Balapatren, in the mythology of India, was an avatar of Vishnu. He lived as a penitent, not knowing himself that he was the god Vishnu. He sought to lead men to follow the good, and destroyed the giants—for instance, Vrutarassuram—whom he slew with his ploughshare. Others call him Bala-Rama (q. v.).

Balaram, one of the two images which are placed on either side of the Hindu idol Jaggernaut (q. v.), in the temple which stands on the sea-coast of Orissa. On each side of the great idol is an image, one part of which is painted white and the other yellow. The first is said to be Subudra, the sister of Jaggernaut, and the other that of Balaram, his brother. The image of Balaram, painted white, is set up in a few temples alone. At the worship of Jaggernaut, and also at that of Krishna, a short service is performed in the name of Balaram.

Bala-Rama (or Balabhadra). Rama, in the mythology of India, was the son of Vasudeva and of the shepherdess Rogani, and step-brother of Krishna. Some make him an incarnation of the world-sake Adidesseh; others call him an incarnation of Vishnu, in which case he is one with Balapatrens. He was a friend of Krishna, but also that of Duryodhana, the son of Kuru; therefore he sought to hinder the war between the two. As he slew a Brahmin, he was obliged to begin a long pilgrimage as a mode of penance. In the meantime the war began between his friends, in which he, however, took no part after his return. In the downfall of the entire family of the Gadawer, he saw the end of himself and Krishna, and withdrew into seclusion, where the human form left him, and he was carried alive into Paradise.

Balaua, a Syriac hymn-writer of the sixth century, has but recently become known to the public through Overbeck's edition of his hymn in St. Ephremi Syri, Rabole, Balasitorumque Opera Selecta (Oxford, 1865, p. 257-330). They were translated into German, with an introduction and notes, by G. Bickell, in the Kempter Bibliothek der Kirchenredner, 1872, No. 67-108. See Bickell, Comperuta rei Syorum Literarium (Monast. 1871), p. 46, and his art. in Wetter u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, i, 671. (B. P.)

Balbi, Giovanni (called De Janua, or Jannunis, from his birthplace), was a Genoese monk of the Order of Brother Preachers, and lived near the close of the 13th century. He must not be confounded with another Genoese, his contemporary, of the Dominican Order—that is to say, with James (Giacomo), called De Voragine, the author of the Golden Legend. Balbi composed, about 1286, a kind of universal dictionary or encyclopedia, which treated of theology, natural history, botany, geography, cosmography, jurisprudence, etc. This was entitled the Catholicon. Schiöffer and Johann Faust published this in 1450, and it was several times republished. The author also wrote Dialogus de Questione Animis ad Spiritum, and Opus Fischiore: the latter work he prepared after having entered the Dominical Order. See Hoefer, Nouvelles Biographies Générales, s. v.

Balboa, Miguel Cavello, a Spanish missionary, lived in the 16th century. He at first served in the wars of France, then embraced the ecclesiastical profession and went to America in 1566. He established himself at Santa Fé de Bogota, where one named Juan de Orozco acquainted him with numerous documents relating to American antiquities; this was without doubt the commencement of his work of research. Having come to Quito in 1576, he occupied himself with the history of the Indians of Peru, and was encouraged in this work by Don Pedro de Pena, bishop of the ancient capital. In 1586 his book, which he had entitled Miscellanea Australis, was finished and dedicated to Dom Fernando Torres of Portugal, count of Villar, viceroy of Peru. This was published under the title of Historie de América, y de los Indios, and formed part of the valuable collection published by M. H. Tenaux-Compaup. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générales, s. v.

Balbuenas, Bernardo de, bishop and poet of Spain, was born at Valdepenas in 1568. He accompanied his family to Mexico, and had scarcely attained his seventeenth year when he became remarkable for his poetic talent. After a time he returned to his native country; but he spent the remainder of his life at Jamaica, where he exercised the functions of judge, or at Porto Rico, where he became bishop. He was there in 1625, when the Dutch pillaged it, and lost a large library. He died at Porto Rico in 1627. He wrote Siglo de Oro en las Selvas de Eripide (Madrid, 1608 and 1821). Another poem, entitled Granocca Mxica, was published (ibid. 1604). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générales, s. v.

July 19, 1820, he was installed as pastor of the churches of Snow Hill, Rehoboth, and Pitt's Creek, Md., where he spent nearly ten years in happy and useful labor. In 1824, by the action of the Synod of Philadelphia, he was made his father's successor, and was included in the resurrected Presbytery of Lewes. He continued to labor in Maryland as pastor of the three churches above named until 1829, after which he lived four years in Fairfax County, Va., preaching as he had opportunity. Then he removed to Prince William County, Va., and supplied for two years the Churches of Warrenston and Greenwich. April 28, 1836, he was received from Lewes Presbytery into Winchester Presbytery. For one year he was agent for the American Colonization Society, and traversed the state for that cause. For nine months he supplied the Church at Frederickburg, Va.; then Nokesville Church four years, and Greenwich Church, Prince William Co., two years. He died Feb. 14, 1878, at the last-named place, which had been his residence for many years. Dr. Balch never was settled as pastor after he left Maryland, but preached in many places and did a large amount of miscellaneous work. He had a strongly literary taste, wrote much on many subjects, and was a very valuable man. At the time of his death he had been writing Letters of an Octoberarian, which were published in The Central Presbyterian of Richmond, Va. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1878, p. 8. (W. Balchristy-People, a small party of strict Independents, formed in the village of Balchristy, in Scotland, by Mr. Smith, who, with Mr. Ferrier, both regular clergymen of the Scottish Church, left the Establishment about the time that the Glassites first appeared. From the statistical accounts published by Sir J. Sinclair, it would appear there is still a church of this name in the town of Perth.

Balcony is a name introduced into architecture by the Venetians and Genoese. It was originally a palca, or advanced tower over a gate-house, intended to carry the machicolations. In the 15th century it was built as an ornament in front of private houses. At St. Bartholomew's, Smithfield, there is a glazed balcony; in the south-nave aisle of Westminster is one of timber—and both communicated with the superior's lodge. At Durham the old anchorage or porch in the north choir aisle was used by the prior to hear high-mass; it was reached by steps; and on the south side of the choir of St. Alban's a similar raised platform was discovered, which was probably used for the same purpose. At Westminster processions could be conveniently viewed from the projecting oriel.

Bald, Anders, a Swedish preacher, was born in 1879. He studied at Upsal, and became in 1747 pastor of the Church of St. Catherine at Stockholm. He died in 1761. Baldachin (Ital. baldacchino, from baldaco, cloth of Babylon or Bagdad) is a small dome which overshadowed a high-altar, and is usually carried on four columns. It was formerly called the ciborium. The word in Italian and German is used as a synonym of the French crown and English canopy—an ornamental projection which covers the tops of stalls, doorways, niches, and windows. The canopy carried over the sovereignty in procession was called a cecel, from cecelum. Baldachin also designates the canopy which Italian bishops have a right to erect over their chairs in church. Another name for the baldachin was munera. See Altar. The ciborium was originally the receptacle of the host, dove or tower shaped, and suspended over the altar; but as luxury increased, under the name of tabernacle it extended itself into an architectural erection above the altar, like a canopy supported by four columns, forming four arches, over which hung rich curtains reaching to the ground, and only drawn aside at certain periods of the mass. In the centre hung the vessel containing the host. Lastly, curtains were abolished, and the form became changed into that now called the baldachin. Justinian's ciborium at St. Sophia was of silver gilt, with a canopy of silver, topped by an orb of massive gold. It supported the altar-curtains, and was crowned with a cross, which subsequently was placed upon the altar itself. When there was no canopy of this kind, a covering of precious stuff or plain linen, such as was ordered by the Council of Cologne in 1280, adorned the altar. The baldachin was ornamented with tapers on festivals, and composed of marble, wood, stone, bronze, or precious metals. It was sometimes erected over tombs. Chrysostom says the silver shrines of Diana resembled small ciboria. In 567 the second Council of Tours ordered that the eucharist be reserved, not in a little receptacle, like images, but under the cross which crowned the ciborium. When designed a baldachin for the altar of St.

He died June 1 of that year; but an appeal having been made to the pope against his election and confirmation, he was not consecrated until Jan. 30, 1306. He died at Stepney, July 24, 1318. He contributed two hundred marks towards building the Chapel of St. Mary on the west side of the west door for monuments in it. He gave two priests in the same church near the altar of St. Erkenwold. Baldovinetti, Alessio, a distinguished Italian painter, was born at Florence in 1442. Baldred, Sr., was a Scotchman and disciple of St. Mungo, or Kentigern, of Glasgow. He inhabited a cell at Tyningham, in Haddingtonshire, and is said to have been eminent for his virtues and gift of miracles. For some years he inhabited a solitary island in the sea called Bass. According to Simeon of Durham, he died in 606-7. He taught the faith in the three parochial churches of Altham, Tyningham, and Prestonne, which had been subjected to him by St. Mungo. After his death the three churches were named after his body; and when the people could not agree, being advised to pray God for a sign, it is said that on the morrow they found three bodies laid out each with the same pomp, and each congregation carried off one to its own church. The Church of St. Baldred of Tyningham had the right of sanctuary. At Preston Kirk some

This history is given in the Gesta Dei per Francos, i, 81. Baldricus also wrote a Life of Hugo, Archbishop of Rouen, which is contained in the Neustria Pia of Du Mouster, p. 282. He was appointed to supply statedly at Lawrenceburg and Whitewater; and thus he continued for two years teaching and preaching in private houses. In this time he organized several churches. Sept. 12, 1812, he was appointed to spend two weeks in the vacancys above Dayton. During his residence at Lawrenceburg he studied medicine, that he might support himself in the missionary work. In 1814 he was appointed as stated supply of Washington for one half of 400 dollars. In 1815 he supplied London and Treacle’s Creek. In the same year the Presbytery appointed him to labor ten days on Paint Creek, Deer Creek, Big and Little Darby, and the headwaters of the Miami. April 8, 1818, he was dismissed to the Presbytery of Lancaster. The next spring he received a call to the churches of Chambersville, New Cumberland, and New Concord. This relation continued until April, 1828, when he was released from the first two, but continued at New Concord until 1824. He then removed to Jeromelve, in the bounds of the Presbytery of Richland, and took charge of the congregation; he also gave one third of his time to Parryville and the same to Rehoboth. Baldwin, archbishop of Trier, 1038-1054, was born in 1295 of a noble family. At the age of thirteen he went to Paris to complete his studies there. In 1004, on account of the war between France and Flanders, he was obliged to leave the school. About this time he joined as provost the metropolitan chapter at Trier. After the death of archbishop John Gebhard II, of Mayence (1005), the bishop of Basle, Peter Aichspalt, used his influence with pope Clement V in behalf of Baldwin; but, instead of the latter, Aichspalt himself was obliged to occupy the see of St. Boniface. Having returned to Paris, Baldwin spent two more years there in preparing for the ministerial work. Being now a bishop, he composed universal histories and canonic studies, he learned that archbishop Dietier, of Trier, had died Nov. 23, 1007, and that he was to succeed him. Baldwin, not having the canonical age—being only twenty-two years old—was dispensed by pope Clement, who consecrated him on March 11. On June 2, 1008, he took possession of his cathedral. King Albrecht having been murdered by his nephew, the duke John, Baldwin’s brother, count Henry of Luxembourg, was elected, whom the archbishop assisted everywhere. After having served his church and country faithfully, Baldwin died Jan. 21, 1034. He edited, in 1344, Ordinarium Horumarum Considerationum, Sacramentarium; see Wittenbach, Getta Trexirorum; Brower et Maseni, *Antiq. et Anuall. Tires., Sibris, Regesten der Erzbischöfe von Trier; Lorenzi, in Wetter u. Welte’s Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v.

Baldwin, Francois, a famous French jurist, was born at Arras, Jan. 1, 1520, and died Oct. 24, 1574, at Paris. For a time he was tutor of Charles of Bourbon. In 1564 William of Orange called him to the Nether- lands, to bring about a harmony of existing religious differences. His publication of Cassandier’s De Officio Petri et Publica Tranquillitatis Verum Amistant Viri in hoc Religionis Dassidio (Usins, 1561) entangled him in a controversy with Calvin. He published also, Minucius Felix Orationes, *Prophetae Vulgaris Christianorum Cu-ratum, Residuum (Heidelberg, 1560), in which he shows that the authorship belongs to Minucius Felix and not to Arminius:—Discurso sur le Fait de la Réforme (Paris, 1564);—S. Optati libri sex de Schismate Donatistarum cum Baldwinii Prefatione* (ibid. 1563); in the preface he tries to show the identity of the Calvinistic schism with that of the Donatists:—Historia Carthaginensis Col Liamini olim habita inter Catholicos et Donatistas (ibid. 1566) (reprinted by Migne, P. P. Cat. xi, 1439 sq.). See Ries, *Convivantium, i, 176; Nicolas, Memoires, xxviii; Kaulen, in Wetter u. Welte’s Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v.

the twig in the hand of the blind Hödur, the brother of Baldur, directed his arm to the place where Baldur stood, and the latter fell to the ground. In order to show the mighty god the greatest respect, Hödur decided to burn his body on his beautiful ship, the Ringhorn. But before the deities took this step, their sorrow was increased by the death of the lovely Nanna, Baldur's wife, who died of anguish for her husband. Two funeral piles were made on the ship, therefore, and it was decided to move it, and set fire to it from all sides. But it could not be moved from the spot. In this difficulty the Asas sent for the giantess Hyrrokkin, who was a great sorceress. She came riding on a fierce wolf. She drew near to the ship and gave it so powerful a push that it floated far out into the sea, and the planks, by the fire's heat, burned. Their fierce flame became so exasperated that he would have crushed the giantess with his hammer, Mjölnir, if the other Asas had not stepped between; but as his awakened anger would not subside without the shedding of blood, it was necessary to make a sacrifice. This was the dwarf Litir, who came in his way when lighting the funeral piles. He took him, therefore, and threw him into the fire. All the Asas, many Jotes, Rhimtusses, and dwarfs were present at the solemnities. They each sacrificed something costly by throwing it into the flames. Odin also threw a costly golden ring into the fire, but it was found afterwards uninjured, and Baldur beheld it. He gave it the attribute that, on every ninth night, eight equally beautiful golden rings would drop from it; wherefrom it received the name Drupner (dropper). Subsequent to the funeral, Frigg said that he who desired her special favor should go to Hel (the goddess of death) and offer her a ransom for the return of her son to the world. Hermode, Baldur's brother, offered to undertake the task, and for this purpose he received his father's eight-footed horse Sleipner, on which he rode for nine days and nights through deep, dark vales and caves, until he came to the river of hell, and crossed the bridge. He was instructed that, in order to find Baldur he must keep to the right on the street of the dead. He did so, and came to the hedge which encircles hell. He girded his horse tighter, took a start, leaped over, and there found his brother on a stately throne in the dwelling of Hela. He asked the latter to permit his younger brother to return with him to the upper world. Hela said she did not wish a ransom, but if all things were sorry for him she would let him return; if, however, there was one living or dead creature that did not sorrow for him, he must remain. Hermode returned with rich presents and poor comfort; but the heralds sent out returned with the cheering news that even the stones were sorry. They found him at the bottom of a well, as it had been found in a certain cave an old woman who positively refused to grieve for Baldur. The mischievous Loke was said to live there in this form, and thus he not only caused Baldur's death, but also prevented his resurrection. Therefore the young god must remain in Helheim until the end of the world, when he will come forth to build Gimle (heaven) with his brother.

Baldwin, Abraham, a Congregational minister, was born at Goshen, Conn., May 1, 1792. He graduated at Yale College in 1810. In June, 1822, he was licensed as a candidate for the ministry by the North Association of Litchfield County, and in the same year was accepted by the Domestic Missionary Society as an evangelist. In the work he was most successful. From January, 1824, he was ordained as an evangelist by the Northwestern Association of Vermont at Essex, Chittenden Co. Mr. Baldwin, hearing of the spiritual destitution of the French population in Lower Canada, resolved to give himself to the work of doing them good. But upon this service he was not permitted to enter. Shortly after reaching Montreal he was seized with illness, which in a few weeks terminated his valuable life, July 12, 1826. He was a good man and full of the Holy Ghost, and through his instrumentality "much people was added unto the Lord, both in Jerusalem, and in all Judaea, and Samaria, and unto the end of the earth." 40:11. His character is that of an able, faithful, and successful preacher of the Gospel; beloved by his own flock, respected by all who knew him, and greatly lamented in his death." See Rev. J. Torrey Smith's Centennial Discourse. (J. C. S.)

Baldwin, Burr, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Weston, Fairfield Co., Conn., Jan. 19, 1778. He entered Yale College in 1805, and graduated in 1809. After finishing his theological course, he taught in an academy for a number of years, and was licensed to preach by the Litchfield Association in 1816. From 1821 to 1823 he served as a missionary in Northern New Jersey. His work was characterized by a powerful hand, in which upwards of two thousand souls were converted. At the close of the year he was called to the pastorate of the Presbyterian Church at Montrose, Pa. He was instrumental in the erection of the First Presbyterian Church of that place. A revival followed his labors and many were converted. Leaving Montrose, he was invited pastor of the Church of North Hartford, Conn., and subsequently supplied the Church at Ashfield. Revivals attended his labors in all places. He was in many respects a remarkable man. During the war of the Rebellion, he served as post-chaplain at Beverly, W. Va., and at the age of seventy-six served as a missionary in South-eastern New York, whence he returned to Montrose, where he died, Jan. 29, 1880. See Presbyterian Banner, Jan. 30, 1880; (N. Y.) Evangelist. (W. P. S.)

Mr. Baldwin was a diligent student, industrious and careful, and of a man of peace. He was never spoken against, and was instrumental in bringing many to Christ. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1879, p. 60.

Baldwin, Charles R., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Stockbridge, Mass., March 17, 1805. He received an excellent early education; emigrated to Virginia in young manhood, and became a successor Yale College in 1805, and graduated in 1808, united with the Presbyterians, and a few months later withdrew and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church. Shortly afterwards he received license to exhort, and in 1834 united with the Ohio Conference. In 1838, in addition to his pulpit labors, he was induced to take charge of the Methodist Seminary at Parkersburg. He died in 1841. Mr. Baldwin was a devoted Christian, a warm and sympathetic preacher, an affectionate and generous parent, and a firm and constant friend. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1841, p. 148.

Baldwin, Edwin, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Georgia in 1828. He emigrated to Mobile, Ala., in early life; served as a volunteer in the Civil War; and for some time after the war; experienced conversion in 1850; immediately began preaching, and in 1854 was admitted into the Alabama Conference, in which he served till his death, Jan. 9, 1886. Mr. Baldwin made himself an orator and a scholar by his own exertions. There was a soldierly manner in his preaching that made him very popular and powerful. He was brave, yet meek; stern, yet loving. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1866, p. 39.

Baldwin, Eli, D.D., a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, was born at Hackensack, N. J., in 1794. C., 1822-24; was missionary agent in New Jersey and Pennsylvania during 1824-25, and in Houston Street, New York city, 1825-39, where he died. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America (3d ed.), p. 170.

Baldwin, George, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Clonbury-Mortimer, Shropshire, about 1763. He labored diligently and successfully as a local preacher. In 1786 he was appointed to travel in Glamorganshire, and continued in the work for twenty-four years. He died at Burslem during the session of the Conference in London, July 30, 1810. "He lived and died as a Christian minister should." See Wesleyan Meth. Magazine, 1811, p. 921; Minutes of the British Conference, 1811; Smith, Hist. of Wesleyan Methodist, ii, 508.

Baldwin, Jeremiah, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born in Strafford, Vt., in 1798, and while a child removed to Bethany, N. Y. His early life was one of hardships and self-denial. While keeping a public-house in Ellington, he was converted in 1832, and at once began to hold meetings and exhort others to become Christians. He was licensed in 1833, and in many years preached in Ellington and the surrounding towns. He was ordained in 1840. Being diligent about receiving anything for his ministerial services, it is said that not so much as ten dollars were paid to him during all his term of service for preaching. He was removed to the Superior Conference in 1875, and lived during nearly all the remainder of his life. At that time Rev. Dr. E. B. Fairfield, his son-in-law, was president of Williams College. Mr. Baldwin died in Byron, Shiawassee Co., Mich., March 8, 1878. See Morning Star, May 22, 1878. (J. C. S.)

Soon after he changed his ecclesiastical relation, and in 1879 became acting pastor of the First Congregational

He was admitted to a master's degree at Dartmouth in 1791, and was licensed by Suffolk Presbytery. On June 17, 1761, he was ordained and served over a Congregational Church in Palmer, Mass. He remained as pastor of this Church until June 19, 1811, when he resigned. He died in 1813. He was faithful and diligent in discharging the duties of his office. His preaching was very impressive. In 1848 he was transferred to the Tennessee Conference, and continued one of its most active and efficient workers until his decease, Oct. 8, 1866. Thousands of conversions testified to his ministerial qualifications. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1866, p. 57.

Baldwin, Theron, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Goshen, Conn., July 21, 1801. While a school-teacher, he was converted and united with the Church, and a year later, when he was twenty-one years old, he began preparation for college under the tuition of his pastor, Rev. Joseph Harvey, D.D. In a little more than a year he entered Yale College, and duly graduated in 1827, when he immediately began study in the theological department. He was especially conspicuous in the organization of a society among the students for the evangelization of the Mississippi valley and points beyond. All arrangements were completed in the spring of 1829, and efforts were at once begun to procure the funds for the contemplated seminary in Illinois, which was a part of the scheme of the organization. In a few months the requisite sum (ten thousand dollars) was pledged to the cause. Mr. Baldwin and Rev. J. M. Sturtevant were ordained at Woodbury, Conn., Aug. 27, 1829, and set apart for the work in Illinois, for which state they immediately departed; and Illinois, which was founded in 1831 by these two men. Mr. Baldwin at the same time began preaching at Vandalia, and subsequently organized the first Illinois Sunday-school Union at Jacksonville, of which he was appointed secretary. In 1831 the trustees of Illinois College elected him as agent to solicit funds for the institution in the East; and two years after he returned to Illinois, and entered the service of the American Home Missionary Society as an agent for reaching the emigrants moving westward. Meanwhile, Capt. Benjamin Godfrey was proposing to found the Monticello Female Academy and was urging Mr. Baldwin to become its principal. Accepting the position, he dissolved his connection with the American Home Missionary Society in 1837, and for the rest of his life was directly identified with education in the new states, and was not inaptly called a "missionary educator." He died at Orange, N. J., April 10, 1870. See Cong. Quarterly, 1875, p. 213.

Baldwin, Thomas, a Congregational minister, was born in Cavendish, Vt., Sept. 30, 1777. He was for many years a Professor in Plymouth Academy. He studied theology with Rev. W. C. Burnap of Chester, and Rev. Justin Parsons of Weston. He was ordained June 15, 1836, at Peru, Vt., and resigned in 1845, but continued to fill the pulpit until July 10, 1849, when, after a pastorate of thirteen years, he removed to Plymouth, where he was acting pastor until September, 1851. In 1852 he went to San Antonio, Tex., but in May, 1855, again returned to Plymouth, where he remained as acting pastor until May, 1858. He then held a ministerial work as acting pastor at Lowell, Vt., from 1858 to 1861; then again at Plymouth from 1862 to 1873, and South Wardsborough in 1874. He was without charge at Plymouth until 1875, when he went to live with his son. He died in Clarksburg, West Va., May 26, 1878. See Cong. Yearbook, 1879, p. 37. (W. P. E.)

Baldwin, Truman, a Presbyterian minister, was born at East Haddam, Conn., Sept. 27, 1779. He fitted for college in his native town, and graduated at New Haven in 1802. He then studied theology for three years. The Hampshire South Association licensed him in 1804, and, full of the missionary spirit, he went to a vacant field in Vermont, and then, in 1807, undertook a pastorate at Charlotte in that state. His seven years there were highly prosperous. In 1815 he declined the invitation to the recently organized Church at Pompey East Hollow, N.Y. Here he labored thirteen years, and then, in 1829, took charge at Cicero. During his residence in both of these places, he did much mission work, established several churches, and helped four candidates to enter the ministry, actions which caused him to suspend his activity for a time. He resumed labor at East Aurora for one year and at Darien Centre for another year, and then accepted a call to Somerset, Niagara Co., where he spent four years. Unable to continue the pastoral work, he opened a classical school at Millidoff, and promoted religion in the community so that a flourishing Presbyterian Church sprang up. He died at Cicero, N. Y., July 27, 1865. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1867, p. 272; Presbyterianism in Central New York, p. 456.

Mr. Baldwin was an upright man, a warm friend, an active citizen and patriot, and a faithful Christian. See Universalist Register, 1864, p. 19.

Balentine, Hamilton, a Presbyterian minister, was born January 19, 1817, at Church Hill, C. S. A. Co., Pa. He graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1845, and in the same year entered Princeton Seminary, and graduated in 1846. Having devoted his life to the foreign mission work, and an urgent call having come for help to the Indian missions, he went to Kowata, a station among the Creek Indians, and devoted himself to this work. Next year he was appointed to assist in giving instruction at Spencer Academy, among the Chocotaws. In 1852 he opened a school for females among the Chickasaws. He also had charge of the boarding-school, and labored as an evangelist in the surrounding country. He died Feb. 21, 1876. See Necrology of Princeton Theological Seminary, 1878, p. 55.

Balestra, Antonio, an Italian painter, was born at BALI ESvara

Verona in 1666, and studied three years under Antonio Belucci. In 1694 he gained the prize of the Academy of St. Luke, and was employed to paint several pictures for the churches and palaces of Rome. Balestra established a school in Venice, and his example and lectures promoted the fame of that school. In the Church of Santa Maria della Pietà Domini in Venice he is one of the best works, representing the Nativitv; and in the Church of Sant' Ignazio at Bologna is a picture by him of the Virgin and Infant, with St. Ignatius and St. Stanislaus. His other works are, Two Soldiers—one standing, the other sitting:—The Virgin Mary in the Clouds with St. John:—The Three Angles with Abraham.

Bali-Esvara, in the mythology of India, was the surname of Siva, under which the Siva cultus spreads far the west. The fruitful portion of the god, the Linga, has been distributed among thirty-one parts of the earth; the largest part, called Bali-Lingga, was given to the shore of the Kamudvati (Euphrates).

This myth is designed to express that the Linga of Bali (Bal) was born again as Bali-Esvara. He ruled, worshipped by all, under the name of Līl-Esvara (the joy imparting), in Nineveh (as king Ninus). His wife, Paravadi, had divorced herself from him because of his unfaithfulness, and had fled to the North-land, where she was worshipped as fire-queen, enclosed in a Samiti-tree, as Samirasa (Semiramis). Bali-Esvara found her in Askalaslan (Askelon). They united again and lived on the shore of Hradanieta (Tigiris). Others relate that they inhabited certain wild districts, in the form of doves, under the names of Kapot-Esvara and Kapot-Esa.

Balfour, John, a Scottish clergyman, was elected to the see of Orkney in 1670, and appointed in the consecration of bishop Livingstone of Dunkeld. John was also bishop in 1691. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 164.

Balfour, Robert, D.D., a Scotch divine, was born in Edinburgh about 1747, and was educated in that city.

After being licensed to preach, he presents to the parish of Leacroft, where he officiated for about five years; and in 1779 he was removed to the Outer High-Church, in the city of Glasgow, which charge he held till his death, Feb. 13, 1818.

Dr. Balfour was a man of sterling worth, and high-mindedness; and all things were in the pulpit. During a long life he maintained an unblemished reputation, and discharged his duties as a Christian minister with rare fidelity. See The Christian Herald (New York), 1818, p. 694.

Bali, in Hindū mythology, was a mighty ruler of India who reigned in the second periodic age; and, as he was a great philosopher and disciple of Sakra, he carried the name of Mahāsakṛsvatī. He was descended from the family of the Eruwa, was a grandson of Pragalased, and was held identical with Balaśri. The latter was a favorite of Brahma, and, with his assistance, he conquered the whole earth. He would even have besieged heaven if Vishnu had not come to the assistance of the god, and put an end to all things.

Bali had his residence in the paradise of the king of Patala. The god granted his petition, and made him ruler of the infernal regions (named Balikesar, after him), where Bali has his perpetual abode. During the cold season Brahma is said to have, during the hottest season, and the other gods die, and the god would die, Vishnu is his protection. The preserver and destroyer, Siva, remains at his side when the rain overflows all things. His great festival is celebrated in September, at which time of the year spring begins in Malabar. Among the ruins of Malapipura and in the forest of Tailapiga he has his home. It is believed to be found; and it is thought that Bali was a half-historic person, and that he was a great conqueror.

Related to Bali, or possibly identical with him, is Balali, king of the Affen, an incarnation of the god Indra, the sun.

Balinese Version of the Scriptures. Balinese is a language spoken in the island of Bali, which lies to the east of Java; being about seventy miles long, and containing a population of about three quarters of a million. It is but recently that the people of Bali have received a printing press, and in the Gospel of the God Christ, the Gospel of St. Mark; the translation of which was undertaken by the Rev. R. van Eck, of the Utrecht Missionary Society, in 1875, and printed in 1877. (B. P.)

Balisatma, in Hindū mythology, is the empire of Bali, or the world below; otherwise called Paddala.

Balik, the ancient Bactra or Zaraiqah, was formerly a great city; but is now, for the most part, a mass of ruins, situated on the right bank of the Adish or Balkh river, in a large and fertile plain eighteen hundred feet above the sea. The ruins, which occupy a space of about twenty miles in circuit, consist chiefly of fallen mosques and decayed buildings of sunburnt bricks. The antiquity and greatness of the place are recognized by the native populations, who speak of it as the Mother of Cities. Its foundation is mythically ascribed to Kaïomus, the Persian Romulus; and it is at least certain that, at a very early date, it was the rival of Ecbatana, Nineveh, and Babylon. For a long time the city and country were the central seat of the Zoroastrianism of the founder of the Persian dynasty, who is said to have died within its walls. It was the seat of the principal Persian pyramus, or fire temple, and the residence of the archimamus, or chief priest. In the 7th century there were in the city and vicinity about a hundred Buddhist convents, with three thousand devotees; and there were also a large number of stupas and other religious monuments. In the 10th century Balkh is described as built of clay, with ramparts and six gates, and extending half a parassag (about two miles). There were several important commercial routes from the city, stretching as far east as India and China. See Encyclop. Brit. (9th ed.), s. v.

Baliks, in Oriental mythology, was the name of the queen of Sheba, according to the traditions of the Arabs. She was the daughter of Hadad, the twenty-first king of Yemen. Through the bird Hudhud, Solomon and the queen wrote each other most loving letters, until Balkis began a journey—which the imagination of the Orientals describes as the most magnificent ever seen by gods and men—and came to Solomon, whom she married.

Bali, in Hindū mythology, is a spirit with three heads, reigning in the east of hell. He teaches the science of making one's self invisible. Sixty-six legions of spirits are his servants.

Ball-flower is an ornamental resembling a ball placed in a globular flower, the three petals of which form a cup around it. This ornament is usually found inserted in a hollow moulding, and is generally characteristic of the Decorated style of the 14th century; but it sometimes occurs, though rarely, in buildings of the 13th century, or Early English style, as in the west front of Salisbury Cathedral, where it is mixed with the tooth ornament. It is, however, rarely found in that style, and is an indication that the work is late. It is the prevailing ornament at Hereford Cathedral, in the south aisle of the nave of Gloucester Cathedral, and the west end of Grantham Church; in all these instances in pure Decorated work. A flower resembling this, except that it has four petals, is occasionally found in very late Norman work, but it is used with other flowers and ornaments, and not repeated on a long series, as in the Decorated style. A similar ornament is of frequent occurrence in the 12th century in the west of France. See Nich; RIB; WINDOW, etc.

BALLIZIN (βαλίζινος). The Council of Laodicea (can. 55) says, "Christians ought not at marriages βαλίζινος ὁ λυγρὸς—to use wanton balls or dancing—but dine or sup gravely, as becometh Christians." Some by the word βαλίζινος understand studying on cymbals and dancing to them; but the word denotes something more, viz. tossing the hands in a wanton and lascivious manner; and in that sense there was good reason to forbid it. The third Council of Toledo forbids it under the name of ballimathia (q. v.), which they interpret to be wanton dances joined with lascivious songs. The Council of Agde (can. 39) forbids the clergy to be present at such marriages where obscene love-songs were sung, or the motions of the body were used in dancing. The like canons occur in the Council of Leirida. See Bingham, Christ. Antiq. bk. xvi, ch. xi, § 15; bk. xxii, ch. v, § 8. See DANCING.

She died Dec. 14, 1668. Her religious works were published by P. Grossi of the Oratory (Paris, 1700). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

At the Pauline Library at Leipsic there are other mystic treatises bearing his name, which by their titles—De Imitazione Christi, De Compunctione, De Interna Consolatione—bear a resemblance to the works of Thomas à Kempis. Bamboo-bridge. The inhabitants of the island of Formosa believe that the souls of wicked men are tormented after death by being cast headlong into a bottomless pit full of fire and dirt; and that the souls of the virtuous are saved over it upon a narrow bamboo-bridge, which leads directly to Paradise. But when the souls of the wicked attempt to pass over it, they fall over on one side into the abyss below. See Al-Sharát.

Bamford, Stephen, a Methodist preacher in the British provinces, was born near Nottingham, England, in 1804. In his youth he entered the 27th Regiment of Foot, was with the duke of York in Holland in 1793, and assisted in quelling the great rebellion in Ireland in 1798. He was converted while there, and soon became a zealous local preacher. In 1804 he came with his regiment to Halifax, N. S. In 1806 he entered the ministry and for eighty years travelled and preached with great success in the maritime provinces. In 1810 he was ordained by bishop Asbury; in 1836 he attended the Wesleyan Conference in Birmingham, England, and on returning assumed a supernumerary relation in St. John, N. B. He subsequently removed to Digby, N. S., where he died, Aug. 14, 1848. Bamford's preaching was unique in its expression of thought, aptness in illustration, and religious quaintness; powerful in its sweetness, union, and pathetic appeal. He was greatly beloved for his many excellences of character, and his labors did much to establish Methodism in the provinces. See Burt, in (Lond.) West. Bampfield (or Bampfylde), Francis, an English Baptist minister, was born at Portonion, Devonshire, about the year 1610, being descended from an ancient and honorable family. His parents having consecrated him to the work of the Christian ministry, he was sent, at the age of sixteen, to Waldham College, Oxford, where he took the degree of A.M. in 1636. Soon after leaving the university, he received orders in the Established Church, and was appointed to a living in Dorsetshire. Here he performed most faithfully his duties as a minister, spending a small annuity of his own in works of Christian charity among his parishioners. On the breaking-out of the civil war in England, he was an open, avowed loyalist as well as a zealous conformist. Such was the zeal he displayed that he was appointed a prebendary in the Cathedral of Exeter, entering upon the duties of his office May 15, 1647. He was not blind, however, to the fact that a great reform needed to be effected in the Church of England; and, as a conscientious minister, he set himself to do what he could to bring it about. The trouble and persecution which he encountered resulted in his enlisting himself on the side of the Parliament. In 1655 he became a minister of the parish in Sherborne. The passage of the Uniformity Act, with the conditions of which he was altogether dissatisfied, was the occasion of his resigning his position. He now was expelled to the persecuting spirit of the times, which assailed him with great virulence. For eight years he was imprisoned in Dorchester jail. In his confinement he preached almost every day, and his labors were signalized by his fellow-prisoners. Being discharged in 1657, he resumed his preaching, and was again imprisoned for a few months. He was expelled from his town in 1662; and in 1664, he was avowed Baptist. For several years he preached in London, where he experienced all kinds of annoyance in his work. At length he was committed to Newgate, and, after undergoing many indignities, he died in consequence of the hardships to which he had been subjected, Feb. 16, 1684. His biographer says that "he was a man of great learning and judgment, and one of the most celebrated preachers in the West of England. After he became a Baptist he lost much of his reputation among his former friends, but preserved his integrity to the last." Among his published writings were the following: Judgment for Observation of the Jewish Sabbath, with Mr. Ben's Answer (London, 1672):—All in One; All Useful Sciences and Profitable Arts, in One Book of John, Ezekiel (ibid. 1677, 2 pts.):—Historical Declaration of the Life of Shin Asher (ibid. 1681, fol.:)—Grammatical Opening of Some Hebrew Words in the Bible (1684). Bana (the word), the name given in common conversation to the sacred writings of the Buddhists; the books in which the writings are contained are called Bana-Pot, and the structure in which the truth is preached or explained is called the Bana-Madwaca. The principal books are the Tripitaka, or the three books written in verse, with the native authors; and the language in which they express themselves is of the strongest and most laudatory description. The sacred books are literally worshipped, and benefits are expected to result from this adoration as from the worship of an intelligent being. The books are usually wrapped in cloth, and are often placed upon a rude altar near the roadside, that those who pass by may place money upon them and obtain merit.

Banban. In Irish hagiography there are several Banbans given. (1) Two of these are probably the same person, Banban the Wise, attached to separate days, May 1 and 9. Colgan (Tr. Thum. p. 176) is of the opinion that the Banbanaun to whom St. Patrick committed the Domnach Mor, or large basilica in Magh-Sleach, was Banban the Wise. He also supposes him to have been a son of Richella, sister of St. Patrick. In Tr. Thum. he is called presbyter, but at May 1 the Mart. Tallaght calls him bishop. (2) Bishop of Leitighim, commemorated Nov. 26; the abbot of Ciseadha (Clane, County Kildare), who died A.D. 777. (3) Another bishop, put by Mart. Doneg., etc., on Dec. 3.

Thome Doctoris Angelici, Ordinis Predicatorum ex omnibus textis Operibus, exacte Deprompta, with additions;—in particular, Opusculum de Castitatis (Avignon, 1647);—Brevis Universe Theologiae term Moralis quam Scholastico Cursus in Gratissim Studiunum edita juzeta Inconsulta Tutiissimae Doctoris Angelici D. Thome Dogmatia:—Traité de la Chasteté, in 3 pts.:-Traité de la Vérité de la seule Religion Catholique et Romaine. These last two works are found in MS. in the collection of the order at Avignon. A protegé of Catherine de' Medici, he went to France while very young, and this was his adopted country. In 1593 he denounced the project of Barrière of assassinating Henry IV, and refused the ambassador of Angoulême a deed of his trial in 1625. He wrote, Apologie contre les Jugemens Téméraires de ceux qui ont pensé servir la Religion en faisant assassiner le Roi de France (Paris, 1596). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bancroft, David, a Congregational minister, was born in Rindge, N. H., Feb. 10, 1809. The first sixteen years of his life were passed at home, his father removing to Grafon, Vt., in 1811. At the age of seventeen he was apprenticed to an uncle in Worcester, Mass., to learn the mason's trade. A short time after he was engaged as a clerk in a dry goods house in Cambridgeport, Mass., where he was converted under the preaching of Dr. Beecher. Two years after, he fitted for college, and in 1835 graduated at Amherst. In 1838 he graduated at Theological Institution of Contra, and began labor at once at Willington, Conn., where in 1839 he was ordained to a pastorate which lasted nearly twenty years. From Willington he went to Prescott, Mass., June 3, 1838, where he died, March 11, 1875. See Cong. Quarterly, 1876, p. 63.

Band (figuratively used). Government and laws are bands that restrain from sin and draw into the path of righteousness (Psa. ii, 3; Jer. v. 5). Slavery, distress, fear, and perplexity are called bands because they restrain liberty, and create irritation (Lev. xxvii, 13; Ezek. xxxiv, 27; Psa. xxviii, 52). Sinful customs or meretricious allurements are bands; they ensnare, weaken, degrade, and embitter the soul; they are fetters that at first may seem soft as silk, but are found at last to be iron (Isa. lvii, 6; Ecclus. vii, 26). The wicked often “have no bands in their death;” that is, they frequently die without any peculiar distress, fear, or perplexity, such as might be expected to stamp their real character and condition on the verge of their future woe (Psa. lixii, 4; Ecclus. vii, 15; ix, 2). Faith and love are bands which unite and fasten every believer to Christ, and to the whole body of his holy people (Col. ii. 19). The authority, arguments, instances, and influence of divine love, because they draw and engage us to follow the Lord in a way suited to our rational nature, are generally supposed to be intended in Hos. xi, 4 by “the bands of a man.”

Band, in architectura, is a flat, face or fascia, a square moulding, or a continuous tablet or series of ornaments, etc., encircling a building or continued along a wall. Bands of panelling on the outer surface of the walls are very usual in rich work of the Perpendicular style, especially on the lower part of a tower, and sometimes higher up between the stories also, as in the rich Somersetshire tower, and in Northamptonshire and Oxfordshire, and, indeed, wherever rich churches of this style are found. This kind of ornament is, however, used in the earlier styles also, though less frequently. See also a good illustration from Telertoft Church under PERPENDICULAR STYLE. Band is a name for the moulding or suite of mouldings which encircles the pillars and small shafts in Gothic architecture, the use of which was most prevalent in the Early English style. Bands of this description are not unfrequently met with in late Roman work, but they show that it is verging towards the succeeding style; they are also occasionally to be found in early Decorated work. When the shafts are long they are often encircled by several bands at equal distances apart between the cap and base. See TABLET.

Bandage, Nuns', is the linen band which nuns wear over their foreheads to signify that they have closed their eyes to all worldly objects. See Nun.

Bandaya (Sanct. a person entitled to reverence), the name given to the priests of Nepal. They are divided in that country into four orders: biskor, or mendicants; trandaka, or readers; chandaka, or scantily robed; and arkoute or arkuta, adepts.

Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bandello, Vittorio d., an Italian Dominican, was born in 1435 at Castel Nuovo. He studied at Bologna, became professor of theology, and in 1501 general of his order. He was one of the most violent adversaries of the immaculate conception of the Virgin, and treated the Franciscans who defended the doctrine as impious, ignorant heretics, until Sextus IV, by his bill of 1483, favored the belief of the Franciscans. Bandello died at Atome, Calabria, Aug. 27, 1506. He wrote, Libellus Recolocatoris de Veritate Conceptioh B. Marie Virginis (Milan, 1749), a work refuted by a friar named Luigi della Torre:— Tractatus de Singulare Puritate et Pragmatica Conceptioh Salvatoris (Bologna, 1841). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bangor Use, in ecclesiastical phraseology, is (1) Ancient rites, according to the use of the Church of Bangor; (2) A form for celebrating holy communion, substantially agreeing with the ancient Sarum Missal, but yet having several liturgical peculiarities of its own, commonly used in the diocese of Bangor and some parts of Wales prior to the Reformation. A rare vellum copy, small folio, of a Bangor pontifical is preserved in the cathedral library there.

He died at Paris, Jan. 14, 1743. The scholar De la Barre is supposed to have shared the composition of the works of Banduri, but one of which is entitled Imperium Orientale, etc. (Paris, 1712), and another, Numeramata Imperat. Rom., etc. (ibid. 1718). These two works are the most complete of any which exist upon the medals of the Lower Empire of Rome and Constantinople. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Banadas, a religious sect in the empire of the Mogul. The word is sometimes used in a general and extended sense to denote the idolaters of India as distinguished from the Mohammedans; but in a more restricted sense it is applied to the Vaishyas (q. v.). In the Shaster they are called Shuddhery, and they follow the occupation of merchants or of brokers. Should a Banian quit his mercantile occupation and give himself wholly up to the performance of religious duties, even though he still retain his caste, he is regarded as a Brahmin of a more devout kind. The Banians are the great factors by whom most of the trade of India is managed. They claim it as almost a matter of sacred right that all mercantile arrangements should be conducted through them. They are found, accordingly, everywhere throughout Asia, where they are not only merchants, but act as bankers, and give bills of exchange for most of the cities of Hindustan.

Banira was probably a Gallic local goddess near Lausanne. She is only mentioned on an inscription found there.

Banks of Piety (or Monts de Pitié, as the French call them) are common in Polish countries. They are professedly designed for the benefit of the poor, but really intended to promote the interests of the Church. They are, in fact, spiritual pawnbroking establishments, conducted on the usual principles of these institutions, but the profits of which go to the papal treasury. They were approved by the fifth Lateran Council. See Monts.

Banks, David F., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the diocese of New York, was elected rector of St. Luke's Church, Nashua, N. H., in 1861; in 1864 he was rector of Christ Church, Norwich, Conn.; and in the following year Grace Church at Yantic was added to his charge. He resided in Yantic until 1875, when he was appointed rector of St. Paul's, N. Y., as rector of St. Paul's Church; in 1877 he went to Fairfield, Conn., where he died suddenly, Aug. 29, 1878, aged forty years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1879, p. 168.

Banks, John (1), a minister of the Society of Friends, was born in Sunderland, Cumberland Co., England, in June, 1837. He became a Christian at the age of sixteen, and at the age of twenty-two was recognised as a minister. He entered at once upon that life of suffering for conscience's sake so common among Friends in the period in which he lived. At one time he says his associates in prison, where he was thrust because he would not pay certain fees, were "a Bedlamian and four with him for theft, two notorious thieves, two moss-troopers for stealing cattle, and a woman for murdering her child." For several years he travelled extensively through Great Britain and Ireland. A full account of his different journeys, together with a large number of his letters written to his wife and others, may be found in his Memoirs. He has also left an account of a long imprisonment of nearly seven years which he endured in the city of Carlisle (1864-91). The last years of his life he spent in Somerset. His death took place Aug. 6, 1710. Several of his epistles and other papers may be found in The Friends' Library, ii, 1-68. (J. C. S.)

Banks, John (2), D.D., an Associate minister, was born in Stirling, Scotland, about 1763, and was educated in his native country. He was for some time a minister in the Presbytery of Edinburgh, but resigned his charge and entered into commerce in 1786, and afterwards devoted some time to the Associate Congregation in New York city, and declined a call from that body in 1788. He was installed as pastor at Cambridge, N. Y., in September, 1799. Here he remained until June, 1802, when he became pastor at Florida, N. Y. He remained in this devoted fourteen years, during which time he gave private instruction to boys and young men. In 1816 he removed to Philadelphia as permanent supply, and soon after opened a select school for instruction in Latin and Greek. Afterwards he took charge of the grammar-school connected with the university, and taught several pupils Hebrew. In 1818 he was installed as pastor of the congregation which he had served as supply for two years. In May, 1820, he was elected professor of theology in the Eastern Theological Seminary at Philadelphia. He was licensed by the Associate Presbytery of Philadelphia, Oct. 1, 1826, and shortly after went South, and was ordained Oct. 15, 1831, by the Associate Presbytery of Carolina as pastor of Bethany and Sardis churches, S. C., and Fisgah and Cobb Creek, N. C. He subsequently settled in the congregations of Northfield, Stow, and Springfield, O.; but, in consequence of feeble health, resigned his charge and accepted another in the Western Pennsylvania, at Allegheny City. He was appointed missionary to the island of Trinidad, July 27, 1843, and labored in that field for eight years. On his return in 1851 he established a seminomous paper entitled The Friend of Missions. He died at his residence in Mercer, Pa., April 14, 1860. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulp. IX, iii, 53.

He was converted in early life, entered into revival work with great zeal, received his first appointment to Antigua, W. I., in 1826, and soon saw a great revival on that island characterized by extraordinary scenes. He returned to England in 1837, retired from the ministry at the age of forty-five, 1850, and died at Bridlington, June 15, 1878. Mr. Banks was quick and decisive in action, independent in judgment, and an original thinker. His preaching was earnest, fervently Protestant, and was successful in awakening sinners. See Minutes of the British Conferences, 1878, p. 45.

In 1818 he entered the Illinois Conference, and labored diligently on its frontier circuits until his death, Sept. 4, 1831. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1830, p. 214.

Bannard, John, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Yorkshire, Eng., Jan. 30, 1800. He was converted in his nineteenth year; graduated at Union College in 1846; taught during several subsequent years in Jonesville Academy, and in 1850 united with the Troy Conference, which he served till his decease, May 11, 1858. Mr. Bannard was amiable, humble, devoted, and an able elder. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1854, p. 374.

Banner, a square flag carried in processions after Roman Catholic custom, and usually designating the parish to which it belongs by the image of the patron saint. In the chapel of orders of knighthood, as in St. George’s Chapel, Windsor, the Chapel of the Order of the Garter, the banner of each knight—i.e. a little square flag bearing his coat of arms—is suspended at his appropriate stall. The installation of a knight is a religious ceremony, hence the propriety of the act. It is not uncommon to place banners taken in battle over the tombs of victorious generals. Banners were formerly a part of the ornaments of the altar, and were suspended over it “that in the Church the triumph of Christ may be more prettier to behold in mind” (Durand). A heraldic banner is attached to the staff on which it is carried by one side, while the ecclesiastical banner is suspended from the top of the staff by means of a yard. See Pugin, Gloss. of Ecl. Ornament and Costume.

Banners in church and processions were adopted from Constantine’s use of the labarum—the cross-banners XI.—11—

— which was carried in the van of his army. They were used to commemorate the Easter victory of our Lord. The sacramental character and Church triumphant character of banners, as a relic of the Hebrew words forming the text Exod. xvi, 11. The emperor Heraclius in 621 took a picture of the cross to battle in his war with Persia, and carried, the cross on his shoulders up Calvary as an act of thanksgiving, which was the origin of the festival of the Exaltation of the Holy Cross. Instances of banners in England are those of two guthfanes, war-vanes or standards, which were given by bishop Lofric to Exeter Cathedral. But St. Augustine before this had entered the gates of Canterbury with a banner of the cross carried before his procession, singing a litany. The banner of St. Cuthbert was of white cloth embellished with the same cross as the same one contained in the centre St. Cuthbert’s corporal cloth. It was fringed with red silk and gold, and had three silver bells attached to it. It was of great weight, and five men assisted the bearer when it was carried in procession. Pope Gregory III sent a banner which he had blessed to the King of France; Pope Adrian II one to Charlemagne; and Alexander II sent another to William of Normandy for his invasion of England. Philip II of France also received a papal banner. King Henry V carried a cross-banner in his expedition against the Lollards; and in the rising of the North in 1570 the king’s banner embodied the three crosses, the five wounds, a chalice, and a cross, with the legend In hoc signo vives (“thou shalt conquer by this sign”). The banners of St. John of Beverley, St. Peter of York, and St. Wilfrid of Ripon were carried on a sacred car, crowned with a cross, by archbishop Thurstan in 1198, at the battle of the Standard, or Norhallerios, an imitation of the carovici invented by Eribert, archbishop of Milan, in 1083; and beneath the banner of St. John, carried by a priest, Edward I fought against the Scots. Henry II carried the banner of St. Edmund of Bury to the battle of Fornham, Oct. 16, 1672. Round the shrine of St. Cuthbert at Durham the banners of the king of Scotland, lord Neville, and other noblemen were placed as ornaments and acts of homage. The earl of Surrey borrowed St. Cuthbert’s banner (which was carried at Flodden), and, as Skelton says, that of St. William of York in his Scottish campaign. Ferdinand and Isabella chased the Moors out of Granada, led by the cross-banners. The banners of Burgundy and Edward IV were beneath the banners of St. Edmund the Confessor and St. George. In later days captured flags were suspended round the dome of St. Paul’s, and the banners of the Bath and St. George at Westminster and Windsor. Henry VII offered the banner of St. George at St. Paul’s after his elevation to the throne. The banner of St. Denis was always carried before the kings of France in battle, as by Philip le Bel and Louis le Gros; and regimental colors invariably receive benediction by a priest before their presentation. Pope Pius V in 1568 “baptized” the flag of Alva’s label, or standard, by the name of Margaret. After the Reformation in England, Cartwright mentions “bells and banners in rogations, the priest in his surplice saying gospels and making crosses.” In parish processions banners are still carried in front of choirs at Peterborough, Southwell, and other places. At Salisbury, before the Reformation, three large banners were carried on Ascension-day—two in the midst, of the cross, and one in advance, representing the Lion of Judah; while in the rear was his trophy, the image of a dragon. At Canterbury they included the arms of noble benefactors. In some places till recently a lingering relic of banners might be seen: a banner suspended on a pole which was carried at the perambulation of parishes. Casalius says the procession resembles a celestial host rejoicing in the triumph of Christ, and displaying the sign of the cross and banners to the discomfiture of the powers of the air. And Cranmer said, “We follow His banner as Christ’s soldiers, servants, and men of war.
for the remembrance of him, declaring our proneness and readiness in all things to follow and serve him—a thought which beautifully harmonizes with the admo-nition at holy baptism, that we should serve under Christ's banner, and fight manfully against his enemies, continuing his faithful soldiers and servants unto our lives' end (Psa. xx. 5). Banners were used at wedddings and funerals; the lesser guilds borrowed those of the peple to church chansons, and the greater ones to the length and simplicity. Spurious forms of the Privilegium extend it to the election of bishops and to the whole of Saxoo England.

II. Held A.D. 798, if at all; said to have been under Kenuulf, King (not of Kent, but) of Mercia, and archiejs at the bishop Aethelnothe, with two bishops (two lists, both spurious), abbots, and an archdeacon; and to have prohibited lay interference with churches and monasteries, in complicance with a mandate of pope Leo III. The decree, however, is verbatim that of the (genuine) Council of Clovesho of A.D. 805, from which also one of the lists of bishops is partly taken. The copy at Canterbury, however, has no signatures.

Bapte, from Brian, to eosach, a name formerly appplied to the priests of the Thracic goddess Cotya, or Cotytta, and was derived from them in their festivals of washing in tepid water. But-mann, however, in his Mykologi does not deny that the name Bapte was applied to the priests referred to. See Cotya.

Baptism, Angel of. Tertullian speaks of an angel who is present at baptism, and who prepares the water to be mixed. These fonts and under the name of the angels, men are prepared by the cleansing of the font for the following gift of the Holy Spirit. His language is not inconsistent with a belief that this may have been a mere individual speculation of his own rather than a doctrine generally accepted in his time. No parallel to this language has hitherto, so far as the writer knows, been alleged from any other early writers. But in more than one of the early Ordines Baptismi there will be found expressions derived, in all probability, from this very passage of Tertullian.

Baptism of Desire (baptismus flaminis) is a phrase used for the desire experienced by an unbaptized person living in a heathen country or beyond the influence of the Visio-ble Church to receive the sacrament of baptism, which desire, with a sincere intention and hearty repentence, is regarded by theologians as standing in the place of, or as equivalent to, actual baptism—baptismus flaminis.

Baptism of Tears is a phrase for that repentance in which the shedding of tears forms a part, and by which a sinner is restored to the favor of God and to communion with his Church.

Baptismal Regeneration. A writer in the Cyclopedia Britannica (9th ed. s.v. "Baptism") has these striking remarks on the origin of this dogma:

"In studying the statements made by the early fathers upon baptism, we find not so much a distinct and definite doctrine as groupings towards a doctrine, and it is not until we come to St. Augustine that we can find any strict and systematic presentation of the magical effets of the sacrament, and at other times explain its result in metaphors. Thus Pope Gregory the Great says, 'Our life is sanctified by water; ' while Tertullian expressly declares, 'Animis non lavatione sed responsione sanctificatur.' With this, St. Augustine avoided the abundant use of metaphorical language by the Greek fathers, and the want of a strictly theological terminology prevented the use of the word baptism like the precise doctrinal statements which became familiar in the Western Church; while the prevalence of curious Greek physical speculations, which taught the power of certain words to work good or evil, and the accustomed custom of speaking with and distorted ideas about the effects of water in baptism. In St. Augustine, the great theologian of the Western Church who first gave expression to the dogmatic statements about the nature and meaning of baptism. The real difficulty to be explained was the connection between the outward rite and the inward spiritual change; or, to put it more precisely, the relation between the word used and the effect, which is the word alone can regenerate. The Greek theologians had shrink-ed rather than faced the difficulty, and used terms at one time exaggerating the magical value of the element, at another insisting on the purely ethical and spiritual nature of the rite; but they never attempted to show in what sense the external rite is an indication of the inward change of heart. It is true that one or two theologians have been insistent on the antithesis, but this was more apparent than real; for the theology of the Greek Church in this, as in most other doctrines, is determined by the tendency to represent regeneration and kindred doctrines much more as a species of chemical change of nature than as a change in the soul. Augustinians stood strongly on the distinction between the sacrament itself and what he called the 'res sacramenti'—between the inward and external signs, and they adhered to the doctrine that only the soul is regenerate by baptism. Augustine became the founder of both the modern Roman Catholic and the modern Protestant views. Among the latter, however, it is not difficult for the orthodox Protestant to subscribe to most of Augustine's positions, and to be inwardly convinced by the strong, and not on the uselessness of the external sign with the inward blessing of the Spirit. But in this doctrine, as in most of the doctrine of baptism, Augustine interfered to make practically inoperative his more spiritual views of baptism. The Church, Augustine thought, was the body of Christ; and that in a peculiarly external and physical way, and just as the soul of man cannot, so far as we know, exert any influence save and through the body, so the Spirit of Christ dispenses his graces and regenerating influences only through the body of Christ, i.e. the Church. But the Church, Augustine thought, was in a variable spiritual condition. It was the visible kingdom of God, the visible 'civitas Dei' in perpetuo regenerata versus, and the Church, and the right and possibility of participating in the spiritual benefits which members of the Church can alone enjoy. And therefore he was not at all surprised by the entrance of this into the visible kingdom. Thus, while Augustine in theory always laid greatest stress upon the work of the Holy Spirit itself, the mystical body of Christ, he practically gave the impetus to that view of the sacrament which made the external rite of primary importance. It was the Holy Spirit who was to impart spiritual life to the children of God. But the one way by which the benefits of this Spirit could be shared was in the first place through the visible Church. Baptism was the only necessary medium of salvation, and all who were baptized were saved. In this he was agreeable, while recognizing the spiritual nature of the sacrament, held views about the importance of the rite which were as strong as those of any Greek theologian. The importance of the external rite, according to Greek doctrines and the maxims of pagan philosophy about the creative power of the element of water. Of course such a doctrine of the importance of the baptism with water had to be modified to some extent. There were cases of Christian martyrs who had never been baptized, and yet had confessed Christ, and died to confess him; for theirs the idea of a baptism of blood was brought forward; they were baptized not with water, but in their own blood. And the same desire to widen the circle of the baptized led the way to the recognition of the baptism of heretics, laymen, and others. It was the doctrine of baptism which was developed by the schoolmen, and which now is the substance of modern Roman Catholic theology. The schoolmen, whose theology was dominated by the Augustinian conception of the Church, simply took over, and made somewhat more mechanical use of what Augustine's doctrine was enabled to give the doctrine a more precise and definite shape by accommodating it to the terms of the Aristotelian logic. They began distinguishing between the matter and the form of baptism. Had Augustine had this distinction before him, he would probably have called the water the matter, and the act of the Holy Spirit the form which verified and gave shape to the matter; but the thought of the schoolmen was more me- mechanical, the magical idea of the sacrament came much more into prominence, and the spiritual and ethical fell more into the background. And so it was, while water was the materia sacramentui, the forma sacramenti was the words of the rite—'I baptize thee,' etc., etc. The external rite was the instrument of the external rite, and the work of the Holy Spirit, which Augustine had clearly before him in theory at least, was driven back into the background. As a result, what was inseparably connected with the performance of the rite that the external ceremony was held to be the final, the warrant of true inward spiritual power and reality: and it was held that in baptism grace was conferred ex orae operato. The actual benefits which were supposed to be secured by baptism (original sin, and forgiveness of it and all sins committed up to the time of baptism, and the implanting of a new spiritual life) were supposed to come by a deadly sin. The eschatological doctrine of baptism is the doctrine of the Roman Catholic Church, and the re- statement of its doctrine by Mohler and Jesuit theologians on the other, do not do more than give a poetical coloring to the doctrine, or bring out more thoroughly the magical and mechanical nature of the rite.

Baptismarium, the medieval title of a service-book containing the ritual used in administering baptism.

Baptism, Register of. Such record was first ordered to be kept by the injunctions of Cromwell in 1536, and the regulation was renewed by Canon 70 of the Synod of London, 1602-3, which orders "min-isters and registrars, captains of churchings, weddings, and burials," the said register to be kept in "a sure coffer with three locks and keys." In the Church of Rome the baptismal register is directed to be kept in the sacristy, and the register of each baptism ought to be signed by the father, if present, and by the spon- sors. In most modern churches similar records are required.

Baptist, Edward, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in Mecklenburg County, Va., May 12, 1739, and was a graduate of Hampden Sidney College. Changing his relations from the Presbyterian Church, which he joined at the age of eighteen, he became a Baptist, and was ordained in 1815 and settled in Powhatan County. Dr. Baptist occupied a very prominent position in the movement in Virginia in winning persons to active part in promoting its interests in the state. In 1835 he removed to Marengo County, Ala., and was for many years pastor of a Church in Uniontown. He was a somewhat prolific writer, contributing many ar- ticles to the Richmond Religious Herald, etc. He died March 81, 1863. See Baptist Encyclopedia, p. 72. (J. C. S.)

In conclusion, he admonishes all those Jews who have found the Saviour to remain steadfast in the faith, and to live according to the Gospel. See Wolf, Bibl. Hebr. iii, 808 sq.; Först, Bibl. Jud., i.

near Antioch in the 5th century. After many years of utter seclusion in a cell so small that he could neither stand nor lie in it, he was at last induced by Theodotus, the bishop of Antioch, to come forth. He appeared wrapped in skins from head to foot, with the exception of his mouth and nostrils.
Among other eminent monks and hermits, he was

Eusebius Gallenacus, the author of Homily 48 in the works of St. Augustine, and others to whom St. Romanus of Cæsarea, martyred at Antioch, and Asclepiades, the prefect, his judge, referred the question concerning the truth of the Christian religion. Barilius, having declared Christ to be the true God, was forthwith put to the torture by Asclepiades, and martyred with Romanus. The story has but small authority. It gives them power to appoint or depose the inferior clergy, to grant licenses for marriages, to issue divorces, to collect the revenues belonging to the churches, and to receive and dispose of them—short, in short, to enjoy all the privileges, and to perform all the duties, belonging to their high station.

Barax (or Baraza), Cyprian, a French missionary, was sent by the Jesuits, to which order he belonged, on a mission to the house of Moses, and to other savage tribes of South America. He called them together, taught them to cultivate the soil, to weave cloth, and other useful arts. He spent twenty-seven years in this work, and finally suffered martyrdom at the hands of the savages, a savage nation, being attempted in vain to convert. He died Sept. 16, 1702, aged about sixty-one years. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Barbarelli, Giorgio (called Giorgiones), a distinguished Italian painter, was born at Castel-franco, near Treviso, in 1472, and attended the school of Giovanni Bellini at Venice. He soon manifested great ability, and was the first of the Venetian painters who broke through the timid and constrained style that prevailed at the time of Bellini, and introduced a freedom of outline, a boldness of handling, and a vigorous effect of chiaroscuro previously unknown before him. He died in 1511. Of his oil-paintings the principal are, the picture of St. Onobono, in the school of Sarti at Venice:—Christ Bearing his Cross, in the Church of San Roch:—and in the school of San Marco, a picture of that saint appeasing the tempest. One of his most esteemed works is the Finding of Moses, at Milan.

Barbarians, Bishops For. In ordinary cases, the election of a bishop required the consent or suffrage, not only of the clergy of the diocese over which he was to preside, but of the faithful laity also. This rule was applicable only to countries already Christian. When a bishop was to be sent out to a distant or barbarous nation, it was required by the Council of Chalcedon that he should be ordained at Constantinople, to which city, as the new Rome, equal privileges with "the elder, royal Rome" were now to be assigned. Athanasius ordained Fruentius at Alexandria to be bishop of the Ethiopians. See Bingham, Christ. Antiq. (index). See in Partibus Infidelium.

Barbarigo, Giovanni Francesco, a learned Italian prelate, nephew of the following, was born at Venice in 1638. He was successively ambassador to France during Louis XIV., papal legate of St. Mark at Venice, bishop of Verona, cardinal and bishop of Padua. He published at his own expense the works of St. Zenob (Padua, 1710). He died at Padua, Jan. 27, 1730. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Barbarigo, Gregorio, an Italian prelate, was born at Venice, Sept. 25, 1625. Destined at first for a public administration, he afterwards embraced an ecclesiastical course, having studied at Padua both law and theology. He became canon and domestic prelate, and received from pope Alexander VII the care of the infected districts lying beyond the Tiber, a mission which he performed with zeal. In 1657 he was made archbishop of Bergamo, where his charity gained for him the surname of "the new Charles Borromeo." In 1660 he was made cardinal. From the bishopric of Bergamo he passed to that of Padua in 1663. He established in this last-mentioned place a seminary which he endowed, and where he introduced professors of Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, Greek, and Latin, and at the same time attached to the establishment a printing-house provided with the type for all these languages. He died at Padua, June 18, 1697. Miracles are said to have been worked at his tomb. He established in hissee the clercs delarte, the Clementine, relative to the cardinals, etc., and died at Bologna, July 21, 1747.

Barbatus was a surname of the Asiatic Bacchus among the Romans, for here he appeared mainly, dressed and bearded, much different from his usual youthful appearance.

Barbatus, Sr., bishop of Benevento, was born about the end of the year 663. In his youth he was employed in preaching, and was made cure of the Church of St. Basil, in Morcona. He strove to destroy the remnants of superstition among the Lombards, and in 665 was made bishop of Benevento. He attended the Council of Rome in 690, under pope Agatho, and died Feb. 19, 682. See Baille, Feb. 19.

Barbauld. Mrs. Anna Letitia, an eminent Christian writer of hymns, was born at Kilworth, Leicestershire, England, June 20, 1748. She was the daughter of Rev. John Aikin, LL.D., who for several years had charge of a flourishing academy. Her brother, John Aikin, M.D., like his sister, was a distinguished scholar. She early developed remarkable literary ability, and received an accomplished education. At the age of thirty (1773) she published a volume of miscellaneous poems, which was so well received that four editions of the work were called for within a year after publication. She was married in 1774 to the Rev. Ebenezer Barbauld, a descendant of a family of French Protestants. Soon after their marriage Mr. and Mrs. Barbauld opened a select school in the village of Palgrave, which met with great success. Although busily occupied with her work as a teacher, Mrs. Barbauld found time to engage in literary pursuits. She prepared for the press her Early Lessons for Children and Her Hymns in Praise for Children; in 1775 her Devotional Pieces, composed from the Psalms and the book of Job. In 1790 she published A Poetical Epistle to Mr. Wilberforce on the Rejection of the Bill for Abolishing the Slave-trade, and in 1792 Remarks on Mr. West Wofford's "Meditations upon the Expediency and Propriety of Public and Social Worship." Mrs. Barbauld was associated with her brother in the production of Evenings at Home, a work in six volumes, commenced in 1792 and completed in 1796. Mr. Barbauld became pastor of a congregation at Newtonington Green, and with his wife made a home at Stockton. In 1795 Mr. Barbauld published Selections from the "Spectator," "Tatto," "Guardian," and "Freeholder." She wrote also this year a Life of Samuel Richardson. In 1810 she edited the British Novelettes, a series which was published in fifty volumes, and in 1811 wrote a poem, Eighty Hundred and Eleven. She died March 9, 1825. Her rank among the English female writers is a high one. Her hymns are among the best sacred lyrics in the language, and not a few of them have found their way into our best collectiouns. The best known of these are:

"Praise to God, immortal praise, For the love that crowns our days;"

the Easter hymn, "Again the Lord of life and light Awakes the kindling ray;"

also the hymn, "Awake, my son! lift up thine eyes! See where thy foes are brought to nought;" and the hymns of which the following are the first lines: "How blot the sacred tie that binds," "Come, said Jesus' sacred voice," "Our country is Immanuel's land." Authors,* s. v. (J. C. S.)

Barbauld, A Quinquennium, an English dissenting minister, was born of French parents in England in 1748. He received the rudiments of his education at home; was trained by his father for the Church of England, though educated at the Dissenting Academy at Warring-ton to avoid the expense, and hazard to the morals, of a university education, and in 1773 entered the Dis- senting ministry at Highgate, where he preached about a year. In the year following he removed to Ful- dridge, took charge of a neighboring congregation of Dissenters in Norfolk. There he taught a very flourishing school. Eleven years later he removed to Hampstead, thence to Stoke-Newington, where he remained until about the time of his death, which oc- curred Nov. 11, 1800. Mr. Barbauld was liberal in the- ology, a man of active benevolence, of free and cour- ageous spirit, and possessor of a winning simplicity and natural enthusiasm. See Whittmole, Modern History of Universalism, p. 248.

Barbe, the name given to a pastor among the an- cient Waldenses (q. v.). See Barbers.

Barbe, a Flemish engraver, was born at Ant- werp about 1858, and probably studied under the Wierixes. He visited Italy and became proficient in drawing. The following are some of his best prints: The Ascension; The Nativity.——The Vir- gin Mary and St. Joseph Arriving at Bethlehem.— Christ on the Mount of Olives.—The Repose in Egypt: —The Holy Family, with the Infant Jesus Embracing St. Joseph.

Barbe, Phillipe, a Roman Catholic minister, was born at London in 1728 of French parentage. Having studied at the College of Louis the Great at Paris, he took holy orders. He was shortly after called to the head of the College of Longres, and afterwards to that of Chaumont. Being recalled to Paris in 1785, he was placed in charge of the translation of the works of the Greek fathers for the collection which M. de Juigné, archbishop of Paris, was preparing. At the period of the Revolution he went to Chaumont, where he died soon after, in 1792. He wrote, Fables et Contes Philo- sophiques (Paris, 1771). Barbei, in his Dictionnaire des Anonymes, attributes to him wrongly the work entitled Fables Nouvelles, Divisées en 6 Livres (ibid. 1762). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Barbelle was one of the names given to certain Ophitic Gnostics (Epiph. 1, 85 B), taken from Barbelo, a personage in their mythology. The word Barbelo (see Ecol. 1, 13) calls itself "Immanuel," apparently on no independent authority. The common text of Irenæus (p. 107) speaks of "multitudo Gnosticorum Barbelo;" but Mr. Harvey reasonably suggests that Barbelo came in from the margin. This sentence refers to a "multitude" of heretics, "some only of whom are seen in this sentence," "some that are imagined" (in Patriarch) Barbelo (Bar- boreian). —Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Barber, Aquila, a minister of the British Wesley- an Methodist Church, was born in Bristol, Jan. 14, 1797. He was converted at the age of eighteen, was received into the ministry in 1821, became a supernumerary in 1833, settled at Gainesborough, and died April 21, 1870, having had the rare joy of seeing four of his sons called to the ministry. He was distinguished by a firm attach- ment to the Church, by cheerfulness and upright- ness, and by his faithfulness and ability as a preacher. He wrote, A Brother's Portrait; Memorials of the Late Rev. William Barber, with Memorials of His Wife Written by Himself (Lond. 1830, 6to). See Minutes of British Conference, 1873, p. 31.

Barber, Cyrus, a Baptist missionary, was born in Portsmouth, N. H., March 27, 1807. He pursued his studies at the Hamilton Literary and Theological Insti- tute. The Missionary Union appointed him one of its missionaries July 22, 1835, and he was set apart for his work by ordination at Newport, R. L, in Septem- ber of that year. He sailed with his wife from New- port Oct. 22, 1835, and reached Calcutta Feb. 20, 1839. He and Mrs. Barber, and Miss Rhoda Bronson, a sister of Rev. Dr. Bronson, were originally designated to the department among the Nagas, but it was decided that the two former should confine their labors to the As- samese. Accordingly, they took up their residence in Sivasagar, a town having a population of 18,000 of that tribe, situated on the river Dikho, ten miles from the Brahmaputra. Here, for several years, Mr. Barber labored with great zeal, and a blessing followed his work. Officers and residents attached to the civil and military service of the East India Com- pany rendered substantial aid to the mission. In Febru- ary, 1845, a Church was formed in Gowahati, to which place Mr. Barber had removed. On account of ill-health, he left his station with the hope that a temporary ab- sence might recruit his wasted strength. He died at sea, and was buried in Mozambique Channel Jan. 31, 1860. See Gammell, History of Missions (chapter on Assam); The Missionary Jubilee, p. 237. (J. C. S.)

Barber, Daniel Montgomery, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Montour County, Pa., March 16, 1800. He graduated from Washington College, Pa., in 1824, and was ordained Nov. 21, 1827, by North- ernnder Presbyterian as an evangelist, and appointed to labor on the Susquehanna river. In 1833 he accepted a call to the First Church, Williamsport, Pa., and after 1836 labored in other places. He died at Milton, Pa., Oct. 30, 1865. He wrote, Worship, Proeb. Hist. Almanac, 1867, p. 122; Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 52.

Barber, Edward, a Baptist minister, was born in Exeter, R. L, Sept. 28, 1768. He was ordained pas- tor of a Baptist Church at Union Village, Sept. 25, 1794, and died July 1, 1834. He was distinguished as a preacher, a pastor, and a counsellor. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpü, vi, 194.

Barber, Eldad, a Congregational minister, was born in East Windsor, Conn., Sept. 24, 1801. He com- pleted his theological course in Yale College in the summer of 1829, having spent the winter of 1828-29 under the direction of the American Sunday-school Union in Ohio. He was ordained as a missionary under appointment of the American Home Missionary Society Aug. 26, by the Litchfield South Association, at Barber, Samuel, a Congregational minister, was born in Dublin, Ireland, Dec. 31, 1773. Soon after his birth, his parents removed to Manchester, England. On Sept. 1, 1801, he left Manchester to become a student in Rotherham College. His last day at Rotherham he received an invitation from the Church at Ulverstone, Lancashire, which he accepted, and after laboring there for a considerable time was ordained, June 14, 1807. He was B.D. at Bridgnorth, Shrewsbury, May 22, 1809, and opened an academy, in which he continued from 1812 to 1844, in the meantime performing his duties as pastor. He resigned his charge in December, 1845, and withdrew from the Church. An illness of three years now undermined his health, and he died Oct. 24, 1849. He was a man of steady, pure, and strict fidelity: a faithful minister and a devoted servant of God. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1855, p. 204.

Barber, Thomas, an Irish Wesleyan minister, first heard the Gospel preached by Methodists at Sidare, County Fermanagh. He was convicted of sin under the ministry of John Wesley, who admitted him into the Church. His love for souls soon led him to engage in missionary work on the Londonerry Circuit. His first appointment was to Glandore in 1779. After a most active service, he became a superannuated in 1808, and died in 1826. Barber guided Adam Clarke's earliest religious course. He was a man of agreeable eccentricities, indefatigable energy, and great success. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1826; Stevens, Hist. of Methodism, 1841.
functions, and was finally made archbishop of Ferrara by pope Benedict XIV. He died Oct. 15, 1743. He wrote, Orazione Italiane (Forlì, about 1716), upon various subjects, which proved a great success—Prediche della vedova Scuro Palacca Apostolico per il Corso di Dicembre (Venice, 1752). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Barbarini, Francesco, an Italian prelate, nephew of Urban VIII, was born in Florence, Sept. 23, 1597. He was sent as legate by his uncle to France and Spain, and was afterwards vice-chancellor and librarian of the Vatican, bishop of Sabina, later of Porto, and finally of Ostia, and likewise a college cardinal. He had to leave Rome on the accession of Innocent X, but was permitted to return, and became dean of the sacred college. He died Dec. 10, 1679. He was learned in the languages, translated the twelve books of Marcus Aurelius from the Greek, and prepared a catalogue of the papal library. See Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Barbarini, Maffeo. See Urban VIII.

Barbarini Manuscript (Codex Barbarinus), which belongs to the Barberini Library at Rome, No. 223, is a fragment (six leaves) of John's gospel, written on vellum, in folio, probably of the 8th century. It contains John xvi, 3-21, 41 prefixed to a Codex of the gospels (G 329) furnished with Theophylact's commentaries, of the 12th century. The text is mixed, and lies about midway between A and C. A and C are in the Vatican and Alexandrinus. Scholz imperfectly collated the fragment, and Tischendorf published it entirely, with a fac-simile, in his Monumenta Sacra Inedita, in 1846. See Manuscripts, Biblical. (B. P.)

Barbarino, Antonio (the younger), an Italian prelate and poet, nephew of Urban VIII, was born at Rome in 1608. He was archbishop of Rheims, and was made cardinal in 1647. He died in 1678. He wrote some Latin and Italian poems, which were published in the Archivio Barbarino di Jerome Tesio (Rome, 1642). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Barbeyrac, Jean, a famous French jurist, was born March 15, 1674, at Béziers, where his father was a minister of the Gospel. After the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, he went with his parents to Lausanne, where he pursued his literary studies. In 1694, he entered the school at Frankfurt-on-the-Oder, and finally settled at Berlin, where he was appointed, in 1697, tutor at the French College. Giving up his theological studies, he devoted himself to the study of jurisprudence. In 1706 he published the famous Latin treatise of Puffendorf in French, intitulé la Lettre de la nature des lois, in which he achieved such a renown that the Academy of Lausanne extended to him a call as professor of law and history in 1710. In 1714 he was appointed rector of the academy, an honor which he received for three succeeding years. But, being a conscientious man and unable to subscribe fully to the Formula Consensuum, he accepted a call to Groningen, where he died, March 24, 1744. Besides a number of articles published in Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, Bibliothèque Britannique, Nouvelle Bibliothèque, and Bibliothèque Raisonnée, he translated from the Latin a treatise of Puffendorf, under the title Traité des Devoirs de l'Homme et du Citoyen (1707), and of Noord, Traité du Pouvoir des Souverains et de la Liberté de Conscience (1711). The latter, translated from the English he translated Tilloston's sermons (1706-16). He wrote Traité du Jus, from the standpoint of the natural and moral law (1709), and translated the famous treatise of Grotius De Jure Belli et Peace (1724). He also translated Traité de la Morale des Pères de l'Eglise (1729), and published Histoire des Anciens Traités depuis les Temps les plus Reculés jusqu'à Charlemagne (1759). See Gardes, Oratoire Funèbre in Obitum J. Barbí (or Barbíti, i.e. bearded). The lay brethren of several orders, especially those of the order of Grandval, who had the management of the temporalities, were so called. We find mention of a distinct order of Friars Barbí in Alberici in 1118 and 1240.—Landow, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Barbiani, Andrea, an Italian painter, was born at Ravenna about 1680. Lanzi says he studied under P. Cesare Pronti, in whose style he painted subjects of history. Some of his works are to be seen in the churches and public edifices at Ravenna and Rimini. The best of these are the four evangels in the vault of the cathedral of Ravenna. He died in 1754. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Barbiano, Giovanni Battista Simone, an Italian painter, was born at Ravenna and flourished about 1635. He probably studied under Bartolomeo. He died in 1650. His finest oil-paintings are at Bolonga, being two of St. Andrew and St. John in the Church of the Franciscans. His best fresco painting is The Assumption of the Virgin, in the dome of the Chapel of Our Lady del Sudare at Ravenna. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Barbican is an advanced work before the gate of a castle or strong town, or any outwork at a short distance from the main works, generally serving the purpose of a watch-tower. There are barbicans remaining at York, Scarborough, Alnwick, and Carlisle castles. This term is especially applied to the outwork intended to defend the drawbridge, called in modern fortifications the tête du pont. It was frequently constructed of earth and wood. It was a sort of bridge or passageway leading to each other with an arch or a gate at each end to defend the principal gate, which is midway between them.

Barbier, François de Sales, a French theologian, was born in 1599. After studying at the abbey of Bellelay, he became a regular canon of that abbey, and there taught mathematics and belles-lettres. During the following year he decided to leave the school and travelled in Germany, but afterwards returned. He died April 1, 1824. He translated a History of Brabant into French from the German of Schmidt. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Barbier, Louis, a French prelate, the son of a tailor of Épame, said to have been the first bishop who wore a wig. He became professor in the College of Plessis, almoner of Gaston, and finally bishop of Langres. He died in 1670. See Biog. Univ. iii, 334; Hook, Eccl. Biog. i, 508; Landow, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Barbieri, Domenico del (surnamed Fiorentino), an Italian painter and engraver, was born at Florence about the year 1506, and was instructed by Il Rosso, who took him on a visit to France, where Il Rosso was invited by France I to adorn the palaces of Fontain and Meudon, in which his pupil greatly assisted him.

Barbieri, Giovanni Francesco (called Guercino), an Italian painter, was born at the village of Cento, in Ferrara, in 1590. Before he was ten years old, he painted a figure of the Virgin on the façade of his father's house which would have been thought a very remarkable production even at a more advanced age. At different periods of his life he followed three different styles. In early life he imitated Michael Angelo Caravaggio in his violent contrasts of light and shadow. After visiting Bologna, Venice, and Rome, he chose a style distinguished by a grander and more elevated taste and design. In the middle of his life he commenced his stupendous work of the dome of Piacenza. Malvasia gives a list of one hundred and six altar-pieces of his, in churches alone, and concludes his historical essays with a detailed account of his large historical pictures besides his great fresco works, and numerous Madonnas, portraits, landscapes, and private collections. Later in life, after the death of Guido, the great fame of that painter induced him again to change his style, but in this great undertaking he fell into feebleness and languor. In this weak state he painted most of his works for the churches at Bologna, also The Marriage of the Virgin, in the Church of San Pateriano at Foro. He left a great number of beautiful drawings, which are highly valued. He died in 1606.

Barbo, Luigi, an Italian prelate and historian, was born in 1681. He was the son of a Venetian senator of the family of Paul II. After having embraced a religious life, he instituted a reform among the pupils of St. Augustine. He assisted at the Council of Constance, and became bishop of Treviso, where he died in 1443. He wrote, History of the Reform of the Augustans: Discourses: and Meditations. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Barbo, Paolo, an Italian ecclesiastic, was born at Soccino. He entered the Order of St. Dominic, and became doctor in theology. He taught at Milan, Ferrara, and Bologna, and died Aug. 4, 1494, being at the time prior of the Monastery of Cremona. Among other works, he wrote Epistola Questionum in 4 Libros Sentent. a Principe Thomastarum J. Capreolo Tolosano Disputataram (Vialia, 1522; and elsewhere). See Biog. Univ. iii. 350.

Barbolini, Demetrius. See Barbuxi, Demetrius.

Barbosa, Agostinho, a Portuguese prelate and jurist, was born in 1590. He went to Madrid and to Rome, and, destitute of resources, spent his time in the public libraries, reading at night what he had gained through the day. When the Portuguese monarchy was restored, Barbosa, who was still attached to Spain, was made bishop of Ugoento by Philip IV, but died in 1649, soon after having assumed his bishopric. Among other works, he wrote, Formulario Episcopale: Recperium Juris Civilis et Canonici: Variae Juris Tractations (Rome, Venice, Paris, and Lyons): De Officio et Potestate Parochii (Rome, Venice, and Lyons). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Barbosa (Machado), Diogo, a celebrated Portuguese prelate and historian, was born in Lisbon, March 31, 1682. He studied at the University of Coimbra, and in 1727, became bishop of Viseu. By all his orders he was honoured; he became abbot of St. Adrian's in Lisbon, and finally bishop of Oporto. He died in 1770. gree. He joined the Methodist Society, and became a local preacher. His views afterwards changed, and he joined the Congregationalists and was ordained as an evangelist in connection with the Leeds Mission. In a short time he became superintendent of the mission, having several under his direction, as well as the work to plan. Much of his work was in holding out-door meetings. He was engaged for some years in public controversy, contending valiantly and successfully against Swedishborgianism, Mormonism, socialism, Romanism, and the Barker development of infidelity. He died Oct. 4, 1855, with firm faith in Christ. See London Quarterly Review, 1857, p. 140.

He died June 29, 1570, leaving several Latin poems, of which the chief is entitled Salutiferæ Crucis Triumphans in Christi Gloriam (Coimbra, 1603).

Barcelona, Concilium of (Concilium Barcelonense). Of these several are mentioned, chiefly of a provincial character. The following are of some importance:

I. Held A.D. 540 by Sergius the metropolitan and six suffragans; passed ten canons upon discipline.

II. Held Nov. 1, 599, in the Church of the Holy Cross, at which twelve bishops of the province of Tarra- gona were present, Asiaticus of Tarragona presiding. They drew up four canons, of which the first two relate to the crime of simony; the third forbids the elevation of a lay person to a bishopric, the king's mandate notwithstanding; the fourth condemns the marriage of virgins consecrated to the service of God, and of peni- tentiants of either sex. See Mansi, Concil. v, 1605.

III. Held in 1608 by the legate-cardinal Hugo the White, and also in 1609, at which the prelates attached to the see in Aragon being inclined to do away with the use of the Gothic office, the abbots present, from the whole of his dominions, unani- mously agreed to exchange it for the Roman rite. They further declared that the clergy in future should live in entire continence, and not be married, as had hitherto been permitted.

Barceloneta, Ugovì di, an Italian theologian and preacher, was born in Ficdmont about 1260. He was of the Dominican Order, and became cardinal of St. Sabina. His sermons gained for him great ren-own. He wrote, Manipulat Curatorum (Lyons, 1597):—Compendium Theol. Veritatis:—Dissertatio de Cre- atione Mundi (in manuscript, preserved in the Li- brary of Venice). See Hoefer, Nouv. BioGr. Générale, s. v.

Barcham (or Barkham), John, an English di- vine and antiquary, was born at Exeter in 1572, and was admitted to Exeter College, Oxford, in 1587. He became a skilful linguist, a curious critic, an antiquary, especially in coins, and an able theologian. He died at Oxford in 1622. He contributed to Selden's History of England, wrote a preface to Cranmer's Defensio Ecclesiae Anglicanae (Lond. 1629), and published The Display of Heraldry (ibid. 1610). See Allibone, Dict. of Brt. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; BioG. Universelle, s. v.

Barclay, Charles Wesley, a Methodist Episco- pal minister, was born in 1817. Concerning his early life there is no record. He entered the Genesee Con- ference in 1840, and labored faithfully until droopy of the chest compelled him to desist from all active labor, and shortly after, on Dec. 29, 1847. Mr. Bar- clay was fervid in piety and devoted in life. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1847, p. 164.

Barclay, Christian, an English minister of the Society of Friends, daughter of Gilbert Molleson, a merchant of Aberdeen, Scotland, and the wife of the celebrated Friends' Apologist, Robert Barclay, was born in 1647. She was religiously inclined from her childhood, and at the age of sixteen became an avowed Christian. She was approved as a county minister among Friends. She was married to Robert Barclay in 1669. She was a diligent minister of the Lord Jesus, and her preaching was attended with the power and presence of the Divine Spirit. After a life of great usefulness, she died Dec. 14, 1722. Barclay, David (1), a prominent member of the Society of Friends, father of Robert Barclay, a distinc- guished Quaker, was born at Kirkcudbright, Scotland, in 1610. He received a liberal education; travelled in Germany; enlisted in the army of Gustavus Adolphus, king of Sweden, and soon rose to the rank of major; returned to his native land at the breaking-out of the civil wars; was made colonel; quelled an insurrection by the earl of Crawford in 1645; the same year routed the marquis of Montrose; in 1647 drove the marquis of Huntly into the Highlands; and was made governor of Strathbogie. When Cromwell's party came into power in Scotland, colonel Barclay lost his commission. Subsequently, however, he was three times elected a member of the House of Lords, in which he was very vigorous in opposing the crowning of Cromwell as king. Notwithstanding this, after the Restoration he was im- prisoned in Edinburgh Castle as "a trustee under the usurper;" but was at length liberated without trial. In 1668 he became a member of the Society of Friends, on account of which he was subjected to various indigni- ties. See The Friend, vi, 292.

Barclay, David (2), a Presbyterian minister, after graduating at Princeton, studied theology, and was or- dained by the Presbytery of New Brunswick Dec. 3, 1794, and installed pastor of the Church at Bound Brook, N. J. He remained there until April, 1805, when, on account of some troubles, in June of that year he removed, and became pastor of Knowlton, Oxford, and Lower Mount Bethel churches, N. J. He continued here till 1811. On April 25, 1819, Mr. Barclay was dis- missed to the Presbytery of Redstone, and took up his residence in Punxutawney, Pa., where he died, in 1846. Mr. Barclay had much trouble with his congregations; and one of his elders, Mr. Jacob Ker, published a vol- ume of more than four hundred pages entitled The Sev- eral Tracts of David Barclay before the Presbytery of New Brunswick and Synod of New York and New Jer- sey. He was a man of decided ability; quick, earnest, energetic in his speech, and imprudent in temperament. See Alexander, Princeton College in the 18th Century.

Barclay, John, an English minister of the Society of Friends, was born in Clapham in 1797, became Christian before reaching his majority, and began his ministerial labors in the autumn of 1823, and was "recognized" as such by Friends in Cornwall in 1825. After residing in Alton, and in Croydon for a time, he took up his abode in Stoke Newington. "His engagements in the line of ministry were not frequent, but he was at times led to address his friends in a weighty and feeling manner, endeavoring to turn their attention from a dependence on man, and from all that is superficial in religion, to a single reliance on the great Head of the Church." For the purpose of promoting the spiritual welfare of the members of the Society, he edited, and published a series of selections from the writings of Friends eminent for their piety. In family visitation he was especially blessed. He died May 11, 1838. See Testimony of Deceased Ministers at the Yearly Meeting, 1839, pp. 3-9. (J. C. S.)

Barclay, Joseph, LL.D., third Anglican bishop of Jerusalem, graduated at Trinity College, Dublin, in 1854. He commenced his duties at the mission field under the Rev. Dr. Stern, at that time in charge of the Constantinople station of the London Jews' Society. Three years later, at the request of the committee, he removed to Jerusalem, where, as incumbent of Christ Church and examining chaplain to bishop Gobat (q. v.), he faithfully discharged his duties until after 1870. Having returned to England, he became rector of Stapleford, Herts, in 1873. When bishop Gobat died, in 1879, Dr. Barclay assisted his successor. His episcopate lasted only two years, his death occurring Oct. 22, 1881. He is buried in the Protestant Cemetery, beyond the southern slope of Mount Zion, close by the tombs of his predeccessor, the Rev. Alexander and Gobat. Dr. Barclay was peculiarly fitted to fill his office. In addition to his knowledge of Hebrew, he was well acquainted with several of the modern languages, and able to preach in English, German, Spanish, Turkish, and Arabic. He is the author of The Talmud (London, 1875), being a translation of several treatises of the Mishna. (B. P.)

Barcliff, Wilson, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Perquimans County, N. C., Oct. 24, 1804. He was early taught the duties of a religious life by his pious mother, but did not realize the joys of Christian experience until 1824. In 1829 he entered the Virginia College, which he labored till his decease, Aug. 9, 1838. Mr. Barcliff was characterized by his devotedness to the Church and his success in her upbuilding. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1834, p. 278.

Livingston, and was licensed by the Classis of New York in 1798. He became Pastor at Hopewell and New Hackensack from 1805 to 1810, and died at Preakness, N. J., in 1832. Barcos, Martin de, a French theologian, was born at Bayonne in 1600. He was a nephew of John Duper-
Mount Pleasant for a portion of his time. This double relation he sustained ten years; but, after the dissolution of the pastoral relation, he continued to reside throughout the whole of his long life near Greenville; and during most of these years supplied those places as well as the Mount Zion and Allensville churches, preaching zealously and almost constantly, but never again assuming the pastoral office. After the division of the Presbyterian Church in 1862, he adhered to the Southern General Assembly. Mr. Bard lived to be the ministerial patriarch of all that region, at the time of his death being the oldest member of his synod, enjoying vigorous health and embracing every opportunity. He died June 29, 1878. See NecroI. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1879, p. 11. (W. P. S.)

Bardas, patriarch of Constantinople, was brother of the empress Theodora, mother of the emperor Michael III, and was tutor of this prince after the death of Theophilos in 842. He re-established the sciences in the empire, which had declined after Leo the Isaurian, who had burned the library at Constantinople. In order to preserve the authority, he recorded the death of Theoctistus in 856, who was general of the troops of the emperor Michael III, and secured his position. He shut up his sister, the empress, in a cloister, drove St. Ignatius from the patriarchal see, and gave it to Pho- tius, his nephew, in 858. This injustice was the source of a schism in the Greek Church about 860. He sought to gain control of the empire, but was assassinated by his enemy Basil, April 21, 866. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Barde, Jean Charles, a Reformed minister of Switzerland, was born at Geneva, Sept. 29, 1808, where he also prepared himself for the ministry. In 1827 he went to Lyons, where he labored for many years. From the latter part of 1830, where he ministered to the Swiss congregation, and returned to his native place in 1830, where he was destined to labor till his end. Barde was no brilliant preacher, but he soon became the nucleus of Christian activity, which he developed in the formation of evangelical societies and other Christian enterprises tending to promote new spiritual life everywhere. He died July 12, 1878, greatly lamented by the Christians of the Church of Geneva. (B. P.)

Bardin, Jean, a French historical painter, was born at Montpellier in 1740, and was instructed first by the elder Lagrence, but finished his studies at Rome. His picture of Christ disputing with the doctors gained him admission into the Academy of France in 1795. His subjects partake of poetry, history, and religion. He died in 1809.

Baridon was the war-song of the Germans, which they began by softly murmuring and then increasing to the loudest tones; and from the sound of the same they thought they could discern the success of the battle. The Romans adopted it later, on account of its inspiring effect.

Bards were sacred singers among the Gauls and Gaelic tribes, and accompanied the warriors to the field of battle and glorified their deeds. Their instrument was a kind of lyre, probably with five strings. It is doubtful whether the Germans called these poets by this name, but they were well acquainted with the poets and their songs. Charles the Great had such heroic poems collected, but pope Silvester had them burned subsequently. The bards existed longest in Scotland, where the bards of Ireland became philosophers and poets. The poems of Ossian, collected by Macpherson, are noted specimens of these wild compositions, and fragments of many similar productions among the early Welsh are extant. The troubadours of the Middle Ages were the lineal descendants of these heathen poets. So old Homer is represented as having sung his epic moral through the cities of Greece, and Arabia has even to modern times been famous for such strolling minstrels who were capable of improving as well as of studied recitative. Religious themes are always characteristic of these effusions, and the popular mythology has been thus kept alive from age to age. Among the Celtic and Scandinavian tribes the immortality of the soul was from the earliest times a prominent doctrine of their bards, as we learn from their first mention by Roman writers. The sacred books of the Hindus are substantially mythological poems, and indeed the earliest literature of most nations consists chiefly of various legends of heroes and demi-gods. See Poetry.

Bardley, Samuel, an English Wesleyan minister, was received on trial in 1768, and for half a century labored with zeal and success. On his way from the Conference of 1818 to his circuit, Manchester, he died suddenly (Aug. 19) at an inn in Delph (between Manchester and Leeds), leaping upon his travelling companion, Rev. Francis Wrigley. "He was much beloved, not because of his pulpit talents, for they were of no very brilliant order, but for his transparent simplicity of character and purpose, his unassuming manners, and genuine Christian feeling" (R. A. West).

Bardsley had been for some time the oldest preacher in the connection. See Minutes of the Brit. Conference, 1919; West, Sketches of Wesleyan Preachers, p. 108-197; Smith, Hist. of Methodistism, iii, 43; Stevens, ed. iii, 255; Wesleyan Takings, vol. i.

Bardwell, Horatio, a Congregational minister and missionary, was born in Belcher town, Mass., Nov. 3, 1778. In 1809 he went to Stanford, Conn., where he pursued his studies till November, 1811, when he entered the theological seminary at Andover, where he took the course. He was licensed to preach by the Haverhill Association, July 6, 1814; was ordained a missionary at Newburyport on June 21, 1815, and sailed for India, from the same place, Oct. 23 of same year. He resided some years as a missionary in Bombay, and returned to this country in 1821. After laboring as an agent for the board for nearly two years, he obtained a dismissal on account of impaired health. In October, 1823, he was made pastor of the church in Marshfield, Mass., where he labored till 1832, when he received from the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions the appointment of general agent for the New England States. From 1836 to 1864 he was pastor in Oxford, Mass. Here he died, May 5, 1866, from injuries received in burning the dwelling-house of a native. He experienced conversion at the age of seventeen; graduated at Yale New Haven University, Conn., in 1834; and joined the New England Conference. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1851, p. 574; Alumni Record of Wel. Univ. s. a. 1842.

Barebone, Praise-God. The person who had the name of Barebone in Baptist records in London. In 1640 he became pastor of a colony that separated from Rev. Henry Jerzy's Church. Besides preaching, he carried on the secular occupation of a leather-seller in Fleet street. Rapin, in his second volume of the History of England, tells us that he "passed among his neighbors for a notable speaker, being used to entertain them with his sermons, particularly in the Charterhouse." This point led him out to the notice of Cromwell, who nominated him a member of the legislative body that succeeded the Long Parliament in 1659." Such a man could not fail to make himself conspicuous in such a body; and from the special prominence which he attained as one of the most active members of the assembly, it was called, by way of derision, "Barebone's Parliament." When this Parliament dissolved, he seems to have ended his connection with the government, being dissatisfied with the course which Oliver Cromwell took in setting himself up as "lord protector" of England, and assuming an authority that seemed to have all the qualities belonging to the rightful possessor of the throne. After the restoration of Charles II, the government regarded him with a jealous eye, and upon some pretext he was seized and committed to the Tower. It is very evident that he was a strong republican, and that he thought, although accepted in these days, would exceedingly obnoxious at the time. It is not known what were his circumstances in the later years of his life, nor when he died. It is said that he had two brothers whose names were more remarkable even than his own. The name of one of them was Christ-into-the-world-to-save Barebone; and that of the other was And-if-Christ-had-not-come-into-the-world-thou-host-hast-been-damned Barebone. For short, this latter was called "Damned Barebone." See Wilson, History of Dissenting Churches, i, 47-49. (J. C. S.)

they occur very rarely. The earliest barge-boards known to exist are of the 14th century. After that time they were used most abundantly, and were of very various designs, and in later examples they not unfrequently supported a hip-knob on the point of the gable. They are usually either feathered or panelled, or pierced with a series of trefoils, quatrefoils, etc., and the spandrels carved with foliage; when feathered, the cusps or points of the principal featherings sometimes have flowers carved on them. As Gothic architecture advanced, the barge-boards continued gradually to lose much of their rich and bold effect.

It was thought that a sea voyage would benefit him, and he embarked with this hope; but the expectations of himself and friends were disappointed. He died at sea, and was buried in Mozambique Channel Jan. 31, 1850. See The Missionary Jubilee, p. 184, 297. (J. C. S.)

min Grosvenor. Six years later the congregation in Mare street, Hackney, elected him pastor, as successor to the pious and excellent Mr. Matthew Henry. This charge Mr. Barker held till 1736, when he resigned, to the inexpressible joy of many people. After some time in Epsom and Surrey, about three years, he accepted a call from the congregation at Salter’s Hall. Here he remained as long as he was able to perform the duties of his office; but in 1762 he was compelled to retire from work. After this he lived about one year. Mr. Barker was a man of great manliness, and un肄ilities, with ardent and unaffected piety. His preaching was solid, serious, and convincing. In 1748 he published a volume of sermons, and was preparing a second volume for the press, but was prevented completing his design. His purpose, however, was carried out by his executors, who, in 1783, issued the second volume. See (Lond.) Theological and Biblical Magazine, Oct., 1896, p. 413.

On retiring from the ministry, he settled at Stoke Newington, where his best years were devoted to the education of youth in schools, and in connection with the Young Men’s Christian Association. He was the founder of Abney House School, one of the largest and most flourishing schools for boys in the north of London. He was for some time chaplain of Abney Park Cemetery, of which place he published a guide. His death occurred April 25, 1881. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1882, p. 285.

His publications consist chiefly of little religious tracts which were printed from time to time (1640-79). Besides these he published a poem, Nymphia Libellaria; or, The Ctosowell Muse (1651). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Barlaam, Sr. The modern Roman martyrlogy places the festival of St. Barlaam and Josaphat on Nov. 27 as of two actual saints worshiped by the Indians on the confines of Persia. Huet and others hold the history of these saints to be a mere romance. Baronius, however, receives it as true. See Huet, Orig. des Romans, p. 49.—Landon, Eccl. Dict. s. v.

Barlaamites, a sect of Christian heretics in the 14th century, were followers of Barlaam (q. v.).

Barlass, William, an Associate minister, was born near Perth, Scotland, and preached for some years at Whitehill, where he continued until converted to Methodism in 1798, and afterwards engaged as a bookseller until his death, Jan. 7, 1817. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, IX, iii, 38.

Barlow, Ann, a minister of the Society of Friends, was born in 1787 at Darlington, England. She was the daughter of pious parents, who gave her a guarded and Christian education. At the age of eleven years she was converted, and became a member of the Wesleyan Methodist Society. In 1842 she embraced the doctrines and principles as held by the Friends, and continued to be a useful minister of their society until the infirmities of age prevented her activity. She died March 10, 1867. See Annual Monitor, 1868, p. 9.

Barlow, Daniel B., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Richland District, S. C., Aug. 8, 1806. He removed about two years in 1829 was admitted into the Mississippi Conference, in which he filled many important stations with dignity and usefulness. On the division of the conference, he became a member of the Alabama Conference. He died Dec. 12, 1888. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1889, p. 663.

Barlow, Joel, an American preacher, diplomatist, and poet, was born at Reading, Conn., in 1758, and was first sent to Dartmouth College, but returned to New Haven, where he graduated in 1778. Shortly after this he was licensed a Congregational preacher, and joined the American army as a chaplain. At the close of the war, he resumed the study of law, in which he had previously been engaged, and settled in Hartford, where he established a weekly newspaper. While here, he adapted Watts's version of the Psalms to the use of the General Association of Connecticut, adding to it several original hymns. In 1788 he went to England as agent for the Schio Company, but, finding himself associated with a party of swindlers, he resigned his official position in Paris, was tried and acquitted as a zealous adherent of the Girondists. In 1795, while yet in Paris, he was appointed by president Washington consul to Algiers. He returned to Paris and resumed some commercial speculations in which he had formerly been engaged, and through which he realized a fortune. In 1805 he returned to the United States and established himself in Washington. In 1806 he instituted a scheme for a national academy under the patronage of the government, but it failed. In 1811 president Madison appointed him minister to France. Napoleon, desiring his advice in diplomatic affairs, in the autumn of 1812, while on his Russian campaign, invited him to a conference at Wilna, Poland. Being attacked with inflammation of the lungs while on the journey, he died at Zarnowitch, a small village near Cracow, Dec. 22, 1812. His first poem was written in 1778. In 1791, on receiving his master's degree, he recited a poem called The Prospect of Peace, which was subsequently merged in The Columbian. The germ of his great epic was The Vision of Columbus (1787), and attained greater popularity on both sides of the Atlantic than was the fate of the more pretentious work. His most popular poem, entitled Hasty Pudding, was written while at Châlmetv, in Savoy. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Encyclopedia Brit. (9th ed.), s. v.; Appleton's American Cyclop. s. v.; Duyckinck, Cyclop. of Amer. Lit. i. 408.

He was appointed prayer-leader at sixteen, commenced his ministry in 1807, retired in 1848, and died at Harbeck, near Harrogate, Aug. 31, 1861. Mr. Barlow was a practical, genteel man of spotless character; diligent, faithful, and well read in theology. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1861, p. 24; Wesleyan Methodist Magazine, 1864, p. 102.

Barlow, Thomas, a preacher in the United Methodist Free Church, was born of Wesleyan parents at Darlington, Devonshire, Aug. 7, 1810. He was converted to the religion of his youth, and at seventeen began to preach the Gospel. His love of freedom induced him in 1835, during the Warrenite disputes, to leave the Wesleyans, and join the Association Methodists, and again in 1831, when the reform movement began, he identified himself with it and entered the ministry. He removed to Egypt four years after, in 1837 when he was chosen book steward to the United Methodist Free Churches, in which office he served with fidelity till his health failed in 1874, when he became a supernumerary, and resided at the East End of London, preaching as he had strength to the end of life. He died June 29, 1880, and was interred in Ilford Cemetery. He was courteous, conscientious, devout, intelligent. See Minutes of the Assembly.

Barlow, William (1), D.D., an English prelate descended from a family of the name in Lancashire. He became fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, and afterwards dean of Chester. His account of the celebrated Hampton Court Conference is well known (London, 1604). It professes not to be an account of the conference at large, but, to use the author's own words, it is "as an extract, wherein is the substance of the whole." Various attacks have been made by the Dissenters to invalidate its authority, but in vain. Barlow was consecrated bishop of Rochester June 30, 1605; was translated to Lincoln in 1608, and died Sept. 7, 1613. His principal works, besides the above, are, Defence of the Articles of Faith (London, 1601), A Life of Dr. R. L., and The Rites of the Church of England. He was the first English writer on the nature and properties of the magnet, and the inventor of the compass-box as now used at sea. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Le Neve, Fasti, i. 582, 592.

Barlow, William (2), an English divine and eminent mathematician, was the son of William Barlow, bishop of Chichester, and was educated at Balliol College, Oxford, where he graduated in 1654. About this time he went to sea and learned much about navigation. About 1573 he took holy orders, and in 1585 became prebendary of Lichfield. He was installed treasurer of Lichfield Oct. 17, 1589, and died May 25, 1625. He wrote several works on subjects connected with practical navigation, the most remarkable of which was The Navigator's Supply (Oxford, 1597). He was the first English writer on the nature and properties of the magnet, and the inventor of the compass-box as now used at sea. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Le Neve, Fasti, i. 582, 592.

Barlow, William (3), a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was pastor of St. Paul's Church in Syracusé, N. Y., and subsequently of Ogdensburg. He died at Chicago, Ill., Feb. 24, 1890. See Amer. Quart. Church Rev. 1850, p. 159.

Barmidbar Rana is the title of a Midrash (or exposition) on Numbers. It contains twenty-three chapters. The age of its compilation is uncertain, but internal evidence points to the 11th or 12th century. According to Zunz, the work was written by two different authors. See his Gottesdienstliche Veritragte der Juden (Berlin, 1807), p. 298-299. (B. P.)

Barnabas, St., Legend and Festival. There is a tradition that he became a believer after witnessing the miracle wrought by our Lord at the pool of Bethesda, and that he was one of the seventy disciples (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl., i. ii, 11). It is also said that he was the first preacher of Christianity at Rome, that he converted Clemens Romanus to the faith, and that he founded the churches of Milwad and Alphs. But these and other statements are unworthy of credit. There is a general agreement of testimony about the time, place, and cause of his death. From very early times he has had the credit of martyrdom. It is believed that he was stoned to death by the Jews of Salamis in Cyprus about A.D. 64. Tradition says that his death took place on June 11, and that he was buried at a short distance from the town of Salamis. Nothing, however, seems to have been heard of his tomb until about A.D. 478.

Alexander, a monk of Cyprus, who wrote (Eulogy of Barnaby, James, a Baptist minister, was born in Freetown, Mass., June 25, 1857. He graduated at Brown University in the class of 1809, and was ordained in July, 1811, as pastor of the Church in Harvard, Mass., where he remained until 1817, when he removed to New Bedford, Mass. His pastorate here was for four years. Subsequently he was pastor of several churches, but his longest ministry was with the Church with which he was originally settled. At four different times he was called to this Church, and the whole period of his connection with it was thirty-nine years. His entire ministry covered a period of nearly sixty-seven years. During this time he baptized not far from two thousand eight hundred persons. He died at Harvard, Dec. 10, 1877. (J. C. S.)

Barnard, A. F., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Dixfield, Me., Jan. 30, 1806. He experienced conversion in 1820; entered the Maine Wesleyan Seminary in 1825, where he pursued his studies for about five years, and proved himself a man of great merit in the Maine Conference. During his ministry, he received twenty-three different appointments, two of which were in the East Maine Conference, and in all of which he succeeded well, and in some had glorious revivals. He died March 27, 1867. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1867, p. 138.

Barnard, Edward, an American clergyman, was born in 1731. He obtained an excellent education, became minister at Haverhill, Mass., and died in 1774. He published his Discourses, 1774, 4to., 1779. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Barnard (or Bernard), John (1), D.D., an English divine, was first a student of Cambridge, but removed to Oxford, where he became a fellow of Lincoln College in 1648. He afterwards became rector of Waddington, in Lincolnshire, and died in 1683. His works include, Cesarea Cleri (1660), against scandalous ministers not submitted to the church, and several other pamphlets, etc.—Theol–go–histrorius; or, The True Life of The Most Reverend Divine and Excellent Historian, Peter Huygyn, D.D. (1688). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Barnard, John (2), a minister in Andover, Mass., was born in 1690, and died in 1758. He published several sermons and discourses. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Barnard, Thomas (1), a Congregational minister, was born at Hadley, Mass., about 1665. He graduated at Harvard College in 1679; was called as an assistant to the Rev. Francis Dane, pastor of the Church at Andover, Mass., in January, 1682, and was ordained in March following. When Mr. Dane died in February, 1689, Mr. Barnard succeeded to the pastorate. During four or five years before the division of the town into two parishes, the contention was warm in regard to the site for a new meeting-house; but in 1709 the division was amicably made, and Mr. Barnard, who had conducted himself throughout the controversy with prudence, was given the charge of the eastern part of the town. Subsequently he was settled as minister of the North Parish. He died in Andover, Oct. 13, 1718. He is described as one of the best of men and of ministers.” See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 198.

Barnard, Thomas (2), a Unitarian minister, was born Aug. 17, 1716, probably at Andover, Mass. He graduated at Harvard College in 1732, and was ordained and installed pastor of the First Church in Salem, Mass., Jan. 31, 1739. He was, by his own request, dismissed Jan. 18, 1751; removed to Newburyport, studied law, became a practitioner at the bar, and was a representative of the town to the General Court. He subsequently re-entered the ministry, and was installed as pastor of the First Church in Salisbury. He removed soon after, and eventually he was settled as minister of the North Parish. He died in Andover, Oct. 13, 1775. Here he continued till the close of his life, Aug. 15, 1776. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 14.

Barnard, Thomas (3), D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Newbury, Mass., Feb. 5, 1733, being the son of Rev. John Barnard of Andover, Mass. He graduated at Harvard in 1758, was ordained over the North Church, Salem, in 1764, and died Oct. 1, 1814. See Cong. Quarterly, 1859, p. 41.

Barnardston, Giles, a minister of the Society of Friends, was born in Clare, Suffolk, England, about 1624. His parents, who were persons of repute in the world, gave him an education consistent with their rank. After passing through the common schools, he was placed at the university, where he pursued his studies for about six years, and proved himself one of the most earnest and upright of his preachers among them. At once he became an object of the scorn and contempt in which the Friends were held in that ungodly age. He was despised of his goods to a large amount and exposed to innumerable hardships. He was, however, most diligent and faithful in the performance of his duties. We are told that “he visited many parts of his own nation, and was also present at the conference in 1655. In all his efforts he went he left a good report and savour.” The histories of one Jeffery Bullock, a professing Friend, called forth a reply from Barnardiston, in which he clearly set forth the teachings of Holy Scripture concerning some of the cardinal doctrines of the common evangelical faith. About the year 1677, he was imprisoned in London for conscience’ sake, and during the next three years was more than once incarcerated. He died at his house in Chelmsford, Nov. 11, 1680. George Whitehead says of him: “My soul was deeply affected with his innocent life, sincere and tender spirit to God, and with his humble example among his people in word, in conversation, in charity, in spirit, in faith, in purity, in gravity, and sound speech that could not be condemned.” See Friends’ Library, iv, 1–10. (J. C. S.)

Barnauf, Jean, a French theologian and Jesuit, was born at Charolles in 1575, and died at Lyons, Nov. 1, 1640. Sotwel attributes to him a book entitled Doctrina Christiana. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s.v.

Barnden, James, an English Methodist preacher, was born at Maidstone, Kent, Jan. 2, 1806. He was brought up religiously; converted in early life; entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1835, and was ordained as a full preacher in 1837, with much acceptance in circuitous circuits. He became a supernumerary in 1870 at Dymock, Gloucestershire, where he suddenly died, Feb. 27, 1875.

Barnes, Albert, D.D., one of the most prominent theologians of the Presbyterian Church, was born at Rome, N. Y., Dec. 1, 1798. He studied at Hamilton College with a view of becoming a lawyer, but the Christian experiences he had had there induced him to give up his fondly cherished plan for the work of the ministry; and upon graduating in 1820 he pursued a four years’ course of theological study at Princeton, N. J., He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Elizabeth-town, April 28, 1823. His first pastorate was at Morristown, N. J., and in 1830 he accepted a call to the charge of the First Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia, with which Church he retained official connection to the day of his death, Dec. 24, 1870.

Dr. Barnes was not only the friend of the rich, but also of the oppressed, especially of the slave, whose earthly life was bitter. A faithful friend of native modesty which was so peculiarly a trait of his whole life never seemed to be in antagonism with the highest moral intrepidity. He thought, he spoke, he acted, from the sense of right which was so strong an element in his nature. Often in peril, and sometimes in actual experience of perils, of parting, of death, of disaster, of sympathy with the oppressed never wavered or slumbered. His faith in the emancipation of the slave and the elevation of the colored people of the country, though often confessed to be dark respecting the process, was firm respecting the final event. As to his theological position, widely as men may have differed as to the soundness of some of his doctrinal statements and positions, they did not differ as to the purity of his motives and the guilelessness of his spirit. As he approached the close of his life, his own testimony was that “the objects of eternity became overpoweringly bright and grand.” Yet he did not lose his interest in this world as the scene of the development of the great plans of God. He cherished to the last the cheerfulness views of the world, of the certain progress of the race, of the destiny of man.

At Philadelphia, Dr. Barnes prepared those works which made his name a household word wherever the English tongue is spoken. The first of these was his Notes Explanatory and Practical on the Gospels (Phila. 1832), designed for Sunday-school teachers and Bible-classes, which soon attained a larger circulation, both in Europe and America, than any similar work. This was followed, in rapid succession, by Notes on the New Testament (11 vols.), on Job (2 vols.), on Isaiah (2 vols.), on Daniel, and on the Book of Psalms (N. Y. 1870, 9 vols.). He was a man of large and busy life, and by lamplight in the early morning, he nearly lost his sight. He also published, The Attonement in its Relations to Law and Moral Government (Phila. 1859):—Lectures on the Evidence of Christianity in the Nineteenth Century (N. Y. 1868):—Practical Sermons Designed for the Use of Families and Foundations (N. Y. 1884):—The Way of Salvation (ibid. 1863), illustrated by a series of discourses:—Miscellaneous Essays and Reviews (N. Y. 1855, 2 vols.):—Prayers for the Use of Families (ibid. 1870), etc. See Lives of the Leaders of Our Church Universal (ibid.), p. 767 sq. (D. F.)

Barnes, Albert Henry, Ph.D., a Congregational minister, son of the preceding, was born in Morristown, N. J., Feb. 11, 1836. He was prepared for college at an academy in Philadelphia, and graduated at Yale College in 1864. He united on profession of faith with Yale College Church while a student, and studied theology one year in the Divinity School of Yale College, but subsequently entered the senior class in Princeton Seminary and remained one year. He was licensed by the New Haven East Association (Congregational) Aug. 15, 1860. Having accepted a call to become pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Lawrenceville, Pa., he was ordained at that place by the Presbytery of Pennsylvania, and installed pastor Dec. 6, 1864. He was released in 1869, after which he established a school in Philadelphia, which he taught from 1869 to 1870. He died May 6, 1878. Mr. Barnes was the author of a volume entitled Popular Mistakes in Education. He also wrote frequently for the newspapers, and especially for the New York Times. He was an earnest student, especially of the older English literature. See Necrological Report of Princeton Theological Seminary, 1879.

Barnes, Benjamin Nichols, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Southampton, N. J., Nov. 15, 1808. In its effective ranks he continued till 1863, when he became superannuated. The circumstances of his death are painful, being the result of insanity, of which he showed signs for nearly a year. It occurred Sept. 22, 1864. As to his Christian character, no doubt can be entertained; for the amount and kind of work that he performed for so many years was proof of his being thoroughly imbued with the spirit of experimental piety. Barneveldt, Jan van Olden, grand-pensionary of Holland, whose influence upon the religious history of his country entitles him to a place here. He was born in Utrecht, in 1547. He studied law, and commenced practice as an advocate at The Hague in 1569. He felt deeply his country's wrongs under the yoke of Spain, and served as a volunteer at the sieges of Haarlem and Leyden. In 1570 he was appointed counsellor and chief pensionary of Rotter-dam. On the death of William the Silent in 1585, Barneveldt, as ambassador to England and France, of-fered these governments the protectorship of the Con-federated States. On their refusal, he exerted all his powers to carry through the election of Maurice of Nassau as stadtholder of five provinces. He was then raised to the dignity of advocate-general of Holland and West Friesland. At the close of 1586 the earl of Leicester, who had been invested with absolute power in the provinces, was recalled to England. The official career of Barneveldt was one of eminent success and of satisfaction to the States; and when he proposed to resign his post in 1595, he was urgently entreated to remain. In 1598 the treaty of Vervins called Barneveldt to France, where he obtained from Henry IV a large promise of pecuniary help. In the same year he arranged with Elizabeth the public debt and securities which England then held from the republic. In 1599 he again appeared at the English court, was sent into the alliance with James I, to which Sully, as the represent-ative of France, was a party. He next secured the treaty of peace between Spain and the republic, dated April 9, 1699, and to continue twelve years. Although the foundation of Dutch political independence, this treaty brought upon him the suspicions of the bigoted clerical party, and the career of his talents was more or less ruined. It was the struggle of Arminians and Gomorrista that the court of Maurice. The struggle of Arminians and Gomorrista was already raging, and the two parties were led by Barnevedt and Maurice respectively. Maurice was aiming at the sovereign power; Barnevedt resolutely maintained the freedom of the republic. The clerical party, with Maurice as their leader, were determined to have Calvinism adopted as the state religion, and to tolerate no other; Barnevedt and the Arminians contended that each province should be free to adopt the form which it preferred. Barnevedt was the champion of the supremacy of the civil authority and the prime minister of Protestantism. New difficulties arose in the question of the National Synod, and of the right of the States-General to enforce Calvinism on the seven provinces by means of an ecclesiastical synod; the enlisting of Waagstedlers in the state of Utrecht; the occupation of Overyssel and Guelderland by the prince. In 1618 Barnevedt was illegally arrested, along with Grothus and Hoorn, in order by a secret plot to be afterwards adopted by the States-General. During the sittings of the Synod of Dort, he was brought to trial (March 7, 1619) in the most illegal and oppressive manner; found guilty of asserting the rights of the provinces to settle each its own religion, and executed at The Hague by the beheading. See De Vries, van der; Olden Barnevedt en zijn Tijd (The Hague, 1862-65, 3 vols.); Motley, Life and Death of John of Barneveldt (N.Y., 1874); Groen Van Prinsterer, Maurice et Barnevelde, Etude Historique (Utrecht and London, 1875).

In all these pastorates he was greatly blessed with revivals of religion. The constant and exhausting labors of these years of ministerial work broke down his health, and in 1860 he left the pastorate and sought to recruit a farm in Miller County, Mo., where he died, April 29, 1892. Baroes was banished by the Arian Valens to Egypt—first, to the island of Arados;
then, with the view of checking the crowds that flocked to the holy confessor, to Oxynychus, in the Thebaid; and finally to a fortress named Philae, on the barbarian frontier, where he died in extreme old age, A.D. 378, the same year in which his persecutor died, in or after the disastrous battle of Adrianople. The pastoral relation existing between him and the Church of Wayne was dissolved April 21, 1847, but he continued to be pastor of the Jackson Church more than thirty-six years, until his death. During the last few years of his life he was very feeble. He died at Canal Centre, O., Nov. 29, 1877. During his long ministry in this one charge, he had acquired a vast influence over all classes of the whole community. His knowledge of the Scriptures in the original was very thorough. He was also a profound theologian, but nevertheless modest, retiring, humble, discerning, wise. See Necrological Report of Princeton Theological Seminary, 1878. (W. P. S.)

Barracl (or Barradus), Sebastian, a Portuguese theologian, was born in 1542. He was of a noble family, and belonged to the Jesuit Order. He taught at Coimbra and at Evora both rhetoric and philosophy, and so brilliant was he as an instructor that he was asked to come to the St. Paul's in London. His conduct was like to that of a saint; and he held in such high veneration that even a piece of his apparel was sought for. He died April 14, 1615. He wrote, Comment in Historiam et Concordium Evangelicam: Itinerarium Filiorum Israel ex Aegypto in Terram Promissionis. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biol. Gén. et Hist., s. v.

He preached at various points in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia; became a superannuated in 1878, after forty-two years' toil; settled at Carleton, N. B., and died there Aug. 14, 1878. His zeal and faithfulness won many to Christ. See The Wesleyan, Sept. 1878.

Barre, Jean Jacques de la, a French Protestant theologian who was born at Geneva in 1596, and died in 1751, wrote, Pensees Philosophiques:—Dialogues sur Divers Sujets. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biol. Gén. et Hist., s. v.

