The table represents a list of woodcuts from the book 'List of Wood-cuts in Vol. XI.' Each entry includes the title followed by the page number where it can be found. The table covers a variety of subjects such as biblical scenes, historical sites, and architectural features.
An (old), in ancient Egyptian mythology, was one of the demons who accuse the soul of the deceased in the Hall of the Two Truths; also a deity worshipped in the town of Aat.

Aa, Christian Charles Henrý (in Dutch, Chris- tiaan Karel Hendrik) van der, a learned Lutheran div- ine, was born at Zwolle, in Overeyssel, Netherlands, Aug. 25, 1718. He studied theology at Leyden and Jena in 1737, and was the first secretary-territorial of the Society of Sciences in Holland, which he assisted in founding at Haarlem in 1752. For fifty-one years he performed the pastoral functions of the Lutheran Church of that place; and died there in 1788. He published several sermons. His writings on the natural sciences are printed in a collection of Dutch periodicals, entitled at Algemeene Vaderlandsche Letterafneming, published in 1793. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Génerale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Aacs (or Acz), Mihály (Michael) (1), a Hungarian philosopher and theologian, was born at Szent Martony (or Martonhegy), in Transylvania, July 9, 1631. He finished his studies in Germany, and filled the office of pastor at Hegyes Alba, at Raab, and at Rosenaun. He died at Rosenaun Dec. 28, 1708. He wrote in Latin and Hungarian, Fontes Calvinismi Obstructi (Tübingen, 1669);—Bolsdag Halabach Szekere (Strasbourg, 1700). See Hoefner, Nouv. Biog. Génerale, s. v.

Aacs. Mihály (2), a Hungarian theologian, was born at Raab, Feb. 28, 1672. He studied theology at Wittenberg and Tübingen, and became chaplain of a Hungarian regiment. He died at Bartfeld, Feb. 2, 1711. He wrote in Latin and Hungarian, Dissertatio Historico-theologica de Catechumenis (Strasbourg, 1700); — Magyar Theologia (Bartfeld, 1709);—Curris Mortis ex Postulantia, in quo Hominibus Salutare Mortem Cupientibus Gratiam Ipsam Dominus Jesu Preparat (Strasbourg, 1702). See Hoefner, Nouv. Biog. Génerale, s. v.

Aeade, one of the original three museus of the ancient Egyptians; the other two were Melete and Mneme.

Aagaard, Christian, a Danish poet and theologian, was born at Viborg in 1616. He was professor of poetry at Söërië, and afterwards lecturer in theology at Ripen, Jutland. He died in February, 1664. Among his poems are, De Hommageo Frederici III, Danie et Norve. Regis (Hafniæ, 1660, fol.);—Threni Hyperборeis, on the death of Christian IV. All his pieces are inserted in Bostgaard's Declarium quorumdam Portarum Domos- rum (Leyden, 1695, 2 vols. 12mo). See Moréri, Dict. Hist. 1810.

Aagaard, Nicholas (Niels), brother of the above, was librarian in the University of Söërië, Denmark, where he died, Jan. 22, 1657, aged forty-five years. He and his brother were both Lutheran. Among other works, he wrote, A Disputation on the Style of the New Testa- ment (Söërië, 1655, 4to).

Aah (the Moon), the ancient Egyptian name of the god who was called by the Romans Lunus. He was represented as an ibis-headed man, with the lunar horns and disk upon his head; or else as a man kneeling on one knee and supporting a disk above his head with both hands.

Aahuru (the Chief of Terrors), one of the mystical deities of the Egyptian hell.

Aahun (Aaluna, Aahenru, or Aahnaru), the ancient Egyptian name for the plains of Elysium, of which the valley of Balot formed a part.

Aare, Diderik (Dirk or Thierry) van der, was bishop of Utrecht in the 13th century. He seems to have attended more to the temporalities of his see than to his spiritual duties, and was involved in frequent warfare with William, count of Holland. He governed Utrecht for fourteen years, and died at Deventer, Dec. 5, 1212. See Hook, Eccles. Biog. s. v.

Aaroon. The following description of the ascent to his reputed tomb on Mount Hor is taken from Porter's Handbook for Syria (p. 91). See Hor.

"Ascending the ravine from the south-eastern angle of the valley, we reach in about half an hour the plain called Sutth Harim, which skirts the base of Mount Hor. Crossing this slope on the south-east side of the peak, we find a path winding up to the summit. The ascent from the plain in which the path is traceable on foot, and occupies about an hour. It is neither difficult nor dangerous if the proper track be followed, for in the steeper portions rude steps aid the pilgrim. Not far from the summit is a little platform, from which the central and culminating peak rises in broken masses, giving a peculiar character to the mountain, like—" Embattled towers raised by Nature's hands.'

A deep cleft in the rock opens a way to the top. A little way up are the openings to subterraneous vaults with rounded arches, nearly similar to those in front of the tomb in the eastern cliff of Petra. From here a staircase leads to the narrow platform on which the tomb stands.

"The tomb, as it now stands, is comparatively modern; but it is composed of the ruins of a more ancient and im- posing structure. Some small columns are built up in the walls, and fragments of marble and granite lie scattered around. The door is in the south-west corner. An ordi- nary niche, such as is met with in every part of the East—a patchwork of stone and marble—is the only thing in the interior. It is covered with a ragged pall, and garnished with the usual accompaniments—old shawls, ostrich-eggs, and a few beads. Near the north-west angle a staircase leads down to a dark vault, partly hewn in the rock. Visitors desirous of exploring this grotto would do well to have lights in readiness. The real tomb of the high-priest is here shown at the far end of the vault. It was formerly guarded by an iron grating. The date of the building is at least prior to the time of the Crusades; for the author of the Gesta Francorum mentions that in the time of Baldwin (A.D. 1100) an expedition was made in saltem Mysia, 'to Wady Mussa,' and that there, on the summit of a mountain, was an oratory. Fulcher of Chartres, who also gives an account of the expedition, says he saw the chapel. It is highly probable that the spot was held sacred by the Christians before the Mohammedan conquest.

Aaron is commemorated as a Christian saint in the Ethiopic calendar on March 27; and his deposition on Mount Hor is assigned in early Roman martyrologies to July 1.

Aaron, Str. (1), was a Briton who suffered martyrdom with St. Julius in Britain, during the persecution under Diocletian, in 305. We are not informed as to the British name of Aaron; but he and Julius had each a church erected to his memory in the city of Caerleon, the ancient metropolis of Wales. Their festival is placed in the Roman martyrology on July 1.

Aaron, Str. (2), is said to have been the founder of the first monastery in Brittany. He flourished in the 6th century, and was eminent for his piety. When St. Malo fled from Britain into Gaul, he was received and hospitably entertained by Aaron, then residing on a little island not far from the present town of Saint-Malo. Together with St. Malo, he labored for the conversion of the heathen, and was induced to erect a monastery, over which he presided till his death, in 580. See Hook, Eccl. Biog. a.v.

Aaron Ahob (or Avion), a rabbi of Thessalonica who lived near the close of the 16th century. He wrote a liturgical commentary on the book of Esther, in Hebrew, entitled רבי יהודה סן שלמה. See Oudem Myrrha, ex Rabbinorum Commentariorum, etc. (Thessalonica, 1601). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a.v.

Aaron, a presbyter of Alexandria, was the author of thirty books on physic, in the Syrian tongue, which he called the Pundects. They were supposed to have been written before 620, and were translated into Arabic by Maserjatwah, a Syrian Jew, about 683. The original Pundects and their translations are now lost, and we have nothing of them remaining but what Mohammed Rasiz collected from them and left as his Continuatum.

Aaron ben-Ella, a Karaite of Niconedia, lived in the 14th century. He wrote a work in imitation of the Mekor of Maimonides, entitled The Tree of Life, which is a presentation, on a philosophical basis, of the dogmas of Mosaicism; and contains, also, detailed accounts respecting the religious and philosophic schools among the Arabs. See Ueberweg, Hist. of Philos. i, 429.
Aubifex, his brother. They are said to have come from the confines of Persia, in the time of Claudius II, to Rome, where, after rendering many services to the faithful, they were put to death under Aurelian or Diocletian, about A.D. 270. Their bodies, buried at some distance from Rome, were brought to that city about 820 by pope Pascal I and interred in the Church of St. Adrian, where they were found in 1590 at a place now called Santa Ninfa.

Abacus (Lat. from ἀβαξ, a board). This name is applied in architecture to the uppermost member or division of a capital.

1. In the Grecian and Roman orders it is a very essential feature.

In the Grecian Doric the abacus has simply the form of a square tile without either chamfer or moulding.

In the Roman Doric it has the addition of an ogee and fillet round the upper edge.

In the Tuscan a plain fillet with a simple cavetto under it is used instead of the ogee and fillet. In all these orders the abacus is of considerable thickness, and the moulding round the upper edge is called the cimiation of the abacus.

In the Grecian Ionic it is worked very much thinner, consisting of an ovolo or ogee, generally without any fillet above it, and is sometimes sculptured.

In the Roman Ionic it consists of an ogee or ovolo with a fillet above it. In all the preceding orders the abacus is worked square, but in the modern Ionic, the Corinthian, and the Composite, the sides are hollowed, and the angles, with some few exceptions in the Corinthian order, truncated. The mouldings used on the modern Ionic vary, but an ogee and fillet like the Roman are the most common. In the Corinthian and Composite orders the mouldings consist of an ovolo on the upper edge, with a fillet and cavetto beneath.

2. In the architecture of the Middle Ages, the abacus still remains an important feature, although its form and proportions are not regulated by the same arbitrary laws as in the classical orders: in the earlier styles there is almost invariably a clear line of separation to mark the abacus as a distinct division of the capital; but as Gothic architecture advanced with its accompanying variety of mouldings, the abacus was subject to the same capricious changes as all the other features of the successive styles, and there is often no really distinguishable line of separation between it and the rest of the capital.

It not unfrequently happens that the abacus is nearly or quite the only part of a capital on which mouldings can be found to show its date; it is therefore deserving of close attention.

In early buildings of the style spoken of as being, perhaps, Saxon, that is, belonging to the 11th century, the abacus is, in general, merely a long, flat stone without chamfer or moulding; but it sometimes varies, and occasionally bears some resemblance to the Norman form.

The Norman abacus is flat on the top and generally square in the earlier part of the style, with a plain chamfer on the lower edge, or a hollow is used instead. As the style advanced, other mouldings were introduced, and in rich buildings occasionally several are found combined; it is very usual to find the hollow on the lower edge of the abacus surmounted by a small channel or a bead.

If the top of the abacus is not flat, it is a sign that it is verging to the succeeding style.

In the Early English style the abacus is most commonly circular; it is, however, sometimes octagonal, and occasionally square, but not frequently in England, except early in this style. The most characteristic mouldings are deep hollows and overhanging rounds; in general, the mouldings in this style have considerable projections with deep and distinct hollows between them.

In the Decorated style, the form of the abacus is either circular or polygonal, very frequently octagonal. The circular abacus is especially an English feature; the octagonal abacus being most common on the Continent, especially in France. Hollows are not so frequently to be found, nor are they in general, when used, so deep cut; the mouldings and the modes of combining them are considerably, but round mouldings common, particularly a roll or scroll-moulding, the upper half of which projects and overlaps the lower, as in Merton College Chapel; this moulding may be considered as characteristic of the Decorated style, although it is to be met with in late Early English work. The round mouldings often have fillets worked on them, and these again are also found in Early English work.

In the Perpendicular style the abacus is sometimes

circular, but generally octagonal, even when the shaft and lower part of the capital is circular; when octagonal, particularly in work of late date, the sides are often slightly hollowed: in this style the moldings are not generally much undercut, nor are they so much varied as in the Decorated. A very usual form for the abacus consists of a waved moulding (of rounds and hollows united without forming angles) with a bead under it, as at Croydon, Surrey. The most prominent part of this moulding is sometimes worked flat, as a fillet, which then divides it into two oges, the upper being reversed: the oge may be considered as characteristic of the Perpendicular capital. The top of the abacus is sometimes splayed and occasionally hollowed out.

Abadir, in Phoenician mythology, was a name given to cone-formed stones, which were the oldest symbols of the deities.

Aballard, Pierre. See Abelard, Pierre.

Abajji ben-Cajji, surnamed Nachwami, belonged to that class of Jewish teachers who were styled Ama- raim, and occupied the presidency on the school of Pumbeditha from 333 to 338. He is said to have been tolerant of the heathen, and defended the book of Ben Sira, i. e. Ecclesiasticus, against his colleague Rab Joseph, who regarded it as heretical. In the exposition of the Scriptures, he adopted the simple against the customary artificial mode. His maxim was, "One and the same verse may be explained in a different sense, but the same sense cannot refer to different verses." See Hamburger, Real-Encyklopädie für Bibel und Talmud, s. v.; Bacher, Die Aggada der babylonischen Amora- raita (Strasburg, 1878), p. 197 sq. (B.P.)

Aban, in Persian mythology, was a gokius of water.

Abarbara, in Greek mythology, was a nymph whose affections Baculion, son of Laomedon, according to Homer (Hocid, vi, 39), won, and by him became mother of Eneas and Pallas. Both were slain before Troy by the hand of Euryalus.

Abacca, Don Joaquin, bishop of Leon, was born in 1780 in Aragon, Spain. He was one of the chief adherents of the faction of Don Carlos in Spain. In 1886 he was arrested near Bordeaux by the French government and banished to Frankfort, whence he went to rejoin the Pretender in the Basque provinces, with a quantity of silver which the Tory party had advanced to him. He, however, fell into disgrace, and died in 1844 in a convent of Carmelites friars at Lanza, near Turin. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Abaca, Pedro, a Spanish Jesuit, was born at Jaca, in Aragon, in 1619. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1641, and, after teaching theology at Salamanca for more than thirty-five years, died at Valen- cia, Oct. 1, 1689. He wrote, A History of the Kings of Aragon (1682-84), in Spanish—and treatises on The Knowledge and Will of God, Predestination, The Trinity, and The Incarnation and Perfection of Jesus Christ, all in Latin. See Biblioth. Hap. ii, 130; Journal des Sa- lons, 1774, p. 324.

Abaris ('Abapo'), in Greek legend, was (1) a priest of Apollo, whom the latter presented with a golden arrow, by which he was able to fly about the earth. It is related of him (Herod. iv, 36) that he came from the Hyperboreans, about the time of Cressus, to Greece, in order to deliver that country from a frightful plague. He built a temple to Proserpina at Sparta (Strabo, viii, 831; Pausan. iii, 13, 2). He is said by Iamblichus, in his Life of Pythagoras, to have performed wonders by means of an arrow which he had received from Apollo. Brucker relates that, in the time of a general plague, Abaris was summoned to the Seyon to help the Athenians. This plague happened in the third Olympiad. There seems little reason to doubt that Abaris went from place to place imposing upon the vulgar by false pretensions to supernatural powers. He passed through Greece, Italy, and many other countries, giving forth oracular predictions, pretending to be free from diseases by incantation, and practicating other acts of imposture. Some of the later Platonists, in their zeal against Christi- anity, collected the many fabulous tales reported of Abaris, and exhibited them in opposition to the miracles of Christ. (2) A table companion or a friend of king Turnus. (3) An inhabitant of Carausus who was slain by the hand of Perseus on the occasion of his mar- riage with Andromeda. See Smith, Dict. of Class. Biog. and Mythol., s. v.

Abarus, in Greek mythology, was a surname of Apollo, after Abas, a city in Phocis, where he had a temple. This temple was prized so highly, because of its ancient statues, that, after being destroyed twice, in the Persian and the Holy War, it was rebuilt.

Abas, in Greek legend, was (1) a king of Argos, renowned mainly through his great-grandson Perseus. His father was Acrisius, his mother Lycus, his wife the cruel Danaus. Abas built Lycurgus the news of Danaus's death, for which he was presented with a costly shield which Danaus had consecrated to Juno. (2) A son of Neptune and Amphithea, a river nymph. This nymph had appealed to Diana for protection from the persons around her. She was therefore changed into a cloud and then into water. (3) A son of Melampus and Iphianassa, a daughter of Protus. (4) An associate of Diomedes, who was transformed into a stormy petrel by Venus. (5) One of the Centaurs who opposed the Lapithae.

Abaskanton was an amulet worn by the Greeks as a preventive against becoming bewitched.

Abassines, a sect of the Greek Church, inhabiting an extended and wooded region along the coast of the Black Sea. They are a rough variety of the Circas- sians, and support themselves chiefly by plunder and piracy. From their isolated position they have fallen away from many of the doctrines and practices of the Eastern Church, to which they nominally belong. They observe several feasts, and believe in the seven sacraments, holding confession to be one of them; but they neither confess the number nor the particular species of their sins, exclaiming only in general, "I have sinned, I have sinned." On the repetition of this declaration, the offenders are absolved in a few words accompanied with some gentle stripes upon the side with an olive twig. But in the case of heinous crimes, such as homicide, adultery, and theft, they are often severely repressed. Their funeral rites are ushered in by cries, sighs, and groans. The relations of the deceased lash themselves, and the women disfigure their faces while the priest says a requiem over the deceased and perfumes the corpse. They put their dead into coffins constructed out of the hollowed trunks of trees, and bound round with the spirts or branches of vines. After the perform- ance of the funeral obsequies they bring out provisions and lay them upon the sepulchres of their de- ceased friends.

Abita (abara, inaccessible), a name given in early times to the altar, on account of the exclusion of the laity therefrom. The Council of Trullo (q. v.), canon 69, decreed that no layman whatever should come into the altar part, except only the emperor, when he and died in 1563. He was a devoted but disgraced himself by intemperance. He dashed off his work with negligence and haste, but, with such ingenuity of composition as to make us lament his idle-ness and dissipation. In the Gallery of Florence there is a fine picture of his—the Marriage at Cana. In connection with Schioldne, he painted some pictures in the Council Hall at Florence. He died in

Abati, Niccolò, an eminent historical painter, was born at Modena in 1512. He was a scholar of Antonio Bemarelli, an old designer and sculptor, and probably received instruction from Correggio. At the age of thirty-five he painted his celebrated work, the Marriage of St. Peter, for the Church of the Benedictines, now in the Dresden Gallery, which brought him into immediate notice. He afterwards painted, in the Candiano Palace, twelve pictures illustrating scenes from the twelve books of the Aeneid, which were highly praised by Lanzi. These pictures are now in the Florence Gallery. In the prime of his life he went to Bologna, where he executed, in the Palazzo Looii, in fresdo, a Natività, and at the Institute four subjects in a frieze representing musical assemblies and conversations; they were composed with such fine taste and elegance that they became the models of the Caracci, in proof of which Agostino Caracci wrote a sonnet in his praise, in which he attributed to him the symmetry of Raphael, the sublimity of Michael Angelo, the truth of Titian, the greatness of Correggio, and the grace of Parmigiano. His practice was so excellent that it is dsaid he never had occasion to retouch his work when dry. When Primaticcio was invited to the court of France by Francis I, to decorate the royal galleries, he selected Abati to assist him in the great work, esteeming him the most efficient. Abati died in Paris in 1571. Of his numerous fresco paintings but four remain, and his oil paintings are very rare. His great works at Modena and Bologna have been engraved by Domenico Cunego.

Abati, Guido Ubaldio, a distinguished painter of history in fresco, was born probably in 1600, and was early admitted into the Academy at Rome. He was a disciple of Cavaliere Giuseppe Cesari. One of his principal works is on the ceiling of the Chapel of St. Theresa, in the Church of Santa Maria della Vittoria at Rome. He died in 1656.

Abaur (Great Third) is a mystical spirit mentioned in chapter xiii of the Egyptian Ritual of the Dead.

Abbacy, the office of abbot (q. v.).

Abbadion (ἀβδαδίων), a Greek term for an ob-

Abbadopresbuteres (ἀβδοπρεσβυτορις), a Greek term for a monk who is in priest's orders.

Abba, a Hebrew teacher of the 4th century (279-330), is well known for his proficiency in Greek, and even instructed his daughter in that language. He is also known for his polemics and attacks against the Trinity and the ascension of Christ (Ieros. Trinikit, ii, 656; Genes. Radda, c. 29; Exod. Radda, c. 29). Of this Ab-bua we read (Aboth Sarah, fol. 4) that he recommended a certain rabbi Saphra to a noble Christian.

At this recommendation the Christian exempted rabbi Saphra from taxation for thirteen years. When the Church of Judah and the monarchy of the passage in Amos lii, 2, and perceived his ignorance, he asked rabbi Abbaeh about its meaning. Having received a satisfactory answer, the Christian asked, 'Why is rabbi Saphra, whom you recommended to me as a great man, so ignorant in the Scriptures, which thou didst explain immediately?' To this rabbi Abbaeh answered, 'We who come in contact with you Christians are obliged for our self-preservation to study the Scriptures, because you dispute so often with us from the Scriptures; but the other Jews who live among Gent-tiles have no use of that, since they do not dispute with them concerning the Scriptures.' The Samaritans he regarded as heathen, and forbade the use of their wine

(Cholin, fol. 6 b). Of his maxims we mention, 'Be always of the persecuted, but not of the persecutors

(Bab Kamma, fol. 99); 'Better to commit a sin secretly than to profane the name of God openly' (Peshachin, fol. 56); 'In the place where the penitent stands, not even the righteous can stand' (Sibhedrin, fol. 99).

When he died, it was hyperbolically said that 'the columns of the temple were broken by tears' (Midr. Ketaa, fol. 3 a). See Hamburger, Real-Encyclopädie, ii, 4 sq. (B. P.)

Abbandus (or Abbandus), a priest and theologue of the 12th century, was a contemporary of Bérenger and Abelard. We have nothing accurate concerning his life. He was the author of Tractatus de Fratione Corporis Christi in Eucharistia, inserted in the third volume of the Analecta of Mabillon. This is a treatise against those who claim that the breaking of the body of Jesus Christ in the eucharist is only such in appearance, and not in reality. After the condemnation of Bérenger, many questions arose as to the sense of certain articles in the Confession which had been proposed to him for signature in the Synod of Rome. Among other things, it was said by some that the breaking of the body of Christ was only made in the species of bread;

others maintained that it was the actual body which was broken. The former held that after the change of the bread and wine into the substance of the body and blood of Jesus Christ, the species of bread and wine remained, and that the breaking was made only in them. The latter held that a change had taken place as well as in the substance. Abbandus supported the latter view. He is said to have died about 1142. See Ceillier, Hist. des Auteurs Sacr. et Eccl. xii, 197.

Abbanus, Sr., the name of two Irish abbots. (1.)

Of Cill-Abban, in Uí-Muirseacháig, County Meath, is probably identical with St. Abban of Cill-Abban. He was originally named Abban Buidhe, and was the son of St. Ibar, the contemporary of St. Patrick, in the 5th century. Of him nothing certain is known. He is commemorated in the calendars March 16. (2.) Of the son of the sister of St. Coemgen, in the 6th century, is commemorated October 27. The names of these abbes are mentioned as having been founded by this saint, almost all in the southern half of Ireland. See O'Clery, Martyrsl. Dungall.; Colgan, Acta SS. Hiberniae; Acta SS.

Magh-Armuidhe, in Uí-Ceinnsealláig, County Wexford,

Octobris, xii, 270.

Abbas (Ἀβᾶς), a Greek term for (1) father, (2)

a monk, and (3) an abbot.

Abbas (properly Abad-el-Mottalib), the paternal uncle of Mohammad and progenitor of the Mohammadan dynasty of the Abbasides (q. v.), was born at Mecca about A.D. 566. He was but four years the senior of Mohammed, and was still a pagan when the prophet began his public career, and long remained his open enemy. He fought against Mohammed in the battle of Beir, and was taken prisoner; but as soon as the cause of the prophet seemed to succeed, he gave in his adhesion to the new faith, and defended it zealously.

When Mecca surrendered to Mohammed, the holy well

Zemzem was retained, although a monument of paganism, in deference to Abbas, its keeper. He was the chief mourner at Mohammed's funeral, and his presence and memory were treated with great respect by the

Abbasides, a name given to the third Mohamdedan dynasty, the caliphs of Bagdad, which was founded by Abul Abbas, who claimed the caliphate as lineal descendant of Mohammed's uncle Abbas (q. v.),

from whom the name is derived. The Abbassides were the successors of the Ommiads, the caliphs of Damascus. Early in the 8th century the family of Abbas had assumed power in Iraq, and influence; and during the fourth descent from Abbas, obtained several successes over the Ommiads, but was captured and put to death in 747. Ibrahim's brother, Abul Abbas, whom he had named his heir, assumed the title of caliph, and, by a decisive victory near the river Zab in 756, effected the overthrow of the Ommiad dynasty. The vanquished family was treated with such severity that Abul Abbas gained the surname of Al-Saffah, the Bloody. On the death of Abul Abbas, Al-Mansur succeeded to the throne, and founded Bagdad as the seat of the empire. The descendants of Abul Abbas to the number of thirty-six, the last of whom was Mustassem, reigned until 1258, when the dynasty was expelled by Hulaku Khan. The line includes the illustrious names of Al-Mansur, Haroun al-Rashid, and Al-Mamun, but from the 10th century they sank to mere spiritual chiefs of Islam. After their deposition at Bagdad, in 1258, a member of the family, named Ahmed, fled to Egypt, where he was recognised as caliph, and his descendants reigned there, under the protection of the Mamelukes, until Egypt was conquered by the Turks, in 1517. Motawakkel III, the last caliph, was taken by Sultan Selim I, the conqueror of Egypt, to Constantinople, and detained there some time as a prisoner. He afterwards returned to Egypt, and died at Cairo, a pensionary of the Ottoman government, in 1538.

Abbat, the same as abbéd (q.v.).

Abbati, the name of a sect of the Vaudois, which was spread over Italy towards the end of the 14th century, and are charged with having indulged in every kind of brutality. They lasted, however, but a short time.

Abbatiæa (aβbarias), a Greek term for an abbey or monastery.

Abbattisa. See ANDRES.

Abbes, Guillaume, a French theologian and native of Béziers, lived in the first half of the 17th century, and are charged with having indulged in every kind of brutality. They lasted, however, but a short time.

Abbatia (aβbarias), a Greek term for an abbey or monastery.

Abbes, James, an English martyr of the 16th century, was a Christian who, because of his devotion to God and his fellow-men, was compelled to travel from place to place to avoid the peril of being apprehended. He was finally caught by some wicked men, and taken before the bishop of Norwich and examined. They threatened him in order to make him desist from his pious labors, until he yielded to their wishes against his conscience. 'The bishop gave him a piece of money; but poor James had scarcely left the house when his conscience troubled him so that he went immediately to the bishop again, and threw the money which he had given him into his lap, saying, 'I am sorry that I consented to give you the money.' The bishop began anew some scheme by which to win him over, but all was in vain. He was therefore taken to Bury, Aug. 2, 1555, and burned. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, vii, 328.

Abbes, the female superior of a body of nuns. The office of abbess was elective and for life (triennial abbesses, however, are mentioned belonging to years so late as 1565, 1583); an abbess was restricted to one monastery; was bound to render obedience to the bishop in all things; and was subject to be deprived for misconduct, but only upon report of the bishop to the king. She was bound, also, to give account of monastic property to both king and bishop; was entitled to absolute obedience, possessing ample powers of discipline, even to expulsion, but could not excommunicate; neither could she give the veil or ordin. In France an abbess was not to leave her monastery, save once a year if summoned by the king, with the bishop's consent, to his presence upon monastic business. Neither was she to speak to any man except upon necessary business, and then before witnesses, and between the first hour of the day and evening. Abbesses had no power to choose confessors for themselves or for their nuns without the sanction of the ordinary. There have been instances of abbesses attending provincial synods, when they were distinguished by the pastoral staff and veil of procession (ferret at sixty years of age). The dress of an abbess in the 12th century consisted only of a long white tunic with close sleeves, probably of linen, and a black surcoat of equal length with sleeves large and loose, and a hood drawn up so as to cover the head completely.

Ab-beth-din (אַבְתֶּ דִּינָא, i.e. the father or head of the house of judgment, or juridical college) is a term used in the Talmud to denote the vice-president of the Sanhedrin, who sat at the right of the nasi, or president, while at the left sat the chacham, i.e. the wise man. These three persons were called "the ancient," or רחמים, also "the judges," or ראם. In the absence of the nasi, the ab-beth-din presided. The other members of the Sanhedrin occupied places according to their rank in the college. At a late period a certain punctilious etiquette prevailed. Thus, when the nasi entered, all the members were expected to rise and remain standing till he had invited them to resume their places. When the ab-beth-din entered, all were expected to collect their chairs and again to sit down without intention to that effect; while the chacham was only saluted by each individual member rising as he passed, and immediately sitting down again. Only the ab-beth-din was initiated into the mysteries of the law (Chap. 13); and when he died, the lectures in the schools of his place were suspended. (B.P.)

Abbey, David A., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Ulster County, N. Y., April 6, 1813. He was converted in 1830 and united with the Reformed (Dutch) Church. In 1838 he graduated at Yale College: in 1839 he entered the Theological Seminary at Auburn, N. Y., finished his course in 1841, and was licensed by the Cayuga Presbytery. He was a man of great accuracy both in literary composition and in business. He died of typhoid fever at Apalachin, N. Y., Dec. 6, 1865. See Wilson, Preb. Hist. Almanac, 1867, p. 271.

Abbo, a name of Cernua (the crooked), a French monk, who was also called Abbo Parisiensiis because he was of the monastery of Saint-Germain-des-Prés, is said to have died in 923. He was present at the siege of Paris by the Normans in 887. Of this siege he wrote the history in a poem in three books, which has been admitted into Pithou's and Duchesne's collections. A more correct edition, with notes and a French translation, may be seen in the Nouvelles Annales de Paris (1763, 4to). There are also Five Select Sermons under his name, Doctoris Et Divini Sacramentis Speculum (vol. i.), and in Bbl. PP. (Colon. 1618), vol. vi., in Abobii Epistola ad Desiderium Episc. The third book of the Siege, addressed "to the clergy," has been omitted by his editors, as having no connection with the history. See Chartiers, Bbl. Dict. s. v.; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Bbl. Générale, s. v.

Abbo, bishop of Nevers, lived contemporaneously with the emperor Charles the Bald. He subscribed the third Council of Soissons in 868, as also those held at Troyes in 867 and 878, and the one held at Poitiers in 876.

Abbo, a bishop of Soissons and a successor of Rhodoin, who subscribed the Council of Troies in 921, and the one of Rheims in 923. He held the position of chancellor of St. Medard Rudolph, the successor of Charles the Simple, and died in 987.
ABBOTT

Abbott (sometimes written abbot), the head or superior of an abbey or monastery, corresponding to abess for a house of nuns.

1. Different Kinds.—Abbots were distinguished by the epithets commendatory, crowned, field, lay, mitred, occumenical (i. e. general), according to circumstances. See Aznor (in vol. i).

2. Order of Ele...—Thomassin (Discipline de l'Eglise) states that after A.D. 600 the bishopric were the ordinary and universal collators to all benefices, and that the privilege of electing abbots was granted subsequently to monasteries, and by its general use became at last a common right. But he does not well prove that it was in effect abolished in the fourth council of the chapter and the chapter De Ordinando Abbo... and the constitution of the Lateran De Electione Facienda per Scrutinum, etc., were read. The election was then made in one of three ways: 1. Per inspirationem, i. e. the whole fraternity with one voice required the same man for abbot. 2. Per scrutinium, i.e. by electing three members of the fraternity to receive secretly the votes of the others. 3. Per compromissum, i. e. when certain members of the fraternity were appointed to elect an abbot. The election having been pronounced, the abbot-elect was led into the abbey church, and, receiving from the abbot and from the chapter officers, he placed his right hand upon the abbot’s seat in the choir. In the chapter-house he took the oath upon the gospels to preserve the liberties and privileges of the house; after which the members of the fraternity were introduced to him, kissed him, and promised obedience.

3. Confirmation and Benediction.—After election, the assent of the prince having been obtained, the confirmation of the election was required. This originally belonged to the bishop of the diocese, but afterwards passed into the hands of the pope, who appointed a person to see whether the election had been proper, and, if so, to confirm it. Subsequently, the different orders of the pope the privilege of electing one of their number a local prelate, i.e. a person who, having received the confirmation of his own election from the pope, had the power to confirm the elections of the abbots of the order to which he belonged. The benediction was received from the bishop three days after the confirmation in the presence of two other abbots. The benediction of an abbot was not absolutely essential, and yet without it an abbot could not confer orders nor exercise many other privileges.

4. Duties, Power, etc.—The duties of abbots (according to the rule of St. Benedict) were to instruct by the conversation and to edify by their example; to care for the spiritual and temporal affairs of their abbeys; to act as fathers to all, without respect of persons; etc. Novices received the tonsure from the abbot upon entering the monastic state. It was the duty of the abbot to proceed to Rome every three years, unless excused by the local abbot; to attend the court of the Holy Thursday; to feed twelve poor persons during Lent; to clean the sanctum sanctorum on Easter-eve; to perform the office of co... (Martene, De Act. Monast. Rom.) The power of the abbot was almost absolute. In spiritual matters he could excommunicate and grant dispensations to his monks; he could, either in person or by deputy, absolve them; he could reserve certain cases (specified in the bull of Clement VIII, 1558) to himself. He could not, however, without the consent of the community, profess novices, nor nominate to the abbey benefices, nor dispose the conventual priors elected canonically by the chapters. He could bless the ornaments of the church and the altar of his monastery, but not the chalices, nor anything that required unction, without the pope’s leave. He could give the tonture and the four lowest orders in cases where he possessed episcopal jurisdiction or had papal authority to do so. In temporal matters the abbot could buy, sell, bargain, exchange, etc., but could not raise money for the glory of the monastery, nor give up any of its privileges, nor dispose of the savings which he might have made.

5. Rights, Prerogatives, etc.—(1.) Abotts took rank immediately after the bishop, and with them had the title of prelate. (2.) Many abbots had the privilege granted them by the pope of wearing within their own churches the gloves, mitre, and pastoral staff in common with the bishops. (3.) Abbots had the right of giving the benediction within their own churches after vespers, mass, and matins, but could not do so without special permission when a bishop was present. (4.) Certain abbots had the privilege of wearing the episcopal vestments, but only of the three orders of the order of their order. (5.) According to the reply of Gregory XIII to questions put to him by the Council of Rouen in 1581, the following is the order of precedence observed in synods: (1) Abbots who have received the benediction and who are privileged to use the mitre; (2) abbots commendatory; (3) dignitaries of cathedrals; (4) proctors.

6. Deposition.—Abbots immediately subject to the holy see could be deposed by the pope alone; those not exempt, by their bishops, or by their superiors, or the general chapter. The crimes specially punished with deposition were those of incontinence or extravagance. See Gilbert, Fast. Eccles. p. 368; Bingham, Christ. Antiq. bk. vii, ch. iii, § 12 sq.

Abbott, Benjamin, L.L.D., a Unitarian minister, was a native of Andover, Mass. He graduated at Harvard College in 1788, and immediately afterwards took charge of the academy at Exeter. This position he held, with the highest reputation, until 1808, when he resigned it. He died in Exeter, and was buried in the churchyard, and in 1811. See Sprague, A.,of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 466.

Abbott, George (known as “The Puritan”), son (or grand son) of Sir Thomas Abbott, was born at Easington, East Yorkshire, in 1603 or 1604. He was elected probationer fellow of Merton College, Oxford, in 1624; and admitted L.L.D. in 1630. He held Caldecote, Warwickshire, against prince Rupert and Maurice during the Civil War. Mr. Abbott was a member of the Long Parliament for Tamworth. He was not a clergyman, as has been said by some, nor yet a nephew of the archbishop of the same name; but he was a theologian and scholar of rare ability. He died Feb. 2 (or 4), 1648. He was the author of The Whole Book of Psalms, Paraphrased, or Made Easy for Any to Understand (1640):

Vinodice Sabbathi (1641): — Brief Notes upon the Whole Book of Psalms (1651). See Wood (Bisse’s), Athenae Oxonienses, n.s.; Cox, Literature of the Sabbath.

Abbott, Gorham Dunner, L.L.D., an American minister, teacher, and writer, was born at Brunswick, Me., Sept. 8, 1807. He graduated at Bowdoin College in 1829, taught five years on Mount Desert, and in 1834 was called to pastor the Presbyterian Church at Andover. As pastor of the Presbyterian Church at New Rochelle, N. Y.; in 1841 he became travelling agent for the American Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge; in 1848 he organized the Abbott Collegiate Institute, for young ladies, in New York, which was afterwards called the Spinger Institute. He retired from public life in 1866, and died July 31, 1874. He published, Pleasure and Profit.—Prayer-book for the Young:—The Family at Home:—Nathan Dickerman:—Mexico and the United States: their mutual Relations and Common Interests (1869):—and other works.

Abbot, Hull, a Congregational minister, was born in Boston, Mass., June 15, 1702. He graduated at Harvard College in 1720; and died April 9, 1774, after a ministry of more than fifty years. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 241.

Abbot, Jacob, a Unitarian minister, was born at Wilton, N. H., Jan. 7, 1784. He prosecuted his studies, in a private school kept by one Mr. Birge, who had opened a school in Wilton. He graduated at Harvard College in 1792, and immediately began teaching school in Billerica, Mass. Whatever of leisure he could command he devoted to the study of theology, under the direction of the Rev. Dr. Cumming, the Congregational minister of that place. He continued teaching but one year, when he returned to Cambridge and continued his theological studies under the direction of Dr. Tappan. He commenced preaching in 1795. After preaching in various places until 1797, he went to Coventry, Conn., and was shortly afterwards engaged to preach in the neighboring parish of Giblet. In 1798 he went to Hampton Falls, and commenced preaching there as a candidate. In due time a call was presented him, which he accepted, and was constituted their pastor in August of the same year. He was for many years a useful member of the Board of Trustees of the Exeter Phillips Academy; and also, for some years, a trustee of the Female Academy at Derry. He resigned his charge at Hamp- ton Falls in April, 1826, and removed to a farm in Windham, N. H., where he preached occasionally in neighboring parishes. During the winter of 1827–28 he supplied Dr. Abiel Abbot's pulpit in Beverly, Mass. At Windham he preached, after a Unitarian society was formed there, and also superintended the schools of the town. On Nov. 2, 1824, as he was crossing a pond on his return from meeting, the boat was upset and he was drowned. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 320.

Abbot, John Emery, a Unitarian minister, was born at Exeter, N. H., in 1793. He graduated at Bowdoin College, Me., in 1810. Shortly after leaving college he began his theological studies, and became a member of the Cambridge Unitarian Church, and there studied with the minister, the Rev. Jonathan French, the minister of the congregation in that place. In a short time, however, he went back to Cambridge, and was employed as a substitute officer of the college, at the same time pursuing his theological studies under Dr. Ware, professor of theology. In 1811 he was appointed librarian of the college, and held the office two years, at the end of which time he was licensed to preach in 1808; and, during his residence at Cambridge, preached at various places in the neighboring parishes. He was ordained and installed pastor of the First Church in Boston July 14, 1813. His health began to fail him while here, and he was obliged to take a voyage for his recovery. He passed the following summer in Brighton, near Boston; from there he went to Medford; and, finally, in reduced health, returned to his father's in Andover, where he died, Oct. 17, 1814. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 420.

Abbot, Robert, s. noted English Puritan divine, but not a conformist, was born about 1669. He was educated at Cambridge, where he afterwards studied divinity, and was afterwards incorporated at Oxford. In 1616 he was presented to the vicarage of Cranbrook, Kent, by archbishop George Abbot. His ministry at this place was very effective; "his parishioners were as his own sons and daughters to him; and by day and by night he thought upon and prayed for them, and was with them." In 1643 he was transferred to the living of Southwick, Hants; and subsequently he became pastor of St. Augustine, London, where he continued to a good old age. He disappears from history some time previous to 1662. He wrote several works, which are distinguished for their tenacity and variety. The principal of these are, A Hand of Fellowship to Help Keep Out Sinne and Antichrist (1623);—See Thankful London and her Sisters (1626);—Triall of our Church-Forakers (1639). See Brook, Puritans, iii, 182, 183; Wood (Bliss's), Athene Oxoniensis.

Abbots, Arch, Commentary, Crosiered, Fields, Lat., Ecumenical, Regular, Secular. See Abbot.

Abbot, Alfred Freeman, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Lowestoft, July 8, 1816. Piously trained, he early entered upon Christian work, and in 1839 was accepted as a candidate for the ministry. His sympathy for the poor and afflicted, the simplicity of his trust in Christ, the singleness of his aim, and the cheerfulness of his disposition greatly endeared him to the people, and his triumphant and chastened spirit. At the Conference of 1870, when he proceeded to Waford, Herts, where he died, Dec. 4, 1873. See Minutes of Wesleyan Conference, 1880, p. 20.

Abbot, Charles F., a Congregational minister, was born at Levinton, Vt., Nov. 27, 1831. He was converted when nineteen years of age; fitted for college at Chester; graduated at Middlebury College in 1854, and at Andover Theological Seminary in 1861. He offered himself as a missionary to the necessity surrounded by the missionary for Foreign Missions, and was assigned work in Persia. The war, however, interfered with his going abroad at that time, and he was ordained at Bristol, N. H., in 1862, where he labored until his death, Sept. 20, 1866. Mr. Abbot was universally beloved; frank, generous, and noble; well disciplined and trained; sweet sorrow, but cheerful; and, although anxious to live, cheerful by the thought of rest.
ABBOTT

the privilege of welcoming a larger number of converts in Christian churches than Mr. Abbott. See Gammell, Hist. of Amer. Bapt. Missions, p. 185-186, 181, 182.

Abbott, George, commenced his ministry among the Bible Christians in 1834. He labored with acceptability on eight different appointments in Somersetshire, Devonshire, and Cornwall, England. At South Netherton he was appointed twice. In his ministerial duties he was diligent and faithful, and his liberality was praiseworthy. After months of sickness, he died rather than sit by, as he could not officiate in a South Netherton Circuit, Sept. 25, 1878. See Minutes of 61st Annual Conference, 1879.

Abbott, Jacob, D.D., a Congregational minister and writer, elder brother of John S. C., was born at Hallowell, Me., Nov. 14, 1803. He graduated at Bowdoin College in 1820, and at Andover Theological Seminary in 1824. He was (for one year) tutor, and then professor of mathematics, in Amherst College (1825-29), and afterwards took charge of Mount Vernon school for girls in Boston. Sept. 18, 1834, he was ordained pastor of a new Congregational Church in Roxbury, Mass., but in 1886 he removed to Farmington, Me., and devoted himself to literary pursuits. He died at the latter place Oct. 31, 1879. He was the author of a very popular and in many respects valuable work on war and peace, especially for young persons, of which the most decided religious was the Young Christian Series (N. Y. 1832 sq. 5 vols.). See Cong. Year-book, 1880, p. 9.

Abbott, Jacob Jackson, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Groton, Vt., July 17, 1818. He was prepared for college at Peacham Academy, and in 1835 entered Dartmouth College, where he graduated in 1839. In 1841 he returned to Dartmouth College as a tutor, remaining there two years, until 1843, at which time he entered the Union Theological Seminary, and, after spending two years in study, graduated in 1845. His first pastorate was at Bennington, Vt., where he was ordained Aug. 27, 1845, and remained two years, when he was dismissed (Aug. 17, 1847). He then went South, and became agent for the Tract Society, which position he retained one year. April 8, 1850, he was installed at Uxbridge, Mass., and in 1861 offered his resignation, but continued to supply the pulpit until Oct. 30, 1862, when he was dismissed. He was installed at Yarmouth, Vt. Oct. 19, 1865, and resigned Oct. 14, 1875. He also served on the Christian Commission during 1844-45. From Yarmouth he went to Danville, N. Y., where he acted as a supply until 1877. From thence he went to New Haven, Conn., in September, 1877, where he remained until his death, which occurred Dec. 3, 1884. He published several articles in the Biblioth. Soc. See Cong. Year-book, 1879, p. 86. (W. P. S.)

Abbott, John Stephens Cabot, D.D., a Congregational minister and writer, was born in Brunswick, Me., Sept. 18, 1805. He graduated at Bowdoin College in 1825, and at Andover Theological Seminary in 1829. He was ordained in 1830, and settled as pastor of churches successively at Worcester, Roxbury, and Nantucket, Mass., and New Haven, Conn. In 1844 he relinquished the pastorate and devoted himself exclusively to literature, except as he supplied some pulpits occasionally. He died at Fair Haven, Conn., June 17, 1877. He published numerous interesting works, chiefly on historical subjects, besides several of a directly religious character, especially Christian Duty:—Practical Christianity, etc. See Harper's Weekly for July 7, 1877.

Abbott, Joseph, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born in Philadelphia, Aug. 16, 1808. At the age of sixteen he entered the sophomore class in the University of Pennsylvania, and left that institution at the close of his junior year, completing his course at Union College, N. Y. During the greater part of the two years following he studied medicine, and soon after became a member of the First Presbyterian Church. His attention having been directed to the ministry; he entered the Andover Theological Seminary, where, after graduating, he devoted a year to the exclusive study of the Hebrew language. During the autumn and winter of 1830-31 he supplied the pulpit of the First Presbyterian Church in Newburyport, Mass. The next two years were passed in leisure study; and then he was ordained pastor of the Dane Street Church, Beverly, Mass., Oct. 23, 1834, and continued in this pastorate more than thirty years. He resigned in March, 1865, and thereafter continued to reside in Beverly until his death, which occurred April 9, 1887. He acquired an excellent reputation as a scholar, and was an impressive preacher and an admirable pastor. See Cong. Quar. 1870, p. 383.

Abbott, Pitson Joseph, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Cobleskill, N. Y., Aug. 11, 1818. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Albany May 8, 1841. He graduated at Union College, N. Y., in 1861, and afterwards entered Princeton Seminary, N. J., and Andover. In 1844 he began his labors at the Sydney Plains, Delaware Co., N. Y., in September, 1864; but left this field and accepted a call to the Church at Chazy, Clinton Co., May 1, 1868. In 1871 he went to Jefferson; next to Cannonsville, where he continued until 1875; in which year he died, May 11. Mr. Abbott was an earnest, indefatigable worker in the ministry, and held the esteem and confidence of all his fellow-laborers. In all the relations of life he was faithful and true. See Necrological Report of Princeton Theol. Seminary, April 25, 1876.

Abbott, Samuel, a wealthy philanthropist, who died Andover, Mass., April 30, 1812, at the age of eighty, was a merchant of Boston; and on the establishment of the Andover Theological Seminary in 1807, he gave $20,000, and in whose will it bequeathed $100,000 more. See Drake, Dict. of Amer. Biog., s. v.

Abbott, Thomas J., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Hartley, Canada, July 5, 1831. He experienced religion early in life; studied for the ministry in the Concord Theological School; received license to preach in 1858; and in 1859 was admitted into the New England Conference. In 1873 he was transferred to the South Carolina Conference, and for three years served the Centenary Church, Charleston. He then returned to the New England Conference, and labored zealously until his death, March 7, 1878. Mr. Abbott was a conscientious, outspoken man, an intense hater of caste, and heroic in his efforts relating to human freedom. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1878, p. 47.

Abbott, William Penn, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born near Wilkesbarre, Pa., Dec. 31, 1838. His paternal great-grandfather died defending his home against the Indians in the famed Wyoming Valley; his maternal grandfather, the Hon. Charles Miller, was the historian of Wyoming; and his cousin, Mrs. Anna Wentworth, was one of our earliest missionaries to China. When but a lad his father died, leaving him to the teachings and influences of his devoted Christian mother. From a child he knew the Scriptures. His education was limited to an academic course at West Chester, Pa., and a short time under the Rev. Dr. Nelson at Kingston. In 1859 he professed conversion; in 1860 was licensed to preach and labored within the limits of the Wyoming Conference, and in 1863 entered that conference on trial. In 1866 he was transferred to the Troy Conference, and in 1869 to the New York Conference, where he was stationed successively at Trinity Church, New York; Washington Square, and Thirty-ninth and Thirty-first Street, New York city, where he died Dec. 22, 1878. From the opening of his ministry Mr. Abbott attracted attention, and received the conversion of souls as God's seals to his ministry. He had no barren year in all the sixteen, and was never more successful.
ful than on his last charge. He was a diligent student, gifted with a prodigious memory, a well-balanced mind, quick perceptions, and a sound and healthful tact. His presence was commanding and prepossessing; his sermons short, practical, methodical, claspetic, and piercing. He excelled as a pastor, and was best known as a great-hearted Christian friend. SeeMinutes of Annual Conferences, 1879, p. 27.

Abbt, Thomas, a German theological writer, was born at Ulm, Nov. 25, 1738. He received his education in his native place, and in 1756 went to the University of Halle, where he was invited by Prof. Baumgarten to live in his house. In 1760 he was appointed professor extraordinary of philosophy in the University of Frankfort-on-the-Oder. He passed six months of the following year at Berlin, and left that city to fill the mathematical chair at the University of the Saxon University. Wearying of academical life, he entered the profession of law, and in 1765 was presented by the reigning prince of Schaumburg-Lippe to the office of councillor of the court, regency, and consistory of Bückeburg. He died Nov. 27, 1766. Besides other publications (in German or Latin), he wrote early paradoxical essays on The Burial of Moses (Halle, 1757, 4to)—Confusion of Tongues Not a Punishment (ibid. 4to)—Search of Truth (ibid. 1759, 4to). See Nicolai. Ehrregehdichtnis d. Abbt (Berlin, 1767, 4to).

Abbuna. See Aruna.

Abutto, a Japanese idol, invoked for curing disease, and for procuring favorable winds for sailing.

Abdal, a name given to a peculiar class of Moham- medan devotees. They go bareheaded and with naked legs, half covered with the skin of the wild beast, having a leathern girdle about the waist, from which hangs a bag. Some of them have about the middle of their bodies a copper serpent, bestowed upon them by their doctors as a mark of learning. They wear girdles before and behind, and when they walk, they make a noise by the contact of the girdles. They are in the mosques, in the markets, and in the streets, and are helped by their doors of clubs, which they use as a magical wand. They chiefly employ themselves in wandering about, selling relics, and obtaining charity. They are also called Chantins and Calefars.

Abdallah Ibn-Taib Abul-Faraj was a native of Irak, and a Christian physician of the sect of Nestori- ans, who died about 1048. He wrote commentaries upon Aristotle and Galen. He also wrote a large number of works upon medicine and theology, which have never been published. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Abdechauss (Abdechauss, or Abdella), a mar- tyr, vicar of Simeon, bishop of Seleucia. He died near the middle of the 4th century, during the persecution of the Christians in Persia under the reign of Sapor II. His memory is celebrated April 21.

Abdeimamis, an Egyptian who became a Coptie monk and priest of the Monastery of St. Macarius in the desert. He was procurator and orator of Gabriel, patriarch of Alexandria. His publications are, A Depu- tation of the Patriarch to Pope Clement VIII:—and A Profession of Faith (made at Rome, Jan. 14, 1558), given in Baronius, vol. vi, at the end. See Landou, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Abderus, in Greek mythology, was a son of Mer- cury or of Thorius, a favorite of Hercules. According to others, he was the servant of Diomedes, king of the Bistones of Thrace, all slain by Hercules.

Abdilannas, a Christian martyr of Africa, commemo- rated as a saint in the Hieronymian martyrology on April 24.

Abdias Ben-Shalom, a celebrated rabbi of the 7th century. He sent a number of Jewish doctors, it is said, to Arabia, to discuss with Mohammed the laws of Moses. The result of this discussion, which is of great authority to Mussulmans, is found at the end of the Koran printed at Zurich in 1548. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Abdesus (Abel-Jezus, i.e. servant of Jesus), a martyr, who died near the middle of the 4th century, during the persecution of the Christians in Persia under the reign of Sapor II. His memory is celebrated April 22. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Abdisassi (Abdisai, Abd-jeus, or Hbed-geus), a monk of the Order of St. Pachomius, and afterwards patriarch of Mosul, a city of Asiatic Turkey. He went to Rome between 1550 and 1555, and adjured Nestorianism; and after the death of Simon Sulache he was made Latin patriarch of Mosul, which election was confirmed by Pius IV, who conferred on him the pallium, March 7, 1562. Thomassin relates that he was present at the Council of Trent; Sarpi, that he wrote an epistle to the synod, but was not present. Abdisssi was perfect master of Chaldee, Arabic, and Syriac; he maintained that his ancestors had received their doctrine from St. Thomas and Thaddaus, and that their faith was in all respects conformable to that of the Roman Church. Before he adjured Nestorianism, Abdisssi wrote various works in Syriac, in defence of his original faith, which are mentioned by Abraham Ezechellus, Catalogue of Syriac Writers (Rome, 1658). See Thomassin, pt. i, bk. cix, xxiv, p. 9; Sarpi, Storia del Concilio Tri- dentino.

Abdon. The modern Abed was examined by Tristram carefully, who "found traces of a very extensive town, with sculptures of the Greek period, and a solitary column standing out in the plain at no great distance" (Bible Places, p. 292).

Abdon (Abdo, or Abdus) and Sennan (Sen- nes, or Sennus) are said to have suffered martyrdom under Decius. They were Persian princes who, because they had buried the bodies of martyrs, were brought in chains to Rome, and beheaded with some other martyrs.

Abegg, Johann Friedrich, a Protestant divine of Germany, was born at Rothenau, near Kreuznach, Nov. 30, 1755; and died at Heidelberg, Dec. 16, 1840, while he had been actively engaged as professor of theology since 1817. At the same year the Heidelberg University had created him doctor of divinity. Although he lectured for about twenty years, yet he wrote very little. With the exception of a few printed sermons and recensions, he has left nothing behind. See Ulmann, in Thes. Stud. u. Krit. 1841, p. 515 sq.; Holtzmann, in Allgemeine deutsche Biographie, s. v. (B.P.)

Abel (𝜙), Philo, De Sacrific. Ab. et Cain, § 1 (Richter's ed. p. 164 of Manger) explains "ἲμι αὐτῷ ἐν Θεῷ, referring to God, and more fully in Quod Det. Pot. Instr. § 10 (ibid. p. 197), ὁ μὴ γὰρ ἴμι, ἐν Θεῶ πάντων φαίνεται δύναμις, i.e. "for Abel, who refers everything to God, is the God-loving opinion." Accordingly, Philo read ἴμι, and dividing it into ἴμι and ἴμι, ἴμι = Θεός, and ἴμι = ἰαμάρωτος, like σωφρς, σωφρη, "to desire," because he regards Abel as φαίνεται, in opposition to Cain, whom he calls φαίνεται, "self-loving." This explanation we also find in Ambrose, De Cain et Ab. i, 1: "Abel (dictus qui omnìs referret ad Deum) plia devota mentis attentione non habet, sed superioribus tributum conditor quod accepisset ab eo." In De Migr. Abru. § 13 (ibid. p. 447), Philo writes: οἰμάτα δὲ οὐκ εἰσὶν τούτο ταῦτα πεινοῦσιν καὶ ἄδινατα εὐθαρσοῦσιν. This second explanation of Philo we find in Theoclet, at ὅτα ἐγὼ ὑποτάκτως ὑπό τινα εὐθείας γραμμής. Eutrop. L.; and Euseb. Prep. Ec. (ed. Viger. Col. 1698), xi. 518. Jerome, in De Nom. Heb., gives two explanations: luctus and "vapor," "vanitas," the latter referring to ὑπάρχειν. Between these two explanations Cyprian, Tract. de Sina et Sion, seems to vacillate, for he says, "Abel filius Adae nomen accept Hebraicum signans fratris interfectionem ([יסב] et parentum luctum ([יפלכ])." (b. P.)

Abel, Sw., an Irish abbot of Imleach-fach (now Ennagh, County Meath), is recorded to have died in 742. See O'Donovan, Annals of the Four Masters.

Abel, David, an English Congregational minister, was born at Llanwyry, near Carmarthen, March 1, 1789. At the age of eighteen he was admitted into the college at Carmarthen as a student for the ministry. On leaving college, Mr. Abel preached at Gower for six months, and then removed to Bards Park Chapel, Leicestershire, where he was ordained, and continued to be pastor for fifty-eight years. In March, 1870, he removed to Rugby, and there died, Aug. 18, 1871. See (Lond.) Comp. Foren. Lit. ii, 129, 1872. (J. C. S.)

Abel, Ephraim, a Baptist minister, was born in Orange County, Va., about the middle of the last century. He became a hopeful Christian under the preaching of the celebrated John Leland, by whom he was baptized, not far from the year 1788. Soon after he was ordained; and, after being publicly set apart to the work of the ministry, he removed to Fauquier County, where he preached much as an itinerant minister. Subsequently he had the pastoral charge of the church at Hartwood, Stafford Co., and the church at Brentsville, Prince William Co. He died about the year 1809, universally lamented in the large section of country in which he was for many years the only minister of his denomination. See Lives of Virginia Baptist Ministers, ii, 192-194. (J. C. S.)

Abel, Jacob Friedrich von, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Vaihingen, May 9, 1751. In 1790 he was appointed professor of philosophy at Tübingen; in 1811 he was made general superintendent at Öhringen, in 1820 at Urtach; and died at Tübingen, July 7, 1846. Abel, Kaspar, a German preacher, was born at Hindenburg, July 14, 1767. He finished his studies at the University of Halberstadt, and became, first, rector at Osterburg, then at Halberstadt. He died at West- ford, near Aschersleben, Jan. 10, 1829. He wrote some dissertations at the latter city, and made a translation into German verse of the Homeric Ovid and the Statires of Boileau. He also wrote, Historia Monarchiarum Orbis Antiqui (Leips. 1718) — Preussische und brandenburgische Staatshistorie (ibid. 1710, 1738) — Preussische und brandenburgische Statistographie (ibid. 1711, 1735, 1747) — Deutsche Alterthümer (Brunswick, 1739) — Sächsische Alterthümer (ibid. 1730) — Hrethliche Alterthümer (ibid. ed.) — Griechische Alterthümer (ibid. 1738). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Abell, Alfred W., a minister in the Free Methodist Church for a brief period before his decease. For several years he was a member of the Genesee Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He was requested, and received, a location, and soon afterwards cast his lot with the Free Methodist Church. From this event till near the close of his life, he had pastoral oversight of the West Sweden Society. He died June 7, 1885. See Minutes of the Fourth Session of the Genesee Annual Convention of the Free Meth Church, p. 6.

Abell, Am, a distinguished minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, and then in the Methodist Church, was born in Cheshire County, N. H., Nov. 19, 1796. He was converted at a camp-meeting held near Canandaigua Lake, in June, 1815. In 1816 he attended for one term the academy at Onondaga Valley; in 1826 he was admitted to the Genesee Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and was a presiding elder of the Genesee District since 1827. For eighteen years he was a presiding elder in the Methodist Episcopal Church. He was elected a member of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church of 1832, and of the three following General Conferences. Soon after the organization of the Methodist Church, he with others withdrew, joined the new denomination, and did effective work in this his new relationship for several years. About three years before his death he had a stroke of paralysis, which affected his powers of utterance. He died triumphantly in the faith of the Gospel, Nov. 9, 1879. Through life he was a man of unwavering integrity; as a preacher, he was clear, lively, forcible, and convincing. He frequently wrote for the periodicals, also composed several hymns. See the Chicago Free Methodist, Oct. 18, 1880.

Abell, James, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Norwich, Conn., in 1792. He entered college from Lisbon, Conn., where his preparatory studies had been pursued. After leaving Yale he studied theology at the Seminary in Andover, Mass., graduating in 1822. He was ordained and installed, Jan. 18, 1823, pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Oswego, where he remained five years. He was then installed over the Presbyterian Church in Oxford, N. Y., Sept. 14, 1830, was settled there seven years, and was then called to the pastorate of the Reformed (Dutch) Church in Chittenango, N. Y., where he continued nearly nineteen years, and resigned in 1857. This was his last charge.

He was fourteen years a member of the board of trustees of Hamilton College. He died May 7, 1868. See Obituary Record of Yale College, 1868; Presbyterianism in Central New York, p. 685.

Abell, Antoine, a French theologian, was born in Paris in 1827. He became a Dominican, or Frère Prêtre, of the abbey of the famous name-de-la-Livrée, in the Aunoy (a district in the Île de France). For three years he was vicar-general of his congregation, and was also preacher and confessor to the queen Catherine de Médicis. He signed the act of the University of Paris by which he took the oath of fidelity to Henry IV, April 22, 1594. A confidant to Queirié and Échard, he was a man of integrity and learning. He died about 1600. He wrote, La Manière de bien Prier, avec la Vertu et Efficacité de l'Oraison Prouvée par l'Exemple des Anciens, etc. (Paris, 1604, 8vo):—Sermon sur les Lamentations du Saint Prophète Hézékié (Paris, 1582):—Lettre à la Reine Catherine de Médicis (1564).

Abellio (or Abellis) was a deity of the ancient Gauls. Mention is made of him on a few Gallic altar-inscriptions found near Comminges, in France. Sometimes he is compared to Mars, at times to Apollo of the Romans. The word has been derived by some from Bell, the Baal of the Old Test.

Abel-melahah. Tristram conjectures this to be "a spot now called Sher-habat, a trace of the name lingering in the neighboring Wady Ma'aleh" (Bible Places, p. 229); while Lieut, Conder locates it at "a place now called Ain Helweh, in the Jordan valley, to which the direct road led past Shunem down the valley of Jezreel" (Test Work, i, 124).

Abeloni (or Abelenite), also Abelonites. See Abelites.

Abééna, in Roman mythology, was a goddess to whose care parting friends were intrusted.

Abbécis, bishop of Hierapolis, in Phrygia, was raised to that see about A.D. 164, upon the martyrdom of St. Papias. He suffered great torments from the heathen under Marcus Aurelius, but died in peace during the reign of that emperor. Neither Eusebius nor any other ancient writer makes mention of Abbécis, who, according to Baronius, wrote an excellent Book of Discipline, to be observed by princes and-dwellers and an apology to Marcus Aurelius, the emperor; both of which the cardinal promised to give entire in his Annales, but it was not done. The Greeks, who give him the title of Ιεροσύνολος, commemorate him on Oct. 22. See Cave, Hist. Lit. i, 66; Baronius, Annales, A.D. 168, No. 15.

Abercius of Jekrubalem, a noted miracle-worker (ιεροσύνολος Σάμαριστος) of the early Church, is commemorated in the Byzantine calendar on Oct. 22.

Aberdes, in Greek and Roman mythology, was the son of Celeus and Vesta; the same with Saturn.

Aberle, Moritz von, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born April 15, 1819, at Rottmann, near Biberach. In 1842 he received holy orders, and in 1850 he was called to Tubingen as professor of ethics and New Test. exegesis. In 1866 he was ennobled, and died Nov. 3, 1875. Aberle was one of the brightest lights of the Catholic faculty at Tubingen, and a very learned scholar. He was always a hard student, and found no time for producing large publications, although he was able to extend and extend entirely a known theological Quartalschrift. He left in manuscript Einleitung in das Neue Testament, which was edited by Paul Schanz (Freiburg, 1877). See Literarischer Hand- weiser, 1875, p. 483 sq.; Himmel, in the Theologische Quartalschrift, iv, 2. (B.F.)

Abernathy, Burwell, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Giles County, Tenn. As to the date of his birth we have no source of knowledge. He embraced religion in early life, and in 1842 joined the Tennessee Annual Conference. In 1849 he studied for a better ministerial preparation, and re-entered the Conference in the following year, and continued faithful, and with great usefulness, until his death, in 1848. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1848, p. 174.

Abernathy, Joseph T., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Macon County, Ala., July 4, 1823. He spent his early life in wayward thoughtlessness, but experienced religion when about twenty; and in 1855 was admitted into the Alabama Conference and continued to labor in that Church, and much success until his death, Sept. 18, 1859. Mr. Abernathy began his ministry uncultured, but by diligent study became an acceptable and useful preacher. His piety was deep, and his life zealous. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1859, p. 161.

Abest. See Zend-avesta.

Abez. Lieut, Conder (Tent Work, ii, 334) thinks this is the ruined site Khurbel el-Beddo, marked on the Ordnance Map eight miles west of Nazareth and two south-west of Beit-Lehem, remarking (Quar. Report of the "Pal. Explor. Fund," Jan. 1881, p. 49) that "the Arabic exactly corresponds [?] to the Hebrew, with the same meaning, 'white'; but this seems doubtful.

Abgar [see Abgarus, in vol. i, p. 14] is the name of several kings of Edessa, who reigned, according to the chronicle of that city, at various periods from B.C. 99 to A.D. 217. Of the ten kings who are said to have borne the name of Abgar, we have only to do with the last six. The first of the name was Abgar Pkika "the Dumb," who reigned about six years and four months, and by himself twenty-three years and five months (B.C. 93-67). His son Abgar reigned fifteen years (67-52), and is mentioned by Dion Cassius as having made a treaty with the Romans in the time of Pompey. He is the same who treacherously deceived Crassus in his expedition against the Parthians (B.C. 63), and is called by Appian
ABGAR

(De Bella Parth. p. 140) φιλάρχος των Αράβων. In Plutarch his name is written Φιλαρχός. The eleventh and twelfth kings of Edessa bore the same name, according to Dionysius; but nothing is recorded of them except that the latter was surnamed Sumulok, "the Red."

We now come to the one with whom the name is most usually associated—the eleventh king—Ab-gar surnamed Ucnow, "the Black," who reigned, according to the chronology of Dionysius of Telmahar, A.D. 9
-46, but according to the rectification of Gutschmid, A.D. 13-50. Moses of Chorene traces his descent from the Parthian king Arsaces. Froccius has a story of the romantic attachment which he excited in Augustus when on a visit to Rome, and of the device he was obliged to employ before the emperor would allow him to return to Edessa. The narrative of Eusebius we have already given. The Byzantine version of the story given in Coreto's Ancient Syriac Documents is obviously an elaborate expansion of Eusebius. In all probability, the only fact in connection with Abgar which has come down to us is to be found in Tacitus (Ammala, xii, 14-12), where he appears in a not very credible light—first seducing the young Parthian knight Meberdates to waste precious days in luxurious indulgence at Edessa, and then treacherously abandoning him on the battlefield (A.D. 49).

Abgar VI bar-Ma'nu, according to Dionysius, reigned for twenty years (A.D. 65-85), which Gutschmid reckons from 69 to 89. The dynasty now seems to have changed; and the next king, Abgar VII bar-Isat, who purchased the kingdom from the Parthians, and reigned A.D. 106-132, was of the royal race of Alabene. It was this Abgar, in all probability, who behaved with such caution when Trajan made his expedition to the East.
According to Dion Cassius, he did not go in person to meet the emperor at Antioch, but sent him gifts and friendly messages. He was afraid of Trajan, on the one hand, as a Parthian, and on the other; and there fore deferred his meeting with Trajan until he came to Edessa, where he entertained him at a banquet, at which he introduced his son Arbanes dancing some of his native dances. The emperor was greatly captivated with the young Arbanes. The Abgar of the time of Antinuous Pius must be Ma'nun bar-Ma'nu, as Assemani suggests.

Abgar, BAR-MA'ANAN, a descendant of Abgarus (q. v.), who reigned in Edessa about the year 500, was a Christian and friend of Bardeanes (see Euseb. Chron. or. Od. 149, 1; and Epiphan. Haer. 56, 1). That he did not believe in the gnosticism of his friend may be seen from the fact that the orthodox Epiphanius styles him δικη βερούς; while Eusebius in his chronicon, calls him ιερός δικηρός. In the year 216, Abgarus was deposed by the emperor Caracalla, and Edessa became a Roman colony. (B. P.)

Abgarus, the reputed king of Edessa, is commemorated as a saint in the Armenian calendar on Dec. 21.

Abhassara, in the Buddhist religion, a superior celestial world. Previous to the creation of the present world there were several successive systems of worlds, which were destroyed by fire. On the destruction of the former worlds, the beings that inhabited them, and were meritorious, received birth in the celestial world Abhassara; and when their proper age was expired, or their merit was no longer such as to preserve them in a celestial world, they again came to inhabit the earth.
Their bodies, however, still retained many of the attributes of the world from which they had come, as they had subsisted without food, and could soar through the air at will; and the glory proceeding from their persons was so great that there was no necessity for a sun or moon. Thus no change of seasons was known; there was no difference between night and day; and there was no diversity of sex. For many ages the inhabitants of the earth thus lived, previous to the creation of the sun and moon, in happiness and mutual peace.

See Gardner, Faiths of the World, u. v. See also Buddhism; Buddhists.

Abbhidharma, the third class of the Buddhist sacred books, called Pitakali, or Pitakattayan (q. v.). The Abbhidharma contains instructions which are supposed to be addressed to the inhabitants of the celestial worlds.
This is accordingly accounted the highest class of sacrated books in the Buddhist canon, though it is not expressly set down in the highest honor, for it declares preeminent truths, as the word itself implies. The books of which it consists contain terms and doctrines with definitions and explanations. The text consists of 98,250 stanzas, and the commentaries of 80,000; so that in the whole, including ten commentaries, there are 198,250 stanzas. Early in the present century there arose a class of metaphysicians in Ava called Paramata, who respected only the Abbhidharma, and rejected the other books that the Buddhists considered as sacred, saying that they were only a compilation of fables and allegories. The founder of the sect, Kosan, with about fifty of his followers, was put to death by order of the king.

Abhijit, in Hind[t religion, is one of the sacrificers to be brought by a king, or rajah, as a propitiation for unremittingly killing a priest.

Abia, in Greek mythology, was a nurse of Hyllus, who built for the father of her charge, Hercules, a tempie at Ira, in Messenia, in remembrance of whom Presphontes celebrated the festival of Abia.

Abibas (or Abibba), a younger son of the Ga-matel mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles, and Etha, his wife. He is said to have been early baptized and brought up as a Christian; to have spent his life in good works; and to have been buried in the tomb of St. Stephen at Caphargamalia, about twenty miles from Jerusalem. His body is supposed to have been found with those of his father, of Nicodemus, and of St. Stephen, Aug. 3. See Bailet, Vies des Saints, ii,

Abibas, a martyr of Edessa, is commemorated as a saint in the Byzantine calendar on Nov. 15.

Abibo, or Abibon. See Abibas.

Abicht, Johann Georg, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Königssee, March 10, 1757.
In 1783 he was appointed professor of Hebrew at Leipsic; in 1717 he was called to Danzig as professor and pastor;
in 1730 he went to Wittenberg as professor of theology and general superintendent; and died there, June 5, 1740. He wrote, Dixis, de Confessione Priscata (Gedani, 1778): — Exercitatio de Servorum Hebraeorum Acquiescinia (Copenhagen, 1779); — Discus de Hebr. Acosumis Genuino Officio (ibid. 1779); — Ars Di-Stincte Legamenti et Interprete, V. 7. (ibid. 1710). See schneider, Bibl. Hamb., p. 1. (B. P.)

Abida, in Mongolian mythology, was a deity of the Kalmyks, that had much resemblance to Siva of India.
Abida ruled over the spirits of the dead, admits the virtuous into Paradise, and sends the bad back to the earth with other bodies. This deity lives in heaven, to which leads a path all of silver.

Abilitus, Sr. (variously written Αμιλός, Αμιλός, Melios, etc., and perhaps the Latin Ablitus), was the second bishop of Alexandria (after Polycarp), 86-96.
According to one tradition, he was ordained presbyter, Together with his successor Cerdon, by Mark himself. According to another tradition, he was appointed bishop by Luke. Abilinus is commemorated in the Roman martyrology on Feb. 22; in the Ethiopic on Aug. 29.

Abimorgan, in Persian mythology, is a miraculous spring in Kohistan, about which a species of bird called samarman is constantly flying. If any part of the country is dried up, it is only a matter of time for some of this water into that region, and the birds will follow and destroy the locusts.

Abington, William N., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Patrick County, Va., Sept. 30, 1768. He experienced religion in 1823; and in 1827 joined the Virginia Conference, in which he worked diligently until his death, Sept. 14, 1829. Mr. Abington was energetic, faithful, successful, and much beloved. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1820, p. 76.

Abob Ab, Aaron. See Aaron Abob.

Abios (ʾAbio), a Greek term for a monk.

Abja Gon, in Hindi mythology, was a name given to Brahma as the creator of clouds and of the moon.

Ablabius, or Abalavius (ʾAblabio), a famous orator who lived in the time of Theodosius the younger, and whom Chrysantus (q. v.) admitted to priest's orders. Ablabius eventually became bishop of the Novatians at Nicaea, where he also taught rhetoric. He wrote some sermons, which are lost.—Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

In A.D. 314 Constantine wrote to one Abalibus, who held a command in Africa, and was apparently a Christian, summoning the disputants in the Donatist controversy to a council at Arles (August. Op. ix., App. p. 21). This Abalibus is supposed to be the same with the prefect of the praetorium (A.D. 326—337), who was deposed and put to death by Constantius.

Abalutis (or Ablavitis), Geoffroy de, a native of Abluie (now Ablos), between París and Chartres, France. He became a Dominican, and received the appointment of inquisitor-general of Carcassonne; and sustained with firmness the persecution raised against him, as an inquisitor, by the Franciscan Bernard Delicisio, in 1301. His death is said to have occurred at Lyons, about 1318. His works are, Short Commentaries on the Four Books of the Master of the Sentences: Acts in Quality of Inquisitor.

Abolution is a name for the wine and water used by the priest after communion to cleanse the chalice and his fingers. At one time the priest was required to drink it. The water-drain was always erected near the altar to receive the abolution.

ABLUTION. See Foot-Washing; Purification.

ABLUTION OF HANDS is the washing of the priest's hands with water (1) before his assumption of the sacred vestments, preparatory to celebrating the Christian communion. The Roman Præparatio ad Missam contains the following prayer: 'Cum lavat manus dictat: Da, Domine, virtutem manibus meis ad abstergendum omni maculam, ut sine pollutione mentis et corporis valeam tibi servire.' (2) The washing of the priest's hands during the celebration of the divine mysteries. See Lavabo: Hands, Washing of the.

ABLUTION OF THE HEAD (capitulitum) was a Spanish rite adopted in France. It took place on Palm Sunday, the Sunday of Indulgence, out of respect to the sacred Veil, which was taken from the altar and carried on the solemn day of baptism. At the Council of Mayence, in 818, the practice was abolished, and bap-ism was required to be celebrated after the Roman manner.

ABLUTION OF THE SACRED VESSELS is the washing of the chalice and paten by the priest after celebrating the Christian eucharist. Two of the ancient English rites ordered (1) wine to be poured into the chalice, (2) wine and water over the celebrant's fingers, and (3) wine and water over the paten. In such cases the rinsings are partedake of by the priest. An almost similar rule is observed in the Latin communion, as may be seen from the concluding portion of the Canon Missæ.

Abner. "In the town [of Hebron] the tomb of Abner and Ishbosheth is shown within the court of a Turkish house, but is not worth visiting" (Bädeker, Palestine, p. 247). In the Old Testament he is not mentioned. Hence, his conversion he had published a work on the agreement of laws, and accompanied his comments with the Commentarium of Aben-Ezra upon the ten precepts of the law. After having renounced Judaism, he wrote, in Hebrew, a refutation of the book of Rabbi Kimchi against Christianity. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog., Générale, s. v.

Aboba, Emanuel, a Jewish writer of Italy, who flourished in the beginning of the 17th century, was born at Oporto. On account of the Inquisition, he left for Italy, resided at Venice, and subsequently at Amsterdam. In 1625 he finished his Nomologis, or Discursus Legales, an elaborate defense of oral tradition, published in Venetia at Amsterdam, and died in 1639. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 4; De Rossi, Dictionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 12 sq.; Lindo, Hist. of the Jews in Spain, p. 364; Etheridge, Introd. to Jewish Literature, p. 548; Kayserling, Gesch. d. Juden in Portugal, p. 265, 271 sq.; Grätz, Gesch. d. Juden, x, 132 sq. (B. P.)

Aboab, Isaac, or Castile, a Jewish philosopher, jurist, and theologian, was born in 1432. His profound learning procured him the esteem of king John II of Portugal, to which kingdom he retired at the expulsion of the Jews from Spain. He died in 1493. He wrote a highly moral work entitled דרש תריי מים, The Candlestick of Light, in seven parts (Venice, 1544 and later), which has been translated into Spanish, German, and Judeo-German. In the latter translation it has been published in the commentary on the Talmud, by Abraham ben Meir, 1773—78). Zunza, in his Die Ritu (ibid. 1859), p. 204 sq., tries to demonstrate that this Aboab is not the author of this work, but that it was written two hundred years before by an author of the same name. Aboab also wrote, שיא י лишь, The River Fishon, homilies (Constantinople, 1588):—;USH, י лишь, The River Fishon, homilies (Venice, 1548 and later), a commentary on Nachmani's Commentary on the Pentateuch, and an Introduction to Hebrew Literature, p. 267; Kayserling, Gesch. d. Juden in Portugal, p. 108, 121, 271; Jost, Gesch. d. Juden, u. s. Sekten, iii, 98, 480; Zunz, Die Ritu, p. 204-210. (B. P.)

