Breuer, Aaron G., a Methodist minister, was born in Monmouth County, N. J., Dec. 5, 1795. He was converted March 1, 1816, and immediately afterwards became a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He was licensed to exhort in 1820. On Jan. 1, 1821, he withdrew and afterwards associated himself with the Methodist Reformers. At their first Annual Conference, held in April, 1822, he was ordained deacon, and appointed a general missionary to labor and organize churches in the states of New York and Connecticut. At the Conference of 1825 he succeeded in having a call issued to all the non-episcopal Methodist societies in the United States, to meet in convention in New York, which convention was held June 1, 1826; when a constitution, declaration of rights, and articles of religion were adopted. At the Conference of 1827 he was appointed to visit the state of Georgia, and form churches, ordain preachers, organize an annual conference, etc. Being successful, and having made a good impression, he was earnestly importuned to go and labor in the South; he yielded to the call, and went to Georgia the second time, in 1829. At the General Convention of Methodist Reformers, held in Baltimore, November, 1830, he was a delegate. On Sept. 20, 1834, he organized the Methodist Protestant Church in Charleston, S. C., and for two years was its pastor. In 1836 he was principal of the academy at Mechanicville; at this place he organized a Methodist Protestant Church, which church became the nucleus of the South Carolina Conference. In 1838 he was appointed general missionary in the South. Soon afterwards, his health and that of his family failing, he taught school until 1852, when he became editor of the Christian Telegraph and Southern Olive-tree, which was published at Atlanta, Ga. From 1858 to 1860 he filled appointments in the Alabama Conference. For some years he was chaplain in the Confederate army. In 1865 he went to live with his daughter at Charleston, S. C., where he died, April 7, 1877. See Cothern, Founders of the M. P. Church, 1880, p. 365.

Breuer, Daniel, a Congregational minister, graduated at Harvard College in 1687; was ordained pastor of the Church in Springfield, Mass., May 16, 1694; and died Nov. 5, 1735, in the sixty-sixth year of his age. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 365.

Breuer, Daniel D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in North Carolina. He received very limited educational privileges; was converted in 1827, and with marvellous success began preaching in 1830, with the Mississippi Conference about 1829, in which he toiled until his last severe and protracted illness, which terminated in his death in 1854. Mr. Breuer's career was short but eminently successful. Hundreds were brought to Christ through his instrumentation. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1834, p. 277.

Brewer, Darius Richmond, an Episcopal minister, was born in Dorchester, Mass., June 23, 1819. He graduated at Harvard University in 1838, studied theology at Andover. New Haven, took orders in the Episcopal Church in 1842, and was consecrated priest in 1844. In 1842 he commenced his public ministry at St. Peter's Church, Cambridgeport, Mass., where he remained until 1844, when he became rector of St. Paul's Church, Concord, N. H. In December, 1846, he became minister of Trinity Church, Newport, R. I. In 1855 he became rector of Trinity Church, in the same city; this Church having been organized by himself. In 1858 he removed to Yonkers, N. Y., where, having organized St. John's Church, he was its rector for more than eight years. The Church of the Reformation in Brooklyn was a third Church organized by Mr. Brewer, of which he was the rector over six years. In October, 1878, he went to Christ Church, Westerly, R. I., where he remained until his death, March 18, 1881. Mr. Brewer "was a preacher of rare ability, his sermons being marked by great clearness of style, aptness of illustration, and fervor of spirit. He was in full sympathy with all the questions and difficulties of every variety, and his occasional sermons in the Congregational and other pulpits of his native town are specially remembered. See R. I. Biographical Cyclopaedia, p. 441. (J. C. S.)

Brewer, Jehoida, a Welsh Congregational minister, was born in Wales in 1752, and died in Birmingham, England, in 1817. He is described as "a profound theologian, a popular preacher, and an earnest man." Mr. Brewer was the author of the work mentioned in many collections, commencing with the line, "Hail! sovereign love, which first began." See Belcher, Historical Sketches of Hymns, p. 96. (J. C. S.)

Brewer, Josiah, a Congregational minister and missionary, was born in Tyringham (or Monterey), Berkshire Co., Mass., June 1, 1796. After studying at Phillips Academy in Andover, he graduated from Yale College in 1821, and immediately commenced his theological studies at Andover, at the same time acting as missionary one year among the Penobscot Indians in Maine. From 1824 to 1826 he was a tutor at Yale College. On May 10, 1826, he was ordained at Springfield, Mass.; and in June following resigned his civil appointment and embarked for the East, under the direction of the Boston Female Society for the Promotion of Christianity among the Jews. He spent about two years in laboring in Smyrna and Constantinople, and then returned to the United States. While here he published a valuable descriptive of his residence in Turkey. In 1830 he went back to Smyrna, where he remained for eight years as a missionary of the Ladies Greek Association of New Haven, Conn. In 1832 he commenced a semi-monthly newspaper, entitled The Friend of Youth. After his final return to America, in 1836, he was for three years chaplain of the Connecticut State-prison, at Wethersfield, and then a short time agent of the Anti-slavery Society, and editor of an anti-slavery paper in Hartford. In 1844 he opened a Young Ladies' Seminary in New Haven, which was afterwards removed to Middletown, and which occupied him until 1857. He then took up his residence in Stockbridge, Mass., and, after serving for more than a short time in the Congregational Church in the neighboring town of Housatonic, lived in retirement till his death, Nov. 19, 1872. In 1851 he published Ptolema and the Seven Churches of Asia. See Obituary Record of Yale College, 1873; Memoirs of American Missionaries.

Brewer, Walter W., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in 1814. In 1837 he united to the society of the New York Conference. For twenty years he received his appointments regularly, and attended faithfully to his ministerial and pastoral duties. In 1854 he became superannuated, and retired to Hunting Ridge, near Stamford, Conn., where he died in 1868. Mr. Brewer was a faithful, zealous minister, an industrious pastor, and an excellent man. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1868, p. 84.

Brewer, William (1), an English prelate, son of the sheriff of Devonshire (under Henry II), was preferred bishop of Exeter, 1224, and died in 1244. He founded a dean and twenty-four prebendaries in connection with his see. He was a great courtier and was employed in embassies, as when he was sent to conduct Isabel, sister to Henry III, to be married to Frederic, the emperor, whom he afterwards attended to the Holy Land. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), 1, 404.

Brewer, William (2), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in 1827. He was converted in 1847; soon after received license to preach; studied at Mount Morris Seminary, Ill.; in 1853 entered the Rock River Conference, and in its active ranks labored to the close of his life, Dec. 27, 1885. Mr. Brewer was a young man of great promise. As a preacher he excelled, as a Christian he was exemplary. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1853, 1854, 1863.

Brewis, William, an English Congregational minister, was born at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Oct. 8, 1804. When thirteen years old he was converted through the influence of pious Presbyterian parents. He entered the Rotherham Independent College, to prepare for the ministry, just before completing his sixteenth year. In 1824 he was licensed to preach at Lundon, Shropshire, where he labored two years, when he removed to Kirby Moorside, and thence to Gainsborough, and seven years later to Penrith, where he died May 22, 1859. Mr. Brewis was a total abstainer from all intoxicating drinks during the last thirty years of his life. As a preacher he was diligent, plain, energetic, and fervent. See Long, History, 1870, p. 222.

Brewster (see Shewell), Ann, an English minister of the Society of Friends, was born in London in 1762. She was converted in early life, was married to Thomas Brewster in 1784, and took up her residence in Clapham in 1800. For many years she was impressed with the duty of becoming a minister, and was recognized as such in 1821, at the somewhat advanced age of fifty-nine years. She labored very diligently in her own meeting, and in some of the neighboring quarterly meetings. She seems to have been especially blessed in family visitations, for which she had a rare gift. Her last years were attended with great physical sufferings from chronic rheumatism, which she bore with Christian patience. She died April 23, 1863. See Minutes of Deceased Ministers, 1836, p. 17-28. (J. C. S.)

Brewster, Frederic Humphrey, a Congregational minister, was born at Waterloo, N. Y., Feb. 20, 1822. He graduated at Williams College in 1846, spent one year at Andover Seminary, and graduated at Connecticut Theological Institute in 1851. He was ordained at Enfield, Conn., and received an appointment to the China Mission from the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. He sailed July 31, 1852, and died at Canton, Jan. 29, 1853. See Alumni Records of Conn. Theol. Inst. p. 61. (J. C. S.)

Brewster, Henry, an English Congregational minister, was born at Staron, Norfolk, Sept. 14, 1813. Some time from 1831 to 1834 he joined the Church at Wottwell, in Norfolk. In November, 1834, giving up his school work as a tutor, he entered as a member in the Borough-road School; and in March, 1835, he was sent to Farnham, Surrey, to commence a British school in that town. Two days after his arrival here he preached his first sermon. In August, 1841, he went to Chuchleigh, Devonshire, where he remained only a few days, but this visit resulted in a winning influence for the cause of Scriptural Christian Society. His sphere of labor was the villages of Stowey and Can-nington, near Bridgewater. Here he labored assiduously, but with little success. Subsequently he proceeded to Milborne Port to establish a day-school in connection with the Independent Church. Soon afterwards the Rev. J. Gay, of Cheriton, engaged him as his assistant; on Mr. Gay's resignation Mr. Brewster became the sole pastor, and was ordained at Cheriton, May 16, 1848. He died there, Sept. 28, 1852. "Mr. Brewster was a man of great reserve, great attainments, and great piety." See ( Lond.) Comp. Year-book, 1853, p. 206.

Brewster, James (1), an English martyr, was of the parish of St. Nicholas, in Colchester. He was a carpenter, and listened to the reading of the Bible from one William Sweeney. For this he was burned in Smithfield, Oct. 16, 1531. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 215.

Brewster, James (2), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Green County, O., May 6, 1869. He was converted in 1826, and in 1833 received license to preach, and was admitted into the Ohio Conference, wherein he served faithfully until his death, June 25, 1844. Mr. Brewster was an acceptable and useful minister, bringing many to Christ. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1846, p. 585.

Brewster, John (1), an English martyr, was a Frenchman by birth, and was burned at Smithfield in 1511 for alleged heresy concerning the sacrament. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 190.

Brewster, John (2), an English divine, was educated at Lincoln College, Oxford, and died in 1843. His publications include, Meditations of a Recluse (1800) — Meditations on the Aged (1810) — Lectures on the Acts of the Apostles (1807) — Contemplations on the Lost Histories of our Blessed Saviour with his Disciples, etc. (1822) — and other works. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Brewster, Jonathan McDuffee, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born in Alton, N. H., Nov. 1, 1856. He was fitted for college at New Hampton, graduated at Dartmouth College in 1870, and studied theology at New Hampton and Andover. In May, 1869, he became pastor of the Free Baptist Church in Springfield, Me., and was ordained the following December. From May, 1864, to May, 1869, he was the assistant editor of the Morning Star, the organ of his denomination, publishing a steady supply of matter. After the Star was shelved for a short time in Fairport, N. Y., he removed, in 1871, to Rhode Island, and for three years and a half was pastor at North Scituate. In 1875 he accepted a call to the Park-street Church, in Providence, and at once took a prominent position among the ministers of his denomination. In 1872 he was elected clerk of the Rhode Island Association of Free Baptist Churches, and held this position till his death, which occurred in Providence, June 1, 1882. For several years he was on the editorial corps of the Morning Star, and was a constant contributor to the columns of the paper. He was a trustee of Storer College, at Harvard, Va., and a member of the Executive Board of the Free-will Baptist Foreign Mission Society. Among the productions of his pen were, Life of William Burt, editor of the Morning Star; History of the Free Baptists of Rhode Island and Vicinity; and The Free-will Baptists, embodying an outline history of the denomination. See E. R. Bigg, Dict. of Providence Journal, June 8, 1882. (J. C. S.)

Brewster, Le Roy S., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Unity, N. H., in 1826. He experienced conversion when about fourteen; at the age of nineteen received license to preach; and at the age of twenty-two entered the New England Conference. He died in Webster, Mass., in March, 1873. Mr. Brewster possessed excellent natural ministerial endowments, and was a writer of much influence and moral spirit. He was punctual and systematic, studious and eloquent. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1873, p. 52.
Brewer, Doring, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Weybridge, Vt., in 1796. He was licensed by the Congregational Association, and appointed over a Church in Addison, Vt., in 1822. In 1840 he joined the Presbyterian Church (N. S.), and became pastor of a Church at Livonia, N. Y. In 1846 he joined the Hudson Synod, and became pastor of Bethel Church, New York. He died Feb. 12, 1860. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1861, p. 80.

Brewer, William, elder of the Pilgrim fathers, was born, so far as can be ascertained, at Scrrooby, England, in 1560, and was educated at the University of Cambridge. During his college course of study he became a Christian. William Davison, who had been appointed governor of queen Elizabeth, in Holland, received him into his service, and formed him for an enduring friendship. On returning from Holland Brewer took up his residence in his native place. Not satisfied with the religious condition of affairs in the Church of England, he left it and joined the Puritans. In the attempt which was made by himself, Bradford, and others to escape from England to go to Holland, where they hoped to enjoy religious liberty, he was seized and thrown into prison, and lost no small part of his property. At length he, with his impoverished family, reached Leyden, and, for a time, devoted himself to teaching and printing. He was chosen a ruling elder of the Church in Leyden, and when it was decided by the Pilgrims to leave the Old World for the New, he was among the first company which came to this country in 1620. For several years the Plymouth Church was without a regularly ordained minister. Elder Brewster took charge of the want, in so far as preaching was concerned, but would not administer the sacraments. He died about April 16, 1644. His life was one of great usefulness, and his holy influence was felt among the Pilgrims long after his decease. See Belknap, Amer. Biog., ii, 252-256; Allen, Amer. Biog., s. v. (J. C. S.)

Breyer, Rcm., a French theologian, was born at Troyes, in Champagne, in 1698. He was a doctor of the Sorbonne, and ultimately treasurer in the collegiate establishment of St. Urban, at Troyes. He died Dec. 29, 1749, leaving a translation of the Letters of St. Lupus of Troyes, and St. Sidonius of Clermont (Troyes, 1706, 12mo). He also wrote the lives of several saints, and two works in defence of the veneration and cultus paid by the Church of Troyes to St. Prudentius, etc. There is said also to exist in MS. a History of the Councils of the Province of Sens, by the same author. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog., s. v.; Landou, Ecles. Dict., s. v.

Breuning, in Norse mythology, was a large, richly engraved, golden ornament on the neck of the goddess Freia. Four clever smiths of the family of dwarfs had made it. Loki stole it to bring it to Odin, who presented it to Freia, and she could now no longer withstand the love of the god.

Briant, Alexander, an English controversialist, was born in Somersetshire in 1557. In 1574 he entered Hart Hall, whence he went to Rheims and thence to Douay, where he was ordained priest. In 1579 he returned to England, and showed his zeal for Catholicism. In 1581 he was imprisoned, and in the same year executed for treason. He wrote several Letters.

Briant, Denis, a French Benedictine of St. Maur, who was born about 1655 at Ple duen (Côtes-d'Armor), and died Feb. 6, 1710, at Redon, wrote a Histoire de Bretagne, and several memoirs in the Gallia Christiana. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog., s. v.

Briant, Lemuel, a Congregational minister, was born in Scituate, Mass. He graduated at Harvard College in 1815; was ordained pastor of the Church in Quincy, Sept. 4, 1745; was dismissed Oct. 22, 1758; and died at Scituate, Oct. 1, 1754, aged thirty-two. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 499.

Briard, Johannes, a Flemish theologian, was born at Batieul in Hainault. He was a doctor of theology, and vice-chancellor of the University of Louvain; a man held in estimation by Erasmus. He died Jan. 15, 1520, leaving Questions quodlibetica (Lyons, 1546): De Contructa Sortis seu Loterias: De causis Indulgentiarum. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog., s. v.; Landou, Ecles. Dict., s. v.

Briareus, in Greek mythology, is the name which the deities gave to the frightful hundred-armed giant Aegaeon.

Bribery. It may be a question whether the qualification required of bishops and deacons by the Pastoral Epistles, that they should not be "given to filthy lucre" (1 Tim. iii, 3, 8; Tit. i, 7), implies promiscuous to bribery, properly so called, or covetousness generally. If, however, we reckon the Apostolical Constitutions as representing generally the Church life of the 2d century, we see that the offence was then beginning to take shape. The bishop is directed not to be open to receive gifts, since unconscionable men, becoming acceptance persons, will have their reward. A bishop is required to keep the door of his house shut, will spare the slander, letting him remain in the Church. In two other passages there are even more marked recognitions of such offences.

In the Roman law there were numerous enactments against bribery. Theodosius enacted the penalty of death against all judges who took bribes, who took any bribe, even if it were only a cent, in a judge's time, although the penalty of death seems to have been abrogated, the offence is subjected to degrading punishments.

The law of the Church on the subject of bribery was substantially that of the State. The spiritual sin was looked upon as equivalent to the civil offence, and the Church needed no special discipline to punish the former. One form of bribery, indeed, relating to the obtainment of the orders or dignities of the Church, is considered separately under the head of Simony (q. v.)

Briccio, Francesco. See BRIZZIO.

Briccio, Paolo, an Italian prelate and historian, entered the order of the Recollets, was theologian of the duchess of Savoy, and had charge of a Spanish congregation; abbot of the monastery of the Recollets at Rome, and in 1665, 1671, 1672, 1674, 1675, 1676, 1677, he issued statutes. In 1683, he issued a treatise Against the Calvinists, and was made a cardinal in 1685. He was soon afterwards in the service of the Emperor Charles II, and in 1688, in a treatise on the Church of Sweden, he proved the superiority of the Church of Rome over that country, and for these reasons he was expelled from Sweden. In 1701, he issued a treatise on the Inquisition, and in 1720, he published a treatise on the Church of Sweden. He died at Rome, July 10, 1726. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog., s. v.

Brice, Saint, a French prelate, a native of Tours, was educated by St. Martin, to whom he caused great chargen on account of his indolence. After a thorough reformation of his habits, he was raised to the episcopal see of Tours upon the death of St. Martin. He was finally driven from his diocese, and obliged to take refuge in Rome until recalled by the inhabitants of Tours. He died there, Nov. 19, 444. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog., s. v.

Brice (or Bricius), a Scottish bishop, was a son of the noble family of Douglas, prior of Lemsagow. He became bishop of Moray in 1203, and was the first bishop who located the cathedral of this see in the place of Spynie. He founded the college of canons, being, etc., in number, and went to Rome to a council in 1215. He died in 1222. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 137.

Brice, Edward (1), an Irish Presbyterian minister, appears to have been a man of good ability and strong moral resoluteness. He studied under Fermi at Edinburgh, during 1689 and 1697; "he took the degree of M.A. in Edinburgh in 1698, and must have been entered at the University of 1695, according to the title of the degree he opposed the motion for making Spottiswood, archbishop of Glasgow, permanent moderator of the Synod of Clydesdale—"the expedient then adopted for securing the introduction of prelacy into Scotland"—he was marked out for persecution, and was compelled to leave the kingdom. At this time he ministered at Drymen, in Stirling-shire, where he had been pastor for some years. The next statement in regard to Brice is in reference to the close of his life. He was at this time (1836) at Braidside. He was deposed by the bishop for holding Presbyterian doctrines; but before the sentence had been carried into effect he died. From the inscription on his tombstone, it appears that he began preaching in Braidside in 1818, where "he labored with quiet success" until his death in 1836. See Reid, Hist. of the Presb. Church in Ireland.

Brice, Edward (2d), an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Bristol, May 10, 1810. Maternal piety attracted him to religious thoughts and engagements. In 1838 he was sent as a supply to the Dorchester Circuit, and he subsequently became an acceptable and useful minister. Wolverhampton was his last field, and he died there, May 10, 1859. Gentle and timid, he manifested great courage when duty called to action. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1859; West. Meth. Mag. Jan. 1869.

Brice, Etienne Gabriel de, a French writer, was born at Paris in June, 1807, and became, first, a Catholic, and then, in 1831, a member of a congregation of St. Maur. He labored, with Tachereau, at the Gallia Christiana, and died Nov. 18, 1755. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Brice, Fransces, a French Capuchin and Orientalist, was born at Rennes near the close of the 15th century. After having been a missionary in Egypt and Palestine, where he acquired a knowledge of the Arabic language, he was called to Rome by the congregation of the Propaganda, which employed him to translate several large works into that language. He died in 1533, at the chateau of Esmont, near Montreaux. Some of his translations are as follows: Annotated Edition of the Gregorian Breviary in Two Volumes; Epistles of St. Paul in Latin (Rome, 1569-71); Anselm, a Creationis Monstr. ad Christi Incarnationem Epistome Latino Arabica (ibid., 1655). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Brice (Lat. Brixio), Germain, a French theologian, native of Auxerre, entered the ecclesiastical career, was almoner of the king, and canon of the cathedral of Paris. He died in the diocese of Chartres in 1305. Besides some small works, he wrote a Grammar of the Latin and German, the style, and in the 15th century, brick-work becomes common. The most elaborate mouldings and ornamentation are exhibited in some of the remains of brick-work; and the fine 16th-century chimneys of which there are many examples, are for the most part built of brick.

Brick, Daniel, a Congregational minister, was a native of Boston. He graduated from Princeton College, became chaplain in the army and accompanied Porter's regiment to Canada, and shared in the hardships of that campaign. He was present in the attack upon Quebec. After the war he visited the North-west Territory, and delivered the first sermon ever preached on the spot where Marietta, O., now stands. He died in Vermont in 1845. Mr. Brick was a man of high Christian character. See Alexander, Princeton College in the 18th Century.

Brickwood, Richard, a preacher of the United Methodist Free Church, was born in Carmel, Conn., in June, 1822. He was religiously brought up, was converted at sixteen, and became a local preacher, and in the ministry in 1845, the year he joined the Methodist in 1851; was soon after licensed to exhort, in 1852 to preach, and in 1853 entered the North Ohio Conference. In 1856 he received an appointment from the Delaware to the Van Wert Circuit, and in the midst of his labors there died, April 2, 1857. Mr. Brice was a consistent Christian, a systematic, sound, practical preacher, and a cheerful, faithful pastor. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1857, p. 479.

Brice, John H., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Annapolis, Md., in 1818. He was converted when quite young; obtained a local license in 1836; and in 1864 joined the Washington Conference. In 1876 failing health obliged him to accept a supernumerary relation, which he sustained to the close of his life, June 23, 1877. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1876, p. 27.

Brice, William, a Universalist minister, was born in the state of New York, Jan. 23, 1801. He was educated in England, and on returning travelled over most of the Atlantic States, preaching a universal salvation. He finally settled in Missouri; removed to Washington Territory in 1870; and died June 18, 1878. Mr. Brice was a man of intelligence and culture, and of exemplary life. See Universalist Register, 1879, p. 95.

Bricianorum Ordo was a military order, established by St. Bridget, queen of Sweden, in 1366, during the pontificate of Urban V, who confirmed it, and gave for its observance the rule of St. Augustine. Their principal peculiarity was to bury the dead, to assist widows and orphans and sick persons, to fight for the true faith, etc.

Bricon, an Irish saint of Tuaim Drecain, commemorated Sept. 5, was of the race of Tadhg, son of Cian, and had at Tuaim Drecain a famous college, consisting of three distinct schools—poetry, general Gaedelic learning, and the classics. Among other pupils, St. Bricon had the most remarkable man of his age, Cennfaeladh, "the learned."

Bricel, See Brice.

Brick. The Romans used brick extensively in architecture; and though it might seem singular that such an art when once learned should have been lost, nevertheless the remains of buildings between the Roman times and the 15th century show no evidence of bricks having been used, beyond, in a few instances, employing them as old material from buildings left by the Romans, as at Colchester and St. Alban's Abbey. Perhaps the earliest true brick-building existing in England is that of Little Whamham Hall (c. 1290). A few instances of early 14th-century brickwork occur in the works of Germany of the style, and in the 15th century, brick-work becomes common. The most elaborate mouldings and ornamentation are exhibited in some of the remains of brick-work; and the fine 16th-century chimneys, of which there are many examples, are for the most part built of brick.
BRICONNET 624 BRIDGE

terminated a useful and happy life. See Minutes of Fifth Annual Assembly.

BRICONNET, ROBERT, a French prelate, uncle of Denis and William, was archbishop of Rheims and chancellor of France. His rapid advancement was due to the favor of his brother, the cardinal of Saint Malo, who enjoyed the death of Moulins, June 3, 1497. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

BRICOT, THOMAS, a French writer, was professor of theology at Paris at the close of the 18th century. He composed upon the works of Aristotle, upon logic and scholastic philosophy, numerous books which were considered quite important, and editions of which were multiplied at the close of the 19th century, at Paris, Lyons, Basle, and Venice. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

BRITANNUS (or BRISTANUS), an English Benedictine, who lived about 876, composed some works in verse, one of which, written in imitation of the Lamentations of Jeremiah, is styled In Cocius Monasterii Croylandensis Threni, etc.

BRIDAN, CHARLES ANTOINE, a distinguished French sculptor, was born at Rivire, in Burgundy, in 1730. When he was thirty-three years of age he went to Rome, and studied there three years. In 1764 he returned to Paris, and presented to the Academy his marble group of the Martyrdom of St. Bartholomew. He was elected an academian in 1772. He died in Paris, April 28, 1805. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, 1228; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

BRIDGWYN, JOHN, an English Wesleyan missionary, was converted in early life, and was appointed by the Conference upon his entering the ministry in 1824 to Kingstown, W. I. He labored on the islands with great acceptance for ten years, when impaired health induced him to return to England. He died Jan. 20, 1836, aged thirty-five. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1856-1870.

BRIDE, SAINT. See BRIGID.

BRIDEL, JEAN LOUIS, a Swiss scholar, was born in December, 1759. After being preceptor in Switzerland, then in Holland, he was successively pastor of the French Church at Basel, at Cassonay, in the canton of Vaud, and finally professor of the interpretation of the books of the saints and the Oriental languages at Lausanne, where he died, Feb. 5, 1821. Some of his principal works are, Introduction à la Lecture des Odes de Pindare (Lausanne, 1783); L'Alchimie (Paris, 1806); --Dissertation sur l'état et les Fonctions des Propéthés (Lausanne, 1806) --Discours sur l'Éloquence Morale de la Lecture des Livres Sacrés, et sur le Style de leurs Auteurs (Ibid, 1800).

BRIDEL, LOUIS, a French Protestant minister, was born in 1819 at Vevey. He studied at Lausanne, and after having preached for some time in his native country, he went in 1840 to Paris, where, as one of the preachers at the chapel Taibour, he soon became the centre of evangelical work. In 1855 he returned to his native land, and devoted his entire energy to the benefit of his Church. In 1858 he founded the Christen Evangelique, which he edited as long as he lived. The evangelization of Spain very much occupied his mind, and the carrying-out of his plans was interrupted by his death, Nov. 1, 1866. His important work is Trois Séances sur Paul Rabaut et les Prot. Franç. au Dix- huitième Siècle (1859). See Christen Evangelique, 1866, 865-864; Lichtenberger, Encyclopédie des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

BRIDGART, JOHN, an English Wesleyan missionary, after long labor in South Africa, where his presence was accepted in West Africa for five years, was compelled the second time to quit his field for the recovery of his health. On the voyage home he called at St. Mary's, on the Gambia, but was too ill to go on shore. He was visited by Cooper, the missionary. He died June 24, 1839, and his remains were committed to the deep. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1859.

BRIDGE, THE SHARP. See AL-SIRAT.

BRIDGE, CHRISTOPHER (1), a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was educated at the University of Cambridge, England, and arrived in Boston, Mass., in March, 1869, as an assistant to Rev. Samuel Myles, rector of King's Chapel. After a few years a difficulty, which threatened to convulse the Church, arose between the two, amounting to the insult of the officiating rights. Mr. Bridge was removed in 1866 to the Church at Narragansett, R. I., where he again became involved in difficulty--the bishop of London, in a letter to the officers of King's Chapel, declaring that he had "committed an insolent riot upon the Church of Rhode Island." The nature of the "riot" has not been ascertained. Mr. Bridge arrived at Harvard College in 1738, settled as an Episcopal clergyman on the island of Jamaica, and died in 1738, aged seventy years. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v. 76.

BRIDGE, CHRISTOPHER (2), a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, believed to be a son of the foregoing, graduated at Harvard College in 1738, settled as an Episcopal clergyman on the island of Jamaica, and died in 1738, aged seventy years. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v. 71.

BRIDGE, EBENEZER, a Unitarian minister, was born at Boston in 1714, and graduated at Harvard College in 1736. He was ordained minister of Chelmsford, May 20, 1741, and died in October, 1792. He published two sermons. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 58.

BRIDGE, GEORGE WASHINGTON, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Betherston, Kent, England, Nov. 27, 1817. He was led to Christ as a Sunday-school scholar at the age of ten, and licensed to preach at sixteen. When about thirty he emigrated to America and was ordained as a minister by the South Carolina Conference, N. Y., and in 1851 entered the Oneida Conference. In 1863 he was transferred to the Providence Conference, and in its active ranks labored until his death, Oct. 28, 1867. Mr. Bridge was intelligent, affectionate, and energetic. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1868, p. 60.

BRIDGE, HENRY MARTYN, a Methodist, and afterwards a Congregationalist, was born at Northfield, Mass., Aug. 21, 1803. His parents were devoted members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and his two brothers, J. D. and J. W., were ministers in that Church. Mr. Bridge united with the Church at the age of seventeen, and was licensed to preach in 1844. As a local preacher he was stationed one year at Centreville, R. I. Between 1844, when he joined the North-eastern Conference, and 1854, he was stationed at North Malden, Gloucester, Lunenburg, Princeton, Blandford Centre, and Williamsburg, Mass. Varing in his views towards Congregationalism, he left the Conference, and accepted a call in 1854 to a Church of that body at Warwick. In 1859 he went to Minnesota to try and recruit his health. He returned after a few weeks and entered upon the pastorate of the Church at Colebrook, N. H., where he died, Dec. 31, 1861. He was a solemn and instructive preacher, and a sympathetic pastor. See Cong. Quarterly, 1882, p. 303.
Bridge, Josiah, a Congregational minister, was born at Lexington, Mass., Dec. 28, 1739. He graduated at Harvard College in 1758, was ordained pastor of the Church at Sudbury, Nov. 4, 1761, and died June 20, 1801. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i. 518.

Bridge, Thomas, a Congregational minister, was a native of Hackney, England. He came to America while young, and graduated at Harvard College in 1735. After residing a while in Europe he became a minister. He preached in various places at different times, and then was ordained one of the pastors of the First Church in Boston, Mass., May 10, 1705. He died Sept. 26, 1715, aged fifty-eight years. He was distinguished for his piety, diligence, and modesty. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i. 163.

Bridgegman, Peter G., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Bainbridge, N. Y., March 20, 1804. He was converted at the age of eighteen, licensed to exhort in 1826, to preach in 1828, and in 1836 entered the Oneida Conference, wherein he labored until disabled in 1843 by a shock of paralysis. In 1836 he resumed his place in the active ranks, remained effective some nine or ten years, when he again became supernumerary, and in 1842 was removed to his deaconess position. He died July 24, 1872. Mr. Bridgegman was an excellent preacher and pastor. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1873, p. 35.

Bridges, Albert, a colored Lutheran missionary, was born in South Carolina about 1845. In 1863 he emigrated with a colony of colored people to Liberia, where he remained a year and a half. While there he was connected for a short time with the Lutheran Mühlenberg Mission, but soon returned to America to prepare himself for missionary work. He spent three years studying at the Missionary Institute, and for a time was engaged as an agent for the American Tract Society. He died at Milton, Pa., June 30, 1872. See Lutheran Observer, Aug. 4, 1871.

Bridges, Charles, an English divine, was born at Northampton, March 24, 1794. He received a careful religious training, was educated at Queen's College, Cambridge, took holy orders in 1817, and entered upon his first curacy at Gosfield, Essex. He was presented to the living of Old Newton, Suffolk, in 1823, where he wrote the Exposition on the Book of Proverbs. In 1849 he accepted the living of Melcombe Regis, and in 1855 that of Hinton Martell, Dorsetshire, where he spent the remainder of his life, writing his Exposition on Ecclesiastes. He died April 2, 1869. Mr. Bridges was characterized by great spirituality of mind, deep and accurate knowledge of Scripture, retentiveness of memory, and singular aptitude. See Christian Observer, June, 1869, p. 471.

Bridges, Solomon T., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Putnam County, Ga., Dec. 22, 1822. He joined the Church in 1847, removed to Texas in 1852, received license to preach in 1858, and served in the following year in the East Texas Conference. In 1860 he located, and in 1861 joined the Confederate army, and in it served four years, preaching on every opportune occasion. In 1866 he joined the West Texas Conference, labored one year, and then took a supernumerary relation, which he retained to the close of his life, Nov. 13, 1870. Mr. Bridges was fervent in spirit, cultured in intellect, and faithful in labor. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1870, p. 511.

Bridge, Saint. See Bridgman.

Bridge (Sain't), the Xv Oks of, are fifteen prayers (oratomes, of which oes is the abbreviation), composed by St. Bridget (whose revelations were fervently credited in mediæval times), and used before the crucifix daily in St. Paul's Church at Rome. They were formerly very popular.

Bridge (Sain't), Order of. See Bridgettines.

Bridge (Sain't), Sisters of, a religious order founded in 1606 by Dr. Delaney, bishop of Kildare and Leighlin, Ireland. Candidates take vows of chastity, poverty, and obedience. The costume is black, similar to that of the Presentation nuns and Sisters of Mercy. The first convent was established at Tullow, County Carlow, Ireland, and the second at Mount Rath, in 1806. One was established at Buffalo, N. Y., about 1858.

Bridgewater, Francis Henry Egerton, eighth Earl of, an English clergyman and author, was born Nov. 11, 1756, and educated at Eton and All-Souls' College, Oxford, where he graduated as master of arts in 1780. In the same year he became prebendary of Durham, and in the following year rector of Middle Shropshire. In 1797 he was collated to the rectory of Whitbychurch in the same county. He succeeded to his brother's titles in 1823, and died April 11, 1829. He resided entirely at Paris for many years previous to his death. He published several works, literary and historical (for which see Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.); but the most enduring monument to his memory is the bequest for the publication of the Bridgewater Treatises (q. v.).

Bridgewater (Lat. Acyprotus), John, an English Jesuit theologian, was educated at Hart Hall and Brasenose College, Oxford. He was chosen rector of Lincoln College in 1653, and archdeacon of Rochester in 1679. He subsequently espoused the cause of Romanism, resigned his preferrments, and sought a home in the college for English Roman Catholics at Donny. He died in Germany about 1690. His writings include Concertatio Ecclesiae Catholicae in Anglia (1583; enlarged ed. 1594)—Commentaria in Quadruplices Theologiae, etc. (1609). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Hosefer, Novum Regnum Divinum., s. v.

Bridgman, David, an English Baptist minister, was born in the vicinity of Bovey Tracey, Devonshire, March 13, 1795. He united with the Church at the age of sixteen; studied with Rev. James Viney of Bridgewater two years, and in 1825 was ordained pastor of the Church at Modbury, where he remained five years. In 1830 he removed to怜ington, Somersetshire, where he continued for nearly thirty years. His next and last settlement was at Ashley, Hampshire, where he died, July 4, 1868. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1869, p. 137. (J. C. S.)

Bridgman, Elijah Coleman, D.D., a pioneer missionary to China, was born in Massachusetts in 1801. He graduated at Amherst College in 1826, and at the Andover Theo. Seminary in 1827. He was ordained Oct. 8, 1829, and sent out by the American Board the same year. He was welcomed by Rev. Dr. Morrison, and entered upon his work with ardent hopes for success. He labored first at Canton and Macao, and in 1847 went to Shanghai, where he died, Oct. 27, 1861. (W. P. S.)

Bridgman, James, an English Congregational minister, was born in London in 1788. He was converted in early life; became a student in Cheshunt College, where he remained as student and assistant tutor for five years. He was ordained at Spa Fields Chapel in 1809, and after preaching in various places in the "Connection," according to the practice of the "Society," he settled at Chester in 1814, where he remained for the rest of his life. He died Aug. 11, 1857. He was marked by sound faith and prayer, a patient and calm spirit, simple and faithful in declaring the truth to dying men. (See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1888, p. 192.)

Bridgman, Thomas, an English Wesleyan minister, was converted in early life, and entered the itinerant work in 1811. He died April 21, 1882. He was pious, studious, deliberate in forming his plans, but tem- poraneous in adhering to them. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1839.

Bridgman, William, a Presbyterian minister, was settled at Trenton, Ill., in 1866, and at Richview in 1867, as a member of a Kaskaskia Presbytery; at Streator, from 1873 to 1875, as a member of Ottawa Presbytery. He died at Streator, May 27, 1875, aged seventy-three years. See Norton, Hist. of the Presb. Church in Illinois.

Bridgman, James, an English Wesleyan preacher, was born in 1767. He commenced his ministry in 1792; became a supernumerary in 1825, and died suddenly, May 2, 1831. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1831.

Bridgmond, William, an English Wesleyan missionary, son of the preceding, was educated at Woodhouse Grove. He was converted in early life; accepted for the ministry in 1822; sent to Ceylon; labored at Korneegalle, Negombo, Matura, Galle, and Cultura, and after twenty-five years' service returned with broken health. After three years' rest he resumed the work in his native land, and continued it until 1857, when he retired to his daughter's house in Edinburgh. He died April 19, 1858, in his fifty-eighth year. Mr. Bridgmond was humble, yet possessed of real dignity; meek and patient under trials, yet firmly maintaining right and truth. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1838.

Brioule, TOUSSAINT, a French ascetic theologian of the Jesuit order, was born at Lisieux in 1650, and died at the same place July 28, 1672. His principal works are: La Boutique Sacree des Santes et Vertueux Artisans (Lisieux, 1650) — L'Ecole de l'Eucharistie, etablie sur le Respect Miraculeux que les Bieres, les Oiseaux et les Insectes ont rendu, en differentes Occasions, au tres saint Sacrement de P'union (ibid. 1672) translated into English, Lond. 1688. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.

Brie. See Brey.

Brief, is applied to a little ecclesiastical calendar, containing the order of saying the Holy Office, daily, throughout the year. It is also called Ordo. These Briefs vary in different dioceses, and among different religious orders. Hence there is Le Bref de Paris, Le Bref des Bénédictins, etc.

BRIEFS are also letters patent, formerly issued in England, giving license for public collections in churches.

Brieli, JEHUDA LEON, an Enotian Jewish rabbi, was born about 1643, and died as chief-rabbi at Mantua in 1722. The only printed work of his is the Hebrew grammar, נינ' ילש לילב הזא (Mantua, 1730). He wrote besides, a polemical work against the Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles. In the Italian language he wrote a treatise on miracles, BREVE RIGONAMENTO SOpra i MIRACOLI, and a reply to Pinamonti’s La Sinopisa Dismantolata, all of which are still in MS. See Fritx, Bibl. Brien, O. See O' Brien.

Briely, BENJAMIN, a Baptist minister, was born in York, England, Nov. 24, 1811. He came to America in 1821, and united with the Church in Cunningham, Mass., in 1831. He studied for four years at Newton and Waltham. In 1835 he was ordained in Dover, N. H., and during the fourteen years thereafter he was pastor at Dover and Great Falls, N. H.; Springfield and Middlebury, Vt.; Manchester, N. H.; and Salem, Mass. In 1849 he went to California, and became pastor in Sacramento. Subsequently he was pastor at San Francisco for six years, at San José two years, and at Nevada City three years, where he died, July 21, 1883. An address, which, in 1847, he preached before the American Baptist Home Mission Society, had a wide circulation. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclopedia, p. 133. (J. C. S.)

Briely, ISAAC, an English Congregational minister, was born at Rothdale, Oct. 29, 1812. From early boyhood he was remarkable for his studious habits. He was religiously trained, joined the Church June 2, 1832, and from that time was diligently employed in Sunday-school teaching. He soon became Sunday-school superintendent, then was induced to deliver short addresses, and finally to conduct cottage services. In 1839 he entered the academy at Pickering, with a view chiefly to home mission work. His ministerial services during his academic course were highly valued and extensively sought. In 1842 he was ordained at Mix- enden, where he labored for twenty-two years, and then removed to Ayton, near Stokesley. He retired in 1872 to Leyburn, and there died, March 7, 1875. Mr. Briely adorned his profession with a modest, consistent, and devoted life. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1874, p. 812.

Briesmann, Johannes, a Lutheran minister of Germany, was born Dec. 31, 1488, at Cottbus in Lusatia. In 1507 he went to Wittenberg and entered the mon- astery of the Minorites. In 1510 he read his first mass in the monastery. The disputation held in 1519 be- tween Luther and Eck was the turning-point of his life. He now joined himself to Luther, whose teachings strengthened him more and more in the truth of the Gospel; and the eleven theses which he published in 1521, in order to become a doctor of theology, were his first confession, and show a very clear perception of the truth. From Wittenberg he went, in 1522, to Cottbus, and preached there the Gospel. In 1523 he was ap- pointed preacher at Königsberg, and on Sept. 27 he delivered his first sermon, being the first of the series of reformers who evangelized Prussia. In 1527 he ac- cepted a call to Riga, and brought about a new state of things in religious matters. In 1531 he returned to Königsberg and caused the foundation of a high-school, which since 1544 has been known as the Königsberg University. He died Oct. 1, 1549. See Ranke, Deutsche Geschichte (bd edit.), ii, 54 sq.; Kostlin, Luther, i, 583, 601, 680, 709, ii, 507; Ehrmann, in Herzog's Real-Encyclop. s. v. (B. P.)

Briet, PHILIPP, a learned French Jesuit, was born at Abbeville about 1600, and, in conjunction with Père Costart, had the care of the Jesuits' library at Paris. He died Dec. 9, 1668. Among his works are, Paralela Geographia Vetric et Nova (1648, 1649, 3 vol. 4to); the parts of Asia and Africa was by some un- accountable accident lost before publication:— Acade- raus Mundi, sive Chronionum Universale ab Ordo Concilii ad ann. Christi, 1663 (Paris, 1662, 1665, 7 vols. 12mo). He also assisted in the Concordia Chronologiae de Cassart (ibid. 1670, 3 vols. fol.). See Landon, Ecles. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.

Brierc, SAINT. See SINUACS.

Briga, SAINT. See BRIGI.
Briga, Melchior della, an Italian mathematician of the Jesuit order, was born at Cesene in 1686. He was professor of philosophy at Florence, and of theology at Sienna, where he died, July 25, 1749. His principal works are, Facultas Isicae Statae Captivilia (Roone, 1716, 1726). Acta Erud. Leprem, 1722, — Philosophiae Ecclesiasticae (Florence, 1729). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Briggs, Alfred, an English Congregational minister, was born at Wilsden, York, Sept. 13, 1819, and joined the Church at Warley, near Halifex, Dec. 5, 1839. He became a student of Airedale College in September, 1842, and pastor of a small church at Rothbury, where he was ordained, Aug. 14, 1847. He died in January, 1848. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1848, p. 213.

Briggs, Charles (1), an English Baptist minister, was born in 1758. He was successively pastor of the General Baptist churches at Loughborough and at Spalding. He died at the former place Sept. 9, 1840. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1841, p. 92. J. C. S.

Briggs, Charles (2), an English Congregational minister, was born at Whitew, Leicester, Dec. 27, 1827. He had a godly training, and, being converted at the age of eighteen, put forth earnest efforts to prepare himself for the ministry. He had connected himself with the Primitive Methodists, and in 1848 was called to the regular ministry in the Maidenhead Circuit. Thence he went to Congregational Oxford, and, in 1859, to Southampton, where he joined the Congregationalists, preached for them four years at Coleford, Gloucestershire, three years at Leicester, a few years at Wellingborough, Northamptonshire, and at Chatteris, Cambridgeshire. In 1868 he accepted a call to Kingswood, and served there until the time of his death, Aug. 9, 1874. Mr. Briggs was a kind-hearted, genial, frank man: a sincere, devout, earnest Christian: and a faithful minister. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1872, p. 302.

Briggs, Ebenezer, a Baptist minister, was born in Middleborough, Mass., in 1768, where he became pastor of the Fourth Baptist Church for many years, preaching also in several years in Raynham, likewise at what was known as "The Four Corners." He is spoken of as having been eminently a peacemaker, though never at the expense of truth. He died at his residence in Middleborough, Feb. 8, 1851. See Watchman and Reflector, Feb. 20, 1851. J. C. S.

Briggs, Isaac, a Congregational minister, was born at Halifex, Mass., May 7, 1775. He was the son of the Rev. Ephraim Briggs, pastor of the Congregational Church at Northfield, and the brother of Charles. He graduated at Brown University in 1794, and was pastor of the churches in the following places: York, Me., from 1797 to 1805; Boxford, Mass., from 1805 to 1809; New Rochester, Mass., from 1805 to 1808. He died at East Morrisania, N. Y., Feb. 22, 1862. Mr. Briggs was a pious and faithful servant of his Master. See Cong. Quarterly, 1862, p. 388.

Briggs, James, a Congregational minister, was born at Newton, Mass., Jan. 18, 1746. He graduated at Yale in 1775; was ordained pastor of the Church in Cummington, in 1779, where he had been preaching for several years previous; and died Dec. 7, 1825. "When he was settled, the town voted to give him 20£, and 40£ (the value of rye at 3s. 4d. a bushel), for 'settlement,' and £50 salary, to be increased by £5 a year until it reached £200, estimated by rye, as above; but at 20l. a pound, and flax at 8d. a pound." See Cong. Quarterly, 1869, p. 44; Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ii, 408.

Briggs, Joel, a Baptist minister, was born in Northborough, Mass., Oct. 16, 1800. He died in early life, and was baptized in March, 1770. He pursued his collegiate studies at Brown University for nearly three years, when he was obliged to leave college on account of a weakness in his eyes. In January, 1785, he accepted a unanimous invitation from the Baptist Church and Society in Randolph, to become their pastor, and was ordained Dec. 5, 1787. After a pastorate crowned by four or five revivals, he resigned in 1825, on account of growing infirmities. He continued to preach, as opportunity offered, until his death. He left a good record as a faithful servant of Christ, who loved the cause to the promotion of which he had consecrated his life. See Amer. Baptist Mag. v, 285. J. C. S.

Briggs, Otis, a Baptist minister, was born about 1788, and graduated at Brown University in 1808. He commenced his ministry in Enfield, Conn., Jan. 18, 1815. He was ordained pastor of the Church in North Yarmouth, but soon after took charge of the township of land given by the state of Massachusetts to Waterville College. In 1818 he removed to Bangor, Me., and about two years afterwards became pastor of the Church in Hampden for eight years, and of the Second Baptist Church in the same place three years. For several years he was engaged in agencies for benevolent causes, and died Oct. 1, 1842, while he was in the employment of the Home Mission Society. See Millett, History of the Baptist of Maine, p. 407.

Briggs, T. C., a Baptist minister, was born in Vermont, Nov. 29, 1823. When but two years of age he lost his father. His taste for books early developed itself, and he gave promise of his future usefulness. He became a Christian when he was seventeen years of age, and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church. During the next ten or twelve years he attended school, and taught and preached. Having gone through a course of study at the Delaware College, he went to Kentucky, where he was ordained by bishop Andrews. In 1850 he became pastor of the Baptist Church at Newton, where he remained two years, and afterwards at Lawrenceburg, Ind., for three years. His next pastorate, which was of four years' duration, was at Harrington Centre, Ill. From this place he removed to Orlando, Ind., where he remained ten years, and then to Chickasaw, La., where he remained until his death, preaching a part of the time at Fredericksburg, and a part of the time at Jacksonville. While the civil war was in progress, Mr. Briggs was outspoken in his anti-slavery sentiments, and lectured on the subject, and circulated a small work which he wrote, entitled, An Exposition of the Constitution of the United States. He died at Chickasaw, Jan. 24, 1880. See Chicago Standard, Feb. 12, 1880.

Brigh (Lat. Brighi), Saint, is given in Irish martyrlogies as the name of a saint of Coirpre, commemorated Jan. 7. She is thought by some to be the daughter of Fergusa, a noble man, who assisted St. Patrick on the banks of the Liffey (Evrinius, St. Patrick, iii, 19), by others the sister of St. Brendan of Clonfert. If daughter of Fergusa, she was probably a Palladian Christian, and lived at Glasheen, near Naremgmore. See O'Halloran, Irish Statistics i, 120.

Brigham, Charles Henry, a Unitarian minister, was born in Boston, July 27, 1820. He graduated at Harvard; became pastor at Taunton, Mass., in 1844, and at Ann Arbor, Mich., in 1865; professor of ecclesiastical history at Mendville, Pa., in 1866; and died at Brooklyn, N. T., Feb. 19, 1879. He wrote, Letters of Foreign Travel: — Life of S. Duggett, numerous pamphlets, sermons, and articles in reviews. See Memoir (Bost., 1881).

Brigham, John Clark, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in New Marlborough, Mass., in 1793. He graduated at Williams College in 1819, studied theology at Andover (class of 1822), spent three years in the ministry in South America, and resigned his charge on the distribution, and on his return, in 1825, became connected with the American Bible Society, of which he was appointed a corresponding secretary in 1827, a post Colgan identifies her with the daughter of Aedh, son of Eochadius. She is probably the Brigida of Moimoinlain—March 9—in Dalairalia, the district governed by the offspring of Coelindis.

2. Daughter of Dubtas, commemorated May 13 and 24. Colgan thinks that this Brigida is she who so carefully nursed her infirm husband and converted him.
After his death she dedicated all her property to and St. Mochteus, and the saint advised her to return to her father's house, build a cell, and there wait the resurrection. Colgan also tries to identify her with Brigida of Naunghar, and Brigida of Senboith or Stranbo in Wexford.

3. Daughter of Leinín, of Cill-inghen-Leinín, commemorated March 6. Among the saints descended from the family of St. Fiollán, Colgan (Acta Sanctorum, p.
104, c. 2) enumerates " Brigida V. filia Leiníni," who is venerated March 6 in the Church of Kill-naninge, district of Ui-Briuin. This "Church of the Sisters" is dedicated to her and other five daughters of Leinín.

4. Daughter of Neman and sister of St. Sédna or Sedonius (commemorated March 9), abbot of Kilalane; sister also of Sta. Gória, Lassara, etc.—all descended from Erec, son of Buthag.

5. Fifth virgin abbess of Kildare, the "Mary of the Irish" (commemorated Feb. 1), was of the race of Eochaidh Finnruathair, son of Fechlinmhidh Reachadh, and thus connected with St. Columba. Her father was Dubtas of Leinín, and her mother a slave or captive. She was educated by the clergy. Brigida was born at Fochart, near Dundalk, about 450. In order to receive, about 467, the pallium album et vestem candi-dam, dedicating her to virginity. Her chief residence was the monastery of Kildare, which she founded; but affiliated houses of both men and women (de utroque sexu) were raised all over the country, she being abbess over all other abbesses, and the bishop with her at Kildare being similarly above all bishops in her other monasteries. She is connected with bishop Mol, disciple of St. Patrick; and her lector and preacher was bishop Nadroich. Thirty years after the death of St. Patrick, whose winding-sheet she prepared, and at the age of about seventy-four, St. Brigida died. Montaillietb (Monks of the West) gives an account of St. Brigida and her monasteries, and places her birth at A.D. 467, and her death A.D. 523. He says that "there are still eighteen parishes in Ireland which bear the name of Kildare or the Church of Brigida." The Irish annals vary as to the manner of her death, but the most probable is A.D. 523. Cogitius (Colgan, Tr. Thum., p. 523, 524) says that when she died her body and that of bishop Conaladh were placed on either side of the decorated altar of the church at Kildare. Others say that her body was afterwards translated to Dow and deposited in one grave with St. Patrick and St. Columba. This, however, is controverted as an invention of the 12th century. In the Scotch account, she was buried or her relics were kept at Abernethy, but it is more probably another St. Brigida (see 6). St. Brigida was a very frequent object of devotion; and churches dedicated to St. Brigida, St. Bright, and St. Bride, in all parts of the British isles, attest the belief in the efficacy of intercession. In Ireland they are almost numberless, and many are forgotten. In Scotland, also, the cultus of this saint was very extensive, her dedications being found chiefly in those parts nearest to Ireland and most under Irish influence. For a full and critical account of her life, see Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ireland, i, 68, 955, and ch. viii, ix; Todd, Book of Hymns, i, 60 sq.; O'Han-lon, Irish Saints, ii, 1 sq.; Baring-Gould, Lives of the Saints, ii, 14 sq.

6. Virgin, commemorated March 14. It is probable there was a Scotch saint of this name, whose relics were kept at Abernethy. A Brigida in the "Life of St.
Cuthbert," to have been brought from Ireland, and educated by St. Columba, the first bishop of Dunkeld, along with St. Cuthbert, at Dunkeld. See Usher, Briguet, Sébastien, a Swiss historian, was canon of Sion in Valais, and sought diligently for the antiquities of his native country. He died in 1780. He left some works, among which we notice Vellese Christi sum Deicides Sedentia Historia Sancta, Vallenianum Episcoporum Seriem Obsequi, Addicto in Fine Eorumuvan Salutem* (Sion, 1744); — oration pro Funebris de Louis XI (Paris, 1756, 1758). Brihat-Katha (the great story), a collection of the popular legends of India.

Bril, Paul, an eminent Fleming painter, the brother of Mathew, was born at Antwerp in 1556, and studied under Daniel Wercelmann, an obscure artist. He was engaged, on the accession of the Emperor to the throne, in securing some considerable works in Santa Maria Maggiore, in the Sistine chapel, and in the Scala Santa, at St. John of Lateran. He died in Rome in 1626. See Spooner, Bibl. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Brill, Jacob, a Dutch mystic, was born Jan. 21, 1639, and died at Leyden, Jan. 28, 1700. He was despoiled of his office as preacher of Phillipburg in 1688 for attaching himself to the doctrines of Postvin van Hattem. He wrote about forty treatises, which were published in 1705 at Amsterdam, and in a German translation at Leipzig in 1706. His teaching is unorthodox, and represents an unchristian mystical pantheism. Thus, according to Brill, the first sacraent of Christ was not on the cross, but must take place in every Christian. Poiret, in the Bibliotheque Mystique et Sellecta, 1708, speaks very highly of Brill's writings. His writings are given in Unachulde Nachrichten, 1712, p. 876-882. See Göbel, in Hertzog's Real-Encyclop. s. v.; Lichtenberger, Encyclopavie des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Brilliart, Jacob, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in York County, Pa., Sept. 16, 1808. He was converted in 1834; removed to Richmond, Va., in 1839, where he was licensed to preach; and in 1848 entered the Kentucky Conference. On the organization of the Western Virginia Conference in 1850 he became a member of it; and in 1865 was transferred to the Holston Conference. In 1870 a stroke of paralysis removed him to the hospital, where he remained a supern- nate, which relation he sustained to the close of his life, April 10, 1874. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1874, p. 16.

Brim, William W., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Henrietta, N. Y., May 18, 1817. He went to reside with friends on a farm, near Cazenovia, N. Y., in 1831, and in 1834 was appointed a depot at eighteen; experienced religion at nineteen; studied at Wyoming Seminary one year, a short time at Cazenovia, and graduated at Dickinson College in 1857. Soon afterwards he became principal of Rainsburgh Seminary, and in 1839 entered the East Baltimore Conference. In 1863 he became superintendent, and travelled for his health. In 1868 he became principal of Jonesville Seminary, and in 1864 retired to Lockport, N. Y., where he resided until his death, Oct. 7, 1874. Mr. Brim was a genial Christian gentleman, and led a gentle, devoted life. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1875, p. 22.

Brimner, in Norse mythology, is the hall in Gimle or Okolni, where the best drink is to be found for departed souls.

Brinkmann, Philipp Jérôme, a German painter and engraver, was born at Siena in 1705, and studied under J. G. Dathan. The following is a list of some of his works: — The Head of Golgotha; — The Resurrection of Lazarus; — Christ and the Samaritan Woman; — Mary Magdalene at the Feet of Our Saviour. See Spooner, Bibl. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Rose, Bibl. Dict., s. v.

Brindley, Richard, an English Congregationalist minister, was born at Worcester in 1825. He was converted and received into Christian fellowship at the age of fourteen, obtained his education at Highley Grammar School, and was pastor first at King's Lynn. Severe weather at this place caused his removal to Argyile Chapel, Bath, where he labored successfully during ten years, and then accepted an invitation to the pastorate of the Church at Highgate Square, Chelsea. Here he died, Oct. 19, 1865. Mr. Brindley, during his life, published several Sermons and Tracts, which had considerable circulation. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1866, p. 237.

Brine, John, an English Baptist minister, was born at Kettering in 1703. Although placed when quite young in a factory, he devoted his spare hours to reading and study. He became a Christian, and joined the Baptist Church at Kettering, which subsequently gave him a license to preach, and he was, after he was called to the pastoral charge of the Church at Coventry. After a few years he was called to London, to become the pastor of the Baptist Church worshiping in Currier's Hall, Cripplegate. As a minister in the metropolis he took a prominent stand in all matters pertaining to the prosperity of his denomination during his thirty-five years' residence in London. After a life of great usefulness he died, Feb. 24, 1765. The publications of Mr. Brine were very numerous, consisting largely of Sermons, with a few treatises, the design of which was to vindicate his peculiar tenets. He belongs to the school of divines represented by Gill, and may be termed a High Calvinist. See Wilson, Hist. of Dissenting Churches, ii, 574-580. (J. C. S.)

Brinkerhoff, Abraham D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Fishkill, N. Y., June 5, 1735. He was educated at Columbia College and the Auburn Theological Seminary. He was licensed by the Champlain Presbytery of New York in 1802, and became pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Chazy in September, 1832, and subsequently at Plattsburgh, Keeseville, and Champlain (till 1850), and in 1862 again at Chazy until 1858. He afterwards resided without charge at Champlain, where he died, March 2, 1860. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1861, p. 157.

Brinkerhoff, George G., a minister of the Reformed Dutch Church, was born at Clifton, Bergen Co., N. J., in 1842. He studied at Princeton, New York, and Frelingh, and was licensed by the Synod of Dutch Reformed churches in 1788. In 1789 he was missionary "to the North," and to Conewago, Pa., from 1789 to 1793. While he was there, and about the time of his departure, his congregation was broken up by the abolition of the synod in 1842, and in 1847 he was pastor at Kakeau and Rarapee from 1783 to 1806, and at Senmom, near Oswego, Cayuga Co., N. Y., from 1808 to 1813. He was also missionary to "Genesee County" in 1796. He died in great peace and triumph in 1813. He was a godly man and a faithful minister, mild and gentle, and yet firm and resolute. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America (3d ed.), p. 195.
BRINKLEY, Samukl Crawford, a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born at Dover, Del., Jan. 26, 1796. He graduated at Princeton College, N.J., in 1815; was ordained deacon in 1818 and priest in 1820; officiated at St. David's Parish, Rashor, Pa., for seven years; in Grace Church, Philadelphia, two years; and was assistant minister to the United Swedish churches fourteen years. In May, 1848, he took charge of Christ Church, Christians Hundred, near Wilmington, Del., where he remained until his death, March 12, 1863. He was a delegate from Delaware to the General Convention of 1862. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. July, 1862, p. 387.

Brinkley, John, an English prelate and astronomer, was born in 1763. He graduated from Caius College, Cambridge, in 1788. In 1826 he was appointed bishop of Cloyne, in Ireland, having been previously for many years professor of astronomy in Trinity College, Dublin. His death occurred Sept. 14, 1835. Dr. Brinkley was eminent for his knowledge of mathematical science and astronomy. He published Elements of Plane Astronomy (1822, 8vo); the 8th edition was edited, with notes, by the Rev. Dr. Luby. See (London) Christian Remembrancer, Oct. 1835, p. 640; Rose, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Brinley, Jons, an English Nonconformist divine, nephew of bishop Hall, was born at Ashby-de-la-Zouch, Leicestershire, in 1600, and educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge. He preached first at Oreston, near Chelmsford, then at Smereleyton, in Suffolk, and lastly was called to Yarmouth, but, on account of his principles, was not permitted to preach except on week-days at a small village, until the people of Yarmouth applied to the king for his license. At the Restoration, however, he was ejected for nonconformity. He died Jan. 22, 1665. He published several theological and educational works. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Brinsmade, Daniel, a Congregational minister, graduated from Yale College in 1746, was ordained pastor of the Church at Washington, Conn., in 1749, and died in 1733. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 631.

Brinsmade, Horatio Nelson, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at New Hartford, Conn., Dec. 28, 1798. He prepared for college at Phillips Academy, Andover, and graduated at Yale College in 1822. Immediately thereafter he entered Princeton Seminary, where he remained one year, and afterwards studied theology under Dr. Hawes. He taught in the Deaf and Dumb Asylum at Hartford from 1823 to 1831. He was licensed by the North Congregational Association of Hartford, June 1, 1828. He supplied the North Congregational Church at Hartford, the Church at Collinsville also (1831); became pastor at Pittsfield, Mass. (1833-41); and from there he went to the Third Presbyterian Church of Newark, N.J. (until 1853); was pastor subsequently of a Congregational Church at Beloit, Wis., and closed seven years of highly successful labor, Jan. 1, 1861. During nearly the whole time of his pastorate there he gave gratuitous instruction in Beloit College. From there he returned to Newark in 1864, and commenced labors with a mission of the Third Presbyterian Church, and as a result the Wycliffe Presbyterian Church was formed in 1865, of which he was pastor from 1867 to 1872. He died in Newark, Jan. 18, 1879. See Necrology, Report of Princeton Theol. Sem., 1879, p. 19.

Brinmad, William, a Congregational minister, was a native of Dorchester, Mass. He entered Harvard College in 1646, but left in 1647, without taking his degree. He first preached at Plymouth, but was also pastor at Duxbury although he was not installed there until Oct. 3, 1666. After he was preaching on March 20, 1667, the assembly was surprised by the approach of Indians. All reached the fort safely except one man, who was wounded. The meeting-house and many dwellings were burned. Brinmad died July 3, 1701. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 256.

Brioucos, Siouet, as is not uncommon with the early Celtic saints who led a wandering life, is claimed by some as a disciple of Saint Aemilius and by others as a disciple of Saint Gangulus, whom they consider his bishop. In the famous work of the Christian Church, written in the 6th century by Saint Aemilius, May 1, Briocus was born of idolatrous parents in Corriicia, and educated from the age of ten years by Germanus, bishop of Paris. He settled in Brittany, where he died at the age of ninety. His monastery at St. Brieuc was made the centre of a bishopric about 444, although it seems to have been established after the death of Saint Aemilius. The monastery of Saint-Servan and Buckuch, near Angers, the monks flying before the Danes. His bell was still existing in 1210. The pariah of St. Brec, in Cornwall, is on the river Camel, and the parish fair is held May 1, the day of the saint's translation, but his feast day at St. Pol de Leon was April 28 (or 29). He is known in Scotland as Brexoch, Broxck, and Breach, and had dedications at Montrose, Rothesay, and Dunrod, in Kircubrightshire, but does not appear in Scotch calendars (see Forbes, Kal. Scot. Saints, p. 291; Orig. Per. Scot. ii, 228).

Brion, a French ascetic theologian, lived at the commencement of the 18th century. Some of his principal works are: Pourparlons sur divers Pheumes Mystérieux (Paris, 1718); — Vie de la Sœur Marie de Saint Thérèse, Carmelle de Bordeaux (ibid. 1720); — Considérations sur les plus Importantes Vérilités du Christianisme (ibid. 1724); — Traité de la Vraie et Fausse Spiritualité (ibid. 1728); — Vie de Madame Gugon (Cologne, 1770). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Brionne, Council of (Concilium Bruniesia), was held in 1050. (The place is the ancient Brinicon, in France, fifteen miles N.E. of Bernay.) This was rather a council than a conference, in it Béranger was silenced, and made to profess the Catholic faith. See Labbe, Concil. ix, 1054.

Briosco, Andrea (called di Riccio), an Italian architect, was born at Padua, and flourished about 1500. His chief work was the great Church of Santa Giustina. This work gained him a reputation. He was also a sculptor of some eminence, as there are some of his works in San Antonio, at Padua. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Brissac, Jacques Charles de, a French theologian, was born about 1646. He was for seventy years overseer of the seminary of foreign missions. He died in 1736. His chief works are: Orison Funèbre de la Duchesse d'Aiguillon (Paris, 1675); — Orison Funèbre de Madeleine de Bouillon (Rouen, 1685). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Briller, Jean de, a French theologian of the Jesuit order was born at Blois in 1603. He taught classics and philosophy in several colleges, and afterwards devoted himself to preaching. His zeal against Port Royal gained for him a great deal of credit in his society. He was successively rector of several colleges, provincial in Portugal, rector of the college of Clermont at Paris, and finally died at Blois. From his writings we notice, Le Jansenisme Confusou (Paris, 1651). This work was censured by the archbishop of Paris, M. de Gondi, and strongly combated by Arnould. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Brisbane, William H. (I.), D.D., a Baptist minister, was born near Charleston, S. C., in 1803. "His ancestors were of aristocratic English and Irish stock and he was the heir of large wealth." Bishop English of the elevin Church, and Rev. W. T. Braund was his early instructors, and he was a graduate of the mill.
Brisbane, William H. (2), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in New York city, Aug. 5, 1824. He was thrown upon his own resources at the age of ten; became a messenger boy in the employ of a lawyer, where he formed a fondness for books; found his way to Philadelphia while yet young, apprenticed himself to a bookseller, bought religious subscriptions, attached himself to a Sabbath-school, and in 1845 gave his heart to God. Three years later he received license to preach, and in 1848 entered the Philadelphia Conference, where-in he served faithfully until his death, April 29, 1862. Mr. Brisbane combined devoted piety, studious habits and industry, thus starting favorably in his ministry, and continuing to increase in ability and acceptability.

Briscoe, Thomas, an English Wesleyan preacher, commenced his ministry in 1731, and continued in the harness for about thirty years. Damp beds and poor accommodations in Ireland induced the disorder from which he died in the town of Chester, where he was married, and where his wife is buried. He was a well-read man, a good preacher, but with little physical energy. See Atmore, Meth. Menorul, s. v.

Brison was a eunuch of the empress Eudoxia, an orthodox Christian, and a faithful friend of Chrysostom. He took the lead in the persecutions set on foot to overpower the resources of the Arians, and in an assault made by them on the residence of the happy bishop, was thrown down, and killed by a stone. When, on Chrysostom's first deposition, Eudoxia's fears had been aroused by the earthquake, Brison was one of the messengers sent to discover the archbishop's place of retreat. He found him and brought him back. On his arrival at Cæsarea, Chrysostom wrote to Brison, giving an account of his journey and its miseries.

Bristed, John, a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born in Dorset, England, in 1779. He studied medicine and practiced it before he came to America. In 1806 he arrived in New York, began the study of law, and was admitted to practice in the courts of that county. He was appointed to succeed the late John Jacob Astor of New York city, in 1829, and continued in the legal profession until 1824, when he removed to Bristol, R. I., and began the study of divinity under bishop Griswold, and was admitted to orders. Subsequently he went to Vermont and completed his studies under bishop Smith. For some time he was in charge of a Church at Vincennes, and in 1829 returned to Bristol as an assistant to bishop Griswold. In the following year he was rector of St. Michael's Church in that town, which position he held until April, 1848, when he resigned it on account of failing health. He died at Bristol, Feb. 23, 1855. See Amer. Quart. Church Review, 1855, p. 155.

Bristol, Council of (Concilium Britolitenum), was held under the pope's legate, on St. Martin's day, in 1216, upon matters relating to discipline. Eleven bishops of England and Wales were present, with others of the inferior clergy, and of the nobility who continued faithful to Henry III. The barons who opposed that monarch were excommunicated. See Wilkins, Concil. i, 546.

Bristow, James H., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Clark County, Ky., July 26, 1818. He received a liberal education, and on reaching manhood made choice of the law as a profession; but being converted in 1832 he joined the Presbyterians, and soon after was licensed to preach in the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. He thus continued to labor, first in Kentucky, and afterwards in Ohio. Eventually he joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, and in 1844 was admitted to the Kentucky Conference. As the unfortunate division of the Church, Mr. Bristow, for peace's sake, though an avowed enemy to slavery, took work in the Church South, in which he filled many of its best appointments, and gained merited distinction in his able defence of some Methodist doctrines which are in direct opposition to popular belief in the region where he was born and reared. In 1852 he was sent as a missionary to California; two years later he returned and united with the Louisville Conference of the Church South. At the beginning of the war Mr. Bristow was intensely southern in feeling and education, as well as association; but he was equally patriotic, and declared, "I am determined to stand by the old flag," which assertion made the Confederates his deadly enemies, and obliged him to flee for refuge to the Louisville Legion, of which he was immediately chosen chaplain, and with it thus remained till near the end of the war. On closing his military career he found no affiliation in his heart for the sentiments of the Church South, and returned to the bosom of his mother church, procured an upper room in Louisville, Ky., and soon formed a religious society, to whom he preached, and with which he labored until it became a strong Church. His last charge was in the city of Paducah, presiding elder of that district. That was, indeed, pioneer work. He had no supporters, few friends, and many opposers; but he rose superior to every discouragement and obstacle, secured a room in which to hold meetings, organized a Sabbath-school, traveled thousands of miles soliciting money for the erection of a house of worship, was eminently successful, and at his death left there a fine brick edifice worth three thousand dollars, a Church of one hundred and four members and probationers, and a fine Sunday-school, equipped with a library of one hundred volumes. Mr. Bristow was struck with paralysis April 19, 1869, and on the first of the following March he died. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1870, p. 24.

Bristow, John, an English Congregational minister, was born at Great Marlow, Jan. 27, 1787. He joined the Church at Woolburn in his nineteenth year, and was sent, in 1809, to the Gospoort Academy, but at the close of the first year removed to the college at Hoxton. In September, 1814, he was ordained over the Church at Exeter. He was the first clergyman in the ministry here for ten years. He became pastor of the Church in Castle Street, Exeter, in 1824, but in 1847 he resigned his pastoral charge, as he found his health was failing greatly. He preached occasionally, as his health admitted, but his sufferings and life ended Aug. 30, 1852. As a minister and a Christian, he was much revered and honored. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1853, p. 267.

Bristow (or Bristophilus), Richard, an Englishman in Roman orders, was born at Worcester in 1553. He was educated at Exeter College, Oxford, lived first at Louvain, and then at the English College at Douay. At that time it was not safe for one of his sect to remain in England, and he fled to Douay, where he was consecrated to be made a priest, being the right hand of cardinal Allen, who, departing to Rheims, left Bristow prefect of Douay College. He was afterwards sent for to Rheims, where he wrote his book, Contra Futurum Falso. He returned to his native land for his health, and died in London in 1582. He also collected, and for the most part wrote, Annotationes on the English Translation of the New Testament at Rheims, with some minor works. See Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générales, s. v.; Rose, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Britain, COUNCIL OF (Concilium Britannicum), is a name (1) for Councils of the Welsh Church. See Augustine’s Oak; Caerleonense; Llandewi-Brefi; Llucus Victorlæ; Verculumium. (2) By the Breviary Council of. The councils called “Britanniæ” are either those above named (mostly mislaid and incorrectly described), or are pure fables; Cave has chosen to add to them the Northumbrian Synod of Onesiufofle of A.D. 702, which see under its proper title.

Brithwaldus (or Britwold), a monk of Glastonbury, and afterwards abbot of Evescure (?Regulbiene), was elected to the see of Canterbury, July 1, 692. He drove into banishment Wilfred of York; but at length, frightened by the papal menaces, restored him to his see. He held the metropolitan see thirty-eight years and six months, and died in 738. He composed the Life of St. Ethelwold, Bishop of Worcester:—De Origine Ecclesiamos Cenobii, etc. See Gildas de Præs, p. 43; Landon, Ecclesiastical Dict. s. v.

British Church. See England, Church of.

Brittius, Saisit, bishop of Tours, was licentious in early life, but was converted by St. Martin, and became his successor. He died Nov. 13, 444.

Brittius, Francis, a French missionary and Orientalist, a native of Rennes, lived in the latter half of the 17th century. He at first preached the Gospel in the East, but was finally recalled to Rome by his superiors, who employed him to translate into Arabic an abridgment of the Annals of Baronius, continued by Sponde down to the year 1646 (Rome, 1658, 1655, 1671). He also assisted in an Arabic version of the Bible, published by Nazari (Rome, 1671), with the text of the Vulgate opposite. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générales, s. v.

Brittain, Joseph, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Wednesbury, Staffordshire, in 1784. He joined the Methodist Church in early life, and the itinerancy in 1806. He died in the work, Nov. 28, 1811. "He was of a meek and quiet spirit." See Minutes of the British Conference, 1822.

Brittianins, a congregation of Augustinian monks, so called from their having been first established at Brittin, near Ancona, in Italy, in the former part of the 13th century. They were very austere, ate no animal food, and observed long fasts. They were recognized by Gregory IX, and joined the general congregation of Augustinian monks (q. v.) in 1256.

Britton, Maurice, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Wormwood, Nov. 3, 1802. He was converted when sixteen, received an appointment from the Conference in 1830, and died at Hereford, Feb. 22, 1869. He was a godly man, attentive to the poor and the afflicted, and a soul saver. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1869, p. 19.

Britton, Thomas, a Presbyterian minister, came to America from England in 1656, joined the Brooklyn Presbytery, and was stationed in the city of Brooklyn, N. Y. He died in the autumn of 1658. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1860, p. 120.

Brivio, Giuseppe, an Italian poet, was born at Milan in 1780, became canon of the cathedral of that place, and died at Rome in 1850. He composed a great many Latin poems, only fragments of which have been published, among which is a letter to Niccolo Nicolli. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générales, s. v.

Brixen (or Bressa), COUNCIL OF (Concilium Brixienae), was held in 1080, by the emperor, Henry IV. (The Italian name is Bresciana; it lies in the Tyrol, south of the Alps, and is the seat of a bishopric.) Cardinal Heinsius thought White and thirty bishops were present. They maintained the rights of the emperor against pope Gregory VII, who had excommunicated him; they proceeded so far as to depose Gregory, and to elect Guibert of Ravena in his place, who took the name of Clement III. See Labbe, Concil. x, 389.

Brizzio (or Brizzi), Filippo, an Italian painter, the son of Francesco, was born at Bologna in 1668. He studied under, and executed a picture in the Church of San Giuliano, at Bologna, representing St. Julian Crowned by Angels; also an altar-piece in San Silvestro, representing the Virgin, with Saints. He died in 1757. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générales, s. v.

Brizio (or Briccio), Francesco, a distinguished Italian poet and song-writer, was born at Bologna in 1574. He studied art in the academy of Caracci, and died in 1629. The following are some of his principal works:—The Return out of Egypt; The Holy Family; St. Francis kneeling holding the Infant Jesus, and the Virgin Mary in the Clouds; The Great St. Jerome; Christ and the Samaritan Woman. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générales, s. v.

Brizo, in Greek mythology, was a local deity of the island of Delos, the protectress of sailors. Only fruits and animals of the earth were offered to her as sacrifices. Her oracles were uttered in dreams.

Broach (or Broche), an old English term for a spit, and applied to a spire; still in use in some parts of the country, as in Northamptonshire, Leicester, Oxfordshire, etc., where it is used as a spire springing from the tower without any intermediate parapet. See Spire. The term is to broche seems to be also used in old accounts, perhaps for cutting the stones in the form of vases.

Broad, John, an English Baptist minister, was born in London, Jan. 22, 1809. He was convinced of sin in 1835, at the Wesleyan chapel in Hinde Street, Soho, London, and soon afterwards found peace in Christ. He immediately gave himself to evangelical work among the neglected classes of the great metropolis. After a time he became pastor of a Church in Kensington, giving up a business which was yielding him a large profit. Here he remained seven years, and then became pastor of a Church in Hitchin, Herts, for sixteen years. In 1858 he visited Melbourne, Australia, for his health. On his return he preached at Hastings, Oct. 3, 1858, and on the Saturday morning following he was found dead in his bed. See (Loml.) Baptist Handbook, 1869, p. 45. (J. C. S.)

Broad (or Broadeus), Thomas, an English clergyman, was born in Gloucestershire in 1577, and educated at St. Mary’s Hall and Albam Hall, Oxford. In 1611, on the death of his father, he became rector of Rendome, Gloucestershire, where he continued until his death in June, 1655. He wrote Touchstone for a Christian (1613)—The Christian’s Workhouse (eds.)—Three Questions on the Lord’s Day (1621)—and Tractativa de Sobbuto, etc. (1627). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.
Broadbent, John, an English Wesleyan preacher, was born near Leeds, Yorkshire, in 1751. He was converted young, and entered the ministry in 1772. He was lively and fervent in preaching, and having naturally a vivid imagination, he frequently put himself as to be ready to drop down when the sermon was concluded. A short time before his death he settled in Frome, Somersetshire. He died Nov. 10, 1794, aged forty-three years. "Those who knew him best, knew but in part the goodness and greatness of his heart." He preached for the Wesleyan in his home congregation, and signed the circular announcing his death. See Admore, Meth. Memorial, s. v.; Smith, Hist. ofWelsh. Meth. Methodism, i, 580; ii, 200.

Broadbent, Joseph, son of Rev. Samuel Broadbent, was sent by the British Wesleyan Conference to Calcutta in 1867, and at the end of that year was removed to Logknow, where his kindness of spirit and uniform attention to duties won the confidence and love of all. He died Aug. 20, 1872, in the thirty-third year of his age. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1873, p. 46.

Broadbent, Samuel, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Braistow, near Sowerby Bridge, Yorkshire, Oct. 27, 1794. He was converted in early life, was received into the ministry in 1815, and was sent at once to China, where he labored at Salle, Trincomalee, and Pondi Pedro until 1820, when he was appointed to commence missionary operations in Madagascar. At the instance of the Missionary Committee, however, this enterprise was abandoned, and he and F. L. Holgate were sent to commence operations among the Bechuanas of South Africa. After six years' toil his health failed and he returned to England, where he received regular Conference appointments until 1863, when he retired from the toils of the itinerancy and settled at Lytham. He died June 8, 1867. Mr. Broadbent labored with undeviating regularity and faithfulness. He saw several of his sons enter the same sacred work. He wrote, The Missionary Martyrs of Nungquandu: Memorials of Rev. William Threlfell (2d ed. London, 1860, 18mo)—Sermon on the Sabbath Day:—An Anti-Scriptural Marriage the Ruin of Souls and the Curse of the Church:—A Narrative of a Mission to the Barulongs (Lond. 1865, 12mo)—The Pioua and Princely Shoemaker: An Account of Mr. Joseph Walker (1855, 18mo). See Minutes of the British Conference, 1867, p. 27; Wed. Meth. Magazine, Oct. 1870, art. i; Osborn, Meth. Bibliog., s. v.

Broadus, William F., D.D., a distinguished Southern Baptist minister, was born in Culpepper County, Va., April 30, 1801. He was ordained in April, 1824, and became pastor of the Church in Middleburg, Lou- don Co. Besides serving, during a period of sixteen years, several churches from which he received little or no compensation, he had under his charge a large and prosperous school for young ladies. He removed to Lexington, Ky., in 1840, where he repeated his experience of preaching and teaching, remaining about ten years. For two or three years from 1851 he acted as a financial agent to raise an endowment for Colum- bian College; and in 1855 became pastor of the Church in Fredericksburg, Va., where he also conducted a young ladies' school. In 1869 he was the financial agent, successfully prosecuting his work, of the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary. A second time he entered upon his ministerial work in Fredericksburg, and remained at his post until the United States troops took posses- sion of the city in 1863. For a time he was in prison at Washington, and on his release removed to Char- lotteville, in which place he remained until 1868, when he returned to Fredericksburg. He was engaged for several years in the benevolent work of securing an education for the children of deceased and disabled Confederate soldiers. So long as his strength permitted he continued to preach. He died in Fredericks-

Brobat, Samuel K., a Lutheran minister, was born Nov. 16, 1822. He went to Washington, Pa., in 1837, to learn a trade, which he soon after abandoned to devote himself to study. In the fall of 1841 he attended the Allentown Seminary and taught school the following winter. Subsequently he was a student in Marshall College, Lancaster, and in Washington College, in western Penn- sylvania. In Washington he preached in German, and taught that language, and was also an agent of the Ameri- can Sunday-school Union to labor among the Germans. He was also connected with the Lutheran church as a pastor, and in 1850 was elected president of the Union College, which he declined. On June 4, 1847, he was li- censed in Philadelphia as a minister; but it was only during the last nine years of his life that he served as a pastor. For thirty years he was engaged principally as editor of German periodicals. His first venture was a Sunday-school paper, the Jugendfreund, which attained a wide circulation. In 1859 he founded the Lutherrische Zeitchrift, which became a weekly quarto. In 1868 he began the publication of a monthly theological journal, called Theologische Monatshefte, which after six years was suspended for want of adequate support. Mr. Brobat was likewise the editor of the Lutheran Calendar. A Pennsylvania German by birth, he took a prominent part in the organization of the German Press Associa- tion of Pennsylvania, of which he was president from the beginning until his death, a period of fifteen years. He was also active in the founding and success of Muhlenberg College. Especially was he distinguished as a Sabbath-school worker and organizer. In addition to his publishing interests he established a printing-office and bookstore. In the discussion of the ecclesiastic- al matters that disturbed the Lutheran Church he took a prominent part, and became a zealous advocate of union. He died Dec. 29, 1876. See Fifty Years in the Lutheran Ministry, 1878, p. 326.

Brocard (Burchard, or rather Burckhardt), an early German traveller, was born in Westphalia or Strasburg, in the latter half of the 13th century. He entered the Dominican order, and was sent by his superiors in 1232 into the Levant, Armenia, and Egypt, passing ten years in the monasteries of Palestine and Mt. Sinai. On his return late in life (cir. 1283) he wrote an account of those parts, which contains notices of many of the places uterely in use in a weekly-day issue published under the title Prologa Terra Sanaete, by Luke Brandon in his Rudimentum Noricorum (Lubeck, 1475, p. 164-188), and often later, usually as Descriptio Terra Sanaete; especially in Ugolinus's Itinerarium, vol. vi, and at the end of Le Clerc's ed. of Eusebius's Onomasticon (see Tolebar, Biblioth. Greg. Parisii, p. 27). It was a favorite work in medieval times, and was variously transcribed. Canisius has given, in the fourth volume of his Lectiones Antiquae, an account of the Holy Land, founded upon that of Brocard. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bio- graphie, s. v.

Brocchi, Giuseppe Maria, an Italian theologian, was born at Florence in 1867. He was prior of St. Maria-aux-Olivier near the town of San Lorenzo, also rector of the Ecclesiastical Seminary, prothonotary apostolic, and a member of the Societa Colomba. He died June 8, 1751. He is the author of the lives of the Florentine saints, entitled Ille de' Santi e Berti Fiorentini (pt. ii, Florence, 1761, 4to). He also wrote the Life of St. Francis, Prima ministro, arch-dean-general of the Vallombrosi (Ibid. ed. 4to). See Hoefer, Nouv. Bio- graphie, s. v.; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Brocard, Bonaventure, a French traveller, lived in the former half of the 16th century. He was a friar of the convent of Bernay, in Normandy, and accompanied Geoffrin Arlagart of Coutelles on a tour, BROCHARD, Michel, a French scholar, was priest and professor in the college of Mazarin. He died in 1729. We are indebted to him for the Bibliotheca Fugiana (published by Martin, Paris, 1725, with a catalogue of authors;—some editions of the Liber annus: of Jesus-Christ: —of Catullus, Tibullus, and Propertius (ibid. 1728):—of Horace (1729). He was able in correcting the text of the work of Poggio, De Varietate Fortunae (Paris, 1728). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

BROCKHAUS.

Brock, John, a Congregational minister, was born in Stradbroke, Suffolkshire, England, in 1629. At the age of seventeen he came with his parents to New England. In 1646 he graduated from Harvard College; for two years he was preaching pastor of the Congregational Meeting-house and the college, and began preaching in 1648. At first he ministered at Rowley, and afterwards at the Isle of Shoals. Subsequently he removed from the latter place, and in 1652 assumed the pastorate of the Church at Redding, where he died, June 18, 1688. He was especially distinguished for his faith and power in prayer, and was a very devoted lover of the Gospel. See Sprague, Annales of the Amer. Pulpit, i. 134.

Brock, John, R., a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, graduated at Rutgers College in 1859, and at New Brunswick Seminary in 1862. He was licensed by the Classis of Passaic in the same year, and served as pastor of the Church at West New Hempstead from 1862 to 1866, and Spring Valley from 1866 to 1868. He was thereafter without charge until the time of his death, which occurred in 1872. He was a man who tried to serve his people, the Church, and his God faithfully. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church (3d ed.), p. 136.

Brock, William (1), D.D., an eminent English Baptist minister, was born at Honiton, Devonshire, Feb. 14, 1807. After serving as an apprentice for seven years to a watchmaker, he went to Hertford, where he was converted, and subsequently united with a Church in London. Soon after he entered upon a course of study at Stepney College, and before completing the full term of four years he accepted a call to a Church at Norwich, beginning his ministry there May 10, 1833. Here he remained about fifteen years, at the end of which period, at the earnest solicitation of his friend, Sir Morton Peto, he removed to London, where he became the pastor of the Church worshiping in Bloomsbury, Holborn. For twenty years Dr. Brock ably and with great success discharged the duties of his sacred office, and was a trusted and honored leader in all the great enterprises of his denomination in England. Among the productions of his pen during this period was his Life of General Hareholck. He resigned his pastorate on account of his health in 1860, and died Nov. 13, 1870. See Cathecr, Baptist En cyclop. p. 140. (J. C. S.)

Brock, William (2) an English Methodist preacher, was born at Northlew, Devon, in 1839. He was converted at Gunnislake during a revival, at the age of sixteen, joined the Bible Christians, and became the useful and acceptable local preacher. He entered the itinerant ministry in 1865, and consecrated to the ministry of the eldership of power of the work of the ministry. He died Dec. 30, 1878. He was diligent, conscientious, faithful, an earnest preacher and devoted pastor.

Brocke, Heinrich Matthias von, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Sept. 4, 1646, at Dercben. He studied at Helmstedt and Jena, was in 1672 preacher at Hamburg, and in 1675 pastor of the Church of the Holy Ghost at Magdeburg, in 1680 pastor of St. John's at Hildesheim, and in 1688 superintendent there, receiving at the same time the degree of doctor of divinity from the Jena University. In 1699 he was appointed general superintendent at Altenburg, and died Jan. 6, 1708. He wrote, De Pace et Concordia Pravdomitali et De Merito Christi Unicurio : —De Propositione Fidei et Mente Pontificis: —Judicium de Piatismo. See Kettner, Ceres Johanneus Magde burgensis; Höcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. F.)

Brocken was the mountain of altars, the Olympus of the ancient Saxons.

Brockhaus, Friedrich Clemens, a Protestant theologian of Germany, a son of Hermann, was born at Dresden, Feb. 14, 1837. He studied at Jena and Leipzig, was in 1860 appointed catechist of St. Pe-Brockhaus, Hermann, a German Orientalist, was born at Amsterdam, Jan. 28, 1806. He studied at different universities, and after completing his studies spent many years at Copenhagen, Paris, London, and Oxford. In 1839 he was appointed professor at Jena, and in 1841 he was called to Leipzig, where he died, Jan. 5, 1877. He published in Sanscrit, with a German translation, the Kathā sūtra śūky, a collection of legends of Somadeva (Leipzig, 1839-62) — an edition of Prabodha Camden, a comedy of Krishna Misra, together with the Indian Sollia (ibid. 1845) — Nashebi's Persian edition of the Seven Wise Men (ibid. edn.) — a critical edition of the poems of Haiât (ibid. 1842-51, 3 vols.; 1863 n. ed. in 1 vol.) — an edition of the Venedid Sade, prepared after the lithographed editions published at Paris and Bombay, together with a word-book and a glossary of the Zend language (ibid. 1850). As one of the founders of the German Oriental Society, it was his quarterly from 1852 to 1860, and from 1856 he edited the famous Allgemeine Encyclopädie of Ersch u. Gruber. He advocated the system now generally adopted of transcribing the Sanscrit and the other Oriental languages, as Persian, Arabic, etc, with Roman letters, on which see his Üeber den Druck sanscrit-dermischen Werke mit lateinischen Zeichen (Leipzig, 1841) and Zeitschrift der deutschen Morgenländischen Gesellschaft (ibid. 1851-63, vol. xvii). (B. P.)

Brocklehurst, William (1), an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Hollingscough, near Leek, Staffordshire, June 6, 1784. He united with the Church at the age of fourteen, entered the ministry in 1803, retired from its active duties to London in 1843, and died July 4, 1866. He was a plain, earnest preacher, considerate and faithful pastor, and was ever active, and often successful, in labor for the Lord. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1866, p. 37.

Brocklehurst, William (2), an English divine, was born in 1779. He was educated at Brasenose College, Oxford, becoming B.A. in 1816, M.A. in 1819, and D.D. in 1833. He was an advocate of the Methodist Connexion, appointed vicar of Oswestry in 1821, and archdeacon of Stowe in 1844. He died at Oswestry Ferry, Dec. 18, 1862. Dr. Brocklehurst was the author of five or six religious works, the most popular of which is the Crusade of Fidelis, also several valuable archaeological works. See Appleton's Annual Cyclopaedia, 1862, p. 697.

Brockmack, Johann Heinrich, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born March 4, 1767, at Liesborn, near Münster, and died Sept. 21, 1817, as doctor of theology, cathedral-dean, and preacher at Münster. He wrote, Pastoralverwaltung zur Verpflichtung der Söhnliche in der Katholischen Kirche durch den Bischof seiner Zeitgenossen, (Münster, 1836-38) — Hofprediger und Predigten auf alle Sonn- und Festtage des Kirchenjahres (ibid. 1826-30). See Winer, Handbuch der theolog. Lit. ii, 49, 146. (B. P.)

Brookminder, Samuel R., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Huntington County, Pa., June 12, 1785. His father was raised a rigid Lutheran, experienced conversion, and joined the Methodists, with which he was expelled from home and disinherited. His mother was a devout Methodist, and dedicated him to the ministry at his birth. Samuel had the tenderest care, and was surrounded by the most holy influences from infancy. He gave his heart to God in 1812, very reluctantly received license to preach, and in 1819 entered the Ohio Conference. The latter years of his life, from 1855, he spent as a superannuate. His life-record was finished for him by Brotons Gregor von Heinsburg (Leipzig, 1863) — Aurelius Prudentius Clemens in seiner Bedeutung für die Kirche seiner Zeit, with an appendix: die Übersetzung des Gedichtes Apotheosis (ibid. 1872) — Letzte Predigt (published after his death, in 1876) — also Aufgabenhilfe Predigten (1886). (B. P.)

Brockway, Jesse, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Rossville, Brown Co., O., Feb. 28, 1822. He was converted at the age of sixteen years, and licensed to preach. He joined the Indiana Conference in 1850, was ordained deacon in 1851, and elder in 1854. In this Conference he served the following appointments: Sugar Creek, Mount Auburn, Southport, Moorefield, Patriot, Lawrenceburg, Milford, West Point, Paris, Seymour, and Edinburgh. In 1855 he was transferred to Kansas Conference on account of his health. His appointments were: North Lawrence, state agent for the American Bible Society, Burlington, Carbondale, and Scranton circuits. His health failing, he became a superannuate in 1869, and was granted a superannuated relation in 1891. He died near Burlington, March 17, 1881. Though not brilliant, he was an excellent preacher, faithful to his Church, cheerfully discharging his duties as an itinerant. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1881, p. 70.

Brod, Abraham, for some time rabbi at Constantinople, who died at Jerusalem in 1710, is the author of דִּבְּרֵי אָבִּיהַ מֵאָבְּרָם , "the blessing of Abraham," or a Comment on Genesis (Venice, 1696) — דִּבְּרֵי אָבִּיהַ מֵאָבְּרָם , on the Priestly Code (ibid., 1690), i.e. six editions, printed in מִסְיָפָה יִשְׂרָאֵל of Moses Benveniste (q. v.). Brod, Abraham ben-Saul, a Jewish rabbi of Bohemian-Brod, was for some time rabbi at Nicolzburg and Prague. In 1629 he went to Metz, and afterwards to Frankfort, where he died, April 11, 1717. He wrote Novellas on several sulfurous treatises; and also דְּבֵרי מִשָּׁרְפָּא, or Esquisses de la France, printed in the הַדֵּדֶנֶרֶט of Israel ben-Iaac (Offenbach, 1722). See Jücher, Allgemeines Gebräten-Lexikon, a. v.; Schudt, Jüdische Denkbiicher, iv, 3, 81 sq.; Furst, Bibl. Jud. 1, 132 sq. (B. P.)

Brodbridge, George, an English martyr, was one of five who were burned at Canterbury in 1555 for testifying for Jesus and the Gospel. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, xvii, 254 sq.

Brodt, John Henry, a Presbyterian and Congregational minister, was born at Troy, N. Y., June 2, 1827. After pursuing a course at Troy Academy and at the Polytechnic Institute, he entered the Union Theological Seminary, from which he graduated in 1855. He was ordained at Troy as an evangelist in 1854, and in that year became acting-pastor of the Church at Columbus, Cal. A bronchial affection interfering with his work, he was for one year secretary of the Water Company at San Francisco, and afterwards edited The Pacific. From 1868 to 1872 he was acting-pastor of the Church at Petaluma; from 1868 to 1873 he was charge of the Presbyterians at Miracle. From 1873 to 1874 he preached in the Howard-street Church, San Francisco, of the same denomination; from 1865 to 1867 pastor at Salem, N. Y.; in Dec., 1867, he was chosen to serve the Park Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, remaining until the dissolution of the Church in Feb., 1869. In the same city he was installed pastor of the New England Congregational Church, of which he was dismissed in Dec., 1872. He resided, without charge, at Dansville after this date, and died there, Sept. 8, 1875. See Cong. Quarterly, 1876.

BROECK, BARBARA VAN DEN, a Flemish engraver, the daughter of Crispin, was born at Antwerp in 1569.
She was quick, and handled her plates with great ability. The following are her principal religious works:
The Holy Family, with Angels; Simeon and Delilah;
The Last Supper. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

BROECK, CRISPIN VAN DEN, a Flemish painter and engraver, was born at Antwerp in 1624, and studied under Francis Floris. He died in Holland, probably in 1675. The following are some of his best works: The Crucifixion; The Annunciation; The Adoration of the Shepherds; The Adoration of the Magi. See Spooner, Générale, s. v.

Brogaidh, of Imleach-Brocadha, an Irish saint, commemorated July 9, is said to have been the son of Gollit-Ceileach, or Gallus, a Briton or Welshman, and of Tigrida, sister of St. Patrick. He and his brothers came with St. Patrick into Ireland, and labored with him to bring great stores of wheat into the kingdom. He was the patron of a church or abbot of Imleach, in the barony of Castello, county Mayo, which from him got the name of Imleach-Brocadha.

Brogan (or Brocan) is the name of two Irish saints.

1. BROGAN, CLUNY, was the disciple of St. Ultan of Ardbraccan, uncle of St. Brigida; he is said to have put into rhetorical form in Irish the accounts of St.
Brigida’s virtues and miracles which St. Ultan had gathered and placed in his hand. This Irish hymn Colgan has translated into Latin, and given in his Trias Thommatica as the “First Life of St. Brigida.” According to Colgan it originated from its own author, Bishop, it was composed about A.D. 555. But Lanigan (Eccl. Hist. I., 379) follows Ware in reckoning him among the writers of the 7th century. Colgan seems to identify him with Brecan of Rosluire, on account of residence and day of dedication.

2. BROGAN, MATEHAI-BROGAN, commemorated
July 8, is said to have been one of the sons of Gollit the Welshman, and of Tigrida, sister of St. Patrick, who accompanied their uncle into Ireland. He was bishop of Breghmagh or Maghbragh, in Meath, among the Ui Tortain tribe, near Ardbraccan, though Evinus also calls him Eighbrath. He founded the abbey of Mothel, county Waterford. In the calendars he is called “Brogan the scribe,” and in the Four Masters, A.D. 448, we have in St. Patrick’s household “Brogan the scribe of his school.” In the Introduction of the Martyrology, edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, there is mentioned, among “the more famous books,” “The Books of Brogan Scribain” (p. xxxvii), and in the Book of Lecan “Priest Brogan” is one of St. Patrick’s “two writers.”

Brodgen, William, a missionary of the Church of England, was the son of a gentleman of the same name who lived in Calvert County, Md., on the Patuxent River, a merchant and large shipper of tobacco. The date of his birth is unknown, but he was ordained Aug. 6, 1732, as deacon, by the bishop of London. Soon after, he returned to America, and became incumbent of All-Hallows’ Parish, in Anson County, Md. In 1742 he purchased a farm of twelve hundred acres, near Annapolis, which he occupied while rector of the parish.
In 1747 he became rector of Queen Anne’s Parish, Prince-George’s Co., where he remained until his death, in 1770. His talents were of a high order. Several times he was a member of the Diocesan Convention. See

Broglie, MauRice Jean Marielaink DE, a French prelate, was born at the castle of Broglie, Sept. 5, 1766.

He emigrated to Poland during the French Revolution, and on his return to France, in 1803, he was made archbishop of the emperor, and in 1805 bishop of Aquit, in Piedmont. He was banished for his opposition to the national council in 1811, but on the fall of Napoleon returned to France. He was once more banished in 1814 for his political contumacy, and died in Paris, July 20,

Brogni, Giovanni Allarmet DE, a Roman prelate, was born at Brogni, Savoy, in 1842. From the station of a swineherd in youth he rose to the dignities of bishop of Viviers and of Ostia, archbishop of Aries, bishop of Geneva, and finally archbishop of Milan and chancellor of the Holy Roman Church. He devoted himself assiduously to the work of conciliation during the great schism which so long divided that Church.
As senior cardinal he presided at the Council of Constance after the deposition of pope John XXIII at the sixth session, until the election of cardinal Colonna as pope Martin V at the forty-first.
It was during this time that the trial of John Huss took place. Brogni showed him great kindness during the trial, but, as president of the council, had to pronounce sentence of death upon him. He died at Rome, Feb. 16, 1426. He founded the hospital of Amscgy, and the college of St. Nicholas at Avignon. See Hoefer, Brok, in Scandinavians mythology, was a dwarf,

the brother of Sindri, both well skilled in working metals.
The sons of Iwahles, dwarfs likewise, had finished three great costly articles: golden hair, which, as soon as it ached the head of an Asa, would grow fast; the never-failing spear Gunmar, and the ship Skibbladner. Loke made a bet with Brok that the latter’s brother could not make articles equal or as costly. The prize was Loke’s head. Sindri began his work; he placed a boat’s hide in the fire, and bade Brok blow until he returned: during Sindri’s absence Loke came in the form of a hornet and stung, but Brok endured it until Sindri drew a golden boar from the fire, whose bristles shone in the dark, and which could travel faster over land and sea than the swiftest horse. Thereupon Sindri placed a piece of gold in the fire. Brok was told to blow again, and the hornet stung him still more, until Sindri brought out a golden ring, from which every ninth night eight equally costly rings sprung. Thereupon Brok began to blow again, but now Loke stung him on the eyelids, so that the blood streamed down his cheeks and he could not see any more. Then Sindri came and drew out a hammer, which never failed in hitting an object, and crushed whatever stood in its way, and always returned back to the hands of its owner. Now they proceeded with their treasures, and Freir, Odin’s horse, was a gift of the dog, the judges. To the first was given the golden boar, to the second the ring, while Thor was given the hammer.
The latter was considered as the most costly of all, and the deities hoped for great good from the hammer at the battle of the world’s-end.
Brok now sought to cut off the head of Loke, but in an instant he was away, for he had on shoes which could travel in the air and on the water as well as on land.

Brokaw, Abram, a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, graduated at Queens (now Rutgers) College in 1738. He studied theology under Dr. J. H.
Livingston, of New York, and was pastor at Oswego, N. Y., 1736-1808; Ovid, Senea Co., 1808-22, when he was suspended. About this time it seems this Church seceded, and he went with it. He maintained this potion till his death, in 1846. See Corwin, Manual of Bromfield, Edward, an English Congregational minister, was born in London, Dec. 1, 1864. He joined the Church in his twenty-first year. He was a printer until 1887, when he resolved to enter the ministry, and in the following year entered Hackney College for beter preparation. On leaving college he labored for some time at Needham Market, then was ordained as missionary in connection with the Surrey Mission, and settled as their agent at Elstead. Here he labored abundantly, and was greatly loved by his people. He died Aug. 12, 1859. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1860, p. 176.

Bromley, Henry, an English Congregational minister, was born at Islington Green, near London, Dec. 3, 1738. He joined the Church at Cambridge, received his theological training at Hoxton Academy, and first settled in the ministry at Appledore, Devonshire, in 1820. He afterwards preached nineteen years at Clavering, Essex, and a few years at Brighton, then retired to London, where he died, Feb. 6, 1878. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1879, p. 303.

Bromley, Humphrey, a Universalist minister, was born in North Wales about 1796. He received his religious education in the Church of England, but joined the Wesleyans and began preaching in that connection at the age of sixteen. On entering into a discussion several years later on endless punishment, with a Unitarian minister, he was expelled from the Wesleyan Church. He emigrated to America in 1833; settled first at Cleveland, O., joined the Universalists; soon after removed to Norwalk, thence to Sandsbury, and in 1837 to Republic, where he spent the remainder of his days, dying Dec. 13, 1876. See Universalist Register, 1878, p. 86.

Bromley, John, an English clergyman of the 17th century, was a native of Shropshire. Early in the reign of Charles I. he was curate of Whitchurch-in-the-Fields, London, but afterwards turned Roman Catholic, and was employed as a proof-reader in the king's printing-house. When obliged by the Revolution to quit this employment, he turned school-master, and afterwards travelled abroad as tutor to some young gentlemen. He died Jan. 10, 1717. His only published work is a translation of the Catechism of the Church of Trent (Lond. 1687). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Bromley, Robert Anthony, B.D., an English divine, was born about 1738. He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. In 1775 he was presented to St. Mildred's, in the Poultry, with St. Nicholas Cole Abbey united. He was also a tutor of St. John's, Cambridge. He married a daughter of Walter Hackney, and chaplain to Mr. Sherriff Miles. He died Oct. 10, 1806. Mr. Bromley published a number of sermons preached on special occasions (1770–90); and A Philosophical and Critical History of the Fine Arts, Painting, Sculpture, and Architecture (Lond. 1786–95, 2 vols. 7to.). See (Cam.) Annual Register, 1807, p. 865; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Brompton, John, was an English Cistercian monk, and abbot of Jorvaux (or Joreval), in Richmondshire. He appears to have flourished about 1198, if, indeed, he was the author of the Chronicon which is extant under his name, extending from 588 to 1196. Selden thinks it probable that he was not. The Chronicon is praised by Sir Roger Twysden, in the Historia Anglorum Scriptores Decem (London, 1659, p. 725 fol.).

Bromwell, Jacob L., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Talbot County, Md., Aug. 1, 1792. He was converted in early life; licensed to exhort in 1815; to preach in 1816; and admitted into the Baltimore Conference in 1817. In 1826 he became superannuated, but became effective in 1829, and in the following year again superannuated, which relation he held to the close of his life. In 1881 he removed to the wild, uncultivated territory of Morgan County, Ind., where he preached as he was able in log-houses, school-houses, and at funerals all over the country. He died March 9, 1871. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1872, p. 18.

Bronc was bishop of Caisel-ira, in Ul-Fiachrach-Musidhe. Dr. Kelly (Cal. Ir. SS. 4) identifies his see as Kilalaughbrone, near Sligo, in Ireland. In Colgan he is "Episc. Bronus filius ignis, qui est in Caisell-ira, servus Dei, eocius St. Patricii," but he can give no account of his receiving from Evinus the designation filius ignis, except that his father's name may have been Aidh (fire). The Four Masters give his death occurring 84 years after the death of his bishop, to this O'Donovan adds a note on Cull-ira, and traces, from the Annalisation of Tírechán and the Book of Aranagh, the wanderings of St. Patrick, till "crossing the Muaidh (Moy) at Bertriga (Bartragh), he raised a cross there, and proceeded thence to the mountain of Riabhart, near which he built a church for his bishop, bishop Bronus, the son of Ienae." This is called the church of Caisel-ira in the Trip. Life of St. Patrick.

Bronach (or Bromada), virgin, is commemorated as an Irish saint, April 2. She was abbess of Glenisichis, otherwise called Glenegyes, Clonfey, and now Killbroney, since the 14th century. She was called St. Bromae, and her localv and churchier seems to have been a relic which was preserved with great veneration and emolument in the parish church of Killbroney, which derived its name from her.

Brown, Rev., a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, was born at Coxackie, Greene Co., N. Y., in 1789. He was the son of a Revolutionary patriot and statesman, who gave him a thorough education. He graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1810; at the New Brunswick Seminary in 1813, and was licensed by the Classis of New Brunswick in the same year. He was pastor at Washington (now West Troy), Albany Co., N. Y., and Bught, Saratoga Co., from 1818 to 1822; Washington, alone, from 1823 to 1834. He died in 1837. He had not the finished graces of oratory, but he had the elements of a powerful preacher. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America (3 ed.).

Brombhorst, John van, a Dutch painter, was born at Utrecht in 1608, and studied under John Verburg. In the new church at Amsterdam, besides handsomely painting the windows, he executed three excellent pictures: The Triumph of David over Goliath; The Antiquing of Saul; and Saul's Attempt to kill David. He died in 1690. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Brombhorst, Peter van, a Dutch painter, was born at Delft, May 16, 1598, and died June 22, 1661. In the council-chamber at Delft are two fine paintings by him, representing the Judgment of Solomon, and Christ Driving the Money-changers from the Temple. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Brongcombe, Walter, an English prelate of the 13th century, son of a poor man of Exeter, raised himself by his own industry to the bishopric of Exeter, where he built and endowed a hospital for poor people, and also founded a college at Perin, Cornwall. He instituted an annual festival to the angel Gabriel, for meeting the poor of which he left a custom which never appears to have been observed outside of his own diocese. He died in 1280. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), i, 444.

Bronson, Abraham, a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born in Waterbury, Conn., April 11, 1778. He was educated at Cheshire Academy, Conn., and ordained deacon bishop on Jarvis, on Christ's church, in 1799. For two years he was assistant to Rev. Mr. Dehon, at Newport, R. I., when he was ordained presbyter, and removed to Manchester, Vt., where he remained thirty years. He went to Ohio in 1833; and, two years after, settled in Peninsula, continuing there until 1846, when he removed the parish of Wakeman, and others in its vicinity. He died at Franklin Mills, O., June 12, 1853. He was highly esteemed as an authority in regard to the history of his own Church. See Amer. Quart. Church Rev. 1853, p. 463.

Broxon, Oliver, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Utica, N. Y., Jan. 9, 1826. He graduated at Union College, Schenectady, in 1843, and from the Theological Seminary at Auburn, in 1846. In 1854 he accepted a call from the Reformed Protestant (Dutch) Church at Kinderhook. In 1858 he was installed as pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Janesville. He died Jan. 10, 1860. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1861, p. 81.

Broxon, Samuel Jennings, a Baptist minister, was born in Danbury, Conn., in 1819. He united with the church in 1837, took the full course of study in both departments in Madison University, graduating in 1846, and was ordained pastor of the Church in Millbury, Mass., Dec. 16 of the same year. Here he remained until 1854, when he went to Hyannis, and was pastor there till 1867, when he went to Winchester, from which place he returned to Millbury in 1870, and continued there till obliged to resign on account of ill-health. In 1874 he resumed ministerial and pastoral work in West Woodstock, Conn., where he died, Jan. 10, 1879. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclopedia, p. 142. (J. C. S.)

Broxon, Tillotson, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at Plymouth, Conn., in 1762. Under the Rev. John Trumbull, the Congregational minister, he began his preparatory studies for college, teaching a school, meantime, at Waterbury. In 1786 he graduated at Yale College, and was ordained deacon Sept. 21, 1787. The following October he was called to officiate in the churches of Stratford, Vt., and Hanover, N. H. He returned to Connecticut in 1788, and on February 23 was ordained priest in New London. In October he resigned his charge, and in 1792 went to Boston, supplying the place of Rev. William Montague, rector of Christ Church, during the latter’s travels abroad. In 1798 he became rector of the churches at Hebron, Chatham, and Middle Haddam, in Connecticut. Two years thereafter he was called to the rectorship of St. John’s Church, Waterbury, where he remained about ten years. Having been appointed to conduct the Churchman’s Magazine, published at New Haven, he resigned his pastorate in 1805, and removed thither. The publishing office of the magazine was removed to New York after two or three years, and his connection therewith accordingly ceased. The Diocesan Convention of Connecticut elected him principal of the academy at Cheshire in the latter part of 1805. The Churchman’s Magazine having been revived he had again undertaken to edit it, while at the same time performing his duties as rector of the academy; but his health was now seriously impaired, and he declined a re-election as a member of the Standing Committee, a position which he had held for the twenty preceding years. He died at Cheshire, Sept. 6, 1826. Very often he had been a delegate to the General Convention; and he was a trustee of the General Theological Seminary and of Washington College. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v. 338.

Brontés, in Greek mythology, was a Cyclop, the son of Uranus and Earth. His brothers are called Arges and Steropes.

Brook, Benjamin, an English Congregational minister, was a native of Nether Thong, near Huddersfield, Yorkshire, became a member of the Independent Church at Holmfled, and entered Rotherham College in 1737. After the completion of his studies he became the first pastor of the Church at Tubury, Staffordshire, in 1801, where he labored until 1830, when his health failed, and he resigned his charge. He afterward removed to Birmingham, where he continued his studies into the history of Dispensations, which occurred Jan. 5, 1848, in the seventy-third year of his age. He published, The History of the Lives of the Puritans (1818)—The History of Religious Liberty (1820)—and Memoirs of that Eminent Puritan, Thomas Cartwright (1845)—besides leaving the materials for A History of Puritans who Emigrated to New England, and a new edition of his Lives of the Puritans. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1848, p. 214; (Lond.) Evangelical Mag. 1851, p. 693.

Brook, Thomas, a Bible Christian minister, was born in Cornwall, England, in 1800. He grew up to be a very wicked boy. Reading carefully mastiff’s Call to the Unconverted, he was convinced of sin, sought and found salvation. For sixteen years he was a very acceptable local preacher. He made it a point of conscience never to neglect an appointment. In 1835 his name appears in the Minutes as appointed to the Kilham Circuit. During the twenty years during his itinerant ministry he filled fifteen appointments. At the Conference held at Exeter, in 1860, he became superannuated, and settled at Crediton, in the Exeter Circuit. He took an active part in the cause of temperance, and was rendered very useful. He died Aug. 8, 1875. See Minutes of the Conference, 1876.

Brook, William, a minister of the Bible Christians, was born at Northlewith, Devonshire, England, in 1839. At the age of sixteen, during a gracious revival, he was converted. He became a lay preacher in 1855, and entered the travelling ministry in 1855. In 1876 he was necessitated, on account of feeble health, to take a supernumerary relation. He died Dec. 30, 1876. His sermons are remarkable for the pureness of doctrine, lucid in statement, impressive in delivery, and were procured in demonstration of the spirit and of power. See Minutes of the Annual Conference, 1876.

Brooke, George Gibson, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Fauquier County, Va., about 1808. He was favored with the watchful care of a pious mother, who brought him to Christ. When about twenty years of age he was licensed to preach, and received into the Baltimore Conference, wherein he labored faithfully until his death, Dec. 8, 1878. Mr. Brooke served as chaplain in the Confederate army during the rebellion. His ministry was crowned with success. See Minutes of Annual Conference of the M. E. Church South, 1875, p. 9.

Brooke, James, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Bilston, May 24, 1790, and died at Cheetham Hill, July 25, 1881. His ministry extended over nearly sixty-nine years, the last thirty of which were spent in comparative retirement. The simplicity of his spirit and the purity of his life declared plainly that “the path of the just is as the shining more and more unto the perfect day.” See Minutes of the British Conference, 1881, p. 53.

Brooke, John, a missionary of the Church of England, came to America in 1705 in the employ of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, and was appointed to Elizabethtown, N. J., by Lord Cornbury, governor of the province. Shortly after his arrival three churches were built under his direction—St. John’s, at Elizabethtown, St. Peter’s, at Perth Amboy, and another at Freehold. At Piscatway his congregation had repaired a meeting-house, and were using it temporarily. At seven different stations, one of them fifty miles from his residence, he officiated as regular. In 1712 he added to the feeble churches liberally from his own salary. He died suddenly in 1717 at Elizabethtown. He was an earnest, zealous, and self-sacrificing preacher, and the stability of several of these churches was largely owing to his effort. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v. 188.

Brooke, John Thomson, D.D, a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in Frederick County, Md., in 1800. By birth a country and educated man, and was at one time a professor in a Romanish college. In 1825 he was ordained in the Protestant BROOKES, Edward, a Congregational minister, was born at Medford, Mass. He graduated at Harvard College in 1757; was ordained at North Yarmouth, Me., July 4, 1764; his license was dismissioned in March, 1769; and died at Medford in 1781. See Sprague, Annals of the Aner. Pulpit, i. 538.

Brooks, Edward Flint, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Halfax, Vt., Sept. 27, 1812. He graduated at Washington College, Pa., in 1839; and at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1842. He was ordained an evangelist by the Barton Presbyterian, Oct. 29, 1842. He served as stated supply at Franklin Creek, Vt., in 1843; at Riverhead, L. I., 1844-46. He was then pastor of a Congregational Church at West Woodstock, Conn., 1846-50; stated supply of Presbyterian Church at Manchester, N. J., in 1850; pastor of a Congregational Church at Mill, Mass., 1851-55; stated supply in Connection with the last two years; pastor at Manassas, Va., from 1855 to 1861; pastor at Westminster, 1866-67; stated supply at Paris, N. Y., in 1868. He died at Elgin, Ill., Sept. 15, 1872. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 122.

Brooks, Elbridge Gerry, D.D., a Universalist minister, was born in Dover, N. H., July 29, 1816. He spent his boyhood in Portsmouth; acquired a good education; and then preaching at the age of nineteen. His fields of labor were Exeter, N. H.; Amesbury, Mass., where he was ordained in 1837; East Cambridge in 1838; Lowell, for one year; Bath, Me., in 1846; Lynn, Mass., in 1849; Sixth Universalist Church, New York, in 1853, where he remained until chosen, in 1867, general secretary of the United States Convention. In that office he traveled extensively, carrying life, energy, and courage wherever he went. In 1869 he accepted an invitation to the Church of the Messiah in Philadelphia, where he continued until his decease, April 8, 1878. Dr. Brooks was a strong man physically, mentally, and morally. He was energetic, careful, able; majestic in his bearing, and powerful in his appeals. By nature he was an ardent reformer, an uncompromising advocate of the Gospel and of freedom. He was a strong and vigorous writer, contributed frequently to his denominational periodicals, and published two works of great denominational value: Universalism in Life and Doctrine, and Our New Departure. See Universalist Register, 1879, p. 88.
Brooks, Frederick, a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, entered the ministry about 1866, and became, in that year, rector of St. Paul's Church, Des Moines, Ia. The following year he became rector of St. Paul's Church, Cleveland, O., in which parish he remained until his death, Sept. 15, 1874, at the age of thirty-two years. See 3 Prott. Episc. Almanac, 1875, p. 15.

Brooks, J. H., D.D., an English Baptist minister, was born in Berkhamsted, Hants Co., about 1795, and united with the Church in March, 1815. He immediately began to study earnestly. His Sabbath schools were spent in village preaching, and in due time he completed a full course of study in the academy at Newport-Pagnell. He was pastor of the Church in West Bergholt, about 1812; then at Fenny Stratford, Buckinghamshire, from 1827 to 1835; next at Ridgemonde, Bedfordshire, from 1835 to 1851. For a short time he was in Buckingham. At the last he was laid aside by complete mental and bodily prostration. His final residence was in Banbury, where he died, March 3, 1857. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1858. (C. S. S.)

Brooks, William A., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., July 7, 1810. He was converted at the age of twenty-one; licensed to exhort in 1838; and in 1858 entered the New Jersey Conference, in which he toiled zealously and successfully, in the pulpit, pastorate, and in the translation of Bibles, until his death, Sept. 12, 1868. Mr. Brooks was a man of much prayer and great liberality; always cheerful and laborious. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1869, p. 63.

Broomefield, Robert W., an English Wesleyan minister, was born near Rochester in 1815. He was converted about three years after the House Theological Institution, was appointed to Welbington in 1824, and died at High Wycombe, Aug. 17, 1875. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1875, p. 12.

Broquier (or Bronquard), Jacques, a French theologian, was born at Thionville about 1588. In 1608 he entered the Jesuit order and went to reside at Luxemburg. He died in 1660, leaving a translation in Latin of the Pédagogue Chrétien of the Jesuit Philip Oultram, which was called the extenuated edition. The first edition of which appeared at Mons in 1641:—also a translation in Latin of the work entitled Pensées de Jésus, or, Moyen Assuré de se Sauver (Rouen, 1648):—a Latin translation of the Testament de l'Homme Chrétien de Antoine Suquet:—and a translation of La Vraie Philosophie Chrétien de Charles Muard. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Broda (also called Hildigis), was a Mercian exiledman, whose death in 790 is recorded by Simeon of Durham. He attached the charters of Offa from 764 to 795, and, after the death of Offa, those of Ecgrith and Kænulf down to 798. He is probably the person who is mentioned in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle as a benefactor of Medeshamsted in 777, although the passage is an interpolation, and the monastery of which he was the patron was Woking, in Surrey. He was present as the Legatine Synod of 787. Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Brsom, Hans Adolph, a famous Danish hymn-writer, was born June 20, 1694. He studied at Copenhagen, and succeeded his father in the ministry. In 1729 he was called to Medeshamstede, near Cumber dwick, and in 1741 he was made bishop of Ribe. In 1760 he was made doctor of divinity, and died June 8, 1764. Of his hymns, at least two hundred are translations from the German of Gerhard, Rist, Angelus Silesius, Laurenti, Freylinghausen, Richter and others. The best edition of his hymns is the one published by P. A. Ar dland (Copenhagen, 1867), under the title, Hans Adolfs Brorsoms Pæntner og ændelige Sange. See Daugaard, Bidrag til Karakteristik af Brorsen som Redamedsh in Theolog. Tidskrift, 1888, ii.; Petersen, Dansk Litter tur-historie, iv, 295 sq.; Michelsen, in Herzog's Real cyclopedia. (3d ed.), s. v. (B. P.)

Brosse, La. See ANGE DE ST. JOSEPH.

Brosnais, Martin, a French fanatic, was born in 1547, and son and father of a lawyer of the name of Brosnais. He pretended to be possessed with spirits, and in that state inveighed against the edict of Nantes. Her im potence, however, was exposed by the bishop of Angers, who produced the same convulsions upon her nervous temperament by artificial excitements. She traveled about, first with her father, and afterward as a nun at St. Martin. She was repeatedly arrested, and was finally confined in a convent, where she died about the beginning of the 16th century. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Brothénus, a Welsh Saint, was the founder of Llanfrothen, in Merionethshire, in the 6th century. Rees says his festival-day was Oct. 15, but the Acta Sanctorum (viii, 658) gives him under Oct. 18, in con cjunction with the abbess Gwendolen (Gwyddelan), whose name is preserved at Llanwyddelan, in Monte gomeryshire.

Brotherhood. The origin of fraternities in the Christian Church and world, whether clerical, lay, or mixed, is far from being satisfactorily ascertained. The formation of such associations was in direct opposition to the very intent which produced monachism itself, and sent the solitary, as a "hermit," into the wilder neness. Yet such fraternities were practically in existence in the Egyptian laurus, when Serapion could rule over a thousand monks; they received their first written constitution from St. Basil (326-379). Muratori was the first to point out the Abbeux (Q. XIX) religious fraternity, in opposition to various writers who held that such fraternities date only from the 9th or even the 13th centuries. Mura-tori also suggests that the leccturis or decani, who are mentioned in the laws of Justinian (43 and 59 Novellae) as fulfilling certain functions at funerals, must have been a mimetic and transitory fraternity to clergy, and the old sodalitas appears to have become more and more discredited, since the 18th canon of the Council of Chalcedon (A.D. 451) requires the cutting off of all clerics or monks forming "conspiracies and sodalities."
In the 8th century we find a disposition on the part of the Church to redefine the idea of personality to clergy and monastic use. In the Dialogue by Question and Answer on Church Government of archbishop Egbert of York (middle of the century), the terms frater and soror will be found applied both to clerics and monks or nuns, but never apparently to laymen. There is at the same time ground for supposing that the term "frac-ternity," which in the 12th and 13th centuries is used ordinarily as a synonym for "gild," was already current in the 8th or 9th to designate these bodies, the organization of which Dr. Brentano holds to have been complete among the Anglo-Saxons in the 8th century, and the bulk of which were of lay constitution, though usually of a more or less religious character. The connection between the two words is established in a somewhat singular manner. A Council of Nantes of very uncertain date, which has been placed by some as early as 658, by others as late as 800, has a canon which is repeated almost in the same terms in a capitulary of anarchitect of Archbishop Thierry of Rheims, of 852 or 854. But where the canon speaks of "those gatherings or confraternities which are termed conuortia," the archbishop has "gatherings which are commonly called guilds or confraternities."
But the term "gild" itself was already in use to designate fraternities for mutual help before the days of Hincmar. We meet with it in a capitulary of Charlemagne's of the year 779, which bears "as touching the oaths mutually sworn by a guild, that no one presume to do so." It occurs in two other places in the capitularies. It is thus clear that the guilds of the later half of the 8th century existed for purposes exactly the same as those which they fulfilled several centuries later. So far indeed as they were usually sanctioned by oath, they were obviously forbidden by the capitulary above quoted, as well as by several others against "conjunctions and conspiracies; the last (the Thionville Capitulary of 805) of a peculiar character. The subject of religious or quasi-religious brother-hoods or fraternities in the early Church (apart from monastic ones) has been but imperfectly investigated as yet. Specific bodies are found apparently answering to the character, attached to particular churches, during the 5th, 6th, 8th, and 9th centuries. In the West, however, we seem first to discern them under the Teutonic shape of the guild, which in its free forms was palpably the object of great jealousy to the political and spiritual despotism of the Carolingian and.

BROTHERHOOD OF GOD, a Christian sect which grew in the 12th century, having for its chief object to restriet and abolish the right and duty of the War. It was founded by a carpenter at Guienne, who pretended to have had special communication with Jesus Christ and the Virgin Mary, and was received as a divinely inspired messenger.

Brothwood, Thomas, an English Wesleyan minister, was born near Wellington, Shropshire, in 1792. He was converted in early life; entered the itinerant ministry in 1825, in which he labored in plainness of speech, sound doctrine, zeal and fidelity for thirty-two years, and for nearly sixteen years he discharged, as a supernumerary, the duties of preacher and pastor in the Madley and other circuits. He died at Broseley, Madeley, April 7, 1857. He was sincere, upright, and affection-at. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1873,
p. 28.

Broue, Pierre de la, a French prelate and theologian, was born at Toulouse in 1648, and went to Paris in 1668, where he took his degree in theology. He was of an ancient parliamentary family, and he wrote signed poetry in order to devote his time to preaching, which he did with great success before Louis XIV, who made him bishop of Mirepoix. Being devoted to the conversion of the Protestants, he published six pastoral letters on the subject. He also corresponded with Bossuet concerning the most efficient means for the accomplishment of this end. The opposition excited by the bull Unigenitus claimed a large share of his attention. Broue died Sept. 20, 1720. He wrote, Catechisme pour l'instruction de ses Diocesanens:—Statuta Synodale:—Orasion Funèbre d'Anne-Christine de Baviere (Paris, 1690):
—Relations des Conférences tenues en 1716 à L'archevêché de Paris et au Palais Royal, sur les AccoDHdements proposés dans l'Affaire de la Bulle Unigenitus; inserted in the Histoire du Livre des Réflexions Morales of the abbé Louali:—Défense de la Grâce efficace par elle-même, against Fénelon and P. Daniel. See Hoefer, Voue.

Brough, Joseph R., a minister of the Methodist New Connection, was born at Lane End, Staffordshire, in 1794. He was brought up religiously, converted in youth, and entered the ministry in 1816. After travelling in eight circuits, his health gave way at Sunderland, but he accepted another circuit at Dewsbury, where he became a supernumerary, and, after much suf-fereing, died in peace, Oct. 9, 1826. See Minutes of the Conference.

Brougham, Joseph, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Burnley in 1788. He was converted in youth, commenced to preach in the itinerancy in 1811, and, after laboring with acceptance for some years, his health failed, and he retired from active work and settled in Bury, where he died, March 24, 1836. He was pious, faithful, but naturally reserved. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1836.

Broughton, Job, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Coatsheath, England, July 15, 1791. He was educated at Lutterworth, was licensed by an association of Independents, and labored as a missionary for seventeen years. He returned to America in 1819. In 1833 he was installed pastor of Greenland Church, Bloomingburg, N. He died Nov. 1, 1838. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanacr, 1860, p. 67.

Broughton, Thomas, A.M., a minister of the Church of England, and one of the number known as Oxford Methodists, was a member of Exeter College, Oxford, and was connected with the Methodists. After leaving the university, he first officiated at Cowley, near Uxbridge. In 1736 he became curate at the Tower of London, also preached every Tuesday afternoon to the prisoners in Ludgate prison, and read prayers every night to a religious society at Wapping. "By means of Whitefield, he was presented to St. Helen's, Bishopgate Street Within; and, through faithfulness to his old Oxford friend, he lost it. The parishioners objected to Whitefield having the use of Broughton's pulpit.
Broughton answered, 'Through Mr. Whitefield's influence I obtained the living of St. Helen's, and, if he insists upon it, I shall have my pulpit.'' Whitefield insist, and Broughton lost his pulpitu This in 1741
he became lecturer of All-Hallows, Lombard Street.
In 1743 he was appointed secretary of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, which position he held until his death. He remained in the lecturership of All-Hallows for some years after beginning work for the society. After his loss of the pulpit he gave much his living of Wotton. He attended to both the du-

BROUGHTON
BROWN

Brower, Cornelius, a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, was born in New York city in 1770. He graduated at Columbia College in 1789; studied theology under Dr. J. H. Livingston, and was licensed by the Classis of New York on Dec. 21, 1787. He was pastor at Poughkeepsie and Stoneburgh, 1794 to 1812; then supplied Hyde Park, 1812 to 1815. He next became professor in the high-school at Utica, and stated supply at Frankfort, 1815 to 1833. At this time he resided at Geneva, and did the work of an evangelist. He frequently supplied Arrow, Groton, and Tyre, from 1833 to 1846; and died in the last-named year. "Mr. Brower allowed no inclemency to prevent his filling his appointments." He was quiet, unobtrusive, and cheerful: a thorough classical scholar and mathematician; and a sound, extensive, and thorough Biblical student. He was, however, more dourous to be useful than popular. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church (3d ed.), p. 198.

Brower, Daniel (styled van Niedriëck), a Reformed minister of Holland, was born at Yhorst in Upper Ye-ssel. Two years after having completed his theological studies at Franeker, he went in 1651 to the East Indies with a view of preaching the Gospel to the heathen there. Having spent several years at Batavia and other stations, he was finally placed by the Synod of Franeker himself to the translation of the Bible into Malay. He commenced with the book of Genesis, which was printed in 1662. Five years later, in 1668, the entire New Test. was printed in roman letters at Amsterdam; translated "with all care and fidelity out of the Greek, Latin, and several other languages," and was six hundred pages long. His life was simple and devout. See Amer. Quar. Church Rec. 1858, p. 158.

Browner, Jacob H., a Baptist minister, was born in New York city, Jan. 1, 1791. He united with the First Baptist Church in 1806, was licensed when young, and for some time was associated with Rev. G. G. Sommers in missionary labors among the destitute of his native city. In 1812 he was ordained in the Tabernacle Church, New York; was pastor at Sing Sing for fourteen years; and then went in 1828 to New York, where for twenty years he was pastor of the North Baptist Church. During this time an attractive house of worship was built, and he baptized three hundred and thirty converts while at the North Church. He died in 1848. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclopedia, p. 144. (J. C. S.)

Broussais, Jacques, canon of St. Honoré at Paris, was a native of Auvergne, and a celebrated preacher. During the civil troubles of 1649, he remained firm to the king, and, in 1651, was deputed to Rome with M. de Maistre, for the benefit of the Jacobins. He was a pupil of M. de Meur, the most learned of the Jesuits. He died at Paris, Nov. 7, 1736, leaving Sermon sur la Grâce : — Lettre au Sujet de ce Sermon. — Requêtes et Mémoires au Sujet de l'Affaire des cinq Propositions de Jansenius : — Tableau de l'Homme juste : — Vie du P. Ange de Joyeuse. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.; Landon, Eccl. Dict. a. v.

Broadway, Perry O., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Treded County, N. C., Sept. 2, 1824. He was brought up piously; embraced religion in early life; received license to preach in 1850, and in 1851 joined the Louisville Conference. After a short and severe sickness, he died July 31, 1854. Mr. Brower was faithful, zealous, affectionate, and highly esteemed. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1854, p. 506.

Brower, Caspar, a German Jesuit and teacher of philosophy at Treves, was born in 1559 at Arnhem. For some time he was rector of the college at Fulda, and died June 2, 1617, at Treves. He wrote, Note in l'Enseignement de F. Robert de Maizour, in charge of the Jesuits of Mayence (1610) : — Antiquitates Fuldeniensium libri 4 (Antwerp, 1612) : — Antiquitates et Annales Trevirienses, published by Jac. Masenius (Liege, 1607, 2 vols. fol.). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. I, 676, 794; Jöcher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon, a. v. (B. P.) inter, was born at Lawrenceville, N. J., Sept. 30, 1808. He graduated from New Jersey College in 1825, and for a time studied medicine. From 1828 to 1830 he was tutor in New Jersey College. He pursued the study of theology in Princeton Theological Seminary for two years, and also studied in Yale Seminary. He was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, April 17, 1834, to minister at Middlesex, Va., from 1832 to 1833, and died at Lawrenceville, Sept. 9, 1833. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 75; Gen. Cat. of Yale Div. Sch., 1873, p. 12.

Brown, Absalom, a Methodist Episcopal minister, entered the itinerant ranks of the South Carolina Conference in 1826, and labored zealously until his death, in 1856, to promote religious and social welfare. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1835, p. 845.

Brown, Allen, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Providence, R. I., March 81, 1788. In early life he united with the Congregationalist Church at Providence, and soon after completed his school education. After having for some time been in successful business, he united with the First Baptist Church in his native city, and later went to Philadelphia, where, under the tutelage of Rev. Dr. William Stoughton, he pursued a course of theological study. Returning to Providence for six years, he was pastor of the newly organized Third Baptist Church in that city. He then became a member of the Free-will Baptist Church at Olneyville, and was soon chosen chaplain of what is known as "The Dexter Asylum," continuing in that position for twenty years. He was a frequent contributor to the Morning Star. His death occurred in 1860. He left behind him the sorrow of a good name, and the example of a useful, exemplary life. See Barrett, Memoirs of Eminent Preachers, p. 223-229. (J. C. S.)

Brown, Alonso, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Osipee, N. H., May 25, 1825. He graduated at Dartmouth College in 1840, and from 1853 to 1856 was a student in Union Theological Seminary. He was ordained Nov. 5, 1856; was pastor at Clifton (S. L.), N. Y., from 1856 to 1857; and from 1858 to 1873 was a teacher in New York city. He died there, in October, 1873. See Gen. Cat. of Union Theol. Sem. 1876, p. 77.

Brown, Amelia, an English minister of the Society of Friends, was born at Cirencester, England, in 1787. She was carefully educated and faithfully instructed in the truths of the gospel. Early in life she formed a strong attachment to the Scriptures, which increased as she advanced in years. She travelled through several of the English counties, exercising her gifts as a minister. She died Oct. 13, 1849. See (Lond.) Annual Monitor, 1851, p. 9.

Brown, Amos, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Bristol, N. H., in 1800, and became a Christian at the age of twenty-seven. He united with the Church at Alexandria, and soon after began to speak in public as a minister, and was ordained to his work by his brethren. He labored with a good degree of success at Alexandria, Nashua, Orange, and other places. Not long, however, to his death he remained in Eaton and took charge of the Church at that place, which was in a low, depressed condition. Here he labored with great fidelity and zeal. While thus engaged, he died suddenly, Dec. 7, 1867. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1869, p. 86. (J. C. S.)

Brown, Amos P., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Guilford, N. H., June 15, 1837. He was licensed to preach by the Plymouth Association, Jan. 24, 1816, and was ordained by a council at Campton, Jan. 1, 1817, pastor of the Congregational Church. From 1822 to 1824 he spent his time in western New York, and entered upon missionary labors in Missouri, June 1825. In young manhood he was a diligent worker in the Illinois and Mississippi River; became supply pastor of Jerseyville Church, Ill., in October, 1835, and so continued until 1838. In a few years he removed to Rushville, and labored in the ministry as his health allowed. He was one of the original members of the first Alton Presbytery, and removed his relation from that to the Presbytery of Peoria, April 20, 1850. He died May 16, 1859. See Norton, Hist. of the Pres. Church in Illinois.

Brown, Andrew Morton, LL.D., an English Congregational minister, was born at the parish of Londoun, Ayrshire, Scotland, March 12, 1812. He was educated at Glasgow and Edinburgh, in the latter place having for his instructors Prof. Wilson ("Christopher North") and Dr. Chalmers. He was first engaged in mission work in London, but soon removed to Overton, Hampshire, to take charge of a small village church. In 1857 he removed to Chicago and thereafter served with the Rev. Thomas Durant, of a large Church in that place. On Jan. 8, 1843, he settled as pastor of the Independent Church at Highbury Chapel, Cheltenham. Here he labored with eminent success both in religious and political work. He was regarded as the champion of liberal principles in Cheltenham. In 1894 he was elected chairman of the Congregational Union of England and Wales. He died in the midst of his labors, July 17, 1879, having been absent from his pulpit but one Sunday. His literary works include contributions to the press of Cheltenham and London, and several volumes. See The Cross: Salvation, and the Way to Secure it;——Evenings with the Prophets;——Leader of the Lollards;——Peden the Prophet;——The Life of the Rev. J. Rogers; and, in conjunction with Dr. Ferguson, an edition of The Life and Labors of John Campbell, D.D. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1880, p. 510. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1861, p. 212.

Brown, Anthony, an English Congregational minister, was born in Bunhill Row, London, Sept. 7, 1783. He was for some time an occasional preacher, and finally settled at South Ockenden, where, and at Aveley, he labored faithfully in the Gospel for thirty-seven years. He died July 29, 1851. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1851, p. 212.

Brown, Areta, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Hampton, Mass., Aug. 13, 1792. He was early subject to religious impressions; experienced conversion in 1817; soon became class leader, exhorter, and local preacher; moved to Ohio in 1819, and in 1824 was received into the Ohio Conference. His itinerant labors covered a large territory, extending over nearly all of Ohio and southern Indiana. His health obliged him to become superannuated in 1855, which relation he sustained to the close of his life. In 1856 he removed to Chicago, and served West Indiana-street Church with great usefulness for three years. Beginning with 1861, he and his wife labored among the soldiers in the camps and hospitals at Natchez; after that, until 1868, among the freedmen in that city, as well as in Vicksburg and Baton Rouge. He died at Chicago, July 31, 1869. Mr. Brown was eminently practical and useful, gentle and affectionate. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1869, p. 281.

Brown, B. J., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was a member of the Black River Conference, and died in 1867 or 1868. As to his personal character he was remarkable, and physically powerful and well-formed. The fires of love and zeal were far too fierce for the control of his will. He lived and died in raptures. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1868, p. 118.

Brown, Benjamin Newton, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Pittsburgh, Dec. 19, 1808. He experienced conversion in 1824, soon after was licensed to exhort, then to preach, and in 1838 united with the Baltimore Conference. He died in Washington, D. C., Jan. 17, 1869. Mr. Brown's endowments were of a high order. He was strong in mind, given to prayer, industrious, in a diligent manner, fearless in utterance; genial, witty, and even playful. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1869, p. 12.
Brown, Caleb, a Baptist minister, was born in Sudbury, Mass., Dec. 4, 1791. In early manhood he moved to Rockingham, Vt., where he united with that Church. He spent about two years at the theological institution in Hamilton, N.Y.; in 1829 became pastor of the Church in Wilton, N.H., and subsequently preached in Townsend, Winchester, and Wallingford. In 1831 he was called to Scituate, removed to Warner, N.H., and supplied churches in the vicinity. In 1842 he went to Weare, remaining there nearly three years, then returned to Warner and labored as before. In 1851 he became pastor of the Church at Conway. At the end of three years he took up his residence in Concord, where for four years he acted as chaplain in the state prison. He died at Concord, Oct. 30, 1875.

Brown, Chad, a Baptist minister, the ancestor of the well-known family which bears his name in Providence, R.I., was born in England about 1610. He came to America, it is supposed, in July, 1638. Sympathizing with Roger Williams in his views on civil and religious liberty, he fled from the colony of Massachusetts, and took up his residence in the newly planted town of Providence. In the early colonial times he was a man of no small influence in the community in which he lived. With four other citizens he was chosen to draw up a "plan of amendment for the peace and government of the colony." For several years this instrument constituted the only acknowledged constitution by which the colony was governed. By the records of the First Baptist Church in Providence, it appears that Mr. Brown was its first elder or regular minister, although for a short time Roger Williams preached for the Church. The Church for more than half a century had no meeting-house. The tradition is that they were wont "to assemble in a grove or orchard for public worship, and, when the weather would not permit this, in private houses." Mr. Brown's name has been made somewhat memorable in the ecclesiastical history of Rhode Island, from the position which he took in a controversy which seems to have greatly agitated the little state. He maintained very stoutly the obligation of the rite of "laying-on of hands" as necessary to constitute one a member of Christ's Church. This rite, however, has long since, except by a few Baptists of Rhode Island, ceased to be regarded as of divine authority. Mr. Brown died about 1665. His name and influence were transmitted through an honored posterity, which has made itself felt in many of the literary and benevolent organizations of its native state. See Guild, Life of Manning. (J.C.S.)

Brown, Matthew, a minister of the Society of Friends, was born in England in 1817. He early yielded himself to the Holy Spirit and his future work. It was not, however, until he was about forty years old that he ventured to address his friends in public. This long delay was owing to his high ideal of the Christian ministry. He realized fully the need of mental preparation before he eminently and favorably placed his spiritual gift. He died Jan. 1, 1864. See (London) Annual Monitor, 1865, p. 14.

Brown, Charles Eden, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Alexandria, Va., in 1815. He was converted while a boy, and entered the Baltimore Conference in 1837, in which he toiled faithfully until his death, July 15, 1846. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1846, p. 9.

Brown, Charles L., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Campbell County, Va. He experienced conversion in 1868; was licensed to exhort and to preach in due time, and about 1872 entered the Missouri Conference, in which he labored faithfully two years, then was transferred to other fields, and after months of suffering he died, in 1874 or 1875. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1875, p. 46.

Brown, Charles S., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Plattekill, Ulster Co., N.Y., Feb. 7, 1825. He inherited admirable natural qualities from exemplary Christian parents. His intention was to become a lawyer, and he determined to obtain a liberal education, which he began in New Paltz Academy, afterwards attending Amenia Seminary. Here he was converted, and he determined to enter the Methodist ministry. He was more diligent than ever in his efforts to secure an education. Entering the Wesleyan University in 1845, in 1849 he graduated second in a class of thirty-one. He joined the New York Conference in 1850, where he continued an efficient and honored member until his death, Nov. 14, 1890. He was a sincere and upright man, who possessed a fine intellect, and his conversation was noted for its strong moral tone. His preaching was uniformly clear, forcible, and fervent. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1880, p. 84.

Brown, Charles Smith, a Universalist minister, was born in Oneida County, N.Y., March 20, 1804. He joined the Methodist Church at the age of fourteen; received a private theological training for the Universalist ministry, and in 1832 was ordained, and entered upon his work at South Oxford. He afterwards removed to Upper Lisle; then spent a few years in Pennsylvania; then in Oneida and Cortland counties, N.Y.; and finally settled at Cambridge, Ill., where he died, in May, 1870. Mr. Brown's voice was strong, but not brilliant, preacher, and an exemplary Christian. See Universalist Register, 1871, p. 110.

Brown, Clark, A.M., a Congregational minister, was ordained pastor of the Church in Machias, Me., Oct. 7, 1795; dismissed Nov. 8, 1797; installed pastor in Brimfield, Mass., June 20, 1798; dismissed Nov. 5, 1803; and remained there for four years after. See Sprague, Annals of the Aмер. Pulpit, ii, 485.

Brown, Cotton, a Congregational minister, was a native of Haverhill, Mass. He graduated at Harvard College in 1743; was ordained pastor at Brookline, Oct. 20, 1748; and died April 13, 1751, aged twenty-five years. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ii, 73.

Brown, Daniel (1), a Free-will Baptist minister, was born July 16, 1813. He united with the Church in Hingham, N.Y., in 1834. For six years he resided in Boston, N.Y., and in 1848 moved to Dayton, Cattaraucus Co. He was ordained when forty-seven years of age, and labored chiefly in the Cattaraucus and Erie quarterly meetings. "With a self-sacrificing spirit he labored earnestly and faithfully the most of the time for twenty-five years, being sick but little himself, and preaching until the means he had accumulated previous to his entering the ministry were entirely used up." He died in Dayton, Aug. 5, 1882. See Morning Star, Sept. 27, 1882. (J.C.S.)

Brown, Daniel (2), a Free-will Baptist minister, was born in Canada West, April 5, 1822. He was converted when eighteen years of age, and joined the Methodist Church. Subsequently he united with the Free-will Baptists, and was ordained in 1845. For several years, with a good degree of success, he labored in different places in Canada. He removed to the West, and died at Bruce, Mich., Aug. 8, 1883. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1871, p. 80; 1872, p. 81. (J.C.S.)

Brown, Daniel E., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, resided in Michigan in 1833, at about which time he entered the ministry. The following year he became rector at Litchfield, Conn.; in 1837 officiated at Milford; in 1838 was rector of Trinity Church, Troy, O.; and at the same time of St. Paul's in Greenville. In 1840 he moved to Michigan, residing there until 1862. In 1862 became rector of St. Paul's Church, East Saginaw; in 1864 was missionary in Genesee County, although still residing at Flint. In 1866 he removed to Ionia, having charge of two churches, viz. St. John's in Ionia and Trinity Church, Sarana; in 1867 was rector of the latter only. In 1870 he resided in Flint without charge, and continued so to do until his death, which occurred in 1873. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1874, p. 188.

Brown, David (1), a Presbyterian minister, was born in Scotland. On his arrival in America, he became a member of the Presbyterian of New Castle, and took his place in the Synod of Philadelphia in May, 1748. He returned to Scotland during the year. See Webster, Hist. of the Presb. Church in America, 1857.

Brown, David (2), an English clergyman, was educated at Magdalen College, Cambridge, and became chaplain to the East India Company in 1794, and provost of the College of Fort William in 1800. He died in 1812. A volume of Memorial Sketches, with a selection of his sermons, appeared in 1816, edited by the Rev. Charles Simeon. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Brown, David (3), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in the county of Down, Ireland, in 1760. He entered the itinerant connection in 1794; travelled nine years on Dutchess, Columbia, Croton, New Rochelle, Long Island, Redding, Litchfield, and Cambridge Circuits; and died Sept. 5, 1803. Mr. Brown was a man of unsullied piety, gentleness, and cheerfulness. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1801, p. 117.

Brown, David (4), a Cherokee Indian who took special interest in the intellectual and spiritual improvement of his tribe, was born about the beginning of the present century. He received his education at a school established at Brainerd by Rev. Cyrus Kingsbury, of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. At this school he became a decided Christian, and set out for Cornwall, Conn., to attend the Mission School, to fit himself for a preacher. He spent one year in the Andover Theological Seminary, to perfect himself in the work of preparation. In due time he returned to his own people, and devoted himself with great zeal to missionary work for several years. His death occurred in the spring of 1829. See Anderson's Memoir; Allen, Amer. Biog. s. v. (J. C. S.)

Brown, David (5), an English Congregational minister, was born in Forfar, Scotland, March 27, 1804. He was apprenticed to his father as a linen-weaver, but was more fond of books than the loom. He taught two years at King's Muir, and then several years in Forfar. He at first joined the Established Church, but in 1837 became a Congregationalist. He was ordained in 1839. Soon after this he studied at the universities of St. Andrews and Edinburgh, with a view to the ministry, and then for several years supplied vacant churches and itinerated in various parts of the country. In 1846 he was ordained over the Church at Harray, Orkney, where he labored eight years, and then became pastor at Cullen, where he died, April 8, 1862. See (Loud.) Cong. Year-book, 1863, p. 212.

Brown, Duncan, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Robinson County, N. C., Oct. 3, 1771. He received a good academic education, studied theology privately, and was licensed by Orange Presbytery in 1801. In 1802 he accepted a call to Hopewell Church, S. C., where he remained for ten years. During his last years he had no charge. He died July 6, 1861. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1862, p. 82.

Brown, Ebenezer, a Congregational minister, was born at Brimfield, Mass. He studied theology, and was first settled as pastor over the Congregational Church in the north parish of Wilbraham, March 3, 1819. He resigned this charge, July, 1827, and was installed as pastor over the Congregational Church in Prescott, where he continued until March, 1835. He left this Church to accept a call to the Second Church in Hadley. In 1838 he went from this position to Illinois under a commission from the American Home Missionary Society, and settled first in Byron, Ogle Co. In November, 1848, he aided in forming the Congregational Church in Roscoe, and two months later assumed its pastoral charge. He died there, Feb. 13, 1872. See Obin. Record of Yale College, 1870-80 sup.

Brown, Edward, an English Congregational minister, was born in Edinburgh, Aug. 21, 1877. In early manhood he removed to London, was there converted, and offered his services to the Irish Evangelical Society. He studied three years at their academy in Dublin, and in 1821 was given a charge at Kilmainham. There he removed to Limerick, where for six years he labored very abundantly as an assistant. Between 1830 and 1841 he preached successively at Birr, Newry, Carrickfergus, and Limerick, when he returned to England. He next preached three years in Lincoln, and then went to Leeds, where he became chaplain to the Cemetery, in which office he continued until his death, July 25, 1860. (See Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1863, p. 205.

Brown, Edwin C., a Baptist minister, was born at New London, Conn., Nov. 28, 1807. He graduated at Madison University, N. Y., in 1838; was ordained immediately afterwards in Hudson; and began to preach as a missionary in Franklin, Mo. In consequence of his outspoken views on the subject of slavery, after a single year of service, he resigned; and, after supplying a pulpit at St. Louis for six months, removed to Quincy, Ill., where he remained five years. He filled an engagement at Galena for three months, and then accepted a call to Lousdale, R. I. His other pastorate was at Port Washington, Wis.; Beverwark, N. Y.; Waltham, Mass.; Ind.; Bath and Westminster, N. Y.; and Oxford, Ill. In consequence of ill-health he retired from the pastoral, and continued his ministerial work only as a supply in places in Illinois. He died in Galva, Jan. 16, 1881. See Chicago Standard, Feb. 5, 1881; Minutes of Illinois Annual Conference, 1881, p. 117 (J. C. S.)

Brown, Eleazar, a Baptist minister, pastor of the First Baptist Church of North Stonington, was ordained in 1770, and died June 20, 1795. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vi, 109.

Brown, Eli H., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Troupsburg, N. Y., in 1867. He received a godly training, joined the Church in his childhood, and in 1829 entered the East Genesee Conference. In 1862 sickness obliged him to become a superannuate, which relation he sustained to the time of his death, March 21, 1865. Mr. Brown was earnest, full of the Spirit and faith, and successful. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1865, p. 241.

Brown, Elias P., a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Strafford, Vt., April 17, 1792, and in early life became a Free-will Baptist. Having been set apart to the work of the ministry, he labored for many years in his Master's cause. Later in life he removed to Amherst, O., where he continued to reside until his death, Aug. 29, 1869. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1869, p. 86. (J. C. S.)

Brown, Elijah, a Congregational minister, was a native of Waltham, Mass. He graduated at Harvard College in 1755; was ordained pastor of the Church in Sherburne, Nov. 28, 1770; and died Oct. 24, 1816, aged seventy-two years. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 514.

Brown, Ezekiel, a Baptist minister, was born at Warren, R. I., Sept. 17, 1877. He united with the Church in Haverhill, Mass., in 1809; was licensed by the Church in West Sutton, Feb. 20, 1814; and ordained pastor of the Church in Dudley, June 15, 1815. Here he remained till the fall of 1818, when he went to Lebanon, Conn., which was his residence during the remainder of his life. He died Sept. 11, 1833. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 144. (J. C. S.)

Brown, E. T., a Baptist minister, was born in Lancaster, Pa., March 16, 1818. While residing in Savannah he was converted and joined a Methodist Church, and subsequently united with a Baptist Church in Virgination. In 1842 he was ordained, and was pastor of three churches successively in Ohio—Mount Vernon, Wooster, and Warren. In 1863 he was appointed chaplain in the Second Ohio Cavalry, and served till the close of the war. For some time he resided at Sedalia, Mo., where he accomplished much spiritual good among the people. He died June 9, 1879. See Cathcart, Baptist Eng., 44, 44. J. C. S. 82.

BROWN, Fountain, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Tennessee about 1808. There he was converted, licensed to preach, in 1830 admitted into the Tennessee Conference, and immediately transferred to the Missouri Conference. In 1863 he was arrested by the Federal authorities and sent to the monastery, where he remained until December, 1865. He reached the neighborhood of his home about Dec. 25, 1865, when he was suddenly attacked by disease, and in a few hours died. Mr. Brown was an earnest and faithful preacher. See Minutes of Annual Conference of the M.E. Church South, 1866, p. 158.

BROWN, Frank, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Warren County, Pa., Jan. 30, 1837. He was converted at fifteen; graduated at Allegheny College at eighteen; served four years as professor in the university at Athens, O., two years as superintendent of schools in Allegheny City, Pa., one year as tutor in Allegheny College, and in 1865 entered the Erie Conference. When the Conference was divided, he fell into the East Ohio. His appointments were, Delaware Grove, Sheakleyville, Conneautville, Girard, Bristol, Jefferson, Tidioute; Scoville Avenue, Cleveland; and New Philadelphia. At the close of this last pastorate ill-health compelled him to take a superannuation relation, which he held until his death at Chautauqua, N. Y., Aug. 3, 1881. He lived a pure and blameless life, approaching the ideal as a minister of the Gospel. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1881, p. 819.

BROWN, Frederick H., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Stockbridge, Mass., Nov. 1, 1806. He united with the First Presbyterian Church in Auburn in 1826; was educated at Auburn Theological Seminary, N. Y. (1832-33); was licensed by Cayuga Presbytery in 1836, and installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Ludlowville, where he remained over a year. His subsequent fields of labor were Brownsville, O. (six years), Medina (seven years), Cleveland (as chaplain, a year), and Youngstown (three years and a half), and finally as chaplain again until 1858. He died July 31, 1861. See Wilson, Preb. Hist. Almanac, 1862, p. 178; Gen. Cat. of Auburn Theol. Sem. 1885, p. 220.

BROWN, Garrett Garney, a Congregational minister, was born at Bethlehem, Conn., in 1784. He prepared for college partly with a private instructor, and partly at Morris Academy, Litchfield; and entered college in the sophomore year. After graduating he taught in Milford, Conn., for one term, and then became a student in Andover Theological Seminary. He remained there until licensed to preach by the New Haven East Association in 1811. The next fifty years of his life were spent in the Southern and South-western States, where he taught in private families and in select schools. He preached also as opportunity offered, though not ordained. During these years he had no fixed residence, and scarcely remained for a year in any one place. In 1854 he visited the Sandhills Island and opened a private school, but returned the next year to the South. After the war broke out he came back to his native town. The closing part of his life was spent in Woodbury, Conn., where he died, Oct. 1, 1878. See Obituary Record of Yale College, 1871.

BROWN, George (1), a Scottish prelate, was chancellor of Aberdeen, and rector of Timmingham in East Lothian, and was consecrated bishop of Dunkeld in 1484. He was witness to the charter of regality granted to the abbey of Paisley by King James IV, Aug. 19, 1489.

He died Jan. 12, 1515. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 91.

BROWN, George (2), an Irish Wesleyan minister, was born in 1750. He was converted at the age of twenty-two, entered the travelling connection in 1776, preached thirty years, and died in 1822. He lived as he preached. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1852.

BROWN, George (3), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Halifax County, Va., about 1771. He experienced conversion in his twenty-first year, and, after discharging the duties of a local preacher for twelve years, was in 1818 admitted into the Kentucky Conference, wherein he served until his death, Dec. 12, 1851. See Minutes of Pastoral Conferences, 1825, p. 574; Math. Missionary, viii, 105.

BROWN, George (4), an English Baptist minister, was born in 1777. He seems to have commenced his ministry in Sabden, Lancashire, where he remained two years, and then removed to Kington, in Herefordshire, where he was pastor eight years. About 1822 he was invited to take charge of the Church in South Shields, Durham. Here he remained during the last part of his life. He is said to have experienced heavy trials, through all of which the Lord carried him. He died Aug. 26, 1842. See (Lond.) Bapt. Hand-book, 1843, p. 21. (J. C. S.)

BROWN, George (5), a Methodist Protestant minister, was born in West Pennsylvania, Jan. 29, 1792. He was converted in 1813, began the Methodist Episcopal Ministry in 1815, and after serving for four years as a presiding elder, entered the Baltimore Conference, which then included West Pennsylvania. In 1825 he became a member of the Pittsburgh Conference, and so continued, filling some of its principal stations, and serving four years as presiding elder, until 1829, when he took a position pastorate in the organization of the Methodist Protestant Church, and commenced his first pastorate in that body in the same year. In 1831 Mr. Brown was elected president of his Conference, and served in this relation three years. In 1838 he was placed in charge of the Ohio Circuit, in 1839 elected president of his Conference, in 1842 stationed at Pittsburgh, in 1842 again elected president, in 1845 appointed Conference missionary, in 1846 again president, and thus continued to vibrate between the presidencies and pastoral office until 1860, when he was elected editor of the Western Methodist Protestant at Springfield, O., in which office he served two years, producing many useful things. He was also again summoned to the presidencies, and then took a superannuated relation at his home in Springfield, where he died, Oct. 25, 1871. Mr. Brown was a prodigious worker, a finely educated man, and a devoted Christian. After retiring from the editorial service, he published his Recollections of Itinerant Life (8vo, 436 pages), and an autobiography of great interest, full of incident, and details of travel, Gospel labors, and experiences. See Bassett, Hist. of the M. Prot. Church, p. 369.

BROWN, George F., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in New Jersey, March 18, 1809. He was converted at sixteen years of age, licensed to preach in 1828, and joined the Philadelphia Conference in 1829. He was a pastor nineteen years, a presiding elder fourteen years, chaplain of New Jersey state prison two years, and superannumery eighteen years. In 1848, 1852, 1856, and 1869, he was a delegate to the General Conference. He died of paralysis, in Cincinnati, March 30, 1883. He was a man of much culture, piety, and intense loyalty to the Church and his Master. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1882, p. 80.

BROWN, George Jny., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Brainerd, N. Y., Nov. 12, 1839. He was admitted to the bar in Albany, N. Y., at the age of twenty. Soon after he received a divine call, and commenced studying for the ministry. He prepared for college at Fort Edward Institute, and entered the Wesleyan University, at Middletown, Conn., in 1865. While in college he supplied vacant pulpits as he had opportunity, and under the pressure of over-work his mind became deranged. After two years spent in an asylum reason was restored, and, returning to the university, he graduated with honor in 1875. Entering the Methodist Episcopal Seminary, at Bloomington, Ill., he preached, and taught, gaining a reputation for critical scholarship, deep religious experience, and pulpit ability far beyond his years. He had joined the Troy Conference in 1868, and, after completing his education, he now occupied two of its most prominent appointments, Schenectady and State Street, Troy, until his (1873-77) appointment. Symptoms of his former malady returned, and although he sought relief by rest and travel, reason again left her seat, and he was removed to the Utica Asylum, where he died, Dec. 2, 1880. To do the will of God was "his meat and drink." The Bible was "the man of his counsel." He possessed powerful mental abstraction and concentration of thought. He could study anywhere. Although stricken down in middle life, he lived longer by living better than most men. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1881, p. 93.

Brown, George L., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Baltimore, Md., in January, 1809. He was converted in 1830, and in 1834 joined the Balti-more Conference. For eight years, on account of ill-health, obliged to hold a supernumerary relation. He then assumed the active relation, and labored faithfully and successfully until his sudden death, in 1843. Mr. Brown possessed ordinary ministerial talents, deep piety, and much patience. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1835, 4, 5.

Brown, George R. (1), a native of Western Africa, became an assistant missionary of the Wesleyan Society in 1856. He died at Cape Coast, Aug. 17, 1854, aged forty-five years, and was followed to the grave by the governor and staff, with a multitude of people, making great lamentation. Mr. Brown was a man of excellent spirit and acceptable talents. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1855.

Brown, George R. (2), a Universalist minister, was born at Watertown, N.Y., Oct. 6, 1806. He removed with his parents to Peru, O., in 1823, where for some years he worked on the farm summers and attended the district school winters. He was ordained to the Universalist ministry in 1837, and labored in Northern Ohio and Indiana, and Southern Michigan, serving largely as a pioneer. He died May 9, 1873. Mr. Brown possessed a special gift as counsellor and comforter to the afflicted, was mighty in the Scriptures, a firm and zealous advocate of temperance, and his life was above reproach. See Universalist Register, 1874, p. 127.

Brown, Hartwell Harwell, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Virginia. He was well educated, experienced conversion in 1818, and later in the same year entered the Tennessee Conference. He soon rose to eminence, but after filling several of the first appointments of the Conference, located on his farm, and soon began merchandizing in general goods. He soon was lost in business failures, and he was again brought into the active ranks of the ministry. For two or three years previous to his death he sustained a superannuated relation, and to a large degree became insane. He died in 1868. Mr. Brown was of robust form, had a fine voice, and an agreeable manner. In his better days his sermons were full of thought, and delivered with much power. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1868, p. 251.

Brown, Harvey, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in New England in 1799. He served as a soldier in the war of 1812, experienced religion in 1825, at the revivals in New Haven, Conn., and was received into the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1827. In 1828 he was licensed to preach in the Illinois Conference, in the following year located, and in 1866 re-entered the New York Conference as a superannuated, and continued to sustain that relation until his death, in Harlem, N.Y., Dec. 15, 1870. Mr. Brown was a man of strong convictions, deep, positive, and unintermittent piety, and great faith. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1871, p. 108.

Brown, Henry, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Rockbridge County, Va., Nov. 28, 1806. He received his early education at home, and graduated at Washington College, Va., in 1827. After leaving college he taught for a few months, and entered Princeton Theological Seminary, but in consequence of severe illness was obliged to leave. He next entered Union Seminary, but did not remain long, for the same cause. He was licensed by Lexington Presbyterian Church in 1834, and was the same an evangelist in 1831. He commenced his labors at Tygart's Valley, extending his missionary labors to Kanawha county, preaching at Beverly, Huttonville, Mingo Flats, and Woodstock. His next field of labor was Augusta County, and subsequently he was a supply at Briery Church, Prince Edward County. He then removed to Wilmington, N. C., where, and in neighboring churches, he labored with great success. In 1840 he returned to the valley of Virginia, supplied Black River and Rock Fish churches, and afterwards the Church of Harrisonburg. His first pastoral charge was Goshen Church, in the Shenandoah Valley. He was installed, which relation was dissolved in 1857, and at the same time he was also pastor of Pisgah Church. Compelled to seek a milder climate, he removed to Alligator (now Lake City), Fla., where he was duly installed. He next labored as a missionary in the Cherokee Presbyterian, residing at Lafayette, Ga. A sunstroke compelled him to lay aside work for a time. Returning to Virginia, he taught school for six months, and was afterwards missionary to the sick and wounded soldiers in the hospitals at Richmond, and for a while post-chaplain of the Confederate army. At the close of the war he made a pedes¬trian journey of two hundred miles in south-western Virginia, preaching nearly every day. For one year he supplied Lafayette and Harmony churches, Ala. They were twelve miles apart, and he visited them on foot, calling on every family on his way. He then went to Tennessee, and labored five years as an evangelist in Knoxville Presbytery. Another sunstroke led him again to Florida, where he preached at Pilatka, Enterprise, and Cedar Keys. He finally went to Mar¬lin, Tex., where he died, Jan. 14, 1881. See Princeton Neurology, Report, 1881, p. 25. (W. P. S.)

Brown, Henry Bell, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Chester-le-Street, Durham, June 8, 1808. He was converted in his thirteenth year, while at school at Houghton-le-Spring. In 1829 he received his first appointment. In 1846 he was laid aside by affliction. He died at Workington, Cumberland, Feb. 11, 1856. He was studious and devoted. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1856.

Brown, Henry C., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Springfield, Bradford Co., Pa., Nov. 3, 1835. He was a wayward youth, though reared by Christian parents, but experienced conversion about twenty, and in 1856 entered the East Genesee Conference. In the latter part of 1859 he was attacked by illness, became superannuated early next year, and died Sept. 22, 1860. Mr. Brown was an able minister, though only possessing a partial education. He was characterized by great earnestness, fidelity, and strong faith. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1861, p. 140.

Brown, Horace, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Kennebec County, Me., Nov. 11, 1799. He removed to Indiana with his parents while quite young, joined the Church when about eighteen, and subsequently became a member of the Missoula Conference. In 1851 and 1852 he labored in the Illinois Conference, in the following year located, and in 1866 re-entered the Methodist Episcopal Church South, in the county and domestic life, was an ex-
Brown, Isaac, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Fonthill, Wiltshire, Aug. 9, 1752. He was sent to call to the ministry of Isaac Brown, a man of child-like innocence, was greatly beloved by John Wesley, and worked hard and long and well. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1815.

Brown, Jacob A., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Morristown, N.J., Sept. 15, 1810. He became a Christian in early manhood, in due time was licensed to exhort and to preach, and in 1834 entered the Ohio Conference. On the formation of the North Ohio Conference he became a member of it. During his later years he sustained a superannuated relation, retired to Delaware, O., and engaged in mercantile business, where, by his integrity, fair dealing, and genuine piety, he won the high respect of all. He died Jan. 26, 1875. As a preacher Mr. Brown was clear, tender, and scriptural. He was an affectionate man and a faithful Christian. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1879, p. 39.

Brown, James (1), a Presbyterian minister, was born in Connecticut. He was licensed by Suffolk Presbytery, and was called to Bridgehampton, and ordained in June, 1748. The loss of health compelled him to lay aside his pastoral work in March, 1776, and he died April 22, 1788. He was a judicious, spiritual preacher, laborious and successful. See Webster, Hist. of the Presb. Church in America, 1857.

Brown, James (2), an English missionary in the province of Georgia during the latter part of the last century, published The Restitution of All Things (1785):—and Civil Government (1792). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Brown, James (3), a preacher of the United Methodist Church, was born in April, 1828, at Rochester, Kent, of Wesleyan parents. He was converted under the ministry of Rev. Joseph New, who, when he went as a missionary to Africa, sent for his young friend as a teacher in the African school, and Brown soon became a school inspector there. His health failed, and he returned home, and travelled in six English counties. He died Feb. 6, 1878. See Minutes of 22nd Annual Association.

Brown, James Allen, D.D., LL.D., a Lutheran theologian, was born in Lancaster County, Pa. He was of Quaker descent, but reared under Presbyterian influences. In 1811 he entered the senior class of Pennsylvania College, from which he graduated in 1842. Having become acquainted with the doctrines of the Lutheran Church, he united with that body, and resolved to devote himself to the work of the ministry. He studied at Baltimore under Drs. J. G. Morris and B. Kurtz. Having completed his studies, he was licensed by the Maryland Synod, and became pastor of Luther Chapel in Baltimore. He subsequently was called to York and to Philadelphia. In 1860 he was elected professor of theology of the Theological Seminary of the South, at Newberry, S. C. On the breaking-out of hostilities in 1861, he withdrew and returned to the North, and became chaplain of the hospital and military post established at York. In 1865 he was elected professor of theology of the Gettyburg Seminary, in which he labored with distinguished ability and success until December, 1879, when he was stricken with paralysis, which deprived him of his speech. He resigned his position in June, 1880, and died at Lancaster, June 19, 1882. (B. F.)

Brown, James Francis, a Congregational minister, was born in 1820, and graduated from Cambridge Theological School in 1848. In November of the same year he accepted a call from the First Congregational Church at Coventry, Mass., and served there earnestly and successfully till his death, June 14, 1858. Mr. Brown was a sincere Christian man, full of kind sympathies, and eminently faithful in all the duties of his sacred office. See The Christian Examiner (Bost.), 1853, p. 312.

Brown, James Willis, a Methodist Episcopal minister, son of Rev. Nathaniel Brown, was born in Fairview, Ind., in 1800. He joined the Church in 1829; was converted at his father's family altar a few years later; received license to exhort in 1869, to preach in 1870; and in the same year entered the North Indiana Conference. In 1872 he entered the North-Western University to complete his education, but had studied but a short time when failing health obliged him to return home. He continued to preach until prostrated with consumption, of which he died, Sept. 21, 1873. Mr. Brown was possessed of a clear and logical mind, studious in habit, earnest as a speaker, warm in his attachments, cheerful in disposition, and devoted to his calling. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1874, p. 53.

Brown, John, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Amberst, County, Va., July 17, 1872. He received a pious training; joined the Church in 1866; received license to preach in 1868; and in 1809 entered the North Carolina Conference, wherein he served until his death, Nov. 8, 1832. Mr. Brown's life was pious, zealous, and full of good works. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1833, p. 229.

Brown, John (1), an English martyr, was mercilessly treated because he rebuked the priest, and was burned at Ashford in 1517. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 181.

Brown, John (2), an English minister of the Society of Friends, was born at Laleham, Middlesex, June 1, 1638. He was among the first who, in his native county, wrote to frame a new discipline and a new society for these Friends. He became a member of the monthly meeting of Kingston-upon-Thames, where the meeting-house was built, and continued a member there of forty-eight years. After he became a minister he "was very zealous, not fearing the trials and persecutions that came upon him." He was in prison at the time of the great fire in London in 1666, and he was obliged to carry his bed out on his back when the prison was burned. He remained steadfast in the truth to the last, and died at the house of his son-in-law, in Blackman street, Southwark, May 6, 1733. See Pickersgill, iv, 362. (J. C. S.)

Brown, John (3), was the first settled pastor of the first meeting-house in New Jersey, founded in Middlesex in 1668, and he gave the lot on which the first meeting-house in that place was built. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vi, 12.

Brown, John (4), a minister of the Scotch Church at Rotterdam, died in 1673. He published, Christ the Way, the Truth, and the Life (1677):—Quakerism the Pathway to Popery, in answer to R. Rolfe's A Dialogue between a Priest and a Quaker (1678):—An Explanation of the Epistle to the Romans (1679). In theology he was a Calvinist of the old school, and a man of learning and piety. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Brown, John (5), a Unitarian minister of Haverhill, Mass., was born in 1706, and died in 1752. He published a Sermon on the Death of Thomas Symmes (1726).

Brown, John (6), a Unitarian minister, was born at Haverhill, Mass., in 1724, and graduated at Harvard College in 1741. He was ordained and installed pastor of the Church in Cohasset, Sept. 2, 1747. He died Oct. 22, 1791. He published a sermon entitled, In what Sense the Heart is Deceiv'd. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 86.

Brown, John (7), a Presbyterian minister, was born in Ireland in 1728. He graduated at Nassau Hall in 1749, was licensed by the New Castle Presbytery, and sent to the valley of Virginia. He received a call from Timberidge and Providence, and was ordained and installed Oct. 11, 1755. He resigned his charge after a period of three years, and removed to Kentucky. He died in 1809. See Index to Princeton Review. (W. P. S.)

Brown, John (8), an English Wesleyan minister, was born in Helsme Black-moor, in Yorkshire, in 1782. He was converted in his sixteenth year, and, three years after, he left the farm for the ministry. He preached at Bathtwick-upon-Dearne, 1804, at Liverpool, Manchester, and Wakefield. While attending the Conference at Sheffield (1811), he was seized with cataract fever; this was aggravated by his journey, first to his native place, and then to London, to which city he was appointed by the Conference, so that he died soon after his arrival, Sept. 17, 1811. "In mental vigor, moral worth, studious diligence, ministerial ability and spiritual usefulness, he excelled most of his contemporaries." See Minutes of the British Conference, 1812; Wel Meth. Magazine, 1819, p. 241.

Brown, John (9) (of Ossawatomie), a fanatical reformer, was born at Torrington, Conn., May 9, 1800. He removed to Ohio in early youth, and became a tanner and quarryman. In 1820 he became removed to the idea of liberating the southern slaves, and retained it during the rest of his life. In 1846 he removed to Springfield, Mass., and engaged in the wool trade, and afterwards visited Europe. In 1855 he emigrated to Kansas, where he took an active part in the anti-slavery struggle. In May, 1859, he called a secret convention of the friends of freedom, which met at Chatham, Canada, and organized an invasion of Virginia for the purpose of liberating the slaves, and adopted a constitution. In July of that year he rented a farm-house about six miles from Harper's Ferry, and collected there a supply of pikes, guns, and munitions. On the night of Oct. 16, with the aid of about twenty men, he surprised Harper's Ferry, captured the arsenal and armory, and took over forty prisoners. "About noon the next day his party was attacked and defeated by the Virginia militia, and himself wounded and taken prisoner. He was tried in November, and hung at Charleston, Va., Dec. 2, 1860." He was a devout member of a Congregational church, and a man of strict moral character, unflinching courage, and intense earnestness. He met his death with the composure of a hero. See Redpath, Life of Captain John Brown (1860); Webb, Life and Letters of Captain John Brown (London, 1861); Greeley, American Conflict (vol. 1). Brown, John (10), an English Congregational minister, was born at Denny, Stirling, April 24, 1811. He was early converted, and began to labor in the Christian cause. In 1833 he entered Blackburn Academy, and in 1837 he became the pastor of the churches of Wirksworth and Middleton, in Derbyshire, where he remained nineteen years. In 1857, after a brief period of rest, he accepted the pastorate of the churches of Hambledon and Skirrment, near Henley-on-Thames, where he continued for eleven years. In 1868 symptoms of failing health led him to remove into Shropshire, and after two years, the entire failure of his health caused him to retire to Matlock, where he died, March 22, 1860. See (London) Cong. Year-book, 1861, p. 359.

Brown, John (11), an English Wesleyan minister, father of Rev. John Brown, who began his ministry in 1822, commenced his long career in the sacred office in 1807. He preached in England until 1816, when he and James Catta were sent to commence a Wesleyan mission in Hayti, W. L., being the first Protestant missionaries to enter the French-speaking part of St. Domingo. After two years' effort they were compelled to leave Port au Prince in consequence of the riotous opposition of the natives, stimulated by the Roman Catholic priesthood, the feeble republican government being unable to afford them protection (this mission was re-established in 1834 by John Tindal). Resuming his labors at home, he was appointed to several circuits of the most important circuits in the district, and, after a short time, he retired from the activities of the traveling ministry, and settled in Chelsea, London. He died Aug. 11, 1867, in his eighty-second year. Mr. Brown's habits were retiring, his spirit peaceful and benevolent, his pastoral vigilance and kind, his sermons instructive and serious. He was well beloved by the theologians who spoke of him, and beloved by his brethren. A few of his sermons were published, and he translated a memoir from the French. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1868, p. 10.

Brown, John (12), an English Wesleyan missionary, received his first appointment in 1841 to St. Christopher, W. L., after having attended the theological institution. He labored successfully until removed by a short affliction to his eternal rest, Sept. 17, 1843, aged twenty-four years. He was distinguished for piety, love of souls, and discretion. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1844.

Brown, John C., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the dioceose of New Jersey, was born in New York city in 1828. He was ordained deacon in 1846; priest in 1847; and became rector of Christ Church, New York, in 1850; of St. Mary's, Jersey City, in 1859; of St. Paul's, Trenton, from 1862 to 1877; and died in Trenton, March 28, 1877. See Prot. Epc. Almanac, 1878, p. 168.

Brown, John D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Kishacoquillas Valley, Pa., Nov. 8, 1834, and was left dependent on his own resources very early in life by the death of his father. In 1851 he was a common-school teacher, and in 1853 he entered the Tuscarora Academy and Jefferson College; and in 1859 entered the East Baltimore Conference. In 1861 he volunteered as a missionary to India, sailed in August of that year, and about one year after his arrival was preaching to that people in their native language. While in India his fields of labor were Moradabad, February to November, 1862; Shahjehanpoor, December, 1862, to December, 1864; and Seetaipoor, January, 1865, to 1870, when the failing health of his wife obliged him to return to America. While in Seetaipoor Mr. Brown translated into the native language, Church Paddy, by bishop Morris, Elements of Christianity; and The Indian Youth; Whirlpool of Intemperance, and many valuable works. He was also the author and publisher of Inquirer after Truth, and many other valuable Sunday-school books. On his arrival home he immediately began a diligent representation, among various churches, of the foreign mission work. In 1871 he was given charge of First Church, Carlisle, Pa. At the end of the year, his wife's health having recovered, he sailed again for India. He first settled in Shahjehanpoor, where he served as a member of the publishing committee in addition to teaching and preaching. Thence he went to Farelly, where for nearly three years he devoted his time to ministerial duties, the translation of the Berean Sunday-school lessons, and devising Sunday-school picture-books for the natives. His health then becoming too feeble for the severity of the climate, he again returned to the home of his childhood in 1876. After an interval he was appointed to the Board of Foreign Conference for work, and was appointed to traverse it as Sunday-school and tract agent. He made Harrisburg his home, and died there Feb. 17, 1878. Mr. Brown's love and zeal for the missionary cause were unbounded. He was a man of strong faith. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1881, pp. 36.

Brown, John, Hovee, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Kentucky, and spent the greater part of his ministerial life there. He was a pastor in Richmond, and afterwards in Lexington. In 1854 he was stated supply at Jacksonsville, Ill.; in 1855 he removed to Springfield, where he ministered to the First and Second Presbyterian Churches. His last field of labor was in Chicago, where he spent two years, and died Feb. 23, 1872, aged seventy-seven years. He was a man of note in the pulpit. See (N. Y.) Presbyterian, March 9, 1872.

Brown, John M., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Mayfield, N. Y., Aug. 12, 1833. He removed to Steuben County, Ind., about 1853; served as a soldier in the Federal army over three years; in 1870 began preaching, and served the close of that year entering the North Indiana Conference, wherein he labored with zeal and fidelity until his sudden death, Jan. 18, 1878. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1878, p. 53.

Brown, John Newton, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at New London, Conn., June 29, 1803. When quite young his parents removed to Hudson, N. Y. He pursued his studies at the Hamilton Literary and Theological Institution (now Madison University), and graduated with an honorable standing in 1828. Shortly afterwards he was settled as pastor of the Church in Buffalo, and then at Malden, Mass., and Exeter, N. H. In 1853 he took up his residence in Boston, in order to prepare his Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge. See Encyclopedia, Exeter Magazine, 1858; Sprague, Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1878, p. 53.

Brown, John Snowden, an English Congregational minister, was born at Birmingham in 1801. His earliest religious experience was among the Wesleyan Methodists, and he spent some time in preaching under the direction of that denomination, particularly in Cornwall. He afterwards entered Western College, Plymouth, with the design of preparing himself to preach among the Congregationalists. In 1847 he accepted an invitation to become a pastorate at Maryport, York- shire, where he labored with eminent success until his death, near the close of January, 1879. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1880, p. 312.

Brown, John Walker, a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born Aug. 21, 1814, in Schenectady, N. Y. At the age of fourteen he entered Union College, and graduated in 1832 with distinguished honors. In the following year he entered the General Theological Seminary, and, having completed his course, was ordained deacon in 1836, and immediately began his ministry at Astoria, L. I.; serving at the same time as assistant to Rev. Dr. Lyell of Christ Church, New York city. He was ordained priest in 1838, and in May of that year he established the Astoria Female Institute, with which he was connected for seven years, when he became editor of the Protestant Churchman. A bronchial affection became so threatening in the later part of 1848 that he took a voyage to Europe. His editorial correspondence while abroad is written in his graceful and vigorous style. He reached Malta about the middle of March, and died there, April 9, 1849. He was singularly modest, and was a writer of no ordinary ability. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1849, p. 445; Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v. 739.

Brown, Jonathan (1), an English Wesleyan minis-

Brown, John, was born near Stanhope, in Weardale, about 1750. He was converted at the age of twenty-two, and was admitted into the Connection in 1778. His first field was the Isle of Man; he labored six years in Ireland, and then returned to his ministerial life at the northern part of England. He became a superintendence in 1817, and died at Hull, Aug. 2, 1825. He labored on twenty-four circuits, on seventeen of which he gathered in many new members. He was diligent, mighty in earnest, and frequently spent whole nights in prayer. See West. Meth. Magazine, 1826, p. 506; Minutes of the British Conference, 1826.

Brown, Jonathan (2), a Presbyterian minister, was born at Pittsfield, N. H., in 1757. He graduated at Dartmouth College in 1789; was ordained and installed as minister of the East parish in Londonderry in 1795; was dismissed at his own request in September, 1804; and died in the place where he had exercised his ministry, in 1855. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 411.

Brown, Jonathan (3), an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Weardale, Sept. 26, 1785. He was converted at the age of sixteen, and in 1805 was appointed to the Inverness circuit. He labored in the itinerancy for thirteen years, one of his circuits being Keighley, in 1808, and his last, Salford. In 1818 he became a missionary to India, and settled in Calcutta. He died Dec. 14, 1819. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1820; West. Meth. Magazine, 1820, p. 561 sq.

Brown, Jonathan (4), a Baptist minister, was born at Marblehead, Mass., Jan. 21, 1790. His early life was spent in hard struggles with poverty. At the age of twenty-eight he united with the Church, and soon yielded to a conviction that it was his duty to preach the Gospel. About 1837 he moved to Adams County, Ill., and was ordained in 1851. He was pastor of the churches in Centreville and Hodley Creek, in Brown Co. He found great delight in preaching as an evangelist among feeble churches and destitute neighborhoods, for which service he neither asked nor received compensation. In 1866 he was removed to Quincy, where he died, March 25, 1875. See Minutes of Illinois Annual Conferences, 1875, p. 9, 10. (J. C. S.)

Brown, Joseph, (1) an English Baptist minister, was born in Coventry, in June, 1730. He was educated under Dr. Doddridge, at Northampton, who appointed him as his assistant in his lectures on experimental philosophy. For all branches of natural sciences he had a special bent, and, though his time was chiefly given to the taste for the mechanic arts. He afterwards became a Baptist, and was ordained, his first settlement being at Downton, in Wiltshire, and his second at Fair Street, Horsley Down. After several removals he finally accepted a call to the Church at Depford. For many years Mr. Brown was secretary to the General Assembly of the Baptists. He died May 21, 1803. See Wilson, Hist. of the Dissenting Churches, iv, 262, 263. (J. C. S.)

Brown, Joseph (2), an English minister of the Society of Friends, was born at Loughton, West Riding, Yorkshire, in 1751. His occupation, for many years, was that of constructing dry stone fences. With his utmost efforts, he found it hard to earn enough to support his large family of thirty children. In 1795 he came forth in the ministry, and labored to the best of his ability, chiefly in his own immediate vicinity. In 1795 he was committed to York castle, and subsequently was thrown into prison because of his refusal to pay tithes for the support of the Established Church. He was discharged at the end of two years, and was able afterwards to comfort others in like circumstances "with the comfort wherewith he had been comforted of God." He died a peaceful death, June 28, 1803. See Piety Promoted, iii, 318-20. (J. C. S.)

Brown, Joseph (3), a Presbyterian minister, was born in Robeson County, N. C., Aug. 17, 1795. He was edicated at Philadelphia, N. C., and at the Union Theological Seminary of Virginia, and was licensed by the Fayetteville Presbytery in 1830. In 1838 he was ininstalled pastor of Hopewell Church, S. C., in Harmony Presbytery, May 19, 1839. See Wilson, Prob. Hist. Almanac, 1860, p. 67.

Brown, Joseph (4), a Congregational minister, was born in Chester, England, and preached in that country. After arriving in America, he was settled as pastor of the Second Church in Exeter, N. H., Nov. 20, 1792, and remained in that position until 1795. In January, 1796, he was installed pastor of the Natick Meeting, Mass., and remained there until May, 1804. The following year he was installed pastor in Alfred, Nov. 13, and was dismissed in 1809. In the same year he was installed pastor at Deer Isle; and he died in September, 1819. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ii, 211.

Brown, Joseph (5), an English Wesleyan minister, was born in 1692. He was converted at the age of twenty, soon after became a zealous local preacher, and entered the itinerancy in 1698. He died Dec. 31, 1832. He was a young man of studious habits, modesty, piety, faithfulness in labor, and resignation in affliction. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1833.

Brown, Joseph (6), a Presbyterian minister, was born in Rockbridge County, Va., Sept. 24, 1809. He was licensed in 1834 by the Lexington Presbytery; ordained by the same at Augusta Church, Oct. 26, 1836. He graduated at Washington College in 1830, after which he spent two years in teaching; entered Princeton Seminary in 1833, and graduated in 1835. He accepted calls, Sept. 7, 1837, from the two churches Spring Creek and Oak Grove, and was installed as their pastor by the Presbytery of Greenbrier. Here he labored until 1847. This was his first and only pastorate. Most of his ministerial work was of a missionary character, usually in frontier settlements and among the colored population. He spent six years in preaching to the colored people in Mississippi. He taught in Little Levels Academy and Lewisburg Academy, and as assistant in a parochial school, Memphis, Tenn.; a grammar-school near Natchez, Miss.; and as principal of Locust-lawn School for Females. From 1828 to 1879 he resided in Florida at Clearwater Harbor, where he gradually gathered, watched over, and supplied the Andrews Memorial Church. He, in 1830, near the same place, where he died, Feb. 14, 1880. Mr. Brown was a devout, self-sacrificing man, clear in his convictions and a thorough-going Presbyterian. See Necrological Report of Princeton Theol. Seminary, 1880, p. 19.

Brown, Joseph (7), a Baptist minister, was born at Wickford, R. I., and graduated from Yale College in 1844. For some time he was a school teacher in the Pittsburgh Female Seminary, and subsequently was ordained at Gallipolis, O., over a church organized by himself. For ten years he had charge of a church in Springfield, O., and in 1860 he became pastor of the Church in Terre Haute, Ind. He removed, in 1870, to Indianapolis, and for five years was the corresponding secretary of the Indiana State Convention. After a protracted illness, he died Aug. 11, 1878. See Cathcart, Baptists Encyclop., p. 146. (J. C. S.)

Brown, Joseph (8), a Cumberland Presbyterian minister, was born in Surry County, N. C., Aug. 2, 1772. In 1788, his father, colonel James Brown, attempted to move his family from North Carolina to the Cumberland country by boat. Young Joseph was in the company. The boat was attacked by Indians, his father was killed, he was taken prisoner, and it was determined to kill him also, but he was spared for the sake of an expected ransom. After remaining a captive eleven years, he was exchanged for a prisoner, 1812, restored him to freedom. In 1794 he was guide to an expedition against the Indians, which resulted in the destruction of their towns. During the Creek War of 1812 he accompanied general Jackson as aide-de-camp and interpreter, with the rank of colonel. He subsequently had an opportunity to avenge his father's death by the capture of his murderer, Cuttey Ooty, but mercifully spared his life. In 1798, after the close of the Indian war in which he had so greatly distinguished himself, he settled his family on White's Creek, near Nashville, Tenn., and became a ruling elder in the Presbyterian Church. Occasionally, through life, he had paroxysms of bodily jerking, while engaged in prayer—one of the remarkable phenomena of the revival of 1800, in which he was an active participant.

Brown, Joseph, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Bedford County, Va., July 27, 1807. He was converted at the age of twelve, and in 1830 admitted into the Virginia Conference. Loss of health obliged him to become supernumerary in 1844; after five years he again became effective, and labored for two years. He then became again supernumerary, and remained such until his decease, Feb. 20, 1846. Mr. Brown was an excellent preacher, and highly successful. See Minutes of Annual Conference of the M. E. Church South, 1846, p. 71.

Brown, Joshua Rogers, a Congregational minister, was born at Stowington, Conn., June 14, 1812. He was converted in the great revival of 1831; graduated from Yale College, and studied theology at Yale and Andover, graduating at the latter seminary in 1841; and was ordained over the Second Congregational Church in Lebanon, Conn., in 1845, where he labored with universal success for eight years. On April 5, 1854, he was installed pastor of the Church in East Longmeadow, Mass., where he remained until his death, Sept. 7, 1858. See Cong. Quarterly, 1859, p. 99.

Brown, Josiah H., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born about 1810. He began his itinerant career in 1832, in the Troy Conference, and continued eleven years, when he became supernumerary, and established himself as physician at Stockdale Hill, and there resided until his death, Jan. 7, 1855. Mr. Brown was ardent in temperament, excitable, warm and true in friendship, but often given to melancholy. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1855, p. 540.

Brown, J. Fearnor, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Bald Eagle Township, Clinton Co., Pa., July 19, 1831. He was converted at thirteen. When quite young he entered Dickinson Seminary (Williamsport), and by farming and teaching, to obtain money, struggled hard for an education. In 1859 he joined the East Baltimore Conference. He served faithfully fourteen charges within its boundaries. He died at Montgomery, Pa., Dec. 8, 1890. He was a scriptural, practical, evangelical preacher, and a man of cheerful humor, pure life, and chaste conversation. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1881, p. 77.

Brown (or Brown), Moses, an English clergyman, was born in 1703, and learned the trade of a pen-cutter. Early in life he distinguished himself by his poetical talents, and devoted himself to literary pursuits. In 1738 he took holy orders, and soon became vicar of Olney, in Buckinghamshire. Some time afterwards he was appointed vicar of Sutton, in Lincolnshire, and in 1763 he was elected chaplain of Morden College, Kent, where he died, Sept. 13, 1787. His publications include Poems and devotional and literary subjects (1773):—Sunday Thoughts (1752);—Percy Lodge, a poem (1755);—Sermons (1754–65); and other works. See Chalmer, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.
Brown, Nehemiah, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Canterbury, Conn., June 11, 1791. After leaving college he studied divinity. He was for a time principal of Clinton Academy, in East Hampton, L. I. He was ordained and installed eighth pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in Hopkinton, Oct. 18, 1824. In consequence of failing health he resigned this charge, June 25, 1832, and removed to New York city. Here he was for several years principal of the Pickett School, and he afterwards taught a collegiate school in Washington, D. C., but returned to New York to pass his latter years. He died Jan. 5, 1876. See Obituary Record of Yale College, 1876.

Brown, Nicholas, Hon., an eminent merchant and philanthropist, was born in Providence, R. I., April 4, 1769. He was descended from Mr. Chad Brown, a companion of Roger Williams. At thirteen years of age he entered what was then Rhode Island College, graduated in 1786, and at once entered upon a mercantile career. Through a long life he was the far-seeing, large-hearted, benevolent merchant, forecasting results with great sagacity, and laying the foundation of institutions, the beneficent influences of which were to extend to coming ages. His private charities were unstinted. He did not make a public profession of religion, but the acts of his life furnish the best proof that he was a Christian at heart. At his own expense, he published some of the most impressive sermons of President Edwards, and several religious works of a practical character, for gratuitous distribution. He was a warm friend of the American Tract Society, and a liberal contributor to its funds so long as he lived. He united with some other gentlemen in procuring stereotype plates of Dodridge's Rise and Progress of Religion and Baxter's Saints' Rest, which were given to the society for their use in the publication of these excellent works. Mr. Brown was also one of the most munificent founders of the Providence Athenæum. His benefactions to the university which has since borne his name commenced in 1792 by his giving $500 towards the purchase of a law library. In 1804 he gave $5000 as a foundation for a professorship of oratory and belles-lettres. In 1822 he built at his own expense "Hope College," so named in honor of his sister, Mrs. Hope Ives. In 1833 he erected and presented to the corporation "Manning Hall," thus called to keep alive the memory of the first president of the college, Rev. Dr. James Manning. It is estimated that the value of all his gifts to the university could not have been less than $100,000. Mr. Brown died Sept. 27, 1841. (J. C. S.)

Brown, Obadiah B., a Baptist minister, was born in New York, N. J., July 20, 1778. He was licensed in 1806, and first preached at Salem. In February, 1807, he removed to Washington city, and in May following was called to the pastorate of the First Baptist Church there. During his stay in Washington he became chief clerk under the postmaster-general. He died May 2, 1852. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vi, 598.

Brown, Oliver Eldridge, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Huntington, L. L., in 1818. He received a careful religious training from his devout widowed mother, experienced religion at the age of seventeen, graduated at Wesleyan University in 1833, and in 1844 entered the New York Conference; in the active rank of which he continued until his death, July 28, 1857. Mr. Brown was distinguished for his consistent life, deep piety, and faithful ministry. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1858, p. 147.

Brown, Orsmus P., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in 1809. He was converted in 1820, licensed to preach in 1821, and in 1827 was the Erie Conference. In 1855 he was transferred to the Wisconsin Conference, and died near Janesville, Jan. 24, 1857. Mr. Brown was true to his calling, indefatigable in labor, faithful in all his life-duties, a warm friend, and a devoted Christian. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1857, p. 375.

Brown, Paul R., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Cornwall, N. Y., March 4, 1801. He was converted in early life. In 1828 he entered the New York Conference, and received for his first field of labor Delaware District, then having thirty-three years—the longest being four winters, and requiring four weeks' travel of two hundred and fifty miles to visit them. His subsequent stations were Jefferson, New York East, Newburgh, Middletown, and New Rochelle. In 1838 he was tried and severely censured for his abolition principles, and appointed junior preacher on the New York Conference Circuit. He afterwards served Redding, Stratford, and Hartford, Conn.; Williamsburgh, Green Street (N. Y. city), White Plains, Yonkers, Peekskill, and Pleasantville, N. Y.; in 1856, Monticello district; in 1860, Prattsville district; in 1864, New Palz Landing; in 1865-66, Ellenville; in 1867-70, Rhinebeck district; in 1871-72, Tremont; and in 1873 he became superannuated. He died at Tarrytown, Oct. 1, 1879. Mr. Brown was a loyal, judicious, and kind presiding officer; a thoughtful, able, and effective preacher; an excellent pastor, and a devoted friend. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1880, p. 43.

Brown, Peter, (1) an Irishman, was bishop of Cork and Ross, to which see he was promoted in 1708, and died Nov. 17, 1735. He left many works, among them A Reply to the Infidel Toland (Dublin, 1697, 8vo)—On the Custom of Drinking to the Memory of the Dead, in reply to a divine who justified the practice (ibid. 1715, 12mo)—On the Evil of Drinking Healths (1716, 1722). He also wrote works on a remark of the bishop of Raphoe, entitled A Cloze and Easy Method, by means of which a moderate capacity is enabled, to a satisfactory knowledge of the things which belong to his eternal salvation (ibid. 1716). See Ware, Irish Bishops (ed. Harris).—Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Brown, Peter, (2), a colored Methodist Episcopal minister, was born a slave at Norfolk, Va., in 1821. He was taught to sing hymns by his first master, who was a minister; experienced conversion at the age of sixteen; was sold twice, and finally liberated by the declaration of emancipation; became a member of the Louisiana Conference, and in it labored faithfully and successfully for many years, dying at his post in 1873. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1880, p. 8.

Brown, Philip P., a Baptist minister, was born at Bennington, Vt., Sept. 17, 1780. He was ordained Oct. 17, 1821, as pastor of the Church at Smithfield, N. Y., and continued for more than twenty years. His second pastorate was with the Church at Augusta, Oneida Co., where he had a most fruitful ministry for fifteen years. He was pastor of six different churches between the years 1830 and 1850. During all this period he assisted in revivals, and his labors were greatly blessed. He died Dec. 23, 1876. See (N. Y.) Examiner and Chronicle. (J. C. S.)

Brown, Richard (1), D.D., an English clergyman, was a canon of Christ Church, and became regius professor of Hebrew at Oxford University, Nov. 12, 1774. He died March 20, 1780. He published, John's Expectation of a Resurrection (1747)—and The Case of Naaman Considered (1750). See Le Neve, Fasti; Albion, Dict. of Bibles, s. v. Brown, Richard (2), D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Wellsburg, W. Va., Feb. 1, 1796. He graduated at Jefferson College, Pa., in 1822. He entered Princeton Seminary the same year, and graduated in 1826. During 1824-25 he was agent for the Western Missionary Society. He was licensed to preach Dec. 29, 1824, by the Washington Presbytery, and ordained by the same body at Wheeling, Va. His first settlement was over the united charge of Congress, Mount Hope, and Rehoboth; he afterwards changed to Jeromeville, O., where he was installed by the Presby-tory of Richland in 1829. In 1832 he was made pastor of Three Springs Church, Va. In 1836 he was installed pastor at New Hagerstown, O., where he worked twenty-two years. He then went to Oak Ridge, and remained until 1861. In 1862 he returned to New Hagerstown, where he supplied different churches until his death.

He made a missionary trip to the Iowas and Maumee, and another along the New York and Pennsylvania line for the Ladies' Missionary Society of Princeton, N.J. He was appointed agent of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions.

He died April 12, 1879. Dr. Brown led a blameless and consistent life.

He was a model pastor, excellent in counsel, and fondly loved by all classes. See Necrological Report of Princeton Theol. Seminary, 1880, p. 13.

Brown, Richard (3), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born near Friendship, Anne Arundel Co., Md., May 30, 1799. He experienced conversion when about nineteen, and was doing a flourishing mercantile business when he entered the itineracy in 1827. His labors were confined to the Baltimore and East Baltimore Conferences. He died at his home in Howard County, Md., Aug. 5, 1859. Mr. Brown's ministry was solid, instructing, and soul-converting. He excelled as a manager of camp-meetings; was highly esteemed for his genial spirit, sincerity, and steadfastness. See Minutes of Conference, 1860, 21.

Brown, Robert Alexander, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Montreal, Canada, Dec. 13, 1800. He pursued his studies in Wilmington, Del., and in 1826 entered the Princeton Theological Seminary, where he remained two years. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Philadelphia in April, 1826. During the summer of 1826 he supplied the Second and Arch Street churches. In the same year he was received into the Presbytery of Chicago, and accepted a call to become pastor of the North Church in that city. This relation was dissolved July 21, 1827. Soon after he accepted a call to Hagerstown, Md., and was installed by the Presbytery of Carlisle, Oct. 17, 1828. His pastoral relation was dissolved in 1861, but he continued to labor at Hagerstown as a stated supply till 1862. He served from 1864 to 1868 the Church of Columbia, Pa. In 1870 he became pastor of Trinity Church, Philadelphia. In 1874-75 he supplied the Church at Smyrna, Del., and he died Nov. 24, 1877. See Necrological Report of Princeton Theol. Seminary, 1876, p. 92.

Brown, Rowland Hill, a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the diocese of Central Pennsylvania, was assistant minister of St. David's Church, Manayunk, Pa., in 1860. The following year he was rector of the Memorial Church of St. John, Ashland; in 1864 he was employed as missionary to Lewistown, Pa.; the following year he was rector of three churches viz., Trinity Church in Lewistown, Christ Church in Milton, and St. James's in Anthony. In 1867 he was rector of St. John's Church in Salem, and Zion's Church in Stirling. He died at Salem, March 6, 1880, aged fifty-one years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1881, p. 172.

Brown, Samuel (1), a Presbyterian minister, was born in Beverly, Nov. 17, 1814. He was educated at Washington College; was licensed by the Hanover Presbytery in April, 1798, and labored as a missionary in Eastern Virginia until 1796, at which time he accepted a call to become the pastor of the Presbytery congregation of New Providence. He here spent the remainder of his life as a faithful and zealous minister, and died in October, 1818. See Sprague, Annales of the Amer. Pulpit, iii, 74.

Brown, Samuel (2), an English Wesleyan minister, was born in 1817 in Cheshire. He was converted in 1807; became a local preacher in 1809; was received by the Conference in 1816; labored in Sierra Leone from 1819 to 1829; and in England from 1823 to 1851, when failing health compelled him to retire from the full work. In 1858 he returned, as a supernumerary, to the scene of his early labors in Sierra Leone, where he spent three useful years. He died in Liverpool, England, Oct. 5, 1861. See Minutes of The British Conference, 1862, p. 12.

Brown, Samuel (3), an English Congregational minister, was born at Taunton in 1792. He converted while he was a young man, and in 1807 he removed to Devonshire, where he became a minister. In 1812 he removed to Liverpool, where he entered into business, and became engaged in a banking establishment. Mr. Brown's first and only charge was at Ashton, near Bristol, where he was ordained Jan. 28, 1827, and died June 16, 1862. He was eminent for his piety, charity, and soundness in faith. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-Book, 1843, p. 218.

Brown, Samuel (4), an English Congregational minister, was a descendant of one of the oldest Nonconformist families in the county of Cumberland. He was destined by his friends for mercantile life, but after his conversion at the age of twenty, he desired to become a missionary. He was, however, persuaded to study for the ministry at home, and spent four years at Highbury in preparing for the work. By invitation of the Irish Evangelical Society he took charge of the small Independent congregation at Tralee, Ireland, in December, 1843. He labored with true missionary zeal in this field until declining health forced him to relinquish his work. He returned to England, and died June 28, 1847. (See (Lond.) Cong. Year-Book, 1848, p. 214.

Brown, Samuel (5), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Monmouth County, N. J., May 12, 1806. He was early brought under the influence of the Friends, his parents probably being members of that society, which accounts for his life-long aversion to formality and display in religious services. He joined the Methodists in his fifteenth year; was licensed to preach in early manhood; and in 1841 entered the Ohio Conference. On the division of that conference in 1852 he became a member of the Cincinnati Conference, in which he continued to the close of his life. In 1869 he became superannuated, and settled on his farm in Miami County, where he remained until his death, Sept. 23, 1876. Mr. Brown's life was exemplary and abundantly successful. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1877, p. 89.

Brown, Samuel (6), an English Wesleyan Methodist minister, was born at Newcastle-under-Lyme, Jan. 8, 1811. He was converted at the age of seventeen, began business in Guernsey, and entered the ministry in 1835; was very successful in the conversion of sinners; labored for souls night and day; rested for three years, 1866-69; finally retired in 1877; settled at Swaffham, and died Feb. 19, 1879. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1879, p. 13.

Brown, Samuel Henry, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Virginia. He was the youngest son of Rev. J. B. Brown, D.D., of Charleston, Va. After receiving a preparatory education at home, Samuel was sent to Washington College, where he graduated in 1849. After taking two years in a classical academy he entered Princeton Theological Seminary, where he remained until 1852, during which time he failed his health, returned to Charleston and completed his theological course under the tuition of his father, and was licensed to preach by the Greenbrier Presbytery. He took a tour in the bounds of the Presbytery, visiting its vacant churches and mission-fields. He was called to supply the Church of New Providence, in the Lexington Presbytery, and in 1855 he was ordained and installed pastor of the united congregations of Frankford, Spring Creek and Anthony Creek, where he labored with great efficiency and success until his death at Frankford, Aug. 1, 1857. (W. P. S.)

Brown, Samuel Robbins, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Scantic Parish, East Windsor, Conn., June 16, 1810. He entered Amherst College in 1828; graduated at Yale College in 1832; and then spent three years and a half as teacher in the New York Institute for the Deaf and Dumb. In 1853 he went to Columbia, S. C., and studied theology for two years in the Presbyterian Theological Seminary. Returning to New York, he finished his studies at the Union Seminary in 1858, and was accepted by the American Board as a foreign missionary. He was invited to go to China, but declined this Mission, and became a member of the Mississippi Synod of the United States in Cincinnati, and for about eighteen months he fulfilled this duty in addition to his pastoral work. In 1857 he ministered to the Congregational Church at Lebanon, and organized the Congregational Church of Waynesville. From 1857 to 1868 he was, for the most part, in the eastern states, near the outside of Oswego lake, near Auburn, as pastor of a very feeble Reformed Dutch Church, where he remained eight years. Early in 1859 the Reformed Dutch Church's Board of Foreign Missions determined to send a mission to Japan, and Mr. Brown was appointed one of the missionaries. He sailed for China in April, and in November established himself in Japan, which continued to be his residence until 1879, with the exception of two years. Protracted illness obliged him to return to America. He died in Monson, Mass., June 20, 1880. To Dr. Brown's influence, by means of his pupils, much of the recent development of China is justly due. His work was more striking and fruitful, in connection with the education and the study of the Japanese language and the translation of the Bible. See Obituary Record of Yale College, 1880.

Brown, Samuel Watson, a Congregational minister, was born in Winchendon, Mass., April 7, 1828. He graduated at Yale College in 1850, and immediately began the study of law at Philadelphia, in the office of Judge Mathay. This course means to further prosecute his studies, he taught about a year in New Jersey, and for several years in Matagorda, Tex. In the spring of 1855 he returned to the North and resumed his law studies, but soon abandoned the profession. In the latter part of the same year he took a share in a store at Ludlow, Vt. He closed his business in 1858, and went to Chicago, entering the theological seminary there; but in the following year he began to study theology at the Andover Seminary. He was ordained Dec. 31, 1861, and became the stated supply of the Church at South Coventry for two and a half years ensuing, in 1864, he was installed pastor of the Church at Groton, Mass., and died there Nov. 9, 1866. See Cong. Quarterly, 1868, p. 45.

Brown, Simeon (1), a Baptist minister, was born at North Stonington, Conn., Jan. 21, 1722. He was converted under Whitefield's preaching in 1745, but left the "standing order," and became a Baptist in 1764. He assisted in the organization of the Second Baptist Church in North Stonington, in March, 1785, was ordained its pastor, and remained such for fifty years, having an assistant for a part of the time. He died Nov. 24, 1815. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclopedia, p. 148. (J. C. S.)

Brown, Simeon (2), a Congregational minister, was born in Washington County, Pa., Nov. 25, 1808, from the time of his conversion, in his seventeenth year, in Japan was turned toward missionary work. He entered Jefferson College, Cannonsburg, Pa., in 1829; after a period of theological study, was licensed by the Presbytery of Richland, O.; and in June, 1835, was ordained and took charge of the Church in Harmony. Having labored here two years and a half, he accepted a call to the Church at Zanesville, and was installed pastor of the First Presbyterian Church at Zanesville, where he remained six years. In 1844 he became pastor of the First Presbyterian Church at Pleasant Ridge, near Cincinnati. While pastor of Fredericktown, Mr.

Brown established a religious monthly, called the Cynicistic Monitor. After eight numbers were issued it became the Family Monitor, Rev. John A. Dunlap being associated with him in the editorship; and about a year later the name was again changed to The Presbyterian of the West, when Mr. Brown ceased to act as editor. In 1858 Rev. Willis Lord, D.D., and he became editors. In 1857 the Monitor was reorganized by Mr. Brown in Cincinnati, and for about eighteen months he fulfilled this duty in addition to his pastoral work. In 1857 he ministered to the Congregational Church at Lebanon, and organized the Congregational Church of Waynesville. From 1857 to 1868 he was, for the most part, in the eastern states, near the outside of Oswego lake, near Auburn, as pastor of a very feeble Reformed Dutch Church, where he remained eight years. Early in 1859 the Reformed Dutch Church's Board of Foreign Missions determined to send a mission to Japan, and Mr. Brown was appointed one of the missionaries. He sailed for China in April, and in November established himself in Japan, which continued to be his residence until 1879, with the exception of two years. Protracted illness obliged him to return to America. He died in Monson, Mass., June 20, 1880. To Dr. Brown's influence, by means of his pupils, much of the recent development of China is justly due. His work was more striking and fruitful, in connection with the education and the study of the Japanese language and the translation of the Bible. See Obituary Record of Yale College, 1880.

Brown, Stephen D., D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Swanton, Vt., Sept. 13, 1813. He was the third of five sons, one of whom, Amasa Brown, was a prominent lawyer and jurist in the state, and grandson of Rev. Amasa Brown, who for more than forty years was pastor of the Baptist Church in Hartford, N.Y. Mr. Brown was naturally inclined to the practice of law. He received a thorough academic training; very early developed remarkable talents as a debater, and was admitted to practice at the bar of New York at an early age. No young lawyer in Vermont made more rapid progress during the two following years, or bid more fairly for early eminence, than Stephen D. Brown. In 1837 he was led by his own convictions and the counsel of his pastor to devote his life to the ministry; received a license to exhort; immediately began to preach and study theology, and in that same year entered the Troy Conference. His conversion and consecration to the Methodist ministry marked an epoch in the history of Vermont Methodism. His high social position, ripe culture, fine talents, matchless eloquence, and fervent piety gave vast impetus to the cause of Methodism throughout the state. His first three years in the ministry were spent among minor appointments, after which he stood in the front rank and held the most important positions. In 1857 he was transferred to the Troy Conference; was retransferred to the Troy Conference in 1861, and in 1860 was again retransferred to the New York Conference. He died at his residence in New York city, Feb. 19, 1873. No man of his time or conferences was more popular than Dr. Brown. He was remarkably punctual in his attendance on all the means of grace, thoroughly devoted to all the interests of the Church, a favorite among his brethren, full of cheerful encouragement, and also a powerful platform speaker, taking a prominent position in favor of temperance, and advocated strongly the anti-slavery cause. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1873, p. 48; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Brown, Thaddeus Howe, a Congregational minister, was born at Billerica, Mass., June 17, 1838. He was left an orphan at the age of seven, and his home was then located at Andover, Mass., where he was prepared for college at Phillips Academy. He graduated from Yale College in 1860, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1864, having spent one year during his course in Germany. Mr. Brown next preached for six months at Pittsford, Vt., and then became pastor at the North Woodstock, N.H., congregation, where he was ordained Nov. 11, 1866, and continued to work there until the close of his life, Oct. 19, 1868. See Cong. Quarterly, 1869, p. 291.

Brown, Theophilus Southwick, a Congregational minister, was born in Mendiham, Mass., June 7, 1812. He began his ministry as a Reformed Methodist, and was subsequently pastor for thirteen years of the Old Spruce Church, South Middleborough; also preached at North Rochester, Myrickville, Wareham, and there he died on the 2d of May, 1865. He engaged in business in Ulster County, N. Y.; was similarly employed in Massachusetts until 1872, when he removed to Croton, Mich., where he died, May 20, 1880. See Cong. Year-book, 1882, p. 24.

Brown, Thomas (1), an English martyr, was born in the parish of Histon, within the diocese of Ely. Because he was not prompt in his attendance at Church, he was arrested and ordered to attend mass, which he refused to do, but instead would go into the woods, and there pray to God. For this he was brought before the bishop, and had all the articles of the Church read to him. When the bishop had finished reading, he asked Brown if he would return to the Romish Church and renounce all his books. See The Friend, viii, 278. He was then taken in haste to the place of execution and burned, Jan. 27, 1556. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, vii, 746.

Brown, Thomas (2). See Brown, Thomas.

Brown, Thomas (3), a minister of the Society of Friends, was born in Barking, Essex, England. On Sept. 1, 1696, he arrived in America, being then quite young. His parents resided for some time in Philadelphia, and resided here from April, 1705, to April, 1707. While residing here Thomas entered the ministry. Subsequently he returned to Philadelphia, entering into business so far as was necessary for a simple livelihood. In regard to his preaching it is said of him that, when he rose to speak, he pronounced a few words, and then stood for a long time silent, proceeding so very deliberately that strangers formed at first unfavorable surmises as to the result; but as he proceeded he frequently became eloquent. He was not, however, a learned man, and possessed no literary acquirements. Except attendance upon neighboring meetings, he travelled but little. During a long life, he continued to exercise his ministry in the vicinity of his home. See The Friend, viii, 278.

Brown, Thomas (4), a missionary of the Church of England, was the only child of the Rev. G. Brown of Oxford. He graduated at St. Alban's Hall; was ordained deacon, Sept. 23, 1754, and soon after came to America —with the Twenty-seventh Regiment, it is supposed, of which he was chaplain. This regiment participated in the reduction of Martinique, in February, 1752. Solomon Hasbrouck twice resided here, as he had at New York, and Petersburg, Virginia. Having returned to England, he was ordained priest, and, July 8, 1764, was appointed missionary to North America. Until 1768 he was rector of St. Peter's Church, Albany, N. Y., when he went South, and, May 30, 1772, was appointed rector of Dorchester, Md., where he died, May 2, 1784, aged forty-nine years. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 135.

Brown, Thomas (5), an Irish Wesleyan minister, was converted at the age of twenty; entered the ministry in 1790; travelled nineteen circuits; became a supernumerary in 1820, residing first at Newry and afterwards at Belfast; and died June 22, 1844, aged eighty. His mental and moral character is highly spoken of. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1844.

Brown, Thomas (6), an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Hunslet, Yorkshire, June 7, 1799. He was converted when fifteen; was accepted by the Conference in 1825; became a supernumerary in 1867; and died at Ripon, Feb. 25, 1875. He was kind to his colleagues, attentive and judicious in management, diligent in the performance of duties, and conspicuous in preaching. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1875, p. 22.

Brown, Thomas (7), a Baptist minister, was born at Newark, N. J., Nov. 1, 1779. He was brought up a Presbyterian, but early joined the Baptists, and was licensed to preach March 26, 1803. He taught school at Amboy, and studied theology. At this period he became greatly interested in foreign missions. A few months later he entered the academy at Pennepeck, Pa., where he spent two years, and then took charge of a church at Clinton, N. Y., where he was ordained in 1808. In 1808 he was called to preach at Scotch Plains, N. J., and in 1828 at Great Valley, Pa., where he died, Jan. 17, 1831. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vi, 469.

Brown, T. J., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in South Carolina in 1791. He was left an orphan at the age of seven, but received the guardianship of a devout class-leader, and gave him a thorough text to God in 1809. He was elected a member of the Tennessee Conference in 1830, and entered the Holston Conference in 1832; was transferred to the Illinois Conference in 1833, and in 1835, on the formation of the Indiana Conference, became a member of it, and labored as health permitted to the close of his life. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1860, p. 555.

Brown, Valentine, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in 1805. In 1839 he was received into the Troy Conference, and in its active ranks labored with zeal and fidelity until 1852, when failing health obliged him to retire. He was a member of the Tennessee Conference in 1852, and in 1854, Mr. Brown was a good preacher, a faithful and affectionate pastor, and a truly pious and devout man. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1855, p. 540.

Brown, William, an Irish Wesleyan minister, was born at Castlecaulfield, county Tyrone. At an early age he removed to Belfast, where he entered the Royal Academical Institution. He commenced his ministry in 1839, and has since filled the first and second circuits of the British Conference. He died in Dungannon, June 16, 1860, aged forty-two years. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1860.

Brown, William Colvin, a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the diocese of New Jersey, entered the ministry in 1854, and in 1867 was rector in Haverhill, Mass.; the next year was rector in Newport, R. I., having charge of Zion Church. In 1862 he was called to the rectoryship of St. Stephen's Church, Milburn, N. J.; and in 1867 removed to Hanover. For several years thereafter he was not regularly employed in ministerial labor. In 1876 he went to Europe. He died at Jyirgum, Mass., Sept. 8, 1880. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1881, p. 172.

Brown, William F., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in the northern part of England in 1818. He emigrated to New York city early in life; experienced religion there, and several years later moved to Mississippi, where he was licensed to preach in 1840, and in the same year entered the Mississippi Conference. On the division of that Conference in 1846 he became a member of the Louisiana Conference, and in it toiled zealously until his death, Aug. 30, 1848. Mr. Brown was a conscientious, irreproachable Christian. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1849, p. 118.

Brown, William Lawson, M.A., an English Congregational minister, was born at Kilrenny, near Anstruther, on the east coast of Fifehire, Scotland. He was educated at the high school of St. Andrews, and at the universities of Glasgow and Aberdeen. His first pastoral charge was at Lerwick, in Shetland, where he remained between two and three years from 1840. He then took charge of the Church at Liscard, in Cheshire, England, from which he removed to Bolton in 1846. Here he remained three years, and was removed to Lynn, in Norfolk, became the pastor at Totteridge chapel, where he remained twenty-three years. He resigned his charge in July, 1877, and retired to Lytham, near

Brown, William Martin, a Baptist minister, was born in Halifax County, Va., Aug. 18, 1794. He removed to Mercer County, Ky., in 1813, and in 1821 united with Bacon Creek Church, Harp Co., becoming its pastor in 1826. He continued in that relation for thirty-two years. He also, for a part of this time, had the pastoral care of the Knox Creek and South Fork churches. He travelled very extensively over that part of the state in which he lived, and under his auspices several churches were formed. He died June 8, 1861. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop., p. 146. (J. C. S.)

Brown, William R., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born near Amsterdam, N. Y., March 7, 1828. He was converted in his fifteenth year; was licensed to exhort in 1848, to preach in 1849, and in 1850 entered the Troy Conference. His educational advantages had been very limited, but by great industry and perseverance he acquired considerable literary distinction, and in his later years ranked among the ablest ministers of his conference. From 1868 he was subject to frequent attacks of hemorrhage of the lungs, disabling him much of the time for work, and eventually causing his death, June 8, 1871. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1872, p. 43.

Brown, William Shrieve, an English Baptist minister, was born at Swaffham, Norfolk, Nov. 5, 1802. He gave his heart to God and was baptized July 21, 1822, and removed to Bury St. Edmunds in the autumn of 1825. He began to preach in 1833, and labored about two years at Bardwell, in Suffolk. He was recognized as pastor of the Church at Attleborough, Norfolk, Jan. 7, 1835, where he labored with great success for about thirty years. He retired from the active work at the close of 1873, and died Jan. 13, 1874. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1875, p. 275.

Brown, W. G. E., an English Congregational minister, was born at Newbury, Nov. 8, 1806, of pious parents. He became a Sunday-school teacher at the age of sixteen; was educated at Christ Church school, and admitted into Church fellowship in 1834. He taught school at Woolhampton, Berkshire, between 1835 and 1845, and was pastor there at the same time. Thence he removed to Summertown, near Oxford, where he devoted himself entirely to the work of the ministry for three years, and then removed to Pheasant's Hill, near Henley. After two years he entered upon his last charge, at Eversley, Camberidgehire, where he died, March 12, 1875. He was a man of unblemished reputation, holy and devout; he was diligent, fervent, prudent, cheerful, and firm; he was loved by his people, and respected by the community. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1874, p. 313.

Brown, Zina H., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Jericho, Vt., Dec. 27, 1804. He was converted at the age of nineteen; licensed to exhort in 1840, to preach in 1848, and in 1856 entered the Troy Conference. In 1862 he accepted a supernumerary relation, but continued to preach until his death, May 12, 1867. He was the father of his family when he died. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1868, p. 124.

Browne, Gardiner Shepard, M.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Atstead, N. H., Sept. 12, 1810. He prepared for college at the Amos Hall Union Academy, and graduated from Dartmouth College in 1834. During the two following years he was a teacher at Nauset, and then attended theological lectures at New Haven, Conn. From 1838 to 1844 he was pastor of the Church at Hinsdale, N. H. During the three succeeding years he occupied an editorial position at the Andover Institute, New York city. In 1847 he received his medical diploma from the New York University, and from 1851 until the close of his life he practiced medicine, for a time in New York, and afterwards in Hartford, Conn. He became president of the Connecticut Homoeopathic Society in 1865; and died in Chicago, Ill., Dec. 29, 1878. See Cong. Quarterly, 1877, p. 411.

Browne, George, an English Congregational minister, was born at Clapham, Feb. 14, 1790. He received his religious training, joined the Church at 16, and received his license in 1807, and in 1810 entered Rotherham College. During his college course he preached occasionally for the Congregational pastor at Hull, and at its close became his assistant. In 1818 he was ordained pastor at St. Albans, and after laboring here six years, he preached at Clapham until 1846. In 1843 he was appointed secretary of the Bible Society, and, the society requiring his undivided energies, he complied with its wishes in 1840 by resigning his pastoral charge, and continuing in its employ. In 1854 he removed to Trumbridge Well, and in 1854 he began writing the history of the Bible Society, and completed it at a cost of 1857. He resigned his office in 1859, and in 1862 removed to Worton-super-Mare, where he died, Sept. 5, 1868. Mr. Browne was remarkable for his gentlemanly and courteous bearing, his amiable and kind disposition, combined with great firmness of purpose. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1869, p. 209.

Browne, James, an English Congregational minister, was born March 5, 1781, in Russell Street, Rotherhithe. He was brought up in a respectable education, and apprenticed him to a tradesman in the borough of Southwark. He was received into the Church when seventeen years of age. In 1800 he removed to Shoreham, Sussex. Here he first opened a Sunday-school, and afterwards hired a harnsey, in which he commenced his ministry Nov. 10, 1800. A chapel, built chiefly through his exertions, was opened on Feb. 22, 1801; and in the following August he entered Hoxton Academy, where he remained till 1804. The pastor at Halesworth being temporarily laid aside, Mr. Browne left college to assist in the work, and continued there about a year and a half. He engaged to assist Mr. Owen at Deanbyham, and afterwards supplied Steeple Bumpstead for a short time. He then went to Burnham, in Norfolk, where he laid the foundation of a chapel. In 1807 he accepted the pastorate at Bradfield; a chapel was opened in the adjoining town of North Walsham, Nov. 29, 1808, and in the following September he was ordained at Deanbyham. He continued to preach at both places till his death, April 26, 1857. He was a man of unblemished reputation, holy and devout; he was diligent, fervent, prudent, cheerful, and firm; he was loved by his people, and respected by the community. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1858, p. 126.

Browne, John R., an English Wesleyan minister, was converted in early life; entered the itinerancy in 1813; became a superannuated at Chester in 1847; and died there, Feb. 2, 1848, aged fifty-one. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1848.

Browne, Joseph, D.D., an English divine and educator, was born at a place called the Tongue, in Wa- termellock, Cumberland, of which he was educated at Burton School, and at Queen's College, Oxford, where he took the degree of A.M., Nov. 4, 1724, and was chosen one of the chaplains of the college. In April, 1831, he was made a fellow of his college, and became a tutor of great eminence. He became rector of Bramshot, in Hampshire, May 1, 1746, and professor of natural philosophy in the university in 1747. While residing at Bramshot he was made chancellor and canon-residentiary of Hereford. In 1756 Dr. Browne was chosen provost of Queen's College, and in 1759 vice-chancellor of the university; in which offices he remained until disabled by a stroke of the palsy, March 25, 1765. He died June 17, 1767. His only publication, joined an edition of the Bell and Insti- te, New York city. In 1847 he received his medical diploma from the New York University, and from 1851 until the close of his life he practiced medicine, for a time in New York, and afterwards in Hartford, Conn. writer, "Charlotte Elizabeth," whose companionship she enjoyed for many years of her youth. She quite early in life became a follower of Christ, and in 1855 joined the Friends. She was an earnest worker among the poor, especially those of the Hebrew nation, for whose spiritual welfare she labored in connection with the Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews. In 1846 she was recorded a minister by the Norwich Monthly Meeting. She travelled in Scotland, Ireland, and England, preaching an atoning Christ. She died Nov. 9, 1880, at Guildford. She was of an intensely sympathetic nature, very decided in her views, with great strength of will, often carrying out her convictions at the cost of much personal sacrifice. She was very fond of linguistic studies and history, and the sciences were of great interest to her. Her preaching was characterized by "great clearness, specially in exposition of doctrine." Brown, (or Brown), Thomas, D.D., a learned divine of the Anglican Church, was born in Malmsley in 1604. In 1629 he became a student at Christ Church, Oxford, and chaplain, in 1657, to Archbishop Laud. Two years after he was made a canon of Windsor, and, eventually, rector of Oddington. He suffered much during the Rebellion, and was compelled to leave his country. At the Restoration he was admitted again to his precentorship, and died at Windsor in 1673, leaving many works. See Walker, Sufferings of the Clergy, p. 93; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. a. v.

Brown, William, a minister of the Society of Friends in Great Britain, was born near Credinton, in Devonshire, in 1756. Through the influence of an older sister, who was a Wesleyan, he was led to Christ, and united with the Friends in 1828. He enjoyed the advantages of a liberal education, and during the years of his active business life was always a leader in the temperance and educational interests of the community. In 1827 he relinquished his business occupation, and opened a school, which was unsuccessful. He died in Torquay, Aug. 8, 1880. He never travelled as a minister, but extended his gifts among the friends, whom he happened to be living. His preaching was "usually clear and weighty in its character." See (Lond.) Annual Monitor, 1881, p. 4.

Brownell, James, an English Wesleyan minister, son of the following, was born in Tortola, W. I., Sept. 27, 1804. He was sent to the Woodhouse-grove School, near Wakefield, and in the winter of 1822-1823 he remained there as a teacher until 1835, when he was ordained and sent by the British Conference to Derby. From the time of his ordination until his death at Todmorden, Nov. 23, 1868, he labored uninteruptedly. His preaching was characterized by research, clear thought, and fidelity. As a pastor he was greatly valued; his kindness and hospitality never failed. His counsels, imparted with modesty, were highly prized by his colleagues. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1869, p. 14.

Brownell, John, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Altrington, Cheshire, Jan. 22, 1771. In 1795 he went as a missionary to the West Indies, and labored successfully on the islands of St. Kitts, Nevis, and Tortola; returning to England in 1806. Thereafter he travelled the Lynn, Yarmouth, Bedford, Bolton (1812), Holmforth, Sheffield, Nottingham, and Newark Circuits. He died at Newark-upon-Trent, Sept. 24, 1821. Mr. Brownell was a faithful and devoted missionary and minister. See (Wes. Meth. Mag.), May 1823, 1, 70; Minutes of the British Conference, 1823, p. 255.

Brownell, John B., a Wesleyan Methodist minister, son of the preceding, was born in St. Kitts, W. I., Oct. 29, 1802. He was converted at the Kingswood School, England; commenced his ministry in 1826; labored for five years in the West Indies, for five in Malta (1833 to 1839), then in the upper provinces of Canada, and finally in Bermuda (1846) and the lower provinces. He became a superintendat, 1861, and died at Frederickton, N. B., March 27, 1864. His attainments in scholarship were respectable, and he was a good sermonizer. His piety was intelligent and decided. See Huestis, Memorials of Wesl. Meth. Preachers (Halifax, N. S., 1872), p. 28.

Brownell, Veranus, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Vermont, March 16, 1810. He was converted at the age of sixteen, and joined the Protestant Episcopal Church, was thereafter admitted into the presbytery, and was ordained to the ministry in 1837. He united with the Methodist Episcopal Church; was ordained deacon and elder in the church at Sundown, Ohio, in 1844. He was ordained a priest in the church at Greensboro, North Carolina, in 1845. He was consecrated a bishop in 1854. He died at Dec. 11, 1874. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1875, p. 136.

Brownell, William, a Baptist minister, was born in 1773. He was converted and became a minister in early life. His life as a pastor was spent chiefly with the churches at Smithfield and Uniointown, Pa. He also organized a Church at Stewartstown. His travels in the interior of the country, visiting the counties of Pennsylvania and sections of West Virginia and Ohio. He died Jan. 18, 1859. He was a sound divine, an able preacher, and a fearless advocate of the truth, and his efforts were greatly blessed. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclopedia, p. 154. (J. C. S.)

Browning, George, an Episcopal missionary minister, was in the ministry two and a half years; was a priest, devoted to the mission, and died in prison in 1791 or 1792. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1792, p. 45.

Browning, Jacob, a Baptist minister, was born in North Carolina, Feb. 11, 1779, and at an early age removed to Tennessee. He was trained as a Presbyterian, but subsequently became a Baptist. From 1805 to 1824 he was "living epistle" in the association with which his Church was connected. In the latter year he removed to St. Louis, Mo., and was one of the founders of the University of Tennessee, taking up his residence in Benton County. At this time he commenced his labors of love in the wilds of the West, and planted many flourishing churches. From the Philadelphia Association he received a commission to act as their missionary through the region in which he lived. One of the churches which came under his special pastoral care was the Parish Church in Henry County, his last sermon being preached there. He died Aug. 12, 1841. See Borum, Sketches of Tennessee Ministers, p. 78. 79. (J. C. S.)

Browning, Thomas, a Universalist minister, was born in Rutland, Mass., March 2, 1787. He removed to Barre, Vt., with his parents at the age of eight, exposing himself, among the Methodists, later became a Universalist, and in 1823 began to preach that faith. Hitherto he had been a farmer and mechanic, and had but a limited education; but by diligent and persevering study became well versed in the Scriptures, and received ordination in 1827 from the Old North Church in Westborough. He removed in 1828 to Waterbury, and in 1834, where he resided until his decease, March 12, 1875. Mr. Browning was genial, dignified, courteous; earnest, decided, and liberal. See Universalist Register, 1876, p. 115.

Brownlee, James, a Scotch Presbyterian minister, was born in Lanarkshire, Scotland. He graduated at Edinburgh University, received a private theological education, and in 1798 was licensed to preach. the Gospel. He was ordained pastor of the Church at Falkirk, May 20, 1799, where he labored until his death, May 24, 1821. Mr. Brownlee was an humble Christian, an affectionate friend, a devoted pastor, an earnest preacher, and a ripe scholar. See (N. Y.) Ref. Dutch Church Magazine, 1829-25, p. 50.

Brownlee, John, an English Congregational minister, was born in 1791. Having labored two years, first at Bethelsdrop, and afterwards at Somerset, he set sail in 1816 as missionary to Africa. Mr. Brownlee sought to form a mission-station on the banks of the Chusie, and in order to carry out this object was compelled to resign his connection with the London Missionary Society and become agent of the agent's society. In 1832 he accepted an invitation to commence a mission to the Kaffres, and once more became one of the society's agents. In January, 1826, he removed to Buffalo River, and formed a station at Tsatsroz's Kraal, the present King William's Town. In this sphere he labored upward of forty years. He died Dec. 25, 1872. Mr. Brownlee was mild, peaceable, and loving; a man of great perseverance and faith. See (Lou.) Cong. Yearbook, 1873, p. 318.

Brownson, David, a Congregational minister, graduated at Yale College in 1762. He was ordained pastor of the Church at Oxford, Conn., in 1764, was dismissed in 1774, and died in 1806. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 468.

Brownson, Hector, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Vernon, Conn., Oct. 7, 1791. He belonged to a typical Puritan family, whose stern moral teachings were inwrought into his nature; experienced a genuine conversion when about twenty; enlisted in his country's service in 1812; was in several engagements, out of which he came with great credit and a lieutenant's command; and began preaching in 1823 under the auspices of the New England Conference. In 1838 he entered the service of the American Bible Society, in which he continued thirty-nine years, closing his labors and life April 30, 1877. Mr. Brownson was a happy, exemplary Christian. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1878, p. 47.

Brownson, Ira, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was received into the Genevese Conference in 1820, and labored with self-sacrificing devotion until his death at Granger, N. Y., June 27, 1848. He was abundantly useful as a Christian and minister. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1848, p. 453.

Brownson, Orestes Augustus, L.L.D., an eminent writer and lay theologian, was born at Stockbridge, Vt., Sept. 16, 1803. In consequence of his father's death and his mother's poverty, he was adopted at an early age by an old couple at Royaltown, who brought him up in the most rigid form of the New England orthodoxy of that period. The entire atmosphere of his youth was chilling to the last degree; and to a nature such as his—buoyant, impulsive, generous, and light-hearted—the memory of these early impressions and this cold and severe discipline hung darkly over him all his life, and had much to do, no doubt, with his later composition to extreme and contrary principles, and his uncompromising warfare against Protestantism. In October, 1822, he united with the Presbyterian Church as one claiming divine authority, his deeply religious nature asking for guidance and help out of the darkness into which his questionings had led him; but the restraint under which he there found himself, and the surveillance to which he was subjected by a hard discipline, which has now largely passed away, at length induced him to break loose from what he came to consider an unwarrantable tyranny. In the rebound he became a Universalist, was accepted as a minister in that body, and at the age of twenty-two became editor of the Universalist Advocate. As theafterwards editor of the Philanthropist, a contributor to the Christian Examiner, the Democratic Review, and many other peri-section in the Roman Church. When the Syllabus of 1865 was published, he questioned its propriety and effect, but afterwards accepted and defended it in the Catholic World and Tablet. He also cordially accepted the definition of infallibility. His Review was the first American periodical reprinted in England, which was done for about twelve years. An edition of his works and essays was issued by his son, in 1880; it was also published in Detroit (1882). Lord Brougham is reported to have called Brownson one of the first thinkers and writers of the present age. With Gœs, Rossi, De Maistre, Lamorcière, Montalembert, Dechamps, Lucas, Ward, Mallikrodt, Malan, and others, Brownson has taken a prominent place among the eminent thinkers of this century in the Roman Catholic Church. Brownson also wrote Charles Elwood; or, The Infi del Converted (1840):—The Convert; or, Leaves from My Experience (N. Y. 1857). He was a great admirer of the philosophy of M. Comte. Blakney, in his Hist. of the Philosophy of Mind, assigns Brownson a high place among the critics of mental philosophy. See Duyvickneke, Cyclop. of Amer. Literature, ii, 144; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Appleton's Amer. Cyclop. s. v.

Browning, Edward, a preacher of the United Methodist Free Church, was a Cornishman, born at Pencarrow, June 4, 1810. His father was a Methodist local preacher at Cambellford for sixty years. Young Browning was educated by himself, and at fifteen he opened a school, in 1825, and began to preach under the Rev. Dr. Joseph Beaumont. In 1850 he joined the Methodist Reformers, and entered the ministry in 1852. He labored in nine circuits with much success. At Stockton Illsion prostrated him, and he died May 30, 1875. See Minutes of the 19th Annual Assembly.

Bu, Moxon Vincenzo, a Spanish painter, was probably born at Valencia in 1832, and studied under Juan Conchillos. Before he was twenty-one he had painted several altar-pieces for the churches of Valencia, where he died soon after, in 1703. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bruce, Andrew, a Scottish prelate, was archdeacon of St. Andrew's, after which he was preferred to the see of Dunkeld in 1755, but was deprived in 1808 for non-compliance with the measures of the court. In 1808 he was restored to the bishops of Orkney. He died in March, 1700. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 229.

Bruce, A. W., a Universalist minister, was born at Bennington, Vt., in 1812. He was trained by the strictest sort of Methodist parents, became a Universalist in faith at the age of eighteen, studied medicine in early manhood, and after practicing it a few years, entered the ministry of the Universalist Church. He was ordained in 1843, and labored in some of the Eastern States, in Michigan, Ohio, and Indiana. He died suddenly, Aug. 19, 1871. Mr. Bruce was an impressive and acceptable preacher. See Universalist Register, 1872, p. 152.

Bruce, James (1), a Scottish prelate, was the son of Sir Robert Bruce of Clackmannan, and was first Total Reformed in Fife, about 1430. He was promoted to the see of Dunkeld, and consecrated in 1441. In 1444 he was made chancellor of the kingdom. He was translated to the see of Glasgow in 1446, but died before his consecration, in 1447. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 87.

Bruce, James (2), an English Congregational minister, was born at Kelso, Roxburghs, Jan. 29, 1804. As he approached his twentieth year he entered the Glasgow Grammar School, and on completing his course he was appointed tutor to a gentleman's son in Scotland, and afterwards usher in a school at Hinckley, Leicestershire. There he was converted. In 1827 he entered the University of Edinburgh, and was ordained to Lochhouse, in the North Riding of York. After this he preached twelve years at Houden, ten years at Bamford, a few years at Manchester, and then, resigning active ministerial labor, he lived a short time at Liverpool, next at Leamington, and finally removed to Cubbington, where he died, Sept. 28, 1873. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1874, p. 318.

Bruce, John, an English Congregational minister, was born at Great Grimsby, July 7, 1862. At thirteen years of age he was apprenticed to a linen draper at Pontefract, 1872; in 1874 he entered Jesus College, Cambridge, and graduated B.A. in 1878; in 1880 he published The Doctrine of Death, in the Evangelical Magazine; and when about eighteen he entered Homerton College. On leaving college he was ordained, and became assistant minister at Newington Chapel, Liverpool. In 1870 he accepted a call to Newport, Isle of Wight, and eventually removed to Reepham, where he labored until his death, Aug. 17, 1874. Mr. Bruce published, Twenty Sermons to Aid in Private and Family Devotions:— Devotions; or, Female Christian Benevolence Simplified:— The Abrahamite Covenant:— and various other minor treatises. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1876, p. 319.

Bruce, John Helvey, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Montgomery County, Va., Feb. 2, 1817. He emigrated with his parents to Miami County, O., in early life; received a careful religious training; experienced conversion at the age of fifteen; soon after received license to exhort; was licensed to preach in 1835; and in 1836 joined the Indiana Conference, in which he labored with faithfulness and success until his decease, Aug. 23, 1874. Mr. Bruce was manly and courageous; sound and clear in theology; zealous and pathetic as a preacher; affectionate and devoted as a friend. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1854, p. 447.

Bruce, Joseph, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born in Springfield, Vt., in 1821. He was converted when about seventeen years of age, and united with the Methodist Protestant Church. For seventeen years (1840–57) he was a Methodist preacher. He then joined the Free-will Baptists, and was ordained a minister in that denomination in June, 1868. It is said that during the year following his baptism he preached more than three hundred sermons, travelling from place to place on foot. He died in Brantree, Vt., Dec. 16, 1890. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1862, p. 92. (J. C. S.)

Bruce, Michael, an Irish Presbyterian minister, was a descendant of Robert Bruce. He was ordained as one of the class of 1838 at the coll. of Edinburgh in 1840, and settled at Killinchy in October of the year following. A person "singularly gifted, truly zealous and faithful, but also peaceable and orderly in his temper and conversation with his brethren... a very Nathaniel." He was very zealous in stirring up the people against prelacy; he was thought to have been connected with the Blood plot, though this was false; yet for his zeal he was obliged to fly to Scotland. Here he was taken prisoner and sent to London, and did not return to his congregation until after some years of absence. He afterwards became an Ariane, and was known as a "non-subscriber." See Reid, Hist. of the Presb. Church in Ireland.

Bruce, Nathaniel F., M.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was for many years chaplain of the state prison, Clinton, N. Y. He died in Dexter, Mich., Aug. 1, 1857. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1858, p. 96.

Bruce, Robert (1), D.D., an Associate minister, was born in the parish of Scone, Perth Co., Scotland, Aug. 4, 1779; was a student in Oxford in 1794, and in 1795 became a student at Edinburgh. He was ordained in 1798, and in 1801 was admitted as a student of divinity by the Associate Presbytery of Perth, and for five years prosecuted his studies under the venerable professor A. Bruce. He was licensed by the Associate Presbytery of Perth in 1806, and was immediately sent out to the United States. There he was admitted to the Associate Presbyteries of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and Connecticut. In 1809 he was commissioned to return to the United States. After travelling some years, he became pastor of the Associate congregation in Fort Pitt, now Pitts.. burgh. In 1820 he was chosen president of the Western University; here he served until 1845, when he resigned. After this he had an important agency in establishing another institution (Duquesne College), of which he became provost, and held the place till the close of his life, June 14, 1846. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, IX, iii, 90. [B. P.]

Bruce, Robert (5), an Irish Wesleyan minister, was born at Ballinaclasy, County Antrim, in 1756. In 1810 he was received into the ministry, and for forty-five years fulfilled his duties with unwearied zeal, courage, faithfulness, and success. He clearly apprehended and lucidly expounded the doctrines of Methodism, was well acquainted with its constitution and history, and was an able and general historian of the church. He was a man of unimpeachable integrity, firmness of purpose, and gentleness of spirit. He became a supernumerary in 1855, and died at his residence in Skibbereen, June 5, 1863. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1863, p. 23. [B. P.]

Bruce, Samuel, a Lutheran minister, was first connected with the Methodist Episcopal Church. In his later life he began to be heard, and subsequently became a local preacher. In 1868 he was ordained as a Lutheran minister by the Franconian Synod, and for nearly twenty years he served the congregation at South Worcester, N. Y. During the last four years of his life he was additionally employed as pastor of the Lutheran church in that city. He died at South Worcester, April 21, 1881. See Lutheran Observer, May 6, 1881. [B. P.]

Bruce, William (1), an elder of the Wood Street congregation, Dublin, in 1750 founded the “Widow’s Fund.” From Reid’s History of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland we learn that he received a collegiate education, after which he engaged in business. Nine or ten years after his death, his family published something in pursuit of intellectual improvement, he settled permanently in Dublin, “and distinguished himself as a most useful and public spirited citizen.” In 1755 he died, in the fifty-fourth year of his age. [B. P.]

Bruce, William (2), D.D., an Irish Presbyterian minister, grandson of Rev. Michael Bruce, was born in 1768. Originally he was connected with the synod of Ulster, and was afterwards pastor of the Strand Street congregation, Dublin. In 1790 he settled in Belfast, as minister of the First Congregation. For more than thirty years he presided over the Belfast Academy. He died in 1841. See Reid, Hist. of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland. [B. P.]

Bruch, Johann Friedrich, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born in 1791 at Zweibrücken. He studied at Strasbourg, where he also occupied the theological chair for more than forty years, and died July 21, 1874. He was one of the founders, and president, of the Evangelical Society, also president of the board of directors of the Lutheran Church of Alsace. His theological position was that of a rationalist. He wrote: Lehrbuch der christlichen Sittenlehre (Strassburg, 1829):—Christliche Vorträge (ibid. 1888):—Etudes Philosophiques sur le Christianisme (Paris and Strasburg, 1839; Germ. transl. by Franz, Mannheim, 1847, new ed. 1850):—Die Lehre von den geistlichen Eigenschaften (Hamburg, 1842):—Betrachtungen über Christentum und christliche Glauben (Strassburg, 1846):—Weisheitslehre der Hebräer (ibid. 1851):—Das Leben und der Herrn (ibid. 1852):—Die protestantische Freiheit (ibid. 1857):—Die Lehre von der Priesterzelt der menschlichen Seele (ibid. 1859). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 383; Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 194. [B. P.]

Brucker, Philip William, a Swiss Protestant theologian, was born at Kitchberg, near Basel, June 30, 1667, and died in March, 1751. His principal works are, De Quarto Imperio a Daniele Descripto (Basel, 1692, 4to):—Pensées sur le Réunion des Églises Protestantes (Heidelberg, 1723, 4to). See Hoefner, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. [B. P.]

Brucken, John, a Lutheran divine, who settled in England, was born on the island of Cadsand, near the Belgian frontier, Dec. 31, 1726, and was educated in theology chiefly at the university of Franeker, whence he passed to Leyden, and then obtained a pastورship. His literary acquirements were eminent; he read Hebrew and Greek; composed correctly; and preached with applause in four languages—Latin, Dutch, French, and English. In 1753 he accepted the position of French preacher to the Wallon Church of Norwich, England, where he continued fifty-one years. In 1766 he also became minister to the Dutch Church, but the duties soon became merely nominal. He died May 12, 1809. Bruckner published, Théorie du Système Aimal (1767):—Créations sur le Diverson de Parly (1790):—Thoughts on Public Worship (1792), and other works. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v. [B. P.]

Brudo, Abraham, a Jewish commentator and rabbi at Constantinople, who died at Jerusalem in 1710, wrote a commentary on Genesis entitled, Birkath Abrahams (Jerusalem, 1709), in which he comments on the blessing of Abraham (Genesix, 1696). See Hoefner, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. [B. P.]

Bruecker, Persyn, a German Reformed minister, was born at Düsseldorf in Germany, and came to America in 1849 or 1850. He took a theological course at Merceburg, Pa., and left soon after for the West. He was licensed to preach and ordained by the Tiffin Presbytery of Ohio, in 1852. About the same time he took charge of a German congregation in Sandusky, where he labored about two years, when, Jan. 15, 1854, he died. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church, iv, 498. [B. P.]

Bruehl (Lat. Brüllus), Joachim, a Flemish theologian of the Augustinian order, was born at Vorst, in Brabant. Having taught philosophy and theology he was twice elected provincial of his order in Flanders. He died June 29, 1658. Bruehl wrote, breves Resolutiones Casuism apud Regularium, als Theologorum (Cologne, 1640):—Les Confession aux Bretons et Provençaux (de France) A. P. du 1630, traduits de l’Espagnol en Français (ibid. 1610):—L’Etoile, Jovina Chistis (Antwerp, 1645):—Historia Permanens Ordinis Eremitalium S. P. Augustini. Bruen, Barnabas, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Philadelphia, Mass., in 1735. He graduated with the highest honors from Union College, Schenectady, N. Y., in 1816; proceeded to Newburgh, [B. P.] where he engaged in the work of teaching, devoting his leisure hours to theological study, with a view to the ministry, and in the year following was recalled to his alma mater as a tutor. On June 30, 1819, he was ordained to the Presbyterian Church at Newburg, to which he had been unanimously called. He died Nov. 18, 1820. Mr. Bruen was a man of deep piety, brilliant gifts, and of unriveting devotion to duty.

Bruen, James McWhorter, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Newark, N.J., July 30, 1818. He graduated from the University of Pennsylvania in 1839, and from the Union Theological Seminary in 1842. He was ordained July 1, 1845, and became pastor of the Presbyterian Church of New Windsor, N.Y. His pastorate of three years in that Church (1845-48), and another of equal length in the Reformed Dutch Church at Clintonville, N.J. (1849-52), were his only terms of office as an ordinand. For the last twenty-nine or thirty years of his life he resided in Irvington, N.J., where he led a quiet and scholarly life. He died at Clayton, in February, 1881. See Presbyterian, Feb. 12, 1881. (W. P. S.)

Brueys, David Augustin de, a French theologian, was born of Protestant parents at Aix in 1640. He was brought up for the bar, but after the death of his wife he turned to the law. He died Nov. 4, 1663, and first wrote against Bossuet's Exposition de la Doctrine de l'Eglise, but was afterwards converted by that prelate. He wrote, Examen des Raisons qui ont donne lieu a la Separation des Protestants (1683);—Defence du Collè de l'Eglise Catholique (Paris, 1685, 12mo);—Traité de l'Eglise d'Utopie (ibid, 1686), where he endeavored to prove the Roman doctrine by truths admitted by both parties:—Traité de l'Eglise, où l'on Montre que les Principes des Calvinistes se Contrelient (1687);—L'Histoire du Fomentisme de Notre Temps (1692);—Traité de la Sainte Messe (1700), etc. He also wrote many dramas. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bruggana, Gaetano, an Italian theologian and scholar, was born at Mantua in 1732. He taught rhetoric and classics in several colleges, and philosophy at Perugia. Being a Jesuit, he retired to his native place during the time of the suppression of his order, and devoted himself to the performance of literary labor and of his priestly functions. He died about 1800. He wrote, Discorsi e Meditazioni (Mantua, 1779):—La Poesia in Aiuto alla Prosa (ibid. 1781). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bruges (satur), often spelled Bridges, the English mediaeval form of the town of Bruges, is rich material of tissue from Flanders, used for vestments.

Brugbach, an early Irish prelate, was bishop of Rath-migh-Aengh, a church situated in Tir-enns, in Tyrconnel, probably the church of Rath, near Manor Cunningham, County Donegal. But Dr. Reeves says (S. Adamnan, 192, n) it is what is now called Raymohy, in the barony of Raphoe. He is said to have been of the race of Colla-da-Chrioch; and, perhaps, was the son of Sedna and disciple of St. Gedaigh. His dedication is given on Nov. 1. He was consecrated by St. Patrick for Rath-Mageasouan, and afterwards himself consecrated St. Cairpre (Nov. 11). But Lanigan (Eccles. Hist. Hibern., ii, 77, 79) points out that Brugachh must have been bishop there after St. Bolcan, and the latter could scarcely have been a bishop till after St. Patrick's death.

Bruggi, Giovanni Battista, an Italian painter, was a pupil of Gaulli, and painted in several fine pictures for the churches of Rome. He died about 1730. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Brugière, Pierre, a French theologian, was born at Thiers, Oct. 3, 1740. He became collegiate of that city, preacher successively at Clermont, Riom, Brioude, and (in 1768) at Paris, where he remained for ten years in the convent of St. Roch. He died in 1803, leaving several discourses and practical treatises, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Brugieri, Giovanni Domenico, a Florentine painter, was born at Lucca in 1678, and first studied under Bahl, and afterwards Carlo Maratti. His works are to be seen in the Chapel of the Sacrament at the Servi, and in other edifices at Lucca. He died in 1744.

Brugman (or Brugmans), John, a Flemish preacher, was a member of the Franciscan order of the diocese of Cologne, and obtained a great reputation for his eloquence. He taught theology in the convent of St. Omer, was medical officer at the hospital, and died at Nimegen in 1473. He wrote, Vita S. Lievenis Virginis (Schiedam, 1498). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bruguère de Gard, J. T., a French ecclesiastic, was born at Sommières, near Nîmes, in 1765. He was educated at Aix, and was vicar at St. Julien-du-Sault, near Sens, until 1792, when he went to Paris, married, and turned his attention to civil affairs. He died in 1834, leaving several works of a public character, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Brühl, Moritz J. A., a Roman Catholic writer of Germany, was born of Jewish parentage, in 1812, at Düsseldorf. He studied at Heidelberg and Bonn, and, for a time, at London, and was a reporter on a London paper. After his return in 1844, he joined the Church at Schwäbisch-Gmünd, and published his Selbstkenntniss eines Katholiken (Regensburg, 1844):—Kurtz Denkschrift an alle akatholischen Christen, von einem katholischen Neukristen (Augsburg, 1844). Brühl died at Vienna, Jan. 13, 1872. Besides the two works above, he published, Geschichte der Gesellschaft Jesu (Würzburg, 1846);—Neuere Geschichte der Geschellschaft Jesu (Gleiwitz, 1847-48, 2 vols.);—Gehrne Geschichte der Wiener Papat Clemens XIV und der Aufhebung des Jesuitenorden (Aachen, 1849);—Die Versammlung der deutschen Katholiken zu Breslau (Breslau, 1849);—Uebet den Charakter und wesentlichen Eigenschaften der Concordia (Schaffhausen, 1850);—Geschichte der kathol. Literatur Deutschlands, vom XVII Jahrhundert bis zur Gegenwart (Wien, 1854; 24 ed. 1861)—Johann Michael Sieuler (Aachen, 1850). (B.P.)

Brünn, David, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Memel, Sept. 30, 1750. He studied at Königsberg, and Halle, in 1760, con-rector at the Cölnische Gymnasium in Berlin, in 1752 preacher at the military school, in 1754 dean at St. Mary's, and in 1756 arch-dean. He died April 27, 1782. He is the author of some hymns, one of which has been translated into English—Der du uns als Vater liebest, "Thou who lovest us as a father," in Storck's Hymen from the German, p. 30. See Koch, Gesch. d. deutschen Kirchenleides, vii, 231. (B. P.)