During the dreadful plague of Lisbon in 1569, his charity and attention to the sick were unbounded, and continued even after he had himself sickened with the disease. His excellence being thus proved, he was sent as missionary to Angola in 1590, where he learned the language and was blessed with vast success. In his sixty-fifth year, after his return to Portugal, he was sent to Cape Verde, whence he proceeded to Sierra Leone, on the coast of Africa. He died in 1612 at Ribeira Grande. See New Gen. Biol. Barrett, Alfred, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Attercliffe, near Sheffield, Oct. 17, 1808. When fifteen years of age he united with the Wesleyan Methodist Society; entered the ministry in 1832; was governor of Richmond Theological Institution for many years; spent the closing years of his life in retirement, and died at Clapton, Oct. 26, 1876. "He was a man of high intellectual capacity and of refined and cultivated tastes. He was a hard student. Some of his works are valuable; and his sermons, carefully prepared and hallowed by fervent prayer, were a fine retinue of facts and figures, a joy for language of beauty, and depth of thought, as well as for energy and unction. . . . Powerful in the pulpit, unrivalled in the Bible class, and not less remarkable for the faithful and fruitful discharge of pastoral duties, he was also diligent in the more subordinate functions of his office." Mr. Barrett combined dignity and re宁mance with that courtesy, gentleness, and affection which won him many friends. William Arthur calls him "the lovely Alfred Barrett—a pearl of great price" (Life of Dr. S. D. Waddy, by his youngest daughter, p. 346). Owing to a constitutional tendency, his soul was sometimes for weeks under a cloud of sadness and gloom. Mr. Barrett wrote the following: The Pastoral Office; with Special Reference to the Wesleyan Methodists (Lond. 1839, 8vo);—Pastoral Addresses (1824; ibid. 1845, 2 vols. 12mo).—Catholic and Eccehical Principles Viewed in their Present Application (ibid. 1848, 5vo).—Life of Mrs. Cryer (ibid. 1845, 12mo).—Christ in the Storm; or, The World Pacified (ibid. 1849, 12mo).—The Bootman’s Daughter (ibid. 1847, 18mo).—Discourse on Modern Mental Philosophy, with an Address to Young Men (ibid. 1851, 12mo).—Reminiscences of the Church of the Rev. J. H. Bunby, with a Brief History of the New Zealand Mission (ibid. 1852, 18mo).—Devotional Remains of Mrs. Cryer, with an Introduction (ibid. 1854, 16mo).—The Ministry and Polity of the Christian Church, Viewed in their Scriptural and Theological Aspects (ibid. 1861, 12mo).—sermon on Rev. xix. 18. in Sermons by Wesleyan Methodist Ministers (1850)—Consolator; or, Recollections of the Rev. J. Pearson (ibid. 1856, 12mo).—a sermon on Knowing our Fathers’ God. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1877, p. 14; Osborn, Wesleyan Bibliography, p. 66.

Barrett, Benjamin, an English Wesleyan minister, was born in Ecclesfield, near Bradford, in 1779. He was converted at fourteen, appointed to the rank of a local preacher at nineteen, entered the itinerancy in 1807, and, after thirty-two years of pious, unassuming, faithful service, died May 24, 1839. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1839.

Barrett, Edward Semans, a Congregational minister, was born in Cavendish, Vt., Oct. 17, 1810. He graduated at Middlebury College in 1838; taught at Canaan, N.H., for two years, and the same time a tutor in the theological studies. He commenced preaching at Weston, Vt., where he was ordained in 1841. In 1844 he was a member of the legislature of Vermont. From 1845 to 1852 he was a teacher in Leicester, and from 1852 to 1855 superintendent of schools in Addison County. Barrett, Elisha D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Northampton, Mass., in 1789. After a preparatory training, he entered Williams College, and was graduated in 1813. After graduation, he removed to Virginia and opened a high-school, his pupils being mostly slave-holders. He also organized a Sunday-school, to which the blacks as well as whites were invited. As the instruction of the blacks was contrary to law, he was threatened with its penalties if he did not desist. Despite all threats, he continued, during the whole of his time, a higher character than he had superior claims upon him. His school was not closed, and he conducted it with success. He was ordained and installed pastor of the Presbyterian churches of Plumb Creek and Glass Run, where he labored many years with great success. His late years were spent in Illinois and Missouri. In his eighty-eighth year he taught a private class in Latin and Greek. His last sermon was preached when he was ninety years of age. He closed his long and useful life in Sedalia, Mo., Nov. 6, 1880. See Presbyterian, Dec. 1, 1880. (W. P. S.)

Barrett, George J., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Mechanicsville, N. Y., Feb. 22, 1818. He professed religion in early life; became a teacher among the Chippewa Indians at Green Bay, Wis., in his eighteenth year; and in 1839 entered the Illinois Conference. Ten years later ill-health obliged him to locate. On recovering, he began preaching for the Congregationalists, and remained with them fifteen years. In 1863 he re-entered the Illinois Conference, and continued to preach and faithful until his death, Feb. 19, 1877. Mr. Barrett won the reputation of being the wittiest man ever connected with the Illinois Conference. Always cheerful and buoyant, he scattered sunshine wherever he went. He was conscientious and strong in all his convictions; was brave, and wielded a scathing pen in early life; became a teacher of the Church in Hinckley, O., and commenced his duties in July, 1876. In the midst of great usefulness, and with bright hopes of success in his ministry, he was called away, after an illness of three weeks, Jan. 29, 1878. See Morning Star, Feb. 27, 1878. (J. C. S.)

Barrett, John, D.D., an Irish clergyman and educator, was born in Dublin in 1738. He was educated at Trinity College, of which he became a fellow in 1778, a member of the senior board in 1791, and librarian in 1792, having served as assistant during the preceding eight years. He died Nov. 15, 1821. Dr. Barrett was a fine scholar, and distinguished in particular for a memory which was almost miraculous. He was, however, exceedingly eccentric in his habits, and rarely passed beyond the precincts of his college. He published, An Inquiry into the Origin of the Constellations that compose the Zodiac, and the Uses they were Intended to Promote; —An Essay on the Earlier Part of the Life of Swift; —Evangeliwm secundum Matthaeum ex Codice scripto in Bibliotheca Collegii Scholasticici of privileged Dublin and of the Lond.) He graduated at Yale College in 1844, after which he went to Columbia, O., and taught four years. In 1851 he was appointed to the Union Theological Seminary, N. Y., where he spent about two years, and then entered the senior class in Princeton Seminary, N. J., where he was regularly graduated in 1851. He was licensed April 16 of that year by the Presbytery of New York, and received a call from the Church at Pontiac, Mich., but did not accept it. He went to Detroit, Mich., preached a few weeks in the First Presbyterian Church of that city, and in the next was chosen assistant pastor, and filled the pulpit for fifteen months during Dr. Duffield’s absence in Europe. Mr. Barrett was ordained as an evangelist by the Presbytery of Detroit, in the First Church of Detroit, Michigan, that year, and was installed pastor of the First Presbyterian Church at Newton, Sussex Co., N. J., June 26, 1854, and here he continued about five years. His health then failing, he resigned his charge, continuing, however, to preach as he had opportunity. He spent the following summer in the employ of the American Tract Society, and then made three successive engagements of six months each to supply the Church at Stroudsburg, Pa., but declined to accept its call. He preached for one year as assistant pastor to the South Church, New Haven, Conn., and afterwards supplied for periods of various length churches at White Plains, N. Y., and elsewhere, being seldom unconnected with the Sabbath Societies. He died May 5, 1876. Mr. Barrett was a man of quick perceptions and logical intellect. His convictions of truth were clear and intense, and gave power to his preaching. He was active and useful as a citizen, and as a man and a Christian commanded the unwavering respect of all who knew him. See Necrological Report of Princeton Theological Seminary, 1877.

Barrett, Samuel D.D., a Unitarian minister, was born in Royalston, Mass., in 1794. He was educated in Wilton, N. H., and at Harvard College, where he graduated in 1818, and subsequently at the Theological School at Cambridge. In the fall of 1817 he removed to Rutland, Vt., and in 1837 he was licensed to preach by the Meigs Quarterly Meeting. His ordination took place in September, 1849, in Cheshire, O. Here he preached more often than in any other place, although he labored in different churches in his own quarterly meeting and in that of Athens. He died in Rutland, July 19, 1860. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1861, p. 91. (J. C. S.)

Four years later he located on account of ill-health; removed to Ohio, and in 1821 joined the Ohio Conference, and in 1830 was elected bishop of the church, and labored diligently till his death, Feb. 22, 1889. Mr. Barrett was open-hearted and frank as a man, confident and unwavering as a friend, affectionate as a parent, and devoted and zealous as a minister. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1840, p. 32.

Barrett. The Carmelites were formerly called "Carmelites of Jesus." Barry F. Prior in his 1927 essay shows this was a misnomer for a time was party-colored—part black and part white. This was about 1295. They afterwards resumed the white dress, which was their original habit. See Collier, Hist. Dict. vol. iv.; London, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Barrénn (Barrindus, Barinhensus, and also Finbar and Findbar, white hair), the name of three Irish ecclesiastics.
1. Son of Eithid, or Aedath, of the family of St. Bridget, who was related to the Irish king called the Lawgiver, who reigned A.D. 164-174 (Todd, St. Patrick, p. 287). His festival is Nov. 8.
2. Bishop of Drum-cullin (now Drumcullen, Kings Co.) and of Cliffrinhill, celebrated May 21. His date as given by Ussher (De Brit. Eccl. Prim. [Dublin, 1639]) is A.D. 590; but Laming (Eccl. Hist. Tr., ii. 223) thinks he must have flourished earlier. Ussher counts him among the three hundred who formed the second order of Irish saints, and quotes from the Life of St. Carthusius, calling him abbots of Drum-cullin, on the borders of Munster and Leinster. Kilbarron Parish, Drumcliff, County Sligo, sends its patronage to one named from this name from saint. See Stat. Acc. Ireland, i, 462.
3. Abbot of Inis-dambl, on the borders of Ken-salach in Leinster, whose festival is celebrated January 30. Some appear to confound him with No. 1 above.

Barri, Giacomo, a Venetian painter and engraver, lived about 1560. He etched a fine plate of the Notturni, after P. Veronese; also some plates after his own designs; and in 1651 he published a work of some merit, entitled Viaggio Pittoresco d'Italia.

Barrientos, Genes de, a Spanish theologian, studied at Salamanca, entered the Dominican Order, and made himself known as a theologian and preacher. Appointed to the Court of Charles II. for his eloquence, he did not remain to be dazzled by his success, but sequestered himself to foreign missions. In 1685 he went to the Philippine Islands, and became successively titular bishop of Troy and suffragan of the archbishop of Manila. He died in 1694. He wrote Reflexiones Theologicas (Manilla, 1694). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Barrientos, Lopes de, a Spanish theologian, was born at Medina del Campo in 1892. He entered the Dominican Order, and became professor of theology at Salamanca. He held this position from 1416 to 1433, when he was placed in charge of the education of the prince Henry by the king of Castile, John II. In 1438 he was appointed bishop of Segovia and grand-chancellor of Castile, and in 1440 assisted the king at the States-General of Madrid. In 1442 he became bishop of Avila, and, after bringing about a reconciliation between prince Henry and the king, his father, he became bishop of Cuenca and inquisitor-general of all Castile. He refused the bishopric of Compostella, and remained at Cuenca till his death, which occurred May 21, 1469. The poor were his heirs. He wrote, Claris Summatorum, ad Summam et ad Sanctum Florentini, Summatam Thesaurum:—and several other works which remain unpublished. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Barriére, Jean de la, founder of the Order of the Feuillants, was born at Saint Ceré in 1544. At the age of eighteen he was appointed to the Abbey of the Feuillants, of which he took possession in 1565. He died as a prisoner at Rome in 1600. His varied fortunes are recounted under the article FEUILLENTS.

Barrière (or Barreria), Pierre de, a cardinal, and bishop of Autun, a native of Rodez, lived at the close of the 14th century. He refused to accept the cardinalate at the hand of pope Urban VI, because he believed that this pontiff had not been legally elected, but accepted it later from Clement VII. He wrote a treatise upon schism, directed against John of Lignano, defender of Urban; it was published in Dubuay's Histoire de l'Université de Paris, vol. iv. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Barrimit, in Mongolian mythology, is the name of the six perfections which the priests of the religion of Lama are required to reach—namely, sanctification from worldliness, true zeal, holiness, virtue, devotional meditation, and wisdom.

Barrindus. See BARRFINN; also BARRY.

He was converted in his seventeenth year, and in 1838 entered the Conference, in which he served the church till his decease, Sept. 3, 1871. Mr. Barringer was an able preacher, a sound theologian, a logical and lucid speaker. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1871, p. 249.

Barringer, William, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Cabarrus County, N. C., Feb. 18, 1816. He was educated at Chapel Hill; entered mercantile business at Concord; experienced a powerful conversion in 1842, and in 1844 joined the South Carolina Conference, in which he served with diligence and fidelity until his sudden death, March 17, 1875. Experimental religion was Mr. Barringer's great theme, and he exhibited it as the controlling power of his life. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1878, p. 804.

Barrington, Shute, a prelate of the Church of England, was born in 1784. He was educated at Eton and at Merton College, Oxford, of which he became a fellow; was ordained in 1757; obtained various prebendaries, and at length, in 1769, the bishopric of Llandaff; in 1781 that of Salisbury; and ten years after that of Durham, which he held till his decease, in March, 1820. He was a learned man, a protector of literature, a patron of all religious and philanthropic institutions, and wholly devoted to the great work com-minded to his care by the Church. His talents were acknowledged to be considerable, and his various publications, which consisted of Biblical criticisms, tracts, sermons, and charges, were all consecrated to the glory of God.

Barritt, John, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Owlet Hill, near Colne, Lancashire, in 1756. He was converted at the age of seventeen, and was called into the ministry by Wesley in 1766. He travelled eighteen circuits; became a superintendental in 1817, and died March 8, 1841. He was a good man and a useful laborer. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1841, p. 156; Wesleyan Meth. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1862, p. 15.

Barritt, Myron. See Barrett.

Barrius (or Baroccus). See Barry.

Barroco, Sr., a disciple of St. Cadoc, in the 6th century. When Cadoc sailed from the island Echlini Brarow with his disciples Burre and Gulachs, he found that they had forgotten his encription, and sent them back for it, saying, "Go, not to return." The irritable and revengeful character of Celta saints is noted by Giraldus. A sudden storm overtook their boat, and Barrius lies buried in the living island Barrow, to which he gave his name. This account is late, and there is an evident use of Nennius in it. Giraldus Cambrensis, whose family took its name from Barry Island, describes the saint's shrine in his time thus: "Cujus et reliquias in capella ibidem sita, hodie nuxius ampelasia, in feretrum translationem continuavit." His feast-day is variously stated as Nov. 29 (Cressey, Church History, xx, 18) or Sept. 27 (Ritson, Arthur, p. 157).

Barrois, Humbert, a French theologian of the Benedictine Order. He entered the Order of Moyen Moutier in 1711, became abbot in 1727, and was invested with the principal honors of the Society of St. Van. He published various works upon the constitution of his order and upon other subjects. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Barroll, William, a missionary of the Church of England, was a native of Wales. He was licensed to preach by the bishop of London, and immediately on his arrival in Maryland succeeded his uncle, the Rev. Hugh Jones, in the rectoryship of North Sassafras Parish, Cecil Co. When the living was taken away from the clergy in Maryland in 1776, he removed to Elkton, Md., and taught school for the support of his family. He died in North Sassafras Parish in 1778, aged about forty years. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 12.

Barron, Thompson, a Universalist minister, was born in Billericia, Mass., April 17, 1816. He was left an orphan at the age of eight; learned the carpenter's trade; gave himself a liberal education, and began preaching in 1836. In 1837 he was ordained at Bridge-water, Vt., in which vicinity he preached until 1841, when he removed to Winchester, N. H. He afterwards removed to Concord, N. H., in 1846; to Dayton, O., in 1851; to Ste. Genevieve, O., in 1859; to Muscatine, Ia., in 1866; returned to Enfield, N. H., in 1858; afterwards laboured in Wentworth; and lastly removed to Newport, same state, where he retired to a small farm, and there continued until his death, Jan. 4, 1870.

Mr. Barron was a man of positive theological views, impetuous temperament, of marked independent character, and very limited popularity. See Universalist Register, 1871, p. 100.

Barrow, David, a Baptist minister, was born in Brunswick County, Va., Oct. 30, 1758. He united with the Church in his seventeenth year, and began to preach when he was eighteen. He was ordained in 1777, entered the ministry by the called order of the people in Virginia, itinerating much also in that state and in North Carolina. He was exposed to many of the persecutions which in those times the Baptists suffered.

In 1778 he was seized at one of his meetings by a gang of twenty men, dragged a half-mile, and forcibly dipped under water twice, with many jeers and mockeries." He was removed to Montgomery County, Ky., and became pastor of the Church at Mt. Sterling. He was a warm advocate of anti slavery, and was regarded as a leader in the abolition movement in the section of the state in which he lived. He died Nov. 14, 1818. Among his published writings were a book against slavery and a treatise in defence of the doctrine of the Trinity. See Baptist Encyclopedia, p. 83. (J. C. S.)

Barrowclough, Samuel, a minister of the Methodist New Connection, a native of Staniland, Yorkshire, was born in 1756, and devoted himself in early life to the Methodists. He joined the New Connection at the time of the division, and in 1804 entered their ministry; travelled in thirty circuits, laboring with great success, some of his converts being eminent Christians. He was an eloquent and able divine; but in 1820 his health failed, and he retired to Manchester, and died there Dec. 1, 1821. See Minutes of the Conference.

Barrowclough, William, an English Wesleyan minister, and a young man of deep piety and promising gifts, was appointed by the Wesleyan Missionary Society to go to some circuit in County Durham. Barrowes (or Barrowes), Henry, a Brownist, was executed at Tyburn with John Greenwood, April 6, 1695, "for writing and publishing sundry seditious books and pamphlets tending to the slander of the queen and government." He wrote, A Brief Discourse of the False Church; as is the Mother, so is the Daughter (Lond. 1690) — and Platform which may Serve as a Preparation to Drive away Prelatism (1698). See Brook, Lives of the Puritans; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Barrowists, a name which was sometimes applied to the Brownists (q.v.), after one of their leaders.

Barrows are mounds of earth which have in many countries been raised over the remains of the dead. Their use was prevalent among many of the ancient inhabitants of Europe. Virgil attributes it to the ancient Romans, and Herodotus mentions it as being a practice among the Scythians. Many monuments of this kind are to be found in both England and Scotland, while in Scandinavia the practice of raising barrows has prevailed for many centuries. The usual form of the Scandinavian barrows is either round or oblong, and some of them have rows of upright stones set around them. Barrows with stone chambers were earliest in use. Of the oblong some have been found to contain two or more stone chests, one at each end, and others, as that at the middle, were chambers. Pit barrows were commonly raised over stone vaults or mortuary chambers in which the dead body was deposited, either buried in sand or laid out on a flat stone, and sometimes in a sitting posture. Barrows in considerable number were often raised on a field of battle, high stone mounds set around the mound for the benefit of the soldiers. Among the wooden barrows mentioned there were those known as ship-barrows, made by taking a boat or ship, turning it keel uppermost, and raising a mound of earth and stones upon it for a house of the dead. See Mallet, Northern Antiquities (Blackwell's ed.); Gardiner, Faiths of the World, s. v. See MOUNDS.

After the Revolution, Nov. 9, 1799, abbe Barreau desired to return to France, and July 8, 1800, he circulated about Paris a tract warmly recommending fidelity to the consular government. This writing gained for him the favor of the First Consul, who, in order to recompense him, appointed him canon of the Cathedral of Paris. Barry (Barrius, Barrindus, Barrocos, Barr, Flanbar), Sr., commemorated Sept. 25, has both an Irish and Scotch history. According to the Irish history, he was a native of Cork or its neighborhood, and the founder, bishop, and patriarch of the Church there, spending his life in that district as a confessor. He was educated at first in Leinster under Mac-corb; and at Corcaigh-Mór, the "marshy place" where Cork now stands, he founded his Church and established a school. He had previously had a school at Loch Fre. All accounts agree that he visited Rome, and on his way paid a visit to St. David at Menevia. After an episcopate of seventeen years, he died at Cloynne, Sept. 25, 633 (or 630), and was buried at Cork. He is patron of Kilberry Parish, in Waterford; perhaps also of Kilberry Parish, Diocese of Dublin, County of Kildare. See Caulfield, Life of St. Flibi Barrus (London, 1854); and for a long list of authorities, Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog., s. v.

more Conference. In 1844 ill-health obliged him to resign from the presbytery, and he located at Rockville, Md., where he continued to reside until his death Sept. 2, 1877. As a preacher, Mr. Barry was studious, Biblical, sound, and forcible; as a man, spiritual. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1878, p. 15.

Barry, Edmund D., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in Kinsale, Ireland, in 1777. His earlier studies were prosecuted under an able master in charge of the academy at Youghal. In 1796 he was entered as fellow-commoner at Trinity College, Dublin. In 1798 he became an exile to America, his banishment growing out of the political agitation in Ireland during 1796-97. He began his career as a teacher on Staten Island, where he remained fourteen months. In 1800 he taught at the Elizabethtown Academy. He became assistant minister of the French Church in New York in 1808, and at the same time took charge of the Protestant Episcopal Academy in that city, where he remained thirteen years. Removing to Baltimore, Md., he occupied a position as instructor in a similar institution in Maryland to New York in 1824, where he established a flourishing academy. He died at Jersey City, N. J., April 20, 1852. Dr. Barry was a man of eminent piety, courteous and graceful in his manner, and beloved by a large circle of friends. See Amer. Quart. Church Rec. 1852, p. 326.

He was educated at the University of Edinburgh, and for a short time was employed as a private tutor to the sons of some gentlemen in Orkney, whose patronage he became second minister of the rivalburgh and ancient cathedral of Kirkwall. About 1756 he removed to the island and parish of Shapinsay. He first attracted public notice by the statistical account of his two parishes, published in Sir John Sinclair's Statistical Reports. He was very zealous in his labors for the education of youth, and for that reason the Society for the Propagation of Christian Knowledge in Scotland about 1800 chose him one of their members and gave him superintendence over their schools at Orkney. He died May 14, 1805. Shortly after his death appeared his History of the Orkney Islands.

Barry, Gerald (usually called Geraldus Cambrensis, or Gerald of Wales), an English clergyman descended from a noble family, was born at the Castle of Mainaper, near Pembroke, in 1146. His early training was conducted by the bishop of St. David's, his uncle. He was afterwards sent to Paris for three years, after which he returned to England, in 1172, entered into holy orders, and received several benefices in England and Wales. He became the legate of Richard, archbishop of Canterbury, for correcting various disorders in Wales, and executed his office with great vigor. At the death of his uncle, David FitzGerald, bishop of St. David's, he was elected to the vacant see, but declined the office on account of an irregularity in the election, more especially, however, on account of the opposition of King Henry II. He then returned to Paris, and enga-gaged in the study of civil and canon law, especially the papal constitutions or decreta. In 1179 he was elected professor of canon law in the University of Paris, but declined the honor. In 1180 he returned to England, and was appointed bishop of Menevia pro tempore, which function he filled during three or four years with great success. In 1184 he became chaplain to Henry II, and subsequently received various honorary appointments. In 1198 he was again elected bishop of St. David's, but this time the opposition of Hubert, archbishop of Canterbury, stood in the way; and after a contest of five years, in which he made three journeys to Rome, he was finally defeated. Soon after this he retired from public life, and spent the remaining seventeen years of his life in literary labors. He is supposed to have died in 1223. lin, where, at the age of twenty-two, he gained the prize for a historical picture representing the arrival of St. Patrick on the coast of Cashel. In 1770 he went to England, and exhibited in the Royal Academy his Adam and Eve, and the year following his Venus Anadyomene. He was elected a Royal Academician in 1777, and professor of painting in that institution, but on account of misconduct was obliged to resign. He struggled with his evil genius, poverty, and neglect, and died in the greatest infirmity at London in February, 1806. The principal works of this great artist are the series of pictures in the Adelphi, which are best described by himself in his pamphlet, and which he terms a Series of Pictures on Human Culture.

He was afterwards sent to Canada and Bermuda, but, on his rupturing a bloodvessel, returned to England in 1836. He vainly tried to regain his health in Guernsey and the West Indies, and died in Montreal, June 21, 1838. "His sermons were rich in the grace of charity, and when delivered with great earnestness and power." See Cooney, Autobiog. of a Weal. Meth. Barsanians were one of the minor Egyptian sects.

of the Monophysites during the latter part of the 5th century. Joannes Damascenus identifies them with the Semidians (q.v.), and states that they had no valid consecration of the eucharist, but, having mixed a few crumbs of sacramental bread consecrated by Dioscorus, the Eutychian patriarch of Alexandria, with wine and near the partook of the loaf made therefrom, and regarded it as a reception of the holy communion. Damascenus strangely attributes to them the netuses both of the Gajzenius (or Julianists) and of the Theodosiani (or Severians), who held opposite doctrines as to the corruptibility of Christ's body, adding thereto something of their own.

Barsanuphi (or Barsanuphites) were an obscure subdivision of the Monophysites, taking their name from Barsanuphius, an Egyptian pretender to the episcopal rank. They separated from the Jacobites in the reign of the emperor Zeno, at the latter part of the 5th century, and were reunited to them in the time of the patriarch Mar, about 810. At that time they had two bishops, whom Mar at first refused to recognise, but afterwards acknowledged, and appointed them to the first vacant seats. The founder of this sect was a different person from the Palestinian anchorite. See Fleury, Hist. Eccl. x. 116; Neale, Patriar. of Alexandria, ii. 137, 252.

Barsema, a solitary of Palestine, an Egyptian by birth, in the reign of Justinian, about 540. According to the story related by Evagrius (Hist. Eccl. iv, 33), he shut himself up in his cell in a monastery at Gaza, where he remained for more than fifty years, seeing and seen by no human being, and eating no earthly food. Eustochius, the bishop of Jerusalem, disbelieving the story, went to see him, to be broken open, whereupon fire burst out and consumed the sacrilegious disturbers of the holy man's repose. Barsanuphius was the author of Quaestiones et Responsiones Acadetica Variae, and a Paraphrase ad Proprium Discipulam, originally printed by Montfaucon, Biblioth. Crit. p. 384; and afterwards by Galland, Biblioth. Vet. Patr., xi. and Migne, Patrolog. Lxxxvi. p. i. 887 sq.

Barsam, in Persian cultus, is a bundle of consecrated twigs which the priest holds in his left hand while reading the Zendavesta. They are held together by a sacred band of palm-leaves, which is called Evangunik. The tree from which the branches are taken is not mentioned; the number is decided according to the number of books which the priest reads.

Bartholomew, bishop of Oxford. So Dupin styles an ecclesiastical writer of the 18th century who wrote a Penitential, which he says was in MS, in the Library of St. Victoire at Paris. But clearly he is mistaken in calling him bishop of Oxford, which see was not erected till 1542. He means Bartholomew Is- oucanus, bishop and his writer who was consecrated in 1161, and died Dec. 15, 1194. He who, as Godwin states, wrote several works, a list of which may be seen in Bale. Some letters written to him by John of Salisbury, bishop of Chartres, are still extant. See Godwin, De Prax. Aug. p. 409; Dupin, Hist. of Eccles. Writers, ii, 369; Tanner, Bibl. Brit. p. 78.

About this time he was converted, and joined the Methodists. He was licensed to preach, and in 1831 gave up the study of medicine, and was employed on Middlesex Mission. Dr. Bartine was a noble specimen of a man—nearly six feet tall, stoutly built, straight, and vigorous; his hair was black and beautiful, his forehead high and commanding, his large dark-gray eyes were brilliant, his lips at times compressed All these grace in him a marked personal presence. His mind was of a high order, cultured and well-balanced; his imagination sublime, his voice having wonderful compass and sweetness, his diction faultless, and his gift of utterance most remarkable. His deep piety, burning zeal, and profound knowledge and use of the Scriptures made him a very successful and popular preacher. He stood forth a champion for liberty, education, temperance, Sunday-scholar, and missions, but pre-eminently as a preacher of righteousness. His great popularity made him a favorite at dedications, extra meetings, and at Conferences. His most effectual efforts were made at camp-meetings. Here he stood as a prince of preachers. In the deep solitude of the woods at night, when the stars peered through the trees, when the old-fashioned torchlight fires lighted up the ground and flashed over the vast congregations, and the stand was crowded with preachers, then he seemed almost inspired to speak the Word with marvelous edification to the Church and wonderful awakening power to the unconverted. Thousands were swayed under his preaching like fields of grain by the wind. For fifty years he went forward untarnished in reputation, never listening to flattering overtures of other denominations for his ministry. The last decade he seemed like one of the old prophets: his venerable appearance and long flowing locks, his youthful fire and full, sweet-toned voice, made him to the last a man of mark. (See N. Y.) Christian Advocate, Oct. 20, 1881.

Barton, Bernard, known as "the Quaker poet," was born near London, England, Jan. 31, 1784. He early developed a poetical taste, and in 1811 published a volume of poetry which, coming from such a source, awakened the admiration of scholars in England. In 1806 he removed to Woodbridge, and in 1810 became a clerk in the banking-house of Messrs. Alexander, where he remained nearly till the time of his death. At one time he thought of abandoning music and poetry to the law, and for a moment attempted to divide his attention between literature and music, but he never lost the reminiscences of his friend Charles Lamb, who set before him the uncertainties of a merely literary life, kept the gentle poet at his desk. During the leisure hours of his profession, he devoted himself to literary pursuits. The Edinburgh Review gave a flattering notice of a volume of his poetry published in 1820. "The staple of the whole poems," said the critic, "is description and meditation —description of quiet home scenery sweetly and feelingly wrought out, and meditation overshadowed with tenderness and exalted by devotion; but all terminating in soothing and even cheerful views of the condition and prospects of mortality." Of his Devotional Verses (the Lond., New Monthly Magazine, March, 1826, says, "Mr. Barton's style is well suited to devotional poetry. It has great sweetness and pathos, accompanied with no small degree of power, which well qualify it for the expression of the higher and purer feelings of the heart." Another writer says, "His religious poems, while they are animated with a warmth of devotion, are still expressed with that subdued propriety of language which evinces at once a correctness of taste and feeling." Such was the esteem in which he was held that he was honored with a pension of one hundred pounds, granted to him by the queen, during the administration of sir Robert Peel. It was said of him that, "whether at his official place at the bank or in the domestic circle, he was the same pleasant man, and had the same manners to all, always equally frank, genial, and communicative: and, as he was charitable towards all, so he was beloved by all, and was much regarded, respected, or esteemed. His death took place Feb. 19, 1849. See Selections from the Poems and Letters of Bernard Barton, with a Memoir, by his daughter, Miss Lucy Barton; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Cleveland, English Literature of the 19th Century, p. 494; Gentlemen's Magazine, Nov. 1849. (J. C. S.)

Barzakh is the name given by the Mohammedans to the time and condition of the soul between death and the resurrection. The souls of the believers partake, even in this state, of a part of the blessedness to follow; on the other hand, the souls of the unbelievers are banished to the place of punishment, the seventh heaven. The souls of the prophets go directly into Paradise; the martyrs, however, live in the bodies of beautiful green birds, which eat of the fruit of the trees of Paradise.

Bassus (or Basanow), in Norse mythology, was a king and priest of the Sigamars, wise, and possessing the most useful attributes, but too devious of conquest for a prince. He conquered, from B.C. 264 to 240, every king of Irland; his name pervaded the nations. He was a great philosopher. Having spent his life in idol-worship, he was worshipped after death as a god of war, and his fame was celebrated in all the songs of the ancient bards.

Bassan, Pierre François, a French engraver, was born in Paris, Oct. 23, 1728, and studied under Stephen Fessard and Jean Daulé. In 1767 he was chiefly employed in print-selling, and published a Dictionnaire des Graveurs. He died Jan. 12, 1797. The following is a list of some of his prints: Louis XV, with Diogenes:—Cardinal Prince de Rohan:—Baccus and Ariadne:—Christ Breaking the Bread:—The Female Gardener. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Basana, Dominoc of, a Christian martyr, was a citizen of Bassano, Italy, and followed the war of Charles, the emperor, in Germany, where he received the first taste of Christ's Gospel. He became able to instruct others in this doctrine, and he travelled and worked in the Church, till at length, in 1550, he went to Placentia, and there preached to the people the true doctrine. He was taken by some officers and put in prison. From there he was led to the changing house, and was asked whether he would renounce his doctrine. He answered that he maintained no doctrine of his own, but only the doctrine of Christ, which he was ready to set with his blood; and at the same time gave hearty thanks to God, for accepting him as worthy to glorify his name with his martyrdom. Upon this, he was committed to a filthy and stinking prison, where, after he had remained a few months, he was exorted divers times to revoke, otherwise he should suffer; but still he remained constant in his doctrine; whereupon, when the time came assigned for his punishment, he was brought to the market-place where he had preached, and there was hanged. See Fox, Acts and Monaments, iv, 461.

Basany, in the mythology of India, was the wife of Vaishya, created from Brahma's left hip, and therefore belonging to one of the lower castes, as the Brahmins sprang from the head, and the Kashetry from the shoulders, of Brahma.

Bascetti, Clemente, an Italian theologian, was born at Montaione, and lived about 1660. He wrote, Viridarium Theologicum, etc. (Venice, 1688);—Giardinetto di Verita, etc. (1693). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.
many, was born Sept. 8, 1700, at Juliusburg, in Silesia. He studied at Breslau, Jena, and Leipzig; in 1730 was pastor and co-inspector at Christianstadt; in 1734 arch-deacon and assessor of consistory at Sorau; in 1751 general superintendent at Hildburghausen; and died, April 24, 1771, as first court preacher, member of consistory, and superintendent of the duchy of Weimar. He wrote, Disputatio de Interpretatione N. T. ex Patribus Apostolicis (Leipzig, 1726); Epistola de Unitim Elise (ibid.); Deutlicher Beweis von der Glaubwürdigkeit der heil. Schrift; Pastorale Christi ex VII Epistolis ad Ecclesias Antiquas (1717). See Hamberger, Gelehrtes Deutschland; Aub, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

BASCHI, Matteo, an Italian visionary, was born in the duchy of Urbino, near the close of the 15th century. He entered the Convent of Montefalconi, where a sort of religious madness seized him. He believed that it had been revealed to him that the costume of the Franciscans should be changed, and, with the sanction of the pope, Clement VII, it was attempted; but the Franciscans refused to do this, and he was imprisoned. The capuchon, or cowl, which he wished them to adopt was that from which the Capuchin friars, who adopted it, derived their name. Matteo Baschi was the first general of the Capuchins, and died at Venice in 1552. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

BASCOM, Ellery, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Chester, Mass., July 5, 1798. He was educated at the academies of Tallmadge and Aurora, O., and was graduated at the Western Reserve College. He studied theology in Princeton Seminary, where he remained nearly three years, and was ordained an evangelist by the Haron Presbytery in 1833. He was ever settled as a pastor. His successful fields of labor were as follows: Lower Sandusky, Williamsfield, Jackson, Wikesville, O.; and Pleasant Hill and Kendallsville, Ind. His health failing, he removed to Janesville, Wis., preached one year at Decatur, and two years at Jefferson, La., when he removed to Duluth and preached two years. He then removed to Upland, Kan., where he died, Dec. 25, 1880. See Necrological Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1882. (W. P. S.)

BASCOM, William, a Congregational minister, was born at Orleans, Mass. He graduated at Harvard College in 1802; was ordained pastor of the Church in Fitchburg, Mass., Oct. 16, 1805; was dismissed Dec. 16, 1813; and died in 1845. See Sprague, Annuals of the Amer. Pulpit, ii, 243.

BASE is the lower part of a pillar, wall, etc.; the division of a column on which the shaft is placed. The Grecian Doric order has no base; but the other classical orders have each their appropriate bases, which are divided into plinth and moldings, though in some examples the former of these divisions is omitted.

In Middle-Age architecture, the forms and proportions of the various members not being regulated by arbitrary rules as in the classical orders, the same capricious varieties are found in the bases as in all the other features of each of the successive styles. In the Norman architecture, in the moldings of the base often bear some resemblance to those of the Tuscan order, with a massive plinth which is most commonly square, even though the shaft of the pillar and the molded part of the base may be circular or octagonal. There is often a second or sub-plinth under the Norman base, the projecting angle of which is chamfered off. In the earlier periods of this style the bases generally have but few moldings, but, as a rule, they increase in number and vary in their arrangement as the style advances. There is a very great variety of bases in the Norman style; often in the same building scarcely any two are alike. This seems to be especially the case in the earlier division of the style both in Normandy and in England, and the bases in the two countries are often exactly alike. In Gaudí's Crypt of the Rochester Cathedral this variety of bases is found, and it continues until quite late in the style.

At the commencement of the Early English style the bases differ but little from the Norman, having very frequently a single or double plinth retaining the square form, with leaves springing out of the moldings lying on the angles. At a later period the plinth commonly takes the same form as the moldings, and is often made so high as to resemble a pedestal; and there is frequently a second molding below the principal suite of the base, as at the Temple Church, London. In this style the moldings of the base sometimes overhang the face of the plinth. The moldings of the Early English base that it will hold water, which is not the case in any other style.

In the Decorated style there is considerable variety in the bases, although they have not generally many moldings: the plints, like the moldings, conform to the shape of the shaft, or they are sometimes made octagonal, while the moldings are circular, and in this case the moldings overhang the face of the plinth. In some examples, where the shaft of the pillar is circular, the upper member only of the base conforms to it, the other moldings, as well as the plinth, becoming octagonal. The plints are often doubled and of considerable height, the projecting angle of the lower one being worked either with a splay, a hollow, or small molding. A common suite of moldings for bases in this style consists of a torus and one or two beads above.

In the Perpendicular style the plinths of the bases are almost invariably octagonal and of considerable height, and very frequently double, the projection of the lower one being moulded with a reversed ogee or a hollow. When the shaft is circular, the whole of the moldings of the base sometimes follow the same form; but sometimes the upper part, the projecting angle of which is chamfered off. In the earlier periods of this style the bases generally have but few moldings, but, as a rule, they increase in number and vary in their arrangement as the style advances. There is a very great variety of bases in the Norman style; often in the same building scarcely any two are alike. This seems to be especially the case in the earlier division of the style both in Normandy and in England, and the bases in the two countries are often exactly alike. members only carried round the pillar, which are commonly those on the upper part of the lower plinth. The characteristic moulding of the Perpendicular base is the reversed ogee, used either singly or doubly: when double, there is frequently a bead between them. This moulding, when used for the lower and most prominent member of the base, has the upper angle rounded off, which gives it a peculiar wavy appearance. The mouldings in this style most commonly overhang the face of the plinth.

The above descriptions apply only where a single shaft occurs. In compound piers, which are made up of groups of single pillars, the bases become more complex.

Basedow, Johann Bernhard (known also as Bernward of Nordkaljingen), a German theologian and sectary, was born Sept. 11, 1728, at Hamburg. He studied at Leipsic and Kiel; was in 1738 professor of practical philosophy at Sorrie, in Denmark; in 1761, professor at Altona; went to Dessau in 1771, where in 1774 he founded the "Philanthropinum," an institution in which education was to be achieved without any religious influence—a principle which Rousseau had laid down before him. In 1778 he retired from this institution, went to Magdeburg, where he died July 25, 1790.

Lichtenberger, in his Encyclopædia des Sciences Religieuses, says of Basedow, "His life is that of a vulgar adventurer, and his character deserves neither sympathy nor esteem;" and, concerning his educational system, the same writer says, "He has, nevertheless, the merit of having called the attention of his age to the important problem of education, and of demanding that this should be conceived in a more rational and humane manner; but he was deceived in the method generally, and lacked the authority needed to effect a like reform." He is the author of Philaletheia, oder Neue Ausichten auf die Wahrheit und Religion der Vernunft bis an die Grenzen des Unüberwindlichen Offenbarung (Altona, 1754, 2 vols.):—Theoretisches System der gesunden Vernunft (1765):—Methodischer Unterricht in Religion und Sittenlehre (ed.). He also published Universalsammlung zur gesellschaftlichen und unstetischen Erbauung (Berlin and Altona, 1767), changing some very fine hymns according to his own taste. Baselius (or Van Basle), Jacob (1), a Dutch theologian and historian, was born in 1580. He preached at and died at Zippinger-Zimmern, where he died in 1598. He wrote an account of the siege of this city in 1588, which was published in 1603. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Baselius, Jacob (2), a Dutch theologian, son of one who bore the same name, native of Leyden, lived in the early half of the 17th century. He was pastor of Kerkwerven, and devoted himself to civil and ecclesiastical history. He wrote Sulpicius Belgicus, sive Historia Religionis Instaturae, Corruptae, et Reformatae in Belgio et a Belgia (Leyden, 1657); translated into Dutch by Melchior Leydekker, and published in connection with the Nederlandse Historie of Z. van Bozign (Amsterdam, 1739). Basement is the lower story or floor of a building beneath the principal one. In ordinary houses the lower story is not called a basement unless partly below the surface of the ground. In larger buildings in which an architectural arrangement is introduced, the lower story, even if above the ground, is called a basement if in the composition it serves as a pedestal or substructure for the main order of the architecture.

Base-moulding (or Base-table) is a projecting moulding or band of mouldings near the bottom of a wall, etc.; it is sometimes placed immediately upon the top of the plinth, and sometimes a short distance above it, in which case the intervening space is frequently panelled in circles, quatrefoils, etc.

Basenzi, Paolo Emilio, an Italian painter, was born at Reggio in 1824, and studied under Albano. He painted a number of works for religious edifices, of which those in the Church of San Pietro are most esteemed. He died in 1866. None of his works are mentioned.

Bashyzen, Heinrich Jacob Van, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born Oct. 26, 1673, at Hanau. He studied at Leyden and Franeker, and was in 1701 appointed professor of Oriental languages and Church history at the gymnasium of his native city. In 1708 he was made professor of theology. In 1716 he was called to Zerbst as professor of theology, history, and Oriental languages; and died Dec. 31, 1718. Bashyzen was one of the most learned scholars of his time; especially was he well versed in Rabbinical lore. He wrote, Dss. de Fatis Ecclesiae N. Test. (Franeker, 1700):—Dss. de LXX Hebdobmadis Danielis (ibid. ed.):—Dss. IV Positiones ad Scagriaphum Syriam Aquili. Hebriac. (Hanau, 1702-12):—Dss. de Academias Academiarumque Titularum Origine Hebraica (ibid. 1708):—Dss. de Federe Gratiae (ibid. 1704):—Dss. de Impostitio Manum (ibid. ed.):—Claudia Taulnacodea Maxima (ibid. 1714), etc.;—Lib. I. Observationum Sacrum de Interpretate S. Scripturae, occasione R. Mainimmittis Tract. de Libro Legis (Latine vers.) (1708). Basileas is the name of two early Christian martyrs: (1) At Rome, with Rogatus and others, under Aurelian, June 10; (2) June 12, under Diocletian, with Polymachus and others.

Basil, the friend of Chrysostom, with whom he lived on terms of the closest and most affectionate intimacy. The friends were equal in age, in rank, and property: read the same books, and studied under the same masters—Diodorus, afterwards bishop of Tarsus, and Carrierus. They were simultaneously resolved on adopting an ascetic life. Basil was the first to put the purpose into execution, living in solitude and devotion in his paternal home. On Chrysostom following his example, the two friends prepared to take a house and live together; but were prevented by the entreaties of Anthusa, Chrysostom's mother. The circumstances attending Basil's elevation to the episcopate, and the pious fraud by which his scriptures were overthrown, are narrated in the article CHRYSTOSTOM. We do not know the name of his see; but, as Chrysostom promised to give him his presence and counsel frequently, it could hardly have been far from Antioch. Baronius thinks it was Raphana (Chrysostom, De Sacrdot., i, 1, 8; vi, 19).

Basil, saint and martyr, bishop of Amasea, in the diocese of Pontus and province of Hellenopontus, is said to have been one of the victims of the persecution set on foot, about 323, by Licinius, the colleague of Constantine, in Armenia; and especially in Pontus and the cities of Armenia. The author of the Acts of this saint appears to say that he attracted the fury of the emperor by receiving into his house, and protecting from his violence, a virgin named Gaphrya — one of the women attached to the household of the empress Constantia; for which act he was carried to Nerochis, there killed, and thrown into the sea. His body was alleged to have been cast ashore at Sinope, carried thence to Amasea, and buried there near a church that he had built. He is commemorated April 26.

Basil, saint (the father of St. Basil the Great), was the son of St. Macrina the elder, but the name of his father is unknown; he was, however, a scion of a noble house in Cappadocia or Pontus. During the cruel persecution under Galerius and the Caesar Maximin Daia, they were compelled to flee into the deserts, where they continued for about seven years, i.e. from 306 to 315. At the end of this period they returned to Pontus, where Basil, their son (the subject of our present theme) heard the sacred offices and talents. He united to vast erudition a rare gift of eloquence, which gained him a high reputation at the bar. The time of his death is not known, but the decease of his wife, St. Emmelia, probably took place in 370 or 372. The Church honors their memory January 20.

Basil of Achrida was metropolitan of Thessalonica, and flourished about 1155. Pope Hadrian wrote to him to entreat him to forsake the Greek schism and unite himself to the Church of Rome. Basil replied, with dignity, that his Church was not schismatical, nor was the Church of Rome in any way her superior. His Letter to Hadrian will be found in Baronius, A.D. 1115, and (Greek and Latin) in the Jux Graec–Rom., v. 307; also his Reply to some questions concerning certain marriages (Greek and Latin), ibid. p. 309. See Cave, Hist. Lit., ii. 231.

Basil of Ancyra (1), a presbyter who became a martyr for the faith under Julian the Apostate, A.D. 362, was of Christian parentage and of orthodox faith. During the reign of Constantius, he was a bold and uncompromising opponent of Arianism, and maintained the truth with great courage at the Council of Jerusalem in 355. He was more than once apprehended as a seditious person by the provincial governors, but escaped his liberty. The Arian council under Eudoxius held its session in 360, and was held to hold no ecclesiastical assembly. The zeal of Basil was still further quickened by the attempts made by Julian to suppress Christianity. The natural result followed; he was apprehended, and brought before the governor of the city, Saturninus, who put him to the torture, and informed the emperor of the prize he had secured. On the arrival of Julian at Ankyra, Basil was presented to him; and, having reproached the emperor with his apostasy, he suffered death by red-hot irons on June 29. His festival, probably the anniversary of his persecution, is kept both by the Greek and Latin Church on March 22.

Basil of Ancona (2) attended the second Council of Nicaea (the so-called seventh General Council), A.D. 787. At the first session Basil read a lengthy apology for the tardiness of his arrival, and, abjuring the heresy as to image-worship which he had previously favored, expressed his acquiescence in the decision of Hadrian of Rome, Tarasius of Constantinople, and the holy apostolic thrones; and signed the decrees of the council. See Labbe, Concil. vii, 670, 887.

Basil, bishop of Antioch, succeeded Maximus II. as forty-third bishop of the see, A.D. 456. A portion of a letter addressed to him by St. Simeon Sty-
Basil, bishop of Tiberias, at the end of the 8th century, was originally an inmate of the monastic College of the Resurrection at Jerusalem, of which he afterwards became abbot. Here he was the intimate friend of the intruding patriarch of Jerusalem, Theodore, who, while still a young man, imbibed on the very point by him to St. Stephen at the monastery of St. Sabas, with the view of learning from him the future issue of his ambitious designs. Basil afterwards visited St. Stephen on his own account, and received from him an assurance that he would attain the episcopal dignity, together with a warning of the difficulties of the office. He subsequently administered the affairs of the see of Jericho, and finally became bishop of Tiberias. See Leonitus, Vita S. Steph. apud Le Quien, Or. Christ. iii, 306 sq.; 665 sq., 708 sq.

Basil, bishop of Tralleis, in the province of Rhodope, in Thrace, and metropolitan, took part in the "Robbers' Synod" at Ephesus in 449, when he gave his verdict in favor of the orthodoxy of Eutyches and against Flavian. He was present in 451 at the Council of Chalcedon, when he joined the noisy adversaries of Theodoret, and appears on the orthodox side consenting to the deposition of Dioscorus, and accepting the same of Leo. He was one of the bishops to whom the emperor Leo wrote in 458, requesting their opinions on the disordered state of ecclesiastical matters at Alexandria, after the murder of Proterus and the usurpation of Timothy Ælius.

Basilia, Abiad, a Jewish rabbi, who died at Mantua in 1743, is the author of הosophן היל אביד, or a philosophy of Judaism (Mantua, 1730; Lemberg, 1858), in which he defends Judaism against Greek and Christian philosophers. See De Rossi, Dizionario Storico Germ. (2nd ed., t. ii, p. 58; Fr. 76); Benjacob, Osar Hiz-Spharonim, or Theaurus Librorum Hebraicorum (Wilna, 1880), i, 41, No. 769. (B. P.)

Basilas, Raphael Chajim, son of the preceding, is best known as the editor of the famous Mantuan Bible with Norzi's (q. v.) commentary, published under the title עונש יושב. Basilas added some notes, and also appended a list of nineteen variations. The work was published at Mantua in 1742. The commentary itself was first published at Vienna in 1813, and then late in the Warsaw Rabbinic Bible, 1860-66. The remark of the writer of the art. Nonz in this Cyclopedia, "the work of Norzi marked great progress in Biblical exegesis, but it has no longer any value," is, to say the least, a very superficial one, for Norzi never attempted exegesis, but textual criticism, as any one acquainted with the work can see from the very first page. As to its value, it is best shown by the use which Baer and Delitzsch, the latest editors of the Hebrew text, make of it. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud., i, 92; De Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 58; Benjacob, Osar Hiz-Spharonim, or Theaurus Librorum Hebraicorum (Wilna, 1880), ii, 543, No. 1558; Dresde, Prograrnma qua Commandament Raphaels Chajim Basila, Judaei Recensoris, Excercitationes Criticas in Diversitatem Codicis Ethiopi ad Eceravdo van der Hooght Observationum (Wittenberg, 1774). Basiléa (queen), in Greek mythology, Uranus had by a number of wives forty-five children. Of these Tethea also gave him eighteen, who, under the name of Titans. Basilis was the oldest, and also brought her brothers. After her father had been translated among the gods, she undertook the government of the kingdom. She then (still a maiden), in order to leave the kingdom to children of the family, married her brother Hyperion, and by him became mother of Aether, and then might ultimately draw the kingdom towards himself led the brothers to an atrocious act. They killed the husband, drowned Helios, and Selene, disharmonated, threw herself from the top of the house. A dream comforted the unhappy mother. Helios made known to her that he and her sister had been placed as sun and moon in the heavens, and that the Titans would receive their just punishment. Basilis (chanced called bona dea) told the people of the fates of her husband, and they appropriated the name of her children upon the sun and moon. She finally became insane, and at death was taken among the deities.

Venus was often worshipped as Basilis, but without being identified with the subject of the above sketch.

Basilieus (king), in Greek mythology, was the surname of a number of gods—of Jupiter, of Neptune, of Apollo. This name was especially worshipped by this name at Trozenae.

Basilica, or law books. The large Justinian compilation of Roman law (the so-called Corpus Juris Civilis), because of its being written in Latin, could not satisfy the wants in the East, a Greek translation being needed. In order to avoid all ambiguity, the emperor Basilissi Macedo undertook the publication of a manual (Προφήμιος νόμος) in the year 876 published by Zacharia, Heidelberg, 1837, which was revised in 883 (Επαναγωγή τον νόμου). Besides, he undertook Ανακειδάρων των παλαιων νομών (repetitio veterum legum) in sixty (comp. Πρόφημος, § 3) or forty (Επαναγωγή, § 3) volumes, which were published by the emperor Leo the Wise in 886, and which received the title Basilica: οι βασιλικοί (νόμοι) Ιατρικά βασιλικά (νόμιμα), consisting of sixty books. It was edited, in connection with others, by Symbatius or Sabbatius. Of a later revision under Constantine Porphyrogenitus, we read in Balsamon, Vodeti et Justiti in Bibliotheca Juris Canonici, ii, 814, but this statement is without any foundation. The Basilica are a Greek elaboration of Justinian's compilation, put together from older translations and commentaries, extracts from Justinian's Novelle, promulgated after 530, and from the Πρόφημος of Basilissi. For the history of these revisions and elucidations were added as scholia from the beginning, to which others were added, till finally a kind of glossa ordinaria was formed, which was also published by the editors. The manuscripts of the Basilica are all incompleat, and so also the editions. Single books were edited in a Latin translation by Gentianus Hierretus (Paris, 1557), Cuja- cius (1566), Labbeus (1569). The Greek text, with a Latin translation and scholia, was first published by Fabrot (Paris, 1647, 7 vols. fol.). To these were added supplements by Ruhnken (Reitz, a. o.). The latest edition is, Basilicorum Libri I-X post A. Fabroti, censurae oper. cod. MSS, a. Erm. Heinbacho cxilique Collatarum, in quibus Scholarship est recensuit, deputadis restituit, translationem Latinam et adnotationem criticam adjecit Carol. Guili. Erm. Hein- bacho. Basilicapotri, Carlo, an Italian prelate, was born at Milan in 1500. After having studied jurisprudence, he joined the Barnabites, whose general he became. In 1593 he was appointed bishop of Novara, and died Oct. 6. 1615. He wrote, De Concordiæa Ecclesiastica.—De Immunitate Ecclesiastic. Basiliius, a Maronite of the 2nd century (Euseb. Hist. Eccl., v. 13), perhaps the same as Blastos (Volkmar, Hippol. p. 27).
Another of the same name is mentioned by Ruinart in connection with St. Mamas, to whom, with Basiliscus, a church was dedicated at Constantinople, their day being July 29.

Basilisk, in the supersition of the Middle Ages, was a fabulous animal which was to come from an egg laid by a thirty-year-old cock, and which a turtle was to hatch. It was to be frightfully large, with the body of a fowl, a brazen bell and brazen claws and a long tail, formed like three snakes, and with three points. Such an animal was regarded as dangerous from its size, and deadly from its poison, and it was supposed that it killed even with its look, and is itself invulnerable, the only weapon available against it being a looking-glass, at the presence of which it is frightened. Basilisci, wife of Julian, is commemorated as a martyr of Antioch (A.D. 296) in various Church lists on March 3 (Byzant.), May 20 (Jerome), June 9 (Old Rom.), or Nov. 25 (Armen.).

Basil is the name of three Christian saints in different early martyrlogies: (1) Virgin martyr at Rome under Gallienus, commemorated May 20; (2) commemorated Aug. 26; (3) in Antioch, Nov. 23. See BASSILIDES.

Basin, Eucharistic. When the people offered bread and wine at the holy communion, as they did at first in large quantities, the ministers of the altar were obliged, after receiving it, to wash their hands before proceeding to consecrate. They did in large vessels, or basins, of silver, earthenware, etc. At the present day in the Latin Church, the form is still kept up by the priests dipping the tips of their fingers in water contained in a little basin. The alms and other devotions of the faithful are, by the rubrics of the Book of Common Prayer, directed to be received in a decent basin, or, as it is otherwise called, an alms-dish (q. v.), which ought to be brought to the altar, that the alms, etc., collected by the churchwardens, deacons, or others may be received in it. See BASINS.

Basin, Bernard, a Spanish theologian, canon of Saragossa, lived at the close of the 15th century. Among other works, he wrote Tractatus de Arithas Magiae et Magorum Maleficia (Paris, 1485). See Hoeve, Nouveau Dictionnaire... v.

Bassin, Thomas, a French prelate, was born at Calais, France. He studied philosophy at Paris; in 1431 was assessor of the philosophical faculty of Louvain; and finally bishop of Lisleux. He was a great favorite with king Charles VII, but was obliged to leave the country under his son, Louis XI. He went to Louvain, where he lectured on jurisprudence. From there he went to Trier, and finally to Utrecht, where pope Sixtus IV appointed him archbishop of Cressa and vicar to the bishop, David Burgund, of Utrecht. He died Dec. 30, 1491. He wrote, Res suo Tempore Trajecta Gestae: — a treatise against Paul of Middelburg; — and left in MS. Consilium super Christiana Poelia, etc. (Rome), an account of the history of the Maid of Orleans. Basins, Ecclesiastical Use of. Before the high-altar, and above the steps to it, were usually three basins of silver, hung by silver chains, for sergeants to wash their hands, and the other people before receiving the wafer; thus we find one engraved with the mortal life and a second with the divine life of Christ. The material was sometimes enamelled copper or silver-gilt, and the embellishment was frequently of a heraldic rather than religious character. At Durham one basin and two cruets were used at a time. There is a beautiful basin of the time of Edward II, wrought with figures of a knight helmed by a lady at a castle gate, in St. Mary's, Bermondsey, which once belonged to the abbey there. Two enamelled basins of the 13th century at Conques are called penelloions; one is used as a ewer and the other as a jug. There was also a large basin for alms, usually double girt, used upon principal festivals, and a smaller one of less value for ordinary days. Alms-basins of Flemish manufacture and latten are preserved at St. Margaret's, Westminster.

Basinus, St., a French prelate, who was born in Lorraine. He entered the Monastery of St. Maximinus at Treves, where he made such advance in Christian perfection and holiness that, upon the death of Herwinus, the monks elected him abbot of their community. Subsequently, about A.D. 670, when the see of Treves became vacant by the death of St. Numerius (or his successor), Basinus was compelled to fill it. As archbishop of Treves, he reformed nothing of his former strictness in discipline or morality. After filling the see for twenty-two years, he resigned his office, and St. Ludwinus, his favorite nephew, succeeded him. The remainder of his days he employed in preparing for his death, which happened towards the end of the year 700. His festival is marked March 4. See Bellers, vol. i.

In 1842 he received an appointment to the agency of the Memphis Conference Female Institute. He thus labored as agent and as minister until 1853, when he became superannuated, which relation he sustained until his death, May 1, 1873. Basmagut, in Hindusth mythology, was an evil demon (Danawa). Because of the sacrifice Homa, which he made by cutting up his own body and offering the pieces to Siva, the latter endowed him with the power to convert into ashes everything that he touched. But when, in love with Parvati, he sought to try and destroy power on Siva also, the latter fled Vishnu, who assured the frightened god of his help and revenge. Vishnu appeared to Basmagut in the form of Parvati, and promised to listen to his petitions if he would learn the dance of her husband, which she danced for him. Basmagut imitated the movements of Vishnu, and the latter putting his hand on his head, Basmagut did the same, thus destroying himself.

Basolus (or Basilus), St., was a hermit, born in the 6th century, in the Limousin, who, resolving to quit the world, went to Rheims to visit and consult Gilles, the bishop of that see. In A.D. 575 he entered the Monastery of Verzy, and was regarded by the abbot Dromer and the other monks as a model of perfection; but, in order to attain to a higher state, he resolved to betake himself to solitude and solitude, and in 680 retired to a neighboring mountain, where he constructed a chapel and a cell, which he occupied for forty years, and died Nov. 26, about 620 (or 625). The Roman martyr-ology commemorates him on Nov. 26. Usuardus, who lived in the 9th century, speaks of his day as Oct. 13, the day of his translation by Hinemar of Reims.

Basque Version of the Scriptures. There are at least eight dialects of the Basque language, which is a tongue utterly unlike other European languages, unless we except the Finnish, with which it appears to have some slight connection. The Basques who can read at all can, in almost every instance, read either French or Spanish; but, as a matter of course, their mother-tongue is more valued by them than acquired languages. According to the geographical position, we have the French and Spanish Basque. See Bible of Every Land, p. 314-318.

I. French Basque.—The French dialect of the Basque is spoken in the south-eastern extremity of France, on the frontiers of Spain. It formerly included the three subdivisions of Labour, Lower Navarre, and Soulé, and it is now comprehended in the department of the Lower Pyrenees. The entire New Test. in the Basque of Lower Navarre was published at Rochelle in 1571 under the title Jesus Christi Evangelii Jovamarensis Testamentum Berrie. It was translated by John de Licarrague, a minister of the Reformed Church and a native of Béarn. In the dedication to Jeanne d'Albret, queen of Navarre, at whose expense it was published, the translator says: ["Et peu s'en fallut que je ne desistes entierement, voyant mon entreprise d'autant plus grande, que la langue en laquelle j'ay escrit est de plus stereotypes et diverses, et du tout insuitée, pour le moins en traduction." A copy of this New Test. was found in the library at the University of Oxford, and from this copy the British and Foreign Bible Society printed in 1825 at Bayonne one thousand copies of the gospel of Matthew, under the encouragement of the congregation of the Reformed Church in Béarn. The Roman Catholic bishop was opposed to the circulation of this edition, and destroyed about eight hundred copies of the same. This opposition only encouraged the British and Foreign Bible Society to publish another edition. Under the care of Mr. Mouleza and the superintendence of friends at Bordeaux and Bayonne, the text of 1571 was altered in accordance with the modern forms of language, and so many changes were introduced as virtually to constitute a new version. The New Test. in this new and revised form was completed at press in 1828, and further editions followed. Since 1869 the same society has published the Basque New Test. in the Labourdin dialect.

II. Spanish Basque.—This dialect is spoken in the provinces of Bizcay, Guipuscoa, and Alava. The educated class of the people can read and understand Spanish, but their native dialect has a peculiar charm for them. No portion whatever of the Scriptures appears to have been printed until the year 1838, when Mr. George Borrow, with the aid of the British and Foreign Bible Society, edited and published an edition of the gospel according to Luke. In 1848 this version of Luke was revised and accompanied by the translator, named Oteiza, and printed at the expense of the Spanish society. As this translation was, however, a mixture of the Guipuscoan and the Bascaian, an edition in the pure Guipuscoan dialect was printed, at the expense of the Rev. J. E. Dalton, in 1870, to which in 1878 was added the gospel of John, which had been also translated at the expense of the same gentleman, under the care of Señor de Brunei.

Bassiliana, bishop of Ephesus, was originally a presbyter of Ephesus. The popularity he there gained by his service to the poor so excited the jealousy of Mennon, then bishop, that he, having failed to drive him from the city, forcibly ordained him bishop of Evaza (or Thessalonica). He, however, refused to recognize the promotion of the archbishop of Constantinople, to ordain Bassianus. Irregular as his ordination had been, Bassianus visited Constantinople, and succeeded in obtaining its recognition by the emperor Theodosius II. After four years he became odious to his flock, who thrust him into prison. Four months afterwards the emperor sent Eustathius, the chief Silentiary, to investigate the matter; and the case being laid before the chief bishops of the Christian Church—Leo of Rome, Flavian of Constantinople, and Domnus of Antioch—they pronounced for his deposition on the ground of forcible intrusion. On the receipt of this sentence, Bassianus was treated with the greatest indignity; his accustodial habit was violently torn from him, and he was cast into prison. At the Council of Chalcedon (q. v.) the See was declared vacant; but Bassianus and Stephen (ordained as his successor) were allowed to retain episcopal rank, and a pension of two hundred gold pieces was granted him by the episcopal revenues. Batchelder, John, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Brookfield, Mass., Aug. 23, 1755. He was converted at the age of sixteen; received license to preach in 1817; was ordained deacon in 1821; and in 1830 was ordained elder and received into the Maine Conference. In 1841 he locatecl, and in 1843 was put on the superannuated list, which relation he held until his death Feb. 15, 1873. Mr. Batchelder was a man of great devotion to the Church, and was highly esteemed by all who knew him. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1875, p. 70.

Batcheller, Bered, a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was a graduate of Dartmouth College, and was for many years engaged in teaching in Bateman, William, an English prelate of the 14th century, was born at Norwich, and was sent to the University of Cambridge, where he was elected doctor of civil law before he was thirty years of age. In 1248 he was called to the archdeaconry of Norwich, and soon after visited Rome, where he was appointed to various ecclesiastical honors. In 1254, being made bishop of Norwich, he returned to his native country, and in 1257 founded Trinity Hall in Cambridge. He died on Jan. 6, 1255, at Avignon, on a diplomatic visit to the pope. He was a man of great personal integrity and strictness of administration.

Bates, Alvan Jones, a Congregational minister, was born in the part of Brewer now called Holden, Me., April 12, 1820. He received his preparatory education at Gorham Academy and at Bangor Classical School, and graduated at Bangor Theological Seminary in 1847. He was ordained as an evangelist Sept. 27, 1849, at Lincoln, Me., where he was acting pastor from 1847 to 1865. He was acting pastor at Harwich Port, Mass., from Feb. 1865, to March, 1868, and at Saumerville, in Griswold, Mass., where he was installed, June 22, 1869, and remained from his death. He died of tuberculosis Sept. 3, 1892, at Silverdale, Me., September 6, 1892, to January 6, 1895, of the 2d and 14th Maine regiments. He died in Lincoln, July 29, 1897. (W. P. S.)

Bates, Benjamin Edward, Ion, a generous man of business, was born at Mansfield, Mass., July 12, 1808. He went to Boston in 1829, and commenced what proved to be a prosperous business career. He became a Christian about the preaching of Rev. Dr. Lyman Beecher, joined his Church in 1832, and became an active Christian worker. In 1847 he had his attention directed to the remarkable water-privilege at Lewiston, Me., and soon after entered into arrangements for the utilizing of this great power for manufacturing purposes. In the spring of 1848 the educational wants of the Free-will Baptists of New England were brought to the notice of Mr. Bates, and his sympathy awakened in behalf of the young of that denomination who were seeking for a more complete training than they could obtain in institutions already in existence. The appeal was not made in vain. Mr. Bates paid $100,000 towards the endowment of the college which bears his name, and subscribed another $100,000 on condition that the friends of the college raise $100,000. An effort is now making (1881) to secure this sum. He died Jan. 14, 1878. See Morning Star, July 3, 1878. (J. C. S.)

Bates, Charles, an English Wesleyan missionary, was converted in early life; entered the work in 1822; labored in Newfoundland and the West Indies for nearly twenty years; and died at Tortola, Dec. 16, 1841. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1842.

Bates, George, a Universalist minister, was born at Fayette, Me., Feb. 12, 1788. He acquired a good common-school education; learned the blacksmith's trade; was licensed to preach in 1824, and ordained in 1825. He labored in Livermore, Hallowell, Canton, Auburn, and Turner, Me., in which latter place he preached for twenty-five years. He died in Auburn, Jan. 24, 1876. Mr. Bates was a truly evangelical preacher; winning, impressive, clear, unaffected, and forcible; and the embodiment of kindness, gentleness, and hospitality. See Universalist Register, 1877, p. 195.

Bates, George Washington, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Salisbury, Mass., Oct. 16, 1811. He experienced religion at an early age, and in 1835 entered the New England Conference, in which he remained a useful member till his death, Sept. 24, 1851. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1852, p. 38.
Bates, Henry H., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the Diocese of New York, was rector in Tariffville, Conn., for several years until 1859, when he became warden of Christ Church at Falls Falls, N. Y. Here he served until 1862, when he became a chaplain in the United States Army. He was minister of St. Paul's Church, Oak Hill, N. Y., from 1864 until his death, Jan. 14, 1888. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1869, p. 109.

Bates, James (2), a Congregational minister, was born at New Lebanon, N. Y., Jan. 17, 1795. He graduated at Dartmouth College in 1822; studied theology at Andover; was ordained colleague with Rev. Dr. Homer at Newton, Mass., in 1827, remaining there till 1840, when he was installed at Granby, Mass. His next charge was Central Village, Plainfield (1853-55). He died at Granby, Dec. 3, 1865. See Cong. Quarterly, 1860, p. 377; 1865, p. 395.

Bates, James (2), a Presbyterian minister, received his education in Scotland, and was called to the pastorate of a Congregational Church at New Cumnock. His health was failing, and, being advised to change climates, he sailed for Australia in April, 1858, but died there in July following. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1860, p. 277.

Bates, John (3), an Irish Wesleyan clergyman, was born at Ballymore, County Wexford. The years of his probation were spent in the north of Ireland, where his self-denying labors were remarkably successful. He was an affectionate and assiduous pastor. On account of failing health he became a supernumerary in 1862, still laboring, however, as strength permitted in his native county and at Cashel, where he settled, and where he died in 1865, in the thirty-second year of his age and the eighth of his ministry. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1866, p. 43.

Bates, John (2), a Baptist minister, was born at Bugbrook, Northamptonshire, England, Jan. 26, 1805. He removed to London in 1827, and procured a situation as a compositor and bookseller. Soon after he became a Christian and united with the Baptist Church. His thoughts soon began to be directed towards the Christian ministry, and he turned his attention to study to prepare himself for the work. He was designated as a missionary under the patronage of the Baptist Irish Society to labor in Ireland, and was stationed for a time on the island of Ballina, on the coast. Early in 1834 he removed to the city of Sligo, and became pastor of a small Baptist Church in that place; but soon removed to Coolany, and subsequently to Ballina-carrow, where he labored for a few months, and then returned to Ballina. From this place he made extensive journeys, with addresses as an evangelist for seven years. He left Ballina at the close of 1845. The greater part of the next four years was spent in Banbridge, in the neighborhood of Belfast, where he collected a Church of fifty members. In 1850 Mr. Bates came to the United States as missionary of the American Baptist Home Mission Society, of which appointment, however, he did not avail himself, but proceeded to Cascade, Ia., where he became pastor of a Baptist Church, which, under his faithful ministry of fifteen years, became strong and influential. In all the region around he did good service as a missionary, and was instrumental in the formation of quite a number of Baptist churches. In 1864 Mr. Bates removed to Canada, and became pastor of the Baptist Church in Dundas, near Hamilton, where he remained nearly three years, and then accepted a call to one of the most important Baptist churches in the province, that of Woodstock. Here he had a ministry of six years, which was richly blessed: but on account of failing strength he resigned in June, 1873. His last ministry was at St. George. It lasted but two years, his death occurring May 8, 1875. See Smith [J. A.], Memoir, Sermons, Essays, and Addresses of Rev. John Bates (Toronto, 1877). (J. C. S.)

Bates, John H., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Lebanon, Conn., March 20, 1776. Under the instruction of Rev. Josiah C. Shaw he prepared for Harvard College, teaching a select school meantime, and graduating in 1800, when he became assistant teacher in the Andover Phillips Academy for one year. At this time he began to study theology under Rev. Jonathan French. In 1802 he was licensed to preach, and was ordained pastor of the Church at Dedham, Mass., March 16, 1808, and in this connection he served fifteen years. In March, 1818, he became president of Middlebury College, from which position he retired at the age of sixty-four. Being in Washington, D. C., at that time, he was chosen chaplain to Congress. After a visit to South Carolina, he preached for two months at Portland, Me., and then for two years as supply at Northborough, Mass. On March 22, 1843, he was installed pastor of the Church at Dudley, Mass., and he died there Jan. 14, 1854. Dr. Bates published a large number of sermons, lectures, etc. As a college president, he was very popular and efficient. His eloquence was remarkably distinct. A striking trait in his character was his punctuality. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ii. 405.

Bates, Lemuel P., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Blanford, Mass., Dec. 16, 1791. He was educated at Williams College, Mass., and at Princeton Theological Seminary, where he graduated in 1822. He was a successively pastor of the Congregational churches in Whately and Templeton, Mass., and in 1846 he removed to Manchester for the charge of the Baptist Church at Pontiac, Mich., for one year. He was next stated supply for the Presbyterian churches in Conneautville and Hermansburg, Pa., and in 1851 he preached at Utica, O. In 1859 he was appointed to a Church in Edwardsville, Ill., where he labored until death, March 5, 1884. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1861, p. 78; Gen. Cut. of Princeton Theol. Sem. p. 92.

Bates, Merritt, a Methodist Episcopalian minister, was born at Queensbury, N. Y., July 12, 1806. When but seven years old he was thrown upon his own resources and began his life-struggle. From childhood he was in the habit of rising at four, summer and winter, and devoting the first three hours of the day to study. He never failed for the love of the Bible, the light of a pine knot served his purpose. Thus he strove until he acquired a solid English education, and became so proficient in the classics that in 1836 Middlebury College conferred upon him the honorary degree of M.A. In 1857 he entered the Troy Conference, and devoted thirty-six years of his life in his active ranks. In 1863 he became superannuated, and retired to a new farm near Travis City, Mich., where he died Aug. 23, 1869. Great zeal, diligence, and success marked Mr. Bates's course through life. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1870, p. 139.

Bates, Samuel, an Irish Methodist preacher, was born at Baldlomore in 1843. He was converted at the age of nine through the teaching of his pious father and the preaching of the Rev. Thomas Guard; entered the itinerant Irish ministry in 1866, and labored with acceptance for five years. He died at Wexford, Dec. 1, 1871.

Bates, William F., a Congregational minister, the son of Josiah Bates, D.D., president of Middlebury College, Vt., was born at Dedham, Mass., Jan. 19, 1816. He graduated at Middlebury College in 1837, and at Andover Theological Seminary in 1840. Two subsequent years were spent in teaching, and very successfully. In 1845 Mr. Bates was ordained over the Church in Northbridge, Mass., which he supplied till 1858. On June 18, of that year, he was installed pastor in Falmouth, Mass., where he died, Sept. 9, 1859. See Cong. Quarterly, 1859, p. 418.

Bateson, Anthony, an English Congregational minister, was born at Wray, Yorkshire, in 1815. His conversion occurred when he was about sixteen years of age, at Settle. In 1837 he removed to Preston and joined the Grimshaw-street Chapel. He received a sanction to preach occasionally, which he did with much acceptance. He was under the instruction of his pastor, Rev. R. Slater, for a year. In 1838 he was admitted as a student to Blackburn Academy, and upon his graduation received a unanimous call from the Lee Chapel, Horwich, which he accepted, and entered upon his pastorate at New Bolton, Nov. 25, 1845, and was removed to Egerton, near Bolton, in 1848, where he remained only till 1853, when the Middletown Church, near Manchester, called him, and he accepted. His work was greatly blessed; but in the midst of great usefulness, with a few days' sickness, he passed away, on Sept. 30, 1854. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1855, p. 206.

Bath, Levi, a Baptist minister, was born at Dunhill, N. Y., in 1821. He pursued higher parsonage studies at Pres养ry, Va., and was a graduate of Union College, N. Y. Michigan was the field of his ministerial labors for several years, as he had been pastorate in several places in that state. In 1861 he took up his residence in Columbus, Wis., where he was pastor until obliged on account of ill-health to resign. He was elected a fellow-citizen of his city by several offices of public trust both in the town and in the county in which he lived. He died at his home in Columbus, March 4, 1876. See Baptist Encyclop. p. 85, 86. (J.C.S.)

Bath (or Bates), William, an Irish Jesuit, was born in Dublin in 1654. His parents, although Protestants, placed him under the care of a Roman Catholic instructor, and afterwards sent him to Oxford. He left England, and in 1596 became a Jesuit. Having spent some time among the Jesuits of Flanders, he travelled into Italy, and completed his studies at Padua, from which he passed into Spain, having been appointed to govern the Irish seminary at Salamanca. He died at Madrid, June 17, 1614. He published an Introduction to the Art of Music (Lond. 1604) — Jëuua Longinum (Salamanca, 1611) — and several theological treatises. See Chalmer, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bathen (Ibn el-Bathen, i. e. "inner science"), in Mohammedianism, is the inner, spiritual life, which consists in the purification and enlightening of the heart. The mystical sects among them call the practice of this inner life Thikikat and Hukumat, i. e. the way and the truth.

Bathenians (from bathen, the secret knowledge of mysteries), a name applied to the Asassins (q. v.).

Bath-house is a large building for bathing at certain times, and was a usual adjunct to a Benedictine monastery; at Canterbury it occupied the site of the deanery.

Bathilda (Bathilde, Bathylida, or Baldechilda), Sr. (corrupted into St. Baudouer and St. Baudouer), was by origin a Saxon, and born in England, and was exposed for sale on the coast of France, when she was purchased by Erchinoald or Archambaud, the maire du palais of Chlodoveus, or Clovis II; she afterwards became, through the means of Archambaud, the wife of the king, about 640. St. Gregory of Tours calls her princess of the clergy, and by her Clovis had three sons — Cloethaire III, Childeric II, and Theoderic III. Upon the death of the king she became regent, and used all her authority in endeavoring to discover and reform abuses in Church and State, and founded many churches and religious houses; among the latter, the celebrated monastery of Corbie, in Picardy. She also endowed, or restored, the houses of St. Vindulfe, Luxeuil, Juauzure, Foissigny, and Corbon; and completed that of Cala (Chelles), the palace of Paris, which the bishops of Paris, and the queen, had commenced. To this last monastery she retired, when the injustice of Ebroin, or Ebrovius, the maire du palais, and the violence of others of the courtiers, had compelled her to resign the government. Having thus forsaken the world, she took the vows, and gave herself up to a religious life, under the abbess St. Bertila, whom she had herself constituted as the first establishment of the community. She died Jan. 30, 680, on which day she is commemorated, and her tomb is yet to be seen at Chelles. See Ruinart, Noti. de Grav. Tarun, p. 663; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bathing. The common use of baths throughout the Roman empire presented to Christian converts a special difficulty and danger. Yet, as the employment was not a forbidden one, Christians would be found to enter on it and reform its evils. The public baths at Rome, which were established by emperors or places under magisterial control, were free from the grosser evils of the mixture of the two sexes; and many of the emperors, who were, more or less, under the influence of a higher culture, sought to check them. Though the practice is but little noticed unless where its accomplishment can be censured, it appears that the most devout Christian did not think it necessary to abstain from the public bath.

It was in the "baths" of Ephesus that John encountered Cerinthus (Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. iii, 38). Tertullian, with all his austerity, acknowledged that bathing was necessary for health, and that he practised it himself (Apol. xi). Clement of Alexandria lays down rules, half medical and half moral, for its use (Paedag., iii, 9). It formed part of the complaints of the Christians of Lugdunum and Vienne, and was mentioned by them as the first sign of the change for the worse in their treatment, that they were excluded from the public baths (Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. v, 1). Augustine narrates how on his mother's death he had gone to the bath to assuage his sorrow, and found it fruitless (Confes. ix, 82). The old evils, however, continued to prevail, probably in worse forms in the provinces than in the capital. Epiphanius mentions mixed baths as common among the Jews of his time (Herod. xx). Clement describes the mixture of the sexes as occurring in the daily life of Alexandria (Paedag., iii, 8); Cyprian (De Cult. Virg. p. 73) and Ambrose (De Off. i, 18) both plead against it with an earnestness which shows that it was a danger for Christians as well as heathens. It was even necessary, after the conversion of the empire, to forbid, under pain of excommunication, the cloistered Assasins from frequenting baths where the sexes were thus mingled. Offending laymen were in like manner to come under sentence of excommunication. Gradually the better feeling prevailed, and the "mixed baths" fell into a disrepute like that of houses of ill-fame. It was reckoned a justifiable cause of divorce for a wife to have been seen in one.

Traces meet us here and there of a distinctly liturgical use of bathing, analogous to the ablutions of Jewish worshippers and priests, as preliminary to solemn religious acts, and in particular to baptism. The practice existed among the Essenes, and there may possibly be a reference to it in the "washed with pure water" of Heb. x, 22. Tertullian condemns as superstitious what he describes as the common custom of washing the whole body before every act of prayer (De Orat. xii).

In Western Africa there was a yet stranger usage, which Augustine characterizes as "pagan," of going to the sea on the feast of St. John the Baptist, and bathing as in his honor (Serm. cxxxv). As preparatory to baptism, it was, however, recognised. The catechumens who were to be admitted at Easter had during the long quadragesimal fast abstained from the use of the bath:
BATHORI 377 BATTEN

and there was some risk in such cases, when large numerbers were gathered together for baptism by immersion, and stripped in the presence of the Church, of offensive uncleanness. The bath was therefore brought into use, and the bather delivered to attendants, who furnished him with a flask of oil and his towels, after the usual fashion. This implies that the employment was lawful for Christians to engage in. Probably for this purpose, as well as for the use of priests before they celebrated the eucharist, Constantine constructed baths within the precincts of the great church which he built at Constantinople.
They were recognized as important, if not essential, appendages to the more stately churches, and were entitled to the same privileges of asylum. Popes and bishops followed the imperial example, and constructed baths in Rome, in Pavia, in Ravenna, and in Naples.
See Bath.

Bathory, LADISLAUS, count, a learned Hungarian theologian, lived in the latter half of the 16th century. He entered the Order of St. Paul the Hermit, and spent nearly all his life in the cloister of St. Laurent at Ofen.
He wrote a translation of the Bible, and the Life of the Saints, in the Hungarian language. See Hoefer, Nouv.
Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bathrick, STEPHEN, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born in Cayuga County, N. Y., May 10, 1810. He was converted at nineteen, commenced preaching in 1832, and was ordained Sept. 23, 1833, pastor of the North Parma Church. For nine years he was pastor of this Church, at the same time performing pastoral work in the Church at Byron. He removed to Comanche, O., about the year 1842. Subsequently he labored in New York and New England, and for a short time was in Michigan. Twenty years of his life were spent in central New York, with the exception of the brief period alluded to in Michigan. His last settlement was at Frankfort, Ill., where he died suddenly, Sept. 28, 1880. See Morning Star, Dec. 25, 1880. (J. C. S.)

Baths were used by the faithful before communion, by catechumens before baptism, with the use of the strigil and perfumes, and by the clergy on the eyes of festivals. The latter had by the grant of Theodosius the right of sanctuary; and Constantine having built one at Constantinople, near the Apostles' Church, St.
Hilaria Damasus, and Adrian I followed his example at Rome. Paintings and mosaics adorned them, and bishop and their visits occasioned their use. One at Pazozuoli still bears the name of the Bishop's Spring. See Bathing.

Batlan (בַּתְלָן, Chald. leisurely), a word formerly used among the Jews to denote a free person of full age, who had leisure to attend the service of the synagogue. It was a rule that a synagogue was to be erected in every place where there were ten Batlanim, but with a less number a synagogue could not be built,
as ten were required to make a congregation. See Synagogue.

Batsmanon, JOHN, a Roman Catholic divine, stud-ed divinity at Oxford, became a monk, and afterwards prior of the Chartusian monastery, or Charterhouse, in the suburbs of London. He was an intimate friend of Eusebius, and also of the abbot of York, at whose request he wrote against Erasmus and Luther. He died Nov. 16, 1531. Batsmanon wrote several works, among which are,
Adaevvediones in Annotationes Erasmii in Novum

Batrachite. Philaster (11) mentions a sect who worshipped the frogs of the plague before the Exodus, thinking so to appease God's anger. Later writers add-et the name. It was probably an obscure and misunderstood heathen superstition.

Batt, GEORGE, an English Methodist preacher, was born at Burritung, Devon, in 1899. He was converted under John Smith, the Methodist revivalist, in 1831, and joined the Wesleyan Methodist Church. In 1835 he began to preach in 1833, entered the itinerant ministry in 1837, and for thirty-four years labored in many circuits with zeal and earnestness, till failing health obliged him to locate at Wellington. There for a year he worked as he had strength. His death took place Sept.
19, 1872.

Batta Version of the Scriptures. Batta is a language spoken by a large population on the island of Sumatra. The Batta has three dialects—the Toba, the Mandailing, and the Daire. See Bible of Every Land,
p. 575.

1. The Toba is spoken by the Batta of northern Sumatra. It is the most classical and widely spoken.
The New Test. has been translated by the Rev. J. Nommenzen of the Rhenish Missionary Society, and was printed at Elberfeld for the British and Foreign Bible Society, under the superintendence of the Rev. Dr.
Schreber, a former missionary, in 1878. The edition consisted of 370 copies of the New Test., and 1500 copies of Matthew and John.

2. The Mandailing is spoken by 100,000 of the population of the southern part of the island. Nearly the whole of the New Test. was translated some years ago by the Rev. Dr. Schreber, after it had been revised and improved by Mr. Leipoldt, another missionary of the Rhenish Society; it was also carried through the press by Dr. Schreber at Elberfeld in 1878. The edition consisted of the same amount of copies as that in the Toba dialect.

Battaglin, MARCO, an Italian prelate and antiquary, was born March 25, 1645, of a noble family, in a little town of the diocese of Rimini. In 1690 he was appointed bishop of Nocera, in Umbria, and in 1716 was made bishop of Cesena, in the Romagna, and died Sept.
19, 1717. He is the author of, Istorla Universale di

Battley, JOHN, D.D., an English clergyman and antiquary, was born at St. Edmund's Bury, Suffolk, in 1647. He was some time fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, and chaplain to archbishop Sancroft, by whose favor he became rector of Adisham, Kent, prebendary of Canterbury, and archdeacon of that diocese.
He died Oct. 10, 1708. In 1711 Dr. Thomas Terry published Dr. Battley's Antiquitates Rutupinae. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Batten, THOMAS, a Welsh Wesleyan minister, son of Rev. William Batten, was born at Beaumaris in 1826. He was educated at Kingswood school, and converted at the age of fifteen. He commenced his ministry in 1845, and died April 10, 1857. "His sermons had point and power." See Minutes of the British Conference, 1857.

Batten, WILLIAM, a minister in connection with the British Wesleyan Conference, was one of the firstfruitists of Methodism in North Wales, and there entered the labor of the church's mission in 1804, retiring in 1848.
Batten possessed showy views and sagacity, was of a cheerful disposition, and knew the reality of an experimental religion. He was chairman of the North Wales District for several years. He died at Llansantffraid, BATTER

Sept. 1, 1864, in the eighty-sixth year of his age. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1865, p. 11.

Batter is a term applied to walls built out of the upright, or gently sloping inward, for example, the tower of Oxford Castle, and of St. Peter's Church (Oxford), of Isham Church (Northamptonshire), and some others, batter—that is, they are smaller at the top than at the bottom, the walls all inclining inwards. Wharf walls, and walls built to support embankments and fortifications, generally battery.

Battersby, Charles, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Manchester, England, in 1836. He emigrated to the United States with his parents in his ninth year; received from his exemplar an early, careful mental and moral training; experienced conversion in his nineteenth year, while teaching near Saugerties, N.Y., and at once began laboring from house to house for the salvation of souls. He graduated at the State Normal School at Albany in 1858; resumed his profession as teacher at Gravesend, L.I.; received license to preach, and accepted a call to supply a vacant pulpit until 1864, when he entered his remaining life-work as a missionary and agent of the church in New York City. He joined the New York Conference in 1865, and labored under its direction to the close of his life, receiving as his first appointment the Five Points Mission, and his three subsequent ones as chaplain of the city prison. He died of typhoid fever, May 29, 1898. Mr. Battersby was extremely modest and retiring in deportment, charitable in judgment almost to a fault, unflinching in duty, ardent and energetic in his home relations. His literary attainments and preaching abilities were extraordinary, and his life exemplary. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1865, p. 93; Simpson, Cyclopaedia, s.v.

He was converted in early life; educated for the ministry at Kent's Hill, Me.; and after one year's service under the presiding elder, joined the Maine Conference. Battista, Giovanni Guido Giona (originally Jehuda Jona ben-Isaac), the teacher of the learned Bartolocci (q.v.), was born at Safed, in Galilee, Oct. 28, 1588, where he was also appointed to rabbiship. He was a descendant of a famous family who, after their expulsion by Ferdinand, retired into Tuscany. Pius V having expelled them thence also, his parents went to the East, where Jehuda Jona was born. Having gone through his course of studies, he visited Italy, Amsterdam, Hamburg, and Poland. In the latter country he joined the Church with his wife and children in 1625, taking the name of Giovanni Battista Giona, after the bishop Lancelot of Nola, the papal nuntius at the court of king Sigismund III of Poland, who baptized him. He now gave up his talmudical studies, while he commenced the study of the Bible. As he made his living by the sale of jewelry, the king of Poland sent him to Constantinople for the purpose of buying precious stones. He was, however, taken for a spy of the Cossacks, who had lately burned a city upon the banks of the Euxine Sea, and would have lost his life had he not been ransomed by the Venetian ambassador. He was sent to Italy, where he remained some time as teacher of Hebrew and Chaldee at the Academy of Pisa, which he left for Rome, where he was appointed professor of Hebrew and assistant librarian at the College pro Propaganda Fide. He died May 26, 1668. He wrote, The Doctrine of Christianity, translated from the Italian of Robert Bellarmine, with notes (Rome, 1658):—הعالم והדת, The Four Gospels, translated from the Latin into Hebrew, with a preface of Clement IX (ibid. 1668):—האברכים וה诫, a discourse on the Advent of the Messiah and the Outpouring of the Holy Spirit, in Hebrew and Latin (ibid. 1658). Battista, Hortensio. See Battista, Hortensius.

Battlement. A notched or indented parapet originally used only on fortifications and intended for service, but afterwards employed on ecclesiastical and other edifices and intended for ornament only. The solid parts of a battlement are called merlons, and the intervals between them embrasures, but these are rather military terms than ecclesiastical. In the earlier battlements the embrasures appear to have been narrow in proportion to the height of the wall; in the modern or classical buildings the battlements are often richly panelled, or pierced with circles, trefoils, quatrefoils, etc., and the coping is frequently continued up the sides of the merlons so as to form a continuous line round them, as at St. George's Chapel, Windsor.

St. George's, Windsor, and St. Peter's, Dorchester. On fortifications the battlements are generally quite plain, or pierced only with a very narrow, cruciform, or upright opening, the ends of which often terminate in circles, called loop-holes or ollites, through which archers could shoot. Sometimes the coping on the top of the merlon is carried over the embrasures, a feature that is seen in many English castles, and lending interesting effects. Occasionally the merlons are figures of warriors or animals; were carved on... the tops of the merrions, as at Alnwick and Chestow castles. Towards the end of the 13th century, and afterwards, battlements are very frequently used in ecclesiastical work as ornament on cornices, tabernacle work, and other minor features, and in the Perpendicular style are sometimes found on the transoms and bases of windows. It is remarkable that the use of this ornament is almost entirely confined to the English styles of Gothic architecture. In Wales a peculiar battlement is used, as at Swansea and St. David’s, which has a hollow space under it to allow of the free passage of the water from the roof, an ingenious contrivance suitable to the climate. It is used chiefly in the 14th century.

The Irish battlements are also very peculiar, consisting of a sort of double battlement, one rising out of the other, they are quite picturesque, but very liable to decay. The idea of them was probably taken from the Venetian battlements, which bear some resemblance to them. In Ireland there is frequently a row of holes on a level with the gutter to let off the water, instead of the English gurguyles or the Welsh openings.

Bauge, or Baug, in Norse mythology, was a Jote, brother of Suttung, who possessed the costly Meth, a drink which possessed the power of imparting the art of poetry, and eloquence. Odin, desiring of possessing the same, made several fruitless propositions to the giant. He then took on the appearance of a servant, and, after slaying the nine servants of Bauge, offered to do the work of the nine laborers if Bauge would give him a taste of the Meth. Bauge promised, and, when the work was completed, led the god to the mountain where his brother lived. The entrance was blocked up by a huge rock, which Odin ordered Bauge to cut into. Bauge bored through it, and Odin converted himself into a snake and crept in. He now changed himself into the most beautiful man, and won by his songs and form the love of Gunlod, the daughter of Suttung, and she favored him for three nights, consenting to his taking three draughts of the poetic Meth, which she guarded. Odin thus drank all of the Meth and flew away in the form of an eagle, but not without danger, for Suttung sought to overtake him in the same form. Odin had nearly reached Asgard, when he lost some of the Meth. This fell to the poor poets. The rest of the Meth Odin preserved in vessels. The gods very rarely gave it away, and then only to their favorites.

Bauny, Étienne, a French theologian, was born at Mouzon (Ardenne) in 1564. In 1593 he entered the Jesuit Order, and then taught successively clausal of disclosing numerous means of gaining heaven in spite of all. Nevertheless, his works were examined

Bavilier, Jean de (called Sans Pitié), bishop of Liége, lived at the commencement of the 15th century.

He filled the country with troubles and scandals. The people of Liége revoluted against him, and opposed to him Thierry of Furnes. Jean vanished them in the bloody battle of Other, and deprived them of their liberty and privileges. He allied himself with the count of Hainault and the duke of Burgundy against France. In 1418 he obtained the subdeaconry, left the bishops of Liége, and married the widow of An-Thony, duke of Burgundy. See Hœfer, Nouv. Bio!. Générale, s. v.

Bavithin, Sr., succeeded St. Colomb as abbot of

Hy. He died Jan. 9, 599, having written a Life of St.

Colomb in Irish verse, and some Prophecies.

Bavo, Sr. (whose proper name was Allovios), the patron saint of Ghent, in Flanders, and of Haarlem in Holland, was born about 889. Upon the death of his wife, he was brought to repentance through the preaching of St. Amaranus. Baro confessed to him his sins, sold all his goods and gave to the poor. Returning to Soissons after a long journey, he retired in a monastery, which that saint had lately founded there in honor of St. Peter. After a time, he was admitted to the clerical office; and, being attached to the person of St. Amaranus, benefited by his example and instructions. After visiting the most celebrated monasteries of France, he resolved upon his return to Ghent to endeavor to unite the austerity of the life of an anchorite to the observance of a conventual rule. A huge, hollow beech-tree formed his cell, which, after a time, he exchanged for a little hut in the forest of Malmedy, near Ghent; and again for the monastery of St. Peter, where he lived in silence, practising the most unheard-of abstinences. He died Oct. 1, 658, or thereabouts. Many miracles are recounted as having been worked at his tomb in the Abbey Church of St. Peter, which monastery was subsequently called by the name of St. Baro, and secularized in 1357. In 1540, when the Church of St. Baro was converted into a citadel, the new canons were transferred to the parish Church of St. John, which was, in 1559, erected into a cathedral, and called thence forwards the Cathedral of St. Baro. The name of this saint occurs on 1 Oct. in martyrologies as ancient as the 9th century. See Acta SS. April, i, 874; May, ii, 494; Baliet, Oct. iii, 15; Butler, vol. x.

Bauosi, Alfonso, an Italian theologian, was born at Bologna. He was canon regular of the Order of St. Augustine, and was several times elected general. He died May 5, 1628. He wrote, Controversiae Miscellanea (Venice, 1588, 1593; Bologna, 1607).—Disputationes Catholicae in quibus Principes Grammaticorum Oppositis Ordoxolea Sides Recipiturum, etc. (ibid. ed.).—See Hoefer, Nouv. Bawden (or Badwdeen), William, an English clergyman who was born in 1762, undertook a translation of the Donesday Book, which was to be completed in ten volumes; but he died in 1816, leaving only two volumes finished, which were published (Lond. 1809, 1812). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Bawdon. See BALDACHINO.

Bawor, in Norse mythology, was a dwarf who lived in stones and never made his appearance.

Baxmann, Rudolf, a German licentiate of theology, was born at Stendal in 1832, and died July 2, 1869, on the same day on which the University of Göttingen had honored him with the doctorate of divinity. He is best known as the author of, Die Politik der Päpste von Gregor I bis auf Gregor VII (2 vols.).—Friedrich Schleiermacher, sein Leben und Wirken (Bonn, 1864).—Philipp Melanchthon Epistolae Tract, nunc Primum Editae et Commentario Instructae (Viteberg, 1860). Baxter, Andrew, a Scotch philosophical writer, was born at Aberdeen, in 1866, and educated at the university of the town. He was employed as private tutor to young gentlemen, among whom were lords Gray, Blantyre, and others. With the latter he travelled, and resided six years on the Continent. He published an Essay into the Nature of the Human Soul (Lond. 4to; 2d ed. 2 vols. 180). An appendix was subsequently published, and dedicated to the widely known John Wilkes. In 1779 Dr. Duncan collected from the MSS. of Baxter, and published, The Evidence of Reason in Proof of the Immortality of the Soul Independent of the Doctrine of Matter and Spirit. Mr. Baxter published, for the use of his pupils and his son, a piece entitled Mathes sine Cosmologia Pueriliis (Lond. 1740, 2 vols.). His treatise on the soul has been highly commended, and by no less authority than Dugald Stewart. Though he was not a graduate, he acquired a large amount of learning. He died in Aberdeen in 1750. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v. (W. P. S.)

Baxter, Benjamin Stephens, a Congregational minister, son of Rev. Elijah B. Baxter, was born at Cornwall, Vt., Aug. 8, 1806. In early life he was a carpenter, and began to preach in 1836, assisting Rev. Sherman Kellogg, the evangelist. Although he had previously labored with the Congregationalists, he was ordained Sept. 23, 1842, as a Free-will Baptist minister, in Waterbury, Vt., and the following year preached in East Vermont. In 1862 he ministered in Benss and Leon, Wis., 1862 to 1864 in Birono and Portland; 1864 to 1868 in Mauston; 1868 to 1870 in Tomah; 1879 to 1872 in Hale; 1873 to 1877 in Mauston, where he remained without charge thereafter until his death, which occurred June 14, 1879. See Comp. Year-book, 1880, p. 11.

Baxter, John, one of the first Wesleyan missionaries, was a native of England, a local preacher, and an emplower of the Mecklenburg and Dock Establishments at Chat- ham, Kent. In 1779 he went to the island of Antigua, W. I., where he was invested with a lucrative government office. Renouncing this in 1785 (Myles says 1786), he became a missionary among the slaves of the islands. Next to Nathaniel Gilbert, he may be considered the founder of the missions in the West Indies. He wrote: "He was greatly beloved by the negroes, and loved them in an equal degree; and went to glory (1806) from among them in the triumph of faith." See Myles, Chron. Hist. of the Methodists, p. 173; Smith, Hist. of Wesl. Methodist (see Index, vol. iii); Stevens, Hist. of Methodism, iii, 208.

Baxter, Joseph, a Congregational minister, and a lineal descendant of Richard Baxter of England, was the son of Lieut. John Baxter of Braintree, Mass., and was born June 4, 1767. He was a graduate of Harvard College in the class of 1803, and was ordained April 21, 1807. He offered his services as a missionary to the North American Indians, but they were so greatly under the influence of the Jesuit Riales that they declined the offer. Mr. Baxter died May 2, 1745. Baxterians, the followers of the nonconformist divine Richard Baxter (q. v.).

Bay is a principal compartment or division in the architectural arrangement of a building, marked either by the buttresses or pilasters on the walls, by the disposition of the main ribs of the vaulting of the interior, by the main arches and pillars, the principals of the roof, or by any other leading features that separate it into corresponding portions. The word is also sometimes used for the space between the mullions of a window, properly called a light; it is occasionally found corrupted into day.

Bay, Andrew, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Ireland. He was ordained by the New-Side Presby- teries of Newcastle in 1748, and installed pastor of Round Hill Church, N. Y., and of Marsh Creek in Adams Co., Pa. He remained until 1760, and became pastor of Deer Creek Church, which relation he sustained seven years, when he was sent by the synod to the South to supply the vacancies which had appeared. He was the father of the Bay family of Wilmington, Newbern, Edenton, and Williamsburg. He also travelled extensively in Virginia and South Carolina. He made a tour of New Eng- land, and was sent by the synod in 1768 to the vacancies above Albany, N. Y. The congregation was, for its convenience, annexed to the New York Presbytery, which Bay joined in 1773, having accepted a call to Newtown,[ L. I., and after remaining a year was dismissed, he refusing to submit to the jurisdiction of the synod. He died in 1776. (W. P. S.)

Baya (Beya, or Vey), St.—commemorated Nov. 1 or 8—who is venerated at Dunbar, in Lothian, is said she died on the island, and there was raised over her remains, and may be the one now in ruins bearing her name. King places her in the 9th century.

Bayadero (from the Portuguese balladeira, i.e. ballet-dancer), is a professional dancing and singing girl of India. In the language of India they are called Devadasis, and are divided into various classes. The first live in the temple of Vishnu and Siva; they dance and sing during the solemnities of the worship. Those in the second class are called Nutshas, or Night girls, and perform the same duties as above, but they do not belong to any particular pagodas. The third class are called Vestitiras, and those of the fourth Concias. The latter are placed under the care and supervision of an old woman, and are hired out by the latter, single or in greater numbers, in order to participate in festivities. They are taken from all ranks in life, are chosen for their beauty, and subjected to severe physical training, by which they acquire great variety and facility of movement. Most of these girls assist at the formal services of particular divinities in the temples, likewise serve the passions of the Brahmans so long as their beauty remains. If children are born to them, the girls are brought up to the occupation of their mothers, and the boys are trained to be musicians. They receive a fixed allowance of food and money, to which some classes add the income of an infamous profession. See DANCE.

Bayanne, Alphonso Hubert (de Lattine), Duke de, a French cardinal, was born at Valence, Dauphiny, Oct. 30, 1739. He was auditor of the rote at the court of Rome in 1777, was appointed senator, April 6, 1813, and voted the forfeiture of the emperor in 1814. He was created peer of France by Louis XVIII, and assisted at the Camp de Mai, but was retained upon the list of peers, and refused to sit as judge in the trial of Marshal Ney. He died in Paris, July 26, 1818. He wrote a very rare and interesting medical work entitled, Diario sopra la Mal aria e la Malattie che si opera in Varie Spagge d'Italia (Rome, 1793). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bayard, Lewis P., D.D., a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was a son of the Hon. Samuel Bayard, of Princeton, N. J. He graduated from the College of New Jersey in 1809; became rector of Trinity Church, Newark, N. J., in May, 1813; resigned his charge in 1829, and then preached in various places in the surrounding country; was the first Episcopal minister who officiated in Paterson, N. J.; and died at Malta, on his return from the Holy Land, Sept. 2, 1840. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v. 740.

Bayart, in the sagas of the Middle Ages, was the famous horse of the four Heimun children, on which they all sat, and whose fleetness, courage, and strength made them so dangerous to the king of France, that the lieutenants of their army, who had conspired on the sacrifice of this noble steed. The oldest son, Renaud, was obliged to tie a millstone to the horse's neck, and throw it into the Seine; but it worked its way up again and swam to the shore. The weight was doubled and redoubled, but every time it gained new power and courage when it saw its master. At last a millstone was tied to each foot, and around the neck, and Renaud was ordered away. The noble animal again came out of the water, but, not seeing its master, lost its strength and sank.

Bayer (de Bobpart), Conrad, bishop of Metz. From 1415, was of the same family as Thierry Bayer de Bobpart. This prelate first occupied his time in extinguishing the brigands who were desolating the country, and bringing about a reconciliation between the people of Messina and the duke of Lorraine. He went to Rome to secure the appointment of the archbishopric of Messina to his nephew, James of Sterck. On his return he took the part of René d'Anjou against Anthony of Vaudemont, was taken prisoner with René, and purchased his liberty with ten thousand talents of gold. Thanks to his generous ally, René also returned to his estate. The bishop of Bobpart was pursued by him to introduce reforms and to subdue revolting vassals. In 1488 René bore arms into Italy. At that time, in concert with Erard de Chatel, Bayer governed the two duchies. Bayer, in order to repulse them, in view of the financial crisis, laid taxes upon the estates of René, for which he was arrested, and gained his liberty only upon harsh conditions. The people of Messina received him in triumph, aided in paying the debts, and allied themselves with him in 1439 and 1440 to take revenge on the duke of Lorraine. Bayer consecrated the latter years of his life to the administration of his diocese. He protected artists, and called a number around him. He died April 29, 1457. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bayer (y Subias), Francisco, a Spanish painter, was born at Saragossa, March 9, 1734. He was early instructed by an obscure painter, and soon after sent to Madrid, where he entered the school of Antonio Gonzales Valasquez. He painted several pictures for the churches of Madrid, among which were those of the life of St. Peter, at the Carmelites. In 1765 he was received into the Academy of Madrid, and in 1788 made painter to the king. He died in August, 1795. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bayer, Francisco Perez, a Spanish antiquary who was born at Valletta, 1711, and died in 1794, wrote, De Numis Hebrao-Samaritana (Valent. 1781), and Numos Heb. Sam. Vindelic. (1790). These are standard works on the subject to which they relate.

Bayer, J. Adam, a German Reformed minister, was born at Zweibrücken, Rhine Baier, Dec. 26, 1807. He came to America, and in 1831 became pastor of some congregations in Westmoreland County, Pa. Subsequently he served Meadville and French Creek, in Crawford Co., Pa., from 1838 to 1885; Dansville, N. Y., Livingstone and vicinity, from 1854 to 1864; and later, Allentown, Ind., 1845, withdrawing after a short time and returning to Dansville, N. Y., where he died, Aug. 24, 1878.

Bayer, Johann, a Hungarian theologian, was born at Eperies, and was called in 1650 to the University of Wittemberg, where he became professor of philosophy. He wrote, De Notitia Dei Naturali (Wittemb. 1659), and some other works indicated by Haranyi. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bayer, Johann Wolfgang, a German Jesuit missionary, was born at Schleswitz, Bavaria. He was sent in 1749 to Peru, in order to propagate the Christian faith. After the dispersion of his order in 1722 he returned to his native country. Murr has published an abridged account of the travels of P. Bayer (Nuremb. 1776). He died in 1796. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bayer (de Bobpart), Thierry, a French prelate, exchanged in 1385 the bishopric of Worms for that of Metz. The historians of his time have spoken in high terms of his personal qualities. He terminated the discussions raised between the inhabitants of Metz and his predecessor, formed an alliance with the dukes of Lorraine and Bar, and with Charles IV combated the duke of Milan, concerning which affair he went as ambassador to Rome. The new strifes with the inhabitants of Messina, the quarrels with the clergy which he wished to settle, and the wars with the dukes of Lorraine and Bar

Bayes, Joshua, an English Presbyterian minister, was born in 1671, and died in 1761. He was one of the writers who completed Matthew Henry's Commentary on the Holy Scriptures. He also published a work against Popery (2 vols. 1750). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Bayfield, Richard, an English martyr, was for some time a monk of Bury. He was converted by some godly men of London, who went about visiting and preaching to friends in the country around. For reading the New Test. in Latin he was cast into prison, whipped with a gag in his mouth, and then put in the stocks for nine months. He was released through Dr. Barnes. He prospered in the knowledge of God mightily after this, and was beneficial to Tyndale and Frith for their works in Germany, France, and England. He afterwards went to London, and was there betrayed. The articles laid against him by the bishop of London were numerous. After his examination he was taken to Newgate, and there burned, Nov. 29, 1581. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv. 689.

Bayless, John Clark, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Louisville, Ky., Jan. 7, 1819. His mother died while he was an infant, but he was sedulously trained by a pious grandmother in the precepts and practices of gospel truth. He was graduated from Centre College, Ky., in 1836. While a student he was converted during a revival in Danville, united with the Church there, and was baptized by the Rev. Dr. John C. Young. He entered Princeton Seminary in June, 1837, and remained until September, 1838, when the state of his health compelled him to leave. He returned, however, in August, 1839, and remained until he had completed his course in the spring of 1841. He was licensed by the Presbyterian Church in Danville, Sept. 28, 1840, and spent his first year of ministerial labor at Cloverport, Ky., and vicinity. At the end of this time he became pastor of the church at Jeffersonville, Ind., for two years, and, in addition, was for one year chaplain to the penitentiary. In 1844 or 1845 he removed to Covington, Ky., where he succeeded in building up a flourishing church, and sent out a colony to organize a second church (now North Street) in that growing city. In 1852 he removed to northern Kentucky, and took charge, for a part of his time, of Bethesda Church (now Ashland Church), in Boyd County. Here began that great evangelistic work in which he was engaged for the last twenty-five years of his life, and which extended not only through northern Kentucky, but all contiguous parts of West Virginia. On this wide and needly field preaching points and Sabbath-schools were established. Iron-furnaces were made centres of work. New churches were organized wherever practicable. Thus he soon had five or six organized churches under his care, and each was a centre of extended mission work. In April, 1866, he severed his connection with Ashland Church, still continuing his work as an evangelist. In 1867 he bought a mountain farm near Grayson, Carter Co., Ky., and henceforth resided there, still, however, earnestly continuing his missionary labors. But his health grew more and more feeble, and for four or five years before his death he was able to travel very little, especially in winter. He died May 28, 1875. Dr. Bayless espoused the Southern side during the civil war, and at the time of his death was in connection with the Presbytery of the Eighth District of the Southern Synod of Kentucky. He was a man of great ability, and of strong and clear views on all subjects to which he gave his attention. He was an earnest, effective, and instructive preacher. He was especially fond of children, and gave much time and labor to instruct and benefit them in every way. He was a winner of Christian joy and even of triumph. See Necrological Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1876, p. 23. (W. P. S.)

Bayless, Lewis C., a Presbyterian minister, was born in New York city, Sept. 26, 1888. He was educated at the New York Free Academy, and studied theology at the Seminary at Princeton, N. J. He was ordained by the New York Presbytery in 1862, and installed pastor of the Eighty-fourth Street Presbyterian Church, New York city. He died Aug. 18, 1864. See Withrow, A. A. L. M., I, 188, 188.

Bayley, Abner, a Congregational minister, was born at Newbury, Mass., in 1716. He graduated from Harvard College in 1736, was ordained pastor of the church in Salem, N. H., Jan. 30, 1740, and died March 10, 1798. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ii. 389.

Bayley, C., D.D., an English divine, was born about 1732, near Whitchurch, Shropshire. He was sent to the grammar-school, where by assiduity he made great progress in learning, staying there until he became the master. To his advancement in literature his excellent gr mmar in the Hebrew language bears sufficient testimony. He entered the ministry as curate of the Rev. John Fletcher, vicar of Madeley, Salop, and subsequently was connected with the Rev. Dr. Couys, at Deptford. After much labor and perseverance, he erected a church in Manchester, and in 1788 became its first pastor. Dr. Bayley retained this charge till his death, which occurred April 2, 1812. His diligence in pastoral duty, his faithfulness in the ministrations of the pulpit, and his purity of life, were such as to place him in the estimation of the servants of the Lord. He published The Christian's Choice (Manchester, 1801, 12mo). See (Lond.) Christian Observer, August, 1812, p. 477.

Bayley, James, a Congregational minister, was born Sept. 12, 1650. He graduated from Harvard College in 1669, was ordained at Danvers in October, 1671, became senior of Harvard College, in 1687, and in 1697 he was again visited by the Lord in his work. He published The Christian's Choice (Manchester, 1801, 12mo). See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i. 136.

Bayley, John, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born at Newcastle-under-Lyme, Staffordshire, Eng., March 13, 1814. In his youth he became a bold and decided infidel. He came to America in 1836, was converted in 1839, and in 1840 joined the Virginia Conference. In 1845 he visited England, returning to his work the following year. In 1849 he again visited England, to recruit, and returned in 1869. He died in Lynchburg, Va., Feb. 25, 1880. Mr. Bayley was a close student. The Bible was his chief study, and his preaching was always accompanied with the unction of the Spirit. Socially, he was entertaining, cordial, pure, and was eminently successful in winning souls to Christ. He was continually writing for papers and periodicals, and he wrote and published many interesting books. Among them are: Confessions of a Converted Infidel:—Marriage as it is and as it should be:—Pleasant Hours; also many smaller pamphlets, viz.: Shakespeare—Was He a Christian?—Facts About America for the People of England, etc. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of M. E. Church South, 1880, p. 235.

Bayley, Josiah, a Unitarian minister, was born at Newbury, Mass., in 1723. He graduated at Harvard College in 1752, and was ordained pastor of the Church at Hampton Falls, N. Y., Oct. 19, 1757. He died Sept. 12, 1762. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vi. 445.

Bayley, Robert Slater, F.S.A., an English Congregational minister, was born at Lichfield, in 1801. He was converted early in life, educated for the ministry at Hoxton College, and settled first at Louth, in 1833. In 1835 he removed to Sheffield, where he labored ten years. From Sheffield Mr. Bayley went to Queen-street Chapel, London, where he bore his labors to the utmost. He died Nov. 15, 1859. Mr. Bayley was the author of, Nat-Bayley, William, an English minister of the Society of Friends, was born about the year 1630, and was for some time a Baptist minister at Poole. He united with the Friends about the year 1655, and, as the "testimony" about him says, "he ran up and down in many places in the service of the Lord." He is spoken of as being singularly gifted by the Holy Spirit, and an "able minister of the New Testament." He undertook the personal sufferings usual in that age with his associates. In order to provide for the wants of his family, he made a voyage to Barbadoes in 1682, on a ship which was wrecked. His last voyage was made to Barbadoes. On his return from visiting Friends in that island he died, April 1, 1675, in lat. 46° 36'. See Piety Promoted, i, 73, (J. C. S.)

Baylis, Frederick, an English Congregational minister, was born at Rotherham, Gloucestershire, in 1828. Soon after his conversion he was accepted by the London Missionary Society, and sent to Fakenham and Rotherham to fit himself better for their work. In 1850 he was ordained at Southampton. On Sept. 14, 1850, Mr. Baylis left for India. He labored first at Madras, and finally at Neyyar, South Travancore. In August, 1854, the charge of the entire mission devolved on him. He was the last of the first generation of the medical department, for which he had been happily prepared by his early education. His death occurred May 17, 1877. Mr. Baylis was possessed of great energy and patient determination. He was indefatigable, self-possessed, and cheerful. His varied abilities and attainments qualified him for all departments of missionary labor. He had the confidence and esteem of both the English and native authorities of the province. Besides discharging his missionary duties, Mr. Baylis contributed numerous works to Tamil Christian literature, and for several years was joint, and afterwards sole, editor of the illustrated Tamil magazine, The Jeevakār. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1878, p. 306.

Bayliss, Samuel, a Congregational minister, was born at Stratford-on-Avon, England, Jan. 9, 1812. His early years were spent in New York and Philadelphia, and from 1832 to 1842 he was engaged in business in Rochester, N. Y. From 1842 to 1853 he was agent of the American Tract Society; but May 1 of the latter year he was organized as an evangelist in Brooklyn, N. Y. As a result of his labors the Warren Mission Church in Brooklyn was organized in the following year, and he remained in pastoral charge of it until 1866, when he was elected secretary and agent of the Brooklyn Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor. He continued to hold this position until 1877. His death occurred in Brooklyn, Feb. 12, 1879. See Cong. Year-book, 1880, p. 12.

Baylor, Hon. and Rec., R. E. B., a licensed preacher of the Baptist denomination, was born in Bourbon County, Ky., May 10, 1791. He studied law in his native state, and, having been admitted to the bar, he removed to Alabama, and practised at Cahaba and Tuscaloosa. For two terms he represented the Tuscaloosa district in Congress. His conversion took place in 1839, and soon after he was licensed to preach. He removed to Texas not long after, where he was a member of the Texan Congress for a time, and for twenty-five years he was a licentiate for a time, and for twenty-five years he was a licentiate for preaching, and for eight years on the Supreme bench. "Wherever he held courts he also preached, often deciding cases on the bench during the day, and holding a protracted meeting at night." "His religious character aided him no little in his judicial career at a time when violence, lawlessness, and misrule prevailed among the people." He was singularly identified with the people of God wherever he went. He was a generous friend and contributor to "Baylor University"—called so from him—an institution of high character, situated in Independence, Washington Co., Texas, established in 1845. Mr. Baylor spent most of his time during the last ten years of his life in attending religious meetings. He died Dec. 30, 1873. "His memory is precious among all classes of people in the State of Texas. See Bapt. Encyclopaedia, p. 89.

Bayly (or Bailey), Anselm, LL.D., an English clergyman, who died in 1784, was sub-dean of his majesty's Chapel Royal, and published a number of educational and theological works (1751-89). His most pretentious work was, The Old Testament, English and Hebrew, with Remarks Critical and Grammatical on the Hebrew, and Corrections of the English (Lond. 1774, 4 vols. 8vo). "In this work he has made no large number of alterations, chiefly in the punctuation, is printed so as to face the Hebrew; a few notes are added of an explanatory kind; the Keri readings are conveniently placed on the margin; and summaries of the books are appended. The work is of little value, except as it supplies a legible Hebrew text. The text is pointed, but only the thaukach and sobh-pusak accents are inserted." Dr. Bayly published also a Hebrew Grammar, and a Practical Treatise on Singing (ibid. 1771).

Bayly, Benjamin (1), an English clergyman, was rector of St. James's, Bristol, and died about 1720. He published, An Essay on Inspiration (Lond. 1707) — a Discourse on the Genii, or the General A ministral, or the general A ministral Subjects (2 vols. 1721). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v. Bayly, Benjamin (2), an Irish Methodist preacher, was born at Moneygrath, County Carlow, Oct. 13, 1807. He was converted at twenty-one, received into the Methodist Society by the Rev. Robert Huston, became a class leader and local preacher, and began in 1822 the career of an itinerant minister. During forty-two years he labored more and longer than any in Ireland, and reassembled remarkable revivals of the work of God. He took special interest in the spiritual welfare of the young. He died Jan. 29, 1714. See Pieti Promota, ii, 145–147. (J. C. S.)

In 1822 he became rector of Salisbury, Conn.; in 1838 rector of Essex, Vt., in the same state, taking charge also of St. Stephen's Church, East Haddam. In 1836 he resigned the parish at Essex, and assumed the rectorate at East Haddam, where he died, Jan. 14, 1888. As a preacher, his sermons were remarkably clear, earnest, and instructive, and he excelled in extemporaneous address. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 832.

Beacock, William, an English Wesleyan missionary, went to the West Indies in 1816, and labored in the island of St. Vincent's. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1818.

Beacom, James, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Pittsburgh, Pa., Aug. 15, 1817. Following his natural inclinations, he became a votary of the histrionic art, and acquired some celebrity therin. He was the associate of Forrest, and also Parsons, who, like him, abandoned the stage for the Christian ministry. He experienced conversion at the age of thirty, and soon afterwards entered the Pittsburgh Conference. He grew in knowledge and grace with a rapidity rarely surpassed, and labored with great zeal and fidelity until near the close of his life, when he became superannuated, and retired to Pittsburgh, where he died, April 21, 1862. Beacon Turrets occur at Llandrillo-yn-Rhos, at St. Burian's, Hadley, and St. Michael's Mount, under the modern name of St. Michael's Chair; they carried a light that warned seamen on an isolated coast of the presence of travellers or ships. The cage for the cresset remains at Hadley Tower. Octagonal lanterns are found at Boston, in the west tower of Ely, at All Saints', York, and other places which served the same purpose. St. Hilary Tower was yearly whitewashed by the port of St. Ives, to render it conspicuous at sea. At Bow Church, Chapside, and Winchester, there were beacons.

Beadle, Elias Root, D.D., LL.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Cooperstown, N. Y., Oct. 13, 1812. He united with the Church at the age of seventeen, and soon after commenced his preparation for the ministry, spending parts of two years under the tuition of Rev. Dr. E. N. Kirk, then pastor of the Fourth Presbyterian Church at Albany, N. Y. In 1835 he was licensed to preach, and in 1836 was ordained. His health being much shattered in consequence of his labors as a city missionary, he accepted an invitation to become the pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in Albion, N. Y., where he remained for two years; at the end of which time the church was placed in an unhealthy situation among the Druses of Mount Lebanon, Syria, and sailed from this country in June, 1839. The war in Syria prevented his entrance upon the work for which he had been set apart, and, after three years' missionary labor in different parts of Syria, he went to Constantinople, with the hope that Providence might open some field for work in Turkey. To recruit his health, he decided, after a time, to return to his native land. In 1840 he went to New Orleans, where he continued for nine years "in labors abundant and most fruitful, in zeal ardent, in perils oft, amid epidemics and panics, sicknesses and calamities." As the result of his persistent efforts, three Presbyterian churches were formed in New Orleans, of one of which he was pastor for several years. In 1852 he returned north, and became pastor of the Pearl-street (Congregational) Church in Hartford, Conn., —a new church, of which he was the first minister. Here he continued his useful labors. Then his health failed, and he was compelled to rest from his ministerial labors, and then yielded to the pressure of disease, and was obliged to spend eight months in the West Indies to recruit his wasted energies. Returning to Hartford, he continued his labors for a time, and then resigned. After spending some time in the Old World, he returned to the United States, and having accepted a call to the pastorate of the See-Beacon, Richard, D.D., an English prelate, was born about 1739, and educated at Cambridge, where he became fellow of St. John's College. He was chosen master of Jesus College, Cambridge, in 1781, and vice-chancellor of the University in 1782. He was consecrated bishop of Gloucester June 7, 1789, and translated to the see of Bath and Wells in 1792. He died April 21, 1824. He published a few sermons. See Le Neve, Fasti (Index).

Beal, William, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Devonport, in 1785. He was converted at the age of seventeen, and appointed teacher, by Dr. Coke, in the first Sunday-school established at Liskeard. He was received into the ministry in 1808, and for sixty-four years he did the work of an evangelist with ability, purity, and fidelity. In the early part of his ministry, he endured privation and persecution as a pioneer home-missionary in a part of Devon where Methodism was scarcely known, among a people sunk in ignorance and apathy. He was a conscientious and faithful student, and his sermons were practical, rich in experience, pervaded throughout by deep thought. He pursued anti-quarian studies with enthusiasm. He was affectionate and eminently simple-hearted and single-minded. He became a superannuate in 1848, spent the evening of his days in genial activity, amid calm and sunshine, and died at Liskeard, June 18, 1872. He published the following works: The Fatal Tendency of False Principles; a sermon, 2d ed., with a Postscript to Rev. Dr. Coke (in which latter science he was one of the very highest authorities in America. The museum of Brown University has been greatly enriched from his valuable collections. See Dr. Herrick Johnson's Memorial Sermon. (J. C. S.)