Aboab, Isaac, or San Juan de Luz, in Spain, a Jewish poet and pamphleteer, who died in 1599, was born at Amsterdam in 1639. He wrote a copious Spanish commentary on the Pentateuch, Parnas Æmentado sobre el Pentateuco (Amst. 1681, fol.).—La Filosofia Legal (Philosophy of the Law) (ibid.)—Triumph of Moses, a poem:—Porta del Cielo (םליאמ י, e. i. "gate of heaven"), a Hebrew translation of Herera's work against Spinoza. (The number of lines of the anonymous poems in number). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 4; Kitto, Cyclop. s. v.; De Rossi, Dictionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 13;

Aborezi, Giacomo, a Bolognese painter, was born in 1692, and became a scholar of Agostino Metelli. He worked mostly in fresco, and has also painted history, but was more distinguished for views of architecture. He painted some perspective pieces in the Church of San Giacomo Maggiore in his native city. He died in 1667.

Abortion. The crime of procuring abortion is little noticed in the earliest laws. It is a crime of civilization; in a barbarous state of society the parallel crime is infanticide. The practice was horribly prevalent among the Romans of the empire, although punishable with banishment and sometimes with death, and was a ground of accusation by the early Christians against the heathen. Tertullian denounces the practice as homicidal, declaring it to be but the anticipation or the beginning of murder. "Prevention of birth is the preparation of murder." Minucius Felix declares it to be a parricide. The Council of Ancyra (A.D. 514) limited its punishment to ten years' penance. The Council of Barlaam (392) classes the crime with infanticide, but allows the mother to be received to communion after seven years' penance, even when her sin was complicated with adultery. The Council of Trullo classes it with homicide. Pope Gregory III, in the next century, reverses to the ten years' penance, but modifies the sentence to a single year in cases where the child has not been formed in the womb: this is based on Exod. xxii. 15. By the Vivisich law, the person who administered a draught for the purpose was punished with death. See Bingham, Christ. Antiq. bk. xvi, ch. x, § 4.

Abra de Racionis, Charles François, a French bishop, was born in 1580 at Castle Racionis, in the diocese of Chartres. In 1692 he joined the Church of Rome; in 1695 was appointed professor of philosophy at Paris; in 1697 he became professor of theology; and in 1618 royal court-preacher. In 1637 he was appointed bishop of Lavau, and retired in 1648 to Paris, where he died, July 16, 1646. He wrote, Examen et Jugement du Livre de la Fréquente Communion (Paris, 1644), directed against the Jansenist Anton Arnauld. In 1645 he published the Lection du Livre de l'Institut Réponse au Livre de M. l'Evq. de Lavau. His works are characterized by Arnauld, who only scorned him, in the words "donte ouvrages ont été méprisés de tous les honnêtes gens." See Rass, Conversitum, iii, 445 sq.; Weitzer u. Weite, Kirchen-Lexikon (2d ed.), s. v. (B. F.)

Abraham, the Hebrew patriarch, is commemorated as the Christian saint in the old Roman Martyrology on Oct. 19; in the Gallican calendar on Aug. 19; and in conjunction with Isaac and Jacob, on the 28th of every month.

Abraham, Apocalypse of, a book "full of all manner of wickedness," was current among the Serb-Han Ophites (Epiph. Har. 286 c). It is probably the Apocalyptic work under Abraham's name condemned by Nicephorus (Origines, Zur Gesch. d. Kanons, p. 121, 145). The length is rather over that assigned to Canticles. A Greek Testament of Abraham, extant in Ms. at Vienna, appears to be of a much later date.

Abraham's Sacrifice (of Isaac). Feast of, is celebrated at Constantinople, under the name Belni Brim ("the Great Festival"), by a procession, headed by the Sultan, through the city. The Mohammedans substitute Ishmael for Isaac in their version of the narrative.

Abraham, Sr., a title applied to three men.

1. Abramus, of the diocese of Cyrus in Euphratesia, who, after leading a solitary life for some years, went to preach the Gospel in the regions east of Mount Libanus. Bound to his solitude, he was contrary to his own will, elevated to the see of Charras, in Osrhome, or Lower Mesopotamia. Here he practiced great mortification and self-denial until his fame reached the ears of Theodosius the Younger, who called him to his court, receiving him with great honor. He died at Constantinople in 548, and his remains were carried back to Charras. A legend is made of him in the Latin martyrologies, but the Greek commemorate him on Feb. 14.

2. This saint was born about the end of the 4th century in Upper Syria. While still young, he went to visit the anchorites of Egypt, but was captured by the Saracens and cruelly maltreated. Eventually he escaped from them, and towards the close of the reign of Valentinian III came to Gaul, and, settling at Avvergne, built a monastery there. He died in 472, and was buried in the Church of St. Cirgus (Cyraicus), now a parish in the city of Clermont. His festival is marked in the Roman Martyrology. June 15. See Gregory of Tours, ii, 21; Bailleul, Vies des Saints, June 15, vol. ii.

3. This person was a hermit and priest, and was born in the 4th century at Chidna, Syria (or Mesopotamia). He permitted the celebration of his marriage to his son from whom he had been separated, but on the same day retired to a cell, and, stopping up the entrance, gave himself up to devotion and prayer. The report of his sanctity getting abroad, the bishop forcibly ordained him priest, and sent him to preach the Gospel to the infidel inhabitants of a neighboring town. After suffering much at their hands, his patience and zeal were rewarded by the conversion of the town. His festival is celebrated with that of St. Mary, his niece, by the Greek Church, Oct. 29, and by the Roman on March 16. See Bailleul, March 16, vol. i; Butler, March 15.

Abraham (of Ephrem), the sixty-second Coptic patriarch of Alexandria (after St. Mark), was the son of Zera (or Zaraat), and succeeded Minias (or Mennas) in 977, and was poisoned after filling the see four years. He is commemorated as a saint and martyr by the Alexandrian Church on Dec. 2. His life is written in Syriac and Arabic, and is to be found joined to that of Barbars in the National Library at Paris, No. 795.

Abraham (or Ibrahim), a native of Antioch, was, in the 9th century, the chief of the heretical Abrahamicites (q. v.), a branch of the sect of the Paulinists. He denied the divinity of Jesus Christ. Cyriacus, patriarch of Antioch, opposed him powerfully, but was not able to restore him to orthodoxy. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Abraham, a Scottish bishop, was promoted to the see of Dunblane in 1220, and was bishop there in the fourth or fifth year of pope Honorius, being contemporary with William, bishop of St. Andrews. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 172.

Abraham (or Saba [Saba]), a Portuguese rabbi who lived at Lisbon in 1498, the date at which the Jews were banished from Portugal. He is recorded according to Nicolas Antonio, in 1509. We have from him a commentary on the Pentateuch, very highly esteemed, which was published under the title Tever Hamnor (Venice, 1523; 2d ed. 1546). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Abraham BEN-ChAILA or HAJA, was a Spanish rabbi of the 12th century. In a book on astrology he foretold the coming of the Messiah as to occur in 1158. He died in 1105. He wrote, Tractatus de Notitia-
ABRAHAM, Nicholas, a learned Roman Catholic writer, was born in the diocese of Toul, in Lorraine, in 1589. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1609, and took the fourth oath in 1628. After teaching belles-lettres, he was (in 1658) made divinity professor in the University of Pont-à-Mousson, which position he retained until his death, Sept. 7, 1665. He wrote, Parusia Veteris Testamenti Sperans (Paris, 1652); De origine iniquitatis X V (Paris, 1648); — Epitome Rudimentorum Lingua Hebraica, Verba Latina Breviter et Dilicite Comprehensa (Pont-à-Mousson, 1645; Dijon, 1651). He also edited Nomi Papal, Paraphrases in Evangel. Joannis (Paris, 1639). He composed many other works, a list of which will be found in S impuls, Biblioth. Sac. Soc. Jes.; in Bayle; and in the large Bibliothèque Ecclésiastique, 18. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jücher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit., i. 196, 898. (B. P.)

Abraham Ostrom, being a Jew, a writer who flourished in the beginning of the 17th century, is the author of יִבְרָאֵל ידיע, or a commentary on the Chaldee paraphrase of the Pentateuch (Hanau, 1614; Frankfort-on-the-Oder, 1681);—יִבְרָאֵל יְבַיָּא, a commentary on the thirteen hermeneutical rules. See First, Bibl. Jud. i, 8; Jücher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Abraham Shalom ben-Iaac ben-Samuel, a Jew of Catalonia, born about 1430, wrote a dogmatical work connecting the divine with the human under the title of יִבְרָאֵל ידיע, The Habitation of Peace (Constanti- nople, 1588). See First, Bibl. Jud. i, 10; Lindo, History of the Jews, p. 268; Finn, Sephardim, p. 415. (B. P.)

Abram, Robert, an English Congregational minister, was born at Little London, a village near Southport, Lancashire, June 2, 1805. His early as well as his religious associations were among the Wesleyan Methodists, by whom he was, at the age of twenty, made a local preacher. In 1832 he joined the Independent Church at Southport, under the pastorate of Rev. George Greatbatch. He was now engaged as an itinerant preacher and Scripture-reader, and became an agent of the County Union in 1884. He removed to Martin Top in the latter part of the summer of 1887, and forthwith was ordained. Here and in the surrounding district he labored with great success, preaching at nine out-stations besides his own chapel. He accepted a call to be pastor of the Church at Marsden, near Burnley, in 1845. Here he labored with great earnestness, preaching on Sabbath and week-day at home and outside places, many of which now sustain independent churches through his labors. About 1849 he resigned his charge at Marsden and removed to Tockholes, where he labored with his characteristic earnestness, and with comparative success. In the early part of the summer of 1882 he began to feel ill, and so continued till he died, peacefully and happily, July 30, 1852. He was a good and modest man, and a plain but faithful preacher. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1853, p. 204.

Abren, Peter, a Spanish monk of the Strict Observance of St. Francis, in the province of Andalusia, who flourished about 1120. Among other works, he published an exposition of the Song of Songs (Ecclesiae, Virgins, etc., and Explicationes of the Magnificat and Benedicite.)

Abren, Sebastian, a Jesuit, was born at Alenteijo, Portugal, in 1578, and entered the Jesuit College at Evora in 1610. In 1633 he took the degree of doctor of theology. The date of his death is not recorded. His works are, Abren, P. et J. C. de, Vincent Abren, P. et J. C. de, Vincent (Evora, 1651);—Theology (in MS, 7 vols.).—Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

ABRUCAR, in Greek mythology, was a giant, the son of Tartarus and Gaia.

ABUSA. See AUSA.

Absolution, as a liturgical term for a form of public service, has several applications.

1. A short degradation which follows the Psalms of each Nocturn in the ordinary offices for the Hours. In this usage, the word perhaps denotes simply "ending" or "completion," because the monks, when the noontimes were said at the proper hours of the night, broke off the chant at this point and went to rest. Of the "Absolutiones" in the present Roman Breviary, only one (that in tercio nocturno, et pro feria iv et Sabbato) contains a prayer for a setting free from sin.

2. For the absolution which follows the introductory Confession in most liturgies and offices, see Confession.

3. The prayer for absolution at the beginning of the Office is in Oriental liturgies, addressed to the Son; but many of these contain a second, at some point between Consecration and Communion, which is addressed to the Father.

4. The word is also applied to those prayers said over a corpse or a tomb in which remission of the sins of the departed is entreated from the Almighty.

Absolution, as a theory of God's plan in regard to the world held by Leibnitz (q. v.) and others. The system holds that the final aim of all things is exclusively the glorifying of God, especially of his sovereignty. They thus run the risk of bringing this sovereignty of God into opposition with his wisdom and love; for while insisting merely on the fact creativus ab, they seem to overlook the equally important fact creativus nobis. The tendency of such a theory is to fatalism and quietism. See Van Oosterzee, Christian Dogmatik, i, 297.

Absolvo (to I absolve thee), the form used in the Roman Church in the remission of sins after private confession. Its English equivalent, "I absolve thee from all thy sins," is found in the "Order for the Visitation of the Sick" in the Book of Common Prayer. See Absolution.

Absorption, one of the great leading principles of Brahmanism. It is claimed that the last and highest kind of future after which every good man ought to aim is that his soul may be absorbed in the essence of Brah, the supreme spirit. For a full discussion of this subject, see NIRVANA.

Abtalon, BEN-SALOMON, an Italian rabbi, native of Modena, lived about the middle of the 16th century. He was a member of the academy of Spanish rabbis, at Ferrara. He wrote, Responses to the Epistles of Rabbi Simon (Venice, 1608). See Hoefel, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Abu means the name of one of the mythological deities of the Egyptian mysteries.

Abu (Horus) was the name of a mystical deity in ch.lix of the Egyptian Ritual of the Dead.

Abu-Bekr ("father of the virgin"), a caliph, the first successor of Mohammed, was born about A.D. 670. His original name was Abu-el-Cabba, which was changed for his well-known title when his daughter Ayeshah became the favorite wife of the prophet. He began to reign in A.D. 692, and died in 694. See MOHAMMEDANISM.

Abucara, THEODORE, according to Cave (Hist. Lit. V, ii, 54), was archbishop of Caria, about A.D. 867 (others say of Haran, about A.D. 770), and was either actually, or about to be, translated to the see of Laodicea by the patriarch Photius. By the latter he was sent, together with Zachary, bishop of Chalcedon, to the emperor Louis to convey to him the book which he had written against pope Nicholas. His progress, however, was tortuous and circuitous. He met with, in Athens, the Patriarch Bucaros, and was asked to remain at home. In the Synod of Constantinople in A.D. 869, in favor of the patriarch Ignatius and against Photius, Abucar presented a petition, in which he complained of the conduct of the latter towards him, and prayed for the pardon of the steps he had taken against Ignatius. Upon this he was admitted to communion with Ignatius, and to a seat in the council. Lequien states that Abucar was bishop of Charran, in Phoenicia.

Among his works are, Dialogue concerning the Five Enemies from which Christ delivered us:—Dialogue Proving Logically the Existence of God:—An Epistle Containing the Orthodox Faith as Defined at Chalcedon:—Of the Sin of Adam:—Of the Temptation of Christ:—Various Treatises against the Jews, Mohammedans, etc.:—De Pane Mystico et Corpo Rerum:—De Christo Verbo Deo:—De Una Uzore:—De Filio quoque, contra Saracens, etc. (Ingoestal, 1606), all edited in Greek and Latin by J. Greuter. See Landon, Eccle. Dict. s. v. Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Abuducan, Joseph, a learned Orientalist, was born at Cairo, in Egypt, in the 17th century. For some time he was professor of Arabic at Oxford. He then went to Louvain, where he instructed in the Oriental languages. He is the author of Historia Jacoborum tran Capitum in Egypto, Libro, etc., Habitationus, published at Oxford in 1675, and translated into German by C. H. Trommler with the title Abbildung der jüdischischen oder kopfischen Kirche, with a preface by J. G. Walch (Jena, 1749). Whether this translation was made from the edition published in 1675, or from Seelen’s (published at Lubeck in 1733), we do not know. See Moehrm, Dissertatio ad Hist. Ecclesiast. Pertinent. ii, 296; Seelen’s preface to his edition of the Historia; Jöcher, Alignede Gelehrten-Leizikon, s. v., and in the Supplement, s. v. (B. P.)

Abud, in Persian mythology, was the bull which Ormuzd first created, and in which lay the germ of all life. Ahriman sent out two evil genii to kill the bull, which in dying prophesied the final overthrow of evil. Out of his right fore-foot sprang the first man, out of his left fore-foot sprang the germ of all animals, and out of the other parts of his body came various plants. The genii took two-thirds of the seed and gave it to the worm, who, one-third to Ahriman. Ahriman did not attain his object, and was compelled to create evil beings to fight against the beings created by Ormuzd, and thus the great battle between right and wrong was begun, which is to continue throughout all ages.

Abundentia, Moses ben-Gideon, a Jewish native of Lisbon, in the early part of the 17th century, is the author of the Commentaries on the Hebrew Laws (Hamb. 1638), Hebrew and Portuguese:—also Fin de los Dios, which treats of the end, as foretold by the prophets. See First, Bibl. Jud. i, 15; De Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 24; Lindo, History of the Jews in Spain, p. 566; Kayerling, Gesch. der Juden in Portugal, in 3 volumes, 309; id. Abu-Hanifah (or Abanainfah), surnamed Abu- man, perhaps the most famous of all the doctors of orthodox toleration. He was born at Cusa, A.D. 700. He was especially distinguished in matters of the law, and held the first place among the four chiefs of particular sects, who may be followed implicitly in their decisions upon points of right. The caliph Almansur had him imprisoned at Bagdad for refusing to subscribe to the opinion of abolute and determined predestination, which the Mussulmans term taula. Abu-Joseph, sovereign judge and chancellor of the empire under caliph Hadi, brought forward the doctrinal tenents of Abu-Jenain, in order to be a good Mussulman, it was necessary to be a Hanifite. He died, nevertheless, in prison at Bagdad. His principal writings are, The Menad (i. e. The Support), in which he establishes all the points of Mussulmanism on the authority of the Koran and of tradition: Fikheh, a treatise on scholastic theology:— and Moallem (i. e. Master), a catechism.

Abu-Isaac ben-Assil, a learned Maronite, who flourished about the year 1240, is said to be the author of An Exposition of the Apocalypse, written in Arabic; An Exposition of the Four Gospels; An Exposition of the Gospel of St. John; An Exposition of the Lord’s Prayer; An Exposition of the Nicene Creed; and Magna Omeliana, or on the Christian faith. Nothing has as yet been published from the Arabic manuscript found in the National Library at Paris. The first of these works is often quoted by Abraham Eccheleinus, and a copy of the same is said to be preserved in the Library of the Maronite College at Rome. See Jöcher, Alignede Gelehrten-Leizikon, s. v., and Supplement, s. v. (B. P.)

Abujahia is, according to the teachings of Islam, the angel of death, who separates the soul from the body.

Abulafia, Abraham ben-Samuel, the founder of a Cabalistic school called the school of Abulafia, was born at Saragossa in 1240, and died about 1292. For thirty years he devoted himself to the study of the Bible, the Talmud, philology, philosophy, and medicine, making himself master of the then existing philosophical writings. Finding no comfort in philosophy, he gave himself entirely to the mysteries of the Cabala in their most fantastic extremes. At Urbino, he published in 1279 a prophesy, in which he records his conversations with the Deity, calling himself Raziel and Zechariah, because their names were numerically the same as his own name (Abraham=248), and preached the doctrines of the Cabala. In 1281 he undertook to convert the pope, Martin IV, to Judaism, for which he was thrown into prison, and narrowly escaped death by fire. Seeing that his holiness refused to embrace Judaism, Abulafia went to Sicily, accompanied by several of his disciples. In Messina he imagined that he was revealed to him that he was the Messiah, a belief which he published in 1284, together with the announcement that the restoration of Israel would take place in 1296, and so great was the faith which the people repose in it that thousands prepared themselves for returning to Palestine. Those, however, who did not believe in him raised such a violent storm of opposition against him that he had to escape to the island of Comino, near Malta (cir. 1288), where he remained for some time, and wrote sundry Cabalistic works. Of his many works only the seven Patha of the Law (םירשפא יבכשכ לברמ) has as yet been published, namely, by A. Jellineck, in his Auswahl kabbalistischer Mystik (Leips., 1858), pt. i, p. 13, etc. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 16; De Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 25; Grätz, Gesch. d. Abulias is the Arabian name for evil demons.

Abundantia (also called Ubertas) was, in Roman mythology, the deity of plenty. Her image was like that of Ceres, which appeared on Roman coins.

Abundantius of Alexandria is commemorated in the Hieronymian martyrlogy as a saint on Feb. 26.
ABUNDIUS. Two martyrs of this name are commemorated as saints— one as having suffered at Rome, under Decius, Aug. 29 (early Roman martyrlogy) or Dec. 10 (old Roman martyrlogy).

ABUNDIUS, the fourth bishop of Carthage, who flourished from A.D. 450 to 469, was a native of Thessalonica. He was present at the Council of Constantineople in 450, and took an active part against the Eutychian heresy at the Council of Chalcedon, where he represented pope Leo. He was afterwards present at a Council of Milan (452) held to refuse the same heresy. The authorship of the Te Deum is ascribed in some MSS to him.

ABURZA SUBERGANO, in the Kalmuck religion, is the name for the sacred shrine in which the Kalmucks place the images of their deities.

Abu-Said of Egypt is known as the author of an Arabic version of the Samaritan Pentateuch, which he made about 1070, on the basis of the Arabic translation of Sardis. Like the original Samaritan, it avoids anthropomorphisms and anthropopathisms, replacing the latter by euphemisms, besides occasionally making some slight alterations, more especially in proper names. It is written in the common language of the Arabs, and abounds in Samaritanisms. An edition of this version was commenced by Kuenen at Leyden. Genesis was published in 1851, and Exodus and Leviticus in 1854. See Juyonboll, Orientalis, ii, 115 sq; Ellicott, Einlautungen zum Alten Testament, vol. ii. A description of a MS. of Abu-Said's in the University of Leyden was given by Van Vloten in 1803. See also Davidson, Treatise on Biblical Criticism, i, 258 sq. (B. P.)

Abuse, in ecclesiastical law, is applied to a permutation of benefits without the consent of the bishop, which is consequently null.

Abuskan is a mythical personage mentioned in ch. xxxi of the Egyptian Ritual of the Dead.

Abutment is the solid part of a pier or wall, etc., against which an arch abuts, or from which it immediately springs, acting as a support to the thrust or lateral pressure. The abutments of a bridge are the walls adjoining to the land which support the ends of the roadway or the arches at the extremities; also the basement projecting to resist the force of the stream and on which the piers rest.

Abutto, in Japanese mythology, is the god of health. The sick implore his help. He is ranked in the second class of great gods. He is very mighty, and is often prayed to for fair winds by sailors. They throw a few pieces of silver into the water which they wish to navigate, after having fastened the silver to a piece of wood in order to keep it afloat, as a present to this god. They believe that the money comes directly into the hands of the god, whom they worship.

Abýdēnus (Ἀβύδηνος) was a Greek historian who wrote a history of Assyria (Ἀσσυρία), of which some fragments are preserved by Eusebius, Cyril, Syncellus, and Moses of Chorene. His work was valuable for chronology, and a fragment found in the Armenian translation of the Chronicle of Eusebius settles some difficulties in Assyrian history. The time at which he lived is not certain; he must, however, belong to a later period than Berosus, one of his authorities, who lived about B.C. 250. The fragments of his history are collected in Scaliger's work De Emissatione Temporum, and more completely in Richter's Berosii Chaldæi Historiarum Quae supersunt, etc. (Leips. 1825).

Absendrykan was the spring of eternal youth, the object of Alexander's fruitless search. According to an old tradition, it lies in a rough, desolate region, and immortalizes him who drinks its waters. The Mohammedans have accepted this fable in their religious belief.

Acacillas, in Greek mythology, was a daughter of Minos and Pasiphae, loved by Mercury and Apollo. By the former she became mother of Lycurgus, by the latter of Miletus, whom she exposed, out of fear of her father, and whom Apollo nourished and protected by wolves.

Acacius, in Greek mythology, is a surname of Mercury, who, according to an old saying, was reared by king Acacius in Arcadia, in the city of Acacæmus.

Acacæmus (one who ancient evil), a surname often given to Mercury.

Acacius, bishop of Amida, in Mesopotamia, lived about A.D. 421. Varanes V, king of Persia, having, at the instigation of the magi, commenced a persecution of the Christians, war followed between the Romans and Persians, in which the former made about 10,000 prisoners, who were left by their captors in a most miserable condition. These men foolishly in the bishop an unlooked-for friend, who sold all the gold and silver vessels and ornaments of his Church in order to purchase their liberty, and sent them back to their country. The Persian monarch, struck by this act of Acacius, sent for him, and the interview ended in the restoration of peace and intercourse between nations. The Roman Church celebrates his festival April 9. See Socrates, Hist. Eccles. vii, 21; Bailleit, Vies des Saints, vol. i, April 9.

Acacius (or Achatius), St., bishop of Antioch (prob. in the province of Caria), was cited, together with bishop Pison of Troy (in Phrygia) and a priest, Menander, to appear before the tribunal of Marcianus, the governor of the province, March 29, 251. Although strictly interrogated, he continued firm in the faith, whereupon the governor forwarded the articles of examination to the emperor Decius, who was so pleased with the answer of Acacius that he set him at liberty. Hence there is no reason to suppose that he suffered a violent death, or that it occurred on March 31, two days after his confession. May 7, however, is the day on which the Greeks celebrate his festival. The Acts of St. Acacius are considered authentic. See Ruinart, p. 139; Bailleit, vol. i, March 31; Butler, March 31.

Acacius, a presbyter of Berea who visited St. Basil about A.D. 375, taking with him a favorable report of the monastic life at Berea. He wrote an elaborate letter and exhortation with them on the loss of their monastery, which had been burned by the heretics (Epist. 266). This is doubtless the same Acacius who, in conjunction with Paulus, wrote to Epiphanius urging him to compose a work on heresies; for the two are described as presbyters and archimandrites of monasteries in the regions of Chalcis and Berea, in Coele-Syria.

Acacius, patriarch of Constantinople, was originally administrator of the College of Orphans in that city, and was made patriarch in A.D. 471. He nobly defended the Catholic faith upon the publication of the memorable edict of the emperor Basiliscus against the Council of Chalcedon, called the Remonstrance, and which had been signed by more than five hundred bishops, mostly Asiatic. Acacius opposed this decree with all his might, and compelled the emperor to revoke his edict and confirm the Council of Chalcedon. He also induced the prelates who had signed it to declare that they had done so only through fear and a desire to please the emperor. Acacius maintained that his motive was to have the Church's supremacy over those of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem. In a council held at Rome in 488, pope Felix condemned him as an accuser of heresy, and either in that or in a council held the following year deposed him. Acæius paid but little attention to the sentence, only erasing the pope's name from the sacred diplomas (q. v.) of the Church of Constantinople. He enjoyed his bishopric quietly until his death, in 488. His extant writings are, Two Epistles to Peter Fullo, in the collections of councils—Epistle to Pope Silvester on the State of the Church of Alexandria. See Cave, Hist. Lit. vi, 452.

Acæius, bishop of Melitene, in Armenia Secunda, was a firm friend of Cyril of Alexandria, and in 431 published a writing against Nestorius and in defence of the twelve anathemas of Cyril. He was, however, friendly to Nestorius, and strove, before the first session of the Council of Ephesus, to convince him of his errors. The homily which he delivered before the council is still extant, and acquits him of the charge, brought against him by Alexander of Hierapolis in his letter to Acæius of Beroea, of maintaining that the Deity was passible. In 457 he united himself with Rabbulas, bishop of Edessa, in an endeavor to hinder the circulation of the works of Theodore of Mopsuestia and Diodorus of Tarsus. The two bishops wrote a joint letter to the bishops of Armenia warning them not to receive the books of Theodore. Acæius also addressed a letter to Cyril congratulating him on the fact of the tribute Aristoiocas having received orders (A.D. 492) to enforce peace and to compel every bishop to anathematize the dogmas of Nestorius and Theodore. In this letter he states that he considers it to be an error on the part of those who deny that there are two Sons to say, nevertheless, that He had two natures after the union; and, further, that he considers the opinion that each nature possesses the operations proper to it, so that while one nature suffered the other remained impassible, to be tantamount to an opinion that there are two Sons. In the Greek Church he is reckoned among the saints, and his memory is celebrated on April 17. His extant works are, A Homily, delivered in the Synod of Ephesus, in the collections of councils: Epistle to St. Cyril, in the Epistolas Ephesiorum (ed. by Lupus). See Cave, Hist. Lit. v, 1, 417.

Acæius, bishop of Seleucia and catholicus of Persia, is said to have been the first Nestorian patriarch. He is called the Assyrian, and was educated at Edessa. Thence he was summoned to Seleucia by his kinsman Babæus, bishop of that Church, upon whose death (A.D. 372) he was raised to the see. After this, he is said to have been driven by the threats or induced by the wiles of Barusam, bishop of Nisibis, to embrace Nestorianism. If this was so, he was at least no blind partisan, as the following incident will show. Having been thrown into prison by the Magi, and released by the Persians, he took an ambassador to the emperor Zeno. Questioned by the Western bishops about his Nestorianism, and urged to dissociate himself from the scandalous doings of Barusam, he replied that he knew nothing about Nestorius or Nestorianism, and determined to excommunicate Barusam, but on his return found that prelate no longer living. He is said to have held a council at Seleucia which allowed and even encouraged the marriage of the clergy. The date of his death is differently given by different authorities; but it must have taken place before the close of the century. Acæius wrote several orations, On the Faith, in the latter of which "he exposed the errors of those who believe one substance in Christ."

Acadianus, in Greek legend, is a well in Sicily. Persons who had taken an oath the truth of which was doubted had to write the oath upon a board and cast it into the well; if the board sank, the oath was a false one.

Acafoth is a peculiar ceremony observed by some of the modern Jews on the continent of Europe. When a Jew has died and the coffin has been nailed down, ten chosen persons of the chief relatives and friends of the deceased turn seven times round the coffin, offering up all the while their prayers to God for his departed soul.

Acapanthis, in Greek legend, was one of the children of Pierus, king of Emathia, who engaged in a singing-match with the Muses, for which boldness the latter transformed them into various birds.

Acalle. See Acacallus.

Acamarchia, in Greek mythology, was a nymph, daughter of the Ocean.

Acani, Giacomo, an Italian count of the last century, was the author of several works, among them Dell' Antiquità, Autore, e Prigi del Sacramentario Veronese (Rome, 1748, 4to). It is an apologetical dissertation in three parts. Part first is designed to show that this sacramentary was composed in the first ages of the Church. The following facts are cited in proof. viz. the extracts from Holy Scripture contained in it are taken from the Old Italic version, and not the Vulgate; that at the time when it was composed it was the custom to make use at the sacrifice of the mass of the bread and wine offered by the fideles; that the subdiaconate was not one of the holy orders; and that the feast of the accession of Peter to the episcopal chair of Rome was still celebrated April 25. In part second he endeavors to prove that St. Leo was the compiler of the sacramentary. In part third he infers from certain prayers used in the book a belief in the dogmas attacked by the heretics of the 14th, 15th, and 16th centuries. A reply to this work by an Anabaptist in London elicited from the count a rejoinder, Jacobi, Comitia Acanii, de Pedobaptismo, etc., sine de Perpetuo Eclesiae Ritualie, etc. (Romæ, 1755).

Acanthus, in Greek legend, was a daughter of Autonous and Hippodamia. With her parents and three brothers she was transformed into a bird because of her deep sorrow at the death of her fourth brother.

Acantha, the mother of the fourth son in pagan theology, which admitted five different suns.

Acanthous (Lat. from ἄκανθος, a thorn), a plant the leaves of which are imitated in the capitals of the Corinthian and Composite orders.

Acanthos, in Greek mythology, was a son of Alcmene and Calirrhoe, a youth whom the gods suddenly changed into a man in order that he might avenge the murder of his father. After this, he journeyed with his brother Amphilochus and his mother to Epirus, which afterwards received the name of Acanthia.

Acaias, in Ilinden mythology, is the name given to the substance called ether, which fills all space and forms other substances, such as air, fire, water, and earth. According to this theory, the bones of man are earth, his flesh and blood are water, his animal heat is fire, his breath and his soul or the sphere he occupies is the acaia, or ether.

Acaetes, in Greek mythology, was a daughter of Oceanus and of Tethys, one of the Oceanides.

Acaithus (ἄκαθιστος, not-seated), a hymn of the Greek Church sung on the eve of the fifth Sunday in Lent in honor of the Blessed Virgin; so called because during the singing of it the whole congregation gation stood, while during the singing of other hymns of the same kind they occasionally sat. Its origin has been assigned more especially to the deliverance of Constantinople from Chosorea, king of the Persians, in the reign of the emperor Heraclius, A.D. 626.

Acatus. See Acacius.

Acca. See Accho.

Acca (or Accar), the fifth bishop of Hexham (A.D. 703-732), was a native of Northumbria, had his education under Bossa, bishop of York, and was taken under the patronage of Wilfrid, whom he accompanied to Rome in 704. Succeeding Wilfrid in the see of Hexham, he devoted himself to the completion of that precedent, by establishing the cathedral, and to the maintenance of the religious education and art of the North on the Roman model. His skill in ecclesiastical music and architecture is mentioned by Bede with especial praise. His greatest work was the library of Hexham, which he furnished with a great number of Lives of the Saints and other ecclesiastical books. In 732 Acca was driven from his see (according to Bede, 731; Simeon of Durham, 732) for reasons unknown. He died Oct. 20, 740, and was buried outside of the east end of the church at Hexham. His relics were translated in the 11th century, and again in 1154. He was commemorated in the calendar on Eo. 19, Bale and Pits mentioning his writing: De Viis et Passione Sanctorum quorum Reliquiae in Ecclesia sua Recondentur. De Ecclesiasticis sui Chori Officialis. Carmina Varia. Epistola ad Diversos. See Cave, Hist. Lit. i, 619; Chalmers, Bkgs. Dict. s. v.; Book, Eccles. Bkgs. s. v.; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Smith, Dict. of Christ. Bkgs. s. v.

Acca Larentia (or Laurentia), in Roman legend, was the wife of the shepherd Faustulus, who is mentioned in the mythical story of Romulus and Remus, whose first nurse she was, and to whose remembrance Romulus instituted the Larentalia, a feast of mourning. It is related of her, or one of like name, that when she was in the Temple of Hercules he advised her to give her hand in marriage to the first man who met her on going out of the temple. This was a certain Curtius or Farutius, a man of immense wealth, whom she married, and who left her all his riches, which she bequeathed to the Roman people, and for this she was deified.

Accaophori. A sect of heretics which used water instead of wine for the eucharist; had this name given to it by Timotheus Presbyter, who traces the sect's origin to the followers of Tatian, or the Encratites (q. v.). But he adds that the Accaophori were called Hydroparastatae (q. v.), and hence the name is supposed to be merely a misreading for Saccopori (q. v.).

Accarisi (or Accarialo), Glaomo, S. T. P., professor of rhetoric at Mantua, was a native of Bolonia; he became professor in 1637, and died bishop of Vesta in 1654. When lecturing in Rome in 1636 on Aristotle's book on the heavens he maintained that the sun moved round the earth, and published his opinion (1637, 4to). Among his many works yet remaining in MS. are, De Natalibus Virorum. De Dominia Regum Gestatarum a Suaer Congregatone de Fide Propaganda, etc. (1680-81); Epistola Lutocia; also a published volume of Sermons.

Accendit (light ye), a liturgical term signifying the ceremony observed in many churches in lighting the candles on solemn festivals. The Accendit is usually sung by the deacon, acolytes, or singers; but at Angers by a musical choir in these words, "Accendit faces lampadarium; eia; psallite, fratres, hora est; can-personal incapacity, such as defect in age. In such a case the pope commits the benefice to a third party to hold until the person, cum jure accessus, arrived at the proper age. The accessus was abolished by the Council of Trent.

Accetti, Geronimo, was a Dominican of the Convent of Brescia, in Italy, assistant commissioner of the Inquisition at Rome, and afterwards inquisitor-general of Cremona. He was appointed bishop of Fondi, but died in 1670, before he was consecrated. He left a work entitled Tractatus de Theologia Symbolica, Scholastica, et Mystica.

Accetto, Siginaldo, of Sicily, was a Dominican of the Convent of St. Peter the Martyr at Naples. He died in 1530, leaving several works in Italian, among which are Trattato dell'Anno Santo; — Trattato del Celibato; — Trattato delle Ricchezze Spirituali della Chiesa; — Salutatones ad Sanciss. Nomen Divinae a Confratibus Soc. Jesu. (Naples, 1561).

Accho (now Acre). The latest description of this formerly memorable place is given by Lieut. Conder (Tent Work in Palestine, i, 188 sq.), from which we extract the following particulars: "Acre is a walled town with a single gate on the south-east. Its trade is now much reduced, and the bazaars are deserted; the richest inhabitant is not worth £1000. . . . The appearance of the town outside is picturesque; with brown walls, a tower on the rock in the sea (called El-Manara), yellow stone houses, with two higher buildings, roofed with red tiles and green shutters; above all, the huge white mosque of Jezzar Pasha, a square building, with a dome and a graceful minaret, surrounded by palms, and with chambers for the students, covered by rows of little round domes; behind this, the modern fortress, on the site of the old crusading castle."

Acciaioli, a name common to three cardinals, viz.: 1. Angelos, born in 1480 at Florence, and died at Pisa in 1487. He was known for his learning, experience, and integrity. In 1683 he was made archbishop of Florence, and in 1685 cardinal by pope Urban VI. He resisted all endeavors to bring him on the side of the antipope Clement VII, and defended in words and deeds the regularity of the election of pope Urban VI. After the death of this pope, half of the votes were given in the conclave in favor of Acciaioli; but, to end the schism, he directed the election towards Boniface IX. The new pope made him cardinal-bishop of Ostia, and sent him to Germany, Slavonia, and Bulgaria to settle pending difficulties. He afterwards became governor of Naples and guardian of the young king Ladislaus, whom he brought to Naples, and accompanied, some time after, on his march to Hungary; reconciled, after his return, the pope with Orsini; and reformed the Monastery of St. Paul, at Rome. He died on his way to Pisa, and was buried at Florence. See Eggs, Purp. Docta, ii, 88.

3. Filippo, who belonged to the same family, was born at Rome, March 12, 1700. He was nuncio at Portugal, but, on account of his interference in behalf of the Jesuits, he was sent away by Pombal with military force. Clement XIII made him cardinal in 1739, and he died at Ancona, July 4, 1766. See Wetzer u. Welte, Kirchen-Lez. s. v. (B. P.)

Acciaioli (Acciaiuloi, or Acciajoli), Zenobius, a Dominican, was born at Florence, Italy, in 1461. Banished in his infancy by his relations, he was recalled when about sixteen years of age by Lorenzo the Magnificent, and educated, by his direction, with Lorenzo, the son of Pier-Francesco de' Medici. He became eminent as a Greek and Latin scholar, and was intimate with many of the Florentine literati; but after the death of Lorenzo the Magnificent he became disgusted with the commotions in his native place, and, devoting himself to monastic life, he received from Savonarola, about 1494, the habit of a Dominican. On the elevation of Leo X he went to Rome, and was enrolled among his constant attendants. In 1518 Leo appointed him librarian of the Vatican, but, laboring too assiduously, he hastened his death, which occurred at Rome, July 27, 1519. He formed an Index of the ancient public documents in the Vatican (pub-

ASHED by Montfaucon in his Bibl. Bibliothecarum MSS. i. 359. He is supposed to have been the translator of the greater part of the works of Justin Martyr and other fathers. We have also some Poema, Sermons, and A Chronicle of the Convent of St. Mark at Florence.

Accracio, Niccolò, an Italian prelate, was born at Sorrento in the latter part of the 14th century. Having acquired the distinction of doctor, he was made bishop of Enna, afterwards archbishop of Sorrento, and finally of Capua. After having been employed in various achievements by the Roman see, Eugenius IV. in 1439, gave him the cardinal's hat. In the confusion of the Neapolitan kingdom, he sided first with the House of Anjou, but afterwards with the party of king Alfonso. He died in 1447.

Acclamation is a term applied (1) to certain short inscriptions expressed in the second person, and containing a wish or injunction, as Vitae in Deo. By far the greater part are sepulchral, but similar sentences are also seen on amulets (q. v.), on the bottom of cups, and on gems. (2) To the responsive cry or chant of the congregation in antiphonal singing. See ANTRIPHON.

Accolti, Benedetto (1.), an eminent Italian lawyer and historian, was born at Arezzo in 1416. After studying civil law, he was made professor at Florence. The Florentines conferred on him the rights of citizenship, and chose him, in 1459, to be secretary of the republic, which office he retained until his death, in 1466. He wrote, De Bella a Christianis contra Barbaros Getta, pro Christi Sepulchro et Judea Recuperandia (Venice, 1489, 4to; reprinted at Bazel, Venice, Paris, and Florence, the latter edition with Notes by Th. Dempster [1623, 4to]), and at Groningen, by Henry Hoffhinder [1731, 8vo]; — and De Præstantia Vítorum sú Aeti (Parma, 1689 or 1692), to prove that the moderns are not inferior to the ancients.

Accolti, Benedetto (2), a Florentine prelate called from his knowledge of Latin "the Cicero of his time," was raised by the interest of his uncle, cardinal Peter Accolti, to the see of Cadiz. After the death of the cardinal he succeeded to the archbishopric of Ravenna, and in 1527 was created cardinal by Clement VII. He died at Bologna in 1523, at Berne sides other works, he wrote, at the instigation of Clement VII, a Treatise on the Papal Rights over the Kingdum of Naples.

Accolti, Francesco (also called Arétinuss, from his native place, Arezzo), an Italian philologist, was born in 1418. He was a famous jurist, and, like many savants of that time, he led an unsteady life. He lectured at Bologna, Ferrara, Sienna, and from 1461 to 1466 he occupied a position under Francesca Sforza of Milan. When pope Sixtus IV was elevated to the see of St. Peter, Accolti went to Rome with the hope of being made cardinal. His hopes not being realized, he opposed the pope. The last years of his life he lived at Pisa, where he died between November 14 and March 26, 1486. He was regarded as the princeps jurisconsultorum of his time, and was well versed in philosophy, music, poetry, and theology. Of his works there were published, Commentarius Super Lib. II Decretalium (Bononia, 1481) — Supra Titulum de Signific. Verborum (Pissno, 1493) — Consilio et Responsos (Gissano, 1481; Lugd. 1582). See Savigny, Geschichte der römischen Rechte im Mittelalter, 1831, vol. vi; Saveri, Memoria intorno al Giureconsulto Franc. Accolti Arétino (Pissina, 1835); Becker, in Wetzer u. Accra Version. This language is spoken by a trading people on the Gold Coast of Africa. The Rev. A. Hassen, a native of Accra, translated the gospels of St. Matthew and St. John into this language, which were printed in 1849 at London, by the British and Foreign Bible Society, in Roman letters. A revised edition of these gospels, together with the gospels of St. Mark and St. Luke, as prepared by the Rev. J. Zimmermann, of the Basle Missionary Society, were completed in 1855, and in 1860 the whole of the New Test. was printed. The Old Test. was completed in 1885. This entire work was done under the Rev. Mr. Hassen, the translator. The translator, being aware that a first translation made by a foreigner must be very defective, and can only be tentative in its nature, has ever since devoted his time to a revision of his work. The New Test. he completed in 1870, and with the Old Test. he had proceeded as far as 1 Kings 3:6, when called his labours to an end. The remaining part was left to the Rev. G. Christaller, also of the Basle Missionary Society, who completed the work. Mr. Zimmermann has also published a grammar of the Gl language, viz. A Grammatical Sketch of the Agra or Gl Language, with an Appendix on the Adamite Dialect (Stuttgart, 1856). (B. F.)

Accused. By the ancient canons, a priest charged with any crime not interdicted to the exercise of his ecclesiastical functions (Can. xli, xliii, caus. 2, qu. 5). By the law of the decretals, those who were accused of any crime could not, before their absolution, accuse another, give evidence in a court of law, nor be promised to any order (De Terit., Advers. c. i). The chapter Omnipotens ac Deus, decides, in like manner, that no one accused of a crime ought to be elevated to any honor or dignity.

Accused, False, were punished ecclesiastically in the early Church as follows: (1.) In Spain, the Council of Elvira (A.D. 305 or 306) refused communion even at the hour of death to any person who should falsely accuse any bishop, priest, or deacon. In France, by the first Council of Orleans (314), those who falsely accused their brethren were excommunicated for life. This was re-enacted at the second council (443), but permission was given for the restoration of those who should do penance and give satisfaction commensurate with their offence.

Acchab, a name given by the idolatrous Arabs to a species of arrow with iron head and feathers, which were used for purposes of divination. "The ancient idolatrous Arabs used a sort of lots, which were called lots by arrows. They were three in number. Upon one of them was written 'Command me, Lord;' upon the second, 'Forbid or prevent, Lord;' while the third was blank. When any one wished to determine on a course of action, he went with a present to the diviner (the chief priest of the temple), who drew one of his arrows from his bag, and if the arrow of command appeared, he immediately set about the affair; if that of prohibition appeared, he deferred the execution of his enterprise for a whole year; but if the blank arrow came out, he was to draw again. The Arabs consulted these arrows in all their affairs, particularly their warlike expeditions."

Acembs, of Carystus, in Euboea, is named by Hippolytus (Harr. iv, 2; v, 13; x, 10), with Ephratus the "Perater," as chief of the Ophite sect called Perate. Probably the true form of the name may be Acembes.

Acopolius was a bishop and martyr in Persia, under Sapor. He is commemorated as a saint by the Greek calendar on Nov. 3, in the Armenian on Nov. 5, and in the Roman on April 22. See Fox, Book of Martyrs, i, 283.

Acervi, Eumilio, an Italian philosopher and theologian, was born at Bergamo in 1562. He was a member of the Brotherhood of Vallombrosa, and controlled a number of priories and abbeys. He died in 1625. He wrote, Logicae, Quaestionum Libri IV (Venetiis, 1566); — Perigaleticarum Quaestionum Libri V (ibid. 1588), in verse (Florentinum, 1500). See Hoefer, Nouv. Bioi. Générales, s. v.

Acerra (or Acerna), in Roman antiquity, was a little box or pot in which were put the incense and perfumes to be burned on the altars of the gods before the dead. It appears to have been the same with what was otherwise called thuribulum and pygoza.
The cenoters of the Jews were acerra, and the Romanists used the name of acerra under the name of incensepots.

The name acerra was also applied to an altar erected, among the Romans, near the bed of a person recently deceased, on which his friends offered incense daily untill his burial. The real intention probably was to fumigate the apartment. The Chinese have still a somewhat similar custom.

Aceresciones, a name given to Apollo by the Greeks, equivalent to the intonous, or uncut, of the Romans, and applied to the hair of that god.

Acesaménus (poet. Acesasemnus), in Greek mythology, was the father of Periboea, who was the loved one of Arius, god of a Macedonian river, by whom she became mother of Pelagon. A son of the latter, As-temos, led the tribe of Paeonia Priene.

Acesius, in Greek mythology, was a surname of Apollo, by which the people of Elis worshipped him as the healer of disease.

Acestes, in Roman mythology, was the son of the Sicilian god of the river Crimissus, who, being transformed into a dog, begot this his first son by Segesta.
As Segesta was the daughter of a Trojan, Hippotas, the Trojans who came with These to Sicily were received with great hospitality.

Acestor (the Savoris), in Greek mythology, was (1) a surname of Apollo. (2) Son of the Grecian king Exhippus of Tanagra, who was slain by Achilles.

Acestorpides was a class of females in Argos from whom the maiden priestesses of Minerva were chosen.

Achaea, in Greek and Roman mythology, was a name given to Ceres by the Beotians, because of her complaints and despondency after the loss by death of her daughter Proserpina. Under the same name Minerva had a temple in Apulia.

Achaisa, Council of (Concilium Auchacium). Two synods of Achaisa, in Greece, are recorded: one in A.D.
250, against the Valerians; the other, in A.D. 358, against the Aetians.

Achaius (or Aicharius), Sr., was brought up in the monastery of Lusella, in Burgundy, about the middle of the 7th century. His reputation for holiness caused him to be chosen to succeed Eupilas, bishop of Noyon and Tournai, which see had been permanently united since A.D. 532. Achaius died Nov. 27, 659, and was buried in the Church of Sts. Peter and Paul at Noyon, where his festival is celebrated. He is not found in the martyrlogies of the 9th century, nor in the moderan Roman. See Baille, Vies des Saints, vol. iii, Nov.

Achard (or Algard), usually named of St. Victor, also of St. Claudius, bishop of Avranches, in Normandy, flourished in the 12th century. By some he is supposed to have been born at Bridlington, England, while others say that he was of Normandy. He was a regular canon of St. Augustine, and second abbot of St. Victor-ianus. He was raised to the bishopric of Avranches in 1102. Achard was a great favorite with Henry II of England, who made him godfather to Eleanor, his daughter. His death occurred March 29, 1172 (or March 27, 1171); he was buried in the Church of the Holy Trinity, Abbey of Lucerne. His works are De Thutricia Christi (a MS. in the Library of St. Victor at Paris): — De Divinione Animae et Spiritus (in the same library); both these works are, according to Hook (Eccles. Bioi., also in the Library of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge: — Sermons (preserved at Chardin), and Life of St. Guinefin (Dusay, 1828, 12mo). Cave (Hist Lit.,) Ducaze, and Dupsin attribute these works to Achardius, a Cistercian munk.

Achard, Antoine, a Swiss Protestant divine, was born at Geneva in 1569, took orders in 1572, and in 1574 was promoted to the church of Werder, in Berlin. He enjoyed the protection of the prince royal of Prussia, and, being in Geneva in 1730, was admitted into the society of pastors. Eight years after, the king of Prussia appointed him counsellor of the supreme consistory, and in 1740 a member of the French directory, with the title of privy-councillor. He was received into the Academy of Berlin in 1748, and was also appointed inspector of the French college, and director of the Charity-house. He died in 1772. His powers of oratory were very great, although he was of a very feeble constitution, subsisting for twenty years entirely on milk diet.
In the Memoirs of the Academy of Berlin for 1743, there is an outline of a very considerable work, in which he proves the liberty of the human mind against Spinoza, Bayle, and Collins. Two volumes of Sermons sur Divers Textes de L'Esquaire Sainte were published at Berlin after his death.

Achardes, Éléazar Francis de la Baume de, a French ecclesiastic, was born at Avignon, Jan. 29, 1679.
Entering into orders, he distinguished himself by his zeal as a papist at the St. Multin's breastwork at Marseilles in 1721. Pope Clement III appointed him apostolic vicar, with the title of bishop of Haliacarnassus, to settle the disputes among the missionaries of China. His labors were unsuccessful, and he died at Cochin, April 2, 1741.
The abbe Fabre, his secretary, published an account of his missions, and a summary of the Chinese priest (1746;

Achart (or Acard), Sr., was sprung from a noble family in Poitou about 624. Placed, in his youth, in the Abbey of St. Hilary of Poitiers, he embraced the monastic life in the Abbey of St. Toin in Poitou. The reputation of St. Filbert, abbot of Jumièges, who had just founded the monastery of Quinçay, induced him to leave St. Toin, and place himself under his discipline at Quinçay, which abbey he endowed with certain lands his parents had given him. After a time he was made abbot of Quinçay, and eventually of Jumièges, where he died, in 687. He is commemorated Sept. 15, which is thought to be the day of his death; and his relics are preserved in the Abbey of St. Vast at Arras. See Baillet, Vies des Saints, vol. iii, Sept. 15; Butler, Sept.
15.

Achates, in Roman legend, was a hero who accompanied Eneas as a true friend on all his voyages.
His name has become proverbial for true friendship.

Achates, St. See Acaecius.

Achatius. See Acaecius.

Achatius, Sr. (surnamed Agathangela), bishop of Melitene, in Armenia, exhorted the people of his di-decese to keep steadfast to their faith during the persecution under Decius. Being brought before the consul Marian (March 29, 250) or 251, he expounded to him with as much wisdom as power the vanity of idolary, and the purity of the Christian religion. Marian sent the condemned bishop to Rome for further perse-ued. The people admired the orations of the confessor and set him free. In the Eastern Church, his anniversary is commemorated on March 31. (B. P.)

Achea, Sr., of Kilglais, near Ardagh, Ireland, was the daughter of St. Daraec, sister of St. Patrick, in the 5th century. She is commemorated Aug. 5. Her name is also spelled Achaia. See also Via dari, Mautyrol, Dunsoll, (ed. Todd and Reeves); Coogan, Acts

ACHOR

ACHOR, one of the mysterious deities of the Egyptian Ritual of the Dead.

Ashoapitos (ἀσχοπίτοις, not made by hand). So the image of our Lord is styled, which is shown in the Church of St. John of Lateran, Rome, and which, according to tradition, is said to have been roughly cut out by St. Luke, and finished by angels.

Acheirotonitos (ἀχειροτονίτος), a term applied by St. Basil to the inferior ministry, because they were ordained without the imposition of hands. — Bingham, Christ. Ant., bk. iii, ch. i, § 6.

Achelides, in Greek mythology, were the Serens, as daughters of Achelous, the river-god.

Achelous, in Greek mythology, was the son of Oceanus and Tethys. He wrestled with Hercules in contest for Delanira, daughter of king Oeneus, who was betrothed to both. He first turned himself into a serpent, then into a bull, when Hercules plucked off one of his horns and forced him to submit. Achelous purchased his horn by giving in exchange the horn of Amalthea, daughter of Harmodius, which became the cornucopia, or horn of plenty, and which Hercules filled with a variety of fruits and consecrated to Jupiter. This fable is thus explained: Achelous is a river in Greece, whose course winds like a serpent, and whose streams roars like the bellowing of a bull. This river divided itself into two channels, but Hercules, by confining the water of one, broke off one of the horns; the circumjacent lands, thus being drained, became fertile, so that Hercules is said to have received the horn of plenty.

Achomen (or Achmon), son of Senonis, an enchantress in Greek mythology.

Achen (or Ach), Johann van, an eminent historical and portrait painter, was born at Cologne in 1532. He studied six years with Jerrich, a reputable portrait painter of Cologne. He next applied himself to study the works of Bartholomew Spranger, and, when twenty-two years old he went to Italy, and first stopped at Venice, where he stayed long enough to get a thorough knowledge of the great works of art in that famous school. He then went to Rome, where his first performance was an altar-piece of the Nativity, for one of the chapels of the Jesuits. Here he introduced other fine portraits. From Rome he went to Florence, where he painted the portrait of the famous poetess Madonna Laura. He was invited by the elector of Bavaria to Munich, where he executed his most excellent work, The Black Prince and The Four True Cross. He painted the portraits of the electoral family with so much satisfaction that his employer presented him with a gold chain and medal, in token of his esteem. By the invitation of the emperor Rudolph, he went to Prague, where he executed several compositions, particularly a picture of Venus and Adonis, designed with a taste then unknown in Germany. He captivated Germany by the introduction of a new style, compounded of the principles of the Venetian and Florentine schools. He was one of the first German artists who attempted to reform the stiff and Gothic taste of his country. He died at Prague in 1615.

Acher (Enemy), the name of a mythical animal which was symbolical of evil in the Egyptian mythology.

Acher. See Achery.

Acheron, in Greek mythology, was (1) a son of the Sun and the Earth; he furnished water for the Titans when they fought against Jupiter, and was therefore converted into a river whose waters was impure, and afterwards condemned to Hades. Others make him the son of Ceres, born in Crete; and that because he could not endure day-light, he entered Hades of his own accord. The souls of the dead were ferried across this river by Charon. Proverbially, dying is called crossing the Acheron, as the souls who cross this river have no hope of ever returning. (2) A river in Thesprotia, a country in Epirus, which flows through the Acheron swamp, whose water is bitter, and from which arise poisonous plants. (3) A river in the country of the Bruttians in Lower Italy. Here Alexander, king of Epirus, became the victim of an oracle which he misunderstood. He was told to beware of this river, but thinking the oracle meant the river in Epirus, he went to Italy and was killed at the hands of a Lucanian on the banks of the Acheron. (4) A river near Elis, in Peloponnesia, which combines with the Alpheus.

Acherusia, in Greek mythology, is (1) the name of the sea, which is the source of the Acheron river in Epirus. (2) A sea near Cyma, in Italy. (3) A cave in the vicinity of the city of Heraclea in Bithynia, by which Hercules is said to have entered the lower regions. (4) A sea near Memphis across which the Egyptians ferried their dead, either to bury them on the other shore or to cast them into the water.

Achigian, Andrew, an Asiatic Monophysite secretary who induced a party of his sect to forsake their religion for a time and unite themselves with the Romanists. He had been educated at Rome, and was appointed patriarch of Antioch by the Roman pontiff. He assumed the (36) of Ignatius XXIV. See Mosheim, Hist. of the Church, bk. iv, cent. xvii, pt. i, ch. ii, § 2.

Achillas (or Achilleas), (1) patriarch of Alexandria (A.D. 311–319), was ordained presbyter during the episcopate of Thomas (A.D. 283–301), and placed over the catechetical school. On the martyrdom of Peter I, he was raised to the patriarchal throne, but died apparently in about a year. The only act recorded of his episcopate is the restoration of Arius to the diaconate, and his promotion to the priesthood (Sozomen, i, 15). This act is supposed to have been dictated by excess of zeal against the Meletians, who had malignantly attacked him. His festival is set down in the Roman martyrology on November 1.

Achillas, (2) one of the Alexandrian clergy, a friend and partisan of Arius, with whom he was excommunicated, about 319. Contemporaries speak of him as a prime mover of Arianism. Jerome (Ado Lucif. XX, ii, 118) calls him a lector; while others speak of him as deacon and presbyter.

Achilleas. See Achillias.

Achilleus, the eunuch and martyr at Rome A.D. 96, is commemorated as a saint in the Roman calendar on May 12.

Achinos is the god of winds among the Caribbeans.

Achlys, in Greek mythology, is the name of the night which preceded the chaotic state of the world, and out of which the deities sprang. The ancients had other ideas connected with this word — hunger, want, tears, etc.

Acholius, bishop of Thessalonica (Ambrose, Epist. xvi, 12), baptized Theodosius, A.D. 380, before his Gothic war, and died in 388. Ambrose (Epist.) wrote an epistle to the Church at Thessalonica in which he compares his life and gifts with those of Elisha. Acholius was present at the Council of Constantinople, A.D. 381.

Acholos, in Greek mythology, was one of the Harpies, who were driven from the feast of king Phineus by the sons of Bores, when these travelled with the Argonauts.

Achor, in Greek mythology, was a god of flocks. According to Pliny, the inhabitants of Cyrene worshipped him by prayers and sacrifices, in order to be delivered from the plague of flies, which not only tormented men, but also overpowered domesticated animals.

Achashaph. Tristram identifies this town with the modern Khaifa, at the mouth of the Kishon, north of Carmel (Bible Places, p. 215); but with little probability, as Khaifa seems to be the Ziph, choph (core), or "haven" of Asher and Zebulon (Gen. xlii, 13; "sea-side," Deut. i, 7; "shore," Judg. xvi, 17; Jer. xilvi, 7; "coast," Josh. ix, 1; Ezek. xxxv, 16).

Achashaf, one of the mystical deities in the Egyptian Ritual of the Dead.

Achatarie, one of the three ministering angels, alleged by the Rabbinical traditions to be engaged in heavy weaving or making garlands out of the prayers of the Israelites in their Hebrew tongue. The other two are Metatron and Sandalphon.

Achterfeld, Jodocus, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born at Wesel in 1827. In 1850 he received his holy orders; lectured for some time at Münster; and died at Anholt, Aug. 19, 1874, where he had labored since 1863. (B. F.)

Achungunapi, in the mythology of the Mongolians, was the first of the earth's creation, in which all peoples and nations, races and individuals, are said to be eight thousand years old. Thousands of these sainst were carried to heaven alive. But when the fall of man took place, this holiness departed, and the length of a human life did not exceed twenty thousand years. Because they had eaten the food of the gods, men lost their holy status. This food existed now, and men were obliged to eat the fruits of the field. From that time all virtues began to disappear, vice reigned, and the length of life fell to one hundred years; and the length of life will continue falling as low as ten years.

Achonymayarax is the supreme being worshiped by the first inhabitants of Tenerife. Only when great drought threatened the country, sacrifices and prayers were offered. The sacrifices consisted of lambs and young goats.

Achzib of Judah (Josh. xv, 44) is regarded by Tristram as the present Ain Kezbah, near Beit-Nettiff (Bible Places, p. 43), not meaning, as proposed by Keil (Comment. ad loc.), the "place of springs called Kursedh with ruins in the neighborhood" (Robinson, Bibl. Res. ii, 49), which may, perhaps, be included in the group of towns in which Achzib is mentioned (Nehemiah, 3, 21), although very much south of them; but the spot marked on the Ordnance Map as Ain Kezbah at the fork of the road five eights of a mile south-east of Beit-Nettiff, which, however, is too far north, being in a different group (Jarmouth, Sooch, etc.). See Judah. Times. Or.

Acidalia, in Greek mythology, is a spring near Orchomenus, in Boeotia, so inviting that Venus bathed in it, and hence was named Acidalia.

Acinythus, a Christian martyr, who, with his companions in persecution (A.D. 346), is commemorated Nov. 2 in the Byzantine calendar.

Acinythus, Gregory, a Greek monk who flourished at Constantinople in the 14th century, was united with Barlaam in his hostility against Gregory Palamas and the Hesychast, or Quietist. Palamas believed that the light which encircled Christ during his transfiguration was not the Holy Ghost but the fires of the sunrise. Acinythus and Barlaam maintained that the light could not emanate from the Godhead, that no mortal eye could have any possibility to see the Divinity. A synod of Constantinople in 1387 rebuked both parties and ordered them to be quiet. But in his retirement in Greece Acinythus advocated his view, and it was supported by patriarch John XIV, who even convened a council in 1347, in which the opinion of Palamas was condemned. Among the works of Acinythus there are & treatise, De Essentia et Operatione Dei (Ingolst. 1816, 4to): an Iambic Poem (Allatius [Les], Græc. Ortod. i, 567-770), concerning the views of Palamas—and fragments of a Hymn and a Testament, also attributed to Palamas. See Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. ii, App. p. 39; Duprin, Bibl. des Aut. Ecclés. 14ème Siècle, c. 6; Landon, Ecclés. Dict. s. v.

Aecla, in Greek mythology, was the son of Neamus and of Symothia. Galathias, the fairest of the nymphs, was his beloved. She was also loved by the giant Polyphemus, and he followed her wherever she went. One day Polyphemus tried to seize the pair sitting in the shade of a large tree. Full of anger and jealousy, he threw a large stone upon the two lovers. The beautiful young goddess made a hair-breath escape; but Aecla was crushed by the huge rock. He was afterwards converted into a river springing out from under this rock. (2.) A tree, the tree of life, or the tree of knowledge of good and evil.

Aciacles, a Christian martyr of Cordova, Spain, who suffered death during the DIOCLETIAN persecution. The ancient martyrologies, and that of St. Jerome, mark his festival on November 18: Ario and Usuardus on the 17th.

Acisterium, one of the numerous appellations of monasteries. The Latin word is asceterium (q. v.).

Achterfeld, Johann Heinrich, a Protestant writer of Germany, born at Naumburg, Aug. 12, 1647. He was prepared at Naumburg and Schulpforta for the University of Jena, which he entered in 1663. In 1673 he was appointed adjunctus and pastor in Hannau, near Gotha; and advanced in 1689 as superintendent and court-preacher in Blankenhain. In 1717 he retired from his office on account of bodily infirmities, and went to Gotha, where he died Sept. 21, 1719. His main work is Historia Reformatorum Ecclesiasticorum Tempore Primitivum Ecclesiastica (1693, 1695, 1715). (B. F.)

Ackers, John, a German Reformed minister, was born Feb. 22, 1824, in the canton of Thurgau, Switzerland. He was licensed to preach by the Columbian Classis, Synod of Ohio, in 1849, and began the work of the ministry the following year at Mt. Eaton, Ohio. He was an active and efficient worker in the German Reformed Church of America up to the time of his death, January 26, 1869. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church, iv, 404.

Ackermann, Georg Christian Benedict, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born March 3, 1768, and died Oct. 5, 1877, as general superintendent at Meiningen. He was an excellent pulpit orator and a very learned theologian. He wrote, Das Christliche in Platon und in der platonischen Philosophie (Hamburg, 1835; English trans. by S. A. Ashby, The Christian Element in Platon and Platonic Philosophy Unfolded and Set Forth, Edinburgh, 1861):—Rathgeber für Prediger (Schwerin, 1847):—Die Glaubenssätze von Christ Höl- lenjahr und von der Aufserung des Fleisches, etc. (Hamburg, 1846):—Die Brütche, besonders die Priest- erliche (Leipzig, 1856) [Handbuch zu den Lucilusen, nach Lücken, mit Bibelettes (Meiningen, 1857):—Luther, seiner Religion, dem Woll unmenschlichen Wesen nach, dargestellt aus seinen Schriften]. He published, besides, a number of Sermons, for which see Zuchold, Biblioth. Theol. 4, 5 sq. (B. F.)

Ackerlooth, Theodor, a minister of the Dutch Reformed Church, who lived in Holland towards the end of the 17th and beginning of the 18th century, is the author of, Dezerende Zendbrief van Paulus aan de van Korinthen (Leyden, 1707):—De Zendbrief van Paulus aan de Galaten (ibid. 1665; translated into German by C. AkwORTH, George, LL.D., an English divine and civilian, of whom family and life cannot be conveniently accounted. He resided in France and Italy, where he studied civil law; was public orator at Cambridge; and in the following year was made Doctor of Laws. In 1562 he was admitted an advocate in the Court of Arches, and afterwards lived in the family of archbishop Parker, who gave him a prebend. He was convicted of heresy in 1567 to Horne, bishop of Winchester; and in 1575 the archbishop of Canterbury permitted him to hold the rectory of Elington, alias Wroughton. In 1576 he was appointed master of the faculties, and judge of the Prerogative

Court in Ireland, having been turned out of all his situations in the last-mentioned country because of his dis- solute conduct. Besides one or two minor narratives, he wrote De Viesibus Romanarchia, contra Nic. Sanderi Monarchiam

Acæs, of Concilium Aëleaneæ, so called from the "Field of the Oak," supposed to have been in Aycliffe, Durham, England. Synods were held under this name in A.D. 781, 787, 788, 789, 804, and 810; but nothing is recorded of their doings except certain grants of lands.

Aclejam, in the Confidit of Adam and Eve (p. 68; ed. Dillmann), is the twin sister of Abel and wife of

Seth; further on she appears as Læc. In the Ethiopic

"Clementinem" she is called Aldemja (Dillmann, p. 139), and by other late writers, Greek, Syriac, and Hebrew

(all of whom interchange her with her equally legendary sister Luva), Clemes, Chalma, Culemora; 44).

Acménæs, in Greek mythology, were certain nymphs of the woods and rivers near Elis.

Acomon, in Greek legend, was (1) a companion of Diomed, who boldly ventured to disgrace Venus, because of which he and his companions, who had taken part in the crime, were transformed into birds. (2) A son of Clytus of Lycus, in Phrygia, a companion of Æneas.

Acomondí, in Roman mythology, was a Cyclops and an assistant of Vulcan.

Acometæ (açouyiçras, sleepyæs), a name given to certain monks who, divided into three classes, sang the Holy Office in turns, so that it continued day and night without intermission. The order was probably founded by an exiled house of Constantinople, named Alexander (q. v.), about the middle of the 5th century. The first monastery which he established was on the borders of the Ephraips, after which he returned to Constantinople, and founded one on the Dar-denelles, where he died, about A.D. 490 (or 450). After his departure from the monastery on the Ephraips, the Acometæ had for their abbot John, who was succeeded by Marcellus. Among the distinguished persons who supported the order was Studius (q. v.), a Roman nobleman, who built a monastery for their use at Constantinople. This was called, after him, Studium, and the monks of it Studites. There was another monastery, founded by St. Dues, which also came there. Their

"hegumen" (or president), Cyril, made complaints at Rome against Accius (q. v.) which resulted in his excommunication. Meanwhile Peter the Fuller, who had been expelled from their order, had become schismatic patriarch of Antioch, and made common cause with their opponents. In the following century they became entangled in the Nestorian heresy, and the emperor Justinian caused them to be condemned at Constantinople. In 534, in a synod held in Rome, pope

John II excommunicated them for denying the proposition Unus e Trinitate passus est carne, and maintaining that the Virgin was not the Mother of God.

Their monasteries on the passes, on the West, was established in the Abbey of St. Maurice of Agaune, in Valais, by Sigismund of Burgundy, and was confirmed by a council, A.D. 923. It was also established in the monasteries of St. Martin at Tours, Luxeuil; St. Rigi-

quer, and others. The perpetual service of the Acometæ was called by the Latins Laus perennis. See Evragrius, ill, 18, 21; Möreri, Hist. des Ordres Monast. (preface, p. 326); Bingham, Christ. Antiq. bk. vii, ch.

ii, § 10.

Acoméstina (açouyiçrona, sleepyæs), a Greek term for the light which burns continually before the reserved

Acestes, in Greek mythology, was (1) the pilot of a Tyrrenhian ship which landed on Naxos. The ship hands brought a beautiful child to him, which he was requested to take along with him. When he beheld its perfect form, he saw that it was the child of some deity, and would not give his consent to its abduction. But the rest forced him to sail away, and the sleeping child remained in the ship. Soon after, it awoke, and, finding itself in strange society, wished to return to Naxos. The sailors made a promise to fulfil this wish, but did not keep it. Suddenly the ship made a halt, as vine-branches grew out of the water around it.

Bacchus appeared riding on a tiger and surrounded by lions. The sailors confessed the crime, and the god foretell save Acestes, into dolphins, who plunged into the sea, and the pilot brought the god back to Naxos. Some time later Acestes related this adventure to king Pentheus of Thebes, who had the pilot imprisoned. Bacchus, however, liberated him; the doors of the prison flew open of themselves, and Acestes departed unharmed. (2) The father of Laocoön. (3) The armor-bearer of king Evander.

Acoluthus, Andreas, one of the most famous Orientalists of his age, was born at Bernstadt, March 16,

1654. After due preparation at the Elizabeth Gymnasium in Breslau, he was instructed in the Rabbinic, Syriac, Chaldean, Arabic, Persian, and Ethiopic languages by A.

Pfeiffer. With these he combined the study of Maure-tianian, Turkish, Coptic, Armenian, and even the Chinese language. In 1674 he went to Wittenberg, and thence to Leipsic, where he lectured on Oriental languages.

Having secured an Armenian Bible, he edited the prophet Obadiah in Armenian, with observations, in 1689. This was the first Armenian publication printed in Germany.

In 1682 he published De Aquæ Zelotæpia Amaræ Numb. v, 11 sq. In the following year he returned to Breslau, where he was induced to accept an office in the Church.

In 1689 he was appointed professor of Hebrew at the Gymnasium of St. Elizabeth, and in the following year he was called to the university of St. Bernhardt. In his studies he continued, and the possession of an Arabic manuscript of the Koran with a Persian and Turkish version induced him to make the Koran known in Germany by publishing this trilingual manuscript with a Latin translation, since the Arabic edition of the Koran which had been published at Venice in 1538 had been burned by command of the pope. King Frederick of Prussia favored his undertaking, and allowed him an annual pension. Acoluthus died at Breslau, Nov. 4, 1704. His Acominatus, See Nicetas.

Acominatus, Michaeli, (surnamed Choniata, or Chomintes, from the place of his birth in Phrygia), was older than his brother Nicetas. He was archbishop of Athens about 1204, but was at that period far advanced in years. His Psevud Orationes (Paris, 1566; Frankl. 1687) on the death of his brother Nicetas is still extant in the collected works of the latter, and in Bibliothech. Patrum, vol. xxv. Some MS. works and sermons of Acominatus are preserved in the Royal Library at Paris, and in the Bodleian Library, Oxford.

Acontes, in Greek mythology, was the son of Lycaon, the cruel king of Arcadia, whom angry Jupiter transformed into a wolf, and whose sons, with the exception of the youngest, Nyctimus, Jupiter killed by lightning.

Acontus, in Greek mythology, was a companion of Perseus at the latter's marriage with Andromeda, and became a pillar of stone at the sight of the head of Gorgon.

Acontius, in Greek mythology, was a beautiful but poor youth on the island of Ceos, renowned for the stratagem by which he won his loved one, Cydippe of Athens, a maiden of high parentage and great wealth. He wrote the following words on a large Cydonian apple: "I vow by Diana that I will take Acontius as my husband." The apple rolled to the feet of Cydippe's accompanying slave, who, not being able to read the inscription, handed it to her mistress, who read it aloud, and thus uttered the mysterious vow. Her father, being ignorant of the circumstances, promised her to another; but Cydippe became very sick, and did not recover until she was willing to fulfill her vow.

Acontus, of Rome, is commemorated as a saint in the Hieronymian martyrology on July 25.

Acosta, Gabriel, a Roman Catholic divine of the latter part of the 16th century, was born at Torres-Vedras. He was educated at Coimbra; succeeded Luis Sotomayor as professor of theology, and was shortly after made a canon. He died in 1616. He left Commentarii on Genesis xlix, Ruth, Lamentations, Jonah, and Malachi (Lyons, 1641). — Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Acquil, Jacopo, a Dominican monk of Piedmont, lived in the first half of the 14th century. He wrote in Latin a Chronicle, unpublished, from the creation of the world to the time of pope Boniface VIII. Manuscript copies are in the libraries of Milan and Turin. See Hoefler, Novum. Bibliogr. Generale, s. v.

Acrabattine, the northern district so called. Its ruined capital, now Arrebah, is described in considerable detail by Lieut. Conder in the Quart. Statement of the Palestine. Explor. Fund for July, 1874, p. 190.

Acrabbit. This ascent is by some late writers identified with the pass of Sufah, leading from the desert et-Tib to the Negeb, or "South" of Judah; and to this view Tristram lends his adhesion (Bible Places, p. 9). But in this they are actuated by a desire to locate Kadesh-barnea (q. v.) at Ain-Gudais, instead of one of the springs on the western edge of the Arabah.

Acraea, in Greek mythology, was (1) a surname of those goddesses whose temples were built upon high rocks. (2) A daughter of the god of the river Asterion, near Mycene.

Acraeus, in Greek mythology, is the same as Acraeas (q. v.), is for goddesses.

Acrotriptes, in Greek mythology, was a local god who had his temple in Munychia.

Acrotatus, in Greek mythology, was a companion of Bacchus who was worshipped in Athens. As the name signifies unmixed, this mythical person is probably only another personification of Bacchus himself.

Acricus, Israel, a Swedish clergyman, was born at Ostaker, Dec. 25, 1714. He was educated at Upsala, and ordained in 1740. In 1749 he was appointed provost to take charge of the Swedish congregations on the Delaware, and pastor of Racoon and Pensneck. Christiana was subsequently added to his charge. He remained in America until 1756, when ill-health compelled him to return to Sweden. He was rewarded by the king, for his faithful services, with a large pension and the lucrative living of Fellingbo. He died April 25, 1800. Acricus wrote some articles on American affairs, which were printed in the Swedish journals, several religious works, and a description of the Swedish colonies in America (1769).

Acronius (Acrom), Johannes, a Reformed theologian of Holland, who died in 1627, is known by the active part which he took in the controversy between the Remonstrants and the Contraremonstrants. In 1554 he was preacher at Eilsum; in East Friisia, and a few years later at Groningen and Wesel. Having declined a call as preacher to Deventer and Amsterdam, he was appointed in 1617 professor of theology at Franeker. In the following year he was called again as pastor to Kampen, for the purpose of opposing his colleagues there, who were in favor of the Arminian party. As a delegate to the Synod of Dort, 1618-19, he accused his colleagues of Arminianism, and some of them were deposed from their office. In 1619 he went to Haarlem, where he remained till his death. Of his writings we mention: Archius Orthodromus (Deventer, 1615); Syntagma Theologiae (Groningen, 1605); — Uytmonstaringe van verscheyden Doldingen . . . der genoemde Lutherachen (Arnhem, 1625). See Van der Aa, Biog. Woordenbo.; Glaisius, Gogel, Nederl.; Vos, in the Allgemeine deutsche Biographie, s. v. (B. F.)

Acronius, Ruard, a Reformed theologian of Holland, is said by some to have been a brother of Joannes, and another member of the same family, was a Roman Catholic priest. In 1572 he was Reformed preacher at Franeker. After having labored for some years at Alkmaar and Bolsward, he went in 1599 to Schiedam, where he probably died in 1612. He was a learned man for his time, but intolerant. Thus, he challenged the theses (Germ. tenen) to a public disputation, which took place in 1596 between him and Pieter van Ceulen. They held one hundred and fifty-five sessions, and, as is generally the case, both parties claimed the victory. In the controversy between the Arminians and Gomarus he took such an active part that Gomarus asked for his assistance in defending the Calvinistic doctrine, in a meeting which was held at the Hague in 1609. Against the Arminian Uyttenbogert he wrote Noodwendi Vertoog (1610). When, in 1610, the Remonstrants presented their views to the States-General of Holland, Acronius was one of the six Calvinistic delegates who spoke against them. He also published, Onderwerpige oor 't Onderholt der Willekeringen der veren ghemeynten Christi (Franeker, 1599) — Enarratione Catechetica (Schiedam, 1606) — Onderwysinge oor de Christ. Catechism. ibid. (1608). See Van der Aa, Biog. Woordenbo. s. v.; Vos, in the Allgemeine deutsche Biographie, s. v. (B. F.)