Brunsech, Carl (the slender), daughter of Crimthan, and virgin of Magh-trea, is commemorated an Irish saint May 29. Colgan (Acta Sanctorum, 459, c. 10; 789, c. 1) suggests that this may be Brinsecha, a favorite disciple of St. Kevin's mother, but in dubium. But instead of being the daughter of Crimthan, some account her as one of the three sisters of St. Cronan, or Mochus of Balla (March 30), and thus belonging to a different race, while others identify her with St. Buri.

BRULCA, in Thibetan mythology. The religion of the Lamasites teaches that before the existence of the earth, in the place which the latter now occupies, there was an ocean which was inhabited by heavenly spirits. One of these places is called Brulca, and that because of the joy which the world had over the miracles there performed by the spirits.

Brulefer (or Brulifer), ÉTIENNE, a French ecclesiastic, was a native of Bretagne, a doctor of Paris, and a Minorite, who taught theology at Metz and Montaigut, and died in 1485. He wrote, Reportata in D. Boemi-ventura Sententias (Bâle, 1501; Venice, 1544; Paris, 1567: — De Sancissima Trinitate: — De Paulpavtatae Jesu Christi et Apostolorum (Paris, 1500); and a few minor works, for which see Landon, Ecoles. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bruley, PETRUS, a Reformation martyr, was a preacher in the French Church at Strasbourg, who came to France to visit the lower countries about Artois and Dornick in Flanders, where he preached the word of God to the people. Here he was taken and committed to prison, while there wrote many beautiful letters to his friends. He remained in prison four months, and was then burned at Dornick in 1645. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv. 1656.

Brulliard, PHILIBERT, a French prelate, was born at Dijon, Sept. 11, 1765. After having been curate of St. Étienne-du-Mont at Paris, he was nominated bishop of Grenoble Dec. 28, 1825, and was consecrated Aug. 6, 1826. He became involved in a dispute concerning the genuineness of certain alleged miracles among the hermits of the Alps, and in consequence retired, Dec. 7, 1829, to become canon of the Imperial Chapel of St. Denis for the remainder of his days. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Brunamia were heathen festivals among the ancient Romans, said to have been instituted by Romulus in honor of Bacchus. They were celebrated twice a year, on the twelfth day before the Kalends of March, and the eighteenth before the Kalends of November. Among the early Christians Brunamia were sometimes observed, according to Tertullian, who records it to their shame; but these are by some considered the celebration of the winter solstice, from brunam, winter. By the council of Trullo (A.D. 692) Christians were prohibited from attending the Brunamia on pain of excommunication.

Brunaud de Beauregard, JEAN, a French prelate, was born at Poitiers, Dec. 1, 1749. He was at first canon and grand-vicar of the diocese of Laon. At the time of the revolution he went to England and interested himself in the success of the war of La Vendée. Having been arrested at various times, he at length returned to France and became rector of the cathedral of Poitiers in 1805, then bishop of Montauban at the second restoration. In 1839 he was appointed canon of St. Denis. He died Nov. 28, 1841. He wrote, Dissertation sur le Lieu où s'est donné la Bataille de Vincennes, etc., où Clovis défit Alairic II, extracts of which are inserted in the Mémoires de la Société des Antiquaires de l'Ouest: — Notes sur les Événements du Lupon, from Prée de Vodrie down to Borellon. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Brunwell, THOMAS, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Newcastle-upon-Tyne in 1813. He was converted in early life, accepted by the Conference in 1838, sent to Hoxton Institution, received his last appointment (Morley) in 1873, and died March 28, 1875. He was affable, gentle, catholic, faithful to Methodist rules, and unerringly in his attention to all the obligations of his office. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1875, p. 23.

Brundage, ABRAHAM, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Cornwall, Orange Co., N. Y., Jan. 19, 1820. He was converted at the age of thirteen; licensed to preach in 1850; and in 1852 entered the New York Conference, where he remained till 1873, when his health failed and his voice became impaired, making it necessary to send him to the Utica Insane Asylum, where in a few months he was restored. In 1866 he resumed his place in the effective ranks, but the labors of the pastorate were too severe for his nervous temperament, and he was obliged to retire from full active work Nov. 22, 1866. Mr. Brundage was remarkable for his physical and mental ability, his cheerfulness, and his warm, frank spirit. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1869, p. 91.

Brune, ÉTIENNE, a Reformation martyr, was a husbandman at Rutiers, in France. He was persecuted by Gasper Augerius and by Domicellus, a Franciscan. He was burned at Flannoy in 1546. It is said that the wind raised the flames by some device, as he stood exhorting the people, that he continued speaking for an hour unharmed, and they were obliged to build a new fire. But this did not burn him, so they seized a staff and thrust it through his entrails, and took his body and threw it down upon the coals, where it burned to ashes. See Acts and Monuments, iv. 1656.

Brune, John H., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Prussia, Oct. 19, 1884. He emigrated to America in early life; settled in Missouri, where he was converted; joined the South-West German Conference in 1888, and labored faithfully until his death, Oct. 9, 1887. Mr. Brune was known and beloved as a faithful Christian minister. He was meek and gentle in deportment, very patient, and devoted to his brethren in the faith and in piety. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1868, p. 255.

Brunelleschi, FILIPPO, an eminent Italian architect, was born at Florence in 1377. He was one of the first who revived the Greek practice of making the principles of geometry subservient to art, and was the first Florentine who discovered the method of bringing this to perfection, which, as Vasari says, "consisted in drawing in two lines by means of squares or squares." He conceived the idea of raising a cupola over the Church of Santa Maria del Fiore at Florence. He was employed by the duke Filippo Maria, and also made a number of important improvements in the cathedral. He executed a number of works for pope Eugenius IV in Rome, which gained him the same success as his Florentine works. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1855, p. 469.

Brunet, a French theologian and scholar, lived in the latter half of the 18th century. He was doctor of theology and curate of Bernières, and wrote, Homelie pour tous les Dimanches, en Forme de Prêches (Paris, 1778); — Ode sur la Paix (ibid. 1788). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Brunner, Anthony C., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was for thirteen years a faithful preacher in the Georgia Conference, and died in 1852 or 1853. Mr. Brunner's ministry was characterized by zeal, fidelity, and success. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1855, p. 469.

Brunet, François Florentine, a French theologian, was born at Vitél, in Lorraine, and died at Paris, Sept. 15, 1806. He was a monk of the Mission congregation, and taught philosophy at Toul and Chalons-sur-Marne. He is best known by his learned Parallèle des Religions (Paris, 1792, 5 vols. 4to). He also wrote De Ieale de la Foi dans les Francois, et des heureux Effets qu'il peut produire dans l'Egypte, and other minor works. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Landon, Ecoles. Dict. s. v.

After his return, he was made deacon of the cathedral-church at Stuttgart, was called in 1614 as superintendent to Leonberg, and died Dec. 20, 1637. See Fisschin, Memoria theologorum württembergensium; Jücher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Brunn, Lat. Brunardus, Conrad, was a canon of Augsburg, who died in 1563, leaving a Treatise on Ceremonies, in six books; another against the Centurions of Magdeburg; and a collection of treaties, De Hereticiis, De Sedisvacuis, De Legatius, De Imaginibus, etc. (Menz, 1651).

Brunn, Wilhelm Ludwiger, a Reformed theologian of Germany, was born March 15, 1678, at Zerbst, and died Jan. 2, 1807, as third pastor of the German Reformed Church at Magdeburg. He wrote, Disquisitio Historico-Critica de Indole, Etate et usu Libri Apocalypsis, Vulgo Inscripti; Evangelium Nicodemi (Berlin, 1784). See Winer, Handbuch der theolog. Lit., i, 278. (B. P.)

Brunne, Robert de (or Robert Mannyn), a canon of the Gilbertine order, was born in the latter part of the 13th century, and received into the order of black canons at Brunne about 1288. He resided in the priory of Sempringham ten years, in the time of prior John of Camelot, and five years with John of Clynton. In 1303 he began a metrical paraphrase of a French book, written by Robert Grosstede, bishop of Lincoln, called Manuel Pécé (Manuel des Pécès), a treatise on the decalogue and the seven deadly sins, illustrated with many legendary stories. It was never printed, but is preserved in the Bodleian library. His second and more important work was a metrical chronicle of England—the first part being a translation of Wace's Brut d'Angleterre, and the second from a French chronicle written by Peter de Langtoft. See Chalmers, Biogr. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Brusch (or Brusel), Caspar, a German writer, was born at Schlaekenwald, in Bremen, in Aug. 1518. Wolfgang, bishop of Salms, gave him a resi- dence at Passau, where he devoted himself entirely to the ecclesiastical history of Germany. The first volume of his projected work, De Germania Episcopatibus Epitome, which was never finished, was published at Nuremberg, 1549, 8vo; also, at Ingolstadt (1651 fol.), as Monastiorum Germaniae Praeparatorium Chronologia. He was murdered in 1559. See Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bruse, Giles de, an English prelate of the early part of the 13th century, son of William de Bruse, baron of Brecknock, was born at Brecknock, Wales. He became bishop of Hereford. In the civil wars he aided with the nobility against John, on which account he was banished, but returned and recovered the king's favor. The paternal inheritance devolved upon him, so he was at once bishop and baron. He died in 1216, and was buried in his cathedral, the belfry of which he probably erected. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), iii, 515.

Brush, Abner, a Presbyterian minister, was a graduate of Princeton. He studied theology, and in 1758 was ordained by the Presbyterian Church of New York, and installed as pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Goshen, N. Y. Mr. Brush remained in this charge until 1766, in which year he died. See Alexander, Princeton College in the 18th Century.

Brash, George W., a Methodist Episcopcal minister, was converted while a student at Ohio Wesleyan University, and in 1849 entered the Ohio Conference, wherein he served faithfully to the close of his life, some time in 1867 or 1868. Mr. Brush was an admirable preacher, strong in the hour of men's depression, sought relief in death. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1868, p. 254.

Brash, Jacob, a Methodist Episcopcal minister, was born on Long Island, Fed. 4, 1769. From 1785 to his death, his name is among the workers of the Methodist itinerancy. He exerted himself greatly in his preaching, and died Sept. 25, 1793. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1796, p. 66.

Brash, John C., a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, studied theology under Dr. J. H. Livingston, and was licensed by the Classis of New York in 1793. He then became pastor of the Church at North and South Hampton, Bucks Co., Pa., 1794 to 1796. After leaving this church he accepted the churches at Dutch Creek Cross-roads, and Dover, Del., Presbyterian, where he remained from 1796. The time of his death is unknown. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church (3d ed.), p. 203.

Brash, William W., a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, and a son of William Brush, was born at Guilford, N. Y., Sept. 25, 1843. He graduated at Rutgers College in 1862, New Brunswick Seminary in 1865, and was licensed by the Classis of Barren in 1866. He was pastor at Farmer Village, 1866 to 1868; Marlborough, 1868 to 1872; Geneva, 1872 to 1878, when he died, March 31. He was deeply spiritual, and a friend of every good cause. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church (3d ed.), p. 204.

Brual de Monplaischamp, Jan, a Flemish biographer, lived in the early half of the 18th century. He was a native of Namur, and was canon of Brusela. He wrote a large number of works, among which we notice a history of Philippe Emmanuel de Lorraine:—of Jean d'Auriche:——of Emmanuel Philipp, duc de Savoie:——of Alexander Farnese, duc de Parma:——of the Archduke Albert. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Brusel, Peter van, a theologian of the Jesuit order, was born at Bois-le-Duc in 1612. After having taught classics, rhetoric, and philosophy, he became missionary to the Duchy of Berg, and died at Hildesheim, May 7, 1664. He published a work in German on Spiritual Resurrection, in opposition to the consistory of Dusseldorf (Cologne, 1664). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Brusseri, Filippo, an Italian chronologist, a native of Savoy, lived in the early part of the 14th century. He wrote a history of the order of St. Francis, of which he was a member, entitled Sepulchrum Terra Sancta. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bruté, Simon William Gabrieli, an eminent dignitary of the Roman Catholic Church in America, was born at Rennes, France, March 20, 1779, his father being superintendent of the royal domains in Brittany. He studied theology at the College of St. Sulpice, and was broken up by the Revolution. He graduated at the famous school of Paris with the highest honors, and immediately received an appointment to one of the government dispensatories; but he had resolved to enter the priesthood, and on leaving the medical school he entered the Seminary of St. Sulpice. Ordained in 1808, he became professor of theology in the seminary at Rennes. After his arrival in America, he taught philosophy for two years in the seminary at Baltimore, and was then sent to Emmitsburg to help father Dubois in the management of the College of Mount St. Mary. This struggling institution owed much to Bruté. His scholarship extended its studies, his organizing ability established the system upon which the college was conducted, while his gentle and devout life was an example to the young men under his charge. No one has exerted a more beneficial influence upon the Catholic religion than Bruté. His humility, piety, and learning made him a model of the Christian priest. At the same time he carried on missionary labors in the country around, sometimes walking fifty miles per day, and giving away in charity his last penny. In 1834 he was appointed first bishop of the new see of Vincennes, Ind., and consecrated at St. Louis, Mo., Oct. 28, 1834. The condition of his Church throughout that region was low indeed. There were only three priests in his diocese, and the episcopal residence consisted of one room and a closet. Bruté visited all the stations, wrote twice a month to all the priests, sought out Roman Catholic settlers, preached to the Indians, went to Europe and obtained twenty priests and seminarians for his diocese, contributed constantly to the Catholic periodicals, established a college, seminary, orphan asylum, and free school, and built churches. He wore himself out by such labors, and died June 26, 1889. A new edition of Memoirs of Bishop Bruté, edited by archbishop Bayley, and illustrated with engravings, was published in 1847 by the Catholic Publication Society (N. Y. 1876). See (N. Y.) Catholic Almanac, 1876, p. 72; De Courcy and Shea, Hist. of the Catholic Church in the United States, p. 105, 561; Clarke, Lives of Deceased Bishops of the Catholic Church in the United States, s. v.

Brutel de la Rivière, Jean Baptiste, a Dutch Protestant theologian of French origin, was born at Montpellier in 1629, and died in August, 1742. He wrote an anonymous translation of L'Histoire des Juifs et des Peuples Votains, of H. Prieur (Amsterdam, 1728):——Sermons sur divers Textes de l'Écriture Sainte (ibid. 1746). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Brutius, Pietro, an Italian prelate and theologian, a native of Venice, lived in the latter half of the 15th century. The efforts which he put forth for the conversion of the Guelphs and for the appointment of bishop of Cattaro in Dalmatia. Among his numerous works we notice Victoria contra Judeos (1498). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bruyas, Jacques, a French Jesuit missionary, was born in 1637. He arrived in Canada in August, 1666, and began to labor in the interests of the Iroquois missions, which he greatly strengthened by his labors. He died at Sault St. Louis, Canada, June 15, 1712. He made a thorough study of the Mohawk language, and wrote several works on it. His Radical Words of the Mohawk Language was published in New York in 1682.

Brutyn (or Bruin), Abraham Van, a Flemish engraver, was born at Antwerp about 1540. The following are some of his best works: Moses and the Burning Bush; The Four Evangelists; Philip Louis, Elector Palatine; Albert Frederick, Duke of Prussia. He died in 1598. See Spoorer, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Brury (or Bruyn), Nicholas de, a French engraver, was born at Antwerp in 1570, and studied under his father, Abraham Bruyn. The following are some of his principal plates: Adam and Eve in Paradise; Adam and Eve Standing under the Tree of the Forbidden Fruit; David and Goliath; The Crucifixion; The Resurrection; St. Paul Preaching.

Bruy, Walther van, a Dutch Protestant theologian, was born May 6, 1618, at Amersfoort. He studied at Utrecht, in 1641 at Hagestein, and in 1644 at Utrecht. In 1652 he was appointed professor of theology, in 1658 made doctor of theology, and died July 7, 1653. He wrote, De Malo et eo quod Inium, quodque Spontaneum est:—De Scriptura Novi Testamenti Adversus Epicurum:—Disseratio Inauguralia de Doebis Fideles Divinitis:—Diss. ii ad Hist. Trium Caelestium Christianorum:—Tractatus Eruditiissimi Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelobtes-Lexikon, s. v. (B.P.)

Brus, François, a French writer, was born at Sèrrières, in the Maconnois district, Feb. 7, 1708. He received his education among the monks of Cluny and the fathers of the Oratory of Notre-Dame-de-Gresigne-Forez. In 1726 he went to Geneva, and in the following year to the Hague, where he became a Protestant. In 1736 he returned to Paris, and having, in its turn, embraced Calvinism, he returned to his paternal faith, and died at Dijon, May 20, 1788. He wrote a Histoire des Papes (Hague, 1732—34, 5 vols. 4to). This work was written after he had become a Protestant, and is now read by the writers of both of the two communions. See Biog. Universelle, s. v.; Landon, Eccl. Dict. s. v.

Bry (or Brie), Jean Théodore de, a Flemish engraver, the son and scholar of Théodore de Bry, was born at Liége in 1561, and assisted his father in many of his works. The following prints are by him: Portrait de Daniel Specklin; The Marriage of Rebecca; The Little Village Fair; The Fountain of Youth; The Tower of Babel. He died in 1620 or 1623. See Spoorer, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Bry (or Brie), Théodore de, an eminent Flemish engraver, was born at Liége in 1598. The following are some of his principal works: St. John in the Wilderness; A Dance of Men and Women Peasants; Thrice Nine Muses. He died at Frankfort-on-the-Main in 1656. See Spoorer, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoeft, Nov. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bryan, Alfred M'Greedy, D.D., a Cumberland Presbyterian minister, was born in Logan County, Ky., Aug. 19, 1805. He professed religion at the age of seventeen, and studied under Dr. William Price. The Logan Presbytery received him as a candidate for the ministry on April 2, 1828; he was licensed April 7, 1825, and ordained at Glasgow, Oct. 8, 1829. To the latter date he labored in various parts of Kentucky, and then was appointed to what was called the Mercer District, in the northern part of the same state. About 1830 he took charge of a congregation in Nashville, Tenn., where he remained about two years. Then, by the invitation of Dr. John Brown, he removed to the Allegheny Mountains and labored as missionary to Western Pennsylvania, and after serving eighteen months as such took charge of a church in Pittsburgh, with which he was identified until the time of his death. In December, 1833, the congregation completed and occupied a house of worship on Smithfield Street. When this house became too small, a larger church was built, and was dedicated in June, 1842. The great fire which visited Pittsburgh in 1841 partially disabled the congregation, and he visited Tennessee and Kentucky to raise money for its relief. He accepted a call to Memphis, Tenn., in 1856; but in 1859 returned to Pittsburgh as pastor of his former church. While conducting a meeting, by appointment of the presbytery, in Van Buren, Washington Co., Pa., he fell back unconscious, and died the following day, Jan. 22, 1861. See Beadle, Biographical Sketches, 1st series, p. 292; Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1862, p. 283.

Bryan, Andrew, a colored Baptist minister, was a slave belonging to the Hon. Jonathan Bryan, a distinguished patriot of the Revolution. Andrew founded the first colored Church in Savannah, Ga., and remained its pastor through the contest with the South, Oct. 6, 1812. He was very highly esteemed for his piety. See Spreague, Annals of the Ameer. Pilgrims, vi, 259.

Bryan, James Madison, a colored Methodist Episcopalian minister, was born in slavery in Newbern, N. C., June 1, 1817. He was sold in his twenty-second year to a wealthy planter on bayou Lafourche, La., in whose family he became a great favorite, and received careful religious instruction. In due time he joined the Church, and became a useful preacher. He remained with his owners until 1855, when he entered the Mississippi Mission Conference, wherein he served faithfully until his death, Jan. 2, 1876. Mr. Bryan was an excellent man, a close student, a sound Methodist, and aurgent preacher. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1876, p. 12; Simpson, Cyclopaedia of Methodist, s. v.

Bryan, Joseph Firth, an English Congregational minister, was born in Liverpool in 1812. As a child he was a Sunday-school scholar; as a young man, first a school-teacher, and then a pastor for several years at Rarewash, near Colchester, where his labors were abundant. In 1846 he undertook a "A Ragged and Industrial School," which greatly flourished under his care. During his twenty-five years in the industrial school he did not relinquish the pulpit, but was a favorite supply. He died Dec. 11, 1871. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1878, p. 219.

Bryan, Samuel Clothier, an English minister of the Society of Friends, was born at Alston-Mellet, Somersetshire, in 1713. Here he lived sixty years, and resided in Glastonbury, in the same county, for the remainder of his life. In his youthful days he was somewhat wayward in his conduct, but the grace of God subdued his evil temper, and he became not only a worthy member of the society with which he connected himself, but an approved minister. He died Jan. 23, 1805. Mr. Bryan's preaching was plain, edifying, and scriptural, and confined chiefly within the limits of his own quarterly meeting. See Fiery Promoted, iii, 346, 348. (J. C. S.)

Bryant, Alfred, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Springfield, Essex Co., N. J., March 12, 1807. He commenced his preparatory studies in the Academy at Princeton, continued them at the Marquis Institute at Germantown, Pa., and then for two years at Elizabeth, N. J.; entered Princeton Seminary in the fall of 1831, and spent three years: was licensed by the Presbytery of Elizabethtown, Oct. 9, 1834, and ordained by the Presbytery of St. Joseph at South Bend, Ind., April 14, 1836. Soon after completing his seminary course he went to Boston, Mr. Bryant went to the West, and labored at South Bend nearly eight years (1835—43), preached also extensively through all the northern counties of Indiana and of south-western Michigan, and aided in securing the erection of at least three Presbyterian churches. His next field was Edwardsburg, Mich., where, dealing with a small church, he was pastor from 1843 to 1844. He was pastor at Niles from 1848 to 1853, having accomplished the erection of the present large church in that place. He was then missionary and stated supply at North Lansing from 1863 to 1870, preaching also in many neighboring places. He was pastor of the Second Church of North Lansing from 1870 to 1874. From 1874 to 1877 he was in very infirm health, but so far recovered that he served the church in Genoa, after that in Delhi, and then at Holts, until 1880. He died at Lansing, June 2, 1881. With one exception he never labored for any length of time in a place without building a church edifice. He was instrumental in gathering and organizing a large number of congregations. See ”Vernacular Report of Princeton Theol. Seminary,” p. 36.

Bryant, Andrew, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Mercer County, Ky., Sept. 23, 1818. He joined the Church in 1833, was licensed to exhort in 1835, to preach in 1837, and in 1866 entered the Kentucky Conference. In 1869, on the formation of the Lexington Conference, he became a member of it, and in its active ranks labored with great success. He died Sept. 14, 1870. Mr. Bryant was a man of considerable ability, an impressive speaker, and a genial, generous Christian. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1871, p. 16.

Bryant, George S., an English Methodist minister, was born in Cornwall. He was educated at the Wesleyans Training College, Westminster. He entered the ministry in Newfoundland in 1783, was stationed three years at Green Harbor, and then sent to Old Porlier, where he died, Sept. 16, 1787, while yet young in the work. His fidelity and zeal were not without fruit. See The Wesleyan, Oct. 5, 1787.

Bryant, Hilliard, a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the diocese of Connecticut, for many years rector of St. Peter's Church, Cheshire, but removed from that place in 1866, to become pastor of St. Peter's Church, Hebron, and died there Sept. 11, 1880, aged seventy-two years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1881, p. 172.

Bryant, H. D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Pennsylvania. In 1863 he entered the California Conference, and in 1873 was appointed pastor. He died Sept. 14, 1870. Mr. Bryant was a man of considerable ability, an impressive speaker, and a genial, generous Christian. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1877, p. 101.

Bryant, John, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at St. Agnes, Cornwall. He joined the Methodist Church in 1799, and the Conference in 1809. He died at Exeter, July 3, 1825. For a eulogy of his character and work, see Minutes of British Conference, 1823-1825.

Bryant, Lemuel, a Unitarian minister, was born at Scituate, Mass., in 1722, and was a graduate of Harvard in 1739. He was ordained at Quincy Dec. 4, 1745, and was dismissed Oct. 22, 1753. He died at Scituate, Oct. 17, 1754. Mr. Bryant published several single sermons. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vii, 6.

Bryant, O. W., a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at New Vineyard, Me., March 3, 1815. He was converted at the age of nineteen, moved to Illinois in 1836, and united with the Baptist Church at Lamotte, Bureau Co., and subsequently with the Free-will Baptist Church near his residence. Shortly after this he took up his residence at Four Mile Grove, which was his home till death. Of the Church, which was established largely through his efforts, in this place, he was ordained pastor in August, 1839. Besides performing his ministerial work, he filled many offices of trust in the county, and was once a member of the state legislature. He died Aug. 2, 1882. See Morning Star, Sept. 29, 1882. (J. C. S.)

Bryant, Robert, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Dia, Norfolk, in 1788. His ministry commenced in 1814; he retired from its activities in 1835 and died Dec. 1, 1837. Although he was subjected to painful mental depression throughout life, many were turned to the Lord under his ministry. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1858.

Bryant, Samuel S., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born Aug. 4, 1809. He was converted in 1828, and joined the North Carolina Conference in 1832. In 1834 he was ordained deacon, and in 1856 elder. From 1837 to 1839 he was agent for Greensboro Female Collegiate Institute, and from 1840 to 1844 he was presiding elder of the Richmond district. In 1867 he became a member of the South-West Missouri Conference. He was presiding elder of Kansas City district from 1869 to 1873, and in 1877 was appointed pastor in Kansas City. At the end of two years his health failed, and in 1879 he was granted a supernumerary relation. He was for many years of an officer of Central College, and in 1878 was a delegate to the General Conference. His death occurred Dec. 29, 1880. He was an able preacher, and always acceptable to the people he served. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1880, p. 223.

Bryant, William Cullen, an eminent journalist and poet, was born at Cummington, Mass., Nov. 3, 1794. When he was but ten years of age he translated from several of the poets with so much skill that their beauty that their translations were deemed worthy of publication. The Embargo, a political satire, written when he was thirteen years old, was printed in Boston in 1808. Pursuing his studies at Williams College for two years, he was especially distinguished for his attainments in philosophy and belles-lettres. When but eighteen years of age (1815) he was admitted to the bar, and began the practice of his profession in Plainfield, Mass., from which he shortly removed to Great Barrington. It was at this period of his life that he wrote his Thamatopias, and published it in the North American Review in 1816—one of the most remarkable poems in the English language, glowing with the spirit of natural religion, and pervaded with the most devout reverence for the invisible Creator of the universe. Four years afterwards (1821) he delivered before the Phi Beta Kappa Society, at the Commencement of Harvard University, his celebrated poem, The Ages, which, with some other of his poems made up a volume, which was published the same year. Having devoted ten years to the practice of his profession, he decided to retire from the bar and enter upon a kind of work more congenial to his tastes. Accordingly he removed to New York in 1825, and became the editor of the New York Review, which was afterwards merged into the United States Review. His connection with The Evening Post (N. Y.) commenced in 1826, and continued until his death. A full edition of his works was brought out in 1832. This edition, with a flattering preface written by Washington Irving, was published in England not long after its appearance in this country. Carey & Hart, in 1846, published his complete poetical works, and subsequently Messrs. D. Appleton & Co. became his publishers. Mr. Bryant travelled extensively, both in the United States and in foreign countries. The results of his observations, both at home and abroad, have come to the public through his columns of The Evening Post. The letters thus written were collected into book form, and are among the most interesting and instructive volumes of travel in the language. His love for the classics, which, amid the pressure of his professional duties, was never lost, showed itself in his elegant translation of The Iliad, which was published in 1870, and of the Odyssey, published in 1871. These translations are among the best that have been made into our language, of the epics of Homer. Mr. Bryant has written some religious poetry which is worthy of mention in a work like this. As we have seen, at the very outset of his career, a devout, serious spirit inspired his mind. He was at 18 in 1811; by 1850 during which period he laid the foundation of his justly earned fame. We find choice gems scattered through his works, which makes us feel that he was conscious of the purest thoughts and the most elevated emotions. Among these we may include the hymns bearing the titles, Blessed are they that Mourn; No Man Knoweth his Sepulchre; Hymn of the Waldenses; Song of the Stars; A Forest Hymn; Hymn of the City; The Love of God; A Hymn of the Sea; The Mother's Hymn; He hath set all Things in Order and keepeth roast and meat. One of his reviewers uses this language: "His poetry overflows with natural religion, with what Wordsworth calls the 'religion of the woods.'"

Mr. Bryant died at his beautiful country residence, near the village of Roslyn, Long Island (N. Y.), June 19, 1878, Poets and Poems of America, Osgood, Address before the Goethe Society; Duysckinc, Cyclop. of Amer. Literature, i, 899 sq. For list of references to articles reviewing Bryant's works, see Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v. (J. C. S.)

Bryant, William F., a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was rector at different times at Locke's Mills, at Mullica Hill, and was assistant in the parish of the Church of the Atonement, Philadelphia; and finally assumed charge of Trinity Church, Covington, Ky. He died Aug. 21, 1856, in Jackson, Mich., aged thirty-three years. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1856, p. 464.

Bryce, John, a Baptist minister, was born in Goohland County, Va., May 31, 1784, being descended from a Scotch ancestor. He was reared in the Episcopal Church, joined the parents were members. His conversion took place at the age of twenty-one, and he joined a Baptist Church. By profession he was a lawyer. Having been ordained about the year 1806, he preached, as he had opportunity, in Richmond and Lynchburg. He was, for a time, master in chancery under George Washington. In 1819 he was called to be colleague-minister with the First Baptist Church in Richmond, and for nearly twelve years he occupied this position. He afterwards was pastor in Fredericksburg and Alexandria. For a few years he resided in Georgetown, Ky., afterwards for ten years (1833-43) in Crawfordsville, Ind., and for a number of years in Shreveport, La. In all these places he accomplished much for the promotion of the prosperity of his denomination. His last residence was in Henderson, Ky., where he died, July 26, 1864. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 155. (J. C. S.)

Brychan, king of Brecknock, in the 5th century, is said to have been the father of twenty-four sons and twenty-five, or twenty-six, daughters, who are called "the children of Brychan." The fact is that Brecknock was at one time a great missionary centre, and numerous inscribed gravestones are still found there; and an incised cross at Llanappydiddy is still called Brychan's stone. The connecting various members of a tribe under the form of a genealogy is not uncommon, and the lists are valuable as showing the connection of the churches in South Wales and the opposite coast of Cornwall. The practice of making such lists prevailed in the latter section, where "Brychan's children" only means the devoees who came from Wales.

Brynildur, in Norse mythology, was a captive maiden, the daughter of Budis. She was liberated by the Siegurd, when asleep. Siegurd found the maiden extraordinarily beautiful, and fell in love with her. But in Gjuki's house, at which he stayed, he became inclined to forget her on drinking a magic drink, and married Gudrun, the daughter of Grimhild. Gun- nar, the brother of Gudrun, desired to possess Brynildur, but did not dare to fulfill a certain condition which she asked of him. He therefore persuaded the mighty Siegurd to fulfill the condition, disguised as Gunnar, Brynildur did not discover the deceit until, when bathing with Gunnar, she discovered that the latter had the ring which she supposed she had given to Gunnar, but which she gave to Siegurd, who gave it to his wife Gudrun. Her love now turned into hate, and she sought revenge for the deceit. She instigated Gunnar and Hogni to murder Siegurd, and after killing herself and Siegurd were burned on one funeral pile.

Bryson, Robert C., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Spring Hill, Pa., Dec. 3, 1828. He pursued his academic studies at Danville, McEnawville, and Lewisburg, and his theological at Princeton Seminary, where he graduated in 1856. He was licensed to preach in 1858, and was ordained and installed pastor of the Church in Altoona, Pa., by the Presbytery of Pennsylvania. In 1868 he was called to take charge of the Pine Grove Church, Pa., where he soon won the confidence and esteem of all who knew him. On every question of reform he took no equivocal position. He died at Pine Grove Mills, April 13, 1873. See Presby- terian, April 29, 1873. (W. P. S.)

Brytannus, Gualg, a Welsh poet of the 12th century, was fostered in infancy devoted to the Muses. That he might serve them the better he retired from the world and became an anchorite—not for devotion, but for his fancy. He attacked the monks, whose covetousness, wantonness, and impostures were great temptations to the satirist. He did this with such cautiousness that he incurred no danger, in fact, was commended by John of Salisbury and others. He flourished in 1170, under Henry II. See Fuller, Worthers of England (ed. Nuttal), iii, 499.

Brzelecki, Bernhard de, a Polish Dominican of Premislav, was at first regular canone of the holy sepul- chre at Jerusalem, but joined his order when already advanced in years, and died about the year 1639. He wrote De Responsio Spiritus S. a filio:—De Milicia Christiana:—De Alienatione Animorum a Christianismo. Of these works only the first was published, of which also an edition in Polish was edited. See Echand, De Scriptoribus Ordinis Dominicorum: Staravolaci Scriptorum Poloniam Centurias: Jobcher, Allgemeine Geschicht-Lezikon, s. v. (H. P.)

Buabin, in the mythology of the Tonkin-Chinese, is a deity who protects the dwellings of men. He is worshipped especially by those engaged in building houses.

Buatmaelus, an Irish saint, is given as one of the disciples of St. Patrick. When the latter was passing through Connaught, it is said that one called Baudmael died and was buried in the place where a church was built, and took the name of Kill-Bandmael, which was a Patrician Church. Among the disciples of St. Benignus are included Buedanus and Buadmaelus.

Buaidhbeo, an Irish saint, is given by Mart. Doney, on November 17, as being the same with Aenghus of Cillmor, of Aithor Fine, of the race of Oriel. Colgan (Life of Olicum, February 20) says that Colladius, who gave St. Patrick a site for his church, had five of his children noted for sanctity, e. g., St. Buabo, etc. In Dr. Reyre's Ecc. Antiqu. Dublin and Connor, mention is made of Buidhbeo, son of Lughaib.

Buan, a Welsh saint, the founder of Boduan, Car- narvonshire, in the 6th century. His festival was held Aug. 4. See Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 280.

Buatan, an Irish saint of Ethias-cruinn, is commemorated January 24. Thus he is designated in the Mart. Doney., but that of Tallaght has "Batan Meithas Truith, Nendrick, Bishop of Tallaght;" and Colgan (Life of Olicum, February 20) identifies as Mostrin. Colgan (Tr. Thomas, p.

Butaté, in Persian mythology, is one of the evil devas who were formed by Ahriman to oppose the creations of light, produced by Ormuzd. He causes contagious diseases.

Bubast, in Egyptian mythology, is synonymous with the Grecian Artemis and the Roman Diana, being the daughter of Osiris and Isis, who are the same with Bacchus and Ceres among the Greeks and Romans. She is also the sister of Horus, who corresponds to the Greek Apollo. Isis gave her with Horus to Buto (Greek Latona) for protection from the evil god Typhon, the persecutor of Osiris and his generation. As to the significance of her name little is known. She appears to have been a goddess of the moon or birth. But she was a highly honored goddess. In the city Bubastis she had a temple whose walls contained six immense statues, and furnished a place of worship for the innumerable throngs of people who yearly came up or down the Nile to join in the celebration of her joyous festival. The cat, the hieroglyphic symbol of the moon, was sacred to the goddess. In the city Bubastis was the place for collecting mummies of cats. These animals, after death, were brought to the temple in great solemnity, and there embalmed and buried.

Bubier, George Burden, an English Congregational minister, was born at Reading, Feb. 2, 1823. He lost both his parents while still a boy, joined the Church in 1841, and soon after entered Homerton College. In 1844 he was ordained pastor at Orsett, Essex. Between 1846 and 1864 he labored successively at Brixton, Cambridge, and at Hope Chapel, Salford. He then accepted an invitation to the chair of theology and philosophy in Spring Hill College, in conjunction with the pastorate of Acee's Green Congregational Church. Here he died, March 19, 1869. Mr. Bubier's literary powers were of an unusual order, thus ranking him high as an instructor; yet he gloried, above all things, in his office as an ambassador for Christ. For about fifteen years he had the management of the literary department of the Nonconformist, and in his hands that journal maintained a high reputation as an organ of free and appreciative criticism. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1870, p. 279.

Bubón, in Roman mythology, was a goddess who was said to protect the herd, especially oxen.

Bucellin, Gabriel, a German Benedictine and historian, was born at Dissenhoen, near Torgau, and died in the abbey of Weingarten, Wurttemberg, in 1561. He was prior of the convents at Feldkirch and Rheintal, and wrote a large number of works, among which we find Nucleus Historiae Universalis (1554-58):—Annales Benedictini (Augsburg, 1656, fol.):—Aguila Imperii Benedictini (Venice, 1651):—Menolog, Benedictinum (Feldkirch, 1655, fol.). See Bicher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. 1, 7, 19, 711; Hoefer, Nouv. Bioi. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Bucellin, Jean, a French historian and Jesuit, was born at Cambray in 1571, and died in 1629. He wrote Gallo-Flamandae Sacrae et Profanae (Douay, 1625). See Hoefer, Nouv. Bioi. Générale, s. v.

Bucer, Geissone, a Dutch theologian, was born in the latter part of the 17th century at Veere, where he studied and taught Latin and Greek. Bucer himself was well versed in Hebrew, and also in Church government, upon which he wrote a volume, De Gubernatione Ecclesiae, in opposition to Doréman, a famous English divine. This book drew upon him the hatred of James I, but found so much favor at home that it went very soon to a fourth edition. He died in 1631. He was one of the company appointed by the Synod of Dort for the translation of the Old Test. for the famous Sterkensprofit, States Edition (B. P.)

Buchanan, David, a Baptist editor, was born in Glasgow, Scotland, March 3, 1807. He was educated for the legal profession, but gave it up; came to Canada in 1834, and settled near the town of Paris, where, through his efforts, a Baptist Church was formed. In 1849 he removed to Toronto, and started a weekly Baptist newspaper, The Pioneer. Subsequently he was appointed government inspector of the College of Toronto for the United States, and held this position till his death. He was active in all denominational matters, and, at the time of his death, was president for the third time of the Home Mission Convention of Ontario. He died Oct. 17, 1877. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclo., p. 1293. (J. C. S.)

Buchanan, George, an associate Reformed minister, was born about 1762 at "The Barrens of York." He graduated at Dickinson College in 1805, and shortly after entered the Theological Seminary of the Associate Reformed Church in the city of New York. Having completed this course, he was licensed by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, December, 1809. In 1810 he was ordained as a pastor in the First church in New York, and labored in the vacancies of the Monongahela Presbytery till April, 1811. Soon after he accepted a call to Steubenville, Ohio, in which charge he labored for about forty-four years, until his death, Oct. 14, 1855. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, IX, iv, 138.

Buchanan, John, D.D., a minister of the Protessant Episcopal Church, was born near Dumfries, Scotland, in 1748. Buchanan graduated at the University of Edinburgh, studied law with a view to practicing in his native country; but, having gone to Richmond, Va., with his eldest brother, James, a merchant, he conceived an aversion to that profession. After studying theology he returned to Great Britain, and in 1775 received orders in the Church of England. Then he went back to Virginia, preaching occasionally, and for a time was employed as a family teacher. In 1780 he took charge of Lexington parish; and in 1785 became assistant minister to the Rev. Miles Selden, rector of St. John's Church, Henries Parish, Va. When Mr. Selden died, 1787, Buchanan succeeded to the rectorship. About the year 1790 he began to preach at the capitol in Richmond. After the burning of the Richmond theatre, in 1812, the Monumental Church was built, to the rectorship of which bishop Richard C. Moore was invited, and upon the duties of which he entered in 1816. Buchanan became pastor of Monumental to the bishop, and served the new church during bishop Moore's diocesan visits; but he still retained his office as rector of St. John's, assisted by Rev. William H. Hart of New York. He died in Richmond, Dec. 13, 1822. As a preacher his manner was dignified, but lacked animation; but the chief attribute of his character was his benevolence. Possessed of large means, he ministered most liberally to the wants of the poor. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 324.

Buchanan, John Junkin, an Associate Reformed minister, was born at Steubenville, O., Jan. 24, 1817. He graduated at Franklin College, New Athens, in 1838, and studied theology. He became associated with the Society of Allegheny City, and was licensed by the Presbytery of Steubenville in 1841. The next year he served two congregations in Beaver County, Pa., and was ordained by the Presbytery of Monongahela. After a few years he was obliged, from failing health, to give up his charge. In June, 1852, he left the congregation then under his care, and returned home. But he died on July 27 of the following year. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, IX, iv, 139.

Buchanan, Joseph H., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Washington County, Pa., Sept. 22, 1833.
Buchanan, Robert, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Stirling, Scotland, Aug. 15, 1802. He graduated at the Edinburgh University, and was ordained to the ministry in 1827. After the brief settlements in country parishes, he was called to Glasgow, where his ministry was eminent and successful, and where he was largely interested and successful in promoting measures for the amelioration of the condition of the poor, which Chalmers had inaugurated and personally carried forward with success. By the advice of that eminent man, he declined the offer of the chair of Old Testament in 1827. Buchanan was moderator of the Free Church General Assembly in 1860. He was one of the foremost leaders of the movement in the disruption of the Church of Scotland, being engaged, not only in counsel at home, but in watching and shaping events in the British Parliament, and in ministerial circles in London. More than once, when the British government was appealed to by the Church of Scotland—over which it claimed to exercise authority—for protection in the exercise of her spiritual rights and independence, and when great anxiety was felt lest heavier bonds should be placed upon her instead of those she had already bound herself to bear, Dr. Buchanan was selected by his brethren as one of a deputation to visit London to enlighten cabinet ministers and leading members of the Lords and Commons in the great principles which had already been worked out in regard to the freedom of the Church. He was chosen historian of the movement for disruption, and he prepared a faithful record of the times, which was printed under the title of Ten Years' Conflict (Edinburgh, 1849, 2 vols. 8vo), and which is the standard history of the measures which led to the disruption. His health giving way under his many arduous labors, he went to Rome, in hope that the milder climate of Italy would be beneficial, but his constitution was too far undermined to recover. Sleeping peacefully in his bed one morning, without any premonition, he was called away to his rest, in 1878. (W.P.S.)

Buchel, Jan van, a Belgian bishop, was born at Tournai. He was first instructor in a school, then canon of St. Quentin and dean of Notre Dame, and finally bishop in 1582. He was exceedingly jealous of his episcopal prerogatives, yet nevertheless bore the reputation of being virtuous and a great lover of the arts. He died at Tournai in 1626. See Hoefn, Nouv. Biog. Générales, s.v.

Buchenröder, Michael, a Protestant theologian of Germany, who died at Heidelberg; July 13, 1683, wrote, De Dubia et Gog et Magna, and Von der leeuwen. To the works of Gog et Magna in Monte Israele, Horumque Foemini Excidia. See Witte, Diarium Biographicum; Jöcher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon, s.v. (B.P.)

Bucher, Zsigmond, a Hungarian bishop, was born in 1576, joined the order in 1598, became its rector, and died at Dornach, March 8, 1665. He wrote, Disput. Hymnicae, and in 1682, published, Disputatio de levi Testamento, and De Tribus Jurisdictionibus Temporibus. See Alemagbe, Bibliotheca Scriptorum Societatis Jesu; Acta Eruditurae Latinia; Papadophili, Historia Gymnasiae Palatinae; Jöcher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon, s.v. (B.P.)

Bucher, George B., an English Congregational minister, was born in London in 1812. He made a profession of religion at an early age, went to Canada when eighteen, and in 1836 entered the ministry as a missionary of the Methodist body in Upper Canada. In 1854 he transferred his relations to the Congregationalists, and in 1863 was ordained at Granby, where he died, Aug. 31, 1865. Mr. Bucher was mentally and physically endowed, but his health was broken. He was an able and faithful to the full extent of his physical ability. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1867, p. 273.

Buchler, Johann Conrad, a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) and German Reformed Churches, was born in Switzerland, June 10, 1730. He came to America in 1755 as a military officer—the British, from policy, choosing German officers for German troops—and was one of nine to arrive in 1757. He was pastor in 1754 to Carlisle, Pa., in 1763-68; also at Middletown, 1755-68; Falling Springs, 1765-68; and at Lebanon, etc., 1768-80, where he suddenly died, Aug. 15, 1780. He was remarkable for having acquired a rich flow of language and unprecedented copiousness and energy. The breadth rendered the attention of all who heard him. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church (3d ed.), p. 204; Harbaugh, Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church, ii, 109.

Bucher, Samuel Friedrich, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Sept. 16, 1692, at Regensburg, baptized at Würzburg, and studied at Wittenberg. He was appointed professor of antiquities there. In 1726 he was made rector of the public school, but in 1728 he accepted an appointment at Zittau, where he died, May 12, 1755. He wrote, Dis. de Velato Hebraorum Synaxe (Wittenberg, 1715);—Dis. de Concluso Hebraorum Synaxe (ibid. 1716);—De Occulta Hebraorum Sponsa (ibid. ed.);—Antiquitates de Velato Hebraorum et Graecorum Faminis (1717);—Tractatus de Conclusa Hebraorum Faminis (ed.);—Antiquitates Passionales (1721);—Grammatica Hebraea (1722);—Antiquitates Selectae in Universum Scripturam (vol. i. 1738):—Philosophia prima s. Metaphysica Dogmatica (ed.);—Theaurus Orientalis (Frankfort, 1735);—Antiquitates Bibliorum exNovoTestamento Selectae, Constatudines, Ritus, FormulasVestrum Examinatos (Wittenberg, 1729). See Steinschneider, Bibliographisches Handbuch, p. 27, s.v.; Jöcher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon, s.v. (B.P.)

Buchfelder, Ernst Wilhelm, a Reformed theologian of Germany, was born June 5, 1845, at Bentheim, and first studied theology. In 1866 he was in the service of the court of Theing of Under-Eyck, court-preacher to the landgravine Hedwig Sophia of Hesse-Cassel, who impressed him so deeply that, although twenty-four years of age, he betook himself to the study of theology. For this purpose he went to Utrecht. Having finished his studies there, he was, in 1869, appointed professor of church history for four years, regularly attending the sermons and devotional exercises of Under-Eyck, who, since 1670, was pastor of St. Martin's. In 1876 he received his first appointment as preacher in Gieklstein, in Holstein, and in the following year he was elected president of the Latin school at Eden, in East Friesland. In 1878 he was called to Fliingen, and in 1888 to Eden, where he died, March 8, 1711. He is the author of only one hymn, which may be regarded as a jewel of the Reformed hymnology: Erleucht mich, Herr, mein Licht (Engl. transal. in Mill's Hora Germ. p. 39, "Impart, O Lord, my light "). See Koch, Gesch. des deutschen Kirchenlebens, i, 14. (B.P.)

Büchner, Gottfried, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born in 1701 at Riedersdorf. He studied at Jens, and died as rector at Quefert in 1780. He is best known as the author of Die Bibelische Real- und Verbal-Hand-Condordanz (15th ed. Brunswick, 1867). He also published a number of homiletical works. See Jöcher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon, s.v. (B.P.)

Buchholtz, Andreas Henricus, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Nov. 25, 1697, at Schnei- lingen. He studied at Wittenberg, was in 1632 co-rector in his native city, in 1834 at Rostock, in 1836 at Helmstedt, and in 1837 rector of the gymnasion at Lengov. In 1839 he went to Rinteln, where he lectured on philosophy. In 1845 he was made professor of theology, and in 1847 he accepted a call to Brunswick. In 1849 he was appointed to the chair of Moral Philosophy in the University of Romford, butupon the superintendency of Wolfenbüttel, and he died May 20, 1871. He wrote, Philosophia Practica:— Tractatus Theologiae de Ecclesia Romana Pontifici Subiecta Indulgentiis:— Hauss-Andachten, etc. See Witte, Memoir Theologorum; Jocher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. F.)

Bucholtz, Heinrich, a Lutheran theologian of Hamburg, where he also was appointed deacon of St. Nicholas in 1633, and died Jan. 16, 1660, is the author of a Commentary on the Book of Ecclesiastes, which he published in rhyme. See Moller, Cimbria Literata; Jocher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. F.)

Bucholtz, Abraham, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Schonau, in Saxony, Sept. 28, 1599. He studied at Frankfort and Wittenberg, was in 1556 rector at Grunberg, in Silesia, and then pastor at Sprottau, Crossen, and Freystadt. He died June 14, 1584. He wrote, Isagoge Chronologica ab Inicio Mundi ad Exilium Israelitarum in Babylonem:— De Amorum serie in Sacris Biblia:—De Ieici bini Pastoris. See Adam, Vita Eruditorum; Freimuth, Theatrum Eruditorum; Jocher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. F.)

Buck, Benjamin, a Baptist minister, was born in Maine in 1768. His early associations were with the Congregationalists, but he united with the Baptists in 1800. He was ordained in 1817, at which time he became pastor of the churches at Orland and Bucksport. The following year he removed to Eastport, where he remained about one year, and then became pastor of the Church at Machias, where he resided from 1819 to 1825. He was called to Sullivan in 1826, where he remained about three years. After brief settlements in two or three places, he took charge of the Church at Harrington in 1833, remaining there till 1849. He retired in 1849 from the active duties of the ministry, and died Dec. 10, 1844. Mr. Buck was a good representative of a class of Baptist ministers in Maine who, without much scholarly education, did much in laying the foundations of what have since become strong and efficient churches. See Millett, Hist. of the Baptists of Maine, p. 437. (J. C. S.)

Buck, Johann Christian, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born on April 6, 1673, at Gotha, in the Duchy of Saxe-Lauenburg. He studied at Wittenberg and Leipzig, was in 1700 preacher, and in 1712 superintendent at Torgau; in 1715 he was made doctor of theology, and in 1723 first court-preacher at Dresden, where he died, Oct. 19. He wrote De apologeticis Circa Sacra, de nonolaeriquam Romanist Pontificia; de anno Hebraorum Jubilo. See Jocher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Ranft, Leben der chursachsisehen Gottgelehrten; Gleich, Annals Ecclesiastic. (B. F.)

Buck, John de, a Reforma tion martyr, was burned for reading the Scriptures, May 10, 1545, at Gaunt, in Surrey. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv. 384.

Buck, Minerson Erastus, a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the diocese of Missouri, graduated at Nashotah Theological Seminary (Wis.), and was ordained in 1876. From 1874 to 1877 he was pastor of Trinity Church, Three Rivers, Mich.; and from 1876 until the close of his life had charge of St. Luke's Church, Kansas City, Mo. He died Jan. 20, 1879. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1880, p. 170.

Buck, William Calmes, a Baptist minister, was born in what is now Warren County, Va., Aug. 28, 1790. He was ordained in 1812, served as a lieutenant in the United States Army, and from his charge of a church in a neighboring county, lived in Union County, Ky., a number of years, having the pastoral charge of several churches, and moved to Louisvill in 1836, where he became pastor of the First Church. While living there he was, for most of the time, editor of the Baptist Banner and Western Pioneer. For three years (1851-54) he was secretary of the Bible Board of the Southern Baptist Convention, and pastor of Trinity Church in Columbus, Georgia, for three years. After preaching for a short time in one or two other places, he removed to Marion, Ala., and after being engaged for a year or two in editorial work, he labored as a missionary in the Confederate army. In 1866 he removed to Texas, and died at Waco, May 18, 1872. Among his published writings are the Baptist Hymn-Book, The Philosophy of Religion, and The Science of Life. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclopedia, p. 156, 157. (J. C. S.)

Buck, William Foster, an English Congregational minister, was born at Chatham in 1802. He was converted in youth, and received his ministerial preparation at Hoxton College. He went, in 1827, to Burton-on-Trent, where he preached sixteen months, and then became co-pastor at Canterbury. In 1830 Mr. Buck removed to Harleston, Norfolk, and after laboring here for eight years, he preached at Burton-on-Trent nine years, and then removed to Ross, where he remained until his death, Sept. 1, 1867. Mr. Buck was an affectionate and sympathizing pastor, as well as a faithful and respected minister. See (Lond.) Cong. Yearbook, 1858, p. 336.

Buckbridge (Buckridge or Buckridge), John, an English prelate of the first part of the seventeenth century, was born at Draycott, near Marlborough, Wilts. He was educated under Multcaster, in Merchant Taylors' School, and at St. John's College, Oxford, where, from a fellow, he became doctor of divinity and president (1655). He afterwards succeeded Lancelot Andrews in the vicarage of St. Giles, Cripplegate. On June 6, 1611, Buckbridge was consecrated bishop of Rochester, and afterwards set forth a learned book in opposition to John Fisher, De Potestate Papam in Temporibus Domini (1614). He was transferred to the bishopric of Ely in 1626, died May 29, 1631, and was buried in the parish church of Bromley, Kent. Bishop Buckbridge also published Sermons (1618), etc. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), iii, 327.

Bucker, George, an English martyr, was apprehended by the inquisitors appointed under the Six Articles Act, and taken to London, where he was sent to prison, and remained two years, in which time hardly large enough for him to stand in. He was declared a heretic, and for this cause was burned in 1544. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, v, 520.

Buckingham, Daniel, a Congregational minister, graduated at Yale College in 1735; was ordained pastor of the Church at Green Farms, Conn., March 19, 1742, and died in May, 1746. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 648.

Buckingham, John, of, an early English prelate, was born in the town so named in Bucks County. He was educated in the university of Oxford, and although plundered for want of learning, was a great disputant and well-versed scholar, as his works declare. He was made bishop of Lincoln, where he remained two years, in which time he married and pope Boniface IX took place, and the latter in revenge removed him from Lincoln to Lichfield, "that is, from the hall into the kitchen," says Fuller. He resigned the episcopacy in 1397, and lived and died in private at Canterbury. He indulged with the prior and convent of Canterbury to build him a chantry-chapel near his sepulchre, which Fuller found not performed. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), i, 196.

Buckingham, Stephen, a Congregational minister, son of the following, graduated at Harvard College in 1698; began preaching in Norwalk, Conn., in 1695; was ordained pastor there Nov. 17, 1697; resigned his charge of a church in 1721, and died in 1746. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 261.
Buckingham, Thomas (1), a Congregational minister, was a native of Wales. He emigrated to America and settled in Milton, Conn.; was ordained pastor of the Church in Saybrook in 1669 or 1670; was a member and treasurer of the Synod of 1678 that afterwards became Yale College; was moderator of the Synod of 1708 that produced the Saybrook Platform, and died in 1709. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 260.

Buckingham, Thomas (2), a Congregational minister, son of the foregoing, was born in 1679. He graduated at Harvard College in 1699, was ordained pastor of the Second Church, Hartford, Conn., and died Nov. 19, 1731. He published an election sermon. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 260.

Buckland, Rabbi Joseph Wales, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Deerfield, Oneida Co., N.Y., Dec. 16, 1829. His father was a Baptist minister. The son was a graduate, with valedictory honors, at Madison University in the class of 1849. His taste for historical studies was developed and matured in the excellent private library of Rev. W. R. Williams, D.D., of New York. His theological studies were pursued at the Union Theological Seminary, N.Y., where he graduated in 1855. On June 21 of the same year he was ordained pastor of the Olive Branch Baptist Church, in Maplewood, N.J., where he reigned but a short time. After serving the Church in Sing Sing for a time (1857–64), he returned, in 1865, to New York, and for five years was pastor of the Calvary Baptist Church in Twenty-third Street. In 1867 he became professor of ecclesiastical history in the Rochester Theological Seminary, and labored with the most unifying industry until his physical energies broke down, and he died Jan. 30, 1877. See (N. Y.) Exumbler and Chronicle. (J. C. S.)

Buckland, Ralph, an English divine, was born at West Hartperry in Somersetshire, about 1564, and was educated at Magdalen College, Oxford. In 1579 he apostatized to the Romish Church, and, after acting as a missionary in various parts, died in 1611. He published, among other works, a translation of some Lives of the Saints from Surius, and a Discourse from Attending Protestant Places of Worship, etc.

Buckler, Benjamin, D.D., a learned English clergyman and antiquary, was born in 1716, and educated at Oriel College, Oxford, where he graduated as master of arts in 1739. He afterwards became a fellow of All-Saints College, and there took his degree in divinity. In 1755 he was presented to the vicarage of Cumnor in Berkshire, and was also rector of Frilsham, in the same county. He died in December, 1780. For an account of his publications, see Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Buckley, James (1), an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Crampton, near Oldham, Lancashire, Dec. 20, 1770. His parents were members of the Established Church. He united with the Methodist Church in 1785, commenced his ministry in 1791, took an active part in forming the first Wesleyan Missionary Auxiliary Society, was elected Secretary of Home Missions in 1814, became a superintendat of Lincolny, Wales, in 1829, and died while attending the Centenary Conference at Liverpool, Aug. 24, 1839. Buckley was much esteemed by his brethren. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1842; Welh. Metl. Mag. 1842, p. 265.

Buckley, James (2), an English Congregational minister, was born at Mossley, Lancashire, Jan. 27, 1796. He was brought up in the Church of England. In 1819 he was converted at the Independent Chapel in Cricklewood, London, under Lyne. He became a Sunday school teacher, and began preaching at mission stations in the neighboring villages. In 1821 he entered Idle Academy, Yorkshire, and in 1825 was ordained pastor at Thrake, in the North Riding. He accepted a call to Penniston, in the West Riding, in 1837, and in 1851 removed to Horbury, near Wakefield. Mr. Buckley's last charge was at Stockport, which he accepted in 1854. Here he died, March 18, 1873. His character was marked by conscientiousness and intensity. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1874, p. 315.

Buckley, John, a Methodist Episcopalian minister, was born in England in 1805. He emigrated to America in 1827; settled in Bloomfield, Essex Co., N. J.; joined the Church in 1828; studied during 1830 for the Wesleyan Academy, Wilbraham; received license to preach in 1831; and in the same year entered the Hopkinsville, Ky., Philanthropic College. He was ordained and was engaged in business in Bridgeport, N. J., where he died, June 28, 1842. Mr. Buckley possessed more than ordinary ability as a preacher, a well-disciplined mind, and a remarkable aptness in putting the truth. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1843, p. 355, 414.

Buckminster, Joseph, a Congregational minister, was born in 1720, settled as minister of Rutland, Mass., and died in 1792. He published several Sermons.

Buckner, John, L.L.D., an English prelate, became prebendary of Chichester in 1768, archdeacon in 1792, and was consecrated bishop of that see March 4, 1798. He died May 2, 1824, aged ninety. He published Sermons (1798–1812); and a Charge (1797). See La Neve, Biog. Brit.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Buckpitt, James, an English Congregational minister, was born at Trowbridge, March 9, 1800. He embraced religion in early manhood; joined the Independent Church; and in 1825 entered Hackney College for a ministerial preparation. His first charge was at Burwell, Cambridgeshire. In 1829 he removed to Castle Donington, Leicestershire, and three years later took his last charge at Torrington, North Devon, where he died, March 19, 1866. Mr. Buckpitt's perception of evangelical truth was clear; his grasp of it was strong; and his exegesis of it from the pulpit was vigorous and earnest. He was indifferent to nothing with which human interests were bound up. In private life he was genial, hospitable, and hearty. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1867, p. 274.

Bucolus, bishop of Smyrna, consecrated by St. John, is commemorated as "Holy Father," Feb. 6, in the Byzantine calendar.

Buda, Council of (Concilium Budense). Buda, or Ofen, is the capital of Lower Hungary, on the west bank of the Danube. I. A council was held here Sept. 14, 1279, by Philip, bishop of Ferrico, legate of the holy see. Sixty-nine canons were published, containing much the same regulations as others drawn up about that time, and showing that the churches of Hungary and Poland were in great disorder.

Eight of these canons relate to the dress and conduct of the clergy.

The ninth forbids the clergy to sentence any one to corporal punishment, or to be present at the trial of capital cases.

The thirteenth relates to the proper reverence to be observed during divine service; orders all clerks, whenever they pass the altar, the image of the Virgin, or the crucifix; and whenever they enter the choir for the holy office, to bow with respect; and also forbids priests to sing the office without their surplices.

The sixteenth orders that all beneficed clergy, having the care of souls, shall reside and discharge their duties in person, and not by a cure. The thirteenth relates to the attendance of all persons who have been cited by synods, and the proper vestments of the prelates present there.

The council decrees that it is not to be suffered that any one should serve at the altar or read the epistle without a surplice and cassock.

The sixteenth declares that those persons only are to be admitted to preach who have either the pope's or the bishop's license. Also treats of questions.

The eighth exhorts and enunciates three secular powers which forbode appenns to the holy see.
It is also ordered that all the faithful should hear divine service, and especially mass, every Sunday and holy-day in their own parish, and should not wander to any other Church. See Labbe, Concil. xi, 1071.

II. In 1303 cardinal Gentili held a council at Buda.

Budd, Peter, an English Wesleyan minister, was born Dec. 19, 1802, and died July 17, 1864. He was educated at the University of Oxford, to God in youth through the instrumentality of his sister, entered the ministry in 1835, and died on his last circuit (Kingswood) Feb. 9, 1874. Of transparent honor and fidelity, he was full of Christian kindness and courtesy. His mind was carefully disciplined and stored with knowledge, and his knowledge was with the Portrait divine. His sermons were vigorous, apt, evangelical. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1878, p. 32.

Budd, Thomas, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at New Mills, Burlington County, N. J., Feb. 19, 1783. He experienced religion about 1800, and in 1803 entered the Philadelphia Conference, in which he did zealous and faithful work until his death, July 10, 1811. He was a young man of good natural abilities, which he had carefully cultivated, and deservedly highly esteemed wherever known. He was a stranger to dissimulation, and open-hearted and devout. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1811, p. 192.

Buddha, Living, a term applied to certain saints among the Mongol Tartars in Thibet, who are believed to have passed through various stages of being, and supposed to be fitted to preside over a Lamaery (q. v.). He is also called a Chaberen, and such superiors are in large numbers, and placed at the head of the most important religious establishments. He may commence his career with only a few disciples, but, as his reputation grows, the number of his followers increases, and his temple becomes the resort of many pious and devout persons. See Huc, Travels in Tartary, Thibet, and China. See Lamaism.

Buddha-Vishnu, the ninth Avatar (q. v.) or incarnation of Vishnu (q. v.). He is to be carefully distinguished from Gotama Buddha, the originator of Budhism (q. v.).

Budé, Guillaume, a French scholar, was born in Paris, in 1616. Being librarian of Francis I., he exercised a great influence in the reformation of the college curriculum of the French Universities. He was a secret adherent of the Reformation, and even before Luther he had written against the corruption of the clergy and popacy, and of the necessity of a reformation. In his work De transitu Hellesi et Catholicae Hierarchiae (libri tres ad Franciscum regem Paris, 1543), he pointed out that the Papal System is not found in the knowledge of ancient classics, but in the practice of the teachings of Christ. He died Aug. 23, 1540, having expressly declined in his testament all honors of the Catholic Church at his funeral, since he regarded them as an imitation of heathen customs. Some years after his death, his widow, together with his sons, joined the Reformed Church, and, in order to avoid persecution, they went to Geneva. One of his sons, Louis, was appointed professor of Oriental languages, and published a French translation of the Psalms (Geneva, 1551), Proverbs, and some other parts of the Old Test. (Lyons, 1556). Another of his sons, Jean, rendered very important services to the Protestant cantons of Switzerland, in his capacity as ambassador of the Geneva council. In connection with Ch. de Jouvilliers, he collected a portion of Calvin's lectures on the prophets, and published them in French. Guillaume Bude's works were published at Basle in 1557, 4 vols. See Rebié, G. Bude (Paris, 1846); Schmidt in Herzog's Real-Encyclop. s. v.; Lichtenberger, Encyclopédie des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. F.)

Budge is fur of kids, employed in trimming ecclesiastical robes.

was born in 1787, near London. In his early life he was a member of the Wesleyan Society. He joined the Society of Friends about 1810, and was for many years a useful minister. In 1845 he visited the Scilly Islands, and two years later accompanied E. O. Tregelles to Norway and Sweden. He took great interest in the education of the poor. He died July 17, 1864. See (London) Annual Monitor, 1865, p. 36.

Büdinger, Moses, a German Jewish teacher, who died at Cassel, Jan. 31, 1841, is the author of Lehrbuch der hebr. Sprache (Metz, 1816), or Auszug aus dem Lehrbuch der hebr. Sprache (ibid. eod.). He also edited the Jewish ritual for the festivals, with a grammatical commentary in Hebrew (ibid. 1817), and the penitential prayers, with a commentary (ibid. 1822). See Frits, Bibl. Jud. i, 185; Steinmechsner, Bibl. Handbuch, p. 27, No. 298, 299; Benjaeb, Ozer Ha-Sapharim, or Thoraus Lekhibrim Hebreorim, i, 39, No. 790; 195, No. 718; ii, 319, No. 966; 420, No. 356. (B. F.)

Büdinger, Moses Mardochai, Ph.D., a German Jewish writer, was born Jan. 20, 1784, at Mardorf, near Marburg. For twelve years he acted as teacher at different places of his native country, and, after having enlarged his knowledge, he went in 1815 to Marburg, where he attended theological and philosophical lectures. From Marburg he went to Cassel, and from thence to Stuttgart, to return again to Cassel in 1825, where he was appointed inspector and instructor of the newly opened Hebrew College. He died Jan. 31, 1841. Büdinger is the author of religious discourses, which he delivered on Sabbath days; besides he published a number of school-books, very valuable in his day. See Frits, Bibl. Jud. i, 136; Kayserling, Bibliothek jüdischer Kanzleirechber, i, 406 sq.; Steinhelm, M. Büdinger, Lebensbeschreibung (Altona, 1844). (B. F.)

Buddington, William Ives, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born in New Haven, Conn., April 21, 1805. After graduating at Yale College in 1828, he taught in the academy in New Canaan for nearly a year, and then began a three years' course in the Yale Divinity School. The year 1838-39 he spent as a resident licentiate in the Andover Theological Seminary. He was ordained pastor of the First Church (Congregational) in Charlestown, Mass., April 22, 1840. He resigned this charge in 1854, and assumed the pastoral care of the Western Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia, Pa. In 1855 he was installed over the Clinton Avenue Congregational Church in Brooklyn, N. Y. He resigned his pastoral office, December 29, 1875, and died in Brooklyn, Nov. 29, 1879. He was a beloved and efficient pastor, and a noble Christian. He published, in 1845, an admirably written history of the First Church in Charlestown; also several sermons and review articles. See Obituary Record of Yale College, 1880.

Budiyah (Adecritus Gleebe) is the name of the fifth great caste of the Moors. It was composed of serfs, and was the Budis of the Greek historians.

Budjintaja, in Slavonic mythology, was a goddess of the Poles and Kassubes, who protected sleeping persons from danger.

Budmanns, a sect of Socinians (q. v.) which arose in the 16th century, headed by Simon Budmanns (q. v.).

Budocus, Saint, an abbott and confessor of the 6th century, is said to have succeeded Magliorius in the see of Dol, Brittany. The parish of St. Baudock is just west of Plymouth, and the last day of the Close Rolls, i, 498, 529, mention a church of St. Baudock, in Oxford.

Buddeo is the name given in Japan to Gotama Buddha (q. v.), who is worshipped in that empire also.

Budistoi are the Japanese worshippers of Budha. See BUDDHISM.

Buée, Pierre Louis, a French theologian, brother
BUGNOT

Ossere gave lands on the river Tillath to found a monastery. She appears to have been married, and hadn't daughter of her own, who succeeded to the monastery by her grandmother's gift, under her mother's guardianship. Bugga refused to surrender the monastery when Hrotwari became of age, and was only dislodged by decree of a council in 736 (or 737). See Haddad and Stubbs, iii, 307.

2. Called also Eadburga (or Headburga), the third abbess of Minster, in Thanet, who appears to have been a daughter of an abbess, Eangyth. She is recorded to have rebuilt the monastery of St. Mildred, but she is best known from the letters of Boniface. Between 719 and 722 her mother writes to Boniface stating she had been prevented from attending his pilgrimage to Rome by the infirmity of her daughter. A little later Bugga herself writes to him; and in another letter, of much later date, Boniface addresses her as an abbess, and congratulates her on having found a resting-place in Rome, whither she seems to have gone after she entered upon her abbacy. Finally, archbishop Bregwin, writing to Lullus (between 759 and 765), mentions that Bugga died Dec. 27. Elmham (ed. Hardwic, p. 220) dates her death in 755, but this seems too early.

lects; Versions.

Bugia is an Italian term for a metal candlestick to contain a wax taper, held during divine service by an attendant of the priest on the occasion of his reception of a gift. After death the animal is flayed and divided into two parts. One half is distributed among the inhabitants of the mukim, or parish, which consists of thirty-four houses; the other half is divided among the officials of the mosque. On religious occasions buffaloes are always sacrificed on Friday, Monday, or Thursday. They are sacred to the deities of the Hindu caste, and the ceremonies of the offering are performed by wealthy persons; at the Chakur-anuk, or the ceremony of shaving the heads of children; and when going to war.

Buffard, Gabriel Charles, a French canonist, was born at Caen in 1688, in the university of which place he afterwards taught theology. Being obliged to vacate his chair because of his devotion to the doctrine of Jansenius, he retired to Paris, where he was detained for a time in the Bastile. He died at Paris, Dec. 3, 1763. He wrote, Défense de la Déclaration de l'Assemblée du Clergé de 1682, translated from the Latin of Bossuet (Paris, 1783) — Essai de Dissertation pour Faire Faire les Vétus les Nouveaux Formulaires (ibid. 1789). See Hoefer, Nouve. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bug (or Bog) is a river flowing into the Black Sea, which was once an object of devotion among the Russians, and one of the consecrated localities of their worship.

Bugenhagen, Andreas Heinrich, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born April 25, 1665, at Zittau. He studied at different universities, was in 1710 preacher at Leipa, in the principality of Zerbst, in 1719 deacon, in 1724 pastor at his native place, and died Dec. 18, 1742. He wrote Diss. de Hermeneutica Sacra. See Neubauer, Nachricht von jetztlebenden Gottesgelehrten; Jörcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Bugenhagen, Johann, son of the famous theologian of the same name, was professor of Oriental languages at Wittenberg during the lifetime of his father. In 1570 he became the doctor of the church, and soon afterwards professor of theology and preacher at the castle-church. In 1575 he was appointed superintendent there, and provost at Kamberg, where he died in 1592. He wrote Concilia Theologica. See Jörcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Buhon, Louis, a French preacher of the Dominican order, was born about 1600 at Quimzay, in Burgundy. He was noted for his talents as a preacher, and was the last Inquisitor of the Faith in the county of Burgundy. He died about 1700. See Hœfer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s.v.

Buhrman, Alfred, a Lutheran minister, was born in Frederick County, Md., in 1826. In 1846 he entered the Baltimore Methodist Episcopal Conference, and preached three years. On account of impaired health he ceased active ministerial labor for a time, and was employed in teaching school about eighteen months. Then he preached at various places in Maryland and Virginia, but again taught school in 1862. The following year he entered the Melanethon Synod, and became pastor of the Lutheran congregations at Sharsburg and Pleasant Valley. In 1864 he began preaching at Winchester, Va., and was at the Berlin Michigan College in that charge seven years. For two and a half years, from 1871, he was pastor at Milton, and for two years, from September, 1873, he labored at Lovettaville, Va. His health failing in 1875, he removed to a farm near Newtown, where, however, he continued to preach until his death, March 3, 1880. The subsequent memorial was a man of fine intellectual powers and marked oratorical ability. See Lutheran Observer, April 6, 1877.

Buby, Felix, a French theologian of the order of Carmelites, was born at Lyons in 1634. He was the first who dared to sustain the ten articles of doctrine published in 1682 by the clergy of France upon the nature and extent of the ecclesiastical power. He died in 1687. His works include: Histoire des Carmélites de France (Paris, 1659), which was very highly esteem. See Hœfer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s.v.

Bull, Bernardo, a Spanish Benedictine, the first missionary to America, was a native of Catalonia. He was appointed by the pope vicar-apostolic to the New World in 1495, and accompanied Columbus on his second voyage, taking with him several priests. On account of differences of opinion between him and Columbus as to the treatment of the natives, he returned to Spain in 1495, and took an active part in the persecutions waged against the great discoverer. He afterwards became abbot of the convent of Cuxa, where he died in 1520. See Hœfer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s.v.

Busseret (or Bussaret), François, a Flemish theologian and historian, was born in 1549 at Mons, in Hainaut. He was successively official, archdeacon, and grand-vicar of Cambray, bishop of Namur in 1602, and archbishop of Cambray in 1614. He died in 1615. He wrote, Histoire d'une Religieuse de Mons POSSIBILE (1585) — Histoire du Conseil Provincial de Mons (1586) — La Vie de Sainte-Marie d'Oigno (1608). See Hœfer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s.v.

Buisson, Eugène, a French Protestant theologian, who died at St. Etienne, Oct. 22, 1881, as honorary president of the consistory of Lyons, is the author of several works, which have also been translated into German. His best-known work in German is Der Moralwissenschaftlichen und Theologischen Grundlagen der Verhältnisse zur sittlichen Entwicklung der Menschheit (Bale, 1859, 3 pts.). See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol., i, 200. (B. P.)

Buissou (lat. Buibus), Jean du, a Flemish theologian, was born about 1586. He became successively professor in the University of Louvain and chancellor of the University of Douay. He died April 15, 1598, having bequeathed all his property to poor students. He wrote a Harmonia Evangelica (Rome, 1576; Liège, 1695). See Hœfer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s.v.

Buis, Edward Tongé, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Charleston, S.C., March 1, 1809. He was prepared for college at the Charleston College, and entered the College of South Carolina, but did not graduate there. He entered Princeton Seminary in the fall of 1828, and remained over three years. He was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, Feb. 8, 1832, and was ordained by the Charleston Union Presbytery, Jan. 10, 1833. In 1838 he began to supply the Nazareth Church, S.C. From 1841 to 1857 he seems to have served for different terms the Nazareth, Mount Tabor, and Fairview churches in that vicinity. In 1857 he became president of the Female College at Laurens, S.C. He remained there until June 1, 1861. In that year he accepted a call to become pastor of the Washington Street Church, in Greenville, and was installed May 4, 1862. He died Nov. 10, 1877. See Necrological Report of Princeton Theol. Seminary, 1878, p. 20.

Bulst, George, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Fife Sheriff, Scotland, in 1770. He was distinguished for his scholarship while connected with the Edinburgh College, especially in the department of Grecian literature. On the recommendation of Dr. Robertson and Dr. Blair he was called to take charge of the Presbyterian Church in Charleston, S.C. He entered upon the duties of his office in June, 1798, and remained many years, subsequent to his death as principal of the Charleston College. He died in the midst of his usefulness, Aug. 31, 1808. As a preacher he enjoyed a fine reputation. Among the productions of his pen were various articles prepared by him for the British Encyclopaedia, an abridgment of Hume's History of England for schools, a version of the Psalms, etc. Two volumes of his sermons were published in 1809. See Sketch prefixed to his Sermons; Allen, Amer. Biog. s.v. (J. C. S.)

Buite, Saint. See Bokthus.

Bukenton, Henri de, a Jesuit, writer and professor at Louvain, died there in 1716. His most remarkable publication is his Luz de Luce (4to). In the first book he treats of the antiquity of the Vulgate, and of the various readings; in the third, he compares the Sixtine and Clementine editions. See Rose, Gen. Biog. Dict. s. v.

Bukto is the name applied to a Lamas [see Lamaism], who professes to work miracles, particularly to cut himself open, take out his entrails, place them before him, and then resume his former condition as if nothing had happened. This spectacle, so revolting to the spectators, is common in the Lamas of the Tartary. The regular Lamas disdain all connection with spectacles of this sort, and they are only enacted by lay Lamas of indifferent character and of little esteem among their brethren. Other pretended miracles of lesser fame are frequently performed. See Huc, Travels in Tartary, Thibet, and China; Gardner, Faiths of the World, s. v.

Buleus, Christopher, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Ketschberg, near Dresden, Nov. 4, 1602. He studied at Leipzig and Wittenberg, was in 1635 preacher at Mitteichen, and afterwards superintendent and assessor of the consistory at Wurtzen. In 1657 he was called to Dresden as superior counselor of the consistory, and afterward prebendary of the church of Sept. 8, 1677. He wrote, Schiedsmutation in Valerium...
BULFINGER

Bulfinger, Georg Bernard, a German theologian and naturalist, was born in 1698. He was professor of theology at Tubingen, and died in 1750. He wrote, Specimen Doctrinae Veterum Sininarum et Folii, (Frankfort, 1724): De Trachis Plantarum ex Melone Observationi, in the memoirs of the Academy of Sciences of St. Petersburg. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biox. Generale, s. v.

Bulgarian Version of the Scriptures. This is in the vernacular of the Bulgarians, "a race, next to the Huns, the most terrible and most hateful to the invaded Europeans, and known in the West as early as the reign of Theodoric the Ostrogoth. Either mingling with, or bordering upon, the Slavonians, they spread over a large tract of territory, from the shores of the Palus Maeotis and the Euxine, along the course of the Lower Danube" (Milman, Latin Christianity, ii, 418). Towards the close of the 7th century they attacked and conquered the division of the Slavs settled in Mesia, and, in the first instance, gave their own name to the tribes thus subdued. In the latter part of the 2nd century, however, having adopted the language and manners of the Slavonians, the conquerors became identified with their subjects (Krasinski, Lectures on Slavonia, 1851, p. 29, note). Referring to the article Bulgaria in this Cyclopedia, we will state that the Bulgarian, together with the Russian and the Byllrian, belongs to the eastern branch of the Slavonic languages, properly so called. "The most ancient document of this eastern branch is the so-called ecclesiastical Slavonic, i.e. the ancient Bulgarian, into which Cyril and Methodius translated the Bible in the middle of the 9th century. The most exact version of the Bible was made for the whole Slavonic race, and to the student of the Slavonic languages it is what Gothic is to the student of German. The modern Bulgarian, on the contrary, as far as grammatical forms are concerned, is the most reduced among the Slavonic languages" (Müller, Science of Language, i, 395), yet it was not till after the commencement of the operations of Bible Societies that any successful effort was made to produce a Bulgarian version of the Scriptures. See Bible of Every Land, p. 307.

A translation was commenced in 1820, at the suggestion of Dr. Pinkerton. An archimandrite, named Theodosius, who had been recommended by the Greek patriarch of Constantinople as the person best qualified for such a work, was appointed to prepare this version, which he completed in 1821. The work was forwarded to St. Petersburg for publication, and the Gospel of St. Matthew left the press in that city during the year 1822. This translation proved, however, to have been very inaccurately executed, and, as the Bulgarian Bible Society was shortly afterwards suspended, the continuation of the work was given up.

In 1827 another translation of the New Testament was completed by Saposnoff, with the design of publishing an edition on his own account at the press of the metropolitan of Bucharest. In consequence, and in consequence only the four Gospels were published, but they were received with much favor by the people. This induced the British and Foreign Bible Society to make arrangements, through their agent, Mr. Barker, to print an edition of the entire version, but owing to some difficulties, the translation was commenced in 1836 by Mr. Barker, which was completed at the p. 229 in Smyrna in 1840. The success which accompanied this publication induced the British and Foreign Bible Society to proceed with the translation of the Old Testament, which was commenced as completed in 1858, some parts of which had been printed in the meantime. Although the best of the Russian and his successors in the Scriptures was very great, one of the newspapers having made the statement that "it is the study of the Bible which makes a nation great," and recommended the study of the Scriptures throughout the country, yet it was not till 1864 that an entire Bible was given to that people, the printing having been done at Constantinople. In the annual report for the year 1866, the Rev. S. B. Bergene communicates the following, with date:

"It appears that there is some difference between the Macedonian, or Western, and the Eastern dialects of the Bulgarian. Formerly the Western dialect was in the ascendant, but with the latter it is becoming the Eastern. There is a review and several newspapers published in Bulgaria; these adopt the Eastern dialect; and there is a movement that, in a similar manner that in Russia, shall push out the Western dialect so far as the literary character of the language is concerned. Our New Testament, in the Western dialect, is the translation of the Bible Society's version five years since at Smyrna, by a monk of the name of Neophyton, and was carefully examined by a bishop. It was printed for the first time in 1860. Poor Photinoff, of whose character every one speaks in the highest terms was engaged with Dr. Riggs in the translation of the Old Testament, and in the early part of the work favored the Western dialect; but in correcting the work, as well as in the latter portion of the translation, he adopted the Eastern dialect; and Dr. Riggs feels assured that if his life had been spared he would have followed this course throughout the entire work. Either dialect is used in all parts of the country, but the Macedonian is going into disuse, so far as literature is concerned, it would be extremely desirable that it should be extended to the Scriptures. Photinoff was very anxious to complete the work, and persevered in it, in spite of every remonstrance, almost to the day of death. The present translation, which was completed by a monk, who succeeded Photinoff, and is a good scholar, follows the Eastern Church in most of the arrangement of the first part of the Bible, i.e., the New Testament, and is very much extolled as far as the Pentateuch; and Dr. Riggs is now desirous of going to press with as little delay as possible. Separate copies of the New Testament have already been printed; but instead of fixing on detached books, it is recommended that the whole of the Old Testament should be printed consecutively, say, in three series, the first containing the Pentateuch, the second closing with the historical books or Job, and the third including the rest. There is no doubt that the former is the best in the world. Small copies of the whole, as well as the separate parts, have been presented. These copies will be placed in the hands of competent judges for remarks and criticisms, and by the time the last edition is published the necessary fixes will have been possessed for commencing the edition of the Bible in one volume. There is something about the simplicity of these clauses will be desirable in the New Testament, to bring the dialect into strict conformity with that adopted in the Old Testament."

When the Old Testament was finally published, in September, 1863, the Rev. Dr. Riggs of the American Board, and the Rev. Albert L. Long of the Methodist Episcopal Church, were the two native literati, Costovitch and Slaveikoff, under whose revision of the Old Testament a new version of the New Testament was undertaken by a number of the clergy, throughout the Bulgarian empire. This revision they accomplished about the close of 1864, and two editions, one of ten thousand copies (32mo), at the joint expense of the British and Foreign Bible Society, and another, with references, of five thousand copies (12mo), at the joint expense of the British and Foreign Bible Society, were published in 1865.

In 1874 a new and slightly revised edition of the Bulgarian Bible, in one volume, edited by the Rev. Dr. A. L. Long, was published at Constantinople. Up to March 81, 1883, the British and Foreign Bible Society gave out 1,255 copies of the Scriptures, either as a whole or in parts.

Bulgarn, Samuel, an English Baptist minister, was born at Atworth, near Melksham, Wiltshire, March 23, 1730. After his conversion he removed to Bath and united with a Church of the countess of Huntington's connection, and became a zealous preacher. In 1804, having joined a Baptist Church, he engaged in ministerial service for several years, and was ordained pastor of the church in 1813. He continued in the same ministry until his death, which occurred at Swantou, whether he got to, or was taken there, March 18, 1884. See (Lond.), Baptist Hand-book, 1856, p. 45. (J. C. S.)
BULKELEY 677  BULL

Bulkeley, John, a Congregational minister, grandson of Peter Bulkeley, was first minister of Colchester, Conn., and died in 1731. He published an Election Sermon (1713) — An Inquiry into the Right of the Aboriginal Natives to the Lands of America (1724) — and a Tract on Infant Baptism (1729). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Bulkeley, Lancelot, D.D., an Irish prelate, was a native of Beaumaris, and acquired an education at Brazenose College, Oxford, into which he was admitted a commoner in 1587. He took the degree of A.M. at St. Edmund's Hall in November, 1593, and immediately afterwards was ordained deacon by the bishop of Bangor. He was promoted to the see of Dublin, and consecrated at Drogheda, in St. Peter's Church, Oct. 3, 1619, by Christopher, archbishop of Armagh. In 1625 he revived the controversy concerning the primacy with Dr. Hampton. In 1635 Bulkeley had a confirmation from the king to him and his successors of all former grants, liberties, and privileges belonging to the see. In June, 1646, this prelate was one of the council who signed and issued the proclamation confirmatory of the peace concluded in that month between the king and the Commissioners of Parliament. In 1647, on the surrender of Dublin to the commissioners of the Parliament, one of their first acts was to prohibit the use of the book of Common Prayer, and require the Directory for Worship to be adopted in all the churches of the city. The clergy of the Established Church protested, and was admitted to the remonstrance, but without success. The Directory was adopted throughout the city, and the book of Common Prayer only continued to be used in the chapel of Trinity College. In 1649 archbishop Bulkeley preached his farewell sermon to his congregation, and the Common Prayer was read by William Pilsworth, minister; but for doing so the usurping powers visited them with severe punishment, committing the archbishop and all the others present to prison. At the close of the year 1649 an act was passed by the English Parliament for the encouragement and increase of learning, and the true knowledge and worship of God, and the advancement of the Protestant religion in Ireland. Spent with grief for the calamities of his church, Dr. Bulkeley died at Tallagh, Sept. 8, 1650. See D'Alton, Memoirs of the Archbishops of Dublin, p. 258.

Bulkeley, Peter, a Congregational minister, was born at Odell, Bedfordshire, England, Jan. 31, 1582. He was the son of the Rev. Dr. Edward Bulkeley, author of a supplement to Fox's Book of Martyrs. Peter, when about twenty years old, was admitted to St. John's College, Cambridge, and was subsequently, after acquiring his education there, chosen a fellow. He succeeded to the large estate of his father, and also succeeded him in the ministry at Odell, as a clergyman of the Established Church. But he did not long continue to conform to the ceremonies of the Church, although, through the favor of the bishop of Lincoln, he remained unmolested for twenty-one years; when the matter was brought to the notice of archbishop Laud, he silenced him immediately. In 1635, having sold his estate, he crossed the ocean; and after remaining several months at Cambridge, Mass., he entered the Seminary in 1636, and began the settlement of a place which he called Concord (now in Massachusetts). On July 15, 1636, he organized a church there; the next year John Jones was his pastor, and he was his teacher. In bestowing farms upon his servants he expended a large fortune; and dying a short time before his death, which occurred at Concord, March 9, 1659. A library was established at Harvard College, in part, at least, by contributions from Mr. Bulkeley's. In 1646 he published a work in London entitled The Gospel Covenant; or, The Covenant of Grace Opened. It passed through several editions. It is composed of sermons preached at Concord from Zech. ix. 11. The book was held in high estimation. Mr. Bulkeley was distinguished as a scholar, and wrote Latin with great ease and elegance. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i. 51.

Bulkey, Arthur, an English prelate of the 16th century, was born either in Cheshire or (more probably) in Anglesea. He was educated doctor of laws, but had wholly forgotten the chapter "De Sacrisiae," for he spoiled the bishopric of Bangor, to which he was preferred, and sold the five bulls. He occupied the see fourteen years, was suddenly deprived of his sight, and died in 1555. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), iii. 509.

Bull, the Golden (also called Bulla Carolina), was an ordinance made by the emperor Charles IV at the Diet of Nuremberg, in January, 1356. It is so named because it was sealed with a bull and attached to cords of yellow and red silk. It contains thirty chapters on the form and ceremonies of electing the emperor; the number, functions, and rights of the electors; and all that belongs to the government of the empire.

Bull, Single (or Semi). Between the time of the pope's election and confirmation, the bull or seal attached to a document issued by him has an impression on one side only — viz., the effigies of St. Peter and Paul, the reverse being without any stamp. This is called a single or semi bull. After consecration the name of the pope and the date of his reign was stamped on the reverse; this makes the double bull.

Bull Unam Sanctam. See Unam Sanctam.

Bull, Edward, a Congregational minister, was born at Saybrook, Conn., Nov. 26, 1791. After graduation he was teacher of the grammar-school at New London for two years, and tutor in Yale College for five years. He studied theology with private instructors. He was ordained Sept. 29, 1825, pastor of the Congregational Church at New London, and dismissed in 1837. The rest of his life was spent in Cheshire, where he taught a few pupils. He died April 25, 1869. See Obituary Record of Yale College, 1869.

Bull, John Wesley, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Baltimore County, Md., Sept. 6, 1819. He was early in life the subject of religious impressions, at the age of nineteen gave himself to God, and in 1838 entered into the Wesleyan Conference. He held a supernumerary relation between 1834 and 1866, when he joined the Church South; labored three years in that body, and became a supernumerary, which relation he held to the close of his life, in Alexandria, Va., Dec. 25, 1873. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1869.

Bull, Levi, D.D., a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, who died at Marsh, Chester Co., Pa., Aug. 2, 1850, aged seventy-eight years, was for many years a prominent minister in his diocese; but, unhappily, his vigorous intellect became diseased, and for a long time before his death he was unable to fulfill his duties as a pastor. He was at one time rector of St. Mary's, S. St. Mark's, in Chester, and of St. James's, in Chester County; then of St. Thomas's, in Berks County; then of Bangor Church, in Lancaster County. See Amer. Quart. Church Rev., 1859, p. 534.

Bull, Mitchell B., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was a native of Ireland. Some time after his arrival in America he experienced conversion, and in 1868 entered the Ohio Conference. He entered the Ohio Conference and continued in effective and useful relation for eight years ill-health compelled him to retire from active service. He died in 1857 or 1858. Mr. Bull was a man of sterling integrity and an able and earnest preacher. His love for the Church was made manifest in his bequeathing nine thousand dollars to her various institutions. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1859, p. 99.
Bull, Nehemiah, a Congregational minister, was born on Long Island, N. Y. He graduated at Yale College in 1734, was ordained at Westfield, in 1736, and died in 1740. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 207.

Bull, Norris, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Harwinton, Litchfield Co., Conn., Oct. 24, 1790. He entered Yale College when he was in his ninth year. During his college course he was noted for sobriety and diligence. He became a student in Princeton Theological Seminary in 1816, and was licensed to preach by the Columbia Presbytery in 1818. Soon afterwards he went to the western part of New York state, and labored as a missionary until 1821. In 1822 he accepted a call from the Presbyterian Church at Geneva, where he continued to labor earnestly and effectively until 1833, when he became pastor at Wyoming, and in 1836 at Clarkson. He died at Lewiston, Dec. 7, 1847. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 617.

Bull, Ralph, a Presbyterian minister, was born near Scotchtown, N. Y., Dec. 10, 1812. His early studies were pursued at Scotchtown, and afterwards at Goschen and Newburgh. He spent two years (1829-30) in Yale College, one in the College of New Jersey, and one (1829-30) in Princeton Theological Seminary. He was licensed by the Second Presbytery of Long Island, after which he accepted supply of various pulpits of the Presbytery in connection with his name as a teacher. In the fall of 1836 he became pastor of the Church at Milford, Pa. In the fall of 1839 he removed to Darien, Ga., where he took charge of an academy and also preached. His last field of labor was Westtown. He died June 2, 1877. See Necrological Report of Princeton Theol. Seminary, 1876, p. 27.

Bull, Thomas Palmer, an English Congregational minister, was born July 15, 1772, at Newport, Pagnel, where he also labored until his death, March 17, 1859. He was carefully trained and educated by his father, Rev. William Bull, joined the Church, and eventually became joint-tutor in the Academy and co-pastor in the ministry with his father, and finally, sole pastor. As a preacher Mr. Bull's characteristics were simplicity, affection, earnestness, and pathos; as a teacher he was very learned and devoted. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1860, p. 179.

Bull, William H., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Chester County, Pa., Nov. 24, 1807. He received an early religious training, but did not embrace the gospel until twenty-three years of age, and in 1827 entered the Philadelphia Conference. Early in 1836 severe illness compelled him to become a superannuate. He died on July 19 of the same year. Mr. Bull was a superior preacher, systematic, clear, warm, energetic. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1837, p. 491.

Bulla (bouly, a bullet) is a seal made of two circular pieces of lead, and attached to papal documents, which at length took the same name. Ecclesiastical seals were usually oval until the 14th and 15th centuries, when they became circular; and up to the 18th century the seal was suspended by silk threads or a slip of parchment, but was then attached to the document.

Bullard, Edwin Buxton, a Baptist missionary, was born at Shrewsbury, Vt., Sept. 12, 1818. He pursued his collegiate studies at the Hamilton Literary Institution, N. Y., and his theological studies one year (1840-41) at Newton, Mass. He was ordained at Middlebury, Vt., July 9, 1840. After leaving Newton he was a short time pastor of the Church at Foxborough, Mass. He received his appointment as a missionary from the Missionary Union, March 27, 1843, sailed from Charleston Nov. 18 of the same year, and arrived at Maumauk April 6, 1844. He was appointed to labor among the Karans at Domingo and its vicinity. He devoted four years to the faithful discharge of his duties, until his death, April 3, 1848. See The Missionary Jubilee, p. 241. (J. C. S.)

Bullard, Mulford, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Stonebridge, Vt., June 6, 1808. He embraced religion at the age of fifteen, and after serving the Church some time as a local preacher entered the Vermont Conference about 1846, in which he served twenty-three years. He died at Lancaster, N. H., May 30, 1872. Mr. Bullard was a man of sanguine temperament, well calculated to win souls. He was a good preacher, excelled in social meetings, and was a powerful man in prayer. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1873, p. 65.

Bullard, Ward, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Massena, N. Y., Feb. 8, 1810. He removed with his parents in 1813 to a farm in New Haven, Vt., where much of his youth was spent in severe manual labor. He joined the Church at the age of sixteen, only attended school winters previous to his seventeenth year, graduated at Middlebury College in 1833, and taught school some years in the state of Georgia, where he entered the itinerancy. He was for one year connected with the National Bible Society. Owing to sickness and repugnance to slavery he returned south in the spring of 1838 and united with the Troy Conference, took appointments the next four years, then taught school a few years, and again received appointments until 1854, when he inherited his father's farm at New Haven, and thereafter made it his home. He entered active relations with the Church and preached occasionally. He died May 21, 1879. Mr. Bullard was a man of untarnished Christian character, an able instructor, and an acceptable preacher. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1860, p. 33.

Buller, William D.D., an English prelate, was educated at Queen's College, Oxford, where he became A.M. in 1759. There he removed in 1761, where he took his theological degrees in 1781. He was appointed dean of Exeter, and dean of Canterbury, in which latter office he was installed June 22, 1790. On Dec. 2, 1793, he was consecrated to the bishopric of Exeter, which he held until his death, Dec. 12, 1796. See (Lond.) Annual Register, 1796, p. 67.

Bulet, Jean Baptiste, a French scholar who was born in 1699, and died at Besançon in 1775, was (from 1729) professor and afterwards dean of the university in that city. He left several works, among them Histoire de l'Establissement du Christianisme (1764, 4to), taken entirely from pagan and Jewish writers: L'Examen de la Démonstration par la Nature (2 vols., 8vo); Réflexes Critiques; De l'Apocalypse de l'Ecriture Sacre. Origine (1759, 8vo). See Landou, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Rose, Gen. Biog. Dict. s. v. Buller, Pierre, a reputable French architect, was born about 1645. He studied under François Blondel, and erected a number of structures in Paris, among others the Porte St. Denis. He also designed and executed in 1674 the triumphal arch called the Port St. Martin. He erected the Church of the Jacobins in Paris, and published several good works on architecture in 1688 and 1696. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Rose, Gen. Biog. Dict. s. v.; Hoefler, New Biog. Oelekraule, s. v.

Bullen, Alexander, an Associate minister, was born at Athercgaden, Scotland, in February, 1779. He resolved, when quite young, to be a preacher. He entered the University of Edinburgh in 1798. Here he remained four years, then studied theology for five years under the Rev. Archibald Bruce of Whiburn, and was licensed by the Associate Presbytery of Perth. In 1806 he came to America, and landed at New York, where he remained some time, and then removed to Albany; from here he went to Cambridge, N. Y., and took charge of a congregation, with which he continued until the close of his life, June 26, 1857. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, IX, iii, 44.
Bullions, Alexander Blyth, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Argyle, N.Y., May 13, 1822. He graduated at Union College in 1842, and spent over two years in the study of theology at Princeton Seminary. He was ordained by the presbytery of Long Island, L. I., from 1846 to 1848, at Waterford from 1848 to 1853, and tutor in Europe from 1853 to 1856. He was professor of languages at Carroll College, Wis., from 1858 to 1859; editor of the Presbyterian, Philadelphia, Pa., from 1860 to 1861; stated supply of the Congregational Church at St. Paul, Minn., from 1865 to 1872. He afterwards resided at Lansingburg, N. Y., and died there, May 16, 1882. See N. Y. Observer, May 23, 1882; Presbyterian, May 27, 1882; Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Seminary, 1881, p. 155.

Bullions, David G., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Cambridge, N. Y., June 24, 1817. He was educated at Union College, N. Y., and studied theology in the seminary of the Presbyterian Church, Canonsburg, Pa. In 1842 he was ordained by the Cambridge Presbytery, and stationed at West Milton, N. Y., where he labored till his death in 1864. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1866, p. 96.

Bulliard, Pierre, a French magistrate and writer, father of Symphorien, was procureur-général of the parish of Paris, and was successively judge in a presidial court of Lyons. He died at Paris in 1596, and left La Fleur des Explication Anciennes et Nouvelles sur les 4 Eclogues (Lyons, 1596, 1688, 4to). See Landon, Excles. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Noue. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bulliard, Symphorien, a French prelate, was born at Lyons in 1680. He was successively bishop of Glandeve, of Bazas, and of Soissons. In 1699 Louis XII made him governor of Milan, and afterwards sent him as ambassador to Rome. He assisted at the councils of Pisa and of Lateran, and took part in other important affairs. He was a skilful negotiator, a lover of the sciences, and a patron of the learned. He died Jan. 5, 1553. He wrote Statuta Synodalitiae (Paris, 1532). See Hoefer, Noue. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bullivant, William J., an English Wesleyan minister, was born in London. He entered the ministry in 1832, became a supernumerary in 1867, resided at Sheffied, Wellington, and Salop, and died very suddenly, Aug. 2, 1869, while the Conference was in session at Manchester. He was an earnest laborer in the presbyterian cause, and a successful pastor. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1869, p. 29.

Bullock, George, a Roman Catholic professor of theology at Antwerp, where he died about the year 1580, in the monastery of St. Michael, is the author of Economiae Metodicae Concordantiarum Scripturae Sinonum (Antwerp, 1572 fol.). See Pluseus, in Relat. Historiae de Rebis Anglicis, i, 714; Jücher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Bullock, Adam D., a Free-will Baptist minister, was born in 1807. He became a Christian in 1822. For the purpose of fitting himself for the ministry, he went to the Baptist Institution at Hamilton, N. Y. After completing his studies he was engaged in teaching for a few years. He was ordained by the presbytery of Yonkers, N. Y., in 1834, and in 1841 was admitted to the ministry of the Church in Ames, interesting himself not only in his pastoral work, but also in the religious and benevolent enterprises of the day. His death occurred April 14, 1848. See Morning Star, 1848. (J. C. S.)

Bullock, Christopher, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born in Sciota, R. I., in 1761. He joined the Six-principle Baptist Church when a youth. Subsequently he removed to Roylton, Mass., and connected himself with a Calvinist Baptist Church. Having removed to Fitchburg, he connected himself with a Free-will Baptist Church, and after a time was ordained to the work of the ministry. In 1814 he removed to Limington, Me., where his labors were greatly blessed. His last residence was in Parsonfield, in which place, and the surrounding towns, he preached with great success. He died in the spring of 1825. See Morning Star, xix, 16. (J. C. S.)

Bullock, Daniel, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Herkimer County, N. Y., in 1806. He was converted at the age of twenty-one; and in 1834 entered the New York Conference, wherein his appointments were as follows: in 1834, Windham and Pratts- ville; in 1838, Lee, Lenox, and Hopbrook; in 1839, Lenox; in 1837, Middletown; in 1838, Charlottetown; in 1839-40, Deposit; in 1841-42, Jefferson; in 1843, Middletown; in 1844-45, Charlotte. In 1846 he removed within the bounds of the Wyoming Conference, then held a supernumerary relation, engaged in business for some time, and was afterwards employed by the presiding elder two years at Triangle, three at Coventry, two at King's Settlement, and two at North Norwich, N. Y., where he died, Aug. 31, 1879. Mr. Bullock was a great revivalist, a man of much prayer, and a powerful exhorter. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1860, p. 43.

Bullock, George, an English Congregational minister, was born in Northamptonshire, March 31, 1810. He was piously trained in a presbytery, and died at the age of twenty-three, and in 1852 entered the London city mission, in the service of which he labored three years. He next preached ten or eleven years at Weldon, Northamptonshire, and nine months at Caergwile, Flintshire. Then, for the sake of his health, he removed to Wingham, where he died, May 31, 1867. Mr. Bullock was not regularly educated for the ministry, though trained at the Lewisham School. He possessed considerable natural qualifications for the work, in soundness and clearness of judgment, the energy of his character, the kindliness of his disposition, the simplicity and ardor of his personal piety, as well as his familiarity with the Scriptures. See (Loud) Cong. Year-book, 1868, p. 257.

Bullock, Henry, D.D., an English divine and scholar, a friend of Erasmus, was a native of Berkshire. He was educated at Queen's College, Cambridge, where he took his master's degree, and became a fellow in 1607. He was vice-chancellor of the university in 1624-25. He was a man of acknowledged abilities, and was chosen by cardinal Wolsey to answer Luther. Wolsey also made him his chaplain. In 1513 he read mathematical lectures at Cambridge; and was one of the twelve preachers sent out by the university in 1515. Tanner places his death in 1526, but Dodd says he was living in 1530. He wrote De Constantia Abrahamica contra Lutherum ; Epistolae et Observationes ; De Serpentibus Stuculosis (1521) ; Oratio Coram Archipirchico Eboracensi (ed.). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Bulum Version of the Scriptures. The Bulum is a dialect of the Mandingo language, and is spoken around Sierra Leone, on the western coast of Africa. A version of the Gospels according to St. Matthew was made into their language by the Rev. G. R. Nylander, of the Church Missionary Society, and an edition was printed by that society in 1815. No further attempts have since been made to furnish the Buloms with the Scriptures in their native tongue. See Bible of Every Land, p. 409; for the study of the language, see Nylander, Grammar, Vocabulary, and Spelling-book of the Bulom Language (Lond. 1814). (H. P.)

Bull's Eye is the circular window in the west front of early Italian churches, which became the rose of the Gothic period.

Bulmer, Agnes, a Christian poetess, the daughter of Mr. Edward Collins, was born in London, Aug. 31, 1775. In 1789 Wesley admitted her into the Methodist Society, and she became a member of Hester Ann Rogers's class; in 1738 she was married to Joseph Bulmer of London; she became the intimate friend of Drs. Adam Clarke and Jabez Bunting; and on Aug. 30, 1836, she died, in the Isle of Wight, and was buried in the cemetery at Alverstoke, near City-road Chapel. He was an orator of deep piety and intellectual powers of a high order. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1841; Smith, Hist. of Wesley. Meth. iii, 385, 447; also Life of Bumsy, by Rev. Alfred Barrett (Lond. 1858, 12mo).

Bumpass, Sidney D., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Person County, N. C., Dec. 29, 1826. He was carefully trained by a pious mother; received a good education; experienced religion in 1834; was licensed to exhort in 1835, to preach in 1836; and in 1837 was admitted into the Virginia Conference. He afterwards became a member of the North Carolina Conference, in the active ranks of which he died, Dec. 12, 1851.

Bunyard, Daniel, an English Wesleyan preacher, was born in Colchester, Essex, in 1742. He was called out by Wesley in 1762, and travelled the Sussex Round, Birstall, Leeds, Sheffield, and London circuits. In 1775 he was with Nicholas Manners, desisted from the work, his health being broken down by excessive toil. Thereafter he kept a wine-store in Bishopsgate Street, and was a member of City-road Chapel. He died in 1797. He was a man of piety, zealous in his ministry, and successful. See Atmore, Meth. Memorial, s. v.; Stevenson, City Road Chapel, p. 426.

Bumsted, James, an English Wesleyan minister, brother of Rev. John Bumsted, was born in 1786. He commenced his itineracy in 1807, travelled twenty-three circuits, became a superannuated at Louth in 1844, and died there after two days' illness, June 26, 1851. His life was one of devotion and piety. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1851.

Bumsted, John, an English Wesleyan minister, was born in Suffolk, Jan. 7, 1778. He was converted after he was twenty, under the preaching of William Timperley. He commenced his ministry in 1804, labored in various circuits, was laid aside on account of age, for seven years, and died July 9, 1855. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1855.

Bunch, John, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Charleston district, S. C. He was converted in his seventeenth year, and two years later entered the South Carolina Conference. After laboring with much zeal and success for eight years, he was continued to preach, as health permitted, until 1829, when he again entered the active ranks. The last year of his life was spent as a missionary on Cooper River. He died Sept. 7, 1838. Mr. Bunch was studious, humble, energetic, and exemplary. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1839, p. 664.

Bunch, Reddick, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, belonged to the South Carolina Conference, in which he had labored two years, and had just entered upon the mission-field, when he died in great peace, Feb. 14, 1851. He was devout and useful. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1851, p. 351.

Bundehash is the name of a Pehlevi translation of a work of a learned and orthodox Persian, one of the sacred books of the Parsees.

Bunderen (Lat. Bunderius), Jan., a Flemish theologian of the Dominican order, was born at Ghent in 1418. He was preacher and inquisitor of the faith in the diocese of Tournay, and died at Ghent, June 8, 1557. He wrote, Compendium Dissiilities Quorum... to 1848. On resigning at Webster, he removed to Worcester, but did not take another pastorate. While in Worcester he filled several municipal offices, and for a time was president of the common-council. He died there, Nov. 23, 1853. (J. C. S.)

Burbank, Moses, a Baptist minister, was born at Campton, N. H., Oct. 2, 1811. He pursued his preparaatory studies at the New Hampton Institution, and was a student of Watervliet College, in 1836. For several years he devoted himself to teaching—in Hampton Falls, N. Y., 1836 to 1838; in Kentucky, 1838 to 1845. He had charge of a private school in Newton, Mass., from 1854 to 1862; he was principal of an academy in Lodlow, Vt., where, at the close of his term of service, he published a political paper, in partnership with a partner, called the Black River Gazette, of which he was the editor. Mr. Burbank was a licensed preacher, but was never ordained. His death occurred March 11, 1867. (J. C. S.)

Burbank, Samuel, a Baptist minister, was born at Brentwood, N. H., June 17, 1792. When Samuel was a child his father removed to Newfield, and became a person of some prominence in town affairs. Samuel early developed a great thirst for knowledge. While attending the Newfield church he became a Christian, and was baptized Sept. 18, 1814; just two years afterwards he was ordained as pastor of the church in Newfield, and held this position for several years. He traveled a part of the time as a minister of the Free-will Baptists, in different sections of New England and Canada. For a number of years he published the Free-will Baptist Register, before the establishment of the Morning Star.

When the latter paper was started, he removed to Lim-nerick, Me., having been appointed agent and junior editor of that periodical. While thus occupied he preached constantly. Upon the removal of the paper to Dover, N. H., after it had been under his charge for seven years, Mr. Burbank devoted a portion of his time to secular pursuits, filling for eight consecutive years the office of county treasurer for York County, Me.
In all matters pertaining to the prosperity of his denomnation he was interested, and labored abundantly to elevate it in all worthy ways. After a life of great usefulness he died, Sept. 24, 1845. See Barrett, Memoirs of Eminent Preachers, p. 118-124. (J. C. S.)

Burbage, Edward, a Wesleyan preacher, was admitted to the English Wesleyan Connexion in 1768.
His last circuit was Inverness, Scotland, where he died in the dawn of his usefulness, in 1788. Dr. George Smith (Hist. of Wesleyan Methodism, i. 540, 541) mentions a curious circumstance connected with one of his Journeys. See Attmore, Meth. Memorial, s. v.

Burch, Chancy, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Warren, N. Y., in 1803. He was converted in early life at Westfield, and commenced preaching in North East, Pa., being ordained about 1856. His longest pastorate was with the Church at North East. His other pastorates were, Waterford one year, French Creek one year, and Greencfield, four miles from North East, a number of years. He died at Greenfield, March 21, 1871. He is said to have been a man of more than ordinary ability, of most worthy Christian integrity and character, possessing a very kind and feeling heart, coupled with deep piety. See Morning Star, Dec. 11,
1878. (J. C. S.)

Burch (or Burchi), Francois van der, a celebrated French prelate, was born at Gand, July 26, 1657.
He was of a brilliant family, and one who had added much to the literature of the 16th century. From the bishopric of Gand he was called, June 14, 1615, to the see of Cambrai. He was a prelate of great activity, rare piety, and large benevolence, and was the founder of several institutions for the instruction of poor children, and, of the most importance of which are some in Cambrai under the name of St. Agnes, where the children of Catholic parents are taken care of. He also founded the Dominical, a similar institution, and to him was given the title of "Pope des pauvres." He died at Mons, May 23, 1644. Some of the pastoral letters of Van der Burch have been published. See Hoefer, Nouv.
Biog. Générale, s. v.

Burch, James K., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Robeson County, N. C., Aug. 7, 1793. He received his classical education at Philadelphia, N. C., and his theological at Union Seminary, Va. In 1818 he was licensed by Fayetteville Presbytery, and stationed at Laurel Hill, N. C. In 1838 he accepted a call to Hopewell Church, S. C., where he labored for twenty years.
He died in 1859. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1860, p. 67.

Burchan is the name of the idols of the Celmuck Tartars, who are said to number one hundred and eight. Most of their gods are supposed to have been spiritual, but created, beings, who, after passing through all the different degrees of transmigration, have at last raised themselves to the dignity of divine beings by great deeds and extreme suf-ferras.

Burchard (1), a German prelate, was a monk of Lobe, who became, in 996, bishop of Worms. He attended the Council of Seligenstadt in 1022. For many years he dwelt in a cell about two miles from Worms, where, with the assistance of Albertus of Gemblours, he compiled his great work, the Decretorum Volumen, a collection of canon, decretals, etc. (Cologne, 1454, fol.; Paris, 1549, 8vo).

Burchard (or Boucharde, Lat. Barcarus or Bro-carida) (2), a German prelate and canonist, was born in Hesse. He attached himself to the archbishop of Mayence, and became preceptor of Conrad, called le Salpique. In 1006 Ortho III appointed him bishop of Worms. The prelate was not less noted for his found knowledge of science than for his charity and exemplary life. He died in 1026. His principal work is Magnum Volumen Canonum (Cologne, 1548). See

Burchard (3), a German prelate, lived about the middle of the 11th century. Henry IV, emperor of Germany, made him bishop of Halberstadt in 1050, and in the following year sent him to reconcile certain differences which existed between Alexander II and Honorus II. Burchard, without regard to the wishes of his sovereign, decided in favor of Alexander, and on his return to Germany took sides with the enemies of Henry IV, and waged a hard battle against him. But his efforts to seduce and to divide the clergy were duly the work of the church, and he died into captivity

Burchard (4) was a French ascetic theologian.
Under the direction of St. Bernard he went to Clair-vaux. In 1136 he was made abbot of Balerno, in Burgundy, and was finally transferred to the abbey of Bellevaux, where he died, April 19, 1162. He wrote a letter to Nicolas, monk of Clairvaux, which was published in the Bibliotheca Maxima Potam (xxi. 523), also an appendix to the Life of St. Bernard, in the Biog. Générale, s. v.

Burchard (5), abbot of Urspurg, in the 13th century, who died in 1226, is the author of that part of the famous Chronicle of Urspurg which contains the history of the emperor Frederick Barbarossa, and the princes of his house.

Burchard, Elia, a Presbyterian minister, was born at West Springfield, Mass., April 24, 1788. He graduated at Yale College, New Haven, Conn., in 1811.
In 1827 he was a member of the Oneida Presbytery.
Much of his life was without a ministerial charge.
He died Feb. 4, 1866. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1867, p. 284.

Burchard, Jedediah, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Norwich, Conn., in 1790. His parents moverd to Utica, N.Y., where he entered the store of Mr. Lynot Bloodgood, and was taken with him to Al- bany, where he became converted, and soon after began preparing for the ministry. He then went to live at Sackett's Harbor, continued his studies there, and be- gan in small neighborhoods the work of an evangelist, to which his subsequent ministry was largely devoted. Lieutenant-Governor De Witt, who received him into the Black River Association, then he joined the Presbytery of Watertown in 1825, and was actively engaged in revivals of religion in Jefferson and St. Lawrence counties, and occasionally elsewhere. In 1828 he organized Fayette Street Church, Utica, and servd it for a time. Though afterwards a pastor or stated in the Townsends of the Chatham Street Chapel, New York city, and Adams, N.Y., his profes- sional life was mainly spent in special meetings in cen- tral and western New York, in Canada, and New Eng- land. He was constitutionally eccentric. See Presbyterianism in Central New York, p. 279.

Buchard, Johann (1), a German prelate, was born at Strasburg in the 16th century. He became dean of the cathedral chapter and bishop of Città di Castello, and died May 6, 1506. He is the author of Diarium, or journal of pope Alexander VI, which is curious, but has never yet been published entirely; excerpts from it were published by Leibniz under the title, Specimen Historiarum Aurea S. Anecdota de Vita Alexandri VI; it was published in a more complete form by Eckhard, in his Corpus Historiarium. Buchard also wrote Ordin Pro Informatione Sacroedum (Rome, 1509), and aided in the correction of the Liber Pontificiorum (ibid. 1497, fol.). See Biog. Universelle, vi, 287; Ugelli, Italia Sacra; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Buchard, Johann (2), a Danish theologian, who died June 4, 1663, was a bishop of Ripen and doctor of theo- logy, the author of Oratio de Inuasnuel Jeu Chriato Sceveoppoy, and Disputatio de Horeus. See Moller, Cimbria Litterata; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Buchard, Matthias, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Kiel, Aug. 22, 1619. He studied at Rostock and Kiel, was in the latter place appointed preacher in 1639. Buchard was pensionary, 1483, and died sud- denly, Aug. 29, 1679. See Moller, Cimbria Litterata; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Buchard, Mauritius, a German theologian, who died as doctor and professor of theology, and arch- deacon of St. Thomas at Leipzig, July 16, 1637, is the author of Propagationis Christianae; — De Ododemae pro Augustanae Confessione; — De Incerto Originis. See Wite, Dicarium Biographiae; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Buchardt, Francis, a Lutheran theologian of Lowenberg, in Silesia, was pastor at Riesenburg, which place he had to leave on account of the Osandarian controver- sies in 1534. In 1555 he went to Danzig, where he became pastor of St. Mary's, and in 1560 he went to the University of Wittenberg as professor of theo- logy at the gymnasium there. Differences between his colleagues obliged him to return to Danzig, where he died in 1590. He wrote, De Sacramentum Corporis et Sanguinis; De Libertate Variarum Religionum, etc. He was very bitter against non-Lutherans. See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Burchell, Thomas, an English Baptist missionary, was born in Oxford, and died in 1325, and soon after sailed for Jamaica. It was decided to establish a station at Montego Bay. On Feb. 29, 1824, he formed a Church, which grew to a membership of sixteen hundred persons. His constant and severe labors were not in vain. He died in England, in the early part of 1832, he found his part of the country in a state of 1867. Mr. Burger was an excellent scholar, well-read in general literature and biblical criticism, and was familiar with the Hebrew and Greek text of the Scriptures. His ministry was distinctly evangelical. Conscious sincerity gave him an almost indomitable energy, and he seemed to breathe the same spirit into others. See (London) Cong. Year-book, 1868, p. 337.
BURGER

Burder, Samuel, D.D., a minister of the Church of England, who died as pastor of Christ Church at London, Nov. 21, 1836, is the author of The Scripture Exposition: a New Commentary, Crit. and Prac., on the Holy Bible (London, 1809)—Oriental Literature applied to the Illustration of the Sacred Scriptures, especially with reference to Antiquities, Traditions, Manners, etc. (1810—2 vols.)—Orival Customs; or, An Illustration of the Holy Scriptures by an Explanatory Application of the Customs and Manners of the Eastern Nations, and especially of the Jews, etc. (ibid. 1839, and later). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 135, 188; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v. (B. P.)

Burdett, Cheney, an English Baptist minister, was born at Nasely, Northamptonshire, in 1785. He was converted at an early age, and united with the Church at Guilford. His ministerial preparation was made under the tuition of Rev. Mr. Sutcliffe of Olney. After serving for a year the Church of Sutton-in-the-Elms, Leiceshtire, he was invited to become the pastor. Accordingly he was ordained, and served the Church until within a few weeks of his death, which took place at Thorpe, Essex, Sept. 2, 1852. See (London) Baptist Hand-book, 1853, p. 42. (J. C. S.)

Burdick, David M., a Baptist minister, was born at Newport, R. I., Sept. 5, 1805. In early manhood he left his calling as a mechanic, and having pursued a course of study in the Theological Seminary at Hamilton, N.Y., he graduated in August, 1839. He was ordained, Jan. 9, 1840, pastor of the Baptist Church at Arkwright and Fiskeville, R. I. Here he remained a year and a half. He was subsequently pastor at Rehoboth, Marshpee, and Catuit Port, all in Massachusetts. For three years (1850-53) he had charge of the Baptist Church at Tiverton, R. I., and for about a year and a half he preached to the churches at Lime Rock, Smithfield, and Albion. He died at Lime Rock, April 28, 1855. See Rev. Dr. H. Jackson's Funeral Discourse. (J. C. S.)

Burdick, James Ross, a Baptist minister, was born at Leyden, Mass., June 29, 1796. He graduated at Brown University in 1822, and for a time afterwards was a student in the medical department. Mr. Burdick, while the latter was getting ready for the press his History of all Religions. Mr. Burdick was ordained as an evangelist in 1826. In 1832 he was settled as pastor of the Baptist Church at Ithaca, N.Y., and subsequently pastor at Owego, Lisle, and Tioga; and at Canton, Pa. Ill-health obliged him to retire from the active duties of his ministry for some ten years. He was able to preach more or less during the latter part of his life. He died at Syracuse, N. Y., Feb. 8, 1867. (J. C. S.)

Burditt, Thomas, A.M., an English Baptist minister, was born at Leicester, March 8, 1811. He was converted at the age of eighteen, and in 1836 entered Stepney College. He left college in 1840 for his first pastoral charge at Long Sutton. While here he edited for a time the Baptist Record, a monthly periodical of much ability. In 1845 he removed to Zion Chapel, Cambridge, and a few years afterwards succeeded the late Dr. Bennett as pastor. While in Cambridge, the useful period of his ministry was at Haverfordwest, with whom he removed in 1853 to assume the double function of classical tutor in the college and copastor of the Baptist Church at Bethesda. Here he spent thirteen years of earnest and useful labor, when he removed to South Parade Chapel, Tenby, where the chapel soon became too small for the rapidly increasing congregation, and had to be enlarged at two or three different times. In 1871 Mr. Burditt went on a visit to his sons, who had settled in America, and spent over ten years in Tenby, at the same time accepting a charge at Pine Grove, Nova Scotia. He soon returned to England, however, and again took up his residence at Tenby, ministering occasionally to the Church at Manorbier. In 1875 he accepted the pastorate of Craig Chapel, Rawdon, where he labored about five years. He announced his resignation early in February, 1881, but before the time of its taking effect had arrived he died, Feb. 20, 1882. See (London) Baptist Hand-book, 1882, p. 296.

Burdass, John, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at York. He was converted in early life, was received into the ministry about 1760, when twenty-one years of age, became a supernumerary in 1837 in his native city, established there a theological class for local preachers, and died in York, Feb. 7, 1861, in his eighty-sixth year. Burdass possessed a mind of fine quality, of acuteness and balance. He was a self-taught scholar, a great reader, especially in theology. His sermons were sound expositions enforced by pointed application, fluently delivered. He was inclined to mathematics and metaphysics. He wrote, Memoirs of R. Burdass, of York, his father (3d ed. Thetford, 1823, 12mo)—The Sinner's Tears, and Devout Breakings after God (revised and adapted from Bunyan's Fitts, 1829, 12mo)—Memoirs and Remains of Rev. J. Stpace (1842, 12mo)—Sermon on Rom. viii, 2, in Sermons on Important Subjects (London, 1832). In 1841 Burdass published in London, in three vols. 12mo, the complete works of "the poetic divine," Rev. Daniel Isaac. See Smith, Hist. of the C. and Meth. iii, 505; Rev. Minutes of the British Conference, 1861, p. 14; Osborne, Meth. Bib.; Everett, Wesleyan Centenary Takings, i, 299, sketch 22. Burdass was implicated in the writing of the celebrated Fly-sheets, and was repaired by the Conference, his age saving him from expulsion.

Buré, was in Scandinavian mythology, the first man, whose three grandchildren, Culin, Willie, and We, killed Ymir, the frost-giant, from whose body they made the earth. See Ymir.

Buren, James Pascal, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was a member of the Arkansas Conference, and filled acceptably five different appointments. He died April 30, 1861, in Arkansas. Mr. Buren was a man of energetic, practical, prudent, affable, and true. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1862, p. 5.

Burg, Franz Joseph von, a German theologian, leader of the Ultramontanists in Baden, was born March 23, 1803, at Zell-on-the-Harrembach. He studied at Freiburg, Heidelberg, and Göttingen, and commenced his lectures at Freiburg in 1829, where he was also made professor extraordinarius in 1833, and in 1836 professor extraordinarius of law and jurisprudence. In 1834 he was elected member of the House of Representatives. The liberalism which he at first espoused he soon exchanged for ultramontanism, and in a short time he became the leader of the clerical party. In 1874 he was elected member of the German Parliament, and died Feb. 1, 1878, at Munich. He published various works, but is best known for his Druck der Christenmensa auf Recht und Staat (Freiburg, 1841):—Die Methodologie des Kirchenrechts (ibid. 1842):—Der Unterschied der protestantischen und katholischen Universitäten Deutschlands (ibid. 1846):—Die Gemeinsameanerk. der Rechte und der Interessen des Katholischen (Schumacher, 1847-1850, 2 vols.):—Der Orden der barmherzigen Schwestern (ibid. 1847):—Die Kato-lische Politik von Donoso Cortez (Paderborn, 1850); - Gesicht der Bedrückung der kathol. Kirche in England (Schaffhausen, 1851); - Urbanlische Geschichte des National- und Territorialkirchenhums in der kath. Kirche Deutschlands (ibid. 1851); - Die Freie kathol. Universität Deutschlands (ibid. 1851); - Die Gesellschaft Jesu, ihr Zweck, ihre Satzungen, Geschichte, Aufgabe und Stellung in der Gegenwart (Mayence, 1853, 1854, 2 vols.; new ed. 1865); - Die Gesellschaft der Seligen Thomas der Dämmerschaf von Canterbury (ibid. 1855); - Winfried-Bomfichus, published after his death (Gratz, 1880). (B. P.)

Burg, Johann Friedrich, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born May 13, 1869, at Breisau. He studied at Leipsic, and in 1711 took the degree of bachelor of theology in his native city. In 1713 he was appointed pastor of Trinity Church, and he died June 1, 1786, as professor of theology and superintendent of the Evangelical churches and schools. He published, Diss. Sistens analysin Logicam Epistola Philo ad Ephesios, etc. (Leipsic, 1708); - Diss. de Adoration et Gratificationis Spiritus S. contra G. Whitonam (ibid. 1711); - Summarische Wiederholung und Erläuterung des Grundes der Theologischen Ordnung des Hochstifts Leipsig (ibid., 1739); - Summation gesetzlicher Reden (ibid. 1750-56, 6 parts). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit., 1, 166, 784; Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, i, 206 sq. (B. P.)

Burgar, John, an English Wesleyan minister, was born in London, May 11, 1787. He was converted in 1806, and was ordained in 1816 as a foreign missionary. He held the charge of Rebecca, W. I., until his death, Aug. 1, 1816. His acquirements were considerable, and his labors crowned with success. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1817; - West. Meth. Mag. 1820, p. 641, 721.

Burgate, William, a Reformation martyr, was a native of Spain, and a true believer in the Scriptures. He was apprehended, and condemned to be burned Nov. 2, 1538. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, viii, 516.

Burge, Hartwell T., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Virginia, Dec. 23, 1800. He removed to Kentucky in 1819; experienced religion in 1888; soon after received license to preach, and in 1845 entered the Louisville Conference of the Church South. On the opening of the rebellion he entered the Union army as chaplain of one of the Kentucky regiments. Two years he served as a commissioned officer, and with his regiment spent much time in suppressing guerillas in Kentucky. His active part in overcoming the rebellion made it impossible for him to obtain support in the ministry in that state, after the war, and he removed to Indiana and united with the Indiana Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church. In 1870 he became superintended and retired to Patoka, Ind., where in the following year his robust constitution gave way under the burden of years and cares; in August he became insane, and on the 20th of that month died. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1877, p. 55.

Burge, Lemyel, a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born at Litchfield, Conn., in 1797. He was educated at the Episcopal Academy at Cheshire, and subsequently studied under bishop Griswold of Rhode Island; was ordained deacon in 1820, and afterward priest. His only cure was that of the "Old Narragansett Church" at Wickford, R. I. In 1855 he removed to Brooklyn, N. Y., with impaired health, officiating occasionally as his strength permitted. He died in that city, Sept. 10, 1864. See Amer. Quart. Church Rev. Oct. 1864, p. 485.

Burgess, Jean, a French martyr, was a merchant in Paris; was condemned for declaring against the mass and other popish ceremonies, and had his tongue bored through, and a hot iron rod tied or bored through one of his cheeks. He was burned at Paris in 1583. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 396.

Burgess, Mark, an English martyr, was master of an English ship, called the Minion, and was burned at Lisbon, Portugal, in 1600, because of his faith in Christ and his adherence to the mass of the see. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, viii, 516.

Burgess, Alvin, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Booneville, N. Y., May 10, 1820. He removed to Bainbridge, O., with his parents, in 1833; received an early religious training; experienced religion in 1839; was licensed to preach in 1840, and admitted into the Erie Conference, in which he labored with much acceptability to the close of his life, Oct. 22, 1872. Mr. Burgess was a man of energy and great faith. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1873, p. 85.

Burgess, Benedict, a Methodist minister, was born in Maryland, May 18, 1784. After his conversion he united with the Methodist Episcopal Church. On March 6, 1807, he was received into the Baltimore Conference. In 1809 he was ordained deacon, and in 1810 he located. He labored as a local preacher until 1828. He became associated with the Methodist Protestant Church, and was one of the founders of the Virginia Conference. Three times he was elected president of that body. As a preacher of the Gospel he was very successful, and brought souls to Christ. He died in Virginia, Oct. 25, 1848. See Colhoun, Founders of the M. F. Church, p. 560.

Burgess, Cornelius D.D., an English Nonconformist divine, was invited at Oxford in 1611. On receiving orders he was presented to the rectory of St. Magnus, London -bridge, and received the living of Watford, in Hertfordshire, in 1618. He was one of the chaplains on an embassy to Charles I, in the beginning of his reign, but afterwards became an adherent to the principles which resulted in the overthrow of that monarch. He became lecturer in St. Paul's, with a salary of four hundred pounds and the dean's house for a residence; but at the restoration he lost all his property, and died in extreme poverty, June 9, 1679. His writings were few and of no present importance. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Burgess, Ebenezer, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Wareham, Mass., April 1, 1790. He sprang from a Puritan stock, his ancestors being among the early settlers of Sandwich, Mass. He graduated from Brown University in 1809, and on leaving college had charge, for two years, of the Latin School connected with the university, and for some time was a tutor in the college. He commenced the study of theology in 1812, with Rev. Dr. Emmons of Franklin, Mass., and completed his course of study at Andover Theological seminary, in 1815, he became professor of mathematics and natural philosophy in the University of Vermont, which office he held for two years, and then resigned to accept an appointment from the American Colonization Society, by whom he was sent to the west coast of Africa, on a mission of inquiry, being accompanied by Samuel J. Mills. The result of this mission was the commencement of what has since become the republic of Liberia. Upon his return he devoted another year to theological study under the Rev. Dr. E. D. Griffin, then a pastor in Newark, N. J. His ordination took place Aug. 14, 1821, and he became pastor of the First Congregational Church in Dedham, Mass., where he remained until his death, Dec. 5, 1870. He published a few occasional discourses, a volume entitled The Dedham Pulpit, and another on The Burgess Genealogy. (J. C. S.)

Burgess, Harrison, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Maryland, Feb. 22, 1828. He emigrated with his parents to Ohio in his childhood; was converted in his twentieth year, and at the same time removed to Indiana; was soon after licensed to preach; and in 1850 entered the North Indiana Conference. After filling three appointments ill-health necessitated his taking a local relation, which he held three years; then, in 1859, he united with the North-western Indiana Conference, and was appointed to Covington circuit, where he labored but a week or two when he was attacked with consumption, which terminated his life, Dec. 7, 1859. Mr. Burgess was devout and energetic. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1860, p. 356.

Burgess, James, an English Congregational minister, was born March 25, 1798, at Upper East Smithfield. He early knew what it was to enjoy communion with God. While still young he preached in London and adjacent villages in connection with the Itinerant Society of London. In June, 1814, he became pastor at Great Shelford, a village near Cambridge, where he preached with great success for nine years. On July 6, 1823, he was united in marriage to Miss Lydia, daughter of Mr. John Hare, of Little Shelford, Cambridgeshire. A church was formed here Oct. 13, 1823, over which he was ordained Dec. 16 of the same year. He died Feb. 21, 1833. As a preacher he was faithful and eloquent; he gave exceedingly lucid views of the doctrines of Scripture. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1854, p. 219, 220.

Burgess, John (1), an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Grantham, near Louth, Lincolnshire, in 1801. He was piously trained by Methodist parents, and was converted when fifteen years of age. In 1824 he received his first appointment (Ipswich), and he continued to labor until he was cut off in the midst of his usefulness and usefulness, Sept. 14, 1846. He was a diligent student, a sound theologian, an instructive preacher. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1846.

Burgess, John (2), an English Congregational minister, was born at Peckforton, Cheshire, in 1825. He was converted at the age of sixteen; was educated at Chesham College, and settled as pastor at Long Melford, Suffolk, in 1848, where he labored until his death, which occurred at Hammersmith, Feb. 21, 1868. His gentle manner, amiable disposition, his meekness, his unmistakable piety and devotion to God, endeared him to all, and brought many to Christ. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1869, p. 225.

Burgess, Joseph (1), an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Thurlow, County Tipperary, Ireland, Aug. 4, 1757. He received a careful training by his father, who belonged to a regiment of horse. Joseph himself joined the regiment at an early age, and was successively trumpeter, paymaster's clerk, quartermaster (1780), and paymaster. His army associations led him to leave the army in 1795, when he was converted under the ministry of William Boothby. Wesley, Burgess's personal acquaintance, received him into the itineracy in 1790, and appointed him to Liverpool. He thenceforth labored with faithfulness and diligence, chiefly in the counties of Devon and Cornwall, until 1822, when he became a supernumerary at Plymouth. He died March 24, 1839. He was a man of exalted piety and unwearying generosity, tender, studious, and courteous. Besides contributions to the Wesleyan Methodist Magazine, and other periodicals, Burgess published Remarks on the Sacrifical Death of Christ (2 ed., London, 1846); Publications in the West Meth. Mag., 1840, p. 537 sq.; Minutes of the British Conference, 1839; Memoirs of Burgess, by his son, Rev. W. P. Burgess (London, 1840).

Burgess, Joseph (2), an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Northwich, Cheshire, in 1795. He was received into the ministry in 1812; preached thirty-nine years in the active work; resided at Warrington, and died June 2, 1859. "A contented, thoughtful, and cheerful spirit diffused its influence around his path. He pursued an undeviating course of well-doing." See Minutes of the British Conference, 1859, p. 200.

Burgess, Nathan B., a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born Sept. 14, 1771, at Woodbury, Conn. He received his education in the Episcopal Academy at Cheshire; was ordained deacon in 1801, and took priest's orders in the following year. Among his parishes were Guilford, Glastonbury, and Pomfret, Conn. In 1835 he removed to the diocese of Western New York, where he served several parishes. He died Feb. 20, 1854, at Utica, N. Y. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1854, p. 458.

Burgess, Richard, B.D., a minister of the Church of England, who died in April, 1881, at Brighton, at the age of eighty-two, was for years a curate of St. Stephen's, Rome, and in 1836 was appointed to the rectory of Upper Chealse. Here he labored for a period of thirty-three years, and during that time he was appointed to a prebendal stall in St. Paul's Cathedral, and was also made rural dean of Chelsea. In 1869 he was presented to the living of St. Mary's, Lutterworth and Ekworth, near Bury St. Edmunds, which he resigned some time before his death. Mr. Burgess took great interest in antiquarian and archaeological studies, and also in the question of education. For many years the reports of the Foreign Aid Society were from his pen. He promoted the interests of commercial Protestantism, more especially in connection with members of the Church of England. Among many of the Evangelical churches he was long regarded as a spiritual father; and once, across the Channel, he had no hesitation in donning the robe of a pastor of the Reformed Church, and conducting divine service in a Presbyterian pulpit. He published The Topography and Antiquities of Rome (1881)—Great Britain and the Levant (1885). (B. F.)

Burgess, R. W., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, labored some time in the South Carolina Conference, and in 1859 entered the Florida Conference. In 1862 he enlisted as a private soldier in the Confederate army, and fought during the campaign of that year in the south. In 1863 he resumed his ministerial labors in the Florida Conference, and continued laborious until his death in 1864. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1864, p. 522.

Burgess, William Pennington, A.M., an English Wesleyan minister, was born in Liverpool, Dec. 3, 1790, being the son of Rev. Joseph Burgess. He was educated at Kingwood School (1798-1803); was classical instructor in Pocock's Academy in Bristol (1803-11); became private tutor; was received into the ministry in 1842, and labored for forty-two years, chiefly in the west of England; became a supernumerary at Plymouth in 1856; and died July 25, 1880. Mr. Burgess was gifted with an enlarged and fruitful mind, and was always assiduous in knowledge, and uniriting industry. He was a solid scholar. Catholicity of principle, inflexible truthfulness, open-hearted benevolence, a warm heart, under a cold exterior, and a profound humility, were traits of this useful minister. He published Sermons on the Doctrine, Experience, and Practice of Primitive Christianity (Lond. 1824, 1830; 2d ed. 1836, 12mo)—Essays on the Principles and Doctrines of Christianity—Wesleyan Hymnology (2d ed. Lond. 1846, 18mo—valuable)—Memoirs of Joseph Burgess (1853)—Occasional Sermons. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1868, p. 57; Wes. Meth. Magazine, 1878, p. 491, 577; Everett, Wesleyan Contemporaries, 1879, p. 47, 48; Whitaker, Hist. West Meth. Mag., 1840, p. 537 sq.; Minutes of the British Conference, 1839; Memoirs of Burgess, by his son, Rev. W. P. Burgess (London, 1840).

Burghill (or Burbill), Robert, an English clergyman, was born at Dymock, Gloucestershire, in 1572, and educated at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, of which he became a fellow in 1584. He received the living of Northwold, in Norfolk, and became a prebendary of Hereford in 1604. He died in 1641. He published, Incolumitas Pauperis, or Regem Contemplationis Christi vates, Ruth 1. 3. Be thưba nuper Regione Posteriore ad Osmonum Audentia, etc. (1603)—De Potestate Regia et Usurpatione Papali, etc. (1613)—and other works. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, a. v.

Burgkmair, Hans, a German painter and engraver, was born at Augsburg in 1472, and probably studied under Durer. He died in 1558. Several of his pictures are preserved at Augsburg. His principal work is Joseph and Potiphar’s Wife; besides several saints.

Burmann, Johann Christian, a Lutheran doctor and professor of theology of Germany, was born at Rostock, where he also studied, as well as in Jena and Wittenberg. In 1724 he was appointed pastor of the Holy Ghost Church in his native place; in 1726 he was made doctor of theology; in 1735, professor of theology; in 1754, senior of the theological faculty; and, in 1760, director of the ministerium and senior of the academy.
He died Feb. 15, 1775. He was a voluminous writer.

gemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Burgoj, Charles, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was a native of Maryland. In 1790 he entered the institute of the Methodist society, and in the latter part of 1800 died. Mr. Burgoj was a man subject to depression of spirit, and affliction of mind as well as body. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1801, p. 97.

Burgos, Council or (Concilium Burgense). Burgos is the capital of Old Castile, in Spain. Two coustics were held here.
I. Held in 1090 (according to others in 1076) by cardinal Richard, legate. In this council the Roman office was substituted for the Gothic rite hitherto in use.
See Labbe, Concil. x, 1815.
II. Held in 1136, by Guy, cardinal and legate, who was sent into Spain to facilitate the introduction of the Roman office, and to effect a reconciliation between the kings of Navarre and Castile, who were at war.

Burgos, Juan Bautista, a Spanish theologian, was a native of Valencia, and a monk of the order of St. Augustine. Being sent to the Council of Trent in 1553, he there delivered a remarkable discourse, On the Four Means of Extirpating Heresy. He afterwards taught theology in his native place. His sermons were published at Louvain in 1567. He died in 1574. See Hoefner, Nouv. Bldg. Générale, s. v.

Burgos, Pablo de, a Spanish prelate, was born in Burgos in 1535. He was a Jew, and was afterwards converted to Christianity, baptized, and then took the name of Pablo de Santa Maria. At the death of his wife he entered the order and became bishop of Carthagena, then of Burgos. King Henry II chose him as preceptor of his son John. He died Aug. 29, 1435. He wrote some important additions to the Pontificis of Nicolas de Lyra, and a treatise entitled, Scrutinium Scripturum, 1505. See Hoefner, Nouv. Bibliotheque, s. v.

Buruana, Daniel, D.D., a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born at Sherman, Conn., July 7, 1763. His father served as an officer for seven years in the old French war, at the close of which he settled at Sherman. Daniel’s only opportunity for study was about three months of the year, in a district-school, but he prosecuted his studies vigorously and prepared himself for college. About 1783 he began to teach in the public-school at Lanseashire, Mass., and here he was converted. His friends erected for him a large brick school-house; he built a comfortable residence and abandoned the ministry, towards which he had been looking previous to this time. In the absence of the rector of St. Luke’s, at Lanesborough, he sometimes officiated as lay-reader until 1791, when he began the study of theology. Two years thereafter he was ordained deacon, and, the rector of St. Luke’s having died, the care of the two churches in that parish devolved upon Mr. Buruana, who, nevertheless, still retained his school. Reading enterprising upon his own organized two other churches—one at Lenox, Mass., and the other at New Lebanon, N. Y. His health failing, he dismissed his school and devoted himself entirely to his clerical duties. In 1794 he received priest’s orders at New Haven, and labored six years at Lanesborough and adjacent places. In 1798 he became pastor at Newtown, Conn., a pastorate which continued thirty-one years. Resigning his charge in 1830, he officiated for one year at Woodbury, Roxbury, and Bethlehem; and in the fall of 1831 took charge of the parish of St. Peter’s, Plymouth, Mass., where he remained six years.
After this he officiated at Oxford and Zoar, but in 1841 he was compelled, by increasing bodily infirmities, to close his ministry, after which he removed to Poughkeepsie, N. Y., where he died Jan. 30, 1859. He was then at the time the oldest minister of his communion in the United States. Dr. Buruana had great knowledge of human nature; and his mental energy, keen discernment, and profound sagacity supplied, in some measure, his want of scholastic culture. From 1804 to 1826 he was elected continuously a delegate to the General Convention. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vo. 410; Amer. Quarr. Church Rev. 1854, p. 151.

Buri, in Norse mythology. The cow Audhumla, who came from the Ginnungagap (chaos) immediately after the great giant Ymer, licked the salted earth, and on the first day there came up human hair, on the second a head projected, and on the third a goat. Buri, came forth, beautiful, large, strong, and vigorous. He begat Bor. The latter produced Odin, Wili, and We.

Burdian, Jean, a famous French nominalist of the 14th century, was born at Béthune, in Artois. In 1310 he went to Paris, where he attached himself to the faamous Occam (q. v.). In 1327 he was rector of the Paris University, and was one of the delegates who went to the pope at Avignon. After the ascendency of the realists over the nominalists, he went to Vienna, where he died after 1358. Burdian was one of the most vigorous adherents to the principles of his teacher Occam, which carried in all its conclusions. His main works are Summa secundum Diereticum und Compendium, 1490; 1500, 1516; 1521, 1523, 1526; 1532, 1534;

Burienna (or Burien), Saint, one of the Irish as-cetics (said to have been the daughter of a king) who settled in the wild Land’s End district, CornwalL In the 6th century. In honor of her relics, the church of Burienna, a short distance north of Land’s End, was built; a college within sight of the Scilly rocks, with a church which enjoyed the privilege of sanctuary (see Butler, June 5). The two churches which have always been connected with St. Burienna are those of St. Senanus and St. Levan, also from Ireland. St.
Burienna’s day is May 29 or June 19 (register of Burienna), or June 4 (Butler), or May 1. The parish feast is on the nearest Sunday to old May-day. The martrology of the Church of Exeter placed it on May 1.

Burin, Giovanni Antonio, a reputable Italian historical painter, was born at Bologna in 1560, and died about 1750. He studied under Domenico Casti, and painted a number of pictures for the churches of Bologna, among which are The Crucifixion, in San Tommaso del Mercato; the Martyrdom of St. Catherine, in Santa Caterina de Saragozza; David with the Head of Goliath, in the sacristy of San Salvatore. See Sporer, Burk, Johann Christian Friedrich, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born in 1800.

From 1849 until 1873 he was pastor at Eckerdingen, in Wurttemberg. In that year he retired from the ministry, and lived with his son at Lichtenstein, where he died, Nov. 28, 1880. He published, Dr. Johann Albrecht Bengel’s Letters to the Church (5d Ed., Strasburg, 1815).
He was a member of the Herz- und Abendmahlbischöfe (5th ed. 1846). — Was Bilkik, John, a Baptist minister, was born in Virginia, Nov. 13, 1806, and removed to Salem, Tenn., where he united with the Church in May, 1833. He was licensed to preach in May, 1844, and ordained one year after. He was much occupied with labors as an itinerant evangelist in lower Tennessee, a successful revivalist, and wonderfully gifted in exhortation and prayer. As an evidence of the place he held in the regard of his brethren, it may be mentioned that for many years he was moderator of Oooue Association. During the late war he went to Texas after his daughter-in-law. On his return home, on board of a steamer, he took the cholera, and was put off on the bank of the Red River, where he died and was buried, Jan. 29, 1863. See Bur, Sketches of Tenn. Ministers, p. 46. (J. C. S.)

Burr, Philip David, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born July 29, 1714, at Neuen. He studied at Tübingen, was in 1742 pastor at Bolheim, and in 1750 at Hedelingen, near Stuttgart. In 1758 he was appointed superintendent at Markt-Grippen, and in 1766 he was called for the same position to Kirchheim, where he died, March 22, 1770. He is the author of Gnomon in Duodenum Prophetarum Minores (Heilbronn, 1753), with a Preface by his father-in-law, the famous J. A. Bengel.—Gnomon Paulinorum (Stuttgart, 1760);—Evangelischer Fingerzeig auf den wahren Verstand und heiligen Gebrauch der geheimen Sinn-Fest- und Friedläufigen Evangelien, etc. (Leipsic and Tübingen, 1747, 7 vols.)—Die Lehre vom Gleichgewicht und der Gesundheit im Herzen und Gewissen des Sinners, etc. (Stuttgart, 1763-65, 7 pts.) Burke, Abel Benjamin, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Woodstock, Conn., Feb. 13, 1816. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1838, began his studies in theology at Union Theological Seminary in 1839, and graduated in 1842. He served as stated supply at Jacksonville, Fla., from 1842 to 1846; taught at Alexandria, Ga., from 1846 to 1847; and died there, May 11, 1847. See Gen. Cat. of the Union Theol. Seminary, p. 28.

Burke, John, a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the Diocese of Long Island, was chaplain in the United States Army in Louisiana in 1853, and was removed to Fort Washita, Ind. Ter., the next year: in 1864 he was chaplain at Fort Hamilton, N. Y.; in 1870 he resided at Tarrytown, having retired from his chaplaincy in the army. He died Dec. 24, 1873. See Prot. Epic. Almanac, 1875, p. 144.

Burke, Richard, an English Wesleyan preacher, commenced his ministry in 1765, and died in 1774. He was "made perfect through sufferings. He united the wisdom of age with the simplicity of childhood." Sunday, Feb. 15, 1778: I buried the remains of Richard Barke, a faithful laborer in our Lord's vineyard. A more unblamable character I have hardly known. He never gave me occasion to find fault with him in anything. He was a man of unwearied diligence and patience, and his works do follow him" (Wesley, Journal). See Atmos, Meth. Memorial, s. v.

Burke, William, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, born in Lebanon, Pa., Nov. 14, 1805. In early life he was converted to God. He was received on probation into the East Pennsylvania Conference in 1831, and two years afterwards, on account of bodily infirmities, was necessitated to take a location. In 1839 he applied again to Conference, and was accepted. His society in the East Pennsylvania Conference had been organized the previous year, and he was one of the first four missionaries sent out by this society. The field assigned him was among the Germans in New York city. He reached his mission May 3, 1839, and on the 12th preached his first sermon in the city, to seven attentive hearers. He labored in this mission for two years. In 1841 his field of labor was Reading, Pa. At the close of this year he was necessitated to locate because of ill-health. In 1844 he resumed his ministerial labors and was stationed at Buffalo, N. Y.; in 1846 had charge of Lake Circuit, in New York state; in 1848 joined the Ohio Conference, and was stationed at Dayton; in 1847-48 at Erie, Pa.; in 1849, Greenville Circuit; in 1850-51 he travelled Canton Circuit, and in 1852 Wayne; in 1856 labored on Liverpool Circuit; in 1864-66 at Canton Mission; Tuscarawas, 1856; Lake, 1857; Lancaster, 1858; Greensburg, 1859; Tuscarawas, again, 1860; Sewickley, 1860; Tarentum, 1862; and Marion Circuit, 1863. His health having failed, the Conference granted him a supernumerary relation, which he held until his death, which occurred near Greensburg, O., Jan. 11, 1881. He was a patient, enduring, zealous, and successful minister of our Lord Jesus Christ. See Methodological Messenger, Feb. 1, 1881.

Burkitt, M. H. B., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Virginia, Jan. 11, 1812. He received a careful religious training, joined the Church in his youth, and in 1845, on the organization of the Church South, his residence being within its bounds, he was licensed to preach by it, and in its local ministry served until the beginning of the rebellion, when his strong Union sentiments caused him to depart his bearing his home. He went to Kentucky, and was appointed chaplain of the 23rd Regiment of Kentucky Volunteers. In 1864 he entered the Kentucky Conference, and on the organization of the Hoiston Conference in 1865 was transferred to it. He died Nov. 12, 1873. No man of his time did more for the cause of education in East Tennessee than Mr. Burkitt. He was kind, generous, and energetic. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1867, p. 140.

Burkholder, Jacob, a clergyman of the German Reformed Church, was born in Bedford County, Pa., Aug. 29, 1812. In his youth he learned the carpenter's trade, at which he worked, until he joined the Church and entered the ministry. In 1847 he joined the Reformed Church, and two years later began his studies for the ministry. In 1856 he removed to Illinois, where he continued to study, and in 1862 was licensed to preach. His health failing, he removed to Huntington, Ind., but in 1869 accepted a call to Union Charge, De Kalb Co., Ind., and was ordained. After one year he became pastor of West Jefferson Church, Williams Co., O., where he remained one year, and also took charge of some congregations in Miami and Kosciusko counties, Ind., and in their midst ended his labors, Aug. 17, 1875. He was a faithful, zealous laborer. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church, v. 187.

Burke, Napoleon W., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Greensboro, Ky., Oct. 8, 1809. He embraced religion in Texas in 1843, was licensed to preach in 1844, and in 1845 joined the East Texas Conference. He continued to fill the appointments assigned him as circuit and station preacher, presiding elder and president of Fowler Institute, until 1871, when he became superannuated, a relation which he held to the close of his life, Oct. 15, 1873. Mr. Burks was a man of fair literary attainments, an excellent and useful preacher. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1873, p. 804.

Burlamaqui, Farihce, a Swiss pastor and scholar, was born in Geneva in 1826. He served successively the Church of Geneva and that of Grenoble. He was well versed in Oriental languages and literature. He died in 1898. In 1869, he published anonymously two theological works: Sermon fait au Jour du Jeune Célébre par les Églises Réformées du Dauphiné (Geneva, 1864) - Catechisme sur les Controverses avec l'Église Romaine (1668) - Synopsis Theologiae et Speculativ (Écono- nomiae Fidérum Dei (1671) - Considérations sur les Sermo's de Repose au Cardinal Spinola, in French and Latin (ibid. 1680). See Hoefer, Nouv. Bioi. Générale, s. v.

Burleson, Richard Byrd, LL.D., a Baptist minister, was born near Decatur, Ala., about 1820. He united with the Church in 1839: spent three years in Nashville University, Tenn.; was licensed by the first Baptist Church at Nashville in 1841, and ordained as pastor of the Church in Athens, Ala., in November, 1842; remained there till 1845, and then was transferred to the Church at Tuscumbara, where he continued till 1849, when he became president of Moulton Female Institute. In 1855 he removed to Austin, Tex., where he was pastor, and also had charge of a select female school. He was chosen professor of natural philosophy in Baylor University in 1857, and vice-president and professor of natural science in Waco University in 1861, with which institution he was connected eighteen years. He died at Waco, Dec. 21, 1879. He is said to have been a preacher of distinguished ability, and a teacher eminently qualified for his work. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclopaedia, p. 163. (J. C. S.)

Burlet, Stephen, a German martyr, was burned at Arras in 1534 for reading the Scriptures. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv. 397.

Burley, James, an English Wesleyan minister, was born in Leeds, Yorkshire. He was converted in youth; admitted into the travelling connection in 1796; travelled in three circuits; became a superinten- dent at Wells in 1823; and died Nov. 12, 1846. He was much esteemed.

Burley, Walter, an early English secular priest, or probably a Franciscan monk, was born in 1275. He was educated at Merton College, Oxford, and afterwards studied at Paris. On his return to England he dis- sented from Duns Scotus. He was preacher to king Edward III about 1337. He wrote Commentaries on the Sentences, and a large number of philosophical treatises, only a part of which have been published. See Mo- sheim, Hist. of the Church, bk. iii, cent. xiv, pt. ii, ch. ii.

Burlingame, Arnold G., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Norwich, N. Y., Aug. 27, 1808. He was converted in 1820: made a class-leader at the age of nineteen; licensed to exhort in 1833, to preach in 1839, and entered the Oriskany Conference. After serving the Church twenty-two years, failing health necessitated his superannuation, and he removed west and located within the bounds of the Rock River Conference, wherein, whenever able, he served as supply until 1868, when he was called to the charge of the Southern Tier Orphan Asylum, Elmira, N. Y., which position he held until his death, in 1871 or 1872. He was a most excellent man and a useful preacher. Over fifteen years ago he was brought to the west through his labors. He was characterized by amiability, prudence, and inflexible integrity. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1872, p. 58.

Burlingame, James, a minister of the so-called Christian denomination, was born at Sterling, Conn., May 13, 1794. His opportunities for acquiring an education were of a limited character. When he reached the age of twenty, he was called to the ministry, and was at twenty-one began to preach. About the time of his baptism, in 1812, a Church had been formed in the west section of the town of Coventry, R. I., where there had been no religious reformation for thirty years. To this Church, after it had passed through various fortunes, Mr. Burlingame was called to be pastor in 1824, having been ordained April 1, 1821. His ministry with this Church continued for half a century. He died at the residence of his son, in Boston, Aug. 29, 1881. During his long ministry he performed a large amount of itinerant labor, his parish including a hundred square miles. He preached in a large frame and great physical endurance. He also traveled and preached through all the New England States, more or less in the Middle States, and made two preaching tours through Ohio, the early days of the anti-slavery movement he went to Virginia and the Carolinas for the double purpose of visiting the churches and learning for himself the condition of the slaves. His record as an advocate of temperance is worthy of honorable mention. See Providence Journal, Oct. 4, 1881. (J. C. S.)

Burlingame, Maxey Whipple, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born in Gloucester, R. I., May 4, 1865. When very young he united with the Church in his native town. His education he acquired at Kil- lingtong, Conn., and Wilbraham, Mass. In May, 1829, he was licensed, and he was ordained in 1829. With his early labors as a preacher he combined teaching. Most of his life was spent in the neighborhood of Gloucester. In 1830 he became pastor of the Church in Blackstone (Waterford), Mass., where he remained sixteen years. He was subsequently pastor for brief periods in several churches in the western part of Rhode Island, all in the vicinity of his native place; also of churches in New Hampshire, Maine, Massachusetts, and Connecti- cut. From 1844 to 1859 he was a corporator of the Free-will Baptist Printing Establishment, the publish- ing-house of the denomination. His death occurred at Georigaviile, R. I., March 4, 1879. See R. I. Biograph- ical Cyclopaedia, p. 335. (J. C. S.)

Burlingame, Waterman, a Baptist minister, was born in Pitcher, N. Y., in 1805. He pursued his studies at the Hamilton Literary and Theological Insti- tution, and graduated at the Newton Theological Insti- tution in 1836. He was ordained pastor of the Bap- tist Church in Hingham, Mass., Sept. 29, 1826, where he remained three years; was pastor of the Church at Mendon, N. Y., four years; and was in Buffalo four years. He died in Baltimore, Md., Feb. 11, 1866. (J. C. S.)

Burlington, Charles D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Greenfield, N. Y., Feb. 8, 1810. He entered the western part of the state with his parents when quite young; had very limited educational advantages, yet prepared himself for school-teaching, and while employed in that profession at Portageville in 1831 he experienced religion. In 1840 he entered the Genesee (now Western New York) Conference, in which he continued with zeal and fidelity to the day of his death, Sept. 50, 1874. Mr. Burlingame was a man of superior talents, culture and piety; an able writer and preacher, an excellent pastor, and an exemplary Christian. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1875, p. 159.

Burlington, Richard, an English minister of the Society of Friends, was born in 1779. He labored as a minister for nearly thirty years, and was much beloved and highly esteemed by all who knew him. He died Oct. 11, 1840. See (Lond.) Annual Monitor, 1841, p. 10.

Burlingame, Charles, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in West Greenwich, R. I., in 1801. He removed with his parents to Willet, N. Y., in 1809; was converted in 1822; began exhorting in 1826; received license to preach in 1828; was ordained local deacon in 1834; and in 1836 entered the Oneida Conference. In 1842 he was obliged to relinquish active work because of hemorrhage of the lungs, and he died May 30, 1843. Mr. Burlingame was the means of bringing hundreds into the Church. His character was exemplary. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1845, p. 452.

Burls, Robert, an English Congregational minister, was born at Thorley, Herts, Oct. 8, 1792; and through the teaching and example of his wise and pious mother was early brought to Christ. He entered college and theological training at Wymondley College, and in 1820 was ordained pastor at Maldon, Essex, where he labored until his death, June 8, 1866. Mr. Burls was intellectually independent, religiously conservative, essentially evangelical, and thoroughly practical. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1867, p. 275.

Burligay, Jean, a French priest and doctor in theology, was born at Paris in 1624. He died in 1702, having edited the Breviary of Sena, published in 1702. He also assisted Tillemon in the composition of his Mémoires pour l'histoire Ecclesiastique.

Burnese Version of the Scriptures. The Burnese, it has been conjectured, was originally a dialect of the Chinese family of languages, and was moulded into its present form by admixture with the Pali. It numbers many dialects, some say, as many as eighteen. The first attempt to procure a complete version in this language was made by the Baptist missionaries at Serampore. About the year 1807 Felix Carey, the son of Dr. Carey, settled as a missionary in Burnah; and, in connection with Mr. Chatter, he produced a translation of two or three of the Gospels. In 1815 the Gospel of St. Matthew was printed by them in Serampore; but this version proved very imperfect. In 1816 Dr. Adoniarm Judson, in connection with Mr. Hough, commenced the version; and in 1817 the Gospel of St. Matthew was printed at Bangang, as introductory to the entire New Testament. The first complete version of the New Testament was issued from the press in December, 1832; and in 1834 Dr. Judson completed the translation of the Old Testament, (a second edition of which appeared in 1840.) In 1857 a second and much-improved edition of the New Testament was printed by the American Baptist missionaries established at Maulmein. The language has been treated by Judson, Burnese and English Dictionary (Maulmein, 1826, 1829), also Grammar of the Burnese Language (Rangoon, 1866); Later, Burnese Grammar (Caldicott, 1845). See Bible of Every Land, p. 7 sq. (B. P.)

Burnaby, Thomas, A.M., an English divine, was born in 1761. He graduated from the university of Cambridge in 1784, eventually became vicar of St. Margaret's, Leiceste, and rector of Misterton, and was also one of the magistrates of the county. He died, after a short illness, Feb. 1, 1830. Mr. Burnaby was highly esteemed and beloved by all who knew him. See (Lond.) Christian Remembrancer, March, 1830, p. 197.

Burnam, Jacob, a Congregational minister, was born in Reading, Mass., Nov. 2, 1748, and graduated from Harvard College in 1770. Having pursued his theological studies under the direction of Rev. Thomas Haven, of Reading, he was ordained pastor of the church in Merrimac, N. H., Oct. 14, 1772. His ministry extended over a period of nearly fifty years, and closed with his death, Dec. 20, 1821. He published a number of Discourses on various topics, especially the Election Sermon for 1819, the Thanksgiving Sermon delivered at the Celebration of the Landing of the Pilgrims, Dec. 20, 1820. See Farmer, Collet, ii, 76-77; Allen, Amer. Hist. (J. C. S.)

Burnell, Robert, an English prelate of the 13th century, son of Lord Robert Burnell, of Acton-Burnell Castle, Shropshire, was by Edward I preferred bishop of Bath and Wells, and treasurer, and then chancellor of England. He was well versed in Welsh affairs, and that he might the more effectually attend to them, caused the court of chancery to be kept at Bristol. He acquired great wealth, wherewith he rebuilt his paternal castle. He also built (for his successors in the bishopric) the Hall at Wells. He died in Scotland, where he was attending to some business of the king, and was buried in his own cathedral, in 1292. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), iii, 57.

Burnet, Alexander, a Scottish prelate, was a parochial minister, of the family of Barns, born in 1614, and became chaplain to the great earl of Traquair. He had a rectory in Kent; but was expelled from it, upon the score of popery, in 1652. About the middle of the century, England and served king Charles II., becoming chaplain to general Rutherford, earl of Teyton. He was made bishop of Aberdeen in 1662, and in 1663 was translated to the see of St. Andrews, where he died, Aug. 22, 1684. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 42.

Burnet, Eleazar, a Presbyterian minister, graduated at Princeton College in 1759. He was licensed by the presbytery of New York in 1801, and died at New Brunswick, N. J., Nov. 22, 1806. Mr. Burnet was distinguished for a quiet, amiable, and devout spirit. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 396; Alexander, Princeton College in the 18th Century.

Burnet, Gilbert (1), an English clergyman, son of bishop Burnet, was educated at Westminster School, and at the University of Oxford, and at Leyden. He became chaplain to George I., and died early in life, about 1720. His literary works embrace an abridgment of his father's History of the Reformation (3719);—The Generation of the Son of God (1720);—and some controversial pieces and contributions to religious periodicals. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Burnet, Gilbert (2), an English clergyman, born about 1698; became vicar of Coggeshall, Essex, then minister of St. James's, Clerkenwell; and died in 1746. He abridged the Boyle Lectures (3 vols. 4to.) to 4 vols. 8vo (Lond. 1747), and published Practical Sermons (ibid. 1747, 2 vols.). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Burnet, John (1), a Scotch Baptist minister, was born at Annan, on the borders of Scotland, Jan. 19, 1778. Early in life he became a member of the Independent Church in Blackburn, in which place he resided; not long after he joined the Baptist Church in Preston. He removed to Lytham in 1819. For several years before this he had preached, more or less, in Rivington, and now became pastor of the Church in his native home. This position he occupied thirty-one years. His death took place Jan. 11, 1850. See (Lond.) Baptist Hymn-book, 1856, p. 41. (J. C. S.)

Burnet, John (2), a young Methodist preacher of Ireland, joined the Conference in 1787, and died the next year. See Atmore, Meth. Memorial, s. v.

Burnet, John (3), an English Congregational minister, was born in Perth, Scotland, April 23, 1789, of Highland ancestry. He received his early education in the city, and was remarkable for physical energy and vigor, great independence of character, and a thirst for knowledge on every subject within his reach. He was converted early in life. In 1815 he left Perth and went to Dublin; thence he proceeded to Cork, where he labored fifteen years in the interest of the Irish Evangelical Society. In 1830 he became pastor of the Church in Camberwell, where he continued till his death, June 10, 1862. Mr. Burnet was a thoroughly devoted minister, a very popular platform speaker, and a powerful advocate of the civil and religious liberties of the people. While in Ireland, he published the substance of some lectures on The Deity of Christ, On The Authorship of Pastors in the Church, with Remarks on the Orders of Deacons. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1803, p. 214.

Burnet, Mathias, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, studied theology with Dr. Witherspoon, and was ordained and installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Jamaica, L.I., by the presbytery of New York, in April, 1773. Here he exercised his ministry during the whole of the Revolutionary War. He left Jamaica in 1782, and was settled over a Congregational Church in Norwalk, Conn., where he remained until his death, June 30, 1806. He published an Election Sermon, 1804, and two Sermons, one in the second and the other in the third volume of the American Magazine (1791). See Plymouth, Conn., and Princeton, N.J., on the 19th Century.

Burnet, Thomas, D.D., an English clergyman, was educated at Oxford, and became rector of West Kingston, Wilts, and prebendary of Sarum. He died in 1750, leaving, among other works, an answer to Tindal's Christianity as Old as the Creation. See Landon, Eccl. Dict. s. v.; Rose, Gen. Bapg. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Burnett, George, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Pennsylvania County, Va., Dec. 8, 1788. He received an early religious training; experienced conversion in his youth; and in 1817 entered the Virginia Conference, wherein he labored faithfully until his death, Sept. 15, 1843. Mr. Burnett led an exemplary life, and died triumphantly. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1839, p. 342.

Burnett, Hiram, a Baptist minister, was born in Georgia, Feb. 19, 1799. His parents moved, when he was ten years of age, to Winchester, O., where he spent a few years. His conversion took place in early manhood, and he was ordained in 1825. For four years he was pastor of the Church in Bethel, O., from which place he removed to Winchester, where, finding a new church, he built up a strong religious society. He performed much missionary work in Scioto, Highland, and Pike counties, preaching the Gospel in schoolhouses, private houses, and out of doors, his labors being greatly blessed. In the fall of 1842 he removed to Mt. Pleasant, Ia., when its population was only about three hundred. In due time a Baptist Church was formed, of which he was the pastor for twelve years. A part of this time he preached at PIGHAD Church, in Des Moines Co. He also organized the Church at Jeffer- son. Subsequently he was aided in the establishment of several other churches. He continued to serve his Master down to the close of his long life, his death occurring at Mt. Pleasant, Jan. 8, 1881. He was everywhere known by the affectionate appellation of "Father Burnett," and was, in all the vicissitude in which he lived, regarded with the greatest love and respect. See Chicago Banner, Feb. 5, 1881. (J. C. S.)

Burney, Charles, Jr., D.D., LL.D., an English clergyman, was born at Lynn, Norfolk, in 1757, and educated at the Charterhouse and at Caius College, Cambridge. He was for some time engaged in an academy at Higgbate, and afterwards became assistant to Dr. Rose at Chiswick. From 1763 to 1800 he was a contributor of classical articles to the Monthly Review; and for two or three years was editor of the London Magazine. He died in 1817. His published works are of interest, chiefly to the literary critic. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Burney, Richard, an English clergyman of the 17th century, and rector of St. Peter's, Canterbury, published a work on The Restoration of King Charles II. in eight sermons (Lond. 1660). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Burnham, Abraham, a Congregational minister, was born at Dunbarton, N.H., April 9, 1829. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1852; and taught in the academies at Haverhill, N. H., Danvers, Mass., Newmarket, and Durham, N. H. In 1857 he graduated from Andover Theological Seminary; was ordained pastor Sept. 9, 1857, at East Haverhill, Mass., remaining until May, 1866; from August, 1866, to April, 1872, was teaching pastor in Hooskett, N.H.; from 1872 to 1878, preached in East Concord; and from 1878 ministered in West Stewartstown until his death, March 18, 1879. See Cong. Year-book, 1880, p. 13.

Burnham, Amos Wood, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Dunbarton, N. H., Aug. 1, 1791. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1814, from the Theological Seminary at Andover in 1818. He was the first principal of the Blanchard Academy at Pembroke, N. H. In 1821 he was ordained pastor of the First Congregational Church in Rindge, the first and the only place in which he preached as pastor, and the only one in which he labored as a minister. He was dissolved at his own urgent request at the close of the forty-sixth year of his ministry. He died at Keene, April 9, 1871. As a scholar he was accurate, and his style, whether in speech or in print, was a model of purity and precision. As a preacher, he was earnest, logical, and simple. His sermons were instructive and systematically arranged. See Cong. Quarterly, 1871, p. 448.

Burnham, Asa, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born Aug. 9, 1789. He was converted at fifteen, and commenced his labors as a preacher in New Hampshire in 1809. After preaching in various places until 1820, he settled in Sebec, Me., where he resided for twenty years, and saw several revivals of religion during his ministry in that place. His next settlement was in Montville, where he remained some four years, at the end of which period he removed to Garland. While residing here with a widowed daughter, he preached half the time in Exeter. His service continued some three years. His death occurred suddenly, took place at Garland, Aug. 9, 1852. It is said of him that, "among the defec- tions, delusions, and secessions around him, he was un- moved as a rock. His sermons were instructive and practical, and few men possessed a more unarnished character." See Free-will Baptist Register, 1854, p. 81, 82. (J. C. S.)

Burnham, Edwin Otway, a Congregational minister, was born at Ghetto, Ky., in 1824. He graduated at Hamilton College, N. Y., in 1828, and was a student at Union Theological Seminary for three years. From 1855 to 1866 he was a teacher at Pennington, N. J. In 1858 he was ordained, after having been stated sup- ply at Columbia, N.J., in 1856, and at Wilton, Mass., in 1857. At Tivoli he also served as stated supply. From 1871 to 1873 he was an invalid, in California. He died at Los Angeles, Calif., Aug. 1, 1873. See Gen. Cat. of Union Theol. Semi., 1876, p. 74.

Burnham, Jesse, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Lee, N. H., in 1777. He was converted in early life, and in 1806 moved into the forests of Maine, and, seeing the spiritual destitution which prevailed, he felt impressed that it was his duty to preach the Gospel to the people. For many years he labored as an evangelist, like John the Baptist, "crying in the wilderness." In 1841 he removed to the West, and continued to perform the kind of work for which he seems to have been raised up by Providence, on the prairies of Illinois and Wisconsin. The first year of his labors there, with the assistance of a brother in the ministry, he organized the first quarterly meeting of his denomination in Wisconsin. After a long life of devotion to his work, he died in Janesville, Dec. 5, 1863. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1864, p. 91. (J. C. S.)

Burnham, Samuel, a Congregational layman and editor, was born at Ringde, N. H., Feb. 21, 1833. His father was James W. Burnham, minister at Ringde from youth to old age. Samuel was educated at New Ipswich and Francisctown, and entered Williams College in 1851. On account of impaired health, he was compelled to retire in his junior year, and it was not until 1868 that he recovered. On leaving college, he went South; returned to Ringde, where he taught for a time, and then assumed charge of the high-school in Amherst. Soon relinquishing this post, he went to Boston in 1857, and was engaged in literary occupations. He died in Cambridge, Mass., June 22, 1873. As a writer he developed some poetic power, but perhaps excelled in critical analysis. He assisted in the preparation for the press of Gen. Wm. H. Sumner's History of East Boston. Among other works of this nature, he prepared the sketches of Gov. Andrew and Charles Sumner for the work entitled Massachusetts in the War, and also various articles for Appleton's Cyclopaedia. His last labor, probably, was the supervision of the publication of Sumner's Speeches, under the direction of Sumner himself. His chief literary work was in connection with various periodicals. At the time of his death he was one of the editors of the Congregational Quarterly, and for a year and a half was connected editorially with the Congregationalist. After leaving this journal, he was engaged on the Watchman and Reflector as its literary editor. He was distinguished for his accurate literary taste, which he exhibited in his published criticisms. See Cong. Quarterly, 1874, p. 2.

Burnier, Louis, a Swiss Protestant theologian, was born at Lutry, Jan. 27, 1795. Having completed his theological course at Lausanne, he was ordained in 1807. He preached at several places in the canton of Vaud. During the first years of his ministry the separation in the national Church took place, and although he regretted this very much, yet he extended the hand of fellowship to his dissenting brethren, and labored with them in the translation of the New Test. and in other missionary works. He founded the Revue Britannique Religieuse et les Discours Publics. Libéralite et le Gouvernement de l'Eglise, in which he wrote in defense of liberty and equality of religious exercises. He also agitated the question of having the ecclesiastical ordinances revised on the basis of allowing the laity to participate in ecclesiastical affairs. In 1839 the Swiss Confession was abolished, and in 1841 Burnier resigned his pastorate. In 1845 he became one of the first founders of the Free Church, and he died Jan. 14, 1873. He wrote, Etudes Elementaires et Progressives de la Parole de Dieu (2d ed. Paris, 1862, 4 vols.); — Instructions et Exhortations Pastorales (Lausanne, 1843); — Eglise Evangélique (1858, 3 vols.); — Histoire Littéraire et Historique de l'Eglise (1864); — His greatest work, however, is La Version du N. T. dite de Lausanne, son Histoire et ses Critiques (1866) — Le Miss de la N. T. (1871). See Chris. Evangelique, 1873, p. 318-329, 563-565; Ruffet, in Lichtenberger, Encyclopédie des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Burning or Whores is a strange and horrible custom among the inhabitants of India, which was only forbidden by the English law since 1827, but has never been entirely rooted out. It is contended that the custom was instituted upon the poisoning of a Brahmin by his wife, wherefore all wives must follow their husbands into the grave. It is not at all probable, however, that so small an affair should be the cause for so atrocious a custom. To sacrifice one's self is, in the religion of India, the highest attainable merit which a member, no longer of profit or advantage to men, can acquire. Now, the widow is such a disadvantageous person; inasmuch as for marriage, maidenhood of the bride is an essential condition; and as a widow is unable to marry again, she is unprofitable as far as the increase of the race goes, and she is, further, a burden to her family. Her sacrifice of herself, however, is not strictly required, provided any one is found willing to marry her. Time has made this custom sacred, so that a woman refusing to follow her husband to the grave is despised, cast out of society, and driven into the woods, where she may repent of her sin, by continually drinking out of the skull of her departed husband; and, further, by eating everything, even the most abominable food, which may be thrown to her. See Suttee.

Burnouf, Eugène, a French Orientalist, was born at Paris, April 8, 1801, and died May 28, 1852. Through his researches he greatly promoted the knowledge of ancient religions in the first half of our century. In his Essai sur le Pali ou Langue Sacrée de la Prêquille au Delà du Gange (1826), he showed, in a most complete and definite manner, that this language, which was regarded as sacred among the Buddhists of Ceylon, Burnham, Siam, etc., was nothing but an offshoot of the Sarskrit. His greatest work, however, was his deciphering of the Zend language (Commentaire sur le Yaqna, 1838). His other great work is his Introduction à L'Histoire du Bouddhisme Indien (1841). See Notice sur les Traites de M. Eugène Burnouf, in Barthélemy Saint-Hilaire's Introduction au Bouddhisme (Paris, 1870); Verner, in Lichtenberger's Encyclopédie des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Burns, David, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Ferrisburgh, Vt., July 1, 1819. He was converted at the age of fifteen, and in 1833 entered the Ohio Conference. In 1836, on the formation of the Michigan Conference, he became a member of it. In 1842 he located for a better literary preparation, and in 1845 resumed his labors. He died July 28, 1877. Mr. Burns possessed a muscular, robust frame, which in his young manhood he had developed at his occupation as blacksmith. He also had usages of the Hebrews. The practice of burning alive, however, by throwing the criminal into a furnace of fire, is well known to have been common among Oriental nations; and a remarkable example is given in the case of the three companions of Daniel. Another instance is referred to in Jer. xxix, 22. The same barbarity appears to have been not uncommon as late as the 17th century. The Romans inflicted the punishment of burning upon the early Christians in various forms. See Nero. Sometimes they were fixed to a stake over a slow fire, until the flesh was consumed from the bones; at other times they were clothed in goats fitted close to the person, besmeared with pitch, sulphur, wax, or some other inflammable substance, and being fastened to a stake, with a cord tied round the chin to keep the head in an erect position, fire was applied, and the martyr expired amid the flames. Another form of this horrid punishment, especially in papal times, was to fix the Christian, in a sitting posture, on an iron chair red-hot from a furnace, and so constructed that its arms enclosed the body of the victim. On other occasions the chair was gradually heated by a slow fire kept burning beneath it. See PERSECUTIONS.
high intellectual endowments. He was naturally cheerful, thoroughly pious, and energetic. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1871, p. 105.

Burns, David E, a Baptist minister, was born near Evansville, Ind., in 1822, and spent the younger part of his life in a region about as wild as any portion of the West. His father died when he was young, and the religious life of the family divvied largely on him. Of course, his early education was greatly neglected. When he was twenty years of age he was converted, and thenceforward his life was completely changed. He began at once to preach, and his early efforts were wonderfully effective. Soon he was set apart to the work of the ministry, and became pastor of the Church in Henderson, Ky., then of the Church in Russellville, from which place he went to Paducah, where he remained three years, the most popular preacher in all that region. In 1850 he became pastor of the Beul Street Church in Memphis, Tenn., the same popularity following him, as also in his next pastorate in Jackson, Miss. For several years he had charge of the Church in Canton, and was also the owner of a valuable plantation near that place. The war swept away all his property. In 1866 he was called to the Coliseum Place Church in New Orleans, from which place he went back to his former church in Memphis, where he died in November, 1870. See Burn, Sketches of Tennessee Ministers, p. 81-40. (J. C. S.)

Burns, Isaiy, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was a native of Scotland. He became the successor of McCheyne at St. Peter's, Dundee, and was, a few years afterwards, translated to the professorship of theology in Glasgow Free College. He died at Hillhead, Glasgow, May 29, 1872. See Prebysterian, June 15, 1872.

Burns, Jabez, a Baptist minister, was born in Oldham, Lancashire, England, Dec. 18, 1805. He was educated at Chester and Oldham; joined the Methodist New Connexion early in life, and in 1830 became minister of the United Christian Church at Perth. In 1833 he went to London and took charge of the General Baptist congregation in New Church Street. He was one of the earliest members of the Evangelical Alliance, taking his place in the first conferences held in Liverpool, London, Edinburgh, and Birmingham. In 1817 he was appointed by the Annual Association of General Baptists one of the deputation to London, and from 1823 to 1840 Conference of the Free-will Baptists in the United States. He died in London, Jan. 28, 1876. Mr. Burns was the author of Marriage Gift Book:—Life of Mrs. Fletcher: —Tracts and Small Treatises on Baptism:—The Pulpit Cyclopædia:—Hints to Church-members:—And A Few Words to Religious Inquirers. At the time of his death, he had been editor of the Temperance Journal and the Preacher's Magazine. See Appleton's Annual Cyclopædia, 1876, p. 630.

Burns, James D, a Scotch Presbyterian minister, was born at Edinburgh in 1823, and educated there. In 1845 he became pastor at Dunblane, but in 1847 went to the Maclreas for his health, and preached there until 1853, when he returned to Edinburgh and settled in Hampstead. He died in 1864, leaving several poems.

Burns, Jeremiah, a Baptist minister, was born in South Carolina, Oct. 19, 1779. He united with the Church in 1802, and was unained not long after. Much of his early life as a preacher was given to itinerant work. After laboring more than twenty-five years in South Carolina and Alabama, he moved in 1851 to Fayette County, Tenn. He interested himself in ministerial education, and took a prominent part in the establishment of an education society which was formed in Brownsville, Tenn., in 1835. He is represented as having been an able preacher, with a sweet, musical voice, and could not excel as an exhorter. He died near Germantown, Shelby Co., Tenn., January, 1861. See Borum, Sketches of Tenn. Ministers, p. 95-98. (J. C. S.)

Burns, Robert, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in South Carolina, April 10, 1794. He spent his youth in Warren County, O.; acquired a substantial education by diligent personal effort; experienced religion in his seventeenth year; immediately began exercising his gifts in singing, praying, and exhorting; received a license to preach in his twenty-first year and soon after was sent to labor on Paint Creek Circuit, where he began his active, useful itinerant life. In 1824 he went into the wilderness of Indiana, and proclaimed salvation in the log cabins to a people hungry for the Gospel. In 1826 he was admitted into the Illinois Conference, and in 1828 he continued for two years, during which time he labored in the work of the ministry. He had been obliged to become a itinerant preacher, and in 1833 he was appointed as a delegate to the Conference, where he continued until 1835, when he went back to his former circuit, and spent the next ten years in the work of the ministry. In 1843 he was appointed as a delegate to the Conference, where he continued until his death, Oct. 2, 1867. As a preacher, Mr. Burns was clear, pointed, and successful; as a Christian, thoroughly consecrated. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1873, p. 53.

Burns, Silas, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Fairmont, Va., Jan. 8, 1828. He joined the Church in 1848, and in 1851 entered the West Virginia Conference, in which he served with zeal and fidelity to the close of his life, Dec. 25, 1854. Mr. Burns was exemplary in his piety alike at home and abroad; in the bosom of his family, church, practical, and merciful, he was zealous. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1855, p. 562.

Burns, William Chalmers, A.M., a missionary to China from the English Presbyterian Church, was born in Scotland in 1815. He was converted at the age of seventeen; studied at the Universities of Aberdeen and Glasgow; and in 1839 entered upon his ministry at Dundee, where he wielded an influence over the masses unparalleled since the days of Whitefield and Wesley. In 1841 and 1842 he served the Church in Edinburgh; afterwards spent two years travelling and preaching in British North America, and on returning offered himself to the Free Church Mission for India, but they not being able to send him he embarked for China under the auspices of the English Presbyterian Church, in 1847. Soon he became entirely familiar with the Chinese language. Mr. Burns labored six years in China before he had a single convert to Christianity. But in 1854 a new era dawned upon his career. Great interest was awakened in the neighborhood of Amoy, and after a time he went from there to Foo-Chow, where he removed to Fuh-Chow; four years later to Fook, and in 1857 to Nieu Chwang, on the confines of Manchuria, where at the close of the year he was seized with fever, which soon terminated his valuable life. Mr. Burns was an unmarried missionary, a man of one object, the salvation of his fellow-men. See Christian Observer, Aug. 1870, p. 601; and Memoir by Rev. Islay Burns (Lond. 1870).

Burns, William Hamilton, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Striritling, Scotland, July 15, 1733. He was educated in the University of Edinburgh. In 1799 he was licensed by the Strainr昌 Presbytery, and stationed at Dui, where he discharged his duties faithfully and zealously, for ten years. In 1757 he was called to the parish of Kilryth. He died May 8, 1839. See Wilson, Preb. Hist. A man, 1830, p. 263.

Burneayt, John, an eminent English minister of the Society of Friends, was born at Crabtreebeck, in the parish of Loweswater, Cumberland, about 1663. He was brought to embrace the views of the Friends in 1653, through the labors of George Fox, and at once began to be persecuted on account of his religious opinions. For fourteen years he lived in comparative seclusion, attending to his secular business and making himself useful in the meetings of Friends. He visited several villages, and, entering on the Sabbath, during divine service, what he called the "sly, sly, sly, sly, sly-house," etc., interrupted the service with his "testimony." He was finally arrested and thrown into the common jail in Carlisle, where he was a prisoner twenty-three weeks. Soon after being released, he made a religious tour through some parts of Scotland, and the next year, 1659, through Ireland, having for his companion Robert Lodge, an English minister. At Londonerry he was driven out of the city, by the mayor's orders. During this trip, which lasted a year, he was several times in prison. Early in 1662 he left his companion, and returned to London, to convalesce some of the elders as to whether it was his duty to go to America. On his way back from London he was arrested at Ripon for refusing to take the oath of allegiance and supremacy; as he could not conscientiously take any oath. His imprisonment continued for fourteen years. After his release, he remained there for most of the time until July, 1664, when he embarked at Galway for Barbadoes, where he remained three or four months, and then took ship for Maryland, landing there in February, 1665. He remained in America for about two years, travelling extensively, and visiting the churches of his denomination in different sections of the country. He spent the summer of that year in Barbadoes, and returned home in the fall. His ministry for the next few years was exercised in various parts of Great Britain. In 1670, in company with William Simpson, he again crossed the ocean, and, having spent six months in Barbadoes, he sailed for America, and arrived in New York Feb. 27, 1671. After spending some time in New England, he visited the middle and southern sections of the country.
During a part of this tour he had for his companion George Fox. He returned to Ireland in 1673. From this date to the close of his life he was engaged in his ministerial work, often amid severe hardships and trials.
His death took place July 11, 1790. A large number of his epistles, etc., may be found in the Life of John Bungay, in Friends' Library, xi, 119, 188, 343-450 875.

Burr, Erastus Hamilton, a Baptist minister, was born at Preble, N. Y., Feb. 9, 1820, and was a graduate from Madison University in 1849. He pursued his theological studies at the Rochester Seminary, where he graduated in 1851. His ordination took place at Massillon, O., Jan. 7, 1852, where he was pastor in 1851 and 1852. His next pastorate was at Durhamville, N. Y., until 1854. He died at Herkimer, March 11, 1857. See Geo. Cat. of Rochester Theol. Sem. p. 7. (J. C. S.)

Burr, Isaac, a Congregational minister, was born in 1698. He graduated at Yale College in 1717; was ordained minister of the Church in Worcester, Mass., Oct. 13, 1725; was dismissed by an ecclesiastical culnovice in November, 1744; then removed to Windsor, Vt.; died in 1761. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer.
Pulpit, i, 169.

Burr, Jonathan Kelsey, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Middletown, Conn., Sept. 21, 1825. He was converted when but thirteen years old, and in 1843 graduated from Wesleyan University at Middleton. After his graduation, he taught for a time in the Adelphian Academy, Mass., and in 1846 became a professor at the Throop University in New York city. In 1847 he preached on Clinton Circuit, N. J., and in 1848 was received on trial in New Jersey Conference, and appointed junior preacher on the Rome and Vantage Circuit. His subsequent appointments were as follows: 1849-50, Milford, Pa.; 1851-52, Orange, N. J.; 1853-54, Union and Burlington; 1855-56, Hoboken; 1857-58, Union Street, Trenton. In 1858 he was transferred to Newark Conference, and stationed at Clinton Street, Newark; 1860-61, Orange (second time);
1862-63, Market Street, Paterson; 1864-66, Hoboken
(second time); 1867-69, Central Church, Newark; 1870-72, Morris Street, 1873, Hoboken (third time); 1874-76, Madison; 1877-78, Mountclair. He was a member of the General Conference of 1872; was for a short time professor of Hebrew in Drew Theological Seminary, though at the same time retaining his pastoral connection with Central Church, Newark; and was a member of the American Committee on the Revised New Test, attending its meetings faithfully, and doing his full share of the work even after sickness had made its inroads upon him. In 1873 he became very ill, but still resisted the steady encroachments of disease, retaining an effective relation to Conference until 1879, when he became supernumerary. For nine years he struggled heroically against the approach of death, not that he was willing to die, but because he wished to live to continue his life-work for the Church. So persistent was he in his labor, that even after his health failed he supervised the passage through the press of his Commentary on the Book of Job. He died in Trenton, April 24, 1882. He was an excellent preacher, an admirable pastor, and a perfect gentleman. His reading was extensive and accurate, and his Christian character lovely. See (N. Y.) Christian Advocate, June 1, 1882; Alumni Record of Wesl. Univ. s. a., 1845.

Burrell, John Igen, a Lutheran minister, was born in Centre County, Pa. (near Bellefonte), Feb. 5, 1829. He graduated at the literary department of the Vandalia College in 1849, and graduated in 1855. For two years he was principal of an academy in Aaronsburg, and then was appointed superintendent of schools for Centre County until 1860. For a time he taught in Bellefonte. Having studied law, he was admitted to the bar in 1858, and formed a partnership with Robert G. Durham. Turning to the ministry, he studied theology under Rev. D. Moser, of Pine Grove Mills, and was licensed to preach in 1860, and ordained in 1869. The following he was pastor of the Stone Church, Northampton County. After 1861 this church was known as St. Paul's.

Mr. Burrell founded two churches—one at Martin's Creek, the other at Ackermanville. Though still pastor of St. Paul's, he organized, in 1869, a select classical school until his death. In 1873, at the age of sixty-five, he became pastor of St. Matthew's English Lutheran Church, Brooklyn, N. Y.

From 1874 to 1877 he was a trustee of Pennsylvania College.

He died Jan. 21, 1877.

Burrell, Samuel, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Edinburgh, Middlesex, Aug. 7, 1820. He was converted at the age of seventeen; spent three years at the Richmond and Philosophical Institution; was sent in 1846 to Jamaica; labored there for fourteen years; returned to England and proved himself, in several home circuits, a faithful minister. He died at Thetford, May 13, 1867. Mr. Burrell was of a kind and gentle spirit. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1867, p. 25.

Burrill*, among the negroes of New Guinea, is the name given to God, the Creator.

Burritt, Elihu (often styled "The Learned Blacksmith"), a distinguished philologist and philanthropist, was born at New Britain, Conn., Dec. 8, 1811. His father was a shoemaker, and had in all ten children, of whom Elihu was the youngest. He was sent to the public school, and, although apprenticed to a blacksmith, had already acquired a taste for reading in his brother's school. After ending his apprenticeship, he studied carpentry and something of divine teaching, and mathematics; but at the end of six months returned to anvil and forge, learning the Greek grammar during the intervals of labor. He obtained some knowledge of Hebrew; and, to secure at once blacksmith's work and books, he removed to Worcester, Mass., xvi. He wrote a defense and interpretation of which he made from the German happening to fall under the eye of governor Everett, secured him public notice; and, though still working at his forge, he edited a monthly magazine (The Literary Geminus) for one year (1839). In 1840 he began to accept engagements as a lecturer. In the Eclectic Review he printed translations from the Italian, Dutch, Spanish, and Hebrew. While he went on adding to his stock of languages. Always interested in philanthropic and social reforms and progress, and particularly in the propagation of the principles of peace, Mr. Burritt began in 1844, at Worcester, the publication of a newspaper called The Christian Citizen. From the office of this journal he also issued a series of tracts, entitled Oliver Leavies. He became very earnest in his devotion to the cause of peace, and devised a mutual system of addresses in its behalf between England and America. He also circulated among travelers a periodical tract, entitled The Bond of Brotherhood. In 1846 he was both proprietor and editor of The Peace Advocate. In the same year he went to England, where he was hospitably received by men of opinions similar to his own. He lectured, wrote for Douglas Jerrold's Weekly Newspaper, printed and circulated tracts, and in 1802 began the distribution of tracts. He always maintained his hold on Englishmen from the癞 through different parts of France. In all the European Peace Congresses he took a prominent part. For several years he occupied the position of United States Consul at Birmingham. After a residence abroad of nearly twenty-five years, he returned to the United States, and removed to New York, where he devoted himself to the different matters to which he had devoted his life, and continued to write and lecture publicly upon them. He resided at New Britain until his death, March 6, 1873. Of his numerous writings and orations, many of them fugitively printed, we mention only, as published in book form, Sparks from the Anvil (1848) — Miscellaneous Writings (1850) — Oliver Leavies (1853) — Thoughts and Things at Home and Abroad (1864) — A Walk from London to Lochs Gare (1866) — Lectures on Speeches (1869). His is another added to the names of those men of nature, energy, and irrepressible aspirations who have pursued knowledge and attained it under early difficulties. See N. Y. Tribune, March 7, 1869; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v., 1873; Dyer, Biog. Dict.

Burroughs, Andrew R., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Stamford, N. Y., June 19, 1839, of pious parents, who gave him a careful religious training. He experienced conversion in 1857, and in 1863 joined the New York Conference. After serving seven different stations with acceptability he died, Nov. 28, 1877. Mr. Burroughs was a devoted Christian. His preaching ability was superior to his pen, and his daily life a living sermon to his people. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1878, p. 44.

Burroughs, Charles, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the diocese of New Hampshire, was born in Boston, Dec. 27, 1787. He was ordained priest in 1812, and was rector in Portsmouth, N. H., until about 1825, when he resigned there upon the appointment of another charge, until 1826, when he removed to Massachusetts, but never resumed regular duty. He died March 5, 1868. He wrote Memoirs H. B. Morse (1829) — Poetry of Religion, etc. (1851). See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1869, p. 109; Drake, Dict. of Amer. Biog., s. v.

Burroughs, Eden, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Stratford, Conn., Jan. 19, 1738. He graduated at Yale College in 1757; was ordained at Killingly in 1760, where he was pastor for twelve years. From 1772 to 1800 he was in charge at East Hanover, N. H.; the following year he was pastor of the Dartmouth College Church; and at Hartford, Vt., from 1810 to the time of his death, May 22, 1813. See Sparrow, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, 15, 30; Cong. Quarterly, 1840, p. 193.

Burroughs, Joseph, an English Baptist minister, was born in London, Jan. 1, 1685. His father was a respectable weaver in Spitalfields, who by his prudence and industry acquired considerable property, and was a layman of prominence in his denomination. Being in possession of ample means, he gave his son a liberal education, and enabled him to travel to Leyden. In May, 1713, he was invited to become assistant minister in the Baptist Church in Paul's Alley, London; and on the death of his colleague, Rev. Richard Allen, was chosen his successor, being ordained May 1, 1717. Before the general prevalence of open-communion sentiments, now so largely held in England, Mr. Burroughs took the ground that "as no particular terms of Church communion are prescribed in the New Test., every Church must be at liberty to fix those terms which it may judge conducive to the main end and design of the Gospel, provided no attempt be made to impose them upon others." When he had served his Church forty years, he expressed a wish to be freed from ministerial and pastoral care; but his congregation preferred to secure for him a colleague, and his relation continued until his death, which occurred Nov. 23, 1741. Mr. Burroughs gave to the Christian world many productions of his pen, in address, and defense of the English Free Church, through different parts of Europe. Among these were, Thanksgiving for Victory (1718) — Against Popery (1735) — Two Discourses on private institutions — Concerning Baptism, etc. (1742) — a volume of Sermons, fourteen in number, on various subjects: — Duty Thoughts, a poem in blank verse, written by way of animating the subject of duties, and suited for use in the children's rooms, by Young's Night Thoughts. Mr. Burroughs belonged to that division of the English Baptists known as Geo.
eral Baptists," because they hold to general in distinction from particular redemption. See Wilson, History of Dissenting Churches, iii, 249, 250. (J.C.S.)

Burroughs, William, a Congregational minister, was born in Boston, Mass., Feb. 1, 1823. After graduating he was for one year a member of the Yale Law School. He then pursued a course of theological study in the seminary of this college, and received license to preach in 1846 for one year, and in 1847 for four years. His efforts were then directed to prepare himself to discharge the duties of a clergyman, and he resumed the study of law in Philadelphia. In 1853 he was admitted to the bar; in 1855 he travelled extensively in Europe. He died in Germantown, Pa., March 24, 1861. In his last will he bequeathed to Yale College, for the benefit of the Theological Institution, the sum of $10,000, subject for a few years to a small annuity. See Obituary Record of Yale College, 1861.

Burroughs, William Mills, a Methodist Episcopalian, was born in Mercer County, N. J., June 21, 1814. He was converted at Pennington, in his nineteenth year; began preaching in 1837; and in 1839 entered the New Jersey Conference. He held the superintendency of, and was a member of the Newark Conference, and in it labored to the close of his life, April 17, 1864. Mr. Burroughs was a true friend, a devoted pastor, and a solid, rather than brilliant, preacher. Without bigotry he was firm, a lover of peace, and a promotor of harmony. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1861.

Burrow, Rubeus, D.D., a Cumberland Presbyterian minister, was born in Guilford County, N. C., in 1798. In 1806 his father removed to Tennessee. The Eik Presbytery received him as a candidate for the ministry at Mars Hill, Giles Co., in 1821. The following year he was sent as a missionary to Missouri, in which state, in 1833, he was licensed. That same year he formed a circuit along White River, Ark., where he remained for some time. Subsequently he went to St. Michael, Mo. Returning to Tennessee he labored for twelve months on a circuit which extended through Giles, Maury, Bedford, and Lincoln counties. He was ordained at Shiloh, Tenn., April 24, 1824. In 1826 he was appointed by the synod as an agent to the Carolinas for the collection of funds to establish a college. In 1827 he returned home and surrendered his agency. The following year he resided near Pulaski, Giles Co. In 1831 he was sent as a missionary, in company with Robert Donnell, through East Tennessee, North Carolina, and Pennsylvania; in 1834 he spent about five months preaching in Missouri. He was again in North Carolina in 1847; after that he labored mostly in Tennessee and Mississippi until 1852, when he was appointed professor of Systematic Theology in Bethel College, at McMinnville, Tenn., taking charge of the congregation in that place, and remaining there until 1864. He died in Shelby County, Tenn., May 13, 1868. His eldest son, Rev. Aaron Burrow, died during the civil war. In 1845 Dr. Burrow published a small volume on baptism. He was an extensive contributor to the Theological Medium; wrote largely on doctrinal subjects, especially on sanctification. So many times he was a member of the General Assembly—in 1836, 1840, and 1850. He was regarded as one of the strongest men in the pulpit that his Church ever produced. On the vexed question of baptism he had several public discussions with Baptist ministers in Tennessee and Mississippi. See Beard, Biographical Sketch, 2d series, p. 240. 1856 he became a member of the New Jersey Conference.

Burrowes, Robert, D.D., an Irish clergyman, and dean of Cork, of the early part of this century, published a Sermon (1795)—Sermons on the First Lessons of the Sixth Sunday, etc. (1817):—Twelve Discourses on the Liturgy of the Church of England (1834). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors.

Burrows, George, an Irish Wesleyan minister, was born in Sligo. He was early converted; entered the ministry in 1802; retired after forty-one years of service; and died at Black Rock, near Dublin, Oct. 22, 1863, in his seventy-sixth year. He was a man of amiable disposition and of consistent piety. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1864, p. 27.

Burtons, George W., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South. After several years' service in the Kentucky Conference, he removed to Texas, where, in 1855, he was ordained elder in the Texas Conference. He served three years in the Delaware Conference, and became pastor in the Plymouth, South Carolina, Conference, which relation he sustained to the time of his decease, Aug. 4, 1861. He was a preacher of more than ordinary ability, a man of great affliction, and large faith. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M.E. Church South, 1861, p. 349.

Burtons, James F., a Methodist Episcopal minister, born Feb. 10, 1826, was converted in 1843: professed conversion in 1845; spent one year at the Concord Biblical Institute; and in 1848 entered the Troy Conference. In 1851 he became a superannuate, which relation he sustained to the time of his death, April 2, 1852. Mr. Burrows was an esteemed Christian gentleman. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1852, p. 61.

Burtons, Joseph, an English Baptist minister, was born April 4, 1816, in Netherfield, Nottinghamshire. He joined an Independent Church in his youth, and was encouraged by his brethren to preach. Subsequently he united with the General Baptist Church in his native village, and for some years was its pastor. In 1831 he removed to Aberton, Derbyshire, in which, and the neighboring town of Ripley, he labored from 1831 to 1847. In 1849 he became pastor in Chester, Cheshire. In 1850 he removed to a village in Norfolk County, and continued his ministry until obliged to relinquish its duties on account of ill-health. He died at Wirksworth, April 20, 1857. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1856, p. 48. (J.C.S.)

Burtons, Martin, an English Wesleyan minister, was born Jan. 8, 1795, in Holmlake, Cheshire, Feb. 24, 1818. He was converted when quite young; began to preach at eighteen; was accepted by the conference in 1838, and was twice appointed to Oldham. He died at his father's house in Rotherham, April 21, 1840. He was a pious and promising young man. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1840.

Burrows, Roswell, a Baptist minister, son of the former, was born at Fort Hill, in Grotton, Conn., Sept. 2, 1768. He was ordained associate pastor with his father in August, 1806. Soon after he went on a missionary tour, which gave an impulse to the cause of missions in the churches. He served as pastor at Groton, Stonington, and Preston, and at Greenport, L. I. His sermons were Biblical and full of thought. He died May 28, 1837. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop., p. 109.

Burwoods, Silas, a Baptist minister, was born at Fort Hill, in Grotton, Conn., in 1741. He was ordained in 1763 pastor of a Church in Grotton, and encountered much opposition from numerous sects in the vicinity. During the Revolution he served as a pastor in Connecticut, and during the Revolution he served as an officer of the New Jersey Conference, 1770, 1772, and 1776. He was associated with the adoption of constitutions in Connecticut securing equal religious privileges to all, for which he earnestly labored. His ministry was favored with several remarkable revivals. He died in 1818. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpite, vi, 106; Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop., p. 168.

Burwoods, Thomas, an English Wesleyan minister, was born in Manchester, Aug. 29, 1807. He was converted in early life; entered the ministry in 1831; labored for fourteen years in Jamaica, and for three years' service on Kingston Circuit; he was ordered to a new station of labors, and arrived at St. John's, Antigua, Aug. 17, 1874. He died a minister at Trinitatis.
man, and labored earnestly for the salvation of souls. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1875, p. 10.

Burrows, Walter, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Elizabeth, N. J., April 19, 1790. He was led to Christ in early manhood, through the labors of a pious sister; and in 1816 entered the Philadelphia Conference. He labored faithfully and zealously until 1835, when he was granted a supernumerary relation, which he held during life, though he continued to labor as health permitted in connection with the New Jersey and Newark Conferences. He died at Baskingridge, March 4, 1869. As a Christian, Mr. Burrows was joyful in his experience. As a minister, he was judicious, practical, and highly respected. See Minutes of the Conference, 1869, p. 193.

Burrows, William, an English Methodist preacher, was born at Nottingham, Jan. 2, 1799. While a boy, he was convinced of sin by reading John Nelson's Journal, and soon afterwards he found peace through believing. He was a local preacher in his youth, and entered the itinerant ministry of the New Connection in 1820. He was a burning and a shining light in the Church, and particularly in the frontier and western circuits. He labored till his strength was utterly exhausted. For three years his sufferings were great, but he died in triumph at Sheffield, Dec. 4, 1852. See Minutes of the Conference.

Burruss, Elijah Willis, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Madison County, Ky., April 17, 1814, and was brought up with his parents in the War of the Rebellion. In 1828; was admitted to Church membership in 1838; experienced conversion two years later; received license to exhort and to preach in 1841; and in 1845 entered the Indiana Conference. He labored with unflagging zeal and fidelity until three months previous to his death, which occurred July 6, 1865. Mr. Burruss was remarkable for his faithfulness and cheerfulness. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1860, p. 193.

Burge, in Kalmuck mythology, is a deity said to possess the virtue of preserving beauty, and also of healing diseases. Usually its image is made of stone, and enclosed in a small case, which is hung about the neck. When a Kalmuck contracts a disease, he rubs some of this stone off, and mixes the dust with his food, which he then eats. The Lamas have sole right to sell these idols. They affirm that the stone came from the mountain on which Dalai Lama lives.

Burscher, Johann Friedrich, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Camenz, Feb. 16, 1732. He studied at Leipzig, where he was also appointed professor of philosophy in 1761. In 1768 he was made professor of theology, and in 1771 senior of the theological faculty. He died Sept. 10, 1805. He published, Introductio in Exegetica Librum (Lips. 1755): Versuch einer kurzen Erklärung des Propheten Jeremia (ibid. 1757); Versuch einer Erklärung der Propheten Hosea und Joel (ibid. 1758; 2d ed. 1763); Des de Gaze Develletta Futuri, Jbr. 4 (ibid. 1776); Christus Marius et Pentateuchus Vindict (ibid. cod.); Ecclesia Doctrina de Deo Triuno, etc. (ibid. 1780). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Liz. i, 594, 597; Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, i, 211 sq. (B. P.)

Burscough, William, D.D., an Irish priest, was consecrated bishop of Limerick in 1726, and died in 1753. He published a number of single sermons. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Journals, v. x.

Burse was ancienly a purse to hold that which was valuable; retained even now among the official insignia of the lord high chancellor of England. The Burse of a convent was its treasurer.

In ecclesiastical phraseology, a burse is the receptacle for the corporal and chalice-cover. It is a square and flat box, and is either of rich silk stuff, or made of cloth of gold, embroidered and lined with jewels, open on one side only, and placed over the chalice veil when the sacred vessels are carried to the altar by the celebrant.

Burt, David, a Congregational minister, was born at Monson, Mass., Aug. 2, 1822. After preliminary study in Wilbraham Academy, he entered Wesleyan University; but graduated at Oberlin College in 1848, and at Amherst Theological Seminary in 1851. On Nov. 8 of the same year he was ordained pastor of the Second Church, New Haven, N. H., which position he retained until February, 1855. From January, 1856, to February, 1858, he was pastor in Rutland, Mass.; and from May, 1858, to August, 1866, he was acting-pastor in Winona, Minn. The two years following he was employed as superintendent of schools in Texas. The Freedmen's Aid, in the next year he was acting-pastor in Minneapolis; and from January to March, 1870, in New Braintree, Mass. After this, about five years, he was superintendent of schools in Winona County, Minn.; and state superintendent of public instruction afterwards, residing at Northfield. He died at St. Paul, Minn., Sept. 25, 1881. See Cong. Year-book, 1882, p. 24.

Burt, Edmund, a Congregational minister, was born at Longmeadow, Mass., Nov. 11, 1808. He completed the course in the theological seminary at Gilman, N. H., in 1829, and two years after was ordained pastor of the churches of Franconia and Bethlehem. He subsequently labored at Deerin; Newfield, Boothbay, Gilead, Me.; and Stewartrtown, Vt. His work was mostly missionary. He died at Gorham, July 14, 1864. Mr. Burt was a careful student of the Bible, and a faithful, instructive, and logical preacher. See Cong. Quarterly, 1864, p. 382.

Burt, Federal, a Congregational minister, was born in Southampton, Mass., in 1789. He graduated at Williams College in 1812; was ordained pastor in Durham, N. H., June 18, 1817; and died Feb. 29, 1829. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit., ii, 468.

Burt, Nathaniel C., D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Fairton, N. J., April 23, 1825. He was a graduate of the College of New Jersey in 1846, and of Princeton Seminary in 1860. His ministerial career began at Springfield, O. (1850-55). From 1855 to 1863 he was called to the pastorate of First Street Presbyterian Church, Baltimore, Md.; and in 1860 was called to the Seventh Presbyterian Church, Cincinnati, O. During his pastorate in the latter Church he traveled for some time in Europe and the East, seeking the restoration of his health. He was elected president of Oberlin College at Cincinnati, in 1865, and succeeded in 1866 to return resolved to Europe. In 1870 he crossed the ocean, in order to superintend the education of young ladies from this country. He died at Rome, Italy, March 4, 1874. He was a man of fine scholarship and cultivated taste; being a correspondent of several American journals, especially the Presbyterian and the New York Evangelist. He published several volumes, entitled, Redemption's Dawn: Hours Among the Gospels:—The Far East:—The Land and Its Story. See Presbyterian, April 4, 1874.

Burt, William, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Torpoint, Cornwall, April 17, 1792. He was converted at nineteen; received by the British Conference in 1816, and sent to British North America: preached at Fredericton, N. B., from 1817 to 1819; Horton, N. S., from 1819 to 1822; Newport, 1816 and 1822; Charlotte-town, P. E. I., from 1823 to 1826; Odeley Town, Canada, from 1825 to 1826; returning to England in that year. For thirty years' efficient service in that field, his native land, he retired to Plymouth, where he died, Sept. 15, 1870. Mr. Burt had a singularly simple, practical mind. From the most vigorous toil he never shrank. His wonderful punctuality, method, sense of duty, quiet resolve to do his best in everything, gave him the mark of a man of great character, and left an exact and painstaking study in fund, of theology, had an immense fund of quiet humor, his face beamed with faith and trust and love to God and man, and hundreds were converted under his ministry. See Minutes of the Baptist Church, 1871, p. 12; Pope, in West. Meth. Mag. 1872, p. 198.

Burris, Arthur D.D., a Presbyterian and (Dutch) Reformed minister, was born in the city of New York, Oct. 25, 1807. He graduated at Union College in 1827; studied theology at Princeton and Auburn Seminaries, graduating from the latter in 1833. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Geneva in 1833, and ordained in 1835. He was settled at Fort Plain Reformed Church in 1835, and subsequently at Little Falls Presbytery Church, Binghamton, one year; Oxford, seven years; Vernon (N. J.), one year; and Buffalo from 1847 to 1857. He taught in Buffalo, and was district secretary of the American and Foreign Christian Union from 1856 to 1864. In 1864 he accepted the professorship of Greek in Miami University, where he remained until his death, March 23, 1867. Dr. Burris was a thorough classical scholar, and, before entering upon his theological studies, had studied law with chancellor Kent. His learning was varied and profound, and in his professional chair, at a late period of life, he found his true place. His death was greatly lamented. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church, s. v.; Appleton’s Annual Cyclop. 1867, p. 558. (W. J. K. T.)

Burton, Henry, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in 1787. In 1830 he entered the New York Conference, but in 1837 impaired health, induced by excessive labor, caused him to locate. He resumed his place, however, and continued zealously to serve, when he became superannuated, which relation he held to his death, at Middletown, Conn., Sept. 25, 1878. Mr. Burton possessed a clear mind, a courageous heart, and a sound faith. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1873, p. 32.

Burton James, D.D., an English divine, was born in 1745, and educated at St. Peter’s College, Oxford, of which he became a fellow. He was presented to the rectory of Over-Warton, Oxfordshire, with the annexed perpetual curacy of Nether Warton, in 1771; to the vicarage of Little Berkhamstead, Herts, in 1789; to the incumbency of the first portion of Waddesdon, Bucks, in the same year, and was appointed canon of Christchurch, Oxford, in 1792. He was a chaplain in the army, and was diocesan of Oxfordshire, for many years a magistrate of Oxfordshire. He died June 30, 1825. See (Lond.) Annual Register, 1825, p. 264.

Burton, James Daniel, an English Wesleyan minister, was born in Manchester, July 25, 1784, and commenced his itinerancy in Wakefield in 1803. He labored efficiently and zealously in his health failure. He died at Liverpool after a tedious illness, which he bore with fortitude and resignation, March 29, 1817. He was a minister of much promise. See West. Meth. Mag. 1817, p. 881.

Burton, John (1), an English minister of the Society of Friends, was born at Dent, Yorkshire, in 1682. Early in life he became a Christian, and in due time gave evidence that he was called of God to the work of a minister. He was called in 1705 to the ministry, and was licensed to preach in 1706. He was appointed to the ministry of the church at Truston in 1709; and was ordained as a preacher of his gospel. His labors extended over a wide field, embracing not only many sections of his native land, but reaching also to the American colonies. After a long life of unrewarded service, he died March 23, 1769. See Piety Promoted, ii, 453, 456. (J. G. S.)

Burton, John (2), a Baptist minister, was born in England in 1760. He emigrated to Halifax, N. S., in 1792; and subsequently came to the United States, where he connected himself with a Baptist Church. Some time after this he returned to Halifax, and, being now an ordained minister, he administered the first baptism by immersion ever witnessed in that city. In 1795 he assisted in the organization of a church, and was its pastor till his death, Feb. 6, 1848. "He was a Christian gentleman, useful in the community in which he labored, and enjoying the love and respect of those around him." See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclopedia. p. 170. (J. G. S.)

Burton, John Hill, historiographer royal for Scotland, was born April 22, 1809, at Aberdeen, where he was educated at the grammar-school, and afterwards at Marischal College. His father dying when he was a boy, he had his own way to make. He chose the legal profession, and was in 1831 admitted to the Scottish bar. He never practised law, but was an extensive writer, and of value in his day; and he acquired a knowledge of the history of Scotch law which was useful when he afterwards wrote his History. Unable to support himself by his profession, he succeeded in doing so by the scarcely less arduous profession of letters. He began to write as early as 1833 for the Westminster, and afterwards for the Edinburgh and North British Reviews. In 1846 he published The Life and Correspondence of David Hume, and in 1847, Lives of Simon Lord Loth, and Duncan Forbes of Culloden. His main work, however, was his History of Scotland (1853, 2 vols.), covering the period from the Revolution of 1688 to the extinction of the last Jacobite rebellion in 1748, and which he supplemented in 1867 to 1870 by seven volumes on the history of Scotland from Agricola’s invasion to the Revolution of 1688. A second edition of the whole work, in eight volumes, was issued in 1873. "This," says a writer in the Academy, is beyond doubt the best, indeed, the only, complete history of that country; for no other historian has embraced the whole of the political existence of the Scottish nation down to the time when it finally merged in that of Great Britain." His last publication was, History of the Reign of Queen Anne (1880). Mr. Burton died Aug. 10, 1881, at Burton House, near Edinburgh. (B. P.)

Burton, J. E., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Nicholas County, Ky., in 1812. He removed to Monroe County, Ind., in 1821; joined the Church in his thirteenth year; was licensed to preach in his eighteenth year; removed to Missouri in 1850; and in 1851 was admitted into the Missouri Conference, where he labored faithfully, with one year’s exception as superannuate, to the time of his death, in 1866. Mr. Burton was a practical preacher of respectable talents, greatly beloved by those who knew him. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1866, p. 264.

Burton, Nicholas, a Spanish martyr, was a merchant dwelling in the parish of Little St. Bartolomew. He was put to death in 1602 for refusing to deny his religion, and lay there in iron fourteen days. All this time he instructed the poor prisoners in the Scriptures. When the officers found out his course, they carried him in irons to Seville, into a still more dismal prison called Triana, where the fathers and friars proceeded against him secretly, according to their custom. On Dec. 20, 1558, he was taken to a place called the Auto, where his tongue was forced out of his mouth with a cloven stick fastened upon it, so he could not utter his faith to the people. As soon as the sentence was given, he was tied to a stake and burned. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, vol. viii.

Burton, Thomas Blount, an English Congregational minister, was born at Nottingham, March, 1767. He was left an orphan at the age of nine, and received his early education at Roggin, under the care of an aunt. While at school he was very reckless, but afterwards became a Christian, and joined the Methodist New Connexion. In 1818 Mr. Burton joined the Independents at Castle Gate, where he preached till his death, Dec. 22, 1860. His preaching was marked by great simplicity and directness, and in character he was as much known and esteemed for his transparent uprightness as for his unfeigned humility. See (Lond.) Comp. Year-book, 1862, p. 229.

Burton, William (1), an English clergyman of the latter part of the 16th century, was minister of the cathedral church in Norwich. He published Catechismae (1591):—Seven Sermons (1592); and other sermons, See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Burton, William (2), a Baptist minister, was born at Margaree, Cape Breton. He united with the Church in 1826, and was ordained July 20, 1828. From 1830 to 1833 he was the colleague of Rev. Harris Hardinge, pastor of the Church in Yarmouth, and subsequently was pastor of churches in St. John, N. B., and Hannsport, N. S., where he died in 1867. See Cathbhs. Baptists Encyclop. p. 170. (J. C. S.)

Burton, William H., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the Diocese of Mississippi, was rector of the Church at New Iberia, La., in 1853; the following year he was rector in Franklin; in 1857, missionary at Bayou Sara, and remained in this work until the close of 1859. Subsequently, he acted as a general missionary in the neighborhood, having his residence at Centerville; and in 1865 he became officiating minister at Corinth, Miss. The following year he was rector of St. Jude's Church, in that place; and in 1867 rector of the Church of the Epiphany, near Port Gibson, Claiborne Co., Miss. He died Sept. 8, 1870. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1871, p. 118.

Burton, William Miller, A. M., a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born at Winsted, Conn., in 1808. At an early age he evinced an extraordinary desire for knowledge. He entered the academy at Erie, Pa., whither his father had removed in 1812. At sixteen he was a teacher, in which profession he continued for several years. Graduating at the Wesleyan University, Middletown, Conn., in 1834, he at once became a tutor, afterwards professor, in Allegheny College, Meadville, Pa.—a position which he occupied for several years. He was ordained deacon in 1840, and priest in 1841; and was settled one year as minister at Huntingburg, Ind., a frontier and half years as rector of St. John's Church at Ohio City (now Indianapolis), and seven years as rector of St. Peter's, Tecumseh, and St. John's, Clinton—a double parish in Michigan. He died at Tecumseh, Nov. 20, 1854. His preaching was distinc- guished for purity and elegance of diction. See Amer. Qur. Church Rev. 1855, p. 159; West. Univ. Alumni Record, 1882, p. 5.

Burtons were soothsayers of the ancient Frus- sians. They told fortunes from lots drawn.

Burt, John, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Kilmarrock, Ayrshire, Scotland, May 23, 1728. When a youth he was decoyed into a boat by a press-gang, and made to serve five years in the British navy. He was afterwards liberated through the interference of a British officer, when he returned to Scotland and devot- ed himself to literary studies. He taught school sixteen months in Kilmarrock, and went to Glasgow to attend lectures in the university. In 1817 he came to America, and joined the Sixth Street Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia. Determined to elevate himself to the ministry, he entered Princeton Theological Seminary in 1822; and after remaining about a year, he was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, and was ordained and installed pastor of the Pres- byterian Church in Salem, N. J., in 1824. He remained pastor of this Church six years, when he became editor of the Presbyterian, Philadelphia. In 1833 he took charge of The Standard, a religious paper published in Cincinnati, O., which he continued to edit till 1842. He was a member of the Fifth Presbyterian Church of that city. He was a professor of Washington College, but declined to accept, and in 1842 took charge of the Church at Blackwood- town, N. J., which he retained until 1859. He was for many years the translator of the French contributions to the Presbyterian. He died at Salem, March 24, 1866. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Alumni, 1867, p. 124; Gen. Cat. of Princeton Sem. 1881, p. 38.

Burward, Anthony, an English martyr, was one of five who were burned at Canterbury in September, 1555, for the true testimony of Christ and his Gospel. See Fox, Acta et Monumenta, vii, 389.

Burwash, Henry, an Englishman, a relative of the 18th century, was named from Burwash, Sussex. "He was of noble alliance, but, when this is said, all is said to his commendation, being otherwise neither good for Church nor state, sovereign nor subjects: covetous, ambitious, rebellious, injurious." He was recommended by his kinsman, Bartholomew de Badilisser, baron of Leoval, in Kent, to Edward II, who preferred him bishop of Lin- coln. It was not long before he fell under the kirk's displeasure, his temporalities were seized, though after- wards, on his submission, restored. He retained his old grudge, and assisted the queen in the deposition of her husband. He was twice lord-treasurer, once chancellor, and once sent ambassador for five years of Bava- ria. He died in 1340. The story goes that, after his death he was condemned as viridia viridarius (a green forester), because in his lifetime he had enclosed other men's grounds into his park. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nattali), iii, 248.

Burrwell, W. F., a Baptist minister, was born in Pennsylvania, in 1841. He was baptized at the age of fifteen, and united with the Monongaehala Church, Pennsylvania. He was licensed to preach June 1, 1866. After preaching temporarily in several churches, he was ordained Aug. 5, 1867, as pastor of the Greensburgh and Beulah churches. His connection with these continued for some years, and then he devoted himself to the Greens- borough Church, Where he has since resided. After his resignation, he was pastor or supply of the Gosho, Zoar, Forks of Cheat, and Monongaehala Union church- es—the latter as pastor, for four years. For one year he served as financial agent for Monongaehala College. He died in Dunkard township, Greene Co., Pa., March 12, 1881. See Baptist, March 24, 1881. (J. C. S.)

Bury, Richard, a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the Diocese of Ohio, resided, in 1855, in Frem- ton, Ohio. Thence, the next year, he removed to Grove Isle, where he remained until 1864, and from thence to Cleve- land, O., as rector of St. James's Church, remaining there until he died, July 21, 1875, aged eighty-three years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1874, p. 149.

Bus, Balthaas de, a French ascetic theologian of the Jesuits, nephew of César de Bus, was born in 1587, and died Dec. 21, 1657. He wrote, Præparation à la Mort (Lyons, 1648; Grenoble, 1690):—Motifs de Dévotion envers la Sainte-Vierge (Lyons, 1649):—Occupation Intérieure pour les deux Sœurs de la Passion (1680):—Motifs de Contrition (1665):—Exercice de la Foi (Chambery, 1669). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bus, César de, a French monk, was born at Cava- illon, Feb. 3, 1544, and died at Avignon, April 15, 1607. After having lived a life of dissipation, he joined the clergy and was made canon of Caivalion. He founded, in 1592, the Congregation of the Priests of the Christian Doctrine, and of a similar one of the Ursulines, called "Filles de la Cloture" by his brother, who, like the former, had to teach. César de Bus is the author of Instructions Uniformes (Paris, 1665). See Beau- vais, Histoire de la Vie de César de Bus (Paris, 1645); Lichtenberger, Encyclopédie des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. F.)

Bus (or Bos, or Van der Bosch), Cornelius, a Dutch painter, was born at Bois-le-Duc about 1610, and visited Italy while young. The following is a list of some of his works: The Last Judgment; Lot and his Daughters; David and Uriah; Jesus Preaching to the Jews; Death Seizing a Monk; The Entombment of Christ, See Spoor, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Busca, Antonio, a Milanese painter, was born in 1620. He studied under Procaccini, and painted, in competition with that master, a picture of the Virgin, Mary Magdalene, and St. John, in the church of Santi Mariani. He died in 1578, and was buried in the church of Santa Marta, at Velletri, in 1578.

Busca, Ignazio, an Italian painter, was born at Milan in 1713. He was nuncio in the Netherlands before the insurrection of these provinces against Joseph II.
On his return to Italy he was appointed governor of Rome; became cardinal in 1789; and obtained the confidence of the emperor. He died in 1803.

Busch (Lat. Buscium), Hans (or Arnold), a German theologian, was born in 1539 (or 1400) at Zvole, in Overyssel. He studied theology at the monastery of Windsedorf, and was appointed canon in 1419 (or 1420).
According to some authorities, he also became prior of Sulten, in the diocese of Hildesheim, in Saxony. He gained a great renown through his indefatigable zeal, firmness, and tact, with which he reformed the monas-terious discipline, and taught the doctrine of the resistance of the monks and nuns. He died in 1477 or 1479. He is the author of a chronicle of the monas-terious Windesdorfi, entitled De Viris Illustris Ordinis sui et Monasterii Windesdorfi (2nd ed. by H. Rosweydus, Antwerp, 1628).—De Reformazione Monasteriorum Quarundam in Ducatu Westfalia, Libri te Compendiose Legitimi Script. Brunsvici, ii. 476 sq., 896 sq.
Both these were originally published at Antwerp in 1621. Triethmesis mentions other works of this writer in MS. See Jocher, Altpreußisches Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Schlegel, Kirchenund Reformationsgeschichte von Norddeutschland (Hanover, 1828); Kinkel, in Herzog’s Real-Encyklop. s. v.;

s. v.; Hoefrer, Novus. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. F.)

Busch, Peter, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Nov. 13, 1682, at Lübeck. He studied at Leip-sic, and, after having acted as tutor in the families of several noblemen, he was, in 1717, appointed pastor at Othlen, near Helmstedt. In 1721 he was called to Hanover, where he died, May 3, 1744. He wrote treatises on several hymns, and composed more than sixty hymns, some of which are still in use. See Koch, Gesch.
des deutschen Kirchenlebens, v. 502 (B. F.)

Busbecch, Édouard Carl, a Reformed theologian of Germany, was born at Kühlen, in Anhalt, in 1748. In 1774 he became preacher at the Reformed Church in Trieste, and in 1785 also superintendent of the Vienna Reformed church. He died Dec. 29, 1882.
He wrote, Biblische Geschichten für Schule und Haus (Frankfort, 1855).—Prehistoire de l’Usu Domestico de Foresti Eclesiastical Reformata (Trieste, 1854).
In connection with Steinerk, he published Verfassungsentwort für die evangelische Kirche Oesterreich, etc. (ibid.

Büsching, Anton Friedrich, a German Protestant theologian and geographer of Germany, was born Sept. 27, 1722, at Stadehagen. He studied theology at Halle; in 1748 he was called to Petersburgh, as preceptor of pupils; in 1754 became professor of philosophy at Göttingen, but was afterwards silenced for alleged heresy; in 1759 became ordinary professor there; in 1761 went to Petersburgh, as director of the Protestant churches, but resigned in 1763, and went to Altona, and finally to Berlin, where he died, May 28, 1773, being denounced as the author of a composition on the Königsmannsium. He wrote, among other works, Introductio Hist. theol. in Epistolam Pauli ad Philippenses (Halle, 1746);—Gedanken von der Beschafffenheit und dem Vorzuge der bibl. dogmat. Theologie vor der scholastischen (Berlin, 1758);—Der Procrastinat Bachspupel Veters ejusque Causa (Halle, 1747);— Geschichte der evangel. Gemeinden in Russland (Altona, 1764, 1767, 2 vol.);—Geschichte der jüdischen Religion
(3 vol., Berlin, 1773);—Von der Wissenschaft der Jüdenschaft (Halle, 1749-51). See Winer, Handbuch der Theol. Lit. i, 67, 89, 147, 217, 234, 292, 631, 774, 855, 859;

Busee (Lat. Buseus, i. e. de Buses), Gerard, a Dutch theologian, was born about 1586. He was canon at Xanten, and distinguished himself as a preacher. He wrote, Reply to Fruetus Utrigiae; also a catechism in Flemish. See Hoefrer, Novus. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Busee, Johannes (Hans Buse), a Dutch theologian of the Jesuit order, was born at Nimwegen in 1547, and for a long time taught theology in Mayence, where he died, May 30, 1611. His principal works are, Disputatio Theologica de Jesu.—De Decemni Chori et Iuferi.—Modus recte Meditandi de Deo Divino. He also translated several religious works from the Italian and Spanish, and wrote some in Latin. See Hoefrer,

Busee, Peter, a Dutch theologian of the Jesuit order, brother of Johannes, was born about 1540. He was professor of Hebrew at Venice, where he died in 1587. He wrote, Christianiae Pontificum Christi tratia Christianam Petri Comastii (Cologne, 1577). See

Bush, Thomas II., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in the city of Washington in 1814. He recieved a religious training; experienced conversion in his eighteenth year; and entered the Baltimore Corfregation in 1837. He died April 19, 1866. Mr. Busch was modest in manner, but strong in moral. See Min-

Bushfield, John Atkinson, D.D., an English cleric-gyan, was born in 1755, and educated at Clare Hall, Cambridge. He was rector of St. Michael’s, Wood Street, London, and lecturer of St. Marylebone; and —Pastoral Memoirs:—Sermons on the Duties of the Christian Religion, the Lord’s Prayer, and the Great Mystery (1826, 3 vols.). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Bush, Alexander, a Baptist minister, was born at Lowville, Lewis Co., N. Y., Feb. 1, 1810. He united with the Church in 1827, and, after reaching for a time, pursued a course of study at Hamilton. He was ordained pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Gouvernour, Oct. 17, 1838. He preached his last sermon July 30, 1842, and, after lingering a year or two in great physical suffering, he died June 17, 1844. See Cattchart, Baptist Encyclopædia, p. 170, 171. (J. C. S.)

Bush, Alva, L.L.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Busti, Chautauqua Co., N. Y., Jan. 29, 1830. He was fitted for college in Jamestown Academy, and was a graduate of Burlington University, 1859. In November, 1859, he was ordained pastor of the Church at Strawberry Point, afterwards in Fayette, and was for a short time an instructor in Upper Iowa University. In Jan., 1863, he came to Osage, and established the Ceder Valley Seminary, of which he was president for eighteen years. During eight of these years he was pastor of the Church in Osage, and subsequently his Sabbaths were largely devoted to work in the country districts, where he was much beloved. Decided although he was in his denominational views, we are told that “the bounds of no church or creed could ever confine his sympathetic and genial spirit.” He belonged to all churches, and Christianity and humanity lost in his death a most efficient and unselfish worker.” In the cause of higher education he took great interest, and was honored on account of that interest. He died July 1, 1881. See The Chicago Standard, July 14, 1881.

ter, son of Rev. Charles Bush, Sr., a worthy local preacher in the M. E. Church, was born at Naples, Ontario Co., N. Y.; Jan. 23, 1819. He experienced conversion about 1844; entered the Western New York Conference, and in it served the Church zealously until his death, July 22, 1874. Mr. Bush was a plain, faithful, energetic, efficient Methodist preacher. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1874, p. 152.

Bush, Charles Peck, D.D., a Congregationalist and a minister, was a Presbyterian minister, was born at Brighton, N. Y.; Nov. 11, 1813. From 1837 to 1839 he was connected with the Yale Theological Seminary, but in the following year graduated at Union Theological Seminary. From Nov. 15, 1841, to Oct. 1, 1845, he was the ordained pastor of the Tenth Presbyterian Church, New York city. Sept. 1, 1846, he was installed pastor in Greenville, Norwich, Conn., from which he was dismissed Feb. 1, 1856. To his duties as acting pastor of the New England Church in Chicago, 1856, he added those of an editor. In January, 1857, he became pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Beloit, Wis., where he remained until Oct. 1, 1859. For three years he was district secretary, in New York, of the American Tract Society; from 1863 to 1871 he was district secretary of the A.B.C.F.M. at Rochester, N. Y.; subsequently held the same position in New York city, where he was also general agent until the time of his death, which occurred Feb. 22, 1889. Among his published works are, Work for All:—Five Years in China, etc.; Memoir of Samuel Huggins; etc. See Cong. Yearbook, 1881, p. 18; N. Y. Observer, Feb. 26, 1880.

Bush, Leverett, D.D., a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was for twenty-three years rector of St. Paul's Church, Oxford, N. Y., during which time he was distinguished for his zeal and urbanity. He was subsequently charge some time before his death, which occurred at Philippipe, Allegheny Co., N. Y., 1856. See Amer. Church Rev. 1857, p. 143.

Bush (or Bush), Paul, an English preacher, was born in 1490, and educated at Oxford, where he graduated B.A. in 1518. He afterwards became a brother of the order called Boni Homines, and, after studying some time among the friars of St. Austin (now Washam College), he was elected provincial of his order at Edington, in Wiltshire, and canon residuary of Sarum. On account of his great acquisitions in learning, Henry VIII made him his chaplain, and advanced him to the newly erected see of Bristol, to which he was consecrated June 25, 1543. On the occasion of queen Mary he was deprived of his bishopric, and spent the remainder of his life in a private station at Bristol, where he died, Oct. 11, 1559. He wrote, Notes on the Psalms (Lond. 1523):—

Treatise in Praise of the Cross:—Anser to Certain Queries concerning the Abuses of the Mass:—Dialogues between Christ and the Virgin Mary:—Curiosity Di- versed: and other works. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. &c.; Allibone, Dict. of Brtit. and Amer. Authors, &c.

Bush, Samuel, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Edgecomb, Me., April 15, 1797. From 1823 to 1827 he followed the sea, and in the latter year moved to Montville, Me. In 1835 he was converted, and in 1839 was licensed to preach by the Edgecomb Quarterly Meeting, and subsequently ordained in the Whitefield Church. He performed a large amount of evangelical labor in Clinton, Smithfield, Stark, Mercer, Bel- grave, and other places in Maine, and was honored by his Master in his work. He died in Edgecomb, May 30, 1875. See Morning Star, Feb. 23, 1876. (G. C. S.)

ter, was born at Augusta, Me., July 10, 1819, was brought up in Albany, as a member of the First Church, and with the advantages of the academy there. He read law at Lenox, Mass., and edited a newspaper; but some time after his admission to the bar he returned to the ministry, and he pursued theological study at Auburn Seminary, passing through the full course, 1833-39. He exercised his ministry at Binghamton five years, Schenectady seven years, Norwich four years, Cooperstown seven years, and filled the chaplaincy of the Binghamton Inebriate Asylum for ten years, until his death, March 21, 1877. His appearance and manners as a gentleman, his good understanding and intelligence, his sincerity, his unfailing devotion to his calling, introduced him into cultured congregations, and made him beloved and useful. See Presbyterian, in Central N. Y. p. 467; Gen. Cat. of Auburn Sem., 1888, p. 264.

Bushby, Christopher C., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Yorkshire, England, Jan. 1, 1839. He emigrated with his parents to Lafayette County, Wis., at the age of three; experienced religion in 1861; and in 1866 entered the West Wisconsin Conference. Subsequently he was transferred to the Iowa, and joined the Methodist Church. He died Nov. 18, 1876. Mr. Bushby manifested in his life geniality without rudeness, self-assurance without vanity, positiveness without dogmatism, and piety without shts. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1877, p. 138.

Bushell, Robert, an English Methodist minister, was born at Chipping Norton, April 30, 1827. His parents were prosperous, and he received a good education. As a Methodist Sunday-school scholar, he was noted for punctuality, regularity, and diligence—habits which never left him. At the age of thirteen a severe illness brought him near to death, and the effects of it made breathing difficult ever after. He gave his hearers an exhortation, written after his recovery, which he joined the Methodist Society. In 1848 he came to London, and became a local preacher under the Rev. Dr. Beaumont. In 1849, when three ministers were unjustly expelled from the Methodist Conference, Mr. Bushell joined himself to the Reformers, who adhered to the expellees. In 1861 he became one of the presidents of the Society of Methodist Reformers at Wisbeach, and remained there for seven years. In 1871 he was appointed local preacher of the Methodist Church, and became one of the presidents of the London Conference, in 1875. In 1899 he was appointed connectional secretary of the United Meth- odists (the union having taken place in 1875), and, filling that office for two years, the conference in 1861 unanimously elected him general missionary secretary, which position he filled with marked ability till 1881. He was the first man from whom, on behalf of missions, his health gave way, and he was compelled to resign his office. He died in peace at Sheffield, Nov. 22, 1881. He was in labors most abundant.

Bushnell Albert, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Rome, N. Y., Feb. 9, 1818. Having received a preparatory education, he entered, in 1840, Lane Theolog- ical Seminary, from which he regularly graduated. His enthusiasm for missions, especially to Africa, showed itself in the seminary, and he constructed a map of the "Dark Continent," with which he visited the churches in Southern Ohio, thrilling his hearers with his mission- ary appeals. On Nov. 5, 1843, he was licensed to preach, and ordained by the Presbytery of Cincinnati as a mission- ary to Africa. He and a fellow-graduate, John Mill- ton Campbell, sailed for Africa, on Jan. 1, 1844. When near the end of their voyage they were both prostrated by the coast fever. On March 18 Campbell died, and Bushnell was spared to be for thirty-six years the apostle of the Gaboon region. He was in some sense the father, and in every sense the heart, of African Presbyterian missions in Africa. In 1861 he visited this country, and his appeals to the General As- sembly in 1879 for a reinforcement of the mission, called forth expressions from that body of the high apprecia- tion in which he and his work were held. On his return, he tarried three weeks at Madeira. But his heart was fixed on his beloved Africa, and he proceeded on his voyage, and in less than two weeks died, in sight of land, and buried, by the crew, on Scurlock-Neck, Dec. 19, 1873, S. N. Y. Presbyterian, Jan. 14, 1880. (W. P. S.)

BUSHNELL, Calvin, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Saybrook, Conn., in 1781. He graduated at Williams College, Mass., in 1809; studied theology under Dr. David Porter; was licensed by the Oneida Presbytery in 1812; labored as a domestic missionary in Western New York for nearly twenty years, and after 1832 at Saybrook, Conn., and Lyme, Conn. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1865, p. 159.

BUSHNELL, Harvey, a Congregational minister, was born at Saybrook, Conn., March 25, 1794. He studied theology with Rev. Dr. N. W. Taylor of New Haven, and was ordained pastor of the Second Church in Plymouth (South), Mass., Nov. 21, 1821, from which charge he was dismissed June 30, 1825; April 24 to 1831 he was pastor in West Avon, Conn.; from January, 1835, to April, 1838, he was acting pastor in Hamburgh Church, now Lyme First; then, until 1834, held the same position in the Union Congregational Church in Sullivan, N. Y. Subsequently he resided, without charge, in Old Saybrook, Fairhaven, and Winsted, Conn. He died at Saybrook, March 14, 1875. See Cong. Year-Book, 1880, p. 13.

BUSHNELL Horace, D.D., LL.D., a distinguished Congregational minister, was born at Litchfield, Conn., April 14, 1802, and graduated from Yale College in 1827. After spending one year in the office of the New York Journal of Commerce, he studied law, and was at the same time tutor in Yale College, from May 15, 1824, to November, 1825. He passed two years in the Yale Divinity School, and was ordained pastor of the North Church, Hartford, May 22, 1833. This was his only settlement, and continued until 1859, when he was dismissed. He died at Hartford, Feb. 17, 1876. During his ministry he became eminent not only for his sermons as a preacher, but as a theologian, and also as a writer. Among the numerous productions of his pen were the following: Christian Nature (1847; enlarged, 1860):—God in Christ (1849):—Christ in Theology (1851):—Sermons for the New Life (1852):—Nature and the Supernatural (1855):—Work and Play (1864):—Christ and his Salvation (1869):—The Vicarious Sacrifice (1866):—Moral Use of Dark Things (1868):—Women Suffrage (1869):—Sermons on Living Subjects (1872):—Forgiveness and Law (1874). Dr. Bushnell occupies a position quite unique among American divines. By some of the leaders of his denomination he was regarded, at times, as the champion of heterodoxy in his views, and they refused to affiliate with him. As, however, his life passed away, he became more and more the object of sincere interest and Christian sympathy among all who came within the range of his influence. On account of the rare purity of his style, the elevation of his sentiments, and his remarkable knowledge of the windings and intricacies of human nature, he has made for himself a place of the highest rank among American writers. Whatever difference of opinion there may be about his peculiar theological views, there can be none about his intellectual ability, the charm of his conversational power, or the grace of his pen. See Memoirs of H. Bushnell (N. Y. 1880); Cong. Quarterly, xix, 411; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, a. v. (J. C. S.)

BUSHNELL, Jackson Jones, a Congregational minister, was born in Old Saybrook, Conn., Feb. 19, 1815. He graduated from Yale College in 1841, and entered Andrews Theological Seminary in December, 1841; but, after a few months there, became a teacher in Western Reserve College, Ohio. After a tutelage of two years, during the latter of which he was licensed to preach, he was appointed financial agent of the college, and served in that relation, and as an agent of the Western College Society, until April, 1848. He was then appointed professor of mathematics and natural philosophy in Beloit College, Wis., and entered on his office as the pioneer instructor of the new institution. In 1858 he resigned, and devoted himself to business in Beloit; but in 1863 he was reappointed, and continued in office until his death, March 8, 1873. See Obituary Record of Yale College, 1873.

BUSHNELL, Jedediah, a Congregational minister, was born in Saybrook, Conn., Nov. 26, 1769. At the age of sixteen he was apprenticed to a shoemaker, and at twenty-one established himself in the business. Two years after, he was converted. After a preliminary course of study, he entered Williams College, from which he graduated in 1797. During his collegiate career he taught school. He studied theology under the Rev. Mr. Judson of Sheffield, Mass.; and, after receiving a license to preach, he labored successfully in various places. He next entered the service of the Connecticut Missionary Society, laboring especially in Western New York and in Western Vermont during the first five years. On May 25, 1803, he was installed pastor in Cornwall, Vt. During his ministry in this place, which covered the period of thirty-three years, his church enjoyed fourteen revivals of religion. On May 25, 1836, he resigned his pastorate. For seven years he was employed in ministering to the neighboring churches. In 1843 he was disabled by an affection of the throat. He died May 25, 1836. He was one of the founders of the Vermont Missionary Society, and one of its Committee of Missions. For a considerable time he was a member of the faculty of Middlebury College. He was one of the editors of a monthly magazine published in Middlebury, Vt., for several years, by the General Convention. This periodical was called The Advertiser. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Polite, ii, 422.

BUSHNELL, Samuel, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Massachusetts, Nov. 28, 1792. He was converted when about sixteen, and in 1810 entered the New York Conference, wherein he labored to the close of his life, Aug. 24, 1824. Mr. Bushnell was sound in mind, calm in temperament, prudent in business, deep in piety, and strong in faith. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1825, p. 476; Methodist Magazine, vii, 408.

BUSHNELL, Wells, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Hartford, Conn., April, 1779. He graduated from Jefferson College in 1823, and was two years a student in Princeton Theological Seminary. He was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick in 1825. In 1830 he became a member of the Presbytery of Erie. He was pastor at Meadville, Pa., from 1826 to 1833, and, upon the resignation, in 1833, of the pastor of the First Church at Sharon, it was proposed that he might go as a missionary to the Indians in the West. After spending one year there, ill-health compelled him to return East. For a time he supplied the First Presbyterian Church in Louisville, Ky. He then accepted a call to the congregation at Greensburg, Ind., in connection with one at Shelbyville, in the same state. After laboring there a year and a half, his health failed, and he returned to New Albany. Soon after this he went to Pittsburgh, Pa., for the purpose of rest and reuniting his health. While there he accepted an invitation to supply the churches of Gravel Run and Cambria, 1838, and removed there. In 1836 he went from the Presbytery of Erie to that of Indiana, and in 1838 was received again into the Presbytery of Erie. In April, 1839, he was dismissed to the Presbytery of Beaver, having accepted a call to the Church of New Castle, Pa. Here he labored fifteen and a half years with success. At this time he became interested in the question of slavery; he accordingly severed his connection with the Beaver Presbytery, and united with the "Free Presbyterian Church." He then ministered to the congregations of Mount Jackson and New Bedford. He died at the former place, July 16, 1863. He was a successful minister; as a Christian, was esteemed sincere and pure. See Hist. of the Presbyterian Church.
BUSINK

was born at Saybrook (now Westbrook), Conn., April 14, 1801. After obtaining preliminary education at Kimball Union Academy, Meriden, N. H., he graduated from Yale College in 1828, and from the Theological Seminary in 1832. From Aug. 8, 1832, until April 8, 1835, he served the Church in North Killingly, now East Killingly. From October 1835, until June 1836, he was pastor in Whippaway, N. J. From January 1836, to May, 1843, he preached in Beverly, Mass.; and from May, 1843, until December, 1846, he labored in Newton. During the succeeding eight years he was secretary of the American Seamen's Friend Society. In 1854 he received the degree of D.M. from Pennsylvania University, and practiced medicine until death, which occurred in East Boston, April 28, 1879. See Cong. Year-book, 1880, p. 14; Obituary Record of Yale College, 1879.

BUSINCK, Louis, a German wood engraver, lived at Minden about 1630. The following are some of his best prints: St. Peter Holding the Keys; St. John and St. Matthew; Judith with the Head of Holofernes; A Holy Family. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

BUSIAGRUS, Johannes Peter, a Swedish scholar, was in 1661 professor of Oriental languages at Upsala, where he died in 1692. He wrote Dispositio de Naturae Moraen (Upsala, 1651):—De Dispositio de Usui et Necessitate Orientalium Literarum (Upsala, 1656);—De Origine et Cultu (1655). See Steinschneider, Bibliograph. Handbuch, p. 28; Jörcher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lezikon, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Buskis (catholic; anciently called campgoer), are stockings of precious stuff—satin, cloth of gold, or silk embroidered—worn by bishops when celebrating, being the first vestment assumed; also by kings at their coronations. The solemn occasion, as anciently the use was confined to the bishop of Rome, but by the 9th century they were generally worn by all bishops. The buskins used at the coronation of King James II were made of cloth of tussore. Those belonging to bishop Waynflete, the founder of St. Mary Magdalene College, Oxford, are preserved in the library of that society.

BUSMANN, Johann Emanuel, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Feb. 26, 1644, at verdin. He studied at Wittenberg and Helmstedt; was in 1678 licentiate, and in 1684 doctor and professor of theology; and in 1685 general superintendent at Helmstedt, where he died, May 18, 1692. He wrote, Disquisitationes de Fide Salve, a seu Justificatione:—De Schoel Herbraeorum:—De Antiquis Hebraeorum Libri in Aserlethet, Malachit, De Apostasia Luciferii cum Angelio Sibis. See Fippinii Memoriae Theologorum; Jörcher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lezikon, s. v.; Steinheisner, Bibliograph. Handbuch, p. 28; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Bussell, Joseph, an English Baptist minister, was born in Ross, Herefordshire, in 1818. He united with the Church in 1818, and began, while young, the work of itinerancy. Having pursued a course of study in Bristol College, he became pastor of a Church in Modbury, in the south of Devon, and remained there about eleven years. His health failing, he returned to his native place, where he engaged in business with his brother, preaching as opportunity presented. He died Dec. 28, 1855. See (Late) Baptist Hand-book; 1867, p. 131. (J. C. S. P.)

Bussero, Giuseppe Luigi, an Italian theologian of the Carmelite order, was born at Milan in 1659, and died at Cremona in 1724, leaving Discors Sacri (Modena, 1683) :—Lector Bibliorum (Cremona, 1725; vol. i only was published posthumously). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bussey, Amos, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Trapboull County, O., Nov. 20, 1806. He experienced religion; in 1833 was licensed to preach, and admitted into the Erie Conference. In 1837 he was transferred to the Indiana Conference; by its division, in 1852, he became a member of the South-eastern Indiana Conference; and in 1856 joined the Iowa Conference. In 1860 he became superannuated, and retired to Oskaloosa, where he remained to the close of his life, Jan. 18, 1865. Mr. Bussey was a faithful, laborious, able preacher; a tried friend, prudent counselor, earnest Christian, and a staunch Methodist. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1865, p. 218.

Bussolari, Giacomo d'Elia, an Italian preacher, was born in Pavia about the beginning of the 16th century. He early joined the Augustine order, and was sent to preach in Pavia in 1536, where he so severely inveighed against the prevailing vices of the city as to arouse the hostility of the bishopric and the duchy of Beccaria. He defended himself by force of arms for a while, but was finally overcome, and died in 1539 of injury by reason of imprisonment. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bussus, Matteo. See Bosso.

Bustamante, Bartoloméo di, a Spanish theologian, was born at Lima, in Peru, in the 16th century. He was a Franciscan, and the author of a work entitled, Tratado de Prunis Primicia de Dios en Santidad y Leytras. See Biog. Universalis, vi, 578.

Bustamante (de la Camara), Juan, a Spanish theologian and naturalist, a native of Alcalá de Henares, lived in the first half of the 16th century. He studied in his native village, and then taught medicine and philosophy. He is known by a work entitled De Repulchris et Jusmentibus Sacrum Scripturae (Alcalá, 1594, 2 vols. 4to; Lyons, 1620, 8vo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bussami was a Mohammedan mystic in the 9th century of our era, who taught that the recognition of our personal existence was idolatry. He was a pantheist, and held that man is absorbed in God; and when a man is with God he worships himself. See Gardner, Faiths of the World, s. v.

Bustard, John, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Sheffield, May 15, 1783. He was converted at the age of eighteen: was received into the travelling connection of preachers in 1807; retired to Sherborne in 1842; and died at Yeovil, Jan. 14, 1868. Bustard wrote biographies of Joseph (in verse), of Mary Anna Bustard, the Thaneet Bustard, the Teather Bustard, the Garnerer, of Lean, a young miner, of Miss H. M. Bingham and Mr. J. Bingham (1822, 12mo); revised and abridged Pierce's Sinner Impeached in His Own Court, with a memoir of the author (1832, 16mo), and a volume of original poems—Scripture Themes in Rilla and Strauss (Bristol, 1840). See Minutes of the Minutes of the General Conference, 1868, p. 19; Osborne, Meth. Bibliog. p. 78, 215.

Busto (Lat. Bustia), Bernardino, an Italian preacher and theologian, belonged to the Franciscan order. He was a speaker of talent, and assisted in establishing the festival of the Holy Name of Jesus. He also wrote on this subject to pope Innocent VIII. He died, 1505. He is said to have composed several sermons, all of which are his, published under the title, Morale, etc. (Milan, 1494; Strasbourg, 1498, 1502; Brescia, 1588; Cologne, 1607). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Buston (or Busten), Thomas Stephen, an English missionary, was born in the county of Salisbury in 1549. After having studied at Rome, he became a Jesuit, and was sent into the East Indies; there he became rector of a college in the island of Salset, where he remained forty years. He died at Goa in 1619, leaving in Portuguese some linguistic works, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bustos (y Viana), Luis F., a Spanish writer, was born at Granada in 1569. He was made, in 1576, by king Ferdinand VI., historiographer of the new discoveries in Granada. He has been called, by some Spanish writer, "the Cypriote of Spanish literature, and the prince of ecclesiastical historians." Among his works are, A Dissertation on the Arrival of St. James the Great in Spain.—A Catalogue of all the Bishops, Religious Orders, Great Colleges, Inquisitors General, and Grandees of Spain.—Dissertations on the Authenticity of St. Veronica of Jaen.—A Dissertation on the Spanish Liturgy.—A Critique on almost every Ecclesiastical Author; etc.

Bustum was a place appointed for burning the bodies of the dead among the ancient Romans. The Bustum was in the immediate neighborhood of the place of sepulture, that when the body was consumed the ashes might be interred. See CREMATION.

Buzum (or Suman) (sacredness) is the native name used by the Ashantees and Fantees for the deities worshipped by the negroes, commonly called fetiches (q. v.).

Butcher, Henry William, an English Congregational minister, was born in London, Aug. 22, 1833, of Wesleyan parents. He received a careful religious training, and early gave himself to the worship and service of God. In 1855 he entered Cheshunt College, and in 1859 was admitted to Magdalen College, Oxford. He was licensed by the University, whence, in 1863, he removed to Margate, where the chief work of his life was done. Here he died, June 5, 1878. Mr. Butcher had great public spirit, and manifested his zeal in the discussion of political, ecclesiastical, educational, and moral questions. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1879, p. 365.

Butcher, John, an English minister of the Society of Friends, was born in the city of London in July, 1666. Early in life, under the careful instruction of his pious parents, he was brought to the knowledge of the truth; and, when he was but fifteen years of age, began to testify in public of the grace of God. Gradually he grew to be an able minister, "not of the letter, but of the power of the Spirit." After being approved as a servant of the Master to whom he devoted the remainder of his life, he itinerated much as a preacher in many parts of England. He was everywhere a promoter of peace and concord, and it was his special delight to heal breaches and reconcile differences among brethren. He died near Edmonton, Middlesex, Sept. 16, 1721. See Piety Promoted, ii, 352, 353. (J. C. S.)

Butcher, Thomas Benjamin, an English Congregational minister, was born at Wandsworth, Surrey, in 1790. He was converted at the age of fifteen. In 1840 he was chosen deacon. His first and only charge was Northfleet, where he labored fifty years. He died July 6, 1858. Mr. Butcher was distinguished for great benevolence, disinterestedness, and zeal. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1859, p. 192.

Butcher, William Colman, a Methodist Episco- pal minister, was born at Mechanicsville, N. Y., Oct. 30, 1841. He received a careful religious training; was a thoughtful, studious young man; graduated at the law university in Albany in 1864; soon afterwards was converted and in 1869 entered the Troy Conference. In its active ranks he labored to the time of his death, Dec. 14, 1874. Mr. Butcher was the possessor of an excellent spirit, a clear judgment, a well-disciplined mind, ready utterance, and was habitually studious. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1876, p. 65.

Butch is the title of an individual who runs furious- ly on certain days of the year through the city of Lassa, in Thibet, killing recklessly all whom he meets, in honor of the goddess Manipa, who is said to take special delight in the shedding of blood.

Buthos or Bythos (Bυθος, the abyss) was the primal essence, among the Valentinian Gnostics, where the spirit is lost in contemplation. According to this system all existence has its ground in the self-limitation of the Buthos, which has in it a fulness of divine life that flows out in the complete series of anna (q. v.).—Gardner, Faiths of the World, s. v. See Gnostics.