Beane, Henry Marshall, A.B., an Irish Wesleyan minister, was born at Mount Mellick, in 1820. His parents were once Quakers. He entered the ministry in 1845, and after a few years accepted a tutorship in the Connectional School, where the influences of his gentle and cheerful temper, pure mind, and upright conduct were fully recognized. Disease was, however, rapidly developing, and under it he finally sank, Dec. 17, 1855. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1856.

Beall, Isaac L., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Fairfield County, Ohio, Sept. 18, 1823. Beaman, H. H., a Baptist minister, was born in 1849. In early life he was frail in health, and was obliged to pursue his studies under private tutors. At the age of seventeen he was converted, and became a member of the church in Athol, Mass., where he was excelled, active Christian from the outset of his religious life, and about a year after joining the Church he felt himself called to enter the ministry. After preaching for a time at Warwick, Mass., he went to the Theological Institution at Newton, Mass., and remained there two years (1870-72). On leaving the seminary, he accepted a call to the pastorate of the churches of Hampton Falls and Seabrook, N. H., his ordination taking place Oct. 2, 1872. After a successful pastorate of four years, he was called, in 1876, to Bridgewater, Mass., where he remained another four years, and then removed to North Oxford, Mass. He died Aug. 10, 1881. "He was a good preacher, a faithful pastor, a kind and conscientious man. He fell at the post of duty, with the harness on." See The Watchman, Sept. 22, 1881. (J. C. S.)

Beamer, Valentine M., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Clark County, Ohio, Dec. 14, 1821. Beam-rood is the beam crossing the chancel arch, on which the rood or crucifix is fixed; sometimes the top of the chancel screen.

Beam, a saint whose day is Oct. 26; but nothing is known of him except that he was venerated at Wester Ercla, in Essex. See Bevan, St. He is not to be identified with St. Beane of Mortlach, but he probably is St. Beane, the uncle of St. Cadlog, or St. Bevan of Tamlach-Meian. See Monitr. Beau, Henry, an English Congregational minister, was born at London, June 2, 1756, of pious parents, and was converted about the age of twenty. He preached two years as an evangelist at Burslem, North Staffordshire; studied four years at the academy at Idle, and in 1824 was ordained at Upper Chapel, Heckmondwike, where he continued pastor until his death, March 7, 1862. Mr. Beau's power in the pulpit lay in his earnestness; the words he uttered came straight from his heart. He was a well-read man, a rapid speaker, a genial, faithful Christian. He left fifteen or sixteen hundred sermons fully written, and an immense number of skeletons—the produce, for the most part, of the hours he devoted to study before breakfast.

Beau, John, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Stratford, Vt., Sept. 23, 1817. He was converted at fourteen; removed to Illinois; commenced his itinerant life in Wisconsin in 1845; labored until he could do so no longer; retired in 1870; and died of apoplexy, near Barnow, Wis., where he resided, May 1, 1890. He was an excellent revivalist, and his words and spirit were eminently successful. He died at Fairport, Mich. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1880, p. 240.

Beau, Joseph, a Congregational minister, was born in Boston, March 7, 1718. In 1741, under the preaching of Whitefield and Tennant, he became a Christian, abandoning his calling as a trader, he devoted himself to preparatory studies, and at length graduated at Harvard College in 1748. He was ordained the third minister of Wrentham, Mass., Nov. 24, 1756, and remained pastor of the Church there for thirty years. He died Dec. 12, 1784. See Panhaph, v., 481-488; Allen, Amer. On removing to London, he was for twelve months evening lecturer at Clapham Common. Mr. Bean's final charge was at Worthing, where he labored from 1855 to 1863, and then retired to London, where he died, Nov. 14, 1871. Beane, Samuel, a Congregational minister, was born at Lyman, N. H., March 1, 1812. He was educated at the Haverhill (N. H.) Academy, where he was converted, at Dartmouth College (graduated 1836), and at Andover Theological Seminary. He was ordained pastor of the Church in Great Falls, N. H., 1845. He was an itinerant installer at Little Cotton, R. I., the Church of which was bitterly divided on the slavery question, but had been united and harmony restored by Mr. Beane. He removed to Beloit, Wis., in 1857, conducting a female seminary for three years. His health improving, he returned east and was installed in 1860, where he labored until his death, after a protracted and painful illness, May 6, 1865. Mr. Beane was a model pastor, and a spiritual and earnest preacher. See Cong. Quarterly, 1867, p. 200.

Beanland, Benjamien, an English Wesleyan preacher in the early times, was called upon to endure grievous sufferings for the truth's sake. He had many narrow escapes and wonderful deliverances. After continuing for a long time a local preacher, he yielded to solicitations and gave himself wholly to the work of the ministry. There being then no settled provisions for the Methodist preachers, Beanland was hard pressed, and, when his clothes were nearly worn out, he returned home; "sooner than being damned for debt, he would work an hour for his wife herself." The sequel proved him in this step. In spite of his industry, he was actually cast into prison for debt, and the remainder of his days were spent in distress; and he died under a cloud, "a monument" (in the opinion of Charles Atmore) "of the just displeasure of God against him, for who is so happy as to desire the path of duty." He had uncommon ministerial gifts, and was an acceptable and useful preacher. No dates can be found. See Atmore, Memorial, s. v.

Beaus, a Scottish prelate, was the first bishop to the see of Aberdeen. He was bishop in 1015, and is said to have administered his diocese for thirty-two years with prudence and integrity. He died in 1047, and is said to have died as a saint on Dec. 16. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 101.

He did valuable service until his death, Oct. 26, 1865. Mr. Bear was a man of correct qualities, possessed a good English education, and rare preaching abilities. As a disciplinarian he was thorough, and as a pastor he had marked success. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1867, p. 148.

Bear, Jacob, a German Reformed minister, was probably born in eastern Pennsylvania, March 4, 1810, and licensed to preach either by the Susquehanna Classis or the Synod in 1836. He was settled first at Spring Mills, Pa., and remained there three years. In 1840 he had charge of twelve congregations in the vicinity of Shanesville, O.; preaching there and then removed to West Point, Iowa Territory, where he died, Feb. 1, 1855. Beard. The practice of the clergy in ancient times in respect to wearing beards was in conformity with the general custom. Long hair and baldness by shaving being alike in ill-repute as unseemly peculiarities, the clergy were required to observe a becoming moderation between either extreme. The fourth Council of Carthage ordered that the clergy should "neither cultivate the hair, nor shave the beard." The contrary practice, however, having obtained in the later Roman Church, it has been contended that the word "shave" was an interpolation in the canon. But this has been disproved on the testimony of the Vatican and many other manuscript long after it was the custom of the French bishops to wear short hair and long beards. See SHAVING.

Bear - worship. Among the Ostiah Tartars in Siberia the bear is held in great veneration. It is sacrificed to their gods as being the most acceptable victim they can select. As soon as they have killed the animal they strip off its skin and hang it on a very high tree in presence of their idol. They now pay homage to it, and utter doleful lamentations over the dead bear, excusing themselves for having put it to death by attributing the fatal deed to the arrow and not to the person that shot it. This part of their worship arises from the idea that the soul of the bear will take the first opportunity of revenging itself upon the murderers.

Beast, a Symbol. See Symbolism.

Beatitude. In the Liturgy of S. Chrysostom the Beatitudes are ordered to be sung by the choir on Sundays, instead of the third Antiphon. Dr. Neale takes them, no doubt rightly, for the Beatitudes of the Sermon on the Mount.

Beaton (or Bethune), James, a Scottish prelate, was first chancellor in the Church of Glasgow, and in 1543 got the Abbey of Aberbrothock, which he held until 1551, when he was preferred to the see of Glasgow. He was consecrated at Rome in 1552, and held the see of Glasgow until 1559; at which time he, receiving the wild fury of the reformers in pulling down churches and monasteries, thought it prudent, for the preservation of his life, to go to the monarch of France, and transport them out of his kingdom; so he took the opportunity and went away into France with the forces of that nation the same year, and carried with him all the writs pertaining to the see of Glasgow. He was appointed by queen Mary her ambassador at the court of France, and her son king James VI continued him in the same character, notwithstanding their difference in religious sentiments. After all these various changes, the king, by act of Parliament, restored bishop Beaton to the temporality of the see of Glasgow, which he enjoyed until his death, April, 1608. By his last will he left all his goods to the Scots College in Paris. See Keith, "Scottish Bishops," p. 259-262.

His early education was received at a school conducted by a Quaker, and he was licensed and appointed to a church in Kincardine. In 1825 he was called to Gordon-street Church, Glasgow, where he remained for thirty-two years. He was successful and very popular as a minister. He died June 10, 1858. See Wilson, "Presbyterian Historical Almanac," 1860, p. 271.

He studied under Dr. Proudfoot, and was licensed by the Classis of New York in 1808. I., 1809 to 1834; stated supply at Belfor, 1838 to 1842; and pastor there from 1842 till his death, Jan. 22, 1864. See Corwin, "Manual of the Ref. Church of America" (3d ed.), p. 172.

By his exemplary conduct he won the esteem of all. See "Minutes of the British Conference," 1853.

Beatty, Charles, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Antrim, Ireland, in 1715. He removed to America after having received a classical education. While travelling as a pedlar he was induced by Tennent to prepare for the ministry. He was taken on trial by the New Brunswick Presbytery, Oct. 12, 1742, and was licensed the next day and sent to Nottingham. In 1743 he was called to the Forks of Neshaminy, and was ordained and installed in the fall of that year. The synod sent him to Virginia and North Carolina in 1754, and he accompanied Franklin in the defence of the frontier, after the burning of the Moravian missionaries by the Indians. Franklin speaks of him as the zealous and devoted chaplain. He was advised by the synod in 1759 to go to Col. Armstrong's station near Augusta. In 1760 he was sent by the corporation of the widows' fund to Great Britain. The same year Beatty and Duffield were sent as missionaries to the frontiers of the provinces, to preach two months in those parts in accordance with the instructions of the corporation. Beatty published his tour in Great Britain, two pamphlets on Indian missions, and a sermon entitled, Double Honor is Due to the Laborious Gospel Minister. He sailed for the vessel, but died Aug. 13, 1722, soon after reaching Barbadoes. (W. P. S.)

From 1861 to the close of the war he served out the United States as a chaplain and afterwards in the Bethel agency, one year in Cleveland, and the remainder of his life in Toledo, where he died, Nov. 22, 1876. Mr. Beatty was tall, erect, and well-developed; his features noble and beaming with good-nature; frank and genial in manner. His culture of mind was largely the result of observation, he never having had many school privileges. His life was highly exemplary. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1877, p. 110.

He was at first preceptor of the Cardinal Charles of Lorraine, whom he accompanied to Rome, and who gave to him the bishopric of Metz. He also went to the Council of Constance, where he spoke with great eloquence and zeal against the pretensions of the Ultramontanes, and upon the necessity of the Reformation. Beaucarne retired to Bourbounais after having resigned his bishopric, and there composed his Heredita Galliarum Commentaria, ab anno 1541 ad annum 1562 (Lyons, 1625). He died in 1631. He also wrote De Infantum in Matrim Uteria Sanctificatiis (Paris, 1565 and 1567); and some verse, which is found in Delicia Poetarum Galliarum Illustrium. His Histoire de France did not appear until after his death, as he had desired. See Hoeyer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Lich- tenberger, Encyclopédie des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.

He became a superannuated in 1866, removed to England, and died first at Newark, then with his son in London (John Beauchamp, Esq. treasurer of the Wesle- yan Thanksgiving Fund). His des- cendants are still in England, one of whom arrived at the present time as resident at Sandown. He died in 1778, what celebrated in his day as a religious controversialist. See Smiles, Huguenot Refugees, p. 398, 399. (J. C. S.)

Beaufort, Eustache de, a French monk of the order of Cistercians, was born in 1835. He embraced the monastic life contrary to his inclination, in order to satisfy his vanity and that of his family. After several years he was appointed to the abbey of Sept Fons. He at first lived in luxury and dissoluteness, but in 1668 he repented of this course, and proposed to the friars a rigid reform; but they, after reproaching him severely, abandoned him. Eustache then rebuilt his monastery, and soon after, by the example of Rance, he assembled a new society, which submitted to more rigid regulations. He died Oct. 22, 1709. See Hoeyer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Beaufort, Henry, an English prelate of considerable celebrity, was born about 1370. He was a natural son of John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, and was half- brother to King Henry IV. He studied at Oxford and Cambridge, but received the principal part of his education at Aix-la-Chapelle. He became prebendary of Lincoln in 1389, dean of Wells in 1397, chancellor of Oxford University the same year, bishop of Lincoln in 1398, and bishop of Winchester in 1404. He repeated-ly filled the office of lord-chancellor, and was involved in all the most important political movements of his times. He was present at the Council of Constance, and voted for the election of Pope Martin V., by whom he was subsequently made a cardinal. When the car- dinal's nephew, Henry V. of England, proposed to levy a new impost on the clergy, in order to raise money for carrying on the war against France, Beaufort was the chief opponent of the measure; yet he loyally the king, out of his own private purse, £28,000, a sum which seems to indicate that he was the wealthiest subject of his time in all England. His service in this affair was soon recognized by the pope, who sent him as legate into Germany to organize a crusade against the follow- ers of John the Slav, who undertook to overthrow the cardinal, having expounded, in levying an English army against France, the monies granted from Rome for other purposes, fell under the papal displeasure. In 1431 Beaufort conducted the young king, Henry VI., to France, to be crowned in Paris as king of France and England. Here he also endeavored in vain to reconcile the duke of Bedford, regent of France, with the offended duke of Burgundy. Cardinal Beaufort died at Winchester, in 1447. His memory is stained by his suspected participa- tion in the murder of his great political rival, the duke of Gloucester, who headed the lay opposition to the despotism of ecclesiastical statesmen, and by the fact that he presided over the tribunal which sentenced the Maid of Orleans to perish at the stake. See Milnor, History of Winchester; Gough, Life of Beaufort, in Vetusta Monumenta, vol. ii; Le Neve, Fusi (Index).

On returning to Turin, he was employed to decorate the royal palace, where he painted in fresco, in the library, various symbolic subjects relative to the royal family of Sardinia; and in the other apartments he represented the episodes of the L'Itinerario di Roma. In the Chiesa della Croce is a fine picture of The Descent from the Cross. The king of Sardinia considered him worthy of the honor of knighthood, in whose service he died in 1766.

Beaune, Geoffrey de, a French prelate and peer, was born at Bayeux, at the commencement of the 13th century. He was legate of the holy see in Lombardy, and accompanied, as chancellor, Charles of Anjou, brother of St. Louis, to the kingdom of Naples. In 1265 he brought to the king of Sicily the aid of three thousand horses, which he had collected at Manta. Joseph Beaumont, M.D., was converted to the new Church of England; entered the ministry in 1766, and travelled until his death at Macclesfield, Nov. 8, 1822. Beaune, Joseph, D.D., an English divine, was born at Hadleigh, Suffolk, March 16, 1615. At the age of sixteen he was placed in Peterhouse, Cambridge, where he made great progress in learning, and subsequently became fellow, tutor, and moderator. In 1648 he was ejected from his fellowship on account of his adherence to Charles I. He was ejected from three other preferments received during the Rebellion for a like reason. In 1650 he became domestic chaplain to Bishop Whitaker, and the restoration of the king, first chaplain to Charles II. In 1602 he was appointed master of Jesus College, Cambridge, and in 1663 master of Peterhouse. The same year he was instituted to the rectory of Tewsham, near Cambridge, and in 1664 to that of Barley, Hertfordshire. In 1665 he had a controversy with Dr. Henry More on account of certain doctrines advanced by the latter in his Mystery of Godliness, which he thought subversive of the English ecclesiastical constitution. Dr. Beaumont received the thanks of the university for his services on this occasion, and in 1670 was elected to the divinity chair. He died Nov. 29, 1699. His Poems in English and Latin were published in 1749. His principal work was Psalms, or Love's Mystery, in twenty-four cantos, displaying the intercouse between Christ and the soul (1648). He is said to have left all his critical and polemical works to his college, strictly forbidding the printing of any of them.

Beaune, Jean de, a French ecclesiastical writer of the 14th century, was a native of Beaune, in Burgundy. He entered the Dominican order at Dijon, and was inquisitor at Carcassonne from 1316 to 1338. Limborch (Amsterdam):—Acta Pluris contra Albigenses Haereticos, anno 1318 mense Maii et Mart. seq. He also wrote some similar works under lengthy titles. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Beaune, Réné de, a French prelate, son of baron de Samblancay, was born at Tours in 1257. He was chancellor of the duke of Alençon; but he afterwards chose the ecclesiastical profession, and was appointed successively bishop of Mende, archbishop of Bourges, and then, in 1596, of Sens. Clement VIII, irritated that this prelate had justified Henry IV, and that he had proposed to create a patriarch in France, obliged him to wait six years for his bulls. De Beaune finally obtained the rights of France on all occasions, before the assembly of the clergy, before the states of Blois, where he presided in 1588, and especially at the conference of Surène, where he announced that Henry IV had decided to make abjuration. Réné de Beaune became grand-almoner of France, and counselor of the orders of the king. He died in 1606. He wrote Decretal Concilii Provincialis Bituricensis:—Discours dans l'Assemblée du Clergé (1605):—Oraison Funèbre de Marie Stuart (1575):—Sermon Funèbre sur la Mort du Duc d'Alençon, Frère de Henri III (1584):—Harangue dans les États de Blois:—Réformation de l'Université de Paris (1591, 1601-87). He was successively master of arts, doctor in theology of the university (1413), canon of Paris, Besançon, Rouen, chancellor of Notre Dame de Paris, and deputy of the university for the nation of Normandy at the council of Bâle. He took part in the process of condemnation of the Maid of Orleans in 1400, where he distinguished himself by his want of truth and his iniquity. In the process of re-examination in 1450, he excused himself for his conduct by the violence exercised by the English concerning the judges who condemned that heroine. He died about 1450. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Beauport, Benjamin, a French theologian, who lived in the latter half of the 16th century, wrote Monotassetron Evangelitum (Paris, 1552, 1560); which is, notwithstanding the Latin title, a concordance of the gospels written in French. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Beauvais, Charles Walon de, a French theologian, was born at Beauvais, Aug. 9, 1621. He was closely allied with the monks of Port Royal, whose schools he directed at Paris. He wrote, Maximes Chrétiennes, Tables des Lecons de l'Abbé de St. Cyran (Paris, 1676):— Nouveaux Essais de Morale, Contenant Plusieurs Traittés sur Differents Sujets (1699). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Beauregard, Jean Nicolas, a French Jesuit preacher, was born at Metz, June 16, 1731. The originality and eloquence of his sermons gained for him great success. The sermon which he preached during Lent, in 1768, produced a profound and universal effect. He took refuge in England during the Revolution, and continued preaching against the emigrants, whom he accused of being the direct abettors of the Revolution by their intrigues. Attracted to Germany by the princess Hohenlohe, who showed him great favor, he there continued his ministry, ever with his wonted success. His sermons, unpublished, were bequeathed, it is said, to the Jesuits of Russia. He died in 1804 at the chateau of Groningon, Suabia. His Analyse was published at Lyons and Paris in 1823. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Beaussant Avant was the war-cry of the Templars, in allusion to their colors—black for their foes, and white for friends, side by side; for which the old French word was baussant (piebald). The Hospitallers' flag was red with a white cross.

Beausobre, Charles Louis de, a French Protestant theologian, son of Isaac, was born at Deseau, March 24, 1690. In 1718 he was appointed preacher to the French congregation at Buchholz, near Berlin. In 1715 he accepted a call to Hamburg, but he soon returned to Berlin, where he died, March 10, 1758, as pastor of the French congregation and member of the Academy of Sciences. He published Le Triomphe de l'Innocence (Berlin, 1716); being a defence of the French Reformed Christians against their opponents. He also edited from his father's writings, Supplement à l'Histoire de la Guerre des Hussites (Geneva, 1745);—Sermons sur le xiiie chap. de l'Esprit aux Romains (Lausanne, 1744);—Sermons sur la Résurrection de Lazare (1751). Beaufortville, Jean Louis Dubuisson de, bishop of Alais, was born at Beaufortville in 1708. In 1755 he was sent to the assembly of the clergy, where he ranged himself on the side of moderation. The mandate which he published in 1761 against the Recueil des Assertions gained for him a number of enemies, especially on the part of his colleagues. Nevertheless he enjoyed great consideration, more especially on the part of the Protestants than among the Catholics of Alais. He was a learned preacher, full of religious fervor, devoted to his duty, and charitable towards the poor. Some of his writings created a public sensation; among others one entitled, Sur la Mort de Louis XV et sur le Sacre de Louis XVI. He had prepared a work against the report of M. de Brienne, at the assembly of the clergy of 1765; but was prevented from presenting it by his death, which occurred March 25, 1775. He was in correspondence with Clement XIV concerning means for terminating the divisions which were disturbing the Church of France. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Beauvais, Councils of (Concilia Bellovacensis). Of these there were several. I. Held in April, 845. Ten bishops were present. Hinennar was elected to the archbishopric of Rheims, which had been vacant ten years. A sort of agreement (consisting of eight articles) was drawn up between Hincmar and Charles, the king, which the latter promised to observe religiously. See Labbe, Concil. vii, 1811.

II. Held Dec. 6, 1114, by Conon, legate and cardinal, assisted by the bishops of three provinces. Here sentence of excommunication was passed upon the emperor, Henry V, and Thomas Seigneur de Marl, accused of cruelty and robbery. Several decrees made by the later popes, for the preservation of Church property, and other articles, to maintain discipline, called furo, the circumstances of the times, were renewed; also the case of certain heretics was discussed, whom the populace had burned at Soissons, without waiting for the sentence of the ecclesiastical court, fearing that it would be too lenient. The case of Godfrey, who had left his bishopric of Amiens, and retired to the monastery of Chartres, for a sentence of excommunication at a future council. See Labbe, Concil. x, 797.

III. Held in October, 1120, by the legate Conon and the bishops of three provinces. At this council, the canonization of Arslough, bishop of Soissons, took place. The then bishop of Soissons, holding in his hand the book containing the life of Arnulphus, certified to the truth of its contents. The day was then settled, with the abbot of Oudenburg, on which the body of Arnulphus should be raised from the ground; and this was accordingly done May 1 of the following year. See Labbe, Concil. x, 882.

Beauvais, Jean Baptist Charles Marie de, bishop of Senec, was born in Cherbourg in 1731. He completed his studies at the College of Harcourt, under Lebeau, successor of Rollin. The noble appearance of his physiognomy was in harmony with that of Hesdéon. His eloquence in the character of the devo- lution, and his entire devotion to the ecclesiastical calling. He acquired a reputation and became preacher at the court. He resigned his bishopric in 1788, and the viscount of Paris appointed him, in 1789, deputy to the States-General. He died April 4, 1790. An edition of his Sermons, Pédagogiques, et Moraux was published in Paris, 1807. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bioi. Générale, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. ii, 115; Lichtenberger, Encyclopédie des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.

Beauvais, Nicholas Dauphin de, a Parisian engraver, was born about 1657, and studied under John Audran. He engraved part of the dome of St. Paul’s, after Sir James Thornhill. Some of his plates are: The Virgin with the Infant Jesus upon a Pedestal, with Saints below; Mary Magdalene in the Desert; Tha- dier; The Descent of the Holy Ghost.

Beauvau, René François de, a French prelate, was born in 1664, at the Château du Rivau. After having completed his studies, and received the cap of doctor in the Sorbonne in 1694, he was appointed canon and grand-vicar of the Church of Chartres, and his uncle was bishop. Six years later he was himself made bishop of Bayonne. Here, by his abilities, his zeal, his gentleness and charity, he won the affection and esteem of all in his diocese. He was convinced of their faithfulness by a circumstance which tested the sincerity of their profession. He had, since his appointment, been the bishopric of Tournay, which spread consternation throughout Bayonne, as the people were so reluctant to part with him. But all effort to retain him was in vain, for Louis would not change his plans, declaring it to be necessary that Tournay should have such a man as this one. Tournay was besieged and taken by prince Eugene, and M. de Beauvau rendered excellent service to the inhabitants. He afterwards retired to Paris, where Louis XIV, in recognition of his valuable services, defrayed his expenses with silver from the royal treasury. Tournay having been given to the emperor, M. de Beauvau resigned his bishopric, and became in 1713 archbishop of Toulouse, and in 1719 of Narbonne. He also had charge of the political government. As president of the states of Languedoc for twenty years, he there exhibited the same virtues as upon the different episcopal sees which he occupied. It is to his patriot-mind that we are indebted for the Histoire du Eien du Roi by the Histoire de St. Maur; also the Description Géographique, and the Histoire Naturelle, of the same province, by the Society of Montpellier. He died Aug. 4, 1739. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bioi. Générale, s. v.

Beauvilliers, Marie de, abbess of Montmartre, daughter of the count of Saint Aignan, a gentleman at-} Becan is the name of some saints.

1. The son of Cula, and contemporary of St. Columba, lived at Imleach-Fiaích, now Inchlagh, County Meath, in Ireland. He was made a deacon in the church, and among him the twelve apostles of Munster, and is commemorated April 5.

2. Of Cluain-aird-Mlochog, commemorated May 36. He was brother of St. Cronbach, in whose lifetime he was astery is called Killbreacan (or Cluainiard-Moiboc) in Munster. O'Clergy puts the site of this church in Muscraige Breaoghain, and attaches him also to Tigh Chonaill, in Uis-Briuin Cualann; adding, from the Life of St. Aiden, that he himself built a church at Cluainiard-Moiboc and left it in it with the place of the holy Church, as in every church he helped. Here St. Bécan continued till his death, A.D. 689 (or 690). In the Annals of Ireland he is known by the diminutives Dubec and Dubecuc. See Lanigan, Eccles. Hist. Irel. ii, 21, 129; O'Donovan, Four Masters.

Becer (or Bec), named Bucer (or Bucen) commemorated March 17, was the son of Ern, and a near relative of St. Columba, and of the early abbots of Hy. Leaving Ireland, he went first to Iona, and then into a solitary place. There he lived for several years, while his uncle, Segenius, was abbot of the island. He died March 17, 677.

Becnac, Martin, a noted French Jesuit, who flourished in 1550-1582, was for a long time professor of philosophy and theology in the colleges of his order. He was a favorite with the emperor Mathias, who retained him at Vienna, and with his son Ferdinand II, who made him his confessor. This position and his writings give us an insight into the zeal with which he supported that policy of which the Thirty Years' War was the final result. On sundry occasions he wrote against kings James I, and he even went so far, especially in his Controversia Apulicana de Potestate Regis et Pontificis (Mayence, 1612), as to define the legitimate authority of the Church. The Roman see found it wise to condemn the work. His Opuscula Theologica (Mornun, 1610-1621, 5 parts in 4 vols.) contain the following treatises:

Becan, Wilhelm, a Flemish theologian and poet, was born at Ypres in 1608. He was a Jesuit, and distinguished himself by his eloquence and poetry. He died at Louvain, Dec. 12, 1683. He wrote, Introitus Triumphis Ferdinanda Austriac in Flandria Metropolitam Pandanum (Antwerp, 1636); with engravings from the designs of Rubens, Regiones et Regiones; published with the works of P. Hochius. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Becandella, Mary, a French martyr, was burned at Fontaine, France, in 1534, for finding fault with a sermon which a friar preached. See Fox, Acts and Monu ments, iv, 897.

Becart (or Becardus), Jean, a Flemish theologian, of the order of the Premonstrants, who died in 1655, wrote, S. Thomæ Cantuariensis et Hierici II. Monachii de Libertate Ecclesiastica (Cologne, 1624), under the name of Richard Brunnaus, and is also the author of Annales Premonstratenses. See Sweerti Athene Belgica; Jücher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lezikon, s. v.; Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. F.)

Bec (or Bog), an Irish saint whose day is Oct. 12, was the son of Dó, and seems to have been attached to the court of Diarmaid of Tara, about A.D. 500, when his prophecies appear to have had a wide reference and acceptance. O'Donovan (Four Masters, i, 197) places his death at A.D. 557. Colgan (Aeta SS. 713, c. 4, § 9) gives his genealogy from Colla-da-chrioch; but the ancient sources represent him as eighth from Niall of the Nine Hostages.

Beccafumi, Domenico (called Meccavio), an eminent Italian painter, sculptor, and engraver, was born at Siena in 1484. He visited Rome and studied the works of Michael Angelo and Raphael. He painted several pictures for the churches and cathedrals of Siena. He was living, according to Lanzi, in the year 1651. The following are some of his principal prints: The Nativity; St. Peter holding a Book and the Keys; St. Jerome kneeling before a Crucifix.

Becancöuld, Council of (Concilio Beccançöulensis), is the name of two provincial synods.

I. Held in 692, by Whittred, King of Kent, at Becancöuld, in the Isle of Bathechild, near Sittingbourne. Beside the king, there were present Briedwald, archbishop of Canterbury, Tobias of Rochester, and several abbots, abbesse, and wise men. The chief object of the council appears to have been to consult about the repairing of the churches in Kent, injured in the wars with the West Saxons. King Whittred then, with his own mouth, renewed and confirmed the liberties and privileges and possessions of the Church in his kingdom; forbidding all future kings, and all aldermen and laymen forever, all dominion over the churches, and all things belonging to them. He further directed that, upon the death of any bishop, abbot, or abbess, the event should be immediately made known to the archbishop, and a worthy successor be chosen with his consent. See Johnson, Eccles. Canon.; Labbe, Concil. v, 1356.

II. Held about 796, by Athelward, archbishop of Canterbury, in which the privileges granted to the churches by Weland and others were solemnly confirmed. This deed of confirmation is signed by the archbishop, twelve bishops, and twenty-three abbots. See Johnson, Eccles. Canon.; Labbe, Concil. vii, 1148; Wilkin, Concil. i, 162.

Beccaria (or Beccarissi), Anthony de', a Dominican of Ferrara, who died in 1548 as bishop of Sosdi, in Dalmatia, is the author of Glossematica super Psalmodiam Secundam 4, Sensum: Exposito Job: — Homiliae 50 super Epistolam Canonicam Petri, etc. See Échéard, De Scripturis Ordinis Dominicano-horum; Jücher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lezikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Becci, Giovanni Battista, an Italian theologian, a native of Castiglione, entered the Benedictine order at Monte Cassino, and became abbot of Arezzo; this office he held at the time of his death, which occurred in 1668. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. He wrote, Joc Corruetis Elagius Illustrum Anachoretarum (Rome, 1662)—Vita Antonii Anagnomate Explorata ad Varias Tezenda Encomia (Padua, 1668). See Hoef ler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Becrespin, Jean du, a French theologian and miscellaneous writer, nephew of Philip of Bec, was born about 1540. On his return to France from a journey in the East, he took part in the civil wars which were so numerous at this epoch, and was wounded in 1577 under the walls of Issoire. Authorized by the king to withdraw from the service, he was provided for at the abbey of Mortimer; became bishop of St. Malo in 1599, and counsellor of the crown. He died Jan. 12, 1610, leaving Paraphrase de l'Esqueue:—Sermon, upon the Latin Pray for the Captives (Venice, 1589). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Becerra, Dominico, a Spanish preacher of the 16th century, was a native of Seville. He was made prisoner by the Moors of Algiers, and conducted to Rome. He published 12 Tratados de Controversias (Venice, 1580). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Becerra, Gasparo, a Spanish painter, sculptor, and architect, was born at Bajalsa, Andalusia, about 1529. He studied at Rome under Michael Angelo. He carved in wood images of Christ, of the Virgin, and of saints, which were among the most beautiful ornaments of the Spanish churches. He was one of the first to conceive the idea of painting statues. His chief work is the statue of the Virgin, made by order of queen Isabella of Valois, which is admired at Madrid. He left some remarkable fresco paintings. He died at Madrid in 1570. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Becerril, Alonso, a Spanish sculptor, lived near the close of the 16th century. Nearly all of his works are in silver. He made for the Cathedral of Cuenca crucifixes, reliquaries, chandeliers, and a splendid ostensorio which is admired to this day. For this last article he received 16,755 ducats, and the weight of it was 1600 marks. He left a large number of statuettes and base-reliefs, which were highly esteemed for the delicacy of their execution. The work of Becerril is largely executed in Gothic style. He is one of the masters who have contributed largely towards the restoration of architecture to its primitive simplicity. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Becerril, Francisco, brother of Alonzo, who died in 1573, and Cristobal, his son, who died in 1584, were also sculptors, and their names are mentioned in the works for the Church of St. John at Alcarnon which were very highly esteemed. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bogga (or Bogga), an Irish saint, whose day is Feb. 10. It is said by Colgan (Tr. Thom. p. 121) that when St. Patrick was in East Meath he left at the Church of Techlasen, in that county, two of his disciples, Lugnach, a priest, probably brother and sister, the children of Gauran. Near the church—door was a well and a tomb, the latter having the name of Feart-Bige, or Bega's tomb.

In 1577, one of the most noteworthy of the French literature of this epoch, has not come down to us. The author worked on it for twelve years. Geoffroy, abbot or prior of Vigeois, a contemporary author, mentions it, with some details, in his History. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Beck, Johann Tobias, one of the most prominent Protestant theologians of the 19th century, was born Feb. 28, 1814, at Balingen, in Württemberg. He studied at Tübingen; was in 1827 pastor at Waldthaun, and in 1829 teacher and preacher in Mergentheim. In 1836 he accepted a call as professor of theology at Basle, and remained there till 1845. In that year he accepted a call to Tübingen, where he remained until his death, Dec. 28, 1878. The great influence which he had exercised at Basle caused him to be honored by the Basle faculty with the doctorate of divinity when he left there for Tübingen. Greater yet was his influence in the latter place, where he was the complete antipode of Bauer, the father of the hypercritical "Tübingen school." He was most popular as a professor. All modern novelties he treated with the silence of utter contempt, professing to know nothing but the Bible as the book of life. His writings are very numerous. Thus he wrote, Versuch einer punitivisch-hermeneutischen Entwickelung des neuesten Kirchbuchs im Briefe an die Römer (Mergentheim, 1833); — Christliche Reden (Stuttgart, 1834-60, 6 vols.); — Einleitung in das System christlicher Lehre (ibid. 1838, 1870); — Liesunden der christl. Glaubenslehre (ibid. 1869); — Gedanken aus und nach der Schrif (Tübingen, 1868); — Über die wissenschaftliche Behandlung der christl. Lehre (ibid. 1865); — Übers der biblischen Seelenlehre (Stuttgart, 1871); — Eng. transl. Oubles (6th ed. London, 1871); — Erklärung der zwei Briefe Pauli an Timotheus (edited by Julius Lindemann, Gütersloh, 1879), etc. See Zschold, Bibl. theol. i. 87 sq.; Worte der Erinnerung an Dr. Johann Tobias Beck (Tübingen, 1879). He graduated at Marshall College in 1848, and pursued the regular course of study at Mercersburg Theological Seminary until 1850, when he was licensed to preach. He first served the Funkstown charge, Md. In 1854 he accepted a call to the Third-street Reformed Church in Easton, Pa., where he continued to labor earnestly and efficiently until his death, April 15, 1877. He stood high among the ministry of his denomination, having filled various positions of trust and responsibility, and being at the time of his death the president of the Mother Synod. He was an able, though not a great, preacher. He possessed a broad, catholic spirit, and a modest, retiring disposition. His well-stored mind, comprehensive, life, genuine piety of feeling, warmth of affection, and unceasing pastoral care, rendered him an efficient servant of his Master. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church, v. 278.

Beck, John (2), a Moravian missionary, was born at Creuzendorf, Upper Silesia, June 7, 1706. He was converted in 1731; was cast into a dungeon of the castle of Suppau in 1732, because of his refusal to recant the religious principles which he had imbibed; and shortly after escaping therefrom he made his way to Herrnhut, Upper Lusatia. Here he found a congregation of the United Brethren which, like itself, had formed a voluntary association; and his election proceeded as a missionary to Greenland, March 10, 1734, arriving on Aug. 19. He afterwards paid several visits to his native country, at the first of which he was ordained a deacon of the Brethren's Church. In 1759 he returned from his last European visit to his station at New Herrnhut, where he remained till 1761, when he removed to Lichtenfels, at which place he died, March 19, 1777. Mr. Beck was an humble, earnest Christian, thoroughly devoted to his work, and successful in the accomplishment of much good among those whom he served in the Gospel. See The (N. Y.) Christian Herald 1821, p. 695. (B. P.)

Beck, Matthias Friedrich, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Kaufbeuren, May 23, 1749. He studied at Jena; was in 1769 deacon, and in 1769 pastor, of the Church of the Holy Ghost at Augsburg, where he died, Feb. 2, 1701. He is best known by his Targum seu Paraphrasis Chaldaica in 1 et 2 Librum Chronicorum cum Versione Latina et Notis (Augsburg, 1680-83); which A. B. Rahm used in his Targum zu Chronik (Thorn, 1866). See Winer, Handb. der theolog. Lit. i. 53; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i. 95; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lezikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Beck, Michael, a Protestant theologian and Hebraist of Germany, was born at Ulm, Jan. 14, 1653. After having studied at Jena, he devoted himself, under the direction of a rabbin who had become Christianized, to the study of the Oriental languages and of philosophy; and from 1674 he himself prepared lectures in philology, and, like most of the learned Germans, he travelled, resorting to Jena, then to Strasburg. On his return he was made professor of Hebrew. At the same time he undertook pastoral functions, which he performed under various titles at Munster and Erlangen. He died March 10, 1712. Some of his principal works are, Disputatio de Judaorum Phylacteribus (Jena, 1675, 1684); — Disputatio de Duplici Accautentie Decalogi; de Acceuntium Hebraorum Us Musico, in the Theosaurus Dissectionum Theologiae, vol. i. —De Firmamentis Hebr. published about 1707. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Generale, s. v. (B. P.)

His ordination in 1855 took place at New Providence Church in Warren County. The churches he served during a ministry of thirty-seven years were in Warren, McDuffie, and several other counties of Georgia. He had, at the time of his death, the pastoral oversight of four churches. He died in Warren County, Ga., Sept. 2, 1862. "He was very successful in winning souls to Jesus, and building up and strengthening the churches he served; and, according to his talents and education, few have done more for the denomination in Georgia than he." See Baptist Encyclopedia, p. 92. (J. C. S.)

He thereafter studied at Halle and Berlin, and for some years labored among the Jews in connection with the London Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews. In 1844 he accepted a call to the pastorate at Pinne, in the duchy of Posen; and in 1849 he accepted a call to Königsberg, in the Neumark. He devoted the latter part of his life entirely to the mission among the Jews, and died Jan. 23, 1874, at Ludwigsalut. He followed out the maxim of the great apostle, and became a Jew unto the Jews. His writings are given by Zuchold, Bibl. theol. i. 88. (B. P.)

Bedia, See Beatus; Bede; Blesin.

Beda, Natalis (or Nokl), a French theologian, was a native of Picardy, being born in the diocese of Avranches near the close of the 15th century. He was principal of the College of Montaigu, at Paris, in 1502; and syndic of the faculty of theology about 1530. He was opposed to all and every kind of reform. In 1521 he obtained from the Sorbonne a condemnation of the writings of J. F. Stapelensis. He chiefly distinguished himself by his opposition to the wish of the king, Francis I, to obtain the sanction of the Sorbonne to the divorce of Henry VIII of England. So far did Beda carry matters, that he was arrested in 1536, condemned to make the amende honorable in the Church of Notre-Dame, and was sent prisoner to Mont Saint-Michel, where he died in the following year. He wrote against Erasmus, who answered in a rejoinder, entitled Supportiones Errorum in Censurae Natalis Bede; and in which he accused Bede of 181 lies, 310 calumnies, and 47 blasphemies. Beda also wrote, De Unico Magno dulce (Paris, 1519), —Dolia Apologia pro Fidelibus et Nepotibus Ammonis (1529); —Contra Gratam in Evangelio Lib. ii (ibid. 1529); —In Erasmi Paraphrases (ibid.): — Apologia adversus Clandestinos Lutheranos (ibid. 1529). Bedawi (plur. Bedaenin, French Bedainin) is the Arabic term for a dyer, who is engaged in the textile industry, in distinction from the fellahin, or fixed cultivators of the soil. See ARABIA.

Beddome, Benjamin, an English Baptist minister, was born Jan. 23, 1771. His father being also a Baptist minister, he was baptized in London in 1788, and in 1746 became pastor of a Church in Bourton-on-the-Water. Some time after, when he had a small congregation, he removed into the West, and was one of the first converts who heard the gospel in the South of England. He died at Evesham, October 24, 1818, aged 47. His son, Mr. W. Beddome, a lawyer in London, has his recovery from which he wrote a hymn found in some collections, commencing, "If I must die, oh, let me die / Trusting in Jesus' blood!"

His ability as a preacher attracted the attention of the Church in London with which, on his conversion, he had connected himself, and they vainly endeavored to obtain him as a minister, as a successor to Mr. Beddome, who had died. Mr. Beddome remained in his pastorate at Burton till his death, Sept. 5, 1795. A volume of his hymns was published in 1818, with a preface by Robert Hall, who says, "The man of taste will be gratified with the beautiful and original thoughts which many of them display, and the reverence with which the Christian will often perceive the most sweet movements of his soul strikingly delineated, and sentiments portrayed which will find their echo in every heart." See Belcher, Historical Sketches of Hymns, p. 88-87. (J. C. S.)

Bede (a prayer). Bede-roll was a catalogue or list of the departed, who were prayed for every Sunday from the pulpit. Bedemon (or peculiar) is a prayer-man, one who says prayer for a patron or founder, hence an almsman. In all the cathedrals of the New Foundation, there are several bedesmen on the Foundation, who wear the Tudor rose on their breast, and serve as bell-ringers and assistant-vergers. Beads of jet were regarded as having virtue to help, beads of mystyll were said to restrict conceit and nrar, beads of alabaster and times of stone, and, in England, often called a pair of paternosters, or, by the common folk, peculiar, or Ave-beads. A belt of paternosters is ordered to be said at the death of a bishop in the English Council of Caerlewythe, of the 9th century. Abbot Paul, who inhabited the deserts of Egypt, according to St. Jerome, recited the same prayer three hundred times a day, and counted them by means of an equal number of little stones, like the cubes used in mosaic work, which he kept in a fold of his robe, and cast away one by one. In a painting of the 11th century, representing the burial of St. Ephraem, the monks carry chaplets in their hands, or suspended at their girdles. Alan, archbishop of Meath, in the 16th century, says that such crowns lasted in England from the time of the Bede until the 7th century, and were hung upon church-walls for public use. The famous lady Godiva, of Coventry, according to William of Malmesbury, possessed a threaded chain of jewels, used by her at prayer-time, as a necklace to St. Mary's image. A similar chaplet is mentioned in the Life of St. Gertrude, in the 7th century. Most probably Peter the Hermit, about 1090, introduced the fashion with the Hours of our Lady among the Crusaders, having seen the beads of the Mohammedans. The Indians use beads, and the Jews have a chaplet called Meuk Berakoth. The ascription of the chaplet to Venerable Bede is no doubt due to the similarity of name; but St. Dominic, in 1290, may be regarded as the author of the permanent use of the beads. The Rosary is a modern name.
The Lady Psalter consisted of fifteen Paternosters, and a hundred and fifty Ave; the latter representing the Psalms of David, in place of which they were recited. The name of bede was transferred to the knobs on the prayer-belts, and when pilgrims from the East introduced chaplets and seeds of stone, the beads strung upon a string, which were used in place of a girdle, studded with bosses or notched on the part which trailed upon the ground. "Hail Mary" was unknown till 1229 or 1235, and then was used simply in the Anglican Salutation (Luke i, 38-42). Urban IV, in 1261-64, added the last of the works to "Jesus Christ," but the prayer or invocation is barely three hundred years old. See Beads.

Bede. Beside Bede the Venerable and Bede рожд (q. v.), there were three others. (1) A name occurring in the pedigree of the kings of Lindisfar, as father to Bishop. See Benedictus Bisop. (2) Beda Major, a priest mentioned by Bede himself as present with St. Cuthbert at his death. His epitaph, written by his pupil Suing, is given by Mabillon, Annales ed. nov. p. 381. He fixes the date at A.D. 681, Feb. 9; but as Cuthbert died soon after this, in 687, the epitaph must belong to another Bede. (3) A monk contemporary with Charles the Great. Mabillon (Itatitulium, p. 144), gives an epitaph of a certain Juves Romanus as buried formerly in the Church of St. Peter at Rome; and Ware refers to Raphael of Volaterra for the story that his tomb was at Genoa. A Life of Beda junior, who died at Genoa about 833, is given in the Acta SS. Boll. April, i, 687-673.

Bede, the Venerable, Hymna of. At the end of his Ecclesiastical History of the English Nation, Bede gave a list of his numerous writings up to the year 731. In the list we find Liber Hymnorum Diversa Metra sive Rhymo, and Liber Epigrammatis Heroico Metra sive Elepticus. But both are lost, hence it is difficult to decide which of the eleven hymns generally ascribed to Bede really belong to him. The longest of his hymns, says the author of Christian Life in Song, p. 140 sq., "is a comparison of the six days of creation with six ages of the world; the sixth day, in which Adam was created, corresponding to the sixth age, in which he by whom man was created himself became man—when, as Eve was formed out of the side of the sleeping Adam, the bride of Christ also was raised to life through him who slept in death upon the cross. The seventh age was, Bede believed, to be the age of quietness, when Christ shall command the Sabbath, and keep it with his own; and the eighth age is to be sublime above all the ages, when the dead of the earth shall arise and the just shall see forever the face of Christ, and be like the angels on the heavenly heights." The best-known of his hymns are:

- "Hymnum canumus gloriam, Hymni novi nunc personent, Qui tenebras nouo cum transtulit, Ad patrias escuditi thronum;"

or in Mrs. Charles's translation:

- "A hymn of glory let us sing; New hymns throughout the world shall ring; By a new route never trod, Christ muniteth to the throne of God."

This hymn treats of the ascension of Christ. Another is for the holy innocents, viz.:

- "Hymnum canentes martyrum Dilamus innocucent, Quae terræ fluentes perdidit, Gaudens sed aethra sanculit. Vultum patria ter secuica, Hoc terrae tur angusti, Rimaque laudant Gratiam Hymnum canentes martyrum;"

or in Dr. Neale's translation:

- "The hymn for conquering martyrs raise: The victor Innocents we praise; Whom in their woe earth cast away, But heaven with joy received to-day."
tled to the Troy Conference in 1848. His ministry of thirty-three years was within the bounds of the Troy Conference, and included seventeen different appointments. On Jan. 23, 1891, he was stricken down with paralytic apoplexy and remained incapable of conscious until his death, four days later. He was unselish, possessing a rich Christian experience, diligent in his labors, and many were converted under his ministry. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1881, p. 93.

Bederan, (1) a hospital; (2) an ancient name for the dwelling-house or room of the chancel in a religious community; (3) a residence for bedmen.

Bederic, Henriq, (surnamed Burj, from his birthplace, Burj, in Surrey), an English writer and theologian, was an Augustinian monk, and lived about 1380. He gave himself to preaching, and also wrote several works, among which are Questions Theologicae:—Commentarius in Magistram Sententiarum:—Sermones per Annurn de B. Virginie. See Chalmers, Biog. Bedeford, Hilkiah, an English clergyman, was born in London, in 1563. He educated at Marlborough College, at Cambridge, and at St. John's College, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow. For refusing to take the oaths at the Revolution he was ejected from his prebend in Lincolnshire, and he afterwards kept a boarding-house for the Westminster scholars. In 1714 he was fined one hundred marks and imprisoned three years for writing, printing, and publishing The Hereditary Right of the Crown of England Asserted (1718, fol.); the real author of which was George Harbin, another nonjuring clergyman. Bedeford translated An Answer to Fontenelle's History of Oracles, and The Life of Dr. Barrow; and published A Vindication of the Church of England (1710), and some other works. He died Nov. 26, 1724. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Bedeord, John, a distinguished English Wesleyan minister, was born at Rothwell, Wakefield, July 27, 1810. He was received into the ministry in 1831; was appointed assistant secretary to the General Chapel Committee in 1835; succeeded Wm. Kelk as general secretary in 1860; retired from office 1873; was appointed secretary to the Board of Trustees for Chapel Purposes in that year; was elected president of the Conference in 1867; and died at Charleston-cum-Hardy, near Manchester, Nov. 20, 1879. Mr. Bedeord's diligence and punctuality were unflagging. His energy was felt in all the duties of his official life. He was a steady debater, sometimes appearing hard and exacting. For many years he was writer of the official Conference letters, and one of the assistant secretaries of the Conference. He published Letters on Doctrines and Systems of the Wesleyan Methodists (Bolton, 1845), against the reform movement in that connection; and Funeral Sermons for the Duke of Wellington (Stockport, 1852) and Rev. Dr. Newton (ibid. 1854). See Minutes of the British Conference, 1840, p. 17.

Bee, Edward, a distinguished English clergyman, son of Hilkiah Bedeord, was educated at Westminster School and St. John's College, Cambridge, where he was junior wrangler, Dec. 9, 1790. Being a nonjuror, he never took a degree in the church but gained an entrance into orders in his own party, officiated among them in Derbyshire, fixing his residence at Compton, near Ashbourne. He died at Compton in Feb. 1778. He edited Simeon of Durham's De Exordio atque Procuras Durhamensis Ecclesia (printed by subscription, 1782). He also published a Historical Register (2d ed. 1826). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

BEEBE, Edmund Murphy, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Springfield, Mass., April 24, 1805. He was converted at the age of eighteen; in 1829 he entered the New England Conference, and in it did valiant service until his death, March 19, 1845. Mr. Beebe passed his declining years in a pleasant home. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1846, p. 616.

Beebe, Warner, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Solon, Cortland Co., N. Y., about 1810. His father removed to Canandaigua, N. Y., in 1812, and to Liverpool, Medina Co., O., in 1823. The son was converted in 1825, licensed to preach by the Stroupsville Quarterly Meeting in March, 1830, and ordained Dec. 11, 1833. He died at Liverpool, Oct. 6, 1854. Mr. Beebe is said to have been a man of much decision of character, diligent, faithful, and prompt in the discharge of his duties. During the twenty years he labored in the ministry, he sacrificed much and suffered many privations. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1856, p. 67. (J. C. S.)

Beech, Hoon, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Chesterton, near Newcastle-under-Lyme, June 3, 1787. He was cheerful, buoyant, generous, simple, beloved, an able preacher and faithful pastor. He conducted the singing in Conference for twenty years. See Life, by his son, Rev. John H. Beech (London, 1856); Minutes of the British Conference, 1856.

Beecer, Elijah Parkes, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Bensselsaule, N. Y., Dec. 7, 1810. He experienced conversion when about twenty-five, and in 1840 entered the Oneida Conference. After fifty years of laborious service, he was transferred (1855) to the Wisconsin Conference. In 1865 he was appointed agent of the American Bible Society, which office he held with credit four years, and then retired from all stated service, but held himself ready for voluntary work whenever health and opportunity afforded a chance, until his decease, Nov. 3, 1867. Mr. Beecher was very earnest and enthusiastic, never allowing a winter to pass without gathering in many from the ranks of sin, through extra revival services. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1878, p. 67.

Beecher, John Sydney, a Baptist minister, was born at Hinesburg, Vt., in 1820. Having completed his literary and theological education, he received an appointment as missionary to Borneo. In 1856 he commenced his labors in Arracan, where he remained for ten years. He then dissolved his connection with the Missionary Union. He subsequently came under the auspices of the Free Mission Society, and occupied himself in the work of preparing young men for the Christian ministry. On account of failing health, he left the field of his labor with the intention of returning to the United States, but died in England, Oct. 22, 1866. See Appleton's Annual Cyclop. vi, 579. (J. C. S.)

Beeck, Jan (1), a Flemish painter, was born at Loos, and was a monk of the Convent of St. Lawrence, near Liége, of which he became the abbot in 1555. He died in 1516. Beck, Johann Martin, a Protestant theologian, of Germany, was born at Lübeck, Dec. 2, 1665. He studied at Wittenberg and Jena; and in 1668 was called as pastor to Kurslack, near Lübeck, where he died, Sept. 7, 1727. He wrote, Disputatio de Plagio Divinae Prafor a trifle, not considering it of any great value. Since then many antiquarians, to whom impressions were sent, have pronounced the device an image of Beezel-bub, the great Fly-god, and the only one ever discovered. He is of the Osiris type, with short beard and four wings. In his hands he holds two apes or monkeys, denoting, perhaps, his office as 'prince of devils' (De Haas, Travels in Bible Lands, p. 424).

Beeman, Jacob, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Kent, Conn., March 12, 1780, of pious Baptist parents. He joined the Methodists in the morning of life; was licensed to preach in 1808; and in 1809 entered the New York Conference, wherein he labored twenty-six consecutive years. He then retired from active service, and finally died of paralysis, Feb. 15, 1868. He won the highest esteem of all. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1868, p. 99.

Beers, Bernard, a Jewish writer, was born at Amsdorf, Saxony, Jan. 20, 1801. Being the son of a wealthy family, he received an excellent education in the Bible and the Talmud, as well as in modern languages. In Mendelssohn's writings he found a great delight; and he regarded him as his example in life. He especially labored in behalf of his co-religionists, whose cause he always tried to advance. He founded societies for the benefit of his brethren, and contributed many valuable works to Jewish literature. In 1834 he took the degree of doctor of philosophy, and he was the first who preached in German in his native country. He died July 1, 1861. Beer, Johann, a German visionary, born at Schweidnitz, in Silesia, raised quite a tumult on account of the spirits he claimed to have seen upon the Riesengebirge. He painted these beings and published them in Loci theo- lischer undirdischer Güter (Leipsic, 1659). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Beersheba. The last person who has carefully examined this locality is lient, Condor, who thus describes it (Tent-work in Palestine, ii, 94 sq.).

'The scenery was tame and featureless, with a single dark tell in front, and white marl peaks capped with flint to the west.... We ascended the tell or mound of Seba, which is two and a half miles east of the wells of Beer-sheba, and there we had a fine view of the great boundary valley which limited our work on the south, joining the long ravine which comes down from Hebron, and running west in a broad flat, gravelly bed, between high walls of brown earth. The pebbles were white and dry, yet water-worn, for, as we found in the following spring, a river will occasionally flow for hours along the muddy bed. East of us were remarkable chalk-hills called el-Ghurrah, and on the west a low ridge bent out the maritime plain. To the north were the hills of Judah, dotted with houses—trees; and to the south stretched the endless desert of the Jezreel valley. The depression of the land is a beautiful pasture-land in spring, when the grass and flowers cover the gray mud, as in the Jordan valley; but in November is desolate. No vegetation exists, but the hollies and the wells, and only the foundation of a once flourishing town of the 4th century remain.... The sides of all the wells are flanked with the shaggy forms of the acacia, and we made one discovery which was rather disappointing—namely, that the masonry is not very ancient. Fifteen courses of stone are preserved with the bases of the columns; but we made one discovery which was rather disappointing—namely, that the masonry is not very ancient. Fifteen courses of stone are preserved with the bases of the columns; but the structure is a stone with an inscription in Arabic, on a tablet dated, as well as to the south of Mount A. H. 626, or about the 12th centu-ry. The stone must be at least as old as those at the mouth. The wells have no parapets.' See Will.
Canon Tristram thus describes the ancient remains on the north of the wady (Bible Places, p. 22):

"Long lines of foundations mark the ancient city, or rather village—a very large, unwalls place with a garriso. The ruins are about half a mile in extent, but scattered, and include the foundations of a Greek church, withapse, sacristy, and stables. Only a fragment of the apse remains above the pavement, although in the 14th century some of the churches were still standing. . . . Among the ruins are the traces of a Jewish fortress—a circular tower or keep of double walls, each four feet thick, and with a like space between them. There are many fragments of pottery strewn about, with occasional bits of glass, and the squares or 'tesserae' of Roman mosaics."

Bega (Beza, Beysa, Begga, or Bee), Sr., a Cumbrian virgin of whom nothing is clearly known. According to Alban Butler (Sept. 6), she was an Irish virgin, an ancestress of the 7th century, and founded a monastery in Copeland. He also mentions a place in Scotland called Kilbees after her. According to the life of her seen by Leland (Col. iii, 96), after founding her monastery in Cumberland, she founded another north of the Wear; then went to Hert, where she becomes identical with St. Hau, and then to Tadcaster; winding up her career at Hackness, as identical with St. Begu. The Aberdeen Breviary contains lessons for two saints, with either of whom she might be identified.

(1.) St. Beza, venerated at Dunbar, who lived on the island of Cumbria, where she was visited by St. Maura, and dying, Sept. 3, was buried on her island. The recto of Dunbar, attempting to remove her remains, was driven back by a storm.

(2.) St. Begga, an Irish princess, who, married against her will, fled to Oswald and Aidan in England, and became the first abbess of nuns in England. She lived on a desert island, and in old age resigned her abbacy to St. Hilda, under whose rule she ended her days, Oct. 31. After four hundred and sixty years her remains were removed to Whithby. Here are perhaps some reminiscences of St. Hein. She was probably a local saint of the 8th century. The monastery bearing her name was founded as a cell to St. Mary's at York, in the reign of Henry I. Under the name St. Begha she is honored at Kilbagie and Kilbue, in Scotland; but her greatest foundation was at St. Bee's, which takes its name from her. It was founded in A.D. 656. In treating of the Anglo-Saxon nuns, Montalembert, Monks of the West, deals with the difficulties connected with St. Begha, but does not decide whether the traditions do not really belong to two or more individuals.

Begah, St. See Begha.

Bega, Karl, a German painter, was born at Heinsberg, near Aix-la- Chapelle, Sept. 30, 1794. He studied first under Philippart, and then went to Paris, where he continued his studies under Gros. Among his earlier works was a Madame du Seda, which attracted the attention of the Prussian king, and gained for the artist the position of painter to the Prussian court. He died in Berlin, Nov. 24, 1854. Among his best works are, Henry IV. at the Castle of Canossa; The Sermon on the Mount; and Christ on the Mount of Olives.

Begaunl, Giles, a French preacher, was born in 1660. He was canon and archdeacon of his native city. His contemporaries compare him to Fleacher for eloquence. He died at Nismes about 1715. He wrote, Panégyriques et Sermons sur les Mystères, avec des Discours Académiques, des Compliments et des Lettres (Paris, part i, ii, 1711; part iii, 1717; part iv, 1727). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Begle, an Irish saint, son of Tigermach—commemorated Oct. 12—descended from Conall Galban, was related to St. Columba, and lived at the close of the 6th century. He was brother of St. Conan-dill.

Begelmir, in Scandinavian mythology, was the last of the ice-giants. He escaped destruction in the blood of Ymir, wherein all his brethren were drowned, by building a ship in which he and his wife took refuge. After the reconstruction of the earth, he repeopled it.

Begoman, Augustus L. W., a German Reformed minister, was born July 14, 1810, at Brenerlehe, kingdom of Hanover, in North Germany, and emigrated to America in 1833. He was licensed to preach by the Classis of West Pennsylvania, at Pittsburgh, and ordained to the ministry, April 30, 1834. From this time until 1886, he served several congregations in Ohio. He continued in this field of labor for four years, when he removed to Wayne County, Ohio, and there took charge of nine congregations. In 1843 he preached at Columbus for a German congregation. His health failing him, he was obliged to give up his charge. Begh (or Le Béguè), LaMhurt, priest of the diocese of Lige, is often recognized as the founder of the Béguines (q. v.). He preached with zeal against the disorders of the clergy, especially against simony, which particularly irritated the ecclesiastical body. Ralph, bishop of Liege, who carried on this as a scandalous extent, arrested Begh, and imprisoned him for a long time at the chateau of Rivogne; then conveyed him to Rome, in order to make it appear that he had been guilty of preaching without authority. Pope Al- exander III, informed of these motives, received Begh honorably, and permitted him to return to his country, with all the necessary power to exercise freely the functions of his office. On his return from Rome, he assembled all the daughters and widows in order to form a religious order. These were called Béguines. They were first established at Neville, in Brabant, whence they spread to Flanders, Holland, and Germany. Begh died in 1177.

According to others, this person was a French so-called heretic, who lived near the close of the 13th century. He is said to have taught that man in this life is capable of perfection, by which he probably meant a state of entire Christian purity. He refused to worship the popish hosts, and, according to his enemies, opposed the practice of the popular acts of piety. His doctrines were condemned at the Council of Vienna in 1311. Behram, in Persian mythology, is the Izd of fire, the king of all beings, with a shining body, the assistant of Ahrilbehest against the Deos. Behram appears in all possible forms, and is represented as the all-penetrating, ever-moving, all-empowering power. In the form of the wind, he loosens the fetters of winter; as a bull, he crushes the evil with his power; as a ram the noblest Oriental symbol, he is represented as adorned with golden ears and horns; as a lamb (a symbol of abundance), he represents the wealth of pastoral peo-

Beiram, a Turkish or Persian word meaning feast, is the name applied to the two great Mohammedan festivals. The first of these, called generally the Greater Beiram, is the day following the Ramadan, or month of fasting. It lasts strictly for only one day, though the common people generally extend it to three, and is a period of great animation and enjoyment. What is called commonly the Lesser Beiram follows the first at an interval of sixty days. It is the feast of sacrifices, at which all Mohammedans imitate the offerings of animals which are then being made at Mecca to commemorate Abraham's offering of Isaac. It lasts four days, and is not of so sacred a character as the first Beiram. See Encyclopedia Britannica (9th ed.), s. v.

Beit-Allah (Arabic, the house of God), the appellation given by the Mohammedans to the Temple of Mecca, which is remarkable for the Kaaba (q. v.). The temple of Mecca forms a very spacious square, about a quarter of a mile in each direction, with a triple or quadruple row of columns. A number of steps lead down into the interior, in which stands the Kaaba or house of the prophet, and with it the black stone brought down by the angel Gabriel to form its foundation. In the Koran, Mohammed says, "We have established a house or temple as a means whereby men may acquire great merit." Such is the veneration in which Beit-Allah is held by the Mohammedans, that all sorts of criminals are safe within it, and the very sight of its walls from a distance imparts merit to a man. The ancient Arabsians were accustomed to adorn this building by inscribing on the outside of it the works of their most distinguished poets, written in letters of gold or silk. The Mohammedans have always covered its walls and roof with rich brocades of silk and gold, formerly furnished by the caliphs, and afterwards by the governors of Egypt. The mosque or temple has nineteen gates, and is adorned in its interior with seven minarets, irregularly distributed. The Mohammedans, in whatever part of the world they may be, must pray with their faces towards the Beit-Allah at Mecca, which they call Kab- lah (q. v.).

1613, when he was expelled from the Kirk and sat until 1638, when he was excommunicated with the rest of his order by the wild assembly at Glasgow.

He went to England and died soon after. See Keith,

Bellenghi (and not Bellenchhi), Filippo Maria Albertini, an Italian prelate and learned Camaldolese, was born at Fortimpeoli (and not at Forlì), Sept. 22, 1758. Having received the degree of doctor of theology and of canonical law at Rome, he was successively rector of the parishes of Faenza and Perugia, abbot of Sassoferato and of Avellana. At last Bellenghi became procurator-general of his order, and Leon XII appointed him archbishop of Nicomedia, and made him apostolic visitor of the orders of friars in Sardinia.
He died March 2, 1839. Besides many of his works which remain in MS, we notice, De Veritate ac Di-vinitate Sacra Magnorum Historia, Dissertatio His-

Belle-Percy, Perre de, a French prelate and statesman, was born of very obscure parentage at Lacenai, in Nivernais. He was first doctor regent in civil law at Orleans, then councillor of Parliament.
Philip the Fair especially drew him into intimate relations with himself about 1296, and confided to him many important missions. Belle-Percy had charge of the negotiations of Flanders in 1301, then was sent to England, and afterwards to Rome. He negotiated for the treaty of peace of Amiens in 1302, between France and England. In 1305 he returned to Rome, and in 1306 was sent to the archbishop of Bor-duen, who became pope under the name of Clement V, and accompanied him to Italy. In 1306 his important services gained for him the bishopric of Aixerre and the title of chancellor of France. He was well-versed in canonical law, and was one of the principal officials of Philip the Fair, and took an important part in the enterprises of this prince, who passed a great part of his life in contest against the spiritual power.

Bellerophon (or Bellerophontes), in Greek mythology, was the son of the Corinthian king Glaucus and of Eurymele. He unintentionally killed his brother, and therefore fled to king Pratos, in Argos. But as the latter's wife became enamoured of him, and he did not favor her love, she accused him to her husband of evil intentions and violence to her person. The king did not care to avenge himself on his guest, but sent him with a letter to his wife's father, Jobates, king of Lycia, asking him to execute Bellerophon. Jobates likewise refused to kill him as a guest, but exposed him to dangers to which he might fall a victim. The deities stood by him because of his innocence, and sent him the winged horse Pegasus (q. v.), by the aid of which he subjected the Solymi, an Asiatic nation, the Amazons,

and the Chimæra (q. v.). Jobates was so touched there- by that he gave Bellerophon his daughter Philonœ as a wife, and appointed him his successor. His end was not so happy as his life. The deities, out of envy; began to hate him, and threw him from his Pegasæ; lame, he wandered about lonely and sad, in bitter anguish of heart fleeing the paths of men. Philonœ bore him three children, Isander, Hippolochus, and a daughter Laodamia. Mars slew the first in a battle; Diana robbed him of his daughter; but Hippolochus inherited his father’s kingdom.

Bellet, Charles, a French ecclesiastical writer, was born at Quercy in 1702, and became prebendary of the Cathedral of Montauban. He had great success in preaching, but, being silenced through the enmity of the Jesuits, he gave himself to literary labors. His principal works are L’Amodation Chrétienne (Montauban, 1754)—Des Droits de la Religion (ibid, 1764). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bell-gable (Bell-turret, or Bell-coat). In small churches and chapels that have no towers there is very frequently a bell-gable or turret at the west end in which the bells are hung; sometimes these contain but one bell, sometimes two, and occasionally three, as at Raddipole, near Weymouth. A few of these erections may be of Norman date, but the greater number are later; many of them are Early English, in which style they appear to have been very frequent. Besides the bell-gables above referred to, there is often found a smaller erection of very similar kind on the apex of the eastern end of the roof of the nave. This is for the sancte-bell (q. v.).

Belli, Francesco (1), an Italian theologian and scholar, was born in 1577, at Arzignano, in Vicentin. He travelled in France and Holland, and died in 1644. He wrote, La Caterina d’Alessandria, a tragedy in verse (Verona, 1621, 1622, 1660) — L’Esquilsi del Redentore, Sacra Rappresentazione, in Prosa (Venice, 1653) — L’Osservazioni di Fr. Belli ne’ suoi Viaggi d’Olanda e di Francia (Venice, 1632). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Belli, Francesco (2), an Italian theologian, perhaps brother of the preceding, of the Order of Francis- cans, a native of Siccna, in Sicily, lived about 1600. He wrote Libro della Verità Chiristiana, ed quale s’ap-Bellino, or Bellini, an Italian painter little known, of the Venetian school, lived about 1500. He painted the Madonnas which are ordinarily attributed to Gentile and Giovanni Bellini, the style of which he imitated perfectly. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bellisomì, Carlo, an Italian prelate, was born at Pavia, Oct. 30, 1736. He was made cardinal in 1765 by Pius VI., and was sent, in 1801, by Pius VII. to the Congress of Lyons, where he showed himself favorable to the project of forming the kingdom of Italy. Napoleon, in evidence of his satisfaction, sent him a snuff-box ornamented with his portrait. Bellisomì died Aug. 9, 1808. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bellman, Henry Wise, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Lecoming County, Pa., March 11, 1824. He experienced religion when about sixteen; soon afterwards received license to preach; and entered the Baltimore Conference. His health failed in 1853, and in 1856 he took a local relation. He studied law and practiced it until 1859, when he again entered the itineracy, and toiled cheerfully and with great energy until his death, in 1860. Mr. Bellman was an earnest, faithful, exemplary Christian. See Proceedings of Annual Conference of the M. E. Church South, 1860, p. 238.

Bello, Marco, an Italian painter of the first period of the Venetian school, was a native of Argiveta, and lived about the middle of the 15th century. He painted The Circumcision of our Lord, at Rovigo. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bellochìo, Pietro, an Italian theologian of the order of Regular Franciscans, a native of Accona, lived near the middle of the 17th century. His principal works are, Exercitii Spirituali (Venice, 1625) — Annunziamenti e Istruzioni per i Giovani Scolari che Desiderano Passare allo Stato Religioso (Rome, 1650). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bellgrandi, Richard. See Bellgrandi.

Bellôna, in Greek and Roman mythology, was the sister of Mars, or his nurse, or his wife, or daughter, the goddess of war. When Mars went to the battle-field, she prepared for him his wagon and his horses. Her temple in Rome was greatly celebrated; the senate, by a decree of 107 B.C., raised it to the dignity of a church. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bellomarti, the priests of Bellona (q. v.), who were employed in offering sacrifices to her mingled with a portion of their own blood. Hence March 24, the day consecrated to this goddess, was called the day of blood.

Belloni, Giovanni, an Italian theologian and jurist, was canon of Padua, and taught with honor moral philosophy in this place. He died in 1623. He wrote Discorsi Incorso nelle Minne, Napoleone, Impresa degli Ricchi Arauti di Padova (Padua, 1601). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bellows, Henry Whitney, D.D., an eminent Unitarian divine, was born in Boston, June 11, 1814. His ancestors were among the early colonists of Massachusetts Bay. The name is "said to be French in origin, and the French spelling to be Bellows." Tradition assigns the same origin to the New England family of Bellin. Dr. Bellows's great-grandfather was the Bellows from whom Bellows Falls, Vt., takes its name. John Bellows, the father of Dr. Bellows, was an eminent merchant of Boston. Losing his mother at the age of seven years, he was sent to a boarding-school at Jamaica Plains, near Boston. After spending a year at two as a precocious boy, he was sent into the service of Mr. Walpole, where he remained a year. Subsequently he spent four years at the celebrated school conducted by Dr. Cogswell and George Bancroft, at Round Hill, Mass. He embodied his grateful reminiscences of this seminar in a paper contributed to The Harvard Register. He entered the Divinity School in 1825, and graduated in 1826. He was ordained in 1827. "He was a delicate boy. I have heard him say that he was indisposed to the sports of boys, shy and timid, small for his age, extremely sensitive to blame, rather dreamy and solitary, homesick at school and at college." He was only fourteen when he entered college, but so well advanced was he that he had small occasion for study; and during two years he studied very little, but passed his days often in the practical pursuit of ornithology, in company with Mr. Nuttall, the naturalist, in the neighboring fields and marshes. After his entrance upon his junior year he read more and studied harder. He became also interested in religious matters, for which his natural proclivity, it was stated that when only seven years old he had resolved to be a clergyman. After graduation, Dr. Bellows occupied a year as an assistant in a school for girls kept by his brother John, at Cooperstown, N. Y., teaching French, German, Italian, Greek, and mathematics. He then entered the Divinity School at Cambridge, leaving it to go to Louisiana as the tutor of a young gentleman named Baldwin. His father, through commercial reverses, had lost his wealth, and the son desired to support himself. He returned to Cambridge in 1855, and completed the course at the Divinity School, supporting himself by teachable private pupils. After his graduation in divinity he went to take charge of a congregation at Mobile, Ala. As he proceeded to this station, he preached in various Southern cities. At Mobile his preaching met with considerable success, but Dr. Hals says that "the awful shadow of slavery frightened him away." Soon after his return to the North, Dr. Bellows was invited to become pastor of the First Congregational Church (Unitarian) in Chambers Street, New York. The salary offered him was not large, yet he accepted the invitation and went vigorously to his work. He was ordained in 1856, and kept his position until the day of his death, a period of forty-four years. During this time the Church, always growing, received the first to Broadway, and afterwards to the Church of All Souls. This success was attained only by hard work, by extraordinary devotion to the duties of his calling, and by a perseverance which overcame every obstacle. As a pastor he had few superiors; in his pulpit work he was popular. He died Jan. 30, 1892.

Few men were more widely or more favorably known in New York than Dr. Bellows. He was eminently social, and his was a familiar and friendly face and speech at all times and upon all public occasions. He was naturally gregarious, and liked to feel himself near to the current of passing events and contemporary interests. When the War of the Rebellion broke out, Dr. Bellows suggested the Sanitary Commission, and he became its president. At first the Commission confined itself to distributing valuable tracts, but the scope of its operations was soon enlarged. It received generous gifts from wealthy people, and the poor gave all they could. It established hospital transports, wagons, ambulances, railway ambulance-cars. It aided the transportation of the wounded soldier from the battle-field to the hospital. On the railroads it had its hospital cars, kitchens, dispensaries, and surgeons' cars. It had its sanitary and hospital inspectors. It cared everywhere for sick or needy soldiers, in or out of active service. It had Homes for the wives, mothers, and children of soldiers. It had "feeding stations" where the tired and hungry soldier could receive a gratuitous meal. It looked after the payment of pensions, back-pay, and bounties. It printed hospital directories. It supplied, whenever permitted to do so, our soldiers at Andoverville, Salisbury, and Riga, with provisions. Its needed medical and medical provisions were upon every flag-of- truce boat. In the camps, it extended its mercies to the Confederate prisoners-of-war. It expended $3,000,000 in money, and dispensed many millions' worth of supplies. Of this most useful and beneficent society Dr. Bellows was the constant and active officer. It is said that while traveling hither and thither in its behalf he never failed to preach on Sunday in the Church of All Souls, except when he went to California and brought back its gift of $1,000,000 to the Commission. So wide was the range of its work that its affairs were not fairly closed until 1878, when Dr. Bellows deposited its archives in the Astor Library. Civil-service reform and like subjects found a strong advocate in Dr. Bellows. He was one of the founders of the Union League Club, and one of the original members of the Century Club. He was also a member of various other associations, such as the New York Natural History Society, the New York Academy of Science, the Phi Beta Kappa Society, and the Harvard Alumni Association. His labors in connection with the Unitarian Church in this country can hardly be overestimated. He was the first president of the National Unitarian Conference when it was formed in 1865, which position he held until 1874.

Dr. Bellows was the chief originator of The Christian Inquirer, a Unitarian newspaper published in New York and started in 1846. He devoted himself with great energy to the establishment of Antioch College, in Ohio. In 1853 he delivered the Phi Beta Kappa oration at Harvard College. He also delivered the annual sermon before the Union Board of the New York School at Cambridge. In 1857 he gave a course of Lowell lectures in Boston on the "Treatise of Social Diseases," which was published in book-form. The same year he delivered another series of lectures in the Academy of Music, New York, on the "Relations of the Theatre to the Public Interest," which was likewise printed in volume. In 1866 he was editor of The Christian Examiner, and kept this position until 1871. His Publications of Christian Doctrine was published in 1860. After a journey abroad he published The Old World in its New Face (1868, 2 vols.). He also published a large number of pamphlets. His life has been too busy to permit the production of many books. See N. Y. Tribune, Jan. 31, 1882; Duuckwicke, Cyclop. of Amer. Lit., ii, 776.

Bellows, Thomas, an English Wesleyan preacher, died April 16, 1883, aged twenty-four, and in the first year of his ministry. He was "a young man of deep piety and good abilities." See Minutes of the British Conference, 1883.

Belluvello, Andrea, an old Venetian painter, was born at San Vito, in the Frioul, where he flourished in the latter half of the 15th century, and where he was considered the Amel of the age. Lanzi says his masterpiece is a Crucifixion in the council-chamber at Udine, and that his works, though possessing merit for the age, have neither beauty of form nor color.

Belluti, Buonaaventura, a Sicilian theologian and philosopher, of the Franciscan order, was born at Catania in 1599. He travelled for a long time, and taught philosophy at Cracow, and in several cities of Italy. He died May 18, 1676. He wrote several philosophical treatises in Latin, at first published separately, but afterwards republished in two volumes, under the title, Philosophia ad Mentem Socii Curtis Interius (Venice, 1678 and 1727). See Hoefer, Nouv. Bio. Générale, s. v.

Bellville, John Latta, a Presbyterian minister, was born at New Castle, Del., Dec. 21, 1800. His classical studies were pursued for four and a half years under his brother, while he at the same time aided his brother as assistant teacher in his school. He was licensed by the New Castle Presbytery in 1827, and in May following was commissioned by the Committee on Missions to labor in Dayton, Ohio, and its vicinity. When he returned from his labors he was ordained, and spent six months in study. Returning to Ohio, he was ordained by the Presbytery of Miami in 1828, and labored for two years as stated supply at Washington and Miamisburg. He first preached in a log school-house, and then in a cotton factory. He was the first pastor of the Washington Church in 1830, and labored with success for ten years. He preached at Middle- town one Sabbath of every month. After the pastoral relation was dissolved, he accepted a call to the Bellfontaine Church, and labored with zeal and success until an attack of bronchitis compelled him to resign. His health was such that for two years he was wholly laid aside. After this he took charge of the academy at Centreville, Montgomery Co., Ohio, where he taught four years, when his health again gave way, and he re- moved to Dayton, where he died, Sept. 21, 1880. See Necrological Report of Princeton Seminary, 1881, p. 27. (W. P. B.)

Belmeis (or Beaumes), Richard de (1), an English prelate in the reign of Henry I, was advanced to the see of London through the influence of Roger Montgomerie, earl of Shropshire, and was consecrated July 26, 1108. He was three years warden of the marches between England and Wales, and lieutenant of the castle of Pembroke. For a time he received the entire revenue of his office in the building of St. Paul's cathedral; but subsequently directed his liberality towards the building of a convent of canons regular, called St. Osith de Chich, near Colchester. He died Jan. 16, 1127.

Belmeis (or Beaumes), Richard de (2), an English prelate in the reign of king Stephen, was nephew to the preceding. Before he came of age he was appointed by his uncle archdeacon of Middlesex. He became bishop of London in October, 1151, and died May 4, 1162, "leaving behind him a reputation for singular eloquence." According to Dr. Richardson, he was the writer of the Codex Niger, or Black Book of the English Chancellors, Bio. Dict. Nat. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Belmen (Judith iv, 4). For this place lieut. Con- der proposes the present Belmen (Tent-work, ii, 335), which he likewise gives as the representative of Bal- hamon and Ibleam (ibid. p. 335, 387); in the last case, at least, by a clear error for Jailaneh.

Belio, Lorenzo, an Italian bishop and canonist, died in 1586. His principal works are, Tractatus de Mortis Coemeterio Restitutio (Brescia, 1562; Venice, 1587) - Opuscnum de Potestate Pontificia, etc., in manuscript at the Library of the Vatican. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bio. Générale, s. v.

Beloe, William, an English clergyman and author, was born at Norwich in 1756. His preliminary training was at St. John's College, Cambridge, and his education was at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1779. For a time he assisted Dr. Parr in a school at Norwich, and was afterwards curate and vicar of Elyham. Not finding his income sufficient for his support, he began to write for the periodical literature. During the American Revolution he advocated the cause of the colonists, but supported the conservative side during the French Revolution; and in 1793, in conjunction with archdeacon Nares, he established the British Critic as the organ of High-church principles. In 1796 he was presented to the rectory of Allhallows, London-wall. In 1797 he became presby- dary of Lincoln, and in 1805, of St. Paul's. In 1834 he was appointed one of the assistant librarians to the British Museum. He died April 11, 1817. His literary works are numerous. Among them we note, his translation of Herodotus (1791): —An Onote of Literature and Science Books (1805-15, 3 vols. 8vo); —and The Sep- arian, or Memoirs of a Literary Life (published posthumously, 1817). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Belomancy, in Greek religion, was a certain way of fortune-telling, by means of sacred inscribed arrows. They were either mixed together and then drawn as a lot, or one was thrown into the air and the fortune told by the direction it took. See DIVINATION.

Beloochee Version of the Scriptures. This dialect is spoken in Beloochistan, south of the Indus, on the Arabian Sea. A version into this dialect was commenced by the late Dr. Leyden. After his death it was transferred to the care of the Serampore missionaries, who availed themselves of the aid of the learned natives previously employed by Dr. Leyden. How much of the New Test. was translated we are unable to state, for the first three gospels were the only parts which were printed at Serampore in 1815. See Bible of Every Land, p. 74. (B. P.)

Belothuron (βελοθύρων) or Bemothuron (βε- μοθύρων), a Greek term for the veil in front of a church.

Belshar, William, an English Baptist minister, was born in 1765. He was converted in early life, and united with the Church in Green Walk, Blackfriars. He published, See Hooper, Biog. Gen., p. 49. (C. C.)

Beltran, Hernando Domingo, a Spanish Jesuit sculptor and architect, was born at Vitoria, in Biscay, about 1500, and studied in Italy, where he became so skilful that he was recommended to Vincenzo I by the Duke of Ferrara to give him above the most famous artists of his time. He formed his style by studying Michael Angelo; and many statues of Christ, of natural grandeur, executed by Beltr and, appear worthy of being attributed to the illustrious master he had chosen. The Escurial and the Imperial College at Madrid, as also the city of Pisa and the great altar of the College of Alcalá de Henares, were decorated with these statues. He died in 1550. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Beluomo (or Belomo), Angelo, an Italian theologian, who lived at Rocca-Contrada about 1625, wrote Thesauri Jusitiae Aphiomosis Comprobiuta (Firmi, 1625).

Belo, in Oriental mythology. The word signifies master among the Orientals, and is the surname of deities and kings. Thus the sun was called Belus among the Babylonians. See BAAL. There are three mythical persons known to us that carried this name: (1) Belus was the first king of Assyria, who founded the culture of this country. He dried up the swamps, led off standing waters, dug channels, and thus made the country habitable and fruitful. He fixed the standard of reckoning times and seasons, and had his observations engraved on a stone tablet of clay, which was preserved in the so-called Babylonian tower. This Belus seems often identified with the god Baal. (2) The Egyptian Belus was a son of Neptune and Libya, the father of Danaus and Egyptus; also, as some affirm, of Cepheus and Phineus. He led a colony to Babylon, according to Diodorus, and may possibly be one and the same with the former Belus. (3) Belus was the father of Dius and Anna, as also of Pygmalion, among the Phœnicians.

Belvedere, Giovanni Stefano, an Italian theologian, a native of Vercelli, who lived in the early half of the 16th century, wrote Libro Degli anni Viaggi che Fece la Vrigne Santissima con Gesù (Vercelli, 1570). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Belvisoli, Lorenzo (called the venerable father Ignace), an Italian preacher, was born at Santia in 1686, and entered the Order of St. Francis in 1716. He devoted himself to preaching, and distinguished himself by his oratorical talents, his virtue, and his austerity of manner. He died at Turin in 1770. The municipal body of Turin demanded that he should be canonized. He wrote several treatises on practical religion, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Belvoir (fine view), a Frankish fortress mentioned in connection with the Crusades, as having been destroyed by Saladin after the capture of Salad in 1188, seems to be the Kavak of the Arabian historians, and the prehistoric Kavak of Homer ("sea of the air"), on the heights west of the Jordan valley, between Beisan and the lake (Robinson, Bib. Res. iii, 178, 226).

Belzardé was a form of the deity Bel, to whom a temple was erected at Babylon by Nabudaduruzzur or Nebuchadnezzar.

Beman, Nathan S. S., D.D., an eminent Presbyterian minister, was born at New Lebanon, N.Y., in 1875. He was educated at Middlebury College, where he graduated in 1897. He afterwards studied theology, and became pastor of a Congregational Church in Portland, Me., in 1810. A few years after this he went as a missionary to Georgia, and gave especial attention to establishing educational institutions. In 1822 he became pastor of the first Presbyterian Church of Troy, N.Y., where he remained more than forty years. In 1831 he was moderator of the Presbyterian General Assembly, and became the leader of the New-school branch in 1857. He resigned his pastorate in 1863, and during the remainder of his life resided either in Troy or at Carbondale, Ill., where he died, Aug. 8, 1871. He published several sermons, single sermon essays, and a volume entitled Four Sermons on the Atonement. He was also one of the compilers of the Hymn-book of the New-school Presbyterians. He was widely known as an active temperance reformer, and as a member of various missionary organizations. The American Board owed its success largely to the influence and labors of Dr. Beman and his associates. See The Presbyterian, Aug. 26, 1871.

Bembo, Pietro (Lat. Petrus Bembo), a celebrated Italian prelate and scholar, was born at Venice, May 20, 1470. He was son of a senator, who was distinguished for his learning. His father being sent as ambassador to Florence, young Bembo commenced his studies in that city, and afterwards continued them at home. His style was in accordance with that of the time. In order to study Greek, so much desired at that time in Italy, under a more highly renowned master, viz. the celebrated Lascaris, Bembo went to Messina, where he spent two years. He at length finished his course of philosophy at the University of Pisa, and then devoted himself to the ecclesiastical garb, that he might the better devote himself to study. Among the princes of Italy who especially favored him was Alphonso d'Este, duke of Ferrara, and through him he gained the friendship of the famous Lucretia Borgia. In order to advance his education he spent some years at the court of Urbino, which was another literary resort. In 1502 he commenced to write a little in the Italian language, and published in 1525 a work entitled Prose. In 1512 he attached himself to Julian de Medici, whom he accompanied to Rome, and obtained soon after the commandery of Bologna from Julius II. Leo X, a pontiff more favorable to literature and art than Julius was, being on the throne, made Bembo his intimate secretary. The distinguished men, the cardinals Bibiena and Julius de Medici, the poets Tiberaldo and Accolit, the artist Raphael, and the principal lords of Rome were the friends of Bembo. In every position of eminence he was offered. At the death of Leo X, his protector, the beautiful Morosina, who had borne Bembo several children, enabled him to erect at Padua a temple of the Muses; also a library, one of the most beautiful of the time, and made a collection of medals and monuments of the Medici family, now in the possession of the present Medici family. On the accession of Clement VII, Bembo returned to Rome to pay homage to the new pope; and on his return to Padua he accepted the position of historiographer of Venice, and traced the history from 1486 to 1530, which history was not published until four years after his death. It was written in Latin, but has been translated and published in Italian under the title Istoria Tintzerana (Venice, 1652). This work naturally led to the appointment of Bembo as librarian. Being chosen librarian of the Holy See by Paul III, he went to Rome, where he allied himself with one of the distinguished men of his time, the English cardinal Pole. Bembo now changed his course, renounced profane literature, and studied the fathers and theologians; and was successively made bishop of Gubbio and of Bergamo. He died July 15, 1538. Many honors were paid to him for his learning and merit. He was the chief of Ciceronians of his epoch. He was a purist in Italian as in Latin. In prose he wrote less his language than that of Boccaccio, and represented less his ideas than those of Petrarch. His works of various kinds were published under the title Opera di P. Bembo (Venice, 1729). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Benaes, the holy city of the Hindis, is the ecclesiastical metropolis of India, and the resort of pilgrims from all quarters. It is situated on the north bank of the river Ganges, in the province of Allahabad and presidency of Bengal. It may be said to form the grand depository of the religion and learning of Hindustan. This city is accounted so sacred that all who die within its precincts are assured of salvation, and for that reason it is a scene of extensive resort. There are said to be eight thousand houses in Benares occupied by Brahmins, who live upon the alms and offerings of the pilgrims. The banks of the river at this place are studded every where with pleasure-gardens and temples; and the city itself is adorned with domes and minarets that are seen in vast numbers. The greatest of these structures was levied to the ground by Aurengzebe, who erected in its stead a mosque, which now forms the principal ornament of Benares. The houses of the mendicants are adorned with idols, while the principal streets are lined with mendicants of various Hindoo sects, presenting every conceivable deformity. Some are seen with their legs or arms distorted by long continuance in one position; others with their hands clenched until the nails have grown through at the back. A stranger passing through the streets is saluted with the most pitiful cries from the swarms of beggars. These are there among the wealthy devotees, who have secured their wealth by dishonesty or oppression, or have come under political censure, who come to Benares to wash away their sins in the sacred waters of the Ganges, or expiate their crimes in gaudy ceremonies and extensive charity. Many thousands of dollars are given away by a single individual in the course of a year. Bulls are reckoned sacred among the Hindis, and are numerous in the streets of Benares; no one being permitted to disturb them in their occupancy of any part of the city. Monkeys are also held sacred, and may be seen clinging to the roofs and projections of the temples.

There are three missions in Benares—the Church of England, the London, and the Baptist Missionary Society. The mission in connection with the Church of England was established in 1817, and has a church capable of holding three or four hundred persons, two normal schools for training Christian teachers, a large college, and several girls' schools. The mission of the London Missionary Society was founded in 1821, and is situated in the suburbs of the city. A substantial church was erected about 1846. The mission of the Baptist Missionary Society originated in 1817, as an outpost of the Scarcrow mission. It maintains an orphanage for the support and education of native children. Bench-table (kome) is a line of stone seats occurring in churches, chapels, and porches. Medieval benches are found in England and France, but nowhere in Spain and Italy, where kneeling only was permitted, as in England even in the time of archbishop Arundel, when all persons sat on the floor in sermon-time. When permanent pews, or benches for the purpose of kneeling in the deep, were built in the 15th century, the bench-table disappeared. In the latter part of the 17th century the French began to use fixed seats.

A second Church was organized in 1796 under his charge, named Christ Church, to which an associate rector was appointed. Benden, Alice, an English martyr, was brought before the judge in Cranbrook, in the county of Kent, Oct. 15, 1556, and asked why she would not go to church? She answered that she "could not do so with a good and clear conscience, because there was so much idolatry committed against the glory of God." For this reason she was sent to prison, where she lay nine weeks in stocks, with only a little bread and water to nourish her. She was finally relieved of her sufferings by burning, June 19, 1557. Tradition says that these holy virgins were of Rome, and that the fame of the martyrdom of SS. Quentin and Lucien, and their companions, was spread to Gaul, with the hope of meeting with a similar reward. When they arrived at the border of Celtic Gaul and Belgium, they parted; Benedicta and Leoberia went to Laon, and Romana to Beauvais; whether their companions betook themselves is unknown. Romana was put to death at Beauvais, and Benedicta at Origini, on the 8th, in the diocese of Laon. In the diocese of Beauvais the festival of St. Romana is observed on the 8th, in October, and that of Benedicta on the 8th. The history of these saints is altogether uncertain, and it should be remarked that the Acts of St. Benedicta are the same as those of St. Saturninus, and that the history given of St. Benedicta is identical with that of St. Benedicta, except in the particular of her translation. See Baillit, liii, 112.

Benediction of Abbeys was formerly styled ordination. The second Council of Nicaea permitted abbots who had received the benediction to admit their own monks to the tonsure and to the four minor orders; but in after-ages they presumed so far as to extend the exercise of it to others than their own monks, so that the Council of Trent (see 33, 33, 10) reduced it to its original terms. This benediction of abbots differs from ordination chiefly in two points: first, that it is done upon the request of the monastery, whereas ordination is conferred upon the demand of the Church ("Postulat Sancta Mater"); secondly, because it is not accompanied by any invocation of the Holy Spirit. See Abbots.

Benediction, Apostolical, is the salutation which the popes use at the beginning of their bulls, in these terms: "Salutem et apostolicam benedictionem."

Benediction, Nuptial. Among the Jews special benedictions were in use, both for betrothal and actual marriage. A passage in Tobit (vii, 13, 14) indicates the close connection of the blessing with what we should term the marriage settlement. Certain heathen marriages being also accompanied with a benediction, it is but natural that the same custom should prevail in reference to Christian ones. St. Ambrose, writing against mixed marriages, says: "For since marriage itself should be sanctified by the priestly veil, and by benediction given by the Church, we find that Chrysostom never indicates the existence of a marriage liturgy, or the indispensableness of sacramental benediction. Two letters of Gregory Nazianzen show clearly that such a benediction was looked upon rather as a solemn accompaniment to Christian marriage than as a condition of it. The work Sacerdotal and Ecclesiastical, a singular document included, by some authorities, among those of the 4th century, evidently represented the practice of the Greek Church. The second chapter forbids marriage with a person's nuptial pararnyphs, with whom "the benediction of the crowns" is received. Benedictions are mentioned in other passages, but it is clear that the ceremony of the Greek rite known as the benediction of the crowns, and not the Latin benediction of the marriage itself, is referred to. Justinian's legislation, minutely occupied as it is with Church matters, never once refers to the ecclesiastical benediction of marriage.

Probably between the 6th and 7th centuries the regular practice of an ecclesiastical benediction upon marriage, and the Greek rite of marriage itself, became established. The canons of a council held in England towards the end of the 7th century, under archbishop Theodore, enact that "in a first marriage the priest shall bless the crowns and benedict the couple; if in a second, it would seem, the practice set forth by the Sanction and Decrees, of confining the blessing to the yet unmarried party only, where the other has been married already."

In the Carlovigian era, the priestly benediction entered into the civil law as an essential requisite of marriage; and the various spurious authorities from the annals of the Western Church were apparently invented for the purpose of carrying back to a remote period the ecclesiastical recognition of its necessity. By the first Capitulary of 862, none are to be married before inquiry be made as to whether they are related; and "then let them be united with a benediction." The reply of pope Nicolas to the Bulgarians, though belonging only to the latter half of the 9th century, preserves to us probably the practice of the Roman Church on this subject from an earlier period. It evidently indicates a different ceremonial from that of the Greek Church, and shows that the ceremonial of marriage sanctified by itself, many centuries elapsed before the pronouncing of such a benediction was held essential to the validity of marriage, when duly contracted according to the municipal law, and not contrary to the special ethical rules of the Church in reference to marriage. (3.) Hence the total absence of marriage liturgies from the early Christian rituals, extending to about the beginning of the 7th century; the genuineness of the Deuterocanonical Missal (end of the 5th century) being confessedly impugned by the absence of any in the Gregorian, a century later. (4.) It may, however, be admitted that by the end of the 7th century the priestly benediction of marriage had probably become the rule in both great branches (not yet divisions) of the Church; and in the course of the 8th and 9th centuries it hardened into a legal institution within the domains of the great usurpers of the West, the Carlovigians, being now largely supported by supposititious Church authorities, carried back as far as the beginning of the 2d century. (5.) It is also possible that about this period a practice of sacerdotally blessing betrothals likewise grew up, and, promising to open a new source of income to the clergy and above all to the Roman pontiffs, was in like manner sought to be maintained by spurious authorities; but the date of this cannot be fixed earlier than A.D. 860, since pope Nicolas, in his reply to the Bulgarians, clearly speaks only of the nuptial benediction.

Benedictional. (1.) The name for an ancient Service-book, commonly containing those rites of benediction exclusively used by a bishop and given during mass. The Benedictional, properly so called, may be found in the well-known Exzer Pontificale of bishop Lacey. The rite of episcopal benediction during mass is not found in the Latin Church. (2.) A term for the Pontifical. See Benedictions.

Benedictions are an important element in ecclesiastical liturgy; the following are the chief:

I. Definition, etc.—Benediction, in contradistinction from the allied expressions, consecration, dedication, may be defined to be a certain holy action which, combined with prayer, seeks for God's grace for persons, and, in a lower degree, a blessing upon things, with a view whether to their efficiency or safety. To dedicate is to offer a place to God, to bless is to sanctify it. To consecrate is to separate things, utensils, vestments, etc., from common use for divine worship, so that they become holy things.

Like many other points of ritual, the practice of benediction passed from the Jewish to the Christian Church. The form used by the Roman Church in the 3d century, in the inafrica form of a sacrifice, is derived, as we shall see, from the older form. Under Aaron, we discover the existence of the blessing of the congregation by the priest after the morning and the evening sacrifice (Lev. xi, 22); and later notices may be seen in 1 Chron. xxiii, 18; Eccles. xxxvi, 17; xlv, 15; l, 20. The actual form is prescribed in Numb. vi, 22 sqq.; comp. Psa. lxxvii, 1.

The benediction, ordinarily pronounced by priests (as, e. g. in the case of Zacharias, for whose blessing the people waited, Luke i, 21), would on occasions of special solemnity be reserved for the high-priest. Even the king, as the viceroy of the Most High, might give the blessing (I Sam. xii, 24; Psa. cxvi, 2). It would appear that Levites had ordinarily, though not invariably, the power of giving the blessing. Comp. 2 Chron. xxxi, 27.

The actual formula referred to above does not occur in the New Test., though our Lord is spoken of as blessing little children and his disciples (Matt. xvi, 16; Luke xxiv, 50), besides the blessing on the occasion of the institution of the Eucharist (Matt. xxxvi, 26). Still the general tenor and form of the blessing must have been similar, and the familiar "peace" of the benediction is probably a relic of the old Aaronitic form.

II. Ministration of Benediction.—It is immediately obvious, from the nature of the case, that a benediction is imparted by a superior to an inferior (see Heb. vii, 7, where this is explicitly stated). Hence it is laid down in the Benedictions, that a bishop may bestow the blessing, and receive it from other bishops, but not from priests; so, too, a priest may bless his fellow priests and receive the blessing from them or from a bishop; the distribution of benediction occurs at every imaginable occasion, wherein the pious of past ages deemed the Church could draw forth on their behalf from a rich store of blessing. Thus we may mention, in addition to those already cited, the following benedictions of things, occurring mainly in the Gregorian Sacramentary: (1) Of a house; (2) of clusters or beans; (3) on new fruits; (4) on all things you have wished; (5) of flesh; (6) of a well; (7) of cheese and eggs; (8) of fire; (9) of books.

IV. Mode of Imparting Benediction.—The Christian ritual was foreshadowed by the Jewish. In the commentary on Numbers and Deuteronomy known as St. Gregory, we have further directions given: (1) the blessing is to be pronounced in the Hebrew language; (2) the impart of the blessing is to stand, and (3) outstretched hands; (4) the sacred name (Jehovah) is to be used; (5) the priest must face the people, and (6) speak in a loud voice.

During the conferring of the blessing the people must not look at the priest, for at the time the glory of God is supposed to rest upon him. Also, his hands are disposed so that the fingers go in pairs, forefingers with middle fingers, ring-fingers with little fingers, with the tips of the two thumbs and of the two forefingers respectively touching each other, thus arranging the whole ten fingers in six divisions.

The foregoing points afford a very close parallel to the usages of the Christian Church. That the impart of the blessing should stand is but in accordance with the natural order of things, and this is a point universally observed, so that the Latin Church does but stereotype usage when in the ritual of Paul V this attitude is prescribed. As to the kneeling of the recipients of the blessing, we may find ancient evidence in the Apostolic Constitutions, where the injunction is prefixed to the benediction, "... and let the deacon say, kneel and be blessed."

The order of the Jewish ritual that the priest should face the people is paralleled (to say nothing of unvarying custom) by the rubric before the benediction in the mass in ancient Sacramentaries; and that to pronounce the blessing in a loud voice by the equivalent command constantly met with in Greek services.

The lifting up of hands is an inseparable adjunct of benedictions. An occasional addition is that of the laying-on of hands; see Apostolic Constitutions, where the benediction upon penitents is associated with this act. The feeling of the greater worth and power of the right hand is shown by its use, but with this natural and almost universal gesture, the act of benediction is usually represented in ancient art.

Thus the Lord extends his open hand over the devotions in the base-reliefs of a sarcophagus at Verona. In the Greek Church and in Greek paintings for the most part, the hand outstretched in blessing has the thumb touching the tip of the ring-finger, while the forefinger, the middle, and the little finger are erected. According to Neale, this method is supported by Dr. Trench, and by the example of the Holy Ghost from the Father alone; and according to others, to form the sacred name I H C by the position of the fingers. In the Latin manner of benediction the erected fingers are the thumb, the forefinger, and the middle finger, with the other two doubled down on the palm of the hand. The hand of the Lord is thus represented in some monuments when he works a miracle; e. g. in the healing of the man born blind. It is, however, only in comparatively modern times that the rite of benediction has constituted a distinction between the Greek and Latin churches. For instance, in the most Roman of monuments, the Vatican confessio of St. Peter, the Lord gives the blessing in the Greek maner; in the triumphal arch of St.
Mark's Church, in the Latin manner.
On the other hand, the bass-relief of a Greek diptych represents St. Peter giving the blessing in the Latin manner, while St. Andrew blesses in the Greek manner.

V. Benedicentiae.—It has already been shown that various early forms of benedictions are found interspersed in ancient Sacramentaries. In that attributed to pope Leo are found forms of blessing "for those accessing from the font," and "of milk and honey," as well as a "benediction of the font," which is possibly a later addition. It is, however, in the somewhat later Sacramentary of Gregory the Great that we meet with specimens of benedictions on a more extended scale, in some MSS., variably interspersed through the book, and in some given separately, forming the so-called Benedicentia. This is the case with the very ancient MS. of the Casarea Library. Another somewhat different form is from two MSS. of the time of Charlemagne now in the Vatican. The Liber Sacramentorum of Ratoldus, of the 10th century, also contains numerous benedictions, but the fullest beneddiction is that found in two MSS. of the Monastery of St. Theodoric, near Rheims, written about the year 900. A large collection of benedictions is also to be found in the Pontificale of Egbert (archbishop of York, A.D. 722-46), published by the Surtees Society in 1853.

Benedict, Giovanni Battista de, an Italian theologian of the Jesuit order, was born at Ostia, Jan. 20, 1620. He made enemies for himself by obsti-nately sustaining the principles of the Peripatetic philosophy and of the scholastic theology against the par-sisians of Descartes, and against the new doctrines of the Jansenists and their partisans. He died May 15, 1706. His principal works are, Analecta Poetica, ex-

Benedictus is the liturgical name for the song of Zacharias contained in Luke i., 68-79, so called from its first word. This canticle has been said at lauds in the Western Church from early times every day throughout the year, whatever be the service. The introduction of the custom is attributed to St. Benedict. It is said with a varying antiphon which is doubled, i. e.
said entire both before and after the canticle, on double feasts; in the Roman, monastic, and other offices deferred from a Gregorian or Benedictine origin, at the end of lauds, immediately before the collect, and occupies the same position at lauds which the Magnificat occupies at vespers. In the Ambrosian office it occurs, on the contrary, at the very beginning of the office, after the opening versicles. The Ambrosian rules, too, for the duplication of antiphons are different from the Roman. The Benedictus is also found elsewhere, e. g. in the Mozarabic lauds for the nativity of John the Baptist. In the Greek rite the Benedictus forms, together with and following the Magnificat, the last of the nine odes [see Odes] appointed for lauds.

The introductory part of The Song of the Three Children, which precedes the Benedicentiae, or Benedictie
(q. v.) proper, is also known as the Benedictus from its opening.

Benedictus Fossatensis, abbot of the Monastery of St. Maur des Fosses, was one of the monastic reformers in the latter part of the 8th and beginning of the 9th century. He is sometimes confounded with Benedict of Aniane; but the latter is never styled "Fossatensis." The monastery over which he presided was the final resting-place of the relics of St. Maur, after frequent translations to escape the ravages of the Normans. Benedictus took an active part in the reformation of the monastery of St. Vauldile, near Rouen.

Benedictus Levita. See BENEZET OF MENZEL.

Benedictus Mediolanensis (Benedict of Mil-ian) was a contemporary of Benedict of Aniane, and, like him, was introduced into the reform of the Odo-Nurian rule. He was made abbot of the Monastery of St. Ambrose at Milan, A.D. 784, by Peter, archbishop of Milan, and his appointment was confirmed by Karl the emperor. See Bulteau, Hist. de l'ordre de St. Be-not, v. 75.

Benedictus (originally Ambraeh), Petrus, a celbrated Maronite, was born at Gusta, in Phoenicia, in 1653, of a noble family, and sent to the Maronite College at Rome when but nine years old, where he made great progress in the Oriental languages; but returned afterwards to the East, and applied himself to preaching the Gospel there. The Maronites of Antioch sent him back to Rome as a deputy from their Church. Cosmo III, grand-duke of Tuscany, having a独 of Benedictus, bequeathed many honors and favors upon him, and made him professor of Hebrew at Pisa. Clement XI appointed him one of the correctors of the Greek press. He entered among the Jesuits at the age of forty-four, and his amiable temper, integrity, and skill in the Oriental languages procured him the esteem of all who approached him. He died Sept. 22, 1742, at Rome. He published the first volumes of that excellent edition of St. Ephraim which has been continued and finished by Assameini. See Bened Elieohm, an expression which occurs only in

Gen. vii. 2, 4 (Heb. beney' ha-Elieohm, בֵּית Elieon be-תת שָׁנָי לָהוּ, sons of God; Sept. viii τῶν ὅσων; Vulg. filii Dei), and in Job i, 6; ii, 1 (Sept. vii ὡμοίων τῶν ὅσων; Vulg. filii Cyril calls it ἀρτοφωταριον. Theodoret (Quotest. in Gen., 430) declares the maintainers of it to have lost their senses, κυριολασθενος και ἄγους

Philistias numbers it among heresies, Chrysostom among blasphemies. Finally, Calvin says of it, "Vetus illud commentum de angelorum concubitus cum mulieribus suab absurdotate abunde reflebitur, ac mirum est doctos viros tam crassos et prodigiosos delirus fuisse olim fantasticos. Notwithstanding all this, many modern General commentators very strenuously assert this view. They rest their argument in favor of it mainly on these two particular first, that "sons of God" is everywhere else in the Old Test. a name of the angels; and next, that St. Jude seems to lend the sanction of his authority to this interpretation. With regard to the former reason, it is not even certain that in all other passages of Scripture where "the sons of God" are mentioned angels are meant. It is not absolutely necessary to understand the designation either in Psa. xxix., 1 or xxxix., 6, or even in Job i., 6. In any of these passages it might mean holy men. Job xxxviii., 7, and Dan. iii., 25, are the only places in which it certainly means angels. The argument from St. Jude is of more force; for he does compare the sin of the angels to that of Sodom and Gomorrah (ταρσους in ver. 7 must refer to the angels mentioned in ver. 6), as if it were of like unnatural kind. That this was the meaning of St. Jude is rendered the more probable when we consider the interpolation from the book of Enoch where the same view is taken. Further, that the angels had the power of assuming a corporeal form seems clear from many parts of the Old Test. All that can be urged in support of this view has been said by Delitzsch in his Die Genesis ausgelegt, and by Kuritz, Greek. des Alten Testament. and his treatise, Die Eben der Söhne Gottes. It must be confessed that their arguments are not without weight. The early existence of such an interpretation seems, at any rate, to indicate a starting-point for the heathen mythologies. The fact, too, that such an interpretation of the "mighty men" was born, points in the same direction. The Greek "heroes" were sons of the gods; ουν σκασα, says Plato in the Cratylus, ην υμιοι ητει ρωμες; παντες δεσμον γνωσιν ιαριδεις ηι δεις ουρες ηι υπιριδοι δεις. Even Hesiod's account of the birth of the giants, monstrous and fantastic as it is, bears tokens of having originated in the same belief. In like manner it may be remarked that the stories of Æneas and Aeneas, so commonly believed in the Middle Ages, and which even Heidegger (Hist. Sacr. i, 289) does not discredit, had reference to a commerce between demons and mortals of the same kind as that narrated in Genesis. (Pars. i, q. 21, 22.) It may be supposed that it was possible for angels to have children by mortal women. This theory, however, must be abandoned as scientifically preposterous. Two modern poets, Byron (in his drama of Cain) and Moore (in his Loves of the Angels), have nevertheless availed themselves of this last interpretation for the purpose of their poems.

3. The interpretation, however, which is now most generally received is that which understands by "the sons of the Elohim" the family and descendants of Seth, and by "the daughters of man" (Adam), the women of the family of Cain. So the Clementine Recognitions interpret "the sons of the Elohim" as 'heroes justi qui angelorum xixerat vitam.' So Ephrem, and the Christian Adam-book of the East; so also Theodoret, Chrysostom, Cyril of Alexandria, Jerome, Augustine, and others; and in later times Luther, Melanchthon, Calvin, and a whole host of recent commentators. They all support the opinion of Azariah ben Jochanan in the Midrash Abkhib: and most of the older fathers of the Church, finding probably in their Greek MSS. ἄγγελοι τοῦ Θεοῦ, as Justin, Tatian, Athenagoras, Clemens Alex. Tertullian, and Lactantius. This view, however, seemed in later times to be too monstrous to be entertained. E. Simon ben-Jochia anathematized it.
this universal corruption which provoked the judgment of the Flood.

4. A fourth interpretation has recently been advanced and maintained with considerable ingenuity, by the author of the Genesis of the Earth and Man. He understands by "the sons of the Elohim" the "servants or worshippers of false gold" (taking Elohim to mean not God, but men), since he supposes they belonged to a distinct pre-Adamite race. The "daughters of men," he contends, should be rendered "the daughters of Adam, or the Adamites," women, that is, descended from Adam. These last had hitherto remained true in their faith and worship, but were now perverted by the idolaters who intermarried with them. But this hypothesis is opposed to the direct statements in the early chapters of Genesis, which plainly teach the descent of all mankind from one common source.

Whichever of these interpretations we adopt (the third, perhaps, is the most probable), one thing at least is clear, that the writer intends to describe a fusion of races hitherto distinct, and to connect with this two other facts: the one that the offspring of these mixed marriages were men remarkable for strength and prowess (which is only in accordance with what has often been observed since—viz. the superiority of the mixed race as compared with either of the parent stocks); the other, that the result of this intercourse was the thorough and hopeless corruption of both families alike. See Son of God.

II. Who were the Nephilim?—It should be observed that they are not spoken of (as has sometimes been assumed) as the offspring of the "sons of the Elohim" and "the daughters of men." The sacred writer says, "the Nephilim were on the earth in those days," before he goes on to speak of the children of the mixed marriages. The name, which has been variously explained, only occurs once again in Numb. xiii, 33, where the Nephilim are said to have been one of the Canaanitish tribes. They are there spoken of as "men of great stature," and hence probably the rendering γίγαντες of the Sept. and "giants" of our A.V. But there is nothing in the word itself to justify this interpretation. If it is of Hebrew origin (which, however, may be doubted), it must mean either "fallen," i.e. apostate ones; or those who "fall upon" others, violent men, plunderers, freebooters, etc. Some have observed that if the Nephilim of Canaan were descendants of the Nephilim in Gen. vi, 4, we have here a very strong argument for the non-universality of the Deluge.—Smith. But it can hardly be inferred from these usual references that the name is intended as that of a race, it is rather used in a general way in both passages for burlig fighters. See Nephilim.

Benefial, Marco, a Roman painter, was born in 1684. He received the honor of knighthood from the pope, and died in 1764. In the Academy of St. Luke is a fine picture of Christ at the Well of Samaria; in the Church of Stignan, The Flagellation; in the Palazzo di Pallavicino there is a salon painted entirely by this artist, which is thought one of the finest works of his time.

Benefice Collative is (1) a benefice of which the patron may freely dispose, the nomination not needing the confirmation of any superior authority. Most benefices collative are in the gift of the bishop of the diocese (2) and are of that character to which a bishop is bound to give immediate institution, so long as it remains in the gift of some independent patron.

Benefice Compatible is a benefice which the law will permit a cleric to hold in conjunction with another benefice.

Benefice Consistorial is a term used in the Latin Church to designate certain clerical positions of eminence rank and importance, which are customarily and formally filled up by the pope in solemn consistory.

Benefice Donative is a benefice which is exempt from the jurisdiction of the ordinary, and the giving of which is completed by a deed under the hand and seal of the patron. Very few of such now exist.

Benefice Elective is a term used to designate a benefice to which the cleric in orders of it is elected. Such are generally in the gift of the two great English universities, or sometimes in that of the parishioners.

Benefice Incompatible is a benefice which the law will not permit a cleric to hold, either in conjunction with another benefice, or with any other position or dignity ecclesiastical.

Beneficiary, in ecclesiastical usage, is the cleric in orders who receives the temporal benefit of an endowment.

Ben-Ephraim and Ben-David, the names of two Messiahs expected by the modern Jews. To evade the express predictions of the Old-Test. prophets concerning the mean condition of the Messiah, they confidently speak of looking forward to the appearance of two Messiahs; the one Ben-Ephraim, whose office is to be a grant to be a person of mean and afflicted condition in this world; and the other Ben-David, who shall be a powerful and victorious prince. See Messiah.

Beneplacitum Apostolicum is the name given to the papal approbation of and consent to the alienation of any property of the Church or other measure, and to the act or brief which contains such approbation.

Benesch, Jacob, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, who died March 8, 1673, at Prague, is the author of a History of the Protestant Congregation of the Augsburg Confession (Prague, 1866).

Benet, A., a German martyr, was a citizen of Wethringest, in Germany, and was persecuted severely because she would not attend mass and repeat the idle ceremonies of the Church. She was beheaded in 1558. See Fox, Ages and Monuments, viii, 467.

Benet (or Benedictus), Cypriano, was a Dominican monk of Aragon, and, according to some accounts, a doctor of the University of Paris. He flourished from 1490 to 1520, and left, Ilustrium Viro Pompa Opuscula (Paris, 1500).—De Sororosancto Ecclésiarum Sacramenteto et de Epimeni Ministerio, ad Julianum, &c. De non Metendo Pincheta (Rome, 1515, 4to).—De Prima Orba Sede; De Concilio; De Ecclesiasticae Pont. et; De Pontif. Maior Autoritate (ibid. 1515, 4to), etc.

Benet, Geronymo, a reputable Spanish painter, was distinguished for pictures of the Virgin and Christ. He died at Valladolid in 1700. See Smeers, Bibl. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Benet, Thomas, an English martyr, was born at Cambridge, and was at the university made master of arts, and was thought by some to have been a priest. He was well learned, and of a godly disposition. In 1524, feeling disposed to go where he could worship in more freedom, according as his conscience dictated, he went to Devonshire, where he took charge of a school and did much towards instructing the children in the knowledge of Christ and his works. In 1525 he removed to Exeter, and started a school there for children; his spare time he devoted to the study of the Scriptures. But, as every tree and herb has its due time to bring forth its fruit, so did it appear by this good man. He saw daily the glory of God blasphemed, idolatry embraced, and the priestly office lost that most false usurped power of the bishop of Rome so extolled, that he was so grievous in conscience and troubled in spirit that he could not be quiet, but uttered his mind to a number of persons. At one time he wrote his view, which was that the pope was Antichrist, and that we should worship God, not saints, and tack it upon the doors of the cathedral church of the city.
These bills being found, there was a great ado made, and a great search was made for the Heretic who dared do such a bold thing. After a long search he was found and taken to prison; afterwards tried and condemned to be burned, Jan. 15, 1531. The mild martyr, rejoicing that his end was so near, "as the sheep before the shearer" yielded himself with all humbleness to abide and suffer the last persecution. When he reached his place of execution, near Exeter, he made his most humble confession and prayer to Almighty God, and requested all the people to do as he had done. This done, he was tied to a stake and fire was set to him. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, v. 18.

Benetelli, Luigi Maria, an Italian theologian, was born Sept. 29, 1641. He belonged to the Franciscan order. After having studied at Rome, he taught philosophy and theology at Venice, and became confessor of the inquisition. He also travelled in Germany, in company with Balthazar Stycher, and returned to preach in Italy. He especially devoted himself to making proselytes among the Jews. He died March 25, 1725. He wrote Le Saggi di S. Lorenzo, scritti in difesa del suo Fisco e dell'Ordine dei Dottori di Filosofia. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Génér. v.

Benevento, Immanuele di, a Jewish grammarian and Cabalist of Italy, who flourished in the middle of the 16th century, is the author of ה ה, a Hebrew grammar divided into four sections and one hundred and thirty-eight chapters (Mantua, 1557). He also edited ה ה, supplementa to the Sohar (ibid. cod.); and ה ה ה ה, of Perez ha-Kohen (ibid. 1558). See De Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 56; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i. 103. (B. F.)

Benfey, Theodor, a German Orientalist, was born of Jewish parentage, Jan. 28, 1809, at Norten, near Göttingen. He was educated at the gymnasiurn at Göttingen; studied in the universities of Göttingen and Munich; and was appointed professor at Göttingen in 1834, where he worked and lectured till his death, June 26, 1861. "In Theodore Benfey," says a writer in the London Times, "we have lost the greatest Sanscrit scholar of our time; and, if one looks at his works and at the permanent results which they represent, one feels tempted to ask, Has there ever been any single scholar in Europe who, since the discovery of Sanscrit, has more advanced our knowledge of the language and literature of the ancient India?" His most important work was the Griechisches Wurzel-lexicon (1839-42), and the elaborate article on "India" in Ersch and Gruber's Encyclopädie. After that, Benfey was one of the first to contribute to the revival of Sanscrit philology which began with the study of the Veda. In 1848 he published his text, translation, and glossary of the Sāṃskāra, and he also gave a complete translation of the first volume of the Rig-Veda. His grammars on the Sanscrit are well known. In 1859 he published his Pantechosantra, or Fünf Bücher indischer Fabeln, München, etc. (Leipzig, 2 vols.), in which he established on a safe basis, to the surprise of the world, not only the Indian origin of European fables, but what was even more important, the Buddhist origin of Indian fables. We also mention, Die persischen Keilschriften mit Übersetzung und Glossar (Leipsic, 1847):—Über das Verhältniss der ägyptischen Sprache zum Semitischen Sprachstamme (1848). See the Society of the History of Oriental and Philological Society in Germany (München, 1869). He also edited Orient and Occident insbesondere in ihren gegenwärtigen Beziehungen (Göttingen, 1860-65). His contributions to the Transactions of the Royal Göttingen Society and to the Journal of Comparative Philology are very numerous, and contain very valuable materials for the student of comparative philology. Benfey was a member of the academies at Munich, Berlin, Buda, and Göttingen, and was highly honored and esteemed by all who knew him. (B. F.)

Bengal Version of the Holy Scriptures. The Bengali is an African dialect, spoken by a people south of the Congo River. The gospels were originally translated each by a different missionary. Matthew was published by the Presbyterian Board in 1858, and the remaining gospels and the Acts by the American Bible Society in subsequent years. In 1864, the Rev. R. H. Nassau, M.D., of the Galleon and Christian Mission, was appointed to harmonize these versions and to prepare an edition embodying the results of improved scholarship and accuracy. In doing this, Matthew and Mark were entirely rewritten, and extensive corrections were made in the other portions. The new revised edition went through the press in 1864. Besides the four gospels, the book of Genesis and the Acts have also been published. (B. F.)

Bengali Version of the Scriptures. Among the Indian daughters of the Sanscrit, none, except the Pali, approach so nearly the parent stock as the Bengali; and as for style and grammar, it bears the same relation to the Sanscrit as the Italian does to Latin. The commencement of the first Bengali version of the Scriptures was dated from the year 1481, when Dr. Carey and his coadjutors quitted England to enter upon their labors in India. In 1801 he published the New Test. in Serampore, which was followed in 1806 by a second and in 1811 by a third edition. The Old Test. appeared between the years 1802 and 1809. A fourth and revised edition of the New Test. appeared in 1815, and in 1832 the eighth edition was committed to the press, shortly before the translator's death.

Another version of the New Test. was undertaken by Mr. Ellerton of the Church Missionary Society, which was printed in 1818 by the Calcutta Bible Society. Other versions followed. In the fullness of time, the attention of the Calcutta committee was drawn to the great improvements which have been made in the Serampore version of the New Test. by the critical revisions to which each successive edition had been subjected; and on a careful examination of Mr. Ellerton's version, it was determined by the committee to subject it to a very minute and accurate revision, or to substitute some other version in its place. This led to the important measure of endeavoring to obtain what might be accounted a standard version of the Scriptures in Bengali. With this view, a sub-committee was formed in 1830, composed of the best scholars in the land, to determine which of the versions of Christians friendly to the Bible Society in Bengal. They were appointed to execute a version of the entire Scriptures, and agreed to submit their labors to the suggestions of other distinguished scholars. They began with the book of Genesis, and published it in 1833. In the meantime a third version of the Bengali, had been prepared by Dr. Yates, and his New Test. was published in 1833. This version was pronounced by competent judges "an able and excellent translation." The Old Test. was completed by Dr. Yates in 1844. In 1845 Dr. Hüberlin offered to the Calcutta society a new version of the entire Bengali New Test., and two hundred and fifty copies of the gospel according to Mark, and the same number of the Epistle to the Ephesians, were printed as specimens of this version, to test its value.

In 1845 an inquiry was instituted by the Calcutta society respecting the state of the Bengali versions, and the opportunity of obtaining a critical and accurate version of the Old Testament was also urged. This might consider its own. It was finally decided to reprint Dr. Yates's New Test., and an edition was published in 1847. Since that time Dr. Yates's translation of the New Test. has been revised by the Rev. J. Wenger, and editions of this revised version have been printed. The translation of the Old Test. was also completed by Dr. Yates, while taken by Mr. Wenger, or Dr. A. completed in 1878. In addition to these three versions another was commenced by the Rev. R. F. Greaves, of the Church Missionary Society. His translation, however, prevented him continuing the work. Only two of the gospels prepared by him had been printed, and another was complete. These translations were purely tentative, the object being to discover if it was possible to prepare a version which should be at once idiomatic and literal. The death of Mr. Greaves is the more to be lamented because he was a prominent member of a committee which had been appointed to consider the possibility of attaining greater uniformity in the renderings of religious terms among the Indian languages.