Acroemi (ἀκρομέιναι, hoorata), a class of penitents in the monastic. The arrangement of the penitents in different classes took place at the end of the 8th century, or in the beginning of the 4th. They were generally arranged in four classes: πρωσαναγωνίας, τουρνώρια;

Acropolis, Constantin (surnamed Πρωταράφων, the Young Metaphrast), the son of George Acropolis, was grand logothete, or chamberlain, under Michael Paleologus and Andronicus about 1270. We are informed by George Pachymeres that the emperor Michael was so irritated by the zeal with which Acropolita maintained the cause of the Greek Church against Rome, that towards the end of his reign he banished him from court. On the accession of Andronicus, Acropolita soon recovered his lost influence, and in 1294 was restored to his former office. He wrote several works on the subjects in dispute between the churches, especially on the procession of the Holy Spirit, fragments of two of which are seen by Leo Allatius.—An Oration on the Holy Martyr Theodorus (Allatius, De Scriptor. Sermo, p. 84):—Upon Martyr St. Neophytus:—Upon St. Theodorus Tyro:—Upon St. John Damascus. See Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, 314; Chausséié, Nouv. Dict. Crit. i, 180.

Acropolita, George, one of the writers of Byzantine history, was born at Constantinople in 1220, and was brought up at the court of the emperor, John Doukas, at Nice. At the age of seventeen years he became a pupil of Theodorus Exoptrerychus in mathematics, poetry, and rhetoric; and at twenty-one held a learned discussion, before the emperor, with Nicholas the physician concerning solar eclipses, being made at length grand logothete. John Doukas sent him as ambassador to Larisa, to establish peace with Michael of Ephira. He was also constituted judge by the emperor to try Michael Comnenus. The emperor's son, Theodorus Lascaris, a pupil of Acropolita, appointed him governor of all the western provinces of his empire. About 1255 he was made lord over Michael Angelus and was taken prisoner, but was liberated by the intervention of Michael Paleologus, who sent him as his ambassador to Constantine, prince of Bulgaria. After his return, he devoted himself wholly to the instruction of youth intended for orders, but resigned the charge in 1267 to Holobulus. In 1272 he was appointed one of the judges in the case of John Vassilac, patriarch of Constantinople; and in 1273 was sent to pope Gregory to treat of a union between the two churches. The following year he attended, with others of the Eastern Church, the Council of Lyons; and at the fourth session, July 6, he, in the name of the emperor, took an oath adjoining the so-called schism, receiving the Roman faith, and recognizing the primacy of the papal chair. In 1292 he was sent as ambassador to John, prince of Bulgaria, and died immediately upon his return home, in the same year. His principal work is Historia Byzantina (Paris, 1651, fol.), in Greek and Latin. He also wrote, Treatise concerning Faith, Virtue, and the Soul.—Thirteen Prayers, used after the Holy Mysteries of the Body and Blood of Christ:—Exposition of the Orations of Greg. Nuisianus, etc. See Fabricius, Bibliogr. vi, 448; Ward, Gresham Professors.

Acrostes (inhabitant of a mountain-rummit), in Greek mythology, was a name by which Bacchus was worshipped in Sicyon, from the high mountain upon which the temple was built.

Acrostic hymns were in use in the ancient Church; and specimens remain in Greek, but especially in Latin. The term was also applied to the Christian formula 1Cor. 15. See Ichthus. A peculiar use of the term occurs in the Greek office-books, in which the successive canons begin with the several letters of the alphabet.

Acroteteria (Gr.), pedestals for statues and other ornaments placed on the apex and lower angles of a pediment. They are also sometimes placed upon the gables in Gothic architecture, especially in canopy-work.

ACT OF UNIFORMITY. See Uniformity Act.

Acteon, in Greek mythology, was the son of Artaeus and Atene, a daughter of Cadmus, and was one of the most famous heroes of Thesee, trained in the school of Chiron. The death of this famous hunter has furnished to poetry matter for many beautiful works. The myth runs as follows: Diana was bathing in the Gargaphian valley just at the time when Acteon was hunting. When he saw the goddess, he remained standing there, which Diana, to transform him into a reindeer, with nothing human left him but consciousness. Acteon fled. However, his own nimble-footed dogs gave chase, and, overtaking him, tore him to pieces. His dogs then sought for their master, and not finding him, Chiron erected a statue of him, which they constantly guarded. Another story is somewhat different—that Diana transformed him because of his boldness in attempting violence upon her person. Others again, relate that she vexed him to death in order that he might not marry Semele, whom he loved.

Actian Games. On the promontory of Actium, in Acaianis, Apollo had an ancient temple, where, every three years, a feast was held with games and fights. At the opening of this feast an ox was killed and given to the flies to feast upon, so that they might not trouble those participating in the feast. Augustus celebrated this feast upon the occasion of his victory over Antony, near Actium.

Actio, a word frequently used to designate the canon of the mass. Taken from the word agere, which bears in classical writers the special sense of performing a sacrificial act, the word actio is applied to the act of this which was regarded as the essential portion of the eucharistic sacrifice. Whatever is included in the canon is said to be infra actionem. Hence, when any words are to be added within the canon, as at great festivals, they bear in the liturgies the title, or rubric, infra actionem, and in printed missals these words are frequently placed before the prayer Communicantes.

Actis, in Greek mythology, was the son of the god of the sun and a brother of Electryone. He was famous for his knowledge of astronomy, which he formed into a science, and taught this science to the priests in Egypt. The Egyptians were, in consequence, much looked upon as the discoverers of the science of astronomy.

Actistates (from αἰτιοτός, not created), a sect of the Julianists, who took this name from their dogma, that after the incarnation Christ ought not to be spoken of as a created being, even in respect to his human nature; thus contradicting the words of the Nicene Creed: "And was made man." This was, in reality, a form of the older heresy of the Docetæ (q.v.), for since a being wholly uncreated must be wholly God, the reality of our Lord's human nature was a doctrine as incompatible with the belief of one sect as it was with that of the other. See Dörner, Person of Christ (Clark's ed.), II, i, 131.

Actius, in Greek mythology, was a name of Apollo, from his being worshipped on the promontory of Actium.

Acton. See Atto.

Acton, an English monk of the Dominican Order, who lived about 1410; and, according to Leland, was a learned theologian. He wrote a treatise, De Pace Ecclesiae; — Sermones; — and other works. See Pius seu, De Script. Anglica.

Acton, Ralph, an English Roman Catholic priest, who flourished about 1820. He wrote commentaries upon the epistles of St. Paul and upon the Master of the Sentences, some homilies, and other theological works. See Pius seu, De Script. Anglica.

Actors. The early Church protested against the life of actors on the ground (1) of general immorality, and (2) of theatricals being so closely associated with idolatry. These were comprised in the pomp and service of the devil, which every Christian denounced at his baptism; and, therefore, any one who returned to them was charged as a renouncer of his baptismal covenant. Hence they were excommunicated as apostates and relapsed from Christian communion. We give the deliverances of some of the councils and early fathers upon the subject. Cyprian (Epist. 61, al. 2) says that "it is neither agreeable to the majesty of God nor the discipline of the Gospel that the meekness and honor of the Church should be defiled with so base and infamous a contamination." Tertullian wrote a treatise (De Spectac. cap. 4) against these public shows, and dwells on the inconsistency of uttering from the same lips the amen of Christian worship and the praises of the gladiator or the mime. Clement of Alexandria reckons the arts of actors as among the things forbidden by divine authority. The Council of Elberus (can. 63) allowed stage-players to be baptized only on the condition that they renounced their arts; and if, after baptism, they returned to them again, they were to be cast out of the Church. The first Council of Arles (can. 5) decreed that all public actors belonging to the theatre were to be denied communion so long as they continued to act. The third Council of Carthage (iii, can. 35) supposes excommunication to pass upon all such when it says that actors and stage-players, and all apostates of that kind, shall not be denied pardon and reconciliation if they return unto the Lord. With one consent the moral sense of Christians condemned what seemed so incurable an evil. See Bingham, Christian Antiquities, bk. xvi, ch. iv, § 10.

Acts, Spurious or Apocryphal (Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha). The recent discoveries of Tischendorf, as published by him under the title Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha (Lipa, 1861)—with which comp. his Additamenta ad Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha, in the prolegomena to his Apocalypse apoc. p. xxiv, etc.—have brought to light an extensive collection of such spurious acts, viz.:

Actual Grace is distinguished from habitual grace as that which God gives to Christians for the purpose of doing some action acceptable to him. See Grace.

Actual Sin. See Sin, actual.

Acuante. See Acuas.

Acuas (Acuas), an early teacher of Manicheism, who is said to have come from Mesopotamia and introduced the heresy into Eleutheropolis. The Manicheist Acuas, whom some call Acuas, Acuas, Acuas, Acuas, was made Bishop of the Romans, Acuas, Acuas, Acuas, Acuas, Acuas, and placed the rise of his followers in the fourth year of the reign of the emperor Aurelian, A.D. 273.

Acuff, Francis, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Culpepper County, Tenn., about 1770. His early life is unrecorded. He was three years a traveling preacher in the Tennessee Conference, and died in August, 1795, in the midst of great usefulness and promise. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1796, p. 67.

Acuna, Cristóbal de, a Spanish Jesuit missionary, was born at Burgos in 1597. He was admitted into the society in 1615, and, after some years spent in study, was elected a missionary to Chili and Peru, and became rector of the College of Cuenca. In 1659 he was appointed by the Jesuits to accompany Pedro Teixeira in his second exploration of the Amazon in order to take scientific observations and draw up a report that might be sent to Spain. He published a narrative of this expedition under the title Nueva Descubrimiento del Gran Rio das Amazonas, etc. (Madrid, 1641); but he was coldly received by the king of Spain, and nothing was done to improve the country thus opened up. After occupying the positions of procurator of the Jesuits at Rome and eclesiastic (censor) of the Inquisition at Madrid, Acuas returned to South America, and died on a journey from Panama to Lima, soon after the year 1675.

Acus. See Psn.

Acus, in Grecian mythology, was a son of Vulcan by Aglaia.

Ada was a Syrian goddess of the moon, the same with Mylitta.

Adab is an Arabic term for whatever Mohammed has done once or twice, which is on that account lawful to be done by any of his followers.

Adalard (Adalard), a monk, was born about 758, and was the son of Count Bernard and cousin-german of Charlemagne. Invited to court, and fearing the infection of such a life, he, at the age of twenty, became a monk of Corbie, in Picardy, and was at length chosen abbot of the monastery. Forced by his imperious relations to attend court, he still preserved the disposition of a recluse. He was banished, on unjust suspicions, by Louis the Meek to a monastery on the Isle of Here, on the coast of Aquitaine. Five years after, Louis recalled him and heaped upon him the highest honors; but, being still inclined to the life of a recluse, he obtained leave to return to Corbie. Here, and at another monastery called New Corbie, he devoted himself to the spiritual and intellectual welfare of the monks. He died in 827. His principal work was a Treatise on the French Monarchy; but only fragments of it have come down to us. See Biog. Universelle, a. v.; Milner, Church Hist., iii, 257; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. a. v.; Landon, Eccles. Dict. a. v.
ADALDUS, a monk of Blandenburg, at Ghent, flourished at the beginning of the 11th century. At the request of St. Elphegeus, archbishop of Canterbury, he composed an Office for the Festival of St. Dunstan. As this work is dedicated to St. Elphegeus, it was probably written before 1012, the year of his martyrdom. This work is found in many MSS., and bears sometimes the title of The Life of St. Dunstan. The epitaph dedicatory is contained in Wharton's Anglia Sacra, ii, 148.

ADALARIUS (Athalarius, or Adelarius), a priest who accompanied St. Boniface to Frisia in 754 and shared with him the glory of martyrdom. His body was translated from Utrecht to Erfurt with that of St. Eoban, and buried in the Monastery of St. Mary. In 866 he is commemorated with a double rite, April 26, as episcopus et martyr. It is supposed that the title of bishop was a baseless assumption, but probably gave rise to Baillot's statement, which rests apparently on no historical foundation, that Adalarus was the first and only bishop of Erfurt, the see after his death being united to that of Mentz. See Henschen, Analecta Bonifaciana; Baillot, Vies des Saints, vol. ii. June 58, and vol. iv. Acta SS. Boll. Jan. i, 471.

Adalbald, saint and confesser, was grandson of P. Gertrude, and his mother's name was Gerberta. He married St. Richtrudis, by whom he had St. Maurontus, his eldest son, who afterwards became abbot, and three virgins, whom he is commemorated with on April 26. On his way to Gescoy, Adalbald was waylaid and murdered by persons unknown. His relics are at St. Amand, Flanders. He is mentioned in the Belgian martyrology, and in Sassenay's supplement to the Galli- can. His day is Feb. 2, and he died about 652. See Baring-Gould, Lives of the Saints, ii, 41.

Adalbero (or Aldalbert), bishop of Augsburg (892-905), was descended from a noble family of that city. In 866 he entered the monastery of the Benedictines at Ellwangen, and in 887 he was made bishop of Augsburg. The German king, Arnulph, committed to his care the education of his son, Louis the Child. He exercised a great influence upon the ecclesiastical history of Germany, and largely promoted the moral and financial welfare of the churches and monasteries within his diocese. He died Oct. 9, 909, his remains being deposited in the Church of Sts. Ulrich and Afra at Augsburg. See Vita S. Adalberonis Episc. August. Audou. Odoldalcolco (ed. Jaffé, in Stehelin, Archiv für Geschichte des Bischöfs Augsburg, iii, 1860); Braun, Geschichte der Bischöfe Augsburg, i, 151. (B. P.)

Adalbert, the twelfth bishop of Würzburg (1045-1090), was born about the year 1010. He was educated at Würzburg, and succeeded his uncle in 1045. In the struggle of the papal see with Henry IV he sided with the former, and on that account was often obliged to leave the country. He richly endowed the monastery at Lambach, which had been founded by his father, which he left Oct. 9, 1066. In the 12th century, many miracles were ascribed to him. See Himmel- stein, Reichenfolge der Bischöfe von Würzburg (1843), p. 61-66; Archiv des historischen Vereins für Unterfranken, 1861, xv, 179-259; Schnietlert, Breve Chronicon Monasterii B. M. V. Adalberon (Ascllinus, or Aegelin), bishop of Leon, was consecrated in 977. He was an ambitious prelate and a servile courtier, and was base enough to deliver up Hugh Capet Arnoul, archbishop of Rheims, and Charles, duke of Lorraine, Hugh's competitor, to whom he had given an asylum in his episcopal city. He died April 10, 980. He left many works in 430 manuscripts dedicated to king Robert (ed. by Adrian Valois, 1668, v. 8vo, at the end of the panegyric on the emperor Berenger). In the library of the abbey of Laubes is a manuscript poem by Adalberon on The Holy Trinity. See Hoefer, Nouvelle Biographie Générale, s. v.

Adalberon of Liege. See ALBERON.

Adalberon, archbishop of Rheims, was one of the most learned prelates of the 10th century. Having obtained the archbishopric in 969, he called several councils for the establishment of ecclesiastical discipline. He also induced men of learning to resort to Rheims, and gave a high renown to the schools there. He was the son of Geoffery, count of Ardenna, and distinguished himself as prelate and as minister under Lothaire and Louis V. In 987 he consecrated Hugh Capet, who succeeded him in the office of grand-chancellor of France. He died Jan. 5, 988. The cathedral of Rheims is indebted to him for most of its sumptuous furniture. Several of his letters are among those of Gerbert, afterwards Sylvester II; and two of his discourses are in Moissac's Chronicle. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Adalbert, St., a deacon, who is commemorated June 25. The Bollandists give his acts written by the monks of Egemont and Meotich. According to these he was a disciple of St. Egbert, by whom he was sent, with St. Willebrord and ten others, into Germany in 690. He died in Frisia, whither he had accompanied Willebrord, and his body was taken to Egmund, where a church was founded in his honor by Thoedoricus of the house of Liuthari in 696. According to H. Conamatus of Aix-la-Chapelle, he was sent to the Synod of Utrecht, in 702, and died in 705. See Acta SS. Boll. Jun. v, 94-110; Mabillon, Annal. Ord. Bened. i, 631-646.

Adalbert, St., count of L'Ostrivant, who is commemorated on April 22, married Regina, niece of king Pe- pin, with whom he dedicated himself to a life of devotion, amsgiving, and good works. According to the documents of the Church of Dewin, we learn that they founded the monastery in that place, and that they were buried above the high-altar there. The exact date of their death is unknown, but they flourished about the middle of the 8th century.

Adalbert, a prince of the royal race of Northumber- land, who devoted himself, about 740, to missionary labor in Holland. He selected the neighborhood of Egmond, and devoted himself with much zeal to the conversion of the heathen Frisians. He was long held in veneration by them as their spiritual father. An imperfect Life of him is given in Mabillon's Annal. Ord. Bened. iii, 866.

ADALGOTHUS, the eleventh bishop of Magdeburg, who established the custom of giving to a hundred poor persons during Lent a loaf of bread and a herring apiece. — Landon, Eccles. Dict. n. s. 272, § 12.

ADALGUDIA, co-founder with her husband, Grimo, in 695, of a monastery at Limoges, diocese of Paris (see the charter of foundation, with her subscription, in Mabillon, Amm. i, 704). A placitum of Chaldebert III, in 708, vindicating the property of this convent, of which Adalgudia, then a widow, was an inmate, may be seen in Guill. Chr. vol. viii, instr. p. 4.

ADALONGUS (or ADALONUS) was bishop of Marcellina when that city was betrayed to the Saracens by Maurontius in 739. He was inserted among the saints of March 1 by Molanus in his additions to Usuard's Martyrology, but is not recognised by the modern breviaries or by the Hollanders. See Gall. Chr. 1, 640; Le Coine, 17.

ADALWINE (Teut. noble friend) was an abbot of St. Hildesheim, and fourth (or, according to an ancient rhyme in Mabillon, Amm. i, 190, the fifth) bishop of Ratibon. This happened in 790, and two years after he presided at a council which Charlemagne summoned for the condemnation of the Felician heresy. Handwriting and probability make it likely that the transfer of the cathedral from the Monastery of St. Haimeranus to the Church of St. Stephen, Ratibon, was made under pressure from Charlemagne and against the judgment of Adalwain, who at his death, in 814, preferred to be laid among his predecessors in the old cathedral. See Metrop. Salisb. i, 188; Mabillon, Amm. ii, 203.

ADAM, in Oriental mythology. The Scripture history of this progenitor of the human race is well known; less known, however, is what the histories of the Persians, Turks, Arabs, etc., relate of him. According to the myths of these nations, God took all the dust of the earth and formed a man-woman with a double face—the same as the Persians represent in one of their idols—with both sexes combined in one body, until he separated them. Adam's height was immense; his head reached to the firmament of heaven; and when he lay down his body reached from the rising to the setting sun. His face shone more brilliantly than the sun; the angels prostrated themselves before him; and all the created things of the earth looked to him as their creator, and would have worshipped him as such, had not Adam taught them that he was a creature as well as they, and came from the hands of the Almighty. He prostrated himself before God, who convinced the angels of Adam's weakness and dependence; for when the latter was asleep God took the respective members from his body, so that he lost his giant appearance. On awaking, he commanded Adam to distribute his members all over the earth, in order that they might become fruitful. Thus only his wisdom was left to Adam, which was increased by the presentation of a book through the angel Raphael, in which every question was propounded and answered. Then God made a wife from the earth, Lilith; but as she was formed of the same material as Adam himself, she refused to be dominated over by Adam, and then vanished in the air. Adam complained to God, who sent the angels after the fugitive, and, as she still refused to return, God inflicted her with the punishment that daily three hundred of her children should die. God now formed for Adam a wife from one of Adam's ribs, very beautiful and fair, and brought her to Adam, blessed both, and invited them to sit for a feast, in which theangelic company joined. Then the evil spirits, through envy, planned Adam's fall. The serpent Sammael beheld Adam's splendor, and, with the help of others, he sought to mislead him. He himself came from heaven, rode upon a snake, and sought to persuade the beautiful Eve to partake of the fruit of the forbidden tree. As a proof that death should not follow, he laid his hand on the tree, and Eve did the same, which she had no sooner done than she saw the angel of death approaching her. Love for Adam moved her to tempt Eve, and to transgress, and could not be separated from each other by death. God banished Sammael from heaven; the snake he divested of its limbs; and Adam and Eve were driven out of Paradise upon the lowest of the seven earths, where they lived in gross darkness and lost the wonderful book of wisdom, which Adam, before he came to the second earth, had received from the second Eve, who, separated from Eve, lived with Lilith one hundred and thirty years. She bore him giants and evil spirits against his will, just as Eve did to Sammael. After this Eve bore Adam three sons—Cain, Abel, and Seth. Then Adam was allowed to go through all the other earths, until he came to the seventh, Tebel, which we inhabit; but he was still comfortable because of the loss of his wonderful book. He went to the river Gihon to drown himself, but to no avail. God saw his sorrow, had mercy upon him, and led him in the way of the recovery of his book again. Whatever man knows and has known originally from this book, that book has come lost. The inhabitants of India, however, claim to be in possession of it in the form of the holy books, which Braham brought to man from heaven.

The tradition of the Mohammedans is quite similar to this. The creation of Adam is more or less exaggerated according as this or that nation is practically inclined. The Assyrian legends of the fall of man are much more sober and brief (Smith, Chaldæan Genesis, p. 15 sq.).

Adam and Eve are commemorated as Christian saints in the Ethiopic calendar on April 1; Adam and Abel in the Armenian on July 28.

ADAM, Book of the title, more or less definitely cited, of several apocryphal works, an account of which we abstract from Smith's Dict. of Christ, Antiq. n. s. See APOCRYPHA.

1. "The Conflict of Adam and Eve."—This is a pseudodeipigraphical treatise brought by Krapf from Abyssinia, in an Ethiopic MS., and published by Watters, with a Latin dress, by Dillmann, in Ewald's Jahrbücher d. d. Wissenschaft in 1855 (also separately, Gött. 1855). It is a story, partly historical, partly romantic, of the adventures of our first parents after their expulsion from Eden, followed by an account of the fortunes of the succeeding patriarchs. It is now one of the most popular books of differenl authors, the latter imitating the style of the earlier.

After the Fall, which is not itself described, the exiles are represented as permitted to dwell in the "Cave of Treasures," under the western boundary of the Garden. There they are subjected to a series of trials, through Satanic influence as well as natural causes, but are comforted by divine intercourse and promises, culminating in a not obscure intimation of the great atonement. As tokens of these assurances, angels bring to Adam "treasures" in the cave, where Adam's body is finally embalmed by Seth. After the catastrophe of the intercourse between the Cainsites and the Sethites, Melchizedek opens the ark in which Adam's body had been deposited to preserve it from the Flood; and the true priesthood is thus continued through him.

The second part of the book is a peculiar travesty of the events of the Old Test., with remarkable incidents interpolated, including a genealogy of the Virgin Mary. This portion, even more plainly than the preceding, betrays a Christian origin.

The early date of the book in question is evinced by its reflection in the legends of Mohammedanism, and the allusions to the "Word of God." At the same time, the author, or authors, are not so deeply imbued with the histrical views under a dramatic form, of which the doctrine of redemption is the basal idea. The work is singularly independent of the other and somewhat parallel Apocrypha known as the Book of Enoch and the Book of Jubilees. The original appears to have been written in Arabic, probably not later than the 7th century. It seems to have formed the basis of the Arabic Apocalypse of Peter, preserved at Oxford and Rome, and the Syriac and Coptic editions of the latter. The Coptic version is also, of D'Abadie's Ethiopic MS. 125, entitled A Life of Adam.

2. "The Testament of Adam."—This is a remarkable group of fragmentary MSS. extant only in Syriac and Arabic. It was published by Renan (in the Revue Asiatique, 1868, ii, 427-470), with a translation, introduction, and notes. The Syriac version and the Syr. Curiously, the text is likewise printed in Wright's Syrian Apocalypse, p. 61 sq. Parts i and ii are a horarium of the universe for day and night, distinguishing at each of the twenty-four hours the adoration paid by some order of created beings, as angels and demons, men, animals, abysses, etc. Part iii, headed "More of Adam our father," contains short prophecies by Adam to Seth, relating to the Incarnation, the restoration of Adam, the making of the cross (from the fig-tree identified with the tree of knowledge), and the Deluge. Part iv, entitled "More of the Testament of our father Adam," is a short account of the "heavenly powers," i.e. angels, archangels, principalities, etc.

These are approximate estimates of different titles in the early ages, such as the Revelations of Adam, noticed by Ephraemi (Hos. 89 u.), and the Repentance of Adam, condemned by Gelasius (Decret. vi, 90). Synecules, Cedrenus, and the Apostolic Constitutions (especially in the Copitic recension) likewise allude to these and other prophetic sayings of Adam.

The Hours and the Prophecy have every appearance of forming part of the same work. In each Adam speaks to Seth, and refers to his past sin; and there is considerable similarity of tone. They are probably, however, mere extracts; the several passages are disconnected, and the sequence of thought at the end. If it be the book meant by Ephraemi, it cannot be later than the 4th century, and nothing decisive can be urged against this date, although it is impossible to speak with confidence.

The Testament, as it stands, is short and unpretending; yet a lofty spirit pervades a great part of it. No distinctive doctrine is to be found in it. It appears to lie outside of Greek and Latin Christianity, and is thus an interesting monument of an almost unknown world of ancient creeds.

3. "The Book of the Daughters of Adam."—This is a work mentioned in the Gelasian decree as apocryphal. Another title appears to be "Legiptophon," i.e. the Book of Jubilaeus; but, as the account of the daughters of Adam in the latter work occupies only six lines of ch. iv, some other writing is perhaps meant.

4. "The Story and Conversation of Adam."—This is the title of a Greek work which purports to be "reveled by God to Moses [read Seth] his servant, taught by the archangel Michael." It begins, after the few introductory lines, with the murder of Abel, in place of whom another son is promised. This marks Seth as the organ of revelation, and he is distinguished throughout by special prerogatives. The true subject of the book, however, is the account of the death of Adam and his giving place to Seth. In his mortal sickness, Adam collects his sons around him. Afflicted at his groans, Eve and Seth approach the Garden to pray for the oil of mercy from the tree, but in vain; he will die, Michael tells them, within three days. Eve then describes the circumstances of the Fall at great length (ch. xiv.), and the embellishments of the Biblical account having at times some imaginative beauty. She goes out to pray, but is raised up by an angel to see Adam (his spirit) borne up in a chariot of light. He is washed in the Acherusian lake, and committed by "the Father of the universe" to Michael to be placed in the third heaven. God himself descends to give promises of restoration and resurrection to the body. It is buried by angels, and Abel's body is with it. Within a week Eve is laid in the same grave, and Michael returns to heaven singing hallelujah.

Various echoes of New-Test. language indicate that the book is of Christian origin, though there is no quotation and no distinct Christian doctrine. Besides the borrowing of the framework and various details from Jewish tracts, its style is strongly connected with other extant apocryphal books. The original language appears to have been Greek, traces of the Sept. being evident. Grammar, however, and inflections are of a debased type, and the tone is that of an oriental population, such as might have been found in Palestine or Western Syria. It seems impossible, at present, to find evidence as to the date; but any early century from the second onwards is not inappropriate.

The work was first published in 1866 by Tischendorf, in his Apocalypses Apocryphae, under the fictitious title "Apocalypsis Mosis." A better text is reproduced in full in Cerrani's Monumenta Sacra et Profana (Milan, 1868, i, 21 sq.). No one of the MSS., however, is complete; and the text is in a bad state in all. An English version of Tischendorf's text is given in the Antiquene Christian Library.

5. "Liber Adami," also known as the Codex Nasaenus, properly The Great Book or Treasure of the Mendes.

Adam (the city). A trace of this name and locality appears to linger in the present Tell Damieh, at the modern ferry of the same name across the Jordan, near Kurn Surtabeh (Badeker, Handb. for Palest. p. 266).

Adam, a monk of ALDERBACH, Bavaria, and a Cistercian, lived about 1250. He wrote A Treatise on Moral Theology, in verse.—Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Adam of Arras, called after his native place, was bishop of Terouenne in 1215. In 1229 he became a monk at Clairvaux, where he died. He left a history of that order, the manuscript of which is preservated in the Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris, and a devotional work, the Prayers of Our Lord Jesus Christ (Paris, 1476).

Adam, a Scottish bishop, was promoted to the see of BRUICHEN in 1238, and was employed in several embassies to England towards the facilitating of King David's redemption, who had been taken prisoner at the unfortunate battle of Durham in 1244. He probably died in the beginning of the year 1251. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 161.

Adam, a Scottish bishop, was abbot of Melrose, and was elected in 1213, and consecrated bishop of CATHNESS in May, 1214, by William Malvoisine, bishop of St. Andrews. While he was abbot he was sent as ambassador to king John of England. He went—in company with Walter, bishop of Glasgow, and BrilCUS, bishop of Moray—to Rome in 1218, to crave absolution from the pope; and they returned in 1219. Adam is supposed to have been cruelly murdered by the earl of Caithness in 1222. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 206.

Adam the CARTHUSIAN. See ADAM OF LONDON.

Adam of CHAMILLUS. A Cistercian monk, was created bishop of Senlis in France, and attended several councils. He died in 1250. He wrote Opus Sermonum, which is yet in MS.

Adam of Clandon, a Roman Catholic divine who lived in the beginning of the 18th century, was made dean of Leon about 1196, and retained that dignity till 1223. He died in 1226. He composed, for the use of his Church at Leon, Ordinariss Ecclesiae, sive Ordo Divini Officii in Eccles. Laudamentum (Paris, 1682)—also a Book of Solutions of Various Passages in Holy Scripture (in 3 vols. MS.). See Oudinon, De Script. Eccles. i, 1702.

Adam of DOMERHAM was so called from his native place, Domerham, in Wilts. He was a monk of

Adam, abbot of Evesham, lived about the middle of the 12th century, and was, according to Pitsen, a Benedictine monk; or, according to Possenivo, a Cistercian. Of his works there are left a volume of Sermones—another of Epistles—and a book on The Holy Eucharist.

Adam of Marisco, an English Franciscan of Oxford, known as Doctor Illustratus. He flourished in the 13th century, and wrote on the Song of Solomon, St. Dionysius the Areopagite, and on the Master of the Sentences.

Adam of Mersham (Muremathers), a canon of St. Paul's, London, was still living in 1342. He composed a History of his own times, as well as two Chronicles—one from 1302 to 1343, and the other carrying it on to 1380. It is doubted, however, whether he is the author of the latter. Neither of the Chronicles has been printed. See Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, App. p. 42.

Adam of Paris, so called because born in that city, flourished in the last half of the 11th century. Thoroughly educated in the liberal arts of his own country, he passed into Greece, and was received with much honor at Spalatro, in Dalmatia, by the archbishop Laurentius, who induced him to undertake the emendation of the Acts of the Martyrs Dominius and Anastasius. The latter part of the work is lost; but the former is given by Henschienius (April 11). Adam also wrote some hymns, and put into verse such parts of the Office of St. Dominius as were chanted to music.

Adam du Petit Pont, a Roman Catholic divine, was born in England in the 12th century, and was sent in his youth to Paris. He studied under Mathieu d'Angers and Peter Lombard, and was a zealous partisan of Aristotle. He became a distinguished professor, teaching a school near the Petit Pont, from which he received his name. He lectured there on grammar, rhetoric, and dialectic; and was afterwards (about 1145) made a canon of Notre Dame and prior of the church of Pereire in the collegiate school of the diocese. In 1175 (or 1176) he was called home, and was consecrated bishop of St. Asaph. In 1179 he took part in the Council of Lateran, where he was obliged to condemn certain propositions made by Peter Lombard. He died in England in 1180. He wrote a treatise entitled Art de Bien Parler. He was sometimes called, by his contemporaries, Peripateuticus, on account of his attachment to the philosophy of Aristotle; and sometimes Scholasticus. See Biog. Universelle, s. v.; Hook, Eccles. Biog. s. v.

Adam the Premonstrant, or Scotus, a historian of the 12th century, was born in Scotland, and educated in the Monastery of Lindisfarne; from whence he went to Paris, and became a member of the Sorbonne. He became in 1158 a regular canon of St. Augustine, of the Order of Premonstratensians; and upon his return to his native country was a monk, first at Melrose and lastly at Durham. He is also said to have been bishop of Wirthem. He died in 1180. His writings are, Commentarius in Regulam D. Augustini:—Tractatus de Triplex Tertiar Nuculo Magna:—Liber de Triplex Generis Contemplationis:—Sermones, XI, VI, VII (Antw. 1659, fol.), before which there had been published (at Paris, 1518), some Treatises, and fourteen Sermons on the Order and Habit of the Premonstratensians of Paris. Oudinus, of the same order, states that he had seen fifty-three Sermons by Adam Scotus, and A Soliloquy concerning the Soul, in MS., in the library of the Celestines of Mantes. See Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, 385, 12; Dupin, Bibl. des Ann. Eccles. (English transl. Dublin, 1728), ii, 368; Landon, Eccles. Hist. s. v.

Adam of Saint Victor. Very little is known of the life of this most fertile of the Latin hymnologists of the Middle Ages. Whether he was born in Great Britain or Brittany is uncertain. About the year 1130 he entered the Benedictine foundation near Paris, and in 1134 was elected after St. Victor of Marseilles; hence his name. He died in 1177, and was interred in the cloister of that abbey, where, before the Revolution of 1789, his epitaph might have been seen in fourteen verses, one of which was as follows:

> "Unde erupit homo? cujus conceptio culpa,\n> Damnatio, labor virtutis, necesse morte nuntiatur.\n> He wrote some treatises on devotion; among others, one in honor of the Virgin Mary. His poetical works, which M. Gautier published in 1858, speak for him. As to the merits of Adam, dean Trench speaks as follows: "His profound acquaintance with the whole circle of the theology of his time, and eminently with its exposition of Scripture; the abundant and admirable use which he makes of it, delivering, as he thus does, his poems from the merely subjective cast of those, beautiful as they are, of St. Bernard; the exquisite art and variety with which, for the most part, his verse is managed and his rhymes disposed; their rich melody multiplying and never degenerating at the close; the strength and dignity of the often concentrates into a single line; his skill in conducting a narration; and, most of all, the evident nearness of the things which he celebrates to his own heart of hearts—all these, and other excellences, render him, as far as my judgment goes, the foremost among the sacred Latin poets of the Middle Ages." Some of Adam's hymns have been translated into English and German. For the English, see Neale, Medival Hymns and Sequences (Lond. 1867), p. 107–158; Lyra Mystica (ibid. 1869), p. 1, 170, 576; Lyra Mesiastica (ibid. eod.), p. 79, 116, 211, 903, 940, 949, 989, 414; and Trench, Sacred Latin Poomonstransians (p. 58 sq). For the Germans, see Rom. 10. 35, 45, 55, 65; Forlagle, Geistliche christl. Vorzeit, p. 400 sq. See Qui PROCEDIS ub UTOQUE. (B. F.)

Adamor, Theodoros, a German philologist, was born about 1470 in Lippe. He wrote, De Christiani Ordine Codicis Christianorum (Paris, 1582), a discourse which was addressed to Charles V and to Francis I: — De Insula Ikdo et Militarium Ordinum Institutione (ibid., 1586): — and edited several Greek and Latin classical works, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Adamah, in Persian mythology, was the place of detention for Adam after his banishment from Paradise — the second of the seven earths, where eternal darkness reigns.

Adamantia (also Amalyta, Eiga, and Adrastea), in Greek mythology, was the nurse of Jupiter. She hid the young god in a cradle among the thick leaves of a tree from the search of Saturn, who would have destroyed him.

Adamastus, in Greek mythology, was (1) a sur-10 name of Mars as well as of Hercules. (2) The father of Achemenides.

Adami, Adam, a Benedictine friar, was born about 1590. He was bishop of Hierapolis and suffragan of Hildesheim. He was appointed to represent the prelates of the duchy of Württemberg in the Assembly at Westphalia. He died about 1670. Adami wrote, Ars 15 Consilia Westphalica (Frankf. 1698; Leips., 1677, by Mayr, who was accused of being inexact in this work). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Adam, Andrea, an Italian musician, director of the Pontifical Chapel at the commencement of the 18th century. He published a volume of musical abstractions entitled Osservazioni per ben Regolare il Cus di' Cantori della Chiesa di San Giovanni Laterano. He observed in the Pontificale Ordinarie che Straordinarie (1771). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Adam, Annibale, an Italian Jesuit, was born at Fermo in 1626. He became a Jesuit in 1641, and was professor of belles-lettres at Rome, where he died, in 1706, leaving, besides many other works, Sententiae Romanae Pulchrae Servatae (S. R. E., Cardinale qui e Seminario Romano Profecer (Rome, 1659, fol.): — Epistolae: — Opus Tripartitum Ethico-Politico-sacerum, etc. (transl. from the Italian of Sperella, ibid. 1671): — Life of the Protomartyr of Denmark, St. Canute (in Italian, ibid., 1882, 4to); — and a translation of the Sermons of Father Antonio Verri (1883, 4to), etc.

Adami, Francesco, canon of Fermo, who lived near the middle of the 16th century, wrote a history of his native country, which was published after his death by Cesar Ottinelli, under the title De Rebus in Civitate Firmana Gestis, Fragmentum Libri Duo (Rome, 1601). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Adami, Johann Christian, a Lutheran theologicalian of Germany, was born Jan. 13, 1682, at Luckau, in Lower Lusatia. He studied at Wittenberg; was in 1684 appointed deacon in his native place; advanced in 1687 as archdeacon; and in 1691 as pastor there. In 1694 he became a licentiate of theology at Wittenberg; in 1700 he was made doctor of theology; and in 1711 he was appointed general superintendent and first preacher at Lübben, where he died, May 12, 1715. He is the au-

Adamian, an Irish name (the diminutive of Adam) borne by three men.

1. A Scot of Irish extraction mentioned by Bede (Hist. Eccles., iv, 25) in connection with Culdil-urbs (Coldingham), a mixed monastery, situated on the bor-

25 hers, in the Borders of the King of Dunbeath. He was a young man, committed an offence, a penitential course of life was prescribed, which Adaman resolved to observe until the end of his days. He continued in Coldingham, from about 670, in the practice of the utmost self-de-

30 nial, tasting meat and drink only on Sundays and holidays. He observed with sorrow the laxity of discipline in the monastery, and is said to have had a revelation of its approaching destruction, which came to pass about 679. He is commemorated in the Eng-

Adams, Aaron, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Steuben, N. Y., June 22, 1796. He spen-

75 t his early life on his father's farm; was converted in 1824, and soon after licensed to preach; entered the Oneida Conference in 1829, and on its division became a member of the Black River Conference. His appoint-

70 ments were Russia, New York Mills, Stockbridge, Little Falls, Fairfield, and Rome; in 1841 he was presiding elder of Herkimer District; in 1845 of Potsdam District; and was afterwards stationed successively at Pulaski, Vien-

80 na, Fairfield, Trenton, Marcy, Oriskany, and Floyd. In 1867 he superannuated, and sustained that relation to the close of his life, making his home first at Floyd, then at Steuben, and finally at Rome, N. Y., where he died, May 9, 1879. Mr. Adams' Christian life was without a blot, having always been earnest, active, and steadfast. He was a symmetrical and complete man in Christ. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1880, p. 75.

Adams, Amos, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born of pious parents at Amenia, N. Y. We have no means of ascertaining the date. He was trained from childhood in ways of righteousness and devotion. At the age of fifteen he experienced conversion, afterwards received a medical education, was licensed to preach in 1823, and in 1851 united with the Rock River Conference. In 1857 his health gave way, and obliged him to retire from active service. He died in Channahon, Ill., Sept. 11, 1859. Mr. Adams possessed a vigorous mind, rea-

90 soned clearly, and presented the truth forcibly and convincingly. As a man, his life was above reproach. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1859, p. 394.

Adams, Alexander, Jr., a missionary of the Church of England, was licensed to preach by the bishop of London, Dec. 21, 1748, and was sent to St. James's Parish, in Ann Arundel Co., Md., where he died, Oct. 20, 1767. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer, Pulpit, v. 35.

Adams, Alfred S., a Methodist Episcopal minis-

100 ter, was born at Union, Me., in December, 1824. He was converted when about twelve years of age through the influence of a religious tract. In 1850 he was admitted into the East Maine Conference. In 1854-55 he located and studied at the East Maine Conference Seminary, and in 1856 re-entered the Conference and continued faithful until the close of 1865, when he enlisted as a private in the Eighteenth Regiment of Maine Volunteers. One year later he was appointed chaplain of the regiment. In 1865 he was readmitted into his Conference, but before reaching his first charge he died at Waldoborough, Me., July 24, 1865. Mr. Adams was a brave Christian soldier. He was small in stature, but of a wiry constitution. His sensibilities were quick; his sermons clear, forcible, and efficient. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1866, p. 111.

Adams, Amos, a Unitarian minister, was born at Medfield, Mass., Sept. 1, 1728. He graduated at Harvard College, in 1752, and was installed pastor of the First Church in Roxbury, Mass., Sept. 12, 1753. He died Oct. 5, 1775. He published a number of single Sermons. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 158.

Adams, Charles R., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born May 20, 1816. His early history is unrecorded. In 1842 he was admitted into the New York Conference. A persistent bronchial irritation soon obliged him to superannuate, yet he continued to preach as his health would permit until the close of his life. On the division of the New York Conference he became a member of the New York East Conference. The last ten years of his life were spent in Chicago. He died Feb. 28, 1865, and was eminently a man of prayer. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1865, p. 81.

Adams, Cornelius, a Congregational minister, was born at Canterbury, Conn., Nov. 9, 1776. He graduated at Yale College in 1808, and was ordained at Scotland, Conn., in 1805. He followed Dr. Cogswell in the pastorate of the Church in the last-named place, and died Nov. 28, 1807. The sermon he preached the Sabbath after his ordination was published. See Cong. Quart., 1861, p. 154.

Adams, Daniel S., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Unionville, N. J., in 1828. He was early led to Christ; received very limited educational advantages in his youth; entered Charlestonville Seminary in his twenty-sixth year for a ministerial preparation; received license to exhort in 1858; and in 1854 united with the New Jersey Conference. In his second year, failing health obliged him to superannuate. He died May 21, 1873. Mr. Adams was a devoted, useful, much-loved pastor, and a laborious, intractable, successful preacher. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1874, p. 96.

Adams, David, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born about 1736, probably in Pennsylvania. He was converted in Sullivan County, Tenn., in 1815; received license to preach in 1818; soon after was admitted into the Holotan Conference, and in it served diligently until his death, at his residence in Knox County, April 15, 1858. Mr. Adams was one of national reputation. He possessed of varied talents for the pulpit, a commanding voice, fine delivery, and sympathetic temperament. As a field preacher he scarcely had an equal. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1858, p. 434.

Adams, Ezra, a Congregational minister, was born at West Medway, Mass., Aug. 29, 1808. He united with the parochial church of Rev. Dr. Ide, graduated at Amherst College in 1835, and, after teaching for a season, entered the East Windsor (Conn.) Theological Seminary, and, having finished its curriculum, was ordained pastor of the Church in Surrey, N. H., in 1839. From Surrey he went, in 1842, to Roxbury, N. H., where he continued seven years. He was then called to, and held the pastorate, at Gilsum in 1849. He died March 20, 1864. Mr. Adams was a faithful pastor and minister, distinguished for his self-sacrifice, and took deep interest in the education of the young. He wrote for the Massachusetts Sabbath-school Society a little volume entitled Advice to an Inquirer, or Children Led to Christ. See Cong. Quarterly, 1864, p. 208.

Adams, Ezra E., D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born near Concord, N. H., and graduated at Dartmouth College. Early in his ministry he became a chaplain to the seamen at Havre, France, remaining in that position about ten years. He visited England, Scotland, Denmark, and other countries of Northern Europe, going as far as St. Petersburg. Returning to America, he was chosen pastor of the Pearl Street Congregational Church, Nashua, N. H. Here he spent six years. He next entered the service of the Foreign Evangelical Society and went to Philadelphia, where he soon became known among the Presbyterian churches as an attractive and eloquent preacher. He then founded the Church of the Spring Garden Hall congregation, which, under his eloquent and earnest preaching, became very strong and active. His health failed, and he went to work in France and Italy and came back much improved, but soon had to leave his duties. In a short time he was elected professor of rhetoric and kindred subjects in Lincoln University, Oxford, Pa. He became one of the editors of the Presbyterian in 1870, retaining at the same time his professorship in the university. He died Nov. 3, 1871. Dr. Adams was a thoroughly noble man, with large intelligence. See Presbyterian, Nov. 11, 1871.

Adams, Fitzherbert, D.D., an English divine, was born in 1651, and was educated at Lincoln College, where he took his M.A. June 4, 1675. He was inducted into the rectory of Waddington, Sept. 29, 1688; and elected to the Fellowship of Lincolns College in 1693. The same year he became prebendary of the sixth stall, Durham; was removed to the tenth in 1695, and to the eleventh in 1711. He was vice-chancellor in 1695, and died June 17, 1719. As rector of Lincoln he held the living of Twiford, and, having received fifteen hundred pounds a year on the lease, he expended it on the college chapel and rector's lodging. He bequeathed his library to the college, and was a benefactor to All Saints' Church, Oxford.

Adams, George Elisabeth, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Worthington, Mass., Oct. 27, 1801. He prepared for college at Phillips Academy, graduated at Yale College in 1821, and at the Andover Theological Seminary in 1826. From 1826 to 1829 he was professor of sacred literature in the Bangor Theological Seminary. In the latter year he was ordained at Bangor and installed pastor at Brunswick, Me. He resigned in the following year, and was acting pastor of Trinity Congregational Church, Orange, N. J., from 1831 to 1832, and died there Dec. 22, 1875. See Cong. Quarterly, 1876, p. 418.

Adams, George Washington, a Congregational minister, was born at Limerick, Me., May 16, 1808. When fourteen years of age, he was apprenticed to a tanner, and worked at that trade until he was of age. He then commenced his preparatory studies for the ministry. Having graduated at Bowdoin College, he spent two years at Bangor Theological Seminary, and was ordained at Brooksville, Me., in 1837, commencing his ministry there in the midst of a powerful revival. He remained here two years, after which he was pastor successively in Hillsborough, N. H., Dracut, Mass.; Shirley and Jaffrey, N. H.; and Riverpoint, R. I., where he died Dec. 2, 1865, after five years of labor. "Mr. Adams was a man of Puritan energy, earnestness, and simplicity, and his preaching was doctrinal, pungent, and uncompromising. Several revivals attended his ministry." See Cong. Quarterly, 1865, p. 192.

Adams, Ira, a Universalist minister, was born at Newtonville, Mass., April 5, 1841. He removed with his parents to Foweshult in Chautauqua Co., N. Y., in 1847; studied for the ministry at Dunkirk, N. Y., and Canton Theological School, and in 1867 began preaching. He was ordained to the work of the ministry at Stockton, N. Y., where he labored faithfully and successfully two years, when ill-health obliged him to relinquish the regular pursuit and enter secular business. He died Dec. 21, 1869. Mr. Adams was characterized...
Adams, James (1), a Presbyterian minister, was born Sept. 12, 1772. He studied in his early days under Rev. James Hall, D.D., of North Carolina, and studied theology under the Rev. James M'Kees, D.D., of the same church. He was licensed to preach by the Oxford Presbyterian Church in 1756; was employed by the Congregational Church of Dorchester, S. C., where he was ordained in 1779. He died Aug. 18, 1843. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iii, 921.

Adams, James (2), a Presbyterian minister, was born in Beaufort County, N. C., in 1800. He graduated at Princeton College, and also at the Theological Seminary. After the ministering the Presbyterian Church as a missionary in district portions of Pennsylvania. A call was sent to him from Monticello, Sullivan Co., N. Y., which he accepted, and he was ordained and installed pastor of the same. He was a ripe scholar and an eloquent preacher. As a pastor, the twenty-one years of service in this Church bear testimony to his fidelity. In 1857, he entered upon the duties of a large school in Jefferson County, N. Y., but he was obliged to relinquish it after six months. He died Feb. 7, 1857. (W. P. S.)

Adams, James (3), a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born at Franklin, Mass. He was ordained in 1839, and his ministry of nearly thirty years was almost entirely devoted to building up feeble parishes in New Jersey and Connecticut. He died at Poquoson, Conn., Oct. 29, 1868, as rector of St. James's Church in that place. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. Jan. 1869, p. 640.

Adams, James M'Connal, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Lincoln County, N. C., Dec. 25, 1810. He received a classical education at Georgia University; a theological education at the Theological Seminary of Columbia, S. C.; joined the Presbyterian Church, and was ordained by the Bethel Presbytery in 1834 as an evangelist. He died at Yorkville, S. C., March 31, 1862. Possessed of fine intellectual gifts, well disciplined by education, and a heart full of noble and generous zeal, Mr. Adams was eminently qualified for the work of his ministry. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1867, p. 422.

Adams, John (1), D.D., an English divine, was born in London, and educated at Cambridge, being admitted to King's College in 1678, and receiving the degree of A.B. in 1692, and of A.M. in 1686. In 1687 he was presented by the lord-chancellor Jeffreys to the living of Hitcham, in Leicestershire. In London he was lecturer of St. Clement's; rector of St. Alban's, Wood Street, and of St. Bartholomew's. He was also a prebendary of Canterbury, chaplain in ordinary to Queen Anne, and in 1708 canon of Windsor. He was presented in 1711 to the living of Hornsey, and in the following year was elected provost of King's College, which position he held until 1719. Fifteen of his sermons were printed (1695-1712). See Alumni Etonenses, p. 48; Cook, Preacher's Assistant.

Adams, John (2), a Congregational minister, was the son of Matthew Adams, whose literary tastes, although he was a mechanic, led him to collect a fine library, for the use of which Dr. Franklin acknowledges his grateful acknowledgment. His son John was graduated at Harvard College in the class of 1745. For thirty years (1748-78) he was minister of Durham, N. H. From Durham he removed to Newfield, York Co., Me., where he preached and practiced medicine till his death, June 4, 1792. He is said to have been subject at times to great depression of spirit, and his behavior was unusually eccentric. When in this latter state he was unusually animated in his preaching. See Allen, American Biog. Dict. s. v. (J. C. S.)

Adams, John (3), LL.D., an American teacher and philanthropist, was born at Canterbury, Conn., in 1772. He graduated at Yale College in 1795, and taught at the academy in his native town until 1798. He became rector of Plainfield Academy in 1800; principal of Bacon Academy, Colchester, Conn., in 1803; and principal of Phillips Academy, Andover, Mass., in 1810, which position he held until 1835. During this period, he was one of the founders of several benevolent societies. At the close of the period of his labors at Andover, he removed to his estate, where he gave much attention to improving the school laws of that state, and organized several hundred Sunday-schools. His death occurred at Jacksonville, April 24, 1865. He wrote several works on the training of the young, a part of which were published and others left in manuscript.

Adams, John (4), a Bible Christian minister, was born in the parish of Kirkhampton, Cornwall, England, in 1764. He was converted when young, entered the itinerancy in 1825, and was superannuated in 1848. He died May 7, 1863.

Adams, John (5), a Presbyterian minister, was born in Ireland, March 7, 1785. He was educated at the University of Glasgow, and studied theology privately. He emigrated to the United States in 1825, joined the American Presbyterian Church, and was appointed to preach at Guiniston, York Co., Pa. He died Jan. 14, 1862. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1868, p. 555.

Adams, John (6), an English Congregational minister, was born at Linton, Cambridgeshire, in 1787. Here he was surrounded by good religious influences from his infancy. He was educated at Wymondley College, and in 1815 was ordained at Market-Deeping, June 17, 1818; and soon afterwards went to Redhill, near Royston, where he labored until 1864. He died Jan. 14, 1866. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1867, p. 267.

Adams, John (7), a Congregational minister, was born at Salem, Mass., Nov. 30, 1813. He graduated at Middlebury College in 1837; entered the Andover Theological Seminary; but did not remain long; preached in Warren, Vt., six months; was acting pastor at Cambridge, Mass., in 1839, and at Essex in 1840; was ordained July 21, 1841, at Underhill North, Vt.; dismissed in October, 1843; installed at Sharon June 26, 1844; dismissed May 1, 1857. He was acting pastor at Hanover Centre, Vt., from 1857 to 1861; and from 1861 to 1869, he was minister of the church at Hanover Centre from that time until his death, May 19, 1879. See Statistics of Cong. Ministers, 1879.

Adams, John Dietrich, a German Reformed minister, was a native of Hesse, in Germany. He emigrated to America in 1808, and accepted a call from the churches at Sunbury, Pa., and a few neighboring places. He was received as a member of the Synod in 1809, and on account of using strong drink was expelled in 1813. He died soon after. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church, iii, 470.

Adams, John H., an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Worcester, Jan. 29, 1788. He was piously trained, converted under J. McCony in 1811, and entered the ministry in 1815. He became a superannuate in 1846, after having labored in various parts of England, and several years in France, and died Dec. 15, 1846. Mr. Adams stood high in the esteem of his brethren, and his private and ministerial character was irreproachable. His sermons were instructive and convincing. See Minutes of the BPF, Conference, 1847.

Adams, John M., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was admitted into the Virginia Conference in 1866, and in a little session to the close of his life, July 9, 1873. As to Mr. Adams's birth and early life, we have no means of information. Through his instrumentality many were added to the Church. He was an affectionate father, a devoted Christian, and a clear, pointed, soul stirring preacher. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1879, p. 20.

Adams, John Ripley, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Plainfield, Conn., March 20, 1802. He was a graduate of Yale College in the class of 1821. He entered the Andover Theological Seminary, Mass., in 1823, and was licensed as a Congregational minister in 1826. Though he labored in churches known as Congregational, he was a member of the Lounderry Presbytery. He died at Northampton, Mass., April 25, 1866. He was an eminent scholar and a successful teacher. For many years he was principal of Phillips's Academy at Andover. See Wilson, Preb. Hist. Almanac, 1867, p. 119.

Adams, John Watson, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Simsbury, Conn., June 6, 1796. He was converted in 1816, graduated at Hamilton College in 1822, and afterwards studied in the Auburn Theological Seminary. In 1826 he was installed pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in Syracuse, N.Y., where he remained until his death, April 6, 1856. After his death there was published a duodecimo volume of his Discourses, in connection with a Memoir of his life and character, by the Rev. Joel Parker, D.D. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 488.

Adams, Joseph (1), a Congregational minister, was born at Braintree, Mass., Jan. 1, 1869. He graduated at Harvard College in 1710; was ordained at Newington, N.H., Nov. 16, 1715; and died May 28, 1758. He is remembered by Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 456.

Adams, Joseph (2), a Unitarian minister, was a native of Newbury, Mass.; graduated at Harvard College in 1742; was ordained at Stratham, N.H., June 24, 1756; and died Feb. 24, 1785. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 14.

Adams, Joseph (3), a Baptist minister, was born in Maine about 1780. He made a profession of his faith in Christ in the Methodist Church, but subsequently a change of sentiments led him to join a Baptist Church. He was ordained pastor of a church in Jay, Me., where he remained for fourteen years. After ten years, spent chiefly in labors as an itinerant minister, he returned in 1828 to the church of which he had been pastor in Jay, and continued in place for three years (1828-31). Resigning a second time, he gave himself more or less to itinerant work so long as he was able to preach. He died in 1844. See Millett, Hist. of the Baptists in Maine, p. 433. (J.C.S.)

Adams, Joseph (4), a Presbyterian minister, was born in 1809. He was dismissed from thePalestine to the Wisconsin Presbytery Sept. 13, 1856. In 1871 he was a resident of Dubuque, Iowa, but was at Frankville, Ia., without charge. He died March 6, 1871. See Horton, Hist. of the Presb. Church in Illinois.

Adams, Joseph Augustus, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at South New Market, N.H., March 17, 1818. He was converted while attending the Wesleyan University, where he graduated in 1842. The next year he was appointed principal of an academy at Norwich, Conn. The next year as theological teacher at Andover; and then as teacher in the New Hampshire Conference Seminary. In 1846 he entered the New England Conference. In 1859 he travelled for his health, and died in San Francisco, Aug. 27, 1860. Mr. Adams was modest, cheerful, cultured, in mind and spirit, and devout. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1861, p. 54.

Adams, Joseph B., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Chester County, Pa., in 1801. He made a profession of religion in 1819; graduated at Jefferson College in 1820 and Princeton Seminary in 1822; and entered the ministry of the Presbyterian Church in 1827. In 1872-74 he was agent of the Sunday school Union for the purpose of establishing Sabbath schools through the states of New York and Pennsylvania. He labored in Georgia as a missionary for nearly three years, when he removed to Alabama and joined the Tuscaloosa Presbyterian. He died at Easton, Pa., July 5, 1865. See Wilson, Preb. Hist. Almanac, 1866, p. 89.

Adams, Joseph D., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Williamsburg District, S.C., Dec. 26, 1820. He joined the Church in 1831, though he did not profess religion until 1825. He moved to Georgia in 1825; became class leader in 1838; was licensed to exhort in 1844; and in 1846 united with the Georgia Conference. In 1856 he removed to Louisiana, and joined the Louisiana Conference, in which he labored until his death, July 26, 1873. Mr. Adams, as a preacher, was richly instructive, apt in illustration, and his sermons and prayers were delivered with great power. In exhortation and prayer he had few equals as to pathos and fervor; as a pastor he excelled. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M.E. Church, South, 1874, p. 383.

Adams, Josiah (1), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Woodfield, O., July 25, 1818. He experienced religion in his eighth year; received license to exhort in his sixteenth year; was ordained to the presbytery; and in 1841 was admitted into the Pittsburgh Conference, in which he served the Church faithfully until his death, April 10, 1851. Mr. Adams was a self-made man of refinement, accuracy, and breadth of knowledge. He possessed excellent natural ministerial gifts. His mind was always attended with unusual power, and everywhere he was highly honored. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1851, p. 603.

Adams, Josiah (2), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at West Huldon, Northamptonshire, England, in 1821, of pious Wesleyan parents. He experienced religion at the age of sixteen; was soon licensed to preach; emigrated to America in 1858; and in 1857 was admitted to the Episcopal Ohio Conference, where he labored with great acceptability and usefulness until his death, Oct. 14, 1866. Mr. Adams, as a preacher, was earnest, practical, and pointed; as a Christian, upright and honorable in all his deportment. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1867, p. 163.

Adams, Lucius, a Canadian Methodist minister, was born at Esquesing, Ont., in 1850. He was converted in childhood, was educated at the University of Toronto, Mich., and the Victoria College, Ont., where he was distinguished by his assiduity and proficiency. In 1854 he was received by the Conference, having been previously sent to Mitchell, Ont., where a revival crowned his labors. He died in the midst of his success at Mitchell, Ont., Jan. 1, 1856. See Carroll, Case and his Contemporaries, i, 151.

Adams, Moses (1), a Unitarian minister, was born at Framingham, Mass., Oct. 16, 1749. He graduated at Harvard College in 1771; was ordained and installed pastor of the Church in Acton, June 25, 1777; and died Oct. 13, 1819. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 115.

Adams, Moses (2), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Jefferson County, N.Y., Jan. 11, 1806. He joined the Church in his youth, and in 1830 united with the Oneida Conference, in which for nearly twenty years he did effective work, though physically weak. In 1854 he removed to Racine, Wis. The last year of his life he spent in Kansas making a way for Methodism. He preached overwork some time in 1871 or 1872. He was well-informed, disciplined, and refined; laborious and sympathetic. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1872, p. 55.

Adams, N. H., a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, died Oct. 23, 1854, while rector of St. Matthew's Church, Utica, N.Y. For twenty-seven years he had labored in that capacity. He had enwrapped his entire ministry. He was of an amiable disposition, and very much beloved by his Church. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1854, p. 627.
Adams, Nehemiah, D.D., an eminentCongregational minister, was born at Salem, Mass., Feb. 19, 1806. He graduated at the Harvard University in the class of 1826. He pursued his theological studies at the Andover Seminary, where he graduated in 1829. Dec. 17 of that year he was ordained and installed as colleague pastor with the Rev. Dr. Holmes of the First Congregational Church, Cambridge; and March 28, 1834, he was installed as pastor of the Essex Street Church, Boston. On account of failing health, he was obliged, in 1840, to resign his pastorate; but he refused to accept his resignation, choosing rather to obtain an associate pastor and allow him to travel for the benefit of his health. He made a long voyage in the fall of 1869 to San Francisco, thence to Honolulu and Hong Kong, and returned in 1870. He died in Boston Oct. 6, 1878.

Dr. Adams was a Christian gentleman, and though often engaged in keen controversies, no word ever fell from his tongue or pen that betrayed anger or resentment. His piety was of a deep and spiritual character, and he possessed in an eminent degree the graces of the Christian. These qualities appear in his published writings, but they greatly enriched and beautified his long and useful life. He was for many years an officer of the American Tract Society, and of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions.

Not long after entering upon his ministry in Boston, Dr. Adams was engaged, in the Unitarian controversy, on which topic he preached vigorous and scholarly sermons, and published several books in defence of Trinitarian doctrine. One of these publications was entitled Remarks on the Unitarian Belief. In a periodical entitled The Spirit of the Pilgrims, published from 1826 to 1828, and devoted to the defence of the Puritan faith, as against the modifying and destructive tendencies of modern liberal thought, he appeared with great frequency. Other published writings of his are, The Friends of Christ in the New Testament; A Life of John Eliot; An Autobiography of Thomas Shepard; Christ, a Friend; Agnes and the Key of her Little Coffin; Bertha and her Baptism; Communion Sabbath; and others of a devotional and religious character, including tracts, hymns, poems, addresses, and discourses. His South Side View of Slavery, published in 1854, is perhaps the best-remembered of his books, from the strong feeling it called out on the part of abolitionists. This book was the outcome of a persuasion that the formation of Southern institutions during a winter spent in Georgia for his health, and it elicited a wide and warm discussion in the North, in connection with which Dr. Adams published his correspondence with Governor Wise of Virginia. See Cong. Year-book, 1875, p. 86. (W. F. S.)

Adams, Newton, M.D., a Baptist missionary, was born at East Bloomfield, N.Y., in 1804. When he was thirty years of age he determined to enter upon missionary life, and in that capacity, in 1834, went to South Africa to labor among the Zulus. He was one of six men who with their wives went to the Zulu country to establish there a missionary station. In 1844 he was ordained a minister of the Gospel. His death occurred September 25, 1856. It is said that he was in the prime of his life and of his usefulness. See Allen, Amer. Biog. s.v. (J. C. S.)

Adams, Obadiah, an English Wesleyan missionary, was converted in Loombridge, Sussex, where he became a very useful local preacher. He was appointed to labor in Jamaica, W.I., in 1818, and was successfully conducting the mission in Spanish Town when he was cut off by fever, April 18, 1816, at the age of twenty-nine years. See Minutes of Conference, 1816, p. 69.

Adams, Richard, M.A., an English Nonconformist, was educated at Cambridge, where he was admitted A.M. in 1844. He afterwards, 1846, entered Brasenose College, Oxford, and was made fellow in 1848, and proceeded to the Master'ship. In 1855 he was presented to the living of St. Mildred, Bread Street, London, where he continued until 1862 for nonconformity in 1862. He afterwards preached to a small congregation in Southwark, and died at Hoxton in 1864. Besides Sermons of his own, he assisted in the publication of some of his brother's works, and those of Mr. Charnock. He also compiled the Commentary on Philostratus and Colossians in Poole's Bible.

Adams, Samuel R., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Campton, N. H., June 5, 1825. He was converted when but fifteen years of age, and always maintained an unblemished Christian character. He obtained his education by his own exertions; graduated at Wesleyan University in 1851; spent two years in teaching in his own state; and in 1853 went to Indiana with the intention of devoting his life to school-teaching. He was licensed to preach in 1854, and admitted into the Indiana Conference in 1857. After teaching a short time in Aurora, he took charge of the Seminary College in the same year. In the same years later was chosen president of Moores' Hill Male and Female Collegiate Institute, which position he held till near the close of his life. In 1861 he was appointed chaplain of the 26th Regiment Indiana Volunteers, and, after sixteen months' service, died at Springfield, Ml., Dec. 19, 1862. Mr. Adams was an ardent patriot, a kind and courteous man, an earnest and successful theological preacher. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1863, p. 171.

Adams, Samuel W., D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Vernon, N.Y., in August, 1815. He pursued his collegiate studies at Hamilton College, and studied theology at the Hamilton Theological Seminary. For three years was pastor of the Congregational church at Oneonta. Here he remained until called to the pastorate of the First Baptist Church in Cleveland, O., in 1846, which office he held fourteen years, and was greatly respected and beloved in the community. He died Oct. 29, 1864. See Appleton's Annual Cyclop., iv, 621.

Adams, Solomon, a Congregational minister, was born at Middleton, Mass., March 30, 1797. He graduated at Harvard College in 1820, and at the Andover Theological Seminary in 1822. In 1833 he was installed as pastor of the church in Alton. He was elected president of the New England Theological Institution. In 1828 he removed to Portland, taking charge of the Free Street Seminary. After serving in this institution for twelve years, he removed to Boston, where for many years he was principal of a similar school. Mr. Adams was very much interested in education, and was an efficient member and officer of the American Institute of Education. In 1825 he was ordained as an evangelist, but, although he preached frequently, his greatest success was achieved as a teacher. He died at Auburndale, Mass., July 20, 1870. See Cong. Quar. 1871, p. 325.

Adams, Theophilus B., a Baptist minister, was born in New Hampshire in 1798. He entered the ministry, as did most of the Baptist ministers of his time, with but little preparation for the work except a heart warmly interested in the spiritual welfare of his fellowmen. His own experience taught him the value of an education, and he encouraged sound learning for the ministers of the Gospel. He was twelve years in the work, eight of which were spent in Aeworth, N. H., where he died, Aug. 15, 1831. See Christian Watchman, Sept. 9, 1831. (J. C. S.)

Adams, Thomas (1), brother of Richard, became a student of Brasenose College, Oxford, England, in July, 1649, and was made fellow in June, 1652. He was much esteemed for his learning, piety, and diligence. Elected from the university in 1862, he resided for a considerable time in the family of Sir Samuel Jones, and afterwards was chaplain to the countess-dowager of Clare. He died Dec. 11, 1670. He wrote a few tracts on the principles of religion, and one on the controversy between the Church and Dissenters. See Wood, Fuscii, vol. ii.

Adams, Thomas (2), a Unitarian minister, was a native of Roxbury, Mass., and graduated at Harvard University, at which he was ordained at Camden, S.C., Nov. 18, 1791, and died Aug. 16, 1797. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 67.

Adams, William (1), a Congregational minister, was left an orphan when nine years old. He probably obtained his preparatory education at Ipswich, Mass., and in 1867 entered Harvard University, graduating in 1871. Soon after, he was invited to preach at Westfield, Mass., but it does not appear that he accepted the invitation. In February, 1872, he preached at Dedham, when the congregation unanimously invited him to become their pastor, and he was duly ordained Dec. 3, 1873. Little is known of his ministry. He died at Dedham, Aug. 17, 1885, at the age of thirty-five. Two of his sermons—"The Old and the New in 1878," and a modern treatise—were published. A Commentary on Tim., written by him, is still preserved, and is exceedingly elaborate. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 181.

Adams, William (2), D.D., an English divine, was born at Shrewsbury in 1707, and entered Pembroke College, Oxford, at the age of thirteen years. He took the degree of A.M., April 18, 1727, and afterwards obtained a fellowship. In 1732 he was presented to the curacy (or vicarage) of St. Chad's, Shrewsbury, upon which occasion he quitted the college. He took his degrees of B.D. and D.D. at Oxford in 1756, and in July 26, 1775, became Master of Pembroke; in consequence obtaining a prebend of Gloucester attached to that office. The year before he went to Oxford, Mrs. Elizabeth Cressett presented him with the rectory of Coumd, in Sh. ophire, which he retained till his death. When he became Master of Pembroke, he resigned the living of St. Chad, and was soon after made archdeacon of Llandaff. He died at his prebendal house at Gloucester, Jan. 13, 1789. He published three occasional Sermons (1742, 1743, 1748), but his principal work was an Essay on Hume's Essay on Miracles (1758, 1802). Two volumes of Sermons, etc., were printed (Shrewsbury, 1777, 1790). His sermon on True and False Doctrine caused a dispute, although neither he nor Rev. William Romaine, a sermon of whose he criticised, took any part in the controversy. See Gentleman's Mag. 1789; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Darlington, Cyclop., Biblical, s. v.

Adams, William (3), an early Methodist preacher, was born in Fairfax County, Va., July 28, 1759. In 1775, after a season of distress and powerful conviction, he was converted. He was received on trial by the Conference in 1779, and appointed to the Baltimore Circuit, where he served with great profit for about six months. He died Dec. 3, 1783. See Jackson, Lives of Early Methodist Preachers, vi, 275.

Adams, William (4), D.D., LL.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Colchester, Conn., Jan. 25, 1807. He received his early education from his father, John Adams, LL.D., the eminent teacher and philanthropist, president of Phillips Academy, Andover, Mass. It was here he took the foundation of that accurate and classical education, which served as an ancient university, and from which he derived such a knowledge of law, history, and literature, and such a prospect of life and public labours. He graduated at Yale College in 1827. He pursued his theological studies at Andover Seminary, and was licensed to preach in Boston in 1805, and ordained and installed pastor of the Congregational Church in Brighton, Mass., where he remained for three years; and, after preaching a short time in Pearl Street, New York, he accepted a call from the Central Presbyterian Church in Brome Street, New York, where he was installed in 1834. His whole subsequent life was spent in that city; and his name and influence have been happily identified with its best interests, religious, civil, and social, for nearly half a century. In 1858 the Madison Square Presbyterian Church was organized; and a large and beautiful building was erected on the southwest side of the square. Of this church he became pastor.

Dr. Adams stood at the head of the profession in the denomination which he distinguished by his scholarship, his varied accomplishments, his purity and dignity of life and manners. In the division which took place in the Presbyterian Church, Dr. Adams was uncompromisingly identified with the New-school branch. In May, 1862, he was elected moderator of the Assembly which was held in Washington, D.C. When the movement was made to effect a reunion of the two severed branches, he was one of the hearty promoters of the same, and was made chairman of the Committee of Conference on the part of the New-school Assembly appointed in 1866; and continued to act in that capacity until the reunion was consummated. At the meetings of the two assemblies in New York in 1869, when the preliminaries were definitely arranged, he appeared before the Old-school Assembly in the Brick Church, to present the cordial greetings of the men with whom he was associated. He was often designated to represent the clergy on occasions of great responsibility, and always proved himself equal to the occasion. At the Evangelical Alliance of 1873 held in New York, Dr. Adams was naturally and without question selected as the most suitable man to deliver, in the name of the American Alliance, the address of welcome to the distinguished theologians, professors, preachers, and laymen from all other lands.

In the fall of 1873 Dr. Adams was elected president of the Union Theological Seminary and professor of sacred rhetoric. Two years before he had been elected to the same position, which he had declined. He was eminently qualified for the position by his extensive and varied attainments as a scholar, combined with his rare oratorical gifts as a speaker. The ministerial labor of Dr. Adams was by no means the extent and measure of his work. He was identified with all the benevolent schemes of the Church, and devoted much of his time to their practical working. He was a frequent contributor to religious and secular journals, and an industrious writer otherwise. Besides sermons, addresses, magazine articles, etc., he published in 1850, The Three Gardens, Eden, Gethsemane, and Paradise;—Spirit of Hebrew Poetry in the Psalms;—Biographical Sketches with Thanksgiving Memories of the Day, and Helps to the Habs,—Conversations of Jesus Christ with Representative Men. His Lecture on the Catacombs of Rome, delivered to a crowded audience in Association Hall, was one of the most interesting ever given to a New York audience. He was the first to read and interpret correctly the inscriptions on the monuments in the Catacombs. He died at Orange Mountain, N.J., Aug. 31, 1880.

Dr. Adams was a very successful teacher. He had an old department, into which little that was new could be introduced; but he treated it in a wonderfully fresh way. He delivered lectures regularly to the senior class, and at first also to the junior class. But his strength was in his method of giving private instruction to all of the students. It was his custom to call one some of them to him every day, and, taking him into the council, he would learn the work, and give him his service. At the conclusion of these exercises, he would criticise the efforts of the student kindly but severely.

Dr. Adams was remarkable for his fine personal appearance. He had a commanding figure, a graceful, dignified presence, and a courtly address. When a young man he was six feet high, and possessed a light, elastic step. His great energy and indefatigable industry

(2) Wofriae, fire in living beings (animal heat);
(3) Orarzebeht, the fire in plants;
(4) Wazeehk, the pure fire burning on the altars, whose highest potential was the Brahma fire;
(5) Spreeniek, the fire in houses, kitchens, etc.;
(6) Omru, the fire

Adams, William (5), an English clergyman, was born at Sheerness, England, Jan. 1, 1831. He emigrated to the United States with his widowed mother in 1841, experienced religion in 1850, and joined the Baptist Church. Later he united with the Methodist Episcopal Church; studied for the ministry at Cazenovia Seminary; and in 1856 entered the Oneida Conference, in which he served with fidelity, ability, and success until overwork compelled him to retire in 1875. He died at Sioux City, Ia., June 13, 1877. Mr. Adams was an extensive reader, a diligent student, a close and fluent writer, and a ready speaker. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1877, p. 117.

Adams, Zadieel, a Congregational minister, was born at Braintree, Mass., Nov. 3, 1736. He was immediately connected with the celebrated Adams family, his father being an uncle of John Adams. He was a graduate of Harvard College in the class of 1756. He was ordained as pastor of the Church in Lunenburg, Mass., Sept. 5, 1754, and died March 1, 1801, in the thirty-seventh year of his ministry. He preached the Dudleian Lecture on Presbyterian ordination in 1784, and was the author of the 'Life History of the Brethren,' a historical and biographical work published by the Brethren in 1857. He was also the author of 'The Life of a Churchman,' and 'The Life of a Churchwoman,' and was a contributor to the Boston Magazine.

Adams, Zenas, a Canadian Methodist minister, brother of the Rev. Ezra Adams, was born at Aescott, Ont., in 1795. He was called into the work in connection with the New England Conference and served in New York, Connecticut, New Jersey, New Hampshire, and Massachusetts, where he died in 1832. He was a writer on religious topics and was known as a writer on social and political subjects as well. He was a contributor to the Baptist Review and和其他 religious periodicals.

Adda, a companion of Felix, an African bishop, martyred with him in the Diocletian persecution, and is probably the same with the one commemorated Aug. 30. See 'Baillot, Fies des Saints, vol. II, Aug. 30; Quain, p. 248.

Adda, the companion of St. Cedd in his mission to the Middle-Angles in 653. He was an Englishman by birth, and brother of Uffa, abbot of Gystshead. See Bede, Hist. Eccl., iii, 21.

Addecius, a Christian martyr, who was a royal steward in a city of Phrygia, the name of which is unknown. He perished during the persecution of Diocletian, about A.D. 305. He is also commemorated by the Latin Church, Feb. 7; by the Greeks, Oct. 5 or 4.—Landon, Eccles. Dict. s.v.

Avelaeus states (Notes to Eusebius) that the Adventus (or Adactus) mentioned above is not the same with the one celebrated by the Roman Church. But we find that there are two saints of this name commemorated at Rome. One was a companion of Felix, an African bishop, martyred with him in the Diocletian persecution, and is probably the same with the one commemorated Aug. 30. See 'Baillot, Fies des Saints, vol. II, Aug. 30; Quain, p. 248.