Butlin, Dominique, a Swiss preacher, was born at Geneva in 1777, and died in 1798. He was librarian in 1799, and published Thesees et Universa Philosophia (Geneva, 1790). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Butlin, Gabriel, a Swiss ascetic theologian and poet, lived in the middle of the 17th century. Having been a village pastor in 1629, he obtained the office of curate of Geneva in 1688. He wrote, Carmina in Miraculis et Felicis Librutionem de Deo Optimo Marti- no Urbis Geneva Missam anno 1602.—In Odissam Jacobii Godfreyi Carmen Epicudum (1652). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Butlin, Pierre, a Swiss theologian and preacher, was born Feb. 8, 1678. Having been admitted to the priestly office in 1698, he was called to preach at Leip- zig, where he remained thirty years. He was likewise called to the Church in London, and contented himself with the office of preacher in Geneva, where he died in 1706. He wrote, Histoire de la Vie de Jesus-Christ (Geneva, 1710).—Sermons sur divers textes de l’Ecriture Sainte (1708, 1786). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

ButinONE, Bernardo, an Italian painter, a native of Travillo, was the companion and friend of Bernar- dino. In the Church of San Pietro, in Gessato, there are several pictures by Butinone, executed about 1484. He died in 1520.

Butland, Benjamin Charles, an English Congregational minister, was born in 1838. He learned the printer's trade in London in the rooms of the Religious Tract Society. Having become interested in the work of foreign missions, he studied in the missionary institution at Bedford, and afterwards at New College, Lon- don. He was then ordained in connection with the Colonial Missionary Society, and set out immediately afterwards for New Zealand. He spent three years at Thames Settlement, after which he returned to England. He was then invited to the pastorale of the Church at Leyland, in Lancashire. His zeal for missionary labors, however, led him to remove to Jamaica in September, 1875. For three years he gave himself to the laborious duties of the pastorale of Four Paths and Brixton Hill. In February, 1875, he accepted the pastorale at King-ston, Jamaica, and died at St. Ann’s Bay, June 3, 1889. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1881, p. 360.

Butler, Augustus Matthew, an English Congregational minister, was born at Leicester, March 5, 1837. He was converted in early life, and joined the Church in 1856. In 1861 he became evangelist to the Leicestershire Congregational Union, and five years later removed to Stowupland as an evangelist to the Suffolk Union. He accepted an invitation to the pas- torale at Reddings, Derbyshire, in 1869, and there died, Jan. 18, 1875. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1876, p. 319.

Butler, Calvin, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Jericho, Vt., May 23, 1877. He graduated at Mid- dlebury College in 1892, and at Andover Theological Seminary in 1892; was ordained by Longfellow Bene- dictory in 1897; labored first at Princeton, Ind., then at Evansville; went next to Washington, Ind., where he preached till the fall of 1898. He then removed to Booneville, and preached to two churches until 1849, when he came to Marine, Madison Co., Ill., and joined Alton Presbytery. He died Nov. 9, 1894. See Nor- ton, Hist. of the Presb. Church in Illinois; Gen. Cut. of Andover Semi, 1870, p. 74.

Butler, Charles F., a Presbyterian minister, was born at New Hartford, Conn., Jan. 21, 1790. He graduated from Yale College in 1816. After leaving college he taught for two years at Bedford Academy, Bedford, N. Y. In 1818 he was licensed by the Congregational Association of Fairfield County, Conn. He labored at BUTLER

South Salem, Westchester Co., N. Y., until 1828, after which he was pastor in Greenwich, Conn., for ten years. After he had been in the ministry three years he severed his connection with the Congregational Association, and joined the Rock River Presbytery. He died in 1866. See Wilson, Fred. Hist. Almanac, 1867, p. 296.

Butler, Clark Spencer, a Baptist minister, was born in Montgomery County, N. C., April 4, 1825. When about five years old he moved with his parents to Carroll County, Tenn., where he spent the most of his life. He was a soldier in the Mexican war. In 1847 he united with the Church, was ordained in April, 1854, and served as pastor twenty years at the laborsome church. Being a farmer and poor, he had to labor hard for a support, the churches which he served rendering him but little pecuniary aid. He died Oct. 5, 1872. See Borum, Sketches of Tenn. Ministers, p. 56, 58. (J. C. S.)

Butler, George W., a Baptist minister, was born in Hillsboro, Va., April 11, 1817, and united when quite young with the Church. Later in life and has pursued a course of study, completing it at the New Hampton Institution. He was ordained at Stratford, N. H., in October, 1846, and spent seven years in laboring among the feeble churches in Coos County, N. H. Subsequently he was pastor three years in Fyngsboro, Mass., and one year in Statenville, N. Y., followed by twenty years in a laborsome church in Hartford, N. Y. In May, 1857, he moved to Berlin Heights, O., where, after laboring very earnestly for a little more than a year, he died, Sept. 15, 1858. (J. C. S.)

Butler, Elijah, a native Cherokee minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was converted in early life, and excelled only Cherokee; but in it was well educated. As far back as 1855 his name appeared in the Indian Mission Conference minutes, from which date to his death in 1870, he labored faithfully among his people, highly esteemed by all and doing much good. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1873, p. 881.

Butler, Franklin, a Congregational minister, was born at Essex, Vt., Oct. 15, 1814. He graduated from the University of Vermont in 1836, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1842. The following year, Jan. 18, he was ordained pastor in Windsor, Vt., and remained there until Nov. 11, 1858. For ten years he was agent for the American Colonization Society; from 1867 to 1871 he was editor of the Vermont Chronicle, and during the same time, he edited the Vermont Journal. For some time he was chaplain of the state prison. In addition to his other duties he served as acting pastor of the Church in Ascutneyville from 1869 to 1876. He died May 23, 1880. See Cong. Year-book, 1891, p. 18.

Butler, Frederick B., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Prince George County, Va., July 22, 1803, of pious parents. He was converted in his twenty-second year, and in 1827 entered the Ohio Conference. In 1829 his health failed, and he retired from active service until 1834, when he again resumed his place in the active ranks. He died March 5, 1839. The conspicous elements of Mr. Butler's character were dignity and humility, fervor and gentleness, plainness and brotherly kindness. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1840, p. 51.

Butler, Henry, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at New Vineyard, Me., July 15, 1806. He studied for the law, and experienced religion when about twenty-six years of age, and soon after began preaching. In 1832 he entered the Maine Conference. For twelve years he held an efficient charge, and then became a superannuate, which relation he sustained to the close of his life, April 5, 1850. Mr. Butler excelled in energy, faith, labors, deep piety, power with God, in preaching talents, and in the number brought into the Church, any man of his time and conference. He was an exemplary Christian. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1860, p. 482.

Butler, Jeremiah, a Congregational minister, was born at Onondaga, N. Y., May 29, 1812. After studying at the academy, and at the Union Institute, in Auburn, O., he entered Oberlin College, from which he graduated in 1842, and from the Theological Seminary in 1845. In the latter year he was ordained at Oberlin, and soon after became acting pastor in Bellevue, O., serving in that position until April, 1849. From October, 1858, to January, 1859, he served in Riga, N. Y.; from 1858 to 1864 in Bergen; from 1864 to 1878 in Fairport, where he died, July 27, 1880. See Cong. Year-book, 1881, p. 18.

Butler, Joel, a Baptist minister, joined the Baptists in 1780, and was ordained at Woodstock, Vt., in 1785. He moved from field to field westwardly through the state of New York, and died in Genes, Ind., Sept. 13, 1822, in his seventy-first year. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pilgrims, vi. 411.

Butler, John (1), D.D., an English prelate, was born in Hamburg, Germany, probably of English parents, in December, 1717. In early life he was a tutor in the family of Mr. Child, a banker. He became, first, chaplain to the bishop of London, and obtained the living of Easington, in Durham. In 1767, by the recommendation of Lord Onslow he was appointed one of the king's chaplains, and obtained a prebend in Winchester cathedral. He supported the administration of Lord North, and wrote several pamphlets in which he endeavored to justify the American war. As a reward for these services he was made archdeacon of Surrey, and in 1788 bishop of Oxford. He held at the same time the living of Cuddesdon. In 1788 he was translated to the see of Hereford, over which he presided until his death, Dec. 10, 1802. He published several political tracts and a number of sermons. He collected and published a number of his discourses under the title of Select Sermons, etc. (1801). See Chalmers, *Biog. Dict. a. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, a. v.

Butler, John (2), a Baptist minister, was born in Nottingham, N. H., April 13, 1789. He was converted in his fourteenth year by the preaching of Rev. Thomas Paul, a distinguished minister of African descent, and afterward his baptism, Oct. 6, 1806, became a member of the Church in Newburyport, Mass. He was licensed to preach in April, 1809, and in 1810 was ordained pastor of the Church in Hanover, Mass. In 1824 he removed to Waterville, Me., where he established a school for young ladies, still continuing to preach. In May, 1826, he removed to Winthrop, where, besides carrying on his school, he acted as pastor of the Church for six years. He became pastor of the Church in North Yarmouth, May 8, 1831, in which office he continued until Oct. 15, 1855. On resigning, he accepted an appointment from the Maine Baptist Convention, and was in their service nearly two years. The ten subsequent years were spent in doing the work of an evangelist. During this period he took an active part in eighteen revivals, in which it is estimated that about twelve hundred persons were converted. He died at Franklin, O., July 1, 1856. See Origin of the Church in Yarmouth, Me., p. 15, 16. (J. C. S.)

Butler, John George, a Lutheran minister, was born in Philadelphia in 1754. He served some time in the Revolutionary war, and afterwards commenced a course of theology under the direction of his pastor. In 1779 he was licensed by the Synod of Pennsylvania, and soon after took charge of the Lutheran Church in Carlisle and vicinity. He made missionary tours through Virginia, and in 1797 was made president of the Cumberland, Md., and took charge of the congregation there, organized in 1794. Here he continued to labor with much zeal until the close of his life, Dec.
Butler, Joseph, a Presbyterian minister, was born on the shores of Lake Champlain in 1799. He was educated at Middlebury College, licensed by the Congregational Association at Montpelier in 1825, and ordained by Champlain Presbytery in 1827. In 1836 he went west, spent some time in Indiana, and then went to Illinois. He was called at once to the Church of Shiloh, in Edwards Co., and there labored, with but short interruptions, for twenty-three years. He removed from Illinois to Pawselin, Minn., where he died, Oct. 27, 1872. See Norton, Hist. of the Presb. Church in Illinois; (N.Y.) Presbyterian, Oct. 19, 1872.

Butler, P. E., an English Baptist minister, was born in Kilkenny, Ireland, in 1803, and was educated for the Church of England at Trinity College, Dublin. He was for several years curate of St. Margaret's, Ipswich, where he was held in high esteem, and preached with much effect, being subsequently harangued by the Bishop of Basketball. He was admitted to the Baptist ministry, and was baptized at Stepney College Chapel in October, 1837, and in the April following he became pastor of the Church in Keppel street, where he remained for a short time, and then resigned on account of the state of his health. His death took place April 6, 1842. He was the author of a volume of poems on religious subjects, a volume of sermons, and several minor pieces. See Report of English Baptist Union, 1842, p. 23. (J. C. S.)

Butler, Stephen, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Peasmarsh, Sussex, June 29, 1781. In 1802 he received his first appointment, Lynn, and subsequently labored on the Thetford, Norwich, Grimstead, Winterton, Lincoln, and Ipswich circuits. He died at Peasmarsh, March 30, 1818. He was of an unblemished character and naturally reserved. See Weal. Meth. Magazine, 1820, p. 161; Minutes of the British Conference, 1818.

Butler, Thornton, a German Reformed minister, was born in Catawba County, N.C., Oct. 4, 1830. After completing the theological course at Trinity College, at New Market, Pa., he returned to his native state, and was licensed and ordained by the Classis of North Carolina, March 12, 1848. In the same year he became pastor of five congregations in Davidson County, N.C. In 1858 he accepted a call from the East Rowan charge, where he labored for ten years, and then, in 1868, removed to Anna, III., where he died, Nov. 2, 1870. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church, iv, 390.

Butler, Weeden, an English clergyman, was born at Margate in 1742. He was curate to the celebrated Dr. Dodd, and his successor, at Charlotte Chapel, Pimlico. He kept a classical school at Chelsea for forty years, and died in 1825. He published Sermons (1798-1800), and other works, for which see Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, a.v.; Rose, Gen. Ric. Dict. a.v.

Butler, W., an English Baptist minister, was born at Ashby-de-la-Zouch, Leicestershire, in August, 1801, united with the General Baptist Church in Caudwell in the autumn of 1817, and soon after began to preach. He was ordained in July, 1825, at Kegworth, where he remained till 1829, and then removed to Longford, Warwickshire, and in 1834 to Heptonstall Slack, where he continued as pastor till 1848. He died April 19, 1850. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1851, p. 41. (J. C. S.)

Butler, William, was an Englishman, who died in 1410, and wrote on the subject of indulgences and against the English version of the Bible, which was made about that time.

Butler, Zebulon, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Wilkesbarre, Pa., Sept. 27, 1803. He was educated at the Academy of Wilkesbarre, and at Nassau Hall (College of New Jersey). He graduated from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1829, was licensed the same year, and settled in 1828 at Port Gibson, Miss., where his earnest, laborious, and useful life was spent. He died Dec. 23, 1860. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1862, p. 84.

Buto, in Egyptian mythology, was a goddess especially worshipped in the city of the same name in the delta of the Nile, where she had the most magnificent temple. When Isis was persecuted by Typhon, she gave both her children, Bubastis and Horus, to this goddess. As the latter correspond to the Greek Diana and Apollo, so Buto appears as their mother Latona. She had an oracle in Buto, and the Egyptians relate that the city could move from place to place, in order to hide Horus and Bubastis. Every Egyptian deity has its sacred animal; that of Buto was the mouse. See MAUT.

Butson, Constantine, a prelate of the Church of England, was born in 1750. He was educated at Winchester; and originally matriculated at Oxford as a commoner of Trinity College, in 1768. In 1798 he succeeded to a scholarship at New College; in 1771, obtained the chancellor's prize for English Verse, on The Love of Our Country; April 3, 1772, he graduated A.B.; and in 1774 vacated his fellowship at New College by marriage; and shortly after was preferred to the deanery of Waterford; whence, in 1804, he was promoted to a see in the Irish church, being appointed to the bishoprics of Clonfert and Kilmacduagh, which had been merged in the sees of Killaloe and Kilfenora. Bishop Butson died in 1836. See (Lond.) Christian Remembrancer, April, 1836, p. 249.

Butta (Butto, or Butturo). In some MSS. of the Liber Pontificalis we read that Leo III (795-816) caused to be made for the venerable monastery of St. Sabas, "butronem [al. buttonem] argenteum cum canistro suo pensantem librum xii." Leo IV (847-855) is also reported, by the same authority, to have placed in the Church of St. Peter, "butronem ex argento purissimo, qui pendet in-presbyterio ante altare, pensamentum libri exilii"; and... another, also of pure silver, "cum gabatis argentinis pendentibus in catenam septem." The buttas seem to have been suspended cups used for lamps. See Canistrum; Gabatha. The illustrations are from the Hieroelixon; the first is a single suspended butta, from an ancient representation; the second, a corona with three hanging buttas, from an old painting once existing in St. Peter's at Rome.

Martens (De Ant. Eccl. Rit. iii, 96) describes a butta as used for fetching and preserving the chrisom, according to an ancient custom, in the church of St. Martin at Tours.

Bentley, Thomas, an English Congregational minister, was born in London, Dec. 26, 1785, of pious parents. He became an orphan early in life; received his education at Hackney College; and first settled in the ministry at Cannock, Staffordshire. He afterwards preached eighteen years at Sutton, Norfolk; fourteen years at Wyciffe; a short time at the church in Oxford; and at Cambridge road; and in 1800 retired from public life. He died at Mile End, Feb. 2, 1865. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1866, p. 239.

BUTTERFIELD, George, a Congregational minister, was born Sept. 5, 1810. He studied theology at the Bangor, Me., Seminary, and graduated from the Connecticut Theological Institute in 1838. He was ordained at Wilmington, Vt., in June, 1838; and installed at Quechee in 1843, remaining there till 1845; was acting pastor at Randolph from 1845 to 1853; pastor at Eagle Point, Ill., from 1855 to 1860. He removed to Monticello, Ia.; and during the civil war he served three years in the Thirty-seventh Iowa Infantry. For two years he was engaged in mission work in York County, Neb.; and spent the last seven years of his life in Monticello, where he died, July 15, 1872. See Alumni Rec-

BUTTERWELL, William, an English Wesleyan preacher, was born at Halifax, Yorkshire. He was converted in early life; became a local preacher; entered the ministry in 1784; and, after a faithful service of forty years, died at Driffield, Yorkshire, in 1794 (or 1795). See Atmore, Meth. Memorial, s. v.

BUTTERWORTH, Edward, a preacher of the United Methodist Free Church, was born at Manchester, Eng., in January, 1841. He was converted at the age of twenty, and began to call sinners to repentance soon afterwards. In the Sabbath-school and reached school he was an earnest worker. He devoted himself to mission work in East Africa, arriving at Bala in February, 1864, full of energy and faith. Fever closed his labors within three months of his arrival. His life was brief, but bright.—Minutes of Eighth Annual Assembly.

BUTTERWORTH, Laurence, an English Baptist minister, was born in 1741, and in 1765 was ordained as pastor of the Church at Evesham, in Worcestershire. This was his only pastorate, and was continued for more than sixty-three years. Such was the vigor of his physical constitution, that he was able to preach till within a very few weeks of his death, which occurred July 1, 1828. He maintained a high Christian character, being distinguished for his integrity, Christian affection, benevolence, and fidelity to the duties of the sacred office. See New Baptist Magazine, 1828, p. 310. (J. C. S.)

Butthingham, Carl, a German theologian, was born at Frankenthal in 1731. He taught theology at Heidelberg, and constantly applied himself to historical researches upon the various states of Germany. He died June 13, 1786. He wrote a Supplement to the Chronicle of Aventicum (Frankfort, 1758)—History of the Palatinate and Switzerland (Zurich, 1766). See Hoe-ner, Nieh. Gesch. der Glauben, s. v.

BUTTLAR, Eva von, the foundress of the German so-called Butlar sect, was born at Eschwege, Hesse, in 1670. At the age of seventeen she married a French refugee, De Vesias, who was a dancing-master at Eisennach. She led a very dissipated life; and, being awakened under the influence of Pietism, in 1697, she left her husband, and held religious meetings, in which, under a vow of silence, the sincere, the most honest things were committed. She founded at Allendorf, in 1702, the so-called Christian and Philadelphian Society; but within six weeks she was expelled with her adherents. The sect carried on its criminal proceedings at many other places, whither it emigrated. Eva was honored with the title of "Paradis," as well as the mother of us all, as the Sophia came down from heaven, the new Eve, and the incarnation of the Holy Spirit. God the Father was incarnate in the candidate Winter, and God the Son in her youthful paramour Appenfeller. Marriage was declared to be sinful; sensual lust must be put to death in spiritual communion, then carnal communion is also holy. Eva lived in the most shameful harlotry with all the men of the sect; likewise the other women belonging to it. At Saamannshausen, in Wittgenstein, where their secret worship had been watched, they were threatened with punishment, and sought escape. In Bohemia they connected themselves with the Reformed Catholic Church. At Lüde, near Pyrmont, their criminal madness reached its highest point. Winter was condemned to death, but had his punishment commuted to scourging (1706). Eva escaped the same punishment by flight, and carried on her scandalous conduct for some years longer, but with more prudence. At Altona she belonged outwardly to the Lutheran Church, leading a decent life. She died there after 1717. See Keller, Die Buttlarische Rotte, in Niederner's Zeitschrift für historische Theologie (1845); Göbel, Geschichte des christlichen Lebens in der rheinisch-öst-fellischen-evangelischen Kirche (Coblentz, 1892), ii, 728-806; Dibelius, in Herzog's Real-Encyclopedia, 2d ed. s. v.; Lichtenberger, Encyclopädie des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. F.)

BÜTTNER, Christoph Andreas, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Oct. 31, 1706, at Nuremberg. He studied at Altorf, and for a time was professor of philosophy at Halle. In 1757 he was called to Strasburg, where he was appointed as rector to the new university. He died, Oct. 24, 1774. He wrote, Disput. qua sicut Quandam Abrahamicam Secundum jus Naturae Consideratur (Altorf, 1727);—Disput. qua Judicium de non Existentia Diabolu Dijudicatur (ibid. 1784);—Disput. de Inufficicien Rationis ad Solutum (ibid. 1735);—Cursus Theologiae Reservi-

BÜTTNER, David Sigmond, a German theologian of the 18th century, was deacon at Querfurt, and wrote a series of books at Leipzig, (1710). See Hoe-ner, Now. Biog., Général, s. v.

BÜTTNER, Gottlieb, a Moravian minister, was born in Germany in 1717, and came to America in October, 1741. In 1740 a mission had been established at Sha-comaco, a village thirty miles from Poughkeepsie, near the borders of the Connecticut. Count Zinzendorf ordained Bütten a deacon in February, 1742, and he was appointed a Moravian missionary to the Indians. During the first year of his labors among the Mohican Indians thirty-one persons were baptized. In 1745 Bütten was subjected to considerable persecution, bening charged with preaching without authority, and of refusing, on conscientious grounds, to take the oath of allegiance to the constituted authorities. In conse-

Buttner, Johann Ernst, a Lutheran minister of Germany, was born April 11, 1648, at Friedersdorf, in Upper Lusitania. He studied at Jenia; was in 1676 con rector at Lengao, in 1678 at Staede, in 1685 deacon there; in 1699 he was made pastor primarius of St. Nicolai;
and died March 13, 1725. He wrote, Disp. de Exsami

Button, Alfred, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Fort Plain, N. Y., July 30, 1824. He was converted in 1844; licensed to preach in 1851, and in 1853 entered the Oneida Conference, wherein he labored faithfully till his death, Sept. 27, 1860. Mr. Button was cheerful, eminently pious, and an able, growing minister.
See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1861, p. 85.

Button, George, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Rotherham, Yorkshire, in 1754. He united with the Church in youth; was called into the ministry in 1779, and continued in its labors until his death, at Shaftesbury, in 1822. "He was remarkable for self-denial, plainness, abstraction from the world, and devotion to God." See Minutes of the British Conference, 1822.

Button, John Wesley, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Gainsborough, March 28, 1798.
In 1820 he was sent to Shaftesbury as supply for his father, Rev. George Button. The following year he went to Witten — his first appointment by Conference. In 1846 he was sent to Oxford, and in 1847 was made chairman of the district. In 1850 he became supernumerary; and on May 26, 1873, he died at Wimborne.
He stood high in the estimation of his brethren. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1873, p. 39.

Buttress, a projection from a wall to create additional strength and support. Buttresses, properly so called, are not used in Classical architecture, as the projections are formed into pilasters, antae, or some other feature in the general arrangement, so as to disguise or destroy the appearance of strength and support. Norman buttresses, es-specially in the earlier part of the style, are generally of considerable breadth and very small projection, and add so little to the substance of the wall that it may be supposed they were used at least as much for ornament as for support. They are commonly not divided into stages, but con-continue of the same breadth and thickness from the ground to the top, and either die into the wall with a slope immediately below the parapet, or are continued up to the parapet, which frequently overhangs the perpendicular face of the wall as much as the buttresses project in order to receive them, as at the nave of Southwell Minster.
Occasionally small shafts are lish), cir. 1200.

worked on the angles of Norman buttresses, but these generally indicate that the work is late.

Early English buttresses have usually considerably less breadth and much greater projection than the Norman, and often stand out very boldly. They are sometimes continued throughout their whole height without any diminution, but are often broken into stages with a successive reduction in their projection, and not usually in their width also, in each; the sets-off dividing the stages are generally sloped at a very acute angle; the buttresses terminate at the top either with a plain slope dying into the wall, or with a triangular head (or pediment) which sometimes stands against the parapet, sometimes below it, and sometimes rises above it, producing something of the effect of a pinnacle, as at Salisbury.
The buttresses at the angles of buildings in the Early English style usually consist either of a pair, one standing on each side of the angle, or of one large square buttress entirely covering the angle, and this is sometimes surmounted by a pinnacle. Pinnacles on buttresses of other kinds in this style are very rare, and are indications that the work is late.
The angles of Early English buttresses are very commonly cham-ered off, and are occasionally moulded:
with this style flying or arch buttresses seem first to have been used, but they did not become common till a subsequent period.

In the Decorated style the buttresses are almost invariably worked in stages, and are very often ornamented, frequently with niches, with crocketed canopies, and other carved decorations; and they are very commonly, in large buildings, terminate in pinnacles, which are sometimes
of open work, forming niches or canopies for statues.
With the introduction of this style the angle buttresses began to be set diagonally.

In the Perpendicular style, the buttresses differ but little in general form and arrangement from the Decorated; but the ornaments of the buttresses in each of the styles partook of the prevailing character of the architecture, and varied with it. Thus in the latter specimens of the 15th century they

Butts, Joshua, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Stowe, Vt., April 26, 1804. His early education was received in the common schools of his native place. He never entered or graduated from any college. He placed himself as a candidate for the ministry under the care of the Baltimore Presbytery. In 1832 he entered Princeton Seminary, from which he graduated in 1835. For the next five years he was engaged as a supply to churches in the neighborhood of Baltimore. He was ordained and installed pastor of the Carmel Church, N.Y., by the Presbytery of Bedford, June 8, 1841. After serving this Church one year, he engaged to supply the Church at Yorkville, near New York city, and was installed its pastor in 1848 by the Presbytery of N.Y.; labored here diligently and successfully until 1852, when he resigned and went to California. While he supplied the Church of Brooklyn, and afterwards resided at Placerville, Cal., until 1858, when he returned to Yorkville. After the breaking-out of the civil war he accepted the chaplaincy of the 47th Regiment N.Y. volunteers, serving from 1861 to 1865. He died at Chapaqua, N.Y., Feb. 27, 1881. He was under fire in about thirty battles, but never wounded. He was much loved by the soldiers, and faithful in the discharge of his duties. See Necrological Report of Princeton Theol. Sem., 1881, p. 48. (W. P. S.)

Butts, Robert, D.D., an English prelate, became dean of Norwich in February, 1731, and was consecrated bishop of that see Feb. 25, 1733. He was translated to the see of Ely, May 25, 1738; and died at Ely House, Holborn, Jan. 26, 1748. He published a Sermon on the Accession (1732) — Sermon before the House of Lords (1737) — Charge to his Clergy (1740). See Le Neve, Fasti: Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Butstedt, Johann Andreas, a German Lutheran doctor and professor of theology, was born Sept. 19, 1701, at Kirchheim. He studied at Jena; in 1741 appointed director of the gymnasium at Hildesheim, in 1745 director at Gieta, and in 1751 at Coburg. In 1752 he took his degree as doctor of divinity, and in 1763 was appointed professor of theology at Erlangen, where he died, March 14, 1765. He wrote Die Notwendigkeit der Geheimnisse in der wahren Religion aus der Vernunft bewiesen (Leipsic, 1780) — Vernünftige Gedanken über die Natur Gottes (ibid. 1736) — über die Schöpfung der Welt (Wittenbittel, 1787) — über die Schöpfung der Menschen (Leipsic, 1738) — Specimen Philosophiae s. a. Buy (or Bhus), Félix, a French Carmelite, was born at Lyons about 1657. He began his studies at Chalons and Valence, and finished them at Paris, where he gained some notoriety by a thesis on the Gallic Church. He wrote a small work entitled Histoire des Quatre Ordres de Prémontrés (Paris, 2 vols. 12mo). See Hoefer, Novum Biog. Generale, s. v.

Buya. See Buckr.

Buza ("Natives") was the third great caste of the Medes; the Buzi of the Greek historians.

Buzacott, Aaron (1), an English Congregational minister, was born at South Molton, Devon, March 4, 1800, where he was converted in early life and joined the Independent Church. In 1823 he entered Hoxton Academy, and in 1825 offered his services to the London Missionary Society, and was sent to finish his curriculum at the missionary college, Gosport. He left England in 1827, and arrived safely at Avarua, Raratonga, where he began his labors as teacher, preacher, translator, and printer. Mr. Buzacott found the natives of Raratonga, in 1827, without a written language; and in 1846 he had translated the whole Bible, and written several useful works in the native tongue. Between 1846 and 1852 he travelled in England to recruit his health; meanwhile publishing his Raratonga Bible, and advocating the cause of missions. He then returned to his adopted home with five thousand copies of the Bible, a gift of the Bible Society to the natives. He now resumed his work, both as minister of a large congregation, and as tutor of the Institution for Training Native Christian teachers and evangelists. The climate and his incessant labors compelled him to retire to Sidney in 1858, where he continued to reside till his death, Sept. 19, 1864. See (London) Cong. Year-book, 1865, p. 229.

Buzacott, Aaron (2), an English Congregational minister, was born at Tahiti, South Sea Islands, Oct. 19, 1857, where his parents tarried for a short time on their voyage to the mission field of Raratonga. He remained with his parents until his twelfth year, when he was sent for instruction to Sydney, New South Wales. Thence he came to England, and was placed in the mission-school at Walthamstow, where he was converted, and began to labor for the salvation of others. Having chosen the missionary work, he studied with the Rev. W. Legge, of Fakenham, Norfolk; then at Chestunt College; afterwards at New College. Being impressed that his duty was not in the mission field, he accepted the charge of the Church at Debenham, Norfolk, and then at Fetter-lane, London, each for one year. He was ordained at Long Sutton, Lincolnshire, June 19, 1856, and six years afterwards he removed to Romford, in Essex. In May, 1864, he became pastor of the Prestonville-road chapel; and, in 1868, at Asylum-road, Peckham. He was secretary of the Congregational Union of Surrey for three years, and of the Anti-slavery Society for four years. He died Oct. 9, 1881. See (London) Cong. Year-book, 1884, p. 287.
BUZANVAL, NICOLAS (surmised Chorati or Chickenari de), a French prelate, was born at Paris, Dec. 21, 1614. After passing through several civil dignities, he entered orders, and was promoted to the bishopric of Beauvais, in which office he distinguished himself by establishing hospitals and a clerical school. He died July 21, 1679. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

BUZETTI, VINCENZO BENEDETTO, an Italian theologian, was born at Piacenza, April 29, 1777. He studied at the college Alberoni, and taught philosophy and theology in his native city. He died there Dec. 14, 1824. He wrote a number of religious works, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

BUZZELL, AARON, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Barrington, N. H., November, 1764. He was converted at the age of twenty-five, and soon after he began to speak in public, and, with his brother John, travelled and labored for seven years. His first effort at preaching was at Alton. His ordinance occurred at the October term of the New Durham Quarterly Meeting, 1794. Subsequently he travelled very extensively in Maine, New Hampshire, and Vermont, where his labors were greatly blessed. He resided and assisted in organizing many churches, and baptized more than one thousand persons. He was held in high esteem in Strafford, Vt., his residence of more than half a century, where he died, in October, 1854. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1856, p. 90. (J. C. S.)

BUZSELL, HEZEKIAH, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Alton, N. H., Dec. 16, 1777. Shortly after he was ordained in 1793, he became pastor of a very prosperous church, and was ordained Jan. 25, 1803. For fifty years he served his Master in the ministry of the Gospel. A large part of his life was spent in itinerant labor, in which he was very useful. He resided for a time in Weare and then in Gilmanton, and other places in his neighborhood, and finally closed his labors in the church of Alton. For several years he was a member of the state legislature, either of the House of Representatives or the Senate. He died Sept. 6, 1858. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1860, p. 90. (J. C. S.)

BUZZELL, JOHN, a Baptist minister, was born in Barrington, N. H., Sept. 16, 1766. His early youth was devoted to teaching. He was converted in the winter of 1785-86, and was ordained at Middleton, Oct. 25, 1792. Having identified himself with the Free-will Baptist denomination, he entered zealously into the work of establishing new churches, and strengthening those already formed in different sections of New England. He became pastor at Parsonsfield, Me., in the spring of 1797. He was married Feb. 29, 1809, and made a very advanced age. His services were in constant demand to promote the interests of his denomination. For several years he was president of their Foreign Missionary Society. He also, by correspondence, brought his denomination into fraternal relations with the General Baptists of England. He was a prime mover in the establishment of the Parsonsfield Seminary. He was noted as an author and a vigorous writer. In 1811 he commenced the publication of a religious magazine, and for several years it made most serviceable in promoting the interests of his denomination. In 1823 he published the first denominational hymn-book, and was one of the association which established the Morning Star, of which paper he was for several years one of the editors. See Barrett, Memoirs of Eminent Preachers. (J. C. S.)

BUZSELL, WILLIAM, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born in Middleton, N. H., in 1775. He made a public profession of his faith Oct. 17, 1798, and very soon began to speak as a teacher of religion, but was not regularly set apart to the work of the ministry until the autumn of 1804. He exercised his ministry in his native town, laboring especially in revivals there in 1807, 1808, 1812, and 1815. The Church was unable to do much for his temporal support, and he was therefore obliged to resort to secular pursuits. The section of Newbury in which he lived was very populous, and the community called on him for ministerial services, and the constant calls he received took him so much from his daily work that he was often brought into great straits. Besides preaching in his native town, he also supplied pulpits in Woburn, New Durham, Acton, Me., and some other places. He labored on amid many discouragements until the fall of 1841, when his appointment was terminated by his death on June 14, 1844. See Morning Star, xix, 42. (J. C. S.)

BYAM, HENRY, D.D., a learned English divine, was born at East Luckham, near Dunster, in Somersetshire, Aug. 31, 1808. He was educated at Exeter College and Christ Church, Oxford. In 1812 he obtained the rectorcy of Luckham and that of Salworthy adjoining. In 1818 he became a prebendary of Exeter, and the meeting of parliament was unanimously chosen by the clergy of his diocese to be their clerk in convocation. He was a firm adherent of the royal family in the Rebellion, and suffered the loss of all his property on that account. During the exile of the prince Dr. Byam officiated as his chaplain, first in the island of Scilly, and afterwards in that of Jersey, until the garrison was captured by Cromwell's forces. At the Restoration he was made canonic of Exeter, and prebendary of Wells. He died June 16, 1669. His works consisted of Thirteen Sermons (Lond. 1675), most of them preached before his majesty. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

BYARS, WESLEY S., a Baptist minister, was born in Greenville County, N.C., Feb. 18, 1825. He removed in 1829 to Henry County, Tenn., and in 1831 to Haywood County. He united with the Church in October, 1842. After residing in one or two places during the next few years, he returned to Haywood County, and was ordained Dec. 19, 1854. He was pastor of united number of churches in Tennessee during his ministry, among which were Friendship, Miller's Chapel, and Providence. He died in Friendship, Crockett Co., April 29, 1875. See Borum, Sketches of Tennessee Ministers, p. 79. (J. C. S.)

BYE ALTAR (or Tables), as called by bishop Ridley, probably designate minor or secondary altars, in distinction from the high-altar; but in the primitive Church there were two tables, one for holding the vestments, on the right side, and the other on the left, for the vessels; and so the term may indicate a crenence.

BYER, WILLIAM C., a Free-will Baptist minister, was born in Eaton, N. Y., in April, 1814. His father was a blacksmith, and his son, spending most of his time at the anvil in the early part of his life, was enabled but limited advantages for acquiring an education. His conversion took place under the labors of the Methodists, and he was licensed as a preacher in that denomination in 1839. He united with the Free-will Baptists, and was ordained as a minister in 1842. He was very successful as a laborer in revivals, and during his ministry baptized not far from five hundred converts. In the spring of 1866 he had a stroke of paralysis, and afterwards another, of which he died, at Fabius, N. Y., Oct. 30, 1869. Although compelled to spend much of his time in manual labor for the support of his family, Mr. Byer was an earnest and successful preacher. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1870, p. 75. (J. C. S.)

BYERS, JAMES, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Annan, Scotland, Sept. 25, 1816. In 1837 he graduated from Pictou College, after which four years were spent in teaching in the province of New Brunswick. He studied theology at Pictou, under Rev. Thomas McCulloch, D.D., but in 1844 he graduated from the class of Princeton Seminary, and spent one year. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Truro, in Nova Scotia, Oct. 5, 1842; was ordained by the same Presbytery in 1845, and installed pastor of Shelburne Church, where he served seven years, and next became pastor at Talamagouche. His third and last charge was at Clifton, N. S., where he was installed in 1860, and labored eighteen years. He died May 21, 1879. He was a man of unswerving fidelity to the cause of his Redeemer, and a very successful minister. See Necrological Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1880.

Byfield, ADONIRAM, a zealous "commonwealth man," satirized by Hudibras, was the son of Rev. Nichol. Byfield. He was educated at Cambridge, became an army chaplain in 1642, and was one of the scribes of the Westminster Assembly. After some years as rector in Middlesex and Wiltshire, he died in 1660. He is chiefly known from his controversial tracts, entitled The Grand Debate between Presbytery and Independency (London, 1650).

Byington, CYRUS, a Congregational minister, was born in Massachusetts, and graduated from Andover Theological Seminary in 1819. He was agent for the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, 1819-20, and went as a missionary to the Chocow Indians in 1820. He was ordained Oct. 4, 1827, and died at Belpre, O., Dec. 31, 1866, aged seventy-six years. See Gen. Cal. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 37.

Byington, M. N., a Universalist minister, appears to have entered the ministry in 1843, in the vicinity of Cincinnati, O. About 1848 he removed to Miller's settlement, near Oxford, O.; and afterwards labored widely in other Western States. He died at Batom Rouge, La., Feb. 1873. Mr. Byington was widely known as an earnest and zealous preacher. See Universalis Register, 1874, p. 116.

Byles, MATHEW, D.D., a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, son of Mather Byles, D.D., of the Hollis-street Church, Boston, was born in that city in 1754. He graduated from Harvard College in 1761; was settled as a Congregational clergyman, Nov. 18, 1757, in North London, Conn.; was dismissed in 1768, having become an Episcopalian. The same year he became rector of Christ Church, Boston, where he served until April, 1775, when he accepted an invitation to become rector in Portsmouth, N. H. In 1776, owing, doubtless, to his strong loyalty to the king, he left the country and went to Halifax, N. S., and in 1778 he was banished from the American colonies. After the war he became rector and chaplain at St. John's, N. B. He died March 12, 1814. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 379.

Bylgius (storm of the sea), in Norse mythology, is one of the nine maidens of the waves, the daughters of the marine god Angir and Ran.

Bynum, GEORGE C., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Chatham County, N. C., Nov. 15, 1847. He was eminently pious in youth, received license to preach in 1866, and in 1867 entered the North Carolina Conference. In its active ranks he toiled until his death, July 11, 1871. Mr. Bynum was a successful and promising preacher, full of faith and good deeds. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1871, p. 541.

Byram, ELIAB, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Bridgewater, Mass., and graduated at Harvard University in 1740. He became pastor at Rosticanus (now Mendham), N. J., in October, 1743. Brainerd had him for his companion in his first journey to the Susquehanna, and spoke of him with much affection. Byram spent some time in 1746 in Augusta County, and his labors were greatly blessed, the revival lasting till 1751. Falling Spring and Providence called him in 1747, having had experience of his faithfulness and ability, but he declined to settle in Virginia. He joined the New Brunswick Presbytery, May 22, 1751, and accepted a call to Amwell. He died before May, 1751. (A. W. P. S.).

Byrche, WILLIAM, D.D., LL.D., an English clergyman, was chaplain to the archbishop of Canterbury; became prebendary of Worcester, Oct. 31, 1727, and died in February, 1742. He published a sermon on the consecration of Bishop Chandler (1737). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Le Neve, Fasti, iii, 88.

Byrchington, STEPHEN, an English Benedictine, was born in the parish of Byrchington, Isle of Thanet, and flourished about 1380. He was a monk of Christ's Church, Canterbury. He wrote Historia de Vitis Archi- episcoporum Cantuariensium, from St. Augustine, A.D. 297, to A.D. 1236, A.D. 1238; and a Life of Simon Sudbury, given by Wharton, Anglia Sacra, i, 49. See Cave, Hist. Lit., vol. ii.

Byrd, JOHN IRA ELLIS, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Sumter District, S. C., May 15, 1791. He was left fatherless when ten years old, and was apprenticed to a shoemaker. He was converted in 1810, and in 1811 entered the South Carolina Conference, in which he labored two years, and then was transferred to the Mississippi Conference. In its ranks he served for fifty-nine years. He died April 6, 1871. By his own exertions he became well-read and a powerful preacher. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1871, p. 578.

Byrd, REBECCA, an English minister of the Society of Friends, was wife of William Byrd, and made her first appearance in the ministry in 1784, in the twenty-sixth year of her age, having been converted two years previously. Soon after, she was engaged to travel abroad, and accompanied Deborah Darby in a visit to Wales. From that time until the death of Deborah, in 1810, they were employed, with little intermission, in the same service in various parts of Great Britain. In 1788 they were engaged for North America, and continued to labor in this country for three years. In 1800 she was married, and, after the decease of Deborah Darby, her husband accompanied her throughout England, Scotland, and Ireland. While attending the Yearly Meeting of 1829 she suffered from an attack of apoplexy, which restored that portion of the body only afterwards ministered in her own meeting at Marnhull. She died May 24, 1834. See The Friend, viii, 357.

Byrd, WILLIAM (1), an English minister of the Society of Friends, was born at Uffculme, Devonshire, in 1735. He was converted when about twenty-two years of age, and entered the ministry in 1734. He was "sound in doctrine, and his ministry was exercised in simplicity, and with an earnestness of the Spirit and grace." For conscientious reasons he abstained from the use of the produce of West India slavery. His ministry for several years was confined within the limits of Devonshire and parts adjacent, but afterwards he travelled in England, Ireland, and to the Orkney Islands. Catholic in his aims, he was a "lover of good order, and a supporter of the denomination, and of enlarged charity and liberal views." He died Dec. 16, 1835. See Testimonies of Deceased Ministers, 1836, p. 3-16. (J. C. S.).

Byrd (or Bird), WILLIAM (2), an eminent English composer of sacred music, was born about 1588. He studied under Tallis, and was chosen organist of Lincoln cathedral, in 1599. He was made a gentleman of the chapel royal in 1609, and organist of the chapel of the household five years later. He died July 21, 1623. His compositions were very numerous. See Lowndes, Bibliographer's Manual; Burney, History of Music; Grove, Dict. of Music, s. v.

Byrde (or Berde), JOHN D.D., an English prelate, was a native of Coventry, and was consecrated bishop of Peterborough June 28, 1537. He was elected to the see of Bangor, July 24, 1539. He became the first bishop of Chester by the charter of erection, and made his profession of obedience to the archbishop of York. April 13, 1542. He obtained, at the same time, the archdeaconries of Chester and Richmond. He was deprived of his dignities in the first year of the reign of queen Mary (1554), on account of his being married.

Byrde was born 1556. He published Lectures on the Epis-

Byrgir, a Norse mythology, was a well to which Bly and Hike went to get water, when they were stolen by the moon and placed among the stars.

Byrisk, William A., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Marion County, Ind., Nov. 4, 1838. He went to Iowa in his youth; joined the Church in 1855; studied for the ministry at the Iowa Wesleyan University; and in 1860 received license to preach and entered the Iowa Conference. He died July 2, 1882.

Byrisk was a young man of promise. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1863, p. 155.

Byrne, Alexander Sturgeon, a precocious Methodist minister in Canada, grandson of Rev. Alexander Sturgeon (Irish Conference), and son of Rev. Claudius Byrne (Irish and Canada Conferences), was born at Dungannon, Ireland, June 20, 1832. He was converted at thirteen, and was led by a train of providences, almost immediately after his conversion, to exercise his gifts in public, which were of such an extraordinary character as to open his way, when not more than fifteen years of age, into many of the first pulpits of the Irish connection. In the winter of 1849-50 he came to the United States, accompanied by his father to Canada. He was at once received into the ministry in that country; preached in Toronto and London; made an extraordinary impression; but was cut down at Brantford, Ont., Feb. 11, 1851. Young Byrne's character was a rare combination of dignity and modesty, fidelity, forbearance, prudence, zeal, gravity, and meekness; a most faultless religious character, an eloquent and searching preacher. Few have enjoyed so much popularity, and few have been so little affected by it. See Carroll, Life and Remains of Rev. A. S. Byrne (Toronto, 1852, 12mo); Case and His Contemporaries, v, 48, 94.

Byrne, Claudius, a Wesleyan Methodist minister in Ireland, was born in Dublin, Ireland, May 12, 1783. He was converted in his thirteenth year; entered the Wesleyan ministry in Ireland in 1824; was transferred from the Irish to the Canadian branch of the Wesleyan Church in 1848; and in the latter he labored effectually six years, and twenty-two as a superintendent. He died Oct. 5, 1876, at Fairfield, Ont., where he had lived since 1854. He was a vigorous, pithy preacher, and most diligent in that service of love—visiting the sick. See Minutes of the London (Ont.) Conference (Toronto, 1877, p. 12.

Byrne, Edmund, D.D., an Irish primate, having received orders at Seville, was appointed archbishop of Dublin in 1783, to which in 1793 he was translated. Soon after his promotion to the see of Dublin, it was proposed that a public convention of Protestant and Catholic prelates and doctors should be held for two months to propound and debate on the disputed articles of faith; on which occasion this primate alone of all the Catholics attended the conferences; and with much zeal and wisdom propounded the principles of his religion in the public college of Dublin. In 1792, some nuns obtained permission from Dr. Byrne to be received into his diocese, but they had scarcely arrived when they were apprehended by the lords justices; and a proclamation was issued Sept. 20 of the same year, to apprehend Dr. Byrne and others as piously priests attempting to exercise ecclesiastical jurisdiction contrary to the laws of the kingdom. In March, 1797, when the Dominican nuns were driven from Galway, Hugh O'Callan, then provincial of the Order of the Dominicans, obtained a similar permission from archbishop Byrne for their admission into his diocese, where, in September of the same year, they founded the Convent of Jesus, Mary, and Joseph, of Dublin. Just at this time Dr. Byrne was involved in a controversy with his brother-prelate of Armagh, Dr. M'Mahon, on the ancient primatial rights. The matter was referred to the College of the Propaganda, whose decision, after a litigation of some years, restored the sees. This subject was, however, again more fully discussed and solemnly laid before the pope in council, when the claim of archbishop Byrne was supported in argument by the Rev. John Clynoch, one of the clergymen of his grace's diocese. The final decision of the Roman college has not been ascertained. Dr. Byrne died a few years afterwards. See D'Alton, Memoirs of the Archbishops of Dublin, p. 499.

Byrne, James T., an English Congregational minister, was born in London, Jan. 29, 1810. He was converted and joined the Church in early life; was ordained in 1838 at Great Yarmouth; settled at Gorleston, Norfolk; and later, in the same year, sailed for Canada, under the auspices of the Colonial Missionary Society. He first settled at L'Original, on the Ottawa river, then at Bytown, now Ottawa City; and subsequently at Brockville, whence he removed to Whitby, commencing his stated ministry in that place in October, 1851. On terminating his pastorate at Whitby, he accepted an invitation from the French Canadian Missionary Society to become their agent, to preach and lecture wherever he could find a house, and in that capacity continued his great zeal until his death, Nov. 21, 1874. In this excellent man society lost a sweet example, and religion a bright ornament. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1876, p. 320.

Byrne, Martin, a Baptist minister, was born at Robinstown, Me., in February, 1811. He was converted at twenty-two; pursued his theological studies at Bangor and at Newton, where he graduated in 1840. He was ordained at Packerville, Conn., June 29, 1842. Subsequently he was pastor of churches in Pembroke, Ellsworth, Conway, and Gardiner, in Maine. For a time he was agent for the American and Foreign Bible Society, and the Young Ladies' College, Westfield, Mass. He removed to Pekin, Ill., in 1857, and was settled pastor of the church in Pekin; and had charge, at the same time, of the church at La Marsh. He died at Pekin Sept. 19, 1858. See Minutes of Ill. Annual Conferences, 1858, p. 9. (J. G. S.)

Byrne, William, an English engraver, was born in London in 1748, and was instructed by his uncle, an obscure artist. In 1770 he went to Paris, and became a scholar of Ailami. The following are some of his principal plates: The Flight into Egypt; Abraham and Lot Quitting Egypt; A Sea-piece; The Death of Captain Cook. He died in London in 1805. See Spooner, Bibl. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Rose, Gen. Bibl. Dict. s. v.

Byron, James M'Kee, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Downton, Ireland, July 25, 1776. In 1785 he was licensed to preach by Mr. West, in the same year entered the ministry, and appointed to Norwich. His circuits afterwards were Kent, Northampton, Penzance, Bradford, Salisbury (1797), Truro, Lancasten, and many others. In 1823 he went to France as a superintendent, where he died, Sept. 24, 1827. Byron possessed powers of a high order for public oratory; his mind was well stored with learning; and his ministry was eminently useful. He was faithful, forgiving, generous, and benevolent. See Weal. Meth. Mfr., 1829, p. 577; Minutes of the British Conference, 1826.

Byrillus. See Birus.

Bytemeister, Heinrich Johann, a Lutheran minister of Germany, was born at Zell in 1698. He was appointed in 1749 professor of theology at Helmstadt, where he died in 1746. He composed a number of works in Latin, the most important of which are two on arithmetic and numeristics (Strasburg: 1744).

Bythway, William, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Dudley in 1736. He was converted in his sixteenth year; called into the ministry in 1824; retired in 1864 to Manchester; in 1863 to Didsbury, where he died, in September, 1874. Bythway was esteemed for his sound judgment, integrity, and piety. His character was transparent and well balanced. His preaching was racy, sensible, and practical. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1875, p. 12.

Bywater, Alfred, a young English Methodist preacher, was born at Sheffield in 1809, and was converted in early life. He became a local preacher; but in 1836 began to itinerate in the New Connection. Two years sufficed to break down his health; he returned to Sheffield, hoping to recover, that he might again preach the Gospel, but his work was done. He died March 4, 1839, a probationer. See Minutes of the British Conference.

Byzance, Louis de, a native of Constantinople, originally a Jew named Raphael Levi, embraced Christianity, and became a priest of the Oratory. He settled in Paris, and became famous for his interest in Oriental manuscripts of the New Testament. He was also an able mathematician. He died in 1722, after twenty years' insanity.

Byzantine Architecture is a name for the style of architecture introduced at Byzantium in the 6th century, derived from the Roman, but distinguished from it by the plans of the buildings, and by the general use of the dome or cupola. The plan of the Greek or Byzantine churches was usually that of the Greek cross, with a large cupola rising from the centre. The smaller cupolas crown the four arms. The arches were generally semicircular, sometimes segmental, or of the shoe-form. The capitals of columns were little more than square blocks, tapering downwards, and adorned with foliage or basket-work. The doorways were commonly square-headed, with a semicircular, and occasionally, in later specimens, a pointed arch over the flat lintel. The Byzantine style had great influence on subsequent styles, both in England and on the Continent. The Gothic styles are derived quite as much from this as from the Roman.

This style prevailed through Christian Asia and Africa, and extended to Sicily. It was the modification of Roman architecture by an Eastern element. There were four periods of the art: (1) 330–557—rock churches, and round or octagonal churches; (ii) 537–1000—marked by the multiplication of domes and polygonal apses; (iii) 1009–1453—when the narthex became less prominent, and choirs were made more important; frescoes were replaced by mosaics; the women's galleries, hitherto erected over the aisles and narthex, disappeared; and the entire form of the basilica, with apsidal ends to the transept, and the cross of four equal arms, with a dome over the cross.

The style penetrated to Provence, through commercial relations between Marseilles (Greece, and Constantinople, and thence to the north and centre of France; and also to the banks of the Rhine, under the patronage of Charlemagne. The dome took the place of the Western vault, as most suited to a circular building; and, to Procopius, poetically seemed to be suspended from the vault of heaven. The whole style combined the basilica with the round church of the Holy Sepulchre of Jerusalem. Like the basilica, the Eastern church had its colonnaded atrium, or forecourt (peribolos), the narthex (propyla, pronaos), or advanced portico; galleries for women over the aisles of the nave or transept; the chora campanist, known as the solea—the presbytery was in it; the holy bema, a raised stage, so called from its steps, or hieraetion, or hagion; and the sacristies (pastophoria) here called the parapetron, or prothesis, on the north, and the skeupophylakion, or diaconicon minus, on the south. Over the bema of the readers, which assembled the basilica ambon, rose the royal door. There was only a single altar, but in some cases parecclesiae, or side churches for daily services, with altars were added; the chancel screen was called, from its pictures, the iconostasis, with its central door curtained, and two lateral doors: the kiklos occupied the place of the podium; over the altarrose the dove, or pelicanus; and above the holy, which were veiled, between the bema and solea: the royal, between the sola and nave; the angelic, between the nave and narthex; and the beautiful, great, or silver, between the narthex and anterior porch (prothyrum). The influence of the style is seen in the cupolas of Russia; those of France, introduced by Venetian colonists and commerce; the ornamentation of capitals, the polygonal apses, and round churches of Western Christendom. A stream of Italian art came to the south and south-west of France, and there moved northward in course of gradual development, and also spread down the Rhine, and from the Rhine spread to the north, influencing the borders of France—the two developments meeting in the Île de France, as they had previously been combined at Torcello. The Byzantine modification of the basilica in Italy received a new form in Rhineland and again in France: and the turreted-like treatment of steeples, the high triforium, and low central lantern, became common features.

Byzantine Historians, The. I. General Classification.—This is the name habitually, but inaccurately, applied to the long succession of authors, of diverse merit, but of equal claim, who record the history of the course of the Roman empire in the East, from the accession of Constantine till after the conquest of Constantine by the Ottomans. By some authorities, the term is restricted to the writers subsequent to the accession of Justinian. It is a loose name, and there is least hazard of misapprehension in its widest employment. The designation has been bestowed upon those writers by modern editors, who have associated their works in grand collections, under the title of Corpus Scriptorum Historiarum Byzantinorum, in consonance with the convenient appellation given to the biographers of the emperors from Hadrian to Diocletian, and who are known as the Scriptores Historiae Augusta. The association of the titles, and the distinction of the collections, are principally due to the general similarity of design and the difference of the languages employed by the respective authors. The Byzantine and the Augustan historians alike record the reigns of the Roman emperors; but the latter are a separate work, in Latin, both almost exclusively in Greek, and the empire of the West is not distinctly contemplated by them. Yet even this ground of discrimination is, in some degree, deceptive. Claudian and Ammianus Marcellinus are excluded from the Byzantines. Both write in Latin. The former is occupied with the Western emperor, Honorius: but his diatribes on Rhusus and Eutropius throw much light upon contemporaneous affairs in the East. The latter treats mainly upon Eastern transactions, but the earlier part takes in the previous series of emperors. But Merobaudes and Corippus, who are Latin poets, like Claudian, are admitted into the Catena Byzantina, though Merobaudes devotes himself to a Western hero. Eusebius is scarcely included in the fraternity, though he writes in Greek, and has left a Life of Constantine. Zonimus embraced the entire history of the imperial rule down to his own day. The exclusion of Claudian and Ammianus Marcellinus is to be explained, not by the Occidental character of the one, nor by the Latin phrase of both, but by the existence of critical and annotated editions of each author, which dispensed with the necessity of a repetition of the collection in such an extensive work so as to make it may never be fully completed. The same reason may be assigned for the omission of Eusebius.

Thus the term Byzantine Historians is unavoidably indistinct and wavering. It has been determined by the compass of the collections, not by any definite principle beyond the requirement that the subject-matter of the accepted treaties should be connected with the story, the institutions, or the characteristics of the empire of the East. Many of these writers, like the monastic chroniclers of the West, begin with the creation of the world, and either write brief annals of the generations, or tell the story of one or more successive or recent history. Many of the writers are of the priestly caste, or are inclined to theological disputation. Thus, they often notice, with peculiar diligence, the succession and years of the patriarchs, and plunge with zest into religious controversies; but professedly ecclesiastical history does not fall within the scope of these collections, though we find in the Bonn edition the Historia Patriarchica Constantinopolitana. Several treaties, too, not formally historical, are admitted. Provision is made for such comprehension by the title attached—"The Body of Byzantine Writers." All render important service to the historical appreciation of the times and countries.

Notwithstanding the heavy expenditure by Louis XIV on the first edition of this great Corpus Scriptorum— notwithstanding the vast and various labor of Du Cange, Labbé, Possinus, Bandurri, Niebuhr, and others— the compositions of Paris, Venice, and Bonn—this long series of writers has been little regarded, until very recent times, except by professed historians of the empire, like Cousin, Münztor, Gibbon, Le Beau, and Finlay. Yet they merit wider and closer consideration. They have an interest and a value of their own, quite unappreciated from one period to another. Nowhere else do the records, of the world present twelve centuries of continuous history, written, in great measure, by contemporaries, with fulness and discernment. Nowhere else do we find such various illustrations of the political, social, military, and ecclesiastical life of one organic system. Nowhere else is it possible to study the processes of natural decline and deceptitude, and the change from bad to worse, from worse to worse still, in so many and in such minute particulars. Nowhere else are the phenomena of the internal and of the external dissolution of a civilization presented in so many aspects, and in such diversified detail. Nowhere else are the authorities of high or lower rank, or more intimately associated with the events described. Nowhere else are incidents more startling, more strange, or of more romantic character accumulated, than in the obscure pages of these unlettered writers. These circumstances may have enhanced the recently resuscitated interest in these little-read authors, which has so marked of late years, especially in Germany. These attractions have been the rewards of increased study, not incitements to it. The true cause of renewed regard may be assigned to the growing gravity of the perilous and perplexed Eastern question, which has drawn the eyes of all to the beautiful city on the Golden Horn, and to the remnants of the vast empire of which it is the capital. The expiring agonies of a mighty system, which only two centuries ago was the terror of Christendom, and which, at the time of the discovery of America, threatened to obtain universal dominion, possess a portentous fascination for the student of human affairs. Exactly the same mortal change pursued its languid course a thousand years ago, in the fall of the Roman Empire, and the similar influences. The best commentary upon the morbid conditions now prevailing, and the clearest insight into their progress and tendency, may be derived from the phenomena of the earlier age. Hence, partly by conscious determination, mainly by that curious instinct which the vicissitudes of the ages, an earnest and rapidly growing attention has been attracted to the Byzantine historians.

Under this name are included several distinct classes of writers, and some who cannot be reduced to any class. About one half are systematic historians; others are meager annalists; some are simple chroniclers. There are biographers, and memoir writers, and panegyrists. Some describe edifices, ceremonies, or institutions. There is a reporter of scandals and tattle. A few note only a single transaction. Many dischge more than one of these functions. Among the authors are emperors, as Constantine Porphyrogenitus and Justinian; confessors, as John of Damascus; monks, as Germanus of Constantinople; members of imperial houses, as Anna Comnena and Ducas; patriarchs and bishops, as Photius and Eustathius; statesmen and diplomats, as Georgius Pachymeres and Nicephorus Gregorius; high officials and legists, as Georgius Codinus and Joannes Lydus; and secretaries, as Procopius and Joannes Cinnamus. Logical classification of such a promiscuous assemblage of ranks, vocations, and topics is impossible. The members are accidentally brought together, and are connected by community of country and purpose—not by similarity of subject or treatment. Relation to the life of the Byzantine empire is the only intrinsic connection. In style they differ widely from each other, passing from the semi-Attic propriety of Procopius and Agathias to the Latinism of Theophanes, the extravagant rhetoric of Anna Comnena, the dense obscurity of Nicephorus Gregorius, the neologisms of Ducas and Phrantzes, and the utter corruption of the Historia Varia of the Patriarch Photius. According to the prevailing tongues and fashions of more than thirty generations. In despite, however, of multitudinous discrepancies, a serviceable arrangement of these works may be proposed.

The Byzantine writers are over seventy in number. Several of them have not been published, or have been published only in part. Critobulus' work is given over to the public by Müller, in his Fragmenta Historiorum Graecorum, as late as 1869. They may be divided into two great classes, the miscellaneous writers and the historical writers. The subjects treated by the former are various and distinct. We have treatises by Constantine Porphyrogenitus on the conduct of the empire, on ceremonials, and on the provinces; by Nicephorus Gregorius on the statues, pictures, etc., destroyed by the Franks of the fourth crusade; by Lydus, on magistrates; by Codinus Curopolata, on officials; by Procopius, on public buildings; by Paulus Silentiarius, Descriptio Sanctae Sophiae. It is much to be regretted that the biograph of the emperor Alexius I, on the finances of the empire, has not yet been edited.

The most important and instructive of these writings are Joannes Lydus on magistrates, and Constantine Porphyrogenitus on the conduct of the empire. The one gives a graphic and truthful view of the judicial machinery; the latter, a curious and suggestive account of the relations of the empire, in the 10th century, with surrounding races and contemporaneous states. The trickery, the deception, the meanness, the unblushing fraud which are recommended, reveal conscious imbecility without diminution of arrogance, vanity, and pretension. Strange glimpses, too, are afforded of the condition of rude tribes and incipient kingdoms. The tinsel splendor and empty statelessness of the formal court are illustrated by the same emperor's formulæ of ceremonial, and, at a later date, by the roll of dignities prepared by the grand master of the household, Georgius Codinus.

II. The Historical Writers.—Of these, the earliest in date is Praxagoras; the latest, Critoibus, and the author of the History of the Goths, Ctesias. The work of Praxagoras was composed, as he tells us, in his twenty-second year, and his date is assigned to the reign of Constantine or of his successor. There is only one fragment extant, and that is brief and unimportant. It has not been inserted in the editions of the Byzantine History, but is given in the Fragmen-ta Historiorum Graecorum. Many of the earlier historians, as Dexippus, Priscus Panita, Malchus, exist only in fragmentary form, and gratitude is due to the patriarch Photius and to the emperor Constantine VII for preserving what remains of them. The latest writers of this class extend beyond the duration of the empire, and connect the Roman world with the modern age.

These historians may be conveniently but loosely distributed into three classes: (1) panegyrista; (2) chronicler, chronicographers, and annalists, more or less dry and jejune; (3) historians, general, particular, or incidental, represented respectively by Zonaras, Cinnamus, and Procopius De Bello Gotico.

1. The panegyrista are Merobaudes, who leaves a broken and unintelligible eulogy on Aëtius, and belongs to the Western empire; Procopius and Priscian, on Anaxatasius; and the encomium of Corippus on Justin II, which is a metrical history of that monarch, like the "Robert Guiscard" of William of Apulia.

2. No sharp line of discrimination can be drawn between the chroniclers or chronicographers and the historians proper, for their characteristics are often blended.
The absence of reflection or independent judgment may be made the ground of distinction. The chronicographers are best twenty-five in number, and vary in extent and character. The most important are Georgius Syncellus [see Synceyllus], with the continuation of the Theophanes and his successors, and the Paschal chronicle.

3. Of the historians, properly so named, there are five who conduct the history of the Roman empire from Augustus to the fall of Constantinople. The Turk Agency Zosimus begins with Augustus, and comes down to the taking of Rome by Attila. Zonaras opens with a universal chronicle, but gives a fuller account of events from Constantine to the death of Alexius Comnenus.
Nicetas Choniates continues the story to the Latin con-querr. Nicephorus Gregoras records the transactions during the Chalcocephalic war. Theodorus Gaza includes the tale of a thousand years with the history of the Ottoman Turks, and with their overthrow of the Eastern empire. These are writers of considerable but unequal merit. Zonaras is of especial interest, for the long period which he embraces, for his continuous narrative, for his preservation of details otherwise unknown, for his perspicacity and general intelligence. Zosimus has a distinct philosophical aim—the exposition of the causes inducing the decay of the empire. He is accused of prejudice and malevolence—charges easily brought against a pagan of his day—but he writes clearly, forcbly, and well, and reveals the signs and symptoms of the waning majesty of Rome. Nicetas Choniates, or Acominatus, and Nicephorus Gregoras are clumsy and tedious writers, but they transmit the account of a dismal period of vice, crime, national distress, and revolution. Laonicus Chalcocephalius records in wretched phrase and cursory notices of the Crusades, the rise and the last century and a half of the expiring empire.

A livelier interest attaches to those writers who relate the eventful periods in which they were themselves actors, or with which they were intimately and personally acquainted. Procopius, Constantine Porphyrogen-itus, Nicephorus Bryennius, and his imperial spouse, Anna Comnena, Joannes Cinnamus, Georgius Pech-nymeres, Joannes Cantacuzenus, and Georgius Phrantzes, are the most prominent of these, the scene of action; they were all at the centre of events.
As a historical writer, for style, for vigor, for reach of thought, and for delineation of character, Procopius far surpasses any other Byzantine author. See PROCOPIUS.
There is no exaggeration in designating him the Thucydides of empire, the Fructuosus of history, the Aquinas of Agathias, and further extended by Menander, the Protector. The emperor Constantine Porphyrogenitus, who has contributed in so many ways to our knowledge of Byzantine affairs, is entitled to special regard for his biography of his father, Basil, the founder of the Macedonian dynasty. John and Iliarion, and the manuscript of fragments of the Historia Excerpta of Fabricius and Anna Comnena were connected, not merely by the bonds of matrimony, but also by community of subject. The husband wrote the history of the Commeni till the acquisition of the throne by Alexius I; the wife took up the pious task at her husband's death, and narrates the reign of her father. Both are among the most entertaining writers of the whole series, but a peculiar interest attaches to Anna's Alexiad, from the rank, abilities, and accomplishments of the princess, and from the attractive topics of that notable period. During that reign occurred the invasion of the empire by Robert Guiscard and the Normans; the exciting incidents of the first Crusades; the manifold and perplexing perplexities of the failing empire. See COMNENA, ANNA.
Joannes Cinnamus, a confidential officer of high rank, reports with brevity the career of the right-minded Kalo-Joannes, and with fulness and discretion the chivalrous reign of the heroic, but wayward and disolute, Manuel Comnenus. George Pechnymeres, one of the weightiest and driest of these historians, records the fortunes of the Hellenic empire during the Frank domination, and under the rule of the first Paleologus.
Joannes Cantacuzenus, who himself usurped the imperial sceptre, relates, with partial view, and in intricate and inflated phraseology, but with ingenuity and minute-ness, the vicissitudes of those troublous years of family and civil discord which compelled him to seize and to abdicate the empire. There is a melancholy fascination in the sorrowful narrative of Georgius Phrantzes—a loyal dignitary and a member of the reigning house, who records the history of the Paleologi, and the haz-dards, the dismay, the massacre, our outrage, and ravage which attended the last struggle, and marked the extinction of Roman suzerainty.

In looking over the course of this long and slow dissolution, there are distinct stages in the descent, which arrest regard and repay careful meditation. With these successive stages, the corrupting influences of foreign able changes among other races, promoting a diverse civilization. An acquaintance with the contrasts and reciprocal influences of the contending systems, during the anxious centuries, is only one of the instructive les-tons to be gained from the Byzantine historians, who are thus indispensable for an intelligent appreciation of the forces which have built up the modern world on the crumbling ruins of the old.

III. Literature.—The illustration of the Byzantine writers must be sought in the introductions, prefaces, and commentaries attached to individual authors;
and especially in the treatises and notes of Nicephorus Cassan. The only works of a particular character to be cited here are Hankius, De Byzant. Rerum Script. Graviss. (Leipsic, 1627); Nikolai, in Emsch und Griber's Enzyklopädie
(ibid. 1870), Geschichte der Byzantinischen Literatur. (G.F.H.)

BYZANTIUM, COUNCIL OF (Concilium Byzacensim), provincial council, after A.D. 397.
I. Held A.D. 397, to confirm the canons of the Council of Hippo of A.D. 393. Its synodical letter is in the acts of the Third Council of Carthage of the same year.
397 (Mansi, iii, 875).
II. Held A.D. 507, a numerous council, which insisted on filling up vacant bishoprics, king Thrasamund baring forbidden this in order to extinguish the orthodox Church (Ferrand, Disc. V. Fulgent. xvi.; Labbe iv, 1576-1380).

III. Held A.D. 541, sent a deputation to the emperor Justinian, who, in reply, confirms all the canonical privileges of the metropolitan of Carthage (Dacianus), and of the African primates (Procustis of Justinian to the Council and to Dacianus in Baron. ad an. 541; Labbe, v, 380).

IV. Held A.D. 602, in the cause of Cremnитis, or Clementius, or Clementinus, primate of the province, held at the instigation of Gregory the Great (Epist.

xii, 32), who exhorts the comprovincial bishops to inquire into, and adjudicate upon, certain accusations that were current against their metropolitan (Labbe, v, 1612).

V. Held A.D. 646, under Stephen, the metropolitan, against the Monothelitians (Labbe, v, 1836: vi, 138).

Byzas, the founder of Byzantium, now called Constanti-nopolis, was said to have sprung from the gods, being a son of Poseidon and Corceis, the daughter of Zeus and Io. But Byzas was really the name of the leader of the Megarians, who founded Byzantium B.C. 656.

Caaba. See Kaaba.

Cabala. We give here some additional particulars.

1. The Sephirot. The Cabala insists upon the following points with regard to these: i. That they are not created, but emanated (בֹּקֶץ) from the En-Soph.

ii. That they form among themselves, and with the En-

Sod, a strict unity, and simply represent different aspects of one and the same being. iii. That all the ten emanations alike partake of the perfections of the En-

Sod. iv. That, as emanations of the Infinite, the Sephirot are infinite and perfect, like the En-Soph, and yet constitute the first finite. On the accompanying wood-cut is shown the figure of the archetypal man, representing the ten Sephirot. Another grouping is given in the table on following page.

2. Creation of Angels. "God," says the Sohar, "animated every part of the firmament with a separate spirit, and forthwith all the heavenly hosts were before him" (iii, 68a). These angelic beings consist of two classes—good and bad—have their respective princes, and occupy the three habitable worlds in the following order: The first is the seat of the Angel of Creation, the second world, the World of Creation. He alone constitutes the world of pure spirits, and is the garment of Shaddai, i.e. the invisible manifestation of the Deity. His name is numerically equivalent to that of the Lord. The angelic host inhabiting this world are divided into ten ranks, answering to the ten Sephirot; and each is set over a different part of the universe. The demons, who constitute the second class of angels, inhabit the fourth world, or the World of Action. Though they are the grossest and most deficient of all forms, they still form ten degrees, answering to the ten Sephirot. The prince of this region of darkness is Samael, angel of poison or death. He is the evil spirit who seduced Eve; and has a wife, called the Harkot, or the Woman of Whore-dom, who, together with him, is treated as one person, and is called "the Beast."

3. The Destiny of Man and the Universe. It is an absolute condition of the soul to return to the infinite source from which it emanated, after developing on earth the perfections, the germs whereof are implanted in it. If the soul, after assuming a human body, during its first sojourn on earth, fails to acquire that experience for which it descends from heaven, and becomes contaminated by sin, it must re-inhabit a body again and again, till it is able to ascend in a purified state. This transmigration, however, is restricted to three times. The world, being an expansion of the Deity's own substance, must ultimately share that blessedness which it enjoyed in its first evolution. Even Satan himself, the archangel of wickedness, will be restored to his angelic nature, as he, too, proceeded from the Infinite Source of all things. When the last human soul has passed through probation, then the Saviour will appear, and the great jubilee year will commence, when the whole pleroma of souls, cleansed and purified, shall return to the bosom of the Infinite Source.

Caballer, Raymond Diodora, a Spanish theologian of the Jesuit order, was born at Palma, in the isle of Majorca, in 1740. He was educated at Madrid, but took refuge in Rome at the time of the suppression of his order, and devoted himself to literature. Nearly all of his works were published under the pseudonym of Filibero de Parralpina. He died in 1820. He wrote, De Prima Typographia Hispanica Etude Specimens (Rome, 1790); De Librario de Enrique Gómez Conframato contro le Censure Nemiche (Ibid. 1806);--

Born at Caunaillon (Venasiaim) in 1605. He became chancellor of Sicily, patriarch of Constantinople, cardinal and legate, and was intimately associated with Papal. He died at Perousia in 1731, and was buried in the Carthusian Church of Bonpas, where his marble mausoleum was seen in 1791. He wrote a few sermons and practical works in Latin. See Hofer, Nouv. Bible, Generaire, s. v.; Hofer, Bible, Dict. s. v.

Cabbon. Lieut. Conder suggests (Tent-work, ii. 383) that this may be the modern El-Kibbeh, which is laid down on the Ordnance Map at two and one half miles north-east of Yalneh (Jabneh or Jabriel) in an inhabited village; and Tristram (Bible Places, p. 40) adopts this identification. The name tolerably well corresponds, but the position seems too far north for the grouping in Josh. xv. 40. See Juda, Tribe OF.

Caberansus Council of. This was a town of Africa, in Byzacena, where, in 394, a pseudo-council was held by fifty-three Donatist bishops, followers of Maximianus of Carthage, who condemned Primianus, bishop of Carthage (see Baluze, Nouv. Coll. p. 368).—Landon, Eccl. Dict. s. v. See African Councils.

Cabezaler, Juan Martin de, a reputable Spanish historical painter, was born near Cordova in 1683, and studied under Don Juan Carreno. His best works are the Assumption, and a picture of St. Ildefonso, in the Church of San Nicola. There is also an Ecco Homo and a Crucifixion by him in the Church of the Franciscans. He died in 1673. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hofer, Nouv. Bible, Generaire, s. v.

Cabiac, Claude de Bane, seigneur de, a French theologian, was born at Nismes in 1578. He was of the family of the barons of Avejan, and for a time a Calvinist, but, having pursued his studies with the Jesuits of Touron, he became a zealous Catholic. In 1629 he was made consultor at the presidial of Nismes, where he died about 1658. He wrote, L'Écriture Abandonnée par les Ministres de la Religion Réformée (1658). See Hofer, Nouv. Bible, Générale, s. v.; Roze, Gén. Bible, Dict. s. v.

Cabiri (καβίρι), in Greek mythology, were divine beings of an early order, apparently belonging to a tribe existing previous to the Greeks. Their worship was continued even after the spreading of the Pelasgic religion, especially in the islands Samothrace and Lemnos. It afterwards passed over into an unintelligible secret worship, in which the Cabiri were often confounded with different deities. In Bocotia the Cabiri were in close relation with Ceres and Proserpina, and therefore probably they may be looked at as assisting demons of fruitfulness. In Rome their worship was united to that of the Penates, who were believed to have come from Troy; it was finally carried so far as to represent persons of the imperial court as Cabiri, on coins, etc. They were usually depicted as very small, with a hammer on their shoulder, and the half of the shell of an egg on their head, with a very thick belly. It is believed that the Romans brought this worship to the Celts and Bretons, but confounded the titles of the priests with those of the deities, because they themselves did not know the fundamentals of the doctrine. See Smith, Dict. of Class. Mythol. s. v.

in the pulpit, and to have died a few hours after April 3, 1756. He published five sermons. See Cong. Quarterly, 1861, p. 15.

Cabrera, Alfonso de, a Spanish Dominican, was born at Cordova about the middle of the 16th century. He was sent, soon after his elevation to the priesthood, to preach the Gospel in America. After his return he preached with wonderful success in the chief cities of Spain, and in 1553, he was sent out by the minister of the 17th century, when he obtained the favor of the prince Borghese, for whom he executed a number of works. His best productions are at Ancona, where he painted several altar-pieces, the best of which are the Marriage of the Virgin, and the Last Supper. He died at Rome in 1781. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Caccianiga, Francesco, an Italian painter, was born at Milan in 1705, and studied under Franscarelli and Bolognino. Afterward he went to Rome, where he obtained the favor of the prince Borghese, for whom he executed a number of works. His best productions are at Ancona, where he painted several altar-pieces, the best of which are the Marriage of the Virgin, and the Last Supper. See Spooner, Biog. Cadden, Robert, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Ireland, Oct. 28, 1782. He was carefully trained by his pious widowed mother, with whom he emigrated to Lancaster, Pa., in 1798; experienced conversion about twenty years; and after having faithfully discharged the duties of a class-leader, exhorter, and local preacher, he entered the Baltimore Conference, in which he sustained an effective relation for thirty-seven years. In 1852 he became superannuated, and died at his residence in Baltimore County, Md., June 26, 1859. Mr. Cadden was remarkable from childhood for his industry and fineness of disposition. He was diffident and retiring, deeply in piety, and faithful in labors. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1860, p. 20.

Cadell was a Welsh saint of the 7th century, patron of Llangadell, a church formerly in Glamorganshire. See also Catell.

Cademann, Adam Theodule (or Gotthelf), a German Lutheran preacher, was born in 1677 at Haynichen, near Freiberg, in Saxony. He first pursued his studies at Gera, then at the universities of Leipsic and Wittenberg, where he received his degree. In 1707 he became vicar at Litzenroda, a village near Torgau, in 1718 pastor at Stiptitz, and finally, in 1729, archdeacon at Kemberg, where he remained until his death, which occurred February 16, 1746. See Hoefer, Nouvelle Biographie Générale, s. v.

Cademann, Johann Rudolph, a German Lutheran theologian, son of Johann Georg, pursued his studies at Leipsic, where he took, in 1699, his degrees in theology. In 1708 he was appointed deacon at Naumburg, and in 1717 superintendent at Pegau, where he remained until his death, which occurred about 1729. He wrote Disput. de Schola Libertinorum, ex Act. Ap. VI. 9. (Leipsic, 1704). See Hoefer, Nouv. Bioi. Générale, s. v.

Cadeoldus (or Edoldus), Saint, a French prelate, originally a monk, became abbot of Grison, and finally bishop of Vienna. He died in 696, and is commemorated Jan. 14. See Smith, Dict. of Christ. Bioi. a.v.

Cadesreuter, Christoph, a German Lutheran preacher and pedagogue, lived in the latter part of the 16th century, in the diocese of Hof, Bavaria. He wrote Grammatica Graecae (Leipsic, 1599). See Hoefer, Nouve. Bioi. Générale, s. v.

Cadfan was a Celtic saint of the 6th century, of good birth in Armorica, who crossed over into Wales at the head of a large company, mostly his own relations, supposed to have been exiled in consequence of the Frankish invasion. He is chiefly known as the first abbot of a monastery founded by him and Enion Freuhin, in the isle of Bardsey. An ancient Welsh inscription upon a rude pillar at Tywyn in Merionethshire, where was one of the many churches of his foundation, is thought to refer to him.

Cadfarch, a Welsh saint, who lived about the middle of the 6th century, was the founder of the churches of Penegos, Montgomeryshire, and Aber-erch, Carmarvonshire. He is commemorated Octob. 24.

Cadfrawd was an early Welsh saint. See Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 92, 100.

Cadgyfarch was an early Welsh saint. See Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 102.

Cadharians were a Mohammedan sect who deny predestination, and hold that human actions are solely regulated by the free-will of man himself. They have been styled the "Manichéans of the Mussulman faith," because they maintain the existence of two original coordinate principles, the divine and the human.

Cadiocenus (Thadiocenus or Thadiacus), was a supposed archbishop of York, who retired into Wales A.D. 586. See Stubbs, Regist, p. 158.

Cadion, Jean Baptiste, a French theologian, who died as a canon at Autun about 1600, after having been curate at Alise, left a Vie de Sainte Reine (Alise, 1648). See Hoefer, Nouv. Bioi. Générale, s. v.

Cadir is an order of Mohammedan monks founded by Abdul-Kadir-Gilani, who died at Bagdad in 1165. They never cut their hair, and always go bareheaded and barefooted. They can leave the order at pleasure, and are under no vow of celibacy.

Cadizadelites are a modern Mohammedan sect who, in some degree, the ancient Greek stoics. Their faith and practice seems to be a confused mixture of Mohammedanism, Christianity, and Judaism. They pray at funerals for the souls of the departed, calling upon the dead to remember that "there is but one God only." They read the Bible in the Sclavonic tongue, and the Koran in the Arabic. They love Christians, and protect them from insults on the part of other Mohammedans. They believe that Mohammed is the Paraclete or Comforter. They hate images and the sign of the cross, and practice circumcision, claiming in this to follow the example of Christ.

Cadle, Richard F., a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, who died in November, 1857, at Seaforo, Del., was for many years at the head of the mission among the Oneida Indians at Green Bay, Lake Michigan. In 1856 he took charge of the churches at Seaforo, Laurel, and vicinity, in Sussex County, Del. He was an earnest and faithful minister of the Gospel. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1858, p. 612.

Cadmus, in Greek legend, was the son of Agenor and of Telphassa or of Antiope. Agenor, king of Phoe-and sent some of his attendants to a spring of Mars to get some water. This spring was guarded by a dragon of the god, who tore several of the attendants to pieces, whereupon Cadmus, assisted by Minerva, slew the dragon, broke his teeth, and, by the advice of the goddess, sowed them. From this seed there grew armed men, who killed one another. Only five of the sowed men (Spartans) were left: Theseus, Udea, Chthonius, Hypermnestra, and Pelor, and from them the Thebans derived their five tribes. Cadmus was compelled to serve the god eight years, for his injury to the dragon; at the expiration of which time, however, he had become so fully reconciled to the god that the latter gave him his daughter Harmonia as a wife, and Minerva gave him the kingdom. The gods all came to the wedding, which was celebrated with the greatest brilliancy. The children of Cadmus were, Polydorus, Autonoe, Ino, Semele, and Agave. After a number of years Cadmus left Thebes, and in his old age he died, at the same time with his wife, or, as Ovid says, they were changed into snakes. He taught the Greeks the use of ores for weapons, and instituted writing by letters among them. See Smith, Dic. of Gr. and Rom. Biog. and Mythol. s. v.

Cado (or Cataw) was a Welsh saint of the 6th century. See Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 202.

Cadoc (Cadocus, Docus, Cathmael, Cstattw the Wise), abbot of Llancarvan, in Wales, was the son of Gundless (or Gwyrrlyw Filwe), and was educated by an Irish anchorite, Meubhi. He then went to Gwent (or Caerwent), Monmouthshire, where he studied under St. Fathai. From Gwent he removed to Glamorgan, and founded the monastery of Llancarvan, of which he became first abbot. He was the friend of Dubricius, and the means of the conversion of St. Idris. He was born, probably, about the beginning of the 5th century. Colgan and Lanigan assign 570 as the date of his death. He was commemorated Jan. 14. The foxes of Cattw the Wise are printed in the Jolo Manuscript, edited by E. William (1848). His Life is given in the Acta Sanctorum of the Bollandists, under Jan. 2, 602. Colgan (in Jo. Tham. 152, 182, 185, 187, 189, 197) seeks to identify the Mochecatocs left by St. Fiac at Inisfallen as the Cadocus of Wales, but the dates do not harmonize. He has also been confused with St. Sophias of Beneventum. His Scotch dedication was at Cambuslang, County Lanark.

Cadog, a Welsh saint of the 5th century, was the founder of Llangadog Fawr Church, in Carmarthenshire, and others. He is not to be confounded with Cadoc (q. v.).

Cadogan, William Bromley, Rom. an English clergyman, was born Jan. 22, 1751, and educated at Westminster School, and at Christ Church College, Oxford. He was presented to the vicarage of St. Giles, Reading, in 1774, and soon after to the rectory of Chelsea. He spent the greater part of his life at St. Giles in faithful and successful ministerial labors. He died Jan. 18, 1797. His publicatory consists of seventy sermons; and after his death appeared Discourses, Letters, and Memoirs of his Life, by Richard Cecil, M.A. (1798). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Cadonici, Giovanni, an Italian theologian, who was born at Venice in 1705, and died Feb. 27, 1786, wrote several works, in which he attacked the Molinists and the pretensions of the Roman Church. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Rose, Gen. Biog. Dict. s. v.

Cadovius, Anton Günther, a German theologian, was born at Oldenburg, Aug. 16, 1654. He studied at Leipzig, Jena, and Wittenberg, and, after a course of travels, became preacher of the duchess Christine-Charlotte, and, in 1678, pastor at Ensens, in East Frisia, where he died, April 5, 1694, leaving De Ritore Substanti (Vitemb. 1673).—De Tempore (ibid. 1674).—De Justitia (ibid. eod.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cadro was a reputed Welsh saint of the 6th century.

Cadry, Jean Baptiste (better known by his anagram, Darrey), a French theologian, was born in 1689 at Trelz, in Provence. He studied first under his father (who was superior of the college of Grimaldi), and afterwards at Paris (1701), where, having entered orders, he obtained the vicarage of St. Etienne-du-Mont, and later (1716) that of St. Paul. In 1718 he was nominated canon of Laon, but, on account of the papal interference, he returned to Poitiers. He died at Sarzigny-sur-Ouche, Nov. 25, 1756. He was an opponent to the bull Unigenitus (q. v.), and wrote the last three volumes of the Histoire du Livre des Réflexions Morales et de la Constitution Unigenitus (Amsterdam, 1723–38); the first being prepared by Joh. Louis.—Tentamen des Chartreux au Suif de la Constitution Unigenitus (1725).—Observations Théologiques et Morales sur les deux Histoires du P. Berruyer (1755). See Nouv. Dict. Historique; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. 1, 622; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. F.)

Cadrucaeus, a Welsh divine, was bishop of Bangor, but, leaving his episcopate, he became a Cistercian monk in Monasterio Durris, where his episcopal not being rich and at that time very troublesome on account of the civil wars. Cadrucaeus “was no less happy than industrious in his endeavors, writing a book of sermons, and another called Speculum Christianorum.” He died in 1225. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), iii, 494.

Caduceus was the rod or sceptre of Mercury, being a wand with two serpents, entwined with two serpents, borne by that deity as the ensign of his quality and office, and given him by Apollo for his seven-stringed harp. Wonderful powers were assigned to this rod by the poets, such as laying men asleep and raising the dead. It was also used by the ancients as a symbol of peace and concord. See Smith, Dict. of Class. Antiq. s. v.

Cadundus, Saint. See Chadoneus.

Cadurcus, Johannes, D.C.L., a French martyr, was degraded and burned at Limousin, in France, in 1538, for exhorting his countrymen upon All-hallow’s day, and afterwards confounding a friar out of the Bible. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 396.

Cadhwallader, David, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Montgomeryshire, North Wales, May 29, 1711. He was converted and joined the Methodists.
in 1812; began preaching in 1814; and emigrated to Delaware County, O., in 1821, where he labored as a local preacher till 1828, when he joined the Ohio Conference, and was sent as Welsh missionary to Oneida County, N. Y. Three years later he returned to Delaware County, labored one year in the Ohio Conference, and then, on account of the small salary that he had been receiving, was obliged to locate in order to support his family. He labored successfully as a local preacher until 1844, when he re-entered the Ohio Conference, and for four years travelled extensively through Ohio and Pennsylvania. In 1848 he was stationed at Pittsburgh, Pa., and in the following year, when many preachers fled the church, he was chosen by the conference in person to locate there, Mr. Cadwallader was always found at his post, not only among his own people, but among others. Failing health obliged him to become a supernumerary in 1854, and he retired to his home in Delaware County, O., where he died Oct. 19, 1855. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1856, p. 115.

Cadwell, Christopher Columbus, a Congregational minister, was born at Lenox, N. Y., Dec. 4, 1811. At the age of eighteen he went to the Manual Labor Institute at Whitesboro; thence to Lane Seminary, expecting to complete his theological course there, but became dissatisfied with the officers of that institution in represing free discussion, as he declared, and left, in 1830, for the study of the ministry. In 1835 he was ordained, and began to preach in the April of that year, removing to Kingston, Canada, in 1836. In the fall of the same year he returned, and was a member of the anti-slavery convention held at Utica, N. Y., which was broken up by a mob, and completed its sessions at Peterborough. In May, 1837, he went back to Canada, and remained until February, 1838, preaching at various points with success, after which he returned to New York. In June he emigrated to Wisconsin, and spent his first year at Southport, now Kenosha. Subsequently he preached a few months at Racine; in 1840 went to Rochester, in Racine County, where he organized a church, and one also at North Rochester; in 1848 he removed to Waukegan, Ill., then called Little Fort, organized a church and preached there until July, 1844; in the same year went to Paris, Ill., and organized a church in that place. With broken health, he returned to his friends in New York State, Sept. 10, 1844. His health improving, he began to preach again in February following, and returned to the church at Little Fort, Ill., in May, 1845. After two years his health again failed, and he removed to Caldwell Prairie, Wis., where he built a church; preached also at Burlington, and helped build another church; early in 1854 he took charge of the churches at Genoa and Richmond, Ill., spending fifteen years with them, and erecting two church-buildings. Desiring to enter more directly into missionary work, he went to Missouri in June, 1869, and began his labors in Barton and Vernon Counties. He had founded a church at Lamar, and other organizations were in contemplation, when he died there, Jan. 16, 1870. See Cong. Quarterly, 1870, p. 405.

Cadwell, Eliza B., M.A., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Warrick County, Ind., Nov. 29, 1805. He was converted in 1861; licensed to preach in 1871; and admitted into the South-east Indiana Conference in 1874. He graduated at More's Hill College in 1875; was elected professor of ancient languages in his alma mater in 1876, and died March 19, 1879. Mr. Cadwell was an earnest Christian, a faithful pastor, and a sound and instructive preacher. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1879, p. 26.

Cadwell, John, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Westfield, Mass., Aug. 11, 1805. He was converted in his twenty-fourth year; immediately began earnest and successful work for Christ, in holding cottage meetings, and after laboring zealously some years as class-leader and local preacher, he entered the New England Conference in 1886. He continued his earnest work to the day of his sudden death, Jan. 8, 1876. Mr. Cadwell was not especially brilliant, nor did he possess marked ability, but he was a good man, fresh and vigorous. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1876, p. 69.

Cady, Daniel Reed, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Malta, N. Y., Oct. 8, 1813. He was a student at Hamilton Academy; graduated at Williams College in 1838, and at Andover Theological Seminary in 1845, having studied law at Albon, and practiced two years. He was ordained at Rutland, Mass., Oct. 29, 1845; was dismissed Oct. 11, 1849; was stationed at Westborough, Dec. 5, 1849, and was dismissed, Feb. 6, 1856, after an illness of fifteen months; was installed at Arlington, then at West Cambridge, Feb. 14, 1856, and dismissed, June 29, 1871, on account of impaired health. He was director of the American Educational Society, trustee of Massachusetts Home Missionary Society, and member of Executive Committee, manager of Massachusetts Sunday-school Society, and of the Congregational Board of Publication. He died at Westborough, May 17, 1879. He published Memorials of Lieut. Joseph P. Burrage (Arlington, 1864);—of Deacon John Field (ibid. 1870);—of Rev. Reuben T. Robinson (Winchester, 1871);—also a sermon, The Bible in Schools, besides other memorials. See Vital Statistics of Cong. Ministers, 1879; Cong. Year-book, 1880, p. 74.

Cadly, Lawton, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Killingly, Conn., July 24, 1796. He was converted in the South in 1820, where he spent some years amid slave institutions, which he thoroughly abhorred; and in 1842 he joined the Providence Conference, wherein he served the Church until his death, June 18, 1871. Mr. Cadly was an excellent man, a thorough Methodist, a lucid, accurate, logical, argumentative preacher, amiable, and a favorite among his acquaintances. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1872, p. 37.

Ceacios, in Greek mythology, was the north-east wind. He was represented on the Tower of the Winds in Athens, with earthen features, wet, loose beard and hair, and with a flying dress about his strong limbs. With both hands he holds a winnowing basket, out of which he throws rain and hailstones on the earth. He was so represented for bringing for Greece storms and hail, clouds and snow, and cold, wet weather.

Ceccoli, Saint, is the name of several females in the Latin calendar.

1. A Roman lady, and one of the four principal virgins and martyrs of the Western Church, commemorated in the Latin and Greek churches, Nov. 22. Her life hardly any authentic account has come down to us. It is supposed that St. Cecilia was born at Rome in the 3rd century, of parents who secretly adhered to the Christian religion. At a very early age she took the vow of chastity, and as she grew to womanhood became distinguished for her musical talent, mental graces, and personal loveliness. She could play skilfully on all the musical instruments of the day, but was no little satisfied with them that she set herself to invention, and produced the organ. Accepting to her parents' wish, she became, at the age of sixteen, the wife of Valerian, a young nobleman. Upon the nuptial night she informed her husband that she was guarded night and day by a glorious angel. Valerian, desiring to see the angel, was told that he could not unless converted to Christianity, to which he consented, receiving baptism at the hands of pope Urban. The prefect Almachius commanded him to abjure the faith, and upon his refusal to do so, had him, and his brother Tiburtius, beheaded. Soon after he sent to Cecilia, and commanded her to sacrifice to the gods. Upon her refusing to do so, the prefect gave orders that she should be cast into her own bath, after it had been heated to an intense degree. "But a heavenly dew falling upon the spouse of Christ refreshed and cooled her body, and preserved her from harm." A day and a night the prefect waited for news of her death. Then he sent one of his soldiers to behead her; but though the sword smote her neck thrice, the executioner could not cut off her head, and departed, leaving her on the floor of her bath, covered with blood. She lived three days, never ceasing to exhort the people to continue steadfast in the Lord, and died Nov. 22, A.D. 280. Urban and his deacons buried her in the cemetery of Calixtus, on the Via Appia, near the third mile-stone, and consecrated her house, which she had given to God, as a church forever. It is alleged that her body was found at Rome by Paschal I, A.D. 821, in the cemetery of Praetextatus, adjoining that of Calixtus, and removed to the Church of St. Cecilia, which he was then rebuilding.

The legend of this saint has furnished the subject of several remarkable pictures, the oldest of which is a rude picture of her on the wall of the catacomb called The Cemetery of San Lorenzo, probably of the 6th or 7th century. The most celebrated of the modern representations of St. Cecilia is the picture by Raphael (Rome, 1513), and now in the gallery of Bologna. It is not known when St. Cecilia was first regarded as a patron saint of music, and in the ancient documents that have come down to us there is nothing to show that she ever made use of musical instruments; and, in fact, before the 15th century, she is seldom seen depicted with them. The tradition which connects her with music is wholly unaccounted for. Pope Paschal built on to St. Cecilia's Church a monastery, to which he gave a handsome endowment, providing that the religious should guard the bodies of the saint and her companions, and chant the praises of God around her tomb day and night (Baillet, Vie des Saints, Nov. 22). Such a service of song could not but kindle a legend-loving imagination, and the story grew that often Cecilia's own instrument was heard accompanying the vocal music. In England, at the latter part of the 17th century, every day was found a convenient one for holding an annual festival set on foot for the encouragement of music. For a more detailed account of St. Cecilia see Baronii Antiquae, s. an. 821; Bollandists, Acta Sanctorum, April 14, p. 204; Ceillier, Histoire des Auteurs Sacrés (Paris, 1859, vol. ii); Jamesson, Sac. and Legendary Art, p. 586-600 (Lond. 1857, 3d ed.); Tillemont, iii, 295-488; Harper's Magazine, Nov. 1880.

3. Called also Clara, is supposed to have lived in the 7th century, and to have been abbess of Remiremont, in Lorraine, for a period of thirty years. She is commemorated Aug. 12. See Bolland, Acta Sanctorum, Aug. ii, 782.

Cecilian is the name of several saints.

1. Jerome says that Cyprian was converted "suae gente presbytero Cecilio," etc., a statement that has probably influenced most editors to substitute Cecilius for Caeceilia in the texts of the Acts of the Martyrs, by his own deacon, Pontius. Cecilianus is, doubtless, correct. He was atale as well as honore presbyter, and Cyprian, as a deacon, probably lived with him, reverencing him greatly "as the father of his new life." He appears afterwards as venerabilis sacerdos (Bolland, Acta Sanctorum, Jan. 3, p. 264) and Sanctus Cecilius in the Roman martyrlogy (June 3) by Gregory XIII (see Morcelli, A. F. Christiana, ii, 76).

2. An ecclesiastic who was first archdeacon, then (A.D. 311) bishop, of Carthage. When archdeacon, he resolutely supported his bishop, Maximus (q. v.), in opposing the fanatical craving for martyrdom. When nominated as his successor this was remembered against him, and a party, headed by a wealthy but superstitious lady, Lucilla, prepared to fill the vacant see. Cecilian's party was strong enough to submit to re-ordination at their hands. Secundus and the Numidian bishops answered by excommunicating him, and ordaining Majorinus, a member of Lucilla's household, as bishop. In the resultant schism, Constantine took sides with the Cecilianists, and a council was called in the Lateran, Rome, A.D. 313. The personal charges against Cecilian were examined and dismissed, and his party proclaimed the representatives of the orthodox Catholic. Cecilian proposed a compromise, but his advances were rejected. A council was called at Arles, A.D. 314, which confirmed the validity of the ordination of Cecilian. This was endorsed by Constantine, Milan, A.D. 316. Cecilian lived until about A.D. 345.

3. A martyr with others at Cassaragusta (Saragossa), under Datianus, the preses of Spain. His natalis was April 15 (see Ussard, Martr.).

4. A martyr at Carthage with Dativus A.D. 304. See CECILIA, 2, above.
Cæcilius is the name of several men in early church history. See also Cæpella.

1. Cæcilius Naïtalis, the pagan in the dialogue of Octavius, by Minucius Felix, is supposed to Tillmont to be no imaginary personage, but a real convert. Tillmont discusses his identity with Cælianus, and with the unmarried presbyter who converted Cyprian (iv, 46, 47; Ierome, Vite Illus., c. 67; Pontius, p. 9).

3. One of the seven bishops said to have been ordained by the apostles at Rome, and sent into Spain. The seven are celebrated together in a Chorismic hymn, called the Spanish liturgy on May 15 (Acta Sanctor um, May iii, 441).

4. The martyrdom of Cæcilius on the farther side of the Tiber is assigned to Nov. 17 in the Martyr. Hieron.

5. Bishop of Biltha, in proconsular Africa, a member of a commission of Virginius Subintrodutix (Ep. 46, A.D. 249, sat in each of the synods, de Pace matutinis danda, etc., and as senior bishop spoke first in the synod de Bapismo III. He is not impossibly the same bishop who is addressed by Cyprian on the subject of the mixed chalice (Ep. 63).

Cæliphinn. See Cælilainn.

Cæl (Irish, slender), is a name of frequent use in early Irish Church history.

1. At Oct. 26 the Marty. Doneg., cites Cæl, virgin, as one of the four daughters of Mac lae, of the Dal Má sínortex: "and they were of Cill-na-minghen" (the Church of the Daughters) "by the side of Tamlacht to the south," in Londonderry, or at Killinimry, near Tallaght, County Dublin. But the Marty. Tallaght places their abode at Cill-maingiden, i.e., Killimain, near Dublin.

2. Colgan mentions a Cæl, whom he also calls Cælus, whose festival is Nov. 10, on which day Marty. Doneg. gives "Cael Craibedheach," and the table to the Martyrology "Cæol, the Devout (Cælius)"; and another Cælus is connected with Athrúinna, Feb. 17. But little more can be said of these. See Colgan, Acta Sanctorum, p. 318 n., 391 n.

3. Cruithner Cæl of Kilmorie, celebrated as a saint May 25. Colgan (Acta Sanctorum, p. 709, c. 26) connects him with St. Endes, but gives no account of his relation to Kilmorie, to which he is attached in the calendar.

Cælan. There are several saints of this name in the Celtic calendars, such as Cælan of Celie, celebrated June 30; Cælan of Doire or Dóire-Chaoilain, June 19; Cælan of Echins, Sept. 25; and Cælan of Tigh-na-mach, Oct. 29. But the most notable is Cælan of Inis-Ceall, July 29; who (under the name Cælan, Coelain, or Chiliain) is usually considered the writer of the Life of St. Brighida, which stands as the sixth memoir of that saint in Colgan's Tria Tracta Sacerdotalis. He was a monk of Inis-Ceall (now Inishclarty, County Clare), and probably flourished after the beginning of the 8th century. See Colgan, Tr. Thuras, p. 596, 597, 600, 601, O'Donovan, Four Masters, 187; O'Hanlon, vii, 35th Saints, 13; Lanigan, New Hist. Ir., i, 381.

Cælestia, Saint, confessor, and bishop of Metz in Lotharingia at the beginning of the 4th century, is supposed to have died about A.D. 320. His acts are doubtful. He is commemorated Oct. 14.

Cælestius. (1) One of the chief presbyters of Carthage, who summoned the neighboring bishops and those of Numidia to elect a bishop; and being disappointed at the election of Cælianus, made a party against him. (2) The Pelagian. See Cæle- lanius.

Cælein (or Cælin) is the name of two early English ecclesiastics.

1. A brother of bishops Cedd and Cædian, a priest in the household of Athelwold, king of Deira. He is mentioned by Bede (H. E. iii, 23, ed. Giles) as introducing his brother Cedd to the notice and favor of his master, about A.D. 668.

2. Provoest of Ripon, who was allowed by Wilfrid, in the year 709, to seek a more retired life. The name of Ripon is in the Liber pontificalis of the Church of Durham. See Edidius, Vita Saint Wilfridi, cap. lxi.

Cælius, Michael, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Döbeln, Sept. 7, 1492. In 1519 he was appointed pastor of the Roman Catholic Church at Rochlitz. Leaving his Church and embracing that of the Reformation, he was appointed in 1525 pastor at Posnan, in Bohemia; and, in 1526, dean and pastor at Mansfeld. He died in 1559. His writings on the Lord's Supper, and his exhortation to the ministers at the Diet of Augsburg, were edited by Cyriacus Spangenberg in 1569. See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. F.)

Cæliainn (or Cælithinn), commemorated as an Irish saint on Feb. 5, was the daughter of Cæl, of the race of Cill-na-minghen. She is called Teardoirn Coe lan and Tearmón Mor, parish Kilkeevin, County Roscommon. She was the special patron of her kinname, the Ciarradhíte, in Connaught, and the legend places her in the reign of Aedh, son of Eochaidh Tirmcharna, king of Connaught, slain A.D. 574. See Colgan, Acta Sanctorum, p. 13 n.; O'Donovan, Book of Rights, p. 100, n.

Caemhgen of Glendalough. See Caomhen.

Caemh (or Caomhe) is commemorated as a Scotch saint on April 4. Marty. Doneg. has "Caemh, virgin of Cill-Caomh," and Marty. Tallaght, "Coine, Cille-Coine." Again, at Nov. 2, Marty. Doneg. gives "Caomh, the Albanian, of Cill-Chaimh," which Dr. Reeves (Marty. Doneg., p. 294, n.) interprets "of Alba, the modern Scotland."

Caemham. Under this form, and that of Caímn, Coemhan, Cúmainm, Cúmainm, and Mochmochm, this name is of frequent occurrence among the saints of Ireland, and the work of identification is very difficult.

1. Of Ard-Caemham—set down on June 12—was the son of Coemloga and Caemell, and appears to have been the younger of the two sons of St. Coemgen. The Marty. Doneg. calls him Caemhan, or Sanct-Lethan, of Ard-Caemham, in Lanesigh. Readaghen (Exc. Hist. Ir. ii, 221, 228) fixes his death on Oct. 25 of St. Coemgen, to the period of the second class of Irish saints—that is, to the second half of the 6th century.

2. Of Enach-Train—on Nov. 3—is said to have been of the race of Laeburh Lorc, king of Ireland. Along with St. Finnian and St. Mochnam of Tir-da-glas, St. Caemham was under the direction of St. Colum, son of Crimthann of Tir-da-glas, and with the rest constantly followed him. He founded the monastery of Enach-Truin, now Annatrim, Queen's Co.; and flourished A.D. 550. There he spent the remainder of his days, and died Nov. 5, the year unknown.

3. (Cuemainn, Comann, Comann, Conan, Comarn, or Comann). In the table of the Marty. Doneg., he is called Pulcherius. According to Colgan (Acta Sanctorum, p. 335), Caemham belonged to a noble stock in Scotland, but withdrew to the Orkneys, where he built a monastery, and, after living in great sanctity as bishop and confessor, died there about 640. At Kirkwall and throughout the islands his memory was long revered. He is commemorated on Feb. 14, and many altars have been raised to his honor.

4. Brec, whose day is Sept. 14. St. Caemham Brei of Rosach, is carefully distinguished from St. Mac Nisi (Sept. 3), who is known by the same name, and founded Coman. Usher places his birth in Hiberna, 529, and his death in 615.
CAEMLACH (Lat. Camuludae) of Rathoin—commemorated Nov. 5—was one of the bishops of the first clergies; his house is at Rahen, Kings Co. He is called the Cammanian, and the Hymn of Columcille is in the Antiphony of Bangor.

Caemlogh is commemorated among the Irish on July 22. The sex of this saint is uncertain, either from the female termination given to the name, or from other sources. Kevoca, a saint of the male sex, is called Caemlogh. Both Colgan and Lanigan regarded this person as female, and are in confusion as to identity; the one making her the same as Cuithrichern, and the other taking her to be Coemnaca. See Colgan, Acta Sanctorum, p. 586; Lanigan, Eccles. Hist. Fr., ii, 45, 223.

Caencomhroaco is commemorated in the Irish calendar on July 23. Mart. Domn. (by Todd and Reeves, p. 199) gives him as bishop, first at Cluain-mic-Nois, and next at Inis Endainm, in Lough Ribh, County Roscommon. He left Cluain on account of the popular veneration given him as a prophet, and sought for solitude in Lough Ree.—Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Caenran (or Caerian) was an Irish prelate. A account of this saint is given by Colgan (Acta Sanctorum, p. 744), from which we learn that he was born in the district of the Hy-Niellan or O'Neillan, County Armagh. He was over a monastery in the same place about 546; and was finally raised to the episcopate of Armagh, succeeding Feildhithn Finn in 578. His canonisation took place in Con的设计 commemorated March 24. See also Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. of Ireland, ii, 183; O'Donovan, i, 212, n. 213; Ware's Bishops.

Caernan is an Irish saint, commemorated Jan. 31. Among the disciples and relatives of St. Columba is enumerated "Caernan, filius Branda, filli Meligi," as coming with St. Columba on his first visit to Britain. But there is no proof to show whether the Caernan thus named is the Caernan of Jan. 31, or he of Cluain—all commemorated April 28.

Cæsar, bishop of Dyrchachium, is given by Dorotheus as one of the seventy disciples sent out by our Lord, and is said to have been mentioned by St. Paul, on the occasion of the speech "I am a Jew," that he of Cæsar's household." The Menology (Dec. 9) makes him bishop of Corinth.

Cæsar, Dominicus, a German Benedictine, lived about the middle of the 17th century. In 1652 he taught logic at Salzburg, and soon afterwards became abbot of Oberalstach. He wrote Rationale Logicae (1658).

Cæsar, W., an English Baptist, born 1790, was the pastor of a Baptist church at Farnham, Surrey, from 1858 to the time of his death, May 7, 1863.

Cæsara-Augustana Concilium. See SARA- GOSA, COUNCIL OF.

Cæsare, Jacob b, a French Catholic theologian, lived in the latter part of the 17th century. He wrote Doctrina de Sacerricio Missae (Douay, 1669). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cæsare, Raphael de, an Italian theologian, was born at Naples, and lived near the close of the 16th century. He wrote Consolatio Animarum, sine Summa Commun Commentator (Venice, 1589, 1599). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cæsarea, COUNCILS OF (Concilium Cæsareum). Several such were held at the various places named below.

I. In Palestine, A.D. 196, on the Easter controversy that had arisen between pope Victor and the churches of Asia Minor; Nareissus of Jerusalem, Theophilus Cæsareus, Cassius of Tyre, and Cardinals of Ptoloman being present, as we learn from Eusebius. They beg, in what he has preserved of their letter to be understood as keeping Eastern the same day as the Church of Alexandria. But several versions of the acts of this council have been discovered in the West, at much greater length: the only question is, are they in keeping with the above letter? See Cave, Hist. Lit. i, 97; Mansi, i, 711-712.

II. In Pontus, summoned A.D. 381, to inquire into the truth of some charges brought against St. Athanasius by his enemies, but not held till 384, when he was further accused of having kept the council appointed to try them waiting thirty months. He knew too well to what party the bishop of the diocese belonged to appear even then; and the council, non-appearance of him to be adjourned to the Council of Tyre the year following.

See Mansi, ii, 1192.

III. In Palestine, A.D. 357 or 358, apparently, under Acacius, its metropolitan, when St. Cyril of Jerusalem was deposed. Socrates adds that he appealed from its sentence to a higher tribunal; a course unprecedented in canonical usage; and that his appeal was allowed by the emperor.

IV. In Pontus, or Neo-Cæsarea, A.D. 358, at which Eustathius, bishop of Sebaste, was deposed; and Meletius, afterwards bishop of Antioch, set in his place.

V. In Caesarea, A.D. 367 or 370, St. Basil was constituted bishop in the room of Eusebius, its former metropolitan, whom he had been assisting some years, though he had been ordained deacon by St. Meletius. A work of the 9th century makes St. Basil anathematise Dianius, the predecessor of his own predecessor at this synod; but St. Basil himself denies ever having done so. In another passage he seems to speak of another synod about to be held in his diocese, to settle the question of jurisdiction between him and the metropolitan of Tyana, consequent on the division of Cappadocia by the civil power into two provinces. St. Basil stood upon his ancient rights; but eventually the matter was compromised, by the erection of more synods, carrying out of which, however beneficial to their country, proved so nearly fatal to their friendship. The date assigned to this council is A.D. 372. See Mansi, iii, 653.

Cesarea-Palatinae. We extract a further description of the ruins of this once noted castle from Porter's Hand-book for Palestine, p. 354 sq.

"The ruins of Cesarea lie close along the windingshore, project a little into the sea, and cover two acres, with huge masses of masonry, and piles of granite columns, to the resting waves. A strong medieval wall encompasses it on the sea side, enclosing a plain and sodden tract, one half mile long by one fourth broad. The wall is strengthened by small buttresses-like towers, and a moat. The upper part is ruinous—the masonry being tumbled over in huge masses like the walls of Acre. In the interior all is ruin; not a building remains entire; confused heaps of stones and rubbish are seen, with here and there a solitary column, or a disunited arch, or a fragment of a wall, all overgrown with thick and brambles. In the southern wall is a gateway still nearly entire; and on a rising ground a little within it stand four massive buttresses, the only remains of the cathedral of Cesarea. But the most interesting part of the ruins is the old port. It is unfortunately not only destroyed, but a large portion of its walls have been carried off for building. There has evidently been a strong tower here, intended to guard the harbor. One wonders how those thick walls have been battered, and how those huge blocks of masonry have been moved from their places, and how they cling together now, like fragments of rock, worn by the elements and beaten by the surf. Then the immense numbers of granite columns attract attention—here projecting in long rows from the side of the hill, and there seen as if half buried in the sand. There are the remains of another mole about one hundred yards north. The foundations of both are composed of very large stones, reminding one of those in the substructions of the Temple at Jerusalem; but the superstructure is much more recent, probably not more than the time of the crusades, and is wholly composed of ancient materials. The city of Herod evidently extended considerably beyond the present walls, but..." though little of it now remains. A few heaps of hewn stones and débris, half covered with sand, and overgrown with brambles, serve to mark its site. Many columns lie about, and doubtless many more have been covered up. A little to the east of the wall, among the bushes, may be seen three shafts, somewhat conical in form, and measuring nearly nine feet in diameter at the base. There is also a block of red granite thirty-four feet long, five broad, and four deep."

church. On the south-west side a ridge of rock, bounding a small harbor, runs out into the sea for about two hundred and fifty yards. This natural pier was enlarged by Herod, and on it stood his Tower of Stratus. Large blocks of granite are still seen under water. The foundations only of the Temple of Caesar are now extant, and their white stones confirm the statement of Josephus that the materials for it were brought from a great distance. The extremity of the ridge of rock, where the 'Tower of Stratus' probably once stood, is now occupied by the remains of a medieval castle, about nineteen yards square, with fragments of columns built into the walls. The top of this ruin commands a very extensive view. In the interior are several vaulted chambers.

"The Roman city probably extended for beyond the precincts of the medieval, particularly eastwards. To the south of the town is traceable the vast amphitheatre of Herod, turned towards the sea, and exactly corresponding with the description of Josephus. It was formed of earth and surrounded by a moat. In the middle of it are remains of a semicircular building, probably a theatre."

_CESAREA-PHILIPP._ We give a further description of this place from Porter's _Hand-book for Palestine_, p. 324 sq.

"This ancient city occupies one of the most picturesque sites in Syria. A broad terrace on the mountainside looks out over the plain of Galilee to the castellated heights of Haman. Behind it rises in rugged peaks the southern ridge of Hermon, wooded to the summit. Two sublime ravines cut deep into the ridge, having between them an isolated cone more than one thousand feet in height, crowned by the ruins of the castle of Subeibeh. On the terrace at this base of this cone lie the ruins of Cesarea-Philipp. The terrace itself is covered with oaks and olive trees, and green glades and clumps of hawthorn and myrtle here and there—all alive with streams of water and cascades.

"The ruins of the city extend from the base of the cliff on the north to the banks of a picturesque ravine three hundred or four hundred yards southward. The stream from the great fountain bounds the site on the north-west and west, and then falls into this ravine, so that the city stood within the angle formed by the junction of two ravines. The most conspicuous ruin is the citadel—a quadrangle some four acres in extent, surrounded by a massive wall, with towers at the angles and along the sides. On the east, south, and west the walls are still from ten to twenty feet high, though broken and shattered. The northern and western walls are washed by the stream from the fountain; along the eastern wall is a deep moat; while the southern is carried along the brow of the cliff called Wady Za'areh. This chasm is spanned by a bridge, from which a gateway opens into the citadel. The substations of the bridge, the gateway, and the round corner-towers of the citadel are of high antiquity, being constructed of large bevelled stones. They have been repaired, however, as we learn from an Arabic inscription over the gate, in comparatively recent times. The most striking view of the site and surrounding scenery is obtained from the south bank of Wady Za'areh, a few paces below the bridge. The chasm is at our feet, with the streamlet gushing through it amid rocks and clumps of oleanders; then we have the old bridge, paved with creepers and long tracts of ferns; then the shattered walls and towers of the citadel; then the wooded slopes around, with the castle of Subeibeh towering high over all. The ruins of the town cover the south bank of Wady Za'areh, with a portion of the level ground to the west and north-west of the citadel. Great numbers of granite and lime-stone shafts lie amid heaps of hewn stones. The modern village consists of some forty houses huddled together in a corner of the citadel—that of the sheikh crowning a massive tower at the north-eastern angle. Some of the houses have on their flat roof a little arbor formed of branches of trees; in these the inhabitants sleep during the summer, to escape the multitudes of scorpions, fleas, and other creatures that swarm in every dwelling."

_Cesareus_, a deacon, mentioned by Bede, _Martirology_ (Nov. 24) as suffering in the persecution of Maximian with Longus and Simaragius. By some he is thought to be Cyriacus, commemorated with the same two companions on March 16 and Aug. 8.

_Cesarea_ is the name of several early Christian females of eminence.

1. Cesarea (or Cæsarius, for the sex is doubtful) had consulted St. Basil to know whether it was lawful and expedient to partake of the eucharist daily by one's

_View of Banias (Cesarea-Philipp)._

"This person and her daughter Lucilla were among the nine or ten Manichaeans who were all that were known to Felix, the convert from that sect, in North Africa in the 5th century.

3. Saint of Arles, was born at Chalon and educated at Marselles. She became abbess of Arles when her brother St. Cesarius was bishop of that see. He drew up the rules of her convent, and procured their ratification by pope Hormisdas. After governing for thirty years, she died about 530. Her monastery was demolished during the invasion of Arles by Theodoric in 507, but was rebuilt by Cesarus. See Acts Sanctorum Bull. Jan. 12, i, 729.

4. A later abbot of the same nunney writing to St. Radegunda defining a Christian's three duties, prayer, Bible reading, and thanksgiving; and sending her, as requested, a copy of a letter of Cesarus, about A.D. 560. See Martene, Anecdota (Paris, 1717), i, 3.

Cesarini, Juliano, an Italian prelate, was descended from a noble family at Rome, and was made cardinal in the year 1426 by pope Martin V, who, as well as Eugenius IV, employed him in several important negotiations. He was slain in the battle of Ladiasus with the Turks at Vannes, in 1444.

Cesarus, a German theologian, lived in the early part of the 13th century. He was of the noble family of Milendunk, in the country of Neusse. He was priest of the convent of Prum, belonging to the Benedictine order. After four years he resigned his position and withdrew to the convent of Heisterbach, of the order of the Cistercians. Here he wrote, in 1222, Explicatio Rerum et Verborum, which is found in his Registrum Bonorum Ecclesiae Frensis. See Heefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cesarus is the name of several early Christians in addition to those given in vol. 1.

3. Father of Eudoxus the Arian. He endeavored to wipe out a life of vice by a martyr's death at Abissina, in Lesser Armenia, under Diocletian.

4. If we accept as genuine the treatise, Ad Cesarium Monachum Epistula contra Apollinaristas, we learn from it that Cesarus embraced a religious life in childhood, before he was ten years old, and secured the affection of Chrysostom. Embracing the views of Apollinarists, he wrote to Chrysostom, acquainting him with his new-found happiness. The intelligence caused great grief to Chrysostom, who composed the above-mentioned letter containing a refutation of this heresy. For an extended discussion of the genuineness of the treatise, see Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Caeti (Caoidae, Coeddis, Caldeus, Caldocus, or Cetti) was celebrated as an Irish saint Oct. 24. The Marty. Donesy gives two entries of saints under these names at Oct. 24 and 25. The table of the Martyrology identifies these names as belonging to one person, but it seems more probable that one name under these different spellings in Latin forms belongs to at least two individuals. See also CADOIUS.

1. Caeti (Coetae, or Coeddi), a bishop at Iona (whom Colgan calls Caedus and Caidius) died, according to the Four Masters, in 710. Other authorities give 711 and 712 (the latter being probably the true date). He is the patron saint of Iona.

2. Coeddi (Coedus, or Cadoius) was abbot of Domnach-Caede, at the Darnaid foot in Tir-Eoghan— that is, the "Church of Caede," now Donaghedy, in the north of Tyrone. He is commemorated Oct. 25.

Caffa, Melchior (called the Maltese), an Italian seaman, was born at Malta in 1531, and studied under Sermius. He executed a number of fine works for the Roman churches, of which the most esteemed is a marble group of St. Thomas distributing alms, in the chapel of San Agostino. He died at Rome in 1887. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Caffarelli, Jean Baptiste, a French prelate, was born April 1, 1763. He was obliged to flee to Spain in 1799, but returned to France in 1802, and was made bishop of St. Brienc, which position he held until his death, Jan. 11, 1815. He was president of the college of the department of the North, went to Paris and participated in the council held there. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Caffo An Caw, a Welsh saint of the 6th century, was patron of Tregaian, a chapel of Llangenin, in Anglesey.

Cafir. See KAFFIR.

Cafur is the name of a fountain referred to in the Koran as belonging to the Mohammedan paradise.

Cagliari (or Callari), PAOLO. See PAOLO VERONESE.

Cagnazzo (Lat. Cagnatius, or Cognatius), Giovannì, a learned Dominican, inquisitor at Bologna, known under the name of Tosesius, from Todi, his native place, died at Bologna in 1521, leaving a Summa Thesauri, called Tabena, from his surname. It is also known as the Summa Summarum (Bologna, 1515, 4to; Venice, 1602).

Cagnaldisus (Hagnaldisus, Chanoaldus, or Chagnulius), Saint, an early French prelate, the eldest brother of St. Faro, bishop of Meaux, was a monk at Luxeuil in the time of St. Columban. About 617 the abbot, abbots of Luxeuil, sent him and Walbertus to the new monastery of Eborac, near Meaux, which Faro, the sister of Cagnaldus, had just built for monks and nuns, under the rule of Columban. He was afterwards made bishop of Laon, and was present at the Council of Rheims in 625. It is probable that he lived till after 665. His festival is marked on Sept. 6 (Baillot, Sept. 6).

Cahen, Samuel, a Jewish writer of France, was born at Metz, Aug. 4, 1736. He received his Talmudic education at Mayence. While a private tutor at Verdon he prepared himself for academic honors. In 1822 he accepted the professorship of German in the academy at Strassburg, where he remained until 1827, when he was elected to the office of secretary to the celebrated Alphonse de Bentheim. In 1824 he was made director of the consistorial school at Paris, where he died, Jan. 8, 1862. He published, Cours de Lecture Hebraique Suivi de Plénitude Frères, avec Traduction Interlinéaire, etc. (Metz, 1824, 1832) — La Bible de la France nouvelle, avec l'Hebreu en regard, Acompagné des Points-cogettes et des Accents Tonnants, avec des Notes Philologiques, Geographiques, et Littéraires et des Principales de la Version des Septante et la Texte Samaritaine (1851, 18 vols.); to which Munk, Dukes, Gerson, Levy, and others contributed. — Archives Israélites de France. Revue Mensuelle, Historique, Biographique, Biblique, Littéraire et Critique (1840-46). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 139; Morais, Eminent Israelites of the Nineteenth Century (Philad. 1880), p. 27. Cahoon, Charles D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Linden, Vet., about 1800. He joined the travelling connection of the New England Conference in 1822, and, on its division in 1830, became a member of the New Hampshire Conference. After serving for three years as preacher in charge, and eleven years as presiding elder, he was transferred to the Rock River Conference, and in it labored diligently until his decease, Sept. 25, 1845. Mr. Cahoon was an eminently holy man, professed and gave evidence of possessing perfect love, was sound in Methodism, and deeply devoted to the cause of religion. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1848, p. 263.

Cahoon, William, Jr., a Presbyterian minister, CAIN

was born in New York in 1756. He graduated at Dickason College, Pa., in 1825, and spent over two years in Princeton Seminary. He was ordained as the second Presbytery of New York, May 1, 1828; was missionary of the Reformed Dutch Church at Bern, N. Y., in the same year, and afterwards served as stated supply at Stuyvesant; at Hyde Park, 1829 to 1833; at Catskill, 1834 to 1847; at Fonthill, 1847 to 1848. He died in 1857. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. p. 48; Corwin, Manual of the Reformed Church (3d ed.), p. 205.

Caian, a Welsh saint of the 6th century, was patron of Tregian, a chapel under Llangefni, in Anglesey. He is commemorated Sept. 25.

Caideus. See Caelt.

Caïdocus, Saint, apostle of the Morini, was a disciple and companion in travel of St. Columban. He and an associate, Francieus, seem first to have gone to Lower Germany to teach the Gospel; but, being driven from that country, they came into Ponthieu, in Picardy. Being roughly treated there, they were about to give up their mission, when a young nobleman, Richarius, received them into his house. Under their direction he retired from the world, and built the monastery of St. Caïdocus, where St. Caïdocus remained until his death, about A.D. 640, and was buried within its precincts. He is commemorated on Jan. 24. See also Cant.

Cainte. See O Ceilte.

Cain, John, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born on the Isle of Man, Oct. 16, 1812. He emigrated to America at the age of sixteen; experienced conversion three years later; and, after laboring some time as a local preacher, he, in 1844, entered the Genese Conference, in which he served as health permitted to the close of his life, in 1886. Mr. Caine was excessive in good works, and abundantly successful. He was ardent in piety, punctual in duty, and true to Christ. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 18653, p. 252.

Caid. See Colga (5).

Caiian, an Irish saint, commemorated Nov. 13, was the son of Niantach of the race of Connac, and brother of St. Diermittius, abbot of Inis Cloga. He is said to have been brought up with his relation St. Jarlath, under St. Benen of Armagh, and to have been a disciple of St. Columba. These statements are evidently inconsistent, and the latter seems the most likely, especially as in the Life of St. Maeldog (or Modicus) of Ferns, born A.D. 558, Maedog is said to have been his school pupil. He is one of the chief saints of Ireland, and preaced over the Church at Fintanach, in Magh-Rein, County Leitrim, and his monastery became a famous school of divinity.

Caillet, Jean, a Jesuit, was born in 1557, and died at Douai, his native place, Sept. 4, 1628. aged fifty years, leaving Histoiria Sanctorum Vivorum Exempla et Facta Lectionum per singulas Anni Dies (6 vols.).

Cailly, Pierre, regius professor of philosophy and eloquence at Caen; died Dec. 31, 1709, leaving, among other works, Durand Commenst, or the agreement between philosophy and theology, with regard to the doctrine of transubstantiation, in which he adopted the opinions of Durand on the subject of transubstantiation. Nesmond, bishop of Bayeux, condemned this work in 1701, and Cailly publicly retracted the opinions he had expressed. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Landon, Diction. des V. v.

Cailltan, a Scottish monk, is mentioned by St. Adamnan, St. Columb, i, c. 31, and by O'Donnell, St. Columb, i, c. 44, as having charge of a "Cella Diuni," in "Stagno Abo fluminis," and was suddenly sent for by St. Columba, who saw he was near his death. The next night, on his arrival, Cailltan became ill and died. The saint erected a church on site of his house on the creek or bay in Mull, called Loch Bay. Camerarius gives the commemoration of "St. Cailltan Abbas" at Feb. 25.

Cailltan. See Caillman.

Cailltan, Saint, belongs to the third order of Irish saints, and was descended from the princely house of Hykindaelagh. He retired for solitude and devotion to an island in Loch Derg, and lived there in the first half of the 7th century. He died A.D. 653, and was buried at Inishcahra. His festival is March 24.

Cain, a Welsh saint of the 6th century, was patron of Llangain, Carmarthenshire.

Caint, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born on the Isle of Man, Oct. 16, 1812. He emigrated to America at the age of sixteen; experienced conversion three years later; and, after laboring some time as a local preacher, he, in 1844, entered the Genese Conference, in which he served as health permitted to the close of his life, in 1886. Mr. Caine was excessive in good works, and abundantly successful. He was ardent in piety, punctual in duty, and true to Christ. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 18653, p. 252.

Cainihe (Canicu, Canice) is the name of several Irish saints.

1. Commemorated Jan. 23. Colgan thinks this may be St. Caneuchs, who was baptized by St. Patrick, became "praefectus monachorum S. Patricii et episcopos," and built the church of Kealltag, in the same district of Corco-theimne (i.e. Corcounded, County Tipperary), where he was baptized.

2. Commemorated Jan. 31. In Mart. Dorn, there is Cainicuis, son of Ua Chil, priest. Mella was the name of his mother, and also the mother of Tighearnach of Doire-Melle. But as to Cainhe, his father, or his life, we have nothing better than supposition.

3. Abbot of Achadh-bo.—Commemoated Oct. 11.—better known to the Celts as St. Canice, and in Scotland as St. Kenneth, was of the race of Clair, and tribe of Corco Dalann. He was born in 517, at Kinnaght, County Derry, and, being baptized by bishop Lucech (or Lyrech), was brought up in his mother's country. He afterwards went over to St. Cadocus in Wales, whose love he won by his prompt obedience. Proceeding to Rome to the pontifice apostolorum, he seems, upon his return, to have studied under Mobi Clairenach at Glasevun, and under St. Finnian at Clonard. Subsequently he appears to have gone to Scotland, and been with St. Columba in Iona. 'With this saint he was closely connected, as well as with other great men of the time, such as the two Breundias, St. Corvall, St. Fintan of Clunnaugh, and St. Mochmeg (or Pulcherius) of Liathmor. The exact date of the foundation of his monastery is unknown, but it was probably before 577, on land granted to him by his patron Colman, lord of Osoray. On an island in Lough Derg he wrote a copy of the four Gospels, under the name of Glais-Kinmax, the "chain" (or "Catena") of Cainhehe. He died in A.D. 600. His principal church was Achadh-bo (now Aghaboe, or Aughavo), Queen's County; and he was also patron of Kilkenny. Besides his Irish dedications of Kilkenny, Aghaboe, and Drumclonche, and being honored as the patron of the diocese of Osoray, he is, next to St. Brigidia and St. Columba, the favorite Irish saint in Scotland. See Forbes, Knt., Scott. Saints, p. 297; Montalembert, Monks of Westminster, iii, 452.

Cainner (Cainder, Canmer, Cinnera, Cunna, or Cennere, or Kennere) is the name of several Irish saints.

1. Mart Doneg, calls this saint the daughter of Cruithneachan, at Cill-Chuillinn, in Caber: but Mart Tallow has "Cainche ingen Cruithnechhan." Colgan (Acta Sanctorum, p. 174) calls her St. Caniera, daughter of Cruithneachan, and she was a virtuous woman, she lived in the solitude of a hermit, and was hermit for many years, in the district of ancient Carberry, County Cork, especially at Cill-Chuillinn. She is commemorated Jan. 28.

2. St. Kennerie, virgin martyr, is given Oct. 29 in the Scotch calendars. She is said to have been a companion of St. Ursula, on the Lower Rhine, in the middle of the 5th century, but to have escaped when the others were martyred. She was afterwards murdered through jealousy, and special honor was given to her relics by St. Wilfrid. She had dedications in the south-west of Scotland.

Cairreach Dergain, an Irish saint, commemorated Feb. 9, was the sister of St. Euna of Arran, in Galway Bay, of the race of Cola-da-chrieoche, and family of Ogielle, in Ulster. Her father was Conall Derg. Her death is entered in the Four Masters at 577, and she is commemorated Feb. 9. Although her monastery is placed at Chonbarren, parish of Moore, County Roscommon, there is no little doubt as to her place and time.

Cairrell (Lat. Caerellus), an Irish saint, commemorated June 13. On this day Mart Doneg, and Tallaght put Cairrell bishop of Tir-Rois, and the former adds, from the Life of St. Colman Ela, that bishop Carell was along with him when he went to Lamlu, in the end of the 6th century. This must be Carellus, son of Nessan, of Leinster descent, who is the contemporary of Sta. Colman Ela, and Senan, and the bishop at Tir-Rois. See Colgan, Acta Sanctorum, p. 611.

Cairian. See Carelan.

Cairn (Saxon, ear, hill or heap), in British and Scottish heathendom, was an artificial mound, encircled by trenches, on which the original natives performed judicial and sacred ceremonies. They were probably sepulchral monuments of eminent chiefs, and finally became noted landmarks. Public meetings were often held on them, and it is thought that criminals were executed there, and a fire was continually kept burning on them. Out of reverence, the hill in early times was only approached from the east and west. See Altar; Stone.

Cairnscote, Alexander, a Scotch prelate, was of the family of Cairnscotes of Cowsimle, and was a dyer in the Canongate of Edinburgh, which employment he exercised for many years. He took his degree of Doctor at the University of Paris in 1677, was licensed to preach in 1662, and became minister at Trinity Church, Edinburgh, in 1663, and afterwards at Dumfries until 1684, when, by the recommendation of the duke of Queensberry, he was promoted to the see of Brechin, and advanced to the archbishopric of Glasgow the same year. He continued there until 1686, when, having incurred the displeasure of the king, he was removed, Jan. 13, 1687. In 1693 he was made bishop of Raphoe, in Ireland, where he continued until his death, in May, 1701, aged about sixty-four years. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 168, 268; Fasti Eccles. Scoticium, i, 96, 559; ii, 380; iii, 609.

Cairnscote, Robert, a Scotch prelate, was of the family of Balmasheannar, in the shire of Angus, and was provost of the collegiate church of Corstorphine, and chaplain to the earl of Argyll, and was created a baronet in 1587, by warrant from the office of high-treasurer upon the fall of the earl of Angus, Sept. 5, 1528. He was soon after made abbot of Holyrood, but was turned out in 1529. He was made bishop of Ross in 1540, and was, by the parliament, appointed to be one of the lords of the council to the governor, the earl of Argyll. He joined with the lords of the clergy in opposing the treaty of peace with England, and the marriage of the infant queen with the prince of Wales. He probably died in 1545. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 190.

Cainnach is the name of several Irish saints.

1. One of this name (written Caenmack) appears in the Four Masters among the deans of A.D. 773 (rather 784), as son of Sibhine, and prior of Armagh. In the Annals of Ulster, A.D. 783, he is called "Cernach mac Sibhne quoquimiu Ardmach."—i.e. house-steward of Armagh.

2. Commemorated March 28, was the son of Saran and Pompa (or Beorna), and was born after A.D. 450. His brothers were St. Berchan and St. Ronan, and his monastery was probably at Cruachan Ligean, on Lough Foyle, near Lifford. He must have died about A.D. 530, and thus could scarcely have been associated with St. Patrick in revising and purifying the Irish laws.

3. Cail Eullen—commemorated May 16—is probably the St. Carough or Eoghan of the Cuidamus of Cornaun, the son of Carraerus. He flourished about A.D. 450, and was the son or grandson of Ceredig. Choosing the religious life, he went to Ireland, where he co-operated with St. Patrick. He returned to Britain, but eventually died in Ireland. Colgan cannot decide whether this Cairne or the one preceding is the Carneuches Moel who wrote the Acts of his master, St. Ciaran. This Cairne is said to have come from Cornwall to join St. Patrick, and to have helped him to compile the Brehon laws. He, therefore, lived in the 6th century. His burial-place is said to be at Dulane, in Meath. The Welsh represent him as the son of Ceretic, and say that he was born in Cardigan.

Cairnes, John, a Scotch clergyman, held meetings in Edinburgh in support of the Protestant faith in 1555, and was a reader there in 1561. He was admitted to the ministry by the assembly in 1566, and was the fourth minister in the city in 1568. He was banished and put to forced labor there, but his friends interceded for him, and he was reinstated in 1568, and again in 1588 and 1590. He was for some time clerk to the session, and died in 1595. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticium, i, 6.

Cairney, Robert de, a Scotch prelate, was made bishop of Dunkeld in 1396, and held the office about forty years. He acquired the lands of Crawford, in the same parish, during his possession of the see. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 85.

Cairns, Adam (1), a Scotch clergyman, was educated at the parish school of Temple; was licensed to preach in 1787; presented to the living at Longforgan in 1793; had a new church built in 1795, and died Nov. 6, 1821, aged sixty-three years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticium, iii, 716.

Cairns, Adam (2), D.D., a Scotch clergyman (son of the preceding), studied at the Edinburgh University; was licensed to preach in 1824; became assistant to Sir Henry Moncrieff Wellwood, Bart.; was presented by the earl of Wemyss to the living at Manor in 1828, and ordained; transferred to Dunbog in 1833, and promoted to Cussar in 1837. He joined the Free Secession in 1843. His health failing, he was sent as a missionary to Gibraltar; demitted his charge, and settled in Chalmers Church, Melbourne, Australia, in 1853. He published Some Objections to Universal Atonement, and other Sermons:—The Second Woe (1862); and The Origin and Obligation of the Sabbath. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticium, i, 251; ii, 463, 490.
Cairns, Christopher, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the Edinburgh University in 1728; was licensed to preach in 1729; was called to the living at Tweedmouth, and in 1734, in like manner, as chaplain, to be confined to himself to the boundaries of his diocese on the day of his consecration. That the patriarch should not apply to his own use the offerings made in the churches on festival days, or at certain accustomed times, but that they should be at the disposal of the bishop of the diocese; except the Lord's, in some degree, be consigned to his occupation, to take such offerings in lieu of his usual pension.

Cyril and his suffragans retired from the vizier's presence, rejoicing that so dangerous an appeal had had so happy an issue.

Cairo, Ferdinando, an Italian historical painter of the Pedeantese school, was born at Casal Monferrato in 1666 (others say 1655 or 1671), and studied with his father, and afterwards with Bevilacqua in Bologna. He executed the frescoes on the ceiling of the Church of San Antonio at Brescia. He died at Brescia in 1730. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cairrotte, Paolo Maurizio, an Italian prelate, was born in Turin in 1726. In 1761 he was called, contrary to his wishes, to the episcopal see of Asti. He reformed the customs of the clergy, and died in 1786. See Instruction à la Jeunesse Écclésiastique (1775). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cairpre (Lat. Carboreu, or Corporeus). There were several Irish saints of this name, but most of them are very obscure; such as Cairpre, bishop of Maghille, memorated May 3; Corporeus of Clonmacnoise, Nov. 1; and Cairpre, bishop of Cill-Chairpre, in Tir-Aedha. Colgan (Acta Sacra, p. 509) gives a memoir of St. Corporeus Cram of Cluanmicona (March 6), who died in 889. Among the disciples of St. Finnian (Feb. 23) is given St. Cairpre, bishop of Culli-rathain, venerated Nov. 11. He is said to have been a disciple of St. Mo-henna (q. v.), and in the Life of that saint there is an account of the saint's being carried by pirates into Amorica, in Gaul, and there put to grinding corn. He was released, and consecrated bishop by St. Brugcassus; flourished at Culli-rathain, now Colleraine, in 540; and died about 560. See Colgan, Acta Sanctorum, p. 406, c. p. 438, and Tr. Tham, p. 148, 148; "Lanigan, Eccle. Hist. of Ireland, ii, 77-79; Reeves, Eccles. Antiq. s. v., 76, 188, 247.

Caisan. See Cassan.

Caius (Gr. Καίος, i.e. Gaius) is the name of several early Christians, not otherwise noted.

1. Only one Gaius is named among the seventy disciples by Dorothesus, and he is said to have succeeded Timothy in the see of Ephesus. In the Menology he is commemorated Nov. 4. This may be the Gaius who is addressed in the third epistle of John, if we suppose Diotrephes to have held the see when the epistle was written.

2. Caius, bishop of Pergamos, is named in the Apostolical Constitutions (vi, 46).

3. The twenty-first bishop of Jerusalem, according to Eusebius (H. E. vii, 12), and called Gaius in the Chronicon (sub anno 160); and by Epiphanius (Harr. 66, p. 687).

4. The twentieth bishop of Jerusalem, and called Gaius in the Chronicon (sub anno 160). Only one of these is named in Rufinus.

5. Martyr of Eumena, at Apamea, who refused to be reconciled with the Montanists. In the Roman martyrologies he is commemorated March 10.

6. Arrested with Dionysius of Alexandria, A.D. 250, and confined with him in a desert place of Libya. He is commemorated with Dionysius by the Greeks, Oct. 4, as a deacon and martyr.

7. Priest of Dido's, was excommunicated, with the approval of Cyprian (Ep. 28), for receiving the lapsed without penance. He is supposed by Tillemont (iv, 94) to have been one of five schismatics named in epistle 40.

8. Gaius, Fortunatus, and Antus are commemorated, Aug. 28, at Salerno, as patron saints; and are supposed to have been companions of Felix. They are not mentioned in the Martyrology of that day, but the first two are frequently joined in the Hieronymian Martyrology—e.g., Jan. 19, Feb. 2, March 4.

9. One of the martyrs of Saragossa.

10. Martyr, at Nicomedea, Oct. 12, with twelve soldiers, and commemorated in the Roman martyrologies.

11. One of the forty martyrs of Sebaste. This name is frequently joined in the Hieronymian martyrology, and occurs in the Lesser Roman Martyrology on April 19 (at Militiana) and on Nov. 20 (at Messina). Usually adds one (at Bononia) Jan. 4, and one drowned March 4.

12. Deacon of Alexandria, who followed Arius, and signed his letter to St. Alexander.

13. Orthodox bishop of Thumis, in Egypt, who assisted at the councils of Tyre, Sardica, and Nice. He had to flee from the Arian persecution, and perhaps appears at the Council of Alexandria in A.D. 362, as bishop of Paretosia, in the Libyan desert.

14. The Arian bishop of Pannonia, who was at the Council of Milan in 355, and at the Council of Rimini in 359, maintained the third confession of Sirmium, and was deposed. Afterwards he was reinstated, and sent on a deputation to Constantius. The Semi-Arians who were deposed at Constantinople in 360 asked the Western churches to hold him excommunicated, which they accordingly did, in 371.

15. A heretic, to whom Augustine writes in 390 his epistle 19, sending him all his books.

16. Supposed Donatist bishop at Carthage; others read Cursus.

17. Patriarch of Alexandria. See Galanus (6).

18. Monk. See Dionysius the Areopagite.

Caius, bishop of Rome from Dec. 17 (167), 283, to April 22, 296—i.e., for twelve years, four months, and one week (Pontificale, Bucher, p. 272); but only eleven years, according to Anastasius (c. 24), and for fifteen years, according to Eusebius, who speaks of him as a contemporary (H. E. vii. 22; Chron. 284). He is probably the same as Caius the deacon, imprisoned with pope Stephen in 257. Caius is said, in the early pontificate, to have avoided persecution by hiding in the crypta. He is stated by Anastasius to have established the six orders of usher, reader, exorcist, subdeacon, deacon, and presbyter, as preliminary stages necessary to be passed before attaining the episcopal order also to have divided Rome into parishes, and assigned them to the deacons. He is said to have sent Protus and Januarius on a mission to Sardinia. According to the 6th century pontifical he died in peace, and is not called a martyr earlier than by Bede and Anastasius. From a confusion between the calends of March and of May, in the Mart. Hieron., Rabanus assigns his death, and Notker his burial, to Feb. 20. His commencement on July 1, in the latter martyrlogy, is unexplained. He was the last of the twelve popes buried in the crypt of Sixtus, cemetery of Calixtus; and is, therefore, mentioned again Aug. 9, at which date a great cathedral of Christ and the Virgin was created, set up by Sixtus III., was placed in the margin of the ancient martyrlogy.

Cajeta, a cardinal, of Placentia, and legate of the pope in France, lived in the latter part of the 16th century. He wrote Littera ad Universos Regni Franciae Catholici, super Conventu quorundam Ecclesiasticorum ab Henrico Borbonico ad Oppidum St. Dionisii Indici (Paris, 1557). Also described a cathedral of Catholic opinion in Regno Franciae ab Hieraciti Parvibus Sanct (ibid., ed.). See Hoefer, Noue. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cajeta, Constantino, an Italian Benedictine, was born at Syracuse, in Sicily, in 1560. Having joined his order in 1686 at Catania, he was called to Rome, where he assisted the famous Baronius in the edition of his Annales, and where he was also appointed by Paul V. custos of the Vatican Library. In 1621 he commenced the erection of the College de Propaganda Fide, which was completed by Gregory XV., and for which he was made first president. Cajetan died Sept. 17, 1650. He edited the works of Petrus Damianus, the Sanctum Trium Episcoporum, Isidori Hispalensis Vita et Acta, etc. See Mongiatoria, Bibliotheca Sicula; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i. 916. (B. F.)

Cajetan, Mario, an Italian Capuchin of Bergamo, who died in 1636, at a very advanced age, and left a number of ascetical works, for which see Hoefer, Noue. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cajetan, Ottavio, an Italian Jesuit, was born at Syracuse, in Sicily, Aug. 22, 1666; and died, as rector of the college at Palermo, March 8, 1690. He wrote Vita Sanctorum Sicorum ex Antonii Gracii Latinae Monumenta (edited by Peter Salerno of Palermo, 1657):—Isagogae ad Historiam Sacram Scilicet (ibid. 1797). See Alegambe, Bibliotheca Scriptorum Societatis Jesu; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i. 576, 815; Hoefer, Noue. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. F.)

Cajetan, Sebastien, a French theologian of the order of the Observants Minorites, lived in the first half of the 17th century. He was provincial of his order, and left in Latin a commentary on the Decretals. See Hoefer, Noue. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cajot, Jean Joseph, a French Benedictine of the congregation of St. Vannes, was born at Verdun-sur-Meuse in 1726; joined the order at Hautvilliers in 1743; and died in his native town July 7, 1779, leaving a number of archeological and critical works, for which see Hoefer, Noue. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cakebread, Charles, an English Baptist minister, was born near Banbury, Oxford County, in 1755. His father was a minister, and he united with the Church at the age of eighteen; and, after studying for a time, was ordained pastor at Marylebone, Portsea. Subsequently he became pastor at Landport. While absent from London on a journey of health, he died in London, Dec. 2, 1858. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1861, p. 97. (J. C. S.)

Calabro, a dark or ruddy fur from Calabria, used for the almucnes of minor canons and priests vicars in English cathedrals.

Calabre, Edme, a French priest of the Oratory, was born at Troyes in 1665; and died, as professor at Soissons, June 15, 1710. During the last fifteen years of his life he was employed at Soissons in preparing young priests for their spiritual calling. He left a Pariaphrase on the Psalms, and some Sermons. See Landou, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Noue. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Calahan, James, a Methodist Episcopal minister, son of Rev. George Calahan, a Methodist preacher, was born in 1807. He experienced religion when but a boy, and in 1826 entered the Ohio Conference. In 1828 he became superannuated; and died Nov. 9, 1883. Mr. Calahan was a young man of considerable talent and culture, deep piety, and usefulness to the Church. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1885, p. 343.

Calais. See CALK-crus.

Calais, Henni de, a French Capuchin of the 17th century, wrote an Apology against the adversaries of his order (Paris, 1640, fol.).

Calamanda was a virgin martyr, honored Feb. 5, at Calafa, diocese of Vico, in Spain, of whose history nothing is known (Tillemon, v, 550).
Calame, Mary Anne, was a philanthropist of the Society of Friends. In early life the poor and the helpless were her objects of care. Her efforts to reclaim the children of vicious parents led her at last to the establishment of a kind of home for them. She began with only five children, asking at first about a farthing a month for their support, from each of her neighbors. In 1832 the institution which she established at Locle, Switzerland, as a refuge for the young from vice and misery, contained two hundred and fifty children. These were nourished, clothed, and educated by benevolent contributions, under her direction. These contributions came largely from the Society of Friends in England. In this work she was assisted by her intimate friend, Marguerite Zimmerlin, during a score of years. In 1828 she cleared the religious services after the manner of the Quakers, not only in the institution which she had founded, but also in Neuchâtel. She died Oct. 22, 1834, leaving the orphanage in the hands of a committee, together with all the funds which she had collected for it. See The Friend, viii, 366.

Calame, Roman, a French chronologist of the congregation of St. Vannes, was a native of Mortec, in Franche-Comté. He entered the order at the abbey of St. Evre de Touj, June 3, 1644; taught philosophy, belles-lettres, and theology in several convents; and died at Fontaine, near Lescuit, Sept. 4, 1707, leaving a number of historical and other works, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Calamus, in ecclesiastical usage, is (1) the reed—the single upright shaft which supported the table of an altar, called also Calamina. In the 5th century there were, according to local usages, two or four pillars, and a fifth, in the centre, which supported the reliquary, was sometimes added, as in St. Martha's at Tarascon, St. Agrippa's at Avignon, and one at Marseilles, formerly in the abbey of St. Denis. The space between these columns served as a sanctuary for fugitives. (2) Called also Fisula, Siphon, and Cana—a narrow tube or pipe of precious metal, which was for some time used after the 10th century, or, as some say, a still earlier date, in the Western Church, by the communicants, for auction, when partaking of the chalice. Bishop Leo of Trier, in 1046, gave a silver pipe to Exeter Cathedral; William Rufus gave other kinds to Worcester. The custom was long retained at St. Denys and Cluny, at the coronation of the kings of France; and the pope still, at a grand pontifical mass, uses a golden pipe at communion when he celebrates alone in conjunction with his deacon and subdeacon. The Benedictines and Carthusians communicated the laity with a reed in Italy, in memory of the bitter draught of vinegar, gall, and myrrh offered in a reed to the dying Saviour on the cross, and also to avoid any risk of spilling the consecrated wine, and to obviate the repugnance of some persons to drinking from the same cup with others.

Calamy, Benjamin, D.D., an eminent English divine, son of Edmund the elder, was educated at St. Paul's School, and at St. Catharine's College, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow in 1688. He was chosen minister of St. Mary Aldermanbury, April 25, 1677, and soon after appointed chaplain to the king. In 1683 he became vicar of St. Lawrence Jewry, with St. Mary Magdalen, Milk Street, attached. June 18, 1685, he became a prebendary of St. Paul's. He died in January, 1686. He published several single sermons, and some collections of sermons. His celebrated Discourse about a Scrupulous Conscience was preached in 1683, and published in the following year. See Calamy, Benjamin, s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Rose, Gen. Biog. Dict. s. v.

Calamy, James, an English clergyman, younger brother of Benjamin, was educated at Cambridge (graduating in 1672). He became prebendary of Exeter, and died in 1714. He published some sermons. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Rose, Gen. Biog. Dict. s. v.

Calander, Sharauf Bu-All, a Moslem fanatic, lived in the 15th century. At the age of fourteen he went to the court of Jugh, which he ruled for twenty years in outward science. He then pretended to have become inwardly enlightened, threw his books into the river Jenua, and travelled as a religious teacher. CAldleOUGH, John, a Scottich clergyman, was third master at St. Mary's College, St. Andrews; minister at Abdie in 1594; and was appointed constant Moderator of the Presbytery in 1606. He was charged before the High Commission in 1611, for unadvisedly giving admission to a minister at Strathmiglo, but was only admonished, and remained. He was a member of the ABD 1600, 1601, 1608, 1610, and generally supported the measures of the court. He is described as a vain boaster and unwise. He died in 1612.

See Fasli Eccles. Scotiaeana, ii, 466, 467.

CAlDER, Charles, A.M., a Scotch clergyman (son of the minister at Croy) took his degree from the University and King's College, Aberdeen, in 1767. He was licensed to preach in 1773, and called to be minister at Urrquhart in 1775. In 1776 he was the SED new church built in 1755. He died Oct. 1, 1812, aged sixty-three years. He was a man of saintly character, gentle, benign, but majestic in his simplicity. He was a successful minister, generous to the poor, and esteemed by all his parishioners. See Fasli Eccles. Scotiaeana, iii, 200.

CAlDER, Frederic, an English Wesleyan minister, was born in 1785. He was converted at the age of fifteen; entered the ministry in 1808; became a super-numerary at Bedford in 1842; removed to Chelsea in 1844, and died June 20, 1851, in the sixty-sixth year of his age. He travelled sixteen different circuits. His ministry was earnest, persuasively and successfully. Calder was a diligent student. Besides minor publications, he wrote, Memoirs of Simon Episcopus (Lond. 1835; New York, 1837, 12mo). See Minutes of the British Conference, 1851.

CAlDER, Hugh, A.M., a Scotch clergyman (son of the minister at Croy), took his degree from King's College, Aberdeen, in 1767. He was licensed to preach in 1776, and was living at Croy in 1777. He had a vacant by following his father's death, and ordained. He died Aug. 31, 1822, aged seventy-seven years. His son Alexander was a minister. See Fasli Eccles. Scotiaeana, iii, 250.

CAlDER, James, a Scotch clergyman (son of the minister at Cawdor), was licensed to preach in 1738; appointed minister at Ardersier in 1740, and ordained; he refused an earnest call from Inverness in 1746, and was transferred to Croy in 1747; he had a new church built in 1767, and died Dec. 24, 1775, aged sixty-four years. He had three sons, all in the ministry. See Fasli Eccles. Scotiaeanae, iii, 244, 245, 250.

CAlDER, John (1), a Scotch clergyman, chaplain to Sir James Calder, was licensed to preach in 1768. Having a knowledge of the native language, he was appointed to go to Sutherland by the General Assembly of 1704; was recalled, and appointed minister at Cawdor in 1705, and was ordained the same year. He died in March, 1717. See Fasli Eccles. Scotiaeana, iii, 248, 249.

CAlDER, John (2), A.M., a Scotch clergyman (son of the minister at Croy), took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1764. He was licensed to preach in 1768, and at the living at Croy in 1775; transferred to Roskeen in 1775, and died June 1, 1783, aged thirty-nine years. He was both pious and popular. See Fasli Eccles. Scotiaeana, ii, 817; iii, 323.

CAlDER, John (3), D.D., a Scotch Dissenter, was born at Aberdeen in 1738, and educated at the University of Edinburgh. He settled with a congregation at Alnwick, Northumberland, where he married a lady of fortune. In 1770 he removed to London, and succeeded Dr. Price at Poor Jury Lane. Soon afterwards the society was dissolved, Dr. Calder became a member of Mr. Belsham's Unitarian congregation in the Strand, and devoted himself chiefly to his literary work. He died in 1792. He published a Sermon (1772)—a translation of Le Courayer's Last Sentiments on Religion.

Calder, Robert, a Scottish Episcopal clergyman, was born in 1650, at Elgin, in Morayshire. He was graduated from King's College, Aberdeen, in 1674, and ordained about 1680. In 1689 he was appointed to the parish of Newthorn, in the county of Berwick, but refused to acknowledge William and Mary, and was deprived of his curacy, and imprisoned for eleven months in Edinburgh jail for exercising his ministerial functions. He died in Edinburgh, May 28, 1723. He published Scottish Presbyterian Eloquence (Lond. 1693):—Three Sermons (1701):—Reasons for a Toleration of the Episcopal Clergy (Edinburgh, 1703):—The Divine Right of Episcopacy (1705):—The Lawfulness of Set Form of Prayer (1706):—The Genuine Epistles of Ignatius, etc. (1708):—The Nail Struck in the Head (1712):—Remarks on the Oath of Abjuration (1712):—Comparison between the Kirk and the Church of Scotland (1712; Lond. 1841):—Machiavel Relating to Rites and Ceremonies, etc. (1713):—The Priesthood of the Old and New Testament (1716, 1717):—Verses on King James's Death, and other works. See Fasi Ecclec. Scotiana, i, 468; Rose, Gen. Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Am. Authors, s. v.

Calderari, Cesare, an Italian monk, a native of Vicenza, lived at the close of the 16th and the beginning of the 17th century, and wrote several ascetic works, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Calderino, Giovanni (2), an Italian theologian of the 16th century, is known by a work entitled De Heresia (1571), relating to the duties of an inquisitor. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Calderon, Antonio, bishop elect of Granada in 1622, was born at Baeza, in the diocese of Toledo, and died in 1654, before consecration, leaving three or four works on the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin, etc.

Calderwood, Archibald, A.M., a Scotch clergyman (son of the Dean of Guild of Edinburgh), was baptised Jan. 22, 1636; took his degree at the Edinburgh University in 1652; was called to the living at Dalkeith in 1659, and ordained. He died March 4, 1680. See Fasi Eccles. Scotiana, i, 265.

Calderwood, William (3), A.M., a Scotch clergyman (related to the historian), took his degree at the Edinburgh University in 1649. He was in the service of Sir Adam Hepburn, a Lord of the Session, from 1648; was licensed to preach in 1652; admitted minister at Legerwood, by Act of Parliament, in 1662, though he often visited the parish privately afterward. He was restored by Act of Parliament in 1659; was a member of the General Assembly in 1692, and died June 19, 1706, aged eighty years, having earned a high reputation for sanctity of life and ministerial usefulness. See Fasi Eccles. Scotiana, i, 527, 528.

Caldicott, Thomas Ford, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in the village of Long Buckley, Northamptonshire, England, March 21, 1803. His father was a deacon and lay-preacher of the Baptist Church in that village. The son became a Christian at the age of seventeen. He soon began to preach, having received a license from his Church. Feeling the need, however, of further preparation for his profession, he studied for a time in a school of some note in Chippen Norton, and then himself opened a school in Leices- ter, employing his leisure hours in the study of the language, under the tuition of a competent teacher. He came to America in 1827, and opened a school in Quebec, preaching on the Sabbath in the city and its neighborhood. After a time, he became con- nected with the 79th Highland Regiment, acting as tutor in the family of the commanding officer, and afterwards as regimental schoolmaster. He was with the regiment in Montreal, Kingston, and Toronto. In the latter city he closed his engagement with the army, and devoted himself to teaching a private school. Not satisfied, however, with his vocation as a teacher, and longing to become an active pastor, he gave up his school, and was ordained in 1834 as pastor of the Church in Chinguacousy, Canada. He remained there about a year, and in 1835 he was called to Lockport, N. Y., where he had a successful ministry of four years. Subsequently he was called to fill important pulpits in Roxbury, Mass., in what is now the Dudley Street Church, in the First Baptist Church, Charles- town, and in the Baldwin Place Church, Boston. Nineteen years were spent in New England in these three churches, and two or three years in the employ of the Northern Baptist Education Society. While acting as pastor of the Baldwin Place Church, in Boston, he was visited with a severe illness, which compelled him to resign his pastorate. He was indisposed for a year, a part of which he spent in Europe. On returning he took charge of a new church which had been formed at Williamsburg, N. Y. He was also, for a time, pastor of the Lee Avenue Church, Brooklyn. In 1860 he removed to Toronto, and became pastor of the Bond Street Baptist Church, where his ministry was eminently successful. During the entire length of his service as a pastor, his pulpit gospel, which was of some thirty-five years' duration, is estimated that he baptized upward of a thousand persons. His death, which was almost instantaneous, took place July 9, 1869. See Memorial Sermon, by Rev. William Stewart. (J. C. S.)

Caldonius, bishop of an unknown African see, first appears (Cyprian, Ep. 24) as asking the opinion of Cyprian, a presbyter, whether the gifts of the clergy of the Roman church who have been consecrated in Rome, and who are authorized to celebrate communion, be subject to the rules of the Roman church, and are under the obligation of obedience to the See of Rome. Although the expression of the word "peace" may not be given to the lapsed, who, on subsequent confession, suffered excommunication and banishment. In 251 he was appointed by Cyprian to visit Carthage, to relieve sufferers by persecution, assist them in resuming their trades, to influence the lapsed, etc. Afterwards he was charged with the excommunication of Felicius, but in the same year was sent with Fortuna-
CUS to Rome, from the Carthaginian synod, to report on the election of Cornelius and the position of Novatian (Ep. 44, 45). They also conveyed to Cornelius the last synodical letter about Felixcecimus, and copies of Cyprian's forty-first and forty-third epistles on the same subject. In 232 he appears as second bishop, by seniority, at the Council of Carthage, and in the same rank at the fifth Council of Carthage, in 355.

Caldwell, Abel, a Congregational minister, was born in Massachusetts, and graduated from Dartmouth College in 1817, and from Andover Seminary in 1821. He was ordained Feb. 27, 1822, and immediately afterwards became home missionary in New York. He labored at West Creek, from 1823 to 1825; Black Creek, from 1827 to 1830; in the Presbyterian Church at Portage, from 1830 to 1835; became stated supply at Sheldon, from 1835 to 1838; at Black Creek, from 1839 to 1841; at Centreville, in 1841 and for some time afterwards. He acted as colporteur in New York and Canada from 1850 to 1860. He died at Black Creek, Aug. 1, 1861. See Geneal. of Andover Sem., iii. p. 44.

Caldwell, Asa, a Baptist minister, was born in Orange County, N. Y., in 1796, and united with the Church in Spencer, Tioga Co. Not long after this he commenced preaching, in which work he continued until nearly the close of his life. He was pastor of churches in Oswego, Tompkins, Herkimer, and Cortland counties, where many of the converts were converted through his instrumentality. He is represented as having been an earnest scriptural preacher, with a warm and catholic heart, and a vigorous advocate of temperance and anti-slavery. Not meeting with the sympathy which he looked for as a moral reformer, he became disheartened, and for a time withdrew from association with his brethren. In January, 1856, he closed his connection with the Calvinst Baptist, and became a member of a Free-will Baptist Church, in Summer Hill, Cayuga Co. He died in Locke, Cayuga Co., June 26, 1859. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1860, p. 90. (J. C. S.)

Caldwell, Asbury, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Paris, Me., about 1810. He was converted in early life, and in 1832 entered the Maine Conference. He died Dec. 1, 1842. Mr. Caldwell was friendly in disposition, of great intellectual activity, a fluent speaker, strikingly original, sound in doctrine, and eminently pious. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1843, p. 344.

Caldwell, Booth, an Irish Presbyterian minister, was born near Omagh, and in 1797 was ordained minister. In 1839 he was appointed clerk of the Synod of Ireland. He was emphatically a man of prayer, and as such he was held in memory by those who knew him. —Reid, Hist. of the Presb. Church in Ireland.

Caldwell, David, a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born at Bennington, Vt. In early life he removed to Virginia, and was ordained at Alexandria in 1841, serving in the ministry seventeen years, at Petersburg, a rector for a time, at the Church, Norfolk; and two years before his death succeeded to the rectorship of St. James's, Leesburg. He died there Nov. 25, 1858, aged forty-three years. Mr. Caldwell was about to publish a series of lectures on the Psalms, when he died. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev., 1859, p. 480.

Caldwell, Ebenezer Bowditch, a Congregational minister, was born in Massachusetts. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1814; and also took a course in theology in Andover Theological Seminary, graduating in 1817. He was ordained July 10, 1818; and was pastor of a Congregational church in Indiana, and at Waynesboro', Ga. He died at Bath, Ga., Aug. 6, 1830. See Gen. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem., 1870, p. 52.

Caldwell, Isaac Nelson, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Jefferson County, Tenn., March 14, 1838. He graduated from Maryville College, Maryville, in 1858; and studied theology in the Union Theological Seminary, New York City. In 1861 he was licensed by the Newark Presbytery, and stationed at Fayetteville, Tenn. His health, which was rapidly declining when he entered the ministry, soon rendered him unable to perform pastoral duties. He removed to North Carolina in 1864, but returned to Tennessee in 1867. He died at Union City, May 16, 1867. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1868, p. 318.

Caldwell, James, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the Glasgow University in 1800; was ordained minister at Bothkennar in 1803; transferred to Falkirk in 1810, and died in October of the same year, aged about thirty-six years. He published The Laws of Mason’s Archidom or Sanctuarie (Edin- burgh, 1625; partly republished in 1662). See Fusi Eccles. Scotianae, i, 186; ii, 699.

Caldwell, James Douglas, a Presbyterian minister, was born Sept. 24, 1847, near Elizabeth, Allegheny Co., Pa. He prepared for college at Beaver Academy, and from Princeton College in 1871; also studied three years at Jefferson College; spent one year at Princeton Seminary, and two at the Allegheny Seminary, where he graduated. He was licensed by Redstone Presbytery, April 22, 1873; and was ordained as an evangelist by Wooster Presbytery, Sept. 9, 1874. In 1875 he was elected minister of the First Presbyterian Church in Texas as a home missionary. There he gathered three churches, and been laboured there since in supplying the churches of Cambridge and Adora. In 1878 he travelled three hundred and seventy miles in his own conveyance to Austin, in order to attend the first meeting of the new synod of Texas, to be organized as ordered by the preceding General Assembly. He was also a member of the elected clerk of this last synod, and was an active part in the proceedings; also assisted at the communion table on the Sabbath. He died next day, Oct. 14, 1878. See Necrolog. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem., 1879, p. 61.

Caldwell, John, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the Glasgow University in 1657; had the living of Robertson presented in 1664, but declined it; was admitted to the parish of Portpatrick in 1666, and died at Edinburgh in June, 1669, aged about fifty-four years. See Fusi Eccles. Scotianae, i, 770.

Caldwell, John P., a Presbyterian minister, was licensed by the presbytery of St. Clairsville. His first field of labor was Chardersville, O.; he afterwards served at Sharon and Fredericktown; and subsequently at Florence, Pa.; and still later at Beech Springs, Barnesville, and Rome, O., in 1869. He was married Jan. 31, 1872, aged fifty-three years. Mr. Caldwell was widely known and highly respected. See Presbyterium, Feb. 17, 1872.

Caldwell, Patrick, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1768; appointed minister at Norriestown in 1775, and died March 25, 1796. See Fusi Eccles. Scotianae, ii, 728.

Caldwell, Robert (1), an English Calvinistic Methodist, was very humble; and for a time an itinerant in Lady Huntington's Connection, but preferred a settled pastorate, and in 1800 accepted a call to the Church in Silver Street, London, where he was popular, and had success, but was cut off prematurely in 1803. See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, ii, 182.

Caldwell, Robert (2), an English Congregational minister, was born at Mid-Caldher, near Edinburgh, Scotland, in 1777. When he was quite young his parents moved to Edinburgh; and at the age of fourteen they apprenticed him to the trade of a mason, which he followed till upwards of twenty. In 1799 he became a student of theology, under the care of Mr. Innes, and of Mr. Ewing of Glasgow. In 1802 he commenced labor at Falkirk, where previously the Congregationalist had no regular preaching; and here he soon gathered a Church, to the pastorate of which he was ordained, Nov. 22, 1803. In 1813 he accepted an invitation to Wick, in Caithness, and remained there for nearly twenty years. He removed to Howden-on-the-Tyne, near Newcastle, England, in 1834, where he was the means of building a new church; and, after a successful pastorate of eight years, resting his health, he retired; he died in 1850. Mr. Caldwell was a man of spotless character, great familiarity with the Scriptures, and eminently faithful in all the duties of life. See The Evangelical Magazine (London), 1850, p. 667; (London) Cong. Year-book, 1850, p. 92.

Caldwell, Vincent, a minister of the Society of Friends, was born in Derbyshire, England, in 1674. He became a member of the Society at the age of thirteen or eighteen, under the ministry of John Grafton. After a time he was recognised as a minister by the Friends. He labored for a while in his own country, and then crossed the Atlantic and took up his residence in East Marlborough, Chester Co., Pa., where he continued till his death. His ministry is said to have been "sound and edifying, being attended with the power of truth, and adorned with an exemplary conversation." Twice he made extensive visits to the meetings in the southern provinces of America, and once to several of the West India Islands. See Piety Promoted, iv, 345, 346. (J. C. S.)

Caldwell, William, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the Glasgow University in 1647, and held a bursary of divinity there. He was presented by the king to the living at Ballantrae in 1662, and ordained in 1663. He died in September, 1672. See Fusi Eccles. Scotiaceae, i, 735.

Caldwell, William H., a Baptist minister, commenced as a lay preacher in Halifax, N. S.; was ordained by the White Street Church of Halifax, Sept. 22, 1832; had a successful career; and died in New Germany, 1862. See Bell, Hist. of the Baptists of the Maritime Provinces, p. 411.

Caldwood, David. See Calderwood.

Calcina (or Calceus), Manuel, a Greek monk and theologian, flourished at Constantinople about 1360. He renounced the communion of the Greek Church, and attached himself to the Romish party in the East; became a Dominican, and wrote much on the subject of the Eucharist in dispute between the Greek and Roman churches; e. g., De Processione Sp. Sancti (Ingolstadt, 1698, and in the Bibl. Patrum, t. 26), translated into Latin by Ambrogio Traversari of Camaldoli:—On the Essence and Operations of God, against the Pelagians:—De Præcognitione (Paris, 1499); De Veritate (Gr. and Latin by Coubets, Auctarium Novum:—A Treatise on the Most Holy Trinity, See Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, App. p. 65; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Calef, Jonathan, a Congregational minister, was a native of Kingstown, N. H. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1787; was ordained pastor of the church in Farmfield, Me., June 11; was dismissed in October, 1801; installed at Lyman, Me., in November following; and died in 1845. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 544.

Calef, Robert, was a merchant in Boston in the early part of the last century, who died April 13, 1719. He deserves a place in the records of New England history. He bore a bold hand on the block, and by opposing the infatuation which seems to have pervaded all classes of the community, with reference to witchcraft. He was the author of a work, entitled More Wonders of the Invisible World (London, 1700), which was a reply to Cotton Mather's Wonders of the Invisible World. Mather has distinctly avowed his belief in witchcraft, and that belief was held and proclaimed by the leading divines of the day. So obnoxious was Calef's book, XI—24.

that, by order of Dr. Increase Mather, president of Harvard College, it was burned in the college yard, and a pamphlet was published in defence of the Mathers, bearing the title, Remarks upon a Scandalous Book, etc., which had this motto, "Truth will come off conqueror." Ere long the motto was fully verified, but not in the way in which it was anticipated. The spell which rested upon the community was broken. Bitter regrets was felt by those who had been instrumental in procuring the death of persons charged with the commission of crimes while under the influence of Satanic agency. See Musa. Hist. Coll. vol. iii; Allen, Amer. Biog. s. v. (J. C. S.)

Calefactory (Pisaria, or pyralis, the "Common House") at Durham, is a hereditary name for the keep-room of a monastery or religious house. It was a chamber provided with a fireplace or stove, used as a withdrawing-room by monks, and generally adjoining the refectory. It very often was a portion of the substructure of the dormitory. Here the brethren met before the dinner, and in winter time for warmth. Where there was no Galliere, processions were marshalled here. The preceptor of Benedictines dined his parchment, prepared the waxen tablets and liquefied ink, and the censers were filled by the sacristan's servants in this room. At Winchester a chamber in the south wing of the transept, used for the latter purpose, still retains the name. At the Groves Friary, London Street, was a chamber furnished with tubs and water from the conduit; at Kirkham it had a bench-table, and at Thornton a series of stalls.

Calemerus was a deacon of Antioch at the Council of Alexandria, in A.D. 362.

Calen, Schottos, a German theologian, was born at Riga. He studied at Giesenheim, and became Lutheran pastor of St. Peter's, in his native place, where he remained till his death, July 10, 1653. He has the title of "Best Theorbor of Theological Philosophy" (Giesenheim, 1615)—Pedicis Paschales:—and some Sermons in German. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Calendar, in ecclesiastical usage, is a name for sculptures of agricultural labors, within medallions, found in Norman churches and those of the thirteenth century, as ornaments over doors and porches.

Calendar, Ecclesiastical. A complete alphabetical list of the saints commemorated in the Roman Catholic Church, with the day of each, may be found in Guerin, Les Petits Bollandistes (Paris, 1887), x. 221-592.

Calendario, Filippo, an Italian architect and sculptor, flourished at Venice about 1334. He is erroneously said to have erected the superb porticoes, supported by marble columns, that surround the vast area of the square of St. Mark. There are several other good works, however, in that city, by him, especially the galleries of the ducal palace. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Calendio. See Calando; Candidianus (10).

Calenius, Gualterus, a Welshman, was preferred archdeacon of Oxford about 1120. He was highly prized for his great learning. He went over to Brittany, France, and thence brought back an ancient MS. of the British princes from Brutus to Cadwallader, which he communicated to Geoffrey of Monmouth, who translated it into Latin. Walter continued the same chronicle for four hundred years, until his own time. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttalli), iii, 499.

Calense, Cesare, a Neapolitan painter, about 1590, executed a fine Descent from the Cross, in San Giovanni Battista, at Naples. See Rose, Gen. Bio, Dict. s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Calentyn, Peter, a Flemish theologian, who died in 1658, wrote, Via Crucis a domo Pisatis usque ad Mon.

Calepino (or d'Acalepino), Ambrogio, an Augustinian monk, was born at Bergamo, June 6, 1435. He was descended from an old Italian family of Calepino, whence he took his name. He died Nov. 30, 1611. He devoted his whole life to the composition of a polyglot dictionary of the Bible. A great part of his greater work was afterwards augmented by Passerat and others. The most complete edition was published at Basle in 1590, in eleven languages. The best edition is that published in Padua, in 1772, in seven languages.—Ency. Brit. 9th ed. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Calepodius. (1) A Roman presbyter in whose cemetery (three miles from Rome on the Aurelian way) Calixtus was buried. The distinguished conversions he made at Rome, jointly with Calixtus; his appearing in a vision, after death, to Calixtus in his martyrdom; and the burial of Calixtus, are related in Bede (Martir. May 10, Oct. 14), and partially by Ursinus. His natal name was May 10, as recorded, also, in the lesser Roman martyrology. (2) Bishop of Naples and legate of the pope at the Council of Sardica. But, according to Athanasius, two presbyters signed for the pope, and Calepodius for himself only. May he be the same by whom Liberius wrote to Eusebius of Vercelli, A.D. 354. (3) Donatist bishop of Bazar, in Africa, in 411.

Calert, Michael, a German Lutheran theologian, was born at Zeitz, Sept. 19, 1603. He was son of Laurent Calert, chamberlain of the council at Zeitz, and studied philosophy at Leipsic, and became in 1632, bachelor of theology. Being called, in 1635, to Misnie, as director of the gymnasium, he became, in 1635, pastor and ecclesiastical superintendent at Bischofswerda, and was, in 1649, placed in the same position of Weissenfels. In 1651 he was made doctor of theology at Leipsic. He died at Weissenfels, May 10, 1655. He wrote a large number of works, among which we mention, De Discrimine Legis et Evangelii (Leips. 1634);—De Decalogi Preceptis Prioribus Dubios (ibid. 1631);—Decalogi Preceptum Tertium (ibid. 1632);—Aphorismi de Consciis Oppositis et Asertionibus, etc. (ibid. 1656). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Calea, bishop of Hermethe, was on the list handed over by Meletius to Alexander. See also Cailleux.

Calétricus, Saint, confessor and bishop of Chartres, was present at the third council of Paris in 557, and second Council of Tours in 567. He seems to have died in 571 (or 573). See Acta Trium Dom. Nov. 22, 278.

Caletti, Giuseppe (called il Cremascone), a painter of Ferrara, was born about 1600, and first studied the works of D. Dosso, but afterwards became an imitator of Titian. He has two fine pictures in the church of San Benedetto at Ferrara, representing St. Mark, and the Four Doctors of the church. He died in 1660. See Spooner, Biog. Nat. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Call as a Christian emblem. In the early Church a call (ἐκλέγεσθαι) was used for several things. According to Ariugi (lib. vi, ch. xxxii, vol. ii, p. 820), it represented the Christian soul. He also takes it to represent the apostles laboring in their ministry, quoting various fathers, and St. Chrysostom's idea, that the oxen and saltings spoken of as killed for the Master's feast are meant to represent prophets and martyrs. It has been taken to represent the raising of Lazarus. Lord's spiritually, and his resurrection near the Good Shepherd in Buonarroti (Vetel, tab. v, fig. 2); and Martigny refers to Allegranza (Mon. Antichi di Milano, p. 125) for an initial letter at Milan, where the animal is represented playing on a lyre: typifying, as has been supposed, the subjugation of the life of faith, the life of faith in Alexandria (Padda, lib. i, ch. 5) seems to make a comparison of young Christians to sucking calves; though no such comparison exists in Scripture. See Lynch.

Calfee, William Monroe, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Franklin County, Ind., April 16, 1825, of pious Baptist parents. He was converted in his eighteenth year, but afterwards relapsed into sin. In 1846 he was reclaimed; in 1848 removed to Marion County, Ind., and was licensed to exhort. In 1848 he received license to preach; moved to Iowa in 1859, and in 1861 entered the Western Iowa, now Des Moines, Conference, wherein he labored zealously and successfully until his death, Jan. 7, 1886. Mr. Calfee was a warm-hearted Christian; a ready debater, remarkable for precise and convincing argumentation; an extraordinary temperance lecturer; but, as a preacher, unrestrained, and sometimes even coarse. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1868, p. 288.

Calthill (Calfill, Cavfield, etc.), James, an English prelate, was born in Shropshire in 1580. He was educated at Eton, and entered King's College, Cambridge, in 1545. In 1548 he was removed to Christ Church, Oxford, of which he afterwards became sub-dean. In 1565 he became incumbent of Bocking, in Essex, and archdeacon of Colchester; and in 1570 was nominated to the see of Worcester, but died in August, before his consecration. He left Historia de Ecclesiasticis Catholicae Cathedrae Eboracensis Pontificiis (Lond. 1652, 4to);—An Answer to J. Marticall's Treatise of the Cross (ibid. 1656, 4to). See Rose, Gen. Biog. Dict. s. v.; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Calhoun, William, a Presbyterian minister, was born in 1772 in Prince Edward County, Va. He entered Hampden-Sidney College at the age of fourteen. He was licensed to preach the gospel by the Hanover Presbytery, and in 1790 was made a missionary to Kentucky. He returned to Virginia in 1799, and accepted a call to the Presbyterian Church at Staunton. He died Aug. 27, 1851. He was a man of vigorous intellect and great self-command. See Sprague, Annu. of the Amer. Pulpit, iii, 237.

Calhoun, George Albion, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born in 1799 in Washington, Conn., Oct. 11, 1788. His early education was very limited. In 1812 he joined the junior class in Williams College, but left at the end of the second term to enter Hamilton College, in Clinton, N.Y., from which he graduated in 1814. He also graduated from the Andover Theological Seminary in 1817. The year following he spent as a home missionary in the vicinity of Geneva, N.Y., preaching almost daily. Thence he went to North Coventry in 1818, and was ordained as pastor of the Church there in the following year. By an arrangement with his people, he spent one year in collecting funds for the endowment of the Theological Institute of Connecticut, of which he was a trustee for many years. On account of impaired health, he spent the autumn of 1830 in Maine, in behalf of the American Education Society, and afterwards visited one hundred churches in Connecticut, pleading the cause of home missions. A trip to Europe, from which he returned in November, 1831, greatly improved his health. In 1860 he resigned the active duties of his pastorate, and in September, 1862, received as colleague in the pastoral office Rev. W. J. Jennings. For twenty months he supplied the pulpit of the First Church in Coventry, but was stricken with paralysis in December, 1863, and again in 1866. He died in Coventry, June 23, 1867. His published writings are not numerous. Among them is a series of letters to Dr. Bacon in reply to his attack on the Pastoral Union and Theological Institute of Connecticut. See Cong. Quarterly, 1869, p. 63; Gen. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 92.

Calhoun, Simeon Howard, D.D., a Congregational divine, was born in Boston, Mass., Aug. 15, 1804. He fitted for college at Canajoharie, N.Y., and was a graduate of Williams College in the class of 1829. He was ordained as an evangelist at Springfield, Mass., Oct. 20, 1836. Having entered the service of the American Bible Society, he became their first agent in the Levant, arriving in Smyrna on the 15th of June, 1837. In 1840 he joined the Syrian mission of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. His term of service covered the long period of thirty-one years, 1844 to 1875. His special department was the charge of the seminary at Abein. He returned to his native country on the termination of his connection with this institution. He lived but a short time, his death occurring Dec. 14, 1876. He published, in Arabic, A Hand-book for the Bible and A Life of Christ, in the form of Notes on the Harmony of the Gospels. See Cong. Quarterly, xix, 412. (J. C.)

Calici, Giovanni Battista, an Italian theologian, was a secular priest at Florence towards the end of the 17th century, and wrote Discorsi Apologetici, etc. (Lucca, 1697). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Caliga, a sort of half-boot or stockade made of various material, serving for a defence against cold, and as such worn at times by soldiers; by monks, if in iron or exposed to cold; and by bishops in outdoor dress. The Rule of St. Ferreolus, quoted by Ducange, has an amusing passage forbidding the elaborate cross-gartering of these caligae, out of mere con- cern for dignity, by a monk who wears the caligae as among the "sacred vestments" to be worn by bishops and cardinals is Ivo Caronensis (died 1115). See Buskin.

Caligone, Pierre Antoine D'Ambereszen de, a French preacher and theologian, was born at Greenwich in 1729. Being of a Protestant family, he fled from France on the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, but returned in 1735, and was made royal almoner at Geneva, where he officiated for the French Catholics. During the Revolution he retired to Ponthierry, near Melun, and died Dec. 25, 1735. He is said to have written several works. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Caligro, in Roman mythology, is darkness, the origin of all things, from which Chaos originated. By Chaos, Caligro was mother of night and day, Erebus and Ethei.

Caligula, Se Caus.

Calinfus, as martyr at Apollonia in the reign of Decius, is commemorated, according to Usuard, Mart., on Jan. 28.

Calino, Cesare, an Italian Jesuit theologian, who was born at Brescia about 1669, and died Aug. 19, 1749, wrote several chronological and practical works, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Calino, Mutto, an Italian prelate and theologian, was born at Brescia. He was archbishop of Zara, and, as such, assisted at the Council of Trent. He died at Terni, April 6, 1576. He wrote several works of which we notice Constitutiones Smodales, etc. (1567). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Caliph, or Khalif (Arab. Successor), is the highest ecclesiastical dignity among the Mohammedans, vested with absolute authority, both religious and political. The caliphs are regarded as the vicars or representatives of God. When Bagdad was taken by the Tartars, and the caliphs were compelled to leave them, the Mohammedan princes appointed in their respective dominions a special officer to discharge the spiritual functions of the caliph. In Turkey he was called mufi (q. v.), and in Persia, sadie.

Caliphate is the title of caliph in Mohammedan countries. It continued from the death of Mohammed till the taking of Bagdad by the Tartars in the six hundredth and fifty-fifth year of the Hegira (A.D. 1307). The title was used by every one of the various individuals in Egypt, who assumed to be of the family of the Abbassides, and the successors of the Prophet. The honor of being the true caliphs is claimed at present by the emperors of Morocco.

Calippus, a deacon, is represented as the bearer of the spurious correspondence between Sabinus and Polibus.

Calistus, Johann Heinrich, a German theologian, who was born at Wohlau, in Silesia, in 1633, and died in 1703, court-preacher and member of consistory, is the author of several hymns, of which one has been translated into English by Mills, in Hora Germ, p. 224: "Auf, auf, mein Herz, und du mein ganzer Sinn" (Awake! awake! to holy thoughts awake). See Koch, Gesch, d. deutschen Kirchengesch., iii, 535 sq. (B. P.)

Calixt, Friedrich Ulrich, a Lutheran theologian, son of George Calixt, was born at Helmstedt, March 8, 1622. He studied at his native place, and, after completing his curriculum, travelled extensively. Having returned, he was made doctor of theology, and was soon appointed professor of theology, member of consistory, and steward to the king. He died at Helmstedt, Aug. 7, 1701. He took an active part in the controversies which his father had with Calov and others, and edited also some of his works, as, Respomnua Maledicia Magnification, Theologorum pro Romano Pontificia Infallibilitate, etc. (Helmstedt, 1672)—Disput. 15 de Praesenti Christ. Relig. Capitil. (Bibl. Bodl.)—Tractatus Didero de Precato (ibid. 1659)—Fascic. Programmum et Dissertationum de Persona Christi (ibid. 1663)—De Igno Purga- torio (ibid. 1650). See Pipping, Memoriae Theologorum; Jocher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon. s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 404, 408, 431, 435, 488, 633. (B. P.)

Calylla, in Hindu mythology, is the name of a great evil serpent, who was ultimately overcome and crushed by the god Vishnu in his incarnation Krishna.

Call to the ministry is more a matter of Christian ethics than of Church canons, and yet the early Church was not without its rules upon this subject. The temper that ought to animate those who are to be ordained was held to be one hand, a wise and sober discretion to serve God in some special way, but on the other, also, a shrinking from the fearful responsibility of the ministry; accompanied, however, with obedience to the call of superiors. Under this view, it naturally came to be, and so was the common rule, that the bishops or rightful electors should choose, at least to the higher orders; and in such case the canons enacted that any one already in orders in any degree could not refuse to accept. A like rule would apply in a less degree to the first entry into the ministry; the supply in both cases being supplemented by voluntary candidates, from the necessity of the case, but it being held that the call should come from others, who had authority. On the other hand, the call need not originate with the bishop. It was open, and it was considered a pious act for parents to devote their children to the ministry, not compelling, but exhorting and encouraging them so to devote themselves. The second, in 331, regulates the education of those "whom the will of parents, from the earliest years of infancy, had devoted to the clerical office." Pope Siricius (Ep. i, c. 9, 10) had, before that (385-398), regulated the several periods of years during which such should remain successively in each order of clergy. And Cons. Emeriti, in 666, before the term of years prescribed was limited, to prevent young people for the purpose of making them clergymen. Nor was this restricted to young people with their parents' consent; but older men were permitted to offer themselves for the ministry; yet under certain CALLAHAM, Obadiah B., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Smythe County, Va. He embraced religion in early youth, and in 1852 entered the Holston Conference, wherein he labored with much success until within a few weeks of his death, in September, 1865. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1855, p. 597.

CALLANDER, Alexander (1), a Scotch clergyman, was admitted minister at Killearn in 1572, having Baillierown under his charge; was transferred to Largs in 1574, with Kilbride and Arrossan under his charge; he continued in 1590, but no further mention is found of him. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiaci, ii, 252, 355.

CALLANDER, Alexander (2), a Scotch clergyman, was appointed by the earl of Orkney to the living at South Ronaldsay and Burray in 1684, and was confirmed in the living by the king; he continued in 1689, but is not thereafter mentioned. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiaci, iii, 388.

CALLANDER, Alexander (3), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1621, and was admitted minister at Denny in 1627. A violent flood in 1636 destroyed much of his parish. At the battle of Kilsyth, in 1645, he had protection from the marquis of Montrose. He died in September, 1663, aged about sixty-three years. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiaci, ii, 698.

CALLANDER, Daniel, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1699; became minister at South Ronaldsay and Burray in 1710, with six hundred communicants at the former place, and one hundred at the latter. He was bitterly rebuked by bishop Graham for preaching, in general, against sin; afterwards suspended for giving opinions on various subjects under disciplinary orders: he was finally disposed of by the bishop; yet he preached frequently in Zetland. He was still later admonished by the bishop; but dwelt at the manse, and continued in 1756. He had a testimonial of approval from his brethren in 1688, and was appointed by the synod minister at Birse and Harray in 1695. He died May 15, 1741, aged about sixty-two years. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiaci, iii, 388, 392.

CALLANDER, John, A.M., a Scotch clergyman (son of Alexander 3), took his degree at the Edinburgh University in 1661; was licensed to preach in 1668; was presented to the living at Denny, and ordained in the same year. He died in May, 1686, aged about thirty-five. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiaci, iii, 698.

CALLANDER, Richard, A.M., a Scotch clergyman (son of Alexander 3), studied at the universities of Glasgow and Edinburgh, and took his degree at the latter in 1649. He became chaplain to the countess of Roxburgh; was called to the living at Cockburnspath in 1657; was presented to the living by the king in 1662; collated in 1663; transferred to Falkirk in 1665; and died Jan. 29, 1686, aged sixty years. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiaci, i, 187, 371.

CALLANDER, Robert, a Scotch clergyman, a native of Falkirk, was licensed to preach in 1764; was presented to the living at Kirkmaiden in 1772, and ordained. He died at Maybole, Dec. 29, 1812, aged seventy-four years. He published an account of the parish. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiaci, i, 762.

CALLAWAY, Charles M., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the diocese of Delaware, was born in 1836. He graduated from the Theological Seminary of Virginia in 1850; was rector, in 1858, of a Church in Middleway, Va., and in 1857 of the Church in Topexa, Kan., where he remained until 1861, when he became rector of the Church of the Ascension in Baltimore, Md., and served there until 1870. His next parish was St. John's, under the vicar of the Diocese of the peninsula near Kanawha Court-house. In 1873 he had no regular charge, but in the following year was rector of St. John's, Kanawha Court-house. After this he was rector of Grace Church, Brandywine Hundred. He died suddenly at Wilmington, April 11, 1877. See Prot. Epis. Almanac, 1876, p. 168.

CALLAWAY, Christopher C., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Lincoln County, Tenn., about 1821. He professed conversion in 1838, and in 1844 entered the Alabama Conference. In 1855 he was appointed agent of the Southern University; and died Aug. 11, 1867. Mr. Callaway had but few educational advantages when young, but attained marked mental development. 2 He possessed a fine physique, melodious voice, sensitive temperament, a genial, ardent spirit, and unflagging zeal. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1867, p. 131.

CALLAWAY, Eliza, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Delaware, Jan. 8, 1792. He removed to Hancock County, Ga., in early life, and completed his education in the Department of the South Carolina Conference. In 1834 he was transferred to the Alabama Conference. He died June 21, 1876. He was ever faithful, zealous, and successful: quiet and humble in daily life, but loud, bold, and powerful as a preacher. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1876, p. 457.

CALLAWAY, Enoch, a Baptist minister, was born in Wilkes County, Ga., Sept. 14, 1792. He united with the Sardis Church in 1808, where he was ordained Nov. 7, 1823. He was pastor of churches in his native county and in Oglethorpe County for twenty-five or thirty years. He accomplished much in promoting the cause of Christ in the field of his labor, and greatly built up his denomination. He died Sept. 12, 1852. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 176. (J. C. S.)

CALLAWAY, John, an English Wesleyan minister, was converted at the age of thirteen; entered the ministry in 1815, and was at once sent as a missionary to Ceylon, his stations being Matura, Columbo, and Galle. He returned to England in 1826, where he labored faithfully for several years. He died Nov. 23, 1841, aged forty-eight. He published several works in the Singhalese language, which were widely used. "He was an able divine." See Minutes of the British Conference, 1842.

CALLAWAY, Joshua S., a Baptist minister, was born in Wilkes County, Ga., May 30, 1789, and united with the Church Sept. 23, 1809. In 1818 he removed to Jones County, and having been ordained in 1829, he preached the gospel with great success. He united with the church and then changed his residence to Henry County. He opposed the anti-missionary spirit of the denomination in his native state, and influenced many of his brethren to contribute to aid in sending the gospel to the heathen. During his ministry he baptized many hundreds. He was an able preacher of the New Testament. He died at Jonesborough in 1854. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 176. (J. C. S.)

CALLAWAY, S. T., a Baptist minister, was born in Winchester, Clarke Co., Ky., Jan. 14, 1808; was licensed in 1831, and preached in his native state until 1851, when he removed to Illinois, and resided in Jacksonville, Morgan Co., for some time; and removed to Tuscola, in 1862, where for several years he was pastor of the Church. In 1689 he was elected superintendent of public schools for the county, and re-elected in 1783, and served in both until his death, which occurred on January 7, 1875. He was highly respected and esteemed in the community. See Minutes of Illinois Anniversaries, 1876, p. 1-11.

Callcott, William Hutchins, an English musical composer, was born at Kensington in 1867, and died Aug. 4, 1882. He published some musical pieces, such as The Hymn of Mirth, which he composed for the church of his adopted city. His anthems, "Give peace in our time, O Lord," and "In my father's house are many mansions," are admirable specimens of part-writing, full of deep feeling and refined musical treatment, and are likely to continue favorite works with all church choirs. In the latter years of his life Mr. Callcott enjoyed the friendship of Dean Alford and Charles Kingsley, and in his intercourse with them "he found the truest sympathy with his own deeply religious nature and complete purity of life."

Calleja, Andres de, a Spanish painter, was born at Rioja in 1705. He obtained academic honors and court favor, established a school of painting, and was greatly beloved by both his sovereigns and the people. His works are to be found in the churches of San Croix, of San Felipe le Royal, the convent of St. Francis, and the chapel of the Treasury. He died in 1782.

Callein is a Scottish saint, commemorated Nov. 28. In the parish of Rogart, in Sutherland, the church, dedicated apparently to a saint locally known as St. Calleen, was repaired between 1602 and 1610. In 1830 a yearly fair named Selfswane, or Calleen's, was held at Rogart. It may be that this saint is Colga. See Forbes, Kal. Scot. Saints, p. 294.

Callemborg, Caspar, a German canonist and Jesuit, was born in 1678 at Castrum, in Westphalia. He taught philosophy at Munster, and theology at Paderborn, Munster, Treves, and Aix-la-Chapelle; and died at Koesfeld, Oct. 11, 1742, leaving several historical and other works, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Calloway. See Callendar.

Callender, Aurora, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Shoreham, Vt., March 7, 1798. He removed with his father to Cumberland County, Pa., at the age of seven; experienced conversion in 1818; received license to preach in 1825; and in 1828 moved to Ohio and entered the Pittsburgh Conference. In 1837 he was transferred to the Erie Conference, and in 1849 joined the Wisconsin Conference, wherein he labored until its division in 1856, when he became a member of the Western Wisconsin Conference. In 1867 he was re-transferred to the Wisconsin Conference, labored in its active ranks until 1863, and spent the remainder of his days as a superannuate, dying at Pincneuyville, Ill., Oct. 23, 1871. Mr. Callender began his ministry when circuits were large, support poor, and appointments almost daily. Even as a superannuate he preached nearly every Sunday, and often during the week. He was a man of robust health, an able, educated, instructive preacher, and a devoted Methodist. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1872, p. 118.

Callender, N., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Chazy, Clinton Co., N. Y., Sept. 18, 1800. He removed with his parents to eastern Ohio in 1817; received the best education his circumstances allowed; experienced conversion in 1819; was licensed to exhort in 1823, to preach in 1825, and in the same year entered the Pittsburgh Conference, in which he filled the most important appointments. In 1839, having acquired a knowledge of the German language, he became one of the pioneers of German Methodism in this country; took charge of the Pittsburgh German Mission District, the first of the kind in Methodism, and built there the first German Methodist church in the United States.

In 1840 he was appointed to the New York German Mission; in 1842, as moral instructor at the Western Penitentiary, Pennsylvania; but, in 1845, was appointed to enter the English work. From 1854 to 1859 he presided over the Michigan and Cincinnati German Districts; then again entered the English work; and between 1862 and 1866 acted as hospital chaplain, United States army, Camp Denison, Ohio. From 1866 to 1871 he occupied various important charges in the regular work; and then, on account of the infirmities of age, became superannuated. He died Feb. 6, 1876. Mr. Callender was a man of deep piety, a sound theologian, a good counselor, a warm, steadfast friend, and a successful minister. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1876, p. 103.

Callirôcrates. (1) Bishop of Claudopolis, in Pontus, joined in petitioning Justinian against the Arians. (2) Theologian, who wrote down the dispute of Basil against Photinus.

Callixtus were ornaments for the alb or white tunic, made either of some richly colored stuff or of metal. Examples of these may be seen in Perret, Cat. acobim de Rome, ii, pl. 7; and Garrucci, Vetri Orbati, vi, 5, xxv, 4.

Calligônus was a eunuch and chamberlain to Valentinian I, who insulted Ambrose, A.D. 383, and was afterwards put to death on another and peculiarly infamous charge.

Calliculès are the name of several persons in early Christian fashion. 1. Martyr, of Cilicia, who was made to run six miles in boots bristling with nails inside, to Tanga, in Paphlagonia, where he was burned, and where his church was afterwards famous. He is commemorated July 29. Calliculus is likewise the name of a martyr at Apolloonia under Decius, commemorated Jan. 28; and of a third, commemorated Dec. 14.

2. A Greek sophist and rhetorician, usually assigned to the reign of Gallienus, A.D. 252-268. Clinton (Fasti Rom. ann. 266) points out that the sophist is also assigned to a later date, and thinks that Suidas may have confounded two Caliiculi. Among the works ascribed to him by Suidas (p. 1961 B) are ten books on Alexandrian history, referred to by Jerome (Proc. Com. in Danii).

4. A Melitian bishop of Pelusium, who slandered Athanasius in 381, accused him at Tyre, in 385, of breaking a chalice, and of deposing and ill-treating himself. He was present at the Council of Sardica, and asked permission of the Council of Nice to persevere in schism.

5. Bishop elect of Sangra, sent by Eusebius of Ancyra, who was himself unwilling to ordain him, to Proclus, patriarch of Constantinople, for ordination (A.D. 434-446). He was sent back, however, to Eusebius, who ordained him. He died burned after.

6. Bishop of Apamea, in Bithynia, named the patriarch of Antioch, as well as those of Rome and Constantinople, as leading him to condemn Dioscorus at the Council of Chalcedon (A.D. 451).

7. Patriarch of Constantinople, A.D. 693 (or 692) till 705, the powerful prelate and treasurer of the Church of Blachernae. Soon after his appointment he offended the emperor Justinian by refusing to compose a prayer to be said at the removal of a church. It soon came to his cars that orders had been given to Stephen, the governor of Constantinople, for a general massacre of its inhabitants, to begin with the patriarch. This intelligence, doubtless, disposed him to receive Leontius as a deliverer; and he accompanied that usurper to the font on his entry into the city, publicly welcoming him with the cry, "This is the day which the Lord hath made." On the return of Justinian, in 705, Caliniclus was deprived of his eyes and banished to Rome. See Theophylact, Chron. p. 313; Niceph. Constant. Breviarium, p. 28.

Calliópe, in Greek mythology, was one of the Muses, the oldest daughter of Zeus and Mnemosyne. She possessed the gifts of oratory, of music, of statesmanship, and, later, of poetry. By Apollo, or by Zeus, she became the mother of Linus and Orpheus. By different fathers she had various other children: Ialemus, Hyumenaeus, and the Sirens. Her attributes are sometimes a lyre, sometimes a parchment roll or a tube.

Calliopius (1), a Pamphylian, who was brought before Numerius Maximus, and scourged and crucified on Good Friday, April 7, 304. (2) Bishop of Thessaly, whom pope Boniface, A.D. 422, in writing to Rufus, declares separated from his communion, as far as we can gather, for resisting the authority of the see of St. Peter. (3) Bishop of Nice, to whom, about A.D. 425, Atticus, patriarch of Constantinople, sent three hundred pieces of gold, at a time when many of the people of Nice were starving.

Callirrhóë. The following is an account of this interesting locality, taken from Bädeker's Syria, p. 363.

"A ride of about three hours to the north, over a hilly country, avoiding the Wady Zophara, a short and deep gully, brings the traveller to the brink of the deep valley of the Zerka Maut, in the region of Callirrhóë. From this terrace to the bed of the brook the ravine descends eight hundred and seventy-six feet. The bottom and sides of the ravine are covered with a luxuriant growth of plants, including palm-trees, and will interest botanists. The flora resembles that of southern Arabia and Nubia. At the bottom of the valley is seen red sandstone, overlaid with limestone and basalt to the south. The ravine has been formed by the action of a powerful stream. Within a distance of three miles a number of hot springs issue from the side-valleys, all of them containing more or less lime, and all rising in the line where the sandstone and limestone come in contact. The hottest of these springs, while sending clouds of steam and largely deposit their mineral ingredients, has a temperature of 142° Fahr. The Arabs say that these springs were called forth by a servant of king Solomon, and they still use them for sanitary purposes.

In ancient times they were in great repute, and Herod the Great visited them in his last illness."

The following more minute description of the springs is from Ridgeway's Lord's Land, p. 408 sq.: "On reaching the valley I put my hand into a small stream gushing from the hill, and had to withdraw it instantly. One of the horses got into it, and jumped out very quickly. Riding down about half a mile, we met a large stream, two yards wide and two or three feet deep, of hot sulphur water. Rushing on, it leaps over a large bowlder, forming quite a fall, and dashing and leaping for one hundred yards in a succession of cascades, it finds the main valley. Below this, by the hill on the right, we found evidences where baths had existed. Holes through which sulphur was escaping formed the crude baths of the Bedouins. Further still, a beautiful fountain, so divided by impeding rocks as to make a dozen little fountains, bursts from the mountain, creating a reservoir of hot water, which, losing itself under an enormous sulphur crust, descends about one hundred feet, when it too, finds the lower level of the wady. Some of these waters are 130° Fahr. As to their number, instead of saying there are six or eight, it is nearer the fact to regard the whole bed of the valley on the north for about a mile one continuous hot-sulphur spring." "In addition to the medicinal quality of the waters, the temperature of the valley in autumn, winter, and spring is delightful; while for scenery, in the fantastic blendings of basalt, limestone, and sandstone, the exquisite forms of the sulphur crystallizations, following in their outlines twigs, reeds, and roots, on which the volatile salts have charmed to furnish, the fragrance and colorings of oleanders, jujupers, and flowering shrubs, and the flight and songs of various birds, there is everything to charm. "Our bath that day was most delicious. In the main stream we lay rolling like pigs from the cold water to the hot water, and from the hot to the cold, and where the hot and cold mix at the most agreeable point. Indeed, so exactly does the cold and hot water divide in the stream that the body can lie partly in the one and partly in the other at the same moment. As the waters flow along, the moss grows luxuriantly where the cold water runs, and not a vestige of green appears under the warm water. The line of verdure is as sharp as if cut by a knife."

Callisen, Christian Friedrich, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Glikstadt, Feb. 20, 1777. In 1817 he was appointed pastor at Schleswig and perorat at Hütten, and died in 1582. He wrote, Kurzer Abriss des Wissenswertigsten, etc. (Altona, 1810; 3d ed. 1843).—Kurzer Abriss der Religionsophilosophie (Kiel, 1802).—Handbuch zum Gebrauch nach denkender Christen beim Lesen des Neuen Test. (1812-14, 2 vols.).—Kurzer Abriss einer populären und praktischen Glaubenslehre (Schleswig, 1832). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. ii, 16, 216, 316, 303, 301; Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 210 sq. (B. P.)

Callisen, Johann Leonhard, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Aug. 23, 1738, at Preez, in Holstein. In 1764 he was pastor at Zarpfen, in 1782 at Oldenloe, and went, in 1792, as general superintendent and member of consistory to Reinsburg, where he died, Nov. 12, 1806. His best work is, Die letzten Jöge uneroer Herrn Jesu Christi (edited by his son, Nürnberg, 1813; 3d ed. 1838). See Winer, Handbuch der theol.
Lit. ii, 402; Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 211; Döring, Die deutschen Kanzelredner, p. 14 sq. (B. P.)

Callista and Christa (or Calliste and Christa, Christiana, etc.), were two sisters who had lapsed, and whom Dorothea was instructed, with orders that they should induce her to give up her faith. She, however, contrived to have them tied back to back, and thrown into a boiling caldron. There is a Calliste commemorated Sept. 1, in the Byzantine calendar, as having suffered martyrdom with her sisters. See also Calo-Cerus.

Callistea, in Grecian usage, was a festival which was celebrated in honor of Juno by the inhabitants of Lesbo, at which beauty took the prize. A similar festival was that of the Eleusinian Ceres, instituted by Cypselus, and celebrated by the Parians in Arcadia. The most charming maiden was decorated, and the women were called Chrysophore (gold-bearers).

Callistratus (1), an Isaurian bishop, and a friend of Chrysostom. Having written to Chrysostom, ex-cusing himself for not having visited him at Ca-cus, on account of the length of the journey and inclomency of the season, the latter responded (winter of 401), thanking him for his letters, and expressing a desire to receive both a visit and correspondence. See Chrysostom, Ep. 200. (2) A legendary martyr, commemorated, in Basil's Menologium, Sept.
27.

Callistus is the name of several persons in early church history. See also Calixtus.

1. A deacon who accused pope Damasus of adultery, and was expelled from the Church by the Council of Aquileia.

2. Prefect of Egypt, killed by his servants, Sept., 422, to which event a passage of Cyril's homily, the next Easter, is supposed, by Tillemont (xiv, 292), to refer.

3. Son of a Roman prefect, and the subject of a miracle of healing in the legendary Life of Epiphanius (ii, 357).

4. With Caribus and seven others, martyrs at Corinth, commemorated April 16.

Callistus, a monk of Mount Athos, was deputed by the monks of his monastery to Constantinople, during the contest between Paleologus and Cantacuzenus, to make peace. In 1349 or 1350 he was made patriarch by the emperor Cantacuzenus. In 1355 he refused the request of the emperor to crown his son Matthew, and returned to the monastery of Xatamia. Upon his refusal to return he was deprived of the patriarchate, and Philotheus substituted in his place. However, when John Paleologus came to the imperial throne, Callistus was restored to that of the patriarchate, and was sent as legate into Servia to treat for peace with Elizabeth, the widow of the prince of that country, where he died, at Pheras, the capital, in 1358. His homilies On the Exaltation of the Cross are given in Greek and Latin by Greuter, De Cruce, ii, 1847; other works exist also in MS.

Callon, Jacques, a French theologian, was born at Rheims in 1562, where he afterwards took charge of the seminary. He died June 2, 1714, leaving many unpublished works. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale,
S. V.

Callot, Jacques, an eminent French engraver, was born at Nancy, in Lorraine, in 1592, and was instructed by Cantagallina and Giulio Parigi. He died in 1635.
The following are some of his principal works: The Murder of the Innocents; The Crucifixion, with the Virgin, St. John, and Magdalene; The Annunciation; Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts,
S. V.

Calloway, David, an English Methodist preacher, was born at Selsey, Sussex, March 10, 1824. He was a scholar in the Bible Christian Sunday-school; was converted at eighteen; became a Sunday-school teacher and local preacher; and in 1845 entered the ministry, and labored for three years in the Isle of Wight. In 1849 he was appointed to Lone, where he died, Oct. 25 of the same year.

Callum. See M'CALLUM.

Callwen, a Welsh saint of the 6th century, and patroness of a church in the parish of Defy-nock, in Brecknockshire. See Rees, Welsh Saints, p.
158.

Cally, Pierre, a French theologian, a native of Mesnil-Hubert, near Argentan, in the diocese of Sez.
Having pursued his studies at Caen, he became professor of eloquence and philosophy in 1660, and principal of the College of Arts in 1675. In 1684 he was made curate of the parish of St. Martin. He first taught the Cartesian philosophy in France. From 1696 to 1688 he was an exile at Moulins. He labored zealously for the conversion of the Protestants. He died Dec. 31, 1709. He wrote, Doctrine Chrétienne et Schismatique touchant la Primitivité du Pape Enseigné par les Jeunes dans leur College de Creu (1644);— Universo Philosophiae Institutioni (Caen, 1695);—Discours en forme d'Homilies sur les Mystères, sur les Miracles, et sur les Paroles de Notre Seigneur Jésus Christ qui sont dans l'Evangile (ibid. 1703). See Hoefer, Nouv.
Biog. Générale, s. v.

Calmaig. See Colman (2).

Calminius, Sabinus, commonly known by the French as St. Cerny or St. Calmin. Both Cermay and Calmele are said to have founded the monastery of Moustier-St.-Chaffre, belonging to the church of Velay, and the monastery of Manzou (or Mozac), in Auvergne, longing to that of Clermont. The uncertainty about them, however, is illustrated by the fact that Cermay is celebrated Aug. 19, and Calmèe Nov. 22. Cermay is said to have died either in the 6th or the 7th cent; Calmèe at the beginning of the 8th. The Vita Calu-minii, edited by Th. Aquinas, states that the saint lived in the time of Justinian. The first Justinian died in 565, the second in 711; but there is no reason for trusting this date.

Calmauc. See Mongolian.

Calman, John, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Ireland about 1833. He emigrated to America in early life; was converted at Carlisle, Ill., and in 1858 entered the Southern Illinois Conference. In 1861 he was granted a supernumerary relation, and shortly afterwards died, Nov. 21, 1861. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1862, p. 211.

Calne, Council of (Concilium Calene). Calne is a town in Wiltsire, England, where a convention was held in 792, in the fourth year of Edward, king and marquis of the English, in consequence of the dispute then rife between the monks and clergy, the former of whom were unduly favored by Dunstan, archbishop of Canterbury, to the great prejudice of the latter. Dunstan himself presided in this council, at the head of the chief nobility, the bishops, and other ecclesiastics. No decision was, however, arrived at, owing to a singular accident, which broke up the council—the floor of the chamber in which they were assembled giving way, all were precipitated to the ground, except Dunstan, whose seat escaped. See above.

Caleo, Johann Adam, a German Lutheran theologian, was born at Belgern, in Saxony. He pursued his studies at Wittenberg, where, having received his degrees in 1705, he became, in 1707, professor. In 1716 he was made deacon at Schleiben, and in 1735 at Schöne- wald, where he remained until his death, which occurred in 1742. He wrote, Disputazioni Dei Chilopodi.

Camelo, Pietro, of Venice, was a Dominican, who lived about 1300, and wrote some lives of the saints and other treatises.

Calsorius. (1) Said to have been deputation and successor of Apollinaris at Ravenna, and to have held the see from the time of Vespasian to that of Adrian. (2) Martyr at Albenga, on the coast of Genoa, put to death at Brescia, March 19 or April 18.

Calsorius and Parnethius, eunuchs, were respectively chamberlain and major-domo to Zimmianus, a Christian of Armenia, consol under the emperor Philip. Decius endeavored to induce them to sacrifice, and upon their refusal sent them to torture. They were afterwards condemned to the stake, and the fire not burning, they were despatched by a blow on the head, May 19. They are commemorated May 19 and Feb. 11.

Calsorius, bishop of Claudiiopolis, in Pontus, was represented by a deputy at the council of A.D. 449 at Ephesus.

Calona, Tommaso, an Italian Capuchin, was born at Palermo in 1599, and died there in 1644, leaving Latin commentaries on the history of Samuel, on Judges, and on the minor prophets (Palermo, 1644). See Hoenig, Nov. Brev. Generalis, s. v.

Calarisius. See Kalonymus.

Calopodius was a eunuch and presbyter, a Eutychian, deposed by Anatolius, A.D. 431. One Calopodius stole the authentic copy of the acts of the Council of Chalcedon from the altar of the great church at Constantinople, of which he was steward, and took it to Anastasius, who tore it up, A.D. 511. They are, probably, different persons.

Calori, Raffaelo, a painter of Modena, flourished from the years 1492 to 1547 in the employments of the Duke of Ferrara. He was a pupil of the Virgin, which is highly commended. He has several other works in different churches of his native country.

Calosyrwus was a suffragan of Cyril of Alexandria, who wrote to him, about A.D. 444, a letter to be read in all the monasteries of his diocese of Arsinoe, against anathemizing absent persons against standing idleness with sanctity. The same bishop, at Ephesus, A.D. 449, declared that he had always maintained communion with Eutyches.

Calphurnius. See Macarius.

Calpurnius. (1) Father of pope Pontianus. (2) St. Patrick (q. v.).

Calumet, the "pipe of peace" (sometimes of war), in use among the North American Indians, is regarded by them with the utmost veneration, and believed to have been presented to them by the sun. It is a great smoking-pipe, of red, white, or black marble. It is very much like a pole-axe, has a very smooth head, and the tube, which is about two feet and a half long, is made of a quite strong reed or cane, set off with different colors, and several plaits made of woman's hair, variously interwoven. To this they fix two wings, which makes it something like Mercury's caduceus, or the wand which ambassadors of peace held formerly in their hands. They thrust this reed through the necks of hares, which are birds speckled with black and white and at the size of our pigeons, or through the necks of a certain kind of ducks. These ducks are of three or different colors. Every nation adorns the calumet as custom or their own fancy suggests. The calumet is a passport to all who go to the allies of such nations as send it. It is a symbol of peace, and the natives are universally of opinion that some great misfortune would befall any person who would violate the faith of it. It is the seal of all undertakings, of all important affairs and public ceremonies (Father Hennepin).

Calummys against the Christians. A new society of the Church could not escape misrepresentation. It offended men by presenting a higher standard of purity than their own, and the secrecy attending portions of its life and worship gave rise to suspicions. Popular credulity was ready to accept every malicious or Ignorant tale of horror suggested. Also there was a system of calumny, of which the Jews were the chief propagators. 1. The Agape, and the more sacred supper at first connected with them, furnished material for some of the more horrible charges. "Thyestian banquets and (Edipodean incest" became bywords of reproach. When they met, it was said, an infant was brought in, covered with flower, and then stabbed to death by woe. The father who was thus initiated in the mysteries. The others then ate the flesh and licked up the blood, and by this sacrifice were bound together (Tertull. Apol. Nat. 1, 15; Apol. c. 8). Two sources of this monstrous statement may be given: (a) To drink of human blood had actually been made, as in Catiline's conspiracy, a bond of union in a common crime (Sallust, Catil. c. 22); and the blood, it was said, was that of a slaughtered child (Dio, Cass. xix. vii. 30). Christians were regarded as members of a secret society conspiring for the downfall of the empire's religion and polity, and all acts execrated to have like purposes of initiation. (b) The language of devout Christians as to the Supper would tend to confirm, if not originate, the belief. It was not common bread or wine which they ate and drank, but flesh and blood.

2. The charge of impurity came next. When the Christians met—men and women—it was at night. The lamp gave light to the room, and to its stand a dog was said to be fastened. After supper meat was thrown to the dog, which would overthrow the lamp-stand in struggling to reach it, and then the darkness, it was said, covered a scene of shameless and unbridled lust, in which all laws of nature were set aside (Clement. Apol. c. 8; Ad. Nat. c. 16; Eusob. H. E. vi. 7-15; Orig. Contra Cel. vi. 27; Minuc. Felix, c. 9). This calumny, also, we may trace to two main sources: (a) In the Bacchanalia and other secret mysteries, it was known that such licentiousness had been but too common. (b) The name of the Agape, interpreted by men of prurient imaginations, was sure to strengthen the suspicion. They could form no other notion of a "love-feast" held at night. The terms "holy kiss," and the "kiss of peace" were distorted likewise. The names of "brother" and "sister," by which Christians spoke of each other, were said to refer to incestuous intercourse (Minuc. Felix, loc. cit.).
early years in the monastery of Incla, where he so abstained from food as to be unable to perform his share of the ordinary work of the establishment. The other monks reproached him, and he withdrew to a neighboring cave, where he built himself an oratory. He occupied himself entirely with study and prayer, and is said to have furnished persecuting evils spirits by using the sign of the cross. The Lord's Providence showed the monks visited him at his cave, and ordained him deacon and priest. He died in 576. See Acta Sanctorum Boll.

Calusco, Taddo, was a Milanese of the order of St. Augustine, who died in 1720, leaving, besides other works, Excm della Religione Protestante, o sia Pretesa Riformata (Venice, 1720, 4to).

Calvert, Denis (Ital. Diomiso, also called Fiammingo), an eminent Flemish painter of the Bolognese school, was born at Antwerp about 1555, and was the scholar of Sabbatini. After quitting this master he studied the works of Raffaello and other great painters at Rome, after which he returned to Bologna and established that celebrated school where Albano Domenichino and Guido were first instructors. The best picture is the St. Michael in San Petronio, at Bologna. Some of his other works are, The Holy Family, with St. Roch and St. Sebastian, in the Church of San Giuseppe; Our Saviour Appearing to Magdalene, in San Giorgio. He died at Bologna in 1619. See Sponer, Br. Art. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefler, Nouv.
Br. d'Art, Générale VOL.

Calvert is the name of a family whose history is closely identified with that of the colony of Maryland. It includes:

1. George, the first lord Baltimore, who was born at Kipling, in Yorkshire, about 1580, and educated at Trinity College, Oxford. He early became secretary to Robert Cecil, Lord Salisbury, and in 1608 he was appointed to the council of James 1. Soon afterwards he was made one of the clerks of the privy council, and in 1617 he was knighted. He afterwards became one of the two secretaries of state, and in 1620 received a pension of one thousand pounds annually. In 1624 he frankly confessed to the king that he had become a Roman Catholic, and resigned his office. The king, however, retained him as privy-councillor during his entire reign; and in February, 1625, created him baron of Baltimore, in the county of Longford, Ireland. Calvert had obtained a royal patent for himself and heirs granting them the absolute proprietership of the province of Avalon, in Newfoundland. He expended twenty-five thousand pounds in advancing this new plantation, and built a handsome house in Ferryland, to which he had sent a colony in 1621. He afterwards fitted out two ships at his own expense, with which he relieved the English fishermen of that coast from the encroachments of the French. Becoming dissatisfied with Newfoundland, he visited Virginia in 1628.
Not being able to take the oath of supremacy required by the Episcopal party in that colony, he sought poss-sessions outside of its limits. He returned to England, and in 1632 obtained a patent for the territory within the limits of the southern coast of America. He landed in London, April 15, 1632, before the grant was made out, and it was afterwards issued to his son as below.

2. Cecil, second lord Baltimore, son of George, received June 20, 1632, the charter which had been intended for his father, but which was executed for him by Charles I. He is said to have left England to found a new colony on the mainland of America, for his and his heirs forever absolute ownership of the territory granted, and also civil and ecclesiastical powers of a feudal nature. The only tribute required was the annual payment of two Indian arrows, by which the proprietor acknowledged the sovereignty of the king. Cecil did not go with Charles I to Amsterdam, but formed a production in November, 1638, under the charge of his brother, Leonard Calvert (q. v.), who became the first Calumny. The law of the early Church enjoined a heavy penalty upon those guilty of perjury. By can-73 of the Council of Elberfeld, "He that bears false wit-tness against another, to the loss of his life or liberty, is not only the cause of communions evil to his last hour.

In a lighter case, he was to do penance for five years, before he was reconciled and perfectly restored to the peace of the Church.—Bingham, Christ. Antig. bk. xvi,

Calvert, Daniel, an English Congregational min-istcr, was born June 8, 1794. He was the second of three brothers who entered the ministry. In early life he joined the Independent Church at Mixenden. He entered Airedale College in 1818, and afterwards became a home missionary in the West Riding of Yorkshire. He served the following stations: Tadcaster and Wetherby, Yorkshire, and Calderbrook, near Rochdale, Lancashire. He died at Calderwood, Yorkshire, Sept. 22, 1849. He was a simple, plain, good man.

Calvert, Henry, a Scotch clergyman, a native of England, was admitted in 1629 assistant minister at Broadeland, Scotland, and afterwards at Oldstone, Ireland, in which town he by the deposit of Down, in 1636, for refusing to subscribe to the canons. He returned to Scotland, and was presented to the living at Paisley in 1641. He found the charge a heavy one, and got an assistant minister appointed, which laid the foundation for a second charge in the town. He was disabled by gout in 1647, and died June 22, 1658. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, ii, 190.

Calvert, James, an English nonconformist divine, was born in York and educated at Clare Hall, Cambridge. He had been for several years at Topcliffe when he was silenced by the act of uniformity; after which he retired to York, and lived privately, but studied diligently. As a result of his studies here, he brought out his work, entitled Nuphrathali, seu Collectatio Theologica, de Reditu Decem Tribuum, Conversione, et Mensibus Ecclesialis (1672). About 1675 he became chaplain to Sir William Strickland, and, afterwards, to Sir William Middleton and tutor to his son. He died in December, 1688. See Chalmers, Bibl. Dict. a.v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Calvert, John, an English Congregational min-istcr, was born in 1787. He was educated at the Independent Church at Morley, near Leeds, where he died, Sept. 26, 1846.

Calvert, Leonard, the first governor of Maryland, whom we may designate as the "Roger Williams" of that state, on account of the position he took on the matter of religious liberty. He was sent to America by his brother, Cecil Calvert, the proprietor of the territory embraced in what became the state of Maryland. About two hundred Roman Catholic families accompanied him. The colonists landed at Point Comfort, Va., Feb. 24, 1634. Sailing up the Potomac, they came to an island which Calvert named St. Clements, of which he took possession "in the name of the Saviour of the world and of the king of England." Pursuing his way, he came to Piscataway, on the Maryland side. Here he had an interview with an Indian chief, afterwards bone of contention with whom treaties of friendship were made; and the settlement was commenced under auspicious circumstances. The colony began its existence, as did that of Rhode Island, with a declaration of the broadest principles of civil and religious liberty. Christianity was established without putting the state under the control of any one denomination of Christians. The new commonwealth became the asylum to which those in other parts of the country, especially New England, who endured persecution for conscience' sake, fled. Governor Calvert erected a mansion at St. Mary's, for the use of himself and those who might succeed him in office. When the monarchy was overthrown in England by the execution of Charles I, and the Commonwealth was set up in its place, it was not to be expected that the Baltimore government of the former monarchy would be suffered to remain in power. Calvert was displaced and a new governor appointed in his place. He died in 1676. See Belknap, Amer. Biog., ii, 372-380; Allen, Amer. Biog. s. v. (J. C. S.)

Calvert, Reuben, an English Congregational min-istcr, was born on Oct. 2, 1606, at Marley, Halifax, Yorkshire. A sermon to the young was the means of his conversion, and in September, 1626, he became a member of the Church at Halifax. In 1628 he entered Airedale College. In July, 1832, he settled at Upper Mill, Sadddworth. He remained there nine years, doing much good. In July, 1841, he removed to Hyde, Cheshire, where he remained till his death, which occurred Dec. 19, 1855. See (Loud.) Cong. Year-Book, 1856, p. 195.

Calvert, Thomas, an English nonconformist divine, was born in York, and educated at Oxford, and Cambridge. He served as chaplain to Sir T. Burdet, in Derbyshire, for some time, and afterwards held the vicarage of Trinity, in York. He also preached at Christchurch, York, and was one of the four preachers who officiated at the cathedral during the Cromwellian period. When Cromwell's government was passed he was ejected from Allhallows parish, in that city, and lived privately. He died March, 1679. His works include Mel Calv, or Exposition of Isa. lxxii (1657):—The Blessed Jew of Morocco (1648):—Three Sermons (1680):—Heart Suite for a Wounded Soul, etc. (1675). See Chalmers, Bibl. Dict. a.v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Calvi, Giovanni Battista, an Italian theologian and layman, was born at Milan in the latter half of the 18th century. He wrote, Veritas Romanae Ecclesiae quam Brevissimae Demonstrata Catholica in Conspectu Religionis Protestantismi (Milan, 1758). See Hoefer, Nour. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Calvi, Lazzaro and Pantaleo (or Pantaleo), two brothers, were sons of Augustino Calvi, a reputable painter of Genoa. Lazzaro was born in 1591, and with his brother Pantaleo was educated in the school of Piero del Vaga. They painted in concert at Genoa, Monaco, and Naples. Lazzaro was jealous of his brother's work, and Pantaleo claimed no share of the paintings. The jealous Lazzaro was convicted and sent to the commission of the foulest crimes. He painted the Birth and Life of St. John the Baptist for the Chapel of Nobili Centurioni. His last works were for the Church of Santa Caterina. He died in 1606 or 1607. Pantaleo died in 1595. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Calvin, James, an English Methodist min-istcr, was born at Tavistock in 1815. He was licensed at the age of nineteen and joined the Primitive Methodists, and distinguished himself by Christian zeal as a class-leader and local preacher. At the age of thirty-four he entered the itinerant ministry, and labored earnestly and successfully in sixteen circuits in Ireland and England. In July, 1880, he was appointed to the Barton-on-Humber Circuit, where he continued his ministrations till January, 1881, when he became a superintendent. He died June 21, 1881. He was a faithful minister of the Gospel and a devoted Christian.

Calvin, Joseph Hadden, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born near Clones, Ireland, June 16, 1828. In 1846 he came to the United States. He graduated at Jefferson College, Pa., 1851, and entered the Theological Seminary in 1852. He was licensed by the New Brunswick Presbytery the same year, and installed pastor
Calvinus (or Calvino), a presbyter, is addressed by Athos in two letters, dated respectively (in edition of Frobenius) 15.7.27 and 890. From his being mentioned in connection with "Symeon acredos," it is conjectured that he was an Englishman. In the first letter occurs "Nil tibi deesse satimo in cella sancti Stephani honestas conversationis;" but Frobenius is uncertain whether this cell is some English monastery, or whether it means that of St. Stephen at Strasbourg, to which Calvinus had retired. The second letter is addressed to him jointly with Cuculus, and they are bidden to exhort Symeon to fortitude under his tribulations.

Calvör, Caspar, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Nov. 8, 1650, at Hildesheim. He studied at Jena and Helmstäd, and was in 1671 deacon, and in 1684 superintendent, at Zellerfeld. In 1710 he was called as pastor primarius and general superintendent to Clausthal. He died May 11, 1725. He wrote, Gloria Mosis, h. e. Illustria aliquot Facta sub Mosè, etc. (Goslar, 1696); Ritualis Ecclesiasticum (Jena, 1705, 2 parts); Saxonia Inferior Antiqua Gentilis et Christiana (Goslar, 1714); De der Kärer, eine Streitdracht über der Juden (Leips. 1710); Juden-Katechismus (ibid. edit.). Calbythe. Saints who lived in huts were so styled.

Cypodiamon Boar, in Greek mythology. One of the heroes of Calydon, had made to the deities a solemn offering of thanks, but had forgotten Diana, who therefore sent an animal in the form of a boar, with bristles like arrows, and with teeth like the tusks of an elephant. It went fire, destroyed the vineyards and the woods, laid waste the cornfields, killed the cattle, and compelled the inhabitants to seek refuge in the city Calydon. Thereupon the valiant Meleager assembled the heroic young men of Greece to a united hunt for this monster boar. Echion, Jason, and Mopsus threw their spears in vain at the monster. Eupalamus and Pelagon were killed by him, also Eneasimus, and the father of Achilles only escaped death by swinging himself on a tree; but the boar began to gnaw at the tree and try to pull it up by its roots, when Castor and Pollux came near, by whose spears the boar was driven into the thickets of the woods. Then Atalanta shot a feathered arrow at the beast, and struck it near the ear. Meleager praised her shot, saying she deserved the prize more than the men. Aeneas, boasting, wished to show what a man could do in comparison with a woman, and said, "Even should Diana protect the boar, still he would succumb under the axe." Then he raised his battle-axe, but, even before it fell, the monster's sides were rent in pieces. The companions came together and dipped their weapons in the monster's blood. But Meleager took the head and hid of the animal and presented both to Atalanta.

Calypto, in Greek mythology, was a nymph of the sea, whose parents are stated differently, as she is sometimes called a Nereide, sometimes an Atlantide, sometimes an Oceanide. In the island Ogygia she possessed a magnificent palace. She appeared at a banquet that was being given at the golden lomen, when Ulysses came, after he had been shipwrecked, and had been nine days on a mast, tossed hither and thither by the waves. The beautiful nymph offered to give him immortality and eternal youth, if he would always remain with her. Seven years she held him fast, until, at the instigation of Minerva, Jupiter sent Calypso word, by Mercury, to let her lover go. Thereupon she gave him wood and implements to build a ship, with which he sailed to the island of Alcinous, king of the Phaeacians. According to some accounts, Calypso had two sons by Ulysses, Naustithotis and Nausinotis. The poem of Ffennol, according to which Telemachus, seeking his father, comes to Calypso, has no foundation in ancient mythology.

Camail, in ecclesiastical usage, is a French name for (1) a tippet or mozaeta of black silk, worn by French clergy, but edged, lined, or furred to mark canons, and (2) an aumasse, or cape of fur, adopted by the English dignitaries, with edging of the animal's tail, or pendant, and worn by canons in a modified form in the 15th century. See AUMULTUM.

Camaldoli (or Camaldules) were a reformed order of Benedictines founded by Romuald of Ravenna in 1019. They wore a cassock, scapular, and hood, of white wool, and a large-aasled gown. They lived in mountainous and solitary places.

Camara (y Murga), Christopher de la, a learned Spanish prelate, was born at Archinega, near Burgos, towards the end of the 16th century. He was professor of Holy Scripture at Toledo, and afterwards bishop of the Canaries, and eventually of Salamanca, where he died in 1641. He published a sort of early ecclesiastical history of the Canaries, under the title, Constituciones Sinodales del Obispado de Camarilla, su priemera Camaldulcine Monk in fundacion y translacion, vidis de sua obispos, y breve relacion de la islas (Madrid, 1834). See Laszlo, Ecles. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Camara (or Camarra), Lucio, of Chieti, an Italian antiquary in the middle of the 17th century, wrote De Teste Antiquo Marrucinorum in Italia Metropoli Lib. 3 (Rome, 1651, 4to). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Landon, Ecles. Dict. s. v.

Camacho, Ignacio, a Spanish Jesuit and professor of theology, was born Salamanca, Dec. 26, 1650, and died Dec. 22, 1722. He published Regula Honestatis Moralis, a theological treatise on the way to act morally (Naples, 1702, fol.), in which he combats the doctrine of probability; viz., that it is allowable for a man to follow an opinion which he thinks probable, although it appears to be less certain, less sure, than the contrary opinion. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Landon, Ecles. Dict. s. v.

Camassel, Andrea, an Italian painter and engraver of the Roman school, was born at Brevagna, near Foligno, in 1601, and studied under Domenichino. He died in 1648. His best works are, The Assumption, in the Pantheon, and The Dead Christ, at the Capuchins; also The Two of Commitivio, in St. John Lateran. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Landon, Ecles. Dict. s. v.

Camuscors, Abbé de, a French priest, uncle of Étienne, was born at Montpellier, in 1721, and became archdeacon there. In 1757 he preached before king Louis XV, and in 1768 delivered his beautiful panegyric, which elicited from the congregation, though in a church, the most unbounded tokens of applause. He became a celebrated preacher, and published, besides the Panégyrique (1768, 4to), three volumes of Sermons (1781, 12mo, and 1788). See Biog. Universelle, vi, 589.

Camuscors, Étienne Hubert de, a French prelate, was born at Montpellier, Sept. 11, 1756. After entering holy orders he was rapidly promoted, being appointed archbishop of Rome in 1802, and eventually to the cardinalate. He refrained from taking part in the French Revolution, but, later, was active for a time in political affairs. He died Oct. 25, 1828. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cambedoxi is the Japanese name for the Chinese god Fo, among the inhabitants of Nippon, Japan, and the islands round about.

Cambolas, François de, a French priest, born in 1600, was canon of St. Saturnin, in Toulouse. He founded the order of nuns of Notre Dame at Toulouse, and was distinguished for his piety, modesty, and charity. He died May 4, 1668. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cambonnet (de la Mothe), Jeanne de (or de Sainte Ursule), a French Ursuline and biographer, who lived at Bourg-en-Bresse in the second half of the 17th century, is the authoress of Journal des Illustres Religiones de l'Ordre de Sainte Ursule (Bourg, 1884). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cambout (de Pont-Château), Sébastien Joseph de, a French theologian of the second half of the 18th century, was abbé of the convent of Pont-Château, and left some epistles, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cambrai, Council of (Concilium Cameracense), was held in August, 1565, in the city of that name in France, Maximilian, archbishop and duke of Cambrai, presiding, assembled the bishops of the diocese, and of Namur. Twenty-two decrees were published, each of which contains several chapters. The titles of the decrees are as follows:

1. Of heretical books.
2. Of theological lectures in chapters and monasteries.
3. Of schools.
4. Of seminaries.
5. Of doctrine, and the preaching of the Word of God.
7. Of the ministry.
8. Of the examination of clergymen.
9. Of the examination of bishops.
10. Of the examination of pastors.
11. Of the residence of bishops and curates.
12. Of the residence of pastors, and their duties.
14. Of the ecclesiastical power and jurisdiction.
15. Of matrimony.
16. Of dioceses, etc.
17. Of ordination.
18. Of monasteries.
19. Of the salutary.
20. Of images.
22. Of indulgences.

The 18, relating to schools, contains six chapters; it orders that they be visited by the curate every month, and by the bishop at least once in each year, in order that a report may be made to the bishop. The 19th enjoins the wearing of the surplice and stole by the priests, when they carry the holy sacrament to the sick, and also that a clerk carry a lighted taper and bell, that the people may be warned of its approach, and of their duty towards the holy sacrament and to the sick person.

Finally, the council confirmed the decrees of the Council of Trent. See Labbe, Concil. xvi, 147.

Cambray, Sect. in. In the early part of the 11th century a Christian sect was discovered in the diocese that Paris, in the districts of Arras and Liege, which was supposed to have had its origin in the teaching of Gundulf, an Italian, and from some of its strange doctrines was thought to have some connection with certain Oriental sects. They rejected marriage, and held that a state of celibacy was indispensable to a participation in the kingdom of heaven. They alleged that the disciples of Christ, both male and female, ought to live together only in spiritual fellowship. They also held the utter inefficacy of mere outward sacraments to purify the heart. Neander says, "To show the inefficacy of baptism they pointed to the immoral lives of the clergy who performed the ceremony, to the immoral lives of the persons baptized, and to the fact that in the children on whom baptism was performed not one of the conditions was to be found upon which such efficacy must depend—no consciousness, no will, no faith, no confession. The tenets which they had received from Gundulf agreed in all respects, as they affirmed, with the doctrines of Christ and of the apostles. They were as follows: to forsake the world, to overcome the flesh, to support one's self by the labor of one's own hands, to injure no one, to show love to all the brethren. Whoevers practiced these needed no baptism; where these failed, baptism could not supply their place. They were also opposed to the worship of saints and relics, and ridiculed the stories told about the wonders performed by the saints. But it is singular to observe that they at the same time held to the worship of the apostles and martyrs, which probably they interpreted, however, in accordance with their other doctrines, and in a different manner from what was customary in the Church." They were opposed to the worship of the cross and of images, and had no reverence for churches as such, claiming that "the church is nothing but a pile of stones heaped together; the church has no advantage whatever over any hut where the divine Being is worshipped."

Those who held these views were early arrested and brought to trial, but succeeded in explaining their faith to the bishop. After that time the number of this sect was increased to considerable numbers, and the archbishop assembled a synod at Arras in 1025, before which the arrested men were compelled to appear. Here they were obliged to subscribe a recantation on the cross, but only the effect was to make them more cautious in their teachings. Towards the end of the 11th century a sect of this kind once more made its appearance in the same locality. Their leader, a man named Rami- ned, although it was impossible to convict him of heresy, was burned to death in an old hut, for charging the priests with immorality. The persecution to which the leaders of the sect were subjected tended greatly to increase its numbers, and to give it such importance and permanence that in the 12th century it was still found in many towns of the district. See Neander, Hist. of the Church, iii, 597 sq.

Cambric Concilium, A.D. 465, is a fiction, taken from Geoffrey of Monmouth, etc.

Camburn, Myron B., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Nashville, Tenn., 1849. He was converted at the age of twelve; licensed to preach in 1844; and in 1846 was admitted into the Michigan Conference. He filled twenty-two conference appointments successively, and died at his post, Oct. 17, 1872. Mr. Camburn was remarkably healthy, faithful, and laborious. He was a fully consecrated Christian, and a gifted preacher. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1872, p. 94.

Camden, William, an eminent English antiquarian and historian, was born in London, May 2, 1551, and was educated at Oxford. In 1577 he was co-rector, and in 1597 rector, of the Westminster School. He died at Chislehurst, Nov. 9, 1623. His main work is Britannia, sive Floridissimorum Regnum Anglicum, Societatis et Industriæ Rerum Antiquarum et Insanae Arte Curiographicae Descrip (London, 1586). He also wrote Remains of a Greater Work concerning Britain (ibid. 1605) —Annales Rerum Anglorum et Hibernicarum Regnante Elisabetha (1615-17, 2 vols.). In his honor the Camden Society was founded in 1838. (B. P.)

Camilla (or Gamelia Dea), in Roman mythology, were goddesses of marriage (Gr. yypia), invoked by young women just before their nuptials.

Camelaucium (Camelacuum, Camelauca, or Camelacuca) was a covering for the head, used chiefly in the East. It appears to have been a round cap with ear-flaps of fur, originally camel's hair, if the ordinary etymology is to be accepted, or wool, and sometimes adorned with gems. The form varied with time; it was preserved, it sometimes became a helmet, and was worn in battle. We find it adopted by royal personages, and Ferrario (Costumi, Europa, vol. iii, pt. 1, pl. 38) and Constantine Purpur. (De Adm. Imp. c. 18) describe by the same name the sacred caps, preserved at the high-altar of St. Sophia's, traditionally believed to have been sent by an angel's hands to Constantine the Great, and used in the coronation of the emperors of the East. See Crowns.

Its ecclesiastical use in the East seems to have been chiefly confined to the monastic orders. Goar (Eucholog. p. 156) tells us that the mitre of the metropolitan of Constantinople had this name only when he was taken from the monastic ranks. It is defined by Allais, De Custumis Eccl. Concens. (sl. no. 12, apud Du Cange) as a round woolen cap worn by monks. It was worn by Armenian bishops when officiating at the altar. See Mitre.

Caménae (or Camenas), in Roman mythology, were nymphae endowed with prophetic gifts among certain ancient Italian nations. To them belonged Camenae and Egeria. Their worship in a grove at Rome had been instituted by Numa. The name was afterwards given to the Muse of the Greek.

Camenz, Berkmann Gottfried, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Grossen Saxony in 1692, and studied at Wittenberg. In 1718 he was called to the Darmstadt; and at 28 was appointed preacher at Schönewalde. In 1744 he was made provost and superintendent, and he died there in 1743.

Camenz, Karl Wilhelm Theophilus, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Cöln, near Meissen, Oct. 14, 1759. For some time he was pastor at Obera, and in 1807 became superintendent at Sayda, where he died, Sept. 1, 1837. He wrote Geschichtliches Handbuch (1801–11, 8 vols.) — Lehrbuch der Glaubens- und Sittenlehre des Christenthums (Meissen, 1811). See Winer, Handbuch der Theol. Lit. ii, 259; Zschokul, Bibl. Theol. i, 212. (F. P.)

Camaramus, Bartolomeo, an Italian theologian, born at Benevento, was for twenty-four years professor of law at Nápoli, and at the end of which time, in 1599, he was made president of the royal chamber. In 1557 he settled at Rome, where pope Paul IV appointed him commissary-general of the papal troops. He died at Naples in 1564. He was a man of vast learning, and wrote, De Predestinatione, de Gratia et Libero Arbitrio, contra Calvinum, Paris, 1556; De Jesu, de Oratone et Eleemosynis (ibid. eod. 4to); De Fugatoriorum Igne (Rome, 1557) — a work on preaching, and another on marriage. See Landon, Eccles. Diet. s. v.; Hoefner, Nouv. Bio. Gén., s. v.

Camerata, Giuseppe (2), an Italian engraver and miniature painter, was born at Venice in 1718, and studied engraving under Gio. Cattini. In 1751 he was made engraver to the court at Dresden. The following are copies of some of the plates preserved: The Promised Land; David with the Head of Goliah; The Holy Family; The Adulteress before Christ. He died in 1803.

Cameron, Francesco, an Italian preacher of the early part of the 14th century, was sent as a missionary to Asia Minor. On his return he lived at Avignon in intimate relations with pope John XXII (1338), but afterwards returned to Italy. See Hoefner, Nouv. Bio. Gén. s. v.

Cameron, Charles Richard, a Church of England divine, was born in 1780. He was educated at Christ Church, Oxford. His latter days were spent as rector of Swaby, Lincolnshire, where he died, Jan. 10, 1865. He was the author of several sermons and pamphlets, among which are, Lectures on Confirmation: — A Sermon on the Death of Nelson: — Sayings and Doings of Poetry: — A Letter to Mr. Whitmore on the Corn Laws: — A Pamphlet on the Sabbath Question, addressed to Archbishop Whately: — Parochial Sermons: — On the Antichrist: — On the Revolution of 1842: — A Poem on the New Moral World against Socialism. See Appleton's Annual Cyclop., 1865, p. 664.

Cameron, Finlay, an English Baptist minister, was born at Chatham in 1782. He united with the Church, by baptism, June 29, 1800, and in the latter part of 1801 began his theological studies under the tuition of Rev. Dan Taylor of London. He was ordained as pastor of the General Baptist Church in Louth, July 4, 1805. He had supplied the pulpit of this church for more than a year and a half, previous to his ordination. His ministry was so prosperous as to make necessary an enlargement of the building in 1808. Some division having sprung up in his Church, he retired from the pastorate, and for ten years served the Baptist Church at Coningsby, returning to Louth, by the unanimous request of the Church, in 1822. Prosperity again attended his labors. He died Aug. 29, 1848. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1849, p. 41. (J. C. S.)

Cameron, James (1), a Wesleyan Methodist missionary, was born at Kirkintilloch, near Glasgow, Scotland, April 30, 1819. At the age of fifteen he joined the Methodist Society, and soon began to preach in the streets of his native village. In 1832 he was accepted by the British Conference, and sent to Cape Town, South Africa, where he labored five years with ability and success. For nearly twenty-five years thereafter he was itinerating in various parts of the Eastern Province of South Africa, and in the Orange Free State, among Europeans and natives; and everywhere his labors were those of an able, undaunted, and uniriting preacher. In 1857 he returned to Cape Town, where he was appointed to large congregations till 1864, when he was appointed to Natal as chairman of that district, where he and to Durban and Pietermaritzburg (his residence for the last years of his life) he worked with loving zeal and ceaseless devotion until called away to rest, Dec. 12, 1875. Mr. Cameron's sermons were carefully prepared, massive in their structure, rich in truth, and delivered with great energy. He was one of the most successful preachers in South Africa. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1876, p. 86.

Cameron, James (2), an English Congregational minister, was born in 1809. He spent his boyhood at Gourou, on the Firth of Clyde; matriculated at the university of Glasgow in 1820; was converted in 1831; and in the following year entered the Glasgow Theological Academy. He was exeget of the gallery of the elector of Saxony, The Parable of the Lost Drachma, after Felé; The Holy Family, after J. C. Procaccini; The Assumption, after Camil. Procaccini; The Charity of Joseph, after Contarini. He died at Dresden in 1761. See Hoefner, Nouv. Bio. Gén., s. v.
Dumfries, where he remained till 1847, when he accepted a call at Headgate, Colchester. His final charge was at Hopton, Mirfield. Here he died, March 29, 1873. The Church of England, according to the manner in which he was trained, did not hold him in any such esteem.

Joseph; of Brandon Academy, Miss.; professor of mathematics in West Tennessee College; principal of Trinity High-school at Pass Christian, Miss.; of an academy at Lexington, Mo., of the Preparatory School at Crystal Springs, Miss., from 1872 to 1875. He was licensed to preach by the presbytery of Central Mississippi, April 20, 1861; and ordained by the presbytery of East Mississippi in 1865. He preached as stated supply at Pass Christian; at Mossy Creek Church, Tenn.; at Overton, Tex., from 1869 to 1871. He died at the last named place, May 10, 1879. Mr. Cameron had a strong desire to preach the gospel, but his peculiar fitness for teaching kept him mainly in the school-room and in the professor’s chair. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1880, p. 35.

Camerus, ordained deacon by Polycarp, succeeded Papirius in the see of Smyrna, according to Metaphrases. See Tillemont, ii, 372.

Camilla, Saint, in Auxerre, went with St. Germanus to Ravenna; but is said to have died in her return journey, A.D. 437. See Acta Sanctorum, Boll. Mart. i, 342.

Camillianus, Saint, confessor and bishop, or Thoros, is supposed to have died in 525 (or 536). He was present at the first council of Orleans, A.D. 511.

Camillo, Francisco, a reputable Spanish historical painter, was born at Madrid about 1655 (others say 1610), of a Florentine family, and studied under Pedro de las Cuevas. One of his best pictures is in the Church of San Juan Dios, at Madrid, the Nuestra Señora de Belen. Some of his other works are, The Descent from the Cross; St. Mary of Egypt before the Virgin. He died in 1671. See Sporer, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog.Generale, s. v.

Camillus and Camilla, in Roman antiquity, were the titles applied to the boys and girls who were occupied in the ceremonies of sacrifice, whether temporarily or as a preparation for their entering the priesthood. In the latter case it was necessary that they should be the children of parents still alive, and freeborn.

Camillus. (1) Presbyter of Genoa, who consulted St. Prosper respecting some propositions of Augustine on predestination, after that father’s death; and to whom Prosper addressed his Answers to the Genoese. (2) Father of Gallus, bishop of Pavia, A.D. 473. See Ceillier, x, 500, 599.

Camis is a title of the honored dead among the Japanese, to whom they pay divine homage. They believe that the souls of very good men become Cams, or protecting geniuses of men; while those of the wicked wander through the air, wirthing in agony. To these deified heroes they build temples or maus (q. v.); and offer sacrifices, swear by them, and implore their assistance in all important undertakings. This system prevails among the Sintoists (q. v.) in Japan, and hence the system has sometimes received the name of the religion of the Camis. See Kami.

Camisla, in ecclesiastical usage, is a name for (1) a shrine in which the Book of the Gospels used at high-mass wasanciently preserved. It was frequently made of gold, richly jewelled. Many such existed in English cathedrals and parish churches before the Reformation. (2) An alb (q. v.).

Camm (née Newby), Anne, a minister of the Society of Friends, was born at Kendal, England, in August, 1627. While residing in London, whither she had been sent to complete her education, she became a Christian, and united with the Puritans. Her first marriage was with John Audland (q. v.), and both husband and wife soon joined the Society of Friends, and, not long after, she was recognised as a minister in that denomination. More than once, in her early ministry, she was arrested and thrown into prison, and kept there, at one time, for a year and a half. Her husband died in 1668, and subsequently she married Thomas Camm, another minister of the Friends. After a life of remarkable usefulness, during which she passed through great sufferings for conscience' sake, she died, Sept. 30, 1705. See Friends' Library, i, 473-479. (J. C. S.)

Camm, John, a minister of the Society of Friends, was born near Kendal, Westmoreland, England, in 1604. He was converted under the preaching of George Fox, and soon after commenced his labours as an itinerant preacher among the Friends in the North of England, and in London, whither he went with Francis Howgill, "with a message from the Lord to Oliver Cromwell, their protector." He is said to have been a "man richly furnished with the gifts of the Holy Spirit, patient in exercises, grave in behaviour, profound in judgment, quick in discerning, and a sharp reprouver of wickedness, hypocrisy, and of disorderly walkers in the profession of truth." He died a peaceful Christian death in 1652. See Evans, Nitty Promoted, i, 31, 32. (J. C. S.)

Camm, Thomas, a minister of the Society of Friends, was born at Camgill, Westmoreland, England, in 1610. He was converted in early life, and eventually recognised as a minister. He had a large share of the hardships and persecutions of the Quakers which marked the age in which he lived. In 1674 he was imprisoned at Kendal, for nearly three years, for the non-payment of tithes, and subsequently at Appleby for six years. He was also very heavily fined. During these trials he conducted himself with wisdom and patience. He died in the triumphs of Christian faith, Jan. 13, 1708. See Friends' Library, i, 479-481. (J. C. S.)

Camna, in British mythology, was the goddess of hunting.

Camnarch was a Welsh saint of the 6th century, said to have been of Llegamarch, in Brecknockshire. See Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 238.

Cammarota, Filippo, an Italian ecclesiastic, was born Nov. 23, 1809. He was appointed archbishop of Gaeta in 1854, and died March 1, 1876. See Appleton's Annual Cyclop. 1876, p. 630.

Cammin, Sestia, was one of the most celebrated abbots of Ireland, who in his youth retired to the island of Inisheer, and on the last islands of Connacht, on one of the confounds of Thomond and Galway, where he built a monastery. The church of that place still retains the name of Tempul-Cammin. He died about 638. See Ussher, Antiq. p. 503.

Camocena. See Cameniae.

Camos, Marzco Antonio, a Spanish prelate, was born at Barcelona in 1553. After a military career and the loss of his wife, he became an Augustinian monk in 1591, studied theology and philosophy, and in 1605 was appointed bishop of Trani (in Iari), but died before his confirmation to that office. He left, Micromosio y Go- bicino universal del hombre Cristiano. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bio$, Générale, s. v.

Camp, Abraham, a German preacher, was a native of Cologne. He became a member of the Jesuit order in 1614, and studied Hebrew-leters at Aix-la-Chapelle, and theology at Treves. Having preached with great success at Dusseldorf, he was placed at the head of the new missions established in the duchies of Juliers and Berg, and held that position until his death, which occurred at Dusseldorf, Feb. 26, 1696. He wrote, Annales Dusselrodenses, Aulicenae et Drutetanae et Poetae Funerea Serenissimae Mariae-Anneae-Josephae Austriacae (Dusseldorf, 1689). See Hoefer, Nouv. Bio$, Générale, s. v.

Camp, Albert Barlow, a Congregational minister, was born at Northfield, Conn., and graduated from Yale College in 1822. After a theological course at Andover, which he completed in 1826, he was settled over the First Congregational Church in Ashby, Mass. In 1832 he returned to his native place, where he resided two years, supplying various pulpits in the vicinity. In 1834 he was settled over the Church in Bridgewater, Conn., and continued there ten years. He removed to Bristol in 1845, where he became engaged in book-keeping and writing for various manufacturers in the vicinity, and continued in this occupation until the failure of his health. He died in Bristol, May 17, 1862, aged sixty-nine years. See Obituary Record of Yale College, 1866.

Camp, Amzi, a city missionary, died in New York, Jan. 5, 1864. He was for nearly thirty years in the employ of the American Tract Society as city missionary. His life was one of earnest, patient, self-denying labor among the neglected classes. See Appleton's Annual Cyclop. 1864, p. 501.

Camp, Henry Bates, a Congregational minister, was born at Durham, Conn., Dec. 10, 1809. After graduating from Yale College in 1831, he began the study of theology in the Yale Divinity School, and completed his course at the Princeton Theological Seminary, graduating in 1834. In July, 1835, he was ordained pastor of the Mountain Grove Church, Northfield, Conn., but resigned this charge in August, 1836, on account of ill-health. In 1837 he became an instructor in the American Asylum for the Deaf and Dumb at Hartford, where he taught until 1864. The rest of his life was spent in retirement at Hartford, where he died, Feb. 16, 1890. See Young, History of Hartford, ii, 593. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ii, 592.

Camp, Joseph Eleezer, a Congregational minister, graduated at Yale College in 1878; was ordained pastor of the Church in Northfield, Conn., in 1879, continuing there until 1887; and died in 1888. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ii, 592.