As it was deemed desirable to prepare a special edition of portions of Scripture for the use of that large section of the Mussulman population of Bengal who, while they read the Bengali character, speak a dialect of the Bengali language which is largely mingled with Persian and other foreign terms, the gospels of Luke and John, in Mussulman-Bengali, were issued from the Calcutta press at the expense of the British and Foreign Bible Society, in 1855 and 1856. Luke, the first issued of the Mussulman-Bengali version, was prepared under the care of the Rev. J. Paterson, who was followed by the Rev. S. J. Hill, of the London Missionary Society. Mr. Hill translated the Gospel of John and other portions of the Bible. In the report for 1858 we read:

"The propriety of rendering the Scriptures, or at least any of the portions into this mixed language having been called in question, your committee, aided by the opinions of missionaries resident in the provinces where the dialect prevails, and where our books in it have been used, deliberated on the subject, and adopted the resolution to maintain a supply of the publications already issued and ordered in the language, and to prepare also the two remaining gospels of Matthew and Mark, leaving its future course to the judgment of whether any other parts of the New Test. should be added."

All that had been published in this mixed tongue were the four gospels and Acts, Genesis, Psalms, and Isaiah. In 1875 the work of translation was resumed again, and a sub-committee was appointed to prepare a new translation of Luke. This gospel was issued by the Calcutta Auxiliary in 1876, it being edited by the Rev. J. E. Payne, of the London Missionary Society. A number of copies were especially prepared to receive the criticism of those best acquainted with the requirements of the Mussulmans of Lower and Eastern Bengal. See Bible of Every Land, p. 109 sq.

BENGEL, Ernst, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born March 12, 1755, at Denkendorf. For some time deacon at Tubingen, he was appointed in 1786 superintendent and preacher there, and died April 1, 1795. He wrote, "Kurse Abhandlung über 1 Joh, 5, 7" (Tubingen, 1772); -"Chronologische Harmonische Tafel die der chronologischen Wahrheit nach den Grundsatzen des altertümlichen B. Bengel, Ernst Gottlieb von, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born Nov. 3, 1769, at Zavelstein, near Carl. He studied at Tubingen, where he was assistant librarian at the theological seminary in that place. From 1792 he travelled in Germany for literary purposes, and in 1800 he was appointed deacon at Marbach. In 1804 he was called to Eilwangen, and in 1806 to a professorship in Tubingen. Here he remained for the remainder of his life, highly honored by the civic and ecclesiastical authorities, and died March 28, 1826. He published, "Die Insais. ad Isaiam in Librum Psalmorum Supplementa Quamdem Esclebm (Tubingen, 1808); -Historico-theologica, quid in Ayenida Immortalitatis Doctrina Religionis Christianae ipsi subjacentia (Tubingen, 1821). - Archiv für die Theologie und für neueste Literatur (ibid. 1814-21, 5 vols.); -Progr. Bengler, Johann Michael, D.D., a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born in 1823 at Bockum, near Crefeld. In 1845 he was made priest and chaplain at Erlkönig; in 1847 he was appointed cathedral vicar of Hildesheim, and second preacher at Cologone, and in 1848 professor at the clerical seminary there. In 1845 he joined the Congregation of the Holy Redeemer at Althing, whose leader he became. He died Feb. 27, 1870, at Vilshiburg, in Lower Bavaria, as rector of the Redemptorists. He wrote, Pastoraltheologie (Regensburg, 1861-63, 8 vols.); -Compendium der Pastoraltheologie (ibid. 1868). See Literarischer Handwörterbuch für das kathol. Bengston, Johann, archbishop of Upsal, was born in Sweden in 1417. He took the part of Christian of Oldenburg against Charles Canutson Bonde, proclaimed king under the name of Charles VIII, collected troops, fought against Charles, who withdrew to Dantzig, and obtained a bull of the pope in order to hold the reins of government, which should be yielded to none of Sweden. The archbishop having accorded an amnesty to the peasants revolting in the diocese of Upsal, Christian caused him to be arrested and conducted to Copenhagen. The dissatisfaction of the clergy and the complaints of the court of Rome were useless. Kettii, bishop of Upsal, the parent of these insurgents, was retained, and demanded the liberty of the archbishop. Charles Canutson, taking advantage of circumstances, returned to Sweden, where he was proclaimed king in 1446. Seconded by Kettii, Bengston again put Charles to flight. The two prelates were then masters of the government. Kettii having died, Bengston was sole administrator, and was alienated himself by his harshness. Charles was recalled the third time, and maintained his position on the throne until his death. Abandoned by his friends, the archbishop retired to the isle of Oeland, and died in 1467. See Hefker, Nov. Bieg. Gêndal, a.v.

Benham, Hugo, a Scottish priest, went to Rome, and was consecrated bishop to the see of Aberdeen in 1257. He was sent by the pope to a charity of foundation, by Alexander Cumin, earl of Buchan, for building a hospital at Turriff, a village in the shire of Aberdeen, in 1272. He died at Loch-Goul in 1279. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 108.

Benham, John E., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Rome, N. Y., Sept. 20, 1806. He experienced religion at the age of sixteen, and, after spending a year at Cazenovia Seminary, was appointed as a missionary to the Indians of Upper Canada in 1828. In 1834 he returned and entered the Queen's Conference, and, after having filled several appointments, he was sent to take charge of the Mission at Newfield, May 1, 1868. Mr. Benham was a model minister in fidelity, zeal, and piety. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1869, p. 127; Simpson, Cyclopedia of Methodistism, s. v.

Benham, John Raymond, a Universalist minister, was born in 1812. He experienced religion among the Free-will Baptists; began preaching for them early in life; was ordained Universalist minister for some years; he was a zealous advocate of that faith in various parts of Canada. He died at East Brome, province of Quebec, April 19, 1876. Mr. Benham was an upright, faithful man. See Universalist Register, 1877, p. 109.

Benignus is commemorated in the old Roman martyrlogy on April 3 as a martyr at Fomi, in Scythia.

Benignus, a name appearing in both Scotch and Irish hagiography.

2. Brother of St. Cethechus, and a disciple of St. Patrick, by whom he was made abbot of the Monastery of Drumalis, which he ruled for twenty years. Colgan (Acta SS., p. 788, etc.) doubts whether this Benignus may not be the Benignus who is venerated at Glastonbury, Eng. Some imagine that it was Benignus of Armagh who went to Glastonbury. See Ussher, De Brit. Eccl. Prim. (Dublin, 1639) p. 876; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. of Ireland, i, 518.

3. The most famous is St. Benignus (or Benen), son of Besnen, and primate of Armagh (commemorated Nov. 9). Tradition says that when St. Patrick landed at Colp he came first to the house of Besnen, and, in baptizing him and his house, gave to one of his sons the name of Benignus, whom he also took along with him. St. Benignus succeeded to Armagh A.D. 455, and in the lists of the Coarls of St. Patrick is usually placed third after that saint. Most Irish authorities date the arrival of St. Patrick and the baptism of St. Benignus at A.D. 432. Benignus died in 468, and is counted the special apostle and patron of Connaught. See O'Conor, Rev. Hist. Script., ii, 109, 112; O'Curry, Lect. on Armagh, ii, 25, 46, 60; O'Donovan, Four Masters, i, 134.

Benignus, Saint, the apostle of Burgundy, is said to have been a pupil of Polycarp, who sent him to France to preach the Gospel there. He came thither, it is said, accompanied by St. Andochius, a priest, and St. Thyrus, a deacon, about the beginning of the reign of Marcus Aurelius. They landed at Marseille, and passed through Lyons, and, having proceeded to Langres, and, after preaching in the adjacent country, Benignus received the crown of martyrdom at Dijon, with his two companions, being thrust through by a lance, in 178. Some martyrlogies place his death on the 2d or 3d of April; but the common belief assigns Nov. 1 as the day of his martyrdom. In 512 the Abbey of St. Benignus of Dijon was erected over these martyrs' tomb, which was richly endowed by Charles the Bold. See D'Achery, Spicilegium, i; Roget de Belleguut, Origines Dijoniennes (1851); Bouguad, Etude sur St. Benigne sur l'Origine des Eglises de Dijon, d'Autun et de Langres (Autun, 1859); Lichtenberger, Encyclopédie des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. Beni-Jareach (Heb. for Sons of Israel), a peculiar class of people found in India, who practice a mixture of Jewish and Hindu customs. They claim that their ancestors came from a country to the northward of India about six or seven centuries ago, and consisted of seven men and seven women who were saved from shipwreck near Chaul, about thirty miles southeast of Bombay. They found a refuge at a place called Navagam, where they were permitted to settle, and from which, gradually increasing in numbers, they spread about among the villages of the Konkan, particularly those near the sea-shore. That locality and the coast, where they began to settle after it came into the possession of the English, their descendants are found in numbers variously estimated at from five thousand to eight thousand. They resemble in countenance the Arabian Jews, though they regard the name Jehudi, when applied to them, as a term of reproach. They are fairer than the other natives of the same rank, but they somewhat resemble them in dress. They have no sheadi like the Hindus on the crown of their heads; but they preserve a tuft of hair above each of their ears. Their turbans and shoes are like those of the Hindus, and their trousers like those of the Mussulmans. They give to their children each two names, one from the Hebrew scriptures, conferred on the occasion of circumcision, the other of Hindo origin, given about a month after birth.

The Beni-Israel all profess to adore Jehovah, the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; but they, when assembled, in their ritual, and at times of particular necessity, they worship the gods of the Hindoos, while open idolatry was formerly quite common among them. In their synagogues there is no Sepher-Torah, or manuscript of the law, as the Jews have; but they admit the divine authority of all the books of the Old Testament. From the Arabic Jews they have received the Hebrew Liturgy of the Sephardim, which they partially and use in their religious services. The Pentateuch forms the standard of their religious law, though the divine statutes are but partially regarded. The weekly Sabbath is in some degree observed by about a third of the population. At six in the morning they assemble for worship in the magid, where they remain for two or three hours, chiefly engaged in reciting prayers or parts of Scripture after the kazzan or reader, and practicing genuflections. Some of the more devout remain in the magid for a longer time. The evening service, which commences about six o'clock, is best attended. It lasts for about two hours, and is frequently concluded by the persons present merely touching with their lips the cup of blessing.

Several facts have been thought to combine to indicate that the Beni-Israel belong to the "lost tribes" of Israel. The want of a MS. Sepher-Torah, or Book of the Laws, is in some degree suggestive of the situation in which the congregation of Jews throughout the world. The most universal replication among them of the designation Jew, of which they doubtless would have been proud had they merited it; the distinctive appellation of Beni-Israel, which they take for themselves; the non-occurrence among them of the favorite Jewish names Judah and Esther, and the predominance of the name Reuben, as well as other names principally connected with the early history of the children of Israel, strongly indicate that they are a remnant of the posterity of the Israelitish races which were removed from their homes by the Assyrian kings.

Beni-Khalibir (Heb. for Sons of Kober), an Arabic tribe, supposed to be the descendants of the Rechabites (q. v.).

Benilda, Sr., was, according to tradition, the companion in martyrdom of St. Anastasius, a monk and priest of Spain, who suffered in 853, on the 14th of June. St. Benilda was put to death on the day following.

Benin, Religion of. The country which bears the name of Benin is a large tract of coast in western Africa, extending upwards of two hundred miles, and presenting a succession of broad estuaries, now discovered to be all branches of the Niger, of which this country forms the delta. It is a country of great commercial importance. The king is not only an absolute despot, but a fetish or god in the eyes of his subjects; and all offences against him are punished in the most severe and summary manner; not only as treason, but impiety. It is a crime to believe that the king either eats or sleeps, and at his death numerous human victims are sacrificed that they may accompany him to the other world, and wait on him there. Every tree three or four human beings are presented as votive offerings at the mouth of the river, with the view of attracting ships and a profitable commerce; and ifFnch and Doha are the leading forms of religion, although on great occasions the address to the Supreme Being, among whom they are called as Canon. They place implicit confidence in fetishes or charms, which they wear about the body or hang from some part of their houses; and they have also their Fetisoro, or fetish-man, by whose assistance they consult their fetishes on all important occasions. They worship the spirits of the dead, which they consider as keeping a deep interest in all human affairs. They believe that these spirits reside in the woods, and hence when a person is in difficulty or danger he retires to the forest, as he may implore the aid of the soul of his deceased friends. They make offerings to the evil spirit to appease his wrath and prevent him from inflicting injury. They practice circumcision, and sprinkle the blood of animals on the door-post of their houses, and upon all places where their fetishes are kept.

Benign, Francois, a French Jesuit preacher of the 17th century, was born at Avignon, and is especially known for his funeral oration, published in 1714 at Avig-on and at Lyons, under the title, Le Bouclier d'Honneur, ou sont représentées les beaux Fait de très-généreux et puissants Seigneurs, son Messeire Louis de Berton, Seigneure

Benish Days, a name given by the modern Egyptians to three days of the week, which are devoted more completely to pleasure than the other four, and in which they feel less bound to observe religious duties.
They are so called because the benish is worn more especially on these days, being a garment of the commoners, and not of ceremony. The Benish-days are Mondays, Wednesdays, and Saturdays. See Gardner, Fatha of the World, s. v.

Beniti, Philip, Saint, founder of the Order of Ser-vites, was born at Florence at the beginning of the 13th century. He studied at Florence and Paris, and took his degree of doctor of divinity at Padua. After returning home he entered a chapel belonging to the confraternity of the Annunciata, in order to hear mass. He saw at this time a vision of the Blessed Virgin, who seemed to invite him to join her company, at the same time presenting him with the black habit of the Annunciata.
He was received as a lay associate of the house, and after some time was sent to Sienna, where he entered the priesthood. Passing rapidly through all the offices of his order, he was created superior-general; and, upon the death of Pope Clement IV, died in order not to be elected his successor. After the election of Gregory X, Sept. 1271, he returned, and devoted himself to the extension of his order and to preaching. He passed through a great part of France, the Low Countries, Friesland, Saxony, and Upper Germany, where he established several houses. He died at Bologna, Italy, in the year 1274, and was canonized in 1271, by Clement X. His festival, which is one of obligation, is on Aug. 23. See Butler, vol. viii; Bailey, it, 350.

Benivieni, Dominico, a Florentine theologian (surnamed Scottino, on account of his deep research in theology), was professor of logic at Pisa in 1479, and canon at Florence in 1491. He was on terms of intimate friendship with Marsillo Finico and Jerome Savonarola. He died Dec. 3, 1507, leaving, Trattato in

Ben-Jacob, Isaac, a Jewish writer, who died at Wilna, in Poland, July 2, 1683, is best known as the author of a large bibliographical work, entitled Osar Ha-Sepharim, or Thesauros Librorum Hebraicorum Ram Impresorum quum Manuscriptorum (Wilna, 1680, 3 vols.). This work, which has been edited by Wilson, is a very important contribution to Hebrew literature, inasmuch as it contains the titles of 17,000 works, published till the year 1683. Written in Hebrew, the titles are given according to the Hebrew alphabet. For his other writings, see First, Bibli. Jud. i, 105 sq. (B. P.)

Benjamin, Saint, a deacon and martyr in Persia, was one of the most celebrated of those who suffered in the persecution commenced in 420 under Zeycejd, and continued under Bahram, or Varanes (surnamed Gour, the father of Bahram and successor. Benjamin was first thrown into prison for having spoken boldly in defence of the true faith before the king. Here he remained two years, at the end of which time the ambasador of the emperor, Theodosius the younger, obtained his release under promise of certain conditions—viz., that the prisoner should never again speak to the people of the court of our Blessed Lord, nor of his religion. To these conditions, however, Benjamin refused to accede, and began to preach Jesus Christ to all persons as soon as he was released. This he continued for a year, when the king, exasperated, caused the forest that he may implore the aid of the soul of his death or apostasy. St. Benjamin hesitated not an instant, and the king, after exposing him to tortures fearful even to read of, caused him to be put to death. His festival is marked in some martyrlo-gies on April 4. The Roman, however, places it on March 31; the Rituall, p. 806; Bailey, ii, 388, March 31; Butler, March 31.

Benjamin succeeded Tobias as sixth bishop of Jerusalem. He is one of the fifteen enumerated by Ensesiib (Hist. Eccles. iv, b) before Hadrian's days "all

Benjamin, Eastburn, a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the diocese of New York, began his ministry as rector of Christ Church, Ramapo, N. Y., in 1802. In 1834 he was assistant minister of St. Ann's, New York city; in 1868 he officiated in New York without a regular charge; in 1870 was rector of the Church of the Holy Light, New York city, a position which he retained until 1872, continuing thereafter to reside in New York. He died Sept. 8, 1874, aged thirty-eight years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1875, p. 145.

Benjamin, Judson, an American Baptist missionary, was born at Rodman, N. Y., Feb. 2, 1819, and was a graduate of Brown University in the class of 1846. He studied theology at the Newton Theological Institution one year (1847), and was ordained at Providence, R. I. Oct. 13, 1848, being under appointment as a missionary to Burmah. Sailing from Boston Oct. 21 of that year, he reached Tavoy, Burmah, April 9, 1849. He remained here about one year, and then removed, March, 1850, to Mergui, about ninety miles from Tavoy, which had become a missionary station in 1822. He devoted himself to the Salongs, collecting a vocabulary of twelve hundred words of their language, in which a Primer and Catechism were prepared. He was engaged in missionary work at this station nearly four years. He returned to the United States early in 1854, and died at Boston, Feb. 20, 1855. See The Missionary Jubilee, p. 296. (J.C.S.)

Benn, William, an English Nonconformist divine, was born at Egremont, in Cumberland, in November, 1600. He was educated at St. Bees, and at Queens College, Oxford. On leaving the university, he became rector of Oakingham, Berkshire, and afterwards chaplain to the marcheresses of Northampton. In 1629 he obtained the rectory of All Saints, Dorchester, and continued in that capacity until Bartholomew's day, when he was ejected for nonconformity. "In 1654 he was one of the assistants to the commissioners for ejecting such as were called scandalous, ignorant, and insufficient ministers and schoolmasters." After his own ejection, he continued to preach occasionally, and was sometimes fined and imprisoned. He died March 22, 1680. He published an Answer to Mr. Francis Bampfield's Letter, in Vindication of the Christian Sabbath Against the Jewish (Lond. 1672), and a volume of sermons on Soul Prosperity (1680). Benner, Johann Hermann, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born Dec. 15, 1659, at Giessen, where he also studied. In 1729 he accepted the position as afternoon preacher; in 1731 he received permission to deliver theological lectures, and in 1735 was appointed professor of theology. In 1739 he received a call from the Göttingen University, but as his salary was not large enough to let him go, he was obliged to remain in his native place. In 1735 he was appointed superintendent, and in 1770 ecclesiastical counsellor. He died July 8, 1782. He published, Diss. de Majestate Christi Divina (Giesswe, 1732); Diss. de Ecclesiis Mund. Bennet, Benjamin, a Baptist minister, was born in New Jersey in 1792. He received a public school education. Studied theology and was after licensed to preach by the minister of the Gospel at Middletown, N. J. Subsequently he was elected a representative from New Jersey to the Fourteenth Congress, and was re-elected to the Fifteenth Congress. His term of service continued from Jan. 15, 1815, to March 3, 1819. His death took place at Middletown, Oct. 8, 1840. See Poore, Congressional Directory, p. 290. (J. C. S.)

Bennet, George, at one time a Dissenting minister, subsequently in the Church of Scotland, published a work Against a Pretense of Reform (Lond. 1796)—and Olum Hameshenith, or a View of the Intermediate State as it Appears in the Records of the Old and New Testaments, the Apocryphal Books, in Heathen Authors, the Greek Fathers, &c. (ibid. 1815). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Bennet, James, a Scottish prelate, was chosen by the canons of St. Andrew's bishop of that see in 1328, and he obtained his episcopate by the collation of pope John XXII, before there was any account of the election. In 1329 he performed the office of setting the crown upon the head of David II, and soon afterwards was constituted chamberlain of Scotland. When Edward Baliol and his party prevailed, Bennet was forced to flee to Flanders, where he died, at Bruges, Sept. 22, 1332. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 23.

Bennet, John, an early English Wesleyan preacher, was a native of Derbyshire. He was converted under David Taylor, and commenced his itinerant labors in 1747. He labored in Derbyshire, Lancashire, and Cheshire, where he was impressed; his tact and bearing, however, soon gaining his release. On Dec. 26, 1752, he separated from the connection, taking a considerable part of the society with him, and formed an independent congregation at Bolton-le-Moors, Lancashire. He died Dec. 1, 1795, aged 60 years, leaving a widow and nine children. See Bolland, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Bennet, John, an English Baptist minister, was born in the village of Beaulieu, Hants, in 1790, and was brought up to the trade of a shoemaker. His mind was awakened by the Spirit of God, and he finally met with Isaac Tinsley through whose efforts he was converted. In 1818 he was baptized and joined the Church in Lymington; and in 1817 was one of twenty persons who were formed into a Church, at what was called Beaulieu Rails. In 1822 a prayer-meeting was started at Exbury, of which Mr. Bennet took the charge. Gradually he began to preach. At length a Church was formed at Blackfield Common, near by, and he was called to be its pastor, which position he held until his death, BENNET, Robert, D.D., an English Nonconformist divine, was educated at Oxford, and was presented to the rectory of Wadesdon, Buckingham, where he continued till he was ejected for nonconformity in 1662. He afterwards preached at Aylesbury, where he preached privately to a small congregation, and from thence removed to Abingdon, where he died, April 6, 1687. He wrote "an excellent work," entitled A Theological Concordance of the Synonymous Words in Scripture (1657). See Chalmers, *Bibl. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Bennett, William Crosby, a minister of the German Reformed Church, was born on Long Island, N. Y., April 14, 1804. He came to Pennsylvania when quite young; studied at York, Pa., and was ordained in 1839, and sent as missionary to the Carolinas. After laboring there successfully for five years, he returned to the North, and exercised his ministry in several fields in Pennsylvania, principally at Allentown, and subsequently in several County. He died in 1870. "He was a genial companion, and a warm friend. His appearance was venerable and dignified." See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Ref. Church, iv, 266-270. (D. Y. H.)

Bennett, Alfred, a Baptist minister, was born at Mansfield, Conn., Sept. 26, 1780. He was licensed to preach in 1806. In 1828 he accepted an appointment by the Board of Foreign Missions to visit churches and congregations, and he permanently gave himself to this work in 1832. He died May 10, 1851. An intellectual, well-balanced, and far-reaching mind gave him high rank among his denomination. He published a sermon entitled The Kingdom of Christ Distinguished from the Kingdom of Caesar. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vi, 338.

Bennett, Archibald, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Byron, N. Y., in 1807. He was converted at the age of twenty-two, and united with the Church in Byron. In 1840-41 he was especially interested in bringing about a union between the Free Communion and Free-will Baptist. In 1848 he moved to Waycross, Ga., and preached in several churches—viz. Paw Paw, Waverly, Jackson, etc., Mich., until the close of his life. He was engaged in about twenty revivals, witnessed over a thousand conversions, and baptised several hundreds. He died in Waverly, Oct 22, 1869. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1870, p. 80. (J. C. S.)

Bennett, Asa, a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, graduated from New Brunswick, 1824, and was licensed by the Classis of New Brunswick in his same year. His charges were, Schodack, Rensselaer Co., N. Y., 1824 to 1829; Ovill, Seneca Co., 1828 to 1838; Constantine, St. Joseph Co., Mich., 1843 to 1845. The date of his death is not known. See Conwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America, s. v.

Bennett, Charles Z., a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born in Rhode Island. His earlier years were devoted to the profession of music. Ordained by bishop Henshaw, he went to Crompton Mills under the direction of the Rhode Island Convo- cation. In the spring of 1849 he removed to Stonington, Conn., where he rendered gratuitous service to the rector of Calvary Church residing there. He died at Stonington, Conn., Jan. 26, 1900. See Mer. Quar. Church Rev., 1850, p. 158.

Bennett, James D.D., an English Congregational minister, was born in London, May 22, 1774. He was designed for business by his father, but on his conversion, in his nineteenth year, he resolved to enter the Christian ministry, and preached his first sermon near London, July 1, 1792. His marriage preparation was received at Gosport, and in 1796 he accepted a call to Romney, Hampshire, where he labored twenty-seven years. Mr. Bennett threw himself heartily into the great movements of the day, while at the same time he prosecuted his studies with untiring diligence. His talents soon attracted notice, and his influence was felt throughout the county. In 1823 he was invited to become the pastor and theological instructor of Rotherham College, and to be the minister of Masham Methodist Church. In 1815 he preached a sermon on "The Claims of London on the Zeal of Christians;" maintaining that London ought to have the services of the best ministers that could be found; and shortly afterwards, on earnest and unanimous solicitation, he accepted the pastorate of Silvester's Church, in that city. His labors in the pulpit, on the platform, and for the press, were incessant, and such only as with a sinewy frame and marvellous health could have been accomplished. In 1840 he was chosen chairman of the Congregational Union, and in 1860 he retired from public life. He died Dec. 4, 1882. Dr. Bennett's life furnishes a noble example for the imitation of students for the ministry. Without early educational advantages, he reached an extent of real and useful scholarship which few ministers have possessed. He valued time airt. He lost no moments. He rose at five o'clock A.M. all the year round, and was necessarily and unceasingly industrious in his studies and public duties. He was an eminently devout man, and conscientious in all his labors. Dr. Bennett was a voluminous author; besides several sermons, preached on special occasions, he published, Life of the Rev. Richard Darrocast (the "Star of the West") (Taunton) — Lectures on the History and Preaching of Christ (4 vols. 8vo) — and On the Acts of the Apostles (1 vol.) — The Congregational Lecture for 1841, on The Theology of the Early Christian Church :—The History of Dissenters, jointly with Dr. Bogue. He also wrote various smaller works, as well as books on controversial topics, in all of which the close thinker, keen logician, and tenacious writer are manifest. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1865, p. 206.

Bennett, John, an English Congregational minister, was born at Wellington, Somersetshire, March 12, 1803. His father was a soldier, a man of vigorous mind, and a "Unitarian;" his mother was a pious "Evangelical." To the latter he attributed his early conversion to God. Although he was a young scholar, he was very limited, by diligent and prayerful self-culture he became an intelligent, earnest, and successful village preacher. His earliest formal connection with ministerial life was as a home missionary—sometimes walking more than thirty miles on Sunday. Subsequently he was pastor at Braun- ton a short time, and twenty-two years at Northampton, when he resigned his charge, and, after living a few years at Slough, removed to Dalston, where he died, April 10, 1870. He was a laborious student; this, with his large-heartedness and his fidelity, made him an able minister of the New Testament. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1871, p. 304.

Bennett, Leonard, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Dublin, Ireland, June 16, 1756. He experienced religion in 1806; landed in America in 1807, and entered the New England Conference in 1810. He labored faithfully until 1833, when he became superannuated. In 1841 he removed to Illinois, and died there in 1847. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1847, p. 192.

Having spent eleven years upon laborious charges, and three as a superannuate, he died, Aug. 8, 1861. Mr. Bennett was a man of much personal and great success in the ministry. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1852, p. 151.

Bennett, Moses G., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Monmouth County, N. J., Jan. 29, 1820. He received the best Christian culture in early life; was converted at the family altar at the age of thirteen, and soon began laboring for the salvation of his associates and acquaintances. In 1845 he moved to Ohio, thither he appears to have fled to get rid of preaching. He even declined committing himself as a professor of religion. His society was looked upon as his unfaithfulness by being asked by the pastor of the place if ever he ever enjoyed religion. From that time he resumed his Christian activity, and in 1847 entered the Ohio Conference, wherein he served, as health permitted, with zeal and fidelity until his death, March 8, 1857. Mr. Bennett was a man of indefatigable energy and his unclouded eloquence. His social qualifications were of the first order, and as a friend he was devoted. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1857, p. 444.

Bennett, Perry, a Baptist minister, was born at Stonington, Conn., in 1824. He early evinced more than ordinary intellectual ability, and attained a high degree of scholarship without graduating from college. In 1852 he was ordained pastor of the Church in Lebanon, Conn., where he remained two years; was pastor at Cold Spring, N.Y., one year; and in the spring of 1856 removed to Winchester, Ill., and was pastor five years; then went to Berlin, Sangamon Co., in which county he labored for thirteen years with great success. The last two years of his life he had charge of a school in Springfield, supplying, for most of the time, the pulpit of the North Church in that city. He died Sept. 8, 1873. See Minutes of Ill. Annual Conferences, 1873, p. 15, 16. (J. C. S.)

Bennett, William, a Wesleyan minister in Nova Scotia, was born in England in 1770. He was sent out in 1807 as a missionary to Nova Scotia, there being at that time in the whole of British North America only three Wesleyan Methodist preachers besides himself. He travelled for twenty years and preached almost incessantly. "Among the sparse settlements of Cumberland County, in the forests of Hants, the village of Annapolis, along the rocky southern shore, in the province of New Brunswick and in the rising towns, he watched over the flocks gathered by Black and the brothers Mann, and formed many new societies." He became a superannuate in 1820; resided at Newport, N.S., until 1839; removed to Halifax in that year, was chaplain of the penitentiary, and died in that city, Nov. 6, 1858. Mr. Bennett was trustworthy and faithful to the interests of the Church. See Huestis, Memorials of Wesleyan Preachers in Eastern British America (Halifax, 1872), p. 19.

Bennet, William C, a German Reformed minister, was born on Long Island, N.Y., April 14, 1804. His early life was devoted chiefly to the missionary cause in the South. In 1824 he began his ministerial labors. In 1837 he came North and took charge of a congregation at Shippenburg, Pa., which he continued to serve until 1844. He died at Boiling Spring, Pa., April 12, 1870. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church, iv, 266.

Bennu, in Egyptian mythology, was the sacred bird of Osiris, probably a kind of lapwing. From its being supposed to accompany the soul through its journeys in the lower life, it was gradually accepted as its emblem, the emblem of its resurrection. It was further also a symbol of a period of time, the great cycle of 1256 years, which gave rise to the Grecian fable of the phoenix.

Benoi (or Benoit), an English theologian and biographer, entered the Order of St. Benedict, was prior of the Monastery of Canterbury, and afterwards priest of Peterborough. In 1189 he assisted at the coronation of Richard I, and in 1191 he was elected guard of the grand seal. He died in 1198, or, according to bishop Nicholson, in 1200. He wrote, Life of Thomas à Becket:—History of Henry II and Richard I, from 1170 to 1192 (Oxford, 1735, 2 vols., ed. Hearne). The English considered this the best history of the epoch. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Benoist, bishop of Marseilles in the first half of the 13th century, was one of the first Minorite Brothers, and also, it is said, a disciple of Francis of Assisi. In 1229 he was chosen arbiter by the Cardinal of San Angelo between the Minorites and the Monastery of St. Victor. He wrote a treatise entitled De Ecclenastic et Ordoni Totius Anni et Praepice Apostolico Dignitatis et Totius Curiae (Paris, 1689, in the Museum Italicum, ii, 118). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

In 774 he retired to the Abbey of St. Secine, where the friars desired to make him priest, but he refused, and withdrew to his native place near Aniane. He constructed a small hermitage near the chapel of St. Saturnin, upon the river of Anian. The strictness and sanctity of the life of this hermit drew around him a large number of disciples, so that in 782 he added a new monastery to the one already constructed. Louis the Debonnaire placed him in charge of all the monasteries of the kingdom of Aquitania, and charged him to establish everywhere the rules of the founder. He died in 821, at the monastery near Aix-la-Chapelle. His chief work was, Codex Regularum (Rome, 1661; Paris, 1653), in three parts: the first containing the rules of the Oriental fathers, the second those of the fathers of the West, and the third those of the fathers of the Church, for the friars and nuns. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

He travelled nineteen years, in thirteen circuits, to the edification and delight of his hearers. He was a man of culture, mental power, and piety. His health failed in 1852, and he removed to Sheffield as a supernumerary, where he died of typhus fever, Nov. 1, 1858. See Minutes of the Conference.

Allen McLean, of Simsbury, Conn., he was licensed to preach in 1825, and in the following year was ordained pastor at Middle Haddam. Thence he removed to Granby, where he was installed in 1833, and remained for six years. For eleven years, from 1839, he was pastor in Harwinton; after which, in 1850, he was installed pastor in Green’s Farms. His fifth and last pastorate was in Willington, and lasted for eight years, when he was constrained by the infirmities of age to resign his office, and soon after removed to Berlin, where he died July 23, 1869. Mr. Bentley was one of the most successful ministers of his day, and always very remarkable for his energy during his ministrations. He had one of the largest libraries in the country, which he bequeathed to Meadville College, Pa., and to the American Antiquarian Society at Worcester, Mass. He died Dec. 2, 1819. He published a great many single sermons. See Sprague, Sketches of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 154.

Bentley, William (2), a Baptist minister, was born at Newport, R. I., March 3, 1775. He removed to Boston, Mass., at the age of fourteen, and joined the Baptist Church in 1791. He commenced preaching in 1806; served as pastor at Woburn and at Malden, and became a settled pastor at Tiverton, R. I. He was ordained at Salem, Mass., Oct. 9, 1807. He subsequently preached at Worcester, Mass., and at Wethersfield, Conn. He died Dec. 24, 1855. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vi, 636; Baptist Encyclopedia, p. 96.

He was a printer by trade, and he published the Mississippi Christian Herald, at Natchez, and at the same time was editor and proprietor of the Natchez Courier. In 1837 he published the Southron, at Port Gibson. In 1838 he was licensed to preach and admitted into the Mississippi Conference. In its active ranks he travelled until 1842, when, on account of ill-health, he located. In 1845 he re-entered the conference, and, remained as faithful as health would admit until his sudden death, June 28, 1851. Mr. Benton was a pure man, zealous, devoted, unostentatious, generous, and much beloved. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1831-52.

Benton, Carloino N., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Franklin, Delaware Co., N. Y., Jan. 29, 1857. He was educated at the Union Theological Seminary of New York. He was licensed by Tioga Presbytery, and began his work as a missionary under the American Sunday School Union. He was ordained as pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Appalachia, N. He worked upon a farm until twenty-four years of age, but afterwards pursued academic studies and entered Amherst College, and subsequently Middlebury, where he graduated in 1836. After teaching two years in the academy at Randolph, Vt., he supplied the Church in Stafford ten months, and was ordained at Saxton's River, Vt., in 1847. From 1848 to 1855 he labored at St. Ignatius, under the Home Missionary Society, and the eight years following was pastor at Anamosa, la. He then received a commission as chaplain of the 31st Iowa regiment, and remained in that service till the close of the war. He died in Barnet, Vt., Nov. 19, 1864. Mr. Benton was "a readable, warm-hearted speaker, and his labors among the Western churches were greatly blessed." See Cong. Quarterly, 1866, p. 298.

Benton, Sanford, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Tolland, Conn., July 12, 1807. He was converted in early life, and in 1830 entered the New England Conference. From this time he devoted his time and talents to the work of soul-saving with a zeal and constancy rarely surpassed, until his death, Nov. 25, 1862. Mr. Benton was emphatically an excellent man. His Christian life was uniform and unexcelled. As a pastor he was laborious and devoted; as a preacher clear, earnest, pointed. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1866, p. 59.

Benton, William Austin, a Congregational minister, was born at Tolland, Conn., Oct. 11, 1817. He spent two years in Williams College, and twenty-one years of age, Yale, in 1841. Having given himself to the foreign missionary work, he was ordained May 18, 1847. In the following month he sailed as a missionary of the American Board for Syria and Palestine. Arriving in Beirut in October, he spent the winter in the study of Arabic, and in April, 1848, went to Aleppo, where he labored with zeal and success until February, 1851, when ill-health compelled him to return. Re-embarking for Syria in January, 1853, he established in April a missionary station at Bhamdun, on Mount Lebanon, where he continued until the spring of 1869. The remaining years of his life were spent in America. He died at Barre, Mass., Aug. 23, 1874. See Obituary Record of Yale College, 1875.

Benveniste, a name common to a number of Jewish writers, of whom we mention the following. See also Benbenista.

1. Chajim, rabbi at Smyrna, was born in 1600 at Constantinople, and died in 1673. He is the author of מְשָׁר תַּנּוּךְ כָּלָה, an extensive commentary on the Arba Turim of Jacob ben-Asher (q. v.), published at Constantinople, 1654.

2. Issakai, who died at Constantinople in 1627, wrote מְשָׁר תַּנּוּךְ כָּלָה, or a collection of fifty-two lectures on the Pentateuch, repentance, etc., edited by his son Abraham (Constantinople, 1678).

Benvenuto, Giovanni Battista (called L'Ortolano), an Italian painter, was born at Ferrara about 1490, and studied a few years in his native city, after which he visited Bologna and became a pupil of Bartolomeo Bagnacavallo. One of his best pictures is the Virgin and Infant, with saints, in the Church of St. Nicolo, 1529; in St. Maria he painted a Nativity; and in St. Agata, one Altarpiece. He died at Ferrara in 1525. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, a. v.

Ben-Zebah, Jeshuah Lieh, a Jewish philologist, was born not far from Cracow, in 1766, and died at Vienna, Feb. 25, 1811. Having devoted himself entirely to the study of philosophy and philology, in which latter department he especially distinguished himself, he resorted in 1787 to Berlin, where, at the age of twenty-one, he published the work of Saadia Gaon (q. v.), יַדֶּרֶךְ הָעֶשֶׂרָה, or Religion and Philosophy, with a twofold commentary (Berlin, 1798). He then went to Breslau, where he remained about ten years, and published in 1796 his highly esteemed ספרוֹ הַכַּל, a Hebrew grammar, written in Hebrew, of which improved editions appeared at Vienna, 1806, 1818, 1825; Königsberg, 1829. Two years later (1798), he issued from the press ספרוֹ הַכַּל, The Wisdom of Joshua the Son of Sirach, in Syriac with Hebrew letters, a Hebrew and German translation, and a Hebrew commentary. A new revised edition (Leipzig, 1817; Vienna, 1818, 1828, and 1844; and twelve months after, his ספרוֹ הַכַּל, The Book of Jethiel, translated into Hebrew and German, with a Hebrew commentary (Vienna, 1799), of which another edition appeared in 1819. He then went to Vienna, where he published his famous school-book ספרוֹ הַכַּל, composed of two parts (a) ספרוֹ הַכַּל, Method of Learning Hebrew; and (b) ספרוֹ הַכַּל, Ethics, of which improved editions appeared in 1809, 1825, and 1842. All his labors were, however, preparatory for his great work, his ספרוֹ הַכַּל, An Introduction to the Old Testament (Vienna, 1810, and since printed in the Vienna Bible Work, illbd. 1832-36, 19 vols.). Benzel, Henry, a prominent Swiss theologian, was born at Stengnas, Aug. 7, 1869. Having studied at Upsal and Altorff, he was in 1719 appointed professor of philosophy at Lund, was made in 1729 professor of Oriental languages, and in 1732 professor and doctor of theology. In 1738 he was appointed provost of Lund, and in 1740 bishop there. He succeeded his brother in the archbishopric of Upsal in 1747, and died May 20, 1758. He published, Syntaxa Dissertationum in Academia Lundensis Habitarum (Leipsig, 1748), containing an account of his extensive travels and researches, and in 1752-54, after the edition of J. J. Jocher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, a. v.; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. a. v. (B. P.)

Benedict, Jacob, a Swedish theologian, was born Feb. 25, 1688, at Upsal, where he also pursued his theological studies. In 1718 he was appointed professor of theology at Lund, and was made in 1725 doctor of divinity; in 1721 he became bishop of Gothenburg, and in 1744 archbishop of Sweden and Finland. He died June 14, 1747, leaving, Dissertation de Palestina: De Fatis Pontificum: De Prædestinatione Absoluta: S. Jocher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, a. v. (B. P.)

Benze肋, Erik, a learned Swedish prelate, son of one who bore the same name, was born at Upsal in 1675. He was well versed in theology, languages, antiquities, and history. Returning from his travels in the principal countries of Europe, he became successively professor of theology, bishop of Gothenburg, of Linköping, and archbishop of Upsal, which position his father had formerly held. He died in 1748, leaving, Monumenta Sueco-Gothica: Ulfilas Illustratus: A work upon the history of Sweden, editions of several histories of the North Channel, and Cycles Judaicae, translated from Moses Maimonides. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, p. 193; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. a. v.

Beosch (Lat. Beos or Beosus), bishop of Ardcarne, in Roscommon, was a son of Ollam, of the race of Lugaidh. He was a disciple of St. Patrick; being possibly the St. Beatus, bishop of Dunchurch, of whom St. Evinus writes in his Tripartite Life of St. Patrick. He died March 8, 524, and his bell "Ceolan-Beosidh," covered with gems and kept in a silver case, is said to have been used in the service in the Church of Knockagh, Co. Cleiragh. See Colgan, Acta Sanctorum, p. 562-63, and Tr. Thamn. p. 156, c. 22; Kelly, Col. of Tr. Saints, p. 89; O'Conor, Rev. H. Script. ii, 130; O'Donovan, Four Masters, i, 170, 171.

Becall. There are several names of this name, but only two of them can be treated in detail.

1. Bishop of Tullchuehillim (or Feighchhallin, County Kildare, Ireland), was a son of Nessan, of the race of Cathaor Mór of Leinster. He was abbot of Ard-cuillín and of Feighchhallin (if they were not identical), and at the latter his feast is celebrated Aug. 8.

2. Bishop of Tamlacht-Menan—commemorated Oct. 26. The Mart. Doney, at this date, associates him with Meallain, and states that he was "Loca Coireach in Uoieth-Uaithi" (Iveagh, County Down). The other mar- cryologies call him a Briton, but the writer of St. Fursey's Life says that the "two venerable men" (Beoan and Meldan) were of the province of South Munster (Lamigan, Ecl. Hist. of Ireland, ii, 455, 456; Reeves, Eccles. Antiq. p. 112-114). He is frequently mentioned in the Irish Life of St. Patrick, and Meldan, his companion, was "sineactus seu pater spiritualis" of St. Fursey. St. Fursey took their relics with him when he left Ireland, and deposited them in the chapel dedicated to Sts. Peter and Paul on the top of the hill of Cignes, at Peronne, in France. Beoan flourished in A.D. 590, but he must have died before 626, as he appears in St. Fursey's vision.

Beode. See BORTITHUS.

Beog (or Beocch), an Irish saint, commemorated Oct. 25, is most probably the St. Dabeoc who, when living in a "penal cave" on the island in Lough Derk, afterwards made famous as the scene of St. Patrick's Purgatory, saw a bright light in the north, and told his disciples that this represented the glory of St. Columba. He afterwards bore his name in that region. His Life is given by O'Hanlon, Lives of Irish Saints, i, 11-16.

Beoggin, abbot of Bangor, County Down, Ireland—commemorated as a saint Aug. 22—succeeded St. Comgall, A.D. 600; and died in 655. In the Four Masters (by O'Donovan, i, 201) is given a wild legend, in which Sts. Comgall and Beoan are engaged in the capture of a salmon, which proves to be Liban, the daughter of Eochaidh, who had been drowned in Lough Neagh. See Colgan, Acta Sanctorum, p. 1-3; O'Conor, Rev. H. Script. ii, 149; Reeves, Eccles. Antiq. p. 55, 265, 376.

Beonna (Blinna or Bynna), the name of several early English ecclesiastics. (1.) A Mercian witness to charters, about 730. (2.) A Mercian abbot, who attests... charters from 767 onwards. He appears to have been abbot of Peterborough, and attended the great Council of Clovesho, of 808, in attendance on the bishop of Lichfield; and continued to sign charters until 865. It is just possible that he is (3) the Beonna who became bishop of Hereford in 823, and died in 830. His relics were, according to Hugh Candidus, preserved at Brede.

Beorchgyth (or Berhtgyth), an early English abbot who addresses two letters to a man named Balthard, probably her brother, desiring to see him. If the Balthard in question be the Kentish nobleman of that name, Berhtgyth would seem to have been in a German monastery. She was a daughter of the missionary abbot Chunnihit, aunt of Lulius, sent by Boniface to Thuringia.

Beorthwald. See Berthwald.

Beorwald, abbot of Glastonbury, early in the 8th century, has been confounded erroneously with Beorthwald, archbishop of Canterbury. All that is known of him is in connection with St. Boniface. He is said to have taken part in a West-Saxon synod, in which Boniface was sent to the archbishop of Canterbury, to make certain inquiries, between 710 and 716 (Willibald, Life of Boniface). There is a letter of archbishop Britwald to Beorwald of Sherborne, ordering him to order Beorwald to receive a captive girl, which he had refused to do at the archbishop's personal request. In the list of the abbots of Glastonbury given by William of Malmsbury, he appears twice, first as Beorthwald the sixth, and again as Beorwald the seventh, abbot; but in the more ancient list he is placed fourth.

Bera, Jacob. See Jacob Berar.

Berach (Lat. Varus) was a name of several early Irish ecclesiastics. (1) The abbot of Bangor, County Down, who succeeded Segain, son of O’Conn, in 665, and died of the great plague in 664. He is commemorated April 21. (2) A better-known Berach was abbot of Cluaincarph, now Killarney. Feb. 15 is the day observed in his memory, but the dates of his Acts are uncertain. He was the son of Nenmald, of the race of Dobitha, and was born at Gortnauchla, near Cool, Feb. 15, 521. He was successively under St. Daiglo and St. Kevin, and the place of his monastery was pointed out by a stag which carried his baggage. The date of his death is uncertain, but it probably occurred before the close of the 6th century. St. Angelus counts him among the bishop-saints of Ireland.

Beraldino, Paulino. See Berardini.

Berardine, Gabrielle, a French martyr, belonged to the Church of Geneva, in France. He was taken to Chambrey, and put in prison for rebuking a priest, who in his sermon had abused the name of God. He first had his tongue cut off, and then was burned. This occurred in 1530. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv. 407.

Beradunio (or Beramuccio), Machimen Antonio, an Italian theologian and jurist, native of Biseglia, in the kingdom of Naples, who lived in the latter half of the 16th century, wrote Somma Eora de' Confessori, dove si Tratta d' Agra Sorte di Restituzioni, Ueare et Cambii (1591). See Hoefen, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Berard of Carpi, in Umbria, Saint and Martyr, was one of the six monks whom St. Francis of Assisi sent from Italy into Spain, to convert the Moors. Berard (who knew a little of Arabic) was appointed the chief of the mission; they penetrated to Seville, where they preached in the mosque. The Moors, taking them for madmen, drove them from the mosque; but, when they tried to convert the prince, sent them to Morocco; where they were cast into prison, but, having escaped, they began again to preach in public. The king, having tried in vain to silence them, was greatly exasperated, and with his cimeter split open their heads, Jan. 15,1220. Dom Pedro, infante of Portugal, brought their bodies to Portugal, and placed them in the Church of the Holy Cross, at Coimbra. Pope Sixtus IV canonized them Aug. 7, 1481; and their life was written by the infante Dom Pedro mentioned above. See Baillet, i, 210, Jan.

Berardi, an Italian theologian of the Augustinian order, who lived at Savona, in the latter half of the 15th century, wrote, Commentaria in Omnes D. Paulo Epistolae:—Sermones:—Tractatus de Haereticis sui Temporis. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Berardi, Carlo Sebastiano, a famous Italian canonist, was born at Oueglia, Aug. 26, 1718. He studied theology in the Jesuits as a priest, a native of these holy orders, and afterwards betook himself to the study of jurisprudence, especially of canon law. In 1749 he was appointed prefect of the Law-college at the Royal Academy; in 1754, professor of law at the University of Turin, and died in 1768. He wrote, Grattis Canonica, Generali ab Aporophysis, Dictis Corruptis et Emendatiorum Collecta Fiderem Erecut, Dignissimae Communis Interpretatione Illustrati (Taur. 1752—53; Venet. 1777, 1778):—De Vagia Sacror. Cronicum Collectionis ante Gratianum, printed with the foregoing:—Commentaria in Juris Ecclesiasticum Universam (Taur. 1760 sq.; Venet. 1778, 1789; Lauret, 1847);—Institutiones Juris Ecclesiastici (Taur. 1760);—Lezioni e Scrittori d’Italia, ii, 2, 910; Vallauri, Storia delle Università degli Studi del Piemonte, iii, 219; Schulte, Geschichte der Quellen und Literatur des canonicum Rechts, iii, 1, 824; Mühler, in Wetzl u. Welt's Kirchenlexikon, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Berard, Fabio, an Italian engraver, was born at Siena in 1729. He studied under Vedel and was master of engraving. The following are a few of his principal religious prints: St. Seraphinus Worships the Cross; Isaac Blessing Jacob, and the Sacrifice of Gideon; and Jacob and Rachel. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Berardi, Timoteo, an Italian theologian of the order of Carmelites, a native of Genoa, was bishop of Noli in 1588, and died in 1616. He wrote, Declama- tiones Panegyricae de Sacra Fide et de Romano Pontifice; also some small philosophical and theological treatises. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bérardier, Denis (surnamed Feuillon), a French priest, professor, and member of the first national assembly, was born at Quimper in 1729. He was the son of a merchant of Quimper, and first pursued his studies at the Jesuit school at that place. At Paris, where he afterwards went, he studied philosophy and theology, and became doctor at the Sorbonne. At the time of the expulsion of the Jesuits in 1762, he was appointed by M. de la Chalais principal of the College of Quimper, to which institution he presented a cabinet of natural sciences, very valuable for that epoch. The opposition which he encountered on the part of the Jesuits, it is said, led him to abandon Quimper. March 19, 1778, he was appointed principal; May 1, 1780, administrator; and in 1787 grand-master of the College Louis-le-Grand, at Paris. From this time he was found mingling with men, and in the memorable affairs of the epoch. He numbered among his pupils Luce of Lancial, Camillus Desmo- lins, and Maximilian Robespierre. Camillus saved his life Sept. 2, and still later, in 1793, he turned away from the dwelling of his master the dangers which were threatened to him. As to Robespierre, he obtained at the close of his course of study, at the recommendation of Berardier, a gratuity of six hundred pounds. Berardier held his position in 1789, as assist- ant deputy of the clergy at the constituent assembly, when he opposed the civil constitution of the clergy. He signed the protestation against this act, and naturally refused the bishopric of Quimper, to which he was elected. He became grand-master of the College of Conformity, and died in 1794. He wrote, among other works, L'Eglise et Constitution fondamentale prônées (Paris, 1792).—Les Principes de la Foi sur le Gouvernement de l'Eglise, etc. (ibid. 1791). This work had fourteen editions in less than a month, and were entitled Les Vrais Principes de la Constitution du Clergé. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Berardin (Bernardini or Berardinini), Paulino, an Italian theologian of the Dominican order, was born at Lucca about 1515, and died at Naples in 1583. His principal works are, Quodlibeta Theologica: — Tabulae sive Index Sententiarum in Commentario Thoma Cojetiani super Summam Th. Thomasa de Aquino:—Chronica Ordinis:—Concordia Ecclesiastica contra pulli ex Hereticis:—Defensione della Vita e della Dottrina del P. Gerol. Sacromarola.—Narrazione e Dscorsio circa la Monteselloni in 1598, and at La Bertinella in 1607. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Béraud (or Béraud), Armand Bernard, a French theologian, who lived in the early half of the 18th century, wrote, Thesae Theologicae (Paris, 1717):—Traité des Annates, etc. (Amsterdam, 1718). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Béraud (or Béraud), Michel, a French Protestant theologian, was born about 1550, at Mans. About the year 1556 he left the convent of the Dominicans of his native place, and joined the Reformed Church. In 1560 he was received into the evangelical ministry, and ministered to the Church at Ladève from 1561 to 1562, and at Béziers from 1563 to 1564. Being driven away from the latter place, he went to Montauban. In 1576 he was at Puylaurens, and in 1576 again at Béziers. Being obliged to leave this place a second time, he became pastor at Réalmont. In 1579 he was appointed pastor and professor of theology at Montauban, where he died, July 11, 1610. He took a very active part in the affairs of the Reformed Church, and presided at the national synods held at Montauban in 1594, at Castres in 1599, and at La Borbonne in 1607. Of his numerous works we mention, Athénaeaeus Athaieus, Philosophie Christien, touchant la Résurrection des Morts (Montauban, 1583):—Briève et Claire Défense de la Vocation des Ministres de l'Ecclede, etc. (ibid. 1598):—Epistola Apologetica ad Plenarium Fuum Seminarii:—Disputationum Prima de Sacra Theologia (1608). See Lichtenberg, Encyclopédie des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Béraud-Bercais, Antoine Henri de, a French Jesuit, was born Nov. 2, 1722, at Brieg, near Metz; and died as canon of Noyon in 1744. He is the author of a popular Church history—Histoire de l'Eglise (Paris, 1779-80), a volume—comprising the period from the founding of the Church to the year 1772. This work has often been reprinted, with corrections and a continuation, by Guillon (Beaunoy and Paris, 1820—21, 12 vols.); by Pelier de Lacroix (Ghent, 1829—33, 18 vols.); by count Rubino ( Lyons and Paris, 1842, 16 vols.). The fifth edition, coming down to the year 1844, was published by Henriot (Paris, 1844, 19 vols.). It was also translated into Italian and German. See Funk, in Wetter u. Welt's Kirchenlexikon, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Berber Version of the Holy Scriptures. The whole of the interior of Northern Africa is inhabited by the Berbers, representatives of the ancient Libyan race. The language is not distinct from the Arabic, but the principal are the Amazigh or Berbers of Northern Atlas; the Shellalas, who inhabit the southern part of the same mountain chain; the Kabyles of the Algerine and Tunisian mountains; and the Tuaregs tribes of Sibah, Sokna, and the Western desert. A translation of the first twelve chapters of St. Luke into the Algerine-Berber (or Shouwah) dialect of the Berber language spoken by the Kabylie tribes was published by the British and Foreign Bible Society in 1886, from a MS. which included the four Gospels and the book of Genesis, and which was purchased by the society of Mr. Hodgson, American consul at Algier. This is the only part hitherto published. See Bible of Every Land, p. 403. (B. F.)

Bercarius. See Bertcharius.

Berchan (Lat. Berchanus and Barachianus). Several of these name are found in Irish hagiography, of whom but little is known. Of this class are Berchan of Cluain Mainne, who is mentioned in the Martyrologium Hibernum for June 5; Berchan of Cluain-Caoi, May 24; Berchan of Inis-Roecha, in Loch Erne, Nov. 24; and Berchan, son of Neman, brother of St. Sedna of Killain. Of those better known are:

1. Of Cluain-Sosta—commemorated Dec. 4. The Martyrology, calls him "bishop and apostle of God, of Cluain-Sosta, in the Faillige." He was the son of Maireadh-bach, of the race of Caibre Righfoda; and was called also Ferdi-leithe (the man of two portions), as he spent his life in Alba, and the other half in Erin. The Scotch calendars place this saint's day on April 6, and make him bishop in the Orkneys. Camararius says that he was celebrated for the presence of St. Columba, who had committed his youth in the monastery of St. Columba, near there. He has several places in Scotland named after him, and his grave was said to be in Inishmore, in Galway Bay. See Colgan, Acta Sanctorum, p. 713, n. 1; Forbes, Kal. of Scot. Saints, p. 279; O'Grady, Leb. on Anc. Ireland, iii, 68.

2. Or Eochiaim—commemorated May 7. From the dates and other circumstances this Berchan seems to be the Eochiaim of the race of Cola-Dachrioch, whom Colgan gives (Acta Sanctorum, p. 782—83) as brother of St. Cairnch and St. Rouan.

3. The Irish calendars, under April 10, give Berchan as one of the saints especially venerated in Eoch (or Eog), in the Hebridies of Scotland, and this may be the Berchan who was so troublesome to St. Columba on account of his inquisitive disposition. See Colgan, Ty. Thaum.

4. Abbots of Glas Naoidhain, in Fine Gallow—celebrated Oct. 12—is more generally known as Moh-McClareachin (of the first five), and the place of his dedication is now Glassnevin. He was the race of Finn Futhairt, and Uamhain, daughter of Finnbar, was his mother. "The extraordinary universal plague through the world, which swept away the noblest third part of the human race," broke up his monastery at Glassnevin about A. D. 544 (or 545). A medieval MS. of St. Brendan's Monast. Hibenn, p. 119, there is mentioned among the canons regular of St. Augustine, "Glasena-Odheast, St. Mobyus, alias Mobyus."

Bercharius (or Bererius), Saint, a French ecclesiastic, was born in the 7th century, in one of the provinces of Aquitaine. He was educated by St. Nirvadius of Rheims, and retired into the monastery of Luxeuil, in Burgundy, where St. Wulbertus was abbot. After many years thus spent he returned to Rheims, and St. Nirvadius built, at his request, the monastery of Hautvilliers, of which Bercharius was appointed the first abbot, and united the rules of St. Columbanus and St. Benedict. In 673 St. Nirvadius died, and subsequently Bercharius founded two other monasteries in the forest of Der—one, for men, called Montier-en-Der, and another, for nuns, called Peulle-Moutier—which no longer exists. Bercharius left Hautvilliers, and became abbot of Montreuil; he then went on a pilgrimage to Rome, and in 674, when he was abbey, published one of his monks, named Daguinus (his godson), the wretched man stabbed him in the night; he died on Easter-night, A. D. 676. His festival is marked on the 16th of October, the day of his translation. See Mabillon, Sec. Den. par. ii; Ballot, iii, 282, Oct.—Laudon, Eccl. Dict. s. v.
Berchère, Carle le Gouz de la, a French theologian, was born at Dijon about 1647. He was successively archdeacon of Aix, of Alby, and of Narbonne, where he died, June 2, 1719. He wrote, Statuta Synodaux de Lurion (Toulouse, 1679) — Haaruge au Roi Louis XIV in 1791, etc. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Berchere (or Bercholle; Lat. Bercherius or Bercorius), Pierre, a learned French Benedictine, a native of St. Peter du Chemin, near Maillezais in Poitou, was born about the beginning of the 14th century. He was prior of the monastery of St. Eloy, which at that time belonged to the Benedictines. He died at Paris in 1362. He wrote Reductorium, Repertorium et Dictionarium Morale utrisque Testamenti, etc. (Strassburg, 1474; Nuremberg, 1489; Cologne, 1681–92). This is a learned work, in which the author treated of Jewish criticism, philosophy, physics, medicine, anatomy, geography, and astronomy. A translation of this work by Richard Leblanc was published at Paris in 1584. Berchere also translated into French, by order of king John, the Roman History of Livy. This translation, of which several fine manuscripts are to be found in the Imperial Library, was published under the title Les Grandes Décades de Titus Livius, etc. (Paris, 1514–15). He composed several other works which have been lost. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Wetzer u. Welt, Kirchenlexikon, s. v.

Berchmann, Johann, a German theologian of the Jesuit order, who lived in the early half of the 17th century, is revered as a saint. Hugo (Antwerp, 1630); into French by Cachet (Paris, 1630); into Spanish by Jos. Ozlina. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Berechtorius. See Berchere. Berechthun is the name of two early English prelates.

1. A bishop of Lichfield, the thirteenth in the ancient lists, succeeded Cuthbirt, whose death is placed in some MSS. of Florence in 767. Little or nothing is known of his history, but he is mentioned by Matthew Paris in his Lives of the Offices. He is there made archbishop of Lichfield and confounded with bishop Humbert, who lived a half-century later. See Wharton, Ang. Soc. vi, 409.

2. Otherwise styled Brithhunus, deacon of John of Beverley, bishop of York, was abbot of John's monastery of "Inderauda," or Beverley, when Bede wrote. According to the fragments of the history of Beverley preserved by Leland (Collectanea, iii, 155), he died May 15, 748; but, according to Capgrave, he died in 740. He was buried at Beverley near his master.

Berechtold, count Leopold de, a German philanthropist and traveller, was born in 1738. He was versed in eight different languages; travelled in Europe, Asia, and Africa, and exposed himself in Turkey to great danger in order to study the means of preventing and of curing the plague; was a zealous propagator of vaccination, and consecrated his whole immense fortune to the relief of the evils of humanity, and to found establishments of beneficence. In 1806 he collected offerings of wheat in order to maintain the inhabitants of Riesengebirge, who were a prey to famine. At the beginning of the cholera, he was served as an asylum for the sick and wounded. Berechtold died of typhoid fever developed in this improvised hospital, in 1809. He wrote, An Essay to Direct and Extend the Inquiries of Patriotic Travellers (Lond. 1789); translated into French by P. de Lasteyrie (Paris, 1797): — Courte Méthode pour Rappeler à la Vie toutes les Personnes Adultes de Mort Apparente (in German, Vienne, 1791); the author translated this work into several languages. He also published the Tables, in which artists give advice for the cure of the sick. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

He studied at Helmstedt, and after having acted as pastor at several places, in 1721 was appointed general superintendent at Hildesheim, and in 1726 for the same office at Osterroda. In 1735 he was deposed from his office, and had to leave the country. He died at Nordhausen, Feb. 22, 1743. He published Evangelische Glaubens-Lebens- und Gewissenslehre. Bérat (1 Mac. ix, 4). Lient. Conder (Tent Work, ii, 385) proposed to identify this place with Birèk, which, however, has long since been settled as the site of Beeroth.

Berecutus (Berechcert, or Berictus) is the name of a Scottish and an Irish ecclesiastic of early date:

1. A saint by this name is mentioned by Wion. He is said to have died in 720, and is commemorated Feb. 24. See Forbes, Kat. of Scot. Saints, p. 278.

2. On Dec. 6 the Irish hagiologists place Berchetra, or Berucus, of Tulachleigh, now Tullylease, County Cork. He is given as brother of Sta. Gerald, Balamus, and Hubrit. The Bollandists (Acta SS. Feb., ii, 833 sq.), in their Life of St. Beruch, would identify Berucus with him. The Nollaig na Méire gives the death of "Berricht of Tulachleigh" Dec. 6, 839.

BERECHYNAH, in Greek mythology, was the usual surnames of Cyphe, from the mountain-range Ber-cynthes, in Phrygia, where she was principally worshipped.

BERESFORD, or Beresfors, was seven persons in Beverley Minister who act as rectors of choir; their amesses were probably lined with bear-skin, or fells, whence their name.

BEREGAZZI, Peter, a Protestant Hungarian theologian, lived at Grosseradein, Hungary, near the close of the 16th century. He wrote, Aduersaria de Contro-

BEREYUS, Geronimo, a Spanish Protestant theol-

1676. He wrote, Diap. de Insectis:—De Amplificandae República:—De Indulgentiis Papaliis. See Hoefer,

BEREN (or Jura), in the mythology of India, was the hunter who killed Krishna without being aware of it; for the god, sleeping under a tree, had forgotten to cover up the bright signs of his divinity on the soles of his feet, and thus Jura, aiming at this mark, robbed Vishnu, in the highest incarnation, of his life.

BÉRENGREY, Raymond, a native of Dauphiné, celebrated grand-master of the Order of St. John of Jerusalem, rendered himself illustrious by his valor, and was raised to the dignity of grand-master in 1365. In conform with the orders of King Louis of Cyprus, he destroyed the Egyptian privateers that infested the sea in the vicinyty of the islands of Rhodes and Cyprus. He then went into the midst of the siege before Alexandria, took it after two very deadly assaults, burned all the buildings which were in the port, pillaged the city, and terminated the expedition by the sack of Tripoli.

SYRIA. In 1731 Urban V sent him to the isle of Cy-pus to appease the troubles caused by the death of the king, Peter. Bérenger held two general chapters in order to re-establish the discipline of his order.
This was at first very difficult, but his reforms were at last approved in an assembly convoked at Avignon by Clement V, and Bérenger was placed in this assembly on account of his advanced age. He died at BERENGOSIOUS, abbot of St. Maximin of Treves, who lived at the commencement of the 12th century, wrote

De Laudibus et Inventione Sancta Crucis, de Mysterio Ligni Domini. These sermons were published in the Biblioth. Patrum, vol. iv (Paris, 1697). The commentary upon the Apocalypse which was found under the gusie of anonymous at the end of the works of St.
Ambrose is attributed to Berengosius. See Hoefer,

BERENGUER, Pedro Juan Morales, a Spanish theologian who lived at Valencia in the early half of the 17th century, wrote Universal Exposition de los Mys-terios de Nuestra Santa Fe (Valencia, 1608). See Hoe-

BERENICE, in Greek mythology, was the daughter of king Ptolemy Philadelphus of Egypt and of Arsinoé, who was married to her brother Ptolemy. When the latter went to Syria to war, Berenice, who loved him dearly, shaved off her hair to Venus in the event of his safe return, and placed it in the temple of Aphrodite and the Pythian. On the following day it was missed, and the Samian astronomer Conon affirmed that it had been placed among the stars. There may be found by the name of "hair from the head of Berenice" a group of stars near the tail of the Lion in the northern heavens, from 170° to 203° in a straight ascension.

Its stars are all of or below the fourth magnitude, and many nebulous mists. Berenice herself was adored as an Egyptian goddess in the city of Memphis under Ptolemy V.

BERENT, Simon, a German theologian of the Jesuit order, was born in Prussia about 1855. He became confessor of prince Alexander of Bologna, and accom-

BERENTZ, Christian, a German Reformed minister, was born at Baltimore, Md., in 1794. He was licensed to preach and ordained in 1829. In 1830 he was located at Johnstown, Cambria Co., Pa., where he labored until 1842, and then removed to Hillsborough, Highland Co.,

he resided without a regular charge until his death,

BERES are monks of Mingrelia in the Caucasus.
They are initiated or admitted into the body by having a calot, or leathern cap, put upon their head, and from that time they are bound to abstain from animal food, and receive their instruction from the other Beres. They read mass in the Georgian language. They very frequently fast, and should they omit so important a duty they imagine that the guilt of such a sin can only be removed by a second baptism. They prohibit the eating of every kind of flesh, claiming that our Lord never tasted animal food during his whole life, and that he celebrated the paschal supper with fish only. The Beres are not dressed like monks, but they take difference, that they let their hair and beard grow. They are also trained up from childhood to abstinance.

The name of Bére is also given to Mingrelian nuns of different kinds. Some are young women who have renounced marriage; others are servants, who, after the death of their masters, become suppliants with their mistresses; others are widows who never marry again, or in some cases divorced wives; while many have embraced the life of a Bére from poverty. All these nuns of Mingrelia are dressed in black, and have their heads covered with a black veil. They are not confined in convents, and are free from the religious life without being chargeable with any breach of vow.

BERESFORD, James, an English clergyman and writer, was born in 1764, and died in 1840. He pubmam Life; or, The Last Grooms of Timothy Teney and Samuel Sensible, etc. (1806-7, 2 vols.)—Bibliotheca, borne, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Irish prelate, was born at Tyrone House, Dublin, Nov.
22, 1773. He was the second son of the right hon.

After leaving Eton School, he went to Christ Church, Oxford, and took the degree of B.A. in 1793. At the age of twenty-three was appointed dean of Christ Church which office he held until 1805, when, March 24, he was consecrated bishop of Cork and Ross. In 1807 he was translated to the see of Haphoe, and to that of Clough-er in 1815, and to the archbishopric of Dublin in 1820. He succeeded to the archbishopric of Armagh in June, 1822, and became chancellor of the University of Dublin in 1851, having held the position of vice-chancellor for more than twenty years. In 1850 the see of Clough-er again came under his jurisdiction. He died July 19, 1862. His liberality was conspicuous. On Armagh cathedral he spent nearly £30,000, and in one year he expended £1100 in stipends to poor curates. For many years he wholly supported the fever hospital of Armagh, with its forty patients, and it was no uncommon thing for him to disburse £1000 in a single year in private charities. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. Apr., 1863, p. 155.

Bereshith (בראשית), in the beginning, the name given by the Jews to the book of Genesis, because it opens with this word in Hebrew.

BERESHITH is also the second part of the Jewish Cabala, and is so called from the first word which occurs in the book of God.

Bereshith Rabba is the title of a midrash or commentary on Genesis, composed in Palestine in the 6th century. The last five chapters, commencing with the section "Ani Yehi" (Qohelet xxviii, 12 sq.), here also called "Voichi Rabba", are modern, probably of the 11th century. A careful examination of this midrash proves that its author made use of Bar-Sira or Ben-Sira, Mishna, Tosehpit, Sifre, Sifri, Mechilta, Seder Olam, the Onkelos Version and Jonathan Targum, etc. This midrash is now accessible to students in the German translation published by G. Ratz in his Zentralblatt (Leips., 1880). Besides Zunz, Gottesdienstliche Vortrage, p. 174-179, 254-256, see especially the prize-essay of M. Lerner, Anlage des Bereshith Rabba und seine Quellen, published in Berliner und Hofmanns Magazin fur die Wissenschaft des Judenthums, 1880, iii, 157 sq.; iv, 197 sq.; 1881, i, 90 sq. (B. P.)

Beresovsky, Maximus Sognovtch, a Russian composer, in music, and first reformer of the ecclesiastical chant in Russia, was born in 1795 in the city of Glouchkoff, which was also the birthplace of another great musician, M. Bortniansky. Beresovsky studied at first at the ecclesiastical academy of Kief. Being called, on account of his fine voice, to the chapel of the empress Elizabeth, he was there the object of general attention. He was sent, at the expiration of the crown, to perfect himself in singing and composition, at Bologna, with Martini, the most celebrated professor of the epoch. He spent nine years at Bologna, where he became master of the chapel and member of the Academy. On account of harsh deceptions which awaited him on his return to Russia, he obtained neither the consideration nor employment he had anticipated. He died of chagrin two years after. The compositions of this predecessor of Bortniansky are numerous and breathe a profound sentiment, and are simple as well as expressive. His reforms were welcomed throughout all Russia. Berezat, in Zendic mythology, was a holy mount in the centre of the earth, from whose side flowed the sacred river Arvany.

Berezeskung, in Persian mythology, is one of the five kinds of fire which is distributed in all creations of Omuzd, even in the earth, in mountains, and in naphtha springs. It was this fire mainly whose cultus spread over a great part of Asia, and of which rays penetrated to India, Tibet, Mongolia, and Turkey. Baku, with its naphtha springs, seems to have been the central place of devotion for the fire-worshippers.

Berg, Franz, a German canon and professor of theology, was born in 1753 at Frickhausen-on-the-Main. He received holy orders in 1777, and acted for some time as priest. In 1785 he was made profesor extraordinarius and in 1790 ordinarius of theology at the Würzburg University. About that time he published his De Clemente Alexandrino ejusque Moravit Doctrina (Würzburg, 1779), and his Oratio Additialis de Origine Ritualium Ecclesiasticum, qui circa Aequam Veranunt (1786). In his lectures he maintained that Christianity was but a mere human work, the teaching of Jesus that of a wise man. His ambition led him to write against Schelling and Kant. His own philosophical system he laid down in his Epikritik der Philosophie (1805), in which he criticises the philosophical process and the science of knowledge. He died in 1821 at Würzburg. He was learned in history, law, and politics. On his return from his travels in the Netherlands, England, France, Switzerland, Italy, Hungary, and Poland, he performed the functions of ambassador in the different cities of Europe. In 1751 he returned to his own country, and consecrated, by testament, all his property towards creating a capital which should be used for the education of the children of his compatriots. He was a man of vast learning, and was well versed in Oriental languages, especially the Arabic, and he introduced into the University of Dussburg an exact translation of the sacred books. He wrote, Specimen Animadversionum Philosoph. ad Selecta V. T. Loca (Leiden, 1761); — Reformationsgeschichte der Länders Jülicher, Clerc, Berg, etc. (ibid. 1769). He took an active part in the publication of some works of his friends, under the title: Symbole Litterarum Dussburgensier, ad Incrementum Scientiarum a Variis Amici Amice Collate, ex Hogania Facta Dussburgensier (vol. i, pt. ii, 1783; vol. ii, pt. i, 1784; pt. ii, 1786). He was educated in the Moravian institutions at Fulinc, England, 1816-25. In 1825 he came to the United States, and was placed in the Moravian school at Nazareth, Pa. He was made teacher of chemistry at Nazareth in 1829, when only seventeen years old, and while he was pursuing theological studies. In 1831 he was licensed, and was ordained and installed as pastor of the German Reformed Church at Harrisburg, Pa., Oct. 15-37. From 1837 to 1862 he was pastor of Race-street German Reformed Church, Philadelphia, and while here he also studied medicine in Jefferson College, and received the degree of M.D. He served the Second Reformed (Dutch) Church of Philadelphia from 1852 to 1861. Bergall, Carlo, an Italian scholar and theologian of the order of Conventual Minorites, a native of Palermo, distinguished himself as a preacher, and taught philosophy and theology in the convents of his order. He died at Palermo, Nov. 17, 1679, leaving De Objeto Philo-

Bergelmer, in Norse mythology, was the son of Aurgelmer, a powerful mountain giant. Long before the creation of the world this mighty god lived, until the earth was overflowed by Ymer's blood, and the entire Rhinthusian generation perished. He alone saved himself in a boat, and with his wife subsequently peopled the earth again. The analogies with Noah are obvious. See Flood.

Bergen, George Providence, a Presbyterian minister, was born Jan. 1, 1820, in Mercer County, Ky. He graduated from Centre College in 1846, and from Princeton Seminary in 1849. He was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, April 26, 1848. Returning to Kentucky, he engaged to fill, for a few months, the pulpit of the First Presbyterian Church of Covington. He was ordained and installed pastor of the Church at Springdale, O., by the Cincinnati Presbytery, May 1, 1850. He was released from his pastoral relation here in April, 1857. In the same year Mr. Bergen was urged by the Board of Domestic Missions to go, under its commission, to Omaha, Neb. He accepted the position offered. He began the erection of a church here, but financial difficulties prevented his finishing it. After two years he returned to Ohio, and in 1859 settled at Bellefontaine, and remained over four years in charge of a flourishing Church in that town. He next removed to Mt. Pleasant, la., and established a boarding-school for young ladies, which proved to be highly successful. He removed to Birmingham in 1869, and founded a prosperous school for both sexes, and at the same time he accepted a call to a pastorate of the Presbyterian Church of Birmingham, where he continued until his death. A few years before his death he supplied the Church at Libertyville. He died April 11, 1876. Mr. Bergen was a pioneer of education, and was left two institutions of his planting in active operation in his new home, which was based on the Old Testament doctrine, simple in style and fervent in manner. J., in 1812; had sixteen years of great success; and finally removed to Springfield, Ill., in 1828, where he became pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, and where he died, Jan. 10, 1872. "He was a man of power, and influence; courageous, earnest, conscientious, and everywhere honored. So long and faithfully did he labor in the West, and much of the time in pioneer work, that he came to be known as the 'Old Man of the Prairies.'" See Aikman, Hist. Discourse concerning the Pres. was licensed and ordained the following year, and comsequently organized a Church at Valatie, and became an assistant to the Rev. F. J. G. Uhl; and thus Churchtown was added to his charge. There he labored with much zeal until his death, March 11, 1842. See Sprague,

German by birth, and did much for the good of the Gospel in Germany. He suffered martyrdom in 1545, by having powder put to his breast and then set on fire.

Bergimus, in Celtic mythology, was a god of the Cemoneans, only known by a few inscriptions. As these inscriptions were found near Bergamo, it is thought that this city received its name from him.

Bergman, Christopher P., a Lutheran minister, was born at Ebenezer, Ga., Jan. 7, 1736, and educated exclusively under the instruction of his learned father. In 1824 he was licensed and solemnly set apart to the work of the ministry, and took charge of the church which his father had so long served, in his native place. He died March 26, 1882. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 163.

Bergman, John Ernest, a Lutheran minister, was a native of Pintsch, in Saxony. He entered the University at Leipzig in 1776, where he graduated; was ordained by the evangelical seniors of the Lutheran Church, in the duchy of Augsburg, July 19, 1783.
Mr. Bergman arrived in this country in 1785, and went immediately to a congregation, then without a pastor, in Georgia, where he labored in connection with three other charges in the neighborhood, which he served until he died, Feb. 25, 1824. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 77; Evangelical Review, ix, 13.

Bergmuller, John George, a German painter and engraver, was born at Durckheim, in Bavaria, in 1888, and studied under Andrew Wolff. Some of his works are to be seen in the churches at Augsburg, where he is chiefly known by his engravings. He died in 1762. The following are his principal religious prints: The Baptism of Christ; The Transfiguration, the Resurrection, and the Ascension;
The Conception; The Virgin Mary Carrying the Infant Jesus; The Death of St. Joseph; Christ on the Mount of Olives.

Bergrue, Samuel B., an English clergyman, was born in 1805. While a minister of the Poultry Chapel, London, in 1858, he was elected secretary of the British and Foreign Bible Society, in the place of Rev.
George Brown, who had in turn succeeded the Rev.
Joseph, one of the original secretaries, and also one of the principal founders of the society. During the twenty-six years of Mr. Brown's connection with the society, every other work was doubled; an increase in which he found constant joy, and to which he, according to the testimony of the committee, contributed more largely than any other, though none could be more unwilling to receive the credit. He died in London, July 18, 1880. See Bible Society Record, Oct. 1880. (W. F. S.)

Berhtwald (Brightwald, or Beorhtwald), an earl, according to Beorhtwald was or-originally abbot of Reculver, and a man well instructed in ecclesiastical and monastic discipline. A charter of Hlothari, king of Kent, is preserved, dated at Reculver in May, 673, in which lands in Thanet are bestowed upon him and his monastery (Kemble, Cod. Dipl. 1, 20); and he is also mentioned in a spurious charter of 699
as an abbott of Kent. The Glastonbury writers claim him as an abbott of that monastery, but they have confounded him with Boerwald. He was chosen archbishop of Canterbury, July 1, 692, and went to Lyons for consecration, which he obtained from Godwins, June 29, 692. On his return, he was placed as abbot in the See of Jarrow, king of the Hwicas, done in a Mercian Witenagemot; in 696 he took part in the legislation of Whtred, king of Kent, at the council of Berhamstedt (or Bersted); and between that year and 716 he obtained, in a council at Baccaccel, or Bapchid (q. v.), the famous privilege of Whtred, which secured the liberty of the Kentish mountains. In 716, at the command of the pope, he attended the council at Nidd, at which Wilfrid was reconciled. The same year he held the synod at Brent-ford, for the pacification of Essex and Wessex. The division of Wessex being accomplished, he consecrated Alkibhem as bishop of the new see of Sherborne; in 706 he assisted a charter founding the monastery of Evesham; between 709 and 712 we find him writing to Forthe, bishop of Sherborne, to obtain the release of a captive girl from Boerwald, abbot of Glastonbury. In 716, in a council at Clovesho, he obtained a confirmation of Whtred's privilege. Bede records his death, Jan. 13, 731, and mentions that he was buried near his predecessor, within the Church of St. Peter, at Canterbury. The Life of St. Egwin, ascribed to him, belongs unquestionably to a later Berchwald.

BERHUT, in Mohammedan mythology, is an unusable high wall, which is said to be in Arabia, in the region of the strait Bab el-Mandeb. It was built by the prophet, to prepare the way for the faithful (Moslems)

from the unfaithful (Giaours).

Beringer, Diepholm, a German fanatical peasant, known also by the name of Perring of the Schuster, and of the country of Wöhrd, lived at the commencement of the 16th century. He made a great uproar at the time of the Reformation, by denouncing the pope. He preached for the first time at Wöhrd, in 1524. Being banished from Nuremberg on the complaint of the archduke Ferdinand, at the council held in that city, he fixed his residence at Kitzingen, in Franconia. It is believed that he perished in the War of the Peasants.

Berkeley, George, L.L.D., an English clergyman, son of Viscount Berkeley, was born Sept. 29, 1733 (O. S.). He removed with the family to Ireland in his infancy, where he was instructed by his father in the classics until he was nineteen years of age, and then went to Oxford, and was educated at Christ Church. In 1758 he became vicar of East Garston, Berks, and in 1759 he was removed to the living of Bergholt, in Suffolk county. Through the kindness of archbishop Secker, he became chancellor of Brecknock, rector of Acton in Middlesex, and prebendary of Canterbury. He subsequently received other preferments, and died Jan. 6, 1795. "He was the charitable divine, the affectionate and active friend, the elegant scholar, the accomplished gentleman." He published some single sermons, and his widow published a volume of his sermons in 1799. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Berkeley, Gilbert, an English prelate of the 16th century, was a native of Norfolk, being descended from ancient barons of that name. He was consecrated bishop of Bath and Wells, in the first year of the reign of Elizabeth, and sat in that capacity twenty-two years. He died in 1581, and was buried in his own cathedral. See Godwin, Catalogue of Bishops; Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), ii, 447.

Berkenmyer, William Christopher, a Lutheran minister, was born at Bodelicheim, Germany, and was thoroughly educated in his native land. He received and accepted a call from the Amsterdam Lutheran Consistory, to take charge of a congregation in New York. He was ordained by the Consistory of Amsterdam, May 23, 1725, and immediately commenced his pastoral labors. He was pastor of the Trinity Lutheran Church, corner of Broadway and Rector streets, New York city, being the successor of Rev. Justus Falkner, who was called to this pastorate in 1703. Mr. Bergen-myer resigned in 1782. Under these two ministers the Dutch Lutheran Church in New York city prospered greatly. The log building was taken down, and a substantial structure with high belfry and erected on the same site, collections for that purpose having been sent from Hackensack, Albany, London, Amsterdam, etc. He is said to have divided his time between

New York and Albany, where he continued to labor until the close of his life in 1751. In 1728 he published a work entitled De successione Herdoniae magni de sacrae Domini Nester Deux Whip Patentasionen in dese

Gewesten, ein-stemming te Zyn, etc. See Sprague, Braunschweig. He studied at Helmstadt and Göttingen, and was in 1775 appointed provost of St. Laurence at Schönningen, near Helmstädt. In 1778 he was called to Magdeburg, and in 1787 he succeeded Götte as pastor at St. Catharine's, in Hamburg, where he also died, Dec.

7, 1798. His publications, consisting mainly of sermons,

BERKY, ABRAHAM, a German Reformed minister, was recommended to the Synod in 1826. He prepared himself for the ministry at Carlisle Seminary, Pa.; afterwards became a member of the Free Synod, and in 1830 was called to a church at Berks, lived in penitence and poverty. His last place of mention is said to have been Michigan, where he passed over to the Reformed (Dutch) Church, and remained until he died, Aug. 1, 1867. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church, iv, 465.

Berlage, Anton, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born in 1800 at Münster. He studied theology at the universities of Bonn, Tübingen, and of his native place, received holy orders in 1829, and at the same time the degree as doctor of theology from the Munich University. In 1834 he commenced his academic lectures, was in 1855 professor extraordinarius and in 1886 ordinarius of dogmatics in his native place, and died there, Dec. 6, 1881. He wrote, Apologetik der Kirche, oder Begründung der Wahrheit und Gültigkeit des Christenthums (Münster, 1834)—Katholische Dogmatik (ibid. 1839-64, 7 vols.). See Zuchold, Bibl. Berland, Pierre, a French prelate, known to this day by the name of Pey-Berland, was born about 1375, and was the son of a poor laborer of Medoc. He commenced by keeping the flocks, and advanced by his own merit so as to secure a place in history. He distinguished himself while a child by his precocious talents, his love of study, and his piety. It is supposed that the young shepherd was sent to a school at Bordeaux, where he studied the classics. From thence he went to a university at Toulouse, where he took the degree of bachelor of canonical law. On his return, in 1409, he became secretary of the archbishop and canon of the cathedral. After a trip to the Holy Land, he became rector of Soliac, and acquired a great reputation by his ability and moral character. The see of this great province became vacant in 1430, and Pierre Berland was appointed to fill the position. In 1440 he constructed at Bordeaux the grand tower of the Church of St. Andrew, which still bears the name of Pey-Berland. In 1441 he contributed largely to the municipal foundation of the University of Bordeaux, the legal existence of which was definitely confirmed by Louis XI in 1472. He also established at his own expense the College of St. Raphael, in which he established twelve scholarships for the benefit of poor pupils. The invasion of the French troops, who came to recover Guyenne in the name of Charles VII, and accomplish the expulsion of the English, brought to this prelate matters of serious importance. The capital was finally, however, surrendered to the representatives of Charles VII. The archbishop of Bordeaux still played a part, though less important, than in 1453, when he wrote his English, and which terminated in the submission of Guyenne. Bowed under the weight of years, he resigned his see in 1456. He died soon after, Jan. 17, 1457, in the enjoyment of public veneration and regarded as a saint, and was buried with great honor in the cathedral. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, a.v.

Berlin, Solomon Jesse, a Lutheran minister, was born at Greensburg, Pa., May 29, 1831. His preparatory study was at Salsbury Academy, and after graduating from Pennsylvania College in 1858, he took the theological course in Gettysburg Seminary. In 1859 he was tutor in Pennsylvania College, and in 1860 was licensed to preach. The latter year he supplied the Altoona congregation; during 1861-62 he was pastor in Williamsburg, Pa.; 1862-65 in Duncansville, Pa.; and in 1865 he was principal of the Bedford ('Pa.) Academy. About two years, until 1867, he was pastor in Williamsport, Md.; and subsequently served in the same relation at Tremont, Pa., until his death, which occurred Feb. 8, 1888. See Pennsylvania College Book, 1892, p. 237.

Berlinda, Saint, of the 7th century, was the daughter of a nobleman, Oedulard, who lived at Meerbeeke, near Mirone, in Brabant, in the reign of Dagobert. She had gifts of intellect, unlike many saints, but like many female saints she had beauty; but was disliked by her father. Being disinherited, she retired to the monasterY of the Holy Cross, in the country of the Franks, and was there a nun devoted to work and prayer. On the death of her father, Berlinda returned to Meerbeeke, where, being retained, she continued her life of austerities until her death, Feb. 3 (her festival day), 690. Miracles were said to be wrought at her tomb; her coffin was petrified. A church was built, and on the site of the church relics of St. Berlinda were preserved. In May 2, 728. She has remained in great honor at Meerbeeke, is invoked against cattle-diseases, and pilgrims pray before a wooden image of the saint beside a cow. According to a popular saying, Berlinda protects trees transplanted on her festival. She is mentioned in the martyrologies of Wyon, Menardus, Perrius, and Molanus in his addition to Usuardius. There is an ancient Life (anonymous) published by Bollandius.—Baring-Gould, Lives of the Saints, ii, 50 (sub Feb. 3).

Bermann, Heinrich August Wilhelm, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Wechselburg in 1767, and died as doctor of theology and superintendent at Penig in 1823. He wrote, Commentatio Historico-theologica in Locum i Petri, 15 ad Recensionem Mehdrium (Leipzig, 1804); In locum Ioannis in Trenchos et in locum I. Pet. in Commentationem Accommodatam (Penig, 1809). Bernachus (or Brynach), Saint, of Wales, in the 7th century, was said to have been the instructor of Brychan, king of Brecknock. His life is given in the Cotton MS. of A. 14 of the 12th century, and is also written in the 'T, T. Welsh Lives of the Christian Saints (1535). The details are fabulous: the saint comes from Brittany to South Wales, and his disciple, St. Clether, retires to Cornwall, to lead the life of a devotee. The Life dates his death April 7; but another Life gives his festival as March 9 or July 7. J. Rees (Welsh Saints, p. 156) enumerates several churches named after Brynach in or near Pembroke or Brecknock. Another account makes Brynach contemporary with Maelgwn, and if so he must be placed in the first half of the 6th century. See Hadrian and Stubbs, i, 138; Hardy, Cat. of Manu. Wale. i, 162.

Bernal, Augustin, a Spanish theologian of the Jesuit order, was born at Magallon (Aragon) in 1587, and died at Saragossa, Sept. 13, 1642. His principal works are, Disputatio de Divini Verbi Incarnazione:— hymns are given in Mahillon's collection of St. Bernard's works (Paris, 1690), ii, 896 sqq. (2d ed. 1719, ii, 909-922; new ed. 1851, 1852). For English renderings, comp. Miller, Singers and Songs of the Church, p. 28. (B. P.)

Bernard of Clugny (or Cluny), a French monk, was born at Morlaix, in Brittany, in the 12th century, and is said to have been of English parentage. We know nothing of the incidents of his life; his poetry is his best memorial. He is the author of the famous poem De Contemptu Mundi, comprising 9,150 lines, of which 8,300 are in hexasyllables. The greater part, however, is a bitter satire on the fearful corruptions of the age: but, as a contrast to the misery and pollution of earth, the poem closes with a description of the peace and glory of heaven, of such rare beauty as not easily to be matched by any medieval composition on the same subject.

It is written in a dactylic hexameter, divided into three parts, between which a cesura is inadmissible. The hexameter has a tailed rhyme, and feminine leone rhyming to the first two clauses, thus:

Tunc nova gloria [picta...]

From this specimen it will be seen that it would be difficult to adopt the measure of the original in any translation; and Dr. Neale, who has translated the larger part of this poem into English, remarks concerning his own rendering:

"I have deviated from my ordinary rule of adopting the measure of the original; because our language, if it could be tortured to any distant resemblance of its rhythm, would utterly fail to give any idea of the majestic sweetness which invests it in Latin. Its difficulty in that language is such that Bernard, in a preface, expresses his belief that nothing but the special inspiration of the Spirit of God could have enabled him to employ it through so long a poem."

As must naturally be expected, this hymn has never been entirely translated into any language. Parts of it have been rendered, especially those referring to the celestial city. Best known is the one commencing with "Jerusalem the golden," and found in many hymn-books. The student of hymnology is referred to the following works: French, Sacred Latin Poetry (Lond., 1864), p. 304 sq.; Neale, Meditations in the Heavenly Land, from the De Contemptu Mundi (N. Y., 1867); The Seven Great Hymns of the Mediæval Church (ibid., 1866), p. 7 sq.; Miller, Singers and Songs of the Church, p. 29. (B. P.)

Bernard, priest and ascetic of Compostella, a Spanish theologian and canonist, lived in the 12th century. His principal works are, Diplomata Summorum Pontificum, et Antiquorum Hispaniae Regum; found in the fourth volume of Hispania Illustrata—the third compilation of the Decretales: a commentary upon the first books of the Decretales. Bernard, Saint, bishop of Hildesheim, in Lower Saxony, where he was born between 950 and 955, was nephew of Adalbero, palatine count. He was first sent to Oslog, bishop of Hildesheim, to be educated, who made him exorcist of his church; and subsequently Willigis, archbishop of Mentz, ordained him priest. He also studied under Tangmar, canon and primicerius of Hildesheim, to whom was confided the direction of the school dependent upon this chapter. He made rapid progress in the only in sacred literature, but in painting, sculpture, architecture, silver-working, mosaic work, the setting of diamonds, and the copying of MSS. After his ordination he was charged with the instruction of the emperor Otho III, who was then seven years of age. At the death of Theophane, the empress mother and regent, he exercised his functions without control, and took part largely in the affairs of the government. Being appointed bishop of Hildesheim in 998, he occupied himself especially in embellishing the cathedral. He accompanied the emperor Otho to Italy, relented toward the Tuscans and Romans, and improved his taste for art by viewing the monuments of Rome. On his return he sought more than once to decorate the church at Hildesheim with all the elegance of art. He had a long dispute with archbishop Willigis concerning the territories of the Abbey of Gandersheim, which gave occasion for the assembling the council of Yodi, Rome, and Frankfort, in the years 1006 and 1007. He took the name in the Ab- bey of St. Michael. He died Nov. 20, 1028, and was canonized in 1093. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bernard, archbishop of Toledo, the main promoter of the Gregorian papal system in Spain, was born at Agen, in France, near the close of the 11th century. For a time being he served as a soldier; he then entered the order of the Benedicines, and when Gregory VII endeavored to introduce his church reforms into Spain, his archbishop was appointed abbot of Sabugna in Castile, in 1080, where he greatly promoted the claims of the papal see. His influence, however, was widened when Alfonso VI elected him archbishop of Toledo, while pope Urban II appointed him princeps of the Spanish Church, when he invested Bern- ard with the pallium at Rome in 1067. All bishops were now given to the brethren of the pope; the Benedic- tine monks whom he had brought along from France), and without any regard the papal system was now in- troduced. These proceedings caused not only the resist- ance of the king, but also of a part of the Spanish clergy; and the archbishop of St. Jago de Compostella went even so far as to invite the clergy of Lambeceur to ordain the introduction of the Roman liturgy in place of the Mozarabian was mainly Bernard's work. At one time his martial character would have placed him at the head of a Castilian army, as he intended to undertake a crusade to Palestine, but pope Paschal II forbade him and all Spaniards, under pain of the interdict, taking any part in crusades to the East. Bernard professed in the Council of Le Mans, his cardinalate of Nimes in 1096, and finally at that of Gironne in 1097, as legate of the holy see. He died in 1125. He wrote four Sermones upon the anthem Salve, Regina Merericordiae, which, published under the name of St. Bernard, had always been attributed to this saint in all the editions of his works until Malalain proved the error in the edition which he gave in Paris in 1690. They are given in Bernardi Claravall. Opera V (Paris, 1719). See Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v.; Aschbach, in Weitzer u. Wele, Kirchenlexikon, s. v.; Hoefer, Noue, Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Bernard (or Bern-Hart), Saint, bishop or Viri, in Dauphiny, was born in 778, of a noble family in the Lyonnais. When he was eighteen years of age, his parents sent him to the court of Charlemagne, and, against his own inclinations, married him. When he was twenty-five years old he obtained his wife's consent to leave her, and enter the monastery which he had founded at Ambourmay, in Besane. He was elected to the office of abbot, but he had not held it more than three years when Wolfrat, bishop of Vienna, died, and the electors, listening to the voice of a child of twelve years old; who cried loudly in the assembly that God had chosen Bernard for bishop, declared that their choice had fallen upon him. He, however, refused, until a positive command from pope Leo II compelled him to accept. He acted with those who had taken upon themselves to depose Louis-le-Debonnaire, and upon his restoration Bernard was compelled to flee into Italy, with Agobardas of Lyons, but was subsequently enabled to return to his see, where he endeavored to expiate his fault. He founded the monastery of Romans, and died in 842. His festival is marked on the 23d of January. BERNINI, Tommaso, an Italian ecclesiastic and statesman, was born at Fermo, Dec. 29, 1778. After having pursued his studies with success in his native city, he became secretary of the tribunal of the Rota. In 1808 he accompanied cardinal Brancadoro to France, and was one of the three who refused, April 2, 1810, to appear at the marriage of Napoleon with Marie Louise, and who were called les cardinaux noirs because the emperor had prohibited the purple and the insignia of the cardinalship. He was banished to Rheims with Consalvi, and remained there five years. In July, 1813, he had the wisdom to send on to Houthem St. Gerlac, to his friend Van der Vreken, the autograph letters of Pius VII, in 1835, emperor of Austria, president of the Holy Roman Empire, and emperor of Austria at Vienna. These letters were delivered, and the pope received replies which were favorable. Pius VII made his entrance into Rome May 24, 1814. Bernetti followed the pontiff. He made a treaty with marshal Bianchi, and vanquished the Neapolitan army, in order to rescue the pope and restore the papal states. Returning to Rome, he was appointed assessor of the committee of the war. In 1826 he was chosen by Leo XII to represent the court of Rome at St. Petersburg. On his return to the capital of the Christian world, he was sent as legate to Ravenna. On Jan. 29, 1827, he received at the hands of Leo X the insignia of the cardinalship. On June 17, 1828, he was called to succeed cardinal Della Somaglia as secretary of state, and was employed in important negotiations between Rome and the other courts of Europe. He cooperated especially at the conclusion of the Concordat with the Netherlands, June 18, 1827, at the accession of Pius VIII, and went as legate to Bologna. He continued these functions until Gregory XVI succeeded Pius VIII, when he was appointed pro-secretary of state. He had charge of directing the demarcation of the Roman states on the side of the Two Sicilies, and was made vice-chancellor of the Roman Church, which position he filled zealously and well. The storms which assailed the pontificate of Pius IX did not spare Bernetti. Being threatened by the revolutionists, he left Rome and retired to Naples, and finally joined Pius IX at Gaeta. He did not return to Rome, but went to Fermo, and died soon after, Dec. 29, 1779. He was considered one of the more remarkable and brilliant among the statesmen of the epoch. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bernier, Étiennel Alexandre, a French prelate, was born at Dax, a district of Mayence, Oct. 31, 1672. He was rector of St. Land at the period of the Revolution. He refused the oath required by the constituent assembly, and became one of the directing members of the insurrectional government. The pope enrolled, known under the name of the bishop of Agny, was president of the council, but the abbot Bernier was the veritable head. His predictions, which excited Brittany, gained for him the title of apostle of Vendée, but it soon appeared that he was working for his personal advantage. He finally sought, in the midst of peril, to return to the army of Charette. He became the friend and ally of Stofflet, and the first days of their union were noted by the assassination of Bernard of Marigny, whose ability and talent overshadowed that of Bernier, and the latter was chosen by Stofflet to negotiate peace with the republican government. At length Bonaparte expressed his desire for peace with Vendée, which was accordingly arranged, and Bernier was shortly after made bishop of Orleans. He died Oct. 1, 1806. He is supposed to be the author of the words and music of Reveil des Vendéens. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bernières-Louvigny, Jean de, a French theologian, was born in 1692 at Caen. Guided in his spiritual life by P. John Christian Notzinger, a monk of the third order of St. Francis, it was by his advice that Bernières built at Caen a house called the Hermitage, in the exterior court of the Convent of the Ursulines, which had as its foundress and superior his sister, Jourdain of Bernières. He did not go forth from this except to perform the duties of his charge, and consecrated his time to prayer, to good works, and to the spiritual direction of some of his friends with whom he lived in common. He was initiated in the mysteries of his ecstatic vision to dictate to an ecclesiast his numerous works, which he composed wholly in the spirit of Christian obedience. He died May 8, 1659. He wrote, L'Intérieur Chrétien (Paris, 1659; published with some additions at Rouen); this book, which reached twelve editions in eleven years, was edited anew at Paris by the widow Martin in 1674:—Les Œuvres Spirituelles de M. de Bernières de Louvigny, were published by his sister Jourdain of Bernières:—La Vie de la Foi de la Grâce:—De la Raison de ses Degrés. Bernini, Giovanni Lorenzo (called Il Carac- bile Bernini), an Italian artist whose renown filled all Europe in the 17th century, was born in Nolaes in 1658. Richly endowed by nature, and favored by circumstances, he rose superior to the rules of art, creating for himself an easy manner, the faults of which he knew how to disguise by its brilliancy. At ten years of age he was the astonishment of artists. Pope Paul V wished to see the prodigy, and when he was brought into his presence, he desired him to draw a picture of the Virgin, which he did in half an hour—so much to the satisfaction of the pontiff that he recommended him to cardinal Barberini, a great connoisseur and patron of the arts. His first work in marble was the bust of the prelate Montalto, which was so striking a resemblance that some one said to the artist: "Monsieur Moi, I am not your model!" At eighteen he produced the Apollo and Daphne, in marble—a masterpiece in grace and execution, which he himself, towards the end of his life, declared one of his best works. He did work for Gregory XV, and in 1644 cardinal Mazzarini, in the name of the king of France, offered him a salary of 12,000 crowns to enter the service of that monarch, but he declined the invitation. His reputation extended more and more, and Charles I of England engaged him to execute a statue for 6000 crowns. About this time Bernini erected the palace of Monte Citorio, and the beautiful monument to the memory of his benefactor, pope Urban VIII. He also built the Palace Odescalchi, the Rotunda della Ricc, and the House of Novices for the Jesuits. He set out from Rome for Paris, and it is said that never did an artist travel with so much pomp, and under so many flattering circumstances. The king made him a present of 10,000 crowns, gave him a pension of 2000 and one of 400 to his son, and in 1666 he executed three statues of himself (Louis XIV). This work he finished in four years. He died at Rome, Nov. 28, 1680. The following are some of the most remarkable of his religious works: the great altar of St. Peter's, in bronze and gilt; the four colossal statues of St. Chrysostom, St. Athanasius, St. Augustine, and St. Ambrose, cast in bronze; the belfry of St. Peter's; the basso-relievo in the portico of St. Peter's, representing Christ saying to Peter, "Feed my sheep." He built the chapel in the church of St. Maria della Vittoria, dedicated to St. Teresa, with a fine marble statue of that saint; the principal part of the Barlieries, the most magnificent example of his craft; and he built for the cardinal Flavio Chigi, nephew of pope Alexander VII. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Bernini, Giuseppe Maria, an Italian Capuchin missionary, was born in Piedmont, at Carignano. He went to the Indies in order to study the manners, customs, and religion of the natives, and to translate their sacred and literary monuments into his own tongue. He died at Porey, on the island of Notzinger, Usl, Scurjfiz ed Idoli nella Regne di Nepol. The Dialogues, in the Indian language, are also preserved among the manuscripts of the Bernis, François Joachim de Pierre de, a celebrated French ecclesiastical, was born at St. Marcel of Ardeche, May 22, 1715. Being of one of the more ancient families of Languedoc, he was, as younger brother, des- signed for the ecclesiastical profession. He was a brilli- ant student at the College of Louis the Great, then at the Seminary of St. Sulpice. Desiring of obtaining a benefice, he went out into the world at the age of nineteen, with the title of abbot, without fortune, but full of confidence. His agreeable manners and pleas- ing appearance in a few years made him known in high places, and his parentage gained for him an entrance to the best circles of society. In 1744 he was elected member of the French Academy. In 1748 he left the chapter of the counts of Brienne, in order to enter that of the counts of Lyons. He was made ambassador to Venice. Called to France, he entered the grand council and be- came minister of foreign affairs. Having assisted in the alliance of France and Austria, he was reproached, but afterwards justified in the matter. Madame de Pom- padour, who had formerly been his friend, and had se- cured for him a lodgment at the Tuileries and 1500 francs a month, when the king, having become his enemy, he preferred to retire to the Abbey of Vic-sur-Aisne, near Soissons. Bernis was elected commander of the order of St. Esprit during his ministry. Pope Clement XIII made him cardinal in spite of the hatred which Madame de Pompadour bore for him, and he was after- wards made archbishop of Aix after the death of Ma- dame de Pompadour. In 1769 he was sent as ambassador to Rome, and there sought the destruction of the Jesuit order. He was the Nestor of the political circles, and the king of Naples secured his presence under such circumstances as to render his counsel of great value, and he was loaded with honors on all sides. Gustavus III of Sweden held an intensive correspondence with him up to the time of his death. Refusing the oath which was at that time exacted of ecclesiastics, and which he believed incompatible with his former vows, he was obliged to resign his position, and his annuity of 400,000 pounds; but so highly was he honored for the part which he took against the king, that he was elected bishop of the see of Spain. He died at Rome, Nov. 1, 1794. His family and the French legation made for him a mausoleum, from the model of that of the cardinal Orsini, and his body was carried to Nismes. Another monument was erected in the Church of St. Louis at Rome, containing his remains. Besides his "Memoires," his "Bibliotheca," his volume of collected works, he edited the "Oeuvres Mées en Prose et en Vers." His style is simple, but not wanting in elegance. His poem of La Religion, which has reached several editions, is as noteworthy for the principles expressed as for the talent. His nephew—among whom we mention M. the visscount Raymond de Bernis, superior officer of the cavalry, born in 1815—have in their possession the memoirs and various unpublished articles of this illustrious cardinal. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Bernis, the first abbot of Cluny, made his profession of the monastic state in the Abbey of St. Martin, at Autun, whence he removed to that of Baune (or to St. Bonot d'Aniane). He was appointed abbot of Baune, and subsequently of Cluny, about 910 (or 913). He also had charge of the monastery of Declos, or Bourg- Dieu; and, in the following year, of Massay, in Berry. He was thus, at one time, superior of seven abbeys, which were committed to him in opposition to his own wishes; the result of his resignation that he might restore them to a proper state of dis- cipline. Nothing is known of his private life; but he died peaceably on the 1st or 18th of January, 927, XI.—15* and was buried at Cluny. Many martyrologies give him the title of blessed, others call him saint. See Baleit, Jan. 13.

Berno (or Bernard) of Reichenau (also styled Quod-cult-Jesu) was originally a Benedictine monk of Feur-sur-Surette (others say St. Gall in Switzerland), and was afterwards sent to the Court of Emperor Otto III. In 1008 (or 1014) he was appointed abbot of Reichenau, an abbey located upon the lake of Zell, near that of Con- stance. He restored the pristine glory of this abbey, which was lost under his predecesor Immo. He was known as an excellent musician and poet, and was well acquainted with all the literature of his time. He enrich- ed the library of his abbey by collecting old works, and by manuscripts made by his monks, and by new works which were written by him and the learned inmates of the monastery. Under his guidance the school at Reichenau revived its old fame, and students flocked to it from great distances. In 1013 also he restored the music of the Church. In 1015 he accompanied the emperor, Henry II, to Rome. The privileges of Reichenau were confirmed in 1016 by the emperor, and again in 1032 by pope John XX. He died Jan. 7, 1045, leaving, De Of- ficio Missae (Cologne, 1568; Venice, 1572; Paris, 1578; also found in the Magna Biblia, tom. xviii)—Quaest. Auctores et Doctores theologiae (in Ges. Bened. iv, par. ii, p. 68) —a book upon song, entitled Libellus Tonarium, seu de Regulis Symphonistorum et Tonarum, which he dedicated to Purgin, archbishop of Cologne. At the Pauline Library at Leipsic were to be found at one time manuscripts upon mathematics, astronomy, and music, by Berno. During the time of Berno, the manner of keeping the four days' fast was various, and he accordingly wrote a dialogue entitled De Quatuor Temporibus, priusquam subsecuerunt Aenacta et Arbonem, Archiiepiscopum Moguntinum; also another addressed to Arbon, entitled De Quatuor Auctoris Angellicita. These works are likewise to be found in the Theatrum Auctoritatum Novissimus of Bern. Gez (Augsburg, 1721, vol. iv). The remaining four years of his life were spent in retirement and great suffering. He died in December, 1863. Mr. Berry was emphatically a practical man, hence his success. Berseker, in Norse Mythology, were mighty combatants—half-men, half-beasts, who played a great part in Scandivania legends. Starkadder, a giant with twelve hands, milked Ailhilde, assumed the All-beautiful. Her son, Armgrim, was the first to receive the name of Berseker (i.e.
without armor), because, being of supernatural strength, he always went to battle without any armor; his fury was so great, that he cut open the sword with the edge only. Armgrim, married the daughter of the murdered king, and became the father of twelve sons, all of whom had the same fury in battle as their father. They also received the name of Berseker or Berserker. The inherent fury sometimes reached such dimensions that they would slay their own men, not recognizing them through madness. The gods employed them in the most fierce and bloody contests. They were even more feared than the Trolls, Bergriemen, and Gnomen, and other dreaded spirits. They would yell and bite with their teeth Biter, often hoisting the sword and shields of their enemies, and demoralizing everything within reach of their hands. Their downfall was brought about by their own madness. One of them, Hordalf, desired to marry.priethee of the Swedish king Zegburg, and asked his brothers to help him batter the Swedish army so strong that the fury of the Berserker gave out before one part of the army had been slain, and thus the other part of the army was victorious and slew every one of the Berserker.

Bersetkers, the name given to persons in Iceland who were suspected, when in a state of frenzy and extravaganza, to be supernaturally inspired. They pretended to keep up a familiar intercourse with spirits, and gave forth their inspired effusions in rugged, uncouth rhymes.

Berse, Thomas, an English Wesleyan minister, was born near St. Austell, Cornwall. Being converted in his twenty-fourth year, he was appointed to a circuit in 1809. In 1845 he retired to Plymouth as a supernumerary. He died in that city June 7, 1857, aged seventy-eight. He was very undefeatable in the conduct of financial affairs. See Minutes of the British

Berut, Jean, a French bishop and poet, was born at Caen in 1562. He was the son of Francois Beraut, original bishop of Caen. He studied at the University of Paris, where he wished to take charge of the education of his son, who became familiar with the Greek and Latin authors; he assumed the style of French poetry by reading the works of Bomsard and Desportes. The early essays of the youth charmed the court of Henry III. This prince accorded to him the charge of counselling the Parlia-mament of Grenoble, which he afterwards resigned. He greatly aided the cardinal Du Perron, with whom he had been a disciple, according to the Gallia Christiana, at the conversion of Henry IV, who in 1604 gave him the rich abbey of Auxaye, in the diocese of Bayeux. At that time of the death of Marginoup Henry IV, and chose Berut as first chaplain.
At length in 1606 he was appointed bishop of Seez.
The year following he assisted at the baptism of the BERTHEL

Dauphin (Louis XIII) at Fontainebleau, and in 1610 carried the body of Henry IV to St. Denis. He was the uncle of Madame de Motteville, author of Mémoires upon queen Anna of Austria, whom Voltaire has often eulogised. He was a very young man, and had some light poems which had met with considerable success, and when he was raised to the episcopacy he sought to suppress them, but this was impossible. His early writings possessed a charm and harmony which well merited the praise bestowed upon them. The Lettres de Quelques Vrais... published in 1609 contained several very remarkable pieces. Many of his poems were translated into Greek and Latin. He died June 8, 1611. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

At the age of seventeen he assumed the Benedictine garb at Luxemburg, and was for nineteen years abbot of the monastery. In 1574 he was transferred to the Abbey of Echternach. The Dutch made him prisoner in 1596, and a large consideration was required to obtain his release. He died at the Abbey of Echternach, June 19, 1607, leaving, In Relatio de Opusculis D. V. BERTHEAU

BERTHEAU, Charles, a French Protestant divine, was born at Montpellier in 1689. He studied philosophy and theology partly in France and partly in Holland, and was admitted a minister in the synod held at Vigen in 1681; the next year he was chosen pastor of the Church of Montpellier; but was soon promoted to one of the churches of Paris. He was expelled from the latter city at the revocation of the Edict of Nantes in 1685. He was one of the ministers of the great church at Cluny, near Paris, which was capable of containing 14,000 persons, and which was levelled to the ground—the work of demolition commencing on the very day of the revocation, and being completed in five days. Bertheau went to London, and became in 1687 minister of the Walloon Church in Threadneedle Street. This church, which was the oldest Huguenot church in the city, was established not far from A.D. 1546. It was regarded as the cathedral church of the Huguenots. We are told that "thither the refugees usually repaired on their arrival in London, and such of them as had temporarily adjourned their faith before flying, to avoid the penalty of death or condemnation to the galleys, made acknowledgment of their repentance and were received into membership. During the years immediately following the revocation, the consistency of the French Church met at least once every week in Threadneedle-street chapel for the purpose of receiving such acknowledgments of repentance, or reconversion as they might make. At one of the sittings in May, 1687, not fewer than 497 ministers were again received into the Church which they had pretended to abandon." It was at this most important period in its history that Bertheau became one of the ministers of the Church, holding office forty-four years. Associated with him for a part of this time was the celebrated Saurin, afterwards minister at the Hague, of whom it is said that "nothing can give an idea of the effect produced by his inspired voice, which for twenty-five years resounded beneath the vaulted roof of the temple at the Hague, unless it be the profound veneration and pious worship with which the memory of the great author, continually revived by a perusal of his writings, has remained preserved in Holland." Bertheau died Dec. 25, 1732. He left two vols. of Sermons in French (1702-30). See Smiles, Huguenots, p. 399; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v. (J. C. S.)

BERTHOLET. GRENOBLE, a French Benedictine of the congregation of St. Vannes, was born at Berain in Barrois, Jan. 20, 1693. He passed the age of seventy in the Abbey of Montauban, in Alsace. He devoted himself with ardor to the study of ecclesiastical antiquities, and was finally considered worthy of the position of librarian of the Abbey of St. Leonold of Nancy, where facilities were afforded to him for improvement. Unfortunately he formed a friendly alliance with M. de Tallemens-Cousin, who was a Jansenist and favored the Jesuits by certain writings, and who, in order to escape the storm which threatened him, fled to Holland. Among his writings which were condemned we mention, Mémoires de Port Royal:—Instrucions du Cardinal de Noailles, etc. Berthollet was also the author of the Abbey of St. Diobel, where he died, March 31, 1745. He was the author of Traité Historique et Moral de l'Abstinence des Viandes, and des Révolutions qu'elle a eues depuis le commencement du Monde jusqu'à aujourd'hui (Rouen, 1751); a learned work, and full of interesting research. We might mention the titles of a number of his works, the contents of which are lost. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

BERTHE, Jean, a French theologian, was born at Tarascon in 1622. After having taught the classics with success, also philosophy and theology in the various Jesuit colleges, he was again sent abroad, by order of Louis XIV, to hold consultation. He then entered the house of the Benedictines, and died at Ouix in 1692. He wrote, Traité Historique de la Charge Aumonier de Présence des rois:—Memoires du Révérend Père Berthollet de Cluny:—sur les Droits du Roi au Comte d'Avignon et au Comtat Venaissin:—sur les Indes Orientales:—sur la Langue Italiene:—sur la Chronologie, etc. See Hoefer, Nouv. BERTHYTH. See BEORCHTUTHY.

Berthilde (or Bertille), Saint, first abbess of Chelles, was born c. 628, of one of the first families of the Soissons region. She took the veil in 650, and as a nun there she was for a long time priestess. St. Bathilde, queen of France, widow of Clodius II, caused her to withdraw in 656, in order to make her abbess of the convent of Chelles, of which that princess was the foundress. The high reputation which the abbey soon obtained under her rule attracted thither strangers from distant parts, especially from England; and even men repaired thither, for within the precincts of the abbey was established a small community of priests. Berthilde died there, Nov. 5, 702. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Berthod, Anselme, a French ecclesiastic of the order of St. Benedict, was born at Rupt (in the Franche-Comté), Feb. 21, 1733. He took the vow of the order of St. Benedict, Sept. 8, 1752. His superiors confided to him the direction of the library of Besançon, which contained a quantity of important documents for the history of Belgium—autograph letters of the cardinal of Granville, and of the emperors and kings of Spain. Berthod sent to the Academy of Besançon, of which he was a member in 1769, several extracts from this rich collection. About 1770 he applied himself to a very difficult work. He undertook to classify a large number of treatises of the 18th, 14th, and 15th centuries, which were lying in disorder in the archives of the bishopric of Besançon. After he had completed the arrangement of these, they were found very useful to the families of Burgundy, Alsace, and Switzerland. This gained for him a reputation, and the minister of state, Berlin, appointed him to search through Europe for the manuscripts necessary to clear up certain obscure points in the history of France. In this work he was very successful, but after Berlin had retired from the ministry, in 1780, the work was abandoned. Berthod employed his time in writing commentaries upon the rule of St. Benedict, and a brevity for the use of the monks. In 1782 he was appointed grand-prior of Luxeuil, and the year following was elected superintendent of the monastery of the congregation of St. Vannes. As he was looking to the highest dignities of his order, the emperor Joseph II designated him, upon the presentation of the counsellor of Kulberg, for the successor of Ign. Hubens, one of the hagioographers charged with the continuation of the Acta Sanctorum. But his election was not pleasing to the people, and he was not well received. In effect, many of the members of this period approved the five propositions of Jansenius. In order to dissipate certain suspicions, he published a very orthodox profession of faith. It is believed that these difficulties so wore on him as to shorten his life. He died at Brussels, March 19, 1788. He wrote several short treatises upon l'Histoire des Comtes de Bourgogne, etc.; published in the Mémoires de l'Académie de Besançon. Those which have not been published are preserved in the archives of the Academy. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Berthold of Mainsbruch, a German theologian, who lived in the latter half of the 15th century, was of the Dominican order, and wrote, Commentaria in Librum Elementorum, of Proclus:—Commentaria in Tres Libros Meteororum Aristotelis. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Berthold, Christian, a German theologian and chronicler who lived in the latter half of the 16th century, was parish recorded at Lubben in Lusatia, and wrote, "Die schöne biblische Historia von dem heiligen Königlichen Propheten Davíd und seiner Tochter Salomo," a comedy in verse (Wittenberg, 1579)—Kleine Kaiser-chronica (1579). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bertholdus (Bernaldus, Bertoul, Bernoul, or Berthold; whom Dupin calls Bertulphus, or Ber- nulphus), a German theologian and historian, was priest at Constance, and lived in the latter half of the 14th century. He was a most bitter enemy of his prince, the Elector of Trier, Henry IV, against whom he did not scruple to employ both the pen and the sword. He continued the Chronicle of Herman Contracte, by giving a history of his own time from 1054 to 1100. His works are entitled, Bertholdi Historia Rerum suae Tempore per Singulos Annos Gestaaram (Frankfort, 1570, 1586) —De Vide Vaticana Excommunicatorum Communione de Reconciliatione Lapsorum, et de Conciliorum, Decretorum, Decretatium, ipsarumque Pontificum Romanorum Auctoritate (Ingolstadt, 1612) —Beroldi De poleticis pro Gregorio VII, seu Tractatus de Sacramentis Excommunicatorum juxta Aseriounem SS. Patrum, in vol. v of the Grand Pontifical Library of Jo. Thomas Rocaberti (Rome, 1698) —some also small treatises in favor of Gregory VII, published by the Jesuit Greiter (Ingolstadt, 1609).

Bertholte, François, a French theologian, was born Feb. 27, 1814, at Aigle in Switzerland. He prepared himself for the ministry at the Academy of Lausanne, and in 1837 went as vicar to Grion. In 1845 he went back to his native place, with a view of performing ministerial functions there independently. Being obliged to leave this place, he accepted a call from the evangelical society of France, and went to Senlis, where he remained from 1845 to 1849. In the latter year he went to Lyons, where he remained till 1854. Being obliged to give up this place on account of his climate, he accepted a call to Geneva, where he labored for about eight years, when he was obliged to retire to the Alps to recruit his shattered constitution. On his journey, however, he died, July 2, 1862. He was a very popular preacher, full of zeal and love for his Master and the salvation of the souls committed to his charge. He published, Exhortation Pastorale adressée par le Pasteur d'une Paroisse de Montagne a ses Paroissiens (Lausanne, 1843) —Deux Lettres Pastorales aux Anciens Paroissiens (1844) —Ephese et Lucioide (Paris, 1845) —Le Cate de la Louange et le Cate de la Vie (Toulouse, 1845) —L'Amour de Dieu pour le Monde (Lausanne, 1857) —Méditations sur quelques Sujets de l'ancien Testament Étudié à la Lumière de l'Evangile (1857, 1862). Bertholte, Jean, a French Jesuit, known principly by his history of the duchy of Luxembourg, was born at Salm in Ardennees, near the close of the 17th century. He entered the Jesuit order, and was appointed to a chair of eloquence. For more than fifteen years he performed the functions of preacher, then gave his attention to history, and wrote a very important work entitled L'Histoire Éclesiastique et Civile du Duché de Luxembourg et du Comté de Chine (Luxembourg, 1741-43, with plans and maps). He was criticised for the manner in which he obtained some of his material. He died at Liège in 1755. He also wrote Histoire de l'Institution de la Fête-Dieu (1746). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bertholf, Guillaume, was the pioneer Dutch preacher and "the itinerant apostle of New Jersey." He came to this country from Holland with the early emigrants who settled at Hackensack, N. J., as their catechist, schoolmaster, and vorleser, or preceptor. So well did he fill these offices, that he was sent back to Holland in 1639 to receive ordination and installation as the pastor of the church of Hackensack and Hackamack-anonock. In 1649 he returned, and immediately began his ministry. He was the first regularly installed pastor of the Dutch churches in New Jersey, and for fifteen years was the only preacher in the Dutch language. His ministry covered a large section of country. He organized a church at Baritan in Morrisville, N. J., about 1700, and introduced the Rev. Theodore J. Froingeuyhussen as the pastor in 1709. He also founded the Church at Tarrytown, N. Y., about 1697, and officiated regularly or occasionally in many surrounding churches in New Jersey. He was very successful as a winsome soul, large and deep being made by his work. He was noted for a calm, persuasive eloquence, for his evangelical spirit, and for his efforts to promote the independence of this Church from the country in foreign control. His labors ended in 1724. See Annals of the Classics of Bergen, by B. C. Taylor, D.D. (W. B. E. T.)

Bertin, elevated to the priesthood, in this re- treat exercised himself in all the virtues; and in 1639 he went to Teroane, near St. Omer, and became bishop of that place. There he spared neither time nor labor to instruct the people and to strengthen them in the faith. St. Bertin had for a long time the direction of his friars; and when he was about to leave the monastery over which he had held control, and to become bishop of Teroane, S. H. Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Bertin, Jean, bishop of Vannes, was born at Perigueux in 1712, and consecrated in 1746. He endeavored, in common with most of the French bishops, to obtain the observance of the bull Unigenitus, and came in for his share of the displeasure of the parliament. He was condemned to pay a fine of six thousand francs, and the temporalities of his see were seized shortly after. He continued, however, firmly to do what he considered to be his duty, and died in 1774.

Bertoldus, surmamed Borbach, an impious wretch, who appeared about 1539, taught (1) that Jesus Christ, in dying on the cross, extinguished the righteousness of the law and cleared the way for the people to the kingdom of despairing of salvation, and had beaped maldections on the head of his mother and on the earth which drank in his blood; (2) that a layman, illuminated, could preach more effectually than the Gospel; (3) that a devout person might receive as much grace by eating ordinary food as by receiving the blessed sacrament.