Addeci Doctrina. Under this title there is extant what purports to be a history of the Christian Church from its foundation by Jesus Christ to the year 1956. It is written in a Complete Form in the Original Syriac, with an English Translation and Notes (ibid. 1876). In our edition, we learn that Addai, or Thaddeus, not only converted king Agbar Ukbam, but also the larger portion of the nobles and people of Edessa, and built churches in and about that place. For Addai did not only convert Agbar, but also was killed by an apostatized son of Agbar, and was buried by the believers in the church where he was murdered. The author of this narrative signs himself Labuna, a contemporary. Cureton, Phillips, and Bickell regard this document as genuine, and as the source from which Eusebius derived his material concerning the introduction of Christianity into Edessa. Not so, however, Nestle, in a review of Phillips's work in Schützer's Literaturzeitung, 1876, p. 644, who, while admitting that some passages which are found in Eusebius may be accounted for by a hasty translation from the extant Syriac text, yet thinks that the differences existing between Eusebius and the Doctrina are so great that it seems to be improbable that the former should have perused the latter. As to the age of the composition there is also a difference of opinion. Nödeke places it about the year 300, Wagenmann in the latter half of the 2nd century, and Bickell in the 1st century. According to the latter, the conversion of the king and people of Edessa during the 1st century must now be regarded as a matter of fact, although he would not identify Addai with Thaddeus. See Bickell, Consectus Rei Syrorum Historiarum (Monasterii, 1871), p. 15 sq.; the same in Literarischer Handwörterbuch für das Kaisergebiet, Deutschländ (1889), p. 145 sq.; Wagenmann in Jahrbücher für deutsche Theologie, xxii, 320-322; Nödeke, in Liter. Cent.
Adar, the twelfth month of the Assyrian year. It was dedicated to the seven great gods; was called by the Accadians Sairu, "sowing of seed," and answered roughly to our February.

Adidas, one of the three disciples of Manes, who, according to the Acts of Archeleus, was originally sent to preach his master's doctrines in Scythia, and was afterward commissioned with the others to collect Christian books. He was subsequently sent as a missionary to the East. Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. vi. 81) gives his name as Rodakos (Rodex). Photius (Biblia, Cod. 89) mentions certain writings of Adidas, one of which was entitled Maco, in allusion to Mark iv. 21, and which was refuted by Diodorus of Tarsus. The Greek form of abjuration (Cotelite, Patres Apost. 1, 544) mentions a work against Moses and the prophets as written by Adidas in conjunction with Adaminas (q. v.).

Adderborne, COUNCIL OF OF NEMAR (Concilium Adderbornensi), was held in a place of that name, near the river Nadder (or Nadder), in Wiltshire, England, in 705. The council was composed of English abbots and bishops, and confirmed a grant of free election of their abbots to the abbeys of Malmesbury, Froome, and Bradford, which had been made by bishop Aldhelm. See William of Malmesbury, lib. v. De Questis Pontific.; Wilkin., i. 68.

Add Puson, in Hindu mythology, was a festival in honor of the goddess Parvati, the wife of Siva, in the month of Adi. It was celebrated in the temples of Siva. The goddess, on this occasion, was triumphantly carried through the streets on a wagon.

Addington, Stephen, D.D., a learned Dissenting minister, was born at Northampton, England, June 9, 1729, and was educated under Dr. Dodridge. Having been admitted to preach, he removed in 1750 to Spaldick, Huntingdonshire, and in 1752 became minister of a Dissenting congregation at Market-Harborough, Leicestershire. In 1758 he opened his house for the reception of pupils, and for many years he devoted nine hours each day to their instruction. He removed to Miles Lane, Cannon Street, London, in 1781, and soon after was chosen tutor of a new Dissenting academy at Mile End. He continued in the care of his congregation for about nine months of the year, and in the spring of 1793. Besides several educational works, he wrote, Marzian Religious and Prudential, with a Sermon to Young People (12mo):—Dissertation on the Religious Knowledge of the Ancient Jews and Patriarchs, etc. (1751, 4to):—Life of St. Paul the Apostle (Lond. 1784, 4to):—Sermon on the Prophecies of St. Paul (Lond. 1785, 8vo):—Sermons, Disc. s. v.; Darling, Cyclop. Biblio. s. v.; Theol. Mag. Jan. 1803, p. 7.

Addir (the mighty Father), a name applied to the true God by the Philistines, because he had visited the Egyptians with plagues.

Adris, W. B., an English Congregational minister, was first appointed by the London Missionary Society to Travancore in 1785, and in 1790 he was chaplain, Rangoon, Imbatoor, where he continued till 1861, when failing health compelled him to retire from active service. He resided at Coonoor, on the Nilgerrries, till his death, Feb. 18, 1871. See (Lond.) Com. Year-book, 1872, p. 304.

Addis, Henry, an English Congregational minister, was born at Devonport in 1806, of pious parents. He entered the Western College as a student in 1822. In 1837 he entered upon his first pastorate at Tonquin, where he was ordained. In 1838 he removed to Maiendenhead, and in 1843 entered upon his final pastorate at Taunton. Here he died, Oct. 2, 1860. Mr. Addis' preaching was very attractive, instructive, and powerful. See (Lond.) Com. Year-book, 1861, p. 197.

Addison, Edward, an English Wesleyan missionary, was born at Thirsk, Yorkshire, in 1820. In 1845 he was accepted as a candidate for the ministry, and appointed to British Akrah. Four years he labored in Western Africa with zeal and success both in preaching and in conducting a native theological institution. His pure character and exemplary pastorate commanded warm regard. He died, after twelve years of suffering, at Barnstable, Devonshire, May 8, 1861. See Minutes of British Conferences, 1861, p. 20.

Addison, James H., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Baltimore, Md., Oct. 12, 1822. He emigrated to Texas in 1833; was converted in 1844; in 1848 was received on trial in the Texas Conference, and in its active ranks was faithful until 1856, when he superannuated, which relation he sustained until his sudden death, Jan. 21, 1870. Mr. Addison was a laborious and useful minister. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1870, p. 506.

Addison, Laurence, D.D., an English prelate, was born at Mauldslieburne, parish of Crosby-Ravensworth, Westmoreland, in 1632. He was educated at Appleby, and was afterwards sent to Queen's College, Oxford, where he was admitted A.B. Jan. 25, 1654, and A.M. July 4, 1657. He was chosen one of the terrae fill in 1658. He objected to the tenure of the pastorate, which he was exposed, he soon after quitted Oxford. After the Restoration he obtained the chaplaincy of the garrison at Dunkirk, and in 1663 that of Tangier. He returned to England in 1670, and was made chaplain in ordinary to his majesty. Soon after, he obtained the living of Milton, Wilts, and also a prebend in the Cathedral at Salisbury. He took both degrees in divinity at Oxford July 6, 1675, and July 8, 1688, was promoted to the deanery of Lichfield. On Dec. 8, 1684, he was collated to the archdeaconry of Coventry, and held it with his deanery in commendam. He died April 20, 1708, and was buried in the church-yard of Lichfield. He published, The Present State of the Jews (Lond. 1676, 12mo):—The Christian's Manual (ibid. 1700, 12mo):—A Modest Plea for the Clergy (1677, 8vo):—The First State of Mahometanism, etc. (1688, 8vo):—An Introduction to the Sacraments (1681, reprinted 1696):—ΧΡΙΣΤΟΣ ΑΥΤΟΘΕΟΣ, or, An Historical Account of the History Dying the Godhead of Christ:—The Christian's Daily Sacrifice on Prayer (1689, 12mo):—An Account of the Millennium, etc. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Darling, Cyclop. Biblio. s. v.; Hook, Eccles. Biblio. s. v.

Addison, Walter Dulany, a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born in Annapolis, Md., Jan. 1, 1759. In 1784 he was sent to England to complete his education, and was placed in charge of the Rev. John James, who kept a select school near London. Thence he was removed to a large academy near Greenwich, and in 1787 to Epsom, under the tuition of the curate, Rev. Joseph Golding, and there he was converted. Three years after, he went to London and studied under Dr. Barrow for six months, when he embarked with his brother John for America. On his arrival in his majority, he came into possession of nearly four thousand acres of land, twenty-five slaves and other property, near Annapolis, Md. In 1798 he removed to Oxon Hill, a part of his estate. For several years he had been studying for the ministry, and about this time he was ordained deacon, and took charge of Queen's Parish in Prince George Co., where he remained two years. In 1796 he was appointed on the Standing Committee. After his resignation of Queen Ann's Parish he frequently officiated in the churches contiguous to his residence, and in 1808, when he became rector of St. John's Parish, within which his estate was located. This position he held until 1809. Meanwhile (in 1804) he had commenced teaching a school at his residence on Oxon Hill. The following year he removed to Hard Park, where he continued to teach until 1809, when he removed to Georgetown, D.C., and taught school there in connection with his brother John, and also served the church in that place. He continued in charge of St. John's Church until his increasing infirmities compelled him to resign it. In 1818 he became entirely blind. In 1830 he left Georgetown and went to Washington, D.C., where he remained until 1847, after which time he resided in Baltimore. He died there Jan. 31, 1848. Mr. Adelhelm's piety was of great affectionate character, and it was largely through his influence that various fashionable amusements, such as balls, card-playing, etc., were interdicted in the diocese. His liberality was conspicuously both in his intercourse with other denominations and in the use of his wealth. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v. 403.

Adecdeter (prop. Hadecondeter, i. 79) is a term used by Philostratus (Nar. 125) that Christ preached after his death to all that were in Hades, that they might repent and be saved.

Adelaide (or Alice), St., the daughter of Rodolph, second king of Transjurian Burgundy, was born in 961, and was widowed at the age of nineteen years, by the death of her husband, Lothair, king of Germany. She afterwards married Otto I, emperor of Germany, and so acted as to win the esteem and affection of her people. She died Dec. 16, 999, at Seltz, on the Rhine, at the monastery which she had erected there twelve years before. Although never formally canonized, her festival is marked in several modern martyrologies. On Dec. 16, St. Odilo of Cluny has written her Life, which is given in Surina. See Baleit, iii, 229; Butler, xii, 298.

Adelard. See Adalard.

Adelard (or Athelard), an English Benedictine monk who flourished about A.D. 1150, resided at Bath and became a member of the celebrated monastery of that city. He travelled into Egypt and Arabia; and translated from the Elements of the Greeks into Arabic in Latin before any Greek copies were discovered; also wrote several medicinal and mathematical treatises, which remain at Oxford in MS.

Adelbert. See Adalbert.

Adelbert, a Roman Catholic divinity, was a monk and professor of divinity of St. Vincent's at Metz, and died in 364. He wrote a Chronicle containing a list of the bishops of Metz up to his time. Thibautinus declares he had seen it, but no copy is known to exist now. The authors of the Histoire Litéraire de la France (vi, 396) attribute to Adelbert an Abridgment of Pope Gregory's Exposition of Job, to which he gave the title of the Mirror. Martene gives the preface in his Thaesaurus Anecdotorum, (ii, 94)

Adelbold (Adelboldus, or Adelborn), a German prelate, was born of a noble family in the bishopric of Liége. He was educated there and at Rheims, and became a councillor of emperor Henry II, and commander of the army. Unsuccessful in these positions, he assumed the monastic habit in the Monastery of Lobes. In 1098 he became bishop of Utrecht, rebuilt the cathedral, and devoted his later years to promoting learning and founding churches in his diocese. He died Nov. 27, 1097. He wrote De Vita S. Henrici Imp. given by Canisius, vi, 883; by Surina, July 14; and by Greuter, in Lives of the Saints in Belgium, Aug. 16 (1811) — a treatise De Rationali Intendiendi Cosmudinum Sphera (printed by B. Pez in his Thaesaurus Anecdotorum, vol. iii). Thibautinus attributes to him Hymnus in Praise of the Cross and of the Blessed Virgin, etc. See Biog. Universelle (1811); Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, 126; Dupin, Bibl. Eccles. 10th and 11th Cent.

Adelgawith, Johann Albert, a German seer, was born near Elling. He was the son of a Protestant minister, and well versed in the ancient languages. He claimed that seven angels had charged him with the work of banishing evil from the earth and of beating the sovereigns with rods of iron. He was arrested at Königsberg, accused of magic, and condemned to death. His works were concealed. He died Oct. 11, 1638. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Adelhelmus (or Adelinus) was the successor of Hildibrand in the bishopric of Sees, in Normandy, which he governed till about 910. He wrote an Accout of the Life and Miracles of St. Opportuna, Virgins and Abbess, which is given entirely by Mahillon, corrected by a MS. in the Church of St. Opportuna, Paris; and in an abridged form by Surius (April 22). See Surius, Op. cit. iii, ii, 229; Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, 67; Dupin, Bibl. Eccles. 9th Cent.

Adelberius (or Athelberius). See Adalaricus.

Adelgawith, the name which the followers of Ali (q.v.) among the Mohammedans take to themselves. The word denotes, in Arabic, the Sect of the Just, but the other Mohammedans call them Shiî. See SHITES.

Adelman, bishop of Brescia, flourished in the 11th century, and was a disciple of Fulbert (q. v.) and fellow-student of Berenger (q. v.). He was at first clerk of the Church at Liège, and afterwards master of the clerical choir there; probably from 1005 to 1048. In 1047 (probably) he addressed a letter to Berenger, endeavoring to reconcile him to the then novel doctrine of transubstantiation. The following year he was made bishop of Brescia, where he died, according to some in 1057, or, according to others, in 1061. The latter to Berenger had the following title, De Veritate Corporis Christi in Exsuntia, Epistle ad Berengariwm (Hib.; Max. Patr. xviii, 438). He also wrote Rhymi Alphabetici de Viris Illustribus sui Temporis. See Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, 134; Mahillon, Vie, Anecdot. 382; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Darling, Cyclop. Biblio. s. v.

Adelme (or Adhelm), St. See Aldhelm.

Adelphologia, the name given by Prædestinatus (i, 71) to a sect which, according to Philastrius (Hist. 86), "did not eat their meat with men," alleging prophetic example; and believed in the Holy Spirit to be created.

Adelphtos (Adelphatos), a Greek term for (1) a brotherhood; (2) a convent.

Adelphos (Adelphos, sister), a Greek term for a nun.

Adelphians, a heretical sect, condemned by Maximus (in Dionysius, De Eccles. Hierarch. c. 6) for observing the Lord's day as a fast. — Bingham, Christ. Antiq. bk. xx, ch. iii, § 5.

Adelphus (1), a Gnostic contemporary with Poltinus (Porphyry, Vit. Plot. 16). He is not mentioned by Christian writers. (2) A member of the first Council of Arles, supposed to have been bishop of Lincoln (see Augustine, Opp. ix, App. 1095 A; Cave, Hist. Lit. i, 350; Routh, Rel. Socr. iv, 318). (3) An Egyptian bishop and confessor, exiled by the Arians to the Thébaid. In 362 he writes as bishop of Onuphis, in the Delta. Athanasius addressed a letter (c. 371) to him, in which he briefly defends the Catholic faith against the objections of Arius, and, by anticipation, of Nestorians and Eutychians.

Adelphus, a chorépiscopus (q. v.) to Adolus, bishop of Arabissus, in the middle of the 5th century. He signed as proxy for his diocesan at the Council of Chalcédon. Moschus (Spir. Prat. c. 29), followed by George of Alexandria in his Life of Chrysostom, antedates that episcopate of Adelphus by half a century; and, confusing him with the unnamed bishop of Cucusus, by whom Chrysostom was honorably received on his arriaval at his place of exile, makes the saint lodge at his house at Cucusus. See Tillenot, xi, 628; Baroniuni, Anales, ann. 407, § 29.—Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.
ADEMANTUS. See ADIMANTUS.

ADEMAR (Ademarus, or Aymar) of CHABOIS, was born in 988, and was a monk of St. Cîgier of Angoulême (or, according to some, of St. Martial of Limoges). He wrote: Chanson a Principe Monarchia Francorum, chiefly from 892 to 1039 (published by Labbe)—also Commemoratio Abbatum Lemoricensium Bascilica S. Martialis Apostoli.—Letter to Jordanus upon the pretended apostolate of St. Martial:—Aristotlichen, etc. See Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, 120; Dupaix, Bibl. Eccles. 11th Cent.; Bibl. Universelle, vol. i.

ADENUL (or Atrophinus), archbishop of Caps, lived about the year 1690 (?), and wrote, in verse, The Office of the Martyr St. Mark, Bishop of Aleks, who suffered under Domitian, and other metrical works.

ADEMA, in Roman mythology, was the goddess of arrival, who had no temple; but who received promises and oaths from travellers who were to be fulfilled in case of a safe arrival at home.

ADEPHAGIA, in Greek mythology, was a goddess in Sicily, where she had a temple, and was worshipped like Ceres.

ADEN, John, an English Congregational minister, was born at Painswick, Gloucestershire, May 15, 1738. He was educated from childhood. As a young man, Mr. Aden was engaged in business at Winslow, Bucks, but during his leisure hours devoted himself to evangelistic labors in the neighboring villages. Being especially struck with the spiritual destitution of Great Horwood, he resigned his business and gave his best efforts to the building-up of Christianity in the place. After a time he removed to Cranbrook, Kent; and then to Rousgate. While at Rousgate Mr. Aden often preached in London. In Southwark, for twenty-two years, he was "in labors most abundant." Hundreds were converted, and many young men were led into the ministry. In 1850 Mr. Aden removed to Beasley Heath, Kent; and in 1858 he retired from the state ministry; and on Dec. 4, 1869, he was struck with paralysis, and, after twelve days, entered into rest. Mr. Aden was widely known as a preacher to the young, to sailors, and to the working-classes; to all of whom he was exceedingly useful. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1871, p. 300.

ADGATE, Cyprian V., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Newton, N. Y., and experienced conversion in early life; and in 1819 was admitted into the Genesee Conference. He died in Penn Yan, Feb. 4, 1833. Mr. Adgate possessed respectable talents, was a careful student, social in disposition, and upright in life. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1833, p. 216.

ADHAB AL-KABIL, in Mohammedanism, is the punishment in the grave. The followers of Islam believe that the dead are judged immediately, and are punished even before the resurrection.

ADHABA, a festival among the Mohammedans, the same as the Turkish great Beiram (q. v.).

ADHEMAR de MONTEILL, bishop of METZ, was born near the close of the 13th century. He was a native of Langres, and was sovereign of the kingdom of the Limousins from 1237, holding both the sword and the crosier. He was at war with Ralph, duke of Lorraine, when king Philip of Valois intervened, brought the war to an end, and established a treaty of peace. This warrior-prelate then had difficulties with the regent of Lorraine, and with Robert, duke of Bar. He reduced to ashes the castle of Salins, invaded the Baroiss, took Conflans, and established justice by force of arms. His warlike taste obliged him to make loans, and to mortgage large territories and entire villages, such as Neuvilles and Sarrebourg. He died in 1361, and was interred in the chapel of the bishops which he had caused to be constructed in the Cathedral of Metz, the main part of which was not finished until 1490. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biol. Générale, s. v.

ADHEMAR (Alma) de MONTEILL, bishop of PUTY, in Velay, first punished a military revolt, and then consecrated bishop May 3, 1061. At the Council of Clermont, held by Urban II in 1095, he first demanded the cross, and excited enthusiasm which led to the first crusade. Having been appointed legate by the pope, he joined himself to the company of Raymond, count of Toulouse; and made a pilgrimage over the Alps; traversed Dalmatia and Albania; and at Constantinople made a truce with Alexis Comnenus, who at first created obstacles in the march of the crusaders. He then went to Nice, where he re-established discipline in an army of six thousand men. He distinguished himself in several combats with the Saracens, masters of Asia Minor; he favored certain religious frauds; and caused the siege of Antioch to be given up to the Mussulmans. He died of the plague at Antioch, Aug. 1, 1098. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biol. Générale, s. v.

ADI-BUDDHA is the one Supreme Intelligence in the creed of the Buddhists of Nepal, the only sect of the followers of Buddha which believes in a Supreme Being, either like the Aum (q. v.) of the Vedic period, or the Brahma (q. v.) of the later period of Hindu history. See BUDDHISM.

ADILE, George, a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, died at Greenwood, near Leesburg, Va., May 3, 1856. For nearly a quarter of a century he was a useful and influential minister of the Gospel; and, until within a few weeks of his death, he ministered at St. James's Church, Shelburne Parish, Leesburg, of which he had been rector for so many years. See Amer. Quart. Church Rev. 1856, p. 301.

ADILOS (unjust), in Greek mythology, was a surname under which VENUS was worshipped in Libya.

ADILS, in Norse mythology, was a giant of unconquerable strength, who assisted Rolf Krake.

ADIMANTUS (Aidíyuvroc), or ADIMANTUS (IDyuvroc), one of Mann's twelve disciples, who, according to Photius (Contra Man. i, 14) and Petrus Siculus (Hist. Man. xvi), was sent as a missionary into various regions. He seems to have met with special success in North Africa, where he was held in high veneration till the time of Augustine (Contra Adm. xii, 2; Contra Faust. i, 2). He wrote a book, apparently in Latin, in which he endeavored to prove a contradiction between the Old Test. and the New, taking passages chiefly from the Pentateuch, but also a few from the Psalms, Proverbs, and the prophets. This was refuted by Augustine (st. niv). In other ancient documents (see Zöteiler, Patres Apost. i, 547), this work is ascribed to Addas (q. v.) as well as to Adimantins; and Augustine states (Contra Adm. Leg. ii, 49) that Addas was the progenitor of Adimantins. Hence considerable confusion has arisen among later writers respecting these two persons.

ADITAS, in Shemite legend, is the name of the first mythical dynasty of Arabian kings; also a Hamitic race, one of the two great nations by whom the peninsula of Arabia was early peopled. See AP.

ADITH is the legendary name of the wife of Lot, who became a pillar of salt. The masses of stone along the shore of the Dead Sea are thought by the inhabitants, to be human beings changed into pillars of salt. The wife of Lot is mentioned in the book of Wisdom (6, 7). See LOT.

ADITI (the light), in Hindu mythology, is one of the two wives of Kasyapa; the other, Diti, is the darkiness. Aditi is a personification of the day, and therefore is the daughter of Daksha and the mother of the twelve Adityas. Aditi and Kasyapa sprang from Brahuna, and are therefore called children of God. Because of their great light, they are called the source of light. Aditi and Kasyapa are the parents of Indra, the first of the twelve Adityas. The latter were pressed hard by the sons of the giants in a frightful war. Indra asked his husband what she should do. He advised her to bring an offering to the honor of Vishnu, who would be born as her son, and would annihilate the giants. It happened so; and thus Aditi gave birth to Vishnu in the person of the dwarf Vaman.

Aditya, in Hindu mythology, were the children of Aditi and Kasyapa, the twelve deities ruling the twelve months of the year. Among them, Indra is the highest, the sovereign of the entire sun-system. He is not the guide of the sun, like Matai. The names in prose history are very different from those given in the sacred poem Mahabharata and the canonical book Bhagavata-Purana. As Diti and Aditi are classed together, so all the children are one—the sun, or the year.

Aditya (devoted to Ur), a mythical Chaldaean king, referred to by Sargon II as the founder of the dynasty. He may have been the Aoros of the Greeks.

Adjunct Gods (or Adjuncts of the Gods) among the Romans, were a kind of inferior deities, added as assistants to the principal ones to ease them of their functions. Thus to Mars belonged Bellona, to Neptune Volusia, to Vulcan the Genius Luepis, and to the Evil the Lemures.

Adjutants-General is the title of those fathers among the Jesuits who dwelt with the general of the order, and whose business it was to watch over the principal occurrences of distant countries, and from time to time to communicate information to the general. See Jesuits.

Adjuvo (also St. Aindu or Ustrin) lived in the 12th century. He was the son of a Norman gentleman, of the family of the seigneurs of Vernon-sur-Seine, but assumed the cross in the war against the Saracens, and after seventeen years' service was captured and put to torture. He refused to renounce the faith, and, returning to France, contributed largely to the Abbey of St. Honoré, and built a chapel and a few cells near Vernon, where he shut himself up, rigidly observing the rule of St. Benedict. He died April 30, 1131 or 1132, and was buried in the Chapel of St. Mary Magdalen at Vernon. His life was written by Hugo, archbishop of Rouen. See Butler, Lives, April 30; Baillot, Vie des Saints, April 30.

Adkins, Joseph, a Baptist minister, was born in Warren County, Ga., in 1802, and remained there all his life. For many years he was a preacher in that section of country. During the late war he was a warm friend of the Union, and when Georgia was reconstructed he was elected a state senator. A delegation having been appointed to visit Washington to complete the legal reconstruction of the state, he was made a member of it. The anger of his political opponents was awakened against him for his decided stand he had taken, and he was murdered in Warren County, Ga., May 10, 1869. (J. C. S.)

Adkins, Thomas, an English Congregational minister, born in Ramsgate, Kent, on April 1, 1787. He was very precocious, even at the age of eight. On reaching his twelfth year he was sent to Newport Pagnell College, in which he soon rose to the rank of a teacher; and such was his proficiency in various branches of knowledge that at the age of seventeen he became a tutor in a liberal academy at Northampton. Hand in hand with the growth of his intellect was that of his spiritual life, and a desire to consecrate himself to the service of Christ. In 1807 Mr. Adkins entered Hoxton Academy for special ministerial preparation, and was soon sent into the neighboring villages to preach. In 1810 he supplied the vacant pulpit of the Congregational Church in Southampton, and in the following year was ordained to its pastorate. Here for more than forty years he labored with much success. His death occurred Dec. 9, 1868. Mr. Adkins was a good linguist, and had considerable acquaintance with the Latin and French languages, as also with the Greek New Testament and Hebrew Bible. But his piety was more conspicuous than his learning. He walked by faith and his devotion burned with divine flame. See (London) Cong. Year-book, 1870, p. 275.

Adkins, Abraham, a Universalist minister, was born in Westmoreland County, Pa., Dec. 24, 1811, but removed to Indiana in 1815. He early developed energy and decision of character; organized the temperance movement of Switzerland County in 1833; was the first to boldly advocate negro-emancipation in that section; joined the Free-will Baptists in 1838, and soon after was ordained a preacher in that denomination, which office he filled until 1870, when he became a Methodist. He finally embraced Universalism about 1872; was ordained a preacher of that faith in 1878, and labored as pastor in Stringtown, Ind., until 1876, when consumption obliged him to retire from the regular work. He died Aug. 22, 1876. Mr. Adkins was abundant in labors, and highly esteemed in life. See Universalist Register, 1878, p. 81.

Adkins, Irvin D., a Congregational minister, was born at Moorefield, Switzerland Co., Ind., Nov. 11, 1837. His academic study was pursued at Moore's Hill Seminary, and at Hillsdale, Mich. He graduated from Hillsdale College in 1865, and was ordained in 1866. Afterward he was one year in the Boston Theological Seminary, and one year in Mr. Hepworth's School for the Ministry in Boston. In 1868 he became professor of ancient languages in a new Free-will Baptist College at Ridgeville, Ind., where he remained until 1873, during most of the time acting pastor of the Free-will Baptist Church there. In 1873 he was chosen president of the Congregational Church at West Concord, N. H., and died there, Feb. 25, 1875. See Cong. Quarterly, 1876, p. 418.

Adlam, Samuel, a Baptist minister, was born in Temple Parish, Bristol, England, Feb. 4, 1786. As a child he exhibited remarkable mental powers, and at a very early age became proficient in a student in grammar and acquired a deep range of Latin, Greek, and French. He came to the United States in 1821 and took up his residence in Boston, where he devoted himself to his trade, that of a manufacturer of philosophical instruments. His establishment was large enough to give employment to nineteen apprentices. Not long after settling in Boston Mr. Adlam became a member of a Baptist Church, then under the pastoral care of Rev. Dr. Francis Wayland, by whom he was baptized. Feeling a desire to preach the Gospel, he studied theology with his revered pastor, and was ordained Nov. 1, 1824, as the minister of the Church in West Dedham, Mass. He completed his somewhat imperfect preparation for the ministry by spending some time at the Newton Theological Institution, where he graduated in the class of 1838. He was subsequently settled at Marblehead, Mass., and Hallowell and Dover, Me. From the latter place he removed to Newport, R. I., where he became pastor of the First Baptist Church, his ministry with this Church continuing from 1849 to 1865. In the latter year he retired from the pastorate, and for some time devoted himself to the work of fitting young men for college. He visited England in 1871, and interested himself in researches into the archives of several institutions there, to discover facts bearing upon Rhode Island history. Until smitten by the disease which afflicted the closing years of his life, he spent much of his time in his valuable library, engaged in those literary employments to which his cultivated tastes inclined him. "For his talents, scholarship, piety, industry, fidelity, and success, both as a preacher and a writer, he

Adoption to the Church. This was very simple in the early Christian times. Upon a personal confession of belief in Jesus as the Saviour of men, and the adoption of the ordinance of baptism, men and women of all classes and conditions were freely welcomed to the community of the saints, without any other ceremony. In monastic times, when the Church became a national institution, this class of catechumens (q. v.) was organized, and full admission was deferred for a considerable period. A longer or shorter term of probation has in like manner been found advisable or necessary in modern times, and those who have been baptized in infancy are usually called upon, in adult years, to adopt the vows made in their behalf by their parents or sponsors (q. v.), and on responding satisfactorily to the questions propounded touching their actual experience and purposes, they are admitted either by the rite of confirmation (q. v.) or by a simple declaration in public to that effect, usually with a hand-shaking in token of Christian fellowship. See Membership.

Admission Service. See Admission.

Admitting Clergy, in English ecclesiastical law, is a writ granted to any one who has established his right of presentation against the bishop in the Court of Common Pleas.

Adolf, Ciro, an Italian painter, was born in 1688. He distinguished himself by some excellent fresco paintings in the public edifices at Bergamo and in the state. His principal works are, The Four Evangelists, in the Church of S. Alessandro della Croce: — the Deposition from the Cross, in the Church of Santa Maria delle Grazie: — and the Decollation of St. John, in the parochial Church of Colognola. He died in 1758.

Adolfo, Giacomo, an Italian painter, brother of the preceding, was born at Bergamo in 1682. He painted history with success, and also painted sacred subjects for the churches, convents, and monasteries of Bergamo. The Crowning of the Virgin, in the Church of the Monastery del Paradiso, and the Adoration of the Magi, in the Church of S. Alessandro della Croce, are considered his best productions. He died in 1741.

Adolph, Gottlob, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Oct. 30, 1685, at Nieder-Wiese, in Upper Lusatia. He studied at Leipzig; was in 1720 appointed pastor at Gross-Hemmersdorf, near Zittau; in 1726 deacon at Hirschberg; and in 1757 archdeacon there. He died Aug. 1, 1745, while in his pulpit, struck by lightning. He wrote, Disputatio de Psalmis Filiorum Korh (Lips. 1701). He is also the author of a number of hymns. See Kluge, Hymnographia Silesica (Breisach, 1751), 1, 11; Koch, Gesch. d. deutschen Kirchenliedes, v. 294 sq.; Jucker, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexicon, v. (Bl. 13.)

Adon (master'), in Phoenician mythology, was the name under which an incarnation of the sun was worshipped in Byblos.

Adonoea (or Adonias), in Greek mythology, is a surname of Venus, derived from Adonis.
with both hands, singing Ecce lignum crucis ("Behold the wood of the cross"). Instantly the whole congregation start to their feet, and all the ministers at the altar begin to sing In quo salus mundi pendebat ("On which the Saviour of the world was extended"). The singers answer, Venite et adoremus ("Let us come and adore"). As soon as the last syllable is chanted, all present, except the officiating priest, fall upon their knees and offer silent adoration to the cross. In a few minutes all rise again, and the priest uncovers the right arm of the cross and again elevates it, saying, as before, but in a louder voice, Ecce lignum, etc. Next he approaches the middle of the altar, and, turning towards the congregation, elevates the cross again, which now he exposes by the removal of the veil from every part of it, and repeats the same words in a still louder and more emphatic voice. A purple cushion is then laid upon the steps of the altar, upon which the priest lays the cross; he then retires for the purpose of taking off his shoes; his attendants do the same; returning barefoot, they reverently approach the piece of wood upon the cushion, and, kneeling down, they meekly kiss it. Then all present, in the order of their rank (the clergy always first), perform the same ceremony of kissing the crucifix, which at last is taken up by a deacon and placed in an upright position on the altar.

In Moscow, St. Petersburg, and other cities of Russia many ceremonies are performed during Passion week, which are brought to a close about a week before Easter and on the morning of Easter-Sunday by the ceremony of adoring the cross. The members of the Greek Church not only kiss this symbol of the Christian religion, but when the bishop or archbishop holds it forth for the reverence of the worshippers they rush forward, to the imminent risk of many of them, and embrace the crucifix with vehement devotion and affection. See Caos.

Adoration of the Host. See Host.

Adoration, Perpetual. Various religious orders practice the perpetual adoration of the holy sacrament, relieving one another constantly, so that, day and night, there is always some one occupied in prayer before the host. The most noted among these celebrities were the nuns of the Perpetual Adoration at Marseilles.

Adorea (from odor, "scent"), in the ancient Roman worship of the gods, were the light flat cakes made of flour and salt, which were used at offerings, partly to burn them and partly for the priests. The offerings which consisted only of such cakes were called Adorea sacrificia.

Adorno, Francesco, an Italian Jesuit, was born at Genoa in 1513, was educated in Portugal, taught and preached with great celebrity in Rome, and died at Genoa, Jan. 13, 1586. He composed on the prayer of St. Charles, of whom he was a confessor, a learned treatise entitled De Disciplina Ecclesiastica. The Ambrosian Library has two of his MSS., entitled De Ratione Illustranda Lignorum Historiam, and a treatise on the taxes (De Can. Tasse, etc. See Bibl. Universelle, Suppl. v. s. v."

Adorno, Giovanni Agostino, an Italian priest, founder of the Congregation of Regular Clerks Minor, was descended from the ancient family of the Adorni. He laid the first foundation of the order at Naples in 1588, and received the approval of Sixtus V. He died at Naples, Sept. 29, 1591. See Moréri, who cites Aubert le Mire, De Origo Clerici, in Commun. Vincent.; London, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Adosht, in Persian mythology, was a sacred, rough stone, about half a foot high, which was used in the fire-temples of the ancient Guebres—i.e., fire-worshippers, so called because they do not pray directly to fire, but pray only in the presence of fire.

Adranus, in Italian mythology, was the god of the Sicilian nations, whose temple stood near Aedranum. This temple was guarded by a large number of trained dogs, of which it is said that they conducted drunken men, but wicked people they tore to pieces.

Adrastea (the Aemera), in Greek mythology, was (1) the daughter of Oceanus, or Erebus, and of Nemoisia. She is represented with a ship's rudder or with a wheel. Some derive the name from Adrasteus, who, as a memorial of Eteocles, built a temple to Nemesis near Thebes. (2) The daughter of the Cretan king Melissaus, who was given to Rhea to bring up by the mother of Jupiter.
ADRIANUS

ADRIAN, Sr. (1.), was put to death at Rome, in the 4th century, with Sta. Eusebius, Marcellus, Hippolytus, and others, under the reign of the emperor Valerian.

There are two saints of this name—one commemorated in the Roman martyrology on July 26, the other in the Armenian on Aug. 28—one of which may be the above.

Adrian, Sr. (2.), suffered martyrdom at Cesaeres, in Palestine, in 309, by order of the governor Firmilianus. He was exposed to the lions, March 5, with St. Eubulus as his companion in martyrdom. The Greeks commemorate them together, the Latins separately—the latter March 7 (in some martyrlogies March 4). See Ruinart, p. 382; Moréri, who cites Eusebius, De Martyr. Palæst.

Adrian, Sr. (3.), was an officer in the imperial army (cir. 307) at Nicomedia. Shocked at the cruelties practiced upon the Christians of that city by Licinius, he renounced with him upon his conduct. The only effect of this was that he himself was tortured, and afterwards beheaded. His memory is commemorated in the Roman martyrologies on Aug. 26 or Sept. 8, in the Greek in Nov. 6.

Adrian, Sr. (4), the husband of St. Natalia (q. v.), was also martyred at Nicomedia, under the emperors Galerius Maximianus and Licinius. His body is said to have been transported to Argyropolis. He is commemorated August 26, with St. Natalia and twenty-three other fellow-martyrs. By some he is thought to be the same with the preceding. See Bailleul, vol. iii, Sept. 8; Moréri, who cites The Acts of St. Adrian.

Adrian, Sr. (5.), a disciple of St. Landaldis, missionary of the Low Countries (cir. 667), was assassinated on his journey to fetch alms which King Childeric II had destined for St. Landaldis at Wintershoven.

Adrian was the last patriarch of all Russia. He had before been metropolitan of Kassan, and had the pain, during his pontificate, of having the patriarchal court fall away from its former eminence, and of seeing it lose successively many of its privileges which the piety of the predecessors of Peter the Great had recognized. When the czar, terrible in his vengeance, deluged with blood the streets of Moscow, Adrian had the courage to go in a procession to him with the image of the Holy Virgin of Vladimir and implore mercy. At his death, Peter the Great opposed the election of any one to succeed him; his spirit of exclusive sway being no doubt more justified by the circumstances, as he would not share the power and influence over the orthodox people with the patriarch, since it was already enfeebled, and he would turn to ridicule all the parodies played at Moscow. Peter declared to the Russian clergy that hereafter he himself would be chief, and that he would reunite the patriarchal dignity with that of the crown. He named, also, an administrator of the patriarchate, and instituted in 1721 the sacred synod. Thus the Russian Church lost its spiritual chief. The patriarchate continued one hundred and fourteen years after the exaltation of Job, consecrated in 1588 by Jerome, patriarch of Constantinople, of which Adrian was the ninth successor. Adrian died in 1792. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bio-gr. Générale, s. v.

Adriano di Castello, an Italian cardinal, was born at Corneto, in Tuscany, about 1450. Having been sent by pope Boniface VIII as nuncio into Scotland, he became acquainted in London with Morton, archbishop of Canterbury, at whose recommendation Henry VII appointed him his agent at Rome. He was rewarded with the See of St. Bologna; and in 1505 he translated that of Bath and Wells. In 1568 he was admitted into the College of Cardinals, and narrowly escaped poisoning at a banquet in the Vatican. Detected in 1518, with cardinal Alonso Petruccio and others, in attempting the death of pope Leo X, he withdrew from Rome; and so effectually concealed himself that the place and time of his death are unknown. He was subsequently degraded. He wrote De Serмонe Latino, and De Verâ Philosophia.

Adrian, surnamed Le Chartreux (Carthausianus), who lived in 1410 at the Chartreuse, near 'Gertrudenberg, left a work which is often confounded with a moral treatise by patriarch, entitled Liber de Remediis Utriusque Fortunae, Prospera scolice et Adversae, per Adrianum, quem Popam Posthumiam, secundum Suarez Theologiae Præfationem (Cologne, without date, about 1470), a very rare work. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bio-gr. Générale, s. v.

Adrianese were certain temples built by Adrian, emperor of Rome, in several towns about A.D. 127. As these temples contained no statues nor any marks of being dedicated to pagan gods, some have imagined that they were built in honor of Jesus Christ, whom Adrian wished to worship, but was dissuaded from it, lest the whole country should be thereby led to embrace Christianity.

Adriani, Adrian, a Flemish Jesuit, was born at Antwerp. He entered the society at Louvain in 1544, and governed the Jesuits in that place for many years. In 1551 he made profession of the four vows; and, after the death of Ignatius, was called to assist in the election of a second general of the society. Displeased with the disputes and intrigues he found there, Adriani returned to Flanders; and died at Louvain, Oct. 18, 1580. He wrote several treatises in the Dutch language, among which are, Inspiration; or, The Inward Language of God (1570; translated by Brunensis [Cologne, 1601])—The Lord's Prayer:—On Active Life, Temporal Property, Works of Mercy (1668):—The Origin and Progress of the Christian Life:—Of Obedience:—Of Evangelical Poverty (1570, 2vo and 4to)—Of Consecration (3 eds.).—Of frequent or Annual Communication. See Soellner, De Script. Soc. Jes.

Adrianiata, an obscure sect of Dutch Anabaptists, named after Adrian Hamsted. Among other heresies, they denied the miraculous conception of our Lord by the Virgin Mary. Hamsted was minister of the Dutch sectaries in London, and was deposed by Grindal, bishop of London, in the year 1561. A few years after, stating his heretical tenets, is printed in Strype's Annals of the Reformation (i, 176); but it was not signed by Hamsted, who was excommunicated by Grindal, and went abroad. He seems to have organized a small community in Holland, which was called after his name. See Grindal, Works, p. 243.

Adriano was a Spanish monk of the Order of the Barefoot Carmelites, who lived at Cordova. He was an extraordinary painter; but he practiced only for amusement. He studied under Pablo de Cespedes. He destroyed most of his paintings as soon as they were finished, hence they are extremely scarce. Some of his best works were preserved by his friends. His chief work is a Crucifixion, now in the convent of the Carmelites at Cordova. He is spoken of by Pacheco, who knew him well, as a great artist. He died in 1650.

Adrianus, an alleged bishop of St. Andrews, martyred by the Danes in 874. He is commemorated on March 4. See Adrianus; Anianus; Hadianus.

Adrianius, Matthias, a famous Hebraist in the 16th century, was a convert from Judaism. He was of Spanish descent; but joined the Church in Germany. He was originally a physician; but his acquaintance with Reuchlin and Conrad Pellican—who the latter he introduced in Hebrew—secured for him the position of a teacher in the house of Johann Amerbach at Basle. In 1513 he was appointed teacher of Hebrew at Heidelberg, where Johann Brezn and Johann Ecolampadius were among his pupils. At the recommendation of Erasmus he was called in 1517 to Louvain, as teacher in the Colle\u00e9gium Trilingue. In 1519 he left Louvain and went to Wittenberg, which he left in 1521. When and where he died cannot be ascertained. His Introductio in Linguam Hebraeam, and Hebrew translation of some Christian prayers, are now of the greatest rarity. See Gei\u00e9r, Das Lexikon der Sprachwissenschaft in Deutschland (Breslau, 1870), p. 41-48, 148; Hirt, Orientalische und ge\u00e9ographische Bibliothek, vi, 320; Steinschneider, Bibliograph. ADURMETIANS, the monks of Adurmetum, or Adurmymto, in Africa. They misinterpreted Augustine's Antileprojan doctrine, especially that contained in his 194th Epistle, into Antinomian conclusions respecting grace and predestination, and are thus sometimes considered the first Predeterminists.

ADURMYTOO, an episcopal see in Africa, in the province of Byzacian, suffragan to Carthage. It is supposed by some to be identical with the place now called by the Arabs Harnameta, in the kingdom of Tunisa. The episcopate was held by bishops relating to ecclesiastical discipline—on in 347, the other in 397. Polycarp was bishop of this see in the time of St. Cyprian.

ADO (Aozon, or Asbon, known also as HERUMETUS, or HERBALUS), a French prelate, was born in the diocese of Chalons-sur-Marne, in the early part of the 10th century. He embraced the monastic life at Luxeuil, under the direction of the Benedictines. He succeeded, about 965, his friend Albert as abbot of the monastery of Montier-en-Der. He labored earnestly for the spiritual and temporal welfare of the community, and, under the auspices of Manasses, bishop of Troyes, undertook to regulate the psalmody and order of divine service throughout the diocese. He was employed for nearly two years by Beatus, bishop of Langres, in re-establishing good order in the monastery of St. Benjamin of Dijon. He died at Champagne in June, 992, while on a voyage to Jerusalem. His writings are, Vita S. Frodberii Abbot. Primi Cellensis (in Mabillon, Annales Ord. Bened. ii, 528)—Vita S. Manueeti Scotti (the first part containing an account of the second and account of his miracles)—Vita S. Apri (2 pts.)—Vita S. Basilii (in Mabillon, ut sup. ii, 67)—Vita S. Weldeberti (in Mabillon, vol. iii, pt. ii, p. 451)—Vita S. Bercharii Abbat. (in Mabillon, ii, 881)—and a treatise, De Astichstria, which is also attributed to some of his MSS. (See Cave, Hist. ADULTERY. Ecclesiastical Treatment of. By a study of the writings of the fathers and of the canons of the ancient Church, we are made acquainted with the Church's views concerning this crime. (1) As a criminal law of Justinian, the wife is regarded as the real criminal, and only an accessory, whether married or unmarried, as the mere accomplice of her crime. She is essentially the adultera, and he, because of his complicity with a married woman, becomes an adulterer. The same meaning is attached to the term "adultery" during the whole early Christian period, as appears from the heathen writings of Valerius Maximus, Quintilian, Juvenal, and Apuleius. In the latter half of the 4th century we have exact and very valuable descriptions of this crime. The chief distinctions between fornication and adultery, the latter including deceits and injury afflicting another (i.e. man). A canon of Basle furnishes this incidential definition: "We name him who cohabits with another woman (aliena, not his own wife) an adulterer." Am\u00e9lie (Sermo 6. Thesaurus in Deut., lib. vii) points out that the real crime is adultery; what is illicit for the woman is illicit for the man, etc. Gregory Nazianzen argues that the man should not be left free to sin while the woman is restrained; and says that this inequality came to pass because men were the law-makers, and that it is contrary to (a) the fifth commandment; (b) the equal creation, resurrection, and redemption of both sexes; and (c) the mystical representation of Christ and his Church. Chrysostom (Sermon on the Bill of Divorce) says, in substance, "It is commonly called adultery when a man wrongs a married woman. I, however, affirm it of a married man who sins with the unmarried; for the essence of the crime depends on the condition of the injured as well as the injured." Yet we encounter a qualification: the offence of a husband with the unmarried is "a different kind of adultery." Jerome feels most strongly the unity of marriage, and joins with it the proposition that the word man contains woman, and says, therefore, that 1 Cor. vi, 16 applies equally to both sexes.

2. Classification.—By the Lex Julii, adultery was placed among public wrongs. But a public wrong does not necessarily infer a public right of prosecution. Under Augustus, the husband was preferred as prosecutor, next the wife's father, and was in danger of incurring the guilt of procuration if he failed to prosecute. The Church agreed with the State in not allowing a husband to condone. Divines who were not canonists differed considerably. Hermas's Pastor allowed and urged one reconciliation to a penitent wife. Augustine at first hesitated between condonation and divorce, opposed forgiveness, and concluded by advising continence.

3. Penalties.—The following are the Church penalties: (1) Against Adultery, strictly so called. A convicted adulterer cannot receive orders (Conc. Ancyra, can. 20). An adulteress or adulterer is sentenced to seven years' penance. The second canonicating is to be fully excommunicated and brought to penance (ibid. can. 8). The layman whose wife is a convicted adulteress cannot receive orders, and, if already ordained, must put her away under penalty of deprivation (Basil. can. 9). An unchaste wife must be divorced; an unchaste husband is not so treated. See Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, 167. The adulterer must undergo fifteen years of penance (ibid. can. 59, which gives seven years to simple incontinence). Gregory of Nyssa (can. 4) prescribes eighteen years, and nine only for simple incontinence.

(2) Against Adultery as under Spiritual, but not Civil Law. Laws were drawn dividing and diversifying: (a) Divorce, except for adultery, is adultery. Under this fell the questions of enforced continence and of marriage after divorce. (b) To retain an adulterous wife is also adultery. These divisions should be remembered, though the points are often blended in the canons (Conc. Apost. 6). No one in higher orders is to cast out his wife for the sake of religion. Regulars are not regarded as bishops (by Trull. can. 12), but the change was not enough to satisfy Rome. If a divorced husband marries again, the second wife is not an adulteress, but the first. A woman must not leave her husband for blows, waste of dower, incontinence, or even disbelief (1 Cor. vii, 18), under penalty of excommunication. But a woman cannot, in the same sense, signs extra penance to what would now be called simple adultery, i.e. the incontinency of a married man. An offending wife is an adulteress, and must be divorced. Not so the husband (Carthage, can. 105). Divorced perome are to remain unmarried, and an alteration of the imperial law in this sense is to be petitioned for. The same canon and its parallels forbade marriage after divorce, whether just or unjust, and the view of its being adultery had gained ground in the West. But we find from several sources that the Church courts in the West did not always hold incontinency to be held a like condition in husband and in wife.

(3) Constructions of Adultery.—The following are treated as guilty of the actual crime: a man marrying a betrothed maiden (Tract. can. 98) girl seduced marrying other than her betrothed (Canon 14); consecrated virgins who sin, and their paramours (Basil. can. 18). These supercede Anacreon, can. 19, by which the offence was punished as digamy. Marriage between Jew and Christian was to be treated as adultery (Cod. Theod.); and, on the principle of idolatry being considered from Old-Test times as adultery, marriage with an unclean transgressor involved wife or husband in the sinner's guilt. See Bingham, Christ. Antiq. index.

ADUMMIN. Tristram remarks that this "is probably Telat el-Dammn, i.e., the Mount of Blood, a mediaeval fortress, surrounded by a rock-hewn moat, standing above the town Khan el-Khman, and commanding the Jericho road on the south of the Kelt. The name Mount of Blood applies not only to the castle, but to the eminence of bright red-colored rock on which it stands. It was known to the Crusaders as 'Four Rouge.' (Bible Places, p. 95). His authority for this is Mr. Drake (in the Quarr Statement of the 'Pal. Explor. Fund,' April, 1874, p. 70), who adds, "The Arabs say it is called the Mount of Blood because of a severe battle once fought there, but the bright-red limestone and marl are much more likely to be the true cause."

ADVIA (or Adoja), in Hindu mythology, is a surname of Brahman, who is only like himself, because there is no one who is like him.

ADVENT. In addition to what has already been given on this subject, it may be proper to add the directions of the various councils regarding the observance of the feast. A canon of the Council of Macon (A.D. 581) enjoins that from the Feast of St. Martin (Nov. 11) to the Nativity there be fasting on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday of each week, and that the canons be then recited. For the sacrifice during the Quadragesimal order. In the second Council of Tours (567), the fast of three days in the week is ordered for the months of September, October, and November, and from Dec. 1 to the Nativity every day. This is for monks only. It seems, from all that is certainly known, that Advent took its place among Church seasons only in the latter part of the Gengarian. Once established as one of the great festivals, it was felt that its dignity demanded a season of preparation. Originally left to the discretion of the faithful, the number of days or weeks to be set apart was eventually fixed by rule, and at first, it seems, in the churches of Gaul. Yet the same rule was not universally adopted, and for older sources in Latin, sacramentary shows three Sundays in Advent, and the Gothic-Gallican only two. But the rule that the term of preparation should be a quadragesima, to commence after the Feast of St. Martin, implies six Sundays. This rule—when not enacted, or re-enforced, by the Canon of Macon (581)—obtained in other churches, as appears from the fact that the Ambrosian (or Milan) and Mozarabic (or Spanish) Ordo shows six missae, implying that number of Sundays, and the same rule was observed in some of the Gallican churches. The rule—not of Advent, but of this quadragesim—is first met with in the diocese of Tours. The observance of the Quadragesima Apos tolorum and Quadragesima S. Philippi (in the Greek calendar Nov. 14) is enjoined upon monks by Nicethor, patriarch of Constantinople (806). The Church of Rome, under Gregory, at the close of the 6th century, received the season of preparation as an ecclesiastical rule, restricted in its proper sense to the four Sundays before the Nativity, and this became the general rule for the Western Church throughout the 8th century and later. The Sicilian church of Gelasius (496) wrote to Charlemagne by Paul the Deacon, and other older works, all give five Sundays. This seeming discrepancy is easily explained, since the fifth Sunday before the Nativity was not considered as itself a Sunday in Advent, but as the preparation for Advent.

After the pattern of the Lenten fast, Advent was marked as a season of mourning in the public services of the Church. The custom of omitting the Gloria in Excelsis, and also the Te Deum and Its Missa Est, and of laying aside the dalmatic and subdeacon's vestment, was coming into use during the 8th century. The Beneficentines monks retained the Te Deum in Advent as in Lent, alleging the rule of their founder. The Alleluia also, and the sequences, as also the hymns, were omitted, but not in all churches. In some churches the Missae (Psalm II) and other mournful psalms were added to or substituted for the ordinary psalms. For lessons, Isaiah was read through, beginning in Advent, and lasts until the day when that was finished, the twelve minor prophets followed, or readings from the fathers, especially the epistles of pope Leo on the incarnation and sermons of St. Augustine.

In the Greek Church the season of preparation for the Nativity is of later introduction. No notice of it occurs in the earlier works of Theodoret, though the forty days' fast of St. Philip was enjoined (upon monks) by Nicethor. This forty days' fast, beginning Nov. 14, is now the rule of the Greek Church. In the separated churches of the East no trace appears, within our period, of an Advent season, unless we except the existence of the Chaldean and Syrian rule, by which the liturgical year begins with four Sundays of Annunciation before the Nativity. The Armenian Church, refusing to accept Dec. 25 as the Feast of the Nativity, and adhering to the more ancient sense of the Feast of Epiphany as including the birth of Christ, prepares for this high festival (Jan. 6) by a fast of fifty days, beginning Nov. 17.

Advent Antiphons are those ancient antiphons used before and after the Magnificat which begin with the letter O. We give those for Dec. 16–23 as they stand in many ancient and some modern rituals:

"Dec. 16.—O Sapiens! O Wisdom! whom comest forth out of the mouth of the Most High, and reachest from one end to another, mightily and profoundly, with the might of all things; come and teach us the way of prudence."

"Dec. 17.—O Root of Jesse! The holy and righteous Branch of the House of Israel! who appeared unto Moses in a flame of fire in the bush, and gave unto him the law in Sinai; come and redeem us with a stretched-out arm."

"Dec. 18.—O Rosary Jesus! O Root of Jesse! who standest for an enigma of the people, at whose wings shall shut their mouths, and whose the Gentiles shall pray; come and deliver us, and tarry not."

"Dec. 19.—O Clarus David! O Key of David and Sceptre of the House of Israel; thou that dost govern the house of Jacob, shuttest, and shuttest no man openeth; come and house the prisoner from the prison house, and him that is shut in from the window of death."

"Dec. 20.—O Orient! O Orient, Brightness of the Eternal Light and Sun of Righteousnesses! come and enlighten them that sit in darkness and in the shadow of death."

"Dec. 21.—O Rex Gentium! O King of the Gentiles and Their Desire, the Coven that made us perfect; come and save man, whom thou hast cast out of the dust of the earth."

"Dec. 22.—O Emmanuel! O Emmanuel, our King and Lawgiver! the Desire of all nations and their Salvior; come and save us, O Lord our God."

"Dec. 23.—O Virgin of Virgins! how shall this be? for neither before thee was any like thee, nor shall there be after thee. Daughter of Jerusalem, why marvel ye at me? the thing which ye beheld was a divine mystery."

Advent Christian Association, a branch of the Adventists (q.v.), which now includes the great majority of those who believe in the speedy coming of Christ to rule the world in his own person. In 1852 Jonathan Cummings, one of the ministers of the Advent body in that city, claimed to have gained the "last light on the commencement and terminus of the periods of Daniel." He predicted with the utmost positiveness that the resurrection would take place in 1854. About this time F. H. Berrick wrote a book entitled The Lord Soon to Come to sustain the same theory. The time movement having failed with the earlier Adventists as a body, there was no disposition on the part of the managers of the official periodicals to permit any extended discussion of the theory in their columns. In consequence of this the advocates of the new doctrine held a mass meeting at Lowell, Mass., in January, 1854, and decided to set out to gain attention to their views. As a result The World's Crisis was issued at Lowell in March of that year. Mr. Cummings gathered about him several hundreds of followers on the plan of a community of goods, but that feature of the enterprise failed. When the year 1854 had passed, The World's Crisis was obliged to confess the error of its doctrine in regard to time, but certain other differences existed which prevented its supporters from returning to their former fellowship. They appointed a conference to meet at Worcester, Mass., June 5, 1855, where doctrinal views were set forth, but no organization was effected. In February, 1856, The World's Crisis was removed to Boston, where it has remained ever since. Another magazine, the Signs of the Times, was established at Worcester, Nov. 6, 1861, at which "The Advent Christian Association" was organized. This association consisted of those who believed in the entire mortality of man, the sleep of the soul in death, and the final destruction of the wicked. By the evangelical class they were termed materialists. Although their number was limited at the beginning, those who belonged to the original organization gradually came over, until this branch now comprises the greater part of the Adventists in America. It has about one thousand ministers, and some thirty state and sectional conferences meeting annually. Its form of Church government is Congregational. See Welcomer, Hist. of the Second Ad- vent Message, p. 594 sq.

Adventists, a name applied to those Christians who believe in the speedy coming of Christ to reign over his kingdom in the world. From intimations in Paul's Second Epistle to the Thessalonians (2:2, 3) there would appear that there were those even so early as that time who were looking for the immediate coming of Christ in his own person; and frequently along the ages since, the same expectation has been revived, with various changes as to circumstances and dates. Among the most remarkable of this type was a journeyman tailor in the town of Cromwell, who, with his companion Reeves, absolved and condemned according to their own pleasure. They claimed that they were the two last witnesses spoken of in Revelation, who were to appear previous to the destruction of the world. See MEGOLSTONIANS. The Fifth Monarchy Men (q. v.) in the days of Cromwell formed another class of prophets whose influence was but short-lived. The Assyrian, the Persian, the Grecian, and the Roman were the four great monarchies, and these men, believing that the spiritual kingdom of Christ made the fifth, bore the name by which they were distinguished. They aimed at the subversion of all human government. In the 17th century, Thomas Burnet (q. v.), in his Theory of the Earth, taught that in the latter period of time, Christ shall live and reign on the earth for a thousand years, and that this period shall be the seventh millennium. For as God created the world in six days and rested on the seventh, so the world, it is argued, will continue six thousand years, and the seventh thousand will be the great Sabbath or holy rest to the people of God.

Men of very different denominational creeds have written freely on this subject. For example, the Re- torationist, Mr. Winchester, in his Lectures on Prophecy, suggests that all the large rivers in America are on the eastern side, in order that the Jews may be carried the more easily down by the inhabitants of the west and the Holy Land; that Christ will appear at the equinox, either in March or September; and, finally, that the body of Christ will be luminous, and be suspended in the air over the equator for twenty-four hours, and will be seen with circumstances of peculiar glory from pole to pole by all inhabitants of the world. The author of a work entitled Illustrations of Prophecy contends that in the period commonly called the millennium a melioration of the human race will take place, by natural means, throughout the world. Robert Hall, Dr. David Bogue, and others, in the latter part of the 19th century, have attempted to give their views of the matter. Edward Irving (q. v.) also published two volumes on prophecy, in which he contends for a millennium involving the personal reign of Christ on earth, commencing in 1866. However Millennials may differ among themselves respecting the nature of this great event, they all agree that a revolution will be effected in the latter days by which vice and its attendant misery will be banished from the earth. It is remarkable that the subject of the second advent of Christ has generally been made most prominent by its adherents when the public mind has been more than usually excited about other matters, such as the prevalence of fever and the frequent earthquake shocks. See PREMILLIENARIANS.

I. Origin of the Modern Phase of Adventism.—The agitation of the question began in America about the close of the last century. In 1796 the Rev. Joshua Spanuhling, minister at the Tabernacle in Salem, Mass., published a series of sermons on The Coming and King- dom of Our Lord Jesus Christ, advocating the speedy appearance and reign of Christ. In 1800, Benjamin Farnham published a work at East Windsor, Conn., on the premillennial advent of Christ. Other works were published at various subsequent dates. In 1898, Elias Smith, a Christian Baptist minister, produced the first religious newspaper devoted to this subject ever published in the world, at Portsmouth, N. H. It was called The Herald of Gospel Liberty, and advocated the premillennial personal coming of Christ, and nearly all the views of what are now called Adventists. About this time came the popularisation of the idea of the termination of Daniel's "seventy weeks" and 2900 days, that the coming of Christ would take place in 1843 or 1847, according as the "seventy weeks" ended with the death of Christ, or four years later. Among these was William Miller (q. v.); also for an account of his followers and the doctrines of this MILLERIANISM, see pre- millennialism. He was followed by a great awakening. Thousands were converted to God, and many ministers and members of other denominations, either through his public addresses or through the reading of his published works, were led to embrace his views and change their denominational connections.

The first general conference of Adventists assembled in Boston, Oct. 14, 1840. It was designed to be unde- nominational, and, accordingly, was composed of minis- ters of various communions. The Conference convened in Chardon Street Chapel, and the pastor, Joshua V. Himes, read the call for this assembly as follows:

"The undersigned, believers in the Second Coming and Kingdom of the Messiah at hand, cordially invite you to the call for a general conference of our brethren of the United States, the majority of whom are also looking for the advent near, to meet at Boston, Mass., Oct. 14, 1840, at 10 o'clock A.M., to continue two days, or as long as may be found necessary. The object of the conference is to form a new organization in the faith of Christ, nor to as- sess others of our brethren who differ from us in regard to the doctrines of which we are in favor. We believe the whole subject faithfully and fairly, in the exercise of that spirit of Christ in which it will be safe immediately to meet, and discuss the subject. By doing so we may acco- mplish much in the rapid, general, and powerful spread of the everlasting gospel of the King at hand, that the
After the passing-away of the Jewish year 1843, the great body of the Adventists settled down in the belief that they could henceforth reckon particular times with no degree of positiveness. They believed that they had reached the end of all the prophetic periods, at the termination of which the advent was expected, and that while they should have to wait only the little while that the great illumination might be held up to them, till the day of God so came, yet they believed that they could have no more clew to the definite date. The time movement had failed. Every preparation had been made by the great majority of these believers for the final coming of the Lord on Oct. 22, 1844. The Advent periodicals issued last motions and suspensions, considering their work ended; and many thousands of believers gave up all worldly pursuits, disengaged themselves from all worldly alliances, and sat down in the firm expectation of the coming of the Messiah. The day came and went, and nothing unusual occurred. From that time a new phase of the movement was necessary to its existence. Under various leaders it assumed various forms. The great body of Adventists, however, remained in the line of the originators of the movement. The publishers resumed their work, and declared their firm belief in the doctrine which they had been proclaiming, only varied in minor details. The following is the pen of Mr. Miller's earliest and most zealous follower in the proclamation of the immediate coming of the Lord: "We have now passed every point of definite time in which we looked for our blessed Saviour, and yet I do not give up the question; I only give up the point that our chronologies are to be depended upon for literal exactness as to time. But we are in the circle of a short period, and may look now every hour for the advent." Such was the view held by the principal leaders in the movement, and they began anew their labors, somewhat cautiously at first, yet more vigorously afterwards.

But while this great body went forward in harmony with the original leaders, there were many side-issues which drew to themselves varying numbers, thus creating division in the ranks and causing much discredit to all concerned. The first question that produced a distracting influence was Judaism, which taught the conversion and restoration of the natural Jews. The men not finding satisfaction in the discussions of the question in the regular Advent papers, started the American Millenarian in Boston in 1842, and afterwards removed it to New York. A considerable number left the main body on account of these differences of opinion.

The next disturbing cause was a strange fanaticism, originating in the mind of a man named Starkweather, who became assistant to Mr. Himes at Chardton Street Chapel, Boston. He was a turbulent spirit, and was noted for making divisions wherever he went. His principal theme was the necessity of a preparation for the Saviour's coming. He taught that conversion, however full and thorough, did not fit one for God's favor without a second work, and that this second work was usually indicated by some bodily sensation. Accordingly, the losing of strength and other spasmodic phenomena were manifested and hailed as evidences of the great power of God in the sanctification of those who were already Christians. This he called the "waiting power." The fanaticism grew to such proportions in the Church that measures had to be taken to remove it. All who spoke in opposition to such manifestations were charged with "offending against the Holy Ghost." Notwithstanding these denunciations, however, Starkweather and his followers continued to circulate in Europe and in another place. Meetings were held in various places, camp-meetings were organized, and a conference attempted. Some followers were gathered, and many disgusting and disgraceful scenes enacted; but the movement assumed only small proportions.

with Joseph Turner, of Maine, and several others in various places, who simultaneously claimed to have it impressed upon them by the Holy Spirit, on "the tenth day of the seventh month." Mr. Turner proclaimed it at a camp-meeting held at Woodstock, Me., Oct. 22, 1844, while some penitents were present for prayers, he suddenly declared that Christ had left the mercy-seat. With him it soon settled into a theory, and he with others began to proclaim throughout the Advent societies that the door of mercy was shut from and after Oct. 22, 1844; but that all who remained steadfast in their experience of the movement of 1844 were already members of Christ's kingdom. This theory found adherents, and was confirmed by one Ellen G. Harmon, who travelled from town to town, where she was strangely exercised in body and mind, usually talking in assemblies until nature was exhausted, and then falling to the floor, remaining for a considerable time in an epileptic state. Afterwards she would relate the wonders which had been revealed to her during the trance, even professing to have seen Christ and the records contained in the book of life. Some of the Advent publications defended the theory, and others were controlled temporarily by its advocates. Extravagant views were held by most of the adherents of this theory, such as visions and dreams. Feet-washing and kissing were declared to be Gospel ordinances.

Another branch of this class of believers was established, with "visions" and "revelations," which had been so systematically organized as to deserve separate treatment. See Revivals, 1838-1844.

II. Organization. — As has already been intimated, the purpose of these zealous heralds of the second advent of Christ was simply to arouse the world to a consideration of their message, and induce the careless and impious to turn to God and prepare to meet the Lord as he cometh. They aimed at nothing less than denominational organization, considering the time too short for any such necessity. But circumstances made it necessary to organize in some localities. Converts to the faith existed in such numbers as to require organization into societies. It frequently happened that the Adventists of a congregation were a minority, and were expelled from fellowship in their churches. Opposition on the part of believers of the various denominations drove many from their doors, and thus societies sprang up in various places from the beginning of the movement, while thousands who embraced the doctrine continued to hold their Church relationship as they had always done.

But after the disappointment of 1843-44, some plan of operations was required for the prosecution of the work in hand. To define more clearly the views of the Adventists, and determine who were of their number, it was decided to call a conference to meet at Albany, N. Y., April 29, 1845. As a result of the deliberations of that body, a report was adopted setting forth their views and recommending a course of action. This report formed the basis of subsequent organizations, and from it we present the following extract:

"In view of the many conflicting opinions, unscriptural views, and erroneous practices, arising out of the Divisions which have been caused by some passing to be Adventists, we deem it incumbent on us to declare to the world the beliefs that the Scriptures teach, among others, the following important truths:

"1st. That the heavens and earth, which are now, by the word of God, are kept in store, reserved unto fire against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men. That the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night; in which the heavens shall be dissolved with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat; the earth also, and the works that are therein, shall be burned up. Therefore the heavens and a new earth, wherein righteousness— that is, the righteous— will forever dwell, shall come. And the king and dominion under the whole heaven shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom, and dominion, and power, and might shall be forever and ever, and all dominions shall serve and obey him (Dan. vii, 27)."

"2d. That there are but two advents or appearances of the Saviour to this earth (Heb. ix. 28). That both are personal and visible (Acts i, 9, 11). That the first that took place on the day of Pentecost (Acts ii, 21); the second, the ascension (Mark xvi, 19). That after the ascension, the Holy Ghost was not conceived of the Holy Ghost (1 John, 5), born of the Virgin Mary (ver. 8), went about doing good (xi, 6), suffered and rose again (Rev. xiv, 4, 5), died (Luke xxiii, 40), was buried (ver. 39), arose again (xvi, 8), reigned and returned (John xvi, 4, 5), and ascended into the heavens (Luke xxi, 31), which must receive him until the time of the restitution of all things by the second coming of the Lord (Acts xiii, 39, 40). That the second coming or appearing will take place when he shall descend from heaven (Dan. vii, 9), or make his appearance upon the earth with power and great glory (Matt. xxv, 31), and with the sign of the times (Matt. xxiv, 39; Luke xxi, 22, 26). But that this truth should be preached both to saints and sinners, that the first manifestation of the saints shall precede, knowing their redemption draweth near (ver. 2; 1 Thess. iv, 15), and the last be warned to flee from the wrath to come (2 Cor. vi, 14, 15; Rev. xvi, 8), that the visible appearance of the kingdom (Matt. xxii, 1) shall rise up and be seen to the door (Luke xxi, 31, 32).

"4th. That the condition of salvation is repentance toward God and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ (Rom. x, 13, 17, 18). That this is the great mark of the advent of the Lord Jesus Christ (1 Thess. iv, 16, 17; Rev. xiv, 13, 14; xix, 16, 17). That all the righteous shall be gathered in the kingdom of God (Isa. x, 21; Mark i, 15); and that those who have repentance and faith shall enter in, and with great joy, and godly in this present world, looking for that blessed and glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ (2 Pet. i, 19)."

"5th. That there will be a resurrection of the bodies of all the dead (John v, 28, 29), both of the just and of the unjust (Acts xxiv, 15); that those who are righteous shall live at his coming (1 Cor. xv, 53); that the rest of the dead will not live again until after a thousand years (Rev. xx, 5); and that these will be the only pilgrims, not all sleep, but shall be changed in the twinkling of an eye at the last trumpet (1 Cor. xv, 51, 52).

"6th. That the only millennium taught in the Word of God is the thousand years which are to intervene between the first resurrection and that of the rest of the dead, as indicated in the Revelation (Rev. x, 6-7); and that the various portions of Scriptures which refer to the millennial state are to have their fulfillment after the resurrection of all the saints who sleep in Jesus (Isa. xxxv, 1, 2, 5-10; Rev. xv, 17-20).

"7th. That the promise that Abraham should be the heir of the world was not to him or to his seed through the law, but through the righteousness of faith (Rom. iv, 13); that they are not all Israel which are of Israel (xv, 9); that there is no difference, under the Gospel dispensation, between Jew and Gentile (x, 12); that the middle wall of partition of Jew and Gentile is broken down, and they stand together in the same kingdom (Eph. ii, 19); that gentiles also are made meet for the inheritance of the saints in the light of the kingdom (Col. iii, 12); and that the nations of the earth shall serve the Lord (Isa. xi, 4; Ezek. xxxiv, 15-16).

"8th. That the promise of this world's deliverance (Matt. xvi, 14): that the horn of the papacy will war with the saints and prevail against them until the Ancient of Days shall give judgment to break the power of the Most High, and the time that the saints possess the kingdom, which is everlasting, will be restored out of the hands of the Gentiles (Dan. vii, 26-27); that the righteousness shall shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father (Matt. xiii, 37-43); that the man of sin will only be destroyed at the coming of the Son of man (Dan. ix, 27); and that the nations of those which are saved and redeemed to God by the blood of Christ, out of every kindred, and people, and tongue, and nation, will be made kings and priests unto God, to reign forever on the earth (Rev. v, 10; x, 10; xxi, 14)."

"9th. That the ministers of the Word to continue in the work of preaching the Gospel to every creature (Matt. xxi, 39); and that this work now begins immediately, upon the promise of the promise (John xii, 49); and that all the promises of God shall come from the presence of the Lord (Acts iii, 20, 21)."

ADVOCATES OF THE POPE

"And 10th. That the departed saints do not enter their inheritance or receive their crowns at death (Dan. xii, 21; Rev. vi, 4-11; Rom. viii, 23, 29); that they cannot be made perfect (Heb. xi, 40); that their inheritance, incorruptible and undefiled, and that faitheth not away, is reserved in heaven, ready to be revealed in the last time (1 Pet. i, 4, 5); that they are laid up for them and us as crowns of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, will give to everyone according to his work; and that the unity of Christ to heaven, appears ly (2 Tim. iv, 8); that they only will be satisfied when they come, ye blesséd, with Christ into his kingdom, and see him, as they have desired, and have the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world! (Matt. xxv, 34). Then they will be equal to the anges and the children of God and of the resurrection (Luke xx, 30)."

The same conference recommended the organization of societies to be governed according to the independent plan, acknowledging only the New Test, as an authoritative guide in Church government. Yet many of the Advent believers still continue to hold their membership in the churches to which they formerly belonged, not departing, except in this particular, from their former faith. There are many others also who, not finding their views exactly met by the common belief of any one religious body, have no denominational connection; still they reckon as Adventists.

A movement begun in England in 1842 by sending Joshua V. Himes, R. Hutchinson, and F. G. Brownthorpe in June of that year to proclaim the advent of the Messiah at hand. A paper—the European Advent Herald—was published one year, and many lectures and sermons were delivered; but the mission was abandoned in 1847 for want of men and means. A similar mission to the British West India Islands was undertaken by L. D. Mansfield and wife. This also failed, and was abandoned in the following year. Several missionary societies have been in existence from time to time, among which are The American Advent Mission Society,

The seven senior consistorial advocates have large salaries—twice as large, indeed, as the six junior advocates—and the fees drawn from those who obtain doctorates are considerable.

Advoca. See ADVOCIA.

Advovor is the advocate of a church or religious house, as a cathedral, monastery, abbey, etc., called a defensor or bailiff in Germany. Sometimes it signifies a person who has a right to present to a church living. Charlemagne had the title of advovor of St. Peter's, which he conferred on him for having protected Italy against the Lombards. Pope Nicholas constituted king Edward the Confessor and his successors advovors of the Monastery of Westminster and of all the churches in England. Advovors were the guardians and administrators of temporal concerns, and under their authority all contracts passed which related to the churches. The collection of the tithes and all other church revenues were under their control, as a reward for which many of the richest benefices were placed by the heads or principals of convents at their disposal. The command of the forces furnished by their monasteries for war was intrusted to them. Sometimes there were sub-advovors, who introduced great disorder, and very much contributed to the ruin of the monasteries. Abuses of this office having become general and intolerable, it was abolished by Frederick II of Germany. The origin of this office is sometimes assigned to the time of Stillicio, in the 4th century; but the Benedictines present it as commencing so late as the 8th century. Persons of the first rank were gradually introduced into it on account of the skill and power required in its execution. For a classification of advovors, see ADVOCATE OF THE CHURCH.

Advowson. Some additional facts may here be presented. In case the patron does not present within six months, the presentation lapses to the bishop; and if he neglect to collate within the following six months, to the archbishop, and after him to the crown. If, however, after the first six months the patron present before the bishop has collated, the presentation of the patron is good. So, after the expiration of twelve months, if the bishop collate before the archbishop, the archbishop's appointment is good. If a benefice in the gift of a person outlawed or tainted fall vacant, the sovereign presents. If the patron remain in a state of excommunication for the space of forty days, his clerk may be refused. Presentation made while the benefice is full is void. If a patron present first one and then another clerk, the ordinary may institute whichever he pleases; but where the sovereign is patron the ordinary must institute the second. A patron may not present himself, but the ordinary may admit him on his petition. A married woman, having the right of advowson, must present in the name of her husband. See Johnson, Clergyman's Vademecum.

Adyta (advera, inaccessible), a name given in early times to the chancel of a church, because there was no place of access here for the people, who were wholly excluded therefrom.—Bingham, Christ. Antiq. bk. viii, ch. vi, § 4.

Aentea, in Greek mythology, was the name of a festival of Ajax celebrated on the island of Salamis, where he was born. A temple was erected there, in which stood a wooden image of him. He was likewise worshipped in Athens and on the promontory of Rhoitumo.

Aides, a name given by the Romans to unconsecrated temples.

Aedesius (or Hedesius), a Christian martyr, was a noble Lycian and a student at Alexandria, where he was martyred by drowning about A.D. 306. See Eusebius, De Martyr. Palatin. v, 14; Syriac Acta in Amssenian. Acta Mart. i, 195.

Ediclia, a small temple or chapel among the ancient Romans, called also seculum.

Edite, a Roman magistrate whose business it was to superintend the temples and other public buildings, the public games, and spectacles. Two curule aediles were annually elected, and there were, besides these, plebeian aediles. The office was one of dignity and honor, though reckoned a minor magistracy.

Editus, an officer among the Romans who had charge of the offerings, treasure, and sacred utensils belonging to the temples of the gods. A female officer of the same kind, termed Edita, presided over the temples of the goddesses. See DOOKERPER.

Eaga, in Greek mythology, was the daughter of Oceanus, who with her sister Helice brought up the young Jupiter. She was subsequently placed among the stars. Eaga had such a brightness that the Titans were blinded when they attempted to besiege heaven. They accordingly asked her mother to darkén the star. Gea hid Eaga in a cave on Crete, where afterwards she became Jupiter's nurse.

Eagea, in Greek mythology, was a surname of Zeus, from her extraordinary worship on the islands of the Egean Sea. She was also called "the inhabitant of the island," for she was worshipped more than any other deity.

Eagocus, in Greek mythology, was, according to Strabo, a surname of Neptune, derived from Eagea, a city in Eubea, where a temple was erected to his worship on a hill.

Eageon, in Greek mythology, was (1) a giant with one hundred arms and fifty heads, whom the gods called Briareus (the frightful, the powerful). He was a son of Uranus and the Earth. He and his brothers, Cottus and Gyes, were bound by their father and imprisoned in a cave, from fear of their strength, until Jupiter in a war against the Titans liberated them, and with their help became victorious. Once Neptune, Juno, and Minerva had plotted to bind Jupiter. Thetis brought Eageon up to Olympus and placed him side by side with Jupiter. At the sight of the frightful giant the deities were so afraid that they abandoned their design. (2) One of the evil sons of the Arcadian king Lycaon. Jupiter disguised himself as the centaur and changed the father into a wolf, killed the sons by lightning.