Camp, Phineas, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Durham, N. Y., Feb. 18, 1785. He graduated at Union College in 1811, and spent over two years in Princeton Theological Seminary. He was ordained by the North River Presbytery in 1817, and spent a year as missionary in Ohio, Michigan, New York, and Pennsylvania. His first charge was Westfield, N. Y. (1819-22), and his next Lowell (1825-29), and afterwards he served at Denmark and Whitesville, N. Y., and Dixon, Ill. He died at the last-named place, Jan. 30, 1880. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem., 1881, p. 16.

Camp, Riverius, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the diocese of Florida, was rector for many years of Trinity Church, in Brooklyn, Conn., until 1872, when he became rector of Christ Church, Monticello, Fla. In the following year he returned to his former connection, in 1874, and in 1876 to his former Church in Monticello. He died Sept. 12, 1875, aged sixty-five years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1876, p. 150.

Camp, Samuel, a Congregational minister, graduated at Yale College in 1764; was ordained pastor of the Church in Ridgebury, Conn., in 1770; and died in 1813. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 664.

Campiga (Campacus, Gambocus, or Cam- poubus), was a kind of ornamental shoe worn by emperors and kings. At a later period it was worn by the higher ecclesiastics at Rome, and by others elsewhere, but in disregard of the special privileges claimed in regard to it by Roman authorities. See Gregory Magnus, Hisp. Antiquit. ii, 28.

Campagna, Girolamo, an Italian sculptor, was born at Verona in 1522, and studied under Catanese. His productions consist chiefly of altars and sepulchres, in the cities of Venice and Verona. He was living in 1625. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bio$, Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Bio$, Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Campagnola, Domenico, an eminent Venetian painter (and engraver) of the school of Titian, lived...
Campagnola, Giulio, a Paduan painter and engraver, lived about 1500. Among the plates by him is especially mentioned the picture of John the Baptist Holding a Cup.

Campagnolo, (Ital. bell), a name used first as a Latin term by Bede, in the 7th century, and employed generally afterwards, to denote the bells used in churches, to summon the people to public worship.

Campano, Alberto, a Florentine Dominican, was professor of philosophy at Pisa, and afterwards of theology at Padua, where he died, Sept. 24, 1639, leaving a metrical translation of the Pharsalus, in Italian (Venice, 1600). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Campano, Pietro, an Italian engraver, was born at Soria in 1727, and studied under Rocco Pozzi. The following are his principal plates: St. Francis of Assisi; St. Peter Delivered from Prison. He died in 1765.

Campana, Lorenzo di Lodovico (surnamed Lornetto), an Italian sculptor and architect, was born at Florence in 1494, and at an early age was commissioned to complete the tomb of cardinal Fugger, in the church of San Giacomo, at Pistoia. He was also employed upon the tomb of cardinal Chigi in the church of Santa Maria del Popolo. He died in 1641. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Campanarius (bell-ringer). His special office in a church is perhaps not mentioned in the literature of the first few centuries. In more ancient times the duty of ringing the bells at the proper seasons seems to have been laid upon the priests themselves (Capitulare Episcop. c. 8; Capit. Caroli Mgumi, lib. vi, c. 168). To the same effect Amalarius (De Div. Off. iii, 1) says, speaking of the ringing of bells, "Ne despicat presbyter hoc opus agere" (Ducange s. v. Campumam, Campanum). In later times the custom was the bell-ringer (Martene, De Rit. Eccl. ii, 18, ed. 1783). See Bell.

Campallano, Angello, a Roman engraver, was born about 1748. He engraved several plates for G. Hamilton's Scholica Italia, and the statues of the Twelve Apostles in St. John of Lateran. He died in 1815.

Campanile, an Italian missionary, was born at San Antonio, near Naples, in 1762. He early became a member of the Dominican order, was consecrated priest, and, being charged with the duties of teaching, he acquired himself to the satisfaction of his superiors. He joined the College of the Propagandists at Rome, and, on account of his knowledge of the Arabic language, was sent, in 1802, into the East as prefect of the missions of Mesopotamia and Kurdistan. Returning to Naples after thirteen years of successful labor, Campanile became preacher, and soon after assistant professor of Arabic, at the University of Naples, where he died, March 2, 1853. He wrote a History of Kurdistan. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Campanna, Piliero, a painter of the Roman school, was born at Bologna in 1593, and, while young, visited Rome and studied the works of Raphael. He painted the triumphal arch erected for the reception of Charles V, in 1530, at Bologna. The best of his works are in the Cathedral of Seville, particularly his famous pictures of The Nativity, and The Purification. He died in 1570. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Campante, Isaac ben-Jacob, a Jewish writer of Castile, in Spain, was born in 1600, and died at Pisa in 1648. Although not very learned, he was called the Gaon of Castile. He is the author of The Book of the Ways of the Talmod, a metaphysics of the Talmod, in which he lays down general rules for the understanding of its style. It was first published at Mantua, 1596. See First, Bibl. Jud. i, 140; Lindo, Hist. de los Jewe, p. 189; Finn, Sephardim, p. 386; Grätz, Gesch. der Juden, viii, 192; J. J. G. d. J. J. Sefken, iii, 87; Eicher, Intro, to Heb. Lit. p. 267. (B. Campbell, Abraham, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Pennsylvania, June 11, 1811. He was converted at the age of nineteen, and in 1850 entered the Illinois Conference. He afterwards became a member of the Southern Illinois Conference, held a local relation between 1864 and 1868; and the remainder of his life was an effective member. He died Feb. 10, 1879. Mr. Campbell was a clear and forcible preacher, a successful pastor, and an amiable companion. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1879, p. 38.

Campbell, Alexander (1), a Scotch prelate, son of Sir John Campbell, was made first Protestant bishop of Brechin while a boy; May 16, 1566, and was present with Regent Moray in the convention at Perth, July 28, 1569. He had a leave of absence in 1567, to study abroad, went to Geneva, and, on his return home, in 1574, he exercised the office of particular pastor at Brechin, without interfering with episcopal duties. He sat in many parliaments, and retained the designation of Lord High treasurer of Scotland on his death, in Feb. 1608. He was called Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 166; Fasti Eccles. Scotienses, iii, 889.

Campbell, Alexander (2), a Methodist Episcopal minister, joined the Texas Conference in 1872. After the division of the Conference, he labored successfully in the West Texas Conference until he was transferred to the East Texas Conference, and appointed to the Circuit Court. He died in 1880. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1881, p. 338.

Campbell, Alexander (3), D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Pennsylvania, and graduated from Jefferson College. He studied theology at Princeton Theological Seminary two years, graduating in 1822. He was ordained a minister in the Presbyterian Church, 1827, and preached at Burlington and Washington from 1828 to 1837. Subsequently he preached at Dover, Del., and Poplar Springs, Md. He then became stated supply at McMakie Church, New Orleans, La., from 1850 to 1854. He was a teacher in the same place during 1855. He died in 1855. See Gen. Cut. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 94.

Campbell, Alfred Elderkin, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Cherry Valley, N. Y., Jan. 1, 1802. He graduated from Union College in 1826. Immediately after, he took charge of the academy in his native town, and studied law while he taught school. He soon after turned from the bar to the ministry, and in 1822 went to Princeton Theological Seminary, and graduated in 1828. He was ordained pastor of the church in 1837. The church was located at Winchester, Ohio, and his subsequent settlements were in Newark and Palmyra, both in Wayne County, and in Ithaca. He held charge of the Church at Cooperstown for twelve years. He then went to Spring Street Church, New York city. In 1858 he became Secretary of the American and Foreign Christian Union, and in 1867 accepted an invitation to become pastor of the Church at Cherry Valley, where he remained for the rest of his active life. He died at Castleton, N. Y., Dec. 28, 1874. See Presbyterians in Central New York, p. 480.

Campbell, Allan Ditchfield, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Lancaster, England, March 15, 1791. He emigrated to America, and settled in Campbell, Benjamin, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Ireland. He was received by the Newcastle (Del.) Presbytery, Nov. 5, 1729, and was licensed and ordained to a charge in their bounds, Sept. 1733. He was succeeded in his charge by Rev. James Short, who died in September, 1735. See Webster, Hist. of the Presb. Church in America, 1837.

Campbell, Benjamin H., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Pennsylvania. He spent three years in the study of theology at Princeton Seminary. He was ordained by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, Feb. 2, 1836. He was next at Rome, N. Y., and afterwards preached in Charleston, Pa., Sept. 14, 1846. He resided in Philadelphia, in infirm health, 1847-48. He died in 1848. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem., 1881, p. 81.

Campbell, Charles F., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Marion, S. C. He was a member of the South Carolina Conference, probably joined in 1850; labored six months, and then died, probably in 1850. Mr. Campbell was prompt, faithful, and amiable. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1860, p. 232.

Campbell, Daniel, an English Wesleyan minister, was a native of the north of Britain. He joined the Methodist Church in Nottingham, and in 1788 was sent as a missionary to Jamaica, W. I., and commenced preaching at Montego Bay. A bill having been passed through the local legislature forbidding Protestant preaching to the natives except by the clergy of the Established Church, Mr. Campbell was sentenced to a month's close confinement in a damp and dismal quarter of the Morant Bay jail, where John Williams, a local preacher, had been imprisoned for the same offense. Campbell returned to England in 1803, and procured from the home government a dispensation of the law. He thenceforward labored in Great Britain. A paralytic stroke received on the Newcastle-under-Lyme circuit compelled him to cease travelling in 1833. He settled in London, and died, April 21, 1839, aged sixty-four years. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1835; Weal. Meth. Magazine, 1838, p. 641 sq.

Campbell, David R., D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Washington County, Pa. He graduated at Jefferson College, and received his theological education at the Western Theological Seminary, Allegheny City. He was licensed to preach, and ordained preaching pastor, in 1832. He labored at Meadville, Meadville, and Meadville, Pa., where he spent most of his ministerial life. In consequence of declining health he was obliged to resign his charge. He was a laborious and successful preacher of the Gospel, and rejoiced that he was counted worthy of being put into the ministry. He died at Steuben-

Campbell, Donald, a Scotch prelate, was of the family of Argyle, and abbot of Cupar. He was elected to the see of Brechin in 1558, but the election being declared void, he withdrew from the see of Brechin, and issued all his estates. He was ordained at Meadville, Meadville, and assumed the See of Brechin. He died Sept. 20, 1861. He was a man of great learning, and possessed of considerable wealth.

Campbell, Duncan R., L.L.D., a Baptist minister, was born in Scotland, Aug. 14, 1814. He was a graduate of one of the Scotch universities, and came to the United States in May, 1842. For several years he was in the active duties of the ministry, and won for himself an excellent reputation as a scholar and preacher. As pastor of the Baptist Church in Georgetown, Ky., he added to this reputation, and was called to the presidency of the college in that place in 1849. Success attended his administration until the breaking-out of the civil war scattered the students, and for several years the classes were very small. He died at Covington, Ky., Aug. 16, 1865. "Dr. Campbell is said to have been a man of fine manners and extensive learning, a man of great scholarship, both in belles-lettres and theology." See Appleton's Annual Cyclop., v, 645. (J. C. S.)

Campbell, George A., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Baltimore Hundred, Del., Sept. 3, 1846. He experienced conversion in 1866, received license to exhort in 1869, to preach in 1870, and in 1871 entered the Wilmington Conference. In 1875 his health declined, and he died Sept. 7, 1876. He was a young man of fine promise, an excellent, practical preacher. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1877, p. 12.

Campbell, George Washington, a Congregational minister, was born at La~anen, N. H., March 28, 1794. He graduated at Union College in 1820, and at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1823. In the following year he became a member of the Church in Madison, Wis., and in 1826 was appointed to the pastoral charge of the church in South Bend, Ind., as the colleague of the Rev. John Thompson. His dismissal occurred in 1828; and on Jan. 13, 1830, he was installed pastor of the Second Church in Millbury, Mass. In July, 1833, he left that place, and after spending two years at Bradford, Vt., as acting pastor, he was installed at Spencer, Vt., in 1835, at Newbury, N. H., where he was removable by vote in 1839. Having removed to Hadley, N. H., he made his residence there for two years, during which time he preached for several months at Fishersville, and for some months at Post Mill Village and Fairlee, Vt., on alternate Sabbaths. In 1856 he moved to Bradford, Mass., residing there until the close of his life. He supplied the pulpit of the church in Wolfborough, N. H., for one year, beginning May 20, 1856; of that in Kensington, two years, 1858-60; of that in Mechanics' Falls, Me., for six months, 1865-66; in Bristol and Wells, several months each. He died at Bradford, Mass., Feb. 2, 1869. See Cong. Quarterly, 1869, p. 301.

Campbell, George W., a Baptist minister, was born in Carleton County, N. B., March 1, 1890. He was baptized in 1844 at Woodstock; was ordained at Howard, in March, 1867; labored in York, Victoria, and Carleton counties, and died in July, 1878. See Baptist Year-Book of Maritime Provinces, 1878.

Campbell, Harvey M., a Baptist missionary to Arracan, was born at Lebanon, N. Y., June 9, 1825, and was a graduate of Columbia College. He labored at Saline, Mich., in June, 1849, and sailed the autumn following for the field of his labors. He went to Kyouk Phydro in November, 1850, and there engaged in missionary labor till his death, Feb. 22, 1852. (J. C. S.)
Campbell, James (1), a Presbyterian minister, was born at Campell on Kintry, in Argyleshire, and came to America in 1730. He was licensed by the New Castle Presbytery, and received by the Philadelphia Presbytery, in 1739. The church at Tehicken sought his services, and the presbytery granted its request, but he, after many struggles, told the synod, in 1739, that he was unconverted, and dared not preach till he was born again. He had been preaching four years, and was moral, upright, and well esteemed. At the persuasion of Whitefield he was induced to preach once more, on the following Sunday. He consented, and success attended his labors. In May, 1742, he was directed to spend one fourth of his time at Forks, and in August at Augusta, and asked for his time. Campbell was ordained Aug. 3, 1742, and was ordered to divide his time between Forks and Greenwhich. He was installed at Tehicken May 24, 1744. In 1758 he was dismissed to join the South Carolina Presbytery, and he became a minister of a band of his countrymen settled on the left of the Savannah River. The Scotch-Irish began to flow in a steady stream southward from Pennsylvania before the French war, and drew to this region large numbers from their native land. Mr. Campbell united with the Orange Presbytery in 1774. When or where he died is not known. (W. P. S.)

Campbell, James (2), a Presbyterian minister, was presented to the presbytery April 26, 1770; was licensed Oct. 10, 1771, and sent to visit the vacancies, Timber Ridge, Forks of James, Sinking Spring, Hat Creek, and Cub Creek, Va. Oct. 15, 1772, the presbytery was informed of his death. See Foote, Sketches of Virginia, 2d series.

Campbell, James (3), a Presbyterian minister, was born near Mercerese, in Franklin Co., Pa., May 4, 1798. He graduated from Jefferson College in 1825, entered Princeton Theological Seminary the same year, and graduated in 1828. He was licensed by New Brunswick Presbytery, Aug. 7, 1828; was received by certificate into Redstone Presbytery in 1830; and in August of the same year was installed pastor over the churches in Kittanning and Crooked Creek. He next was installed as pastor of Pine Run Church, in Blairsville. In 1834 he was received into Ohio Presbytery, and became pastor of Pine Creek Church, and in 1838 became pastor at Sharpsburg. For four years he continued to supply various churches, but was never again settled as a pastor. After this he labored in Huron, Marion, Hocking, and Huntingdon Presbyteries in Ohio. He and his wife opened, at Athens, O., a seminary for young ladies, in which they taught for two or three years. For three years he was teacher at Shirleyburg, Pa. From 1857 to 1859 he was at Highland, Kan., and was employed as agent for Highland University a part of the time. He then was a member of the Muncie Presbytery (Ind.). He died at New Orleans, June 14, 1875. Mr. Campbell loved to preach, and was constant and heroic in his endurance of hardships in his missionary work wherever he labored. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1876, p. 18.

Campbell, James M., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, joined the Airiana Conference in 1844; entered the Confederate army as chaplain in 1861; became major, and was killed at Spottsylvania Court-House, Va., May 14, 1864. Mr. Campbell was a warm-hearted, energetic, efficient minister, a close observer, and diligent student. See Minutes of Annual Conference of the M. E. Church South, 1864, p. 514.

Campbell, James Robinson, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born near Armagh, Ireland, in 1800. He emigrated to the United States in 1824, and connected himself with the First Reformed Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia. In 1834 he was licensed by the Reformed Presbyterian of Philadelphia, and designated to the mission field of north India. He died in Landouar, India, Sept. 18, 1862. See Wilson, Prof. Hist. Almanac, 1863, p. 380.

Campbell, John (1), a Scotch prelate, was made bishop of the diocese of Argyll, June 1, 1608. He died in 1612. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 290.

Campbell, John (2), a Congregational minister, was born in the north of Scotland in 1690, and was educated at the University of Edinburgh. He came to America about 1717, and in 1720 became the pastor of the Church in Oxford, Mass., the ordination taking place March 11, 1721. He continued in that relation for more than forty years, and died March 7, 1761. Mr. Campbell was a man of more than ordinary abilities, acting not only as the pastor of his flock, but as their physician, and, when called upon, settling their disputes as a judge. He published A Treatise on Conversion, Truth, Justification, etc. See Ammidown, Hist. Collection, i, 242; Allen, Amer. Bishops' a. v. (J. C. S.)

Campbell, John (3), a Presbyterian minister, was born in Scotland in 1718, and came to America in 1734. Charleston and New Providence, N. J., petitioned New Brunswick Presbytery that, if he should be licensed, they might have his services. May 19, 1747, Campbell was taken on trial, licensed Oct. 14, and ordained and installed in the vacant church at New Providence. On May 1, 1758, he was struck with palsy in the pulpit, and died a week later. See Webster, Hist. of the Presb. Church in America, 1857.

Campbell, John (4), a Scotch Congregational minister, was the subject of religious impressions very early in life. In 1802 he joined Mr. Haldane's classes at Edinbrugh, and in 1804 he labored zealously for some months at Callander, Scotland. He commenced his regular labors at Fort William in 1807. In 1811 he removed to Oban, and was ordained in August of the same year. He preached much in the surrounding districts. On July 3, 1832, he was taken ill, and died Feb. 4, 1833. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1834, p. 320.

Campbell, John (5), an Irish Wesleyan minister, was born in the County Down, Ireland. He converted at the age of eighteen; entered the itinerancy in 1812; became a superintendcr at Magherafelt, his last circuit, in 1842; removed to Belfast in 1845; and died March 4, 1861, aged sixty-six years. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1851; Hill, Ablh. Arrangements of West. Meth. Ministers, 1846, p. 197.

Campbell, John (6), D.D., an English Congregational minister, born at Kitteraus, Scotland, in 1795. He was very precocious in childhood; became converted in early manhood; received his collegiate education at the University of St. Andrews and at the Glasgow University; and began his ministerial labors at Kilmarnock, Ayrshire. In 1828 he removed to London and was engaged at the Tabernacle, where he labored until 1848, when he resigned the pulpit, but retained the office of pastor during life. He died March 26, 1867. The endowments and attainments of Dr. Campbell were multiform and marvellous. He was a man of iron will, of unriveting energy, of unflinching courage, and of vast information. As a controversialist he had few compersers. He wrote several volumes. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1868, p. 259.

Campbell, John (7), a Scotch Congregational minister, was born at Stonehouse, Lanarkshire, Jan. 15, 1828, of pious parents, who took him in his childhood to Manchester, Jamaica. He was converted there, and soon afterwards he joined the Church, devoted his life to spreading the gospel in his native land, emigrated to Glasgow University, and, having completed his classical and theological courses, he was ordained pastor, in 1855, at Kilmarx, where he died, March 26, 1869. Mr. Campbell was most assiduous in his attentions to the sick, energetic in caring for the young, and laborious in his pulpit preparations. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1866, p. 178.
Campbell, John A. (1), a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, joined the Memphis Conference in 1841, and in its active ranks served to the close of his life, in January, 1857. He was a plain, humble, useful minister. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1857, p. 756.

Campbell, John A. (2), a Presbyterian minister, was born near Edington, Ind., March 21, 1825. He was educated at Bloomington, Ind., and studied theology in the Oxford Theological Seminary. He was licensed in 1848. In 1854 he accepted a call to Putneyville Church, Arkansas, where he was made principal of Mount Lebanon Academy, Pa. He died Aug. 8, 1860. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1861, p. 206.

Campbell, John C., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Blount County, Tenn., Dec. 27, 1802. He was educated at Marysville College; was licensed by the Union Presbytery in 1830, and settled at New Providence, Ill., where he remained for eight years. He afterwards preached at various places in Illinois, and died at Cerro Gordo, in the same state, Dec. 31, 1862. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1864, p. 295.

Campbell, John N., D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Philadelphia, March 4, 1798. He was baptized by the Rev. Robert Amman, pastor of the old Scotch Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia, and in commerce with his calling, he received the pur- fessional training. He was a pupil of the celebrated teacher, James Ross, and afterwards became a student in the University of Pennsylvania. After studying for some time under the preceptorship of Dr. Ezra Stiles Ely, he went to Virginia, where he continued his theological studies, and became connected, as professor of languages, with Hampden-Sidney College. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Hanover in May, 1817. The first two or three years after his ordination he remained in Virginia, and preached in various places. In the fall of 1820 he was chosen chaplain to Congress. He then returned to Virginia, and preached for some time in Petersburg, and also went into North Carolina, and was instrumental in establishing the first Presbyterian Church in Newbern. In 1823 he returned to the District of Columbia, and for more than a year he was an assistant Rev. Dr. Balch of Georgetown. In 1824 he took charge of the First African Church in Washington city, where his great gifts quickly filled the place of worship. In January, 1825, he was elected one of the managers of the American Colonization Society, and for six years discharged the duties of that office with great ability and fidelity. In 1831 he became pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in Albany, N.Y. In 1836 he was appointed president of the Theological Seminary at Princeton, which office he held till the close of his life. He was scarcely ever absent from his pulpit, and his rare executive abilities were called into requisition outside of his profession. For many years he was one of the regents of the university of the state of New Jersey. He died suddenly, March 27, 1864. Dr. Campbell possessed great energy of mind and decision of character, and though he had a delicate frame, his endurance and vigor were wonderful, enabling him to accomplish a great amount of work; and his experience of the world, added to a natural shrewdness, made him an admirable exponent of man's estate. As a preacher, he was clear, evangelical, and animated. His sermons were carefully prepared, but written in a character only legible to himself, and then they were delivered with a graceful ease and freedom which made them appear to those who listened as if they were the production of nature. They were brief and logical, and easily remembered. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1865, p. 79. (W. P. S.)

Campbell, John Foage, M.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Augusta County, Va., in 1767. In 1781 he removed to Kentucky. He graduated at Hampden-Sidney College in 1790, and was licensed to preach in May, 1792, and took charge of several congregations in Virginia. In 1795 he returned to Kentucky, and became pastor of the churches of Smyrna and Flemingsburg. He died in Nashville, Tenn., Nov. 4, 1814. He published several Sermons, etc. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iii, 626.

Campbell, Joseph, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Omagh, County Tyrone, Ireland, in 1776. He came with his parents to America in 1797, and, having enjoyed excellent advantages for a common education previous to leaving Ireland, he engaged, shortly after his arrival here, in teaching, and at the same time prosecuting his theological studies. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New Brunswick in 1808. In 1809 he accepted a call to become pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Hackettstown, N. J. Here he continued laboring with great acceptance and success for nearly thirty years. He died Sept. 6, 1840. A volume of his Sermons was published by Dr. Gray, in life, and consecrated to his calling. See Minutes of Annual Conference of the M. E. Church South, 1860, p. 227.

Campbell, Lewellyn, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, entered the Kentucky Conference in 1831. Six years later he was appointed missionary to Texas, then included in the Mississippi Conference, which he joined in 1838, and held an active relation therein until within one year of his death, having labored constantly upon the Texas frontier and in the more remote districts, and one as agent for Centenary College. His last year he spent as a superannuate, dying Sept. 21, 1860. Mr. Campbell's early educational advantages were very limited, yet, by a life of close study, he became intellectually and religiously a strong man. He was an ardent observer and an economist, and consecrated to his calling. See Minutes of Annual Conference of the M. E. Church South, 1860, p. 227.

Campbell, Neil (1), a Scotch clergyman, was "parson and chanter" at Kilmaron in 1574; a member of the general assembly in 1590; assessor to the moderator; promoted to the bishopric of Argyile in 1606, but resigned it in 1608 in favor of his son. He was a member of the general assembly of 1604, and continued his duties as presbyter; he leased three fourths of the parsonage and vicarage of Kilbride (part of his patrimony), to Alexander Campbell. He died in July, 1627, and his two sons, John and Neil, were promoted to bishoprics. In life and doctrine he was praised as superior to both his other bishops. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiacae, iii, 11, 415.

Campbell, Neil (2), A.M., a Scotch clergyman (son of the bishop of Argyile), took his degree at the Glasgow University in 1607, was the first minister over the new parish of Glassary, appointed in 1616, and had the same year over £200 "for nineteen year tuck of the bishop's quarter of the kirke at Dysart." He was promoted to the bishopric of the Isles in 1634, became a member of the faculty of Edinburgh, subscribed the Covenant, abjured Episcopacy, and by the synod was declared, in 1640, capable of the ministry. He died before April 29, 1647. His episcopal robes, four in number, were estimated as of £200 value. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiacae, iii, 7, 419.

Campbell, Peter, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Perthshire, Scotland, in November, 1784. He graduated at the University of St. Andrews in 1814, studied theology in Edinburgh, and was licensed by the Glasgow Presbytery in 1819. In 1820 he emigrated to the United States. In 1823 he was installed pastor of the Presby- terian Church, Florida, N. Y., where he remained till 1844. He died Oct. 19, 1860. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1867, p. 537.

Campbell, Robert, an Irish Methodist preacher, was born near Portadown in 1809. He was converted in early life; joined the Methodists; gave himself to earnest work in the Church; entered the itinerant ministry in 1836, and for more than forty years was an earnest, practical, revival preacher. He was for some years a supernumerary, but a happy and useful one, and died at Clones, May 18, 1879. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1879, p. 47.

Campbell, Robert B., a Presbyterian minister, was born in South Carolina. He studied at Princeton Theological Seminary for three years, graduating in 1824. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Harmony, Dec. 20, 1826; preached at Lancaster Court-House, S.C., from 1825 to 1828; was stated supply at Beaver Creek in 1829, and at Cane Creek during 1830; preached at Wexhaw and Beaver Creek from 1831 to 1837; was stated supply from Camden from 1837 to 1843, and stated supply at Franklin, Miss., from 1848 to 1867. He died in 1871. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem., 1881, p. 32.

Campbell, Robert Potter, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born near Pine Grove Mills, Pa., Aug. 17, 1849. He was converted in 1866; graduated at Dickinson Seminary (Williamsport, Pa.) in 1872, and at Drew Theological Seminary in 1874; and in the same year entered the Central Pennsylvania Conference. His appointments were: Martinsburg, Glen Hope, and Woodland, where he closed at once his labors and life, Jan. 21, 1880. Mr. Campbell was a young man of unusual energy and force of character. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1880, p. 24.

Campbell, Robert S., a Presbyterian minister, was born in 1822. He was educated at Madison College, Antrim, O., and was licensed to preach by the Second Presbytery of Ohio in 1854. In the fall he entered the Western Theological Seminary, and, after completing his course, he went West as a missionary. In 1856 he was ordained and installed pastor of DeWitt Church, Ia.; and, after twelve years of effective service he resigned, and traveled as an evangelist in Pennsylvania, New York, and Ohio. He again went west, and took charge of the Church at Pleasant Unity, Ill., where he was installed pastor by the Rock Island Presbytery. In 1878 he resigned and organized a Church at Davenport, Ia. In consequence of illness he was compelled to resign, and went to New Concord, O., where he died, Jan. 10, 1880. See Christian Instructor, Feb. 12, 1880. (W. P. S.)

Campbell, Thomas J., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born at Columbus, N. C., Feb. 22, 1809. He removed to Georgia in 1815; experienced religion in 1827; received license to preach the gospel in 1837, and in 1840 entered the Alabama Conference, wherein he labored until 1858, when he became supernumerated. He died in 1854. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1854, p. 554.

Campbell, William (2), a Universalist minister, was born at or near Brownsville, Fayette Co., Pa., Nov. 21, 1781. He moved to Gallia County, O., in 1797; joined the Halcion (a Partizans) Church in 1802; and subsequently united with the Universalists, and became a preacher of that faith. He died at Wilkesville, Yinton, O., Mar. 16, 1870. See Universalist Register, 1871, p. 112.

Campbell, William (3), an English Congregational minister, was born at Wick, in the north of Scotland, in 1803. He was a precocious youth, and, at the age of fourteen, had made such progress in learning that he became tutor in a wealthy family in Sutherlandshire. Subsequently he entered Edinburgh University, and took his degree of M.A. before he reached manhood. Having joined the Church, he resolved on quitting the university to enter the ministry, and, accordingly, after taking a theological course at Highbury College, he was ordained at Cheltenham. Subsequently he labored at Newcastle-on-Tyne, Stockton-on-Tees, London, Sunderland, Monmouth, and finally resided at Yenge Park, London. He died July 8, 1876. See (London) Cong. Yearbook, 1877, p. 849.

Campbell, William (4), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Warren County, O., Aug. 21, 1810. He removed to Fountain County, Ind., in 1826; embraced religion in 1829; began preaching that same year; and in 1838 united with the North-western Indiana Conference. In 1843 he labored under the same circuit until 1859, when feeble health obliged him to retire from his favorite work. He died June 4, 1860. Mr. Campbell, as a citizen, neighbor, and friend, was highly esteemed; as a minister, he was thoughtful, unique, prudent, useful. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1860, p. 355.

Campbell, William (5), a young English Methodist preacher of great promise and deep piety, born at Alnwick, Northumberland, in 1816, was converted in his youth, and began to preach. He became an itinerant in the New Connection in 1842, and traveled only at Staley Bridge and Stanley. He died at Alnwick, Aug. 19, 1842. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1860, p. 402.

Campbell, William (6), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Ireland in 1816, and, at the age of three, emigrated with his parents to Quebec, Canada. He was converted when about nineteen; entered Wesleyan University, Middletown, Conn., in 1837, where he remained three years, receiving while there license to exhort and to preach. Between 1840 and 1843 he labored under the presiding elder, and then united with the Philadelphia Conference. He continued his work in the effective ranks until his death, at Salisbury, Md., Aug. 18, 1849. Mr. Campbell was an excellent preacher, thoughtful, fluent; a good pastor, solicitous, diligent, sympathetic, punctual. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1860, p. 426.

Campbell, William Graham, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Rockbridge County, Va., July 27, 1799. His early education was received chiefly at a classical school in that county. He graduated at Washington College, Va., in 1822; then spent one session as tutor in the college; entered Princeton Theological Seminary in the fall of 1825, and spent one year there in study. He was licensed by Lexington Presbytery, Oct. 23, 1826, and was ordained an evangelist by the presbytery April 26, 1828. He then supplied a church at Christianburg, Va., and at the same time taught a school in that place. From 1830 to 1841 he labored as a missionary in Greenbrier and Pocahontas counties, Va.; supplied the churches of Spring Creek, Anthony's Creek, Little Level, and Mount Carmel. From 1841 to 1843 he was stated supply at Warm Springs, Va.; was installed pastor at Shamashah, Va., by Lexington Presbytery, Aug. 24, 1844, and remained there till 1850. From this time to 1857 he resided at Staunton, Va., preaching and teaching. From 1857 to 1859 he had charge of the same academy for girls at Salem, N. C. From 1859 to 1865 he was stated supply to Lebanon Church, Va. From 1866 he resided in Harrisonburg, Va., until his death, Aug. 2, 1881. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem., 1882, p. 15; Christian Observer, Sept. 28, 1881.

Campbell, William J., a colored Baptist minister, was born in 1812. He was baptized by the celebrated Andrew Marshall, and was licensed to preach by the First Colored Church in Savannah, Ga. On the death of Mr. Marshall he became his successor, in 1856, and, by his efforts, a new house of worship was built, and dedicated during the late civil war. Under his ministry the Church greatly increased in numbers. Owing to the troubles arising from the war, and seven hundred members, retired from the church edifice and worshipped in a hall. He died Oct. 10, 1880. See Cathcart, Bapt. Encyclopaedia, p. 179. (J. C. S.) CAMPE

Campe, in Greek mythology, was a monster stationed in Tartarus, to guard the Centaurs and Cyclops imprisoned there by Uranus. When Jupiter was advised by his mother and Metis to get the means whereby he might master his father, he promised the help of the Cyclops and of the hundred-armed giants if he would liberate them; therefore he killed Campe and the giants. When Benohech pursued through Libya, he erected a tent near Zabrina; here he slew an earth-born monster which bore the same name as the above (others say it was identical with it), and had killed many of the inhabitants. He piled up a great hill over the carcases, as a monument to his courage.

Campeggio, Giovanni Battista, an Italian prelate, was a grandson of Lorenzo. By the help of friends he obtained the episcopacy of Majorca. He opened the Council of Trent, Dec. 10, 1545, by a speech entitled De Tuenda Religione, published at Venice in 1561. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Campeggio, Tommaso, an Italian prelate, was born in 1500. He was nephew of cardinal Lorenzo, and accompanied that prelate on many of his missions. He succeeded his uncle in the episcopal see of Feltre, and was sent by Paul III as nuncio to the coloquy of Worms (1540). He was one of the three bishops present at the opening of the Council of Trent in 1545, and there assisted at the sessions held under the pontificate of Paul III. He died at Rome, Jan. 11, 1546. He wrote pamphlets and tracts on ecclesiastical subjects, among which we notice, De Auctoritate Sancctorum Conciliorum, dedicated to pope Pius IV (Venice, 1561)—also various works on ecclesiastical duties (ibid. 1550-55).

Campan, Heimero de (better known as Heimero de Campan), a Dutch theologian, was born at Kampt (Overyssel). He first taught philosophy at Cologne. He was present at the Council of Basel in 1431, and in 1445 was made professor of theology at Louvain. He died there in 1460, leaving, De Auctoritate Concilii:—Super Sententias, and some other treatises.

Campan, Johannes, a Dutch theologian, lived in the beginning of the 15th century. He entered the order of Carmelites, and wrote some commentaries upon Quodlibetorum Opus; Summulae Artium, etc. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Campigli, Giacomo, an Italian theologian, was born at Genoa in 1440, and became a member of the Dominican order. He went to England, to finish his studies at Oxford, where he was made a licentiate in philosophy. On his return to Italy he published De Immortalitate Animae, Opuscula in Medium Dialogum (Rome, 1473; Milan, 1475; Vienna, 1477; Cozenza, 1478).

Campshausen, Matthew, a Flemish theologian, was born at Dusseldorf, Aug. 16, 1636. He entered the Jesuit order at Cologne in 1655, and became a notable preacher. He was a professor of theology at the University of Louvain, and in 1690 was made bishop of Mons. He died there, Sept. 18, 1703, leaving Passio Jesu Christi Adornata in Figuris et Prophecia (Cologne, 1704). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Campi, Antonio, an Italian painter and architect, the second son of Galeazzo, and scholar of Giulio, was born at Cremona before 1550, and lived till after 1593. He painted various tapestries for pope Clement VIII, Eucharist, and The Nativity, in San Paolo, at Milan. As an architect he erected several edifices which are de-
CAMPIONI

Camplius, in Italian mythology, was, according to various inscriptions, a god of war of the ancient Salute, or a surname of Mars.

Camus, a French singer and composer of the court of Louis XV, was born in 1781 and died in 1777. He executed several sacred musical pieces, especially one entitled Qui Confident in Domino. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Camus, Jean, a French martyr, for confessing the gospel of Christ, was condemned by the senate of Paris, and burned there in 1474. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv. 404.

Camuset, Nicolas, a French ecclesiastic, was canon of Troyes, in Champagne, where he was born in 1575, and died Jan. 20, 1655. He edited Chronologia Seriem Temporum et Historiarum Revam in Orbe Gentium Continens, from the creation to the year of Christ 1290, by an anonymous monk of Auxerre (Troyes, 1688, 4to) — A Collection of the Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Troyes, in Latin (ibid. published in 1610). — Historia Albigenorum, by an eye-witness (first published from the MSS. in 1615; was translated into French by Sorbin, and published at Paris): — Miscellanea, a curious collection of acts, treatises, epistles, etc., from 1390 to 1580; besides many other works. See Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Camuset (or Camuset), abbé, a French theologian, was born at Chalon-sur-Marne in 1746. He was at first assistant master of the College Mazarin, then professor. His works are highly esteemed, even by his adversaries. He wrote, Pensées Antiplerialiques (Paris, 1770) — Saint-Augustin Vénéré des Janséniats (ibid. 1771) — Précis de l’Incredulité (ibid. ed. 1773) — Pensées sur le Théisme (ibid. 1785). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cana, Miracle Of. Representations of this miracle frequently present themselves in early Christian art. It was supposed to be typical of the eucharist; indeed, Camulae. See CARMALACH.

Camulodunum, or Camington, a town of the Roman period, on the south side of the Thames, five miles from Crewkerne.

Campi, or Campetis, and Campes and Campenses is the name of a small congregation of Donatists at Rome, mentioned by Jerome and others, and called also Montes (s. v.) and Rupicent. Opisthatus says that their first bishop was Victor of Numidia, and that no church in Rome was open to him. He therefore surrounded a cave outside the city with wattles, and used it for a conventicle. Jerome says they met on a mountain. The three names seem to have been derived from campus, monu, and rupes, in allusion to their places of meeting.

Campo, Christoval, a Spanish martyr, was a citizen of Zamora, and was condemned as a heretic because he would not adhere to the doctrines of the Church of Rome. He was burned in 1560. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv. 456.

Campo, Libera de, an Italian painter of the Venetian school, flourished in the latter part of the 14th century. In the cathedral at Venice is a picture by him representing The Nativity, dated 1418.

Campos, Peter, D.D., a Roman Catholic priest, a native of San Martin de Mercedal, Minorca, followed his flock to St. Augustine, Fla. The parish church was in the hands of the Protestants, the Franciscan chapel a barrack, and the other two chapels in ruins. Campo accordingly said mass in the house of Carrera, near the city gates. He continued religious services during the British rule, and died among his flock, May 18, 1790, aged seventy. In 1788 Florida was restored to Spain, when the Roman Catholic religion had free course. See De Courcy and Shea, Hist. of the Cath. Church in the United States, p. 667.
lib. iv.). Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. xxii, 11) says it represents the change of the wine into the blood of the Lord in the eucharist; and this idea has been applied with eager inconsequence to the support of the full dogma of transubstantiation. The miracle is represented on an ivory, published by Mamachi, Bottari, and Gessner, to have been made in the court of the emperors of a throne belonging to the exarchs of Ravenna, and is referred to the 7th century. See Bandini, In Tabulam Eburneam Observationes (Florentin, 1746, 4to).

Canada. Dominion of. The national and religious associations of this, our most important neighbor on the North American continent, are such as to justify the occupancy of more than usual space for their consideration.

1. Physical, Industrial, and Political Aspects.—1. Geography.—The Dominion of Canada comprises all those portions of British America, except the eastern coast of Labrador, that lie between the United States and the Atlantic, Pacific, and Arctic Oceans. Its area is about 3,500,000 square miles.

2. Geology.—From the Atlantic, along the north shore of the river St. Lawrence, along the north shore of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, its eastern and western part, along the Georgian Bay and the north shore of Lake Superior, thence north along the eastern shore of Lake Winnipeg, and extending beyond the height of land between these lines and Hudson's Bay, is one almost continuous belt of Lower Laurentian, relieved, at wide intervals, by spots of Upper Laurentian, with occasional bands and spots of Huronian, Cambrian, and Silurian, and, along the St. Lawrence and Ottawa Rivers, a considerable extent of Siluro-Cambrian, or Lower Silurian. The southern coast of Labrador, the southern shore of the St. Lawrence, the country along Lake Onta- rio, and what is known as The Western Peninsula of Quebec, have the Lower Silurian, rising, between Lake Erie and Lake Huron, through the Upper Silurian into the Hamilton and Chenngue series of the Erian or Devonian formation. In the Eastern Provinces, the strata reach through the Upper Silurian, Devonian, Carboniferous, and, in Prince Edward Island, even to the Trias. West of Lake Winnipeg, the series enters the Cretaceous and Tertiary. The Cretaceous appears also in British Columbia. The long range of islands skirting the north shore of Lake Huron are Lower Silurian on the north and Middle Silurian on the south, while, on the adjacent mainland, the Huronian prevails, and shores north-east to the neighborhood of James Bay. The Eastern Townships of Quebec give strata even of the Upper Silurian as their general character. South-west of James's Bay is a vast basin of Devonian; and surrounding this, and extending northwards, is a great extent of Silurian. Pleistocene gravels, sand, and clay are uniform and abundant in Canada. Terraces and ancient sea-beaches line the rivers and lakes, and contain, as far west as the Ottawa River, remains of marine shells and fish, at the height of even 450 feet above the St. Lawrence. The relation of these formations to the scenery and products of the country will be apparent.

3. Resources.—In minerals Canada is rich, producing the common metals, with nickel, platinum, antimony, and bismuth; all kinds of coal, salt, coarse and fine clays, marbles of great beauty, soapstones, building and precious stones. Her western coal-fields, to any nothing of those of the east, yield from 4,000,000 to 9,000,000 tons to the square mile, as at Horse-shoe Bend, on the Bow River, and at Blackfoot Crossing on the same River, respectively, the beds reaching even to a depth of twenty feet. Her araucaria of the western moun- tain region has been pronounced excellent. Her wheatflakes, produced by a species of wheat of a faint flour, and Peace Rivers alone, are among the best on the continent.

4. Trade, Industry, etc.—According to the Dominion Annual Register for 1881, Canada has 1,310,896 tons of shipping, placing her fourth on the list of maritime powers of the world, England being first, the United States second, and France third. The tonnage of new entries of a throne belonging to the exarchs of Ravenna, and is referred to the 7th century. See Bandini, In Tabulam Eburneam Observationes (Florentin, 1746, 4to).

3. Resources.—In minerals Canada is rich, producing the common metals, with nickel, platinum, antimony, and bismuth; all kinds of coal, salt, coarse and fine clays, marbles of great beauty, soapstones, building and precious stones. Her western coal-fields, to any nothing of those of the east, yield from 4,000,000 to 9,000,000 tons to the square mile, as at Horse-shoe Bend, on the Bow River, and at Blackfoot Crossing on the same River, respectively, the beds reaching even to a depth of twenty feet. Her araucaria of the western moun- tain region has been pronounced excellent. Her wheatflakes, produced by a species of wheat of a faint flour, and Peace Rivers alone, are among the best on the continent.

Northern fruits, timber, and fish are abundant; and these, with numerous other products, find markets in parts as distant as Brazil and the East Indies.

4. Trade, Industry, etc.—According to the Dominion Annual Register for 1881, Canada has 1,310,896 tons of shipping, placing her fourth on the list of maritime powers of the world, England being first, the United States second, and France third. The tonnage of new entries of subjects beyond those mentioned in the governor's message. Two years are allowed the queen in which to veto any bill, even after it has been passed by both houses and signed by the governor-general. The members in the several executive councils of the provinces vary, as do the houses in each, Ontario having but one house, the Legislative Assembly, and Quebec having two, the Legislative Council and the Legislative Assembly. The local parliaments of Ontario and Quebec sit for four years. Those of the maritime provinces have regulations which existed prior to Confederation. Military matters, marriage and divorce (except such matters as licenses may), the persons allowed to keep registers of marriage, etc., banking, criminal law, and, in general, all matters relating to the whole country, are in the hands of the central government. Education is a local matter. Agriculture and immigration are not confined to either the local or the central government. Judges, except in courts of probate in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, are selected from the bar of the provinces they are to serve, are appointed by the governor-general in council, and are paid by the Dominion Parliament. That parliament takes the revenues and assumes the debts of the provinces, as they were before confederation. These provinces fixed sums yearly to enable them to meet their burdens. In the Dominion Parliament debates may be in French or English: both languages must be used in records, journals, and printed acts in the province of Quebec. The Dominion capital is Ottawa; the capitals of Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Manitoba, and British Columbia, respectively, are Toronto, Quebec, Halifax, Fredericton, Charlottetown, Winnipeg, and Victoria.

II. Population. — The number of inhabitants of the Dominion, in 1861, was 4,324,810. In 1862 there arrived 160,449 immigrants who declared their intention of settling in the Dominion. The immigration in 1863 was 133,000. Hence, the population of Canada, at the close of 1883, was 4,618,259. Of the 4,324,810 given in the census of 1881, those of French origin numbered 1,298,929. Of the full number, 8,715,492 are native Canadians, Ontario containing the largest proportion of these, and Quebec the next. Divided according to religions, the Methodists number 742,981 adherents; Presbyterians, 676,165; Church of England, including 2596 Episcopalians, 577,414; Baptists, including 21,224 Methodists in Ontario and Manitoba, 296,520; Congregationalists, 20,300; Disciples, 20,158; Lutherans, 46,850; Pioneers, 1,900; Quaker, 17,955; Adventists, 4,755; Protestant Episcopal, 1,962; Roman Catholics, 1,791,982; those of no religion, 2634; those giving no returns of religion, 86,765; papans, 4478.

Judges. — Henry. — 1. Political. — Canada was first settled by the French, who gave it its present name from an Indian word meaning "a village." The first brick house of which we have any record was built by Père Buteux, in 1614, at Tadoussac, or, as the Indians called it, also, Satîgine. This trading-post lay at the confluence of the Saguenay and the St. Lawrence, and gained its name from the Indian (Ojibwa) Dhôdôhek, plural Dhôdhôshkoo, a female breast, the surrounding hills and an island some distance up the Saguenay having a resemblance to the breasts of a woman. In 1665, Canada became a "royal government," with a governor and a council, with the Custom of Paris as a legal code, and with a superior jurisdiction of Quebec. The union of Canada to England, by the treaty of Paris in 1763, founded in the colony about 65,000 souls. The "Quebec Act" of 1774 was unjust to the English, depriving them of the right of habeas corpus. In 1793, Upper Canada abolished slavery, and Lower Canada did the same in 1833. From 1771 till 1791 Quebec belonged to Upper and Lower Canada. The virtual suspension of that constitution by the English Parliament led to the rebellion of 1837. In 1841 the two provinces were united under a new constitution, framed on the English model. The confederation of all the British American provinces had been advocated by chief-justice Sewell as early as 1814; was brought prominently before the public in 1817 by the present Sir Alexander Galt; and was accomplished for Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, on July 1, 1867; for British Columbia in 1871, and Prince Edward Island in 1872, Newfoundland alone now refusing to enter the Dominion. In 1870 Canada consummated the acquisition of the Hudson's Bay Company's territory, and so laid the foundation of her future national lity. The relative progress of Canada may be seen from the following statement: In 1812, the year of the "American war," the population was 400,000: that of the United States, according to Mackenzie's History of America, was 8,000,000. Fitting the present population of the latter at 55,000,000, the population of Canada ought to be, if the same rate of progress had been maintained in both countries, 2,750,000. The actual population, however, is above 4,900,000; that of Quebec and Ontario, "Old Canada," alone, being 3,582,255.

2. Ecclesiastical. — (1) Roman Catholics. — In 1610 and 1611 the Jesuits were visited by Rocolarts and Jesuits. In 1615 four Rocolarts came to Quebec with Champlain. In 1617 services were held at Quebec, Tadoussac, and Three Rivers. Great interest attaches to the church at Tadoussac, as it was the first church erected in Canada. Up to 1642 it was a bark cabin, with a wooden door, with a bench in the back for the priest. In 1645 it became an active mission of the Jesuits. In 1747 Père Coquart, a Jesuit, commenced a wooden church. About 1870 some carpenters, while repairing the present church, found, under the floor, "a plate of what appears to be hammered lead," with the following inscription engraved upon it. It is given verbatim et literatim.

The early record of Jesuit labors is one of privation, zeal, virtue, superstition, mutilation, and massacre. Ladies of refinement bore their share in the sacrifices made for religion. François Lavall, vicar-apostolic in the field of the Hurons, was sent in 1658 as a missionary with three Quakers. He was afterwards interfered, as an ecclesiastical, with the civil government, and, by his power, made the governors tremble. He gave his name to the university into which the seminary of 1658 developed. The Seminary of St. Sulpius, at Montreal, was founded in 1647. The Grey Nuns were settled in that city in 1677 by Madame Yonge. The year 1826 witnessed the establishment of the diocese of Kingston, which included the whole of Upper Canada. Further divisions took place as the Church progressed, until now, in the Almanach Ecclésiastique du Canada for 1884, returns are furnished from four ecclesiastical provinces, the Roman Catholic province of the Hurons, three apostolic vicariates, and one apostolic prefecture, besides one Canadian diocese, that of Vancouver Island, which is under the control of the American province of Oregon city. The first bishop of Upper Canada was the Rev. Alex. McDonnell, who is said by Dr. Caniff to have been consecrated in 1822. When he entered the country, in 1804, there were only two Roman Catholic clergymen in Upper Canada, and one of them deserted his post. The bishop had no assistance for ten years, while traveling from Lake Superior to Lower Canada. He lived in Indian huts, and spent many thousand pounds of his private means in building churches, erectinging schools, and ordaining priests. In 1791 the lands now possessed by his Church in Ontario, and held for years a seat in the Legislative Council. The recent progress of Roman Catholicism in Canada is very marked, and threatens the welfare of the country. The time was then, in the persons of the Récollets, it opened its church-buildings in Quebec and Montreal to clergymen of the Anglican and Scotch churches respectively, while a Gallican bishop welcomed the arrival of a Protestant bishop by a double kiss. Now, adopting the syllabus and the Vatican decrees of 1864 and 1870, and strengthened by the influence of European despotism, it suppresses the Protestants out of public offices and the province of Quebec; it suppresses the Protestant press, and the control of the books to be studied in Ontario schools; threatens the destruction of a medical school which has been affiliated with a Protestant university, and acts in its destiny on the political and religious destinies of the whole Dominion. The results which would arise from the predominance of this form of Christianity may be judged from the fact that the latest sources of information at hand show that over 64 per cent. of the non-readers over twenty years of age, and 50 per cent. of the non-writers, of the Dominion, are found in the one province in which that Church is supreme. This supremacy arose from the generous grant to the conquered French, by the English victories, of such religious rights as they had possessed up to the time of the conquest, and, also, of the use of Catholic churches. A commission was set up in 1855 to signalize by the abolition of the seigniorial tenure of law. Prior to this, the seignor was a feudal judge of all crimes except murder and treason; and, from him, the peasant held his land subject to compulsory feudal obligations. The Seminary of St. Sulpice was the seignior of the whole island of Montreal; and, even with its now limited power, it has so strengthened its claims that a large band of Indians, intrusted to it for education, has been driven to seek refuge from its severity in a distant portion of Ontario.

(2) Church of England.—The first clergyman who officiated in England in 1776 was the Rev. John Ogilvie, D.D., a graduate of Yale; at first the church was under the direction of Mr. Brooke, of Quebec, who acted as chaplain at Niagara in 1759. The Rev. John Doty was a chaplain between 1777 and 1781, and a missionary at Sorel after 1784. The first resident clergyman was the Rev. John Stuart, a United Empire Loyalist from Virginia. He arrived in 1785, and was located between Kingston and Niagara. The United Empire Loyalists, by their assumption of special claims for their church, afterwards introduced long and bitter contentsions into the land which they adopted. The first bishop was the Right Rev. Charles Inglis, of Nova Scotia, who was consecrated in 1785. In 1793 Bishop Inglis appointed the first rector, which meant all that was then Canada. His successor was the Hon. and Right Rev. Charles James Stewart, D.D., said to be a scion of the royal house of Stuart. He was a member of the Executive Council of Canada under the constitution of 1791; and to him and his successors was granted by letters patent the title of "lord bishop," though the Anglican Church is not "Established" in Canada. In 1791 one seventh of the unsurveyed lands was set apart "for the support of a Protestant clergy." The ambiguity of the term "Protestant clergy" caused a long and bitter agitation, which ended, in 1846, in the triumph of those opposed to a religious establishment. In 1839 the diocese of Quebec, under Dr. George Jehoshaphat Mountain, was divided, and that of Toronto formed, with the Hon. and Right Rev. John Strachan, D.D., as bishop. He was the Anglican champion in the Clergy Reserves agitation. Though his exertions failed, he was the father of the Anglican synod. In 1846 he was made an archbishop in the Anglican institution. On the transformation of this into a provincial university, called "Toronto University," in 1850, Trinity College, Toronto, was begun for the Anglican Church, and opened in 1852. In 1850 the queen exercised her royal supremacy in the Canadian branch of the English Church for the last time, by appointing Dr. Fulford as bishop of the new diocese of Montreal. In 1860 bishop Fulford became metropolitan, and for many years next, led by Dr. Strachan, to secure the rival of the Canadian Church, and to obtain such an appointment. Dr. Lewis, to whom the suggestion the Lambeth Conference of 1867 was due, became bishop of "Ontario" in 1862. The issuing of royal mandates for the consecration of bishops ceased with the appointment of Dr. Williams as fourth bishop of Quebec in 1860. In the following year, the Church of New Westminster and Caledonia, formed from that of Columbia; and a new diocese of Assiniboia, as yet without a bishop, was erected in the north-west. In October, 1860, was formed the "Society for Converting and Civilizing the Indians, and Propagating the Gospel among Destitute Settlers in Canada," under the presidency of the Right Rev. J. P. Cuff, of New York, now Toronto, prior to 1825. The contributions of the Canadian Church to foreign missions are made through the great societies of England. The mission of this Church to the French Canadians is known as the "Sacrevois Mission." During 1888 the various missions of Canada have been consolidated under one central missionary society, and the Church has energetically committed itself to the temperance reform, by the formation of a Church of England Temperance Society, with parish branches and Bards of Hope. The contests between High and Low churchmen have been keen and long, the clergy in the Toronto diocese and the most of those tending to the High, and most laymen leaning to the Low. The Evangelicals have recently secured appointments from their school to two dioceses, one of which is the best in Canada.

(3) Presbyterianists.—In 1765 a chaplain of the 84th regiment, the Rev. George Henry, officiated at Quebec, while Mr. Bethune, chaplain of the 84th, founded the first Presbyterian congregation in Montreal. In 1792 was erected the St. Gabriel Street Church, Montreal, the oldest Protestant church-building in Canada. The first presbytery was formed in 1786, in Nova Scotia, where the burghers of the province were prominent, who, until the establishment of "Associate Presbytery of Nova Scotia" was founded by Dr. James McGregor and two others in 1794. These two presbyteries united in 1817, as the "Presbyterian Church of Nova Scotia." In 1803 the Presbytery of Montreal was founded by two ministers and one elder. The Established Church of Scotland, or "The Kirk," commenced its labors in 1784, when the Rev. Samuel Ruscel took up his residence in Halifax. In 1831 the "Synod of the Presbyterian Church in Canada, in connection with the Church of Scotland," was formed in "Old Canada," with twenty-five ministers. These united, in 1840, with the "associate Church of Scotland in Upper Canada." Prior to that time, the "United Presbyterian Church in Canada" was formed. In 1838 the "Synod of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island" was formed, with seven ministers. The Presbytery of New Brunswick did not enter this synod, but in 1846 was formed the "Presbyterian Church in New Brunswick." The "Free Church" secession of 1843 led to the formation of the "Presbyterian Church of Canada," in 1844, with twenty-five ministers. This schism has ultimately led to a unity grander and purer, doubtless, in spiritual life, than would have been probable without it. In 1861 the "Free Church" and the "United Presbyterian Church" united as the "Canada Presby-terial Church," with two hundred and twenty-six ministers. The General Assembly of this Church was founded in 1870. On June 15, 1875, in Montreal, "The Kirk," the "Canada Presbyterian Church," the "Church of the Maritime Provinces in connection with the Church of Scotland," and the "Presbyterian Church of the Lower Provinces" united as the "Presbyterian Church of Canada." A very few congregations connected with "The Church," "The Church of St. Andrews" of Montreal is the chief, refused to enter the union, and commenced a suit at law for the control of the "Temporalities Fund." This fund had arisen from the consuma-tion of grants received principally from the "Clergy Reserves." The suit ended as had a previous one, that of the American Episcopal Church against the "Can-wesleys," in the decision that the majority of a Church, in its corporate action, must be considered the Church. While supporting the majority, however, Parliament refused to alter the title of the board which controls the fund; and it remains as in connection with the Church of Scotland." The claimants who entered the union were twenty-seven; the disidents, seven.

The "Presbyterian Church of Canada" makes the Bible the infallible rule of faith and manners, the Westminster Confession the subordinate standard, the catechism the means of doctrinal instruction, the "Form of Church Government" the "Bishops' Directory for the Public Worship of God" the standards of government and worship. This Church has missions in the New Hebrides, Trinidad, Erromanga, Formosa, and India, besides missions to the French-Canadian Roman Catholics.
As a specimen of the early influence of this Church, special reference may be made to the Rev. William Smart, one out of many names connected with pioneer work in Canada. Converted to God in Drury Lane Theatre, London, by seeing the vast audience, and asking himself, "Where will all these people be in one hundred years?" and "Where shall I then be?" he gave himself to study and the ministry of Christ, came to Canada in 1811, and founded the first Sunday-school in Upper Canada; in 1817 established the first Bible Society in Upper Canada; in 1818 founded the first Missionary Society; and originated the first Religious Tract Society in 1820. The early spirit of this Church has not departed from it; but, with great wealth and intelligence, its influence for good grows steadily.

(4) Methodists.—This body, the largest of the Protestants, like both Anglicans and Presbyterians, owes its origin in Canada greatly to soldiers. Commissionary Tuffey, of the 44th regiment, a local preacher, held meetings in 1787; and in 1789, another local preacher, labored in 1786 along the Niagara river. Philip Embury and Barbara Heck, after living ten years in Lower Canada, came to Upper Canada in 1785. In 1788 came to Ernestown an Irishman, named James McCarthy, a follower of Whitfield.
He preached for the Methodists. His enemies hated him conveyed to one of the "Thousand Islands," where he was left to perish. His fate has never been generally known; but his son informed the writer of this article that he escaped from the island, and, after making his way towards home, was found by the roadside stabled in a number of places. The early records of Methodism give the names of Losee, Dow, Bangs, Dunham, Case, the Coates, Pickett, and others, as the pioners of its heroic age. In 1814 the English Wesleyans began work in Montreal, and extended it to Upper Canada in 1818. In 1820 Lower Canada was given up to the English Conference, Upper Canada being under the American Church. Methodists. The Methodist preachers of the West, many of them being from the United States, and not able to take the oath of allegiance, were not allowed to perform marriages, even when that right was conceded to Prestbyterians and Lutherans in 1797, and when, as late as 1823, a bill was introduced into Parliament to give them the desired authority. The first conference met at Hallowell, now Picton, in 1824. The Conference Missionary Society was formed at this period. The "Canadian Wesleyans" arose in 1827, under Ryan and Breakenade. In 1828 Canadian Methodism became independent of the United States, and, in 1831, its preachers obtained the right to marry. In 1833, aided by the Metropolitan Church of Montreal, the "Church of St. Andrews" of Montreal had new buildings, which it was desired to call a "Methodist Episcopal Church,

Ennes, and one minister from each Annual Conference. It has two sections, the Western and the Eastern, the dividing line being the eastern limit of the Montreal Conference, that of the Southern Baptist Convention, the boundary of 13° 30' at Utrecht and the boundary of 48° 30' at Yarmouth, near Digby. In Ontario and Quebec are two home mission conventions, combined in one foreign missionary society, organized in 1866. This society, also, has a mission among the Telugus, with the same number and kind of stations and missionaries as the Eastern society, and about six-hundred communicants. The Western Baptists number 27,066.

(6) Congregationalists.—In 1769 New England Puritans settled in Nova Scotia under a provincial enactment, which gave "full civil and religious liberty" to "Protestants dissenting from the Church of England." After this, Congregational churches grew in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Some Christian soldiers at Quebec secured, in 1801, from the London Missionary Society, a pastor, Rev. Mr. Bentom, who supported himself mainly by the practice of medicine. He was fined and imprisoned for the publication of a pamphlet protesting against the arbitrary suspension by the authorities of the act granting power to Congregational ministers to keep registers of clerical acts. This deprived many of their legal status for thirty years. Mr. Bentom's Church eventually joined the Presbyterians. Prior to doing so, however, they began printing in French. The Quebec Bible Society published the first Canadian Sunday-school in 1806. In 1811, a graduate of Dartmouth College, the Rev. John Jackson, came to the "Eastern Townships," and labored with almost no pecuniary reward for ten years, retiring through failure of health. In 1815, a graduate of Middlebury College, the Rev. J. Taylor, came to Eaton; and in 1816 the Rev. Thaddeus Osgood came to Stanstead and formed a Congregational Church. Congregationalism was introduced into what is now Ontario by the Rev. J. Silcox, of Prince, England. In 1831 was formed Zion Church, Montreal, which, under the pastorate of the Rev. Dr. Wilkes, has, perhaps, done more for Congregationalism in Canada than any other church. In 1833 the illegal decree before mentioned was rescinded. Dr. Wilkes, after educating himself in Glasgow for the ministry, came to Canada in 1836. The feelings aroused by the rebellion of 1837 caused many pastors from the United States to return thither, leaving the congregations to starve. Such a spirit was strengthened by the addition of a congregation partly composed of seceders from the Church of England. This accession is credited to the opposition of the rector, afterwards bishop Inglis, to "evangelical" preaching and conversions. The "Fathers" of the Baptist churches in the East were Theodore and Harris Hardin, chimney, Edward and James Manning, Asley, Dimock, Burton and Cruandall. Gilmore, Cramp, and Davidson are names most prominent in the West. The first Baptist congregation of "Old Canada" was that of Caldwell's Manor, in Lower Canada, formed in 1794 by Rev. E. Andrews, of Vermont. The Montreal Church began in 1831. The Canada Baptist Union was formed in 1800. The Grande Ligne Mission began in 1835. The Maritime Provinces have seven Associations, with 218 ordained ministers and 88,430 communicants, two thirds of whom are in Nova Scotia. The Baptist Convention for the Maritime Provinces was formed in 1835; a general, or, state, union was formed in 1836; and foreign missions and for education. These departments are managed through three boards. Among the Telugus of India are three stations, eight missionaries, four men and four women, with ninety-one communicants. The mission property of the Eastern Baptists, among the Telugus, is worth $12,500. The disbursments for the year ending August, 1883, were $8331. The Home Mission Board, which meets at Yarmouth, spent, last year, $4,400 for forty-nine missions and fifty-two men. The number of memberships in the year 1862, in the province of New Brunswick, was 62,769. In 1863 the value of church property is $9,130,807. There are foreign missionaries in Japan and Bermuda, 14; French missionaries, 9; Indian, 27, besides unpaid agents and teachers; domestic, 350. The amount raised for missions in 1883 was $185,769.
menced in Canada in 1839, under two missionaries in Welland and Waterloo, the Revs. M. Els and C. Hall. Their work, at first among Germans, has become partly English. The body is connected with the Church of the same name in the United States. In 1864 a separate conference for Canada was formed. Missions exist on the Ottawa, in Muskoka, and at Parry Sound. In April, 1868, there were 5066 members, 56 preachers, 375 classes, valued at $118,400, 26 parsonages, worth $28,225, with 82 Sunday-schools, 5310 scholars, and 1007 teachers. The Mission Fund amounted to $7000.

(8) Christian Disciples.—This body maintains the same principles as the followers of Campbell in the United States, separated from, by the labors of Scotch Baptists and followers of the Haldanes. The pioneers were Stewart, Stephens (both students of Haldane's College), Weir, Hutchison, Oliphant, Menzies, McLaren, McKellar, McVicar, Sinclair, Robertson, and Barclay, with Mr. James Black, of Eramosa, who came to Canada in 1825, and still lives, at the age of over eighty. The body is not numerous.

(9) Unitarians.—There are but three congregations of this body in Canada, so far as is known. These are in Montreal, Toronto, and St. John, N. B. The Montreal Church was organized in 1842, and served for some months by the Rev. Henry Giles. The first pastor was the Rev. Dr. Cordier. For ten years the church was connected with the Remonstrant synod of Ulster, Ireland. In 1856 it became independent. In the strife and opposition of its first years, it grew. With the repudiation of such irrational interpretations of orthodox doctrines as alone furnish a legitimate ground for objections against these doctrines, the orthodox churches gain such a hold on the masses that Unitarianism makes but little progress. The Unitarian Church in Toronto was founded in 1845. That in St. John appears to have no settled pastor. The congregation in Montreal is of the moderately conservative wing, and seeks to be definitely Christian. The radicals, who either reject the supernatural, or call themselves Agnostics, have drifted into the "Free Thought Club." The body numbers 2126.

(10) There are other small bodies, Lutherans, Quakers, Swedes, etc.; and small communities of Jews exist, to the number of 2856. "Free-Thought" clubs exist in some of the leading cities, chiefly in Montreal.

IV. Languages, Literature, and Education.—German prevails in some localities, but is gradually giving place to English. French is spoken by 1,298,929 persons, chiefly in the province of Quebec, and promises to increase in extent and influence. The Canadian French is not a patois, but is mainly the French of the age of Louis XIV, preserved, by distance, from the effects of the revolutions of France, and exhibiting trifling local varieties in vocabulary, with occasional Anglicisms. In the writings of Garneau, Suite, Chapman, Lemay, Faucher de St. Maurice, Marmette, Bisson, Frechette, and many others, a style is found that would do no discredit to Paris, the last-named having been made laureate by the French Academy. The intonation of Canadian French lacks the refinement of Paris; but that of Canada does not give the harsh burr to the letter r which is so often heard east of the Atlantic, and is wholly devoid of dialects. Canada supplies, in increasing numbers, her own school text-books; and royal societies of art and literature, founded under the auspices of the marquis of Lorne, promote the growth of an educated taste. The table below shows the publications of the country that publish advertisements.

Education is under the control of the provincial governments, and, consequently, is not uniform. In Ontario and other provinces, the system is unseccessarian, yet Christian, provision being made for opening and closing prayers, though permission to be absent from these may, under certain circumstances, be given. There is provision for Roman Catholic separate schools. In Quebec, education is sectarian and Roman Catholic, with provision for Protestant dissentient schools. In Manitoba, the schools are partly Protestant and partly Roman Catholic. The Ontario system, developed by the late Dr. Ryerson, is the model, to which the best remaining systems are similar, with local peculiarities. Under this system, the various grades of schools are public schools, high schools, collegiate institutes, and the university, with a special institution named Upper Canada College, founded in Toronto and endowed on the model of the great public schools of England. There are both English and normal schools and an agricultural college. The public schools are free, as are most of the high schools and collegiate institutes; and education is compulsory. There are military schools at prominent places, and a military college at Kingston. These are under Dominion control, there being no provincial militia in Canada. The chief non-denominational colleges are Toronto University, McGill University, and the University of New Brunswick. The expenditure for education in Ontario alone for 1880 was $2,822,052.

The Roman Catholics have one university, Laval, in Quebec, besides numerous colleges and convent-schools. The Church of England has, of universities, Trinity, Bishop's, the Western, King's College, and St. John's, in Toronto, Lennoxville, London, Windsor, N. S., and Winnipeg, respectively. There are, also, in Toronto, Wycliffe Theological College, and, in Montreal, the Diocesan Theological College, to meet special wants besides other colleges and schools, some of which are for ladies only, and the Sabrevois Mission College of Montreal.

The Presbyterians have Queen's and Dalhousie Universities, with Manitoba and Morin Colleges, besides Knox Theological College, of Toronto, and the Presbyterian College of Montreal, and other schools, some being for ladies.

The Methodists have Victoria and Albert Universities, which, under the union, are to be consolidated under the name of the former, Albert becoming a high-class school. They have, also, Mount Allison University, with theological schools in Coubour, Montreal, and Sackville, besides ladies' colleges at Hamilton, Whitby, and Sackville, and various other schools.

The Baptists have Acadia University, with Horton Academy and Acadia Seminary, with a first-class theological college, McMaster Hall, in Toronto, and a college in Woodstock, Ont.

The Congregationalists have a theological college in Montreal.

The medical schools of Toronto, Kingston, and Montreal are of a high character. Schools for the blind, for deaf mutes, for Indians, and reformatory schools, with scientific, literary, and art societies, abound. Two medical schools for ladies have recently been opened in Toronto and Kingston. Wealth begins to show its power in the erection and equipment of buildings not surpassed upon this continent. The result is seen in the fact that both French and English are honorably quoted in Europe, even while Canada is, politically, not yet a perfect nation, but is in a state of transition from a position difficult to define to one more definite but, as yet, unseen.

Canal, FARO, a Venetian painter, was born in 1708, and studied under Gia. Bat. Tiepolo. He died in 1767. In Venice he executed many works for the churches and public edifices.

Canale, GIUSEPPE, a Roman designer and engraver, was born in 1728, and studied under Jacob Frey. In 1751 he was invited to Dresden to execute some fine works for the gallery. The following are his principal prints: Christ and St. John; Christ Appearing to St. Thomas; A Turkish Woman; Maria Josephina, Queen of Poland.

Canal (Canalis or Canale), Bartolommeo, an Italian painter who was born in 1470, and died in the duchy of Milan. He entered the congregation of Regular Clerks Barnabites, and was celebrated for his piety and seclusion from the world. He died in 1584, and left some works, among them, Diario Spirituale, or meditations for every day in the year (Milan and Rome).

Canales, Giovanni, an Italian theologian, was born at Ferrara and lived near the close of the 15th century. He entered the order of Cordeliers, and composed several treatises on the Celestial Life, the Nature of the Soul, on Paradiso, on Heil, etc. (Venice, 1494). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a.v.

Canarese (or Kannara) Version. The Canarese is spoken, in the form of several millions throughout the Malabar coast, also in the province of Canara, and as far north as the Kistna River. The first attempt towards a Canarese version of the Scriptures was made at Surampore in 1808, and it was not till 1822 that the New Test. was completed at press. A version of the Old Test. was also undertaken, and partly executed by the Surampore missionaries. But, on finding that others had undertaken a similar work, they relinquished it. In 1817, Mr. Hands of Bellary, an agent of the London Missionary Society, made it known to those concerned that he had translated the whole of the New Test. into Canarese. Of this translation the Gospels and the Acts were printed under the immediate superintendence of the translator. In order that the translator might not be longer detained from his station, the types and printing materials were sent to Bellary, and the entire New Test. was completed in 1821. At this period Mr. Hands had likewise completed the translation of the Old Test., while his friend and coadjutor, the Rev. Wm. Reeve, had engaged in a separate translation of the Pentateuch, with the view of comparing it with that of Mr. Hands, and of securing thus a more correct and idiomatic version. In 1822, while these two laborers were conjointly engaged in their undertaking, the Madras Bible Committee, upon whom the superintendence of this translation had devolved, invited them to assume for themselves with major A. D. Campbell and R. C. Gooking, so as to form a sub-committee of translation. Under the care of this sub-committee, the version of the Old Test. was continued. In 1862 the Old Test. left the press. As it was afterwards found desirable to submit the entire Canarese Scriptures to a further and more elaborate revision, the Rev. G. H. Weigel was engaged by the British and Foreign Bible Society, at the instance of the Madras Committee of Revision, to devote his whole time to the work. Under this arrangement thoroughly revised transversions of the Canarese New Test. were completed in 1853, and two large editions were published, one at Bellary and the other at Bangalore. A like revision of the Old Test. has subsequently been accomplished, and was, according to the report for the year 1860, in the hands of the Canarese missionaries and their people. This edition seemed to have been only tentative, for, in the report for 1866, we read the following account given by the Rev. B. Rice, secretary to the Canarese Revision Committee:

The printing of the Quarto Reference Bible in Canarese has been completed during the past year, and is now being circulated among a considerable number of the Revision Committee, who commenced the work twenty years ago. During that period, some who took part in this new translation (for which it really is and simply a revision of the previously existing version), have been removed by sickness, death, or other causes; but it is matter for deep satisfaction that several of those who have been spared to assist in the work from the commencement to the close, are in the work chiefly of the following missionaries: Rev. Dr. Weigel and Rev. Dr. Mische, the German mission; Rev. D. Sanderson, of the Wesleyan mission; and Rev. G. Campbell, Rev. B. Rice, of the London mission. It may be worth while to record that the entire New Test., with the books of Psalms, Proverbs, and Judges, was completed by the brethren collectively in committee, which held repeated sittings for that purpose of two and three months' duration at each time. During the same period, the first two volumes of the historical books of the Old Testament, together with Job, were revised by the Rev. C. Campbell, partly on the basis of the old version, and partly on the basis of a new translotion by the Rev. G. H. Weligel. The prophetic books were written by the Rev. B. Bible, who was at the base of the new translation by Mr. Weigel. The whole was circulated for some time in a tentative edition, before a large edition was printed."

According to the report for 1881, there were circulated in the Canarese, up to March 31, 1881, two hundred and ninety-eight thousand portions of Scriptures. See Bible of Every Land, p. 141.

Canaveri, Giovanni Battista, an Italian prelate, was born at Borgonanero, Sept. 25, 1755, and at eighteen years of age was an amateur of mathematical sciences, and had studied his profession in the University of Turin, in which city he joined himself to the Congregation of the Oratory. In 1779 he was made bishop of Bielle, but resigned in 1804, and in 1805 he was appointed bishop of Vercelli, to which the see of Bielle was then united. He died Jan. 10, 1811, leaving some panegyric and moral letters, and a work entitled Notizia Compendiosa dei Monasteri della Trappola Fondati Dopo la Rivoluzione di Francia (Turin, 1704, Svo). See Biog. Universelle, s. v.; Landou, Ecclés. Dict. s. v.

Cancer (the Crab) was the animal which Juno is said to have sent against Hercules, when he contended with the Hydra in the marshes of Lerna, and by which his foot was bitten. The hero, however, killed it, and Juno placed it in the zodiac.

Canda, Charles Du, a French ecclesiastical historian, born at St. Omer, lived about 1615. He entered the order of the Premonstrants, and became canon and then prior of the abbey of Dormin. He left, La Vie de Saint Charles Borromée (St. Omer, 1614; translated from the Italian)—La Vie de Saint Thomas Archevêque de Cantorbery (ibid. 1615)—La Vie de Sainte Françoise (translated from the Italian, without date). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Candale (or Candolle), François Husates (or De Fouis, count of), a French prelate and mathematician, was born in 1502, and died Feb. 5, 1554. He was bishop of Aire, in Gascoigne, and a commander of the royal order of St. Louis; his amercements in his mathematical sciences, he established a chair at the University of Bordeaux. His extant writings are, Traduction du Poème d'Hermès Trismégiste :—Traduct. des Œuvres d'Enclide. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Candeo, Isaac, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born about 1754. He entered the itinerancy in 1801; became superannuated in 1811; resumed his work in 1824, and continued faithful until his death, Dec. 22, 1828. Mr. Candeo was a warm-hearted friend, a sincere Christian, and a serious, devoted, successful minister. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1829, p. 40.

Candeo, Isaac Newton, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Galway, N. Y., Oct. 30, 1801. He graduated at Union College in 1825, and in 1828 at Princeton Seminary. He was ordained an evangelist by the Presbyterian of New York, May 12, 1829. He was stated supply at Oxford, N. J., from 1829 to 1834; pastor of the First Church of Belvidere from 1834 to 1840; agent for the Board of Foreign Missions from 1840 to 1849; pastor at Lafayette, Ind., from 1850 to 1855; stated supply at Gallesburg, Ill., from 1855 to 1866. From 1866 to 1869 he was engaged in a church agency, and from 1869 to 1874 he was pastor at Richview. He died at Peoria, Ill., June 19, 1874. See Gen. Hist. of Princeton Theol. Semi. 1881, p. 53.

Candela, Giovanni Domenico, a Sicilian Jesuit, died at Catania in the year 1606, leaving some discourses, and other works, on the subject of virginity.

Candelario, Gottfried, a German theologian and Carmelite, was prior of the convent of the Carmelites at Aix-la-Chapelle, and died in 1499. His extant writings are, Sermones de Tempore et Sanctoris :—Orationes pro laudio sanctissimae Patris pro Coronatione Reginae De Conceptione Caelestium Virgum :—Epistole Varie ad Thrichiemum et Alios. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Candelis (or Candiel), Jean de, a French theologian, occupied in 1299 the office of a chancellor of the Church of Paris. In this capacity he had a quarrel with the university as to his prerogatives, which was finally referred to the pope. Innocent III appointed the chancellor of Troyes to examine the claims of the two parties. The report, which was written, may be found in the statute which the prelate, Robert de Courcan, published in 1215. The bishop of Paris, Peter of Nemosur, and Candels, his chancellor, submitted. The university was maintained in full possession of its immunities, under the sole obligation of procuring a license, which, however, was to be granted gratuitously, Candels died about 1230. See Hoefer, Nouvelle Biographie Générale, s. v.

Candida is the reputed name of two early Christian saints: (1) Wife of Artemius, martyr at Rome, commenced on June 6. (2) Virgin, of Rome, commemorated Aug. 29.

Candidati (from Lat. Candidus, white). The catachumens (q. v.) of the early Christian Church were so called because they were accustomed to appear dressed in white on their admission into the Church by baptism.

Candidianus is the name of many persons mentioned in early Christian history.
1. A correspondent of Ambrose (Epist. 91), cir. A.D. 390.
2. A bishop who carried a letter to pope Siricius (cir. A.D. 395), and, perhaps, the same with the bearer of a letter from Victorius at Rouen to Paulinus, and to pope Innocent. He may be the same as a fellow-priest/buyer known to Augustine by the letters of Paulinus (see Augustine, Car. Mort. 25; Tillemont, xiii, 334).
3. Governor of Cappadocia under Julian, though a pagan, was friendly to Basil and to Gregory Nazianzen, who wrote him a letter (Epist. 194). He may be the general whose daughter, Bassimilla, was eminent for piety at the opening of the 6th century, and the friend to whom, in 404, Chrysostom wrote his letter (Epist. 42, Chry. iii, 638).
4. Mentioned by Olympiodorus (Philius, Biblioth. cod. p. 80) as despatched along with Aspar to put down the usurper John at Ravenna (A.D. 423-423); perhaps the same as No. 110.
5. A deacon, A.D. 431, who carried the letter of Alypius of Constantinople to Cyril of Alexandria (Labb. Concil. iii, 786).
6. Count of the horse-guards, sent, A.D. 431, by Theodosius II and Valentinian III to keep order at the Council of Ephesus. When, on June 22, sixteen days after Pentecost, the day appointed for the meeting of the council, the fathers grew tired of waiting for John of Antioch, and demanded to begin at once, Candidianus demurred. At last he consented to read the imperial mandate, which the council refused to obey, and drove out Candidianus for expostulating. When the
6. A bishop of the Anomoean party, who was con-segregated, together with Arrianus, by Caezarius and Eunoius at Constantinople, A.D. 553, to superintend; the one the churches of Lydia, and the other those of Ionia. This ordinance displeased the Eunomians, who, headed by Theodosius, appealed to Eudoxius. He supported them in their opposition to the newly appointed prelates. Candidus and Arrianus used their influence with Eudoxius, their kinsman, against Athanasius, but ineffectually.

7. Archimandrite, to whom, in A.D. 449 (or 450), Theodore wrote (Epist. 128), telling him to get conductors against heretics, heatheans, and Jews.

8. Isaacus, an orthodox Christian historian, in the regius of Anastasius, A.D. 491–518, was a native of Iusa-iania Trachea, and wrote a history of his own, times, from the accession of Leo the Thracian, in 457, to the death of Zeno the Iusarian, in 491. He commands Candidus as a zealous maintainer of the faith as set forth at Chalcedon, and an opponent of all innovators. This history is lost, with the exception of the few extracts given by Photius, and a small fragment in Suidas. These are printed in the Corpus Hist. Byzant.
ed. Labbe), i, 154 sq.

9. Bishop of Sergiopolis, A.D. 544, who died before 554.

10. One of the more distinguished (nobiliores) of the forty soldiers martyred at Sebaste, in Armenia Minor, in the reign of Diocletian. Under the emperors Valerian, Neratius, and Usuard, in their Martyrologies, both mention him, but give the days respectively March 9
and 11.

11. Bishop of Civita Vecchia, who was directed, A.D. 652, not to deprive a man of his pay because of sickness;
and was allowed, in 596, to ordain some monks of monasteries in his diocese to serve as preceptors under him.

12. A presbyter sent by Gregory the Great to Gaul,
A.D. 595, with letters to queen Brunchilda and king Childerich, charged with the administration of the little patrimony of St. Peter there. He was commanded, along with St. Augustin, to Pelagius of Tours and Serenus of Marseilles. In June, 597, he was sent to redeem four Christian captives whom a Jew held in slavery at Narbonne. He had, in 598, been “defender of the Church” in Rome. In 601 we find him seeking to excuse bishop Desiderius for teaching grammar (Epist. 54, lib. xi).

13. An Episcopus Dulcimensis, or Fulginensis, at the third Roman council under Gregory, July, 596.

14. Gregory’s successor, as abbot of the monastery of St. Andrew, was warned, A.D. 598, not further to molest Maurantius, brother and heir of a deceased monk in his monastery, as the suit between them had been settled once by the pope in the brother’s favor. In February, 601, he was sent by Martinianus to Gregory for reliefs.

15. Wizo (Wito, Wilso, or Wiso), a presbyter and disciple of Alcuin, in whose writings his name appears for about ten years, ending A.D. 802. He was a resident of the monastery of St. Martin of Tours. He is first mentioned as bringing to his master accounts of king Charles, about 793. In 800 he is the bearer of Alcuin’s work, Adversus Pelicem, to Charles; and in 801, just after the great coronation, he brought good news from Rome and the imperial court. In the same year, on the emperor’s return, he had the honor to convey his master’s congratulations. This was followed, 802, by his establishment at court. Candinus is frequently mentioned in the epistles of Alcuin, 793–802, and always in language of fatherly regard. According to Leland, Candidus was an alumnus of Lindisfarne, under Higebald, and was sent by him to France to finish his studies under Alcuin; and in due time returned home. Pitsius (IIllust. Angl. Script. i, 828) adds that Candidus went act of deposition of Nestorius was posted up, Candidiian tore it down, sent it to the emperors, forbade the criers to proclaim it, and collected the Nestorian bishopopos to await the arrival of John of Antioco, and form another council in opposition. See EPHESUS, COUN-CIL, OF.

7. Bishop of Antioco, in Pisidia, at the Synod of Constantinople, A.D. 449. The acts of this synod he upheld at Ephesus the same year, where he claimed to have been bred in the Catholic faith, and to have been archdeacon in the royal city. Theodoret (Epist. 147,
v. iv, 1109) tells us that on this occasion he was accused of many adulteries and other iniquities. His name is also written Calendio.

8. A presbyter of Nilus, in the 5th century, who is informed by the saint why monks fasten the
fasten it on the right (Nilus, ii, Epist. 245).

9. Friend or kinsman of Sidonius, addressed by him (Epist. 8) from Rome, with jests against his birthplace Cesena, and his domicile Ravena, in retaliation for his jest against the wintry regions of Clermont (cir. A.D.
460).

10. A martyr who suffered by fire with Polictus and Filotomus, according to Florus, who gives no particulars. He was commemorated Jan. 11 (see Florus, in Bede’s Martyrology).

Candidus, Viscente Maria, a Sicilian theologian, was born at Syracuse, Feb. 2, 1573. He joined the Dominican order at the time of the convent was found in Rome, and was made doctor of theology at the age of nineteen years. He was distinguished for his science and his piety. He was penitentiary of Santa Maria Minora after 1607, which position he held for four-ten years, and was afterwards prior of the Convent of Minerva, then provincial and vicar-general of the Dominicans. Innocent X appointed him master of the sacred palace in 1654, and employed him in important negotiations. He died at Rome, Nov. 7, 1654.
He wrote, Illustration Disquisitiones Morales (Rome, 1657). He also left in manuscript De Primatu Petri: Sermones for Lent. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bioch. Gén-rale, s. v.

Candidus is the name of numerous persons in early Christian history, besides the Arian noted in
vol. ii.

1. Surnamed Thebeus, a martyr, commemorated, according to the Martyrologies of Bede and Usuard, Sept. 22.

2. From other examples of human governors, such as Cincius Severus, Asper, and Pudens, as having resisted the clamors of persecuting mobs. He excused himself from delivering up a certain Christian to death on the plea that it might cause a riot (cir. A.D. 190).

3. The author of a work on the Hexameron, of which mention is made by Eusebius (II. E. v, 27).
He is classed by him among orthodox Church writers, and placed under the reign of Severus, A.D. 198–211.

4. A Valentinian, who held a dispensation with Or-gen, about A.D. 228, the result of which was that Origen fell into disgrace. This dispensation is not extant, and is only known by the references made to it in the controversy between Jerome (Apologia ade. Rufusam, ii, 512) and Rufinus (De Adulteratione Librorum Origi-gentis).

5. Donatist bishop of Villa Regiosa, who returned to the Church, and was continued in his office (August.
Contra Crescon. ii, 10). Tillemont fixes the time at A.D.
548. He was probably deceased when Augustine wrote,
A.D. 402, as Cresconius was then Catholic bishop of Villa Regiosa. to the continent because of the destruction of the Lin-disfarne library by the Danes, in 793. 16. Surnamed Braun, a monk of the abbey of Fulda, was born near the close of the 8th century, and edciated at Fulda, where he embraced a monastic life under the rule of abbot Bangulph, by whom he was sent to France to complete his studies at Clermont. On his return he was advanced to the priesthood. He endured the maladministration of abbot Ratgar, 802-817; was taken into the confidence of his successor, St. Eligil; and, by his successor, Raban (822), was placed at the head of the conventual schools. By the latter's advice he undertook his literary works, the principal of which is The Life of Abbot Bangulph (apart from the other in hexameter); The Life of Abbot Bangulph (not known to exist); and, probably, Opusculum de Passione Domini et Responsio ad Mona-chum.

Candidus (Blanckert), Alexander, a Belgian theologian and Carmelite, was born in Gaul, and lived in the middle of the 16th century. He was made a licentiate in theology at Cologne, and afterwards became chaplain of George D' Egmont, bishop of Utrecht, to whom he dedicated a Flemish version of the Bible (Cologne, 1547), which is highly esteemed. He also wrote, Judicium Joannis Caetini de Sanctorum Religiosis, etc.—Oratio de Retributione Jus-torium Statim Mortu (1561). See Höfler, Nouv. Bio-Générale, s. v.

Candidus, Pantaleon, a Protestant theologian, was born at Ips, in Lower Austria, Oct. 7, 1540. He studied at Wittenberg, where he became intimately acquainted with Melancthon. In 1560 Candidus was called as teacher at the Latin school in Zweibrücken, and in 1571 he was made pastor and general superintendent.
The Church at Zweibrücken had accepted the Augsburg Confession and the Wittenberger Concordia of 1536. The Church discipline of the duke Wolfgang, in the preparation of which Melancthon's advice was followed, was of a mild Lutheran type. But, after Melan-thon's death, Wolfgang became a defender of Lutheran-ism, and was very severe against Philippists and Calvinists. Marbach, in connection with Andrea, prepared, in 1564, a confession, which was to be accepted by all who were already in the ministry, or should be appointed in future. The Zwinglian and Calvinistic doctrine of the Lord's Supper, and the printing and sale of sectarian books, were strictly prohibited. Still, the parties did not succeed in riddling themselves of the Melancthon-Calvinistic elements. Wolfgang died in 1569, and his son, John I, left everything as he found it. In 1574 the edicts against Zwinglians and Calvinists were renewed, and many preachers were dismissed. Their places were filled by strict Lutherans, who had now their own way.
A turning-point came in 1588, when duke John accepted the Reformed confession, and Calvinism was everywhere adopted as the religion of the people. Candidus, formerly suspected, was now the trustworthy adviser of the duke, and greatly promoted the cause of his Church. In 1598, Feb. 3, 1608, S. Butters, Pantaleon
Candidus, ein Lebenbild aus dem zweiten Münchener

Candle Beam is a beam for holding the candles over an altar. On it also were sometimes placed the crucifix, images, and reliquaries. See Rood Beam.

Candlestick, in Ecclesiastical Usage. As a lighted taper was placed in the hand of the newly baptized, baptism was called "illumination. On Christmas no so many lights were kindled that it was called the " Vigil of Lights." and the faithful sent presents of lights one to another. An early instance of a perpetual light was that of the firehouse of St. Bridget, at Kilclare, which burned unquenched from the 6th century to 1220. It may have been connected with a beacon, and the offerings made for its maintenance in part supported the poor. From the number of burning tapers which were used in churches on Easter eve, St. Gregory Nazianzes calls it the " holy night of illuminations"; while Easter day was called the " Bright Sunday," in allusion to the tapers and white robes carried by the neophytes. Tapers were also used at consecration of churches. See Tapers.

The triangular candlestick—called the herse in English cathedral statutes—used at the service of the Tenebron, varied in its number of tapers, which were nine at Nevers, twelve at Mantes, thirteen at Rheims and Paris, twenty-four at Cambrai and St. Quentin, twenty-five at Evreux, twenty-six at Amiens, and forty-four at Coutances. Calhill says that in England it was called the " Judas Cross. The "Lady Candle was the single taper left burning when all the rest, representing the Apostles, had been extinguished one by one. Sir Thomas More says that it symbolized St. Mary standing beneath the cross of Calvary. At Seville, "'entre los Ceros" a tenebroso bronze, twenty-five feet in height, which was made in 1662. Horse lights were placed round
the hier of the dead, in church, upon a barrow-like structure of iron. These resemble the lights set before the tombs of martyrs in the catacombs.

Candlesticks, in Germany, were often placed upon shrines, and some, of pyramidal shape and of the 15th century, still exist. In Chichester Cathedral, on particular days, were set round four tombs in the Prebysterly. Candlesticks of bronze remain at Nuremberg, Mayence, Aix-la-Chapelle, and Leau; at Bruges there are four of copper-gilt in the Jerusalem church, and in the Louvre are there three, with enamel-work of the 12th century.

Candlish, Robert Smith, D.D., an eminent Scottish clergyman, was born in Edinburgh, March 23, 1806. His father died when the son was a few weeks old, and the widow removed to Glasgow. Robert entered the university there in 1816, and, on graduation, passed through the divinity hall (1823-26), teaching privately meanwhile, and at the close accompanying a pupil to Etoe. In 1826 he was licensed to preach, and in 1829 began to act as assistant in the parish of St. Andrew's, Glazgow, and in 1831 in the parish of Bonhill, Dunbarton-shire. He was presented, in 1834, to the parish of Sproston, in the Presbytery of Kelse, and in the same year was ordained pastor of St. George's Church, Edinburgh, the wealthiest and most influential Church in Scotland. In 1839 he took part in the General Assembly which resulted in the establishment of the Free Church. In 1840 he preached his first sermon as a free minister, in the Free St. George's Church, which had been hastily erected for him, and had a large part of

This old congregation to hear him. This church gave way to a larger and more commodious one on the other side of the road.

He was an earnest promoter of Free Church principles, and second only to Chalmers, and was also an active agent in the establishment of the Evangelical Alliance.

Candy, William T., a Wesleyan Methodist minister, was born at Salisbury, England, Feb. 15, 1814.

He was converted at nineteen, entered the ministry at eighteen, travelled two years in Wales; attended the theological institution; was sent to St. Domingo; labored in the West India mission for fifteen years; and, on account of prostration of health, was permitted by the British Conference to labor in New Brunswick. His undaunted fidelity during the cholera scourge of 1856 secured him lasting remembrance. During the last eight years of his life he was the subject of wasting illness, the result of the climate, pecuniary, etc., of the West Indies.

In 1869 he removed to Chicago, Ill., where he died, July 27, 1871. See Minutes of Conferences of Eastern British America, 1872, p. 7.

Cane, Carlo, a notable Italian painter, was born at Tarragona, near Milan, in 1618, and studied under Melchior Gillardini and Morazone. His best works are the fresco paintings of St. Ambrogio and St. Ugo, in the Certosa, at Pavia. He died in 1688.

Cane, John Vincent, an English friar of the order of St. Francis, lived principally at London, and died in 1672. He wrote Fort Iux (1601), in which he endeavored to prove that for the existing evils there was a return to the bosom of an infallible church.

See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Canenio, Michele, an Italian theologian, entitled prior graniarius, was bishop of Castri in the 14th century. He wrote a Life of Pope Paul II, which cardinal Querini published (Rome, 1740, 4to). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Canephrōs (Gr. κανέφρος, a basket, and φιάσκος, to bear), among the ancient Greeks, was the person appointed to carry the apparatus used in sacrificing, in a circular basket. The duty was generally assigned to a virgin, who carried the basket on her head to the altar. In case a private individual offered a sacrifice, this office was performed by his daughter or an unmarried relative, but in public festivals it was assigned to two virgins of the first Athenian families. A similar custom prevailed in ancient Egypt, and the practice continued in Europe till the 3rd century of the Christian era.

Canev, Henrry, D.D., a missionary of the Church of England, was born in 1700, probably at New Haven, Conn., where his father was the architect of the first college edifice erected there, in 1717-18. The son graduated at Yale College in 1724, and began to read prayers in the following year at Fairfield. Having gone to England in 1727 for ordination, he was appointed missionary to Fairfield by the Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts. Occasionally he served at Norwalk. He became rector of King's Chapel, Boston, April 11, 1747. During his ministry King's Chapel was rebuilt, in 1749. Mr. Caner was appointed to preach the sermon on the death of George II. The officers of the British army and navy, previous to the war, were accustomed to worship at King's Chapel. In March, 1776, the British troops evacuated Boston, and Dr. Caner went with them, taking the Church records.

He went to Halifax, and shortly after sailed for London. The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel offered him the choice of any vacant mission, and, in consequence, he was sent to Bristol, R. I. Here he labored from early in 1777 until the close of the war.

He spent his last years in England, and died in Long Ashton about the close of 1792. Among his published works were several important sermons, showing his fine intellectual culture. His manner of address was popular, and he was regarded as one of the most eminent Episcopal clergymen of his day. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v. 61.

Cañizales (or Canas), Francisco, a Spanish Cordelier and Orientalist, was born at Valencia in 1780. He was sent by the Franciscans as missionary to Damascus, where he applied himself to the study of the Oriental languages for sixteen years. On his return home he was assigned to the missions in the Spanish colonies. He died at Madrid in 1795. He wrote, Grammatica Arabico-espanola, etc. (Madrid, 1774) — Diccionario Español-latino-arabigo (ibid. 1787). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Canezi, Francesco Antonio, an Italian painter, was born at Cremona in 1652, and was a pupil of Natali. He afterwards became a Capuchin friar. Some of his best works are in the church of his order at Como, where he died in 1721.

Canevozzi, Timotheo, an ascetic Italian preacher and author, of the order of the Minorites, was a native of Milan, and lived in the latter part of the 17th century. He was of an ancient family, and distinguishes himself as a prisoned and bitten preacher in his own and other Italian cities. Having spent some years as missionary at Constantinople, he returned to Milan, where he passed the remainder of his life. He wrote, Due Sermoni del Signor Chiodo (Milan, 166) — Lezioni, Sermontali Spiegate nel Duomo di Milano, etc. (ibid. 1654); and other works. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Canfield, or Canfield, Benedict (originally William of Filo), an English theologian, was born at Canfield, Essex, in 1564. At first a Puritan, he became a Roman Catholic; went to France, and joined the Capuchins of Meudon, near Paris. In 1599 he returned to England, was imprisoned for three years, and then released, at the request of Henry IV of France. He went back to France, where, after taking charge of several convents, he died, in 1610, leaving, Exercitata Spiritualia (Paris, 1608) — Soliloquy (ibid. ed. 12mo) — Le Chevalier Christien (ibid. 1608, 12mo). His chief work is De Regle de Perfection, first published in English, and translated into Dutch and French (5th French ed., 1658, 12mo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Canfield, Ezekiel, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Salisbury, Conn., March 16, 1767. He professed religion in 1791, and in 1794 entered the New York Conference, and continued laborious and faithful until worn out. He died Oct. 16, 1825. Mr. Canfield was modest, affable, constant, ardent, experimental, and practical. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1826, p. 509.

Canfield, Oren K., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Massachusetts. He graduated at New Jersey College in 1835, and at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1838; and was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, Oct. 7, 1840. He labored as a missionary in Liberia for more than a year, and died there, May 7, 1842. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem., 1881, p. 108.

Canfield, Philip, a Congregational minister, was born at Bridgeton, Conn., Dec. 11, 1816. He graduated at Williams College in 1836, and at Hartford Theological Seminary in 1839. His early ministry was spent in Western New York. From 1844 to 1848 he preached at Perry; from 1848 to 1852 at York. He was ordained in Buffalo, Jan. 12, 1847. In September, 1852, he was installed pastor in Ridgebury, Conn., where he remained until April, 1856. The following year he was at Sheboygan Falls, Wis. In November, 1857, he was installed pastor in Sparta; in 1860 was appointed home missionary in New Pepin; in 1862 served in Menominee; in 1864 preached in Fairbault, Minn.; from 1865 to 1868, in Albert Lea; from 1868 to 1871, in Washington, la. After a short residence there he removed to his residence in that place without change, until his death, which occurred Feb. 11, 1879. See Cong. Year-book, 1880, p. 14; Hist. Cat. of Theol. Institute of Conn. p. 23.

Canfridus, an English prelate, was the first in the list of Glastonbury monks who were advanced to the episcopate. He died in 782. If we might allow an error of a year or two in this date, Canfridus could be identified with Eanfrid, bishop of Ethelm, who vacated his see not later than 781.

Cangitha was an early English abbess, mother of Eadburga or Bugga.

Cang-y is a Chinese deity, worshipped as the god of the lower heavens, and believed by them to possess the power of life and death. He has the constant attendance of three ministering spirits; the first refreshes the earth, the second rules the sea, and the third presides over births, and is god of war.

Canice (or Canicius). See CAINNECH (8).

Canides was a hermit in the time of Theodosius the Great, who, as he was baptized, ran away with a little grotto under a waterfall, where he lived seventy-three years, tasting no food but a few herbs. He died, according to Basil's Menology, June 10. — Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Canillac, Raymond de, a French prelate, was born at Canillac, in Gévaudan. He was canon regular of the church of St. Augustine at Maguelone, and became its provost. He was noted for his knowledge of civil and ecclesiastical law. Pope Clement VI, appreciating his talents, appointed him archbishop of Toulouse in 1345, then cardinal, with the title of the Holy Cross of Jerusalem, in 1350. Innocent VI made him bishop of Palestrina. Canillac died at Avignon, June 30, 1373. He wrote, Recollectorum Liber. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Canini, Giovanni Angelo, a reputable Italian historical painter, was born at Rome in 1617, and studied under Domenichino and Barberi. He was elected a member of the Academy of St. Luke in 1650. He executed two fine altar-pieces for the church of San Martino di Monti, representing the Martyrdom of St. Stephen and the Martyrdom of St. Bartholomew. He died in 1666. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Caninius, a presbyter, probably at Rome, is mentioned by St. Jerome as sent by him with his letter (74, ed. Vall.) from Bethlehem to Rufinus.—Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Canisius (or Cannius), Hendrik, a Dutch theologian, was born at Bois-le-Duc in 1594. He joined the religious order of the Hermits of St. Augustine, and became successively prior of the convents of Tremolinde, of Tillemont, and then of Maestricht. He died March 4, 1689. His extant writings are, Carmina Fusciculae; — Manipulus Sacrarum Ordinationum (Leuven, 1661); — Pax et Una Charitas, per eaque Chara Unitas (Antwerp, 1688). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Canitius, Jacobus, a Dutch theologian and Jesuit, was born at Calcar (duchy of Cleves). He joined early the order of Jesuits, and taught philosophy and modern languages. He died at Ingolstadt, May 27, 1647. His extant writings are, Fons Solusius, seu Primum Omnium Sacrarum Constitutionum (Cologne, 1626); — Meditationes Sacrae de Christo et Beatissima Virgine (Münster, 1629); — Ars Antiqua, seu de Romae Moribus, under the pseudonyme of Christianus Tanauosophsi (1630); — Vita Sanctorum (translated from the Spanish of P. Ribadeneira, ed.); — Sermons of Father Mastrilli (translated from the Italian into Latin, ed.); — Hyperdulia Martiana, a Jeane Berchmanso Exercise (Münster, 1636). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Canitae (Kanitai) are enumerated by Theodor (Hebr. Palk i, 1) in a list of short-lived heretical sects, the origin of which he ascribes to Simon Magnus. The name is mentioned by no other writer, but there is every reason to believe that Theodor derives it from a passage in Clemens Alex. (Strom. vii, 17), where we find the Caunitae mention the cauniates, but not so understood by Theodor.

Canister (or Canistrum) is a comparatively recent term for two ecclesiastical vessels: 1. A basket used for holding consecrated bread, or perhaps Eulogia, Comp. Arca. St. Jerome (Ep. ad Rustic. c. 20), speaking of the practice among Christians in his day of carrying home the consecrated elements, both of bread and wine, uses the expression, "Qui corpus Domini in canastro viremio et sanguinem portat in vitro;" from which it appears that a wicker basket was used for holding the consecrated bread. This passage is remarkably illustrated by a fresco discovered in the crypt of St. Cornelius by Cavaliere de Rossi. This represents a fish (the well-known reptile external of the Redeemer) swimming in the water, bearing on its back a basket having on the top several small loaves, and inside a red object, clearly visible through the wicker-work, which seems to be a small glass flask of wine. This is marked in the engraving by a somewhat darker tint. See ALTAR-BREAD BOX. 2. The disk or taza placed under the lamp or lamp-base is frequent in the Liber Pontificalium. For instance, Pope Adrian (772-790) is said to have given to a church twelve silver canistris, weighing thirty-six pounds. Leo III, his successor, gave a silver canister with its chains, weighing fifteen pounds. Gregory IV gave two canistris of nine lights. In the latter case, the lights were probably distributed round the circumference of the taza.

Canitz, Friedrich Rudolph Ludwig, Baron of, a German poetist and poet, was born in Berlin, Nov. 27, 1654. He studied for the diplomatic career at Leyden and Leipsic, and travelled in England, Holland, Italy, and France. He died at Berlin, Aug. 11, 1699. See friendship of Spener cheered his life, and he was exemplary alike for his statesmanship and piety. He composed some hymns, which were published by J. Ulrich von König in 1727. One of them has been translated into English: Seele du must munter werden, in Lyra Germ. p. 216 ("Come, my soul, awake, 'tis morning"). See Koch, Gesch. d. deutschen Kirchenliebes, iv (4th ed.), 438 sq.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, n.s. (B. P.)

Cann, Joseph A., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Philadelphia, Jan. 16, 1841. He was unusually serious and thoughtful in his early years; experienced conversion at the age of sixteen; became at once a member of the New Jersey Conference, wherein, with great zeal, genuine fidelity, and large success, he labored until his death, March 8, 1873. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1873, p. 25.

Canna (in mediaeval Lat.) is the long stick, with a taper attached to it, by means of which the high candles in churches are lighted.

Canna, a Welsh saint of the 6th century, from Armorica, was the reputed founder of Llanganna (Llangan) in Glamorganshire, and of Llangan in Carmarthenshire. See Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 222.

Cannabich, Gottfried, a Protestant theologian of Germany, who was born at Sondershausen, April 27, 1745, and died, as general superintendent and member of consistory there, Sept. 23, 1800, is the author of: Kritik der praktischen christ. Religionslehre (ibid. 1810-2, 3 parts); —Kritik der Sämmtlichen Evangelien und Epistels auf die jährlichen Sonn-, Fest- und Apostelstage, übersetzt u. mit Anmerkungen begleitet (Sondershausen, 1806); —Predigten über die Sämmtlichen Festtagesgelegenheiten (Leipzig, 1795-8, 2 parts); —Lehrbuch der christl. Religion (ibid. 1801); —Christliche Schule und Volksbibel (1801-2, 2 parts). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit., i, 410, 480; ii, 60, 123, 182, 228, 236, 248, 297. (B. P.)

Cannan, David, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, was born at Shiel in 1775. He was educated at the school of Kells, and at the Edinburgh University; licensed to preach in 1802, presented to the living at Kilrannie in 1803, transferred to Murroes in 1809, thence to Mains and Strathmartin in 1820; resigned on account of impaired memory in 1848, and died at Edinburgh, July 12, 1854. Dr. Cannan was an accomplished scholar, a leader in the musical life, a man of sound judgment, and integrity. His publications were, On the Poor, and the Duty and Mode of Supporting Them (Edinb. 1845): —An Account of the Parish. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, iii, 721, 729, 777.

Cannan, Francis, a Scotch clergyman (son of the preceding), was licensed to preach in 1831; presented the same year to the living at Linntrathen, and ordained; resigned in 1855; went with the army to the Crimean as chaplain; and was stationed at Scorncliffe in 1871, after which no further record of him appears. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, i, 756.

Cannan, John, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born in Westmoreland, England, in 1798. At the age of eighteen he became a Christian, and joined the Independents. In 1832 he came to the United States, landing at Boston, where he was employed as a city missionary about one year. He became a member of the Baldwin Place Baptist Church, then under the pastoral charge of Rev. Baron Stow. Soon after he made an engagement to supply the pulpit of Rev. John Newton Brown, in Exeter, N. H., next preached for a time in New York, and subsequently removed to the state of New York. He afterwards resided in southern Ohio, and became interested in the theological teachings of Oberlin. He finally joined a Free-will Baptist Church. After preaching about two years, he was laid aside from his public labors, and purchased a farm in Camden, Lorain Co., O., where he died, Aug. 31, 1848. See Morning Star, 1848. (J. C. S.)

Cannan, Thomas, a Scotch clergyman of Gallovidian extraction, was a native of Ayr, and grew up in the living of New Spynie in 1818, and ordained; transferred to Carspathian in 1826, and died Dec. 19, 1832, aged forty-two years. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, i, 707; iii, 173.

Cannatus, Saint, was born at Aix, and retired to the desert. He was afterwards elected bishop of Marseille, and was supposed to have died there in the 5th century. See Butler, Lives of the Saints, Oct. vii, 25. —Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Cannel, John, an English Methodist minister, was born in the Isle of Man in 1807. He was converted at the age of sixteen; commenced his ministry in 1836; labored for six years in his native isle; was then stationed successively on six English circuits; became a superannuary in 1861; and died at Peel, Isle of Man, Dec. 3, 1862. He was modest but earnest in all he said and did. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1863, p. 12.

Cannera. See CAINNER.

Cannetti, Pietro, an Italian Camaldolese and poet, was born at Cremona in 1600. He went through the various grades of the religious orders, and finally was ordained as a general. He died in 1730, leaving a Dissertation on a poem of Freschi, bishop of Polignano. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cannibalism is the eating of human flesh by men. This practice has existed from the most ancient times, and has given rise to descriptive terms, such as, Greek, "υβομαζομαι"; Latin, anthropophagus; Anglo-Saxon, man-eat; English, man-eater. Since the discovery of the New World, the name of the Caribs of the West India islands, recorded by Columbus under the Latinized forms Canibals or Caribals, has come into popular use as a generic term for man-eaters, cannibals.

Although man is by nature carnivorous as well as frugivorous, and although human flesh is not in itself indigestible, mankind in general have looked with horror on those individuals and tribes who have been addicted to cannibalism. Simple association of thoughts causes the remains of dead kinsmen or friends to be treated with respect and tenderness, as may be seen from the conduct of some of the rudest races. Moreover, association attaches the horror of death to anything connected with the dead, so that many tribes avoid the mention of a dead man's name, and even abandon his hut and destroy the furniture he has used. Finally, the religious doctrine that the soul outlives the body has evidently led survivors to appropriate the honored and dreaded spirit by respectful disposal of the corpse. The following causes seem to have led to the disgusting practice of cannibalism under peculiar circumstances:

1. Famine. —The records of shipwrecks and sieges prove that hunger will sometimes overcome the horror of cannibalism among men of the higher nations, and it is not surprising that savages, from their improvident habits, should, in severe climates, be often driven to this extremity. For example, the natives of Tierra del Fuego, when starving in winter, would kill and devour the oldest persons in the tribe, as well as their dogs, which they alleged were useful in securing game. See Fitzroy, Voyage of H. M. Ships Adventure and Beagle, ii, 183; Salvado, Memorie dell' Australia, p. 240; Waitz, Anthropologie der Nürvölker, vi, 749; Bancroft, Native Races of the Pacific States, i, 120; Back, Expedit. to Gough Island, p. 110; Professional Researches, i, 359; Martin, Mariner's Tonga Islands, i, 116.

2. Fury or Hravado. —Among the North American Indians the eating of the flesh of their slain enemies is defended as satisfying both hunger and revenge. See Schoolcraft, Indian Tribes, iii, 242; Hempenius, ii, 159;
CANNIBALISM

Müller, Amerikanische Urreligionen, p. 145. The same practice, with a similar design, has been prevalent in Polynesia. See Ellis, i, 309;Waitz, vi, 158; Turner, Polynesia, v, 246. 3. Morbid Affection. — Cases of the dead being devoured by relatives and friends (especially children by parents), from a sentiment of affection, are recorded among low savage tribes. See Spix and Martius, Reise in Brasilien, ii, 692; Angas, Savage Life in Australia, p. 127; Howitt, 1st Report on the Aborigines of Australasia, p. 134; Herodotus, iv, 26, who describes the funeral feasts of the Issedones of Central Asia, where the relatives ate the body of the deceased with other meat, the skull being set in gold and preserved; these were sacred rites performed in honor of the dead. 4. Magic. — There is a wide-spread idea belonging to primitive savage magic that the qualities of any animal eaten pass into the eater. This motive naturally leads to cannibalism, especially in war, where the conqueror eats part of the slain enemy for the purpose of making himself brave. This idea is found among the natives of Australia, and in New Zealand; among the North American Indians, whose warriors would devour the flesh of a brave enemy, and particularly the heart as the seat of courage; also in Ashante. An English merchant in Shanghai, during the Taeping siege, met his servant carrying the heart of a rebel, which he was making homeward to make himself brave. See Magellinvs, Voyage of Rattlinseke, i, 152; ii, 61; Keating, Long's Expedition, i, 102; Wilson, Western Africa, p. 168; Tlotl, Early History of Mankind, p. 133; Eyre, Central Australia, ii, 259, 329. 5. Religion. — Cannibalism is deeply ingrained in savage and barbaric religions, whose gods are so often looked upon as delighting in human flesh and blood. The flesh of sacrificed human victims has even served to provide cannibal feasts. The interpretation of these practices is either that the bodies of the victims are vicariously consumed by the worshippers, or that the gods themselves feed on the spirits of the slain men, while their bodies are left to the priests and people. Thus, in Fiji, "of the great offerings of food, native belief apportions merely the soul thereof to the gods, who are described as being enormous eaters; the substance is consumed by the worshippers. Cannibalism is a part of the Fijian religion, and the gods are represented as devouring the flesh of their victims. (Fiji, the Fijians, i, 291). In Mexico the cannibalism which prevailed was distinctly religious in its origin and professed purpose. See Prescott, Conquest of Mexico; Bancroft, vol. ii; Waitz, vol. iv. On the sacrificial character of this practice in Africa see Landier, Records, ii, 296; Hutchinson, Ten Years Among the Ethiopians, p. 62. 6. Habit. — In many instances the practice of cannibalism did not stop with the performance of the religious rite. In some of the above examples the practice must have become acceptable to the people for its own sake. Among conspicuous cannibal races may be mentioned the semi-civilized Battens of Sumatra, whose original instigation to eating their enemies may have been warlike ferocity, but who are described as treating human flesh as a delicacy, and devouring not only warriors, but criminals, slaves, and, according to one story, their aged kinsfolk. See Junghuba, Rettina-Lautan, Madsen, History of Sumatra, p. 390; Wuttke, Geschichte des Heidentums, i, 172. Cannibalism assumes its most repulsive form where human flesh is made an ordinary article of food like other meat. This state of things is not only mentioned in descriptions of West Africa, where human flesh was even sold in the market, but still continues among the Mombutu of Central Africa, whose wars with neighboring tribes are carried on for the purpose of obtaining human flesh, the bodies of the slain being dried for transport, while the living prisoners are driven off like cattle. See Schweinfurth, Heart of Africa; Pigottella, Regnum Congo. For the effect of such cannibalism on the population see Gerland, Austerliten Naturlövler, p. 61. From the best evidence attainable, it is thought that prehistoric savages were often as reckless like this African as they were neither free from cannibalism nor universally practicing it. — Encyclop. Brittanica (9th ed.), a. v. Cannon, Edward, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Princeton, County, Va., in 1784. He joined the Church in 1808, and in 1807 was admitted into the Virginia Conference, wherein he continued effective labor, till he became superannuated. He died Aug. 11, 1862. Mr. Cannon possessed an eminent, vigorous mind, was studious, popular, and extensively useful. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1855, p. 347. Cannon, John, a Reformed Presbyterian minister, was born at Dungiven, County Derry, Ireland, Nov. 19, 1784. In 1788 the family came to America, and settled in Pennsylvania. After studying some time in a private way, he entered Jefferson College (then at Cannonsburg, Pa.), where he graduated in 1810. In 1811 he commenced a private course in theology, and was licensed in 1815. In due time he accepted a call from a congregation in Greensburg (Pa.) and vicinity, and in 1818 was ordained and set apart as the minister of that congregation. At a meeting of the Synod in 1821 he was appointed to visit the new settlements in North Carolina, to aid in settling certain difficulties which had arisen. He remained pastor at Greensburg until Feb. 2, 1835, when he died. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ix, 68. Cano, Alonzo (surnamed el-Racjonerro), an eminent Spanish architect, painter, and sculptor, called "the Michaelangelo of America," was born at Granada, March 19, 1601. He was the son of Miguel Cano, an eminent architect, who educated him. He was eight months with Francisco Pacheco, a painter. His works are to be found in all the principal churches and convents of Cordova, Madrid, Granada, Seville, etc. There is a celebrated picture by him, representing a subject from the life of St. Isidoro, in the Church of Santa Maria, at Madrid. As a sculptor, he executed several fine works, particularly a marble group of The Madonna and Child, in the great church at Lebrija, and two colossal statues of St. Peter and St. Paul. As an architect, he made several additions to the palaces; and public gates and bridges were added or improved at his design. He died Oct. 5, 1665. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v. Cano, Alphonso del, a Spanish Jesuit, was born in Andalucia in 1580. After having received holy orders and the degree of doctor of divinity, he joined his order in 1606. He lectured on philosophy at Segovia, on theology at Compostella, Valladolid, and Salamanca, with great success. Twice he acted as provincial of Castile, and visitor at Toledo. He died at Salamanca, May 10, 1645. See Jücher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Alemagbe, Bibliotheca Scriptorum Societatis Jesu; Antonii, Bibliotheca Hispanica, s. v. (B. F.) Cano, Melchior. See Canus. Canobio, Evangelista, an Italian theologian, was born at Milan. He was a Capuchin friar, and became one of the most able canonists of his time. He was appointed, in 1564, by the general of his order, to take a distinguished part in the Council of Trent in 1542. He died at Perugia in 1595, leaving Consulta Varia in Jure Canonicum (Milan, 1591) — Annotationes in Libros Decretalium, etc. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. Canobus (or Canopus), in Egyptian mythology, was the original name of a city, near one of the mouths of the Nile, which was therefore called the Canobian mouth. A certain Canobus was also spoken of, who came as pilot with Menelaus to Egypt, and in memory of whom the Spartans named the city Canobus. He was associated with Menuthis, his wife, and both are said to have been divinely worshipped ten miles from the city of Canopus.

The name Canopus was also given to a kind of jug, with a short foot, wide body, narrow neck, and a head thereon, which was used to filter the water of the Nile, and represented the god Canopus. In later times it was related that the ship of Osiris was the same as that which the Greeks called Argo, and that its pilot Cano-bus had been placed among the stars. Strabo says: "There is a temple of Serapis here (at Canopus), which is visited with such godly fear that even the most celebrated men never respect for fear of sleeping in this temple in order to find out for themselves and others the future." This temple of Serapis was that of Canopus, who was a symbol of fruitfulness.

Canopus was really the funerary god Ameot, one of the four infernal deities who had charge of the viscera of the dead.

Canoe (or Cono, also Mochonoe), the syllable Mo being added, according to Colgan, for "the sake of honor and extraordinary respect"), an Irish saint, was born at Brecknock, in Wales, but was the son of Brecan, an Irish prince, who had settled at Brecknock. Canoe flourished about A.D. 492, and founded monasteries both in Ireland and Wales, his chief foundation having been Galen, in Queen's County. Colgan gives his life (Acta Sanctorum, 311 sq.), under Feb. 11, but according to others his feast is celebrated Feb. 18, where Mart. Don. has Conan; and Nov. 18, where the same martyrology has Mochonoe.

Canon (from κανών, or καννα, a straight reed used for ruling lines), in ecclesiastical usage, is (1) A rule (Gal. vi. 6) ordained by the Fathers; a constitution of the Church. (2) The creed, as the criterion for distinguishing a Christian; the "rule of faith" of Tertulli-

Canon, In Music. 1. The peculiar form of musical composition called by this name was unknown to the ancients, the earliest example extant being of the 13th century, we believe.

2. The accepted values of the several notes constituting the musical scale, expressed philosophically. Among the Greeks, followed throughout by Latin writers on music, there were two somewhat conflicting schools, the Aristoxenists and the Pythagoreans. Py-thagoras having discovered the simple ratios of 1:2, 1:2, 1:4, for the octave, the fifth, the fourth, and the tone (major), which last is the difference between the fourth and fifth, his disciples maintained that all sounds should be defined by determinate ratios, while Aristoxenus discard ed this idea altogether, and maintained that the tetrachord or fourth, should be divided into thirds, and the values of which were to be determined by the ear only. This is probably the germ of the dispute which has lasted to the present day respecting the tempera-mint of instruments with fixed tones; and as the true measure of an interval is a logarithm, it was, of course, impossible to reconcile completely these two opinions.

Polesmy examined the manner, and established the truth of the Pythagorean views: Euclid seems to have endeavored to combine them, that is, if the two treatises attributed to him, the Introductio Harmonica and the Seuio Canons, are both genuine. The latter of these is usually considered genuine, and it is purely Pythagorean and rigidly exact; while the former, which is certainly Aristoxean, and perhaps written for popular use, is considered more doubtful.

The canon of the scale, then, is the system of ratios into which a resonant string is to be divided so as to produce all the notes which are assumed; or, which is the same thing, the relative lengths of strings for these notes which are to be fixed in an instrument and stretched with the same tension.

The Aristoxean system, from the Introductio Harmonica, supposes a tone to be divided into twelve equal parts, and the tetrachord therefore into thirty.

Euclid also gives the divisions of the string (which he calls also the canon) according to the diatonic system.

3. Ambrose decreed the use of the diatonic genus alone in church music: and it is probable that the chromatic and enharmonic genera soon fell into general disuse, or only existed as curiosities for the learned.

The Jews are believed to have used a canon proceeding by thirds of tones, thus giving eighteen notes in the octave. It is stated that the Pythagorean canon has been developed into an Arabic scale of seventeen sounds.

CANON or Oness is applied to a part of the office of the Greek Church, sung to a musical tune, for the most part at Lauds, and which corresponds to the hymns of the Western Church. A canon is usually divided into nine odes, each ode consisting of a variable number of stanzas or troparia, in a rhythmical syllabic measure, prosody being abandoned except in three cases. The canon is headed by an iambic, or occasionally a hexameter line containing an allusion to the festival or the contents of the canon, or a play upon the saint's name, which forms an acrostic to which the initial letters of each troparia correspond. This acrostical form is thought, with probability, to be derived from Jewish practice. The nine odes have generally some reference to the corresponding odes at Lauds, especially the seventh, eighth, and ninth. In practice, the second ode of a canon is always omitted, except in Lent. The reason given is, that the second of the odes at Lauds (the song of Moses, Deut. xxxiii), which is assigned to Tuesday, is more a denunciation against Israel than a direct act of praise to God, and is on that account omitted except in Lent. Hence the second ode of a canon, which partakes of the same character, is also omitted except on week-days in Lent. It is not said on Saturday in Lent. The tone to which the canon is sung is given at the beginning, and each ode is followed by one or more troparia, under different names. After the sixth ode the Symazaria, or the commemorations which belong to the day, are read. Among the principal composers of canons were John of Damascus, Joseph of the Stadium, Cosmas, Theophanes, and Simeon of Jerusalem. As an example of canons may be mentioned “the Great Canon,” the composition of St. Andrew, archbishop of Crete. The word canon is applied in the Armenian rite to a section of the psalter, which in that right is divided into eight sections called canons.

Canon is the name of a Japanese god, who, as represented in Japanese art, is preserved with the fish. His votaries exhibited him with four arms, and the lower part of his body swallowed by a large sea-monster; his head crowned with flowers; holding in one hand a sceptre, in another a flower, a ring in the third, and having the fourth closed, with the arm extended. Over against him stood the figure of a humble penitent, one half of whose body was concealed within a shell. The temple was adorned with arrows and all sorts of warlike instruments.

Canon (Lat. Canonici), JOHN (sometimes called Marbres), an English Franciscan monk of the 14th century, studied some time at Oxford, from which he returned to Paris. He there became a pupil of Duns Scotus, whom he always imitated. He afterwards returned to Oxford, and there taught theology until his death, about 1340. He was particularly learned in the Aristotelian philosophy, and in civil and canon law. His published works are, In Aristotelis De Physicis Libri (1481), and some other treatises. See Chalmers, Bibl. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Canonarcha was (1) an ecclesiastical officer of the Church of Constantinople, below the order of -agnostics, or reader. (2) The title of an officer in some monasteries, who called the brethren together.

Canonical Age. See Age, Canonical.

Canonical Letters (called also Letters Dimissory) were granted in the early Christian Church to the clergy who wished to retire from one diocese to another. The Council of Antioch forbade country presbyters granting such letters, but the privilege was not taken from the chiroepiscopi. Such letters might be granted or refused at the will of the bishop, but no clergyman was allowed to remove from his own church or diocese without canonical letters from his own bishop.

Canonical Life. See Canons Regular.

Canonical Pensions were annuities granted in the ancient Christian Church to those who had spent the greater part of their lives in the service of the Church, and desired to be disburdened of their office on account of age and infirmity. It was granted out of the revenues of the Church by authority of the synod.

Canonical is a term for the dress prescribed by the canons to be worn by the clergy, and in actual use in Fielding's time. In 1766 the Connoisseur alludes to the appearance in the streets of the doctor's scarf, pudding-sleeve gown, starched bands, and feather topcrizale. George Herbert, when ordained priest, laid aside his study gown and wore the he had worn as a deacon, and adopted a canonical coat.

Canonici is a name applied to that portion of the clergy who occupy an intermediate position between the monks and the secular clergy. As living together under a rule of their own, they were often regarded popularly as a species of monks; while, inasmuch as their rule was less strict, and their seclusion from the world less complete, they were sometimes, from a monastic point of view, classed even with the laity, as distinguished from those who were "religious." The canonici did not fully assume this quasi-monastic character till the 8th century.

The canonici were at first the clergy and other officials attached to the church, and were so called either as bound by canons, or more probably as enrolled on the list of ecclesiastical officers.

Some bishops, even before the 5th century—for instance, Eusebius of Vercellae, Ambrose of Milan, the great Augustine, and Martin of Tours—set an example of monastic austerity to the clergy domiciled with them, which became widely popular. Gelasius I, at the close of the 6th century, founded an establishment of "canonici regulares" at Rome, in the Lateran. References to such a practice occur in the canons of the second and third councils of Toledo (16th century), and in the writings of Gregory of Tours. In the third Council of Orleans, A.D. 588, the canonici are forbidden secular business. The college in which the canons resided, or rather the church to which the college was attached, is styled "canonica" in a charter in 724.

But the latter part of the 8th century, was virtually the founder of the canonici. By enforcing strict obedience to the rule and the superior, he tightened the authority of the bishop over the clergy of the cathedral. His canonici were, like monks, to reside in the cloister, to have a common dormitory and refectory, but were allowed a life interest in private property, which, however, reverted to the Church after their death. Thus the discipline of the cloister was rendered more palatable to the clergy; and while a broad line of demarcation was drawn between them and monks. They were not to wear the monk's cowl. The essential difference between a cathedral with its canonici and an abbey with its monks has been well expressed thus: the canonici existed for the services of the cathedral, but the abbey-church for the spiritual wants of the recluses happening to settle there. Chrodegang's institution was eagerly adopted by Charlemagne in his reformation of ecclesiastical abuses; and it was evidently his intention to use these colleges of canons for educational purposes.

The rule of Chrodegang was shortened, being too severe to be generally accepted by the clergy of Frisia in England. Even where it had been at first in vogue, the rule of Chrodegang was soon relaxed. The canonic became, first, a community dwelling together under the headship of the bishop, but not of necessity under the same roof with him; next, an "acephalous" community; then, spiritual, instead of receiving any income from the clergy of the diocese, they developed into a distinct, and, sometimes, antagonistic body. As their wealth and influence increased, they claimed a share in the government of the diocese.

Canony is the office held by a canon of the Church of England (q.v.). It includes special prerogative and an ecclesiastical benefice; the spiritual right of reception as a brother, a stall in choir, a voice in chapter, and receiving a peculiar or canonical portion annexed to it out of the Church revenues, in consideration of ecclesiastical duties performed in it. Every canon has, of necessity, a prebend, and every prebend, of necessity, a canonry, belonging to it. By the Act 3d and 4th Vict., the canonries are reduced to 134. See PREBEND.

Canons, Book of, was a set of rules formed for the government of the Scottish Church, by order of Charles I., and designed to make it an episcopal Presbyterian constitution of the Church. In 1684 it was agreed that such a book and a liturgy should be framed in Scotland, and submitted to Laud, Juxon, and Wren for their revision and approval. In April of the following year the Scottish prelates met at Edinburgh, and brought the Book of Canons and Liturgy to such a condition as possible, after which they forwarded it to Laud, who revised and amended it. It was then confirmed under the great seal, by letters patent bearing date May 28, 1635. Dr. Hetherington says (Hist. of the Church of Scotland, i, 275), "The canons contained in this book weresubversive of the whole constitution of the Church of Scotland. The first decree excommunication against all who should deny the king's supremacy in ecclesiastical affairs; the next pronounces the same penalty against all who should dare to say that the worship contained in the Book of Common Prayer (a book not yet published, nor even written) was supersitious or contrary to the Scriptures. The same penalty was decreed against all who should assert that the prelatic form of Church government was unscriptural. Every minister was enjoined to adhere to the forms prescribed in the liturgy, on pain of deposition; which liturgy, as before stated, was not yet in existence. It was decreed also, that no General Assembly should be called, but by the king; that no ecclesiastical business should even be discussed, except in the prelatic courts; that no private meetings, which were termed conventicles, and included presbyteries and kirk-sessions, should be held by the ministers for expounding the Scriptures; and that on no occasion could a minister pour out the fulness of his heart to God in extemporary prayer. Many minute arrangements were also decreed respecting the ceremonial parts of worship, as fonts for baptism, communion altars, ornaments in church, modes of dispensing the communion elements, the vestments of the clerical order, &c.; such as "an indolent, lazy, and busy brain of Laud could devise, or the fantastic fooleries of Rome suggest." The utmost excitement prevailed throughout the country when the character of the Book of Canons became known. Though episcopacy had been established in Scotland for thirty years, the publication of this book, instead of reconciling the people to the prevailing ecclesiastical arrangement, appeared to increase their antipathy to it. See Stevenson, Hist. of the Church of Scotland, p. 159-164; Neal, Hist. of the Puritans, ii, 277 sq.
CANONS OR EUSEBIUS are ten tables, composed by Eusebius for the comparative study of the Gospels, indicating by numbers the parallel passages of the Evangelists and those peculiar to each. See EUSEBIUS.

CANONS, HONORARY, are canons exempted from observing the hours. Sovereign princes and nobles were occasionally regarded as honorary canons of cathedral chapters. They were allowed to sit in the conclave at Strasbourg, at Bamberg, Ratibson, Cologne, Spiers, Utrecht, Aix-la-Chapelle, St. Peter's and St. John Lateran, Rome; the king of France at Poitiers, Chalons, Sens, Anjou, Tours, and as warden of St. Quentin and abbot of St. Hilary; the king of Spain, at Burgos, Toledo, and Leon; and the queen of England, as first consul of St. David's. The prerogative was due to the union of the sovereign at coronation. The dukes of Bourges and Burgundy had stalls at Lyons; the count D'Artouga at Toledo; the duke of Brabant at Utrecht; the count De Chasteluz at Autun; and the counts of Anjou at Tours. The princes of Mecklenburg held four prebends at Strasbourg.

The twenty extravagantes at Toledo assisted only on certain anniversaries. In cathedrals of the new foundation twenty-four honorary canons, so called by a blunder, may be appointed by the bishop, pursuant to a recent act of parliament; they may be called upon to take dues, but they have no vote in chapter. In foreign cathedrals they are called supernumerary, fictitious, or improper canons, not being regarded as of the body. There are three classes in foreign churches: (1) Expectants, canonici in herba, with right of succession to the next vacancy. (2) Honorary, canonici in aere, merely titulars, without succession but living a stall if the chapter concede it. (3) Supernumeraries, by-canons, added by a new foundation. The honorary canon is not bound to residence, can retain a living requiring continuous residence, and is not to be called canon, but always honorary canon.

CANONS, MISSON (also called vicars), are clergymen in England attached to a cathedral under the dean and chapter. During the period from the Conquest to the Reformation, each canon was bound to maintain a vicar skilled in music, to supply his place when absent, in the ministrations of the Church. Before the Reformation they were enjoined to keep perpetual residence, and never to be absent without leave from the dean. In 1543 an Act of Parliament by the ecclesiastical commissioners, with the sanction of an order in council, to reduce the number of minor canons; in no case more than six, nor less than two; each to have an income of £150; each may hold one benefice, but within six miles of the cathedral.

CANONS SECULAR are those of cathedral and collegiate foundations, who mixed more or less with the world, and ministered the offices of religion to the laity. The title first appears in 1509, when it was used by pope Nicholas in the Council of Rome; but the existence of such canons in England, who had separate houses, may be traced back three centuries earlier. Such are the canons of cathedrals of the old foundation, and collegiate churches. Their oldest title was in Germania senior, retained in the ancien of some Rhenish cathedrals; or brother, then canon and lord; and lastly capitular, as being members of the chapter. As Christianity spread, the number of the clergy augmented, and the bishop chose from them some of the most learned to live in common with him in the episcopal, or bishop's house, as his assistants and advisers. In time similar colleges were founded in other places, where the clergy lived in a building called the canonica, minster, or cloister, and performed religious worship, receiving food and clothes from the bishop; they were termed canons, and the bishop's vicarius was called prior, provost, or dean. From this ancient arrangement of common habitation and revenues, the custom survives in some parts of the collation to canons by the joint consent of the bishop and chapter. A single trace remains in England, at Chichester, where the dean and chapter have six stalls in their patronage. Prebends at length were instituted, by a division of the common fund; and although the canons lived apart in their separate houses, and from their agencies, the prelate, from close, their daily presence in choir and union in chapter, they were supposed still to dwell together. After the Reformation the vicars were required to occupy their college and halls, and the last trace of the common life has been but recently lost. In the 8th century the councils of Orleans, Bremen, and Tours, and in the learned Council of Tours (813), Meaux (845), and Pont-sous-Yonne (876), required clerks to maintain the canonical life in a cloister near the cathedral, with a common refectory and dormitory, observing the teaching of the Scriptures and the Fathers under the bishop, as if he were their abbot.

In Germany the canons were called dom-herr, and in Italy domini, the masters of the cathedral; as, at Lincoln, the dignitaries were known as masters of the fabric; at Liege they were called trevocens (terve fundararii), lords of the soil; at Pisa, ordinarii, by special privilege of Nicholas II, owing to their jurisdiction as ordinaries over the inferior ministers; at Constantinople, deacons of the laying on of hands; in the diocese of Besancon, Compostella, and Seville, cardinals; at Evreux, barons. Sometimes, from their right of electing the bishop and their president, they were known as electors; and as being graduates, and in recognition of their rank, domini, or lords. Every canon is a presbyter, a priest, on the church, in a sense ex officio, as holding a prebend or revenue. In cathedrals of the new foundation, residentialities, by the new act, are no longer called prebendaries, but simply canons. In the old foundations all are canons and prebendaries, residentialis, stagilis, stationarius, natu; or non-residentialis; the latter, in the episcopal and deaneries, were held by beneficed, or extraneous. In the foreign cathedrals were three classes: (1) capitulars, perpetuall, simple or ordinary; numeral, or major canons in actual possession of stalls; (2) the German domiciliaris or domicellis, the chanoines bas-formers of Angers, Sens, and Rouen; by-canons, minor canons, or lordlings, in distinction from the majors domini, or dom-herr; expectants of vacancies; honorary, or supernumeraries, elected by the bishop and chapter, who augmented the efficiency of the choir and received small payments, but ranked after the vicars or beneficiaries; and (3) canons elect, not yet installed. Every foreign cathedral in England and France has a canonicate fabric; in Italy, the Peninsula, and Germany they pay a stipulated sum. Canons had the right of wearing mitres at Lisbon, Pisa, Besançon, Puy, Rodez, Brioude, Solosa, Messina, Salerno, Naples, Lyons, and Lucera; these were plain white, like those of abbots, as a sign of exemption from the jurisdiction of the ordinary, and probably a corrupt use of the end of the alms. Some canons are attached to archdeaconries or living, like St. Margaret and St. John, Westminster, 1840; and some to university offices, as those of Christ Church to the professors of divinity, 1606, and Hebrew, 1630; of Worcester to the Margaret professor, 1827, now exchanged for the Savilian professor of mathematics to the provost of Oriel; of Gloucester to the master of Pembroke College, Oxford; and of Norwich to the master of St. Catherine's Hall, Cambridge, by queen Anne. The principal of Jesus College, Oxford, had formerly a stall at St. David's. By a recent act the professors of Greek and Hebrew at Cambridge have stalls at Ely, and the occupants of the chairs of pastoral theology and ecclesiastical history at Christ-church. James I confiscated a stall at Salisbury to endow a readership at Oxford. The professors of Greek and divinity hold stalls at Durham. At Lisieux the bishop was earl of the city, and the canons prelates in civil jurisdiction; on the vigil of the feast of St. Ursinus, two, habitd in surplices, crossed with candelabres of flowers, and holding nasegays, rode to every gate, pre-Canopy. See Canorus.

Canopy, in Gothic architecture an ornamented projection over doors, windows, etc.; a covering over niches, tombs, etc. Canopies are chiefly used in the Decorated and Perpendicular styles, although they are not uncommon in the Early English, and are occasionally found over the heads of figures, etc., in late Norman work.

Early English canopies over niches and figures are generally simple in their forms, often only trefoil or cinquefoil arches, bowing forwards, and surmounted by a plain pediment, as on the west front of the cathedral at Wells; the canopies over tombs are sometimes of great beauty and delicacy, and highly enriched, as that over the tomb of archbishop Gray in York Minster.

In the Decorated style, the canopies are often extremely elaborate, and are so various in their forms that it is impossible to particularize them; some of the more simple of those over figures, niches, etc., consist of cinquefoiled or trefoiled arches, frequently ogees, bowing forwards, and surmounted with crockets and finials; some are like very steep pediments with crockets and finials on them; others are formed of a series of small feathered arches, projecting from the wall on a polygonal plan, with pinnacles between and subordinate canopies over them, supporting a superstructure somewhat resembling a small turret or a small crocketed spire; of this description of canopy good specimens are to be seen at the sides and over the head of the effigy of queen Philippa in Westminster Abbey. The canopies over tombs in this style are often of great beauty; some consist of bold and well-proportioned arches with fine pediments over them, which are frequently crocketed, with buttresses and pinnacles at the angles; many tombs of this style, when made in a wall, have an arch over them, forming a kind of canopy with hanging tracery.

In the Perpendicular style, the canopies are more varied than in the Decorated, but in general character many of them are nearly alike in both styles; the high, pointed form is not to be met with in Perpendicular work; a very usual kind of canopy over niches, etc., is a projection on a polygonal plan, often three sides of an octagon, with a series of feathered arches at the bottom, and terminating at the top either with a battlement, a row of Tudor flowers, or a series of open carved work.

The canopies of tombs are frequently of the most gorgeous description, enriched with a profusion of the most minute ornament, which is sometimes so crowded together as to create an appearance of great confusion. Most of our cathedrals and large churches will furnish examples of canopies of this style. They are sometimes called Testers (q. v.).

Canossa, Paulus. See Paulus Canossa.

Canova, Antonio, one of the most celebrated sculptors of modern times, was born in the village of Possagno, near Treviso, Nov. 1, 1757. He lost his father when three years old, but the family had long followed the vocation of stone-carvers, and the youth had cultivated an artistic taste; and after some preliminary training he was sent by the Venetian government to complete his studies in Rome; for which purpose he was granted a pension of three hundred ducats per annum for three years. This judicious liberality was the indirect cause of Canova's settling in Rome, and his studies there eventually in a great measure contributed to the revival of the arts in the 19th century. His first work of note was the group of Theseus and the Minotaur; this was succeeded by the great monuments to popes Clement XII and XIV, and Pius VI, which raised the reputation of Canova above that of all his contemporaries; the monument of Clement XIII is that in St. Peter's, of which the celebrated reposing lions form a part. Canova's works are extremely numerous, and are singularly graceful, combining nature with classic beauty and proportion; his extraordinary ability, and perhaps industry also, are well displayed in the noble collection of casts after his works, preserved together in the academy at Venice, among which Her- cules, in the tunic of Deianira, hurling Lichas into the sea from the rock, is a most imposing group. Some of his best works are preserved in the Vatican, as the Bozzars, and many others; his celebrated Venus is in the Pitti Palace at Florence; The Three Graces are in England; at Aspley House is a colossal statue of Na- poleon. Canova died at Venice, Oct. 12, 1822, and a magnificent design which he had made for a public monument to Titian was, with slight alterations, adapted, and in 1827 executed by some of his pupils in commemoration of his own memory; it is in the church of the Frari. A painting of the Descent from the Cross, which he executed for the church of his native village about 1800, shows how eminent he might have become in this branch of art. Canova was in every sense a most successful artist; his reputation is world-wide; he amassed great wealth, and was created marquis of Lachia by the pope. There is a portrait of him by Sir Thomas Lawrence. See Missirini, Vita di Antonio Canova (1834); also the Life of Canova, by Cignorara (1823), Rossini (1825), and D'Este (1864); Canova's Works, by Moses, etc.

Cangendu, Bernhard de', a French bishop, was elected to this office at Carcassonne in 1267, and spent his time in the care of his diocese and in separating the ecclesiastical and temporal interests. He died in January, 1278. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biot. Générale, s. v.

Canstraius (or Cantrenius) was an officer of the Church of Constantinople, whose duty it was to look after the pontifical vestments of the patriarch; to assist him to habit himself; to hold the censer at mass, or the veil of the chalice; and to sprinkle the blessed water upon the people, while the hymn of the Holy Trinity was sung.

Cant (from cantus, singing), in an ecclesiastical sense, denotes properly the whining or nasal tone common with many persons in their religious exercises, akin to what has been called "the clerical tone" in the pulpil. The Quakers were once proverbial for this peculiarity, amounting to a decided "sing-song" utterance, and it is said, not without a measure of truth, that the denomination of a clergyman may very generally be distinguished by it. A wider sense the word

does not have the same meaning or connotation. It was used in prayer, but not in any definite meaning or authority. At the time of the Reformation, the word became improperly used to express the formalism of the church.

Cant (and Canted), a term in common use among carpenters to express the cutting off the angle of a roof, or the part of a building on a polygonal plan is also said to be canted, as a canted window, or oriel, etc.

Cant, Alexander, A.M., a Scotch minister, graduated at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1686; was licensed to preach in 1698; called to the living at Banff, and ordained in 1659. He was president of the University of Aberdeen in 1649; joined the Protestants in 1651; was deprived on the establishment of episcopacy at the Restoration, and charged with "seditionary carriage" in 1662, and died before 1681. See Festi Eccles. Scotiae, iii, 521, 522.

Cant, Andrew (1), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, father of the foregoing and of the following, was regent of King's College, Aberdeen. He was widowed to the living at Alford in 1617; nominated for a living at Edin- burgh in 1629; resigned after October, 1629, and settled at Pitsligo in 1633, having been tutor in the family of Forbes. He tried to get up supplications to the privy council against the service book of 1637, which led to the establishment of the Covenant; went to Aberdeen with two celebrated ministers in furtherance of that object; and was a member of the assembly which met at Glasgow on that business. He was transferred to Newbattle in 1638, instituted in 1639, and transferred to Aberdeen in 1641. He was a member of the Commissions of Assembly from 1642 to 1649, inclusive, and had his expenses paid by parliament in consideration of his "great pains and travel, his fidelity and care, and for the payment of his losses."

He was elected moderator of the General Assembly in 1650, joined the Protestants in 1651, demitted his charge in 1660, and died April 80, 1663, aged seventy-eight years. He was the most active partisan of the Covenant in the Scotch Church. He had powerful influence with the nobles who adhered to it. It is held by some that from this zealous minister the term "cant" has arisen, signifying the whining tone of a preacher, or a pretension to piety or goodness which is not felt. This is confirmed by an essay in the Spectator of Addison. His publications were, Tales of our Blessed Saviour:—Sermon preached in the Church of St. Giles (Edinb. 1638)—Two Sermons on Renewing the Covenant. See Festi Eccles. Scotiae, i, 298; iii, 463, 464, 547, 665.

Cant, Andrew (2), a Scotch clergyman, was promoted from regent at Marischal College, Aberdeen; called to Newbattle in 1657, but declined; admitted to the living at Liberton in 1659, and transferred to Trinity College Church, Edinburgh, in 1673. In 1674 a complaint was made to the privy council that "his carriage and expressions were insolent," and the bishop was ordered by the king to remove him to Liberton; he was removed and removed to the High Church, at Edinburgh, in 1681. He died in 1695, living in comfort. He was a member of the University, elected thereto by the town council. He died Dec. 4, 1685. He was an eminent and solid preacher. He published three works in Latin. See Festi Eccles. Scotiae, i, 27, 32, 115.

Cant, Andrew (3), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1668; was licensed to preach in 1670; called to the living at South Leith, and ordained in 1671. He was licensed in England in 1676; had a dispute and quarrel with his colleague, when blows were given, and repentance and reconciliation followed. He was transferred to Trinity College Church, Edinburgh, in 1679, and deprived by the Convention of Estates, in 1689, for not disowning James II, and not acknowledging William and Mary. He was consecrated a bishop of the Nonjurant Church in 1722, and died April 21, 1730, aged eighty years. He published two Sermons on the anniversary of the martyrdom of Charles I (1708, 1715). See Festi Eccles. Scotiae, i, 32, 108.

Cant, John, a Scotch clergyman, was admitted minister at Kells in 1659; deprived by the privy council in 1662; was a member of still labouring in the hearts of the people from the present government in Church and State." The judgment was delayed, and he was excused by the council in July; but was fined in July, 1673, for not observing the anniversaries of the king's Restoration. He confessed to the charge, and was summoned as a rebel in 1684, but was liberated in 1685 on giving a bond to live peaceably and not preach. He demitted his pastorate in May, 1689, and though he was restored to his living at Kells, he did not take advantage of the restoration; but as he was in indigent circumstances, each member of the synod gave him the sum of thirty shillings. He died before May 29, 1708. See Festi Eccles. Scotiae, i, 715.

Cantababrii, literally, hearers of the cantabrum, or cruciform standard of the later Roman emperors, in military or religious processions, occurs in the Cud. Theod. xiv, 7, 2, as applied to a guild of such persons, and has no direct connection with ecclesiastical antiquity. Bingham, however (xvi, 5, 6), cites the passage in its bearing upon the mention of cantabrum by the council in Trullo (c. 61) as connected with divination; and hence it appears in the index to his work as the name of "a sort of conjurors." The cantabrum itself is mentioned by Minucius Felix (Octar. c. 27) and Ter- tollian (Apol. c. 16), as an instance of the uncon-
CANTAGALLINA

CANTICLES

I. Held about 608, by St. Austin, in order to confirm the foundation of a monastery which he was about to build near Canterbury, to be dedicated to Peter and Paul.

II. Held in 969, by Dunstan, archbishop of Canterbury, Edgar, the king, being present, who, advocating the celibacy of the secular clergy, spoke with warmth of their negligent and dissolute conduct at that time. At the end of this celebrated speech of king Edgar, a plain hint is given of the violent measures then in contemplation by that monarch and the archbishop. See Wilkins, Concil. i, 246.

III. Held in 991, in which those of the clergy of the cathedral who refused to become monks were turned out, and monks appointed in their places, to whom also great privileges and possessions were granted. See Spelman, Conc. Angl. iv.

IV. Held Nov. 1, 1439, by Henry Chichely, archbishop of Canterbury. A constitution was made for augmenting vicarages. It declares that there were in the province of Canterbury many vicarages belonging to rich churches, too poor to afford a livelihood to their vicars, who were unable to afford the necessary expense of prosecuting a suit before the ordinary for the augmentation of their portion. It then orders that proceedings in such cases shall therefore be summary, and conducted in a plain manner, and that ordinaries shall admit such vicars to prosecute such causes de forma et subterminis, and that care be assigned to them in portions as shall be suitable to the revenues of their several churches. See Johnson, Eccl. Canones, A.D. 1439; Labbe, Concil. xiii, 1282; Wilkins, Concil. iii, 535.

V. Held in 1554, by cardinal Pole, in which, for the sake of peace, the alienation of Church property, made in the preceding reigns, was sanctioned. See Wilkins, Concil. iii, 101.

CANTIANUM, CONCILIUM. See KENT, COUNCIL OF.

CANTIANUS, Saút, an early prince and martyr, was born at Rome, and beheaded at Aquileia. He suffered execution with Cantius, his elder brother; Cantianilla, his sister; and Proitus, their Christian preceptor, A.D. 304. Although they were of the illustrious family of the Anicii, and relatives of the emperor Carinus, these three young men had been educated in the Christian faith. In order to flee from the persecutions of Diocletian and Maximian, they sold what they possessed at Rome, distributing its price among the poor, and went to Aquileia. There they continued to practice their religion, encouraging the imprisoned Christians to suffer for their faith. Information against them having been given to the emperor, they were arrested as they were about to hide themselves, at a short distance from Aquileia, near the tomb of Chrysogones, their friend, who had suffered martyrdom shortly before. Their heads were cut off on the spot. A priest, Zosius, buried their bodies close by that of Chrysogones. Afterwards their remains were removed to Aquileia, but Milan, Bergamo, and other cities of Lombardy, Germany, and France, pretend likewise to be in possession of the bodies of these saints. Their festival is May 31, the traditional day of their death. See Hoefer, Novus. Biog. Générale, s. v.

CANTIOLES is the liturgical name for the Te Deum, Benedictus, Benedictus, Magnificat, and Nunc Dimittis. The songs of Moses, Miriam, Deborah, Hannah, and Isaiah are specimens of Biblical canticles; hymns inspired at the moment on a special occasion. After the 5th century canticles were added to psalmody. The Benedictus is mentioned by Amalarus in 820, and by St. Benedict, nearly three centuries before the canticle from the Gospel. Te Deum was sung at matins every Sunday before the Gospel-lectern, by the rules of St. Benedict and St. Cæsarius of Arles, c. 507. The Magnificat occurs in the office of Lauds in the latter rule, and in the office of the Eastern Church; in the forbidden to use the cap. At Stoke College caps and not hoods were worn. The gown cap which Pope Sylvester sent to St. Stephen, in 1000 is used at the coronation of the kings of Hungary. See BIRETTA; ZUCHETTO.

Capa (or Cappa). See COPE.

Capella, Giovanni Maria, a Dominican of Saluzzo, lived in the 16th century, and taught sacred literature at Faenza and Bologna, and was made inquisitor-general at Cremona. He died Nov. 2, 1598, leaving, Scintilla della Fiamma Immosta, etc.:—Arca Salutis Humanae, being a Commentary on the Passion of our Lord (Venice, 1606, fol.):—De Cena (ibid. 1604). See Hoefler, Novum. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Capallì, Giovanni Battista, an Italian theologian of the second half of the 17th century, was dean of Arezzo, and wrote Ricordo dell' Abito Monacale (Venice, 1680). See Hoefler, Novum. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Capalti, Francesco, an Italian composer, born at Fossombrone (in the Roman States), lived in the latter part of the 18th century. He was chapel-master of the cathedral of Narni, and published, Il Controspuntista pratico, Ossimo Dimostrazioni fatte Sopra l' Esperienza (Terni, 1788). See Hoefler, Novum. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Capax was a bishop at the second council of Rome, A.D. 344.

Capce, Angelo, an Italian theologian of the order of Theatines, who lived at the beginning of the 18th century. See Hoefler, Novum. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Capce (Lat. Capuscus), Marco Antonio, an Italian theologian, was born at Naples in 1569. He was of a patrician family, entered the order of Jesuits, and devoted himself to preaching, and after that to instruction, but would not accept the bishopric of Nico- tero, which was offered to him. He died at Naples, Nov. 18, 1640, leaving A. Generali Orationem in Queen Margaret of Austria. See Hoefler, Novum. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Capce-Latro, Giuseppe, a Neapolitan archbishop and publicist, was born Sept. 23, 1744. He obtained when quite young the archbishopric of Taranto, which gives to the titular the rank and privileges of a principal see. These advantages did not prevent him, however, defending the principles of an enlightened philosophy, and fighting against the old ideas, the superstition and hierarchical pretensions of the papal see, yet all this without neglecting his duties as a Roman Catholic priest. During the reign of Joseph Bonaparte, in 1802, Capce-Latro was minister of the interior, and continued to direct this department under Joseph Murat in the most distinguished manner. After the fall of that king the prelate lost his archbishopric, retired altogether from public affairs, and made of his house a place of reunion for all persons distinguished for their rank and knowledge. Capce-Latro died Nov. 2, 1806. His last writing is remarkable for its style: it is El Sigilo di Federigo II, re di Prussia (Berlin, 1832). See Hoefler, Novum. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Capedinum was the vessel in which the sacred fire of Vesta was preserved.

Capets, in Finnish mythology, were gobins, spirits of the air, who were possessed of great power, and even of a certain fire-moon (Coffe) out of which the latter came only with great difficulty. There were various kinds of these Capets, who all had their special duties. Sorcerers often made use of them in order to injure persons whom they hated.

Capesigue, Jean Baptiste Honoré Raimond, a French historian and publicist, who was born at Mars- selles in 1802, and died in 1873, is best known as the author of, Histoire Philosophique des Juifs (Brussels, 1854):—Histoire de la Réforme, de la Ligue et du Régne de Henri IV (ibid. 1854-55, 8 vols.). He also wrote, Histoire d'Alphonse d'Aquitaine (1861, 4 vols.):—The First Four Centuries of the Christian Church (1850, 3 vols.):—The Church in the Middle Ages (1852, 2 vols.):—And The Church in the Last Four Centuries (1854, 4 vols). See Hoefler, Novum. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Capel, Daniel, an English clergyman, son of Richard, was ejected from his living in Gloucestershire, and, after practicing medicine, died at Stroud in 1763.

Capel, Richard, an English divine, was born in Gloucester in 1586, educated at Magdalene College, Oxford, and in 1609 was made fellow. He was presented by Stephens with the rectory of Eastington, in his native county, where he wrote his excellent book on Temptations, in which he set out to prove that there is no temptation to which man is subject but what might be suggested by his own corruption, without any suggestion from Satan. When the reading of the Book of Sports on the Lord's Day was pressed upon him, he refused to comply, and willingly resigned his see, preaching afterwards gratuitously to neighboring congregations. He died Sept. 21, 1590. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), i, 653; Roe, Gen. Biog. Dict. s. v.

Capelain. See CAPPELLANUS.

Capell, Daniel S., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in North Carolina, Dec. 13, 1801. He received a careful religious training; emigrated with his parents to Kentucky in 1816; and, after having been local preacher for several years, in 1830 entered the Kentucky Conference. In 1844 he moved to Missouri and joined the St. Louis Conference, wherein he labored until within a short time of his death, which occurred on his way to California, June 10, 1852. Mr. Capell was more than an ordinary preacher. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1852, p. 379.

Capella, Marco Antonio, an Italian Franciscan, was born at Este, in Lombardy, about the middle of the 16th century, and taught theology at Udine, Anagni, and Venice. He wrote against the interdict of Paul V, in 1606, on the famous Venice question, but afterwards he entirely retracted his position. He died in September, 1629. He also wrote, L'es- tre Prudenza di Eccezoni Regia Ingegno (Bologna, 1610, 4to); Cologna, 1611, 8vo) Deipintuatione di Summo Pontificatu B. Petri et di Successione Episcopi Romani in Eundem Pontificium (ibid. 1621).—In Ap- pellationibus Eccl. Africana ad Romanam Sedem (Rome and Paris, 1622, 8vo).—Deipintuatione di Summo Pontificatu B. Capellani, Antonio, a Venetian engraver, was born about 1730, and studied under Wagner. In 1760 he engraved the principal part of the portraits in Bottari's edition of Vasari. The following are some of his prints: The Marriage of St. Catherine: The Repose in Egypt; Adam and Eve driven from Paradise.

Capelleri. See GREGORY XVI.
It has been a subject of much dispute where the ancient Capernaum is to be sought. At Capernaum there was a custom-house and a garrison. Dalman, therefore, it was situated close to the frontier of the tetrarchy of Philip; and in this respect it corresponds with Khan Minyeh. This inference might be drawn from the direction of the Roman roads across the hills, leading into the tetrarchy, except for the probability of a frequented road from the mouth of the [upper] Jordan, skirting the [west] shore of the lake, in which case the frontier-town would be farther north. After a victorious engagement in the plain of Bethsaida, Josephus, who was injured by a fall from his horse, caused himself to be carried to Capernaum, which was the nearest place, and therefore not Khan Minyeh. When Christ crossed the lake from Capernaum to the opposite shore [Mark vi, 28 sq.], the crowd ran round the north end of the lake to meet him, and a glance at the map shows that Tell Hum is more likely to have been the starting-point than Khan Minyeh. Again, when Mark informs us that the disciples took ship to the plain of Gennesaret [v, 45, 58], and John that they sailed to Capernaum [vi, 9 sq.], we are clearly justified in inferring that Capernaum lay in the plain of Gennesaret.

Major Wilson argues in a similar manner in favor of Tell Hum (in Plumptre's Bible Educator, iii, 134 sq.). Lieut. Conder well sums up the evidence thus (Tell-work in Palestine, ii, 132 sq.):

"The various scholars and explorers who have written since Robinson are divided into two parties, one placing Capernaum near Khan Minyeh and the other selecting the large site at Tell Hum. The places are only two and a half miles apart, but modern disputants are not content with such wide limits. There is a point which strikes one as curious in the controversy. In all the arguments usually brought forward, no reference is made to the information which can be deduced from Jewish sources dating later than Bible times. To this information I would call attention."

"Identification, properly so called, is impossible when the old name is lost; but in the case of Capernaum traces of the name may perhaps be recovered still. It is generally granted that the Talmudic Caphar Nahum, or Village of Nahum, was probably identical with the New-Test. Capernaum, and it is on this supposition that the only philological claim of Tell Hum is based; but the less implied of an important radical at the commencement of the name Hum, if it be supposed to be a corruption of Nahum, is a change of which we have scarcely any instance; moreover, Hum in Hebrew means 'black,' and still retains its original signification in Arabic. Tell Hum was so named, no doubt, from the black salt which covers the site. If we are to seek for an ancient corresponding title, I would suggest Caphar Ahim, a town mentioned in the Talmud with Chorazin, and famous for its wheat, as being probably the ancient name of the ruined site at Tell Hum. Even if this town were standing in the time of Christ, there seems no more reason why its name should be mentioned in the Gospels than that Tarichea or Sepphoris should be so noticed, or that Chorazin should be mentioned when speaking of the same district."

"An investigation of the name Minyeh is more satis-

— the modern aqueduct being apparently constructed to supply some mills near Minyeh. It seems impossible to identify this spring with the spring of Tell Hum, which is a rocky spring in a field about two and a half miles south of Minyeh, the other scarsely three quarters of a mile west of the same site. The first irrigates a great part of the plain of Gennesaret, and the second is called ‘Am ‘El-Madawerah, the modern spring being surrounded by an octagonal reservoir, which was built up to its present height by one of the sons of the family of the Nabul.”

In favor of the Minyeh site we have then Jewish tradition, and the existence of a spring fulfilling the description of Josephus; but it must be remembered that, even if Tell Hum is not the original site of Tell Hum, we have a Christian tradition from the 4th century downwards. Jerome places Capernaum two miles from Chorazin. If, as seems almost certain, by the latter place he means the ruin of Kerazeh, the measurement is exactly that to Tell Hum. The account of Theodorus (A.D. 533) is more explicit, and seems, indeed, almost conclusive as to the site of his Capernaum. Two miles from Magdala he places the Seven Fountain, where the miracle of feeding the five thousand is said to have taken place; these, as will presently appear, were probably close to Minyeh; and two miles more he places Capernaum, where, it is said, it was six miles toBethsaida, on the road to Bonias. These measurements seem to point to Tell Hum as the 4th-century site. On the other hand, the ancient name of Capernaum seems to place it in the 14th century. The site of Minyeh would have been within a mile and a half of his road, and the name is apparently connected with Capernaum by his valuable note about the Minam. The same connection is traced in A.D. 1616, when Quaresmin speaks of Capernaum as shown at a place called Minyeh, and thus we are able to trace back an apparently unbroken Jewish tradition connecting Capernaum with the ‘Village of the Minal,’ and with the ruined site of Minyeh.

In addition to the Jewish tradition connecting Minyeh with Capernaum, there is a second indication which favors that identification. Josephus speaks of the fountain which watered the plain of Gennesaret, and which was called Capernaris. It contained a fish named Coraci-um, which was also found in the Nile. There are two springs to which this account has been supposed to apply, at ‘Arum, and at the second is called ‘Ain Tābqah, and Dr. Tristram points out that the water being warm, brackish, and muddy, is unfit for the Coraci-um, which has never as yet been found in it. ‘Ain Tābqah is not in the plain of Gennesaret, but in a spring surrounded by an octagonal reservoir, which was built up to its present height by one of the sons of the family of the Nabul.”

as above noticed. John of Würzburg (about A.D. 1100) speaks of the mountain called Mena, with a fountain a mile distant, and Capernaum two miles away. Fretellus (A.D. 1150) is yet more explicit: Capernaum, he says, is at the head of the lake, two miles from the descent of the mountain, and apparently three from the fountain where the five thousand were fed, which fountain would probably be 'Ein-et-Tin, a large source, west of Miyneh, and not far from the hill which Sewall points out as being the Meena. The whole of this topography is summed up by Martino Santcro, whose valuable chart of Palestine shows us the position of the various traditional sites of the 14th century. On this chart the Meena is shown in a position which is unmistakable. The valleys which run down to the plain of Gennesaret are drawn with some fidelity, and the Meena is placed north of them; at the border of the lake Bethsaida is shown, about in the position of Miyneh, and Capernaum near the site of Tell Hüm; in the letterpress the account is equally clear, Capernaum being placed near the north-east corner of the lake, and Bethsaida just where the lake begins to curve round southward.

"Christian tradition points, then, to Tell Hüm as being Capernaum, but Jewish hatred has preserved the Jewish site under the opprobrious epithet of Miyneh; the question is simply whether—settling aside the important testimony of Josephus—Jewish or Christian tradition is to be accepted."

After repeated consideration, and especially since a personal examination of the localities, we are inclined to locate Capernaum at Khān Miyneh, and Bethsaida at Tell Hüm.

Caperolans, a congregation of monks in Italy, in the 16th century, who derived their name from Pietro Capereole, their founder. The monasteries of this order are found at Brescia, Bergamo, and Cremona.

Caperole, Pietro, a Venetian theologian, of the order of Observants, gained great celebrity by his preaching. In 1472 he caused the withdrawal of several convents, and formed a new order called Caperolans. Although pope Sixtus IV did not favor this, nevertheless, in 1480, he accorded to him the convent of Veletri. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Capers, Samuel Wragg, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Georgetown, S. C., March 5, 1797. He received a classical education at Lodebar Academy, Sumter District; entered upon the study of law, but was converted, licensed to preach, and, in 1828, admitted into the South Carolina Conference. In 1854 failing health obliged him to superannuate, and he retired to Camden, where he died, June 22, 1855. Mr. Capers was strong physically and mentally, a powerful speaker, a generous friend, and an excellent pastor. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1856, p. 628.

Capers, Thomas H., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Sumter District, S. C., March 27, 1811. He was son of the Rev. Gabriel Capers, and nephew of bishop William Capers; joined the Church early in life, and, at the age of nineteen, entered the Georgia Conference. In 1839 he was transferred to the Alabama Conference. He was eminently successful in winning souls; but pecuniary embarrassments compelled him in 1846 to locate, and devote himself to the practice of medicine, and to teaching; in which former vocation he continued until 1864, when he was admitted into the Florida Conference. He died at his post, Oct. 15, 1866. Mr. Capers was a minister of rare ability. His pulpit efforts were earnest, practical, forcible, and his pastoral work a great success. He was wise, sympathetic, energetic. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1866, p. 31.

Capes, George, an English Baptist minister, was born in 1776. He united with the Little Prescot Street Church, London, in 1779, being baptized by the celebrated Abraham Worth. He entered the ministry in 1808, and became pastor of the Church in Gamlingay, Cambridgeshire, and afterwards in Loughborough, Leicestershire, from 1816 to 1826. His third and last settlement was in Farringdon, Berkshire, where he died, May 29, 1855. See (London) Baptist Hand-Book, 1886, p. 17. (J. C. S.)

Capet, Jean, a French theologian and canon, was born at Lille. He received the degree of doctor at Louvain, where he taught philosophy. He died in his native city, May 12, 1599. He wrote, De Vera Christi Ecclesiae, de qua Ecclesiae et Scripturae Autoritate (Douay, 1584);—De Harrii et Modo Coeernonis Habentiae (Antwerp, 1591). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Capgrave (or Catgrave), John, an English theologian, was an Augustinian monk of Canterbury, and afterwards a doctor at Oxford, and provincial of his order. He was an intimate friend and the confessor of Humphrey, duke of Gloucester, and flourished about 1450. He died, according to some accounts, in 1464; according to Pits and others, in 1494. He wrote a Catalogus seu Legend. a Sacramen Anglor. (Lond. 1516, fol., and printed in English by the celebrated Caxton in 1483). He also left a Commentary on the Holy Scriptures, of which the part relating to Genesis is preserved in the library of Oriel College, Oxford; and that on the Acts in the library of Balliol. Dale gives a full catalogue of his writings (Cont. viii, cap. 1). See Landon, Ecclesiastical Dictionary, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Capicerius (or Capitarius, French, chef-crier), an ecclesiastical officer. Some think he had the care of the cera, or tapers, and derived his name à capiendu cera. Others make him the same as the privenciarius, so called from being the first name inscribed on the

-eria (or tablet of the church). Martene explains capite- erius to be the monk or nun who had charge of the capitum or presbyterium, or of the sacred ornaments and furniture of the church.

Capitius. See CAPECE.

Capilupi, YPPOLETTO, an Italian prelate and poet, was born at MARINA in 1512. He was appointed bishop of Povo in 1560, and afterwards legate of Venice.
Some of his elegies are found in the Décies des Poètes Italiens, vol. i. He died in 1551. See Hoefn, Nouv.
Biogr. Générale, s. v.

Capiscul (i.e. Capius Schulze), a precentor. The
at Rome schools of ecclesiastical singing, and in allusion to these, the pontifical speaks of the clerks who accompany the bishop and aid him in his sacred functions, as the "Schola." Thus the term school came to be applied not only to the place where the choristers learned singing, but also to the choir, chapels, etc. Hence the "capiscul, in a cathedral, was the chief or head of the school of chanterists.

Capiscuchi, Giovanni Antonio, an Italian prelate, was born in Rome Oct. 21, 1515. Pope Paul III appointed him canon of the Vatican and auditor of the Rota. In 1554 Paul IV made him cardinal, and afterwards inquisitor and bishop of Lodi. Under Pius V Capiscuchi became prefect of the papal palace, governor of Guado, and apostolic legate. He died at Rome, Jan. 27, 1569, leaving Constitutions, which he prepared for a synod held at Lodi. See Hoyer, Nouv.
Biogr. Générale, s. v.; Jöcher, Algemeene Geschieden-Lexbib, s. v.

Capiscuchi, Paolo, an Italian prelate, was born at Rome in 1479. Pope Clement VII appointed him canon of the Vatican, then referendiary of both signatures, auditor of the Rota, bishop of Nicosia, and vicar-general. In 1529 the case of Henry VIII, king of England, who was seeking to obtain a divorce from Catherine of Aragon, was committed to the care of Capiscuchi, who espoused the cause of Catherine, claiming that Henry VIII had, by his conduct, laid himself open to censure. Pope Paul III employed Capiscuchi advantageously in several important negotiations, especially during the troubles of Perugia and Avignon. Capiscuchi succeeded in establishing peace and the papal authority. Paul III, in recognition of this, appointed him vice-legate of Umbria. He died at Rome, Aug. 6, 1559,

Capiscuchi, Raimondo Camillo, an Italian ecclesiastic and theologian, was born at Rome in 1616.
He was the son of Paolo Capiscuchi, and marquis of Puy Catin. At the age of fourteen years, on June 8, 1630, he entered the Dominican order, and afterwards became professor of philosophy and theology. Innocent X made him secretary of the Index, member of the board of examination of bishops, and in 1654 master of the sacred palace. On Sept. 1, 1681, Innocent XI appointed him to the cardinals'hip. He died at Rome, April 12, 1691, leaving the works on Scripture Theology, Scholastics, Morals, and Medita Diarii Thome Resoluta (Rome, 1670, 1677):

Capital (or Cap), the head of a column, pilaster, etc. In classical architecture, the orders have each their respective capitals, which differ considerably from one another, but their characteristics are easily distinguished; there are, however, considerable differences between the Corinthian orders of the temple of Vesta at Tivoli, and of the Choragic monument of Lysicrates at Athens;
there are also a few capitals totally unlike those of any of the five orders, as in the Temple of the Winds, at Athens. In Norman and Gothic architecture they are densely diversified.

A very common form for plain Norman capitals, es-specially on small shafts, is one called the cushion capnecking, are used with it; the leaves have generally stiff stems; but almost always stand out very boldly, so as to produce a striking and beautiful effect, and they are generally well worked, and often so much undercut that the stalks and more prominent parts are entirely detached. The character of the foliage varies, but by far the most common, and that which belongs peculiarly to this style, consists of a trefoil, the two lower lobes of which (and sometimes all three) are worked with a high prominence or swelling in the centre, which casts a considerable shadow; the middle lobe is frequently much larger than the others, with the main fibre deeply channelled in it. Occasionally animals are mixed with the foliage, but they are usually a sign that the work is late. Some of the richest specimens of thirteenth-century foliage are to be found in the presbytery of Lincoln Cathedral.

In the Decorated style, the capitals very often consist of plain mouldings either with or without ball-flowers or other flowers worked upon the bell, though they are frequently carved with very rich and beautiful foliage; the mouldings usually consist of rounds, ogees, and hollows, and are not so deeply undercut as in the Early English style; the foliage is very different from Early English work, and of a much broader character, many of the leaves being representations of those of particular plants and trees, as the oak, ivy, white-thorn, vine, etc., which are often worked so truly to nature as to lead to the supposition that the carver used real leaves for his pattern; they are also in general extremely well arranged, and without the stiffness to be found in the Early English foliage.

Perpendicular capitals are usually plain, though in large and ornamented buildings they are not frequently enriched with foliage, especially early in the style, when the shafts are circular; it is very common for the necking only, or for the necking, the bell, and the first moulding above it, to follow the same form, the upper mouldings being changed into an octagon; ogees, beads, and hollows are the prevailing mouldings; much of the foliage bears considerable resemblance to the Decorated, but it is stiffer and not so well combined, and the leaves in general are of less natural forms and frequently square; towards the latter part of the style there is often a main stalk continued uninterruptedly in a waved line, with the leaves arranged alternately on opposite sides. See ARAUCUS.

Capitani are Christian martyrs commemorated early in November in the calendar of Carthage.

Capitein, Jacques Élisée Jean, a negro convert, a Protestant theologian and missionary, was born upon the coast of Guinea. At the age of seven or eight years he was purchased, upon the banks of the St. Andrew's, by the captain of a Dutch vessel, Arnold Steenhard, who in turn gave him up to a trader of Elmina, James Van Goeh, who gave him the name Capitein, and brought him to the Hague, where he was baptized and instructed in the elements of the ancient and Semitic languages by Miss Roscam. Early in 1738 Capitein went to the University of Leyden, where he studied theology. After taking his degree he was appointed, in 1742, pastor at Elmina in Africa. After his departure for the coast of Guinea, in the same year, not much was known of him, though some asserted that he had returned to his early idolatrous religion. Among his writings are an elegy on Manger, his master, in Latin verse, translated into French by Gregory, in the Littérature des Negres;—De Vocatione Ethnorum (Leyden, 1738);—Dissertatio Politeo-theologico de Servitute Libellus Christianum non Contraria (ibid. 1742, translated into Dutch by Jerome of Brielhelin, and containing the portrait of the author)—Uitgevoerde Predikaten (Amsterdam, ed.). The portrait of Capitein, by Reynolds, is found in Blumenbach's Manual of Natural History. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Capitellii, Bernardino, a painter and engraver of Siena, was born in 1689, studied under A. Casolani, and R. Manetti, and died in 1689. Little is known of him as a painter, but as an engraver he executed a number of works, among which are the following: The Marriage of St. Catherine; The Repose in Egypt; The Life of St. Bernard of Siena; St. Anthony of Padua, and his Miracles. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Capitilavium (head-washing) is a name for Palm Sunday in France and Spain, because the heads of the Competentes, who were to receive chrism after baptism, were then washed. In 813 the practice was abolished.
by the Council of Mecenae. At Milan the feet of the candidates were washed. See ABLUTION OF THE HEAD.

Capito is the name of several persons in early Christian history:
1. The twenty-fifth bishop of Jerusalem, whose death is placed in the consulship of Maternus and Bradus. A.D. 185.
2. A Donatist bishop, who joined in presenting a request against Cecilian. A.D. 313, claiming that the question at issue should be tried in Gaul, which had been free from the temptation that caused the dispute.
He was deposed accordingly, at Tours, April 28, 315.
4. Father of the presbyter Athanasius, named, perhaps, to distinguish his son from the great bishop whose persecutions he shared.

6. In the Menology of Basil, on Dec. 22, we read of a Capito, sent as bishop to Cherson on the death of Athanasius, and who by a miracle converted the people. On comparing the entry on July 8, we find that Cherson means the Crimea, to which an earlier Capito had been sent, in the time of the Diocletian persecution, and was martyred.
8. A robber who became a hermit, and supported himself in a cave four miles from Antinoplis in Egypt. When Palladius saw him, between A.D. 410 and 420, himself had lived thirty years without entering the city.

Capito, an Italian prelate and geographer, was born at Narni. He entered the order of the Servites, and became archbishop of Avignon. He died in 1576, leaving, Explanations of Certain Passages of the Old and New Test. (Venice, 1579; Cologne, 1581). See Hoefer, Notiz, Biogr. Générale, s.v.

Capitolina, Saint, was a martyr of Cappadoecia, who was first cast into prison, and is said to have been beheaded on Oct. 27, and her servant, Erotes, on the 28th. The Menologics put their martyrdom under Diocletian, but the Mis. Acta under Licinius.

Capitolini was a name of reproach applied by the Novatians to the Catholics, because the latter resorted, in their synods, to receive communion again, upon their sincere repentance, such as had offered sacrifice in the capitol. See Bingham, Christ. Antig. bk. 1, c. 3.

Capitoline Playa, in Roman mythology, were solemn scenes enacted in honor of Jupiter, and in memory of Juno, and Minerva, connected with the goddess of the capitol, when the latter was stormed by Brennus.

Capitolinus is the name of several persons in early Church history:
1. Deputy of Thrace under Julian, who put St. Zenillian to death.
4. Martyr at Rome with Eulalia, commemorated Dec. 11.

Capitolium is a word applied by Latin writers chiefly to certain temples. The first was a small temple, supposed to have been built by Nummi, and dedicated to Mars and Minerva, situated on the Esquiline, near the spot which was afterwards the circus of Flora. It did not receive the name Capitolium until after the foundation of the second one here mentioned, from which it was then distinguished as Capitolium vetus. The second was the Temple of Jupiter Optimus Maximus, on the Mons Tarpeius, so called from a human head being discovered in digging the foundations. This temple was begun by Tarquinius Priscus, continued by Servius Tullius, and finished by Tarquinius Superbus. It was thrice burned to the ground, and thrice rebuilt, the third time by Domitian. The Capitolium contained three temples within the same peristyle, or three cells parallel with each other, the partition walls of which were common and all under the same roof. In the centre was the seat of Jupiter, the Moneta menti, and the temple of Juno, which was on the right, and that of Juno upon the left. Capitolium is sometimes put for the whole mount on which the temple stood, and is also used to distinguish the chief temples in other cities besides Rome.

Capitula is the name of a prayer in the Mozarabic rite, varying in matter, but consisting of the Lord's prayer. It changes with the day and office, varying much in length, but having no special characteristics to distinguish it from other Mozarabic prayers.

Capitulans is a knight, canon, or monk having a voice in the chapter.

Capitulum (or Capitulare) is (1) Properly a summary or heading, under which many particulars are arranged, or in the plural, of code of laws ecclesiastical or civil, digested under chapters or capita. (2) The word came also to mean the "chapter" itself, of which it is properly the heading; as, e.g. the capitula or short lessons for particular days. (3) From this last-mentioned usage, coupled with the practice of reading out of the capitula or chapter of the day from the Scriptures, to the assembled canons or monks, these came to be called, in a body, the capitulum, or chapter.

The "little chapter" said at all the canonical hours excepting matins, after the Psalms. It consists of one or two verses of Scripture, usually taken from the Epistles, often from the epistles or epistles, and occasionally from other parts; and is recited by the officiating priest, standing. (6) An anthem in the Ambrosian rite said at lauds after the Psalms and before the antiphon, varying with the day.

Capes, Jacob T., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Jeromesville, O., Sept. 8, 1825. He was converted at the age of fifteen, and educated at Norwalk Seminary. In 1845 he removed to Michigan, and then to a point on the Mississippi, and in 1855 to Illinois, where he continued his religious work, and died, July 25, 1860. Mr. Capes was gentle, obliging, and unassuming; as a preacher, grave, able, and eloquent. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1860, p. 322.

Capnomacy (from καπνός, smoke, and μάτωσις, derivation, permeation) is the action of smoke by which the ancient heathen in their sacrifices. If the smoke was thick and light, and went straight upwards, the omen was favorable; but if the smoke was thick and dark, and rested like a cloud over the fire, the omen was unfavorable.

Cappocho, Alessandro, an Italian monk, of the family of the Cappacci, was born at Florence, Oct. 14, 1515. At the age of twelve he entered the Dominican order, and made great progress in the Oriental languages. He died at Florence, Oct. 8, 1581. See Hoefer, Notiz, Biogr. Générale, s.v.

Cappuccio (or Capocciu), Renato, an Italian theologian and poet, was native of Viterbo. He belonged to the order of Cistercians. Pope Innocent IV made him cardinal. He died in May, 1254, leaving some Latin hymns, among them, Colorem Condor, and Plange Turba Papae Petri. See Hoefer, Notiz, Biogr. Générale, s.v.

Capodiferro, Gian Francesco, an Italian artist, was native of Bergamo, and probably the pupil or rival of Fra Dominice of the same place. He was often employed by the Duke and other Churches and other cities, and was aided by his brother Pietro and his son Timino. He died about 1533. See Spooner, Hist. of the Fine Arts, s.v.; Hoefer, Notiz, Biogr. Générale, s.v.
CAPOLONGO

CAPOLONGO, Antonio, a Neapolitan painter, lived about the year 1480, and studied under Della Luna. There is a handsome altar-piece by him in San Domenico, Naples, representing The Conception, with Saints. In San Niccolo is a picture by him of The Virgin and Infant, with a glory of angels, and several saints.

Capon, John, an English prelate, was bishop of Salisbury in 1547, having been transferred to that see from Bangor. He was a time-serving tool of Henry VIII., and afterwards sat in judgment upon Hooper and other martyrs.

Caponsacchi (Pantanetti), Pietro, an Italian theologian and miscellaneous author, was a native of Arezzo, and lived in 1575. His writings are more remarkable for their singularity than for their orthodoxy. Some of them are, In Josphin Apostoli Apocalypsis Observation (Florence, 1572, 1580), dedicated to Selim II. emperor of Turkey: De Justitia et Juris Auditione (ibid. 1575). See Hoeffer, Nouv. Bio. Générale, s. v.

Caporella, Pietro Paolo, an Italian prelate and theologian, entered the order of Conventual Minorites in 1530, and taught ethics at Naples. In 1535 he was appointed bishop of Saronno, and died in 1560. He wrote, De Operibus Misericordie, et de Purgatorio: Questions de Matrimoniis Regni Angliae, etc. See Hoeffer, Nouv. Bio. Générale, s. v.

Capp, Thomas, an English Wesleyan minister, was a native of Mewith, Norfolk. Converted when fourteen, he united with the ministry in 1854, and died on his last furlough in the same year. His sermons were clear, correct in doctrine, vivid in illustration, and were sometimes illuminated by passages of impassioned eloquence. He loved specially the Puritan divines. He was frank and cheerful. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1862, p. 33.

Cappa is a Latin term for (1) a cape or tippet; (2) a hood to a cape or tippet, fastened to the back of the same, so that the hood may be drawn over the head as a protection against the weather; (3) a cope, i. e. a choir and professional vestment. See Cope.

Cappa Chorale is a choral cope; i. e. a cope of rich material, such as velvet, silk, satin, or cloth-of-gold, richly embroidered, and used in the solemn services of the choir or sanctuary. The figure in the accompanying woodcut is from the brass of abbess Beaufouris, circa A.D. 1568, at Dorchester Church, Oxford. He is represented vested in cassock, surplice, amice (alоборот), and two furred ends of which hang down in front, and choral cope. He also bears the pastoral staff (but with the crook turned outwards); and a label, with a pious prayer inscribed on it, is placed over his head.

Cappa Magna is a rich flowing cloak or covering of silk, in some respects resembling the cope, worn by bishops and other dignitaries on state occasions. For bishops, the color of it is purple; for cardinals, scarlet. Its use has been abandoned in the Church of England, though the archbishops still sometimes assume a cope with a train borne by pages.

Cappa Minor is a small cape or tippet covering the shoulder. These capes or tippets are commonly worn abroad over the surplice, and are regarded as a necessary part of the choir habit. They were anciently worn in the English Church, and are still ordered by the seventy-fourth of the canons of 1603. The incongruous and absurd mode of wearing mutilated hoods and tippets, hanging round the neck by a ribbon and falling down the back, is a modern innovation, dating from the 17th century.

Cappa Pliavilla is a cope to be worn out of doors in processions, funerals, etc., usually of a coarser material than that worn in choir (cappa chorale), and intended to protect the wearer from the weather.

Cappe, Newcome, an English Socinian minister, was born in Leeds, Feb. 23, 1733, and educated at the academies of Dr. Aiken and Dr. Doddridge, and at the University of Glasgow. He returned to Leeds in 1755, and, within a short time after, was chosen co-pastor, and the following year sole pastor, of the dissenting congregation in St. Saviourgate, York, where he remained forty years. He died Dec. 24, 1800, leaving several single sermons, A Selection of Psalms for Social Worship: Remarks on Vindications of Dr. Priestley, in Answer to the Monthly Reviewers; and other works. See Chalmers, Bioj. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Cappel, Guillame, a professor and dean of the faculty of theology at Paris. He was rector of the university when, in 1671, Innocent VIII. laid an imposition upon it of a tithe; against which Guillame Cappel wrote a folio forbidding all members and agents to obey the order of the pope. See Hoeffer, Nouv. Bio. Générale, s. v.

Cappel, Louis (surnamed de Moniaibert), a French theologian, was born at Paris, Jan. 15, 1584. He was the uncle of Jacques Cappel (q. v.). At the age of twenty-jeux, he went to Bordeaux, with the view of studying jurisprudence. Here he became acquainted with members of the Reformed Church, which he joined. After his return to Paris, his relatives tried to persuade him to resume his pursuit of jurisprudence; but he continued the study of theology, which he had commenced at Bordeaux, and remained true to the Reformed Church. His co-religionists decided to petition the king to issue a decree, allowing the Reformed the free exercise of their religion, and Cappel was asked to plead their case. He succeeded, and the petition being granted, Cappel was appointed preacher at Meaux. Being obliged, on account of the troublesome times, to give up his pastorate, he went to Geneva, and thence to Sedan. In 1569 he accepted a call to Amsterdam, but he soon returned to Sedan. His next pastorate at Clermont was only of short duration. The massacre on St. Bartholomew's day obliged him again to take refuge at Sedan. The French Reformed sent him to Germany; and, after having acted as chaplain to the Reformed soldiers, he returned to Sedan, where he died, as preacher and theological professor, Jan. 6, 1586. His inaugural address is printed in Meursius's Athenae Batav. See Bertheau, in Herzog's Reel-Encyklop. s. v.; Hoeffer, Nouv. Bio. Générale, s. v. (B. F.)
CAPPANNA

Cappella, Simone, a Neapolitan painter, was born in 1591, and studied at Rome under Annibale Carracci. He painted sacred subjects with great success, and his pictures are quite numerous at his native place. He died in 1641.

Cappellanus (Fr. Capelain), Claudius, a French theologian, was born in the province of Maine, and lived in 1607. He became a member of the Sorbonne and doctor of theology. He was well versed in the Hebrew language, and claimed that the Greek text has been often perverted by the unfaithfulness or ignorance of the rabbins, citing in support of this opinion numerous passages from the ancient rabbinical works which differ from those of the modern Hebrew Bibles. He published, Morde Rabbinicum Infidem (Paris, 1607, 1638). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cappelli, Francesco (called Cassianemici), an Italian painter, was born at Sassuolo, in the duchy of Modena, and flourished from 1535 to 1586. He studied under Correggio, and resided chiefly at Bologna. There is a picture by him, representing The Virgin with Saints, in the church of San Sebastiano, at Sassuolo. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cappelli, Marco Antonio. See Cappella.

Cappellus, Johannes, a Calvinistic theologian whose nationality is not exactly known, lived in the middle of the 16th century. He wrote Encomium de Ultimo Christi Paschate, etc. (Amsterdam, 1644). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cappenberg, Adolph, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born in 1808 at Münster. Having studied theology there, as well as at Bonn and Tübingen, he received holy orders in 1828; was made doctor of theology in 1834, at Munich, and was appointed in the same year professor of church history and ecclesiastical law at the clerical seminary in Posen. In 1844 he was appointed theological professor at Münster, and he died there, Nov. 20, 1880. He wrote, Origines de Trinitate Doctrina (Münster, 1888); Des Fidei et Scientiae Christ. Ratione Mutuata (ibid. 1844); Ultrum Hussii Doctrinae Fuerit Heretica? (ibid. 1834). (B. F.)

Capper, Mary, an English minister of the Society of Friends, was born at Birmingham in 1755. Her parents were members of the Established Church, and educated her with great care. She joined the Society of Friends in her twenty-eighth year. In 1794 she received a certificate as a minister, in which capacity she labored effectively for thirty years, visiting different parts of England and Wales. She was simple and unassuming in her manner, yet her appeals were earnest and pathetic. She died at Birmingham, June 23, 1845. See (Lond.) Annual Monitor, 1846, p. 8.

Capper, Samuel, an English minister of the Society of Friends, was born in 1792, in London. Until his conversion, in his twelfth year, he was a very un promising child. He became a member of the Society at the age of sixteen he took the Domestic habit, and first taught metaphysics in his native place, then theology and the sacred Scriptures at Rieti and at Aquila. He was appointed inspector of his order at Ferrara, but left that place in 1851 for Venice. In 1866 he returned to Bologna, and died there, Jan. 2, 1861. He wrote, Instita super Compendium Theodopolii Instituti Alberti Magnus (Venice, 1588, 1590); Evangelistiae Formales in Summam Sancti Thomae (ibid. 1588); Tota Theologia Sancti Thomae Aquinatis in Compendium Redacta (ibid. 1587); Veritatis Auctus super Totam Legem Veterem, etc. (ibid. 1589); Praelectiones Sacrae curante D. Joanni Baptistae de Starno, 1613. He travelled through many parts of the country, holding meetings in the groves and under shades, that the poor might receive the Gospel. He died in Bristol, Aug. 29, 1852. See (Lond.) Annual Monitor, 1853, p. 65.

Cappidus, a Frieslander, a genealogist and theologian, who lived about 920, was surmised Staurismus, from the time of his birth. He wrote, Historiae de se, of the lives of saints Lebuin, Otger, Flechheim, and Odulph, as well as the genealogy of the sovereigns of Friesland. His MSS. were destroyed in the fire which consumed the library of Stavoren. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cappilatius Catellus was a Christian at Rome, A.D. 363.

Cappochi (Lat. Cappiocus), Niccolo, an Italian prelate, completed his studies at Perugia, and was very able in canonical law. He went to Avignon, where pope Clement VI appointed him cardinal in 1356. In 1356 he was sent to France with cardinal Talleyrand de Perigord, to effect a reconciliation between king John of France and Edward III of England, but was unsuccessful. Cappochi was again at Avignon at the consecration of Urban V, in 1362, and followed that pope to Rome. About this time he founded a college at Perugia, a grammar school at Narni, and a hospital dedicated to the Virgin of the Ovetanas, and some other institutions. He died at Montefiascone, July 26, 1368. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cappoci, Pietro, an Italian prelate, was made cardinal in 1244 by pope Innocent IV, whom he accompanied the following year to the Council of Lyons. In 1247 he assisted at the Diet of Frankfort, in which William of Holland was named as emperor. The election Cappochi was commissioned to maintain by arms the pretensions of William, and the interests of the court of Rome in Italy. He acquitted himself ably in this difficult task. On his return to Rome he established the church of Notre Dame de la Place. He died at Rome, May 28, 1259. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Capponi, Domenico Giuseppe, an Italian writer and theologian of the Dominican order, lived at Bologna in the early part of the 18th century. He edited, Johannis-Antoniis Flaminii Epistolae Familiariae (Bologna, 1744). Flaminio of Imola, one of the best writers of the 15th century, had written in Latin and Italian, in verse and in prose, upon hagiography, grammar, philosophy, literature, etc., and Capponi gives a complete list of his works. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Capponi, Orazio, an Italian prelate, was born at Florence. He was made bishop of Caprentia in July, 1566, and, at his own expense, rebuilt and embellished the principal edifices of this place. He also formed a mont-de-piété, and made several donations to the hospitals and to the community. Dec. 17, 1597, pope Clement VIII appointed him rector of the province of Venice. Capponi died at Rome, March 29, 1622. He published, Recueil des Ordonnances du Comitat Venetois (Avignon, 1681). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Capponi (Della Forretta), Serafino Annibale, an Italian theologian, was born at Bologna in 1586. He was aged six when he took the Dominican habit, and first taught metaphysics in his native place, then theology and the sacred Scriptures at Rieti and at Aquila. He was appointed inspector of his order at Ferrara, but left that place in 1581 for Venice. In 1606 he returned to Bologna, and died there, Jan. 2, 1614. He wrote, Studia super Compendium Theodopolii Instutitii Alberti Magni (Venice, 1588, 1590); Evangelistiarum Formales in Summam Sancti Thomae (ibid. 1588); Tota Theologia Sancti Thomae Aquinatis in Compendium Redacta (ibid. 1587); Veritatis Auctus super Totam Legem Veterem, etc. (ibid. 1589); Praelectiones Sacrae curante D. Joanni Baptistae de Starno, 1613. He travelled through many parts of the country, holding meetings in the groves and under shades, that the poor might receive the Gospel. He died in Bristol, Aug. 29, 1852. See (Lond.) Annual Monitor, 1853, p. 65.

Cappris (or Caprais). See CAPPRAIS.

Capranica, Domenico, an Italian ecclesiastic, was born at Capranica, near Palestrina, May 31, 1400. He completed his studies at Padua and Bologna, and became one of the most learned men of his time. Pope Martin V employed him in many important matters, gave him the government of Imola, and made him cardinal in 1426, but died without sending to Capranica the cap and ring, emblems of the office; therefore the other cardinals refused to admit him to the conclav.
Caprasius died about 430, and is commemorated June 1. His relics were left at Lérins. See Acta Sanctorum, June, i. 77; Cellier, Histoire des Auteurs Sacrés et Ecclésiastiques, viii, 489.

3. A monk of whom nothing is known except that he is commemorated in the French Lucensian calendar, as martyred at Castrum Golà, May 25.

There is another doubtful Caprasius mentioned by some authors as prior of Carmel. He is supposed to be the same as No. 1.

Capreole (Lat. Capreolus), Jean, a French Dominican, was born in Languedoc, and entered the monastery at Rodez. He became professor of theology at Paris in 1409, and died at Rodez, April 6, 1444. On account of his constant defence of the theology of Thomas Aquinas, he acquired the name of "the prince of the Thomists." He wrote, in 1433, a Commentary on the Four Books of the Master of the Sentences (Venice, 1494, 1514, 1519, and 1588); and Defensiones Theologicae S. Thomas Aquinatis (ibid. 1483); unless, says Cave, the two works are the same. See Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Caprédus, bishop of Carthage, is known in history in connection with the Council of Ephesus, A.D. 431. Unable to reach the council, because the country was ravaged by the Vandals, he sent a letter in defence of the Catholic position. Against Nestorius, of whom little is known, he was entered upon the acts of the council as from the "most revered metropolitan," the bishop of Carthage; and is still extant in Greek and Latin. There is also extant another letter by Capreolus on this controversy, in answer to inquiries addressed to him from Spain, by Vitalis as archbishop of Toledo. See De una Christi Veri Dei et Hominis Persona contra recentem Damnamunt Harresin Nestorii. A fragment of the letter which he addressed to Theodosius is extant. Tilmont (xii, 559) supposes Capreolus to have succeeded to the see of Carthage shortly before the death of Augustine, as the letter convoking the council seems to have been addressed to him and to Augustine. He is probably the "priest" in Africa in the time of Aspar, mentioned in the Book of Promises, ascribed to Prosper. The death of Capreolus is generally supposed to have occurred about A.D. 435. His burial was commemorated in the calendar of Carthage between July 21 and 30; the note of the date is lost. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v. For others of the same name, see CAPREOLE; CAPRÉOLI.

Caprett, Gaudentino Ercio, an Italian canonist, was born at Venice, Nov. 22, 1780. He taught theology at Florence, at Pavia, and finally at Parma, and died at the last-named place, Nov. 11, 1806. He wrote, Graphica III, Sueciae Res. (Parma, 1784). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Capricorn, a sign of the Zodiac, consisting of twenty-eight stars in the form of a goat. Some say Pan assumed this form when terrified at the giant Typhon, and was transferred by Jupiter to the heavens; while others assert that the constellation was the goat Amalthea, which nourished Jupiter.

Capri, (Lat. Caprinus), Giovanni Antonio, a Neapolitan theologian and philosopher, was born in Aquila in 1614. He belonged to the society of the Jesuits, and became professor of philosophy and belles-lettres in several houses of his order, as well as rector of various colleges. He published, under the pseudonym of Siderius Leo, the following: Apex Barberinæ Universæ Philosophiae, Motu Moteflacionis Terra;—Læux Philosophici, See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Capron, William Banfield, a Congregational minister and missionary, was born at Uxbridge, Mass., April 14, 1824. Having pursued a preliminary course at Phillips Academy, Andover, Mass., he graduated at Yale College in 1846, and became a private tutor at Baltimore, Md., for one year. Afterwards, for six years, he was principal of the Hopkins Grammar-school, in Hartford, Conn. In 1856 he graduated at the Andover Theological Seminary, and on Sept. 3 of that year he was ordained and consecrated an evangelist in Uxbridge. Under the auspices of the American Board for Foreign Missions he sailed for India Nov. 24 of the same year, and arrived at Madras, March 6, 1857. For sixteen years he labored in the vicinities of Madura, India. He visited America in 1872, returning to his mission-field in January, 1875; and died in Madura, Oct. 6, 1876. See "Caius," "Caius," p. 412.

Caprona, Arcangello d'A., an Italian Franciscan and preacher, was born at Palermo, Sicily. At the age of eighteen he entered a Capuchin convent, in spite of the opposition of his family. He preached with ability in the principal cities of Sicily, and founded, at Trapani, three brotherhoods of his order and a public hospital. He died in 1877, leaving Statuta et Lege menta pro Confraternitatis Domini Hospitalis Montis Pietatis et Misericordiae in Civitate Drepanum. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Capsa (Capsula, or Capsella) is a name applied to several kinds of receptacles for ecclesiastical use:

1. The vessel used to contain the unconsecrated ele ments. According to the direction of the Ordo Romæ nus I, c. 8, two acolytes bear in the procession before the pope, when about to celebrate, "capsas cum sanctis aper tas.

2. The vessel in which the reserved eucharist was carried from one place to another. The 17th canon of the Council of Orange enjoins, "cum capsas et calix offerantur in conscienciae Eucharistia eucharistia consecranda." Mabillon (Comm. Praw. in Ord. Rom. p. cxxxi) considers this to mean that, together with the capsas containing the sacred vessels and perhaps the eucharist, the chalice was also to be brought to the altar.

3. A repository or shrine for preserving the relics of saints. In the description of the altar built by St. Benedict at Aniane, we read that an opening was made in the back of it for inserting the "capsas" containing relics of saints (Acta Sanctorum, Feb. ii, 614).

Capsarium is the room in which the capsas containing relics were placed. Perpetuas of Tours (cir. A.D. 490), in his will, distinguishes a reliquary which he left to a friend from another gilded "theca" which was in his capsarium, and which he left to the Church.

Capsia, Heinrich, a German Lutheran theologian, was born at Gorden, near Rüthen, in the duchy of Holstein. After having pursued his studies at Wittenberg, he was elected, in 1679, pastor at Burg, where he remained until his death, which occurred May 9, 1706. He wrote, Disputatio de Ioue Diapio Thalassio (Wittenberg, 1699, 1687) — Disputatio de Mysterio Verbi (ibid. 1659) — Diap. de Popul. starum Consensu (ibid. 1660). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Capsula. See Capsa.

Capsum is a term for the naves of a church. Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. ii, 14) describes a certain church as having thirty-two windows in the sanctuary, twenty in the nave ("in capso").

Captator. A bequest dependent upon the secret will of another was, by the Roman law, termed captatores instituto, and was forbidden. In a less technical sense, however, the captator answered substantially to our legacy-hunter, and the scandal seems to have been rife in the early Church. A law of Valentinian, Valerian, and Gratian (A.D. 370), in the Theodosian code, enacted that clerics or professors of continence were not to frequent the houses of widows and female warders; nor should such persons receive aught from any woman with whom they might become connected under pretext of religion, by any kind of liberality, or by her last will. Every bequest so made was void, and was to be paid into the public exchequer. As respects the clergy, we find, by a law of Valentinian and Marcian (A.D. 450), inserted in Justinian's code, that widows, deaconesses, virgins dedicated to God, nuns, and women bearing any other name of religious honor or dignity, received no liberty to leave, by will or otherwise, any part of their fortune.

Captive, Christian Redemption of. The disasters which fell upon the Roman empire in the 4th and 5th centuries gave a special prominence to this as one of the forms of Christian love. Ambrose was charged by his Arian opponents with sacrilege for having melted down the eucharistic vessels of the church at Milan, in order to finance war against the Goths, and defended himself on the charge on the grounds that this was the highest and best use to which he could have applied them (De Offic. ii, 28). Augustine did the same at Hippo (Possidius, Vita, c. 24). Acacius, bishop of Amida, ransomed as many as seven thousand who had been taken prisoners by the Goths, B. H. vi, c. 1. In 396, a Roman provincial, bishop of Carthage, redeemed the Roman soldiers who had been carried off by Gereric after the capture of Rome (Victor Ulic. De persecut. Vandal. i, in the Bibl. Pat. vii, 691). It is worth noting that the truth that mercy is above sacrifice was formally embodied in ecclesiastical legislation. The code of Justinian (i, tit. 2, De Sacris, Ecles. 21), while forbidding the alienation of church vessels or vestments for any other purpose, distinctly permits them to be pledged or even sold for this or other like works of mercy or necessity.

Capua, Council of (Concilium Capuanum). This was held about the year 369, for the purpose of putting an end to the schism which divided the Church at Antioch. The emperor Theodosius granted it at the earnest prayer of the Western Christians. The circumstances of the case were as follows: After the death of Paulinus, Flavianus was, rightly, the sole bishop of Antioch, but Paulinus, before his death, had nominated Evagrius, his brother, and he, on the express injunction of the canons, was recognized by the party of Paulinus as bishop. None of the acts of the council have come down to us; but Ambrose speaks of it as having been numerous attended by bishops; he also says that the absence of Flavianus was the reason why the affair could not be finally decided in this council. However, in order to preserve the peace of the Church, they granted communion to all the eastern bishops who professed the Catholic faith, and intrusted to Theophilus of Alexandria and the other Egyptian bishops the decision of the differences between Flavia nus and the Evagrians. As they were biased by so prejudices, and had not joined the communion of either party. Several regulations were also made, one of which forbids to rebaptize or reordain any person; another forbids the translation of bishops. Moreover, in the council, Bonosus, bishop of Macedonia, was condemned, for saying that the blessed Virgin had had children and was married after our Lord's birth. See Later, Concill. ii, 1039.

Capua, Pietro di, an Italian prelate, a native of Amalfi, was made cardinal deacon in 1192 by pope Celestine III, who employed him in three consecutive legations, Naples, Lombardy, and Poland, where he reformed certain abuses. On his return to Italy he was arrested by marauders near Piacenza, and obliged to pay a ransom. Innocent III employed him to secure a truce between France and England, and to arrange other important matters. He was also legate of the crusade of 1268. After a short sojourn in the East he returned to Rome, where he died in 1209. See Hoefer, Nour. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Capuanaus was a presbyter at the Council of Siena, A.D. 385. See Labbe, Concil. i, 949.

Capuch (or Capuch) is a cap or hood (Fr. capuche) worn by a particular order of Franciscan friars, hence called Capuchins (q.v.). It is secured to the dress, and hangs, usually, down the back.

Capugno, Giovanni Giovanni di, an Italian theologist, a native of Venice, who lived in 1646, left among other works, Officium Hebdomadis Sanctae (Venice, 1686)—Deum & Animarum Suarum, etc. See Hoefer, Nour. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Capuña was a white hood, worn by the person to be baptized ("Si propriam capellam propera pauperem... non habeant... baptizandus cum capulla cum qua et alius fuerat baptizatus, baptizetur"—Martene, Thes. Aed. iv, 866 b, 1026 e).

Caput Exūrom was the convex upper portion of the liver, in animals, from the appearance of which, in the victims slain in sacrifice, the ancient Roman soothsayers drew their auguries. If that portion of the liver was unyielding or wanting, the omen was unfavorable; but if it was healthy and well-developed, the omen was favorable. See Divination.

Caput Jejunii is a Latin term for Ash-Wednesday (q.v.).

Caputu, Antonio, an Italian biographer of the Capuchin order, a native of Apulia, who lived in the middle of the 16th century. He flourished in 1540, and published Angelo Scotto Capuccino (Naples, 1650; Bologna, 1656)—La Vita Della S. Febromia Vergine (Venice, 1660). See Hoefer, Nour. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Caputum (1) is a university.hood. (2) The hood of a monastic habit. (3) The hood of a cope. (4) The hood of a cassock. It was the custom of certain religious orders in the Middle Ages to turn the hood of their habit over the back of the cassock when the latter was assumed. Hence, for convenience sake, a hood was sometimes attached to the back of the cassock, some examples of which still remain in Germany.

Car (Cart, Chariot, etc.). Herzog (Real-Encyclop. s. v. "Simmlider") mentions a sculpture in San Callisto, which contains a chariot without driver, with people on top of the horse, and with a flower in his hand. This, as he says, appears evidently intended as a symbol of the accomplished course of a life. In Bottari, tav. clx, two quadrigae are represented at the base of an arch (covered with paintings of ancient date) in the second cubiculum of the catacomb of St. Priscilla on the Sabatian Way. The charioteers carry palms and crowns in their hands, and the horses are decorated with palm-branches, or perhaps plumes; which connects the image of the chariot with St. Paul's figure of the Christian race (1 Cor. ix, 24, 2 Tim. iv, 7). In the catacomb of Prætextatus there is a powerful and striking representation of the chariot of Death, who is taking away a man as the victim in his car. See Horse.

Car (or Ker), Arsherni, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1607; was admitted minister at Glenbucket in 1618; transferred to Carracl in 1633; returned to Glenbucket in 1662, when he was in decrepit old age; and died before Feb. 26, 1663. See Faute Evir. Scotinorum, iii, 85.

Carabantes, Josep d'or, a Spanish theologian, was born in 1628. He was of the Capuchin order, and labored zealously for the spread of Christianity among the savages of America. He died in 1634, leaving, Arts Ad-

Caracalla was originally a garment peculiar to Gaul, and introduced into Roman use by M. Aurelius Antonius. Ecclesiastical writers (Bede, Hist. Eccl. lib. i, c. 7) speak of it as worn by clerics, and as corresponding in shape to the Jewish ephod. So says St. Eucherius of Lyons, about the 5th century, referring evidently to the genuine Gallic caracalla, which was a kind of short tunic with sleeves, and furnished with a hood. The caracalla introduced into use by M. Aurelius was, however, lengthened so as to reach nearly to the feet. From the reference to this garment by St. Jerome (Epist. 46, 49) it is likely that, in common with other garments for outdoor use, it was furnished with a hood.

Caracci, or Caracci, Agostino, an Italian painter and very eminent engraver, the cousin of Lodovico, and the elder brother of Annibale, was born at Bologna, Aug. 16, 1557. He became a pupil successively of Fontana and of Peruzzini; then visited Rome and studied the works of Correggio and Parmigianino. He afterwards went to Venice, where he distinguished himself as an engraver. He painted his celebrated picture of The Communion of St. Jerome for the Certosa at Bologna, and it is now in the gallery of the Louvre at Paris. He also painted an admirable picture of The Assumption of the Virgin, in the Church of San Salvatore at Bologna. His paintings are very numerous; the following are some of the other noted ones: Jacob—Watering the Flocks of Rachel; Eve Giving the Apple to Adam; The Good Samaritan; The Resurrection; The Virgin and Infant Giving the Keys to St. Peter. He died at Parma in 1601 or 1606. See Spooner, Bio. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nour. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Caracci, Annibale, an illustrious Bolognese painter, was born in 1560, and studied under his cousin Lodovico. His principal works are at Rome; they are, The Marriage at Cana, in the chapel of the Farnese palace; The Assumption, in the Madonna del Popolo, and another fine picture representing the body of Christ supported by the Virgin. He died at Rome in 1609. The following are some of his other noted works: The Virgin Stucking the Infant Jesus; The Virgin and Child, with St. John Presenting a Bird; St. Francis, with a Crucifix and a Skull; The Massacre of the Innocents. See Spooner, Bio. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nour. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Caracci, Antonio (called II Gobbo), an Italian, the son of Agostino, was born at Venice in 1558, and studied under his uncle Annibale. One of his best pictures is a frieze in an apartment of the palace of Monte-Cavallo. He painted several frescos, representing The Life of the Virgin and The Passion of Christ, in San Bartolomeo nell’Isola. He died at Rome in 1618.

Caracci, Francesco, a Bolognese painter, the brother of Agostino and Annibale, was born in 1559, and studied under his cousin Lodovico. He attempted to rival that great master, but, failing, left Bologna and went to Rome, where he died in 1622. While at Bologna, he painted St. Roch and the Virgin in the church of San Rocco, and, in Santa Maria Maggiore, The Death of the Virgin, with the Apostles. There are also a few prints by him.

Caracci, Lodovico, an illustrious Bolognese painter, was born in 1555, and was a pupil of P. Fontana. He visited Venice and Florence, studying the works of the artists. His chief works are at Bologna, and the most important are his fresco paintings in the Palazzi Maggiolani and Zambriani. There is also a wonderful picture by him in the church of
CARACCIOLI

San Domenico, of St. Dominic and St. Francis. He died at Bologna in 1619. He painted, Samson Overcoming the Lion; The Virgin and Infant, with Four Angels; The Holy Family, in which the Virgin is washing linen. See Spooner, Biographical History of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouvelle Biographie Générale, s. v.

Caracciolo, Antonio, an Italian theologian of the 17th century, entered the order of the Theatines, and distinguished himself by numerous works upon ecclesiastical history, among them, Synopsis Veterum Religionorum Rituum (Rome, 1610; Paris, 1628); Collectanea Vita Pauli, B Caetani et Scorciat Vitae (Cologne, 1628); Epistola de Oratio (Rome, 1628); Some of these works were published in the Acta Apostolicae Sedis (Naples, 1618).—Nomenclator et Propylae in Quatuor Antiquos Chronologos (ibid. 1626). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Caracciolo, Giovanni Antonio, an Italian prelate, was born at Melfi about the beginning of the 16th century. He entered into orders and obtained the abbotship of St. Victor in 1544, which he exchanged in 1551 for that of St. Frediano at Luni. He was friendly to the Reformation, and openly preached in its favor in 1561; by which he lost the esteem of the Catholics without gaining the Protestants, and was obliged to resign his bishopric, and go to Chateauneuf, upon the Loire, where he died in 1569. He wrote, Miroir de la Vraie Religion (Paris, 1560); —A Letter to the Most Christian Bishop of Bitonto, to excuse Montgomery in killing Henry II; this letter, dated at Paris, July 14, 1559, is found in the Epistolae Principum of Ruscelli:—an Epistle, published in 1561, without any indication of place, inserted in the Mémories de Condé. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Caracciolo, Metello, an Italian Jesuit and preacher, who died at Naples, Dec. 5, 1651, aged seventy-five years, wrote commentaries upon Isaiah, and some other works. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Caracciolo (or Caracciolo), Roberto, an Italian theologian (commonly called Robert de Liciio, from the city of Lecce, in the kingdom of Naples, where he was born, in 1425), while very young, embraced the religious life, and entered the Order of St. Francis, but, finding this rule too severe, entered the Conventionals. He became so celebrated as a preacher that he was called the second St. Paul. He was made bishop of Aquino in 1471, and pope Sixtus IV nominated him to the see of Lecce; but he died at Aquino, May 6, 1495, the investiture not having been effected. His Sermons on the life of St. John the Baptist were published (Rome, 1486, 8vo); also, Sermones de Quadra, seu Quadragesimae de Precciosa (Colonius, 1475, fol.); —Sermones de Tempore ac de Laudibus SS. (Naples, 1489); —Speculum Fidei Christianae (Venice, 1555); —Tractatus de Immortalitate Animalium (ibid. 1486, 4to); —De Eterno Beatitudine (ibid. eod. 4to); —De Hominis deorum natura (Hamburg, 1479); —De Incratione Christi contra errores Judæorum, and others. His complete Works were published at Lyons (1509, 3 vols. fol.). See Landon, Ecles. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Caracciolo (or Caracciolo), Francesco Maria, an Italian monk, founder of the order of Clerks Regular Minorite, in Naples in the 17th century, and was canonized in 1607 by Pius VII. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Caracciolo (or Caracciolo), Giovanni Battista (called Nattistelo), a Neapolitan painter, was born about 1580, and studied under F. Imperato, and afterwards under Caravaggio. He also studied the works of Annibale Caracci at Rome. On returning to Naples he painted altar pieces for the churches and published edifices of that city. He died in 1641. The best of his works are, St. Cecilia, in the church of Santa Maria degli Angeli; St. Antonio, in San Niccolo; St. Carlo, in Santa Agnello; The Death of the Virgin and The Assumption, in Santa Anna di Lombardi. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Caracciolo (or Caracciolo), Marino (or Martino), an Italian prelate, was born in 1469. At a very early age he came into the house of cardinal Ascanio Sforza of Milan, and took holy orders. In 1515 he attended the fifth Lateran synod as orator of the duke of Milan. Pope Leo X appointed him apostolic prothonotary, and finally took him entirely into his service. In 1519, Caracciolo went with papal legation to Germany, to congratulate the newly elected emperor, Charles V, at the same time urging upon the latter to make the papal measures against Luther more effective. He was also present at the coronation of Charles V at Aix-la-Chapelle (1520), and at the diet of Worms (1521). Caracciolo soon gained the confidence of the emperor, into whose service he now entered. In 1526, pope Paul III made him cardinal-deacon. When the duke of Milan died, the emperor intrusted the government of the duchy to Caracciolo. This prelate died at Milan, Jan. 28, 1538. See Victorelli, Additi. de Vitis et Res Gestas Rom. Pontif. (Rome, 1630); Weiss, in Wetzer u. Weeke's Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Caracciolo, Niccolò Misquino (or Moschino), inquisitor-general of Sicily, who died at Rome in 1389, was cardinal and legate a latere at Perugia after 1378. His main efforts were to heal the schism brought about by the election of Robert of Geneva against Urban VI, and he wrote, for this purpose, De Veris Consiliis Electorum et pontificum VI. He also wrote, Sanctorum Passionis: —Tractatus de Incarnatione Verbi. See Kaulen, in Wetzer u. Weeke's Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Caradoc, Saint, Priest, and Hermit, was a Welshman of Breconshire, who held an honorable post at the court of Rhesus, a Welsh prince. Falling into disgrace with the king, he withdrew to a solitude, was ordained priest, and then retired with some companions to the island of Ayr. The bishop of St. David's sent him to the monastery of St. Hismael, in Ross, or Pembroke; and, when Henry I of England conquered those parts, St. Caradoc and his fellow monks suffered bitter persecution, and died on Low Sunday, April 13, 1124, and was buried in the cathedral of St. David's. See Butler, April 13.

Caraffa, Antonio, an Italian theologian, born at Naples in 1588, was a distant relative of pope Paul IV, who caused him to be educated under William Sires. Upon the death of that pontiff he shared the disgrace of his family, and, stripped of all his titles, fled to Padua, where he gave himself up to study. Pius V recalled him to Rome, and in 1586 made him cardinal; and, shortly afterwards, headed the congregation established for the correction of the text of the Bible. He became, under Gregory XIII, apostolical librarian, and died Jan. 12, 1591, leaving a CatenisVeterumPatrumin Omnibus S. Scripturis (Cologne, 1572, 8vo). He also edited the Greek text of the Sept., given with the Notes and Scholia of Morinus (Rome, 1587, fol.); the Letters or Decretals of the Popes, from St. Clement to Gregory VII (8 vols.); and an edition of the Vulgate (Rome, 1590). Caraffa, Carlo (1), an Italian ecclesiastic, was born at Naples in 1561. At the age of sixteen he entered the order of the Jesuits, but was compelled by ill-health, at the end of five years, to leave it, and took to the profession of arms, which, after some years, he forsake. He then devoted himself to works of piety, making the hospital of Incurabili the chief scene of his labors; here he established a congregation under the rule of St. Francis. Lastly, he founded the Congrega-

Caraffa, Carlo (2), prince of La Roccella, an Italian theologian, became bishop of Aversa (1616), apostolic nuncio, and then legate in Germany, under Urban VIII. He died in 1644, leaving a book entitled Commentarium de Sacro Scriptura Restaurata (Cologne, 1639). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Caraffa, Vincente, an Italian theologian, brother of Carlo (1), was born at Naples in May, 1655. He became a Jesuit at sixteen years of age, and in 1654 was made general of his order. He died at Rome, June 8, 1649, leaving Theologia Mystica, etc. (Cologne, 1660, 9 parts, in 2 vols.). His Life was written by Dan. Belli (1701). See Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jocher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Toppi, Bibliotheca Napoletana; Alemagne, Bibliotheca Scriptorum Societatis Jesu; Wiener, Handbuch der Theol. i, 502. (B. P.)

Caraglio (Lat. Caralios), Giovanni Giacomo, an eminent Italian designer and engraver, was born at Verona or Parma about 1560, and studied at Rome under M. Cesarino. He flourished as an engraver on copper from 1526 to 1551, and died at Parma in 1571. His principal works are, The Virgin and Infant, under an orange tree; The Marriage of the Virgin; The Holy Family. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Caran, Bishop and Confessor, was a saint belonging to the east of Gaul, and may have been a Corseu (or Corinthus) who, according to Annals of Tighernach, died among the Picts, A.D. 669. He was honored at Premecht (or Premay), Aberdeenshire, and at Fetteresso, Kincardineshire; and must not be confounded with any of the seven Carins of the Irish calendar. He is commemorated Dec. 22.

Caranto. See CAIRRE (3).

Carate, Girolamo di, an Italian canon of the regular clerks of the order of the Oblates of St. Ambrose and of St. Borromeo, lived, probably at Milan, in the first part of the 17th century. He was professor of theology and of canon law, and afterwards apostolic prothonotary. He left, Teste delle Opere Esteriori, etc. (Milan, 1609):—De Juribus Feroxialibus, etc. His other works, which are very numerous, are only in MS. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carranus (a corruption of Cervanus), a boy-martyr at Rome, to whom Fulbert of Chartres writes a hymn, running on the name and the word "carus." Usuard, who calls him Carranus, and commemorates him May 26, says that he was beheaded at Chartres. His legend in the Brevarium Carthusianum makes him a deacon and evangelist of that place, murdered on his way to evangelize Paris, A.D. 98. This is, probably, mere romance. See Migne, Patrolog. cxxi, 349; Acta Sanctorum, May, vi, 740.

Caravaggio, Michael Angelo. See ANGELO, MICHAEL CARAVAGGIO.

Caravaggio, Polidoro Caldara da, an eminent Milanese painter, was born at Caravaggio in 1455, and was instructed by Raphael, who selected him to paint the friezes of his works in the Vatican. He appears to have revived the perfection of ancient art. He executed at Rome two subjects from the life of Mary Magdalene. Caravaggio was in the full tide of success when he determined to flee to France, in consequence of the sack of Rome by the Spaniards in 1527. He painted at Naples two pictures of St. Peter and St. Paul, in the church of Santa Maria della Grazia, and at Messina a celebrated picture of Christ Bearing the Cross. He was murdered by his servant, for his money, in 1564. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Caravoglia, Bartolommeo, a Piacentine painter, flourished about 1673, and probably studied under Guercino. His best production is The Lord's Supper, in the church of Corpus Domini, at Turin.

Carayon, Augustin, a French historian and Jesuit, was born March 31, 1813, and died May 15, 1874, at Poitiers. He published, Documents Inédits Concernant la Compagnie de Jésus (Poitiers, 1863-75, 18 vols.),—Biographie de la Compagnie de Jésus (1864),—Premières Missions des Jésuites au Canada (1864):—Bannissement des Jesuites de la Louisiane (1865). (B. P.)

Carbach, Georg Wolfgang, a learned German theologian, was born at Nuremberg, Aug. 23, 1658. After 1679 he completed his studies, both literary and theological, at the University of Altdorf, and became pastor at Nuremberg. He died March 7, 1727, at an unnamed place, leaving, Disputatio de Palmaria (Altdorf, 1680):—De Inncovatione Culta (Ibid. 1685); and in Joannis Fabricii Majoria Prolectiones Theologicae, p. 627-646. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carbeja, or Caravaja, Luis, an eminent Spanish painter, was born at Toledo in the year 1564, and studied under Vulpiano. He painted, for the Escorial, scenes from the life of the Virgin; also the altar-piece of the Infarnaria, representing The Nativity. There are several of his pictures in the churches of Madrid and Toledo. He died after 1613.

Carbeus. See PAULICLANS.

Carben, Victor von, a German convert from Judaism, was born in 1425. He was at first rabbi of the Jewish community of Cologne, but embraced Christianity in 1472, abandoning his wife and children, who refused to forsake the religion of their ancestors. The archbishop of Cologne, Hermann, proclaimed this conversion loudly, inscribing upon the outer gates of the city the words, "Victor olim Judæus." Carben was afterwards made priest, and combated, in various writings, the tenets of his earlier years. He died at Cologne, Feb. 2, 1516, leaving, Judæorum Errores et Mores (Cologne, 1509; Paris, 1511; also in German) :—Propagandaes Fidei Christianæ (without date); also in German, at Strasbourg, 1619, 1550). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Furst, Bibl. Jud. i, 142; Jocher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (C. B.); ibid. iii, 298; iv, 268 sq.; Kalkar, Israel und die Kirche, p. 89; Banage, Hist. of the Jews (Taylor's transl., p. 730); Adams, Hist. of the Jews, ii, 46 sq.; Gritz, Geschichte der Juden, ix, 77 sq. Carbo, Luigi di Costacchio, an Italian theologian, flourished about the year 1680, as professor of theology at Perugia and Venice, 1727. He wrote an Introduction to Theology, in six books; an abridgment of the Theology of St. Thomas (Cologne, 1608, etc.).

Carbolt, Alfred, an English Congregational minister, was born at Ipswich, May 7, 1821. He was trained for missionary work at Bedford, and was there ordained and sent out to the Western interior of the United States, where he labored from village to village for ten years. From 1861 to 1870 he labored at Madras, and then returned to England, where he remained two years for the benefit of his health. After two and a half more years' earnest work in India he again returned to England, and died there, Sept. 28, 1877. In disposition Mr. Carbolt was reserved, yet he was greatly loved and revered. He was sound in judgment and fearless in doing what he thought was right. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1878, p. 310.

Carbonari (Lat. carbonarii, i. e. charcoal-men) are a modern politico-religious sect in Italy, somewhat resembling the Freemasons in their practices, and professing to derive their first principles from the Scriptures. They meet in secret societies, and observe cer-tian mystical rites and signs. In 1829 the pope issued a bull of great length against the Carbonari, threatening excommunication against all who became members of the organization. Such secret societies, however, notwithstanding the anathema of the pope, are still in active operation in various parts of Italy.

Carboncino Giovanni, a Venetian painter, was a knight, and studied under Matteo Ponzone. He executed many works in Venice, some of which are in the churches of that city. Two of his best are St. Angelo, at the Carmini, and a Dead Christ, at San Antonio. He flourished in the latter part of the 17th and former part of the 18th centuries.

Carboni Francesco, an Italian controversialist, who lived in the latter half of the 17th century, published the Disputatio cum Judaeis of Contardus Ignetus, under the title, Flagellum Judaeorum super Judaeos Perfidiam, Prophetarum Jacults Labefactatum (Venice, 1672, 1677). The Piave del Ebraismo, without place or date, is also credited to him. See Hoefer, Nouve. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carboni Francesco, a Bolognese painter, studied under Tiarini. In San Martino, at Bologna, is The True Cross, with St. Teresa and other figures, by him; in San Paolo, The Entombment. He died in 1635.

Carbonnet (de la Mothe), Jeanne de, an Ursuline nun of the 17th century, at Bourg-en-Bresse (department of Ain), left memoirs of many pious women of her order, taken from the chronicles of the Ursulines and other sources (Bourg, 1854-59, 4 vols. 4to). This work contains the lives of seven hundred and fifty of these nuns, and thirty beneficiaries of the order, but is not considered trustworthy, because of its lack of critical exactness, dates, etc. See Landon, Ecoles. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carca, Samuel (called Ibn-Sennach, i. e. "son of a bush"), a Jewish rabbi of Castile, flourished about 1800-80. It is related, in the book Judah, that, at the reading of a nuptial contract in the synagogue, he publicly protested against its being created from the creation, and contended philosophically for the eternal existence of the world. This argument, though not novel as an Aristotelian speculation, yet, when propounded in open congregation, so alarmed the more orthodox party that, during the tumult which followed, R. Isaac Campanot cried out, "Why is the bush (alluding to his name) not burned?" The assembly then dragged the so-called blasphemer before the judges, who condemned him to be burned alive as an atheist. Three of his writings remain, Sacred Purification, בִּקָּעַת הַמָּכָרת, and The Fountain of Life, போஜ்ஜெக்க் கிருட்டம் 5, a super-commentary to Abar-Egra's commentary on the Pentateuch—Perfection of Beauty, உதுறுக்கொரிச்சு போஜ்ஜெக்க், a philosophical elucidation on Haggadoth and Midrashim. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud., i. 442; De Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. trans.), p. 287 sq.; Grätz, Gesch. d. Juden, vii, 27 sq.; Finn, Sephardim, p. 368. (B. P.)

Carcadis was bishop of Maxula, a province of Africa, at the Synod of Carthage, Feb. i, A.D. 484, and was afterwards banished to Corsica.

Carcaménos was one of the twelve "maternal" angels in the system of Justusin (q. v.).

Carcano (or Charcano). Michele, of Milan, was a monk of the order of Friars Minorite Observantines, celebrated as a preacher, who died in 1495 or 1490. He left, Sermonarium de Commandatione Venerabilis et Reproducuntis Venerabilis (Milan, 1495, 4to)—Quadrugencimale de Fide et de Articulis Fidelis, MS.—Quadrugencimale sine Sermonarium (Venice, 1476); and other books of sermons and discourses.

Carcat, Augustin, the younger, a French ascetic writer and hagiographer, a native of Berry, was provincial of the order of Reformed Augustines. He died in 1655, leaving, Vie de Saint Fere (Paris, 1629)—L'Excellence de l'Ecclésiastique Monastique (Poiziers, 1601). See Hoefer, Nouve. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carchedonius, a priest or bishop of Subesa, was rebuked and afterwards excused by Augustine. Ep. 62 (241), 63 (240).—Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Card, Henry, D.D., an English divine, was born in 1779, and died in 1844. He published some theological treatises (1829-26). See Alibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Card, Henry S., a Baptist minister, was born at Nelson, Madison Co., N. Y., Jan. 4, 1816. He was licensed to preach by the Erieville Baptist Church in 1840. Having pursued his theological studies at Hamilton College for two years, he became pastor of the Church in Clear Creek, Chautauqua Co., where he remained about three years, and afterwards was pastor of the Church in Colden, N. Y. for eight years. In his other pastorates were in Freedom, Watkins, and Lodi. He died in Watkins, July 23, 1873. See (N. Y.) Examiner and Chronicle. (J. C. S.)

Cardailiac, Jean, a French theologian, was born in the early part of the 14th century. He belonged to the noble family of Queray, which furnished to the Church so many illustrious prelates, among others, William of Cardailiac, Bishop of Cahors, in 1292. After having taught law in Toulouse, Jean Cardailiac became bishop of Orense in 1531, and of Braga in 1560. He was held in prison by Peter the Cruel from 1567 to 1589, but was appointed by pope Gregory XI patriarch of Alexandria and administrator of the Church of Rodes in 1571, and in 1573 perpetual administrator of the archbishopric of Toulouse. He died Oct. 7, 1590, leaving several books, preserved in the library of the Dominicans of Toulouse, among others, sermons for the Sabbaths and festivals of the year, various treatises on synodal conferences and the sacred orders, and a Psalterium on the Aims of the pope Clement IV: also one on that of Urban V, etc. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cardimus, a slave of Paulinus, addicted to buffonery and drinking, was sent to Amandus, under whose influence he reformed and became an ecclesiastic (Paulin. Ep. 17, 18, 24, 25).

Card-cloth (or Care-cloth) is a long piece of rich Indian silk, held over a bride and bridegroom at their marriage, during the Middle Ages. This rite obtains in Ireland, in the Tyrol, and in parts of Spain still.

Carden. The churches of Kirkwall, now Golspie, and of Loth, in Sutherlandshire, were dedicated to St. Carden, and the annual fair was St. Carden's; but the person thus honored seems to have been of only local note.

Carden, Byron Speed, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Kentucky. He was converted in early life, and in 1849 entered the Arkansas Conference, where he labored until 1884, when he was transferred to the Texas Conference. He died Jan. 16, 1882. Mr. Carden was a good and acceptable preacher. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1882, p. 413.

Cardenas, Bartolomé de, a Spanish painter of Portuguese origin, was born in 1547, and studied under Sanchez Coello, at Madrid. He painted the principal part of the cloister of the convent of Nuestra Señora...

Cardoso, Fernand, a Portuguese Jesuit, was born in the 16th century. He early went to Brazil to assist in the first missions of Brazil, but was on the point of retiring in 1583. Being, however, a man of high culture, he was called to the office of rector of the college of Rio de Janeiro, and afterwards became provincial of his order, which position he held in 1609. He is found mingling in the critical and Xilogr. (See Missal of Brazil down to 1618. M. Adolfo of Yarnham published a valuable work of this missionary traveller, Narrativa Epistol. de Una Vida e Missao Jesuítica, etc. (Lisbon, 1847). This work is written in charming style, and gives the details carefully. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cardinal is a term given to certain clerical officers in a cathedral or collegiate church. Such still exist at St. Paul's Cathedral, London, at Compostella, and in other continental churches. See Cardinal Altar.

Cardinal Altar means the high or principal altar; and from their attendance upon it two minor canons in some churches were called the senior and junior cardinals. Their duties were to take charge of the choir, to keep the vestments ready on Fridays, to act as rectors of the choir, to administer the sacraments, enjoin penances, hear confessions, bury the dead, and receive oblations.

Cardisco, Marco (called il Calabrese), a reputable painter of Calabria, flourished from 1508 to 1542, and probably studied under P. da Caravaggio. There is a picture by him, in the church of San Agostino at Naples, representing that saint disputing with the infidels. He also painted several other pictures, among which is a Dead Christ, with two lateral rays of St. Peter and St. Paul, in the chapel of the church of San Pietro ad Aram, at Naples. See Spiller, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Rosse, Gen. Biog. Dict. s. v.

Cardmaker, John, an English martyr, was prebendary of the church of Wells. He was apprehended in queen Mary's time, and put in prison in the Fleet, where Edward's laws being yet in force, he was examined and persuaded to recant, but again returned to his faith, and was a constant confessor and worthy martyr of Christ. He answered many of the articles brought against him by letter, most learnedly and substantially. He was burned at Tyburn, May 30, 1555. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, vii. 77.

Cardona, Juan Bautista, a Spanish antiquarian and theologian of the 16th century, was born at Valencia. He was canon of the cathedral there, and was named by Gregory XIII member of the commission charged with correcting the text of the fathers' writings. He had already restored from the MSS. more than eight hundred lectures of Leo the Great and of St. Hilary, when he died prematurely, in 1589. He had been bishop of Perpignan, of Vich, of Tortosa, and, for two years, commissary of the inquisition. He wrote, Oratio de Sancto Stephano, a discourse delivered before the pope in 1575.—Ex Encomiendi Historiarum Propria Nos- tisbus, dedicated to Gregory XIII (Rome, 1576)—De Regia Sancti Laurentii Bibliotheca Libellum. This book—containing also de Bibliothecis, extracted from Fulvius; de Vaticana, a collection of the papers of Onuphrius Pavinus; and de Dipthycha Commentarium—was published at Tarragona in 1587. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Rosse, Gen. Biog. Dict. s. v.

Cardoso, Isaac (originally Fernand) a brother of Abraham, a Jewish physician of Spain, was born in 1615. He practiced medicine at Yavnaim and Modrid. While professing Christianity, he was a convert of Fernando. After having openly professed Christianity, at Venice, he took the name of Isaac and settled in Verona, where he died about 1683.

The first of these works consists of ten chapters, in which the author expatiates on the privileges of the Jewish people, and refutes the calumnies which are commonly alleged against them. These privileges are, (1) the divi-en election; (2) the seal of circumcision; (3) the Sabbath;
(4) the sacred law; (5) the gift of prophecy; (6) the Holy Land, and the relation of the one to the other; (7) nationality; (8) divers virtuous characteristics; (9) separation.
The calumnies refuted relate to (1) false worship; (2) impurity; (3) blood-sucking; (4) vindictiveness against Christians; (5) proselytism-making; (6) disloyalty; (7) profi-tucity; (8) corrupting the text of the Holy Scriptures;
(9) seducing of nations; (10) murder of children.

Cardoso, Jorge, the celebrated Portuguese hagi-ographer, was born Dec. 31, 1606. He studied at first under the direction of Francisco de Macedo, and, having devoted himself to the ministerial life, he was ordained priest July 4, 1632. Some time after that he obtained a simple benefice, and was thus enabled to devote himself to literature. He travelled through the Peninsula in search of ecclesiastical traditions and local legends, which he embodied in his extensive work on the lives of Portuguese saints, entitled Agiologia Lucanino dos Santos e Varios Illustres em Virtude do Reino de Portugal e Suas Conquistas (Lisbon, 1651-1657). The court of Madrid, recognizing the merit of his undertaking, made him a present while he was in his present while he was also a canonicate was offered to him, which he would not accept without the consent of the king of Portugal.
Cardoso died Oct. 3, 1669. Among his other works there is a MS. entitled Santuarios de Portugal. See Cardoso, Miguel (later Abraham), a Jewish physician and writer of Spain, was born about 1630, being a descendant of the Maranos, or New Christians, in the Portuguese city Celorico. He studied medicine with his older brother Fernando. While the latter was given to his studies, Miguel spent his time in the dolce far niente, sat under the balconies of ladies, and amused them with his songs. He quitted Spain, probably with his brother, to keep Vice, and there they openly professed Judaism. Abraham Michael Cardoso, as he was now called, practiced medicine at Leghorn, but did not meet with success. When the bef of Tripolis was in search of a physician, the duke of Tuscany recom-manded Cardoso. But Cardoso having become a student of the Cabala and an adherent of the pseudo-Messiah Sabbatai Zebi (q. v.), he only saw visions and spoke of dreams, and, instead of attending to his profession, he preached and wrote in behalf of the pseudo-Messiah.

In the end, Cardoso was driven from Tripolis, and died in 1706. He wrote, 2םנמ in, a Cab-allistic apology of Sabbatians:—בר לא דמע, also in favor of Sabbatians:—קב דרגב, against the opoponents of the Cabala, etc. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, Carducci (Span. Carducho), Bartolomeo, an eminent Italian painter, was born at Florence in 1561. He studied under Frederico Zucchi, whom he assisted on the work of the great cupula at Florence; and, while quite young, he painted two pictures for the church of the Jesuits, representing The Annunciation and The Nativity. The work which, above all others, established his reputation in Spain, is The Descent from the Cross, in the church of San Felipe, at Madrid. He lived in Spain till 1632. SeeCourtesy, s. v.; Hoef, Nouv.

Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carducci, Vincente, a Florentine painter, the brother of Bartolomeo, was born in 1568, and was instructed by his brother. He completed the work begun by the latter for Philip III of Spain, adopting, instead of The Life of Charles V, The History of Achilles as the subject; and was made King's painter during the reign of that monarch, and also of Philip IV, by whom he was employed in many important works. He painted The Incarnation, in the convent of l'Encarnacion at Madrid; St. Antonio and The Angel's Warning to Joseph, in the convent del Rosario; and St. John Preaching, in the refectory of the Franciscans. He wrote a book on painting, printed at Madrid in 1633. He died in 1629.

Cardwell, Edward, D.D., a learned English divine and ecclesiastical historian, was born at Blackburn, in Lancashire, in 1787. He studied at Oxford University, became a fellow of Brasenose College in 1809, and a university examiner in 1814. He was appointed historiographer royal of Cambodia in 1825. He was whately as principal of St. Albans' Hall in 1831. He filled several prominent offices in the university, and was also private secretary to three successive chancellors. He died at Oxford, in May, 1863. Among his numerous works are an edition of Aristotle's Ethics, with notes; Lectures on the Canon of the Greek and Roman Odes (Oxford, 1802);—a students' edition of the Greek Testament:—a critical edition of the History of the Jewish War, by Josephus:—The Two Books of Common Prayer Compared (1838);—A History of Conferences and other Proceedings Connected with the Revising of the Book of Common Prayer (ibid. 1840, 1849).

Care, Thomas, A.M., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Harrison, Pa., July 10, 1832. He was converted in 1857, while a student at Dickinson College, and in 1859 entered the East Baltimore Conference.
In 1864 he was made professor of natural science at the Dickinson Seminary, Williamsport. He labored in the ministry as health permitted, with great zeal and fidelity, until his death, March 18, 1864. As a pastor, Mr. Care was solicitous and indefatigable; as a preacher, impressive, substantial, argumentative; as a friend, modest, frank, cheerful; as a Christian, exemplary. See Minis-tes of Annual Conferences, 1865, p. 12.

Careless, John, an English martyr, a weaver of Coventry, was cast into a filthy prison, where he remained two years. He was to be put to death by burning, for his faith in the Christian religion, but died in prison two days before the time fixed for his execution, and was buried in the fields, in a dunghill, in 1584.
See Fox, Acts and Monuments, viii, 779;—Careless, John, an English martyr, in A Calendar of the Martyrs, p. 99.

Carbone, Girolamo, an Italian theologian of the order of the Franciscans, was a native of Schio, in the vicinity of Vicenza, and lived in the latter part of the 17th century. He was lecturer on theology and controller of his order, and wrote, Dottrina de' Sacri Riti, etc.

Carcellus, a martyr with Primulus at Cesarea, in Cappadocia, is commemorated May 29. See also Ca-

Carne (plural Carnea) is a forty days fast, imposed by a bishop upon clergy or laity, or by an abbot upon monks. A MS. Penitential, quoted by Du Cange, speaks of fasting on bread and water, "quod in com-munem servitute carnis vocatur."—Smith, Dict. of Christian Antiquity, s. v.
CARENTIUS (or Corentinus), in early Christian history, was, (1) bishop of Cornouailles, Brittany; commemorated May 1. (2) Saint, bishop, and confessor, mentioned in the Antiquia to Usuard, Patrolog. Lat. cxxiii, May 18. It is uncertain whether or not he is the same with St. Corentinus. He is commemorated May 18.

Carera (Lat. Cerreria, or Caperruria), Alessandro, a jurisconsultus of Padua, was born in 1548, and died Aug. 20, 1626, leaving, among several treatises, one De Postestate Pontif. Rom. (Padua, 1599); and another De Laudibus (London, 1576).—Lambert, Dict. a. s.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Carey, Alice and Phoebe. See Cary.

Carey, Arthur, a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born near London, England, June 26, 1822. When he was eight years of age his family removed to New York city. In 1836 he joined the sophomore class of Columbia College, and graduated in 1839. In October of that year he entered the General Theological Seminary, M. Y., and graduated in 1842. He was admitted to the order of deacon, July 2, 1843. His ordination proceeded, however, under protest, as two of his examiners declared their conviction that he held views radically at variance with Protestantism. The ordination was subsequently the source of earnest debate, and called forth a large number of pamphlets. In September of the same year he was invited to become assistant pastor of the Church of the Annunciation, New York city, which he subsequently accepted. In December he was attacked by a violent fever; when he had somewhat recovered, he embarked with his father for Cuba, March 29, 1844, but died on shipboard, near Havana, April 4, following. See Sprague, Annales of the Amer. Pulpit, v. 799.

Carey, Charles Stokes, an English Congregational minister, was born in London, Sept. 17, 1828. He was religiously disposed by childhood, joined the Church in 1845, entered Hackney College in 1849 to prepare for the ministry, and was ordained at Basingbourne in 1853, where he remained three years. He afterwards preached successively at Harwich, Bungay, and Leytonstone, and died at the last-named place, June 8, 1875. Mr. Carey was an able, forcible, fluent, and thoroughly evangelical preacher. His sermons were well thought out, his extensive reading and retentive memory gave him much facility and illustration, and he was always prepared without notes. See ( Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1876, p. 322.

Carey, Edustace, an English Baptist, nephew of the Rev. Dr. William Carey, was born at Poulpurney, Northamptonshire, March 22, 1791, and baptized by Dr. Ryland. He studied at Bristol College, and, having offered himself for service in Baptist missions, was ordained in January, 1814, after which he sailed to India, and, with two others, founded the Calcutta mission as distinguished from the Serampore mission. His health failing, he returned to England in 1825, and was employed as the travelling agent of the Baptist Missionary Society. His chief literary work is the Life of his uncle, Dr. Carey. He died in London, July 19, 1855.

Carey, Joel, a German Reformed minister, was born June 1, 1814. His name first occurs in the minutes of the synod of Ohio as a licentiate of the Maumee classis. He was ordained in 1848, and labored as a missionary in Napoleon, O., up to the time of his death, Sept. 21, 1849. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church, iv. 494.

Carey, John, an Irish Methodist preacher, was born in 1797, at Clonmel. He was converted at fifteen, joined the Methodists, entered the ministry of the Irish Conference in 1809, and for forty years labored as a preacher of the Gospel with acceptance and success, when failing health led him to become a superannuary in 1854. He continued to toil as he had strength, and died at Droghea, March 2, 1874. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1874, p. 27.

Carey, Robert E., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born at Askill, Wilklin Co., Ala., February, 1846. He joined the Church in 1864, and in 1865 united with the Montgomery Conference. From that time to the close of his life, April 14, 1872, he filled the various appointments assigned him with zeal, efficiency, and success. See Minutes of Annual Conference of the M. E. Church South, 1872, p. 689.

Carey, Samuel, a Unitarian minister, was born at Newburyport, Mass., Nov. 24, 1785. He graduated at Harvard College in 1804, studied divinity at Cambridge for three years, and was invited to preach on probation in King’s Chapel, Boston, in November, 1808. He afterwards received a call, and, having accepted, was ordained and installed Jan. 1, 1809. Here he labored for six years, and died in 1815. He published a number of Discourses. See Sprague, Annales of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 424.

Carey, Walker, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in the Cherokee Nation, May 18, 1815. He was brought up in absolute ignorance, becoming a full-grown man without knowing how to read, a word in any language, or understanding anything about Christianity. At the age of twenty-five, through the instrumentality of a fellow-Cherokee, he was brought to Christ. He was immediately employed by missionaries as an interpreter. His power in the pulpit was soon felt, and he was licensed to preach, and in 1846 received into the Indian Mission Conference. By close application he soon learned to read the Bible, and in a few years became an able minister of the Gospel. He travelled nearly all the circuits in the Cherokee Nation, and some of them several times. He died March 15, 1869. Mr. Carey was earnest and laborious, social and influential, deeply pious and very successful. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1869, p. 375.

Carfrae, Patrick, D.D., a Scotch clergyman of Carniehaugh, was licensed to preach in 1765, presents to the living at Morham in 1766, and transferred to Dunbar in 1781. He resided in the Blackingwall and Bonnerhouses, and died there, March 4, 1822, aged eighty years. He was known as one of the most eloquent and accomplished preachers of his day, and in his later years, because he took to reading his sermons, he was designated "Paper Pate." His publications were, A Letter to Scotch Dissenters, which elicited a reply (Burnet's Works, vol. ii) — Account of Morham. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiianae, i. 341, 369–70.

Cargill, David, A.M., an English Wesleyan missionary, was converted under the Methodist ministry while pursuing his studies at the University of Aberdeen. In 1802 he was sent as a missionary to the Friendly Islands. In 1833 he and Mr. Cross commenced the Christianization of the Fiji cannibals of Lagouma. After a visit to England, Cargill was re-appointed to the Friendly group with a special view to employing his learning for the translation of the Scriptures into the native tongue. Expectations were blasted, however, by his sudden death on board the Brierly, April 24, 1843, only five months after his brave coadjutor, Cross, had laid down his weary life on a neighboring island. Cargill wrote a Life of his wife, Margaret, with Notices of the Progress of Christianity in Tonga and Fiji (Lond. 1858, 12mo). See Minutes of the British Conference, 1844, pp. 79, 80. (See also Cargill, Missions in Tonga and Fiji, etc. See Cross, William.)

Cargill, James Harvey, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Jackson, Susquehanna Co., Pa., in May, 1828. He was converted in 1839, began exhorting at the age of nineteen, graduated at Wyoming Seminary, and in 1852 was admitted into the Wyoming Conference, wherein he labored with distinguished ability and large success till his sudden death, July 4, 1855. Mr. Carrill was a young man of great promise in the ministry. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1855, p. 579.

Carrill, Thomas, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1610, was admitted to the living at Catterline in 1623, continued in November, 1622, and died before Sept. 4, 1678. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticae, iii, 577.

Carrillites is a name sometimes given to the Covenanters (q.v.) of Scotland, from Mr. Donald Carrill, one of their leading ministers.

Cariani, Giovanni, an Italian historical and portrait painter of great merit, was born at Bergamo, according to some authorities about 1510, but there are pictures by him dated 1514 and 1519. In the church of San Gottardo at Bergamo is his celebrated painting representing the Virgin and Infant in the Clouds. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Ross, Gen. Biog. Dict. s. v.

Carlatto. See Carlatto.

Caribert. See Caribert.

Carilefus (Calais, or Calais), Saint, was born of noble parents in the territory of Avrune, and entered a monastery at Misey, then under St. Maximinus. Not long after he went into retirement at Le Mans, and still later, obtaining from Childebert some land, he built thereon the monastery of St. Calais du Desert. He probably lived between 517 and 542. His remains were removed in 1171 and 1658. His day is July 21. There is a Carilefus, a prebendary of Annunsa, in Gaul, commemorated in Usuard's Martyrology on July 1.

Carilpianus, an early Christian martyr, is commemorated in Usuard's Martyrology on April 28.

Carillo, Alfonso (1), a Spanish prelate, was born at Seville in the last quarter of the 14th century. He was made cardinal in 1409 by the antipope Benedict XIII, and confirmed by pope Martin V in 1418, and by him sent as legate to Bologna. The Council of Basle afterwards appointed him legate to Avignon; but pope Eugenius IV had already sent the cardinal of Poix, and Carillo was obliged to return to Basle. He died there, March 14, 1424. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carillo (D'Aconha), Don Alfonso (2), a Spanish prelate, nephew of the foregoing, was born in Portugal in 1410. He accompanied his uncle to Basle, and on his return was appointed bishop of Siguenza, in 1446 archbishop of Toledo, and afterwards minister of state by Henry IV. This last position gave him a political influence which he used against the king of Castile, his patron. He ever sought to gratify personal ambition, rather than the good of his country. He was at last frustrated in his schemes, and spent his remaining days in a monastery which he had founded at Alexia de Henares. He died July 1, 1482. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Ross, Gen. Biog. Dict. s. v.

Carianus, Lucius (or Leoncini Charrinus), is named as the author of the Gaucio or Manichaeum Acta, which bore, according to Photius (Bibl. p. 114), the title τῶν ἀπόστολων περίβολον, and contained the Acts of Peter, John, Andrew, Thomas, and Paul. See Acta (for TIR APOTHEEK (Apocrypha)).

Carlo, an Egyptian of the 4th century, left his wife and two children in order to retire to a hermitage at Scete. His story, in which his son Zacharias prominently figures, may be seen in Coteler (Ecl. Gr. Mon. i, 444, 516; see also Tillemont, Mem. x, 76).

Carisi, Antonio, an Italian hagiographer and founder of an order, was a native of Cugitone, in the district of Milan, and lived in the middle of the 17th century. He was curate of Milan, where he founded a congregation of monks for the aid of the sick. He wrote, I Capelli della bella Penitente Riveriti (Milan, 1649);—Ritratto di Gesù, etc. (ibid. 1671);—Esercizi sopra i Dolori di Gesù Cristo (ibid. 1672). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carissimus, with Callistus, is commemorated as a martyr at Corinth in the old Roman martyrology on April 18.

Carites, Lus, are the priest-titular of a benefice entitled Caritas, who twice a day served the church of St. Stephen, in the city of Corbie and diocese of Amiens. This benefice seems to have originated in the charity and pious gifts of the abbots, monks, and citizens of Corbie, and others; and from this, its charitable foundation, and the aims which were distributed by the priests who held it, it seems to have derived its name. The Caritas began to be established about 1048, when the number of "Caritases" was forty; but in 1248 it was reduced to twenty. The benefice was in the gift of the abbots of Corbie, and the clergy who held it were for the most part curates of the city, canons of Fouilloy, or others of the neighboring clergy. The chief of them was called prepositus, or provost.

Caritan of Drumilara is commemorated as an Irish saint in the martyrologies on March 7, and Colgan (Acta Sanctorum, p. 510) gives an account of his life by identifying him with St. Cruithnech. As Dr. Reeves (Ad annum, p. 192 n.) says, however, "the connection of the two names extends no further than their initials."

Caritas (Charity), with her virgin sisters, Faith and Hope, and their mother, Wisdom, seem to have been real martyrs. Sophia, Pistis, Elpis, and Agape are said to have been mother and daughters who suffered in September, and whose relics were transferred to the church of St. Silvester. On the other hand, Sapientia, Spe, Fides, and Caritas are said by Azo to have suffered Aug. 1, and were buried on the Appian Way, in the crypt of St. Cecilia. The menology gives the ages of Faith, Hope, and Love as twelve, ten, and nine.

Caritans was bishop at the councils of Sirmium, A.D. 383, and Rome, A.D. 394.

Carkettick, Patrick, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1563. He went to the living at Soutra in 1599, was transferred to Stenton the same year, promoted to Hume in 1602, and died between April 6, 1616, and Feb. 20, 1617. See Fusi Eccles. Scoticae, i, 280, 386-7.

Carkettick, William, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1603. He was licensed to preach in 1605, although the Presbytery considered him too young and inexperienced; but he was admitted to the living at Stenton in 1606, and continued in 1608. There is no further record of him. See Fusi Eccles. Scoticae, i, 383.

Carl, Daniel, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in New York, May 26, 1834. He removed with his parents to Tennessee, in early childhood, experienced religion at the age of twelve, went to Texas in 1837 and engaged in school-teaching, and in 1839 entered the Mississippi Conference. On the formation of the Texas Conference he became a member of it, and as long as health permitted to labor with zealous frankness. Although his life was spent largely on the Western frontier, he maintained a genial, unsullied ministerial character. He died Aug. 16, 1865. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1865, p. 586.

Carlierius. See Charlier.
Carles, Lancelot de, a French prelate, was born at Bordeaux in the beginning of the 16th century. He was sent as a young man to the court of King Henry II, where he was intimately connected with the chancellor of the hospital, Ronsard, and with Joachim of Bellay. He died at Paris about 1570, leaving Epître Contenant le Proces Criminal fait à l'Encontre de la Reine Boullan d'Angleterre (Lyons, 1545) — Parcours en Vers français de l'Exécution de Salomon (1561);—a translation of Homer's Odyssey, is also attributed to him. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carleton, George J., a Baptist minister, was born in Boston in 1812. He studied for a time at Amherst College, and also at Brown University, but did not graduate. He was ordained pastor of the Church in Andover, Mass., and subsequently labored at Wilminton, Del., and Arlington, Mass. For ten years he was chaplain of the Massachusetts State Prison. He died at his residence in Newton Centre, Mass., Feb. 17, 1884. See The Watchman, Feb. 21, 1884. (J. C. S.)

Carley, Jesse, an English Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Daruvash, Sussex, in June, 1801. He was converted at the age of sixteen, and two years afterwards began his labors as a local preacher in London, where he remained several years. Subsequently he emigrated to New York, and two years after his arrival entered the New York Conference, in 1832. He died Nov. 1, 1887. Mr. Carley was humble, prudent, and simple in his manner. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1837, p. 578.