Bertolotti, Giovanni Lorenzo, a reputable historical painter of Genoa, was born in 1640, and died in 1721. He studied under Francesco Castiglione. Bertrand, William, a Presbyterian minister, presented to the Synod, in 1733, testimonials from the Presbytery of Bangor, Ireland, of his ordination, and, having declared his full assent to the confession and catechism, was received, and joined the Donegal Presbytery. He accepted a call to settle at Paxton and Derry, and was installed Nov. 15, 1732, at Swatara. In 1735 he complained of "the intolerable burden" was under with the two congregations, and desired to confine himself to one, so in 1736 he was released from Paxton. He died May 3, 1746. See Webster, Hist. of the Presb. Church in Amer. 1857.

Bertran (Berti-Chranmans, or Bertramans), bishop of Mains, was born of a noble family of Poitou, about the middle of the 6th century, and devoted himself to the service of God in the city of Tours, where, it is said, he received the clerical tonsure from St. Germanus, bishop of Paris, who took him away with him and educated him. Bertran afterwards received priest's orders, and became archdeacon of the Church of Paris about 576. At the end of ten years he was chosen to succeed Baldegisius, bishop of Mains. Contramans, king of Orleans and Burgundy, made use of him in matters of state (Greg. Turon. ix, 18). He devoted himself to the good of his diocese, built or repaired many monasteries, churches, and hospitals; and in the year 615 he made his celebrated testament (given by Marlijon in the Anatota) by which he appointed the Church his heir; among other arrangements, giving to the Basilica of St. Vincentius, where the body of St. Germanus, his early preceptor, was buried, the town of Bocanis, near Estampes, and much property to the Abbey of Coutre, which he had founded and dedicated to Sts. Peter and Paul, near Mains. He also left legacies to the king, to St. Denis abbey, and gave liberty to all his slaves. He was three times driven from his diocese, was present in various councils, and died June 30, 628. In the Gallican Martyrology his festival is marked February 3. See Baillet, July 3.

Bertrand le Blas, a martyr of the Reformation period, was a German by birth, and went to Wesel for the cause of religion, where, on Christmas-day, he took the cake out of the priest's hand, and stamped it under his feet, saying that he did it to show the glory of God. Bertrand was taken before the governor, and asked whether he repented of the act. He answered that if it were a hundred times to be done, he would do it. Then the judge put the hand that tormened most miserably. He had a ball of iron put in his mouth, and his right hand and foot burned between red-hot irons. Then his legs and arms were bound behind him with chains, and he was let flat down on a bed of red-hot coals. This occurred in 1555. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 395.

Bertrand, a monk of Chaise-Dieu (Chase-Des), in Auvergne in the 12th century, is the author of a treatise on the Life and Miracles of Robert, the Founder, which Labbe has given in his Bibliotheca Nova MSS, ii, 637; and which is also printed in the Acta Sanctorum, 24 Apr. iii, 326.

Bertrand, Saint, bishop of Comminges, in Gascony, was born about the middle of the 11th century. He embraced the ecclesiastical state very early, and was made, first, archdeacon of the Church of Toulouse, and shortly after bishop of Comminges, in which capacity he showed himself alike the physician, guide, and pastor of his flock. He restored the Church of Comminges, and was considered as its patron. He built a monastery for the clerks and canons, and gave them a rule. He died on the 15th or 16th of October, about 1126, having held the see about fifty years. His principal festival is made on the 15th of October. See Baillet, Oct. 15.

Bertrand de Comps, sixteenth grand-master of the order of St. John of Jerusalem, was elected in 1256, and addressed in 1257, a citation to the Knights of England to join their brethren in Palestine. They accordingly abandoned their house of Clerkewille at London, and aided in gaining Jerusalem for the Christians. He died in 1241. See Hoefer, Novus Biogr. Générale, s. v.

Bertrand or, according to some, Bernardes de Trilia, of the diocese of Trinches, a Dominican; flourished about the close of the 13th century. He composed a commentary on Peter Lombard's Book of Sentences, and postils on several books of Scripture are attributed to him. None have been printed.

He was the son of that village in 1759, preacher at Berne in 1744, private counsellor of the king of Poland, and member of the academies of Stockholm, Berlin, Florence, Lyons, etc. He cultivated the natural sciences, on which he wrote many works, besides a few religious books, for which see *Biogr. Bertrand (or Bertrando), Jean (1), a French prelate, was born in 1470. Originating from one of the more ancient families of Toulouse, he was appointed capitoul of that city in 1519, second president of Parliament in 1538, and in 1536 first president. The favor of Anne of Montmorency made him, in 1558, third president of the Parliament of Paris, of which he became first president in 1550. After the disgrace of chancellor Oliver, the favor of Diana of Poitiers made him guard of the seals. Having become a widower, he entered the ecclesiastical profession, and was first bishop of Comminges, then archbishop of Sens, and finally cardinal, in 1557, at the recommendation of Henry II. He died at Venice in 1560, on his return from Rome, where he had assisted at the election of pope Pius IV. See Hoefer, Novus Biogr. Générale, s. v.; Biogr. Universelle, s. v.

Bertrand, Pierre, a French prelate and theologian of the former half of the 14th century, a native of Annonay, taught civil and canonical law at Avignon, Montpellier, Orleans, and Paris, and was canon and dean of Pay-en-Velay, counsellor-creator at the Paris of France, chancellor of Queen Joan of Burgundy, bishop of Nevers, and, later, bishop of Autun. His merit gained for him numerous friends among the scholars who frequented the court of the pope at Avignon, and the canonists. He was an important part in the conference held at Vincennes in 1292, where Philip of Valois presided, in which the question was the circumscription of the civil and ecclesiastical jurisdiction in disputable matters. The result of this was a promise of reformation on the part of the clergy. The terms on which they were the going on between France and England did not allow the king to bring about the execution of this agreement. The oratorical talent which Bertrand showed on this occasion, in response to Peter of Cugnieres, advocate of the king, for gained, in 1331, the hat of the cardinal, which was given to him by pope John XXII. He founded at Paris the College of the Old Catechumens. He died at Avignon, June 24, 1439, leaving, Libelles aedeers Petrus de Cugnieres (Paris, 1503, 1153); the best edition is that given by Brune in 1713.—Tractus de Oriphis Jurisdictionum, sive de Dubias Potestitibus, etc. (Ibid. 1561). See Hofer, Nouv. Biog. Generale, s. v.

Bertrand, Samuel Reading, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Philadelphia, Dec. 17, 1806. He was prepared for college in Philadelphia; graduated from the College of New Jersey in 1828, and entered Princeton Seminary the same year, where he remained two years and a half, not completing his course because of ill-health. He was licensed by the Presbyterian of Philadelphia, Oct. 20, 1830, and ordained by the same Presbytery, April 22, 1831, as an evangelist. For about two years he labored as a traveling itinerant preacher, and entered Princeton Seminary in the spring of 1834 he became a resident of Port Gibson, Miss. Mr. Bertraon lived a very fruitful in establishing Chamberlain Hunt College, in Port Gibson, and was elected its president. He died Oct. 7, 1878. See Neurologcal Report of Princeton Theological Seminary, 1879, p. 27.

Bertulphus, Saint, third abbot of Bobbio, in Italy, son of a good family in France. He lived for some time at the court, from which life he was withdrawn by the example of his relative St. Arnoldus of Metz. He retired to Arnoldus at Metz, and after undergoing with him a course of discipline for some time, entered the monastery of Luxeuil about 620, under the abbot Exulfus. Here he attracted the attention of St. Attaulf, abbot of Bobbio, who requested the privilege of taking Bertulphus into Italy. This was granted; and about 624 Bertulphus was removed to Bobbio, and upon the death of St. Attaulf was elected abbot. In 627 Probus, or Proclus, bishop of Tortona, endeavored to submit the abbey of Bobbio to himself; but Attaulf, king of the Lombards, had such veneration for the abbot of Bobbio that he refused to meddle in the question, and suffered the latter to make his appeal to Rome. Pope Honorius exempted the abbey of Bobbio from all ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and made it dependent solely on the holy see. Bertulphus lived twelve years after his return from Rome; and having governed his monastery thirteen years, died August 19, 640, or 641. Neither the ancient martyrlogies nor the modern Byzantine martyrologies make mention of him; in that of the Benedictines his festival is marked August 19.

Bervanger, Martin de, a Roman prelate and philanthropist, was born at Sarcelles, May 15, 1795. He was at first vicar in his native city. After having concurred in the work of St. Joseph founded by the abbess of St. Joseph, in the Adoration of the Blessed Sacrament, intended for the instruction of children who were obliged to live by their own labor. This work, inspired by Christian charity, was at first very small. The first establishment of this kind was in 1837, in an attic in the suburbs of St. Marceus, attended by seven children, who made good progress. It required a great deal of patience and labor to bring the institution to a successful issue. This work of M. de Bervanger remains, and is one of the most useful imaginal. See Hofer, Nouv. Biog. Berwyn (or Gerwyn), a Welsh saint, a son of Brychan who is said to have settled in Cornwall, but is difficult to identify, unless he is the same as St. Caernarvon, who preceded him as Bishop of Llandaf. Another account (Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 142) makes Gerwyn a son of Brynach by Brychan's daughter.

Beryllians, a sect of Christian heretics which sprang up in the 3d century. They were followers of Beryllus, bishop of Bostra (q. v.).

Berytus (or Beirut). We extract the following additional particulars descriptive of this place from Porter's Handbook for Syria, p. 388 sq.

"The town is at the present time the most prosperous in Syria, though only ranking third in point of size. It is a commercial European, with its bustling bazaar and crowded streets, and its warehouses and magnificent and beautiful suburban villas. All this prosperity is owing to foreign influence; the European mercantile firms having invested large fortunes in the trade. The most important export is raw silk, the trade in which is rapidly increasing in extent and importance. In fact, Lebanon is gradually becoming one vast mulberry plantation. Beirut is every year increasing, and is at this moment, as far as foreign commerce is concerned, the first town in Syria. A large proportion of its imports are for the Damascus markets, it being now the port of that city. . . . The making of the great roaring waves and the range of the coast are further testimonies to the belief which has contributed very materially to the prosperity of Beirut. The road was constructed by a French company, but is now managed by the Britons. Beirut, the capital, is at the sea road running along the foot of Lebanon. The southern side is composed of loose, drifting sand, and has the aspect of a desert. The north-western side is totally different. The shore-line is formed of a range of irregular, deeply indented rocks and cliffs. Behind these rocks the ground rises gradually for a mile or more, when it attains the height of about two hundred feet. In the middle of the shore-line stands a dense nucleus of substantial buildings, then a broad margin of picturesque villas, embowered in foliage, running up to the summit of the heights. Beirut is a great port for foreign trade and foreign. Beyond these are the mulberry groves covering the activities, and here and there groups of palms and cypress.

"The old town stands on the beach, and often during a northerly gale gets more of the sea-water than is agreeable. The little port, now in a great measure filled up, lies between a projecting cliff and a ruinous insalated tower called the Buire, which has been made one of the fortifications, many a mark of British bulins. The old streets are narrow, gloomy, and badly paved; but some of them are wide, and broad enough for a rapidly advancing commerce. Many of them are passable for carts and carriages. The houses are substantial. They are built with a feeling of the spirit of the time, possessing some pretensions to architectural effect. The view commanded by the higher houses is magnificent. Embracing the bay of St. George, the indented coast stretching away northwards far as the eye can see, and the ridge of Lebanon with its wild greeks, dark pine-forests, clustering villages, and bare, outlined peaks.

"The antiquities in and around Beirút accessible to the traveller are few and of little interest. A number of col-
The environs of Beirut (Beirut) are described in the text. The city is accessed by tunnels of gray granite scattered here and there through and around the town; some foundations, pieces of tessellated pavement, and excavations in the rock, probably the remains of baths, half a mile along the shore to the westward; a group of sarcophagi about the middle of the south-western shore of the promontory; and the ruins of an aqueduct at the base of the mountains on the east, which once brought a supply of pure water from Nahr Beirut to the city—such is about a complete list of the antiquities. Almost every year shows that there are many others far more important buried beneath the soil and rubbish. Old tombs are frequently laid open by excavation, sometimes containing sarcophagi of pottery, with lachrymatories and other articles of glass.

"The cause of education has received a great stimulus since the establishment of the American Mission in 1823. Their schools have created a taste for information and literature: and their admirably conducted press has done much to gratify it, by the issue not only of religious books, but of excellent elementary treatises on the various sciences. The director of that press, Dr. Van Dyck, is one of the most accomplished Arabic scholars in the world.

"The college established in 1863 by the liberality of English and American philanthropists is an admirable institution, and will serve largely to advance the cause of education not in Beirut merely, but throughout Syria. It is founded on a large and liberal basis, and proposes to give complete collegiate training in languages, literature, science, and medicine. It is at present under the able presidency of Dr. Bliss, formerly an American missionary."

There is also a prosperous mission-school for girls, a boarding-school for boys, a medical school, a Prussian Institute of Deaconesses, and a beautiful chapel for English as well as Arabic Protestant service. The city is supplied with water from the Nahr el-Kelb by a modern aqueduct. See Thomson, Land and Book, i, 39 sq.; Hugawary, The Lord's Land, p. 726 sq.; Schaff, Through Bible Lands, p. 379 sq. BERYTUS, COUNCIL OF, was held A.D. 448, as is supposed, in September, to hear a charge preferred against Ibas, bishop of Edessa, by nine of his clergy, which was twofold: first, that he had said, "I envy not Christ being made God, having been made so myself as much as he," which he denied indignantly; and next, that he had called St. Cyril a heretic, which he avowed he never had after the reconciliation between John of Antioch, his own superior, and St. Cyril. refute this, his letter to Maria of subsequent date was added in evidence, containing a narrative of the whole controversy between Nestorius and St. Cyril. He rejoined producing a testimonial in his favor addressed to Eustathius, bishop of Berytus, and Photius, bishop of Tyre, two of his judges, and signed by upwards of sixty presbyters, deacons, and subdeacons of his diocese. His acquittal followed, which, having been reversed at Ephesus by Dioscorus of Alexandria the year following, he was summoned to the tenth session of the Council of Chalcedon, where the acts of this council are preserved. His epistle to Maria, indeed, was afterwards condemned at the fifth General Council.

BES (or Bessa) was a warlike and savage deity of Arabian origin. When introduced into Egypt he was regarded under the form of Typhon, or Dæus. He was represented as a short man with deformed legs, and a hideous face with a protruding tongue; with his right hand he generally brandished a sword over his head, over which was a high crown of erect feathers curving outwardly; around his loins was a panther's skin, the tall hair of which formed a decoration on his breast. He was also the special god of dancing and of the female toilet, and hence his figure continually occurs on mirrors and perfume-bottles. His analogue has been thought to be the Sīra of the Hindus.

Besas was a soldier martyred at Alexandria with St. Julianus (q. v.).

Bescapa, Carlo, an Italian prelate, was a noble Milanese, born in 1536, to whom St. Charles Borromeo gave a canonry in his cathedral. In 1579 he was appointed and entered among the Barnabites, of which order he became general; afterwards, in 1583, he was created bishop of Novara. He wrote many works, most of which still remain in MS.; among those published are, De Metropoli Mediolanensi (Milan, 1585, 1592); De Poesia, et Arte, Collectanea (Ingolstadt, 1592; Brescia, 1613). Beschi, Constantino Giuseppe, an Italian missionary of the Jesuit order, landed in 1700 in the city of Goa, learned the Tamarli language, the Sanskrit, Teloguan, Hindustan, and Persian, and attained the dignity of divin or counsellor of Shenda-Sahib, nabob of Trichinopoly. He founded two churches, and applied himself diligently to the conversion of the idolaters, with great success. In 1740, Morarpy Rao, at the head of the Maharratas, having conquered Trichinopoly, and made Shenda-Sahib prisoner, Beschi fled to Holland. He died in 1742. He published Grammatica Latino-Tamulica (1738; new ed. 1813; also in English, Madras, 1822). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Beschitz, Elias, a Karait of Adrianople, who died in 1491, is the author of פִּניָה נְזָר הַיַּה, i.e. "the mantle of Elijah," a ritualistic work, which is highly esteemed among the Karait Jews. It was completed by his son-in-law Caleb Afendulopo, and was printed at Constantinople in 1531. A new edition was published by Firkowitz (Opataoria, 1835; latest edition, Odessa, 1870). (B. P.)

Beschitz, Moses, a great-grandson of Elias, a learned Jew, was born at Constantinople about 1554. Educated by his father, a learned rabbin, he studied Greek, Latin, and Spanish; visited the principal synagogues of the East, and sustained several disputes against the rabbinites. Although not yet eighteen years of age at the time of his death in 1572, he left, according to the rabbin Mardochee, more than two hundred and forty-five works, which were mostly destroyed in the fire at Constantinople. Among those which escaped we notice פִּנֵה נְזָר הַיַּה, i.e. "the rod of God," in which he treats of the differences between the Karaites and rabbinities, tradition, the Decalogue, and the six hundred and thirteen precepts. A fragment of this work was published in Dod Mederach (Vienna, 1830). See De Dieu, in Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, & c.; Ben-Jacob, Thesaurus Librorum Judaeorum (Heidelberg, 1680); i, No. 832; ii, No. 1032; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Besen (existing in all things) was, according to the Indian Brahmins, the second of those beings which God created before the world. He is supposed by them to preserve the present world in its present state and to pass through several incarnations: in the first as a lion, in the second as a man, and in the tenth and last will appear as a warrior and destroy all religions contrary to that of the Brahmins. He is the second person of the Trinity, and has some ascribed qualities that apply to Christ.

Besley, Henry, an English Congregational minister, was born at Barnstaple in 1784. He was converted very early in life; at the age of fourteen began his ministerial preparation in the theological seminary at Axminster, and received his first appointment at Sydling, Dorsetshire, in 1804. After about three years labor at this place, an equal number on the island of Guernsey, and a short time at Limner, Somersetshire, he took the oversight of the Church at Littymore. Here for thirty-three years he labored faithfully and successfully. Resigning his charge in 1844, he passed the remainder of his days in less conspicuous Christian work. He died May 24, 1860. Mr. Besley's preaching combined doctrinal, experimental, and practical views of divine truth.
His happy tact in spiritual conversation, large correspondence on topics of the highest importance, and his zealous efforts to promote the benefit of religious institutions, made him extensively useful. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1861, p. 201.

He next went to Bristol, where he became connected with a business house. Here he was converted and gave himself to various forms of Christian labor, especially to preaching in cot-tages and visiting the sick. He soon began a regular course of ministerial preparation, with his brother, the foregoing. At the close of his studies Mr. Besley received a call from the Church at Wincanton. Here he was ordained, and spent five years of earnest labor. He next removed to Buntingford, where he labored for thirty-six years. At the close of this period, because of personal and family afflictions, he resigned his charge and returned to his native county, where he labored as often as opportunities and health would permit, and died June 26, 1877. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1878, p. 306.

(Tegernsee, 1782, fol.). This last work is but a preliminary of the Annals of Gottwick; it is a sort of treatise on the diplomatia and MSS. of Germany, after the manner of Mabillon’s great work, De Re Diplomatice. It is said, however, that the true author was Francis Jos. de Hahn, afterwards bishop of Bamberg, of whose Bessel speaks in the Preface as his fellow-laborer. See Biol. Universelle, iv, 394.

re-entered the itineracy. His health failed in 1863, and, though he was promised the restoration of his health, he continued in the ministry until his death, Aug. 15, 1873.
Mr. Beswick was a man of marked excellence and usefulness.

Betanças, Domingo de, a Spanish missionary, was born at Leon near the close of the 16th century.
He first studied law at Salamanca, then went to Rome, and established himself in a convent of the Benedictine order, which he soon left in order to take refuge on the small island of Ponza, situated four or five leagues from Naples. This island was for a long time inhabited by hermits, who lived in caverns. Betanças abode there for five years in absolute seclusion. He finally abandoned the ascetic life and came forth, and was ordained priest at Seville, and in 1614 went to Hispaniola, at the time when bishop Grijalva intended to chastise the Indians. Betanças was a witness of the cruelties which so rapidly depopulated St. Domingo. He learned the language of the Indians, taught them, and befriended them.
About this time Mexico offered a vast field for labor. He resolved to go, and arrived there with some of his brethren June 23, 1526. Here he founded, for the honor of the Benedictine order to which he belonged, the province of Santiago. In 1528 he went to find another convent in Guatemala, about the time that the independence of the convent was threatened by the house of St. Domingo. Betanças embarked for Europe in 1531, to maintain in the rights of his brethren at Rome. He obtained his request, and returned immediately to America. In 1356 he was elected canonically as provincial. This was the most glorious epoch of his career. The New World afforded intellectual culture to the Indians, whom he was seeking so zealously to aid. He sent T. Domingo of Minaya to Rome to plead the cause of the Indians. In 1537 he obtained of Paul III the promulgation of the bull which called upon Christian Europe to recognize the Indians as children of God, and by this act their cruelty was condemned. He spread this famous bull throughout America, and refused the bishopric of Guatemala, and in monastic humility performed the functions of provincial. At length he set out on his return to Spain, with a monk named Vicent of Las Brzas, and landed at San Lucar in July, 1549.
The month following he expired in the convent of St.
Paul, at Valladolid. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, Beteswammy (god of Sport), a Baga deity, was supposed to inhabit the forests of the Nilgherries in Hindustan.

Bethabara. Lieut. Conder thinks he has recovered this site in the present ford Akarsh, about a mile north of the place where the stream el-Jalud falls into the Jordan opposite Beisan (Tent-work, ii, 64 sq.); but he gives no decisive reason for the identification beyond the correspondence in name and the vicinity to Galilee, which he contends is required by the note of time in John iii.

Betham, Edward, B.D., an English divine of the 18th century, was educated at Eton School and at King's College, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow in 1731. He afterwards became rector of Greenford, in Middlesex, and preacher at Whitehall. His benefactions were very large as compared with his fortune.
He gave £20,000 to the Botanical Garden at Cambridge, endowed a charity-school in his own parish in 1780, and gave other gifts of importance. He died in 1785.

Betham, John, D.D., an English Roman Catholic divine, chaplain and preacher to king James II, died in
i. 31 (1688)—and Catholic Sermons (2 vols. 8vo).

Bethany in Judaea. We glean the following additional particulars on this interesting Scripture locality. Bethany is mentioned in connection with Beth-phage, "house of figs." We also know that palm-trees were plentiful in the environs of Bethany (John xii, 23) and on the Mount of Olives (Neh. viii., 13); while the date palm is moderately rare in Palestine to give to each locality where they were found a distinctive name (comp. Gen. xiv, 7; Deut. xxxiv, 3; Judg. iv, 5).

The village of Bethany is unquestionably ancient, though it was probably so small, and its situation so retired, that it never came into notice until the time of our Lord. Bethany stands on the border of the descert. Beyond it there is not, and apparently never was, any inhabited spot. It seems as if excluded from the world of active life, and one would suppose, from the look of its inhabitants, that they had given up industry in despair. The view from it is dreary and desolate.
Olives shut out Jerusalem and the country westward;
and the eye roams eastward down the bare, gray, "wilderness of Judaea" into the deep valley of the Jordan; and then up again to the long wall of the Moab mountains on the distant horizon. The houses are massive and rude, built chiefly of old hewn stones.

The leading, and indeed the only, road from Jerusalem to Jericho runs past Bethany. It is one of the dreadest in all Palestine, and it is now, as it was in the time of our Lord, one of the most dangerous (Luke x, 30). The road does not proceed direct from the Holy City to this village; it winds round the south side of the Mount of Olives; thus making the distance as nearly as possible fifteen furlongs (John x, 18). It was up that road through the wilderness from Jericho Christ came to raise Lazarus; and on it, without the village, the weeping sisters met him (comp. x, 40 and xi, 1–20). It was along that road to Jerusalem he went in triumphal procession, and from the palm-trees in the adjoining fields the multitudes cut down branches (Mark xi, 1–11; John xii, 13). A steep and rugged footpath leads from Jerusalem to Bethany over the summit of Olivet. It was probably by it Jesus "led out" his disciples "as far as to Bethany"—the same place where he was often wont to retire—and there "he lifted up his hands and blessed them. And while he blessed them, he was parted from them, and received up into heaven" (Luke xxiv, 50, 51). By the same path the disciples returned to Jerusalem (Acts i, 12). It is a singular fact, and one calculated to show the value that ought to be attached to Eastern traditions, that a tradition as old as the beginning of the 4th century fixes the scene of the ascension on the summit of the Mount of Olives and there, in honor of it, the empress Helena built a church (Eusebius, Vit. Const. iii, 43); yet Luke distinctly states that this event occurred at Bethany.

BETHANY BEYOND JORDAN (i.e. Bethabara). Con-

der (Handbook of the Bible, p. 315) regards this as another form of Bataanaza or Basham; but this identification is precarious, and the region indicated is too far north and east.

Betharabah is regarded by Tristram as "indicated by some ancient ruins on Tel-el-Moghefer, near the opening of the ravine Khaur el-Katuf" (Bible Places, p. 94). The Ordnance Map lays down the ruins of Kusa Hajlah in that position (three and a quarter miles south-east of er-Riba), and marks a site without ancient remains as Ruin el-Mogeirf, lying near the Kelt (one and a quarter miles south-east of er-Riba).

Beth-Aram. Tristram identifies this with what he calls Bel-Haran, "a conspicuous mound or tell, which might be artificial, very much like the great mounds of Jericho, and its top crowned with an old Moslem wey and tomb... On the mound and alongside of it were a few traces of walls and foundations" (Land of Moab, p. 360). Elsewhere, however, he says, "Beth-Aram is marked by a deserted heap of ruins at that spot, called Bel-Haran according to some, but for which my guides had no name" (Bible Places, p. 336). Prof. Merrill, on the contrary, says, "Its identity with the modern Tell er-Rama cannot be reasonably disputed" (East of the Jordan, p. 388). This latter spot is a mound a short distance east of the other site.

Beth-baal-Meon. The ruins of this place, the present Main, are of vast extent. They occupy the crests and slopes of four adjacent hills—one having evidently been the central city, and connected with the next by a wide causeway. The remains are of the ordinary type—foundations, fragments of wall, lines of streets, old arches, many carved stones, caves, wells, and cisterns innumerable. Some curious cavernous dwellings, built up with arches and fragments of old columns, are still occasionally used by the Arabs as tents and sleeping-places. The position of Baal-meon, the name ("The habitations of Baal"), and the commanding views gained from the neighboring peaks, would seem to show that here are the very "high places of Baal" to which

Bethel, king of Moab led Balaam, that "he might see the utmost part of the people," and curse them for him (Numb. xxii, 41). Balaam met Balaam on the banks of the Arnon; he led him thence to Kirjath-huzoth ("the Town of Streets"), which may perhaps be identical with the ruin Kureiyat ("the Towns"), situated at the southern base of Jebel Attârûs; and then on the next day Balaam brought the prophet to "the high places of Baal," that he might obtain a full view of the Israelites. See Trismann, Land of Moab, p. 316 sq.

Beth-car is thought by Lieut. Conder (Tent-work, i, 25) to be the present Ain-Karum, noted as the reputed residence of John the Baptist (Thompson, Land and Book, ii, 536 sq.).

Beth-Chayim (Heb. בְּתֵחַיִם, house of the living), a name given by modern Jews to a burialplace—the dead being looked upon as living. The name was probably invented by the Pharisees as a protest against the infantile doctrine of the Sadducees that there is no resurrection, and as a standing declaration of their belief in the immortality of the soul and a general resurrection of the dead.

Bethdagon. The town in Judah (Josh. xv, 41) is identified by Conder (Tent-work, ii, 335) and Trismann (Bible Places, p. 41) with the present Beit-Dejun, between Jaffa and Lydda; a site, however, which could not have fallen within the limits of that tribe. The town of this name in Galilee (Josh. xix, 27) is thought by both of these writers (Tent-work, ii, 335; Bible Places, p. 292) to be the modern Tell Dâvîd on the river Bolus, near its mouth. The name corresponds tolerably well (see Quarterly Report of "the Palestine Exploration Fund," January, 1881, p. 50), and there are "said to be remains upon the mound" (Robinson, New Researches, p. 103). It is marked on the Ordnance Map as Khîret Dîvîd, a ruined mound about twenty-five feet high, four miles south-east of Akka, with a well adjoining, but no other marks of antiquity.

Beth-Din (Heb. בֵּית-דִּינָם, house of justice), a tribunal in religious causes among the Jews. The Jewish Church is governed by a presiding rabbi in the city or town where they may be settled. He generally attaches to himself two other rabbins, and these combined form the Beth-Din. Their power was partly civil, partly ecclesiastical, and they received the name of Beteris of the Synagogue, because the chief government was vested in them. The Beth-Din had power to inflict corporal punishment, as scourging, but they could not condemn to death. See SYNAGOGUE.

Bethel (now Beitius). Of this locality we extract the following additional particulars from Porter's Handbook, p. 238.

Bethel, as it now appears from the South-west. (From a Photograph by the Editor. The eminence towards the right is Tell Hayjr.)
Bethesda, born at Iseworth, England, in 1773. Dr. Bethell was educated at King's College, Cambridge, where he took the degree of B.A. in 1796, became a fellow of his college and second member's prizeman. In 1824 he was nominated to the bishopric of Gloucester, and was duly consecrated. In 1830 he was transferred to the more lucrative see of Exeter, and subsequently in the same year was further advanced to the see of Bangor, which he held at the time of his death, in Carnarvonshire, Wales, April 19, 1852. The bishop was the author of several theological works, the principal of which is his General View of the Doctrine of Regeneration in Baptism. See Amer. Quart. Church Rev. 1859, p. 399.

Bethesda, Miracle of, in art. Of this there is an ancient representation on a sarcophagus from the Vatican cemetery. The subject occupies the centre of the tomb. A wavy line, representing water, divides the composition horizontally into two compartments: on the lower, the impotent man is seen lying on his couch, which is covered by a coverlet; on the upper, he is seen healed and carrying his couch, while the Lord stretches forth his hand towards him; another figure raises his hand, the fugues arranged as in the Latin form of benediction. The background is formed by an arcade of three arches supported by columns, intended, no doubt, to represent one of the "five porches" (John v. 2) in which the impotent folk were laid. The same miracle is represented, in a very different style, in the great Laurentian MS.

BETHESDA, to lie at the pool of, is a gross accommodation of a simple historical fact, in which some preachers indulge when urging sinners not to despair of salvation. There is reason to fear that multitudes have, by this abuse of Scripture, been deluded to their eternal ruin. In Germany the formula is used proverbially in speaking of theological candidates who are waiting for a living.

Beth-gamul. Prof. Merrill gives some reasons for thinking that Moab may have been popularly regarded as including the modern Um el-Jemal (East of the Jordan, p. 86). He gives a detailed description of the place (p. 82).

Beth-ham-Midraash (מִדְרָשׁ, house of exposition), is the name given by the Jews to those of their schools in which the oral law or rabbinical traditions were explained. See Midrash; Harbinism.

Beth-ham-Mikra (מִקְרָא, house of reading), is the name given by the Jews to those of their schools in which the text only of the law was read.

Beth-horon. Of both the places thus designated in Scripture but insignificant clusters of huts now remain as the representatives. See Porter, Handbook, p. 215, 264.

1. Beitar el-Foko (Beth-horon the Upper) is a small village, but it has an antiquated aspect, owing to the numbers of large stones built up in the walls of its houses, and also to its situation, perched like a castle on the summit of the tell. At the foot of the hill on the east side is an ancient reservoir. There is little cultivation round it, and indeed the rocky declivities afford little space for it.

2. Beitar el-Fohta (Beth-horon the Nether) is likewise a small hamlet, but there are some foundations and heaps of large stones marking the ancient site. It stands upon a slight eminence along the ridge on the north side of a well-wooded ravine (Wady el-Melab), which runs into the valley of Ajalon (Merj ibn-Omer), with another site bearing traces of ancient ruins along the Roman road a little to the south-east of it.

Béthisy de Mézières, Henri Benoît Jules DE, a French theologian, brother of count Eugène Eustace, was born in 1744. He embraced the ecclesiastical profession, was appointed in 1789 bishop of Uzès, and became in 1789 deputy of the clergy of the bailiwick of Nismes to the States-General, where he showed himself
Bethlehem

The population, of 2000 souls, is almost entirely Christian, and the inhabitants are remarkable for their enterprise and energy in trade. The Bethlehem women are famous for their beauty, for their delicate complexion and aquiline features. They are distinguished by their head-dresses, a tall felt hat, in shape a truncated cone, over which a white veil is arranged, and from which heavy strings of coins are suspended. Their dresses are also remarkable from the square patches of red and yellow, which are introduced into the blue or striped fabric of which they are composed. See ATTIRE.

Bethlehem is supplied with water by cisterns, and from the great aqueduct (from Solomon’s Pool) which passes through the hill. The famous well for the waters of which David thirsted (2 Sam. xxiv, 14-17) is supposed to be represented by an ancient and extensive cistern, with many mouths, on the north-east. It is not impossible that this may be the ‘pit’, as Josephus calls it (Ant. vii, 12, 4), which was beside the city.

“East of Bethlehem is a narrow plain or open valley, bare and treeless, with white stony slopes and a few crumbling ruins. One of these ruins is a large building called Sîn al-Ghamam (‘the sheepfold’), apparently an ancient monastery; a second site is called ‘the Church of the Flocks’, a subterranean Greek chapel, with medieval ruins above, first mentioned in crusading chronicles. It is here that Migdat-Eder, ‘the tower of the flock’, is supposed by Jerome to have stood, where, according to the Jews, Me-siah was first to appear; and it is on this plain, according to tradition, that the angelic messenger appeared to the shepherds, and that the Glória in Excelsis was first sung.”

Bethlehem as an Architectural Term. In the Ethiopian churches, a small building is thrown out from the east end of the sanctuary, where the bread for use in the eucharist is prepared by the deacon alone, and baked in the oven with which the place is furnished. This building is called the Bethlehem, or ‘house of bread’.

Bethlehem as a Symbol. In an ancient mosaic of the Church of Sts. Cosmas and Damian, in the Via Sacra, at Rome, two flocks, each of six sheep, pass from cities labelled respectively Hierusalem and Bethlehem towards the figure of a Lamb, representing the Lord, which stands on a mound in the centre. Similar representations are found elsewhere. The abbé Martigny supposes Jerusalem and Bethlehem to symbolize...
分别指的是犹太和正统教会在伯利恒的教堂，但这不是一种普遍的看法。伯利恒可能更适合作为正统教会的标志，因为这头山羊是被普遍认为代表了牧羊人的，而非牧羊人。伯利恒是基督教的诞生地，位于耶路撒冷以南，是使徒传教的地方。在玛利亚和约瑟的领导下，这座教堂位于伯利恒，是耶稣降生的地点。

Bethesda. If Capernaum be located at Khan Minyeh or Ain Tabghah, or anywhere in that immediate vicinity, Bethesda may very well have been situated at Tell Hum; and this position will obviate the necessity for the supposition of two Bethsidas, inasmuch as this was the last important town in that direction, and the entire shore of the lake beyond, even on the north-east side, may very well have been connected with it. Belonging to it (Luke ix. 10). See CAPERNAUM.

Bethshean. We extract the following additional particulars from Porter's Handbook, p. 347.

The ruins of Bethshean cover a space about three miles in circuit. No less than four streams flow through the site, so that the city must have consisted of several sections, separated by deep ravines and braving torrents. Between the principal streams is a hill two hundred feet high, in form a truncated cone. From its southern base the ground ascends gradually for about half a mile, and on this slope the great body of the ancient city stood. Here also stands the modern village, grouped round a massive square tower, the style of whose masonry proclaims its Jewish or Phoenician origin. Seathopolis was a city of temples. It was a chief seat of the Philistine god Dagon. The remains of no less than four temples can be traced at the base of the tell, and several others are seen elsewhere.

There are some thirty columns standing among the ruins, most of which appear to have lined the street which ran from the Gomar gate round the acropolis.

The most perfect as well as the most interesting ruin of Bethshean is the Theatre, situated in the valley south-west of the tell. Though the outer walls are shattered and ruined, the interior doors and passages are almost perfect. It is entirely built of basalt. In form it is semi-circular, and its diameter measures nearly two hundred feet. Here, we are told, a number of Christians were massacred during the reign of Julian the Apostate.

The citadel stood on the summit of the hill, and must have been a place of very great strength. The hill is a natural fortress, for a deep gully, called Wady el-Jilud, sweeps round its northern base, while another gully passes round the southern base, and the two meet on the east, thus almost surrounding it with an impassable moat. Its sides are steep, scarped, and in places almost perpendicular. A massive wall encircled the flat top, and its principal gateway was on the northwest. In its days, which are of comparatively recent structure, may be seen fragments of Corinthian capitals and shafts of limestone. It was doubtless on the wall of this citadel that the Philistines hung up the bodies of Saul and Jonathan (1 Sam. xxxi, 10); and one can understand from the position of the city how the daring inhabitants of Jnhesh were able to carry off the bodies. They crossed the Jordan during the night and crept up Wady el-Jalid to the northern base of the tell, then clambered up its steep side, scaled the wall of the city, and pushed down the bodies, and escaped.

"On the east and north of the tell there are extensive ruins, but now so overgrown with thorns, thistles, and rank grass that it is difficult to see them. On the north bank of the ravine, opposite the citadel, are a number of rock tombs and sarcophagi.

"The village is poor but populous, containing a colony of Egyptians brought: by Ibrahim Pasha. They have a bad name, and deserve it; for they are given to plundering and opium robbery when they can safely venture upon it. They are themselves frequently plundered by the wandering Bedawin."

The following is the latest account (Conder, Ten-twork, ii, 69):

"Beitnun is a miserable hamlet of mud hovels, amid the ruins of the important town of Scythopolis, which was a bishopric from the 5th century until the change of the see to Nazareth, in the 12th century. The remains of a theatre, hippodrome, and temple, of fine structural tombs, and baths, with a crowning fortress and bridge, are among the best-preserved antiquities of western Palestina. Christian martyrs, in the 4th century, here fought wild beasts in the theatre; and the caves with the sockets of the iron bars, and the narrow passages from the outside, are still intact in the ruined theatre of black basalt."

Bethshean is Isaiah's (Josh. xix, 22) is suggested by Lieut. Conder (Quarterly Statement of the "Pal. Explor. Fund," January, 1881, p. 50; Ten-twork, ii, 335) as being possibly the ruined site of the Beth-shan which was on the Jordan valley.

Bethulia is regarded by Lieut. Conder ( Ten-twork, ii, 335; Quarterly Statement of the "Pal. Explor.
Fund," 1881, p. 45) and Tristram (Bible Places, p. 204) as the modern village Mithluk, which is laid down on the Ordnance Map as Mithbalin, one and a half miles south-east of Samur and four and a quarter miles east of south from Tell Dothan.

Béthune. Hyppolyte de, a French prelate, younger son of Philippe, was born in 1647. He was raised to the bishopric of Verdun at the age of thirty-four years. He there established a seminary, to which he called superior professors, composed a catechism, a ritual, a Méthode pour Administrer le Sacrement de Pénitence (1691), a Nouveau Bréviaire (1693), and a Messe (1699). He built a hospital in his diocese, to which he bequeathed all his goods. He was the patron of several men of literary fame, and in particular of Martin Rethelius, who dedicated to him the second volume of the translation of the Chroniques de Saint Bénoit, par B. Jepres, Bénédictin Espagnol. Hyppolyte de Béthune signed an appeal against the bull Censivatus, and made himself highly esteemed by his conduct and his administration. He died Aug. 24, 1720. See

Béthune, James. See BEATON; BRUTON.

Béthune d'Orval, Anne Léonore de, a French ascetic writer, was born in Paris in 1557. She was educated at the abbey of Royal Dieu, then of Compiègne, where she acquired a taste for monastic life, which she entered upon at the age of sixteen years. The abbes of Notre Dame du Val de Giis, who perceived the merit of Leonore d'Orval, designated her to Louis XIV for her successor. At the age of twenty-nine, she was nominated for the position, and entered upon it at the commencement of the year 1687. Her virtue and talent made her a model for the society. She died Nov. 28, 1733. She left some works, as Réflexions sur l'Économie —Livre de la Perfection Chrétienne et Religieuse (Paris, Nally, 1718) —Règlement de l'Obbope de Giis, avec des Réflexions — Vie de Madame de Clermont-Mongat. All these works are published anonymously. See Hoefner,

Betogabra. See ELEUTHEREOPOLIS.

Betthelm, J. B., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Presburg, the capital of Hungary, in 1811.
His parents were devout Jews and were anxious that he should become a rabbi. At nine years of age he could read and write Hebrew, German, and French.
He attended medical lectures at Padua, and received the degree of doctor of medicine. He then travelled through various parts of Italy and Greece, practising his profession, after which he went to Egypt and entered the navy of Mehemet Ali, having received the appointment of chief surgeon. While stationed at Smyrna an Italian Bible was placed in his hands by the English Episcopal missionary, and also the New Testament in German; these he began to study, and he became so deeply interested that after five months he was impressed that it was his duty to preach to the Gospel to his brethren the Jews. With this view he went to London, and in an interview with the bishop he was informed that he must study theology at least three years at Oxford or Cambridge University.
Feeling
the burden upon him that he must preach, he com-enced as an Independent, and preached to the Jews in London with great success. In 1845 he was sent by a society of naval officers to the Loo Choo Islands, where he remained seven years, acquiring the language and translating the Gospels into Japanese and Chinese.
In 1850 commodore Perry found him there, and he rendered important service to that officer by acting as his interpreter. He went with the commodore to Hong Kong, China, and after remaining some time came to New York, where he spent two years in missionary work, and then removed with his family to Illinois.
In 1868 he settled at Brookfield, Mo., where he died, Sept. 9, 1869. See The Presbyterian, March 12, 1870.

Bettelinii, Pietro, an eminent Italian engraver, was born at Lugano in 1763, and studied under Gandolfi and Bartolozzi. In 1848 he was employed on The Judgment of Solomon, after Raffaello. His masterpiece is the engraving of The Entombment, after Andrea del Sarto, in the Florentine gallery. The following are some of his best productions: St. John; Ascension of the Virgin; Magdalene; Madonna and Sleeping Infant; the Portraits of Poliziano, Mucheluzzi, and Galilei. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Betti was an English priest, and one of the four sent by Finan to the Middle Ages as missionaries, after the baptism of Papua in 653.

Betti Biagio, an Italian painter, was born at Catiglione near Pistoja in 1454, and studied under Danielo da Volterra. His works are chiefly confined to the monasteries of Rome; among which is Christ Disputing with the Doctors, in the library of the Theatines. Baglioni says he was a monk for fifty years and died in 1615. He was also skilled in medicine, music, and botany. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bettinelli, Giuseppe Maria (called also Xavirro), an Italian Jesuit and literateur, was born at Mantua, July 17, 1718. He was sent by the Jesuits to Mantua and Bologna, and joined the society in 1736. From 1739 to 1744 he taught belles-lettres at Brescia, after which he went to Bologna: to study divinity. In 1748 he became professor of rhetoric at Venice, and in 1751 the College of Nobles at Parma was intrusted to him, and he was named to the illustrious office eight years during which he visited the various cities of Italy in the interest of his order. After the suppression of the Jesuits in 1773 he retired to Mantua, where he spent the greater part of his remaining years. He died Sept. 13, 1808. His complete works were published at Venice in 24 vols. 12mo. (1779). See Encyclopedia, Brit. (9th ed.) s. v.; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bettini, Antonio, an Italian prelate and anti-quarian, was born at Sienna in 1396, and joined the Jesuits. At the age of sixty-five he was elected bishop of Foligno, and died in 1487, leaving several works on mystic and religious art, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bettini, Pietro, an Italian engraver who flourished in 1681, etched a few plates, among which are the following: Christ appearing to Peter, after Domenico Campelli; The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian, after Domenico.

Bettle, Samuel (1), a minister of the Society of Friends, was born in Philadelphia in 1816. In early manhood he embarked in mercantile pursuits. After his conversion he consecrated himself to the service of his Lord, and was recognized as a minister of the Gospel. "His ministry was clear, eloquent, thoughtful, weighty, and, above all, accompanied with unction." In the discharge of his duties he visited many yearly meetings in the United States. He was conspicuous among the Indians and freedmen, and his advice was sought and followed by the heads of government at Washington. Among the ministers of his denomination he took a deservedly high rank. He died at his home near Philadelphia, January 28, 1880. See Friend's Review, xxxii, 616. (C. C. S.)

Bettolo, Samuel (2), a minister of the Society of Friends, was converted in early life, and became one of the most eminent ministers in the denomination. His mind was remarkably well disciplined, and this, with his natural endowments, made him peculiarly well fitted for his work during a long course of years. Instructed with considerable means, he exercised a true Christian influence, devoting a large portion of his wealth to that purpose. For more than half a century he filled various responsible stations in his society. He died in Philadelphia, Pa., April 12, 1861, aged eighty-six years. See Amer. Annual Monitor, 1862, p. 7.

Betta, Alfred H., M.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Norwalk, Conn., Sept. 2, 1786. Beughe, Charles Antoine François de Paul de, a Flemish theologian and scholar, was born at Brussels in 1744. He obtained in 1763 the degree of bachelor in theology at the University of Louvain, and in 1766 he was selected as the college's theological professor. He was successively professor of poetry at Turnhout, director of the College of Courtray, principal of that of Gand, and secretary of the vacant see of the bishopric of Tour- nay. He demanded of one of the leaders that he should repress habitual begging, and give place to a memorial where the commune of Vilución (XIV) published in 1775—Sur les Moyens de Corriger les Malversations et les Fraismot. In 1790, the cardinal of Frankenberc, archbishop of Mechlin, chose Beughe for his secretary; but the invasion of the French army in Belgium forced the cardinal to flee, while his secretary, not being willing to take the oath of kâne à la royauté, was imprisoned seven months at Mechlin and afterwards at Versailles, from whence he was carried to the Isle of Oleron. At the fall of the empire he returned to his own country, where he secured the favor of a violent contractor, who bribed the publicists, who proposed the union of Belgium and Hol- land. This dispute caused him to write several pamphlets, entitled Le Bouclier, L'Unité, L'Antidote contre le Somnambulisme. He also took part in the disputes of the bishop of Gand with the government. He died at Bruges on Oct. 4, 1797. In the same year he was sent by duke Christopher of Württemberg, together with Brenz and two others, to the Council of Trent, with the view of having the new creed approved. But, of course, this mission was without result. After his return he used all his influence to harmonize those parties which participated in the Oesandrian controversy, especially in Prussia, Saxony, Worms, and Erfurt. In consideration of his many services, he was appointed in 1561 chancellor of the University and provost of the Stifts- kirche at Tübingen. He died in the same year, Oct. 28, at Paris, where he had gone, together with Jacob Andréi and Biedembach, to attend the colloquy of Poyse. He wrote, Enarratio Epistolae Canonicae Ioannis:—Li- ber contra Petrum a Soto:—Disputatio de Mediatori Christi:—De Claudius Regno Cicerorum. Bevan, Barbara, a Welsh minister of the Society of Friends, was born in Tremyr in 1682. She converted at the age of sixteen, and soon after joined the Church and received a call to the ministry. She now devoted herself most zealously to her work in West Jersey, and some parts of East Jersey, where her labors were well received. For a time she was her father's companion in Christian work in Wales, travelling in 1704 about six hundred miles in the performance of her ministerial duties. Her life, which was so useful, was a brief one, ending in great peace, Nov. 26, 1705. See Piety Promoted, ii, 29, 26. (J. C. S.)

Bevan, Evan, a minister of the Society of Friends, was born in Lantwit Yarde, Wales, about 1678. He pursued his collegiate studies at Oxford, where, it is said, he made considerable progress in various parts of literature. He next studied law, and subsequently practiced in his native county, Glamorganshire, where he received an appointment as deputy-sheriff. While thus engaged his mind became deeply interested in his own spiritual condition, and having been instructed and comforted by reading Barclay's Apology for the Quakers, he began to preach. Between 1693 and 1694. During last twenty years, he was much engaged with his ministerial duties, chiefly in the place and neighborhood of his residence in Pontymo, Monmouthshire, Wales. After uniting with the Friends, he taught a school for thirty-five years. He died Feb. 17, 1746. See Friends Library, iii, 174-178. (J. C. S.)

Bevan, John (1), a minister of the Society of Friends, was born in Wales in 1646. After his marriage, he became a member of the Church of England. Having read a book by George Fox the younger, he united with the Friends. In 1688 he and his wife removed to Pennsylvania, where they remained many years and brought up a family. They returned to England in 1704. While in America John had received a gift of the ministry, and itinerated in parts of the new country; and when he returned to his native land he continued to preach in different parts of Wales, closing his life not long after 1721. See Piety Promoted, iv, 383-384. (J. C. S.)

He was religiously trained from infancy; joined the Church of England, and afterwards became a Quaker; received his theological training at Three Crosses, and was ordained Aug. 6, 1852, at Providence, Llangedock, and Carmel, Llandudno. Bevan, William, an English Congregational minister, was born at Ilginlton, London, Sept. 3, 1812. In 1835 he left college, and was ordained pastor at Salem Chapel, Wetheralbourn, and in 1837 undertook the pastorate at Newington Chapel, Liverpool, where he labored successfully ten years. At an urgent request, in 1847 he removed to London and became secretary of the Evangelical Alliance. He accepted the pastorate of Snow Hill, Wetheralbourn, in 1849, which he retained until 1860. In 1862 he removed to Bow, where he preached till his death, June 4, 1874.
Mr. Bevan was a grave and earnest preacher; his sermons were solid in style, and rich in instruction and guidance. He had a remarkable gift of prayer. As a pastor, he was the ever accessible resort of the troubled and anxious. Whatever he undertook he did thoroughly. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1873, p. 912.

Beverly, Thomas (2), an English Nonconformist divine of the 17th century, was minister to a Congregation at Cutler’s Hall, London, and published a number of works on prophecies and other subjects. Shortly after graduation he was elected fellow of his college, and, receiving holy orders, settled in Lincoln, where he excited public attention as a preacher, first at the chapel in Great Queen Street, Lincoln’s-inn Fields, and afterwards at that in Spring Gardens. He was also the author of several successful literary efforts. Besides other productions of equal merit, the public is indebted to his pen for an able vindication of Hammond from the strictures of Dr. Johnson, and for a very elegant translation of Numa Pomppilius, from the original French of Monsieur de Florian. Mr. Beville, in private circles, was no less popular than as a preacher and scholar. He was an agreeable companion, a firm friend, and ever ready to assist with advice and means those who might need his aid. He died suddenly in 1822.

Bewglass, James, L.L.D., M.R.A.S., an English Congregational minister, was born at Killyman, Co. Tyrone, Ireland, Dec. 4, 1809. His father was a small farmer, and it was only by strenuous efforts and much self-denial that Mr. Bewglass obtained his education. He was first sent to a small neighborhood school near his home, and then, after some years' work on the farm, he went to Belfast College. Here he took honors in fourteen subjects, and made a fine figure. But it was in 1832, when he avowed himself a Christian, joined the Church, and was chosen deacon. In 1842, he was ordained to the ministry in connection with the Irish Evangelical Society, and about this time obtained his A.M. at the University of Aberdeen. Soon after he was chosen to a professorship in the Dublin Independence College. During the four months' vacations he went to the universities of Halle and Berlin, was made a member of the German Oriental Society, and was pressed to accept a professorship at Halle, but he declined. At the close of his Dublin career, in 1848, Dr. Bewglass became principal over the Yearly-of-England Dissenters' Proprietary School, at Taunton, and six years later removed to Silicoates, where for twenty-two years he presided over the Northern Congregational School, dying at his post, April 3, 1876. In politics, Dr. Bebbington was an advanced Liberal; in religion, he had a marked Puritan strain of thought and feeling, and was a strong Nonconformist. He was a ripe scholar, a benevolent gentleman, and a zealous public servant, in the Home Office department. He was a born ruler of boys, and won the affection and regard of all under his sceptre.

In 1828 he entered the travelling connection of that conference, and in 1829 was transferred to the Missouri Conference. In 1841 failure of health obliged him to take a superannuated relation, which, with two years' exception of active work, he sustained until his death, at Hannibal, Mo., Nov. 5, 1846. Mr. Bewley was eminent for his sincere self-denial and abundant labors. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1847, p. 106.

See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1847, p. 106.

Bexerano, Pietro. See Bengarano.

Bexerans are pagan priests among the Mandingoes, on the west coast of Africa. They are much addicted to the study and practice of jugglery. Their grand Bexeran is, as it were, the sovereign priest. He presides over all the other priests who profess to teach magical arts to the people. A common practice with them is to inscribe letters or other marks on small pieces of paper, which they carefully wrap up and give to their pupils and others as effectual preservatives against diseases and calamities of every kind.

Beysgacht, Haji (i. e. saint), a Turkish dervish, founder of religious orders. This pious Musulman, who, from his virtuous reputation, was called Vely, instituted an order of dervishes, which was called, from the name of the founder, Beysgachta. The reputation which his prophecies and miracles had gained for him determined Amurath I to employ him to consecrate the standard of the new militia. He consented, and, approaching the army, ordered them to conquer in all their undertakings, and gave them the name of Teni cher. The Sultan of Persia, Mohammed Chehr, in 1367 or 1368, is found at the village of Beyzartish upon the European shore of the Bosphorus, not far from Galata. This is a place of pilgrimage which is highly respected by Musulmans. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Beyla, in Norse mythology, was the servant of Freyr, the wife of Beiggwir, and friend of Landfisa, the mother of Loke, which moved her to beg the evil Asa Loke, when he insulted all the deities at Fjgir's feast, to spare Landfisa, his mother.

Byeun, D. J., a Welsh Congregational minister, was born at Caermarthenshire in 1792. When very young he removed to Merthyr-Tydfil, and there joined the Congregationalists. Mr. Byeun was ordained at Llaner-chuy-nued, Anglesea, in 1814. After a few years of incessant labor he resigned his charge, and returned to South Wales. Thence he went to Prussia, stayed a few years, and then returning, spent the remainder of his life at Groeswen, where he died, June 26, 1872. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-Book, 1873, p. 316.

He came back to America in 1710 and took orders in the Episcopal Church, and became pastor of Harlem and Fordham Episcopal churches in 1710. He was suspended by the Classis of Amsterdam in 1712, because he had joined the Episcopal Church without making any complaints or giving any reasons for the step which he had taken. Thereupon he went again to Harlem in 1713, and was restored to the ministry of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, and became pastor of the Church at Curacoa from 1714 to 1717. BEZAA, Saint. See BEGA.

BEZEK. 1. (Judg. i, 5) This is thought by Lient. Conder (Tent-work, ii, 385; Quart. Statement of the Pal. Explor. Fund, 1881, p. 50) to be the ruined site Bezzaz, “south of Lydda,” but the Ordnance Map contains no such name in that immediate vicinity. 2. (1 Sam. xi, 8) This has been fully recovered by Lient. Conder (ibid.) in the ruined site, with graves and cisterns, laid down on the Ordnance Map as Kharib Ibkit, nine miles west of the Jordan and eleven miles southwest of Beisan.

The ruins of this place have recently been discovered by Mr. Palmer, a little more than two miles southwest of Dihon, now called Kasur el Beheir. They are on a knoll, and are of some extent.

BEZET (1 Mac. vii, 19) is considered by Lient. Conder (Tent-work, ii, 385) as the modern Beita Zita; but he gives no further details.

BEZETH. Tristram thinks that “beyond a shadow of doubt” this hill “forms the greater part of the Mohammedan quarter of modern Jerusalem—a broad, irregular ridge, separated from Moriah by the fosse and great Pool of Bethesda, from Akra by the Harmonian valley, and with a rugged, precipitous descent on the east to the valley of Jehoshaphat or Kidron. The north gate, now a Moslem cemetery, is outside the walls” (Bible Places, p. 140).

BEZLA, in Slavonic mythology, was the goddess of twilight among the Wends, in the train of the god of the sun, Perun.

BEZON, ARMAND BAZIN DE, a French prelate, son of Claude Bazin, became in 1685 bishop of Aire; in 1698 archbishop of Bordeaux, and in 1719 of Rouen. He was one of the provincial of the Bordeaux at the assemblies of the clergy in 1705, 1707, 1710, 1711, and 1715. His great knowledge of ecclesiastical affairs caused him to be made a member of the Council of Concience, which was established Sept. 1715, after the death of Louis XIV. He was admitted to the Council of Regency, and charged with the direction of the stewardships. Severe reproach is due this prelate for having permitted the infamous Dubois to be ordained in his diocese. He died Oct. 8, 1721, leaving, Ordonnances Synodales du Diocese de Bordeaux (Bordeaux, 1704):—Proces-verbal de l'Assemblee du Clergy tenu en 1685 a Saint-Jean-au-Lac-et-Laye (Paris, 1890). The principal sects of Bespoopotschina are the Duchoborts, the Pomoryzna, the Theodornits, the Filopofftechis, the Neotetchnits, the Posterskho Soyogtlen, the Novojetzni, the Samokrachtschni, the Tuchauschni, the Molakanen, the Ikonoborts, and the Seleznetschni (s. v., under their appropriate heads). See Russian Church.

BEZIZCALUA, ERECOLE, an Italian painter, who flourished about 1640, was a native of Pisa, where he was born, and where he received his instruction. He is thus a picture in the choir of the Church of San Stefano, at Pisa, representing several saints, as a fine performance. His works are not mentioned. See Spooner, Biog. Dict. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

BHADRAKALI. See WADRAKALI.

BHAGAVADI, in the mythology of India, was the surname of Daksha or Tekhen, one of the ten created beings sprung from Brahma's great toe. Bhagavad was also the surname of Bhavam, the wife of Siva, when she is worshipped as Wadradali (q. v.).

BHAGAVAT (the blessed), in Hindu mythology, is a surname of the supreme deity Vishnu, when he is worshipped in the icon of Krishna. The book Purana, teaching about him, bears the name of Bhagavat-Purana. See PURANA.

BHAGAVAT-GITA, a philosophical episode of the Mahabharata (q. v.), is regarded as exhibiting the most complete view of ancient Oriental mysticism. It consists of a dialogue between the god Krishna and the hero Arjun. This poem is attributed to the 7th or 8th century of our era, while the Mahabharata, to which this pretends to be an episode, must have been written at least eight hundred years before. The highest state of felicity to which the Bhagavat-Gita points is eternal absorption into Brahma—such a state that when the man dies, he may be born again into any form on earth. See BAGAMA.

BHAIYAV (or Lord of Terror), in Hindu mythology, is one of the incarnations of Siva (q. v.).

BHAIYAVASA is a festival of Bhaiyav, celebrated among the Hindus, when, according to promise, his votaries suspend themselves in the air by hooks passed through the muscles of the back, and allow themselves thus to be whirled in his temple and a circle of fifty or sixty feet in circumference. See DUDLA PYRAM.

BHAAHA, in the mythology of India, was the “godness of speech,” the surname of Saraskwadi, the wife of the Gauges.

BHAAOS, in the religious doctrine of India, is a mixture of the dust of sandal-wood and dry cow-dung. With it a certain mark (Terumma) is made on the forehead by which the various religious sects distinguish themselves.

BHAVA, in the mythology of India, was a surname of Siva; it signifies, “he who produces,” and therefore applies much rather to the all-producing power of Brahma than to the destroyer Siva.

BHAVAN is the exercise of meditation enjoined upon the Buddhist priests. At the close of the day, or at the dawn, they must seek a place where they will be free from interruption, and, with the body in a suitable posture, they must meditate on the glory of Buddha, the excellence of the bana (q. v.), and the virtues of the priesthood.

BHAVANA (the All-bearing), in the mythology of India, is one of the most honorable names given to the wife of Siva. She is identical with the mighty goddess Maia, the all-awakening love, the first mother. The myths of India affirm that she is both mother and wife of the great trinity Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva. This trinity had a conference with her as to the further creations, and her creative word (Om—Be-it, or “Let there be”) was both confirmation and creation. Joyfully she clapped her hands, and thereupon those eggs fell from her lap, out of which the gods were formed. The fable which is most generally accepted is that she only bore Vishnu, from whose navel a lotus-flower grew, and in its centre Brahma rested, from whose blood Siva sprang. Bhavana is the dispenser of all happiness and she is therefore highly honored in a number of festivals—as, for example, in the festival Egadashi. This goddess also has her dark side, as most of the Hindu deities, according to which she becomes the frightful Kali. As her husband, Siva, is the creator and also the destroyer, so she as Kali, or Wadradali, is the dreadful revenger, whose fiery glance need not escape. See TRIMITLI; WADRAKALI.
Bhikshu, in the religion of India, is the highest of the four grades of the castes of Brahmins, into which every Brahmin enters in his seventy-second year, if he can meet the ascetic requirements necessary for admission to this honor. He is then looked upon as a perfect saint, whom nothing separates from entering Paradise save death, and whose departure from this world is not mourned, but celebrated, as everlasting bliss has opened its arms for him. In order to become a Bhikshu, the Brahmin renounces all his property, has his hair cut off as a sign that he is no more a priest, wears a linen cloth and the skin of a tiger in honor of Siva, and performs the sacrifice Homam; whereupon he is instructed in the duties of the new grade and made a priest of Siva. As a Bhikshu he must wash his linen himself, and continually hold a brass vessel in his hand, in order to cleanse the food that he has begged; he is further compelled to carry the staff Dandam, which protects him against all influences of evil geni. He is obliged to battle against all evil lusts, bathe three times a day, mark his forehead and breast three times a day with the ashes of sacred cow dung, and wander about the country begging by stretching forth his hand, not with words. There are thousands of such Brahmins, living on the kindness of the people, who worship them as gods and look upon them as perfect beings. They are barefoot; their clothes are filled with ashes and their posture. Their head is broken by a coconut, and parts of the skull are distributed to those standing around.

Bhima (the frightful), in the mythology of India, is a surname of Siva. The same name is also carried by two other mythological characters, one a scholar of Siva, and the other a son of Pandu, also of supernatural strength. During the war between the Kurus and Pandus he saved his brothers from death by fire. He also distinguished himself for his fearlessness and bravery in besieging Duryodun and slaying the mighty elephant Asshutharam. He eventually threw himself into an abyss, because he trusted more in his own strength than in the gods.

Bhogavati, in the mythology of India, is a city of the infernal region, inhabited only by snakes, in which the despisers of laws are tortured by bites of snakes.

Bhom (Bhum, or Bhumi), in the mythology of India, is the name of Tuesday. The god Mangal (Mangalen), a son of the earth, rules the same, as also the earth, from where the name Bhom (earth-day).

Bholverlok, in the mythology of India, is the heaven of the gods, the second of the thirgala (regions of heaven). In this the moon travels every month through the twenty-seven houses of its great dwelling. This is probably a picture of the astronomical relation the moon bears to the earth, as the former completes her sidereal course in twenty-seven days.

Bhrigu, in the mythology of India, was one of the ten Mahakarish or great philosophers, the sons of Brahma, the compiler of a number of books. He proved which was the most loving of the three great gods, in order to worship him supremely. Brahma was engrossed in the study of the sacred books, and did not allow the philosopher near him. Siva, as the incarnate Mahadeva, pleased him gladly, but asked him to be displaced by a few insulting words of Bhrigun, that the latter was only saved from death by sudden flight. Therefore only Vishnu, the preserver, remained. To prove him, Bhrigun woke the sleeping god with his foot; but the god was so calm and kind that he not only did not grow angry, but also asked Bhrigun if he had not hurt his foot, as his (Vishnu's) body was hard. Bhrigun fell on his face before the god, told the reason of the deed, and begged forgiveness, which he received.

Bhudas (Budhas, or Budhon), in Hindu mythology, is a servant of Siva, when he appears as judge and punisher.

Bhula. See Bhum.

Bhulok (or Bhurolk), in the mythology of India, is the lowest of the seven surga or heavens, the nearest to us, the region of the earth. The sun (Surya) is its ruler, as the moon is of the second, Bholverlok.

Bhumasser, in the mythology of India, is a powerful giant, a proud daemon, who desired to rule all heaven, overloading the seven surga with his armies, andsubjecting their king Indra. Sixteen thousand beautiful princesses were captured by him and imprisoned in his palace. Sushama, Krishna's wife, desired to see the ravishingly beautiful daughters, but Bhumasser refused her. This insult resulted in a frightful war, in which numberless daemons fought on both sides, until Krishna, obtaining the victory, battled with Bhumasser himself, and killed him. Thenceupon the young god entered the palace. The beautiful princesses had only changed masters. For Krishna kept them with his wife, who led them to his residence Dwarka, where he built them sixteen thousand palaces, and lived a happy life.

Bhūr, in the mythology of India, is one of the mysterious works which was milked by Brahma from the Vedas (the sacred books, represented under the symbol of milk-producing cows). It denotes the earth, whose mystical picture it is. The earth has five attributes, known through smell, taste, color, touch or sound; and the other elements, going downwards, have each one attribute less. Water lacks smell; fire, besides smell, lacks taste; the air lacks smell, taste, and touch; and ether has only sound left.

Bhūt, in the mythology of India, is a general expression for the ten elements out of which the human body is composed. They are divided into five fine and uncouth; the former are ether, fire, air, water, earth; the latter are the same, only in another form.

Bhūt-Akāsh, in the mythology of India, is the personification of the highest and purest element, that which we call Ether. He holds all; all is embodied in him: stars, sun, earth, moon—the whole universe.

Bhuta (or Butta), in Hindu mythology, is an evil spirit, who guards the doors of the temple of Manar—a deity whose cultus is quite extended among the Tamul tribe. He is represented in a colossal statue as a sitting warrior, treading a human being under him. The whole is built up with bricks and covered with lime. The god Manar signifies the sun. The Sanskrit language says: "sacred master" (Swami), and is thought by some to be Mahadeva, by others to be Vishnu himself. A third opinion is still more general, that he is an incarnation of Svaramun, a son of Siva. The Brahmins despise Manar, and do not recognize him as classed among the gods of India, and never sacrifice in his temple: however, he has many worshipers, and his priests belong to the numerous tribe of Pallis, but they are equally as much disregarded as their god. The small temples of this god may be found on the plains of India. Before these temples stand these giant statues of Bhuta as guard.

Bhūt-ātma, in the mythology of India, is the human body, so called because of its composition out of the five elements (Bhut) and the spirit (Ațma). Bhuvāy, in the mythology of India, is one of the four mysterious words which Brahma milked out of the three Vedas—namely, Air; the others are called Bhr (earth), Swer (heaven), and Om (the unity of the three divine forms or manifestations—namely, Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva).

Bia (strength), in Greek mythology, was the daughter of the Titan Pallas and Styx. Her brothers were Zeos (fame or war) and Kratos (power), and her sister Nike (victory).
Bia-GOMAI, in the mythology of the Lapps, is the god of storm and ruler of the entire space. It is he whom the sorcerers pray to for favorable changes in the weather.

Bialban, in Oriental mythology. According to the myths of the Persians and Arabsians, there were creatures (called Bialbaus) before Adam, differing from human beings in form, language, and character. Every generation was ruled by a ruler, Soliman, seventy of which followed each other, and the people changed their forms and languages and character with every generation.

Bialloblotzky, Christian Hermann Friedrich, a German theologian, was born of Jewish parents, April 9, 1793, at Pattensen, near Hanover. When he left the Church they were at a loss to say. Chalmers, Ed. Irving, etc., Hanover, 1828). In connection with F. Sander, he published Pusey's Historical Inquiry into the Theology of Germany (Lond. 1828, 2 vols.), under the title, Das Aufkommen u. Joseph ben-Joshua Meir, the Sephardi (Lond. 1834-36, 2 vols.). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 115; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 449, 595; ii, 109; Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. ii, 1021. (B. P.)

Bianchini, a family of eminent artists, who wrought mosaic pictures at Venice in the 16th century. The most eminent of these were Vincenzio, who flourished from 1517 till his death in 1552; Domenico, his brother; and Giovanni Antonio, his son. They were employed in the churches of Venice. The art of mosaic work had at this time been brought to such perfection at Venice that Vasari declared that "there would be no effect possible to effect more with colors." There are a number of mosaic pictures in the churches, galleries, and public edifices of Italy, especially at Florence, Milan, Rome, and Venice, and some of the greatest artists were employed to furnish designs for them. It will be sufficient to mention the mosaic of the window chapel of the Church of St. Mark at Venice, which contains the famous series of pictures of the Life of the Virgin, executed by Michele Zambono, after designs in the best taste of the Vivarini. The Ducal Gallery at Florence is also rich in specimens of this art.

Bibërës is a term used principally among the Benedictines, to signify the cup of drink given to the monks assembled in the refectory, during the summer, after noes, if it were not a fast; but after vespers, if it were. It was commonly of cold water; if wine was added, it was taken from the usual allowance. There were, however, special foundations, for the purpose of giving the monks, in some houses, wine instead of water for their birebes.

Bibiana, Saint, Virgin, and Martyr, is said to have been the daughter of Flavianus, a Roman prefect, exiled for the faith, and of Dafrosa, also a martyr. Apro- nianus, governor of Rome in 863, before whom Bibiana and her sister Demetria were brought, prepared to put them to the torture, but before it could be inflicted the latter fell dead, after having made confession of the faith. Bibiana was placed in the keeping of an infamous woman named Rufina, who in vain endeavored to corrupt her virtue, and at length she was beaten to death with scourges loaded with lead. She is commemorated with her mother and sister on Dec. 2. The Christians built a chapel over her tomb, which pope Simplicius changed into a church in 465. This church was called Olympia, from the name of a pious lady who had met with a personal injury. Repaired by Honorius III, it was rebuilt in 1628 by Urban VIII, who placed in it the remains of the saints Bibiana, Demetria, and Dafrosa. See Hoefer, Nov. Biogr. Générale, s. v.; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Bible Christians, commonly styled Bryantites, are a branch of the great Methodist body in England.

I. Origia and History.—This section of the Methodist family originated in the summer of the year 1815, through the labors of William O'Brien. He was born at Gunwen, in the parish of Luxullian, Cornwall, in February, 1778. Soundly converted in 1798, he immediately became anxious about the souls of his neighbors, and began to exhort publicly. These humble efforts were blessed, so that in a short time about seventy persons were converted and joined the Methodist society in Cornwall. The first text he took was Luke xix., 1-10, and on the first Sunday after Christmas-day, he longed to be called into the Wesleyan ministry, but several disappointing circumstances prevented. God had other purposes in reserve, which were in due course revealed. In 1804 he was again impressed with the conviction that he must preach, but the way to do so did not open, and he was sorely tried. The trial was followed by a dangerous illness, during which he resolved to preach the Gospel when he recovered; but, on consulting with the Wesleyan preacher, he was again discouraged in his projects.

In 1809, while the Rev. William Womersley was absent from Cornwall, on a visit to Yorkshire, Mr. O'Brien took his appointments. God abundantly blessed him in his preaching, and he visited some places where the Gospel had not before been preached—his labors being owned by the conversion of sinners. This greatly encouraged him to visit other places destitute of religious services, and, on inquiry, he found that in East Cornwall there were about twenty families in the situation of which the people were without the privileges of the Gospel. He visited those in Devon County, preaching almost daily, with many converts as the result; but meeting constant opposition and persecution. In 1810, he would not give up his itinerant labors outside of his own Methodist circuit, the resident preacher in November formally excluded him from the Wesleyan society.

Being assured of the good-will and affection of the poor neglected people, in the spirit of an earnest missionary he went from place to place, receiving abundant encouragement and besought him to come to Christ. This course he continued for five years, being content with such support as the people were willing to give to secure his continued services. Among his converts were Mrs. Rattenbury, Mrs. Thorne, and her sons, then of Sheebear, a place which has since become famous in the history of their connection.

In January, 1815, the Rev. Francis Collier, Wesleyan preacher at Bodmin, secured the services of Mr. O'Brien in carrying on the work of God in his circuit; but, in addition, he was out at many special services, and preaching in places where no religious societies existed. He took the circuit of Bodmin with steady and unremittent persistence; and some places being quite beyond Methodist circuits, he was urged to repeat his visits. For doing so, at the June quarterly visitation, the preacher who met the class for tickets in which he was a member left Mr. O'Brien no ticket, because he was not present to give account of himself. Consulting with his friends on this matter, they promised him subscriptions, and some gave money freely to keep him in the work. The preacher having been rewarded for countenancing his irregular labors, he saw there was no hope left of being called into the ministry of Methodism; so he continued his journeys, content with hard work, hard fare, and sometimes no pay, excepting the testimony of a good conscience and the prayers of the people. At the Conference, in August, Rev. George Banwell was placed in charge of the Stratton Circuit, and, refusing to co-operate with or to recognize Mr. O'Brien unless he gave up his independent action, the appeals of his many converts in destitute places determined his future action to look after the poor sheep in the wilderness, and he at once drew up a plan for the regular visitation of seventeen places in Cornwall and Devon, the first of which was Cooksbury, and the seventh Lake and Sheebear. At Lake, where was the home of Mr. Thorne, many people gathered an hour before the time of service, so that the house was crowded, and a present salvation was earnestly preached by Mr. O'Brien. At its close he explained the nature of the class-meeting, and asked any who wished to belong to such a company of believers to remain. On that evening, Monday, Oct. 9, 1815, the first society was formed; twenty-two gave their names, among whom were Mr. and Mrs. Thorne, and their sons John, James, and Samuel. Mr. O'Brien and Rev. G. Banwell were present, but they were slow to consider themselves a separate organization. At their second meeting, the clergyman of the parish was present and encouraged them.

When the Wesleyan preacher, George Banwell, next visited Week St. Mary, and heard what action the people had taken at their meeting, he inquired the names of those members who had attended Mr. O'Brien's preaching, and, finding that all the members of the Week St. Mary society had done so, he tore up the class-paper, and left the meeting without the usual concluding prayer. The indiscretion thus shown determined all the members to unite with Mr. O'Brien, whose labors were incessant, Mr. O'Brien maintaining himself by the proceeds of a small business. Applications for the services of this earnest missionary multiplied so rapidly, in answer to his prayers, that, at the end of the year 1815, James Thorne, aged twenty, a young convert, began to preach in his father's house, and soon afterwards assisted in filling the circuits of two twenty parish ministers, in which the monthly meeting of the new society was held at Holsworthy, Jan. 3, 1816, in Mr. O'Brien's house, where two stewards were appointed, and the members in society were reported at 257. At the close of the meeting a sermon was preached, followed by a love-feast, which was a time of counting places in the sum of the society, but also did persecution; and among those converted were some women, who were constrained to publicly relate their Christian experience, and several of them shortly afterwards began to preach. The families which were first to encourage the new movement were those of Thomas Rattenbury, Red, Courtenay, and Cotle. The first local preachers' meeting was held in February, 1816; and on March 15 James Thorne commenced his itinerant work, without any certain prospect of support, but trusting in God and the people. At the second quarterly meeting, held in April, the number of members had risen to 412, and by July they were 496; preaching having been introduced into ten new parishes, with new converts, and a new society in each. The preachers were men of faith and prayer. After one of Mr. Thorne's sermons at Lake, Sheebear, twelve persons prayed without the congregations rising from their seats; and during this year, the society being reported 557 members in the society in Devonshire.

The most cheering results followed the labors of the evangelists everywhere. At the fifth quarterly meeting, January, 1817, the members were reported at 929. About that time a love-feast was held, at which the Spirit of God was so abundantly poured out that the meeting became one of incessant prayer; it was continued all night, and about fifty persons found peace. All this good work had been done in barns and private houses. In August, 1817, Mr. John Thorne resided on hundreds of acres of land in Worcestershire; he was the first to take up the subject, and was soon to preach a sermon on the corner-stone. It was finished and opened for divine worship, May 29, 1818. No other chapel then existed for many miles round. By the end of the year 1817, three circuits were formed, in which there were six itinerant preachers, 1522 members in the society.

It was resolved in 1818 to extend the work into Cornwall, and, although various forms of opposition and petty persecutions were tried to hinder the work, the hand of God was in it, and prosperity attended their efforts. During that year twelve godly women were employed as itinerant or local preachers, and much good was done by them, while the men were opening new stations. In July a tract society was formed, and the first Sunday-school for their children commenced at Shebbeare, with 42 children. In September the rules of their society were first published, in which Mr. O'Brien gave an account of his separation from the Wesleyan society.

The first Conference was held at Baddash, Launceton, from Aug. 17 to 26, 1819, Mr. O'Brien presiding, and James Thorne was secretary. Twelve circuits were reported, with twenty-seven preachers, thirteen males and fourteen females. The chief business done was to justify the expense of the female preachers. In February, 1820, a mission was commenced in Kent; great discouragement at first disheartened the preachers, but in six months they counted 140 members in the Chatham society. The second Conference was held in August, 1820, when the payments for the preachers were fixed at 15s. a circuit, and adults 2s. 6d. per annum each; women preachers 2s. 6d. per annum, with house-rent, coal, and candles found.

At the Conference of 1821, there were eighteen circuits and forty-five preachers reported, including eighteen female preachers, one of whom was stationed in nearly every circuit. The Preachers' Annuity Society was established by six members subscribing £1 each. In five years the fund had scarcely reached £54, and in forty years it had only reached £3853. A missionary society was also established at that Conference. During the year, a society was formed in the Scilly Isles by Mary Ann Werrey, and in less than five years 141 members were united in Church fellowship.

In January, 1822, a monthly magazine was commenced, which has now reached its sixtieth annual volume, and in the interesting pages of which the history of the Connection is carefully written. Mr. O'Brien was the recognized editor, and James Thorne the assistant editor. Mr. Thorne led the impression of his ever-acquisitive mind on the pages of that work for half a century—not always as its editor, but as its patron and best friend. The Conference of 1822 was held at Stoke Damerel. Three new circuits were reported, and the Conference published in the Minutes their first Address to the Primitive Methodists, which was marked by good, plain, practical counsel and encouragement. The members in society were 4918. The death of Margaret Adams, a female preacher, was reported as the first which had taken place.

During the year 1823, Mr. O'Brien and James Thorne had a restoring commission to visit all the societies and encourage them and their various agencies. At the Conference, twenty-seven circuits were reported, and these were, for the first time, divided into six districts. Samuel Thorne was appointed first book-steward, Stoke Damerel being the book-depot. A mission to the metropolis to the autumn of 1822, and in 1828 preaching-places had been secured in the north, south, east, and west of London; but the preachers' salaries had reached only £8, the expenses being £30 for the quarter and the receipts £17—a discouragement truly; but they persevered, and succeeded in securing a permanent position in the capital of England. James Thorne was sent to London with three assistants in 1824, during which year annual district-meetings were first held. In January, 1824, a society was opened at Hyde Park; and the body to London, was sent to the Horsemonger-lane prison for preaching in the street. He refused to pay a fine; that imprisonment was greatly for the furtherance of the Gospel. Members in 1823 were 5050. In 1824, two of the preachers, not content with such small means, joined the Society of Friends, for which they had a preference; but the work advanced, and 6200 members were reported at the sixth Conference. The smallness of the income reported to the next Conference led to a reduction of ten shillings per quarter on the wife's salary. At the same time (1825), a chapel fund was established, and a form of chapel deed was read which secured the property to the Connection. The members reported that year were 6369. Lay-representatives were first admitted to the Conference in 1825; they have continued ever since to be an integral part of the Conference.

In the Minutes of 1826, the first official return of members is made, the number being 6433, with eighty-three preachers. The Chapel Fund was £65, all spent as soon as received. During the next year, although the members increased to 8054, the finances were so small that supernumerary preachers who married were thereby disqualified to be claimants for support. Still the work advanced, and the trials were in vain.

During nine years, Mr. O'Brien had been at the head of the movement. The official record of their yearly proceedings had been entitled Minutes of the Annual Conference between William O'Brien and the Preachers in connection with him. The tenth Conference, held at Lake SHEBEBEAR, changed all that, and their proceedings were entitled Minutes of the Tenth Annual Conference of the Ministers and Representatives of the People denominated Bible Christians, formerly termed Arminian Bible Christians. The word "Arminian" was discontinued. The Conference ordered that house-rent for the preachers should be £50 a year in towns, £4 in the country. William Mason was the first elected president.

At the previous Conference, much dissatisfaction was expressed at the authority claimed by Mr. O'Brien, and a series of six hastily drawn resolutions was passed intended to limit that authority and to place Mr. O'Brien under the discipline of the ministers of the Church. This painful agitation was the consequence, which was continued through the year, Mr. O'Brien increasing it by issuing a pamphlet in defence of what he considered his rights. Disaffection brought loss; a decrease of 209 had to be reported. This was further increased by the loss of 190 in 1828. At the Conference held that year, Mr. O'Brien tried to dissolve it by declaring, "I will do no more business with you; I adjourn this Conference to Liskeard next Monday." The preachers present prayerfully considered the matter, and refused to adjourn, continuing the business under the presidency of Andrew Cory. Mr. O'Brien severed his connection with Mr. Cory, and took more than a thousand members with him.

Relieved from what had been a burden to many, the disruption turned out to be for the furtherance of the Gospel. Only one station was given up, and the members joined the Primitive Methodists, and not more than two hundred adhered to Mr. O'Brien. At the following Conference, many who had left through excitement asked to be taken back, and they were heartily welcomed. All the funds were in debt, and to remove this burden the preachers agreed to a further reduction of their very small salaries; and this voluntary self-denial was again repeated next year, so that the preachers, who were not wealthy, might not be hindered in their desire to unite with them by being taxed financially. Revivals set in, new chapels were built and opened, the preachers were united, and a new departure was made.
BIBLE CHRISTIANS

by commencing to hold public missionary meetings in the circuits, conducted chiefly by the energetic and devoted James Thorne; and, to make the missionary work more popular, they engaged in a work for the education of the young called "The Bible Christian Schools." 1834. Mr. O'Donnell, M.R.I.A., a clergyman who had resigned his position in the Established Church, became the first head-master, and with only eight pupils the good work was favorably inaugurated. He lived but one year to carry on the work, dying of paralysis in 1842. He has been continued ever since, and during the forty years of its existence it has been a great blessing to hundreds of boys. After a while it enlarged its sphere of operation, and became also a school of the prophets, opening its doors for the reception of young men intended for the itinerant ministry, who here received much valuable information as a preparation for their life-work. Some of the more outstanding declines of boys, just as the demand for ministers was pressing or otherwise. For over twenty years it was superintended by the venerable James Thorne. The Rev. Robert Blackmore, president of the Conference in 1869, was next appointed governor of the institution, and at his death the Rev. John Gammon was elected. In 1850 and 1876, was chosen governor, which office he still holds. In 1880 there were nearly one hundred boys in the College, which name was given to the institution in 1876 by resolution of Conference. In addition to the high intellectual and scientific attainments of some of the pupils, it is gratifying to record that not a few had been converted to Christ and were engaged in the work of the gospel in the distant parts of the country. The debt on the premises in 1880 was £4900.

Among the aids introduced at the period when thirty years of experience had been passed, we find at the Conference of 1843 and 1844 that a committee to guard the privileges of the Connection was appointed, Sunday-schools were promoted and encouraged, the management of chapels and Connectional property was fully considered, mission-work in the destitute localities was extended, and a benefit society for the insurance of chapels was instituted. All these were contributory to the consolidation of the societies, which in the aggregate, in 1844, showed the following totals—namely, 50 circuits and mission stations, 107 itinerant preachers and 8 female preachers, 362 chapels, 1102 local preachers, 12,000 Sunday scholars, 3063 teachers, and 13,793 members in society. Although the period was near the middle of the 19th century, yet their progress was not equal to their expectations; but considering their varied trials and hindrances, with the small finances at their disposal, these results were of an encouraging and hopeful character, and the membership was considerably greater than was that of the New Connection at the end of thirty years, although it was not half that of Mr. Way's society at the end of thirty years.

The year 1850 was a memorable one for the impulse then given to the foreign missionary cause. The society was then £400 in debt; but the work of revival had increased the membership, and it was resolved to send the two brethren, James Way and James Rowe, to South Australia, in compliance with the urgent requests of members of the society who had emigrated to that country. Both those ministers were present at the Conference missionary anniversary, and the meeting was one of deep interest and profit to many. They sailed Aug. 12, and arrived in Australia Nov. 14, 1850. Then commenced a work in that distant locality which has been crowned with the abundant blessing of God, and has extended its operations to Adelaide, Victoria, and New Zealand. In 1840, as the result of thirty years' labors, there were reported as belonging to their Australian Conference 47 circuits, 58 preachers, 256 local preachers, 180 chapels, 83 preaching rooms, 1828 members, 600 Sunday-school scholars, 380 teachers, and 3302 children. The family of Mr. Way has been a most welcome addition to the colony, and his son has, for some years, been the lord chief-justice at Adelaide, and in other ways has been a large benefactor to that city and district. In 1876 their societies in Australia were made into a far as means would allow, of making it a school for educating the sons of their preachers. The school was opened on Lady-day, in 1841. The Rev. John Glass to Canada and Francis Mereath to Prince Edward Island—although the debt against the Missionary Society was £66; but they had faith in God, so America has since had a place on their Missions. Emigration to that country had, even at that early period, caused losses to the home societies which were felt to be such. Both the mission stations flourished, and most encouraging reports of their prosperity were sent home soon after they were established.

Seeing how feebly he was supported after the disruption in 1829, Mr. O'Bryan witnessed his few adherents grow less and less, and remained alone. In 1832, he had only about six hundred followers, while the Conference had 8000. At the Conference of 1835, the seceders sought reunion with their brethren, and Mr. O'Bryan came back with them, but in no official capacity. The Conference undertook Mr. O'Bryan's obligations of a financial character as a trustee of chapels and as the founder of the Book-room. They gave him £65, and promised him an annuity of £20 a year for life. He lived more than thirty years afterwards. At the Conference of 1836, when the reunion formally took place, an increase of over 2000 members was reported, in addition to 545 old members returned. The total of members then reported was 10,195. As an illustration of the rapidity of its growth, the disruption, the membership in 1827 was greater than it was in 1855, so that the labors of all their agencies for eight years were not sufficient to balance the losses sustained by the indiscretion of the separation. In addition to this, chapel debts to about £300 had to be met by taking Mr. O'Bryan's securities, and the preachers generously taxed themselves to the uttermost to meet the emergency. And it was met. It was followed by a committee of inquiry as to the best way to raise the salaries of the itinerant preachers. At the Conference of 1837, the new scale was received and adopted. Its provisions were—single men, £10 a year; ministers in full connection, £12 12s.; after travelling twelve years, to be £14; female preachers, £7 a year; a married preacher and his wife, £30 a year. For their children, this rate of payment was adopted: first child, until sixteen years old, £6 per annum; second child, £5 10s.; third child, £4; fourth, £3 10s.; but no allowance to be continued after the age of sixteen. House-rent was to be allowed, £6 a year in towns, £4 in the country. At death, for a preacher's funeral, £4 was allowed, £2 for a child's funeral. It was then resolved not to have their chapels licensed for marriages, but since that time preachers have been allowed to marry. Having recovered lost ground, removed many obstructions, and being assured of the blessing of God, every effort was made to consolidate and extend the work. In 1858, the Conference took the temperance question in hand, and gave it every encouragement. New chapels were rising in various localities, although small; but the poverty of the people caused most of them to be heavily burdened with debt, and that, in after-years, became a serious responsibility and hindrance to the work; still there was a strong undercurrent of faith in God and reliance on his aid to deliver. The subject of holiness was made a prominent feature in the pulpit, and a higher state of Christian experience was urged upon the people. Prosperity was reported on both the home and foreign mission stations, and, although opposition, intolerance, and bigotry in turn were doing all they could to hinder the work of God, it continued to grow.

The importance of education was recognized in 1840, and steps were taken to provide for the wants of the Connection in that department. At a meeting held at Shebbear, Devon, Jan. 20, 1841, it was resolved to establish at that place a Connectional school for the education of the boys of the more affluent members, and, as separate Conference, although not with quite independent action. The English Conference reserved to itself certain specified rights, which will no doubt have to be relinquished as the society advances.
The determination of 1858 had to consider their mission-work under a different aspect. Two of their stations in America, in Ohio and Wisconsin, had been struggling with heavy discouragements, and the illness of one of the missionaries had obliged him to remove to Canada. Had it not been for two brethren—John Chapple and James Hume—who volunteered to undertake those stations, they would have been discontinued. They have not prospered as it was hoped and expected they would. The Wisconsin district is but feeble after more than thirty years' work.
Up to the year 1852, all the Conferences of the Bible Christians had been held in Devonshire or Cornwall. This year's Conference was held at Southsea, Hampshire, the Conference of 1856 at Newport, Isle of Wight, and that of 1859 in London, the capital of England. Two conferences have since been held in the city of Bristol. These four are the only places out of Devon and Cornwall where the societies are large enough to accommodate the Conference.
In 1855, the Canadian and American societies were made into a separate Conference—the English Conference to either send or select the president once in two years; delegates to be exchanged from time to time, the expense to be borne by the senders; missionaries to have their salaries increased or be recalled in seven years; the Preachers' Fund to be common to both Conferences; the cost of sending out missionaries to be arranged mutually in England and Canada; the Canadian Conference to have entire control over local affairs, selecting their young ministers, and disposing of their own funds; the Prince Edward Island members to be part of the Canadian Conference.
The temperance question was early welcomed by the Bible Christians. James Thorne became a pledged teetotaler in 1837, and from that time was the acknowledged leader in the denomination on that and similar social and moral questions. The cause has been sheltered in all its chapels, and has been a blessing to the societies, and especially to the young. As a small acknowledgment of those services, the Bristol Temperance Society presented a handsome sacramental service to the new chapel of the Bible Christians.
Although the mission in London was commenced as early as 1824, the membership was not large enough to justify them in inviting the Conference till the year 1859, when they met in Waterloo-road Chapel. Their London friends generously met the entire expense. The Rev. John Gammon was president. The Rev. William Cooke, D.D., of the New Connection, paid a welcome fraternal visit to the Conference, the first of the kind. The Conference representatives, preachers, and laymen were under 120.
At the Conference of 1860, held in the city of Exeter, the first subscription was taken towards the Jubilee Fund, which amounted to £900. An appeal was made to the societies throughout the denomination to contribute to that fund.
In 1861, the Preachers' Annuity Society, established in 1821, was found to be quite inadequate to the purpose designed—namely, to provide a maintenance to worn-out preachers. It was resolved, in 1861, to establish an Auxiliary and Benevolent Fund, to increase the annuities to superannuated preachers, to make grants to preachers in case of heavy affliction, to assist itinerants unable to do full work, to help to furnish houses for new supernumeraries, and to aid widows and orphans of preachers. This fund was to be raised by subscriptions from the friends, and by a collection yearly in August, in all circuits. At the same Conference an increase was made to the salaries of the preachers. Single preachers on trial were allowed £14 per annum; those in full connection, £16; married preachers, £36; those who have served four years in full connection, £42. These sums were exclusive of allowance for furniture, rent, board, etc., as given by circuits.
The year 1862 was marked by a large increase of members. 355 new members were added to the total membership. The year following was one which produced twenty-five young men for the ministry, a larger number than had ever before been realized. The increase of members in 1863 was only 614. A new district was made in Wales, with Newport as its centre and head. The Conference of 1863 was memorable for a fraternal letter sent to it by the Conference of the Methodist New Connection—the first of the kind—hoping that on special occasions they might unite more cordially in promoting the world's salvation, and looking towards a union of the several sections of liberal Methodism. The Rev. William Cooke, D.D., was the leading New Connexion minister promoting union; the Rev. William Cocker, a man far inferior in position and acquirements, took the lead in opposing union. Dr. Cooke secured many hearty friends by the course which he so generously adopted. The Bible Christians cordially responded to the fraternal letter, and secured a true friend in Dr. Cooke.
In 1864, Prince Edward Island district was united to Canada for the more economical and efficient working of both. A good work had been carried on in the former place during several years. In the early part of that work, in 1860, a remarkably wicked man, aged about thirty, a native of that island, died under much anxiety to the ministers on the island. The ministers visited and prayed with him, and many prayers had been offered on his behalf. At length, amid sobs and tears, the aged man cried out, "Lord, have mercy upon my poor soul." Prayers for him increased. The next day he attended the service, and the love-feast which followed, when the old man wept, and cried aloud, "I'm happy in my heart and soul! my sins be gone! my trouble be gone!" So God in his mercy converted the centenarian sinner, and the work prospered. The membership at the Union was as follows: Prince Edward Island, 630; Canada, 4222; total, 4852. By this union a yearly grant from the Missionary Society was saved.
The prosperity of the society in Australia had been of the most gratifying character. The veteran missionary, James Way, who as a fatherless youth had been brought up at the hands of the Rev. Ann Arthur Guest thirty-seven years before in Devonshire, was in 1860-64, travelling and laboring most successfully in Australia. When the Rev. Thomas Binney was in that country in 1860, he preached one of the opening sermons in one of their best chapels, and when he returned to England he wrote this testimony: "The Bible Christians are active and useful, penetrating and missionary in their character." The success of that mission was mainly due to the liberality of Mr. William Hicks, of Lostwithiel, who did not belong to the Bible Christians, but who, to start their cause in Australia, in 1850, gave them £100 towards sending out the first two missionaries, and he generously gave them the same amount yearly for twelve years to give the mission a fair start. He continued his financial aid longer than he promised. The efforts made to extend the mission in Australia led to considerable expenditure in excess of income. Appeals were made for increased subscriptions, and for loans without interest, but the societies were unable to respond thereto.
The celebration of the Jubilee of the denomination was observed by meetings in nearly all the societies. Great self-denial was exercised to raise a fund adequate to the occasion. The objects to be served by the Jubilee Fund were the erection of pulpits and shelters to hold one thousand people, to have a book-room and mission-rooms connected therewith, to remove debts on chapels and on the institution at Shebbear, to reduce the missionary debt, and to increase the annuities of XI.-18°
the aged and worn-out preachers. Several years were given for contributions to be made to the fund. When the distribution took place in 1867, it was found that the total sum collected was £3800. For such an occasion, the sum was small indeed, but it indicated the limited extent and resources of the members identified with the society. The appropriations of the fund were as follows: London chapel, £360; Preachers' Fund, £260; Ordinary Wesleyan Chapel at New London, £200; Sheffield, £150; preachers' salaries, £104. The total amount was in excess of the receipts, but the latter were afterwards increased by £200.

The year 1869 was memorable for the opening of the Jubilee Chapel, East Road, City Road, London, with rooms attached to be used for the Book-room and the Missionary Society. The venerable James Thorne was thanked by the Conference for nearly forty years' service as editor and book-steward, having, during that long period, conducted the printing and distribution of the Connectional literature at Sheffield and Plymouth. A new room was commenced when the Book-room was opened in London. The Rev. Frederick William Bourne was appointed as new editor and book-steward, with a permanent residence in the metropolis. Ten years later, in 1879, the new editor established his headquarters and conducted his operations at No. 9, Whitefriars Row. A small testimonial fund was collected for Mr. Thorne, but he died before it could be of any service to him.

The Australian Conference of 1875 having expressed a strong desire for an annual conference to be held in that colony, the English Conference gave consent for such meeting to be held, on learning that no legal difficulty existed, and that the first was convened in the summer of 1877. The conditions were to be as follows. It was to be constituted like the English Conference, excepting that they might have every year, instead of once in five years, an equal number of ministers and laymen. The ministers in the colony sent from England have the right to return to the conference on their years absence; the English Conference to have the right to recall such ministers. The funds of the Annuity Society are available in both countries. Delegates may be exchanged. A General Conference may be held for the purpose of exchanging ministers between the Australian provinces. The English Conference has the right to appoint the president in Australia once in five years; to receive a copy of their minutes; and to disallow any act of the Australian Conference within one year, all such acts to be valid till disallowed.

The regulation in the Poll Deed which requires that the representatives at conference be an equal number of laymen and ministers only once in five years not having given satisfaction in many districts, the Conference of 1877 resolved that the number of representatives may be equal every year, but that official business and constitutional questions should be decided by the legal Conference only, until the Poll Deed can be altered so as to admit of equal representation annually.

A proposal was considered in the English Conference of 1880 for the Bible Christians in Australia to unite with the other Wesleyan bodies in that country. It was resolved to defer action until after the Conference of 1881, when it was proposed to send a deputation from England to Australia to consider the question fully. The Rev. F. W. Bourne was nominated as the deputation to the Canadian, American, Australian, and New Zealand conferences, as editor and general treasurer during his absence being undertaken by the Connectional, missionary, and book committees respectively.

II. Statistics.—The following figures represent the state of the denomination at the tenth conference, in 1868: Itinerant preachers, 253; local preachers, 174; chapels, 784; preaching places, 267; members, 27,407; Sunday-school scholars, 8718; Sunday scholars, 42,488.

At the Conference of 1880 the total number of members was 33,540. The statistics of the denomination were as follows: Itinerant preachers, 307; local preachers, 1882; chapels, 937; preaching places, 192; members, 30,842; Sunday-school teachers, 9680; Sunday scholars, 53,450. (G. J. S.)

III. Doctrines, Usages, Institutions, etc.—The doctrines of the Bible Christians are the same as those of all other branches of the Methodist Church, and their interpretation of the Scriptures agrees with the principles adopted by the Wesleys.

In its Church government each society is governed by its own elder's meeting, consisting of the minister, the three leading laymen, and all approved local preachers belonging to that society. The elders' meeting manages all the financial affairs of the society according to the rules of the Connection, and receives or dismisses members of the Church. A meeting of the itinerant and local preachers is held quarterly. Each circuit has a quarterly meeting of all the official persons belonging to the societies within the circuit. For the convenient working of the denomination the circuits are mostly grouped, so as to form districts, and the ministers, together with an equal number of laymen, hold an annual meeting preparatory to the conference. The annual conference is composed of an equal number of ministers and laymen appointed by the district meetings.

In 1821 the first missionary society of the Bible Christians was formed. In that year its evangelistic efforts extended to Canada West and to Prince Edward Island. In 1850 two missionaries were sent to Australia. In 1853 missions were opened in Victoria, in 1866 in Queensland, in 1877 in New Zealand, and in 1885 in China. On the mission stations at home and abroad nearly two hundred agents are regularly employed; these are assisted by about one thousand local preachers, and they preach in nearly seven hundred chapels and preaching places. The annual income of the society amounts to £32,400.

Among the institutions of the Bible Christians is the Sunday-scholar department, book department, temperance, Chapel Fund, Preachers' Annuity Society, and educational work.

The private cloister of the Church of Santa Croce contains several pictures by him in fresco, representing the legends of St. Francis. Lanzi says his best frescoes are in the Church of Santa Maria Nuova, built by Martha X. He died in 1460. See Spener, Biographical History of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefler, Nouvelle Biographie Générale, s. v.

Biceps (or Bifrons)

A name of Janus in Virgil and Ovid, where he is described with two faces, because so great was his sagacity that he saw both the past and the future; or else because Janus was thought to represent the world, viewing with his two faces the past and the future.

An English Congregational minister, was born in London, Oct. 2, 1775. He received his collegiate training at Trenveccia and Cheshunt colleges. After completing his course, Mr. Bickerdike preached as supply to various chapels in the country under the direction of the college trustees. He preached at Devon one year, a short time at Durham, and thirty years at Woolwich. In his seventy-fifth year he retired from public life, and spent the remainder of his days at Cheltenham. On the formation of the West Virginia Conference he became a member of it, and in it labored until the breaking-out of the civil war, when he returned to Kentucky, and re-entered the Kentucky Conference. In 1871, because of ill-health, he became superannuated, which relation he sustained until his death Feb. 22, 1875. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1875, p. 223.

principles of his denomination. He died of pneumonia, near Bankstown, March 21, 1880. See Minutes of Illinois Anniversaries, 1880, p. 10. (J. C. S.)

Bickernell, Edward, an African Wesleyan minister, was born in the Egba country, and was taken captive in a slave-hunting expedition; was sold to the Portuguese, who retired him by a British cruiser, and brought to Sierra Leone, where he was converted and became a member of the Methodist Church. He was afterwards employed as a schoolmaster, and in 1854 was elevated to the ministry and became a powerful and eloquent preacher in his native tongue. Many pagans were won to Christ by his labors. Uniting with the Philadelphia Annual Conference in 1870, he served successfully six charges within its bounds. He died with unshaken confidence in God, at Tobyhanna, Pa., Jan. 19, 1891. He was a faithful pastor. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1891, p. 73.

With his wife and two children he arrived at Marash in October, 1874. He had been but three years in the field, showing rich promise of future usefulness, when he was attacked with malignant small-pox, which ended his life at Marash, Oct. 17, 1877. See Gen. Cat. Bicknor, Alexander de, an Irish prelate, was elected archbishop of Dublin in 1134, and took a journey to Lyons with the king's letters, Jan. 29, 1141, recommending the prelate. He was consecrated at Avignon, July 22, 1137, by Nicholas de Prato, cardinal of Ostium. In the first year of his appointment king Edward granted to him the liberty of acquiring lands, tenements, advowsons, etc., in Ireland to the value of £200 yearly, except such as were held in the fee of the crown, to hold them as his father in law had done. He did not visit his see until Oct. 9, 1138, when he arrived as archbishop of Dublin and lord justice of Ireland. He was received by the clergy and people with great joy. In 1138 he was twice summoned to a parliament at Lincoln. In 1139 he founded a university in St. Patrick's Church, Dublin. In 1139 he constituted the Church of Inchinmone a prebend in St. Patrick's Cathedral. In 1139 he was sent as ambassador to France by the Parliament of England. In 1139 he received royal orders to repair his fortifications at Castle Kevin, and was required to appear before the king's council in England to report the state of affairs in Ireland. In 1144, having obtained a grant of the manor of Coolmine, in the parish of Saggard, from Geoffrey de Lacy, subject to render a tenth to the chief lord, he settled it for the maintenance of certain chantries in the Cathedral of St. Patrick, adding for the same endowment several houses and gardens near the palace of St. Sepulchre, and in the parish of St. Kevin. De Bicknor died July 14, 1149. See D'Alton, Memoirs of the Archbishops of Dublin, p. 125.

Bicorniger (the double-horned), in pagan mythology, is the Latin translation of the Greek word deinos, which is given to Bacoosus when he appears horned.

Biddellians, the followers of John Biddle (q. v.), the father of English Socianism.

BIDDLE

1828 he became pastor of the Church at Brockham Green, near Dorking, Surrey, where he passed the remainder of his life. He died Feb. 8, 1858. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1858, p. 47. (J. C. S.)

BIDDLE, William, a Baptist minister, was born in Horsham, Sussex, England, June 27, 1824. After preaching for a time without settlement, he was appointed missionary to Asbury by the Board of the Missionary Union in July, 1851, and ordained Aug. 13. A few weeks after his ordination he was taken ill, and died Sept. 17, 1851. "He was a man of devoted piety and great promise." See Amer. Baptist Register, 1852, p. 415. (J. C. S.)

Biddle, William Phillips, a Baptist minister, was born near London Bridge, Princess Anne Co., Va., Jan. 17, 1788. He began to preach in 1808, and took a deep interest in all matters pertaining to the growth and prosperity of his denomination in North Carolina, where he took up his residence in 1810. Being a man of large wealth, he gave his services gratuitously to the churches to which he ministered, chiefly in the eastern part of his State, and South Carolina. He died at Newbern, N. C., Aug. 8, 1853, "He was eminent for a devout spirit, a godly walk, and a large measure of usefulness in his day." See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vi, 559; Cathcart, Baptist Encyclopedia, p. 99. (J. C. S.) popular, able, eloquent, and useful. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1873, p. 58.

Biedwell, Ira M., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Kingston, New York, in 1823. He united with the Church in 1830; was licensed in 1833; admitted to the New England Conference June 22, 1834; ordained deacon in 1836, and elder in 1838. Consecrating all his energies to the work of the ministry, he took rank among the leading preachers of his day. He served with success eleven charges. While yet young and full of promise, disease laid its hand upon him, and for ten years he was unable to take an appointment. Receiving an appointment after his protracted disability, on his way home from conference he was the victim of a railroad accident, from which he never recovered. His death was publicized for some time, but from 1841 until the close of his life he was a supernanntated minister. He died of apoplexy at Norwich, Conn., July 28, 1880. His mind was quick and versatile; and, gifted by nature with a commanding form, strong but melodious voice, possessing a thorough knowledge of human nature, he had wonderful power over an audience. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1881, p. 89.

Biedwell, Oliver B., a Presbyterian minister, was born in 1827. He was a graduate of Yale College and of the New Haven Seminary. His first charge was Hubbardstown. He was ten years engaged in executing sectional maps of all the missions of the American Board, and devoted considerable time in aiding the circulation of the National Preacher. He served a number of churches, both in this country and in the West Indies. His last pastoral work was in connection with the Presbyterian Church, Jersey City Heights, where his labors were attended with marked success. He died there Aug. 5, 1881. See (N. Y.) Observer, Aug. 11, 1881. (W. P. S.)

Biedwell, Walter H., D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Farmington, Conn., June 21, 1790. He graduated at Yale College and subsequently at the Yale Theological Seminary. He was licensed to preach in 1813, and subsequently ordained. In 1841 he began to publish the National Preacher, which he conducted nineteen years. In 1843 he became the proprietor of the N. Y. Evangelist, to which he devoted twelve years of labor. He was in connection with Dr. George B. Cheever. In 1846 he became proprietor and conductor of the American Biblical Repository, and at the same time editor of the Eclectic Magazine. In 1849 he went abroad for the purpose of recruiting his health, his travels extending through England, France, Switzerland, and Italy. In 1852 he again visited Europe, went to Holland, visited the Rhine, Spain, and other places. After 1853 he was constantly engaged in editorial labors. In 1860 he became proprietor of the American Theological Review, which was united with the Presbyterian Quarterly Review. His health again declining, he took another trip abroad, visiting England, France, Germany, Northern Europe, including Russia, and returned through Finland, Sweden, and Denmark. In 1867 he was appointed a commissioner of the United States to Western Asia, during which, in the discharge of his duties, he visited Italy, Egypt, Palestine, Greece, and France. From 1869 to 1880 he resided alternately in London and New York, continuing to discharge his numerous editorial duties. In connection with his younger brother, Oliver B., he published seven large maps of different parts of the missionary field. He died, after a short illness, at Saratoga, N. Y., Sept. 11, 1881. See (N. Y.) Evangelist, Sept. 22, 1881. (D. P. S.)

Ble, Adrien de, a Flemish painter, was born at Lierre, near Antwerp, in 1594; he studied under Wouter, an obscure artist. When eighteen years of age he visited Paris, and studied under his countryman, Rodolph Schoof, painter to Louis XIII. He afterwards visited Rome, where he remained eight years. In 1625 he returned to Flanders, and was much employed for the churches and in painting portraits. His best work was a picture of St. Elgy, in the Collegiate Church of St. Germain, at Bourges, and another of the same subject, Bouic, in the Church of the Fine Arts, n. v.; Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Biele, Rudolph, a Protestant theologian of Germany, who died at the age of seventy-three, June 5, 1881, at Erfurt, as member of consistory, is the author of Spruchbuch zu M. Luthers Gemeinheit Kutscheim, etc. (Berlin, 1857, 8vo ed.). See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 146. (B. P.)

Biederstedt, Dietrich Hermann, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Stralsund, Nov. 1, 1762, and died March 10, 1824, at Greifswald, as member of consistory and archdeacon of St. Nicolaus. He wrote, Beiträge zur Geschichte der Kirchen und Prediger in Neuworpennern, etc. (Griewand, 1818): — Sammlung aller kirchlichen Verordnungen in der Herzogthum Neuworpennern, etc. (Stralsund, 1816): — Geist des pommerschen Predigterseens, etc. (ibid. 1821): — Predigten über einige Gegenstände der christl. Religion und Sittenlehre (Berlin, 1792). See Winer, Handbuch der Theol. Lit., i, 807; ii, 14, 88, 125, 128, 165, 173, 189; Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 146. (B. P.)

Biel, in German mythology, was an idol of the old Saxons and Thuringians, worshipped especially on the Biel's-height near the convent of Ifeld, and honored by an altar. He is said to have been a protector of the woods and a fruitspool of fruitfulness. It seems that his worship was carried far over the northern provinces. The above-named Biel's-height is said to be a cliff from which Bonifacius preached the Gospel after hurling Biel from his altar. But Bonifacius had hardly gone, when the people again erected their idol. Even now ruins of an altar and of a priestly residence in Harz, near Blankenburg, may be found. The inhabitants relate many wonderful things about the idol, and show the place where it stood. As everywhere in Northern Europe, so also were bloody sacrifices brought to this god, and the idol was sprinkled with the blood of the victim.

Biel, Johann Christian, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Braunschweig in 1867. He studied at Leipsic, Rostock, and Helmstedt, was in 1719 appointed adjunctus ministerii, and in 1723 pastor of St. Ulrich and St. John in his native place, where he died, Oct. 18, 1745. French ecclesiastic, who died Feb. 9, 1806, at Metz, of which he became bishop in 1802, successfully cultivated the study of ecclesiastical history, on which his name is associated with several works. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.

Bienna, in Egyptian mythology, was the name of the deity of the soil, adorned under the form of a kneeling ram.

Bierling, Conrad Friedrich Ernst, a Luther-ian theologian of Germany, was born Sept. 15, 1709, at Rinteln, where he was educated and raised, as well as theological studies. In 1729 he was made doctor of philosophy, and in 1731 appointed professor of logic and metaphysics. He was appointed professor of theology in 1745, and in 1751 was made doctor of divinity. He died Jan. 14, 1755. He published, Dissertatio de Liberale A. Selm Huius, (Rinteln, 1739); Sylla, sq. Moser u. Neuhauser, Jettelebende Theol. a. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Genehren-Lezikon, a. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v. (B. P.)

Bierling, Friedrich Wilhelm, a Lutheran theologian of the same country, was born March 19, 1652, in Magde-burg, and studied at Leipsic, where he also lectured for a number of years. In 1712 he was called to the pastorate at Rinteln, and was in 1714 superintendent and member of consistory; in 1716 was made professor of theology, and in 1720 doctor of divinity. He died July 25, 1724. He wrote, Epistola ad 2 Tom. in de Officii Evangelistica: Dissertatio de Origeni Moti; Observationum in Genesis Specimina VI., etc. See Dölle, Life of Bierling (Hanover, 1749); Jöcher, Allgemeines Genehren-Lezikon, a. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biet, Antoine, a French missionary, was born in the diocese of Senlis about 1620. He embarked for Cayenne in 1652, with six hundred colonists, sent out by a company who had obtained the government thecession of that island. The enterprise did not suc-cceed; most of the colonists perished from famine and sickness, and Biet devoted himself to the alleviation of their sufferings with his own devotions. On his return to France he published the Voyage de la France Equioxiale, or, L'Ile de Cayenne, entrepris par les Francois en 1652 (Paris, 1664). This work is terminated by a Dictionnaire de la Langue Guatbi. His work concerning the West Indians is not considered trustworthy, as his account was very brief; this work had been written by P. Dutertre. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.

Bifinnde (the movable), in Norse mythology, was one of the twelve surnames of Alfdafar.

Biformis, in Pagan mythology, is the Latin transliteration of the Greek word διμοφρος (two-formed). It was the surname of various mythical beings, as, for instance, of Minotaurus, the Centaurs, Janus; also of Bacchus, because he was represented sometimes as a youth, sometimes as an aged man.

Birions. See Beers.

Bifrost (or Bifraust), in Norse mythology, is the bridge which joins heaven and earth, the rainbow. The Asas rise high upon the place of assembly, Utadar's well. Heimdall with his Gjalderborn guards it, so that the Asas are not suddenly attacked. It is very skilfully built of air, water, and fire. The green is the water, blue is the air, and red is the fire. The first two elements would make it strong enough for the Asas; will therefore be upheld, in order that the mountain-giants (Jarg-vieyen) cannot pass over.

Bifur (the trembling), in Norse mythology, is a dwarf made of earth and living on the earth.

Bigamy. Under this head we designate only, according to modern usage, the case of matrimonial union to two persons at the same time; premising that until the beginning of the 17th century, at least, the term was applied to all cases of second marriage, whether during the existence of a prior union or after its dissolution; the word "polygamy" being applied to the former case; the distinction being made entirely to turn on the simultaneous or successive nature of the marriage relations. See Bigamy.

The first Church legislation we find on the subject is of doubtful genuineness—viz., those canons attributed to the Council of Nicaea I. (A.D. 325) as to be be found in the Arabic version. The 24th of these declares that "none ought to marry two wives at once, nor to bring in to his wife another woman for pleasure and fleshly desire." If a priest, such person was for-bidden to officiate, and was excluded from communion until such time as he cast out the assembly by which he ought to retain the first; and so of a layman. Two other canons are to the same effect. The 5th chapter of the 1st book of Sanctions and Decrees says that "no Christian is it lawful to have two or more wives at once, after the manner of the Gentiles, who marry three or four at once; but one is to be married after the other, that is, the contract is to be made with those second after the death of the first." The practice of the West seems to have been generally more strict than in the East, and we have thus to infer the spirit of the Western Church towards bigamy from enactments against concubinage (q. v.). A letter of Leo the Great, A.D. 440-61, addressed to the African bishops of the province of Mauritania Cæsariensis, speaking of an actual case of bigamy in the priesthood of that province, says,
"Neither apostolic nor legal authority allows the husband of a second wife to be raised to the pastoral office, much less this, as it has been related to us, in the husband of two wives at once." And a letter of Leo (dated 458 or 459), to Rusticus, bishop of Narbonne, is probably the first authority for the lower modern view of the concubinage. "Not every woman united to a man is the man's wife, for neither is every son his father's heir. Therefore a wife is one thing, a concubine another; a handmaid is one thing, a freewoman another. Wherefore if a clerk of any place give his daughter in marriage to a man having a concubine, it is not to be taken as if he gave her to a married man; unless haply the woman appear to have been made free, and lawfully jointured and restored to honor by a public marriage. Then if by birth or their father's will they are married men, they are not in fault if the women which such men had were not nor had in marriage. Since a wife is one thing, a concubine another, to cast from one's bed the bondmaid and to receive a wife of ascertainment free birth is not a doubling of marriage, but a progress in honorable conduct.

Towards the same period, however (latter half of the 5th century), a Nestorian Synod held in Persia, under the presidency of Banunas, archbishop of Nisibis, affords probably the first instance of what may be called the modern Protestant interpretation of the Pauline "husband of one wife." A priest, its canons declare, "should be one who has one wife, as it is said in the Apostle's Epistle to Timothy, 'Whoever marries, let him have one wife;' if he transgresses, he is to be separated from the Church and the priestly order. But if a priest not knowing marriage, or whose wife is dead, should wish for lawful marriage, let him be not forbidden to marry, whether he has wished to marry before or after his priesthood." It is clear that the Nestorians in this case interpreted St. Paul as speaking not of successive but of simultaneous marriage. That this was not, however, the view of the Greek Church generally is evident.

A collection of Irish canons, supposed to belong to the close of the 7th century, shows that the Celtic kings of Ireland must, as in Britain in the days of Gildas, had had regular harem. The Synod is represented as enacting (if the term can be used) as follows: "According as is the dignity which the king receives, so great should be his favor; for many women deprave his soul, and his mind, divided by the multitude of his wives, falls greatly into sin."

To the 8th century belongs one of the most curious incidents in the treatment of this question by the Church. In a letter of pope Gregory II (A.D. 714-30) to Boniface, the apostle of Germany, we find the pope treating the case of a wife, through bodily infirmity becomes incapable of fulfilling the conjugal duty. Can the husband in such an event take a second wife? The pope replies, that it is good for him to remain united to her. "But he who cannot contain," (referring evidently to 1 Cor. vii. 9), "let him marry no more, but let him live with his wife as long as she shall live, for from her whom infirmity hinders, but no detestable fault excludes" from his bed—a decision closely akin to that of Luther and the Protestant theologians in the case of the Landgrave of Hesse. Further on the pope condemns bigamy generally:

We find the question of the lawfulness of a second marriage in case of a wife's bodily infirmity recurring in a work not of much later date than pope Gregory's letter to Boniface, archbishop Egbert of York's Dialogue on Church Government. The archbishop is, however, more cautious than the pope. He puts the case only in the shape of a discussion of the marriage tie by agreement of both parties, because of the infirmity of one of them; can the healthy one marry again, the infirm one consenting, and promising continuance? The archbishop implies that he may: "By change of times necessity breaks the law .... in doubtful cases one should be undecided." See CONCERNING

Besides supplying several churches he organized one, the Noix Creek Church. For fifty years he labored in that state, and to him the churches in north-east Missouri are greatly indebted. He died Aug. 1, 1845. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 96. (J. C. S.)

He was appointed successively canon of Bayeux, theologian at that diocese, and dean of the Church of Mons. Being sent to the provincial Council of Rouen in 1581, he drew down upon himself the animadversion of his bishop by sustaining against him the prerogatives of his chapter, and he finally resigned his canonship. He died at Paris about 1590. He wrote, Bibliotheca Veterum Patrum et Antiquarum Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latine (Paris, 1573);—Appendix, sive Tomus Nonus (1579; 2d ed. He is the author of several sermons and poems, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bigot, Émile, a French scholar, was born at Rouen in 1626. His father left him a library of six thousand volumes, among which were more than five hundred MSS. This rich collection he greatly augmented, until it was worth 40,000 francs. He discovered at Florence the Greek text of the Life of St. Chrysostom by Palladius, which he published (Paris, 1680, 4to) with some other unpublished Greek pieces, the whole of which being accompanied by the Latin version of Ambrogio Traversari of Camaldoli. This collection contained the famous letter of St. Chrysostom to Caesarius, so opposed to the modern doctrine of transubstantiation. Peter Allix procured a copy of this work of Bigot, and reprinted it (Lond. 1688). Bigot died at Rouen, Oct. 18, 1689. See Biog. Universelle, s. v.; Landun, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bigotry consists in being obstinately and perversely attached to our own opinions, or, as some have defined it, "a tenacious adherence to a system adopted in opposition to those of others without the leisured spirit towards all who differ." It must be distinguished from love to truth, which influences a man to embrace it wherever he finds it, and from true zeal, which is an ardor of mind exciting its possessor to defend and propagate the principles he maintains. Bigotry is a taste for position combined with a certain degree of malignity. Bigotry is mostly prevalent with those who are ignorant, who have taken up principles without due examination, and who are naturally of a morose and contracted disposition. It is often manifested more in unimportant sentiments or the circumstantialities of religion than in the essentials of it. Simple bigotry is the spirit of persecution without the power; persecution is bigotry armed with power, and carrying its will into act. As bigotry is the effect of ignorance, so it is the nurse of it, because it precludes free inquiry, and is an enemy to truth; it cuts also the very sinews of charity, and destroys moderation and mutual goodwill. If a man considers the different constitution of men's minds, our own ignorance, the liberty that all men have to think for themselves, the admirable example our Lord has set us of a contrary spirit, and the benevolent effects of this disposition, we must at once be convinced of its propriety. How can it be otherwise? To enable men to enjoy the peaceful religion we profess, is a duty towards our neighbors! See Catholicism; Church.

BILTHBERG, JOHANN CHRISTOPH, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, who was born Nov. 5, 1702, at Urach. He studied at Tübingen, which was in 1726 declared a protestant town, and in 1734 pastor there. In 1749 he was called to Urach, where he died, Jan. 2, 1762. He published, "Moses und die Propheten in den Evangelien" (Eaising, 1744, 1751):—Evangelischer Liederschatz oder glosarisse grosses Würtembergisches Gesangbuch (Tübingen, 1803-34, 3 pl., in quarto with Music). BILVERTI, GIOVANNI, a Florentine painter, was born in 1578, and studied under Cigoli, and blended the style of that master with that of Paolo Veronese and Titian. He finished some pictures which Cigoli left unfinished at his death, and executed a number of pictures in the churches of San Gaetano and San Marco. Of these The Elevation of the Cross is considered the masterpiece. He died in 1644. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefel, Nouv. Biog. Générales, s. v.

BILLIART, MARIE ROSE JULIA, the foundress of the Sisters of Notre Dame, was born at Cuvilly, Picardy, France, in 1751. On Feb. 2, 1804, she, with Frances Blin and Catharine Duchateau, made the necessary vows, and promised to devote themselves to the education of orphans and homeless children. Through her strength of character and patient endurance, even through sufferings and hard trials, she labored constantly, and at her death in 1816 saw her order widely established. Archbishop Purcell of Cincinnati introduced the Sisters of Notre Dame into the United States in 1840. On Jan. 1, 1872, the order numbered in this country 20 houses, 13,242 free scholars, 5,017 Sunday scholars, 869 night schools, and 150 missions. In the Spanish colonies of the United States, and Central America, there were at the same date 88 houses, 9,996 day scholars, 45,146 free scholars, 12,671 Sunday scholars, 19,404 night schools, and 564 missions. See Life of Mother Julia (N. Y. 1872); (N. Y.) Cath. Almanac, 1875, p. 93.

BILLET, ALEXIS, a French prelate, was born in 1783.
In 1825 he was made bishop of Maurienne; in 1840, archbishop of Chambery. In 1861 he was appointed cardinal, and died April 30, 1875, being at the time of his death senior of the French clergy and the oldest member of the college of cardinals. He wrote Mémoires pour servir à l’Histoire du Diocèse de Chambery (1865). (B. P.)