Eagaten is commemorated as a Christian saint in some martyrologies on Oct. 24.

Eageates, John, a Nestorian priest, lived, according to Vossius, about 483; but Cave thinks that he lived some years later, as he continued his history five books after the deposition of Peter the Fuller. This was an Ecclesiastical History from the reign of Theodoreus the Younger, and ending with the deposition of Peter the Fuller (p. v). There is only a fragment of this work extant, in the Concilia, vol. vii, and in the collections of Theodorus Lector. He wrote, also, a treatise against the Council of Chalcedon.

Egidius, an Anabaptist who appeared at Aix-la-Chapelle about the end of the 16th century, and was condemned to death at Antwerp.

Egidius, St., is considered by many to be identical with St. Giles (q. v.). In addition to what has already been given in that article, it is related of him that he refused treatment for an accidental lameness, that he might be able to practice more rigid self-mortification. From this anecdote he has been esteemed the patron of cripples, and St. Giles's Cripplegate, built about 1000, is dedicated to him. In art, St. Giles is generally represented as an aged man, with a long white beard; a blind, pierced with an arrow, rests his head or fore-feet in his lap, or crouches at his feet. Representations of him are seldom met with in Italy, but very frequently in early French and German art. The relics of the saint, buried in the church dedicated by himself when, with the rest of the gods, he fled from Typhon. Jupiter, for his subtlety, placed him among the stars.

Aemilia, St. Jerkome, an Italian philanthropist, was born at Venice, of noble parentage, in 1481. Having been taken prisoner in his youth, upon his release he dedicated his life to the care of orphans, and accordingly collected a considerable number of them in a house, where they were educated in virtue and industry. This laid the foundation of the regular clerks of St. Mairel, or Fathers of Somasche, so called from the place where he first established their community. He appears to have been a man of most humane disposition; and in 1528, when plague and famine raged in Italy, he sold even his furniture to assist the poor. He died in 1537, and was canonized by Benedict XIV. His Life was written by Andreas Stella, general of the Somaschians (q. v.).

Aemilius is the name of three saints in the Roman calendar. (1) Martyr in Africa, commemorated May 22. (2) Or Sardinia, commemorated May 28. (3) Commemorated June 18.

Aemilius, Gero, a Lutheran theologian, was born June 25, 1537, at Mansfeld, and died as superintendent at Stolberg, May 22, 1569. Aeronomy as was a passion for geometry practiced among the Greeks and Romans, by which future events were foretold from certain appearances or noises in the air. One mode of aeronomy as was as follows: The person employing it folded his head in a cloth, and having placed a bowl of water in the open air, he proposed his question in a low voice, when, if the water was agitated, he considered that what he had asked was answered in the affirmative.

Birtzen, called Birtzen, Peter (called by his friends Longo, from his tall figure), an eminent historical painter, was born at Amsterdam in 1519. At the age of eighteen he copied some capital pictures in the cabinet of Bossu, in Hainault. He gained much celebrity in historical painting. His greatest work, The Crucifixion, at Alkmaer, was destroyed by a mob in 1566. At Delhi are two of the pictures of this artist, A Nativity and the Offering of the Wise Men; and at Amsterdam, in the Church of Our Lady, are three, viz. the Death of the Virgin Mary, a Nativity, and the Adoration of the Magi, all of which are reckoned excellent performances. He died at Amsterdam in 1573.

Bruscatöres, a name given to the priests of Cybele among the Romans because they begged alms in the public streets. The word came to be applied to fortune-tellers generally, or vagrants like the modern gypsies.

Bires (or Eres) is a name given in Danese, in his edition of Augustine's treatise De Heresibus, to a sect which is numbered as the sixty-seventh in that work and as the eightieth in Philaster. The Aeternales taught that the world will remain forever in its present condition, even after the second coming of our Lord. Augustine remarks that Plautius gives neither the name of the sect nor its originator. The author of Pachymerison (Chronicler) placed the Samarian sect in a sect which he names Satamiammi (q. v.), from one Satamiammi; but this name was sometimes given to the Euchites.

Ethalides, a mythical hero, son of Mercury and Eupolemas, was a native of Larissa, who had the liberty from his father of being sometimes with the living and sometimes with the dead, so that he was aware of all that was transpiring among both. He was a herald of the Argonauts, and the duties of his office gave rise to the faule; he being necessarily often present with, and often absent from, the army, and being obliged to be exactly informed of all that happened.

Ethiops, in Pagan mythology, was the son of Vulcan by Agasia, one of the Graces. From him the Ethiopians had their name, being previously called Etheceans.

Ethius, the son of Jupiter by Protogenia, and father of Endymion, is said to have been one of the institutions of the Olympic games.

Ethen, a name given by the poets to the four black horses of Ptolemy.

Ethusa, in Paganism, was a mythical character, daughter of Neptune by Apollo.

Aetius (1), a Palestinian bishop who condemned the ascetic Peter of Capharbaria, who was a general before A.D. 361 (Epìb. H.rr. p. 291). (2) A bishop of Lydda (Diospolis) of this name subscribed the Council of Nice; yet he had been claimed not long before by Arius as a partisan (Theodore, Hist. Eccles, i. 5; Epìb. H.rr. p. 731 c). He took part in the Arian Synod of Antioch in 380 (Theodore, Hist. Eccles. i. 29); and the Arian historian Philostorgius (ibid. iii. 12) accuses him of having joined the Arianusians in the hope of evading the charge of fornication, adding that he died soon after by an appropriate judgment. (3) An Aetius stands second among the Palestinian bishops who subscribed the Council of Sardica, and who two years later, especially congratulated the Arians on his return from exile. (4) A bishop of the Valentinians at Constantia, in Cyprus. According to Polybius (Vit. Epìb. p. 59), he was struck dumb by Epiphanius for his blasphemies, and died on the seventh day.

Atra, an English prelate, was a pupil of St. Hilda, in the Monastery of Whitby, and (according to Bede) became bishop of Dorchester. He is probably the same as Hæddi (q. v.); but Florence of Worcester (Chronicle, sub ann. 622) supposes him to have been the bishop of a new see established for the South Angles in A.D. 679. Perhaps Atra may have been ministerial for Hæddi. See Bede, Hist. Eccles. iv. 29; Ang. Sacra, i. 192, 2.

Aœ, in Egyptian mythology, was the mystical name of the sun in the lower hemisphere, or Hades.

Afeza, Pietro, an Italian painter, who flourished about the year 1650, was called Della Bellaicata, from his being a native of a province of that name in the kingdom of Naples. His works are on religious subjects. Dominici speaks of this artist in very favorable terms. His works are preserved in many of the churches and convents at Naples. In the chapel of the monastery at Marsico Nuovo is an altar-piece, the Assumption of the Holy Virgin, which is highly esteemed.

Affaitati, Antonio Maria, a Capuchin friar, was born in 1660. He lived at Milan, where he was appointed to assist those condemned to death. He died April 26, 1721. He wrote, Fiori Istorici, overo Compendio d'Ereditazioni Virtuose, e Fatti Illustri d'Uomini Grandi, Astichi e Moderni, e dei personaggi che fanno parte delle Memorabili (Milano, 1711; a 2d and more complete ed. was published in 1732):—Memoriale Catechismo, Esposto alle Religione Classtrali di qualunque Ordine (ibid. 1716):—Il Patriarca Davide, Spiegato nella Vita e Santità Eminentie di S. Affarosì, Camillo, a Benedictine of Italy, was born in 1680 at Reggio, in Lombardy. He employed himself chiefly with the history of his native place. He died in 1763. He wrote, Memorie Istoriche del Monastero di S. Giuseppe, in 2 vols.,—Notizie Istoriche della Città di Reggio in Lombardia (Padua, 1755). See Hofer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Affelmann, Johann, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Soest, in Westphalia, Nov. 25, 1588. He studied at Marburg, Giessen, and Rostock; and in the latter place, when twenty-one years old (in 1609), he became doctor and professor of theology, and as such he labored there until his death, Feb. 28, 1624. He took an active part in the controversies of his time, and wrote on Christ's ubiquity, baptism, and the Lord's supper, against Roman Catholics and Calvinists, chiliasm and enthusiasts. Fifty years after his death, Dr. G. Möbius, in Leipzig, published his writings, Synopsis Exercitiorum (1750), in 2 vols., containing the Scripta Polémica, the second Scripta Exercitica. The introduction to this collection contains also a short biography. See Tholuck, Das akademische Leben des 17ten Jahrhunderts; Krabbe, Aus dem kirchlichen u. wissenschaftlichen Leben Rostocks, p. 33 sq.; Allgemeine deutsche Biographie, s. v. (B. P.)

Affidatio (betrothal), a term which probably came into use about the 16th century. It seems to belong to the period of fully developed feudalism. The earliest example is of the year 1287; and the forms given in which the word occurs, from the rituals of Limoges and of Rheims, are more modern yet, to judge from the passages in French which are intermixed in them.

Affiliation, a term used among monks to signify the incorporation of a monk with the particular monastery to which he binds himself, and whose son he thenceforth becomes.

Affirmativa, the name given by the tribunal of the Inquisition to those heretics who, in word or deed, confess that they do actually hold the errors attributed to them, and, when interrogated formally, obstinately maintain them. See Emeritus, Director Inquisitionum, pt. ii, qu. 34.

Affitus, a term used by the poets of ancient Rome to indicate the inspiration of some divinity which prompted their poetic effusions. Not only, however, were poets supposed to be under the influence of the divine effutus, but all who performed great exploits or succeeded in any enterprise undertaken the name. See Hofer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Affitto, Eustachio d', a Dominican of Italy, was born in the early part of the 18th century, and died in 1790 at Naples. In 1782 he published the commencement of a large work on the literary history of Southern Italy, entitled Memorie degli Scrittori del Regno di Napoli (vol. I as far as letter A). The 2d. vol. appeared in 1792. See Hofer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Affitto, Giovanni Maria, an Italian Domini-can, was born near the close of the 16th century. He devoted himself to the study of mathematics, and especially to the art of defence. He died at Naples in 1678. He was called in Spain Don Juan of Austrina, and was the author of a treatise on fortifications, besides certain theological and philosophical writings. See Hoefer, Nychaeus, Nigro, Dei, s. v.

Affusion (another name for pouring or sprinkling), although previously practiced, did not become general until the 13th century in the Western Church, which permits it, although the ancient practice of immersion, or dipping, has never been formally abolished in favor of pouring water on the person to be baptized. Affusion was probably an indulgence to clinics or persons baptized by immersion, and therefore limited to infants in delicto health. The Eastern Church retains dipping, and insists on rebaptism by immersion in all cases where it has not been observed. See SPRINKLING.

Afghan Version. See PUSHTO.

Afghans, a people inhabiting Afghanistan (q. v.), and, according to their own traditions, descended from Melic Talut, that is, from King Saul. Sir William Jones has conjectured that they are a remnant of the ten tribes of Israel carried off in the Captivity. He says, "We learn from Eusebius that the ten tribes, after a wandering journey, came to a country called Arsareth, where they may suppose they settled. Now the best Persian historians affirm that the Afghans are descended from the Jews; and they have among themselves traditions of the same import. It is even asserted that their genealogies are distinguished by the name of Jewish tribes; though, since their conversion to Islamism, they have studiously concealed their origin. The language they use has a manifest resemblance to Chaldæa; and a considerable district under their dominion is called Hagarthe, which might easily have been changed from Arsareth." The Afghans still preserve a strong resemblance to the Jews in their customs and ritual observances. They contract marriages chiefly with their own tribes; they adhere to the Levitical law in the brother marrying the widow of his deceased brother whenever the brother has died without issue; divorces are permitted among them, and a ceremony prevails among one of their tribes bearing a marked resemblance to the Feast of Tabernacles. Their language also contains a greater number of Hebrew words than any other in India.

Afshack, GILLES, a theologian of Holland, a native of Vreeswyk, was professor of theology at Utrecht near the commencement of the 17th century. He wrote "De controversia historiae Catholicae disputata," which existed at that time in Holland between the Gomarists and Remonstrants. This history, published under the pseudonym of Salomon Theodote, is entitled Enotikon Disserti Belgici, in quo Historia Religio Originis et Progressus eorum Dissidentarum Continuata est in Forma Quatuor et Decem Contra Remonstrantes per Animos aliquot Expectatantur (Utrecht, 1618). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Afzai Sorores (the African sisters), that is, the Hesperides, mythical personages in the Pagan legends.

African Code, a title given to the codification or compilation of the conclusions arrived at in the various African councils (q. v.). On this African Code a good deal has been written, but a good deal also remains unsolved, and perhaps insoluble. Several of the canons contained in it have been preserved to more councils than one, and several of the councils are differently dated or numbered by different editors or collectors. Perhaps the best edition of it is that published in Greek and Latin by Mansi (iii, 659-845). Originally promulgated in Latin, it was probably translated into Greek by the Council of A.D. 683, by the second canon of which it became part of the code of the Eastern Church. It comprehends, first, the deliberations of the Council of Carthage, A.D. 419; then the canons of the same synod to the number of 33; then "canons of different councils of the African Church," in the words of their heading, especially those down to 138. Other collections contain fewer or more canons, some adding those of later councils, others quite ancient and not included in the Code of the Council of Constance, A.D. 419. Notwithstanding this variety, the title of "African Code" seems properly given to the 138 canons above mentioned as designating those canons alone which have been received generally by the East and West. The chief interest attaches to the two canons interpreted as applying beyond the sea. See Migne, Patrologia, lxxxv, 723-236; Beveridge, Synodicon, i, 365-372; Johnson, Vindication, ii, 171.

African Councils. We give under this head a chronological view (from Smith's Dict. of Christ. Antiq., s. v.) of the various ancient synods held in different parts of Africa, exclusive of those of Egypt [see ALEXANDRIA, COUNCILS, &c.], with the translations of each, leaving further details for the separate places where the date and relative order of many of these are disputed:

CARTAGH, A.D. 400, 817—Supposed to be the same under Agrippinus, in favor of rebaptizing heretics.
CARTAGH, A.D. 521—Under St. Cyriacus; decreed that the lapsed should be received to communion, but not till they had performed their full penance.
CARTAGH, A.D. 522—Against Novatian, who denied that the lapsed were to be received to be readmitted to communion; and Felicilus, who affirmed that they were, even before they had performed their penance.
CARTAGH, A.D. 524 or 525—Under St. Cyriacus, in favor of infant baptism.
CARTAGH, A.D. 526—Under St. Cyriacus, approving the consecration of Marcellus, a young African bishop, to the see of Pelusium; Sublime, bishop of Baal and Martini, against two bishops who had purchased certificates, or "libels," of being sacrificed to idols, and affirmed that Stephen, bishop of Rome, had interpreted in favor of the latter unreasonably, from having been duped by them.
CARTAGH, A.D. 526—In favor of rebaptizing all who had received heretical baptism, when St. Cyriacus uttered his celebrated invective against Stephen. The question was finally settled in the seventh of the Constantinopolitan canons.
CARTAGH, A.D. 535—To elect a new bishop in place of one who had been a "trattitor," that is, had surrendered copies of the Scriptures to the Pagan authorities, to which all present, when they came to be asked, however, pleaded equally guilty.
CARTAGH, A.D. 539—Of seventy Donatist bishops against Caecilian, bishop of that see.
CARTAGH, A.D. 539—Under Bonitus, against the schism: favorable to the "trattitors."
CARTAGH, A.D. 546—Under Gratian; its acts are comprised in fourteen chapters, of which the first is against rebaptizing the lapsed. They have been baptised twice, with water in the name of the Trinity. This is probably the council whose canons are invoked in canon 13 of the African Code.
TREVESTE, A.D. 565—Of Donatist quarrelling among themselves.
AFROCENS, A.D. 589—Of Donatists, in condemnation of Tichonius, a Donatist bishop.
CARTAGH, A.D. 586—Confirmatory of the synodical letter of the see of Carthage.
LEXTERS, A.D. 586—Passed canons on discipline.
CARTAGH, A.D. 590—Under Genebius, bishop of Carthage: made thirty canons, by the second of which bishops, priests, and deacons are required to abstain from their wives' continence.
CARTAGH, A.D. 590—Of Maximian's (Donatist bishop of Carthage) supporters against Primalus (another Donatist bishop of Carthage).
HIPPO, A.D. 593—At which St. Augustine disputed "De fide et similibus" as a prebyster.
CARTAGH, A.D. 603—Passed fifty canons, among which the "Breviarium canonum Hippensium" is said to have been inserted.
CARTAGH, A.D. 606—Passed fifteen canons on discipline.
CARTAGH, A.D. 607, 608—Passed three canons, against the "Breviarium canonum Hippensium." Thirty-nine of the canons on discipline.
HIPPO, A.D. 607, 608—all incorporated into the African Code.
CARTAGH, A.D. 610—Against the Donatists.
AGAPeMONE

AGANdurnu, in Hindīṣīm, is a verse in the holy books which the natives repeat to cleanse themselves from sin.

AGANdūra, RODERICIO MAURICIO, a Spanish missionary, lived near the close of the 16th and the commencement of the 17th century. His religious zeal was directed towards the conversion of the inhabitants of the island of Luzon and the Japanese. In 1640 he was sent to Rome by the friars of his order (Barefooted Augustinians) in order to give an account to pope Urbain VIII of the results of his mission. Agandur wrote several works on kindred subjects, for which see Hoefer, Neue Biogr. Générale, s. v.

AGANocē (also AGANOCE), in Greek legend, was the daughter of prince Hegeter of Thessalia. She knew how to foretell eclipses of the moon, and was said to be able to draw the moon down from heaven.

AGANIPPE, in Greek mythology, was (1) a spring on Helicon, the same as Hippocrene, which inspired him who drank to compose poetry. The Muses are called Aganippides. (2) A nymph of Mount Helicon. According to others, the nymph of the spring was a daughter of Peneus. (2) The mother of Danae and wife of king Acrisius.

AGAPē (St. 1. Virgin of Antioch, commemorated February 15 and March 10. (2) Of Thessalonica; she was burned under Maximianus Herculis, April 1, 304; commemorated April 3, in many martyrologies April 15. (3) A virgin. (8) (a) Apoc. April 16, (b) (4) Daughter of Sophis; commemorated September 17. (5) Virgin; commemorated at Rome August 8. (6) Virgin; commemorated at Heraclea November 20.

AGAPEMONē (αγαπημονή, love abode), a conventual establishment consisting of persons of both sexes, founded at Chartley, near Bridgewater, in the County of Somerset, England, by Henry James Prince, formerly a clergyman of the English Church. The inmates belong to a new religious sect, and are sometimes called Lamperobrethren, from the place where Prince was educated. The adherents of the sect generally, of whom there are a great many in the southwestern counties of England, are known as Prerestes, or Starkeyes, from Mr. Starkey, one of the prime movers in the hereby.

Mr. Prince was born at Bath in 1811, and was educated for a physician. He decided, however, to enter the ministry, and, on leaving college, became curate of Chartly. While there he gave expression to strange and, to an eminent degree, bold views on the germs of his later doctrines. He succeeded in making a convert of his rector, the Rev. Samuel Starkey, and his views began to excite so much attention that he was removed to a curacy at Stoke, in Suffolk. Here, however, his conduct was in no respect improved, and he was dismissed; and about the same time Starkey was silenced. A conference was held by the Lampeter Birethren, and it was decided to leave the Church. They began preaching in the South of England, and attracted large crowds, securing many converts. One of their tenets was community of goods, and many farmers brought their wealth and laid it at the feet of the "apostle." Funds were accumulated in various ways, and the community have lived since 1859 in property sumptuously fitted up at Spaxton, near Chartly.

The inmates of this house are married couples, but they have religious objections to the increase of population, as if believing that the perfection of all things will be the extinction of the human race. Prince himself makes extravagant claims. Letters intended for him pass through the post-office addressed to "The Lord," and his followers claim that he is their creator. He asserts that Christ came to redeem the soul, but he came to redeem the body. The following passages occur in one of his pamphlets, of which he has published several: "God in Jesus Christ has again entered into covenant with man at the resurrection of mankind, and this is the first resurrection, and now brother Prince is his witness." "This one man, brother Prince, has Jesus Christ selected and appointed his witness to his counsel and purpose to conclude the day of grace and to introduce the day of judgment; to close the deprivation of the Spirit, the Gospel, and to enter into covenant with flesh." He considers himself perfect, and incapable of further improvement. These are his words: "Having neither wishes nor desires, my will can have no disposition whatever to move in any one direction rather than in another, but to rest in a sound of heavenly peace. In a well of perfect balance, it hangs delicately suspended on the divine will, in a holy equilibrium of inward passiveness." They were still preaching their doctrines at a recent date. See Dixon [W. Hepworth], Spiritual Wives (2 vols. 1889).

Agapemones. See PRINCEITIES.

Agapēta, or Agapētē, the name given to a branch of Gnostics which existed towards the end of the 4th century. According to Jerome, they consisted principally of women who attached themselves to young people, and taught them that nothing was impure with pious minds. One of their maxims was, that they were bound rather to perceive themselves than to reveal the secrets of their sect.—Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Agapētēs, the name of several martyrs and prelates. (1.) A deacon, said by some to have been the companion in martyrdom of pope Christus, and in many martyrlogies he is commemorated with Sts. Xistus and Feliciasimus on the same day. They are believed to have suffered on the same day, A.D. 258, although in different places. (2.) Saint and martyr of Persia, who died in Rome. He was elected by the officers of Aurelian, about 275, when he was only fifteen years of age. He is celebrated Aug. 18. (3.) Archbishop of Rhodes, and one of the metropolitans to whom the emperor Leo wrote respecting the death of Pelagius. Replying to a letter of Leo's respecting the Council of Chalcedon, he vigorously defended the cause of the council. His name appears affixed to the ecumenical epistle of the Council of Constantinople, A.D. 459, directed against simony. (4.) Deacon of the Church of Constantinople, flourished about A.D. 527, when he wrote a letter, called Churta Regia, to the emperor Justinian, containing excellent advice on the duties of a Christian prince. The work is given in the Bibl. Patrum under the following title: Agapēti, Constantiopol, Ecclesia Diaconii, ad Justinianum Imperatorum Oratio Parematica, etc. It was printed in Greek and Latin (Venice, 1589, 8vo; Basle, 1518, 8vo; with notes, Frankfort, 1659), and translated into French by Louis XIII. (5.) Bishop of the Macedonians at Synnada. The sect was fiercely persecuted by Theodosius, the Catholic prelate, with the view of extorting money. During his absence from Synnada, Agapētēs convened the clergy and laity of his sect, and, persuading them to accept, took possession of the churches and the episcopal throne, from which Theodosius, on his return, was unable to expel him. See Cave, *Hist. Lit.; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. Dict. s. v.

Agapētēs (or Agapētus), three men are given who are known by either of these names. (1.) Bishop of Seleucia, metropolis of Isauria, who was present at the Council of Antioch. (A.D. 328). (2.) Bishop of Apamea, succeeded his brother Marcellus in the reign of Arcadius. A disciple of St. Marcellus, he had been conspicuous for eminence in ascetic virtue. Theodoret (Hist. Eccles. iv. 28; v. 27; Rel. Hist. 38) speaks of him with high commendation, and bestows on him the epithet of thaukoumenos. (3.) A friend and correspondent of Chrysostom, whom he addresses with much respect. He appears to have offered to visit Chrysostom in his banishment at Cucusus, but he begs him to content himself with writing (Chrys. Ep. xx, lxiii).

Agapētus de Duno Comus, abb of Campodon, died of grief, A.D. 817, upon the accidental destruction by fire of his library.

Agapētus, one of Manes' twelve disciples. Petrus Siculus and Photius mention a book of his entitled Heptapalos, and Photius (Biblioth. cod. 179) gives an account of one of his works of this kind, dedicated to a female follower named Urania. In them Agapētus maintains the doctrine of the two principles, the sinful nature of the body, and the duty of abstinence from flesh, wine, and marriage.

Agapētus, St., was a bishop and martyr, who with St. Secundianus was put to death for the faith at Cirta, in Numidia, May 6 (other martyrlogies, April 29, 295 (or 290), in the same persecution in which Sts. James and Marianus suffered. See Ruinart, Acta Sincera. See AGAPÉTUS.

Agapētus, a Greek monk of Mount Athos, in Macedonia, lived in the 17th century. He was the author of The Selection of Sinners (Αμαρτώλων Σωτηρία). Claude doubt's his being the author. The work is written in Modern Greek, and cited by De Perpetuitat de la Foi. Nau translated it into Arabic. It was printed at Venice (1641, 1664). See Moreri, who cites Richard Simon.

Agapētus, bishop of Cesarea, succeeded Theodorus towards the end of the 8th century. Eusebius, his contemporary, praises him for his knowledge, the laborious character of his episcopate, and his great liberality towards the poor. He ordained St. Pamphilus a presbyter (Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. vii. 32; Niceth. vii, 37).

Agapētus (St.) of Palestine was exposed to the wild beasts at Cesarea in 806 (or 807) by order of Caesar Maximus, but, surviving this ordeal, was drowned on the second day after. The Roman martyrologies commemorate him Nov. 20, and again Aug. 19, with Sts. Timotheus and Thecla, which is the day on which the Greeks keep his festival. See Baillet, Aug. 19; Ruinart, p. 522, 523.

He is, perhaps, the same with Agapētus who is commemorated in the Byzantine calendar as having been martyred with his companions at Gaza on April 2. See Agape.

Agar, Charles, an Irish prelate of the last century, was born in Gowran Castle, in the County of Kilkenny, and educated at Westminster School, and afterwards at Christ Church, Oxford. Having entered into holy orders, he was appointed first chaplain to the duke of Northumberland while lord-lieutenant of Ireland in 1768, from which situation he was promoted to the deanery of Kilmore, and to the see of Clonard in 1768. In 1779 he was translated to that of Cashel, over which he presided for twenty years. During that time he restored all the old churches and cathedrals in his diocese and built eleven new churches. In 1756 he was elevated to the peerage as baron Somerton, and yet higher in 1759. In 1801 he was translated to the archbishopric of Dublin, and was one of the representative spiritual peers in the first imperial parliament. In 1806 he was dignified with the title of earl of Normanton. In 1807 he and the other prelates of the Established Church were commanded by his majesty to make a minute return of the state of the Irish Church in their respective provinces and sees; and in a visitation of the same year he directed, with a too-long-deferred regard for the working clergy, that the incumbents of the diocese should, for the future, pay to their curates seventy-five pounds per annum instead of fifty pounds, as before allowed. In 1808 he was the promoter of a bill for securing the estates and funds.

 devised by the Rev. Richard Daniel, and to apply the profits to the relief of the poor of St. Luke's parish in the city of Dublin, the support of the Hospital for Incurables, and other charitable institutions. He died July 14, 1809. See D'Alton, Memoirs of the Archbishops of Dublin, p. 349.

Agar, John, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Newtonbrook, Canada, Feb. 10, 1848. He received an academic education; experienced religion at the age of seventeen; soon began preaching; about 1864 removed to New York State, and in 1870 was received into the Western New York Conference, wherein he labored until his death, at Kendall, Feb. 9, 1878. Mr. Agar was a young man of more than ordinary preaching abilities; his pulpit efforts were logical, Scriptural, and forcible; in his pastoral work he was systematic and faithful. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1878, p. 71.

Agar, Joseph, an English Wesleyan minister, was born in York. He was converted in his twenty-first year; entered the ministry in 1810; preached on the Driffield, Glasgow, and other circuits; and died suddenly in Portsmouth, Aug. 23, 1830, aged forty-two. "I scarcely ever knew a person who had fewer infirmities, nor were they of a nature to form any serious drawback on my great excellency of his Christian character" (Rev. Daniel Isaac). See Wesleyan Methodist Magazine, 1832, p. 161; Minutes of British Conference, 1831.

Agatha (or Agathe). Sr. (1.) The virgin martyred at Catania; passion commemorated Feb. 5. (2.) One commemorated April 2. See Smith, Dict. of Christ. Antig. s. v. The former is often figured in sacred art, either as a single figure or grouped with other saints. She usually bears in one hand the palm, in the other a dish or salver on which is the female breast, in addition to her torture. She often wears the crown of martyrdom. The shears, as the instrument of her torment, are frequently in her hand or beside her, at other times a book of devotion. She generally wears a long veil as a token of modesty. See Jamieson [Mrs.], Sacred and Legendary Art, p. 608 sq.

AGATHA'S (S'r) LETTERS, a superstitious charm against fire: the heathen took her vitae from her tomb to extinguish a conflagration. When Frederick II was about to lay Catania in flames, the legend says that at the reading of the Gospel he saw these words written in letters of gold on the book: "Harm not Agatha's birthplace, for she avenged injury."

Agathodorus, Sr., was the servant and fellow-martyr of St. Carpus (q. v.), bishop of Thyatira, in Asia. He was beheaded death April 13, 261, by command of Decius. See Baillet, i, 181, April 13; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Agathalyus, in Greek mythology, was a surname of Philo.

Agathangelus, an Armenian historian and secretary to Tiridates, first Christian king of that country, lived about (probably) 290. He wrote the Life of St. Gregory Illuminator, and History of the Introduction of Christianity into Armenia (Constantinople, 1709, 4to). The National Library of Paris has a copy of this book and a manuscript much more complete.

Agathangelus, Sr., deacon of St. Clement (bishop of Ancyra), who suffered with him a long and cruel martyrdom in the 4th century. The principal festival of these saints is kept by both Greeks and Latins Jan. 23. Their acts are mere fables, as Baronius allows. See Baillet, vol. i, Jan. 23. See AGATHUS.

Agathenae, Concilium. See AGDE, COUNCIL OF.

Agathy of Alexandria, a Christian martyr, was a man of arms in that city, and was condemned to lose his head for rebuking some lewd persons who were depriving the dead bodies of some of the Christians. This occurred in the middle of the 3d century. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, i, 182. He is commemorated in the Roman martyrology on Dec. 1. Another of the same name, a deacon, is commemorated April 4, and a third July 5.

Agatho of Constantinople was, first, reader in the Church of that city, then librarian, and lastly prothonotary and second chancellor. He was notary of the sixth holy and ecumenical synod (A.D. 680), and wrote out all the acts of that council, delivering a copy to each of the five patriarchs. In 712 he wrote his Libellum de Epitaphia, in which he narrates all that the tyrant Bardanes attempted against the council. See Cave, Hist. Lit. s. v.

Agathodemon, in Greek mythology, was the Grecian name for the Egyptian Kerph—snake. See EISCAPLUS. It was also a good deity to whose memory a glass of unmixed wine was drunk at the end of meals, and to whom a temple was built in Arcadia.

Agathon (αγαθον, good), a Greek term used by Basil the Great for the holy eucharist.

Agathonias, Sr., of Pergamus, the sister of St. Paphius, who, seeing her brother suffer courageously with St. Carpus and his companions, threw herself into the flames with them. She is commemorated April 13.

Agathonias, martyr, commemorated in the Byzantine calendar Aug. 22.

Agathopodes (more prop. Agathopous), Rhesus, was a deacon of Antioch, one of the two companions of St. Ignatius on his journey to his martyrdom at Rome, and one of the authors of the Acta of that martyrdom. He is not known to have been a martyr himself, although given by Baronius, Martyrology (April 25). He is mentioned in the first set of Pseudo-Ignatian epistles as an "elect man," who has "renounced life," etc., and is also represented in the second set of spurious epistles.

Agathus is commemorated as a Christian saint in some Latin martyrologies on May 8.

Agatkon was the same among the Iroquois as Nau-te-na among the American tribes generally.

Againe (or St. MAURICE EN VALAIS), Concilium of (Concilium Agatenuense).

I. Held on May 14, 523 (according to others, April 30, 515 or 516); nine (others say sixty) bishops were present. The continual psalmody ("Laws Perennis") established in this monastery upon the plan of the Ascemitian monks at Constantinople, was here confirmed by Sigismund, king of Burgundy.

II. Held in 888, in which Rodolf was elected and crowned king of Burgundy. See Greg. Turon. p. 107, 108, AGDE, COUNCIL OF (Concilium Agathenchse), was held on Sept. 10 or 11, 506. Twenty-four bishops were present, and ten deputes of absent bishops from different provinces of Gaul, which at this time was under the dominion of the Visigoths. Omarius, bishop of Arles, presided. In this council the discipline of the Church was treated of, and forty-seven canons were drawn up, confirming the discipline already established in many other councils. Of these, the 12th enjoins fasting every day in Lent, Sundays excepted. The 16th forbids the making any person deacon under twenty-five years of age without the consent of his wife, and a promise of continence. The 17th forbids ordination of bishops or priests under thirty years of age. The 18th orders all lay persons to communicate at Christmas, Easter, and Whitsun-tide. The 19th forbids any woman to take the veil under forty years of age. The 20th forbids the clergy to wear long hair, and orders the archdeacon to cause that of the disobedient to be cut. The 27th forbids the establishment of any monastery without the consent of the bishop, and the ordination of a monk without the consent of his abbot. The 31st orders that those persons have been in a seminary for a long time shall refuse to be reconciled, shall be excommunicated. The 34th orders that converted Jews shall remain eight months in the rank of catechumens before they are baptized. The 39th forbids persons in holy orders to attend wedding festivities. The 44th forbids a priest to bless the people at a penitent in church. See Labbé and Couturat, Concilium Sacrum, iv, 1381.

Agdus, an immense mythical stone from which Deucalion and Pyrrha took those which they threw over their heads to people the world. Jupiter, enamoured of this stone, changed it into a woman, who bore to him Agdistis.

Agel. See ROXAL.

Agelénthus (Ethelnothus, Egelinotus, or Aglinoth), summoned "the Good," was archbishop of Canterbury in 1020. According to some, he was a Beneficent of the Abbey of Glastonbury, and dean of that cathedral. He went to Rome in 1022 to receive the pall from the pope, and upon his return is said to have brought from Favia an arm of St. Augustine, bishop of Hippo, for which he paid one hundred talents of silver. This he presented to Leofric, earl of Coventry, together with a work which he composed on the subject. He died Oct. 29, 1089. He left a volume of Letters, and a work in Praise of the Blessed Virgin, addressed to Fulbertus, bishop of Chartres. See Godwin, De Presul. Angl. Comment.; Pilcuse, De Illust. Angl. Script.

Aggailia, a name given to Pluto from his disposal of the dead.

Agès (or Agétis), in ancient Paganism, was a mythical personage, son of Apollo and Cyrine, and brother of Aristheus.

Aggravation, in ecclesiastical usage, is a term given (1) to the threat to fulminate excommimation after three injunctions to obey the Church. The aggravation may not be published by the minister without the order of the official. (2) The extreme penalty of the major excommunication (i.e. the stoppage of all intercourse between the excommunicated party and the body of the faithful). The word in this sense has now no use.

Aghori is a name of a Hindó sect professing complete worldly indifference. The original Aghori worship seems to have been that of Devi, in some of her terrible forms, and to have required even human victims for its performance. Dr. Horace Wilson thus describes their practices: "The regular worship of this sect has long been suppressed, and the early traces of it now left are presented by a few disgusting wretches who, while they profess to have adopted its tenets, make them a mere plea for extorting alms. In proof of their indifferently worldly objects, they eat and drink whatever is given to them, even ordure and carrion. They smear the body with excrement, and carry it about with them in a wooden cup or skull, either to swallow it for the purpose of obtaining alms, or to throw it upon the persons or into the houses of those who refuse to comply with their demand. They also for the same purpose make inflict gashes on their limbs, that the crime of blood may rest upon the head of the recusant, and they have a variety of similar disgusting devices to extort money from the timid and credulous Hindús. They are, fortunately, not numerous, and are universally detested and feared."

Agiasma (or rather Hagiiasma, ἁγιασμα), in the name into the Seventy to the sanctuary in the Old Testament, and applied by the early Church to the altar; called also Agion (q. v.).

Agest, in Cabalistical mythology, is the intelligence of the planet Saturn.

Agil (or St. Aisle) was the son of Agnoald, councilor of Hildebert, who was persuaded by his friend Colmanus to devote his child at an early age to the monastic life. Accordingly, Agil entered the Monastery of Luxebé about 590, and in 615 was appointed by a synod of the Frankish churches to accompany Eustacius (q. v.) on a missionary tour in Bavaria. Having considerable success, he undertook, at the request of Dagobert (q. v.), the supervision of the Monastery of Meaux, about 656. He continued till advanced age to carry on missionary labors.

Agilbert (or Adilbert), a Roman Catholic prelate, was probably a native of Paris. He appears in Bede, first as "pontifex quidam, natione Gallus," from which he is supposed to have been consecrated by French bishops without any see. After studying in Ireland, he went to Wessex about 648, and was appointed by king Cenwalch bishop of the West Saxons. Being unable to learn English, the king gave half of his diocese to Wina, which so displeased Agilbert that he left Wessex and went to Northumbria, whence, after taking part with Wilfrid and his own priest Agatho at the Synod of Streansea in 664, he returned to France. He was made bishop of Paris in 668, and still later declined the invitation of Cenwalch to return to Wessex. The year of his death is unknown, but it occurred in the Monastery of Jouarre, Oct. 11. It is questionable whether he is the Agilbert who, according to Fredegar, was sent in 680 by Ebroin to duke Martin to deceive him by taking a false oath on an empty reliquary.

Agles, Raymon (summande de Podio because he was a canon of Puy-en-Velay), went to the Holy Land in 1096 as chaplain to Aimer de Monteil, the apostolic legate. He was present at the taking of Jerusalem, and wrote a history of the proceeding entitled Gesta Dei per Francos (printed in the collection of Bongars).

Agilmare (or Almar), a French prelate, was bishop of Clermont in the 9th century. Driven from his diocese by the Normans, he took refuge in the county of Amaons, where he brought the relics of Sts. Ilia and Vincent. He deposited these in two great churches which became the nucleus of large villages. In the Assembly of Pavia, Agilmare had a number of prelates who promised fidelity to Charles the Bald, and in 878 he sent, in behalf of Louis the Stammerer, a letter to pope John VII, of which a long fragment may be found in Gallia Christiana, and in Acta Sanctorum, i. 13. He signed the acts of the Council of Meun-on-the-Loire in 891. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Agilus. See Agil, St.

Agiotis (or rather Hagiotas, ἄγιοι, σινιά) was one of the common appellations of Christians, and current among them at the date of the apostolical epistles. Subsequently it was used as one of the names of the baptized or faithful, in contradiction to the catechumens. We also find this word and the superlative ἄγιοστορον employed as epithets of bishops. See Saint.

Agionites (or Agionenses), a sect which appeared in the 7th century, and which pretended to more than ordinary sanctity. It is but little known, appears to have had but few followers, and was condemned in the Council of Gangra, together with the Encratites, Manichaes, and Montanists.

Agiotatos (or rather Hagiotatos, ἄγιοστορον, most holy), a title used in the early Church in addressing or speaking of bishops. — Bingham, Christ. Antiq. bk. ii. ch. ix. § 6.

Agius, a priest and monk of the Monastery of Corby, in Saxony. He lived in the 9th century, and wrote a history of the Life of St. Bathwulma, the first abbot of Gandersheim, his friend; also a Dialogue, in elegiac verse, on her death, which happened in A.D. 874. The two works are published by D. Bernard. See Pez, Anecdotes, vol. ii;

Aglaia, in Greek mythology, was one of the Graces or Charities, so called because of her cheerfulness, beauty, and worth. Homer says she was the wife of Vulcan.

Aglaonice. See Aga nice.

Aglaopheme, in Greek mythology, was the name of one of the sirens.

Agloby, George, was the eighth dean of Canterbury, by appointment of Charles I, but was never installed, nor received any advantage from it, as the Parliament had, in 1642, seized on the profits of those capitolary bodies which were in their power. He survived his nomination but a few months, dying at Oxford, in November, 1643.

Aglonby, John, an eminent English divine, was born about 1588, and was admitted into Queen's College, Oxford, in 1588. Being elected fellow, he took orders, and afterwards travelled abroad, where he made the acquaintance of the famous Bellarmino. On his return, he was made chaplain in ordinary to queen Elizabeth, and in 1600 took his D.D. About the same time he became master of Ialip, and in 1601 he was elected principal of St. Edmund's Hall. He was also chaplain in ordinary to king James I, and died at Ialip, Feb. 6, 1609. He was eminent for his learning, deeply read in the fathers, and is given by Wood (Amm tail) as one of the Oxford divines who were to translate the Gospels, Acts, and Apocalypse.

Agna (in Lat. Ani rius), Sr. bishop of Orleans, demanded aid from Attilla against Attila, who was obliged to abandon the siege of the place. It is said that the governor was attacked with a serious malady, and, believing his recovery to be due to the prayers of the priest, set the prisoners free. It was in memory of this action that the bishops of Orleans had, on the day of their entry into the village, the privilege not only of delivering all the prisoners, but those in the province of Orleans who had been detained for certain crimes. The Huguenots in 1562 invaded the tomb of Agnan, and burned his remains. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Agnani, Council of (Concilium Agnaniun), was held on April 14, 1166, at Rome, to condemn certain bishops and cardinals in this council, excommunicated the emperor Frederick, and absolved all his subjects from their oath of fidelity to him. — Landon, Manual of Councils, s. v.

Agnellii, an Italian Franciscan, was born at Pisa about 1194, and becoming acquainted in early life with Francis of Assisi, was by him appointed warden of the newly erected convent of his followers at Paris. He was afterwards sent, with the title of provincial minister, to found the Order of Franciscan Friars in England. This mission landed at Dover in September, 1224, and after proceeding to the Nore, a Mr. Agnellii remained there. Others went to London, Oxford, and Cambridge. Agnellii died at Oxford at an early period of his mission, worn out with fatigue by a journey into Wales. See Brit. Mus. and York Minster Libr. i. 10.

Agnellii, Giuseppe, a learned Italian monk, was born at Naples in 1621, and entered the Jesuit Society in 1637. For five years he taught moral theology, afterwards was employed in preaching, and governed the colleges of Monte-Pulciano, Macerata, and Ancona. The last thirty years of his life he passed among the Society of Jesuits at Rome, where he died, Oct. 8. 1706. Among his many works, the most celebrated is Il Pornico, or St. Jerome, Ravenna. He was made abbot of the monasteries when very young, and even before he had taken the religious vow. He occupied the tenth place among the priests of Ravenna, under Petroniacus, from A.D. 821 to 857, and wrote a history of the prelates who governed the Church of Ravenna before him. Entitled Agnellii, qui est Andrea, Abbatis St. Mariae ad Blackneros, Liber Pontificialis, sive Vite Pontificum Ravennaturn. This work was first made public by the abbot Benedict Bacchini at Modena in 1708. Muratori printed it in vol. ii, pt. i, of Scriptores Rerum Italicarum. The father of Agnellii having conspired against the pope, Paul I, he was taken to Rome, where he died in prison. This treatment rendered the son less favorable to the interests of the court of Rome, and his writings were regarded as outrages against the pontifical authority. Moreri has confirmed this archbishop with the preceding. See Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Agnellus, archbishop of Ravenna, was born in A.D. 486 or 487. He was consecrated at an early age, and held a considerable wealth. On the death of his wife, he entered holy orders, and became prefectus of the Church of St. Agatha. He was consecrated bishop in 556, and held his bishopric until his death, in 569. In addition to efficient work in his diocese, he wrote Epistola de Ratione Fidelitatis et Armeniis, against Arianism. See Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 629; Rubens, Hist. Ravenni, iii. 162.

Agnes, Sr. (1), a virgin who at the age of twelve (or thirteen) was beheaded at Rome, under Diocletian. The acts of her martyrdom said to have been written by Ambrose are spurious, but the substance of her history, as given by Prudentius (14th hymn, Περί Στρεγανών) and Ambrose (De Virginitate, lib. i), amount to this: St. Agnes, having refused to profess the profession of Chastity, was persecuted by her superiors. She was sentenced by the judge to be confined in a brothel, and one who tried to outrage her there was struck with blindness, but was restored through her intercession. This miracle, however, did not save her life, for shortly after, having refused to offer incense to idols, she suffered martyrdom. A church at Rome in her honor, said to have been built in the time of Constantine, was repaired by pope Honorius in A.D. 625-688, and another was built at Rome by Innocent X. The Latin, Greek, and Anglican churches celebrate her festival Jan. 21; the Greeks also Jan. 14 and July 5, and the Latins Jan. 28. Her name stands on the black-letter calendar of the English Prayer-book on Jan. 21, and it is one of four (St. Margaret's, St. Lucy's, and St. Agatha's days being the other three) appointed in England by the Synod of Worcester, under Walter de Cantilupe, in 1240. See Baillie, "Vita des Saints, January 21; Butler, Lives; Ruinart, Acta Sinc. p. 457; Moréri, who cites Bollandus, Acta, April.

St. Agnes was the favorite saint of the Roman women. Her effigy is found on the ancient glass and earth-ware of the Christians of the 3d century. She bears the palm as martyr, but seldom the book, or accompanied by the lamb; these two last were symbols. When alone, she is generally placed between two trees; sometimes she is at the side of the Virgin Mary; sometimes between the Lord and St. Lawrence, between St. Vincent and St. Hippolytus, between St. Peter and St. Paul. See Jameson (Mrs.), Sacred and Legend. Art. p. 600 sq.

St. Agnes, with Doves on either side, bearing the Crowns of Chastity and Martyrdom. (From an ancient glass vessel.)

Agnes, St. (2), of Monte-Pulciano, in Tuscany, was born in 1274, and at nine years of age entered the convent of the Order of St. Francis, called Sacchine, or Sackins, because they wore scapulars of coarse linen, such as sacks are made of. At fourteen she became cellarius of the house, and subsequently abbess of another house at Proceno. Lastly, she established a monastery at Monte-Pulciano in accordance with the rule of St. Benedict and the institution of St. Dominic. She died April 20, 1317, and was buried in her convent; but the building having been given in 1435 to the monks of St. Dominic, they removed her remains to the high-altar. St. Agnes was canonized by Benedict XIII in 1726, and her festival is kept on April 20. See Baillie, April 20;

Agno (or Agnes), Juan Bautista, a Spanish priest, was born at Valencia, and lived about 1550. He wrote many works in prose and verse, among them being an Apologiafilm Puniciricorum de Laudibus D. Hieronymi, etc. See Moréri, who cites Biblioth. Hisp.

Agnew, John Holmes, D.D., an American Congregational minister, teacher, and editor, was born at Gettysburg, Pa., June 13, 1804. His first editorial charge was at Uniontown, Pa.; he was elected professor in Marion College, Mo.; in Newark College, Del.; and in Washington College, Pa. He had for many years devoted himself to literary and educational pursuits, being at one time editor of the Eclectic Magazine, and afterwards for several years principal of a female seminary at Pittsfield, Mass. Subsequently he engaged unsuccessfully in some coal-mine speculations, in 1860 became secretary of the Southern Aid Society, and in 1865 took charge of the American Federal Monthly, a continuation of the old Knickerbocker Magazine. He died at Peeksskill, N. Y., Oct. 12, 1865. See Appleton's Annual Cyclopædia, 1866, p. 652; Princeton Sem. Gen. Catalogue, 1872, p. 48.

Agni is the Vedic name of the Supreme Being under the character of the deity of fire; the analogy of the Hephastus of the Greeks.

Agni, Tommaso, an Italian prelate, of Leonforte, in Sicily, died about 1231, the foundations of the house belonging to his order (the Dominican). He was made titular bishop of Bethlehem in 1255, and appointed legate of the Roman see in the Holy Land. He was afterwards made archbishop of Cosenza, and in 1272 Latin patriarch of Jerusalem by Jean d'Acre, which he held together. He died in 1277, leaving a Life of Peter the Martyr, given in the Acts of the Saints, April, vol. iii. See Moréri, who cites Échard.

Agnitus is commemorated as a Christian saint in the Roman martyrology on Aug. 16.

Ago (or Hago), in Greek mythology, was one of the twelve gods who nursed Jupiter. She gave her name to a fountain, concerning which many fabulous wonders are told.

Agoetes (or Agnoites), a school of Alexandrian monophysites, for which see THEMISTIANS.

Agno, Aniello Floré, a Neapolitan sculptor, flourished about the 16th century. He executed two works in the Church of San Domenico Maggiore at Naples, which, according to Cicognara, possess considerable merit in design—one a basso-relievo, dated 1470; the other a Virgin and Infant, with two angels, on the monument of Mariano Albero.

Agno, Baccio d', an Italian wood-carver, sculptor, and architect, was born at Florence in 1460. He gained considerable distinction in wood-carving, and then went to Rome to study architecture. He still carried on his former occupation, and his studio was the resort of such artists as Michael Angelo, Sansovino, the brothers Sangallo, and others. On his return to Florence he devoted himself chiefly to architecture, and planned many of the finest palaces and villas of the city. He introduced the fashion of applying frontispieces of columns to the doors and windows of private residences, which had hitherto been confined to churches. A much-admired work by this artist is the campanile, or bell-tower, of the Church di Santo Spirito in Florence. He died in 1543, leaving three sons, architects, one of whom, Giuliano, completed his father's unfinished works.

Agnostics. See SKEPTICISM, LATEST FORMS OF.

Agnisāṭra is a class of worlds, according to the Buddhist system of religion. The Buddhists reckon that there are innumerable systems of worlds, each system having its own earth, sun, and moon. The space in which the light of one sun or moon extends is called a Sakwala, and includes an infinite number of continents, islands, and oceans, as well as a series of hells and heavens. The Sakwala systems are divided into three classes, of which the Agnīsāṭra denote those systems which receive the ordinances of Buddha, or to which his authority extends. These systems are a hundred thousand kelus in number, each kelu being ten millions.

Agoardus, S.T., with St. Agilbertus, came into France from beyond the Rhine, about the 5th century, and suffered martyrdom under the Vandals, in company with many other Christians. Their bodies were buried at Creteuil, about two leagues from Paris. The modern Roman martyrology commemorates them June 24. See Baillie, June 24; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Agon, one of the inferior ministers employed in the ancient Roman sacrifices, whose office it was to strike the victim. The name is probably derived from the question which he put to the priest, Agon, "Shall I strike?"

Agoniales, in Roman antiquity, were festivals celebrated on Jan. 9, May 21, and Dec. 11 in each year in honor of Janus, whom the Romans invoked before undertaking any affair of importance. Ovid, in his Fasti (i, 319-322), mentions various etymologies of the word.

Agonius (also Enagonius), in Greek and Roman mythology, were surnames of those gods that protected the soldiers in battle. Jupiter was also specially so called as the god of battle. Mercury also was so designated as manager of the Olympic games.

Aargonotheta (or Agonosthes, from ἁγωνόθητα, a contest, and ἐν ἱσε, to place), in Grecian antiquity was the president or superintendent of the sacred games. At first the person who instituted the games and decreed the rules was the Agonotheta. He was later in the great public games, such as the Olympic, Pythian, etc., these presidents were the representatives of different states, or were chosen from the people in whose country the games were celebrated. They received the several titles of ἀγωνικέα, βαιδεμάρτην, ἱερονόμων, ἀγωνολόγων, αὐτοκτόνοι. They were also called ποδόσκευοι or ἕξωδεμανοι, from the rod or sceptre emblematic of their authority.

Agonolites (Gr. ἄγωνι, and ὁ λίθος), a fanatical sect which arose in the beginning of the 8th century. Their peculiar tenet was that people ought not to pray kneeling, but standing or dancing. They were not numerous, and were condemned by a council held at Jerusalem in 726.

Agop, John, an Armenian priest, lived at Rome in the latter half of the 17th century. He wrote an Armenian Grammar (Rome, 1674) — a Latin Grammar (ibid. 1675), in Armenian; — and an Italian translation of the correspondence of Constantine the Great and of pope Sylvester with Tiridates, king of Armenia (Venice, 1688). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Agoreus, in Greek mythology, was an appellation given to those deities who had statues in the public markets or fairs. Thus Mercury Agoreus was to be found at Athens, Sicyon, Thebes, Sparta, etc.; and thus Minerva Agorea was in extraordinary veneration among the Lacedaemonians.

Agostino, Paolo, an eminent Italian musician, was born at Valerano in 1593. He was the scholar of Bernardo Nanini, and the successor of Soriano in the pontifical chapel. His death occurred in 1629. Antonio Liberati considered him as one of the most scientific and ingenious composers of his time; and adds that when he was master of the chapel of St. Peter's Church at Rome, he astonished the world with his productions for four, six, and eight choirs or choruses. Father Martinini, who was the successor to him in this office of musicology, has inserted an Agus, in eight parts, of this composer. See also Augustino.

Agotikon, in North American mythology, was a name by which the Iroquois called the inhabitants of the lower heaven, i.e. spirits of the second order, which name also fortune-tellers and sorcerers received, who were said to associate with these spirits.

Agoyeh is the fetiche of the negroes of Vidah, a monkey-like statue made of black clay, and seated upon a red chair, which is ornamented with red bands, cloths, feathers, etc. On its head is the point of a spear.

Agraeum, or Agronaeum, St., was made bishop of Chalon-sur-Saône in 532. He was present at many councils, built a church supported by pillars, and ornamented with marble and mosaic. A man of rare mental qualities, he united to them solid piety and great self-denial. He died A.D. 580, in his eighty-third year. His festival is celebrated March 17, the supposed day of his death. See Baillet, March 17; Greg. Turon. Hist. Franc. v, 46;

Agraeus, in Greek mythology, was (1) a name given Apollo from his feeding cattle; (2) also a name of the god Aristaeus.

Agrain, Eustachie d', constable and vicerey of Jerusalem during the first Crusade, was of a noble family of Vivarais. He set out for the Holy Land in 1096 with Raymond, count of Toulouse. His exploits were of value to him, besides the viceroyalty of Jerusalem, and the principality of Sidon and of Cæsarea, which he transmitted to his children. He was summoned l’Épée et le Bouclier de la Palestine. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Agrate, Marco Ferrerio, an Italian sculptor, lived near the close of the 15th century. He executed several works in the cathedral at Milan, among which is the celebrated statue of St. Bartholomeus Flagged. It is worked in marble with much care, but is devoid of taste.

Agrath was the name of one of the four females to whom the Jewish rabbins attribute the honor of being the mother of angels. The other three are Lillith, Eve, and Nasmah. See ANGES.

Agraulus, in Greek mythology, was a surname of Minerva, derived from a similar name in Attica.

Agreement of Sandomir. See SANDOMIR.

Agrebus, in North American mythology, was the god of war among the Iroquois, and at the same time their supreme God.

Agrast, Livio da Forli, an Italian painter, was born at Forli, a town in the Roman territory. He studied under Pierino del Vaga at Rome. He was employed by pope Gregory XIII in the great works that were executed by his order in the Vatican. On the staircase is a grand fresco painting by him, representing Philip of Arragon submitting his kingdom to the dominion of pope Eugenius III. There are also some of his works in the churches of the public places of this city. His best works are in his native city, Forli, where he painted in the chapel of the cathedral the Last Supper, and some admirable figures of the prophets. He died at Rome in 1580.

Agregus (the hunter), in Greek mythology, was the surname of Parn and Aristeus.

Agrania, in Greek Paganism, was a festival in honor of deceased persons in Argos; also certain prize-fights among the Argives.

Agriclius, bishop of Treves and confessor, is celebrated in some old martyrologies under date of Jan. 18.

Agricli, the name of several persons of whom little is known. (1.) A martyr in Africa, commemoration Nov. 3. (2.) Saint, born Dec. 5. (3.) A martyr in Auvergne, Dec. 9. (4.) A martyr at Ravenna, Dec. 16.

Agricola, St., of Bologna, Italy, was martyred with his slave Vitalis, by crucifixion, A.D. 304. Their bodies, it is said, were interred in ground belonging to the Jews, where they remained concealed until they themselves revealed the fact to St. Eusebius. The latter is reported to have raised their bodies, and to have taken away a few drops of St. Agricola's blood and some of the wood of his cross, which he placed in the altar of a new church at Florence, at the dedication of which he preached a sermon, An Exhortation to Vir-AGRICOLA, Magnus, a learned Benedictine, was born at Augsburg, Sept. 11, 1640. He was professor of philosophy at the University of Salzburg, and retired to the Abbey of St. Ulrich at St. Ulrich, April 5, 1708. He wrote, Sententiae Philosophicae IV Libellorum Comprehensae (1671):—Quaestiones Naturales Mixtae de Principiis et Lib. I et II Physicorum (1674):—Tractatus de Artibus Humanis. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bioe. Générale, s. v.

Agricola, Michael, a learned Swede, was born in Finland, near the commencement of the 16th century. He studied theology under Luther at the University of Wittenberg, and was made rector in 1538. In 1554 Gustavus I appointed him bishop of Abo, and sent him to preach Christianity to the Laplanders. He died in 1557. He is known as the translator of the New Test. into Finnish, which was printed at Stockholm, in 4to, in 1548. The preface to the first edition states that the translation was made from the Greek, with the aid of the Latin, German, and Swedish versions.

Agricola, Rudolph (originally Roodt Huysman), a distinguished Dutch philosopher and theologian, was born at Balfour, near Groningen, in 1443. He was educated at Louvain, where he graduated as A.M. He afterwards studied at Paris, and at Ferrara, in Italy. He returned to Holland in 1479, and soon after became syndic of Groningen. In 1482 he became professor at Heidelberg, where he died in 1485. His principal work is the De Inventione Dialectica, in which he attacks the scholastic philosophy of his day. He also opposed the ceremony of the mass, and denounced all the other ceremonies.

Agrionia were festivals celebrated annually by the Boeotians in honor of Dionysus, in which they held the women, after playfully preceding for some time to search for that god, desisted, saying that he had hidden himself among the women. They were solemnized at night by the women in the presence of the god. The festival was inherited by the daughters of Minyas, having disposed the rites of the god, were seized with frenzy and ate the flesh of one of their children, and that the Agrionia were celebrated in expiation of the offence. A singular feature of the festival was the assembling of maidens of the family of Minyas in front of the temple, whence the maidens were flown, followed by a priest with a sword, who would kill any of the maidens he might overtake.

Agrippa Castor, an ecclesiastical writer who flourished in the reign of Hadrian (about A.D. 135), and is highly spoken of by Eusebius and St. Jerome. He is the first who is said to have written against heresy, and wrote a most accurate Confutation of the Epigraphi at Polemics, which remains important in Eusebius (iv. 7). Theodoret seems to imply that he wrote another work in refutation of Isidorus, the son of Basilides. See Cave, Historia Literaria, Sec. II, i, 57.

Agrippa von Nettersheim, Heinrich Cornelius, a German philosopher, theologian, and chemist, was born in Cologne, Sept. 14, 1486. Having been a distiller of the paradise in the Society of Francis, he fled to Paris, where his public discourses gained him a professorship of theology at Dôle. Accused of heresy and magic, he fled to England in 1510, and afterwards returned to Cologne and became secretary to Maximilian. He subsequently studied and practiced medicine, and was a distinguished student of universities. He wrote several works on natural sciences. His work De Incertitudine et Vanitate Scientiarum (Paris, 1581) is a satire on the state of knowl-
AGUDI

AGUDI, LUIGI MARIA, an Italian divine, was a native of Milan. He was at first a Barefooted Carmelite, and was considered one of the first preachers and theologians throughout Italy during the 17th century. He taught theology at Naples and Bologna; but applying himself subsequently to preaching, he addressed vast crowds at Como, Naples, Verona, Milan, Venice, and other Italian cities. After being a Carmelite for twenty-nine years, and filling the office of prior, provincial vicar, definator, and visitor, he assumed the habit of the Dominicans, by permission of the pope, in 1663, in the Convent of Santa Maria at Milan. His works are, Carmelus Sapientis, sive de Scriptoribus Utriusque Carmelitani, etc.—Fontes Salvatoris, sive de Sacramentis, in Genera et Species, etc. (Lugd. 1683, 4to);—De Justitia et Jure, de Restitutione, de Contractibus.—De Christo.—Ann. Bibliothecae.—Quadragimales, sermons for all the Sundays of the year.—Sito Sermoum, or homilies gathered from the early fathers.

Agulli was a saint of the Kalams. He is represented as a man sitting on a chair with a cup in his hands.

Agüier, François, a celebrated French sculptor, was born in 1604 at the town of Eu, in Normandy. He studied under Simon Guillaume, of Paris. He practiced some time in England, and afterwards went to Rome, where he remained two years. He acquired the reputation of one of the best sculptors of his age in France. He died at Paris in 1669. His best works are a marble crucifix in the Church of the Sorbonne:—the mausoleum of cardinal de Berulle, in the Church of St. Oronoré, Rue St. Honoré, and that of the duke of Longueville, and the tomb of the duke Bohan, in the Church of the Celestines at Paris.

Agüila (Terrone del Cagno), Francisco, was bishop of Leon, in Spain, and was originally of Iliturgi or Anduxar, in the diocese of Jaén. He was preacher to king Philip II; held the chair of theology at Granada; and was made first bishop of Tui, and lastly of Leon. He died in 1615, and left an Instruction for Preachers and some other works.

Agüiol, Grace, an English Jewish authoress, was born at Hackney, near London, June 2, 1616. She was a descendant of a family of Hebrew merchants in Spain, who had fled from that country on account of religious persecution, and found a refuge in England. She died at Frankfort, in Germany, Sept. 16, 1647. A writer in the Jewish Chronicle in 1874 says—

"No Jewish female author has attained the general and popular celebrity achieved by Grace Aguillo. Her numerous literary productions have been read and appreciated in England, America, Germany, and France. Her Women of Israel is a work stamped with the most ardent zeal and fervent pietie, in every line of which breathe the national sentiments and patriotism which are the characteristics of her writings. It is a book teeming with powerful lessons to her own sex and eloquent exhortation to the desired to elevate the character of the women of Israel. She has shown that when all the nations of the East regarded females, the civilized Jews preserved them an equality in civil and religious institutions suitable to women's mind and to their special mission. She has also demonstrated that many women in Israel have been the exponents of the noblest sentiments and the most sublime actions. Her spirit of patriotism is like the works of considerable merit, and full of that pious fervor and filial affection which carry the reader along with her and impress him with profound sympathy for the writer. Her Jewish Faith displays signs of no mean acumen and with settled philosophers and divines, and its logical reasoning is far from betraying the sex of the author. With all her abilities, which were of no ordinary range, she was humble and unassuming, kind to all, and greatly attached to her parents. The ambition of Grace Aguillo was neither for wealth, for reputation, nor for distinction. The pure consciousness of raising the literary and religious character of the Jewish race resulted generally from her own and a desire concerning her special interest at the same time her guiding motive and her reward."

Agüirre, Pedro Sanchez de, was a native of Yucatan, in America, who, when canon of Los Charcas, in Peru, wrote a book (in Latin and Spanish) entitled Informe contra Idolorum Cultores del Obispado de Yucatan (Madrid, 1698, 4to). The work relates to the powers of bishops and the necessity of punishing idolatry. See Antonio, Biblioth. Hisp. ii, 191.

Agullannef (A-gui-Tan-neuf), an old cry used on Jan. 1 as a mode of rejoicing. It is derived from the Druids, who at the beginning of the year distributed the blessed mistletoe to the people, announcing at the same time the new year. In Brittany, Picardy, and Burgundy the children are said still to sing these words on New-year's day.

The name was also given to a collection made in some dioceses on Jan. 1 to procure candles for the churches. Young persons of both sexes took part in it, and were apt to commit, even in the churches, all sorts of extravagances. The Synod of Angers, in 1256, prohibited these proceedings and the use of the custom; but the custom still continued out of them until a later synod (1668) forbade the observance of it altogether. See Moréi, who cites Thiers, Traité des Jésus.

Aguilllon (or Aguillon), François d', a Belgian Jesuit, was born at Brussels in 1567. He first introduced the study of mathematics among the Jesuits of the Low Countries, taught philosophy at Douay, and theology at Antwerp, where he was rector of the college. He died at Seville in 1617. He wrote, Opticorum Lib. VI Philosophica Juxta Arithmeticae Utilis (Antwerp, 1615, fol.). This work contains the first mention of stereographic projection. This was known from the time of the Arabs; but had never been expounded in an extended manner. Aguillon worked on catoptrics and dioptries until his death. See Hoefner, Novi. Bkd. Générale, s. v.

Aguirre, Gaspar Salcedo de, was professor of theology in the University of Baccia, Spain, and prior of St. Idefonso at Jaén, in the 17th century. He wrote, Allusiones N. Testamenti ad Verum (1698)—A Relation of Some Remarkable Matters Concerning the Kingdom and Bishops of Judæ (in Spanish, 1614, 8vo)—Pliego de Cartas (1694). See Antonio, Biblioth. Hisp. i, 407.

Aguirre, Juan, a Spanish sculptor, was born at Seville, and was the scholar and son-in-law of Matteo Inverro. He executed the tabernacle of the Church of Villacastin, with the statues of the evangelists and six other saints, in 1594, which, according to Bermuder, Ahavanya, in Hindū mythology, is the fire worshipped by the Indians.

Ahhotep (Fields of Peace), a locality in the Egyptian mythology, mentioned in the Ritual of the Dead. Comp. A. H. Gardiner (Peace of Aah).

Ahi (Assistant), a title of the Egyptian deity Horus, as the performer of the religious rites called the Assurances of Horus to his father Osiris. He is called also Lord of the Heart, and is mentioned in chapter cl of the Egyptian Ritual of the Dead.

Ahi is a name for the serpent mentioned in the Rig-Veda as the chief of the Asuras.

Ahimnus, bishop of Asugga, in the province of Zengit, Africa (together with Fortunatus, Optatus, and other bishops) was excommunicated by Carthianus as a heretic and expelled on November 1, 379. He died in August 382. See also Ahi, of which this name is the feminine form.

Ahlwart, Peter, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born Feb. 14, 1710, at Greifswalde. He studied at his native place as well as at Jena. His lectures on the First Article of the Catholic Apostles' Creed were published in 1731. He wrote, Diss. de Davide, Prudentia Politica, Practica in Causa Homicidiorum a Joabo Commissorum (Gryph. 1738) — Testamen Metaphysicum de Subordinatione Finium Primorum, Secundum quo Homines suus Tentatur Componere Actiones (ibid. 1734) — Diss. de Necessitate Dei. Quia Haec, 6, 8, 9 (ibid. ecol.) — Propr. de Immortalitate Animae Humanae, ex Ratione Demonstrata (ibid. 1735) — Diss. de Duratione rerum et Mundi per se nulla (ibid. 1738, 1738), etc. See Döring, Die gekrönten Theologen Deutschlands, i, sq. Ahmed, a name by which MOHAMMED is mentioned in the Koran. In chapter lix it is written, "Jesus, the son of Mary, said, O children of Israel, verily, I am the apostle of God sent unto you, confirming the law, which was delivered before me, and bringing good tidings of an apostle who shall come after me, and whose name shall be AHMED." Mohammedan writers endeavor to confirm this alleged prediction by the words of Jesus as recorded in John xvii, 7, "Nevertheless I tell you the truth; it is expedient for you that I go away: for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart, I will send him unto you." This Comforter, or Paraclete, they transform into Periclete, the Illustrious, and add all explaining as referring to Mohammed.

Ahriman, in Persian mythology, is the evil spirit according to Zoroaster's system of religion. The eternal god Zermene Akterne created light and darkness (or Ormuzd) and Ahriman, both of whom are eternal and only limited by one another. Both of these were living alone and separate, Ormuzd in light and Ahriman in darkness. Then God created the earth, in order that the good might combat with and overcome the evil. He divided the period of the earth's existence into four great ages of three thousand years each. In the first age, light was to rule; in the second, darkness besieged by the light; in the third, light and darkness alternately; in the fourth, the same, ending in the full sway of the light. Ormuzd created in the first age all that can be seen, over against which Ahriman placed a frightful creation of darkness, but although having a combat that either in the first nor in the second age, although he was asked to do so by his genii. At the end of the second age, feeling himself strong enough, he began war with Ormuzd; he entered heaven himself, but alone, and, filled with wonder and amazement, was thrown down upon the earth. Here he made fire impure by smoke and steam.
devastated everything, and enveloped all things in a thick darkness, until he was driven back by Ormuzd and thrown out of the eternal abyss. Ahriman, however, roused himself, reached the earth, and made it his habitation. Now the third age began, in which Ahriman created an evil spirit for every good spirit created. In the fourth age he is to obtain the superiority, and will cause a comet to fall upon the earth, which will set it on fire, and change it into a smoking dunghill that shall fall into the eternal pit. In this way the kingdom of darkness becomes the kingdom of light; the evil spirits are purified and become good spirits beside the throne of God. See ORMUZD.

Ahti, an ancient Egyptian goddess, having the head of a cobra and the body of a hippopotamus. She was one of the Typhonic or malevolent deities.

Ahun, an ancient Egyptian deity; another name of the god Atum or Tutu, the setting sun.

Ahuramazda (Wise Spirit) was the great and beneficent creator of good in the Zendic mythology. He was called also "The Good Spirit," and he has been considered as in some points resembling the Assyrian deity Adad. The world was created for him in the residence of mankind, and all the good angels were made by him also. His chief mission, however, was to preserve the human race and to defeat the evil being, Ahriman. His name is often contracted into Ormuzd (q. v.).

Ahuta, in Hindu mythology, is one of the five great sacrificial limbs which the Brahminicus performs daily. It consists in the reading of the holy books.

Ahzab, the name given to the sixty equal portions into which the Mohammadans have divided the Koran, probably in imitation of the Jews, who divided the Mishna into the same number of parts. See KORAN.

Ai. Lieut. Conder reports the existence, near the modern village of Deir-Diwaïn, of the remains of a large town, bearing the name Haiydn, which closely approaches Aina, the form under which Ai appears in the writings of Josephus. Rock-cut tombs and ancient cisterns, with three great reservoirs cut in the hard limestone, are sufficient to show that this was a position of importance. To the west is an open valley called 'Valley of the City,' which, gradually curving round eastward, runs close to the old road from Jericho by which Joshua's army would probably have advanced. To the north of the site there is also a great valley, and the plain or plateau on which the modern village stands close to the old site expands from a narrow and rugged pass leading up towards Bethel, which is two miles distant on the watershed. Beside this pass and north of the ruins is a large terraced knoll, very stony, and crowned by a few olive—trees—a conspicuous object in the landscape. It is called simply Et-Tell, 'the mound,' and a connection has been supposed between this name and the fact that Joshua made Ai 'a heap (tell in the Heb.) forever.' The place does not, however, show traces of having at any time been covered with buildings, and the rock-cut tombs and cisterns above noticed seem too far from it to indicate Et-Tell as the exact spot of Ai, being close to the pass; it has moreover no valley such as would seem fitted for the ambush immediately west of it ("Test Work in Palestine," ii, 109).

Aiam Almadoulêt (the reckoned days), the first ten days of the month Moharram, or the first month of the Arabian year, in the course of which the Koran is believed to have descended from heaven to be communicated to men.

Aiat (signs or wonders), the verses, or small portions of unequal length, into which the one hundred and fourteen chapters or large portions of the Koran are divided.

Aigler (or Ayler), Bernard, a French prelate, was born at Lyons, in the 13th century. At first a simple monk, he became sacristan of the abbey of Savyzny, and Innocent IV made him one of his chaplains and abbot of Lerins. Charles of Anjou took him with him when he went to take possession of the kingdom of Naples and Sicily. Upon this occasion Urban IV made him abbot of Monte-Cassino and cardinal, and also sent him as his legate into France against the Albigenses. He was also sent to Constantinople to conclude an alliance against the Saracens. He assembled a general synod at St. Germainns, and died April 5, 1292, leaving, among other works, De Collectionibus:—De Beneficiis et Officiis, Breviarii Praefatio; Benedictus Benedicti Speculum Monachorum. See Colonia, Hist. Lit. de Lyon, ii, 327; Chron. Cassinian Chron. SS. Ligivinum.

Aigradus (or Angradus), a French prelate, was monk of Fontanelles, near Rouen, and flourished about 699. He received his monastic institution under St. Lantbert, and became archbishop of Lyons in 678. At the request of St. Hilbert (q. v.) he wrote the Life of St. Ancbert, who ruled the monastery of St. Maximin from 678 to 695. The compilers of Gallia Christiana (xi, 167) and modern authors attribute to Aigradus the fragment of the Life of St. Lantbert (or Lambert), edited as anonymous by Mabillon, Acta Ord. Bened. III, ii, 462-465. See Henschen, Commentary, Acta SS. Boll. Feb. i, 348; Histoire Lit. de la France, iv, 35-55.

Aigulphus (or Ayody), Sr., abbot of Lerins, was born at Blois, about 630. He assumed the Benedictine habit in the abbey of Fleury, and was employed by Momolus, the abbot, to dig up the relics of Sts. Benedict and Scholastica from under the ruins of Monte Cassino and bring them into France, which he did. He was despatched by Clotaire III to reform the abbey of Lerins, but the monks rebelled, and, having first imprisoned him, they delivered him and thirty-three faithful monks into the hands of pirates, by whom they were beheaded on the island of Amathis, A.D. 675. Their festival is given by the Roman martyrology (Sept. 3). See Bailer, Sept. 3; Mabillon, Life of Aigulphus.

Aihala (or Al-aswaid), a rival prophet to Mohammed in Arabia. He pretended that two angels appeared to him, giving him his commission. His eloquence and bravery drew great crowds after him; but he maintained his position only four months, being killed by his opponents. Aihala and Moseisama, who also pretended to be a prophet sent from God, were called by the Mohammedans the two Liars.

Aljkhthryner, in Norse mythology, is a reindeer standing in Walhalla and eating the limbs of the tree Lerad. Out of his horns flows so much water that thirty-six rivers are fed by it.

Aljukal, in the mythology of the Mongoli, as, is one of the four supreme gods, probably related to Vishnu of India. Images, partly of brass and partly of silver, are made of the deity in China. He has three heads and ten hands. He is seated, as are the majority of Oriental gods.
Aiken, Alison, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Maury Co., Tenn., Sept. 9, 1814. He received a careful religious training; was converted at the age of twenty-five; soon began to preach, and in 1841 entered the Tennessee Conference, and labored with marked success till 1855, when he was transferred to the Louisville Conference, in which he continued until his death, Oct. 17, 1872. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1873, p. 965.

Aiken, John E., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Chatham, Conn., March 18, 1802. He experienced religion at the age of eighteen; soon became class leader; was licensed to exhort in 1824, and in 1831 was received into the Pittsburgh Conference. In 1849 he located at Plainfield, where he died, Dec. 17, 1853. Mr. Aiken was earnest, devoted, and greatly beloved. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1854, p. 409.

Aiken, Silas, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Bedford, N.H., May 14, 1799. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1825 with the highest honors; was ordained pastor of the Congregational Church in Amherst, N.H., March 4, 1829; was installed pastor of the church in Boston, Bost., Dec. 26, 1836; became pastor of the Church in Rutland, Vt., March 29, 1849. On account of impaired health he resigned this pastorate in 1863, but held the nominal relation of pastor for several years afterwards. He died in Rutland, April 8, 1869. During his three pastorates, extending over thirty years, he received eight hundred and ninety members into the church. His character and work won the esteem of all who knew him. See Cong. Quarterly, 1869, p. 428.

Aiken, Solomon, a Congregational minister, was a native of Hardwick, Mass. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1784; was ordained pastor of the church in Dracut, Mass., June 4, 1788, from which he was dismissed June 4, 1814. After this he removed to the State of New York. He died about 1832. As a political partisan he acquired some celebrity. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ii, 87.

Aikenhead, John, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Arbroath, Scotland, in 1768. His parents were members of the Church of Scotland, and trained their boy in the right way, so that he soon found peace in believing. In 1796 he devoted himself to the ministry, and was appointed to the Boston Circuit. In 1832 he became a supernumerary at Devensport, where he died, March 12, 1835. He was a man of studious habits, and had a well-cultivated mind and great stores of information, the most amazing—always so; frank and ingenious, to a stranger always reserved. He was a man of lovely Christian character, and withal a faithful and useful minister. See Wesleyan Meth. Mag. Aug. 1837, p. 561; Minutes of the British Conference, 1835.

Aliçe, an Ettruscan male divinity, who is represented on an Ettruscan mirror accompanying the deities Euturpa, Altria, and Thalna.

Ailkin, John C. L., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Alabama in 1820. He professed religion in his sixteenth year, and in 1847 was received into the Alabama Conference. In 1849 he was transferred to the Arkansas Conference. Failing health in 1859 compelled him to take a superintendency, which he held until his death, May 17, 1866. As a preacher Mr. Ailkin was plain, practical, and pathetic. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1866, p. 80.