Carley, Robert, a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the diocese of Texas; entered the ministry while a resident of Missouri, in 1870; and in the following year became officiating minister of St. Andrew's Church, Seguin, Tex. He died Aug. 5, 1872. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1873, p. 133.

Caril, Denis, an Italian Capuchin missionary, was a native of Placentia. He was sent, in 1667, by the Propagation to Africa, with Michael Angelo Guattini de Reggio, and fourteen other Capuchins. On their arrival at Guinea they were appointed to the provinces of Bamba, Congo, and Danda. They baptized three thousand children, and made a good number of converts among the adults. Guattini, overcome by the effects of the hot climate, fatigue, and hunger, after recovering from a severe illness, returned to Europe. On reaching Bologna, he wrote a history of their journey and labors, entitled Il Miero Transportato in Venetia (Reggio, 1672; Bologna, 1674; Bassano, 1687). This was republished under another title, translated and published in English, and called Gesù nell'Africa, and died about 1680. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carlile, Stephen, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Arkansas about 1818. He professed religion in 1837; soon became class-leader and exhorter; received license to preach in 1839, and was admitted into the Arkansas Conference, in which he served until his death, April 14, 1869. Mr. Carlile filled the important offices of class-leader and exhorter in many of the most important appointments in that conference. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M.E. Church South, 1860, p. 283.

Carroll, Thomas, an English Wesleyan minister, entered the itinerancy in 1762, after having been local preacher for ten years. In 1798 he became supernumerary, and died in August, 1801. His sermons were sometimes characterized by an exuberance of wit. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1802.

Carling-Sunday is an English term for the fifth Sunday in Lent, or Passion Sunday, so called because of a certain sort of peas, termed "Carles," were made into cakes and eaten on that day. A rhyming couplet, designating the Sundays in Lent, after the first, is still commonly quoted in certain parts of England. The abbreviated words in it refer to portions of the old services of the Church:

"Ptd, Mid, and Miere, Carling, Paim, and Pasch-egg day."

Carlisle, Hugh, a Presbyterian minister, was probably a native of Ireland, and was admitted into the New Castle Presbytery, Penn., before September, 1735. At this time Newton and Plumstead, in Buck's Co., secured his services, and he joined the Philadelphia Presbytery in 1736. He was employed the following year to supply Amwell and Bethlehem, in Penn. In 1738 he went into the bounds of Lewes Presbytery, Del., and was still a member in 1742; later his name is not seen. See Webster, Hist. of the Presb. Church in America.

Carlisle, John, an Irish Wesleyan minister, was born near Lisburn, March 17, 1800. He was reared by Presbyterian parents, but converted under the Methodist preaching, and joined the Primitive Methodist and Dissenting Societies. He was for some time a local preacher, and entered the conference in 1832. In this relation he continued for fifty years. He retired from the active work in 1874, but continued to do what he could for the Master until his death, in Belfast, June 26, 1882. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1873, p. 41.

Carlisle, Simon, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born Jan. 15, 1778. He was converted in 1798; and in 1790 entered the Tennessee Conference. In 1794 he was dropped on a doubtful charge of improper conduct, which disgraced him with uncommon Christian patience and forbearance for several years. In 1804 he removed to the banks of the Cumberland River, where he maintained an unbroken character and labored in the capacity of a local preacher for thirty years. In 1834 he again entered the itinerant ranks, and served the Church zealously until his death, Nov. 24, 1839. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1840, p. 56.

Carlisle, Thomas, an English Congregational minister, was born at Enfield, Cheshire, Ireland, Aug. 4, 1838. He joined the Methodist New Connection at the age of fourteen, and in his nineteenth year was called into the regular ministry. After laboring three years, he was allowed, at his own request, a classical and theological course at London, under the tuition of the Rev. William Cooke, D.D. Leaving London, he labored successively at Liverpool, Bolton, and Guernsey. Preferring a settled pastorate to the itinerancy, Mr. Carlisle offered his services to the Congregational body, and in 1869 became pastor of the Church at Plaistow. Here his fervent and eloquent ministry, his amiable disposition, and diligence in pastoral duties were rapid in increasing the Church and extending his influence, when he died, June 22, 1870. Mr. Carlisle had a naturally fertile mind, which became well furnished and disciplined by study. His ministry was fervent and eloquent; crowds were attracted by his preaching. See (Loud.) Cong. Year-book, 1871, p. 307.

Carlcock, Jacob G., a Cumberland Presbyterian minister, was born in Overton, Tenn., Sept. 30, 1821. He was born in a Presbyterian family, and from boyhood maintained an irreproachable character. As a minister he was energetic and faithful in all of his labors, which were within the bounds of the Sparta Presbytery. He died at Livingston, Tenn., Oct. 19, 1860. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1862, p. 284.

Carlcock, Moses, a Baptist minister, was born in Wilson County, Tenn., Sept. 5, 1828. He united with CARLoman was the brother of king Pepin, and son of Charlemagne. On the death of his father he succeded to the government of Austrasia, Thuringia, Bavaria, and the country of the Alemanni, or Germans. In 742 he assembled a council at some place (name unknown) in Germany, founded the celebrated monastery of Fulda, endowed other religious houses, and finally resigned his kingdom, and became a monk in a convent, which he had built in honor of St. Silvester, on Mount Sorace, near Rome. Thence he went to Monte Cassino, where he obtained no higher office than that of assistant cook. He was sent into France, by his ab-obot, on business, and died at Vienne in 755. He is by some esteemed as a saint (Balliet, Aug. 17). See Lan-

Carlini, Carlo, a Milanese painter, was born near Cornuda, and instructed by Giovanni Guaglia. He died in 1775. Little is known of him as a painter, but he executed the following engravings, mostly original: The Conception of the Virgin; The Holy Family, with St. John Kissing the Foot of Jesus; The Death of a Saint.

Carlini, Giovanni Andrea (1), a reputable Genoese painter, was born in 1590, and studied under Sorri and Passagnani at Florence, where he became an able fresco-painter. He assisted his brother in the great fresco work in the Cathedral of the Guastato, at Genoa, and was invited to Rome to paint the ceiling of the Church of the Theatines, which he did not live to finish. He died in 1636. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carlini, Giovanni Andrea (2), a Genoese painter, the son of Giovanni Battista, was born in 1599, and studied with his father a few years, after which he went to Venice and remained some time, and then returned to Genoa. Some of his pictures are at Rome, in the different churches. His earlier ones are at Perugia, and The Life of St. Feliciano is in the church of that saint at Spoleto. He died in 1637. See Spooner, Biog. Hist.
of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale,
s. v.

Carlini, Giovanni Battista, an eminent Genoese painter, was born in 1594, and studied under Passagnani. He executed several great works at Genoa, and in connection with his brother, the principal of which were the fresco paintings in the three naves of the Cathedral of the Guastato. In the principal nave are:
The Adoration of the Magi; The Entrance of Christ into Jerusalem; The Resurrection; The Ascension; The Descent of the Holy Ghost; and The Assumption. For the same church he also painted The Presentation in the Temple, and The Blessing of the Shepherds by the Hangman (1757) — Four single Sermons — A Biography (1760). — The Prologue to Hermius and Es-piria (1754); and other works. See Fasti Eccles. Scolonia, i. 287, 288; Christian Observer, 1861, p. 245.

Carlyle, David, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in County Down, Ireland, in 1850. He was converted in 1873; licensed to preach in the Moravian Church in 1877, and sailed to America as a missionary;
but not finding favor with the church, he withdrew himself with the Methodist Episcopal Church, and, joining the South Kansas Conference in March, 1873, was stationed on Lyons Circuit. He rallied the people about him, built a parsonage, and was progressing finely with his work when he was smitten with malarial fever, and died in 1874. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1880, p. 55.

Carlyle, John, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree from the Edinburgh University in 1837; was called to the living at Dalton in 1702, and ordained in 1703; continued in 1710, and afterwards resigned his charge. He was curate to James Carlyle, merchant, Glasgow, in 1729 and 1720, after which time no record of him is found. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, i. 645.
CARLYLE, Joseph Dacre, an English divine, was born June 4, 1758. Of the earlier part of his life we have no record. At the time of his decease he was vicar of Newcastleton, and rector of Carlisle. Professor of Arabic in the University of Cambridge, and chaplain to the bishop of Durham. Mr. Carlyle was a man of eminent abilities and learning, greatly esteemed and respected. He died April 12, 1804. See (Lond.) Christian Observer, 1804, p. 256; Allibone, Dict. of Brt. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Carlyle, William, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, descended from the Bridskirk family, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1715. He was tutor to the sons of Mr. Hay, and afterwards chaplain in the family of lord Elibank; appointed minister at Cummertrees in 1720, and ordained; translated to Lochmaben in 1724; but the admission was set aside by the General Assembly, and he was transferred to Prestonpans the same year. He died March 8, 1765, aged seventy-five years. He was a highly popular preacher, orthodox and pious, but had a great relish for amusement. He published a sermon preached at the opening of the synod in 1748. See Fasti Eccles. Scotsiani, i, 552, 553, 615.

Carma (or Carma), in ancient pagan mythology, was the goddess who presided over the vital parts, and gave health and vigor. Some claim that she was the wife of Janus. The Greeks sacrificed to her on June 1, with potage of beans, meal, and bacon. She is also called Dea Carmina, or The Goddess of the Hinge, because, says Ovid, by her influence she opens what is shut, and shuts what is open.

Carmagnole, André, a French monk, was born at Coignac, March 9, 1619. He entered the order of the Oratory at Aix Jan. 27, 1637, and taught belles-lettres at Marseilles and at Beaufort. He was ordained priest March 19, 1643, and became superior of the Oratory of Beaufort in 1649; shortly after he was elected theologian of the chapter and superior of the hospital. He filled these offices for twenty years with much zeal and piety, and in 1669 was appointed governor of the Oratory of Rouen. Finally he became superior-general of the convent of St. Honoré at Paris, and died Dec. 5, 1688, leaving Recueil des Statuts Constitutifs de l'Ordre de l'Oratoire (Paris, 1684). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carmen, Thomas, an English martyr, was one of three burned at Norwich, May 19, 1548, for their truthful testimony. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, viii, 462.

Carmathians were a heretical sect of Mohammedans, named from their spear Carmath (so called from being born at Hamadan-Carmath, a village near Cufah), a man of austere life, who flourished about the close of the 9th century. He inculcated the duty of praying fifty times a day, and his followers were obliged to neglect their worldly vocations and give themselves almost exclusively to a life of devotion. They were not bound by the creed and ceremonies of the Mussulmans, and professed that the angels were the guides of all their actions. He enforced upon his followers an inviolable secrecy as to the doctrines which he taught. They paid great respect to the Imam, or chief of their sect, laying aside a fifth of their substance for his benefit, and holding themselves at the sign of the cross. Thus, they were under the dominion of belief and fidelity to him was denoted by that command which forbids fornication. They increased rapidly at first, through the zeal and sanctity of their founder, who chose from among his most zealous followers twelve apostles, who were to exercise special authority over the others. He was soon pursued by the caliph, and imprisoned, but finally escaped. The sect flourished for a time, but, in the absence of their leader, it dwindled away, and is no longer in existence. Carmel of Judea. We extract some additional particulars respecting this place from Robinson's Researches, ii, 197 sq.

"The principal ruins are on the level area to the west, and consist of fragments of walls, massive foundations, and heaps of hewn stones. The castle is a curious structure: it occupies a little eminence in the centre of the town; its form is quadrangular, sixty-two feet by forty feet, and the walls are ten feet high. The exterior is rough, the interior ancient; and has on the northern and western sides a sloping buttark, like the citadel in Jerusalem. It seems to have had a subterranean communication with the round tower adjacent. One of the ruined churches, about a quarter of a mile south of the castle, measures one hundred and fifty-six feet in length by about fifty feet in breadth. On the east was a chapel with a portico, while attached to it on the west was a large building, probably the episcopal residence. On the south is a square reservoir sunk in the rock. Most of the stones of the ruins were only thought of when hewn, and it has been worn away in the rock. In the western part are the remains of a smaller church, surrounded by those of very many houses. Here also is an open passage leading down into a cavern, apparently natural. A somewhat similar but artificial cave, about twenty feet square, is seen just east of the castle. The bottom of the amphitheatre is a beautiful grassplot. The well for the pool is brought by an underground channel, first to a small basin in the rocks, and then five or six rods further to the reservoir. There is no running water in the valley."

CARMEL, Monastery of. We give a fuller description of this, one of the chief conventual establishments of Palestine, from Conder, Tent Work, ii, 173 sq.

"Carmel has been a sacred mountain from the time of its earliest appearance in history. Elijah himself repaired the altar of the Lord that was broken down" (1 Kings xvii, 19), from which we infer that a sacred place, or Makom, had existed on the summit of the mountain at an earlier period, though, according to the Talmud, such an altar was never lawful after the building of the Temple at Jerusalem. From Tacitus we learn that Vesuvius visited a place on Carmel, sacred to the deity of the mountain, but without either statue or altar, and even now the Druses hold the site at El-Mahrak in reverence as a sacred place.

"In the early Christian period the memory of Elijah consecrated Carmel, and it became a favorite resort of hermits, to whom, in A.D. 412, John, the forty-second bishop of Jerusalem, gave a rule of life. In 1188, after Jerusalem had been taken by the Crusaders, a church was given over to the monks of El-Illah, and in 1299 a monastery of St. Margaret or St. Brocardus was built in a steep gorge south of the promontory. We visited from Hassa its ruins, with a cave containing sedilia for the monks and an upper open story, a spring with sedilia beside it, and below, at the opening of the valley, a second spring, and a garden of fruit trees, pomegranates, apricots, and figs. The lower spring was called after Elijah, Monastery of Mount Carmel.

and the title still remains in the corrupted form El-Helweh ('the snake'), applied to the stream from it. A tradition exists that Elijah turned the fruits of the garden to stone, and the huge geodes in the white chalk of the valley are shown as the petrified fruit. This monastery was sacked by the Saracens in 1258, the monks were massacred and thrown into a rock quarry, and the lower spring, and hence the place is still called 'the Valley of Martyrs.'

In 1660 St. Simon Stock, a Kentish man, became general of the Carmelites. He is said to have received from the Virgin the scapular or distinctive tabard worn by the monks of this order; for sixteen years he lived in a cave on Carmel, and was visited by St. Louis during his stay in Palestine. The monastery of St. Bertoldo was built round this cave, and Simon Stock is buried there. The slope northwest of the present building, under the lighthouse, near the chapel containing the cave of Simon Stock, in 1291, however, the Saracens fell upon the monks while chanting the 'Salve Regina,' and massacred them all.

The history of the two subsequent monasteries gives a good example of that energy and perseverance which once formed the main characteristics of the Church of Rome. In 1680 the order of Carmelites was extinct in Palestine, when a certain father Prospero, of the monastery of Biscagia, near Genoa, was ordered by his general to proceed with his monks to Rome—probably he was found to be a dangerous man at home, for his history bears witness to his ambitious and energetic character. He got no farther than Carmel, where he left his companions and returned to Rome to obtain leave from the Propaganda to establish a missionary hospice on the mountain. In a second journey he obtained from the pope the title of Prior for himself and his successors, and, in 1851, he bought the land round the Oratorio of Elijah, where the present monastery stands, and round the cave called 'School of the Prophets' (now El-Khadr) at the foot of the promontory. He erected churches in both places, but a Moslem dervish succeeded in establishing himself at the latter place, and in 1835 the Moslems took it by force and made it a mosque. Quarrels and persecutions followed; in 1839 two robbers stabbed father Prospero and tied him to a tree. Soon after he died, and was buried in the upper chapel. In 1761 the famous Abbot of Amr had already made himself lord of Acra and king of Galilee; he despoiled the monastery, and in 1761 ordered its destruction, on the plea that it was in a dangerous position, on the slope of the hill. In 1775 he was beheaded at Acre, and his son Aly in revenge massacred all the monks.

In 1799 the sick of Napoleon's army were sheltered in the monastery, but, on his retreat, they were all killed by the Moslems. A pyramid in the front garden of the monastery marks the grave where their bones were afterwards laid by the monks. In 1821, by order of the pasha of Acre, the monastery was destroyed, and the new monks arriving from Europe saw it in flames on the hill-top. Warned by the natives not to land, they returned to Europe, but three of them came back in 1829—Fra Gianbattista of Frascati, Fra Matteo of Philippolis, and Fra Giusto of Naples. They built the present monastery from a design by the first named, and so strong has it been made, with high walls and anapse which affords flank protection on the outside, where alone being in other words, there is a ditch, that the monks need scarcely fear further massacres. In 1849 other monks arrived. In 1852 He Matteo died, in extreme old age, the last survivor of three founders.

CARMEL, MOUNT. The prominence of this range both in the geography of Palestine and the history of the Bible, justifies a few additional particulars, which we gather from Conder, Tent Work, i, 168 sq.

'Carment is best described as a triangular block of mountains, the apex being the prominent peak of Carmel. While the Carmeltonic monastery stands on the watershed which runs south-east from this point for twelve miles, to the Maharak or place of burning, a peak rises 3,000 feet above the winter, south of which lies Wady el-Milb, and above that valley a large volcanic upheaval near the ancient city of Ugarit (ancient Ushna). An upheaval of such a nature also exists farther west, near Aksum. The highest point of the mountain is 1,740 feet above the sea at the Brue village of Efori. The peak of Maharak is only 1,500 feet high, and the promontory by the monument is 500 feet high, but the slopes of the shed is gradual. Long spars run out westward from this ridge and fill up the triangle, their western extremities having steep slopes above a narrow plain along the sea-coast. In the valleys among them are two fine springs, and others similar. The north-eastern declivity of the ridge is extremely steep, and fine cliffs occur in places. At the foot of the mountain are numerous springs feeding the Kishon, which runs beneath, gradually diverging northwards. The little town of Haifa nestles under the promontory, by which it is sheltered from the south-west wind, its bay forming the best harbor on the coast. On the north side of the bay is St. Jean d'Acre, twelve miles along the curve of the shore from Haifa. On the narrow plain between Carmel and the sea there are also many places of interest. Sycamore, Gehouf Horsemu, Calamoun, Elijah's Fountain, the Crusading Capernaum, and the strong and beautiful Château Pelerin, with its little advanced port of Le Detroit. On Carmel itself is a ruined synagoge, and on the south of the range, beneath the inland cliffs, are the fine springs feeding the Crocodile river.

"Carmel, 'the place of thickets,' was at one time cultivated, as shown by the rock wine-presses among its copes. In 1837 it had many villages on its slopes, but these were ruthlessly destroyed by Ibrahim Pacha, and only two now remain — Ela, on the main ridge, Ed-Dalleh, on a high spur; both are inhabited by the mountaine-loving Druzes, and are remarkable for their race of fine, handsome men and beautiful women, some with flaxen, curly hair and blue eyes. The whole mountain is covered thickly with brushwood, mastic, Hawthorn, the Spurge Laurel, and, on the top, dwarf pines. The luxuriance of the vegetation, rolling down the valleys between the steep gray and rusty cliffs like a dark curtain, attests the richness of the red soil, and the fine mountain air makes Carmel the healthiest district in Palestine. Among the thickets game abounds — the Nixor or hunting-leopard, wild pigs, gazelles, and fallow deer; partridges and other birds are seen continually in riding about the mountain. To this known fauna we were able to make an important addition. From natives of Haifa we learned that a kind of deer called Yahmăr was to be found on Carmel, and, offering a reward, we procured from some of the Arab charcoal-burners a specimen, which resembled the English roebuck." (See cut on p. 806.)

Carmel (Notre-Dame-du-mont), Order of. This was a military order of knights hospitaliers, founded by Henry IV of France. The knights were required to be one hundred French gentlemen, who in time of war were placed close to the royal person. Their collar was a tawny ribbon, from which was suspended a cross of gold, engraved with a figure of the blessed Virgin was united to that of St. Lazarus of Jerusalem in 1608.

Carmel, Michelangelo (originally Zeno), a Greek and Hebrew scholar of Italy, of the order of the Minor Friars of St. Francis, was born at Cittadella, in the territory of Vicenza, Sept. 27, 1706. He studied first under the direction of the secular priests, and afterwards pursued theology and philosophy at Verona, Padua, Rome, and Udine. In 1744 he was appointed professor of Oriental languages at the University of Padua, and member of the Academy dei Ricovrati. In the latter part of his life he was made commissioned visitor of his order for the province of Rome. He died at Padua, Dec. 15, 1766, leaving many historical and other works, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carmélus, in Phcenician mythology, was a deity worshipped on Mount Carmel, without a temple or a statue. He, however, had an altar and a celebrated oracle there, whose priests first prophesied the universal role of Vespasian, from an inspection of the intestines of animals.
Carmenæ. See Carmenæ.

Carment, David, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, son of a schoolmaster, was himself schoolmaster at Kincardine in 1789, afterwards at Skye, and recommended for the mission at Roay and Halkirk. He became assistant minister at Croy; was elected to the charge at the Gaelic chapel in Glasgow in 1810, and ordained; but resigned the charge in 1822, and removed to Rosskene. He had a new church built in 1832; joined the Free Secession in 1843; and died May 26, 1856, aged eighty-three years. He was a ready and humorous speaker in Church courts. His son James was minister of the Free Church, Comrie.

See Fusi Eccles. Scoticae, ii, 323; iii, 34.

Carmenta, in Roman mythology, was originally the same as Carmen (q. v.). She had a temple at the foot of the Capitolia Hill, and altars near the Carmentalian door. In the later endeavor of the Romans to mingle their own mythology with that of the Greeks, Carmenta was affirmed to be a certain nymph from Arcadia, who journeyed with her son Evander to Italy.

Carmentalia, in Roman mythology, was the festival celebrated in honor of Carmen (q. v.) on Jan. 11 and 15, at which the goddess was proclaimed as Antevorta and Postvorta; names which related to her gift of seeing the past and the future.

Carmichael, Alexander, A.M., a Scotch clergyman (son of the minister at Markinch), took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1860; was licensed to preach in 1664, and admitted minister at Pettinain the same year. He was deposed for adopting views antagonistic to episcopacy, in 1667, and joined the Presbyterian; was cited before the privy council in 1672; went to London, and founded in London Wall one of the earliest congregations of Scottish Presbyterians in that city. He died in July, 1677, aged about thirty-eight years. Shortly afterwards appeared a small work of his, entitled Sin in Believers. See Wilson, Dissecting Churches, ii, 463, 464; Fusi Eccles. Scoticae, ii, 331, 332.

Carmichael, David, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1744; became for a time preacher at Norristown Chapel of Ease; was presented to the living at Pettinain in 1760, and ordained in 1761. He died April 4, 1779. See Fusi Eccles. Scoticae, ii, 332.

Carmichael, Frederick (1), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, was presented to the living at Kenneway in 1627. He was a member of the General Assembly in 1628, was transferred to Markinch in 1640, and confirmed in 1641; a member of the Committees of Assembly in 1643 to 1645, 1647 to 1649; also on the commission for visiting the University of St. Andrews in 1648, and a member of the assembly in 1650. He died May 3, 1667, aged about seventy years, leaving his sons John and Alexander in the ministry. See Fusi Eccles. Scoticae, ii, 540, 543.

Carmichael, Frederick (2), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the Glasgow University in 1729, where his father was professor of moral philosophy. He taught in the humanity class there during the illness of professor Rope, 1726–28. On the death of his father, in 1729, he was supported as candidate for his chair. He was licensed to preach in 1733; appointed to the living at Monimail in 1736; ordained in 1737; transferred to Inveresk in 1741; presented to the Grevines in 1747; and died Oct. 17, 1751, aged forty-two years. He published Christian Zeal, a sermon (1758); and a volume of Sermons on Various Important Subjects (ed.). See Fasti Eccles. Scotiacae, i, 70, 297; ii, 505.

Carmichael, George, a Scotch prelate, was of the family of that name, in Lanarkshire, and was elected bishop of Glasgow in 1563, and consecrated in the same year. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 255.

Carmichael, George Oliver, a Methodist Episcopal bishop, was born in Cumberland, Sullivan Co., N. Y., Oct. 31, 1833. He was converted at the age of seventeen; received license to preach in 1856; in 1857 was admitted into the New Jersey Conference, and, being on appointment to Spanish Fork, from that time attended the Newark Conference. Though his early educational advantages were very limited, he became an able and acceptable preacher, from his lifelong studious habits. He died March 3, 1872. Mr. Carmichael was a man of sterling qualities of mind and heart, methodical, skilful, faithful, devoted, and successful. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1872, p. 35.

Carmichael, Geraham (1), a Scotch Presbyterian minister, was born at Glasgow in 1682, and was educated at the university there. He became pastor at Monimail, and afterwards professor of moral philosophy in the university of Glasgow, where he died in 1738, leaving some notes on Puffendorf's De Officio Hominis.

Carmichael, Geraham (2), a Scotch clergyman (son of the foregoing), was called to the living at Monimail in 1741; ordained in 1742; transferred to Dundee in 1751; and died Nov. 6, 1761, aged sixty years. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiacae, ii, 503; iii, 693.

Carmichael, Ichabod B., a Methodist Episcopal bishop, was born in 1828. He was converted in 1844; served the church some time as class-leader and exhorter; and, in 1867, was pre-eminent in preparing himself better for the ministry, he entered the New Jersey Conference. He labored with wondrous zeal and fidelity until his death, Jan. 11, 1888. Mr. Carmichael was energetic beyond his strength, sustained an unquestioned piety, and lived an exemplary life. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1888, p. 55.

Carmichael, James (1), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1654, and later was master of the grammar-school there. He entered upon the living at Haddington in 1657, officiating as schoolmaster in 1652; but the town council in 1654 separated the two offices. He took an active part in the business of the Kirk. In 1574 he had also fought for the pulpit and the kirk in church. He was appointed by the assembly the same year one of four to prepare the acts of the kirk for more general use, and one of the editors to oversee the printing. In 1577 the assembly appointed him one of five to revise the Second Book of Discipline. He was presented by the king to the vicarage of Haddington in 1681, but was compelled to flee into England in 1684, having been friendly to those who had taken Stirling Castle by surprise. He was a member of twelve general assemblies in fourteen years. There is no further record of him. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiacae, i, 311, 312.

Carmichael, James (2), A.M., a Scotch clergyman (son of the minister at Haddington), took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1666; was presented by the king to the vicarage of Athelstaneford and that of St. Martin, in 1613; admitted in 1614; instituted in 1619; continued in January, 1664, being aged and infirm. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiacae, i, 819.

Carmichael, James (3), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in July, 1612; was presented by the king to the living at Cleish in 1614; but resigned it in October, 1649, "being sensible of his weakness for the ministry." See Fasti Eccles. Scotiacae, i, 592.

Carmichael, John (1), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1584; and was admitted to the living at Newburn in 1596. He was a member of the general assemblies in 1597, 1600, 1601, and 1602; and was appointed in 1600 a visitor of Ross-shire, and in 1601 to sit in the General Assembly of the Kirk. He was transferred in 1603 to Kilconquhar, and was one of those who counselled with the six ministers previous to trial, in 1606, and one who signed the protest to Parliament against the introduction of episcopacy; for which he was summoned to London, and placed under guard with the archbishop of York in 1607; but obtained leave to return on condition of keeping himself quiet, not preaching, nor attending synod or presbytery. He took part in a conference at Falkland in 1609; was released from his confinement in 1614, and in 1616 was offered the degree of D.D., which he declined. He was a member of the assemblies of 1608 and 1618, and edited the articles adopted by them. He was on the royal commission in 1619 for visiting the colleges at Aberdeen, and was charged before the High Commission with disobeying the acts of the Perth Assembly. He was nominated to fill a vacant charge in Edinburgh in 1620, and died there in June, 1622, aged about fifty-eight years. He firmly resisted all the incinations proposed by the king, and was a man godly, learned, and zealous in the cause of right and truth. His son Frederick was minister at Markinch. He published Two Letters to James Melvill. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiacae, ii, 438, 451.

Carmichael, John (2), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the Glasgow University in 1632; was minister at Kirkconnel after 1641, and had also the charge of Sangquhar, but was ejected on the re-establishment of episcopacy, in 1662. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiacae, i, 679.

Carmichael, John (3), A.M., a Scotch clergyman (son of the minister of Markinch), took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1650; was elected to the living at Traquair the same year; ordained in May, 1661, as minister of Thursby, in England; presented by the king to the living at Traquair the same year; instituted and admitted in 1662; deposed in 1665 for declining episcopacy, when he joined the Presbyterians, and had his share of suffering. He died at Pitscottie, in Fife, aged about thirty-six years. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiacae, i, 257.

Carmichael, John (4), a Presbyterian minister, was born at Tarbert, in Argyleshire, Scotland, Oct. 17, 1728. He was educated at the College of New Jersey; studied theology at Princeton; and was licensed to preach by the New Brunswick Presbytery in May 8, 1760. Some time during the same year he accepted a call from the Presbyterian Church at the Forks of Brandywine, Chester County, Pa. This connection was terminated by his death, Nov. 15, 1785. Mr. Carmichael took the side of his adopted country; and in 1777 preached a sermon to the militia of Lancaster County, Pa., in which he maintained the dignity and self-defence of the American people. This sermon was published, and soon a second edition was called for. So effectually did he succeed in instilling into the minds of the people his own patriotic spirit, that, whenever they were called into service, it is said that not one hesitated. He was a man of an eminently devout and Christian spirit, and indefatigable in his labours, as a minister. See Sprague, Lives of the Amer. Pulpit, iii, 228; Alexander, Princeton Coll, of the 18th Cent.

CARMICHAEL, Patrick, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the Edinburgh University in 1597; was admitted minister at Soutra in 1599; transferred to Aberdour, Fife, in 1602, and to Oxnam in 1610; and died before Sept. 16, 1623. See Fasit Eccles. Scoticae, i, 290, 509; ii, 574, 575.

CARMICHAEL, William (1), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the Edinburgh University in 1589; became licentiate at Colleteon; was licensed to preach in 1603; became minister at Wampray in 1664; was transferred to Athislanestred in 1665; deprived for refusing the test in 1681; received again into the communion and made minister at Makerston in 1689; re- signed in 1715, being incapable of ministerial duty, though he gave his influence; and died in 1718, aged seventy-eight years. See Fasit Eccles. Scoticae, i, 1, 319, 463, 664.

CARMICHAEL, William (2), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the Edinburgh University in 1688; held a bursary of philosophy at the Glasgow University in 1690; was called and admitted minister at Symington in 1692, and ordained; and died before May 11, 1719, aged about thirty-one years. See Fasit Eccles. Scoticae, i, 381.

CARMICHAEL, William (3), a prelate of Ireland, was the second son of the second earl of Hyndford. In 1742 he was appointed archdeacon of Bucks, and, Jan. 5, 1758, was consecrated bishop of Clonfert and Kilmacalmage. In 1756 he preached, before the House of Lords, the anniversary sermon on king Charles's martyrdom. In 1768 he was translated to the see of Leighlin and Ferns, and in the same year that of Meath. In June, 1765, he was transferred from Meath to the see of Dublin. He died Dec. 15, 1765. See D'Alton, Memoirs of the Archb. of Dublin, p. 342.

CARMICHAEL, William Millar, D.D., an Episcopalian minister, was born in Albany, N. Y., June 28, 1841. He received his preparatory education at Plainfield, N. J., graduated from Hamilton College, N. Y., in 1862, entered Princeton Seminary, and graduated in 1862. In 1862 he was licensed by the Presbytery of Albany, April 22, 1892; served as a missionary at Clinton, N. J., 1892-93; and as stated supply to the Reformed Dutch Church at Waterford, N. Y., from May to December, 1890, when he united with the Protestant Episcopal Church. He was licensed as lay deacon in 1891. May of that year he went to Europe, returned in December following, was called to the rectorship of Christ Church at Rye, and ordained deacon Jan. 13, 1892, and priest April 10. In 1894 he became rector of St. George's Church, Hempstead, L. I., where he continued five years; then he was rector of Thomas's Hall, Elmsford, and remained one year. He was rector at Watertown, N. Y., from Jan. 5, 1894, until Oct. 1, 1897; at Meadville, Pa., from the last date until Nov. 30, 1897; at Christ Church, Richmond, Va., from Oct. 1, 1895, until July, 1896; at Filatia, Fl., as missionary and rector, from Aug. 28, 1896, until Aug. 1, 1897; at Milledgeville, Ga., as missionary and rector, from Nov. 1, 1897, until Aug. 1, 1898; at Hempstead, L. I., occasionally acting as assistant rector of Trinity Church, Rockaway, until April 1, 1873. He died at Jamaicus, L. I., June 14, 1891. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theological Seminary, 1882, p. 16.

CARMOLY, Eliakim, a French rabbi and Orientalist, was born in 1808. He was a Jewish pastor at Brusseis, and the Asiatic Society of Paris included him among its members. Among his numerous writings are, Ode Hebraique et Francaise en l'Honneur de Philippe I (Mets, 1830) — Biographie des Israélites Anciens et Modernes—Contes Chaldéens. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v., First, Bibl. Jud. i, 144.

CARVON, Jacob, a German jurist and canon, was born at Rostock, March 2, 1677. He descended from an aristocratic family, which had made itself famous in England under Henry VIII. He studied theology in his native town, but afterwards studied law at the universities of Wittenberg and Jena. After his return to Rostock, in 1706, he was appointed archivist and secretary of the academy, and procurator of the Protestant consistory. In 1712 he occupied the chair of Bibliography and of belles-lettres, and in 1718 he became professor of the Pandects. He died at his native city, July 25, 1748, leaving many historical treatises, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

CARVON, Don Emanuelle, Salvador, an eminent Spanish engraver, was born at Madrid about 1740, and instructed in the school of Charles Dupuis. In 1760 he received into the academy at Paris. He died at Madrid in 1788. His engravings are very fine, and his publications include plates: The Virgin and Infant; The Angels Appearing to Magdalene; St. John Baptist in the Desert; See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

CARNAGIO, Ignazio de, an Italian theologian, was born at Carnago (Milan), and lived in 1666. He was a zealous preacher, of the Capuchin order, and wrote, De Exceletitia B. Virginis Mariae (Milan, 1646) — Cita di Rifugio a Mortali (ibid. 1655) — Manuale Servorum Beatae Mariae Virginis (ibid. 1656; Cremona, 1658) — Paradisa Spiritualia, etc. (Milan, 1663) — Turris Saur supra Firmam Petram (ibid. 1666). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carnarvon is a "skull-house," or charnel; a vault stacked with bones and skulls of skeletons; as at Grantham, Hereford, Worthwell, Ripon, and Christchurch (Hants), and the Franciscan church at Evora, Portugal. A charnel chapel was built near the west end of the cathedrals of Worcester and Winchester, over a crypt devoted to the pious purpose of preserving human remains disinterred when new graves are formed.

Carnegie, Alexander, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Marischal College in 1783, was licensed to preach in 1788, and ordained as assistant minister to his father, John, in 1796; presented by the king to the living at Inverkeilor in 1799, and died Jan. 2, 1806, aged seventy-three years. He published An Account of the Parish. See Fasit Eccles. Scoticae, iii, 798.

Carnegie, Charles, D.D., a Scotch clergyman was regent at St. Leonard's College, St. Andrews, admitted minister at Farnell in 1684, and died in July, 1694, aged about thirty-eight years. See Fasit Eccles. Scoticae, iii, 828.

Carnegie (or Carnegie), David, a Scotch clergyman, was a tenet at King's College, Aberdeen, was admitted minister of the second charge at Brechin, 1631, transferred to Farnell in 1638, and held the two chaplaincies of Maisondieu. He preached a thanksgiving sermon at Brechin on the deliverance from the pestilence. He died in 1692, aged seventy-seven years. See Fasit Eccles. Scoticae, iii, 815, 827.

Carneiro (Lat. cara, flesh) was an opprobrious name applied by the Orispionis (q. v.) to the early Christians, because they maintained the doctrine that the bodies of men, after the resurrection, should be composed of flesh and bones, as they are now, only altered in quality.

Carneiro (da Sylva), Joaquim, a Portuguese engraver and writer, was born at Oporto in 1727. He went to Brazil at the age of twelve, and became a pupil of João Gomes, at Rio de Janeiro. He not only studied art, but also became a skillful musician, and made himself acquainted with literature. He went to Lisbon in 1756, and in the following year visited Rome to study its masterpieces. An order of Don Francisco d'Almeida called back all Portuguese who were staying in that city; but Carneiro went to Florence and remained there in his art. In 1769 he was placed at the head of an engraving school attached to the royal printing-house at Lisbon. Some time after that he was a teacher of design in the royal college. He died at Lisbon in 1818. He left a great number of engravings, among which is The Coronation of the Virgin Mary, and The Assumption of the Virgin Mary, etc. He also translated several useful books from the French into the Portuguese language, such as, La Elementa de Geometria de Coulston (Lisbon, 1772); and the Traité Théorique des Caractères Typographiques (1802). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carneiro, Manoel, a Portuguese composer and Carmelite, was born at Lisbon in 1660, and died in 1695. He was an excellent organist, and left the following works: Responsoria e Licanias das Matinas de Sabado de Santo (for two choirs); Responsoria de Pascha (ibid.); Missa de Defuntos (ibid.); Psalms, Motets and Villancicos (for many voices). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carneiro, Melchor, a Portuguese missionary, was descended from a noble family of Coimbra. He had already gained some reputation as a scholar in his native place, when the Jesuits drew him into their ranks, in 1548. He was soon after made first rector of the college established by the congregation at Coimbra. Ignatius of Loyola having called him to Rome, he was appointed by pope Julius III bishop of Nice and confidant of the patriarch of Ethiopia. In 1556 he went to Goa; but his attempts to convert the Jews of Cochin were not more successful than were those for the conversion of the Christians of St. Thomas, upon the coast of Mocha. In 1567 he was appointed bishop of China and Japan, which office he held until his death, Aug. 19, 1583. He wrote, Duas Cartas Sopre a Missao. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carnell, Simon P., a Lutheran missionary, studied for some time in the theological seminary at Gettysburg, Pa., and immediately offered himself for the African work. He arrived at Monrovia March 14, 1839, and for a little more than four months labored successfully, when he was seized with a sudden attack of fever, and died May 4, 1870. See Lutheran Quarterly, iv, 457.

Carney, Thomas Johnson, a Universalist minister, was born in Dresden, Me., June 10, 1818. He was taught Universalism from childhood; travelled quite extensively in the West in 1838 and 1839; resided in South Carolina from 1840 to 1844, and was engaged as private tutor; returned to Maine in 1845; received private instruction in theology; and in 1846 began preaching. In 1848 he was ordained pastor of the Kenington Society, Philadelphia, Pa., and had charge in Liverpool, Leeds, Wayne, and Livermore Falls, Me., in 1850; labored at Cooperstown, N. Y., in 1851; spent several years as missionary in Illinois, Missouri, and Kansas, and died May 4, 1871. Mr. Carney was essentially a Church organizer and pioneer. See Universalist Register, 1871, 14.

Carniprivicium (or Carniprivium) is a name given by Macrobius to be applied to Quinquagesima Sunday, as being the last day on which it was permitted to eat flesh, the Lent fasts anciently commencing on the following day, as he says, is still customary with the Orientals and with some religious orders in Europe. In the calendar of the Greek Church, however, the corresponding term, Aprocous, designates Sexagesima Sunday.

Carnott, Luigi (known also under the pseudonyms of Virgilio Nolari and Giulio Larante), an Italian biographer, was born at Bologna in 1618. He became a Jesuit, and for six years taught grammar and rhetoric, and for eight years philosophy and theology. He died at the city of his birth in 1658, leaving Vita l'ingegnoso Tredittore Historiografo (Venice, 1652); Della Virtù d'Ignazio di Loyola (Bologna, 1658); — Vita d'Ignazio di Loyola (Venice, 1680) — Oratio in Erectione Academia Accesorum Mantuana (Bologna, 1655). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carnott, or Crennach, John de, a Scotch priest, was bishop of the see of Brechin in 1455. The same year he accompanied princess Margaret, daughter of king James 1st of Scotland, into France, to attend her marriage with Louis XI, then dauphin of that kingdom. In 1450 he, with others, was sent on an embassy to England. He is mentioned as living April 18, 1451. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 163.

Carnson, David Thompson, an English Congregational minister, was born at Cummertrees, Dumfriesshire, Sept. 5, 1737. He connected early with the Independent Church, and entered the Independent Church in Carlisle. In 1817 he entered as student at Blackburn, and in 1820 became pastor of Fishergate Church, Preston. Here he was secretary of the executive of the Lancashire Congregational Union, and was one of the founders of the Lancashire Ministerial Provident Society. After thirty-four years' labor in Preston he removed to Halesworth, Suffolk, where he remained till 1864, when failing health compelled him to resign. He returned to Preston and there remained until his death, May 28, 1877. Mr. Carson was a man of strong convictions, and a lover of Puritan theology, which he preached in a terse and vigorous style. See (Lord) C. C. Year-book, 1878, p. 309.

Carnull, or Carmullo, Simon da, a Genoese painter and Franciscan monk, painted several pictures for the church of San Francisco, at Voltri, two of which are The Lust Supper and The Preaching of St. Anthony, dated 1519. He was educated at Oriel College, Oxford; became precentor and dean of Canterbury; was succeeded to the see of Canterbury by the archbishops of Canterbury, and became prebendary of St. Anthony's, London, and at last became bishop of Worcester. He died in 1475. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), i, 555.

Carpenter, John (2), an English theologian, was born in Cornwall, and died in 1620, leaving Sermons, Meditations, etc. (Lond. 1588). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carpenter, John (3), D.D., an Irish prelate, was born in Charleville, Limerick, and was educated at the university at Lismore. On his return to his native city he was appointed curate in St. Mary's parish chapel. He was consecrated to the see of Dublin, June 3, 1779, by the Catholic primate, assisted by several others. In November, 1778, Carpenter, at the head of seventy of his clergy, and several hundred Roman Catholic laity, attended at the court of the king's bench in Dublin, and took the oaths prescribed by the act for the relief of Roman Catholics in that kingdom. He died Oct. 29, 1786. See D'Alton, Memoirs of the Appts. of Dublin, p. 472.

Carpenter, Lucien Bonaparte, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Denver, Colorado, Aug. 13, 1829. He was a precocious youth; secured for himself a private collegiate education; removed to Springfield, Ill., at the age of seventeen; taught school, and prepared to study law, but, on experiencing religion, in 1858, became an earnest Christian worker; received license to preach, and in the same year entered the Illinois Conference. His appointment was to Exeter, Petersburgh, Cañon City, Beards town, Hillisborough, and Stapp's Chapel, Decatur; in 1870 he received a transfer to the Indiana Conference, wherein he was stationed three years at Trinity, Evansville; was transferred to the Virginia Conference in 1873, and appointed to Fourth Street, Wheeling; and in 1874 was transferred to the Baltimore Conference, in which he was stationed for three successive years as pastor of Grace Church; in 1877 and 1878 of Exeter Street Church, and in 1879 of Jackson Square Church, Balti more, where he died suddenly, Nov. 20, 1879. Mr. Carpenter's pulpit ministrations always attracted a throng of admiring listeners. He was passionately fond of study, a brilliant orator, and an advanced thinker. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1880, p. 15.

Carpenter, Mark, a Baptist minister, was born at Guilford, Vt., Sept. 23, 1802. He pursued his studies in part at Amherst College, and graduated at Union College in 1829, and from the Newton Institution in 1833. He was ordained at Milford, N. H., Feb. 12, 1844, and six days later was transferred to the Baltimore conference, where he accepted a call to a church remaining there about five years. He was pastor from 1846 to 1850 at New London, N. H.; from 1851 to 1861 at Holyoke, Mass.; at Brattleboro, Vt., from 1861 to 1867; at West Dumferton, from 1867 to 1869; South Windham, from 1869 to 1874, when he removed to Townsend, and died there, Nov. 13, 1882. He was one of the oldest and best-known ministers in the state of Vermont. See Cattch, Baptist Encyclopedia, p. 185. (J. C. S.)

Carpenter, Mary, an English philanthropist, was born Aug. 18, 1867, at Bristol. At a very early age she took an active part in that social movement which had for its object the amelioration of the condition of the lower classes, the reorganization of prisons, and caring for homeless children. To this end she originated the system of reformatory schools and such institutions as had her cherished object in view, and by word and deed she interested the community at large. She was active in the annual meetings of the "British Association for the Promotion of Social Science," and even undertook a voyage to India for philanthropic purposes in 1866-67, the results of which she published in "Suggestions on Prison Discipline and Female Education in India" (1867); and "Six Months in India" (1868, 2 vols.).
Carpenter, Nathaniel, an English clergyman, was born in Devonshire in 1588, and educated at St. Edmund's Hall, Oxford. About 1626 he became acquainted with archbishop Usher, then at Oxford, who admired his talents, and took him to Ireland, where he made him one of his chaplains. Soon after this Carpenter was advanced to a deanship. He died at Dublin, according to Wood, in 1628; according to Fuller, in 1635. His publications include Philosophia Libera, etc. (1621), memorable as one of the first attacks upon the Aristotelian philosophy;— Geographie Delineatus (1625):— and several sermons. See also Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Chalmers, Biog. Dict., s. v.

Carpenter, Richard (1), an English divine, was a native of Cornwall, and was educated at Exeter College, Oxford, of which he became a fellow in 1590. In 1617 he was admitted to orders; and about that time he was made rector of Sherwell, and of Loochmore, adjoining, in Devonshire; and afterwards obtained the benefice of Hams, near Sheerness. He died Dec. 1637, and aged fifty-two. He published several single sermons. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict., s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Carpenter, Richard (2), D.D., an English divine and poet of the 17th century, was educated at Eton College, and at King's College, Cambridge. About 1625 he left England, and studied in Flanders, France, Spain, and Italy, and at length received holy orders at Rome from the hands of the pope's substitute. He entered the order of St. Benedict, and was sent to England to make proselytes; but in little more than a year he returned to the Protestant communion, and obtained the vicarage of Foling, in Sussex. In the time of the civil war he was pressed to return to Paris, and subsequently to himself to the Romish Church. He afterwards returned to England, and settled at Aylesbury, where he obtained a curacy. He was living there in 1670, but, before his death, returned a third time to Romanism. He published, Experience, History, and Divinity (1641);— Antrology Faced Harmless, Pons, Useful (1663);— Aron in her Fruits (ed.);— The Pragmatical Jesuit New Learned; and other works. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict., s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Carpenter, Robert Wright, an English Congregational minister, was born at Taunton, July 5, 1831. He joined the Church in his boyhood; received his ministerial training at Hackney College; and, at the close of his college course, became co-pastor at Portsea. He commenced his ministry there in 1858; removed to Devonport in 1861, to Woolwich in 1869, and finally retired to Buxley Heath, and died there, May 15, 1872. (See Lond.) Cong. Year-Book, 1872, p. 307.

Carpenter, Samuel T., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the diocese of Ohio, was rector of the Church in Smyrna, Del., in 1858, and remained there for several years. He subsequently returned and removed to Muncie, Mich., as rector; in 1859 he became rector of Trinity Church, Poli, III.; and in 1864 he was appointed chaplain in the United States Hospital at Cincinnati, O. He died Dec. 26, 1864. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1866, p. 98.

Carpenter, Sarah, wife of Zeno Carpenter, was an elder, for many years, of the Society of Friends (Orthodox), and was also a member of Bridgewater Monthly Meeting. She died Dec. 16, 1855, in Utica, N. Y., aged sixty-two years. See The Friend, ix, 112.

Carpenter, William, a Lutheran minister, was born near Madison, Va., on Nov. 29, 1762, and was a soldier in the Revolutionary war up to its close. While there he felt called to preach. He took a course of theology, and was licensed, by the Synod of Pennsylvania, in 1787. His first field of labor was in Madison County, Va., where he continued twenty-six years. He removed to the West in 1815, and entered upon his second and last charge, in-wrapper County, Ky. He died there, aged seventy years, and died Feb. 18, 1833. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 84.

Carpentras, Council of (of Concilium Carpentoracense), was held in 527, Cæsarius of Arles presiding, at the head of sixteen bishops. They published but one canon, which forbids the bishop to take anything from the churches within his diocese, provided he has a sufficient revenue for his maintenance. In this council, also, Agrecius, bishop of Antibes, was suspended during a year for conferring orders contrary to the canons. See Labbe, Concil. iv, 1668.

Carper, Joseph, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Pendleton County, Va., in 1789. He passed his early years on a farm; received a very limited education; was converted in his youth; but spent his early manhood in the army. His religious conversion, turning however, he received license to preach, and in 1816 entered the Baltimore Conference. In 1819 he was transferred to the Ohio Conference. Between 1837 and 1840 Mr. Carper held a local relation. He then entered the effective ranks and served until 1848, when he again located, but continued to preach until 1855, when he became superannuated. He died Aug. 27, 1867. Mr. Carper was capable of great physical endurance; had a strong, clear voice; a logical, rhetorical, practical mind; a pathetic manner of delivery; an ardent spirit, and a soul full of devotion. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1867, p. 527.

Carphacaseomechelis (Карфакасемехелис) was one of the heavenly powers in the system of the Persians (q. v.).

Carpi (or de Carpi), Girolamo, a reputable Italian painter, was born at Ferrara in 1501, studied under B. Garofalo. He painted many fine pictures for the churches of Ferrara and Bologna. At the latter place are his two best pictures—one in San Martino Maggiore, of the Inquisition of the Magi; and the other in San Salvatore, of The Magi, with St. Catherine and other saints. He died about 1569. See Hœfer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Carpi, Ugo, an Italian painter and engraver, was born at Rome about 1460, and distinguished himself by the invention of printing in chiaro-scuro, in imitation of drawing. The following are some of his principal engravings: Joseph's Ladder; David with the Head of Goliath; The Murder of the Innocents; The Descent from the Cross, etc. He died about 1590. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hœfer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carpiànus was the brother to whom Eusebius (iv, 1250) addressed his scheme of canons for a harmony of the Gospels.

Carpio, Yago de, a witness of the apostasy of Marcellinus, A.D. 903, and bishop at the Council of Rome, A.D. 924.

Carpiñi, Giovanni de Plano, a Franciscan monk, was born in Italy about 1220. Pope Innocent IV sent him, with six others, in 1246, on a religious embassy to the descendants of Genghis Khan, who were threatening Europe. After great hardships he reached his des-Carpionti, an Italian painter, was born at Clusone in 1566, but visited Venice while young and painted a series of pictures of the Venerable Face of Christ. He afterwards labored as a zealous missionary among the central and northern tribes of Europe, and died at an advanced age. See Hoefer, Nov. Biog. Générale.

Carpioni, Domenico, an Italian painter, was born at Clusone in 1566, but visited Venice while young and painted a series of pictures of the Venerable Face of Christ. He afterwards labored as a zealous missionary among the central and northern tribes of Europe, and died at an advanced age. See Hoefer, Nov. Biog. Générale.

Carpioni, Marsiale, an Italian painter, the grandson and scholar of Domenico, was born at Clusone in 1644. He was instructed in the school of Ciro Ferri, at Rome. He painted a number of historical works for the churches at Clusone, Bergamo, and Brescia. Some of his best works are, The Nativity; The Baptism of Christ; St. Domno; St. Eusebia. He died in 1722. See Hoefer, Nov. Biog. Générale.

Carpionti, Giulio, an Italian painter and engraver, was born at Venice. He was one of the best scholars of Alessandro Varatoli, surnamed the Paduan. He settled at Vicenza, where he painted many small pictures representing fantastic or mythological subjects. He also engraved a large number of plates, of which the principal ones are, Severus, Severianus, and Victorius, Jesus on the Mount of Olives; The Penitent Magdalene; Two Baccchae; and The Four Elements. He died at Verona in 1611. See Hoefer, Nov. Biog. Générale.

Carpiones was one of the five alternative appellations employed in the system of Valentins, to denote the Son Horus. The application of so many different names to the same personage seems to be best explained by the fact that in what is apparently an older form of the Valentins system, known to us by a fragment in Eusebius (Haur. xxxii, 6), there correspond to Horus five different sons, Carpiones being the name of one of them. It is intelligible that when the system was simplified by the reduction of the five sons to one, this one was considered as entitled to receive any of the older appellations. The name is supposed by Grabbe to be derived from Καρπείς, the rod with which the preceptor emancipated a slave. Καρπείς then denotes an emancipator, and is completely parallel to Karpheus, one of the other titles of Horus. The functions attributed to Carpiones are stated by Irenæus (1, 3) to be two-fold, that of supporting, and of restraining or limiting; as it is by him that each son is sustained in its own place, and restrained from intruding into that which does not belong to it.

Carpônés was a presbyter of Alexandria, a rival preacher to Arians, afterwards excommunicated along with him, a.D. 319, and was his companion in exile at Nicomedia, where he signed his letter to Alexander. At a later date he was deputed by Gregory of Cappadocia to pope Julius.

Carpaphorus, Saint (1), was one of the four crowned brothers, martyrs at Rome, in the year 304. The names of the other three were Severus, Severianus, and Victorius, who, with Caraphorus, in the Diocletian persecution, were whipped to death with scourges loaded with lead. Pope Gregory the Great mentions an old church of the four crowned martyrs in Rome, which was subsequently repaired, or rebuilt, by Leo IV and also by Pascal II. This church (Sanctorum Quattuor Coronatorum) is commemorated in an ancient title of a cardinal-priest (see Butler, Nov. 8; Baillet, Nov. 8). (2) Said to have succeeded Cyprian at Carthage. (3) The name of a martyr of unknown date, celebrated in Umbria and at Capua and Milan. (4) Presbyter, martyr at Spoleto, commemorated Dec. 10, in the old Roman Martyrology.

Carpov, Jacob, a German Lutheran theologian, was born at Goslar, Sept. 29, 1699. He studied at Halle and Jena, and at the latter place he completed, in 1725, the course of philosophy and theology. He then returned home, and two years after, in 1728, he started in applying the mathematical and philosophical demonstrations of Wolf to Christian dogmas. This innovation, introduced in the teaching of theology, arrayed against him all the academic corps, and led to the condemnation of his writings. In 1736 he was obliged to leave Jena, and established himself at Weimar, where he continued his course of theology, for many of the students of Jena had followed him. In 1737 he was appointed sub-director of the gymnasium of Weimar; in 1742 professor of mathematics; and in 1745 director of this gymnasium, and he elected a member of the Academy of Berlin. He died at Weimar, June 9, 1748. Some of his principal works are, De ratione Sufficiendi Principii (Jena, 1725); Disput. de Quant, Utrum Tellus sit Machina, An Animal (ibid. ed.); Disput.; Theol. Trinitatis Mysterium Methodo Demonstrativa Proposita (Jena, 1750); a long work directed against Poly_campaign, who had declared the Trinity contrary to sound judgment. The mathematical proofs given by Carpov in support of the Trinity were commented upon in a work by John Thomas Haupt: Gründe der Vernunft zur Erläuterung und zum Beweise des Geheimnisses der heyligen Dreifaltigkeit (Roent, 1729). The following three works relate to the same controversy: Revelatum S. S. Trinitatis Mysterium Methodo Demonstrativa Propositione (Jena, 1735); De pluralitate Personarum in Deitate (ibid. ed. and 1737); Anmerkungen über den Trokta; von De Pluralitate Person, etc.; Gesamta Salutis N. T. (Jena, 1735, 1736); Frankfort and Leipzig, 1737, 1749; and Rodas_bstadt and Leipzig, 1761). See Hoefer, Nov. Biog. Générale.

Carpus, martyr at Pergamus (Euseb. iv. 16). The Byzantine calendar distinguishes him from the Carpus of Tross, and commemorates him Oct. 15.
Carr, Henry, a Baptist minister, was born at Moorefield, Hardy Co., Va. He graduated at Union College in 1829, and from the Newton Institution in 1832; was ordained at Newton, Sept. 20 of the same year, and went to Ohio, where he was pastor of the Church at Granville, and then of the Church at Akron. Subsequently he was Secretary of the Ohio Education Society, and afterwards acted as an agent to raise funds for Granville College, now Denison University. He died at Granville, July 24, 1864. See Newton General Catalogue, p. 10. (J. C. S.)

Carr, James, an English Wesleyan minister, was born near Leeds, Feb. 27, 1810. He was converted at fourteen; entered the ministry in 1832; became a superintendemty at Dynas Powia, near Cardiff, Wales, in 1875, and died March 10, 1880. He was eminently successful in turning many to righteousness. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1880, p. 26.

Carr, L. C., a Baptist minister, was born in Pennsylvania in 1814, and early in life removed to Ohio. He was educated in Granville College, now Denison University. After leaving college he was pastor of the Church in Lockland. Subsequently he removed to Illinois, and preached in Monroe, Jerseyville, Griggsville, and other places in that state. Finding his health impaired by the rigors of northern winters, he removed to Florida, where, at Spring Garden Centre, in that state, he died suddenly, June 3, 1882. He is spoken of as an excellent man, a good preacher, and an earnest worker, making himself especially useful in the cause of temperance in Illinois. See Watch-Tower, June 15, 1882. (J. C. S.)

Carr, Robert, a Scotch clergyman of Tweedmouth, studied theology at the Edinburgh University, was tutor in the family of Sir James Colquhoun; licenced to preach in 1817; ordained in 1821 as minister of the Presbyterian Congregation at Mayport; presented to the living at Luss the same year, and died Sept. 4, 1845. He published An Account of the Parish. See Fasi Eccles. Scoticae, ii, 367.

Carr, Samuel, D.D., an English divine of the latter part of the 18th century, was prebendary of St. Paul's, and published Sermons on Practical Subjects (Lond. 1786, 3 vols.). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Carrick, James, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1755, presented to the living at Balmore, in 1772, and ordained; transferred to New Kirkpatrick in 1776, and died Feb. 28, 1787. See Fusti Eccles. Scotiaca, ii, 343, 365.

Carrick, Robert, a Scotch clergyman, studied at the Glasgow University, and was licensed to preach in 1713; became tutor in the family of Andrew Buchanen, provost of Glasgow, through whom he was called, in 1719, to the living at Houston, and ordained in 1720. He died May 1, 1771, aged ninety years. See Fusti. Eccles. Scotiaca, ii, 215.

Carrick, Samuel, a Presbyterian minister, was born in York County, Pa., July 17, 1760. At an early age he went to the valley of Virginia, and there pursued his studies under the Rev. William Graham. He was licensed by the Hanover Presbytery, Oct. 25, 1781; became pastor at Rocky Spring, in November, 1783. In 1785, he removed to New Albany, and labored between New York, Pennsylvania, Virginia, and Tennessee. He was active in civil and ecclesiastical affairs. He died in 1806. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iii, 483.

Carrière (or Carrières), François de, a French monk of the order of Conventuals of St. Francis, was born at APT in 1612, and died in 1655, leaving Meditations Bibliorium, Exquimis Summariæ quaest. Testamenti Liber Veteris Testamenti (Lyons, fol. 1660);—Fidei Catholici Digestum, etc. (ibid. 1657, 2 vols. fol.). See Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Huesca, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Carrière, Joseph, a French theologian, was born at Avignon, Feb. 19, 1735. He was educated at the seminary of St. Sulpice, and became professor of theology in the same institution, and afterwards director. He was finally appointed superior, in place of M. de Courson, who died just at the time when M. Carrière published a work on theology which was highly esteemed by the clergy, entitled Prælectiones Theologicae. He also wrote De Deo Patre (Paris; 1839)—De Contractibus (ibid. 1844-47). M. Carrière always dealt impartially with questions of controversy concerning the Church. He died April 23, 1864. See Hoefr, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carrillo, Francisco Perez, a Spanish ascetic theologian, who lived in the early half of the 17th century, wrote Via Sacra, Exercícios Espirituais, y Arte de bien Mortir (Saragosoa, 1619). See Hoefr, Nov. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carrillo, Juan, a Spanish Franciscan, brother of Martin, left an account of the Third Order of St. Francis, published in two parts (1610 and 1615); he was also a Lubavdit, queen of Isabel, and an account of the foundation of the monastery of Discalceates of Santa Clara, at Madrid (Madrid, 1616).

Carrillo, Martin, a celebrated Spanish historian and jurist, was born in the latter part of the 16th century at Saragosoa, where for ten years he professed the canon law, and where he subsequently obtained a canonry in the cathedral. In 1611 Philip III sent him to Sardina, whence he returned in the following year; and he died abbot of Mount Aragon, about 1630. He wrote, Annals Memorias Cronologicas, etc. (Huesca, 1622, fol.);—Historia del Gloria St. Valero Obispo de Saragossa (Saragosoa, 1615, 4to), containing lists of all the prelates, bishops, etc., of the kingdom of Aragon;—Relacion del Regio de Sardeeta (Barc. 1612)—Catalogus Archip. Cesarengustaneo Ecc. (Cagliari, 1611, etc.). See Hoefr, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Carroll, Andrew, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in County Monaghan, Ireland, Dec. 24, 1810. He was educated at Belfast; emigrated to Canada in his youth; was converted in 1830; and removed to Ohio, where he was employed as school-teacher, and where he joined the Church. In 1833 he was licensed to exhort, in 1834 to preach, and in 1835 entered the Ohio Conference. He continued his faithful, zealous labors without abatement until his death, Feb. 17, 1870. Mr. Carroll was humble, industrious, and useful. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1870, p. 266.

Carroll, Henry G., a Baptist minister, was born in Dublin, Ireland, in December, 1822. He was educated as a Presbyterian, and for a time was pastor of a church of that denomination in his native city. In 1867 he came to Canada, and the year succeeding to the United States. He united with the Baptist Church and became a minister of that denomination in Pontiac, Ill.; Orangeville, Mich.; Denison, Ia.; Appleton, Wis.; Evanston and Chicago, Ill. He died at Deadwood, Dak., in November, 1888, to which place he had gone for his health. See Chicago Standard, Dec. 6, 1883. (J. C. S.)

Carroll, John, an Irish Congregational minister, was born at Ballynicky, Armagh, in 1791. He grew up a Christian in his youth; was converted in 1820; and received his special ministerial preparation at Dublin Theological Institution, and began his ministerial office at Ballyraff, Antrim, in 1817. He then labored with noble self-sacrifice and consuming zeal till 1827, when he accepted a call to Richhill, Armagh, where he remained twenty-one years, becoming exceedingly popular as a preacher, and greatly respected as a pastor. In 1848 Mr. Carroll resigned the pastorate, removed to Newry, labored for several years as evangelist, and then returned to his native place, where he died, May 14, 1867. See (London) Cong. Year-book, 1868, p. 261.

Carroll, Philip Clifton, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Mercer County, Pa., Oct. 14, 1840. He was converted in 1856, and admitted into the Illinois Conference the same year. He served the Church faithfully until his death, April 24, 1879. Mr. Carroll had studied law before his conversion, thereby gaining much knowledge. As a speaker, he was clear, brilliant, elegant, and sympathetic. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1875. (J. C. S.)

Carron, Guy Toussaint Julien, Abbé, a French philanthropist, was born at Rennes, Feb. 23, 1769. He was tonsured at the age of thirteen, and taught the children of the suffering classes, and relieved their wants. In 1785, having been impressed by the disorder arising from beggary throughout his province, he conceived the idea of erecting an institution of charity, for which he interested a number of noble families, who contributed large sums to the execution of his plan; so that the city of Rennes, in 1791, came into possession of cotton spinning-mills, weaving establishments, etc., which occupied more than two thousand working people of both sexes, under his direction. In 1792, having the island of Jersey, together with many others during the French Revolution, he established there two schools for the instruction of young French refugees, a new chapel for Catholic worship, and a library for divines. In 1796 he went to London, where he received contributions which greatly extended his power. At Somerton, a suburb of London, a building was erected, for the instruction of French youth. He returned to Paris in 1814, and died there, March 15, 1821. The active charity and constant occupation of abbé Carron did not prevent his devoting himself to his ministry, nor from writing religious books for the instruction or edification of the faithful. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carron, Philippe Marie Thérèse Guy, a French prelate, nephew of Guy Toussaint Julien, was born at Rennes, Dec. 13, 1788. Having been vicar, then rector, of St. Germain, at Rennes, he became grand-vicar to the bishop of Nevers, and was appointed in 1829 bishop of Mans, where he instituted nuns of the Carmelites and Bon Pasteur orders. He died Aug. 27, 1833. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carruth, James Le., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born at Madison, Fla., Jan. 27, 1842. He experienced religion in 1857, and in 1859 was licensed to preach, and received into the Florida Conference. In the latter part of 1861 he enlisted in the Confederate army, and died Jan. 9, 1862. He was a young man of extraordinary talents and great promise. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1862, p. 410.

Carrucci (da Pontorno), Jacopo. See Pontormo.

Carruthers, David, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1816; presented to the living at Kirkden by the king, in 1824, and was ordained. He had a new church built in 1825, and died Nov. 21, 1846, aged sixty-one years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, iii, 503.

Carruthers, James, a Scotch clergyman, the earliest Protestant minister in the parish of Buitte, was first an exhorter at Preston in 1570, and was appointed to the living at Buitte in 1574. He continued in 1586, and was transferred in 1588 to Croxsmichael, with two other parishes in charge; he continued in 1590, and removed to Balmaghie the same year, and continued in 1593. There is no further record of him. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, i, 697, 703, 708.

Carrying-cloth is a robe or cloth in which children were anciently enveloped when taken to church for baptism. It was made of various materials—satin, silk, or lawn, richly and appropriately embroidered.

Cars, Laurent, an eminent French designer and engraver, was born at Lyons in May, 1699. When young he went to Paris, and soon acquired distinction. Cars may be considered one of the best artists of his time, in the class of subjects he has represented. He died at Paris, April 14, 1771. The following are some of his principal works: The Adoration of the Shepherds; The Flight into Egypt; The Chastity of Joseph; Adam and Eve before their Sin; Adam and Eve after their Sin. See Sées, Histoire de l'Art, Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carsan, John, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the Edinburgh University in 1670, and had a charge at Longford, Ireland; was presented to the living at Abdie in 1691; and died May 18, 1719, aged about sixty-nine years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, ii, 468.

Carse, Robert, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the Edinburgh University in 1624; was admitted to the living at Newton in 1646; ordained in 1641; and was a member of the Commission of Assembly in 1645. He continued Dec. 12, 1661, and confirmed to Episcopacy. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, i, 298.

Carshun Version of the Scriptures. The Carshun, or Arabic in Syriac characters, is used (chiefly by members of the Syrian churches) in Mesopotamia, Aleppo, and in many parts of Syria. A diglot edition of the New Testament, which the Syriac fathers in Carshun from the Arabic text of Erpenius were ranged in parallel columns, was published in 1703 at Rome, for the use of the Maronite Christians. From this edition the British and Foreign Bible Society had a new edition prepared at Paris in 1827; M. de Quatremère and de Lisle, the editors. See Bible of Every Land, p. 56. (B. P.)

Carstale, William, an English Presbyterian minister, was educated at Exeter College, Oxford, and had the living of Werrington, Devonshire, till ejected in 1662, when he came to London and preached there during the Great Plague, 1665-66. He then settled at Paris Street, Horsleydown, till his death, in 1688. Calamy relates that "he was a good and pious man, inclined to melancholy." See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, iv, 275.

Carson, David, an Associate minister, was born in Greencaust, Pa., Oct. 25, 1739. He graduated at Jefferson College in 1819, and took a theological course in New York. After receiving several calls from different congregations, he finally accepted one from the congregation at Big Spring, Pisgah Creek, Elizabeth, in Tennessee. He was ordained in 1824; labored in Tennessee ten years, and was then elected professor of Hebrew, Biblical antiquities, chronology, and Church history in the Associate Presbyterian Seminary at Canonsburg, Pa. He did not live to enter upon his duties as professor, being Lied Sept. 29, 1834. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, IX, iii, 117.

Carson, Irwin, a Presbyterian minister, was born in 1809. He was at one time pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Chillicothe, O., and afterwards of the Church of Oskaloosa, Ia. He returned to Ohio and supplied a number of churches. He died at Chillicothe, May 31, 1875. See Presbyterian, June 28, 1875. (W. P. S.)

Carson, Joseph, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born at Winchester, Va., Feb. 18, 1783. He was converted in his seventh year; soon became class-leader, exhorter, and local preacher; and in 1805 entered the Baltimore Conference, and was appointed as junior preacher on Wyoming Circuit. There was not a church on the circuit—the preaching was in private houses, barns, and groves; nevertheless, six hundred were led to Christ that year, and a new circuit formed. Thus he labored on large circuits, and met with great success, until 1812, when impaired health led him to locate. In 1824 he entered the Virginia Conference, and in it remained faithful to the close of his life, April 15, 1875. Mr. Carson possessed a clear, logical, powerful mind; a strong, pure, self-sacrificing character; a genial, confiding spirit, and deep piety. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1875, p. 143; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism. s. v.

Carson, Leander, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born April 12, 1823. He was converted about 1841; licensed to exhort in 1852; and in 1854 received license to preach, and was admitted into the North-western Indiana Conference, in which he served, with zeal and fidelity till his death, March 24, 1868. Mr. Carson was deeply imbued with the spirit of the Christian ministry, and was faithful and successful in his work. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1858, p. 282.
Carson, Robert (1), a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1745; presented to the living at Anwoth in 1753; and died March 26, 1769. See Fasti Eccles. Scottiani, i, 694.

Carson, Robert (2), an Irish Methodist preacher, was born at Omagh, County Tyrone, in 1784. He was converted in his youth, and became an itinerant preacher in Ireland in 1808, laboring with earnestness and success for thirteen years; he then became a superannuated, and died May 29, 1854. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1854.

Carson, Robert Joiner, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born near Louisburg, Franklin Co., N.C., in 1809. He was led to Christ in early life; obtained a good English education, and in 1829 entered the Virginia Conference. On the formation of the North Carolina Conference, in 1837, he became one of its members, and in it for four consecutive years labored with all his energy. In 1858 he returned to the Virginia Conference as a superannuate, which relation he sustained to the close of his life, in 1873. Mr. Carson was a fine preacher, often powerful, always simple; a charming companion, and a steadfast friend. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1873, p. 787.

Carstairs, Andrew, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, a native of Singapore, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1664; was licensed to preach in 1670; instituted to the living at Kirkmaiden in 1677; resigned before August, 1681, and died in Edinburgh, Oct. 11, 1692, aged about forty-nine years. See Fasti Eccles. Scottiani, i, 761.

Carstairs, George Andrew, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, was educated at the grammar-school, Kings-barnes, and at the University of St. Andrews; became tutor in the family of Mr. Lundin; was licensed to preach in 1802; presented to the living at Anstruther-Wester in 1804; ordained in 1805, and died at Devon-Grove, Dollar, Oct. 11, 1838, aged fifty-eight years. He published, The Scottish Covenant Service (Edinb. 1829); and a Sermon in the Scottish Pulpit. See Fasti Eccles. Scottiani, ii, 409.

Carstairs, James, A.M., a Scotch clergyman born at Boarhills, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1662; was licensed to preach in 1666; appointed to the living at Tamadice in 1667, and ordained; was transferred to Inchtuthil in 1682, and died before May 4, 1706, aged about fifty-eight years. See Fasti Eccles. Scottiani, iii, 765, 767.

Carstairs, John, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1641; was licensed to preach in 1646; presented to the living at Cathcart in 1647, and ordained. He was elected in 1648 for the living at Burnt-Island, and for one of the livings at Edinburgh in 1649, but was transferred to the Outer High Church in Glasgow in 1650. He accompanied the army, was wounded, stripped naked, and left among the dead at the battle of Dunbar the same year. He had charge of the south district of the city in 1651, and removed to the Inner High Church in 1655. When it was proposed to unite the Revolutioners and Protesters, he urged agreement unconditionally. He had the west quarter of the city for his Charge in 1658, and the east district from 1660 to 1662. He was deprived and imprisoned in 1663 for not taking the oath of allegiance; was charged in 1664 with "keeping conventicles," and fled to Ireland, but returned; joined the rising in 1666, for which he was indicted, but had indemnity in 1667, and died at Holmwood, where he refused to be come minister of the Scottish Church, but returned soon after; attended lord chancellor Ruther's on his death-bed, in 1681, and the earl of Arryill previous to his execution, in 1685. He died Feb. 5, 1686, aged sixty-three years. He published some Poems and Letters:—A Treatise on scandal:—Unanswerable Ritches of Christ.—Calderwood's True History of the Church of Scotland (1787). See Fasti Eccles. Scottiani, ii, 8, 22, 59.

Carstens, Aamun Jakob, a Danish painter, was born at Sankt-Jürgen, near Schleswig, May 10, 1754. While young he served in a mercantile house; but afterwards, quitting his master, went to Copenhagen, where he supported himself for seven years by taking portraits in red chalk. During these years he produced two of his best pictures: The Death of Eschylus, and Alcides and Ulysses. In 1783 he started for Rome, but could go no farther than Mantua, on account of his poverty. Here he remained a month, and then went to Lubeck, where he spent five years in obscurity. Through the poet Overbeck he became acquainted with one of his wealthy patrons, who sent him to Berlin, where his Fall of the Angels gained him a professorship in the Academy there. In 1792 he was appointed to the chair of art at Copenhagen. In 1797 he returned to Rome and studied the works of Raphael and Michael Angelo, and also those of Albert Dürer, at Dresden. His best works were designs in water-colors and paintings in fresco. He died at Rome, May 23, 1798. His biography was published in 1806 (new ed. by Riegel, 1867), and his works engraved by Müller in 1809. See Rose, Biog. Dict. s.v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s.v.; Spender, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s.v.

Carstens, Heinrich Johann, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born April 9, 1715, at Witzen- dorf. He studied at Helmstädt, was in 1746 pastor at Hanover, in 1754 pastor primarius at Hitzacker, and in 1759 superintendant at Burgdorf, where he died, April 30, 1783. He wrote, Commentatio ad Joa. III, 38 (Lem- gow, 1744): — Disquisitio Theologica de conscribendis Christiana (Göttingen, 1760). See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s.v. (B. P.)

Carwell, Donald, A.B., a Scotch clergyman (brother of bishop Carwell), studied at the University of St. Andrews in 1654, and took his degree there in 1568; was appointed to the Protestant ministerate at In- shail in 1572, and soon afterwards the parish was united to Clashan-Dysart. He resigned the rectory the same year, and was vicar, in 1681, of Kilmartin. There is no further record of him. See Fasti Eccles. Scottiani, iii, 11, 68.

Carwell, John, a Scotch clergyman, studied at the University of St. Andrews in 1648. He had been a conventual brother in the abbey of Inchmilk; was rector at Kilmartin from 1558 to 1646; embraced the Protestant faith, and was appointed chaplain to the earl of Argyll; was nominated by Parliament as superintendent of Argyll, in 1660; and was promoted to the bishopric of the isles in 1656, by queen Mary. In the General Assembly of 1569 he was reproved for ac- cepting without informing the assembly, and "for as- sisting at the parliament held by the queen after the murder of Darnley the king." He died between July 10 and Sept. 29, 1572, and was a man of great piety and learning, as well as of wealth and official power. He published A Joinstallation of John Stirling, 1579, the first book printed in Gaelic, only two copies of which are known to exist. See Fasti Eccles. Scotti- can, iii, 11, 447; Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 307.

Carr, Josiah, was, at the British Wesleyan Methodist- ist Conference of 1867, received as a candidate for the foreign missions; soon after he was appointed to Ba- lize, but died in Jamaica, before reaching his destina- tion, May 6, 1868. See Minutes of the British Confer- ence, 1868, 47.

Cartaphilus (or Cartophylus), in Christian legend, was a Roman soldier who was doorkeeper at the entrance to the palace of Pilate at the time of our Lord's crucifixion. When Jesus was led out thence, and went too slow for Cartaphilus, the latter struck him with his hand, and mockingly said, "Faster, Jesus, faster;
why tarried thou?" But Jesus pitifully looked at him, and said, if so be, thou shalt tarry until I come again. In fulfillment of the Saviour's prophecy, Car-tophilus still waits in tears and anxiety for the judgment, and only the Saviour's own merciful prayer sustains him: "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." This is the basis of the fable about the Wandering Jew (q. v.). See Meth. Quart. Rev. July, 1882.

Carter, John, an English clergyman, was educated at Trinity Hall, Cambridge (1707). Having taken holy orders, he became first vicar of Tach-broke, in Warwickshire, and was afterwards promoted to the vicarage of Hinckley, in Leicestersire, with the rectory of Stoke annexed. At this place he resided from 1720 until his death, Dec. 17, 1753.

Carter, Samuel, an English divine and antiquary, was born in 1653, and educated at Coventry, his native place, whence he removed to Oxford. He became prebendary of Lichfield, and vicar of St.
Martin's, at Leicester, where he died, in 1740, leaving Tabula Chronologica Archiugiae, et Episcopatus in Anglia et Wallis, Ortus, Divisions, Translationes, etc., Brevior Excubia (fol. without date).

Carter, Thomas, an English clergyman and learned historian, was born at Clifton, in Warwickshire, in 1686, and educated at University College, Oxford. In 1714 he visited the south of France, and returned to England, where he began to write his "History of Europe," which was published in 1728. He died in 1772, and was buried in St. Mary's Church, Coventry.

Carter, Albert, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was received into the New Hampshire Conference in 1842, from which time till within a few days of his death, Aug. 1, 1852, he labored with diligence and success. He everywhere gave evidence of a sterling Christian character and thorough devotion to Methodism.
See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1853, p. 229.

Carter, Benjamin, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in the Ohio or the Mississippi valley.
He was converted about 1875, and two years later entered the itineracy. He died at Shoulderborne, Washington Co., Ga., in August, 1792. Mr. Carter was a man of perennial happiness and great courage, a pointed, zealous preacher, and a strict disciplinarian. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1798, p. 49.

Carter, Edward, a Baptist minister, was born in Maine about 1790. He was licensed, in 1816, by the First Church in Montville, Me., and ordained pastor of the Second Brooksville Church in 1817. Here he remained about 15 years, and for a longer period was an itinerant preacher. In 1832 he became pastor of the Church in Plymouth, Me., where he continued to labor, and many discouragements, from 1832 to 1843. On resigning he engaged in evangelistic work. The date of his death is not recorded. See Mellett, Hist. of the Baptists of Maine, p. 436. (J. C. S.)

Carter, E. J. G., a Baptist minister, was born in Mississippi in 1846, and removed to Arkansas in 1852.
About 1870 he began to preach, and after supplying different churches for five years, he was ordained in 1876. The field of his ministerial labors was with churches in Washita and Nevada counties, Ark. He died in 1879. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 188.
(J. C. S.)

Carter, Herbert, a native Wesleyan Methodist missionary, was converted early; embraced Methodism at the cost of much sacrifice; was called to the ministry in 1843; was one of the first of the native ministers of the Wesleyan body ordained in Jamaica, W. L., and died at Ocho-Rios, Jamaica, Sept. 29, 1861. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1862, p. 57.

Carter, Hugh, an English Wesleyan minister, was born near Mold, Flintshire, June 15, 1784. He was converted at Denbigh, whither his parents had removed a few years after his birth. In 1805 he began to preach in Welsh, but was afterwards connected with the English work. In 1855 he was made a supernumerary, and died Sept. 8 of that year. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1856.

Carter, James, an Irish Wesleyan minister, was born in Tentore, Queen's County. He entered the ministry in 1747; retired from the active work in 1837; resumed it, and was ordained on account of the extension of his labors, in 1841, and died July 31, 1844. He was "a true witness for his Lord." See Minutes of the British Conference, 1845.

Carter, James W., a Baptist minister, was born in Wilson County, Tenn., Feb. 6, 1817. He united with the Church in April, 1843; soon after was licensed, and was ordained Sept. 21, 1846. After preaching for a year or two, he was called, in 1848, to be pastor of Shady Grove Church, Haywood Co.; also had pastoral care of another church for seven years. From 1849 to 1854 he preached for a church in Quincy. In 1854 five churches looked to him as their pastor. An attack of hemorrhage of the lungs compelled him to give up preaching in 1857, and he died near Chestnut Bluff, March 16, 1858. See Borum, Sketches of Tenn. Ministers, i, 137-139. (J. C. S.)

Carter, John, an English Congregational minister, was born at Blandford, in 1728. He early united with the Church, entered Hoxton College in 1808, and was ordained over the Independent Church at Braintree in 1812, where he remained till his death, June 23, 1864.

Carter, John J., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Patonsburg, Botetourt Co., Va., Sept.
16, 1806. He experienced religion in 1824, and in 1839 entered the Virginia Conference, wherein he labored until his death, Nov. 3, 1883. Mr. Carter was a zealous, successful preacher, much beloved, an amiable, piou-eman, and a deeply devoted Christian. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1894, p. 278.

Carter, Joseph Sylkes, an English Congregational minister, was born at Booth Bank, near Hid-dersfield, May 16, 1830. He was pious educated, and, after many struggles with scepticism, became converted, studied at Airedale College, and entered upon his pastoral duties at West Houghton, Yorkshire, with great energy and diligence. Here he died, Feb.
5, 1869. Mr. Carter, during his last years, was filled with a holy enthusiasm, and a glowing anxiety for the salvation of souls. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1861, p. 205.

Carter, Lawson, a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the diocese of Ohio, was rector of Grace Church, Cleveland, in which position he remained until 1861.

residence in Cleveland. He died July 11, 1865. See

CARTACH

Carter, William E., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Sumter District, S. C., Oct. 81, 1869. He was converted in 1850; began preaching in 1856, and in the same year entered the Alabama Conference. He died July 19, 1869. As a preacher Mr. Carter was gifted and eloquent. The most marked feature of the man was his spirit of consecration to God. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1869, p. 365.

Carteria, The Martyrs of, in Africa, are commemorated Feb. 2 in the Carthaginian calendar. They may therefore be either Victor, Marinus, Honoratus, Hilary, Urban, and Perpetua; or else Fortunatus, Felician, Firmus, Candidus, Castula, and Secundula: both which sets are marked that day in the Hieronymian Martyrology of D'Achery.

Carteriæus is the name of several men in early Christian records. See also Pamphilus; Philostorgius.

1. A martyr at Sebaste, in Lesser Armenia, under Linius and duke Marcellus. If the title be rightly attached to the legend, he was of the company of Attius, Eudoxius, and Agapius, who had taken counsel with the whole army to abide in the faith of Christ. They were tortured and imprisoned, then brought out and beheaded, and committed to the flames, with many others.

2. Signed the epistle of the Council of Alexandria to Antioch in A. D. 362 (Tillem. vii. 212). He only says, "I, Carterius, pray your welfare." Tillemon supposes him to be the bishop whose exile was mourned by the Church of Antiochus; as Athanasius (i. 705) tells in his apology for his flight.

3. The joint provost with Diodorus, afterwards bishop of Tarasus, of a monastery in or near Antioch, under whom Chrysostom and his companions studied the holy Scriptures and practiced asceticism (Socrates, H. E. vi. 9). He may also be the same that is commemorated by Gregory Nazianzen. Again, there is a Carterius on whom Gregory wrote an epitaph. Chrysostom was with Carterius up to A. D. 380. Tillemon (i. 370) says that there was an abbey of St. Carterius near Emesa, in Phoenicia, in the middle of the 6th century.

4. Governor of Cæsarea, in Cappadocia, A. D. 494. Chrysostom having halted at Cæsarea on his way to his place of exile at Cucusus, was there attacked by a mob of fanatic monks, the tools of the bishop Phæretius, his concealed enemy, from whose violence Carterius used his utmost efforts to shield him. His endeavors proving ineffectual, he made a vain appeal to Phæretius to call off the monks and allow Chrysostom to enjoy the rest of his sentence in peace. On his refusal at Cucusus, Chrysostom sent him a warm letter of thanks for his services, and begged that he might hear from him (Epist. 14, p. 236).

5. A presbyter of Constantinople, who brought Anatolian's letter to Leo the Great, and carried back the answer (Leo, Epist. 89, p. 1088), April, A. D. 451.

Carthach (Lat. Carthagius) is the name of two early Christian saints.

1. The Elder, commemorated March 5, is entered in the Martyrology as "Carthach mac-Aengusa Droma Ferdaim," and in Mart. Doney, as bishop, alumnus of Ciaran of Saighir. Colgan (Acta Sanctorum, p. 473-474) gives a memoir of him that little is known of him. He was of royal descent in Munster, being son or grandson of Aengus, king of Cashel. He was sent by St. Ciaran upon a penitential pilgrimage, when he spent seven years abroad, visiting Gaul and Rome. On his return he taught, and founded churches and monasteries, St. Ciaran choosing him, it is said, to be his successor. The scene of his labors was Kerry, where he was bishop; he had a church called Druin-Fertain, in Carbery; another on Inis-Uachtair, in Loch Silean, now Sheelin; and a third, Cill-Carthach, in Tir-Boghaine, in Tírconel, County Donegal. In Kerry, on the banks of the Mang, he trained his pupil and namesake, St. Carthage the younger. The year of neither his birth nor death is known, but he flourished about A.D. 540, and probably did not die before 580. His two chief designations are "alumnus S. Kieran Sigirensis," and "institutor S. Carthacci Junioris seu Mochuda" (see Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir., ii, 98 sq.; Kelly, Cat. Ir. Sanctarum, p. 83). The "Acta Sanctarum, Mhath. 1,899-389" have a combined account of St. Kieran and St. Carthach.

2. The Younger, commemorated May 14, is one of the most noted saints in the beginning of the 7th century. Two lives are given by the Bollandists (Acta Sanctarum, May 14, tom. iii), the second life being the more remarkable. He is also a subject of the very fine picture of Bishop of Kilkenny, in Primase Marsh's Library, Dublin. He was a native of Kerry, and for forty years ruled his community of monks in Rahen of Ballycowan, King's County, where scholars flocked to him from all parts of Ireland and Britain, so that he is said to have had eight hundred and sixty-seven under him. He had been ordained priest by the elder St. Carthach, perhaps about 580, and at Rahen, which was probably founded in 591, and was consecrated bishop. For his monks he drew up a rule, but, notwithstanding his sanctity and zeal, he was driven from Rahen by Bathmac, king of the country; and his successor in Rahen from "diebus passum," was usually set down at 630; the Four Masters give 631, and the other Irish annals place it later. After wandering about for some time he was at last presented with land for a monastery, by Metris, which was the origin of the present church and town of Lismore. St. Carthach had only been a short time at Lismore when he died, May 14, 637, and was buried in the monastery.

Carthage, Councils of (Concilium Carthaginense). An account of some of these have been given in the arts. African Councils; Carthage, Councils of; and Milevita. The following are additional particulars:

I. Was held in 217, by Agrippinus, bishop of Carthage, and attended by all the bishops of Africa and Numidia. In this council it was declared that those who have received the form of baptism out of the Church may not be admitted into it without being rebaptized. See Labbe, Concil. iv, 607.

II. Held by St. Cyprian, at the head of sixty-six bishops, about 253 (2). Here a letter was read from Fidus, which informed them that another bishop, named Therapius, had granted reconciliation to Victor, who had been ordained priest a long time before, without his having undergone the entire course of ordination, and that even then, when the people had not required it, nor even known anything about it; and there was no plea of necessity, such as illness, to constrain him. The council expressed great indignation at the act, and administered a strong rebuke to Therapius; nevertheless, they would not depose of communion Victor, who had been admitted to it by his own bishop. See Labbe, Concil. i, 741.

III. Held in 254, by St. Cyprian, at the head of thirty-six bishops. It was decided that Basilides, bishop of Leon, and Marcial, bishop of Astorga, could not be any longer recognized as bishops, being both of them among the "Libellatici," and also guilty of various crimes. See Labbe, Concil. i, 746.

IV. Was also held in 254 upon the case of those who had relapsed into idolatry during the persecutions. See Lapsi. The circumstances of this council are detailed under Novatian.

V. To remove the doubts of those who had been influenced by the false statements of Novatian and his party, with respect to the conduct and consecration of Cornelius, the council resolved to obtain the testimonial of those who were present at his consecration, and to send deputies to Rome to inquire into the matter. This precautionary step did not, however, hinder St. Cyprian from recognizing at once the election of Cornelius.

When the deputies of Novatian arrived at Carthage, they required that the bishops should examine their accusations against Cornelius; to which the fathers in council answered, that they would not suffer the reputation of their brother to be attacked, after he had been elected by so many votes, and consecrated: and that a bishop having been once recognized by his fellow-bishops, is not another to the same see; and further, the council addressed a synodal letter to Cornelius upon the subject.

Then they proceeded to inquire into the case of Feliciusimus, and the five priests who had followed him: these men they condemned and excommunicated. And further, seeing that there was a sect, viz., the Feliciusimites: Novatian on the one hand and Novatian on the other, virtually destroyed penance by the opposite extremes to which they endeavored to bring it—the former abolishing it, in fact, by admitting at once to communion all those who had fallen into sin, while the others altogether refused to acknowledge its efficacy—they proceeded to consider what they considered a course of penance reestablished. It was decreed that the Libellatici, who, immediately after the commission of their fault, began a course of penance, should be thenceforward admitted to communion: that those who had actually sacrificed should be treated more severely, yet so as not to take away from them their true Christian character. It was also decreed that a bishop should be for a long period kept to a course of penance, in order that they might thus seek with tears and repentance to obtain God's pardon for their sin. It was further decreed that the different circumstances of the sin of each individual ought to be inquired into, in order that the duration of their course of penitence might be regulated accordingly, that those who had for a long time resisted the violence of the tortures should be treated with more lenity; and they judged that three years of penance ought to suffice in order to render these admissions commissible to communion.

At this council several articles or canons were drawn up, and afterwards forwarded in writing to every bishop. Baronius thinks that these were the same with those afterwards styled the "Penitential Canons."

With respect to bishops and others of the clergy who had either sacrificed or had received certificates of having done so, it was determined that they might be admitted to communion only after they should have been once excluded from the priesthood, and from all exercise of their office, or of any ecclesiastical function. It was also determined that the communion ought to be administered to persons who might be visited with mortal sickness during the course of their term of penance.

Novatian and Feliciusimus were both condemned in this council, which continued sitting for a long time. See Labbe, Concil. i, 714.

VI. Held in 255. Eighteen bishops of Numidia having applied to St. Cyprian for advice upon the subject of baptism, those who had received the form out of the Church being anxious to be received regularly, held on the 20th of November, with the assent of the council, the reply that they ought, by all means, to follow the ancient practice, which was to baptize every one received into the Church, who had previously been baptized only by heeretic or schismatical bishops (Cyprian, Epist. 79). See Labbe, Concil. i, 761.

VI. Another council was held in September in the same year (255), attended by eighty-seven bishops from the provinces of Africa, Numidia, and Mauritia. The letter of Julyab, who had written to consult St. Cyprian upon the subject of baptism, was read, and likewise the answer of Cyprian. Also the letter of Cyprian and the former council to Stephen was read, and the answer of the then bishop does not appear in this answer, although accompanied by threats of excommunication, had the effect of shaking the opinion of Cyprian.

After these papers had been read, Cyprian delivered a discourse, in which, forcibly, yet mildly, testifying his disapproval of the conduct of those who would, as it were, make themselves bishops over other bishops, in wishing to compel them, by a tyrannical fear, to submit absolutely to their opinion, he again protested that he left to each full liberty in his faith as to the subject before them, without judging or desiring to separate them from communion with himself on that account.
CARTHAGE 893

The other bishops present then delivered their opinion, afterwards Cyprian himself declared his own, and all agreed unanimously.

Nevertheless, pope Stephen, filled with anger, refused even to grant an audience to Cyprian; and, to confirm his case, Cyprian wrote upon the subject to Firmilian, bishop of Cessarea, in Cappadocia. The latter, in his answer, declares twice, that in his opinion the pope had entirely broken peace with Africa; and that he did not feel to assert that Stephen, by the very act of separating all others from his communion, had, in fact, separated himself from all the other faithful, and therefore from the communion of the Catholic Church; and, by so doing, had really become himself schismatical. This contest lasted until the pontificate of Sixtus, who succeeded Stephen, and it seems that the bishops of Africa, little by little, yielded their opinion. St. Jerome says, that many of the bishops of Africa, who had declared in communion the invalidity of heretical baptism, afterwards concurred in a contrary decree. See Labbe, Concil. i. 786.

VII. Was held in 348 or 349, after a great number of the Donatists had united themselves to the Church, under Gratus, bishop of Carthage. Bishops from all the provinces of Africa attended it, but neither their number nor the names of the greater part of them have come down to us.

Gratus having returned thanks to Almighty God for the termination of the schism which had for so many years rent the African Church, they proceeded to publish fourteen canons. The first forbids to republicate those who have been baptized in the name of the Sacred Trinity; the second forbids to honor those as martyrs who, by their indiscretion, have been instrumental in bringing about their own death, and treats generally of the honor due to the martyrs; the third and fourth forbid the clergy to dwell with women; it was also ruled, that three bishops are necessary in order to judge a deacon, six for the trial of a priest, and twelve for that of a bishop. See Labbe, Concil. ii. 713.

VIII. Held in 890, by Geneethius, bishop of Carthage.
The number of the bishops present is unknown. They first drew up a profession of the Catholic faith, and then proceeded to publish thirty-three canons.

The 1st enjoins belief in the Holy Trinity.
The 2d enjoins obedience upon all the clergy.
The 3d forbids the consecration of the chalice by priests, and the consecration of virgins and the reconciliation of penitents at public mass by them.
The 7th orders that those of the clergy receiving persons into their church excommunicated by any bishop, without his permission, shall also be excommunicated.
The 12th forbids the consecration of a bishop without the consent of the metropolitan.

From the canons of this council it appears, plainly, that the bishop was the ordinary minister in cases of penance, and the priest only in his absence, or in cases of necessity. See Labbe, Concil. ii. 1158.

IX. Held Aug. 28, 397, under Aurelius, the bishop, at the head of forty-four or forty-eight bishops, among whom was St. Augustine. They published fifty canons.
The 1st orders every bishop to ascertain from the primate yearly, the day upon which the festival of Easter should be celebrated.
The 2d enjoins that a council be held annually.
The 3d directs that all the bishops and clergy shall acquaint the people of the canons of this council before their consecration.
The 4th enforces the order of deacons or the velling of the consecrated virgins before their twenty-fifth year.
The 6th forbids the administration of baptism or the excommunication of the third.
The 21st forbids any bishop to ordain the clergy of another diocese.
The 26th orders that mass be said fasting.
The 34th allows the baptism of sick persons unable to speak, if their desire of this be guaranteed by their friends.

The 39th forbids the consecration of a bishop by less than three bishops.
The 46th forbids the translation of bishops.
The 47th canon forbids the reading of anything in the Church that differs from the usage of sacred Scripture, except the canonical writings, among which are included the apoephyal books of Tobit, Judith, the Wisdom of Solomon, Ecclesiasticus, and the books of Maccabees. St. Augustine's "whole canon of Scripture," in his treatise De Doctrina Christiana, is identical with the 34th contained in this forty-seventh canon of the Council of Carthage, at which that father was present.

See Labbe, Concil. ii. 1165.

X. Held Nov. 8, 398, under Aurelius of Carthage, at the head of two hundred and fourteen or two hundred and fifteen bishops, including St. Augustine. One hundred and seven canons were published, chiefly relating to the life and conduct of the clergy.

The 1st enjoins that no one be elevated to the episco-Bpate without adequate inquiry first made as to his faith and moral character, in order to ascertain whether he hold the Catholic faith, and have all the virtues necessary for the office; whether he be prudent, docile, moderate, chaste, sober, charitable, humble, well instructed in the word of God, etc.
The eight canons following are upon the ordination of bishops, priests, deacons and sub-deacons, acolytes, ex-orcists, etc.
The 15th directs that bishops shall have nothing but what is plain and simple, either at table or in their furniture, and that they should keep their clergy and ser-eslaves only by the lustre of their faith and virtue.
The 16th enjoins that bishops from receiving costly works of beauties, but allows those of heretics to be read in case of necessity.
The 22d forbids that a bishop should ordain any one without the consent of his clergy, and the testimony of the laity.
The 24th orders that all persons leaving the church
during the time of sermon be excommunicated.
The 34th forbids a bishop, while seated, to keep a priest standing.
The 88th permits a deacon, in cases of great necessity, to administer the eucharist in the presence of a priest.
The 151st and two following canons order the clergy to get their living by some honest trade.
The 61st declares that bishops and clergyman swearing by any creature be severely rebuked, and if he continues in fault he is to be excommunicated.
The 64th declares those persons not to be Catholics who fast upon Sunday.
The 66th enjoins that the clergy who consider them-seves heretics, but are treated by their bishop, may appeal to a syndikon.
The 70th forbids all the clergy to keep company with heretics and schismatics.
The 82d directs that greater respect be paid to old peoples, and to the poor, than to others.
The 344th declares that the bishop should have whatever, whether heretic, Jew, or pagan, to remain in church until the mass of the aforesaid was finished.
The 93d and 94th order that the offerings of those who are at variance, or those who oppress the poor, be reegected.
The 99th forbids a woman, however well instructed and holy, to presume to teach in an assembly of men.

See Labbe, Concil. ii. 1196.

XI. Held about the year 401, in June, by Aurelius, at the head of sixty-two bishops. It was agreed that deputies should be sent to Rome and to Milan, to submit for approval a scheme for putting into the order of clergy the children of Donatists who had been converted. The great scarcity of clergy in Africa arose chiefly from the oppression of the Donatists, and the extreme carton of the bishops in making choice of fit persons.
Fifteen canons were drawn up, one of which directs that the bishop shall live at his cathedral church.
The decree concerning the continence of the clergy was confirmed. See Labbe, Concil. ii. 1241.

XII. This council was held Sept. 13, 401, to consult upon the best method of acting towards the Donatists.
It was resolved to treat them with lenity, and (2) that those of the Donatist clergy who desired to resume their ministerial functions in the Church should be received. Afterwards the council drew up certain rules of discipline. Some suppose that these canons were drawn up at another council in the same year.

1. The canon made in the Council of Carthage, A.D.
396, which forbids the marriage of bishops, priests, and

CARTHAGE
CARTHAGE

desecraced, was confirmed, and its observance enforced under the ecclesiastication. In the case of bishops, it was ruled that each Church should follow its own custom in the matter.

2. It was forbidden to any bishop to change the place of his see, or to absent himself from it for long together.

3. It was ordered, that whenever it became necessary to consult the whole council, all the bishops of each province should assemble previously, in two or three classes, from whom all the deputies should be chosen, who should be obliged to proceed forthwith to the council, or to communicate the cause of their absence.

4. The action in the case of the goods should be refused community, and deposed, on account of any crime committed, should be allowed the space of one year wherein to justify themselves, or not be doing the same within the year, they should never be received again.

5. That if any bishop should make any strangers, not his kinsmen, nor his relatives, if they were heretics, or heathens, his heirs, in preference to the Church, he should be anathematized after his death. The part in which the property only which was not in the eighth canon of the Council of Hippo permitted him to dispose of by will, was, his patrimony, and property which had been given to him.

6. In order to prevent superstition, it was resolved to allow of no altar or chapel in honor of a martyr, except his body was actually there buried, or except he had lived or had suffered there; and that all altars should be destroyed which had been erected upon the strength of pretended revelations.

It is not known what bishops were present in this council, but there is good reason to believe that the number was large, and that Aelfricus, St. Augustine, and Possidius were present. The Donatists were invited to a conference, but they rejected the offer with contempt, upon the pretense that they could not confer with sinners. As a consequence the fathers in council were obliged, through their legates, the bishops Euodius and Theodiscus, to require from the emperor Honorius that laws should be enacted against the Donatists. See Labbe, Concil. ii, 1292.

XIII. This council was held Aug. 25, 403; at which Alypius, St. Augustine, and Possidius were present. The Donatists were invited to a conference, but they rejected the offer with contempt, upon the pretense that they could not confer with sinners. As a consequence the fathers in council were obliged, through their legates, the bishops Euodius and Theodiscus, to require from the emperor Honorius that laws should be enacted against the Donatists. See Labbe, Concil. ii, 1291.

XIV. Was held Aug. 28, 405. It was resolved that letters should be written to the governors of the provinces, begging them to labor to effect union throughout Africa. A letter to the emperor was also agreed upon, thanking him for the expulsion of the Donatists. See Labbe, Concil. ii, 1331.

XV. At this council, held in 407, deputies were present from every province in Africa. By common consent, according to the canons of Hippo, which decreed that a general African council should be held annually, on account of the difficulty of getting to the council. It was further ruled, that when any circumstance arose affecting the whole Church of Africa, the matter should be communicated in writing to the bishop of Carthage, who should thereupon convene the council in which it might be determined what should be done; that other matters should be considered and determined in their own province; that in case of an appeal, each party should name their own judges, from whose decision there should be no further appeal. In order to prevent the bishops from going to the emperor's court more than was absolutely necessary, the council ordered that the cause should be specified in the letter to the Roman Church, given to every bishop journeying to Rome, and that, when at Rome, a letter for the court should be given to him; that if any bishop, having received a commendatory letter for his voyage, should arrive at the court, should nevertheless go thither, he should be separated from communion. It was also ruled, that no new see should be erected without the consent of the bishop out of whose diocese it was to be formed, and that of the primates and whole council of the province. Rules were also laid down concerning the conduct of the Donatists; the council further deputed the bishops Vincentius and Fortunatusian to attend the emperor in the name of the whole African Church, and to defend the cause of the Church in the conference with the Donatists, and also to demand of the emperor five ad vocates to defend the interests of the Church. See Labbe, Concil. ii, 1338.

XVI. Held Jan. 12, 411, with a view to uniting the Donatists with the Catholic Church, and convincing them of the necessity of seeking for salvation therein.

These heretics appear to have increased to such a degree in Africa, that they were in a fair way to overwhelm the Catholics altogether, and from the time of their obtaining full liberty they were guilty of acts of violence equal to the acts of the Heretics of the sixteenth century, and the necessity of the Church being united was now more urgently called for. The Catholic bishops having at last persuaded the emperor Honorius to allow a public conference with the Donatists, Marcellinus was sent over to Africa by order of that prince, who appointed June 1 for the day of meeting. He also ordered that seven bishops only, on each side, should take part in the conference, to be chosen by the whole number, but that each party might have seven other bishops, with whom the disputants might take counsel, if they needed it; that no other bishop should be permitted to take part in the conference than the fourteen disputants; and, lastly, that each party should bind itself to stand by the acts of those whom they had named to represent them, and that notes of what passed should be taken by public notaries.

The Donatists, however, refused these terms, and desired that all their bishops should be present. The Catholics, on their part, wrote to Marcellinus, accepting his offer, and threatening they would declare their object to be to show that the holy Church throughout all the world cannot perish, however great may be the sins of those who are members of it; and, further, they declare their willingness, if the Donatists can show that the Catholic Church is reduced to their communion, to submit themselves entirely to them, to vacate their sees and all their rights; but if the Catholics, on the other hand, can show that the only true Church is in their communion, and that the Donatists are in error, that they will, nevertheless, preserve to them the episcopal honor; that in cities where there are both a Catholic and a Donatist bishop, both shall sit alternately in the episcopal chair, and that when one of the two shall die, the survivor shall remain sole bishop. Then they named, as their representatives in the conference, Aurelius of Carthage, Alpian of Tagaste, Augustine, Vincentius of Capua, Fortunatus of Cirta, Fortunatianus of Soes, and Possidius of Calama. Seven others were also named for consultation, and four more as sureties that the result of the conference should be observed faithfully. The Donatists also (being compelled) named their representatives in the same order.

In the second sitting, after a long discussion, a delay was granted. In the third sitting the Donatists did everything in their power to prevent the question of the origin of the schism being inquired into; but Marcellinus caused the statement of Anulinus the proconsul to be read, in which he set forth the complaints of the Donatists against Cæsarianists. The Donatists, being thus hand pushed, presented a memorial, in which they endeavored to show from holy Scripture, that bad pastors are spots and defilements in the Church, and that she cannot have among her children any that are openly wicked. After this document had been read, the Catholics answered it through Augustine. He strongly established the verity, that the Church is in this world composed of evil members, both open and concealed, and that the good, although they are mingled with the evil, do not participate in their sin. From Cyprian he showed that it was in the Church that the devil sowed the tares (which was contested by the Donatists), the object of the Catholic Cyprian was to prove that in this world there are evil members, whether they are open or concealed, and that the good, although mingled with the evil, do not participate in their sin. From Cyprian he showed that it was in the Church that the devil sowed the tares (which was contested by the Donatists), the object of the Catholic bishops being to prove that in this world there are evil members, whether they are open or concealed, and that the good, although mingled with the evil, do not participate in their sin.

way be reconciled. He showed that the Church is to be regarded in two lights: first, as she is, militant in this world, having within her both good and bad men; and secondly, as she will stand in the future, when all evil shall be purged out of her; he also explained how the faithful are bound in this life to separate from the evil, viz. by withdrawing from all participation in their evil deeds, not by separating from them outwardly.

When the Donatists found themselves too closely pressed by the reasoning of Augustine, they declared plainly that they did not conceive themselves to be permitted to join in any act of devotion with those who were not perfectly just, and true saints, for which reason they regarded the holy sacraments as utterly null and void, except they were administered by persons whom they knew to be truly preachers of the same cause they insisted upon rebsipizing Catholics. Augustine, in reply, showed plainly that such a notion went at once to overthrow all external religion whatever, since difficulties without end must arise upon the question of the personal holiness of ministers.

They now proceeded to inquire into the original cause of the rupture between the Donatists and Catholics. The former maintained that they were justified in separating from Cecilianus, who had been consecrated by men who were themselves " Traditores." However, the proofs which they alleged were without weight, and Augustine, in reply, further unravelled all their tricks and shifts. He bade them bear in mind that Memmius, the predecessor of Cecilianus, although charged with the same crime of having given up the sacred volumes, was yet never publicly condemned; that the Council of Carthage against Cecilianus condemned him in his absence, and that this was done by bishops who in the Council of Cirtha had been pardoned for the same crime; in proof of which he caused the acts of the Council of Cirtha, A.D. 306, to be read.

After various shifts on the part of the Donatists in the matter of this last-mentioned council, the acts of the Council of Rome, in 313, absolving Cecilianus, were read, and also the letter of Constantine to Eumelas, upon the subject of the contradictory judgment which that prince had given in the matter of Cecilianus. It seemed, indeed, as M. Tillemont observes, as if the Al-masai constrained the Donatists to speak in spite of themselves, since the very document which they produced served only to bring out more clearly the innocence of Cecilianus; for, first, wishing to show that Constantine, after having absolved Cecilianus, had condemned him again by a later judgment, they were blind enough to produce a petition which they had clumsily addressed to the pope of which it appeared that he had himself condemned them, and maintained the innocence of Cecilianus; secondly, they produced a letter of Constantine, in which he acknowledges that the cause of Felix of Aptoula had not been examined and judged impartially, and in which he ordered that Inquitius, who confessed that he had told a lie, should be sent to him, in order to bring about the condemnation of Felix.

Now, nothing could better serve the cause of the Catholics and more confound the Donatists than to show that this very Felix was in truth innocent of the charge upon which he had been condemned; for, simply considered, their charge against Cecilianus was, that he had been consecrated by a man who had delivered up the Holy Scriptures. But, to complete the proof of the innocence of Felix, the Catholics produced the statement of the procuress Eliana, who had acted as judge in the affair, and the very acts of the judgment, to none of which had the Donatists anything to object; and finally, the Catholics having entirely established every thing that they had asserted, Marcellinus gave sentence, two hundred and eighty-one articles of which still remain to us; it was to the effect that the Donatists had been entirely rebfuted by the Catholics; that Cecilianus had been justified, and that, even had the crimes with which he had been accused been proved against him, he was a man of good will, and that, accordingly, those of the Donatists who should refuse to unite themselves to the Church should be punished as the laws directed.

From this sentence the Donatists appealed to the emperor, but in vain. Honorius confirmed the acts of the conference of Cartaghe by a law, bearing date Aug. 30, 414.

This conference may be said to have given the death-blow to Donatism. From this time the sectarians came in crowds to unite themselves to the true Church, and the heresy declined. See Labbe, Concil. ii, 1355.

XVII. Held in 412, against Celestius, the disciple of Pelagius. In this same council, ii, 1510.

XVIII. Held in 416, against Pelagius and Celestius. It was composed of sixty-seven bishops, whose names are preserved; Aurelius of Cartaghe presiding. The letters of Heres and Lazarus were read, in which they accused Pelagius and Celestius of errors worthy to be visited with the censures of the Church. Then the acts of the Council of 412 against Celestius were read. It was finally resolved that both he and Pelagius should be anathematized, unless they would unequivocally abjure their wicked doctrine. A synodical letter was also addressed to pope Innocent, to inform him of the affair, and he added the heaviest canon, that treachery to the decree. In this letter the principal errors of Pelagius are specified and refuted summarily from Holy Scripture; to it were added the letters of Heres and Laz-rus, and the acts of the Council of 412, in which Celestius was condemned. See Labbe, Concil. ii, 1538.

XIX. Held by Aurelius in 419; composed of two hundred and seventeen or two hundred and fourteen bishops. Here eight doctrinal articles, drawn up by Augustine, were agreed to against the Pelagians. These articles or canons have come down to our time, and are dated May 1, 418. The last three definitively declare that no man can be said to be without sin, and anathematize those who should deny it. Besides these canons, the oldest Roman code adds another, by which the council condemns with anathemas those who hold that infants dying without baptism enjoy a happy existence, although not in the kingdom of heaven. Photius, who, as a later bishop, had given the Pope the use of good MSS, recognises this canon; and, as a further proof of its genuineness, Augustine, in his letter to Boniface, says, that both councils and popes had condemned the heresy of the Pelagians, who maintained that infants not baptized enjoy a place of salvation and repose out of heaven.

In this same council, ten other canons were agreed to against the Donatists. It was determined, that in places containing both Catholics and Donatists, each party recognising a different diocesan, the Donatists, at whatever period they might have been converted, should belong to the bishopric which the original Catholics of the place recognised as their own. That if a Bishop of a Donatist church be converted, those parishes where the Donatists had been under his jurisdiction, and the Catholics under the bishop of some other city, should be equally divided between the two bishops, the oldest to make the division, and the other to have the choice. The same council determined, by another remainder, that the priests and other inferior clergy had any complaint to make against the judgment of their bishop, their case might be judged by the neighboring bishops, from whose decision they might appeal either to the primate or to the Council of Africa; but if they pretended to appeal to any authority beyond the sea, all Donatists were forbidden to communicate with them. It also gave permission to a virgin to take the veil and the vows before the age of twenty-five, in cases where her chastity was endangered by the power of those who sought her in marriage, provided also that those upon whom she was dependent made the demand as well as herself.

The bishops at this council waited to see what steps the new pope Zosimus would take in the matter of the Pelagians, the chief of them continued at Carthage, and thus formed there for some time a sort of general council. In the end, Zosimus, perceiving that he had permitted himself to be taken in by the Pelagians, gave his sentence, confirming the decrees of the African council; and according to the judgment of pope Innocent, his predecessor, he condemned afresh Pelagius and Celestius, reduced them to the rank of penitents, under condition that they abjured their errors, and, in case of refusal, sentenced them to be entirely cut off from the communion of the Church. He also wrote a very long epistle to all the churches of the world, which all the Catholic bishops subscribed. The emperor Honorius issued a decree against the Pelagians, and added the weight of his authority to the decision of the Church.

At the head of these decrees, the bishops wrote to Zosimus, the pope, declaring that they were resolved that the sentence passed by his predecessor Innocent against Pelagius and Celestius should remain in force against them, until both of them should clearly recognize the necessity of divine grace, agreeably to the decrees of the council; and that so they need never hope to return into the bosom of the Church without abjuring their errors. They also reminded the pope of the mean opinion which Innocent had of the Council of Diospolis, and represented to him that he ought not to have given ear so readily to the representations of a heretic. Lastly, they laid before him all that had passed in Africa upon the subject. This letter was carried to Rome by Marcellinus, subdeacon of Carthage. See Labbe, Concil. ii. 1576.

XX. Held May 15, 419, in the Basilica of Faustinus, was convoked by Aurelius, bishop of Carthage, assisted by the primates of Numidia, and Faustinus, legate of the pope. Deputies from the different provinces of Africa and the bishops of the proconsular province were present, making in all two hundred and seventeen bishops; Aurelius presiding, and Augustine being present.

At the first sitting the pope's instructions to his legates were read, and also the canon, which he brought forward in order to show that all bishops have a right of legislation. First, it was decreed that the pope should be written to, in order to secure an authentic copy of the canons. Secondly, all that related to the case of appeals was read, and Augustine promised that it should be observed until they had received more authentic copies of the Council of Nicea. Thirdly, the Nicaeans, together with other ordinary African canons, and the several regulations made by the African councils held under Aurelius. Fourthly, the affair of Apianus (q. v.) was discussed, and the right of appeal to Rome denied. The bishops further desired that the clergy should make complaint of judgments passed upon them by the primates or council of the province, and to the bishops of the neighboring provinces. Finally, Cyril, bishop of Alexandria, and Atticus, of Constantinople, delivered to the priests deputed by the council faithful copies of the acts of the Council of Nicea.

In the second sitting six canons were drawn up, relating to the charges that might be alleged against clerks. See Labbe, Concil. ii. 1689.

XXI. It is doubtful whether this council, held in 424, was not merely a continuation of the preceding. It was called to attend to the business of Apianus, mentioned in the account of the preceding council. After having been re-established by the foregoing council, he was again guilty of great enormities, and, accordingly, a second time excommunicated, and driven out of Trabuc, a city in the proconsulate of Africa, whence he fled to Rome. The pope Celestine, giving credit to everything that he was pleased to pretend in the way of justification, readmitted him to communion, and added further a letter to the bishops of Africa. This controversy on the part of the pope caused the whole of the Africa to assemble at Carthage, to hold there a general council. Out of the whole number present we have the names of only fifteen. Apianus appeared with Faustinus, who acted rather as his advocate than his judge. He wished them to promise to receive Apianus into communion with them; but the fathers, in their conference, thought first to examine into his criminal conduct. Apianus eventually confessed the crimes of which he had been guilty, and was excommunicated. The council ordered a letter sent to pope Celestine, in which they complained of his conduct in absolving Apianus; begged of him to be future not to listen so easily to those who came to him from Africa, nor receive into communion those whom they had excommunicated; and lastly, requested the pope to send no more legates to execute his judgments, lest the pride of the world be introduced into the Church of Christ. See Labbe, Concil. ii. 1638.

XXII. Held in 525, under pope Boniface, in order to restore the discipline of the Church. On this occasion an abridgment of the canons made under Aurelius was read. The last three forbid all appeals beyond the sea, absolutely, without making any distinction between bishops and others. See Labbe, Concil. iv. 1628.

XXIII. Held in 555, composed of two hundred and seventeen bishops; convoked to Carthage by Reparatus, bishop of that city. A demand was made upon the emperor Justinian to restore the rights and property of the Church, which had been usurped by the Vandals, which request was granted, by a law bearing date Aug. 1 in the same year. See Labbe, Concil. iv. 1784.

XXIV. In the year 645 a conference was held between Pyrrhus, bishop of Constantinople, the chief of the Monothelites, and the abbot, Maximus, in the presence of the patrician Gregory and several bishops. Maximus there showed that there were two wills (due voluntates) and two operations in Jesus Christ. Pyrrhus yielded to his proofs, and went afterwards to Rome, where he retracted what he had formerly taught, and was received into communion; subsequently, however, he returned to his errors.

XXV. Held in the year 646. Several councils were added together in the same year, against the Monothelites; one in Numidia, another in Byzacena, a third in Mauritania, and a fourth at Carthage (sixty-eight bishops present), in the proconsular province. See Labbe and Comart, Concilia Sacrosancta i. Paris. 1671.

CARTHAGENA, Don Alfonso de, a Spanish prelate, was born a Jew. He was a son of Paulus Borgenais (q. v.), and was baptized, together with his three brothers, at the time when his father professed Christianity, in 1392. After his father's death he succeeded him in the bishopric. When the Council of Basle was convened, in 1431, he was a representative of Castile, and was treated with great honor, on account of his talents and distinguished excellence. Emas Sylvia, afterwards pope Pius II, called him, in his memoirs, "an ornament to the prelacy." Pope Eugenius IV, learning that the bishop of Burgos was about to visit Rome, declared in full council that in the presence of such a man he felt ashamed to be seated in St. Peter's chair. Spanish historians speak very highly of him. He died in 1456. Among his writings we notice, Chronicles of the Kings of Spain:—A Treatise on Christian Morality; or, Instruction for Knights, and Memorials of the Church; both of the former works were translated into Latin and Spanish; and dedicated to prince Edward, afterwards king of Portugal:—Commentary on the 28th Psalm:—Homily on Prayer. See Jücher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Da Costa, Israel and the Gentiles, p. 523 sq. (B. F.)

CARTHAGINIAN, MYTHOLOGY OF. The Carthaginians had, like their progenitors, the Phoenicians, a very imperfect mythology. The account which the Romans or Greeks gave us of them is, perhaps, the least correct, as they always identified other deities with their own. So much, however, is certain, that the religion of the Carthaginians was a branch of the fire and star worship which was universal in Phoenicia and the Orient. In general, like the Greeks and Romans, they had a kind of Polytheism of a rough, barbaric nature. Their supreme god seems to have been Moloch, or Baal (q. v.), the sun, whom all the tribes of Canaan and the neighboring countries worshipped under this name. Astarte, the second principal deity, was the receiving principle; her worship was even wilder and more profligate than that of Venus in Carthage. The worship of Astarte and Carthage was therefore called by the Romans Regnum Veneris. This cultus lasted long after Christianity had sprung up. The emperor Constantine, and, later, Theodosius, were obliged to publish edicts against it. A third deity was Melcart, who seems to have been the god of the Carthaginian Hercules. The worship of Esmun is compared to that of Aesculapius. The worship of Ceres and Proserpine came from Sicily, and that of Iolaus from Sardinia, the oldest colony of Carthage. Native hero, however, are Dido and Hamilcar, who had temples in Carthage. The Carthaginians, like the Romans, had their field-worship, their tabernaculum augurale, under a tent, beside an altar which, in important ceremonies, was turned into a funeral pile, or pyre. It is certain that the Penates and Larves were domestic deities of the Carthaginians; they took them along on journeys, for Hannibal had so many and such large idols that he was able to hide his treasures in them, when he fled from Crete. The Carthaginians considered the mountain-tops as habitations of the gods, and gave them names, as if they were the car or throne of the deities. They did not have a separate caste of priests, like the Egyptians and Indians. Their generals, high officials, and kings performed the sacrifices for the Carthaginians, although for over seven hundred years a powerful nation, still, on account of their barbaric and bloody religion, made no progress in civilization, and by their human sacrifices they became an object of abhorrence. The superstition of the people was of a wild and uncivilized nature, and cruel both to foreigners and natives. Many a Carthaginian general died on the cross because he was unsuccessful in battle; besieged tribes were horribly massacred; often the inhabitants of large cities were cut down without respect to age or sex; the corpses were torn from the graves, the temples destroyed, the statues of the deities broken to pieces, and if they were of precious metal, they were melted and carried off. Such acts of violence, however, were common in many other ancient nations. See PHENICIA.

CARTIER, Gallas, a French Benedictine, was born at Poretry, in Franco-Switzerland, April 8, 1698. In 1717 he took holy orders, and was for some time professor of philosophy and theology at the monastery of the Etienne-Minster, in the Beuvrais, and at Grangengbach. He died April 17, 1777. He was one of the most learned Benedictines of the last century, and wrote, Tract. Theol. de S. Scriptura (1736) - Autoritat in Infalibilites Summarum Pontif. (1758) - Universal. Concepta et Scientia (1749; 2 vols. - Philosophia Electrica (1756) - - Theologia Universalis (1757, 5 vols.). Wolff's Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

CARTIER, Germanus, a German Benedictine and prior at Etttenheim, where he died, Feb. 18, 1749, is the author of Dilucidatio Paschalis Ecclesiastical, Breviarri Monasti Dispositio Occurrentia (Freiburg, 1734) - Biblia S. Vulgata Editionis (Constance, 1751, 4 vols.). See Ziegler's Gesch. d. Lit. Ord. S. Bened., v, 186; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

CARTIGNY, Jean, a Flemish theologian of the order of Carmelites, was born about 1550. He was professor of theology at Brussels in the convent of his order, of which he became prior. In 1654 he was sent to Rome as delegate from his province to the general chapter. He died at Cambray in 1580, leaving, Commentaires sur l'Écriture, etc., and also the work, De Quatre Fins de l'Homme (Antwerp, 1558, 1572). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

CARTLEGG, Samuel, a Baptist minister, was born at Pedee, N. C., in June, 1750. When he was about thirteen years of age his father removed to Columbia County, Ga. He received his religious impressions under the exhortation of Mr. Marshall, and was put under the care of Rev. Daniel Marshall, when her husband, in 1771, was arrested for preaching in St. Paul's parish, and was baptized by Mr. Marshall in 1777. Although for many years he had been very active in promoting the interests of his denomination, he was not ordained till 1789, and soon after removed to South Carolina, where he was pastor of Plumb Branch Church about fifty years. In 1813 he visited Columbia County, Ga., on horseback, and preached as usual, but was thrown from his horse, and died soon afterwards. CARTOPHYLLUS. See CARTAPHILLUS.

CARTULARIUM, in a monastic or ecclesiastical establishment, is the keeper of the papers and archives. This officer, in the Church of Constantimople, was called CHARTOPHYLLUS. The cartularies of Rome presided at ecclesiastical judgments in the place of the pope. Gregory the Great sent his cartularies into Africa to hold a synod.

CARTULARY (veterum chartarum volumes) is a book containing a collection of the original, or copies, of contracts of sale and exchange, deeds, privileges, immunities, and other monuments and papers, relating to churches, monasteries, etc. The most ancient known cartulary is that of the abbey of St. Bertin, at St. Omer, compiled, according to Mabillon, by Folquinus, a monk of that abbey, at the end of the 10th century. The most noted in Italy are those of Monte Cassino and Fara. That of Compóstella, in Spain, was put together about 1129. In the library at Turin is a cartulary entitled, Chrysobolum et Argyrobolus, being a collection of diplomas of the Greek emperors, which formerly belonged to some monastery. It is signed at the end by the emperor and patriarch. Of the numerous cartularies which still exist, relating to monastic foundations in England, a list has been printed by Sir Thomas Phillips, Bart., of Middle Hill.

The term cartulary is sometimes extended to include any monastic record-book, and is likewise applied to the receptacle or room in which such documents are kept.

CARTWRIGHT, Edmund, D.D., F.R.S., an English clergyman, was born at Marnham, Nottinghamshire, April 24, 1743, and was educated at Wakefield Grammar-school. His academic studies were begun at Oxford, in University College, and in 1762 he was elected a deymy of Magdalen College, where, in 1764, CARTWRIGHT

he succeeded to a fellowship. He published, in 1779, Armire and Eleira, a legendary tale in verse, which passed through editions in more than one year. In 1779 he published his best poetical production, The Prince of Peace. In the same year he was presented to the rectory of Godby Marwood, Leicestershire, to which was added a prebend in the cathedral of Lincoln. Dr. Cartwright probably would have passed an obscure country clergyman life, but his attention had been turned, in 1784, to the possibility of applying machinery to weaving. He invented the power-loom, for which a patent was granted in 1785. In 1796 he settled in London. The first mill on his plan was that of Messrs. Grimshawe, of Manchester. About 1807 parliament voted him a grant of £10,000, in consideration of his having contributed so largely to the commercial prosperity of the nation. He also invented machines for combing wool and making ropes, and was the author of many improvements in the arts, manufactures, and agriculture. He died near Sevenoaks, Kent, Oct. 30, 1823. See Encyclop. Brit. 9th ed. s. v.

Cartwright, Joseph, an English Baptist, succeeded Thomas Charlton as minister at Mazepond, Southwark. He tried to get into the national Church, but failed to do so. He took a place in Lambrecht, Borough where he read the church prayers, and preached till his death. See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, iv. 284.

Cartwright, Peter, a famous pioneer Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Amberst County, Va., Sept. 1, 1785. He removed at the age of eight with his parents to Logan County, Ky., and grew up amid the wild scenes of backwoods life, being more familiar with the axe, rifle, and plough than with books, and hence his education was quite limited. He was converted at a protracted meeting in 1801; received license to exhort in 1802, from bishop Asbury, and removed to Lewiston County, where he entered Brown's academy and received the rudiments of an education, but continued his work as an exhorter, holding forth to large congregations. He was soon licensed to preach, which enlarged his authority but did not increase his labors or usefulness. Leaving his school to form a circuit, he supplied it with preaching, and was thus employed by the presiding elder until 1804, when he was admitted into the Kentucky Conference. His theological studies were with Mr. McKendree towards bishop. In 1806 he was ordained a deacon by bishop Asbury, and appointed to Marietta Circuit, O., meeting with hard service and poor fare. His next appointment was Barren Circuit, where he was allowed the first and only vacation he ever enjoyed. In 1808 he was ordained and in 1812 was appointed presiding elder of Wabash District, and in 1818 of Green River District. Between 1816 and 1826 he travelled circuits in Kentucky, and in 1821 was appointed presiding elder of Cumberland District, which was the beginning of his fifty years in regular succession of presiding eldership. He was a delegate to thirteen general conferences, beginning with 1816. In 1823 he rode on horseback into Illinois to explore the country, and in the following year moved his family to Pleasant Plains; there he continued to reside during the remainder of his eventful life; there he died, Sept. 25, 1872, and there his remains still lie in the soil which he, like Abraham, purchased with his own money. The Illinois Conference was organized in 1824, and Mr. Cartwright, becoming one of its members, was appointed presiding elder, and in that office continued in that conference until, at his own request, in 1869, a superannuated relation was granted him. He was present at first roll-call of forty-five out of the first forty-seven sessions of the Illinois Conference: a conference visitor six years to McKendree College, three to Illinois Wesleyan University, and one to Garrett Biblical Institute; and was eight years a member of the Old Western Conference, eight of the Tennessee Conference, four of the Ken¬ ucky Conference, and forty-eight of the Illinois Conference. He took an active part in all the controversies which agitated the church, and could with ease present delegations, etc., being firm in his opposition to all innovations on primitive Methodism; and during the earlier years of his ministry had many controversies with Presbyterians, New Lights, Universalists, Haly¬ons, Mormons, etc. He published two anti-Calvinistic pamphlets, but his principal literary production was his Autobiography. He has had an English edition, and been translated into German and French, the Revue des deux Mondes regarding it as a romance. While on the Illinois District he was a candidate to the state legislature, and, entering with zeal into the campaign, was elected, but soon became disgusted with politics, and returned to his God-appointed work. Few men ever passed a more eventful or toilsome life. For upwards of fifty years he was an indefatigable servant of the Church. Although considered eccentric, he was an acknowledged leader in his conference. In person five feet ten inches high, with a square-built, powerful physical frame, weighing nearly two hundred pounds, as immensely strong and enduring constitution, dark complexion, high cheek bones, small, piercing black eyes, large head, and curly black hair, he naturally appreci¬iated highly the muscular part of Christianity, consider¬ing himself one of the Lord's breaking-up ploughs, to drizzle and break with all kinds of soil, from the roughs and disturbers at camp-meetings and else¬where stood in awe of his brawny arm. Above all there was a moral and kingly power that belongs to all real heroes, which commanded the respect and reverence of all. Mr. Cartwright was a man of supreme mental force, a master in interpreting human nature, a preacher warm in sympathy, clear in thought, and often of the highest style of oratory. His speeches were short, pithy, and pointed, exhibiting a scathing sarcasm, a stern indignation, and a piercing wit that defied rejoinder. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1873, p. 115; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.; also his Autobiography.

Cartwright, William, an English clergyman and poet, was born at Northway, near Tewkesbury, Gloucestershire, in September, 1611. He was educated at the free school of Cirencester, Westminster school and Christ Church, Oxford. He took holy orders in 1638, and became the "most florid and yet seraphical preacher in the university." In 1642 he was made rector of the church of Salisbury, where he was appointed a delegate to provide for the troops sent by the king to protect the colleges. His zeal in this office caused his imprisonment by the parliamentary forces. In 1643 he was chosen junior proctor of the university and reader in metaphysics. He died Dec. 23 of the same year. He wrote several poetical pieces, among which were The Royal Slave; a Tragedy (1639); Troyes Com¬edies, with other Poems (1640). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Carus, Friedrich August, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born April 26, 1770, at Bautzen, in Upper Lusatia. He studied at Leipzig and Göttingen, and in 1783 commenced lecturing at the former place. In 1795 he was made bachelor of theology and morning preacher at the university church. In 1786 he was appointed professor of philosophy, and died Feb. 6, 1807. He wrote, De Accominatio Christi et Apostolorum (Leipsic, 1798); Die Awakening Comosmtographie Fontibis (ibid. 1796). After his death were published, Ideen zur Geschichte der Philosophie (ibid. 1805); Psychologie der Bewegung (ibid. 1830); Moral- und Religionsphilosophie (ibid. 1819; 2d ed. 1824). CARUTHERS, Eli Washington, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Rowan County, N.C., Oct. 26, 1798. He was educated at Hampden-Sidney College, Va., and New Jersey College; and graduated from Princeton College, N.J., in 1829. He was licensed to preach in the New Brunswick Presbytery in the same year; became pastor of Bethel and the adjoining churches in Guilford County, N.C.; of Alamanche Church, one of these, for over forty years, resigning in 1861; and died near Greensboro, N.C., Nov. 24, 1865. See Wilson, Pref. Hist. Alamanche; 1886, p. 347.

CARUTHERS, James El., a Presbyterian minister, was a member of the Presbytery of Peeoria, and pastor in Yates City, Ill. He died near Poland, O., March 7, 1875, aged 54 years. See Presbyterian, March 27, 1875.

Carvajal (or Carvaga), Luis de, a Spanish Franciscan, of the order Observantines, in the province of Castile, and theologian of Alcala, studied at Paris, and attended the Council of Trent, in 1547, where he delivered a discourse, on the second Sunday in Lent, which has been printed at Antwerp. He also wrote an Expositurale Declaration (in Latin) for the Immaculate Conception (Seville, 1583; Paris, 1541);—Theologiae Sententiae, etc. (Cologne, 1545);—Apostolia Monastic, against Erasmus (Basle and Paris, 1579).

Carvajal, Tomas Jose Gonzalez, a Spanish statesman and writer, was born Dec. 21, 1758, at Seville, where he studied jurisprudence and philosophy. At the age of fifty-four he commenced the study of Hebrew, and died Nov. 9, 1844. He was the author of a metrical version of the Psalms, Los Sabinos Aluminia, 1819, 5 vols.;—Los Libros Poéticos de la Santa Biblia (ibid. 1827, 6 vols.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. Carver, Dirick, an English martyr, was burned at Lewes, of the parish of Brighstone, in Sussex County. He was examined on many points of the Christian religion, and compelled to leave the works of Liberal, of which he firmly believed in, but refused to sign the articles presented him by the bishop concerning the papal Church. He was sent to Newgate prison, where he remained some time in torture. He was burned in a barrel in 1555. His sufferings were horrible, but he bore them more joyfully. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, vii, 921.

Carver, James, an English divine, was born at Wymondham, Norfolk. He was conspicuous in youth for integrity and high moral character, and began his ministry in a rural charge in Norfolk. In 1823 he entered upon the curacy of St. Nicholas, Lynn, and the evening lectureship at St. Margaret's; and in 1828 was appointed chaplain to Lord George Wellesley's prison for London debtors, in which he labored, greatly esteemed for the holy consistency of his character, till his sudden death, Sept. 3, 1840. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1841, p. 31. (J. C. S.)

Carver, Robert, a Congregational minister, was born at Taunton, Mass., April 20, 1810. He graduated at Yale College in 1833, and at Andover in 1836. He preached in Phillipsburg, Ont.; Walden, Vt.; Berlin, Mass.; Plattsburg, Vt.; Cut trespass., L. I.; and Raynham, Mass. In 1857 he took charge of the boarding-house of the Wheaton Female Seminary, Norton, Mass. He was subsequently appointed chaplain to the 7th regiment of Massachusetts Volunteers, and in 1861 left with them for Washington. His health declined after the campaign of Yorktown, and he was compelled to leave the service. He was conveyed to the house of his father, in Orient, L.I., where he failed rapidly, and died Feb. 28, 1863. "Few excelled him in fidelity as a chaplain, adhering to his post and duty to the last." See Cong. Quarterly, 1863, p. 194.

Cary, Alice, an American authoress, was born in the Miami valley, eight miles north of Cincinnati, O., April 26, 1820. At the age of eighteen she began to write verses, and for ten years made frequent contributions to local and distance newspapers and magazines. Attention was first attracted to her by some sketches of rural life published in the National Era. The poems of Alice and her sister, Phoebe Cary, appeared in 1841. In 1850 she removed to New York, where, with her sister, she devoted herself successfully to literature. He was professor in the University of New York, Dec. 8, 1842. Of some of her best works are, Cloternook Papers (in two series, 1851 and 1853) — Hogar: A Story of To-day (1852) — Lyra and other Poems (1858) — Married, not Mated (1856) — The Bishop's Son (1867), etc.

Cary, Phoebe, an American authoress, sister of Alice, was born near Cincinnati, O., Sept. 4, 1824, and died at Newport, R. I., July 31, 1871. When quite young, she contributed largely to periodicals. Her writings were chiefly poetical. Her earliest poem of speech worth was her New Home, which was a popular success. Her published works, besides the contributions to the volume issued in conjunction with her sister, were, Poems and Parodies (1854) — Poems of Faith, Hope, and Love (1868); and a large portion of the Hymns for all Christians, compiled by the Rev. Dr. Deems in 1869. She was a Free will Baptist, married the Rev. Dr. Deems, on Nov. 12, 1871. Some of her best works are, Cloternook Papers (in two series, 1851 and 1853) — Hogar: A Story of To-day (1852) — Lyra and other Poems (1858) — Married, not Mated (1856) — The Bishop's Son (1867), etc.

Cary, Richard M., a Free will Baptist minister, was born at Williamsburg, Va., Dec. 10, 1749. After two or three changes of residence, his father removed, in 1806, to western New York, and settled in Boston. Erie Co., then known a "The Holland Purchase." He was converted in 1816, and soon after became pastor of the Church in Hamburg, N. Y., where he remained for twelve years, having also the pastoral charge of the Church in Zoor. He afterwards performed much evangelistic labor in different sections of the country, and was pastor of a church in what is now Ashford, Cattaraugus Co., for twenty years. In 1842 he removed to Cohoes, N. Y., and was the pastor of the Church in Cohoes, N. Y., for five years, and of the Church at Fort Plain, N. Y., until his death, Oct. 16, 1868. See Barrett, Memoirs of Eminent Preachers, p. 157-170. (J. C. S.)

Cary, Robert, LL.D., an English clergyman and learned chronicler, was born at Cockington, Devonshire, and educated at Exeter and Corpus Christi Colleges, Oxford. He became rector of Portlemouth, in Devonshire, and affiliated with the Presbyterians of that section during the civil war. He became archdeacon of Exeter, Aug. 18, 1662, but was ejected in about two years, after which he retired to his rectory at Portlemouth, where he died, Sept. 19, 1668. His principal work was entitled Palæographia Chronicorum, a chronological account of ancient time, in three parts: 1. Didatical; 2. Apodeictical; 3. Canonical (Lond. 1667). See Chalmers, Biojg. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Cary, Samuel, a clergyman of Boston, Mass., who died in 1615, aged thirty, published Sermon, etc. (1608-17), s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Cary and Thomas, a Congregational minister, was born at Charlestown, Mass., Oct. 17, 1745. He graduated at Harvard College in 1761; was ordained at Newburyport, Mass., as pastor of the First Church, May 11, 1796, and died there, Nov. 24, 1808. "He possessed a strong and comprehensive mind, which was highly cultivated by reading, observation, reflection, and prayer." His only published writing is a Discourse. See The Panoplist, Dec. 1808. Caryatid, a name given to statues of women applied instead of columns, in Greek architecture, as at the Erechtheum at Athens.

Caryáthia, in Greek mythology, was a surname of Diana, who had a sanctuary near the pillars of Hermes and close by Carys, in Laconia. The place was sacred to Diana and the nymphs, and yearly the Laconian maidens danced ring-dances around the statue of the goddess, which stood in the open air. Some have thought to find a fac-simile of these Spartan dancers in the Caryatides, or female columnar figures of antique architecture.

Caryophyllae, or Caryophylle, John Matthew, a Greek prelate and scholar, was born in the isle of Corfu. Having studied at Rome in the college of Greeks, he returned to his own country, but soon went back to Rome, where he taught in the same college. He entered successively the service of cardinals Abbatrandini, Ludovisi, and Barberini—all three nephews of the popes. The second of these cardinals procured

CASANATI, MARC ANTONIO ALEGRE DE, a Spanish Carmelite, died in 1658, at the age of sixty-eight, leaving a work entitled The Paradise of Carmelites.

CASANOVA, JOSE MARIA, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born at San Cristobal, state of Nuevo Leon, Mexico. He removed to Texas about 1865; was converted to Protestantism in 1874; and in 1875 was licensed to preach, and sent to start a mission in Concepcion. He continued a faithful missionary until his death, Oct. 4, 1878. Mr. Casanova was nearly twenty years in the Indian, and was noted for his preaching abilities. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1879, p. 114.

CASATI, Cherbino, an Italian theologian and preacher of the order of Clerks Regular of St. Paul, was a native of Milan. He entered his order in 1565, and had the control of various colleges, and preached with success in many cities of Italy. He died January 1618, leaving 13 discipulos Apostolos (Milan, 1616). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

CASATI, Paolo, an Italian Jesuit, was born at Piacenza in 1617. He taught mathematics and theology at Rome and in the colleges of his order, then was sent by his general to Sweden, where he influenced queen Christina to embrace the Catholic religion. On his return he governed several houses of the Jesuits, and was for thirty years at the head of the University of Parma, where he died, Dec. 22, 1707. His principal works are, De Terra Mucchius Mota (Rome, 1688); La Tromba Paralante (Parma, 1678); De Anglia (Piacenza, 1703); Optica Disputations (Parma, 1705); written when he was blind and eighty-eight years of age.

CASAUBON, Mignon, a Swiss Calvinistic theologian and critic, son of Isaac Casaubon, was born at Geneva, Aug. 14, 1599. He commenced his studies at the Protestant academy of Sedan, then went with his father to England, where he became distinguished, under the protectorate of Cromwell, by his attachment to the Stuarts. He died July 14, 1671, while rector of Bledon, in the county of Somerset, prebendary of Canterbury, and rector of Ickham. Like his father, he pursued a literary career, and was also one of the most distinguished critics of his time. He wrote, besides, some very scholarly works upon other subjects: Putes contra Malebrosi Patroni Nominaev et Religionis Hosten (Lond. 1651); - Vinocatio Patris Adevens Reimpostae (1624). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.

CASEDO, a martyr of Persia, daughter of king Sapor, is celebrated by the Greeks and Latin Sept. 29, according to Tillemont (vol. 663), but the story is not in the Menology of Basil, and Soccone knows nothing of it.

CASE (or CASE), Alexander, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the Edinburgh University in 1690; was appointed to the living at Polwarth in 1664; was a member of the General Assembly in 1638, and of the Commission of Assembly in 1644 and 1646. He died after July 28, 1651, aged seventy-three years. See Fasti Eccles. Scottiani, i, 423.

Case, Charles Z., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Sudus, N.Y., July 21, 1857. He spent his early years on his father's farm; joined the Church at the age of fourteen; studied two years at Wesleyan Seminary, and then, in 1857, began his regular conference duties. From that time until his death he labored with great application, zeal, and success. He died Oct. 19, 1872. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1873, p. 129.

Case, Francis Hiram, a Congregational minister, was born at West Simsbury (now Canton), Conn., Oct. 1, 1797. He graduated at Yale College in 1822, and at the Yale Divinity School in 1825. Feb. 1, 1826, he was ordained pastor of the Congregational Church in Goshen. From this charge he was dismissed, Sept. 30, 1828. He was then for eighteen months an agent of the American Tract Society in the Southern States. Returning to Connecticut, he was installed pastor of the Congregational Church in Ansonia, Conn., Nov. 22, 1830, and in 1833 was dismissed April 28, 1840, and soon after removed to Whitewater, Wis., where he supplied the pulpit from 1842 to 1844, and where he resided until 1868. He died at Cold Spring, Wis., Dec. 20, 1872. See Obituary Record of Yale College, 1873.

Case, John W., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at West Greenwich, R.I., July 22, 1798. He was converted at sixteen, and in 1816 was admitted on trial to the New England Conference. When the conference was divided, in 1840, he became a member of the Providence Conference, from which he received laborious appointments with small compensation until 1873, after which he was a superannuate until 1878, and thereafter a superannuate. With declining health his mind failed, and the last few weeks of his life were spent in the Hartford Retreat for the Insane, where he died, May 13, 1880. His preaching was clear, concise, and practical; his pastorate faithful and useful. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1881, p. 88.

Case, Josiah Leonard, a Congregational minister, was born in New York in 1808. He graduated at Union College, in 1836, and at the Andover Theological Seminary in 1839; was ordained Oct. 17, the same year, as pastor at Kingston; and died Nov. 15, the same year. See Triennial Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem., 1870, p. 137.

Case, Lyman, a Congregational minister, was born at Whiting, Vt., April 13, 1792. He studied theology with Josiah Hopkins and B. Wooster, and was ordained at Coventry, Vt., 1820. After his dismissal from Coventry he resided in various towns in Vermont and Canada. During the latter part of his life, he was colporteur for the American Tract Society. He died Feb. 27, 1857. See Cong. Quarterly, 1864, p. 32.

Case, Moses Parmelee, a Congregational minister, was born in Vermont in 1819. He graduated at the University of Vermont in 1839, and studied theology a part of a year at Andover Theological Seminary, and was ordained at Andover in 1845. He was a teacher in the high-school of Newburyport, Mass., seven years, and died at Pepperell, Dec. 18, 1859. See Triennial Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem., 1870, p. 168.

Case, Pierre de. See Cassis.

Case, Thomas, an eminent English Nonconformist divine, was born at Boxley, in Kent, in 1608 or 1609, and educated at Christ Church, Oxford. He took orders in the Church of England, and preached for some time in Oxfordshire and Kent, and held the living of Erpingham, in Norfolk, from which he was ejected for nonconformity. In 1641 he joined the parliamentary party, and became minister of St. Mary Magdalen, Mile Street, London, and afterwards lecturer at Aldermanbury and St. Giles's, Cripplegate. He was imprisoned six months in the Tower for being implicated in the plot of Christopher Love (q. v.), but was released and restored to his living. He died May 30, 1682. His works consist chiefly of sermons preached on various occasions. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Case, Wheeler, a Presbyterian minister, was licensed to preach by Suffolk Presbytery, settled as first incumbent of New Hale, Mass., May 1, 1718, and continued there more than twenty years. He died in 1739, leaving a number of poems, written to promote the cause of liberty (reprinted in New York in 1852). See Alexander, Princeton College in the 18th Century.

Case, William, a Congregational minister, was born in Connecticut in 1796. He graduated from Yale College in 1818. He died two years in Andover Theological Seminary, as a member of the class of 1824, and was ordained Sept. 1 following. See Triennial Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem., 1870, p. 69.

Cassell, or Cheesell, Johann. See Cassells.

Caselli, Carlo Francesco, an Italian prince, was born at Alessandria, Oct. 20, 1740. He entered the order of Servites, became procurator-general, then consultor of the Congregation of Rites, and was one of the signers of the Concordat in 1801. Pius VII raised him to the dignity of bishop of Sidon in paribus, made him cardinal in 1802, and appointed him bishop of Parma in 1804. In 1811 Caselli sat in the Council of Paris. On the fall of Napoleon the emperor, Marie Louise conferred upon him the office of private counselor with the number of the order of St. George. In 1823 he returned to Rome, and was a member of the claque for the election of a new pontiff. He died April 19, 1828. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bioog. Generale, s. v.

Casembrodt (or Casenbrodt), Abraham, a Dutch painter, lived about 1650. He painted some historical subjects, three of which, representing the Fusion of Christ, are in the church of San Giovanniachis, at Messina.

Casmant, (1) a frame enclosing part of the glazing of a window, with hinges to open and shut. (2) An old English name for the deep hollow moulding, similar to the scotia of Italian architecture, which is extremely prevalent in Gothic architecture, in cornices, door and window frames, in columns, arches, etc., especially in the circular style, and which is frequently enriched with running patterns of foliage.

Casey, Hiram, a Baptist minister, was born in Georgia, March 23, 1870. He united with the Church in 1812, and soon began to preach. So neglected had been his education that when he commenced preaching he could scarcely read a hymn or text. In his appearance he was something of everything in his dress. He travelled extensively, not only in Tennessee, but in other parts of the country, having for his companion Rev. John Wiseman, a famous preacher of his times. He was instrumental in building up several churches in Middle Tennessee. In 1824 he moved to Hardeman County, Tenn., and devoted most of his ministerial life to his death, Dec. 4, 1828. See Bosom Sketches of Tennessee Ministers, p. 140-145. (J. C. N.)

Cash, Rezin, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was a native of the western shore of Maryland, Montgomery County. In 1794 he entered the travelling connection. and remained faithful until his death, in 1808. Mr. Cash was a man of great solemnity of mind, goodness of heart, and attentive steadfastness in Christian and ministerial duties. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1804, p. 117.

Cash, Thomas, an English minister of the Society of Friends, was born at Alderney, Nov. 13, 1739. He was converted in his twenty-fourth year, and when thirty-two years of age felt himself called into the ministry. He travelled through Great Britain, appointing meetings for all who desired to hear the gospel. Having in his secular business acquired a competency, he gave his entire attention to the ministerial work. He died Jan. 16, 1809. See Piety Promoted, iii, 409-413. (J. C. S.)

Cash, Thomas Y., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born at Washington, Fauquier Co., Va. His pious parents led him to give his heart and devote his life to God when but a boy. After spending several years as an earnest, pious Christian, and serving some time as a local preacher, he entered the Virginia Conference in 1846, and labored in the circuit for the next ten years. On Jan. 2, 1856, he was married to Miss Mary B. Greely, of Greely, N. Y. He was remarkable for his devoted, consistent Christian life. He was quiet and unobtrusive, yet wielded a wondrous power. He was sound and clear in Scripture exposition, and fearless in the application of truth. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1865, p. 588.

Cashmirian Version of the Scriptures. This is the dialect spoken north of Lahore. An edition of the New Test., was printed in 1820, after having been ten years in course of preparation. In 1832 the Old Test. was completed for the press as far as the second book of Kings.

Casiana was a deaconess, to whom Theodoret wrote his Epistl, 17;

Casillac, Bernard de, a French prelate, was provost of Saint-Cécile of Albi and prior of Parcos, when he was elected by the chapter, Dec. 8, 1434, in place of Pierre Neveu; but pope Eugenius IV gave the bishopric to Robert Dauphin, bishop of Chartres. De Casillac applied to the Council of Basle, which recognised his election and consecrated him, Feb. 12, 1435, in the church of the Franciscan friars at Basle. Robert, on his being appointed, received the vestments from the pope, and was confirmed by the king, and the two candidates then made haste to take possession of the bishopric by arms. Finally their case was brought before the parliament at Paris, which, by decree of April 1, 1400, sustained Bernard de Casillac. This prelate, however, died ten years and eight months afterwards, leaving behind him only ruins as marks of his career. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Casimir, patron saint of Poland, was grand-duc of Lithuania, and third son of Casimir IV, born Oct. 5, 1458, and was educated by John Dlugoc, a canon of Cracow, commonly called Longinus. Casimir, in early youth, devoted himself to piety and asceticism. When the noble of Hungary, disdainful with Matthias Corvinus, his king, entreated the king of Poland to send his son Casimir to occupy the throne, the latter, with extreme reluctance, went thither; but finding that the differences between Matthias and his people were adjusted, he joyfully returned home, and spent the rest of his life in exercises of devotion. He died of consumption, at Wilna, in Lithuania, March 4, 1482. He was canonized by pope Leo X. The day of his commemoration is March 4. See Landen, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Casimir, a French Capuchin theologian, was born at Toulouse in 1634. He was made rector after 1666. Of his works there are extant, Histoire de Mlle, de Bachelet, printed at Toulouse, 1680, 12mo.; Le Phénomène Paroxysmatique, etc. (Bâziers, 1674, 8vo) — La Vie du P. Jean XL—27.

Casmir was martyred, together with her husband, Melasippus, and her son, Antony, at Ancyra, by order of Julian the Apostate. According to Menol. Basili., they are commemorated Nov. 7.

Casino, Monte (or Monte-Cassino) is a celebrated abbey in Italy, founded by St. Benedict, and situated on a mountain immediately behind the city of Casino. It was here that St. Benedict established the order which bears the name of this place. The abbey of Monte-Cassino was destroyed by the Lombards in 580, when St. Benedict, the abbot, and all his monks escaped to Rome, and were lodged near the Lateran church. About 720 they were restored, under the abbot Petronax. In 884 the house was again destroyed by the Saracens, in 1468 by the Normans, and by the emperor Frederick in 1239. The Chronique of Monte-Cassino, published in 1608, comprehends all the memorable facts connected with the monastery and church, from 542 to 1186. It is in four books, the three first written by Leo of Ostia, the fourth by Peter the Deacon. See Monte-Cassino.

Casiri, Michael, a learned Maronite, was born in 1710 at Tripolis, in Syria. Being educated at Rome, in the college of St. Peter and St. Marcellinus, he entered the clerical order in 1734. In 1785 he accompanied Assenani into Syria, by order of the pope, to assist in a synod of the Maronites. Casiri made a report in 1738 at Rome on the religious opinions of the sect, after which he was appointed to teach in his convent Arabic, Syriac, and Chaldean, theology and philosophy. In 1748 he went to Madrid, and was employed there in the royal library, and in 1749 in the library of the Escorial, of which he was made director soon afterwards. He began in 1750 to consult the materials of the East, and of Arabe-khapanis, etc. (Madrid, 1780-70, 2 vols.) This famous work has a particular merit on account of its extracts from historical books in Arabic. The second volume, which treats of geographers and historians, is very interesting, and contains numerous documents concerning the wars between the Moors and Christians upon the Spanish peninsula. Casiri died at Madrid, March 12, 1791. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Casisia, Petrus de (Pierre Desmaso), a French ecclesiast, was a native of Limoges, where he also joined the order of the Carmelites. In 1524 he was appointed provincial of Aquitania, and in 1530 general of his order. In 1541, Benedict XII made him bishop of Vaison, and in 1542 he was appointed by Clement VI patriarch of Jerusalem. He died Aug. 3, 1348. See Bibliotheca Carmelitana (Aurélianus, 1752), ii, 561 sq.; Hundhausen, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Caskey, Curtis, a Lutheran minister, was born at Canton, O., Oct. 17, 1827. His opportunities for securing an education were meager. He was ordained in 1857 by the school of northern Illinois, and for twenty-six years was actively engaged in the ministry. His last pastorate was what was then known as the Millersburg charge, in which he served more than five years. He died at his residence in Ligonier, Noble Co., Ind., Sept. 12, 1881. See Lutheran Observer, Oct. 7, 1881.

Casmann, Otto, a German theologian and naturalist, was born at Hamburg, on the 10th of November, and afterwards pastor of the same town. He died Aug. 1, 1607. Of his works there are, Questionum Marinorum Libri ii (Frankfort, 1596, 1607, 2 vols. 8vo) — Nucleus Mysteriorum Naturae Ecclesiastae (ibid. 1605, 8vo) — two editions of the treatise of De Re Civitaria of Brucer, etc. — some other works in German and Latin, on naturalistic, of value. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Casmillius (or Cadmillius) was the fourth of the Samothracian gods, or Cabiri. Wherever he went, the harmony of his voice, the eloquence of his speech, his graceful mien, and chaste conduct persuaded men to regular, discreet, and moral ways of living. He is thought to be the same as Mercury.

Cassedi, Carlo Antonio, an Italian Jesuit theologian, was born at Milan the second half of the 17th century. After teaching philosophy and theology for some time in his native place, he visited the court of Madrid, and became examiner of the inquisition. He then went to Lisbon, where he became provincial of his order over Lusitania. He died in the first quarter of the 18th century, leaving Crisìs Theologiae in Select ore Hujus et Alquae Sacri Controversiarum (Lisbon, 1714, 2 vols.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s.v.; Casola, Pietro, an Italian theologian, was born at Milan. He became canon of the cathedral at Milan, and died there in 1507. His works are, Liber Libitumum Tridunariam (Milan, 1494);—Ratione Carinianiorum Missæ Ambrosiæ (ibid. 1498, 4to);—Ceremoniale Missæ Ambrosiæ (ibid. 1499). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s.v.

Casoli, Alessandro, a reputable Italian historian, was born at Siena in 1585, studied under Cav. Roncalli, and died in 1606. His works are principally in the churches of Siena; there are also a number at Naples and Genoa. His best is The Martyrdom of St. Bartholomeus, in the church of the San-melles.

Casolani, Iacopo (or Crucenforte), an Italian painter, was born at Siena in 1598. He was a son of Alessandro, who instructed him in his art. He finished The Assumption, of the church of San Francesco at Siena, sketched by his father before his death, and then went to Rome, and executed some fine work in the church of the Madonna de Mouli—The History of the Virgin, and an Ascension; The Trinity in Santa Maria, in Siena, painted in 1616. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s.v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s.v.

Casone, Giovanni Battista, an Italian painter, was a native of Sarzana, living in 1668; studied under Fiaseira at Genoa. There is an altar-piece in Della Vigne, in that city, representing The Virgin Surrounded by Angels.

Caspar, Adolphus B., a minister of the Reformed Church, was born at Halberstadt, Germany, Nov. 2, 1816. His father, the Rev. Frederick W. Caspar, was court-preacher to William III, king of Prussia. The son was educated in his native country. In 1836 he emigrated to America, and entered the ministry in 1837. His first charge was Dillsburg, York Co., Pa. In 1840 he became pastor of several congregations in and around New Berlin, Union Co., Pa., where he died, June 5, 1882. For some years he was not able to preach, but made himself useful by practising medicine. He was a man of fine talents, high culture, and excellent social qualities, and was greatly respected in the community in which he lived. See Ref. Ch. Miss. July 5, 1882. (D. Y. H.)

Caspari, Christian Eduard, a Protestant theologian of Germany, who died as pastor in Alsee in 1678, author of Chrono-geographische Einleitung in das Leben Jesu Christi (Hamburg, 1869); translated into English by M. I. Evans, A Chronological and Geographical Introduction to the Life of Christ (Edinburgh, 1876). (B. P.)

Caspari, David, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born March 5, 1648, at Königsberg. Having completed his studies at various universities, he was in 1670 appointed sub-inspector of the Albertian college at his native place; in 1678, rector of the cathedral school at Riga, where he died as superintendent, Feb. 28, 1702. He wrote, De Vita Dei, Quale est et ex Monte Gravorum et Poenissimae Aristotelis (Jena, 1678);—De Vite vitis de Vite et de Vite deu (Königsberg, 1677);—De Futuri Theologi Studii Philologici et Philosophici (edited by his son, 1705).—Brescianit theologiana Moralia (also edited by his son, 1712). See Gadebusch, Liebfndische Bibliothek;—Jücher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s.v. (B. P.)

Caspari, Georg, son of the preceding, was born at Riga, April 17, 1685. He studied at Rostock, and died at his native place, April 12, 1743. He published, in Dreissig Jahren, die Beschreibung (Königsberg, 1745);—De Territoria Sessiva (ibid. 1708); and other works. See Gadebusch, Liebfndische Bibliothek;—Jücher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s.v. (B.P.)

Caspepsi, Ludovicus, a Spanish Capuchin, was born at Saragossen, and joined his order when sixteen years old. He was provincial of its province ofragon, and died in 1647. He wrote, Cursus Integri Thesaurus (Madrid, 1642, 1643, 2 vols.; enlarged edition, Lyons, 1666);—Cursus Integri Philosophicus (2 vols.);—Apologia in Defensionem Annauld Zachariae Boceri (Casaragusi, 1646). See Jelier, in Wetter u. Welser's Kirchen-Lexikon, s.v. (B. P.)

Casper, Andreas, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Augsburg on Jan. 19, 1819, at Ebersfeld. He studied at Kiel; was in 1849 deacon at St. John's, in Flensburg; in 1851, pastor primordi and provost at Husum; and died April 9, 1875. He wrote, Die Symbolismus Apostolischer Meinungen der Reichsbohmen (Stuttgart, 1857);—Das Grab geredet aus der Schrift (ibid. 1858);—Christi Fundamenta (ibid. 1861-63);—Engl. Trans. of the Pro- teas of Christ, by A. G. Rodham, Edinburgh, 1871;—Praktische Auslegung der evangelischen Pericones (1872);—Praktische Auslegung der epistolischen Pericones (1875). See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 217. (B. P.)

Caspi, Joseph. See Ibn-Caspi.

Cass, William D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Bradford, Vt., April 2, 1797. He was converted at thirteen, but grew lukewarm; was reclaimed several years later by the Free-will Baptists; and was an ordained minister in that body several years. In 1827 he united with the New Hampshire Conference, and served the church faithfully until 1866, when he retired to farm life near Sanbornton Bridge, and there remained till his death, May 7, 1867. Untiring energy, farming zeal, and an infallible tact will make Mr. Cass one of the greatest powers of his connection. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1868, p. 91.

Cassady, Francis Stanbury, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Baltimore, Md., Feb. 5, 1827. He was converted in 1846, and in 1850 entered the Baltimore Conference; continued his labors until March, 1872, and then became superannuated, which position he sustained until his death, in his native state, Nov. 22, 1872. Mr. Cassady possessed superior power of mind, which, by careful discipline, made him distinguished for comprehensiveness and clearness of thought, originality, and ability. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1873, p. 30.

Cassady, Thomas S., a minister in the Methodist Church of South, was born at Thoseq, Norfolk Co., Va., in 1817. He was converted in his twentieth year; three years later received license to preach, and in 1846 entered the North Carolina Conference, and labored faithfully until his decease, Dec. 11, 1849. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1850, p. 292.

Cassan (Cassian), Casmiducus, Cassidius, was according to Colgan, a common name among the saints of Ireland; he mentions four, who are also given in Mart. Doneg. and Talloagt, but whom he cannot distinguish with any historical accuracy.

1. There is entered in the Annals of the Four Masters, "A.D. 685, Cassian, scribe of Luasa, died." He was the son of Atracht, of the race of Laisghearn, son of Naill, and the monastery where he was scribe or master was Lusk or Lush, now a parish in the barony of E. Balrothery, County Dublin.
2. Son of Neman. Mart. Doneg. calls him "Caecius of Neman, Neman is of the race of Eochaidh, son of Muireadh, of the posterity of Heremon." He flourished about A.D. 530, and was a contemporary of St. Finnian of Clonard. He is commemorated March 1.
3. Of Jomuald and Donmach-mor, in Magh-Echnach. About the middle of the 6th century, when St. Patrick lived and St. Ciaran was in Meath, he is said to have gone on a pilgrimage to Rome, and on his return became "Abbas, episcopus, et scolae publicae rector." St. Patrick afterwards gave him the church of Donmach-mor in Magh-Echnach, and also a holy patena; at this ancient church of Donaghmore, in the barony of Lower Naran, his relics were preserved, and held in the highest veneration for ages after his death. Colgan says he flourished about A.D. 456, but Cerasus or Ciaran of Saighir, a fellow-traveller to Rome, is usually placed in the following century. He is commemorated March 28.
4. Of Domnach-Peduirt. This Cassian of Peter's Church is probably son of Maenach, and brother of St. Fachtna of Ross. He may also be Cassius or Cassidius or Cassianus, "instructor" of St. Senan at Iniscaheety. He was born in the region of Kierraghra Chuirke (probably a part of Kerry), and dwelt in the monastery of Inis, where he gave the monastic robe and tonsure to St. Senan. The monastery, the scene of his early training, and the resting-place of his master, St. Senan was coming when he felt his own end approaching, but died on his way thither. He is commemorated June 17.

We find mention, also, of Cassian Chian-ratha, June 29. At Dec. 3, there is a Cassian, where Dr. Reeves (in Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, p. 325) cites an authority for identifying him with the martyr Cassian in Mauritania, commemorated in the Roman Martyr.-

Cassiana, Giovanni Francesco, an Italian painter, was born at Genoa in 1611, and studied under Strozzi. He passed some time at the archduke's court in Mirandola, where he painted a picture of St. Girolamo, in the dome of the church, besides other creditable pictures. He died in 1651. See Spoober, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefler, Novi. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cassiana, Maria Vittoria, an Italian female artist, sister of the preceding, painted small pictures of devout subjects for private collections, which were much esteemed. She died at Venice in 1711. See Spoober, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefler, Novi. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cassanate, Marcos Antonio Alcibcr, a Spanish Carmelite, was born in 1590 at Tarragona, and died in 1658, leaving nine volumes of sermons and other writings, among which are Paradisi Carmelitica Decori, etc. (Lyons, 1639, fol.). This work, which is a sort of library of famous Carmelites, was censured by the Sorbonne. See Hoefler, Noui. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cassandra, in Greek legend, was the most unfortunate of all the daughters of Priam and Hecuba. Apollonius says she was 수도로 칠을, she would teach her to look into the future. She promised, but, after having been gifted by the god, she did not keep her word. Therefore he deprived her of the faith of the people, and caused her to be a mockery among men. She was now thought insane, and, as she prophesied nothing but evil, she was imprisoned in a tower. Later she became a priestess of Minerva, out of whose temple Ajax, son of Oileus, dragged her by the hair, when she had two temple choirs thrown over the goddess. At the conquest of the city she was given to Agamemnon, who took her with him on his ships, and by her became father of the twin sons Teledamus and Pelops. When the king returned to his country she was murdered, with Cassandra. Her two sons also were slaughtered by the recent Hul Clytemnestra on the grave of Agamemnon. Pausanias relates that in the ruins of Mycenae there might be seen the grave of Agamemnon, of Cassandra, and of the two sons. She had a temple at Leuctra and a statue by the name of Alexandra.

Cassells, John Baker, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Liberty County, Ga., April 6, 1811. He spent part of a year in Princeton Seminary, N. J.; was also a student in Columbia Seminary; was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of Hopewell, April 22, 1837; was pastor at Salem Church, Ga., during 1837 and 1838, and died in Wilkes County, July 24, 1838. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 81.

Cassentino, Jacopo di, an Italian painter, was born about 1270, and studied under Tabdeo Gaddi. He founded the Florence Academy in 1350. His most memorable work was St. Luke Painting the Portrait of the Virgin, painted for the chapel of the academy. He died in 1356. See Spoober, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Rose, Gen. Biog. Dict. s. v.

Cassian, Saint. See Cassianus.

Cassiani, Padre Stefano (called il Certosino), an Italian painter, lived at Lucca about 1660. He painted in fresco the cupola of the church of the Carthusians at Lucca, also two altar-pieces, representing subjects from the life of the Virgin, and several works for other churches of that order in Pisa, Sienna, and elsewhere.

Cassianus is the name of several persons in early Christian records:
1. The second Gentile bishop of Jerusalem (Eusebius, H. E. v. 15).
2. Julius. See Cassian, Julius.
3. A Christian schoolmaster, and apparently a short-hand teacher at Imola (Forum Cornelii), in Romagna, who, on refusing to sacrifice, was given up to the boys of his school to kill with their styles and tablets. His martyrdom is assigned to Aug. 11 or 13, on which latter day it has been celebrated since the 8th century. He is said to be buried under the altar of the cathedral at Imola, which is dedicated to him (Tillumone, v. 53). The martyrdom is thought to have occurred in the time of Decius (249-251).

4. A martyr at Tangiers, commemorated Dec. 5
CASSIDAY 836

Mart, Usuard.

He is said to have been clerk of the praetorium at Targers, when the magistrate Aurelius Aquilea condemned to death St. Marcellus the centurion, at which Cassianus became so indignant that he threw both pen and paper to the ground. He was put into prison and beheaded in 298; according to the Jerusalem Martyrology, Dec. 5.

5. One of those martyred with Saturninus and Darius, under Diocletian, in 305.

6. One of the eighteen martyrs of Saragossa; being one of the four whom Prudentius calls Saturninus. He is commemorated, according to Usuard’s Marti, April 16.

7. A deacon of Rome, sent by pope Melchiades (Mitriades) to receive back the confiscated catacombs at the close of the persecution (A.D. 318), and identified by the Donatists with a Cassianus who had been a tradior; an identification which Augustine (Post. Coll. ad Don. ix, 662) indignantly repudiates.

8. One of the Donatist bishops who petitioned Julian (A.D. 362) to be recalled from exile and restored to the possession of Arela. They spoke of justice as the only plea that had any weight with the apostate.

9. Bishop of Autun, was born of noble parents in Alexandria, and brought up by bishop Zonis; he made his house a Christian hospital in the time of Julian, liberated his slaves, and built a church to St. Lawrence, all in Egypt, at which place he was made bishop against his will, in the time of Tovian, A.D. 363. He afterwards went to Autun, where he helped in the conversion of the pagans, and would have proceeded to Britain, but Simplicius detained him. Simplicius dying three years later, he was unanimously appointed his successor. He held the see for twenty years. He is ememorated, according to Usuard’s Marti, Aug. 5.

10. A presbyter who took part in the Council of Aquilea, A.D. 381.

11. Of Rome, A.D. 431, commemorated Feb. 29 (Col. Byzand.); perhaps identical with one of the above.

Cassidius (or Cassidus). See Cassan.

Cassiday, David, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Galion County, Ill., June 6, 1826. He was converted when about fourteen; received license to preach in 1846, and admitted into the Illinois Conference; located in 1850, and began business to provide for the education of his children; re-entered the effective ranks in 1852, and continued faithful until his death in April, 1862. Mr. Cassiday was prominent in theological training in preaching, and earnest in his Christian life. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1862, p. 177.

Cassie, John, A.M., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Peterhead, near Aberdeen, Scotland, in 1807. He studied theology at Glasgow, was ordained in 1834, and installed pastor of a congregation at Port Hope, Canada West, in 1835. He died June 19, 1861. See Wilson, Prob. Hist. Almanac, 1862, p. 316.

Cassin, Eugene, a French philanthropist, was born in Sens, Dec. 11, 1796. Having distinguished himself by his devotion to the sick in the hospital of Sens, which he entered as an employee, he went to Paris and became one of the most active agents of all the societies of instruction and associations of charity. He died April 1845, leaving L’Union Philanthropique (Paris, 1826, 1827) —Choc de Nouveaux Fac-simil’s d’Ecritures Contemporaines et de Personnages Ce-f-

Cassino, Bartolommeo di, an Italian painter, was a native of Milan, and studied under Civerchio. There are works by him at Milan, particularly an altar-piece in the Immotale in 1535.

Cassito, Luigi Vicente, an Italian theologian and antiquarian, was born at Bologna in 1765. He entered the order of Dominicans, became prior at the great convent of Naples, and died March 1, 1822. His principal works are, Institutiones Theologicae (4 vols. 8vo):

—Liturgia Dominica (2 vols. 8vo); —Acta Sentical Martiril de Cuma, S. Mauro: —also Discourses and Fun-

Cassius is the name of several men in early Christian records.

1. Bishop of Tyre, who in the year 198 attended the synod held at Cesarea, under the presidency of Theophilus, bishop of that city, and Nicauris, of Jerusalem, to settle the pastoral controversy (Euseb. H. E. v. 20).

2. Bishop of Avuergna, about the time of Crecus, king of the Alemanni (probably A.D. 260), was found by Victorinus, the officer of the pagan priest, in a village called the village of the Christians. Victorinus is said to have been so touched by his preaching and miracles that he became a Christian and a miracle-worker himself, and the two were martyred together, May 15. See Acta Stendurum, May, iii, 454.

4. A jailer by Byzantium, who kept Acacius in custody in A.D. 806, and testified that he had heard from the fellow-prisoners, and seen with his own eyes, that many splendid soldiers, advocates, and physicians attended on him in his cell, but disappeared immediately when the door was unlocked. He was hanged for the assertion, but persisted in it, and offered to die for it according to Simeon Metaphrastes.

5. Mons, at Bonn, Oct. 10, along with St. Gregor, according to Usuard’s Marti.

6. Bishop of Narni, said to have freed the sword-bearer of Totila from a devil by signing him with the cross. He is commemorated on June 29.

Cassius, Bartholomseus, a Dalmatian theologian and grammarian, of the Jessuit order, was born in 1575. After having been missionary in the Levant, he became successively provincial at Ragusa and apotolic penitentiary at Rome. He died Sept. 28, 1630, leaving Institutiones Motagentes (Rome, 1604, 8vo). Cassius also wrote, Spiritual Songs, in the Dal-matian language (1624, 8vo);—translations of the Roman Ritual (1640, 4to), and of the Gospel (1641, 4to).
His other works, which are in Latin, are ascetic, and of no interest. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, a. v.

Casson, Hodgson, an English Wesleyan minister, famous for his zeal, eccentricity, and success, was born at Worthington, Cumberland, in 1788. He was converted under the Methodist ministry, applied himself to study, became a local preacher—preaching and being persecuted everywhere—and was received by the Conference in 1818. His circuits were principally in the north of England and in Scotland. After a ministry of remarkable earnestness, he reluctantly retired from the active service in 1838, residing in Berks. and died Nov. 29, 1862. See Minutes of the Annual Confer-i, 1852, p. 11; West, Sketches of Wesleyan Prophets, p. 187 sq. (Long. ed.); Stevens, Hist. of Methodism, iii, 294—304; Steele, Life and Labors of Hodgson Casson (Long. 1854).

Cast, Charles, a minister of the Reformed Church, was born in Ettlingen, Germany, Feb. 22, 1815. He studied in the universities of Freiburg and Heidelberg, completing his theological course at Freiburg. He was ordained as a Roman Catholic priest in 1845, having been called to Carlshuhe, the capital of Hellen, where he attracted considerable attention as a pupil orator. He came to America in 1850, renounced Romanism and, in 1852, was received by the Swiss Reformed Church as a Mr. He labored successively in the East and West, and finally settled in Egg Harbor, N. J., where he died Jan. 2, 1883. Mr. Cassino was a man of good natural endowments and thorough scholarship, an able and eloquent pulpit orator, and successful pastor. (D. Y. H.)

CASTAGNARES, AGOSTINHO, a Roman Catholic missionary, was born Sept. 25, 1687, at Palta, in Paraguay. He was educated by the Jesuits, and entered their society when a youth. It was intended by his superiors that he should preach the faith to the savages, and being placed among the Chiquitas and Guarani, he succeeded in converting a part of the Samunyes tribe. He then went to the Mataguais, among whom he had already made some converts, when he was killed by the cacique of the tribe, Sept. 17, 1744. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

CASTAGNA (or CASTANZA), JUAN DE, a Spanish biographer and theologian, of the order of Benedictines, who died at Salamanca in 1598, was general preacher of his order, chaplain of Philip II, and censor of theology of the apostolic judges of faith. His principal works are, La Vida de Santo Benito (Salamanca, 1588, 8vo) — Historia de Santo Romualdo Padre y Fundador de los Hermanos Cisterceos de Fossanova (Istanbul, 16:0, 4to). Some biographers attribute to him a well-known book, Batalla Sacratitud, but it is known now that the monk Laurent Scupoli wrote it. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

CASTAGNO, ANDREA DEL, a distinguished Italian painter, was born in Tuscany in 1498, and was placed under the tuition of M. Montoriolo, as a young pupil. His early works are at Florence, in the Hall of Justice, and in the Church of Santa Lucia; also on a wall in the monastery of Degli Angeli. He died in 1498. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

CASTALLA, in Greek mythology, was a nymph, the daughter of the river-god Achelous, who lived near Delphi, and whom the Cyprians say he has in name. She is said to have been very beautiful, and loved by Apollo, and to escape his attentions she threw herself into the spring. Thereupon the god selected this place as his favorite spot, ordered a temple to be built, and endowed the spring with animating virtues, so that whoever drank from it would become a poet. From this spring, as also from the spring Cassotis, the Pythian prophetess drank before she took the tripod.

CASTALIU was bishop at the Council of Sirmium, A.D. 303.

CASMNET. See CYMBAL.

CASMNET, BERNARD DE, a French prelate, was born at Montpellier of an ancient family from Rouergue. He was auditor of the papal palace under Innocent V, when called to replace Bernard of Cambresis in the see of Albi, March 7, 1276. He immediately built a new cathedral, the magnificent church of St. Cecile. He laid the foundations of a convent for the Dominicans, and another for the Minorite Franciscans. Being appointed by Philip the Fair to treat with Boniface VIII about the canonization of St. Louis, he displayed great prudence and skill in the secularization of his own chapter. The severity of the bishop in his functions, however, excited the indignation of the people, of the consuls, and even of the clergy, who brought their complaints before the court of Rome. In 1308 the pope made inquiries, in consequence of which Bernard of Castanet was transferred to the bishopric of Puy. Eight years afterwards he was assigned to the bishopric of Paris and the cardinal's hat to Castanet. The latter died Aug. 14, 1317, at Avignon. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

CASTANEUS, HENRI LOUIS, bishop of Poitiers, was born Sept. 6, 1577, at Tivoli, and died July 30, 1651. He wrote, Commentarius in Genesis — Commentarius in Ezekiel, printed at Paris posthumously, and given him the Dita-clator Illustrum Cardinalium, etc. See Jörcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theolog. Lit., i. 693. (B. P.)

CASTAGGIO, PETER ATKE, founder of the institution for deaf mutes at Copenhagen, was born in Norway in 1780. After having passed through his medical studies at Copenhagen, he travelled through Germany, France, and Switzerland, where he studied the deaf and dumb. On his return in 1805 he became professor, and in 1807 director, of the institution. He died in 1827, leaving among other scientific dissertations, Farelommer over Doestumme Underreumingsens Methode (Copenhagen, 1818) — Sententia de Inspirazione Prophecy (Copenhagen, 1819) — Carl Michael de Lepin, e Biographick Forsig (Ibid. 1806), etc. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

CASTEL (or CASTELLO), THOMAS, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the Edinburgh University in 1603; was sent to preach in the presbytery of Dunfermline in 1601; was a member of the General Assembly in 1602; and died after Dec. 1, 1708. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

CASTEL, WILLIAM (1), a Scotch clergyman, studied at the University of Glasgow, and was appointed to the living at Stewarton in 1618. Between 1625 and 1630 there was a great religious awakening in the parish, known then as the "Stewart on sickness." He died in July, 1642. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, ii, 188.

CASTEL, WILLIAM (2), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at St. Andrew's University in 1625; was admitted to the living at Stewarton in 1625; not conforming to episcopacy, was confined to his parish in 1662; was excused by the privy council in 1672, and died before March 1, 1699. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, ii, 188, 189.

CASTELFRANCO, ORAZIO DA, an excellent Italian fresco painter, flourished in the time of Titian, but very little is known of him. In the church of the Dominicans, at Campo d'Istria, is a large picture, executed in the glowing style of Titian, signed "Horatio: Per P. A.D. MDLXVIII," attributed to him. He was living in 1600.

CASSITIELA, ADRIANO, an Italian prelate, was born at Corneto (Tuscan), in the latter part of the 15th century. Although of obscure parentage, he attained to the first dignities of the Church. Having been sent to England by Innocent VIII, he was gained by that mission the favor of Henry VII, who in 1503 appointed him bishop of Hereford, and in the year following transferred him to the see of Bath and Wells. Meanwhile pope Alexander VI gave him the secretariat and gave him the cardinal's hat. It is said that this pontiff, in trying to poison him, poisoned himself. Castelli was exiled by Julius II, and called back again by Leo X; but he entered into a conspiracy against the latter pope, and was condemned to pay a certain sum; he then fled from Rome, but it has never been ascertained precisely what became of him. He left, De Vera Philosophia (Bologna, 1507) — De Sternae Latino (Bazele, 1518) — De Narratione et Julii III, et Ier. (Venice, 1514). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

CASTELL, ANNIBALE, a Bolognese painter, flourished about 1616, and studied under Faceine. His best work is the Raising of Lazarus, in the Church of San Paolo, at Bologna.

CASTELLI, (or CASTELLO), BERNARDO, an Italian painter, was born at Genoa in 1567, and studied under A. Semini. He painted a number of pictures for the Genoese churches, the principal of which are St. Diego and St. Jerome, in San Francisco. At Rome he painted Peter Walking on the Sea, in the Baslese of St. Peter's, in 1629. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

CASTELLI (or CASTELLO), FABRIZIO, a talented Ital-Castiglione, Carlo Ottavio, Count, a reputable Italian philologist, was born at Milan in 1784. His principal work was in connection with the Arabic and other languages. He died at Genoa, April 10, 1849. He edited Mémorial d'Abbadia, and Universal de Lincei, di Milano, and assisted cardinal Mai in his Ulpiana Partim Ineditarum in Ambrosianis Palimpsestis Repertum Edito. A learned Mémoire Geographique et Numismatique sur la Partie Orientale de la Barbarie Appelée Afritha par les Arabes, appeared in 1826, and established Castiglione's reputation. In 1829 he published the Gothic version of the second epistle of Paul to the Corinthians, and this was followed by the Gothic version of the epistle to the Romans, the first epistle to the Corinthians, and the epistle to the Ephesians in 1834; by Galatians, Philippians, and first Thessalonians in 1835, and by second Thessalonians in 1839. See Encyclop.Brit. (9th ed.) s. v.

Castiglione, Giovanni Benedetto (called il Grechetto), an eminent Italian painter and engraver, was born at Genoa in 1616, and studied for some time under Giovanni Andrea Ferrari. He afterwards visited Rome, Florence, Parma, and Venice, in each of which cities he left proofs of his ability. His Nativit at the Church of Sant'Antonino at Genoa; His Marriage and St. Catherine, in the Madonna di Castello, are fine works of art. He died at Mantua in 1670. Some of his engravings are: Noah Driving the Animals into the Ark; The Departure of Jacob; Rachel Hiding her Father's Images; The Adoration of the Shepherds; The Angel Appearing to Joseph in his Dream; The Flight into Egypt; The Finding of the Bodies of St. Peter and St. Paul. See Spooner, Bibl. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s. v.

Castiglioni, Luca, an Italian canon and theologian, of the order of the Dominicans, was born at Feenza. After having been vicar-general of his order, he became, in 1629, bishop of Catanzaro, and died in 1631. His principal writings are, De Electione et Confirmatione Canonicorum Prelatorum (Rome, 1625) ; De Canonisatione Sanctorum (ibid. 1629). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s. v.

Castello, Avanzino di, an Italian painter, was born in the Roman States in 1552, and studied under Pomerancio at Rome, where he painted many pictures for the churches. The best of his works are, The Miracle of the Viper, in the Isle of Malta; The Decollation of St. Paul, and Paul's Ascent into the Third Heaven, in the Church of San Paolo, near Rome. Castello died in 1629.

Castello, Castellino, an eminent painter of Turin, was born in 1579, and studied under Gio. Battista Paggi. His picture of The Pentecost, in the Church of Spirito Santo, gained him much reputation. He died in 1649.

Castello, Francesco da, an Italian painter, was born in Flanders, of Spanish parentage, in 1586. He visited Rome while young, for improvement, and painted historical and sacred subjects. Among his works for the churches is an altar-piece in San Giacomo degli Spagnuoli, representing The Assumption, with a glory of angels, and the apostles below. In San Rocco di Ripetta is a picture by him of The Madonna and Child, with saints. He died at Rome in 1636.

Castellucci, Salvi, an Italian painter, was born at Arezzo in the year 1608, and studied at Rome under Pietro da Cortona. There are several of his larger works in the churches of his native city. He died in 1672.

Castelnau, Pierre de, a French Cistercian at the convent of Fontfroide, near Narbonne, was commissioned as legate by Innocent III, with two other monks of his order, Raoul and Arnaud, to combat with fire and sword the progress of the Albigensians. Castelnau showed great determination, but did not succeed in his purpose. Finally, having reproached Raymond VI for his weak faith, he died from court, but was overthrown near the Rhone and slain, Jan. 15, 1208. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s. v.

Castello y Baavedra, Antonio del, an eminent Spanish painter, was born at Cordova in 1663, and was the son of Augustin Castello, who gave him his earliest instruction. He afterwards became a scholar of Fraunc.

Castinus of Tivoli was a follower of Pope Simplicius. It is uncertain whether this was the same as the Castinus who was general under Honorius in 422, and banished by Placidia in 425.

Castle, Allen, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Albug, Va., Nov. 2, 1805. He joined the Church when about eighteen; labored some time as exhorter; received license to preach in 1833, and in 1836 united with the Black River Conference, in whose active ranks he labored until his death, Oct. 21, 1865. He was an earnest, devoted Christian minister. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1866, p. 101.

Castle, Henry, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Bristol, March 19, 1814. He was received into the ministry in 1835, and died Aug. 24, 1876. He was noted for his uniform gentleness and geniality, as well as punctuality. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1879, p. 14.

Castle, Joseph, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Devonshire, England, Jan. 6, 1801. He came to America at the age of ten, was converted, and united with the Methodist Episcopal Church at nineteen; became a local preacher, and joined the Genesee Conference on trial, in which he served five charges. At his division, in 1829, he became a member of the Oneida Conference, and in this filled five pastorates and one term as presiding elder. In 1839 he was transferred to the Troy Conference, and after filling one appointment two years, was transferred to the Philadelphia Conference, where he spent the remainder of his life. After fifty-two years of effective service, he received a superannuated relation in 1875. He was a delegate to seven General Conferences. He died Feb. 1, 1881. Of imposing presence, fine powers of eloquent communication, and a mind of extensive resources, he was a preacher of unusual power, a theologian and scholar of great attainments. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1881, p. 74.

Castleden, James, an English Baptist minister, was born at Faversham, Kent, Feb. 25, 1778, and was reared in the Church of England. At seventeen he was converted in a Wesleyan prayer-meeting, and on the next Sunday preached a sermon. He was baptized by Dr. Jenkins in 1799, became a deacon, for nine years preaching occasionally at Holly Bush Hill, London. A chapel was built for him, and was pastor at Hampstead for thirty-six years. In 1833 he was seized with paralysis, and died June 4, 1854. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1855, p. 46.

Castleden, Michael, an English Congregational minister, was born in London, Feb. 22, 1769. He entered Hoxton Academy in 1792, and was ordained at Aylesbury in the summer of 1797. Discouraged in this field by the prevalence of Antinomianism, he removed to Woburn, Bedfordshire, and there commenced his pastorate, Nov. 5, 1798, remaining until 1846, when, because of feebleness, he resigned. An anuity was secured to him through the liberality of his friends, and he continued to preach, when able, until his death, Nov. 5, 1848. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1848, p. 215.

Castelford, Thomas, a monk and writer of the 14th century, a native of Yorkshire, was educated as a Benedictine at Pontefract, of which he wrote a history (1326). See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), iii, 426.

Castlenuy, David, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born near Gettysburg, Pa., Nov. 4, 1825. He was converted near youth; received license to preach in 1848; and in the following year was admitted into the Baltimore Conference, in which he labored until his sudden death, Nov. 10, 1875. Mr. Castlenuy was a careful student, an approved preacher, an industrious, faithful, affectionate, efficient pastor, and a devout Christian. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1876, p. 359; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Castlenuy, Robert, an Episcopal clergyman of Petersburg, Va., was murdered near Gaston, N. C., for his efforts in behalf of the freedmen, Oct. 11, 1865. See Appleton's Annual Cyclop. 1866, p. 651.

Castlenuy, Thomas G., a missionary of the Protestant Episcopal Church, labored as such throughout the country with indomitable zeal. His first charge was Staunton, Va., where he labored for fourteen years, building a beautiful church, and establishing the Virginia Female Institute. During two years he was engaged in teaching in the diocese of Illinois, but his last days were spent in labor at and about St. Joseph, La., where he died, Feb. 7, 1861. See Amer. Quart. Church Rev. 1861, p. 188.

Castles, Allen, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Montgomery County, N. C., Nov. 12, 1821. He removed with his parents to Choctaw County, Miss., when about twelve years of age; embraced religion in 1842; and in 1848 received license to preach, and entered the Mississippi Conference. He died Sept. 28, 1861. From youth Mr. Castles's life was blameless. He was a man of limited education but of great application, full of zeal and the Holy Spirit. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1861, p. 320.

Castor is the name of several persons in early Christian records:
1. A correspondent and personal friend of Gregory Nazianzen. There are two letters of Gregory to Castor: one (Epist. 98) sent by his young friend and spiritual son, Cordus, from Gregory begs he parents to cherish in- ternal long. The second (Epist. 94) contains complaints of his own health, and threatens Castor in playful terms if he does not soon send back a letter whom he calls "their common sister."
3. A confessor and bishop of Apt, in Provence, who appears to have been born at Nismes, and to have founded a monastery between the years 419-426. He is commemorated Sept. 21 (Acta Sanctorum, Sept. vi, 249). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.
4. A priest of Coblenz, who is said to have performed many miracles, but his history is uncertain, and his date is unknown (Acta Sanctorum, Feb. ii, 683).
5. The father of pope Felix IV.

Castoria is the maternal aunt of St. Jerome. His letter to her (13, ed. Vail.), written when he was in the desert, shows that they bore it between them.

Castorius is the name of several early Christians:
1. The brother of the constable Nicostratus, converted and martyred with him (see Tillemont, Mémoires, iv, 521, 528). His feast is marked July 7. He is known as St. Stillemont, but that they could not have suffered before the 17th. Claudius, the jailer, and his sons, Felix and Felicissimus, were also converted and martyred along with them, A.D. 296.
2. A martyr at Nicomedia, commemorated March 16.
CASTREJÓN

3. A martyr at Tarnos, commemorated March 28.
4. The name of three Roman presbyters in A.D. 303, one condemned, with Marcellinus, for apostasy, and also for betraying the grannies of the Church, the other two accusing him (Labbé, Concil. i, 990–943)
5. The brother of Maximian (q. v.). We meet with him in the year 402 (Tillemont, xiii, 398; Labbé, Concil. ii, 130). He was a Donatist, and became Catholics. Maximian was appointed to the see of Vaccena, but a scandal was raised against him, and he withdrew. Castorius was urged to take his brother's place by Augustine and Alypius (Epist. 69, vol. ii, p. 230), whom Tillemont (Mémoires, xiii, 991) supposes to have been then at Vaccena, where Castorius had been elected, and where he needed.
6. The notary or representative or minuto of pope Gregory I at Ravenna, against whom the people of that town laid complaints (Gregory, Epist. vi, 31).
7. Bishop of Rimini, ordained reluctantly by Gregory I, at the request of the people, but resigned because of infirmity (Gregory, Epist. ii, 30).
8. A deacon, charged with examining into the life of the bishop of Peraso and his presbyters (Gregory, Epist. viii, 19).

CASTREJÓN, Antonio, a Spanish painter, was born at Madrid in 1625, and was celebrated for his small historical subjects, although he painted several larger works for the churches, which possess great merit. The best of these is St. Michael Suffering the Dragon. In St. Giles is his Presentation in the Temple, and several subjects from the life of the Virgin. He died at Madrid in 1690. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

CASTRENSE, Saint, was celebrated in South Italy as an African bishop of note, who, in some barbarian persecution, both of clergy and laity (perhaps between 305 and 311) was taken by seven other bishops and put on board an old ship, which was cast by the wind from Sinussa, or Volturno, where he died, Feb. 11 (Tillemont, xvi, 607, 608). It seems more probable that the name is only the title taken from his see, and that he may be the Candidianus, bishop of Castra, in Mauritania Caesariensis, who is given in a list of bishops persecuted by Hunicus (A.D. 484). His legend is given from two MSS. in the Acta Sanctorum, Feb. ii, 523.

CASTRICIA, a rich and fashionable matron of Constantinople, the widow of Saturninus (consul in A.D. 388), a leading member of the female cabal formed against Chrysostom at the court of the empress Eudoxia.

CASTRIES, Armand Pierin de la Croix de, a French prelate, was born in 1659, of an ancient and noble family of Languedoc. He was destined from his early childhood to the priesthood; received while still very young the title of doctor of the Sorbonne, and was appointed in 1679 to the abbey of Val-Magne, in the diocese of Agde. Five years later he received the abbacy of Saint-Chapte, and was elected bishop of Aups. Shortly after he became chaplain to the duchess of Berry; in 1717 he was appointed archbishop of Tournai; and, finally, transferred to the see of Albi, Nov. 5, 1719. He was called the good archbishop, and was very active in embellishing his church. He died April 15, 1746. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

CASTRO, Alfonso, a Portuguese Jesuit, was sent as missionary to India, and was killed there in 1558 by the natives of the Moluccas, after a sojourn of eleven years. He left a full account of his mission (Rome, 1656). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

CASTRO, Alfonso de, a Spanish theologian and Franciscan, was born at Zamora about 1495. He rose by his talents to the highest offices of his order; and accompanied Philip II to England and the Netherlands, where he remained several years. Being called to the bishopric of Compostella, he prepared to enter upon the duties of this office; but died Feb. 11 (or 8), 1558, at Bruges. His principal writings are: Adversus Haereses (Paris, 1584, fol.); Antwerp, 1556, 1568; translated into French, Rouen, 1712, 2 vols. —De Justa Hareticorum Punitione (Salamanca, 1547, fol.): —De Potestate Legis Positiva (ibid. eod. fol.); Paris, 1571, 1578, fol. —De Solutis ac Malefas, Eorumque Punitione (Salamanca, 1558, fol). —Histoire Ecclesiastique de la Ciudad de Guadalazar (Madrid, 1558), etc. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

CASTRO, Andrés de, a Spanish Franciscan grammarian and lexographer, a native of Burgos, was a missionary to the West Indies, and died in 1577. He wrote, Arte de Aprender las Lenguas Mexico y Matzinzauan: —Sermones: and Christian Doctrine, in the same language. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

CASTRO, Cristófero de, a Spanish Jesuit theologian, was born in 1561 at Ocaña, in the diocese of Toledo. He taught theology in the universities of Alcala and Salamanca, and died at Madrid, Dec. 11, 1615. His principal work is, Commentarium in Deudicum Prophe- tous (Lyons). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

CASTRO, Don Felipe de, an eminent Spanish sculptor, was born at Noya in Galicia, in 1711. He went to Lisbon, then to Seville, and afterwards to Rome, where he produced several fine works, which gained him a pension from Philip V, king of Spain. He took the prize in sculpture at the Academy of St. Luke, and was afterwards admitted a member of that institution, as well as of the Florentine Academy. On his return to his native country he executed, at Madrid, several admirable works; and in 1752 was appointed director of the Royal Academy of San Fernando. He died in 1755. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Carriedo.

CASTRO, Francisco de, a Spanish biographer of the 16th century, wrote, Miraculosos vida y Santas Obras del B. Juan de Dios (Granada, 1788). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

CASTRO, Giacomo di, an Italian painter, was born at Sorrento about 1597, and studied under Gio. Battista Caraccioli, and afterwards received some instruction from Domenico Fetti. There are a number of his works in the churches of his native city, the best of which is his picture of the Marriage of the Virgin. He died in 1687.

CASTRO, Leon de, a Spanish theologian, canon of Valladolid, was for more than fifty years professor of Oriental languages at Salamanca, where he died in 1586. Though well acquainted with the Hebrew, he gave his preference to the ancient versions, especially the Vulgate. He asserted that the Hebrew text was corrupted by the Jews when they invested it with the vowel points. Castro's works are, Commentaria in Euseium (Salamanca, 1570): —Apologeticus pro Lectione Apostolica a Ecclesiis (ibid. 1588): —Commentaria in Dionys (1586). See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v. T., I, 3, c. 12; Wetzer u. Wetzer's Kirchen Lexikon s. v.; Hoefer, Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

CASTRO, Pablo Fernando de, a Spanish Jesuit, was born at Leon in 1581, and joined his order when fifteen years of age. He lectured on philosophy at Valladolid, and on scholastic theology at Salamanca, and died while rector of the college at Medina, Dec. 1, 1653. He wrote a small work in 7 vol. quarto in 1584, and another in 1558 5th ed. 1700. See Backer, Bild. des Erziehers der Compagnie de Jesus, s. v.; Mullendorf, in Wetzer u. Wetzer's Kirchen Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

CASTRUCCI, Raffaello, an Italian theologian of the Benedictine order, was a native of Florence, and died in 1574, leaving Trattato di S. Gregorio (Florence, 1567): —Trattato del Sacramento dell' Eucaristia (Venice, 1565).
CASTULUS

CASTULUS is the name of several early Christians:
1. The/setari, or manager of the smithery and winner of the Eumachia, Maximianus. He lodged in a garret in the palace, and sheltered the Christians there. He was examined three times, then thrown into a pit, and finally buried alive. He is commemorated March 26, and a cemetery on the Via Laviniana is said to bear his name.
2. An Arian presbyter, whom Ambrose rescued out of the hands of the orthodox multitude at the time of the conflict about the basilicas at Milan (Ambrose, Epist. 20, 5).
3. A martyr along with Zoticus (q. v.) in Egypt or in Africa, Jan. 12.
4. A martyr at Ancya, in Galatia, Jan. 23, according to the Hieronyman Mart.—Smith, Dict. of Chist. Biog. s. v.

CASTULUS, Stain, a confessor and bishop of Vienna, supposed to have lived about the 8th century (Acta Sanctorum, Oct. vi, 545).

CASTUS is the name of several early Christians:
1. Bishop of Sicca Veneria (Ke'), a proconsular praefect of the province, on the borders of Numidia (the town of Arboisius), spoke twenty-eighth in order in the Synod of Carthage (Sess. Epp. sub-Cyrt., vii).
2. Castus and Emilius were two men who lapsed, and then made renewed confession; mentioned by Cyprian, under Decius, as having suffered some time before (Cyp. Laps. c. 13; Tillemont, iii, 125); and commemorative in the calendar of Carthage, by Bede, etc., on May 22.
3. A bishop, imprisoned along with pope Stephen, A.D. 257 (Anastasius, i, 1390, ed. Migne; Tillemont, iv, 31).
7. A presbyter of Antioch, who, in conjunction with Valerius, Diophantus, and Cyriacus, maintained the cause of Chrysostom and the orthodox clergy against the tyrannical intruder Porphyry, and on whom they were grievously persecuted.
8. Martyred, according to the Hieronyman Mart., Sept. 4.
9. A martyr at Capua, Oct. 6, according to the martyrologies.
10. Bishop of Porto in the third Roman Synod, A.D. 501; the fourth, A.D. 502; and the sixth, A.D. 504 (Labeo, Concil. iv, 1326, 1384, comp. 1877).

CASTULUS. See CHAMEBUS.

CASWELL, Henry, D.D., an Episcopal clergyman, was born at Yatesley, Hampshire, England, in 1810, and educated chiefly at the grammar-school of Chigwell, Essex. When eighteen years of age, he came to America and graduated at Kenyon College, O. After having been engaged for some years as a parish minister and professor of theology in this country, he returned to England in 1842, obtained a private act of Parliament recognizing the validity of his ordination in the United States, was appointed to the vicarage of Fighdean, Wiltshire, and became proctor in convocation for the diocese of Sarum, and prebendary of Salisbury Cathedral. He returned to America about 1865, and died at Franklin, Pa., Dec. 17, 1870. The main object of his life was to promote the consolidation and to increase the power of the great religious organization connected with the English Reformation. His principal work is America and the American Church (1839; 2d ed. 1851). See Encyclopedia Britannica (9th ed.), s. v.

CASWELL, Alexis, D.D., LL.D., an eminent Baptist divine and teacher, was born at Taunton, Mass., Jan. 29, 1799. He graduated with the honors of his class from Brown University, in 1822, and was at once appointed tutor in what is now Columbia University in Washington, D. C., where he remained five years, teaching, and pursuing his theological studies under the president of the institution. In the summer of 1827 he returned to New England, and in a short time received an invitation from the First Baptist Church in Providence, R. I.; but was elected in October professor of mathematics and natural philosophy in Brown University. He entered immediately on the duties of his office, and was in full sympathy with the spirit and plans of Dr. Wayland, who had recently been called to the presidency. He taught not only the classes in his special department, but those of other departments until other professors should be appointed. In 1850 he took the department of astronomy, relinquishing that of natural philosophy. He remained in his office of professor thirty-five years, excepting one year, 1860-61, when he was absent in Europe. The next five years he passed in Providence engaged in the benevolent institutions of the city, and occupied with literary work. Upon the resignation of Rev. Dr. Sears, Dr. Caswell was called to the presidency of Brown University, and held the office four years and a half, resigning in 1872. He was elected a trustee of the university in 1873, and a fellow in 1875, and since he held until his death, at Providence, Jan. 8, 1877. Among the published writings of Dr. Caswell are the following: Phi Beta Kappa Oration (1855)—Four Lectures on Astronomy, delivered at the Smithsonian Institute (1858)—Address before the American Association for the Promotion of Science, at Springfield, Mass. (1859)—A Memoir of the late Benjamin Stillman, read before the National Academy of Science in Washington (1866)—A Sermon on the Life and Christian Work of Francis Wayland (1867). See Lincoln, Alumni Address, June 19, 1877; The Providence Journal, June 20, 1877. (J. C. S.)

CASWELL, A. A., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Derby, Vt., Feb. 4, 1850. He was converted in 1867, and ordained local deacon in 1874. In 1878 he joined the New Hampshire Conference, and was ordained elder. His first charge was that of supply at East Rochester. On his admission to conference he was appointed to Chichester, where he died, after three years of earnest and useful labor, June 18, 1881. He was an able, original preacher, esteemed by all for his social qualities and unaffected piety. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1882, p. 89.

CASWELL, Ennoch Haskin, a Congregational minister, was born at Middletown, Vt., March 25, 1818. He graduated at Middlebury College in 1843; studied at Union Theological Seminary, and graduated at Andover Theological Seminary in 1847. See Caswell, N. H. It was his first charge, where he was also ordained in 1848. In the following year he removed to Stockbridge, Vt., where he served two years. His remaining pastorates—inevitably short—were at Barnet, Vt., Hooksett, N. H., and Bennington. Caswell died at the latter place, Nov. 11, 1863. See Cong. Quarterly, 1864, p. 119.

CASWELL, Jesse, a Congregational minister, was born in Vermont in 1809. He graduated at Middlebury College in 1832, and studied theology for one year in Andover Theological Seminary as a member of the class of 1837, and was also a student in Lane Theological Seminary from 1835 to 1837. He was ordained as a city missionary at Cincinnati, O., in 1837; was agent for the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions in 1838; a missionary to Siam in 1839 and later; and died there, Sept. 25, 1848. See Tren. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 127.

Caswell, Lewis E., a Baptist minister, was born at Salem, Mass., in 1795. He united with the Baldwin Place Church, Boston, in 1812; was licensed about 1833, and for five years was pastor in Meredith, N. H., and eight years in Ware. About 1847 he went to Boston and became a city missionary, in which capacity he labored thirty years. He died March 15, 1877. "He was a good man and especially kind to the poor. He was known but little on the platform and in the pulpit, but his record was in the homes of woe and in the chambers of sickness." (J. C. S.)

Caswell, William D., a Free-will Baptist minister, was born about 1820. He spent his early years in Massachusetts, and in 1831 removed with his parents to the state of New York. He was converted about 1840, and in 1846 united, by baptism, with the Church in Lyndond. He was licensed to preach in 1855, and in 1864 was ordained. His various fields of labor were in the states of New York and Illinois. He died in Edwards Co., Ill., April 30, 1868. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1870, p. 75. (J. C. S.)

Casyapa, in Hindī legend, was a disciple of Buddha, who presided at the first council of the Buddhists, after the death of Buddha at Rajagriha. He wrote a great number of sermons, which made the first伟大的 tradition of the Buddhist books. Casyapa was the author of the book called Abhidharma (Mathysics). He became the principal of one of the four classes of the Buddhist schools, named Vahhachica. He was a Brahmin converted to the faith of Buddha. His disciples were of five or six suborders, and were distinguished by the name of the great community." See Hoefer, Nour, Biog. Générales, etc.

Catabasia (Karaōbaios). was an anthem or short hymn in the Greek offices, so called because the two sides of the choir come down (karaōbaiow) into the body of the church and unite in singing it. It often occurs between the "odes" of a "canon," and its construction is that of any other "troparion." Sometimes two "catabasias" occur together between each ode, as on the Sunday after Christmas-day, where each pair consists of the first troparion of the corresponding odes of the two canons for Christmas-day.

Catacombs. We give some additional particulars under this head.

1. The existence of Jewish Catacombs in Rome is of a date anterior to Christianity. One was discovered by Bostio early in the 17th century, and placed by him on Monte Verde, but has escaped all subsequent research. Another Jewish catacomb is still accessible on the Via Appia, opposite the Basilica of St. Sebastian. It contains two cubicles, with large arcosoli, ornamented with arabesque paintings of flowers and birds, devoid of distinctive symbols. Some of the loculi present their ends instead of their sides to the galleries—an arrangement very rarely found in Christian cemeteries. The inscriptions are mostly in Greek characters, though the language of some is Latin. Some bear Hebrew words. Nearly all have the candlestick. In 1866 another extremely plain Jewish catacomb, dug in a clay soil, was excavated in the Villa Cimarrìa, on the Appian Way. In these Jewish catacombs we are to look for the germ of those built by Christians. See Rome, Jews on.

2. As to the History of Christian Catacombs, it is best to discard the idea, so long prevalent, that these excavations were made in secret, and in defiance of existing laws. No evidence can be alleged which affords even the faintest hint that in the first two centuries, at least there was any official interference with Christian sepul-nament of Christianity as the religion of the Roman States, was the commencement of a new era in the history of the catacombs. Subterranean interment gradually fell into disuse, and had almost entirely ceased by the close of that century. The undeniable evidence of the inscriptions with consular dates shows that between A.D. 338 and A.D. 360 two out of three burials took place in the subterranean portions of the cemeteries.

The zeal displayed by pope Damasus, A.D. 365-384, in repairing and decorating the catacombs, caused a sudden outburst of desire to be buried near the hallowed remains of the martyrs. The flame, however, soon died out; but was replaced by pilgrimages to the sacred places. The fosaer's occupation was, however, gone, and after A.D. 426 his name ceases to be mentioned. We have direct evidence (Anast. § 99) that the ravages of the Goths under Vitiges, when they sacked Rome, A.D. 537, extended to the catacombs. On their retirement the havoc was repaired by pope Vigilius, who replaced the broken and mutilated epitaphs of pope Damasus by copies, not always very correct.

The reverence for the catacombs was now gradually dying out. Successive popes attempted to revivify it by their decrees, but without any permanent effect. John III, circa A.D. 568, restored the cemeteries of the holy martyrs, 'and ordered that oblations' (the Eucharistic elements), 'creets, and lights should be supplied from the Lateran every Sunday.' It is also recorded in commendation of Sergius I, A.D. 687-701, that when he was a presbyter it was his wont to 'celebrate mass diligently through the different cemeteries.'

We have now reached the period of the religious spoliation of the catacombs, from which they have suffered more irreparably than from any violence offered by sacrilegious hands. The slothfulness and neglect manifested towards these hallowed places are feelingly deplored by Paul I in a constitution dated June 2, A.D. 761. Not only were sheep and oxen allowed to have access to them, but folds had been set up in them and they had been defiled with all manner of corruption. Paul resolved to transfer the bodies of the saints and enshrine them in a church built by him. His immediate successors endeavored to restore the lost glories of the catacombs, but owing to a change of feeling they were unsuccessful. As the only means of securing the sacred relics from desecration, Paschal, A.D. 817-857, translated to the Church of Santa Prassede, as recorded in an inscription still to be read there, no less than 2300 bodies. The work was continued by succeeding popes, and the sacred treasures which had given the catacombs their value in the eyes of the devout having been removed, all interest in them ceased. This, however, was revived by their being again discovered May 31, 1578. See CEMETERY; CHURCH; CEM:

CATACOMBS OF NAPLES, etc. To the north of the city of Naples four subterranean Christian cemeteries are known to exist, in a spur of Capo di Monte, not far distance from one another. They are known by the names of San Vito, San Severo, Santa Maria della Santita, and San Gennaro dei poveri. There is also a fifth at some distance under the monastic Church of San Efremo. That of San Gennaro is the only one now accessible.

The Neapolitan catacombs differ very widely in their general structure from those of Rome. Instead of the low, narrow galleries of the Roman catacombs, we have at Naples wide, lofty corridors, and extensive cavern-like halls, and subterranean churches. The chief cause of this diversity is the very different character of the material in which they are excavated. Instead of the friable tufa granolare of Rome, the stratum in which the Neapolitan catacombs lie is a hard building-stone of great durability and strength, in which wide vaults might be constructed without any fear of instability. It is probable that these catacombs were originally stone quarries, and that the Christians availed themselves of excavations already existing for the interment of their dead. On this point Marchi (Monum. Primit. p.13) speaks without the slightest hesitation.

The Catacomb of St. Januarius derives its name from having been selected as the resting-place of the body of that saint, whose death at Puteoli is placed A.D. 303, when transferred to Naples by bishop John, who died A.D. 432. Mabillon speaks of three stories. Two only are mentioned by Pelliccia and Belleram as now accessible. The galleries which form the cemetery proper are reached by a suite of vauled passages and vaulted cellars, cut out of the rock, and decorated with a succession of paintings of different dates, in some instances lying one over the other. The earliest frescoes are in a pure classical style, and evidently belong to the 1st century of the Christian era. There is nothing distinctly Christian about these. In many places they have been plastered over, and on the surface are the surface portraits of bishops, and other religious paintings, in a far inferior style and of a much later date, have been executed.

The interments are either in loculi, arcosolia, or cubicula. At the entrance of the lower piano we find a so-called martyr's church, with a slightly vaulted roof. It was divided into a nave and sanctuary by two pillars, the bases of which remain, with cancelli between. In the sanctuary stands the altar, built of rough stone, and a rude bishop's seat in anapse behind it. On the south wall are the arcosolia of bishops John, A.D. 452, and Paul, A.D. 764, who, according to Joannes Diaconus, desired to be buried at St. Januarius. In other rooms we find a well and a cistern, recesses for lamps, and the remnants of a Christian mosaic.

Among other Christian catacombs known to exist in different parts of the shores of the Mediterranean, of which we are still in want of fuller and more scientific descriptions, we may particularize those of Syracuse, known as "the grotos of St. John," and described by D'Agincourt as "of immense size," and believed by him to have passed from pagan to Christian use; the Saracen catacomb near Tyronus, with ambulacra as much as twelve feet wide; the loculi at right angles to, not parallel with, the direction of the galleries; each, as in the Roman catacombs, hermetically sealed with a slab of stone; those of Malta, supposed by Denon (Voyage en Sicile [Par. 1788]) to have served a double purpose, both for the burial of the dead, and as places of refuge for the living; and which, according to the same authority, "evidence a purity, leisure, and magnificence far different from the Roman catacombs," and those of Egypt. Of these last D'Agincourt gives the ground plans of several of pagan origin. The most remarkable is one beyond the canal of Canopus, in the quarter called by Strabo "the Necropolis."

Very recently a small Christian catacomb has been discovered at Alexandria, described by Dr. Rossi (Bul- letino, Nov. 1864, Aug. 1865). It is entered from the side of a hill, and is reached by a staircase, which conducts to a vestibule with a stone bench and an apse.
Catafalque (Ital. catafalco) is a large, hearse-like construction over a coffin, used in the lying-in-state of distinguished persons, as well as during the solemnization of the services for the departed.

Catalan (or Catalonia) Version of the Scriptures. The Catalan is a cognate of the Spanish language spoken in the province of Catalonia. There are two or three Catalan versions of the Bible (one of which bears the date 1467) preserved at Paris. One of these MSS. is deposited in the Royal Library, and contains a translation from the Latin of the entire Scriptures, with the preface of Jerome. Of other translations nothing is known. It was reserved to the British and Foreign Bible Society to furnish the Catalans with a version of the Scriptures in their own dialect. In 1832 this society printed, at London, an edition of the New Testament, as translated by Mr. Prat, a native of Catalonia. A second edition was published in 1835 at London, and a third at Barcelona in 1837. The Psalms and Pentateuch have since been translated, but not yet printed. See Bible of Every Land, p. 265. (B. F.)

Catalan or Catalan. Antonio (1) (called the Sicilian, or the elder), an Italian painter, was born at Messina in 1560, and probably studied at Rome. There is a fine picture of The Nativity by him in the Church of the Capuchins at Gessy. He died in 1630. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Catalan or Catalan. Antonio (2) (called the Roman, or the younger), an Italian painter, was born at Bologna about 1596, and studied under Albano. He painted several pictures for the Bolognese churches. In the Church of La Madonna del Grado are four pictures of the patron saints of the city, in four niches; and in the Church Del Gesu, St. Peter Healing the Lame at the Porch of the Temple. He died in 1666. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Catalan, Giuseppe, an Italian theologian, who lived in the first part of the 18th century, wrote De Codice Sancti Evangelist (Rome, 1733, 4to):—Sacrosancta Consilia Eccumenica (ibid. 1736, fol.). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Catalan, Michele, an Italian archaeologist and biographer, was born at Fermo, Ancona, Sept. 27, 1750. At the age of sixteen he entered the Society of Jesus, and on the suppression of that society obtained a canonate in his native town, and devoted himself to the study of ancient history. He collected a large number of documents of great value; but his principal writings relate to his native place. He died at Bologna early in the 19th century. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cataldus. See Cathaldus.

Catalgus Hieraticus is the name given in the apostolic canons to the list of the clergy of a particular church. The term is also said to be applied to that part of the diptychs which contained the names of those who were named in the Eucharistic service; viz. of those who had made offerings, emperors, patriarchs, etc.

Catan (Cathan, Cadan, Ceddar, or Keddar), an early bishop and confessor, tutor of St. Blane, has his festival in the Irish calendars on Feb. 1, and in the Scotch on May 17. He is said to have been first converted in Ireland, but then went to Scotland and settled in Bute, where he built his cell at Kilcathan, or Kilchattan, and educated his nephew St. Blane. Colgan thinks he flourished about A.D. 560, but others place him even in the 7th century. According to the Irish tradition he was buried in Ireland, and his tomb is near the church of Kildonan.

St. Cadan's tomb is to this day shown beside the Church of Tamlighard Ard, County Londonderry; but according to the Scotich he lies at Kilchattan. His memory is honored by many dedications in the west of Scotland. There was also a Cadan who died abbess of Kildare, A.D. 853.

Catana Manoa (the universal sea) is a name among the Achequas, a tribe in the northern portion of South America, for the flood, of which mythological traces are found both in the old and new world. See Deluge.

Cataneo, Danesh, a reputable Italian sculptor, was born at Massa di Carrara, flourished about 1555, and was a scholar of Sansovino. His greatest work was the altar and sepulchre of the celebrated Gian Francesco, in Santa Anastasia, at Florence. He died there in 1573.

Cataspétaim, in Peruvian mythology, was the great New Year's festival, celebrated in honor of the sun by most of the Andes tribes.

Cataphronius is the name of several persons in early Christian records:

2. The persecutor of Eulalia (q. v.) is called by this name in some copies of her acts, in others Dorius (Tillemont, v. 322).

3. Supposed by Tillemont (vii, 639) to have been an Apollinarist, and companion of Timotheus, and, on receipt of a letter from him, to have written to others of the same sect named Pausios, Uranius, Diodorus, and Jovius. But from the passage to which he refers (Leontius Byz., adi. Prand. Apollin., in Migne, Patr. Gr. xxxvi, 1954), it appears rather that Cataphronius was... an imaginary personage in a dialogue dedicated by Timotheus to Pausanias and others.

4. The prefect of Egypt in A.D. 356, who established the Arian bishop George at Alexandria, and persecuted the Catholics (Tillemont, viii, 157, 677; Allen, i, 447.)

Cattacho, ROBERT, a Presbyterian minister, came as a licentiate from Ireland, was received into New Castle Presbyterian, April 15, 1739, and was sent to supply Middletown, Pa., and Brandywine, Kent, and Lewes, in Delaware. In December he was called to Kent, but declined, and settled at Brandywine, and, probably, at Middletown. In 1740 Cattach began to preach in Wilmington. He died in 1754.

Catchi (or Cutchee) VERSION OF THE SCRIP-

TURES BETWEEN THE GULF OF Cutch and the Indus. A translation of the Gospel of St. Matthew into Cutchei was made by the late Rev. James Gray, one of the chaplains at Bombay, and in 1835 a small edition was printed. See Bible of Every Land, p. 117. (B. P.)

Cate, George W., a Baptist minister, was born at Uxbridge, Mass., in February, 1815. He graduated from Brown University in 1841, and from the Newton Theological Institution in 1844. He was ordained soon after as pastor in Barre, Mass., and died there in 1847. See Newton Gen. Cat., p. 28. (J. C. S.)

Cate, Noah, a Baptist minister, was born in Jefferson County, East Tenn., May 17, 1805. He was baptized in 1822, began to preach when but little more than a boy, and was ordained when only eighteen years old. He spent the early part of his ministry in East Tennessee, and was among the first Baptist missionary Cater, Richard B., D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Beaufort District, S. C., in December, 1791, and was left an orphan when a child. In 1814 he was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of South Carolina. For many years after he entered the ministry he was occupied in preaching in various parts of his native state. He died Nov. 24, 1850. Dr. Cater published several Sermons and Addresses, among which were two Discourses on Baptism, and one on Temperance. See Sprague, Annaals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 520.

Caterer, Isaac, an English Congregational minister, was born at Tetworth, Oxonshire, in January, 1795. He grew up to early manhood sceptical and indifferent to Christianity, was converted at twenty-five, preached at various places, and in 1828 became pastor at Tetworth. Here he labored both as school-teacher and preacher for seven years, and then removed to Peppard with his school, where he remained till his death, March 17, 1868. As a preacher Mr. Caterer was very laborious, and had great success. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1869, p. 240.

Catermole, John, an English Wesleyan minister, commenced his ministry in 1768. Although a pious man, his gloomy disposition rendered the itinerancy a burden to him; so, after a year's service, he settled at Portsmouth-Common, opening a school, and preaching occasionally. He died about 1799, having published several useful tracts. See Atmore, Meth. Memorial, s. v.

Catholic, Jacques, a French Jesuit and orator, was born at Rouen, May 5, 1677. He took a regular course of study, and taught the humanities in different colleges, but soon developed a manifest talent for preaching. He died Feb. 7, 1757. See Hofer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cathcart, See CATHAN.

Cathari. The divinities of Arcadia were so called; as was a nation of Indians mentioned by Diodorus, whose wives attended the bodies of their husbands to the funeral pile, and were burned with them upon it. See SUTTRE.

Catherine of Cardona, a nun, was so called because she spent most of her life in Spain, although born at Naples in 1519. She was intrusted with the instruction of Don Carlos, the son ofPhilip II.; but she abandonned him because of his indolency, and joined the Carmelites as the companion of St. Theresa. She died in 1577. See Hofer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Catharine, ORDER OF ST., of Mount Carmel, was a military order, established in 1663, in imitation of all through Europe. In 1841 he was made a member and professor of the Academy of Berlin. He died in Rome, Dec. 19, 1856. See Appleton's American Cyclop., s. v.

Catellan, Bernardo, an Italian artist, was a Capuchin of Urbino, who lived about 1550. There are some of his works in the convent of his order at Cagli, and an altar-piece in the Church of the Capuchins, executed in the style of Raphael.

Catellan, Jean de, a French prelate, born at Toulouse, was bishop of Valence, and died in 1725, leaving, Instructions Pastorales: —Antiquités de l'Église de Va-

Catena, Giambattista, an Italian theologian and linguist, who lived about the middle of the 18th century, published, Girolo. Gisla. Lessioni di Lingua Toscana (Venice, 1744, 8vo):—Lettere del Cardinale Gio. di Medici, etc. (Rome, 1792, 4to). See Hofer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Catena Patrum (chain of the fathers) is the name for a collection of passages from the old Church fathers, arranged according to the books of the Bible, which they are designed to illustrate. See GUESTRIE.
that of the Holy Sepulchre. The knights were bound by vow to observe the rule of St. Basil, to guard the body of St. Catharine, their patroness, to protect pilgrims, and to obey their grand master. They wore, upon a white dress, the instruments of the martyrdom of the saint, in the form of a cross, viz., a wheel of six spokes, armed with spikes, traversed by a bloody sword. The order is now extinct.

Catharistæ were a sect of Manichæans, who are said to have committed the most horrible impieties in the pretended consecration of their eucharist (August. Har. 46).

Cathbadh (Lat. Cathubhús). There are two saints of this name commemorated in the Irish martyrologies, on July 1 and Sept. 16. It is said that when St. Patrick first came into the north-east of Ireland, he built, among other churches, one in the country belonging to the descendants of Ængus, over which he placed two disciples, Cathbadhús, a priest, and Dimanus, a monk. The former is perhaps the Cathubhús, son of Fergus, abbot of Achadh-áin, who, according to the Four Masters, died in 554, aged one hundred and fifty years. See Colgan, Tr. Thutm. p. 146, etc.; Lanigan, Eccles. Hist. Ir. ii. 267, ii. 163.

Cathcan (also Catullus and Cathal) is commemorated as bishop of Rathderthagh on March 20, in the Irish calendars; and at Lathrisk, in the parish of Falcarragh, in Fife, there was a dedication to a St. Cathcan. Colgan suggests that Cathana, one of St. Patrick’s disciples, may have had his name corrupted to Cathcan.

Cathcart, William, a Presbyterian minister, was born near McEwensville, Pa., Oct. 19, 1823. He graduated from the University of Michigan in 1850, and from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1853; was ordained by the Presbyterian Church in 1854; was called to Adamsville, Pa., in 1855; was pastor there from 1854 to 1864; and died at Lima, Ind., May 17, 1870. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 177.

Cathedra. (1) The first and strictly ecclesiastical application of this word is to the seat of the bishop in his episcopal chair. (2) The word was afterwards transferred to the episcopal see itself; and it is used by Urban (De Provinciis Septem) to speak of “Cathedra Apostolorum,” meaning the specially apostolic succession of the bishops of those sees. (3) Later, the word became used for the Episcopal Church itself, “principalis cathedra,” in Conc. Agiogr., A.D. 789, can. 40, meaning the cathedral as opposed to other churches in the diocese.

CATHEDRA PÆSTR. See PÆSTRA, FESTIVALS OF.

Cathedral (Latinized Gr.), a church which contains the cathedral or seat of the bishop. In the earliest cathedrals, the basilicas or large churches in Rome, the bishop’s seat was a marble chair attached to the end wall behind the altar, which was at the west end of the church, and he officiated over the altar, which was low; so that he was always looking towards the east, or the rising sun, the great emblem of the resurrection from the earliest times. Among the ordinances of pope Clement, A.D. 93, was one that in every church one chair should be placed in a more lofty and prominent position, so that the bishop sitting in it could overlook all persons present, and be seen by them. This marble chair was placed in the cathedral chair, because when the church was served by a cardinal it was his seat, but the name of cardinal is not primitive. This arrangement of a marble arm-chair fixed against the wall on the level of the upper bench round the apos is found in some of the early crypts in Rome as early as the 7th or 8th century, and it has been retained.

In the mediæval cathedrals the Lady-chapel takes the place of the apos, and the bishop’s seat or throne is usually on the south side of the nave, eastward of the stalls for the canons. The choir is enclosed in its own solid screen, with a space between the east end of the screen and the Lady-chapel. In England, Wells exhibits the most perfect example of a cathedral with all its parts and appurtenances. Both nave and choir, as well as the Lady-chapel, have been constructed. The window transverse troutward of the altar between that and the Lady-chapel. The chapter-house is on the north side of the choir, and joins the eastern corner of the north transept, its vestibule being parallel to that transept on the east side of it. This is the same at York, and it is the most usual; although there this is marked by a passage in the middle of the north side of the choir. The two transepts have each two chapels on the east side, and an aisle on the west; the aisle communicates at the south end with the cloister, which is on the south side of the nave, and has the library over it on the east side, and the singing-school on the west. The nave has aisles on both sides, and another transept at the west end, with towers at the extremities; there is also a central tower and a north porch.

Wells was a cathedral proper, not monastic, but with a separate house for each of its officers, either in the cloister or in the Liberty adjoining the bishop’s palace, of the 13th century, is enclosed by a separate moat, and fortified—it is on the south side of the cloister, from which it is separated by the moat; the deanery and the archdeaconry, of the 16th, are on the north side of the Close, with some of the canons’ houses, the organist’s house is at the west end, adjoining to the singing-school and the cloister; the precentor’s house is at the east end, near the Lady-chapel. The vicars choral have a close of their own joining the north-east corner of the canons’ Close, with a bridge across through the gatehouse into the north transept; they were a semi-monastic body, with their own chapel, library, and hall, but still were chiefly laymen.

The cathedral church was also called parochius, the principal or mother church, and in some places still the High Church. In it coronations, ordinations, councils were held, munificences of serfs made, and academic honors conferred. The word is confined to the Western Church, and is not older than the 10th century. The cathedratum, or payment to the bishop for the honor of his see, called in Italy La chierica, was paid in the time of Honorius III by all the diocesan clergy; and in later days St. Richard’s pence at Chichester, St. Chad’s in Lichfield, Pentecostals and other honors also, were the tribute of the diocese to the cathedral church, and a compensation for an omission to visit it at Whitsun tide.

A cathedral is composed of a corporation of canons presided over by a bishop. In some rare cases, as Poitiers and Pavia, Liebfeld and Coventry, and Bath and Wells, a bishop had two cathedrals; and occasionally a collegiate church was united to a cathedral, as at Dublin. The system was established in large towns for mutual aid, and as a central station for missionary operations. Cathedrals were of two kinds: such as were served by a bishop, as well as the permanent clergy, with all the rights of a bishop, and immediately governed by the abbot-bishop as his family and household; and collegiate churches, with chapters of clerks under an archpriest, but having the bishop as the head of the capellan body. Gradually the itinerant clergy, who were sent out on Sundays and festivals to the surrounding district, settled down as permanent clerks, while those who remained about the bishop became his standing chapter. There were cathedrals of regular canons in many places, of Premonstrants at Lottomissel, Havemburgh, and Brabant, and of Austin canons, in a few cities. The cathedral of Alcala is called magistral, because all the canons have the degree of D.D. Ramsbury, exceptionally, although a see, had no chapter. At Canterbury and Worcester, two ministers, occupied by the clerks and monks respectively, adjourned each other.
till the bishop definitely assumed one as his cathedral. At Winchester, and in London, at Westminster, the monks built a separate minster; at Worcester and Winchester they absorbed the canons; at Exeter they gave way to them; at Canterbury, Durham, Rochester, and Norwich they only gradually gained the ascendant when the Norman policy removed sees from villages into towns, as in the instance of the translation from Thetford to Norwich, and Selsey into Chichester, as, about forty years earlier, had been the case of Exeter, removed from Bodmin, and Salisbury from Wilton; and half a century yet earlier, in the foundation of Durham. With the exception of Monte Cassino, and some early foundations in Germany, colonized from Britain, in England only there were monastic cathedrals. These were Canterbury, Winchester, Durham, Bath, Carlisle, Ely, Norwich, Rochester, Worcester; and being refounded at the Reformation as secular cathedrals, along with the newly created sees of Chester, Bristol, Peterborough, Oxford, Gloucester, and Westminster, they are known as cathedrals of the new foundation. Those of the old foundation, which always had secular canons, are York, St. Paul's, Wells, Chichester, Exeter, Hereford, Lichfield, Lincoln, Salisbury, and the four Welsh cathedrals. The bishops of Meath, Osraig, Sodor and Man, Argyll and the Isles, Caithness, Moray, Orkneys, and Galloway did not take their titles from their sees. Some German cathedrals, as Bamberg, Cammin, Breslau, Laybach, Meissen, Olmutz, like those of Trent and Trieste, are exempt.
that is, free from visitation by the archbishop of the province, and immediately subject to the see of Rome. See Church Episcopalian.

Cathedrals of the New Foundation are those which were, before the Reformation, held by Benedictines, or by Austin canons, as Oxford, Bristol, and Carlisle, or as Ripon and Manchester had been collegiate churches. The chapter consists only of residents, who, till the recent act, were called prebendaries; the clergy, the master of the house, and being thus a layman, had sinecure of some stall. The minor canons were originally equal in number to the major canons; and out of their number the precentor and sacrist are annually chosen.

Cathedrals of the Old Foundation are those which have always been held by secular canons, and underwent no change at the Reformation. These consist of four internal dignitaries—dean, precentor, chancellor, and treasurer; archdeacons, in some cases of a subdean, and subchanter of canons, and prebendaries and canons, residuary or nonresident, internal or extraneous. Each was represented by his vicar. Strasburg, in France, alone retains its full complement of members and ancient organization; but in Spain, Italy, Germany, and Austria all are preserved intact. The canons of the cathedral churches of the British Isles were modelled on Lincoln, which followed Rouen; those of Dunkeld, Glasgow, and St. Patrick's (Dublin) on Salisbury, which followed Amiens; as St. Paul's imitated Paris in its constitution, and is now the model for Carlisle and Peterborough.

Cathedralcym was the name anciently given to two kinds of secular tribute to a bishop: 1. A pension paid annually to the bishop by the church's of his diocese, "in token of subjection," "pro honore cathedral," the payments being limited by two councils to two shillings severally. This was sanctioned by the Council of Braga in 580 (canon ii), and although the church could not, in the council permit to it that we possess, they speak of it as a custom then in general use. This is not only one of the most ancient episcopal rights, but the most universal, and is still commonly observed. The only difference between the jura cathedralica and synodalitas is, that the former was paid at a visitation, the latter at the synod; but it seems to have been the same impost. 2. A fee paid by the bishop to the bishops who had consecrated him, and to the clerks and notaries who assisted.

Cathedralicus (Doctor) is a Spanish university term, to designate one who fills a chair; a professor.

Cathol (Cathol, or Cattel), Saint, is perhaps Cathen (q. v.), of March 20, in the Irish calendars.

Cathelinot (or Catelinot), Idefonso, a Benedictine monk of the congregation of St. Vanne and St. Hydulphe, the coadjutor of Calmet, was born at Paris in 1670. He became a monk at the age of twenty-five in the abbey of St. Mansuy of Toul, and was engaged in preaching for several years. He passed a part of his life in the abbey of Senones, whose very large library afforded ample materials for his researches. His chief work was the supplement to supplement to Supplement to Rube's Secret de Calmet, inserted in the fourth volume of the first edition of the Dictionnaire de la Bible. He was the editor of Les Lettres Spirituelles de Bossuet, published in 1746, 8vo. He finally became librarian of the abbey at Saint-Mihiel, and died there, June 15, 1756. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cather, Robert G., LL.D., an Irish Methodist preacher, was born at Omagh, County Tyrone, June 1820. He was educated at Trinity College, Dublin. An alarming accident, at the age of nineteen, led to his conversion. He soon began to preach; in 1841 was a student in the Hoxton Theological Institution; in 1842 was in the Irish itinerancy, and labored successfully for some years as a travelling preacher. He conceived the idea of forming a society for promoting systematic giving, to the cause of God, and the Irish Conference consented to his devoting all his time and energies to the working out of that idea. The Systematic Beneficence Society and then the Christian League were the result. He travelled over England, Ireland, the Continent, and in America to advocate his plans. Much good was the result, but the work broke down his health; he sank rapidly, and suddenly closed a useful life at Clapham, London, Nov. 21, 1859.

Catherine (Lat. Catharina), an early saint, has dedications in Scotland and Ireland. She is probably St. Catharine, the martyr of Alexandria (Forbes, Kal. of Scott. Saints, p. 299).

Catherine. See Catharine.

Catharinus is the name of several early Christians: 1. Bishop of the Cimmerian Bosporus, present at the Council of Nice (Tillemont, vi, 643; Labbe, Concil. ii, 54). 2. Bishop of Arpona, at the heretical Council of Sardis, A.D. 347 (Labbe, Concil. ii, 711). 3. Bishop at the Council of Saragossa, A.D. 381. In this and the previous case the name is spelled Cathariscus; the first with a termination, Cathariscus. In Gama's Series Episcoporum the name of the bishop of Arpona is given as Cariricus.

Cathism is a section of the psalter. (1) The psalter in the Greek office is divided into twenty sections, called cathismata. Each cathismus is subdivided into three stases, and "Gloria" is said at the end of each stasium only. The reason for the name assigned is that, while the choir stand two and two by turns to recite the psalms, the rest sit down. (2) A short hymn which occurs at intervals in the offices of the Greek Church. It consists of one stanza or troparion (prosopos), and is followed by "Gloria." The name is said to indicate that while it is sung the choir sit down for rest.

Catwine, archbishop of Canterbury (Gaimar, Estorie, v, 1740). See Tatwine.

Cat, Pasquale, a Roman painter, flourished during the pontificates of Gregory XIII, Sixtus V, and Clement VII. He was employed in the Vatican, where he painted The Passion of Christ, and several friezes in the Sala Clementina. He also painted the chapel of cardinal Altemps, with subjects from the life of the Virgin. He died in the pontificate of Paul V, aged seventy.

Catina is mentioned by Jerome (v, 12, ed. Vall.) as an author who gave a mystical interpretation of Ezek. i, 7, etc.

Catius, in Roman mythology, is said to be the name of the god who gave the faculty of wit.

Catissi, in mythology a race of pignies, supposed to have been driven from their country by cranes.

Catlett, Thomas, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Albemarle County, Va., in 1798. He was converted about 1815, and called to the ministry at Staunton. He attended school at Wytheville, and there continued until 1825, when he united with the Holston Conference. He suddenly died Feb. 25, 1867. Mr. Catlett was a man of industrious habits, iron constitution, and burning zeal. His intellect was somewhat peculiar—strong, original, and in some respects eccentric. No man of his conference ever presented a greater variety of subjects in a plainer style, and produced a more lasting impression. He was mighty in the Scriptures, a man of prayer, and spotless in life. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1867, p. 194.

CATLIN, Oren, a Presbyterian minister, was born in New York. He graduated at Hamilton College in 1818, and at Andover in 1822. He was ordained Sept. 26, following. In 1825 he labored in Illinois. He assisted in organizing the First Presbyterian Church of Greene County, at Carrollton, in the same year. He was pastor at Warren, Mass., in 1829 and 1831; stated supply at Cornerstone, Pa., in 1832 and 1833; presided, from 1834 to 1837; at Fairport, from 1838 to 1841; at Newfield, in 1842 and 1843; and at Collins, from 1844 to 1846. He died at Evans, N. Y., Aug. 11, 1850, aged fifty-five years. See Norton, Hist. of the Presb. Church in Illinois; Trin. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 50.

CATLING, S. T., a Baptist minister, was born at Montville, Me., in 1819, and was ordained in 1839. He was pastor of several churches in his native state, and in 1851 removed to Hudson, Wis. In 1854 the American Baptist Missionary Association appointed him a missionary among the Indians. Subsequently he preached at Osceola, St. Croix Falls, and Taylor Falls, Wis. He died May 1, 1878. He was a faithful and successful pioneer preacher. He was a good abler; an ordinary ability; and highly esteemed by the churches that knew him. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclopedia, p. 196. (J. C. S.)

CATLING, William, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Maine in 1811. He removed to Zanesville, O., with his father when six years old; was converted in 1837; served the church as class-leader, exhorter, and local preacher; and in 1849 entered the Ohio Conference, wherein he labored with zeal and fidelity until his death, in 1856. Mr. Catling was an interesting and useful preacher, of ordinary ability; a minister of the common people. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1856, p. 113.

CATLOW, John Booth, an English Congregational minister, was born at Gishburn-in-Craven, Yorkshire, Oct. 4, 1820, of Wesleyan parents. He was converted in his fifteenth year, and was put under private training in London for the Wesleyan ministry. He became pastor of the Congregational Church at Hounslow, where he was ordained, March 22, 1854, and labored eight years. In 1863 he removed to Luton, Bedfordshire. Early in 1865 he accepted a call to Soham, Cambridgeshire, where he was very successful. In 1873 Mr. Catlow became pastor of Zion Chapel, Ashbourne, where he remained until his death, March 5, 1877. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1878, p. 809.

CATLOW, Jonathan, an English Wesleyan preacher, began his ministry when about sixteen years of age. After travelling for several years, he settled at Heighley, Yorkshire, where he died about 1763. His funeral sermon (from 1 John iii. 2, at his own request) was the commencement of a great revival in the neighborhood. Catlow was a good man, and shared in the dangers which beset the pathway of the early Methodist ministers. See Ashmore, Meth. Smaller Minutes, p. 173.

CATMER, George, an English martyr, was one of five burned at Canterbury in September, 1555, for the true testimony of Christ and his works. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, vii. 383.

CATMER, John, an English martyr, was one of five burned at Smithfield, Jan. 31, 1566, for her constancy in the belief of Christ and his works. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, vii. 50.

CATHACH, John, a Scotch clergyman, studied at the University of Aberdeen; became tutor at Zetland; was licensed to preach during episcopacy, and was again licensed by the presbytery in 1658, and called to the living at Usthe same year, and ordained. He died in May, 1717. See Fusi Colle Eccles. Scotianae, iii, 441, 442.

CATON, William, a member of the Society of Friends, was born in England about 1635. When quite young, he seems to have been the subject of very marked religious impressions. In 1652 he became an awe-struck Friend. Shortly after he began to preach "in a steeple-house and markets," and at the same time the usual persecutions of Quaker preachers in those days. He made a religious visit to Holland in 1655, and repeated it the next year. At Middelburg he was arrested, in August, 1656, and cast into prison, where he remained several days, and, when taken out, was placed on board a ship of war to be sent back to England. He endured great sufferings for about two weeks, but was not discouraged, and soon went again to Holland, where he remained about a year, laboring in various cities, and then returned to England. In 1659 he went once more to Holland, and, after several months' labor, took ship for England, but came very near being taken by a pirate, and barely escaped shipwreck in a fearful storm. In 1661 he went to Germany, where he was very kindly received by the prince palatine, in Heidelberg. Aug. 4, 1663, he was arrested and thrown into prison in Yarmouth, England, where he remained until Feb. 22, 1664. After many trials, and a life of constant activity in his calling, he died in Holland, it is supposed, in November, 1665. He was the author of An Abridgment of the Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius, etc. (Rotterdam, 1661, 1669). See the Friends' Library, ix, 434—479. (J. C. S.)

CATRON, FRANÇOIS, a French preacher, was born at Paris, Dec. 8, 1659, and died Oct. 18, 1737. He was instructed with editing the Journal de Trésaux, a periodical published by the Jesuits, which obtained considerable renown in the 18th century. He also published some historical works, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jucher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

CATS (Catz, or Caets), CHARLES, a Brabant theologian of the beginning of the 18th century, was at first an adherent of the Roman Church, but later went into Holland, joined the Socians, and was imprisoned for the translation of the New Test. into Dutch, but afterwards released. He lived at Utrecht, and was for a time in Prussia, but was compelled to remove. He wrote, also, Jesus Christus ist der Stuhlgymer der Welt (Amsterdam, 1867). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

CATTA, in Northern mythology, was one of the wise women, or fortune-tellers, of the Germans. She is probably the same as Jutta, a sorceress.

CATTANO, Lazzaro, an Italian missionary, was born at Sarzana, near Genoa, in 1560. He joined the Jesuits, and was sent with Ricci to China. They founded together the religious establishment of Macao. Cattano died at Hang-chow in 1640, leaving some works in Chinese, which were intended for the propagation of Christianity. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

CATTANI (da Dinozco), FRANCESCO, an Italian theologian and preacher, was born at Florence. He joined the religious orders in his native place, and became secretary of the cathedral there. As secretary of the Council of Trent, and was appointed to the bishopric of Fiesole, Aug. 15, 1570. He died Nov. 4, 1595, leaving Italian translations of St. Ambrose's Christian Offices (Florence, 1558, 4to):—his Hexameron (ibid. 1560, 8vo);—Dell' Autorità del Papa (ibid. 1562, 8vo):—Sopra la Scrittura Sacra (ibid.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

CATTANI, Gaetano, an Italian missionary, was born at Modena, April 7, 1596. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1719, and was sent to Paraguay as a missionary in 1729, where he died, Aug. 28, 1733, leaving of Burgundy and Hormidas pope. While executing the decrees of this synod in his city he was exiled by the Arians, and took up his residence at Vienne, with Avitus the bishop. He passed years of exist devoted to good works (Cath. Christ., iii.
1000).

Catual was an abbot succeeding Buctunus, mentioned in a charter of Cynewulf, king of Wessex, A.D.
789.

Caucabardites were a branch of the Eutychians, who, in the 6th century, followed the party of Se-

Cauchon, Pierre, bishop of Beauvais, took an active part in the contest of the parties which divided France in the beginning of the 15th century. In 1429 the inhabitants of Beauvais drove him from his see on account of his vices and tyrannic; and he took refuge in England. He made himself infamous by his bigotry and fury towards Jeanne d'Arc, who was taken captive in May, 1430, within the limits of the diocese of Beauvais. Cauchon became her accuser, and addressed himto the king of England, and finally succeeded in securing her condemnation and death. He died sud-ondly in 1431, and was excommunicated by Pope III, and his body was dug up and thrown into the common sewer. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale,
s. v.

Caukerken, Cornelius van, a Flemish engraver, was born at Antwerp in the year 1625. The following are some of his principal works: The Dead Christ in the Arms of the Virgin; The Inserit of the Holy Ghost; St. Agnes with the Young Emperour Mary;
The Martyrdom of St. Licius; Mephisto and St.
John.

Caula, Sigismundo, a painter of Modena, was born in 1637. He studied under John Boulanger, and afterwards visited Venice, where he studied the works of Titian and Tintoretto. He painted altar-pieces, and and cabinet-pieces for private collections. The best of his large pictures is one of The Plague, in the Church of San Carlo, at Modena. There are works by him dated 1682 and 1694.

Caulacau is a sacred word (banded down with variedties of spelling, apparently a corruption from "wé, "précept upon precept," Isa. xxviii. 10) in some of the Gnostic systems. The first mention of the name is found in the account given by Ireneus (i. 24) of the Basilidians. Thedorevet (Hist. Fub., 4), borrowing his account from Ireneus, says that it was to the Lord and Saviour that they gave the name Caulacau. The next mention of the word occurs in the earlier work of Hippolytus, on heresies, where it is named under the heading of the Nicolaian. By some of these it was applied to a certain archon (Epiphanius, Hist. 25); but according to Philastrius (Hist. 33), to mankind. In the later work of Hippolytus, Refutation of all Heresies, the use of caulacau is ascribed to the Nasenex, who used the word "man" in speaking of the principle of the univer-
s. This principle they held to be threefold, and Hippolytus says that they gave the name Caulacau to the blessed nature. A man (the Adam above), Caulacau to the mortal nature below, and xeesar to that of those who had been raised from earth to receive the heavenly birth, by which it is to be supposed their own disciples are indicated.

Caullet, Etienne Francois de, a French priate, was born May 19, 1610, at Toulouse. He studied at the Sorbonne in Paris, and was in 1644 raised to the episcopate of Besançon. He introduced order and reorganized the schools and seminaries. Though a Jansenist, he took an active part in the controversy concerning the Right of Regalia (q. v.) He advocated the rights of the Church and of his diocese, but without Cattanio, Costanzo, an Italian painter, was born at Ferrara in the year 1692, and studied under Scarnsellino, and afterwards under Guido, at Bologna. His Ecce Homo, and The Flagellation, in San Giorgio at Ferrara, have been much admired; also his picture of Christ Praying on the Mount, in San Benedetto, and his Annunciation, in Spirito Santo. He died in 1665.

Cattapani, Luca, an Italian painter, was born at Cremona about 1570, and was a scholar of the Campi.
The best of his compositions is his Decollation of St.
John, in San Donato at Cremona.

Catterick, Thomas, an English Wesleyan minister, labored from 1816 to 1820 in Frederickon, N. B., Kingston, Fort Wellington, and Niagara, Ont., and Sheffield, Quebec; and from 1820 to 1821 in various charges in the United States. In 1817 failure of corn the active work, settled at Wednesbury, Staffordshire, and died April 24, 1561. He was a man of powerful voice and strong faith, meek in disposition, and unshrinking in the performance of duty. He published, Observations on Benevolence, chiefly designed for the benefit of the Methodist society (London, 1826). See Minutes of the British Conference, 1861, p. 18.

Cattle, William, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Driffield, York, in January, 1813. When quite young he was converted, and at once joined the Methodists. For several years he was employed as a prayer-leader and local preacher, and in 1856 was accepted at the conference as a travelling preacher. He failed of his health in 1857, and the fear of his health caused him to hold a supernumerary relation four years; return health enabled him to take work again in 1861; but eleven years afterwards his health again failed, and he retired to Walsall, where he spent the remainder of his life. He died there Aug. 29, 1880. His noble and manly presence was associated with strong individuality of mind and character, and with much warmth and cordiality of spirit. He had an almost chivalrous sense of honor. His preaching was evangelical, practical, and useful. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1881, p. 15.

Catton, James, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Nottingham in 1796. He was converted in his twenties, and in 1822 was accepted into the ministry in 1823, and died at Grantham, Aug. 29, 1863. He was diligent and cheerful; his intellect was original and powerful; and his ministrations effective. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1863, p. 10.

Catulinus is the name of several persons in early Christian history.

Theodecitius. The subdeacon at Cirta, under Paul the bishop, A.D. 305. On May 19, in that year, after the church furniture had been given up, he was called upon to surrender the books, but only produced one very large volume, as the readers had the rest.
When asked the readers' names, both he and Marcocius refused to answer. Though "traitors," they would not be "traitors" (prostitutes). They were arrested; but we do not hear of the end of Catulinus' imprisonment.

2. The deacon, martyr at Carthage, buried in the basilica of Faustus in that city; commemorated July 16, and honored with a sermon by Augustine (according to Irenæus), which is no longer extant (Ellemont, v.
554).

3. The sixth bishop of Embrun (Ebreunum). He subscribed at the Council of Epaneum (Epavnum, Epavnum), which was held in 517, when Sigismund was king success. He died Aug. 7, 1680, leaving, Traité de la Régale (Cologne, 1890), and some minor works. See Rapin, Mémoires (Paris, 1865); Recherches Historiques sur l'Assemblée du Clergé de France de 1682 (2d ed. 1870); Loysyn, L'Assemblée du Clergé de France de 1682 (Paris, 1870); Jungmann, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Cautel, Jean de, bishop of Grenoble, and grand-nephew of the foregoing, was born at Toulouse, April 6, 1683. He was a great scholar, and secured the regard and affection of his diocese. He died Sept. 27, 1711, leaving a considerable number of Sermons and Letters, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Caulfield, Charles D.D., a bishop of the Episcopal Church in the West Indies, died at Nassau, Sept. 4, 1862. He was the first bishop of the Bahamas Islands, and was consecrated Nov. 24, 1861. See Amer. Quart. Church Rev., April, 1863, p. 154.

Caulicollis are small volutes under the flowers on the sides of the abacus in the Corinthian capital, representing the curled tops of the acanthus stalks. Also, like the large volutes, continued in the Norman style, and may even be traced, though much modified in form, in later styles.

Caumartin, Jean François Paul, Levre de, a French prelate, was born at Chablons-sur-Marne, Dec. 16, 1668. He was educated under the care of cardinal de Reiz, his godfather, who assigned him one of the richest benefices. Caumartin had scarcely reached his twenty-sixth year when he was admitted a member of the French Academy. He was appointed bishop of Vannes in 1717, and died at Blois, Aug. 30, 1738. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universalis, s. v.

Caumont, Armand de, a French archaeologist, was born at Bayeux, Aug. 28, 1892. He founded the Société des Antiquaires de Normandie and Société Française d'Archéologie pour la Conservation des Monuments Nationaux, which held annual sessions, and published the results of their investigations in the Bulletin Monumental, which Caumont edited till 1872. He died April 15, 1873, at Caen. Besides numerous contributions to different periodicals, he published Histoire de l'Art dans l'Ouest de la France (1831-40, 6 vols.);—Abécédaire ou Récit de l'Archéologie (1830-32, 3 vols.; ed. 1860). [R. P.]

Caucupōna (or a tavern). The apostolical constitutions enumerate the caupōna, or tavern-keeper, among the persons whose obligations are not to be accepted. If such obligations were forced on the priest, they were to be spent on wood and charcoal, as being only fit for the fire. A later constitution still numbers the caupōna among those who could not be admitted to the Church unless they gave up their mode of life. It is clear, from too many evidences, that the ancient tavern differed little from a brothel. A constitution of Constantine (A.D. 320), while declaring that the mistress of a tavern was within the laws as to adultery, yet if she herself had served out drink she was classed among tavern servants, who were "not deemed worthy to observe the laws." A cleric found eating in a caupōna, unless under the necessities of travel, was, by the apostolical canons (46th), sentenced to excommunication. The Council of Laodicea enacts that none of the priestly order, from the presbyter to the deacon, nor outside of the ecclesiastical order, to the servants and readers, nor any of the ascetic class, shall enter a tavern. In spite of these enactments, we find by later ones that clerics, who were forbidden to enter taverns, actually kept them. Thus certain "Sanctions and Decrees," from a codex at the Vatican, but evidently from a Greek source, require that the priest be neither a caupōna nor a tabernarius.

In the East, it appears that in the first half of the 6th century, and presumably since the days of Constantine, taverns were held on behalf of the Church. But apparently this tavern-keeping for the Church was not held equivalent to tavern-keeping by clerics, since the 9th canon of the Council of Constantinople in Trullo, A.D. 691, orders that "it shall not be lawful for any cleric to have a tavern. He must therefore either give it up or resign. It will then be seen that while the severity of the apostolical constitutions against the individual tavern-keeper is not followed in later times, yet that the Western Church, at least during the anti-Carolingian period, persistently treated the use of the tavern by clerics, otherwise than in cases of necessity, still more their personal connection with it, as improper and liable to the clerical character. The witness of the Eastern Church is also to the same effect, but its weight is marred by the trade, including that in liquors, which for two centuries at least seems to have been carried on at Constantinople for the benefit, not, indeed, of individual devices, but of churches and charitable foundations.

Cause Majores is a term of the canon law, meaning cases relating to the great questions of the Church; they are of three kinds: (1) such as relate to the faith; (2) such as regard doubtful and important points of discipline; and (3) such as relate to conduct on the part of bishops involving deposition.

Causby, Stephen, an English Congregational minister, was born in London, in September, 1811. He joined the Church in his youth, and in 1833 entered Hackney College. On leaving college he preached some time at Wadbridge, Cornwall; settled as pastor at Hallaton, Leicestershire, in 1838; removed to Kelvedon in 1845, and in 1864 to Towerstreet, where he remained seven years, and then entered the stated ministry. He died June 16, 1860. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1861, p. 206.

Cause (Causation, Causality). These are associated terms in connection with a fundamental topic in the highest range of philosophical speculation.

I. Definition of Cause.—This will always be determined by the role the term in connection to the received definitions is, that they assume at the outset what is to be explained by the close. This is true of Reid's definition of the popular idea of Cause. "CAUSA est id, quo posito effectus, quo subito tollitur." So, in Whewell (Phil. Ind. Sci. pt. i, bk. iii, chap. ii, p. 159): "By Cause we mean some quality, power, or efficacy, by which a state of things produces a succeeding state." The words, "effectus," "power," "efficacy," "produces," beg the question, and require explanation and acceptance in advance of the definition.