He was installed at Greenfield, Mass., March 10, 1754. He died in Philadelphia in 1760. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 10.

Billings, Oliver, a Baptist minister, was born in Maine about the year 1755, and was in early life converted in Fayette, Me. He was ordained as an evangelist in 1800, and was not long after called to the pastorate of the church in Fayette. Of this church he was the acting pastor for more than twenty years, and senior pastor until his death, which occurred July 31, 1842.

He had a son, John, who was one of the early students at Waterville, was licensed in 1825, ordained pastor of the church in Addison in 1825, where he remained seventeen years (1825–42). Subsequently he was pastor of the North Church in Pittsfield for a short time. See Millett, History of the Baptists of Maine, p. 436; Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vi, 392. (J. C. S.)

Billings, Silas, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Somers, Tolland Co., Conn., Aug. 10, 1804. He graduated from Yale College in 1829, when he entered the Princeton Theological Seminary and graduated in 1832. His first field of labor was in Prince George County, Va., near Petersburg, where he remained but a short time and removed to the valley of Virginia, where for nine years he had charge of the churches of Woodstock, Strasburg, and Cedar Creek. He afterwards lived and labored successively at Morgentown, West Va., and also at Brooklyn, N. Y. After leaving this charge he went to West Bloomfield, N. J., and returned to Virginia, where he took charge of the church at Duffields. After 1869 he resided in Winchester, in charge of a seminary for young ladies. He was a great sufferer for many years, but his energetic spirit overcame all obstacles, and for a long time he was a successful pastor and popular preacher. He died in Winchester, Va., Jan. 8, 1881. See (N. Y.) Observer, Jan. 20, 1881. (W. P. S.)

Billings, William, a Congregational minister, was born at Preston, Conn., Feb. 15, 1697. A Fast-day Sermon of his was published posthumously, with a preface by Hale. See Cong. Quarterly, 1860, p. 180.

Billingaly, John Ashcum, a Baptist minister, was born in St. Mary’s County, Md., April 24, 1770. When about fourteen years of age he removed to Virginia. He was a very witty and agreeable young man, and uncommonly musical, and for many years was an excellent performer on the violin. When about twenty years of age he was awakened from his vain life, made a public profession of his faith in October, 1794, and at once fully identified himself with the cause of Christ as an active and zealous member of the Church. He was ordained to the ministry in 1816, and became pastor of the church at Zoa, Orange Co., Va. Subsequently he ministered to other churches in his native state. He died Aug. 1, 1837, on his plantation called Salem, in Spottsylvania, near Fredericksburg. He was a popular, successful, and indefatigable preacher. Although not educated in the colleges, he was always a student and reader of good books. It is said that few men in modern times have been instrumental in the conversion of more sinners or baptized more believing subjects. See Taylor, Virginia Baptist Ministers; Haynes, Baptist Cyclopaedia, i, 96–99.

Billot, Jean, a French preacher, was born at Dole in 1709, and died at Macherans, in the diocese of Besançon, in 1757. He wrote Proses Rédacées en Pratique pour les Dînemouch et les Fêtes Principales de l’Année (1771; Lyons, 1780). These lectures, often republished, were translated into English (Glasgow, 1774). See Hoefer, Nouv. Bio. Générale, s. v.

Billuart, Charles René, a French theologian and preacher, was born at Revin, Ardenne, Jan. 8, 1685. He completed his studies at Charleville, was appointed professor at the College de Douay, entered the Dominican order, and became, in 1728, provincial of his order. He died Jan. 28, 1757. His principal works are: De Missa Eclesiae Catholicae circa Academiae Eruditionis Dissertatio Unica, adversus Aut. Lenigrand (Liege, 1715): Le Théisme Vénygé de sa Prétendue Condemnation par la Constitution Unigenitus (Brussels, 1720)—Lettre aux Docteurs de la Faculté de Théologie de Douay, avec des Réflexions, etc. (1725)—Examen Critique des Réflexions sur le Brief de N. Thome (Liege, 1746–51, 29 vols, 8vo). This manual, which has often been printed in Italy, France, and Germany, in which the author is the author of an abridged edition in 1754, in 6 vols., has contributed not a little to develop in the Catholic schools the ideas and especially the spirit of the Doctor Angelicus, who was the favorite and theological ideal of Billuart. See Lichtenberger, Encyclopédie des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Bio. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Bilups, Humphry, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in South Carolina, in 1816. He was ordained to the ministry in 1794, and in 1837 entered the Virginia Conference. Both in the local ministry and in the itinerant ranks he abounded with earnest labor and abundant success. Age and infirmity finally compelled him to retire from active service, and he spent several years in a superannuate prior to his death, which occurred May 20, 1871. Mr. Bilups had only the advantages of a rudimentary education, yet by persistent personal application he attained considerable excellence as a well-read preacher. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1817–71.

Billy (or Bille), Brar (or Erard), a French theologian of Lorraine, was born Jan. 10, 1610. He taught theology and mathematics at Caen. In 1644 he ventured to issue upon the simony and power of the popes certain propositions which brought against him violent replies, so that he was at length obliged to retract. He resolved to go to America as missionary, and died by shipwreck in 1645. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bio. Générale, s. v.

Billy, Jean de, a French theologian, was born at Guise about 1580. He was elder brother of Jacques and of Godfroy, pursued the ecclesiastical profession, obtained some benefits, and was at first very worldly in his mode of living; but having been rescued from death by fire, he resigned the abbey in his possession, and entered the Carthusian order. He was prior of Mont-Dieu and of Bourbon-les-Goëlo, where he died, June 30, 1580. He wrote, Des Sceaux et des Hérités de notre Tempa, etc.; translated from the Latin of Stanislas Hosius, bishop of Varnie in Poland (Paris, 1561):—Dissédode de la Perfection de Chasté; translated from the Latin ofопер, nos, and saved in the Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris; this title is signed by Marc’ Antonio. The following are some of his principal plates: Adam Holding the Branch of a Tree; Eve with a Branch with Two Apples; The Seven Planets, represented by Figures; The Seven Virtues, Faith, Hope, Charity, Justice, Patience, Fortitude, and Temperance; David with the Goliath; The Descent from the Cross. See Spoone, Bibl. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Bindachul, a town near Mirzapur, to the north of Bengal, in Hindustan, where there is a temple dedicated to the sanguinary goddess Kali (q. v.). At this place religious ceremonies are constantly performed, and thousands of animals are offered in sacrifice. It is chiefly frequented by the Thugs (q. v.), or leagued murderers, who, before settling out on their cruel expeditions, visit the temple of the goddess, implore her aid, and, in the event of success, promise her a portion of the booty.

Bindeman, F. W., a German Reformed minister, was, in 1824, a student of Rev. J. William Deechaut, and by him recommended for ordination to the fathers; but owing to his rude and passionate conduct he was not deemed worthy to be a member, hence was excluded from all connection with the Church. It is not known when he died. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the German Ref. Church, iv, 475.

Binder, Christoph, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Gretchingen in 1519, and studied at Tübingen. In 1548 he was pastor at Denkendorff, in 1546 at Stuttgart, in 1557 at Nürtingen, in 1563 general superintendent and abbot at Adelberg, where he also signed the Formula of Concord, and died Oct. 9, 1596.

His grandson, also named Christoph, was born at Roswalden in 1575, and studied at Tübingen. In 1601 he was deacon at Caustait, in 1608 superintendent and preacher at Stuttgart, and in 1610 member of consistory and court-preacher. Two years after he had received the degree of doctor of theology, in 1614, he was made general superintendent and abbot of Maulbronn, and died June 8, 1616. He wrote, Theologia Scholastica:—Treatatul de Usurii:—De Jesuvarum Logistica et Malae Arisus, quibus in Congressibus ut Solent. Thesauri, Theor. Ellerm. et Altri. Memoria theologica. Binét, Étienne, a French Jesuit, was born at Dijon in 1569, and died at Paris, as rector of the College of Clermont, July 4, 1636. He was a prolific writer, and his works are found in the Bibliothèque des Erudiens de la Compagnie de Jésus (edited by Augustin and Alois de Backer, Liege, 1833). Sotwell, in his Bibliotheca Scriptorum S. J., praises him highly; but Binet appears to have had more zeal and piety than talent, and few of his numerous works, enumerated by Papillon in the Bibli. des Auteurs de Bourgogne, call for any special notice. We must, however, except his Essai sur les Merveilles de la Nature (Rouen, 1821), which soon appeared through twenty editions, and Abri du Vies des Principaux Fondateurs des Religions de l’Eglise, Représentés dans le Chœur de l’Abbaye de S. Lambert de Lesse in Huygnaut (Antwerp, 1834, 4to), which was translated into Italian, German, and other languages. Of his works: What is the Melior Governement, the Binet, François Isidore, a French theologian, was born at Niort in 1720. He was professor at the house of the Capuchins, where he was first provincial of the province of Tournaine, and then guardian of the convent of Poitiers. He frequently preached in Poitou and the surrounding provinces, where his oratorical artistry greatly endeared him to his listeners. The pope, in 1736, made him a cardinal. He died at the close of the 18th century. He wrote, Le Mis-nionnaire Controversist, ou Cours Enlêtre de Controverses (Poitiers, 1866).

His nephew, Isidore Binet, born at Niort in 1838, also entered the Capuchin order, of which he was twice provincial. A commendable orator, he went to Rome as preacher of the chapter-general of his order. He wrote a history of his voyage to Italy, in order to refute the erroneous reports of Misson, but before his death he demanded that his MS. should be burned. He died at Poitiers in 1779. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, IV, 2.

Binet, William, a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the diocese of Albany, was the officiating minister in the parish of New Castle, Pa., in 1857, and continued in that position until 1859, when he removed to Fort Smith, Ark., being employed in what was then known as the "Mission of the South-west." The following year he took the same mission, and served at Van Buren, Ark., and remained there until 1865. In 1866 he became rector of Grace Church, Canton, N. Y., and, after serving there about two years, resided in Canton without charge. Soon after, he removed to Be\ncia, Cal. A year after this, in 1871, he became principal of St. John’s Institute, Sacramento, retaining that position until 1873, at which time he removed to New York city, without charge. In 1874 he officiated in Stockbridge, Mass., and in the following year was rector of Edward’s-place School, in the same town. A short time previous to his death he was connected with the diocese of Albany. He died in the island of Jersey, Channel Islands, Feb. 1, 1877. See Prot. Episc. Alabamia, 1878, p. 18.

Bingham, Abel, a Baptist missionary among the Seneca and Ojibwa Indians, was born at Ensfild, N. H., May 9, 1786. He was ordained at Wheatland, N. Y., in 1838, and was sent among the Ojibwas. In 1853 he resigned his connection with the mission and removed to 29, 1865. See Appleton’s Annual Cyclopaedia, 1865,
p. 638; Cuthcart, Baptist Encyclopaedia, p. 100.

Bingham, George, an English clergyman, was born at Melcombe Bingham, in Dorsetshire, in 1715, and educated at Westminster School and at Christ Church, Oxford. He afterwards became fellow of All-Souls’
College, and was some time proctor in the university.
A few years later he was presented to the rectory of Pimpern, Dorset, and afterwards to that of More Critchill. He died at Pimpern, Oct. 11, 1800. His principal works are A Vindication of the Doctrine and Liturgy of the Church of England (Oxford, 1774)—An Essay on the Millennium, etc. (Lond., 1804, 2 vols.
8vo)—and Essays, Disputations, and Sermons, with Memoirs of the Author’s Life, by Peregrine Bingham
See Chalmers, Hist. of Scot., s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Bingham, Henry, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was a native of Virginia. No particulars are recorded concerning his birth or life other than that he spent four years in the ministry, and was serious, faithful, zealous, humble, and successful. He died in 1789.
See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1789, p. 33.

Bingham, Hiram, a Congregational minister, was a native of Bennington, Vt. At the age of twenty-one he was converted, and began preparation for college with the Rev. Eliaha Yale, D.D., of Kingsbury, N. Y., and graduated from Middlebury College in 1816.
Three years afterwards he graduated from Andover Theological Seminary. He was ordained at Goshen, Conn., Sept. 29, 1813, as a foreign missionary—the first ordination of a foreign missionary in Connecticut.
In company with other missionaries, he sailed from Boston, Oct. 23, for the Sandwich Islands, the voyage occupying one hundred and sixty days. After an exploration of the islands, Mr. Bingham, in September, 1825, established himself at Honolulu on the island of Oahu; and in 1826, he occupied the first mission house of the Pacific. He translated hymns, school-books, and large portions of Scripture into the language of Poly-nesian. On account of the failing health of his wife, he returned to the United States in 1840, and began to act as stated supply to various churches, particularly the church in Chester, Mass., and the Temple-street Church,
New Haven, Conn. He died at New Haven, Nov. 11, 1859, aged eighty years. Mr. Bingham made a valuable contribution to missionary literature in a work entitled, A Residence of Twenty-one Years on the Sandwich Islands (Hartford, 1847). He also printed a little book, Bartiments of the Sandwich Islands, published by the American Tract Society. See Cong. Quarterly, 1871,
p. 593.

Bingham, Luther, a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, was graduated from Middlebury College in 1821. He was licensed by the Essex Association, Mass., in 1825, and served as pastor from 1825 to 1837 at Marietta, O. He was pastor in Cincinnati from 1837 to 1843, and at Wheaton, Ill., 1843 to 1851; and a journalist, from 1851 to 1877. In 1855 he joined the Reformed Dutch Church, and was colporteur as well as connected with the Board of Publication. He died in minister, the son of a gentleman farmer, was born at of Queen’s- College, Caius, and, in 1837, he graduated at the University of Cambridge. His first settlement was at Middleborsough, Yorkshire, where he was ordained April 28, 1842, and Thence he removed to Crewe, thence to Tockholes, Lancashire, and thence to Drayladen, where he died,

May 30, 1862. Though naturally retiring, Mr. Bingley possessed a moral character that impressed every command made upon it. His conduct, spirit, and truth-

He died at his parochial residence in North Wales; including its Scenery, Antiquities, Customs, &c. (London, 1804, 2 vols. 8vo.) — Memoirs of British Quadrupeds, etc. (1809) — Animated Nature (1815): Useful Knowledge (1816). See Alli-bone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Binney, Amos, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Hull, Mass., Oct. 30, 1802. He experienced conversion when sixteen years of age; received a common-school education, and studied one year at New Market Academy; was licensed to preach, and entered upon mercantile business; and in 1826 joined the New England Conference. In its active work he did noble consecrated service until 1854, when he located. In 1857 he became superintendent and remained such until his decease in New Haven, Conn., March 29, 1874.

Mr. Binney was characterized by great fidelity to the Methodist Episcopal Church, and by tireless industry in every department of pastoral labor. He had a peculiar insight into the religious wants and difficulties of the common people, hence the publishing of his Theology of the Bible, which has been reprinted into the Arabic, Chinese, German, Swedish, Bulgarian, Spanish, Italian, and Japanese languages. His last eighteen years were spent in publishing his People's Commentary. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1878, p. 47.

Binney, Joseph Getchell, D.D., a distinguished Baptist missionary, was born in Boston, Dec. 1, 1807. At an early age he became a Christian, and united with a Congregational Church. He pursued his preparatory studies in his native city and entered Yale College, where he remained but a short time, on account of ill-health. Soon after he became a Baptist, and was received into the Baptist Church in East Cambridge, Mass., which gave him a license to preach, Oct. 15, 1830. His ordination to the work of the ministry and the pastorate of the Church in West Boylston took place May 16, 1832, in which place, and for a brief period in Southbridge, Mass., he was pastor for several years, and then removed to Savannah, Ga., to assume the pastorate of the Baptist Church in that city. Here his ministry was a happy and successful one. He was called in 1843 to be the founder and first president of Colgate College, D. D. He opened the theological school at a place near Mauimain. Here, for five years, he labored with great zeal and success in training a native ministry for the Karen churches, when the ill-health of Mrs. Binney compelled him to return to the United States, where he remained not far from eight years, acting during most of this period as pastor of two churches, one in Elmira, N. Y., and the other at Augusta, Ga., and, for a time, as president of Colgate Theological College, D. C. He was reappointed as a missionary in the summer of 1858, and resumed his labors as the president of the Karen Theological Seminary, which soon afterwards was removed to Rangoon. Here Dr. Binney performed the duties of his office from May, 1859, till November, 1875, with rare fidelity, and left the impress of a character of great energy and devotion to the cause of his Master upon the young men who came under his charge. He established a college for the Karens on the 28th of May, 1872, with three native teachers and seventeen students. An attack of paralysis in 1864, and another in the fall of 1875 compelled him to pass the winter of 1875-76 in the south. The following summer he returned to his native land. He sailed from New York, Oct. 6, 1877, by the overland route to the East, but died on board the steamship "Amarapoor", Nov. 26, 1877, and his remains were committed to the deep.

Among American missionaries of all denominations, Dr. Binney took a high rank. His personal appearance was such as to arrest attention at once. Seriousness, earnestness, thorough consecration to the work he was called to do, and his rare gifts were written in every line of a face which, once seen, would not soon be forgotten. He published, in the Karen language, a work on Systematic Theology, and another on Preaching. He left also several works in manuscript, which were nearly or quite ready to be placed in the press when he died. He was a hard, diligent worker, and doubtless shorted his life by his severe application to the tasks he had undertaken to accomplish. He guarded well his lips, and was sober and dignified in his demeanor, and his presence commanded respect. See Baptist Missionary Magazine, iv, 65-69. (J. C. S.)

Binney, Thomas, D.D., LL.D., an eminent English Congregationalist, was born at Newcastle-on-Tyne, April 30, 1798. In early life, he was engaged in secular employments, but found time for reading and composition, and, by the help of a Presbyterian clergyman, acquired a good knowledge of Latin and Greek. He was brought to Christ when he was young, and he early sought admission to the Christian ministry. His studies were made at Wymondham College, where his first settlement was at Bedford, where he continued but twelve months. Mr. Binney was ordained in 1824 to the pastoral office at Newport, Isle of Wight. Here he preached five years, and here began his career as an author, by publishing a reply of Rev. Stephen Morell, an intimate and beloved friend. In 1829 Mr. Binney accepted a call to the pastorate at the Weigh House, London, and then entered upon a course of usefulness and popularity, which for forty years he sustained with almost undiminished vigor. During the last two years of his life he occupied, with acceptance, the chair of Divinity in Christ's College, Cambridge, in which he died, at Clapton, Feb. 24, 1874. Dr. Binney was endowed both by nature and grace with many noble qualities. His presence was commanding—a lofty stature, a speaking countenance, and an intellectual brow. His mind matched his body; it was of great force, of iron grasp, keen and logical. He published, Comment and the Church:—Four Discourses on the Christian Ministry:—Illustrations of the Practical Power of Faith:—Sermons Preached at Weigh House Chapel:—Service of Song in the House of the Lord:—Ultimate Design of the Ministry: besides byrons, tracts, and various articles. Many of his Sermons were edited by Aylott (London, 1875). See Memorial by Stoughton (London, 1874); (London, 1875), p. 313; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Lights of the Mod. Pulpit (London, 1852), p. 49 sq.

Binning, Hugh, a Scotch theologian, was born in the County of Ayr, in 1627. He was educated in the University of Glasgow, and distinguished himself by his talent for oratory, and by the power of his logic. It was this that rendered him celebrated as a preacher and controversialist. In a conference which was held in the presence of Cromwell, between the Presbyterians and Independents, Binning so victoriously refuted the latter as greatly to please the future Protector, who demanded his name. Binning died in 1654, while minister of Gowan, near Glasgow, after having been regent and professor of moral philosophy in the University, of Glasgow. He wrote a Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans (Edinb, 1735). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Binning, William, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at or near Horsem, Yorkshire. He was converted at the age of fifteen, entered the ministry in 1817, labored in Jamaica, W. L., until 1826, when he returned to England, and died Dec. 7, 1867, in the sixty-seventh year of his age. His preaching, like his character, was simple, faithful, earnest. See Minutes of the Brit. Conference, 1858.
Binns, Charles, a minister of the Society of Friends, was born at Waterford, Ireland, in 1881. He inherited the Irish characteristic of warmth, both in affection and disposition. Being left an orphan when a child, he was brought up by his uncle William Binns, of Poole. He was converted and became a member of the Society of Friends, but afterwards resigned his membership, assigning as his reason that they did not realize the blessing and efficacy of the atonement of Christ. In the year 1868 he sought readmission into the Society of Friends. The merits of 23 years of his life were devoted to the education of the young, for which he had a peculiar gift, and in which he was very successful. He died Nov. 2, 1875. See Annual Monitor, 1877, p. 24.

Binns, Henry, an English Quaker minister, was born at Sunderland, Jan. 13, 1810. He began his ministerial labors when about fifty-five years of age. In 1863 he moved to Croydon, where a wider field of usefulness was opened up to him. “He often felt attracted in Gospel love to pay pastoral visits in various parts of Great Britain; and in 1869 he united with William Robinson in a visit of this character to some parts of the United States, embracing Iowa, Minnesota, and Wisconsin, and to Canada.” He died at Croydon, Jan. 17, 1880. See Annual Monitor, 1881, p. 22.

Binns, Joseph, a minister of the Society of Friends, was born in London in 1774. In early life he was exposed to many temptations, and yielded at times to their influence. During the greater part of his life humility and love were conspicuous in his demeanor. While he had many peculiarities, and some faults, there is good reason to believe that he sought out “the doctrine of our Saviour in all things.” He died Feb. 19, 1836. See Annual Monitor, 1837, p. 6.

Binns, Mary, a minister of the Society of Friends, was born at Poole, England, in 1775. Through a long course of years she was an earnest and devoted follower of her Saviour, and was very successful in inducing others to accept the offers of the Gospel. For many years she was an invaluable, and frequently her opportunities for doing good were most limited. She died in 1881. See Annual Monitor, 1852, p. 8.

Blufeld, Petrus, a Flemish theologian, was originally from Luxembourg. At Rome he received the degree of doctor of theology, became canon of Trèves, grand-vicear of the archbishop, and was consecrated bishop in 1563. He died of the plague, Nov. 24, 1565. See Echirchillation Theses (Douay, 1630 and 1636):—Commentarius in Lat. Decret. de Injuria et Damno:—Comment. ad Tit. de Sinumia:—Commentarius in Tit. Cod. de Maleficia et Mathematica, etc. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bioch. Générale, s. v.

Bion, Jean-de-Dieu-René, a French theologian, was born at Niort in 1704. He entered the ecclesiastical profession, became rector of Notre Dame of Niort, and died May 7, 1774. He bequeathed his large library to his native city, the beginning of which was established there, and which the municipal body was eager to open to the public. Bion united with the talent for composing excellent discourses, that of reading well what he had written. Many of his sermons are preserved in the Journal Chrétiens. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bioch. Générale, s. v.

Bion, Jean François, a Huguenot theologian, was born at Dijon in 1668. He was a member of the Catholic clergy and rector of the village of Urey, and was appointed chaplain of La Superbe, a galleys where Protestant prisoners were detained. Bion, touched by their patience, embraced their doctrines, went to Geneva in 1704, then to England, where he was placed in charge of a school. He left this position in order to become chaplain of an English church in Holland. The date of his death is not known. He wrote, Relation des Tourments que l'on fait Souffrir aux Protestants qui sont sur les Galères de France (London, 1708; Amsterdam, 1709):—Essais sur la Providence et sur la Possibilité de la Réurrection (Hague, 1719); this work, given as a translation, is really the work of Bion:—Relation Extr. et Sinone du Suicid qui a Exécuté la Finestre a la Ville de Thorn (Amsterdam):—Triélu des Morits et des Resussicants; translated from the Latin of Thomas Burnet (Rotterdam, 1731):—Histoire des Quackeries et des Bourgeois (1709). See Hoefer, Nouv. Bioch. Générale, s. v.; Smiles, Huguenots, p. 400.

Blondt, Flavio. See FLAVIUS BLUNDS. Biozuni, in Slavonic mythology, was an idol of the Moscovites, which they worshipped even during the 14th century. It is represented with a two-horned head of a cow, and long, projecting tongue, sitting with naked body and large breasts of a woman.

Bippus, John, a minister of the German Reformed Church, was born at Boll, Wittenberg, June 2, 1815. He came to America in 1837, and settled in Tuscarawas County. Subsequently he was removed to Crawford County. He was licensed in 1864, and ordained and installed pastor of the church at Galion, where he labored four years. Receiving no call elsewhere, he lived privately at Lewisville, O., until his death, May 21, 1872. He was a zealous, faithful minister. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church, v. 40.

Birch, Andreas, a Danish Protestant theologian, was born at Copenhagen, Nov. 6, 1738, and died as doctor of theology and bishop of Aarhus, Oct. 25, 1829. He published, Varia Lectiones ad Textum Ach. App. Eph. et Gal. (Copenhagen, 1776):—Quatuor Evangeli Graecus, cum Variis Notis apud Textum Lectiones Cod. MSS. etc. (ibid. 1788):—Varia Lectiones ad Textum Apost. i Cor. Cod. Gr. Birch, Henry (1), an English Congregational minister, was born at Sheffield in 1680. He was converted in early life; was very useful in Sunday-school teaching, village preaching, and in holding cottage services. He was recommended to the college at Blackburn, where he studied five years, and passed through his course with great credit. Mr. Birch was ordained at Keighley in 1825. His ministry having terminated in that place, he settled successively at Fordingbridge, Paisley, and Lodbury. His last years were spent at Walsden, where he died in 1874. Mr. Birch was a man of sound theology and sound theological opinions, and an author of considerable ability. Among other valuable works he published a volume entitled Positivae Theologia. See (London) Cong. Year-Book, 1876, p. 317.

Birch, Henry (2), an English Congregational minister, was born at Birmingham, July 29, 1812. Through the efforts of a female servant and his mother's death, he early in life became a Christian, and joined the Church in Carr's Lane in 1832 or 1833. He greatly desired to go as a missionary to India, but the delicate state of his health hardly made it advisable. He commenced his studies for the ministry under the Rev. S. Barber of Bridgenorth. In September, 1857, he entered Rotherham College. He was ordained March 26, 1842, over the Church at Providence Chapel, Driffield, York- shire, and remained pastor there till his death, Oct. 21, 1856. Many souls were converted as the result of his labors. His preaching was scriptural, clear, and greatly calculated for instruction and edification. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1857, p. 168.

Birch, Peter, an English clergyman, was born in 1632, and became prebendary of Westminster in 1669. He died in 1700. See (Lond.) House of Commons (1689); and another (1694). See Le Neve, Fasti, iii, 362; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Birchorodius, Jacob, a Danish Protestant theologian, who died at Copenhagen as doctor of theology and member of consistory, June 13, 1688, is the author of Book Pyrum. Liber Illustratus (Hafniae, 1686)—Olausius Exegetice Expositus (ibid.). See Jöcher, Algemeenes geleerden Lexikon, s. v.; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 119. (B. P.)

Birchorodius, Janus, a Danish Protestant theologian, who was born at Birkerød, in Zealand, in 1625. He studied at Copenhagen and Leyden, and was appointed professor of philosophy at Copenhagen in 1658. In 1660 he was made professor of Greek, and in 1666 he was appointed professor of theological chair. He published his degree as doctor of theology in 1675, and died in 1686. He wrote, Diatrise de Legis Mosaicae Deinæ Origine et Acciditiate—Filæ Esec de Messia Davidina Natura:—Excursiones contra Atheos. See Pippin, Memorial Theologicorum; Witte, Diarium Biographicum; Jöcher, Algemeenes geleerden Lexikon, s. v.

Birchett, Henry, a Methodist Episcopal minister, of whose birth or early life no information remains, was in the ministry between five and six years in Virginia. He died in February, 1794. He was a courageous, consecrated minister. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1794, p. 54.

Birchington (Brychington, or Bruckington), Stephen, a Benedictine monk of the church of Canterbury, died about 1047. He wrote a History of the Archbishoprics of Canterbury to the Year 1668, published in Wharton's Anglia Sacra; and is believed to have written histories of the Kings of England to 1367, of the Roman Pontiffs to 1378, and of the Roman Emperors to 1578. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Birchbeck, Simon, an English divine, was born in 1584, and educated at Queen's College, Oxford, of which he became a fellow. In 1607 he took holy orders, and became distinguished for his patriotic and scholastic knowledge. In 1617 he became vicar of Gilling and of Forcet, in Yorkshire, and died in September, 1656. His principal work was The Protestant's Evidence, taken out of All the Records (Lond. 1634), to which he was the author of a work on the Four Last Things (1655). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Bird (as a Christian symbol). The birds represented in the earliest Christian art are generally distinguished by their species. See Dove; Eagle; Phoenix, etc. This is not only the case in the early sarcophagi and frescoes, but it is especially remarkable in the first Gothic works of the Lombard churches in the north of Italy. But in the very earliest tombs birds assignable to no particular species are introduced, apparently with symbolic purpose. They occur so often on tombs, with or without the palm-branch, that they may be said to have been in the use of tombs, for seeking its home in heaven. Arianghi take the lightness and aerial nature of the bird as a symbol of the aspiration of faithful spirits (see also Ps. cxviii, 6, of the released soul). Bede looks on the bird also as a sign of the resurrection. Caged birds are occasionally found in paintings or other representations. They are supposed to represent the human soul in the prison of the flesh, or they may be emblems of the imprisonment of a martyr. Marigny describes a mosaic in the tribune of Sta. Maria in Trastevere, in Rome, where one of these cages is placed near the prophet Jeremiah, with inscription "Christ the Lord was taken in our sins," and another by Isaiah, with the words "Behold a virgin shall conceive and bring forth a son," referring thus to the passion and incarnation of our Lord.

The symbolism of the cross by a bird's outspread wings is Tertullian's. Herzog conjectures that the pictures or carvings of birds with flowers and fruits combined are symbolic of Paradise. In early Gallician MSS. undescribed birds are found almost everywhere, generally in pairs on each side of the monogram of Christ, and almost always with the letters A, w, which appear more frequently in the ancient documents of Christian France. Pairs of drinking birds, peacocks, and also of conventional shape, are still to be seen among the most ancient fragments of Byzantine manuscripts more especially in Venice. They may be carried back to the 11th or 12th century, perhaps, at all events, they are clearly decorative repetitions of the bird-symbols in the catacombs and earlier monuments.

Bird, Caleb, an English Congregational minister, was born in 1606. He labored thirty-five years in the Christian ministry—ten at Warrington, Lancashire, and twenty-five at Margate, Kent, where he died, Dec. 10, 1666. As a preacher, Mr. Bird was earnest and faithful; as a man, he had an untaught character. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1668, p. 251.

Bird, Charles Smith, an English divine, was born at Liverpool, May 28, 1795. He studied law in his youth, and after his conversion entered Cambridge, in 1817, where he graduated in 1820. In 1821 he was offered the principality of the Isle of the Royal College at Halifax, Nova Scotia; but, declining, took a party of young students, one of whom was Lord Macaulay, into Wales. In 1838 he took clerical duty at Mapledurham, and while there wrote Tracts for the Times and A Plea for the Reformation; placing him at once before the public as a controversialist of the first order. He accepted the living of Chesham in Hertfordshire, and in 1869 was collated to the chancellorship of Lincoln Cathedral, where he served the Church until his decease, Nov. 9, 1862. He also published Lectures on the Church Catechism (Lond. 1841). See Christian Observer, December, 1862, p. 969; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Bird, Edward, an eminent English painter, was born at Wolverhampton, April 12, 1772. His father, a clothier by trade, was a man of sense and information, and gave him a fair education. A family tradition declares that he began to sketch at the age of four, and that his passion for drawing called him up at early dawn, and made the figured furniture and walls of his house mere matter for unusual washing and scrubbing. He was privately encouraged by his eldest sister, and pro- duced his first composition worthy of notice in his fourteenth year—an imaginative interiew between the earl of Leicester and the daughters whom Miss Lee conferred on Mary queen of Scots, in her novel, The Recense. When his father saw that his love of drawing was incurable he became anxious to turn it to some account, but could think of nothing better than apprenticing him to a maker of tea-trays in Birmingham; these accordingly it became the boy's business to embellish, at which he soon became famous. Thus self-instructed, at the age of about thirty he removed to London and commenced a drawing-school, employing his intervals in producing all kinds of sketches, both serious and comic, such as The Interior of a Volunteer's Cottage, and Clandon dancing.
in an Alcove. Later, on visiting London and studying the historical pictures of the great painters, he dedicated his pencil to the illustration of sublime passages in the life of St. Paul, and religious themes, which in the Reformation furnished, such as The Fortitude of Job, The Death of Sappho, The Crucifixion, and The Burning of Ridley and Latimer. As premature old age crept on he was neglected, and finally died Nov. 2, 1819, and was buried in a cloister of Bristol Cathedral. Mr. Bird was in stature below the middle size, and had a mild, expressive, winning countenance. Towards the close of his life he lost his bright geniality, and grew dark and melancholy. His earlier works have an original and unburrowed air, but his later compositions were but little above failures. See Harper's Family Library, Lives of Painters and Sculptors, ii, 208.

Bird, Francis (1), an English sculptor, was born in 1607. He executed, among other works, the statue of Queen Anne, in the front of St. Paul's; the Conversion of St. Paul, on the pediment; and the bass-reliefs under the portico. His most important work, however, was the fine monument of Dr. Bushy, in Westminster Abbey. He died in 1721.

Bird, Francis (2), a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in 1875. He entered the South Carolina Conference in 1894, located in 1808, re-entered in 1849, and, after laboring one or two years, was put on the superannuated list, which relation he sustained until his decease, Nov. 17, 1881. Mr. Bird was a conspicuous Church worker and faithfulness and usefulness in the ministry. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1881, p. 341.

Bird, Isaac, a Congregational minister and missionary, was born at Salisbury, Conn., June 19, 1739. His preliminary education was acquired at the Castlemon Academy, Vt. In 1810 he graduated at Yale College, and, after having taught one year at West Watlington, Md., he graduated at Andover Theological Seminary in 1820. During the following two years, he was agent of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. His ordination occurred at North Bridgewater, Mass., Oct. 31, 1821; and he sailed for Malta, Dec. 9, 1822. From 1822 to 1826 he was a missionary in Syria, and in October of the latter year returned to America, resuming his agency for the American Board of Commissioners till 1888. He was acting professor of sacred literature in the Gilmanton Theological Seminary for six years from 1838, and was elected to the full professorship in 1844. From 1846 to 1869 he was teacher in a family school at Hartford, Conn., when he removed to Great Barrington, Mass., without charge. He died June 13, 1876. His published works are, Thirteen Letters to the Maronite Bishop of Beirut:—The Jewish Prisoner (Boston, 1860) ;—The Martyr of Lebanon (ibid., 1864) ;—Bird's Bible and Bible Lands (Presbyterian Board, 1872). See Cong. Quarterly, 1877, p. 410.

Bird, John, an English prelate of the 17th century, was born at Coventry, Warwicksire. He was educated a Carmelite at Oxford; became the thirty-first and last provincial of his order; preached some sermons before Henry VIII against the primacy of the pope, for which he was preferred to be successively bishop or osoppory, Ireland, Bangor, in Wales, and Chester, Eng-land (see Godwin [bp.], Lives of the Bishops). John Bale, however, contemporary with Bird, and also bishop of Osoppory, names him not as bishop of Osoppory, but "Episcopum Penneicensem in Hibernia" (De Scriptoriis Britonum et Britannorum). Bale also says that in the reign of Mary I he returned to the vomi of popery, but in the first year of her reign he was ousted from his bishopric for being married, and all that we know after is that, at the examination of Thomas Hawkes, martyr, Bird brought Bonner wine and apples, probably a present for a ne nocet. He was apparently complacent to the regnant faith, enough to save his head, but there seems to be no evidence that he was a thorough-paced Romanist. He was a little man, lived to a great age, died in 1565, and was buried at his request in Edinburgh. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), iii, 279.

Bird, John Cox, an English Congregational minister, was born at Thame, Oxfordshire, in 1845. He was educated at Howard House, Oxford County School, and afterwards held a position in the London post-office. He began his ministerial labors as a home missionary, and was ordained as pastor at Hatfield soon after, where he remained until the close of his life, being about six years. His death occurred in 1879. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1880, p. 508.

Bird, Mark B., a minister of the English Wesleyan connection, was born in London in 1807. He was converted early in life, and called into the ministry. In 1833 he was appointed to the Evesham Circuit. The year following he offered himself for missionary service, and was sent to Jamaica, where he labored four years, impaired health causing his return to England. A year's work on Ipswich Circuit so improved his health that he felt ready to return. Accordingly, in 1839 he was sent to Hayti, where he labored nearly forty years. He returned in 1879, spent some months in the Home Missions, and in January, 1880, became in very feeble health, removed to Jersey, where he died very suddenly, Aug. 23 of the same year. "In prosperity and adversity he clung to his post of duty with a moral heroism worthy of the highest commendation. He was a plain, practical, faithful, and thoroughly evangelical preacher, and specially solicitous for the spiritual welfare of the young. During the whole course of his ministry, his labors were greatly owned of God." See Minutes of the British Conference, 1881, p. 13.

Bird, P. Goold, a Scotch Congregational minister, was born in the village of Blantyre Works, near Glasgow, Jan. 25, 1813. He became a member of the Underston United Presbyterian Church, Glasgow, and became a missionary to Samoas, where he died, Aug. 22, 1864. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1866, p. 236.

Bird, Thomas Fairfoot, an English Congregational minister, was born at Blyth, Northumberland, in 1843. He emigrated to Australia with his parents at the age of fourteen. He entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1865. In 1870 he went to Tasmania and officiated on the New Norfolk Circuit, but while there left the Wesleys and joined the Congregationalists. In 1872 he accepted an invitation to the pastorate at Collingwood, and was inducted in February, 1873. Here he remained pastor, until his death, April 24, 1883. Mr. Bird had great originality and breadth of mental view, and was a valuable contributor to the secular and religious press. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1877, p. 346.

Bird, William (1). See Byrd.

Bird, William (2), an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Southport, April 11, 1781. He was converted at eighteen, entered the ministry in 1806, and exercised a successful ministry for forty-five years; retired in 1851, and died at Oldham, Sept. 7, 1869. Mr. Bird's intellectual powers were acute, masculine, and discriminating. He was an extensive reader, a vigorous thinker, a sound theologian, and a fluent speaker. His racy and epigrammatic sayings often became household words, or were admired as gems of wisdom. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1871, p. 673.

Bird, William Harrison, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Fayette County, near Lexington, Ky., May 31, 1814. He was educated at the Mission Institute, near Quincy, and applied to the Salt River Presbytery of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, and was licensed by them April 6, 1844. He was ordained by the Rushville Presbytery, Sept. 80, 1844, and labored in that Church a year and seven months, part of the time at Bernadotte and part at Table Grove; at the latter place he organized a Church in 1845. Later he has preached to hundreds of Quakers in Ohio, and was not satisfied, and took his disposal from the Cumberland Presbyterian Church; attended a meeting of the Schuyler Presbytery at Quincy, and was received into that body in 1846. In the fall of that year he united with Alton Presbytery, was installed pastor of the Venerables Church in 1847, and in 1853 of the Old Dutch Church. His subsequent fields of labor were Mr. Vernon, Vandalia, Bethel, Sandoval, and Bethel again. In these latter places he served as supply pastor. He died at Woodburn, Ill., April 15, 1877. His preaching was uniformly profitable, and was often attended with great unction and power. See Norton, Hist. of Presb. Church in Illinois.

Bird, John. See Byrde.

Birdsal, Ruth, wife of William Birdsal, was an elder in the Society of Friends (Orthodox). She died at Macedon, near Farmington, N. Y., Nov. 17, 1834, aged sixty-three years. See The Friend, viii, 68.

Biretta (Ital., from *pixěśȧ, red) is a cap called from the color of the fur, its original material. The *cuppa was also called a *biretus, and worn with a fur hood to cover the head. In 1281 copes were ordered by archbishop of Canterbury not to be presented before and before that, is, without folds (another meaning of biretus), and not slit down the back or the centre in front. The earlier biretus, a cloak, as Sozomen explains it, loose and of woolen material, was usually red in color, and common to all the clergy. St. Cyprian wore a bero, together with his tunic, and this habit is alluded to under the same name by the Council of Gangra. St. Austin speaks of a precious biretus, probably made of rich silk. At the coronation of William and Mary some of the clergy wore square caps, resembling flat-topped birettes. The biretta, a skull-cap, is mentioned by the instrument of investiture of a rector by the archbishop of Canterbury. Bireus was also a tippet worn on the tunic, and sometimes buttoned over the chest, or else flowing over the shoulders: it was used by the clergy, of a ruddy black or brown, or more usually fire-red color, as its name, purpus, as an adjective, implies; but as a substantive, indicating a dress, it was spelled bero. It had sometimes a hood attached to it, and is represented by the modern monetta.

A covering, similar in many respects to that represented in the illustration, was universally used by clerics about the 16th century, but has since been changed and modified in different countries, though retaining all its main and marked features. The ordinary Roman biretta is a square, stiff-sided cap, with curved ridges, and a tassel at the top, commonly made of black cloth or stuff, and of the same material as the cleric's cassock. Hence it is usually of black for priests, violet for bishops, and scarlet for cardinals. Birettes with four ridges are sometimes assumed by professors of theology; and those worn by doctors of canon law in some parts of Spain and Germany are made of black velvet. See BIRRUS.

Birge, Chester, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Bolton, Conn., Sept. 20, 1706. He graduated at Yale College in 1825, at the New Theological Seminary in 1828, and was ordained by the New Haven Congregational Association as pastor of the Congregational Church at North Greenwich. In 1830 he removed to New Philadelphia, O., and joined the Trumbull Presbytery. He died May 4, 1861. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1862, p. 177.

Birid, in Mongolian mythology, is the general name of monsters. Their kingdom, Biridian Orron, lies five hundred and twenty miles under the earth, and is called Sauron-goin-Sang (elephant of the air), is one of the Assuri, on whom the fifth ray of the six lights of Bodhidasaio-Chutuktu, the saviour of mankind, fell. Heri Khan, the ruler of the infernal region, lives there in a palace surrounded by sixteen iron walls, and this lies in the capital city, which is in the centre of the kingdom.

Birinus, Saint, the first bishop of the West Saxons, is said by Bede (Hist. Eccl. iii, 7) to have undertaken, by the advice of pope Honorius, the conversion of the interior of England, and for this work was consecrated by Asterius, bishop of Genoa. He landed in Wessex in 684, and, finding the people to he heathen, decided to stay and preach among them. The king, Cynegils, was one of his first converts, and under his protection and that of Oswald of Northumbria he fixed his see at Dorchester, Oxfordshire, on the border of Wessex and Mercia. The latter kingdom, then under Penda, afforded a field for his missionary labors. He died in or about 682, and was buried at Dorchester. His remains were translated by bishop Haeddil to Winchester about 686, and he is commemorated Dec. 3. The Winchester historians add that he was a Benedictine monk of the monastery of St. Andrew at Rome, that he dedicated the Church of the Holy Trinity, Winchester, in the year of his pontificate, and died in the fourteenth. The canons of the saint were constructed as relics, asserting that Birinus had never been translated. The parish of Kilbirnie, Scotland, is named from St. Birinus, but no fair marks his day. There is a Kilbirnie Loch at the west end of the parish of Beith; and the parish Dunbarney probably takes its name from this saint. See Forbes, Kel. Scott. Saints, p. 279 sq.

Birkbeck, Mary, a minister for many years of the Society of Friends, was born in Yorkshire, England, in 1753. Little is known of her life, but enough to show that she was pro-eminent in piety and usefulness. She died in peace April 7, 1809. See Annual Monitor, 1831, p. 8.

Birkby, John, a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, was born in Yorkshire, England, in 1792. He graduated at Rotherham College, and was ordained by the Congregationalists. He served in England, Earl Shelton, Leicester, Tockhols, Lancaster; in America, Hanover, N. H., 1835-40; Gansevoort, Saratoga Co., N. Y., 1840-45. He died in 1881. He was rather timid and reserved, but covetous of ornament or notoriety. He seldom took part in discussion, but, when he was drawn out by the strength of his convictions, he spoke with point, propriety, and power, revealing a clear head, logical intellect, and a hoard of wealth and resources which proved him to be a man of vigorous and independent mind. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America (3d ed.), p. 183.

Birkett, Edward, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Kendal, Westmoreland, England, Jan. 4, 1812. He gave himself to Christ at the age of fourteen; was soon licensed to exhort, and four years later to preach; emigrated to America in 1835, and immediately began his ministerial labors in connection with the Pittsburgh Conference. On the formation of the Erie Conference in 1836, he became a member of it, and two years later was transferred to the Pittsburgh Conference, wherein he labored faithfully, with three years' exception as supernumary, until 1872, when he took for a third and last time a supernumary relation, which he sustained until his death at Mount Union, O., Aug. 13, 1878. Mr. Birkett was not strong physically, but attained a superior mental power. He was sound in faith, and steady in purpose. His sermons were full of thought, chaste and elegant. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1878, p. 47.
Birkey, Abraham, a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, was born in 1806. He was pastor of the German Reformed Church in Detroit, Mich., 1849–52. He then served the Second German Reformed (Dutch) Church in New York, 1852–66. He died in 1867. See Corwin, Manual of the Def. Church in America (3d ed.), p. 183.

Birkowsky, a noted Polish preacher, was born at Leopol in 1586, and died at Cracow in 1596, leaving sermons, etc., which were published in several volumes (Cracow, 1620–32), and mark the golden age of Polish literature. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Birley, George, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Calne, Wilts., Nov. 12, 1792. He united with the Church in his twenty-first year, was received into the itinerancy in 1812, retired in 1857, and died at Market-Rasen, May 18, 1867. Mr. Birley's sermons were plain, faithful expositions, indicating vigor of thought and careful preparation. In labors, he was more abundant; in piety, praiseworthy; and in reading, indefatigable. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1867, p. 26.

Birnbaum, Christian Gottfried, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Dresden, May 28, 1651. He studied at different universities; in 1688 was deacon at Zwickau, and accompanied Prince Johann George IV as chaplain through Germany, the Netherlands, France, and England. In 1687 he was made superintendent of Kohlitz, and in 1694 of Grimma. In 1695 he became a member of the Academy of the Leipsic; in 1703 was pastor at Prenzlow, and in 1709 at New Ruppin, where he died in 1722. He wrote, De Libertatoe a Lege per Christophum Facta: —De Impotentia Virtutis Humanae in Spiritualibus, See Dietmann, Chrurzschische Priesterleh. ii, 1881; Jülicher, Allgemeine Kirchen-u. Gelehrten-Gesch., s. v. (B. P. B).

Briot (or Briot), Jacques, a French theologian, a native of Bordeaux, was prior of Bussans, of the order of Cluny, counsellor and preacher to the king. He died about 1666. He wrote a large number of sermons, which have been printed in several volumes. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Birrell, Charles Mitchell, an English Baptist minister, was born in 1810. He commenced his ministry in Liverpool in 1835, and remained there thirty-six years (from 1836 to 1872). He was very prominent and influential in his denomination, and his counsels were highly respected. He died at Blackheath, Dec. 16, 1880. (J. C. S.)

Birrus (or Byrrhus, βυρρος, βυρρων) was an old Latin word equivalent to "rufus" or red, and identical probably with the Greek ψυρρος. No traces of the word, as the name of a garment, are to be found before the Christian era. The earliest known instance of such a use is early in the 2d century. Speaking of the significance of various articles of dress, when seen in dreams, Artemidorus (Omenoi Cr. ii, 3) says that the chlamys (a short military cloak), "which some call sanguineous, or the chlamys of the Greeks, others hard to endure, and to prisoners under trial portends condemnation, by reason that it compasses about and confines the body." Other writers identify it with the "amphilobus" (q. v.). A fresco in the cemetery of Pontius, in which are represented three laymen, Sts. Milieux, Abdon and Sennen, and one ecclesiastic, St. Vincen- tius, will probably give a good idea of the difference between the chlamys, the birrus, and the casula (or planeta). St. Milix is represented wearing a chlamys; Abdon and Sennen a heavy cloak reaching from the shoulders to the back of the knee, and in form differing but little from the birrus. See Abdon. But the birrus (if such be the garment intended) is provided with a hood, or cowl, for wearing over the head, as were most such outer garments when intended, as was the birrus, for out-door use, and represented as worn on the head. Such a rough birrus as this was allowed to be worn by slaves under the provisions of the Theodosian code. Hence some have inferred, though wrongly, that the birrus was at that time regarded as a garment suitable only for persons of the lowest class. This was not so. There were "cheap birrus," such as those here allowed as a privilege to slaves; there were "costly cloaks," such as those of which St. Augustine says that they might perhaps be fitting for a bishop, but not fitting for Augustine, "a poor man, as his parents had been poor before him" (De Dicerinis, v, 1759). From the 4th century onward the mention of the birrus is not unfrequent as of an out-door dress used alike by laymen and by ecclesiastics. In these later notices it is almost always referred to as being either a somewhat expensive dress or as having a certain secular character attaching to it as compared with the dress worn by monks. Thus Cassianus (civ. 418 A.D.), describing the dress of monks, says that they avoid the coarseness and the pretense to dignity implied in the planeta and the birrus (De Habito Monach. i, 7). St. Isidore, in like manner, couples together the planeta and the birrus as garments which are not allowable to monks (Regula, xii). This will account for the peculiar language of the Council of Gangra (319), warning men against attributing too much importance to the monastic dress for its own sake, and despising those who wore "birri." Towards the close of the 6th century we find St. Gregory the Great using the term "birrus albus," in speaking of the white "christening-cloak" worn by the newly baptized (Epist. 5). See Bireta.

Birt, Caleb Evans, an English Baptist minister, was born at Devonport, March 11, 1755. He entered Cambridge University when he was seventeen years of age, intending to study for the bar. Not long after he became a Christian, and decided to study for the ministry. After preaching for a time as a licentiate, and studying in the Bristol College, in the fall of 1814 he became a student in the University of Edinburgh, and in 1816 took the degree of master of arts. His ordination took place in 1817 as pastor of the Baptist Church in Derby, where he remained until 1827. He then removed to Plymouth, and was pastor until 1857, and after wards went to Birmingham, whence he removed in 1844. His last pastorate, which was at Wem, continued ten years, and closed with his death, Dec. 13, 1854. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1855, p. 46. (J. C. S.)

Birt, Isaiah, an English Baptist minister, was born at Coleford, Sept. 6, 1756, his father being a Baptist minister, and died in life, he left the society, and continued in the ministry. He entered Bristol College in 1779, and had among his teachers Rev. Dr. C. Evans and Robert Hall. In 1784 he became co-pastor with the Rev. Philip Gibbs at Plymouth, and subsequently of a Church at what was afterwards known as Devonport, this church being a colony from one of which he was the colleague pastor. Here he remained until the close of 1813, when he removed to Birmingham, where he was for twelve years pastor of the Church which had had for its minister the saintly Samuel Pearce. Finally he removed to London, where he died, Nov. 1, 1857. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1858, p. 28. 24. (J. C. S.)

Birt, John, an English Baptist minister, eldest son of the foregoing, was born at Devonport, Jan. 7, 1787. He united with the Church at the age of seventeen, and commenced village preaching near Coleford. For two years he studied theology with a minister in London. His first pastoral settlement was in Hull in 1812, where he remained ten years. In 1822 he became pastor of the York-street Baptist Church, and was there in that relation twenty years. His last settlement was in Oldham. At the end of fourteen years he had a paralytic stroke, which nearly disabled him. He died Oct. 30, 1863. Among his published writings are, The Conversations of Erastus and Tropheimus, a vindication of the views held by the moderate Calvinists:— A Summary of the Principles and History of Popery:—
and Puritanic Essays, a work which is said to bear witness to the variety of his learning and the versatility of his writing. Besides the foregoing, a considerable number of smaller productions issued from his pen. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1864, p. 117, 118. (J. C. S.)

Birt, John B., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Ohio about 1806. He joined the Indiana Conference in 1837; faithfully preached, generally on large circuits in the middle of the state; twice was presiding elder, once a delegate to the General Conference, and only lost about six years as superannuate from the active ranks up to the time of his death, April 24, 1870. Mr. Birt possessed a pathos and moving tenderness which gave him wonderful access to the hearts of the people. He was exemplary in life. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1871, p. 114.

Birt, Owen Johnson, an English Baptist minister, son of Rev. Caleb Birt, was born at Derby, May 30, 1821. He was converted when about seventeen years of age, and joined the Church at Broadmead, Bristol, in March, 1838. In 1839 he entered the Baptist College, in Bristol, where he remained from 1839 to 1842. In October of the latter year he was accepted by the committee of the Baptist Missionary Society for service in Ceylon. He was so feeble that he died at sea, March 14, 1844. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1844, p. 21, 22. (J. C. S.)

Birthwald, an early English prelate, was born in the middle of the 7th century, but where is unknown. He was probably educated at Glastonbury, and was deeply read in Scripture. He was elected July 1, 692, the eighth archbishop of Canterbury, but was not consecrated until June 29 of the following year. There seems to have been nothing in the conduct of Birthwald more praiseworthy than the zeal which he displayed in the missionary cause. But although the long episcopate of Birthwald was one of peace and internal prosperity, he was not without his troubles. At the close of his life, his Church contrasted favorably with the condition of the Church in other parts of the world. His death occurred in 729. See Hook, Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, i, 178 sq.

Birzuli, in Slavonic mythology, is an idol of the Wends and Poles, only known from the name. It is believed he was simply a household deity.

Bisacramentarians was a term invented by Gabriel du Freaux (Proteus), in his Elenchos Herveticorum, to signify those who receive only the two sacraments of baptism and the eucharist.

Bisarion. See Bessaion.

Bisbee, Benjamin, a Baptist minister, was born in Maine about 1763. His early life was spent in agricultural pursuits, and he was ordained in Belgrade, Me., in December, 1809. For two years he was occupied as an evangelist in the destitute sections of Maine. In 1812 he became the pastor of a small church in the town of Harmony, where he remained until 1829. His love for missionary work was not abated during these thirteen years, and he frequently left his home to carry the Gospel into the regions round about. From 1808 to 1832 he was pastor of the Church in St. Albans. He continued to perform his ministerial and evangelistic labors until he was laid aside by the infirmities of age. His last years were spent in Waterville, Me., where he died in 1847. See Millett, History of the Baptists of Maine, p. 436. (J. C. S.)

Bisbie, Nathaniel, D.D., an English divine, was rector of Long Melford, near Sudbury, Suffolk, and died in 1655. He published several single Sermons. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Bis-cantârè means the chanting or celebrating of two masses in the same day by the same priest. This was forbidden by the canon law, except on Christmas-day and some other occasions. The Bishop was able to grant a dispensation to do so.

Bischoff, Melchior, a Lutheran theologian of German origin, was born at Plasneek, May 20, 1547. In 1570 he was deacon in his native city, but in 1574 he was deposed of his office because he would not subscribe to the articles of the Wittenberg theologians. He then acted for some time as pastor at Jekenheim and Thundorf, and after the fall of the Philistines (q. v.), in 1585, he was installed as pastor to his native place. In 1590, duke Johann Casimir appointed him court-preacher at Coburg, where he died, Dec. 19, 1614. Besides sermons and ascetic works, he wrote some hymns, which are still found in German hymn-books. See Fechter, Theater Vindorum Eruditiorum Clarorum (Norib., 1688); Wesel, Hymnographia [Hermstadt, 1719], vol. 1; id., Anal. Hymnol. Iiii. 7; Koch, Geschichte des deutschen Kirchenliedes, i, 266 sqq. (B. P.)

Bischofsberger, Barthélemy, a Swiss Protestant theologian, was born in 1632. He took holy orders, became minister at Trojen, and died in 1678, leaving a History of the Canton of Appenzell (St. Gall, 1682). See Hoefner, Noue. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bishop (or Bishop), Johann van, a Dutch designer and engraver, was born at the Hague in 1646. He executed nearly all the pictures of the Dutch painters, in small colored drawings. His principal work was a set of prints for a book, of which the first edition, published by Bischoff, contains 192 plates; the second, published by Nic. Visscher, contains 113 plates. It is entitled, Paradigmata Graphice Variorum Artificium, Tabulæ Iconem, pars i, et ii (Hague, 1670). The following are some of his principal prints: Christ and the Samaritan Woman; Joseph distributing Corn to the Egyptians; The Martyrdom of St. Lawrence. See Spoor, Bioi. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Bisciano, Bartolomeo, a Genoese painter, was born in 1632, and studied under his father, Gio. Andrea Bisciano, and afterwards under Valerio Castelli. At twenty-five years of age he had executed many fine works, but his career was cut short by the plague which visited Genoa in the year 1651. The following are some of his principal works: Moses in the Bulrushes; Susanna and the Elders; The Nativity; The Circumcision; The Wise Men's Offering; The Virgin Adoring the Infant Jesus; St. Joseph with the Infant Jesus.

Bisciola, Giovanni Gabrielle, an Italian Jesuit, was born at Modena in 1538, and died at Ferrara, Feb. 8, 1613, leaving an Abrissment of the Annals of Baronius, and an Italian translation of the Martyrology Romanum.

Bisciola, Leolus, a learned Italian Jesuit, was born at Modena about 1545. In several of the colleges he taught Greek, theology, eloquence, and philosophy. He died at Milan, Nov. 10, 1629. He wrote, Hororum Subsecievarum: hoc est, Rerum in Omni Philologia Geneae Ecelestium (two volumes, of which the first was published at Ingolstadt, 1611; the second at Cologne, 1618)—Observationum Sacrarum, lib. xi—Disregissio in Augusto Matthi et Jord. deestinationis: libri duo ad Romanos, Galatas et Hebrews. He also published in Italian, under the name of his brother, Paul Bisciola, two volumes of Christian and Moral Dissertations: a Treatise on Comparisons and Similitudes, with some dissertations. See Hoefner, Noue. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Biscop, Richard, an English divine, was the son of a Dissenter, educated at a Dissenting academy at Shrewsbury, and was ordained a Dissenting minister, Dec. 19, 1716. In 1728 he confirmed, and received orders in the Church of England. In 1727 he was presented to the rectory of St. Martin Outwich, London, which he retained until his death, July, 1748. He held also a prebend of St. Paul's, and was chaplain in ordinary to the king. He was the author of an elaborate work entitled The History of the Acts of the Holy Apostles Confirmed from other Authors, etc. (1742); being the substance of his sermons preached at the Boyle lecture in 1736, 1737, and 1738. See Chalmers, Bings.

Bisenti, Antonio, an English Congregational ministor, was born near Setubal, Portugal, in 1800. He was brought up by his uncle, and escaped from the monastery where he was placed for education for the minisyery, and was captured by a band of robbers, who treated him kindly, however, and conducted him to the British colors. He was subsequently licensed as a missionary and was received into the Congregational Church as the son of an old acquaintance, and was adopted by him and taken to America. His benefactor being killed at the battle of New Orleans, the lad, with a sum of money for his education and support, was left in the charge of a brother officer. This officer afterwards returning to his estate in Ireland, sent the boy with him and sent him to bath to be educated and put into business.

While at Bath he was converted, joined the Church, and began preaching in the surrounding villages. In June, 1830, Mr. Bisenti was ordained pastor of the Independent Chapel, Hemingham, where he labored three years, and there became rector of the Congregation

Church at Stalbridge. Here his troublous path took place, Jan. 16, 1872. Many souls were converted through the ministry of Mr. Bisenti. His pastoral visitation was his principal forte; many a Christian's sunset has been irradiated with the ruddy glow of hope at the words of comfort which fell from his lips. See (Lonely) Cong.

Year-book, 1872, p. 316.

Bishop. In addition to information already given,

there may be of interest the following:

I. The special conditions of eligibility for a bishopric were, (1) that the candidate should be (Apost. Const.

ii, 1) fifty years of age; but, according to Conc. Neoces.

A.D. 314, and later similar canons, the age of thirty only was insisted on. Photius, in one place, says thirty-five, which is likewise Justianus's rule in another place.

Special merits, however, and the precedent of Timothy

(1 Tim. iv. 12) repeatedly set aside the rule in practice, as in the well-known case of St. Athanasius, apparently not much more than twenty-three when consecrated bishop. (2) That he should be of the clergy of the Church to which he was to be consecrated (a rule enacted by Pope Julius II.); and, in the Great; a regulation repeatedly broken under the pressure of circumstances, special merit in the candidate, the condition of the di-cose. (3) That he should be a presbyter, or a deacon

at the least, and not become a bishop per saltum, did not go through all the several stages; also at first an ecclesiastical custom, grounded on the fitness of the thing (by a number of fathers and popes), but turned into a canon by Conc. Sturdic, A.D. 347 (naming reader, deacon, priest; the object being to exclude neophytes, and by some later provincial councils: and so Leo the Great (admitting deacons, however, on the same level with priests); broken likewise, perpetually, under special circumstances. Instances of deacons, indeed, adavanced at once to the episcopate, are numerous, and scarcely regarded as irregular, beginning with St. Athanasius. But the case of a reader also is mentioned in St. Augustine, and of a subdeacon in Liberatus. Although expressly forbidden by Justianus and by Conc.

Arelat. IV, A.D. 455, yet the well-known cases of St.

Cyprian, St. Ambrose, St. Martin of Tours, St. Germanus of Auxerre, and others, prove the admissibility of even a layman, if under the circumstances—as, e.g. by reason of the sudden acclamation of the people—a cannon or priest, or both, was needed in an emergency.

Instances may also be found in the Alexandrian Church.

But then (4) such candidate was not to be a neophyte

(1 Tim. iii, 6) or a heathen recently baptized, who had not yet been tried, but one converted at least a year before, or if he had a reader or a subdeacon or a deacon for a year. Yet here, too, special circumstances were held to justify exceptions; as in the case of St.

Cyprian himself; of St. Ambrose, and of Eusebius of Caesarea in Pontus, not yet baptized. All these are cases of consecration by the apostles or bishops ordaining to each step on successive days, in order to keep the letter while breaking the spirit of the rule, dating no earlier than the case of Photius above mentioned. (5) Apost. Can. xxii permits the consecration of one made a eunuch by cruelty, or born so; and of one made and consecrated in Spain, an eye or leg, and it is in the case of a deaf or dumb person. (6) Lastly,

the bishop who was appointed interventor to a see during the vacancy was, on that account, ineligible to that see.

See Intercessores. It remains to add (7) that the candidate's own consent was not at first held to be requisite, but that in many cases consecration was forced upon him (as in the case of Eusebius of Caesarea in Pontus, A.D. 362). Apost. Can. xxxvi orders the excommunication of a bishop who refuses the charge of the people assigned to him. But first St. Basil exempts those who in such a case had "sworn not to receive ordination." Afterwards the emperors Leo and Majorian forbade forced ordinations altogether.

II. Euhemerization, which is mentioned in the Apost.

Constit., and in Greek pontificates, as the concluding act of ordination, followed upon ordination, either (as at first) immediately or (in course of time) after an interval; a regular sequence being then prescribed for it. A sermon was thereupon preached, at least in the East, by the newly consecrated bishop. Littera communicatioraria, or synodycum, or euhemeristicus, were written to other bishops, to give account of the sender's faith, and to receive letters of communion in return. The term was also applied to such letters which cannot be made to bishops on occasion of their euhemerization. The Arabic version of the Nicene canons has a rule that the bishop be enthroned at once by a delegate of the archbishop, and that the archbishop visit him personally

after three months, and confirm him in the see.

III. A profession of obedience to the metropolitan, and (in the Carolingian empire) the imputation of oath of allegiance to the emperor or king, began to be required, prior to confirmation; the former from the 6th century onwards, the latter from the time either of Charlemagne or of his immediate successors—but far earlier in Spain. (a)

The earliest written profession of obedience is one made by the metropolitan of Ephesus to the archbishop of Thessalonica, and is condemned by Leo I in 450. Netheless, professions to the metropolitan by the bishop to be consecrated became the regular practice. (b)

A general oath of allegiance to the king, from all subjects, occurs repeatedly in the Spanish councils. A promise of fidelity from bishops is mentioned in Gaul as early as the time of Leodegarius of Autun and St. Eligius, c.

A.D. 640.

IV. Removal.—The next point to be considered is the various methods by which a bishop ceased to occupy a see.

1. Translation, which, as a rule, was forbidden, but only as likely to proceed from selfish motives. Before the period of the apostolic canons this prohibition would have been hardly needed. Apost. Can. xiv forbids it, unless there be a prospect of more spiritual "gain" in saving souls; and guards the right practical application of the rule by the proviso, that neither the bishop himself, nor the diocese ("parochia") desiring him, but

"many bishops," shall decide the point. The Council of

Nice, Conc. Antioch. A.D. 341, Conc. Sturdic. A.D. 347,

Conc. Carth. III, A.D. 397, and Conc. Carth. IV, A.D.

398, forbid it likewise: the first two without qualification; the last two, with the proviso mentioned above;

from the bishop, the people, or other bishops; but the third, if "from a small city to a different one;" and the fourth, also in case it be "from an unimportant to an important place;" while allowing it if it be for the good of the Church, so that it be done "by the sentence of a synod," and at the request of the clergy and laity. The Canon of Nicæa also condemn it under the same penalty if it be done "by the sentence of a synod," and at the request of the clergy and laity. The Canon of Nicæa also condemn it under the same penalty if it be done "by the sentence of a synod," and at the request of the clergy and laity. The Canon of Nicæa also condemn it under the same penalty if it be done "by the sentence of a synod," and at the request of the clergy and laity.

BISHOP 510 BISHOP

3. The deposition of bishops. A. The grounds upon which bishops as such were deposed were as follows:

(a) Certain irregularities which vitiated an episcopal consecration or title; and these were for the most part, although not wholly, irregularities such as disqualified for consecration at all.

(b) The general causes affecting all clergy, as well as causes relating to their own special office.

(c) Bishops were liable to excommunication as well as deposition, if (1) they received as clergy such as were suspended for leaving their diocese; or (2) if they "made use of worldly rulers to obtain preferment;" or (3) if, being rejected by a diocese to which they have been appointed, they move sedition in another diocese, etc.

(d) Lastly, bishops were liable to suspension or other less censure, if (1) they refused to submit to the authority of their diocesan when summoned to meet an accusation; they failed to appear even to a third summons, they were deposed; or (2) if they unjustly oppressed any part of their diocese, in which case the African Church deprived them of the part so oppressed.

B. The authority to inflict deposition was the provincial synod; and for the gradual growth and the differing rules of appeal from that tribunal, see AEPPAL. Conc. Chalced., A.D. 451, forbids degradations of a bishop to the rank of a priest; he must be degraded altogether or not at all. Conc. Antiochii, A.D. 341, forbids recourse to the emperor to reverse a sentence of deposition passed by a provincial synod.

V. From the office, we pass to the honorary privileges and rank of a bishop. But no doubt many of such privileges belong to Byzantine times, and date no earlier than the 3d or 4th century.

1. Of the modes of salutation practiced toward them from the 4th century onwards. Such were (1) bowing the head to receive his blessing, mentioned by St. Chrysostom, St. Ambrose, and others, and referred to in a law of Honorius and Valentinian. (2) Kissing his hand. (3) Kissing the feet, also, appears by St. Jerome to have been at one time a mark of respect common to all bishops; being borrowed, indeed, from a like custom practiced toward the Eastern emperors. The deacon is to kiss the bishop's feet before reading the Gospel, according to the Ordo Romanus. It was restricted to the pope as regards kings, by Gregory VII. (4) The forms of address, and the titles and epithets, applied to bishops, have been discussed above.

2. Singing hosannas before a bishop on his arrival anywhere, is mentioned only to be condemned by St. Jerome.

3. The form of addressing a bishop by the phrase corona tua or vestra, and of adorning him per coronam, frequent in early writers, has been explained as referring to the mitre, to the tunic, or to the corona or "assembly" of the bishops present. The nature of the appellation appears to exclude the last of these. Its being peculiar to bishops is against the second.

4. The bishop's throne. See THRONE.

5. If we are to take the pretended letter of pope Lucius to be worth anything as evidence in relation to later times, the bishop of Rome was habitually attended by two presbyters or three deacons, in order to avoid scandal.

VI. Rank.—1. The relation of bishops to each other was as of an essentially equal office, however differentiated individuals might be in point of influence, etc., by personal qualifications or by the relative importance of their sees. St. Cyprian's view of the "one episcopate" —the one corporation of which all bishops are equal members—is much the same with St. Jerome's well-known declaration, "Wherever there may be a bishop, whether of Rome or of Zuziphus—or he is of the same merit, of the same priesthood also." A like principle is implied in the litura communicatrix or synodica—sometimes called litura enthronica—by which each bishop communicated his own consecration to his sees to foreign bishops as to his equals. The or-order of precedence among them was determined by the date of consecration (so many councils and Justinian). 2. This equality was gradually undermined by the existence of metropolitans, archbishops, primates, ex-archs, patriarchs, pope: for each of whom see the several articles.
3. However, apart from this, there came to be special distinctions in particular churches; as, e. g. in Mauritania and Numidia the senior bishop was "primus;"
but in Africa proper, the bishop of Carthage: and in Alexandria the bishop had special powers in the ordinations of the suffragan sees: for which see ALEXANDRIA (Patriarchate of); METROPOLITAN.
4. The successive setting-up of metropolitans and of patriarchs gave rise to exceptional cases ("autocephality"); all bishops whatever having been really independent of the province to the time of the setting-up of metropolitans, and all metropolitans before the establishment of patriarchs. See AUTOCEPHALY; MET-ROPOLITANS; PATRIARCHS.
5. For choripisci, in contradiction from whom we find in Frank times episcopi cathedrales, 6. for suf-froganes, 7. for consuls, 8. for intercessores and interterentes, and, 9. for commendarii, see under the several titles.

VII. Subordinate Titles.—There remain some anomalous cases; as, 1 Episcopi vacantes, viz. bishops who by no fault were without a see, but who generated sometimes into episcopi sugi or ambulantes, encounter; and among them is the subdeacon. In France, for example,
"Scotuli" enjoyed a bad pre-eminence. Bishops, indeed, without sees, either for missionary purposes to the heathen, or merely "honorary," existed from the time of the Council of Antioch, A.D. 341. (mentions) Wandering bishops, who have no diocese, are condemned by many councils.
2. The bishop-abbots, or bishop-monks, were principally of Celtic monasteries, but also in some continental ones;
the former having no see except their monastery [see ABBOT], the latter being simply members of the fraternity in episcopal orders, but (anonymously) under the jurisdiction of their abbot, and performing episcopal offices for the monastery and its dependent district.
3. Episcopus, or antistes palatii, was an episcopal counselor residing in the palace in the time of the Carlovigians, by special leave.
4. For episcopus cardinalis, which in St. Gregory the Greatest means simply "praiseworthy," i. e. the duly installed and "incardinated" bishop of the place, see under CARDINALS.
5. Episcopus regionarius, i. e. without a special diocesan see. See REGIONARIUS.
6. Titular bishops, and bishops in partibus infidelum, belonging, under certain names to later
7. Episcopus ordinum, in Frank times, was an occasional name for a coadjutor bishop to assist in conferring orders.
8. For the special and singular name of libra, attached to the suffragans of the see of Rome, see LIBRA.

Bishop, Abraham John, a Wesleyan missionary, was born in the Island of Jersey. In 1792 he was sent as missionary to the province of New Brunswick. Making St. John's the basis and centre of his work, he pushed into the interior, visiting Sheffield, Fredericston, and Nashwa. His labors were greatly blessed, and it was to the great grief of his friends that he departed, at the end of the year, for Grenada, W. I., at the appointment through the Rev. Dr. Oake, in January, 1793, whence he was predicted, in Grenada he died, June 16 of the same year.
"He was one of the holiest young men on earth. A useful preacher all the day long. See Minutes of the British and was ordained by Dr. Busk at Binglewood Church, Hampshire, in 1808, where he labored twenty-one years, and then removed to Bedminster. He relinquished his charge in 1856, and retired to Tunbridge Wells, where he died, Jan. 15, 1875. Mr. Bishop was a good scholar, and in the prize of life a vigorous preacher. He was a devo-\toted Christian and a resolute Nonconformist. He pub-his own request he was granted a supernumerary relation, which he sustained five years, residing at Brown-sville. In 1868 he resigned his public service, effective ranks, and continued faithful to the close of his life, April 25, 1874. Mr. Bishop was a man of medium stature and frail constitution, but of sound mind and cheerful disposition. His domestic and religious life

p. 62.

In November he was ordained and installed pastor. By 1834 he was elected to the professorship of Biblical criticism and Oriental literature in the Indiana Theological Seminary at Hanover, now the North-western of Chiicago, and died in that position, Dec. 14, 1837. Few men have given greater promise of usefulness to the Church. He daily read from the Latin, Greek, Hebrew, and German versions of the Scriptures, and his piety was equal to his scholarship. See Index of the Princep= sitores, 1863, p. 100.

Bishop, Hiram N., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the diocese of Illinois, was rector in Ken= nosha, Wis., in 1833. In 1857 he removed to Chicago, and became rector of St. John's Church, continuing to serve this charge until his death, which occurred Aug.

at Lewes; preached a short time at Newport, Isle of Wight; labored at Chard and Bridgewater, and finally settled at Axminster, Devonshire, in 1854, where he died, March 9, 1862. As a preacher, Mr. Bishop was occupied many positions of eminence. He died at Saratoga, N. Y., Aug. 7, 1880. In denominational af philanthropic societies and organizations received the benefit of his wise counsels and his pecuniary aid. He was a man of the firmly commanding presence, although the possessor of a large fortune, he was simple and un ostentatious in his habits and style of living, freely giving in many directions to objects of benevolence with which he sympathized, especially to the Freed= men's cause as represented by the Home Mission So= ciety. See ( N. Y.) Evening Post and Examiner; Cathar= cart, Bapt. Encyclop. s. v. (J. C. S.)

his health failing from overwork, he was dismissed in 1834, and went to Andover, Mass., becoming a resident member of the Theological Seminary. In 1839 he was installed as pastor of the Congregational Church in Weatherfield, Vt., and in 1842 was dismissed from the charge to become associate editor of the Boston Recorder, retaining this position until the sale

that time he was variously engaged, preaching occasion=

Bishoping is the vulgar name for confirmation (g. v.).

Bisal, the fourth bishop of the East Angles at Dun= wich, was consecrated by Theodore, as successor to Boniface, in 669 (or 670). He was present at the Council of Hertford in 673, but was soon after obliged to retire by reason of ill-health. His diocese was im= mediately divided between the sees of Dunwich and Elyham.

Bisal, Bonaventura, an Italian painter, was born at Bologna in 1612. He studied under Lucio Massari, and gained considerable reputation by his copies in miniature after Correggio, Titian, Giotto, etc., many of which were in the cabinet of the duke of Modena.
He etched a few plates after his own designs, one of which is the Holy Family with St. John and St. Eliza beth, marked F. B. B., F. 1631. He died at Modena in 1662. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.;
Bisi, Michael, a celebrated Milanese engraver of the present century, first distinguished himself by the publication of 1753, in which he engraved a number of plates, most of which were admired. He was one of the members of the Accademia delle Scienze dell’Arte, etc. He engraved the Virgin and Infant Enthroned with Saints. It is not known whether he is living or not. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Vaperce, Dict. des Contemporains, s. v.

Bismillah (in the name of God) is a solemn form of words prefixed to every chapter of the Koran except the last. Mohammedan doctors are not agreed as to the inspiration of this phrase, some declaring it to be of divine origin, while others hold it to be the invention of men.

Bisnow, in Hindustan, is a religious sect in East India which lives mainly on plants and milk. The majority of the Bantians belong to it. The Bisnowans never kill an animal, so that all sick animals, even insects, are nursed in hospitals specially erected for this purpose. In order to feed flas, bed-bugs, etc., they hire beggars, who, bound hand and foot, are given to these animals for a number of hours for food. Their god, Ram-Ram, they worship with dancing and music, without sacrifices.

Bismus is a sepulchre capable of containing two bodies. The word is found in inscriptions in Christian cemeteries at Rome and elsewhere.

Bisquert, Antonio, a reputable Spanish historical painter, was born at Valencia, studied under Ribaltas, and established himself at Teruel in 1620. He copied Sebastian del Piombo’s picture of a dead Christ in the arms of the Virgin, attended by the Marys and John. He died in 1646. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Biss, Philip, an English prelate of the early part of the 17th century, came from "a worshipful family" of Sparrgrae, Somersetshire. He was trained at Magdalen College, Oxford, of which he became fellow and dean until 1611, and was dean of St. John’s College, Taunton. He was a learned man and at his death bequeathed his library to Wadham College, Oxford, then newly founded. He died about 1614. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), iii, 107.

Bisse, Philip (1), an English clergyman, became archdeacon of Taunton in 1684, andsubdean of Wells the same year. See Le Neve, P. rist., i, 167, 168.

Bisse, Philip (2), an English prelate, was consecrated bishop of St. David’s Nov. 19, 1710, and was translated to Hereford, Feb. 16, 1712. He died Sept. 6, 1721. See Le Neve, P. rist., i, 304, 473.

Bisset, William, an English clergyman, was rector of Whiston, Northamptonshire, and died about 1727. He published, Sermo, on the Reformation of Manners (1704) — and The Modern Fanatick, being an Account of Dr. Sacheverell (1710-11). See Hosier, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Bissett, George, a missionary of the Church of England, came from that country to Newport, R. I., in 1767, as assistant to the Rev. Arthur Browne, rector of Trinity Church. When Mr. Browne went to England in 1772, Mr. Bissett was his assistant, and was part of his regular duty to teach the children connected with the parish. The "Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts" declined sending a missionary to this point, whereupon the congregation made him rector, and he remained with them until Newport was evacuated by the British, Oct. 25, 1779, when he went to New York, leaving his wife and child in destitute circumstances. His flight, of course, was in consequence of his royalist sentiments. Afterwards his family were permitted to rejoin him in New York. About 1796 he was appointed missionary to St. John’s Church, and died in New York city in 1798. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 80.

Bissett, John, a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, a native of Scotland, was born about 1752. After graduating from the University of Aberdeen, he came to America, and was ordained in 1776 by the bishop Seabury. He was rector of Shrewsbury Parish, Md., in 1789, and the same year was a deputy in the General Convention. In the session of the same body in 1792 he was elected secretary. During that session he was chosen third assistant minister of Trinity Church, New York, in which capacity he served as a member also of the General Convention of 1795. As a preacher he was remarkable for his eloquence. Besides this, he was a ripe scholar and a sound theologian. While connected with Trinity Church, he held for several years the professorship of rhetoric and belles-lettres in C bile College. In consequence of a religious revival he was compelled to resign. He returned to Scotland, and died in obscurity about 1810. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 443.

Bissey, Jonas, a Methodist Episcopalian, was born in Bucks County, Pa., Sept. 24, 1809. He was religiously inclined from childhood, professed religion in 1826, began immediately to prepare himself for the ministry, received license to exhort in 1831, to preach in 1832, and in 1833 entered the Philadelphia Conference, in which he labored with fidelity and zeal, with but one year's quiet as supernumerary, until Aug. 17, 1851, when he was killed by lightning in the pulpit at New London Cross-roads. Mr. Bissey was a faithful friend, an humble, devoted Christian, and a plain, zealous, successful preacher. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1852, p. 21.

Bisill, John, an English Baptist minister, was born about 1778. He was converted in 1817, and in 1798 was a member of the General Baptist Church at Knipton, by which he was called to the ministry. After spending about four years in the Academy under the care of Rev. Dan Taylor, he became pastor of the Church at Leake and Wimshold in 1800. In 1803 he removed to Sutterton, where a commodious chapel was soon erected and his congregation increased. His ordination took place Oct. 24, 1805, as pastor of the Church at Gosberton, in the neighborhood of Sutterton, a part of its members residing in the latter place. Subsequently a Church was formed at Sutterton, of which he was chosen pastor in 1808, and held the office for thirty years, resigning in 1838. He now took up his residence in Boston, where he died, Jan. 23, 1844. See (Lom.) Baptist Hand-book, 1845, p. 41. (J. C. S.)

Bisson, Louis, a French theologian and historian, was born Oct. 19, 1742, at Geffosses. During the Revolution he was first vicar of the bishop of that city. After taking the oath required by the constituent assembly, he refused to deliver his letters of the priesthood at the time of the suppression of the religion. For this he suffered ten months' detention. On Oct. 20, 1793, he took possession of the bishopric of Bayeux, on which occasion he published his first pastoral letter. In 1801 he took part in the national council, and resigned his bishopric to cardinal Caprara, legate a latere. Returning to Bayeux, he died there, Feb. 28, 1820. He wrote, among other works, Méditations sur les Vies des Saints, and others. See Chretien (1807) — Pensees Chretiennes pour Chaque Jour de L'Annee.—Histoire Ecclesiastique du Diocese de Bayeux pendant la Revolution. See Hosier, Nouv. Biog. Generale, s. v.

Biteus, abbis of Inis-colrca (now Inch, County Down), commemorated July 22, was one of the 350 disciples of St. Patrick. It is said that when St. Patrick built a church at Elphin, he left there Assicus.
Biteus the son of Asicus, and Cipa the mother of bishop Biteus (Petrie, Round Towers of Ireland, p. 202), Colgan (Tr. Thmus, p. 176, etc.) says that he was ordained by only two bishops of ecclesiastic birth or education, being really his brother's son. Working with his uncle, Asicus, he made altars, square covers for the service-books, and square patens. One of these little shields was kept at Armagh, another at Elphin, and a third at St. Felart's Church, Donnachmor. He is often mentioned as the bishops assisting St. Patrick, and is said to have been buried at Rath-cunga. See also Lanigan, Eccles. History of Ireland, i, 341, 343.

Bittino, a Bolognese painter, flourished at Rimini in the first part of the 16th century. In the Church of San Giuliano, at Rimini, is an altar-piece, much praised, of the titular saint, by this artist, dated 1467. See Sponser, Bion. Hist. of the Fine Arts, n. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, n. v.

Bit-nur, in Accadian mythology, was the general of Adar, the champion of the gods, and the favorite of Bel. He was chiefly invoked for the protection of pregnant women and for the maturity of the embryo.

Bitra, in Hindu mythology, are the fine tender spirits which are an emanation from a Brahman. They are so light that they never come to rest, and they do not need any nourishment.

Bittle, Daniel Howard, D.D., a Lutheran minister, was born near Middletown, Frederick County, Md., in 1811. His desire for liberal education was promoted by the advice and example of his older brother, Dr. D. F. Bittle. In 1837 he entered the preparatory department of Pennsylvania College, and graduated in 1843. He spent three years in teaching at Boonesboro', and in 1846 he entered the Lane Theological Seminary at Cincinnati. For a time he was agent for the Wittenberg College, and afterwards for the English Lutheran Church in Cincinnati. He also, for a while, was employed as a home missionary in Louisville, Ky. In 1849 he was ordained, and accepted a call to supply the Canton charge in Ohio; in 1850 he was employed by the Miami Synod as travelling missionary in Indiana. In November of the same year he was appointed agent for the establishment of the Hagerstown Female Seminary. In June, 1853, he became pastor at Smithsburg, Md.; in 1853, at Selinsburg, Pa., and in 1855 assisted his brother, Dr. D. F. Bittle, in building up Roanoke College, one year collecting funds for it, and then as its professor of ancient languages. The latter part of 1858 he became the first president of North Carolina College, in which office he remained three years, but the institution was compelled to close on account of the civil war. Removing to Texas, he took charge of a female seminary at Austin, where he taught and preached until the close of the war. Again he was called to the agency of Roanoke College, in behalf of which he labored two years. At the close of 1867 he accepted a call to Shepherdstown, W. Va., where he served nearly four years. In October, 1871, he assumed charge of the Church in Shepherdstown which he was pastor when he died, Jan. 14, 1874. Dr. Bittle was regarded as an able preacher, a thorough scholar, and was very attractive socially. See Pennsylvania College Book, 1882, p. 216; Lutheran Observer, Jan. 30, 1874.

Bittle, David F., D.D., a Lutheran minister, was born near Myersville, Frederick County, Md., in November, 1811, and was a brother of the above. His early years were spent in work upon his father's farm. Under the ministry of Rev. Abraham Pollock, of Middletown Valley, he was converted, and immediately set about preparing himself for the ministry. At eighteen years of age he entered Gettysburg Gymnasium, afterwards Pennsylvania College, and graduated in 1835. In October of the same year he entered the Theological Seminary. Two years after he accepted a call from St. John's Lutheran Church, in Augusta County, Va., where he was very successful, he was called to Mount Tabor Church. This was organized by him. He also organized the congregation at Churchville. Soon after settling in Augusta County, he conceived the project of establishing an academy there, which he subsequently carried into effect. On Aug. 12, 1845, he accepted a call to Middletown, Md., and frequently preached in the neighborhood as well as in Germany and English. At the end of six and a half years he removed to Hagerstown, where he resided about eighteen months, devoting his time to the collection of funds for home missions in Maryland and Pennsylvania, and to the establishment of the Hagerstown Female Seminary, of which he was justly regarded as the founder. He is also entitled to be considered as one of the founders of the General Synod's Publication Society, in Philadelphia. In September, 1858, he removed to Salem, Va., to assume the presidency of Roanoke College, the establishment of which had been a prominent part of his life-work. In 1842, when this institution was an Academy in Augusta County, he had served it in connection with his pastorate as teacher of mathematics. Mr. Bittle was not only president, but also professor of moral and mental science. Under his administration a debt of $8000 was liquidated and additional funds secured for the building. He was the only college in Virginia that did not suspend during the war, but suffered severely on account of military requisitions upon the students. At this time he supplied various churches in the vicinity. Financial embarrassments followed, incident to the war, but with the assistance of the Rev. Dr. H. Bittle, D.D., his brother, the large sums were raised and all debts paid. He died in Salem, Sept. 25, 1876. Several of his discourses have been published. His reputation as an educator was conspicuous. See Quarterly Rev. of the Evangel. Luth. Church, vii, 541.

Bitzius, Albert, a Swiss theologian, was born in 1835 at Lützelflüh, in the Emmental. He was educated at Burgdorf, and afterwards studied theology at the University of Berne, and later at Berlin and other German universities. After serving as vicar in two or three parishes of his native canton, he accepted the pastorate of the German congregation at Courtheul. His literary activity was devoted chiefly to serial works. He obtained a position as writer offered for him by a government for an essay on capital punishment. In 1878 he became a member of the government of Berne, after resigning the parochial charge at Twann, and the last years of his life were devoted almost exclusively to the reform and completion of the educational system of the canton. He died Sept. 20, 1882. (B. H.)

Blaceto, Antoine, a French ecclesiastic, was born at Grenoble, Aug. 28, 1655. He embraced at first the profession of arms, then resigned that in order to enter upon the ecclesiastical profession. Having become re-converts, he translated his Histoire de Cal-vín (published in Paris, 1787). He was in 1685 sent to the province of Vienna, to the general assembly of the clergy. He was appointed, in 1670, director of the devotees of Mt. Calvary, of Luxembourg, and two years later visitor of all this congregation. The abbe Blache did conceal a violent hatred for the Jesuits, and, on some of his writings on Christian doctrine becoming public, he was arrested in 1709 and sent to the Bastile, where he died, Jan. 29, 1714, having bequeathed all his goods to the Hôtel-Dieu. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Gé-

From this period his declining health prevented him from stated labor, though he preached occasionally, as opportunity offered and his strength allowed. He died in Cincinnati, July 5, 1881. He had been everywhere where successful, especially in his Moscow and Cincinnati charges. He was the oldest member of the Cincinnati Presbytery, and greatly beloved by his fellow-presbytery. He was called Oct. 7, and ordained Nov. 18, 1785. Charges were brought against him, for which he received the rebuke of the presbytery, and for a season they suspended him. Conewago, Adams Co., Pa., called him in 1741, and he was installed in May of that year. He began to visit Virginia as a missionary, and was sent to Potomac in 1745. Blackader (or Blackadder), John, a minister famous in the religious history of Scotland, was descended from an ancient family of wealth and distinction, and was born—perhaps in Blairhall, Scotland—December, 1623. He studied at Glasgow under his uncle, principal Strang, son to Rev. Wm. Strang, minister at Irvine, and was ordained by the presbytery of Errol, Perthshire, 1643, where he converted from the Roman faith the earl and his family. He seems to have taken his degree the preceding year. Although episcopacy was in its zenith when he studied divinity, it is not likely that he was ever tainted with its sentiments. Long before he became a minister, prelacy was completely abolished in Scotland.
Blackader was called as pastor to Troqueer, in the presbytery of Dumfries, in 1659, where he exercised a most diligent and faithful ministry for nine years. He rigidly enforced discipline, and completely renovated the parish and the Church. In 1660 the Restoration came, and with that dark day for the Scottish Church, Royalty was made the fountain of ecclesiastical power; every church was dependent on the prince of the blood. Scotland was one after the other torn away, and the hierarchy re-established in the plenteous jurisdiction, and the bishops restored to all the temporal emoluments. Blackader, with many other ministers, refusing to receive their charges from the new bishops, was expelled from his livings, and in November, 1662, removed his family to Glencarne, and still preached in his own house. For this he was cited to appear in person at Edinburgh, a journey he declined, as he did not wish to surrender himself to illegal violence, which was crowding the jails with prisoners, driving his countrymen across the seas in perpetual banishment, selling others into slavery, and filling the country with outlaws. In 1666 he went to Edinburgh for concealment, and his family was forced to lead a homeless life. It was a terrible time; the laws proscribed the common duties of humanity: acts of piety and beneficence were pronounced criminal, and visited with heaviest chastisements. Blackader, a man of human elevation, turned Balien-den, Bannatyne, and Dalzell overspread the country with terror, devastation, and despair. People were made "to groan and weary of their lives," imprisoned in prisons, or hunted like beasts of prey. After the defeat at Preston, persecution became even more severe, and innocent and godly people, including women, were put to extreme torture and torment. From 1657, under the milder administration of Tweedale and Murray, the rigor of the persecution was softened. Blackader was engaged in holding conventicles and preaching throughout Scotland. Itinerant field-preaching became a feature of his public thoughts. The confines of the country were literally increased, until they were universally suppressed in 1679. Through these weary years—still marked by bloodshed and cruelty, which saw the murder of archbishop Sharp and the battle of Bothwell Bridge—Blackader continued preaching and holding conventicles, until, April 3, 1681, he was seized in Edinburgh and lodged in the Bass, a high insulated rock at the mouth of the Forth, off the coast of East Lothian, at that time the most celebrated state-prison in Scotland, and, until the Revolution, crammed with the victims of prelatical cruelty, doomed to pine in darkness and silence until they were plunged to unnecessary privations. After an imprisonment of four years, this heroic and godly man died at the Bass, and was buried at North Berwick. See Crichton, Memoirs of Rev. John Blackader (24 ed. Edinb. 1826); First Eccles. Scotcicnm, i. 363.

Blackader (or Blacader). Robert, an early Scottish preacher, was bishop of Aberdeen in 1490, and was transferred to Glasgow in 1494. He was at first a prebendary of Glasgow and rector of Cardross. He studied at Rome, and received consecration from the hands of the pope. It was during his episcopate, and chiefly by his interest with pope Alexander VI, that the see of Glasgow was erected into an archbishopric—an honor which greatly exasperated his spiritual brother of St. Andrew's, who objected to acknowledge this real dignity, as St. Andrew's had been created by Sextus IV metropolitan of all Scotland. Jealous for the supremacy of his eastern capital, the pope, of St. Andrew's, immediately armed ecclesiastical warfare, which divided both clergy and nobility into factions. The prelates were reconciled at length by granting the new dignity to Glasgow, but allowing St. Andrew's still to retain its ancient precedence. In Blackader's time, about 1494, the declining light of the Revolution was spreading in the west, chiefly in the districts of Kyle and Cunningham. Thirty persons were summoned at his instance before the king and council, as holders of heretical opinions. Among these were Campbell of Cessnock, Reid of Barbkimning, lady Stair, and other distinguished persons, who were nicknamed the Lollards of Kyle (Knox, Hist. ch. 1). Archibishop Blackader went to England with the earl Bothwell, to negotiate the marriage of James IV with the princess Margaret, daughter to Henry VII, performed in Edinburgh, 1503 (Holinshed, v. 465). Spottiswood calls him "a gentleman well descended, and of good knowledge, both in divine and human learning." He died about 1508, while on a pilgrimage to the holy sepulchre at Jerusalem. See Crichton, Memoirs of Rev. John Blackader (24 ed.), p. 10 sqq.; Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 115, 254.

Blackader, Henry, a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the Diocese of Ohio, was rector in Mansfield for several years, until 1856. Subsequently he was rector in Newark, and in 1868 was chosen rector of Zion Church, Dresden; in 1869 he became rector of Christ Church, Ironton, where he removed, about 1864, to Gallipolis, where he died, June 21, 1867, aged sixty-nine years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1868, p. 104.

Blackbourne, John, a learned English divine, was born in 1688, and educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. After the Revolution he refused to take the oaths, thus excluding himself from Church preferment. He was the corrector of the celebrant printed and edited several important works. For some years before his death he was a non-juring bishop, but lived a retired life in Little Britain. He died Nov. 17, 1741. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Alliorne, Diet. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Blackburn, Amos, an English Congregational minister, was born at Pinfold Hill, near Halifax, July 14, 1809, of poor, pious, and greatly united parents, and joined the Independent Church in Halifax in 1818. He received his collegiate course at York. He records that within three months of his entrance he had preached between forty and fifty times, and had walked five hundred and sixty miles. His first and only charge was at Eastwood, where he was killed by a train of cars, Jan. 28, 1864. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1865, p. 225.

Blackburn, John, an English Congregational minister, was born in London in 1792. Quite early he had a strong desire to become a Baptist minister, and for that purpose entered Stepney College; but, his views being undergirded, he resigned his course, and became a student at Hoxton Academy. He entered the service of the Irish Evangelical Society, and for a time labored in Ireland to disseminate Protestant and evangelical truth. He then returned to England, and preached with acceptance at Finchington, Essex; became chosen pastor of that Church, and settled there in 1815—where his labors were very successful. In 1823 he became pastor at Clapham Chapel, London. He died June 16, 1855. One, speaking of his success, here remarks, "His efforts were crowned with remarkable success, both in the numbers, and devotedness, piety and liberality of his flock." He was a prominent man in the efforts to benefit his race. He was one of the projector and secretaries of the Congregational Union of England and Wales; also editor of the Cong. Magazine and Cong. Calendar, afterwards the Cong. Year-book. He published, The Spiritual Claim of the Metropolis, A Lecture on Three Subjects Connected with the Law Enforced at Nuremberg—the Biblical Educator. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1856, p. 208-210.

Blackburn, Samuel, a Presbyterian minister, was educated at Danville, Ky., and went to Illinois in 1832. He labored in Carlinville and Spring Cove. He started to Kentucky on business, and died on the Ohio River in 1836. See Norton, Hist. of the Presb. Church in Illinois.
Blackburn, William, an English Congregational minister, was born at Garstang, Lancashire, in 1797, of poor Roman Catholic parent. At an early age he was apprenticed in a large machine establishment in Preston, and, being invited, he attended a Protestant prayer-meeting, and soon after was converted. At the close of the year 1817 he left Rochdale College, Mr. Blackburn accepted an invitation to the pastorate of Silver-street Chapel, Whitby, where he was ordained in 1821, and labored until 1838, when he removed to Bamford, near Rochdale. After an eight years' pastorate at this place, he became secretary and general superintendent of the Manchester City Mission. The next year, after his resignation and a short interval, he accepted the pastorate of Sobra, where he died, Oct. 18, 1826. In Mr. Blackburn's character zeal, prudence, firmness, and kindness blended in a remarkable degree. [See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1863, p. 211.

Blackburne, Laurencetot, an English prelate, became prebendary of Exeter in 1691, subdean in 1695 and dean in 1705. He died in 1712. He was noted for his learning, his piety, and his charity. He was a man of eminent piety and extensive liberality. His deaconry took place in 1698. See (Lond.) Christian Remembrance, Oct. 1808, p. 634.

Blackett, Cutbirt Robert, an English Congregational pastor, was born at the Abbey Mill, near Durham, in 1796. He became an active Christian at fifteen years of age, and subsequently devoted himself to the ministry. He studied first at Mr. Scott at Rowell in 1829; entered Hoxton Academy in 1825, and Highbury College or Academy in 1826. Having completed his studies, he preached at Burslem and at Stone, and was settled at Southminster, in Essex, in 1826. For five years he preached in a large room, but in 1838 a chapel was completed, and he was ordained to the pastorate. He removed to Burnham Market, Jan. 29, 1838, where he remained till Aug. 15, 1852, when he resigned, and sailed from Sunderland, Sept. 11, 1852, as a missionary to Australia, arriving at Melbourne Jan. 8, 1853. He died there, April 3, 1853. His mind and preaching were characterized by great solicitude. As a man he was greatly beloved, and his consistency of character a theme of praise among those who knew him best. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1854, p. 218, 219.

Blackett, James, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Woodhouse, near Leeds, in 1778. He was converted when twenty years of age. His first circuit was Dudley, 1803; he travelled thirty-six others. In 1841 he settled as a supernumerary in Leeds, where he died, Sept. 29, 1848. He was "a good Methodist, and minister." See West Meth. Mag. 1852, p. 105; Minutes of the British Conference, 1949.

Blackhouse, Sarah, an English minister of the Society of Friends, was born about 1726, and in the twenty-seventh year of her age was converted under the preaching of George Fox. Some years after this she began to preach. Her labors are said to have been highly edifying. She died May 80, 1706. See Piety Promoted, i, 377, 378. [J. C. S.]

Blackhurst, John, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Sheffield, England, in 1818. He joined the Methodist Society in his youth; received license to preach at the age of twenty-six, as such was remarkably popular wherever he went. In 1847 he emigrated to America, and located at Dover, Wis., in 1856 he was received into the West Wisconsin Conference, in which he did efficient work until his decease, Oct. 6, 1859. Mr. Blackhurst was ardent in his attachments, a giant in intellect, and a clear, logical reasoner. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1859, p. 326.

Black-letter Days are (1) holy days recorded in the calendars of Episcopal service-books in "black-letter" type, instead of being printed in red ink; therefore holy days of an inferior character and dignity. (2) In the modern Church of England holy days ordered to be observed, but for which there are no special collections nor service.

Blacklidge, John, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born and reared in South Carolina. In early manhood he joined the Church, served a short time as class-leader and exhorter, and twenty-five years as local preacher. In 1867 he entered the Mississippi Conference, and labored diligently for two years before he was called to a more difficult and responsible part in the service. He died in the latter part of 1870. Mr. Blacklidge was characterized by consistent piety, fervent zeal, and fidelity. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1871, p. 573.

Blacklee, Thomas, was professor of theology in the English College at Douay, and afterwards canon of the Romanist Chapter, formed by William Bishop, in London. He lived about the middle of the 17th century, and was a man of turbulent disposition; many of his writings were condemned by the inquisition, such as, Sonus Bucinum: ... Appendicul ad Sonum Bucinum: ... Tabula Suffragiorum: ... Monasterum Exsuntius. He also wrote De Medio Atque Aequo Status, which made much noise at the time. He was accused of teaching in it that the souls in purgatory would not be released until the day of judgment; that the damned feel no corporeal pains, and that in the state of damnation they are happier than people in this life; that the doctrine of the infallibility of the pope is the mother of all heresies. See Landon, Ecclesi. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Blackman, Benjamin, a Congregational minister, was the son of Rev. Adam Blackman, first minister at Stratford, Conn. Benjamin graduated at Harvard College in 1803; was ordained at Malden in 1814; and resigned in 1827, having preached 678. He left his books, the consequence of dissatisfaction, and nine years afterward sued the town for arrears of his salary. After leaving Malden, he preached at Scarborough, Me.; and in 1883 was a representative of the town of Saco. It is supposed that he died in Boston. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 144.

Blackman, James F., a Baptist minister, was born in Louisiana in 1828. He was brought up to the business of a printer and publisher. He preached for several years most acceptably and with success in the Ouachita region, in his native state. His death took place Dec. 11, 1874. See Catcath, Baptist Encyclopedia, p. 104. [J. C. S.]

Blackmore, Thomas W., an English Baptist min-
iater, was born in Claybidon, Devonshire, in 1799. After receiving the rudiments of an education, he was sent in his youth as an apprentice to a manufacturer in Bridgewater, Somersetshire. Here he was converted, and began to proclaim the message of salvation to others. He labored for a number of years in various places, and subsequently settled as pastor at Hemyock, East Devon. He soon removed to Upottery, where he remained fourteen years. Failing health compelled him to retire for a time from the active work of the ministry, but he subsequently entered upon the pastoral service at Uffculme and other places. He died March 27, 1873, after fifty-six years in the ministry. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1880, p. 290.

In 1856 he removed to Lafayette, Ind., and succeeding to the Northwestern Indiana Conference, became the pastor of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the town of Chicago. Of which he was an honored member until his death, Aug. 31, 1873. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1873, p. 90; Simpson, Cyclopedia of Methodism, s. v.

Blackstock, William, a minister of the Associate Church, was born, educated, and licensed to preach in Ireland. He emigrated to this country about 1794. The Presbytery of the Carolinas report that he was a preacher from the Presbytery of Down, in Ireland, and had been received and ordained by them, July 8, 1794, over the united congregations of Steele Creek, Ebenezer, and Neeley Creek, S.C. In 1804 he resigned, and became a stated supply to the churches of New Perth, New Sterling, and Rocky Spring. Here he remained until 1811, when he was settled at the Hawkins, N. C. He subsequently accepted a call from Tirzah, S. C, and died in 1830. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, IX, iii, 111.

Blackstone, William, a clergyman of the Church of England, the date of whose birth is unknown, figures in the first list of the freemen of Massachusetts in 1660. Subsequently he sold the land upon which the city of Boston is built. He was one of the three earliest Episcopal clergymen residing in New England. As a student he had a considerable reputation, and his library was extensive. Six miles from Providence, R. I., he built a house upon an eminence, which he called "Study Hill," and to which, it seems, he removed in 1631. He preached only occasionally. His house and library were burned in king Philip's war. He died at Shrewsbury, near Boston, Mass., May 26, 1675. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 1.

Black-Sunday is the Sunday before Palm-Sunday, i.e. Passion-Sunday, so called because in England black, dark blue, or dark violet were the ecclesiastical colors used in the services for the day.

He removed in 1829 to Illinois, where he was converted in the following year; received license to preach in 1833, began to preach in 1834, and at the close of the same year entered the Illinois Conference. In 1845, owing to his health, he retired from the effective ranks, and spent nearly all his remaining days confined to his house. He died July 7, 1848. Mr. Blackwell was an excellent man, an able preacher, and a devoted Christian. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1848, p. 284.

Mr. Blackwell was an excellent, zealous, faithful minister, most religious, and well received. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1849, p. 393.

Blackwell, George, an English divine of the Roman Church, was born in Middlesex in 1545, and educated at Trinity College, Oxford, and at the English College in Douay. He approved of the oath of allegiance to the crown of England, and advised the Romanists to take it. This led to a controversy with cardinal Bellarmine. He died in Rome, Jan. 13, 1612. His Letters to the Roman Priests, touching the lawfulness of taking the oath of allegiance, were published in 1597. He also published a Letter to Mr. Cooper (1596), and some other papers of the same subject. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Blackwell, Henry C., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in St. Genevieve, Mo., Dec. 21, 1824. In 1845 he engaged as compositor for the Illinois State Register, and in 1846 for like work for the Illinois Gazette, at Beardstown, where he was converted. In 1851 he entered McKendree College for better ministerial preparation, and the next year united with the Southern Illinois Conference. Failing health in 1854 necessitated his superannuation. In 1857 he was transferred to the Rock River Conference, labored one year, and again became superannuated, which relation he sustained till his death, by drowning, in the Kaskaskia River, July 19, 1860. Mr. Blackwell was a Christian gentleman, modest and retiring, and a self-sacrificing, efficient minister. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1860, p. 330.

After that his ministry was exercised in England, with great blessing to the church. His preaching was of a high order of excellence, chaste and elegant in style, beautiful in illustration, evangelical in matter, and attended with the union of the Spirit. He died suddenly at Burley, July 9, 1864. Mr. Blackwell was genial and conciliatory, truly kind of heart, courteous, and with the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1864, p. 25.

In the Conference sessions Mr. Blackwell was considered one of the wisest of counselors. His knowledge was extensive, and his power of analysis very strong. His style of expression was elegant, dignified, didactic, enrapuring. His zeal exceeded his physical strength. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1870, p. 455.

He was one of the young gentlemen who, in 1652, under the ministry of George Fox, and about the beginning of 1655 "received a dispensation of the Gospel to publish to the world." He exercised his ministry in the counties of Durham, Northumberland, and Yorkshire, and many parts of Scotland. "His ministry was at times attended with power." Late in life he wrote, in reply to William Roger's book against Friends, a little volume entitled Antichristian Treachery Discovered and its Way Blocked Up. He died May 4, 1705. See Evans, Piety Promoted, i, 299-272. (J. C. S.)

Blain, Daniel, a Presbyterian minister, was born in South Carolina in 1773, of the Scotch-Irish race. When about twenty years of age, Mr. Blain entered Liberty Hill, near Lexington, to complete his education, and afterwards took a theological course in Washington College. He was licensed by the Lexington Presbytery about 1796. He taught in the New London Academy at Bedford, and preached regularly to the congregations of Old Oxford and Timber Ridge. He was appointed to a pulpit in the latter in 1805 where he remained until 1813 to consider the subject of establishing a religious periodical, and the first number of The Virginian Religious Magazine was issued in October, 1804. He died March 19, 1814. Some of his contributions to the magazine are as follows: "Christian Zeal," "Observations on the Sabbath," "Death of Voltaire and Mrs. Leech Contracted," "Religious Curiosity," "The Scriptures Profitable," "Professor and Honestus," "Lines on the Dark Day in Lexington." See Foote, Sketches of Virginia (2d ser.).

He was a pastor successively in Auburn (N. Y.), Stonington (Conn.), Pawtucket and Providence (R. I.), New York city, Syracuse, in two churches in Charleston (Mass.), Central Falls and Providence (R. I.), and Mansfield (Mass.). Regarding his gifts as fitting him for evangelistic rather than pastoral work, he preached in many places in New York, Connecticut, Rhode Island, and Massachusetts. We are told that during his ministry he had charge of six or seven churches, baptized about three thousand persons, labored in about one hundred revivals, preached in more than one thousand places, delivered over nine thousand five hundred sermons, and married over two thousand couples. After having contributed liberally to various objects of benevolence, in his last will bequeathed his property to mission causes. He received only what he needed from the benevolence rendered in the war of 1812. His death took place at Mansfield, Dec. 26, 1879. was associated in Cazenova Seminary, and in 1841 graduated with honors at Wesleyan University, Midd-

Blanc, Anthony, D.D., a Roman Catholic bishop, was born at Sury, near Lyons, France, Oct. 11, 1792. In 1816 he was admitted to the priesthood, and soon after, upon invitation of bishop Dubourg of New Orleans, he volunteered for the American mission. On his arrival, in 1817, he spent a short time at Annapolis, Md., and then proceeded south-west through Kentucky. His first mission was at Vincennes in 1818; in 1820 he was called by New Orleans to Dr. Dubourg, and appointed associate vicar-general. In 1830 he declined an appointment as coadjutor to bishop BeNeciere, but in 1833, on the death of that prelate, he was elected administrator of the diocese, and in 1835 was appointed bishop, and consecrated in the cathedral of New Orleans, Nov. 22 of that year. The diocese of New Orleans then included Louisiana and Mississippi, and subsequently Texas. The Roman Catholic population was large, but careless and inert. Churches were few, small, and widely scattered; religious teaching was at the lowest pitch. charitable institutions were almost unknown. The new bishop called to his aid the Lazarists, Jesuits, Redemptorists, and other orders, besides various communities of women, who opened schools and asylums. In 1838 a diocesan seminary was established in the parish of Assumption, and soon colleges and schools. In 1845-46 the lay trustees of the Cathedral of St. Louis refused to recognize his episcopal authority, but after several months' litigation, and upon an appeal to the state legislature, he triumphed. On the recommendation of the seventh council of Balttimore, New Orleans was erected into an archdiocese July 19, 1856; Blanc being raised to the dignity of a metropolitans, was consecrated for the occasion in the Basilica of St. Louis, and assisted in the promulgation of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception. The following year he summoned the first council of New Orleans, and instituted measures for its better government. Bishop Blanc died suddenly, after celebrating mass, June 26, 1860, admired by all for "his amiability of character, and unbounded charity to all men." tsville, Mass., he was installed in Warner, N. H., in 1857. Meeting a want of a defined field of labor, he was installed in 1840; from this charge he was dismissed more than twenty-five years afterward, moveagles. The labors of Mr. Blanchard were greatly blessed. In a revival which occurred in 1838, seventy people were added to the Church by baptism. He remained with this Church until 1886, when he removed to Augusta, and was pastor there one year; he then went to Orono, and took charge of the infant Church in that place, which he has since increased to some seventy members. Beyond this point the writer is unable to trace the his-

Subsequently, having partially recovered his health, he took charge of the congregation at South Natick, but was never fully restored again; the effect of his labors was the cause of his death, which took place on April 9, 1845, he re-

His chief works are two pictures that he painted for the Church of Notre Dame—one representing the Descent of the Holy Ghost, and the other St. Andrew Keening before the Cross. The following are some of his principal works: The Holy Family; another Holy Family, with St. Catharine and St. John; The Birth of the Virgin; St. Agnes Adoring the Infant Jesus. The son of Erca (or Ertha), through the violence of an unknown man, he, with his mother, was put into an oarless boat at sea, and was carried to the shore, where Sta. Comgall and Caimin found them, and gave him his education. St. Blyne was next under his uncle, St. Cathan, at Bute, and then was sent back to his former instructors for priests' orders. Raised to the episcopate, he went to Rome and received the pope's blessing. The true time of his life is probably, at the end of the 6th or the beginning of the 7th century. He was buried at St. Comgall's, and is celebrated August 10. See Camerarius, De Scot. Pott. p. 145, 164, 167; Fordun, Scotich. xi, c. 21; Bolland, Acta Sanctorum, Aug. ii. 10.

Blasius, a Quintodecimian Montanist at Rome about the reign of Commodus (180-192), whom Eusebius ( Hist. Eccl. v, 15) names as having at that time drawn away many from the Church by his heresies. Irenæus wrote to him a letter On Schism (Euseb. v, 20, 21). The appendix to Tertullian’s De Preseptione adds to his article on the Montanists a statement that Blasius "wished secretly to introduce Judaism, saying that the Pasch must be kept only on the 14th of the month, according to the law of Moses." Pascianus, in the 4th century, speaks of him as a Greek, whom he believed to be one of the many authorities to whom the Catachrygians (i. e. Montanists) appealed. See Geseler, K. G. I, i, 292 sqq.; Masuet, Dict. de l’Iren. ii, 59; Schweger, Montanismus, p. 242, 252.

Blath (Irish, flower or grace). Martyrologies give several virgins of this name. Thus, on Jan. 18 is “Soth, Feammor, Blath, and Anna, four virgins of Cluan-grenach;” Jan. 29, another Blath appears in Cart. Doneg.; while Colgan (Tr. Thaum. app. v, c. 19) has “S. Colgan (Annals of the Four Masters, p. 69) gives a story of Blathmac’s Life of St. Blathmac the Martyr in the Benedictine martyrology. Blathmac, the son of an Irish prince, became a monk in early life, and, after being made abbot of an Irish monastery, he fled to Scotland, and came to Iona. When the Danes attacked Iona, Blathmac was celebrating mass, and, refusing to show them the shrine of St. Columba, was slain. Menardus places his death about 793, and on the Cart. Doneg., and Camerarius (Bolland, Acta Sanctorum, Jan. ii, 691) on Dec. 4.

Blaue, Otto, a famous German Orientalist, was born April 11, 1828, at Nordhausen, being the son of a Protestant theologian. He studied at Halle and Leipzig for the medical profession, which he soon exchanged at the latter place for the study of Oriental languages, numerals, and languages; and where Freiberg and Rödiger were his teachers. The expectation of these teachers and of their confidence in their pupil were so great that at the age of twenty-four they intrusted to him the redaction of the Zeitschrift der deutschen Morgenländischen Gesellschaft. In 1852 he was attached to the Prussian legation at Constantinople, and, in close communion with men like Mordmann, Schloßmann, Vogüe, and others, he acquired a rare knowledge of the present linguistic, ethnographical, commercial, and political affairs of the Orient, and succeeded in bringing to light many a valuable treasure of the past of the East. From 1855 to 1858 he belonged to the officials of the German Evangelical Church at Constantinople, and contributed largely to the welfare of the German hospital and school connected with the church. In 1859 he was appointed consul at Trebizond, where he did good service to the poor oppressed Protestant Armenians. In 1861 he accompanied Omer Pasha as member of the pacification commission into the Herzegovina, and in 1862 he was appointed consul at Sarajevo in Bosnia. In 1870 he was made general consul of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and in 1872 he was sent in the same capacity to Odessa, where he died, Feb. 26, 1879. The fruits of his researches may best be seen from the many contributions to the Zeitschrift der deutschen Morgenländischen Gesellschaft since the year 1852. (B. P.)

He was a monk and priest in a Macedonian monastery, at a time when the Emperor Ducas Vatatzes (1185) called a meeting to Nicaea, for the sake of bringing about such a union (1233). Blemmydes took part in the colloquy, and with great skill and learning he defended the Latin doctrine of the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father and the Son (comp. Leo Allatius, Græciae Orthodoxæ Scriptores, p. 1-60). The emperor's son, Theodore Lascaris, made him patriarch of Constantinople, but Blemmydes remained and died in his monastery. After the year 1855 he published a number of pamphlets, with special reference to the points at issue between Judaism and Christianity; and, though his efforts were praised by the one and derided by the other, yet he lived, moved, and died in what he thought to be the object of his life. Blind, Healing of (in Christian art). This is frequently represented on ancient monuments, perhaps as a symbolical representation of the opening of the eye of the soul wrought by the power of the Saviour (1 Pet. ii, 9). In most cases only one blind man, or "man blind from his birth " of John i, 1, is healed. He is generally represented as low in stature, to mark his inferiority to the Saviour and the apostles (when any of the latter are introduced), is shod with sandals, and bears a long staff to guide his steps. The Saviour, young and beardless, touches his eyes with the finger of the right hand. This representation is found on an antique vase, on an ivory casket of the 4th or 5th century, in a bass-relief of a tomb of the Saxon family, in the museum of Aix in Provence, of about the same epoch, and elsewhere.

In a few cases the blind man healed appears to be Bartimaeus, from the circumstance that he has "cast away his garment." (Mark x, 50) before throwing himself at the feet of Jesus.

On a sarcophagus in the Vatican (Botari, xxxix); is a representation of the healing of two blind men; probably the two who were healed by the Lord as he left the house of Jairus (Matt. ix, 27-31). Here, too, the figures of those upon whom the miracle is wrought are of small size; the blind appears to lead the blind, for only one has a staff, while the other places his hand upon his shoulder. The Lord lays his hand upon the head of the figure with the staff; while another, probably one of the apostles, raises his hand, the fingers arranged after the Latin manner a blessing. See Benediction.

Boards, Sacred, were small pieces of board struck together, for the purpose of assembling the people to worship, before the invention of bells. To the present day, the Catholic Church uses such boards in the service of Lent, because the noise of bells they consider to be unsuitable to the solemnity of the season. On the first day of Easter, the bells ring again, to betoken cheerfulness and joy.

Boast. To boast or block out a piece of stone or wood is to shape it into the simple form which approaches nearest to its ultimate figure, leaving the smaller details to be worked out afterwards. Sometimes capitals, corbels, etc., especially of the 13th century, are found in this state, never having been finished. A good example occurs in the crypt at Canterbury.

On leaving, in 1833, he settled for a few months at Elstead and then, offering his services to the London Missionary Society, he was sent a short time to Hertford, for better preparation, and in June, 1834, was ordained at Manchester as an evangelist to the heathen in India. On his arrival in Calcutta he accepted an invitation to occupy the vacant pulpit in Union Chapel, and after preaching a few Sabbaths he received a unanimous call from the Church and congregation to become their pastor. He returned to England in 1847, chiefly to raise funds for the erection of a Christian college at Bhowanipore, a suburb of Calcutta, which now stands as a monument of his zeal and perseverance. In 1850 he again went to Calcutta, and labored until ill-health compelled his return to England. He spent the last years of his life traveling as deputy for the London Missionary Society in the country districts of his native land. He died at his home in Brompton, Oct. 13, 1861. Dr. Boaz was noted for liberality and gentleness. He was sole editor and proprietor of the Calcutta Christian Advocate for fourteen years, and also for several years one of the editors of the Calcutta Christian Observer. See (Lond.) Cong. 1717, at Hlofs. He studied at Jena, not only theology, but also Orientalia and natural sciences. In 1750 he received a call as professor of Oriental languages to the university at Erlangen, but declined it on account of the small income connected with the position. He died in 1797 as superintendent and court-preacher at Bialersdorf. Boleschach is the author of "Kirchliche Verwaltung und Gesetze" (1782), Gesetze der deutschen Juden (Erlangen, 1748), a very learned and still valuable work; *A ufriichte teutscherer Hebräer, über den Ursprung, Schicksal, Kirchenwesen, etc., des jüdischen Volkes, besonders der heutigen deutschen Juden" (Frankfort, 1776). Bodhi (Singlesale, wisdom), is one of the three principles which influence a Buddhist priest. When under its power he is kind and tractable; he eats his food slowly, and is thoughtful; he avoids much sleep, and does not procrastinate; and he reflects on such subjects as impermanency and death.

Bodhism is a candidate for the Buddhism. See Buddhism.

Bodhisattva, is the incipient state of a Buddha, in the countless phases of being through which he passes previous to receiving the Buddhahood.

Bodin, Jean, a French Roman Catholic writer, was born at Angers about 1530. He studied at Toulouse, and died at Laon in 1596. He is the author of a work, Colloquium Heptapleros, published by Subrauer (Berlin, 1841). This work contains a colloquy between a Jew, a Mohammedan, a heathen, a Catholic, a Lutheran, a Reformed Protestant, and a naturalist, in which Christianity is ranked below all the other religions. Another work of his, also a dialogue, and entitled, Universa Naturae Theatrum, was suppressed. See Baudillart, Jean Bodin et son Temps (Paris, 1853); Lichtenberger, Encyclopédie des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.; Gieseler, Ecclesiastical History, v., 140; Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Bodinton, John, an English Congregational minister, was born at Spitalfields, Jan. 6, 1794, of Arian parents. He was converted when about thirteen, and joined the Congregational Church. His father, enraged at this step, drove him from home. The youth soon found generous Christian friends, however, who encouraged and helped him; and at the age of sixteen he began to preach in workhouses and to other small congregations. He received an academical training at Hoxton, and in 1818 became co-pastor at Back street, Horseydown. He immediately became very popular, and in 1815 was called to succeed the pastor of his charge, which position he held till the close of 1834, when he resigned. He died Oct. 21, 1855. Mr. Bodinton was neither eloquent nor learned,—hence, after the arrest of youth had passed, his popularity ceased. He seldom left his own pulpit, and scarcely ever attended any meeting outside of his own circle. See (London) Cong. Year-book, 1860, p. 177.

Bodley, Thomas, a Baptist minister, was born in Bardlesey, Mtd., Nov. 5, 1722. In 1743 he followed the sea for several years, and was in the War of 1812. He joined a Reformed Dutch Church in 1816, and subsequently united with a Baptist Church; was licensed and afterwards ordained in Auburn, N. Y., in September, 1830; preached for a time at Saline, Mich., also at Adrian and Tecumseh, After preaching in one or two other places he removed to Chillicothe, Ill., in 1850, where he preached for a year, then went to Lacon, and in January, 1872, moved to Princeton, and thence to Bradford, Stark Co., where he died, April 30, 1879. See Minutes of Illinois Anniversaries, 1879, p. 10, 11. (J. C. S.)

Bodin, in Norse mythology, was one of the three vessels in which the dwarfs Fialar and Galar gathered the blood of the murdered sage Quaser. They mixed it with honey, and thus prepared the drink of wisdom, or nectar of the gods.

Bodwell, Joseph Conner, D.D., a Congregational minister, son of Rev. Abram B. Bodwell, was born at Sauburnton, N. H., June 11, 1812. Having received his preliminary education at Woodman Academy in his native town, he entered Dartmouth College, from which he graduated in 1833. For two years he was a teacher in the Haverhill Academy, and taught also in Sauburnton for one year. He studied theology in Hingham College, London, England, graduating in 1838. His ordination occurred in the following year in the Church at Weymouth, Dorsetshire, over which he was pastor until 1845. In 1847 he was installed pastor at Bury St. Edmunds, Suffolk, from which he was dismissed in 1856, and returned to America. From 1852 to 1862 he was pastor of the Church at Framingham, Mass.; from 1862 to 1866 at Woburn; from 1866 to 1873 was professor of preaching and the pastoral charge in Hartford Theological Seminary, Conn., after which he resided in Hartford without charge until the close of his life. From 1861 to 1868 he was one of the editors of the "Haston Review." He died at SouthWest Harbor, Mt. Desert, Me., July 17, 1876. Dr. Bodwell published a number of sermons and addresses. See Cong. Quarterly, 1877, p. 410.