Ailkin, Samuel Clark, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Windham, Vt., Sept. 21, 1790. He graduated from Middlebury College in 1814, and afterwards entered the Andover Theological Seminary, from which he graduated in 1817. He was ordained and settled over the First Church, Utica, N. Y., Feb. 3, 1818, where he stood as a strong, earnest, and successful pastor until 1835. In that year he was installed pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Cleveland, O. In 1858 he resigned his charge, but continued to reside in Cleveland until his death, Jan. 1, 1879. See Presbyterianism in Central New York, p. 209; Andover Gen. Catalogue, 1880, p. 16. (W. F. S.)

Ailekes Olmink, in the mythology of the Laplanders, are three deities which they suppose are companions of the sun, and are therefore called deities of the holy days. Friday, Saturday, and Sunday were holy days with them. These gods are named Frit Alike, Lanu Ailek, Schodredni Aike. Others state that only Sunday is a holy day with them.

Alleranus (Aileranus, or Aleranus). St., usually named the Wise, was head of the famous college of Ciean, County Meath, Ireland. He died, according to the annals of Ulster, in 665. Among his works are, the Life of St. Bridget of Kildare; —Life of St. Patrick; —and Life of Fincius. But the best known of his writings is his famous Exposition of the Genealogy of Jesus Christ. This was inserted in the Gaulish version of the Gospels by Younger in his Collections on St. Matthew, and published in 1667, from a copy of a MS. of St. Gallen, with the title Allerani Scoto-Hiberni, Cognomine Supintius, Interpretatio Mystica Prognitorum D. Jesu Christi, etc. See Usher, Primord. Eccles.;

Aimara Version. In this language, which is spoken in Peru, a Jesuit, Ludovico Bertonio, as early as 1612, wrote the history of the life of Christ. Nearly ten years after, an New Test. was translated from the Vulgate into Aimara in 1827 by Dr. Pasos Kanki. This work was conducted under the superintendence of Mr. Thomson, and with the sanction of the British and Foreign Bible Society. Of this translation the gospel of St. Luke, with the Spanish version in parallel columns, was issued in 1929 by the British and Foreign Bible Society for the inhabitants of Bolivia. Aimene (or Emene), a Trojan to whom divine honors were rendered in Greece.

Aimerich. See Amaury.

Aimerich, Malraida (or of Malefaya), a patriarch of the Latin see of Antioch, was born in the beginning of the 12th century, in the village of St. Viance, Lower Limousin, France, and early embraced the monastic state. His zeal in the crusade under Urban II caused his election to that position in 1142, and his reformation of the hermits of Mount Carmel procured its confirmation by Alexander III in 1180. He died in 1187, and is represented as De Institutione Monachorum (in vol. v of the Bibliotheca de Pareis), and a few historical narratives of the crusades (in Martene's Trésor, vol. i).—Biographie Universelle, s. v.

Aimerich, Matteo, a Spanish Jesuit, was born in 1715 at Bordil, in the diocese of Girona. While young he entered the Order of St. Ignatius, and after the expulsion of the Jesuits from Spain he retired to Ferrara.
where he died in 1799. Among other theological works he wrote, Nomina et Acta Episcoporum Barcinonensium (Barcelona, 1760) — Quinti Moderati Censorinii de Vita et Morte Linguarum Latinae Paradoxa Philologica, Criticae Nominaliae Dissertationibus Exposita, Asserta et Probata (Ferrara, 1789) — Relatione Autentica dell' Accademia in Parma (ibid, 1789). This is in defence of the preceding work: — Specimen Veterum Romanæ Litteraturæ Deperditæ et adhaæ Latinitæ (ibid, 1784) — Novum Lexicon Historicum et Criticum Antiquæ Romanæ Litteraturæ Deperditæ et Latinitæ, etc. (Bassano, 1787). Almüller, Maximilian Emmanuel, a German artist, founder of a new school of glass-painting, was born at Munich, Feb. 14, 1807. In 1826 he had acquired such distinction as to be appointed director of the newly founded royal painted-glass manufactury at Munich. The process perfected by him consisted in actually painting the design upon the glass, and carefully subjecting each color as it was laid on to a heating operation. The earliest specimens of his work are to be found imbedded in the cathedral at Ratibon. Other specimens may be seen in Glasgow cathedral, St. Paul's cathedral, and St. Peter's College, Cambridge; but his finest productions are in the Cologne cathedral. He had some skill as a painter in oil, especially in interiors, and his pictures of the Chapel Royal at Windsor, and of Westminster Abbey, have been much admired. He died Dec. 9, 1879.

Aiprout, in Hindû mythology, is the powerful white elephant which is ridden by the god Indra, and carries the world. This elephant is said to have come out of the ocean.

Airay, Christopher, an English clergyman, was born at Clifton, in Westmorland, about 1601, and entered Queen's College, Oxford, in 1621, of which he was afterwards elected fellow. In 1642 he took his B.D., having previously become vicar of Milford, in Hampshire. He died Oct. 18, 1670. He wrote, Pasciuclus Priorroptarum Logicaliam in Gratianum Justutissima Academica Compositum. See Biog. Brit.; Wood's Athenæ Oxonienses, xi.—58.

Airay, Henry, D.D., an English clergyman, was born in Westmorland in 1558. He was educated by Bernard Gilpin, and by him sent to St. Edmund's Hall, Oxford, in 1579. He soon removed to Queen's College, of which he was chosen fellow in 1586. Entering orders, he became a constant preacher in the university, especially in the Church of St. Peter's-in-the-East, and was elected provost of it, March 9, 1598 (or 1599). Airay was a zealous Puritan, but was excused from submitting in 1602; and in 1604, when king James appointed an anniversary of his escape from the Gowrie Conspiracy, and ordered a sermon and service on Tuesdays throughout the year, Dr. Airay introduced this last custom into Oxford. He was the first (in 1606, when vice-chancellor) to call Laud to task for preaching sentiments supposed to favor popery. He died in Queen's College, Oct. 10, 1616, and was buried in the chapel. He published, Lectures upon the Whole Epistle St. Paul to the Philippians (Lond. 1618, 4to).—The Just and Necessary Apology touching his Sedi in Lice, for the Rector of Churlton-on-Otmoor, in Oxfordshire (ibid, 1621, 8vo). — A Treatise against Bowing at the Name of Jesus.

Aithiron (aiθρων, the open air), a word employed by Eusebius to describe the open space between the church-walls and the extreme circumference of the various courts or outbuildings, and is synonymous with the common Greek word. This court or churchyard was the station of the energumena, and of those persons called fentres. These persons were also called χειμαζόμενοι, from the circumstance of their standing in the open air exposed to the weather.

Aitkins (Aiken, Elkins, or Atkkins), James, a Scottish bishop, was born at Kirkwall, and educated at Edinburgh, from whence he went to Oxford. Returning to Scotland, he became chaplain to Hamilton in 1635, in which station he conducted himself so well that, upon the return of the marquis to England, the latter procured from the king a presentation for Mr. Aitkins to the church of Birs, in Orkney. In 1650, in consequence of some trouble arising in the Church, he was apprehended and compelled to leave with his family for Edinburgh, and resided there obdurately until the Restoration, when he went to London to congratulate the king, at which time the bishop of Winchester presented him to the rectory of Wentworth, in Dorsetshire. There he continued until 1877, when he was elected and consecrated bishop of Moray; but he was translated from this see to that of Galloway, Feb. 6, 1880. He died at Edinburgh, Oct. 26, 1887. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 158, 282.

Aiton (or Halton), an Armenian prince, who served long in the wars of Palestine against the Saracens. About A.D. 1290 he became a Prenomstratensian monk in the island of Cyprus, and spent his life in retirement and devotion. About 1307, while resident at Poitiers, in France, he dictated a history of the Tartars, their customs and their wars, which Nicolaus Falconius translated from the French (in which language it had been composed) into barbarous Latin, entitled Itinerarium et Flus Historiarum Orientis, with an appendix entitled Passagium Terras Sacrae. See Mosheim, Hist. of the Church, bk. iii. cent. xiv. pt. ii. ch. ii.

Aitvaros, in Lithuanian mythology, is a spirit living in the country, frequenting fences, bushes, and roads.

Ainos Locutius (or Loquens) (the predicting speaker), in Roman mythology. In the year B.C. 390 a voice was heard in Rome which warned the Romans of the approaching Gauls. The voice was not heeded, and the Gauls destroyed the city. A temple was afterwards erected to Ainos Locutius to reconcile the slighted deity.

Aium, in Kalmuck mythology, was a brazen image which showed the skill and perfection this nation had acquired in mechanical art. With crossed feet, he appears to sit upon an opening flower. The lower part of the body is covered, while the upper part is naked. The head carries a crown in the shape of a pyramid. This god is worshipped by old people: he is said to possess the power to give health, long life, and rejuvenescence.

Aix, Council of (Concilium Aqüaeanae), was held in Aix, assisted by the bishops of Apt, Gap, Riez, and Sisteron, his suffragans, together with the grand vicar of the bishop of Frejus. Several useful regulations were drawn up relating to the discipline of the Church and the reformation of morals, similar to those of Bourges in the preceding year. See Labbe, Concil. xv, 1119; Lond. Manual of Councils, a. v.

Aix-la-Chapelle, Councils of (Concilium Aquae-granumense). There were several of these.

I. Held in A.D. 800. At it Felix d’Urgel was heard in his defence before Charlemagne. He was answered and refuted by Alcuin (q. v.), whom Charles had induced to come over to France. Other accounts of his frequent relapses, Felix was deposed, but he returned into the bosom of the Church, having sincerely abjured his errors, which he did in the form of a letter addressed to the clergy and people of Urgel. He was, nevertheless, banished to Lyons, where he passed the remainder of his days. See Mansi, Concil. vii, 1151.

II. Held in October, 802, by order of Charlemagne. It was a numerous council. The bishops with the priests read the canons, and the abbots with the monks the rule of St. Benedict, in order that both parties might henceforth live in conformity to the law which was prescribed for them. At that time there were no monks or religious persons who followed any other rule than that of St. Benedict. There remains to us of this council a capitol of seven articles. The most important are those which relate to the choriprisci. It was determined that they had no power to perform any episcopal function, and should be considered simply as priests. This discipline agrees with that of the ancient councils of Autun and Neo-Cesaræa; nevertheless, it was not until towards the middle of the 10th century that they ceased to have authority in both the East and the West.

III. Held in December, 809, upon the question of the procession of the Holy Spirit, which had been first raised by John, a monk of Jerusalem. In order to decide it, the emperor sent as deputies to pope Leo III two bishops, Bernardius and Jese, and the abbot Adelhard, who held a long conference upon the side of the words Filioque chanted in the Creed by the people of France and Spain, but not by the Church of Rome. The pope expressed his regret that the same caution had not been used elsewhere; and without condemning those who in chanting the Creed added the word Filioque, and allowing that the word expressed the true faith, he refused to sanction the introduction of the word into the Creed, respecting the decision of those councils which had forbidden any addition to be made. See Labbe, Concil. vii, 1194.

IV. Held in September, 816. In it a rule was composed for canons, containing 145 articles; another, containing 28 articles, was drawn up for canonesses. Both rules are of great length, and are said to have been mainly composed by Amalry, deacon of Metz. See Labbe, Concil. vii, 1307.

V. At this council, held in July, 817, eighty chapters were drawn up concerning the rule of St. Benedict, which were confirmed by the emperor Louis, and by his authority put into execution. See Labbe, Concil. vii, 1505.

VI. This council, held in 825, upon the subject of images, was a continuation of one held at Paris in the same year. The bishops wrote (Dec. 6) to the emperor at Aix-la-Chapelle their decision, and the whole matter was sent to the pope by the hands of two bishops. The result of the negotiations between the pope and bishops is unknown. The French, however, maintained for some time after that images are neither to be broken nor adored, rejecting the second Council of Nice, although the pope had approved it.

VII. Held Feb., 866. The acts of this council are divided into three parts. Part i refers to the life and doctrine of bishops, and contains twelve canons, the third of which makes it imperative upon all bishops to have some poor persons always at their table when they eat, or within sight, and to send them food. Part ii relates to the morals, conversation, and degree of knowledge to be required in other ecclesiastics, and contains twenty-eight canons. Part iii treats of the virtues and duties required of the emperor and his children, principally in ecclesiastical affairs. This part contains two orations, a very long address was given up to Pepin, king of Aquitaine, requiring him to restore the property of the Church. See Labbe, Concil. vi, 1700.

VIII. This council was a plenary court of the emperor Frederick, assembled in 1163, for the canonization of Charlemagne, which was performed Dec. 29. Those of the presentization as the result of schismatics, and had the sanction only of an antipope, no pope has ever refused to recognize it.

Ajala, Martin Perez de, a Spanish prelate, was born in the diocese of Carthagena in 1564. He first taught grammar in order to support his family. He was sent by Charles V as theologian to the Council of Trent, and obtained successively two bishoprics and finally the archiepiscopate of Valencia. He died in 1566. He prepared a Latin translation of the Apostolical Traditions (Paris, 1565, 10 vols.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s.v.

Ajata, in the mythology of the Finns, was an evil female spirit that led all those to ruin to whom she appeared. She led travellers into wrong paths or into swamps to suffocate them, or into woods, where they died of hunger or became a prey to wolves.

Ajoutre, St. See ADJUTO.

Ajzat is a name of the sections into which the Koran is usually divided, each of them twice as long as the Ahzab (q.v.), and subdivided into four parts. These divisions are for the use of the readers in the royal mosques and the adjoining chapels, where emperors and other great men are buried.

Aka is one of the mystical deities of the Egyptian Ritual of the Dead.

Akabja, Ben-Mahalaleli, a celebrated Tanaiti, who probably lived in the 2d century, is known for his learning and probity, and the attitude he took against his colleagues. He had made decisions in regard to four Halachas in a manner unpalatable to the sages. As nothing could shake his testimony, an attempt was made to bribe him into compliance with the theological wishes of the rabbis by the tempting offer of raising him to the office of ab-beth-din. But he remained firm. "Rather," exclaimed he, "may I be termed a fool all my life than for one hour stand as a transgressor before God!" (Edagoth, v, 6). Argument failing, he was excommunicated, and in conviction of the righteousness of his case, he patiently bore this sentence to the day of his death. But before his decease, Akabja admonished his son to submit to the Sanhedrin. He could not have done so, as he had received the traditions from more than one rabbi; but his son had only heard them from the lips of his father. Before expiring, the rabbi also directed his son not to seek the patronage of men, but the recommendation of deeds which would deserve the praise of others. This was his maxim: "Ponder on three things, and thou wilt be kept from committing sin. Consider whom thou comest, whither thou goest, and in whose presence thou standest shortly to return." (Pirke Aboth, iii, 1). See Frankel, Dorke Mishna, s.v. "Akabja." Gritz, Gesch. d. Juden, iv, 59; Jost, Gesch. d. Juden, u. u. Sekten, ii, 34; Hamburg, Real-Encylop. s.v. (B. V.)

Akakia (ακκια, guilelessness), a Greek name for the purple bag, filled with dust or earth, which the Greek emperor anciently carried, in token of humility, at his coronation.

Akala is a name given among the Druses on Mount Lebanon to ecclesiastics. They are distinguished from the seculars by their white dress, and particularly the white turban, which they wear as a symbol of their purity. They despise all employments of honor in the world, believing that on the return of Hakem, the personification of deity, they shall be kings, viziers, and pashas. They do not marry the daughters of seculars, and they refuse to eat with the sheiks and emirs of the other nation. Akals are both men and women. There are different degrees of Akals, and women are also admitted into the order—a privilege of which many avails themselves, as they are thus exempted from wearing the expensive head-dress and rich silks fashionable among them. The order is estimated to number about ten thousand.

Akambue, in the mythology of the Caribbeans, is a general name for the spirits, good and evil.

Akara is a mystical name of a region of the Egyptian Hades, which is mentioned in the Ritual of the Dead.

Akara is also a mystical reptile, called the "viper of Lotus," mentioned in ch. xxv of the Egyptian Ritual of the Dead.

Akarkhentkata (wise one keeping her place), in Egyptian mythology, is the name of the third of the mystical cows, or Hathors.

Akasmukhia, a Hindû sect, who hold up their faces to the sky until the muscles of the back of the neck become contracted, and retain it in that position. They wear the kuta and allow the beard to grow, smearing the body with ashes. They subsist on alms.

Akababa, in Oriental mythology, is a fabulous bird mentioned in the stories of the Arubians, Turks, and Persians. It is said to live one thousand years.

Akbrat, a species of adoption permitted among Mohammedans and very common among the Turks. The ceremony by which this deed is confirmed consists in the person who is to be adopted putting on and going through the shirt of the person who adopts him. See ADOPTION.

Akdah, in Oriental mythology. Prior to Mohammed, the Arabs made use of fortune-telling and of oracles. The oracles were especially noted for the seven holy arrows, which were called by the above term. Whoever desired to know anything, or was unable to arrive at a decision concerning something, went to the priests of the temple, where these seven Akdah were kept. Three of the arrows were put into a bag. The priest would draw one, which would be the answer of the oracle. On the first arrow was written "Do it!"; on the second, "Do not do it!"; and the third was blank, indicating that the undertaking might or might not be fortunate.

Akerman, James, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Bromham, Wilts, June 28, 1786. Although blessed with Christian parents, he was not converted until his twentieth year. He soon after commenced to preach, and in 1809 regularly entered the work of the ministry. On the Axminster and Exeter circuits he met with persecution from the magistrate and from mobs. In the Redruth Circuit a great revival attended his ministry, in which nearly two thousand souls were converted. A disease of the heart, to which he had been subject for many years, compelled him to leave the active work in 1829. His death at Penzance, April 13, 1848, was very sudden. Akerman's character was one of peculiar amiability. See Minutes of British Conference, 1848; Wesleyan Methodist Magazine, 1851, p. 521.

Akersloot, William, a Dutch engraver, was born at Haarlem about 1600. His principal religious engravings are, Christ Taken in the Garden, after Hondius: — Christ Bound: — Peter Denying Christ, after Melyn.

Akh (intelligences), in Egyptian mythology, is one of the five component parts of the human being. It was also sometimes called Khu.

Akh es-Samain (Brother of the Heavens) was an Arab demonshiped at the city of Iraq. Akhekh, in Egyptian mythology, is one of the names of the mysterious Serpent of Evil.

Akhem, in Egyptian mythology, is the sacred name of the Mummified Hawk. It was an emblem of the deity Sokari, or rather of the Memphite dwarf deity Pthah-Sokari-Osiris.

Akhuvit (or Akhvizir), an Etruscan goddess, who is represented as clothed like Alpanu, with the addition of a star behind her head.

Akhvistr, an Etruscan divinity, generally represented as a nude winged youth, with a long fillet in his hands and an attendant upon Turan and Atumis (Adonis).

Aka. See Accho.

Akkâl, Jacob Ben-Moses, of Huesca, lived towards the end of the 13th century. Nothing is known of him except that he translated the Mishna commentary to the treatise Nashim (כ"ה) from the Arabic of Maisonevides into Hebrew for the Jews of Rome in 1298. Grätz is of opinion that his name is not Akkâl, but Akkâsî, See First, Bibl. Jud. i, 29; Grätz, Gesch. d. Jud. Vol. iii, xi, 264 (B. P.).

Aklima, in Oriental mythology. According to the traditions and books of the Persians and Mohammadans, Eve had twins by Adam. Aklima was twin sister of Cain, and fondly loved by him; but Adam gave her to Abel, which caused the first fratricide. See Akrî.

Akmano (the Evil Spirit), in Zendic mythology, is the first of the evil Darvandas.

Akrill, Joseph, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Horncastle, May 15, 1817. He was converted in early life, was received on trial by the Conference, and sent to the Theological Institution at Hoxton. His abilities were of no ordinary character, and his ministry was increasingly spiritual and faithful. He was a diligent student. He died of a short but severe illness at Chester, Oct. 5, 1849. See Minutes of British Congress, 1850.

Akteris (the Sunken) was the son of Helios, the sun, and was a mythical hero who was said by the Rhodians to have been the first astronomer.

Aktistete. See ACSISTETAL.

Aku (or Paku), an Accadian deity.

Akmân, in Persian mythology, is the first evil spirit created by Ahraman. He is the most frightful of all the evil spirits, is poisonous, and plagues good people. The Prince of Darkness created seven such monsters; and set them against the seven Amshaspands. Rustan, a Persian, fought seven days and nights with Akman. Rustan was thrown into the sea by Akman, but rose again and overcame the monster.

Aksana (the Setting Sun), an Egyptian goddess, the wife of the god Tum.

Al, or El (God), the name of the Supreme Being of the ancient Nabateans. He was the universal Deity of Palestine and Phoenicia. See God.

A1, in Hindû mythology, is the noted tree in Brahma's Paradise bearing all the fruits of the world.

Alaba (or Alava) y Esquivel, Diego de, a Spanish prelate of the 16th century, was born at Vitoria, the capital of Alava. He studied at Salamanca, and was made bishop of Astorga, in which capacity he attended the Council of Trent. After his return he was made bishop of Avila, and lastly of Cordova. He died Feb. 16, 1562, leaving a work entitled De Concilia Universales et de suis quos ad Religionis ac Reipub. Christ. etc. (Granada, 1832, fol.). See Aspiliaeus, De Represip. No. 154; Antonio, Biblioth. Hagi.; Landdon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, New Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alabandus, in Grec mythology, son of Calirhthoe, was ranked among the gods, and worshipped at Alabanda, a city of Asia.

Alacoque, Marie of Marqueville. See ALACOQUE.

Alaguni, in Hindû mythology, is one of the four heavenly streams which flow from the palace of Brahma and unite to form the Ganges.

Alais ('the rump bone,' os corpozis). The Koran teaches that a man's body is entirely consumed by the earth, excepting only the alais, which is to form the basis of a new body. The renewal of the whole human frame is to be effected by a forty days' rain, which will cover the earth to the height of twelve cubits, and cause the bodies to spring up like plants. But the time of the resurrection is to them a perfect secret, known only to God; the angel Gabriel himself acknowledged his ignorance on this point when Mohammed asked him.

Alain de la Rochère, a French monk of the order of Preaching Friars, was born in Brittany in 1415. He assumed the Dominican habit at Dinan, and finished his studies in a monastery of the same order in Paris. In that city and in other places he taught theology; and died on the Festival of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin, about 1462. Andrew Coppenstein gives his works as follows: A Treatise on the Psalter or Rosary of Jesus Christ and Trinity (Florence, 1619; Cologne, 1624) — The Confraternity of the Psalter of Our Lady (Paris, 1660). — The Mirror of the Soulful Soul, etc. See Richt, Script. Ord. Frec.

Alainus (Alanis, or Halain), a French monk, was abbot of Farle in the 8th century. He was born in Aquitaine, whence he passed into Italy. After taking the religious vows at Farle, he became a hermit, and retiring to a neighboring mountain, applied himself to copying several works of antiquity. In 761 he was elected abbot of Farle, and died in 770. His principal work is a Homily, a compilation of passages of Scripture. See Rivet, Histoire Lit. de France, V, v, 10.

Alal, a wicked demon in the Accadian mythology who caused diseases of the chest.

Alala, another form of the name of the Assyrian goddess Allat. She was one of the forms of Ishtar.

Alalcomehnis, in Grec mythology, was an epithe of Minerva, concerning the origin of which there are many, but no well-substantiated, theories.

Alalcomenea, in Grec mythology, daughter of Oggyes, king of Thebes, by Thebe, daughter of Jupiter, and Lodamia, was the most celebrated daughter of that monarch, from her office as nurse to Minerva, and from the worship paid her after her death. She was consid- ered the goddess who brought designs to a happy issue, and was represented, not by a whole statue, but only by a head or breast, to show that it is the head or understanding that determines the limits of things; and for the same reason the heads only of victims were sacri- ficed to her. Her temples were all uncovered, to sign- ify that she drew her origin from heaven, the sole source of wisdom.

Alam (the shadow, or the image), in Babylonian astronony, was the name of the deity Marduk as the planet Mercury in the month Chislev.

Alam, in Hindû mythology. Around about the mountain Meru there are four other mountains, on each of which grows a beautiful tree called Alam, always blooming and bearing fruit.

Alaric. See HUNA.

Alasbi. See ALEON DE L'isle.

Alasi. The Assyrian name of the winged human-headed bulls which were used to guard the entrances of the palaces, and beings similar to which were believed to have had real existence at the mythical time of NUN. They were also called Kurut, whence perhaps the cherubim of Hebrew writers.

Alarico. See AlAN DE L'isle.

Alarico. According to the Mohammedan theology, is the wall of separation between heaven and hell. Those whose good and evil deeds exactly balance each other are placed astride this wall, they being deemed not worthy of heaven nor yet deserving of hell. Those who have gone to war without their parents' consent and have fallen in battle are placed in the same category. The Mohammedan Alaraf bears some resemblance to the Roman purgatory; but there are decided differences.

Alarcon, Alfonso de. A Spanish ecclesiastic of the 17th century. He was canon of Ciudad Rodrigo, secretary of Francis de Alarcon, and bishop of Pamplona. He compiled a large number of poetical writings, on the occasion of the death of Martin Suarez of Alarcon, killed at the siege of Barcelona, entitled Corona Sepulcralis; Elogia in la Muerte de D. Martín Suarez de Alarcon, Hijo Primogénuto del Marqués de Tresofel, Conde de Torras Veludas, Escritos por Diferentes Poetass, Sacados a Luz, etc. (Madrid, 1652). See Hoefer, Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alarcon, Arcángel. General of the Order of Capuchins, was born at Tarragona, and died in the year 1598. He left in verse, Verdel de Plantas Divinas.

Alarcon, Bartolomé de los Ríos. A Spanish hermit of the Order of Augustinians, and sent to Brussels; in 1635 he was definitor of the province of Cologne, etc., and died at Madrid in 1652. Among his works are, Philoxis Themeniai e Cineuros Redivivus (Antwerp, 1637, 8vo): — Christus Dominus in Cathedra Crucis Doecum et Putens (Brussels, 1645, 4to): — Titia Cocconnes, or Commentary on the Gospels of the Passion and Denunciation (Antwerp, 1646): — Hierarchia Mariana (ibid. 1641, fol.): — *De Excellentia et Virtutibus B. Alard (ADHELARD, or AELARD). A Dutch priest, was born at Amsterdam in 1490. He was versed in the Greek and Latin languages, also in belles-lettres. He, which he taught at Amsterdam, Cologne, Utrecht, and Louvain. He bequeathed his library to the orphans of Amsterdam, and died at Louvain in 1544. He edited a large number of works on literature and controversy, among which are, Hippocratis CicMiscellanea (Salinghe, 1528): — The Lucretio et Leibnicius (Hamburg, 1622) and De Marbod, De Gemmis: — Selecta Similitudines, sine Collationes ex Biblia (Paris, 1548). See Hoefer, Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alard, François. A Flemish theologian, was born in a noble family at Brussels about the beginning of the 16th century. His father, William Alard de Centier, a zealous convert to popery, obliged him to enter the Order of Dominican Friars. While employed by them as a preacher, a Hamburg merchant procured him, privately, the works of Luther, and aided him in escaping from his convent. He then studied divinity at Zutphen and Wittenberg, but, deprived by his friend’s death of his assistance, he ventured to return to Brussels and ask help of his father. His mother denounced him to the Inquisition, and, upon his refusal to return to the Church, she even offered to furnish wood to burn him. He was sentenced to death and conducted to prison, from which he contrived to escape, and, reaching Oldenburg, became almoner to the prince. Hearing that freedom of religion was granted at Antwerp, and his father coming to see him, he persuaded him to renounce Romanism. When it was no longer safe for him to remain in the Netherlands, Christian IV of Denmark gave him the curacy of Wilster, in Holstein, where he died, July 10, 1578. His works, written in Flemish or German, consist of, The Confession of Antwerp: — Exhortation of the Ministry: — Apostolical Agenda: — Antwerp: — Catechism: — Treatise on Original Sin. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict., s. v.; Hoefer, Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alard, Lambert. A German historian, son of William, was born at Kempten in 1600. He first studied there and at Hamburg; went to Leipzig when nineteen, and entered upon a course of theology and political science. In 1619 he had acquired much reputation as a philosopher and poet; and, returning to Kempten, was made dean of the college. After holding this position for five years, the king of Denmark appointed him inspector of the schools at Brunswick and assessor of the Council of Meldorf. By order of the emperor he was, in 1646, created A.M., and was made a licentiate in di-

The document contains a list of people, some of whom are associated with religious or academic professions, along with the years and places of their births and deaths. Here is a structured representation of the information:

- Alard, Nicolaus, Sr., a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Dec. 17, 1644. He studied at Giessen and Helmstedt; was appointed in 1673 pastor at Tübingen; and promoted in 1678, by the Kiel University, as doctor of theology on presenting a dissertation, De Christo οἷς Ζητεῖται. In 1682 he was called as provost to Eylauerstadt; four years later (in 1686) king Christian V appointed him general superintendent of Oldenburg. Alard died Oct. 3, 1690. He wrote, Idee Theologiae; Tubula Grammaticam Ephraem, Chronologia, etc., Exhistentes; Der verdernte Zustand der reformirten Kirche, etc. See Thiessen, Gelehrte Geschichte von Hamburg, i, 6; Moller, Cimbria Literata; Jocher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lezikon, s. v.

- Alard, Nicolaus, Jr., son of the preceding, was born Sept. 6, 1669. He studied at Kiel; was in 1712 pastor at Neukirchen, in 1717 at Steinbeck, and in 1788 cathedral preacher at Hamburg, where he died. Feb. 13, 1766. He wrote, Deca Alardorum Scripta Clarorum (Hamburg, 1721); Bibliotheca Harmonio-biblica (ibid. 1725); Disputatio de Misericordia Deus Fortis ex Auro Beat. Lutheri in Geneva Commentarius (Wittenberg, 1738). See Jocher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lezikon, s. v.; Supplement, s. v.; Thiessen, Gelehrte Geschichte von Hamburg, s. v.; Moller, Cimbria Literata; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

- Alard, Wilhelm, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, son of Francis, was born at Wilster, in Holstein, Nov. 22, 1572. He studied at Wittenberg, and was appointed preacher at Krempe in 1596. In 1608 he succeeded to the pastorate of that place; and died May 8, 1645. He is the author of Deca Prima Hymnorum ad Deum Opt. Maxim. (Hamburg, 1599); Tres Centuriae Exclusuarii Piarum (Frankfort, 1607, 1628, 1630); Chilias Triariorum, s. v. Epigrammata Piarum seu Meditaci-uncularum ex Evangelii Anniversarius et Patrum Dic- tis (Goslar, 1618, 1635); Pindus Christianus ad Initiationem Sacerdotii Jesu sive Annus Nati Vario Genera Carminis Adornatas (Lips. 1622); Eucharistia, sieben Predi- gen von der edlen Kunst christlich und seelig zu sterben (ibid. 1623); Achtzehn Dankdienstpredigten (ibid. 1646); Theol. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

- Alary, Étienne Aimé, a French priest, was born at Montpezat, in Vivarais, Sept. 29, 1762. He studied theology at the seminary of Viviers, and took sacred orders in 1785. At the time of the Revolution he was the number of noblemen who assembled at Jales, and emigrated in 1792. He was then appointed almoner of the general ward of the prince of Condé; and successively confessor of the dukes of Angoulême and Berry. He was found in all the campaigns in which the army of Condé was engaged from 1792 to 1800, displayed rare courage, and distinguished himself by lavish expenditure in succoring the wounded. He was wounded before Munich in 1796. He returned to France in 1808, was arrested in 1804, imprisoned at Saint-Pélagie, and transferred to the Temple, where he spent four years in close confinement to the king. On the Restoration, in the first year of the reign of Louis XVIII, he followed that monarch into Belgium, and resumed the functions of almoner of the general ward. He died in 1819. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

- Alary, George, a French missionary, was born Jan. 10, 1781, at Pampelonne, in the diocese of Albi. In 1874 he went to Siam, where he preached Christianity. After eleven months of bondage at Rangoon, in the kingdom of Ayuthya, he was released and sent to Bengal, Pondi- cherry, Macao, and the province of Kouei-teh for China. In 1773 he returned to France, and pope Clement XIV appointed him director of the seminary of Missions at Paris. During the Revolution he retired to England. In 1802 he returned to France, where, until 1809, he filled his former office. He died Aug. 4, 1811. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

- Alascani, a name given to the followers of John à Lasco (q. v.), a celebrated Polish Reformer. He left no permanent sect, but was instrumental in promoting the Lutheran Reformation.

- Alastor, in Greek mythology, was (1) a surname of Jupiter, as punisher of evil. (2) A son of Neleus and Chloris, who married Harpye, the daughter of Cly- menius, king of Argos. (3) A companion of Sarpedon, slain by Ulysses. (4) One of the horses of Pritus.

- Al-asvad. See Ahlala.

- Alath, in ancient Nabataean mythology, was the feminine form of the local deity Elga.

- Alatrine, Johanan Mordecai, an Italian rabbi who lived at the commencement of the 16th century, wrote L'Angiela Tromba, con Aluni Sonetti Spirituali del Medesimo (Venice, 1629). See Hoef er, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

- Alava y Ezquível, Diego de. See Elaba.

- Alb, in Scandinavian mythology, was the spirit of the night, or the nightmare; the successor of mediavel writers.

- Alba, Duke of. See Alva.

- Alba, Giacomo, an Italian rabbi, was a native of Monteferrat, and lived at Florence near the close of the 16th and at the commencement of the 17th century. His treatises and commentaries on the Pentateuch, under the title Toleloth Jachob, were published at Venice in 1629. See Hoef er, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

- Alba, John of, a Spanish Carthusian of the monastery near Segovia, province of Spain, Spain. He studied the Scriptures with great success, also the Oriental languages; and died in 1591, leaving many works. Some of these have been printed, and others remain or at least did so a little before 1850, in the library of his monastery of Val-Christ. See Antonio, Biblioth. Hisp. i, 477.

- Alba, Martial, a martyr, was a student in the University of Lausanne in 1650. He was a Frenchman, and was one of five who instructed others in the knowledge of the Lord. They went from Lausanne to Geneva, from there to Lyons, where, while sitting at the table of a friend, Alba was apprehended and led to prison, where he continued a year. He was learned and well exercised in the Scriptures. Alba was examined, and refuted his adversary in reasoning; but right was overcome by might, sentence was given, and he was burned in Lyons, his face first being smeared with fat and brimstone. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 409.

- Albani, Alessandro, an Italian cardinal, was born at Urbino, Oct. 15, 1692; and was promoted to the rank of cardinal by pope Innocent X. He had great taste and knowledge of antiquities, and became a magnificent patron of learning. He wrote some historical and literary works, which are held in much esteem. In 1762 his portfolio, consisting of three hundred volumes—one third original drawings of the first masters, the others collections of the most capital engravings—were offered to the king of Great Britain for fourteen thousand pounds. Albani died Dec. 2, 1779. See Strook, Vita Aless. Albani (Rome, 1779); Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Hoef er, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

- Albani, Annibale, an Italian prelate, brother of Giovanni Francesco, was born at Urbino, Aug. 15, 1682, and died about 1756. He was cardinal of St. Clement, chamberlain of the Church at Rome, bishop of Sabina, Albania was an epithet of Juno, thus named from Alba, where she was worshipped.

Albanian Version of the Scriptures. This language is vernacular in Albania, which lies partly opposite to the Ionian Islands, and extends for more than 250 miles along the Mediterranean and Adriatic coasts. The Albanians possessed no version of the Scriptures till the year 1819, when Dr. Pinkerton, agent of the British and Foreign Bible Society, employed a native Albanian to prepare a translation of the New Test. into Albanian. The translator, Evangelos Mexico, after having finished the translation, handed the same for revision to Gregory, archbishop of Negropont. In 1825 the Gospel of John was published, and the Book of Acts was added. In 1835 the New Test. was completed at press in Corfu, under the superintendence of the Rev. J. Lowndes. The expense of the work was borne by the Ionian Bible Society. Of late the attention of the British and Foreign Bible Society has been directed towards the Albanians, who, with much that is degrading, continue to possess a great deal of character. During the year 1866 a translation of the four gospels and the Acts of the Apostles in the Gheg, or Northern Albanian dialect, was printed at Constantnople. The translation was made by Mr. Constantine Christophorides, a native of the country. During the year 1868, the Psalms in the Tesk, or Southern Albanian dialect, were also translated by Mr. Christophorides. The same translator proceeded with other parts; and at present there exist in Gheg the New Test. and Psalms, and in Tesk the New Test. and the Psalms in a revised edition. (B. F.)

Albano (or Albani). Francesco, an Italian painter, was born at Bologna, March 17, 1578. When quite young he displayed a talent for painting, and was placed, at the age of twelve, under the tuition of Denis Calvart. Albano afterwards went to Rome, where his genius soon gained him a reputation. The greater part of the work in the national Church of the Spaniards was executed by Albano. Returning to Rome, he resided in the house of the Madama della Pace. He died at Bologna, Oct. 4, 1660. Among his best works at Bologna are, The Baptism of Christ, in the Church of San Glorio—the Annunciation, in the Church of San Bartolomeo—and the Resurrection, in the Church of Santa Maria de Galeria. He is regarded more as an agreeable than a great painter. Among his other best efforts are the pictures of the four elements, painted for the cardinal Maurice, and now in the Gallery at Turin.

Also he published several sermons, for which see Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexicon, s. v. (B. P.)

Albasinius, Gabriel. See AUBSPINE.

Albee, Isaac, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Wiscasset, Me., Sept. 20, 1766. He was converted at Anson in June, 1796, and in August following he, with others, organized the first church in that town. See also Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexicon, s. v.

Of this church he was ordained deacon on Oct. 19, 1812, and received license to preach and administer the ordinances wherever God in his Providence should call him. It is said of him that he was truly a nursing father in Israel. He died at Anson, Feb. 27, 1861. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1863, p. 90. (J. C. S.)

Albeld, John. See AVELDA.

Albelda, Moses Ben-Jacob, a Greek rabbi at Salonicli, who flourished at the beginning of the 16th century, is the author of不准頗確, or expositions on the Pentateuch (Venice, 1608) —不准頗確, or disquisitions on the Pentateuch (ibid. 1528, 1691) —不准頗確, or treatises on the articles of faith (ibid. 1588) —不准頗確, an ascetical work on the vanity of the world, etc. (ibid. 1586) —不准頗確, a supercommentary on Rashi’s Commentary on the Pentateuch (Constant. s. a.). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. 1, 31 sq.; De Rossis, Dizionario Storico (Ger. transl.), p. 33 sq.; Hoefner, Nouv. Bibl. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Alberelli, Giacomo, an Italian painter, was born at Venice, and lived about 1600. He studied under Jacopo Palma, the younger, and remained his coadjutor for thirty-four years. He died about 1650. Some of his works are in the public edifices of Venice, the best of which is a picture of the Baptist of Christ in the Church of Ognissanti (or All-Saints).

Alberga (med. Lat.), a term used to signify the right of procurations, as albergaria is the composition made in lieu of procurations. See Martini, Theatrum Asian. 1, 613.

Alberga, Antonio, an Italian prelate, was born at Bologna, Sept. 18, 1566. In 1609 he was appointed bishop of Veglia (Naples) by Paul V. He died at Rome, Jan. 4, 1634. He wrote, I Tre Libri della Guida Spirituale (Bologna, 1628): —Intraco et Decreto Generale pro Pastoribus Civitatum et Diocesis Leodiensi (Leodi, 1614). See Hoefner, Nouv. Bibl. Générale, s. v.

Alberga, Pablo, a native of Bologna, Italy, flourished about the close of the 16th century. He was the author of II Cardinale (Bologna, 1599, 4to), and of Trattato del Modo di Ridurre a Pace le Inimicité Privati (Venice, 1614, 4to). In 1573 Zanetti published, at Rome, six vols. of Alberga’s moral works. See Dict. Historique; Bibl. Universelle; Chalmers, Bibl. Dict. s. v.

Alberga, Niccolò, an Italian cardinal, was born at Bologna in 1575. At the age of twenty he entered the Order of Chartreux, and distinguished himself by his doctrines in favor of the absolute sovereignty of the pope. Martin V made him bishop of Bologna; then cardinal of St. Croix of Jerusalem; and sent him as apostolic nuncio to France in order to mediate between Charles VI and Henry V, king of England. He was several times expelled from his bishopric by the people of Bologna. He went to Rome, and returned there in 1430. In 1431 Eugenius IV sent him to preside at the Council of Basle. Here he encountered strong opposition against his doctrines concerning the pope, and returned to Rome with his mission unaccomplished. In 1433 he went to Basle with three associate cardinals, who, with him, governed the seventeenth session of the council. New dimensions arose, and Alberga obtained, in 1437, a bull from the pope transferring the council to Ferrara. This was the occasion of a new schism. The prelates who assembled at Ferrara, Jan. 10, 1438, declared null all that was done, and who remained at Basle. The Council of Ferrara was broken up by a pestilence, and nothing was decided concerning the union of the Church East and West. Alberga was appointed penitentiary; then treasurer of the pope, and died shortly after at Sienna, May 9, 1445. Benedict XIV canonized him in 1745. See Ruppius, Vettinaria de Nic. Alberga (Rome, 1744); Hoefner, Nouv. Bibl. Générale, s. v.

Alberghino, Giovanni, an Italian monk of the third Order of St. Francis, was born at Palermo in 1574. He assumed the habit of that order in 1590. While still young, he took his doctor’s degree, and taught philosophy and scholastic theology with great credit. He was appointed definitor of the province of Sicily, and twice provincial, as well as censor and examiner of the Inquisition. He died at Palermo in 1644, in the Convent of St. Mary of Puty. His works are, Manuale Quaestoriarum S. Inquisitionis (Palermo, 1643, 8vo; Saragossa, 1671:—Lucubrationes Scholasticae et Mor. Theolog. —Biografia Cronica Tertii Ordinis S. Francisci. See Mongitore, Biblioth. Sicilia, 1, 314; Coronelli, Biblioth. Univ.; Landon, Ecles., Bibl. s. v.

Alberghini, Elceterno, a Minorite preacher, was born at Milan about 1560. He was provincial and confessor of the sacred office, for a number of years acted as teacher and preacher at Milan, was in 1611 appointed bishop of Montemarano, in Naples, and died in 1636. He wrote De Glorificatione S. Carmini Scotuli (Rome, 1640); —Onorando nelle Cinque Domeniche di Quaresima con Canzoni del S. B. Vergine (Milan, 1594); —Concejo Evangeliorum Quadragesimae et Psalmorum (Rome, 1631): —Lessoni sopra il Magnificat Concordia con gli Evangelj Ambrogiani (ibid. ed.). See Mazzuchelli, Scrittori d’Italia (Brescia, 1733 sq.), s. v.; Argellati, Biblioth. Mediolanensis (Milan, 1745). (B. P.)

Alberht, abbot of Ripon, who succeeded abbot Botwin in A.D. 786, was probably present at the late regnal Council of the North, held in September, 787, the acts of which were signed by an abbot Aldberht. He died in the autumn of the same year.

Alberht is also the name of (1) an archbishop of York. See ALCHEMBY. (2) The ninth abbot of Glastonbury in Malmsbury’s list, dated A.D. 712.

Alberio of Ostia, a friar of the Order of St. Benedict, was born at Beauvins in 1080. He re-established the discipline in the Monastery of Cluny and in the Abbey of Vezelay (diocese of Autun). He was appointed cardinal-analyst to the Roman Curia, and at that time disturbed by the war of David I, king of Scotland, against Stephen I, king of England. On Dec. 14, 1138, Alberic held a council in London in order to settle certain questions. After a fruitless mission into Sicily in order to bring into submission the people of Bari, who were rebelling against Roger II, he returned to the East and called a council at Anthoch, Nov. 80.
1140, which deposed the patriarch Rudolph, who was accused of heresy. After having visited Jerusalem and the holy sepulchre, he returned to Rome. He afterwards retired to France, in order to combat, with St. Bernard and Geoffrey of Chartres, the heresiarch Eron de l’Etoile, to establish in his seat the archbishop of Bordeaux, who had been banished by his clergy, and to arrange with Louis the younger a journey through the Holy Land. He died at Verdun in 1147. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alberic, probably a Frenchman, was a Cistercian monk of the Abbey of Trois-Fondateins, diocese of Châlons, and was born near that place early in the 13th century. He is the author, according to some, but in the opinion of others only the interpolator and continuator, of a Chronicle from the Creation to 1241. Leibnitz printed it in his Annales Historicis, vol. ii, and Menkenius in Scriptores Bemorum Germanumarum et Saxewn. (ibid. 1729, fol.), vol. i. The National Library at Paris contains an even complete MS. than has ever been published. Alberic also wrote some poems. See Biog. Univ. i, 396; Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, 298; Rose, Gen. Biog. Dict. s. v.; Chaillans, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alberic, Felippo, an Italian monk, was born at Mantua about 1470. He was a commissioner at the court of Rome, and was sent by the pope, Julius II, to France, to England, and to Germany in order to combat the doctrines of Luther. He died at Naples in 1551. He wrote a History of the Order of the Blessed Virgin: —a Latin poem —De Sacratissimo Christi Corporis per Judæam Pontis Afficto. This last poem is in heroic verse, and very rare. Its subject is the pretended miracle known under the name Billette, dated in the year 1290. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alberici, Enrico, an Italian painter, was born at Vilminore, in the territory of Bergamo, in 1714. He studied three years under Ferdinando Cairo of Brescia, and is said by Tassi to have been an artist of distinction. He died in 1775. Some of his most prominent paintings are to be found in the Church dei Miracoli at Brescia, viz., the Woman of Samaria: —Parse of the Pharisees and the Publican: —the Raising of Lazarus: —the Prodigal Son: —and the Good Shepherd.

Alberici, Giacomo, a friar of the Order of Augustinians, died at Rome in 1610. His work Dqlogi degli Illustri Scrittori Venesiuni (Bologna, 1603) contains the lives of Croce, Gabriele, Zartino, etc. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albericus de Verre. See ALBERICUS DE VERRE.

Albero of Montreuil, archbishop of Troyes, was born in 1080 at Montreuil, near Toul. He was a zealous propagator of the ecclesiastical life of Gregory VII, and abolished many abuses then predominant in the Church. In 1130 he was made archbishop. At first he declined this honor, but finally adhered to the wishes of the pope. His position was a very trying one; but, with his usual energy, he commenced the reformation of his diocese. The monasteries were especially cared for, while his own palace formed the nucleus for the gathering of men of learning in his time. He died Jan. 18, 1152. See Hoefer, Albero von Montreuil, Ersbisché von Trier (Got. 1874); Huyckens, Albero von Montreuil, Erzbischöf von Trier, i. Theil (Münster, 1879); Wetzer u. Welte, Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Alberon (or Adalberon), prince-bishop of Liege, was a brother of duke Godfrey, canon and dean of Meziére, and was elected bishop of Liege after the office had been vacant for about two years. This long vacancy was caused by the contentions of the empire and the priesthood concerning the investitures. Peace was made between the two powers Sept. 23, 1122; and the following year the emperor Henry V came to celebrate the festivities at the Passover at Liege. During his sojourn the election of bishop took place, and Alberon united all the votes in behalf of his brother, the duke. The first care of this prelate was to clear his diocese of brigands who infested it. Their retreat was the citadel of Rouquemont, from which they were finally driven. Thus, under the episcopacy of Alberon, peace and his flourishing. In 1127, he consecrated a monastery on Mount Cornillon; a short time after the one at Floref was founded, belonging to the same order. In 1124 he placed the canon monks in the Church of St. Giles-au-Mont. In 1127 Renau of Margigni, archbishop of Rheims, submitted the laws of his Church to the regny of Bouillon and his successors; but he reserved for himself, and those who should come after him in the court of Rheims, the prerogatives of justice and of military service. At the same time, he received the homage of Alberon. Alberon abolished the ancient custom of mortmain which had prevailed among the clergy of Liege. He died in January, 1129. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alberon, prince-bishop of Liege, was born of the house of the counts of Namur. He was dean of the Church of Metz, and in 1136 was made bishop. In 1140 he had a war with the count of Namur, Henry II, the most fierce and daring of his neighbors. This was soon ended by a treaty of peace which made him the ally of his enemy. He then turned his attention towards the recovery of what he had lost, and sought to engage the emperor and the pope in his behalf; but the money which the count of Bar had lavished in these two courts made this attempt useless, and therefore he resorted to arms. In 1141 Alberon made a league with the count of Namur; and that league, having united their forces, besieged the château of Bouillon. After long and painful efforts they became discouraged; and the prelate proposed a journey to the place where rested the remains of St. Lambert. At length the supplies failed, and they surrendered. Historians relate this as a miracle; and Nicholas of Liege, a writer of the time, has given us a full account of it under the title Triomphe de Saint Lambert. Some believe that the character of Alberon was such that it would not call down the special favor of Heaven; and it is certain that under his episcopacy the license of the people and the debauchery of the clergy reached their climax. Henry of Leyen, provost of the Church, at length came to the rescue. He went to Rome, and carried the reports of these disorders to the tribunals of the sacred court. The pope called for the bishop of Liege, who, accordingly, presented himself at Rome. It is not known what passed between him and the pope, but on his return from Rome he was attacked with a violent fever and was carried at Orthez, in Navarre, March 27, 1146. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alboni, Giulio, a famous Italian cardinal and prime-minister of Spain, was born near Piacenza, May 31, 1664. Being the son of a gardener, he at first was a tiller of the soil. At the age of fourteen years he became clerical belligerent of the Cathedral of Piacenza. He entered the school of the Barnabites, where he showed a good deal of ability, and sought the protection of Barni, vice-legate of Ravenna, who, having heard of this Bishop of Piacenza, placed him in charge of the house and made him a member of the order. Afterwards Alberoni accompanied the son of his protector to Rome, and there learned the French language. He also gained the friendship of the secretary of the duke of Vendôme and of the poet Campanella, which was of great service to him afterwards. During the war of the Spanish Succession he was interpreter to the government of Parma. In 1706 Alberoni accompanied the duke of Vendôme to Paris, where he was presented to Louis XIV, who offered him the rectory of Anet; but he refused this, preferring to remain with his patron rather than be placed at the head of a parish. The duke of Vendôme having been brought to the generalissimo of the armies of Philip V, Alberoni accompanied him to Spain as his secretary. A little later the death of his benefactor occurred, and he returned to Paris to inform Louis XIV of the fact. The following year the duke of Parma conferred upon him the title of count, and appointed him his consular agent to Spain. The princess of Ursins had at that time great influence at the Court of Madrid; but at the death of the queen of Louis XIV, Elizabeth Farnese, daughter of the last duke of Parma and niece of the acting duke, was proposed for queen. Alberoni shared with the new queen this influence and was trusted with important matters. About this time the death of Louis XIV completely changed the policy of the cabinet of Madrid. The age of Louis XV rendered a regency necessary; and Philip V believed that he had a claim to the position. After the death of Innocent XIII (March 7, 1724), cardinal Alberoni obtained ten votes in the conclave. It was on this occasion that the lamppost was posted in Rome—"Il cielo vuol Orsini; il popolo, Corsini; le donne, Ottoboni; il diacono, Alberoni." Cardinal Orsini was chosen under the name of Benedict XIII. Alberoni did not gain the favor of the new pope, and therefore retired to his castle at Castel-Romanó, and did not return to Rome until after the death of the pope, which occurred in 1720. The new pope, Clement XII, confined to him several negotiations, and appointed him in 1734 legate of Ravenna. In spite of his advanced age, he was still active. He constructed canals, founded benevolent institutions, reformed the police system, and prohibited vagrants from taking refuge in churches. About this time he became entangled in the affairs of the small republic of San Marino. Alberoni had to do with the last health and energy. His conversation was sprightly; and he was able to converse in Italian, French, and Spanish. He died in Rome, June 16, 1732. After his death, a pretended Trettent Politiique was printed under his name in 1753. La vie d'Alberoni, by Rouset, which we cite as the principal authority, was completed in 1718. Two letters of his have been found, the first of which is addressed by Alberoni to cardinal Camarlingo Paolucci, and is the famous apology of the cardinal-minister. This is followed by a sequel apology in the form of a letter addressed to a Genoese marquis by a Roman prelate. This prelate is Alberoni himself. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albert (Alberico, or Albricci), a French ecclesiastic, was canon of Aix, in Provence, and died about 1120. He is the author of a History of the First Crusade, from A.D. 1095 to 1120. Albert was not a witness of the events he records but appears to have had recourse to information from others. Reineccius first published it under the title of Chronicon Hierosolymitanum (Helmstadt, 1584). It is printed by Bongars, as the work of Albert, in the Gesta Dei per Francos, i. 184. See Biog. Universelle, i, 419; Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, 521; Chalmers, Bich. Dict. s. v.; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albert de Argentina was theologian of the bishop of Strasburg in the 14th century. About 1528 he composed a History, from the beginning of the house of Hapsburg to the death of Charles IV, A.D. 1370 to 1378 (imperfect by Cuspinian, Basle, 1555, 1569). Christiaaus Urtelius gave it entire in his Scriptores Germaniae (Frank., 1670, ii, 97). Albert also wrote a Life of Bertholdus, Bishop of Strasburg and Spira. For the catalogue of his other works, see Dupin, Bibliothèque, 14th Century; also Cave, Historia Literarum.

Albert of Bergamo was a monk of the Third Order of St. Dominic. He gave at a very early age tokens of his future eminence in holiness. At the age of seven he devoted himself to prayer and fasting. Later on he assisted his father in his agricultural labors; and, to satisfy his parents, took a wife, who was displeased with his charities. After a time he retired to Cremona, and shortly after took the monastic vows. He went on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, and died May 7, 1573. His body was buried under the choir of the church where he had spent much of his time in prayer. Benedict XIV permitted his festival to be observed by the Dominicans and the clergy of Bergamo and Cremona.

Albert, baron of Bonstetten, was almoner of the emperor Maximillian II, and dean of the Hermitages of St. Augustine, in Switzerland. He lived about 1500, and wrote The Liber Regius for the emperor, that order, who is reported to have lived many years without eating (given by Surius, Sept. 10). See Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. ii, App. p. 214.

Albert of Brandenburg, grand-master of the Teutonic Order, took monastic vows at Mergentheim, where he received the record of his nomination; and entered at Königsberg Nov. 22, 1512. Albert having refused to render homage to Poland, king Sigismund declared war against him Dec. 28, 1519. This lasted until 1521, and was terminated by the intervention of the emperor and the king of Hungary, who secured a truce of four years. In 1521 he accompanied Walter of Plettenberg, provincial master of the Teutonic knights in Livonia, the right to exercise sovereignty in his own name. In 1524 Albert took the oath of loyalty to the empire in the Diet of Nuremberg, and held to the rank of the ecclesiastical princes—after the archbishops and before all the bishops of the empire. In 1525 the treaty with Poland expired, and it was desired to enter upon the conferences at Presburg; but this was useless. The grand-master, already preceded by the doctrines of Luther, sent an ambassador to Cranachow, who had been sent himself; and concluded, April 9, a treaty with his uncle, the king, by which he was recognised hereditary duke of all the territory possessed by the order in Prussia, with the stipulation that his brothers and their successors should receive investiture by the king. This was immediately put into execution. Albert, strength ened by a large number of Poles, took possession of the duchy, quitted the habit of the order, and expelled the Catholics. Thus was the Teutonic Order overwhelmed in Prussia, by the action of its grand-master. He died near the middle of the 16th century. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albert of Curych, prince-bishop of Liege, ascended in 1194 to the patriarchal see of Liege, after Rome had declared null the election of Simon of Limburg, a youth of sixteen. Pope Celestin III made null that election at the request of Albert of Curych and three other archdeacons, and ordered another election at Namur, Nov. 18, 1194, at which Albert was elected. In order to indemnify Simon of Limburg, Celestin made him cardinal. Albert disgraced his office in some way which he so boldly practiced, and which was thus communicated to the clergy of Liege. The various hardships which the country suffered at this time were regarded as a punishment brought upon them for the wickedness of this prelate. He nevertheless made him-

Albert, bishop of Freising (res.), came of an Ablascan family of Hohenburg. He was first chaplain of pope Clement VI, who resided at that time at Avignon, and who, in 1345, appointed him to the bishopric of Würzburg, contrary to the wishes of the chapter. This occasioned trouble between the pope and the emperor, which was settled by the appointment of Albert to the bishopric of Freising. He died in 1359. He is supposed to have written the lives of the martyrs St. Kilian, bishop of Würzburg, and his companions St. Colman and St. Totman, in the Acta Sanctorum. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albert of Gembloux (Albertus Gemblacensis), a Benedictine, was born at Loben, near Liege, towards the close of the 10th century. He studied at Paris and at Châlons under the celebrated Fulbert, and became priest of Gembloux, then of St. James, at Liege, where he died in 1048. Sigebert speaks of him as being eminent for his knowledge of civil and religious affairs, as well as for his zeal in religion. He assisted Burkhard, bishop of Worms, his pupil, in the compilation of Magnum Volumnum Canonum, and wrote several hymns and lives of saints. Of these the Life of St. Veronus, Albertus (ed. by Galopinus, 1635; and by Henchensius, Acta SS. vol. iii, March 30) is the best known. See Sigebert, De Script. Eccl. c. 142; Cave, Hist. eccl. ii. 195; Landon, Eccl. Diet. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albert II, count of Hallemande and cardinal-archbishop of Magdeburg, enlisted on the side of king Philip of Suabia, and reconciled that prince with Innocent III. At the death of Philip (1208), he made peace with Otho IV, whom he accompanied in 1209 to Rome. In the following year, as legate of the holy see in Germany, he had the cause of deposition pronounced by the pope against Otho, and in 1212, at the Diet of Mincs, he concurred in the election of Frederick II. This brought the arms of Otho into Magdeburg. Twice the prelate was made prisoner in the course of these hostilities, and twice he was delivered by the valor of his troops. In 1216 he brought under his jurisdiction the metropolitan bishopric of Camin. Albert had no peace until the death of Otho, which occurred in 1218. He assisted, in 1225, at the Diet of Aix-la-Chapelle, where he resolved on a new crusade to the Holy Land, but he had the prudence not to enroll himself as one of the knights of St. Louis. In 1227 he raised a war between the prelate and the margraves of Brandenburg, Otho and John, to bring under subjection the house of Waldeck; but this was soon ended. The prelate was considered one of the most important men of his time. In 1227 he commenced to rebuild his cathedral church, which had been burned. He died about 1292. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albert, patriarch of Jerusalem, was born about 1150 at Castello di Gualtieri, near Pavia. After having been prior of a community of canons, he was appointed successively bishop of Bobbio and of Verceil. The high estimate in which his prudence, his uprightness, and his ability were held enabled the emperor Frederick Barbarossa and pope Clement III to choose him as arbiter of their disputes. Henry VI, successor of Frederick, appointed him count of the empire. Popes Celestin III and Innocent III also employed him in many negotiations. In 1204 the Christians of Palestine appointed him Latin patriarch of Jerusalem, although he could not reside there because Jerusalem was in the hands of the Muslims. He established certain wise but rigid regulations for the order of the Carmelites which were modified by the commissaries appointed by pope Innocent IV. Pope Innocent III invited Albert to be present at the General Council of Lateran, held in 1215; but Albert was assassinated the year before, Sept. 14, at Acre, by a man whom he had rebuked for his crimes. He is honored in April 8 as a saint in the Order of Canons Regular. Trithemius attributes to him Status Terrae Sancte, which is unpublished. The Regula Carmelitana is found with the life of Albert in the Acta Sanctorum. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albert, bishop of Livonia, was born in 1160. Being a native of Germany, he placed himself at the head of the nobility of Saxony and of Westphalia and came to Livonia to prepare the Catholic religion. He obtained of Innocent III in 1223, permission to found a monastic military order, which took the name "Chevaliers Porte-graives" (in Latin, Eniferi, and in German, Scheuerbrüder). Their first grand-master was Winno of Rörbach. Albert established a number of colleges for the diffusion of the light of religion throughout all Livonia. He died at Riga, Jan. 17, 1229. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albert (or Olbert) of Loben. See Albert of Gembloux.

Albert I, archbishop of Magdeburg, was first monk of Corbie, then of St. Maximin of Treves. He was sent in 961, by the emperor Otho I, to preach the Gospel in Russia. In 968 he was appointed archbishop of Magdeburg by pope John XIII. On Dec. 21 following, he arrived at Magdeburg, where he consecrated the cathedral of Merseburg. He was vested as bishop of Poland. He gave a grand reception to Hermann, burggrave of Magdeburg, and in 978 he received from Otho the jurisdiction of all the inhabitants of the place, with the right of appointing the burggrave. The following year he gave to the canons the right of electing their archbishop. Albert desired the consent of Otho, which he received for the faithful performance of his duties. While on his way to visit the diocese of Merseburg, he fell from his horse, and died from the accident June 10, 981. His body was interred in the cathedral at Magdeburg. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albert III, count of Sternberg and archbishop of Magdeburg, was appointed by pope Urban V, at the request of the emperor Charles IV, of whom he was chancellor, in preference to Frederick of Hoyum, bishop of Merseburg, whom the chapter had chosen. Albert, after his installation, confirmed the privileges of the states and towns of his archbishopric. This prelate was a very bad economist. He alienated many cities and villages dependent upon his Church, and gave up the rights of exaction. In 1371 he raised a war between the prelate and the margraves of Brandenburg, Otho and John, to bring under subjection the house of Waldebeck; but this was soon ended. The prelate was considered one of the most important men of his time. In 1227 he commenced to rebuild his cathedral church, which had been burned. He died about 1292. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albert IV, lord of Querfurt and archbishop of Magdeburg, is represented as a penurious, anxious, wanton prelate. In 1390 he aided the prince of Brunswick against the inhabitants of Brandenburg, and in 1394, by the aid of the prince of Anhalt and the lord of Querfurt, by treachery, he surprised the city of Rathenow and pillaged it. This city was restored to the inhabitants of Brandenburg by the prelate in 1396. The deterioration of currency in 1401 obliged the archbishop and his chapter, with the city of Magdeburg, to which they vainerly laid claim, to take advantage of the interdict. The threat which the prelate made of bringing this before the formidable tribunal of Westphalia was, however, efficacious. A contract was made Feb. 14, 1403, by means of which all was restored to order. Soon after the archbishop became ill and chose as his coadjutor Günther, younger son of the count of Schwarzburg. Albert died at Giebichenstein, June 14, Albert of Saxony (Albertus de Saxonia) was a Dominican friar who lived in the first half of the 14th century. According to Lockhart, he studied and sojourned a long time in Paris. The library of Bologna contains a number of MS. commentaries by him upon the Alphonsine tables and the Physics of Aristotle. He also wrote, Magistri Alberti de Saxonia, Tractatus Proportionum cum aliis praecipuis Augustini Nephi (Venice, 1496). He afterwards prepared an abridgment, entitled De Velocitate Motuum F. Alberti de Saxonia, Opus Redactum in Epitomen a F. Indoro de Isolamon Medici, nensis Ordinis Preclarissimae (Lugd., 1580). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alb. of Stade (Albertus Stadensis) was a Benedictine priest of the Cloister of St. Mary at Stade. He was appointed priest in 1292, and made vain efforts, with the papal, to have the pope, to declare his two orders of the monks of his abbey. Being greatly troubled, because the bull which he obtained in 1286 of Gregory XI produced no effect, he entered in 1240 the Order of Francisca. He became, after Olearius, general, and still lived in 1380. Alb. of Stade, who must not be confounded with Albert, Pisa, compiles a Chronicon, embracing the period from the creation of the world down to 1256. This is especially valuable for consultation concerning the occurrences in the north of Germany from 1072 to 1256. Andrew Hoier added a supplement, which comprehends a period of sixty years (Hamburg, 1510). This was published again, by Reineccius, under the title Chronicon Alberti Abbatis Stadensis, a Codice Orbe usque ad Auctoris Etatem, etc., (Helmstätt, 1587). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albert of Treves (Albertus Tresvasserus) was priest of the Monastery of St. Matthias at Treves. The monastery was distinguished in the 9th and 10th centuries. The priory of this priory, which occurred at Erfurt, June 28, 1141, forbade his putting this promise into execution. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albert of Metz (Albertus Metensis), a Benedictine of the monastery of St. Symphorien at Metz, lived near the commencement of the 11th century. He wrote historical sketches, which were inserted by Eckart in his Corpus Historiarum Medii Aevi, i. 91-131. These sketches contain important details of the history of Lorraine and of Alsace from 973 to 1025. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albert, St., a Carmelite of Monte Trapani, was born at Trapani, Sicily, in 1212. Dedicated to the service of God in his infancy, Albert assumed the habit of the Carmelites in the above-mentioned convent, where he subjected himself to great austerity. Receiving a mission to preach, he went to the remotest parts of Sicily, addressing Jews as well as Christians. He died in a solitude near Messina, Aug. 7, 1292, and, according to common opinion, was buried there, in the church in accordance with his order. The relics were taken to the convent at Monte Trapani. He was canonized at Rome about the middle of the 15th century, and his festival is observed Aug. 7. See Baill. Vies des Saints, Aug. 7.

Albert of Pader was a monk of the Order of Hermits of St. Augustine in the 14th century. He was a disciple of the celebrated Gillius Romanus at Paris, and taught theology with such reputation that scholars flocked to him from all parts. Boniface VIII called him to Rome; but that pontiff dying very soon after, Albert returned to France, and died at Paris in 1232. He wrote many Sermons (Paris, 1544, 1550), and An Explanation of the Gospels for Every Sunday in the Year (Venice, 1476, fol.). Other works of his in MS. are preserved at Padua. See Cave, Historia Literaria. him as follows: "Go, my brother, into your cell, and say Misere me, Deus!" He died at Hamburg in 1517, leaving Metropolis; or, An Ecclesiastical History of the Churches of Germany from 780 to 1504 (Baele, 1548; Cologne, 1574, 8vo; Frankf. 1576, 1598)—thirteen books on the History of the Vandals (Frankf. 1575):—a Chronicle of the Other Northern Nations, viz. Sweden, Denmark, Norway, &c., in Latin, 1577;—another, in Latin, 1578;—and another (Frankf. 1575). All these have been inserted in the Index of Prohibited Works. There is also a small work on the Office of the Mass (Rostock). See Cave, Hist. Lü.

Albert, Erasimus, a Lutheran divinity of Germany, was born at Wetterau (or, according to some, at a small village near the Main) at the close of the 15th century. He studied divinity, and became one of the most zealous adherents of Luther. For a time he was preacher to Joachim II, elector of Brandenburg; but, on a dispute respecting the revenues of the clergy, he lost that situation, and traveled in the interest of the doctrines of the Reformation. In 1548 he was a preacher of Magdeburg; but the Interim proposed by Charles V obliged him to leave that place and reside in a private station at Hamburg. He was afterwards appointed superintendent-general of New Brandenburg, in Mecklenburg, where he died, May 1, 1558. He published the Akkorum of the Cordeliers, collected from the Conventuals of St. Francis with Jesus Christ (in German, 1531; in Latin, Witzenberg, 1542–44). Luther honored it with a preface, and Conrad Baudius augmented it with a second book, translated into French (1556, 12mo; Geneva, 1560, 2 vols. 12mo). The last edition of this satirical work is that of Amsterdam (1794, 3 vols. 12mo). There is also of this author, Judicium de Spongia Erasmii Roterodami: and the Book of Wisdom and Virtue (Frankf. 1579, 8vo), in German verse. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albert, Jan, a Carmelite monk of Haarlem, Holland, died at Mechlin in 1496, leaving, among other works, a Commentary on the First Epistle of John:—an Explanation of the Book of Ecclesiastes:—Sermons:—and Questions on the Master of the Sources.

Albert, John E., a German Reformed minister, was born in the latter part of the 18th century. He was licensed to preach, probably, during the year 1818; was ordained in 1820, and had charge of three congregations in Pennsylvania. On account of ill-health he resigned his charge in 1822; after which time he lived in retirement at the York Springs, Adams Co., where he died in 1856. He was a very pious man. "The service he rendered his Master must have been a cheerful and pleasant one, since he always, until the day of his death, spoke of the ministry as a subject very dear to his recollection." See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Germ. Reformed Church, iv, 152.

Albert, Pierre Antoiné, a Huguenot minister, was born of a highly respectable family in 1765, at Lausanne, Switzerland. In 1796 he became pastor of the French Protestant Church in New York. The history of that Church is full of interest. The Revocation of the Edict of Nantes brought to the New World a large number of refugees, many of whom settled in New York. There were about two hundred families of these Huguenots, and they were among the most influential in the city. In process of time there was built for their use a commodious chapel on Pine Street, to which they gave the name L'Église du Saint-Esprit—the Church of the Holy Ghost. It was the custom of the minister, at the close of the public services, always to say "Remember ye the poor," when old and young dropped their benefactions into the poor-box behind the church doors. For one hundred and thirty years the French Protestants used the forms of religious worship to which their fathers had been accustomed in the public services of the Reformed churches of France and Geneva. In 1864 they became Episcopalians. Of this Church Mr. Albert, in the years 1807, 1811, and 1813, is said to have been "an accomplished gentleman, an erudite scholar, a profound theologian, and a most eloquent preacher. A stranger, of unobtrusive manners and invincible modesty, he led a very retired life. His worth, however, could not be concealed. He was esteemed and beloved by all the acquaintances." See Thereu, Hugenots in America, in Smiles's Hugenots, p. 483; Allen, Amer. Biog. s. v. (J. C. S.)

Alberti, Albert, a learned Italian Jesuit, was born at Trent, Feb. 2, 1598. He studied at Padua, and distinguished himself by his controversies with the celebrated Scioppi, whom he silenced, and who died of chagrin because of his defeat. Alberti died at Milan, May 3, 1676. His principal works are, Generali Vindici adversus Famosos Giss. Scioppi Libello (Lucca, 1649):—Lydus Lapis Ingenii (ibid. 1647):—Liber contra Salutantes et Choreas (1650):—Actio in Eloquentia tum Profana cum Sacra Corruptores (Milan, 1651). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alberti, Cherubino, a distinguished Italian painter and engraver, was born at Borgo San Sepolcro in 1592. It is probable that he was a scholar of Cornelius Cort: and afterwards acquired a freer style by studying the works of Francesco Villamena and Agostino Caracci. He was far more distinguished as an engraver than as a painter; and executed 180 prints, 78 of which are from his own designs. He died at Rome in 1615. Some of his most important works are, Portrait of Pope Gregory XIII:—The Flight into Egypt (in 1574):—The Holy Family, with St. Elisabeth (dated 1571):—The Body of Christ Supported in the Clouds by Angels:—The Virgin Mary and Infant in the Clouds, inscribed "Regina Coeli:"—Mary Magdalene, Penitent (dated 1582):—The Crucifixion:—St. Andrew Bearing the Cross:—Christ Praying in the Garden:—and many others of value.

Alberti, Durante, an Italian painter, was born at Borgo San Sepolcro in 1588. He visited Rome when quite young, and gained eminence by some works he executed for the churches and other public places; but he is but little known in several of the Roman churches. In the Church of San Girolamo della Carita, one of the chapels is entirely painted by him in fresco. In the Church of Santa Maria de' Monti he painted The Annunciation. His portrait is in the Academy of St. Luke. He died in 1613, and was buried in the Chiesa del Popolo, his funeral being attended by all the principal artists of Rome.

Alberti, Georg Wilhelm, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born in 1728 at Osterode. After having completed his studies at Göttingen, and having received the degree of magister in 1745 by presenting a dissertation De Imputabilitate Sancodi, he spent several years in England, where he studied its ecclesiastical and literary affairs and the history of the English sects. The result of his studies he published in his Aufriichtige Nachrichten von der Religion, etc. (Hanover, 1750), and Briefe über den Zustand der Religion und Wissenschaften in Grossbritannien (ibid. 1752–54, 4 pts.). He died in 1773. See Schürck, Kirchengesch. seit d. Ref. ixi. 425; Weingarten, Revolutionskirchen Englande, p. 5; Allgemeine deutsche Biographie, s. v. (B. P.) Alberti, Giovanni Andrea, a celebrated preacher, was born at Leipzig, 1611, and entered the Society of Jesus in 1628. He was professor of eloquence. He died of the plague at Genoa, July 4, 1657. He wrote, Le Querela della Pietà (Turin, 1640) — an oration delivered on the death of Anthony Provana, archbishop of Turin: — Il Museo Riformato nel Collegio di Genova della Compagnia di Gesù (Genoa, 1639). Le Pa- negriego en Vélez P. Camillo della Leila, Fundador de los Ministerios Infirmos (Genova, 1647) — Il Sole Liguare: a discourse addressed to J. B. Lercaro, accompanying a eulogy on his family entitled Lercariara Eologia (Genova, 1644) — Adelaida, Istoria Penegpecifica (ibid, 1649) — Eneaide, Penegpecifica detta a San Francesco Saverio (Bologna, 1650) — L'Impianto Fluminiduci del Santo Zelo d'Elia (Genova, 1655) — Vita sc Eologia XII Pa- trum Fundatorum Ordinis (Taurini, 1688) — Zeopistio ovvero Vita di Paola Maria di Gesù Centuriona, Car- melitana Scalza (ibid, 1688). Alberti, Giovanni Battista, an Italian ecclesiastical and artist, was born at Florence about 1400. In order to have leisure to pursue his studies, he entered orders; he was canon of the metropolitan Church of Florence in 1447, and abbé of San Savino or of Sant' Eremita of Pisa. Alberti, although known as a scholar, a painter, a sculptor, and an architect, it is to his works of architecture that he owes his principal fame. Among his works are, the completion of the Patti Palace, Florence; the chapel of the Rucellai, in the Church of St. Pancras; the façade of the Church of Santa Maria Novella, and the choir of the Church of Nunziata; the church of St. Sebastian and St. Andrew, Mantua. But his principal work is generally acknowledged to be the Church of St. Francis at Rimini. Of his writings, those on the arts are in the highest estimation, and he derives the most of his reputation from his treatise on architecture, De Re Aedificatoria, published after his death (1455, 10 books; last ed. Bologna, 1782, fol.). See Life prefixed to Leoni's Architecture; Vasari, Life; Biog. Universelle, s. v.; Bossce, Lorenzo de' Medici.

Alberti, Luigi, an Italian theologian, was born at Padua in 1600. He became a monk of St. Augustine, and professor of theology in his native place. He died at Paris in 1629, and published many theological treatises, among which are, The Life of St. Nicholas of Tolentino (Padua, 1610) — De Reali Presentia Christi in Euch. Sac. (1618) — De Terrestri Paradiso (1619): Life of St. Clara de Monte-Falco: Lecciones quaedam de Operibus VI Dierum (1629) — De Lib. de Predestinatione et de Absolutione Sanctorum (1635). See Alberti, Niccolò, an Italian ecclesiastic, was born at Palermo, Dec. 20, 1653, and entered at an early age the ecclesiastical state. He was soon distinguished for his learning and piety. He died at Palermo, Oct, 16, 1707, after the most intense suffering. His Life has been written by Montegore. He left several works in Italian, some of which have been published, especially Commentarius in Usu Vitae, Doctoris a S. C. Cristo (Palermo, 1703; Venice, 1716) — La Terra de' Viventi Scoverta a Mortali, cioè lo Stato de' Beati in Paradiso (ibid. 1709) — Offerte Fervorose al SS. Crocifisso, e Maria Immacolata (ibid 1713, 1714). See Mazzucelli, Scrittori d'Italia. (B. P.)

Alberti, Paul Martin, a Lutheran theologian, was born May 10, 1866. He studied at Jena, in 1881 was pastor at Niddbuhl, and died July 7, 1892, as archdeacon at Heersbruck. He wrote Porta Linguae Sacrae, s. a, Lexicon Novum Hebraico-Latino-Biblicum (Bautz- sen, 1704). See Wills, Nürnberger Geburtser-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Alberti, Valentin, a Lutheran theologian, was born at Letha, in Silesia, Dec. 15, 1635. He studied at Leipzig, where he also located in the philosophical and theological faculty. In 1678 he was promoted a doctor of theology. He died at Leipzig, Sept. 19, 1697. His writings are very numerous. His doctoral position was that of the orthodox Lutheran Church, and from that point he wrote alike against Pietism and Roman Catholicism. A memoir of Alberti and a catalogue of his works are given in the Pantheon, Mem. Acad. p. 669. See Allgemeine Deutsche Biographie, s. v.; Hoefner, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Albertinelli, Mariotto, an Italian painter, was born at Florence in 1475. He is said to have been the disciple and friend of Fra Bartolomeo di San Marco, whose style he followed, and whose merit he nearly approached. He was of a very zealous and unhappy disposition. In 1516, upon hearing an unfavorable criticism on his work, he abandoned the art for some time, but returned to it some years after. His works are almost wholly upon sacred subjects. Several of them are in the churches and convents of Rome, Florence, and Viterbo. In the Church of San Silvestro a Monte Carlo is a picture by him of The Virgin and Infant on the Throne, with St. Domenico and St. Caterina da Siena. He died in 1520.