As a preliminary and provisional exposition, for the purpose of inquiry, we may be permitted to say, that Cause is the agency, real or assumed, in the production of change; Causation, the exercise of such agency; and Causality, the bond of connection between the antecedent condition and the subsequent change. Causality and Causality are, however, frequently used as equivalent terms. It will not escape the notice of those familiar with investigations of the present character, that there is a latent petitio principii in the introduction of the words agency and production. This acknowledged paralogism, noted already by Hume, is inevitable, from the peculiarity of the subject, from the implications of words, and their multiplicity of meanings. The fallacy involved will not be directed to the support of any conclusion. It is admitted and tolerated simply to furnish a point of departure for the doctrine of Cause, Causation, and Causality.

Before proceeding to this task, it is requisite to discriminate between the ordinary and the metaphysical employment of the term Cause. The word is full of ambiguities, and is a shifting homonym in both characters. In customary usage, as a common expression, which has passed through many successive ages of metaphor and degradation, to descend to its current laxity and vagueness, it indicates the immediate, or remote, agency of change; the motive, the occasion, the aim, the accidental, partial, antecedent, or concomitant condition of a phenomenon, without distinguishing, or even regarding, the diverse character of these several applications. With these loose meanings there will be no need to be concerned, except so far as they may illustrate the fluctuations of the philosophical import, by reflecting in their variety the speculative perplexities whence they have arisen.

Causality may be said to be the connection between two states of being, the one consequent upon the other. This awkward circumlocution is employed to prevent, as far as may be, the introduction of any phrase which would virtually beg the question, or anticipate the conclusion. The absence of any precise or technical definition, or, rather, of any indistinctness, variability, and inappraisability of the idea of what is spoken of, which occasions such absence, necessitates the adoption of this unsatisfactory procedure. Yet it may be said that, in spite of the acute and varied speculations of the philosophers, every one has a fixed, if unanalyzed, conception of Causation. To this indeterminate notion, present in the mind, reference must always be had, as a support for the reasoning, in order to render any argument on the subject intelligible.

To Aristotle (Metaph., i, ii; Phys. Ause. ii, iii) is due the well-established division of Causes into—1. Formal, or qualitative, τὸ τι ἐστὶ εἰσὶν, which gives the qualification per quod. 2. The Material, or Substantitive, ex quo. 3. The Efficient, a quo. 4. The Final, propter quod. This celebrated classification was seen to be invalid, by Reid (Works, p. 75; ed. Hamilton). It is rather an analysis of the ambiguities of speech, consequent upon a multiplicity of thought, than of ultimate distinction. Careful and discriminating reflection would apparently indicate that these species do not belong to one and the same genus. The division is not made on one plane—not in accordance with one principle. It is scarcely possible to refer to the same order of concepts, as the joiner makes of the table, was made of wood, that tables require the character exhibited by them, and that the table is made to put victuals on. The Final Cause, or the result contemplated, is rejected by Bacon and Descartes, and by many of the most rigorous reasoners; but is maintained by Leibnitz and other perspicacious inquirers. The aim is an inducement, but it cannot be properly considered as part of the act of Causation, whatever Causation may be. The purpose for which a thing is done is surely diverse from the act or operation by which it is done.

The Material Cause has been strenuously held to be an indispensable part of the process resulting in an Effect. By some writers it has been regarded as the sole cause. Aristotle considers that, in some cases, Cause and Effect are conjoint and logically simultaneous—the one is involved in the other. Hamilton asserts that all Secondary Causes—(all causes but the "Great First Cause")—are Siamese twins, the Material Cause necessarily participating and co-operating with the Productive Cause. This is true in a certain sense. There must be a subject to be acted on. "Essa debet, unde fuit aliquis, deinde a quo fiat." No effect can arise unless it arises in something. But the idea of Cause is entirely dissimilar in regard to the agent and in regard to the passive element.

The Formal Cause—the Plutonic archetype— the natura naturata—the plan—the aggregate of qualities constituting a thing "what it is," and pre-adapting it to exhibit under suitable incitement the characteristic phenomena, is, in most schemes, analogous, ex parte natura, to the Material Cause, and is obnoxious to similar censure. The Aristotelian Form must be distinguished from shape, as well as from Platonic Ideas.

The Material and the Formal Cause are rather prerequisites, indispensable concomitants, conditions, attributes, than any part of the act or idea of Causation. No doubt, the qualities of the things in which the change is evolved, and the relations of constitution between them and the stimulant which excites the change, regulate the occurrence and the character of the Effect; but they do not aid in the apprehension of the abstract idea, or act of Causation. They do not touch the conception of Causality. The Efficient, or Motive Cause, that which involves the manifestation of power, according to Kant, is to be inferred directly from the act. The Efficient directly conveys the conception of Cause (cf. Aristot. Metaph. XI, iv, 6). Therefore, in endeavoring to estimate the nature of Causation, it is the species which will be exclusively regarded. Occasional Causes belong to an entirely distinct inquiry. See Malesherb. Other Causes do not belong to Aristotle's specification, such as Exemplary Causes, with which Formal Causes are often identified, and Instrumental Causes, are equally to be disregarded.

II. Theories of Causation.—The theories and modifications of theories of Causation are very numerous, and often reappear in strange combinations. It is not inappropriate to discuss them in this place. Sir William Hamilton has done this very ably and elaborately (Discur. App. i; Metaph. § xxxix, xi), if not always with entire satisfaction. He has added a Table, in which he has endeavored to classify the several systems which have met with any considerable acceptance, excluding, of course, the doctrine of the First Cause, the primordial, or immanent operation of the Creator. Hamilton's Table is introduced, as it may save much explanation which would otherwise be required.

This classification is, like all Hamilton's dissections, acute, arbitrary, plausible, incomplete—systematic, but delusive from its apparent thoroughness. There are other actual and possible theories, Schopenhauer's, for instance, which he has not provided for in his scheme. Hamilton makes eight classes, all of which he rejects as "wholly worthless," except the last, which is his own, and is open to as grave objections as those which he repudiates. He distributes all his recognised opinions between two summa genera: A, the Empirical, or Posteriori; and B, the Priori or Noetic. He then makes a new former set, by making the conception of Causation a mere result of experience, renders it nothing more than an empty Eux, or, rather, Phantasma Rational. Locke, Hume, and Brown are types of these schools.
It may be observed, in passing, that the contemptuous terms in which Hamilton speaks of Brown's theory, which he inculces in his class, but which also are more accurately to Locke's, may be retorted upon his own.

"It evacuates the phenomenon of all that desiderates explanation," and "eviscerates the problem of its sole difficulty." The Empirical systems may be confidently repudiated as inadequate explanations of the mystery, for the reasons assigned by Hamilton, and for others not suggested in his class. A ready concurrence may not be in accord to his refutation of two of the Pure theories — the sixth and seventh. But there is one of them, besides his own, the fifth, that which is maintained in diverse modifications by Descartes, Leibnitz, Reid, Stewart, Kant, Fichte, Cousin, and the majority of recent philosophers, which cannot be dismissed as readily. Its consideration may be postponed till Hamilton's original theory has been noticed.

Hamilton's scheme rests avowedly, as might have been expected, on the Philosophy of the Conditioned. He does not succeed in making it evident that it is a logical consequence of his peculiar philosophy. He says: "We cannot know, we cannot think, a thing except as existing, that is, under the category of existence; and we cannot know or think a thing as existing, except in time." Now the application of the Law of the Conditioned to any object thought as existing, and thought as in time, will give us at once the phenomenon of Causality (Metaph. p. 552). There is a quibble in the word "existence" which need not be dwelt upon. The reasoning is per saltum, if not a palpable non sequitur. There is no connection manifest between the inference and its supposed foundation. Moreover, Causation, the principle of change — if a quo forma mutatur — is completely eliminated from consideration.

Hamilton refers the belief in Causes, which is not identical with the idea of Causation, to the impossibility of conceiving any new existence to commence, or any existence to be annihilated. The impossibility of conceiving an absolute commencement of existence is a thesis as old as Aristotle, (Met. Min. II, i). But it can only suggest the catenation of existence, it cannot of itself suggest Causation. Hamilton illustrates his position by the line: "Ex nihil rhino nihil, in nihilum nihil posse reverteri." He thus places himself on the ground of Stoicism, which is the thorough, the truth of which is the aliquid latent in the beautiful and profound extract from cardinal Change, cited by Hamilton (Dis. p. 627), and is fully recognized by Leibniz (Opp. v, p. 574), Reid and many others. It is noted here, because it will be involved throughout the remarks with which this article will conclude, and because a complete comprehension of Causation is impossible; "id tam suprema nos est quam ipsa veritas."

Hamilton's reasoning appears to be invalid. His doctrine crushes out all reality of Causation, and all significance in the term. There is no genuine Causation where there is no recognition of an act eventuating in change. There is thus only one theory which has not been rejected by Hamilton, not as inherently insufficient, but as unnecessary. This is the doctrine that the conception of Causation is intuitive; that it is due to a distinct principle in man's intellectual constitution. It may be untenable in the forms in which it is presented, not in the germ and the spirit of the truth. So far as it needs examination here, it will enter into the further consideration of this mysterious problem, which no one should venture to say that he has solved. It is prudent, however, by way of caution, to say that such tenets as "infinite idea," "perception," or "emanation of ideas," or "perceptions" do not require the admission of formulated dogmas, developed faculties, or matured apprehensions. It is sufficient if the distinct tendencies which end in such results are recognised as actual characteristics of the mind.

III. Possible Explanation of the Idea of Causation.

Sir William Hamilton, as has been seen, distributes the various theories of Causation into eight classes, and arranges them, by a quadripartite procedure, under two supreme heads—the Empirical and the Pure. So far, only the latter aggregate has been considered. It may be asked, with much hesitation, whether these two summa genera may not be united in one explanation. No theory on any subject can be held to be complete, certain, and satisfactory, which does not incorporate, or subsume, all special or partial theories, revealing the fragmentary truth which each contains, and conferring the whole of the truth, the unities, the abstractions, and fallacies of each.

The space at our command, and the design of the present article, would render it inappropriate to pronounce on this occasion any novel and systematic theory of Causation, though all theories but one have been rejected, and the exceptional one has not been allowed for any theory. It cannot authorize or explain any positive conviction; yet every one has such a conviction in regard to what is and cannot get rid of it. At most, it can conclude only negatively. Here, if anywhere, the maxim, "Ex nihil rhino nihil," is applicable. But whatever interpretation be given to Causation, the conception of Causation and its alleged manifestation is distinctly affirmative. Sir William Hamilton's reasoning only goes far enough to show how and when the idea of Causation introduces itself as an essential character. His conclusion is, to retort his own language, "a virtual assumption of the question," or something worse.

It merits continual meditation that the words most current and most indispensable in daily intercourse—Being, Mind, Substances, Matter, Space, Time, Cause, Force, Power, Quality, especially involve the highest, and most insoluble problems of philosophy, and are vacillating in meaning. These terms are all positive, and convey very positive meanings, impossible as it may be to define or to comprehend them. The fact of their necessity and familiarity is something more than presumptive evidence of the veracity of the underlying conviction. It may be taken as irrefragable proof, that, in all our mental operations, there is present, not merely "aliquid ignotum et incomprehensibile," but that this unknown constituent of thought is the kernel, the life, of all thought. This is the aliquid latens in the beautiful and profound extract from cardinal Change, cited by Hamilton (Dis. p. 627), and is fully recognized by Leibniz (Opp. v, p. 574), Reid and many others. It is noted here, because it will be involved throughout the remarks with which this article will conclude, and because a complete comprehension of Causation is impossible; "id tam suprema nos est quam ipsa veritas."

Hamilton's reasoning appears to be invalid. His doctrine crushes out all reality of Causation, and all significance in the term. There is no genuine Causation where there is no recognition of an act eventuating in change. There is thus only one theory which has not been rejected by Hamilton, not as inherently insufficient, but as unnecessary. This is the doctrine that the conception of Causation is intuitive; that it is due to a distinct principle in man's intellectual constitution. It may be untenable in the forms in which it is presented, not in the germ and the spirit of the truth. So far as it needs examination here, it will enter into the further consideration of this mysterious problem, which no one should venture to say that he has solved. It is prudent, however, by way of caution, to say that such tenets as "infinite idea," "perception," or "emanation of ideas," or "perceptions" do not require the admission of formulated dogmas, developed faculties, or matured apprehensions. It is sufficient if the distinct tendencies which end in such results are recognised as actual characteristics of the mind.
to be satisfactory. Still, it may be appropriate to add some observations tending to make more distinct, and to support, the character of Causation. This may, perhaps, be achieved by pointing out in what manner experience and the constitution of the human mind concur in the generation of the idea of Cause. It will scarcely be denied that the human intelligence is adapted, or apt, for the reception of knowledge from the external world, and of forming rational observations. There will be as little difficulty in admitting that internal and external experience both contribute to the excitation and determination of distinct procedures of thought, and to their results. If these things be so, there is neither incongruity nor impossibility in conceiving that the continual reactions of nature produce an outward stimulant, which may develop itself into clearnessless tendencies, without either originating definite conceptions. Such conceptions may be the joint production; while they will be deemed purely Empirical, or purely Intuitive, by those who contemplate only one set of the interacting and co-operating processes.

Experience, by itself, cannot furnish the idea of Causation, for Causes are nowhere directly subjected to observation, not even the results of volition. Intuition alone is equally powerless, for there is neither evidence nor likelihood that it should give a distinct, definite, and formal conception. Such a conception cannot be entertained without language, in which the words of the language in which the conception is expressed. Words and language can be no part of intuitive knowledge. But there may be—indeed, there must be—a preconformity to apprehend under suitable conditions (the most important of which will be the just occasion) the significations of those things with which the mind has to deal. The acorn on a bare rock will not produce an oak, though by nature constituted for such production. The richest soil without the acorn will be equally inoperative in this regard. The potential oak is in the acorn; the fit soil, and the air and dew of heaven, convert the potency into act, make the acorn swell and disclose the germ, tender and feeble, and hitherto concealed, whose powers are developed and strengthened and increased, till it grows into the monarch of the woods. With the modus operandi, the latent schematismus of the two factors, we have no concern at present. These are the creation from human intuition. Yet, they are most important considerations in the case, but not the Cause. That lies still further back. But the fact of Causation—the presence of what is competent to bring about the result—the existence of a Cause, cannot be ignored. Now, what has been described as taking place in the vegetable world may be believed or conceived to be analogous to what takes place in intellectual growth. The mind may be compared to the acorn: experience and observation may correspond to the soil, and the air, and the dew. Analogies are, indeed, no argument, but they may be indispensable to render intelligible what is only confused and obscured by direct statement, in consequence of the ambiguities and irrelevant implications of language.

All intellectual faculties, all intuitions, if such exist, are in their primitive exercise unconscious and unintelligent. They are blind instincts. The child sucks, as the bee builds its cell, without the capacity of recognising or reflecting upon the nature of the operation. There is a spontaneous process, a cocus appertius, which guides its action. As acts are repeated, as experience is enlarged, as faculties are expanded, there arises an awakening consciousness of ability to perform the action, and to govern it by the will.

The spontaneous processes required for the subsistence of the infant thus convert themselves, under the instigation of the surroundings, into conscious actions. The idea of purpose and result, dimly, but with growing distinctness, develops itself, till it becomes a conscious principle, and the subject of inceptive reflection.

The hungry child will point to its victuals; the thirsty one, able to move about, if left alone, when of larger growth, will seek to drink off the glass of water. It learns that the satisfaction of its wants is secured by its own action. The repetition of such experiences fixes and brightens the perception that deliberate acts will produce definite results. When the process is multitudinously varied by the innumerable occurrences of daily life, the power to do what is designed is recognized, even if the mind has not yet analyzed its operations, or distinguished and named the several exercises of its faculties: "as the temple of the mind grows wide withal," this analysis is executed with more or less clearness and accuracy. The perception of power becomes habitual, and potency in action is increased. The power of producing, of one series of acts, another, diverse, dependent, as co-related series of acts, is ascertained, tested, and demonstrated. What is thus unfolded in individual experience is analogous to the changes presented to observation. Fire is applied to gunpowder. The explosion of gunpowder exfoliates. The power is fire to explode gunpowder. The contact or conjunction of the two things is followed by an explosion. The power, or ability, of the fire to change the state of the gunpowder is the Cause of the explosion. There is something more here than the sequence of conditions: "Alia est causa efficiens, ali procedens.

Again, an act of the will may occasion sitting down, standing up, going, coming; the consciousness and indisputable connection between the volition and the ensuing state, though the manner of the change may be unrecognisable. A hot coal on the flesh will produce pain. A glass of wine will eventuate in speedy exhilaration. How these things are brought about cannot be fully told; but it must be apprehended that the change is more than succession of events, and is dependent upon what went before. The Cause and the Effect are both known, and are known as Cause and Effect.

Notwithstanding the vast alteration of the primitive instinct, appetite, or tendency, which conduces to the final recognition of Cause in all changes of condition, there is nothing anomalous or surprising. Such conversion of potencies into dissimilar forms is the universal law of the mental and physical world. The transmutations are not more marvellous in the intelligence than in the vegetable world. The plant from the seed, of the leaves from the plant, of the flower from the leaves, of the fruit from the flower. Metempsychosis and metempsychon are the law in the realms of mind and of matter.

There is much in this exposition which has been unwillingly, but necessarily, excluded. The briefest possible outline has been given. Enough may, however, have been said, to show that the constitution of the animal and the spiritual nature of man necessitates processes which, under external stimulation, with constant development, in connection with the reactions of experience and observation, eventuate in the inevitable apprehension and conviction of Causation in all changes. Thus the empirical and the a priori ideas of causality are combined, and both are required to account for the idea of Cause.

IV. Literature.—We indicate only a few leading authorities. It is scarcely possible to give the Literature of Causation in extenso, because the materials are various and are widely scattered. We have endeavored through the whole range of Metaphysical investigation:

Cause, La (the cause), is the name by which the French Huguenots under Condé designated their association and its priest.

Causer, Joseph, an English Methodist minister, was born at Norton-Stockton, Shropshire, Sept. 25, 1816. He was early converted, joined the Primitive Methodist Society, entered their itinerant ministry in 1842, and during thirty-one years labored in eighteen circuits, till failing health obliged him to take a supernumerary release in 1878. He continued to preach as strength permitted, until his death at Mombour, Wales, July 16, 1881.

Caulker, A. G., a Baptist minister, was born in South Carolina in 1825, and began to preach in 1852. For fifteen years he labored with zeal and success in his native state. In 1867 he removed to the northern part of Arkansas, and after spending a few years in that section of the state, he went to the southern part, and labored for some time among the churches in the Columbia Association. He died in 1872. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclopedia, p. 197. (J. C. S.)

Cause, Johann Isaac Ludwig, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Frankfurt-on-the-Oder, in 1726, and studied theology there. In 1752 he was ordained runner of the Bolognese Church, in his native city, and died April 28, 1802. He wrote, Commentatio ad Luc. xvi, 1-5 (Frankfort, 1749):—De Vera Significacione Vocis Εὐαγγελία (ibid. 1772):—Observationum ad Christianorum Baptismum Perpetuum Specilegium (ibid. 1752):—De Sobro Doctoris Theologici Tituli L's Christianae Religionis Indul. Non Repugnante (ibid. 1780). See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, 1, 245. (B. P.)

Caussin (de Perrecy), Armand Pierre, a French Orientalist, was born at Paris, Jan. 11, 1780. In 1821 he was appointed teacher of the vulgar Arabic at the college of Oriental languages in Paris, was made professor of Arabic in the College de France in 1833, and in 1849 he was elected member of the Academy. He died Jan. 15, 1871, leaving Essai sur l'Histoire des Arts Musulmans (2 vols., 1849-53, 3 vols.);—Grammaire Arabe Vulgaire (ibid. 1824):—Dictionnaire Français-Arabe. (B. P.)

Causton, Thomas, an English martyr, was a native of the county of Essex, and a zealous Christian. He would not attend mass, and was, therefore, taken prisoner and sent to London. His examination began Feb. 17, 1555; he was commanded to retract his errors and come to the unity of the Popish Church, which he refused to do. The examination continued until March 4, 1555, when Causton made a public confession of his faith. After he had finished this, the bishop hurried him off to Newgate, where he remained fourteen days in prison, and was then taken to Raleigh, in Essex, and burned March 26, 1555. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, vi, 729.

Cautelae Missae are certain regulations concerning the office of holy communion, like those at the end of that office in the book of common prayer, only more minute, and entering into extreme detail.

Cautilium, Absoluto ad, is a term of the canon law, signifying the absolute or irremovable condemnation or interdict, from which he appeals, he is obliged to obtain letters of absolution ad censum, to enable him to celebrate, pending the hearing of the appeal.

Cautin was bishop of Clermont about A.D. 562, previously deacon at Issoire. The first appearance of Cautin after a remissiveness of his diocese is at the death of St. Gallus, bishop of Clermont. He was at this time archdeacon. The people wished to have Cato for their bishop, but the archdeacon went by night to the king and obtained the episcopate for himself before the appearance of the messengers of his rival. Cautin was well received by the greater part of the clergy and people of Clermont. There was nevertheless a schism in the see, and Cautin at last took away from his opponents all Church property, restoring it only to those who had not adhered to him. We next find Cautin seeking to obtain for Caetanus, who had died on the death of Gunthas, the bishop. This offer Cato rejected. Cautin was very intemperate, and finally became epileptic. The last mention of him is at the time of a pestilence which devastated Clermont, when he fled from place to place to escape disease; but returning at length to his episcopal city, he died at Easter, of the plague. (See Greg. Turon. Hist. Franc.)

Cavagna, Giovanni Paolo, an Italian painter, was born at Borgo di San Leandro, near Bergamo, in 1569, and probably studied under Titian. His best fresco work is The Assumption in Santa Maria Maggiore, at Venice. Two of his best oil paintings are The Nativity and Esther before Ahasuerus, in the same church. His most noted picture in The Crucifixion, in Santa Lucia. He died in 1627. See Spooen, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cavagna, Pietro Francesco, a Bolognese historical painter, was born in 1675, and studied under Domenico Viani. He was employed in decorating the churches of the city of Bologna. In the Church of St. Sebastian and Rocho it is his paintings of The Concepcion, St. Sebastian, and St. Roch. In San Colombano are pictures of St. Nicholas and St. John the Baptist; and in San Giuseppe The Nativity. Cavagna died in 1733.

Cavagni, Giovanni Battista, a Neapolitan architect, flourished about 1585. In connection with Vicezente della Monica, he erected the church and convent of San Gregorio Armeno, at Naples. The Sacred Monte della Pietà was also erected by Cavagni, and is secured for him great reputation. He died in 1600.

Cavalc, Domenico, an Italian ascetic theologian of the order of Dominicans, a native of Vico Pisanu, in Tuscany, who died in 1849, was recognized as the talent as a preacher. Besides several Italian translations, he left, Trattato Dico Prego Lingua (Rome, 1742, 1751):—Specchio di Croce, etc. (Milan, 1780, 1784, 1787; Rome, 1736):—Frutt di la Lingua (Florence, 1783; Rome, 1774). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Rose, Gen. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cavallaburo, Gaspare Antonio, an Italian painter, was born near Roveredo in 1682, and studied under Antonio Balestra at Venice, and afterwards under Carlo Maratta at Rome. He executed many beautiful works, particularly an altar-piece in the choir of the Carmine, in his native place, with four lateral pieces of great merit. He died in 1738. See Spooen, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cavalleri, Giovanni Michele, an Italian theologian of the order of Benedictines, was a native of Bergamo. He was connected by a very close friendship with Vincente Orsini, who made him his theologian, on becoming archbishop of Benevento. He died there in 1711, leaving, Gallaria de Somniis Pontificii, Patrum, Patriarchorum, et Erasorum de蓆tomaculatis et Communitorum (Benevento, 1786, 2 vols. 4to);—Tesoro delle Grandezze del SS. Rosario (Naples, 1713, 3d ed. 8vo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jocher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Cavalleri, Marcello, an Italian theologian of the order of Dominicans, brother of Giovanni Michele, was born at Bergamo about 1649. After having been professor of philosophy at Naples, he became vicar-general of cardinal Vincente Orsini, and then bishop of Gravia, in 1690, where he died in 1705. His principal works are, A Treatise on the Mass (Naples, 1686):—Constitutiones Synodalz (1685):—A Treatise on the Construction of Churches (in Italian, several times re-
CAVALLERI 856

CAVERS

CAVALLERI (or Cavalleri), Giovanni Battista, an Italian engraver, was born near Brescia about 1580, and worked at Rome from 1550 to 1590, where he died in 1597. He executed about three hundred and eighty plates, of which the following are the principal: The Last Supper; The Dead Christ held by the Virgin; The Descent from the Cross; The Animals Coming Out of the Ark. Among his figures in the last he died at Rome in 1544 (or 1536). See Sporer, Biogr. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s. v.

Cavallini, Pietro, an old Roman painter, was born in 1259 (or 1279); studied under Giotto, and practised the Mosaic art as well as engraving. He assisted Giotto in the most important work he undertook, and added graces to the figures in the Arena Chapel. His most important work in oil was the picture of The Crucifixion, at Assisi. His principal work in fresco was in the Church of Aca Celii, in which he represented the Virgin and Infant, surrounded with glory and light, and above, the emperor Octavian, with the sibyls, directing his eyes to the figures in the Æther. He died at Rome in 1344 (or 1364). See Sporer, Biogr. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s. v.

Cavallucci, Antonio, an Italian painter, was born at Sermoneta in 1732. His principal paintings are: S. Bona Distributing Her Wealth to the Poor, at Pisa; S. Frances of Rome, in the Basilica di Loreto. He died at Rome in 1795. See Sporer, Biogr. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s. v.

Cavallones, Antonio José, a Spanish ecclesiastic, who devoted himself to botany, was born at Valencia, Jan. 16, 1745. He was educated by the Jesuits, in the university of that town; became tutor to the sons of the duke of Infantado, whom he accompanied to Paris and remained there twelve years. He was afterwards director of the royal gardens at Madrid. In 1780 and the following years he published Dissertations upon Monopetalous Plants, and in 1790 he commenced to issue his work on the plants of Spain, and those discovered by Spanish navigators in Mexico, Peru, Chili, New Holland, and the Philippine Islands. He died at Madrid, March 25, 1804. See Encyclopedia Britannica, 9th ed. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s. v.

Cavarazzì, Bartolommeo (called Creacemi), a painter of Viterbo, was born about the year 1590, and studied under Pompognocio. He painted a great deal for the Roman churches. In the Church of San Andrea della Valle is a picture by him, of St. Corbo Kneeling, and a Choir of Angels. In Santa Ursula he has painted that saint with the famous Legend of the Eleven Thousand Virgins; also A Holy Family, in the convent of St. Anna. He died in 1625.

Cavazzoni, Francesco, an Italian painter, was born at Bologna in 1559, and studied under Passerotti, and afterwards in the school of Caracci. His principal work is a picture of St. Francis at Bologna, admired as Magdalene at the Feet of Christ, in Santa Maddalena: The Crucifixion, in Santa Cecilia; and St. John Preaching, in San Giovanni. He was living in 1612.

Cavest, in English ecclesiastical law, is a caution entered in the spiritual courts to stop probates, licenses, administrations, etc., from being granted without the knowledge of the party that enters it.

Cavedone, Giacomo (or Jacopo), an eminent Italian painter, of the Bolognese school, was born at Sassuolo, near Modena, in 1577, and was instructed by the Caracci. He afterwards went to Venice and studied the works of Titian. His most celebrated picture is in the Church of the Mendicanti at Bologna, representing St. Alo and St. Petroino Kneeling before the Virgin and Child, with a glory of angels. In San Paolo are his fine pictures of The Nativity and The Annunciation. In the Ospedale di San Francesco is his Holy Family, with St. John and St. Francis. In San Michiele is The Last Supper, and in San Salvatore, The Four Doctors of the Church. Cavedone died, miserably poor, in 1660. See Spooner, Biogr. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s. v.

Cavellici, Celestino, an Italian priest and antiquarian, was born May 18, 1796, at Levizzano, near Modena. He studied at Modena and Bologna; was in 1821 custodian of the numismatic collection at Modena, and in 1847 librarian there, also professor of biblical hermeneutics at the university from 1830 to 1863. He died Nov. 29, 1865, leaving Numerismatica Biblica (Modena, 1850; Germ. transal. by Werther, 2 parts, Hanover, 1855-56)—Confutazione dei Principali Errori di Ermetico Raman nella sua Vie de Jesus (Modena, 1863). Cavelric, Jean, a French theologian, was born at Nimes in 1713. At the time when the question arose whether toleration should be given to the Protestant sect in France, he published the following works: La Vérité Vénitienne, 1754; La Vérité Revendiquée par le Peuple de Jésus Chrétien (1757)—Apologie de Louis Quatorze et de son Conseil sur la Résolution de l'Édit de Nantes, etc. (1758)—Appel à la Raison, des Écris Publiés contre les Jésuites de France (Brussels, Paris, 1762, 2 vols.). He was an antagonist of J. J. Rousseau, and published Lettre à un Vénitien, en réponse à un Discours sur le Décret de M. Rousseau (Paris, 1754)—Nouvelle Lettre à M. Rousseau de Geneva (ibid, 1754), etc. He sided with the Jesuits, and was banished in 1762, but afterwards returned, and died in 1782. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s. v.; Roe, Gen. Biogr. Dict. s. v.

Caverly, John, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born in New England in August, 1614, and at twenty-one years of age converted in 1624, and became a member of the Third Church in Strafford, N. H. He began to preach about a year afterwards; was ordained Sept. 6, 1627, and was soon called to the pastorate of the Fourth Church in Strafford, where he remained until his death, March 25, 1665. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1863, p. 91. (J. C. S.)

Caveno, Arthur, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Barrington, N. H., April 6, 1801. He is said to have been of Scotch-Irish descent, his ancestors of the same name having come to America in 1725. He was examined at seventeen years of age, and in 1823 he was ordained. For at least two or three years he taught school and preached. A church having been gathered in Epsom, N. H., in 1824 he was chosen pastor, and remained there until 1827, and then accepted a call to Concoocook village, in Hopkinton, in 1829 a remarkable revival of religion was enjoyed by his church, as the result of which is more than doubled its membership. From 1833 to 1836 he was pastor at Great Falls; from 1836 to 1838 financial agent for Strafford Academy; and in 1838 and 1839 pastor of the Roger Williams Church in Providence, R. I. His other parishes were in Charleston, Mass.; Bangor, Me.; Candia, N. H., Dover, Biddeford, Me.; Gardiner, South Parsonsfield, and First Church, N. Berwick; and last, a second time, in Candia. His last residence was in Dover, N. H., where he died, July 13, 1876. He wrote for the Morning Star from its commencement to his last publication, and from 1834, for several years was one of its editors. He published several Sermons, and left a full journal of his life and ministry. See Morning Star, Aug. 28, 1876. (J. C. S.)

Caviathan (Kūvaθaun), one of the twelve "maternal" angels in the system of Justinus (Hippol. Ref. v. 26). Harvey conjectures that we should read Caulcan, but, if any correction be necessary, a simpler change is Schneidewin's conjecture, Leucthan.

Cavin, James M., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Miami County, O., June 1824. He experienced religion in the winter of 1842-43; was educated at the Ohio Wesleyan University; received license to preach in 1850, and entered the Ohio Conference, where in he served the Church until his death, May 25, 1855. Mr. Cavin was grave and gentlemanly in deportment, deep in pious, and exemplary in life. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1855, p. 639.

Cavin, Samuel, a Presbyterian minister, was a native of Ireland. He was sent by Donegal Presbytery, Nov. 16, 1737, to Coneoceague, Md., and came to Canegog in 1739. After laboring some time in the Highlands of New York, he was called, May 26, 1745, to Goodwill, Ga. The remainder of his life was spent in itinerating in Virginia and filling vacancies. He died Nov. 9, 1750. See Webster, Hist. of the Presb. Church in America, 1857.

Caw, John, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1739, presented to the living at Bothkennar in 1736, and ordained, and died Dec. 4, 1847, aged eighty-two years. See Fusi, Eccles. Scotiæ, ii, 895.

Cawchoes, Katharine, an English martyr, was judged a heretic, and burned, with her two daughters, on the isle of Guernsey, in 1556. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, vii, 278.

Cawdrey, Daniel, an English nonconforming divine, was educated at Peter-house, Cambridge, and ejected from his living of Dingling, in Northamptonshire. He was received among the Quakers, and elected Assembly of divinity, and wrote, besides sermons and treatises, several violent philippics against the Established Church. He died in 1664.

Cawrdaf, a Welsh saint of the 6th century, was king of Brecknockshire, and whenever he went to wage the battle the whole population of the country attended his sumnos. (See Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 270; Williams, Lolo Manuscripts, p. 467.)

Cawthorn, James, an English clergyman and poet, was born at Sheffield, Nov. 4, 1719. He was educated at the grammar-schools of Sheffield and Kirkby Lonsdale, and entered Clare Hall, Cambridge, in 1738. After leaving Cambridge he went to London, where he became assistant in an academy. About this time he took orders, and in 1743 was elected master of Tumbridge school. He was killed by a fall from his horse, April 15, 1761. His principal works are, The Prize of Labour (1736) — Abecedar zu Eloise (1746). An edition of his Poems appeared in 1771. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Caxas, Eugenio, a Spanish painter, the son and scholar of Caxas de Caxas, was born at Madrid in 1577. In the monastery of St. Augustine Calzada, at Madrid, is a fine picture of St. Joachim and St. Anna in the Church of St. Martin are his two pictures of The Nativity and

The Adoration of the Magi. All his other works were destroyed by fire. He died in 1642. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cazes, Patricio, an Italian architect and painter, was born at Arezzo or Florence about the middle of the 16th century. He is known of his early history, but he attained sufficient eminence to be invited to Spain by Philip II. He was appointed to decorate the Queen's Gallery at the Prado, and painted there The Charity of Joseph. He translated into Spanish the Treatise on Architecture, by Vignole (1588). See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cayet (Lat. Cajetanus). See CAIET.

Cayley, Lady, the widow of Sir Thomas Cayley, Bart., was one of the most eminent and devoted Christians known in the annals of Methodism. She was converted at the age of fifty-two, at Brompton, where she resided, in the Scob磴's circuit, and joined the Methodist society, of which she continued a most faithful member until her death, July 30, 1828, aged eighty. She was the means of reintroducing Methodist preaching in Brompton; through her exertions a chapel was built, and every poor and neglected family in the neighborhood shared her visits and personal labors. Humility, devotion, and an unceasing desire to do good characterized all her sphere of action. She was strongly interested in the doctrine and discipline of the Methodists. See West. Mth. Mag. 1830, p. 1; Smith, Hist. of West. Methodism, ii, 384-386.

Caylus, Daniel Charles Gabriel de Pentel de Lévis de Tubières, a French prelate, was born at Paris, April 20, 1669. After having been admitted doctor at the Sorbonne, he was appointed one of the king's almoners, under the Regency of Madame de Contenson, next grand-vicar of cardinal Noailles, and obtained, in 1704, the bishopric of Auxerre. In that city he exhibited his charity during the very severe winter of 1709. He was one of the opponents of the bull Unigenitus, and also one of the twelve bishops who protested against the deposition of Sommiere and against the declaration of 1730. Caylus died at Rennes, April 3, 1754. His works were published in 10 vols, from 1750 to 1752. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cayot, Augustin, a reputable French sculptor, was born at Paris in 1667, and studied under Le Horgne. He gained the grand prize of the Royal Academy, and was sent to Rome, where he became an assistant to Van Cleere. Among other works, he executed the two angels in bronze, for the grand altar of the Church of Notre Dame at Paris. He died in 1722. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Caytan, Louis Albert, a Belgian writer, was born at Roulers in 1742. In 1774 he became pastor at Notre Dame, in Bruges; in 1790 he was made canon of the city and censor of books. After this he became one of the three secretaries of the general vicariate of the bishopric of Bruges, and was associated with the vicariate in 1798. He remained general vicar until 1802, which is the date of the reunion of the two dioceses of Gand and Bruges, at the close of the revolution. Caytan was still firm and energetic in the midst of the agitation caused by the French Revolution, and he even suffered imprisonment in consequence. He died in 1815, in the hospital for strangers. In a life so full of agitation, Caytan still found the calmness to write and publish several historical and religious books. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cazes, Jean de, a French martyr, was condemned because he visited Arnold Monier, a heretic, in prison. After his examination he was sentenced to be burned. When the time came for his martyrdom, he was dragged through the streets to the place of execution, and lanced to the stake, where he made full confession of his faith, and gave many earnest exhortations to the people. During his imprisonment he bore his sufferings with great patience, and constantly urged the people to trust in God. Trumpets were sounded to prevent those present from hearing his words. He was burned at Bordeaux in 1556. See Fox, Acta et Monuments, iv. 425.

Cazes, Pierre Jacques, an eminent French painter, was born in Paris in 1676, and studied under Housaye, and subsequently in the school of Bon Boullonge. He obtained the grand prize at the academy in 1699, and in 1704 was elected a royal academician. There are many of his works to be seen at Paris, in the Church of Notre Dame, in the college of the Jesuits, at the House of Charity, etc. At St. Germain-des-Prés he represented the lives of St. Germain and St. Vincent. A Holy Family at St. Louis de Versailles is very much admired. He died in Paris, June 23, 1754. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Rose, Gen. Biog. Diet. s. v.

Cazier, Mathias, a Congregational minister, graduated at Princeton College, and immediately became pastor of a church in Pelham, Mass. In August, 1779, he removed to Connecticut, and was installed pastor of a church in South Britain, where he labored till January, 1804. In May of that year he supplied Salem Church, in the town of Watertown. He died in 1837.

Cea, Didacus de, a Spanish theologian of the order of Franciscans, was a native of Aquedra. He was made general commissary of the Franciscans at Rome, and died in the monastery of Ara Coeli in 1640, leaving, Archologia Sacra Principum Apostolorum Petri et Pauli (Rome, 1636, 4to) — Theatrurn Terra Sanctae, etc. (ibid. 1639, 4to). Ceddad, the eighth bishop of Hereford, between 758 and 772, the successor of Heccae and the predecessor of Aldhelm.

Ceddad (or Chadd) of York. See Chad.

Cechlyth, Council of (Concilium Cechlythum, or Colchuthenum). This was a place in Mercia. Bishop Gibson suggests that it may be the same with Colchelch, in Lancashire, on the borders of Cheshire. It is generally thought to be Chelsea, originally Cechlyth. Several councils were held there:

1. 785 or 787, by Gregory (or George), bishop of Otia (the legate of pope Adrian I), who, in his letter to the pope, declares that Alfwald, the king, and Eanbald, the archbishop of York, with all the bishops and abbots of the country, were present, besides the senators, dukes, and people of the land. Its object was to renew the "antiquam amicitiam" between Rome and England, and to confirm the "sanctam et fidelem" canons and decrees of councils. But it also appears to have been made the occasion of preparing the way for the erection of Lichfield into an archbishopric independent of Canterbury, which actually took place in 788. Twenty canons were published, regulating the administration of baptism, visitation of clergy, their care of canons and their election of abbots, etc., ordination of priests and deacons, celebration of mass, election of, and government by, kings, marriage, tithes, etc.

Cecropius, a companion council was held in Northumbria (Had- dan andStubbs, Concil. iii. 444).

2. Held in 789, called "Pontificale Concilium"; made several grants still extant.

3. In 794, at which a grant was made to St. Al- ban's.

4. In 794, at which a cause was adjudicated between king Kenufill and the bishop of Selsea.

5. Heil July 26, 816; Wulfred, archbishop of Canter- bury; presiding. Besides Kenufill, king of the Mercians, and his lords, were present the bishops among whom were those of Rochester, Selsea, Hereford, Lindisfarné, and London. Many abbots, priests, and deacons also attended. Eleven canons were published, relating to the faith, consecration of churches, giving to every bishop the power to select his own abbots, etc., forbidding them to diminish the estates of their churches.

Ceb (Cebus, Cepus, or Cephus) was a monster worshipped at Memphis, supposed to have been a satyr, or ape.

Cecocarini, Sebastiano, a historical painter of Urbino, was born about the year 1700. He studied under Augustino Castellucci, and practiced afterwards at Rome. His best productions are at Fano, where he resided for some time. They are the portraits of the church of the Augustines, and several sacred subjects in the palaces. He died about the year 1780.

Cecchi, Giovanni Battista, a Florentine engraver, was born about 1748, and engraved a number of works, among which are the following: The Vocation of St. Andrew to the Apostleship; The Martyrdom of St. Lawrence; The Martyrdom of St. Vitalis; The Stoning of Stephen; The Entombing of Christ. He was living in 1812.

Cecil, Richard, an English Congregational minis- ter, was born in London, Jan. 18, 1799. At the age of fourteen he was converted, and at sixteen entered Rother- ham College. He began his ministerial work at Whitehaven, and afterwards removed to Harpenden, near St. Albans. In 1824 he became pastor of St. James Street Chapel, Nottingham. After remaining there five years, he labored nine years at Turvey as preacher, also as tutor for the London Missionary Society, and nine years at Ongar; then he returned to Turvey, and died July 30, 1863. See (Lord,) Cong. Year- book, 1864, p. 200.

Cercoarius was the name of two early Christian bishops:

1. Of Nicomedia, in Bithynia, a Semi-arian, who was transferred from Laodicea by Constantius in 351. Athanasius (Contra Arian. p. 290) charges him with having secured his elevation by his calumnies and plots against the orthodox. In the year of his appointment to Nicomedia he attended the synod at Sirmium, and took part in the deposition of Photinus (Athan. Epis. ad So- lit. p. 800). Cercoarius was one of the bishops who at- tended the consecration of the church erected at Ascri- tinum in Nicomedia in 357. The name was addressed by George of Laodicea, representing the danger the faith was exposed to in consequence of the recognition of Aetius and his disciples at Antioch by Eudoxius, and urging them to take bold measures for their deposition (Sozomen. ii. 22, vi. 14). A deputation was accordingly sent to Constantius, who ordered that Aetius and Council of his followers should be brought before Cercoarius to answer to the charges alleged against them (ibid. iv. 24). Cercoarius perished in the earthquake which devastat- ed Nicomedia in 358, and prevented the proposed council from being held there.

2. Of Serafopolis, took a leading part in the Council of Chalcedon in 451. At the second session, Oct. 10, Cercoarius strenuously opposed the formation of any new definition of the faith, and required that the Nicene creed and the letter of pope Leo to Flavian
Cedda, (or Cedda), an English bishop, was a native of Northumbria, and brother of Chad (q.v.). In 633 Peada, ruler of the Middle- Angles, became a Christian, and took home with him, in order to convert his people, four priests, of whom Cedda was one. About the same time Sigered, king of Essex, also embraced Christianity, and allowed Cedda to visit that kingdom. In consequence the latter was ordained, by Finn, bishop of Lindisfarne, about 634. He afterwards became abbot of Lastingham (Lastingham). In 664 Cedda was present at the Synod of Strensæahal (Whitby), and died shortly after. Almost everything that we know about Cedda is in Bede, H. E. iii. c. xxi-xiii. Cedda's day in the calendar is Jan. 7.

Cedol, an early Welsh saint, of uncertain date, was patron of the chapel of Pentir, otherwise Llangedol, subject to Bangor, in Carnarvonshire. He is commemorated on November 1 (Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 306).

Cedunius, Satur and Confessor, was bishop of Aix, in Provence. His name occurs in the Martyrology Gallinianus and in the Brevery of Aix; but his date and acts are quite uncertain. He is otherwise called Sidonius (Acta Sanctorum, Aug. iv. 581).

Cedwren, a Welsh saint of the 6th century, was the reputed patron of Llanbedw, a chapel under Llanhairyd, in Montgomeryshire (Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 280).

Cedwio, a Welsh saint of the 6th century, was patron of Rhodwydd Geidio, subject to Llantrisaint, in Anglesey, and of Cedio, in Carnarvonshire (Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 227).

Ceiling is the under covering of a roof, floor, etc., concealing the timbers from the room below; now usually formed of plaster, but formerly most commonly of boarding; also the under surface of ceilings in vaulted rooms and buildings. During the Middle Ages, the ceilings were generally enriched with gilding and coloring of the most brilliant kind, traces of which may often still be found in churches, though in a faded and dilapidated condition. Plaster and wood ceilings under roofs are often made flat, as at Peterborough Cathedral and St. Alban's Abbey, both of which are Norman with old-style painting, but they frequently follow the line of the timbers of the roof, which are sometimes arranged so as to give the shape of a barrel-vault, especially in Early English and Decorated work. In the Perpendicular style they are more common than in any other, and are usually either flat or canted, and divided by ribs into square panels. See RIN.

The ceiling in churches, immediately over the altar, and occasionally also that over the roodloft, is sometimes richly ornamented, while the remainder is plain, as at Ilfracombe, Devon. This custom continued as late as the time of Charles II.

Ceinwen, a Welsh saint of the 6th century, was patron of Llangeinwen and of Cerrig Ceinwen, in Anglesey. He is commemorated on Oct. 8 (Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 161).

Celtino, a Welsh saint of the 6th century, was the presumed founder of Llangetho, in Cardiganshire. He is commemorated on Aug. 5 (Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 218).

Celadon succeeded Marcus II, as bishop of Alexandria, in 153. He was succeeded by Agrippinus in 168. (Euseb. H. E. iv. 11; Chron. apud Hieron. p. 2171).

Celano, Thomas A. See DIES ILE.

Celantia was a noble Roman matron, a letter to whom is included among those of St. Jerome (Epist. 148, ed. Vall.), though it is probably by some other hand. The letter is full of moderate councils as to ascetism, and blames her for taking a vow of continence without her husband's consent.

Celbes. See ACIMBES.

Celebrant (or celebrating priest) is the priest who makes the oblation and consecrates the holy eucharist; so called to distinguish him from the assisting priests or deacons.

Celic, of Celle-C, Christ, in Uilduchada, of Fotharta in Leinster, was a native of Ulster, being son of eochaidh and brother of Comgall. He left his native province, and, going to the west of Leinster, built a church in the district called Hy-Dondach, which was afterwards known as Cill-Cele-C. Christ. "He was also an artist of some note, and was much employed and devoted himself to heavenly contemplation; but honor pursued him, and "invitus ad pontificis dignitatis apicem raptur." With some others he went on a pilgrimage to Rome, and died in 722, some time after his return. He is venerated March 51 (see Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. i. iii, 162; Kelly, Cat. Ir. Saints, p. 82).

Celle-Clocher, bishop and martyr, commemorated July 8, is given in the Mart. Domest., as martyred along with Eth and Thadua at Wurtzburg, in Franconia. He is probably the same as CILIAN.

Celle-Pedair (servant of Peter) was abbot of Armagh, and the Four Masters gave his obit A.D. 757. He was a native of Ui-Brasail-Macha (now Clan-brasil, County Armagh), and succeeded bishop Congus at Armagh, in the year 750, as abbot and bishop.

Celedel. See COLDELI.

Celedonius, martyr at Leon, in Spain, is commemorated March 3, in the Ancient Roman Martyrology.

Celenea, COUNCIL of (Concialem Celeneea), was held A.D. 447 in a small place close to Lugo, in Galicia, against the Priscillianists. It was an appendage to the first Council of Toledo. See Labbe, Concil. iii. 1466.

Celor, (I. procensus of Africa A.D. 429, is addressed by Augustine (Epist. 56, 57, or 237, 210) as a Donatist. He was anxious to know if the African Donatists had any good reason for severing themselves from the Catholics. (2) Martyr of the primitive Welsh Church, was patron of Llangeler, in Carmarthenshire.

Celerina, (I. a martyr in Africa, under Decius, is commemorated with Celerinus, Feb. 3, in the Jerusalem and Roman martyrologies. (2) The deaconess to whom Theodoret wrote his Epist. 101.

Celerinus, (I. a confessor at Rome, was tortured, apparently in the presence of Decius himself. He writes in agony of mind to Lucianus (q.v.), the Carthaginian confessor, to beg a libellus for his two sisters—Numeria and Candida—the latter of whom had sacrificed and, to avoid sacrificing, the former, called also Euteca., "paid money." The Celerinus whom Cyprian ordained in his retirement, near Carthage, in December, 250 (Epist. 37 and 39), must be the same person; for he comes from Rome, and from the famous group of confessors—Moyes, Maximus, etc. He belonged to a family of martyrs—his grandmother, Celerina, and two uncles, Laurentius and Ignatius, having died by martyrdom. In the Carthograpbus he is commemorated Feb. 3 as deacon confessor. Again, the Celerinus mentioned in Cornelius' letter to Fabius, bishop of Antioch, must be the same (Euseb. H. E. v. 49). (3) Father of Ageruchia (q. v.). See Jerome, Epist. 128, ed. Vall.

Celesti, Cavallere Andrea, a Venetian painter, was born in 1567, and studied under Ponzoni. His best historical works are in the Church of the Ascen- sant, Venice, which he most esteemed in his Adoration of the Magi; and in the ducale palace a picture of a subject from the Old Test. He died in 1706. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Celestius. See CELLOFRID.

Celi, Placido, an Italian painter, was a native of Messina, and studied under Augustino Scilla. He exe- cuted some works for the churches of Messina, and some for the churches dell' Animia and Spontinanza, at Rome. He died at Messina in 1710.

Célideine, a French prelate, was bishop of Besan- çon after Léonce, about 443. Hilary, bishop of Arles, had deposed him for various offences, among others, for having married a widow and having assisted at a service before being ordained; but Célideine appealed to pope Leo I, who ordered him to be re-established in his see. This is the first time that a bishop made an appeal to a pope; but Hilary did not acquiesce in the de- cision, and Célideine remained deposed. It is supposed that Célideine perished in 451, during the capture of Besançon by Attila. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Celin. See CAOLIN.

Cello, Coraliere Garparo, a Roman painter, was born in 1571, and studied under Nicolò Circignani. He painted all the altars for the Roman churches, the best of which are: St. Michael Discomfitting the Fated Spirits, in San Giovanni Laterano; St. Francis Receiving the Stigmata, in the Mandicante, and The Israelites Crossing the Red Sea, in the gallery of the Palazzo Mattei. Cello died in 1640.

Cell, in ecclesiastical usage denotes (1) a small apart- ment; (2) the small dwelling of a hermit or a Carthus- ian; that of the latter contained a bedroom, dayroom, and study; (3) a cubiculum, or partitioned sleeping- room in a dormitory.

CELL, i. e. OBEEDIENCE, of ABRATIAL; was a dependent religious house founded on an abbey estate, under the jurisdiction of the abbot of the mother Church. About the middle of the 11th century, owing to the creation of a new dignitary, the prior, in the Abbey of Cluny, these establishments received the designation of priories.

Cell, Jeremiah, a Baptist minister, was born in Western Pennsylvania, April 13, 1819. He joined a Presbyterian Church in Ohio in 1839, and a Baptist Church in 1846. Soon after, he began to preach. He studied for a time at Covington, Ky., preaching mean- while. He later made New York his permanent home. He was a frequently visiting New York's leading sev- ered churches in Aurora, Ind., two years: Ebenezer, eight years; Momence, Ill., two years; Galesburg, Mich., three years; a second time in Aurora, then Greensboro, Ind., from 1864 to 1886; recalled to Gales- burg, then went to Centralia, Ill., six years: returned to Greensboro in the spring of 1874, in which year he died. He commanded the respect, esteem, and confidence of all. See Min. of Ill. Anentaries, 1874, p. & (2) Cella (or Cellum Memorialis), was a small memorial chapel erected in a sepulchral area over the tomb of a deceased person, in which at stated times, especially the anniversary of his decease, friends and dependents as- sembled to celebrate an agape, and partake of a banquet in his honor. Sepulchral buildings of this character were common both to heathens and Christians. Chris- tians, however, adapted the custom, and purged them of li- centious or idolatrous taint.

Directions for the erection of a building bearing the same title, and devoted to a similar purpose, by a pagan, are given in a very curious will, once engraved on a tomb at Langres, a copy of a portion of which has been discovered in the binding of a MS. of the 10th century in the library at Baslé.

These _cella_ were halls for memorial banquetts. The Christians were essentially men of their country and their age, following in all things lawful the customs of the time and place in which their lot was cast. Re- jecting the abuses arising from the license of pagan morals, there was nothing in itself to take exception at in the funeral feast. Indeed, the primitive "love- feasts" were often nothing more than banquets held in _celle_ at the tombs of the faithful, the expenses of which, in the case of the poorer members, were provided out of the church-chest. Pictorial representations of banquetts of this nature are found in the catacombs. These _celle_ also formed oratories where prayers were offered over the remains of the departed. The name was applied only to buildings erected above the ground, those below being known as _Cubicula_ (q. v.).

Cellen were employed at a later time for sepulchral chapels built along the side walls of a church, and in this sense the terms are used by Paulinus of Nola.

Cellach (Cellan, or Kellach), a name derived from Ceadal, or Celi, "a cell," and borne by thirty-three saints between 567 and 1148; but few of them have much bearing on history, or are distinctly identifiable.

1. Commemorated April 1. Seems to be the son of Sargus, anchorite, abbot, and bishop of Armagh, in the end of the 9th century. This is likewise the day of Ceallach, abbot of Iona. Ceallach, son of Conghal, was abbot of Hy, A.D. 802-813, and during his presi- dency the monastery of Kells, in Meath, was founded, or re-organized after its original foundation in 561. Conghal, of whom we have no notice, was also abbot at Cashal, and was made the chief station of the Columbanus order, on account of the danger and sufferings to which the community at Iona was exposed from the attacks of the Northmen. There is mention also of a Ceallach, son of Connmac, who was blind, deaf, and lame.

2. Deacon in Glendalough in U-Mail. Colgan: Tr. Thaum. p. 510, c. 9) says that St. Kellach, son of Samul, abbot of Pothan (now Fathan, County Downeal), was successor of Mura; died, according to the Four Masters, A.D. 657, and was venerated on October 7. These may have been placed upon the same day, but can hardly be the same person.

Cellah. See KOLACH.

Cellanas was a native of Ireland, and a monk at France, in the monastery where the uncorrupted body of St. Finian rested, at Peronne. He wrote to Aldhelm begging some of his discourses, and received from him a favorable reply.

Collarage is an ecclesiastical name for the store- chambers of the callarier or house-steward, such as were formed at Kirkham and Leeds: under the guest-hall at Chester: below the dormitory. It commonly was divided longitudi- tudinally into two alleys by a range of pillars, and lat-errily by wooden screens, into separate rooms. At Fountains one enormous range on the western side of the cloister was filled with wool, with which the Cistercians supplied the market at the convent. At Chester, a similar vaulted space was stocked with fish, which the abbey boats brought up the Dee. At Durham, it was clear that various apartments might be called "guests," and devoted to many uses. The substructure of the refectory contained the food, and that of the dormitory the materials for furniture and clothing. At Canterbury, in the western range of vaults were the beer and wine cellars; and at the north end, as at the Charter-house, the turn remains in the wall.—The abbey was an obvious Gimme, and through which the end of wine asked for by a weary monk was passed to him. At Battle Abbey two magnificent specimens remain; one under the guest-house, and the other on the west side of the cloisters, as at Beaulieu, where a wall divides it from the cloisters.

Cellarius, Andreas, a Protestant theologian of Germany, born at Rotenburg, on the Neckar, in 1508; was pastor at Wildberg, in Württemberg, and died Sept. 18, 1562, leaving Von der Haltung eines Concilii: — Von Vereinigung der Christlichen Religionen. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jücher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Cellarius, Balthasar, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Oct. 10, 1614, at Rottenbein, and studied at Jena, Wittenberg, and Helmstadt. He died Sept. 15, 1671, being doctor and professor of theology of Helmstadt and abbots of Marienthal, and leaving Examen Controversiarum Ecclesiasticorum Augustanae Confesstonis: — Epitome Theologia Philosophicae: — De Natura Theologiae. See Witte, Memoriae Theologorum; Jücher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Cellarius, Christopher, a German theologian, was born Nov. 22, 1638, at Smalcald. He studied at Jena and Giessen; was in 1667 professor of Hebrew at Weisensel, in 1679 rector at Weimar, in 1678 at Zeitz, and in 1688 at Merseburg. In 1685 he was appointed professor of history at Halle, and died June 4, 1707. He wrote, among many other works, Rabbinismus (Giessen, 1681, also in Roul's Anal. Robb., Utrecht, 1702) — Grammatica Hebraica (ibid. 1681, 1684): — De Lingua Sancta Proprieta (3ed ed. 1679): — De Gemino Judeorum Messis (Weisensel, 1689): — Scholastic Philologiae (Zeitz, 1678). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud., i, 136; Steinschneider, Bibliogr. Handbuck, p. 38; Jücher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Cellarius (Keller, or Keliner), Johannes, a German theologian, was born at Kudtstedt in 1496, and died at Dresden, April 21, 1542, where he was the first Lutheran Superintendent. See Stein, Liber Libri Hebr. Literar. (Hagenau, 1518): — Tabula Declarationum et Conjugationum Hebr. See Jücher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Steinschneider, Bibliogr. Handbuck, p. 33; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Cellarius, Ludwig Friedrich, a German theologian, was born Nov. 25, 1745, at Quittelsdorf, and died at Rudolstadt, May 22, 1818, while he was a member of the Provisional Ministry, which was called De Paulo Apostolo, etc. (Wittenberg, 1776): — De Silla Viro Apostolico (ibid. 1775). See Winer, Handbuck der thol. Lit. 1, 568, 571. (B. P.)

Cellars, J. V., a Presbyterian minister, was a graduate of Washington and Jefferson College, and also of the Western Theological Seminary. On completing his course at the first-named college he was appointed to the Providence Missionary Church in Allegheny, Pa. He was for a time professor of Hebrew and Oriental literature in the seminary. He retired on account of failing health, and died at Allegheny, Sept. 20, 1872. See Predigerzeit, Oct. 12, 1872. (W. P. S.)

Cellas, L., a franciscan, was born near the French prélate of the 12th century, was born in Champagne, and studied at Paris, in the convent of St. Martin-des-Champs. He was made abbé of La Celle about 1150, and of St. Remi, at Rheims, in 1162. His piety, science, lively spirit, good judgment, and zeal gave him the friendship of the greatest men of the Church. He succeeded John of Salisbury as bishop of Chartres in 1180, and occupied that see until his death in 1187. Among his writings is a Notice des Prophetes et Mystere Expostulo (Paris, 1809, 4to): — De Conscientia, etc. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cellérier, Jean Isaac Samuel, a French theologian, was born at Crans, near Nyon, Switzerland, in 1755. He studied at Geneva, where he was ordained in 1776. Having spent a few years in travelling, he returned to his native country, and was called in 1783 as pastor to Saint-Jacques, where he laboured for thirty-six years. In 1814 he resigned his pastorate on account of feeble health, and spent the remainder of his life at Geneva, where he died in 1844. He wrote more than four hundred and twenty sermons, of which one hundred and forty-one were published during his lifetime, and twenty-three after his death. These are all still in manuscript in the library belonging to the pastors' association of Geneva. See Coulin, in Lichtenberg's Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.; Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 219. (B. P.)

Cellitas were a class of monks midway between hermits and cenobites. Strictly speaking, they were the "anchorites," so called because they withdrew or retired from the commune, whether from want of room or from the desire of being, together, to small cells in the immediate vicinity. On festivals the cellite repaired to the church of the monastery, and thus, being still semi-attached to the community, they differed from the "hermits," who were independent of control. As preferring the more complete privacy and quiet of these cells to living in common, they were sometimes called kykkaste. But the cells of the cellite, properly so called, resembled rather a "laura" in Egypt and Palestine, each laura being a quasi-cenobitic cluster of cells, forming a community to which, in the earlier days of monasticism, the abbot's will was in place of a written rule. The first of these laurae is said to have been founded by St. Chariton, about the middle of the 4th century, near the Dead Sea. Other famous laurae were those of St. Euthymius, near Jerusalem, in the next century, and of St. Sabas, near the Jordan. Each cell had a small garden or vineyard, in which to live on the produce which it occupied himself at pleasure. But sometimes the cellitas was a monk with aspirations after more than ordinary self-denial. Thus it was a custom at Vienna, in the 6th century, for some monk, selected as pre-eminent in sanctity, to be immersed in a solitary cell, as an intercessor for the people.

A strict of cellitas was drawn up in the 9th century. Their cells were to be near the monastery, either standing apart one from another, or communi-

Celynyn, a Welsh saint of the 7th century, was patron of Llangelynnin, in Merionethshire: commemorated on November 20 (Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 302).

Cemetery. The early Christians used the subterraneous vaults or excavations beneath the hills in the neighborhood of Rome chiefly for the purpose of burial. At the entrance, chapels were erected, and hence also the cemetery-chapel was spoken of under the name of crypta. The vaults containing the coffins were called catacombs, and, besides being used as burial-places, were possibly, during times of persecution, though rarely, used by the early Christians for worship. In after-times, when these vaults, which were accessible to the people, in consequence of so many saints and martyrs reposing there, and prayers at their tombs were considered more efficacious than elsewhere. It is most probable that this gave rise to the introduction of crypts beneath our own churches, where saints only were buried, or to which their remains were moved sometimes years after their burial. At their tombs the faithful of all ages have worshipped as at an altar. In medieval times the cemetery for the faithful was simply the ground adjoining the church, which was enclosed as church-yards are now, and was often called paradise. At times, as at Canterbury to A.D. 740, it was forbidden to bury within towns, and in that case a cemetery was provided outside the town, with its church or chapel, as in our own times.—Parker, Gloss. of Architect, s. v.

Tertullian calls the burying-place adjoining a church an area, when used for religious meetings. The enormous Campo Santo, built between 1218 and 1263, by John of Pisa, is the most remarkable in Europe, forming a great cloistered quadrangle. The burial-place of unbaptized infants was called the cemetery of the Innocents. In continental cemeteries, and commonly in the north of France, a light—the dead man's lantern—burned in a pharos, or tower, to mark the resting-place of the dead; one, of the Christian period, is in the Fontevrault; and it is not improbable that, in England, in many cases a low side-window contained a lantern, or Lynch-light, for the same purpose. There are sometimes two churches within one churchyard, as at Altrington, Evesham, Willingale, Cockerington, Hackford, Reenham, and Gillingham; as formerly also at Fulbourne, Trimley, and Staiton. The monastic cemetery was usually on the south side, and the laymen's yard on the north of the presbytery, in England, but in France eastward of it; and a light burning at night gave light both to the crypt and this garth. At Durham, after dinner, the monks, bareheaded, went in procession, daily, to pray around the graves of their departed brethren. At Canterbury, the southern close was divided into the outer cemetery, for lay persons, and the inner, for ecclesiastics and religious. The cemetery—gate, called at Gloucester and Worcester, until their destruction. The church-gate, remains at Ely and St. Augustine's, Canterbury.

Cena is the name of a lady who writes (A.D. 738) to St. Boniface, assuring him of her prayers, and begging his. She rarely sees him, but would gladly serve him or any of his party, should they come into her province. To her place of residence the letter gives no clue (St. Boniface Epist. 34, ed. Würsdiein; in Migne, Patrolog. lat., 735).
In 1851, when I was at Kalamaki, on the north-western corner of the Saronic bay, I inquired of the natives if they knew Cenchrea. After some confusion, arising from the provincial pronunciation of their names, they recollected it as a small town described as it a creek, where there was a corn-mill and a stream of water flowing from the rock. I crossed in an open boat, which stood the rough sea. Northward, we were told to lie between two mountains confronting each other in the dusk, like crowning lions. The evening on the left was precipitous, standing for miles in a magnificent cliff, and the bright green of the former and the gray foliage of the latter showing the disturbed surface of the sea. The boat was run ashore (for the water was deep to the edge), and we landed on a beach of fine pebbles. Beyond the beach was a row of cottages, with red roofs covered with red earth, to which the boats were fastened the arbutus. Having passed this, we found ourselves in a triangular plot of ground shut in by the mountains, the sea forming one side of the triangle. We entered in a valley which swept away to the left. A clear and swift stream flowed from north to south, parallel to the sea, as mentioned by Pausanias, 'on the stream along the sea.' Having crossed it, we found about the middle of the area a circular pool resembling a bath, for the purpose of which it was probably adapted by its size, and the depth and clearness of its waters. A stream was running rapidly from it, betokening the power of the spring by which it was fed. Beyond was another rivulet running towards the sea, and, thinking it must come down the north side of the hill, I ascended it for a little way. But all the water was from the springs in the fairy ground we stood upon, and the channel was dry long before we reached the sea. We then turned to the left and traversed the southern side, and here were two small millponds, or reservoirs, enclosed in stone walls, and connected by a channel, between which a stream flowed from them to one end to supply the mill below, the water poured from the other end into the rivulet which went to the sea. There was the site of the area of Cenchrea. The cove which I examined was that of Galataki, which was the open port or roadstead of Cenchrea, as opposed to the close or proper port of Cenchrea, which adjoined on the north. (See cut on p. 584.)

Cêne, Nicolas, a French martyr, was a physician in Dijon, who visited the prisoners in their filthy cells and sang psalms and did whatever he could to comfort them. He was shot by the commandment of those who did not already know them. When the time of his examination came he perceived that the judges had intended that, if he would recant, he should be strangled, and if not, he should burn alive and his tongue be cut out; and being content to suffer these torments for his Lord's sake, he offered his tongue willingly to the hangman to be cut. Then he was drawn out of prison in the dung-cart to the suburbs of St. Germain, where he was buried alive. This occurred at Paris in 1558. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv. 433.

Cêne, Philippe, a French martyr, was an apostate at Geneva. He was taken at Dijon for objecting to the doctrines of the Church of Rome, and burned in 1557. He was convicted on singing psalms. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv. 426.

Cêne (Keyne, or Keyna) is the name of several Welsh saints:

1. A recluse of Keynsham, commemorated Oct. 8, whose memory is greatly honored on both sides of the Severn, is said to have been the third daughter of Brychan, of Brycheiniog; but it is more probable that she was either the fourth or second daughter of this Brychan, or the daughter of another, who lived at a later period. According to the legend, in her youth she took up her abode in a wood or desert place near Avon, where the abundance of serpents made the place uninhabitable. But having by prayer performed the miracle of changing the serpents into stones, as is still related of her in that district, she remained for many years where Keyn-sham now stands, and in her old age returned to Brecknock at the request of her nephew, St. Cadoc. There she died in the 5th or beginning of the 6th century, but the place of her interment is unknown. Her name is perpetuated at St. Keyne, a parish in Cornwall; and at Keynsham, in Somerset.

2. Son of Cef, a Welsh saint of the 4th century.

3. Bishop of St. David's in the 6th century, founder of a church named Llangen, once existing in Pembroke, all traces of the situation of which were obliterated by the Flemings who settled in that county. He was the third bishop, according to one text of Giraldus Cambrensis; but, according to another, he is absent from the list.

Cengille (Cengilleus, Cingilus, Cyngilus, or Cengils; also Kengillus, Kengisael), abbot of Glastonbury A.D. 729-748, succeeding Echfrid, is said to have received for the abbey a grant of land at Polonbrot, Torric, and Brunamont from Ethelward, king of Wessex, and his wife. In conjunction with abbot Ingeld and the presbyter Wietberhtus, he addressed a proposal of mutual intercessory prayer, the first of the kind on record, to the abbots Aldhean and the abbesses Cueburga and Cumburga, who replied in acceptance of it. His name appears in attestation of a doubtful charter of king Ethelward, A.D. 787.

Cennfsoaldh, abbot of Bangor, commemorated April 8, was among the saints who went security for liberating the women (of Ireland) from military service, etc. He was grandson of Eth Breac, and died A.D. 704.

Cennl, Garatano, an Italian paleographer, who lived at Rome early in the 18th century, wrote, De Antiquitate Ecclesiae Hibernae (Rome, 1740-41):—Codex Carolinianus et Codex Rudolphinum, Chronologia Dissertations et Nota Illustrata (ibid. 1780). See Hoefer, Nouv. Hist. Générale, s. v.

Cennni, Andrea, an Italian painter and author, who lived at Florence early in the 15th century, painted The Virgin, with several saints, in the Hospital of Bonifacio, at Florence, and other sacred subjects.

Cennydd (or Cenydd), a Welsh saint of the 6th century, was at first a member of the college of Caerac and afterwards founder of a religious society at a place in Gower, Glamorganshire, where the Church at Llangenydd is now situated.

Cenobites. See Cenobites.

Cenōnēs were an order of ecclesiastical functionaries among the Montanists of the 2d century, superior to bishops and distinct from them.

Cenotaph, an empty monument erected by the ancient Greeks and Romans in honor of the dead who were either buried elsewhere or whose bodies could not be found. After the structures were completed the souls of the dead, for whom they were intended, were thrice called upon by name to occupy the habitations prepared for them.

Cerrewath is the name of a sect of the Banians (q. v.) in Hindustan, who hold the transmigration of souls so strictly that they will not kill the smallest creature. They drink no water without previously boiling it, lest they should swallow some insect. They burn the dead bodies of the old, but bury those of children under three years of age. Their widows are not obliged to burn themselves along with their husbands, but take upon them vows of perpetual widowhood. Any one who becomes a priest must assume the priestly dress, take the vow of chastity, and practice great austerities. This sect is held in great contempt by all the other Banians.

Censurius, Saint, confessor, and bishop of Auxerre. It is a disputed point when he held that see: but, according to Gain's (Series Episcoporum, p. 50): it was from A.D. 472 to 502. His history is not certain. According to Usuard (Mart.) he is commemorated June 10.

Centaurs, a fabulous creature in Greek mythology. The Centaur of ancient myths must be distinguished from the later representation of double-bodied monsters.
Norman architecture, in which the vaulting is constructed with rough, unhewn stones, the centering was covered with a thick layer of mortar, in which the stones were imbedded, so that when the centering was removed it remained adhering to the under surface of the vault, exhibiting an exact impression of the boards on which it was spread. In Ireland hurdles were used instead of boards over the centering, and their impression frequently remains on the plaster.

Centimaki (Greek Hekatoncheires), in pagan mythology, were the hundred-armed giants, Briareus, Gyges, and Cottus, the sons of Uranus and Gaea. Because of their giant-like form and strength, they were dreaded by their father and placed by him in Tartarus. But Jupiter liberated them to fight the Titans, whom they besieged and placed in Tartarus in their own stead, and ever since guard there.

Centuriius was a Donatist layman, who brought to the Church at Hippo a book written against Augustine by the Donatists, consisting of a compilation of Scripture testimonies to the nullity of baptism by unworthy ministers (e.g. Prov. v. 15–17).

Cenzontotochtin, in Mexican mythology, is the god of wine, who, from the effects of this drink, has two surnames, Tequemekamkani, "the murderer," and Teco-tlakukani, "the stupefer." He had a temple with four pillars. In the thirteenth month of the Mexican year human sacrifices were brought him at his festival.

Ceode. See Casti.

Cebulor (Cobulurg, or Cebulburn) was abbe of Hersies or Berkeh. Her name is attached to a charter of Offa, king of Mercia, A.D. 783, marked aperious or doubtful by Kemble. From her being mentioned in the Saxo chronicle, where her death is placed in A.D. 805, i.e. probably 807, she must have been a person of some note.

Cebullhein was one of four prelates of the diocese of Dunwich, attesting an act of the Council of Clovesho, Oct. 12, 983.

Céollia. See Céllach.

Céollach, the second bishop of the Mercian Church, was a Scot by birth. He was appointed bishop by Oswe before the end of the year 636, and was consecrated by Fiano. His episcopate was very short; immediately, as it would seem, on the evacuation of Mercia by Oswe, he retired to Iona, about 639. In the Scotch calendars he appears as Colchus, Céollach, Ceollia, and Galgur (Forbes, Kol. Scottish Saints, p. 237, 299, 302), and elsewhere as Celch (Malmsbury, Gestis Pontif. ed. Hamilton, p. 307).

Céollmund was (1) the single abbot of the diocese of Selern, attesting an act of the Council of Clovesho, Oct. 12, 983. Nothing is known of the monasteries within that diocese at this period. (2) The eleventh bishop of Hereford, who attests Mercian charters from 788 to 793.

Céollón, abbot of St. Peter's, Chertyce, received a grant from Offa, king of Mercia, issued in a synodal meeting at Aedah or Acer, i.e. Oakley, in Surrey, A.D. 787.

Céollnoth, archbishop of Canterbury, was the first dean of Canterbury, and was consecrated archbishop Aug. 27, 883. His episcopate is celebrated in ecclesiastical history on account of a charter granted by king Ethelwulf, to which reference has been made by some historians, as the foundation of tithes to the Church of England. The custom prevailed during his administration, among the first converts to Christianity in England, of dedicating to God's service tenth or tithe arising from things that give a yearly increase. Archbishop Ceolnoth is also distinguished for the quantity of money which he coined. There are no less than two varieties of his coins in existence. This prelate's stormy career was closed by death in 870. See Hook, Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, i, 284 sq.

Ceolwine, a bishop, attests an undated and probably spurious charter of Coenwulf, king of Wessex; possibly intended for Cedd (q. v.).

Coelestinus, sacerdos, attests a charter of Offa, king of Mercia, A.D. 777.

Ceorh, deacon, attests a charter of Denebert, bishop of Worcester, about A.D. 802.

Ceowulf is the name of several early Christian characters:

1. King of Northumbria, from A.D. 719 to 737, is chiefly known from the circumstance of Bede dedicating to him his Ecclesiastical History. In 731 there seems to have been an insurrection in his kingdom, in which Ceowulf was seized and forcibly tonsured, as if to mock his ecclesiastical tastes. In 737 Ceowulf rebelled against his kingdom and became a monk in Lindisfarne, to which monastery he had been a liberal benefactor. Here he died in 764. After a time his body was removed by bishop Ecgred to the Church of Norham, and at a still later period his skull had a conspicuous place among the saintly relics in Durham.

2. The seventh bishop of the Lindisfar, at Sidnecaster, who, according to Simeon of Durham, was consecrated April 24, 767. His name appears misspelled "Eudeulfus Lindensis Faroneus episcopus," among the attestations of the Legantine Synod of 785, and is very frequently attached to the Mercian chapters from 767 to 796. The Anglo-Saxon chronicle mentions his departure from the land, and death in the year of Offa's death, A.D. 796.

Cepari, Virgilio, an Italian historian and ascetic thelogian, of the order of the Jesuits, was born at Panze, near Perugia, in 1564. He was rector in the Jesuit colleges at Florence and Rome, and died March 14, 1631, leaving, Vita di San Francesco di Borgia (Rome, 1624, 8vo):—Vita di Santa Francesca, Romana:—Vita di Santa Maddalena di Passi:—Vita di San Luigi di Gonzaga:—Vita di Giovanni Berchmans:—Vita di San Stanislao di Kostka. These latter four lives have been translated into French and often reprinted. See Hoefer, Nouvelle Biographie Generale, s. v.

Cephalomancy (from κεφαλής, the head, and μαντινία, divination) was a species of divination or ordeal practiced occasionally among the ancient Greeks with an ass's head, which they broiled upon coals, and, after muttering a few prayers, and mentioning the name of the suspected person, if the jaws moved and the teeth chattered, they thought his guilt established.

Cephas (Gal. ii, 11) was sometimes distinguished from Peter by early Christian writers, and said to be one of the seventy disciples by Clement of Alexandria (Hypothoses, v), as recorded by Eusebius (H. E. i, 12). In the list of the seventy ascribed to Dorotheus, he is specified as bishop of Cannia. In the chronology of Basili he is commemorated on Dec. 9, but nothing is said of him in the Synaxarion there given. The Armenian calendar commemorates Apollus and Cephas as disciples of Paul, Sept. 25. Dr. Lightfoot (Galatians, p. 128) refers to the constitutions of the Egyptian Church as representing him as one of the twelve distinct from Peter.

Cephus was a Gallican bishop, to whom, A.D. 467, the bishop of Astorga sent his refusal of the Priscilianists, and who was ordered by pope Leo I to assemble a council against them.

CERCOPES

CERCOPES, in Greek mythology, were therian, tamed by the papyrus on the Nile, and that Jupiter came to them for assistance in the war against the Titans. The Cercopes promised him assistance for a certain amount of gold; but when they had received their pay in advance, they ridiculed him, and refused to serve him, for which he changed them into asps, hence the name Pithicentaires, i.e., asp-lands. Others understand two brothers under this name, Atlas and Caudulus, sons of the Oceanid Thia, who lived in Lydia, where they played dishonest tricks on strangers.

Cerda, Juan Luis de, a Spanish Jesuit, who was born at Toledo about 1560, and died at Madrid, May 6, 1613, is best known as the first editor of the Psalterium Solemonis, which he published with a Latin translation, introduction, and notes, as an appendix to his Adversus Socera (Lugd., 1626). He also wrote Commentaria in Tertullianum (Paris, 1624-30, 2 vols.). See Joter, Algonnis Gebrohten-Leizon, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol., L. i, 912; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Cerdagne, Guillaume Jourdain, Count, a French knight, who went in 1102 to the Holy Land with Raymond IV of Toulouse, whom he succeeded in 1105. He died in 1109. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cerdo, a presbyter, attests a charter of Cynewulf, king of the West Saxons, A.D. 759.

Cerdo, (1) succeeded Abilius as bishop of Alexandria in 98, and was succeeded by Primus in 139 (Euseb., H. E. ii, 31, iv, 1). According to the legendary "Acts of St. Mark," Cerdo was one of the presbyters whom St. Mark ordained (Bolland, Acta Sanctorum, April 25).

(2) A Manichean, taught his doctrines in A.D. 275, according to Jo. Malalas (Chron. xii, p. 399). His views are that this may possibly be Manes himself.

Cerdomians. See Cerdo.

Cerealia, among the Romans, was a festival in honor of Ceres, in the month of April. Pigs and cows were sacrificed, plays of warriors were held in the circus, white dresses were worn, and a general festive time was enjoyed.

Cerealia was the name of several persons in early Christian history:

1. A procurator by Hadrian to arrest the two brothers Getulus and Amanius, tribunes and Christians, at Tivoli. He was convicted by them, baptized by the Soldiers, arrested by them with one Licius, and beheaded, June 10, cir. 121 (Tillemont, i, 242).

2. A soldier convicted by his prisoner, pope Cornelius, and beheaded along with him; as also his wife, Sabina, whom the pope had cured of palsy. See Tille

3. A bishop (surnamed Afer) of Castellum, in Numidia, the author of a Libellus contra Maximium Arrianum. His own episcopal city and the neighboring towns having been devastated in the religious war carried on by Humeric and his nephew Gundemund against the Catholics, Cerealis took refuge in Carthage, A.D. cir. 485, where he was confronted by Maximus, the Arian prelate of the Ariminum (or Ammonium), who reproached him with the calamities which had fallen on those of the orthodox faith, as a proof of the displeasure of God. Being challenged by Maximus at the point of execrably at issue between the Arians and the orthodox from Scripture alone, he accepted the challenge on twenty assigned heads, each of which he demonstrated in favor of the Catholics by two or three quotations from the Bible. Maximus deferred his reply from day to day until he allowed judgment to go against him by default. See Gennadius, c. 96, Cav., Historia Literaria, i, 460.

Cerere. See CHILL.

Ceremoniale is a book containing directions or rubrics for the due performance of certain ceremonies. The more ancient form for such a book is Ordo (q. v.).

Ceremonies, Masters of the, is a term applied to certain officers of the papal establishment, usually six in number, two of them being called assistants, and the other four supernumeraries. Their duties are to regulate all pontifical functions, acquaint the cardinals with their duties, and issue orders to all persons belonging to the clergy and laity. Whenever the pope sends any cardinal à lateve out of Rome, he deputes one of the super numerary masters of the ceremonies to wait upon him. These officers usually wear purple cassocks, with black buttons and facings, and sleeves trailing on the ground; but in the papal chapel they wear a red cassock like the cardinals, and rochetts like the prelates.

Cerensius, Saint, deacon of Civitas Sugorum (Sèze), under the metropolitan of Rouen, went, with his friend Serenus, to Rome, where they were ordained deacons. In the Life of St. Serenus it is stated that after a moderate time the pope ordained them both cardinals of the Church; but this is thought by the Bollandists to be a mistake. Leaving Rome, they entered Gaul, and lived for a time at Mayence. Cere sianus founded the monastery of Cenomanum (Le Mans), and had one hundred and forty disciples. He lived to a good old age, and was buried in the Church of St. Martin, which he founded, and which was afterwards called after himself. He lived towards the end of the 7th century, and is commemorated May 7.

Ceres (among the Greeks Demeter), in pagan mythology, was the daughter of Saturn and Rhea. Saturn had swallowed Ceres, together with the rest of his children, but when Jupiter gave him an emetic, prepared by Metis, the daughter of Oceanus, he vomited them all up. By Jupiter Ceres became mother of Proserpina (in Greek Persphone, or Kore), and according to some also of Bacchus. The snares of Neptune she sought to avoid by changing herself into a horse; but the god did the same, and thus she gave birth to him in the famous horse Apollo. The most important part of the mythical history of Ceres is found in the story of the rape of Pros erpina. Jupiter had promised to give Proserpina to Pluto, without the knowledge of Ceres. Therefore when the daughter was gathering flowers with her companions near Enna, in Sicily, Pluto appeared suddenly, with four black steeds, out of the earth, and carried off the strangling and crying maiden. Nobody had heard the cry for help save Hecate, and the sun-god. The mother of the maiden then sought her nine days, until she met Hecate, who led her to the sun-god, from whom she learned the whole story. Angry, she now avoided the society of the gods, and wittunknow among men, but was hospitably re caused unfruitfulness in the country. At that time she dwelt in a cave near Phigalia, in Arcadia. Her whereabouts remained unknown to all the gods, until Pan, hunting in Arcadia, discovered her, whereupon Jupiter ordered a shepherd, who was tending his flock in calming his disciples by reciting to them the prophecies of the sollars who turned earth ordered to get Proserpina from the infernal regions; but Pluto gave her the fruit of the pomegranate-tree to eat, in consequence of which she re-mainted bound to his kingdom. Jupiter therefore ordered that Proserpina should remain two thirds of the year with her mother, and one third of the year with her husband.

Other stories relate of the goddess that she gave birth to Plutos (wealth) by Jupiter; that she transformed the Sycian king Lyncus into a lynx, because he sought to kill Triptolemus; that she caused bees to spring from the corpse of Melissa, a woman of the Isthmus, who had been killed by other women because she would not re-tray the mysteries of Ceres, thus making her the giver of honey; also that she caused Erysichthon, son of Triopas, to be continually plagued by a craving for food, because he cut down some trees in a sacred wood; and finally that she endowed Pandareus, son of Merope of Miletus, with the power of eating as much as he wished without injuring his body or giving trouble to his brain.

Ceres is the goddess of the fruit-bearing earth, therefore of agriculture; but she is also the goddess of marriage and of married women especially. The myth of her daughter returning from the depths of the earth was frequently used, especially in the mysteries relating to the sacred rites of the Eleusinian Mysteries. The worship of Ceres was universal in Greece, especially in Athens. Her chief mysteries among the Athenians were the Thessalia and Eleusinia. The former were celebrated in October, and lasted three or four days, with nine days' preparation. The Eleusinia were twofold, the lesser in Feb-uary, the greater for nine days in September. Fruit-trees, also the elm, the hackberry, and the poppy were sacred to Ceres. In Italy she was worshipped among the highest deities, and was placed on a level with Vertumus. The name Ceres is said to have come from the Sabines, and to denote bread in their language. In formal representations she is similar to Juno, but has a milder look; she is draped in full, and sometimes has her head covered. As accessories she was crowned with ears of wheat, in her hand was a sceptre, also poppy-stalks, and a basket containing the sacred articles used in her mysteries. She was sometimes borne in a car drawn by horses or winged dragons. See Ceresia (or Cerezia), René de, a French historian and ascetic theologian, of the order of the Jesuits, was born at Nantes in 1609. After having taught in several colleges of his order, he asked and received secularization. He was then made chancellor and censive of Louis XIV. He died in 1662, leaving a great number of historical and ascetic writings, of which the principal are: L'Image de Notre-Dame de Liesse (Rheims, 1622); Les Heureux Commencements de la France Chrétienne sous Saint Remi (ibid. 1633, 4to; 1647, Ceridwen, in British mythology, was the godess of nature, but also goddess of death as well as of the renewal of life, according to the Druid's doctrine of the transmigration of souls. Ceridwen was married to Te-fid Voci, a knight of high birth, whose father was laid in the middle of the Tegid sea. A son, Morvän, and a dughter, Creivyn, the prettiest girl of the world, were their children; besides these they also had another son, Avagddu, the most hateful-looking of all creatures.

In order to comfort the latter under his deformity, his mother had a mystical vessel made, into which it was only necessary to look to discern the future. The preparation of the vessel, by boiling the contents, had to be brought on night and day without intermission, until the indwelling spirit presented three blessed drops.
Ceridwen employed a man, therefore, the little Gwion, to oversee this process. But towards the end of the process, out of carelessness, the three drops flew out of the vessel on his finger; he swallowed them, and found that the future lay open before him. But Ceridwen, when she discovered that her pains for Avagddu had been lost, followed Gwion. After various changes, both of the pursued and pursuer, Gwion changed himself into an ear of wheat, Ceridwen into a hen, and ate the ear, whereupon she became pregnant and gave birth to a beautiful child, which she placed in a small boat and left to its fate. It was found by Elfyns, the son of Gwydno, who named it Taliesin (radiant forehead), and discovered that this child was the heritage of all the druids, and was able to make revelations.
The vessel of Ceridwen was the symbol of a special order among the bards, who were the depositaries of certain secrets, and at festivals declaimed mysterious songs.

Cerva, Giovanni Battista, a Milanese painter, flourished about 1550, and studied under Gaudenzio Ferrari. His only mentioned work is the Incrédulity of Thomas, which ranks high.

Cervieu, René, a French writer, was born at Paris, May 22, 1700. He made himself remarkable by his zeal for Jansenism, and was one of the principal editors of the Névrole des plus célèbres défenseurs et Confesseurs de la Vérité (Paris, 1760-78, 12mo). He died in Paris, April 15, 1780, leaving S. L'Esprit de Cervelli, Federico, a Milanese painter, flourished about 1600, and studied under Pietro Ricchi.

One of his best works is at the Scuola di San Te-odoro, representing a subject from the life of that saint.

Cervi, Bernardino, a painter of Modena, who died in 1630, was a scholar of Guido, and his principal works are his frescoes, in the dome at Modena.
There are also several altar-pieces in the church. He excuted an engraving of The Martyrdom of St. Sebastitus.

Cerynthian (or Cerynean) Hind, in Greek mythology, was an animal of extraordinary swiftness, with golden horns and brazen feet, consecrated to Dianna by the nymph Ta'gete. It lived on the mountain Cernavata, in Arcadia; hence its name. Hercules was commanded to bring it alive to Eurythmus, and, after chasing it a while, he captured it near the river Ladon.

Cesari, Antonio, an Italian writer, was born at Verona, Jan. 16, 1760. He was a member of the order of St. Philip of Neri, and died Oct. 1, 1828, at Ravenna, having been a member of almost all the academies and learned societies of his country. He published, Vite de Santi Padri (Verona, 1799, 4 vols.):—La Vita del
Cespedes, Pablo (called in Italian Cedace), a very eminent Spanish painter, was born at Cordova in 1558. He visited Rome twice for improvement, and derived great advantage from the study of the productions of Michael Angelo. While there he executed several paintings, among them an Ammunion and a Nativity, in the Trinita dei Monti; also several subjects from the Bible, in the Virgin's vault in the same chapel. His works are chiefly at Cordova; in the cathedral is The Virgin and Infant, with St. Ama; also his admirable picture of The Last Supper. He died at Rome in 1608. He was a fine antiquarian, well acquainted with ancient and modern languages, and wrote several works on archaeological subjects. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biogr. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Cessation is an act of discipline in the Church of Rome, technically called cessatio a divinitis, by which, for any notorious injury or disobedience to the Church, a stop is put to all divine offices and the administration of the sacraments, and the dead are deprived of Christian burial. The only privilege allowed is to repeat every week a small mass in the parish churches, the doors being shut, taking care also not to ring the bell, or to admit more than two persons to the service; to administer baptism, confirmation, and penance to such persons as desire it, provided they are not under sentence of excommunication or an interdict; and to administer extreme unction, provided the prayers which are said before and after that sacrament are not repeated. Cessation may be incurred by a whole diocese, a city, a village, or one or more churches.

Cession is a term employed in the Church of England, when a benefice has become void in consequence of the incumbent being promoted to a bishopric.

Cesoles (Lat. De Cessolis, Cessaloi, or Cessales) Jacques de, a French theologian and moralist, who lived at Rheims in the 13th century, was, as is supposed, a native of the village of Cesoles in Picardy, whence his name. He took monastic orders, and about 1290 wrote a book in Latin on the Morality of Chess-games, which was long circulated in MS, and was first printed in Holland (about 1470), and afterwards in Italy and other countries (Italian, first about 1470; last at Florence, 1629; French, Paris, 1504; English, by Caxton, 1474, etc.). — Hoefer, Nouv. Cethchach, an Irish saint, bishop of Cill-garadach, is commemorated June 16. He is usually known as St. Patrick's bishop. His father belonged to Meath, and his mother was of the race of Oilius or Tirell. He was born at Downagh, near Duleek, and when St. Patrick was going westward through Roscommon, he gave the church of Cill-garadach to St. Cethchach, who was buried there at the end of the 5th century. He had many churches under his charge (Colgan, Tr. Thurn. p. 185, 136, 176, 267).

Cethubera, a virgin whom Joceline (Life of St. Patrick, c. 75) thus calls, and afterwards (c. 106), Ethubera; and whose name assumes a great multiplicity of forms, as Cestamaria, Cestumbリア, and perhaps Edithmore, etc. She is said to have been the first who received the veil in Ireland from St. Patrick, at her monastery of Drum Duchain, near Clongher, and is supposed by some to be the "una benedita Scotia" alluded to in St. Patrick's confession, and by others to be St. Cimna (Feb. 1).

Chabib, Levi ben-, a Jewish writer, son of Jacob, with whom he had to leave Spain in 1492, was rabbi at Jerusalem, where he died in the middle of the 16th century. He is the author of "Decisions" (Venice, 1550), and also wrote a commentary on Maimonides' treatise on the Jewish calendar, תקון הלוח, printed with Maimonides' Mekor Tora (Venice, 1574-76, s. o.). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud., i, 152; De Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 70. (B. P.)

Chabib, Moses, a native of Lisbon, in the 16th century. In the persecution against the Jews, he had to leave the country. He is the author of "The First Rudiments of Hebrew Grammar" (Venice, 1546): תקון הלוח on "New-Hebrew Metrics" (written at Bitonto della Puglia in 1486, and published together with the first work). Both were edited, with additions, by W. Heidenheim (Rodelheim, 1806). He also wrote a commentary on Fenini's Bechinath Olam (Ferrara, 1552), etc. See Fürst, Bibl. Chabry, Marc, a French painter and sculptor, was born at Lyons in 1660, and studied there under Puget. He executed in that city a large number of works in both departments of art, among which were the paintings and bas-reliefs that adorn the great altar of the Church of St. Antoine; also two statues of Hercules and The Virgin, for the king, who appointed him sculptor to the city of Lyons. He died there in 1727. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chacabut was a religious sect of the Japanese, so called after their founder Chace, who was a native of St. Antoine, and to whom there signifies what Buddha does in India. They revere him rather as a god than as a religious teacher.

Chacaras was the name of the sun-priests among the Peruvians.

Chace, George Shepherd, a Baptist minister, was born at Penn Yan, N. Y., March 9, 1826. He studied at Madison University, N. Y., from 1848 to 1850, and then at Asbury College, and from the Rochester Theological Seminary in 1854. His pastorates were in Warren, R. I., Pittsburgh, Pa., Columbus, O., Detroit, Mich., and New Bedford, Mass. He died June 27, 1871. See Gen. Cat. of Rochester Theol. Sem. p. 10. (J. C. S.)

Chace, Hannah, a minister of the Society of Friends, with Harvey Chace, a prominent member of Swanzey Monthly Meeting, died at Fall River, Mass., July 20, 1838, aged thirty-two years. See The Friends vi, 359.

Chachy, in the mythology of Kamchatka, was the wife of the god Kutku, the creator of the world. She was not beautiful, but very sensible. From her sprang the Kamchadalies, i.e. the aborigines of that peninsula.

Chacon (Lat. Caecum), Alfonso, a learned Spaniard, was born in 1540 at Baeza, in Andalusia. He entered the order of preaching friars, and went to Rome, where Gregory XIII appointed him apostolical penitentiary. He was well versed in ecclesiastical history and antiquities. He died in Rome in 1609. His principal works are: De Libertatione Tragicorum, Ponzii In- ferno (Rome, 1576) = Historia Utriusque Belli iucnri Trajano (ibid. ed.); De S. Hieronymi Cardinalitatis Dignitate (ibid. 1591) = Vita et vera Gestis Pontificum Romorum Cardinalium (ibid. 1601), etc. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jucher, Allgemeine Ge- lehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Chacon, Pedro, a learned Spaniard, was born at Toledo in 1555. He taught at Salamanca, was appointed canon of Seville by Gregory XIII, and was charged by the same pope with revising the Bible, the writings of the fathers, and the decreal of Gratian. Chacon commented upon a large number of sacred and profane writers, and was admired by many of his contemporaries for his learning. He died at Rome, Oct. 24, 1581. His works were not published until after his death. His principal writings are: Colendurri Veteris Explanatio (Antwerp, 1566) = Opuscula, containing archaeological treatises (Rome, 1566; also in Grécia Theissen) = De Tribuino Romano (ibid. 1598), See Hoefer, Nouv. Chadbourne, John, a Baptist minister, was born in Maine about 1770. He was ordained as an evangelist in Cornish, Me., in 1798, having previously been the deacon of the Church. In 1799 he began to preach in Lemington, Vt. A number of persons were converted and added to his number; but his labors in this county were decreasing, they formed a new Church, and invited him to become their pastor. He remained with them one year, and then resigned. For several years he was engaged in itinerant work in the newly settled part of the state, and in 1809 became pastor of the church in Dixmound, Me. Here he remained two years (1809-11). From 1816 to 1826 he acted as supply, and in 1827 again became regular pastor at Dixmound, which position he held until his death in 1831. See Millet, Hist. of the Baptists of Maine, p. 436. (J. C. S.)

Chadbourne, Paul A., D.D., LL.D., a Congregational minister and educator, was born at North Berwick, Me., Oct. 21, 1823. He worked hard, in his boyhood, on a farm and in a carpenter-shop; studied pharmacy and medicine; fitted for college at the Phillips Academy, Exeter; and was a graduate of Williams College, with the highest honors in his class, in 1848. After teaching school for a time at Freehold, N. J., he studied theology at East Windsor, Conn.; was tutor at Williams College, then principal of the Windsor Hill Academy, and then was appointed professor of chemistry and natural history at Williams College. While holding this position he also, for a part of the year, gave lectures on the same subjects at Bowdoin College (1859-65); and on the retirement of professor Uxham, of the same institution, he had charge of the department of moral philosophy and metaphysics (1871-72). For thirteen years he gave chemical lectures at Mt. Holyoke Seminary. He was professor in the Berkshire Medical College for three years, president of the Illinois Wesleyan University, 1867-70, in which was also included the Agricultural College of Wisconsin. From 1872 to 1881 he was president of Williams College, Mass.; and in January, 1882, became president of the Massachusetts Agricultural College at Amherst. He died in the city of New York, Feb. 22, 1883. Besides volumes in natural theology, etc., he was a frequent contributor to reviews and journals. See The Congregationalist, March 1, 1883. (J. C. S.) Chaddock, Calvin, a Congregational minister, was born at Oakham, Mass. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1791; was ordained pastor of the Third Church in Rochester, Mass., Oct. 10, 1793; resigned his charge in 1803, and died in 1822. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, 697.

Chaderton, William, an English prelate of the 16th century, was born probably in Cheshire. He became first a fellow, then master of Queen's College, Cambridge; was chosen Lady Margaret professor of divinity, then king's professor; was made bishop of Chester in 1576, of Lincoln in 1584, and died in April, 1608. See Fuller, Worthies of Eng. (ed. Nutt), 169, 171. Mention is also made of him in the Council of Châlus, in 644, where abbot Chagnold represented him. He died in 653, and is commemorated on Aug. 20, the day of his death.

Chaduc, Blaise, a French theologian, was born in 1608 at Riom, in Auvergne. He entered the Society of the Oratory, and was one of the most famous preachers of his time. He died and was admired by many of his contemporaries for his eloquence. His most famous work is: "Tractatus de Legibus Naturae" (Rome, 1607). Mention is also made of him in the Council of Châlus, in 644, where abbot Chagnold represented him. He died in 653, and is commemorated on Aug. 20, the day of his death.

Chadwell, William Stone, a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the diocese of Long Island, entered the ministry in 1854. In 1857 he officiated at East Hampton, Long Is., and in 1859 became rector of St. Luke's Church, Catekill, N. Y., and retained this pastorate until 1808, when he removed to Williamsburg, N.Y., as rector of Grace Church. He died at Welford, Me., July 28, 1877. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1878, p. 168.

Chadwick, James, D.D., a Roman Catholic prelate, was born at Drogheda, Ireland, April 24, 1813. He was educated at St. Peter's College, Dublin, and at other colleges in Ireland and England. He was then sent to France, where, at different times, he filled the chairs of humanities, mental philosophy, and pastoral theology; laboring, also, part of the time, as missionary priest in the diocese of Hexham and Newcaste, of which he was, in 1866, he was appointed bishop. He died May 14, 1882.

Chadwick, Job, a Baptist minister, was born in Maine about 1770. He was ordained an evangelist at Vassalboro, Me., in 1806; and in 1817 he was chosen pastor of the Second Baptist Church in China, Kennebec Co., where he remained eight years. He next removed to Gouldsborough, where he was pastor between 1816 and 1831. During the interval between these two pastorates, Mr. Chadwick was acting as a missionary, under the direction of the Massachusetts Home Mission Society, in the destitute regions of Maine and on Cape Cod, Mass. His final residence was at Windsor, Me., where he died, Dec. 25, 1831. See Millett, History of the Baptists of Maine, p. 439. (J. C. S.)

Chaeremon was the name of several early Christians:

1. An aged bishop of Nilus, who fled from the Decian persecution to the Arabian mountains with his wife and was never heard of more (Euseb. H. E. vi. 42).

2. A deacon of Alexandria, who accompanied Diosynius, when he came before Æmilian in the time of Valerian. He is commemorated along with him, on Oct. 4, in the Menologium of Basil, and is represented as surviving backwaters till the time of Decius, when he was beaten to death. The rest of the legend seems to belong rather to Eusebius (H. E. vii. 11).

3. Saint, a reclus, who probably lived in the 4th or 5th century, or in both; as he died at the age of one hundred years, the greater part of which he spent in seclusion in the wilderness of Mount Scete, in Libya. The memory of this saint is chiefly confined to the Greeks, who commend him as a pattern of patient labor. There is a short chapter on him in Palladius (His. Lausiac. xcii. 768; Patrok. Lat. 1xxiii. 386). The Bollandists call him Petrus de Natalibus (xli. 47), who calls the recluse Theremon, and says he was so bent with age and prayer that he crawled on the ground like an infant. He is commemorated on Aug. 16, in the Acta Sanctorum of the Bollandists.

Chafner, Thomas F., a Congregational minister, was born at Hull, England, Nov. 14, 1836. He came to America in 1838, and resided in Kentucky; graduated from Farmers' College in 1856 and from Auburn Theological Seminary in 1865. April 11, 1866, he was ordained at Rising Sun, Ind.; and from that time until 1870 was acting pastor at Downer's Grove, Ill. Subsequently he resided, without charge until 1872, in Kansas City, Mo.; then until 1877 he was acting pastor at Morgan, O.; in 1878 and 1879 served in the same relation at East Smithfield, Pa.; and from 1879 to Rock Creek, O., until his death, which occurred there, May 14, 1882. See Cong. Year-book, 1883, p. 20.

Chahfey, Abdallah-Mohammed ben-Edris, El., founder of one of the four orthodox Mussulman sects, was born at Gaza, in Palestine, in the year 1566 of the Hegira. The doctors of Islam to Cairo, and charged them to preach the orthodox doctrine. The sect of the Chafyeis received from him particular support and encouragement; and in the year 569 of the Hegira he built, near the tomb of imam Chafey, a magnificent college for theology and Mussulman jurisprudence, where other doctors was placed. Chafey died in Egypt in the year 204 of the Hegira (A.D. 821). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chaffault, Pierre du, a French canon, was elected March 10, 1477, to the bishopric of Nantes. He would not accept the bishropic, except on condition that the differences between the duke and the bishop concerning the oath of fidelity should be terminated, which took place in April. He was chosen by chance, by virtue of the collegiate administration of his diocese, reviving the ancient statutes. He also caused a breviary and a missal to be printed at Venice. Du Chaffault made a journey to Rome in 1485, and remained there nearly two years. Duke Francis II of Brittany suspected him of collusion with Charles VIII of France, and he was watched during the siege of Nantes by the retirements of French and Breton barons in 1487. He was imprisoned in his cathedral, which he continued to construct. He died Nov. 12, 1487, leaving a reputation for great holiness. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chaffee, Chester, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Grafton, Vt., in 1791. He united with the Church in 1812, began his ministry in 1830, and was ordained in 1832.

2. Having lived many years in Nebraska, C. T., N. Y., he removed to Arcade, Wyoming County, in 1850, where he thenceforth resided, adorning his profession as a Christian and his vocation as a minister. He died there, Sept. 5, 1876. See Morning Star, Nov. 8, 1876. (J. C. S.)

Chaffey, Thomas, an English Congregationalist, was born at Sherborne, Dorset, Dec. 26, 1768. He began to study medicine; but, being converted, was engaged in Sunday-school work, and afterwards in village preaching. He was recommended to the Academy at Axminster as a candidate for the ministry, and was ordained at Bulford, Wiltshire, Jan. 30, 1815, where he labored for seven years and then reigned. In 1825 he settled at Great Yarmouth, where he remained about four years. Ill-health caused him to relinquish pastoral labor, and for seventeen years he supplied various places in town and country as he was able; he was, however, chiefly occupied in assisting Rev. Dr. Fletcher of Finsbury Chapel. He died in the faith Aug. 5, 1854. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1855, p. 209.

Chaffey, W. W., an English Congregationalist, was born at Chard, Somersetshire, June 14, 1837. He became a Christian in youth; entered Cheshunt College in 1861 for a ministerial discipline; and in 1865 began his pastorate at Hillhouse, Huddersfield, where he preached but a few months, and then, from ill-health, was obliged to resign the ministry. He died Aug. 21, 1866. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1867, p. 277.

Chaffin, Aaron Whelkem, a Baptist minister, was born at Langrove, Vt., July 9, 1821, and graduated from Brown University in 1846. He studied theology at Newton for one year (1846-47), and was ordained in April, 1850. For twelve years (1850-62) he was pastor of the church in Danversport, Mass.; next in Manchester, N. H.; then in Amherst, N. H.; (1862-88); and at a church in Hamburg, N. Y. (1888-73). He died in 1874. See Creighton General Catalogue, p. 35. (J. C. S.)

Chajon, Nkhemia Chiza, a Jewish impostor, was born about 1560. He received his Talmudic education at Hebron, where the pseudo Messiah Sabbathai Zebi (q. v.) had his adherents. When eighteen years of age he became rabbi at Uskupia, not far from Saloniki, but, on account of his immoral life, he was compelled to leave the place. From this time his adventurous life commenced, which brought him in contact with a great many literary men, who either supported or opposed him. By the way of Egypt Chajon came to Leghorn, where he was opposed by Joseph Ergas (q. v.). At Prague he was supported by D. Oppenheimer (q. v.). In the house of the chief rabbi he had not only leisure to write some of his works, but also delivered sermons at sundry occasions, which, though replete with the greatest nonsense, were readily applauded. From Prague, Chajon went to Amsterdam, where he was opposed by Zebi Ashkenazi (q. v.) and Moses Chagis (q. v.), who, in connection with Ashkenazi, pronounced the ban against Chajon. The latter left Amsterdam, and went either and neither. Everywhere he was persecuted, and, finding himself destitute, he fled to the North of Africa, where he died after 1726. His writings are סדרות, Sermons and Comments on the Pentateuch, written in the house of Oppenheimer, and published with the approbation of this and other rabbis (Berlin, 1713): לוין, The Crown of the Highest, on the doctrine of the unity of God (Venice, 1711): לוחך חי, or a system of the Judeo-cabalistic religion, to which are appended two large cabalistic and theosophic commentaries, the הינר"ע and הינר"ע (Berlin, 1713): לוין, a treatise on the true conception of the Cabala (Amsterdam, 1714): לוין, The Secret of the Unity of God (Venice, 1711). Chakam (Heb. קמא, a wise man), the name given in some countries to the chief or presiding rabbi among the modern Jews, who holds a spiritual and, to some extent, civil authority over a country or large district. The term is usually applied to the chief rabbi among the Spanish or Portuguese Jews.

Chakara (or Chakura), in Hindu mythology, is the mighty weapon of Vishnu, endowed with reason, which by its brightness lights up the entire paradise of the god. It was a ring containing a beautiful gem, and can be seen on the pictures of the god. This ring was made of rays cut from the sun.

Chakia-Muini was a name adopted by Buddha, according to the legendary accounts given by the Mongol books, which are only translations from the Tibetan or Sanskrit, and laid down certain principles of morality as the foundation of his religious system. These he reduced to four: 1. The power of pity resting upon immovable bases. 2. The avoidance of all cruelty. 3. An unlimited compassion towards all creatures. 4. An inflexible conscience. Then follows the deacologue, or ten special precepts and prohibitions: 1, not to

Chalcedon, COUNCILS of (Concilium Chalcedonense). Of these there were two:

I. Held A.D. 403, better known as "the Synod of the Oak"—a name given to a suburb there—at which Chrysostom was deposed. He had been appointed to the See of Constantinople by Pope Damasus, and was consecrated by the five pontiffs, the Emperor Honorius, and Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, and had been summoned thither by the emperor Arcadius to ordain him. Theophilus had a presbyter of his own whom he would have preferred, named Isidore, so that in one sense he consecrated Chrysostom under constraint. It was agreed that the Constantinopolitan Council would be wise for him to have consecrated at all out of his own diocese; but in another sense he was probably not loath to make Chrysostom beholden to him, and be possessed of a pretext for interfering in a see threatening to eclipse his own, where he could do so with effect. Hence the part played by him at the Synod of the Oak, where he presided, and in which no less than twelve sessions were occupied on charges brought against Chrysostom, and a thirteenth on charges brought against Heraclides, bishop of Ephesus, who had been ordained by him. The number of charges alleged against Chrysostom was twenty-nine at one time, and eighteen at another. When cited to appear and reply to them, his answer was: "Remove my avowed enemies from your list of judges, and I am ready to appear and make my defense, should any person bring suit against me; otherwise you may send as often as you will for me, but you will get no further."

II. Held in 451, and so important that we give additional particulars:

The heresy of Eutyches consisted in his acknowledging only one nature in Christ; his father was a priest, and abbot of a monastery near Constantinople; and Eusebius, bishop of Dorylaem, having cimted him to give an account of his faith before a council consisting of thirty-three bishops and twenty-three abbots, Eutyches there refused to retract, and was condemned and separated from the communion of the faithful. He then took upon him to write to Leo, the pope, imporing his protection, and sent to him a preface and a confession of his faith. Leo, deceived by these pretences, wrote to flavius of Constantinople, expressing his surprise at the suddenness of his apostasy upon Eutyches, who had been his own abbot. flavius wrote back to him a true account of the matter, declaring that Eutyches maintained that both natures, human and divine, were of the same substance, and had not but one; and he further entreated the pope to add his own condemnation to the condemnation of Eutyches. By these statements Leo was convinced of the justice of the sentence, and, moreover, perceived the bad results which must follow from the patronage which the emperor Theodosius extended to Eutyches, especially in convoking a council at Ephesus to recon-

This pseudo-council assembled at Ephesus in 449, consisting of thirty-three bishops and thirty abbots, including florians, who had been deposed by the emperor, who was deposed. This pseudo-council, from the extreme irregularity and violence which accompanied all its acts, has been censured, said by the same authority as the "con- clivum." Leo, distressed at these proceedings, wrote to the emperor a letter worthy of a Christian bishop, set- ting himself up as the apostle of Eutyches, and claiming to be appointed to conduct the affairs of the Church. Leo, on the contrary, was the name of all. The emperor Cæsarius, having been sent to the West to convocate an ecumenical council in Italy. At the same time he sent to Florians to excuse his refusal, and to influence him to hinder this attack upon the Catholic faith from having more fatal results. He, lastly, addressed the clergy and people of Constantinople, and exhorted them to persevere in the true faith.

Dioecesans, irritated by the opposition which his designs made by that of Lycaes, who discourse of himself in the pseudo-council from his communion, and by threats or otherwise induced ten other bishops to concurn in this schismatical act. The bishop of Naples retracted, availing himself of the opportunity of a voyage which the emperor, Valentinian III., made to Rome at the time, the force of which examples, and the danger with which the true faith was threatened, and conjured him to induce Theodosius to repair by his authority the evil that had been committed, and hence, on the 9th of June, and to annul all acts of the council, both by the creed there in an ecumenical assembly. But although Valentinian wrote upon the subject to Theodosius, he re- fused to accede to the wishes of the bishops, and it was agreed by the emperor to annul all acts of the council.

However, Theodosius dying that year in consequence of injuries received by a fall from his horse, Marcellus, bishop of Zeugitana, and Dardena, on his bid, and others to the holding of the council were removed. His chief desire was to see all his subjects united in one faith; hence he empowered Marcellus to make him a prisoner of the emperor, and to see that peace restored to the Church, and to banish all error and heresy, and for that end to cause the Council of Laodicea to be assembled.

Among the large number of bishops, three distinguished ones were present, viz.: Maximus of Antioch, Eusebius of Dorylaem, and Theodoret, whom the emperor had recalled from exile. The emperor sent as his representatives the chief officers of the empire: Anatolius, a nobleman; Justinian, prefect of the city, and Flavius in the East; the prefect of Constantinople, Vincenzianus; Stositius, companion of the imperial guard; various other persons of great dignity were also present. Marcellus, from the high idea which he had formed of Leo, wished to make Leo the chief authority, and for that purpose he made Leo, in his letter, begged to consider his legates as his representatives, and especially designated Pas- chasius of Carthage as his messenger, which was considered in his absence, rightly judging that there was need at the head of the council a man of firm mind, and one incapable of being imposed upon from any motive. It was arranged that the officers of the emperor should propose the questions for discussion, draw up the various motions, and pronounce the decision, after the bishops had given their votes.

In the first session, at the request of Eusebius of Dory- laem, the petition which he had presented to the emperor against Dioecesans was read. In this petition Eusebius demanded justice for the evils which concurred against the council of Constantinople, and which the Emperor was induced to order, by his officers, that he should enter, and take his place in the synod, but the Emperor to his great lottom, refused to allow this, saying that he must remain in the sole character of an accuser. Many of the other bishops also interposed with explanations of the violence which they had suffered from Dioecesans, and when the latter was silenced, they exclaimed against the emperor, which was with the consent of those present, the bishops ex- claimed with vehemence against his assertion, declaring that the Emperor had never been so clear of his crimes as had been condemned with blamish; that soldiers had expelled them when they desired to depart, and that they had, in fact, been compelled to the council against their will.

After this, the acts of the Council of Constantinople were read, which were inserted in those of the pseudo-council of Ephesus. Among others they read the second letter of Cyril to Nestorius, and that which he had written to the Eastern Church; these being ended, the bishops of Alexandria, of Constantinople, of Antioch, and of Thessalonica, explained their own belief and their own doctrine, and as Flavianus had approved these two letters in the Council of Constantinople, they renewed them in the present. The chief of all these was Bishop of Berytus, declared that in their opinion the faith of Flavianus was strictly in accordance with the true faith, and therefore, the bishops, always with one voice, agreed that Flavianus had truly asserted the Catholic faith, and at the same time the bishops of Persia, the Persian, the right hand of the imperial officer, to testify that they abandon not the Catholic faith, and that they are ready with all the forces of Flavianus was established, and, at the same time, necessarily, the pseudo-council of Ephesus condemned, none of the bishops of Persia, that for his part he belonged to no party, and professed no faith but the Catholic and apostolic faith; neither did he rend men, but God alone.

After this, the opinion which Eustachius of Berytus had delivered at the Council of Ephesus came under con-ideration, maintaining that it is an error to believe in two natures in our Lord Jesus Christ, and that the right faith is, that there is in him but one nature incarnate. This opinion was unanimously condemned. In the third place the confession of Eutyches, which had been appproved by the pseudo-Council of Constantinople, was read, and in it he declared his belief that in our Lord were two natures before his incarnation, and but one afterwards. This definition was at once anathematized by the fathers in council.

On this day the acts of the first session only of the pseudo-council were read. In the second session Dioscorus, Juvalen, Thalassaeus, Eusebius, and Basil were absent. The bishops were now summoned upon the part of the emperors to decide matters relating to the faith, in order to settle the minds of those who had been led astray. They replied that a new exposition of the faith was not needed, for that the fathers had left a sufficient exposition of the true faith, which they had given their bishops, and of which the bishops, which were all the bishops in the council had already subscribed, was a sufficient antidote to the heresy of Eutyches.

The decision of the council was given to the emperor, to be pronounced. He consequently desired that pardon should be granted to the chiefs of the pseudo-council at Ephesus, specially naming Dioscoros. The emperor had heard the last notice of the others, insisted upon the anathematization of Dioscorus.

The third session was held on the 13th of October, at which the officers of the emperor were not present; probably, as Tillemont says, in order that it might not be so much a place of deliberation as a place of a judgment upon Dioscorus.

The petition of Eusebius was read. In which he demanded that Dioscorus having been convicted of many crimes, the council should anathematize his implacable conduct, and in the person of Dioscorus a kind of judgment in his own deserts; that it should confirm the true faith, and annul all that had been done in the false Council of Ephesus. The answer of the council was short, but decisive, before the council to answer him, and this was accordingly done; but Dioscorus, upon various pretexts, refused to appear. The chief of the clergy of Alexandria and against Dioscorus were then read, in which they accused him of grievous crimes, stating that he had been guilty of homicide, had burned and pulled down houses, had lived an infamous life, had bought up corn in order to enhance the price, and had contrived at the residence of women of influence, to have illegitimate children, and had even kept them in his own house. After this, Dioscorus was cited a second time, with a letter from the emperor, demanding as before; and the deputies having made their report to the council, the legate, in a few words, enumerated the crimes of Dioscorus, and declared to him that he was to be deprived of himself, acting for the pope, and by the council of his episcopal office, and of all his ecclesiastical dignities. After this, they requested the council to make a decree conformable to the canons of the Church, and accordingly each of the bishops present consisting of bishops and priests of the emperors. By an act to signify to Dioscorus the judgment passed against him, and a letter to the emperor, informing him of the sentence pronounced, all the bishops, under the signatures of the bishops, among whom several were bishops of.

At the fourth session, Oct. 17, the emperor's officers were again present, and perceiving that the bishops were assembled, stigmatized the new definition of the faith, they contended themselves with demanding whether they accepted the letter of Leo as agreeing with the creed of Constantinople, and insisted that Dioscorus declared it to be the faith of the council, and that they held to the definition of Nicaea, and that of Constantioleus, under Theodotus, as also to the exposition of Cyril, and to the writings of Leo against the heresies of Nestorius and Eutyches.

After this, the bishops Junvalen, Thalassaeus, Eusebius, of Persia, and Basil, and the bishops of the Persian right hand of the imperial officer, to testify that they abandon not the Catholic faith, and that they are ready with all the forces of Flavianus was established, and, at the same time, necessarily, the pseudo-council of Ephesus condemned, none of the bishops of Persia, that for his part he belonged to no party, and professed no faith but the Catholic and apostolic faith; neither did he rend men, but God alone.

Justel, and containing one hundred and seventy canons, taken from the councils of Nicea, Ancyra, Neo-Caesarea, Gangra, Antioch, Lodovice, and Constantinople.

1. The bishop shall have a certain amount of money, etc., in consideration of conferring orders, both he and the person so ordained shall be deposed; and that any person who shall take any way of money as the legal property on the occasion shall, if a clerk, be deposed; if a monk or a layman, be anathematized.

2. Forbids any ecclesiastic or monk to undertake the management or stewardship of the property of others, or intrude himself into worldly ministrations. Among a bishop and clergy, however, it is permitted to them to undertake the care of the property of orphans and widows, and other afflicted persons, with the bishop's consent.

3. Forbids the erection of any monastery or oratory within the confines of the bishop's dioecesis. Or- derers all monks to submit to the bishop of the dioecesis, and not to meddle in any ecclesiastical or civil matters, unless it shall be committed to them to do so for some necessary purpose by their bishop. Lastly, orders all bishops to keep watch over the conduct of the monks within their dioecises; offenders to be excommunicated.

4. Renews the prohibition made in a former council, forbidding the bishop or clergy of one church to quit their own church in order to go and serve in another.

5. Forbids a bishop to ordain a cleric unless he is, bade. Intended to serve in some particular church of the bishop, and to attend the functions of the church, and not make in accordance with this law to be null and void.

6. Forbids any priest or deacon who has been ordained, or who have entered a state of monkhood, to quit their state.

7. Forbids any bishop or clergyman attached to all monasteries, chapels of martyrs, hospitals, etc., to submit to their bishops; offenders to be excommunicated.

8. Forbids any bishop or clergyman to settle before his bishop, and in no secular court, except by his permission. That if a dispute arise between a bishop and one of his clergy, it shall be judged in the provincial council. That all disputes between a bishop or clergyman and his metropolitan shall be brought before the archbishop of the dioecesis [if the patriarch] or the bishop of Constantinople.

9. Absolutely forbids a clergyman to be on the list of the clergy of two cities at the same time, and orders that such as act thus shall be restored to the church in which they were first ordained.

10. Orders that letters of peace (or of communion) be given to poor persons going abroad, after examination; and that no letters commendatory be given to those persons only who are liable to suspicion.

11. Forbids any bishop, under pain of deposition, to divide the province, by giving letters-patent from the emperor, erecting his bishopric into a metropolitan see.

12. Forbids that a foreign or unknown ecclesiastical be permitted to exercise any function in the church, except he bring letters commendatory from his bishop.

13. Forbids the lower orders of ecclesiastics (readers, choristers, etc.) to be permitted to marry, to marry Jewsesses, or pagen, or heretical women, except they promise to become Christians.

14. An ordination of a deaconess under forty years of age; if after ordination she shall marry, she shall be treated no better than a profane woman. If she marry, she shall immediately lose her office.

15. Orders that virginity marrying after having consecrated themselves to God be separated from communion for the space of seven years as bishop should be a greater.

16. Makes over to the bishop forever parishes in the country over which he has exercised jurisdiction for thirty years.

17. Deposes those of the clergy or monks who form cabals against their bishop or any of their fellow-clergy.

18. Renews the decree of the Council of Nicea, which directs that provincial councils be held twice in every year; and enjoins that bishops who wilfully neglect to attend shall be reproved.

19. Directs that if any bishop shall receive a clergyman belonging to another bishop, neither bishop nor clergyman shall be separated from communion until the said clergyman shall return to his own bishop.

20. Directs that the receiving of an ecclesiastic against a clergyman from any person without first inquiring into his character.

21. Forbids the clergy to take possession of the property of their bishop after his decease, under pain of losing their rank.

22. Directs that the defender of the Church of Constantinople shall drive out of the city all strange clergy or monks, coming there without letters from their bishop, and that their letters be consigned, shall ever after be devoted to the same purpose.

23. Directs that the metropolitan shall consecrate to a vacant bishopric within three months after the death of the bishop.

24. Directs that in every diocese there shall be a steward (ecclesiastics) chosen from among the clergy, who shall manage the property of the Church according to the bishop's directions.

25. Anathematizes those who have been guilty of rape or abortion of the clergy, or any other sin committed and abjured in these crimes, or who have consigned to them; if any one of the clergy be among the guilty, he shall be deposed.

26. "We, following in all things the decisions of the holy fathers, and acknowledging the canon of the one hundred and fifty most religious bishops, which has just been read, do also determine and decree the same things respecting the privileges of the most holy city of Constanti nople, the new Rome. For the fathers properly gave the primacy to the throne of the elder Rome, because that was the imperial city. And the one hundred and fifty most religious bishops, being of the same opinion, gave equal privileges to the most holy throne of new Rome; judging, with reason, that the city which was honored with the dignity and name of the sees which enjoyed equal privileges with the elder royal Rome, should also be magnified, like her, in ecclesiastical matters, and be conferred on her. And (we decree) that the metropolitans only of the Pontic, Asian, and Thraco-ian dioceses, and, moreover, the bishops of the aforesaid dioceses who are among the barbarians, shall be ordained by the above-mentioned throne of the most holy Church of Constantinople; each metropolitan of the aforesaid dioceses ordaining the bishops of the dioceses, which has been declared by the divine canons; but the metropolitans themselves of the said dioceses shall, as has been said, be ordained by the bishop of Constantinople, the proper elections being made according to custom, and the other bishops being ordained according to the canons of the council of Nicea, which, as they asserted, had been done by those who said 'the Roman see hath always had the primacy; this, however, was shown to be only an interpolation, and after it had been proved that all things had been done rightly and canonically, the imperial judges delivered their opinion, which was to the effect, the Roman see should have the primacy; according to the canons, the primacy and prerogative of honor, the bishop of Constantinople ought never to be enjoyed by the same ecclesiastical privileges of honor, and that he should have the right of consecrating metropolitans in the dioceses of Asia, Pontus, and Thrace." See Labbe, Concil. iv., 1-1003.

Chalcedonius was abbot (probably the first) of Viers, one of the two twin monasteries established by Cassio- de, A.D. 660-670.

Chalchihuitlicue, in Mexican mythology, was the goddess of water. As water appears in various forms, this goddess also had different names, which designated the attributes in each case. In honor of the goddesses of the water and of the mountains there were five festivals, at which numerous human sacrifices were always offered, especially prisoners of war.

Chalcolithia was a Christian lady, residing probably at Antioch, and the byzantine emperors were wont to invite during his exile, expressing the most affectionate solicitude for her health, which was very feeble, and for the troubles brought upon her by her fidelity to his cause. These letters are sometimes addressed to Chalcolithia separately, sometimes conjointly with her friend Asyndrites.

Chalcidice, in Greek religion, was a festival among the Spartans in honor of Minerva. It was celebrated in a brazen temple, where her image of bronz stood. Armed youths brought her sacrifices.

Chalemot, a French theologian, lived in the latter part of the 17th century. He belonged to the Cistercian order, and wrote, "Series Sanctorum et Beatorum ac Illustrium Virorum Ordinis Cistercensis" (Paris, 1670, 4to).—Hoefner, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chalgrin, Jean François Thérèse, an eminent French architect, was born at Paris in 1729, and studied under Moreau and Boullée. Having gained the grand prize of the academy, he went to Italy, but soon returned to Paris. Among his principal works is the Church of St. Philippe du Roule, and the Triomphal Arc de l'Tôle. He died Jan. 20, 1811. See Hoefner, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spouzer, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Chalice. Of this important ecclesiastical vessel we give the following additional particulars, which serve to illustrate their various forms and applications:

1. Kind.—There were four principal sorts of chalices: (1) communicat, that used by the celebrant; (2) ministerial, large and small, for communicating the faithful; (3) offertory, in which the deacons received the wine offered by communicants; possibly the chalices found in tombs of the catacombs were those into which the deacon poured the wine, and were religiously preserved for burial with their late owners; (4) baptismal, used for communion in the case of the newly baptized, and for administering to them milk and honey.

At that early period, when the administration of the Eucharist was connected, both as regards time and locality, with the feasts of charity (agapæ), the distinction between the vessels used for each purpose was less strongly drawn than afterwards came to be the case, and in the earliest centuries there was little or no distinction of either form or decoration between the Eucharistic cup and that of the domestic table.

Besides the chalices actually used in the rites of the church, vessels called "calices" were suspended from the arches of the ciborium and even from the inter-columniations of the nave and other parts of the church as ornaments. Many of these were, however, most probably cups or vases, not such as would have been used for the administration or consecration of the Eucharist. The ansate in the 6th century, being of great weight, were often suspended by chains above the altar.

II. Form and Position.—In a chalice there are four parts—the foot, the stem, the knob, and the bowl. The foot should extend considerably beyond the bowl, to prevent the possibility of its being upset. On one division of the foot it is usual to engrave a representation of our Lord's Passion, which should always be turned towards the celebrant. The stem unites the foot to the bowl, and on it is fixed the knob for the convenience of holding the chalice. The knob is often enriched with enamel, jewels, tracery, and tabernacle-work, while the stem is frequently engraved or enamelled. The height of the stem is generally about four inches, and seldom exceeds six. The bowl should vary from three to six inches in dimension, and be of a proportionate depth; it should have a plain rim of about an inch, below which it may be enriched with engravings, inscriptions, and chasings. The chalice should never have turned-over lips, which are extremely liable to cause accident in communicating.

In medieval chalices the pommel, or knob, and foot were usually covered with niello-work, gems, and elaborate chasings. The foot was indented in order to keep it steady when laid down to drain upon the paten, according to ancient usage, before the affusions were drunk by the priest, or at the commencement of mass. At York the curves are wanting, but in one case the foot has a crucifix. Until the 15th century the communion was given in both kinds, and subsequent to that date the chalice was administered only to the celebrant and his acolytes; the vessel, therefore, which had previously been of large dimensions, for the use of all the faithful, and was provided with two handles, shrank into a cup-like form about that period in the Western Church. The Greeks retain communion in both kinds, and consequently the two-handled chalice. Several of this shape are still preserved in the treasury of St. Mark's, Venice. In the 11th and 12th centuries the stalk was short, the foot large, the knob in the centre thick, the bowl wide; after that the cup became small, the stalk long, and the knob flat and flat, and in some cases enriched with tabernacled figures of saints. In the 15th century it underwent a further modification, the knob became diamond-shaped in profile, the cup more long and shallow, and the foot indented, like the petals of a flower.

According to Alexander of Hales and Leo of Chartres, the chalice should stand on the right side of the paten, but by the Salisbury use it is placed behind it.

III. Use.—In 418 pope Zozimus restrained the use of the chalice to the cells of the faithful and of clerks. Pope Martin V gave it to the Roman people, and the Council of Basle permitted it to the Bohemians. The emperor of Constantinople, at his coronation, parrot of the chalice; and Clement VI allowed the king of Gaul to partake at pleasure, although other princes were permitted the privilege only at their coronation and at the hour of death. The pope, at solemn celebration, communicates the cardinal deacon with the chalice. The monks of St. Bernard dipped the bread in the wine. Pope Victor III and the emperor Henry of Luxembourg are said to have been poisoned by the chalice.

The denial of the cup to the laity by the Roman Church was introduced at the close of the 12th century, and confirmed in 1414 by the Council of Constance.

IV. Materials and Specimens.—It has been asserted that in the apostolic age chalices of wood were in use; but for this assertion there is no early authority. Glass was no doubt in use from a very early date. Pope Zeno, in the 4th century, ordered the material to be glass; and St. Jerome speaks of a bishop of Toulouse who bore the Lord's body in a wicker casket and his blood in glass. Tertullian also alludes to the latter material. Wooden chalices were in use until the 9th century. St. Boniface said, when permitting their use: "Once good orientes used wooden chalices; now, on the contrary, wooden priests use golden chalices." The Council of Rheims, in 226, forbade glass, and in 883 the use of wood, tin, glass, and copper. Pope Leo IV, in 847, prohibited wood or glass; the Council of Tribur, in 897, prescribed wood; the Council of Caerlaethite, in 785, forbade wood; but Ælfwine's canons, in 957, allowed wood, probably owing to the devastations of the Danes; yet, three years later, King Edgar's canons allowed only molten metal. Honorius, Cæsarius of Arles, and St. Benedict used, or at least mentioned, chalices, which certainly were not disused in the 8th century. Glass was considered improper, owing to its fragility; horn, from blood entering into its composition, by the Council of Caerlaethite; wood, from its porousness and absorbent nature; and brass and bronze, because liable to rust. In 1222 the Archbishop of Canterbury forbade the use of pewter; but this was rescinded in France so lately as 1709, and by the canons of 1604 the wine was to be brought in "a clean and sweet standing pot or stoup of pewter, if not of purer metal." The most precious metals and materials were, however, at an early date used. Onyx, ivory, sardonyx, and agate are mentioned by early French writers; marble is spoken of by Gregory of Tours; gold and silver are mentioned by St. Augustine; in 227 pope Urban I ordered the latter; in the time of pope Gregory II chalices were jewelled, and Tertullian mentions that they had carvings of the Good Shepherd; from the 6th to the 15th century their bases were sculptured with animals or foliage, and blue, red, and green enamel was used in their ornamentation. At Clairvaux, St. Malachy's chalice was surrounded with little bells; one at Rheims, of gold, was inscribed with an anathema, impressed upon any person who should steal it. Sometimes the maker's name was engraved upon it; one, formerly belonging to St. Alban's Abbey, is now at Trinity College, Oxford, and another ancient specimen, of the 12th century, at Chichester; three of early date are at York. Chalices of earthenware or pewter were buried in the grave with priests. There is a chalice of St. Remigius, of the 12th century, at Paris; St. Wolfgang's cup, c. 994, and the chalice of Weingarten are preserved at Ratisbon; another is at Mayence. There is a Jacobean chalice of wood at Goodrich Court, and a German chalice, of the 15th century, is in the case at the British Museum. There are several chalices still preserved, one of ivory and silver, of the 14th century; at Milz; that of Rheims, of gold, with enamel and gems, of the 12th century, now in the Imperial Library at Rome; that of Troyes, c. 1220; and one of Cologne, of the 13th century, with the apostles under niches below the rim—sometimes sacred subjects from the life of our Lord adored at the foot of the cross. Most of the 15th century, has only an arabesque pattern; but a beautiful specimen at Hildesheim, of the 18th century, represents, in compartments, the offering of a lamb by Abel, Melchisedek's oblation of wine, the brazen serpent, and the bunch of grapes from Eschol. The use of bronze is exceptional, and perhaps peculiar to the Irish monks, probably because of the tradition that our Saviour was affixed to the cross by nails of this metal. This traditional use of bronze was no doubt continued by the successors of the Irish missionaries in the south of Germany, and explains why the Kremsmunster chalice is of that material. The precious metals were, however, from a very early, perhaps the earliest, period most probably the usual material of the chalice. We have at least proof of the use of both gold and silver in the sacred vessels in the beginning of the 4th century, for we are told by Optatus of Milevi that in the Dio- cletian persecution the Church of Carthage possessed many "ornaments" of gold and silver (Opt. Mil. De Schism. Donat. i, 17). The Church of Civita in Numidia at the same time possessed two golden and six silver chalices (Gesta. Purgat. Caeciliani, in the Works of Op- tatus). Many instances of gifts of chalices to the churches of Rome by successive popes are to be found in the Lib. Pont. Of these the following may deserve special mention; a great chalice (calix major) with handles and adorned with gems, weighing fifty-eight pounds; a great chalice with a syphon (cum sy- phon) or tube, weighing thirty-six pounds; a covered (spanoclystus, i.e. iatroxyn- narq) chalice of gold, weighing thirty-two pounds; all three given by pope Leo III (795).

The earliest chalice still existing is probably that found, with a paten, at Gourdon, in France. This is of gold ornamented with thin slices of garnets. With it were found one hundred and four gold rings of emperors of the East; twenty-five of Justin I (518-527), in a fresh condition and unworked, were the latest in date. The deposit was, therefore, probably made in the early part of the 6th century. Of not much later date were the splendid chalices belonging to the basilicas of Monza, no longer in existence, but of which representations, evidently tolerably accurate, have been preserved in a large painting probably executed in the latter half of the 15th century, and now in the library of that church. These chalices were both of gold, set with jewels, and their weight is variously stated at from one hundred and five to one hundred and seventy ounces. There is ground for believing that these chalices were in possession of the Church of Monza before A.D. 600. In the sacristy of the Church of Santa Anastasia in Rome a chalice is preserved as a relic, as it is said to have been used by St. John; the bowl is of white opaque glass with some ornament in relief, the foot is of metal. A chalice is preserved (? at Maastricht), which is believed to have belonged to St. Lambert, bishop of that city (ob. 708); it is of metal (? silver) girt, the bowl hemispherical, the foot a frustum of a cone, the bowl without ornament. A chalice of exactly the same form is to be seen in an illumination in the very ancient Gospels preserved in the library of Corpus Christi College at Cambridge, and known as St. Augustine's. Until the year 1799 the Ab- bey of Chelles, in the diocese of Paris, possessed a most splendid example of a golden chalice, which ancient inven- tories asserted to have been the work of St. Eligius, and therefore to date from the first half of the 7th century. An engraving of it has been preserved, and the character of the work corresponds with the Chalice, ABLUTION OF. See PURIFICATION.

Chalice-cover is a lid or covering for a chalice. Anciently, chalices were without covers, the paten being slightly indented, so as to form a cover. At the period of the Reformation covered chalices came into use, and so continued for a considerable period.

Chalice-pall is a covering for a chalice when in use. This is commonly made of a piece of stiff cardboard, covered with silk on the top, and with lawn underneath, and is placed on the chalice after the consecration.

Chalice-veil is a lawn or linen cover for the chalice, used after the communion, about twelve inches square, mentioned in the English Prayer-Book as a "fair white linen cloth."

Challope, Louis François CANDIDE, a French theologian, of the order of the Récollets, was born at Paris in 1694, and died there in 1757. There remain of his writings, Oration Funèbre du Cardinale de Maillochon (Paris, 1722, 4to).—Vie de Saint François d’Assise (ibid. 1727, 4to). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chalitsäh (Heb. קָנֹדֶה, a matching) is the ceremony among the Jews called "the loosening of the shoe," which is performed when a man refuses to marry his brother's widow, and to raise up seed to his brother. It is done in pursuance of the ordinance in Deut. xxv, 9, 10, and is performed in the following manner: Three rabbis go out on the preceding evening, and agree upon a proper spot where the transaction is to take place. Next day, at the close of the morning service, the congregation repair to the place agreed upon, and the widow and brother-in-law present themselves before the assembly and make a public declaration that the object of their appearance is to procure their freedom and discharge. The principal rabbi examines the man, argues with him, and endeavors to prevail upon him to marry his brother's widow. After a second examination, if he still refuse, he puts on a shoe which is too large for him, and the woman, attended by one of the rabbis, repeats Deut. xxv, 7, "And if the man like not to take his brother's wife, then let his brother's wife go up to the gate unto the elders, and say, My husband's brother refuseeth to raise up unto his brother a name in Israel, he will not perform the duty of my husband's brother." Whereupon the brother-in-law replies, "I like not to take her;" then the woman loosen the shoe and takes it off, throwing it upon the ground with the utmost anger and disdain, repeating, with the assistance of the rabbi, "So shall it be done unto the man that will not build up his brother's house. And his name shall be called in Israel, The house of him that hath his shoe loosed." She repeats this form of words three times, and each time the witnesses reply, "His shoe is loosed." The rabbi now informs the widow that she is at liberty to marry whom she pleases, and a certificate of the fact is given her if she desires it. The permission to marry is called by the Jews cha-litsäh or calmâ. The custom here described is seldom followed by modern Jews; but when they marry a daughter to one of several brothers, they are in the habit of requiring a contract that, in case of her husband's decease, the widow shall be set at liberty without any ceremony. Some will even oblige the husband, if he happen to become dangerously ill, to grant his wife a divorce, that her brother-in-law, after her husband's decease, may have no claims on her. See Levirate.

Chalker, ISAAC, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Connecticut. He graduated from Yale College in 1728, and was ordained in 1734 by the East Jersey Presbytery pastor of Bethlehem and Walkill, in the Highlands of New York. In 1743 he left the bounds of the synod, and in 1744 settled at Eastbury, Conn., where he remained till 1760. He died May 28, 1765. See Webster, Hist. of the Presb. Church in America, 1857. (J. C. S.)

Chalkley, Thomas, a minister in the Society of Friends, was born in Southwark, London, March 8, 1685. He came to Pennsylvania about 1701. A part of his time was devoted to trade, but whatever he felt was what he believed to be the movings of the Spirit, he went where Providence seemed to direct him to preach the Gospel. He made a trip through Great Britain, Holland, and Germany, returning to America in 1710. In 1716 he visited the British Isles, the Barbadoes and Great Britain again in 1718. He died on board of Tortola, Sept. 4, 1740, while on one of his evangelical errands. He is said to have been a man of many virtues, and was endowed to his acquaintances by the gentleness of his manners. He laid the foundation for the valuable library of the Friends in Philadelphia. A collection of his writings and his Journal were published in Philadelphia in 1749, and in New York in 1808. (J. C. S.)

Challe, Charles Michel Ange, a French artist, was born at Paris, March 18, 1718. He gained no great reputation as a painter, but attained sufficient distinction as an architect and mathematician to be chosen an academician in 1758, and professor the same year. He wrote a number of essays, among which was a picture in the Church of St. Ildefonso, representing the priests congratulating that saint on his conversion. He died at Paris, Jan. 8, 1778. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Challis, James, an English divine and scholar, was born in 1683, and was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1705 as senior wrangler. He was ordained in 1709, and in 1736 was appointed professor of astronomy and experimental philosophy in Cambridge University, and director; positions which he held until his death, Dec. 4, 1882. In 1861 he published Creation in Plan and Progress, a reply to Charles Wycliffe Goodwin’s treatise on the Mosaic cosmography in the celebrated Exodus Visions. He was also the author of twelve volumes of astronomical observations and of many scientific papers.

Challis, James M., a Baptist minister, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., Jan. 4, 1779. He united with the Church in Salem, N. J., which gave him a license to preach. After studying for a short time with Rev. Dr. Holcombe of Philadelphia, he was ordained in 1822 pastor of the Church at Upper Freehold, N. J., and remained there till 1830, when he went to Lower Dublin, Pa. Of this Church he was pastor till 1840, and then he returned to New Jersey. He was pastor of the Church in Cohansy till 1850, when he resigned and removed to Bridgeton. He died there in April, 1868. See Cathcart, Bapt. Encyclopedia, p. 198. (J. C. S.)

Chaloner is the early form of the frequent Scotch name Chalmers, and hence both appear in the same family below.

Chaloner, Alexander, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1699; called to the living at Forteviot in 1696, and ordained and died before Feb. 17, 1697. See Fusi Eccles. Scoticae, ii, 641.

Chaloner, George (1), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, originally of Barra as first Protestant minister, was transferred to Crimond before 1596, and to Botarie before 1599, having Gartly in his charge before 1608. He was named as constant moderator by the General Assembly of 1606, and transferred to Kinloch and Dumbeaman before 1614. He adhered to the protestation for the Liberties of the Kirk in 1617, with fifty-four other ministers, and died before Oct. 24, 1626, aged about fifty-four years. See Fusi Eccles. Scoticae, iii, 189, 624.

Chaloner, George (2), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1592; was appointed to the living at Barra, but the parishioners would not receive him; nevertheless he continued there in August, 1594. He was pursued by Will Hay, a rebel, who would have slain him with a pistol, but by his rapid flight he secured safety within the gates of Haddo. There is no further record of him. See Fusi Eccles. Scoticae, i, 332.

Chaloner, George (3), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1629; became schoolmaster at Inverurch, having no salary; was licensed to preach in 1642, and ordained minister at Rhyne the same year. He died after April 3, 1660, having two sons, George and Hugh, in the ministry. See Fusi Eccles. Scoticae, iii, 212.

Chaloner, William (1), a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1634; was appointed to the living at Knockando in 1641. The inhabitants of Botriphnie petitioned him to become their pastor in May, 1652. He died April 7, 1668, aged about fifty-four years. See Fusi Eccles. Scoticae, iii, 228.

Chaloner, William (2), a Scotch clergyman, son of the above, was ordained at the College of St. Mary’s in 1648; was transferred to Fettercairn in 1666, and went to London, where he died in 1669, aged about forty-nine years. See Fusi Eccles. Scoticae, iii, 866, 880.

Chaloner, William (3), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, son of the minister at Fettercairn, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1656; was licensed to preach in 1670, and admitted to the living at Bervie in the same year; transferred to Glammis in 1674, and died in March, 1681, aged about forty-five years. See Fusi Eccles. Scoticae, iii, 770, 859.

Chaloner, William (4), a Scotch clergyman, was admitted to the living at Garly in 1666; conferred to the Presbytery government, was received into communion by the Assembly in 1694, transferred to Rathven in 1699, thence to Kinedar in 1704, and died in 1718. See Fusi Eccles. Scoticae, iii, 197, 662, 676.

Chaloner, William (5), a Scotch clergyman, retired from Episcopacy in 1687; was licensed to preach by the Presbytery in 1691, and called the same month to the living at Monzie, and ordained. English and Gaelic were spoken by the people, he had difficulty there, not knowing both, and was transferred to Muthil in 1702, but returned to Monzie. It had long been the custom of many of his parishioners to play at foot-ball on the Sabbath morning, so he had great difficulty in getting their attendance at the church; but by taking part with them occasionally, he at length prevailed on them to accompany him to the sanctuary. He was transferred to Dunkeld and Dowally in 1705, and thence to Kinloch in 1718. He died Dec. 30, 1742. See Fusi Eccles. Scoticae, ii, 774, 878, 880.

Chaloner, Alexander (1), a Scotch clergyman, son of the minister at Marnoch, was licensed to preach in 1706; called to the living at Marnoch, as successor to his father in 1707, and ordained. He died Feb. 20, 1752, leaving a son, John, principal at Marischal College, Aberdeen. See Fusi Eccles. Scoticae, iii, 368.

Chaloner, Alexander (2), a Scotch clergyman, son of George, the minister at Botriphnie, was called to the living at Glass in 1734; ordained in 1735; and died April 7, 1756. See Fusi Eccles. Scoticae, iii, 199.

Chaloner, Alexander (3), a Scotch clergyman, studied at Marischal College, Aberdeen; was licensed to preach in 1744; and presented to the living at Cairn- in 1747. He was appointed chaplain to the 86th Fout
In 1759; obtained an augmentation of stipend in 1794, and died Oct. 5, 1798, aged seventy-seven years. He was highly esteemed for his attention to parochial duty, and his benevolence to the poor in his parish. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanum, iii, 193.

Chalmers, Daniel, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, son of a burgess of Edinburgh, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1582; was presented to the vicarage of Barra in 1588; called to be a reader in the king's house in 1589, and re-entered on the living of Barra in 1592. He was summoned before the Assembly to answer for non-residence in the parish, and resigned in 1593. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanum, i, 332.

Chalmers, George (1), D.D., a Scotch clergyman, a native of Aberdeen, took his degree at King's College in 1674; was admitted to the living at Kennoway before 1685; was deprived by the privy council in 1689 for not praying for the king and queen, and other acts of disloyalty. He went to England, and was presented to the living at Ford in 1690. He died in January, 1722, aged about sixty-eight years. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanum, ii, 541.

Chalmers, George (2), a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1678; called to the living at Bo- trippnie in 1682; survived the Revolution and most of his parishioners to the end of his life, Feb. 24, 1717, aged seventy-two years, leaving two sons, Alexander and James, in the ministry. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanum, iii, 193.

Chalmers, George (3), a Scotch clergyman, son of the minister at Rhynie, was admitted to the living at Drumblair before 1687, and died in 1702. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanum, iii, 652.

Chalmers, George (4), a Scotch clergyman, principal of King's College, Aberdeen, was appointed to the living at Old Machar in 1729, which he held in conjunction, although opposed for some time, but reaffirmed in 1730. He died May 4, 1746, aged seventy-five years. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanum, iii, 485, 486.

Chalmers, George (5), a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1739; presented to the living at Mortlington in 1804; ordained in 1805, and died Feb. 21, 1831, aged sixty-four years. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanum, i, 416.

Chalmers, Hugh, a Scotch clergyman, son of the minister at Rhynie, was ordained helper at Marnoch in 1671; presented to the living by the king in 1680, and died June 6, 1707, leaving his son Alexander, who became his successor, and James, minister at Dyke. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanum, iii, 208.

Chalmers, James (1), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, was promoted from being rector at King's College, Aberdeen; admitted to the living at New Machar before 1551; transferred to Cullen in 1562; appointed by Parliament in 1662 one of the visitors to the University of Aberdeen, and the same year was called south by the bishop of St. Andrews, and was promoted to Dumfries in 1663. The privy council ordered that as he had been at great charges in caring for the king's interest in Church and State, he was to have the salary due to his predecessor (who had been deprived and imprisoned), as well as that from his former parish. He was transferred by the king to Paisley in 1667; continued Aug. 18, 1669, and died before Aug. 4, 1675, aged about fifty years. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanum, i, 569; ii, 197; iii, 508, 674.

Chalmers, James (2), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1692; was appointed minister at Kirkpatrick-Fleming in 1686, and deprived by the privy council in 1689 for not praying for the king and queen. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanum, i, 622.

Chalmers, James (3), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, son of the minister at Fettercairn, was admitted to the living at Cullen in 1689, and deprived in 1695 for non-jurancy. He was the last minister settled there under Episcopacy, which was abolished one month before his deprivation. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanum, iii, 673.

Chalmers, James (4), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1598; was licensed to preach in 1609; called to the living at Elie in 1700, and ordained. He died Jan. 20, 1741, aged about sixty-three years. His son John succeeded to the benefit. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanum, ii, 425.

Chalmers, James (5), a Scotch clergyman, son of the minister at Marnoch, studied at Marischal College, Aberdeen; was licensed to preach in 1709; appointed to the living at Dyke, and ordained, but for some years had no salary. He was transferred to the second charge at Aberdeen in 1726; the appointment was opposed, but the General Assembly, by a small majority, affirmed it. He was transferred to the living at Greyfriars Church in 1728, with the professorship of divinity at Marischal College in conjunction. He died Oct. 6, 1744, aged fifty-seven years. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanum, iii, 181, 467, 475.

Chalmers, James (6), a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1729; appointed to the living at Daviot in 1731, and died Aug. 5, 1737, aged eighty-four years. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanum, ii, 426.

Chalmers, John (1), a Scotch clergyman, was minister at Auchterderran in 1599. He was one of the fifty-four ministers who signed the protestation in behalf of the liberties of the Kirk in 1617, and appeared before the Court of High Commission in 1620, for not keeping holy-days, and not administering the communion according to the Perth form, but owing to sickness he was excused. He died in 1642. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanum, ii, 521, 522.

Chalmers, John (2), a Scotch clergyman, sub-principal of King's College, Aberdeen, was appointed first to the living at Dyce, but was refused; then to the living of second charge, Old Machar, in 1601, which he held in conjunction. Objection was taken to his holding the two offices, as his charge was neglected, and he was transferred to Keith in June, 1610. In a fit of melancholy he attempted suicide, but survived a week, and died June 11, 1611, after full confession and repentance. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanum, iii, 205, 207, 486, 500.

Chalmers, John (3), a Scotch clergyman, son of the minister at Kinore, entered bursar at Marischal College, Aberdeen, in 1619; was admitted to the living at Inverawe in 1630, and ordained. The finances of the rebellion and the Irish army prevented divine service for a long time, and to escape therefrom he was transferred to Garly in 1649, where he was admitted in 1650, and continued in 1661. There is no further record of him. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanum, iii, 157, 221.

Chalmers, John (4), a Scotch clergyman, of Balnacrag, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1650; was appointed suffragan assistant and successor at Glenbervie in 1634, and died in April, 1635, aged about twenty-five years. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanum, iii, 878.

Chalmers, John (5), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, son of the minister at Boyndie, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1669; was appointed suffragan assistant and successor at Glenbervie in 1634, and died in April, 1635, aged about twenty-five years. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanum, iii, 878.

Chalmers, John (6), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, brother of the principal at Aberdeen, supplied the congregation at Rotterdam in 1698, during a vacancy; was admitted to the living at Camperve, Scotland, in 1699; translated to Duffus in 1722, and died there in September, 1729. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanum, i, 158.

Chalmers, John (7), D.D., a Scotch clergyman, of the minister at Elie, was licensed to preach in 1737; called to the living at Elie in 1738, in succession to Robert Cruickshank. He was licensed to Kirkconon in 1760, though his settlement was the subject of a long debate in the General Assembly. He died April 7, 1791, in his eightieth year. He was superior to many for ancient learning, but his usefulness was marred by a species of buffoonery, which excited much public censure against him. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiaci, ii, 425, 438.

Chalmers, John (8), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Annanville, Md. He embraced religion when but a boy; began preaching before he was sixteen; and in 1788 entered the itinerancy. In 1797 he located; re-entered the Baltimore Conference in 1822 as a supernumerary, which relation he sustained until his death, June 3, 1835. Mr. Chalmers was zealous in his work and exemplary in his life. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1854, p. 279.

Chalmers, Patrick, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1668; was admitted helper and successor to his father at Boyndie in 1671, and was deprived, on his own confession, for not praying for the king and queen, in 1689. He increased the supply of preaching at Boyne in 1692. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiaci, iii, 600, 607.

Chalmers, Peter, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1814; presented to the second charge at Dunfermline in 1817; and transferred to the first charge in 1836. He joined the Free Secession in May, 1845, but changed his mind, applied to the presbytery, and was again received in June. He was living in 1868. He published, Two Discourses on the Sin, Danger, and Remedy of Duelling (Edinb. 1822) ---Structures on the Dunfermline Volunteers (Glasgow, 1835) ---The Province of Reason in Matters of Divine Revelation and Scepticism Considered (1847) ---An Historical Account of Dunfermline (Edinb. 1844-59, 2 vols.) ---An Account of the Parish, etc. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiaci, ii, 570, 572.

Chalmers, Thomas, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, a native of Moray, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1611; was proposed for the living at Livingston in 1616, but the absence of the patron caused delay in his admission. He was admitted minister at Kirkpatrick, Flamborough, in 1624; but was deprived in July, 1624, and died in February, 1678, aged about eighty-two years. He published two single Sermons (1720, 1724). See Fasti Eccles. Scotiaci, i, 622.

Chalmers, Walter, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1766; appointed and ordained as missionary at Cairnie in 1768; then removed to Portsoy, and was presented to the living at Deskford in 1780. He died Dec. 20, 1829, aged eighty-three years. He published two single Sermons (1780, 1784). See Fasti Eccles. Scotiaci, iii, 675.

Chalmers, William (1), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, son of the provost of Aberdeen, took his degree at King's College in that city in 1617; was admitted to the living at Boynde before 1658, being the first minister of the separated parish. When the army of the Covenant, under John Crichton, was plundering the country in 1645, they made spoil of his goods, gear, and books. He was a member of the Commission of Assemblies in 1647 and 1649, and died in February, 1671, aged about seventy-four years. He had four sons, James, John, Patrick, and William, in the ministry. Patrick succeeded him in the benefice. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiaci, iii, 670, 671.

Chalmers, William (2), a Scotch clergyman, was baptized Feb. 17, 1755; licensed to preach in 1783; appointed to the living at Auchertaven in 1784, and ordained. He died June 10, 1838, aged eighty-three years. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiaci, ii, 790.

Chalmers, William (3), D.D., a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1805; presented to the living at Aberdour in 1806 by desire of the parishioners, and ordained and transferred to Dally in 1811. He joined the Free Church in June, 1845, and was admitted minister to the Presbyterian congregation of Ed- ward Street, London, in 1844. He published a sermon on the death of Sir Alexander Gibson Carmichael. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiaci, ii, 576.

Chaloner, Edward, D.D., an English divine, was born in 1590, at Chiswick, in Middlesex, and graduated at Oxford in 1610. In 1611 he was chosen fellow of All- Souls' College. He was principal of All-Hall. He died at Oxford, July 25, 1625. Some of his sermons were published at London in 1628, 1629, and 1632. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s.v.

Châlons, Council of (Concilium Calaminense). Of these the following were provincial:

I. Held A.D. 470, to elect John, bishop of Chalon.
II. Held A.D. 579, to dispose Salonius and Sagittarius, bishops respectively of Embrum and Gap, deposed by a previous council (of Lyons, A.D. 567), restored by Pope John III, and now again deposed.
III. Held A.D. 594, to regulate the psalmody at the Church of St. Marcellus after the model of Aganae.
IV. Held A.D. 608, to dispose Desiderius, bishop of Vienne, at the instigation of Queen Brunichilde. ---Smith Dict. of Christ. Antiq. s.v.

V. Held A.D. 694 (or 690, Le Comte says 694) by order of Clodius II; present, thirty-nine bishops, the deputies of six who were absent, six abbots, and one archdeacon. Agapius and Bobonus, bishops of Digne in Provence, were here deposed from the episcopate for violation of the canons. The council also drew up twenty canons.

1. Orders that the true faith, as taught by the Council of Nicea and confirmed by that of Chalcedon, be observed.
2. Forbids the consecration of more than one bishop to the same church at the same time.
3. Forbids the laity to meddle in the administration of churches and church property.
4. Directs that the clergy who serve chapels shall be subject to the bishop in all things.
5. Is directed against simony.
6. Imposes penalties upon lascivious dancers, and women who sang immoral songs within the church enclosure, or saints' days and festivals of dedication.

See Labbe, Concil. vi, 387.

VI. Held in 1062, by Peter d'Amiens, cardinal and legate, at the head of thirteen bishops. The subject was the claim of the privileges of the Abbey of Clugny, which Drogos, bishop of Macon, had attacked. Peace was restored between him and the abbot. See Labbe, Concil. ix, 1177.

Chalucet, Armand Louis, Baron de, a French prelate, was appointed bishop of Toulon in 1804, and consecrated in 1802. He displayed a rare courage when the armies of the allies, commanded by Victor Amadeo, duke of Savoy, came, in August, 1707, to besiege the city. Chalucet died in 1712, leaving some controversial works and excellent Ordinances Synodales (Toulon, 1704, 12mo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s.v.

Chalvet, Hyacinthe de, a French theologian, was born on Sept. 14, 1603, at Toulouse. He entered, when still quite young, the order of clerics, and followed the court of Morosant to the aid of the city of Caualia, which was besieged by the Turks. He stopped there for one year, and started, in September, 1648, to visit the holy places, but was taken captive by the infidels, and was not relieved until 1650. After returning to Toulouse, he printed the first volume of his Théologus Ecclesiasti, a large work, of which the sixth volume was published at Casal, in 1659. He obtained, in 1662, the chair of theology at the university of that city, and occupied it for fourteen years, having a large concourse of auditors. Chalvet died at Toulouse, in 1688, leaving a work on the Grandeur du Saint-Jesu, and

CHALYBÆUS, Heinrich Moritz, a German philosophical writer, was born July 3, 1796, at Pfaffroda, in Saxony. He studied philosophy, theology, and philosophy at Leipzig, and was, in 1823, called as a professor to Kiel, but was deposed on account of his anti-Danish sentiments. He died at Dresden, Sept. 22, 1862, leaving Historische Entwicklung des Spezulativ Philosopher von Kant bis Hegel (Dresden, 1857, 5th ed. 1860; English translation, Historical Development of Speculative Philosophy from Kant to Hegel, Andover, 1854) ; System der Spezulativ Ethik (Leipzig, 1850, 2 vols.); Philosophie und Christentum (Kiel, 1853) ; Fundamental-philosophie (ibid. 1861). See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 219. (B. P.)

Chama, in the mythology of the Burmese, is one of the three classes into which they divide all living things. The Chama are divided into eleven grades, seven happy and four unhappy. In one of the seven happy grades man lives; in the remaining six, higher beings; the four unhappy are the grades of fallen spirits, who dwell in the dark abysses of the earth.

Chamber, in architectural usage, is a room or apartment, distinguished from the hall, chapel, etc. The greater number of modern chambers are simply adjoined, or have a passage leading to them from the hall, and answered to the modern drawing-room, or withdrawing-room. The camera of an abbey or prior means his suite of lodgings in the establishment. The guest-chamber was usually over the buttery and pantry, at the lower end of the hall, in a medieval house, and in monasteries near the entrance. In some instances there was a separate hall called the Guesten-hall, as at Worcester.

Chamberlain, in a monastery, was overseer of the dormitory, and purchased clothes, bed furniture, and other necessaries. He received all considerable sums of money or other dues. He acted as treasurer, having the charge of nearly every considerable payment. At Durham his exchequer was near the abbey gates, under which was the tailors' shop for making linen-woolsey shirts and tunics for the monks and novices, and whole and half socks of white woolen cloth. At Abingdon his chamber was in the dormitory. He provided copes, albs, birettas, croziers, hoods, shoes and boots, towels, combes, knives, bells, straw palliasses, stools, bed-perches, hot water, tools for the tailors and cordwainers, five lights burning in the dormitory from twilight to dawn, and baths three times a year. At Canterbury he provided mats, blankets, razors, all the necessaries that are used for the fuel of the dormitory. The old clothing was distributed by him to the poor. Under him were the laundry folk, peltmen, or skin dressers, tailors, shoemakers, etc. In a cathedral hp was often called the procost, and, like the macarius in Italy, chamberier of Lyons, Strasbourg, and Saragossa, was the receiver of rents and paymaster of the stipends and money for stipendaries, and general accountant of income and keeper of the common chest. He was annually elected, and took precedence of canons while in office. At St. Paul's he found the necessaries for divine service and posted the summons of prebendaries to chapter on their stalls, and at York acted as punctator of the absences of the vicar. In the latter instance he might be a vicar.

Chamberlain, Charles, a Congregational minister, was born at Holliston, Mass., Oct. 4, 1813. For a time he was a student in Leicester Academy. In 1836 he graduated from Brown University, and in 1839 from Union Theological Seminary, having spent one year at the Andover Seminary. Meanwhile, in 1837 and 1838, he was tutor in Brown University. Two years he served as a home missionary in Ohio and Indiana. He was ordained pastor in Berkely, Mass., July 5, 1845, and was dismissed in 1844. The three years following he was acting pastor in Freetown; in 1847 and 1848, in Newmarket, N. H.; from 1848 to 1850, in Mendham, Mass. From July, 1851, to December, 1853, he was pastor in Auburndale, Mass., in June, 1854, was installed in Ashford, Conn.; from April, 1858, to March, 1867, was pastor in Eastford, Conn. Then he served as acting pastor as follows: at Oxford, from 1867 to 1869; Reading, from 1869 to 1871; Burlington, from 1871 to 1873; East Granby, from 1874 to 1881. His death occurred in East Granby, March 30, 1881. He published The Layman's Assistant and Home Monitor. See Cong. Year-book, 1882, p. 24.

Chamberlain, Chester, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Thetford, Vt., Jan. 19, 1807. He removed in his youth to Watervliet, N.Y., where he experienced religion; and, in 1834, united with the Troy Conference, wherein he labored with fidelity and success twenty-two years. In 1856 he became superannuated, in which relation, and that of a superannuate, he continued to the close of his life, July 30, 1875. Mr. Chamberlain was a man of devout and genial spirit, of harmonious and uniform Christian character. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1876, p. 82.

Chamberlain, Hiram, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Andover, Vt., April 2, 1827. He graduated from Middlebury College in 1822; studied theology at Princeton Seminary for one year, and subsequently at Andover Theological Seminary, where he graduated in 1825. He was ordained evangelist by the Presbytery of N. Y., Oct. 16, the same year; became a home missionary in St. Louis, Mo. (1825-1829); served as stated supply at Fayetteville, Ark. (1829-1833), at Franklin and Fayette (1833-1835); and was pastor of the 2d Church of St. Charles (1837-1844). He was editor of the Herald of Religious Liberty, St. Louis, for about two years. He became stated supply of Somerville and Bethany, Tenn. (1846-1850); and thereafter at Brownsville, Texas, where he died, Nov. 1, 1866. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 44; Trum. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 68.

Chamberlain, Jason, a Congregational minister, teacher, and lawyer, was born at Holliston, Mass., Feb. 9, 1783. His early education was thorough, and he graduated with the highest honors at Brown University in 1804. He first preached at Thomastown, Me., was ordained at Guilford, Vt., in 1808; and was dismissed from that church in 1811, to become professor of Latin and Greek in the University of Vermont. In 1814 he went West, and was one of the founders of Jackson County, Ohio. He next engaged in the practice of law, and in 1820 was drowned while going the circuit of the courts in Arkansas. Mr. Chamberlain's publications were a Sermon at the funeral of Gen. Henry Knox, 1807; and an Inaugural Oration at Burlington, Vt., in 1811.

Chamberlain, Joseph H., a Baptist minister, was born at Thetford, Vt., Feb. 25, 1800. Early in his life the family moved from Vermont to Western New York, and there, in a log school-house, while attending a revival meeting, he became a Christian when he was seventeen years of age. He went, in 1825, to the Hamilton Institute, now Madison University, to prepare for the ministry. He was ordained in 1829, and settled in South Berlin, N. Y. He pastored the church through the period of twenty-seven years, and his residence in the vicinity continued fifty-two years. For brief periods he lived in other places. He was, for a year and a half, agent of the Education Society at Hamilton. When not acting as a pastor, he performed a large amount of evangelistic labor in Norwich, Oxford, Greene, Coventry, the Hudson valley, and other places. He possessed more than ordinary gifts as a preacher. It is said of him that his eccentricities of speech and manner were marked, but it is thought that they added to rather than impaired his power. "When the heavenly gale blew upon him," as he often said, he loved to preach, and at such times his audiences heard him with delight. He was able to stir both the fountain of love and the fountain of tears. It is believed that during his long and laborious ministry he baptized more than one thousand persons on a personal profession of their faith in Christ. He died at Holmesville, N. Y., March 24, 1880. See New York Examiner, April 8, 1880. (J. C. S.)

Chamberlain, Josiah P., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born Sept. 6, 1786. He was converted in 1800; began preaching in 1811; and subsequently became a member of the Vermont Conference, wherein he labored faithfully till his death, March 26, 1864. Mr. Chamberlain was exemplary and eminently successful. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1864, p. 110.

Chamberlain, Levi, a lay missionary, was born at Dover, Vt., and for many years devoted himself successfully to business in Boston. He finally determined to relinquish secular life and devote himself to the work of aiding in the spread of the Gospel among the heathen, and for that purpose went to the Sandwich Islands and was appointed secular superintendent of the missions there. "His various toils were incessant and malarial, his food a constant judgment, his object the provision of the missionary department, and self-denial." After twenty years of service in the cause of his Master, he died at Honolulu, July 29, 1849. See Missionary Herald, Dec. 1849. (J. C. S.)

Chamberlain, Philip, a Baptist minister, was born at Hebron, Mc, in 1796. His opportunities for obtaining an education were very limited, and at the age of seventeen he was a laborer on a small farm in Maine. After this he was set apart to the work of the ministry, and for many years traversed what was then the wild region of Coos Co., N. H., and through his simplicity of character and earnestness of purpose accomplished much good. In later life he was settled in Bradford and other villages in New Hampshire, and in places in Vermont. He spent his last days in East Milford, N. H., where he died, Feb. 25, 1878. (J. C. S.)

Chamberlain, Pierce, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Newark, Del., June 11, 1790. He attended the Academy of Andover, and also at Newark Academy, and was licensed to preach with prudence. In 1827 he was licensed to preach by the New Castle Presbytery. He had much of the missionary spirit, and for a time labored in the almshouses and prisons of Philadelphia. After a few years he was ordained as an evangelist by the Presbytery of New Castle, and received a call from the Board of Missions to labor within the bounds of the Presbytery of Erie. He first visited the shore of Lake Erie in 1826, and labored for some time in the vacant churches with much acceptance. In 1828 he was installed pastor of the Church of Springfield, in Erie Co. On account of ill-health this relation was dissolved the same year, and then, till 1836, he labored as a missionary throughout the bounds of the presbytery, preaching wherever he could collect a congregation. In 1836 he accepted calls from Waterford and Union; giving up the latter, he labored at Gravel Run. His health failing, he was released from the pastoral charge. He soon after left Erie Presbytery and returned to Newark. At the time of the division of the Church in 1838, Mr. Chamberlain identified himself with the New School. After his return to Newark he took charge of a female seminary, where he labored till his death, Aug. 23, 1850. See Hist. of the Presbytery of Erie.

Chamberlain, Remembrance, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Vermont. He graduated at Middlebury College in 1814, and at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1819, and was ordained a minister in the Presbyterian Church. He preached at Madison, Ga., in 1825; went in 1826 to Bethel and preached for two years; from 1828 to 1830 was stated supply at Decatur, from 1830 to 1833 at Forsyth, and for the next year at Jackson. He acted in the capacity of an agent for the Church thereafter until his death in 1852. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 22.

Chamberlain, Robert, an English Congregational minister, was born at Ravenstonedale, Westmoreland, Sept. 5, 1797. He was educated at a free grammar-school. After his conversion he commenced to study for the ministry, under Rev. M. McLean, of Kendal. In August, 1819, he was admitted to Hoxton Academy. He was stationed at South Shields in 1822, where he was ordained; at Petworth in 1828, and at Swanage in 1832. In 1832 he was at Falcon Cliff, Isle of Man. In December, 1855, he went to Oakham, and died there on the 30th of the same month. He was unaffected, upright, and conscientious in public as well as in private life. See London Cong. Year-book, 1857, p. 170.

Chamberlain, Uriah Tracy, a Congregational minister, was born at Richmond, N. Y., March 3, 1809. His academic education was acquired in Rochester, N. Y. For a year he was a member of the Lane Theological Seminary, but graduated at Oberlin Seminary in 1838.

Chamberlayne, Israel, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Butternuts, Otsego Co., N. Y., Sept. 6, 1796. He joined the Church at the age of fifteen; received license to exhort in 1811, to preach in 1812, and in 1839 to unite with the Genesee Conference. From extreme nervous sensibility he was obliged to retire from the itinerancy in the meridian of life, and thereafter devoted himself to writing sermons, essays, reviews, and valuable volumes. His most important publications are: The Past and the Future: The inaudible Cogitation. He died at Philadelphia, Oct. 23, 1873, was active pastor in Hartford, Ct. Subsequently he resided, with his family, in Cambridge, Pa., where he died, Jan. 10, 1880. See Cong. Year-book, 1881, p. 19.

Subsequently he resided, with his family, in Cambridge, Pa., where he died, Jan. 10, 1880. See Cong. Year-book, 1881, p. 19.

Chamberlain, Nelson P., a Presbyterian minister, was born in New York. He graduated at Oberlin College in 1842, and at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1845; and was licensed by the Presbytery of New York, April 17, 1845. He was stated supply at the first Church, Madison, Parke Co., Ind., from 1846 to 1857; missionary and stated supply at Thibodeaux, in 1858, and pastor from 1859 to 1863. He was imprisoned at Hickman in 1867 and 1868; and resided thereafter at Wheeling, W. Va. He died in 1869. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 155.

Chamberlain, Farnemle, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Dalton, Mass., Aug. 11, 1801. He was converted at the age of sixteen, began preaching two years later, and in 1823 entered the New York Conference, wherein he labored as health permitted to the close of his life, in March, 1866. Mr. Chamberlin was an instructive and useful preacher, a faithful pastor, and an exemplary Christian. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1856, p. 58.

Chamberlin, William, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Newbury, Orange Co., N. H., Nov. 2, 1816. He taught school in his young manhood; was licensed to preach in 1844, and ordained at Dighton, Mass., in 1847, where he spent some time preaching, and then engaged as missionary in Virginia. In 1849 he went to Cincinnati, Ohio, where for twelve years he was employed as a book-keeper, acting in the meantime as Sunday-school superintendent of the Universalist church in the city. In 1855 he removed to his mother's house, and was ordained successively at Mendota, Ill.; Vinton, Council Bluffs, and Dubuque, Iowa; and finally at Clinton, N. Y., where he continued to the close of his life, April 28, 1876. Mr. Chamberlin was a man of marked ability, especially as an extemporaneous speaker, and possessed great geniality. See Universalist Register, 1873, p. 113.

Chambers, E. C., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in 1813. He was for several years a local preacher, and in 1853 was ordained local deacon. In 1854 he entered the Michigan Conference, and was ordained elder in 1856. He labored consecutively at Adrian, Reading, California, Osseo, Burr Oak, Union City, Beulah, and Osbomo, Niles, and Pentwater, and died at Victor, Mason Co., Mich., March 11, 1881. For seven years previous he had held a superannuated relation. He was a sweet-spirited Christian man, and his zealous labors were abundantly successful. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1881, p. 311.

Chambers, John, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Stewartstown, Ireland, Dec. 19, 1757, and brought to America while an infant. At the age of sixteen the son went to Baltimore and took a situation as clerk in a hardware store. On becoming a Christian, he began his theological studies under Rev. James Gray. He was ordained at New Haven in 1823, and called to the charge of a Presbyterian church in Philadelphia, which subsequently bore his name, and in which he ministered upwards of fifty years. He early rose to eminence as a preacher. His natural endowments were remarkable. To a fine physique, showing great muscular and nervous force, he had a voice which rang out like a bugle's blast, and to the effect which it produced was ascribed the conversions of several individuals, some of which are sufficiently marked to be characteristic of the date of the architecture, and they are more varied, and produce a stronger effect, than might be expected in such minute features. The angles of Early English buttresses are very uncommonly chamfered.

Chamber, Robert Daniel, A.M., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Martinsburg, Berkeley Co., Va., Jan. 4, 1823. He received a private preparation for college, but his father's resources being too limited to assist him further, he was apprenticed to a printer in his native town, and, while thus employed, improved every available opportunity for extending his knowledge. He was soon after converted, and in 1845 entered the East Baltimore Conference; in 1859, became professor in Irving Female College; in 1864, president of Emory Female College, of which he was the founder, and died in Carlisle, Pa., Sept. 8, 1864. Mr. Chambers was conscientious, intensely pietistic, a bold, fierce denouncer of evil; possessed an iron will and deep piety. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1865, p. 254.

Chamber, Thomas, an English engraver, was born in London about 1724. The following are his principal plates: The Holy Family; St. Martin Dividing his Cloak; St. Peter and St. John Healing the Sick; The Good Man at the Hour of Death. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Chamber, William, an English Wesleyan minister, became a local preacher in 1830, and studied theology for a time at Edinburgh. He entered the ministry in 1832, and labored faithfully for a long period. He became a superannuary in 1872, and died at Chatham, Jan. 14, 1887, aged seventy-five years. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1882, p. 20.

Chambray, Robert de, a French ecclesiastic, was born at Evreux, of the Norman family Ferre-Fremel. He was elected abbé of Saint-Étienne at Caen, and pope Clement VI gave him the right of carrying the pontifical ornaments even in the presence of the bishop of the diocese. He died in 1355. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chamfer (or Champer), an arrow or angle which is slightly pared off is said to be chamfered: a chamfer resembles a splay, but is much smaller, and is usually taken off equally on the two sides; it applies to wood-work as well as stone. In the Early English and Decorated styles, more especially in the former, chamfered opportunity for extending horizontal transitions of several kinds, some of which are sufficiently marked to be characteristic of the date of the architecture, and they are more varied, and produce a stronger effect, than might be expected in such minute features. The angles of Early English buttresses are very uncommonly chamfered.

CHAMILLART, or Chamillart, GASTON, a French theologian, and doctor at the Sorbonne, died about 1650, leaving De Covenia, Tumurata et Habita Clinorium (Paris, 1659, 8vo).—Déclaration de la Conduite de M. l'Archevêque de Paris Contre le Monastère de Port-Royal (ibid. 1667). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chammas is a name frequently found in the designation of churches in the west of Scotland, indicating the existence of a local saint of that name, or died probably Coman (Orig. Par. Scot. ii, 29 sqq.; Fortes, Kal. Scot. Scots, p. 299).

Chammanum. See IDOL (14).

Chamnée, MAURICE, a Roman Catholic writer, probably born in London, was bled a friar at the Charter House. He was imprisoned in the reign of Henry VIII for refusing the oath of supremacy with eighteen others of his order, all of whom lost their lives for fidelity to their conscience, Chamnée alone escaping to write a history of their execution. His convent was also destroyed. Fearing persecution, he fled beyond the seas, and passed the rest of his life on the Continent, dying in 1681. See Fullers, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), ii, 382.

Chamorro, JUAN, a Spanish historical painter, studied under Herrera the elder. From 1659 to 1673 he was president of the Academy of St. Luke. His principal works were in the Convent of Mercy at Seville. They represent subjects from the life of the Virgin, and the Four Doctors of the Church. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chamissô, CLAUDE HUMBERT, PIARRON DE, a French philanthropist, was born at Paris in 1717, of one of the most distinguished families. As soon as he became master of his fortune he changed his residence into a hospital, and hired a house at the gate of Sèvres for a similar purpose. He was also appointed general intendant of the military hospitals. The "Petite Porte de Paris" was named after his palace, and La Vineuve, the first idea of fire insurance companies. Chamouset died April 27, 1773. He published among other works a large number of Mémoires on military hospitals, on abandoned children, on the extinction of mendicity, etc. His complete Works were published by Caton des Houssayes (Paris, 1768, 2 vols. 8vo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Champagne (or Champaigne), PHILIPPE DE, a Belgian painter, was born at Brussels, May 26, 1692. The greatest assistance he ever obtained was from Fouquieres, who lent him some of his drawings. His works were distinguished for an admirable system of coloring, and he was a close imitator of nature. The best are in the ceiling in the king's apartment at Versailles, on the subject of the peace of 1659; St. Philip in Meditation; and in the Carmelite Convent at Paris, The Nativity; The Adoration of the Magi; The Circumcision; The Assumption; The Raising of Lazarus; The Descent of the Holy Ghost. Champagne died in Paris, Dec. 12, 1743. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Champagny, FRANCOIS, count de, a French writer, was born at Vienna, Sept. 10, 1804, and was the second son of the duke of Cadore, the minister of Napoleon I. He took an active part in the issue of the Aïa de Religion and the Correspondant, and was one of the founders of the Revue Contemporaine. In 1869 he was elected a member of the Hoefer, Académie, and died May 4, 1882. His most important works are, L'histoire des Cœurs (4 vols. 1841-43; 2d ed. 1883); Les Antonins (3 vols. 1863; 2d ed. 1866); — and Les Cœurs du IIIe Siècle (3 vols. 1870). (B. P.)

Champagneux, GILLES DE, a French religious writer, was born at Orleans in 1588. He was made doctor in theology, and taught in the Convent of La Place Mabeau at Paris; but during the political troubles of the time he remained faithful to the king. He became provincial of his order, and labored for its reformation and the extension of its privileges. He died in 1631, leaving De Antiquitatique et Privilegia Ordinis Carmelitani (Paris, 1627), and several other treatises in MS. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Champell, PIERRE (or LEONARD), a French theologian, was born at Treignac in 1590. He entered the Jesuit order at the age of nineteen, and taught theology and moral philosophy at Bordeaux, as chaplain of Occam and the Nominalists. He died April 12, 1669, leaving Les Vérités Catholiques (Paris, 1664). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Champfleur, FRANCOIS DE, a French theologian who lived in the first part of the 17th century, was of the order of the Benedictines, and wrote Le Dësiratoire (Paris, 1638; translated from the Latin of Nicolas Bourbon, in verse (Paris, 1610, Soiré Pau- bres Cyprès sur la Mort de Henry IV, in verse (ibid. eod.)); La Grandeur sur le Sacre de Louis XIII (ibid. eod.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Champion, Antoine de, a Swiss prelate, was first senator and then president of the senate of Cham- béry. On the death of his wife he embraced the ecclesiastic state, and was appointed bishop of Mondovi in 1485. Pope Innocent VIII nominated him bishop of Geneva in 1491, but the chapter there called as their bishop Charles de Susseville, a divine of the order of Saint Anthony of Vienna. Champion transferred his official suit to Annecy, but was finally induced to return to Geneva by the present of three hundred florins. He held a synod in 1493 for the reformation of his diocese, and died in 1495, leaving Constitutiones Symboli Episcopatus Genevensis (Geneva, 1493, 8vo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Champion (de Nilon), CHARLES FRANCOIS DE, a French theologian, was born at Rennes, Feb. 1, 1714. He entered the order of the Jesuits, Feb. 2, 1735, and taught theology there until he was appointed bishop of Amiens in 1745. Pope Ignatius VIII nominated him bishop of Geneva in 1749, but the chapter there called as their bishop Charles de Seysel, a divine of the order of Saint Anthony of Vienna. Champion transferred his official suit to Annecy, but was finally induced to return to Geneva by the present of three hundred florins. He held a synod in 1748 for the reformation of his diocese, and died in 1749, leaving Constitutiones Symboli Episcopatus Genevensis (Geneva, 1749, 8vo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Champion (de Fontenay), JEAN DE, a French theologian, was born at Rennes, Oct. 21, 1731. He became a Jesuit, Sept. 19, 1752, and went to Paris. On the abdication of his order in France he retired to Orleans, where he continued to dwell, and there he was pursued theological studies, and died Sept. 10, 1812. The following are the titles of his principal works: Variété d'un Philosophie Provincial (Paris, 1765, 12mo.); —Le Trésor du Chretien (ibid. 1778, 2 vols. 12mo.); —Le Théologien Philologique (ibid. 1786, 2 vols. 8vo.); —Nouvelles Discours (Paris, 1804, 4 vols. 12mo.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.
Champion, George, a Congregational minister, was born in Connecticut in 1808. He graduated from Yale College in 1831, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1834; was ordained and became a missionary to South Africa the same year, and died at Santa Cruz, W. L., Dec. 17, 1841. See Trien. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 107.

Champion (de Cice), Jérôme Marie, a French prelate and statesman, was born at Rennes in 1735. In 1763 he was appointed general agent of the clergy of France; five years afterwards he was made bishop of Rhodes. In 1781 he was elevated to the archbishopric of Bordeaux, and in 1787 to the assembly of the notables. As a member of the constitutional committee, he made, in 1789, the report on the rights of man, which his brother, the bishop of Auxerre, was also a member of the national assembly, opposed as useless. Louis XVI selected Champion de Cice, in place of Barantin, as keeper of the seals; an office which, since the times of cardinal de Bérégé, who had done so much harm to France (1570-78), no minister had ever held. This nomination was not listened to; but Champion maintained his position from 1785 to 1790, when he resigned it, having, meanwhile, addressed to the national assembly several memoirs on the royal prerogatives. Afterwards the archbishop of Bordeaux was obliged to go into foreign countries (being in danger of persecution), where he lived ten years, and whose exile ended by his submission to pope Pius VII, after which he was appointed archbishop of Aix, by the first consul, and directed all his attention to the erection of charitable establishments and schools. He died at Aix, Aug. 22, 1810. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Champion, Judah, a Congregational minister, graduated from Yale College in 1791; was ordained the pastor of the Church in Litchfield, Conn., July 4, 1793, and died in 1810. See Sprague, Annales of the Amer. Pulpit, 1, 512.

Champion, Pierre, a French Jesuit and biographer, was born at Avranches, Normandy, Oct. 19, 1631. He entered the order of the Jesuits in 1651, and taught rhetoric ten years. Afterwards he went with a French fleet to Capodimonte, and on his return settled at Nantes, where he died, June 28, 1701. He wrote, La Vie du Père Roppeaul (Paris, 1666, 1694, 12mo; Lyons, 1735, 1739, 12mos) — La Vie du Père Sollem- mand (Paris, 1694, 12mo; Lyons, 1735, 12mo; Avignon, 1692, 12mo) — La Vie des Fondateurs des Maisons de Recrutée (Nantes, 1698, 8vo), under the anagram Phamasar. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Champion, William, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in St. Just, near Penzance, England, May 23, 1817. He united with the Church in 1840; began preaching in 1843; emigrated to America in 1848, and in 1850 was admitted to the Baltimore Conference. Between 1861 and 1867 he held a superannuated relation, and from that time was a supernumerary to the close of his life, Jan. 20, 1873. Mr. Champion was characterized by meekness, fidelity, zeal, and success. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1873, p. 31.

Champlin, Albert, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in East Middlebury, Vt., Dec. 3, 1809. He was converted among the Congregationalists in 1825; joined the Methodist Church in 1827; soon after was licensed for the work of the ministry, 1834, entered the conference, and was superannuated in 1868, and died in Charlotte, Vt., June 18, 1872. Mr. Champlin labored on twenty-one different charges, was in thorough sympathy with all the interests of the Church, and devoted to God. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1873, p. 67.

Champlin, James Tift, D.D., an eminent Baptist minister, was educated at Willamette Coll., Conn., and graduated at Brown University with the highest honors in 1834; was tutor there from the fall of 1835 to March, 1838; and then became pastor of the First Baptist Church in Portland, Or. In 1841 he was made professor of ancient languages in Water- ville College, now Colby University, and was president of the college from 1847 to 1875, greatly promoting the prosperity of the institution. He had the gift of awakening the sympathies and calling forth the aid of men of wealth, and after he resigned that position he returned to Portland, where he died, March 15, 1882. Dr. Champlin was the author of several classical text-books. See Cattanach, Baptist Encyclopedia, p. 199. (J.C.S.)

Champness, William Weldon, a deacon in the Church of England, was born in 1808. At St. Ebbes's, Oxford, he exhibited wonderful talent for teaching children by catechization; was some time curate in that place, and subsequently published in Whitechapel, Lon- don. He died about 1875. See Christian Observer, March, 1875, p. 231.

Champney, Joseph, a Congregational minister, was born at Cambridge, Mass. He graduated from Har- vard College in 1721; was ordained in Beverly, Mass., Dec. 10, 1729, and died Feb. 28, 1773, aged sixty-nine years. See Sprague, Annales of the Amer. Pulpit, ii, 25.

Champollion, Jean François, a famous French Egyptologist, was born Dec. 26, 1790, at Figueres. In 1816 he was appointed professor of history at the Academy of Grenoble, after having two years previously become known by his 𝑃 узнёй 𝑘 селёс 𝑂芤𝑎𝑛𝑛 (Paris, 1814, 3 vols.). From 1828 to 1830 he travelled in Egypt, and after his return he was called to the chair of Egyptology, which he held, and subsequently published in the Academy of France. He died March 4, 1828, leaving, besides the above, De l'Écriture hiératique des Anciens Égyptiens (Grenoble, 1821) — Précis du Système hiéroglyphique des Anciens Égyptiens (Paris, 1824, 1825) — Panthéon Égyp- tien (ibid. 1823). After his death was published, Gram- maire hiéroglyphique de la langue des Égyptiens, 4 vols.- Monuments de l'Égypte et de la Nubie, (1835-45), 6 vols. — Dic- tionnaire égyptien en écriture hiéroglyphique (1842-44). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Champs, Étienne Agard de, a French Jesuit and theologian, was born at Bourges in 1613. He taught theology in the College of Rheims and at Paris, was three years superintendent and dean of his order to the papal court, and died at La Flèche, July 31, 1701, leaving Disputatio de Libero Arbitrio, etc. (Paris, 1642, 12mo; 1646) — Respondio ad Theronicum Vincentii Lexis (ibid. 1648; Cologne, 1650) — Le Secret du Jésuitisme Décou- vert (1651) — De Hierarchia Jesuænorum (Paris, 1654). etc. — Questions Éthiques (ibid.) — De la souveraineté Tholosporum Aristoteles (published in the Selecta Ora- tiones Passerini Societatis Jesu, Lyons, 1667) — Neuf Lettres sur la Grâce, Adresses au Prince de Conti et Suisses de Repones (Cologne, 1689, 12mo). Chamanel, Xen-Churhik, a rabbi of Kairwan, in Africa, was born about 990, and died about 1050. He was one of the greatest teachers of his time, and is the author of a commentary on the Pentateuch and Ezekiel. He also wrote a commentary on the Talmudic treatise Makkot. See Dr. Berliner's Mishag Chamanel, sein Leben und seine Werke, etc. (Leipzig, 1876); Fürst, Bibl. Jud. I, 1853; De Honi, Dictionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 75. (B. P.) Chananja 12th century, as one of the ten martyrs who died in the revolt of Bar-Cochba. He was found engaged in the peruasal of a roll of the law. To the question how he had ventured to defy the imperial edict, he replied by appealing to the higher duty of unconditional obedience to the laws of his God. Chananja was sentenced to be wrapped in the roll which he had being studied, and thus to be bound to the stake. One of his daughters was the wife of the famous rabbi Meir (q. v.). See Ederheim, History of the Jewish Nation, p. 239 sq.; Hamburger, Real-Encyclop., für Bibel u. Talmud, s. v. (B. P.)

Chancellor of the Choir is the dignitary in a cathedral next in rank to a precentor, and presides over the readers of the lessons in church, and the schools of the city and cathedral. The office was instituted in England in the 12th century, but in France apparently not until the 13th. The dignitary bore the name in foreign chapters of scholarist scholaræ cabalæ, that is, caput schola, head of the school, magistral and theological. Like the Greek chirographia, he was the librarian and secretary of the chapter, and sealed the caputary correspondence. He acted as the theological lecturer and reader in canon law. The chancellor's name is derived from that of the law officer who stood at the bar ad cancellorns to receive the plea of suitors, and was keeper of the court seal. The chancellor of a university has the sole executive authority within the precinct.

Chancellor, Samuli, an English Congregational minister, was born at Kensington, Jan. 12, 1795. During the greater part of his life he labored at his trade of iron-founder, but spent his time in secular improvement and diligent study. He was first engaged as a Sunday-school teacher, then in itinerant labors and in Kensington, twenty-six years, on the Sabbaths. For a short time he accepted a charge at Hayes, in Middlesex, and in 1817 at Epping, Essex. He died suddenly, Nov. 29, 1858. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1854, p. 221.

Chancels (cancelli) are screens, often of great beauty and richness, set round an altar, or the choir, or tombs of saints. The original chancels were those which divided the choir from the nave, forming a line of demarcation between the clergy and the laity. Leo III erected a chancel of pure silver, and Stephen IV placed another of the same material round an altar. The second council of Tours enjoined the people not to stand near the altar among the clerks at vigils or mass, because that part of the church which is divided off by chancels is restricted to the use of the singing clerks. Gregory of Tours mentions a chancel in the chord of the apan in San Pancrazio near Rome, and at Santa Sophia, Constantinople. The chancel fenced the entrance to the sanctuary.

The chancel-screen round the choir were called, in Spain, rejas, and elsewhere pectoralia, being a wall breast-high at which the faithful communicated and received the palms and ashes when they were distributed. It was identical with the peribolos which was introduced when the bums were first sung in choir during the 17th century. The solid and taller screens does not date earlier than the 12th century. Sometimes the chancels had a balustrade and columns, called regulata, placed at intervals; on these curtains were suspended, so as to resemble the Greek illuminations: Gregory of Tours noticed that they were embroidered and painted with sacred images in France. At certain times they were made of parchment. These curtains were sometimes closed, like the modern custom of leaving the whole vista of the interior and the altar in full view; this utter change from the more ancient idea of seclusion of the sacred mysteries eanminated from the Greeks, contemporaneously with the introduction of the altar with mourns and the chancel-screen, and was a wholesale destruction of the rood-screens. The latter, which are the true representatives of the primitive chancels, marked the separation between the clergy and laity, and also symbolized the entrance to the Church triumphant. For this reason they were painted, as at Hexham, with figures of saints, or with the sentences of the creed, or with the destruction of the drapes or the Last Judgment. Two of these screens, of open-work, of the time of Wren, exist at St. Peter's, Cornhill, and All-Hallows the Great, Thames Street, London; while beautiful specimens of lateral choir-screens remain at Alby, Paris, of the 14th century, at Chartres and Amiens, of the 15th century, and of the 13th century at Canterbury. The chancels mostly, however, have shrunk into the mere altar-rail round or in front of the altar, dividing, not as before, the nave from the choir, but the choir from the sanctuary.

Chanche, John Joseph, a Roman Catholic bishop, was born in Baltimore, Md., of French refugees from St. Domingo, Oct. 4, 1795. He was ordained in 1819, became a member of the Society of St. Sulpice, acquired a high reputation as professor and president of St. Mary's College, Baltimore, was consecrated bishop of the newly erected diocese of Narcissus, Miss., Dec. 14, 1841, and after attending the Council of Baltimore in 1852, died suddenly at Frederick, Md., July 22 of the same year. Chanche, a man fitted to shine among the learned, drew his talents to an obscure and laborious field, zealously serving as a missionary priest, building up with his own resources. See Dr. P. and New Hist. of the Cath. Church in the U. S. p. 150, 604-606.

Chandermi, in Hindist mythology, is one of the forms of the name of the moon-god. He is also the sovereign of the entire expanse of the air, in which he lives. He loved Tarci, the young and beautiful wife of Vyasah, and from this love the celebrated Buddha is said to have come. Vyasah adopted the latter as his son, and instructed him in all branches of science. See Chandara.

Chandler, Amariah, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Deerfield, Mass., Oct. 27, 1792. He graduated at the University of Vermont in 1807, and was ordained pastor of the Church in Waitsfield, Vt., in 1810; here he remained until 1830; preached two years at Hoosac, N. Y.; was installed over the Church at Greenfield, Mass., in 1832, and died there in the pastoral office, Oct. 20, 1864. Dr. Chandler was a delegate to the Massachusetts Convention for the Revision of the State Constitution in 1838. He published several sermons and treatises, including A Review of Dr. Wiliard's History of the United States (1837). His mind was antagonistic, independent; his manners were simple; he was much beloved for his kindness and sociability, and his sermons were solid and impressive. See Cong. Quarterly, 1852, p. 208, 421.

Chandler, Augustus, a Congregational minister, was born in North Woodstock, Conn., Dec. 1, 1800. He graduated from Williams College in 1826, and taught school the following year, and was ordained to the Westwood, in 1659 he graduated from Andover Theological Seminary. Sept. 12, 1660, he was ordained at Saxton's River in Rockingham, Vt., and remained there one year as acting pastor. From 1681 to 1684 he ministered in Lempster, N. H., and on Dec. 28 of the latter year was installed pastor in Strafford, Vt. Having removed to Dummerston, he was made pastor of the church there, Dec. 18, 1687, and held that charge until Aug. 24, 1697. After this he resided in Episcopal communion. He was appointed secretary of the Church Book Society, New York city, about this time, and in 1688 became secretary of the Society for the Increase of the Ministry, residing in Poughkeepsie, N. Y. This office he held until 1781, when he removed to Baltimore, Md., as the associate secretary and general agent of the Democratic Convention of Missions. In 1783 he died in Baltimore, in February, 1787, at the age of sixty years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1879, p. 108.

Chandler, George, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Middletown, Conn., Jan. 24, 1790. He graduated from Yale College in 1813, and was licensed by the Huntington Presbytery, and stationed in Newark, N. J. In 1815 he was installed to the New Church of Kensington, Philadelphia, where he remained till his death, Feb. 15, 1869. He was greatly beloved by his people, and the Church prospered under his ministration. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1861, p. 157.

Chandler, George Clinton, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Chester, Vt., March 19, 1807. He graduated from Madison University in 1835, and from the Theological Institution at North Springfield, Vt., Sept. 5 of that year, he went to Indiana as home missionary there, and afterwards pastor at Indianapolis from 1839 to 1843. He was president of Franklin College, Ind., for the next seven years, and went as a missionary to Oregon in 1851. He died at West Grove, Ore., Jan. 19, 1881. See The Watchman, Feb. 24, 1881. (J. C. S.)

Chandler, Hubbard, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Wilton, Franklin Co., Me., Jan. 11, 1798. He was converted at twenty, and immediately began preaching. He was ordained in Phillips, June 27, 1822, and labored extensively and successfully in Maine as an evangelist. As a speaker he was earnest, powerful, but eccentric. During his last years he preached only occasionally. He died at West Poland, Me., Nov. 5, 1866. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1868, p. 88. (J. C. S.)

Chandler, J., an English Baptist minister, was pastor over the Church at Wedmore, Somerset, during his whole public career, commencing in 1814. He was active in the means of introducing the Gospel into several villages around, and for many years preached in one of them nearly every evening. He died Feb. 11, 1851.

Chandler, James, a Congregational minister, was born at Andover, Mass., June 20, 1706. He graduated from Harvard College in 1728; was ordained minister of the second parish in Rowley, Mass., Oct. 16, 1732, and died April 16, 1789. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 454.

Chandler, John (1), an English minister of the Society of Friends, was born at Great Bardfield, Essex, April 10, 1687, and was a linen-draper by trade, and had but little scholastic education; but he applied himself diligently to study, familiarizing himself with Latin and several of the modern European languages, and general literature. In 1689 he went to the West Indies, under sanction of the Meeting for Sufferings, to relieve the miseries of the emancipated negroes. During his visit, he explored many of the islands. In 1694 he made a second voyage to the West Indies in behalf of the Anti-Slavery Society. In 1815 he visited America. In 1825 he went to Portugal, to present to the queen of that country an address from the Society for Friends on slavery; and in the latter part of the same year he visited Brazil on a similar mission. In 1826 he was sent to America, to present to the government of each state, and the president of the United States, a declaration from the Yearly Meeting of London on the unrighteousness of slavery. In 1826 he went to Norway as a missionary. He was one of the founders of the Auxiliary Bible Society, and was secretary of the Danish Missionary Society. He died at Springfield, Chelmsford, July 4, 1869. See Annual Monitor, 1870, p. 89.

Chandler, John (2), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Enfield, Conn., Oct. 16, 1737. He was reared a Calvinist; experienced conversion at the age of twenty-four, and immediately joined the Methodists. He received license to preach in 1824, and in the same year united with the Pittsburgh Conference, in which he travelled large circuits for twelve years, and served as presiding elder eight years. In 1824 he entered the Rock River Conference, and labored faithfully until 1865, when he became superannuated, which relation he sustained to the close of his life, at his home in Peoria, Aug. 14, 1873. Mr. Chandler was deeply pious; powerful in prayer and preaching; a prudent, princely leader in Israel. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1873, p. 147; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Chandler, Joshua, a Congregational minister, was born at Andover, Mass., May 17, 1787. He graduated at Harvard College in 1807; was ordained at Swampscott, N. H., Jan. 20, 1819, and remained pastor there until Nov. 6, 1822. The day following he was installed in Orange, Mass., where he continued about five years. He became pastor in Belchertown, Jan. 20, 1826, and finally in Pembridge, Feb. 9, 1842. He removed to Boston, and died there, May 31, 1844. See Necrology of Harvard College, p. 29. (J. C. S.)

Chandler, Leonard Niles, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Mississippi, July 9, 1841. He was converted in 1868, and in the same year was licensed to preach, and received into the Little Rock Conference, wherein he labored until his death, Oct. 11, 1871. Mr. Chandler exemplified Christianity in truth and trust, a gentleman of great faith. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1871, p. 619.

Chandler, Richard, D.D., an English divine and antiquary, was born in 1738 at Elion, in Hampshire, and was educated at Winchester school and Queen's College, Oxford. His first work consisted of fragments from the minor Greek poets, with notes, in 1759; and in 1763 he published a fine edition of the Arundelian marbles, Marmoris Oxoniensis, with a Latin translation. The same year Chandler, together with Revett, the architect, and Pars, the painter, was sent by the Dilettanti Society to explore the antiquities of Ionia and Greece. They returned to town in 1766. A result of their joint investigations, they produced the two magnificent folios of Ionia antiquities, in 1769. Chandler also edited a valuable collection of inscriptions, entitled Inscriptiones Antiquae Pleraque Quadam Editione (Oxford, 1774). In 1775 he published his Travels in Asia Minor, a work of value, and in 1780, his History of Illyria. After his return from Greece he obtained several Church preferments. He died in England in 1810. See Encyclop. Brit. (9th ed.) s. v.

Chandler, Samuel, a Congregational minister, was born at Andover, Mass. He graduated at Harvard College in 1755; became pastor of the second parish of York, Me., Jan. 20, 1752; was dismissed in 1755; installed at Gloucester, Mass., Nov. 13, the same year; and died April 16, 1775, aged sixty-three years. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 274.

Chandler, Theophilus Bradbury, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in East Woodstock, Conn., March 28, 1826. He experienced religion at the age of fourteen; graduated at Wesleyan University in 1850, and in the same year entered the New York East Conference. During the years of 1856-58 he was obliged to retire from regular work, and was employed occasionally. In 1859 he resumed his place in the effective ranks, labored faithfully four years, when he was prostrated by hemorrhage of the lungs, and continued to decline in strength by repeated attacks until his death, June 20, 1866. Mr. Chandler possessed rare excellencies, a quick mind, fine perceptions, poetic taste, retentive memory, genial temper, and an earnest, practical, sympathetic spirit. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1867, p. 77; Alumni Record of Wel. Unie, 1881, p. 103.

Chandler, Thomas W., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born Dec. 30, 1799. He was converted in 1823, licensed to exhort in 1826, and in 1827 was licensed to preach, and admitted to the Kentucky Conference. He was transferred to the Illinois Conference, in 1841, to the Missouri Conference, and in 1846, to the Ohio Conference. He located and returned to Illinois in 1850, and in the following year was readmitted to the Southern Illinois Conference, wherein he continued zealous and faithful until 1858 as an elder and preacher, and from that time superannuated to the close of his life, Sept. 7, 1859. Mr. Chandler was an earnest student of theology, and a man of exemplary life. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1860, p. 562.

Chandra, in Hindë mythology, is one of the names for the moon or the genius inhabiting it. He married two of the daughters of Daksha and Bohini especially, and neglected the rest, for which their father cursed him, and he consequently died; but having repented of his error, he was again awakened. His children are called Children of the Moon, and form a separate family in the mythology of India. See Somà.

Chandrayana (or Tsiandrayana), in Hindë mythology, is the moon-penance which the men, born again as Brahmans, practice as atonement for sins committed in a lower grade of their existence. The body is scantily fed, only nuts of the woods being eaten.

Chaney, Bailey E., a Baptist minister, was born in South Carolina, and moved to Natchez about 1790. During the persecutions to which the Protstants in that part of Mississippi were subjected, Mr. Chaney managed to conceal himself. When the territory was brought under the government of the United States, "the people assembled in large numbers, a brush arbor was constructed, and he was sent for; and, while the flag of the United States floated over him, he preached the Gospel of Christ unawed by the minions of Rome." He visited, in 1738, an American settlement near Baton Rouge, La., and preached. He was arrested by the authorities and forced to leave the country. He went back to Mississippi, where he continued to labor until his death, which occurred about 1816. See Cathcart, Baptist Ency. p. 200. (J. C. S.)

Chaney, S. Freeman, a Free-will Baptist minister, son of Rev. John Chaney, was born in 1819. He was converted at fifteen, entered upon a course of study at Farnsfield, Me., was ordained June 5, 1842, and became pastor of the Church in Buxton. Among the most remarkable events of his ministry, and to his church, was the use of the free-will and hynm, which were responsive sung in the night air during the Arkanapersion by the encampment litigating on the river; and watching times and in many churches, single voices chanted while the congregation merely joined in at the end, and meditated in silence. The people now joined zealously in the Chang-ko is a Chinese goddess worshipped by bachelors, and held in great esteem by the learned men, as Minerva was by the Greeks and Romans.

Channa ben-Dosa, a Jewish teacher of the 1st century, was celebrated for his piety. It was said that a voice from heaven daily declared that the whole world was only preserved for the sake of Channa. Among his recorded sayings are these: "The wisdom of a man will be abiding if his fear of sin is greater than his desire after wisdom only; but where search after wisdom takes precedence of the fear of sin, the former also will only prove a temporary possession;" also, "The man whose works exceed his wisdom really possesses firm and lasting wisdom; but he who wisdom exceeds works, will find that the former also will prove unstable" (Pirke Abot, iii. 8). Many anecdotes are related to show this rabbi's power over angels. See Hamburger, Real-Encyclop. für Bibel u. Talmud, ii, 120 sq.: Friedländer [M. J.], Geschichtsbücher aus der Zeit der Tannaica (Britten, d. d. J., A. 669, Berlin, 1855, 12mo), p. 141: Friedländer [M.], Ben Dosa und seine Zeit (Vragg, 1872). (B. P.)

Channer, Isaac, an English Baptist minister, was born at Bristol in 1701. He came to Ashley River, near Charleston, S. C., about 1733, where he served as pastor fifteen years. He died Nov. 30, 1749, having published a treatise entitled The Doctrine of Glorious Grace. Baptized, Preached, and Preserved, and Protestant in Life, also a treatise on Original Sin. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vi, 47; Cathcart, Baptist Ency. s. v.

Channing, Henry, a Unitarian minister, was born at Newport, R. I., in 1760. He graduated at Harvard College in 1781, where also he was tutor from 1783 to 1786. He was ordained and installed over the Congregational Church in New London in 1787. A revival of religion commenced with his ministry, and continued two years. He was dismissed, at his own request, May 20, 1806. In January, 1808, he was called to the Congregational Church in Canandaigua, N. Y., and continued till May, 1811, when he resigned. His preaching during this time was never distinguished for his power, and, indeed, little was known of Unitarianism, at least in that part of the country. In 1817 he returned to New London, and in the two following years was a member of the Legislature of Connecticut. After this he went to New York city, where he died in 1840. He published many sermons. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 381.

Chanorier (or Chanorier), Antoine de Miranges, a French Protestant minister and theologian, lived about 1550. He was sent by the Church of Geneva to the Church at Blois in 1558; the following year he was appointed pastor of Orleans. Chanorier published La Legende des Pères et des Moines (Geneva, 1545, 12mo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chant, Ecclesiastical. The following are additional particulars:

"Singing is mentioned in the apocryphal times (Acts xxi. 25; 1 Cor. xiv. 26), just as our Lord and his disciples sang a 'hymn,' that is, certain psalms, but what the music was is unknown. The church was probably founded on Greek music; and antiphonal singing, allowed to by Piluly, took its origin at Antioch, and was adopted by St. Basil at Symmuscus, the Patriarch of Jerusalem, and Arabia. St. Ambrose introduced it into the West at the baptism of the converts; the use of the free-will and hymn, which were responsive sung in the night air during the Arlan persecutors by the encampment; and watching times and in many churches, single voices chanted while the congregation merely joined in at the end, and meditated in silence. chanting, until at length their extreme vociferation was reduced to a sustained whisper, the words of which were given out by the choirmaster, or oecumenes, on the other side. The use of the organ was a matter of great importance in the Roman Church: its harmonious notes, in time, to the music of the psalms, were to be compared to the harmonious notes of the organ. The organ was the instrument of the liturgy, and its use was so general that it became the characteristic of the Roman Church. In the Middle Ages the organ was so highly valued that it was considered a sine qua non for the celebration of divine service. It was used in all the principal churches of Europe, and was considered an essential part of the liturgy. The organ was used in all sorts of services, from the mass to the chanting of the offices. It was used in the mass for the singing of the Elevation, and in the offices for the chanting of the psalms. In the time of the Crusades it was used for the chanting of the offices of the Holy Sacrament, and in the time of the Reformation it was used for the chanting of the offices of the Holy Sacrament.

Chantre, Sir Francis, an eminent English sculptor, was born in 1782, at Norwich, in Derbyshire. He received some instruction from John Raphael Smith, and in 1802 he advertised in the Sheffield papers to take crayon portraits. Shortly afterwards he visited Edinburgh and Dublin, and then London. In 1817 he was elected an associate of the Royal Academy. He was employed upon some designs for St. Paul's, besides designs for church sepulchres. He died in 1841. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chamukah was a Jewish festival of dedication or purification, which lasted eight days, during which every- body burned lights, each day one more than the preceding, and said prayers, but did no work as long as these lights burned. It was believed to have been instituted by Judas Maccabaeus in memory of the repossession of the Temple, after its profanation by strange gods. Many fables of brutal ceremonies were said (by enemies) to have been practiced, which called forth the most cruel persecutions of the Jews on the part of their foreign masters. See Dedication.

Chanut, Pierre-Martial, a French theologian and translator, was abbe of Iloasche, chancellor of queen Anne of Austria, and a friend of Chuliac. He died Nov. 15, 1695, leaving Seconde A pologie de Justin pour les Christiens (from the Greek, Paris, 1670, 12mo), under the assumed name of Pierre Tondet, and in 1696, under the true name of the author:—Catholicae (ibid. 1696, 12mo):—Vie et Oeuvres de Saint Stephen written by himself, and translated from the Spanish, ibid. 1691, 8vo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chaos, in Greek mythology, was the primitive element, the formless, out of which everything arose—the deities, as well as heaven, air, earth, and sea, and all their inhabituants. Chaos united with Darkness (Céligo) and produced Ether, Day, Erebos, and Night. The pairs again united, and thus Ether, Erebos, and Darkness united, and produced Heaven, the Earth, and the Sea. Erebos and Night had as their children, Fate, Age, Death, Sleep, Dreams (Phantasma, Morpheos, Mousm), the Parce, Discord, Misery, Revenge, Sympathy, and finally the Hesperides (Egeia, Hesperia, Arethusa). From the Earth and the Sea there sprang forth as their offspring, Pain, Crime, Fear, Falsehood, Pejurity, Intemperance, the Furies, Pride: also the Ocean, Pontus, Tartarus, Themis, and the Titans. It is plain that here are only personified powers or attributes of nature, and that these in the course of production were gradually separated more and more, until the Titans and the deities quarrelled about the land, which finally was peopled with human beings by Prometheus when he secured the fire from Olympus. See Cosmogony.

Chapeauville (or Chapeaupile), Jean, a Bel- gian theologian and historian, was born at Liege, Jan. 5, 1551. He studied first at Liege and at Cologne, and then at the University of Louvain, where he received the title of doctor of theology. On his return to his native place (1578) he was appointed examiner of the synod, and the following year pastor of St. Michel, and canon of the Church of St. Pierre. He next taught theology in several seminaries, and showed the greatest devotion during the plague which desolated Belgium. He was to the Synod an inveterate inquisitor of the faith, canon of the cathedral, grand penitentiary, grand vicar of the prince-bishop. Erasmus of Bavaria, archdeacon and provost of the chapter of St. Pierre. Chapeauville was honest, grave, and laborious, but he condemned Jean Devalx, subprior of the Abbey of Stavelot, as guilty of magic, and delivered that unfortunate monk to the secular arm. Chapel. Chapels may be divided into several classes: (1) as regards their relation to other churches; being (a) dependent on the church of the parish, or (b) independent, in some cases even exempt from episcopal visitation. (2) As regards their material structure; being (a) apartments in palaces or other dwellings; (b) buildings forming part of or attached to convents, hermitages, or the like; (c) buildings forming the appendages to larger churches; (d) sepulchral or other wholly detached buildings.

The following classification has sometimes been made:

(1) Isolated or detached buildings for religious worship annexed or affiliated to mother churches, without the name of a church on the gate or other structure, as the statue of Cauntes, a "field church," and in modern times chapels of ease. (2) Those attached to a palace, castle, mansion, or college, less generally known as oratories; the earliest recorded in a college or university is at Paris in 1254. (3) Chapels, or internal buildings within a church. An aisle furnished with its own altar, chalice, paten, cruets, basin, pyx, and sacring-bell. (4) A set of vessels and vessels in the service of the church, as we read that a bishop bequeathed his chapel to a cathedral. (5) A well chapel, like that of the Perpendicular period, often a mere repository for effigies till more spacious and most Whitireed's at Holywell, where the bath, which was a place of great resort, is star-shaped, and was formerly enclosed with stone screens; round it is a vaulted ambulatory, and in front there is an entrance porch: in the upper story there is a chapel. The class of first class are not permitted to contain a font, and usually have no cemetery. The principal Chapels of Paris, Vincesnes, Dijon, Blois, Champlayn, and Bourbon, so called as containing presumed relics of the Cross, were peculiar to France. That of Dijon is called the Palatine, from the palace of the Dukes of Burgundy, in which it stood.

A strictly accurate division is, however, impossible, as some cases may be placed in either class. It is also impossible to draw a clear line between churches and chapels with regard to their material aspect, some of the latter being too important in a historical point of view, or too extensive and magnificent, to be omitted from any attempt to trace the progress of church building.

"In the 11th century, when the practice of building crypts or subterranean vaults fell into desuetude, the chapel became an integral portion of the upper structure; usually there were three at the east end, one in the centre dedicated to the Virgin, or set between two ancient chapels. In the 12th century chapels were multiplied round the sanctuary: throughout the Norman style they were apsidal, but growing broader and higher in the 13th century, in the Eastern chapels were added in still greater numbers round the altar; in the later styles they were as many as sixteen. In this and the succeeding century chapels were erected between the buttresses of the nave-aisles. These are common abroad, and were at King's College (Cambridge), and at Windsor, at Lincoln, in the presbytery, and formerly there was one in the nave at Canterbury."

"Lowest of all are a group of chapels round the presbytery at Westminster, Tewkesbury, Pershore, radiating from the main building, but it was an uncommon arrangement to see an external range of chapels in the naves of Chichester and Manchester; and the lateral or transeptal line (at Cork) of those at Fountains, Petworth, Waverley, and Nene, south of York are quite Brlechton, and that recently destroyed at Hexham, and the second youngest, at Gart in Kincardine, and at Canterbury. Chapels were usually founded as chapels of ease and maintained by families of distinction, by the bequests of ecclesiastics, and very frequently by confraternities and guilds. The resemblance in many particulars the cubicles or side rooms of churches, which Paulinus of Nola says were allotted for prayer, devotum reading, and commemoration, but are not recorded; but the idea of a building rendered indissoluble by the multiplication of altars which blocked up the nave and aisles, and by the omission of the piers of the nave; and in later periods strengthened the enormous stride of the buttresses, which was necessary to support the vast height of the walls. In the west of England the dedication was usually to St. Michael, as the conductor of souls to Paradise. In Christchurch (Hants) and at Bury St. Edmund's and Abingdon there were several chapels built in the cemetery and cloere, and this may have been a not uncommon arrangement, till such parochial buildings were absorbed into the central minster after its reconstruction with larger dimensions on a grand scale for the Eastern Church at Mount, Blakesley, on Mount Athos, and in several parts of Ireland, there were similar groups, which are not uncommon, probably to give the principle of having only one altar to a church."

I. Domestic Chapels. The earliest example of this class is probably the small chapel now known as the Sancta Sanctorum (originally St. Lawrence) in the fragment of the ancient palace of the Lateran which still remains. It was the private chapel of the popes and appears to have existed as early as A.D. 383; but the site of the Lateran by the 13th century. In the 14th century (1342) and at Burr St. Edmund's and Abingdon there were several chapels built in the cemetery and cloere, and this may have been a not uncommon arrangement, until such parochial buildings were absorbed into the central minster after its reconstruction with larger dimensions on a grand scale for the Eastern Church at Mount, Blakesley, on Mount Athos, and in several parts of Ireland, there were similar groups, which are not uncommon, probably to give the principle of having only one altar to a church.

II. Commercial Chapels. Chapels were intended for the private and daily use of the community. In some instances even more than two chapels existed in a monastery: for Adamnan (De Situ Terrae Sancte, ii, 24) says that at Mount Talbot, within the wall of enclosure of the monastery, were three churches, "non parvi sedicem." In the last century of the convent the Nithian valley are three churches, one over the other (Sir Gardiner Wilkinson, Handbook of Egypt); but it does not appear what their date is.

In Ireland there still exist some small chapels which may be assigned with probability to very early dates. Mr. Petrie (Ecclesiastical Architecture of Ireland, p. 133) thinks that such structures as the oratory at Gallerus, in Kerry (shown on p. 893), may be considered to be the first erected for Christian uses, and at least as ancient as the conversion of the Irish by St. Patrick. This example measures externally twenty-three feet by ten, and is sixteen feet high, with a roof being ten feet high and twelve feet in its easter end. As early as the 5th or 6th centuries are such buildings as Tempull CONANACH, island of Arran, bay of Galway, Church of St. Macara, island of Cruach Mhic Dara, which are simple quadrangular buildings, without distinction between nave and chancel. Others, apparently of ecclesiastical use, were a small chapel within the nave, and entered by an archway. In no case is an apse found in Ireland.

Many of these small chapels were built of wood, and were known as "Druithechas," or "Drethechas," (i.e. house of oak). Buildings of very similar character exist in Cornwall, and their foundation societies and chancellories from Ireland: such was the chapel of Perversu-
CHAPEL

820 and 830; nor do any seem to have formed parts of the minister of Aix-la-Chapelle.

In the East the rule has always been to have only one altar in a church; and chapels have, therefore, rarely formed parts of churches, but are sometimes found attached to them. An instance of the latter would appear to exist in a church of St. Demetrios at Thessalonica; and to the Convent of St. Catherine on Mount Sinai six chapels are attached on each side of the nave, but these are doubtless not of the original fabric.

3. Subterraneous Chapels, or crypts (q. v.). We have probably an instance in the remains of the Basilica of San Stefano, in Via Latina, built by pope Leo I, 440-461, at Rome. Where, however, no chamber existed, a crypt was not constructed. Hence, in the earlier churches of that city, we find no crypt forming part of the original plan, but small excavations under the altar, to receive some holy corpse brought from the extramural cemeteries. In San Apollinare-in-Classe, at Ravenna, a crypt appears as part of the original structure; it consists of a passage running within the wall of the apse, and another passing under the high-altar.

Although French antiquaries (Martigny, Dictionnaire, art. Crypte) have claimed a very high antiquity for crypts under several churches in France, they are probably not structural crypts. Two crypts, however, exist, which were, it would seem, structural; these are those of St. Ireneus (founded in the 4th century) at Lyons, and of St. Victor at Marseilles (5th century).

Two remarkable crypts exist in England, one in the cathedral of Ripon, and the other in the abbey church of Hexham; both attributed to St. Wilfrid (A.D. 670-678). The model which he followed was evidently not the "confessio" of a church, but the cubicles and galleries of a Roman catacomb. Crypts existed in the Saxon church of Canterbury, in the plan for the Church of St. Gall (made about 800), and there is one in the Church of Brixworth, Northamptonshire. A remarkable crypt, or "confessio," exists under the raised presbytery of the Church of St. Cecilia at Rome, and apparently dates from the construction of the building by pope Paschal I. (817-824). It consists of a vaulted space south of the altar (the church stands nearly north and south), a passage running round the interior of the apse, and another passage running south from the north end of the former, but stopped by a mass of masonry supporting the high-altar. Within this mass is a sar-Chapelle (de Jumilhoe), Pierre Benoît, a French theologian and Benedictine of St. Maur, was born at Saint-Jean-Ligoure. After having been visitor of the province of Bretagne in 1551, of Toulouse in 1564, and assistant of the general of his order in 1657, and also superior of several monasteries, he retired to the abbey of St. Germain-des-Prés, where he ended his days, March 22, 1682. He left La Science et la Pratique du Plain-Chant (Paris, 1677). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chapels, Union, is a name given to those places of worship in which the service of the Church of England is performed in the morning, and the service of Dissenters in the evening.

Chapelon, Nicolas, a French engraver, was born at Chateauzoulu in 1596, and studied painting under Simon Vost. He visited Rome for improvement, and remained several years, in which time he published his set of fifty-two plates from the loges of Raphael in the Vatican. The following are some of his original works: The Holy Family: The Virgin Stalking the Infant. He died in 1647. See Spoor.

Chapin, Almon B., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in 1808 at Somers, Conn. He practiced law for six years, entered the ministry in 1838, and was rector of the Church in South Glens-bury for several years, until about 1856; subsequently he removed to Hartford, to devote himself more especially to literary work, and died there, July 9, 1859. He wrote several works, among them, The Free Church (1845); Gospel Truth (1847); besides numerous pamphlets and contributions to periodicals. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1859, p. 90; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Chapin, Asahel, a Baptist minister, was born at West Springfield, Mass., July 20, 1804. He graduated at Amherst College in 1829, and at the Newton Theological Institution in 1833. He was ordained at Shub-bula, O., Feb. 13, 1834, where he remained about one year and then removed to Buffalo, N.Y., and was pastor in 1836 and 1837; then pastor at Jamestown, from 1837 to 1843; at Tariffville, Conn., in 1846 and 1847; Second West Springfield, Mass., from 1847 to 1851; Second Holyoke, from 1849 to 1852; Galena, Ill., from 1852 to 1856; Vinton, Ia., from 1856 to 1863; Dubuque, from 1863 to 1870. On leaving Dubuque, he removed to Rice, Peace Co., Kansas, where he resided without charge the remainder of his life. See Newton General Catalogue. (J. C. S.)

Chapin, Augustus Lyman, a Prebost, was born at Springfield, Mass., Jan. 16, 1755. He prepared for college at West Springfield Academy, Ab- bany, N.Y.; graduated at Yale College in 1817; was taught at Georgetown, D.C.; entered Princeton Theological Seminary in 1819, and remained there two years and two months. He was licensed by the New Brunswick Presbytery, Oct. 2, 1822; was a missionary at Manches- ter, N.Y., and vicinity, in Ontario County, from December, 1822, to October, 1823; was stated supply at Clark- son, at Madison, and at Wolcott, after which, from seek-ness, he was laid aside for three years. He was ordained at Oxford, N. Y., Sept. 30, 1830, as an evangelist for the General Conference; sent to supply there, 1839-40; at Walton, 1831-33; and at Lexington, New York, Sept. 19, 1839.
After this he served the churches in Galway, West Turin, and Leyden, residing at Amsterdam, from whence he removed to Illinois, and died at Galesburg, Nov. 7, 1878. See Necrological Report of Princeton
Theol, Sem., 1877, p. 15.
Chapin, D. Hubbell, D.D., an eminent Universalist minister and lecturer, was born in Union Village, Washington Co., N. Y., Dec. 29, 1814. His parents, who were of New England origin, removed to Bennington, Vt., while he was yet a boy, and he received his early education at the Bennington Seminary. After completing the course prescribed in that institution, he began the study of law in Troy, N. Y. This, however, he soon abandoned, and, removing to Utica, he undertook the duties of assistant editor of The Magazine and Advocate, a periodical devoted to the interests of Universalism. About this time he appears to have determined upon entering the ministry, and in 1837 he was ordained, and began to preach in Richmond, Va., where he was pastor of a congregation composed of both Unitarians and Universalists. Mr. Chapin remained in Richmond until 1840, when he removed to Charlestown, Mass. After six years' service in the latter place, in 1847, he accepted an invitation to become pastor of the Second Universalist Church in that city.
This appointment was soon followed by a call to the Fourth Universalist Church in Providence, R. I., which he filled for a term of years. On account of his health, he removed to New York, where he resided for some years, and in 1854 he was called to the pastorate of the church in Catskill, N. Y. He was also protinental minister of the church in Rome, N. Y.
In 1865 he removed to Kansas City, Mo., where he continued to reside until his death in 1883. Mr. Chapin was a strong, powerful man, almost six feet in height. He weighed over two hundred pounds when in good health. His broad face and firmly set mouth indicated vigor of intellect and earnestness of purpose. He wore a beard, which was almost white, and his upper lip was shaven. His hair was brown, and his eyes were a light gray.
He published several volumes of Sermons, and among his other printed works are, Crowns of Thrones; a Token for the Suffering (1869); Discourses on the Lord's Prayer (1850); Duties of Young Women (1855); Duties of Young Women (1863); Hours of Communion (1844); Humanity in the City—Discourses on the Book of Proverbs (1867); The Beatitude in the Gospels: and he also compiled, with J. G. Adams, Hymns for Christian Devotion (new edition, 1870). See

Amer. Authors, v. v.; Men of the Times, v. v.
Chapin, Harvey (1), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Tyringham, Mass., Oct. 2, 1787.
He removed with his parents, at the age of nine, to Paris,
N. Y., where he was converted in his eighteenth year.
He began exhorting four years later; was ordained dea-on in 1818, elder in 1826, and in 1832 entered the Black River Conference. He died Sept. 14, 1861. Mr. Chain possessed tender sensibilities, a warm, sympathetic heart, sound understanding, and a large stock of energy.
See Minutes of Conferences, 1826-36.
Chapin, Harvey (2), a Presbyterian minister, was born in the state of New York in 1798. In 1843 he was licensed by Wyoming Presbytery, and stationed at Lancaster Presbyterian Church. In 1855 he removed to the state of Missouri, and organized a Presbyterian Church in the town of Owatonna, over which he was pastor for several years. He removed to Tipton, Mo., in 1865.
On July 29, 1866, his residence was burned, and he perished in the flames. See Wilson, Preb. Hist. Almanac, 1869, p. 77.
Chapin, Jason, a Congregational minister, was born in New Hampshire in 1801. He graduated at Amherst College in 1828, and at Andover Theological Semiinary in 1831; and was ordained Sept. 26 of that year.
He labored first as a home missionary, and then became stated supply at Madison, O., until 1853; at Jefferson, in 1834, and thereafter at West Church, Farmington, at the same time teaching, until his death in 1846. See Tien, Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 92.
Chapin, Joel, a Presbyterian minister, graduated at Dartmouth College in 1791, at the age of thirty.
After a short time as a missionary at New York, N. Y., for a considerable time, he was installed pastor of the Church in that place in 1798, and died there in 1845.
Although feeble in health, he was fervent in piety, and eminently skilled in transacting ecclesiastical business. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pal-pit, iv, 141.
Chaplin, John Marvin, a Congregational minister, was born at Springfield, Mass., May 15, 1844. He prepared for college at Western Academy, and was ordained at the Williston Seminary, under Rev. Henry M. Colton, of Middletown, Conn., and in 1868 graduated at Yale College. For a short time he was clerk in an insurance office in Springfield, but soon after was engaged to preach in North Blandford. In June, 1872, he graduated at the Theological Institute of Connecticut, and then received a call to the church at Springfield, where he was ordained and installed pastor, June 19 following. He died there, Oct. 25, the same year. See Cong. Quarterly, 1873, p. 439.

Chaplin, Pelatiah, A.M., a Baptist minister, was born in 1747 at Belcher, Mass., and at the age of twenty-one became a member of a Congregational Church. Subsequently he was ordained pastor of the Congregational Church in Windsor, Vt., where he remained about ten years, and then for several years preached in various places in Vermont, Maine, and New Hampshire. In 1806 he became a Baptist, and was reordained June 11 of that year. He continued to labor in different places until about two years before his death, which took place at Compton, N.H., May 22, 1888. Although in his youth he was not favored with opportunities of acquiring a finished education, yet he later improved his time and talents for the acquisition of knowledge. (J.C.S.)

Chapin, Seth, a Congregational minister, was born in Massachusetts. He graduated at Brown University in 1808, and spent more than two years in Andover Seminary. He was ordained Jan. 1, 1812; was pastor at Hillock, N.H., from 1812 to 1816; occasional preacher at Bowley, Mass., Mansfield, Conn., etc., from 1816 to 1819; pastor at Hanover, Mass., from 1819 to 1824; stated supply at East Haddam, Conn., in 1825; at Hunter, N. Y., from 1825 to 1827; at Attleboro, Mass., for a time; at West Granville, from 1823 to 1833; was without charge from 1835 to 1842; and pastor at Fow- ridle, R. I., from 1842 until his death there, April 19, 1850. See Trin. Cut. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 20.

Chapin, Walter, a Congregational minister, was born at West Springfield, Mass., in 1779. He attended the Western Academy, and graduated at Middlebury College in 1803. For a year thereafter he was preceptor of the Royatton Academy; and in 1804 and 1805 was tutor at Middlebury College. He afterwards studied theology under Rev. Dr. Lathrop of West Springfield; served as missionary in northern Vermont, and, from 1810, as pastor in Woodstock, Vt.; for seven years, was secretary of the Vermont Domestic Missionary Society; from 1822 to 1827 belonged to the corporation of Middlebury College; from 1821 to 1824 was editor of the Evangelical Mirror; and died July 22, 1827. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ii, 481.

Chapin, William Arms, a Congregational minister, was born at Newport, N. H., Dec. 8, 1790. He graduated at Dartmouth College in 1816; taught several years in Virginia; was licensed in 1821, and preached at Craftsbury, Vt., from 1821 to 1827, and at Greensboro from 1829 until his death, Nov. 27, 1860. Mr. Chapin was noted for his imperturbable calmness and for his soundness of judgment. As a preacher he was methodehical and slow, and in doctrine a strict Calvinist. See Cong. Quarterly, 1864, p. 158.

Chapin, William Wilberforce, a Congregational missionary, was born at Somers, Conn., Dec. 2, 1836. He graduated at Williams College in 1860, and at Andover Theological Seminary in 1863. He was immediately ordained at Somers, and sailed for India, where he rapidly acquired the language, and was assigned a station at Pimplus, fifty miles from Ahmednugger. He died there March 22, 1865. See Cong. Quarterly, 1866, p. 89.

Chaplin, is (1) a priest who officiates in a collegiate or private chapel at a particular altar; (2) a cleric vicar or beneficiarius in a foreign cathedral; (3) the domestic preacher of a parsonage. An archbishop may have eight, a duke or bishop six, a viscount four, the lord chancellor, a baron, and K.G., three, a marquis or earl five, a dowager, the dean of the chapel, the master of the rolls, lord almoner, the lord treasurer, and secretary to the queen, each two; the lord chief-justice of the queen's bench and the warden of the cinque ports, each one. (4) Chaplains in ordinary to the queen and priests who serve in rotation as preachers in the chapel royal. The dean of St. Paul's, if a royal chaplain, or if no royal chaplain is present, presides at the opening of each new convocation.

The word chaplain designated an assistant priest, and generally an officiating priest. Their annual wage was six marks, in the 14th century. They were called vice-curates, in absence of the parish priest; the assistant curate was properly called a conduct. They were removable by the rector.

Chaplains at Pisa are divided into two classes: (a) thirty-two participants in the daily distribution, wearing a violet robe, and called chaplains of the Quinterno, from the name of the register-book. They form a college called the Chaplains' University, which is presided over by four superintendents, and has its own chancery seal and buildings. (b) Twenty simple chaplains, without order, or diacuus, wearing a cowl or hood, and a black cloak over the left shoulder; they do not attend the hours, and are incapable of promotion into the staff of the cathedral, but simply serve chantries.

CHAPLAINS, MILITARY (Aumôniers d'Armée). St. Boniface, in his first council in Germany, ordered that every commander should keep a priest to shrieve his soldiers on the eve of a battle. In the time of Charlemagne, and before the battle of Hastings, it was the custom of the soldiers to pray and communicate the terrors before an engagement. In nearly all Christian nations chaplains are a regular part of the army staff.

Chaplain, John Francis, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Trappe, Talbot Co., Md., Oct. 16, 1824. He graduated at Dickinson College in 1846, and was soon afterwards converted. Leaving prospects of great promise in secular pursuits, he began to labor for the Lord. In 1882 he joined the Philadelphia Conference, in which he spent his life, serving clever of its best pastors, and one term as presiding elder. He was a delegate to the General Conference in 1875, and was chosen as a reserve delegate three times. He died Aug. 7, 1880. In learning and ability he took a prominent place; yet conscientious that he was not the time on studies other than those relating to the kingdom of God and the spiritual life. His preaching was scriptural, methodical, and simple. His ministry was a labor of love, and his death-scene most glorious. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1881, p. 73.

Chaplet. It was anciently the practice of some churches to crown the newly baptized with a chaplet or garland of flowers.

Chaplin, Alexander, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, was born at Barnhill, parish of Bervie, March 17, 1714. He took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1732, and was licensed to preach in 1743; presented by the king to the living at Kinnell in 1754, and ordained. He died May 6, 1813, leaving an Account of the Parish. See Fasti Eccles. Scotienses, iii, 801.

Chaplin, Benjamin, a Congregational minister, was born in that part of Pomfret, Conn., which is now called Hampden, Sept. 16, 1788. He graduated at Yale College in 1788, and was ordained pastor of St. John's Church in Sutton, Mass., with Rev. Dr. Hall; was ordained pastor of the Second Church in Sutton, now Millbury, Nov. 14, 1789, and was dismissed March 6, 1792. Subsequently he lived with his children, and finally died at Hardwick.
Chapman, Edward, an English Wesleyan preacher, was admitted to the ministry in 1804 at Cardif, became a superintendern at Croydon in 1840, and died
Dec. 9, 1856, in the eighty-sixth year of his age. He was of devout and godly character, and a man of fidelity to his duty. He died Dec. 9, 1856, in the eighty-sixth year of his age. He was of devout and godly character, and a man of fidelity to his duty.

Chapman, Abner W., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in New Cambridge, N. Y., June 9, 1812. He was left an orphan at the age of four, and wholly to his own discretion when fourteen, but acquired a good education. For some time he was principal of the preparatory school of Augusta College, Kentucky; afterwards master of a school in Vicksburg, Miss.; and finally president of a female institution, under the patronage of the Mississippi Conference. In 1835 he was licensed to preach; and in 1839 united with the Mississippi Conference, labored two years, and then located; again entered the effective ranks in 1849, and labored with great zeal and fidelity until his death, June 21, 1850. Mr. Chapman was diligent, greatly beloved, and eminently useful.
See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church
South, 1850, p. 308.

Chapman, A. H., a Cumberland Presbyterian min-est, son of Rev. Alexander Chapman, and brother of Rev. B. C. Chapman, pastor of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church in Selma, Ala. He was born Oct. 28, 1838. He was received by the Logan Presbytery, was licensed and ordained, and devoted himself mainly to itinerant preaching in the upper portion of his presbytery. He died Aug. 22, 1842, in Greene County, Tenn. See Beard, Biographical Sketches, 2d series, p. 173.

Chapman, Alexander (1), A.M., a Scotch cler-gyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1693, was licensed in 1705, and was called to the living at Moneylie in 1709, and to Dunbar in 1716, but the presbytery refused consent. He died Aug. 3, 1716, aged forty years. See Fasti Eccles. Scotici, p.
653.

Chapman, Alexander (2), a Cumberland Presbyterian minister, was born in Bucks County, Pa., Jan.
2, 1776. When he was twenty years old he removed with his parents to Tennessee. In 1805 he went to Kentucky, and was received by the Cumberland Presbytery as a candidate for the ministry, at the Red River Meeting House. In March, 1811, he was licensed by the new Cumberland Presbytery, which met for the first time at Big Spring, Wilson Co., Tenn. He was ordained Oct. 17, 1811, by Jeremiah, Louisa Co., Ky., in abdomino, 1813. Under instructions from the Missionary Board he went to Illinois, in 1820, preaching in Gallatin, White, Wayne, and Edwards counties. Mr. Chapman was one of the missionaries sent by the General Assembly, in 1831, to western Pennsylvania, and labored there about two months, but returned for a short time in 1832. He died Sept. 15, 1834. See Beard, Biographical Sketches, 2d series, p. 148.

Chapman, Benjamin, a Congregational minister, was a graduate of Princeton College. He was ordained March 17, 1756, and settled over the Congregational Church at Southington, Conn. He was dismissed from his charge Sept. 29, 1774, but continued to reside in Southington until his death, June 22, 1786. See Alexander, Princeton College in the 18th Century.

Chapman, Daniel, an English Wesleyan minister, was born in Sheffield in 1799. At the age of fifteen he united with the Church. Through the help of James Montgomery, the poet, and others, he was educated at Edinburgh University, where he honorably acquitted himself. On leaving the university, in 1826, he was appointed to the church in Aberdeen, in 1826;
He died, after much suffering, Nov. 10, 1856. He was a man of blandness of manners, kindness, high sense of honor, piety, and many eccentricities. His sermons were original, but unduly exuberant in language. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1857.

Chapman, Edward, an English Wesleyan preacher, was admitted to the ministry in 1804 at Cardif,
became a superintendern at Croydon in 1840, and died
Dec. 9, 1856, in the eighty-sixth year of his age. He was of devout and godly character, and a man of fidelity to his duty. He died Dec. 9, 1856, in the eighty-sixth year of his age. He was of devout and godly character, and a man of fidelity to his duty.

Chapman, Epaphras, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Connecticut. He graduated from Yale College in 1816; studied theology for more than a year at Princeton Theological Seminary, and was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, April 6, 1820, to evangelize the Indians on the Arkansas
Sem. 1881, p. 22.

Chapman, Ezekiel I., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Saybrook, Conn., Aug. 28, 1781. He was educated at Yale College, and during his course there was converted and united with the college church.
In 1801 he joined the Congregational Association, and entered upon his labors as an evangelist in Ohio. In 1804 he was called to the First Presbyterian Church in East Bloomfield, N. Y., and he subsequently labored in the churches of Lima, Bristol, Livonia, Lebanon, Manlius, and Oneida Lake, all within the state of New York.
He died at Oneida Lake, Madison Co., Aug. 1, 1866.
See Wilson, Pref. Hist. Alabama, 1868, p. 78.

Chapman, Frederic William, a Congregational minister, was born at Canfield, Trumbull Co., O., Nov.
17, 1806. He graduated from Yale College in 1828, and from Yale Theological Seminary in 1832; and was pastor of the Church in Stratford, Conn., from 1832 to 1839, at Deep River until 1839, and at South Glastonbury for the next four years. From 1839 to 1863 he was principal of the high-school at Exeter, acting pastor of the Church at West Stafford from 1856 to 1861, and at Bolton from 1861 to 1864. In the last-named year he became acting pastor of the Union Church, East Hampton, from which he went in 1866 to the Church at Prospect. In 1867 he removed to Rocky Hill, where he resided, without charge, until his death, July 21, 1876. He was a diligent associate and founder of the Historical Society of New England, and published, Genealogy of the Chapman Family (1854)—A Genealogy of the Pratt Family (1864)—A Genealogy of the Trubridge Family (1872)—A Genealogy of the Buckingham Family (ed.): A Genealogy of the Colt Family (1877)—A Genealogy of the Bulkely Family (1875). He was a member of the New England Genealogical Society, Connecticut Historical Society, New Haven Colony Historical Society, and Buffalo Historical Society. See Cong. Quarterly, 1877, p. 412.

Chapman, George, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1764; appointed to the living at Kinfuans in 1765, and ordained; kept an academy for young men, and died Oct. 50, 1795, aged fifty-six years.
He was a man "who had kindness of heart, integrity of conduct, gentleness of manners, cheerfulness of temper, and liberality of spirit." He published An Account of the Parish, and edited Original Essays and 646.

Chapman, George T., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, of the diocese of Massachusetts, resided in Pittsfield in 1854; was officiating minister in 1857 at Lee, where he remained until 1859, when he removed to Newburyport, residing there during the rest of his life. He died Oct. 18, 1872, aged eighty-

Chapman, James (1), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, a native of Inverness, took his degree of A.M. at Aberdeen, in 1695; was licensed to preach in 1696;
presented to the curacy of Calder the same year, and ordained;
transferred to Cromdale in 1702, and died Dec. 30, 1717, aged about sixty-three years. He wrote a History of the Branch, Family of Grant, which is prefixed to a work of the same name.

Chapman, James (2), a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born at Elizabethtown, N. J., May 15, 1786. His early education was acquired at the academy of the Rev. Dr. Barry, and subsequently he graduated from Princeton College. He pursued a theological course under the Rev. Dr. Hobart, afterwards bishop of New York; was ordained deacon in 1807, and was immediately engaged as assistant to the rector of Trinity Church, New York city, continuing in this relation until he accepted a call from Peter's, Perth Amboy, N. J. In the following year he was ordained priest, and continued to serve St. Peter's until 1842, when he resigned. For twenty years he was a member of the Standing Committee, for a still longer period the treasurer of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, and was frequently a delegate to the General Convention. During the latter years of his life he officiated gratuitously in Trinity Church, Woodbridge. He died at Perth Amboy, April 6, 1857. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1857, p. 310.

Chapman, James Dyer, a Congregational minister, was born at Columbia, Conn, in 1739. He graduated from Yale College in 1760, and from the Yale Divinity School in 1766. From September, 1768, he supplied the Church in Prospect, Conn. After preaching for a few years in different places without settlement, he was ordained pastor of the Church in Wolcott, Oct. 25, 1787, and remained until Nov. 4, 1840. His strong, outspoken anti-slavery principles aroused prejudice against him on the part of some of the community. The last ten years of his life he preached in Cummington, Mass., where he died, Dec. 19, 1854. See Hist. of Wolcott, p. 200.

Chapman, Jedediah, a Presbyterian pioneer minister, was born at Hadam, Conn, Sept. 27, 1741. He graduated at Yale College in 1767, and in 1766 he was licensed and installed as pastor of the Church in Orange, N. J. He adhered to the cause of American liberty during the Revolutionary War. In 1780 he was appointed missionary to western New York, and removed to Geneva, where he passed the remainder of his life, being installed pastor there in 1812. He died May 22, 1813. He published five Sermons on Baptism. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 95.

Chapman, John, B.D., an English missionary to India, was born in 1816. He graduated at St. John's College, Cambridge, in 1839, and was subsequently elected to a fellowship in that college, which he resigned in 1840, and was sent out by the Church Missionary Society to take charge of the Cottayam College in Travancore. After ten years of efficient service, greatly elevating the character of the institution, he removed to Madras, to the supervision of the Church Missionary Seminary in that city, and health obliged him in 1856 to return to his native land. Soon after his arrival he was appointed secretary of the society, which position he held till his death, at Islington, England, Dec. 27, 1862. Mr. Chapman contributed largely to the theological literature of the day, and in 1861 published a very able Account to the Essays and Reviews. See Appleton's Annual Cyclopaedia, 1862, p. 695.

Chapman, Joseph (1), an English Wesleyan missionary, was converted at an early age, travelled one year in the ministry in England, was sent in 1817 to the West Indies, and died at Tortola, July 21, 1821. See Minutes of the Brit. Conference, 1822.

Chapman, Joseph (2), an English Wesleyan minister, was converted at the age of twenty, commenced to travel in the ministry in 1810, and labored for six years, when bodily affliction compelled him to desist from active work. He died Sept. 20, 1825.

Chapman, Joseph Miller, an English Baptist minister, was born at Frome, Jan. 8, 1801. In early life he united with the Baptist Church in his native place, and entered upon a career of preparatory study at the Charles College in 1829, on coming home was as- signed as pastor of the Church in Hilsdale, Gloucestershire, about two years, and then accepted a call to Yeovil, where he was ordained, Oct. 26, 1825. In the midst of his usefulness he died, in the fall of 1842. See (English) Baptist Magazine, 1842, p. 569-572. (J. C. S.)

Chapman, Josephus, an English Congregational minister, was born at Greenhithe, in 1791. He joined the Church in 1797, became a diligent Sunday school teacher and a zealous tract distributor; received his collegiate education as a non-resident student at Hoxton College, and was ordained at Ashford about 1816. After three years he removed to Hunsome-caeus, Sussex; subsequently labored seven years at Bromyard, Herefordshire; a few years as traveling agent for the British and Foreign Sailors' Society, and finally at Ramsgate, where he died, May 8, 1873. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1874, p. 517.

Chapman, Lewis, a Scotch clergyman, had a bursary for study at the Glasgow University, and studied also at Edinburgh and Leyden; was licensed to preach in 1726, and presented to the living at Alvie in Kinghorn in 1738. He removed to Petty in 1788, and died Aug. 19, 1741, aged thirty-five years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticæ, iii, 229, 270.

Chapman, Nathan, a Baptist minister, was born in October, 1797. He was converted at the age of twenty, and in 1830 was ordained at East Ware, N. H. During the forty-five years of his ministerial work he was pastor of his church in Westfield, Mass. His last settlement was in Barnstable. In 1845 on account of feeble health, he withdrew to Dedham, where he died, Aug. 11, 1888. See The Watchman, Aug. 28, 1888. (J. C. S.)

Chapman, Nathaniel, a Congregational minister, was born at Exeter, N. H., in 1789. He removed to Mt. Vernon, Me., in 1800; graduated at Bangor Theological Seminary in 1803, and was ordained pastor of the Church in Bristol, Me., in 1824, where he remained until 1883. His other charges were as follows: in Maine: Boothbay, 1833; Camden, 1835; Warren, 1852; Thorndike, Freedom, and Pittston, 1856; where he died, April 1, 1868. He was a man of sound judgment and unassuming spirit; his preaching was earnest in the practical. See Cong. Quarterly, 1859, p. 97.

Chapman, Philip, an English Wesleyan missionary, was appointed to Jamaica, W. I., in 1886, after having spent two years at the Theological Institution. He died May 17, 1848, aged thirty-three years. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1848; Blyth, Roman Without Fiction, p. 518.

Chapman, Richard, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Hatfield, Hertfordshire, in 1815. He was converted when thirteen; was accepted as a candidate for the ministry in 1888; spent three years at the Theological Institution at Hoxton; was ordained 1848; was appointed two years later the first Methodist missionary to the seamen on the Thames, and died Dec. 19, 1885. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1871, p. 22.

Chapman, Robert Hett, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, son of Rev. Jedediah Chapman, was born at Orange, N. J., March 2, 1771. He graduated at New Jersey College in 1789, and, after studying with his father, was licensed to preach by the New York Presbytery in 1796. In 1796 he became pastor at Neshaminy, Pa., and in 1801 at Cambridge, Vt. In 1811 he was elected president of the University of North Carolina, and resigned that position in 1817, after which he was pastor of Bethel Church, Va., and in 1823 removed to the vicinity of Winchester. In 1830 he settled at Covington, Tenn. He died June 18, 1835. Dr. Chapman published only a few Sermons. See Sprague, Annales de l'Amer. Fulgisii, ii. 95.

Chapman, Thomas, D.D., LL.D., an English clergymen, was born at Bilingham, Durham County, in 1717. He was educated at Richmond School, in Yorkshire, and afterwards obtained a fellowship at Christ College, Cambridge, in 1741. In 1746 he was chosen master of Magdalene College. In 1748 he served as vice-chancellor, and was appointed one of his majesty's chaplains. In 1749 he was rector of Kirby-over-Blower, in Yorkshire. In 1750 he was presented by the king to a prebendal stall in the cathedral of Durham, and in 1758 was appointed official to the dean and chapter.
He died at Cambridge, June 9, 1780. His principal production is an Essay on the Roman Senate (1780). See Climisars, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Chapman, William (1), a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1698; called to the living at Glen-islav in 1699; ordained in 1700, and died in 1717. See Pasti Eccles. Scotican, iii, 748.

Chapman, William (2), an English Independent, son of the Rev. Samuel Chapman, of Yoxford, Suffolk, was educated by his father, by Mr. Richard Frankland, and at the Ruthmell Academy. About the year 1699 he was chosen first pastor of the Church at Lower Bother-ham, where he remained till 1703, but removed to Green in 1703, and died there in 1738. He was a man of great learning and piety, and an excellent preacher. See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, iv, 368.

Chapman, William (3), an English Congregational minister, born in 1777, was brought up to business in London. He early devoted himself to the ministry, was educated at the College of Newport-Pagnell, and ordained pastor of the Independent Church at Sandwich, Kent, Oct. 30, 1800. A few years afterwards he began to preach in the chapel in Greenwich Road, of which he was constituted pastor, March 29, 1808. He died July 26, 1848. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-

Chapman, William (4), an English Methodist preacher, and one of the pioneers in the New Connection, was born in 1767, and was converted in early life.
He entered the ministry at the age of twenty, travelled for twenty-three years in eighteen circuits, his services being acceptable and useful. He became a superintemerary in 1831. In 1829 he was president of the Conference. His last residence was Sowood, Stainland, Halifax, where he died, June 4, 1872. See Minutes of the Conference.

Chapman, William H., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Maryland. He was converted in early life, and in 1821 joined the Baltimore Conference, in which he served the Church with diligence and considerable success until his death, April 24, 1828. Mr.
Chapman was plain in his manners, searching and pow-eful in his appeals, energetic in duty, and devout in life. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1829, p. 37.

Chapman, William Rogers, a Congregational minister, was born in Maine in 1812. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1837, studied theology in Andover Theological Seminary, and graduated from the theological department of Yale College in 1841.
He was ordained by the New Haven Association, of that year, to the pastorate of the Centre Street Church, Boston, Mass., until 1847, and from 1844, in connection with Green Street Church; of Eighth Street Church, New York city, from 1847 to 1849; of the Presbyterian Church of Aurora, N.Y., from 1850 to 1854; and stated supply at Hanover, Mass., thereafter, until his death, Oct. 25, 1853. See Trum. Cut. of Andover Theol. Sem., 1857, p. 149.

Chaponel (D'Aussicourt), Raymond, a French theologian and Augustinian monk, was born in 1636. He was canon of the congregation of Sainte-Genevieve, and priest-pastor of Saint-Eloy de Roissy. He died Nov.
29, 1700, leaving L'Usage de Cultiver le Seruice Divin en Langue non Vulgaire (Paris, 1687, 12mo);—Histoire des Chanoines (ibid. 1699, 12mo);—Examen des Voies intérieures (ibid. 1700, 12mo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chaput, Jean, a French theologian of the order of St. Francis, a native of Châlons, in Burgundy, died Feb. 27, 1741, in the Charter-house of St. Michel de Paul (Nancy, 1621). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chaput, Pierre, a French martyr, was proof-reader to a printer in Paris. He went through France with copies of the Holy Scripture, which he distributed among the people. His great zeal caused him to be apprehen-sed in Paris, July 27, 1620, by Andreaul, being a great friend of the churches and comissionaries, he promptly rendered an account of his faith.
He was examined by three Sorbonne doctors. MM. Nicolas Clerici, John Picard, and Nicolas Maillard, and was condemned to be burned in Paris in 1546. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 402.

Chappell, John, a distinguished member of the Methodist Protestant Church, was born in Gloucestershire, England, April 23, 1763, and died in 1842. He was educated and prepared to be a teacher and children to Philadelphia, June 15, 1795. Having filled the offices of class-leader, steward, member of the book committee, and delegate to the annual and general conferences, he died Oct. 23, 1838, at the age of eighty-eight, full of grace. See Colhounder, Founders of the Methodist Church, p. 392.

Chappell, John B., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Lincoln County, Ga., in 1789. He was brought up by a godly mother; was converted in 1812; entered the army in 1814; at the close of the war became a local preacher, and finaally, in 1819, entered the South Carolina Conference, wherein he laboured with much acceptance and success.
He died Oct. 21, 1855. See Minutes of Annual Con-fences of the M. E. Church South, 1855, p. 623.

Chappuis, Jean Samuel, a Swiss Congregational minister, was born July 16, 1805, at Rivaz, near Lake Geneva. He received his education at the Veyvay College, the Academy of Lausanne (1824), and Heidelberg.
His first work in the ministry was as curate at Mont-treux and Basel (1833). In 1835 he went to Berlin, to prepare himself for the post of theological professor in his native canton, and in 1838 was appointed to the chair of systematic theology in the Academy of Lausanne. The thesis he wrote on this occasion, L'ancien Testament Considéré dans ses Rapports avec le Christia-nisme (1838), is a masterly production, bringing out into great prominence the pedagogic character of the old economy. When the revolution occurred in Vaud in 1845, M. Chappuis quit his post, and at once set about forming the Free Church. As soon as this infant Church had determined to have a faculty of theology, M. Chappuis was appointed professor of systematic theology and of New Test. exegesis. This important post he held till his death, April 8, 1870. M.
Chappuis, in profile, closely resembled Calvin; he posessed also many of the qualities which distinguished the great Reformer. Although professor of systematic theology for twenty years, he had no complete system of theology, properly so called. He believed that Christianity must be approached by the path of moral experience. The great point is to be in living relation with Christ. We are not saved by dogmas, but by a living being. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1871, p. 308; Lichtenstein, Histoire des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.;
And the Life of Chappuis, by Monastier and Rambert (Lausanne, 1871).