Body of the Church is the nare, of which the transpsect forms the arms, and the choir the head.

Body, Mutilation of, a frequent practice, which we here consider only under certain aspects in reference to ecclesiastical affairs. See Cutting in the Flesh.

I. In Beheading upon Clerical Orders.—The Penta- teuch forbade the execration of the priest's office to any of the Aaronites who should have a "blemish," a term extending even to the case of a "flat nose" (Lev. xxi., 17, 23) ; while injuries to the organs of generation excluded even from the congregation (Deut. xxiii., 1). The prophets frequently mitigated the spirit of the law (Isa. lix., 3-5), and its stringency finds no place in the teaching of our Saviour (Matt. xix., 12), nor does any trace of it remain in the rules as to the selection of bishops and deacons in the pastoral epistles (1 Tim. iii; Tit. i). Nevertheless, the Jewish rule seems to have crept back into the discipline of the Church. —The Church witnesses the story of the monk Ammonius having avoided promotion to the episcopate by cutting off his right ear. One of the so-called apostolic canons, which provides that one-eyed or lame men who may be worthy of the episcopate may become bishops, "since not the bodily defect, but the settlement of the soul," the man, leaves at least open the question whether such defects were a bar to the first reception of clerical orders. No general rule as to mutilation is to be found in the records of any of the early General Councils, but only in those of the non-ocumenical ones of the West, or in the letters, etc., of the bishops, always of suspicious authority. The rule of the Church as to mutilations and bodily defects may be taken to be generally as follows: such mutilations, etc., were a bar to ordination, especially if self-inflicted; but, supervening involuntarily after ordination, they were not a bar to the fulfilment of clerical duties or to promotion in the hierarchy. There is, however, one particular form of mutilation—that of the generative organs—which occurs with peculiar prominence in early Church history, and is dealt with by special enactments. The most notorious instance of self-mutilation in Church history is that of Origen, who, in his 20th year, ordained himself bishop of Caesarea and Jerusalem; but he was condemned and sentenced to be deprived of his orders for self-mutilation by the Council of Alexandria, A.D. 230. According to the apostolic canons, while a man made a eunuch against his will was not excluded from admission to the clergy, yet self-mutilation was assimilated to suicide, and the culprit could not be admitted, or was to be “altogether condemned” if the act was committed after admission. A layman mutilating himself was to be excluded for three years from communion. The Nicene Council (A.D. 325) enacted that, if any one had been condemned for mutilating a medical man in illness, by libertinius, or by his master, he might enter or remain in the clergy; but, if any have mutilated himself, he is, if a cleric already, to cease from clerical functions, and if not already ordained not to be presented for ordination. See ENNUCH.

II. A Crime.—An alleged decretal of pope Eutychianus (275-276), to be found in Gratian, enacts that persons guilty of cutting off limbs were to be separated from the Church until they had made friendly composition before the bishop and the other citizens; refusing to do so after two or three warnings, they were to be treated as heathen men and publicans. The eleventh Council of Toledo, can. 6, enacts that clerics shall not inflict or order the mutilation of a limb on any persons whosoever, under penalty of losing the honor of their order and being subject to perpetual imprisonment with hard labor. The excerpt from the fathers and the canons attributed to Gregory III bears that, for the wilful maiming of another of a limb, the punishment is to be three years, or, more humanely, one year. The Capitulary of Aix-la-Chapelle, in 789, and the Council of Frankfort, 794, forbid aborts for any cause to blind or mutilate their monks. See DISCIPLINE, ECCLESIASTICAL.

III. As a Punishment.—Mutilation was no unfrequent punishment of the Christian in the West. Constantine punished slaves escaping to the barbarians with the loss of a foot. The cutting-off of the hand was enacted against exactors of tribute who should fail to make proper entries of the quantities of lands, and against those who should copy the works of the heretic Severus. It is, nevertheless, remarkable that the 13th novels finally restricted all penal mutilation to the cutting-off of one hand only. In the barbaric codes mutilation is a frequent punishment. The Salic law often enacts castration of the slave, but only as an alternative for composition (for thefts above forty denarii in value; for adultery with the slave—woman who dies from the effects of it). See ADULTERY; CORPOREAL INFILTRATIONS.

Even in the legislation of the Church itself mutilation as a punishment occurs; but only in its rudest outlying branches, or as an offence to be repressed. Thus, to quote instances of the former case, in the Richborough collection of councils, supposed to belong to the end of the 7th century. Patrick is represented as assigning the cutting-off of a hand or foot as one of several alternative punishments for the stealing of money either in a church or a city within which sleep martyrs and bodies of saints. Another fragment from an Irish synod enacts the loss of a hand as an alternative punishment for shedding the blood of a bishop, where it does not reach the ground and no salve is needed, or the blood of a priest when it does reach the ground and salve is required. Instances of the latter case have been already given in the enactments against abbeats making their monks, which was, no doubt, done at least under pretext of enforcing discipline. In the Ex transitioning ascribed to Egbert, archbishop of York (but of at least two centuries later date), we find a canon that a man stealing money from the church-box shall have his hand cut off or be put into prison. See CORPOREAL PUNISHMENTS.

Boece (Boyce, Boys, etc.), Hector, an eminent Scottish clergyman and historian, was born at Dundee about 1465. He received his early education in his native place, and completed his course of study at the University of Paris, where he took the degree of B.D. He afterwards obtained a degree of philosophy in the College of Montaigu, but was called back to Scotland to become principal of the newly founded Kings College at Aberdeen, about 1500. It was a part of his duties in this office to read the divinity lectures. He was at the same time a canon of Aberdeen and rector of Tyrie in the same county. He died at Aberdeen, aged about seventy. His principal works are the lives of the bishops of Aberdeen and a Latin history of Scotland, entitled Histories, or Cronicles, published in Paris, 1505, vol. 1, and Ebertinorum (Paris, 1522), and Scotorum Historia de illius Gens Origine (1526). See Encyclop. Brit., 9th ed., s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v. "Boothius."

Boedromia, in Greek worship, was a festival celebrated yearly in memory of the assistance which Iunon, or, according to others, his father Apollo, gave to the Athenians against Eneas. It fell in the month Boedromion, which began in the middle of August.

Boehm, Henry, a noted Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Lancaster County, Pa., June 8, 1775. In 1798 he united with the Church, in 1800 received license to preach, and entered the Philadelphia Conference. After the General Conference of 1808, for five years he was bishop Asbury’s travelling companion and assistant, and served as presiding elder of the Wyoming, at Wilkes, Delaware, and Delaware districts, and then again entered upon the pastorate, wherein he labored faithfully until his superannuation on account of the infirmities of age. On the division of the Philadelphia Conference he became a member of the New Jersey portion, and on its dissolution identified himself with the Western and New York portion. On June 8, 1875, by direction of the Annual Conference, his centennial anniversary was celebrated in Trinity Church, Jersey City. He died Dec. 29 of that year. Mr. Boehm was remarkable for his gentleness of spirit and uniform courtesy. He had a vigorous, well-balanced mind, and showed no signs of speedy departure until his last sickness. He preached fluently both in German and English. His Autobiography was edited by Dr. J. B. Wakeley (N. Y. 1875, 8vo). See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1876, p. 48; Simpson, Cyclopaedia of Methodism, s. v.

Boehm, John Philip, a German Reformed minister, came to America from the Palatinate early in 1726. He had been a school-master in Germany, and was licensed by the Reformed (Dutch) ministers of New York city in 1729, by direction of the Classis of Amsterdam, Holland. Soon after his arrival in America, his ministry began at Whitpain, near Philadelphia. The erection of his Church occurred while he was there, and he served as its pastor until near the time of his death, May 1, 1749. "He was a man of strong will-power and decided character and doctrines." He held different doctrinal views from those of most of the members of his Church, and consequently had to resign some time before his death. See Hartlaub, Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church, i, 275; Conant, Manual of the Ref. Church in America (3d ed.), p. 185.

Boehme, Anton Wilhelm, a Lutheran theologian of Germany and England, was born at Oestorf, in the County of Prumort, June 1, 1673. He studied at Halle, and went in 1701 to England, at the request of several German families residing there, who employed him to the education of their children. In 1705 he was appointed court-preacher to the prince George of Denmark; a position which he retained under queen Anne and George I. He died May 27, 1722. He wrote, Discourses and Treats for Promoting the Common Interest of True Christianity:—The Church of the Prophets and the Gentiles;—The Doctrine of Godly Sorrow;—Plain Directions for Reading the Holy Bible:—The First Principles of Practical Christianity. He also translated into English Arnold’s True Christianity. His writings were published at Altona in 1731, with Rambach's preface, containing also a biography of Boehme. (B. P.)

Boehringer, Emannuel C., a German Reformed minister, was born in Buergach, Germany, May 29, 1823. He emigrated to the United States in 1868; studied privately, and was ordained by the Classis of Philadelphia in 1871. He came to the United States. He returned to Philadelphia in 1863, and established the "Orphans' Home of the Shepherd of Lambs." He died Oct. 25, 1864, only four weeks after burying his wife, leaving six children as inmates of the Home which he had founded. He was a good man, and died universally esteemed. See Scharbaugh, "Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church," iv, 433-438. (D. Y. H.)

Boelen, Hermannus Lancelot, a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, was pastor at Jamaica, New- town, Oyster Bay, and Success, L. I., from 1766 to 1772, and from 1772 to 1780 at Oyster Bay and Newtown. In the time of the Revolutionary war in America, he was in sympathy with the English, and his prayers for the king greatly exasperated the Whig, who were opposed to the English; so great was this exasperation that he left America in 1780 and returned to Holland. His language is said to have been "too pure and high-flowing for the people." He had a stentorian voice, though small of stature. Dr. Livingston desired and earnestly entreated him to attend the meeting for union held in 1771, but he did not attend. The time of Boelen's death is unknown. See Corwin, "Manual of the Ref. Church in America" (3d ed.), p. 187.

Boelwerck, in Norse mythology, is a name which Odin gave himself, when he entered the service of Bangi as a servant, in order to gain admission to the cave in which the beautiful Guineide, a giant-maiden, guarded the poetical nectar. Boelwerck came to her in the form of a snake, and changed himself into a beautiful youth, won her love, and remained three nights with her, for which she allowed him to take draughts of the nectar. He thus emptied all the vessels which contained the costly liquid, and fled.

Boer, in Norse mythology, was the son of Bure; his wife was a Jote-woman, Besela, the daughter of Baul- thorn; she presented him with three sons—Odin, Wili, and We. By these the giant Ymer was slain, whose blood drowned the earth, and from whose body a new world was formed. The bones became mountains and rocks, the blood, the water, and the skull the arched heaven.

Boethius (Bute, Boël, Beode, or Boitch), a Scotch poet, commemorated as the son of Bronach of Mainistir-Bethe, of the race of Comla. He died upon the day on which St. Columba was born, whose birth he is said to have foretold, and who afterwards came to the monastery and disintegrated his remains. The Four Masters give the obit of Brian MacBrouagh, bishop of Mainistir, at A.D. 521, which is generally accepted as the true date. A poor copy of "St. Bute's Life," in Latin, is preserved in the British Museum.

Boethius, Hector. See Borce, Hector.

Boethius, Jacob, a Swedish theologian and scholar, was born at Kila-Socken in 1647. He was successively professor of theology at Upsal, and pastor of Mosse in Dalhagen. He married to a daughter against the unlimited power which Charles XI had introduced. He was arrested and condemned to perpetual imprisonment in the fortress of Noteborg. The Russians rescued him in 1702, but he was again imprisoned until 1710. He died at Vesteras in 1718. He wrote, "De Orthographiâ Linguarum Sacrarum Traductâ: ---Munenius Bilinguis: ---Epitome Logicon Auricelli: ---some dissertations. See Hoefler, "Noue, Bag. Geneâlere, s. v."

Boëtius, Simon, a disciple of St. Fursey, and probably one of the three companions of St. Foillan (the brother of St. Fursey) who was killed with him, and buried with him in the Church of the Canons of St. Gertrude, in Belgium. See Boèthius, Saint.

Boettcher. See Böttcher.

Boetticher, Frederick William, a German Reformed minister, was educated and ordained in his native country, Prussia. He is first met with in America at the Synod of Ohio in 1835. While there he was admitted as advisory member of this body. He visited congregations in Ohio; served two in Belmont and Cap- tains Creek during the years 1835 and 1836; after which nothing more is known of him. See Harbaugh, "Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church," iii, 487.

Bog (Slavic for god) is the etymon of the large number of names of deities joined to this syllable, as Cernobog, Iapobog, etc. Bog-Triglav seems to have been pre-eminently worshipped as supreme god by the Slavonic nations. However, as there has been found not the least trace of a representation of this god among the monuments of the Wendian, and especially none among those of the Obotritian, heathens which were found in the early part of the 17th century near Prilwiz, in Mecklenburg-Strelitz, on the site of the ancient famous Rethra, the capital of the Obotrites, it is thought that Bog-Triglav was an unknown god, and, as his worship did not produce immediate temporal blessings, he was worshipped very meagerly.

Bogardus, Cornelius (1), a minister of the Re- formed (Dutch) Church, was born Sept. 25, 1780. He studied theology under Dr. Livingston, and was licensed by the Classis of New York in 1808, who were killed at Schenectady from 1808 to 1812, where he died, Dec. 13, 1812. See Corwin, "Manual of the Ref. Church in America" (3d ed.), p. 187; Sprague, "Annals of the Amer. Pul- pit," ii, 187.

Bogardus, Cornelius (2), a clergyman of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, was born at Fisikill, N. Y., in 1753. He died from the effects of too close mental activity, and from the seminary at New Brunswick in 1818, and engaged at once in the work of domestic missions in Madison and Warren counties, N. Y. He afterwards settled in small churches in Albany and Schoharie counties—Beaver Dam, 1821 to 1823; Wynantskill, 1826 to 1828; Hoght, 1834 to 1838; Gibbon and Conesville, 1838 to 1842. Subsequently he taught school. He was a man of great mind, and a writer of considerable power—especially in theological controversy. His work on Baptism, now out of print, is a good specimen of critical and logical ability. He was a plain, earnest, devout man, lacking in cultivation and refinement of manner, but well suited to the people among whom he ministered; but he died in 1854. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America, p. 187. (W. J. R. T.)

Bogadus, Everardus, the second minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church in New York, Jonas Michaelis being the first. Mr. Bogadus arrived at New Amsterdam in 1638, with governor Van Twiller, and with Adam Robelnd, Sr., the first teacher, and founder of the School of the Collegiate Church. Upon the reception of their minister, the people, who had hitherto worshipped in a loft over a horse-mill, erected a church edifice near the East River, in what is now Broadway Street. Mr. Bogadus soon became involved in unfortunate contests with individuals and with governor Van Twiller, whom he severely reprimanded from the pulpit. The result was a devil of a quarrel, in which he also collided with governor Kieft, who caused charges against him to be preferred before the Classis of Amsterdam. The governor, who had been superseded by Peter Stuyvesant, and who sailed for Holland in the same vessel, Aug. 16, 1647, to account for his conduct, the wrecked vessel was wrecked at Portland Harbor, near the coast of Wales, and both of them were lost. See De Witt, Historical Discourses, Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America (3d ed.), p. 187. (W. J. R. T.)

Bogardus, Nanning, a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, was pastor of the Church at Heckerberg, Albany County, N. Y., from 1830 to 1833, and at Fort Plain from 1834 to 1835. Not he was stated supply at Plattekill. From 1838 to 1842 he was pastor at Woodstock, Ulster County; Sharon, Schoharie County, from 1842 to 1848; Westerlo, Albany County, from 1848 to 1856; and stated supply at Canastota, Madison County, from 1856 to 1859, and stated supply at Spraker's Basin from 1856 to 1858. He died in 1868. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America (3d ed.), p. 188.

Bogardus, William R., a prominent minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, graduated at Union College in 1813 and at the New Brunswick Theological Seminary in 1816. He was settled in Ulster County, N. Y., from 1817 to 1831, and at New Paltz and New Hope, Orange County, N. Y., in 1831 to 1835. He retired from active life in 1856, and died in perfect peace in 1862. He was a fearless, sound, and eloquent preacher, a successful pastor, and a man thoroughly fitted for his work. Hundreds of souls were converted under his ministry. He was the pioneer of the temperance reform in Ulster County. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America (3d ed.), p. 189; Christian Intellecten, 1862. (W. J. R. T.)

Bogart, David Schuyler, a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, was born in New York City in 1770. He graduated at Columbia College in 1790, studied theology under Dr. J. H. Livingston, and was licensed by the Synod in 1792. He was missionary "along the Hudson and to the North as far as St. Croix" in 1792, and was assistant at Albany from 1792 to 1796. He then served the Presbyterian Church at Southampton, L. I., from 1796 to 1806. His next charge in the Reformed Church was at Bloomingdale during 1806 and 1807, when he returned to Southampton and remained there until 1813. In that year he again left Southampton and was pastor in the Reformed Church at Success and Oyster Bay until 1826. He died in 1839. As a student he was zealous and indefatigable. In many departments of science and literature he extended his researches, and in all he sought truth rather than mere knowledge. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America (3d ed.), p. 189.

Bogdo Lama, in Mongol religion, is the personification of the eternally lasting incarnation of the god Xaka, or Fo. He was one thousand years old before one of reckoning, born of a pure maiden, spread a purified doctrine, and was translated alive into heaven; but his spirit rested upon an innocent boy, who now represents him. See Lama.

Bögehold, Philip Wilhelm Moritz, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born May 24, 1815, at Mulheim, on the Rhine. He studied at Bonn and Berlin, and in 1849 was appointed rector of the Law School at Dierdorf and second preacher there. The many duties connected with his twofold position obliged him to retire to Oberdollau, a quiet place where he could procure his broken health. In 1845 he went to Altwied, and here it was that he commenced his inner-missionary work among the poor and destitute, for which he became afterwards so well known. In 1858 he was called as pastor of the prison at Düsseldorf, and in 1857 he accepted the same appointment at Moabit, near Berlin. In 1863 he received the pastorate of St. Elisabeth at Berlin, and in the capital of the German empire he founded those Christian institutions for both young and old which he endeavored his whole life to promote in the Christian community. He died Oct. 16, 1873. See Erinnerungen an Ph. W. M. Bögehold, etc. (1873). (B. P.)

Boger, George, a German Reformed minister, was born in North Carolina, Dec. 15, 1782. In early life he was admitted to the Church, and in 1796 was ordained and received as a member of the Synod of Carlisle, Pa. During the year 1818 he preached at Rowan and Cabarrus, in North Carolina. While in that state, a period of twenty years, he preached 308 funeral sermons, baptized 1919 children, confirmed 607 persons, and solemnized 901 marriages. After living many years in retirement, he died June 1836. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church, iv, 41.

Boggs, John M., a Presbyterian minister, was a native of Pennsylvania. He graduated at Franklin College in 1840, and spent over one year in Princeton Seminary. He was pastor at Millersburg and Clark, O.; at Paxton, Pa.; and at Independence, Pa., where he died, Nov. 29, 1877, aged fifty-three years. See Princeton Sem. Gen. Catalogue; Presbyterian, Sept. 21, 1872.

Boggs, William, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Belmont County, O., May 17, 1817. He was converted when about twenty-one years old, was educated at Norwalk Seminary, and in 1841 entered the North Ohio Conference. In 1864 his health gave way, and compelled him to become a superannuate, which relation he held until his death, June 7, 1869. Mr. Boggs was upright, straightforward, and guileless, as a man: plain, logical, and scriptural, as a preacher. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1869, p. 284.

Bogha (or Boga), a virgin of Leitir, in Dalaradia, commemorated as a saint on Jan. 22. In Dr. Todd's note, Mart. Doneg, p. 24, he says that Óèugus, in the Feirce, mentions "the decease of the daughters of Cembhail." Among the saints descended from the family of Maccarthnues and the race of Eochaidh are given Sta. Boga, Colma, and Lassara, virgins, with their genealogy, etc., Jan. 22. See Colgan, Acta Sanctorum, App. III, 741; Reeves, Eccles. Anq. p. 237.

Bogie, James, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Capheaton, Northumberland, Feb. 28, 1757. He was converted at fifteen, and died in Liverpool, Oct. 4, 1837. His piety was genuine and his preachings successful. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1838.

Bogos Version of the Scriptures. Bogos is a language or dialect spoken by a tribe numbering about 20,000 souls, and dwelling at the northern apex of the table-land of Abyssinia. One third of the tribe are Roman Catholics, and the remainder are Mohammedans and Abyssinian Christians, but without churches or priests. Other tribes are also represented, such as the fellahs and the Harari people. The translation is naturally in the Abyssinian character. (B. P.)

Bogri is the name of a sect of the Albigenese who appeared in the neighborhood of Cambrai about the year 1225. Many of them were burned. See Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Bogs are favorite saints among the Russians. A figure of some patron saint, stamped in copper, is carried about in the pocket, or fixed in some small chapel in the house. The household bog is usually painted on wood; and in the houses of men of wealth and rank it is surrounded with precious stones, and tapers are burned before it. Among all classes they are held in the highest veneration. The most popular of the patron saints are St. Nicholas, St. John the Baptist, St. Sergius, and St. Alexander Nevsky.

He finally laid aside all regular labor and removed to Buffalo, occasionally preaching, as his health allowed. He died there Jan. 28, 1873. His convictions were positive; his sermons commanded attention. See Presbyterian in Central N. Y. p. 465; Triennial Cat. of Andover Theol. Seminary, 1870, p. 56.

Bohan, Stone of. Mr. Clermont Ganneau thinks he discovered this ancient landmark in the present "Quarature Statement of the "Pale Explor. Fund," April, 1871, p. 105. Subsequently he described it (ibid., April, 1874, p. 80 sq.) as "the most northerly of four five great blocks of rocks, probably fallen from the summit or flank of the mountain;" "very nearly cubical in form, and measuring two metres and a half in height," and "clad in the middle." Dr. Tristram, however, thinks this conjecture, "though ingenious, yet hardly satisfactory" (Ible Flora, p. 94).

Bohemond, Marc, one of the leaders of the Crusades, was born about 1056. He was the eldest son of Robert Guiscard, a Norman, who had obtained by conquest the duchedom of Apulia and Calabria. From 1081 to 1085 he served under his father in a war against the Byzantine emperor Alexis Comnenus. At the death of his father, in 1085, he became involved in a war with his younger brother over the division of his dominions, but he was speedily diverted from this strife by the Crusades. Accompanied by his cousin Tancred, he led an army of 10,000 cavalry and 20,000 infantry, with which he would have besieged Constantinople had he been able to persuade Godfrey of Bouillon to join him. In 1098 he besieged and took Antioch, of which he assumed the principality. In 1101 he was defeated and taken prisoner by the Turks. After a captivity of two years he was released, and he returned to Europe to raise troops. He levied an army in France, with which he renewed the war with Alexius, but was unsuccessful, and was obliged to conclude a peace in 1108. He died at Canossa, in Apulia, in 1111. Boils are medical priests among the native Indians of the Caribbean Islands. They are also conjurers, each of whom has a particular genius, which he invokes. In order to become a Boai the candidate must abstain from certain kinds of meats from his infancy, and, while under instruction, live in a little hut where he is visited by no one except his instructor, subsisting on bread and water alone. He is purified by making incisions in his skin and administering tobacco freely. His body is likewise rubbed over with goat's oil or then covered with feathers. When a Boai is summoned in case of sickness he immediately exercises his office, and then goes into a corner, where the patient is carried to him. After various incantations, of which tobacco-smoking is the principal ceremony, he applies his mouth to the diseased part, pretending to suck away the disease. If the patient fails to get relief, he then turns priest and administers consolations to the afflicted, endeavoring to reconcile him to impending death.

He was an honest, straightforward, earnest man, without guile or hypocrisy. His preaching was, in a sense, the reflection of his personal character. See Baker, Manual of the Ref. Church in America, 3d ed. p. 130.

He at once began to preach, and during the neighboring Sunday-schools, taking also an active part in the Sunday-schools of that neighborhood. In Sept. 1862, he entered the seminary at Andover, and remained there till January, when his health gave way. He died at Keene, May 14, 1863. See Obituary Record of Yale College, 1863.

In Feb. 1805, he left Harpersfield for Dalton, Mass., where he preached about three years. Compelled to relinquish the ministry by failing health, he commenced teaching in Granville, but in 1850 he returned to Harpersfield, by the invitation of the Church, where he remained until the close of his life, March 7, 1867. Bois, JOHN, D.D., an English prelate, was descended from an ancient family in Kent. He was educated fellow of Clare College; became famous for his postills in defence of the Anglican liturgy, and died about 1625. His life was pious, though "a great prelate in the Church did bear him no great good-for will for mutual amissibilities between them, while gremials in the university; the reason of the high name he got in the Cambridge. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), ii. 155.

He became parson of Boxworth, Cambridgeshire, and prebendary of Ely. He died "about the beginning of our warlike disturbances." See Fuller's Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), iii. 187.

Destined from infancy for the ecclesiastical profession, he was appointed successively grand-vicar of Pontoise, bishop of Lavaur, and archbishop of Aix. While president of the States, a canal was built, which bore his name; he also founded an institution for the education of the young girls, and several other useful establishments. In 1789-97 he was sent as deputy of the clergy of Aix to the States-General, where he jealously fought against the union of the three orders, and voted for the abolition of the feudal privileges, and for the annual assessment of the tax. He was elected president of the States-General on Nov. 29, 1790, and, for the second time, in 1792, he directed the motion which gave to the assembly the power to dispose of all the goods of the Church. He proposed the convocation of a general council, and published a writing entitled, Exposition des Principes des États de l'Assemblée. After the session of the constituent assembly, a constitutional archbishop having been appointed to Aix, M. de Boisgelin retired to England, and did not return to France until after the signature of the Concordat. In 1802 he was appointed archbishop of Tours, and a little later was made cardinal. In 1815 he pronounced the funeral oration of the Dauphin, son of Louis XV.; in 1826 that of Stanislas, king of Poland; in 1829 that of the Dauphin, and the discourse at the coronation of Louis XVI at Rheims. Bois, PROSPER (or prior) of the monastery of Mailor, under abbots Eata, is described by Bede (Hist. Eccl. iv. 27) as a man of great virtues and of a prophetic spirit; several instances of his power of predicting events are given, which Bede seems to have learned from Hildebert. Whether may be the truth of these stories, it remains certain that through Bois that Cuthbert obtained admission at Mailor and the tonsure. Another of his favorite pupils was the famous Egbert. Boisil probably died about 664. He was not only a scholar, but an indefatigable preacher in the villages of the north. Relics of him are preserved at Durham, and his memory is observed on Sept. 9. See Mabillon, Acta Sanctorum, O. S. B. Sac. ii. p. 590.

After the conclusion of the Concordat, he was appointed honorary canon of Notre Dame. Boisalde pronounced the sentence of divorce between Napoleon and Josephine, Jan. 16, 1810. He became afterwards titular canon, vicar-general, and director of the monks of the Hôtel-Dieu and the nuns of the Congregation. He died at Paris, Dec. 3, 1830. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. He received, at the close of the war, the appointment of commissioner of immigration in Tennessee, and returned to Knoxville. Bolcan (or olanC) is the name of two Irish saints.

1. Bishop of Derkau or Airthir-mugu, lived about A.D. 440, in the north of Ulster. He was found, when an infant, beside his dead mother, by Darius, a chief of Carsedua; and was baptized by St. Patrick, who later put him over the Church of Rath-mugua (or Airthir-mugua). St. Patrick afterwards sent him to Gaul, from which he returned (date uncertain), and was in all probability a bishop in A.D. 480. Ussher gives the date of his consecration as bishop of Derkau (or Clonderkan), in Dalriada, as 474. A story is told of his having been induced by menaces to baptize Saran, a chief in Dairida; and of St. Patrick's foretelling that for his indiscretion his church would be thrice destroyed. Reeves notes that the Church of Armoy (Airthir-mugua) has had its property gradually merged in the episcopal property of Connor, so that three fourths of the parish have been from time immemorial the property of that see. His day in the calendar is Feb. 29.

2. In speaking of St. Bolcan, Colgan (Acta Sanctorum, p. 377, n.) says there is another saint in Ireland called Bolcan, who is venerated in the church of Kill-ichle, County Roscommon; and that he is always enumerated by Tirechan and Aengus among the presbyters and abots who were disciples of St. Patrick, being commemorated July 4. Alb. Buter (vii, 61) says that his relics remain at Kilmore, where his monastery stood. Langian (Eccles. Hist. Ir., i. 256, 344) calls him Bolcan of Kilmoyle.

Bold, John, an English clergyman, was born in Leicestershire in 1679, and educated at St. John's College, Cambridge. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors.

Boldeatti, Marco Antonio, an Italian antiquarian, was born at Rome, Nov. 19, 1663. Boldeco, JACQUES, a French theologian, was born at Paris about 1558. He was a Capuchin monk, and his oratorical talent acquired for him some reputation. His theological works were sought for on account of their singularity, and for the paradoxes which they contained. He wrote, Commentariarum in Epistolam S. Jude (Paris, 1620); Commentariarum in Librum Job (ibid. 1619, 1631, 1638); — De Ecclesia post Legem (ibid. 1630); — De Ecclesia ante Legem (Lyons, 1626); — De Orgio Christiani libri tres, in quibus Declamator Antiquissimi Sacri Deutereae Eucharistiae Theologiae (ibid. 1640). These ancient mysteries consisted, according to the author, in the institution of the sacrament of the eucharist by Adam, who cultivated wheat, and by Noah, who made wine. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Landon, Eccl. Dict. s. v.

In a pamphlet which he published in 1749, he adopted so far as to give the name of Jacobins to all the Jansenists or constitutionalist. Five years later, he wrote in favor of the oath which the Roman republic required of the institutions and public functionaries, but was obliged to retract before the sacred college assembled at Venice to elect a pope. Bolles, JOHN, a layman prominent among the early Baptists of this country, was born at New London, Conn., in August, 1677. His mother and only brother and sister were murdered by a young lad named John Snowball, leaving him the only surviving child of his father, Thomas Bolles. When he had reached the age of thirty he became dissatisfied with the religious tenets of the "standing order," and joined the Seventh-day Baptist Society, being immersed by John Rogers the elder. Well educated, familiar with the Bible, independent in fortune, earnest in his convictions, and of a proselyting disposition, bold, and venturesome, Mr. Bolles engaged very actively in polemical controversy, and wrote and published many books and pamphlets, some of which, yet extant, prove him to have been fluent with the pen and adroit in argument. A man of so much decision and earnest conviction on the subject of Church and State that he was sure in jail until payment of costs. He received fifteen stripes, and his companions ten each. The knowledge of this outrage was spread far and wide, and, especially in Rhode Island, the land of religious freedom, awakened the greatest indignation.
It has been well said by Hon. John A. Bolles, a descendant of John Bolles: "There seems to be a sort of poetical justice in the fact that justice Backus's (the trial just concluded) grandson, a child of eighteen months at the date of this flogging, became himself a Baptist preacher and the historian of the Baptists." Mr. Bolles died at New London, Jan. 7, 1757. Among the productions of his pen were, A Message to the General Court at Boston (May, 1749);—True Liberty of Conscience, etc.—A Reply to Jacob Johnson's Answer to my Books, etc.—A Brief Account of Persecutions in Boston and Connecticut Governments (1738);—Objections to the Conception of Faith of the "Standing Order." Another of the books of Mr. Bolles is called Good News from a Far Country, designed to prove Roger Williams's doctrine that the civil government has no power from God to judge in cases of conscience. See Bolles Genealogy, p. 8-11. (J.C.S.)

Bolton, Utred, an English Benedictine writer of the first part of the 14th century, was a native of Wales probably, or of that part of England beyond the Severn. He travelled to Durham, became a Benedictine there, and was ingratiated with the abbot, "the promptness and pleasantness of his parts commending all things he did or said;" went to Oxford, where he heightened his learning, and entered into the Wycliffe controversies. Bolton sided with neither party, or consented to both, as his conscience directed. William Jordan, a Dominican and a northerner, now attacked Bolton both in writing and preaching. Bolton, in his turn, came out more openly for Wycliffe, especially in his book Pro Veris Monachis, showing what sanctity and industry became them. Jordan now became enraged, and tried (it seems in vain) to get Bolton excommunicated as a heretic. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), iii. 301.

While serving his apprenticeship he entered upon the work of preparation to preach the Gospel. In 1800 he was appointed as a home missionary in a village not far from Colchester. Despite the popular prejudice and bigotry, Mr. Bolton persevered with his work in a Christian spirit, and at length had his reward. A piece of land was purchased, a neat place of worship was erected, and a Church established. Of this church he was chosen the pastor, and remained in office till 1840, when, feeling the infirmities of age, he resigned, although he continued to reside near his beloved people for several years, and took the most friendly interest in their prosperity. Later in life he removed to London, where he died, Jan. 27, 1844. See Lond. Bapt. Hand-book, 1854, p. 46. (L. C. S.)

Bolzano, Bernhard, a Roman Catholic theologian and philosopher of Germany, was born at Prague, Oct. 5, 1781. In 1805 he took orders, and was appointed professor of the philosophy of religion in the High-school of Prague. His lectures, in which he endeavored so to present the system of Catholic theology as to show its complete harmony with reason, were received with eagerness by the younger generation of thinkers. His views met with great opposition, but he was defended by the archbishop Salm-Salm, and thus retained his chair until 1826, when he was compelled to resign it. Several doctrines extracted from his works were condemned at Rome, and he was suspended from his priestly functions by the pope. He devoted himself to literary work from that time until his death, at Prague, Dec. 18, 1848. His principal works are, Lehrbuch der Religionswisenschaft (Salzburg, 1834, 4 vols.); Wissenschaftliche lehrbuch (ibid., 1837, 4 vols.); Almanach, oder Gründe für die Ununterbrochenheit der Seele (2d ed. They settled in Savannah, and Mr. Bolstra was one of the first and most active agents for the trustees of the colony, and a missionary under the English Society for Propagating Christian Knowledge, while he retained a relation also to the Lutheran Church in Germany. He sustained the pastoral relation to the Church in Savannah thirty-two years, when he died, Nov. 19, 1775. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pul- pit, i., 1; Evangelical Review, ix. 1.

Bona Dea (good goddess), in Roman mythology, was a goddess of a mysterious nature, appearing to have a great resemblance to Ceres, and also is held one with Maia (the earth), Semele, Medea, Hecate, and Proserpina, but really was said to have been named Faunus. The solicitations of her father she withstood, and one night, when she was asleep, was whipped with the twig of a myrtle tree. He had intercourse with her, however, after converting himself into a snake. Therefore no myrtle-tree twigs were allowed to be brought into her temple, and no man was permitted to enter it, the great festival on the first of May being celebrated by women only. The other gods of the Punic cultus is familiar to him dressed himself in female apparel and went to this festival to join Pompeia, the wife of Julius Caesar, with whom he had an intimate relation.

Bonald, François de, a French prelate, was born May 9, 1734, at the chateau of Bonal, in the diocese of Agen. He became successively canon and grand-vicar of Chalons-upon-the-Saone, director-general of the Carmelites, and in 1776 was appointed bishop of Clermont. In 1789 he opposed the license of the press, showing the evil consequences to France. He was elected to the seat of the archbishopric of Clermont by the clergy of that diocese; but the revolutionists of Clermont, where he distinguished himself by his attach- ment to the true principles of religion, and his firmness in maintaining them. Bonald, Louis Jacques Maurice de, a distinguished French prelate, was born at Aumay (Aron), Oct. 30, 1787, being the son of the viscount Bonald. Having completed his classical studies, he entered the Seminary of Saint Sulpice, where he was noted for his ardent piety. Mgr. de Pressigny, archbishop of Besançon, made him his secretary when he went to Rome to conclude the concordat, according to the direction of Louis XVIII. In 1817 he became grand-vicar and archdeacon. He distinguished himself by his preaching in the Cathedral of Chartres during the Lenten season of 1822. For sixteen years he was bishop of Puy, and passed from this office to that of arch- bishop of Lyons, and in 1841 was made cardinal. He published in 1844 against the Manuel de Droits Ecclesiastique of M. Dupin, condemning it as containing doctrines destructive of the liberties of the Church. This created a great deal of discussion. M. Emanuel Arago, commissioner extraordinary in the department of the Rhone, succeeded in driving a great number of monks from the cathedral, and this ushered in a form of government established with Liberty as its motto. In a controversy occasioned by the publication of a book by the abbot Gaume, upon the necessity of reforming the classical studies, the archbishop of Lyons showed himself favorable to the proposed innovations of this ecclesiastic. Virgins Maria (Augsburg, 1476) is attributed to him, as are a Commentary on the Sentences, some Meditations on the Life of Christ, etc. See Dupin, ii, 533.

He was licensed to preach in 1834, and for twenty years did noble work as a local preacher—preaching ten or fifteen miles from home at night, returning at a late hour, and toiling all next day on his farm. In 1854 he entered the Illinois Conference, served one year as agent of the Illinois Female College and one year as agent of the Quincy College, and then entered the pastorate. In 1868 he became superannuated, and so continued till his sudden decease, May 31, 1877. Mr. Bond was en-

He was also some time professor of law at Gresham College. He died in 1676. Anthony Wood characterizes him as "an importunate preacher of the Gospel, who, by his doctrine, did lead the people to rebellion, advanced the cause of Satan much; and, in fine, by his, and the endeavours of his brethren, brought all things to ruin, merely to advance their unskillful and ambitious desires." This opinion was doubtless actuated by prejudice and political hatred. He published, A Door of Hope (London, 1641) — and some single Sermons. See Allbone, Dict of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

See Minutes of the British Conference, 1841.

Bond, Joseph, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Stokes County, N. C., July 9, 1814. Having experienced religion and received license to exhort, he removed to Missouri, and in 1844 was licensed to preach, and admitted into the St. Louis Conference. Between 1863 and 1865, on account of the ravages of the war, he sustained a superannuated relation. He was then transferred to the East Texas Conference, wherefrom he labored with fidelity and usefulness until Dec. 27, 1867, when he suddenly died in the midst of his labors. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1866, p. 283.

From this last place he removed to Romney, N. H., and then to Cornish. About 1860 he removed again to Maine, spending the last years of his life in Jay, where he died July 8, 1878. His ministerial life was a sort of pioneer work. (J. C. S.)

In 1878 he arrived in New York, and was elected rabbi-preacher of the congregation Ahuá Chebech. He was also rabbi of the second congregation. At the expiration of his term, he engaged in literary pursuits, contributing to the Occident of Philadelphia, of which he subsequently became associate editor. Shortly before his death, he assumed control of the Jewish Record, and changed its name to the Hebrew Leader, which he edited to the day of his death, March 11, 1874. (B. P.)

Bondington, William de, a Scottish bishop, was born in 1699 in the shire of Berwick, and was rector of Edelstone, a prebendary of Glasgow, one of the clerici conciliarii, and afterwards archdeacon of St. Andrews, in Lothian, and a privy-councillor to king Alexander II, who advanced him in 1231 to the chancellor's office. He was elected bishop of Glasgow in 1232, and in 1233 was consecrated to that see in the cathedral church by Andrew, bishop of Moray. Bondington was witness to a charter by king Alexander II, at Aberdeen, Oct. 9, in the eighteenth year of his reign. He was contemporary with Allan, bishop of Argyile, and finished the cathedral of Glasgow out of his own liberality. In the last year of his life he introduced into his diocese the use of the liturgical form of the Church of Sarum, or Salisbury, in England. He died Nov. 10, 1257. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 288.

Gregory XIII appointed him as his nuncio to Switzerland and Cologne. He was the first permanent nuncio in Germany, and he there published the decrees of the Council of Trent. He died in 1867, leaving De Reformanda Ecclesiae Decreta Generalia (1598); a work often eulogized by pope Benedict XIV. See Hofer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Boniface, a noted English prelate, was the son of Thomas, count of Savoy, and uncle to Eleanor, consort of Henry II. To the influence of the circumstance Boniface was indebted for his advancement, at an early age, to the primacy of All England. While he was yet a sub-deacon, he was, through the influence of Gregory IX, elected to the see of Bellay, though still a youth. The fact that he was so youthful caused some disturbance. In 1242 he visited England before his consecration, that, as soon as he had been invested with the temporalities, he might regulate his worldly affairs. The see was involved in an immense debt. He immediately enforced a rigid economy in every department in order to bring about a reform. He abolished sinecures, and dismissed all the officers of the archbishop's court who were not interested in living by their work. He stood in the relation of abbot to the convent of Christ Church, and here he interfered in everything. In short, the poverty of the see was the wealth of Boniface. In addition to his anger with the court, for the manner in which the property of the archbishopric was dealt with during the sequestration, he took also issue with his sovereign, to whom he presented his objections to the throne of the king. He took part, therefore, with the suffragans against king Henry, when the attempt was made to force Robert Passelewe into the see of Chichester in 1244. Boniface insisted upon the right of the metropolitan to demand a contribution from the whole province, to liquidate the debt upon the metropolitan Church. Of what became of the surplus above the sum required, the king and the pope might possibly know. In 1247 he went to Lyons, and the military duties and political intrigues of the archbishop of Canterbury prevented his return to England for four years. People became indignant, and it was demanded that the income of Canterbury should be expended abroad. Accordingly, four years after his consecration, he revisited England, and on All-saints-day, 1249, he was enthroned at Canterbury with great pomp and ceremony, notwithstanding his wickedness. Queen Eleanor accompanied the king on this occasion to Canterbury, and was the guest of the archbishop. Boniface had endeavored, when yet on the Continent, to compel his clergy to pay procurations and visitation dues, although no visitation had been held by him in person. This unheard-of exaction his suffragans resisted. He continued these unjust requirements until the people became so disgusted at them that he was forced to admit that a mob went in force and rushed upon the archbishop, and dragged and dashed him by one side of the street to the other, regardless of his cries for assistance. They threatened to tear him limb from limb, but Boniface had entered his barge, and had gone up the river to Lambeth. Here he was safe from all but the malefactions which were shouted at him from beneath the walls. The people called for vengeance upon one who, instead of watching for souls, was a robber of churches. It was added, as a consummation of his criminality, that he was even a married man. When the mob disperse, Boniface, with the permission of the people, obtained his permission to leave England. Retiring to France, he entered Lyons not now in military array, but in all the pomp and magnificence which he thought to be seemly in the patriarch of the West. He established his court and spent his money freely. He exhibited letters in his favor from the king of England, and those accompanied with the usual formal recommendations, conciliated the curia Romana. He admitted that he had been hasty; in short, the conduct of Boniface was wise, judicious, and conciliatory. In 1252 Boniface returned to England with good intentions, but the publicacity was so great, and the conduct of his past conduct, and his reception was anything but encouraging. It is said to add that scarcely any one believed him to be sincere. He was still in England in 1250, and also in 1262. Feb. 15 of the last year mentioned he officiated at Southwark, in the consecration of Henry Wengham to the see of London. Before May, 1255, he had left the country. He returned some years after, but only to continue his troubles. He died at his castle of St. Helen's, June 18, 1270. See Hook, Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, iii, 228 sq.

Boniface, Saint, of Lausanne, was a Flemish ecclesiastic of the 18th century, the son of a goldsmith at Antwerp. He was trained at the University of Louvain, and was ordained, living by his labors. He became a monastic at the monastery of Chartreuse at Grenoble, near Paris. He then went to Cologne, where he taught with success two years. He was then appointed bishop of Lausanne, where he labored to enforce a reformation on the clergy, who resisted, and some, enraged, armed themselves and entered the church where he was celebrating mass, with intent to kill him; but a Frenchman, from seeing his peril, ran through the streets of Lausanne calling for help, and the people, crowding into the cathedral, rescued him. Boniface, in despair, resigned his charge, and returned to Chartreuse, where he died in 1265, and was buried in the choir. A small chapel has recently been erected at Chartreuse by a Recolet father, Francis of St. Brabant, in honor of the saint. The building is solemnized in Brabant in virtue of a bull of Clement XI in 1702. On June 25, 1600, his relics were exhumed by Robert Van Ostebae, abbot of Cambrem. This reliquary was translated to the Church of Notre Dame de la Chapelle, Brussels, in 1736, whence a portion was transported, May 9, 1852, to the Church of Ixelles, of which St. Boniface is patron. He is commemorated by Molanus in his additions to the martyrology of Usuardus, and is not extensively known. His life was written by an anonymous monk of the Cistercian order, probably very little posterior to the death of St. Boniface. See Baring-Gould, Select Lives of the Saints, ii, 948 (sub Feb. 19, Boniface's festival).

Bonifacio of Verona, an Italian painter, boursied in the finest era of Venetian art, was born in 1491. He was the scholar of the elder Palma, and studied the works of Titian. There are some very large works by him in the State Palace at Venice. There are also a number of his works in the churches of Christ Squadre, by his Apostles; Michael Driving the Evil Spirits from Heaven; The Baptism of Christ; The Sacrifice of Abraham. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bonifacio (or Bonifazio), Francesco, a reputable Italian historical painter of Viterbo, was born in 1657, and studied under P. da Cortona. He painted several pictures for the public edifices of that city, among which is The Adulteress before Christ, in the Palazzo Braschi. See Spooner, Biographical History of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouvelle Biographie Générale, s. v.

Bonifacius is the name of several Christian saints and martyrs, besides those specially enumerated at length: (1) Deacon, martyr in Africa under Himerius; (2) Martyr and commemoration in 17 Dec., commemorated also in the Collecta Bonificiani episcopi, Sept. 4 (Mart. Romani). (3) Confessor in Africa; commemorated Dec. 8 (Mart. Hieron.); Dec. 6 (Mart. Adonii). Bonifacius, Saint and Martyr, was the steward of a certain rich and beautiful woman of Rome, named Aglaë, with whom he for many years carried on a criminal commerce, at the same time indulging in drunkenness and other vices. Aglaë at length, touched with remorse, requested him to repair to the East, where many martyrs about that time had yielded their lives for the sake of Jesus Christ, and bring back with him some of the relics of these holy men, that she might build over them a monument and honor them. This was about the year 307 or 309 (290, according to Ruinart), when the Western Church enjoyed peace; but in the East the persecution begun by Diocletian, and carried on by Galerius Maximianus and Maximinus Daha, was raging. Arrived at Tarsus, in Cilicia, Bonifacius went to the place of torture, where more than twenty martyrs were undergoing torment. He approached and embraced them, and implored them to pray for him. Simplicius, the judge, enraged at this, and at his boldly declaring himself to be a believer, instantly ordered that sharp-pointed reeds should be thrust under his nails and melted lead poured into his mouth. The next day, after this horror, he was thrown into a caldron of boiling pitch, he was beheaded. His body was pur-

Bonifacius Mognuntinensis. See Boniface of Mentz.

Bonifacius Queretinus (called also Albonus Kiri- tius) has his history inextricably entangled with fable. According to the legend, he was the pope of that name, of Jewish stock, descended from a sister of St. Peter and St. Andrew, and born at Bethesda. He was or- dained priest by John, patriarch of Jerusalem, in the thirty-sixth year, and four years after went to Rome, where he occupied the chair more than seven years. With a large retinue he entered Picland, and founded churches at Invergowrie and Restonagh, Forfarshire. He baptized king Nectan and court, and, after evangelizing and converting them, among other places, founded a see at Ross-shire, and built a church at Rosemarkie, dedicating it to St. Peter. Here he died at the age of eighty and upwards. A closer determination appears to be beyond our reach than to say that he was an Italian who, in the beginning of the 7th century, came to Scotland to induce the Scottish Church to conform with Roman customs. For list of authorities see Smith, Dict. of Chríst. Biog. s. v.

Bonifacius (Saint), of Ross, Scotland. See Bon- ifacius Queretinus.

Bonifas (Lacondamine). Ernest, a French Protes- tant theologian, was born Oct. 21, 1826. Having pre- pared himself for the ministry in his native country, he spent two years in Germany, and after his return was ordained, in 1854, at Nérac, and took charge of the parish at Salles-du-Doré. In 1856 he was elected to his Hebrew professorship at Montauban, made vacant by the death of his father, and in his inaugural address combated rationalistic criticism and exclusive dogmatism. He died Dec. 19, 1859. Besides his Discours d'Installation, he published a volume of Homélies et Sermons. See Lichtenberger, Encyclopédie des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Bonfass, François, a French theologian, brother of Ernest, was born at Grenoble, Oct. 19, 1837. Being very gifted, he obtained, at the age of twenty-nine, the degree of doctor of liberal arts and theology. In 1866 he was appointed to the chair of Church history at Montauban, made vacant by the retirement of the dean of the faculty, Mr. M. Montet. He died Jan. 15, 1878, having published, Étude sur la Théodicé de Leibnitz: Doctrine de la Redemption dans Schleiermaccher: Essai sur l'Unité de l'Enseignement Apostolique: Histoire des Protestants de France depuis 1861. A Histoire des Dogmes was published after his death from his notes and those of one of his pupils, M. Bois, and also Réseillé de Mémoires Littéraires et Théologiques, by M. D. Benoit. See Lichtenberger, Encyclopédie des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Bonisoli (or Bonisol), Agostino, an Italian painter, was born at Cremona in 1633, and studied un- der Battista Tortoli, and afterwards for some time under M. A. Bonisoli. His works were principally easel pictures of sacred subjects. The only large picture known by him is the Dispute between St. Antonio and the Tyrant Essexino, in the Conventual at Cremona. He died in 1700. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bonitus (or Bonus), Saint (commonly St. Bonet), was born in France about 624. He became referendary or chancellor to Sigebert III, king of Austrasia. The- odoric III in 680 made him governor of Marseilles, and nine years afterwards, on the death of his brother, St. Arius, he retired, but he was recalled when that see. After ten years, scruples having insinuated them- selves into his mind whether or not his election had been perfectly canonical, he resigned his see, and, after living for four years a penitential life in the abbey of Manlieu, died at Lyons, Jan. 15, 710, being eighty-six years of age. See Butler, Jan. 15; Baillet, Jan. 15; Landau, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bonivard (or Bonivard), François de, a Swiss ecclesiastical and politician, was born about 1450 in the canton of Bern. See Seycler, Geschichte der Schweiz, a work which enjoyed many privileges under the government of Savoy. He was educated at Turin, and became prior of St. Victor, just outside the walls of Geneva, in 1510. But duke Charles of Savoy succeeded in depriving Bonivard of all his paternal possessions, with the exception of the priory of St. Victor; the consequence was that Bonivard sided with the Geneva patriots, who at that time defended their rights and liberties against the encroachments of the house of Savoy. Bonivard thought it advisable to leave Geneva in 1519, at the approach of the duke. On the way, two men of Savoy offered themselves to Bonivard as companions, and succeeded in persuading Bonivard to give up his priory, and finally delivered him into the hands of the duke, who imprisoned him for twenty months. In 1527 he again took possession of his priory, and participated in the strife against the duke. He was taken prisoner by the duke in 1533, and was retained in prison at the famous Castle of Chillon until 1556, when the castle was taken and Bonivard set free. On his return to Geneva, now fully emancipated, he was made a member of the Coun- cil of Two Hundred, and endowed with a pension. He died at Geneva in 1570. Bonivard was a voluminous writer. His writings are given by Seycler, Histoire Littéraire de Genève, i, 137–139. Of those published we mention, La Chronique de Genève (Geneva, 1831, 4 vols.):—Advis et Devis de la Source de l'Idolâtrie et Tyrannie Populare (Chaperon and Revilliaud, ibid. 1856):—Advis et Devis des Langues, written in 1563 (ibid. and Paris, 1839). Bonjour, the brothers, founders of a new sect of flagellants, lived in the latter half of the 13th century. These two farmers descending from Pont d'Aillle in Breze, entered upon the ecclesiastical profession. The elder was first made rector at Forez, and brought upon himself the animadversion of his parishioners and the remonstrance of his bishop for preaching a heterodox doctrine. This was in 1775, and he changed his parish for that reason. Eight years after, the rector publicly acknowledged himself unworthy of his position, resigned, and became Bonjour, or Bonjour, Guillaume, a French Augustinian monk, was born at Toulouse in 1641. He was called to Rome in 1695 by cardinal Narsis, and honored with the esteem of pope Clement XI, who confided to him several important functions, especially the commission for reforming the Gregorian Calendar. He was deeply versed in the Oriental languages, and particularly in the Coptic. He died in China in 1714, where his zeal for the propagation of the Christian religion had led him. He wrote, "Discourse of the Patriarch Joseph a Pharao Imposed (Rome, 1696) — Exercitation in Monumenta Coptica or Egyptian Bibliotheca Patrocina (ibid. 1699) — Selecta in Nov. Sacra, Dissertations, apud Montem-Fulcium (1705) — Calendarium Romanum Chronicorum Causes Constructum (ibid. 1701) — De Compluto Ecclesiasticus, apud Montem-Fullcium (1705) — Description de la Legende d'une Pierre Gratuite Egyptienne (inserted in the Frontispiece of the Gospel of St. John, p. 391-392, published by P. Gregori). — Observations sur un Miroir Chinois trouvé en Siberie (published with the letters of Coper, De Epochia Egyptica, a dissertation mentioned by Gravius). Among the MSS. left by Bonjour we notice a Coptic Grammar and Lexicon. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bonnaire, Louis de, a French theologian, was born at Ramon-sur-Aube about 1680, and died in Paris, June 28, 1752. He was priest of the Oratorio, and published, "Paradise de la Morale des Jesuites et de celle des Patins (Troyes, 1726); the publication of this book brought the printer Lefèvre to the Bastille: — Examen Critique Physique et Théologique des Conversations (1733) — in collaboration with P. Jaud, "La Religion Chrétienne Méditée dans le Véritable Esprit de ses Maitres (1745, 1746); a translation of the "Imitation of Jesus Christ." See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bonnal, François de, a French prelate, was born in 1734 at the chateau of Bonnal, in Agenois. He embraced the ecclesiastical profession, and in 1747 assisted as deputy of the second order at the general assembly of the clergy. He was appointed in 1758 bishop of Clermont, and elected in 1789 deputy of the bailiwick of that city to the states-general. As president of the ecclesiastical committees, he protected against the suppression of the regular clergy, and later he demanded, against the voice of the majority, that the Catholic religion should be proclaimed the national religion. On Jan. 1 hr, with Boispelin, demanded the convocation of a Gallican council. After having been one of the signers of the protestation of Sept. 12, 1791, he distinguished himself among his opponents by the zeal with which he pressed the resolutions of the clergy. For this he was obliged to retire to Holland. He was there taken by the victorious armies in 1790, arrested, and transported to Altona. He died at Munich in 1800. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bonnard, James, a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the diocese of Maryland, was born in England. He graduated at the University of Erfurt in America, and engaged in teaching for several years in Philadelphia. In 1857 he resided in New York city, whence he removed the following year to Ashtabula, O., as rector of St. Peter's Church, where he remained until 1867, when he became rector of All-Hallow's Parish, Anne Arundel County, Md., where he remained until the close of his life. He died in July, 1880. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1881, p. 172.

Bonnard, Jean Louis, a French priest, missionary, and martyr, born at Mirecourt, France, March 1, 1824. At the age of ten years his calling to the priestly office was decided on, and he was sent to a large seminary at Lyons, from there to that of foreign missions at Paris, where he accomplished his course in theology. Having been ordained priest he embarked for the Western mission in 1847, and King, and arrived at Mani- ques in 1850, at the time when clergymen were committing such fearful ravages. He devoted himself diligently to the study of the Annamite language, and in 1851 was charged with the two parishes of Ki-Bong and Ki-Tring. He went to Boixayen, was arrested, thrown into prison, and sentenced to death, which sentence was executed. In 1852 in Chinhae he was ordered that his body should be thrown into the sea, at a spot unknown to Christians; but one followed and saw where it was deposited, and it was recovered and conveyed to the Foreign Mission College, where it was disposed of with due honor. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Générale, s. v.

Bonnard, Jean Baptiste, a Roman Catholic theologian, was born in America in 1740. He was taken to France, completed his studies at the college of Fieche, and entered the Jesuit order. He was not ordained priest until after the suppression of this order. From 1777 to 1787 he published several works. A discours, "Sur le Projet d'Accorder l'Etat Civil aux Protestants," which he published, gained for him the protection of M. de Marbeuf, who procured for him the priories of Sermaine and of Harnicourt. He was also appointed grand-vicar of Lyons. He appears to have been the author of most of the bills and writings published by his archbishop, which appealed to Paris to follow his counsels. The energy of the works of Bonnot, drew upon him the animosity of the revolutionists, who imprisoned him at the convent of Cannes, where he was massacred, Sept. 2, 1792. He wrote, "Le Tarteau Epi- tosique Démouqué, under the pseudonym of Kokerbourn (Liege, 1777) — Discours à l'Assemblée du Conseil de Prise du Roi, 1788; — Le vrai Système du vrai Clergé (ed). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

For some time he served in the French army, and in 1829 he was appointed librarian of the palace at St. Cloud. In 1838 he published his "Histoire de l'Église de Béthléem," for which he received the prize of the French Academy. In 1836 he published, in 2 vols., Chrsitoune Cvent, ou la Société sous la Restauration, which was but the beginning of other historical works, that made his name known throughout France. His Histoire de France (2 vols.) went through fourteen editions during the lifetime of his author, and his Histoire d'Angletère received the prize of the Academy. But his main work was Les Réformateurs avant la Réforme (2 vols. 1845), which is highly praised. See Waddington, in the Bulletin du Protestantisme Francais, xxiv, 144; Lichtenberger, Encyclopédie des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Being appointed general advocate at the royal court of Besançon, he became intimate with Rohan, archbishop of that city, and about 1830 he went to Strasburg in order to consult Bautain concerning his vocation. Having decided this question, he entered the order, and was shortly after an appointed professor of divinity deceased in the house of advanced studies founded by Rohan at Besançon. He espoused the philosophical opinions of Bautain, concerning which both were obliged to retract. Afterwards he was placed at the head of the community of St. Louis des Français at Rome, and next succeeded to the episcopal see of Carcassonne by the royal ordinance of Nov. 18, 1647. Then passing to the presidency of the republic at Narbonne in Oct. 1652, Mgr. de Bonnefois delivered a discourse in the Church of St. Just. He was translated to the see of Evreux in 1654, made archbishop of Rouen in 1658, and cardinal in 1683. He has been an ardent supporter of the pope's temporal power, and of the independence of the Church. His fame is equal to that of a public benefactor, one of the favorite pupils of M. Bautain, and wrote an introduction to the Philosophie du Christianisme, a work which in epistolar form contained responses to various philosophical and religious questions. The date of his death we have been unable to ascertain. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

He was reared principally in the city of Philadelphia; graduated from Jefferson College at the age of eighteen, and moved to Georgia, where, in connection with the South Georgia Conference, he continued to labor as preacher of the Gospel, and teacher, principally in the Southern tier of the state, until his death in 1861. Mr. Bonnell possessed a finely cultured intellect, a versatile talent, and a pure, gentle spirit. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1871, p. 568.

Bonnell, William Wilson, a German Reformed minister, was called to the ministry in 1842, by the German Reformed Church at Chambersburg, Pa., where he labored until 1844. Bonner, a German Reformed minister, prosecuted his studies under the auspices of Principal Stoy of Holland. He was aided by the Holland fund; but the sum was not sufficient to allow him to finish his work. He was recommended to the English dispensers of their bounty, so that he might be able to attain "his desired goal." These facts we learn from a letter written to Holland in the year 1757. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church, ii, 383.

Bonner, Richard, a minister in connection with the British Conference, was a native of Flintshire, Wales. He was converted under the powerful preaching of the early Welsh missionaries of the Wesleyan Methodist Church, and entered the ministry in 1818. He sought rest in 1854, and settled at Carnarvon, where the remainder of his life was spent, and where he died, July 28, 1867, in the eightieth year of his age. He taught philosophy and theology for eleven years, and finally became prior of St. Germer de Flicé, where he conceived, in 1696, the project of a work to be called Biblia Maxima Patrum, a compendium of all the best things that the fathers have written on Holy Scripture. See Landon, Eccl. Dict. d. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bonneval, Ruppo de, a French theologian, brother of Sixte Louis Constant, succeeded M. de Beaumarchais in the episcopal see of Senez, and, like his brother, showed himself very hostile to the principles of the revolution. He left France and sojourned for a long time at Viterbo, where the pope bestowed on him a pension. At the period of the first Concordat he resigned the bishopric of Senez, and went to Rome, where he was appointed archbishop of Arles, returned to France in 1814, and died in 1830. See Hoefer, Nouv. Mr. Bonnissal's endowments were of a solid order. His preaching was varied in its character. He read his study by workman. See (Lond.) Cong. Yearbook, 1867, p. 271.

BONNUS, Hermann, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born in 1504 at Quackenbrück, in the principality of Osnabrück. He studied at first in Münster, under the cathedral provost, Rudolph von Lange. From 1521 to 1525 he attended the lectures of Luther and Zwingli at Wittenberg, and in 1526 he remarried to Margaretha Grösswalde, where he labored for the propagation of the pure Gospel. In 1530 he accepted a call to Liebek as rector of the newly founded school of St. Mary, and in 1531 he was appointed superintendent there. Amid many difficulties he succeeded in introducing a fixed evangelical order for the city of Liebek, and his catechism, which was first published in 1539, was often republished. In 1543 he was called to his native country to labor in behalf of the Reformation. Having completed his work there, he returned towards the end of the same year to Liebek. In 1545 he published the Liebek hymn-book, entitled Enchiriōdion gesiitge lede und Gebetsbuch, an nove gebetet von M. Luther. He died Feb. 12, 1548. His motto was, "Spes mea unica Christus." He pursued his studies at Turin, where he obtained in 1768 the chair of canonical institution, and in 1768 that of canonical law. From this time he became known by different works in which he defined the boundary between ecclesiastical and civil power. He wrote a book about the civil and the ecclesiastical power, and the county of Nice having been occupied by the French army, the abbots Bono and some other prelates declared themselves favorably to the revolution. The University of Turin was closed, and Bono was obliged to resign himself to a life of retirement. He took advantage of this opportunity to write the preface of the edition of a work by Leibnitz, published at Geneva in 1797. After the occupation of Piedmont by the French in 1798 he was made president of the provisional government. He died March, 1799. He wrote, De Potestate Ecclesiae tum Principe seu Jurisdictione (about 1675); — De Potestate Principis circa Matrimonii (1788); — De Crimenibus Ecclesiasticis. See Hofer, Now. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bono, a Scotch saint, In the Register of the Great Seal, b. 36, No. 72 (MS, General Register House, Edinburgh), there is a confirmation by king James VI. of Scotland of a charter granted 1482 to dominion Thomam Wemis capellani capellanie Sancti Bonici Custos, in the manor of LOWER NIEVETS, and the advowson. In the original charter the saint is called Bono, "capellan capelle Sancti Bonoci," and is probably St. Bonifans, the bishop who accompanied St. Boni- face to Pictland. His relics were at Leuchars, Fife- shire.

Bononi, Giovanni Francesco, an Italian painter, was born in Oct. 6, 1586. He studied at Bologna and Pavia, and afterwards went to Rome, where he was patronized by cardinal Carlo Borromeo, who resigned the abbey of Nonantula in his favor. Popes Gregory XIII and Sixtus V employed him as legate, and in 1581 he was sent to Germany to settle the affair of the archbishopric of Cologne. He deposed the archbishop elector, Gerhard Truchses, of Walspur, and installed in his place Eberhard of Liece. He was afterwards legate in Flanders, and died at Liege, Feb. 26, 1587. Cardinal Borromeo had bequeathed his MSS. to Bononi, who wrote the life of his patron, Vita et Obitus Caroli Borromei (Cologne, 1587). He also composed a poem on the same subject, Borromensis libri is (Milan, 1589); and a sonnet on the great victory gained by Don Juan of Austria over the Turk's forces at Lepanto, 1571, En- chanteris um Victoriam ad Echinadas Partam (Milan, 1589). He afterwards spent some time at Bologna, after which he went to Rome, and then to Venice. He died in 1631. His smaller works exhibit so much of the style of Caracci, that he was considered the Caracci of Ferrara. His best work is the Feast of Herod, in the Church of St. Benedicto, and next in value is his Miracle at Cana, in the refectory of the Certosini at Ferrara. Many other works of this painter are to be found in the public edifices of Ferrara.

Bonosius, Saint and Martyr, of Antioch, was an officer of the Herculian band, in the time of Julian the Apostate. This emperor had removed from the imperial standard (laborum) the cross and sacred name, which Constantine had ordered to be borne. Bonosius and Maximilian persisted in retaining these standards, and were beaten with loaded clubs, and thrown into boiling pitch; after which they were beheaded, with some other martyrs, among whom are named Jovianus and Herculanus, about the end of December, 362. Their festival is, however, kept on Aug. 21. The Acts of these saints, given by Ruiart, are probably authentic, although not original. See Butler, Aug. 21; Baillot, Aug. 21; Landou, Ecles. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Now. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Books. As these in ancient times were always in MS. form, the treatment of this subject necessarily resolves itself into a consideration of writing. We give the following particulars in addition to those under that head. This is an art by which facts or ideas are communicated from one person to another by means of graphic signs, such as symbols or letters.

I. Origin of Writing.—It has been a generally received and popular opinion that writing was first used and imparted to mankind when God wrote the Ten Commandments on the tables of stone; but the silence of Scripture upon this subject would rather suggest that so necessary an art had been known long before that time, or otherwise the sacred historian would probably have added this extraordinary and divine revelation to the other parts of his information respecting the transactions on Mount Sinai.

It is a simple fact, however, that although, with respect to other arts, as, for instance, those of music and metal-working, the Hebrews have assigned the honor of their discovery to the heroes of a remote antiquity, there is no trace or tradition whatever of the origin of letters, a discovery many times more remarkable and important than either of these. Throughout the book of Genesis there is not a single allusion to writing, either direct, or even to the practice or to the existence of writing. The word נַקִּית, kath'ah, "to write," does not once occur; none of its derivatives are used; and נַקִּית, נַקִּית, "a book," is found only in a single passage (tien, v. 1), and there not in a connection which involves the supposition that the art of writing was known at the time to which it refers. The signet of Judah (xxxviii, 18, 20) which had probably some device engraved upon it, was the signet's ring (v. 20), and which Joseph was invested, have been appealed to as indicating a knowledge quite consistent with the existence of writing. But as there is nothing to show that the devices upon these rings, supposing them to exist, were written characters, or in fact anything more than emblematical designs, they cannot be considered as throwing much light upon the question. That the Egyptians in the time of Joseph were acquainted with writing of a certain kind there is other evidence to prove, but there is nothing to show that up to this period the knowledge extended to the Hebrew family. At the same time there is no evidence against it. The instance brought forward by Hengstenberg to prove that "signets commonly bore alphabetic writings," is by no means so decisive as he would have it appear. It is Exod. xxxix, 30: "And they made the plate of the holy crown of pure gold, and wrote upon it a writing of the engravings of a signet, 'Holiness to the Lord.'" That is, this inscription was engraved upon the plate as the device is engraved upon a signet, in intaglio; and the expression has reference to the manner of engraving, and not to the figures engraved, and therefore cannot be appealed to as proving the existence of alphabetic characters upon the signet or Pharaoh's ring. Writing is first distinctly mentioned in xvii, 14, and the connection clearly implies that it was not then employed for the first time, but was so familiar as to be used for historic records. Moses is commanded to preserve the memory of Amalek's onslaught in the desert by committing it to writing. "And Jehovah said unto Moses, Write this for a memorial in the book (not 'it,' as in the A. V.), and rehearse it in the ear of Joshua." It is clear that some special book is here referred to, perhaps, as Aben-Ezra suggests, the book of the wars of Jehovah, or the book of Jashar, or one of the many documents of the ancient Hebrews which have long since perished. Or it may have been the book in which Moses wrote the words of Jehovah (Exod. xxiv, 4), that Joshua was bidden to study in charge of the ark. The writers of the testament are said to be "written by the finger of God" (xxxii, 18) on both sides, and "the writing was the writing of God, graven upon the tables" (xxxii, 15). It is not clear whether the passage in xxxiv, 28 implies that the second tables were written by God himself. The writing of the gem of the high-priest's breastplate with the names of the children of Israel (xxxviii, 11) and the inscription upon the mitre (xxxix, 30), have to do more with the art of the engraver than of the writer, but both imply the existence of alphabetic characters. The next allusion is not so clear. The Israelites were forbidden, in imitation of the idolatrous nations, to put any "brand" (lit. "writing of burning") upon themselves. The figures thus branded upon the skin might have been alphabetic characters, but they were more probably emblematical devices, symbolizing some object of worship; for the root קְטַלֵּב, katlib (to write) is applied to picture-drawing (Judg. viii, 14), to mapping out a country (Josh. xviii, 8), and to plan-drawing (1 Chron. xxviii, 19). It does not seem, therefore, that the edicts written by the priests in the book, as before, and blotted out with water (Num. v, 23). This proceeding, though principally distinguished by its symbolical character, involves the use of some kind of ink, and of a material on which the curses were written which would not be destroyed by water. The writing on door-posts and on walls alluded to in Deut. vi, 9; xi, 20, though perhaps to be taken figuratively rather than literally, implies certainly an acquaintance with the art and the use of alphabetic characters. Hitherto, however, nothing has been said of the application of writing to the purposes of ordinary life, or of the knowledge of the art among the common people. Up to this point such knowledge is only attributed to Moses and the priests. From Deut. xxiv, 1, 3, however, it would appear that it was extended to others. A man who wished to be separated from his wife for her infidelity, could relieve himself by a summary process. "Let him write her a bill (םֹפָר, sopher, "a book") of divorce, and give it in her hand, and send her out of his house." It is not absolutely necessary that the edicts written by the priests be an accomplishment possessed by every Hebrew citizen, though there is no mention of a third party; and it is more probable that these "bills of divorce," though apparently so informal, were the work of professional scribes. It was enjoined as one of the duties of the king (xxvi, 16), that he should transcribe the book of the law for his own private study, and we shall find hereafter in the history that distinct allusions to writing occur in the case of several kings. The remaining instances in the Pentateuch are the writing of laws upon stone covered with plaster, upon which while soft the inscription was cut (Deut. xxvii, 3, 8), the writing of the song of Moses (xxxii, 22), and of the law in a book which was placed in the side of the ark (xxxii, 24). One of the first acts of Joshua on entering the Promised Land was to inscribe a copy of the law on the stones of the altar on Mount Ebal (Josh. viii, 32). The survey of the land was drawn out in a book (xxviii, 9). In the time of the Judges we first meet with a professional scribe (םֹפָר, sopher), in his important capacity as marshal of the host of warriors (Judg. v, 14), with his staff (A. V. "pen" of office. Ewald (Post. Bibl. i, 129) regards sopher in this passage as equivalent to בֹּדֶד, bode, "judge," and certainly the context implies the high rank which the art of writing conferred upon its possessor. Later on in the history we read of Samuel writing in "the book" the manner of the kingdom (1 Sam. x, 25); but it is not till the reign of David that we hear for the first time of writing being used for the purposes of ordinary communication. The letter (lit. "book") which contained Uriah's death-warrant was written by David, and must have been intended for the eye of the king. Joshua was in charge of this writing, and probably to write himself, though his message to the king, conveying the intelligence of Uriah's death, was a verbal one (2 Sam. xi, 14, 15). If we examine the instances in which writing is mentioned in connexion with individuals, we shall find that in all cases the writers were men of high rank. In the Pentateuch the knowledge of the art is attributed to Moses, Joshua, and the priest alone. Samuel, who was educated by the high-priest, is mentioned as one of the earliest historians (1 Chron. xxix, 29), as well as Nathan the prophet (2 Chron. ix, 29), Shemariah the prophet, Ido the seer (xii, 15; xiii, 22), and Jehu the son of Hanani (xx, 24). Letters were written by Zechariah in the name of Ahaz and sealed with his seal (1 Kings xxi, 8, 9, 11); by Jehu (2 Kings xi, 6); by Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxix, 1); by Rabshakeh the Assyrian general (xxxii, 17); by the Persian satrapa (Ezra iv, 6, 7, 8); by Sanballat (Neh. vi, 9), Tobiah (vi, 19), Haman (Esth. viii, 5), Mordecai and others (Esth. x, 26). The prophet Haggai wrote to Ahaz (2 Chron. xxxii, 2); Isaiah wrote some of the history of his time (xxvi, 22); Jeremiah committed his prophecies to writing (Jer. li, 60), sometimes by the help of Baruch the scribe (xxxvi, 4, 32); and the false prophet, Shemariah the Nehemiahite, endeavored to undermine Jeremiah's influence by the letters which he wrote to the high-priest (xxxii, 30). In Isa. xxix, 11, 12, there is clearly a distinction drawn between the man who was able to read and the man who was not, and it seems a natural inference from what has been said that the accomplishments of reading and writing were not widely spread among the people, when we find that they are universally attributed to those of high rank or education, kings, priests, prophets, and professional scribes. In addition to these instances in which writing is directly mentioned, an indirect allusion to its early existence is supposed to be found in the name of certain officers of the Hebrews in Egypt, סֹפָהִּים, soterim, Sept. γραμματικός (Exod. v, 6, A. V. "officers"). The root of this word has been sought in the Arabic satora, "to write," and its original meaning is believed to be "writers," or "scribes;" an explanation adopted by Conze, Gunkel, and Litzmann, though he rejected it in his Geschichte der hebräischen Sprache und Schrift. In the name Kirjath-Sepher (Hoofton, Josh. xv, 15) the indication of a knowledge of writing among the Phenicians is more distinct. Hitzig conjectures that the town may have derived its name from the discovery of the art, for the Hitittites, a Canaanitish race, inhabited that region, and the term Hititate may possibly have its root in the Arabic chatuta "to write." The Hebrews, then, a branch of the great Semitic family, being in possession of the art of writing, according to their own historical records, at a very early period, the further questions arise, what character they made use of, and whence they obtained it. It is scarcely possible in the present day to believe that, two centuries ago, learned men of sober judgment seriously maintained, almost as an article of faith, that the square character was known to us, and by remote antiquity, an Augustan parentage, it is of comparatively modern date, and has been formed from a more ancient type by a gradual process of development, the steps of which may approximately be indicated. What, then, was this ancient type? Most probably the Phoenician. To the Phoenicians, the daring seamen and adventurous colonizers of the ancient world, tradition assigned the honor of the invention of letters (Pliny, v, 12). This tradition may, indeed, in part, be evidenced as not probably originated with the Greeks, it shows that, to them at least, the Phoenicians were the inventors of letters, and that these were introduced into Europe by means of that intercourse with Phoenicia which is implied in the legend of Cadmus, the man of the East. The Phoenicians companions of this hero, according to Herodotus (v, 30), received the alphabet from Egypt. From this, among others the use of letters, which hitherto they had not possessed. So Lucan, Phars. iii, 220: " Phoenice primit, fame si credimus, and Manusrum radinas vorem signare ignara.

Pliny (vii, 56) was of opinion that letters were of Assyrian origin, but he mentions as a belief held by others that they were discovered among the Egyptians by Mercury, or that the Syrians had the honor of the invention. The last-mentioned theory is that given by Diodorus Siculus (v, 74), who says that the Syrians invented letters, and from them the Phoenicians, having learned them, introduced them into Greece. But to the other hand, according to Tacitus (Ann. xi, 14), Egypt was believed to be the source whence the Phoenicians derived their knowledge. Be this as it may, the voice to which tradition represents the Phoenicians as the disem-ninators, if not the inventors, of the alphabet. Whether it came to them from an Aryan or Egyptian source, or can at best but be the subject of conjecture. It may, however, be reasonably inferred that the ancient Hebrews derived from, or shared with, the Phoenicians the knowledge of writing and the use of letters. The two nations spoke languages of the same Semitic family; they were closely connected in geographical pos-tion; all circumstances combine to render it probable that the ancient Hebrew alphabet was the common possession both of Hebrews and Phoenicians, and this probability is strengthened by the results of modern investigation into the Phoenician inscriptions which have of late years been brought to light. The names of the Hebrew letters indicate that they must have been the invention of a Semitic people, and that they were moreover a pastoral people may be inferred from the same evidence. Such names as Aleph (an oz), Gimel (a camel), Lamed (an oz-goud), are most naturally explained by this hypothesis, which necessarily assumes a common Semitic origin. In some inscriptions the Hebrews claim to their invention. If, as has been conjectured, they took the first idea of writing from the Egyptians, they would at least have given to the signs which they invented the names of objects with which they themelves were familiar. So far from this being the case, the letters of the Hebrew alphabet contain no trace whatever of ships or seafaring matters; on the contrary, they point distinctly to an inland and pastoral people. The Semitic and Egyptian alphabets have this principle in common, that the object whose name is given to a letter was taken originally to indicate the letter which begins the name; but this fact alone is insufficient to show that the Semitic races borrowed their alphabet from Egypt, or that the principle thus held in common may not have been the possession of other nations of a still earlier date than the Egyptians.

The phonetic use of hieroglyphics," says Mr. Kenrick,
"was the common possession of the Phoenicians, as the Phoenicians were, a simplification of the cumbrous system of the Egyptians, by dispensing altogether with the pictorial and symbolical use, and assigning one character to each sound, instead of the multitude of phonemes which made the reading of the hieroglyphics so difficult; and the use of hieroglyphics was, as the Phoenicians thought, no less advantageous to the Hyksos, in Egypt might afford an opportunity for this adaptation, or it might be brought about by commercial intercourse. We cannot, however, trace such a resemblance between the earliest Phoenician alphabet known to us, and the phonetic characters of Egypt, as to give any certainty to this conclusion " (Phoenicia,
p. 164, 165).

There were three kinds of writing practised in Egypt:
1st. The hieroglyphical, or sacred sculptured characters;
2d. The hieratic, or sacerdotal, which was written in the hieroglyphical alphabet, and used for writing in a more general use, Lipsius, in "The Annals of Archaological Correspondence" (Rome, 1887), maintains that the Egyptians had two colloquial dialects in which they were very distinct; the classical or sacerdotal, and the hieratic, or hieroglyphical. The latter was used in a more popular style, and was only used in writing for any consequence was made without the voucher of a writ-en document” (Wilkinson, i, 183). On a tomb said to have been built about the time the Pyramids were correct, is seen the representation of a steward giving an account of the number of his master’s flocks and herds (iv, 131). The scribes and stewards, who were employed in domestic suits, convoying and farming, could not have used the sacred characters for their affairs, nor could they have been understood by the people generally if they had; it may, therefore, be concluded that the enochial writing was that in popular practice.

II. Writing materials, etc. — The oldest documents which contain the writing of a Semitic race are probably the bricks of Nineveh and Babylon on which are impressed the cuneiform Assyrian inscriptions. Inscribed bricks are mentioned by Pliny (vii, 56) as used for astronomical observations by the Babylonians. There is, however, no evidence that they were ever employed by the Hebrews (the case of Ezekiel [iv, i] is evidently an exception), who certainly at a very early period practiced the more difficult but not more durable method of writing on stone (Exod. xxiv, 12; xxxi, 18; xxxii, 15; xxxiv, 1, 28; Deut. x, 1; xxxiv, 1; Josh. viii, 22), on which inscriptions were cut with an iron instrument (Job xix, 24; Jer. xvii, 1). They were, moreover, acquainted with the art of engraving upon metal (Exod. xxxviii, 36) and gems (xxxviii, 9). Wood was used upon some occasions (Num. xvii, 3; comp. Homer, Iliad, vii, 175), and writing-tablets of boxwood are mentioned in 2 Esdr.

xiv, 24. The “lead,” to which allusion is made in Job xix, 24, is supposed to have been poured when melted into the cavities of the stone made by the letters of an inscription, in order to render it durable, and does not appear ever to have been used by the Hebrews as a writing material, like the γέφυρα μολέκλωσαν at Thebes, on which were written Hesiod’s Works and Days (Pausanias, ix, 81, 4; comp. Pliny, xiii, 21). Copper was used for the same purpose. M. Botta found traces of it in letters on the pavement slabs of Khorsabad (Layard, Nineveh, i, 188). Inscriptions and documents which were intended to be permanent were written on tablets of bitumen (Pliny, viii, 22; xiv, 27), but from the manner in which they are mentioned it is clear that their use was exceptional.

It is probable that the most ancient as well as the most common material which the Hebrews used for writing was dressed skin in some form or other. We may perhaps know that the sacred or sacerdotal writing of the Hebrews (Exod. xxxv, 5; Levit. xii, 48), and they may have acquired the knowledge of the art from the some of these bearing the names of kings who ruled Egypt about the period of the Exodus, or 3200 years ago" (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt, iii, 155). Perhaps the Hebrews may have borrowed, among their other acquirements, the use of papyrus from the Egyptians, but of this we have no positive evidence. Papyri are found of the most remote Pharaonic age (Ibid. 148), so that Pliny is undoubtedly in error when he says that the papyrus was not used as a writing-material before the time of Alexander the Great (xiii, 21). He probably intended to indicate that this was the date of its introduction into Egypt. In the Bible the only allusions to the use of papyrus are in 2 John, 12, where παπυρος occurs, which refers especially to papyrus paper, and S. MacC. iv, 20, where γράφωμαι is found in the same sense. In Josephus (Ant. iii, 11, 6) the trial of adultery is made by writing the name of God on a skin, and the seventy men who were sent to Tepolymer from Jerusalem by the high-priest Eleazar, to translate the Law into Greek, took with them the skins on which the Law was written in golden characters (Ant. xi. 3, 10). The oldest Persian annals were written on skins (Diod. Sic. ii, 82), and these appear to have been most frequently used by the Shemitic races, if not peculiar to them. Of the byzans, which was used in India before the time of Alexander (Strabo, x, 717), and the palm-leaves mentioned by Pliny (xii, 23) there is no trace among the Hebrews, although we know that the Arabs wrote their earliest copies of the Koran upon the roughest materials, as stones, the shoulder-bones of sheep, and palm-leaves (De Sacy, Mém. de l'Acad. des Inscript., i, 307). Herodotus, after telling us that the Ionians learned the art of writing from the Phoenicians, adds that they called their books skins (τους βιβλοὺς διφθηρας), because they made use of sheep-skins and goat-skins when short of paper (βιβλος). Among the Cypriots, a writing-master was called διφθηραφέρος. Parchment was used for the MSS. of the Pentateuch in the time of Josephus, and the μυμβαρα of 2 Tim. iv, 13, were skins of parchment. It was one of the provisions in the Talmud that the Law should be written on the skins of clean animals, tame or wild, or even of clean birds. There are three kinds of skins distinguished, on which the roll of the Pentateuch may be written: 1. λυτός, keph (Mrg. ii, 2; Shabb. viii, 3; 2. μυμβαρα = διφθηρα or διφθηρας; and 3. γερικ, geril. The last is made of the undivided skin, after the hair is removed and it has been properly dressed. For the other two the skin was split. The part with the hairy side was called keph, and was used for the trphillun or phylactery; and upon the other (τὸ καλύμμα) the mezuzoth were written (Maimonides, Hil. Tephil). The skins when written upon were formed into rolls (יַרְכֶּה, megilloth; Psa. xxvi, 8; comp. Isa. xxxiv, 4; Jer. xxxvi, 14; Ezek. ii, 9; Zech. v, 1). They were rolled upon one or two sticks and fastened with a thread, the ends of which were sealed (Isa. xxxix, 11; Dan. xiii, 4; Rev. vi, 1, etc.). Hence the words בַּרְכִּי, goldai (πίσισμα), to roll up (Isa. xxxiv, 4; Rev. vi, 14), and פַּרְדָּה (ἀπαντοσθος), to unroll (2 Kings xix, 14; Luke iv, 17), are used of the closing and opening of a book. The rolls were generally written on one side only, except in Ezek. ii, 9; Rev. v, 1. They were divided into columns (יַרְכֶּה, delathoth, lit. "doors," A. V. "leaves," Jer. xxxvi, 22); the upper margin was to be not less than three fingers broad, the lower not less than four; and a space of two fingers' breadth was to be left between every two columns (Wähner, Ant. Ebo. vol. i, sect. 1, cap. xiv, § 337). In the Herculanenum rolls the columns are two fingers broad, and in the MSS. in the library at Stuttgart there are three columns on each side, each three inches broad, with an inch space between the columns, and margins of three inches wide (Leyrer in Herzog's Enzyklop. "Schriftzeichen"). The case in which the rolls were kept was called רְכִּי or בַּרְכִּי, Talmudic יַרְכֶּה, kerek, or יַרְכֶּה karka. But besides skins, which were used for the more permanent kinds of writing, parchment (spelled covered with wax. (Isa. lxix, 1, 63, παρθενος) served for the ordinary purposes of life. Several of these were fastened together and formed volumes (יַרְכֶּים אֲסָתָנוֹ). Books were written upon with a pointed style (סֶנֶס, כְּרֵית, Exod. xxiii, 4; Isa. viii, 1) was employed: the bard point was called יָסָפָר, yisparen (Jer. xvii, 1). For parchment or skins a reed was used (3 John 13; 3 MacC. iv, 20), and according to some the Law was to be written with nothing else (Wähner, § 334). The ink, יֵדֶד, yed (Jer. xxxvi, 18), literally "black," like the Greek μπλαν (2 Cor. ii, 3; 2 John 12; 3 John 18), was to be of lamp-black dissolved in gall juice, though sometimes a mixture of gall juice and vitriol was allowable (Wähner, § 335). It was carried in an inkstand (יַרְכֶּה קְאֵה, kerek has-skophe), which was suspended at the girdle (Ezek. ix, 2, 3), as is done at the present day in the East. The modern scribes have an apparatus consisting of a metal or ebony tube for their reed pens, with a cup or bulb of the same material, attached to the upper end, for the ink. This they thrust through the girdle, and carry with them at all times. (Thomson, Land and Book, i, 188). Such a case for holding pens, ink, and other materials for writing is called in the Mishnah יַרְכֶּה, kalmdrin, or קְאֵה, kalmyron (calamaram; Mishnah, Celim, ii, 7; Mitz. xxii, 331). he removed to Charlton, Mass., to take charge of the Church in that place. Although obliged to engage in secular pursuits to meet his family expenses, he regularly preached to the Charlton Church, and towards the latter part of his life he preached in destitute places in his neighborhood. For two or three years before his death he was laid aside from his ministerial work. He died at Charlton, Feb. 24, 1857. It is a proof of the esteem in which he held that the city of Charlton chose him for several years as their representative to the state legislature. See The Christian Watchman, Dec. 29, 1857. (J. C. Boon[e], Charles, an English Wesleyan minister, commenced the work in 1771, and for twenty-four years was a faithful itinerant. His last circuit was Plymouth dock. In July, 1775, he left Plymouth for Exeter, thinking the change would be beneficial. A contrary effect was produced, however, and he died there, July 20, 1775. See Atmore, Meth. Memorial, s. v.

Boone, Levi, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Fayette County, Ala. In 1869, when about forty-eight years old, he was admitted to the Mississippi Conference, within the bounds of which he labored the next five years, and died at Dale, Miss., Feb. 25, 1880. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1880, p. 70.

Boone, Squire, a Baptist minister, was born in Berks County, Pa., in 1757, and was a brother of the famous Daniel Boone. Until 1770 his residence was a few miles from Wilkesborough, N. C. He was for some time the companion of his brother in making explorations in the states of Kentucky. In 1775 he had his home in a fort in Wilkesborough, where he remained until 1779, when he built a fort in what is now Shelby County. For some time he resided in Louisville, Ky., and spent the last part of his life in what was then the territory of Indiana, where he died in 1815. The only official act of his of which we have any account was his marrying the first white person who was married in Kentucky. His niece, the same Sarah, his contrison, Thomas Boone, were worthy Baptist ministers in Kentucky. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclopedia. p. 118. (J. C. S.)

Boone, William E., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born at Fayetteville, N. C., Jan. 11, 1850. He received a careful religious training, joined the church in 1846, prepared for the ministry at Cokesbury Conference School, and in 1850 entered the South Carolina Conference, in which he served the Church with fidelity until his death, Oct. 29, 1858. Mr. Boone was characterized by deep piety and conscientiousness. He was untried in zeal and greatly beloved. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1858, p. 56.

Boos, a German Reformed minister, arrived in America about 1771. He brought no testimonials with him, but the Congregation of Reading, Pa., concluded to take him. He conducted himself well during the year, and the Cautus permitted him to continue another year. In a letter from the secretary of the Cautus to the fathers of the church at New York the following year, he states that several families begged them to remain, and that upon Mr. Boos: that his Church in Reading is in a most flourishing condition through his industry and zeal; that he is beloved not only in Reading, but by all the members of the Cautus. In the minutes of 1782 we find that Mr. Boos was compelled to leave his Reading Church. He afterwards continued as an Independent minister. There are many traditions about him in Berks County, Pa. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church, ii, 392.

Booth, John P., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, a Cherokee Indian, was born about 1795. Prior to his conversion he was a leaker among his people, a man of unswerving patriotism. He was converted in 1815, and two years later he was licensed to preach. He died Aug. 8, 1853. As a preacher he had but few equals. He had a strong, comprehensive mind, and grasped his subject like a giant. He was powerful in declamation. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1853, p. 452.

Booth, Bidcock, an English Congregational minister, was born at Sawley, Aug. 22, 1805. He was converted early in life, joined a Church at Clitheroe in his nineteenth year, and after earnest labor as a local preacher for some years in the neighborhood became pastor at Newton-in-Bowland in 1861. Here he died, Aug. 22, 1874. Mr. Booth was an incessant worker and a devoted pastor. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1875, p. 317.

Booth, Henry J., an English Wesleyan minister, was born in London. He was trained in the fear of the Lord, became a minister in 1844, and died suddenly, Nov. 29, 1854, in the thirty-fourth year of his age. He was active in mind and abundant in labors. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1855.

Booth, James, a Wesleyan minister in Canada, was a native of Yorkshire, England. He came to America in 1816, and was one of the most self-sacrificing and successful of the superintendents in the upper provinces. He became a supernumerary at Waterloo, Ont., in 1888, but resumed work again in three years. He died at Kingston, Ont., Jan. 22, 1854, in his seventy-third year. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1854; Carroll, Case and his Contemporaries, vol. v, index.

Booth, John, an English preacher of the 16th century, brother of Laurence and Wiliam, was probably a native of Cheshire. He was bachelor of laws, and in the sixth year of Edward IV (1466) became bishop of Exeter. He built the bishop's chair in his cathedral, which bishop Godwin says had no equal in England. During the troublesome times of the wars of York and Lancaster he retired to his native Hampshire, where he died, April 1, 1478, and was buried in St. Clement Danes, London. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), i, 268.

Booth, John F., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Brooklyn, N. Y., June 1, 1829. He entered the New York East Conference in 1853, passed all his itinerant ministry on Long Island, and died in the midst of his labors, Nov. 26, 1860. Mr. Booth was not loud and ostentatious, but remarkably firm and consistent. His ministry was short, but decisive, and crowned with great success; his chief excellence lay in his heart-devotedness to the young. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1866, p. 63.

Booth, Joseph, a minister of the Society of Friends, was born at Sciute, Mass., about 1660, and was educated as an Independent. He removed to Delaware when a young man. In that colony for many years he filled the office of civil magistrate, and represented for a time the county of Sussex, in which he resided, in the General Assembly. Having been brought under the influence of the ministry of Joseph Story in 1699, he became one of the leaders of the truth. He abjured the principles of the Friends, and some time after was recognized as a minister in that denomination of Christians. "His communications were solemn and awful, delivered in the power of truth." A meeting at Matherkill, Del., and one at Cold Spring, Md., were established through his instrumentality. He died about 1732. See Bowden, Hist. of Friends in America, ii, 268. (J. C. S.)

Booth, Laurence, an English preacher of the 15th century, was half-brother of William Booth, archbishop of York. He became master of Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, and chancellor of that university. He was an eminent benefactor of his college, conferring thereon, among other things, the manor and patronage of Overton in Gloustershire. From being chancellor of Cambridge, he was preferred to the same office to Margaret, queen of Henry VI, and, well discharging that office, he was, in the thirteenth year of Edward IV, (1474), made lord high chancellor of England, having first been bishop of Durham, and afterwards archbishop of York, and being a benefactor of both sees. He retained the mastership of Pembroke Hall till his death in 1489. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), i, 267.

Booth, William, an English preacher of the 15th century, was educated at Gray's Inn, London, quitted the study of law to accept the chancellor's place in St. Paul's, and took orders. He was soon consecrated bishop of Lichfield, and six years after was translated to York. He expended much in enlarging his archi-episcopal palace in York. After twelve years he died, and was buried at Southwell, in 1465. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), i, 267.

Booth, William C., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Covington County, Miss. He entered the Mississippi Conference in 1851, and labored until his death, in 1854. Mr. Booth was a young man of buoyant spirit, warm and generous nature, and confiding heart. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1855, p. 606.

Booth, William Oliver, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Eccleshill, near Bradford, Yorkshire, Sept. 1, 1801. After some years employed in tuition, he was accepted by the Conference in 1824. In the prime of his life accidents befell him, which laid the foundation of great weakness; but he did not cease his labor, although subdued by the chastening of almost constant pain, until age was added to suffering. He died while living as a supernumerary in London, March 19, 1879. His love for the young was intense and his labor for their welfare incessant. Few men had more friends. "His sermons were well studied, full of evangelical theology, and brought home to the consciences of his hearers in mighty and loving appeal." See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1873, p. 83; Wesleyan Conference, i, 718.

Boothby, Jeremiah, an English Wesleyan missionary, was sent to the West Indies in 1813, and died at Roseau, in the island of Dominica, July 14, 1816, of a fever induced by a cold he contracted from exposure, made necessary by a persecuting disturber in the congregation. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1817.

Bootho, Paul, a Methodist Episcopal minister, belonged to the Lexington Conference, and was frequently stationed for many years a local preacher, and later entered the traveling connection. He died on the Harrodsburg Circuit, Lexington District, Dec. 19, 1878. He was an earnest, faithful man. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1874, p. 11.

Boottman, Charles, an English Methodist preacher, was born at Lynn, Norfolk, in 1829, in the midst of life, but was brought up among the Wesleyans, and converted to God in his eighteenth year. He labored hard as a class leader and local preacher till 1849, when the division took place which led to a society being formed of Methodist reformers. Mr. Bootman was the minister of the Friends Meeting in Lynn until 1888. In 1888 he united with the New Connection. He travelled in all the four circuits, and was happy and useful in his work. His last circuit was Gloucester, where he labored for only a few months, but preached till within two days of his death, which occurred Dec. 8, 1860. He published a tract on the Connection of the Muses. See Minutes of the Conferences.

Boots were introduced by the Benedictines, and worn by masters of arts at their inception, until the doctors of faculties appropriated them to their own use, and masters were reduced to pantaloons or sandals. The boot was buttoned up the side of the leg like a gaiter; hence, probably, the modern use of the latter by the bishops, who have always a doctor's degree. The doctor of divinity stood booted and spurred at his act, as if shod with the preparation of the Gospel and ready always to preach God's word.

Boots, Abraham, a German theologian and historian, was born at Bremen, Sept. 27, 1628. He studied at Marburg, and there taught metaphysics in 1662, history and eloquence in 1664. He died Oct. 11, 1695. His principal works are: De Immortalitate et Spiritusbeatu Angelorum (Marburg, 1658); De Veritate (ibid. 1661); De Veris Thematibus ex omni Scibili (ibid. 1670). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Boozer, John Jay, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Newberry, S.C., in 1825. He was educated in Oglethorpe University, Milledgeville, Ga., and studied in the theological seminary at Columbia, S.C. He was licensed about 1850 by the South Carolina Presbytery, and became pastor of Hopewell Church. In 1856 he removed to North Carolina; in 1858 to Arkansas, and became pastor of Pine Bluff Church, where he remained until his death in August, 1864. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1866, p. 946.

Boquin (or Bouquin), Pierau, a French Protestant theologian, was born at the beginning of the 16th century in the province of Guienne. He studied at Bourges, and received his degree as doctor of theology April 23, 1589. He joined the order of the Carmelites, and was appointed prior. Having embraced the views of the Reformation, he left France in 1584, and went to Basel. While at Basel and Strasbourg, where he had been received into the Church, he occupied the chair formerly held by Calvin, and commenced his lectures on the Epistle to the Galatians. But the love for his own country brought him back again to Bourges, where he lectured on Hebrew and exegesis, protected by the queen of Navarre, to whom he dedicated his treatise De Necessitate et Ue Sacerdotum Literarum. In 1556 he was again obliged to leave the country, and went to Strasbourg, where he acted for some time as preacher of the French Church. When in 1557 the university of Heidelberg was reformed, he was appointed professor there. He took an active part in the religious controversies of his time, and was present at the colloquy at Maulbron. In 1574 he was obliged to give up his chair with the rest of the Calvinistic professors, for which he would not subscribe to the Lutheran dogma of the ubiquity of Christ, and went as professor to Lausanne, where he died in 1582. His writings, which mainly treat of the controversy between the Lutherans and Calvinists, bear the title: *A France Protetant, t. i, 404. See Hundesagen, in Herzog's Reit-Encyklop. s. v.; Lichtenberger, Encyclopédie des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)*

Bora (Bohra or Bohren), Katharina Von, the wife of Luther, was born at Lüben in Saxony, Jan. 29, 1499, and while very young became a nun in the convent of Nymptschen. On reading some of Luther's writings, she determined to abandon the monastic life, and, along with eight of her companions, applied to Luther for help. At his instance Leonard Koppe, a citizen of Torgau, succeeded in effecting their escape by night, April 4, 1523. Katharina found an asylum in the house of the burgomaster Reichenbach, at Wittenberg, and was married to Luther June 13, 1525. The marriage caused a great stir in the religious world, but proved a very happy one. Luther in his will left all his property to her. She died at Torgau, Dec. 20, 1552. Borak. See ADBORAK.

Borns, a remarkable fact in all the larger towns in the province of Gujarat in Hindustan, where, being Jews in features, manners, and genius, are Mohammedans in religion. See Gardner, Faiths of the World, s. v.

Borbatz, Neires, an Armenian theologian, was born near Tiflis about the middle of the 12th century. He applied himself diligently to the study of logic and theology, and became bishop of Bitlis. He died in 1317. He wrote a treatise on Logic, in which he traces with discernment the systems of Plato, Aristotle, Porphyry, of David the Prophet, philosopher, and others — a short Exposition of the Pentateuch; — and Sermons. These works are cited in the Armenian manuscripts of the Imperial Library. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.*

Borchard, G., a minister of the Lutheran Church, and a native of Germany, arrived in Nebraska in 1877, as a missionary to the German population. As a scholar his attainments were of the highest order. To the German Lutheran Church he is known as the author of the Kirchenfreund, especially by his letters on Japan. After two years of missionary labor, he became a teacher of German in Nebraska College, Nebraska City, where he died, Sept. 15, 1879. See Lutheran Observer, Sept. 26, 1879.

Borchert, Peter Van der, Sr., a Flemish landscape painter and engraver, was born at Brussels about 1640, and died in 1608. As a painter he gained very little distinction. He had great fertility of invention, but was not veryjudicious, either in the attitudes of his figures or the composition of his groups. The following are his best: A Set of Landscapes from the Old and New Testament, Forest Entertainment; A Landseer, with the subject of Hogwar and Asannah; The Festival of the Company of Archers. Bordeaux, Councils of (Concilium Burdegalense). Of these there were several.

I. Held in 385, by order of the emperor Maximus, against the Priscillianists. Instantius and Priscillianus were called upon for their defense. The former made out so bad a case for himself that he was judged unworthy of the episcopate. Priscillianus, fearing the same treatment, ventured to appeal to the emperor from the council, which appeal the bishops permitted. Priscillianus and the other accused parties were in consequence brought before the emperor at Treves, Idacius and Ithacius, their accusers, accompanying them. The emperor, at the urgent request of Ithacius, and contrary to his promise made to St. Martin, condemned Priscillianus and some of his followers to death. St. Martin had before strongly urged Ithacius to desist from his violent accusations; but this business refused to communicate with the Ithacians. Moreau, vegan, Ambrose, the pope Siricius, and the Council of Turin, in 398, condemned the Ithacians, maintaining that it was far from the part of a bishop to be in any way instrumental in causing the death of heretics. St. Ambrose in his writings also evinced his disgust at these cruelties, and the irregular condemnation of the Priscillianists. See Labbe, *Concil. ii, 1084.

II. Held in 1080, in the month of October. Two legates, three archbishops, and several bishops were present. The notorious Berenger here gave account of his faith, either in confirmation of what he had declared at Rome in this same year, or to retract what he had just published in contradiction of that declaration. See Labbe, Concil. x, 581.

III. Held on April 13, 1255. In it Gerard of Malemort, archbishop of Bordeaux, published a constitution consisting of thirty articles. Among other things it is enacted, that all who for the salvation and others having the title of souls shall be constantly in residence; that those persons who remain in a state of excommunication for forty days shall pay nine livres, or some other suitable fine; it is absolutely forbidden to absolve any one under excommunication, even at the point of death, if he, or some one for him, have not not made application to the party interested, the priest so absolving him to be bound for him. To such an extent had the abuse of excommunications been carried in that age that it was a custom common to excommunicate in execution of a judgment, or on account of some money debt remaining unpaid. The fifth article enjoins that the consecrated host shall not be given to children who are brought to communion on Easter-day, but only bread which has been blessed. See Labbe, Concil. xi. 798.

IV. Held in 1588, by Antoine, archbishop of Bordeaux. Thirty-six regulations, relating to matters of faith, morals, and discipline, were drawn up, similar to those of the Council of Rheims in the same year. The last of these refers to the proper regulation of seminaries, and is divided into nine chapters, which enjoin, among other things, that they should be built in some open spot not far from the cathedral church; that mass and prayer should be said daily; that the members of the seminary should obey the superior and other officers; that they shall be modest in their behavior, never eat out of the seminary, and never go out without leave; that all shall go to bed at nine, and rise at four in the morning, etc. See Labbe, Concil. xv, 944.

V. Held in 1624, under Francis, archbishop of Bordeaux, and cardinal. In this council twenty-two chapters, containing a large number of canons, were published, chiefly relating to discipline. See Labbe, Concil. xv, 1632.

Bordel, John, a martyr of the Reformation period, was a Frenchman by birth, and suffered martyrdom, by strangling, in Brazil, in 1558. See Fox, Acta et Monuments, iv, 440.

Bordelian Sect. In the year 1739 a separatist party took its rise at Bordelom, near Hensburg, in the duchy of Holstein. Its founder was the Saxon licentiatus David Diet, who claimed a higher spiritual life and rejected all ecclesiastical order. He even despised the Church, which he called the devil's house, rejecting the sacraments and marriage, and claimed the same liberty which we find in the Oneida Community. An edit of king Christian VI, issued June 11, 1739, made an end to the immoral doings of the leader, who died in 1743. See Tschackert in Herzog's Real-Encyclop. (2d ed.), s. v.; Lichtenberger, Encyclopédie des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. F.)

Borders, Étienne Jean François, a French theologian, was born at Montauban, Jan. 24, 1764. He studied in the college of St. Barbe, in Paris, where he remained as principal until the Revolution. He then went to Holland, anu later to Germany, but eventually returned to France. In 1802 he became vicar of Lande, and in 1819 vicar-general of the archdeaconate of St. Denis. He died Aug. 4, 1882, leaving Éuvres, which were published after his death. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bordeas, Florian, a French preacher, was born about 1588. He was a hermit of Notre Dame d'Étang, at Dijon, and had a friend, named Nicholas, who one day confided to him quite an amount of silver. He yielded to the temptation to assassinate him and appropriate the money. A little time after, having occasion to preach at St. Benigne, of Dijon, he spoke at length upon the violent death of brother Nicholas, and, in so doing, certain expressions escaped him which led to his being suspected of the crime. He was finally convicted, and executed in 1633. He wrote, Histoire de l'Image de Notre Dame d'Étang (Dijon, 1682). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bordeau, Paris, a distinguished painter of the Venetian school, was born at Trevise in 1500. There are many fine works of art in the churches and public edifices at Venice, Milan, Genoa, and Florence. His most important works are the Ring of St. Mark at St. Mark's at Venice, and the dome of San Vincenzo, at Trevise, containing, in six compartments, the Adoration of the Magi, the Crucifixion, the Ascension, and the Assumption of the Virgin. He died in 1570. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bordi, Francis, a Franciscan of Parma, was born in 1537. At the age of fifteen he joined his order, whose general he became, and died Aug. 7, 1671. He wrote, De Constitutione Syllaginarum (Milan, 1630); —De Antiquitate Religionis Tertii Ord. S. Fratresci (Bologna, 1644); —Ecclesiastico Raciocinio Festorum Mobiliam (ibid. 1637); —Chronologiam Fratrum et Sororum III. Ord. Seraphici (Parma, 1530); —Formulae Doctrina Subtilis ab Objecta Viddicata (ibid. 1662); —Privilegia Clericorum in Controversia (ibid. 1668), etc. See Jücher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit., i, 719. (B. P.)

Bordonio, Giuseppe Antonio, an Italian theologian, was born at Turin, Feb. 22, 1682. He entered the Jesuit order in October, 1686, and after two years he was professor, successively, of belles-lettres at Pignerol and Genoa. In 1708 he occupied the chair of rhetoric at Turin, and in 1708 was placed in charge of the studies of the marquis of Susa. Four years after, the marquis of Trivie, being sent as ambassador to England, took Bordoneo as chaplain of the embassy. He died in 1742, leaving Beatissima Augensia Genoa, de Patris et Triumphantor, a drama in Latin verse (Pignerol, 1700) —La Ligraria in Pace, Scherzo Pastorale, etc. (Genoa, 1702) —Edissio Tragedia (Turin, 1703) —Discorsi per l'Esercizio della Buona Morte (Venice, 3 vols., of which the first two were published in 1740, and the third in 1751). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bordewell, John, a Congregational minister, was born at Deerfield, Mass., in October, 1782. He graduated from Yale College in 1758, was ordained pastor of the Church in Kent, Oct. 28, 1758, and died Dec. 6, 1811. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 672.

Boreas (the north wind), in Greek mythology, was a Titan, the son of Astraus and Aurora, one of the four winds (his brothers were Zephyrus and Notus). He was reckoned among the benefactors of hot countries, because his breath brought refreshing and rain. His dwelling was a cave of the Bhiphan mountain-range, in the country of the Hyperboreans. He was highly venerated by the Athenians, and a small temple was erected in honor of him, because he had damaged the fleet of Xerxes. He loved the daughter of the Attic king Eretheus, Orithya, who presented him also with a daughter, Cleopatra, who married Phineus, king of Salmydessus, in Thrace, the son of the Phoenician king, Agenor. Chloris also was betrayed by him. The nymph Pitys, however, refusing his favor, was hurled out of jealousy, against a rock, so that she died. Many of the most famous steeds of antiquity are indebted to him for their existence. On the Temple of the Winds at Athens, he was represented as a bearded man; his dress reminds of the cold which he brings, his sea-horn of the peculiar sound which the blowing of this wind produces.
Boreasmi, in Greek cultus, were festivals celebrated at Athens in honor of Boreas.

Borein, Peter Rubli, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Washington County, East Tenn., Nov. 17, 1809. He experienced religion when about twelve years of age, and was distinguished during childhood and youth for his amiable and affectionate disposition and exemplary filial obedience. Having moved to Illinois, in 1830 he entered the Illinois College at Jacksonville, and on leaving college was licensed to preach, and entered the Illinois Conference in 1833. He continued his labors faithfully and with great success until his death, Aug. 15, 1888. Mr. Borein was engaging and delightful in person, manners, and public exercises. He was everywhere admired as a scholar, gentleman, and speaker. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1846, p. 54; Sprague, Annals of the American Pulpit, vol. vii.

Borromini, Francesco, a painter of Mantua, lived about 1650. He studied under Domenico Fetti. There are several of his works in the churches of Mantua.

Borger, Elie Anne, a Flemish theologian, was born at Joure, in Friesland, in 1785. He completed his studies at the university of Leyden, where he received the degree of doctor, and was appointed in 1807 lecturer on sacred literature. In 1812, by the courtesy of the king of France, he was appointed professor. At the restoration of the university of Leyden, in 1815, Borger obtained the chair of theology, which he resigned for that of belles-lettres. He died in 1820. He wrote a large number of works, a complete list of which is found in the rectorial discourse of M. Smellenburg, delivered Feb. 6, 1821, at the university of Leyden. The most remarkable of these works are, Des Sermones:—an explanation of the Epître aux Galates:—Disputatio de Mystico (Hague, 1820). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Borghardt, Ludwig Immanuel, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Magdeburg, Nov. 29, 1841. He studied theology, philosophy, and physiology at Berlin. After completing his studies there, he entered the theological seminary at Wittenberg, where Nitzsch, Heubner, and Roth were his teachers. In 1864 he went as pastor to Gross-Salze; in 1840 he was called to Kloster-Gröningen, and in 1846 as court-chaplain and superintendent of Stendal. In 1867 he was appointed member of consistory and second general superintendent of the province of Saxony. He died at his native place, June 21, 1870. See Zum Gedächtniss von L. I. Borghardt (Magdeburg, 1870). (B. F.)

Borghes, John. See Bourges.

Borghesi, Ippolito, a reputable Neapolitan historian, flourished about 1620. He studied under Francesco Curia, and painted an altar-piece in San Lorenzo, at Perugia, representing the Assumption, which is his principal work.

Borghini, in Norse mythology, was the mother of Hamund and the Hunger-slayer Helgis, famous in Northern heroic tales.

Borgia, Alessandro, an Italian prelate and theologian, was born at Velletti in 1652, and died Feb. 14, 1764. He was archbishop of Permo, and left the following works: Vita di San Geraldo (Velletri, 1698):—Istoria della Chiesa e Città di Velletris, in quattro libri (Nocera, 1728):—Vita Beneficiorum XII (Rome, 1741):—Letters collected by Muratori:—Homelies:—and some other works. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Borgia, Stefano, an Italian prelate and theologian, was born at Velletri, Dec. 3, 1731. He early gave evidence of great talent, and received the first of his education from his uncle, archbishop of Permo. He devoted himself especially to the study of antiquities, and at the age of nineteen was received at the academy of Cortona. He collected a very rich museum of monuments, medals, manuscripts, etc. Benedict XIV appointed him governor of Benevento, and soon after he was made secretary of the Congregate for religious candidates, or foreign missions. Pius VI appointed him cardinal and general inspector of the Foundling Hospital, and he introduced important changes in its administration. He went to Venice to see the men of letters, then to Padua to found an academy, and finally to Valencia to organize a kind of Pragmatic of the Society; and was sent to Rome and to Aniza to be the prince of religion, and to collect monuments. The pontifical government having been re-established at Rome, in 1800, the new pontiff, Pius VII, who found the administration in disorder, placed Borgia at the head of the council, the labors of which included nearly all the material interests of the state. In 1801 he was appointed rector of the Roman College. Fatigued with his labors, and at an advanced age, he accompanied his master to France to crown Napoleon, but he was taken ill at Lyons, and died there, Nov. 23, 1804. His museum, rich especially in Egyptian and Indian monuments, was his chief possession. He had sold his jewels to obtain these monuments, and his plate to publish a description of them. They were, however, scarcely his property, but rather that of the learned of his country. Adler, Zega, Gregi, Paulin of St. Bartholomew, Heeren, and many others have profited by this collection, and have written concerning it. The manuscript of this cardinal was as gentle as his spirit was chaste. Among his principal works we notice, Monumento di Popa Giovanni XVI (Rome, 1750):—Breve Istoria dell' Antica Città di Todino nell' Umbria (1761). An ancient map of the world in the museum of this cardinal, prepared by the curé of Camillos, Giovanni Paolo Borgia, nephew of the cardinal, is known in the history of geography under the name of the Mappe Monde du Cardinal Borgia (Encyclop. des Gens du M.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Borgiani, Orazio, a Roman painter and engraver, was born in 1577, and studied under his brother Giulio, called Scialo. He painted several pictures for the Spanish ambassador and also for the churches of Rome. His principal works are, The Resurrection; The Dead Christ, with the two Marys and St. John; St. Christopher giving his Hand to the Infant Jesus. He died in 1615. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Borgognone, Ambrogio, a noted Milanese painter, lived about 1490, and studied under Federigo Zuccaro. He painted for one of the cloisters of San Simpliciano, at Milan, the history of St. Sisinio and his companions, also a Coronation of the Virgin. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Borgo, Juan de, a Spanish painter, flourished from 1495 to 1533. He gained distinction by his works, several of which, at Toledo, in oil and fresco, were held in high estimation. At Avila he painted some pictures from sacred history. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Borie, Pierre Rose Ursule Dumoulin, a French missionary, was born at Beynot, in the diocese of Tulle, Feb. 28, 1808. He was trained from childhood in the Church, and at the age of fifteen went to the seminary of Servières. He afterwards studied at the seminary of Tulle, and finally at Paris. He was made deacon March 27, 1830, and soon after priest. He went to Macao the same year as vicar apostolic to the province of Macao, and after a series of hardships and persecutions he was finally beheaded by the natives, Nov. 24, 1838. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Borj (or Al-borj) is the mythical world-mountain of the ancient Persians, from which all mundane existence took its rise and the stars leaped into their orbits. It is the symbol of creation, and is affirmed to be the navel of the world, the mountain of mountains. It is considered the centre from which come prophets and lawgivers, and the religious dogmas and liturgical rites of the ancient Persians.

Bork, Christian, a clergyman of the Reformed Church in America, was born in Berlin, Prussia, in 1758. His father, a Prussian army officer, died of a wound received in battle before his son's birth. His mother was a pious Lutheran, who trained him with religious care. In his eighteenth year, when about thirty miles from home, he was impressed into the military service, and sent to join the British army in America in 1776. He was in the army of general Burgoyne until its surrender at Saratoga in 1777, and after this event he determined to return to his native country. He then entered school near Albany, and in 1781, having left the British service, enlisted in a regiment of New York State levies, from which he was honorably discharged the same year. During his army life, he was converted under a sermon preached in a barn at Livingston Manor by Rev. Dr. Livingston of New York, who was then a voluntary exile from the city on account of the war. While he was yet in the army, Mr. Bork used to gather the soldiers on Sabbaths and read the Bible to them. He continued to teach for about twelve years, studied theology under Dr. Bassett of Albany, and entered the ministry in 1788. His early ministry was spent in the vicinity of Albany (1789-1808), after which he became pastor of the Franklin-street Church, N. Y. (1808), where he remained until his death, in 1828. He was a bold, faithful soldier of the cross. His preaching was remarkable for its scriptural fulness and holy unction, and his memory is still cherished as that of a Christian pastor who was wholly given to his work. Börling, Jacob, a Protestant minister of Germany, was born of Jewish parentage in 1801 at Slawitts, in Volhynia, Russian Poland. He received a strict Jewish education acquiring a knowledge of the Talmud, but at an early age became dissatisfied with the Talmudic school. He entered the market-town of Posen, in the province of Holstein, Germany, where the Talmud was the main subject of study. In 1821, when Mr. Moritz (q.v.), a missionary among the Jews, visited his native place, the turning-point in Mr. Bör- ling's life came. The arguments of the missionary shook his belief in the divine authority of the Talmud, and he resolved to become a Christian. As this was impossible for him in his native town, he decided to go to St. Petersburg. Having been furnished with letters of introduction to some Christian friends, he set out on foot, in 1822, on a journey of a thousand miles. In St. Petersburg he received instruction in the truth of Christianity, and was baptized May 5, 1822, at the Moravian chapel. He remained at St. Petersburg till 1824, when he accompanied the Rev. Sallet to Tiflis, in Georgia, the latter having been appointed minister of the Protestant community there. In August, 1825, he accompanied the Rev. Joseph Wolff (q.v.) to Shousia, Persia, where he enjoyed the society of Zaremba and other missionaries. In 1830 he returned to Persia, and together directed him to settle somewhere as a citizen, and also to enter the Russian service. He settled at Tiflis, where he was employed by the government. In 1831 he entered the missionary institution at Basle, where he remained for three years. In 1834 he entered into connection with the Berlin Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews, and labored for nearly five years in their service among the Jews in Silesia. Being a Russian, he had to return every three years to his country for the renewal of his passport. After passing an examination at the University of Dorpat, he received an appointment as minister of the Gospel in the colony Belovesch, in the government Tschemignow, in the south of Russia. Here he had thirteen parishes committed to his charge. The sad state of spiritual destitution in which he found his field of labor was soon changed for the better. He established schools everywhere, and his work was only interrupted by his death, Aug. 8, 1844. (B. P.)

In 1707 Börner was appointed professor of ethics, and in 1708 professor of Greek at Leipzig. In 1710 he was ordained to the theological ministry. He died Nov. 19, 1767, in Berlin. He was a voluminous writer, and the titles of his writings fill about five printed pages in Döring, Die geliehrten Theologen Deutschlands. He edited Jacob Le Long's Bibliotheca Sacra, seu Sylvius Omnium Ferae Sacrae Scripturarum Editionum et Versionum, etc. (Leipzig, 1709):—

BORRI, Christoforo, an Italian missionary, was a native of Milan. He made a trip to the East, and on his return taught mathematics at Coimbra and Lisbon. It is said that he was ordered to Madrid by the King of Spain, who was informed that he had found means of determining the longitude by the inclination of the needle. But his science led to his being suspected, it is thought, by his society, which he excluded from his regard in order to occupy himself in matters foreign to this organization. He afterwards entered the order of Cistercians, and died May 24, 1623. He wrote, under the pseudonym of Omiophorus, Doctrina de Tribus Coelis; Aveo, Siderum sanctorum (Lisbon, 1611):—Relazione a Sua Santità della Cassa delle Indie Orientali del Corp- sello, della China, dell’Egitto, dell’Isola di San Lo- renzo, del regno di Monomolopa, e della Terra Incognita Australe (Rome, 1631); with observations upon the manner in which the missionaries attempted to civilize the natives. On the death of his instructors he was appointed architect of St. Pe- ter’s, under the direction of Bernini. He executed the façade of the Church of St. Agnes in the Piazza Nuova, which is considered his best performance, and gained him so much reputation that the king of Spain ap- pointed him to enlarge and modernize his palace at Rome. He was also employed in the Barberini palace; erected the church and monasteries of the Madonna de Strada Giulia; erected the palace of Ruffini at Frascati, and embellished the Spada palace. He was educated for the priesthood, and at twenty years of age took the highest scholarship and entered the seminary at Milan, under the charge of the bishop. At this time he was ordered to give up the reading of certain anti-Romanist publications, but re- fused. He subsequently received ordination as a priest, and in 1650 was appointed professor of rhetoric in the seminary at Mantua. He now manifested so strong an antipathy for the Austrian occupation that he went to his patriotic sentiments, that he was tried and condemned to death. The sentence was afterwards commuted to imprisonment for twelve years, and Fer- dinando Bosio found himself in the Castle of Joseph- stadt, on the Bohemian confines. During this impris- onment his system received a shock which ultimately ended his life. The emperor Francis Joseph, on his public entry into Milan in 1866, granted an amnesty to a large number of Italian prisoners, and Bosio was among the number; the latter accordingly returned to Italy, after his five years of suffering. He was now sent as a parish priest to Casalmondo, where he re- mained until 1861. The reading of a copy of the Scriptu- res sold him by a Wesleyan colporteur led to his con- version to Protestantism. He became a student, an evangelist, and finally, in 1866, a Wesleyan Methodist minister. The last eight years of his life were spent in Milan, where, on July 12, 1877, he died. In his modest and retiring, was a man of independent thought and strong moral courage. His preaching was that of a studious, thoughtful man, and was full of nervous force and earnest appeal. He was esteemed and beloved by his brethren. See Minutes of the British Con- ference, 1878.

of religious affairs in Malta at the end of the 16th century. He wrote a History of the True Cross, from the period of its discovery under Constantine the Great:—and an Account of the Order of the Knights of Malta. The best edition is that of Rome (1621, 5 vols. fol.).

BOSO, Cardinal, an English ecclesiastical, nephew of Nicholas Breakspear (pope Adrian IV), was probably a native of Herefordshire. He was made a cardinal by that pope in December, 1155, and was cardinal priest of the following churches in Rome: Cosma and Damian, Crosses of Jerusalem, Prudentiana, and of Pastor. He was instrumental in making Alexander III pope with the suffrages of nineteen cardinals, against the anti-pope Victor IV. Bosso of Normandy was born in 1153. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), ii. 42.