Albertini, Francesco (1), an ecclesiastic of Florence, Italy, who flourished in the beginning of the 16th century. He was an able antiquarian, and published, De Mirabilibus Novum et Veteris Orbis Romae (Rome, 1605, 4to; 1310, 1515, 1519, 1520), three books, and dedicated to Julius II. -Tractatus sive Quaestio de Laudibus et Memoriae M. Florentini (1560) - Memoriale di Morte Statute (Florence, 1540, 4to), etc.

Albertini, Francesco (2), a Jesuit of Cantarano, in Calabria; died in 1619. He left, besides other works, Corollariologia ex Principiis Philosophiae Decta (Naples, 1606, 1610, 2 vols. fol.).

Albertini, Giorgio Francesco, an Italian theologian, was born Feb. 29, 1732, at Prenzo. He studied at Venice, entered the Order of St. Dominic, distinguished himself for his talent as a preacher, and was appointed professor of dogmatics in the College of the Propaganda at Rome. He wrote, Elementa di Lingua Latina (Venice, 1782) - Dissertation dell Indissolubilita del Matrimonio (ibid. 1792) - Passo Geometrico e Scrittorale (ibid. 1787) - Acroasi ossia la Somma de Lezoni Teologiche (Padua, 1778; Venice, 1800). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albertini, Paolo, a celebrated divine and politician of Venice, was born in that city in 1490. He entered the religious order of Servites at the age of ten years, and made profession for ten years. Afterwards he taught philosophy, became a popular preacher, and was employed by the Republic of Venice in many affairs of state, being sent as ambassador to Turkey. He died in 1475, leaving several works in Latin: On the Knowledge of God; - History of the Servites; and other theological subjects. See Biog. Universelle, s. v.; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albertino, Arnoldo, an Italian prelate of Majorca. He was first canon of the Church of Majorca; then apostolic inquisitor of the kingdoms of Valencia and Sicily; and, finally, bishop of Pacts, in Sicily. He died Oct. 7, 1545. He wrote, Trattato sive Questio de Sezere quando Debehat aut non Debeat Regevafi (Valencia, 1554); - Trattato de Agnoscione della Censura Theatrale (Padua, 1583; Venice, 1571). See Hoefer, Nouv. Albertrand, Jan, d'hez Crecicile (or John Christiaen), a Polish bishop and scholar, was born at Warsaw in 1731. He was educated entirely under the care of the Jesuits, and joined their society at the age of fifteen. He was sent as public tutor to the College of Pulask at the age of nineteen; and subsequently was made the same office at Plovno, Nieswic, and Wilna. In 1760 he was appointed librarian of the collection opened to the public by bishop Zaluzki. He was for several years the instructor of count Felix Lubieniski, during which time he became one of the first humanists of his age. Having become keeper of manuscripts and librarian to king Stanislaus, he was sent to Italy in 1782, and subsequently to Sweden, to collect material for a history of Poland. The result was a valuable collection of MSS, almost two hundred in number. As a reward for these services the king presented him with a medal, the cross of the Order of St. Stanislaus, and made him bishop of Zenopolis. When seventy years of age he was called to preside over the newly founded Royal Society of the Friends of Science of Warsaw; and he continued to direct its operations until his death, Aug. 10, 1808. Albi, COUNCIL of (Concilium Albiense). Albi, or Alby, is a town of France, capital of the department of Tarn, situated on the river Tarn; and was the place whence the popes in the 14th century derived their name.

A council was held there in 1254 by order of St. Louis, who had lately returned from the Holy Land. Bishops from the provinces of Narbonne, Bourges, and Bordeaux attended; Zoen, bishop of Avignon, presiding. Seventy-one canons were published; part of them relate to the extinct clergy, and part to the reformation of the clergy, etc. The first twenty-eight are taken from the canons of Toulouse in 1229.

1. Orders that persons be duly appointed to search after heretics.
2. Grants a silver mark to every one taking a heretic.
3. Deprives of their land persons who allow heretics to harbor there.
4. Orders the destruction of the houses of heretics.
11. Enacts that all persons (at the age of twenty) shall be bound to marry, and take an oath of fidelity to the Roman Church.
15. Orders that all boys above seven years of age shall be brought to Church by their parents, to be instructed by the curate in the Catholic faith, and to be taught the Creed, Pater Noster, and Salutation of the Blessed Virgin.
23. Relate to the papers, etc., of the Inquisition.
24. Orders the construction of prison cells for persons condemned, where they shall be detained and appropriated (as the bishop shall direct) out of their confiscated property.
25. Orders that the names of those who have died in heresy, and have been buried, shall be taken up and publicly burned.
29. Renews the canon "Omnem utrinque sexum.
31. Relates to extrajudicial communication.
37. Orders that every will shall be made in the presence of a priest.
41. Forbids to harbor any suspicious woman within the precincts of the Church.
42. Orders all clerics to be used in all churches of which the revenues amount to fifteen livres tournois.
45. Forbids clerics to gamble; orders them to have their hair cut all around as to leave the ears altogether uncovered.
50. Forbids them to hunt, hawk, and tilt, in game, with shield and lance.
56. Orders two regular canons, at least, in every prison.
61. Provides that all Jews shall have a distinctive dress, and shall constantly wear a large wheel figured on their breast.
66-70. Of Jews.

See Labbe, Concil. xi, 720.

Albi, Henri, a French Jesuit, was born at Bollène, in Comtat-Venaissin, in 1590. At the age of sixteen he entered the Order of Jesuits; and, after studying languages abroad, he studied divinity, which he afterwards taught, together with philosophy, for twelve years. He was afterwards successively rector of the colleges of Avignon, Arles, Grenoble, and Lyons. He died at Arles, Oct. 6, 1659. He wrote, Vie de St. Gabinus, Martyr (Lyons, 1654, 12mo); Vie de St. Pierre de Luxembourgh (Ibid. 1656, 12mo); Vie de la Mere Jeanne de Jesus [foundress of the Augustine Nuns] (Paris, 1649, 12mo); - Vie de St. Catharine de Vami (Lyons, 1665, 12mo); - Eloge des Historiques des Cardinaux Francois et Etrangers mis en Paralles (Paris, 1644); - Anti-Théophile Paroissien (Lyons, 1649, 12mo); - L'Histoire des Cartes du Niveau qui ont été envoyés dans les Affaires d'Etat (1658); and others. Albi (or Alba), Juan de, a Spanish Carthusian, had a great reputation, in the 16th century, for piety and learning. After acquiring a sound knowledge of theology, and great proficiency in the Oriental languages, he wrote a treatise on the habit in the Carthusian monastery called The Valley of Jesus Christ, near Segovia, where he died, Dec. 27, 1591. He left, among many other works on Holy Scripture, Sa-
David is styled "the divine philosopher," published in 1495 his הירד mussnis, The Book of Principles (of Jewish faith), a philosophical view of the theology of Judaism, divided into three parts. The first speaks of the existence of God, the second of revelation, and the third of reward and punishment. According to Albo, "the belief in the resurrection of the dead is an article of faith incumbent on the Jews and accepted according to the national tradition, although its denial was not held by him as a rejection of the law of Moses."

The Sepher Ikkarim is written in difficult Rabbinical Hebrew, and has been carefully explained by annotations in the Ohol Jacob (לֹא לְאֵלָה) of Jacob ben-Samuel (Freiburg, 1584; Cracow, 1594; also in the Ets Skhatul היס.CreateDirectory in Gedala Lüpschutz, with the text (Venice, 1618; Lemberg, 1861), and in Historiche Einteilung zu Albo's Ikkarim, by L. Schlesinger (Frankfort, 1844). A Latin translation was made by Genébrard (Paris, 1850), wherein he answers Albo's attacks upon Christianity. See Fürst, Bibl. Al-Borak (lightning) is the name of the white horse on which Mohammed pretended to have ridden in his celebrated journey from Mecca to Jerusalem. The prophet claims to have made this journey in the course of his mission, and to have been carried from Jerusalem to the highest heavens in one night. He was accompanied by the angel Gabriel, holding the bridle of Al-Borak on which Mohammed was mounted. This horse is held in high repute by the Mohammedan doctors, some of whom teach that Abraham, Ishmael, and several of the prophets made use of him; that, having been unemployed from the time of Jesus Christ to that of Mohammed, he had become restless, and would not allow any one to mount him unless Gabriel sat behind the rider. Others affirm that Mohammed had the sole privilege of training this horse at first, and that he intended to mount him again at the general resurrection. See MOHAMMED.

Albornos, Giles Alvares Carillo, an eminent Spanish cardinal and statesman of the 14th century, was born at Cuenca, and educated at Toulouse. Alfonso XI appointed him almoner of his court; afterwards archdeacon of Calatrava; and finally, although then very young, bishop of Toledo. In return for his bravery in saving the king's life at the battle of Tarifa, the king knighted him, and in 1434 gave him the command of the siege of Algeciras. Falling under the displeasure of Peter the Cruel, he fled to Avignon, where Clement VI admitted him to his Council and made him a cardinal, upon which he resigned his archbishopric. Innocent VI, Clement's successor, sent him to Italy in 1338, as pope's legate and general, to reconquer the ecclesiastical states which had revolted from the popes during their residence at Avignon. He was recalled in 1357, but was again reappointed, and succeeded in establishing the temporal power of the papacy in these states. For many years he was a very popular minister of state, giving to Bologna a new constitution, and founding there the magnificent college. At length he announced to pope Urban V that he might enter Rome, and received him with great pomp at Viterbo. He then accomplished the long desired visit to Rome, and died at Viterbo, where he died, Aug. 24, 1367. His body was removed to the Church of Santa Fè, which took place at Tortosa, between Feb. 7, 1418, and Nov. 12, 1418, under the presidency of Pedro de Luna (afterwards pope Benedict XIII). v. Albrecht, Christian, a Protestant missionary, was a native of Suabia, and was sent into Southern Africa by the Missionary Society of London. He arrived at Cape Town Jan. 19, 1805, and explored, with other missionaries, the savage country in order to preach Christianity. After having founded the establishment at Wam-Bath, he returned, in May, 1810, to the Cape, and there married a Dutch lady, who accompanied him to Warn-Bath. His establishment was devastated by an African chief. He afterwards collected the remain of his colony at Pella, to the south of the Orange River. He died at Cape Town, July 25, 1815. See Hoe-

Albrecht, Georg, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Aug. 1, 1601, at Filholofen, near Neuburg.
He studied at Tubingen and Strassburg; was at first dean-con at Augsburg; and when he had to leave the place, on account of his religion, he went to Gaitdorf: and af-tewards as superintendent to Nördlingen, where he died, Nov. 21, 1647. He wrote, Erklärung der Passion nach den vier Evangelien (Ulm, 1650), in sixty-four ser-mones; and was the author of Festivals (Francofurti-

Albrick (Albericus, or Alfriclus), an English philosopher and physician, was born in London about 1080 or (according to others) 1220. He is said to have studied at Oxford and Cambridge; and to have traveled for improvement. He had the reputation of a great philosopher, an able physician, and was well versed in government. In his third century, he has enumerated the following works of Albrick: De Origine Deorum: De Deo Iumenti:—Virtutes Antiquorum: —Canones Speculativi. The full title of the third work is Summa de Virtutibus Antiquorum Principium, et Philo-sophorum, and it is still extant in the library of Wores-ter Cathedral. The same library contains a work by Albrick entitled Mythologia. None of these works have been printed. In the Mythographi Latini (Amsterdam, 1681, 2 vols. 12mo) is a small treatise, De Deorum Imaginium, written by a person of the same name; but it is doubtful whether this is not Albriclus, bishop of Utrecht, in the 8th century. See Bibl. Universelle, s. v.; Chalmers, Albright, Alexander, count de Hirschfeld, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was a native of the Duchy of Oldenburg, Germany, and descended from a very noble family. Concerning the date of his birth and his early life, we have no source of information. He graduated at the military school at Eu-in, in Holstein; and in 1840 entered the army of his native state with the rank of lieutenant. Three years later he entered the Austrian army with the rank of captain; and in 1858 emigrated to America. Three years after his arrival he joined the Methodist Episcoal Church in Missouri. In due time he became a mem-er of the Missouri Conference; and in 1871 he was transferred to the Texas Conference, and given charge of the German mission in Galveston. Two years later, his health failing, he applied for and obtained the position of professor of German literature at the Texas Uni-viversity; but increased debility forbade his entering upon his professorship, and caused his death at Georgetown, Texas, March 2, 1875. As a man Mr. Albright was au-tere—the result of his military training. Oscenstibly there was little in his home a Bible in his position; but within that coarse exterior there beat an affectionate heart. He walked with God, loved his Bible, prayed much, and was full of hope and faith. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1873, p. 369.

Albright, Anne, a Christian martyr, was one of seven who suffered martyrdom, by burning, at Smithfield, Jan. 21, 1556, on account of her faithful adherence unto the Gospel. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, vii, 750.

Albunea, in Roman mythology, was a nymph whose spring lay near Tibur. Numerous sacrifices were offered to her. Some designate her as the tenth Sibyl.
Ruins of her temple still exist in the vicinity of Tivoli.

Alburnus, a god revered on a mountain of the same name in Lucania.

Albus, a name given by Sidonius Apollinaris to the catalogue, or roll, in which the names of all the clergy were enrolled at an early period of the Christian Church.

Alcalá (de Henares), Councils of (Concilium Completum). Several councils have been held here, viz.:—

I. In 1325, on the lives and moral behavior of clerks.
II. Held in 1236 by Juan of Arragon, archbishop of Toledo and primate of Spain. Three bishops and three depuies were present. Two canons only were published.

1. On the consecration of sub-fragars.
2. On the defence of the rights and property of the Church.
III. Held in 1338 on discipline.

ALCEDO

ALCOCK

Alcedo (or Alcedo), Mauricio de, a native of the valley of Segura, in Biscay, was a proctorary and judge-apostolical, etc., in the early part of the 17th century. He was the author of De Excellentia Episcopalis Dignitati deque Ecclesia Regnanda, Visitanda, Administranda: necnon de Generalia Vicarii Auctoritate et Missioni (Lyons, 1630, 4to). See Antonio, Biblioth. Script. Hist. ii, 85.

Alcester, Council of (Concilium Almenae), in A.D. 709, was an imaginary council, resting solely on the legendary life of Ecgwin, bishop of Worcester, and founder of Evesham Abbey, by Britwald of Worcester (or Glastonbury). It was said to have been held to confirm the grants made to Evesham (Wilkins, i, 72, 73; Mansi, xii, 182-189). Wilfrid of York, said to have been at the council, died June 23, 709.

Alcestis, in Greek legend, was the daughter of Pei- las and Anaxibia. She was the only daughter of this king that did not take part in the murder of her father. She was married to Admetus, king of Thessaly, and because of a sacred vow Admetus and his wife have become the wonder of all ages. Admetus was the friend of Apollo, who promised to save the king on condition that some one would sacrifice himself for him. When Admetus therefore became sick, Alcestis, who had heard of Apollo's condition for the king's recovery, offered herself as the sacrifice and the king recovered. Hercules lifted the faithful wife from the bonds of Hades.

Alcmenê (Alcmen, or Alkmund), the Saxon martyr, is commemorated March 19. Of him we have little trustworthy information; but, according to hagiographers, he was the son of Alcrid, king of Northumbria, who was put to death, as recorded by Simeon of Durham, in A.D. 800, by the servants of Eardulf. He was early an object of veneration, for a church at Swinesby was founded under his dedication by Ethelfleda, daughter of Alfred. According to tradition (Albert Butler, from a MS. sermon in his possession), Alcmen's remains were first buried at Lilleshall, and thence translated to Derby. Several churches in Derbyshire and Shropshire are dedicated to St. Alcmen. See Acta SS. Holland. March 3, p. 47.

Alcmenê is likewise the name of several Saxon prelates.

1. (Alcmen or Ealhmund.) The ninth bishop of Hexham, consecrated April 24, A.D. 767, with archbishop Ethelbert of York. An account of his transla- tion and the attributes attributed to him are given by Alfred of Baieaux in his Hist. of the Saints of Hex- ham. See Mabillon, Acta SS. Ord. Sankt, Bened, iii, i, 214.

2. The thirteenth bishop of Westchester. He attended the Council of Clovesho, in A.D. 803, with four abbots and two priests. His name is attached to several charters from 802 to 805.

3. An abbot of this name attended the Council of Clovesho among the clergy of the diocese of Leicester. He was evidently a person of mark, for he was present at the legatine council of A.D. 787, and attested charters of Offa and Kennulf of Mercia from 789 to 803. See Speelman, Concil. i, 301, 325.

Alciati, Giovanni Paolo, an Italian theological disputant, lived near the middle of the 16th century. He was a native of Piedmont, and abjured Catholicism in order to unite with the Protestant Church. He set forth the new doctrines upon the mystery of the Trini- ty, and formed a new party not less odious to the Protestants than to the Catholics. Alciati commenced his innovations at Geneva in concert with a physician named Blundart and an advocate named Gribaud, with whom Valentine Gentili associated himself. Their ef- forts here met with so much opposition that they retired to Poland, where Blundart and Alciati scattered their heresies with some success. From Poland they intended to cross into Moravia; but Alciati retired to Dantzic, where he died in the Socinian faith, and did not, as some have believed, become a Turk. He published Letters to Valentine Gentili (1634). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s.v.

Alciati, Terenzio, an Italian Jesuit and theologian, was born at Rome in 1570. Urban VIII had a high regard for him, and said publicly that he was worthy of the honor of cardinal; but Alciati died, Nov. 12, 1651, before receiving this honor, and left the materials for a work entitled Historiae Concilii Tridentini a Veribus Hostis Lutetiae (Histoire de Paris). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s.v.

Alcibiades of Apamea was a propagator of heretical doctrines and trafficker in professorial spiritual powers, who found his way to Rome from the valley of Orontes, in the time of Hippolytus, early in the 3d century. According to the same authority, Alcibiades was led to Rome by what he had heard of the heretical teachings of Calixtus, then bishop of Rome. On this ground-work he conceived the hope of erecting a more subtle philosophical system, composed of elements derived from the Ebonites, Pythagoreans, Eastern magicians, and Jewish cabalists. He brought him with as his credentials the Book of Elchasai (Eusebius, vi, 38), received from the hand of an angel. He was openly met and successfully resisted by Hippolytus, and his heresy was branded as diabolical by the Pope and condemned by the Fathers; but at last it was made a public reproach of the Church that she had suffered so great a heresy to be crushed. The untrustworthy Nicephorus (Hist. Eccles. v, 24) makes Alcibiades an opponent of the Euseiates (q.v.).

Alcimachê (sacred warrior), in Greek mythology, was a surname of Minerva.

Alcis was a German divinity, supposed to correspond to Castor and Pollux.

Alcock, John (1), LL.D., an English prelate, was born at Beverley, in Yorkshire, and educated at Cambridge, where he took the degree of doctor of laws. In 1641 he was collated to the Church of St. Margaret, New Fish Street, London, and in the same year was ad- vanced to the deanship of St. Stephen's, Westminster. The next year he was appointed master of the rolls, and six years after he obtained two prebends—one in Salisbury Cathedral and the other in St. Paul's, London. In 1647 he became a privy-counsellor and one of the ambassadors to the king of Castile. In 1471 he was a commissioneer to treat with the king of Scotland, and about the same time a member of the privy council to Edward, prince of Wales. In the same year he was promoted to the bishopric of Rochester, and in 1472 con- stituted lord high chancellor of England, which office he retained about ten months. In 1472 he was trans- lated to the see of Worcester and appointed lord presi- dent of Wales. He was in disgrace with the protector, Richard duke of York, and was removed from his office as preceptor to Edward. On the accession of Henry VII he was again made lord chancellor, and in 1486 was translated to the bishopric of Ely. In the cathedral he ACOCK, John (2), a Christian martyr of England, was cast into prison, where, from exposure and evil torments, he soon after died. The cause of this treatment arose from the fact that he was known to read an English book used by king Edward, exhorting at the same time the people to pray with him, and would read English prayers to them, which they would repeat after him. This probably occurred in 1556. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 781.

Alcoque, Margaret Mary, who instituted the Devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus, was born July 22, 1647, at Lauthecourt, a village in the diocese of Autun. From her godmother, Margaret de Saint-Amour, she received the name of Margaret. At four years of age she is said to have vowed perpetual chastity. Her piety was such that at nine years of age she received her first communion. In consequence of a severe sickness, she consecrated herself to the Virgin Mary, and added to the name of Margaret the name of Mary. On May 25, 1664, she entered the convent of La Visitation de Paris-Montmartre, and in the year following she took her vows. From that time on she had frequent visions, and believed that the Saint told her that the first Wednesday after the octave of the holy sacrament should be consecrated to a special feast in honor of his heart. The first festival was celebrated in 1665, in the convent of Paray. The severe austerities and macerations which she underwent in the convent finally ruined her health, and she died Oct. 17, 1690. On June 24, 1864, pope Pius IX published a decree of her beatification. Of her smaller writings the best known is La Devotion un Cœur de Jesus, first published by Hachette in 1695. See Laroque, Viv de la Venerable Marie Marguerite Marie (Paris, 1792); Daras, Viv de la Bienheureuse Marguerite Marie (ibid, 1875); Lichtenberger, Encyclopedie des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.).

Alcyone, or Halcyone, in Greek mythology, was (1) the daughter of Aegea by Aeolus, a model of unspurged fervent love. Her husband led an unusually happy life with her, and left her only once to ask the advice of an oracle. He was shipwrecked and drowned. Alcyone made daily sacrifices to Juno for the safe return of her loved one, but Juno was not able to receive sacrifices the object of which was impossible to be realized. She therefore instructed Pluto to acquaint Alcyone with the calamity that had befallen her husband. Pluto informed her, and in a moment of utter despair she threw herself into the sea just as the body of her husband was washed ashore. The gods transformed both into birds (halcyones), from whose appearance is derived the name of Halcyon days, signifying days of sweet rest. (2) The daughter of Jeroboam I, father of the Pleiades, and by Neptune mother of several children: Athusa, Hyrieus (father of Orion), Hyperenor, and Anthus. (3) A surname of Cleopatra, the wife of Meleager, the famous victor over the Calydonian boar.

Alcyoneus, in Greek mythology, was (1) a giant, tall as a mountain, who inhabited the Isthmus of Corinth, and robbed and murdered all passers-by. He lived on herds, and lay in wait for Hercules, who travelled across the Isthmus with the sacred oxen and the sons of Triton. Of all his brothers he was the most powerful: born at Pallene, where he lived, and whence he drove the herds of oxen belonging to the god of the sun. Hercules made a search for the monster, and killed him by his superhuman strength. But no sooner had he been slain than he received the soul of a bird, and once more into the thicket, and began a renewed combat with Hercules. Minerva then instructed Hercules to drag him from Pallene; and when he was no longer in his own home, his strength failed him, and he died. He had seven beautiful daughters, the Alcyonides, named, respectively, Anthe, Alcipp, Asteria, Drimno, Methone, Pallene, and Phthia. According to some, they all threw themselves into the sea upon the death of their father, and were transformed into ice-birds by the sympathizing gods.

Aldabi, a Spanish rabbi, lived at Toledo in the last half of the 14th century. He is the author of the Shebekh Emanu (בִּרְשָׁיָהוֹן, paths of truth), a celebrated work among Jewish theologians. This was printed in Hebrew at Trent in 1559, and at Amsterdam in 1627 and 1708. See Hoofer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s. v.; Florid, l, iv, 1, 1559.

Aldbert, (1) one of the bishops of East Anglia, at the period at which the history of Bede closed. His name is omitted in the list of the bishops of Dunwich, to which it must have belonged, or else misplaced; for the fifth bishop, to whom the name of Aldberht is given, must have been later than the time of Bede. (2) The ninth bishop of Hereford in the ancient lists. He signs a charter of Offa as "electus" in 777, and as bishop in 781. He died before the Legatine Council of 787, which is signed by his successor Eane, or Eine.

Ald, Jean Baptiste, a French Jesuit, was born at Paris, Feb. 1, 1674. He was secretary of P. le Tellier, and director of the Congregation of Artisans. He died Aug. 18, 1748. He wrote, Description de la Chine et de la Tartarie Chinoise, and some letters in the collection of Lettres Edifiantes. See Hoofer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s. v.

Aldergaef. See Adelbert; Aldbert.

Aldegonde, St., was born in 630 at Cousobre, in Hainaut, France. Her father, Walbert, was allied to the kings of France, and her niece was a descendant of the royal family of Thuringia. After the death of her parent she returned to the Abbey of Hautmont, and took the veil at the hands of Amand, bishop of Maestricht. She consecrated her fortune to the building of a monastery in a wild spot, bathed by the Sambre, which was the origin of the celebrated chapter of Canonesses of Maubeuge. She died Jan. 30, 680, or, according to others, in 684 or 689. Her body was interred in the establishment which she had founded. The festival of St. Aldegonde is of very ancient date in Hainaut, for she is mentioned in the calendars of the time of Louis le Bon, and in the Martyrology of Usuard. The name of this saint has been written by Andrew Triquet, under the title Sommario de la Vie Admirabile de la tr Mostr. Princesse Sainte Aldegonde, Miroir des Vertus, Patrone de Maubeuge (Lugge, 1620). It is also found in Acta Sanctorum, Dec. Apr., 1793-99. — Hoofer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s. v.

Aldergrever (or Aldgrever), Heinrich, a German painter and engraver, was born at Zouast, in Westphalia, in 1502. He studied at Nuremberg under Albert Dürer, and followed him in both arts and became very distinguished. Some of his pictures are to be seen in the galleries of Munich and Schleisheim, and at Berlin a remarkable one of the Last Judgment. He executed some pictures for the churches and convents of Savoy; and it was not uncommon for him to be entirely to engraving, and became very noted among that class called "the little masters," from the small size of their plates. His style was Gothic. The following are a few of the principal engravings: six plates illustrating the Fall and Expulsion of Adam and Eve from Paradise (dated of 1540); four plates of the History of Lot (1555)—four plates of the History of Joseph and his Brothers: — Judas with the Head of Holofernes (1598) — the Four Evangelists (1539) — the Virgin Carrying the Infant Jesus, with a standard (1553). The year of his death is not known, but there are prints by him dated as late as 1602. His prints are very numerous, amounting, according to abbe de Marolles, to no less than 550. The first collection of them was made by Mariette, to the amount of 390 pieces, comprising many duplicates with differences. This collection was sold in France in 1805 for 660 francs. See Strutt and Pickington, Dictionaries; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Aldeguela, Jose Martin de, a Spanish architect, was born at Manzaneda in 1730. He studied under Jose Coribinos of Valencia, and established his reputation by superintending the erection of the church and college of the Jesuits in Teruel. He was soon after engaged by the bishop of Cuenca to finish the church of San Felix. He afterwards erected a number of public edifices at Cuenca and elsewhere; constructed the new aqueduct at Malaga, and completed the noted bridge at Ronda.

Alden, Justin T., a Methodist Episcopalian minister, was born at Hinesburg, Vt., Jan. 21, 1821. He was brought to Christ at the age of thirteen through the teaching, example, and prayers of his pious parents; was educated at Gouverneur Wesleyan Seminary; received license to exhort when but eighteen; two years later to preach; and in 1844 united with the Black River Conference. He died Aug. 29, 1865. Mr. Alden was mild, yet decided; genial, yet so positive in virtue and grace as to banish everything vicious. He was devoutly sincere. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1865, p. 112.

Alden, Seth, a Congregational minister, was born at Bridgewater, Mass., May 21, 1738. He graduated at Brown University in 1814; conducted the Wakefield Academy the following year; entered upon his divinity studies at Cambridge in 1816; and became the pastor of Marlborough Church in November, 1819, where he remained fifteen years. In May, 1836, he was called to Brookfield, Mass., where he labored ten years; thence to Southborough; and, two years and a half later, to Lincoln, where he died four years afterwards. Mr. Alden, a direct descendant on both sides of the house from the Pilgrims, was a man of sincere piety, of unrivaled devotion to duty, of piety to a high degree. His choleric disposition and stern looks constituted him a friend to all with whom he came in contact. See The Christian Examiner (Boston), 1854, p. 319.

Alden, Timothy, a Congregational minister, father of Rev. Dr. Timothy Alden, was a descendant of the famous John Alden of Plymouth renown. He was born in 1757, graduated at Harvard in the class of 1782, and was ordained pastor of the Church in Yarmouth, Mass., in 1797. He married, in the interval, on Nov. 13, 1812. He was a faithful, laborious minister of the Gospel. See Allen, Amer. Biog. s. v. (J. C. S.)

Aldenbruck, Augustin, a German archaeologist and Jesuit, lived in the first half of the 18th century. He engaged in interesting researches upon the monuments, the religion, the coins, the customs and ceremonies of the Ubians, an ancient people of Germany, and published the result of his labors in a work entitled De Religione Anglorum Dissertatio Historico-mathematica: another edition was published at Cologne by Henry Nothen in 1749. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alderton, Bernardino de, a Spanish Jesuit, was born at Zamora in 1594. He entered the company in 1613, and is the first Jesuit to whom the University of Salamanca granted a doctor's cap, which he obtained in 1657, at Salamanca. He is the author of, De Incarnacion in Secundam Partem D. Thome (Lyons, 1652-57, 2 vols. fol.) —De Visione et Scientia Dei in Primam Partem D. Thome (ibid. 1662, 2 vols. fol.) — and De Voluntate Dei, Praestatione, et Reproductione (ibid. ed. fol.). See Jöcher, Algemeines Gelehrten- Lexicon, s. v.; Antonio, Bibliotheca Hispania; Alegambe, Bibliotheca Scriptorum Societatise Jesu. (B.F.)

Alderton, Joseph de, a brother of Bernardo of Malaga, was born in 1560. He obtained a prebend of Cordova, which he resigned that he might enter among the Jesuits. He afterwards became rector of the College of Cordova, and was in 1616 in the college of the Jesuits he published, Exemptionem of the Regular Orders (Seville, 1605, 4to) — and De Religionis Disciplina Tuenda (ibid. 1615, 4to).

Alderson. Alberry L., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Hart County, Ky., in 1810. No record is accessible concerning his early life. In 1833 he entered the ministry in connection with the Kentucky Conference, and in 1851 joined the Louisville Conference, in which he labored until his death, Nov. 3, 1871. Mr. Alderson wastrim, retiring, and distrustful of his own ability; yet, when fully aroused, he had few equals as an eloquent orator and powerful preacher. As a speaker, he was clear, earnest, logical, and skilful; as a gentleman, he was neatly dressed, polished; and as a Christian, humble, devout, and full of faith. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1872, p. 725.

Alderson, John, Sr., a Baptist minister, was born in Yorkshire, England, early in the 18th century. When quite young, he came to America under somewhat peculiar circumstances. He had become interested in a young lady and wished to marry her; but his father, a worthy minister of the Gospel, was opposed to the match, and, in order to divert his son from carrying out his purpose, he induced him to travel. In a little while his funds were exhausted, and, ashamed to return to his father, he shipped on board a vessel bound to America. On reaching this country, the captain of the ship in which he had crossed the ocean hired him out to a farmer in New Jersey, that he might earn a sufficient sum of money to pay for his passage. While employed in the capacity of a farm-laborer, he was hopefully converted. Having been well educated, and now feeling a desire to preach Christ, he entered upon the work of the ministry. His first efforts were made near Germantown, Pa., where he preached until 1755, when he removed to Rockingham County, Va. Here he soon gathered a Church, known as the Smith and Lynville Church, of which he was the pastor for about sixteen years. He then removed to Botetourt County, where, after nine years' labor, he died, in 1781. "No man of his day," we are told, "was more distinguished among the Baptists than John Alderson, Sr. He was one of the earliest evangelical preachers of Western Virginia. He was a man of much animation, of lively wit and gaiety, and of a high Churchman, who, he was ever ready to propound the Lord's supper, with which he was deeply interested. See Lives of Virginia Baptist Ministers, p. 21, 22. (J. C. S.)

Alderson, John, Jr., a Baptist minister, was born in New Jersey, March 5, 1758, O. S. He took very little interest in the subject of religion until he reached the meridian of life. Severe domestic affliction seems to have been sanctified to him, and he became a new man in Christ. He was ordained pastor of the Lynnville Creek Church, which his father had served, in October, 1775, where he remained two years, and then became pastor of a Church in Greenbrier County, Va., having the oversight also of several feeble churches in the neighborhood. During all this time he was compelled with his family to endure the support of his growing family. After his family cares had been diminished, he gave himself wholly to the pastoral oversight of the churches under his charge. The last part of his life was spent with his son, under whose roof he died, March 5, 1821. Mr. Alderson is represented as having possessed an intellect naturally vigorous; and, although his early education had been limited to the man of no respectable mental culture. In his preaching he delighted to dwell on the atonement of Christ and to recommend him to the attention of men. He was, without doubt, one of the most prominent men in the Baptist denomination in Western Virginia, and, says his biographer, "it may be doubted whether in any part of the state one more self-denying and devoted could have been found." See Lives of Virginia Baptist Ministers, p. 147-151. (J. C. S.)

Aldfrith (or Atfrith) was the tenth abbot of Glastonbury in Malmesbury's list, dated 709. See Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Aldhun, the first bishop of Durham, was born of a noble family in the 10th century, and was educated in the bishop's school at Lindisfarne, or Holy Island, in 990. Finding the island greatly exposed to the incursions of Danish pirates, he removed the see, after about six years, to Durham. He took with him the body of St. Cuthbert from Chester-le-Street, and at Dunelm (or Durham) erected a cathedral to that saint. Aldhun had a daughter named Egdrid (or Eggird), who married Uchtred, son of Waltheof, from whom she afterwards divorced, whereupon Aldhun took back the six towns belonging to the episcopal see, with which he had endowed her. He educated king Ethelred's two sons, Alfred and Edward; and when their father was driven from the throne, he conducted them and queen Emma into Normandy to Richard, the queen's brother, in 1017. In 1018 the English were defeated by the Scots, and the bishop was so affected by the news that he died a few days after. Radulphus de Dicycle calls this bishop Aflhunus, and bishop Godwin, Aedhun. See Hume, Hist. of Durham, vol. i; Surtees, Hist. of Durham.

Aldobrandini, Cinsio Passero, an Italian cardinal, was son of a citizen of Sinigaglia and of a sister of Clement VIII. He took the name of his uncle, and was appointed cardinal in 1593 under the title of St. George. He was a great friend of Tasso, who dedicated to him his Gerusalemme Liberata.

His brother Pietro, twenty years younger, also cardinal, went as legate to France, and settled the difficulties existing between Henry IV and the duke of Savoy in 1601.

He had still another brother, Giovann Francesco, who served in a Turkish company under the emperor Raffaello, and died at Wazad in 1601.

Aldobrandini, Giovanni, an Italian cardinal, was born about 1530. He was the son of a jurist; was first auditor of the tribunal, then bishop of Imola, and finally, in 1578, he received the purple at the hand of Pius V. He was employed in different missions among the various sovereigns in order to form a league against the Turks. He died at Rome in 1678, and was interred in the church of St. Mary, where a marble statue has been erected. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aldom, Isaac, an English Wesleyan minister, was born in Gloucestershire. He was converted in the fourteenth year, admitted into the ministry in 1811, became a supernumerary in 1840, residing first at Peterborough and then (1841 sq.) on the Oundle Circuit, and died at Elton, near Oundle, Northampton, April 29, 1859, in his sixty-ninth year. See British Ministers, 1859.

Aldred, an English prelate of the 11th century, was abbot of Tavistock, and was promoted to the bishopric of Worcester in 1046. He was the first bishop of England that journeyed to Jerusalem, which he did in 1050. Upon his return, he was sent by Edward the Confessor on an embassy to the emperor Henry II, and remained in Germany a year, learning certain points of ecclesiastical discipline which he afterwards introduced into the Church in England. He was promoted in 1060 to the see of York, holding the see of Worcester in commendam. On this account the pope, when Aldred went to Rome on an embassy from the king, refused him the palli; but being robbed by highwaymen on their journey home, earl Tosti insisted on the pope's making good his loss. He thereupon presented the palli to Aldred, insisting, however, upon his resigning the see of Worcester. After the death of Edward the Confessor, Aldred supported the pretensions of Harold, and crowned his conqueror, William of Normandy, over whom he exerted a very powerful influence. Of the latter part of Aldred's life we know but little. He is said to have been so afflicted by an insurrection of part of the people of his diocese that he died, Sept. 11, 1069. See Bösg. Univ. i, 472; Will. Malm. in Angl. Sacra, ii, 245.

Aldrewold, a friar of the Abbey of Fleury, in France, was born about A.D. 618, near this abbey, and died in 890. He wrote the Miracles operisque mar

Saint Benoît depuis qu'il avait été transféré du Mont Cassin à l'Abbaye de Fleury. Aldrewold finished this history about 876, and it was printed in the Bibliothèque de Fleury and in the collection of the Bollandists. He also wrote a treatise in which he asserted, contrary to John Scotus, the real presence of Jesus Christ in the eucharist, by the authority of the fathers. D'Achéry published this treatise in his Spicilegium, vol. xii. Another work of Aldrewold is l'é de Saint Asylphile, priest of Lerins and a martyr. Mabillon has reproduced this in his Acta SS. Orb. Bred. vol. xi, from a MS. of the year 1108, in which the library of the monastery is authenticated. The other writings which Thriminii attributes to Aldrewold have not come down to us. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aldric, Sr., a French prelate, was the son of Bavarian parents of royal descent, but subjects of the French empire, and was born about A.D. 800. He passed his early years at the court of Charlemagne, and became chaplain and confessor of the emperor. In 882 he was appointed bishop of Muns, and was deprived of his bishopric by Lothaire, but re-established by Charles II in 841. In 846 he assisted at the Council of Paris, and in 849 at that of Tours. He died Jan. 7, 856. He composed a Recueil de Comons, collected from the councils and the decreets of the popes. The loss of this interesting compilation, known as Capitulaires d'Aldric, is regretted. He also wrote three Testaments and an Order for Divine Service, published in the Analectes of Mabillon and in the Miscellanea of Baluze. He ordered that his church at Muns should, at the grand ceremonies, be illuminated by at least 190 lamps and by ten wax tapers. It is not true that organs were first introduced in his time, neither that the first one was established in his church. They were of more ancient origin. Constantine Copronymus gave one to Pepin in 757, and this was the first one known in France. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. See also ALDOHRUS.

Aldrich, David, a Baptist minister, was born in Cumberland, R. I., Jan. 14, 1781. He was a graduate of Brown University in the class of 1806. Having pursued a course of theological study with the Rev. Dr. Gano, pastor of the First Baptist Church at Providence, he was ordained to the work of the Christian ministry under the direction of that Church, and settled as pastor of the Church at Goshen, Conn. Ill-health compelled him to retire from the ministry, and he lived during the remainder of his life in his native town, holding various civil offices, and in many ways making himself useful in his day and generation. He died May 19, 1879, being at the time of his death the oldest alumnus of Brown University.

Aldrich, Jonathan, a Baptist minister, was born at Stohnbury, Vt., Sept. 14, 1799. He was a graduate of Brown University in the class of 1826, and studied at the Theological Institution one year (1826-27). He was ordained at West Dedsam, Mass., in January, 1828. His pastorates were in West Dedham, Beverly, East Cambridge, Worcester, Newburyport, all in Mass.; Baltimore, Md.; and Framingham and Middleborough, Mass. He was for some time the district secretary for New England of the American Baptist Missionary Union. His death occurred at Worcester, Jan. 17, 1862. Mr. Aldrich was the compiler of a hymn-book, which is used in quite a number of Baptist churches, especially in New England, for social services.

Aldridge, Robert, an English painter, was born at Barnham, Bicknineshire, about the end of the 15th century. He was educated at Eton, and was elected a scholar of King's College, Cambridge, in 1507, when he took his A.M. He became proctor of the university, schoolmaster of Eton, fellow of the college, and at last provost. In 1529 he retired to Oxford, where he received his B.D., and about the same time was made archdeacon of Coleshed. He was installed canon of Windsor in 1534, and the same year he was appointed register of the Order of the Garter. On July 18, 1357, he was consecrated bishop of Carlisle, and he died at Horncastle, Lincolnshire, March 25, 1555. He wrote, Epistolae ad Gulielmum Hermonum; Epigrammata Varia; Several Resolutions concerning the Sacraments; Answers to Certain Queries concerning the Abuses of the Mass. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Aldricus, St. (or, in France, St. Andry), a French prelate, was born in the Pays d'Aliginais in A.D. 775. Although brought up in luxury, he early began to practice abstinence and every kind of austerity, successively taking the vows of the Monastery of Ferrières, then called Bethlehem. He was ordained deacon in 818. His reputation for piety attracted the notice of Jeremia, bishop of Sens, who ordained him priest in 820, and also that of Louis le Debonnaire, who made him his preceptor. He afterwards became abbot of Ferrières and bishop of Sens in 828, and the following year assisted at the Council of Paris, where he had charge, together with Ebbon of Rheims, of reforming the Monastery of St. Denis. During the revolt of Lothaire, the archbishop of Sens remained faithful to his sovereign. In 834, at the Council of Thionville, he was one of the prelates who annulled the acts of the rebels. He died Oct. 10, 840, and, according to his own request, his body was first buried in the dean of the Church of Ferrières, but it was soon removed to a more suitable place. His festival is observed by the churches of Senlis and Soissons on Oct. 10. He wrote, Lettre à Frénois, Édouc de Toulo, in Duchesse, Mabillon, and Labbé. This article, signed by twenty-six prelates, is without date, and is addressed to the bishops of the empire of Lothaire in 838, the period of the deposition of Louis le Debonnaire. His Life, written by a monk of the Abbey of Ferrières, is given by Contenau, Liconus, Ehrardus, Hoder, Novus, Biog. Générale, s. v. See also ALDRIC.

Aldridge, W., an English Congregational minister, was born April 30, 1796. He was converted early in life and educated at Chestnut College. He preached successively at Newham, Gloucestershire; Clifford, Herefordshire; Bearfield, Wiltshire; and Grinstead, Sussex. Mr. Aldridge finally settled, about 1840, at Hereford, where he died, Dec. 30, 1867. He was an emi-

Aldrovandini, Pomponio Agostino, a celebrated Italian painter, was born in 1677. He executed many works for the palaces, theatres, and churches of Vienna, Prague, and Dresden, besides several beautiful works in oil, fresco, and distemper. He died in 1739.

Aldulf (or Baldudell), the tenth bishop of Rochester, was consecrated by archbishop Brixwaldi in the year 740. He was one of the consecrators of archbishop Tatwine in 741, and is mentioned by Bede in his closing chapter. He attests a charter of Ossere in 736 (Kemble, Cod. Diplomat. i, 99), and an act of his own, dated 738, is still extant requesting confirmation of a gift of land made to his Church by Eadbode, king of Kent. He also had a grant from Ethbald. He is mentioned as having done annually in the port of London in 754. His death is placed on Simeon of Durham in 739, and by Florence of Worcester in 741; but as it is mentioned in connection with that of archbishop Northem in both places, it probably took place in 759.—Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Aldulph, a bishop whose consecration is recorded by Simeon of Durham to have taken place at Corbridge in 786. When he consecrated him to his bishopric he consecrated bishop of Lichfield; but Aldulph of Lichfield was not bishop until after 800. He may, however, be safely identified with the bishop of Mayo, in Ireland, "Aldulphus Myenias ecclesie episcopus," who attended the Legatine Council of the North in 787. See Spelman, Concil. i, 901; Wharton, Anglo-Sax. Hist. s. v.; Smith, Dict. of Brit. s. v.

Aloisius, a Flemish painter, was born at Liege, and flourished in the latter part of the 17th century. He went to Rome and adopted the style, and painted in conjunction with Morandi, Romanelli, and Bonatti. He executed an altar piece in oil and the ceilings of the chapels in fresco for the Church of Santa Maria dell' Anima at Rome. He died in 1689.

Alessa, in Greek mythology, was a surname of Miletus at Tegea, in Arcadia, after Aeaus, son of king Aphidas of Arcadia, who built the temple of Minerva at Tegea. When this temple was destroyed by fire, it was rebuilt in a much more beautiful style by Sosias, one of the most famous architects of Greece. Pausanias relates that the statue of the goddess was so exquisitely beautiful that Augustus had it conveyed to Rome.

Alaborn, Jacob, a German Reformed minister, probably came into the ministry through the Independent Synod. He was early engaged in the missionary work at Kensington and Rising Sun. In 1840 he was without a charge, and also the two following years. In 1843 we find him erased from the roll by the Classis of Pennsylvania, and he was entirely lost sight of afterwards. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the German Ref. Church, iv, 490.

Alecto, in Greek mythology, was a fury, daughter of Etheer and the Earth.

Alectorion Stone, in Greek mythology, was a rocky substance which the ancients believed was found in the stones of the country of Selene (Selinus), in Sicily. This stone was said to possess powers producing happiness and good luck. It was also said to produce love, to prevent danger, to give fluency of speech, and to be a disburser of riches. It was believed that Pericles, Demosthenes, and other renowned Greeks were in possession of such a stone.

upon each letter a grain of wheat was put. A cock was brought in, and the letters were carefully noted from which he took the wheat. Words were then construed from these letters.

Alectryon, in Greek mythology, was a servant of Mars, whom he employed as a door-keeper when he made a call on Venus. Alectryon fell asleep. Sol finding entrance to the happy pair, betrayed their silent joy to Vulcan, who threw an invisible net about Mars and Venus; and, calling all the gods together, he thought to make them laugh at all the time the he himself was laughed at by the gods. Mars transformed the unfaithful door-keeper into a cock.

Alegre, Angélique d', a French Capuchin friar who lived in the later half of the 17th century, wrote Le Chéri parfait; ou, Le Portrait des Perfections Divines tirées de l'Homme sur l'Original (Paris, 1665).

Alegre (de Canamante), Marcos Antonio, a Spanish Carmelite, was born in 1590 at Tarazona, a little town north of Aragon. He chose to live in retirement rather than accept the position of secretary of the king, Philip III; and died Sept. 10, 1638. He wrote, Paradisus Carmelitanae Decoris, cum Apologia pro Joanne XLV, Patriarchio Hierosolymitano (Lyons, 1639). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alegress. The seven Alegres are prayers addressed to the Virgin in the Roman Church. The word is derived from alegire, Lat. alacer, and signifies an uncontrolled joy.

Alégrin, Jean, a French prelate, was born at Abbeville, in Picardy, about the middle of the 12th century. He was, at different times, archbishop of Besançon, bishop of Sabina, and cardinal and Latin patriarch of Constantinople. Under Gregory IX he was sent as legate to Spain and Portugal; and died in 1227 or 1240. He wrote a Commentatio sur les Pauvres de Dauid: — Sermons: — Panégyriques: — and Expositions of the Epistles and Gospels (Paris, 1521). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aleman, Louis, known by the name of Cardinal d'Arles, a French prelate, was born in 1590 at the château of Arzent, seigniory of the county of Duguey. He was made bishop of Maguelonne; then raised to the see of Montpellier; then archbishop of Arles. In 1426 he was made cardinal by pope Martin V, who sent him to the Council of Sienna, and appointed him vice-camarlingo of the Church. In 1431 he, with cardinal Julian, presided at the Council of Basle. Eugenius IV, who was elected pope the same year, made every effort to maintain the pontifical authority, baffled and broken by the Council of Constance, which had placed the authority of the councils beyond that of the pope. The Council of Basle, directed by the cardinals Alemán and Julian, sought to widen this breach. Pope Eugenius then wished to be transferred to Bologna, that he might exercise greater influence; but the French and German prelates, sustained by the princes of the North, strongly opposed this measure. Cardinal Alemán was active against this; and, having fortified himself with the alliance of the emperor Sigismund and the duke of Milan, he hurled against the pope the sentence of deposition, and placed in 1440 the tara upon the head of Ama- dius VIII, duke of Savoy, who took the name of Felix V. According to contemporary historians, Alemán delivered an address which divided the Catholics into Moderates and Ultramontanists, and stirred up a remarkable ferment. Eugenius excommunicated the antipope, and declared Alemán removed from all his ecclesiastical honors. In order to make an end of the scandal of a schism, Felix V abdicated at the same council with Al- eman. Nicholas V, who in 1447 succeeded Eugenius, restored Alemán to all his honors and sent him as legate to the Low Countries. On his return Alemán retired to his diocese, where he zealously devoted himself to the instruction of the people. He died at Salón in 1459. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alemán, Louis Augustin, a French writer of considerable note, born at Grenoble, son of Protestant parents, whose religion he abjured. He was admitted M.D. at Aix; and, having failed in his profession, went to Paris. He used at his native place in 1728; and, living among other works, Histoire Monastique d'Irlande (Paris, 1690, 12mo). See Gough, Typographie, vol. ii; Le Clerc, Biographie Universelle, i, 461.

Alemán, Arcangela, a Dominican nun of the Monastery of St. Niccolodi, was a native of Florence, and lived in the later half of the 16th century. She wrote, in the form of letters, the life of the celebrated Lorenzo Strozzi, her friend and confidante. These letters were entitled Epistola ad Zachariam Montium de Flora Mortibus et Feliux Morte ejus Materiarum dicta Soro- ris Strozii, et Alon ad Alon. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alemán (or Alaman) Cosimo, an Italian Jesuit, was born at Milan about 1558, and entered the Society in 1575. He was a warm admirer of St. Thom- as's writings. His death took place May 24, 1634; and he left, among other works, Summa Totius Philosophiae et D. Thoma Aquinatis Doct. Angel. Doctrina (Paris, 1618).

Alemán (or Alaman), Giovanni Battista, an Italian prelate, was born at Florence, Oct. 30, 1519. He accompanied his father, the celebrated Luigi Alaman, to France, where he became almoner to queen Catharine de Medici. He afterwards became private councillor to king Francis I, who conferred on him the charge of the Abbey of Belleville. In 1555 he obtained the bishopric of Bazas, which he exchanged in 1558 for that of Macon. He died Aug. 13, 1581. He wrote, three Letters, addressed to Benedetto Varchi, which were inserted in the second volume of the Prose Florentines: — Sonnets, addressed to, and published with the poems of Varchi, (Florence, 1657) — La Amarchide, a poem on his father (ibid. 1570). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alemán, Nicola. See ALERMANN.

Alemannus, a hero of the ancient Germans, whom they revered as a god.

Alemadr, an officer of some distinction among the emirs, or descendants of Mohammed. He may be called the standard-bearer; for when the sultan appears in public on any solemn occasion, the alemdar carries Mo- hammed's green standard, on which is inscribed Niz- aznamen Allah (Help from God).

Alemóns, in Roman mythology, was the tutelary goddess who presided over children prior to their birth.

Alen (or Allen), Edmond, an English clergyman, was a native of Norfolk. He was elected fellow of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, in 1536; proceeded A.M. the year following; and became the steward in 1539. He shortly after went abroad for the sake of study, and became a great proficient in the Greek and Latin tongues. He was obliged to remain in exile during the reign of queen Mary; but no sooner was Eliza- beth queen than she appointed him one of her chaplains, gave him a commission to act as an ambassador, and nominated him to the see of Rochester. After a long absence he died, either on his return or soon after, and never being buried, he is not one of the bishopric. It is said that he was buried in the Church of St. Thomas Apostle, in London, Aug. 30, 1559. He translated into English, Ales. Aletius de Autoritate Verbi Dei (12mo); — Phil. Melanch. super Utrecte Sacramenti Specie et de Authori- tatis Episcoporum (1546, 12mo); — and Conradus Felici- cianus super Apostolid. He published, A Christian Alençon, Guillaume, a martyr who did much good in the provinces of France, in 1554, by colportage. Coming to Montpellier, he was there circumvented by false brethren, detected, and put in prison. In his faith he was firm and constant to the end of his martyrdom; being burned Jan. 7, 1554. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 416.

Alençon, Tommaso, an Italian historical painter, was born at Cremona in 1500. He executed some works, in competition with Galeazzo, in the Church of Santo Domenico at Cremona, which are difficult to distinguish from those of that master. He died in 1560.

Aler, Paul, a learned German Jesuit, was born at Saint Guy, in Luxemburg, Nov. 9, 1556. He studied at Cologne; and in 1576 entered the Order of St. Ignatius. He was professor of philosophy, theology, and belles-lettres at Cologne until 1619. In 1701 he was invited to the University of Treves, where he gave a course of lectures on theology; and in 1708 was appointed regent of the gymnasial school. About the same time he was employed in the organization and direction of the gymnasial academies of Ulm, Aix-la-Chapelle, Treves, and Juliers. He died at Duren in 1727, and left as his principal works, Tractatus de Artibus Humanae (Treves, 1717, 4to)—Philosophia Tripartita Pars I, sive Logica (Cologne, 1710); Pars II, sive Physica (1715); Pars III, sive Anima et Metaphysica (1724); and some classic annotations, etc. See Biog. Ales, a term applied in England to certain festivals, which were variously distinguished as the bridal-ale, Whitman-ale, lamb-ale, leet-ale, etc. But the church-ales and clerk-ales (sometimes called the church-ales of the bishop) were among those authorized sports, which, at the time of the Reformation, caused great contention between the archbishop Laud and the Puritans. The people, on the conclusion of afternoon prayers on Sundays, were in the habit of going to their "lawful sports and pastimes," in the churchyard or neighborhood, or in some public-house, to drink and make merry. It was claimed that the benevolence of the people at their pastimes enabled many poor parishes to cast their bells, beautify their churches, and raise stock for the poor. Sometimes these were held in honor of the tutelar saint of the church, or for the express purpose of raising contributions for its repair. Clerk-ales were festivals for the assistance of the parish clerk with money or with good cheer, as an encouragement in his office.

Aleudson, in Persian religion, is the veil in which the holy fire of the Guebres burns. It stands on the stone called Adosh, in the chapel of fire Ashagh.

Aléssio, Matteo Perico d', an Italian artist, born at Rome, Oct. 16, 1568, and died on April 10, 1645. He was much employed by the papal court, as a painter and graver. He went to Spain, where he executed many fresco paintings for the churches of Seville; the principal one being a colossal picture forty feet high, in the cathedral, representing St. Christopher carrying the infant Saviour on his shoulder. It is highly praised by Palomino Valasco. After a few years he departed from Spain and went to Rome, where he died, in 1650.

Alessandro, Benjamin, of Reggio, a Jewish rabbi who flourished towards the latter part of the 17th and the beginning of the 18th century, is the author of Ben Sis, a commentary on Lamentations (Venice, 1718): an Egyptian lexicon (ibid.); together with comments on some passages of the Midrash Echa, printed with his commentary (ibid.), and a commentary on the songs of degrees— Func, a commentary on the sayings of the fathers (ibid. 1719). See First, Bibl. Jud. i, 58; De Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Ger. transl.), p. 36. (B. P.)

Alessandro, Innocenzo, an Italian engraver, was born at Venice in 1740. He engraved several plates in aquatinta and in the crayon manner, of which the following are the principal: The Ammoniation: The Flight into Egypt, after F. Le Moine: The Virgin Mary, a reproduction of a picture of angels, after Piazzetta: The Virgin Mary, with guardian angels releasing the souls in Purgatory, after Sebastian Ricci: two landscapes, and a set of twelve landscapes after Marco Ricci: four prints representing Painting, Music, Astronomy, and Geometry, after Domenico Majotto.

Alethea (truth), in Greek mythology, was (1) the goddess of truth, daughter of Jupiter; according to others, of Saturn. (2) A nurse of Apollo.

Aletrides, a name given in Greece to the young women of honor who prepared the flour for the sacrificial bread.

Aleuromantas was also a surname of Apollo, because these sacrifices were made to him.

Aleworth, John, a Christian martyr, suffered death in a prison at Reading in July, 1555. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, vii, 328.

Alexander, the name of a large number of saints in the early martyrlogies: (1) Martyr under Decius, commemorated Jan. 30; (2) commemorated Feb. 9; (3) son of Claudius, martyr at Ostia, Feb. 18; (4) bishop of Alexandria, Feb. 29 and April 10; (5) of Thessalonica, Feb. 27; (6) of Africa, March 5; (7) of Nicomedia, March 6; (8) with Gaius, March 10; (9) bishop of Jerusalem, martyr, March 18 [see Alexander of CAPPADOCIA]; (10) martyr at Cesarea in Palestine, March 28, March 27; (11) saint, April 24, April 21; (12) the scope of Alexander I, said to have been put to death at Rome under Trajan (or Hadrian), May 5; he is named in the Gregorian Canon; (13) martyr at Bergamo, Aug. 26: (14) bishop and confessor, Aug. 28; (15) "in Sabini," Sept. 9; (16) commemorated Sept. 17; (17) "in Capua," Oct. 15; (18) Armenian patriarch, Nov. 7, April 17; and Aug. 11; (19) bishop and martyr, Nov. 28; (20) martyr at Alexandria, translated Dec. 12.

Alexander, bishop of Antioch, succeeded Porphyrius, A.D. 413, as the thirty-eighth bishop of the see. Before he was raised to the episcopate he had lived an ascetic life in a monastery. The influence of his mild words and winning character led to the healing of sick souls, who were pleased with his severe yet kindly, eight-and-fifty years between the remaining partisans of the banished Eustathius and the main body of the Church. He restored the name of Chrysostom to the ecclesiastical registers. He excited the people of Constantinople to demand the restitution of their archbishop's name from the intruder Atticus. He was succeeded by Theodotus, A.D. 421.

Alexander, bishop of Apamea, in Syria Secunda, and metropolitan, accompanied his namesake and brother metropolitan, Alexander of Hierapolis, to the Council of Ephesus, A.D. 431. He is probably the Alexander despatched by the Oriental bishops to Alexandria with one of the many vain attempts to overcome the obstinacy of Cyril.

Alexander, bishop of Basiliopolis, in Bithynia, a noble family, early embraced the monastic life and took holy orders. Going to Constantinople, he made the acquaintance of Chrysostom, who was so highly pleased with him that, before 406, he ordained him bishop of the city of Basiliopolis. He shared the fall of Chrysostom, and, retiring to his native country, settled at Ptolemas, where Synesius found him in 410. He was afraid, however, to receive him in church or to appear with him in public on account of the malign influence of Theophilus of Alexandria. On the publication of the amnesty after Chrysostom's death, Alexander refused to avail himself of it or leave Ptolemas, deeming the peace a false one. See Synesius, Epistolae lvii, lviii.

Alexander (St.) Carbonarius (the charcoal-burner), a man of good family and wealth, left everything to embrace the lowly occupation of a charcoal-burner. The faithful in Comana having need, about A.D. 248, of a bishop, applied to St. Gregory of Neo-Caesarea, called Thaumaturgus; he came to the city and rejected all the candidates that were presented to him. Upon the recommendation of a person present jeeringly named "Alexander the charcoal-burner" as a man such as the bishop desired. He sent for, conversed with him, and was so charmed with his singular fitness for the sacred office that he appointed him to the bishopric. It is believed that he suffered martyrdom under the emperor Decius, and the modern martyrlogy marks his festival on Aug. 11. See Gregorius Nyssenus, Life of St. Greg. Thaum.; Bailleit, Aug. 11.

Alexander the Carpenter, so called from his father's trade, was an Englishman, and flourished about 1480. He composed a treatise, Destructorismus Fidicium (Venice, 1589), which has been by some attributed to Alexander of Hale. See Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, 129.

Alexander of (St.) Epaphius, in Italy, near Rome, was general of the order of Augustinian hermits in 1312, and in 1325 was made archbishop of Ravenna. The time of his death is uncertain. He wrote a treatise on The Imperial Jurisdiction and the Authority of the Roman Pontiff; by order of pope John XXII (Lyons, 1408, in 2 books; Rimini, 1624) -- also two other works. See Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, 16; Pamphilii, Chron. Ord. Erem.

Alexander Essebiansis, an English poet and theologian, flourished about 1220. He wrote, A Chronicle of England: -- A Medical Compendium of Bible History: -- A Life of St. Agnes: -- and other works. See Alibius, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Alexander, bishop of Galloway, in Scotland, was elected about 1446, and in 1449, and as the resident in an embassy to England in 1428. He was still bishop in 1444, and is said to have resigned the see in 1451. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 275.

Alexander of Iloia, a lawyer, taught the law for thirty years at Pavia, Ferrara, and Bologna, and died in 1467, leaving Commentaries on the Decretals and other works.

Alexander, bishop of Lincoln, was born at Blois, France, and was a nephew of Roger, bishop of Salisbury, who secured for him the bishopric of Lincoln, to which he was consecrated July 12, 1198. He built (in 1214) the greater part of the cathedral, which had been nearly destroyed by fire. In 1142 he went to Rome, and returned invested with legatine authority. He also visited Rome in 1144, and in August, 1147, made a journey into France to see the pope, and spending there, but the town of August, setting out for home, died soon after his return. See Bis, Universelle, i, 528; Godwin, Life of Alexander.

Alexander of Lycolpolis wrote a short treatise against the Manicheans, printed in Galland, Biblioth. Veterr. Patrum, iv, 73-87. Its title is άλεξανδρου δολοπολίων ιματισμοί τον ή τον, προς τον Μανισιον ἔδωκεν. Photius (Contra Man. i, 11) calls him the archbishop of Lycolopolis. He must have flourished early in the 4th century, as he says (c. 2) that he derived his knowledge of Manes' doctrines from οὗ τῶν γγυμνῶν τον αὐτός. It has been disputed whether he was a Christian when he wrote the book, or whether it became, after one of his visits, to the testimony of Photius seems to settle the latter point.

Alexander of Lyons, a physician and martyr, was a native of Phrygia. During the persecution of the churches of Lyons and Vienne, he was exposed with another Christian to be devoured by the wild beasts in the amphitheatre, which suffering was endured with great constancy. The details of the matter are not settled. Alexander took place A.D. 177, and his memory is celebrated June 2, the same time as that of the other martyrs of Vienne and Lyons. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générales, s. v.

Alexander the Pharitze, an Englishman and abbot of the Benedictine monastery of St. Augustine at Canterbury, who lived at the beginning of the 13th century, was distinguished for his steady adherence to king John, for which he was excommunicated. He wrote various treatises, among them De Ecclesia Politestate. He died either in 1217 or 1220.

Alexander, bishop of Ross, in Scotland, was promoted to that see in 1257, and was bishop there in the thirteenth year of king David II (1259). He was bishop when king Robert II came to the crown in 1306, and in 1404, he was witness to a charter by Isabel, countess of Mar and Garroch, to Alexander Stewart, eldest son to Alexander earl of Buchan, granted upon the contract of marriage between them, and to an instrument in consequence thereof on Sept. 9 following: also to a charter and precept of seisin relative to the same on Dec. 9. Alexander was contemporary with Alexander bishop of Aberdeen and William Keith. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 188.

Alexander Severus, a Roman emperor, was born at Acre in Phocicia, in 205. He was carefully educated by his mother, and was adopted and made Caesar by his cousin Heliogabalus, at whose death Alexander was raised to the throne in his seventeenth year. The young emperor followed the noble example of Trajan and the Antonines; and, on the whole, governed ably both in peace and in war. He was murdered in 235, in an insurrection of his Gallic troops headed by the barbarian Maximin. Alexander was favorable to Christianity, but was afterwards following the example of his adopted mother, he is said to have placed the statue of Jesus Christ in his private temple, in company with those of Olympian and Apollonius Tyanus. For a classic reign, as well as his studies in theology and philosophy, in literature, see Gibbon, Decline and Fall, ch. 17.

Alexander, a Valentinian with whom Tertullian entered into a controversy on the incarnation (De Car Chr. 16 sq). It is impossible to say whether he is identical with “Alexander the old heretic” whom Je

Galatians (Pref. ad Gal.).

Alexander, Ann, a minister of the denomination of Friends, was the daughter of William and Esther Tuke, and was born at York, England, May 16, 1677.
Her first description of the work of that country was a visit to Scotland in 1788, in which country she con tributed much to religious progress. Her removal to Ireland, in 1791, was the cause of increased religious awakening in many parts of that country. She came to America in 1803, where she remained two years, preaching in many parts of the country. About 1811 she began the publication of a periodical devoted to the interests of the Society, which has appeared annual ly since 1813 under the title Annual Monitor. She died near Ipswich, England, Oct. 19, 1849. See Annual Monitor, 1860, p. 124.

Alexander, David, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Ireland, and was ordained in 1738. He may have been educated at the Log College, and licensed by Newcastle Presbytery. When called in 1740 to answer for his neglect to attend the stated meetings, he excused himself on account of his bodily weakness, and because the Presbytery were too superficial in examining candi dates and opposed the work of God, and the ministers chosen by the people in carrying it on. Also because they opposed the crying-out during sermons. The Pres bytery met at his church to consider a charge against him of intoxication. He took the pulpit and preached.
He acknowledged the intoxication, and the Presbytery judged it not so heinous as had been represented; but they suspended him till satisfaction was given for his disregardful conduct, yet he was suffered to sit in the synod of 1741 and then withdraw. The conjunct pres bytery of New Brunswick and Newcastle appointed him, on account of “the necessity in the Great Valley,” to supply there. He then passes out of sight. See Web ster, Hist. of the Presb Church in America, 1867.

Alexander, James (1), an English Wesleyan min ister, was born at Bradford, Wiltshire, in 1768. He was converted early in life. When he was taken into the ministry, in 1794, he was sent to preach to the negroes of the West Indies, among whom he labored for six years. He then returned to England, where he minis tered for nineteen years. In 1819 he became a super numary, and died at Wimborne, Jan. 26, 1825. See Min utes of British Cong. in France, 1829.

Alexander, James (2), D.D., a Presbyterian min ister, was born in Mercer County, Pa., Sept. 25, 1798.
He studied for a time in Mercer Academy, and gradu ated from Jefferson College in 1826. His theological studies were pursued in private. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Erie, April 5, 1828; and in October of the same year was ordained and installed pastor of the churches of Greenville, Salem, and Big Bend. This re lation was dissolved June 25, 1834; and in the following year he was dismissed to the Presbytery of Ohio. He labored faithfully in churches in Ohio and Virginia, and died July 26, 1879. See History of the Presbytery of Erie.

Alexander, John (1), a Scotch Episcopalian, was born in 1703. He was ordained deacon and priest in the Scottish Church, and officiated at Allora. In 1743 the diploma of Dunkeld elected him to be their diocesan, and he was consecrated in 1750. In the persecu	tion of the Episcopalian, the chapel of Alexander was razed to the ground, his house was plundered, and he was obliged to conceal himself. He resumed his duties, in spite of the penalties, after the first violence of the persecution ceased, and died in 1776. See Lawon, Hist. of the First Episcopal Church; Keith, Cata logue (Russell's ed.); Skinner, Amma

Alexander, John (2), a Scotch engraver, who worked at Rome in 1718. His plates were chiefly after Raphael. He engraved a set of six middle-sized plates lengthways, dedicated to Cosmo III, grand-duke of Tus cany, as follows: The Benediction of Abraham (1717)
— The Sacrifice of Abraham (1718) — The Angel pearishing Lot from Sodom (edod.) — The Dream of Lot from Sodom (edod.) — Jacob's Ladder (edod.) — Moses and the Burning Bush (1717).

Alexander, John (3), an English Unitarian min ister, was born in Ireland, of English parents, in 1736.
After receiving a grammar-school education, he was sent to the Dissenting Academy at Daventry, from which he went to Dr. Bennion. He afterwards entered the minis try, preaching in or near Birmingham, but princip tially at the small village of Longdon. He died sudden ly, Dec. 28, 1765. After his death, the Rev. John Palm er of London published a work of his entitled A Para phrase upon Ch. xx of 1 Cor., with notes:—Commentary on Ch. xx of 1 Cor., with notes: and a sermon on Ec.
ces. ii, 10 (1766, 4to).

Alexander, John (4), an English Congregational minister, was born at Lancaster, Dec. 19, 1792. He learned to love and serve God in the family circle. In 1812 he was received into fellowship with the Church, and immediately began to preach. Mr. Alexander en	tered Horrox Academy in 1814, and in 1817 was sent as a supply to the Tabernacle, in Norwich. In 1829 he was ordained over that charge, and there labored for nearly fifty years. Upwards of a thousand persons were received into Church fellowship as the result of his minis tery, and ten entered the ministry. Much of his suc cess was owing to the love and attention given to the young people. As a preacher, Mr. Alexander was de liberate at the beginning of his sermons, waxing into great earnestness and fervor at its close; rather rhetori cal in style; and apt in illustration, anecdote, and quo tations from Scripture and sacred song. His efficiency both as preacher and pastor resulted greatly from thor ough and prayerful preparation. His prayer-meeting addresses, week-day sermons, public prayers and speech es, Bible-class lectures, and visitsations of the sick were as carefully thought over, written out in a marvellously neat hand, and prayed over, as were his three Sunday sermons. Mr. Alexander resigned the charge of his charge. He died July 8, 1868. Mr. Alexander publis hed, by request, several single discourses and pam phlets:—also 2 vols. of sermons entitled The Preacher from the Press: —brief Memoirs of bishop Stanley and of Joseph John Gurney: — and a Life of his father, the Alexander, Michael Solomon, D.D., a missionary bishop of the Church of England, was born of Jewish parents, in the grand-duchy of Posen, in May, 1759. Very little is known of his youth and education. He was baptized a Christian at Plymouth, June 22, 1825, by the Rev. Mr. Hatchard, inducted to a curacy in Ireland, and ordained shortly after by the archbishop of Dublin. He was subsequently a home missionary of the Society for the Propagation of Christianity among the Jews, and professor of Hebrew in King's College.

In 1841, when Chevalier Bunsen went to London on a mission for the establishment of a Protestant bishops at Jerusalem, under the joint auspices of the sovereigns of England and Prussia, Dr. Alexander was consecrated to that important charge. Palestine, Chaldea, Egypt, and Ethiopia were the four component countries of his missionary work, but he desired, being too much of alander, to be described, by those who knew him well, as a Talmudist and Hebrew scholar who had few superiors, and who, in the relations of private life, was the most amiable of men.

Alexander, Neckam, an English abbot, was born at St. Alban's, in Hertfordshire, and was educated in different universities. Returning to England, he took up his abode in the abbey of St. Alban's, but shortly after removed to Exeter, where in 1215 he became abbot of the Regular Canons of St. Augustine in that church. He died at Worcester in 1227, leaving the following works: Comment. in IV Evangel. (MS. in Oxford);—Expositio super Cantica (MS. in Oxford and Cambridge);—Laudes Divini Sapientiae (MS.)—De Naturæ Rerum (MS.);—Elucidarium Bibliothecæ (MS. at Caiaus College, Cambridge). See Cave, Hist. Lit., ii, 286.

Alexander, Robert R. R., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Allen County, Ky., Oct. 3, 1831. He experienced conversion in 1849, and in 1851 was licensed to preach and admitted into the Louisville Conference. In 1855 he was transferred to the Louisiana Conference, and in it continued laborious until his death at Jefferson, Tex., April 11, 1867. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1867, p. 136.

Alexander, Samuel, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born Feb. 16, 1836. He professed religion in 1853; moved to Missouri from Tennessee in 1857; and was licensed to preach and received into the Missouri Conference in 1860. In 1872 he was transferred to the Tennessee Conference, from its site to his home, and in the following fall was transferred to the Holston Conference, and remained in its active ranks until he died, Feb. 15, 1874. As a preacher, Mr. Alexander was industrious and eloquent; as a Christian, pious, cheerful, dignified; as a father, devoted and kind. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1874, p. 15.

Alexander, Thomas, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in 1815. His early history is unrecorded. In 1839 he was transferred from the Indiana to the Nebraska Conference, and entered the ministry with great zeal. He died suddenly in Wahoo, Neb., June 4, 1874. Mr. Alexander had been in the traveling connection over twenty years, and had established a reputation for piety and devotedness. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1874, p. 185.

Alexander, William (1), a Congregational minister, was born at Stranraer, Wigtown, Scotland, Feb. 21, 1763. He was apprenticed to his uncle in Newton-Stewart to learn the trade of a carpenter. For several years he worked at his trade in Lancaster, England.

"Visiting the widow of a friend at Golgate in 1797, he was induced to speak to the family on the subject of religion. The neighbors hearing of this, came also to hear this good man and "rare talker." He thus involuntarily became a village preacher, working at his business all the week, and devoting his Sabbaths to the instruction of multitudes in the vicinity of Lancaster, preaching often four times on the Lord's day and walking thirty-two miles." In 1802 he preached at Prescot, and finally became their pastor, preaching also in the neighboring villages. He left the village in 1808, and in 1811 established a congregation at Leigh, commencing his ministry here in 1811. He had to face much opposition, but his prudence, decision, and piety enabled him to bear as well as to disarm hostility. After fourteen years, he removed to Churchtown, where he labored for twenty years, when old-age compelled him to retire. He died at Southport, in January, 1855. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1856, p. 207.

Alexander, William (2), a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born in Philadelphia, Aug. 6, 1757. When about seven years old his father took him to England, where he remained about thirty years. He became a Methodist at Dublin, Ireland, in June, 1815, and was licensed to preach in the same year by the Rev. Richard Watson. In 1835 he returned to Philadelphia, and for nearly six years he was moral instructor in the Maysmendale Prison. Subsequently he was ordained a deacon in the Protestant Episcopal Church, and for a few years before his death was assistant rector of the Church of the Atonement.

Alexander, William (3), a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. Concerning his birth and life we have no other record than that from 1852 until his death, Dec. 5, 1872, he served the Church as a travelling preacher in the St. Louis Conference, and that he possessed good preaching abilities and was always a hopeful, cheerful, and devoted Christian and father. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1873, p. 869.

Alexandria, the modern city, stands, not exactly on the site of the old one, but partly on what was the island of Pharos, now a peninsula, and mostly on the isthmus by which the island is connected with the mainland. This isthmus was originally an artificial dike connecting the island with the shore; but through the accumulated rubbish of ages it has now become a broad strip. The principal public and government buildings are on the peninsula, but the residences, squares, and business part are on the mainland. The general appearance of Alexandria is by no means striking; and, except for its environment, sandy, flat, and sandy, it is narrow, irregular, and filthy, and the houses mean and ill-built; the Frankish quarter, on the other hand, presents the appearance of a European town, having handsome streets and squares and excellent shops. Great improvements have taken place under the native Egyptian rule. The principal hotels, shops, and offices are situated in the Great Square, which is planted with trees and contains a fountain. In the suburbs are numerous handsome villas and pleasant gardens.

The only surviving remains of the ancient city are a few cisterns still in use; the catacombs on the shore west of the city; the red granite or syenite obelisk of Thothmes III, with its fallen fellow, brought thither from Heliopolis, and usually called Cleopatra's Needles (lately removed, the one to London and the other to New York); and the Column of Diocletian, more commonly known as Pompey's Pillar. In 1854, while preparations were going on for the elevation of new buildings, the workmen came upon ancient massive foundations which are supposed to have been the remains of the building of the celebrated Alexandrian Library. See Murray, Handbook for Egypt, p. 75 sq.; Budge, Lower Egypt, p. 201 sq.

ALEXANDRIA, COUNCILS OF (Concilium Aegypti). In addition to the information already given under this head, a fuller account of some of these councils may be found below.

I. Held in 306, under Peter, bishop of Alexandria. Meletius, bishop of Lycomolysis, was deposed, having been convicted of sacrificing to idols and many other crimes.

II. This council was held in the year 319 by the celebrated Hosius, bishop of Cordova, sent by Constantine to appease the troubles to which the heresies of Arius and the schism of Meletius had given rise, and to restore the peace of the Church. Hosius conducted himself in the business with sedateness and care worthy of his piety and of the confidence placed in him. In this council everything relating to the doctrine of the Trinity and to the condemnation of the heresy of Sabellius, who denied the distinction of persons in the sacred Trinity, was thoroughly discussed. Very little, however, is known of what passed here. See Labbe, Concil., 1495.

III. Held in 321, by Alexander, bishop of Alexandria, attended by all his clergy, on account of the heresy of Arius, which was there condemned. Arius was the curate of a Church in Alexandria; he was a man of very considerable talent, with all the external appearance of inward excellence. Jealousy at seeing Alexander promoted to the throne of Alexander betrayed him into heresy. The unimpeachable life of his bishop affording him no handle for attacking his character, he determined to accuse him on the score of doctrine; and the power of the Church, that our Saviour Jesus Christ is truly God, Arian dared—first in private conversation, and afterwards publicly—to assert that the bishop was in error and had fallen into the heresy of Sabellius; that our Lord was but a creature, however exalted. Alexander, having first of all procured the support of the populace by calumny, advising and exhorting him to open his eyes to the enormity of his error; but the latter persisted in his opinions. At last this council was convened, in which Arius and nine others of the clergy of Alexandria were condemned and deprived; also a synodical letter was addressed by Alexander to his brother bishop, Alexander of Byzantium. See Cave, A. postolici, p. 349.