Chapter. We add some further particulars on this subject:

"As properly applied to a cathedral, this term denotes a sacred congregation of persons, set apart for the worship of God, and being composed of a number of curchieries and other churches, and forming the coun-}l of the president of the foundation, from whom, as their head (aspic), the chapter (capitulum) derives its name. As monks and canons regular had their chapters, so when secular canons had their common table divided into several sections, they were called chapter or "little heads," as the bishop was the principal head. The monks and regulars are also known through this practice of holding meetings of the little chapter, a portion of their rule, in their assembly, about the 7th century, when the canons in the capitulari of Chartresmagne and the Councils of Aix and Mayence, instead of the older term 'congregation,' employed by St. Benedict and bishop Ju- lian, to express a church council was a chapter; a convent was a chapter, and a college an inferior church with its members living in common. Chapter meetings were not to be held less than three persons. Usually it assembled every Saturday, and then was often called a parliament; now it meets ordinarily in the fall or in the summer. A chapter was formed in the 15th century at Lincoln that the dean brought armed followers into chapter. At Eton it was convened four times a year. In the new foundations, fortnightly chapters are enjoined. The "chapter," a line of chairs, the library, the books of the chapter. Its members are canons, including a warden in choir and a vote in chapter, with prebends, a foundation and estate, and the right of a common seal, being under their head, and convened by the sound of a bell. Absent canons are represented by proxies. It can enact statutes, which must be ratified by the visitor, and has all the rights of a parish; and before it and the dean all members of the body are to be tried. It forms the bishop's council, and machinery in the diocese in case of its vacancy or of a see's vacant see through episcopal jurisdiction. There are two kinds of chapters:

1. A close chapter, where the number of members is limited.

2. The lesser or ordinary chapter, composed of residentiaries only, at least two thirds of the number, andmeeting under the dean.

A very extraordinary chapter, consisting of all the canons, resident or non-resident, convened by the bishop. It was also called the fourteen chapter, because it met at Whitewall, and continued to do so at Salisbury until 1531. At Hereford it is convoked twice a year; and at Chichester, and in other cathedrals, it is still convoked on special occasions. Sometimes there were two regular chapters in one church, as at St. Ambrose, Milan, and St. Augustine's, Pavia, each having its own subchapter. At St. Paul's and at Reims, there were collective chapters, as at Bath and Wells, Lichfield and Coventry, Hamburg and Bremen.

CHAPTER, MONASTIC. This had been held in winter after tierce, but after prime in summer. At the sound of a bell, rung by the prior, the monks entered two and two, and bowed to a cross in the centre of the room, to the superior's chair, and to another. The ordinary business transacted comprised reading the martyrology, announcement of coming festivals, reading the rule, or, on Sundays and holy-days, a homily of the fathers, commemoration of the departed, and nomination of celebrants and the officiating priest for the week ensuing, public confession of faults, infliction of penance and discipline, and once a year recital of charters. The novice was admitted in chapters; the superior was elected, and the great officers of the house confirmed in their office; the investiture of the library was also carefully inspected in chapter every Lent. In the secular chapter, held after prime, all business connected with the church, the services, and lands was transacted, and all disputes determined. Every canon had his voice in chapter, and his stall in choir. In 1279 there were two general archidioecesan chapters and four quarterly diocesan chapters held yearly in England.

CHAPTER, THE LITTLE. See CAPITULAE.

CHAPTER-HOUSE. The following details further illustrate this subject:

"The conventional or capitular parliament-house, rare in France and Germany, was used by the clergy, and on every Saturday by the secular canons. In it also the canons',Priests and deacons, toward the end of the anniversary of the baptism a.s. or diocesan synod. It derived its name from the little chapters or rubrics of the statutes being read over in it in the monasteries and parishes. At Valle battle, the purpose for the theological lecture stood in it until recently. In the 9th century, the north aisle served for the purpose of the capitular of the church of St. Giles, but in the 14th century a separate building was erected at Fountainebleau, and Edward the Confessor built one of a circular form at Westminster. The chapter-house in a convent was almost invariably an oblong, sometimes terminating in an apex, and round or polygonal in a secular establishment. The latter form may have been suggested by the column with the radiating arcade which is a part of the transverse of a chapel, apsidal crypt, or by the Italian baptistery, in which canons or clerks were sometimes held. The rectangular form was preferred, however, for more consistent light, stronger cooling, as the polygonal was for synodal meetings, conversed by the bishop and canons, but not in real exceptions; at Exeter, where the chapter-house is oblong, and the Beneditines were replaced by canons; at Wells, Lincoln, Lichfield, Southwell, York, and Ely, this council-chamber stands the same; at Oxford, and in the chapter-house of St. Davids, it is in an upper story, adjoining the transept. In the secular canons' chapter-house a large crucifix stood in the centre, near a pulpit for sermons and reading, and stalls were ranged round the sides of the walls; the dignitaries occupying the east end, and the canons sitting in order of installation, reckoning from the east to the west. In the Benedictine houses the walls were generally arced to form stalls, and a large coffer, called the trunck, was placed at the entrance, as the place of offenders. The abbot's or prior's chair was at the east end, and a monk, who applied to him for the case, could not say his breviary or recite his psalms, or otherwise reverence. The apse of the chapter-house possibly contained an altar, since the building was regarded as only accessible by the canons, and a light was never kept in it, and before the door. At Tregre the altar remains, and at St. Albans a portion of the Holy Sepulchre lies in the usual position of the apse. At Belvoir and St. Paul's it stood in the centre of the cloisters. At Bristol, Exeter, Beverley, Lincoln, and Chester, and large rooms with a central hall and windows opening eastward, is built in front of the chapter-house, in order to afford additional accommodation to the canons and other orders. The Cistercians had sermons in the chapter-house; and, like the other regular orders, admitted novices, unless the chapter-house was cut down. In the diocese of Bath and Wells, the new chapter-house was built under the direction of Abp. Bathurst, and in it the usual place of the altar. At Winchester the chapter-house is the same as in the Benedictine houses, and in the chapter-house of the abbey church, and a door was left open on the chapter-house east end.

Chapter (or Conventual) Mass is the high mass of the day, usually sung before 10 A.M. in Franciscans and Dominicans.

Chapuzae, Samuels, a Swiss Protestant divine, was born at Geneva of a poor family originally from Poitiers. After practicing as a physician, he was appointed preceptor and governor in the royal family. He died at Zell in 1701, leaving a Traité de la Mathématique de Préciser, and several geographical works, among them Tavernier's Voyages (1882). See Boise, Gen. Biog. Dict. a. v.

Charak Pujah is one of the most popular festivals in Eastern India. It is held in honor of Siva (q.v.), in his character of Maha Kali, or Time, the great destroyer of all things; and by association of thought the godess Kali (q.v.) has come to occupy a most conspicuous place in this annual festival. The name of the festival is derived from the disk, or wheel, through which the circle performed in the rite of Siva lingam, which forms so prominent a part of the observances. An upright pole, twenty or thirty feet in height, is planted in the ground. Across the top of it, moving freely on a pin or pivot, is placed horizontally a long beam. From one end of this beam hangs a dance (q.v.) and the other end, a second dance; and two houts affixed to it, which are fastened into the fleshy parts of the back of the devotee, while another rope at the opposite end of the beam serves to whirl the machine around, and carry the victim in a circle swiftly through the air. As this is an exercise of great merit to the devotee, he endures the torture as long as possible, usually from ten minutes to half an hour.
CHARALAMPEΣ

Thousands of these swinging posts are in operation at one time in Bengal. If the ligaments of the back of any one should prove too weak for the strain resulting from the very rapid motion, and the poor victim should be dashed in pieces, his violent death is considered by the spectators the just punishment of crimes committed in procuring the means of existence. On the equinoxes, these festively crowded carriages are carried on at these festivals, with the hope of obtaining the favor of their deity. See Duff, India and India Missions.

Charalampes (or Charilampes), Saint, is the name of two early Christian martyrs:

1. Bishop of Magnesia, who was stripped of his priestly attire and flayed alive. The prefect Lucian tried to tear him to pieces himself, but his own hands were by some accident cut off on the spot, and we are told that the saint prayed and made his persecutor whole. The licor Porphyrius, and Adametus, and three women who saw it, thercean believed, but the ungrateful prefect had them all beheaded. Charalampes is commemorated Feb 10, according to Basilius's Menology.

2. Martyr at Nicomedia, with Eusebius, Romans, Mentius, Christina, and many others, probably in the persecution of Diocletian. May 30 is the day assigned for his commemoration in Basilius's Menology.

Charan Das is one of the Vaishnava (q.v.) sects among the Hindus. It was instituted by Charan Das, a merchant of the Dhusar tribe, who resided at Delhi in the reign of the second Alemgir. They assert the pre-eminence of faith above every other distinction. They require no particular qualification of caste, order, or sex for their teachers; and they attach great importance to morality. Their doctrines are as follows: 1. not to lie; 2. not to revile; 3. not to speak harshly; 4. not to discourse idly; 5. not to steal; 6. not to commit adultery; 7. not to offer violence to any created thing; 8. not to imagine evil; 9. not to cherish hatred; 10. not to indulge in conceit or pride. These sectaries consist of two classes, the clerical and the secular. The latter are chiefly of the mercantile order; but the former lead a mendicant and ascetic life, and are distinguished by wearing yellow garments, a single streak of sandal-color down the forehead, a necklace and rosary of Tulasi beads, and a small pointed cap, around the lower part of which they wear a yellow turban. The authorities of the sect are the Sri Bhagavat and Gita.

Charashim (or Craftsman), Valley of. Lieutenant Conder suggests (Tent-work, ii, 315) that this name of a stream still lingers at Khubel Hirsha, a ruin on the edge of the great valley east of Lydian, in the general region indicated by the scriptural notices.

Charlandiel, in Jewish mythology, is an angel, ruler of the earth, who is six million times larger than other angels. He continually irradiates light in twelve brilliant rays.

Chardin, Jean, a famous French Oriental traveller, was born at Paris, Nov. 16, 1643. While yet scarcely of age he went to the East Indies to buy diamonds. From Surat he went to Persia, and remained six years at Isaphan. In 1670 he returned home, but went from thence to Persia to the Indus, where, as well as in India, he remained until 1681. After his return he was knighted by Charles II of England, and was sent as plenipotentiary of England and agent of the Anglo-East-Indian Company to Holland. He died at London, Jan. 25, 1713. He is the author of a highly moral book, Voyage en Orient (Venice, 1686; Paris, 1710; 3 vols.). See Lichtenberger, Encyclopedia des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Litt., i, 152; Ross, Gen. Biog. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. F.)

Chardon, Charles (or Claude) Mathias, a French theologian, was born at Ivoi-Carigian, Lorraine, Sept. 22, 1653. He took the vows of the reformed order of St. Benedict, July 3, 1712, in the Abbey of St. Vanne, at Verdun. He taught rhetoric, philosophy, and theology at Novi-Les-Moines, near Rehet; was acquainted with the schools of Hebrew, Syriac, and Greek; and had a profound knowledge of ecclesiastical history. He was dispossessed in 1730, because of his opposition to the bull Unigenitus, and died at St. Arnold de Metz, Oct. 20, 1771, leaving, *Histoire des Sacreries, a very elaborate work (Paris, 1745, 6 vols. 12mo; translated into Italian, Brussels, 1748, 3 vols. 4to);—Histoire des Variations dans la Trièdre de l'Eglise (MS.);—Contre les Incredibles Modernes (MS.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chardon (or Charidon), John, D.D., an English prelate, was educated at Exeter College, Oxford, and consecrated bishop of Down and Connor in 1596. He published a number of Sermons (1589-98). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Chardon (de Luyn), Zacharie, a French theologian, was born in 1614. His family was Protestant, but when quite young he became one of the pages of Louis XIV, and Bossuet effected his conversion to Catholicism. Chardon took orders, and was attached to the parish church of St. Sulpice. He died June 28, 1733, leaving Traité de la Religion Chrétienne (Paris, 1697, 2 vols. 12mo;—Recueil des Publications que les Ministres de Genève ont faites de l'Écriture Sainte (ibid. 1707, 12mo);—Nouvelle Méthode pour Réfuter l'Établissement des Églises Prétendues Réformées (ibid. 1731, 12mo);—Remarques Historiques sur l'Église de St. Sulpice (published in the Journal des Sercans, 1697, p. 179). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Charelli, Benvenetto, an Italian theologian, who lived in the first part of the 18th century, wrote Memorie Sacre Della Città di Messina (Messina, 1705, 4to). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Charentia, Charentinus, eighth bishop of Cologne, succeeded Dominian, and was followed by Erezegillus. The date assigned to him is 510, and he is commemorated by Fortunatus in an elegiac poem.

Charge is, in ecclesiastical terminology: (1) a sermon preached by the bishop to his clergy; (2) among the Dissenters, a sermon preached to a minister at his ordination, generally by some aged or able divine, and containing a view of the Christian ministry in its nature, duties, trials, and encouragements.

Charitho is the name of two or three noted persons in early Christian records:

1. One of the bishops addressed (A.D. 492) by Leo of Bourges, Victorius of Le Mans, and Eutocius of Tours, in a letter ordaining that, as the emperors have given the bishops the power of judging civil cases, ecclesiastics shall appeal to them, and never to lay judges, under pain of excommunication. The teaching of the letter was adopted in a council held at Angers the next year, in which Charitho took part (Tillemont, Mémoires, xvi, 594; Labbe, Concil. iii, 1420; iv, 1020).

2. A fourth-century Palestinian Martyrology as belonging to a martyr in Syria with Martin and Peter, March 5, and to a martyr at Rome, with Stercarius, Clement, Julian, Emeritus, etc., July 25.

Charicles was a priest in the 5th century, re-buried by St. Nilus of Sinai (Epist. iii, 245) for imposing a hard tax on an humble peasant named Faustinus, and refusing him absolution till they were performed.

Charilaeus, in Greek religious usage, was an annual festival. At Delphi a threatening famine had broken out, during which Charilia, a poor orphan, came to the king and begged for bread. As the king had already distributed all he had, he, in an angry mood, threw his shoe at the girl, upon which she hung herself in despair. But the magic name still had its influence, for several days made their appearance. Hereupon the Pythian priestess was sought for advice; her answer was that the plague would only subside when sacrifices of atonement should be offered to the shade of the murdered girl. This was done, and the evil disappeared. After that time the festivities were celebrated every nine years, in which the king took the lead, distributing provisions to natives and strangers, and finally threw some at the image of Charilaeus, together with his shoe, after which he had the figure buried with a rope around its neck.

Charimfros, Saint, bishop of Verdun, succeeded St. Aigulf in the bishopric in 508. He was referendarius to king Childerich II.

Chariotera. As the public games were considered by the early Church to be intimately associated with idolatry, or comprised in the pomp and service of the devil, which every Christian was expected to renounce at baptism, charioters were commanded to leave their calling or be refused baptism. In Spain, one afterwards returned to it, he was considered as renouncing his baptismal covenant, and thereupon discarded, as an apostate and relapsing from Christian communion. See Bingham, Christian Antiquities, bk. xi, ch. v; bk. xvi, ch. iv. The extensive prevalence of these heathen games accounts for the prominent mention of this class of profanes in the men who followed their vocation, as commoner or less disreputable, and had been excluded, even by Roman law, from most of the privileges of citizenship (Tertull. De Spectac., c. 22). It was, through the eager excitement which attended it, incompatible with meditation and prayer. See Constitut. Apostol., vii, 82. When the games of the circus were reproduced under Christian emperors, the rigor of the Church's discipline was probably relaxed.

Charis (grace), in the system of Valentinus, is an alternative name with Emmesa and Sige, for the consort of the primary Äon, Brython (Irenæus, i, 4). The name expresses that aspect of the absolute Greatness in which is represented not as a solitary monad, but as an imparting some of its perfection to beings of which it is the ultimate source; and this is the explanation given in the Valentinian fragment preserved by Ephraimian (Har. xxxi, 6). The use of the word Charis enabled Ptolemaeus (quoted by Irenæus, i, 8) to find in John i, 14 the first tetrad of Æons, viz., Pater, Monogenes, Charis, Aletheia. Charis has an important place in the system of Marcus (Irenæus, i, 18). The name Charis appears also in the system of Marcion (Irenæus, ii, 29), but as denoting a later emanation than that in the Valentinian system. The word has possibly also a technical meaning in the Ophite prayers preserved by Origen (Contra Celsum, vi, 81).

Charisai (or Al Harais), Jehuda ben Solomon, the Horace of Jewish poets, was born at Jerez, in Spain, about 1170, and bore also the Arabic name, Al-khafri. He travelled over many parts of Europe, and into the East, and died about 1200, probably at Granada. He was not only excelled as a poet, but also as a philologer, physician, and translator. He translated from the Arabic into Hebrew Mainmonides' commentary on the Sefer Zeraiem; the same author's introduction to the Mishna (German transl. by R. Fürstenhal, Breslau, 1842), and his Guide or ַּלִּכְּלָא אָלֶיעָל. His principal work is מִשָּׁה אֲלֵיה תָּלְקָד or Dirwan, which is not exactly an imitation or translation of Hariri's, though written in the style of the Arabic poet. The author describes human life in a multitude of its phases, relates his own adventures as a traveller, and takes a critical survey of Hebrew poetry. Portions of it had been translated into French by Ure (London, 1772); into German by Kämpf and Dukes; and into French by de Sacy. See *Fürst, Bibl. Charistia, in Greek mythology, were festivals in honor of the Charites or Graces, celebrated with dancing at night.

Charisius is the name of two early Christians:

1. Presbyter, and oecumenes of the Church of Philadelphia, who presented himself at the sixth session of the Council of Ephesus, July 24, 221, and laid before the assembled prelates an accusation against two pre-byters named Antonius and Jacobus, who, in 433 had visited Lydia with a commendatory letter from Anastasius and Photius, presbyters of Nestorian's party, and had induced the Lydians to sign a creed, of which Theodore of Mopsuestia was the author, excommunicating himself (Charisius) because he refused to accept it. Charisius laid the creed before the council, together with a list of those who had signed it, and their anathemas of their former errors. He also gave in a confession of his system, in perfect harmony with that of Nicea. The council condemned the creed produced, as full of Nestorian impiety, carefully abstaining, however, from naming theodore as its author. See Labbe, Concil. iii, 673-694: Cave, Hist. Lit., i, 74.

2. Bishop of Azatus, one of the subscribers to the Semi-arian Council of Seleucia (Ephiph. Har. laxiii, 874).

Charistorius. In the Valentinian fragment preserved by Ephraimian (Har. xxxi, 6), this name is given to one of five sons without consorts, whose gen-
CHARISTIA

ereation took place at a late point in the series of emanations.

Charistia was a festival of relatives among the Romans, celebrated Feb. 19. The whole family was then assembled, past differences and discords were laid aside, and the bonds of love and unity were made firmer.

Charitina (or Charitina) was a Christian martyr in the Diocletian persecution, commemorated in the Menology of Basil, Oct. 5 and Jan. 15. By some she is identified with the Catharine of whom Eusebius speaks (VIII, c. 14).

Charites. See GRACES.

Charitina and Charitfo were two early Christian martyrs. In the Acts of Justin Martyr we are told that they confessed Christ, and were scourged and beheaded.

Charitfo, a Greek monk, was raised to the patriarchate of Constantinople in 1177, under Manuel Comnenus, and occupied that see for eleven months. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.

Charity, martyr. See Caritas.

Charity, Charter of, the name given by pope Stephen to the constitutions which he drew up for the regulation and guidance of the Cistercian monks, when he united their monasteries into one body. See CISTERCIANS.

Charke, William, an English Puritan divine, was a fellow of Peterhouse College, Cambridge, in 1572, and was expelled from college in 1580. He published some theological tracts (1580, 1581). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, a. v.

Charles, Antoine, a French theologian and priest, was born in the parish of Puymaurin, diocese of Comminges, about 1630, and was educated at Toulouse. He became superior in the seminary of Pamiers, then adjunct of the ecclesiastical government of that diocese, and opposed the law which gave the kings of France the right to use the revenues of the vacant churches in certain cases. The parliament of Toulouse condemned the writings of Charles, but he escaped to Rome, where he died, April 7, 1691. His principal works are, Tractatus de Libertatibus Ecclesiae Gallicanae (Lyon, 1700, 8 vols.);—Causa Regalis Primiti Explicato (Liege, 1868, 4to). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.

Charles de Saint-Bernard, a French Feuillant monk, who was born in 1597, and died March 14, 1621, founded the monastery of Fontaine. His Life was published under the assumed name of Tournepene (Paris, 1622, 8vo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.

Charles de Saint-Paul, a French Church historian, died Sept. 15, 1644. His family name was Vidart. He became general of the Feuillants, and was appointed bishop of Avaraches in 1640. He wrote, Geographia Sacra (Paris, 1641; Rome, 1666, 8vo; Amsterdam, 1703):—Mémoires du Cardinal de Richelieu (Paris, 1640, 4to). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.

Charles, Claude, an artist of Lorraine, was born at Mures in 1661. He was rector of the academy of painting and sculpture of that city, and afterwards herald-at-arms and ordinary painter to duke Leopold. He worked nine years at Rome, under the direction of Carlo Maratti, and then, after residing for some time at Paris, came back to establish himself in his native city, where he died in 1747. Among his paintings are:—The Coronning of St. Sigibert and The Banquet of the Poor, both in the choir of the cathedral at Nancy; The Ascension of the Virgin, in the parish church of San Se-of the university in 1688, master of University College in 1692, and died Nov. 4, 1722. He contributed a Letter on the Death of Anthony Wood, to the Philosophical Transactions (1709). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Bibliog., s. v.; Le Neve, Pint., iii, 405, 598.

Charlevoix, Pierre François Xavier de, a French Jesuit and traveller, was born at Saint-Quentin, Oct. 29, 1682. He embarked at La Rochelle in July, 1720, for the missions at Canada; arrived at Quebec towards the end of September; went up the St. Lawrence river; made an excursion to Illinois, and descended the Mississippi River as far as its mouth, with the intention of going thence to St. Domingo; but his vessel was wrecked at the entrance to the Bahama Channel. He reached St. Domingo on a second voyage, in 1722, and returned to France in December of the same year. Having been selected to work upon the Journal de Trévoux, he accomplished his task in twenty-two years, with great success, and died at La Flèche, Feb. 11, 1761, leaving, Histoire et Description du Japon (Rouen, 1715, 3 vols.)—Histoire de la Ville de St. Domingue (Paris, 1730, 2 vols. 4to) —Histoire de la Nouvelle France (ibid. 1744, 4 vols. 4to) —Histoire de Paraguay (ibid. 1756, 3 vols. 4to) —La Vie de la Mère Marie de l'Incarnation (ibid. 1724). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Charlier, Gileen, Lat. Episcopus Carlowiensis, a Belgian theologian, was born at Cambray, studied at Paris, was professor of theology in the College of Navarre, and from 1431 to 1472 dean of the church of Cambray. In 1483 he attended the Council of Basle, and was commissioned by the synod to proceed to Prague, and to endeavor to bring the Bohemians to the council (see Labbé, Concil. xii, 1159-1448; in Camb. Ant. Lec. iii). On his return to France, Charlier was elected dean of the faculty of theology at Paris, where he died, Nov. 23, 1473, leaving Sports Frugmentorum (Brussels, 1478, 1479, 2 vols.), and several other unedited works. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, append. p. 139; Hefele, Concilien Geschichten, vii, 494, 514 sq.; Jungmann, in Weitzer u. Welte's Kirchen Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Charlon, Frederick, a Baptist minister, was born in Connecticut in 1852, and united with the Church in 1840. Having pursued a course of study at Madison University, he was pastor in Webster, Mass., three years, and in Wilmington, Del., five years. For two years he was professor of rhetoric in the American Baptist Publication Society. He went to California in 1869, and was pastor of the Church in Sacramento till his death, Aug. 9, 1871. Under his ministrations this Church grew to be one of the largest and most influential in the state. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 265. (J. C. S.)

Charlon, George W., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born at Williamsburg, Va., Sept. 26, 1796. He experienced religion at the age of nineteen, entered the Virginia Conference in 1818, located in 1828, and in 1840 removed to Petersburg, where he resided to the close of his life, in February, 1863. Mr. Charlon was endowed with extraordinary abilities as a pulpit orator; was well read, cultured, bold and glowing in satire, startling and terrible in philosophies, a sincere Christian, and a successful preacher. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1863, p. 439.

Charlon, John Moon, A.M., an English Congregational minister, was born at Kendal, March 25, 1817. He was converted in his youth, received his ministerial training at Highbury College, and began his ministry in the North Berwick Relief, Heriot. He had twelve years of earnest and happy labor there, during which he had made himself thoroughly acquainted with the standard philosophical works of the day, and became well versed in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, he filled the pulpit of Masborough, Yorkshire, a short time, and then was invited to the theological professorship of Western College, at Plymouth, where he died, Dec. 12, 1875. See Lee, Life of Lyman, p. 16.

Charlon, Robert, a missionary of the Church of England, officiated as catechist, first at New Windsor, N.Y., and afterward in New York city. In the later place he was the successor of Rev. Thomas Colgan, who had been assistant to the Rev. William Vesey, rector of Trinity Church. His service in New York city extended from 1792 to 1740. In 1774 he became pastor of St. Andrew's Church on Staten Island, N.Y. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v. 16.

Charlon, Thomas (1), an English Independent, who had been educated at the Academy under Dr. Ridgley, London, was one of the subscribing ministers at the Salter's-Hall Synod in 1719. In 1725 his name appears as minister of the church in Aldermansbury. He was a good man, but not popular. He died at Thatcham, Berks, May 1, 1755. See Wilson, Discourses, ii, 329, 330.

Charlon, Thomas (2), an English Baptist, was bred a Unitarian, and was a popular preacher among that people; but, adopting Baptist views, he was baptized about 1722, having been already minister at Snow's-Fields, Southwark, since 1767, and remained there till his death, Dec. 19, 1774, aged thirty-four years. He is said to have been of the minds of awakening the father of M. Toplyn. He published a Psa. Sermon on Mr. Hughes, by whom he had been baptized. See Wilson, Discourses, iv, 283, 284.

Charmaine, commemorated March 16 (aip. A.D. 660). In the west of Scotland a saint of this name is found in the church dedications. He is identified with St. Abban Mac Ua-Corbuite, of Magh-Ar-naidhe in Ui-Cléainfoine, in Leinster, who is mentioned in St. Ercus Liber Dumm. Donny, by T. and Reeves, p. 7; Forbes, Kol. Scott. Satires, p. 299 sq.—Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

charmosynus was a presbyter, sent, with the presbyter Theognostus and the deacon Leonius, by Cyril of Alexandria to Constantiopole, A.D. 443, on the subject of establishing peace with the Oriental churches. He was present also at the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. He was synodumen among the ecclesiastics of both the Alexandrian and other Alexandrian churches. To them he delivered the sentence against Dioscorus (Cyril. Alex. Epist. xxxvii. d. xi; Psal. No. xlvii, 167; Ceillier, viii, 265;—Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Charon, in Greek and Roman mythology, was the ferryman across the river of death. This representation originated in Egypt, where all the dead who were worthy of an honorable burial were piloted in a small boat to the islands of the blessed, i.e. to the general place of burial. According to the myths of the river. Charon, an old servant of Pluto, was placed as a guard on the river of Hades, and took the souls that Mercury brought up on a boat across the Styx or Acheron, for which an obolus had to be paid, his coin was laid under the tongue of the dead. Those of the dead who had not received a burial were obliged to wade along the bank of the Styx for one hundred years. Charon was not allowed to ferry the living across, unless specially authorized so to do by the immortals. For rowing Hercules across without requiring him to show the golden bough, which was the sign of deity, he was deprived of his liberty for one year. Homer does not speak of this myth. A representation of this, from an antique bass-relief, is shown on following page. Two forms step from Charon's boat; the Parce reaches over the left hand of the other, and the head of the boy shows the golden bough, which was the sign of deity, he was deprived of his liberty for one year.
Charpentier, Hubert, a French ecclesiastic, was born at Coulommiers, in the diocese of Meaux, in 1655. He founded the pilgrimage shrine of Notre Dame de Garaison, at the foot of the Pyrenees; that of the mission of Notre Dame de Betharram, at the foot of a mountain called Calvary, in the diocese of Lescar; and the congregation of the priests of Calvary, on Mount Valérien, near Paris. Charpentier became the friend of the abbé of St. Cyran, and had relations with the recluses of Port Royal. He died at Paris, Dec. 10, 1650. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s. v.

Charpentier, Pierre Francois (called Pierre Étienne and François Philippin), a French engraver in aquatinta, was born at Bois in 1739. Some of his principal plates are, The Education of the Virgin; The Descent from the Cross. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Charpentier, René, a French sculptor, was born at Paris in 1698, studied under Girardon, and executed a number of works in the Church of St. Roch. He died at Paris, May 15, 1723. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s. v.

Charpy, Nicolas (surnamed Sainte-Croix), a French adventurer and visionary, was born at Sainte-Croix (Breze), and died about 1670. Mazarin says that he had been secretary of M. de Choisy's some time before the latter was arrested at NARBONNE. CHARPY lay hid for a month, and then escaped to NANNY. Afterwards he returned to France, and fell into a religious frenzy, in which he pretended to utter prophecies. Charpy published Le Réveil de la Foi des Temps (Paris, 1657, 8vo), in which he gives answers to chalcedonic questions concerning the speedy coming of Christ and the end of the world, similar to the frequent delusions on that exciting subject. It was refuted by Arnauld, in Remarques, etc., published at Paris (1665, 8vo [very rare], and 1735, 12mo). There is also under the name of Sainte-Croix Charpy, Catholique Chalcedonien in Deux Journeys (Paris, 1698, 8vo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s. v.

Charrier (de la Roche), Louis, a French prelate, was born at Lyons, May 17, 1738. He was made doctor, March 17, 1764, and not long after was appointed vice-general of Lyons, and vice-general of the common. He attached himself to the Jansenist party, and thus fell into controversy on political-religious questions. In 1791 he took the oath of the civil constitution of the clergy, and was appointed as constitutional bishop of the department of Seine-Inférieure. He continued, however, his inflammatory course, and, on Oct. 26, 1791, resigned his office, left France, and wrote to several of his fellows to follow his example. Some time afterwards Charrrier returned to France, and published an Examen of the decree of Aug. 27, 1791, on marriage. He at length became reconciled with the pope, and ceased his political agitation. Being appointed bishop of Versailles, and at length first chancellor of Bonaparte in 1802, Mgr. Charrier assisted at the Council of Paris in 1811. He died March 17, 1827. Among his publications are, Réflexion sur l'Influence de l'Examen de Bologne sur l'Église de France (1791, 8vo); — Questions sur les Affaires Prévues de l'Église de France (1792, 8vo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s. v.

Charront, Pierre, a French writer, was born at Paris in 1541. At first he studied law at Orleans and Bourges, and practiced several years in his profession, but afterwards betook himself to the study of theology, and soon became a famous pulpit orator. He preached several years in the south of France, and became chaplain to queen Marguerite. When forty-seven years old he returned to Paris, with the intention of joining a monastic order. Being refused, on account of his advanced age, he went again to the south. At Bordeaux he became acquainted with Montaigne, who exercised a great influence upon him. In 1594 he published his In Trios VSidés (Bordeaux), and the bishop of Cahors appointed him vicar-general. The year following he represented his diocese at the meeting of the French clergy, and was elected its clerk. He died suddenly at Paris, Nov. 16, 1693. Of his many writings, besides the above, we mention a collection of sixteen Discours Chrétiens (ibid. 1600) — Traité de la Sagesse (ibid. 1601 a, n.). The principles laid down in this last work found some severe opponents, especially in the Jesuit Garasse, who accused Charront of atheism. In the second edition, which appeared in 1604, some of the obnoxious passages were left out; but in 1607 a new edition of the correct text was published, which became the basis for later editions as published by Ezevire in 1646 and Diderot in 1789. The best and most complete edition is the one published by Remond (Dijon, 1851, 8vo). See Schmidt, in Herzog's Real-Encyclop., s. v.; Bayle, Dictionnaire Historique et Critique, s. v.; Brucker, Historia Philosophiae, iv, 512; Arboix, in Lichtenberg's Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s. v. (H. F.)

Charroux, Councils of (Consilium Carroues). Two provincial synods were held here,

I. About 989, by six bishops. Three canons were published.
   1. Excommunicates those who break into churches, or carry away anything out of them. 2. Those who rob the poor. 3. Those who lay violent hands upon the clergy.

See Labbe, Concil. ix, 733.

II. In 1028, against the Manichæans, by William, duke of Aquitaine. See Labbe, Concil. ix, 860.

Charrubin are angels, among the Mohammedans, esteemed to be the rulers of the other spirits. The name

XL — 29.
seems related to the Hebrew Cherbim, as also the signification.

Chart, in Slavonic mythology, is the devil, whom several Wendish tribes worshipped, in common with all Slavonic tribes, who reverenced the evil spirit, Zmeenogop. Chart probably is derived from Charni (black). He is therefore, like Zmeenogop, the black evil deity.

Charterius, Saint, is supposed to have been bishop of Marseille. He took part with Avitus, bishop of Vienne, at a conference of Catholic and Arian bishops, held at Lyons about 499, when king Gundobald was present (Avit. Vien. Epist. xxviii.).

Charters, or Chartria, Charles, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1698; was licensed to teach in 1702, appointed to the living at Arbirlot in 1702, and ordained. He was deposed by the presbytery in August, 1728, but the sentence was reversed by the assembly in 1729. He died in December, the same year, aged about fifty-three years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, iii, 789.

Charters, Henry, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, was professed of Edinburgh University, and admitted to the living at North Leith in April, 1692; and promoted to the professorship of divinity in Edinburgh University in May, 1677. There is no further record of him. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, i, 98.

Charters, John, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, son of the professor of divinity at Edinburgh, took his degree at that university in 1624; was elected and presented to the living at Currie in 1621, and died Feb. 2, 1685, aged about sixty-four years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, i, 145.

Charters, Lawrence, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, fourth son of the professor of divinity at Edinburgh, took his degree there in 1646; was called to the living at Bathans in 1653, and his examination being satisfactory, he was ordained in 1654. Conforming to episcopal polity, he lived in 1670 he was one of those who were styled "bishops' evangelists," sent to preach to the Presbyterian Whigs of the West. In 1671 he was offered a bishopric, but declined it, and was promoted to the professorship of divinity in 1675, previously occupied by his father. He died at Edinburgh, Dec. 1709, in the 28th year of his age, leaving several small publications. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, i, 327, 368.

Charters, Thomas (1), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, son of the divinity professor at Edinburgh, took his degree at that university in 1635; preached for several years as a supply at Humble; was ordained helper and colleague at that living in 1646, and died before Oct. 27, 1647, aged thirty years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, i, 387.

Charters, Thomas (2), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1646; was minister at Stonehouse in 1650; joined the protesting party in 1651, and was transferred to Kilbride before 1654. He died June, 1656, aged about thirty years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, ii, 290, 308.

Charteris, the ninth bishop of Périgueux, in the latter half of the 6th century, was brought before king Cluperic I in 589, charged with dictating letters derogatory to the king, but was by him forgiven. In 585 Charteris was present at the second synod of Macon.

Charters, or Charteria, Samuel (1), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1690; was called to the living in Inverkeithing in 1692, and ordained. He died June 28, 1733, aged about sixty-four years, leaving his son Thomas his successor. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, ii, 593.

Charters, Samuel (2), D.D., a Scotch clergyman, grandson of the foregoing, was educated at a grammar school, and at the Glasgow University, where he gave indications of a superior mind and powerful understand-pope Martin V. On Nov. 8, 1498, Renauld received a second time the seals of France as chancellor. When Joan of Arc offered her services to Charles VII, Renauld recommended her examination by a special court. He was present during the remarkable siege of Orleans in 1429, and was largely concerned in the stirring events of that period, in all of which he showed himself a shrewd, wise equirial and unscrupulous diplomat. He received many and other ecclesiastical favors, including the cardinalate (Dec. 29, 1439), and died April 4, 1444. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Charybdis, in Greek mythology, was the daughter of Neptune and the Earth. The myth makes her residence the Sicilian strait. There is a dangerous eddy there, perhaps more formidable to the light-built ships of the ancients than it appears to us. Charybdis is represented as a rapacious woman, who robbed Hercules of his herds, and was therefore hurled into the sea by Jupiter's lightnings, still retaining her old nature. She lived in a rock under an overarching fig-tree, and threatened all passers-by with death and destruction. In order to still her hunger she devoured whole ships, with all in them. Three times every day she would swallow the sea-water and throw it out again with a loud noise, drowning everything that came within reach. On the opposite shore Scylla also destroyed the ships of mariners. Hence the Latin proverb, "In citis in Scyllam cupiens viaire Charybdin."

Chasian, in Sorianic mythology, was a Wendian deity, principally worshipped in Bohemia.

Chassan, Abraham ben-Jehuda, a Jewish writer of the 16th century, is the author of בּ שָׁ רָי מ, or A Commentary on the Prophets, Hagiographa and Free Megilloth (Lublin, 1598, 1612). See Forst, Bibl. Jud. i, 167; De Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 78 sq. (B. P. 1.)

Chassan, Chajim, a learned Jew of Smyrna, who died in 1712 in Poland, while collecting funds in aid of the resident Jews in Palestine, is the author of בּ שָׁ רָי מ, or Discussions on the Pentateuch (Venice, 1668). See Forst, Bibl. Jud. i, 167. (B. P. 7.)

Chase, Albert H., a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Killingly, Conn., June 4, 1829, of English parentage. In early life he united with the Church in East Killingly, and took an active part in religious affairs. In 1833 he began a course of theological study at New Hampton Institute, N. H.; in November, 1835, removed to Cherry Valley, O., and was pastor there for two years. In November, 1857, he became pastor of the Church in New Lyme, and remained there ten years. From 1864 to 1867 a large part of his time was spent in organizing and collecting funds for the Freedmen's Mission Work, also in raising funds for the erection of a church in Chicago, Ill. Early in January, 1867, he was appointed agent and business manager of the Christian Freeman, a denominational paper, established in Chicago. In December, 1868, he became pastor in Cleveland, O., and in 1869 and 1870 was pastor at Harrisburg, Pa. He was corresponding secretary of the Free-will Baptist Home Mission Society for several years, having been the secretary of its denominational body. He served successively at Gilsum, N. H., Westmoreland, Vt., West Tisbury, Mass., West Yarmouth, and Eastham, and died at West Tisbury, Mass., Nov. 22, 1886. Mr. Chase preached many thousand sermons, and many revivals blessed his ministry. See Cong. Quarterly, 1866, p. 392.

Chase, Edward E., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Elizabethtown, Ky., May 30, 1840. He served during the Civil War in the 8th Regiment Michigan Volunteer Infantry; after his close he studied theology at the Union Theological Seminary, Chicago, Ill.; was licensed and, in 1871, ordained pastor in Clyde, O., where he died, May 25, 1874. See Whitney Family of Connecticut, ii, 1902. (C. S.)

Chase, Edwin Bailey, a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was ordained deacon in 1857, and entered the active ministry in 1858, as a missionary, at Belvide, N. J. In 1860 he was chosen rector of St. Michael's Church, Marblehead, Mass.; in 1865 removed to Mansfield, Pa.; in 1866 became rector of St. Peter's Church, Cambridgeport, Mass.; in 1874 left the active ministry, and died May 6, 1875. See Prot. Ept. Almanac, 1876, p. 149.

Chase, E. B., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Newbury, Mass., Nov. 1, 1836. He removed with his parents to Ohio in 1819; was converted at sixteen years of age, soon afterwards became an exhorter and local preacher; and in 1830 entered the Ohio Conference. In its active ranks he labored until his death, March 4, 1862. Mr. Chase was a plain, practical, and useful preacher. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1862, p. 115.

Chase, Hiram, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Charleston, Montgomery Co., N. Y., Feb. 1, 1801. He received a careful religious training, experienced conversion at the age of twenty, was licensed to exhort in 1825, and in 1827 received license to preach, and entered the New York Conference. On the organization of the Troy Conference, in 1832, Mr. Chase became one of its members, and in it served until 1864, when he was licensed supernumerary, and retired to Sandy Hill. He was afterwards active as a supernumerary, as his health permitted, until his death at Los Angeles, Cal., Jan. 9, 1877. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1877, p. 66.

Chase, Irad, D.D., an eminent Baptist minister and biblical scholar, was born at Stratton, Vt., Oct. 5, 1733. He was fitted for college under the direction of Rev. Dr. Sanders, the first president of the University of Vermont, graduated from Middlebury College, Vt., in 1814, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1817. He was ordained as an evangelist at Danvers, Mass., in September of the same year, and for some time preached as a missionary in Western Virginia. His usefulness was greatly increased by the necessity of starting a seminary of sacred learning to meet the wants of the rising ministry of the Baptist denomination. For seven years (1818-25) he was connected with the theological department of Columbia College, Washington, D. C., during one of which he was in Europe, devoting himself to the studies of his profession, and performing some needed work in the interests of his denomination. Having resigned his position at Washington, he went to Massachusetts and opened a school for theological students at Newton, Nov. 28, 1825, which resulted in the well-known Baptist seminary there. He was a hard and most diligent student, patient and willing to get at anything he wished to reach, cost what it might of time and toil. After twenty years' service he resigned his office, and spent the remainder of his life in Boston and Newton, largely occupied with literary work, chiefly in the line of his lifelong studies. He died at Newton Centre, Nov. 1, 1864.

Dr. Chase wrote and published a large amount of matter in Baptist publications, and in the Bibliotheca Sacra, some of his papers embodying the results of patient and protracted investigation. In addition to these were the following volumes: Life of Bunyan: The Design of Baptism, Viewed in its Relation to Christian Life: The Baptist Confessions: Infant Baptism an Invention of Men, etc. (J. C. S.)

Chase, James Morris, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Cornish, N. H., April 4, 1800. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1827. In 1832 he was licensed by the Schuyler Presbytery, and in 1837 was ordained pastor of Sillah Church at Macon, Ill. In 1846 he preached as stated supply at Camp Creek, in 1853 at Mount Sterling, and in 1854 became pastor at Ebenezer, where he died, Feb. 10, 1865. He was a ripe scholar, an able preacher, and a highly respected pastor. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1866, p. 97.

Chase, John, a Baptist minister, was born at Cornwallis, N. S., in 1804. He was converted in 1808; ordained at Billtown, July 1, 1835; was pastor at Bridgetown eleven years; for a time Financial Agent of the Nova Scotia Baptist Educational Society, and died at Wolfville, Nov. 13, 1879. See Baptist Year-Book for Maritime Provinces of Canada, 1880; Bill, Fifty Years with the Baptists, p. 569.

Chase, Mary, a minister of the Society of Friends, was born at Chester, Pa., March 14, 1806. She removed to a Protestant Episcopal Church, but abandoned it at the age of nineteen to join the Quakers, and soon after became a preacher among them. Her favorite theme was the falseness and freeness of salvation. She died at Salem, Mass., April 26, 1861, aged eighty-seven years. For several years previous she had been an invalid. See Amer. Annual, 1862, p. 20.

Chase, Moses, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Newton, N. H., in 1803. He experienced religion at twenty-three, and in 1833 united with the New Hampshire Conference, in which he served until his sudden death, Jan. 7, 1866. Mr. Chase possessed more than ordinary ministerial ability. About five thousand were added to the Church through his instrumentality, thirty of whom became ministers. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1866, p. 51.

Chase, Nathaniel, a Baptist minister, was born at Buckfield, Me., about 1770, and was among the original Baptists of the place. In 1796, soon after the formation of a Church in the town, he was licensed, and in 1801 was called to the pastorate of the Church, which he prospered under his ministry for thirty-four years. In account of age he then resigned and removed to Lebanon, where he preached occasionally, and died about 1850. See Millet, Hist. of the Baptists of Maine, p. 439. (J. C. S.)

Chase, Nathaniel L., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Unity, N. H., Oct. 30, 1813. He was educated at the concord and Litchfield academies and admitted into the New Hampshire Conference. His last years were spent as a supernumerary. He died May 3, 1875. Mr. Chase was a man of deep and uniform piety, a close student, an instructive and edifying minister, and a laborious pastor. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1876, p. 79.

Chase, Oscar F., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in 1825. He was converted in 1846; in 1869 was admitted into the Michigan Conference, and there in labored until his death, Oct. 17, 1863. Mr. Chase was a studious, faithful, and able minister, retiring in his social life. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1864, p. 226.

Chase, Plummer, a Congregational minister, was born at Nantucket, Mass., in 1794. He graduated from Bowdoin College in 1821, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1824, and was ordained at Machias, Me., March 1, 1825. He preached at Carver, Mass., from 1828 to 1839, and died at Newbury, Sept. 17, 1857. See Titn. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem., 1876, p. 57.

Chase, Robert F., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in 1835. He was ordained in the following year in Danvers, of Calvary Church, a position which he continued to hold until 1865, when he was made assistant rector of St. Peter's Church, Philadelphia, Pa., and this position he retained until 1868, when he became rector of St. Matthias's Church, in the same city. In 1850 he resided there without charge, but in the following year was rector of the Mission of St. Peter's Church. He died Aug. 3, 1872. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1873, p. 33.

Chase, Robert G., a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born at Hopkinton, N. H., Dec. 19, 1835. He graduated from Burlington College in 1856, and was ordained deacon the same year. His first curacy was at Perinton, N. Y., which he accepted the rectoryship of St. Matthias's Church, Philadelphia, where he labored with great zeal and success, large number of figures, among which are The Dead Christ, in the Church des Carmes, at Nancy; also one of Charity. He died Oct. 5, 1792. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Chausel, David, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Glasgow, Scotland, April 30, 1787. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1810, and then took charge of the Caledonia County Academy, Peacham, Vt. In 1815 he went to Cambridge, Washington Co., N.Y., as principal of the academy there. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Troy in 1819, and ordained in 1820. In 1821 he taught at Fairfield, in 1840 became principal of the academy in Herkimer, and in 1842-44 again taught in Fairfield Academy. During all this time, after his licensure, he was in the habit of preaching often, as stated supply, and for five years regularly filled the pulpits at Fairfield and Salisbury. He died at Holland Patent, Jan. 10, 1870. He had the gift of teaching in a pre-eminent degree; his scholarship was thorough and profound; his preaching was like his teaching, instructive, thoughtful, intellectual, soundly Calvinistic. See Presbyteriæm in Central N. Y. p. 494.

Chastain, Lewis, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was admitted into the itinerant ranks in 1876, and was appointed to Berthold, Pellston, Alleghany; in 1879, at Gloucester, Va.; and in 1790 and 1791 at Berkeley. In 1792 he located, and nothing more is recorded concerning him. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1787–92; Sprague, Annuals of the Amer. Pulpit, vii. 206.

Chastain, Rance, a Baptist minister, was born in Ponchatoula County, Va., June 28, 1741, of French extraction. When quite young he removed to Buckingham County, where he remained during the rest of his life. When he was about thirty years of age he became a Christian, and soon after began to preach. He was chosen pastor of the Buckingham Church in April, 1779, and continued in office for fifty-three years. He also, at different times, supplied other churches when his strength would permit. Although not an accomplished preacher, he was an excellent pastor, and greatly beloved by the churches to which he ministered. He supported himself chiefly by his own labor on a farm. See Lives of Virginia Baptist Ministers, p. 190–192. (J. C. S.)

Chaste Brethren and Straffans is a name adopted by the Apostolici (q. v.) of the 12th century, in consequence of their preference of celibacy to marriage.

Chaste Week is an old English term for the period immediately following Ash-Wednesday; so called because the faithful, having just received absolution on Shrove-Tuesday, were expected to remain pure at the commencement of Lent.

Chastillon (or Châtillon), Louis de, a French engraver and painter in miniature and enamel, was born at Sainte-Menehoult, in Champagne, in 1639, and died in 1724. The following are his principal plates: The Adulteress Before Christ; The Conversion of St. Paul; The Seven Sacraments; St. John on the Isle of Patmos. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Chastity was a virtue deified by the Romans, and represented on the reverse of a medal of Faustina the younger, sitting, and dressed in the habit of a Roman matron, holding a sceptre in her hand, with two doves at her feet. Juvenal sarcastically says she was once upon our earth in the reign of Saturn, but that she quit it about the time Jupiter began to have a beard.

Chasuble (Chesoble, or Chesable). We give additional particulars respecting this important clerical garment:

CHASE
It was worn as well by laymen as ecclesiastics in very early ages; but in later times its use has been confined exclusively to bishops and priests, and it has become the distinctive official vestment of the holy eucharist. Its primitive form was perfectly round, with an aperture in the centre for the head, and this we find figured in the Beneficenches of St. Ethelwine (Fig. 1). If intended for use in procession, a hood was sometimes affixed to the back; for at that period the chasuble was not restricted to the ministrant cleric. There is another form of this vestment, too, almost circular, which appears to be the oldest in existence, figured in the mosaic of St. Vitalis's Church, at Ravenna, the date of which is A.D. 547. In England its shape continued to be nearly circular for about six centuries after the mission of Augustine (Fig. 2). A chasuble discovered about thirty years ago in a wall-up service at Waterford, in Ireland, is also of this form. When a change was made, the only alteration seems to have been that two opposite parts of the circumference were made to come to a point. This allows the use of many of the Saintly Robes and Vestments so prominently represented on memorial brasses; but, for about three hundred years before the Reformation, the chasuble was likewise made in the shape of a cowl, pike, and the ornaments with which it was then decorated became far more elaborate, and consequently ricer and more beautiful. This shape must likewise be very old, for it is figured on the recently discovered fresco at St. Clement's, Rome, where the wearer, with outstretched arms, is giving the pas. Another shape, differing from those depicted in the other illustrations, is that of the ancient and precious vestment of St. Thomas of Canterbury, still preserved at the cathedral of Senus (Fig. 3). It has the Y-cross both before and behind. The aperture for the head is almost square, and the sides are unusually long and deep. The chasuble of St. Boniface, Archbishop of LLon, preserved at Mayence, is also very like it. This chasuble, however, was not made of velvet, but of chasuble was usually made of silk, satin, velvet, or damask, though sometimes of inferior materials. It is now necessary to describe the Orphey (surplice forms) and the Flower, as it was called, of the chasuble, which in the Middle Ages was elaborately decorated by embroiderers. The former was a band, which ran up behind and before through the middle. Properly speaking, there was no cross upon the old English chasuble, but only the orphey coming from the pectoral or pellier, in the shape of the forked point of Y, the two other bands (called numerals), which went over the shoulders, and the same cross from behind they met in the collar) (Fig. 4). In more modern times this Y-shaped figure has been transformed into a cross, while sometimes a cruciform or inlay is traced in the back of the vestment. The illustration of the flowing old English chasuble in the accompanying woodcut (Fig. 5) is from an ancient memorial brass. Here the whole of the chasuble is depicted, while the position of the priest, in the act of blessing the chalice, is remarkable, for it is unknown in the case of a sacred vessel. The flower (rosa casule) of the chasuble was a splendid piece of floriated embroidery round the neck, which spread itself down the front and the back — representations of which may be seen in the cathedrals of Exeter, St. Albans, and Lincoln. Three brasses remain of bishops in full eucharistic vestments of post-Reformation period — viz., Thomas Goodrich, in 1554, at Ely Cathedral, in the county of Worcester, in 1566, from St. James's, Clerkenwell, in possession of the Right Rev. J. P. Nichols, Esq., F.S.A.; and Robert Thelwall, suffragan bishop of Hull, in 1574, at Tideswell, Derbyshire. In the Fourteenth Council of Toledo it was reckoned a sacred habit. Its old English name was Massall, "the mass mantle." The word occurs first in the year 474, in the will of St. Perpetua, of Tourn. The Greek chasuble was of equal width all round, from the shoulders to the feet. The Western form was that of pointed ends behind and before, and the early examples of the 8th century show it thus, and it is allowed, reaching to the feet; but there are other examples which portray it thus, as if worn at present, the ends being frequently rounded. A remarkably fine example of this kind is that at St. Apollinaria, Ravenna, which is covered with an arming with vestments, superhuman, a band of golden stuff, like an ancient archepiscopal pall, sewn behind and before, and divided round the neck, with the names and heads of thirty-five bishops of Verona. In succession, from the foundation of the see to the middle of the 8th century. The vestment, like orphrey, meaning the "glazed bordered," was given to the chasuble from its peculiar embroidery on the orphrey or laticale, a band originally of a different color from the robe, and called the auricular when made of cloth of gold. One of this kind, of the 8th century, is preserved in the cathedral of Ravenna. St. Stephen's chasuble, made for Isabella, queen of Hungary, in 1601, is preserved at Buda, and worn by the sovereign at his coronation; its color is green. There are two at Maidley, of the 14th century, which were probably brought from Much-Wenlock. One at Toulouse is said to have come from St. Peter's. There is one at St. Maur, made of gold, of the 16th century. The chasuble called palliace, had the pall sewn upon it. Until the 15th or 16th century the pectoral or pellier was sometimes a separate piece and is formed from the dalmatic or back. The superhuman dwindled into a narrow collar, and the cross on the back of the chasuble is the last relic of the old one. The early chasubles were ornamented with sacred designs, flowers, and symbols. The chasuble of Chartres, a picture by the Second Council of Nicaea. The processional chasuble had a hood, which was worn in France until the latter half of the 15th century. In England the ends of the chasuble of the reversed arch of the pointed style of architecture. From being used specially at the time of celebration, it was emphatically called ‘the vestment.’ Cranmer says, ‘The over-vesture or chasuble signifies the purple mantle that Pilate’s soldiers put upon Christ after they had mocked him; the ministry it signifies charity, a virtue excellent above all other.’

Château (or Chastie); in It. Castello, Grz-}
Guia, a French engraver, was born at Orleans, April 18, 1653, and was instructed in the school of John Frederick Greuter. He died in Paris, Sept. 15, 1693. His principal plates are, The Repose in Egypt: The Virgin, with the Infant Jesus Embracing a Cross: The Miraculous Draught of Fishes: The Baptism of Christ by St. John: Christ Appearing to St. Peter: The Stoning of St. Stephen: The Holy Family with St. John St. Paul Taken up to Heaven: Christ Curing the Blind. See Hoefer, Nouvelle Biographie Générale. a.v.; Spooner, Biographical History of the Fine Arts, a.v.
and statesman, was born Sept. 4, 1768, at St. Malo, in Bretagne, and died in Paris, July 4, 1848. He deserves an honorable place in this Cyclopædia as an apologist of Christianity. His first important work in that direction was the Essai Historique, Politique, et Moral sur les Révolutions Anciennes et Modernes, etc. (London, 1797, 2 vols., 1814)—Catechisme du Christianisme (Paris, 1829; Germ. transl. by Schneller, 2d ed. Freiburg, 1856-57, 2 vols.). This work, which he dedicated to Bonaparte, placed him at once among the first writers of his people and time. In 1807 he published his Les Martyrs, ou le Triomphe de la Religion Chrétienne (Germ. transl. by Faeschmair, Munich, 1864), in which he glorifies the Christian religion. In this work, as well as in his Itinéraire de Paris à Jérusalem et de Jérusalem à Paris, he admonishes, as a good Catholic, his co-religionists to adhere to their Church. His Œuvres Complètes were published at Paris in 1836 and 1838; new edition by Sainte-Beuve, in 12 vols. 1859-61; a German edition of his works was published at Freiburg, 1827-38, in 66 small volumes. Château-Gontier (in Anjou), COUNCIL OF (Concilium apud Castrum Gontierium), was held in 1231, by the archbishop of Tours and his suffragans, who published thirty-seven canons or regulations, of which the following are of most consequence:
1. Against clandestine marriages, ordering that those persons who have been so united be separated.
2. Exacts an oath from every clerk presented to a benefice, that he does not continually neglect any thing that has been verbally promised or promised anything in return.
3. Orders the bishops to see that all beneficed clergymen serve their own cure.
4. Forces with commutation with emancipated persons.
5. Forces the frequent use of general communicatio.
6. Deprives of their patronage patroni who present unjust persons.
7. Forces to present to a living any one ignorant of the language of the place.
8. And some others relate to the conduct of monks.
9. Orders the sentence of excommunication against nuns to be read every Sunday.
10. Forces to receive the testimony of Jews against Christians.

See Labbe, Concil. xi, 488.

Château, Ferdinand Toussaint François, a French schismatic, was born at Gannat, in Bourbonnais, Jan. 9, 1785. He learned the trade of a tailor, but was afterwards sent by his pastor to the seminary of Mont-Ferrand. After studying theology among the Sulpicians, Château received the tonsure at the age of twenty, was ordained a few months after, and made deacon the year following. Some time before the revolution of July, he wrote for le Réformateur, foreshadowing his future innovations. Having assembled several discontented priests in his house, he made known to them his projects. He was appointed bishop of the new Church thus formed. The master of the Temples, Fabre-Palaprat, consecrated him in 1848. This bishop was excommunicated, and successively deposed and dismissed. In 1849 it was decided by the council of the Church of Château to be shut up, and, according to the contents of the document, he had uttered but outrages against public morals. In the revolution of 1848 Château used his eloquence in behalf of what he termed "oppressed women;" and as orator of the club, presided over by madame Niboyet, he was heard several times pleading for divorce, one of the favorite themes of his con-

Châtelet, Jean, a French fanatic, was born in Paris about 1576, and studied divinity under the Jesuits, and philosophy in the University of Paris. He regarded Henry IV as an anticrist, and was accused of launching a Spanish fanaticism to stab him, Dec. 27, 1594. It was thought that he had been instigated by the Jesuits, but he declared to the last that he acted entirely of his own accord. He was executed Dec. 29, 1594. See Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Châtellain, Jean de, a Flemish preacher, of the order of the Augustines, a native of Tourinay, lived in the former part of the 18th century. He preached with success in the principal cities of France and Lorraine. Being accused of favoring Lutheranism, in spite of the protection offered him by the magistrates of Metz, he was arrested and burned at the stake as a heretic, Jan. 12, 1525. Calumnies attributed to him the chronicle de la Ville de Metz, in rhyme (Metz, 1598, 12mo); but this was written by Jean Châtel. See Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Châtzenheim, Bernard, a French prelate, native of Montpellier, distinguished himself by his knowledge of civil and canon law. He settled at Rome, and was auditor of the sacred palace under Gregory X. After having served as legate of the pope and ambassador for the Church of Narbonne, he was appointed to the bishopric of Albay in 1276. Nicholas III commissioned him to make inquiries in the diocese of Lodève against those who had usurped church benefices, and Philippe de Bell sent him to Rome to procure the canonization of St. Louis. In 1406 Châteney was transferred to the see of Léove in Velay. He was made cardinal by pope John XXII in 1316, and died at Avignon, Aug. 14, 1317. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chater, John (1), an English Independent, was born in London and educated at Plasterers' Hall. He became a member of Mr. Bradbury's Church at New Court, Carey Street, in 1752; was dismissed to take charge of the Church at Newport, Isle of Wight, in 1755, and returned to London in 1758, when he was appointed as pastor at Silver Street. In 1768 he adopted the Sandemanian opinions, became a preacher among them, and commenced a bookselling business, first on Ludgate Hill, then, in 1769, at King Street, Cheapside, where he kept a circulating library. He wrote Tom Rody, a religious novel, and a pamphlet, with the title Another High-road to Hell, in which he denounced some of the pulpits entertainments of that time (1767). See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, iii, 111-118.

Chater, John (2), an English Congregational minister, was born at Coventry, Feb. 16, 1805. He was carefully trained by his parents, and when about twenty-one joined the Church, engaged in village preaching, and soon after entered Harvard College. On the completion of his college course he accepted a call to Lindfield, Sussex, where he labored until 1842, then removed to Newton Abbott, and there remained till 1884. Ill-health then obliged his resignation, he retired to Southport, and there died Jan. 12, 1868. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-Book, 1870, p. 291.

Chatefield, Lazon, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Windham, Greene County, N. Y., Sept. 7, 1807. He spent his early years on his father's farm; was gifted in the use of the English language; joined the Church at the age of twenty-two; and in 1866 entered the old Ohio Conference. On the formation of the Michigan Conference he became one of its members; was transferred to the Rock River Conference in 1853; returned to the Michigan Conference in the year following, located, and in 1868 was readmitted as a supernumerary, which relation he sustained until his death, July 23, 1876. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1876, p. 113.

Chatizel (de la Néronnière), Pierre Joseph, a French theologian, was born at Laval in 1733. The province of Maine chose him as one of her representatives in the states-general. He was afterwards vicar of the Trinité de Laval, and later pastor of Soulaines, in the department of Maine et Loire. He died August 18, 1717, leaving, Traité du Pouvoir des Évêques sur les Empêchements du Mariage (Paris, 1789, 12mo):—Lettre de M. , Curé du Dioce de Angers, au Père Violat (1791, 8vo);—Lettre à Adresse à une Fille (London, without date, 8vo). Chatterton, Benjamin, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Acreworth, N. H., in 1778. He was converted in 1805, and soon began to preach; was baptized among the Methodists, and was a class-leader. In 1823 he connected himself with the Free-will Baptist Church in Middlesex, Vt., and was ordained Feb. 5, 1826. His ministerial labors were performed chiefly in his own town and in places adjoining. After a long and painful sickness, borne with much Christian resignation, he died at Middlesex, June 17, 1855. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1857, p. 88. (J. C. S.)

Chatto, Andrew, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1747; presented to the living of Merebatch in 1739; ordained in 1740; and died June 20, 1770, aged fifty-four years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, i, 465.

Chatun Erdem (the white maiden), in Laisama, was a picture painted on gold, belonging to the seven Dobon Erdem, the sacred relics of the Laisama temple, placed on the altar before the image of the deity.

Chaucer, Geoffrey, the "Father of English Poetry," is believed to have been born about 1340. Nothing is known of his early life or parentage further than that his father was a London vintner. Chaucer was not simply a poet and author, but exhibited decided talent for diplomacy, and his acquaintance with commerce and his ability in that direction secured for him some important positions. He was a contemporary of Wycliffe, and is said to have adopted the opinions of that reformer respecting ecclesiastical polity, although it is not known that hsy sympathized with him in his religious convictions. His influence, however, was not inconsiderable in pointing the way for the Reformation in England.

Chaucer first comes into public notice in 1382, when he went with the army of Edward III into France, and there, during a retreat, was taken prisoner, but was soon ransomed by the king. About 1387 he was valet of the king's chamber, with a salary for life of twenty marks, and in 1389 took part in another expedition against France, which proved to be an inglorious one. It is believed that he married Philippa, a lady in attendance on the queen, before 1374, for in that year a pension was granted to him for his own and his wife's services. For several years he was employed on public missions in France, Flanders, and Lombardy, and during one of these he may have met Petrarch in Padua. There are evident traces of the effect of Italian literature on all his writings after this journey. In 1382 he became comptroller of the petty customs of the port of London, and in 1386 was sent to parliament as a Knight of Kent. But in the same year came the downfall of his patron, John of Gaunt, and in consequence he was dismissed from all his offices. In this year occurred the death of his wife. She left him two sons, one of whom was named Lewis. Chaucer was afterwards made his executor, and in 1394 obtained an annuity of £20, and a pension of 40 marks upon the accession of Henry IV in 1399. It is believed that he died at his house in Westminster in 1400, and an inscription on his tomb in the abbey fixes the date Oct. 25,

Honorary Tomb of Chaucer in Westminster Abbey.

Chaucer's style marks the beginning of the modern period of English literature, and his language and forms of expression were so excellent that few of them have yet become obsolete. Among all his writings the Canterbury Tales are best known and most admired. In them, as well as in the House of Fame and Legends of Good Women, Chaucer strikes out more positively in a style of his own, and exhibits a mature power and a more masterly freedom than in his earlier works. His characters are sharply defined, living men and women. His narrative skill is unequalled, his tales gliding on with captivating artistic fluency and unobtrusive felicities of phrase. He unites luxuriant invention and piercing satiric shrewdness with delicate pathos, sonny humor, grave love of truth, and refreshing delight in nature. There is little to show the date of his various writings. The Book of the Duchess is supposed to have been written to commemorate the death of the wife of John of Gaunt, which occurred in 1369. Many works formerly attributed to him are now rejected; among them the Tales of the Puss, the Ass's Head, the Legend of Good Women, and the Lamentations of Mary Magdalene. In the last twenty years there has been a remarkable revival of interest in Chaucer and an enthusiastic study of his life and works, a society having been formed in England for that purpose. The best editions of his works are those of Morris (Lond, 1872, 6 vols. 12mo) and Gilman (Boston, 1879, 8 vols. 8vo).

Chaucemer (or Chauoemer), Francis, a French theologian, was born at Blois. At the age of fifteen he entered the order of the Dominicans and was sent to Paris, to study at the convent of St. Jacques. He distinguished himself there by the ingenuity of his discussions and his ready eloquence. He was made doctor of theology in 1675, and acquired such a reputation by his sermons that he was nominated preacher to the king, with a pension of three hundred livres. In 1678 he became provincial of Paris, and in 1687, prior of the grand convent of Paris. He spent the latter part of his life in composing several works, of which the majority remained in MS. He died Jan. 6, 1713, leaving, among other books, Tractat de Foié, etc., (Paris, 1707):—Sermon (ibid. 1709). See Hoefler, Nouv. BioGénérale, a. v.

Charney, Elizanathan, a Congregational minister, was born Sept. 10, 1724, at Durham, Conn., and graduated at Harvard College in 1743. He settled in 1747 as deacon of the First Congregational Church, in the village of Southington, with his father, Rev. Nathaniel Charney, and for some time was his assistant. In consequence of ill-health he gave up preaching, and for several years devoted himself to agriculture, and afterwards accepted an appointment as captain of a military company. He resumed preaching during the last years of his life, and died May 4, 1796. See Chauncy Memorial, p. 173-177. (J.C.S.)

Charney, Isaac, a Congregational minister, was born at Stratford, Conn., Oct. 5, 1670, and graduated from Harvard College in 1693. He was ordained Sept. 9, 1796, at Hadley, Mass., and continued pastor till his death in May 1745. He was of a truly peaceable and catholic spirit; a good scholar; an eloquent orator; an able divine; a lively, pathetic preacher. See Chauncy Memorial, p. 221. (J.C.S.)

Charney, Israel, a Congregational minister, younger son of president Chauncy of Harvard College, was born at Scituate, Mass., in 1644, and graduated from Harvard in 1661. He was surgeon as well as chaplain in the army. In 1665 he was ordained pastor of the Church in Stratford, Conn., and was its learned and devoted pastor until his death in 1763. His name appears as president of the last of the New England colleges, Yale College. He was chosen, Nov. 11, 1701, rector or president of the infant institution, but did not accept. See Chauncy Memorial, p. 206-218. (J.C.S.)

Charney, Maurice, a monk of the Charter-house, London, was imprisoned in the reign of Henry VIII, for refusing to own the king's supremacy. He managed to remain un molested in England and in Flanders until the accession of Queen Mary, when he was placed at a monastery at Sheen, near Richmond. On the queen's death he again went to Flanders, but was obliged to remove to Bruges, where he died, July 15, 1581. The best of his productions is entitled Historia Aequit Aequitie et Seculi Martyrum (Menz, 1550, 4to.)

Charney, Nathaniel, a Congregational minister, was born at Hartsfield, Mass., Sept. 25, 1681. He was the son of Rev. Nathaniel Charney, and grandson of Charles Chauncy, president of Harvard College. In his boyhood he was sent to his uncle, Rev. Israel Chauncy, of Stratford, Conn., under whom he prepared for college, and was one of the first class of six enrolled on the catalogue of Yale College. He graduated in 1706, went to Durham in 1706, and was ordained Feb. 7, 1711. He died there Feb. 1, 1756. His library was large and well selected. In his tastes and acquisitions he was a theological scholar of the Puritan type. As a preacher he was eminently instructive and attractive. His eloquence was distinct, and his language carefully chosen. He was a fellow of Yale College. Frequently he had young men under his care preparing for college. His counsel was often sought for by neighboring churches. He published some sermons (1719, 1734). See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, 1, 263.

Charauqua Assembly is the name given to an annual summer gathering for purposes of instruction, worship, and recreation. Its meetings opened early in July and continued about six weeks. The place is a well-wooded point of land jutting out into the beautiful Lake Charauqua, a body of water about twenty miles long by two wide, and over fourteen hundred feet above the level of the sea. It is in western New York, ten miles from Lake Erie, and seven hundred feet above it. The assembly is situated on an island about one hundred and fifty acres, and are four hundred and sixty miles from New York city, four hundred and twenty-five from Cincinnati and five hundred and thirty from Chicago. The air is pure, the water good, the grounds well-shaded, and the entire place and its neighborhood are noted for salubrity.
I. History.—This place, known as Fair Point, had been used for two years as a camp-meeting, under the control of an association chartered for that purpose, and consisting of a number of prominent members of the Methodist Episcopal Church in western New York and in several adjoining states. Among these was Mr. Lewis Miller of Akron, Ohio, a man of broad views and generous spirit, and especially interested in Sunday-school work. When his friend, the Rev. J. H. Vincent, D.D., Corresponding Secretary of the Sunday-school Union of the Methodist Episcopal Church, conferred with him on the subject of a Sunday-school Institute to be held for several weeks, Mr. Miller suggested that the place in the woods where he afterwards proposed the ground by Chautauqua Lake as the place for holding it. It is worthy of mention here, that several years before this time Mr. Silas Farmer, of Detroit, Michigan, had suggested the idea of a “Sunday-school Camp-Meeting.” (See Sunday-school Journal, April, 1870, p. 155.) Nothing, however, came from it at that time. Dr. Vincent, who had years before organized the first Sunday-school Institute ever held, had for a long time cherished the thought that it might be possible, as it would certainly be desirable, to gather Sunday-school teachers in a meeting for instruction and practice, which should last a much longer time than could be given for the one day; and Mr. M. suggested the grove at Fair Point as the place he accepted the suggestion. There was accordingly held for fourteen days, in August, 1874, a meeting, with this object in view, and called the “Sunday-school Assembly.” The attendance was large, and so deep was the interest excited that, before the assembly was dissolved, there was by formal action a unanimous desire expressed that another assembly might be held the following year.

For several years the meetings were thus held, especially for Sunday-school teachers. The success was so gratifying, in 1876, an organization was formed which bought the property from the Camp-Meeting Association, and has ever since held it for the purposes of the assembly. The plans of work broadened with each successive year. Very early in the history of the assembly Dr. Vincent suggested the desirability of adding to the programme a scientific conference. The idea was soon carried into execution. Since then the Chautauqua Assembly, while it has retained in its original enthusiasm and power the idea of instruction in Sunday-school work, has greatly broadened its scope, until now it includes every branch of human knowledge. It places the Bible at the very centre and foundation of its work, seeking to bring to the hearts of men the word of God and the works of God. The religious element is predominant in all its operations, though there is perfect freedom from asceticism, cant, and sectarianism. Abundant provision is made for innocent recreation, but late hours, dancing, and cards are forbidden.

II. Organization.—There are at present in the assembly seven different departments besides the Chautauqua School of Theology, and the Chautauqua University, separately noted below.

1. The Chautauqua Assembly Normal Department.—This comprises the Sunday-school Assembly with which the movement started, and includes five classes: (1) The Chautauqua Children's Class; (2) The Chautauqua Intermediate Class, for youths and adults; (3) The Chautauqua Sunday-school Normal Class, for parents and Sunday-school teachers; (4) The Chautauqua Advanced Normal, which has a post-graduate course in this class work, organized for the Primary Teachers' Union, for primary-class teachers.

2. The Chautauqua Teachers' Retreat, begun in 1879. Teachers of secular schools may attend this during their summer vacation, and in the intervals of recreation and of rest have the advantage of a summer school under the direction of some of the foremost educators of the age. Lectures are delivered on the Philosophy and Methods of Teaching, and on other subjects of practical interest to teachers.

3. The Chautauqua School of Languages, begun in 1879. The object of this is to familiarize teachers with what is known as "the natural method" of teaching the modern languages, as well as to illustrate other methods in both ancient and modern languages, and to give them opportunity for increasing their interest in the modern field of study.

4. The Chautauqua Literary and Scientific Circle, begun in 1878. This is one of the grandest educational conceptions of the day. It aims to help the large number of people, old as well as young, but especially the young, who have a desire to read, but do not know what to read. For all such, each course of reading is marked out, and text books indicated, many of them being specially prepared for the purpose. These courses of reading are peculiarly adapted for busy people, who can take but little time from their daily toil or their domestic cares. An average of forty minutes for each week—day, or four hours a week, will take one through one of these annual courses of reading in nine months. It is not necessary that the members of the "Circle" should ever come to Chautauqua, though every summer there is a large gathering of them at that place. It is expected, however, that members will fill out memora of their reading, and send them to the central committee each year.

The course of reading of the "C. L. S. C.," as it is called by abbreviation, is not by any means designed as a substitute for a regular collegiate course of study. While it covers the college outlook, it is rather designed for those who have not had the advantage of such a training, and yet who have a thirst for knowledge. Already in a number of instances it has awakened in some of its youthful readers an ardent desire for a thorough collegiate course, and has started them on the way. At the same time it is designed to help men of business who are college graduates of other schools, and who desire to keep up with the results of their earlier days. So popular is this new movement that the "C. L. S. C." now numbers sixty thousand members engaged in one or another of a four years' course of reading. It has over one thousand local "circles," numbering from three students to several hundred each. These are to be found in all parts of the United States, even in Alaska, and also in Canada, Great Britain, India, China, Japan, and the Sandwich Islands. The first class was graduated in 1882, after having pursued the four years' course of reading, and numbered over seventeen hundred. The second class, which graduated in 1883, consisted of nearly thirteen hundred members.

5. The Chautauqua Young Folks' Reading Union, begun in 1881. For this there is an annual course of entertaining reading provided. The design is to drive out interesting bad books by interesting good books. It is especially intended for children and young people.

6. The Chautauqua Missionary Society, founded in 1880, is designed to increase interest in domestic and foreign missions.

7. The Chautauqua College of Music, begun in 1888. This, as its name implies, aims at the cultivation of the science and of the art of music.

III. General Characteristics and Accessories.—Life at Chautauqua would be anything but rest should one undertake to attend all the different meetings. He would be kept busy from early in the morning until late at night, with but little intermission for recreation or food. But this would be clearly an abuse of the design of the institution, and would be contrary to the spirit of it. He should visit Saratoga for his health and drink of all the different springs as rapidly as he could ride from one to another. There is abundant time for recreation and for rest to those who wish them, as most of the visitors do. Each must make a selection of the lectures or other exercises of the day he wishes to attend, and leave the others to those who prefer them.
CHAUTAUQUA 915

departments of instruction are in operation simultaneously. Then there are certain hours in the morning and evening when all exercises are closed excepting the popular lecture, or concert, or addresses in the amphitheatre. If one be so disposed he may absent himself from these and employ the time in fishing, or examining the woods, or sailing on the lake, or quietly seated in tent or cottage, and then at half-past ten at night go to bed at the sound of the chimes of bells, generally sure of being undisturbed until the same faithful sentinels shall announce the coming of six o'clock in the morning.

The appliances for the educational purposes designed are very complete at Chautauqua. The original auditorium consisted merely of rough benches fixed under the shade of the forest trees, and a large covered platform. There were sittings for about three thousand people. This old place of gathering still remains, and is frequently used, but it long since became too small for the immense congregations who gather in Chautauqua. Five or six years ago an amphitheatre was built, or, to speak more correctly, an amphitheatre which nature had made was seated and roofed over.
This will easily accommodate six thousand people. It has been planned for the church service, for Sunday school, for concerts, and is the favorite place for the great lecturers and preachers who every year delight Chautauqua audiences. There are also other buildings for smaller audiences: the Hall of Philosophy; the Childdren's Temple; the Chapel; the Normal Pavilion.

Besides these places for audiences there are places devoted to education through the eye. "Newton Hall" has a Museum of Art and of Sacred and General Archaeology. There is a model of the Holy Land nearly three hundred feet long, with Lake Chautauqua as the Mediterranean sea. There is a model of the City of Jerusalem; and a sectional model of the Great Pyramid.

During the height of the assembly season, a daily paper is published on the grounds, edited by the Rev.
T. L. Flood, D.D. It has eight large pages and forty-eight columns, and is called The Assembly Herald. There is also a monthly magazine known as The Chautauquan, a quarteto seventy-two pages, under the same editorship. These periodicals are devoted to the interests of the Chautauqua Assembly. In them are published reports of the various meetings held and of the lectures and addresses delivered. Besides this The Chautauquan has included the following to be found in the course of reading prescribed for the "C. L. S. C."

The attendance at Chautauqua, especially at the height of the season, is something wonderful. The residents for the term and the casual visitors are numbered by the ten thousand. In 1888 the receipts from all sources were forty thousand dollars, of which nearly thirty thousand dollars were taken at the gate, as payment for admission to the premises. The entire re-cipts are devoted to the payment of expenses and to the improvement of the grounds. The men to whom the management is intrusted, and who do the most important and necessary part of the labor, receive no salaries, and, if the whole truth were known, it would probably be found that they are sometimes out of pocket.
Their work is purely a labor of love, and they consider themselves well paid in beholding the results. (J. M. F.)

CHAUTAUQUA SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY is a char-terred institution affiliated with the Chautauqua Assembly, and incorporated by the New York Legislature in 1881. It is intended for the benefit of young ministers, or of older ones who may wish to review their early studies. It has an elaborate and thorough course.
Its work is divided into eight regular departments and four special, each department being under the direction of a designated regents or superintendents: I. Greek: 1. New Testament Greek; 2. Biblical Greek; 3. Christian Science and Philosophy; 7. Human Nature; 8. Literature and Art. The special departments are: 1. The Relation between Body and Soul; 2. Elocution; 3. Industrial Economy and Trade; 4. Jurisprudence.

The business of the school is conducted by correspondence. The studies prescribed are to be pursued at home and the students are supplied with the most up-to-date works of the day. The presence of competent committees, under the direction of the deans of the various departments. Should the student pass satisfactory examinations on all the studies he will receive the degree of "Bachelor of Divinity."
The studies of the eight departments will require four or five years, and no honors degree, of any kind will be conferrèd. The degree of Doctor of Divinity will be conferred only upon graduates of the Chautauqua School of Theology who pass special examinations for this degree, and who also hold positions of prominence in their respective denominations.

This school is not designed as a substitute for the ordinary theological seminaries of the various churches.
It does not claim to be even a rival to them, but rather seeks to supplement their work. It is undenominational in its character. It is at present, and has been from the beginning, under the presidency of the Rev.
J. H. Vincent, D.D. The dean of the school is the Rev.
A. W. Weeks, M.A., M.R.C.S.

Besides the deans of the several departments there is a board of "counselors," and also a secretary of the archaeological department. There has already been made the beginning of an archaeological library and museum. The design is to have a collection of books, manuscripts, charts, plans, and casts, to assist in the study of the Scriptures. This collection is kept at Chautauqua.

The whole number of students enrolled at the time of the last report (April, 1884) was three hundred and seven. They are divided among the various denominations and are found in all parts of the country.

Connected with the school is the JERUSALEM CHAM-BER OF THEOLOGY, the design of which is to furnish ministers, lay-preachers, Y. M. C. A. workers, evangelists, Sunday-school officers and teachers courses of non-professional studies covering the entire field of theological, religious, and ethical literature. These departments are arranged with special adaptation to ministers who, from any cause, are unable to pursue with profit
the regular curriculum in the sacred languages.

The departments under survey are as follows: 1. Histori-ical Theology; 2. Homiletics; 5. Biblical Theology; 4. Doctrinal Theology; 5. Hebraic Literature (Christian and Pagan); 6. Literature and Art; 7. Religious Biography; 9. Palestine Exploration; 10. Archaeoly; 11. Hermeneutics, Old Testament; 12. Hermeneutics, New Testament; 13. Ancient History; 14. Modern History; 15. Philosophy; 16. Mental Science; 17. Philo-23. The Evidences of Christianity; 24. The Great Religions; 25. Greek and Roman History; 26. The Barbaric Incrusions; 27. The Ancient Monarchies; 28. The He-Christian Fine Arts; 31. Essays and Reviews; 32. Christian Criticism; 33. Biblical Criticism; 34. The Church and the State: Egyptology; 37. History of the Primitive Church; 38.
The Church Fathers; 39. The Church and her Reformers; 40. Introduction to Theology.

The business of this chamber is conducted by correspondence, the same as that of the school. A special session of the Chautauqua School of Theology is held for about four weeks during the summer, at Chautauqua; during this session oral lectures are delivered by the professors. (J. M. F.)

CHAUTAUQUA UNIVERSITY is an outgrowth of the Chautauqua Assembly, and was chartered by the legislature of the state of New York in 1888. There are in operation, as part of this university, colleges of Latin, Greek, German, French, and English, the studies of Checkley, John, a missionary of the Church of England, was born at Boston, Mass., in 1860. After studying at the grammar school in his native city, he completed his education at Oxford, where he was an assistant in the Schools of the University for three years, and in 1879 left England and travelled through Europe, collecting valuable paintings, manuscripts, etc., and was again in Boston in 1875. A pamphlet was published by him in 1873, entitled A Model Proof of the Order and Government Settled by Christ, and His Apostles in the Church—devoted to the interests of the Church of England. This called forth an elaborate answer from Dr. Wigglesworth, of Harvard College, and was the beginning of the first great controversy on the subject of episcopacy in this country. During the same year he published a book bearing on the same subject, but opposing deists and dissenters alike. This gave great offence, both in America and in Great Britain. In 1727 he went to England for ordination; but, in consequence of the opposition from some of the Congregational ministers of Marblehead, Mass., the bishop of London refused to ordain him, and he returned to America disappointed. In 1739 he went again to England, succeeded in obtaining ordination, and was sent as a missionary to Providence, R. I. Besides preaching there he officiated at intervals, in Warwick and Attleborough, this pastorating extending over fourteen years. He died at Providence, Feb. 15, 1753. Dr. Eliot declares that he was an excellent linguist, well acquainted with Hebrew, Latin, and Greek, as well as many of the languages of the North American Indians. Many stories and ludicrous tricks are ascribed to him, and he frequently offended others by the strong expression of his own opinions. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v. 149.

Checkley, Samuel (1), a Congregational minister, was born at Boston, Mass., and graduated from Harvard College in 1715. He was ordained the first minister of the New or South Church, in Boston, Nov. 22, 1719, and died in 1763, aged seventy years. He published several pamphlets. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i. 313.

Checkley, Samuel (2), a Congregational minister, son of the foregoing, was born at Boston, Mass., and graduated from Harvard College in 1743. He was settled over the Old or North Church, Boston, as colleague with the Rev. Joseph Gee, Sept. 3, 1747; and died March 11, 1768. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i. 313.

Checoeur (Chequier, or Checker) is the officer or place of business of a monastic bursar or financial officer.

Chedda, bishop of the East Angles. See CYPE.

Chedelles, in Oriental mythology, was a Turkish hero, similar to Saint George of the Christians, and, as there is reason to believe, based upon the latter and modified according to the fashion of Eastern countries.

Chedsey, William, D.D., an English Roman Catholic divine, became prebendary of London in 1564, canon of Windsor in 1564, archdeacon of Middlesex in 1564, prebendary of York in 1567, and vicar of Coventry, Christ College, Oxford, in 1568. He was deprived of all his preferments in 1569 for not taking the oath of supremacy, and committed to the Fleet Prison. He published several sermons and disputations. Chedwalla. See CHGWALLA.

Chedworth, John, a bishop in England in the reign of Henry VI, was a native of Gloucestershire, and educated at King's College, Cambridge. He was third provost of the same college for six years; elected bishop of Lincoln, and, with bishop Wainfleet of Winchester, was, at the instance of Henry VI, on a commission to regulate the statutes of Eton and King's colleges. He was bishop for eighteen years, and died in 1471. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), ii. 566.

Cheeseman, Lewis, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Princeton, N. J., Oct. 27, 1803; and, being left an orphan when a child, struggled with poverty in securing an education. He was licensed by the Bath Presbytery when nineteen years of age, and commenced his labors at Angelica. In 1826 he was called to Albon, where his labors were greatly blessed; in 1830, to Byron; in 1831, to Scottsville; in 1848, to the Fourth Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia, Pa. In 1856 he published a book, entitled Ishmael and the Church; and in 1859 was made superintendent of the Board of Presbyterian Missions. He died Dec. 21, 1861. Dr. Cheeseman was an energetic and faithful student. He adopted the extemporaneous style for the pulpit. "His nice choice of words and his rich imagery were wonderful." See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1863, p. 144.

Cheesewright, Joseph, an English Wesleyan minister, was a native of Lincolnshire. He entered the ministry in 1818; retired from the itinerant labors in 1832, and died May 4, 1861. Cheerful, and generous to the poor, he was respected and beloved. His style of speaking was colloquial, with illustrations drawn from ordinary life. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1861, p. 19.

Cheeseman, Daniel, a Baptist minister, was born in Brown University in 1811. Soon after he was licensed by the Second Baptist Church in Boston, in July, 1812. He was ordained at an early age, and baptized Oct. 30, 1803. He graduated from Brown University in 1811. Soon after he was licensed by the Second Baptist Church in Boston, in July, 1812. He was ordained shortly afterwards, and settled in Warren, R. I., for two years, and then at Hallowell, Me., for nine years. He was the minister of the church increased under his care from fifty to two hundred and fifty persons. He removed in 1834 to Barnstable, and labored most acceptably until his death, May 21, 1839. He was one of the most useful and honored ministers of his denomination in the states in which he lived. See Christian Watchman, June 14, 1839. (J. C. S.)

Cheeseman, Jarvis, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Mereworth, Kent, Feb. 8, 1803. He joined the Church in 1823, entered the ministry in 1830, became a supernumerary in 1835, settled in Haverford-West, and died Feb. 3, 1866. His ministry was valued. He was amiable and courteous, and was faithful and firm in the discharge of duty. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1866, p. 20.

Cheesewright, James Harey, an English Wesleyan missionary, was converted in his sixteenth year, sent to the West Indies in 1833, and died at Puerto Plata, San Domingo, August, 1836, in the twenty-sixth year of his age. He overcame difficulties, conciliated the hostile, strengthened the feeble, and aroused the careless. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1857.

Cheetham, Charles, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Heywood, near Manchester, in 1794. He united with the Church at the age of twelve; commenced his ministry in 1825; retired, broken by sickness, in 1854, and died May 12, 1856. Mr. Cheetham was an animating preacher. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1856.

Cheever, Amos, a Congregational minister, son of Rev. Samuel Cheever of Marblehead, Mass. He graduated from Harvard College in 1767, was ordained at Manchester, Nov. 17, 1716; and died Jan. 15, 1758. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 255.

Cheever, Ebenezer, a Presbyterian minister, was born in 1877. He was converted in his twentieth year, and graduated from Bowdoin College, Brunswick, Me., in 1817. He accepted a call to Mount Vernon Congregational Church, N. J., in 1819; in 1824 became pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Waterford, N. Y., and there labored for six years with zeal and success. In 1834 he took charge of the First Presbyterian Church of Newark, N. J., which under his administration, for twelve years, greatly prospered. About 1847 he accepted a call to the Presbyterian Church in Tecumseh, Mich.; in 1851 received a call to Ypsilanti, and in 1856 returned to New Jersey, and established Hillside Seminary, in West Bloomfield. He died Dec. 31, 1866. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1867, p. 287.

Cheffontaines (in Low Breton, Penfelotenten, in Latin, A Cupula Fontium), Chrystomus vi, a French theologian, was bishop of the Breton diocese, 1532. He entered the Franciscan order, taught theology at Rome, and was elected general of his order in 1571; was made nominal archbishop of Casarea about 1586, and exercised the episcopal functions in the diocese of Sens, in the absence of the regular incumbent. Cheffontaines was therefore able to exercise a large measure of authority, and went to Rome to justify himself. In the space of five years he applied successively to five popes, Sixtus V, Urban VII, Gregory XIV, Innocent IX, and Clement VIII, and finally received letters from the pontiff which imposed silence on his enemies. He died in Rome, May 26, 1555, leaving, La Défense de la Foi de nos Ancêtres (Paris, 1570); translated by the author under the title of Defensio Fidelis, etc. Novitium in Libris Apostolici Chelromancy (from χειρ, the hand, and μαρτυς, to indicate) is the wooden board which is struck by a mallet, in Oriental Greek churches, to summon the people to service. This is the usual call to worship for all classes in the East, in consequence of the prohibition of the Turks, who imagine that their sound drives away the good spirits.

Chirotheia (from χειρ, the hand, and τιθεμ, to put, or place) is a word used in the Greek New Test.
to indicate ordinance, or the laying on of hands.
Episcopalians attach great importance to the chirotheia in the ordination of office-bearers. See Ordination.

Chirotonia (from χειρ, the hand, and τιθομ, to stretch out) is a word used in the Greek New Test.
to indicate the election of church officers, because one method of voting for them was by holding up or stretching out the hands. See Ordination.

Chesholme, Alexander, a Scotch clergyman, probably a son of Alexander, an early minister at Comrie, was appointed the second Protestant minister at Muthill in 1576; lived with his aged mother-in-law till 1588; was transferred to Comrie before 1585, at which place he was the first minister of the Protestant faith, and had three other parishes in charge.
He was transferred as minister to the Free Kirk of Lochport in 1590, which parish he was the first Protestant clergyman, and was deposed in May, 1592, not having the gift of exhortation nor application, although he had fifteen days given him to expound a text. See Fusti Eccles. Scotiae, ii, 782, 783, 779.

Chesholme, Archibald, A.M., a Scotch clergyman of Dumblane, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews, and was called to the living at New-battle in 1665, and ordained; transferred to Corstorphine in 1666, and died in 1670, aged about thirty-seven years. See Fusti Eccles. Scotiae, i, 137, 295.

Chesholme, Gilbert, a Scotch clergyman, a member of the convent of the Cistercian monastery at Deer, adopted the principles of the reformation, and was appointed the first Protestant minister at Deer, in 1567, having three other parishes in charge. He was prevented to the parsonage at Lunney by the king in 1569, and to the parsonage and vicarage of Rathin the same year. In 1574 his charge was reduced to three parishes, and in 1576 to two only. He continued in 1586. See Fusti Eccles. Scotiae, iii, 619.

Chelcitzky, Petr, one of the most important writers of the Hussite period, who died about 1460, is known by his writings, in which he advocated the free exercise of religion. He rejected every civic as well as ecclesiastical form of government, and denounced both punishment as in opposition to true Christianity.
After the defeat of the Taborites his doctrines found many adherents, and formed, in 1458, the basis of the Kunwander Union, from which resulted the Bohemian Brethren.

of the coming of spring.

Chelidonius and Haematerius, brothers and soldiers, were martyred at the Gason town of Calagur-sis (Calahorra, in Castile). The date of their martyrdom is wholly uncertain. They are honored with a hymn by Prudentius,れないとs, which is quoted by Gregory of Tours (Glor. Mort. p. 98). The day of the martyrdom of the saints is March 3, according to Gregory.

years. He was ordained in 1769, and was transferred in 1792, to the college curacy of Lathbury, near Newport-Pagnell, and to the benefice of Badger, in Shropshire, by Isaac Hawkins Browne. He was also presented to the rectory of Droxford, in Hampshire, by Dr. North, bishop of Winchester, whose chaplain he was. He died in 1801, leaving an able series of Remarks on Gilpin’s Rom-tory (1772, 8vo; 1878, much enlarged). He is supposed to have had a share in the collection of papers published at Oxford under the title of Olla Podrida, and to have published an Essay on the History of Mroziiino. He also made a valuable collection of prints and gems, and Chelim, in the mythology of Central America, especially among the Caribbeans, is the great spirit who made heaven and earth. He is elevated above all temporal concerns. Evil deeds offend him as little as good deeds make him glad. Neglecting everything subordinate, he lives in the enjoyment of his own blessedness.

The Caribbeans do not worship him by any cult; they only think of him in their hearts, because he does not need their offerings.

Chenwai, in Oriental mythology, is the name of the bridge over the gulf which separates, according to Zoroaster's teaching, the realm of light from that of darkness. The spirits of the dead are obliged to confess their sins upon this bridge, and as confessions as those are pardonable or otherwise, they are admitted to the realm of light or hurled into the yawning gulf. It is said there is a place in Tibet, near the spring of Brahmaputra, showing what this doctrine is designed to express. The pilgrims to this sacred place are transported across an abyss on a scale. Suspended in midair, they are obliged to confess their sins to the bouzes. Any hesitancy, even the slightest stammering, may cause the bouzes to remove the balance, and the unfortunate one is hurled into the depth below. See SIRTH.

He accepted the pastorate of the Presbyterian Church at Niagara Falls in November, 1846; next at Oakes Corners, Ontario Co.; then at Shortsville, as a missionary employed by the American Home Missionary Society, until 1857, and was agent for the Presbyterian Publication Committee until 1861. From November, 1861, he supplied the Church at Havana, N. Y., and from April, 1868, likewise that at Dresden, continuing at both until December, 1871. He died suddenly at Geneva, April 4, 1878. He was a devoted Christian, whose religious life ran in deep channels. He was a firm believer in the doctrines of grace. As a preacher, he was clear, condensed, quiet, earnest, sometimes thrilling. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1878, p. 45.

Chester, George, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Grinshill, Shropshire, England, May 2, 1829. He was converted when about sixteen; emigrated to America in 1849; and in 1851 entered the Wisconsin Conference, wherein he served the Church until his decease, Sept. 24, 1865. Mr. Chester, though not a loud preacher, was yet a fair talker and useful preacher. He was careful and energetic in all his domestic and ministerial duties. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1865, p. 235.

Chester, Henry, an English Congregational minister, was born at Bristol, May 23, 1816. He was converted at the age of sixteen; joined the Wesleyan Methodists, and, being fervent in spirit and active in disposition, soon became very prominent in the Sabbath-school, "class," and prayer meetings, and as preacher in the courts and alleys of the city, as well as the villages around. Later he united with the Independents, was ordained at Salisbury, and afterwards preached at Newport and at Cardiff, where he died Feb. 28, 1878. Mr. Chester's life was uneventful, and his pious manifest to all. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-Book, 1874, p. 318.

Chester, John (1), an English Independent, was minister at Wetherly, Leicestershire, some years; was violently dispossessed after 1660; came to London and preached in Christ-Church till ejected, in 1663. He ministered at Spitalfields, yeat at the Independent meetings, in the Union Street; went up with the address to the king in 1687, and died at Guildford, Surrey, in May, 1696. Dr. Calamy says, "He lived desired, and died lamented." See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, iv, 198-195.

Chester, John (2), D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Wethersfield, Conn., in August, 1783. He graduated from Yale College in 1804. In 1807 he was

CHESTER

Licensed to preach by the Association of Hartford. After preaching for a short time successively at Marblehead and Springfield, Mass., and receiving calls to settle in Middletown, Conn., and Cooperstown, N.Y., he was installed pastor in Hudson, N.Y., Nov. 21, 1810; and in Albany, Nov. 15, 1811. In 1828 he became pastor of the Presbyterian Church in the last-named place. He died in Philadelphia, Jan. 12, 1829. As a preacher he w5as earnest and interesting. Dr. Chester published the following works: A Sermon before the Columbia Missionary Society (1813)—A Sermon before the Albany Moral Society (1821)—A Biographical Sketch of the Rev. Arch. Buckau, D.D. He was a frequent contributor to the Columbian Magazine. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv. 401.

CHESTER, William, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Wetherfield, Conn., Nov. 20, 1795. He graduated from Union College in 1813, and studied at the Theological Seminary at Princeton until 1817. He was licensed by the Albany Presbytery in 1816, and became pastor of the Presbyterian Church, Galway, N.Y. In 1822 he was called to a church in Hudson, where he remained till 1832, at which time he was selected to canvass the states of Virginia and North Carolina in the interest of the Presbyterian Church. After his election to membership in the board, he held various important offices in it until his death, in Washington, D. C., May 23, 1865. See Wilson, Preb. Hist. Almanac, 1866, p. 96; Gen. Ctt. of Princeton Theol. Sem. p. 22.

CHESTNUT, Thomas M., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Washington County, Pa.; graduated from Washington College; was ordained by the Presbytery of Steuben in 1834; preached the Gospel for many years in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa, and died at Perryville, O., March 6, 1872, aged sixty-nine years. He was a laborious and faithful minister. See Presbytery, March 28, 1872.

Chester, for the Cork or Vestment. These were of triangular shape, such as remain at Gloucester, York, Salisbury, and Westminster. In the 13th century the synod of Exeter required a chest for books and vestments in every parish. Such parish chests of Early English date remain at Clitheroe, Stoke on Avelon, Saltwood, and Graveney; of Decorated date at Brancephol, Hutton, and Haconby; of Perpendicular period at St. Michael's, Coventry, St. Mary's, Cambridge, and Oxford Cathedral. A "Flanders chest" remains at Glastonbury. Some very rude coffer, bound with iron, are preserved in some churches, and others are enriched with color; these are probably of late date. The material was often eypress or fir. Others are curiously painted, like one in the vestry of Lambeth Palace. Several Early English chests are preserved in the triforium of Westminster Abbey; one is at Salisbury, and another was removed from the Pyx Chapel to the Record Office. See Cistik.

CHESTLE, Henry Hurlbert, a Wesleyan minister, son of Rev. John Chestle, and grandson of Rev. Simon Day, was born at Burton-upon-Trent, March 5, 1809. For six years studied at Kingswood School, and afterwards became a master in Woodhouse Grove. In 1832 he received his first charge (Pickering); in 1832 was elected secretary of the Worn-Out Ministers and Ministers' Widows' Auxiliary Fund, and ably served the interests of this department for the rest of his life. After having been eight years governor of Woodhouse Grove School, he retired in 1876 and settled at Easterbrook, Bradford, where he died, June 19, 1878. "Chestle was eminently a good man. His ministry was able, in-structive, evangelical. He had the gift of grace, and quick perception, and firm in action, administered discipline with wisdom, charity, and success, and greatly served the connection both in peaceful and troublesome times." Mr. Chestle published an address, delivered at Woodhouse Grove, on The Wise Son (1849), and also fugitive Sermons (1850, 1851, 1857, 1863). See Minutes of the British Conference, 1878, p. 46; Osborne, Wesleyan Bibliography.

CHESTLE, John, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Domington Castle in 1777. He was piously trained, and at the age of thirteen was converted; entered the ministry in 1797, and travelled twenty-eight different circuits. He became a supernumerary in 1847, and died Aug. 8, 1850. Mr. Chestle was a plain, practical, and faithful minister, and shared in the success as well as in the persecutions and obloquy of the rising cause. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1860.

CHESTERWOOD, Knightly, D.D., an English divine, was born in 1652, and was educated at Eton. He was made fellow of King's College, Cambridge, in 1688, when he contributed the Life of Lycurgus to the translation of Plutarch's Lives, published in the same year. In April, 1707, he was installed dean of Gloucester, which preferment he enjoyed until his death at Tempes, Apr. 10, 1730, aged 77, of a consumption. Chesterwood wrote the Life of Virgil, and the Preface to the Pastoral, prefixed to Dryden's Virgil. He was author also of several poems, some of which are preserved in Dryden's Miscellanies, and in Mr. Nichol's collection.

CHESTWYND, John, an English clergyman, was born at Banwell, Somersetshire, in 1628, and admitted acommoner of Exeter College, Oxford, in 1638, where he took his master's degree in 1648. He was one of the joint pastors of St. Cuthbert, in Wells, afterwards became vicar of the Temple, in Bristol, one of the city lecturers, and a prebendary of the cathedral. He died Dec. 30, 1692. Besides some Sermons, he published a curious book, entitled Antiquites Historian, containing fourteen centuries of memorable occurrences, etc. (Lond. 1674, 8vo).

CHEURL, bishop, attests a charter of Offa, king of Mercia, A.D. 777, thought to be doubtful or spurious.

CHEUSE, NICOLAS DU, a French martyr, was going from Besancon to the town of Gry, but did not do homoy to a cross in the woods, April 14, 1570. Dr. who was an inquisitor, suspected him. Being guided by this monk to Gry, he was there concealed. When carried to the place of martyrdom, he was offered his liberty on condition of kneeling down and hearing a mass. But Nicolas preferred to die rather than commit such a sin. Calling upon the Lord, took his death patiently. He was burned in 1554. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv. 424.

CHEVALIER, Antoine Rudolph, a French theologian, was born in 1507, at Montchamps, Normandy. He was professor of Hebrew at Strasburg, Geneva, and Caen. In 1568 he had to leave the latter place on account of religious persecution, and went to England, where he became professor at Cambridge. In 1570 he returned to Caen, but was obliged in 1572 to leave it again, and went to the isle of Guernsey, where he died the same year. He is the author of Rudimenta Hebr. Ling. Accurate Methodo Conscripita (Geneva, 1560, a.o.). See Frits, Bibl. Jud. i. 151; Steinheinrich, Bibliog. Handbuch, p. 94; Catalogus Libr. Hebr., in Biblioth. CHEVET (cyprium) is the place corresponding to the position of our Lord's head upon the cross, on the ground-plan of the church, in which the altar represents his head, and the radiator the chapel or glory above. Like the apse, it took its origin from the junction of the circular mortuary chapel with the choir, by the removal of the intermediate walls, in a basilica. The tomb-house has been preserved at Canterbury. See Dodsheim, Batalba, Burgos, and Murcia. The chevet appears at Tintern, Pershore, and Tewkesbury. In France its screen of tall pillars is very striking.

CHEVILLARD, André, a French preacher of the Dominican order, was born at Rennes early in the 13th century, and died in America, May 26, 1082. Having been sent several times as a missionary to the French colonies in this country, he published, in the interval of his travels, Editions de l'extense Regle pour l'adeptes, etc. (Rennes, 1659, 4to), which contained the conversion of a large body of Indians, and of 240 heretics who had come over from France. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

CHEVIER, Charles N., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, became assistant minister, about 1864, of St. Michael's Church, New Bedford, N. J. In 1865 he officiated in Union Church, Lower Providence, near Shamokin, Pa., subsequently became rector of Memorial Church, Lower Providence, and in 1868 assumed the rectoryship of Trinity Church, Swedesboro, N. J., where he remained until his death, Nov. 13, 1872, at the age of thirty-two years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1873, p. 134.

CHEW, Jonas C., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born according to the New Jersey, in 1827. He received a careful religious training; was led to Christ at the age of fourteen; licensed to exhort at twenty-four, to preach at twenty-eight, and at the age of forty received ordination as deacon. His services as local preacher were abundant and successful, and continued till he joined the New Jersey Conference. In 1860 his failing health obliged him to become a local, and he retired to his farm in Cumberland County, where he died of cholera, Oct. 3, 1866. Mr. Chew was an excellent preacher, and brought many into the church. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1867, p. 45.

CHEW, Thomas B., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Anne Arundel County, Md., Jan. 2, 1823. He was converted in youth, soon after given license to preach, and in 1844 admitted into the Baltimore Conference. See Labbe, Concil. xi, 1846; Wilkins, Concil. ii, 169.

III. Held in 1292, by the same prelate; here seven canons were published. 1. Forbids the permitting any animals, except tithe famers, to enter the church for fifteen days only, to feed in churchyards. 2. Forbids any restraint upon voluntary offerings made by the people to the Church. 3. Excommunicates, ipso facto, those who retain the tithe. 4. Orders silence and decent behavior in church. 5. Forbids indiscriminate burial within the church; the lords and great merchants, and the patrons with their wives, the rector, and the curate, are excepted. 6. Forbids the putting up an alms-box in the church without the bishop's permission. 7. Directs that these regulations shall be published four times in each year.

See Labbe, Concilium, xi, 1861; Wilkins, Concilium, ii, 183.

Chichester, Elijah, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Huntington (L. l.), N. Y., about 1785. He studied divinity under religious instruction: experienced conversion when about eighteen; received license to preach about four years later, and soon after entered the itinerant ranks of the Troy Conference. Poor support obliged him to locate in 1807 in order to provide for his family. He entered into mercantile pursuits, to which he returned, when at his request he was readmitted into his conference as a supernumerary, which relation he sustained to the close of his life, Aug. 21, 1855. Mr. Chichester was an excellent man, uncommonly strong in mind and moral integrity, deeply pious, a fine preacher, abundant in labor and usefulness. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1856, p. 52.

Chichester, Isaac, a Presbyterian minister, was born in New Caanaan, Conn., in November, 1786. He studied medicine and continued in its practice, mostly in Pembroke, N. Y., till 1832; was licensed by the Genesee Presbytery in 1838, and became pastor at Orangeville, where he labored for twenty years. He died at Bennington, Aug. 27, 1854. He was prudent, high-minded, and prominent. See Wilson, Prob. Hist. Almanac, 1866, p. 211.

See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), i, 422.

Chichester, Robert, an English prelate of the 12th century, descended from a noble and ancient family in Devonshire, became first dean of Salisbury, then bishop of Exeter in 1128, died in 1150, and was buried on the south side of the altar. He is highly commend ed by many writers for his piety, though his priory suffered from the pillage and violence of the Saracens. He was buried in building and adorning his cathedral. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), i, 408.

Chichikoe (the clapper), is the only musical instrument of the North American Indians. It consists either of a hollow pumpkin or gourd, or of a turtle-shell, filled with stones, so that by shaking it it gives forth a rattling sound. It is used at religious and festive dances.

Chick, John, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Berwick, Me., Dec. 29, 1806. He removed to Osippee, N. H., in his early youth, became a Christian in 1850, was licensed in 1853, and ordained at a quarterly meeting in East Woborough, May 25, 1853. From 1853 to 1873, he was for the most of the time the minister of the Second Free-will Baptist Church in Osippee. He performed some ministerial work in East Woborough, Effingham Falls, and Wakefield, and frequently visited the churches in his quarterly-meeting district. He died, Oct. 9, 1874. See Minutes of Conference, 1873, p. 94, 1874. (J. C. S.)

Chickering, Lucius, a Baptist minister, was born at Lunenburg, Vt., Oct. 16, 1815. He pursued his preparatory studies at Brandon, and graduated at Water ville College in 1842. He taught a school in Bethlehem, N. H., for six months afterwards; and began to preach at Meredith in 1848, supplying the pulpit of the Baptist Church there for two years, and for a year that in Haverhill. In 1848 he was ordained over the Church in Thetford, Vt., and in 1851 went to Weston, where he was pastor three years, but returned to his native place, Lunenburg, for five years (1854-59), cultivating a farm for the support of his family, and preaching the Gospel to the destitute churches in his neighborhood. For one year he labored with great zeal as a colporteur in the employ of the American Tract Society, N. Y., in northern Vermont. In October, 1870, he returned to his former church in Weston, with which he labored until he was laid aside by his last sickness. He died there, Sept. 18, 1872. See Eulogy Read at Colby University, Saleable, No. 1, p. 10. (J. C. S.)

Chidester, David, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born about 1806. He was converted in his youth, and in 1838 entered the Black River Conference; but after laboring seventeen years, failing health obliged him to become a supernumary. Seven years later he again entered the effective ranks, but was only able to labor four years, and retired for good. When not in the pastoral work he practiced medicine and dentistry. He died a supernumerary member of the Central New York Conference, at his residence in Syracuse, Sept. 7, 1875. Mr. Chidester possessed rare talent and culture; was genial and liberal. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1875, p. 12.

Chida, in the mythology of the Orient, was, according to Arabian sagas, the commander-in-chief of an ancient Persian sovereign, Kheikhobab, and a prophet who, having drank from the spring of life, now lives until the judgment-day. Alexander the Great sought this spring of eternal youth, which was said to be in Caucasus, but without success. Chida is mentioned in the Book of Persepolis, which bears a remarkable name.

Chielie, John (1), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1672, was appointed to the living at Quoan in 1671, and died April 4, 1683, aged about fifty-three years. His son John became a great incendiary during the troubles, and his son Walter was notorious as the assassin of lord president Lochart in 1689. See Fusti Eccles. Scot., i, 227.

Chielie, John (2), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1704, and studied theology at Glasgow University, where he held a bursary; became governor (tutor) to Richard Carmichael; was licensed to preach in 1716; called to the living at Fenwick in 1719; ordained in 1719; and died March 22, 1740. Chielisle, John (3), a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1754; presented to the living at Abercrombie in 1756; ordained in 1757, and transferred to Corstopthine in 1758. He introduced the Psalms into public worship, which offended some of the people, and they formed a secession congregation at Sighthill. He died June 12, 1788. See Farti Eccles. Scoticae, ii, 137; ii, 408.

Chieftet (or Chiffet) is the name of several learned Frenchmen, of whom we mention the following:

1. Jean, son of Jean Jacques, born about 1612, was canon of Tournaï, and a Hebrew scholar. He died Nov. 27, 1666, leaving, among other works, Apologetica Paraenesis ad Linguam Sanctam: —Judicium de Fabula Jeanaeo papinae.

2. Jean Jacques, a physician, was born Jan. 21, 1588, at Bézançon, and died in 1600. He wrote, among other works, De Lastea Sepulchralibus Christi Servatoris (Anvers, 1624): —De Amissa Renatus (ibid. 1650); in which he proves that the legend is a pious fraud.

3. Laurent, brother of Jean Jacques, was born in 1588; joined in 1617 the order of the Jesuits; became a zealous missionary, and died March 2, 1635. He wrote, Paschaliari B. Mariae: —Doctrina Christiatis: —Exercitia Infirorum: —Prophasia Devotionis, etc.

4.Philippe, another brother of Jean Jacques, was born at Bézançon, May 10, 1597. He was a canon of Bézançon, abbot of Balerin, archbishop of Bézançon, etc., and died in 1637. He is known by his Canonum et Descria Concilii Tridentini, cum Praefatione et Notis (Anvers, 1640).

5. Pierre François, also brother of Jean Jacques, was born in 1592. In 1609 he joined the Jesuits, and died at Paris, May 11, 1682. He edited the works of Polignatus and of other French writers.

Chija (or Chaja), Ban-Abba, a Jewish writer of the 9th century, and a contemporary of Judah the Holy, was descended from a noble Babylonian family. He settled in Palestine, to co-operate with Rabbi Judah in his great work, the redaction of the Mishna, at Tiberias. Judah held him in the highest esteem, speaking of him as "the man of his counsel" (Baba Mezia, fol. 31 b), saying that "if the laws were lost, he would be able to restore it from memory." He was a Biblical as well as a traditional teacher, and labored not only to indoctrinate his students with the dogma of the oral law, but to lead them to the fountains of pure inspiration. His indefatigable and all-embracing activity was such as to give occasion to the hyperbolical saying that "Chija, with his own hand, took the deer in the chase and skinned them for parchments, which he would inscribe with the records of the law, and distribute, without money or price, for the instruction of the young." He taught, concerning the book of Job, that its author was no Jew, and that Solomon wrote his books when he was old. Chiliam-Cambol, in the mythology of the West-Indians, was said to be the name of a great prophet in Yucatan, who commanded the inhabitants to recognise and obey the doctrine of the bearded men that would come to them from the west, and bring them the coming one.

Chilcott, Cyrus A., a Baptist missionary, was born at East Hamboro, N. Y., Oct. 4, 1886. He graduated at the University of Rochester in 1861, and at the Rochester Theological Seminary in 1864; was ordained at Fredonia, July 20, that year, and soon after sailed, under appointment of the American Baptist Missionary Union, to Bangkok, Siam, where he died, Dec. 30, 1865. See Gen. Cat. of Rochester Theol. Sem. p. 26. (J. C. S.)

Child, Eber, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Vermont in 1758. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1821, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1826, but entered the ministry in 1822. He went to Groton, Mass., 1826. He was ordained Feb. 19, 1829; was pastor at Deerin, N. H., from 1820 to 1834; at Calais, Me., from 1834 to 1837: at Byron, N. Y., from 1839 to 1841; stated supply at Yarmouth, in 1845; at Newstead, in 1846; and at Fulton, Wis., until his death, Dec. 15, 1847. See Tram. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 69.

Child, James L., a Methodist Episcopal minister, spent his early life as a sailor. Soon after his conversion he connected himself with the Free-will Baptists, was ordained as a minister among them, and for some time labored in that position with acceptability and success. In 1868 he joined the Methodists, and in 1895 was admitted to the Michigan conference. After serving seven different charges his health failed, and obliged him to become a superannuate. He died in Denver, Colo., Sept. 10, 1873. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1874, p. 107.

Child, S. R., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in Vermont in 1825. He entered Johnson College in 1844, was ordained deacon in 1848, and admitted to the priesthood in 1851. For six years he served in Warsaw, Ill., and then removed to Decatur, where he died, Nov. 14, 1855. See Amer. Quart. Church Ret. 1855, p. 638.

Child, Willard, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Woodstock, Conn., Nov. 14, 1796. He received his preparatory education at Woodstock and Monson academies, and graduated from Yale College in 1817, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1820; from 1822 to 1825 was teacher at Blue Hill Academy, Maine; then became acting pastor at Benno, Vt., where he remained until November, 1826. He was ordained at Pittsford, April 25, 1827, and remained there until Sept. 8, 1841; then was acting pastor at North Woodstock, Conn., and Aug. 8, 1843. Was installed at Broadway Church, Norwich, where he remained until August, 1845. Next, he was installed over First Church, Lowell, Mass., Oct. 1, 1845, and was dismissed Jan. 3, 1855; Feb. 14 following was installed over the Church at Castleton, Vt., dismissed March 2, 1864; and was reappointed pastor in the same church, during absence, supplied Old South Church, Worcester, Mass. In 1866 he became acting pastor at Crown Point, N. Y., and remained such until 1873; from which date he remained without charge, but preached most of the time in Pittsford, Vt., Mooers, Plattsburg, and Champlain, N. Y. From 1849 he was corporate member of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. In 1837 and 1857 Dr. Child was moderator of the General Convention of Vermont, and preacher in 1829. He died at Mooers, Nov. 13, 1877. (W. F. S.)

Child, William Chaunoy, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Johnstown, N. Y., in August, 1817. He graduated from Union College in 1840, and from Newton Theological Institution in 1844. He was ordained at Charlestown, Mass., Oct. 30, of that year, and after six years removed to Framingham, where he was pastor until 1839. In 1861 he was chosen district secretary of the American Tract Society, Boston, and held the office eight years. He was next made district secretary of the American Baptist Publication Society, and continued in that office until 1873. During the latter years of his life Dr. Child occupied a responsible position on the editorial staff of the Watchman and Reflector. He died at Boston, Jan. 14, 1876. See Newton General Catalogue, p. 26. (J. C. S.)

of Clovis, among whom their father's kingdom was divided in 511. His capital was Paris, and his share embraced the territory between the Seine, Loire, and the sea, including part of Armorica. In the manors of these estates, noble and common, Vigilius appears to have instructed his vicar in Gaul, the archbishop of Arles, to endeavor to maintain friendly relations between Childerbert and Justinian, and in 550 the pope induced Childerbert to write to the Goths in Rome to abstain from doing anything to the prejudice of the Church. Childerbert died at Paris in 558; Clothaire became king of the united Frankish realm.

Childeric I, king of the Salian Franks, and father of Clovis, reigned from 458 to 481. Though a heathen, he had friendly relations with the Catholic Church. He had the greatest reverence for St. Genevieve, and reproved some prisoners at her instance. Ricercet has a chapter on the relations of the Frankish kings to Christianity before the conversion of Clovis. Childeric's capital was Tournay, and there, in 558, his tomb was discovered and opened.

Childers, Richard L., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born at Macon, Ga., Oct. 12, 1837. He was converted in 1841; spent the following year in Egypt, learning the Arabic language; educated at Emory and Henry College, Virginia, in 1850; removed to Pleasant Hill, De Soto Parish, La., where he was some time engaged as teacher in the Masonic Academy, and in 1851 entered the Louisiana Conference. He died at his post, in the midst of useful and arduous labors, of yellow fever, Aug. 3, 1853. As a preacher, Mr. Childers was characterized by severe plainness, excellent method, and searching application. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, 1853, p. 492.

Childers, Robert Caesar, an English Orientalist, was born in 1838, and died in London, July 25, 1876. For some time he resided at Ceylon, as private secretary to the English governor, where he paid especial attention to the Tamil literature. He is well known by his Grammar of the Tamil Language, and still more so by his dictionary of that tongue, which he was the first to make directly accessible to students. Mr. Childers also contributed to the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society of Great Britain, and other literary journals. (B. F.)

Childrey, Joshua, D.D., an English divine and moral philosopher, was born in 1823. He was educated at Rochester, and soon after became one of the clerks of the house of Magdalen College, Oxford. He left the university on the breaking out of the rebellion, but returned when Oxford was surrendered to the parliament, by which body he was expelled two years later. He then entered a school at Freshham, in Kent, for a time, when he was made chaplain to Henry, lord Herbert, and obtained the rectory of Upham, in Dorsetshire. In 1663 he was collated to the archdeaconry of Salisbury, and in June, 1664, to the prebend of Yatminster, in the same church, by bishop Earle. He died at Upway, Aug. 26, 1670. Some of his publications are: Landago Aetnologion (1652, 4to) — Syegyasticum Instituaturum (Lond. 1653, 8vo) — Britannica Bacconica (ibid. 1661, 8vo).

Childs, John, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Calvert County, Md. He was converted in early life, spent some time successfully in the local ministry, and entered the Baltimore Conference about 1789. He shortly afterwards located, and returned to his old cultural employment. In 1816 he was readmitted into the Conference, and continued in its active ranks until 1829, when ill-health obliged him to become a supernumerary. He died in the course of that year. Mr. Childs was highly esteemed as a man and a minister. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1830, p. 76.

Childs, Thomas, a Universalist minister, was born about 1794. After spending some time as a Primitive Baptist preacher, he embraced Universalism about 1832, and from that time preached it to the close of his life, as opportunity afforded. He died at Fayetville, Tenn., Aug. 14, 1872. See Universalist Register, 1870, p. 123.

Childs, Thomas S., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Beaufort, Brecknockshire, South Wales, Oct. 15, 1817. He was converted when nineteen years of age; licensed to preach two years later; emigrated to St. Clair, Schuylkill Co., Pa., in 1849, and in 1853 entered the Philadelphia Conference. He became superannuated in 1861, and died May 25, 1869. Mr. Childs was an earnest, faithful preacher, and a devout Christian. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1870, p. 48.

Childs, Wentworth L., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in New Hampshire, nurtured in the Episcopalian communion, and ordained deacon in 1849, and priest in 1851. For a time he was assistant minister of St. John's, Portsmouth, N. H., and in 1853 removed, as rector, to St. Alban's, near Washington, D. C., where he was until Dec. 14, 1860. See Amer. Quart. Church Rev. 1861, p. 186.

Chillian, a Benedictine monk of the 8th century, belonged to the monastery of Tuis-Kelie, in Ireland. He left a Life of St. Brigid, in Latin verse, which is found in the collection of Bollandus, Feb. 1, 100.

Chillau, Jean Baptiste DC, a French prelate and theologian, was born Nov. 7, 1757, in the castle of Carriere, in Poitou, and took orders very early. He became abbot in 1808, and abbot of Leccinskco, and some time later to Maria Antoinette, and in 1781 was appointed bishop of Chalons-Sur-Soone. At the time of the revolution he opposed, very strongly, the religious reforms instituted by the constitutional assembly, and left France. He protested, in 1808, with fifty-eight other bishops, against the concordat of 1801. On returning to France, in 1814, he gave in his resignation as bishop; but was appointed, in 1819, archbishop of Tours, and peer of France in 1822. He died Nov. 26, 1824, leaving several Lettres Pastorales, which were reprinted in the Collection Ecclesiastique, by the abbe Guilon, under the name of abbé Baruel. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chilton, (1), a solitary, instructed in the duties of a monastic life by a letter attributed in one copy to Nilus, but generally included in the works of Basil the Great (Epist. 42); (2) A Church servant, who is severely rebuked by Nilus (Epist. i. 156, p. 193) for his inability to keep a secret.

Chilperic II, king of France, was a son of Childeric II. On the assassination of his father, in 575, he was confined in a monastery, and ordained priest under the name of Damel. In 715 the Nuestrian Franks raised him to the throne, and his title was nominally recognized in 719 by Charles Martel, who claimed jurisdiction of the whole kingdom. He died in the following year, and was buried at Noyon.

Chilton, Hezekiah T., a Baptist minister, was born in eastern Virginia, Oct. 15, 1830. He became a Christian at the age of sixteen, was ordained Nov. 11, 1857, and preached in different places in Virginia till 1851 or 1852, his labors being accompanied with marked success. Moving to Illinois, he engaged in evangelistic work in Morgan, Scott, Green, and other counties. In the winter it was his custom to hold protracted meetminated by a spire or pinnacle, usually of rather low proportions, having apertures of various forms under, and sometimes in it, for the escape of the smoke. There are also taller shafts of various forms, square, octagonal, or circular, surmounted with a cornice, forming a sort of capital, the smoke issuing from the top.

In the 16th century the most common form of chimney-shafts was octagonal, though they were sometimes square; the smoke issues from the top, unless, as is sometimes the case, they terminate in a spire. Clustered chimney-shafts did not appear until rather later in the 16th century; afterwards they became very common, and were frequently highly ornamented, especially when of brick.

China, Joux, an English Baptist minister, was born at Hinton, near Blandford, Dorsetshire, in May, 1778. He was baptized in London, and united with the Church in Church Street, Blackfriars Road. He was ordained Dec. 29, 1807, as pastor of the newly formed Church in Lion Street, Walworth, where he remained about twenty-six years, until disabled by ill-health. He died Aug. 28, 1839. See Report of the Baptist Union, 1840, p. 57. (J. C. S.)

China is an idol of the people of Casamanzo, on the coast of North Guinea, Africa. In honor of this deity they assemble yearly, about the close of November, at midnight, previous to sowing their rice, take up the idol with great reverence, and go in procession to the appointed station where sacrifice is to be offered. A quantity of rice being burned, each devotee makes his offering, smokes his pipe, and then all unite in begging the god to bless their harvest. He is then carried back to his place of residence, in the profoundest silence. This deity is represented by the head of a bullock or ram, carved in wood, or else made of paste of the flour of millet, kneaded with blood, and blended with hair and feathers.

Chinchon, Bernardo Perez De, a Spanish theologian, was born at Gandia, in the kingdom of Valencia, and lived in the 16th century. He was canon of the Collegiate Church of Valencia, and wrote, Historia de la Suciedad, etc. (Valencia, 1586) — Epistol a de la Vida Humana (Granada, 1587, 8vo) — Anti-Metor (Salamanca, 1595). Chinese Religion. It is hardly possible to speak of one religion so extended a country as China. There are four principal religious beliefs which are distinguishable, although related to each other. The purest is that of Kon-fu-tse or Confucius (q. v.). This faith is professed by the learned, and is better designated as a philosophic system of morals than as a religion. The second is that of Lao-tse or Lao-kyun (q. v.), whose priests exert a powerful influence over the people by their prophecies and soothsayings; hence it is the popular religion. The third is called the religion of Fo, although it might, perhaps, more justly be called the religion of Buddha (q. v.), as it is a Buddhist religion modified to suit the Chinese. Both these

Albert, Thomas, a Baptist minister, was born in Virginia, probably about 1769, and went with his parents when a child to Kentucky. In 1789 he united with a "Separate" Baptist Church, and not long after began to preach. In order to bring the different schools of Baptists in Kentucky into harmony, he published, in 1801, his Terms of General Union. The desired end was accomplished, but the union lasted only a short time. A portion drew off in 1803, under the leadership of John Bailey (q. v.), to which Mr. Chilton adhered. He published a small volume in 1835, in vindication of the position which he and his associates had taken. His death took place in 1840. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclopedia, p. 216. (J. C. S.)

Chimera, in Greek mythology, was a monster produced by Typhon and Echidna. It is generally represented as a lioness, with a second head, that of a goat, projecting from the back, and the tail that of a dragon. Bellerophon was commanded by King Pirithous of Lycia, to slay the Chimera, but was driven from the field by the monster. He then returned to the city, and the inhabitants were much rejoiced.

Jobates, in Lycia, to battle with the monster, which was only possible with the assistance of Minerva. The goddess gave to the courageous youth the winged horse Pegusus, by the aid of which the Chimera was overcome.

Chimalli, in Mexican religious usages, were the consecrated shields carried by men of high rank. They were round, covered with feathers, and adorned with gold, and other decorations. It was possible to bend them and carry them under the arm.

Chim-Hoam is a Chinese idol, supposed to be the guardian of cities. All officials in the Chinese government were formerly obliged, under penalty of forfeiting their situation, to repair to the temple of Chim-Hoam when entering their official career, and thereafter, once a month, and then prostrate themselves before his altar, adore and worship the idol, with offerings of candles, perfumes, flowers, flesh, and wine, and there receive their oath of office.

Chimney (Fr. cheminée). This term was not originally restricted to the shaft of the chimney, but included the fireplace. There does not appear to be any evidence of the use of chimney-shafts in England prior to the 12th century. In the part of Rochester Castle which is of the date probably of 1180, there are complete fireplaces with semicircular backs, and a shaft in each jamb supporting a semicircular arch over the opening, which is enriched with the zigzag moulding; some of these projects slightly from the wall; the flues, however, go only a few feet up in the thickness of the wall, and are then turned out at the back, the apertures being small oblong holes. A few years later, the improvement of carrying the flue up through the whole height of the wall appears. The early chimney-shafts were of considerable height, and circular; afterwards they assumed a great variety of forms, and during the 14th century they were frequently very short. Previous to the 16th century the shaft is often short and not unfrequently ter-latter forms are younger than the religion of Confucius. The real religion of the court is that of Lama (q. v.), which is also generally accepted by the Manchochians or Tartars. All these sects have numerous priests, who mostly live in monasteries, and acknowledge high and low officials, forming a hierarchy wholly separate from the state government. They lead an idle life, and are highly honored in places where labor is a disgrace. They, however, have no functions to perform in relation to life. They are neither employed at the birth or naming of a child, nor at marriages or deaths. See Confucianism.

Chinese Versions of the Scriptures, or, rather, Versions in the Languages of China.—The preparation of an accurate version of the Bible in the Chinese language has engaged the attention of many missionaries since a very early period. The translations of the Nestorians in this direction, during their residence in China for nearly eight hundred years, have not reached us; but it is unwise to infer therefrom that they did nothing in this respect, for else how could they have taught the messages of their God and Saviour to a literary, intelligent people? The Roman Catholics, who went to China over three hundred years ago, have had means of sending learned and earnest men in their missions, some of whom have turned their attention to a translation of the Bible into those languages. The portions which are found in their missals, used in the public service, were translated soon after gathering congregations, and as early as 1658 one of them published a careful version of all the portions read on Sundays and fast-days, with comments on each lesson. Others of them prepared similar treatises for their converts, but, though often proposed, none of the hundreds of missionaries who have lived in China have ever put into the hands of their disciples a complete version of the Bible. All the versions belong to this century, and are at present the only existing leading versions in Chinese, i. e. in the literary or book language (Wén-Lo), as distinguished from the colloquial.

1. Classical Versions.—1. Dr. Marshman's Version of the whole Bible, printed at Serampore in 1822. It was commenced at Bengal in 1806, and completed by Dr. Marshman and his son. During the first decade of the century, while this version was in preparation, several portions of the New Test, translated by Mr. Joannes Lassar, professor of Chinese in Fort William College, Calcutta (Dr. Marshman's instructor), were issued as tentative essays. The Rev. Josiah Goddard, who mostly live in monasteries, and acknowledge high and low officials, forming a hierarchy wholly separate from the state government. They lead an idle life, and are highly honored in places where labor is a disgrace. They, however, have no functions to perform in relation to life. They are neither employed at the birth or naming of a child, nor at marriages or deaths. See Confucianism.

2. The whole Bible, as translated by Morrison and Milne, was first printed in 1823, with the title Shih t'ien shing shoo, in 21 vols., on wood blocks, at Malacca. When Dr. Morrison presented, in 1824, the sacred volume at the anniversary meeting of the British and Foreign Bible Society, Mr. Butterworth related the following story, and I am quoting to the best of my recollection. It is now many years since I visited the library of the British Museum, I frequently saw a young man who appeared to be deeply occupied in his studies; the book he was reading was in a language and character totally unknown to me. I asked the young man what it was; he replied, diffidently, 'The Chinese, sir, I am translating or pretending it, but it is attended with singular difficulty; if the language is capable of being surmounted by human zeal and perseverance, I mean to make the experiment.' Little did I think," continued Mr. Butterworth, "that I then beheld the gem, as it were, of that great undertaking, the translation of the sacred Scriptures into the Chinese language."

The New Test, of this version was made by Dr. Morrison on the basis of an old version of the Gospels, Acts, and Epistles, which he obtained in England, copied from a MS. in the British Museum, and brought out with him to China. The book of Acts was revised from the old MS., and first printed in 1810; Luke was printed in 1811, and the Epistles in 1812; the Pauline Epistles being merely revised by Dr. Morrison. The New Test. was completed in 1813. In the Old Test, Dr. Morrison translated Genesis to Numbers, Ruth, Psalms to Malachi. The remaining books were translated by Dr. Milne. A new and slightly revised edition of the Bible was published in large type on wooden blocks in 1829, at Malacca. A revision of Morrison's Luke and Acts, by Dr. Milne, was published in London in 1841, on English paper.

3. Medhurst's Version.—The New Test, as translated by Dr. Medhurst, was printed in Batavia by lithography in 1837, with the title Sin ê chão shoo. The result of its labors was the Delegates' Version of the New Test, first published in 1842, under the title Sin yó tseuên shoo. The delegates who attended the committee were the Rev. Drs. Medhurst, Bridgman, Bronach, and Milne. (It is true the Rev. W. Lowrie of the American Presbyterian Mission was on that committee, but they had not finished the first chapter of Matthew when he left for Nanking, and was killed by pirates on the way. Dr. Milne of the London Society, was elected in his stead. Bishop Brown was also on the committee, but he never attended for translation one day after the first chapter of Matthew. Dr. Bronach, on the part of the American Board of Commissioners, was also on the committee, as was the Rev. Dr. Stoy, who had been previously been stated by the translators that he never made a suggestion which was adopted, and soon after the completion of the New Test, he repudiated the version altogether. Thus this translation was virtually the work of the English missionaries, Rev. Dr. Medhurst, Dr. Bronach, and Milne, all of the London Missionary Society.) When the New Test was completed, Drs. Medhurst, Bronach, and Milne translated the Old Test, on the same principle, and it was first published at Shanghai in 1855, under the title Kwan tsien shoo. Many subsequent editions of the test were made and issued at intervals, about 1867.
was instructed to form a committee which shall fairly represent the Chinese missions, and whose object shall be to conserve the text of the Delegates’ Version, to receive suggestions from all quarters, and, when needful, to prepare a revised Chinese vernacular version. The title Sing juk, for the vernacular character. A revised version, by the Revs. F. F. Gough and J. H. Taylor, was published in London in 1868 by the British and Foreign Bible Society, with the title Ah loh kyin soo yee-sun ky-i-tho-go ying-tah shu. The New Test., was translated or revised in the Ninggo dialect by the Rev. E. C. Lord of the American Bible Mission, and published in the Roman character in 1874, with the title Ah loh kyin soo yee-sun ky-i-tho-go ying-tah shu. Genesis, with the title Taong shoo kyi, and Exodus, with the title Cih yee-guht kyi, were translated in the Roman character by the Rev. H. V. V. Rankin, and published by the Rev. E. C. Lord, in the Roman character, and published in 1870, with the title Yi-soo woh. Steps have been taken by the American Bible Society to secure a version of the entire Old Test.

4. Foo-chow Dialect.—The New Test. was translated by the Rev. W. Worth of the Church Missionary Society, and published in 1856, with the title Shing kung sin yoo fah choo ping hoa. Another translation of the New Test. was made by the Rev. L. B. Peet, and published in 1856, with the title Sin yoo tsaio nho. A further translation of the New Test. into this dialect was made by the Rev. Drs. Macleod, and Hartwell, which was published in 1866, with the title Sin yoo tsaio nho. The book of Genesis was translated by the Rev. C. C. Baldwin, and published in 1875, with the title Cheung she kee. The book of Joshua was translated by the Rev. J. R. Wolfe, and published in 1875, with the title Yu juk tek ke. The book of Ruth, with the title Loo tih ke, and 1 Samuel, with the title Sa mous urb tsaio nho, were translated by the Rev. S. Woodin, and published in 1875. The book of Job was translated by the Rev. J. Maclay, and published in 1866, with the title T’o yuht ke bo. The Psalms were translated by the Revs. L. B. Peet and S. Woodin, and published in 1866, with the title She peen tsaio nho. The Proverbs were translated by the Rev. S. L. Baldwin, and published in 1868, with the title Keen yin tsaio nho. Other books were added since.

5. Amoy Dialect.—The New Test. was translated by the Revs. J. Macgregor, W. S. Swanson, H. Cowie, J. I. Maxwell, M.D., etc., and printed in Glasgow, in 1873, with the title Lian e kiu-tun tso sio koky e sin ton. It is in the Roman character. The Psalms were translated in the Roman character by the Rev. J. Stronach, and published in 1875, with the title She peen. Besides the Psalms, the books of Genesis to Joshua have also been published.

6. Swatow Dialect. —The book of Ruth was translated by the Rev. S. B. Partridge, and published in 1875, with the title Loo tih she kye.

7. Canton Dialect. —See PUNTY VERSION.

8. Hakka Dialect.—The gospel of Matthew was translated by the Rev. R. Leecher in the Roman character, and published in 1866, with the English title. The gospel of Mark was translated in the Roman character by the Rev. T. S. Lörcher, and published in 1874, with the English title. The gospel of Luke was translated in the Roman character by the Mr. Gibson, Baldwin Mission, and published in 1861, with the title Das Evangelium des Lucas im Volkssprache der Hakka Chinese. The same gospel was translated by the Rev. E. J. Eitel in the Roman character, and published in 1866 with the English title. The Acts of the Apostles was translated by R. Leecher, and published in 1874. Besides, there are published the gospels of John, as translated by Rev. Charles Piton, the epistle to the Romans, by the Rev. Mr. Bender, and the epistles to the Corinthians, by the Rev. Gong Ayun, a native missionary, educated at Basle.

9. Kinhwa Dialect.—John's gospel was translated in the Roman character, and published in 1866, with the title Jah-ben jooa Jok-ing shoov.

10. Hong Kong Dialect.—The book of Psalms has been adopted from the Pekin Mandarin Colloquial, under the superintendence of the Rev. Dr. Eitel. The name "Shanghai" is used for "God" in this version.

11. Chao-Chow Dialect.—The gospel of Luke has been printed in Roman characters in the vernacular of Chao-Chow, in the province of Canton, of which Swallo is the port and chief centre of missionary operations. The translation was adapted by the Rev. William Duffus, from the Delegates' Chinese Version, and carefully compared with the Greek text; and the translator, who is a missionary of the Presbyterian Church of England, was able to carry the work through the press on a visit in England during the year 1877. This version is intended for the use of the native Christians who have not been instructed in the use of their own very difficult written characters, and it is the first portion of the word of God which has been so brought within their reach. Ching, James, an English Bible Christian minister, was born at Clovelly, Devon, Jan. 15, 1808. He was converted at the age of seventeen, and eight months afterwards was appointed class-leader. In 1823 he was placed on the circuit plan as local preacher, and in 1829 was taken into the itinerant ministry. He continued to labor until 1864, when, through ill-health, he became superannuated. At missionary meetings he was an interesting and effective speaker. While laboring in the Penzance Circuit the second time, above two hundred persons were brought to Christ. In 1853 he was president of the conference. He died Nov. 2, 1873. See Minutes of the Conference, 1874.

Ching, John, an English Methodist preacher, was born Oct. 1, 1808, at Woodmaddowby, Devon. He was converted, he was brought up religiously; was converted at nineteen; joined the Bible Christians; in 1823 became a local preacher; in 1832 entered the ministry, and labored with more than ordinary acceptance and success on thirteen stations. After only a few days' illness, he entered into rest at South Petherton, Somerset, March 31, 1872. He had great power in preaching. See Minutes of the Annual Conference.

Chioccarello, Bartolommeo, a Neapolitan priest, was born about the year 1850, and died in 1846. He wrote, Antistitum Neapolitanum Ecclesiae Catalogus (Naples, 1645):—De Scripturis Cistiaris et Regni Neapolis (edited by Meola, ibid. 1780, 1781, 2 vols.). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Chionia, a saint martyred by fire at Thessalonica, on command of Sisinnius, in the reign of Diocletian, is commemorated on April 1, with her sister Agape, who shared her martyrdom. They were sisters of Irene, another martyr of the same city, according to Bede, Mart. April 1 and 5.

Chipana, in the religion of the Andes tribes, was a golden medallion which the Incas of Peru fastened to the arm with a band, and varied according to their rank. The high-priest had the largest, the king next, and smaller ones were carried by the army officers. As these were hollow and polished inside, they were used to light tinder with, and thus the sacrifices were burned at the festivals of the sun. The deities were usually appealed by the sacrifice of Chipana cakes.

Chippewa, or Ojibway Version of the Scriptures. This dialect is spoken by the Chippewas or Sauteaux Indians, dispersed through a considerable portion of British North America, and also found in the United States. In this dialect an edition of the entire New Test. was published in 1844 at New York, under the auspices of the American Bible Society. A new and revised edition was published in 1856, under the superintendence of the Rev. Sherman Hall. A translation of the Psalms, prepared by the Rev. Dr. O'Meara, was printed in 1854 at Toronto, at the expense of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, which also furnished the money for the translation of the Rev. R. McDonald, were published by the British and Foreign Bible Society in 1874. The entire New Test., in the syllabic character, was published in 1880. (B. P.)

Chiron, Hippolytus, Palamedes, Ulysses, Menestheus, Diomedes, Castor, Pollux, Machaon, Poliaslous, Antilochus, and Eneas. He saved Peleus, his grandson, from the hands of the rest of the Centaurs, who sought to murder him, restored to him the sword which Acamas had hid, and gave him a powerful lance, which, later, Achilles carried. The Argonauts, on their journey, called on him, for he gave them his guidance. In the combat with Hercules he was wounded by an arrow, and the pain caused him to beg Jupiter to liberate him from immortality, which the god did by transferring that attribute to Prometheus.

Chisholm, Alexander C., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Maury County, Tenn., Feb. 8, 1811. He embraced religion in 1837, and in 1836 entered the Tennessee Conference, in which he labored until the formation of the Memphis Conference, when he became one of its members. He died Oct. 2, 1856. Mr. Chisholm was a man of great excellence of character, a royal preacher, and an exemplary Christian. See Minutes of Annual Conference of the M. E. Church South, 1856, p. 679.

Chisholm, David A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1741; was licensed to preach in 1750; called to the living of Kilmorich, as assistant to his father, in 1758; ordained in 1754, and died April 18, 1768. See Fasti Eccles. Sco-ticani, iii. 298.

Chisholm, James (1), a Scotch prelate, having been chaplain to James III, was advanced to the see of Dunblane in 1466; consequently the year following; resigned in favor of his own half-brother in 1527; and died in 1584. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 178.

Chisholm, James (2), a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at Salem, Mass., Sept. 30, 1815. After attendance at the high-school of Salem, and the Latin school in the same place, he graduated from Harvard College in 1836, immediately after which he became a teacher in an academy at Charlestown, Va., for one year. In 1837 he went to Washington city and taught a select classical school for more than a year, connecting himself with the Protestant Episcopal Church in February, 1839. Leaving Washington the following April, he entered the middle class of the Theological Seminary of Virginia; and in October, 1840, was ordained deacon. His first parish was Norborne, comprising the two congregations of Trinity (Martinsburg) and Mt. Zion (Hedgesville), Va. Of this parish he was rector from 1842 to 1856, and thereafter at Portsmouth, until his death, Sept. 15, 1855. As a preacher, his style was elaborate and attractive, and he excelled as a pastor. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v. 768; Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1855, p. 483.

Chisholm (or Chesholme), John A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1658; was licensed to preach in 1667; was cited before the privy council in 1681, for dissuading the magistrates of Peebles from taking the test; deprived in 1689 for not praying for the king and queen, and other acts of disloyalty; and died in Edinburgh, Feb. 12, 1701, age about fifty-eight years. See Fasti Eccles. Scot-ticani, i, 554.

Chisholm, Thomas, a Scotch clergyman, was born Dec. 14, 1680; licensed to preach in 1709, and called to the living at Kilmorich in 1710. His ordination was fixed for a day in 1711, but was postponed on account of a disturbance by a rabble of Roman Catholics. He died Jan. 16, 1766, aged eighty-seven years. See Fasti Eccles. Sco-ticani, i, 298.

Chisholm, William (1), a Scotch prelate, brother of James (1), came into the see of Dunblane by the resiignation of the bishopric into the hands of pope Clement VII, and was consecrated at Stirling April 14, 1527.
Chisholm was a great adversary to the reformation.
He alienated the episcopal property of this church, mast of which he gave to his nephew, Sir James Chisholm, of Cromlix. He died in 1564. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 179.

Chisholm, William (2), a Scotch prelate, naph-ew of the foregoing, was constituted coadjutor to his uncle in the see of Dunblane, June, 1651; succeeded him in 1564; was much occupied in royal embassies;
but, without non-compliance with ecclesiastical rules, and withdrew to France, where, it is said, he was made bishop of Vaison, and died in old age, a Carthus-Chishull, Edmund, a learned English divine and antiquary, was born at Eyworth, in Bedfordshire, and educated at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, where he took the degree of M.A. in 1638. In 1638 he set out to travel in the East, and in the following year was appointed chaplain to the English factory at Smyrna, where he continued until February, 1702. He became vicar of Walthamstow, in Essex, and in 1711 was apnointed chaplain in ordinary to the queen. He was presented to the rectory of South Church, in Essex, in 1731, and died at Walthamstow, May 18, 1783. He published A Charge of Heresy Maintained against Mr.

Doddridge, etc. (1706), also numerous sermons, and a number of works on classical antiquities. See Chalers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Chitara, Ludwjo, a minister of the Reformed (Dutch), or German Reformed, Church, was once an Augustine monk. He came to America in 1786, studied theology under William Hendel and Caspar Diederus Weyerberg, and was licensed about 1787.
He served as pastor at Knowlton and Hardwick, N. J., from 1787 to 1792, and died at the latter place.

Chittenden, Alanson B., a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, was born at Durham, N. Y., in 1797. He graduated from Union College in 1824, and from Auburn Theological Seminary in 1828. He was composed in Montgomeri County, 1827 and 1828; pastor at Glen from 1831 to 1854, and at the same time was missionary to Charlestown, both in the same county;
at Amity, Saratoga Co., from 1834 to 1839; Westerlo, Albany Co., in 1839 and 1840; Sharon, Schoharie Co., from 1841 to 1845, and died in 1863. See Corwin, Chittenden, Charles, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Clinton, Conn., in 1805. He was converted at the age of twenty-four, was licensed to preach in 1822, and in the following year united with the New York Conference. In 1860 weakness of voice obliged him to become a supernumary. He died April 27, 1872. Mr. Chittenden was a deeply pious and a useful man. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1873,

p. 50.

Chittenden, William, an English Methodist preacher, was born at Chatham, Kent. He was converted in 1793; joined the Brethren in 1800; became a local preacher at Chatham, entered the ministry in 1832, travelled on six circuits, and died Dec. 18, 1888. He was a pious, devout, and useful, a diligent student, and a self-denying Christian.

Chladeus (Chladinie, or Chladny), Georg, a German theologian, was obliged to leave Hungary, his native country, in 1673, on account of the persecutions against the Protestants, and was in 1670 suppressed at Hauswalde, in Upper Lusatia, where he died in 1692. He is the author of Inventarium Temporum (Dresden, 1689). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit.

Chladeus, Johann Martin, a Lutheran theol-ologist of Germany, grandson of the foregoing and son of the last mentioned. He was born April 17, 1780, at Wittenberg. In 1742 he was professor of Christian antiquities at Leipzig, in 1744 director of the gymnasium at Coburg, and in 1747 professor of theology and university preacher at Erlangen. In 1748 he was made doctor of theo-ogy, and died Sept. 10, 1799. He published, Oratio de Veta Fidei et Brevitate Ecclesiae, 2d ed. (Leipzig, 1772); — Comment. de Statutis Veteris Christianorum (ibid. 1744); — Pr. de Sententia Augusti ni de Stilo Sancta Scripturae in Historia Creationis (Co-

Chladenius, Martin, a German theologian, was born at Chemnitz, Oct. 25, 1669. He studied at Wittenberg, in 1710 professor of theology there, in 1719 provost and member of consistory, and died Sept.
12, 1725. He wrote, Institutiones Exercitio — Institutiones Homileticae — Institutiones Theologiae Morale, and a great number of tracts, enumerates in Chlodulphus, Saint, confessor and bishop, is one of the thirty saints enumerated in the ancient cata-louges and martyrology of the Church of Metz.

Chlodulphus took holy orders, but was never a monarch or a hermit. He succeeded his father, St. Arnulfus, in the bishopric of Metz, and is said to have been an excellent and renowned prelate, skilled alike in Church and State. He lived in the 7th century, and is commemorated in the Leg. 8 (Bollandius, Acta Sanctorum, Jus-

Chlotharius (or Chlotacharius). See Clotaire.

Chlumcanski, Wencesl. Leopold, a Bohemian prelate, was born Nov. 15, 1759. He was successively chaplain at Klsoter, pastor at Gartitz, and afterwards in Prague, where he became chancellor of the metropolitan chapter and suffragan bishop. He was appointed in 1802 to the see of Leitmeritz, and was noted for abanoning and introducing great ameliorations in ecclesastical discipline. The emperor, wishing to reward this "father of the poor," gave him the title of private counsellor, and offered him the archbishopric of Lamberg; but the modest prelate refused this latter favor.
When he was placed, in 1814, in the archbishopric of Choiseul, Gilbert de, a French prelate, was born about 1613, and was made doctor of the Sorbonne about 1640. In 1664, he became bishop of Comminges, and administered the see with great enterprise, charity, and purity. He was transferred in 1670 to the see of Tournay, and died at Paris, Dec. 31, 1689. He took a deep interest in the Jansenistic controversy and other reforms, and left a number of sermons, letters, etc., for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Choiseul (Stainville), Léopold Charles de, a French prelate, was born at the castle of Lanuéville, Dec. 6, 1724. He was made bishop of Évreux in 1758, archbishop of Alby in 1769, and of Cambrai in 1764, and in 1781, leaving Statuts Synodaux du Diocese d'Alby (1763, 8vo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cholerton, John, an English Baptist minister, was born at Derby in 1827. He was converted in his youth, was baptized, and soon afterwards began to preach. He was at Leeds, and was there settled, but afterwards removed to Coalville, where his ministry was much blessed, and there he died, Aug. 10, 1865.

Cholot (Colitti, Cioletti, or Carlet), Jean, a French prelate, was born at Nointel, in Beauvais. After having been canon of the cathedral of Beauvais, he was created cardinal in 1281, and was charged with different missions by popes Martin IV and Nicholas IV, which deeply involved him in the political affairs of his times. He founded the College of the Cholots, upon the mount of St. Geneviève. Cholot died Aug. 2, 1291. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cholmondeley, Robert, an English divine, was born Nov. 1, 1277. For some time he was an officer in the army, but entered into holy orders, and was presented by the king to the united rectories of St. Andrew, St. Nicholas, and St. Mary, Hertford, and to the rectory of Houghton. He besides, he held the position of auditor-general of his majesty's revenues in America till the separation of that country from Great Britain. He died June 6, 1804. See (Lond.) Annual Register, 1804, p. 488.

Choral Habit. Under this head we give additional particulars respecting the clerical garments:

In England the canons wore a surplice, a black, close, and sleeveless cope, and the gray almoce or hood: regulars used the rochet, and monks their proper habit, but on the Continent they became more brilliant. At Pâques, in winter, they wear a large red cope, and in summer a red mozzetta over a rochet: at Salerno, crimson tunicles and rochetes, and phalmodiary with violet: at Urgel, the cope was red, but at Tortosa and Gerona black: at Valencia the cope worn over a rochet is superbly furred, and has a violet hood lined with ermine in winter, and with crimson silk in summer: at Besançon the camail, or hood, is of blue silk, lined with red taffeta; at Strasbourg... the cope of red velvet is lined with ermine, and has gold guards; at Catania the mozzarella of black cloth is worn over the rochet; at Syracuse the mozzarella is violet, as at Malta, where it is used with a rochet and cope; at Vienne the cope is black, at Rouen it is violet. At Barcy the canons wear in winter a cope, mozzarella, and a surplice with sleeves elevated on the shoulders. By the Council of Tortosa, 1429, the use of fur was restricted to digitacaries and cathedral canons; but in some special cases in England priest-singers, who represent a good many diocles, and priest-canons, as at Exeter, and the subdean of minor canons at St. Paul's, wore a gray almuce, lined with black cloth. At Rossis the vicars-surplices reached to the ground, and were rolled over the hands. At St. Paul's the vicars wore a plain almuce of black cloth, and lined or doubled cap. As early as 1580, the Council of Salzburg required a distinction to be made in the choral dress d of canons and vicars. Canons formerly wore violet only in their robes, until the Council of Trent authorized the clothing for black. At Ratibou the choir-tippet, or mozzarella, is of red silk; in France the mantlet is black, edged with the same color, in the diocese of Bayeux; in the south, as at Montauban, it is often crimson ermined, and generally rich in hue. At Veronas blue casackes are worn; in Normandy they are scarlet for the choristers; at Milan the scarlet cape and mantle are worn by canons; the vicars carry farred caps on their arm, and the lay singers have hooded black manxles, faced with green.

Chorentae were a heretical sect who maintained that the Christian Sabbath ought to be kept as a fast.
See Euchites.

Chorestinus (or Correntinus) was a bishop of Quimper. In Usuard (Patrol. exxiv, 13) he is called bishop of Aquila, in Lesser Britain. This Aquila must be the Aquilonia of Gall. Christ. xiv, 871, by which name Quimper was sometimes called in the 11th century. His day in Usuard and in Bede is May 1.

Choristers, i.e. boys singing in the choir. These are called in France children of the albus, or simply children of the choir. Those of Pope Vitalian (657-672) were lodged and boarded in the parvis, as at Canterbury, Durham, and St. Paul. They were known as the boys of the almonery. It is recorded of Gregory the Great, St. Germanus, and Ninier, archbishop of Lyon, that they used to attend the choir-boys' music school;
and children were required to be church-singers by the bishops of Aix-la-Chapelle and Toledo. Pope Urban IV was once a chorister of Troyes. We find them sometimes called clerks of the first or third form, according to the manner in which the role of seats was numbered. They were usually under the charge of the successor; but at Salisbury, where they were endowed, they were intrusted to a canon, called the warden of the twelve boys. They carried the cross, censers, and tapers, and were promoted to be thurifers, to hold minor orders, and, if worthy, advanced to the office of vicar.
They were also allowed to intercede between four and sixteen, in different churches; all received the first tonsure, and were maintained at the tables of one of the canons, whom they regarded as their master, and attended. Probably the ordinary arrangement was, that a portion of the number acted as singers, and the rest as assistants at the altar. In the 17th century, at Hertford, they were required to be taught to play on the lyre and harp in choir. In process of time they ceased to subsist on the canons' alms; and at Lincoln they appear first to have been boarded in a house under a master; an excellent precedent which was followed at Lichfield at the close of the 15th century. Their dress was a surplice.

Chorkam is the most exalted of the celestial regions, according to the Hindu system, at which, if a soul of high caste arrives there, it shall undergo no further changes.

Chorsai, in Slavonic mythology, was an idol which the heathen Muscovites are said to have worshipped as the 9th century. It is not known what he represents. He is depicted somewhat like a satyr; half only of his body being human, with hoofs of a horse and a dog's head with a number of horns. In his hand he carries a sceptre; and on the stone square, which supports the image, the sacrificial fire burns.

Choroes (Xoiopeia) is the Greek form of a name said to be applied in the Zendavesta, as well as in the Shur Namuk, to the great Cyrus (q. v.). The name is certainly not a corruption of Kurush (Cyrus), but can the latter be a corruption of it; but seems to be somewhat common to Persian kings, as descended from Cyrus. It was not, however, the common royal name of any line, as Arracus was with the Parthians, but was borne individually by several monarchs.

Choubret is a festival among the Mohammed-dans of India in commemoration of the examination of departed souls by angels, the good angels recording the good deeds of this life, and the bad angels the evil deeds. They believe that God examines this record; hence, at the beginning of the feast they are moved with fear of the impending judgment, utter prayers, give alms, and examine themselves;
but the occasion ends with illuminations of light and general rejoicing at the prospect of a favorable record for themselves. See DEAD, EXAMINA-TION OF.

to distinguish the place from Chezib or Achzib.

Chresimous (Christinus, Chrisimous, or Chrysimous), a Christian of Augustine's time, was so much cast down by some adversity that he was rumored he meditated suicide. Augustine wrote to cheer him, and enclosed a letter to the court, which he might give or not as he liked (August. Epist. 248 80), ii, 1069.

Chrestus, in early Christian records, was the name of two prelates;

1. A bishop of Syracuse, was addressed by Constatine the Great A.D. 314, in a letter preserved by Eusebius (H. E. x, 5), wherein the emperor complained of the continuance of discord in Africa, and therefore ordered Chrestus to be present at the Council of Arles by Aug. 1. Chrestus subscribed first of the bishops at Arles (Lahille, Concil. i, 1429).

Chriam or Holy Oil. We present the following additional particulars on this subject:

"By the Council of Melbe, the priest, on Maundy-Thursday, had three cruets brought to him, in which were the consecrated oil of the cathedrums, chrisom, and oil of the sick. There were two kinds of Holy Oil. (1) Chriam, or myron, called principal, a compound of oil and balsam, with which oil the sick were anointed upon the forehead and for confirmation on the forehead; and clerks to be ordained received it with. (2) Simple: the pure oil of olive; also consecrated oil for the anointing of the sick and enemergents, and of catechumens on the breast, shoulders, and forehead. Chriam, at first, was made with olive oil, by both Latin and Greeks. In the 6th century, balm brought from Judaea was mixed with it; and this kind was in use in the West until the 16th century, when the Spaniards, by permission of Pope Paul III and Julius IV, adopted balm from India. The Greeks use, instead of balm, forty different kinds of aromatic spices. In England, it was regarded as a spiritual preparation of Christ to wrestle against the devil, and in memory of the anointing of Christ to his burial. A bishop is anointed on the head and hands. The baptised was anointed previously with oil on the breast and between the shoulders, and after baptism with chrisom on the head and brow. In allusion to 1 John ii., 17: 2 Cor. i., 21; 1 Peter iii., 9, kings at their consecration, and altars and churches at dedication, are anointed. The chrisom is mentioned by pope Sylvester in 394. Priests anointed the breast, and bishops the forehead of candidates. Chriam is called myron by the ancient writers; it was symbolical of the sweet savour of Christ, also of the anointing of Christians by the Holy Spirit to be a peculiar people, a royal priesthood. (St. Chrysostom. xxv., 25-30; Nicetas. i. Sam. xxxv., 6; Luke iv., 18; Acts iv., 37; x., 38; 2 Cor. i., 21; 1 Pet. v., 5). The institution of chrisom by the Apostles was by the apostles, the only, who distributed it to the parish priests. In the 5th century this ceremonial was fixed by Maundy-Thursday, and during the second of the three masses celebrated on that day, which, in consequence, was called the Mass of Chriam. However, in France, the Council of Meaux, in 846, permitted consecration on any day, as in primitive times; and the Greeks, although regarding Maundy-Thursday as the principal occasion, still follow the same practice, but reserve the priest to the patriarch and bishops for the office with great pomp. The vase for keeping chrisom, from its shape called vases de chryse, was probably in the 12th century it was brought by the priest before Easter, or by a deacon, as a sign of confirmation in the 13th century. All that remained over from the last year was carefully consumed by fire. By the Council of Orange, in 441, chrisom was used once for all in baptism. The chrisom and holy oil were kept under lock and key, to provide against any abuse for purposes of sorcery and witchcraft, in the 13th century. In 1549 children were still anointed with chrisom on the forehead in the parish churches of England. In 1551, when the grace of the Holy Ghost is now invoked, Bale says that the chrisom was kept in alabaster boxes."

Christadelphians (or Brethren in Christ) is a name adopted by a religious body of recent development, which accepts Christ as its authority but discards the name "Christian." This is said to be on account of the gross perversion of the word Christ. Christadelphians assert that the fact of Christendom is made up of the fables predicted by Paul in 2 Tim. iv., 4, and is entirely subversive of the faith once for all delivered to the saints.

I. Origin.—The organization, made up of independent ecclesias, was founded by John Thomas, M.D. (q. v.), who was for a time an associate of Alexander Campbell, but who gradually changed his views from those of "the Disciples of Christ" until he encountered the violent opposition of Mr. Campbell. Although Dr. Thomas secured a hearing in various Campbellite churches of the United States for many years succeeding 1848, lectured and wrote in his native country and England from 1848 to 1850, and afterwards spoke extensively in the United States, continually adding to the number of his adherents, the name Christadelphian was not adopted until 1864. Congress had exempted war service the members of any religious body which was conscientiously opposed to bearing arms. In order to go upon record in a manner that would secure this exemption, the name was adopted and certified to by Dr. Thomas, in August or September, 1864. In this certificate he stated that the brethren of Ogle County, III., to whom it was given, were in fellowship with similar organizations in England, Scotland, the British Provinces, and various cities of the United States, north and south. "New York," he added, "is the radiating centre at this time."
II. General Features, etc.—The Christadelphians have never had any clergy, and consequently little or no ecclesiastical organization. Their customs are very primitive and unostentatious. They assemble every first day of the week to observe the remembrance of the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ by the breaking of bread and partaking of the cup. To this participation, however, none are admitted except those who have been immersed after making declaration of assent to the beliefs of the ecclesia. All communicants are considered as equal; no member has any prerogative to conduct the ceremonies at the meetings. After the commemoration of Christ's death a hymn is sung, and if any visitors are present some brother delivers an address. This always relates either to "the things concerning the kingdom," or to "the things concerning the name of Jesus Christ." It is a modest exposition of their creed, abounding in Scripture quotations, and delivered without rhetorical or oratorical adornment. No address is ever made, even to members alone, upon what are known as practical or moral topics. They hold that each one must learn from God's Word, or by private consultation, with reference to right conduct in daily life, without any attempt at settling, if an individual in the creed of Christadelphians does not produce right conduct, no amount of lecturing and exhortation will. They teach Christ-like living only by example. The address being over, it is announced that the purpose for which they had assembled being accomplished, the meeting may close. Meetings are held in plain rooms or in private houses. No collection is permitted for any purpose, but there may be a small box in the room for the reception of any contributions which persons care to make in an unobserved manner. It is not, however, announced that such is the fact. The expenses are exceedingly light, the meetings being held in some "upper room" hired for the purpose, and the payments met by the most quiet means. No church edifice has ever been erected by them, as their principles would not permit it. No direct effort is made to increase the membership. If increase results from voluntary acceptance of their doctrines, it is welcomed. In many cases an ecclesia includes but from four to ten persons. The largest, in Birmingham, England, includes about five hundred. It is not expected that a considerable proportion of any community will join their number, for they realize that they are so uncomform to the luxury, fashions, display, and excitement of the world that but few will accede to such a method of life. They expect that at the second advent, which they believe to be very near, they will all, if found worthy, be made priests and kings, to rule with Christ on the earth. Of course only a small part of the race would be needed for that purpose, even as but a few can be induced to prepare themselves for it. They see this to be in harmony with the prophecies of Christ concerning the few that shall be saved. They also accept cheerfully the necessity of being unknown, devoid of influence, or even despised for the present, in view of future reward. They lose no time upon missionary schemes, temperance, or societies of a similar nature. Christadelphians, whether they are few or many, consider organization as a temporary thing. Whatever good is done should be done personally and quietly. As the number of each ecclesia is small, and the loss of a few of the brethren who are accustomed to be present may at any time interrupt the meetings, they are not given much time and attention. They try to let the people know the extent of the sect. They themselves do not care to know its extent, lest some one might boast of it. Offices and organization, as stimulating the ambition of some, are considered in their influence subversive of the true spirit of religious equality and of right thinking and right feeling in religious, political, or otherwise, in this dispensation of the world. They decline to vote or to take any part in secular government, but they submit to the present condition of affairs, considering it too corrupt to be improved until He shall come whose right it is to rule the earth. They have no inducements for people of property to join them, for they think less, if anything, of those who have more. They have no missionary, since they believe the good of the world's souls may be intrusted to them, to doing good and in a secret manner. They desire not to know who is the author of good deeds among them, lest the doer get his reward in the praises of men. They prefer the reward should be deferred till the next dispensation. They believe that every member of the ecclesia should go on the same level with the rest of men, and feel entirely at liberty to do whatever they please on that day. They say there has been no divinely ordained Sabbath since Jesus abolished the Jewish Sabbath. But, out of respect for the feelings of others, they do not openly engage in what may be generally regarded as a breaking of the Sabbath, and convenience they hold their meetings on that day. They will not speak against those who hold different religious creeds, and only ask to be allowed in an unmolested manner to hold and to express their own religious views.

III. The doctrines of the Christadelphians are, perhaps, nearer like those of the Adventists than of any other. They hold the Bible to be the inspired Word of God, and demand its literal interpretation. On this basis they defy the disproof of their doctrines. They group their beliefs under two heads, and the outline is as follows:

1. Concerning the Kingdom of God.—The gospel preached by Jesus and the apostles was with primary reference to this kingdom. A divine but literal kingdom is to be established on the earth, superseding all existing governments. It has once existed as a type, being the kingdom of Israel, but was destroyed because of iniquity. It will be re-established at Jerusalem, and the restoration of the Jews will extend in dominion over the whole globe, and Jesus of Nazareth will be the supreme ruler. Those who are Christ's will be awarded a participation in the "honor, glory, and power" of that kingdom, in the sense of being associates and coadjutors of Christ in the work of ruling the world in righteousness. The visible reappearance of Christ, and the sharing in his inheritance of the physical kingdom, are therefore the "good news," and the hope of true believers. This kingdom will last a thousand years, in which sin and death will continue as now, in a milder form. At the close of this age, there will be a great change in the composition of things. Christ will surrender his position of supremacy, when God will manifest himself as father, strength, governor, and friend of all. Meanwhile, a revolt of the nations, at the close of the millennium, occurs, and proceeds to the last point, only being suppressed by a summary outbreak of divine judgment. Then occurs the resurrection and judgment of all who have died during the thousand years, and a judging of those then alive. The approved are immortalized, and the rejected are destroyed. Sin and death thus abolished, none remain but the righteous, who will inhabit the earth forever. This reign of Christ is without law or order, without property or money, but men deal with men through a mediator. Christ and his associate millennial rulers join the company immortalized at the post-millennial judgment.

2. Things Concerning the Name of Jesus Christ.—There is but one God, who made all things by his spirit. He dwells in a definite locality, "in unapproachable light," and is not universally diffused through space. The Spirit is his instrumental power, and extends whithersoever he wills. God's spirit is manifested, not personally, but by his works. God did not dwell personally in Jesus Christ, but the Messiah was appointed of God and in character an anthropized to the divine character. He was filled with the spirit of God. "Spirit" is a scriptural personification of the power, wisdom, and goodness of Deity. Christ had these from the Father. Jesus Christ is not one of an eternal Trinity, but is the manifestation of the one eternal Creator. He had two sides in the days of his weakness; one Deity, one man. The latter dated from his birth. The Deity dwelling in him was of the eternal Creator. Did not Adam, the first man, have two aspects—the aspect of an offended Deity, but to express the love of Deity, by abrogating the law of sin and death through a full discharge of its claims. Holding immortality in trust for the obedient, he now acts as priestly mediator between the Father and those who come unto God by him.

According to the Christadelphians, the devil is a spiritual personification of sin in the flesh, not the name of a personal, supernatural being. Man is a creature of the dust, whose individuality and faculties are attributes of his bodily organism. In the state of death, man, instead of having gone to another world, is simply a body without life. Corrupted wills will destroy the body and nothing remain of what was a living man. This mortality is the consequence of Adam's sin. In the Bible, soul means creature, but never involves the idea of immortality. Spirit, as applied to man, is no more expressive, but signifies breath, vital energy, etc., attributes of life. Hence, the doctrine of the inherent immortality of the soul is a pagan fiction. But there is a doctrine of immortality attainable, to be found in the Bible. Instead of being inherent in man, it is a quality to be acquired through belief in the gospel and obedience to the divine commands. It results from resurrection and the change supernaturally wrought upon the body. It is not a right nor a property of man's fallen nature, but a gift to be bestowed upon the faithful. It will be enjoyed upon the earth, which is to be the habitation of the saints. Hell and eternal torments are fictions of popular theology. The hell of Scripture is either sheol, the grave; or it is gehenna, a place of judicial execution in the land of Israel. It was once so used, and will be again, on a larger scale. The grossly wicked are to be convicted and annihilated, while that larger part of mankind which is sunk in ignorance and degradation will never see the light of resurrection.

Christ-apples were dry apples which were said to be found on Christmas night, and were an object of superstition in the Middle Ages.

Christfield, or Christfeld, PHILIP ERNST (originally Mordecai), a German convert from Judaism, was born at Uhlfeld-on-the-Aisch in 1767. July 11, 1701, he openly professed Christianity at Wilhelmsdorf, in Hohenlohe. He became a layman of the Exclusivists, but in 1772 he was appointed a professor at Leipzic, which he, however, refused, preferring the office of chamberlain given to him by his sponsors, the count and countess of Hohenlohe. He wrote, Gesprach im Reiche der Todten über die Bibel und Talmud (Schwabach, 1787):—Jüdische Pfrischule (ibid. 1793). See Frütsch, Bibl. Jud. i, 177; Wolff, Bibl. Hebr. iii, 4, no. 1800; Jücher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Kalkar, Israel u. die Kirche, p. 105; Beltzsch, Saul auf Hoffnung, iv. 191 sq. (B. F.)

Christfield, CHRISTIAN ALBRECHT, a Lutheran minister of Germany, was born in Judaism in 1784, at Oettingen. When three years old he was baptized, with his parents. He studied for the ministry at Tubingen, was consecrated and afterwards rector in his native place, in 1816 became pastor and superintendent at Appetzehofen, and died there in 1876, while a member of consistory. He wrote, De es good Judai in Republica sint Tolerandi (Oettingen, 1771):—De Judaeorum Conversione Generali Exspectandae (ibid. 1715). See Frütsch, Bibl. Jud. i, 177; Wolf, Bibl. Hebr. iii, 1805; Schulte, Judaeorum, vii, 91; Hoffnung, iv. 2, 90; Kalkar, Israel u. die Kirche, p. 108; Jücher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. F.)

Christi, an appellation given by St. Ambrose to believers in Christ, in reference to Psalm cv, 15, "Touch not mine anointed," or my Christi, as it is rendered in the Vulgate.

Christian, a German prelate who died in 1183. Although archbishop of Mayence from 1164, yet he is known only by his great military expeditions in Italy from 1167 to 1181. See Hoefer, Nouv. B. Générale, s. v.

Christian is a surname common to many Jewish converts, of whom we mention:

1. CHRISTOPHER GUSTAV, of Nuremberg, who was baptized in 1719, is the author of, in e. i.e. The Elements of the Christian Religion (Berlin, 1712, 1719):—Die Bekehrung Israels (Schwabach, 1722). See Frütsch, Bibl. Jud. i, 177; Wolf, Bibl. Hebr. iii, 1805; Jücher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lei- xikon, s. v.

2. FRIEDRICH, author of Beschreibung von der Juden, ihrer falschen Kirche, etc. (Frankfort, 1717; Forst, Bibl. Jud. i, 177; Wolf, Bibl. Hebr. iii, 1805).

4. PAUL (originally Malachia ben-Mordechaj), was born in 1592. He was rabbi at Brzece, in Lithuania, and was baptized in 1621 at Brunswick. He wrote Judäischer Geschlechter, or a history of his conversion, and his confession (Brunswick, 1621). See Frütsch, Bibl. Jud. i, 177; Wolf, Bibl. Hebr. i, 965; Jücher, Allgemeines Gelehren-Lexikon, s. v. (B. F.)

Christian, Richard Allen, a Baptist minister, was born in Charleston City County, Va., July 27, 1796.
CHRISTIAN

He studied medicine in the University of Pennsylvania. In 1838 he united with a Baptist church, and not long after was ordained, and began to preach regularly, without becoming the pastor of any church, continuing also the practice of his profession. Subsequently he became pastor of Clark's Neck and Hamilton churches, and continued in this office until his death, May 8, 1862. In both his professions Dr. Christian was popular, and highly esteemed in the region in which he lived. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclopedia, p. 222. (J. C. S.)

Christian, William, a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in Virginia. In 1858 he was ordained deacon. The next year, the new assistant in Ascension Church, Washington city, D. C.; rector of All-Saint's Church, Calvert, Md.; and rector of St. Alban's parish, D. C. See Amer. Quor. Church Rev., April, 1865, p. 140.

Christian Association is the designation under which eight congregations appear in the British census of the year 1851. They acknowledge simply an adherence to the great principles of Christianity.

Christian Commission, The United States, was a philanthropic organization of the Northern States during the late civil war, suggested by Mr. Vincent Coller, of the Young Men's Christian Association of New York, and instituted by that body, Nov. 14, 1861. Its object was to supplement the National Military Commission, and more especially to care for the religious wants of the soldiers. The sick and wounded were personally visited, relief afforded, Christian counsel and comfort bestowed, and devotional books distributed. The amount contributed for this purpose was, in the aggregate, about $2,750,000, besides the value of voluntary offerings in supplies of various kinds, and reading-matter furnished. The work closed Feb. 11, 1866. See Moss, Annals of the United States Christian Commission (Phila. 1888). See Young Men's Christian Association.

Christian-Meier, Friedrich, a German Jewish convert of the 18th century, is the author of Guldener Leuchter allen Testamenta auf Christi Geburt (Hamburg, 1777). Ueber den Traum des Leibniz in der Juden (Brunswick, 1719, 1721); — Ἰουδαίοι τῆς Σαλαμίνος, or Herrliche Eigenschaften des Messias (Halle-Magdeburg, 1713); — Davidisches Blümllein aus den 91 Psalm (Jena, 1715). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 177 sq. (B. P.)

Christian Name is a name given to children at baptism to remind them of their solemn profession of that worthy name by which they are called. A similar custom prevailed at circumcision — the analogous Jewish rite. Clement I required candidates for baptism to go to their priest, give in their names, and then be taught the mysteries. Heeneth names were prohibited, and those of apostles or saints usually adopted as memorials and examples of godly living. This spiritual name was entered in the baptismal register. In case of an immediate or unconcealed name being given in baptism, the bishop at confirmation might alter it, by Pecham's Constitutions. In 1494 the bishop mentioned the Christian name of the candidate at confirmation. See Names, Christian.

Christian Union Churches is the title assumed by a body of Christians who were represented by a convention at Columbus, O., in 1863, and whose organization was completed in 1865. Their fundamental principles, as officially stated by themselves, are: (1) The unity of the church; (2) Christ its only head; (3) the Bible the sole rule of faith and practice; (4) "Good Fruits" the one condition of membership; (5) the avoidance of all local controversy; (6) self-government of each local church; (7) no partisan politics to be preached. They hold very liberal views of Church affiliation; require no particular creed; practice baptism at any age; allow open communion; and fraternize with all evangelical Christian bodies. They are chiefly found in the Western States, where they are said to number about thirty thousand members, with a following of more than one hundred thousand. They hold state councils yearly, and a general council every fourth year. Of the last named, The Christian Witness, is published by them at MacArthur, O., and they have issued a number of books and tracts.

Christiana, Saint and Virgin, of Termonde. In Flanders, went to Dickelvenna (Tielcivum), near Ghent, that she might tranquilly devote herself to the Catholic religion, under St. Hildardus, and died A.D. 750. Her relics were translated from Dickelvenna to Termonde about the end of the 9th century, and were enshrined with those of St. Hildardus. She is commemorated July 26, and also on Sept. 7, the day on which her relics were translated to Termone (Acta Sanctorum, July, vi, 311-314).

Christianity continued to be a common version from Judaism of whom we mention the following:

1. FRIEDRICH ALBRECHT (originally Barrecks ben-Moses), who was baptized Nov. 28, 1674, at Straubing, was lector of Hebrew for some time at Leipsic, and edited Abraham's Commentary on the Former Prophets, with a Latin index (Leipsic, 1686) —: The Book of Jonah, in Latin, 1685. The Chaldee and Mariam, etc. (ibid. 1688). —: The Epistle to the Hebrews, in Hebrew, a translation which R. J. B. Carpov calls Pura, Teres a Nisida (ibid. 1676). — Von dem Glauben und Abgerussen der Juden (ibid. 1705, 1713). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 178; Wolf, Bibl. Hebr. i, 959; Delitzsch, Wissenschaft, Kunst und Judenhum, p. 301.

2. MORITZ WILHELM (also called Kopper), originally rabbi at Schlesisungen, and baptized there in 1715, is the author of Kurse Beschreibung einer jüdischen Synagoge (Ratisbon, 1723; Bremen, 1752) —: Rede zur Einladung für robb. Studien, an inaugural address at the opening of his rabbinical lectures at Altort, Jan. 15, 1721, and edited by J. K. Reiner, professor at Altort in 1711. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 178; Kalkar, Israël u. die Kirche. p. 104; Delitzsch, Wissenschaft, Kunst und Judenhum, p. 303.

Christiann, Christoph Johann Rudolph, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born April 13, 1761. In 1810 he was appointed pastor priest and provost at Oldenburg, in 1815 superintendent at East, and in 1814 member of consistory, pastor, and superintendent at Luneburg. He died Jan. 6, 1841, leaving Die Geschenheit unserer heimigen Fortdauer (Leipsic, 1809) —: Über Bestimmung, Würde und Bildung Christlicher Lehrer (Schleswig, 1879). See Winer, Handbuch der theolog. Lit., i, 471; ii, 30, 76, 94, 375, 388. (B. P.)

Christiant, David, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Greifenberg, in Pomerania, Dec. 25, 1810. He studied at different universities, and was for some time professor of theology at Gießen. In 1832 he became pastor at Lütjenburg. He died Jan. 6, 1841, leaving Die Geschenheit unserer heimigen Fortdauer (Leipsic, 1809) —: Über Bestimmung, Würde und Bildung Christlicher Lehrer (Schleswig, 1879). See Winer, Handbuch der theolog. Lit., i, 471; ii, 30, 76, 94, 375, 388. (B. P.)
CHRISTIANS

Christians. Ninety-six congregations of England and Wales, unwilling to identify themselves with any sectarian name, reported themselves in the English census of 1851 under the simple appellation, Christian. One congregation named after the first bishop of St. Germann of Auxerre. He held the see of Auxerre thirteen years, being the thirty-seventh bishop. He was present at the Council of Toussa, which he subscribed before Abbo, perhaps as a coadjutor or successor-designate. The other councils which he attended were the three of Perrigny or Fontigny, and that of Soissons. See Gall. Chrift. xii. 276.

Christians, a Scotch prelate, was consecrated bishop of Galloway in 1154. He was one of the witnesses to the final decision given by king Henry II of England in 1177, to the dispute between Alfonso of Castile and Sancho of Navarre. He died in 1186. See Keith, Scotch Bishops, p. 272.

Christie (or Chrystle) is the name of a number of Scotch clergymen:

1. Henry, of Craigton, took his degree at Glasgow University in 1671; was licensed to preach in 1676; presented to the living at Kinross in 1679; deprived by the privy council in 1689, for not praying for the king and queen, and other acts of disloyalty; consecrated bishop of the non-jurant Church at Dundee in 1709, and died May 5, 1718, aged sixty-three years. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiacae, ii. 597.

2. James (1), a native of Moray, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1662; was presented to the living at Kirkcowan in 1682; transferred to Kirkinner about 1686; discharged by the people about 1689; went to Ireland, and was admitted to the living at Bandony, in the diocese of Derry, and died May 13, 1718, aged about seventy-six years. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiacae, i. 735, 736.

3. James (2), took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1705, was licensed to preach in 1712, called to the living at Simprin in 1714, and ordained in 1717, had a call to Dunfermline in 1718, but it was set aside by the assembly, was transferred to Morebattle in 1725, but his admission was twice hindered by unruly mobs. His manse was destroyed by fire in January, 1727, when four volumes of the synod register were consumed. He died March 16, 1742, aged fifty-one years. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiacae, i. 449, 465.

4. John, was presented to the living at Libberton in 1758, and ordained; was transferred to Carnawith in 1760, and died Dec. 16, 1776, aged fifty-seven years. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiacae, i. 226; ii. 817.

5. Thomas, took his degree at the University of Edinburgh in 1670, was licensed to preach in 1672, was for some years a licentiate as schoolmaster and session clerk at Kilspindie; appointed to the living at Wigtown in 1677, and transferred to Dunning in 1682. He died in January, 1686, aged about thirty-six years. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiacae, i. 725; ii. 757.

6. William (1), was licensed to preach in 1667, presented the same year to the living at Glenbucket, and ordained, and died in 1695. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiacae, iii. 504.

7. William (2), studied theology at Glasgow University; was licensed to preach which he was enabled to do the living at Soone in 1698; ordained, and died before Oct. 8, 1701. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiacae, ii. 665.

Christie, George, a Scotch Congregational minister, was born at New Mills, Keith, Banffshire, July, 1801. He was led to Christ in early life by his pious parents; joined the Church in 1821; offered his services to the London Missionary Society; received a preparation for the work at the Mission Academy, Hokton, and in 1830 was ordained, and sailed to Calcutta, where he spent two years in preparatory studies and labors. Soon, however, the climate began to undermine his health, and he set sail for England, stopped two years at the Cape of Good Hope, and reached his native land in 1835. In 1837 he accepted an invitation from the Church at Fitchingfield, Essex; between 1844 and 1849 he was employed as travelling agent for the London Missionary Society in both England and Scotland; and then returned to mission work in South Africa, first at Philippolis, afterwards at Hankey Seminary, and finally, in 1853, at Cape Town, where he died, Nov. 24, 1870. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1872, p. 306.

Christie, John J., a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, was born at Schraalenburg, Bergen Co., N.J., in 1781. He graduated from Columbia College in 1799; studied under Solomon Frelingh, and was licensed by the classics of Bergen in 1802. He served the Presbyterian Church of Amsterdam and Galway from 1802 to 1812, and the Reformed Church at Warwick, Orange Co., N.Y., from 1812 to 1855. He died in 1845. As a preacher he was clear, instructive, and practical, and as a pastor, kind, honest, affectionate, and sincere. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church of America, 3d ed. p. 210.

Christina is the name of two early martyrs:

1. A woman of Athens, arrested along with Dionysius, and given in charge to two soldiers of the governor's train, whom she taught, and they were converted. The pair of converts therefore, with Dionysius, were tortured and stoned, and Christina, because she fell upon the corseps and wept over them, was beheaded. Such is the story in the Menology on May 15. The Latin acts, given by Ruinart, do not mention Dionysius or Christina, but seem to speak of the latter as Dionysia; nor do the Greek Acts thus speak, but speak of Troas as the place where the governor is informed that Andrew, Paul, and Nicomachus are Christians.

2. A damsel of Tyre, confined by her father in a tower, that no one should see her. For throwing down idols, her father punished her in every way: plunged her in the sea, which served for a baptism, reported her to the governor, and at last she was killed. No year is given, but the day is July 24 (Met. Basili). Acts of this martyr, by Alphanus of Salerno (11th century), may be found in Migne (Patrol. Lat. cxlivii, 1269).

Christinus, a correspondent of Augustine (Epist. 256 and 257), ii. 1070.

Christison (Christesone, Chrysteson, etc.) is the name of several Scotch clergymen:

1. Alexander (1), was presented to the living of Logiebride, with Auchtergaven, in 1621; made a claim for both stipends in 1631, which was granted, and died April 14, 1647. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiacae, ii. 792.

2. Alexander (2), son of Alexander, the professor in Edinburgh University, was educated at the high-school and university there; licensed to preach in 1820; presented the same year to the living at Foulend, and ordained in 1821. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiacae, i. 439, 440.

3. George, was licensed to preach in 1786: became morning lecturer in Edinburgh University till March, 1801; was presented to the living at Garzenoak in 1865, and died June 2, 1809. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiacae, i. 705.

4. John (1), formerly a friar in the Romish Church, was outlawed in 1559 for usurping the authority of the Kirk and taking the ministry without authority. He was appointed the first minister of the Kirk at Fetteresso, in 1567, with two other places under his care: removed to Glenbervie about 1570; in 1574 his stipend was fixed, and he continued there in 1580. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiacae, iii. 869, 872.

CHRISTOPHER

5. John (2), a reader at Dunfermline to 1574, had the living at Logie in 1576, with two other parishes under his care, and continued at that place to 1608. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, iii, 712.

6. John (3), took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1668; was licensed to preach in 1668; appointed to the living at Kembuck in 1669, admitted in 1672; transferred to Lif in 1673; deprived by the act of parliament in 1690, restoring Presbyterian minister in 1692, and resigned in 1694, and removed to the stored, and died in April, 1703, aged about sixty-eight years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, i, 438; iii, 712.

7. John (4), took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1819; was licenced to preach in 1825; presented to the living at Brechin in 1831, was ordained, and elected clerk to the presbytery in 1830, and to the synod in 1845. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, i, 211.

8. William, was appointed the second Protestant minister at Dundee in 1560; was a member of the first general assembly held the same year, and of the sixty succeeding assemblies he attended thirty-eight, and was elected moderator in 1569. He was presented to the vicarage of Dundee the same year; in 1574 to that of Ballumbry; in 1578 was appointed visitor to the churches; in 1589 was one of the commissioners for the defence of true religion in Forfarshire; being aged, another was appointed to supply his place in 1597. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, i, 684.

9. Christlieb, Christian Wilhelm, was a German Jew (originally Lazarus Wolf) who embraced Christianity in 1733 at Burg-Farreboch, in Franconia, and wrote, Kurzer Auszug aus den Wörterbüchern oder Bussgebeten (1745):—Antwort auf Michaelis, etc. (ibid.). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 179; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. F.)

11. Christian, Aaron, a German Reformed minister, was born in Northampton County, Pa., June 4, 1826. He was educated in his native county, and then studied theology privately for a time. In 1850 he was licensed, and ordained by the classis of Mercersburg in 1851. He afterwards passed over to the Episcopal Church, and died March 28, 1860. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church, iv, 497.

12. Christian, Jacob, a German Reformed minister, was examined and ordained in 1798, and set over a congregation in North Carolina. In 1809 he went to Ohio, and is reported to have been the first German Reformed minister in that state. He died in 1810. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church, iv, 467.

13. Christmas. We present the following additional particulars concerning this important festival:

Pope Julius I confirmed the birthday of our Lord to be kept on Dec. 25; and Chrysostom, in the 4th century, speaks of the feast as of great antiquity; Clement of Alexandria, in the beginning of the 3rd century, speaks of it, as being kept on Dec. 25. On April 19 or 30, or May 30: and sermons of Basil and Gregory Nazianzen, preached on this day, are well known. In Epiphanius, who wrote it on Jan. 6, but Augustine on Dec. 25. From the want of observance of the day passed to the Eastern Church in the 4th century, under the name of Epiphany, so says the history of the 3rd century; the same name the apostles known by Antioch ten years before he was preaching, that is, probably, as kept on Dec. 25, the day hitherto observed having been Jan. 6. The Latin and Africans, and the Greek Church, generally, however, held the Nativity on Dec. 25, as appears from Jerome, Augustine, Chrysostom, Basil, and Gregory Nazianzen. The Orientalists in Syria, Cypria, Antioch, and Palestine appear to have observed, for a time only, Jan. 6, as the feast of the Nativity and Epiphany, or Theophania, a name equally applicable to both, as Gregory Nazianzen testifies. However, about the 6th or 7th century the Nativity was commemorated, in the East, on Dec. 25, and the Epiphany on the later day. In the 4th century, the feast of the Nativity was kept at Constantine and its satellites, and the Epiphany was observed in Germany, the Holy Night; in Portugal, the Pasch of the Nativity; and in old English, Yule Merriment. In the Isle of Man the present day is kept as the Holy Day of All Saints to church services, and the Holy Night in Germany they best with mallets on the house door, to symbolize the anxiety of the spirit in giving thanks for the glad tidings of the Nativity. There were three masses on this day: one at midnight on the eve (except in the Gallican and Armenian rites), and the day before Christmas the actual birth of our Lord; the second at dawn or cock-crow, its revelation to man in the shepherds; and the third at night, the eternal sanctuary of the Holy Child Jesus. Two masses were said in France in the time of Gregory of Tours; but three masses were not introduced at Rome till the 14th century, and it was not generally adopted in Germany till the 15th century. In the Medieval Church there was a representation of the shepherds, as at Lichfield, with a star gleaming in the chapel vault; and so lately as 1801 the Flemish preserved the same custom, and the peasants cante with sheep, oxen, and eggs and bread. The midnight mass was said at the high-altar. From the time of Augustus, midnight mass was said on the eve; and the Council of Trent and Toledo required all persons to attend this service at their cathedral church. The Christmas-box was a receptacle made of earthenware, in the 15th century, when the privileges placed the rewards of their industry given them at that season.

14. Christmas, Joseph Strick, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Georgetown, Beaver Co., Pa., April 10, 1803. He studied at the academy in Beavertown; in 1815 entered Washington College, and, after completing his college course, was engaged for some time in the study of medicine. In 1820 he entered Princeton Theological Seminary, where he remained over two years. He was licensed by the Philadelphia Presbytery in April, 1824, and ordained Aug. 1 by the New York Presbytery; in May following he became pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Montreal, and discharged his duties faithfully. He was a member of the American Bible Society one year, pastor of the Bowery Church, New York city, and died March 14, 1830. He wrote The Artist, a poem (1819), besides several pamphlets and contributions to periodicals. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 682.

15. Christolyte, a sect mentioned by John of Damascus, as existing in Syria, saying that when Jesus Christ arose from the dead he left his body behind, and took another body or earth, and that it was the divine nature alone which ascended into heaven. The name of the sect comes from this dissolution of the personality of Christ (see Joh. Damasc. Treatise on Heresies, 95, § 106; Patrolog. Græca, xxiv, 681).

16. Christophe, Jean Baptiste, pastor at Nœud-Dame-de-Bélines, near Lyons, was born at Amplepuis (Rhône), June 8, 1809. He published a Histoire de la Populat. Pendant le XIVe Siècle (1852, 3 vols. 8vo), a work giving an exact account, from the best sources, of the residence of the popes at Avignon. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

17. Christophe, Joseph, a French painter, was born at Verdun in 1667, and was chosen a member of the Royal Academy in 1717. His picture of The Miraculous Finding of the Multitude was one of the finest compositions of Paris before the Revolution. He died at Paris, March 29, 1748. See Sponner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

18. Christopher (Χριστόφορος), Saint, a Christian martyr, lived probably about the 3rd century. According to the legend, which is interesting as the basis of many popular superstitions, Christopher determined to serve some one who was going to reign as a king, and he found the court of a great prince, who was afraid of the devil, from which he concluded that the devil must be the stronger; but he noticed that the latter, to whom he offered his services, had some fear on looking at the image of Christ. Thus Christopher set himself to find one whose strength was superior to that of the devil. In his distress he went to ask advice of a hermit, who suggested to him the idea of carrying pilgrims across a torrent over which there was no bridge, and this became for a long time the daily occupation of Christopher. One day a child presented itself on the borders of the stream; Christopher took the burden upon his shoulders, thinking it easy enough, but it nearly crushed him. The child was Christ, and, in order to make himself known to Christopher, he ordered him to thrust his great stick into the earth. Christopher obeyed, and saw with astonishment, on the following morning, that the stick had been transformed into a date-tree, with fruit and leaves. Thousands of men, having been drawn near by that miracle, accepted the Christian religion; but the pagan governor of the province put Christopher in prison, and tried his faith by the most cruel tortures. He then was beaten with red-hot iron rods, and many other barbarities were inflicted upon him, but he remained unchangeable. Finally three thousand soldiers were ordered to shoot at him poisoned arrows, none of which struck him, but returned against those who had shot them. The governor himself was struck in the eye, when Christopher indicated to him the remedy by which to cure the wound: it was that, when Christopher’s own head had been cut off, he should wash his eye with his blood. Christopher was beheaded. The governor was entirely cured by the blood of the martyr, and was baptized, with all his family. This saint is ordinarily represented under the figure of a giant carrying Christ on his shoulders, and leaning upon a large stick, making all efforts not to succumb under the burden. The popular belief of the Middle Ages identified the image and the name of Christ with those of St. Christopher, and it was said that “he who ever saw St. Christopher would never die an infamous death.” See Hoefer, Nour. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Christopher is likewise the name of several early Christians:

1. One of three soldiers of Diocletian’s guard, who, being converted, A.D. 269, by the constancy of St. George, suffered chasting, scarification, imprisonment, and death, April 19 (Basil, Menol. iii, 63).

2. A deacon, who, with Clement, bishop of Ancrea, and Charito, the second deacon, had his throat cut (A.D. 296) in prison, Jan. 23 (Basil, Menol. ii).

3. A monk at Jerusalem, who testified to the superiori of the common life over the solitary condition of a hermitage (Migne, Patrolov. Ixxiv, 170).

4. Bishop of Arcadiopolis in Asia, at the second council of Constantinople, A.D. 553 (Lapte, Conc. r, 592).

5. A Sabайте, martyr in Palestine under the Saracens (April 14), in the 8th century (Migne, Dict. Hagiog. s. v.).

6. Dean (“primicer”) and counsellor of the see of Rome, who, with his son Sergius, treasurer of the Roman Church, obtained armed assistance from Desiderius, king of Lombardy, to dissolve the antipope Constantinian. Christopher opposed the intrusion of Philip, and procured the election of Stephen III. He attempted to induce Desiderius to restore the Church property which he had plundered; the king was exasperated, and so used his influence at Rome that the eyes of Christopher and Sergius were torn out, which in three days caused the death of the former, cir. A.D. 775 (Ceillier, Hist. des Auteurs, xii, 1117).

7. Patriarch of Alexandria (A.D. 804–837), who wrote a “episcopal” letter to the emperor Theophilus, the iconoclast, in favor of the worship of images, citing the story of king Abgarus. It was signed by fourteen hundred and fifty-five bishops and priests. He wrote De Vita Humana (Paris, 1606), under the name of Theophilus Alexiades. (Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, 25).

8. “Patricius, patria Mitilemous,” a monologist, author of an iambic Historia Sactorum, beginning with September and ending with August. He is included by Cave, Hist. Lit. (Disert. i), among writers of uncertain date.

Christopher (Christopher, or Christophorus), Joseph, a reputable Dutch painter, was born at Utrecht in 1498, and studied in the school of Anthony More. He was invited to the court of Lisbon by John III, where he executed a number of fine works for the churches.

Christopher, Ralph G., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Halifax County, Va., Oct. 10, 1787. He was converted in 1809, licensed to preach in 1810, and admitted into the South Carolina Conference. About 1820 he located and practiced medicine. In 1823 he removed to Alabama, continued his medical profession until 1831, and then entered the Alabama Conference, wherein he labored as health permitted until his death, Oct. 13, 1889. Mr. Christopher was a man of great faith and resignation under many afflictions. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1840, p. 58.

Christopher, Thomas, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Cambridge, Dorchester Co., Md., Jan. 12, 1805. He was converted at the age of twelve; in 1834 entered the Philadelphia Conference, and afterwards became a member of the New Jersey Conference.
In all he labored fifteen years as an itinerant, and died at his post in January, 1850. As a man, Mr. Christopher was candid, companionable, and interesting; as a Christian, warm, sincere, practical; as a preacher, faithful, earnest, useful. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1850, p. 436.

Christopher, William Britton, a Congregational minister, was born at Binghamton, N. Y., Aug.
15, 1817. He attended Syracuse Academy; graduated at Union College in 1847; in 1848 was a member of Princeton Theological Seminary, and the following year was connected with Auburn Theological Seminary. He was ordained at Centre Lalie, N. Y., as an evangelist, Oct. 16, 1849, and during the succeeding year was acting pastor at Union Centre; the two following years preached in Hancock; from 1852 to 1854, served the Presbyterian churches in Oneonta and Otto-gro; from January, 1854, to September, 1859, in Lacon, Ill.; in 1860, at Galena; the following year acting pastor of the Congregational Church in the same place.
From April, 1864, until 1867 he was pastor in Mendota. During the succeeding four years he was employed as a farmer in Iowa. Meantime, from 1866 to 1870, he was editor of the National Prohibitionist of Chicago. As the leader of a prohibition colony, he went to Cheever, Kansas, in 1871. He died at Bingshamton, Nov. 7, 1879. Mr. Christopher was a man of excellent qualities, an earnest preacher of the gospel, and a zealous temperance leader. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1890, p. 39; Cong. Year-book, 1880, p. 15.

Christopherson, John, a learned English prelate, was born in Lancashire, and educated at St. John's College, Cambridge. He was one of the first fellows of Trinity College after its foundation by Henry VIII, in 1546, and soon after became master of it. He was banned in the reign of Edward VI, but, when queen Mary succeeded to the crown, he returned, was made dean of Nottingham; made Bishop of London, 1555; and died in December, 1558. He translated Philo Judeus into Latin (Antwerp, 1559, 4to); also the ecclesiastical histories of Eusebius, Socrates, Sozomen, Evagrius, and Theodoret (Louvain, 1570, 8vo; Cologne, 1570, fol.).
See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Christopherus, Angelus, a Greek writer, was born in the Peloponnesus about 1575. On account of the atrocities of the Turkish government he went to Europe, and settled in England, studying at Cambridge and Oxford. In 1619 he published in Greek, with a Latin translation, a work On the Present State of the Greek Church, which was republished by the Protestant George Phelavius in 1659, at Frankfort, with a new Latin translation and notes; again reprinted in Greek and Latin (Leipsic, 1876). Christophorus also wrote, De suis Tribulationibus: — Explicatio Symboli: — Explicatio Sacrorum Mysteriorum: — De Apostasia Ecclesiae et Homine Pecatorae (Greek and Latin; Lond. 1614).
See Biblioth. Gr. xii; Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. F.)

Christotokos. See Nestorius.

Christovão (of Lisbon), Frey, a Portuguese missionary, the first explorer of the river Tocantins, in Brazil, was born of a noble family near the close of the 16th century. In 1623 he was appointed guardian of the Capuchin convent at Marambhão. He opposed, with all his influence, the reduction of the Indians to slavery, and then undertook to teach them. See Hoefer, Neue Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chrodebert I (otherwise Rigobert, or Zer-bert), archbishop of Tours. The Chronicon Turonense makes him the prelate who granted to St. Martin's Abbey at Tours privileges confirmed by pope Ade-cadius (672-678).

Chrodebert II (otherwise known as Ruothebertus, Crabertus, Erabertus), archbishop of Tours, is said to have taken monastic vows A.D. 662.
He is distinguished for a judgment which he made concerning a woman who had committed fornication after she had joined a religious order. The document was suppressed for two reasons: first, because Chrodebert, who wrote about the middle of the 7th century, says in it that they did not then acknowledge in France more than the first four general councils. St.
Nice, Constantinoiple, Ephesus, and Chalcedon. The other reason was because he maintained that Mary Magdalene merited the appearance of the Saviour after his resurrection, before that privilege was accorded to the apostles, or even to his mother. His letter is to be found in the 45th volume of Vigiliae Loc-orum Patrologiae, among the notes of Quesnel on the Epistles of Leo the Great. See De Coute, Ann. Eccl. Franc.
iii, 573.

Chrodiledis, a nun of the convent of the Holy Cross at Poitiers. She incited a rebellion in the nunnerly, and was excommunicated at the Council of Potiers, A.D. 696, but was afterwards restored to the community.

Chrodogandus. See Chrodegang.

Chronan. See Chronan.

Chronicus (Socrates) were histories or epitomes of history, in which special care was taken to fix the date of each event recorded.

Chronica Hohorii is in substance the chronicle of Hippolytus, but with an appended note bringing the chronology to the writer's time. See CHRONICON CA-NISIANUM.

Chronicon Atheniense. The Festal Epistles of Athenæus, published in Syriac by Cureton, 1848, and afterwards with a Latin translation by Mai (Pat. Nov.
Bibl. vii), have prefixed a chronicle of the Emperor of Athens (A.D. 328-373). It throws much light on the history of the period, marking the Easter of each year, together with the names of his consuls and the other modes of designating the year, both in the east and west.

CHRONICON CANESIANUM (Labbeææ or Hipp. politæ). This chronicle was published first by Canisius, in 1602. It is anonymous, and in Latin, but internal evidence shows it is a translation from the Greek. It can scarcely be called a chronicle, for it contains no continuous history. It merely gives from the Old Test. a series of names and dates sufcient for the purposes of chronological computation.

CHRONICON CYPRICANUM is a short treatise appended to the works of St. Cyprian. This is probably the "very useful chronicle" which Paulus Dia-cicus, in his Life of St. Cyprian, says that father composed.

CHRONICON EDISSINENS is an anonymous Syriac chronicle, published by Assenmati (Biblic Orienti, i, 367), apparently a copy of about A.D. 590. The writer is orthodox, and expressly recognises the first four general councils, though one doubtful passage has brought him under suspicion of Pelagianism (p. 402). He placed the birth of Christ two years before the vulgar computation.

CHRONICON PASCHALIK (or Alexandrinum) is an anonymous epitome of the world's history from the creation to the twentieth year of the reign of Heraclius.
A.D. 630. A MS. of the 10th century, which was found in a Sicilian library in the middle of the 16th century, is now in the Vatican library. The question as to what day of the lunar month it was on which our Saviour suffered is elaborately discussed, and a chronological table of the main events of our Lord's life is given. The author's dates correspond to B.C. 3 for the birth, and A.D. 32 for the crucifixion of Christ. This chronicle is the subject of a special essay by Van der Hagen (Amst. 1738), where will be found the best explanations of those points in the chronicle's method of computation which present difficulty.

CHRONICON RUISTAMNUN is a short Latin chronicle appended to two MSS. of Victor Vitensis, and consists chiefly of extracts from other writers. It begins with the reign of Arcadius and Honorius, and goes to that of Justin II (565-578). It makes mention of the dialogues of pope Gregory the Great, and was probably compiled about the end of the 6th century.

CHRONICON SCALGIERIENUM (or Alexandrinum). Scaliger published this as an appendix to his edition of the Chronicon Eusebii. The chronicle begins with Adam, and ends with the reign of Arcadius and Honorius. Internal evidence points to Alexandria as the place of its composition. Notwithstanding the blunders in its Greek translations, the use made by the compiler of writings not now extant renders it worthy of being consulted. It appears to have taken from apocryphal sources matters of the Zacharism of Zacharias, the father of John the Baptist, and of the miraculous preservation of Elizabeth and her infant, of the names of the wise men, etc.

CHRONICON VALESIANUM. This fragment of a chronicle by an unknown author, embracing the period from Diocletian to Theodoric, is in Latin. It was published by Valesius as an appendix to his edition of Ammianus Marcellinus.

Chronota (from χρόνος, time) is a term of aproach applied by the Arians of the 4th century to the orthodox Christians of the period, by which they designed to intimate that their opponents' religion was only temporary, and would speedily have an end.

Chronogram consists of words in an inscription, so placed that the numeral letters give the date of a certain event thus recorded. The earliest instance occurs in stained glass, c. 1062, at St. Peter's, Aix. There is another, of the time of Charles I, on the ceiling of the lantern in Winchester. The only letters which can be used are Μ, Δ, Κ, Τ, Σ, Υ, Χ, Ι.

Chronophus was a bishop of the time of Valentinian I, mentioned in his law of July 9, A.D. 369. His see is unknown; but, contrary to the laws, he had applied to a secular magistrate, Claudius, who had agreed to another, against the decision of a certain council, and for this he was deposed.

Chronophus I was third bishop of Le Périgord. He succeeded Anianus in the first half of the 4th century.

Chronophus II was the seventh bishop of Le Périgord. He is described as having been of noble birth, modest, gentle, eloquent, the father of the poor, the poor of his country, that noble daughter of the reedemer of citizens. He died about the middle of the 6th century (Migne, Patrol. Lat. LXXVIII, 160; Gall. Christ. ii, 1450).

Chronus (time) was the Greek name of Saturn.

Chrotoberna. See Chroderbek.

Chrotechilia (or Chrotildis). See CLOTILDA.

Chworsch, in Slavonic mythology, was a god of the destructive wind-storm, to whom the Slavs offered sacrifices to shield them from his power.

Chyrsander (properly Goldmann), WILHELM CHRISTIAN JUSTUS, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Dec. 9, 1718, at Gudekenroda, in the vicinity of Halberstadt. He studied at Halle and Helmstedt, and in 1742 was permitted to lecture. In 1744 he was made pastor of St. Stephen's, at Helmstedt, lecturing, at the same time, on Oriental languages and literature. In 1750 he was called to Rinteln, became in 1751 doctor of theology, and in 1756 professor ordinaris of theology. In 1758 he was called as first professor of theology and philology to Kiel, and died Dec. 10, 1788. He was a voluminous writer. Döring (Die Gelehrten Theologen Deutchlands, i, 247 sq.) gives on five pages the titles of his one hundred and one publications. See also Fürst. Bibl. Jud. i, 179; Steinmeider, Bibliographisches Handbuch, p. 35; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 857; Helfer, Nov. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Chrysanthus was the name of several early Christians:

1. Martyred along with the virgin Daria at Rome, under Numerianus, A.D. 283. He is commemorated in Usuard's Marty. and March 19 in the Byzantine Calendar.

2. A bishop of the Novatians at Constantinople, who succeeded Sisinnius in 407. Being disinclined to accept the episcopal office, he retired from Constantinople to Bithynia, but was pursued, drawn from his retreat, and forced to submit to ordination. He died in 414.

3. One of the bishops at the Council of Arles in the early part of the 5th century.

4. Bishop of Spoleti, addressed by Gregory the Great (Epist. vii, 72, 73) and begged to give some relics of Sabinus for a church at Ferro.

Chrysaphius was a eunuch, chief minister at the court of Theodoric II, the Eastern emperor. He is mentioned as gaining over his master, and the emperor Eudoxia to the party of Eutyches. After the death of Theodosius, A.D. 450, he was disgraced, banished to an island, and put to death at the instance of the empress Pulcheria. It is thought that through the influence of Chrysaphus, Eutyches obtained a letter from Theodosius to Libanius, exhorting him to peace. Chrysaphus and Eudoxia also supported Dioscorus in his desire that Theodosius would summon the Eutychian Council of Ephesus (Theodoret, Epist. 124, 125).

Chryse (in Latin versions of the story known as Aurox) is the principal figure in the account of the martyrdom of Hippolytus. It pertains to relate to martyrdoms which took place during a violent persecution of the Christians by the emperor Claudius. There are many versions of this story. The most complete account of all these stories is to be found in Düllinger, Hippolytus und Kilianus, chap. 2.

Chyseiros was a sophist and apostate of paganism in the 5th century, rebuked by St. Nilus (Epist. ii, 42; see Cessner, viii, 217).

Chrysippus of Cappadocia, an ecclesiastical writer, lived in the 6th century, according to Cyril of Scythopolis ( Vita. St. Euthym.). He and two of his brothers, Cosmos and Gabriel, received a good education in Syria, and were then given into the care of Eutychius at Jerusalem. In the meantime, St. John took orders. In 455 he became steward of the monastery, and subsequently prefect of the Church of the Resurrection, and guardian of the holy Cross, filling the latter place for ten years, till his death. He wrote, in a style both elegant and concise, some works on ecclesiastical subjects; but they are lost, except a treatise,
CHRYSOBERGUS

Chrysoborus, Lucas, a Greek ecclesiastical writer, was appointed patriarch of Constantinople in 1155. He presided over the synod which was held there in 1166, and died in 1167. Of his works there are left but thirteen Decreta Synodalia (contained in the Jus Graeco-romanum of Leclercq), and the following are the dates: Diaconus de Leclercq. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chrysogonos was the name of two early Christians:

1. A martyr at Rome, under Diocletian, commemorated Nov. 24, in the Hieronymian martyrology, old Roman, and those of Bede and Usuard. Some MSS. of the Hieronymian martyrology give Aquiliae as the place of martyrdom.

2. A monk of Aquiliae to whom Jerome writes (Epist. 9, ed. Vall.) from the desert, asking him to write to him.

Chrysicius (Chrysseul), St., bishop and martyr, is celebrated at Comines, in Flanders, as the apostle of that neighborhood. He suffered under Diocletian A.D. 302, and is commemorated on Feb. 7.

Chrysolaris, Demetrius, a Greek theologian, was born at Thessalonica, and lived in the 14th century. He was recommended by the Franciscans to the emperors of the East, and was charged by that prince with important missions to foreign courts. In the Bodleian Library, and in the National Library of Paris, there are about one hundred MS. letters of Chrysolaris to the emperor Manuel. Chrysolaris also wrote several treatises on religious subjects, of which the most important are: Dialogus adversus Demetrion Cydoniam; —Dialogos contra Latinos: —Encomium in S. Demetrium Martyrem; —Tractatus ex Libris Nili contra Latinos de Deiposmonis Spiritus Sancti: —Epistola ad Barlaumum de Processione Spiritus Sancti. All these writings are translated, possibly by Barlaam himself, and, with a refutation, are found in the Bibliotheca Patrum Constantinopolitana. A great many more still exist in European libraries. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chrysophora was a correspondent of Dionysius of Corinth, "a most faithful sister" (Euseb. iv, 23). The letter is not extant.

Chrysor, in Phoenician mythology, was a hero belonging to the seventh generation of the Deities. He became the father of various inventions: the canoe, bait, fishing-hook, the art of piloting, and the working of iron by fire. He was also worshipped under the name Diamichios.

Chrysostom was chamberlain of Theodosius II (who reigned A.D. 498-540). He was exceedingly influential, and opposed to the Catholic party (Tillemont, xi, 287). See Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

CHRISTIAN

Chrysostom, James D.D., a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1829; presented to the living at Auchinleck in 1833; and had a son, James R., who was minister at Culra. See Fasts Eccl. Scoticae, ii, 97.

Chubaraq, in the Lamanian religion, is the name of the clergy. The Lamanian priests of the Mongolians are called Gellongs.

Chubbuck, Francis E. R., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was chaplain of a regiment of Massachusetts volunteers at the beginning of his ministry in 1862; soon after removed to New Orleans: in 1865 became rector of Trinity Church, Vineyard, N. J.; in 1867 held the same rectory in and also officiated at Paterson, N. J.; and soon after was rector of St. Peter’s Church, Clearbrook, where he remained until his death, Jan. 2, 1872. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1873, p. 133.

Chubilgata, in Mongolian religion, is those spirits that descend from heaven to take possession of a child at its birth.

Chum, Thomas, a learned layman of the 15th century, who lived at Alfiston, Sussex, published in 1535 a small manual entitled Collectiones Theologicae Conclusionum. Some have much opposed it, although they commended its simplicity and clearness of his position, and others welcomed it from a layman at once able and industrious in theological learning. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), ii, 258.

Chumba Version of the Scriptures. Chumba is a dialect spoken by about 120,000 people. Chumba is an independent hill state between Dhalousie and Cashmere. An edition of St. Matthew and St. John in the Chumbi, and in the Thakuri dialect, which is the medium of communication among the people, was published by the British and Foreign Bible Society in 1880. Chumbrechus. See Cunherbert, bishop of Winchester.

Chung-tien-cho in Chinese mythology, is the name of the birthplace of the god Fo or Fo-hi, where true virtue and pure joy dwell. It is believed to have been on Mount Hiei for men and spirits.

Chunialdus, Saint, presbyter of Salzburg, lived about the middle of the 8th century, and is commemorated Sept. 24.

Church. We give some additional details respecting the church edifices:

"The earliest Church property, so called, dates from the reign of Alexander Severus, 222-235. Oaths of Mlevi mentions forty churches at Rome. From the time of Gallienus (268) to the decline of Diocletian, in 303, the Christians had their use; and the Acts of St. Theodosius prove, by their apsidal and semi-apsedial character, that Christian churches were oblong, looking eastward, with the chapels of the clergy on either side, and two western doors as separate entrances for men and women. Afterwards churches were built in various forms —in the shape of a cross, square, or round; the former were vaulted, and the latter had wooden ceilings. Some were apsidal, and their orientation was called by Fransisca 'the more formal form'; but Stephen, bishop of Tours, objected to it as a peculiarity of St. Bertrand, Paris, in a letter to pope Lucius III. In some Italian churches at his day, the altar was celebrated at the altar faced the west. About the year 1000—the fastened millennium of some ancient writers—architecture came near to a standard. Churches were not repaired, much less re- built; for, as William of Tyre said, the evening of days seemed to have fallen upon the world, and the days of the Lord were near; while charters of foundation, rare as they were, bore the ominous head sc — forsannach as the world's end approached. At the beginning of the 11th century confidence was above them for churches after the peace in the time of Constantine; some think that the name of basilica was derived from this early use of the hall, which was also a court of justice (see Basilica); and in the case of the Cathedral of Troyes the actual hall of a Roman house remains to this day, converted into a church, while there is another basilica, or law court, near to it, also converted into a church in more recent times. At Rome the seven great churches made by Constantine, which still retain the name of basilica in an especial manner, were probably all originally law courts, and so preserved their old arrangements, which served as types for others, and came to be considered the usual arrangement of a church.

The Church of Santa Croce was the praetorium, or law court, in the senatorium or palace of the empress Helen, and had an apos added to it by Constantine as a necessary part of the arrangement. That of St. John Lateran, which was the first that Constantine made into a church, was originally one of the halls in the great palace of the Lateran family. Those of St. Lawrence and St. Agnes were originally two of the small burial-chapels at the entrance of their respective catacombs, and other chapels in the catacombs are called basilicas by some writers, though they seldom hold more than fifty persons, and the largest not more than eighty; these are evidently burial-chapels only, and afford no guidance for the arrangement of a church. St. Clement's is usually appealed to as the primitive type; the original church, which now forms a crypt to the present one, is considerably wider. When the upper part of the church was rebuilt, in the 12th century, the old nave of the upper church was found inconveniently wide, and one of the aisles of this underground church is now outside the wall of the upper church. The nave has a certain type of primitive arrangement. That of Torcello, at Venice, is more perfect and unaltered, but is poorly suited to the needs of the 14th century. The example of primitive arrangement remaining, except perhaps St. Agnes, outside of the walls of the Romanesque, is another that the Romanesque court of justice was closely followed, and all the names of the different parts were retained.

In his study of Gothic in stone was revived in Western Europe in the 11th century, the apse appears at first to have been considered an essential feature, as at Chichester, which seems to have followed the plan of the original church of St. Peter's at Rome; and in such cases the altar was probably placed on the choral, as at Chartres. When this practice was abandoned, as from the 12th century in England the square east end became almost universal, and the altar was placed against the east wall, often resting partly upon corbels in the wall. The choir, or choral, is in Italy is sometimes in one part of the church and sometimes another, and in Spain and the south of France is usually in the middle, was in England and the north of France almost universally in the eastern limb of the church, and enclosed by a screen called originally cancelli, from which the name of chancel and choir became synonymous, but usage now generally confines the name of choral to the cathedrals or large churches. See CHANCEL; CHOIR. When there are aisles to the eastern part of a church the central division of it is usually called the choral or general choir. Although the general rule can be laid down, the most usual plan of our English medieval church may be said to be 1. A chancel without a chapel; 2. A chapel without an aisle; 3. A south porch.

Ashton-under-Lyne, Greater Manchester, Oxfordshire, affords a good example of the original plan of a parish church unaltered.

Church, Aaron, a Congregational minister, graduated in 1755 from Yale College; was settled as pastor in Hartland, Conn., in 1789; resigned in 1814, and died in 1823. See Sprague, Annales of the Amer. Pulpit, v. 938.

Church, Aaron B., a Congregational minister, was born in Massachusetts in 1798. He graduated from Harvard College in 1818, and from the Andover Thoroughological Seminary in 1825; was ordained June 21, 1826; was pastor at Calais, Me., from 1826 to 1834; stated supply of the Presbyterian Church at Princeton, Ill., from 1849 to 1853, and died there, April 23, 1857. See Trium. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem., 1870, p. 63.

Church, Alonzo, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Brattleboro', Vt., April 2, 1793. He was educated at Williams College, and was licensed privately, and was licensed by Hopewell Presbytery in 1829. He never had any pastoral charge, but preached often in Ohio, Ga., and was for thirty years president of Georgia University, resigning in 1869. He died at his residence in Atlanta, May 18, 1862. He was a man of sound mind, an excellent preacher, and an excellent teacher. See Wilson, Preb. Hist. Almanac, 1866, p. 351.

Church, Seiden, a Unitarian minister, was born at East Haddam, Conn., graduated at Yale College in 1765, and was settled as pastor in Campton, N. H., in October, 1774. He was dismissed the same year, and died in 1802. See Sprague, Annales of the Amer. Pulpit, viii. 192.

Church-ailes is a name for festivals at which the benefactions of the people at their sports and pastimes being devoted to recast the bells, repair towers, beautify churches, and raise funds for the poor.

Church-books were divided into several classes. There were six reading-books: the Bibliotheca, a collection of the books of the Bible by St. Jerome; the Homilia, the homilies used on Sundays and certain festivals; the Passionar, containing the acts of martyrs; the Legenda, an account of confessors; the Lectorium, the epistles of St. Paul; and the Sermonogu, sermons of the popes and fathers, read on certain days. The song and ritual books are mentioned under their titles. It was the custom till recent years for women-servants to carry their church books in a clean white handkerchief, a relic of the old custom in the Western Church for women to receive the eucharist in a linen cloth. To this day the altar-rail at Wimborne Minster is covered at the time of holy communion with a white cloth.

Churchill, Charles, an English clergyman and poet, was born in the parish of St. John the Evangelist, Westminster, in February, 1731. He was educated at Westminster School, and admitted to Trinity College, Cambridge, but left immediately and never returned. He was ordained priest in 1766, and then exercised his clerical functions at Caludby, Somersettshire, and at Rainham, in Essex, his father's living. At the death of his father, in 1758, he succeeded him in the curacy and lecturership of St. John's. In a short time, however, he forsook all external decency, appearing, to the amazement of the town, in a blue coat, ruffles, and a gold-brocaded hat. Being remonstrated with by the dean of Westminster for various irregularities, he resigned his preferments, and treated his clerical office with utter contempt. He now lived a profligate life, and devoted his talents to poetry, for which he had unquestionable genius. He died Nov. 4, 1764. For particulars of his career and writings see J. S. Lecky, Essay on English Poetry, Esq.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, a. v.

Churchill, James, an English Congregational minister, was born at Portsea, Oct. 7, 1766. He was converted when about nineteen years old, and admitted, in February, 1789, to Homerton College, where he remained till 1795. He became pastor at Ongar, Essex, in February, 1796, removed to Henn-upon-Trent in 1807, and in 1813 to Thames Ditton, where he labored till 1844, when he resigned his charge. He died March 3, 1849. Mr. Churchill was distinguished for purity of character, fidelity in pastoral work, and success in winning souls. See (Lond.) Evangelical Magazine, 1849, p. 608.

Churchill, John, a Congregational minister, was born at Haddam, Conn., Feb. 15, 1811. For a short time he attended Amherst College, and then, from 1833 to 1835, studied medicine at Yale College. In 1839 he graduated from Yale Divinity School. April 22, 1840, he was pastor of the North Congregational Church in Woodbury, Conn., resigned in 1867, but was not regularly dismissed until June, 1869. From 1869 to 1876 he was acting pastor in Oxford, and then returned to Woodbury, where he resided without charge. He was a Representative from Woodbury, in 1867 and 1868, in the Connecticut legislature. His death occurred Dec. 29, 1880. See Cong. Year-book, 1881, p. 19.

Churchman, John, a minister of the Society of Friends, born at Nottingham, Cheshire, Eng., June 4, 1705. He became an established Christian at about twenty, and was "recommended," in the winter of 1735-36, as a preacher. For the next two or three years he exercised his ministry in Pennsylvania, Maryland, New Jersey, Virginia, and New England. From 1736 to 1744 he was engaged in ministerial work in Great Britain, Ireland, and Holland. In the French and Indian war he often raised his voice in favor of a peaceful and conciliatory attitude towards the natives. His death took place July 24, 1775. He left a very full journal of his labors during all these years of his ministry. See Friend's Library, v. 175-265. (J. C. S.)

Church-rates are an assessment made upon the inhabitants of any parish in England for the expenses of repairing the parish church. The rate must be agreed upon at a meeting of the churchwardens and parishioners, regularly called by public notice, but if none of the parishioners appear, the warden alone make the rate. Houses, as well as lands, are chargeable with rates, and in England cases where houses alone are rated. A rate for repairing the church is charged upon the real estate, while a rate for providing ornaments is charged upon the goods or personal property. The rector is held to all charges for repairing the chancel, and is exempt from any rate for repairs on the church in general, except when he holds lands within the parish not belonging to the rectory. Church-rates have long been unpopular in England, and cannot be raised at the mere instance of the bishop; the consent of the parishioners is required.

Church-reeves (from gerefa, a steward) are church-wardens, officers chosen to maintain order during divine service and as trustees of the church goods and furniture. In Spain they are called operaribi, and in France marguillers (merigleri), from the maré, or token of lead, which was given to the persons who attended the service, as a quittance or qualification for receiving payment. They appear as melingiieri at Cefalu, Catania, and Monte Regale.

Church-yards. The dead were not buried, in the earlier times, in the outer court of the church, but examples of the practice occurred in the 4th century, and after the 6th century it became general. The first recorded instance of a formal consecration of a church-yard occurs in the writings of Gregory of Tours, in the 6th century. The church-yard, under the name of atrium, is first mentioned with the garden near the church in 740, in the Excerpta of Egbert. Cuthbert, archbishop of Canterbury, is said to have introduced the use of church-yards as burial-places to England. So late as 1791, the church-yard of the cathedral was used at Hereford. Fairs and markets were prohibited in church-yards by act of Parliament in 1285, and another act of Henry VI proscribed the former in the Sunday, but at the period of the Reformation they were often profaned by the revellings of summer lords in May, and by mummers, in winter-time, and noisy revels and banquets were held under tents in them. The indecent practice was at length suppressed, and in 1623 the privilege of sanctuary was taken from church-yards. See CEMETERY.

Churen, in Hindustan mythology, was a giant, and king of the evil demons. He was besieged by Kartikesya, the twelve-handed and six-headed son of Shiva, and the two sisters Uma and Ganges, and afterwards married Indra's daughter Daneni.

Churillo. See KASCIJ.

Churmastu-Talnigri, in Lamaisi mythology, is the great protecting spirit of the earth, a giant-like, heavenly being, who rides on the middle head of the three-headed elephant, Garj Sakijkin Kowen.

Chutriel, in Talnudic mythology, is the name of one of the devils who is occupied in scourging the damned.

Chylermarke (Lat. Chylmarcirus), John, an English philosopher, who flourished in 1590, was born at Chylermark, Wiltshire; educated at Merton College, Oxford; became a diligent searcher into the mysteries of nature; an acute thinker and disputant; but most remarkable for his skill in mathematics, being the author of many tracts in that science. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), iii, 334.

Chynnoweth, John, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at St. Agnes, Cornwall, May 20, 1849. He was converted at eighteen, and entered the ministry in 1875. His last appointment was to the Bodwin Circuit in 1880. He died Oct. 24, 1881. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1882, p. 15.

Cia-chy-sa-agi, in Lamaisi, is one of the sixteen regions of hell, or of the kingdom of evil demons (the kingdom is called Gnieva). It lies in the district where the damned are tormented. Here the floor is made of red-hot iron, and the lost are obliged to stand with their bare feet on it. The other half of this kingdom is equally unendurable on account of its cold.

Ciaconius. See CHACON.

Ciaffoni, Bernardino, an Italian theologian of the Franciscan order, was a native of San Elpidio, and died in 1604, leaving Apologia in Favoire de Santi Padre (Turin, s. a.; Avignon, 1698). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Claxtelak, an Armenian lexicographer, and monk of the monastery of the island of San Lazzaro, near Venice, was born in Ghiromulka, and died in January, 1835. He occupied himself mostly with the study of languages, the fruit of which was the publication of Preces S. Nieser, Armeniorum Patriarchae, in fourteen languages. His principal works are, an Armenian-Italian Dictionary (printed in the monastery of San Lazzaro, 1841) — Dei Dea Death, translation from the German into the Armenian (Venice, 1825) — The Adventures of Telemachus (transl. into Armenian, 1826, 8vo). He left also several MS. works, in prose and verse, which are still in the monastery of San Lazzaro. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cladieri, Girolamo, a painter of Urbino, was born at Urbino, in 1568, labored from 1603 to 1640, and died at Rome in 1641. The following are some of his principal works: thirteen plates of the Temple of the Dead, Lying upon a Stone; Christ on the Mount of Olives; Christ Appearing to Mary Magdalene; Christ Appearing to St. Theresa. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Clampellino, or Clampellano, a Florentine painter and architect, who was born in 1578, studied under Santo di Tito, and died at Rome in 1646. He painted St. Stephano di Pescia is his celebrated picture of The Visit of the Virgin with Elisabeth; also, in Santa Prassede, The Crucifixion. Two of his finest works in fresco are in the Chiesa del Gesu, representing the Martyrdom of St. Andrea, and a Glory of Saints and Angels on the ceiling. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Clampinni (Lat. Clampusia), Giovanni Gustinio, an Italian historian, was born at Rome, April (or Aug.) 13, 1658, studied law, but devoted himself to antiquities, enjoyed several offices at the pontifical court, founded a scientific school, and died July 12, 1698. He wrote, De Duabus Emblematis in Cardinali Carpentarii Aenarratione (Rome, 1691) — An Epitaphium Romanus Incesti Pastorali Utitur (ibid. 1690) — De Sacris Aelijiciae a Constantino Magno Constructis (ibid. 1693) — De Perpetuo Asyorum usus in Ecclesia Lat. (ibid. 1688) — De Cruce Stationali (ibid. 1774) — Examen Libri Pontificiales (ibid. 1688). See Jócher, Algemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Cian, an early Welsh saint, was patron of Llangain, a chapel under Llanbadrig, in Carnarvonshire (Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 302).

Cianan (or Konanus), bishop of Duleek (Dalmag), is commemorated Nov. 24. He appears to have been a great favorite with St. Patrick, who ordained him bishop, and presented him with a copy of the Gospels, a most valuable gift at that time. The Church of Duleek was also among the first that St. Patrick built in Meath, and he had this special pre-eminence, that it was built of stone; it is called the first stone church in Ireland, and to this day perpetuates the name of the "Stone Building." Dublin, of which Duleek is a corruption of the Old Irish DUICEL, is Round Tower of Ireland p. 141 sq.; Todd and Reeves, Mart. Doney. p. 315; Ware, Irish Bishops, p. 137, Harris's ed.; Butler, Lives of the Saints, xi, 505; Forbes, Kalendar of Scottish Saints, p. 301.

Clanci, Ignacio, an Italian poet and theologian, a Clunaincnoise, commemorated Sept. 9. He is one of the most famous saints of Ireland, and half the monasteries of that country are said to have followed his rule. The year of his birth is variously stated from A.D. 567 to 516. He received his baptism and early education from St. Patrick's disciple, St. Justus. He was famous for his miracles, like all the others of his age, and also for his humility and purity. He died of the plague which raged A.D. 549. He is one of the "Patriei Priores" in St. Cuthbert's Psalter Letter. See Forbes, "Cal. of Scott. Saints," p. 450, 486; Wilson, "Prefix, A.D. Scott. p. 488.

Ciborium. See CIBAR.

Ciborium. The word is no doubt derived from the Greek κύθον, the primary meaning of which is the cup-like seed-vessel of the Egyptian water-lily. It does not appear when the ciborium came first to be in use, though this was probably as early as a date as that in which architectural splendor was employed in the construction of churches. Augusti quotes Eusebios ("Vit. Const. M. iii, 38") as using the word κύθος when describing the Church of the Sepulchre at Jerusalem, and connecting it with the word ἰγματος; but in this there seems to be a mistake, as neither word occurs in cap. 38, while in cap. 57 the latter occurs in connection with ἱγματος; by which last it would seem that the apse was meant.

Paulinus of Nola has been thought to allude to the ciborium in the verses ("Epig. ii, 5"):

"Divinium veneranda tegunt alteria sedes."

Compositaque sacra cum cruce martyrbiarum."

Veils are mentioned by Chrysostom ("Hom. iii in Ephes."

Veils at the door are mentioned at the consecration of the charist, and it is probable that these were attached to the ciborium in the fashion represented by the accompanying woodcut, where a ciborium is shown with the veils concealing the altar.

Clarian (or Kieran). A large number of saints by this name appear in the Irish calendars, but of these only five have much more than the date and place of dedication:

1. Son of Aedh, commemorated Jan. 5.
3. Abbot of Rathmurgh, commemorated Oct. 8, died A.D. 784.
4. Of Saighir, commemorated March 5. The liars of him are of doubtful authority. Lanigan is of opinion that he became a bishop about A.D. 538, and afterwards built the monastery of Saighir, around which a city gradually arose. He was the founder and first bishop of Ossory, and died there after A.D. 550.
5. Macantsaor, or son of the carpenter, and abbot of CIBORIUM  951

12th century, but the practice of suspending such receptacles is no doubt much earlier. See BALD-CHINO.

Ciborium is likewise a modern name for a vessel of precious metal, like a chalice or cup in shape, with a covering surmounted by a cross. It is used in the Roman Catholic Church to contain the sacrament, under the form of bread, when distributed.

Cibot, Pierre Martial, a French missionary, was born at Limoges in 1727. He studied in the College of Louis-le-Grand at Paris, and joined, when young, the society of the Jesuits. He distinguished himself by Teaching philosophy. His zeal for the propagation of the faith led him to China in 1758. His description of his journey is interesting. The emperor of China made him his gardener and mathematician. Cibot wrote, in illustration of the book of Esther, a work still unprinted, consisting of three volumes, of which ample extracts have been given in the last ten volumes of Mémoires de la Chine. He died at Pekin, Aug. 8, 1780.

Ciboule, Robert, a French theologian and moralist, was born at Breteuil in Normandy. He was chan-celloir of Notre Dame at Paris, and chamberlain to pope Nicholas V. His dean of Evreux, was sent by the king of France to the Council of Constance, and in 1437 was among the jurists who advised the rehabilitation of the Maid of Orleans. He died in 1458, leaving several works in MS, also La Sainte Méditation de l'Homme sur sa Mêne (printed at Paris in 1510);—La Consultation de Ciboule en Faveur de la Pucelle (printed by extracts in the edition of the Proces, iii, 326-329). See Hoefer, Ciccione, Andrea, a reputable Italian architect, who flourished in the former part of the 15th century, studied in the school of Masuccio the younger, where he obtained considerable distinction. Among other good works, he erected the famous monastery and church of Monte Oliveto. He also designed the third cloister of San Severino, in the Ionic order, and the small Church of the Pontano, near the Pietra Santa. He died about 1440. See Spoerner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.;

Cicé, Louis de, a French Dominican missionary, living in the beginning of the 18th century. He was Ecclesiastical vicar in China, and wrote Acta Cantuariensi (1700):—Lettre sur Jésus sur les Idolâtries de la Chine (cod. 12mo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale,
s. v.

Ciceri, Bernardino, a painter of Pavia, was born in 1650, and was one of the ablest scholars of Carlo Sacchi. He visited Rome to complete his studies, and on his return to Paris was much employed by the churches.

Ciceri, Paul César de, a French court-preacher, was born at Cavaillon, May 24, 1678, and died April 27, 1759, leaving Sermons et Panégyriques (Avignon, 1763,

Cichovius, Nicolaus, a Polish Jesuit, was born in 1598. For some time he lectured on philosophy and theology at Posen, but made himself especially known by his writings against the Arians, in consequence of which no Arius was tolerated in Poland. He died at Cracow, March 27, 1669, leaving Credo Ariarum:

orum:—Speculum Ariarum:—Triginta Rationes pro Aimetis Ominibus ab Contupis Ariarum. See Ale-gambe, Bibliotheca Scriptorum Societatis Jesu; Jocher,

Cicogna, Emmanuele Antonio, an Italian historian and archaeologist, was born at Venice, Jan. 17, 1789.
studied at Udine, became imperial procurator in 1811, died in his native city, Feb. 22, 1866. His main work is Inserzioni Veneziei (Venice, 1824-53, 5 vols.)

Ciborium of San Apollinare in Classe, at Ravenna.
Portico della of many other ciboria; they are generally described as of silver or decorated with silver. The ciborium in San Bavo's, as erected by Justinian, is described by Paul the Silentiary as having four columns of silver which supported an octagonal pyramidal dome or blunt spire, crowned by a globe bearing a cross.
From the arches hung rich veils woven with figures of Christ, St. Paul, St. Peter, etc.

Ciboria were constructed not only of metal, or of wood covered with metal, but of marble; the alabaster columns of the ciborium of the high-altar of St. Mark's at Venice are said to have occupied the same position in the chapel of the Greek emperor at Constantinople.
They are entirely covered with subjects from Biblical history, sculptured in relief, and appear to be of as early a date as the 5th century; but perhaps the earliest ciborium now existing is one in the Church of San Apollinare in Classe, at Ravenna, which is shown in the inscription engraved upon it to have been erected between A.D. 806 and A.D. 810.

Various ornaments, as vases, crowns, and bassets (cophinii) of silver, were placed as decorations upon or suspended from the ciboria; and, as has already been said, veils or curtains were attached to them; these last were withdrawn after the consecration, but before the elevation of the eucharist.

It does not appear when the use of these veils was discontinued in the Western Church; in the Eastern a screen (sikooi-ßos) with doors
now serves the like purpose; some of the

Cidaria is a term used to distinguish a low-crowned episcopal mitre.

Cienfuegos, Alvarez, a Spanish prelate and statesman, was born at Aguerra, in the Asturias, Feb. 27, 1657, and belonged to the Jesuit order. He was first a profes- sionary, and afterwards a Jesuit, in Salamanca. For some time he occupied the archiepiscopal see of Monreal; was in 1720, cardinal priest; and in 1724, presi- dient of the highest Spanish council at Vienna; in 1733, imperial minister at Rome, and, in 1735, protector of the nuns of Santa Susanna there. In 1737 he resigned his archiepiscopal see, and died at Rome, Aug. 12, 1739. He wrote, De Perfectione Christi Servitorum; — De Eps- embria Del; — De Scientia Media; — De Simonia; — Enig- ma Theologico seu Potius Enigmaticum et Obscurissimi- marum Questionum Compendium (2 vols. fol.). Cinara (or Cinara), Miguel Gerome, a repute- able historical painter of Granada, studied under Alonso Cano, and died in the year 1677. There are several of his best works in the convent del Angel, and in the hospital Corpus Domini, at Gra- nada.

Cignani, Carlo, an Italian painter, was born at Bologna in 1628, and studied under Battista Cairo and Albinelli. He was also influenced by the genius of Cor- reggio. His greatest work is the Assumption, round the cupola of the Church of the Madonna del Fuoco, at Forli, which occupied him twenty years, and is one of the grandest and most remarkable works of art of the 17th century. He died at Forli, Sept. 6, 1719. The following are some of his best works: Adam and Eve; — A Temptation of Joseph, in the Fiorentine Palazzo Arnoldi; and Samson, in the Bolognese Palazzo Zam- boccari. See Encyclop. Brit. (9th ed.) s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cignani, Felice, an Italian painter, son and scholar of Carlo, was born at Bologna in the year 1669, and died in 1724. In the Church della Tri- nita of Bologna is a picture by him, of The Assumption of the Virgin and Infant, with Saints; and an admirable picture of St. Francis Receiving the Stigmata, in the Cappuc- cine.

Cignani, Paolo, an Italian painter, nephew and scholar of Carlo, was born at Bologna in 1709, and died in 1764. There is a fine picture by him, at Savignano, of St. Francis Appearing to St. Joseph of Copertino.

Cignaroli, Giovanni Bettino, an Italian painter, was born at Verona in 1706; studied under Santo Prunato at Venice, and afterwards under Antonio Balestra; and died in 1770 or 1772. At Pontremoli is an admirable picture by him of St. Francis Receiving the Stigmata; and that of A Flight into Egypt, in San Antonio, at Para- ma. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Louvre, at Paris, The Virgin and Infant, Receiving the Homage of Several Saints. His Descent from the Cross, in San Niccolo, at Carpi, is considered very good. In San Giovani, at Venice, is a fine picture by him of The Baptism of Christ. Some of the altar-pieces attributed to him may belong to his son Carlo.

Cimabue, GIOVANNI GAUTIERI, an Italian painter, was born at Florence in 1240. He seems to have rescued the art from its gross and barbarous state, so that he had been called the father of modern painters. He learned his peculiar skill from some Greek artists who were employed in the Church of Santa Maria Novella. His productions, at that time, were regarded with the greatest astonishment, and when he had finished his picture of the Virgin, the Florentines carried it in procession to the above-named church. Few of his works have remained to the present day. However, in Santa Croce, at Florence, is still preserved his St. Francis, and in San Stefano his St. Cecilia. Cimabue died in 1310. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefler, Neue Biog. Gedichte, s. v.

Cimarelli, VINCENTE MARIA, an Italian historian and Dominican priest, was born at Cornivaldo, in the duchy of Urbino, in the beginning of the 17th century. He taught theology, was inquisitor in different states, and died at Brescia in 1660, leaving Rivoluzione Physique et Morale (Brescia, 1640) — Istoria Della Stato & Urbino da Sommi (ibid. 1642). See Hoefier, Neue Biog. Gedichte, s. v.

Cimoyuk, in Lithuanian mythology, was a field and forest god among the ancient inhabitants of the coast of the Baltic sea. He was considered one of the wise, good deities, and statues were erected for him, mostly under elder bushes, which were thought to be the dwelling-places of good spirits.

Cinao. See Cyanog.

Cincinato, ROMOLO, an Italian painter, was born at Florence about 1525, and studied under Francesco Salvati. In 1567 he was invited by Philip II of Spain, where he passed the greater part of his life. His principal works are in the Escorial, where he painted the great cloister in fresco, and in the church two pictures of St. Jerome, reading, and the same saint preaching to his rude Figure of Cimoyuk. He died at Madrid in 1600 (or 1598). See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefier, Neue Biog. Gedichte, s. v.

Cincture is (1) a band or girdle; (2) the flat band, usually about three yards long and four inches broad, used to confine the clerical cassock round the waist. It is made of silk, serge, or stuff, and is commonly fringed at the ends with silk fringe. See Cingulum.

Cingillum (a girdle). The alb is gathered in at the waist by the belt, ornamented at its ends with a fringe or tassels. This was commonly made of white thread twisted in ononi, at Venice, by some others, like a band. Among the inventories of the larger medieval churches, however, many are mentioned of silk, adorned with gold, and jewelled. If like a cord, it was made fast round the loins by a knot; if otherwise, with a buckle, and the fringed or tasselled ends hung down on the cleric's left side. See Cincture.

Cinna (CINNIA, or CINNUS). Saint, a virgins, is commemorated on February I. As she persistently refused to marry Corbucac, her father, Eochaidh, at last permitted her to take with him, who gave her the veil of chastity about A.D. 480, and committed her to the care of Cuthubernis, in the monastery of Drumduchan, where she remained till death.

Cinthia, a king of the Goths, brother and successor of king Sisemund, assisted at the fifth council of Toledo, and the canons by which he confirmed the canons made at this council were intended for the benefit of Cinthia and his race. On Jan. 6, 638, he convoked the sixth council of Toledo, at which nineteen canons were made. They commence with a profession of faith, in which forty-seven bishops and five absent deputies, Silvia, bishop of Narbonne, being at the head, acknowledge the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father and the Son.—Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Cio Concioa, in Lamian mythology, is the second person in the trinity which the Lamaites recognize. Cio, as an animal and man, went through a thousand gradations of transmigration until he reached the highest stage of perfection. This happened in the fifth age of the world, which he had married, after the requisite consecration by a Lahen (blessed spirit), king Sazan. Cio Concioa chose to be born in the body of this nymph. The birth took place through her right side without an opening being noticeable. The newly born child immediately made seven leaps towards the four corners of the heavens. Four of these seven were made towards the west, which signified that he would bless that quarter. The earth quaked for joy six times, and bowed itself before him; a pure, shining light (called Xaka) encircled the babe, lighted up the shelter, and cast its light through the infant's body, so that it shone with the brightness of the sun. The Lahen descended from the heavens, worshipped, and presented it with delightfully scented gifts; a lukewarm rain came from the clouds and washed the boy, whereupon he was consecrated to the god Lhura. This happened in the city of Shershisagi, on the banks of the Ganges, in the Mahayanistic state, where a mystic prophesied to the child that he would lead a pure, blessed life. Cio had been instructed by the angels in all things. No one on earth could teach him anything more. He himself instructed many scholars in divine wisdom. He took two wives, Sazoma and Traziene, who lived in the wilderness, where many pupils collected about him, whom he taught the true religion. He even reformed by his holiness and wisdom thousands of demons, so that they turned from the evil to the good; and also showed the way to heaven, and converted an infinite number of nations to his doctrines. The whole Lama religion owes to him its existence. After living eight hundred years, the Lahen took Cio into heaven; also both his wives and more than five hundred female slaves had part in his blessedness; the rest went to a lower heaven. When he left the earth it quaked off from fright, and a fearful darkness of the sun, lasting three days, covered the whole world.

CIRTA

Circaissians, Religion of the. This interesting people inhabit the mountain valleys in the northern de¬ civities of the Caucasus. Their faith is a mixture of Mohammedanism, Paganism, and Christianity. The first of these is the prevailing belief, and is found mingled with remnants of the others. An attempt was early made to introduce Christianity, but without success, fur¬ ther than the erection of a few wooden crosses here and there. When passing these the natives stop and make an obeisance. They also observe a feast in the month of October, in which they present certain cakes and utter their invocations. This feast, they allege, was anci¬ tiently instituted in honor of the mother of Jesus. They still observe pagan festivals, and offer sacrifices to Se¬ cesse for a plentiful harvest, to Tschibilé (the god of water and justice), and to Toplee (the god of fire), to Isosorich (the god of wind and water), to Mesitcha, Sekutcha, Pekosch, Achin, and others. See Longworth, A Year among the Circaissians; Bell, Journal of a Residence in Cir¬ casia.

Circe, in Greek mythology, a mighty sorceress, was the daughter of the god of the sun and of Perse, sister of Eetes, the king of Colchis. Her father carried her from Colchis towards the west, and placed her on an island in the neighborhood of Italy, which the sorceress soon changed into an enchanting spot. In a beautiful valley she lived, in a palace sparkling with gold and jewels; lions and wolves, which she had tamed, guarded her residence, and golden-haired nymphs, goddesses, such as she was, were her servants. When Ulysses, in his wanderings, came thither, he sent a part of his crew on shore to explore the island. Eurycleus, the leader, prudently remained at a dis¬ tance, and thus escaped sharing the lot which fell to the rest. They were changed into swine, and fed on acorns. Ulysses now went himself to the dangerous sorceress. Mercury had given him a preventive against her witchery. Circe was taken by surprise when she discovered that her charm did not affect him, and she thereupon swore not to injure him nor his friends, to liberate the latter, and to share her kingdom and her love with him. One year Ulysses lived there, and Circe bore to him a son, Agrius. Latinus, Teleugesus, and Casiphone are also mentioned as her children. Now Ulysses longed for home, but Circe first sent him to Helen to ask the advice of the shade Tiresias. Dur¬ ing Ulysses' stay with her, Calchas, the king of the Danians, whom she had formerly favored, came to her, but was changed into a swine, and only at the entreaties of the Danians was he restored, on condition of never returning again to the island. Telemachus came, seeking his father, and married her daughter Cassiphone; but becoming angry with Circe, he killed her, and was therefore killed by his wife.

Diodorus relates the story as follows: Helios had two sons, Eetes and Perseus, who became kings of Colchis and Taurica respectively. Hecate, the daughter of Perseus, married Eetes, and gave birth to Circe and Medea, and one son, Egeiales. Circe was occupied in the discovery of various poisons. The king of the Danians, a Scythian king, married her in marriage, but her first act was to poison her husband, and to take forcible possession of the kingdom. She was driven from the throne, and fled, with her women, to an uninhabited island.

Circignani, Antonio, an Italian painter, son and scholar of Niccolò, was born at Pomezia in the year 1560, and assisted his father in his works at Rome. He painted several pictures of The Life of S. Bert., for the Carmelite church of Santa Maria; also several subjects in the life of the Virgin, in La Madonna della Consolazione. He died in the year 1620.

Circuti were the same as Agnostici (q.v.).

Circumcision, Festival of the, is the octave of Christmas. We present some further particulars on this subject:

"Its present name does not date earlier than the 8th or 9th century, and commemorates the circumcision of our Lord's Infant in baptism with the Mosaic law. The festival was established in the time of Leo the Great, but its occurrence on January 11 is not mentioned before the Council of Tours, held in 587. It is marked in the ancient calendars, and in the martyrlogy of Jerome, Bede, and Ueuard. The 'Sacramentary' of St. Gregory defines it 'in the Lord's octave.' The day was fixed in order to officiate the relics of pagan superstition by the shedding of our Lord's Innocent Blood. The aged and infirm are usually consecrated a bishop on this day. The second Council of Tours, in 587, required all priests and monks to have public prayer in church on this day; and the Council of Trullo forbade the observance of the calends."

Circumcision, The Great, is a name sometimes applied by early Christian writers to the ordinance of baptism, because it takes the place of circumcision, and is the seal of the Christian covenant, as that was the seal of the covenant made with Abraham.

Cirey, Jean de, a French Cistercian of Dijon, flourished in the 15th century. In 1476 he became abbot of the monastery of Bellemont, and built in 1477 the synod held at Orleans, and in 1478 that held at Tours. He died Dec. 27, 1503, leaving Capitolium Generale Cisterciense (Dijon, 1480) Privilegia Ordinis Cisterciensis (ibid, 1491, 1630); and some other works. had been guilty of betraying the sacred books during the persecution. The better to understand their crime, it must be borne in mind that, during the Diocletian persecution, an edict was promulgated, ordering the destruction of the churches, and obliging the magistrates everywhere to take from the bishops and priests of the Church their copies of the Holy Scriptures. This edict was executed with the greatest rigor in Numidia; the magistrates themselves entered into the churches, and into the houses of the bishops and clergy, to search for the Scriptures, that they might burn them, threatening with the penalty of death all who refused to discover them. Many of the Christians were content to suffer any torment, and death itself, rather than betray them; but there were some, not merely among the lower orders of ecclesiastics, but also among the priests, and even bishops, who, through fear of death, were guilty of delivering up the sacred volumes: such were styled "Traditors." At Cirta there were, unhappily, many bishops and others of the clergy who had shown a miserable example of cowardice. After the bishops had confessed their sin in the council, Secundus gave them absolute absolution.

Silvanus, a subdeacon, who had also been a traditor, was elected to the bishoipric. See Labbe, Concil. i, 586.

II. In 412, in the month of June, under Silvanus, primate of Numidia, assisted by several bishops of the See of Tingis, Augustine, upon the subject of the Donatists, who, finding themselves entirely worsted in the conference of Carthage, spread abroad a report, to cover the shame of their defeat, that Marcellinus, the judge of the conference, had been bribed by the Catholics, and that the Donatists had not permitted a fair discussion. The former wrote a letter, dictated by Augustine, in which these calumnies are refuted. See Labbe, Concil. ii, 1518.

Cisara (Cisa, also Ciri), in the mythology of the Wends and Slavs, was a goddess of the fruitful earth, who is believed to be identical with Ceres, and was worshipped by the Lithuanians, Vindelicians, Sorbians, also in Saxony, where the city Zeitz was named after her. In the vicinity of Augustburg she had a sacred wood, where her festivals were celebrated and sacrifices offered. The name of this mother of all the wise comes from the Slavonic Zita (the breast).

Cisahom, James, a Scotch prelate, was chaplain to king James III, and was advanced to the see of Dunblane, in June, 1564. He was much employed by the queen in civil and public affairs. He was also one of the commissioners for the divorcing of the earl of Bothwell from lady Jane Gordon. He went to France, where it is said he was made bishop of Vaison. He died a Carthusian at Grenoble. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 178.

Cisahom, William, a Scotch prelate, was, during the lifetime of his uncle William, constituted coadjutor and future successor in the see of Dunblane, in 1564. He was much employed by the queen in civil and public affairs. He was also one of the commissioners for the divorcing of the earl of Bothwell from lady Jane Gordon. He went to France, where it is said he was made bishop of Vaison. He died a Carthusian at Grenoble. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 180.

Cissas (Cysas, or Cysae) is the name of two persons in the early history of Christian Britain.

1. A regius in the reign of King Ecgberht, king of the West Saxons (A.D. 676-695), having authority over what is now Wiltshire and the greater part of Berkshire. He was a benefactor of Abingdon monastery, founded by his nephew Heane, and there he was buried.

2. An anciunc at Croyland, in the earlier part of the 8th century.

Cistae were small chests or boxes which, among the ancient Greeks, were carried in procession in the festivals of Demeter and Dionysus. In these chests were certain utensils used in the worship of those deities.

Cistercians. In the following article we add some particulars respecting this order, especially in Great Britain:

"They came to England and settled at Waverley in 1198. From that excellent refounder, Bernard of Clairvaux, in 1118, they were often called Bernardines. They were distinguished by their silence, austerity, labor in the field, their gray or white habit, and dislike of ornament in their buildings. They erected their abbeys in lonely places, until those in the wooded and watered valleys, far away from human habitation, and were principally noted for their success as graziers, shepherds, and farmers. The short choir, the hospital aisle, divided into certain chapels, the low central sail glass in the windows, the solitary bell, the absence of tesselated pavements, pictures, mural color, and many lights in the church; the regular and almost invariably arrangement of the conventional buildings, with the dormitory at the eastern side of the cloister, the dormitory at the western, and all the rest alternating with the transept by a flight of stairs; the refectory set at right angles to the cloister; the chapter-house divided into aisles, except at Margam in Wales, are unfauling notes of the houses of the order. There were, in later days, modifications of this arrangement in the towers of Fontainebleau and Farnese, and noble choirs of the former church, Rievaulx, and Salis; in the exceptional case of Beaulieu, and the choirs of Evesham, with its crowns of radiating chapels and the use of stained glass and armillary tisles. But in general the character of extreme simplicity, verging on baldness, was preserved. Only one abbey church, that of Scarborough, remains in use: the rest are in ruins or destroyed. At Buildwas, Joreville, Melrose, Byland, Rievaulx, Ford, Meresvale, Boyle, Tintern, Llleshall, Kirkstall, and Netley, it is still possible to trace the ground-plan, or reconstruct the arrangement of the ancient buildings. The absence of an eastern lady chapel in England is always observable. No such adjunct was ever built, because the圖案 end of the church was dedicated to St. Mary. The square east end may be said to have been universal in England, for there were but two instances to the contrary: with the exception of Cleves, which was square-ended, the finest ministers on the Continent presented an aisle or chevet. The triforium story was rare in England."

Citation is a summons formally served upon a person charged with an offence, at the instance of an ecclesiastical judge or court, requiring him to appear on a certain day, at a certain place, to answer the complaint made against him.