BOSON, a theologian of Normandy, was born in 1063, in the town of Montivilliers. He entered the abbey of Bec at the age of twenty-three, and in 1093 accompanied St. Anselm to his bishopric at Canterbury, and assisted him at the council of Clermont in 1095. Returning to the abbey of Bec in 1115, he was appointed prior, then abbot of Bec. This made him the object of persecution by those who, envious of his growing influence, wished to do something to lead to his being suspected by the king of England. He died in 1136. He wrote, in the form of a letter, Defesa de l'Ordre Mystique. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bosphorus, bishop of Colonia, in Cappadocia Secunda, was a confidential friend and correspondent of Gregory Nazianzen and Basil the Great. His episcopate must have commenced in 360, and continued at least forty-eight years. He had great influence over the gentler nature of Gregory, who, however, speaks of him in terms of the highest respect, both for the purity of his faith and the sanctity of his life. Bosporus persuaded Gregory to remain at Nazianzum after his father's death, and accept the unwelcome see of Constantinople. Gregory bitterly complained of his excessive importance, but yielded. In 383 Bosporus was accused of unsoundness in the faith, which greatly distressed Gregory, who wrote urgently in his behalf to Theodore of Tyana, Nectarius, and Eutropius. Bosporus attended the second Ecumenical Council at Constantinople in 381; and Palladius speaks with gratitude of the sympathy shown by him towards the bishops banished, in 406, for adhesion to Chrysostom.

Bosquet, FRANÇOIS DE, a French prelate, was born at Narbonne, May 28, 1605. He first studied law, and attained great eminence in that profession, inasmuch that the king, in recognition of his services as intendant of Guienne and Languedoc, granted him the title of counsellor of state. When he was thus on the highroad to the greatest posts, he voluntarily, in 1650, resigned every situation which he held, and was made bishop of Lodève, by the cession, in his favor, of Jean Plantadet de la Pausa, his friend. In the same year he was deputed by the clergy to Rome, to treat of the affair of the Five Propositions. In 1657, he was appointed to the see of Montpellier. He died June 24, 1676, leaving Inocentii III Epistol. Libri vi cum Notis (Toulon, 1635, fol.):—Pontificum Romanorum quos Gallia Orsulana in se Sedentium, Historia, 1305 to 1394 (Paris, 1632, 8vo); Baluze has given an augmented and corrected edition Fide pup. Arva, 1693:—Michaelis Paoli Synopsis Lypm (Ibid., 1632, 8vo):—Historia Ecclesie Gallicana (best edition that of 1636, 4to):—A Life of St. Fulcran, bishop of Lodève, and other works. See Biog. Bosquier, PHILIPPE, a Flemish theologian, was born at Mons, in Hainault, in 1561. He studied theology at the university of Paris, entered the order of the Recollets, and was sent to Rome, where he gained by his talents the favor of the cardinal Baronius. He died at Avesnes in 1636. Bosquier acquired the reputation of a good preacher, although his sermons were somewhat faulty. His most desirable productions are, Trois Ecrits Nouvelles, le Petit Raisin des Ordinaires Mondains, en laquelle toutes les Mésaventures qu'on Ordonnées Superflus du Corps (Mons, 1588 or 1589):—L'Académie des Pécheurs (Ibid. 1596):—Le Fout de l'Académie des Pécheurs (Arras, 1597). The author himself has given a complete edition of his works (Cologne, 1621). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

BOSS, a projecting ornament placed at the intersections of the ribs of ceilings, whether vaulted or flat; also used as a termination to weather-mouldings of doors, windows, etc., called then a Corbel or Dripstone Termination; and in various other situations, either as an ornamental stop, or finishing, to mouldings, or to cover them where they intersect each other; but their principal application is to vaulted ceilings. In Norman work the vaults are most commonly without bosses until the latter part of the style, and when used they are generally not very prominent nor very richly carved. In the succeeding styles they are used in profusion, though less abundantly in the Early English than in the Decorated and Perpendicular, and are generally elaborately carved. The Early English bosses are usually sculptured with foliage characteristic of the style, among which small figures and animals are sometimes introduced, but occasionally a small circle of mouldings, correspondings with those of the ribs, is used in the place of a carved boss. In the Decorated style the bosses usually consist of foliage, heads, animals, etc., or of foliage combined with heads and animals, and sometimes shields charged with armorial bearings are used. Many of the Perpendicular bosses bear a strong resemblance to the Decorated, but there is generally the same difference in the execution of the foliage that is found in all the other features of the style. Shields with armorial bearings are used abundantly in Perpendicular work, and there is considerably greater variation in the bosses of this style than any other; sometimes they are made to represent a flat sculptured ornament attached to the under-side of the rib; sometimes they resemble small pendants, which are occasionally pierced, as in the south porch of Dursley Church, Gloucestershire, but it is impossible to enumerate all the varieties.

Bosschaert, Thomas Willenhorts, an eminent Flemish painter, was born at Berg-op-Zoom in 1618, and studied at Antwerp under Gerard Segers. After remaining at Rome four years, he returned to Flanders, where he soon gained distinction by several pictures painted for the churches and nobles at Antwerp. There is a work by him at the Hague, representing an emblematical subject of peace and war; and in the Church of St. James at Bruges is another composition, representing the martyrdom of that saint. There are also some of his works in the Church of the Capuchins at Brussels. He died Jan. 29, 1656. See Spooner, Bios. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v., Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bossius, Jacques, a Flemish engraver, was born about 1590, and resided chiefly at Rome. The following are his principal works: St. Peter and St. John Curing the Lame Man; four, of The Four Evangelists; The Portrait of M. Angelo Buonarroti.

Bosaler, David, a minister of the German Reformed Church, was born in the vicinity of Selingrove, Pa., April 15, 1800. He joined the Reformed Church at fourteen, and at eighteen commenced the study of theology at Hagerstown, Md., under Rev. James K. Reily. He was licensed in 1821, and accepted a call from the Emmitsburg charge, which included several neighboring places. In 1829 he was appointed an agent to collect funds for the theological seminary at York. He served his first charge twelve years. In 1833 he accepted a charge at Harrisburg, Pa., where his field of labor at this time consisted less than that at Emmitsburg. In addition to this work he was for many years agent for the Dauphin County Bible Society. In 1852 he became pastor of York charge with six congregations. He was very successful in collecting funds for Church enterprises. He was compelled by failing health to resign his congregation in 1868, and died in York, May 14, 1875. He was a man of great zeal, and unselfish fidelity to the Church. By nature generous and sympathetic, he was a man of exemplary piety. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church, v. 154.

Bosmann, Johann, a Roman Catholic prelate of Germany, was born Sept. 21, 1797, at Keppelen, on the Lower Rhine. He studied at Cologne, and received holy orders in 1821. After having served as pastor in several places, he was called in 1852 to Munster as rector of the clerical seminary. In 1858 he was consecrated as bishop of Dioklea in partibus infidelium and suffragan of Munster. In 1866 he was made cathedral dean, and in 1871 doctor of theology. He died Aug. 4, 1873, at Munster. (B. P.)

Bosso, Carlo, an Italian theologian and poet, was a Lombard, and had been charged with important missions. He died Nov. 1, 1649, leaving several works, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Boss (or Bossały), Giovanni Angelo, a learned Italian theologian, was a member of the order of Barnabites, in which he performed various functions, and of which he became general. He died at Rome in 1665. He wrote, De Triplici Jubilaei Privilegio (Pisa, 1635, 1670) — Deceptiones Morales de Jurisdictione Episcoporum (Milan, 1638) — Moralitas Variar ad Usus utriusque Foet (Ipsius, 1649, 1651) — Methodus Sermonum Deo (Milan, 1656). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bossu (Lat. Bossulae), Jacques Le, a French theologian, was born at Paris in 1546. He entered the order of St. Benedict, received the degree of doctor at the Sorbonne, and was tutor to the cardinal of Guise. His affection for his former pupil led him, during the troubles of the League, to favor ardently the projects of the house of Lorraine. He especially did this by his preaching at Paris and Nantes, and it was partially due to his efforts that Nantes revolted against royal authority. He died at Paris on March 11, 1622. He was tried for his crimes by James Clement, and that the fact of Henry IV being a heretic removed from him all claim to the crown. The success of this monarch obliged Le Bossu to take refuge at Rome, where he attached himself to cardinal Alexander and a Spaniard, Francis Pegua, auditor of the tribunal, who by his writings had opposed the admission of Henry IV into the heart of the Church. Thanks to the protection of Pegua, Le Bossu was appointed by pope Clement VIII consulter of the society of Austria. He distinguished himself by his regularity of conduct and purity of manner, and at the succession of Paul V manifested a desire to return to France; but this point, highly appreciating his talents, opposed his leaving, and accorded to him large pensions, with permission to dispose of them as he saw fit at his death. Le Bossu used this favor in behalf of the poor. He died at Rome, June 7, 1628. He published, Les Derniers d'un Catholique et d'un Politique (Nantes, 1589), in which work he strongly opposed the house of Bourbon — Sermon Funebre pour la Memoire de F. Edin. Bourgoin (Ibid. 1590) — Sermon Funebre pour L'Anniversaire des Princes Henri et Louis de Lorraine (Ibid. ed.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bosset, Jacques Bénigne, a French theologian and prelate, nephew of the illustrious bishop of Meaux of the same name, was born in 1664. He is best known by his participation in the condemnation of the book which Fésulan, archbishop of Cambrai, published under the title, Explication des Maximes des Saints. Just as this work was published, Bosset and Philippeaux, his tutor, were about to leave Rome to return to France, but Bosset received orders from the bishop of Meaux to remain and examine the book. The court, however, which the nephew had on this subject with his uncle would fill not less than three quarto volumes. In this affair Bosset showed such much violence that he injured his cause to some extent. On his return to France, he was appointed abbot of St. Lucien of Beauvais, and in 1716 bishop of Troyes. Besides the nephew was a uncle, of which he was the publisher, he published, Mandement Relatif à l'Office de Saint Grégoire VII (1729) — Misaule Sancte Ecclesiae Trescaesis (1736). The innovations contained in the last-mentioned work excited universal complaint, and provoked the censure of the archbishop of Soissons, who condemned it. It received a mandate, April 20, 1737. This caused a dispute, which the bishop of Troyes finally terminated by some concessions. Bosset died at Paris, July 12, 1743. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.
BOSUTUS, Goëwin, a French monk of the order of Cistercians, a chanter, lived in the early half of the 13th century, at Saint-Pierre de Villers. This abbey, only two ruins of which remain, was situated in a valley of Brabant, about three leagues from the city of Gembloux. Bosutus wrote, in two books, the life of Arnaud de Cambrai, a lay brother of the abbey of Villers, which Francis Moschus published at Arras in 1600. The life of the monk Ambus of the same abbey is attributed to him. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bost, Jean Augustin, a French philanthropist, was born at Moutiers-Grandval, in Berne, in 1817. He was apprenticed to a bookbinder at Geneva, but love for music led him to Paris to be instructed by the great masters there. Under the influence of pastor L. Meyer he was induced to study for the ministry, and the young artist, being twenty-three years of age, passed one year of study at Sainte-Foy and two years at Montauban. But bodily infirmities obliged him to abandon his studies, and he went to Laforce, a small village in the Dordogne. The pulpit there being vacant, Bost administered to the spiritual wants of the people, and his zeal was greatly rewarded. While commenting on an article in the Free Church, which then originated (1844), received him among her ministers. Here Bost founded the many asylums which made his name so famous. He died in 1881. See Bouvier, Le Pasteur John Bost, Fondateur des Ailes de la Force (Paris, 1881); Lichtenberger, Encyclopédie des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (5 P. E.)

Bost, Paul Aim Sacio David, a Swiss Protestant theologian, was born at Geneva, June 10, 1790. His father, a member of the Moravian Church, sent his son to Newfield, where he spent four years. After his return, he pursued a theological course at his native place, and was ordained in 1814. In 1816 he accepted a position as assistant at Moutiers-Grandval, in the canton of Berne. There he preached for five years. Feeling that a congregation was too limited a field for him, he entered, in 1818, the services of the London Continental Society. After his first journeys in Switzerland and Alsace, he left, in 1819, the Church of Geneva, defending his course in Genève Religieuse en Mars 1819. In 1825 he returned to Geneva, and was appointed pastor of the Free Church of Bourg-de-Four. The ministers of the national church spoke and wrote against the schismatics, which caused Bost's Défense de Ceux des Fidèles de Genève qui se sont Constitués en Eglise Indépendante, contre le Sectaires de cette Ville. The excitement was great. He left Geneva, 1830. On the 1st of July, 1836, a matter was brought before the court. Bost pleaded his own case, and was acquitted. The procurator-general made an appeal, and the matter was brought before the supreme court. Bost pleaded again for himself, and was acquitted of the accusation for libel, but was fined five hundred francs for offensive expressions against an official corporation (the Compagnie des Pasteurs). On this occasion the separated members of the Free Church were brought into closer contact with each other, and Malar, especially, gave expression to his brotherly love towards the accused. Bost soon resigned his position in the Church of Bourg-de-Four, and organized a new congregation at Carouge, near Geneva. In 1838 he founded a political-religious paper, L'Esprance, which, together with his congregation at Carouge, he soon gave up. In 1840 he was again received into the national Church of Geneva, and accepted a call to Asnières, Bourges, and finally to Melan, where he was appointed pastor of the united church of Geneva, and labored there until 1848. Between 1849 and 1851 we find him at Geneva, Nimes, and Paris. The last years of his life he spent with his son at Laforce, where he died, Dec. 14, 1874. Bost left Mémoires pour- raut Servir à l'Histoire Religieuse des Églises Protestanttes des d'aluise et de la France (1854-56, 2 vols.).

Boston, John, an English monk of St. Edmundsbury, is supposed to have died in 1410. He was one of the first collectors of the lives of English writers and the precursor of Leland, Bale, and Pits. His work was entitled Speculum Canonicorum (Oxford, 1722). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Bostra, Council of (Concilium Bostraanum), was held about 227, in consequence of the errors of Beryllus, bishop of the place, who denied that our Lord Jesus Christ had any proper existence before the Incarnation, and maintained that he then only began to be God when he was born of the Blessed Virgin, and, moreover, that he was God only because the Father dwelt in him and was in him. He was in the office of convincing him of his errors, in which, after several conferences, he succeeded, and brought him back to the Catholic faith (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. v, 33). See Labbe, Concil. i, 651.

Another Council of Bostra was held, at which Origen refuted some Arabian, who said that the souls of men died with their bodies and came to life after the resurrection.

Bostwick, David, a Presbyterian minister, was born at New Milford, Conn., in 1721. He entered Yale College, but before graduating left, and completed his studies with Burr at Newark, and was for some time his assistant in the academy. He was ordained by the New York Presbytery, and installed pastor of the Free church at Jamaica, L. I., Oct. 9, 1745. Davies heard him preach before the synod in 1753, and said of him, "I think he has the best style of extempore preaching of any man I ever heard." He had been appointed on a mission to Virginia and North Carolina, but he never went. He continued at Jamaica ten years, enjoying the affections of his people and the town. At a meeting of the freeholders in 1759, only three dissenters from giving to the elders and deacons certain lands and the right to sell them for the support of a Presbyterian minister forever. His relation being dissolved at Jamaica, he was installed in New York, and died there, Nov. 12, 1763. A sermon which he preached before the synod in 1758 was printed, with the title, Self Disowned and Christ Exalted. As a preacher he was uncommonly popular, his gift being of the highest order. After his death, his treatise, entitled, A Fair and Rational Vindication of the Right of Infants to the Ordinance of Baptism was published in New York and reprinted in London. (W. P. S.)

Bostwick, Gideon, a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born at New Milford, Conn., Sept. 21, 1742 (O. S.). Rev. Nathanial Taylor, the Congregational minister of his native town, gave him his preparatory for college, and he graduated at Yale in 1762. Great Barrington, Conn., became his permanent residence in consequence of his accepting the charge of a classical school recently established there. For some time he officiated as lay reader in the Episcopal Church at that place, and this ultimately led him to become a candidate for orders. He repaired to England, and was appointed a missionary in the British and American Missions, and returned in 1770 to Connecticut. In June he became rector of St. James's Church, Great Barrington, which position he occupied until the end of his life, June 13, 1783. St. Luke's Church in Lanesborough was also under his supervision during the same period. A few years before his death he preached a part of the time in a church at Hudson, N. Y., in connection with his rectorship at Great Barrington. See Sprague, Annals of the Ark, Pulpit, v. 274.
Bostwick, Mr. John of Bostwick, was a minister of the Society of Friends (Orthodox). She died at the Plains, Ulster Co., N. Y., April 23, 1835, aged forty-eight years. See The Friend, i. 280.

Bostwick, William W., a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born in Whitestown, Oneida Co., N. Y., Feb. 19, 1797. He attended the Auburn Academy, and completed his academic studies with Rev. Dr. McDonald at Fairfield, Herkimer Co. When the latter, in 1821, took charge of the academy at Gen-

He experimented in religion in 1824, and in 1828 was admitted into the New England Conference, in which he labored with zeal and diligence till his decease in 1835.
Mr. Bosworth possessed a clear understanding, was perspicuous and pointed in his preaching, dignified and graceful in manner, deep and uniform in piety. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1835, p. 248.

Botanomancy (Barisum, an herb, and parvisor, a prophecy), divination by means of plants. It was practiced among the ancient Greeks on touching its name on herbs and leaves, and then exposing them to the winds; and as many letters as remained were placed together in a word or words, which formed the answer to the inquiry. See Divination.

Both, Andrew and John, brothers, were eminent Dutch painters, and natives of Utrecht, John, the elder, being born about 1610. They first studied under their father, and afterwards under A. Bloemaert. The works of these artists had gained them a wide reputation, when Andrew was accidentally drowned in 1645. John died in 1650. The following are some of their principal works: St. Anthony Praying, with a Skull; St. Francis with a Crucifix before him; Two Beggars; two of Dutch Merry-making.

Bott, William H., a Baptist minister, was born at Salem, Mass., Nov. 25, 1816. At the age of fourteen he removed to Boston, where he was apprenticed to the printing business. He made profession of his faith in 1834, in 1835 commenced preparation for college, and graduated from Brown University in 1840. Soon after leaving college he went South, and was ordained at Baltimore to the work of an evangelist. The winter of 1840-41 he spent with the Baptist Church in Alexandria, D. C., where his labors were blessed to the souls of many. He has since been to fail many in the spring of 1841, and in June he returned to Salem, where, after an illness of a few months, he died, Oct. 7, 1841. See Christian Watchman, Nov. 19, 1841. (J. C. Bottari, Giovanni Gaetano, a learned Italian priest, was born at Florence, Jan. 15, 1689. At the age of ten years he studied ancient literature and eloquence under Antonio Marie Biscioni, with whom he formed a friendly alliance, and whom, on one occasion, he aided in his labors. He applied himself to the study of the Greek language, mathematics, philosophy, and theology. The Accademia della Crusca conduced to him the reprint of the most important, in which he associated the marquis Andrea Alamanni and Rocco Martini. He afterwards had charge of the printing-house of the grand-duke of Tuscany. At Rome, where he established himself in 1730, he became canon, professor of ecclesiastical history and controversy at the College of Sapienza, and a prince of the palace. He was appointed by Clement XI custodian of the library of the Vatican, and there arranged a cabinet of medals according to the wishes of the pope. His friend, Benedict XIV, gave him to the canonship of St. Marie Trasteverine, and wished to have him in his palace as chaplain. He died at Rome, June 8, 1775, leaving many works, among which we mention, Lezioni tre Supra il Trettorno (Rome, 1733, 1748) — Del Museo Capodimonte, Tomo Primo, Contenente Immagini di Umani Illustri (ibid. 1741); vol. ii is in Latin, Musei Capodimontei Tomus Secundus, Augurorum et Augustarum herbos Contiuamina, cui Observationibus Italiae Capodimontae, num Latinae Editis (ibid. 1740). He attested many charters of Offa, in 774, 779, and for the last time in the Council of Cealbyth in 789. (2) ABBOT of Ripon, who died in 786, and was succeeded by Albert. A letter addressed by an abbot Botwine to Lullius, archbishop of Mentz, may have been written by either of the two Botwines.

Boucher, Jean, a French theologian, was born in Paris about 1548. Instead of a tranquil life in the chair of a university or in the heart of an abbey, he chose to mingle in the civil disturbances which were then agitating the kingdom, and thus ended his life in exile. At first he taught literature and philosophy at Rhiems, later he taught philosophy at the college of Burgundy, then theology at the college Des Grasins, and finally became rector of the university. Prior of the Sorbonne, he was made doctor of theology and rector of St. Benedict. But the fortune which he had obtained by his merit he compromised by his fury against monarchy. In 1588 he wrote a satire against the duke of Epernon, entitled Histoire Trauue et Mémorable de Gaverston, Ancien Mignon d'Edward I. The satir following appeared his treatise, De Justa Hincriti III Abhicatione e Francorum Rege (Paris, 1589). He delivered and published, during the last days of the resistance of Paris, his Sermons de la Simulac Conversion et Nullité de la Prétendue Absolute d'Henri de Bourdon. Boucher died at Tournay in 1594. Besides the works already mentioned, he wrote several others, among which we notice, Apologie pour Jehan Chastel, Parizien, Excusé à Mort, et pour les Perses et Écuyers de la Société de Jesus (1595, 1610); — Avoue contre l'appel Intérêté par la Citéure Edmond Richer, etc. (Paris, 1612). He wrote, Vie de la Bienheureuse Sœur Marie de l'Incarnation, dite dans le Monde Madeleine Acarie, etc. (Paris, 1800); — Retraite d'après les Exercices Spirituels de Saint Ignace (ibid. 1807) — Vie de Sainte Thérèse (ibid. 1810). Boucher, Joshua (1), a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in West Virginia, Oct. 27, 1877. He was consecrated to the ministry in 1896, served some time as class-leader and exhorter, received license to preach in 1811, and in 1818 entered the Tennessee Conference. With the exception of two years as supernumerary, he did active work until the time of his death, Aug. 23, 1843. He was solicitous, generous, cheerful, and deeply religious. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of M. E. Church South, 1845, p. 19.

Boucher, Joshua (2), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Lee County, Va., April 2, 1757. He experienced conversion in 1815 through the labors of a pious domestic slave, and in 1818 entered the Tennessee Conference. Everywhere he was laborious and successful. In 1827 he moved to Ohio and joined the Ohio Conference, and subsequently became a member of the Cincinnati Conference. Failing health caused him to become a supernumary in 1867, which relation he held to the close of his life, Nov. 22, 1873. Mr. Boucher was a man of excellent qualities, energetic, successful, and highly esteemed. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1874, p. 101.

Boucher, Nicolas, a French prelate, was born at Cernay, Nov. 14, 1528. He was the son of a simple laborer, and during his studies at the University which he became professor of philosophy at Rheims, and then had charge of the university as rector. He was afterwards called to the episcopacy of Verdun. In a work entitled Vindicatio Episcopatus N. Bocherti (Verdun, 1592), he proved that the Church of Verdun was not dependent upon the Gaussian concordat and Clement V. sanctioned this doctrine. Although by his own acknowledgment on the side of the princes of Lorraine, he withdrew to take part with the League. He died April 19, 1598. He wrote Apologie de la Morale d’Aristote contre Omer Talon (ibid. eod.), dedicated to the cardinal of Lorraine, to whom Boucher had been tutor, and whose patronage he had obtained. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bioi. Générale, s. v.

Boucheron, Carlo Emilio Maria, an Italian philologist and theologian, was born at Turin, April 28, 1773. At the age of eighteen he became doctor of theology; studied law and became secretary of state and titular the following year. Being removed from his position by the French invasion in 1804 at the Lyceum of Turin, and in 1811 was called to the chair of Latin eloquence at the university of the same city. He applied himself to the study of the Oriental languages, and continued to divide his time between teaching and literary labors. In 1832 he was professor of history at the Military Academy, and of archaeology at the School of Fine Arts. He died March 16, 1838. His principal works are, De Clemente Dalmano Privocua (Turin, 1815); De Josepho Vernazza (1837; published first in the Acts of the Academy of Sciences at Turin); Specimen Inscriptwm Latinarum Edentis Thomas Vallicello (ibid. 1836); De Thomas Valperga Calusio (ibid. 1833; Alexandria, 1835). See Hoefer, Nouv. Bioi. Générale, s. v.

Boucher (or Boucher), Gilles, a French Jesuit, was born at Arras in 1576, and died in 1665, leaving Belgiiun Romanum Ecclesiasticum et Civile (Lige, 1655, fol.); it extends from the end of the period embraced by Cesar's commentaries to the death of Clavus I. See Bioi. Universelle, v. 271.

Boucher, Thomas, an English prelate was born about 1404. At an early age in religion he went to Oxford, and took up his abode at Nevils Inn. His education was inferior. His high birth seems to have brought him early into notice. He was elected chancellor of the university of Cambridge in 1428. In 1435 he received the temporalities of his see at Worcester, and in the May following was duly consecrated in the Church of Blackfriars, London, his uncle, bishop of Winchester, officiating on the occasion. He was transferred to the more opulent see of Ely, Feb. 27, 1448. It seems that, during the whole period of his occupation of the see, the young prelate was so absorbed in politics that he thought of his bishopric only as a source of income. He was promoted to the see of Canterbury in 1454, and consecrated in February, 1455. In 1464 he was created cardinal presbyter of St. Cyriacus in Thermis. His attention was now directed to the dangers to which the Church and country were exposed. He required each person to either say mass or to repeat the seven psalms with the litany. By this means he thought he might bring about a reform, and after many hard struggles with enemies he did much to improve the state of the Church. Boucher was distinguished in his day for his moderation and candor; he was not inclined to sacrifice the welfare of his country to the exigencies of his party, and from the fact, perhaps, that he had no very definite principles or strong personal attachments, he was able to do more good than could have been done by a man of a more rigid character. When he entered upon the life prospects of the country were gloomy and dark. The disasters of the French in England, and the disgrace which had been brought upon the once victorious armies of England, ranckled in the minds of the people. Boucher was well termed the peacemaker; during his whole reign, he was always ready to do anything honorable to re-establish the balance. When he closed his life, the country was not in such a state of uproar, and the debt of the court was paid; nothing, at the time of his death, could exceed the splendor of the court, and no one felt more joy than himself. The last official act of archbishop Boucher's trembling hand was "to hold theposing, to receive the white rose and the ring tied together." He died April 6, 1486. See Hook, Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, v, 269 sq.

Having become priest and doctor of theology, he devoted himself to missions in divers provinces, and occupied himself in the composition of a great number of instructive works, of which the principal ones are, Dieu seul, ou, Le Saint Esclave du Vainqueur, Mere de Dieu (Paris, 1674);—La Vie cachée avec Jésus en Dieu (ibid. 1676, 1678); —La Conduite de la Douce Providence, etc., (Lige, 1678)—La Science de la Pratique du Christ (Londres, 1688, 1685). Boudot died at the last-mentioned city, Nov. 11, 1655. This prelate was distinguished as a theologian and prelate for his knowledge of languages. He left, Summa Theologiae D. Thomas Aquinas, Recensita (Arras, fol.)—Nova Metaphysica (Antwerp, 4to)—Traité du Sacrement de Pénitence (Paris, 1601);—Formula Visitationis per Tipsum mun Dioecesin Facienda (Douai, 1627, 8vo),—Cate

Bouillaud (or BOUlLau), ISMAEL, a French theologian, was born at Loulon, Sept. 28, 1695, of Protestant parents; when, however, he attained his twentieth-fifth year, he abjured the faith of his parents, and was received into priest's orders. In 1640 he wrote Diatriba de St. Benigno, i.e., a dissertation on the chronology of the life of St. Benignus of Dijon, which was first published by D'Achery, in the first volume of his Spicilegium (1655). Bouillaud also, in 1649, wrote Pro Sententia St. Stanislas ac Clerum Gallicanum Libri Duo, in behalf of the Church of Portugal, which had remained destitute of fresh bishops from the period at which that country shook off the Spanish yoke, the pope refusing the necessary bulls to those who were nominated by king John IV. Bouillaud shows how the right of election is with the priests and people, and that the claim asserted by princes to nominate to the bishoprics of their kingdoms is a pure usurpation. This treatise, together with another on the same subject, entitled De Populâ Fundis, was printed at Strasbourg in 1640, in 1656. He also gave the Historiae Saxoniae of Theodoric of Beke, with a Latin version and notes, printed at the Louvre, and a Treatise on the Paschal Moon, in reply to M. Tioard. He claimed for his nephew the title of duchess of Auvrigne, and, on some of his demands being refused, he so conducted himself as to become disgrace. In 1684 he wished to become prince bishop of Liege, but failed. In 1689 he was ambassador from France to Rome, and dean of the sacred college, when he refused to aid in the condemnation of Fénelon, and sought to prevent it. He was recalled to Rome, but refused to go. At length, deeply humiliated, he returned to France; but, exiled from the court, he retired to his abbey of Tournus. At this epoch appeared the Histoire Généalogique de la Maison d'Auvergne, which had been composed by Baluze. After a long time he sought to justify his conduct, and obtained, with the restoration of his income, permission to go to Rome, where he died in March, 1715. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biol. Générale, s. v.

In 1700 he became chaplain to Sir Charles Hedges, and soon after a canon of the cathedral of Winchester and the archdeaconry of Surrey. In 1719 he went to BOULTON

Hanover as chaplain to George I, when he so won the king's favor that the latter promoted him to the deanery of Christ Church and bishopric of Bristol the same year. Five years later he was made Bishop of Armagh and lord primate of Ireland. He expended £30,000 in augmenting the incomes of the poorer clergy; erected and endowed hospitals at Armagh and Drogheda for clergymen's widows; contributed to the establishment of chartered schools; and during the famine of 1740, he contributed £5,000 a day for 2500 persons. In June, 1742, he made a visit to his native country, and died in London in September of the same year. He published several sermons and charges; and his Letters to several Ministers of State in England, relative to Transactions in Ireland from 1724 to 1798, were published in two volumes (Oxford, 1792-70). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

BoULTON, THOMAS, an English Methodist minister, was born in 1808. He was converted in early manhood, joined the Primitive Methodist Church, and in 1888 entered their ministry. After he had travelled in nineteen circuits, enduring severe toil and much privation, his health failed, and in 1872 he took a supernumerary position, still working as he had strength. He located near Whitchurch, Dorset, exhibiting his sincere piety in his very loving visits to the sick, poor, and aged, till paralysis laid him aside. He peacefully died, July 30, 1861.

Bouware, Theodorick, a Baptist minister, was born in Virginia, Nov. 13, 1790. He was ordained in 1819, and spent seventeen years as a preacher in Kentucky. In 1827 he removed to Missouri. He is said to have been "a man of high order of talent, well educated, energetic, and an impressive preacher, and he stood in the front rank as a defender of the faith." His connexion, through his ministerial life, was with the "Old school," who held anti-mission principles. He died Sept. 21, 1867. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclopaedia, p. 120. (J. C. S.)

Bouna, Johannes ACRONIUS VAN, a Dutch Protestant theologian, was professor of theology at Franeker, and died in September, 1623. He wrote, Syntagma Theologiae (Groningen, 1605) = Problema Theologiae de Nomine Elohim (ibid. 1616). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bound (or Bowud), NICOLAS, D.D., an English clergyman at Norton, in Suffolk, died in 1607. In 1595 appeared his Subbathum Veteris et Novi Testamenti; in which the Puritan doctrine of the Lord's day was for the first time clearly and prominently asserted.

Bounded Thursday is Ascension-day, which always occurs on a Thursday. This day was so called because the old parish custom of marking or beating the bounds was observed annually either on this day or on one of the Rogation days. By this act the bounds of the various parishes remained matters of personal knowledge and individual repute.

Bournieu, M. HONORÉ, a French painter and engraver, was born at Marseilles in 1740, and studied in Paris under M. Pierre. In 1775 he was elected a royal academician. He died in 1814. The following are some of his principal religious engravings: Adam and Eve driven from Paradise; Mygdalene Penitent; The Deluge. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Bounties, Queen Anne's, the profits of the first-fruits and tenths, which were anciently given to the pope, transferred in the reign of Henry VIII to the king, and restored to the Church by Queen Anne, who caused a perpetual fund to be established from the revenue thus raised, which was vested in trustees for the augmentation of poor livings under £30 a year. This has been further regulated by subsequent statutes; but as the number of livings under £30 was at the commencement of it 5597, averaged at £28 per annum, its operation is very slow.

Bouquet, MARTIN, a French writer, was born at Amiens, June 6, 1703. He married, in 1726, the niece of St. Benedict, and became librarian of the abbey of St. Germain-des-Prés, which appointment, however, he resigned in order to give himself entirely to his studies. His first work was a new edition of Josephus, which, however, he did not complete himself, but sent the fruit of his labors to Travel with, at Amsterdam, who published his edition of the historian (1762, 2 vol. fol.). The minister Colbert had conceived the design, as far back as 1676, of a collection of the Gallic and French historians, which, after his death, Le Tellier, archbishop of Rheims, determined to carry into execution. Maubillon refused the task, which was accepted by Pierre, who was occupied with it until his death, in 1721. Then Dom Denys de St. Marthe, the superior-general of the Benedictine Congregation of St. Maur, proposed that his monks should undertake the completion of the work, and Bouquet was selected to commence the labor. He published the first two volumes of the collection, under the title Rerum Gallicarum et Franciscarum Scriptores (1738). These were followed, in succession, by six others, up to the time of his death, in the monastery des Blanc-Mandeaux at Paris, April 6, 1754. Bouquet had chosen for his assistants D'Antine and J. B. Handiquier, the latter of whom, with his brother Charles, completed the 24th volume. The work was carried on by other authors to the twentieth volume (1840). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Bouquin, CHARLES, a French Dominican, was born at Tarascon in 1622. He was particularly distinguished by the success of his controversies with the Calvinists, against whom many French bishops eagerly sought the aid of his services. His plan of opposing them was to mount a rival pulpit near their preachers, and, taking the sermons which they had delivered, to subject them to the test of Holy Scripture, the teaching of the fathers, and the decisions of the council. He died in his convent at Buix, Feb. 14, 1698, leaving many works; among them, Commentaries in Prosem seu Citticm D. Thomas (Lyons, 1677, fol.) = Sermones Apologetici, quibus Sanctus Catholico ac R. Eccl. Fides contra Norocatesa Defendentur (ibid. 1689, fol.) = Instructions Christiennes et Orthodoxes en Forme de Catechisme (Carpentras, 1686, 1689, 12mo) = Sermons, in French, for Advent, Lent, the octave of the Feast of the Holy Sacrifice, and all Sundays and festivals. These remain in MS.

Bourault, Religion of the. The Bouraits are a people of Mongol origin, who reside in the western part of Siberia and on the frontiers of China, in the government of Irkutzk. Their religion is a mixture of Lamaism and Shamanism. In their huts they have wooden idols, naked or clothed; others are of felt, tin, or lamb's skin; and others again rude daubings with soot by the Shamans, or priests, who give them arbitrary names. The women are not allowed to approach or pass before them. The Bourait, when he goes out or returns to his hut, bows to his idols, and this is almost the only daily mark of respect that he pays them. He annually celebrates two festivals in their honor, and at these men only have a right to be present.

He was remarkable for his piety and strictness of deportment. Being sent to the states-general of Tours in 1467, he was the following year elected to the archiepiscopate see of that city. In 1483 pope Sixtus IV made him cardinal. He died at Tours in 1484. He wrote some ecclesiastical treatises, the chief of which is Opus pro Pragmatica Sanctorum Abrogatione (Rome, 1486; Toulouse, 1518), wherein he attacked the pragmatic sanction as acting against the laws of the Gallican Church. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s. v.

In 1110 he succeeded St. Geraud, archbishop of Braga, and was sent by Pascal II to settle the difficulties which existed between him and the emperor Henry V. He proved false to the interests of Pascal, who caused him to be excommunicated at the Council of Cambrai. This pontificate continued soon after, and Henry succeeded in electing Maurice, who took the name of Gregory VII; but his election was soon declared null, and he fell into disgrace and died in prison at Fumone, near Alatri, in 1122. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s. v.

We have from him a posthumous work entitled Idée d'un bon Écclésiastique. A history of his life has been written by Descourbeaux (Paris, 1714), and abridged by Bouchard (ibid. 1784). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s. v.

Bourdon. See Staff, Fructenort.

Bourdon, Sebastien, an eminent French painter and engraver, was born at Montpellier in 1616. He studied under his father, and subsequently went to Rome, where he remained three years. On returning to Paris he executed the Crucifixion of St. Peter, in the Church of Notre Dame, which is considered his master-piece. He also painted in different churches in Sweden. The following are some of his principal works: Jacob Bourgeois, Edme Bernard. See Bourré.

Bourgeois, David, a minister of the French Reformed Church, was the predecessor of Daniel Bouget, under whom the Church at New Rochelle succeeded and went to the Episcopalian. He served the Church at New Rochelle from 1657 to 1697, and occasionally, from 1696 to 1706, served New Paltz as a supply. He was a staunch Puritan, from 1697 to 1717. He died in 1724. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America (3d ed.), p. 191.

Bourg, Anne de, a French magistrate, a counsellor clerk at the Parliament of Paris, nephew of Antoine, was born in 1521 at Riom, in Auvergne. Destined at first for the Church, and having even taken orders, he left the ecclesiastical calling for that of the bar, in which position he won distinction. Having adopted the opinions of Calvin, he soon became full of zeal for the Reformation, which was then agitating France. The bishop of Paris declared him a heretic, and he was finally condemned to death and executed in Paris, Dec. 20, 1559, and the Protestants numbered him among their martyrs. See Huet, Histoire des Protestants de France (2d ed., 1700), vii. 700.

Bourgade, François, a French apostolic missionary, was born in 1686 at Ganju, India. Having completed his theological studies at the seminary of Auch, he was ordained priest in 1832. In 1838 he was authorized to perform the offices of the sacred ministry in all the French possessions of Algeria. He founded at Tunis a hospital for poor women, and an asylum and schools for young girls. He was a profound student of Arabic literature, and greatly aided him, and his missions were highly successful. He published, Toison d'Or de la Langue Phénicienne (1852), an important work, in which are found a great number of Arabic inscriptions. He also wrote, Soirées de Carthage, ou Dialogues entre un Frère Catholique, un Mahomet et un Cadi (Paris, 1869). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bourgeois, François, a French missionary, was born at Lorraine, and lived in the latter half of the 18th century. He was a Jesuit, and having completed his theological studies at Pont à Mousson, he left France, March 15, 1767, to go to China. At Pekin he became superior of the French Jesuits. The Lettres Édifiantes contain some letters from this missionary. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

He was at first canon and chanter of the cathedral of Verden, and then obtained, in the diocese of Poitiers, the abbey of Merci Dieu. In 1745 he was sent to pope Innocent X, by the French bishops who approved the book entitled De la Fréquente Communion, and he prevented the condemnation of its author by the esteem with which he inspired the pope and cardinals. On his return to Rome he consecrated himself to the ministry in the abbey of Port Royal des Champs. A little later, in order to devote himself more closely to religious duties, he withdrew from his abbey of Merci Dieu. He died Oct. 29, 1687. He composed with Lallane, abbot of Val Croissant, and translated into French, the work entitled Conditions Proposées à Examen de Gratitude Doctrine. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bourgeois, Margaret, founder of the Congregation of Notre Dame, Montreal, was born in Troyes, France, April 15, 1620. Being refused admission to the Carmelite order of her native city in 1640, and afterwards of the Poor Clares, she finally decided to accompany M. de Maisonneuve, one of the first and truest friends of the Canadian colonists, to Canada. They arrived in Quebec on Sept. 22, 1653. She opened a school in Montreal; founded her congregation in 1652; procured letters-patent from Louis XIV, in 1670, for the legal confirmation of her institute; founded many missions, and in 1688 obtained from St. Vallier, bishop of Quebec, the confirmation of the rules of her order. In 1698 her see Laval was accepted, and this humble saint became the last and least member of the flourishing community she had founded. She died in 1700, and it is said that miracles were wrought by the application of her relics. See (N. Y.) Cath. Almanac, 1878, p. 59.

Bourges, Councils of (Concilium Bituricense). Of these there were several.

I. Held in November, 1031, under Aymo de Bourbon, archbishop of Bourges. Twenty-five canons were published, the first of which orders the name of St. Martial to be placed among those of the apostles. The third forbids bishops or their secretaries to receive money on account of ordination. The seventh orders all ecclesiastics to observe the tonsure, and to be shaved. The twelfth forbids the exacting of any fee for baptism, penance, or burial, but permits the voluntary offerings of the faithful upon these occasions to be accepted. See Labbe, Concil. xi, 291.

II. Held Nov. 30, 1225, by the legate, the cardinal of St. Angelo, assisted by about one hundred French bishops. Here Raymond, count of Toulouse, and his opponent, Amauri de Montfort (who claimed to be count of Toulouse), pleaded their cause, without, however, any decision being arrived at. The pope's demand of two hundred crowns for his reasons to be presented, and a prebend in every other conventual church, throughout France, was rejected. See Labbe, Concil. xi, 1017.

III. Held Sept. 13, 1276, by Simon de Brié, cardinal and legate. Sixteen articles were published, tending chiefly to the maintenance of the jurisdiction and immunities of the Church, and the freedom of elections. Among other things, the laity were forbidden to make use of violence or threats, in order to obtain the removal of censures. Secular judges were forbidden to constrain ecclesiastics to appear before them, etc. The canons were sent by the cardinal to every one of the French bishops. See Labbe, Concil. xi, 1017.

IV. Held on Sept. 19, 1286, by Simon de Beaulieu, archbishop of Bourges, assisted by three of his suffragans. Here a constitution, consisting of thirty-five articles, was published, reiterating and enforcing those of the preceding councils. Among other things, it was ordered that the ecclesiastical judges should annul all unlawful marriages, and separate the parties, whoever they might be; that every beneficed person who should continue for one year under excommunication, should be deprived of his benefice; that curates should keep a list of all the excommunicated persons in their parishes, and publish it every Sunday; that they should warn their people to confess at least once in every year; that bows and all kinds of arms should be removed from churches; that all Sundays and festivals be properly kept; etc. Other canons relate to the regulars. See Labbe, Concil. xi, 1246.

V. Held in 1293 by Francesco de Torino, archbishop of Bourges, with his suffragans. Twenty-three deacons were made, of which the first five relate to the Lutheran, and the rest to matters of discipline. Curates are exhorted to instruct their parishioners, and, in order to give more time for that purpose, they are directed to abridge the services until the sermon. Certain prebendaries and councils are directed to be held every three years, according to the decree of the council of Constance. Bishops are ordered to visit their dioceses annually, in order that they may take due care of the sheep entrusted to them. The regulations of the council of Constance and of the pragmatic sanction, concerning the residence of canonos and other ministers, are confirmed; also that which directs that the psalms he chanted slowly, and with particular movements, so as to enablé to explain to the people the commandments of God, the Gospel, and something out of the epistle for the day. Pastors are enjoined to forbid penitents to reveal the nature of their penance, and themselves to observe secrecy, both as to what is revealed to them at confession, and also as to the prayers they have imposed. No conformity is to be erected without the consent of the ordinary. It was further enacted that the bishops should have a discretionary power to retrace the number of festival days according as they should think best; that bishops should not grant letters dimissory without having first examined the candidate for orders and found him qualified; and then to those only who have a benefice or a patronial tithe; further, that none shall not leave their monastery. Afterwards the council made various decrees concerning the jurisdiction and liberty of the clergy: the first is upon the subject of monitions; the second upon the residence of curates, that no dispensation for non-residence be granted without a full investigation of the reasons; the third respects cemeteries, which it orders to be kept enclosed and locked up. After this, four tenths for two years were voted to King Francis I, to make up the ransom of his two sons, then hostages at Madrid, to be levied on the clergy, seculars, and regulars. See Labbe, Concil. xiv, 426.

VI. This council was held in September, 1584. Forty-six chapters were published, each containing several canons (preceded by the confession of faith made by those present). 1. Relates to the worship and service of God; 2 and 3, of the faith and preaching; 4, of the abuse of Holy Scriptures, and orders that the Latin version of the Scriptures shall alone be used, and that bishops' secretaries shall keep a list of prohibited books, which shall be shown annually to publishers; 5, of avoiding heretics; 6, of invocation of saints and of festivals; 7, of pilgrimages; 10 and 11, of relics and images; 12, of the celebration of the holy office, etc.; 16, of cemeteries; 17, of tradition; 18-28, of the sacraments; 31, of excommunication; 34, of canons and chapters; 35, of parish rector, orders them to reside in their cure, and to say mass themselves; orders bishops to divide parishes which become too populous; 40, of the female clergy; there is no parsimony; it directs the bishop to take care to provide one, at the expense of the parishioners; 36, of benefices; 40, of witchcraft and enchantments; 41 and 42, of simony, concubinage, priests, etc.; 45, of hospitals; 45, of the laity, forbids them to sit with the clerks at Church; bids them to abstain from dances, plays, etc.; also from the use of frizzled hair; 46, of synods. See Labbe, Concil. xv, 1067.

Bourgoin, Edmond, a French theologian, became prior of the Jacobins at Paris, and showed great fanaticism, even justifying the assassination of Henry IV. He was arrested in 1589 with arms in his hands, and executed at Tours, Jan. 26 following. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bourgoin, François, a celebrated French theologian, was born in Paris, March 8, 1685. From his brilliant scholarship he was made doctor of the Sorbonne, and then rector of Clichy, near Paris. In 1611 he resigned this position in order to ally himself with the cardinal of Berulle, who at this time founded the order of the Oratorians, and he was actively engaged in establishing a new congregation at Nantes, Dieppe, Rouen, and especially in the Netherlands. In 1641 he was elected superior-general in place of Conderen. In this high position he showed great zeal, and faithfully worked for the good of the order, yet by this very means gained for himself rural conclaves, and a contest where he was obliged to defend himself in very lively contradictions with the friars. Fatigued with the course of affairs, and weighed down by years and infirmities, he resigned in 1661, and died the following year. He had been for a long time confessor to Gaston, duke of Orléans, and then to Henry IV. He died in the seventeenth volume of the works of this great bishop it may be found. Bourgoin was the author of a number of works of a religious character, also of ecclesiastical discipline, of which the following are some of the titles: Légum Cruces (Paris, 1630); Breviarius romani Missarum (1646); Veritates doctissimi Ecclesiae Verbi Incarnati (Antwerp, 1630); Homilias Christiennes sur les Événements des Dimanches et Fêtes Principales (Paris, 1642); and several other works. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; See BOURGONSENT.

Bourignon, Antoinette, a French visionary, was born at Lisle, Jan. 13, 1616. She rendered herself famous by her numerous works, by her religious innovations, and by certain revelations which she claimed. She escaped an undesired marriage, and placed herself under the care of the clergy. At Amsterdam she abjured Catholicism, and advocated the Reformation. She published several of her works at Amsterdam, but, being accused of sorcery, she was obliged to leave the place, and became a deaconess at Hamburg. She died Oct. 9, 1680. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; See BOURGIGNONISTS.

Bourke, Richard, a prelate of the Church of England, was born April 22, 1767. He took his degree of M.A. July 10, 1799; and in 1818 became lord bishop of Waterford and Lismore. He died suddenly, Nov. 15, 1832. See (Lond.) Christian Remembrancer, Dec. 1832, p. 745.

He entered early in the ecclesiastical calling, took the oath required of the clergy, and was consecrated bishop of Evreux April 23, 1802. He was successively member of the council of the hospitals, baron and count of the empire, and president of the electoral college of Evreux. After the empress Josephine had been divorced he became instead of this princess, and was finally made peer of France. He died at Evreux, Oct. 30, 1821. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

When the rebellion broke out he sided with the Presbyterian faction, and was imprisoned from his rectory of Ashover, in Derbyshire, to St. Sepulchre's, in London. On the restoration he conformed, and died rector of Alston, in Leicester, Dec. 27, 1672. Among his works are, A Defence of Scripture as the Chief Judge of Controversy (1656); — Vindication of the Honor due to Magistrates, Men, &c., against the Quakers (1659); — A Defence of Tyndale, Infant Baptism, Human Learning, etc.; — A Golden Chain of Directions to Preservers between the Husband and Wife (1669). Bourn, Samuel, an English Dissenting minister, assistant to Dr. John Taylor of Norwich, was the founder of a sect of Annihilationists (q. v.), called, after him, BOURLIN. He died in 1796. He published Fifty Sermons on Various Subjects, Critical, Philosophical, and Moral (Norwich, 1777) — and other Sermons (1782, 1786, 1783). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Bourne, Alfred, an English Wesleyan missionary, was born at Etruria, Staffordshire Potteries, Aug. 12, 1759. He was converted in 1816, entered the ministry in 1823, traveled the Redditch, Oxford, and Reading circuits, and sailed for Madras in November, 1826. Excepting a few months at Madras, his field was Negapatam. He was successful here and also in Melnotam. He passed into a parsonage in February, 1835, he was compelled to sail for England. His heart was in the mission work, and it was a sore trial to be removed therefrom. He died at the house of Dr. Bunting, in London, May 27, 1836. Bourne translated into Tamil the Memoir of Hester Ann Rogers, commenced a treatise in the same language on the Evidences of Christianity, and assisted in a revision of the Scriptures. See Welth. Meth. Magazine, 1838, p. 321 sqq.; (Lond.) Watchman, June 1, 1836; Minutes of the British Conference, 1836.

Bourne, George, a (Dutch) Reformed minister, was born at Westbury, England, June 12, 1780. He studied at Homsfield in Yorkshire, and in 1809 he emigrated to America and settled in Virginia and Maryland. Subsequently he became principal of an academy at Sing Sing, N. Y., and pastor of the Presbyterian Church. Thence he went to Canada, as supply of a Congregational Church in Quebec, and remained until 1835. He then united with the Reformed Church, and settled as pastor at West Farms (1839-42). He died suddenly, Nov. 20, 1845, of disease of the heart. Mr. Bourne greatly resembled in appearance the portraits of Martin Luther. He possessed a thoroughly controversial spirit, which found full scope in his long-continued demonstrations against slavery and Romanism. He was learned, eloquent, and powerful, but his zeal was often too fiery, and sometimes overreached itself. He edited, for several years, a well-known periodical entitled The Protestant Vindicator, and was an almost constant contributor to the religious press of New York. He was also largely engaged upon literary work for prominent publishing houses, editing such works as that of Barrow and Leighmont, and preparing exhaustive indices to both (Riker's editions). As a preacher, he was scriptural, illustrative, versatile, and powerful. With all his belligerent gifts, he was warm-hearted and devout, an example of conscientious and brave adherence to his own opinions in the face of the inevitable and the popular. A true servant of God. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church, in America, s. v. (W. J. R. T.)

Bourne, Jacob, an English Baptist minister, was born at Beckington, near Frome, Somerset Co., Dec. 31, 1802. Losing his father at the age of fourteen, he became a thoughtless youth. At length, through domestic trials, his heart was touched by the Spirit of God, and on Aug. 30, 1824, he entered the Church at Radstock, Somersetshire. In 1834 he was encouraged to engage in ministerial labor, and performed much itinerant work. In 1846 he was provisionally led to Grettleton, in Wiltshire, and was ordained pastor of the Church in that place, July 27, 1847. Here he remained until his death, Sept. 15, 1857. See (Lond.) Baptists Hand-book, 1858, p. 47. (J. C. S.)

In 1846, on the organization of the Rock River Conference, he became a member of it. In 1868 he became superannuated, and retired to a few acres of wild land near Macomb to eke out an existence for himself and his destitute family. He closed his life in 1885. Mr. Bourne was remarkable for his zeal and piety. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1865, p. 225.

Bourne, Richard, a missionary among the Marshpee Indians, was among the early English settlers of the town of Sandwich, on Cape Cod, Mass. Being a man of an earnest, missionary spirit, he went (about 1658) among these Indians, who resided near a place a few miles from Sandwich. His work was successful, and he gathered a church of converted Indians, of which he was ordained the pastor, Aug. 17, 1670, the services being conducted by Eliot and Cotton. Satisfied that no permanent prosperity would attend the efforts of the people for whose temporal and religious prosperity he was laboring, unless they had a fixed local habitation, he obtained a formal deed of Marshpee from those Indians who claimed it as their property. His efforts resulted in greatly promoting the welfare of his people. He died about 1685. See Mather's Mag. iii, 199; Coll. Mass. Hist. Soc. 1, 172, 196-199, 218; iii, 198-190; viii, 170. (J. C. S.)

He is also remarkable for the memorial presented by the Sorbonne to the czar Peter, upon the occasion of his visit in 1717, and drawn up in a single night, upon the means of uniting the Russian and Roman churches. In 1729, he, together with many other doctors, was expelled from the Sorbonne for his opposition to the bull Unigenitus. He died at Paris, Feb. 17, 1749. See Biog. Universelle, v, 393.

the restoration, ecclesiastical studies were greatly neglected. The works of Bouvier, which were conceived under the authority of Napoleon, were adopted in the teaching, in the seminaries, of both philosophy and theology. His Institutiones Theologiae and Institutiones Philosophicae were adopted in a great number of Samuel Cheekley, of the New South Church, Boston, April 30, 1796; was dismissed May 9, 1772; went to South Carolina in 1776; took orders in the Protestant Episcopal Church; became rector of St. John's parish, Colleton, and died in October of the same year. He was the father of Bishop Bowen of North Carolina. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 708.

Bowen, Reuben, a Methodist Episcopal minister, for years was an infidel, and took delight in perplexing all who could not give a reason for their hope. He finally began a careful reading of the Bible, was convinced of its sin, and embraced Christ as his Saviour. In 1835 he entered the E. P. Church and labored with acceptance and success until his death, June 28, 1845. Mr. Bowen was a man deeply devoted to God, studious, and laborious. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1845, p. 583.

Bowen, Robert J., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the diocese of Pennsylvania, entered the ministry in 1872. He became rector of St. Thomas's Church, Philadelphia, where he remained until the time of his death, May 30, 1874. See Proc. Epi. Alumni, 1875, p. 144.

Bowen, William, an English Congregational minister, was born in March, 1790, near St. Helen's, Lancashire. In early life he went to Liverpool, and there united with the church of Rev. Mr. Charrirer, where his piety and talent found exercise in village preaching. He left Liverpool, and for some years travelled through the midland counties as a book-agent. He studied at Rowell College from 1816 to 1818. In the latter year he returned to Brencherton, where, by his exertions, in 1819, a church was formed. He set apart two days in the week to receive medical patients. He resigned his church after a few years, and lived three years, in which he won all hearts to himself. He died Oct. 9, 1854. His piety was calm and consistent, and he was pre-eminently the friend of the poor. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1855, p. 208.

Bowens, Edward, L.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the diocese of Vermont, was, for a great many years, president of the University of Norwich, Conn.; and in 1858, he became professor of moral, intellectual and political philosophy in the same institution, having resigned the presidency. The following year he was president pro tem.; in 1870 he was professor of ancient languages and political economy, a position which he held at the time of his death, July 6, 1872. See Proc. Epi. Alumni, 1875.

Bower, Jacob, a Baptist minister, was born in Lancaster County, Pa., Sept. 26, 1786. He was converted in 1812; licensed in October, 1816; and ordained in Logan County, Ky., Feb. 27, 1819—the only books he then had being a German Testament, the English Bible, and a hymn-book. For nearly ten years he served churches in Kentucky, and enjoyed many revivals. In 1829 he removed to Scott County, Ill., and became pastor of the Church at Winchester—a strong anti-missionary Church—from which he was dismissed on account of his interest in mission-work, and was sent by the Home Mission Society to preach in several counties in Illinois. He was a great sufferer for many years from a disease resembling tuberculosis, and died April 28, 1874. See Minutes of Ill. Anniversary, 1874, p. 15, 16. (J. C. S.)

Bower, Moses, a minister of the Evangelical Association, was born in Adams County, Pa., April 28, 1814.
He was converted at the age of nineteen, and entered the ministry at the age of twenty-two. At the age of thirty-two he was elected presiding elder. Eleven months and twenty days after this election, in the midst of his usefulness, he was suddenly stricken down with fever, and died. He was a man of possessing appearance, of fine talents, and of marvellous pulpit powers. In 1885 he was succeeded in that post and died in his memory in Stotaytown, Somerset Co., Pa. See Evangelical Messenger.

Bowers, John (1), a British Wesleyan minister, was born at Chester, July 19, 1796. He was brought up in the principles of the Established Church; was converted under the Methodist ministry when seventeen; entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1813; was appointed house governor at Didsbury College in 1848, which position he held until 1864; was for some time general secretary of the Theological Institution. He was president of the Conference in 1838. He retired to Southport in 1864, and died in that city, May 30, 1866. Bowers was an eminent preacher at a time when the British Conference had not a few great preachers. His voice was "rich, varied, mellow, powerful." He made the art of preaching a study; to the preparation of his discourses he devoted indefatigable pains, and in their delivery his action was so finished and theatrical, and his address so graceful that Everett thought he might rather have been selected for a disciple of Kemble than of Wesley. His language was often glaring, yet still "varied, figurative, poetical, chaste, and elevated, showing a man of more than ordinary education. He was a memorable preacher—"to the word of one syllable," says Everett. His supervision of the institution at Didsbury was eminently successful. See Everett’s finely written portrayal, Wesleyan Centenary Tablets (3d ed. Lond. 1841), i, 190 sq.; Minutes of the British Conference, 1866, p. 34; Dr. Osborn in Welsh. Methodist Magazine, March, 1870, art. 1.

Bowers, John (2), a Congregational minister, was born at Thompson, Conn., Sept. 14, 1805. He graduated at Yale College in 1829, and at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1836; was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Long Island, at Franklinville, Oct. 15, 1835. After leaving the seminary he taught one year, 1836 to 1837, in Nichols Academy, Dudley, Mass. His first settlement was at Wilbraham, where he was ordained Deacon at the Congregational Church, Dec. 15, 1837, and continued to serve in this capacity for nearly twenty years; after which he supplied the pulpit at Agawam Falls nearly a year. In October, 1857, he preached a few Sabbaths to the Third Congregational Church in St. Johnsbury, Vt., and was unanimously invited to the pastorate. He commenced his permanent labors there Jan. 1, 1858, and was installed Feb. 4, 1858. Here he labored with great fidelity until his death, Feb. 4, 1863. Mr. Bowers was to the end a man of scholarly habits, and of remarkable benevolence. In domestic life he was genial and affectionate, and, as a pastor, earnest and faithful. Three of his sermons were published. See Cong. Quarterly, 1863, p. 194; 1864, p. 114.

Bowers, W. W., a Lutheran minister, was born in Montgomery County, Pa., April 16, 1827. Although a student in Pennsylvania College, he did not graduate. For three years he studied theology at Heckerstown, Md., under the Rev. Dr. Anspack, and was licensed to preach in 1855. Soon after he removed to Nova Scotia, and became pastor at Lunenburg. Subsequently he ministered at Bridgewater and contiguous places, having charge of Bridgewater. In August, 1873, he resigned his Nova Scotia charge, and removed to Concord, N. C., as pastor of the Church there. He died in Concord, Oct. 17, 1873. See Lutheran Observer, October, 1873.

Bowers, William V., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the diocese of Pennsylvania, was born in Philadelphia, Feb. 13, 1805. He graduated at the Virginia Theological Seminary, and was ordained by bishop Moore in 1834. After a rectoryship of twenty years in St. Martin’s Parish, Hanover County, Va., he officiated in Lewistown, New Market, and Great Cacapon, latterly in his native city. He died at Oney, June 6, 1880. See Whittaker, Almanac and Directory, 1881.

Bowerox, James Gilhr, a Congregational minister, was born in North Industry, O., Dec. 15, 1833. After preliminary study at the academies at Williams Centre and Neville, he was a member, for one year, of Oberlin College. For five years he was a teacher at Butler, Ind., and for two years in Edgerton, O. In 1871 he graduated from Otterbein University, and then, in 1873-74, studied theology in Oberlin. Previous to this time, in 1869, he had been ordained by the United Brethren. In 1872 he became acting-pastor of the Congregational Church at Edgerton, and during the two years following held the same position at Pittsville. On account of impaired health he removed to a farm at Edgerton, where he became principal of a school. He died Jan. 14, 1880. See Cong. Year-book, 1881, p. 17.

Bowery, James, an English Congregational minister, was born at Bristol, July 20, 1816. In 1834 he joined the Congregational Church at Zion Chapel. During the week-days he was engaged in business, yet he managed to prepare himself for the ministry by the time he was twenty-one years of age, and became pastor of the Congregational Church at Whitchurch, Hants. After seven years’ work there he offered himself to the London Missionary Society; was accepted and appointed to Rodborough, Berbice, where he labored for nine and a half years, and became very popular. His sermons were clothed in simple language, admirably adapted to his people, full of stirring thought and striking illustrations. In 1864 he was driven from his missionary work by colonial fever. He returned to England, and in 1866 became pastor of Elenezer Chapel, Shadwell, where he continued as pastor until his death, Aug. 15, 1877. Mr. Bowery’s mind was logical rather than imaginative. To feelings of ambition, and pride, and envy he seemed a stranger. The poor, the suffering, the perplexed not only found in him a sympathizer, but a sharer. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1878, p. 308.

Bowes, Joseph, an English Wesleyan minister, was trained a Romanist, but united with the Methodist Church. He served in the ministry and entitled twenty-eight circuits. In 1855 he became a superintend- numinary in Bristol, where he died, Sept. 26, 1849. His characteristics were simplicity, humility, and charity. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1850.

Bowie, John, a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was a native of Prince George’s County, Md. Having gone to England to be ordained, he was licensed to preach in Maryland, July 29, 1714. On returning to America, he became curate to the Rev. Alexander Williamson of Prince George’s Parish, in Montgomery Co. In 1774 he was pastor of Worcester Parish, Worcester Co. With the beginning of the Revolution he exhibited violent Tory sentiments, for which he was imprisoned in Annapolis. On his release, he settled in Talbot County, on the Choptank River, teaching a classical school and becoming the rec- tor of St. Peter’s Parish. In 1785 he was pastor at Great Choptank Parish, still, however, retaining his school. Having resigned this parish in 1790, he became rector of St. Michael’s, Md., in 1795, where he continued until the close of his life, in the meantime maintaining his school. He died in 1801. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v. 574.

In that year he was settled as pastor of the Church in Winthrop, Me. After two years he was compelled to resign on account of ill-health. In 1863 he became pastor of a Church in New Market, N. H., but resigned before the close of the year. He went West, hoping to regain physical vigor. In 1865 he was appointed agent of Lincoln College, in Kansas, and subsequently became professor of English literature in that institution. He died in Topeka, Kansas, Feb. 15, 1868. See Cong. Quarterly, 1868, p. 288.

Bowler, John, a preacher of the United Methodist Free Church, was born at Newcastle-under-Lyme in 1835. Being left an orphan when young, he entered the Methodist Sunday-school, became a teacher, and was converted under Mr. W. Lawton's preaching. He was a local preacher some years, entered the ministry of the Methodist Free Church in 1863, and for eleven years occupied good circuits. He was a diligent student, good preacher, and useful pastor. He died at Lancaster in 1874. See Minutes of the 18th Annual Assembly.

Bowses, Nathaniel (1), a Baptist minister, was born in 1758. He was converted in 1777, was baptized in 1786, ordained in 1794, and spent his life in serving his Master largely in itinerant labor. A journal of eighty-six days informs us that he rode 1017 miles, preached 52 times, attended 13 meetings, expended $23.90, and received for all his service during this time $197.53. He died at Richmond, N. H., Dec. 2, 1848. (J. C. S.)

Bowses, Nathaniel (2), a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Richmond, N. H., Aug. 12, 1788, and was a son of the preceding. Bowses, John Sharpe, an English Congregational minister, was born in Norwich, July 3, 1801. He was trained in the ways of piety and truth, was converted when quite young, and began preaching when about twenty years of age. In 1838 he was appointed city missionary at Edinburgh, and continued in that office for a term of six years. Six hours per day, for five days in the week, during seventeen years, he was employed in visiting from house to house, distributing tracts, reading and praying with the people, holding prayer-meetings, and preaching in cottages and school-rooms in a parish that was the haunt of thieves, prostitutes, beggars, and gypsies. Mr. Bowles removed to Hingham in 1855, and became pastor of the Independent Church in that town. Thence he went to Sutton, Herefordshire, and thence, in 1862, to Market Lavington, Wiltshire, where he died, Feb. 15, 1864. Mr. Bowles excelled as a pastor. His kindness of heart peculiarly fitted him for this work. See (London) Cong. Year-book, 1866, p. 226.

Bowses, Oliver, an English clergyman, was fellow of Queen's College, Cambridge, and rector of Sutton. He died in 1674. His publications include Tractatus de Pastore Evangelico (1649, 1739); and some Sermons. See Allibone, Dict. of Bril. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Bowell, Orlyn D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born near Nashville, O., about 1836. He experienced conversion when about twenty-one, and in 1861 united with the Upper Iowa Conference. He was a man of prodigious energy, and labored with unflagging zeal and fidelity until his decease, March 18, 1879. Mr. Bowles was deeply pious, uniting in his pastoral work, and an able minister. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1879, p. 50.

He next settled at Hartland, where he was pastor six years (1867-73), after which he became pastor of the Church at West Fitchfield. He died at Hartland, Me., Nov. 15, 1880. See Morning Star, Aug. 25, 1880. (J. C. S.)

Bowan, Francis, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Westford, near Burlington, Vt., Feb. 27, 1799. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Otsego. He graduated from the University of Vermont, and entered Princeton Seminary in 1821, where he spent only one year. After completing his studies, he went to Virginia in 1822, and in 1824 was ordained to the full work of the Gospel ministry by the Presbytery of Hanover, and became pastor of the Church at Charlottesville, at which place and at South Plains he labored with great success. He was engaged in the service of the American Bible Society. Then he labored in Georgia and South Carolina for nineteen years. Four years he ministered at Bryan Neck. In 1822 he returned to the scenes of his early labors. From this time he devoted himself to study and meditation, and had nearly completed a work on The Baptism of the Spirit, when he died April 26, 1875. Dr. Bowan was a noble specimen of a refined Christian gentleman. See Neolog. Report of Princeton Theol. Seminary, 1876.

Bowan, Jarrett, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Charlestown, Va., Dec. 1, 1816. He was born a slave, and held in bondage until he was forty-one years old, and then bought his freedom. In his forty-eighth year he was converted, soon afterwards began exhorting, received license to preach in 1862, and in 1865 was admitted into the Washington Conference, and labored faithfully until his death at Strasburg, Va., June 11, 1878. Bowman, Samuel, D.D., a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was rector of St. James's Church at Lancaster, Pa., thirty-four years, and for three years prior to his death was assistant bishop of the diocese of Pennsylvania. He died suddenly, Aug. 3, 1861. He was highly esteemed for purity and amiability of character. See Record of the Class of 1845 of Yale College, p. 21.

Bowman, Samuel, a minister of the Society of Friends, was born in Westmoreland, England, in 1676, and was converted under the preaching of Anne Wilson, a Quaker minister. Shortly after he was himself called to the ministry, but for the first two years seldom exercised his gifts. In 1701 he made a religious visit to Ireland, where he preached a gospel, not far from Edinburgh, he was arrested for preaching in the street. Shortly after he was released, and at the end of two hours was again arrested for the same offence. He was permitted to leave the town, however, especially as one of the soldiers who guarded him interposed in his behalf. He arrived in Dublin, and soon after came in contact with George Keith, who caused him to be committed to prison at Hempstead, L. I., under the charge of speaking scandalous lies against the Church of England. As the court was not in session, he remained in prison three months. The grand jury refused to indict him, whereupon the chief justice requested them to reconsider the bill. This was accordingly done, but with the same result. While in prison he learned the trade of a shoemaker. After nearly a year of imprisonment he was set at liberty. He returned to England in 1706, and for several years was occupied with his ministerial work. In 1726 he again visited America, also the north of England and Ireland in 1740, and again in 1746. He died April 2, 1753. See Friends' Library, iii, 1-70; The Friend, viii, 310.

Bowen, Anne, relict of John Bowen, was an elder in the Society of Friends (orthodox). For more than fifty years she resided in the ancient dwelling at Flushing, L. L., where the yearly, quarterly, and monthly meetings of Friends had been held for a long time, and where she often entertained the ministers of her denomination. She died at Flushing, April 16, 1834, aged seventy-three years. See The Friend, vii, 292.

Bowring, Sir John, LL.D., a modern hymn-writer, was born at Exeter, England, Oct. 17, 1792. He exhibited unusual intellectual precocity in his youth, and had a remarkable aptitude for acquiring modern languages. His first attempt at authorship was in the publication of his translations of the popular poetry of Russia, Holland, and Spain. Subsequently he published translations from the poetry of writers in Poland, Servia, Hungary, Portugal, Iceland and Bohemia. After the death of Jeremy Bentham, he published an edition of the works of that distinguished writer on political economy, and also wrote his biography. The works thus collected are included in eleven vols., 8vo, and were issued in 1843. When the Westminster Review came into existence, he was appointed its first editor, and himself wrote the first number of it on matters pertaining to parliamentary reform and free-trade. He published, in 1838, Mutins and Vespers, with Hymns, a collection of original poetry, chiefly of a devotional character. With Villiers, he prepared a work On the Commercial Relations between France and Great Britain (1834-35, 2 vols.). He extended his inquiries in a similar direction in connexion with the countries of Switzerland, Italy, the Levant and Germany. He was a member of Parliament for two years (1833-35), and again for eight years (1841-49). He was a strong advocate of liberal opinions, and one of the counsel of the anti-corn-law league. He filled a high diplomatic position in China, having been appointed, in 1849, British consul at Canton, and afterwards acting plenipotentiary. On his return to England he published, in 1858, two volumes in which he stated his objections to the decimal system of coinage. He was knighted in 1854, and made governor of Hong Kong. Coming under the censure of Parliament on account of the course he pursued in the bombardment of the Chinese forts in 1856, he was recalled. Having been sent to Siam to conclude a treaty of commerce with that kingdom, he published his Kingdom of Siam and its People (1857, 2 vols.), and not long after he published A Visit to the Philippine Islands in 1858-59. The hymn by which Sir John Bowring is best known is the one commencing

"Watchman, tell me of the night,
What its signs of promise are, written in 1825. He died Nov. 22, 1872. See Butterworth, Story of the Hymns, p. 125; Belcher, Historical Sketches of the Society of Friends, p. 90; Appleton's New Encyclop., iii, 169. (J. C. S.)

Bowron, John, a minister of the Society of Friends, was born in Cothamstone, Yorkshire, England, in 1627, and was converted under the ministry of George Fox. At Edinburgh he preached to the people as he went through the streets of that city, and at the Cross. The soldiers were very kind to him, but the priest condemned him as a raving against him, for he was a dread to them. Subsequently he visited Barbadoes and Guiana, returning to England after a most perilous voyage. One of the first things he did after landing was to go to Richard Cromwell, with a message from the Lord, warning him of the doom that was in store for him. He made six tours in Ireland in six years. Several times he was cast into prison, and was frequently despooled of his goods. His last days were full of peace, and he died a happy, Christian death, Aug. 5, 1704. See Evans, Piety Promoted, i, 233-238. (J. C. S.)

Bowser, Joseph P., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Baltimore, Md., March 4, 1825. He gave a very extensive and very young, while very young declaration in 1852, a local preacher in 1854, and on the organization of the Washington Conference became a member thereof, and in it labored until his decease, Sept. 12, 1870. Mr. Bowser was characterized by zeal, wisdom, and devotion to his work. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1874, p. 27.

Bowstead, John, an English minister of the Society of Friends, was born near Carlisle in 1659. He was converted when young, and in early manhood "received a gift of the ministry." He labored in all parts of England, also in Scotland and Ireland, holding meetings not only among Friends, but among others, as Providence seemed to open the way, and the blessing of the Lord was with him. He showed him to many the power of preaching. He did not escape the persecutions of his time, being frequently deprived of his goods because he would not pay tithes. He died in 1716. See Piety Promoted, ii, 160, 161. (J. C. S.)

Bowtell (or Boltell), an old English term for a round moulding, or bead; also for the small shafts of columns, pilasters, window and door jambs, mullions, etc., probably from its resemblance to the shaft of an arrow or bolt. It is the English term for the torus.

Bowyer, Reynold Gideon, LL.B., an English divine, was educated at Jesus College, Cambridge. In 1791 he was appointed prebendary of Durham, and in 1814 was made rector of Howick and vicar of North Allerton, in connection with which he also held the chapelries of Brompton and Dighton. He died Jan. 30, 1826. Dr. Bowyer published A Sermon preached before the Delivery of the Colors to the Durham Volunteer Infantry (1865); and Comparative View of the Two New Systems of Education for the Infant Floor (1811, 8vo), in a charge delivered to the clergy of Durham. See (Lond.) Annual Register, 1826, p. 224.

Boyle, Hector. See BOCHE, HECTOR.

Boyle, James, a Roman Catholic priest, was born in Arlugh, County Longford, Ireland, in 1826. He emigrated to the United States early in life, completed his ecclesiastical studies at St. Joseph’s Seminary, Fordham, N.Y., and in 1854 was ordained priest and pastor of two parishes in Kansas. In 1858 he was transferred to the presbyterate over St. Teresa’s parish, New York city, and by his zeal made it one of the best in the city. He founded a parochial school for boys in Rutgers street, and established a convent for girls, under the direction of the Ursuline nuns, in Henry street. He died July 9, 1876. See Appleton’s Annual Cyclop., 1876, p. 618.

Boyle, John, an associate Reformed minister, graduated at Dickinson College in 1776. He studied divinity under the Rev. Matthew Lind, of Greenscattle, Pa., and was the first pastor of Hopewell congregation, Chester district, S.C. He died after a very brief ministry. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, IX, iv, 67.

Boyle, William, Mus. Doc., an eminent English musical master, was born in London in 1710. He received his early musical training while a chorister of St. Paul’s, and in 1736 became organist of St. Michael’s Church, Cornhill, and composer to the chapel royal. He became master of the king’s band in 1757, and soon afterwards was appointed principal organist to the chapel royal. He died in London in 1799. “As an ecclesiastical composer Boyle ranks among the best representatives of the English church.” Among his anthems the best are, By the Waters of Babylon, and O, Where shall Wisdom be Found! He published Anthems (1785); and three volumes of Cathedral Music, a collection in score of the most valuable compositions for that service by the several English masters of the two preceding centuries. See Encyclop. Brit. (9th ed.), s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Boyd, William M., a Presbyterian minister, was born in 1807. He was licensed by the First Presbyterian of Ohio in 1822, and was installed pastor of Richmond and Ebenezer, on which charges he labored for twenty years. He pursued his studies at Cannonsburg Academy; was licensed to preach June 25, 1800, by the Presbyterian of Ohio; was received by the Presbyterian of Fortress, April 13, 1802, preached at Middlessex until 1817, and at Bull Creek until June 25, 1833; and died near Tarentum, Pa., Aug. 14, 1854. He was a practical preacher, a firm disciplinarian, and had great power in prayer.

Boyd, Adam, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Ballymoney, Ireland, in 1692. He came to New England as a probationer in 1722; was received by the Presbytery of Furnitureville, 1724, and was sent to Octorara with directions to supply New Castle and Conestoga. He accepted a call from Octorara and Piqua, and was ordained. In 1727 he was directed to spend every sixth Sabbath at Middle Octorara. The Forks of Brandywine composed part of his field till 1730. He was a vigorous presbyterialist, and as long as he had the support of his congregation left him and joined the Brunswick brethren. He continued pastor forty-four years, and resigned, his congregation agreeing to pay him twenty-five pounds yearly during his life. He died Nov. 23, 1758. (W. P. S.)

Bradshaw, Harvey, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Danbury, Conn., March 26, 1810. He received a careel education, and was converted at the age of fourteen; received license to preach in his eighteenth year; and in 1833 entered the Pittsburgh Conference. He labored faithfully until 1856, when failing health led him to locate and remove to Iowa. In 1856 he united with the Upper Iowa Conference, wherein he served the close of his labors in several years in the regular work, and later as agent of Cornell College. He died Nov. 7, 1861. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1862, p. 240.

Bradshaw, Henry, an English Benedictine of the monastery of St. Werburga, in Cheshire, studied at Gloucester (now Worcester) College, and died in 1513. He composed a Life of St. Werburga; and a work of the city of Chester. See Addis, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Bradshaw, John W., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born Dec. 28, 1808, in Fairfield County, Conn. At an early age he removed to the West. He was converted in 1824; received license to preach in 1826; was received on trial in the Indiana Conference in 1841, and at the close of the preceding year was admitted into full connection and ordained elder in 1843. After serving nineteen charges, he became supernumerated in 1869, but up to the time of his death he was always ready to supply any vacancy. He died in De Witt, Iowa, May 17, 1880. He was a sound, logical preacher; an earnest, interesting, and powerful flight of eloquence. His Christian walk and uniform kindness won the respect and love of all who knew him. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1881, p. 87.

Bradshaw, William, D.D., an English prelate, was educated at Oxford, and became proctor of the university in 1711. He became a prebendary of Canterbury in 1716, and of Oxford in 1725. In 1724 he was appointed dean of Christ Church, Oxford, and Oct. 18 of the same year was consecrated bishop of Bristol. He died at Bath, Dec. 16, 1732, aged sixty. He published two Sermons (1714, 1747). See Le Neve, Fasti.

Bradstreet, Simon, a Congregational minister, was born in New London, Conn., in 1609. He was a grandson of Simon Bradstreet, one of the most distinguished of the pilgrim fathers, and for many years governor of Massachusetts; and son of the Simon Bradstreet who was pastor of the Church in New London in 1670. The subject of this sketch graduated at Harvard College in 1693; and was called to be assistant minister, in March, 1697, of the Church in Charlestown. He declined this invitation, but in May, 1698, when the pastor of that Church was vacant, he was ordained minister there, Oct. 26, 1698. For fifteen years he performed the duties alone, but in 1713 the town gave him a colleague, the Rev. Joseph Stevens of Andover, who died in 1721. For over two years after this, Mr. Bradstreet was without a regular assistant; in February, 1724, the Rev. Hull Abbott became his assistant; in October, 1739, the Rev. Thomas Prince was installed as associate pastor. Mr. Bradstreet died in Charlestown, Dec. 31, 1741. It is said that he was a very learned man, possessed of a tenacious memory and a lively imagination, but subject to a hypochondria to such an extent that for several years before his death he was afraid to preach in the pulpit. Accordingly, his sermons were delivered in the deacon's seat, and were frequently melancholy effusions upon the vanity of the world. Seldom, if ever, did he appear with a coat, but always with a plain gown and with a pipe in his mouth. Gov. Burnet spoke of him as one of the first literary characters and one of the best preachers he had met in America. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, 1, 541.

Brady, John Irwin, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Westmoreland County, Pa., Nov. 10, 1831. He joined the Church in his fifteenth year; received license to preach in 1854; and in 1855 united with the Pittsburgh Conference. In 1862 he volunteered in the Ninety-seventh Regiment Ohio Volunteers, and was commissioned first lieutenant of Company B. Hardship and exposure in the army brought on consumption, on which account he was honorably discharged. He died soon afterwards, victorious, amid great and protracted sufferings. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1866, p. 22.

Brady, William C., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Anderson District, S. C., Nov. 16, 1828. He embraced religion in 1842; was licensed to preach in 1847; and in 1850 was received into the Florida Conference, in which he served with zeal and undoubted piety until his death, May 20, 1883. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1884, p. 53.

Braga (or Bragi), in Norse mythology, was the son of Odin and Frigg, the god of eloquence and the art of poetry, the wisest among the Asas. Odin gave each of the Asas an attribute which he could loan to his favorites. To Thor he attributed strength; to Freia, love; to Balder, beauty; and to Braga, the poetry-inspiring nectar. Braga saves this nectar, and endows few with it, but uses it often himself, so that no spiritless word escapes his lips, and all he says is wisdom in the dress of beauty. Those arriving at Walhalla he meets with the welcome of the gods: "We welcome you to Walhalla; partake of peace and drink consecrated nectar." His wife is the youthful Iðun (later Iðuna); she possesses the apples of immortality. To whomsoever her husband gives the nectar, him she presents with eternal life. The god was so highly worshipped that an oath, made by his cup, was inviolable. A king could not sit on his throne until he had emptied the Braga cup, and made an oath relating to his enthronement. If he drank the contents of the cup with more than one draught, it was an evil omen. It is curious that at Agræg's great supper, Braga does not appear to have had any courage or bravery.

Braga, Councils of (Concilium Bracarense). Of these there were several.

1. Held about the year 411, by Pancratius, bishop of Braga, assisted by nine other bishops, who condemned the Ariant and heathenish errors of the Vandals and other barbarians who had ravaged Spain. See Labbe, Concil. ii, 1568.

2. Held about 560, by Lucetrius, the metropolitan, assisted by seven other bishops, against the errors of the Priscillianists. They drew up twenty-twos canons, mostly relating to ceremonies.

3. Orders a tripartite division of the property of each Church: one for the bishop, another for the clergy, and the third for the poor, and the gleeze of the Church, of which the archdeacon should give an account to the bishop.

BRAHMA

9. Enjoins the deacons to wear the stole over the shoulder, and not to conceal it under the mantle, in order to distinguish them from the subdeacons.

10. Directs that the sacred vessels be carried only by persons in holy orders.

11. Orders the deacons to chant in the Church in a secular dress, and to let their hair or beard grow.

12. Forbids the singing of any hymns in the Church, save the Psalms, and passages taken from the Old or New Testament.

13. Orders clerks who are unwilling to eat flesh, to avoid the smell of Piscatorialism, to be compelled to eat at least herbs boiled with meat.

14. Directs that no one be within the Church.

See Labbe, Concil. v. 386.

III. Held in June, 572, by Martin, the archbishop, at the head of twelve bishops. In this council the first four ecumenical councils were acknowledged, but not the fifth, which was not yet recognised in Spain. Ten canons were drawn up. See Labbe, Concil. v. 894.

IV. Held probably in 675, in the time of King Wamba. Eight bishops were present, who drew up nine canons, in order to remedy certain abuses which had crept in.

Forbids the offering of milk instead of wine, and also the dipping the bread in the wine at the holy eucharist.

Forbids using the sacred vessels and ornaments of the Church for profane purposes.

Forbids the priest to celebrate mass, or to receive the Eucharist, without having the "orarium" or stole over both shoulders, and crossed upon his breast.

In some of these canons complaint is made of the conduct of the bishops, whom they accuse of augmenting their private estates at the expense of the Church. See Labbe, Concil. vi. 561.

Brageleongne, Évêque, a French prelate, was first dean of St. Martin of Tours, and was appointed bishop of Luxeuil in 559. He resigned his see in 647, retired to the abbey of Marolles, and died in 645. He wrote Ordinances Synodales (Fontenay, 1629). See Hoefer, Nouv. Bio., Générale, s. v.

Bragg, Jesse Kendall, a Congregational minister, was born at Royalston, Mass., Oct. 11, 1811. He graduated at Amherst College in 1838, and at Union Theological Seminary in 1841. He was ordained and installed pastor of the Middleborough Church, Mass., Oct. 19, 1842, where he remained ten years, a faithful and efficient pastor. He was next installed pastor of the Brookfield Church, which charge he occupied for seven years. From this he served the Church at Sandwich as a stated supply for one year. He then became editor of the Boston Christian Register, in which post he occupied for seven years, when he resumed his ministerial work and supplied the North Wrentham Church for two years, and the Church at Norfolk three years, at which place he died, June 14, 1874. See Gen. Cat. of Union Theol. Sem. (1876), p. 19. (W. P. S.)

Bragg (see Wilson), Margaret, an English minister of the Society of Friends, daughter of Isaac Wilson, was born at Kendal in 1773, and early in life became subject of God's renewing grace. In 1790 she was married to Hadwen Bragg of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and at the age of thirty-four began her ministerial life. At different times, being freed from her domestic cares, she visited most of the meetings of Friends in Great Britain, and in 1823 made a religious tour in Ireland. She is said to have been endowed with great natural abilities, and was thus prepared for the management of affairs as few women are. Her ministry at the meetings of Friends was on many occasions close and searching, calculated to arouse the mute and indifferent, and was blessed to those who heard. She died June 2, 1840. See Testimonies at Yearly Meeting, 1841, p. 13-18. (J. C. S.)

Bragg (see Furnas), Mary, an English minister of the Society of Friends, was born in Liverpool in 1762, and became a Christian when she was about eighteen years of age. In 1785 she was married to Henry Bragg of Parton, Cumberland, and in 1794 was recorded as a minister by the Pardshaw meeting. In company with another minister she was engaged in ministerial work in Scotland during a part of the year 1801, and for several years performed much evangelical labor within the bounds of their quarterly meeting. In 1817 her husband and herself were appointed to the superintendence of the provincial Friends' school at Prospect Hill, near Lisburn, Ireland. This position they held until 1820, when they removed to Belfast, and a few years after to Orton Mount, a few miles from Belfast, which was her residence during the remainder of her life. During the years which followed, she, from time to time, visited the families of Friends in several meetings within the bounds of her quarterly meeting, and travelled through some parts of Lancashire. "Her communications," it is said, "were generally plain and simple, and many cherished a lively recollection of the comfort and instruction which they derived from her ministry."

Her death took place April 7, 1849. See Testimonies at Yearly Meeting, 1851, p. 28-32. (J. C. S.)

Bragg, Seneca G., a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was a graduate of Middlebury College, Vt.; studied theology at the Alexandria Seminary, Va., and was the founder and rector of Christ Church, Macon, Ga., where he labored for fifteen years. His later life he passed in great retirement. He died at Kingston, N. Y., Jan. 21, 1861, aged sixty-eight years. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1861, p. 188.

Braggs, Francis, an English divine, was vicar of Hitchin, and became prebendary of Lincoln in 1704. He published, Discourse on the Parables (1704, 2 vols.):—Observations on the Miracles (1702—4, 2 vols.)—Thirteen Sermons (1713):—and Theological Works (5 vols. 1726). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Brahaspadi (also Brispot or Vyasa), in Hindu mythology, is the planet Jupiter, or the genius inhabiting it. He is the presiding god of all the Vedas, and instructs the good demons in the sciences which the holy books contain. His wife was Tarci. She had an intimate relation with a friend of her husband, Shanderma, the genius of the moon, from which sprang Buddha, whom Brahaspadi long thought to be his own, until a divine revelation taught him otherwise.

Brahma, in Hindu mythology, must be carefully distinguished from Brahman, which designates one of the supreme being, the only one god, as all others are only manifestations of one or more of his attributes. The high idea which the Hindu's connect with Brahma arises from the surnames which they give him—the supremely perfect, the one without beginning and end, the independent, the omnipotent, the prime soul of the world. Brahma is the sole existence. The world as it stands is only the reflection of his majestic being, only a revelation of his might, and when it ceases it will return to him whose emanation it was. But he and the world are nevertheless not one. The latter is entirely separate from him. He created a being full of beauty and love in the form of female, called Maha, With this being Brahma had intercourse, and there resulted three of his most pre-eminent powers—Brahma, the creator of all living; Vishnu, the preserver; and Siva, the destroyer. They all three are substantially one, and form the Trimurti, or trinity, and are not essentially different from each other or from the god whose powers they are.

Brahma is thus the creative god, a mighty person in the trinity of India. The same name also signifies the science of laws, because Brahma ordered nature according to eternal laws, by which he is also the guide of fate, designating time and duration of existence, and thus not only giving life, but also death. He is the revealer of the Vedas, and his worship is the oldest cult of India. It is fabled that a giant tore off one of Brahma's four heads in a combat and placed it on his own head; since then time has only three periods or directions—past, present, and future. Another fable says that Brahma's sister and beautiful wife fled from him, and in order to follow her in all directions he made himself five heads, one of which Siva tore off to punish his fleshly lust, and placed the same as a trophy on his tiara. From this head the Brahmins sprung. Brahma's birth or production is variously related: according to one myth, he is a son of Brah and Maja, as above; according to another, he is a creation of Brah out of himself, who, with him, created the higher and lower gods; another myth makes him spring from an egg, which, shining, floated on the surface of the deep, and out of which Brahma, directly after birth, formed the earth, heaven, the sea, and the ether; a fourth fable says he grew in a lotus-flower which came from the navel of the sleeping Vishnu. See Brah.

BRAHMA, in the Buddhist system, is also an inhabitant of a Brahna-loka (q.v.).

Brahma-jagnam, in Hindu doctrine, is a solemn offering which the Brahmins bring to Brahma. After a bath they dress entirely in white, sing songs, and read various passages out of the Vedas, during which time the youngest among them make a fire with the sweet-smelling sandal-wood; then they drop cocoa oil or melted butter into the fire, and throw flowers on it. This is the only sacrifice brought to the great Brahma.

Brahma-klari, in the religious doctrine of India, is the period of the Brahmins from childhood until the age of puberty, i.e. until the twelfth year. During this period the youthful Brahmin is instructed by one teacher in all that is necessary for him to know, the teacher ever afterwards being held in high respect as a saint by the youth who came under his instruction.

Brahma-loka is the highest of the celestial worlds, reckoned by the Buddhists as sixteen in number. It is the abode of Brahma himself and of those beings who, in their different states of existence, have attained a superior degree of merit.

Brahma-losey, in Hindu mythology, is a heavenly dancer, beloved of Indra (god of the sun). She is his favorite, and is privileged to be near him daily.

Brahmanda, in Hindu mythology, is the egg from which, according to some, Brahma (q.v.) was produced.

Brahma-Sampradaya. See Madhvacaritas.

Brahmi, in Hindu mythology, was the surname of the wife of Brahma, namely, Sarasvati, who at the same time is Brahma's daughter. She was summoned thus as goddess of language and the sciences.

Brahmo-Somaj is the name of a theistic society in India. It forms what is well-known Brahm, named rajah Ram Mohun Roy, a man of great ability, born near Burdwan in 1774. Besides exerting himself for the abolition of Suttee, or the burning of Indian widows with their deceased husbands, and the promotion of native education, he preached everywhere pure monothelism, endeavoring to prove that the idolatry of the Hindus was contrary to the practice of their ancestors, and to the precepts of the Vedas; but he used the Indian name Brahma for the supreme being, and called the society he founded the Brahma-Somaj, or Society of God. Its doctrines were, in fact, founded on a monothelistic interpretation of the Vedas. After the death of Ram Mohun Roy (at Bristol, in 1833), his friend Dvaraka Nath Tagore, a man of great weight and influence, gave his support to the Brahma-Somaj, but it languished without a leader till his son Debendra Nath Tagore formed the nucleus of a new community, now called the Adi Somaj or First Church. He propagated a pure desism, renounced idolatry, and declared his belief in the one God, as defined in the Vedanta. Then a third great leader arose, Keshub Chunder Sen, who confessed a revealed desism, answering more the religious than the speculative need of man. He rejected entirely the Hindu system. His society is called the Progressive or New Somaj. The creed of this party may be described as "a belief in the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of mankind," and its theology might be well expressed by the first part of the first article of the Church of England: "There is but one living and true God—everlasting, without body, parts, or passions, of infinite power, wisdom and goodness, the maker and preserver of all things." Keshub's doctrines were carried by missionaries to different parts of India with such a success that, in 1876, one hundred and twenty-eight congregations belonged to the New Somaj, or Progressive Society, in opposition to the Conservative, or Adi Somaj of Debendra. Their worship consists in reading, on Sunday, portions from the Vedas, Avesta, Bible or Koran, which are discussed. In 1870 Keshub founded the Reform Association at Calcutta, for propagating a moderate and moral life, to disseminate literature and ameliorate the condition of women, the latter especially with the help of the "Native Marriage Act" passed in 1874, and who legalized marriages by Brahmin rites, required that the bridegroom should be at least eighteen, and the bride fourteen years old, and made bigamy a penal offence for any one marrying under the act. But Kesubh's tendency towards mysticism, and his marrying in 1878 his daughter to a maharajah, caused a split in the society, and a new one took according to purely rationalistic principles was formed, approaching more the conservative society under the leadership of Debendra. The theistical societies, of whatever shade they may be, are the present Protestants of India. See Leonard, A History of the Brahmo-Somaj, from its Rise to the Present Day, London, 1870.; D'Ambrose, Conversations Lexikon (18th ed.) s.v. "Brahmasomadach;" Williams, Hinduism, p. 149 sqq. (B.F.)

Braine, COUNCIL OF (Concilium Brevarum). Braine (Brana) is an abbey of the order of Premonstratensians, four leagues from Soissons, on the Vesle, founded in 1130 by André de Baldimonto and Agnes his wife (Gall. Christ, ix, 408). A council held here (at Braine) in 1131, and appears C'art de Vérifier les Dates, but wrongly), which was rather a state than a church council, A.D. 580, under king Chilperic, excommunicated Leudastes (who had been count of Tours) for falsely accusing Gregory of Tours of having calumniated queen Fredegunde. Witnesses were called, and an imposter was to be believed against a priest. Yet Gregory exculpated himself by solemn oath at three several altars after saying mass, the accusers in the end confessing their guilt.

Brainerd, Davis Smith, a Congregational minister, was born Oct. 12, 1812, at Haddam, Conn. He was licensed to preach May 30, 1837, by the Association of the Western District of New Haven County. In 1829 he went to Munson, Mass, and there completed his preparations for college. He graduated at Yale College in 1834, and entered Princeton Seminary in the fall of the same year. After one year in Princeton he continued his theological studies at New Haven, and afterwards spent part of a year at Andover, Mass. In the autumn of 1840 Mr. Brainerd was invited to preach at the First Congregational Church of Lyme, Conn., and June 30, 1841, was ordained and installed as pastor of that Church by the Middlesex Association of Connecticut. He remained pastor of this Church until his death. In 1835, The Church at Lyme enjoyed much spiritual prosperity under Mr. Brainerd's ministry. He took much interest in the educational and other interests of the town. In 1861 he was elected a fellow of Yale College, and in 1887 a member of its prudential committee. He was a man of lovely Christian spirit, a sound theologian, a faithful pastor, and secured in an uncommon degree the confidence of his people. See Necrological Report of Princeton Theol. Sem., 1877, p. 53.

Brainerd, John, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Haddam, Conn., Feb. 28, 1719. He graduated at Yale College in 1746. Soon after his graduation he was licensed to preach, and began his labors as a missionary among the Indians in the West, where he spent the greater part of his life. He was employed by the Church in many important missions, all of which he filled with great satisfaction to his presbytery. He died March 18, 1781. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iii, 135.

Braithwaite, William, D.D., an English divine, was born about 1560, and became master of Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge, in 1607. He was one of the thirty-seven divines appointed by James I to prepare our present authorized version of the Holy Script-

She visited America about the time of the great accension, known as the "Hicksite Separation." She took her place in the forefront of the conflict, and unflinchingly defended unity and peace. She died Dec. 18, 1859. See Annual Monitor, 1861, p. 15.

Braithwaite, George, an English Baptist minister, was born at Fornace-Falls, Lancashire, in 1681. After leaving the university he came to London, and in 1706 joined the Baptist Church near Cripplegate, but soon after returned to Lancashire, and devoted himself to the spiritual welfare of the poor of his own native place. He next removed to Bridlington, Yorkshire, where he preached several years with reputation and success, but his zeal against intemperance awakened bitter hostility to him, and he resigned his office. Soon after he was called to London, and was installed March 28, 1734, as pastor of the Church worshipping in Devonshire, and was installed there July 19, 1748. Mr. Braithwaite was the author of several publications, among them, The Nation's Reproach and the Church's Grief; or, A Serious and Needful Word of Advice to those Who Needlessly Frequent Taverns and Public-houses:—and two Funeral Discourses (1730 and 1739). See Haynes, Baptist Cyclopedia, i, 60-63. (J. C. S.)

Brake, Charles, an English Congregational minister, was born in Bath in 1805, and entered upon his ministerial career when about twenty-five years of age, by accepting the pastorate of a village church in Cambridge. After two years of labor there he was invited to a small church at the East-end of London. In 1834 he settled at Richmond, and removed to Lowestoft, where he labored five or six years; and in 1854 returned to London. In 1859 he became pastor of the Congregational Church in Essex road, Islington, which position he held until declining health compelled him, in the autumn of 1878, to give up his labors altogether. He died Dec. 30, 1880. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1882, p. 286.

Brakeman, Jonas, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born Aug. 22, 1806, and joined the Church when quite young. Brasses, Sepulchral, are monumental plates of brass or the mixed metal actually called latten, inlaid on large slabs, usually with an effigy of the form part of the pavement of the church, and representing in their outline, or by the lines engraved upon them, the figure of the deceased. In many instances, in place of a figure there is found an ornamented or foliated cross, with sacred emblems or other devices. The fashion of representing on this brasses, and the fashion of the effigy of the form part of the pavement of the church, and representing in their outline, or by the lines engraved upon them, the figure of the deceased. In many instances, in place of a figure there is found an ornamented or foliated cross, with sacred emblems or other devices. The fashion of representing on this melted pitch, and firmly fastened down by rivets laid into a slab, usually in England of the material known as Forest marble, or else Sussex or Purbeck marble. These memorials, where circumstances permitted, were often elevated upon altar-tombs, but more commonly they are found on slabs, which form part of the pavement of churches; and it is not improbable that this kind of memorial was generally adopted, from the circumstance that the area of the church, and especially the choir, was not thereby encumbered, as was the case when effigies in relief were introduced.

The Sepulchral Brass, in its original and perfect state, was a work rich and beautiful in decoration. It is, by careful examination, sufficiently evident that the incised lines were filled up with some black resinous incrust; the armorial decorations, and in elaborate specimens, the whole field or background, which was cut out by the chisel or scraper, were filled up with mastic or coarse enamel of various colors, so as to set off the elegant tracery of tabernacle-work, which forms the principal feature of ornament.

The earliest specimen of a brass that has been noticed in England is that at Stoke Daberton, Surrey, apparently the memorial of Sir John d'Aubernoun, who died in 1277. This exhibits traces of color. Next to this occur the brasses of Sir Roger de Trumpington, at Trumpington, Cambridgeshire; he died in 1299, but no traces of color exist. In speaking of these as the two earliest known examples, it should be added that Jocelyn, bishop of Wells, who died in 1247, is recorded to have had a brass on his tomb; and on that of bishop Bingham, who died the same year, the matrix or inscription of the stone in which the brass was laid still exists.

Some of his principal works are, Dionysiani Monasterii Sacrorum seu Euphemum Sacrae Antiquitatiis, Verissimae Illustrata (Mons, 1651);—Sylva Illustrum Hominum Scriptorum (ibid. 1657). He wrote, Breve Relazione d'Alcune Missioni di Padri della Compania di Gesù nella Francia Novera (1658). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Brassy, Robert, an English divine of the 16th century, was born at Bunbury, Cheshire, and became doctor of divinity at King's College, Cambridge, of which he was elected thirteenth provost. Braulio (or Brauli), a Spanish prelate, succeeded his brother John as bishop of Saragossa in 627, having previously been appointed archdeacon. He was present at the councils of Toledo in 633, 656, and 685, and died in 646. He was one of the most learned men of the age, to whom Spain was largely indebted for the revival of the study of the Scriptures and classical literature, as well as for the reformation of ecclesiastical discipline. It was owing to his persevering importunity that Isidor commenced his great work, De Hylologia, the incomplete manuscript of which was placed, at Isidore's death, in Braulio's hands to arrange, and was by him published in its present form. Braulio took part in the fourth, fifth, and sixth councils of Toledo, drawing up the canons of the last. He also drew up, in the name of the council assembled, a letter to Honorius I, refuting the calumnies brought against them. His voluminous correspondence includes letters between him and the kings Chindesvinthus and Recesvintius, and the bishops and presbyters of Spain and Gallia Narbonensis. He left also a Life of St. Emilius; — an Iambic Hymn, in honor of the same saint; — and Acta de Martyribus Caesaris Augusti. (Migne, Patr. Ixx., 689-790.) See Cæs. i., 579; Ileflons, de Vir. At the council of 1811 he was of the number of bishops who were in favor of the four articles regarded as the foundation of the liberties of the Gallican Church. In 1828 he was made archbishop of Albi. In the empire he was appointed baron and knight of the Legion of Honor, and was created peer of France by the restoration in 1827. He died Feb. 25, 1838. See Zschiedel, Bibliol. Theol. i., 1882; Schütter, Theol. Literatur-zeitung, 1878, 271; Hermann, Leben und Wirken von Dr. Karl Braune (Altenburg, 1880). (B. P.)

Braueon, the name of a festival celebrated in honor of the goddess Artemis at Brauron, in Attica. The festival was held every fifth year, when a number of young females about ten years of age, dressed in crocus-colored garments, walked in solemn procession to the temple of the goddess, and were consecrated to her service. Another festival bearing the same name was celebrated every five years at Brauron in honor of Dionysus, in which both men and women took part.

Brauælet, Mathieu, a French monk, director-general of the Christian Brothers, was born Nov. 1, 1792, at Gachat, Department of the Loire. In 1809 he entered on his novitiate in the Christian Brothers at Lyons, and was subsequently entrusted with the direction of the brother's schools at Metz and Nünsch. In 1817 he made his profession, and in 1823 was called to Paris to act as director of the community of St. Nicho- las, and as visitor of the Brothers' schools of the Depart- ment. Seven years later he became assistant to the superior-general of the Christian Brothers, brother An- sect, upon whose death in 1836 he became director- general of the order. In 1840 he held his office for thirty-six years. In 1873 he visited Rome to witness the beatifica- tion of his exemplar, John Baptist de la Salle, the founder of his order. This journey proved too much for him, and on his return to Paris he died, Jan. 7, 1874. His works of instruction have had a large circulation. The following have been published in America: Meditations on our Most Blessed Virgin Mary — Particular Examen — Meditations on the Holy Eucharist. Brausiet's advice was sought on many occasions by the French government, and twice did two sovereigns, Louis Philippe and Napoleon III, offer him the cross of the Legion of Honor, which he declined. He accepted it, however, from the president of the French republic, for his community, in acknowledgment of his public and private services, in the Franco-Prussian war of 1870-71. In 1838 the Christian Brothers numbered 2300; scholars, 130,000. At the death of brother Philip, by which name Brausiet was known in his order, the brethren numbered 10,000; scholars, 400,000. Brausiet was one of the greatest promoters of Christian education, and many times have they produced. See (N. Y.) Cath. Almanac, 1875, p. 64.

He was baptized in 1812; entered Stepney Academical Institution in 1813, where he remained four years; and in June, 1817, became pastor of the "forest-village" of Loughton, Essex, where his labors were blessed to the establishment of a flourishing Church. His pastorate, which was his only one, continued for nearly two years. For several years he was a useful member of the committee of the Baptist Missionary Society. He died April 10, 1869. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-Book, 1870, p. 188-190. (J. C. S.)

Bray, Charles H., a Methodist Episcopal minister, son of Rev. Sullivan Bray, was born at Winslow, Me., Dec. 26, 1846. He converted in early life; read law at Carthage, and was licensed to preach by the Methodist church, during rare opportunities for understanding the doctrines, usages, and genius of the Church; and began his ministerial career as supply at Cushing in 1867, under the auspices of the East Maine Conference. His after appointments were: 1868, Westport and Arrowsic as supply; then in succession, Bremen and Round Pond, Clinton and Benton, and in 1873, Woolwich. Loss of health necessitated his being placed on the supernumerary list in 1874, where he continued to the close of his life. He resumed preaching in 1878 at Chin and Me., labored one year, and was again prostrated by sickness. He died in that town, June 25, 1879. Mr. Bray was a devoted Gospel preacher. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1880, p. 88.

Bray, Horace L., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at East Vassalboro, Me., March 19, 1811. He was favored with tender religious instruction; professed conversion at the age of eighteen; received a thorough mental culture at Lincoln Academy and at Waterville College; began preaching in 1854, and in 1855 was admitted into the East Maine Conference, in which he served as health permitted until 1862, when he joined the 12th Maine Regiment as chaplain. Ill-health obliged him to return home in a few months, and he continued his connexion with the conference as a supernummary, which relation he sustained until his death, Feb. 21, 1888. Mr. Bray was an able minister, more zealous than strong in body. He was sympathetic and deeply earnest. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1888, p. 142.

Bray, John Evans, a Congregational minister, son of Rev. Thomas Wells Bray, was born at North Guilford, Conn., Nov. 28, 1875. In 1896 he went to Portland, Me., and the next year entered the Fryebury Academy. The death of his father, in 1898, compelled him to abandon a collegiate course. Until 1816 he was engaged in various kinds of business, part of the time in school; then attended college, and then began the study of theology at Portland. In 1818 he was licensed to preach by the Cumberland Association, and for several months was employed as a missionary in and about Newfield. In 1821 he taught a select school in North Guilford, and in 1823 became a missionary in northern Vermont. The next year he received a call to St. Johnsbury, Vt., which he accepted, but owing to difficulties in the Church declined ordination. On May 16, 1827, he was ordained and installed in Columbia (now Prospect), Me., and in 1828 came to Sumner, now Seymour, Conn., continuing his labors in the Preston, Conn., and Norfolk, Me., supply. In August, 1832, he was dismissed, and for two years following preached at Westfield, where he was the means of organizing a Church. From 1834 to 1842 he was acting pastor in Humphreyville (now Seymour), Conn. On account of impaired health, he withdrew from active duties in the ministry, and settled on a small farm at Clinton, in the hope of regaining his health; but he was never able to resume regular labor. In 1855 he removed to Brooklyn, N. Y., residing there until 1867, when he went to Newburyport, Mass. This was his residence, with the exception of two years, with S. J., for his death, April 30, 1875. See Cong. Quarterly, 1873, p. 442.

Bray, Nathan H., a Baptist minister, was born in Petersborough, England, April 29, 1809, and came to America in 1840. He began to preach in 1847, his ministerial labors being put forth in that portion of Louisiana which borders on the Sabine River. He bore the title among his brethren of "apostle of the Sabine region. To his efforts, in a large measure, is to be attributed the rapid organization of fifty Baptist churches in the six counties, which were gathered into three associations, of one of which he was the moderator for twenty years. He was for many years an officer in the Grand (Masonic) Lodge of Louisiana, and parish judge for the last three years of his life. He died Feb. 18, 1875. See Cathcart, Baptist Handbook, p. 129. (J. C. S.)

He removed in 1838 to Perry County, Tenn.; professed faith in Christ in 1840; shortly afterwards moved to Henderson County, Tenn., and resided near Miflin. He was licensed in November, 1850, and ordained in 1856. His preaching was eminently practical, in its character, attracting attention, not so much by the graces of oratory and the charms of eloquence as by his earnest manner and faithful enunciation of those truths which are the common heritage of the children of God." He died at his home in Henderson County, Jan. 8, 1870. See Boorum, Sketches of Tennessee Ministers, p. 64. (J. C. S.)

Bray, Sullivan, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Champaign County, Ill., Sept. 13, 1781. He was fully trained by a Christian mother; experienced a change of heart when quite young; began to preach at the age of twenty; and in 1818 entered the East Maine Conference, wherein he spent his long and useful life, dying suddenly, March 15, 1876. Mr. Bray was a diligent student at the Bible, a close observer of nature, a plain, practical preacher, and a powerful man in prayer. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1876, p. 89.

Bray, William (or Billy Bray, as he was familiarly called), was a distinguished, eccentric, and useful local preacher among the Bible Christians. He was born in Cornwall, England, June 1, 1794. He was converted in 1829, and in 1824 made a local preacher. He died May 25, 1868. His benevolence was remarkable, his faith strong, and his prayers mighty. He detested smoking and drinking. See Memoir (Lond. 1872).

Brayer, Pierre, a French theologian, was born in Paris, May 19, 1654. He was canon, grand deacon, and vicar-general of the diocese of Metz, where he died, Jan. 26, 1731. He wrote, Rituels du Diocèse de Metz (Metz, 1713)—Oraison Funèbre de M. le Duepouf, son cousin (of Louis XTh, 1694). He also wrote several religious works which were published anonymously. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Brayton (see Greene), Patience, a minister of the Society of Friends, was born in North Kingston, R. I., Nov. 18, 1783, and, at the age of twenty-one, was "approved," in accordance with the usages of her denomination. In 1788 she became the wife of Preserved Brayton. Among the praise-worthy acts of their early married life was the liberation of the slaves. In the spring of 1771 she left her home, for the purpose of making an extended religious tour among Friends in the Middle and Southern States. Her Journal relating to this tour is full of interesting details, dwelling largely upon her own spiritual trials, and recounting the many hardships which she and her companions endured while engaged in what they believed to be the Lord's work. Early in the year 1772 they were in South Carolina. After her long and arduous service, she reached her home in Rhode Island, June 27, 1772. On Dec. 14, 1788, she sailed for Great Britain. Of the incidents connected with this tour in the Old World, we have a minute account in her Life. Having accomplished her mission abroad, she returned home to America, Sept. 10, 1787. After this she travelled but little, on account of the infirmities of age. She died July 30, 1794. See Friends Library, x, 489. (J. C. S.)

Brayer, John D.D., a Unitarian minister, was born at Worcester, Mass., in 1787. He graduated at Harvard College in 1813; was appointed Latin tutor in the university one year before taking his regular master's degree; and in 1817 became the immediate successor of Professor Frisbie in the Latin chair. His early determination was for the profession of the law. In after-life he resolved to study theology, and began while at the university his career as one of the chief ministers of an affecting transition from the severe and ceremonial academic government of the olden time, to an intercourse with the pupils more courteous and winning. In 1829 he accepted the pastorate of the North Church in Salem, at the same time declining a call from the new Unitarian Church in New York. He labored long and with untiring zeal at Salem. He died in 1846. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 504.

Breaca, Saint. Among the companies of Irish ascetics who landed in the Hayle Estuary, on the north coast of England, are named Breaca, Ia, Uni, Sinhinnus, and others. Lives of Breaca, Ia, Elwinnus, and Wymburcius, existed in Leland's time (Itin. 3, p. 4, 15, 16, 21), which connected some of their companions with St. Patrick. It is possible that we may place the arrival of Breaca in the latter part of the 6th century. He is said to have been born on the confines of Uster and Leinster, i.e. East Meath. The parish of Breage is by some thought to be named after him. St. Breaca's day is June 4.

Bread, Day of, a name sometimes given in the early ages of the Christian Church to the Lord's day, because of the general prevalence of breaking bread in the Lord's Supper on that day. See Lord's Day.

He was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, April 27, 1825; then went to South Carolina, where the remainder of his life was spent. He was ordained by Harmony Presbytery March 26, 1826, and supplied Sion Church at Winsborough, S. C., until 1842, giving half of his time to the churches of Salem, Aimwell, and Horeb, all in the same county. He was installed pastor of Darlington Church, May 5, 1842, and continued there until Oct. 12, 1878. He died Jan. 9, 1882, at Mayesville. See Necrological Report of Princeton Theological Seminary, 1882, p. 10.

Brébeuf, Jean de, a French Jesuit missionary in Canada, was born in Bayeux, March 25, 1593. He came to America with Champlain in 1626, and entered upon his mission among the Hurons, but was carried a prisoner to England in 1629. He returned in 1632, and prosecuted his labors among the Hurons and other tribes on the Niagara. In the wars between the Hurons and Iroquois he was taken prisoner, with his associate Lalemant, at the town of St. Louis, and put to death at St. Ignatius with the most cruel tortures, March 16, 1649. He acquired a thorough knowledge of the Indian language and a just appreciation of the Indian mind, and exerted a powerful influence among this people. He translated Lademine's Catechism into the Huron language. He wrote also the Huron Relation in the Jesuit Relations for 1635 and 1636. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Hist. des Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Brecon (Brecon, Brocon, or Berchen). Of those bearing this name it is difficult to define what property belongs to each. (1) Bishop of Ard - Brecon, commemorated Dec. 6. He was of the race of Eoghan, son of Niall, and bishop of Meath; but the name of his place is derived from Brecon of Ara and Killbraccan. (2) Of Cilmeir-Dithrubh, commemorated Aug. 5, is one of the nineteen saints of Killmore, near the Shannon, Co. Roscommon. (3) Of Cluain-catha and Arad-Brecon. In a Mart. Doneg. 1567, a church of Cluain-catha in Inis-Eoghan, bishop of Ard-Brecon and abbot of Magh-bile. Another dedication may be April 29. (4) Of Ruirte - Sept. 17. Mart. Doneg. calls him Brecon, and his name is still found in Killbragan, Co. Kilkeny. In Colgan's Life of St. Abban an account is given of a meeting between the two saints Abban and Brecon, the latter being abbot of the two monasteries in the region of Osory, Rosiure and Cluain-imuirchus; but we must doubt the legend. (5) Bishop - May 1. This was Brecon of Ara and of Cill-Brecon, in Thomond, the son of Eschaith Ballisearg. In the island of Ballykilleagh there was a church, called Tempal Brecon (Colgan, Acta Sanctorum, p. 715). This Temple-brecon was St. Brecon's principal establishment; but he also founded and gave his name to Ard-Bracan, the diocesan seat of the bishop of Meath.

BRECC, FELK, an Irish saint of Balach-Fele, commemorated Jan. 15, was of the family of Fiacha Sulidhe, and the son of Silan. He is now associated with Bal-lyfoyle, in Kilkenny.

Brecher, GIDRON, a Jewish physician and German scholar, was born Jan. 14, 1797, at Prossnitz, in Moravia. He received his early education, according to the customs of those days, in the Talmud, which study he continued at different schools. At the age of sixteen he commenced the study of Latin and medicine, in 1825 he became "magister of surgery," and in 1850 he became doctor of medicine. He spent his lifetime at his native city, where he died May 12, 1872, having been decorated in 1871 by the emperor of Austria. Of his publications we mention, Die Beschreibend der Israeliten von der historischen, praktisch-operativen und ritualen Seite (Wien, 1845): Das Buch Kiimori, mit einem hebr. kurzen Commentar und einer ausführlichen Einleitung (Prague, 1838-40): Das Transventulale, Magie und magische Heilarten im Talmud (Wien, 1839): Die Unsterblichkeitstheile des jüdischen Volkes (Leipsic, 1861): Concordanti Nominum Propriornum que in Libris Sacris continentur, edited by his son (Frankfort-on-the-Main, 1876). See Frut, Bibl. Jud. i, 130, and the review of the posthumous work by Mihlau, in Schützer's Thes. Lit. Med., vol. 471 (B. T.).

Brock, Joseph Hunt, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Northampton, Mass., July 9, 1788. He graduated at Yale College, in 1818, studied theology at the Andover (Mass.) Seminary, graduating in 1823, and being ordained in December of that year by the Hampshire County Central Association, was at once sent as a Home Missionary to Ohio, and began his ministerial life in Portage County. After three years of varied service, he was installed, April 25, 1827, pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Andover, Ashtabula Co., which he served two years. Thence he removed to Cuyahoga County, and preached in Brecksville and vicinity until his health failed, when, in 1833, he opened a school for boys in the village of Cleveland. In 1843 he took up his residence in Newburgh, where he resided until his death, June 21, 1880. See Obituary Record of Yale College, 1881.

Breck, Robert, Jr., a Congregational minister, was born at Marlborough, Mass., July 25, 1718. He graduated at Harvard College in 1738. About 1738 he began preaching in Winfield, Ct. He was ordained pastor of Seabury, P. M. (Woodford, Mass.) March 26, 1736; although nearly the whole Hampshire Association opposed the ordination on the ground of heterodoxy, and a portion of the parish remonstrated against it. The controversy was the occasion of three spirited pamphlets, two by the County Association, and one by the Ordaining Council. Although he was indirect, doughty, previous to his ordination, after that event he exhibited great prudence, and succeeded in harmonizing the elements in his parish. He died April 23, 1784. Several of his published sermons are extant. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 985.

Breckinridge, George W., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Charleston, Va., Sept. 26, 1812. He graduated with his father at Mountainea, in 1818; experienced conversion in 1833; received license to exhort in 1834; was licensed to preach in 1836; and in 1837 entered the Michigan Conference. Subsequently he became a member of the North Ohio Conference. In both of these conferences he labored zealously, as health permitted, to the close of his life, 1869. Mr. Breckinridge was upright, practical, courageous; strong in character, intellect, will, and affection. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1869, p. 194.

Breckinridge, William Lewis, D.D., L.L.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Lexington, Ky., July 22, 1803. He graduated at Yale College, and, studying theology for a time, was called to the pastorate of the Presbyterian Church of Maysville, where, after remaining some years, he accepted a call to the pastorate of the First Presbyterian Church of Louisville. His ministry extended over a network of fifteen years, was marked with success. The pastorate was dissolved to enable him to accept the presidency of the University of Mississippi. He occupied this post until 1868, when he returned to his native state, and became president of Centre College. After remaining at this post for several years, he resigned, and settled on a farm in Raymore, Mo., where he closed his earthly mission, surviving all his brothers and sisters. Though retired from public life, he continued, as health and opportunity would permit, to preach in the rural churches. He was frequently a member of the General Assembly, of which he was moderator in 1859. He died Dec. 26, 1876. (W. P. S.)

In October, 1829, he was ordained pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in Lexington, in which charge he was continued during thirteen years, and rose to eminence as an eloquent preacher. In 1845 he accepted the presidency of Jefferson College, Pa., and with the duties of this office he supplied the pulpit of a church in a neighboring village. In 1847 he returned to Kentucky, and became pastor of the First Presbyterian Church at Lexington, and was also State Superintendent of Public Instruction. He resigned this charge and his pastorate in 1853, having been elected by the General Assembly professor of exegetic, didactic, and polemic theology in the seminary at Danville, which office he retained until Dec. 1, 1869, when he resigned. While in Baltimore he edited the Literary and Religious Magazine, and the Spirit of the Nineteenth Century. During his visit to Europe, in 1833, he purchased and transmitted to this country a large amount of rare and valuable literature, and through this means he contained successfully for the principles of the Protestant Reformation and the Roman Catholics of Baltimore. He died in Danville, Dec. 27, 1871. He published, Travels in Europe (2 vols.):—Presbyterian Government not a Hierarchy, but a Commonwealth:—Presbyterian Ordination not a Charm, but an Act of Government:—The Christian Pastor one of the Associates:—Christian Liberty (2 vols.). He made an elaborate discourse on the Internal Evidence of Christianity, before the University of Virginia; in 1852 he published a tract, On the Use of Instrumental Music in Public Worship; and in 1857-58, his most important work, Theology, Objectively and Subjectively considered (2 vols.). He studied at different universities, and succeeded his father in the pastorate of his native place. He wrote against the immoral life of the clergy, was suspended, and was compelled to flee to Hamburg. In 1660 he was elected pastor at Zwoll, in Upperyssel, but his difficulties with the clergy, whom he accused of a worldly life, and his chiliasm views caused his deposition in 1665. From that time he lived at Amsterdam, afterwards at the Hague, where he was slain by the Catholic Mary, with heribe Mary, and afterwards by Spener and others. He died in 1711. He wrote a great many things, but, as Spener said, of little use to the Church. His life and writings are given by his nephew, John Moller, in his Cimbrin Lutherata, ii.

Bregwin (or Bregowinus), the twelfth archbishop of Conecticut, was consigned to the service of St. Michael's day, 759. Although the majority of historians follow

Eadmer, the evidence of Osbern is confirmed by the charter, and his death may be fixed Aug. 24 (Aug. 26, or Sept. 1), 765. He was buried in the chapel of St.

John the Baptist, at the east end of the cathedral church. The important relic of this saint was that to Lullus, archbishop of Mentz, about 762, from which we learn that Bregwin visited Rome, probably in 751. A synod held by him is mentioned in an act of the Council of Clovesho. Ralph de Diceo says that Bregwin received the pall from pope Paul I. See Hook, Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, i, 255.

Brémont, Étienne, a French theologian, was born at Chalon-sur-Loire, March 7, 1714. Brend, William, an English minister of the Society of Friends, was born in London about 1586, and was converted under the preaching of Barrow and How- gill. He did not enter the ministry until very late in life. After various fortunes in America and in the West Indies, he returned to England, reaching that country at a time when the Quakers were suffering the severest persecutions. For a time he was in the wretched Newgate prison, but escaped with many other Friends during the great plague in London in 1665, when the prison-doors were thrown open. He died July 7, 1676. He was a man of great learning, and is said to have written a treatise on the alphabet, and to have been a great miracle-worker. He is said to have performed many miracles, and to have been a great benefactor of the poor. He was the son of Fingolfoch, brother of Domninga, bishop of Tuam-Muscarighe, and Brigh (or Briga), abbess of Anach-dun. He was born about 482 (or 484), in Bally, Kery West Munster, and at an early age was under the care of the bishop, who placed him under his care. He is said to have been a most learned man, and to have written many works, some of which are still extant. He is also said to have been a great benefactor of the poor, and to have built many churches and schools. He is the patron saint of the city of Clonfert, and is also known as the patron saint of the county of Clare.

He gave up Judaism in 1601 in order to embrace Christianity, and published his motives for so doing in a work in which he accused the Jews of the most odious crimes. Another Jew, named Solomon Zebri, responded in a work in which he accused the Christians of abominable practices. These two works, written in German, were translated into Latin and republished (Nuremberg, 1670, 1719). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.

He wrote many works, among them two tracts upon the observation of the Lord's day, in which he maintained the Catholic opinion that there is no obligation to observe the Sunday as a Jewish Sabbath, as the Puritans taught. He also wrote a Treatise on the Patriarchal Government of the Ancient Church, in question and answer (Oxford, 1641, 4to). See Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v. Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.