Citham was one of the "martyres Scillitani" at Carthage, commemorated July 17 in the calendar of Carthage, Bede, old Roman, and that of Usuard.

Cittalicne, in Mexican mythology, was a goddess to whom was attributed the protection of the world.

Cittalstonak, in Mexican mythology, was an ancient mighty god of the tribes of the Andes, the husband of Citallicne. A magnificent city was their residence, from which they had a watcful eye over the people and the world. They had many children.

Citraa, in the religion of India, was a hieroglyphic sign marked on the breast or forehead to show the sect to which one belonged.

Citta (Di Castello), Francesco Ia, an Italian artist of the 16th century, succeeded Pietro Pauschel. He painted the chapel of Bernardino, in Ara Coeli, at Rome. In the Church of the Conventuali, at Citta di Castello, is a fine altar-piece by him, representing The Annunciation. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.
CITTADINI

Cittadini, Pietro Francesco (called il Milanesse), an Italian painter, was born at Milan about 1616, studied under Guido, and died at Bologna in 1681. The following are some of his principal works in Bologna: The Stoning of Stephen; Christ Praying in the Garden; The Flagellation, in the Church of San Stefano. There is a fine picture by him in the Church of Santa Agata, of that same. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Rose, Gen. Biog. Dict. s. v.

Cittina, a Numidian bishop, is addressed by Cyprian, Epist. 170.

Citu, in the religion of the Andes tribes, was a festival of purification, especially among the Peruvians. A fast, lasting twenty-four hours, and a bath preceded this festival. At its celebration four servants of the sun were consecrated by the Incas.

Civaux, François, a French martyr, was secretary to the French ambassador in England in Queen Mary's time, and being desirous to hear the word of God, went to Geneva. He was also secretary to the senate or council of Geneva, where he continued one year. He then went to Dijon. The priest at this place preached certain doctrines which Civaux could not believe, and he reasoned with him in a friendly way, showing him by the Scriptures where he erred. This offended the priest, who had him taken to prison. In seven days after, Civaux was brought to the place of execution, where first he was strangled, and then burned, at Paris, in 1559. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 444.

Civerchio, Vincente (called il Vecchio di Crema), an Italian painter, was born at Crema, in Lombardy, and flourished from 1560 to 1595. In the cathedral of Crema he has a picture by this master, representing Justice and Temperance. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Civa, an early Welsh saint, was a patron of Llangwili, otherwise Llanguke, in Glamorganshire (Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 307).

Cizemsky, Andrew Remi, a Polish theologian of the Franciscan order, lived in the latter part of the 17th century, and wrote Laurus Triumphalis Polonicus a Suecia, etc. (Cracow, 1660). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Clase, Guillaume Marchi, a Flemish theologian, was born at Ghent, in Brabant, Oct. 8, 1668. He was professor of morals at the University of Louvain, and died in 1710, leaving a valuable work, Ethica seu Moralis (Louvain, 1702, 12mo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Classem, Anders Magnus, a Swedish Baptist minister, was born in 1831. He was converted in early youth, and while studying at Linköping, in 1857, in order to fit himself to become a school-teacher, opened a Sunday-school, which was such an innovation upon the old order of things that it awakened no small amount of opposition in the community. Having received an appointment from the American Baptist Publication Society, as one of its colporteurs in Sweden, he served them in that capacity from 1859 to 1866, and amid much persecution may be said to have laid the foundation for the Smoland Association of Baptist Churches. He died Jan. 23, 1881. See National Baptist, March 24, 1881. (J. S. C.)

Claesson, Dietrich Sigfried, a Reformed theologian of Germany, was born at Frankfort-on-the-Oder, Nov. 4, 1685. He studied at his native place and at Leyden, in 1713 rector of the Friedrichs-Werd Gymnasium at Berlin, in 1715 preacher of the Reformed Church, as well as court and cathedral preacher there. In 1718 he was professor as well as rector of theology to his native place, where he was also made doctor of theology. He died at Herborn in 1748, leaving Animadversiones Philosophicae-Theologicae: De Enecissis Judaeorum: De Erastus deichi. See Neubauer, Nachrichten von jetzttodlichen Gottheitslehrern; Jöcher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lecktion, s. v.

Claessoon, Arnold (called by Dutch writers Aart Claassoon, or Aartgen van Leyden), a Dutch historical painter, was born at Leyden in 1498, studied under Engelsbrecht, and died in 1564. There are two pictures by him, much praised, at Leyden, representing The Crucifixion, and Christ Bearing his Cross. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Rose, Gen. Biog. Dict. s. v.

Clagett, Nicholas (1), an English divine, was born at Canterbury in 1607, and in 1628 entered Merton College, Oxford, where, in 1631, he took B. A. In 1638 he became preacher of St. Mary, and some years later was elected minister at St. Mary's Church, in Bury St. Edmunds, Suffolk. He died Sept. 12, 1663, having published The Abuse of God's Grace (1659, 4to).

Clagett, Nicholas (2), D.D., an English divine, was born in May, 1654, and was educated at the free school of Bury St. Edmunds, under Mr. Edward Luds. He took his degree in the arts from Christ College, Cambridge, Jan. 12, 1671. In March, 1689, he was made pastor at St. Mary's, in Bury St. Edmunds; Feb. 1, 1683, he was instituted to the rectory of Churchover parish in Warwickshire, and on Jan. 6, 1690, he was installed to the archdeaconry of Sudbury, and in March, 1707, he was instituted to the rectory of Hitcham, in Suff. He died Jan. 30, 1726 or 1727, leaving some single Sermons, a pamphlet entitled A Peramission to an Injurious Trial of Opinions in Religion (London, 1666, 4to), and The Accomplishment of Scripture Prophecies (ibid. 1710, 8vo).

Clagett, Nicholas (3), D.D., an English presbyter of the preceding, became archdeacon of Buckingham in 1722, dean of Rochester in 1724, was consecrated bishop of St. David's, Jan. 23, 1728, and translated to the see of Exeter in 1742. He became at the same time prebendary and archdeacon of Exeter, and died Dec. 8, 1746, leaving several single Sermons. See Le Nerve, Pauti; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Claggett, Erastus Baldwin, a Congregational minister, was born in Newport, N.H., May 9, 1815. He received his preparatory education at Kimball Union Academy, was a student in Dartmouth College, and graduated from Andover Theological Seminary in 1844. He was ordained at Lyndeborough, N.H., Sept. 30, 1846, and remained until Sept. 20, 1870, when he became acting pastor at New Fairfield, Conn., in October of that year, and remained as such until his death. May 16, 1877. He published, in the Congregational Quarterly for 1864, a History of the Union Association. (W. P. S.)

Clamanges (Clamanges, or Clémangis), MATTHEW NICOLAS DE, a French theologian, was born about 1890, in the village of Clamanges (Clémangis), near Chalons, in Champagne. He went to Paris at the age of twelve, and was admitted to the College of Navarre, of which his uncle, Pierre de Clamanges, a celebrated physician, was master. There he distinguished himself by his poetry. In 1820 he became rector of the University of Paris, and presented a treatise on the royal authority, which caused a conflict between the University of Paris and the government of Charles VI, in consequence of which the schools were closed for some time. It is said that this conflict even caused the death of pope Clement VII. His successor, Benedict XIII, made Clamanges his secretary. But in 1408 a bull of excommunication was sent forth by the pope against Charles VI, in consequence of which Clamanges was obliged to spend several years in Tuscany, in the Abbey of Lellibronso. After this, however, he went back to France, and was successively treasurer of the University of Paris, cantor and professor. He spent his last years at the College of Navarre, and died there about 1440, leaving a number of works, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jülicher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Clanahan, Samuel, a Scotch clergyman, was born July 17, 1779; educated at the parish school; studied at the universities of Glasgow and Edinburgh; was licensed to preach in 1805; became tutor in the family of Robert Hathorn Stewart in 1806; was presented to the living at Glasserton in 1813, and ordained, and died Feb. 27, 1849. He was a man of few words, sententious, witty, fond of playfulness, modest, and diffident. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, i, 782.

Clancululii were a Christian sect which arose after the Reformation in the 16th century. They attached very little importance to the sacraments, alleging that if religion was seated in the heart there was no need of any outward expression of it.

Clancy, John, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Johnstown, N. Y., March 26, 1793. He was prepared for college by Rev. Dr. Yale of Kingsborough, and graduated from Middlebury College in 1814; taught one year in the academy at Castleton; graduated from Andover Theological Seminary in 1822, and the following year was city missionary in Boston. He was licensed to preach by the Londonderry Presbytery in 1822, went to Virginia as missionary, and continued one year. In 1825 he became pastor at Chariton, N. Y., and remained sixteen years. After this he supplied the Congregational Church at Belchertown, Mass., until 1846, when he returned to his old charge in Chariton, and remained there six years, supplying also the Presbyterian Church at Princetown one year, and the Church of Hamilton Union of Guilford and five years. In 1856 he became pastor of the Reformed Dutch Church in Miniville, Montgomery Co., N. Y., remaining until 1869, when he removed to Schenectady, supplying various churches in the vicinity, and preaching six months at Little Falls. He served faithfully and efficiently as clerk of the presbytery for twenty years. Enfeebled by age, he was obliged to retire from active duty, and many persons have said they never saw a happier old man. He died in Schenectady, Sept. 9, 1876. See P. S. 398.

Clapp, HUGH, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree as Edinburgh University in 1675; was called to the living at Kirkbean in 1687, and ordained; was a member of the assemblies of 1690 and 1692, and deposed in 1696 for drunkenness. He was banished in 1713 for marrying persons irregularly. He afterwards joined the "Levellers," a party which would have taken the government into their own hands, and he, being the only learned person among them, was employed to draw up their papers. He published in 1698, in Latin, an account of his party. There is no further record of him. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, i, 584.

Clap, Nathaniel, a Congregational minister, was born at Dorchester, Mass., in January, 1668, and graduated from Harvard College in 1690. He began his work as a minister in Newport, R. I., in 1696. After many trials of faith and patience a Church was formed, of which he was ordained the pastor, Nov. 3, 1720. He preached there about half a century, and died Oct. 30, 1745. He was a saintly and patriarchal man, but never married. The celebrated dean Berkeley said of him, "Before the time of the Rev. Mr. Clap, I thought the bishop of Rome had the greatest asset of any man I ever saw, but really the minister of Newport has a more venerable appearance."

He published only a Sermon (1715), See Callender, Funeral Sermons; Whitefield, Journal. (J. C. S.)

Clap, Thomas, an eminent Congregational divine, was born at Scituate, Mass., June 26, 1705. While attending Harvard University, where he graduated in 1722, he made a profession of religion. He was ordained pastor over the Congregational Church in Windham, Conn., in 1726, and continued there until 1739, when he assumed the presidency of Yale College, being installed in his new office April 2, 1740. He resigned in 1766, and died at the home of his youth, Jan. 2, 1767.

"President Clap was a man of marked qualities, strong mental powers, clear perception, solid judgment; though sometimes turned aside by prejudice, as in the case of Whitefield. He was a good scholar, an instructive preacher, Calvinistic in doctrine, not fond of parade, peaceful in death." He published a History of Yale College, a number of Sermons, Essays, etc., and had gathered materials for a history of Connecticut. See Cong. Quarterly, 1861, p. 262.

Claparde, David, an eminent Reformed theologian of Switzerland, was born in 1727 at Geneva, where he was ordained in 1751. Having returned from his travels in Holland and England, he was appointed pastor at his native place in 1761, and two years later was also elected professor of theology. He occupied the pulpits from 1761 to 1790, and the professor's chair from 1763 to 1798. He published only one great work, Considérations sur les Miracles de l'Évangile (Geneva, 1765; translated into English and German), besides twenty-six Dissertations, published from time to time. He died in 1801. Claparde was an eloquent preacher, a staunch reformer, and an able divine. A selection of his sermons was published in 1805. See Senebier, Histoire Littéraire de Généve, iii; Haag, La France Protestant, iii; Sayou, Le Dir-ou-Uite siècle à l'Évange; l; Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der. Theil. i, 359. (B. P.)

Clapham, Samuel, an English clergyman who died in 1890, aged seventy-six, published, under the name of "Theophilus St. John," Original Sermons (1790) — Practical Sermons (1803, 2 vols.) — Charges of Massillon, from the French (1805) — Points of Sessional Law (1818, 2 vols.) — The Postulate, or The Five Books of Moses, illustrated (1818), and other works. Sidonius' grandfather, a Roman bishop, dedicated a church which Claphus had built, and expresses a great desire to see him some day bishop of it, when God should have alayed the persecution of the Visigoths.

Clapp, Andrew Josiah, a Congregational minister, was born in Massachusetts in 1833. He graduated from Amherst College in 1858, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1861; was ordained Feb., 19, 1862, and was stated supply at Shutesbury, Mass., from 1862 until his death, Sept. 13, 1863. See Treni. Cat. of An-

Clapp, Caleb, a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was made rector of the Church of the Nativity, in New York city, not long after his graduation from the General Theological Seminary, and was connected with that Church for many years. He died Jan. 29, 1878, aged sixty-seven years. See Prot. Epic. Almanac, 1879, p. 168.

Clapp, Joel, D.D., an eminent minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born at Montgomery, Vt., Sept. 19, 1804. His father, Caleb Clapp, was one of two brothers, both of whom served through the war of the Revolution. The father moved from Worcester County, Mass., to Montgomery, Vt., and for two years his family was the only one in town, Joel being the first child born there. In 1810 he entered the University of Vermont, at Burlington, but the death of his father in the fall of 1811 compelled him to leave. After being admitted to practice law he relinquished it and studied theology. In 1818 he was ordained deacon, and priest in the following year. Soon after his ordination he organized three parishes in Montgomery, Berkshire, and Shelburne, and became rector of Trinity Church, in the last named, Oct. 27, 1819. For eight years he devoted himself to this parish, performing, in addition, a vast amount of missionary work. In 1828 he resigned his charge in Shelburne, and officiated alternately at Bethel and Woodstock. In 1832 he accepted a call to Gardiner, Me., remaining eight years, and during that period was delegate from that diocese to the General Convention. In 1840 he was again rector of the Church in Woodstock, and in 1848 became pastor at Bellows Falls. He remained, in 1858, to the diocese of New York, and was instated rector of St. Philip's, Philadelpia. Having accepted the post of chaplain and superintendent of the Home for Orphans and Orphanas, at Brooklyn, in January, 1860, his health proved unequal to its duties, and he withdrew to the rectorship of the parishes of Montgomery and Berkshire, Vt., a short time before his death, which occurred at Claremont, N. H., Feb. 24, 1861.

Dr. Clapp represented the diocese in seven sessions of the General Convention; was thirteen years secretary of the Diocesan Convention; seven years president of the Standing Committee, and in 1848 was appointed one of the Board of Agents for the management of its lands in Vermont by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts. His mental endowments were rather solid than brilliant; he was a man of extraordinary piety, and was a most useful and beneficent

Clapp, Margaret, wife of Allen Clapp of Philadelphia, was a minister of the Society of Friends (Orthodox). She died March 7, 1835, aged fifty-nine years. See The Friend, viii, 290.

Clapp, Sumner Gallup, a Congregational minister, was born at Andover, Mass., March 10, 1860. He graduated from Yale College in 1882, taught at the academy in New Castle, Me., for two years following, and graduated from Andover Theological Seminary in 1887. He was ordained pastor of the Church in Enfield, Mass., Jan. 9, 1892. In 1884, by appointment of the Hampshire Association, he did missionary service for three months in Canada East. In 1897 he was instated to Cabotville, now Chicopee, from which he was dismissed, Jan. 22, 1890. After preaching three months in Orono, Me., he began to study for the ministry in Vt., in November, 1890, in which place he was installed pastor of the South Church, Jan. 14, 1892, and was dismissed in 1895. In October of that year he became pastor in Sturbridge, Mass., and retired from the position in 1892. In 1894 and 1895 he was acting pastor at Lymanville, Me., and at Chester, N. H., at which he concluded his ministry, and resides at Durchester, Mass. He died in Boston, Jan. 26, 1869. See Cong. Quarterly, 1889, p. 300.

Clapperton, Theodore, a Universalist minister, was born at Easthampton, Mass., in 1782. He studied at Williams College, but graduated from Yale in 1814; pursued his theological researches for one year at Andover, N. H., he began to study for the ministry in the General Theological Seminary, and was connected with that Church for many years. He died Jan. 29, 1878, aged sixty-seven years. See Prot. Epic. Almanac, 1879, p. 168.

Clapperton, Warren Benjamin, a Baptist minister, was born in New York city in 1827. He graduated from Brown University in 1848, from the Rochester Theological Seminary in 1852, and from Andover, N. H., in 1856, where he remained six years. He was stated supply at Milford from 1863 to 1865, and died at Wappinger's Falls, N. Y., Sept. 27, 1865. See Gen. Cat. of Rochester Theol. Sem. p. 12. (J. C. S.)

Clapperton, William Thompson, a Congregational minister, was born at Hudson, O., April 12, 1838. In the winter of 1853-4 he was converted; in 1857 graduated at Williams College; and in 1863 at Union Theological Seminary, N. Y. The next year he remained at home, in Hudson, studying, and preaching in the Presbyterian Church at Streetsborough. He was ordained pastor of the Congregational Church in Edinburg, O., in 1864, and died there March 18, 1865. He was a clear, earnest, and elegant preacher. His sermons were filled with great care and affection for his hearers, nothing except to do good in the name of Christ. See Cong. Quarterly, 1861, p. 425.

Clapperton, John (1), a Scotch clergyman, was appointed, in 1670, the first minister of the Reformed faith at Livingston, and was transferred to Hutton in 1731 as the first Presbyterian minister at that place. He was a member of the General Convention; and in 1754 three other places were added to his charge. He was transferred to Lencul (now Coldstream) in 1756; appointed minister of Merse and Lammermuir several times, and in 1888 was visitor from Forth to Berwick. In 1884 he was arrested and taken to Edinburgh for not giving obedience to his Ordinary. He was charged with "drinking" at the Parish of the presbytery in 1866, but the synod required him to resign that office. He was a member of sixteen general assemblies, and died in 1617. Calderwood says, "He was ambitious, and ready to embrace any prerogament." See Fasti Eccles. Scotoe, i. 192, 432, 140.

Clapperton, John (2), a Scotch clergyman, was born at Glasgow, Scotland, in 1680, and was transferred to the succeeding Synods of Edinburgh in 1617; in 1620 was permitted to transfer to the next adjoining presbytery; was deposed before 1641, and died before Aug. 25, 1655. See Fasti Eccles. Scotie, i. 459.

Clapperton, John (3), a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1842; was presented to the living at Yetholm in 1662; resigned to CLARKE

1866; was transferred to Yarrow the same year, and died in 1879, aged about fifty-seven years. See Fasti Eccles. Scottiani, i, 476, 563.

Clapson, Richard, an English Congregational minister, was born at Maidstone, Sept. 2, 1794. He joined the Church in early manhood; received his ministerial training at Hackney College, and settled at Exmouth, where he continued during life, and died May 17, 1863. Much of his usefulness at Exmouth is traceable to the pledge he took and kept, for the sake of "reformed society," of maintaining perfect intoxicants. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1866, p. 241.

Clare, John, an English Baptist minister, was born at Ashton, Berkshire, in 1776. He was educated among the Independents, but joined the Baptists when between eighteen and nineteen years of age; and having already written short sermons as "an amusement and an exercise," he now frequently "exercised his gift" in some of the leading Baptist churches in the vicinity. At length he became pastor in the village of Downton, where he remained for more than thirty-seven years, securing in eminent degree the affections of his flock, and making "full proof of his ministry." He died near the close of 1840. See (Lond.) Baptist Register, 1840, p. 185-187. (J. C. G.)

Clarehune, William, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1700; appointed to the living at Culasmond in 1711; ordained in 1712; transferred to Kindar in 1719, but returned. He died May 13, 1738. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, iii, 579, 603.

Claretius, Saint, bishop of Vienne, in France, lived in the early part of the 7th century, and is commemorated on his birth-day, April 19th.

Claridge, Richard, an English clergyman, and an eminent writer among the Quakers, was born in October, 1649, at Farmborough, in Warwickshire, where he received his early education. In 1666 he entered Balliol College, Oxford, but removed to St. Mary's Hall, where he took his bachelor's degree in 1670. He received ordination soon after, and in 1673 took charge of the Society of People of Worcestershire, but resigned it in 1691, and the same year became a Baptist. In 1697 he joined the Quakers, and continued a member and preacher among them until his death, Feb. 28, 1728. The following are some of his works: Pious ramblings in the woods; The soul's journey out of the world; The liberty of the true-born subject: Liberty of conscience. See Piety Promoted, ii, 361; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. a. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, a. v.

Clarisse, Johannes, a Dutch theologian, was born at Schiedam in 1770. In 1803 he was professor of theology at Hardwick; in 1811, preacher at Amsterdam; in 1813, doctor and professor of theology at Leyden, where he died in 1843. He is the author of Encyclopædia Theologicæ Epitome (Leyden, 1832, 1835)—Diss. Exeg. theol. de Spiritu Sancto (Utrecht, 1791; Dutch transl. ibid. 1793)—Schröte Theologiæ Presbyteri Apostolicæ (ibid. 1843). See Winer, Handbuch der theolog. Lit., i, 424, 427; ii, 67; Zachold, Bibl. Theol. i, 257. (B. P.)

Clarisse, Theodor Adrian, a Dutch theologian, was doctor and professor of theology at Gröningen, and died at Leyden, Sept. 25, 1828. He is the author of Psalmi 15 Hannemolth Illustrati (Leyden, 1819)—Praeissle Societatis Christi Historia (Gröningen, 1824)—De Althaeopagia Vie et Scriptae, etc. (Leyden, 1819)—Viertel Leerredenen (Rotterdam, 1814)—Leer- redenen (Amsterdam, 1817)—Nieuwe Leerredenen (ibid. 1825). Clarke, Abner, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Salem, N. H., May 1, 1788. He was converted when twelve years old; joined the Church in 1807, and in the following year was received into the New England Conference, wherein he served the Church with much acceptance and usefulness until his death, Feb. 20, 1814. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1814, p. 242.

Clark, Albert Brown, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Schellsburg, Bedford Co., Pa. He graduated at Dickinson College, and at the Western Theological Seminary; was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Carlisle in 1841, and called to supply the Church at Bedford; was next ordained pastor at Ligonier. While there he established a female seminary, which he successfully conducted. He served one year as financial agent of Washington College. His last charge was Altoona, Pa., where he labored with success until his death in 1863. He stood high in the Presbytery of Huntington. (W. P. S.)

Clark, Albert G., a Universalist minister, was born at Preston, Chenango Co., N. Y., Sept. 21, 1811. He received a liberal education; began school-teaching at the age of seventeen; commenced the study of theology in 1835, and in 1837 was ordained to the ministry. After laboring several years as missionary at Upper Lisle, he removed successively to Speedsville; to McLean, in 1840; to Beaver Dam, in 1841; to Branchport, in 1853. In 1854 he again, in April, joined the church of De Ruyter (all in New York), where he remained until his death, Nov. 28, 1873. Mr. Clark was an active and efficient agent in the circulation of his denominal literature; a zealous and untiring preacher; pure in his private life, genial in his manners, kind-hearted and full of sympathy. See Universalist Register, 1876, p. 128.

Clark, Alton Byron, a Baptist minister, was born at Sharon, Me., March 24, 1826, and graduated at Waterville College in 1851. For two and a half years he was principal of the Shelburne Falls, Mass, Academy, and then entered the Newton Theological Institution, but did not complete the full course of study. He was ordained in Skowhegan (then Bloomfield), Sept. 12, 1855, where he was very successful for three years and a half, but was obliged to resign on account of ill-health, in the spring of 1859. For the next three years and more he was an agent of the American Baptist Publication Society, and then accepted a call to the pastorate of the church in Cottin, Ca., Mass. He preached only three months, and for more than one year was disabled by disease. Brought back to his Eastern home, he died in Skowhegan, Me., Sept. 9, 1865. (J. C. S.)

Clark, Alexander (1), a Scotch clergyman, son of the minister of Tron Church, Glasgow, took his degree at the university there in 1727; was licensed to preach in 1731; presented to the living at Neilston in 1732; ordained in 1734, and died Oct. 6, 1756, aged thirty-two years. There was then no more acceptable minister or preacher in the west of Scotland. See Fasti Eccles. Scottiani, ii, 230.

Clark, Alexander (2), a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1813; was licensed to preach in 1821; presented to the third charge at Inverness in 1822; transferred to the first charge at Tain in 1834, and died March 6, 1852, aged fifty-five years. He was remarkably zealous and active on the popular side in all the proceedings of the Church. He published Rights of Members of the Church of Scotland (1838)—five single Sermons (1831-46)—Present Position of the Church, and the Duty of its Members (1840)—First Annual Report, on the Church situated in the Church of Scotland (1848)—five of which were translated into Gaelic. See Fasti Eccles. Scottiani, ii, 255, 259.

Clark, Allen, a Congregationalist minister, was born at Chaplin, Conn., Oct. 25, 1817; graduated at Connecticut Theological Institute in 1849, and was ordaining as an evangelist at Windham, Aug. 8, of the same year—
For some time he labored as home missionary in Dover, Ill., and was afterwards agent of the American Home Missionary Society in Connecticut. He was installed as pastor of the First Church, Stafford, Conn., March 19, 1851, and died in Windham, Dec. 26, 1852. See Hist. Cat. of the Conn. Theol. Inst. p. 56. (J. C. S.)

Clark, Almon, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born about 1829. He was converted in 1832; licensed to preach, and admitted into the North Indiana Conference in 1855; and died Oct. 16, 1857. Mr. Clark was a family, faith, intellectual, a kind pastor, and a bold advocate of the Christian religion. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1858, p. 67.

Clark, Anson, a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was rector, in 1853, at Elyria, O., and the following year at Rockford, Ill. Here he remained until 1861, when he began serving St. Matthew's Church in Cambridge; the next year he resided in Dedham without charge; in 1866 he removed to Medina, O.; in 1870 he officiated in St. Paul's Church, in that town, and continued so to do until 1873, when he was appointed a missionary at large. He died at Medina, Nov. 19, 1876. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1876, p. 168.

Clark, Avery, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Springfield, Mass., in 1818. He was converted in 1831. He had taught school and resided in Knox, Me., in 1846; was licensed in 1854, and in May, 1856, was ordained at a session of the Delaware and Clayton Quarterly Meeting. After preaching a few years, he enlisted in the Federal army. Jan. 1, 1863, but did not lose sight of his vocation as a minister. He fell in battle Sept. 17, 1863, near the Stone Hill, in the battle of the Mountains, in the war against the Sioux City. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1864, p. 91. (J. C. S.)

Clark, Azariah, a Congregational minister, graduated at Williams College in 1805; was ordained pastor of the Church in New Canaan, N. Y., March 18, 1807; and died in 1829, aged fifty-four years. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ii, 303.

Clark, Benjamin Franklin, a Congregational minister, was born at Lyndeborough, N. H., Feb. 23, 1808. His preparatory studies were in Marysville, Tenn., and Oxford, O.; in 1833 he graduated at the Miami University, and the following year became principal of Rising Sun Seminary, in Indiana; in 1837 he graduated at Lane Seminary, and for seven months of the following year preached at Lyndeborough. In 1839 he resided at Andover until August, when he was ordained pastor of Parsonsfield, Me. From there he removed to Rumney, where he remained until January, 1869, but resided in that place without charge thereafter. In 1870, however, he supplied the First Church in Dracut; in 1870 and in 1870 he was a state senator; for twenty years was a director of the Stony Brook Railroad, and for about the same length of time superintendent of schools in Chelmsford. His death occurred May 28, 1875. He was the author of several pamphlets in reference to public affairs. See Cong. Year-book, 1880, p. 15.

Clark, Burrell, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Uniontown, Ala., in 1847. He joined the Church in 1870; soon became a local preacher, and in 1873 entered the Mississippi Conference, wherein he remained until his death, which occurred Feb. 13, 1898, three years after his decease, May 17, 1875. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1876, p. 14; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, &c.

Clark, Caleb (1), a Presbyterian minister, was born at New Salem, Mass., in 1790. He graduated at Middlebury College, Vt., in 1814, and studied theology under Rev. Mr. Sanford. He was ordained pastor of First Church in Trenton, N. Y., from 1829 to 1830, and at intervals afterwards, as stated supply, and was clerk of the Presbytery of Cortland from 1825 to 1830. He died Oct. 24, 1863, leaving eighteen thousand dollars to the Presbyterian tsBoard of Publication and the Board of Foreign Missions. For Mr. Clark was a man of decided ability, well informed in science and literature, and careful in Biblical study. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1864, p. 296.

Clark, Caleb (2), a Baptist minister, was born in Canaan, N. H., July 4, 1796. He was converted in 1814; in 1816 went to New York City, and pursued a course of study, after completing which he was ordained pastor of the Church in Rumney, N. H., Jan. 25, 1826, his labors there being followed by a revival of religion. He next became pastor of the Second Church in Haverhill, Mass.; in 1828 he removed to Pittfield, Agawam, where he was pastor three years. After this he was in Dover, N. H., and labored in Massachusetts and Maine. While visiting his friends in Rumney, he suddenly died, March 26, 1840. (J. C. S.)

Clark, Calvin, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Westhampton, Mass., March 27, 1805. He graduated from Williams College in 1822, and from Auburn Theological Seminary in 1825. He entered the home missionary work in Michigan in September of the same year, and, with the reception of four years, when he was in Chicago as district secretary of the American Board, had spent nearly forty-two years in the state of Michigan. He labored for a brief period as pastor, or stated supply, at Homer, Richmond, and Hillsdale. He died suddenly at Marshall, Mich., June 4, 1877. (G. W. P.)

Clark, Charles Chapman, a Universalist minister, was born in Rumney, N. H., in August, 1818. He was a zealous Methodist in early life, but later embraced Universalism, and in 1841 was ordained a preacher of that faith at Thornton, N. H. His subsequent stations were at East Jaffrey and Brookline, N. H.; at Concord and Hartland, Vt.; at Souquehannock, Pa.; and at Souquehannock, Vt. He died in Brattleborough, Vt., Oct. 14, 1878. Mr. Clark was a man of sound common-sense, sincere and devoted spirit, a useful and Scriptural preacher. See Universalist Register, 1879, p. 100.

Clark, Daniel, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Webster, Me., Feb. 15, 1801. He joined the Church in 1826; received license to exhort the year previous, and the following year to preach. He united with the Maine Conference. On the division of the Conference in 1848 he became a member of the East Maine Conference. Of the forty-three years of his ministerial life, twenty-nine were spent in the effective ranks, five in the local, and nine on the superannuated list. He died at his home in Richmond, Me., May 22, 1869. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1870, p. 151.

Clark, Davis Weagart, D.D., a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born on the island of Mount Desert, off the coast of Maine, Feb. 25, 1812. He experienced conversion in his boyhood; gave up his intended project of a seafaring life, took earnestly to books, and at the age of nineteen had earned sufficient money by his own exertions and economy to start him at Wesleyan University, where he graduated in 1836. The next year he was a teacher in Amenia Seminary, N. Y., and the seven following years its principal. In 1843 he joined the New York Conference, and, after filling five appointments, was called to the editorship of the Leader's Repository, which position he held without the necessity of subsequent unanimous re-elections, he retained until 1854, when he was made bishop. He performed his episcopal duties with great zeal and activity, traveling extensively through the South, organizing the Holston, Georgia, and Alabama Conferences. In 1870 his health began to decline, but he nevertheless even then his labors in 1871, conducting the Lexington, Kentucky, and Western Virginia Conferences alone. He had an assistant in conducting the Pittsburgh and New England Conferences. After opening the New York Conference he was obliged to retire, from intense suffering, and, on rallying a little he was taken to his home.
in Cincinnati, O., where he died, May 23, 1871. Bishop Clark was a man of decided convictions and great firmness of purpose. As a minister, he was able and successful in the discharge of his duties, and his prompt and accurate decisions. He was a bold and strong opposer of slavery, and a powerful advocate of liberal education, especially Christian. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1871, p. 283; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.; Alumni Record of West. Univ. 1882, p. 11, 551.

Clark, Dugan, a minister of the Society of Friends, was born in Randolph County, N. C., Oct. 3, 1783. He was converted when about eighteen years of age, united with the Methodists, and was an itinerant preacher for three years. Subsequently he became a member of the Society of Friends, was acknowledged as a minister in August, 1817, and labored in his own and the neighboring quarterly meetings. For the last two or three years he visited the meetings of Ohio and Indiana; and in 1834 those in Philadelphia, New York, and New England. He and his wife had the superintendency of the New Garden Boarding School, from 1837 to 1843. In 1844 they went to Great Britain on a ministerial tour, and were absent a year. His last public preaching was performed in 1845, in the Western and Southern States. He died Aug. 23, 1855. See The Friend, xx, 41, 42. (J. C. S.)

Clark, Edward, a Baptist minister, was born in Newport, R. I., June 6, 1739. He preached several years as a licensed minister, was ordained Aug. 18, 1801, at Attleborough, Mass., but never took charge of any particular church. For the last ten years of his life the scene of his labors was chiefly in the towns of Framingham and Medfield. He died while on visit to Mansfield, April 22, 1811. Mr. Clark possessed an uncommonly acute mind, and all his habits of thinking, writing, and preaching were remarkably correct. He was the author of several tracts, some of which were on baptism. See Baptist Missionary Magazine, ill, 190. (J. C. S.)

Clark, Elias, a Congregational minister, was born in Orange, Conn., July 12, 1814. He graduated from Union College in 1838, and studied in the Union Theological Seminary, N. Y., one year (1838-39), and also in the New Haven Divinity School, one year (1839-40). He was ordained Jan. 7, 1835, was supplied of the Congregational Church in Franklin, O., one year, and pastor in Egremont, Mass., six years, giving full proof of his ministry in bringing souls to Christ and edifying the Church. He next supplied the Church at Rochester, Minn., three years, and at Belle Vue, Ia., three years, and finally at Ottumwa. He died at West Salem, Wis., Oct. 29, 1866. (W. P. S.)

Clark, Ephraim Weston, a Congregational minister, was born at Haverhill, N. H., April 25, 1759. He pursued his preparatory studies at Peacham, Vt., Bangor, Me., and Andover, Mass., graduated from Dartmouth College in 1824, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1827; was ordained in Brandon, Vt., Oct. 3, the same year, and sailed in the following November as a missionary to Honolulu, in the employ of the A. B. C. F. M., reaching his destination in March, 1828. While stationed in Honolulu he devoted a part of his time, until 1835, to seamen; was principal of the seminary at Honolulu from 1835 until 1843; president until 1848; pastor of the Kawaiahao Church in Honolulu. In 1856, and again in 1859, he visited America; and in 1864 arrived in New York to superintend the printing of the revised version of the Hawaiian Scriptures, issued by the American Bible Society. His residence from 1864 to 1867 was in New York city; in 1867 and 1868, in Middletown, Conn.; from 1868 to 1873, in Portland; from that date his home was in Chicago, Ill., until his death, July 15, 1878. Mr. Clark was the first secretary of the Hawaiian Missionary Society. Among the books published by him in the Hawaiian language were several small text-books on Geometry, Trigonometry, and Surveying; also translations of The Little Philosopher: — First Lessons in Astronomy, besides several tracts, and a Bible Diction- ary. See Cong. Year-Book, 1873, p. 99.

Clark, George (1), a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1611; was presented to the living at Aberdeen in 1614, and died Aug. 18, 1644, aged about fifty-three years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, iii, 622.

Clark, George (2), a Scotch clergyman, concerning whom there was an act of the Assembly in 1648, and another in 1649, does not seem to have held a benefice till presented to Burriston in 1672. He died before Aug. 1, 1668. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, ii, 531.

Clark, George (3), a Presbyterian minister, was born at Lenox, Mass., April 24, 1822. He graduated from Washington College in 1843, taught at Tallahassee, Fla., for two years thereafter, and graduated from Union Theological Seminary in 1848. He was, in 1849, pastor at St. Louis, Mo., was recalled to his former position as teacher at Tallahassee for one year, and died there Dec. 25, 1860. See Gen. Cut. of Union Theol. Sem. p. 49.

Clark, George Henry, a Congregational minister, was born at Georgia, Vt., May 23, 1835. He fitted for college at Georgia and Buckeysfield academies, and graduated from the University of Vermont in 1856, and from the Andover Theological Seminary in 1861. He was ordained at St. Johnsbury Centre in 1862; preached there a year, and then ill-health compelled him to return to his father's house, where he died, April 25, 1865. See Cong. Quarterly, 1865, p. 430.

Clark, Harvey, a Congregational minister, was born at Chester, Vt., Oct. 7, 1802; went to Oregon in 1840, was pastor at Forest Grove from 1845 to 1854, and died March 25, 1858. See Minutes of Oregon Association, 1858; Eels, Hist. of Cong. Association of Oregon and Washington Territory (Portland, Or.), 1881, p. 75.

Clark, Homer Jackson, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Mount Holly, Va., Dec. 23, 1803. He experienced religion in early life, and in 1824 entered the Ohio Conference, but afterwards entered the Ohio State University at Athens, where he spent five years, and graduated with honor. In 1829 his name again appears on the Ohio Conference minutes, when he was sent to Pittsburgh, Pa. He was talented and popular, and soon attracted large crowds. In 1831 he received an appointment as professor in Madison College in Uniontown. After two more years in the pastorate, he, in 1834, became president and professor of mathematics in Allegheny College, which position he held until 1844, when he took a superintended relation. In 1850 he again entered the effective ranks; from 1852 to 1856 he was editor of the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate; from thence to 1864 labored in the active itineracy, and spent his after-years as a superannuate. He died at Homewood, Medina Co., O., Sept. 24, 1875. Dr. Clark was exceedingly amiable and sweet-spirited in disposition, a Christian gentleman in demeanor, eminent in scholarly attainments, unostentatious, the noblest type of a preacher and educator. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1867, p. 83; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodistism, s. v.

Clark, Ichabod, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in Franklin County, Mass., Oct. 30, 1802. He was converted at fourteen, licensed at eighteen, and ordained at Scipio, N. Y., in 1823. He was pastor at Lockport, Lagrange, Batavia, Le Roy, Brockport, and Nunda (all in N. Y.), and latterly at New York. Convinced of his appointment, he, in 1848, missionary at Galeua, I., in which state he remained, for the most part, during the rest of his life. For several years he was pastor at Rockford, his ministry being eminently successful.
During a part of this pastorate he was superintendent of missions for that state. He was pastor five years at Lockport, N. Y., then one more acted as superinten dent of missions in Illinois, and while serving for the second time as pastor at Lockport, N. Y., he died, April 14, 1869. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop.
p. 226. (J. C. S.)

Clark, Jacob Lyman, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in 1807. He graduated from Trinity College in 1831, was ordained in 1832, and was rector of St. John’s Church, Waterbury, Conn., from 1837 until his death, Jan. 29, 1877. He was a member of the standing committee for twenty-three years, and declined an election to the episcopate of Nebraska and the North-west in 1859. See Prot.

Clark, Jacob Starr, a Congregational minister, who was born at Easthampton, N. H., Jan. 10, 1832. He was ordained in Morgan, Vt., Jan. 11, 1827, and his active ministry ceased in 1864. He died Dec. 27, 1879, in St.

Clark, James (1), a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1689; was licentiated to preach in 1697; appointed to the living at Dunbar in 1698; was a member of the General Assembly in 1700; transferred to Linverick in 1701; was a member of the assembly of 1692; transferred to Dirleton in 1697; and transferred to Tron Church, Glasgow, in 1702. He zealously opposed the union with Englant, and, on a fast day appointed by the assembly, he preached a sermon which so much roused the lower class of people that they arose, threatened the authorities, and took possession of the city of Glasgow. After a life of piety, usefulness, and popularity, he died in 1724, aged about sixty-four years. He published, Memento Mori: A Word to the Heathful, Sick, and Dying (Edinb. 1698)—Personal Cottling, or the Communicant’s Best Token (bid. 1697)—Presbytery Government of the Church of Scotland Methodically Described (bid.
1701)—On Ruling Elders (ibid. 1705)—On Propagating Christianity in Scotland (ibid. 1710)—Remarks on the Occurrences Concerning Kirk-Sessions (1720).

Clark, James (2), a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1786; appointed to the living at Elie in 1791, and ordained in 1792, having been appointed morning lecturer, assistant at St. Andrew’s Church, Edinburgh, and chaplain to the 3d Battalion of Edinburgh Voluntees; was presented to the living in 1798, and died

Clark, James (3), an English Baptist minister, was born at Fulborne, Cambridgeshire, in 1792. He united with the Little Wild Street Church, London, and ordained there in 1816; he was a student of Halle college. He was pastor in Bingleyside in 1816, and after a short time removed to Guildborough, Northamptonshire, where he remained for twenty years. In 1839 he resigned, purposing not to settle again. He took up his residence in Edinburgh, and was instrumental in the formation of a Baptist Church, for which he preached for twenty years. When the closing of the Baptist Church in Bristol and Leamington. During this period he published a work entitled Outlines of Theology, in 3 vols.
He died Aug. 26, 1862. See (London) Baptist Handbook, 1863, p. 113. (J. C. S.)

Clark, James A., a Baptist minister, was born at Washington, Berkshire Co., Mass., in 1828. He studied at Shelleburne Falls Academy, and graduated from Wil}- dams College in 1853. Immediately afterwards he was offered the position of tutor in the college, but he decided to study the ministry, and was licensed. He be-wrote the editor of the Michigan Christian Herald, at Detroit, and when licensed as pastor of the church in Ann Arbor, in 1867, he held the position of corresponding editor for the remainder of his life. Returning to Kalamazoo in 1867, he entered upon the duties of professor of Latin, and held also the office of treasurer of the college. He engaged with great zeal and earnestness in the work of securing for that institution a better pecu-liary endowment; and in his endeavors he met with much success, but at the expense of his health. He died Aug. 17, 1869. See Chicago Standard, Aug. 19, 1869. (J. C. S.)

Clark, James Augustus, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Lebanon, Conn., Aug. 15, 1808. He studied at Middlebury Academy, graduated from Yale College in 1834, was a student of Princeton Theological Seminary nearly two years, and graduated from Yale Divinity School in 1837. He was licensed by the New Haven West Association, Aug. 2, 1836, and while studying at New Haven supplied various churches; was ordained to the presbytery at Cheshire in 1839; was the first permanent Presbyterian minister in Iowa, supplying the Church at Fort Madison from 1838 to 1819; returned to Connecticut, and supplied Woodstock Congregational Church in 1850; Deep River Church, in Saybrook, from December, 1850, until No-Vember, 1853; Hanover Church, in Meriden, from De-dember, 1853, until April, 1855; the Church at Southw Hamden Co., Mass., from 1855 to 1858; was installed pastor of Cromwell Church, Conn., June 16, 1858, and was released from that charge Feb. 12, 1863; resided at Monterey, Mass., from 1864 to 1870, and preached in that vicinity. He was married, April 18, 1871, into membership in Columbus Presbytery, New York; supplied the Church at Spencertown, from 1870 till 1873; then resided and labored at Lanesborough, Mass., from 1873 till 1877; and finally supplied the Church at Hildab

N. Y., from 1877 until his death, which occurred July 1, 1881, when he died at Ridgefield, Bergen Co., N. J. See Necrol Observer, Nov. 8, 3881.

Clark, Jane, a minister of the Society of Friends, of the Yonge Street Monthly Meeting, Canada, was born in 1811. For ten years she served the Church acceptably as an elder, and in 1869 was acknowledged as a minister, in which vocation she rendered good service to the cause of her master. She died near New Head, Ontario, Sept. 1, 1875. See Friends’ Review, xxxix, 346. (J. C. S.)

Clark, John (1), a Presbyterian minister, received his licence from the Presbytery of New Brunswick, May 9, 1760, and was ordained and settled at the Forks of the Delaware, Oct. 18, 1762. In 1767, on account of his unpopularity, he resigned his charge and moved to Marilyn Hill, where he became pastor of two churches in Baltimore County. In 1775 his pastoral relation was again dissolved, but he continued to preach to the cause of his churches until 1781. In this year he removed to western Pennsylvania, and became pastor of the united churches of Bethel and Lebanon, in that re-district. He died there Aug. 18, 1797. His life was solemn and impressive. See Alexander, Princeton College in the 18th Century.

Clark, John (2), an English Baptist minister, was born at Fulbourne, Cambridgeshire, in 1790. He brought up on a farm, left home at the age of twelve, went to London, and in 1811 was converted and baptized, and joined the Church in Little Wild Street. In 1818 he entered Stepany College. In 1817 he was ordained over the Church at Folkstone, Kent; in 1823 he was called to Long Buckby, Northampton, but removed to Uphill, Folkstone, where he gathered a small Church, and remained its pastor till his death, May 14, 1850. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1850, p. 308.

Clark, John (3), a Free-will Baptist minister, was born in Maine in 1793. His parents being in strained circumstances, were unable to do much in the way of giving him an education. He had reached the age of thirty-eight before he was ordained to the work of the ministry, yet he preached for nearly forty years. His last residence was in Prespect, Me., where he died Aug. 9, 1871. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1873, p. 83. (J. C. S.)

Clark, John (4), a Scotch clergyman, was tutor in the family of the lord chief baron Dundas; was licensed to preach in 1807; presented to the living at Blackford in 1815, and ordained. He died Dec. 31, 1863, aged eighty-one years. He was a man of great penetration and shrewdness, of whom clever strokes of humor are related. He published An Account of the Parish. See Fusi Ecles. Scoticae, ii, 752.

Clark, John (5), A.M., a Scotch clergyman of Glasgow, was licensed to preach in 1819; was elected minister at New Street Chapel, Edinburgh, in 1825, and ordained; promoted to the Second Charge, Cammogate, in 1833; transferred to the Old Church in 1844, and died Sept. 1, 1849, aged seventy years. See Fusi Ecles. Scoticae, i, 90, 91.

Clark, John Flavel, a Congregational minister, was born in New Jersey. He graduated from Princeton College in 1807, spent somewhat more than a year in Andover Theological Seminary, and was tutor in his alma mater from 1811 to 1814. He was ordained in 1815; was pastor of the Presbyterian Church, Flemington, N. J., from 1815 to 1826; at Paterson from 1826 to 1841; at Cold Spring, N. Y., the next five years; at Otter Bay, L. I., in 1845 and 1846; at Fishkill, N. Y., in 1847, and died there, Oct. 7, 1853. See Tien. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem., 1870, p. 23.

Clark, John W., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Hartford, Md., Sept. 21, 1806. He removed with his parents to Hamilton County, O., experienced religion when a boy; received license to exhort at the age of eighteen; in 1824 to preach, and in 1825 entered the Ohio Conference, where he was faithful and laborious until his death, Aug. 26, 1862. Mr. Clark was silent and unobtrusive in his labors, and yet, in his every-day life, an excellent preacher, and a model pastor. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1862, p. 137.

Clark, Jonas, a Congregational minister, was born at Newton, Mass., Dec. 25, 1730. He graduated from Harvard College in 1752, was ordained pastor of the Church in Lexington, Nov. 3, 1755, and remained there more than half a century. In consequence of inadequate success, he was induced to cultivate a farm. He died at Lexington, Nov. 15, 1805. As a preacher he was awarded a high rank among his brethren, being animated in manner and instructive in matter. As a patriot, during the war of the Revolution, he was ardent and decided. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 514.

Clark, Joseph (1), D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born near Elizabeth, N. J., Oct. 21, 1751. In his twentieth year he began a course of study, graduated from Princeton College, and was licensed to preach by the New Brunswick Presbytery, April 28, 1773. In 1788 he accepted a call to the Presbyterian Church at Allentown, where he remained, occupying his work faithfully and earnestly, until 1796, when he removed to New Brunswick, and remained until the close of his life, Oct. 19, 1813. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iii, 446.

Clark, Joseph (2), a Presbyterian minister, was born near Carlisle, Pa., Oct. 11, 1825. He was educated at the New Bloomfield Academy, graduated from Marshall College, Mercersburg, Pa., in 1848, and studied in the Western Theological Seminary at Allegheny. He was licensed by the Carlisle Presbytery on June 18, 1852, and became pastor at Chambersburg, where he labored faithfully until his death, June 7, 1865. See Wilson, Preb. Hist. Almanac, 1866, p. 99; Index to Princeton Rec.

Clark, Joseph Sylvester, D.D., an eminent Congregational minister, was born of Puritan ancestry at West Greenwich, Manomet Point, Mass., Dec. 19, 1800. A part of his youth was spent in teaching. He entered the academy at Amherst in 1822; in 1827 graduated from the college; in 1831 from Andover Theological Seminary, and was ordained successor to Dr. Alvan Bond at Sturbridge. His ministry there of seven years was very successful. In 1839 he was appointed secretary of the Massachusetts Home Missionary Society, and resigned the office in 1857. His labors in behalf of this interest were intense, and of very great value. In 1857 he was appointed corresponding secretary of the Congregational Library Association, a position very congenial to his taste, especially as it afforded him so good an opportunity to gather up and arrange, so as to preserve, memorials of the Puritans, in books, pamphlets, manuscripts, paintings, etc. In 1859 the association commenced the publication of the Congregational Quarterly, and Dr. Clark was appointed one of the editors. He died at South Plymouth, Aug. 17, 1861. Dr. Clark was noted for piety, faithfulness to every trust committed to him, and a herculean diligence. He wrote, An Historical Sketch of Sturbridge, Mass. (1838, 48 pp.): Historical Sketch of the Congregational Churches of Massachusetts, from 1620 to 1858 (1868, 12mo). He was engaged also upon a History of Amherst College. See Cong. Quarterly, 1862, p. 1; 1861, p. 584.

Clark, Justus McKinstrey, a Presbyterian minister, was born on the Isle La Motte, in Lake Chalmain, Vt., Dec. 27, 1811. In 1820 he removed with his parents to Franklin County, N. Y. He was converted when seventeen years of age, and soon after entered Vermont University, remaining there two years, and graduated from Union College, N. Y., in 1835. In 1838 he was ordained by Transylvania Presbytery, and became pastor at Springfield, Ky. He soon removed to Ottawa, Ill., and in 1840 became pastor at Madison, Wis. In 1843 he was appointed chaplain at Fort Winnebago; and finally was elected, in 1850, to the presidency of Ottawa College, where he died Oct. 10, 1867. See Wilson, Preb. Hist. Almanac, 1868, p. 123.

Clark, Laban, D.D., a pioneer Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Haverhill, N. H., July 19, 1778, of strict Congregational parents, who gave him a careful Calvinistic education. He spent his childhood and youth at Bradford, Vt., where his associations with a Wesleyan family won him to Methodism; and on the arrival of a Methodist preacher, he joined the society, and with others in forming a society. In 1800 he was licensed to exhort, and the following year received into the New York Conference, in which for more than half a century he occupied many of the most important stations and positions. In 1833 he became superannuated, which relation he held to the close of his life, July 22, 1868. Mr. Clark was a very popular preacher, sound, instructive, argumentative, practical. He was an extensive reader, possessed a remarkably retentive memory, was amiable, calm, and devout. He figured prominently as one of the founders of the Methodist Episcopal Missionary Society. He was a member of Wesleyan University, at Middletown, Conn., where he spent his latter life. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1869, p. 97.

Clark, Lemen Taylor, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born about 1845. He was brought up in Mercer County, O.; was converted at the age of thirteen; graduated at the Ohio Wesleyan University in 1871; became superintendent of the Defiance public schools; and in 1873 entered the Central Ohio Conference, wherein he labored with much acceptance until his death, Oct. 27, 1878. Mr. Clark was a man of rare scholarship, frank and genial nature, and earnest piety. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1879, p. 99.

Clark, Lewis, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Easthampton, Mass., July 26, 1816. He had a careful religious training; experienced religion in 1830; received license to exhort in 1833, to preach in 1835; spent several years studying at Wilbraham Academy, and labored under the preachers of the town until 1840, when he entered the Erie Conference. In 1863 he became superannuated, but continued to preach at least once each Sabbath until his death, March 4, 1876. Mr. Clark was well-read, honest, and uniform in piety. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1876, p. 124; Simp- son, Cyclop. of Methodists, s. v.

Clark, Lewis Franklin, a Congregational minister, was born at Southampton, Mass., Sept. 11, 1812. In 1830 he entered Sheldon Academy, in his native town, and graduated with honor from Amherst College in 1837, having taught school in various places in Hamp- shire County during his academic and collegiate courses. He graduated from the Andover Theological Seminary in 1853. In 1856 he was ordained to the ministry in the Acad- emy at Southampton, preaching occasionally at the same time. June 1, 1842, he was ordained pastor in Whittingsville, in the town of Northbridge, and there he remained until his death, Oct. 13, 1870. As a preacher Mr. Clark was plain and simple in style and manner but as a pastor he had more than ordinary gifts, and greatly endeared himself to his people. See Cong. Quarterly, 1872, p. 318.

Clark, Lorin, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Amenia, N. Y., Dec. 29, 1797, of Baptist parentage. He joined the Presbyterians in his nineteenth year; studied two years in an academy at Lenox, Mass., and there became a Methodist, received license to preach, and in 1823 entered the New York Conference, wherein he labored with great diligence, devotedness, and marked success. He became superannuated in 1838, and died Jan. 29, 1868. Mr. Clark was able in ministerial qual- ifications, and exemplary in life. See Minutes of An- nual Conference, 1868, p. 77.

Clark, Luther, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Canterbury, Conn., May 1792. He attended Prince- ton College, where he was a member of the junior class in 1819; was ordained evangelist by the Presbytery of North River, April 28, 1825; preached in the Congregational Church at Plymouth, N. Y., from 1827 to 1834, and at Dryden from 1835 to 1845, and died at Lisbon, Conn., Aug. 28, 1845. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. p. 98.

Clark, Martin, a minister in the Methodist Epis- copal Church South, was born in Patrick County, Va., Oct. 3, 1801. He served about eight years old with his parents to Williamson County, Ten., where he received a good education. He was converted in 1820; commenced preaching in 1824, and continued in the local ranks until 1841, when he entered the Ten- nessee Conference. In it he was effective many years in the ministry, and during that time became a copernorium, and died Feb. 28, 1859. Mr. Clark was remarkable for zeal and punctuality. He possessed good natural endowments, a commanding person, a clear, musical voice, and great physical endurance. Cheerful in temperament, always happy, he was a source of consolation and joy everywhere. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1859, p. 114.

Clark, Mary, an English minister of the Society of Friends, the wife of John Clark, a tradesman in Lon- don, very soon after the rise of the Quakers in that city united with that sect. She was recognised as a minis- ter about 1655, and travelled in Worcestershire "to ex-postulate with the local magistracy respecting their cruel treatment of Friends." One of her experiences while thus occupied, was her being placed in the stocks at Evesham for three hours on the market-day, and ex- cited to pass the inns. She came over to America, arriving in Boston the latter part of June. Imme- diately on landing a warrant for her arrest as a "pestilent heretic" was issued, and before being com- mitted to prison she was whipped, twenty strokes, with a heavy, three-corded whip, "laid on with fury," being inflicted upon her. After being kept a prisoner three months, she was dismissed and went to Rhode Island, the asylum of the oppressed for conscience' sake. She was occupied in religious service in New England until the early part of 1668, when, with two of her compan- ions, she was shipwrecked and drowned. See Bowden, Hist. of the Friends in America, i. 126. (J. C. S.)

Clark, Nathan Sears, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Rochester, Mass., Feb. 7, 1807. He was converted at the age of eleven, and began his ministry when twenty years old, among the Reformed Methodists. On the organization of the Methodist Protestant Church he united with it, but in 1872 joined the Western New York Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He died March 25, 1873. Mr. Clark was a cordial, sympathetic, eminently charitable man. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1873, p. 110.

Clark, Nathaniel Catlin, a Congregational minister, was born at Benson, Vt., Aug. 12, 1801. After studying for a time with Rev. Mr. Cushman, of Fair- haven, Vt., he completed his preparatory studies at Castleton Academy, and graduated in 1829 from Middle-bury College. He spent one year teaching in an Au- kerman Academy, and in 1832 graduated from Auburn Theological Seminary. During the winter he supplied the church at Shoreham, Vt., and, although invited to become the pastor of that church, he accepted, instead, after his ordination, May 4, 1833, a commission from the American Home Missionary Society, to preach in Cook County, Ill., which then embraced nearly a third of the State. He gathered a church at Napierville, and ministered there a little more than three years, during which time he organized several other churches. In 1837 he went to St. Charles and preached in the church at that town until the latter, in 1847, was taken by the one at Elgin. Mr. Clark labored in Cook County, Ill., and in the neighborhood of Good Hope, and also at the little church at the mouth of the river. In 1857 he removed to Elgin, and thereafter made it his home. The churches at Utina, Danneil, Kingwood, and Maragoon also shared his services from one to three years each. Under a general commission from the American Home Missionary Society, he commenced his labors in 1858, and continued, in addition to those already noted, for several years in destitute communities. He had no regular charge during the last eight years of his life, but preached as a supply, with little interruption. He died at Elgin, Ill., Dec. 3, 1872. See Cong. Quar- terly, 1873, p. 577.

Clark, Neil, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Glasgow University in 1678; became schoolmaster at Glassraph; conferred to prelacy, and was examined for a license in 1688; was called to the living at Kilnm- glass (now Strachur) in 1690, and ordained; died before May 17, 1692, aged about thirty-six years. See Fusi Ricci, Scotiacum, iii. 32.

Clark, Nelson, a Congregational minister, was born at Brookfield, Vt., Aug. 13, 1813. He graduated at Dartmouth College in 1838, and at Andover Theological Seminary in 1842, after serving one year as tutor in Western Reserve College. He was ordained at El- doph, Vt., July 16, 1844, and remained there until April 7, 1846. The next three years he was acting pastor at chariton, Mass. From January, 1846, to April, 1848, he was pastor in Quayle, Mass., from 1858 to 1862, and in Tiverton, R. I.; from 1865 to 1871, at Somerville, Mass.; from 1871 to 1873, pastor in Rochester; from 1873 to 1878, acting pastor in Clearwater, Minn.; in 1879, re- sided without charge at Stillwater; in December of that year became acting pastor at National and at Garnavillo, Ia., and continued to hold this position until his death, at National, March 16, 1880. See Cong. Yearbook, 1881, p. 19.

Clark, Orin, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born at Marlborough, Mass., Jan. 2, 1788. He studied Latin grammar as he followed the plough, and afterwards entered the Episcopal Academy at Cheshire, Conn., and taught school during the winters; but intense application impaired his health. Having completed his course at the academy, he was ordained in October, 1811, and began his ministry as a missionary in Ontario and Genesee counties, N. Y. He accompanied Bishop Hobart on his first visitation in that region in 1812, and shortly after became rector of Trinity Church, Geneva. Although a settled minister, he exercised a sort of superintendence over the churches throughout Western New York. In the establishment of Geneva College he was prominent, was one of its original trustees, and held that office throughout his life. He died at Geneva, Feb. 24, 1828. In the pulpit Dr. Clark was bold and energetic, and was greatly beloved by his flock. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 54. 4

Clark, Perkins Kirkland, a Congregational minister, was born at Westfield, Mass., Dec. 8, 1811. After graduation at Yale College in 1838, he spent a year or more in Savannah, Ga., as a teacher, and in 1840 entered the theological seminary in his own city. In 1841 he transferred himself to the Yale Divinity School, where he finished the course in 1843. From 1842 till 1845 he was tutor in Yale College. The next year he taught in the normal school in Westfield, Mass., and resigned his position to engage in the work of the ministry, having been licensed to preach in August, 1842, by the Hampden Association. He supplied the pulpit of the Congregational Church in Chester village (now Huntington) from his ordination, Aug. 26, 1846, until 1852. He then accepted a call to Hillsdale, where he was installed over the Congregational Church, June 16, 1852. He resigned this charge Oct. 2, 1853, on account of ill-health. Having partially recovered, he began, in May, 1856, to supply the First Church in South Deerfield, where he remained until Sept. 26, 1865. He was installed over the Congregational Church in West Springfield, Jan. 16, 1866, and was dismissed from this charge April 16, 1871, to accept a call to the First Church in Charlemont. He died Jan. 4, 1872. See Obituary Record of Yale College, 1872.

Clark, Peter (1), a Congregational minister, was born at Watertown, Mass., about 1693. He graduated in 1712 at Harvard College, and was invited, Aug. 7, 1716, to become the pastor at Salem (now Danvers), and was installed June 5, 1717. He died in June, 1768. In the latter part of his life he became involved in a controversy with the Rev. Samuel Webster of Salisbury, concerning the doctrine of original sin, and displayed no ordinary skill in dealing with the subject. His preaching was energetic in denunciation and pathetic in appeal. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 291.

Clark, Peter (2), a Baptist minister, was born at Gilmanton, N. H., Oct. 8, 1791. He joined the Free-will Baptists in June, 1798; was ordained Jan. 8, 1810, and became the pastor of the Church in Gilmanton. He died Nov. 28, 1863. Mr. Clark took a prominent part in the temperance reformation in the region where he resided. He was a careful observer of men and things; possessed a tenacious memory, had a critical mind, and cultivated the study of our English language. See Barrett, Memoirs of Eminent Preachers, p. 78-85. (J. C. S.)

Clark, Philetaus, a Congregational minister, was born at Southampton, Mass., April 26, 1794. He entered Williams College, but graduated at Middlebury College in 1818. After some months devoted to the study of theology, he was licensed to preach in June, 1820, and became pastor in Townshend, Vt., Dec. 29, 1821, from which he was dismissed in 1824. After laboring two years at Weston and Londonderry, under the direction of the Domestic Missionary Society, he became pastor in Londonderry in the summer of 1827, retiring in 1830. For three years he was acting pastor in Clarendon; next ministered for nearly two years at South Granville, N. Y.; from Sept. 30, 1835, to May 23, 1843, pastor at Windsor, Mass., and then returned to Clarendon, Vt., for seven years, supplying destitute churches in the vicinity. In 1850 he removed to West Townsend, and organized a Church there. After seven years of service he went to Post Mill, preached one year, and then became acting pastor of the Church in Sharon in 1858; in 1869, supplied the Church in Wardsboro for several months, and then relinquished further regular service. He died at Memphis, Tenn., Feb. 5, 1875. See Cong. Quarterly, 1875, p. 578.

Clark, Pitt, a Congregational minister, was born at Medfield, Mass., Jan. 15, 1763. He graduated at Harvard College in 1790; was ordained at Norton, July 3, 1793; and died Feb. 19, 1835. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 679.

Clark, Robert, a Scotch clergyman, native of Sutherlandshire, and schoolmaster of Tongue, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1814; was licensed to preach in 1819; appointed minister at the Gaelic Chapel, Aberdeen, in 1822, having been a missionary at Erroll previously. He was promoted to the Gaelic Chapel-of-ease, Glasgow, in 1825, thence to the living at Kneasdale in 1834, and died April 15, 1856, aged seventy-two years. See Festi Eccles. Scoticae, ii, 34; iii, 350, 481.

Clark, Ross, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Halifax, Vt., Oct. 27, 1809. He received a careful religious training from his pious mother; joined the Church in his twenty-second year, and in 1854 united with the General Conference. He died May 6, 1866. Mr. Clark was zealous in and devoted to his calling. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1839, p. 676.

Clark, R. H., an English Baptist minister, was born at Fulbourne, Cambridgeshire, in 1785. In early life he became a Christian, and was ordained in 1824, as pastor of the Church at Long Buckley, Northamptonshire, where he remained from 1824 to 1830. He was next eight years pastor in Lanceria, at Kingsborough and Leighton Buzzard, and, in 1840, received an appointment as town missionary in Bury St. Edmunds. While filling this place, he supplied, for two or three years, the pulpit of the church at Felixstowe, in Norfolk. He died Oct. 9, 1852. See (Long.) Baptist HAND-BOOK, 1853, p. 43. (G. S.)

Clark, Samuel (1), a Congregational minister, was a graduate of Princeton College, and studied theology there. He was ordained and installed pastor of the Second Congregational Church at Kensington, Conn., in July, 1756, and continued there until his death, in November, 1775. Mr. Clark was a man of estimable qualities and a good preacher. See Alexander, Princeton College in the 18th Century.

Clark, Samuel (2), a Unitarian minister, was a native of Brookline, Mass., and graduated from Harvard College in 1805. He was ordained pastor of a Church in Burlington, Vt., April 19, 1810, and died in 1827. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 244.

Clark, Samuel A., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was rector of a Church in Philadelphia for a number of years until he was called to the Domestic Missionary Society. He was chaplain of St. John's Church, Elizabeth, N. J., and remained there until his death, Jan. 28, 1875, at the age of fifty-three years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1876, p. 149.

Clark, Samuel Wallace, a Congregational minister, was born in New Hampshire in 1736. He graduated at Dartmouth College in 1823, and at Andover Theological Seminary in 1827; was ordained Aug. 5, 1829; became pastor at Greenland, N. H., the same year, and died there, Aug. 17, 1847. See Tien. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1874, p. 74.

Clark, Semira H., a minister of the Society of Friends, was born in Indiana in 1825. Her ministerial work was performed chiefly within the limits of the Westfield Monthly Meeting, where she was highly esteemed. She afterwards engaged in a special work in which she was greatly interested, but died suddenly, near Westfield, Hamilton Co., Ind., Feb. 12, 1879. See Friend's Review, xxxiii, 490. (J. C. S.)

Clark, S. P., a Baptist minister, was born in Charlotte County, Va., March 5, 1801, and united with the Church in 1827. In 1832 he removed to Carroll County, Tenn. He began to preach in 1842, and his pastorate were New Hope, Euhala, Turkey Creek, Chapel Hill, and Boiling Springs. Having acquired a good estate, he was graduated at Cumberland. In 1840 he removed to Milan, where he died, March 5, 1880. See Borg., Sketches of Tenn. Ministers, p. 148, 149. (J. C. S.)

Clark, Theodotus, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at New Rochelle, N. Y., in 1816. He was converted in 1805; removed to New York city, and in 1812 entered the New York Conference, in which he labored faithfully until 1837, when he took a superannuated relation, and thus continued till his death, July 28, 1872. Mr. Clark was well read in theology, and a frequent speaker. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1873, p. 46.

Clark, Thomas (1), a Scotch clergyman, was appointed to the living at Anfron in 1691, and ordained, and died Nov. 20, 1737. See Fasti Eccles. Scoti, tom. ii, 157.

Clark, Thomas (2), an Associate Reformed minister, graduated at the University of Glasgow. In 1745 and 1746 he did faithful service in the army. According to the practice of the day, he pursued a thorough course of medical study in the university. He met with the Associate Burgher Synod at Stirling, in 1747; and was ordained and installed over the congregation of Ballybay, Ireland, July 28, 1751. While preaching there he was taken prisoner for his views respecting the oath of allegiance, but converted the jail-keeper and was discharged. He came to America about 1765, and was the first Burgher minister in this country. He preached in Salem, Mass., for several years, then in the South, where he did much good; and finally in Abbeville, S. C., where he died, Dec. 25, 1793. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, IX, iv, 18.

Clark, Thomas (3), a Scotch clergyman, was presented to the living at Eaglesham in 1785, and ordained in 1786; but the settlement was delayed by a furious mob preventing the presbytery entering the church, and threatening death to the minister and patron. The General Assembly censured the presbytery for the delay. He was killed by a fall from his horse, Aug. 8, 1786. See Fasti Eccles. Scoti, ii, 65.

Clark, Thomas (4), a Scotch clergyman, born at Galliway in September, 1790, was licensed to preach in 1809; was made pastor of the living at Inverness in 1824, and ordained; was transferred to the Old Church, Edin-burgh, in 1841, and died Jan. 11, 1857, aged sixty-six years. He was a man of clear and vigorous intellect; his sermons were models of condensed thought and expression. For several years he managed the business of the General Assembly's Colonial Committee. See Fasti Eccles. Scoti, ii, 662.

Clark, Thomas, (5), a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1832, presented by the king to the living at Lark Cycling in 1836, now the, highest objection on the legal difficulties still continued, a libel was preferred against him for drunkenness, his license was taken from him in 1846, and he died at Glasgow in July, 1859, aged fifty-two years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoti, ii, 805, 806.

Clark, Thomas W., a Baptist minister, was born at New Canaan Settlement, Queens Co., N. B., Feb. 3, 1806. He was educated at Starks Academy, and in 1840 took up his residence in De Witt, Ia.; in 1843 began to preach, for a number of years performing itinerant and missionary work; and afterwards took charge of the Church in De Witt, which was organized by him in 1852. He devoted the latter years of his life to evangelistic work, and died at De Witt, May 10, 1893. See The Chicago Standard, June 14, 1893. (J. C. S.)

Clark, Timothy, a Congregational minister, was born in Connecticut in 1764. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1791, and was ordained pastor of the Church in Greenfield, N. H., Jan. 1, 1800, where he remained until May 1, 1811. He died in 1841. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ii, 145.

Clark, Watson, a Baptist minister, was born at Yorkville, Albermarle Co., Va., 1810, and died at Salem, N. C., Oct. 28, 1839. He was the son of a Christian at fourteen, graduated from Madison University in 1850, and from the Rochester Seminary in 1852, and was ordained at Girard, Pa., Aug. 26, 1852. He went to Ohio, where he labored as pastor at Marietta, 1852-54; Ohio Court-house, 1854-56; Cincinnati, 1856-58: as an evangelist in Saline Association, Missouri, 1858-61; pastor a second time at Ohio Court-house, 1862-65; Mount Gilead, 1866-68; Goshen, Ind., 1870-72; Xenia, Ill., 1872-74; Winchester, 1874-76. His last pastorate was in Sycamore, De Kalb Co., where he died June 10, 1877. See Minutes of Illinois Anniversaries, 1877, p. 10. (J. C. S.)

Clark, William, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1692, appointed to the living at Twickhelm in 1693 and ordained, and died before Feb. 3, 1725. See Fasti Eccles. Scoti, i, 726.

Clark, William Atwater, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal minister, brother of Dr. Orin Clark, was born at New Marlborough, Mass., July 20, 1786. For a time he taught school, and pursued both his classical and theological studies at the Episcopal Academy in Cheshire, Conn. He was ordained deacon in 1808, and received priest in 1814, and was sent to western New York as a missionary: was ordained priest Sept. 15, 1812, and preached at Auburn for nine months, then removed to Manlius, Oneida Co., and there preached for several years; in 1818 went to Buffalo, and travelled extensively to collect funds for the building of St. Paul's Church in that city: July 12, 1820, became rector of Christ Church, Batavia, N. Y., and remained four years; removed to New York city in 1824, organized All-Saints' Church on May 27 of that year, and was made its first rector: in 1827 resigned the rectorship, and removed to Michigan with the intention of retiring from active work; but having settled in Brighton, opened his own house for public service, and in process of time a church was organized. He died there, Sept. 13, 1841. Dr. Clark published a number of sermons; the last, The Swedenborgian, a volume of eighteen discourses, was issued by request of the vestry of All-Saints' in 1833. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 556.

Clark, William Henry, a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at Cheshire, Conn., and graduated from the General Theological Seminary, N. Y. He was ordained deacon in 1845, and employed for several years as a teacher in Pittsburgh, Pa.; in 1857 was rector of St. Peter's Church in Rome, Ga., and in 1863 was chosen rector of St. Paul's, Augusta, in which position he remained until his sudden death, Aug. 10, 1877, at the age of fifty-eight years. In 1875 Mr. Clark declined the African missionary episcopate. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1878, p. 158.

Clarke, Alexander, an English minister of the Society of Friends, in the 17th century, was converted in early manhood, but, not satisfied with the churches which he frequented, united with the Quakers, and, after a time, began to preach. For forty years he labored diligently for his Master, and was instrumental in accomplishing great good. He died in the seventy-fifth year of his age. See Fifty Promoted, ii, 126, 127. (J. C. S.)

Clarke, Alured, D.D., an English divine, was born in 1696. He was educated at St. Paul's School, and Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, where he was made fellow in 1718. He was installed prebendary of Winchester on May 23, 1723; was chaplain to king George I and George II; was librarian which he retained until 1763; and from that time resided without charge in Ottawa, where he died, Dec. 26, 1870. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1872, p. 127.

Clarke, Charles P., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was missionary for several years in Ottawa, Ill., and about 1857 became rector there. In 1859 he was made rector of St. John's Church, Lacon; in 1861 he was appointed chaplain of the Eleventh Regiment Illinois Volunteers; the following year assumed the rectorship of St. George's Church, Utica, Ill., which he filled until his death, Oct. 30, 1871. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1872, p. 127.

Clarke, David Duncan, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born near Shippensburg, Cumberland Co., Pa., in Oct., 1810. He graduated from Jefferson College, Canonsburg, in 1831, and spent one year (1829-30) in Princeton Theological Seminary. He was licensed by Carlisle Presbytery in 1838, and was pastor at Schellburg, Beisfird, Co., until 1843; at Lower Marsh Creek, Adams Co., until 1855; and at Waynesburg, Newton, and Hamilton, in Huntington Co., until his death, Dec. 30, 1855. He left a character without a stain, and a precious memory in every congregation he served. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1857, p. 127; Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem., 1881, p. 87.

Clarke, Edmund, an English Baptist minister, was born in the city of Worcester in 1757. After uniting with the Church under the pastoral care of the Rev. Abraham Austin, Fetter Lane, London, he pursued his preparatory studies for the ministry at Steeple College, and was ordained at Truro in 1819, where he remained a highly acceptable minister until 1831, when he resigned, and became pastor at Battersea as successor to the distinguished Rev. Joseph Hughes. Afterwards he returned to his former church at Truro. Being compelled, by ill-health, to retire from the active ministry, he endeavored to serve his Master in various ways until his death, July 8, 1839. He is spoken of as having been an esteemed brother and a valued fellow-laborer. See Report of the Baptist Union, 1840, p. 26. (J. C. S.)

Clarke, Edward, an English clergyman, was born at Buxted, March 16, 1730. He took his degree at St. John's College, Cambridge, in 1752, and was elected a fellow in 1753. In 1756 he took charge of the rectory of Popergharow, in Surrey. His first publication was a copy of Greek hexameters on the death of Frederick, prince of Wales, in the Lucius Academiae Cantorbiensis (1751), and soon after he projected the improvement of a Latin Dictionary. He went to Minorca in 1763, and on his return, in 1768, he took charge of the vicarage of Willingdon, 1st Arlington, in Sussex. In 1778 he issued proposals for an edition in folio of the Greek Testament, with a selection of notes from the most eminent critics and commentators, but sufficient encouragement was not given. He died in November, 1786. See Chalmers, Bios. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Clarke, Eliam Calhoun, a Congregational minister, was born in Massachusetts, graduated from Williams College in 1812, and spent a part of one year in Andover Theological Seminary. He was ordained April 13, 1824; was pastor at Richmond Street Church, Providence, R. I., and in the following year; stated his place at no previous places; from 1825 to 1831; principal of an academy at Greenwich, Conn., until 1835, and without charge at Suffield until his death there, Feb. 19, 1837. See Trien. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem., 1870, p. 31.

Clarke, George, an English Wesleyan minister, was born in the county of Durham in 1785. He was converted in manhood; commenced his ministry in 1813; labored for twenty-nine years; four (1855-58) being spent on the Shetland Islands; became a superintendent at Stockton in 1842, and Gateshead in 1844; and died at Sunderland, July 19, 1857. He was zealous and successful. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1857.

Clarke, Hugh L. M., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, entered the ministry in 1859; was missionary in Zion Church, Belvidere, and St. James's Church, Knowlton, N. J., and rector of Zion Church, Rome, N. Y., until his death, Oct. 2, 1880. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1881, p. 172.

Clarke, Ivory, a Baptist missionary, was born at North Berwick, Me., and graduated from Waterville College in 1834, and from the Newton Theological Institution in 1838. He was appointed chaplain of the 3rd regiment, and sailed the latter part of that year for Africa. For seven years he resided at Bosley, Liberia, and for three years at Edjina, engaged in preaching, looking after the interests of the mission schools, translating a part of the New Test., and making a dictionary of the Bassa language. In order to recruit his wasted energies he sailed for America April 6, 1848, but died at sea eight days afterwards. (J. C. S.)

Clarke, James M., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Baltimore County, Md., Nov. 16, 1806. He was converted at eighteen, and educated at Dickinson College. He entered the Baltimore Conference in 1832, in which he served twenty-three charges, practicing his calling for several years in connection with his ministerial work, and died at Duncansville, Pa., March 12, 1880. He was a true man; a devoted, laborious, and successful preacher. See Minutes of the Annual Conference, 1880, p. 96.

Clarke, James Stainer, an English clergyman and writer, was domestic chaplain and librarian to George IV, rector of Preston, rector of St. Saviour's, canons of Windsor, and died in 1834. He published several works on maritime voyages and kindred subjects, also The Life of James II., from the original MSS. (1816, 2 vols., 4to). See Rose, Gen. Bios. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Clarke, Jeremiah, an English composer of church music, was educated under Dr. Blow, of the Chapel Royal, appointed organist of St. Paul's Cathedral in 1683, and in 1704 one of the organists in the king's chapel. His compositions are few, an account of his untimely death in July, 1707. See Chalmers, Bng. Dict. s. v.; Ali-bone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.
CLARKE

Clarke, John (1), a Sabbatarian, or Seventh-day
Baptist, minister, was born at Westerly, R. I., in 1717.
He was ordained a deacon in May, 1768. As a soldier he performed military duty in the colonial wars and in the revolution. In 1773 he became the successor of Rev.
James Hinsdill, of Hoykinton; was pastor for six, several years a member of the Rhode Island General Assembly, and was recognised as a man of marked ability. He died March 8, 1798. See R. J. Cyclop. s. v.
(J. C. S.)

Clarke, John (2), D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Portsmouth, N. H., April 13, 1755, and graduated from Harvard College in 1774. He was ordained pastor of the First Church in Boston, as colleague of Rev.
Dr. Chauncey, and for nineteen years the relation was maintained with mutual respect and affection. His conduction with the Church as sole pastor continued until his sudden death, April 2, 1798. He was a faithful and learned minister of the gospel. He published a number of Discourses—a work in answer to the questions and objections of a Christian gentleman, to a Ser-drew at College (12mo). A volume of his Sermons and Discourses to Young Persons appeared after his

Clarke, John S., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was appointed missionary in 1870 to Christ Church, Chester, and to Potternville, N. Y. In 1873 he became rector of Christ Church, Morristown, N. J., where he had charge of the mission in connection with that Church. In 1874 he removed to Ashland, and died 419.

Clarke, Josiah E., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was admitted into the Georgia Conference in his nineteenth year, and served the Bryan and Chatham Mission, 1840-42; was again in that Mis-soon, Sparta Circuit, Spring Place, and Lanier Circuit, where he died, May 29, 1854. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1854, p. 546.

Clarke, Lucas W., a Congregational minister, was born at Mansfield, Conn., in 1801, and graduated from Brown University in 1825. He was ordained at W ilbraham, Mass., Dec. 9, 1829; was dismissed Dec. 13, 1832, and died at Milford, Me., Jan. 2, 1854. See Hampden Jnl., p. 112. (J. C. S.)

Clarke, Matthew, an English nonconformist minister (son of Rev. Matthew Clarke, who was ejected from the living of Harborough, Leicesterhire, and who contrived amid all his sufferings for conscience' sake to give his son an excellent ministerial education), was born Feb. 2, 1608. He began his ministry at Little Bowden, near Market Harborough, in 1684; in 1687 he accepted a call to Sandwich, Kent; two years later returned to his flock in Leicesterhire, and shortly afterwards went to Miles's Lane, London, as assistant. In 1694 he became sole pastor, and soon changed a declining Church to the most prosperous in London. About that time he was chosen one of the lecturers at Pinner's Hall.
He continued his pastorate with unsurpassing labor of body and mind till his death, March 27, 1729. Mr. Clarke had a commanding person and a melodious voice; was eminently amiable and accomplished, and highly successful in the pulpit, notwithstanding a certain degree of timidity. See Bogue and Bennett, History of Dissenters, 2d ed. ii, 351; Wilson, Dissenting Churches, i, 474, 431.

Clarke, Miner G., D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Woodstock, Conn., Dec. 9, 1819, and was descended from the same family stock as the Rev. John Clarke, to distinguished in the annals of the early Baptist history of Newport, R. I. He was converted in youth, graduated from the Newton Theological Institution in 1857, and was ordained at Suffield, Conn., shortly after. He was compelled by ill-health to resign his charge, but having somewhat recovered, was invited to the pastorate of the Church in Grafton, Mass. After a year and a half of great success, he was again obliged to resign. His next settlement was in Norwich, Conn., where, during his six years' ministry, he built up a strong, efficient church. He was now called to Springfield, Mass., where he was equally successful. Once more his health gave way, and for a time he supplied the pulpit of the First Baptist Church in Williamsburg, N. Y., and acted as financial secretary of the American and Foreign Bible Society. In 1851 he became pastor of the Tabernacle Church in Philadelphia, and had an ex-erience similar to that which had attended his previous pastorates. In 1856 he went to Indianapolis, and there established, and for six years edited, the Indiana Democrat, and in 1860 was called to a similar office at St.
John's, Brooklyn. In 1864 he was called to a similar charge at Chicago, where, as financial secretary, he performed valuable service for the university in that city. Subsequently he was for a short time pastor at Evanston, near Chicago, and for four years financial He died at Chicago, Sept. 19, 1891. See Cyclop. St. andard, Sept. 29, 1881; Catechist, Baptist Encyclopedia, s. v. (J. C. S.)

Clarke, Moses, a Congregational minister, was born in Massachusetts in 1792; graduated from Harvard College in 1819, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1822. He was ordained Nov. 22, of the same year, went as a home missionary to Louisiana, and died there in 1840. See Test. Cut. of Andover Theol. Sem., 1870, p. 50.

Clarke, Orlando, a Presbyterian, and afterwards Congregational minister, was born Nov. 6, 1824, at Geneva, Ind., and was licensed by the Presbytery of Indiana. He took a partial course of study at Hanover College; graduated at Bloomington in 1846; from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1851, and afterwards spent a year in Yale as a resident licentiate.
From 1854 to 1856 he was stated supply at Edinburg;
in 1857 at Greenville, and in 1858 at Troy. About 1859 he connected himself with the Congregational denomination, in which he ever after remained, at first pastoring to several churches at Reinsornton, Des Moines, Polk City, and other places in Iowa, for short periods of time. In 1862 or 1863 he took charge of the Iowa College for the Blind, and was instrumental in its removal to Vinton, having charge of the erection of its original buildings. In 1864 he returned to the regular work of the ministry, was ordained as an evangelist Jan. 6, 1865, at St. Louis, Mo., and was stated supply at St. Anthony, Minn., in 1866 and 1867. In the latter year he removed to Lansing, Ia., where he resided, although preaching at various places, until June, 1875, when he returned to Vinton, and again took charge of the Iowa College for the Blind, as its President. In this position he resided until the end of his life, April 2, 1876, giving full satisfaction to the trustees, the community, and the state authorities, largely promoting the prosperity of the institution, and greatly endeared to all the pupils and assistants.
Cong. Quarterly, xiv, 413.

Clark, Owen, an English Baptist minister, was born in 1713. He became a Christian in 1737, and at sixteen or seventeen went out as an innermost preacher. In 1812 he entered the Bank of England, and shortly afterwards became pastor of the Church meeting at Paradise Chapel, Chelsea, occupying both positions until 1824, when, his health failing, the directors granted him a pension for life. Subsequently he was pastor of a church in Taunton, and afterwards of two churches, at different dates, in Bath. In 1841 he became travelling agent of the British and Foreign Temperance Society, for the county of Essex, and of the Baptist College at Fetter Lane, London. In 1856 he resigned, but finally ministered to the Working-men's Church, Kensignton, without salary, till his death, Jan. 15, 1859. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1859, p. 46, 47. (J. C. S.)

Clarke, Peter G., a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born at Woodbury, Conn., Feb. 11, 1738. Having received his classical and theological training under Dr. Thilaston Browne, he was made a honorary A.M. in 1821 by Yale College. He was ordained deacon in 1818, presbyter in 1820, and began his ministry in Norwich as assistant to Rev. John Tyler, and missionary to several places in the neighborhood. In 1828 he was commissioned chaplain in the United States navy, in which post he continued till his death at Cheshire, Conn., Jan. 1, 1860. See Amer. Quart. Church Rec., 1860, p. 180.

Clarke, Richard, an English clergyman, was ordained deacon by the bishop of Winchester, May 5, 1746, and presbyter by the bishop of Bangor, Sept. 23, 1750, and was sent to South Carolina by the Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts, arriving at Charleston in the autumn of 1753. St. Philip's Church in that city being without a pastor, he and the Rev. John Andrews became co-pastors in the parish. The negro school within its jurisdiction became the object of his earnest efforts. In 1759 he resigned his rectورية, returned to England, and in a short time after was appointed lecturer of Stoke-Newington, and afterwards of St. James's, near Abingdon, London. In 1769 he was curate of Cheshunt, in Hertfordshire. Pecuniary embarrassment troubled him last years. He died not earlier than 1780. As a preacher he was greatly admired. Among his publications are, A Warning to the World, or the Prophetical Numbers of Daniel and John Calculated (1758):—A Second Warning (1762) ;—Voice of Clire, the Voice of the Jem and Elisha (1769):—The Gospel of the Daily Service of the Law Preached to the Jew and Gentile (1768):—An Essay on the Number Seven, treating of the Komish and Mohammedan religions, etc. (1768) :—The Explanation of the Feast of Trumpets. Besides these he published letters, essays, dissertations, and discourses on various subjects. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v. 145.

Clarke, Richard Perry, an English Congregational minister, was born at Barnstaple, North Devon, July 17, 1821. He connected himself with the Church in early life; received his ministerial preparation at Western College, Exeter, and began his ministry in 1848 as pastor of Lower Darwen, Lancashire. He removed to Exbridge in 1860; to City-road, London, in 1867 ; in 1868 to Bristol, and died June 21, 1876. Mr. Clarke's preaching was simple, direct, earnest, and evangelical, and his life was in thorough harmony with his teaching. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1879, p. 306.

Clarke, Richard Samuel, an Episcopal clergyman, was born in 1737, and for nineteen years was minister at New Milford, Conn., from which place he removed to the Episcopal Church in 1758, and was rector of a church in the latter years. His last settlement was in St. Stephen, where his ministry continued thirteen years. He died there, Oct. 26, 1824. See Sabine, Lives of the Amer. Rec., i. 316. (J. C. S.)

Clarke, Robert, an English Congregational minister, was born at Nailsworth, Gloucestershire, in 1796, of Quaker parents. He united with the Baptists in youth, and was ordained pastor of the Baptist College at Fitchburg, and in 1818 became pastor of the Baptist Church at Leblanc. He subsequently preached twelve years at Bridgesmouth, eight years at Oswestry, and five years at Kingsbridge, Devonshire. He then joined the Congregationalists, and became pastor at Shelton. After laboring at Shaldon six years, he lived in retirement in the vicinity of Romford, Essex, six or seven years; and finally, in 1868, went to labor in the village of Aveley, where he died, Feb. 14, 1878. Mr. Clarke was a very excellent preacher, and in the pulpit, as elsewhere, direct and courageous in expressing his convictions. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1879, p. 306.

Clarke, Roger, an English martyr, was apprehended at Ipswich in 1546, and taken before a priest, who questioned him as to the real presence in the eucharist. He was threatened by the priest, but, continuing constant, was burned at Bury in 1546. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, ii. 358.

Clarke, Samuel, (1) a celebrated English Orientalist, probably born in Northamptonshire in 1623, was educated at Merton College, Oxford, where he took his degree of A.M. in 1648. In 1650 and 1658 he was master of a boarding-school at Islington, near London, during his stay at which place he assisted in correcting and publishing Walton's Polyglot Bible. He died at Holywell, Oxford, Dec. 27, 1692. Among his works are, Variae Lectiones et Observationes in Chaldaicum Paraphrasin (in the above Polyglot, vi. 17):—Scintilla metrica et Rhythmica (Oxon, 1661, 8vo). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Clarke, Samuel (2), an English divine, was born about 1626, and educated at St. John's College, Cambridge. He early applied himself to the study of the Scriptures, and died Feb. 24, 1701. His Annotations on the Bible (1690, fol.), printed together with the sacred text, was the great work of his life. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Clarke, Tertius Strong, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born in Westhampton, Mass., Dec. 17, 1798. He graduated from Yale College in 1824, and from Auburn Theological Seminary in 1827, in which year he was ordained pastor of the Congregational Church in South Deerfield, Mass. He retired in 1833, and was installed at Hadiam, Conn., the next year; in 1837 became pastor at Stockbridge, Mass. ; in 1850 acting pastor at Penn Yan, N. Y.; in 1852 pastor at Franklin; in June, 1858, at Cuyahoga Falls, O., from which he was dismissed in 1862; in Jan. 1, 1863, accepted the pastorate of the Presbyterian Church at Westerlo, N. Y.; removed to Cuyahoga Falls in 1866, without charge; and died in New, Pa., April 12, 1875. See Cong. Quarterly, 1875, p. 422.

Clarke, Thomas W., a Baptist minister, was born in Beverly, Mass., Feb. 28, 1805. He was converted in early life, pursued his preparatory studies at the Leicester Academy, and at the Theological Seminary, Bangor, Me., where he graduated when about twenty-one years of age. He was ordained pastor in Nantucket, Mass., in 1831, and served ten or eleven years there, and at Wheatland, N. Y., and Lexington, Mass.; also for several months supplying the pulpit at West Harwich. He received an appointment in the beginning of the late civil war as chaplain in the army, and was severely wounded near New Berlin, N. C. After his recovery from an amputation, president Lincoln reappointed him to the same post, and he was stationed, first at a military hospital in Montpelier, Vt., and subsequently at a similar institution in Worcester, Mass. When this latter hospital was abandoned, he was appointed to an inspectorship in the custom-house in Boston. While occupying this position, and for several years after, he preached very occasionally when ever he had an opportunity. He died at Boston Highlands, Feb. 11, 1881. Mr. Clarke was a man of good abilities, genial in spirit, an ardent patriot, and devoted to the work to which he had consecrated his life. See The Watchman, March 17, 1881. (J. C. S.)

Clarke, Walter, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Westfield Parish, Middletown, Conn., April 5, 1812. His early life was spent in Farmington, whitch-
Clarke, Wesley C., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Bloomfield, Monroe Co., O. He embraced religion in early life, and in 1834 entered the Ohio Conference. In 1849 he became a superannuate, and died Sept. 2, 1855. Mr. Clarke was energetic beyond his physical endurance. He was a Conflict friend, an ardent Christian, an able and successful minister, and an eminently faithful pastor. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1855, p. 634.

Clarke, William (1), a learned English divine and antiquary, was born at HagHamon Abbey, Shropshire, in 1596. He was educated at Shrewsbury School, and St. John's College, Cambridge, where he became a fellow in 1717. In 1734 he was presented to the rectory of Buxted, in Sussex, by archbishop Wake, and was made presbytery in the cathedral church of Chichester. He resigned the rectory of Buxted in 1768, and in June, 1770, was installed chancellor of the Church of Chichester. He died Oct. 21, 1771. He assisted in the preparation of the first edition of Franz's Lector on Poetry, and in Annotations on the Greek Testament, and was the author of several of the notes subjoined to the English version of Boclet's Life of the Emperor Julian. His chief work was the Collection of the Roman, Saxon, and English Coins (1767, 4to). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Clarke, William (2), a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1744, and called to Kiiich, near Galashiels, in 1746, ordained in 1747, and died Nov. 29, 1786, aged seventy-four years. A lame foot marred his personal appearance, but his exemplary life and warmth of benevolence he respected. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, p. 686.

Clarke, William (3), an Episcopal minister, son of Rev. Peter Clarke, was born in Danvers, Mass., about 1739. He graduated at Harvard College in 1759, went to England and was ordained, then returned to America, and became rector of St. Paul's Church in Dedham, Mass. Here he was successful in his ministry, and lived in peace until the spring of 1777, when he was sentenced to be confined on board a ship because he refused to acknowledge the independence of the United States. After his release he went to England. In 1786 he resided in Halifax, N. S., and soon afterwards removed to Digby. Subsequently he returned to the United States, and died in Quincy, Mass., in 1815. See Sabine, Loyalists of the Amer. Rev. 1, 315. (J. C. S.)

Clarke, William (4), an English Baptist minister, was born in Kouton, Suffolk, April 7, 1729. He was baptized Oct. 27, 1799, chosen a deacon the Church Aug. 26, 1810, and ordained July 14, 1816. For many years he was pastor at Saxlingham, Norfolk. In 1858 he became pastor at Carlton Rode, where he remained until his death, Dec. 30, 1864. He was a truly godly man, liberal in heart, earnest and frequent in prayer, a lover of the house and ordinances of God. See (Long.) Baptist Hand-book, 1866, p. 127. (J. C. S.)

Clarke, William (5), an English Methodist preacher, was born at Harricott, Tarstwick, Devon, Feb. 14, 1822. He was converted in his youth, joined the Bible Christians, was a class-leader and local preacher, entered the ministry in 1847, was an impressive, earnest preacher for thirty years, winning many souls to Christ, and became superannuated in 1877. He was an ardent believer in the Second Advent, and became very engrossed in teaching in the Patapesc Female Institute, Ellicott's Mills, Md., being ordained presbytery Sept. 10, 1868. In 1852 and 1853 he served as an agent of the Church Book Society of New York; and from September, 1853, till February, 1856, had charge of Locust Grove Seminary, near Pittsburgh, Pa. In March, 1856, he became rector of St. Peter's Church, Rome, Ga., and left that position in the summer of 1861 to remove to Augusta as assistant rector of St. Paul's Church. In January, 1863, he became rector, and so continued till his death. Aug. 10, 1877. From 1863 he was a member of the standing committee of the diocese, and from 1867 its president. In October, 1875, he was selected by the House of Deputies to be missionary bishop to Cape Palmas, Africa, which office he declined. See Obituary Record of Yale College, 1878.

Clarke, William Nash, an English Baptist minister, was born in London, April 21, 1732. He was converted under George Whitefield, but joined the Baptists at Devonshire Square, London. He studied under Dr. S. Stennett; became pastor at Unicorn-Yard in 1761; educated several young men for the ministry; removed to Exeter in 1786, and died there, July 29, 1795. Mr. Clarke was a man of great piety and probity, and preached against the spread of Antinomianism. He published four Sermons and Charges. See Wilson, Discoursing Churches, iv, 239.

Clarke, W., an English Congregational minister, was born in Coventry, Dec. 22, 1801. He joined the Church in youth, prepared for the ministry at Hackney Academy, and began his vocation at Godalming, Surrey. In 1837, at the instance of the Colonial Missionary Society, he settled in Ontario, Canada, where he held and preached at various parishes; and in London, and died in 1878. See (Long.) Comp. Year-Book, 1879, p. 508.

Clarke, W. Augustus, an English Baptist minister, was ordained by a Greek bishop, but joined the Baptists, and in 1773 became pastor at Red-cross Street. In 1780 he was opposed by the papists, and had to remove to a room in Bunhill Row. He then fled to Ireland, next to America; but returned to London in 1797, and in 1799 resumed preaching in Bunhill Row, where he still was in 1801. See Godby, Hymn-writers, p. 39; Wilson, Discoursing Churches, iv, 431.

Clarson, Abraham, an English Independent minister, was born at Earl-heaton, Dewsbury, in 1758. He was well educated and trained in the Established Church; was converted at the age of twenty, and became a member of the Independent Church at Ossett in 1806. In April, 1811, he was admitted to the academy at Idle; the same year became pastor at Mixenden, Halifax; in 1816 removed to Bingley, near Bradford; in 1817, went to resist the plans of the late Mr. Dewsbury, which, through his efforts, a commodious place of worship was built in 1839, and in which, as contributor, a frequent supply, and as deacon, he rendered efficient service till his death, May 4, 1856. Mr. Clarson was a man of deep and unform piety, and eminently diligent in the discharge of all his duties. See The Evangelical Magazine (Long.), 1850, p. 705.
Clarkson, David (1). B.D., a celebrated English nonconformist divine, and one of the tutors of archbishop Tillotson, was born at Bradford, Yorkshire, Feb. 2, 1622, and educated at Clare Hall, Cambridge, of which he was made a fellow. He was minister of the Mortlake Church, Surrey, till he was ejected in 1662, when he was chosen co-pastor with Dr. Owen at Mortlake, where he succeeded in 1683. He died June 14, 1686. His publications include Primitive Episcopacy (Lond. 1668):—No Evidence of Diocesan Episcopacy in Primitive Times (1661); a work intituled Discourses of Liturgies (1669):—Sermons and Discourses (1666); and other works. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, a. v.; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. a. v.; Wilson, Dissenting Churches, i. 285.

Clarkson, David (2), a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born in Worcestershire, England, in June, 1681. He graduated at Oxford University; came to America in 1823; was ordained by bishop Doane, and became rector of Trinity Parish, Belvidere, N. J., officiating also in several neighboring places. From 1852 to 1855 he was chaplain in the United States Army, and was stationed at Fort Riley, Kansas. In the winter of 1855 he was pastor at Lexington, Mo., and in 1860 he removed to Grand Rapids, Mich., where he died, April 6, 1862. See Amer. Quart. Church Rec. 1862, p. 735.

Clarkson, James, an Associate minister, was born, educated, and licensed in Scotland. In 1772 he was sent to America by the General Associate Synod of Scotland; was ordained and settled as pastor of the Associate Reformed Church in Guistoun, York Co., Pa., and died in 1811. Mr. Clarkson took an active part in discussions which terminated in the formation of the Associate Reformed Church, by the union of the Associate and Reformed Presbyterian bodies in 1782, and distinguished himself particularly by being one of the two ministers who finally held out against the union. He was moderator of the Associate Synod in 1806. See Sprague, Annales of the Amer. Pilgrim, IX, iii, 15.

Clarkson, Joseph, a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born in 1765. During the early part of the Revolution he attended a classical school in Lancaster, Pa., of which Dr. Robert Smith, a Presbyterian clergyman, was principal. In 1782 he graduated at the University of Pennsylvania, and, after studying theology, was ordained deacon in 1787, in which year he acted as secretary to the House of Bishops. He was stationed in the ministry in Philadelphia, but soon after went to Wilmington, Del., and ministered until 1799 in the old Swedes' Church. In April of that year he became rector of St. James's Church, Lancaster, his field of labor embracing two country parishes besides St. James's, and here he died, Jan. 25, 1830. See Sprague, Annales of the Amer. Pilgrim, v. 292.

Clarkson, Thomas A, an Associate minister, was born in 1794; finished his theological course in 1819, and was licensed the year after. He was ordained Aug. 13, 1822; was pastor at Mercersburg and McConnellsburg from 1823 to 1833; then resigned on account of ill health in 1834, and returned to his labors in exchange of a superannuated minister at Cumberlary, where he died, Dec. 26, 1841, aged eighty-six years. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1842, p. 19.

Clarus is the name of several eminent persons in early Christian history:
1. Bishop of Polotema, attended the synod of Cesa- rea, A.D. 198, convened by the metropolitan Theophi- lus and Narcissus of Jerusalem, with the view of settling the paschal controversy (Euseb., H. E. v. 25).
2. Bishop of Mascula, in Numidia.
3. Apostle of Aquitaine, a martyr, and, as some writers say, a bishop who came from Africa to Rome, and was slain by poison in the time of St. Gregory, as a missionary to Aquitaine. He was martyred at Lectoure, in Gascony, and buried in the same place. He is commemorated June 1.
4. A presbyter and martyr, commemorated Nov. 4 in Usuard's Martyrology.
5. First bishop of Ally, and martyr, flourished in the 3rd century; commemorated at Ally on July 1.
6. Bishop of Nantes, apostle of Brittany in the latter part of the 3rd century. He was the first missionary sent into Brittany, and first bishop of Nantes. There are various traditions respecting St. Clarus, that he associated with the apostles, or at least with two of them, Peter and Paul; that he was sent into Gaul by St. Peter, when that apostle was bishop of Rome; that he was sent into Gaul by St. Linus, the successor of St. Peter; that he brought with him the nail which fastened the right hand of Peter to the cross, etc. It appears that the church came from Rome to St. Clarus and Con Adeodatus about 280, and preached in the southern district of Brittany. According to an ancient tradition, he died in the diocese of Vannes. His relics were transported in 878 to the abbey of St. Aubin of Auxerre. He is commemorated Oct. 16.

A priest of Touraine, born at Auvergne in the middle of the 4th century; commemorated Nov. 8.
8. A saint of Loudun, where he is honored as a martyr. He flourished probably in the 4th century, and is commemorated Aug. 8.
9. Presbyter and abbot of Vienne, in France, was born in the beginning of the reign of Clotaire II, in that town, on the banks of the Loire. He was abbot of the monastery of St. Marcellus of Vienne, which he governed over twenty years, and had at the same time the direction of the convent of St. Blandina, to which his mother had retired. Having been informed of the hour of his death by an apparition of St. Blandina, he caused himself to be carried into the church, where he lay extended on a hair-cloth, and ceased not to pray and sing praises to God until he breathed his last. He died about the year 660. His life has been written anonymously and published by Matillone and Balanasius. He was buried in the Church of St. Blandina. His relics were carried into the Church of the Buguents. He is commemorated Jan. 1.
10. A priest and martyr, was a native of Rochester, and died about 894. He went to Gaul and established himself in Le Vexin, where he soon acquired a high reputation. A beautiful woman, who did not succeed in making him use her with her passion, revenged herself by paying two criminals to assassinate him, in a borough which still bears his name, Saint-Clar, and which is famous for the treaty that ceded to Rollo the province of Neustria.

Clary, Dexter, a Congregational minister, was born in Conway, Mass., Feb. 1, 1798. For a time he was a merchant in Sacket's Harbor, N. Y., and then entered upon a course of study with a view to the ministry, receiving license to preach in 1826. Under commission of the Western Domestic Missionary Society he labored a year in western New York. In 1829 he was ordained an evangelist at Watertown, in the Presbyterial Church, and for several years served as such in the region about Rochester, Buffalo, and occasionally in Canada. For the purpose of studying theology he went to New Haven, Conn., in 1834. Not long after he was called to Montreal, where he labored for two years. In 1838 he went to Rockford, Ill., and in 1840 fixed his residence at Beloit. Within a year after, his labors were divided between Congregational churches of these two places. The Church in Beloit having grown, he gave himself wholly to the work in that field. In September, 1850, he resigned his charge and entered the service of the American Home Missionary Society, as its superintendent for Wisconsin, an office which he filled for twenty-two years, travelling in that time about one hundred thousand miles. In the first years of his pastorate at Beloi were begun the consultations that resulted in the founding of Beloi College, of which, at its organization, he was elected one of the trustees; and at their first meeting, in 1845, he was appointed secretary of the board and one executive committee—positions which he occupied until his death, June 16, 1874. See Cong.
Quarterly, 1876, p. 357.
Clary, Joseph Ward, a Congregational minister, was born in New York. He graduated at Middlebury College in 1808, and at Andover Theological Seminary in 1811; was ordained May 7, 1812, pastor of First Church, Dover, N. H.; was pastor at Cornish, from 1828 to 1834; and without charge at Cornish till his death, April 13, 1835. See Tien, Cat. of Andover Theol.
Sem., 1870, p. 19.
Clausen, D., a Dutch engraver, who flourished about 1660, etched a number of plates, among which is one of The Virgin and Infant, with St. John and an Angel.
Clason, James (1), a Scotch clergyman, son of the minister of Dalziel, was licensed to preach in 1806, and presented to the living at Dalziel the same year;
he joined the Free Secession in 1843, and died suddenly April 16, 1852, aged sixty-eight years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, ii, 283.
Clason, James (2), a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Glasgow University in 1863; was presented to the living at Ratho in 1863, and died April 17, 1842, aged thirty-four years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, i, 141.
Clason, Patrick, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, was born at Dalziel; licensed to preach in 1813; presented to the living at Carmunnock in 1814; ordained in 1815; resigned in 1821; transferred to St. Cuthbert's Chapel-of-Ease, Edinburgh, in 1824; and joined the Free Secession in 1843. At the first meeting of the Free General Assembly he was chosen joint-clerk, and moderator of the Free Assembly in 1848. He published, Consider-tions on the Erection of St. Cuthbert's Chapel-of-Ease (1838) —Strictures on the Statement of the Central Board of Scottish Dissenters: Two Letters (Edinburgh, 1838): —Speech in the Presbytery of Edinburgh to 1858; and three other Dissertations. There is no further record of him. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, i, 128; ii, 59.
Clason, Robert, a Scotch clergyman, native of Logie, was licensed to preach in 1744; presented to the living at Dalziel in 1756; elected clerk to the synod, but resigned on being transferred to Logie, Stirling, in 1801. He died July 8, 1801, aged eighty-five years, leaving two sons, James, minister at Dalziel, and Patrick, minister at Edinburgh. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiaca, ii, 282, 787.
Clases, August, a Hungarian theologian, who was born at Galgö, and died at Pritzitz in 1750, wrote

Classis (a classis, directrix), the name of an ecclesiastical body in the Reformed (Dutch) Church in Holland and in America, corresponding to the presbytery in the Presbyterian Church. A classis is composed of the minister or ministers, and one elder, of each church constituting the body, together with such other ministers without pastoral charge as may belong to it. This same arrangement prevails in the German Reformed Church in the United States.
The classis hold an intermediate place between the consistory and the particular synod. It is represented by two ministers and two elders in the particular synod, and by three ministers and three elders in the general synod. It is both a legislative and a judicial body, many of whose acts are subject to the revision of the superior courts. See REFORMED CHURCH IN AMER-ICA; GERMAN REFORMED CHURCH IN AMERICA.

Claupe, an ingenious French painter on glass, was born about 1408, and practiced at Marles, where he enjoyed a high reputation. He was invited to Rome by the great architect Bramante to paint the windows of the Vatican; and also executed the large windows of Santa Maria del Popolo. He died there not long afterwards. See Biog. Universelle, s. v.; Spooner, Biog.
History of the Fine Arts, s. v.
Claupe, Saint, of Bisançon. See CLAUDICK.
Claupe (D'Abbeville), Clément Poullon (generally known under the name of Abbeville), French missionary and historian, of the Capuchin order, was one of the four who went in 1612, with Razilly, lieutenant-general of the king, to found an institution in Bra-Zil. After his mission had been accomplished, he went back to France to get help, but his age did not allow him to return. He died at Paris in 1622, after having founded the convent of the Capuchins at Abbeville. He left Histoire de la Mission à l'Ile de Maragouk, etc. (Paris, 1614, 12mo) —Histoire de Jésus Vierge de l'Ordre de Sainte-Claire (ibid. 1619). See Claupe, Isaac, a French Protestant theologian, son of Jean Claus, was born at Saint-Africque, March 15, 1653. He first exercised his ministry at Sedan, and af-Afterwards took charge of the Walloon Church at the Hague, where he died, July 29, 1695. He published the works of his father Jean. He is believed to be the auтор of Le Comte de Soissons, a romance (Cologne, 1667).
Claupe, Jean Jacques, a French Protestant theologian, son of the preceding, was born at the Hague, Jan. 16, 1684, became pastor of a French church in London in 1710, and died there Feb. 27, 1712, leaving Sermons sur l'Écriture Sainte (Geneva, 1724, posthumously edited); — and some Dissertations (Utrecht, 1702, 12mo). See Biog. Universelle, s. v.
Claupe was a sister of Sulphius Severus, who was a disciple of St. Martin and pastored in Aquitaine, and flourished about A.D. 420. A great number of letters were written to her by her brother, all bearing on the religious life. Two of them remain (see Gennadius, De Script. Eccles. xix: Baluze.
Miscell. (Paris, 1768), i, 86; Ceillier, Autors, viii, 119).
Claupe, Saint, a citizen of Corinth, martyred under Salamin, in Diospolis, Egypt, A.D. 294. See Victories.
Claupehistata were a sect of Donatists. It was one of the charges against the Donatist bishop Prima-mus that he murdered in the basilica those of his pre-byters who objected to his admitting Claudianus to communion (Migne, Patroli, iv, 379).
Claupeianus is the name of several persons in early Christian records:
1. Martyr with Papias and Diodorus in the Deca persecution, is commemorated Feb. 23 in Usuard's and the old Roman martyrologies.
2. A martyr at Nicomedia, is commemorated March 6 in Usuard's and the Roman martyrologies.
3. A presbyter of Rome among the representa-teves of Sylvestre at Arles, A.D. 314 (Labelle, Cordi, ii, 1429).
4. The reputed author of seven epigrams in the Greek anthology, two of which, ascribed to him in the Vatican MSS, are addressed to the Saviour.
Claupeius is the name of numerous men in early Christian history:

see before A.D. 774, and succeeded by the celebrated Claudius Clemens.

18. Said to have been bishop of Auxerre (Dempter, Men. Scot., commemorated March 20 and March 30), but not mentioned among the bishops of that time in Gall. Christ. (xiii, 360), nor in Gams (Series Episc.).

19. Claudius Clemens, or Claudius Clemens Scotus. See Clemens (2).

20. A martyr whose relics were translated to Rome in 1650, together with those of St. Pontianus, and again untranslated to Antwerp in 1656. Commemorated May 14.

Claudius Apollinaris. See Apollinaris.

Claudius, Gottfried Christoph, a German theologian, was the son of a minister, and was himself minister at Prauat and at Giesebriel. He died March 19, 1747. His principal works are, Historia Fratrum Sportunlantui (Frankfort, 1724, 8vo) — Annuneciorem ad Dissertations Tremonier, etc. (1735, 4to) — Commentatio de Chamaeuma (Wittenberg, 1736). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Claudius (n. Monald). Claude Hippolyte, a French priest, brother of the following, was born April 5, 1759, at Rouergue (Aveyron). He studied at St. Sulpice, and after undergoing many vicissitudes during the revolution and the restoration, was in 1819 appointed almoner to the duchess of Angoulême, and in the year following preached the funeral sermon of the duke of Entraigues. In 1824 he was promoted to the bishopric of Chartres, which he resigned in 1851. He died in 1857. He was an enthusiastic defender of Gallicanism. Of his works we mention, Le Concordat Justice (Paris, 1818) — Coup d’Oeil sur l’Église de France — La Religion Praecede par la Revolution, etc. See Lichten- buenger, Encyclopédie des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.; Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (I. P.)

Claesel (de Cousserges). Michel Amant, a French ecclesiastical writer, was born (oct. 7, 1758, at the Castle of Cousserges, in Rouergue (Aveyron), and was ordained a priest in 1787. He refused the oath to the civil constitution of the clergy in 1795, but accepted the concordat in 1802. He was appointed grand-vicar of Amiens, and took charge of the department of the Oise, at Beauvais. In 1822 he was called to the royal council of public instruction. At the time of the death of Leo XII he happened to be at Rome, and the cardinal of Clermont-Tonnere appointed him to the concile. After the revolution of 1830 he lived in retirement with the monks of the abbey of Verneuil, and died there Jan. 22, 1855. Abbé Clausel published, among other works, Réflexions et Lettres sur l’Affaire du Curé de Chartres (1824) — Observations sur le Nouveau Coutumie de Beauvais (1828). See Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Clausen, Hendrik Georg, a celebrated Danish preacher, was born at Sleswick in 1759. After having spent a country curate for several years, he was appointed, in 1797, pastor at the church of Notre-Dame at Copenhagen, and for nearly half a century delivered eloquent but rationalistic sermons, of which many have been published in two collections, entitled, Prediksmær (1758 and 1807). He died in 1840. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Clausen, Hendrik Nikolai, a Danish theologian, brother of the foregoing, was born April 22, 1793, at Maribo, in Lolland. Having completed his studies, he spent two years (1818-1820) in Germany, Italy, and France. While at Berlin, Schleiermacher exercised great influence upon his theology. In 1821 he was appointed rector, and soon afterwards professor of theology at Copenhagen. In 1874 he resigned his professorship, and died March 23, 1877. He wrote: Aurelius Augustinus Hippon. Sacra Scripturae Intepretes (Copenhagen, 1837) — Quatuor Evangeliorum Tabula Synoptica, etc. (iiid. 1829) — Kirchenverfassung, Lehre und Ritus der Katholischen und Protestantischen (from the Danish, by Fries, CLAUSEN .

1. A person enumerated by Epiphanius (Haer. 51, 427) in a list of heretics who, like the Cerinthians and Ebionites, asserted that our Lord was a mere man.

2. A monk mentioned as a companion of Epiphanius, not, however, by name, and who lived in Cyprus, about A.D. 398. The Latins commemorate them Aug. 23, the Greeks, Oct. 29 (see Fleury, Hist. Eccles. vii, 16).

4. A martyr at Rome, who lived in the time of the Flavian emperors, and was one of the judges called Cluredi, about A.D. 98.

5. Another martyr at Rome, under DIOCLETIAN, commemorated Feb. 18 in Usuard’s martyrology.

7. A martyr at Rome under Nicolaus and others, commemorated July 7 in Usuard’s martyrology.

9. The tribune, martyr at Rome under Numerian, commemorated Dec. 3 in Usuard’s and Roman martyrologies, but Aug. 12 in that of Jerome.

10. Saint, bishop of Vienne, lived in the 4th century, and is commemorated June 1. He was present at the Council of Nicaea, where he was prominent in the debate concerning the Donatists.

11. A bishop who sent Augustine the books that Julian, the Pelagian, had written against him, and whom, in A.D. 421, Augustine dictated and sent his answer (Epist. 207), formerly prefixed to the books against Julian.

12. Saint Claudius I was the nineteenth bishop of Besançon (Vesunum). The lists of the old chronologists make no mention of him; but in the year 517 he subscribed to the Council of Ephesus, signing himself "Episcopus ecclesiae Vesunensis."

13. Saint Claudius II was twenty-ninth bishop of Besançon, and succeeded (according to the lists) St. Gervasio. The incidents of his life are very legendary, but it seems probable that from his earliest years he was enrolled among the clergy of Besançon; that after a novitiate in the abbey of Mt. Jura he was elected to succeed abbé Ingoirdus, A.D. 641 or 642, under the pontificate of pope John IV; that on the death of Gervasius he was elected by the clergy of Besançon to be their archbishop; that after seven years he abdicated and returned to rule the abbey of Mt. Jura; and that he died in A.D. 656 or 659. St. Claudius, in his lifetime, the only one and model of the clergy of Besançon, became after his death one of the most popular saints of France. He is mentioned in the 9th century by Rabanus Maurus in his Martyrologium, as an interces-

14. Father of St. Fulgentius. The granarius and other clerics, Gordianus, was one of the senators driven from Carthage by Generic, king of the Goths. Claudius and his brother returned to Africa, but found that their houses had been given to the Arian priests. After obtaining possession of their goods, by the king’s authority, they retired to Hyazaerune, and established themselves at Telepte. Claudius married Maria Anna, a Christian lady, and Fulgentius was born A.D. 468. Claudius died soon after.

15. Second bishop of Glandevs, succeeded Frateranus, and was succeeded by Basilius. He is only known from having subscribed, through his representative, Benenatus, to the fourth council of Orleans, A.D. 541 (Gall. Christ. iii, 1236).

16. A letter addressed to Claudius exists in the collection of the writings of Isidore, bishop of Seville (A.D. 599-636). From internal evidence, it is believed not to belong to the time of Claudius. His name is shown in the Latin Protestants, and died March 23, 1877. He wrote: Aurelius Augustinus Hippon. Sacra Scripturae Intepretes (Copenhagen, 1837) — Quatuor Evangeliorum Tabula Synoptica, etc. (iiid. 1829) — Kirchenverfassung, Lehre und Ritus der Katholischen und Protestantischen (from the Danish, by Fries,

Clausen, Johann, a Lutheran theologian of Denmark, wrote his Asens in 1821, the author of, Introduc in Epist. Jacobi (Göttingen, 1800). — De Descensus J. Christi ad Inferos Historia, etc. (Copenhagen, 1801). See Winer, Hamilton der theol. Lit. i, 91, 599. (B. P.)

Clausnitzer, Tobias, a Lutheran minister of Sweden, was born in 1619 at Thun, near Annaberg. In the Thirty Years' War he was the Swedish army-chaplain. He was a member of the consistory and the Pangerst and Weiden in Upper Palatinate, at his death, May 7, 1684. He composed some hymns, of which the best known is his Lebter Jesu, sic erit Hier (Eng. transl. in Lyra Ger. ii, 99: "Blessed Jesus, at Thy Word."). See Koch, Gesch. der deutschen Kirchenlieder, iii, 334 sq. (B. P.)

Clausenæa, or persons of the house; consisting, in a Benedictine monastery, of the abbot, prior, prior major, sub-prior, third and fourth priors, who held chapter and collation, celebrated mass, and presided in hall, the precentor, master of the novices, and sucentor.

Clausina Negromantica was a sort of necromancy according to which anything unnatural can be brought into the human body without an outer injury, and also taken out of the body.

Clauswitz, Benedikt Gottlieb, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born Aug. 4, 1692, at Gross-Wriederichs near Leipsic. In the latter place he studied theology and philosophy, and was permitted, in 1711, to lecture on Greek and Hebrew languages, after having presented his De Epistolis et appelatis et de amoris in sua, qua ad Deum pertinent. In 1716 he was made Benedictine, and in 1722 succeeded his father in the abbacy. In 1728 he was a chaplain to the Elector of Merseburg, and six years later to Halle as professor of theology. He was made doctor of theology in 1739, and died May 8, 1749, leaving, Syntaxan: Doctrinae de Fide in J. Chr. Clavenu, Ignaz, a German theologian of the order of the Benedictines, was born at Grätz in 1653. He spent his life in the affairs of his state and in instruction, and died in 1701. His works were published by order of the superiors of his order, nineteen years after his death, under the title: Ascens, etc. (Salzburg, 1721, 4to). They include the following treatises: Vita Benedict Moritis Episcopi; Excidium in Regnui Episdom et in Formulam Professione Benedicti; De Regno Homini Exterior; Tractatus de Arte Rhetorica, cum Appendice de Elloquentia Sueciae et Convocatioribus. See Hoffer, Nov. Bibl. Génerale, s. v.

Claver, Pedro, a Spanish missionary of the order of the Jesuits, was sent in 1610 to the East Indies, where he devoted himself entirely to the relief of the colored slaves, prisoners, and poor. He died at Carthagena, Sept. 8, 1654. Benedict XIV declared, by a decree of 1747, that Claver possessed the divine and cardinal virtue for the degree of a hero. His Life has been writin Spanish, Italian, and finally in French (1751). See Bibl. Universelle, s. v.

Claveson, Charles de, a French religious poet, lived in 1615. He was knight of the order of the king, and sub-lieutenant of Hostun, Meurcoer, and Muril. He took the names of Philothea, Ami de la Crois, and Vieu de laCroix. He left Oeuvres for les Bénareces et Fêtes, — Sommits en quarantrin. See Hoffer, Nov. Bibl. Génerale, s. v.

Claviger (key-beaver) is a canon who keeps the keys of the chapter seal and chest. There are usually two or three such officers at a time.

Clavigny, Jacques de la Marivoue de, a French theologian, was a native of Bayeux. He became canon in the cathedral, where he died in 1702. Clavus is a band of arabesque embroidery or rich stuff of purple or other brilliant colors, worn on ecclesiastical vestments.

The latice of the clavus was usually a wide band, reaching from the neck to the feet. In the chasuble it was pell-splashed, and called the pectoral, dorsal, onophorion, auricular, and orphrey. It also reached no lower than the chest, where it is covered with roundels of metal and edged with little balls.

We continually find in ancient Christian frescoes and mosaic garments decorated with long stripes of purple, sometimes enriched with embroidery or an ivoway pattern, called by this name. These generally run from the top to the bottom of the garment, and are broader or narrower according to the dignity of the wearer. Thus, the Lord is often distinguished by a broader clavus than those of the apostles, as in a fine fresco in the cemetery of St. Agnes. Unimportant persons also wore clavi, but very narrow. In nearly all cases these clavi are two in number, and run from each shoulder to the lower border of the dress. Tertullian (De Palleis, c. 4) speaks of the care which was taken in the selection of shades of color.

There are a few examples of the single clavus, running down the centre of the breast, which Rubens believed was the ancient fashion of wearing it. These occur only in representations of the Three Children in the Fiery Furnace.

Clavi are common to both sexes; women may be seen with ornament of clavi, for instance, in pictures of the Wise and Follish Virgins; and female figures are sometimes found adorned with two clavi on each side. Jerome (Epist. 28, ad Eustochium) alludes to the use of the clavus by women single as well as married. It is also common in early art to personages of the tides Testament and the New; it is given to Moses, for instance, and to the apostles, in nearly all representations of them, whether in fresco, in mosaic, or in glass. Angels also wear the clavus in early mosaics, in the Menologium of Basil, and in several contemporary miniatures.

These purple stripes were worn on the penula as well as the tunic: a fresco from an arcosolium in the crypt of Priscilla furnishes three examples. They are found also in the pallium: a mosaic of St. Agatha Mayer at Ravenna represents our Lord with clavi of gold on such a garment. The dalmatic and clavum were similarly decorated: the latter seems to have had only one broad band of purple descending from the upper part of the chest to the feet.

Priests, after the example of the senators of old Rome, are said to have worn the broad clavus, while deacons and priests themselves with the narrow one on their tunics or dalmatics. The clavus is thus to some extent a mark of rank. The shorter kind, ornamented with small disks or spangles, and terminating in small globes or bulla, is said to be the kind of decoration which is sometimes called para-

Clawson, Samuel, a minister of the Methodist Protestant Church, was born in Jefferson County, Pa., in 1866. He was converted when quite a youth, entered the ministry in 1884, became a member of the Pittsburgh Conference, afterwards of the West Virginia Conference, and died at Weston, W. Va., in August, 1882. He was noted for his eccentricities, especially in the pulpit, which, however, added to, rather than detracted from, his power as a preacher. He was one of the most effective revivalists of his day. His natural eloquence was sometimes wonderful, and completely irresistible. In disposition he was as kind and affectionate as a child. He was several times elected representative to the General Conference. See Methodist Protestant Year-Book, 1884, p. 96.

Claxton, Marshall, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Yarm, Jan. 1, 1779. He was a local preacher at the age of sixteen, entered the itinerancy in 1799, and died July 15, 1832. His disposition was amiable, his abilities solid, and his labors useful. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1832.

Claxton, Robert Bethell, D.D., an Episcopalian minister, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1814. In 1838 he entered Yale College, and subsequently studied at the Theological Seminary at Alexandria, Va. After his ordination he labored at different places until 1863, when he was called as professor of homiletics to the Divinity School at Philadelphia. In 1873 he resigned his professorship, and accepted the rectorship of St. Andrew's Church, Philadelphia, which he held May 24, 1882. He was the author of a volume entitled Questions on the Gospels, and an occasional contributor to Church periodicals. (H. P.)

Clay, Eleazer, a Baptist minister, was born in Virginia, May 2, 1744. He was baptized in August, 1771, and ordained pastor at Chestfield in 1775. Possessing a competent estate, he was able to assist his ministerial brethren who were suffering from persecution, and send relief to the families of those who had been thrown into prison. Within the limits of his own county he labored most faithfully as a minister of Christ, but was finally laid aside from the active duties of his vocation. He died May 2, 1806. He exerted a great influence among the churches in Chesterfield County, and for many years occupied the moderator's chair in the Middle District Association. See Lives of Virginia Baptist Ministers, p. 178. (J. C. S.)

Clay, John, an English Baptist minister, was born at Aberdeen, Scotland, Sept. 4, 1790, and, while a child, removed with his parents to England. He united with the Church at Portsea, March 22, 1797. In 1821 he became associate pastor at Festin, and in 1822 pastor of a church at Landport, where he remained several years. He died Jan. 25, 1841. See Report of English Baptist Union, 1841, p. 36. (J. C. S.)

Clay, Jonathan, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Buxton, Me., Dec. 13, 1775, and was converted in 1809. Soon after he began to preach, and was ordained in 1815. His family were supported by the fruits of his labor as a farmer, his service being for many years confined to his native place. Upon the formation of a second church in Buxton he became one of its members, and, for a time, its pastor. Ill-health obliged him to suspend his ministerial labors some time before his death, which occurred in 1850. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1850, p. 90. (J. C. S.)

Clay, Joseph, a Baptist minister, was born at Savannah, Ga., Aug. 10, 1764. He graduated at Prince-ton College in 1784 with the highest honors in his class, and was licensed to preach in 1804; in 1806 became associate pastor with Dr. Stillman in the First Baptist Church of Boston, and after the death of the latter had sole charge of the church. He was relieved from this work in 1809 on account of ill-health, and died Jan. 11, 1811. Mr. Clay was distinguished at both the bar and the bench. He wrote the original of the present constitution of Georgia. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vi, 487.

Clay, Porter, a Baptist minister, son of Rev. John Clay, and brother of the statesman, Henry Clay, was born in Virginia in March, 1779, and removed to Kentucky with his mother in early life. He studied law, and occupied a position of civil trust under the government of the territory. He united with the church about 1815, and shortly after began to preach. He is said to have been a popular preacher, and greatly esteemed by the churches which he served. He died in 1850. See Catheart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 392. (J. C. S.)

Clay, Slator, a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born in New Castle, Del., Oct. 1, 1754. When a young man he studied law, and soon after began to practice. About 1780 he was induced by the capture of the privateer Vandal to sail with him to the West Indies on what he supposed would be a short voyage; but the war of the Revolution was in progress, and the vessel in which he was a passenger was captured by a British privateer. He was put ashore on the island of Antigua and abandoned, but the ship's master took passage in a sloop for New York, which was then in possession of the British. The ship, however, was taken by an American privateer, which caught in a storm and wrecked on the rocks of Bermuda, where, nevertheless, Mr. Clay landed in safety. There being little prospect of his getting away from the island, he opened a school, and taught for six years. The events of his late voyage had produced in him great seriousness, which led to his devoting himself to the Christian ministry. His friends in Bermuda proposed to accept him as their pastor as soon as he should receive ordination from the bishop of London; but hearing of the consecration of Bishop White in Philadelphia, and preferring to spend his life in his native land, he left Bermuda and arrived in Philadelphia in 1786. On Dec. 28 of the next year he was ordained deacon, and Feb. 17 following (1788) he was admitted to the order of presbyters. He became successively rector of St. James's Church, Perkiomian; of St. Peter's, Great Valley; and of St. David's, Radnor, all in Pennsylvania; and also assistant minister of Christ Church, in Upper Merion. In July, 1799, he removed to Perkiomen, near Norristown, and gave a part of his time to St. Thomas's Church in Whitemarsh. He died at the latter place on Oct. 25, 1821. He was a man of fervent piety. In the pulpit his manner was earnest and impressive. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 355.

Claybaugh, Joseph, D.D., an Associate Reformed minister, was born in Frederick County, Md., July 1, 1803, and removed to Ohio while young. In 1822 he graduated from Jefferson College; in 1824 was licensed, and accepted a call from the congregation at Chilihothe; in May, 1825, was ordained and installed pastor of that congregation, and shortly after took charge of Chilihothe Academy; in 1839 he was called to take charge of the Theological Seminary in Oxford, at the same time having charge of the congregation at Oxford, and continued in both relations till his death, Oct. 9, 1855. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 156.

Claybrook, Richard, a Baptist minister, was born in King William County, Va., Oct. 17, 1785. At the age of twenty-five he removed to Middlesex County, and made a profession of his faith in 1814. A few years after, the church which he had joined having lost its pastor, he was persuaded by Dr. Stillman to preach, and he was ordained in 1823. He also had charge of two or three other churches in different localities. He became eminently popular among all classes of hearers, and his ministry was greatly blessed. In 1831 he was called to the pastorate vacated by the death of Rev. Robert B. Semple, in Brinningt, King and Queen Co., where he remained a faithful, laborious servant of Christ until his death, Dec. 4, 1844. See Lives of Virtuous Ministers, p. 344. (sic.)

Clayton, Dana, a Congregational minister, was born in Framingham, Mass., Oct. 3, 1792. He graduated from Middlebury College in 1815, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1820; was ordained at Meriden, N. H., July 4, 1821, and dismissed Oct. 17, 1837. From 1839 to 1842 he was acting pastor of the Bethel Church at Portland, Maine.; from 1842 and 1854 he was pastor of several churches in North Augusta, Vaassalbough, Bremen, Washington, and Sebasticook; from 1844 to 1846 at Sidney, Windor, Union, Jefferson, and Norridgewock; in 1847 at Industry and Mercer; in 1848 at Stark, and in 1849 and 1850 at Richmond, Swanville, and Mt. Desert. He was without charge at Wakefield, Mass., from 1851 until he supplied the Church at West Danvers, Me., in 1859. He died Oct. 23, 1877. (W. P. S.)

Clayhillis, Andrew, a Scotch clergyman, was admitted to the living at Monifieth in 1656; transferred to Jedburgh before 1754, where he had four other places in charge; appointed visitor to the bounds of Tievotdale the same year, and was a member of twelve assemblies between 1574 and 1589; was at the head of the synod of Alloa in 1579, and signed a decree of discipline in 1586; was transferred to Eckford in 1593; was a member of the General Assembly in 1596, and transferred to Monifieth, his first charge, in 1599; was a member of the Assembly in 1602; was presented by the king to the living at Monifieth in 1614; and died March 23, 1617, aged seventy years. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiacae, i, 479, 494; iii, 725.

Clayton, Abner S., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Alabama, Dec. 1, 1802. He was converted at Shiloh in 1842, in 1843 became a member of Elyton Presbytery, and was ordained in 1844. In 1849 he removed to Itawamba County, Miss., where he labored faithfully until his death, May 1, 1859. As a preacher he was sound and successful. See Wilson, Pref. Hist. Almanaes, 1860, p. 191.

Clayton, Benjamin, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Farnley, near Leeds. He was converted at the age of fifteen, entered the sacred calling in 1822, and died suddenly, Oct. 11, 1861, aged fifty-four. He loved Methodism with an unwavering attachment. He brought all his powers into the service. He was a man of high moral character, and a hero of the cross, an instrument of all kinds of religious enterprises; as prompt to speak from the platform as the pulpit; delivering his addresses with a tact and impressiveness which did equal credit to his head and heart. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1863, p. 219.

Clayton, Isaac, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Daisy Hill, near Bradford, Yorkshire, May 29, 1778. After a course of pious instruction in 1793; sent to the Otley Circuit in 1800; admitted on trial at the conference of 1801, and travelled the Thetford, St. Neots, Northampton, Sevenoaks, London, Dover, Sheffield, Huddersfield, Keighley, Barnsley, and eight other circuits, the last being Cleckheaton. He died at Bradford, Oct. 25, 1833. Mr. Clayton was spirit-

Clayton, Joseph, an English Baptist minister, was born at Gamlingay, Cambridgeshire, Feb. 8, 1710. His parents were, in his early days, connected with the Established Church, but subsequently his mother became a member of a dissenting society. Upon the decease of his father Joseph was placed in the care of an uncle, and brought up in the occupation of husbandry. He was bigotedly attached to the Established Church, although notoriously wicked. He was converted, however, and united with a Baptist Church, and in 1735 was licensed to preach. He was ordained pastor of the Church at Steventon, June 5, 1751, and, after a useful and cheerful ministry, died Sept. 10, 1790. See Ripon Register, i, 491-493. (J. C. S.)

Clayton, Joshua A., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Florida, N. Y., Feb. 10, 1805. He graduated from Union College in 1822; studied theology for over two years in Princeton Theological Seminary, and was ordained by the presbytery of Watertown, Nov. 10, 1826. He became stated supply at Ellisburgh, N. Y., in 1825; preached there as pastor from 1826 to 1828; was stated supply at Peck in 1829; at Montgomery, 1830 to 1834; at Hebron, from 1835 to 1839; at Second Church, Plymouth, Mich., from 1840 to 1846; stated supply and missionary in Michigan and Kentucky, from 1846 to 1857, and also at Oakland, Mich., from 1857 to 1865. He died at Plymouth, Dec. 25, 1872. See Gen. Cat. of Prof. Pres. of Semi., 1861, p. 339.

Clayton, William, was one of the pioneers of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Middle and West Tennessee, uniting with the Tennessee Conference soon after its organization in 1866. He labored in Wayne, Lawrence, and Giles counties, and, completely broken down by labors, exposure, and disease, accepted a superannuationary relation, with an appointment to Summertown. He died in Giles County, Tenn., March 15, 1880, aged forty-five. Mr. Clayton combined strength, gentleness, firmness, courage, generosity, and possessed remarkable influence in his native county. He was a popular preacher alike in town and backwoods. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1866, p. 315.

Cleave, William, an English Congregational minister, was born at London, April 11, 1831. At the age of fifteen he went to India, and passed through the coffee plantations of his relatives; then returned to England, and studied at Nottingham and at Cheshunt College. In 1874 he supplied the pulpit at Chertsey, Surrey, the next year became the settled pastor, and pastor at East Bereham, Norfolk, in August, 1876. He died May 30, 1880. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1881, p. 362.

Cleeland, Eliz., a Baptist minister, was born in Wilkes County, N. C., Oct. 1, 1781. He united with the Church in 1803, and not long after was ordained. From 1813 to 1818 he preached in Knox County, Tenn. In 1821 he removed to Monroe County, and there labored successfully for thirty-eight years, building up a great many churches, and being instrumental in the conversion of many persons. He was pastor, gratuitously, for several years of the Sweetwater Church, which, under his ministry, greatly increased in strength. He died Nov. 23, 1859. See Bur. Sketches of Tenn. Minis., p. 176-178. (J. C. S.)

Cleaveland, Eliza A., D.D., a Congregationalist, was born at Topsham, Maine, Aug. 20, 1821. He graduated from Bowdoin College in 1829, having experienced religion in his senior year; also from Andover Theological Seminary in 1832. He was ordained pastor of the Third Church in New Haven in July, 1833, where his ministry continued for thirty-three years, during the early part of which he passed through many trying scenes, owing to differences of religious opinions in his Church, and pecuniary embarrassments of the society, but at length succeeded in securing the erection of an antagonist church edifice, and laying the foundation of a prominent and strong religious society in New Haven. He died Feb. 16, 1866. Constitutionally conservative, yet, when the hour of trial came in the history of the country, he was a bold, outspoken Christian patriot. While travelling in 1864, both in France and in England, he pleaded the cause of liberty and union with most eloquent and persuasive eloquence. See History of Bowdoin College, p. 391-393. (J. C. S.)

Cleaveland, John Payne, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Byfield, Mass., July 19, 1759. His father was the distinguished Parker Cleaveland, M.D., and his brother, professor Parker Cleaveland of Bowdoin College. He graduated from Bowdoin College in 1821, and spent one year (1822-24) in theological study at Andover. He was ordained at Salem, Mass., Feb. 14, 1827, pastor of the Tabernacle Church in that city, where he remained seven years. Shortly afterwards he went to Michigan, and was pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in Detroit from June 15, 1832, to Nov. 1, 1838, at which time he became president of Marshall College, Michigan. He held this office five years, during a part of this period acting as pastor of the Church of which, previously, he had been the preacher. Early in 1844 he was called to the Second Presbyterian Church in Cincinnati, where he remained two years, and then removed to Providence, R. I., where he was pastor of the Beneficent Church from April 22, 1846, to March 30, 1853. He there distinguished himself as a strong advocate of temperance and anti-slavery, and gained many warm friends. After leaving Providence he was pastor of the First Church, Boston, Mass., from Oct. 2, 1855, to July 11, 1855; from Oct. 2, 1855, to Jan. 15, 1862, of the Appleton Street Church, Lowell. During a part of 1862 he was chaplain of the 30th Massachusetts Volunteers. On leaving the army he was for some time a supply of the Park and Salem Streets churches, Boston. He also preached for some time in one or two other churches. He died at Newburyport, Mass., March 7, 1873. See Memorials of R. I. Congregational Ministers; Andover Triennial, Cat. 1870, p. 60. (J. C. S.)

Cleaveland, Nathan, a Baptist minister, was born at Horton, N. S., in 1777. After itinerating for some time in the province, he settled as pastor at Ouslow in 1809; continued till 1818; then was pastor at Hopewell, N. B., for six years, and retired to Alma, where he died, June 81, 1869. See Bill, Hist. of Baptists in the Maritime Provinces, p. 262.

Cleaver, Charles, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Brackley, England, June 11, 1815. His parents, who were members of the Church of England, strongly opposed his union with the Wesleyan Church, but although only fifteen when converted, he was true to his convictions, and his endurance of rebuke and suffering were rewarded by seeing both his parents unite with the communion which they once despised. At nineteen he entered the local ministry of that church, and remained in it until he came to the United States. On his arrival in Baltimore he continued as a local preacher until 1853, when he joined the Baltimore Conference, in which he labored until 1876, and was then made superannuated, which relation was changed to superannuate in 1878, and so continued till his death at Hereford, Md., Nov. 25, 1880. Mr. Cleaver was a faithful, earnest, and able preacher, very successful in revival and pastoral work. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1880, p. 71.

Cleaver, Euseby D., D.D., archbishop of Dublin, was born in Buckinghamshire in 1746, and received his education in Christ Church, Oxford, where he took the degree of master of arts in 1770, and in 1778 that of doctor of divinity. In 1783 he was preferred to the rectory of Tillington and another benefice in Sussex. In 1787 he accompanied the marquis of Buckingham to Ireland. In March, 1789, he was consecrated bishop of Cork; in the same year he was appointed bishop of the see of Leighlin and Ferns; and in 1809 obtained the archiepiscopal dignity. He died at Tumbridge Wells in 1819. See D'Alton, Memoirs of the Archb. of Dublin, p. 352.

Cleaver, Robert, an English Puritan divine, who died in 1615, published Sermons (1613–14):—The Sabbath (1630):—and other works. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Cleaver, William (1), D.D., an English prelate, was born in 1742. He was educated at the University of Oxford; became prebendary of Westminster in 1784; principal of Brazenose College in 1785; bishop of Chester in 1787; was translated to Bangor in 1800; to St. Asaph in 1806, and died May 15, 1815. Bishop Cleaver was an able Greek scholar and an orthodox divine. He published De Rhythmia Graecorum Libri (Lond. 1789, 8vo):—Sermons (1773, 1791, 1794):—a collection of his own and his father's sermons (1808, 8vo):—Sermons on Select Subjects (8vo):—A List of Books Recommended to the Clergy and Younger Students in Divinity (Oxford, 1791, 8vo); 31 ed. enlarged, with Dodworth's Catalogue of Books written by the Clergy in Three Centuries (1808, 8vo). See (Lond.) Annual Register, 1815, p. 125; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Cleaver, William (2), a Wesleyan Methodist minister, was born at Truro in 1818. He was converted under the ministry of William Moiser, in Portishead; officiated himself for the ministry in 1849; left many enduring monuments of his labors during his thirty-five years' work among the West Indian colonies, and died in his native island, April 19, 1878. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1878, p. 55.

Cledonius, a trusted friend and correspondent of Gregory Nazianzen, who addressed to him his two celebrated letters against Apollinaris. The second of these was a reply to one of Cledonius, asking him to declare his belief as to the person of Christ. In it Gregory begs Cledonius to assure all that he held the Nicene creed inviolate. These letters were adopted as documents of faith by the councils of Ephesus and Chalcedon (Gregory Nazianzen, Orat. 81, 52).

Cledrædus is one of the many Welsh saints who are arranged in the lists collectively as "the children of Brychan," the king of Brecknock, at one time a centre of missionary enterprise, and in which numerous inscribed stones and other early Christian memorials are found. See Hubner, Inscriptiones Britannicae Christianae.

Cleef, Jan van, an eminent Flemish painter, was born at Venloo, in Gueldern, in 1646, and studied under Primo Gentile at Brussels, and afterwards under Gaspar de Crayer. He gained a great reputation, his works being very numerous in Flanders and in Brabant. In the Church of St. James, at Ghent, is a fine picture of The Assumption; in that of St. Nicholas, an excellent picture of Magdalene at the Feet of Christ; in that of St. Michael, an ingenious composition representing The Immaculate Conception, with Adam and Eve in the lower part of the picture. Van Cleef died at Ghent in 1716. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bioogr. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Bioogr. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Cleef, Martin van, a Flemish landscapes painter, was born at Antwerp in 1620, and was a scholar of Francis Floris. He painted several pictures for the churches, and died about 1705. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bioogr. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Bioogr. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Clegg, William (1), an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Bury, Lancashire, in 1787. He was converted at nineteen; entered the ministry in 1808; retired therefrom in 1846, settling in Boston, and died suddenly at Hull, April 11, 1848. He travelled sixteen circuits. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1846.

Clegg, William (2), an English Wesleyan minister, son of the preceding, was born in Bury, in 1814. He was educated at Woodhouse Grove School, and relinquished promising prospects as a medical student to enter the ministry, in 1838. From 1841 to 1844 he had care of an English congregation in Calais, France. When laid aside by sickness in 1851, he retired to Liverpool and authenticated his call. He subsequently took a voyage to Australia, returning in December, 1855, and died on the 9th of the same month. He was a man of good attainments, pious, and modest. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1854.

Clegg, William F., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born near Pittsburgh, Chatham Co., Ga., Aug. 10, 1827. He was converted in early life, and received into the North Carolina Conference in 1852, from which time he was one of the most active and useful ministers in his conference, until a short time before his death, June 16, 1875. Mr. Clegg was pre-emminently pious, but a greater sufferer physically of all the men of his age. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1875, p. 325.

Cleghorn, Eliza Burnham, a Presbyterian minister, was born at De Kalb, St. Lawrence Co., N. Y., Sept. 27, 1812. He received his preparatory education at Potsdam Academy, and afterwards at Ogdensburg, under professor Taylor Lewis; studied in the Oneida Institute (1833-35), but never graduated from any college; taught (1835-41) partly in St. Lawrence County, and partly at Frederickstown, Mo.; afterwards was engaged (1841-50) in mercantile life. He then studied at Princeton Seminary two years, after spending one year in study before matriculation; was licensed by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, July 7, 1852; labored as agent of the American Colonization Society in the south-west from 1853 to 1855; was ordained by the Presbytery of Baltimore, June 3, 1856; was pastor of the Island Church in Washington, D. C., until 1858; agent of the South-western Bible Society, and associate editor of The True Witness, at New Orleans, until 1861; professor of languages of the Presbyterian Publication House in New Orleans, until 1866; missionary in New York city from 1867 to 1872; in the book bureau in Cincinnati the following year; an evangelist in Philadelphia and vicinity to 1875; an evangelist in New York city and vicinity for three years; stated supply at Congkvs- ville and New Roches, N. Y., in 1875, and from that time to his death he labored to the utmost in the cause of the Lord. He died Jan. 14, 1881. See Necrology. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem., 1882, p. 49; Presbyterian, Dec. 24, 1881.

Cleghorn, John, a Scotch minister, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1699; was licensed Aug. 7, 1700; called to Burtnisland, and ordained in 1701; transferred to Wemyss in 1711, and died Feb. 22, 1744, aged about sixty-five years. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiacae, ii, 531, 568.

Cleghorn, Matthew, a Scotch clergyman (son of the minister at Wemyss) was licensed to preach in 1737; presented to the living at Rouay and Egilsay in 1747, and in 1751 transferred to St. Andrews and Deerness in 1759; thence went to Desford in 1754, and died June 17, 1781, aged seventy years. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiacae, i, 648; iii, 367, 416.

Cleghorn, Thomas (1), a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1736, presented to the living at Smalholm the same year, resigned in March, 1845, and died Dec. 12, 1854. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiacae, i, 332.

Cleghorn, Thomas (2), a Methodist minister, was born at Ogdensburg, N. Y., in 1821. He experienced conversion in early life; received a good education, and in 1846 entered the travelling connection of the Wesleyan Church in Canada. In 1871 he was transferred to the Michigan Conference, and at the time of his death, Feb. 24, 1878, was serving his sixth charge in that body. Mr. Cleghorn rapidly rose to the occupancy of important fields. He was characterized by sound judgment, solid culture, and deep piety. See 1845-1855 Minutes of Conferences, 1878, p. 17.

Cleghornie, Geordie, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1857, was appointed the first minister of the new parish of Dornock in 1862, and continued in that charge in August, 1867, being then in old age. There is no further record of him. See Fusti Eccles. Scotiaca, i, 616.

Cleia, in Greek mythology, was an Atlantide, and the sister of Hyas, over whose death by a wild bear, all the sisters were so grieved that out of sympathy, the gods placed them among the stars as Hyadides. They still weep over their brother, and the rise of this constellation with the sun is said to bring rain.

Cleland, George (1), a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1637; was chaplain to lady Yester in 1645; appointed to the living at Moffat in 1652, and continued in it in 1668 and died before Dec. 19, 1683, aged about thirty-three years. See Fusti Eccles. Scotiaca, i, 673.

Cleland, George (2), a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1671; was appointed minister at Durruslee in 1679, and died before Dec. 19, 1683, aged about thirty-three years. See Fusti Eccles. Scotiaca, i, 673.

Cleland, John (1), a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1633; was licensed to preach in 1638; presented to the living at Stow in 1640, and ordained; joined the pastors in 1651, and died in August, 1655, aged about fifty-two years. See Fusti Eccles. Scotiaca, i, 533.

Cleland, John (2), a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1662; admitted to the living at Midldiebie in 1663; transferred to Traquair in 1666, and died before May 8, 1672. See Fusti Eccles. Scotiaca, i, 537, 623.

Cleland or Clelland, Joseph, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Glasgow University in 1613; was licensed to preach in 1614; removed to Wigtown in 1616; was appointed to the living at Kirkcown in 1627, and continued in 1641. See Fusti Eccles. Scotiaca, i, 733.

Cleland, Robert, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1601; was licensed to preach in 1605; called to the presbytery in 1606, and ordained; transferred to Kirkmarnock in 1700, and died in August, 1711, aged about forty years. See Fusi- ti Eccles. Scotiaca, ii, 441, 453.

Cleland, Thomas, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Glasgow University in 1725; became tutor to John Maxwell, and afterwards chaplain to lady Stew- art; was licensed to preach in 1744; called to the living at Cambusochan in 1738, and ordained in 1739; transferred to Stirling in 1763, and died July 31, 1769, aged sixty-three years. See Fusti Eccles. Scotiaca, ii, 575, 576.

Cleland, Thomas Horace, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Glasgow, K.Y., in 1819. He graduated at Centre College in 1840, at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1841, and was licensed to preach by the Trans- vanian Presbytery in April, 1846. The same year he went to Louisiana, and became a stated supply at Lake Providence; in 1854 removed to Natchez, Miss., and for one year supplied the Church at Pine Ridge, in that vicinity; also supplied Union Church for one or two years, and afterwards the Second Church in Natchez for several years. After the civil war he was principal of the Fayette Female Academy. In 1868 he returned to Ken- tucky, but in 1871 settled at Delhi, La., becoming a member of the Presbytery of Red River. At Delhi he acted as stated supply to the Church, and established a private school; also preached frequently at Tal- lulah and other places. He died Feb. 17, 1878. Mr. Cleland was a faithful and useful preacher, and a success- ful teacher. See Ncsv. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem., 1876, p. 28.

Clément, Joseph Guillaume, a French theologian, was born at Havre, Oct. 9, 1717. He was successively pastor of St. Claude, Rouen, grand-vicar of Poiets, and prior of St. Martin de Machecoul, and died Aug. 6, 1792, leaving Défense des Liens de l'Ancien Testament (Paris, 1748): Les Caractères du Messie Vérifiables en Jésus-Christ (ibid. 1776, 2 vols. 8vo.): La Authenticit de la Nouvelle que de l'Ancien Testament (ibid. 1782); reprinted under the title, Réfutation de la Bible expliquée, de Voltaire, etc. (Nancy, 1826, 12mo.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Clémenceau, Charles, a French Benedictine of the congregation of St. Maur, was born about 1704 at Pain- blanc, in Autun; joined his order in 1728 at Vendôme, and died at the monastery of Sainte-Manteau, in Paris, April 5, 1778. His chief productions are, L'Art des Vérifier les Dates, etc. (Paris, 1750; an important work, conceived and imperfectly executed by Maurice d'An- tine, revised by Clémenceau, and completed by François Clement) —Histoire Générale de Port-Royal (Amster- dam, 1755). —Histoire Générale des Écrivains de Port-Royal (ibid. 1770). See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Clemency (or Mercy) was defined by the Greeks, and had an altar in Athens, erected by the kindred of Hercules; and a temple dedicated to her by order of the Roman senate, after the death of Julius Caesar, on some of whose deities this goddess appears. The poets describe her as the guardian of the world, and picture her as holding a branch of laurel, or olive, and a spear, to show that gentleness and pity ought principally to distinguish victorious warriors. The Greeks and Ro- mans gave the name of asylum to the temples they erected to this goddess.

Clemens is the name of several early Christians:

1. Flavius, son of Dabianus, brother of the emperor Vespasian, and therefore first cousin of Domitian, whose niece, Flavia Domitilla, was his wife. Flavius Clemens held the consulate in A.D. 95, and had just resigned the office when he and his wife were arrested and con- victed on the charges of "atheism," undoubtedly refer- ring to Christianity. They were accused, according to Dio Cassius, of "judaising:" from which, in the popular mind, Christianity was hardly distinguishable. Clemens suffered death, and his wife, Domitilla, was banished to one of the islands off the west coast of Italy (Sueton. Domit. § 15; Dio Cassius, Hist. liv. xiv, 14; Meri- cule, Romana Under the Empire, vii, 383; Lightfoot, Philippuses, p. 22). See Domitilla.

2. Bishop of Ampurias and martyr under Diocletian and Maximian, A.D. 296; commemorated Jan. 23. He is said to have been the son of a heathen father and a Christian mother, Euphrasie, who prophesied his mar- tyrdom. The name relating to him is very doubtful (Tillemon, Memoires, v (162).

3. A Greek historian and chronologer. His date is very uncertain, but probably he lived in the 5th cen- tury.

4. One of the Irish missionaries who opposed St. Boniface while enforcing submission to the papal au- thority in Germany, as part of the Christian law. Cle- ment, and Adelbert, a Frankish bishop, were condemned and excommunicated at a Roman synod held in 745 or 748 by pope Zachary at the instigation of Boniface. Clement probably died in prison (Neander, Ch. Hist., v, 77 sq.; Boniface, Op. I., pass.; Monheitem, Eccles. Hist. per. i, cent. viii, c. 5; Wright, Biog. Brit. Lit. p. 392, 397).

5. A Hibernian or Scot, who went over to Gaul about the beginning of Charlemagne's reign (A.D. 772), and was well received by that monarch. St. Clemens was intrusted with the education of boys of all classes, and was made responsible to the king for their progress.
But little is known of him except that the fame of his name attracted scholars even from Germany. The thief to the court visited this same man's village of St. Gall, in his two books, De Gestis Caroli Magn., in Canisius, Antiqu. Lect. ii, pt. iii, 57. He is commemorated March 20.

Clemens, Franz Jakob, a Roman Catholic philosopher of Germany, was born in 1815 at Coblenz.
He studied at Bonn and Berlin from 1834 to 1838, and was made doctor of philosophy at the latter place in 1839. In 1840 he earned his philosophical lectures at Bonn. In 1853 he opposed the school of the famous philosopher Gtianther, and the result was that in 1857 the Gtiantherian philosophy was condemned by the pope, as twenty years before the Hermesian system was stigmatized. Clemens was called to Münster as professor of philosophy in 1855, and died at Rome, Feb.
24, 1862. He published, De Philosophia Anazagateri-Clazuamenti (Bonn, 1840):—Giovanndi Bruno und Nicolaus von Cusa (ibid. 1847):—De Scholastikorum Sententia, Philosophiam esse Theologia Ancillam (Münster, 1856):—Der heilige Rock zu Trier and die protestan-tische Kirche (Bonn, 1845).—Die Wahrheit con-mem von Herrn J. v. Kuhn in Tübingen angeregter Streit

Clemens, John W., a German Reformed minister, was born at New Berlin, Union Co., Pa., Jan. 27, 1858. In 1866 he was licensed and ordained at Little-town, Adams Co., Pa.; became pastor at St. Clair, Schuylkill Co., in 1868, and in 1871 at Goudyham, where he remained until his death, Sept. 11, 1880. See Har-

Clemens, William, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Wheeling, West Va., Sept. 13, 1825. He converted in 1843, and joined the First Presbyterian Church of Wheeling; graduated from Washington College, Washington, Pa., in 1850, and from Princeton Theo logical Seminary in 1853. He was licensed by the Washington Presbytery the same year, and sent as a missionary to the western coast of Africa, where he spent the remainder of his life. He died at sea, June 24, 1862. Mr. Clemens was a man of great humility, and was devoted to his work. See Wilson, Pres. Hist.
Auction, 1869, p. 149.

Clemens, a Scotch prelate, was a Dominican friar, and was consecrated to the see of Dunblane in 1233.
He probably died in 1238. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 172.

Clement, Augustin Jean Charles, a French prelate and canon, was born at Creteil in 1717. He was ordained at Auxerre, and became treasurer of the Church there. Clement favored the views of the Port-Royalists: he was made bishop of the see of Pontoise 1726 male his first journey to Holland in their cause. In 1755 he was elected deputy for the provincial assembly of Sens. From 1758 to 1768 he travelled in Spain, Holland, and Italy, in order to propagate his religious ideas. In 1768 he resigned his treasurership and retired to Livry, which, however, did not save him from being incarcerated in 1724. In 1797 he died, March 13, 1804, leaving, Mémoire sur le Rang que Tiennent les Chiffre dans l'Ordre Ecclésiastique (1779):—Lettres à l'Auteur (Larrièrre) des Observations sur le Nouveau Régime in Paris (1787, 18mo).

rale, s. v.

Clement, Claude, a French theologian, was born at Ormains-sur-le-Loué (Franche-Comté). He entered the order of the Jesuits in 1012, and taught rhetoric at Lyons, and became professor of philosophy in the university of Paris. Here he was sent to stochastic school.
His writings show that he was professor of polite literature, spending his leisure hours in the study of theology and archeology. He died at Madrid in 1642, leaving, Clemens IV, etc. (Lyons, 1623, 1624, 12mo).—Bibliotheca Lugdunensise, etc. (ibid. 1628, 8vo).—Bibliotheca Escorialia, etc. (ibid. 1635, 4to).—Chronologia et Theologiae Tablesspanis, etc. (Madrid, 1634; Spanish.
Madrid, 1643; Mayence and Valence, 1669). See Hoefer, Clement, Denis Xavier, a French ecclesiastic, was born at Dijon, Oct. 6, 1706. He was doctor of theology and abbot of Marcheronaux. Stanislaus, king of Poland, took him as his preacher, and he was also confer to the court of Louis XV. He received, in his old age, the deanery of Ligny, and died March 7, 1777, leaving, Entretiens de l'âne, etc. (Paris, 1740):—Oraison Funebre de la Reine de Suideine (ibid. 1741):—

Clement, Edwin, a Methodist Episcopcal minister, was born at Red Hook, N. Y., April 13, 1802. He was converted at nineteen, while a student at the New York Conference Seminary; served the Church as class-leader and local preacher; in 1855 entered the New York Conference; and died Feb. 20, 1877. Clement's strong characteristics were great promptness, excellency as a preacher, and piety as a man. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1877, p. 45.

Clément, François, a learned French historian, was born at Bèze, near Dijon, in 1714. He studied at the college of the Jesuits at Dijon, and became a Benedictine of St. Maur in 1731. At the age of twenty-five he was excommunicated for literary work, and he was to spend ten years. He then entered the house of the Blancs-Manteaux at Paris, and was engaged to continue L'Histoire Littéraire de la France, of which he finished the eighteenth and twelfth volumes, bringing it down to the year 1167. Clément rendered to chronology a service none too important. Maurice de Sade had conceived the idea of a large work, entitled L'Art de Vérifier les Dates, the object of which was to prove in an exact manner the dates of historical facts; but his chronology was full of errors and omissions. Clément (q. v.) executed this task more completely, and Clément issued a new edition much superior to either of the old.
The first volume appeared in 1783, the second in 1744, and the third in 1767; the tables were added in 1792.
This grand work, the fruit of thirteen years' assiduous labor, is one of the greatest monuments of scholarship of that time. The king recompensed Clément by appointing him official historian of France, and the accuplication of inscriptions admitted him in 1785 to the number of its associated members. The revolution having destroyed the religious communities, had also interrupted the scientific works of the Benedictines. Clément retired to the house of his nephew, Duboy-Laverm, director of the national printing, where, in spite of advanced age, he occupied himself with the duties of a perfect scholar.
He had revised a large part of it, when he was attacked by apoplexy, and died March 29, 1788. M.
Viton de Saint-Alais, who had bought the MS., published a new edition of the work, with the continuation (1819, 1919, 10 vols. 8vo.; or 5 vols. 4to); but this edition is less exact than the Précis de Précis. Clément also published the posthumous work of Clément containing the Clement Henry, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in London, England, and emigrated to western New York in his boyhood. He was converted in early life; graduated at Genesee College; taught school several years in a United States Bible School; and in 1860, he received the degree of Doctor of Divinity. In 1863 he was admitted into the Virginia Church, and appointed to Rockbridge Circuit. His subsequent stations were Highland, Pocahontas, Herndon, Lesburg, Rockbridge, Rockingham, and Amherst. He died suddenly, Feb. 9, 1880. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1880, p. 18.

Clement, John, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Great Britain. On his emigration to America, his credentials were approved by the synod of Virginia, Sept. 18, 1718. He received a call from Pocomoke, Va., and was ordained in June, 1719, but before a year complaint was made to the synod, and that body suspended him. On his full confession, suspension was removed, and he was restored to his pastoral charge at Chester, N. J., and at Gloucester and Phipsgrove; but he was again suspended, and no further mention is made of him. See Webster, Hist. of the Preb. Church in America, 1857.

Clement, Jonathan, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Danville, Va., June 20, 1797. After graduating in 1818 from Middlebury College, he studied theology two years at Andover, and from 1836 to 1838 was an itinerant preacher in Painesville, Ohio. He was ordained pastor in Chester, N. H., Oct. 13, 1838, and was dismissed Sept. 10, 1845. From Feb. 3, 1847, to May 19, 1852, he was pastor in Topsfield, Mass.; and from July 14, 1852, to June 12, 1867, in Woodstock, Vt. After he resided in Norwich, Conn., and supplied the Quebec Church, Clement returned from France in 1874 and died Sept. 6, 1881. He published several Addresses and Sermons. See Cong. Year-book, 1882, p. 25.

Clement, Joshua, a Baptist minister, was born at Hopkinton, N. H., in May, 1803, and united with the Church in that place at an early age. He was ordained at Dorchester about 1833, and preached in the states of Vermont and New Hampshire nearly fifty years. He was an innovation Dec. 19, 1803, but was ordained in Painsville, Ohio. He was ordained pastor in Chester, N. H., which he resigned in 1873. He preached his last sermon at Courtenay, Mass., in April, 1883, and died at Chester, June 29, following. See The Watchman, July 12, 1883. (J. C. S.)

Clémence (de Bavière), Marie Hyacinthe, a Belgian prelate, was born at Brussels Aug. 16, 1700, and studied at Rome under the direction of Clement XI. He was nominated coadjutor of the bishop of Liege in 1713, and was consecrated bishop of Münster and Paderborn in March, 1719. He signed the death of his uncle, Joseph Clement, whose coadjutor he had been, having left the see of Cologne vacant, he took possession of it in 1723, and in the spring of 1724 was elected bishop of Hildesheim, and consecrated Nov. 10, 1727. The bishopric of Osnabruck was given to him Nov. 4, 1728, and on July 17 he was elected grand master of the order of Teutonic Knights. After the death of the emperor Charles VI of Germany, in 1740, Clément supported the pretensions of Charles Albert, elector of Bavaria, to the empire, and, on Jan. 24, 1742, crowned him emperor at Frankfurt. The Austrian army was victorious, and Clément made peace with Maria Theresa. In 1748 he assisted at the coronation of Francis of Lorraine. In 1750 he projected a journey to Bavaria, but on the way he died suddenly at Treves, Feb. 5, 1751. This prelate had for his motto, "Non mihi, sed populo," and he justified it by the good which he did to his diocese. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Clement, Tisdale S., a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Monroe, Me., Dec. 8, 1810. He united with the Church in 1824; was licensed June, 1849, and ordained in June, 1850. For several years he was pastor in his native town; in 1863, removed to Exeter; after a three years' pastorate in that place, went to Plymouth, and, during his residence there, he preached a part of the time for the Unity, Dixmont, and Carmel churches. In the spring of 1869 he took charge of a mission society in South Brooklyn, which was soon organized into a church. In 1873 he is reported to Richmond Corner, Me., and in 1875 to Lewiston, where he died, July 12, 1881. His ministry was very successful. See Morning Star, June 14, 1882. (J. C. S.)

Clementi, Prospero, an eminent Italian sculptor, was born at Reggio about 1654. Among his principal works was the tomb of the Prati family, in the cathedral at Parme; the tomb of G. Androni, bishop of Mantua, in the cathedral of that city. In the cathedral of Reggio are two admirable statues of Adam and Eve. He died in 1584. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Clementinus was a martyr at Hercules, commemorated Nov. 14 in Usuard's and the Hieronymian martyrology.

Clements, Castor, an Irish Wesleyan minister, commenced his ministry in 1804, and continued for twenty-six years. He became a superannuate in 1830, residing in Lifford. Pursuing to remove his family to America, he sailed from Liverpool on Feb. 11, 1837, but the vessel was wrecked on theIrish coast, and all on board were lost. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1837.

Clemm, Heinrich Wilhelm, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Dec. 31, 1725, at Holben-Aseberg. He studied at Tübingen, was in 1754 professor and preacher at Belsenhausen, in 1761 professor at the gymnasiun in Stuttgart, and in 1767 at Tübingen, where he died, July 28, 1775. He wrote, De Limitibus Creaturarum (Tübingen, 1745); — Ob die Heil. Schriften Duns- kel und Zwecklos (ibid. 1753); — Versuch einer Kritischen Geschichte der Hebr. Sprache (ibid. cod.); — Vollständige Einführung in die Religion und Gesamte Theologie (1745-47, 7 vols.). — Die de Origine et Significacione Vocabulorum (ibid. 1767); — Die de Proph. und Propheten der Welt, eine Exegetische, mit etc. (ibid. cod.); — DIsqui Nuncio Verbum Roman. zi, 5, Indicator (ibid. 1771), etc. See Moser, Württem. Clendinnen, John C., an Irish Wesleyan minister, was born in County Down in 1770, of Presbyterian parents. He entered the work in 1786; endured hardship during the rebellion of 1788; labored long and faithfully; became a superannuate in 1831, residing first at Newtownburn and then (1841) at Bideford, where he died, June 6, 1853. He was humble, long-suffering, gentle, and meek. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1855; Welth. Muth. Magazine, 1855, p. 854; Stevenson, The Methodist Hymn-book and its Associations (Lond. 1870, 12mo.), p. 258.

Clenny, Parkly W., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Anson County, N. C., Oct. 17, 1812. He was converted in 1829, and admitted into the South Carolina Conference in 1832, in which he labored with zeal and fidelity until his death, Oct. 5, 1835. He was deeply pious. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1836, p. 406.

Cleobians. In a fragment of Hesegippos preserved by Eusebius (II. F. iv. 22), we have an enumeration of some of the earliest hetereics: "Simon, whence are the Simonians; Cleobius, whence the Cleobians (Kla-

of apotheosis, etc. Cleobius is rarely mentioned by ecclesiastical writers. He, together with Simon, is accused of the forgery of apocryphal books (Ap. Const. vi, 16). Pseudo-Chrysostom, in the 48th homily on St. Matthew (vol. vi, p. cxxxii), names Dositheus, Simon, and Cleobius among the false teachers who came in the name of Christ in fulfilment of our Lord's prophecy (Matt. xxiv, 5).

Cleobius is a person (different from the one named in the foregoing article) mentioned in the legendary life of Epiphanius (Haer. ii, 290) as his instructor in Christian doctrine.

Cleobulus. See CLAUDIUS (1).

Cleoménēs, a teacher of Patristian doctrines at Rome in the beginning of the 3rd century, under the episcopate of Zephyrinus, who tolerated him in the Church. Hippolytus states that Cleomenes learned these doctrines from Epiponus, a disciple of Noetus, who had brought them to Rome (Refut. 2, 3, 7; 10; x, 27).

Cleonices, martyred A.D. 296, is commemorated in the Byzantine calendar on March 3.

Cleophas, a martyr at Emmaus, is commemorated Sept. 25 in the old Roman and Usuardi's martyrologies.

Cleophas, George, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1668; was licensed to preach in 1671, and ordained minister at Newtyle in 1689. The former minister, who had been deprived for not praying for the king and queen, opened a meeting-house, and nearly all the families in the parish sympathized with him and attended his ministry. The newly appointed minister, therefore, could not get many hearers, nor could he hold a kirk session, nor administer the Lord's Supper with decency, and at length, during the rebellion of 1715, he was stopped on the way to church by the army and had to flee for safety. He subsequently returned when order was restored, the former incumbent having left the parish; the people gathered round him, and, with prudence and patience, he won their confidence and became to them a useful, efficient, and faithful minister. He died Jan. 27, 1780, aged about sixty-six years. See Forsi Eccles. Scotiae, iii, 757, 758.

Cleophane, Thomas (1), a Scotch clergyman, brother of the minister who was persecuted at Newtyle, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1693; was licensed to preach in 1702; appointed minister at Kirkcolm in 1704, and ordained; and died in April, 1712, aged about thirty-nine years. See Forsi Eccles. Scotiae, iii, 758.

Cleophane, Thomas (2), a Scotch clergyman, son of the minister at Newtyle, was born Dec. 28, 1700; licensed to preach in 1730, and the same year succeeded his father in the living at Newtyle; was ordained in 1731, and died Oct. 8, 1769, aged sixty-eight years. See Forsi Eccles. Scotiae, iii, 758.

Clapper (or Clappe) was a wooden rattle, anciently used to summon the faithful to church on the three last days of Holy Week, when it was customary for the church bells to remain silent. Anthony Wood, in his MS. Notes on the Oxfordshire Churchers, mentions one that in his day remained at Thame, in that county, of which, however, no trace is now discovered.

Clerc, Christian le, a famous French missionary, was born in 1531, and was for thirty-two years (from 1573 to 1605) in Canada, as the author of Premier établissement de la Foi dans la Nouvelle France, etc. (Paris, 1691, 2 vols.) —Nouvelle Relat. de la Guerre, etc. (1692). Clerc or Kierch, Henri van, a Belgian historical painter, was born at Brussels in 1570, and probably studied under Van Balen. He painted several large works for the churches of the Low Countries. In the Church of St. James at Brussels there is a fine picture of The Crucifixion, and in the Church of Our Lady are two admirable pictures, representing The Holy Family and The Resurrection. See Spooner, Biol. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Clerc, Sebastian le, an eminent French designer and engraver, was born at Metz, in Lorraine, in 1617. The following are his best works: The Call of Abraham; The Prophet Elzaphen Sleeps; The Holy Virgins: The Statue of Stephen; St. John at the Tide; The Annunciation; The Penitence of the Nuns; The Adoration of the Magi. He died in 1714. See Spooner, Biol. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Clerici Acepthili, a name given to vagrant clerks in the Roman Church, or such ecclesiastics and monks as wander about from one district to another. In 860 the Council of Pavia issued an edict against them.

Clericus Lactos is the title of a bull issued by Boniface VIII in the year 1296, pronouncing all princes and nobles under ban who demanded tributes under any form from the Church and clergy, and placing under the same condemnation all who paid such tributes. This bull was aimed at Philip the Fair, of France, who demanded tribute of the clergy, in common with all other classes, should contribute money towards defraying the expenses of his wars.

Clericus, David, a Reformed theologian of Switzerland, was born at Geneva, Feb. 19, 1561. He studied in Germany, Holland, and England. After his return to his native place, he was appointed, in 1592, professor of Oriental languages and history, and died in 1655. He wrote Questiones Sacrae in Quibus Multa Ser. Loca Varrorique Lingua S. Idiomatia Explicatur (edited by J. Clericus, Amst. 1685). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 189; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B.P.)

Clerk, Alan, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1627; was presented to the living at Glenelg in 1641, but served Knowlart in 1642. The synod enjoined him in 1649 to attend synod twice a year. He continued in November, 1681, but the parish was vacant in 1689. See Forsi Eccles. Scotiae, iii, 101.

Clerk, Alexander (1), a Scotch clergyman, was appointed a reader in 1659; promoted to be an exhorter, presented to the living at Laggan in 1674, and died before Nov. 6, 1675. See Forsi Eccles. Scotiae, iii, 117.

Clerk, Alexander (2), a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1657; was presented to the living at Glenelg in 1661, but served Knowlart in 1642. The synod enjoined him in 1649 to attend synod twice a year. He continued in November, 1681, but the parish was vacant in 1689. See Forsi Eccles. Scotiae, iii, 117.

Clerk, Alexander (3), a Scotch clergyman, was born in 1621; was admitted to the living at Latheron in 1652; transferred to second charge at Inverness in 1663; promoted to the first charge in 1674, and died in September, 1693, aged about fifty-eight years. See Forsi Eccles. Scotiae, iii, 253, 257, 368.

Clerk, Alexander (4), a Scotch clergyman, was born in 1621; was admitted to the living at Latheron in 1652; transferred to second charge at Inverness in 1663; promoted to the first charge in 1674, and died in September, 1693, aged about fifty-eight years. See Forsi Eccles. Scotiae, iii, 253, 257, 368.

nished in 1839, and admitted in 1840; to Ardnamurchan in 1841, and to Kilmalle in 1844. There is no further record of him. See Fasti Eccles. Scottiani, iii. 55.

Clerk, David, a Scotch clergyman, was presented to the living at Maxton in 1770, and ordained, and died Jan. 13, 1776. See Fasti Eccles. Scottiani, i, 557.

Clerk, Fargubard, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1826; was the first minister who visited Stornoway to establish a mission, the inhabitants being strangers to the gospel, and only a few under the age of forty having been baptized; was admitted in 1844 and continued in 1843. See Fasti Eccles. Scottiani, iii, 144.

Clerk, George, a Scotch clergyman, native of Buchan, studied at King’s College, Aberdeen, in 1661; obtained license to preach in 1668; was admitted to the living at Logie-Durno (now Chapel-Garioch) prior to 1685, and was deposed in 1702 for negligence. See Fasti Eccles. Scottiani, iii, 575.

Clerk, Gilbert, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the Edinburgh University in 1816; was licensed to preach in 1825; admitted to the living at New Deer in 1834, amid very violent opposition, and continued in October, 1838. See Fasti Eccles. Scottiani, iii, 631.

Clerk, Jean, a French martyr, was born at Beaumetz, on the Marne. There he was arrested in 1528 for putting upon the church door a paper against indulgences, in which he called the pope Antichrist; for this he was whipped and sentenced to death. On the 18th of September 1530, he was whipped to death. Afterwards he went to Rosia, in Bray, and from thence removed to Metz, in Lorraine, where he broke the papal images which the people were about to worship, and, being arrested, confessed the fact. He was brought before the judge, and his hand was cut off; then his nose was torn from his face; after that both his arms and legs were likewise plucked out. His mutilated body was then committed to the fire and consumed, in 1524. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 961.

Clerk (or Clerke), John (1), D.D., an English prelate, was made dean of Windsor in 1570, and promoted to the see of Bath and Wells March 29, 1583. He died Jan. 3, 1581. He presented to Leo X the treaty of Henry VIII against Luther, under the title Oratio ad Leonem X in Exhibitione Libelli Regni Henrici VIII Contra Lutherum; cum Papae Responsione, etc. (London, 1521). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, a. v.

Clerk, John (2), a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the Glasgow University in 1805; was licensed to preach the same year; called to the living at Monzie in 1809, and continued there in 1808. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiian, ii, 775, 774.

Clerk, John (3), a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1806; was appointed to the living at Forteviot in 1819; transferred to Monzie about 1820, and to Auchterarder in 1835, where he continued in 1839. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticani, ii, 610, 716, 798.

Clerk, Pierre, a French martyr, did much good in reforming the Church in Meaux, of which he was afterwards chosen pastor. He began preaching to twenty persons, but his congregation soon grew to three hundred. As soon as the priests of Paris heard of their 4 meetings, they came to him, and took them by force to Paris, sixty-two men and women being bound and marched the whole way. They, however, sang psalms continually, to the disgust of their adversaries. Chief among these captives was Pierre Clerk, who, with the rest, was racked, and then burned at Meaux in 1546. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiian, iv, 431.

Clerk, William (1), a Scotch clergyman, was appointed to the living at Anstruther in 1565 as the first minister of the Protestant religion; in 1567 Kilkenny was also in his charge, and in 1574 Abercornay was added. He died February 1583. He was a man of most happy memory for godliness, wisdom, and love of his flock, the light and life of his parish, and beloved of all sorts of persons. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticani, ii, 406.

Clerk, William (2), a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1589; was presented as the first Protestant minister at Caver in 1591, admitted in 1591, transferred to Wilson in 1602, and died before April 30, 1641. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticani, i, 489, 516.

Clerk-ales is a name for a feast in which, when the clerk’s wages were small, the richer parishioners sent in provisions for a banquet.

Clerks of the Closet is the title of the confessor to the sovereign, whose office it is to attend during divine service, to resolve all doubts respecting spiritual matters, and to wait in the private oratory or closet, where the chaplains in turn say prayers.

Clerks of the Vestry (or Vestibule) were men in charge of the sacristy, with the furniture for highmass, and the cope. At Durham they slept at night over the west end of the vestry, and, with two others, acted as bell-ringers. The latter slept in a smaller chamber opposite the sacristan’s office in the north alley. There were three clerks of the vestibule at York.

Clermont, Councils of (Concilium Clermontum). Of these there were two, which are sometimes also called Councils of Aachen, because they were held somewhere in that French province. They were provincial in their jurisdiction. See GALESIUS, COUNCILS.

I. Held on Nov, 8, 853. Honoratus, archbishop of Bourges, presiding over fourteen other bishops. Sixteen canons were published.

2. Deprives of communion those who endeavor to get themselves appoited to bishoprics by the influence of persons in authority, or by artifice, or for the protection of others, declares that those persons shall be consecrated who have been duly elected by the clergy and people, with consent of the metropolitan.

3. Forbids to lend the ornaments of the Church upon occasion of wedding festivities, and the like.

4. Directs that the priests who serve chapels in the country shall come together to celebrate the principal festivals with their bishop.

See Labbe, Concil. iv, 1803.

II. Held in November, 1055, by pope Urban III, at the head of thirteen archbishops, two hundred and five bishops and abbots. Here the crusade was determined upon. Philip I, king of France, who had deserted his lawful wife, and married Bertrade, was a second time excommunicated. The "Trêve de Dieu" was concluded, as the primacy of Lyons; the archbishop of Tours, also, in this council recovered his jurisdiction over Bretagne, and the bishop of Dol, who had the title of archbishop, was compelled to submit to the archbishop of Tours. Lastly, thirty-two canons were published.

5. Declares the days upon which the "Trêve de Dieu" shall be kept, and orders that it shall be observed towards the clergy, monks, and women.

6. Declares that the privilege to deliver Jerusalem, undertaken from motives of piety, supplies the place of every other pittance.

7. Forbids to appoint laymen, or any one under the order of subdeacon, to bishoprics.

8. Forbids the purchase of a benefice of any kind by any person for himself or another; orders that benefices so purchased shall lapse to the bishop to dispose of.

9. Forbids the gift of any fee for burials.

10. Forbids any women, save those permitted by former canons, to dwell in the same house with a clergyman.

11. Forbids consecration of illegitimates.

12 and 14. Forbid pluralities.

15. Forbid the clergy to receive any ecclesiastical profession at the hand of a layman, and kings, etc., to make any such investiture.

16. Forbids the laity to have chaplains independent of the bishop.

38. Forbids to eat flesh from Ash Wednesday to Easter.

24. Directs that holy orders shall be conferred only in the Ember seasons and on Quadragemina Sunday.
Clermont (Tonnerrre), Anne Antoine Jules de, a French prelate, second son of duke Jules Charles Henri, was born in Paris, Jan. 1, 1749. After having studied at the Sorbonne, he was made doctor of that school. He was nominated grand-vicar of Besançon, and shortly afterwards became bishop of Châlons (1782). As a Catholic, he opposed the civil constitution of the clergy, and in 1792 published a letter on the subject, and then retired to Germany. After the concordat he returned to France, in 1820 became archbishop of Toulouse, and in December, 1822, cardinal. In 1829 he published, from Rome, a pastoral letter, extolling the liberty of the Gallican Church, but it was suppressed by a royal decree. He continued, however, his opposition, Charles X interfered, and notified the prelate that he must retire to his diocese. Finally the cardinal ceased his agitation, by the counsel of the holy see. In 1829, notwithstanding his age, he was chosen bishop of Fréjus, and contributed to the election of Pius VIII. On his journey he suffered a fall, in consequence of which he died at Toulouse, Feb. 21, 1830. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Clermont (Tonnerrre), François de (1), bishop of Noyon and peer of France, was born in 1629; studied with the Jesuits at Paris; was made doctor by the Sorbonne; preacher to the court, and bishop in 1661. He was received in 1694 as a member of the Academy of France, and was made a peer of France. He died at Paris, Feb. 5, 1701. See Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Clermont (Tonnerrre), François de (2), bishop and duke of Laugres, nephew of the preceding, was made bishop in 1696, and charged with the funeral sermon of Philip of France, duke of Orleans and brother of Louis XIV. He died March 12, 1724. See Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Cleromancy (from κληρος, a lot, and μαρτιους, divination) is a method of divination by lot, in use among the ancient Greeks and Romans. It was generally performed by casting beans, pebbles, dice, or small bits of various substances into an urn, and drawing them out. By the particular marks on the pieces drawn the diviners were enabled to form their conclusions. Among the Germans (see Tacitus, De Germantia), this kind of divination was practiced by casting small pieces of the twigs of fruit-trees, previously marked, on a white garment, and on removing them the marks were interpreted. After the introduction of Christianity similar practices were continued by using the Bible, opened at random, the passage which first met the eye being regarded as the solution of the difficulty. This custom, however, was condemned by various councils. See DIVINATION.

Clerus (or Clericus). See CLERGY.

Clerus, a deacon and a martyr at Antioch, is commemorated Jan. 7 in the old Roman and Usuard's martyrologies.

Cleia, David Friedrich von, a Protestant theologian of Saxony, was born Feb. 13, 1766, at Calw. He studied at Tübingen, was in 1787 received into the Calv. and Reformed Church at Heidelberg, in 1799 at Göttingen, and in 1807 at Schorndorf. In 1810 he was appointed dean and pastor at Reutlingen, after having been emolobed the previous year, and died Aug. 10, 1810. He published Versuch einer Kirchlich-politischen Landes- und Burgerregierung (Tübingen, 1802). See Düring, Die Gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, i., 257. (B. P.)

Cleia, David Jonathan, a German theologian, father of the preceding, was born Aug. 20, 1731, at Rommelshausen. He studied at Tübingen, was in 1761 deacon at Calw, in 1782 dean at Wildberg, and in 1790 at Göttingen, and died March 6, 1800. He wrote, Dias, de ec, quod Justinus est Clerus (Tübingen, 1774): —Verzeichnis der Pettenfutten in Breslauer (ibid. 1778). See Düring, Die Gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, i., 258; Winer, Handbuch der theolog Litt., i., 444. (B. P.)

Cleia, Valentine, a German theologian, who flourished early in the 17th century, is entitled Admirabilis doctor, and Operum Poeticorum Paralipomenon (Gera, 1607, 8vo); —Weeks- and Belfegoecklein in Kriegsfahr (Leips. 1622). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cletia, in Greek mythology, was one of the two ancient graces, whom alone the Greeks at first knew; the other was called Phaetho.

Cleveland, Aaron, a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born at Cambridge, Mass., Oct. 19, 1733. He graduated from Harvard College in 1753, and in July, 1758, was ordained pastor of the Congregational Church in Haddam, Conn., from which he was dismissed in 1746, partly because of the deficiency in his support, and partly because some were offended with the fervency of his preaching. In 1747 he accepted a call from the South Precinct Congregational Church in Malden, Mass., which he remained there the next five and half years. In 1750 he took charge of a small Congregational Church in Halifax, N. S. In consequence of a change in his theological views, he resigned his charge and sailed for Boston in 1754. Shortly afterwards he went to England, was ordained by the bishop of London in 1755, and was sent by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts to Sussex County, Del. The vessel in which he sailed was wrecked upon Nantucket shoals, and he was detained by personal injuries for some time at Norwich, Conn. On reaching Lewes, Del., he found his parish so feeble that the society, in 1757, transferred him to the vacant parish at New Castle, but he died on the way, Aug. 11, 1757. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v. 184.

Cleveland, Charles, a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at Guilford, Conn., June 24, 1804. He graduated from Middlebury College in 1821, studied theology at Andover, Mass., and at Princeton, N. J., completing his studies at Alexandria, Va.; was ordained deacon in 1829, and presbyter in 1833. Physical infirmity prevented him fulfilling his purpose of going as a missionary to the Africans; but he went to Washington, D. C, where he formed an African educational society. So much opposition was developed against the project which he finally abandoned it, and became rector of Trinity Church, Shelburne, Vt., in 1840, re-

Clichy, Councils of (Concilium Clippicense), near Paris; provincial: (1) Summoned by Lothaire II, in 628, but nothing more is known of it; (2) Held A.D. 635, in the presence of Dagobert, respecting the sanctity of St. Denis; (3) Held in 636; (4) Held A.D. 635, in which the king confirmed certain privileges to St. Denis.

Clisdaill, George, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Glasgow University in 1600; was licensed to preach in 1602; presented to the living at Glasford in 1607, and died in January, 1627, aged about fifty-seven years. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiace, ii, 284.

Clisdale, James, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1738; became chaplain to the earl of Lauderdale; was called to the living at Kilcombre in 1739, and ordained. He died March 33, 1759, aged forty-six years. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiace, ii, 438.

Cliffe, William, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was a native of England. He was a local preacher in the Primitive Methodist Church; came to America in 1840; joined the Methodist Episcopal Church soon after his arrival. In 1843 entered the clerical line. In 1853, in which he served the Church as an efficient minister, twenty-three years, eight of them as presiding elder. He died suddenly, Sept. 17, 1866. Mr. Cliffe was a good preacher, and a Christian gentleman. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1866, p. 219.

Clifford, Zelotes S., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in New Hampshire in 1815. He removed westward, and gave up his religion; received a very limited education; experienced conversion in 1840, and in 1843 entered the Indiana Conference. In 1860 he was transferred to the Southern Illinois Conference. He joined the 29th Regiment of Illinois Volunteers in 1861, and was appointed chaplain, in which capacity he served three years. He entered the effective ranks, labored four years, then became supernumerary, and died Oct. 28, 1872. Mr. Clifford was a man of fine personal appearance, an able minister, and a true friend. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1873, p. 137.

Cliff, Zenas, an English Baptist minister, fourth son of Rev. William Cliff, was born near Westbury, Wiltshire, Feb. 2, 1743. In 1809 he received a license from the Church of which he was a member, to preach in the villages near his home. He became pastor of the Church at Crocketton, Wiltz, and for twenty years walked five miles regularly to his place of worship every Sunday. He died Dec. 20, 1862. See (Lond.) Baptizat Hist-book, 1864, p. 118. (J. C. S.)

Climent, Josep, a Spanish prelate, was born March 21, 1706, at Castellon de la Plana, Valencia. He studied in his native town, and was made doctor of theology there. Immediately afterwards he was appointed successively professor of philosophy at the university, curate and theologian of the cathedral, and in 1766 was called to the bishopric of Barcino. Having become the object of royal jealousy, he resigned in 1775, and died in his native town, Nov. 25, 1781. He translated into Spanish Fléury’s Mesures des Israélites et des Chrétiens, and published also Instructions on Marriage, written by Le Tourneur, and translated by the countes de Montijo, etc. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Climie, John, a Canadian Congregational minister, was born at Cambuslang, near Glasgow, Feb. 19, 1867. He emigrated to Dallhouse, Ontario, in 1829; and in 1833 removed to Mimisul, near Lake Simcoe, where he was converted, and devoted himself to the ministry. He preached successfully at Mimisul, two years at Scott's Corners, and thirteen years at Boylevale; resigned the ministry in 1856, established a printing-office, and started the Canadian Statesman. In 1857 Mr. Climie removed to Belleville, where he died, Aug. 5, 1867. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1868, p. 262.
CINCLAMP, GERVAS GIANCOLET DE, a French prelate, born in the early part of the 18th century, of noble parentage. Having been by turns archdeacon of Maye, canon of Notre-Dame, he was made cardinal, with the title of St. Silvestre, and of St. Martin des Montagnes, April 12, 1281. He died at Rome of the plague in 1287, leaving two letters of which one was printed in the Speculum Carmelitanae, i, 90, and the other in the Bullarium Carmelitanae. See Hoefer, Nouv. Ann. Eras. Not. Suppl., p. 70.

Clint, DAVID, a Lutheran minister, was connected with the synod of New York and New Jersey, for thirteen years was pastor of the Lutheran Church at Spruce Run, N. J., and died there Nov. 5, 1877. See Lutheran Observer, Nov. 30, 1877.

Clinet, NICOLAS, a French martyr, was a schoolmaster at Saintonge, and an elder of the Church in Paris. He was suspected by the judges of being a minister, and entered the Most Catholic Church, Dr. Mai's, of the Sorbonne. He was burned at Paris in 1558. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 431.

Cling, CONRAD, a Franciscan monk of Germany, and preacher at Erfurt, where he died, March 10, 1566, is remarkable as being the only priest who kept up the religious services of his Church at a time when the Roman churches were deserted and the people eagerly listened to evangelical truth, as preached by the Reformers and their disciples. He wrote, De Securitate Catholiciorum Concussione in Rebus Fidei: — Consistitio Mediationum a Lutheranis Adhereas Librum Imperii seu Intern. Editorum: — Locis Communes Theologici pro Ecclesia Catholica: — Summa Doctrinae Christianae Catholicae. See Molchesmann, Expositor, Libriam; Jocher, Allgemeine Geschichte der Lektion, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Bioi. Generale, s. v. (B. P.)

Clinton, George H., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in St. Helena Parish, La., Jan. 7, 1835. He was converted at the family altar in his fourteenth year; graduated with honors at Centenary College, Jackson, La., in 1853, and in the following year entered the Missionary Conference. In 1858 he was transferred to the St. Louis Conference, but early in 1870 was obliged to become a supernumary, and retired to Darlington, La., where he died, Dec. 29, 1870. Mr. Clinton was social and genial, honest and humble, entertaining and successful, energetic and discreet. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1871, p. 599.

Clinton, ISAAC, a Congregational minister, was born at West Milford, near Bridgeport, Conn., Jan. 21, 1789, and served in the revolutionary war. He graduated from Yale College in 1786; studied divinity with a private teacher; was ordained, and installed at Southwick, Mass., Jan. 30, 1788. In 1807 he removed to Lowville, N.Y., as pastor and first principal of the academy, continuing the former relation for ten years. He died there March 18, 1840. While in Southwick he published a work on Infant Baptism, and in his eightieth year he prepared and published a work on a kindred subject. See Prolugium in Central N. Y. p. 500; Hoefer, Nouv. Bioi. Generale, p. 73.

Clinton, OSCAR, a colored Methodist Episcopal minister, was born a slave about 1844. He professed religion in early life, labored some time as local preacher, and in 1871 was admitted into the Alabama Conference. He served the Church faithfully until his death, March 30, 1873. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1873, p. 143.

Clinton, Thomas, a pioneer preacher in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born of Irish parents in Philadelphia, Pa., in January, 1798. He was left an orphan in infancy, but received a careful bringing up in the family of a generous Methodist. In 1800 he removed with his guardian to Charleston, S.C., where he was apprenticed to a brick-mason. In 1808 he was converted, and after spending some time as exhorter and local preacher, he, in 1820, united with the South Carolina Conference, and was sent to the missions on the Mississippi. Of the next six years of his ministerial life, eighteen were spent on circuits, five on colored missions, four on districts, and twenty-nine as a supernumary. He died in St. Helena Parish, La., Oct. 29, 1875. Mr. Clinton was small in person; possessed a clear, full, manly voice; was a close student, and one of the foremost theologians of his conference. In his private life he was very exact and highly exemplary. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1876, p. 201; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Clo, in Greek mythology, is the muse of history, the daughter of Jupiter and Mennosynoe, and, by Pius, the mother of Hycinthus. She is represented as sitting on an ancient chair, her head crowned with laurels, richly dressed. At her feet there stands an open box with rolls of books, and one in her left hand bears the inscription ΚΑΙΔΗ ΙΣΤΟΠΙΑΝ.

Clippioncense, CONCIL. See CLICHT, CONSILIS OF.

Clissold, Henry A.M., a Church of England divine, was born in 1756. He graduated from Exeter College, Oxford, in 1818, and in 1830 was presented by Lord Lyndhurst to the rectory of Chelmondiston, Suffolk, which he held twenty-eight years. Part of the time, in connection with this, he was also for thirty-three years, minister of Stockwell Chapel, Lambeth. Mr. Clissold was best known, however, as one of the leaders of the evangelical party in the Church, and as an author of several excellent religious works of a practical character. He died in London, Jan. 1, 1857. See Appleton's Annual Cyclop. 1867, p. 567.

Clibaex, king of Brecknock about A.D. 482, was the son of Cigwinn. The story is, that as he had resolved upon remaining unmarried, and as he was nevertheless beloved by a noble maiden who rejected all suitors for his sake, one of the courtiers who aspired to her hand was instigated to murder him. He is commemorated as a martyr Aug. 19. See Rees, Wales, p. 818.

Clicaca is a name applied by Gregory the Great to the baptismal font. See Baptism.

Cloeke, JOHN W., an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Pilaton, Cornwall. He entered the ministry in 1808, and labored for thirty-one years, until obliged by paralysis to retire. He died Aug. 7, 1846, aged sixty-seven. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1846.

Clocicher is a French name for a detached campsite. At St. Paul's, London, it contained the mote bell, Antic Figure of Clo.
CLOCK

which summoned the citizens to folknotes, or muster of arms, on their parade ground.

Clock. A mechanical clock was made by Peter de Chalus at Chagny, in the middle of the 14th century. A contemporaneous clock, with automata to strike the hours, formerly at Glasnostyn, is described by Barletta. In the 14th century the abbey of Wallingford gave an astronomical clock to St. Alban's, and in 1324 T. de Louth, treasurer, presented to Lincoln a clock "as was common in cathedrals and the greater conventual churches." At Padua, Bologna, and Paris, church clocks are mentioned of the same date. At Dijon, Wells, and Strasbourg, there are curious processions of little moving figures occurring at the hours, which are struck also by automata. The invention of clocks with a wheel and escapement is attributed variously to Paci- culus, a deacon of Verona, in the 9th century, and to Ger- bert of Rheims, subsequently pope Sylvester II, who died in 993. Clocks to mark the hours in church tower for commencing divine service remain at Toledo, with automata: at Rheims, in the north wing of the transept; at Westminster, in the south wing, near the vestry; and at Beauvais, in the north choir aisle. There is a mechanical clock of 1308 at Lyons. The choir bell or note was formerly hung at the entrance of the choir for the purpose, mentioned by Durandus, of giving due warning, and then the great campana in the belfry and the signa of the tower sounded the summons to the faithful. The choir bell inside the church is also mentioned by Reginald of Durham.

Ciodius, Johann, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Neustadt, Aug. 15, 1645. He studied at Wittenberg; was, in 1672, adjunctus to the philosophical faculty: in 1675 provost and superintendent at Slien; in 1683 doctor of theology; in 1680 superintendent at Grossenhausen, and died June 14, 1723. He wrote several works; such as, Wirthenbock, in 1687, and 1724:—De Spiritus Willisii:—De Trittumiae Dei et Vestillatione Hominis:—Schola Philologica de Copulatis Romanorum Veterum:—De Magia Stygitarum Nebuchadnezzorum, etc. See Jocher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Hoefler, Nouv. Coffan, an early Welsh saint, was patron of Llang- loogau, in Pembrokeshire. See Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 307.

Coggie, William, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1638; was appointed to the second charge at Elgin in 1667; transferred to Inveravon in 1680; to Inverness in 1629, and retained the revenues till the synod of 1624 compelled his dismissal. He removed, but in 1640 a complaint was lodged against him, and, considering himself ill-used, he resigned, and settled at Spynie in 1647. He died Dec. 17, 1671, and was buried without several mourning ceremonies, leaving a son, Alexander, who received a nominal chaplaincy from James VI in 1618. See Fasti Eccles. Scotii- casiae, iii, 155, 172, 221, 253.

Cloisneaux, Charles Edme, a French theologian, was born at Clamency. He joined, in 1664, the Congregation of the Oratory, and became principal of the seminary and grand vicar of Clamoun-sur-Saline, where he died. Nov. 7, 1720. He left 91 Lettres Moralises, trans. from the Italian of Giussano (Lyons, 1665, 4to):—Vie de Francois de Saint-Pierre (1696, 12mo):—Meditations des Prvets Instruct et Aplas la Mesle (Lyons, 1723, 12mo)—Meditations d'une Retraite Ecclésiastique (ibid. 12mo), with some other works which were not published during his lifetime (See Diction. Cloissonné is a French term for the older method of enamelling, where the hollows in the ground were made by thin strips of metal soldered on to it.

Cloister. (Claustrum, an enclosure; Germ. Kranz-gang.) We give additional details on this subject:

"It was known as the laurel court at Peterborough; the palm court, as connected with the ceremonial of Palm Sunday, at Canterbury; and the strawberry bed, as a form of Paradise, as it was called at Chichester and Winchester, having been either filled with earth from the Holy Land, or more probably because strawberries were the first fruits of spring, with the seeds of the resurrection 'harvest.' The enclosed portion of the foreground of the basilica was also called the paradise, and from the surrounding porches the cloister took its origin. Each alley of the quadrangle in a monastery was placed under the protection of the obediency, or officer whose chequer or place of business was assigned to it; it was considered to form part of the church. The general arrangement was fixed, the porches invariably on the side opposite or parallel to the minster; the dormitory on the east, or otherwise on the west; sometimes the latter side was occupied by the guest-house, or the bedchamber of the converts, or lay brothers; a large central space for air, light, and recreation was sometimes in the midst of privacy, and messages communicated with all the principal buildings. The alleys were allotted to different portions of the monks, and next the hall being forbidden to the brethren at most times. The western alley was occupied by the novices, and the northern by the monks. In times of study the eastern side was used at the monastery, and the usual Sabattial, foot-washing. The abbot, or superior, sat next the east door of the cloister, near the entrance of the church. In some monasteries, as Fountains, Benelton, Jor- doshaw, Netley, Stoneleigh, Wroxhall, Kirkstall, and originally at Westminster, there was only one cloister, and in such cases we understand the term, cloister, to mean a building of timber-work, which have long since perished. Other cloisters, as those at Beverley Minster, and the Minster Church of Carlisle, were enriched with a superb series of stained glass, and the transepted vaulting at Gloucester is a marvel of the most elaborate stone-work. At night four lanterns were lighted at the four angles of the cloister, and one in front of the chapter-house door. A procession we hear through the cloister. In the 5th century abbots were frequently buried in the centre of the work.

Many secular cathedrals, as three in Wales, Lichfield, and York, and most collegiate churches, as Southwell, Ripon, and Chester, were provided with cloisters. In many foreign nations, as Maulbronn, Puy, Münster, Caen, Pontigny, Puy-en-Velay, Braga, Bañalba, Segovia, Leon, Toledo, Cadiz, Mexico, Venice, Hamburg, and elsewhere, the cloisters were on the north side, to secure shade in a hot climate, or rather, perhaps, for water-supply and drainage. In the canons of Canterbury, Chester, Middlesbrough, Magdalen College, Oxford, Carmel, St. Mary Overey, St. David's, Tintern, Malmesbury, Milton Abbas, Moyne, Kirkstall, Tewkesbury, and Abingdon, the Dominican churches of Paris, Agen, and Toulose. In some other churches they occupied a lower position, on the north side of the church, and in the cloister of Tarragona and Lincoln, and southward of it at Burgos, Rochester, and Chichester; and at Leirida, Olivenza, and New College, Oxford, a branch of the monastic church.

At Hereford there was a chantry of Our Lady's Abbey, over the vestibule of the chapter-house; and chapels in the cloisters, in some of the large schools of the orders of Cistercians, Hildesheim, and Old St. Paul's, in which masses of requiem were sung for the repose of the souls of persons buried in the church. The cloisters of Pisa, Cividale, and Sublacou, of Zürich, Batalia, Beauport, Fontenelle, and Censor are among the finest foreign examples. At Bamberg there are two cloisters, one on the north and another on the south of the church. At Tarras and Batch are two on the north-east of the church; at Hillesholm the cloister is eastward of it. Sometimes the ordinary fourth ally of the church, as at Evesham, Cantley and Hereford. At Evesham there were, and at Norwich there still exist, rooms over the cloisters. The infirmary in Evesham contains one of its preserves; at Gloucester, Westminster, and Canterbury; and in foreign monasteries the sub-ordinate cloister was allotted for the use of the copyists and communication with the lodgings of the conventional officers. At St. Paul's there was a two-storied cloister, each story containing the chapter, and another instance at San Juan in Toledo. The Cistercians built round their cloister cells of solitaries, containing three rooms, one of which was for the cellarer to keep the cestous at Florence and Pavia still preserve the arrangement, which, at the foundation of monasteries, was necessary, as men found the monks at battle-lives at first in little houses, and at Stonleigh the Cistercians occupying "dwelling-places of tents," while at Fountaine the earliest brotherhood lodged under the yew-trees that grew upon the slopes. Marburg presents the remarkable type of two choirs, two rood-screens, two towers at each end, and two cloisters, one on the north and another on the south.

"The Eastern monasteries have usually a large central space, round which is a colonnade communicating with the houses of the inmates. In Ireland, Spain, Italy, and France the windows were unglazed, resembling open arcades.

Clooie, Andrew, a Scotch Independent minister, was born at Whithorn, Wigton, Scotland, March 12, 1835. He was educated at King's College, Aberdeen, and began his ministry in the service of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, Glasgow. He labored in that city more than ten years, and then, after two years' retirement, engaged in Christian labor for the Congregational Church at Normanton, where he died, Aug. 24, 1872. * * * * *

Cloppeenberg, Johann Everhard, a Reformed theologian of Holland, was born at Amsterdam, May 13, 1592. He studied chiefly in Leyden, was in 1616 preacher at Aslum, in 1618 at Heusden, in 1621 at Amsterdam, and in 1630 at Briel. In 1640 he was appointed professor and preacher at Harderwick, in 1644 professor of theology and university preacher at Franeker, and died in France, Aug. 20, 1654. He wrote: Sacrificiorum Patriarchi Rum Spirituum; - De die Comestri a Christo Agni Patris, Atque de Sabbato Deuteroptuo; - Synagoga Exercitationum Elecutarum, etc. His Theologiae Opera Omnias were published at Amsterdiam, 1694, 2 vols., and a second edition of his Synopsis, 1696. Clifton, Anner Wentworth, a Baptist minister, was born in Virginia, March 24, 1784. After a partial course in a neighboring academy, he continued his studies in a private classical school, and finally graduated at the University of North Carolina, where he afterwards was a teacher for six years. He was licensed to preach in 1816, and in 1819 had calls to various places, but accepted one from Milton, N. C. In 1821 he joined the Appomattox Association, for which he furnished a circular letter on Church Discipline, and another on Ministerial Ordination, both highly creditable. He died at Abingdon, Va., March 14, 1843, and fervent devotion were distinguishing traits in his character. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vi. 657.

Cloriviere, Pierre Joseph Picot de, a French theologian, was born in Bretagne about 1735. He was educated a Jesuit, but could not take the vow, as the society was suppressed in 1762 by the parliament of Bretagne. Cloriviere was appointed pastor of Paramé, near St. Malo, and continuing relations with the Jesuits and the Jesuit party, he was imprisoned by Napoleon I, in the Temple, for several years. On the return of the Bourbon family he was set at liberty, and eagerly labored for the reunion of the Jesuitical order. He died Jan. 5, 1820, leaving, Vie de Grignon de Montfort (St. Malo, 1765, 12mo) -- Exercice de Divotion à Saint Louis de Gonzague, trans, from the Italian of Galpin (1785, 12mo) -- Considérations sur l'Exercice de la Prière, et de l'Oraison (1802, 12mo) -- Explication des Epitres de Saint-Pierre (3 vols. 12mo). Close is a name for the enclosure of a cathedral, surrounded by a wall, and bordered by the houses of the dignitaries, canons, and minor members of the foundation. In the 14th century, Wells, Lichfield, Lincoln, and Exeter were enclosed with walls; and in the following century, St. David's (Hereford), Carlisle, owing to the acts of violence perpetrated within the precinct by robbers, and the danger accruing to the canons on their way to church. In the 12th century the canons in English cathedrals had their separate houses, and the dignitaries possessed oratories attached to them. The close included also a chapter-house, library, school, vicar's college, and, in some instances, a cloister, as at Hereford, Chichester, Wells, Salisbury, St. Paul's, St. David's, Exeter, and Lincoln. Large gatehouses at various points gave access to the precinct. At Bury St. Edmund's the precinct, in the 10th century, was marked by four crosses, at the four cardinal points of the area of dedication. Some of the crosses remain at Chichester, Exeter, Wells, and Bayeux. Markets, fairs, and every kind of traffic were forbidden in the close, which usually extended to a distance of one hundred and eighty feet on each side of the church. The well-kept close is peculiar to England.

Close, Francis, D.D., an Anglican prior, youngest son of the Rev. Henry Jackson Close, sometime rector of Bentworth, near Alton, Hampshire, England, was born in 1707, and his early education was received from the Rev. Dr. Cherry, head master of Merchant Taylors' School, and the Rev. John Scott, the eldest son of the well-known commentator. He graduated at St. John's College, Cambridge, in 1820, and soon after became curate of Church Lawford, near Rugby. In 1822 he became curate of Willesden and Kingsbury, Middlesex, and in 1824 went to Cheltenham as curate to the Rev. Charles Jervis. He succeeded the latter in 1826, and for thirty years devoted himself to his parochial duties at that place. His public advocacy of the present system of government education, chiefly arising out of his laborsious efforts to establish the training College for school masters and mistresses at Cheltenham, received the acknowledgments of successive governments. During Mr. Close's incumbency, the population of the town increased from 19,000 to 32,000, and he erected no fewer than five district churches, with schools, and contributed largely to the establishment of Cheltenham College. In 1856 he became dean of Carlisle, which position he resigned in August, 1864, on account of ill-health. At Carlisle he established a dispensary, and several schools and churches. He died Dec. 18, 1882. Dr. Close was author of many pamphlets, one of which, on the Choral Service, obtained a wide circulation. He was an earnest opponent of horse-racing, theatrical amusements, and the use of liquors and tobacco. See Men of the Time (10th ed.), k. v.

Close, Henry M., a Methodist Episcopal minister, entered the North Ohio Conference in 1831, and became a member of the Central Ohio Conference when it was organized. He labored therein with much acceptability and usefulness until 1866, when he became superannuated, retiring to his farm on Pioneer Circuit. At Toledo he performed his local duties, and worked his health would permit. He died in the latter part of 1880. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1891, p. 321.

Scotland, Holland, and Wales, and died at Alloway, Cumberland, Nov. 27, 1715. His care over the Church was great, his advice seasonable, his judgment sound. See Piety Promoted, ii, 115, 116. (J. C. S.)

Close, John (2), a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) and Presbyterian Churches, was born at Greenwich, Conn., in 1737. He graduated from the College of New Jersey in 1759, and was licensed by the Presbytery of Rutgers County, N. J., in 1765; served the Presbyterian Church at Huntington, from 1766 to 1775; at New Windsor and Newburgh, from 1773 to 1796, and the Reformed Church at Waterford and Middletown, from 1796 to 1804, and died in 1815 (or 1818). See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iii, 49; Corwin, Manual of the Presbyterian Church in the U. S. (New York, 1818), p. 212.

Close (or Cloos), Nicholas, an English prelate, was born at Birkebe, Westmoreland, and was one of the six original fellows whom Henry VI placed in his newly erected King's College, Cambridge. In fact, he committed the building of the house to Close's fidelity, who right honestly discharged his trust. He was bishop of Carlisle (1450), then of Limburg, where he died shortly after his consecration, in Oct., 1459. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), iii, 304.

Close, Titus, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Hanley, in the Potteries, June 10, 1795. His youth was that of a vagabond in the literal and moral sense: but in 1815 he was deeply convicted under Methodist preaching, and was converted at St. Austell. He soon commenced preaching in the Wesleyan communion, and on Nov. 2, 1819, embarked as a missionary to India. He labored at Madras, visiting other points, until failing health compelled him to return home. In England he worked in the pastorate until his constitution utterly broke down. He died at Croft, near Darlington, June 10, 1838. He was "a willing servant of the Lord and the Church." See Minutes of the British Conference, 1888; Wesleyan Meth. Magazine, 1835, p. 401 sq.

Clotaire II, son of Childebert I and Fredegund, succeeded his father in 584, but only in Childebert's original kingdom of Soissons. Clotaire, after many family strife, became sole king of the Franks in 613. At an assembly in Paris, in 614, Clotaire issued an edict, which, among other provisions, decreed that election of bishops was to be by clergy and people (a clero et populo), with right of confirmation in the king, and reserving also a right of direct nomination to the king (c. 1). No bishop was to elect his own successor (c. 2). The clergy were only in special cases to be subject to lay jurisdiction. In times of war between the clergy and civilians, the cause was to be adjudged by a mixed tribunal (c. 5). Liberty of appeal was granted against oppressive taxation (c. 9); also liberty to relations of intestates to inherit (c. 6). In local administration natives of the locality alone were to be employed (c. 12). Finally, there was a clause that neither freeman nor slave, unless a thief caught in the act, should be condemned to death without a hearing. Clotaire died in 628, and was succeeded by his son, Dagobert.

Clotarius (or Clotterius), Anastasius, a German theologian of the latter part of the 17th century, entered the Capuchin order of the Minors of St. Francis as a preacher, and became master of the novices, and guardian and definor of the Roman province. He wrote, Thymisinae Doceticonis (Cologne, 1674) — De Sacris Ritibus (ibid., 1688). See Hoefer, Nouv. Bioğ. Générale, s. v.

Clothier, Charles E., a Baptist minister, was born in 1820. Being converted in early manhood he united with Calvary Church, Philadelphia, and when that church was organized, he was organized into the work among the sailors; he was elected chaplain of the 88th regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers, and was ordained specially for that service. When the war was ended he returned to Philadelphia, and was elected deacon in the Church of which he was a member. About 1873 he removed to the northern part of the city, where he took an interest in Gethsemane Church. He died in Philadelphia, Dec. 5, 1881. "In all the relations of life he left the witness of a godly walk and true communion." See National Baptist, Dec. 15, 1881. (J. C. S.)

Clotho, in Greek mythology, was the youngest of the Fates, or Parca (q. v.). It was her office to spin the thread between her fingers, that is, to give life and continue it. She was represented holding the spindle, dressed in a long gown of several colors, and having on her head a crown with seven stars.

Clotilda (Chrostephildis, or Chrotiludis), a French saint, daughter of Chilperic I and wife of Clovis, was born about 475. Although the daughter of an Arian, she was brought up a Catholic. According to Gregory of Tours, her uncle, Gundobald, gave her to Clovis (Chlodovicus) as a wife in 492 or 493. Clotilda baptized her first-born son, and took occasion to present to Clovis the fertility of the heathen worship. The child died and Clovis lived principally at Tours. She was of the real or reputed fountness of several religious houses, notably of St. Mary of Andelys, near Rouen, to which girls were sent for education from England in Bede's time. The original foundation was destroyed by the Normans. Clotilda, however, remained the patron saint of the place, and miracles were worked there in her name down to the Revolution, and have recommenced since. She died at Tours, June 3, 545, and was buried at Paris beside her husband, in the Church of the Apostles, afterwards St. Genevieve's. Her festival is on June 3. The only biography of any value is Saint-Clotilde et son Sicle, by the abbé Roussette (Paris, 1867). See Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog., s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Bioğ. Générale, s. v.

Clotho, Stephan, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Lippe, Sept. 13, 1666. He studied at different universities, was in 1629 archdeacon of St. James at Rostock, in 1632 professor, and in 1635 doctor of theology there. In 1630 he was appointed general superintendent of the Protestant church and holy estate of Mecklenburg and Holstein in 1630, provost and pastor at Flensburg, and died in 1666. He wrote, Pneumatics, sive Theologia Naturalis: — Tractatus de Angiologia: — De Sudore Christi Saunguino et trestis Atque Cruciatus Animal Ejus: — De Satisfactione Christi: — De Baptismo: — Historia Magorum: — Compendia et Annotationes in Epistolae Pauli: — De Auctoritate et Perfectione Scripturae Nova, etc. See Moller, Cumbrina Literaturz; Jüchter, Allgemeine gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. Cloud (Clocfodalus), Saint, a Frankish presbytery, was the youngest son of Chlodomir, king of Orleans, and grandson of St. Clotilda. He was born A.D. 522, and in 524 his father was killed in Burgundy. The two elder brothers of Cloudodulus were killed for uncle; kings Childebert and Clotaire, but Cloudodulus escaped by the help of some powerful nobles. Consenting himself to God, he renounced the throne of Orleans. In 551, yielding to a popular demand, Eusebios, bishop of Paris, ordained him a priest. Cloudodulus settled at Nogent (Nowigentum), where he died, Sept. 7, 550. His festival is Sept. 7. See Patrolog. Lat., vol. 17, p. 675-682; Le Cointe, Annuaire Eccles. Franc. (Paris, 1865), i, 327, 348, 370.

Cloud (Cloculph, or Flandulph), Saint, an early French prelate, was born in 597. He was the son of St. Arnulf and of the blessed Dola. He was educated at the court of the kings of Austria. St. Cloud married Almaberta, and had several children. He became minister of the state of Austria, and in 656 was elected by the people as successor of bishop Goda of Metz. The martyrlogy of Metz assigns his decease June 6, 656. His day is June 8. See Hoefer, Nomencl., iv. 163.

Cloud, Newton, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Stokes County, N. C., Nov. 30, 1804. He was converted in Logan County, Ky., in 1823, and in 1835 entered the Illinois Conference. In 1868 he retired, and remained a superannuate until his death, July 22, 1877. For two or three terms Mr. Cloud was a member of the Illinois legislature. He was a Christian gentleman. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1877, p. 134.

Cloud, Robert, a Methodist Episcopal preacher, began his ministry in 1785, and filled the following appointments: 1785, Trenton; 1786, Newark; 1787, Elizabethtown; 1788, Long Island; 1789 and 1790, New York; 1791 and 1792, presiding elder of the territory in and about New York city; 1793, Chester, and in 1794 located, after which no trace of his life remains. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1785-94: Sprague, Annales of the Amer. Pulpit, vii, 225; Stevens, Hist. of the M. E. Church, i, 57.

Clouet (or Clouet) Albert, a Belgian engraver, nephew of Peter, was born at Antwerp in 1534, and studied under Cornelius Bloemaert. His best known is his principal plates: The Miraculous Conception; The Battle of Joshua with the Amalekites. He resided a long time in Rome, and afterwards in Florence, and died at Antwerp in 1587. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Clouet (or Clouet), Peter, a Belgian engraver, nephew of Peter, was born at Antwerp in 1530, and worked under Sierie and Bloemaert at Rome. The following were his principal works: The Descent from the Cross; The Virgin Suckling the Infant Jesus; St. Michael Dismounting the Evil Spirit. He died at Antwerp in 1608. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Clough, James, an English Methodist preacher, was born at 5, Fensale, Lancaster. He began to travel in 1760 in connection with the Wesleyan Conference, and, after laboring for about eleven years, he settled at Leicester, where he acted as a local preacher till his death in 1795. See Atmore, Meth. Memorial, s. v.

Clough, Philemon, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Springfield, Vt., May 18, 1818. He united with the Church at the age of sixteen, and was ordained at Grantham, Nov. 7, 1861. A part of his ministerial life was devoted to itinerant labors in Vermont. For three years and a half he was pastor of a Church in Weare, N. H. For the last six years of his life he did not preach much, on account of ill-health. He died at Grantham, June 19, 1878. His sermons were original and didactic in character. See Morning Star, Sept. 4, 1878. (J. C. S.)

Clough, Simon, a distinguished minister of the Christian Connection, was born at Monmouth, Me., in 1793, and employed on his father's farm till nearly twenty years of age. In 1812 he sought an academic training; in 1814, experienced conversion. He continued his studies first at a private seminary in Winthrop, and then pursued his academic course at the college where he received his degree. His application to the Greek and Latin was so intense that his eyesight failed him, and he was obliged to refrain from books for several years. He began to preach in 1817; was soon after ordained as an evangelist, and, having gathered several new churches between Kennebec and Kennebunk, was sent as a missionary to the Indians in the winter of 1818-19, the pulpit of the Christian Society at Eastport. In the spring he visited Portland; thence removed to Boston, where he remained till 1824. In that year he went to New York, and established the first Christian Connection Church in that city. In 1853 he removed to Fall River, Mass., and in 1857 to the state of New Jersey, where his preaching was followed by remarkable success. He died May 20, 1884. Mr. Clough was distinguished for deep piety, strong mental powers, and great fidelity to his discharge. He published A Series of Articles and Discourses, Doctrinal, Practical, and Experimental (N. Y., 1843, 8vo). See The Christian Examiner (Boston), 1847, p. 227.

Clough, William, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Bishopthorpe, near York, May 30, 1799. He was converted in his sixteenth year, entered the conference at York in 1817, was a Christian gentleman. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1797, p. 134.

Clouston, Charles, LL.D., a Scotch clergyman, studied at Edinburgh University; was licensed to preach in 1821, and ordained to the Ministry in 1826, as successor to the man whom he succeeded at Sandwick and Stromness in 1822. There is no record of his death. Dr. Clouston published, The Church in Orkney (1844) Address to Orkneymen (1845) Account of the Parish and Observations on the County; and wrote the account of Orkney in the Guide to the Highlands. See Fictor Eclesiasticus, iii, 403.

Clouston, William, a Scotch clergyman, was presented to the living at Cross and Barning in 1773; transferred to Sandwick and Stromness in 1782, and died Aug. 20, 1832, aged eighty-five years. See Fictor Eclesiasticus, iii, 403, 411.

Clove-Gillyflower, or, carnation pink, a species of the Dianthus, archaically drawn, is frequently found in medieval MSS., symbolizing the graces of the blessed Virgin Mary.

Cloveshoo (or Cliff's-hoe), Council of (Cecilium Cloveneoune). These were provincial, and the locality is unknown, except that it was in the kingdom of Mercia, and probably near London (Haddan and Stubbs, Concil. iii, 122). It was selected by the Council of Hereford, A.D. 673, as the place for the yearly synod of the English Church (ibid. 670), yet (singular to say) no Council of Cloveshoo was recorded until——

I. Held in 716, when the privilege of Whithred of Kent to the churches of Kent was confirmed by a general synod of the English bishops, under Ethelbald, king of Mercia (Haddan and Stubbs, Concil. iii, 290-392).

II. Held in 742; Ethelbald, king of the Mercians, and Cuthbert, archbishop of Canterbury, presiding. Several bishops attended, and diligent inquiry was made how matters relating to religion, and particularly to the creed, were ordered in the infancy of the Church of England, and in what esteem monasteries then were. The ordinances of King Whithred, concerning the election and authority of the heads of monasteries, made in the Council of Becanceld, in 692, was read, and renewed by Ethelbald in these words:

"I Ethelbald, king of the Mercians, for the health of my soul and the stability of my kingdom, and out of reverence to the venerable archbishop Cuthbert, confirm by the subscription of my own minifie hand, that the liberty, honor, authority, and security of the Church of Christ be conferred upon him, but that all the lands belonging to her be free from all secular services, except military expedition, and the building of a bridge of castle. And all charge that this he trespassed and unmercifully observed by all, as the aforesaid king Whithred ordained for him and his." See Labe, Concil. iv. 1392; Wilkins, Concil. i. 85.

III. Held in the beginning of September, 747, in the presence of King Mercians, Cuthbert of Canterbury presiding; eleven bishops and several priests attended. Two letters from pope Zachary were read, after which thirty canons were drawn up.
CLOVESHO

1. Charges every bishop to be ready to defend his pastoral charge, and the canonical institutions of the Church of Christ, and to prevent divers innovations, and to be an example of good, not of worldliness, to his people, and to preach sound doctrine.

2. Exhorts bishops to humility and charity among themselves, so that, however far distant in seas, they may yet principally direct their labors, mind by mind, and be of good comfort in faith, hope, and charity, and praying for each other.

3. Orders annual episcopal visitations, and directs the bishops to visit the people of every diocese, to search for convenient places, and to plainly teach them, and forbid them all pagan and superstitious observances, etc.

4. Orders archbishops within their dioceses to exhibit a good example in their lives, and to rule well their houses.

5. Orders the princes monasteries which, owing to the corruption of the times, were governed by laymen.

6. Directs the inquiry to be made concerning the good life and sound faith of candidates for priests' orders.

7. Directs bishops, abbots, and abbesses to take care that their "families" do incessantly apply their minds to reading.

8. Exhorts priests to the right discharge of their duty; to desist from secular business; to serve at the altar with the utmost application; carefully to preserve the house of prayer and its furniture; to spend their time in reading, celebrating masses, and psalmody, etc.

9. Exhorts priests, in the places assigned to them by their bishops, to attend to the duties of the apostolical commission, in baptizing, teaching, and visiting, and carefully to abstain from all wicked and ridiculous conversations.

10. Directs that priests should learn how to perform, among other things, the liturgies in the several cases which are in their order; that they shall also learn to compose and explain in their native tongue the Lord's Prayer and Credo, and the prescribed words used in baptism, the holy eucharist, and baptism; that they shall understand the spiritual signification of the sacraments, etc.

11. Relates to the faith held by priests, orders that it shall be sound and sincere, and that their miniistrations shall be uniform; that they shall teach all men that without faith it is impossible to please God, that they shall instill the creed into them, and propose it to infants and their spouses.

12. Forbids priests "to prate in church," and "to dislocate or confound the composure and distinction of the sacred words" by theatrical pronunciation; directs them to follow the "plain song" according to the custom of the Church; or, if they cannot do that, simply to read the words. Also forbids priests to presume to interfere in episcopal functions.

13. Orders the due observation of the festivals of our Lord and Saviour, and of the nativity of the salute, according to the Roman martYROLOGY.

14. Orders the due observance of the Lord's day.

15. Orders the due observance of the saints' and canonized martyrs' day.

16. Orders that the Litanies or rotaiones be kept by the clergy and people, with great reverence, on St. Mark's day, and on the three days preceding Ascension day.

17. Orders the due observance of the solemnity of the pope Gregory. of St. Augustine of Canterbury, who "first brought the knowledge of faith, the sacrament of baptism, and the holy eucharist" to England, to be kept and observed, in and in this council the property of the Church was restored. See Labbe, Concil. vii. 1527; Wilkins, Concil. i. 172.

18. VIII. Held in 892. Knulf, king of Mereica, having forcibly seized some of the Church lands in Kent, desiring the archbishop Wulfred with banishment in case of resistance, gave them to his daughter Wendritha, abbess of Winchcombe, in Gloucestershire. After the death of King Knulf, his son Eadulf, "being desirous of the church," and in this council the property of the Church was restored. See Labbe, Concil. vii. 1527; Wilkins, Concil. i. 175.

19. CLOVIO, GIOVIO GIOVINO (called II Moretano), a very eminent miniature painter of Croatia, was born in 1498. He was educated for the Church, but was discharged from the priesthood by a dissipation from the pope. After learning the elements of design in his own country, he visited Rome and entered the school of Giulio Romano. He executed an immense number of works, which are highly valued. The most celebrated are The Procession of Corpus Domini, at Rome, painted in twenty-six pictures; and at Milan, in the Cistercian convent, a Decent from the Cross. He died in 1578. See Chalmers, Biographical Dictionary, a. v.; Spooner, Biographical History of the Fine Arts, a. v.
Clow, James, a Scotch clergyman, a native of Ardoch, was licensed to preach in 1813; appointed chaplain to the East India Company at Bombay in 1815, and ordained; resigned in 1823; returned to Scotland; emigrated to New York; became a teacher of the Presbyterian Church of Victoria, Australia, after the Union in 1859, and died soon afterwards. See Eccles. Scotticae, i, 155.

Clow, Patrick, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1701; was licensed to preach in 1711; presented to the living at Leslie in 1713, and died in November, 1731, aged about fifty years. See Eccles. Scotticae, ii, 550.

Clowes, Francis, an English Baptist preacher and educator, was born at Heatham, Norfolk, Jan. 10, 1805. He studied at Bristol College, from which he went to Aberdeen, Scotland. In 1831 he was called to the pastorate of the Thrinell Street Church in Bristol, and about five years afterwards was appointed classical tutor in Horton College, a position which he held fifteen years. He died suddenly, May 7, 1873. Mr. Clowes did much with his pen in promoting Baptist periodical literature, and was one of the editors of The Freeman for several years. He was ardent and impassioned in his attachment to Baptist principles. See Cuthbert, Baptist Encyclopedia, p. 296. (J. C. S.)

Clowes, John, an English clergyman, was born at Manchester, Oct. 31, 1745, and was a fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. In 1769 he was made rector of St. John's Church, Manchester, and in 1773 became one of the first English disciples of Swedenborg, whose doctrines he was active in promoting, although he retained his connection for almost twenty years. He died at Leamington, May 22, 1831, leaving Restoration of Pure Religion, two volumes of Sermons, and translated Swedenborg's Arcana Celestia, and other works.

Clowes, Timothy, L.L.D., an Episcopal divine and scholar, graduated at Columbia College in 1808. He became president of Washington College, Md., in 1823, and was for many years a prominent educator, as well as a distinguished mathematician. He died at Hempstead, N. L., in 1847. See Drake, Dict. of Am. Biog. s. v.

Cloyd, Ezekiel, a Cumberland Presbyterian minister, was born in Montgomery County, Va., Feb. 12, 1770. In 1788 he moved with his parents to North Carolina, and about 1800 settled in Tennessee, and became connected with the Church in Shiloh, Sumner County. He was licensed to preach by the Nashville Presbytery in 1814, and in July, 1822, was ordained at Sugg's Creek. After his ordination he travelled as a circuit-rider for several years. A short time he was pastor of Stoner's Creek congregation, within the bounds of which he spent the most of his life. When not travelling as a minister he was busily occupied on his farm. He died in Lebanon, Tenn., in August, 1851. See Beard, Biographical Sketches, 1st series, p. 192.

Clubbe, John, rector of Westfield and vicar of Bedlington in Suffolk, England, was the son of Rev. George Clubbe, of Catherine Hall, Cambridge, and was born in 1703. He graduated from King's Hall in 1725, and lost his sight some time before his death, March 2, 1773. He is the author of a single sermon, History and Antiquities of Westfield (1738) — and of the ironical piece, Phænomeny, and Free Advice to a Young Clergyman (1763).

Clube, William, vicar of Brandon, Suffolk, England, was the son of the preceding; and died in 1844 having published some lyrical pieces.

Cloge, Christian Gottlieb, a Lutheran theologian of Berne, was born in 1700 at Nerichau near Grimm. He studied at Wittenberg; was in 1721 magister; in 1729 archiadjutans at Wittenberg; in 1737 doctor of theology there; and died in 1759, leaving De Antiquitate et Origine Ritus Interrogandi Infantiæ ante Baptismum (Frankenhausen, 1729); De un Forme, qua Interrogossum Infantiæ ante Baptismum de Fide (Wittenberg, 1734): Comm. de Baptismo Adami (ibid. 1747): De Interpretatione Prophetarum Proprium Ipsum Scripturam Dissolvente (ibid. 1754, 1757). Cluguiaics. We add the following particulars:

The chief peculiarity of their churches in France was a large anti-church for penitents. The penitent was usually without habits; but St. Bernard, in 1187, inveighed against the luxury, the enormous height, excessive breadth, empty space, and sumsptuous ornament in their churches. The dress of the order was a black cloak, a pelisse, a hood of lamb's wool, red hose, a white woollen surplice, and black scapular and in choir, cope of white silk in cloister and refectory, a white pall; and in times of labor a white scapular. Their first churches, like those of Cistercians, were dedicated to St. Mary; their rule was a composition of those of St. Benedict and St. Augustine. They prohibited the use of organs, and all superfluous carving and pictures, but allowed painted crosses of wood. In England their churches were very irregular in plan. At length they became the most luxurious order in their mode of living; and Peter of Cluny upbraids them with their extravagance in no measured terms. Some of their monasteries were destroyed, and others composed of monasteries. The early peculiarities of their rule were, the dipping of the eucharist in the chalice; the use of fans for the sick or delicate: admission of novices before a year's probation; inspection of the common; a strict and absolute rule of silence; absence of manual labor, and the custom for abbeys to dine always with the brethren. The Cluniac monks wore a cowl of scarlet cloth, to show their readiness to shed their blood for the sake of Christ. They slept in their shirts. They had three or four courses at dinner, being regarded as a cartissial, and shared among two monks; electorates, spiced and perfumed, and delicate cooking were used: the abbots entertained their guests, and any monks whom the bishop, in the hall. Women might enter the monastery; and convents of nuns were placed of Germany, were born in 1700 at Nerichau. The Cluniacs were beautifully and richly adorned: income was much used, and the ceremonial was elaborate. The guests' feet were not washed, but in his three poor men were admitted to the lavanda. After vigils they returned to sleep in their dormitory. Their houses were built in populous places.

Clugny, Ferri de, bishop of Tournaï, cardinal and counsellor of the duke of Burgundy, was engaged by that prince in important missions, was appointed Bishop of Rouen in 1483. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Clugny, François de, a French theologian. He was born at Aigueus-Mortes, Sept. 4, 1637. He joined the Congregation of the Oratory at the age of fourteen, and was ordained priest at Easter in 1662. He was struck with total blindness, from which, however, he recovered after some time, so that, though not without difficulty, he could again read and write. He began preaching, but died at Djoun, Oct. 21, 1694. He published several works on practical religion, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Clugny, Guillaume de, a French prelate, brother of Ferri, accomplished, like him, important missions under Philip the Good and Charles the Bold, dukes of Burgundy, and, after the death of the latter, went over to the service of Louis XI, of France, who made him bishop of Poitiers in 1479. He died at Tours the year following. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Clugston, William, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, a native of Glasgow, was licensed to preach in 1816; presented to the living at Forsfar in 1817, and ordained. He joined the Free church in 1843, and died March 3, 1857, aged sixty-three years. Mr. Clugston published a sermon on National Judgments (1837), and another on The Widow and the Fatherless (1834). See Fusi Eccles. Scoticae, iii, 762, 763.

Clulow, John, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Rushton, Staffordshire, March 22, 1818. He was appointed to the ministry in 1842, and continued in that work for eleven years, contributing by his unceasing diligence and marked ability much towards the efficiency of the Wesleyan Sunday-schools. In 1853 he resumed circuit work, in which he was engaged until his death, which occurred at Plymouth, Dec. 18, 1873. Strict attention to duty, conscientious observance of the details of the work, allegiance to law, his amiability, manliness, and sincerity, made his life influential for good. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1800, p. 21.

Clulow, Thomas, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Macclesfield, March 6, 1835. He was called to the ministry in 1856, and died at Southwark, London, Jan. 22, 1869. His ministry was very successful. His life was pure, gentle, becoming. Affable manners, pastoral diligence, especially among the sick and the poor, endeared him to all. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1869, p. 18.

Clulow, William Bentin, an English Congregational minister, was born at Leek in 1802, and educated at Hoxton Academy. He first settled at Shal- don, Devonshire, where he remained twelve years, and then, in 1835, became classical tutor in Airedale College, Bradford. After eight years he resigned his position in the college, and lived in retirement the rest of his life, engaged in literary labor. In 1853 he removed to Leek, where he died, April 16, 1862. His published works include, Truths in Few Words—Aphorisms and Reflections: Essays of a Recruit—Sunshine and Shadow. He also left a volume of MS. notes on the Greek New Testament. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1883, p. 269.

Clunie, David, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Glasgow University in 1672; was bursar of divinity from 1673 to 1676; probationer at the first meeting of the Presbyterians after their liberty in 1677; appointed to the living at Cockburnspath in 1689; member of the general assemblies of 1690 and 1692; and died Nov. 29, 1741. He was for forty-seven years. See Fusi Eccles. Scoticae, i, 371.

Clunie, John (1), a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1731; presented by the king to the living at Whitekirk in 1732; admitted to the united parish in 1761, and died June 17, 1784, aged seventy-five years. See Fusi Eccles. Scoticae, i, 386.

Clunie, John (2), L.L.D., an English Congregational minister, was born in London, April 9, 1784. He was converted in early life, in 1803 entered Hoxton Academy, and studied during two sessions at the University of Glasgow. In 1808 he returned to England, and was ordained at Guildford the following year. His later years were diligently employed in various benevolent enterprises. He died June 23, 1858. Dr. Clunie published, The Storm and the Tempest:—A Scripture Diary; and various Sermons on special occasions. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1859, p. 194.

Clunie, John (3), a Scotch clergyman, was precentor at Markinch; licensed to preach in 1784; presented to the living at Eves in 1790; transferred to Borthwick in 1791; was also chaplain to the second regiment of Dragoons of the Kingdom, and died April 14, 1819, aged sixty-one years. He was gifted with a powerful, musical voice, and was extremely fond of singing. See Fusi Eccles. Scoticae, iv, 268, 637.

Clunies, Patrick, a Scotch clergyman, a native of Ross, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1662; was admitted to the living at Wick in 1692, and died in 1701, aged about forty-nine years. See Fusi Eccles. Scoticae, iii, 576.

Clup, William McKendrie, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Barren County, Ky., Dec. 5, 1831. He was educated in Missouri in 1845; prepared for the ministry in 1849, emigrated to California in 1854; was licensed to preach in 1857, and in 1858 admitted into the Pacific Conference, wherein he labored with zeal and energy, and died of illness, March 11, 1870. He was a sweet singer, an earnest preacher, and a faithful pastor. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1870, p. 515.

ADDENDUM.

Canada, Dominion or.—We here bring down this article to the present date.

1. Secular.—1. General.—This confederation of provinces has almost completed the first quarter of a century of its existence. The census has been taken during the present year, 1891; and an estimate of the present population, made at Ottawa, places it at 5,250,000. The net public debt was, on June 30, 1889, $237,580,042.

In 1885, the Canadian Pacific Railway was opened for passengers, and has made accessible for settlement an enormous territory of the richest agricultural and mineral resources, and of scenery surpassing in natural grandeur the famous countries of Europe. Towns have sprung up along the line with great rapidity, and commerce has opened up the resources of the ancient East for the benefit of the Dominion. Population on the Pacific coast has increased, and legal steps have been taken to found a university where, five years ago, a normal school was impossible.

2. Commerce.—The tonnage of Canada for the year ending on the 30th of June, 1889, was 16,054,221. Her exports were $98,189,167, and her imports, $115,254,394. Her exports to Britain were $98,099,051, and to the United States, $38,420,571. The year 1888 showed exports to the value of $57,567,888, and imports, $73,459,644.

The railway mileage of Canada on June 30, 1889, was 13,741 miles, placing her sixth on the list of nations in this respect.

New regulations place the interest on deposits in the Post-office Savings Bank at 3 per cent.; and deposits may range from 25 cents to $3000.

5. Literary and Artistic.—The Royal Society of Canada, founded by the Marquis of Lorne, recognizes and promotes literary eminence. It has four departments—French, English, mathematicians, with physics and chemistry, and geology, with biology. The Royal Academy of Arts, founded by the Marquis of Lorne and the Princess Louise, does the same work for art.

II. Ecclesiastical.—1. Church of England.—Up to August 15, 1890, the dioceses of this Church were not consolidated into one united whole. At a conference held in St. John's College, Winnipeg, on that date, a scheme for the formation of a general synod, to include the whole church of British North America, was adopted. This synod will consist of the bishops of the Church of England in Canada and Newfoundland, with clerical and lay delegates, chosen by the diocesan synods, where they exist, or appointed by the bishop of a diocese without a synod. Dioceses with fewer than 25 licensed clergymen send one delegate of each order; those with from 25 to 49 clergymen, inclusive, two such delegates; those with from 50 to 99, three such delegates; and those with 100 or more, four such delegates.

The synod shall have two houses—the upper, composed of the bishops, and the lower, composed of clergy and laymen—each to sit separately, except by unanimous consent. The primate of the General Synod shall be elected by the upper house from the metropolitan. He shall hold office for life, or so long as he remains bishop of any included diocese, though he may resign. The General Synod shall deal with any matters affecting the whole Church, such as doctrine, worship, discipline; all agencies for promoting church work, missionary or educational; the adjustment between dioceses of funds for clergy, widows and orphans, and diocesan gifts; the transfer of clergy between dioceses; the training of candidates for holy orders; the constitution and powers of a court of appeal; and the erection, division, and rearrangement of provinces. The expenses of the synod, including traveling expenses of members, shall be met by an assessment of the dioceses proportionate to their representation, dioceses having only one delegate of each order being exempt. The first meeting of the General Synod is appointed for Toronto, the second Wednesday in September, 1893, and is to be convened by the metropolitan senior by consecration.

The Church of England in Canada has 20 dioceses and 20 bishoprics, about 450,000 members, and 1019 clergymen. Her contributions, for the year ending July 31, 1890, for domestic and foreign missions, were $377,968,38, those for foreign missions alone being $13,190,40. She has 3 missionaries in Japan. Foreign missions include work among Chinese and other pagan races in Canada.

A college for boys (" Ridley College") has been founded in St. Catharines, Ontario, for the interests of Evangelical Protestants in the Church.

2. Presbyterian.—The Presbyterian Church of Canada has 6 synods, those of the Maritime Provinces, Montreal and Ottawa, Toronto and Kingston, Hamilton and London, Manitoba and the North-west Territories, besides the Presbyterian of India, in India, with synodical powers; the presbytery of Honan, in China, and that of Trinidad, embracing 45 home and 3 foreign presbyteries. Besides these, there is the New Hebrides mission. The communicants number 171,240, of whom 6457 are on missions. There are 1039 ministers, including ordained missionaries.

The missions are among French Canadians, American Indians, in India, China, Trinidad, and the New Hebrides. The latter has 5 ministers as missionaries. Trinidad has 6. China has 8 Canadian and 2 native missionaries, besides a medical missionary, 2 nurses, with 50 native preachers and teachers. India has 5 ministers, 8 ladies and numerous other agents engaged in mission work, and at Indore College. Seven ordained missionaries are among the American Indians. There are 36 mission stations, 26 mission churches, and 22 stations for the French, with 1337 members.

One of the schools is at St. Anne, in Illinois. There are 8653 elders: Sunday scholars and those in Bible classes number 129,886. Workers in such schools number 15,441. The volumes in libraries are 157,598. Those who attend prayer-meetings number 454. Scholars who commit Scripture to memory are 60,965. Those who commit the Shorter Catechism are 67,555.

The income for all purposes, in 1890, was $2,045,431, which, with $88,327 from mission stations, gives a total of $2,093,758. The amount paid for stipends in 1890 was $399,398; to the college fund, $36,259; and to mission funds, $177,695.

A regular system of examinations, by paper, with examines, sub-examiners, prizes and diplomas, for Sunday school scholars exists. The ages of candidates range from 10 to 25 years. The value of each paper is 200, of which 50 per cent. passes, from 75 to 90 per cent. gains a book prize, and 90 per cent. gains a silver medal. The time for each paper is two hours. Examinations are simultaneous at all centres.

Methodists. In this Church, only one general superintendent is now employed.

During the four years ending with September, 1890, the number of probationers for the ministry has increased from 208 to 296; of ministers, from 1610 to 1748; of local preachers and exhortors, from 2692 to 3122; of class leaders, from 6641 to 7148; of members, from 197,469 to 233,868.

The infant baptisms for the same period have been 65,795, and the adult, 11,307.

There are 12 annual conferences, 3173 Sunday-schools, 28,411 Sunday-school officers and teachers, 226,000 scholars, 87,158 scholars in class, 25,677 children learning the catechism, 49,419 scholars pledged against liquor and tobacco, those against intoxicants alone being 41,522, and 217,388 volumes in libraries. There are 3092 churches, 11,687 other preaching places, and 967 parsonages. The value of Church property is $12,547,491.

There are 2 weekly newspapers, 1 monthly, 1 quarterly, 8 Sunday-school papers, of which 2 are weekly.

The amount invested in publishing interests is $504,316. The capital of the Book House in Toronto is $250,570.95.

There are 14 colleges and other educational institutions, 157 professors and teachers, 3157 college graduates, and 2522 college students. Value of institutions, $1,048,700.

There are 473 mission stations, 507 missionaries, 96 native assistants and teachers, 4265 members on mission stations, 28,935 scholars, 723 auxiliary members of the Women's Missionary Society, 8584 members of these auxiliaries, 4462 members of Mission Bands, and about 200 Ewpworth Leagues, with about 15,000 members.

During the past quadrennium, an annual conference has been established in Japan, and the membership there has grown from 591 to 1716; the contributions from $905.04 to 6401.35; the value of Church property from $29,085 to 64,983, and the Sunday scholars from 542 to 1486.

Work has been undertaken among the Chinese in British Columbia, at Victoria, Vancouver, New Westminster, and Kamloops.

The missionary income has increased from $291,674.34 to $220,926.43. Contributions for all purposes amounted to $40,063.967.

The course of study for probationers not attending college has been improved, and Greek has been inserted as one of the requirements.

The relation of attendance upon class-meeting to membership in the Church has been placed upon the same basis as that upon other means of grace.

A movement which is largely expected to affect the future of Canadian Methodism is the contemplated removal of her leading university, Victoria College, from Cobourg to Toronto, the affiliation of that college with the Provincial University of Toronto, and the renunciation by Victoria of her right to grant degrees, except in divinity, during the continuance of such confederation.

The scheme for this confederation was carried in 1886, and was confirmed in 1890 by the General Conference.

In 1882, Victoria and Albert universities were united. The varied claims of University College, in Toronto, and the denominational colleges led to a scheme for the consolidation of all the universities of Ontario as colleges under one provincial university. Certain branch-colleges are to be allotted to 34 university professors, so as to relieve the colleges of work. These branches, which may, under certain circumstances, be changed, are pure mathematics, physics, astronomy, geology, mineralogy, chemistry, zoology, botany, physiography, ethnology, comparative philology, history, logic, metaphysics, history of philosophy, Italian, Spanish, political economy, civil polity, jurisprudence, constitutional law, and engineering.

The lectures of this professoriate are to be free to all matriculated students of confederated colleges, and will include, as optional subjects, Biblical Greek and literature, Christian ethics, apologetics, the evidences of natural and revealed religion, and Church history.

Trinity College, of the Church of England, from dissatisfaction with the financial and educational provisions of the proposed scheme, refused to confederate. Queen's College, of the Presbyterians, from inability to comply with the requirement that confederating colleges must remove to Toronto, the need of a university in Eastern Ontario, and from the benefits of separate universities, as seen in Scotland, Germany, the United States, and even England, also refused confederation. The Baptists also refused, and erected McMaster Hall into a university, with an arts course, as well as one in theology.

The Methodists alone have decided to sink their leading university into a confederated college. Under this scheme, Victoria College secures five acres of University Park, at a nominal rental of one dollar a year while it remains confederated, and proposes to erect buildings at a cost of $135,000. Opposition to the scheme was removed by a bequest, from William Gooderham, Esq., of Toronto, of $200,000, conditioned on such federation and removal from Cobourg. Until the completion of the new buildings, degrees will be conferred by Victoria College only by special arrangements.

The union of the Methodists of Canada has been followed by the appearance of a new denomination, called theFree Methodist Church of Canada, with 6 conference officers and 17 ministers.

Two churches of colored Methodists still retain their separate existence, one with 17 and the other with 21 ministers.

4. Congregationalists.—This body has two unions, that of Ontario and Quebec and that of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. It reports 126 churches, 70 other preaching stations, 91 ministers, 5 districts, 1 college, 1 mission to the Jews, and 10,245 members; 134 church buildings, valued at $782,700, and parsonages to the value of $69,150.

The doctrinal statement omits from the Apostles' Creed the passage about the descent into hell.

Financial difficulties have led to the resignation of the missionary superintendent.

The Foreign Missionary Society was originated in 1881. Two missionaries are in Africa, and one, a lady, at Bombay. The income of the Missionary Society has increased in 8 years, to June 4, 1890, from $4000 to $15,728.73.

The Indian mission at French Bay has been given over to the Methodists.

The debts on Church property in Ontario and Quebec are $180,205. The alumni of the college number 109. The salary of the professor of Hebrew and Greek exegesis is $1,000 a year. The contributions to the college amount to $1,000 for each member of the Church from Quebec, 20 cents a member from Ontario, and 6 cents from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. The expenses exceeded the income by $900 a year from 1887 to 1889. There are 9 professors and lecturers, at salaries amounting to $4500 a year. This college receives $1207.28 from the Colonial Missionary Society of England. The endowment is $92,997.83.

The branches of the Provident Fund for Widows and Orphans and Retired Ministers has a capital of $19,774.06. The free contributions to this fund show a growing decline.

5. Baptists.—This denomination is divided into two groups—those of Ontario, Quebec, Manitoba and the North-west Territories and those of the Maritime Provinces. For the sake of convenience, they may be called the Western and the Eastern Baptists. The Western have 285 ministers, 32,232 members, and 2930 persons were baptized during the year 1890, with 19 associations, 29,824 Sunday scholars, 3408 officers and teachers, and 9 publications.

The Eastern Baptists, engaged on Sunday-schools, was, in 1890, $12,734.67. In the foreign mission field, among the Telugus, are 11 churches, 11 missionaries, and 60 assistants. Six new workers have gone forth during 1890—two men and their wives, one lady, and one artist who proposes to paint, for his support, during part of the year, and to spend the remainder in mission work.

For the outposts of missions, Ontario is divided into 17 associations and 147 sub-circles.

There is one university, called McMaster, from the founder, with 4 colleges connected with it—Woodstock College, Moulton Ladies' College, the Toronto Arts College, and the Theological College. The assets available for college purposes are 899,437.37.

The Canadian Baptist realizes a profit, but the bookroom is maintained at a loss.

There were raised for all purposes, in 1890, $304,635.01. During that year, 12 churches were dedicated.

A superintendent of missions has been appointed, after the death of the Congregationalists and the present example of the Presbyterians.

The Eastern Baptists have 8 associations, 389 churches, 41,480 members, and have had 1171 baptisms during the year ending May 31, 1890. They have 498 Sunday-schools, 29,933 scholars, and 2651 teachers and officers. Of the scholars, 474 were baptized during the year above mentioned.

They have, as educational institutions, Acadia College, Horton Academy, and Acadia Seminary, with Chipman Hall.

They have expended, for the year ending August, 1890, $41,053.88 for foreign missions, and $761.59 for home missions.

The number of Baptist churches in all Canada is 850, with 78,497 members.

The arts department of McMaster University was opened Oct. 10, 1890.

6. Roman Catholics.—The following statistics are taken from Le Canada Ecclésiastique, Almanach-ammonaire pour l'année 1891. This Church has seven ecclesiastical provinces, those of Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto, Kingston, Halifax, and St. Boniface; 24 dioceses; 2 apostolic vicariates, those of Athabaska-Mackenzie and Poncie; 1 apostolic prefecture, that of the Gulf of St. Lawrence; 24 missions of mission and 38 of women; 1,988,142 adherents, 2284 priests, 370 convents, and 51 colleges and schools.

The Jesuits have 14 establishments in Canada, with 230 so-called religious persons (religieux), all Canadians, except 16 who are Europeans. The Provincial House was founded in 1814, on the 1st of June, by Father Felix Martin, who was the first rector of it. He had five companions. There are colleges in Montreal and St. Boniface. The fathers and novices are scattered through the dioceses of Montreal, Quebec, Ottawa, Hamilton, Peterboro, and St. Boniface.

There is one cardinal, who is also archbishop of Quebec, and six other archbishops, 22 bishops, and one apostolic prefect. One of these bishops, Monseigneur Bégin, of Chicoutimi, is the author of a work, Holy Scripture and the Rule of Faith, of which the boast is made that it has never been answered. It proceeds from the ordinary and literal arguments on the Scriptures to the Roman conclusions.

The Victoria Medical School, the medical department of the Methodists' Victoria University, has been brought into connection with the Laval University.

The long-existing claims of the Roman Catholic Church to the forfeited Jesuit estates have been settled by the grant to the Church by the Provincial government of $400,000, and to the Protestants of $60,000, for educational purposes. The Romanistas succeeded, also, in obtaining a grant of a large common at Laprairie, near Montreal. A succinct account of this transaction, from an authorized source, is as follows: Prior to the English occupation of the Province of Canada, the Jesuits had obtained, by grants from the kings of France, by gifts from citizens, and by purchase, lands in Quebec, Montreal, and Three Rivers. When the English took Canada in 1759, the Jesuits were incorporated. In 1773, Pope Clement XIV, abolished them. In 1800, George III. issued a warrant conferring these lands to the Crown, by right of conquest.

The government took them in 1866, and the greater part of them remained with the government in 1867. From 1800 to 1867, the Roman clergy protested that these estates belonged to the Church, as confiscation by conquest was contrary to the actual civil laws and to the Treaty of Paris. In 1874 and 1875, the greater part of them was given by the Quebec government to the basin of Quebec, except the Champ de Mars in Montreal, still held by the Dominion government. In 1876, M. Mercier, the Quebec premier, formal a promissory of the government to set the question. This promise was registered in Rome and Canada. The pope commanded the bishop of Quebec, Mersereau, to declare the property confiscated, but however, in a mixed community, was declared to be impossible. Both political parties agreed to a compromise, the payment to the Roman Church of $400,000, and to the Protestants of $60,000, for education. The act by which this was effected was passed on July 3, 1888. The estates were valued at from $400,000 to $2,000,000.

While successful in this, the Roman Church has been defeated in Manitoba, where separate schools have been by law abolished. The law has been confirmed on appeal.

7. Minor Bodies.—The Evangelical Association returns 67 ministers; the Universalists, 9 ministers and 127 members; the United Brethren, 23 ministers; the Evangelical Lutherans, 58 ministers; the Reformed Episcopal Church, 24; and the New Jerusalem Church, 8.

The census of 1885 for the North-west Territories gives 9301 Romanists, 9976 Church of England, 7712 Presbyterians, 8910 Methodists, and 778 Baptists.

As a conclusion to the ecclesiastical facts in this article, there may be noted a number of events and movements in Canada, which, together with the existence of the non-ecclesiastical parties, show an increased tendency of liberalism on the part of the Roman Catholics. This tendency is not so conspicuous as to be apparent in any particular movement of the Holy See, or in any particular change of doctrine or practice. It is rather a general and gradual change, which is more apparent in the minds of the people, than in the actual doings of the Church. It is a change from the formalism of the past, to a more practical and experimental treatment of religious questions. This change is not confined to the Roman Catholics, but is also noticeable in other Protestant bodies.