Another council was held later in the same year by Alexander, composed of one hundred Egyptian bishops, exclusive of the priests who were present. After hearing Arius, it proceeded to anathematize him and twelve of his followers, both priests and deacons; also two bishops, and one presbyter and three deacons; and to pass censure upon Eusebius of Nicomedia. 1V. Held in 340, in support of Athanasius, and after the death of Constantine. There were present at it eighty or one hundred bishops, from Egypt, the Thebaid, Libya, and Pentapolis. All the synodical advan- tages by the bishops. Nothing at all was set down by the bishops, or what follow from them. Everything that this council was done according to rule, and altogether in a manner very different from what had been done two or three years before at the Council of Tyre. Athanasius was fully justified. These same bishops also wrote a synodical letter to all the orthodox bishops in order that, by union among themselves, they might be strengthened against the heresy. Complaint was made that the Eusebians continued to persecute Athanasius; that they had caused him to be exiled; and that they had sent to the three emperors a letter filled with fresh calumnies against him. This council justified his conduct; it went back to the origin of the persecutions which Athanasius had suffered, and showed that the Arians had hated him, even when he was only in deacon's orders; it proved that his ordinance was strictly according to rule; it observed that Eusebius of Nicomedia had changed his see several times, forgetting that his ordination belonged to the Church by the right of nature, not to seek to change, and that the guilt of adultery according to the teaching of the Holy Scriptures. It showed, further, that the proceedings of the Council of Tyre were invalid, both because the party of Eusebius was dominant there, and the secular power prevented all freedom of action; again, it exonerated Athanasius of the murder of Arsenius, alluded fresh to the irregularity of the proceedings in the Marisot, accused the Eusebians of dividing the Church by menaces and terror, and finally exhorited the bishops to give no credit to anything written against Athanasius. See Labbe, Concil. ii, 592.

2. Secundus and Theona; and to pass censure upon Eusebius of Nicomedia. 1V. Held in 340, in support of Athanasius, in concert with Eusebius of Vercelli, to deliberate with him and the other bishops upon the affairs of the Church, and particularly upon the means to be adopted for restoring peace and union to the Church of Antioch. The "orthodox" Christians could not induce the Eustathians (q. v.) to unite with them. The council settled that teachers and defenders of heresy should be admitted to penance, but not to retain their clerical office; while those who had been led away should be allowed to retain their rank, provided they subscribed the acts of the Council of Nicea. See Athanasius, De An. p. 575; Baronius, An. Dom. p. 562, p. 355; Cave, A. postolici, p. 444.

VI. In the council held in 401, the writings of Origen were condemned. Theophrus, bishop of Alexander, who there presided, condemned also the promoters of the Arian heresy. See Labbe, Concil. ii, 1219.

ALEXANDRIA, JEWS IX. Whether the founder of Alexandria transplanted a Jewish colony into Egypt, or the first Ptolemy removed many Jewish prisoners to Egypt who received their freedom from his successor, there is no certain. There is even a story (in the apocryphal books of the New Testament) that the Church, that our Saviour Jesus Christ is truly God, that our Lord was but a creature, however exalted. Alexander, having first of all procured the support of the populace by calumny, advising and exhorting him to open his eyes to the enormity of his error; but the latter persisted in his opinions. which the president spoke he waved the banner, and the people answered "Amen." They did not resist peacefully; they were not thus permitted to be translated; and the houses of prayer in Alexandria were also houses of instruction, for on all Sabbaths and festivals discourses were held by those well versed in Scripture, who explained in the Greek language the appointed portion of the Pentateuch which had previously been read to the congregation. During the Syriaristians' absence, the houses of prayer in Alexandria had been taken over by the diaspora of the house of Onias, the youngest son of Onias III, the last legitimate high-priest, who, when his aged and venerable father was murdered, thought himself no longer safe in the mother country. The king of Egypt received him very favorably, and Onias rendered him, as general, many important services.

When, soon afterwards, the Temple was defiled by the Syrians, and especially when Alcinus was illegally made high-priest, Onias resolved to erect a lawful temple in Egypt in place of the one defiled in Jerusalem, and whose high-priest he himself should be. In order to obtain the consent of the Jews, he backed his proposition by referring them to the prophecy in Isaiah (xix, 19), which should thus become fulfilled: "One day an altar of the Lord will stand in Egypt." The then reigning king, Polycem Philometor, gave him for the purpose of building a city near the town of Alexandria, which was four and a half geographical miles north-east of Memphis, in the land of Goshen, where once Jacob's descendants had dwelt till the departure from Egypt. In the small town Leontopolis, on the ruins of an Egyptian idol-temple, where once animals had been worshipped, Onias built a sanctuary for the only one God. Its exterior did not entirely correspond with the Jerusalem Temple, but was more in the form of a tower, and built of fire-bricks, while the interior contained the vessels of the temple after the model in Jerusalem, except that the standing candlestick of seven branches was replaced by a golden chandelier, fixed on a golden chain, which the Jews, as they mention in the Tosefta (b., II, 23), did not regard as a Jew; but from the preserved fragments there can be no doubt as to his Jewish origin.

"Artagoras, Eusebius, "Eusebius, Propræpar. Evangel. ix. 10, 29," writes: "Thetioumamis, in which he gives extracts from Jewish Hellenistic writers. Some of these excerpts, again, have been quoted in Eusebius in his Preparatio Evangelica (ix, 17-39). These authors are in part historians, viz.:

1. Eupolemos (Eusebius, "Eusebius, Propræpar. Evangel. ix. 10, 30, 31, 29), the author of the "Histories of the Jews," translated by the "History of Joseph," and, according to Clem. Alex. (Strom. I. 548, ed. Syllog), also the author of the "History of the Hellenistic Philosophers." Although he mentions in the preface to his "Histories" (xi, 23), did not regard as a Jew; but from the preserved fragments there can be no doubt as to his Jewish origin.

2. Apion, Eusebius, "Eusebius, Propræpar. Evangel. ix. 10, 24, 25," writes: "Thetioumamis, or Thetioumamis. The preserved fragments regarding the life of Abraham, Joseph and Moses, also lead us to the conclusion that he was of Jewish descent.

3. Demetrius (Eusebius, "Eusebius, ibid. xi. 21, 29," writes a historical work, "Thetioumamis," which indicates his Jewish origin, speaks of Job.

Eusebius cites also some poets, viz.:

1. The tragedian Ezeckiel ("Eusebius, ibid. x. 28, 29," who wrote a drama entitled "Ezecker," which treats of the Exodus from Egypt. In the fifty-nine lines (the Greek text is given by Delitzsch in his "Geschichte des jüdischen Poesie," p. 211 equ.) Moses is introduced conversing with Zoroaster, who was executed by the Persians in Egypt and his own history. He questions her about the seven virgins whom he sees in her company (a lot of virgins in the time of the Israelites). After her reply there follows a description of the watering of the flock, of the marriage of Moses and Zipporah, and a fragment of a dialogue between the latter and Chonam. In another fragment Moses relates a dream to his father-in-law. In another Moses is introduced as standing before the burning bush, and God is represented as speaking unto him. Then follow Moses' objections, God's commission to Aaron, and the gift of the rod, whose wonder-working powers are described at great length. The whole concludes with a description of the drowning of Pharaoh's army in the Red Sea, as related by an Egyptian. (For Ezeckiel's tragedy and the following writer's work, comp. Philippson, Ezeckiel, des jüdischen Dramatikerlehrers Alexander Thetioumamis, in Philo, des älteren, Jerusalem (Berlin, 1880)."

2. Philo (Eusebius, "Eusebius, Propræpar. Evangel. ix. 20, 24, 37," who wrote: "Thetioumamis.""

3. Theodorus ("Eusebius, ibid. x. 22), the author of an epic poem "Thetioumamis.""

These fragments indicate the following work.

III. Alexandrian Philosophy of Religion.—"A philosophy of religion among the Jews appears, at first, an unwarranted expression. How could they, who, on the intellectual and religious side, secluded themselves so sedulously from all intercourse with neighboring peoples and were fully determined to give no admission to their sacrilegious notions concerning God and religious matters, come to feel any need of a religious philosophy, or to have any inclination for it. The reason was that the attempted seclusion, especially in Alexandria, was far from complete, the spiritual blockade being inadequate to accomplish its purpose. It was inevitable that Greek ideas would follow the Greek language, and as soon as the doors were opened wide enough to admit the Septuagint version some other means of defense were attempted to exclude and ignore the supposed hostile force were imperative. Hence began the period of compromise. Hellenism and the Hellenistic philosophy were an effort to harmonize the revelation of the Old Testament with the current and dominant teachings of Plato, Aristotle, and Pythagoras. Jewish scholars like the Alexandrians Boethus, like Aristobulus, and Philo, did not intend by any means to surrender anything essential to their faith, but, on the contrary, to win for their own prophets and wise men, even among the Greeks, a position higher than that held by their most admired philosophers. They hoped to beat the enemy on his own ground."

The main seat of this Judaic-philosophic activity was Alexandria; but it would be erroneous to think that outside of Alexandria Jewish philosophy was not cultivated. Alexandria, however, was naturally the central place for this branch of science. Thus the oldest Jewish philosophers, like the Alexandrian Boethus, was an Alexandrian. He lived in the time of Ptolemy Philometer, about B.C. 160, and wrote a commentary on the Pentateuch, fragments of which have been preserved by Eusebius (Prepar. Evangel., vii, 14; viii, 10; xiii, 12) and Clemens Alexandria (Strom. i, 342; v, 620; vi, 632, ed. Syllburg). His elucidations consist mainly in the endeavor to avoid anthropomorphisms. His philosophical tendency may be learned from the fact that he was known as a Peripatetic. The special object of his commentary was to prove that the true source of wisdom was the Old Testament, and that this was also the source of Greek philosophy. Plato, Pythagoras, and the Stoics have a direct line of descent from Moses. Even the doctrines of the Greek poets, like Orpheus, Hesiod, Homer, and Linus, agree with those of Moses. He supports his assertion by quoting from these authors. These quotations, it is true, agree entirely with Jewish ideas, which make it certain that they were written by a Jew, whether falsified by Aristobulus or by some one else. While Aristobulus represented the Peripatetic school in the so-called fourth book of the Maccabees (formerly ascribed to Josephus, and found in his works under the title Εἰς Μακαβαίους), the influence of the Stoic philosophy is perceptible. We know nothing of the author, nor of the composition. It is a philosophical treatise or a discourse on the subject "Whether pious reason is master over the inclinations" (εἰ αἰτοδηστικός ἐστι τῶν παθῶν ὁ εὐσεβιός λογομυς). From history, especially from the example of Eleazar and the seven Maccabean brothers and their mother, the author tries to show the affirmative, ἵνα παρακάτω τῶν παθῶν ὁ λογομυς (i, 9). So far as he makes use of philosophical suppositions and ideas, they all belong to the Stoic school, as is indicated by the theme itself. Of greater import than those already mentioned is the Wisdom of Solomon. That the author of this hymn on divine wisdom whom we know, philosophically learned Jew, probably an Alexandrian and belonging to the age before Philo, may be seen from the contents of his work, little as we otherwise know of him. He combines in his ideas Platonic and Stoic elements with those beginning of theoistic speculations which grew on the soil of Palestinian Judaism. It is known that already the Chaldee Wisdom of Jashar (xxvii, 12) and the Proverbs of Solomon (viii-ix), and more especially in Ecclesiastics, the traces for a discernment between the divine wisdom and God himself are found, though the former is not yet actually hypothesized. But in the Book of Wisdom this hypothesizing of the divine wisdom is more freely carried out (comp. vii, 12-28, 51; ix, 4, 9). The epistles given to wisdom are such as are only applied to God: thus she creates everything (viii, 5), governs everything (ver. 1), renews everything (vii, 27). He also distinctly discriminates wisdom from God, and places her in opposition to him as an independent being. She is a breath (ἀνάστη), is the power of God, a pure effusion (ἀνάφορα) from the glory of the supreme, a reflection (ἐντόνωσις) of the everlasting light (vii, 25-26); she lives together with God (ὁ βεβηκός Θεος ἐκκολούθω), is initiated into the mysteries of the knowledge of God (μετὰ τίς τοῦ Θεος ἐπιστήμη), and is chooser of his works (αἱρείται τῶν ἐργῶν αὐτοῦ), i.e. wisdom chooses among God's works what shall be carried into execution (viii, 1-4); she sitteth on God's throne (vii, 25-26). She knows God's works, and was present when he created the world, and knoweth what is acceptable in his sight, and right according to his commandments (ver. 9). All this shows a strong inclination to hypothesizing, although it cannot be said, considering the poetical and rhetorical character of the book, that the author presents the doctrine of hypothesizing the divine wisdom as a fixed formulated dogma. The expressions which he uses in order to designate the work of wisdom in the world (vii, 24, αὐτοί, χωρὶς; vii, 1, αὐτει, etc.) remind us of the analogous formulas of the Stoical school. More disentangled and directly were we to seek Boethus, like Aristobulus, and Philo, did not intend by any means to surrender anything essential to their faith, but, on the contrary, to win for their own prophets and wise men, even among the Greeks, a position higher than that held by their most admired philosophers. They hoped to beat the enemy on his own ground."

The Jews of Alexandria had to endure the same fate as their brethren in Jerusalem. Like the Temple in Jerusalem, so the famous Alexandrian synagogue was destroyed (between A.D. 115 and 117), and the glory of the Alexandrian Jews disappeared, never to be seen again. Alexandrian Liturgy is a title given to that ancient liturgy to which the name of Mark the Evangelist is usually prefixed, believed to be at least as early as the 2nd century. Its liturgical peculiarity is the preceding the Great Intercessory for the living and departed to the words and institution, instead of affixing them as in the Invocation of the Holy Ghost the Holy Spirit in the case of the liturgies of the Antiochene family, or inserting them between the words of Institution and Invocation, as is the case with the Nestorian. On this liturgy were subsequently founded those of St. Cyril, St. Gregory, and the Coptic community; all of which bear a certain resemblance to the more simple liturgy of Alexandria. See Liturgy.

Alexiad was an appellation under which Napoleon was worshipped by the. nunnery-fishers, that their nets might not be torn by the sword-fish. It was also an epitaph of Apollo in Athens, given him for having freed the city from a spreading pestilence.

Alexirhö, a nymph who was wife to Pan.

Alexis, Guillaume, a learned French Benedictine who lived near the close of the 16th century and at the beginning of the 17th. He was the good monk of the Abbey of Lyre, in the diocese of Evreux, and became prior of Bussy in Perche. He is supposed to have died in 1486, though the precise dates of his birth and death are unknown. Alexis made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, and there fell a victim to the persecution of the Turks. He wrote, Le Passé-temps de Tout Homme et de Toute Femme, avec l'A, B, C, des

A. monasteries of the monastery of Studii was patriarch of Constantinople from 1025 to 1045. Some of his decrees are extant.

A. St., was born at Rome about A.D. 350, and compelled by his parents to marry a lady of high rank, but escaping from her on the wedding evening, he spent the night in the porch of the Church of Our Lady of Edessa, where he lived on the charity of others for seventeen years. Having embarked for Taras, he was driven by contrary winds to Rome, and, unknown to himself, was elected pope in his father's house. After his death a paper was found in his hand, on which were written his name and that of his family, and an account of his marriage, etc. The Romans celebrate his memory on July 17, and the Greeks on March 17. He is probably a mythical person, and his story should, without doubt, be applied to St. John Calybites. It may be that the Greeks gave him the sobriquet of Alexius (healer) because of the many miraculous cures attributed to him. See Baillet, July 17.

A. Aristocles was an unusual of the Church of Constantinople, and was present at the Council of Constantinople in 1166. He left Notes upon a Collection of Canons, printed by Justellus in his Library of the Canon Law (ii, 673); also by Beveridge, in Greek and Latin, with notes, in the Pontica of the Canons. See Cave, Historia Literaria, ii, 298.

A. Nicolaus, an Italian ecclesiast, was born at Perugia, and at the age of twenty became a monk. Subsequently he ranked among the first preachers of Italy, and was appointed canon of the cathedral of his birthplace. Having filled the offices of first professor of the College of Perugia and inquisitor, he died, Feb. 28, 1858. He published a small Latin poem, On the Plague, and left several MSS.

A. Gustav, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Rone, Austria, in 1838. He was a student at the University of Milan, Italy, where he graduated in 1867. The following year he came to New York, and, having been early intended for the ministry, he entered the Union Theological Seminary, and graduated in 1871, when he became a resident graduate. Seeing the defective condition of the hundreds of Hungarians and Bohemians in the city, he began the study of the Bohemian language, and was ordained by the Presbytery of New York as a missionary to the same. Prior, however, to entering upon that work, he served as a missionary two years in Barcelona, Spain. He then returned to New York, and founded a Bohemian mission in East Fourth Street, under Rev. A. C. His labors were unceasing in preaching and pastoral visitation; and he was entirely successful in building up a Church and a flourishing Sunday-school. He died suddenly in the street, on Jan. 29, 1880. (W. P. S.)

Alfabeto, in Norse mythology, was a festival at which offerings were made to the elves at night by the inhabitants of the Scandinavian peninsula.

Alfador (Father of all), in Norse mythology, was the supreme god of Norse antiquity. The same attributes which the Mosaic aocracy ascribes to the "un-speaking," and which the Christian aocracy ascribes to the "only God," are found here also. He is creator and preserver of all created things, and his breath is life in all things. His greatness is inseparable; he has never shown himself to a mortal; and when his spirit comes upon the earth, he dwells in the shade of quiet, sacred woods. His will is over all, and everything is subject to his might. This supreme being, who existed before the world, and will exist eternally, is often mistaken for Odin.

Alfani, Domenico of Paris, an Italian painter, was born at Perugia in 1483. He was a scholar of Perugino, whose style he excelled. His reputation has suffered from that of his son Orazio; and even in Perugia some fine works were long ascribed to the latter which are now restored to Domenico. They painted together some fine altar-pieces, especially one in the Church of the Conventuals at Perugia, mentioned by Mariotti. The same writer says he was living in 1556; but Zani says he is painted as late as 1553.

Alifaxis (or Alifaquins) is the term generally applied among the Moors to signify their clergy, or to those who give instruction in the Mohammedan religion.

Alfaro y Gomez, Don Juan, a Spanish painter, was born at Cordova in 1640. He studied under Antonio de Castillo and Velasquez. In the Church of the Carmelites is a fine picture of The Incarnation by Alfaro, and in the Church of the royal College at Madrid as his famous picture of the Guardian Angel. He also painted the portrait of Calderon de la Barca, which was placed upon the tomb of the poet in the Church of San Salvador at Madrid. He died in 1680.

Alfenfuss (or Alfenkreuz), in Scandinavian mythology, is the noted Pentagram, or five-pointed star.

Alfurius, St., flourished about the middle of the 11th century. A dangerous illness led him to embrace the ecclesiastical state; and he assumed the Benedictine habit at Cluny, under Abbot Odilo, about 921. His reputation for sanctity was such that Gaimarus III, prince of Salerno, sent for him to superintend the monasteries in that place. He afterwards retired to the side of Mount St. Elias, and thence to a solitary and dismal cavern, where he was followed by a number of persons. Out of these he chose twelve. The place of his retirement was called the Cave, and became the site of the celebrated monastery Cossombrum Canavese. The saint died in 1050. See Bollandus, Jan. 17, Feb. 17, Mar. 14; Italia Sacra, vii, 367.

Alfes (or Alfasf), Isaac Brabbi Jacob, a Jewish rabbi, was born near Fez in 1018. At the age of sixty-five he was obliged to retire to Cordova on account of a出售. He died at Lucena, Spain, in 1108. While at Cordova he composed a work on practical Jewish ceremonies (הָלָכָה הָעָשׁי, Book of the Halachoth), which the Jews highly esteem and popularly call "The Little Talmud." This work had a large number of editions, the first and most rare is that published at Constantinople in 1509. Sabionesta published another at Venice in 1522, more complete and more highly valued. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bioj. Générale, s. d.; Fürst, Biblioth. Jud., i, 358.

Alfheim, in Norse mythology, is the place of habitation of the elves, presented to the god Frey by the Asa when he got his first tooth. As Frey is the god of fruitfulness, the sunbeams must be subject to him, therefore the elves of light and their habitation must be Alfonso de Espina, or Spina, a celebrated Spanish theologian and preacher, lived near the middle of the 16th century. He was, it is said, of Jewish origin, and entered the Order of Franciscans; became rector of the University of Salamanca, and bishop of Orense, in Galicia. He published a large anonymous work, entitled Fortalitium Fidei contra Judaeos, Saracenos, aliisque Christianos Fidei Inimicos (first published in 1587, and again in 1594 at Nuremberg; among other editions are those of Tottanus, published at Leyden in 1611 and 1624). In the third part may be found violent accusations against the Jews which served as a pretext for their persecution. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générales, s. v. See also Alphonso.

Al-foran (Arab. distinction), a name given by the Mohammedans to the Koran, because, as they claim, it distinguishes truth from falsehood, and is just from unjust. The term may have been applied to the Koran as being a book distinct or separate from every other book.

Alford, Henry, D.D., an English prelate, preacher, poet, and commentator, was born in London, Oct. 7, 1810. His father was a clergyman of the evangelical church in the City of London. Henry was an only child, and remarkably precocious and studious. Having left Ilminster School, he was sent as a private pupil to the excellent Mr. Bickersteth, of Acton, in Suffolk, where, in addition to thorough mental training, he was carefully instructed in the principles of evangelical religion. From Acton he went to Cambridge and entered Trinity College, in which his course was one of the highest distinctions. In 1835 Mr. Alford obtained the presentation to the small vicarage of Wymeswold, in Worcestershire. When he took charge of the parish it was in a deplorable state of disorder and neglect; but through the indefatigable industry of the new vicar, the church was renovated and the spiritual wants of the people attended to with great fidelity. In addition to his work as a clergyman, he engaged in teaching and in literary pursuits. One of his pupils whom he had prepared for Cambridge entered the Church of Rome, and he was charged with culpable negligence in having failed to counteract his Roman tendencies. This incident caused so much unpleasantness that Mr. Alford sought a fresh field of labor; and through the friendship of the Rev. J. H. Gurney, Queen’s Chapel, London, became the scene of his ministrations (1858). It was a post for which he was singularly qualified, and in which he had ample opportunity of making full proof of his ministry. But ere long his reputation as a scholar and preacher won him preference to the deanery of Canterbury (1857). In this position he held in his element; here he found all that could please the eye, delight the ear, and fascinate a soul peculiarly open to aesthetic enjoyment. There was a halo of poetry and romance cast around even the most historical associations of the fabric and the city most congenial to the temperament of the new dean. He became B.A. in 1832, M.A. in 1835, and B.D. in 1844. He died Jan. 12, 1871. Dean Alford’s poetical works are, Poetical and Poetical Fragments (Camb. 1831);—The School of the Heart, and Other Poems (1832, 2 vols.);—Abbot of Machgelus, and Other Poems (1832).—Chapters on the Poets of Ancient Greece (1841, 8vo);—Psalms and Hymns Adapted to the Sundays and Holydays throughout the Year (Lond. 1844), to which are added some occasional hymns:—Poetical Works (2 vols. 12mo);—Select Poetical Works (Boston, 1853, 12mo, pp. 424). Among his many hymns which are found in different hymn-books, there is also a famous Diurna Fides ("day of anger, the dread day"). In general religious literature, besides his contributions to the Contemporary Review, Dean Alford wrote, The Consistency of the Divine Conduct in Revealing the Doctrines of Redemption (Camb. 1842; pt. ii., 1843), being the Huclean Lectures for 1841; to which are added two Sermons by the University of Cambridge:—Sermons (8vo);—Sermons at Quebec Chapel (2 vols. 8vo);—Village Sermons (12mo);—The State of the Blessed Dead (1870);—The Coming of the Bridegroom (ed. Eastern Sermons (1866);—Avent Sermons (1872);—The Sons of God; the Kneum and the Kneum (1754);—Truth and Trust (1757);—The Holy Hymns (edited by his widow, 1875);—Meditations in Advent (1865);—The Year of Prayer (1867);—Life, Journal, and Letters (ed. by his widow, Phila. 1878). His exegetical works are as follows: in 1849 he published the first volume of The Greek Testament, with a Critically Revised Text, a Digest of Various Readings, etc., and a Critical and Exegetical Commentary, and the whole was completed in 1861; since that time it has been published in different editions:—How to Study the New Testament (Lond. 1865-69, 3 vols.);—The New Testament for English Readers, Containing the Authorized Version with Marginal Corrections of Readings and Renderings, etc. (1868, 4 vols.);—The New Testament of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, after the Authorized Version; Newly Compared with the Original Greek and Revised (1870);—The Book of Genesis and Part of the Book of Exodus (a revised version, etc. 1872). Alford, Michael (Griffith), an English Jesuit, was born at London in 1852. He studied philosophy at Seville, and theology at Louvain. He was five years penitentiary at Rome, then coadjutor of the superior of the English College at Liege, and finally rector of the house of the Jesuits at Ghent. Being sent to England, he was arrested on his arrival at Dover and cast into prison, from which he was released by Henrietta, queen of France. He retired to the province of Lancaster, where he occupied himself in collecting material for his Annales Ecclesiastici et Civiles d’Anglaterrre. He was called back to the Continent in 1639 by the head of the order, and came to St. Omer. He is the author of three learned works, Vie de Saint Winifred traduite du Latin de Robert, prieur de Shrewsbury (1856), under the name of John Flood:—Britannia Illustrata, sive Luci, Helena, Constantini Patria et Fides (Antw. 1641);—Annales Ecclesiastici et Civiles d’Anglaterrre (1657). Hugh Gressay made use of this work in his Histoire Église d’Angleterrre. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générales, s. v.

Alfred, William, a Bible Christian minister, was born in Cornwall, England, July 15, 1842. He was converted when seventeen years of age; was accepted on trial by the conference in 1864; and in the year 1867 received an appointment to the pastorate of which he remained till January 28. After laboring with great acceptability and usefulness for nearly five years, he died, April 27, 1872. See Minutes of the Conference, 1872.

Alfric (Alfric, Alfric, Alvric, Alfric, Alfric, or Alfric), an English prelate, lived in the beginning of the 11th century, and was brought up by the bishop St. Ethelwold. In 987 he was appointed by St. Ethelwulf to govern the abbey of Cerne, in Dorsetshire; afterwards he became abbot of Medeshampton (or Peterborough), eventually bishop of Worcester, and in 1028 archbishop of York. He obtained from king Ethelred many privileges for his order, and died in 1060. On account of his great knowledge he was called "the grammarian," and his sermons were so highly esteemed that they were translated into Saxon, and read publicly in the churches. He is often confounded with Aelfric of Canterbury (A.D. 996-1006), Aelfric of Abingdon (983-1005), Elfric of York (1023-1051), Alfric Botha the Anglo-Saxon scholar (11th century), Alfric of Hereford (941), Alfric of Bamburg or (?) Malmesbury (942), and Alfric of St. Peter's (1080). See Cave, Historia Literaria, ii, 108; Rose, New General Biographical Dictionary, a. v.

Alfredin, in Norse mythology, is the first ray of light announcing the coming of day, at whose appearance all spirits of darkness flee.

Algard, ALESSANDRO, an Italian sculptor, was born at Bologna about the year 1600. He was employed in Rome through the influence of Domenichino, and achieved a reputation as the first sculptor of his time by a statue of St. Philip Neri, in the sacristy of the Oratorian Church in that city, and a colossal group representing The Decapitation of St. Paul, in the Church of the Barnabites at Bologna. He executed the bronze statue of Innocent X, erected to commemorate the completion of the Capitol at Rome, the monument of Leo X in St. Peter's, and a figure representing Attilia checked by St. Leo for one of the altars in the same church—the largest work of the kind in the world.

Alger (Lat. Algerus) of Ligea (or of Cluny), a learned French priest, was born about 1055 at Ligea. He studied at his native place, where he was appointed dean of St. Bartholomew's. About 1100 bishop Obert made him canon of the cathedral of St. Mary and St. Lambert, where he labored for twenty years. In 1121 he retired to the monastery at Cluny, where he died about 1132. He was an ecclesiastical writer he was very prominent. He wrote, Tractatus Ecclesiasticus Nego- giotis et Catholici Fidei Valde Utiles:—De Sacra- mentis Corporis et Sanguiinis Domini, Libri III [published by Erasmas, who called this work "Opus plenum juxta ac doctrum" [Baele, 1530, and reprinted in the Bibl. Patr. Lugd. xxi, 251 sq.]]:—Tractatus de Misericor- dia et Justitia (published by Mabillon in his Vetera Anecdota [Paris, 1723], p. 129 sq.); and Martène in his Theaur. Nov. Anecdott. v, 1019; and reprinted by Migne in vol. clxxx of his patrology:—Tractatus de Gratia et Libero Arbitrio (published in vol. iv of the Theaur. Anecdott. pt. ii, p. 114 sq.). A part of his Letters and his History of the Church of Ligea have been lost. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.; Richter, Biogr. Künstler (Leipzig, 1846), ii, 17-17; Hüfner, Biogr. Algerius, Pomponius, a martyr, was an Italian by birth, and a man of great learning. He became a student in the University of Padua, where he ceased not, both by doctrine and example of life, to inform as many as he could in the evangelical doctrine, directing them to Christ. For this he was accused of heresy to pope Paul IV, who had him imprisoned at Venice, and afterwards sent to Rome. Resisting all persuasions and allurements to change his mind, he was burned alive in 1557. While in prison at Venice, he wrote several letters to his friends, indicative of his firm faith. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 467.

Al-Ghazzali (or Ilgazel), Abu Hamid Muham- mad, a Moslem theologian who met the heretical Aria- bian philosophers on their own ground, was born in 1056 and belonged to the sect of the Ascharites. At the age of thirty-three he became the head of a theological college at Bagdad, where his lectures were thronged with eager crowds, including all the imams of the country. His mind having revolted against the orthodox Mohammedan creed, he escaped from Bagdad on the plea of making a pilgrimage to Mecca, but went to Syria, and spent two years in seclusion and meditation at Damascus. While on a journey to Egypt, his private affairs induced him to return to Bagdad, where he reluctantly resumed teaching. There he continued for fifteen years, then retired to Tus, in Khorasan, his native town, and devoted his remaining years to the contemplative life of the Sufis, which had been his earliest instructors. He died in Tus, and was buried there in 1111. He seems to have accepted Aristotelianism of the time in a work entitled The Destruction of the Philoso- phers. For information concerning his philosophical opinions, see Avemro, Works, vol. x, but more especially his spiritual autobiography, translated by Schom- ders in his Essais sur les Ecoles Philosophiques chez les Arabes. Algir (or Malgrin), JOHN, a French prelate and theologian, was born near the close of the 12th century. Nothing definite is known concerning the first part of his life. He was prior of Abbeville, and afterwards went to the University of Paris, where he gained the reputation of being a learned man and an able preacher. In 1225 he was appointed archbishop of Besancon, and in 1227 Gregory IX made him cardinal. He was sent as legate to Arragon in order to stir up the crusade against the Saracens, and afterwards brought about a reconciliation between the pope and emperor Frederick II. He died Sept. 28, 1257. Manuscripts of sermons and commentaries upon the Psalms, written by him, are found in the National Library at Paris. He also wrote, Commentaire sur le Contoye des Contoyes (Paris, 1521). Albeard (Alchardus, Albeard, or Beldard), a bishop of Elmham, was present at the Legatine Council of A.D. 796, and at that of Clovesho in 803, the decree of which he signed. He attested several charters drawn up in councils (788-805), and is doubtless the person called Alichbertus in the charter of Winchelcomb, granted at the consecration of that abbey in 811. Alcuin's 217th letter is addressed to him and Tidulf of Dunwich.

Albon (Alfhn, Aelfhn, or Elfhun), the eighth bishop of Dunwich, was consecrated about A.D. 790. He subscribed several charters of Offa between that year and 793. He died in 797 at Sudbury, and was buried at Dunwich.

All (or Wall), in Norse mythology, was a god of spring, the symbol of the growing light in the north. He was the son of Odin and Rinda. He slew the wicked giant Hödhr to avenge the death of the beautiful Baldr, the beloved of gods and men. Walaskiif is the name of his crystal palace.

Altamet, François Germain, a French portrait and historical engraver, was born in 1734. He studied in Paris, and afterwards went to London, and was for some time under Sir Robert Strange. His works are said to be fine, but they do not equal those of his brother Jacques. A few of the principal ones are, the Adoration of the Shepherds, after Caracci:— the Circum- cision, after Guido:—and the Stoning of St. Stephen, after Le Sueur.

Alliberti, Giovanni Carlo, an Italian painter, was born at Asti, in Piedmont, in 1698. Lanzi says he executed some important works in fresco in the churches of Asti, as in the Church of Sant' Agostino, representing that saint taken up to heaven surrounded by angels, also another of Saint Agostino baptizing a number of children, and other figures. He died in 1740.

Alienation of Church Property. The trans-ference by gift, sale, exchange, or perpetual emphyteusis (renting) of Church property was from early times restricted by special enactments. It is a much debated question among canonsitists whether alienation, except in extraordinary cases, was not absolutely prohibited in the first ages of the Church. This was by reason of the sacred character impressed upon property given for ecclesiastical purposes, and by that act dedicated to God. The oath now taken by Roman bishops contains a clause relating to the alienation of Church property. The words of this clause, as well as the time at which it was first introduced, have given rise to much controversy.

The general law of the Church makes all vessels and the like which have been consecrated to God, all immovable property which cannot be removed from the place where it is, and all the revenues of the administrators responsible to God. Its history, as it is found in the councils of different church-eses, has now to be traced.

The earliest canon on the subject is the fifteenth of the Council of Ancora (A.D. 314), which provides that the Church may not possess whatever property the presbyters of a diocese may have sold during the vacancy of the see. But this canon does not limit any power which the bishop himself may have previously possessed.

The Council of Antioch (A.D. 344) has two canons bearing on this subject. The twenty-fourth directs that Church property should be distinguished in such a way that the presbyters and deacons may know of what it consists, so that at the bishop's death it may not be embezzled, lost, or mixed up with his private property. By the twenty-fifth canon it is provided that the provincial synod should have jurisdiction in cases where the bishop is accused of converting Church property to his own use, or managing it without the consent of the presbyters and deacons, and also in cases where the bishop or the presbyters who are associated with him are accused of any misappropriation for their own benefit.

The seventh and eighth canons of the Council of Gangra prohibit, under anathemas, all persons from alienating produce belonging to the Church except they first obtain the consent of the bishop or his ecco-nomus, or officer intrusted with the care of Church property.

The fourth Council of Carthage, can. 31, enjoined the bishop to use the possessions of the Church as trustee; and by the next canon pronounced invalid all gifts, sales, or exchanges of Church property made by bishops without the consent in writing of their clergy.

By the twenty-ninth canon of the African code (A.D.
419) it is provided that no one may sell the real property belonging to the Church; but in case of urgency the primate of the province is to determine in council with bishops (twelve) whether a sale is to be made or not.
In case the necessity for action is so great that the bishop cannot wait to consult the synod, then he is to summon the presbyters who witness the neighboring bishops at least and to report afterwards to the synod. The penalty of disobedience to this canon is deposition. By the thirty-third canon, presbyters are forbidden to sell any Church property without the consent of their bishops, and in like manner the bishops are forbidden to sell any Church lands without the knowledge of their synod or presbyters.

Passing to Italy, we find that in A.D. 483, the clergy being assembled in St. Peter's upon the death of pope Simplicius, Basilius, the patrician and prefect of Rome, acting as vicegerent of Odacor, the barbarian king, proclaimed the following edict: "That no one, under the penalty of anathemas, should alienate any farm, buildings, or ornaments of the churches; that such alienation is null and void." This decree was declared invalid at the Council of Rome held by Symmachus (502), on the ground of its being, contrary to the usages of the fathers, enacted on lay authority, and as not being ratified by the signature of any bishop at Rome. The same council, however, rescinded the decree of the alienation of Church property. Previously to this, Leo the Great (447) had written to the bishops of Sicily and forbidden the alienation of Church property. Pope Gelasia (492-496) took action in the same direction.

In the Gallican Church, the earliest reference to alienation is to be found in a letter from pope Hilary (A.D. 462) to the bishops of the provinces of Vienne, Lyons, Narbonne, and the Maritime Alpes, which prohibits the alienation of such Church lands as are either waste nor unproductive, except with the consent of a council.

The Council of Agde (A.D. 506) contains several can-os on alienation, and the first Council of Orleans (511) places all the immovable property of the Church in the power of the bishop. By the first Council of Clermont (535) all persons are excommunicated who obtain any Church property from kings. The twelfth canon of the third Council of Orleans (339) allows the recovery of Church property within thirty years, while the twenty-third canon renews the prohibition against the alienation of Church property by abbots, etc., without the written consent of the bishop. Canons against alienation were promulgated by the councils of Paris (the third), Noyon, and the third Council of Toledo. Similar provisions were made in England by archbishop Theodore of Canterbury, and in the Excep-tiones and the Penitentiare.

The provisions of the civil law have been arranged as follows: Immovable property belonging to the Church cannot be alienated under any circumstances if it fall within the following classes: (1) if it had been given by the emperor; (2) if the thing to be alienated is the Church or monastery itself; (3) when the proposed transference is the eccosmus or other Church officer, or a heretic; (4) when the property was given to the Church on the condition that it should not be alienated. Similar provisions to those above restrictions, immovable property can be alienated either for (1) debt, (2) by way of emphyteusis for a term, (3) in exchange with another Church, (4) if the transference be the emperor, or for the redemption of captives. We also find laws directed against the alienation of Church property in Lexes Viegiliiorum, bk. v, ch. iii (about A.D. 700); Lex Alemannorum, ch. xx; and Codicilarius Regn.
Francorum (814). So it is found that the utmost precation was taken lest, under the pretence of necessity or charity, any spoil or devastation should be made of the goods and revenues of the Church. See Bingham, Christian Antiqu. bk. VII, ch. vii, § 6, 7; Smith, Dict. of Christ.

In the United States the laws relating to the sale of Church property, especially real estate, differ somewhat in the several states; but they all include a reference to the appropriate Church authority in the respective denominations, and generally require a special application to the civil court. See Corporation, Ecclesiastical.

Alignan, BENEDICT DE', a learned French Benedictine and a traveller in Palestine, was priest of Notre Dame de Grasse, in the diocese of Carcassonne, until, in 1299, he was appointed bishop of Marsillargue. This was at that time agitated by internal dissensions, occasioned by both the viscounts and the monks laying claim to civil jurisdiction. In 1230 D'Alignan associated himself at Thiet with the king of Navarre and the count of Champagne in order to make a journey through the Holy Land, and while in the East he contributed towards the construction of a castle. In 1248 he was elected council of Valencia. Under his prelacy, he introduced a new religious order called the "Brothers of the Holy Mary, the Mother of Christ," which Clement confirmed in 1256, and which the Council of Lyons suppressed in 1276. In 1260 he again visited the Holy Land, where he remained three years. He died in July, 1268. He left some works printed and others in MS. Among those published we find, Prefatio Benediti, Episcopi Mâconensis, in Commentarium suum de Sancta Trinitate et Fide Catholica (by Baluze):—Sententia Lata in Symodo, de Decimis:—Epistola ad Innocentium Pапam IV, in the Spicilegium of D'Achery:—De Constructionsu Castri Saphet, a work also inserted by Baluze in his Miscellanea. This is concerning the building of the fortress of Sapet in the Holy Land, in which he asserts that its power extends over two hundred and seventy villages, the site of which villages he claims to have been the place where Joseph was sold, where Christ first preached, where Peter paid the tribute-money, and many other events of sacred history transpired. This castle, the cathedral of the Christians of the Holy Land, fell into the hands of the Babylonians in 1266, and the temples were driven out. Great effort was made to regain this, but the two powers providing were not ready to make a decisive fight. The MS. (Bibliothèque Nationale, No. 4224) which contains the principal work of D'Alignan is a large volume in parchment. The title of the work is Tractatus Fidei Diversos Erros super Titulum: De Summa Trinitate et Fide Catholica in Decretalibus. This is a great exposition of Christian doctrine as a treatise on practical theology. In connection with this the author has several brief treatises, as, Exposition de l'Oraison Dominciale:—Salutation Angélique. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alainard (or Halynard), a French prelate, was born in the last half of the 10th century. He joined the Benedictine friars at the monastery of St. Bénigne, at Dijon. His parents, who belonged to the first families of Burgundy, attempted by persuasion and derision to deter him, but in this purpose, but in vain. Alainard was made priest at St. Bénigne; and his wise administration, together with his saintly life, won him the esteem of kings Robert and Henry I, as well as of the emperors of Germany, Conrad and Henry III. The position becoming vacant, the people of Lyons demanded Alainard for their archbishop, but he modestly refused until ordered by pope Gregory VI to accept. When he presented himself to receive the investiture, the emperor wished him to take the oath of fidelity, but he refused, asserting that his promise was sufficient, and that he preferred to remain a priest rather than take an oath. This firmness won the emperor's respect, which wished to assist at the consecration of Alainard (1046). In 1047 the emperor went to Rome, taking with him the new archbishop, who, by his affability and eloquence, won the regard of the Romans. After the death of Clement II, the people demanded him for pope, but he seceded himself; but Leo IX had been restored to the position. At the request of the new pontiff, Alainard accompanied him to France, Rome, and Monte-Casino, and was employed in the negotiations which preceded the treaty of peace between the Normans and the inhabitants of Lower Italy. The pope, invited to visit the emperor at Rome, died at Alainard of plagues in order to take part in the administration of the affairs of the Church. Hugh, who for bad conduct had been deposed from the bishopric of Langres, came to the Court of Rome to solicit his re-establishment. As he was about to return to France, Alainard joined him, with his companions, and dined with him. At the dinner some one administered poison to Alainard, who died in consequence, July 29, 1052, and was interred with high honor in the Church of St. Paul. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alpes, in Roman mythology, was a surname of Mercury, because he had wings on his feet.

Allison, Archibald, an English divinity, was born in 1757, and matriculated at Balliol College, Oxford, in 1775, where he proceeded to the degree of B.C.L., March 28, 1784. At the time of his decease he was senior minister of the Episcopal Chapel, Cowgate, Edinburgh. In 1790 Mr. Allison published Essays on the Nature and Principles of Faith, a work which has taken a high place in celebrity. He gave to the world a number of Sermons (1809-15), also a Memoir of the Life and Writings of Lady Woodhouse (Trams, Edinb., R. Soc. 1818, vii, 515). See Christian Remembrancer, July, 1839, p. 440; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Allison, Hector, a Presbyterian minister, was examined by the Synod's committee and approved May 28, 1745. He was ordained by the Newcastle Presbytery in 1746 at White Clay, and settled at Drawyers. In 1750 he was sent for eight Sabbaths to Western Virginia. In 1758 he asked for a dissolution of his pastoral relation, but it was not granted for obvious reasons. In 1760 he was appointed chaplain to the provost of Philadelphia and sylvania forces, and, in answer to a pressing application made to the Synod in that year by the Church at Albany, N. Y., he was directed to supply the same. He joined the Newcastle Presbytery in 1761. An application from Baltimore on his behalf was not placed in his hands, it being deemed inexpedient. He was dismissed from the presbytery in December of that year with a view to join the South Carolina Presbytery, and was settled at Williamsburg, S. C., where he remained till his death, the date of which is not known. (W. P. S.)

Allison, Hugh, a Presbyterian minister, was a native of Pennsylvania. After his graduation from Princeton College, he was for some time engaged as a teacher in Charleston, S. C. He removed to James Island, taking with him a number of young men, with a view to superintend their education. He also became pastor of the Presbyterian Church on that island, where he died in 1781. See Alexander, Princeton Colleague in the 18th Century.

Aliterius and Aliteria. Jupiter and Ceres were thus called for preventing millers from milling more than their allotment.

Alitra. In Roman mythology, was a goddess of the Bedawin, whom Herodotus compares with Venus and Urania of the Greeks, the Mylitta (q. v.) of the Assyrians, Mirra of the Persians, perhaps also with Astarte of the Phoenicians, and Anatolia of the Armenians. The Arabs have always represented this goddess by a black, three-cornered, four-foot-high and two-foot-broad stone, which rested upon a golden frame, in Mecca. They affirm that this stone came from Abraham's feet—when he again built the holy Kaaba according to the original plan—which had been carried by the angels into heaven at the time of the Flood.

Alix, Ferdinand, a French theologian, was born at Frasne in 1740. He was brought up by one of his uncles; studied at Beaune; entered the Revolution, after which he returned and became rector of Vercel, near Pontarier. He died there, Feb. 4, 1825, leaving, Le Manuel des Catholiques, ou Recueil de divers Entretiens Familiers sur la Religion:—Les Impôts Modernes:—Le Dernier Prêtre d'un Prêtre du Jura. These three works were published in Switzerland from 1794 to 1796. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alix, Pierre, a French ecclesiastical historian, was born at Dole in 1600. He was canon at Besançon, and went running in 1652. He sustained firmly the laws of the metropolitan chapter against the pope, Alexander VII. He died July 6, 1676. He wrote a treatise entitled Pro Capitulo Imperialis Biscantinis, super Jure Electedus ac Archiepiscopos ac Decanos Commentarios (Besançon, 1672)—also Refutatio Scriptor Rumana super Transmarinum Jura contra Juris Capitulii Biscantini. This again aroused the censure directed against him by father Simard, inquisitor of Besançon; but he responded to him in a small treatise, entitled L'Eponge pour Esfacer la Censure du Père Simard, etc. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s. v.

Al-Jahedh, the founder of a sect among the Mohammedans, which maintained that the Koran was an animated being, sometimes a man, sometimes a beast. This opinion has sometimes been supposed to be an allegory, signifying that the Koran becomes good or bad according to the true or false exposition of it; and in this sense the most orthodox Musulmans often say that the Koran has two faces, that of a man and that of a beast, meaning thereby the literal and spiritual sense.

Alkabas (or Alkabeta), Solomon Ben-Moses, a Jewish writer of Safed, in Upper Galilee, who flourished from 1599 to 1638, is the author of a commentary on the Song of Songs, entitledアウトラエトス (Venice, 1599):—on Esther, entitled בּ הַּ לֶא (ibid. 1685):—on Ruth, called דָּרַךְ רַעְיָה, The Root of Jesse (Const. 1651). He also wrote religious hymns, דָּרַךְ רַעְיָה, of which the hymn for the Sabbath eve, "דָּרַךְ רַעְיָה", "Come, my beloved," is best known. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 89; De Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 38. (F. P.)

Al-kadha, a term used by Mohammedans to denote the visit of consummation or accomplishment and pilgrimage to Mecca which Mohammed and his followers performed in the seventh year of the Hegira. At the distance of six miles from the town they all took an oath to perform religiously all the ceremonies and rites prescribed in that visit. Leaving their arms and baggage outside, they entered the holy city in triumph, devoutly kissed the Black Stone in the Kaaba, and went seven times round the temple. The first three rounds they ran as quickly as possible; the other rounds they went jumping, and after the seventh, to show that they were still vigorous after their journey; the other four rounds they walked, so as not to exhaust themselves. This custom is still observed by the Muslems making pilgrimages to Mecca. Having finished their seven rounds, prayer was proclaimed, and the prophet, mounted on a camel, rode seven times between two hills, in which at that time were to be seen two idols of the Koreishites. The whole concluded with a sacrifice of seventy camels, and the Muslims shaved themselves.

Al-kelam (Arab. the knowledge of the word) is the scholastic and metaphysical theology of the Mohammedans. It treats of speculative points, such as the attributes of God; and is full of subtile and intricate conceptions of abstract notions and terms. It is divided into four heads. The first treats of the nature and attributes of God; the second discusses predetermination, free will, and other kindred topics; the third contains the questions about faith and its efficacy, repentance, and other doctrines; the fourth desires into the evidence of history and reason, the nature and force of religious belief, the office and mission of prophets, the duty of the imams, the beauty of virtue, the turpitude of vice, and other kindred themes. The various disputes which have from time to time arisen on all the different points of their scholastic theology have given rise to a large number of different sects and parties, all of whom adhere to the Koran as the standard of their faith. Among these may be enumerated the Ascharians, the Keramians, the Motazaees, the Cadrarians, the Naiharians, the Giabarians, and the Murgians.

Al-kitab (Arab. the book), a name given to the Koran as "the book" by way of eminence, after the manner of the English expression "the Bible."

Allah alkar is the prayer with which the Mohammedans begin their religious service. See Muzzik.

Allah Māpraha was an ancient Indian teacher of religion, a holy priest, who commanded the carrying of the Lingam, and promised the forgiveness of sins as the result of obedience.

Allah Taala is the name given to the almighty being who was worshipped by the ancient Arabs before the introduction of Mohammedanism. He is the only true god, and stands above all the deities, who are companions of his power, but over whom he is supreme ruler.

Allamun, a Chaldaean name of the deity Nergal.

Allan, a Scottish bishop, was a native of Galloway, and became bishop of the Isles in 1305, and was one of the Scotch clergy who recognised king Robert Bruce's right to the crown in 1309. He died Feb. 15, 1321, and was buried at Rotheasy, in the Isle of Bute. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 301.

Allcott, John, an English Congregational minister, was born in Warwickshire in 1764. He was designed by his friends for a carpenter; but he became an artist in Scaglinda, under the tuition of the celebrated Wyatt. He established himself in business as a statuary and dealer in marble. Having acquired much wealth, he retired from trade, and gave himself to the ministry. He had been awakened to a sense of his spiritual danger in his eighteenth year by a sermon preached after a terrible thunder-storm which occurred in London. He united with the Church at Tottenham Court Chapel, London. Most of his Sabbaths he spent in preaching in connection with the London Itinerant Society. He was ordained as an evangelist in order that he might administer the sacrament to the suburban villages. He was preached against being wanted for a shopkeeper; and for having abjured his trade; but in 1814 he settled at Epping, and became pastor of the Independent Church. His labors were continued for nearly eighteen years. Paralysis having disabled him for service in 1822, he retired to his house, where he died Feb. 19, 1855. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1854, p. 217.

Alle, Girolamo, an Italian friar, was a native of Bologna, and lived in the first half of the 17th century. He entered the Brotherhood of St. Jerome at Fiesola, taught theology at Bologna, and succeeded to the highest honors of his order. He studied literature, together with the ecclesiastical sciences. He distinguished himself as a preacher, and published his sermons, together with certain works of poetry, among others four sentations, a species of sacred drama, which were printed successively at Bologna from 1641 to 1650. Another work of his has title, Il Concanato Scommenamento de Peni, Parole e Attioni Umane ch'è Lotto e Praticato Conchenta la Virtù nell'Animo, e il Scommenamento a Vizi, etc. (Bologna, 1653). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s. v.

Allegation, in ecclesiastical law, denotes articles drawn out in a formal manner to establish the complaint's cause against the person injuring him. The defendant answers the allegation upon oath, and this is called a defensive allegation. When issue is thus joined, both parties proceed to their respective proofs.
ALEGRI

Antonio (better known as da Correggio), an illustrious Italian painter, was born at Correggio, a town in the duchy of Modena, in 1494. As an Italian writer says he was instructed by Francesco Bianchi and Giovanni Murani. Others say that he was pupil to Leonardo da Vinci, and others still, to Andrea Mantegna. It is most probable that he learned the rudiments from his uncle, Lorenzo Allegri, a painter who was very fond of him, and at his death left him most of his property. His wonderful genius created such an admirable system of harmony, grace, and grandeur as his successors have never equalled. The principal work of Correggio is the great fresco painting in the cupola of the cathedral at Parma, completed in 1530. The cupola is octagonal, and the subject the Assumption of the Virgin. In the lower part he has represented the angels admiring the event. The dome of the Church of San Giovanni (of the Benedictines) at Parma is another of his wonderful works, which represents the Assumption of our Saviour, with the twelve apostles and doctors of the Church. Among his oil-paintings, one of the most celebrated is the St Jerome at Parma, including the Virgin seated with the Infant on her knee. For the Church of San Giovanni he painted two altar-pieces—one representing the Descent from the Cross, and the other the Martyrdom of San Placido. Correggio's famous work, called La Notte, representing the Nativity, may be seen in the Gemäldegalerie at Dresden, and forms a beautiful little picture of the Magdalen reading. Writers differ widely as to whether Allegri engraved any plates. This great artist passed some time in Mantua, on two occasions, with the marchese Manfredo, and the celebrated patronesses of arts and letters Veronica Gambera, relict of Gilberto, lord of Correggio. Here he had the advantage of examining the works of Andrea Mantegna, the frescoes of Cosmo, Lionardo Bruno, and Dosso, and also the grand collection of pictures, medals, cameo, and antiquities of Isabella da Este. He died March 5, 1534.

Allegri, Gregorio, an Italian ecclesiastic and composer of Church music, was born at Rome about 1580. He studied under Nanini and was intimate with Palestrina. He was thoroughly acquainted with harmony, and, although he did not possess a remarkable voice, was made one of the singers in the pope's chapel in 1629. He composed the famous Miserei, which is performed there yearly on Wednesday and Friday of Passion-week. He died at Rome, Feb. 16, 1652.

Allegri, Pomponio, an Italian painter, was the son of Correggio, and was born in 1522. He learned the rudiments of art from his noted father, who died, however, when Pomponio was only twelve years of age. He continued his studies under Francesco Maria Rondani, the most talented of Correggio's scholars. Pomponio executed a fresco painting in the cathedral at Parma, representing Moses Showing the Jordanites the Waters of the Law, which is finely colored, with beautiful parts, and heads expressed entirely in the style of Correggio.

Allegri, Francesco (called Da Cebbio), a Roman historical painter, was born in 1587, and was a scholar of Arpino. He executed some works for the churches and palaces of Rome, both in oil and fresco. He died in 1663.

Allegri, Giuseppe, a Florentine engraver, lived in the early part of the 18th century. The following are his principal works: the Virgin Mary with the Infant;—the Circumcision;—and the Stoning of St. Stephen.

Alleine (or Allein), Richard, an English Nonconformist and Puritan, was born in Somersetshire in 1611. He was educated at St. Alban's Hall, Oxford, and became rector at Balcombe, Somersetshire, but was rejected in 1652. He was noted for piety and zeal in labor. He died Dec. 22, 1681. He published Discourses (1683), a work still held in considerable estimation by Franscisco Bianchi and Giovanni Murani. Others say that he was pupil to Leonardo da Vinci, and others still, to Andrea Mantegna. It is most probable that he learned the rudiments from his uncle, Lorenzo Allegri, a painter who was very fond of him, and at his death left him most of his property. Allen, Isaac, JOCHANAN, a learned Jew of Constantinople, who flourished in Italy towards the end of the 15th century, where he instructed the famous Fico della Mirandola in Hebrew, is the author of De spiritu, a commentary on the Song of Songs. The introduction to this commentary, published separately by Baruch ben-Moses Chajin (Leghorn, 1790), See Furst, Bibl. Jud., i, 39; De Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 38 sq. (B. P.)

Allen, Amos, a Baptist minister, was born in Maine about 1775. In 1807 he was licensed to preach by the First Church in Bluehill, Me. Three years afterwards he was ordained pastor; in 1811 he devoted himself to evangelical labors among the destitute churches of his native State. In 1818 he was chosen pastor of the Church in Brooksville, where he remained till 1835. For the next four years he supplied destitute churches. In 1837 he was called to the pastorate of the Second Church in Brooksville. From 1835 to 1868 he remained till 1842, when he resigned and returned to his work as an evangelist. The exact date of his death we have not been able to ascertain. See Millett, Hist. of the Baptists of Maine, p. 493. (J. C. S.)

Allen, Asa Smith, a Congregational minister, was born at Medfield, Mass., June 21, 1797. He studied theology at Angelica, N. Y., with Robert Hunter, D.D., and was licensed to preach March 2, 1827. On March 5, 1837, he was ordained at Angelica. At Cuba, N. Y., he became acting pastor of the Congregational Church in 1837, in which position he remained until 1846, when, in the employment of the American Home Missionary Society, he went to Wisconsin. Afterwards he became pastor, for nine years, of the Church in Dodgeville. From 1856 to 1868 he was pastor of the Church at Blue Earth; and in the latter year removed to Clear Lake, Ia., as pastor of the Church in that place, where he died, Nov. 7, 1876. See Cong. Quar., 1877, p. 407.

Allen, Benjamin Russell, a Congregational minister, was born at Newport, R. I., in 1803. He commenced his ministry among the Baptists; but subsequently became a Congregationalist. His ordination took place Sept. 10, 1829. From Aug. 13, 1831, to Jan. 4, 1838, he was pastor in North Scituate, R. I.; and from Sept. 26, 1838, to some time in 1842, he was settled in Barrington. Shortly after leaving Barrington, he was called to South Berwick, Me., as the successor of the lamented Dr. William H. Horner. Here he remained twelve years. Immediately on resigning his office in South Berwick, he accepted a call to Marblehead, Mass., where he remained from 1854 until his death, which took place June 2, 1872. Mr. Allen was a minister of marked ability in his denomination, and left his impress on the communities in which he lived as a minister of the Gospel. See Memorials of Deceased Congregational Ministers in R. I. (J. C. S.)

Allen, Beverly, a Methodist Episcopalian, concerning whose birth, early life, and conversion there is no accessible record. He entered the itinerancy in 1871; was elected for ordination at the Christmas Conference; and in 1875 was commissioned to introduce Methodism into Georgia, where he became very prominent, having an almost unparalleled popularity as a preacher; but, like David, in an evil hour, fell into sin, violated the laws of the country, and a writ was issued for his apprehension. He warned the sheriff not to enter his room, with the threat of his death. The sheriff rushed in and Allen shot him, fled the country, and settled in Logan County, Ky., then called "Rogues' Harbor," where his family followed him, and where he resided until his death, practicing medicine. He ever remained a warm friend to the Methodist Church, which struck his name from her list of workers in 1792; but, to ease his troubled conscience, he drank in the doctrines of Universalism. Peter Cartwright, in his schoolboy days, boarded some time with Mr. Allen; and, on becoming a Methodist, visited the doctor in his sickbed, and records Mr. Allen's last sentiments as being a belief in the salvation of all but himself. We are unable to find the date of his decease. Mr. Allen was in his early career an earnest and devout preacher, and a man of extraordinary talents and zeal. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Ep. Church, ii, 118; Stevens, Hist. of the M. E. Church, ii, 155, 249, 301; iii, 101, 336; Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1781-92.

Allen, Carey, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Cumberland County, Va., in 1767. He entered Hampden Sidney College at the age of seventeen. In 1789 he was received by the Hanover Presbytery as a candidate for the ministry; was licensed to preach in 1790; and spent the succeeding years as a missionary in Virginia and Kentucky. In 1794 settled in Kentucky, and was installed pastor of Paint Creek and Silver Creek churches. He died Aug. 5, 1795. He was remarkable for a kindly disposition, and a great propensity to drollery without seeming to be aware of it. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Presbyterian Church, iii, 563.

Allen, Charles, a Congregational minister, was born in the north of Ireland, Aug. 7, 1848. He was converted under the grace of God, Ulster, and joined the Wesleyans, and became a class-leader and local preacher. On Mr. Allen's removal to Queensland, he joined the Congregationalists; studied four years at Camden College; and in 1871 was ordained in Newtown Congregational Church. He now entered upon his labours at Illawarra, in South Wales, and continued with great earnestness until his death, May 3, 1872. See Lond. Cong. Year-book, 1873, p. 514.

Allen, David J., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born at Charleston, S. C., Aug. 24, 1808. He professed conversion in his nineteenth year, and entered the South Carolina Conference in 1829. On account of ill-health he located in 1836, and settled in Western Tennessee. In 1840 he joined the Memphis Conference, and, with a short intermission, remained in its ranks until his death, in 1868. Mr. Allen possessed an extensive and accurate knowledge of general literature. He filled acceptably the appointments assigned him, and was twice elected as a delegate to the General Conference. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, 1828, p. 246; Simpson, Cyclopedia of Methodism, v.

Allen, Dianca Howe, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, who died Nov. 9, 1870, was a member of the Presbytery of Cincinnati; and was for a number of years professor in Lane Theological Seminary at Walnut Hill, Oh., having been previously a professor in Marietta College. In the Theological Seminary he occupied the chair of sacred rhetoric and pastoral theology, and afterwards the chair of systematic theology. See Presbyterian, Nov. 19, 1870.

Allen, Edmund. See A. EDMOND.

Allen, Edward E., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Accomac County, Va., Aug. 15, 1804. He was converted at the age of seventeen; soon began to preach; and in 1827 was admitted into the Baltimore Conference. In 1865 he superannuated; and died at Shrewsbury, Pa., May 28, 1872. Mr. Allen was practical, scriptural, tender, affectionate, fervent. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1878, p. 21.

Allen, Edwin Halsted, an English Congregational minister, was born at Chichester, June 17, 1836. Surrounded by the influences of a holy parentage, he was one of those who grow up "as children of the kingdom." In 1859 Mr. Allen entered Spring Hill College; but college duties proved too much for his strength, and he was compelled to return home, where he died, Sept. 1, 1860. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1861, p. 158.
Allen, Eli W. R., a Methodist Episcopal minister, of whose birth and early life no record is accessible, judged at the General Conference in 1825; the Oneida Conference in 1830; and the Black River Conference in 1836. He superannuated in 1845, for one year, and again in 1846; and died at Amber, N. Y., March 3, 1864. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1864, p. 105.

Allen, Elizabeth, a minister of the Society of Friends, was born at Bristol, England, Dec. 11, 1787. She had a sweet disposition, was well educated, and was carefully instructed by Christian parents. In 1828 she appeared as a public minister. Her preaching was very pathetic and affecting. In 1863 a serious fall caused a lameness for the rest of her life. She died Aug. 29, 1871. See Annual Monitor, 1872, p. 13.

Allen, Ethan (1), an American general and infidel, was born at Roxbury, Conn., in 1738. He first became conspicuous in resisting the laws of New York in behalf of those who held land grants under New Hampshire. He led the attack against Ticonderoga in 1775, and did other valiant service in the American cause during the Revolution; and died in 1789. He published a number of controversial pamphlets:— A Narrative of his Observations during his captivity from 1778 to 1779:— and A Letter to the Editor of the Oracle. The object of this last work was to ridicule the doctrine of Moses and the prophets. Allen had some very absurd notions as to the future state of man; e.g. that man would, after death, transmigrate into beasts, birds, etc.; and that he himself would live again in the form of a large white horse. See Alls., Amer. Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Men.

Allen, Ethan (2), an Episcopal minister, was born at Londonderry, Vt., Nov. 25, 1794, and was a graduate of Brown University in the class of 1823. For some years after his graduation he was engaged in teaching in Millwood, Vt. In 1828 he became principal of the academy in Hanover, Mass, where he remained five years, and then removed to Rochester, N. Y. Here he had charge for some time of St. John's Parish School. While engaged in teaching, he had directed his attention to the study of theology, and, having been ordained, his first settlement was in Otis, Mass, where he remained ten years (1836–46), and then removed to Nantucket, Mass, and was rector of Trinity Church in that place for nine years (1846–55). His next pastorate was in Guilford, Vt., for twelve years, and he died there May 19, 1877. (J. C. S.)

Allen, Ethan (3), D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the diocese of Maryland, and historiographer of the diocese, was rector in Dover, Md., in 1858; in 1857 was assistant minister in Baltimore; and in 1859 was agent for diocesan missions, and rector of St. Thomas's Church, Homestead, Baltimore Co., Md., which offices he continued to hold until 1862, when, retaining the agency, he officiated in Elliot Chapel, Baltimore. In 1864 he resumed his rectorship in Homestead; in 1867 he became rector of the Church of the Messiah, as well as of St. Thomas's; in 1867 was rector of Messiah only; in 1873 was his last parish; and subsequently was associate rector of St. Thomas's. In 1878 he removed to Newport, Ky., where he died Nov. 28, 1879, aged eighty-two years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1881, p. 172.

Allen, Harrison, a Congregational minister, was born at Chilmark, on Martha's Vineyard, April 26, 1792. In 1815 he entered upon the preparatory studies for college, and completed them at the Boston Latin School. In the fall of 1820 he became a member of Bowdoin College. He taught a portion of his time while in college, graduated in September, 1824, and soon commenced a course in theology. For a time he took charge of the academy during his connection with Bowdoin College. He attended the Andover Theological Seminary, completing his course in 1829, and during the subsequent year was employed as agent for the American Board in parts of Maine and Massachusetts, where he was engaged in forming some auxiliary to the Board. On Sept. 24, 1829, he was ordained in Boston, from which place he embarked Dec. 1 of the same year, and arrived at Elliot, the scene of his mission work, Jan. 26, 1830. He describes the Chocow as kind and friendly to strangers, and he speaks of the Indians they met with more favorably. He died Aug 19, 1851. See Memoirs of Amer. Missionaries.

Allen, Henry, an English Wesleyan Missionary, was proposed to the Conference in 1828, sailed for the mission field in Jamaica, W. I., in March, 1824, and after a month had elapsed, died of pneumonia, April 17. He was a young man of considerable promise. See British Minutes, 1824.

Allen, Isaac, a Unitarian minister, was born at Westo, Mass. in 1829. He graduated at Harvard College in 1738, was ordained and installed pastor of the Church in Boston, Mass, March 14, 1814, and died in 1844. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 178.

Allen, Jacob, a Congregational minister, was born at Columbus, Conn., Aug. 18, 1871. When about twenty-three he went to North Coventry, where he was converted and where he studied under W. Snow, a schoolmaster and ruff. After teaching, he entered Dartmouth College, graduating in 1811; studied theology with Dr. Burton of Theftford, Vt.; was ordained pastor at Tunbridge, Vt.; labored there and at Eastbury, Conn., at Voluntown, Sterling, and Preston; in 1815 he returned to Voluntown, preaching and laboring there till his death, March 15, 1856. He was Rev. Henry Robinson, in a sermon at his funeral, described him as "a sound and able theologian, an earnest and instructive preacher; eminently gifted in prayer; a faithful and devoted pastor, a wise and soul counselor;" etc. Mr. Allen was a frequent contributor to periodicals. See Cong. Quarterly, 1861, p. 261.

Allen, James (1), a Congregational minister, was born at Roxbury, Mass., in 1695, and was a graduate of Harvard College in the class of 1710. His ordination took place Nov. 5, 1718, and he was the first minister of the Church in Brookline, Mass. His ministry continued twenty-eight years, being terminated by his death, which occurred Feb. 18, 1747. His published sermons were seven in number, one of them being The Election Sermon Preached before the Massachusetts Legislature in 1744. His parish shared largely in the revival which so generally pervaded New England in the middle of the century in which he lived. See Pierce, Centen. Discourse; Allen, Amer. Biog. Dict. s. v. (J. C. S.)

Allen, James (2), an English Methodist minister, was born in Yorkshire, June 14, 1734. It was the purpose of his father to educate him for the ministry in the Established Church. To fit his son for his profession, he placed him under the tuition of a clergyman, whose immoral character so displeased the young candidate for holy orders that he withdrew from a Church which harbored in its communion men so dissolute as his tutor. Having received spiritual benefit from the ministry of Mr. Allen, a Methodist preacher, he joined his connection, and for nine years he was a popular minister in that denomination. Having the means to build a house of worship, he erected a meeting-house for himself, in which, with a good degree of success, he preached during the remainder of his life. Mr. Allen was the author of the hymn commencing "Sinner, will you scorn the message?" He died Oct. 31, 1804, in the village in which he was born. See Belcher, Historical Sketches of Hymns, p. 75. (J. C. S.)

Allen, James (3), an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Burslem, Sept. 28, 1787. He became a member of the class-meeting at the age of twelve; was called into the work of the itinerancy in 1806; retired from its activities in 1844; went subsequently to Bramley, and died there, Sept. 20, 1863. Deep spirituality of mind, coupled with modesty and a constitutional re-serve, made this benevolent and affable man appear distant and taciturn. "His character was without a blemish, and the consistency shown in his youth was manifested in old-age" (Isaac Keeling). "I have known many Wesleyan ministers, but I never knew a holier man" (John Farrar). He was characterized by an em-ingenious and moral discrimination, sometimes denying himself of even the necessary of life in order to give the more. See (Lond.) Wesleyan Meth. Magazine, Aug. 1866, p. 682–683; Minutes of British Conference (Lond. 1864), p. 11.

Allen, James (4), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Worcester County, Md., Dec. 22, 1811. He became an orphan in early youth; experienced religion in 1832; acquired a good education; and in 1837 entered the Philadelphia Conference, in which he labored faithfully until death, Aug. 27, 1850. Mr. Allen was greatly devoted to the Church, and much beloved by all. As a preacher, he was studious and zealous; as a parent, affectionate and devoted; as a Christian, cheerful and spiritual. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1851, p. 558.

Allen, James (5), an English Wesleyan minister, son of James (3), was born at Uttoxeter, Aug. 30, 1822. He was educated at Kingswood School, entered the Didsbury Theological Seminary in 1844, the ministry in 1846, and died at Bramley, Aug. 30, 1873. "He was one of the best men," says a minister, "I ever knew. So stable in regular work, and so continuous in his labors, so single-minded in living for Christ; so indefatigable as a minister; so true and kind and affectionate to his colleagues." Says another, "His sermons, his counsels, his prayers, his wit, his cheerfulness, his very presence, always charmed me into kindliness and love. And I am speaking very moderately when I say there are one or two other ministers of the Church who owe their position and influence mainly to his efficient training and oversight." "His life was radiant with all manner of goodness." Mr. Allen was a diligent student, and very successful in conducting theological classes. See Buntings's Sprightly Memoir of him, with extracts from his journal, in Wesleyan Meth. Magazine, Jan. and Feb. 1875; also Minutes of British Conference, 1874, p. 9.

Allen, James Wilburn, M.A., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Virginia, Jan. 10, 1804. He was converted in 1822, and in the same year united with the Tennessee Conference. In 1827 he located on account of ill-health; but was again admitted into Conference in 1847, through being unable to do heretofore, and was continued on the supernumerary list until his death, Oct. 1, 1858. He was an industrious and able writer, and during his latter years, when unable to preach, wrote largely for the Church periodicals. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1858, p. 20.

Allen, John, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Chapel-en-le-Frith, Derbyshire, June 10, 1737. His connection with the Wesleyan Society in 1766 was appointed to the Manchester Circuit, and successively to the Sussex Circuit, in Staffordshire, and others, including London, 1769; Bristol, 1772; Keighley, 1777; Leeds, 1794; Liverpool, 1795; and Bolton, 1797. In 1799 he became a superintend, and took up his residence in Liverpool, where he died, Feb. 20, 1810. "He had all the marks of a man of God." See Wesleyan Meth. Magazine, 1812, p. 2, p.1; Minutes of British Conference, 1810.

Allen, John D., an English Wesleyan missionary, entered the ministry in 1813, and was appointed to the island of Nevis, W.I. He labored with much zeal until June, 1817, when he was compelled to return to his native land to save his life. But it was too late. He gradually sank until he died, in November, 1817. He was a young man of an amiable disposition and genuine piety. See Minutes of British Conference, 1818.

Allen, Jonathan, a Congregational minister, was born at Braintree, Mass. He graduated at Harvard in 1774; studied theology with Rev. Ephraim Judson, of Taunton; was ordained over the First Church in Bradford June 8, 1781; and died March 6, 1827. See Cong. Quarterly, 1859, p. 47; Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ii, 488.

Allen, Laban Wheaton, a Congregational minister, was born at Pelham, N.H., Dec. 11, 1843. After a preparatory course at Phillips Academy at Andover, he entered Amherst College, at which he graduated in 1866, and three years afterwards graduated at An- dover Theological Seminary. In 1869 he was ordained pastor at South Brantree, Mass., but left in 1872, going to Gleeley, Col., where he was acting pastor until 1873. On account of failing health, he sailed for Europe, residing there a year, then went to Los Angeles, Cal. Returning to his father's house in Hanover, Mass., he died there Aug. 23, 1875. See Cong. Quarterly, 1876, p. 418.

Allen, Lemuel Q., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Habersham County, Ga., June 1, 1825. He experienced conversion in 1849; received his license to preach in 1852; was united with the North Georgia Conference. He was not equipped with any of the aids that early culture and mental discipline afford, but he consecrated a vigorous mind and an honest, noble heart, and soon became a powerful herald of the Cross. He died of can-cer, Aug. 8, 1866. Mr. Allen's pulpit ministrations were characterized by simplicity of manner and solidity of matter. He was zealous and devoted; was endowed with high social qualities, and was peculiarly happy in his domestic relations. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1866, p. 220.

Allen, Lorenzo Bickford, D.D., a Baptist min-ister, was born at Jefferson, Me., June 4, 1812, and was a graduate of Waterville College in the class of 1836. For the next four years he was engaged in teaching, a part of the time at Richmond and a part of the time at Waterville. He pursued his theological studies at Thomastown under Prof. Calvin Newton, and was ordained pastor of the First Baptist Church at Thomastown on May 27, 1840, where he remained four years, and then became pastor of the Second Church in Waterville, sustaining the relation until July, 1849. During most of the years from 1845 to 1856 he was employed as secretary of the Maine Baptist Missionary Society. From November, 1849, to November, 1856, he was pas-tor of the Baptist Church in Yarmouth. In April, 1857, he entered upon his duties as professor of ancient la- nguages at Burlington University, of which he was for a time the president, resigning his position in 1865. For the next three years he was pastor of the First Baptist Church at Minneapolis, Minn., and for the next three years more he preached and taught at Waisoja, where he died, Aug. 20, 1872. (J. C. S.)

Allen, Morril, a Unitarian minister, was born at Dover, Mass., April 3, 1876, and was a graduate of Brown University in the class of 1896. Having studied theology, he was ordained as pastor of the First Congregational Church and Society at Pembroke, Mass., and there remained from Dec. 9, 1891, to Dec. 9, 1891. After resigning his office, he continued to preach for his parish and perform ministerial functions as his ser-vices might be needed. He was fond of agricultural pursuits, and acquired a wide reputation as an agriculturist. For several years he was president of the Plymouth Agricultural Society, which he had been largely instrumental in establishing. Although never seeking office, he was twice elected to the Senate of Massachu-setts from Plymouth County, and was a member of that body in 1844 and 1845. He lived to the very great age of ninety-four years, four months, and fourteen days. See Necrology of Brown University, 1871. (J.C.S.)

Allen, Nathan, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Lansing, N.Y., March 9, 1820. In 1842 he entered Western Reserve College, where he remained until 1844, when he went to Hamilton College and completed his college course. In 1847 he entered Auburn Theological Seminary, and he spent two years in that institution. Having completed his studies, he was licensed by the Auburn Presbytery, and became pastor of the Congregational Church at Castille, N.Y. He was ordained by the Angelica Presbytery, and became pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Cuba, N.Y. He died in 1864. See Wilson, Pref, Hist, Almanac, 1865, p. 159.

Allen, Peter, a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, was born in Columbia County, N.Y., in 1806. He graduated at the New Brunswick Seminary in 1837, and was licensed by the Classis of Poughkeepsie, N.Y., in the same year. He served as pastor at West New Hempstead and Ramapo from 1837 to 1838 — the former in Rockland County, N.Y.; the latter in Bergen County, N.J. After 1838 he again served his two churches until his death, which occurred in 1892. He was a good man, and full of the Holy Ghost and of faith. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America (3d ed.), p. 164.

Allen, Phoebe, a minister of the Society of Friends, was born Dec. 4, 1769, at Hitchin, England. She had a careful religious education. Possessing a lively disposition and superior tastes, she was both loved and admired. The power of true religion soon shed its influence upon her, and she dedicated her powers to the Master. In 1794 she made a journey into Yorkshire in the interest of the Society. She did not appear regularly in the ministry until 1797. From 1798 until 1801 she attended various meetings of the Society, and held some important positions. She lived a retired life until 1839, in which year she and her husband started on a journey through their own country and adjoining provinces. She died Oct. 2, 1856. See Annual Monitor, 1856, p. 5.

Allen, Reuben, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born in Rhode Island in 1794. He was one of the most laborious and successful ministers of his denomination. He lived in the neighborhood of New London, Conn., where he was a prominent citizen, because, as we are told, he found the inhabitants more congenial to his tastes and sooner impressed by his methods. He is said to have baptized at least fourteen hundred converts. He was especially gifted in revivals and protracted meetings. After many years of rare devotion to the cause of Christ, he died at North Scituate, R.I., May 90, 1872. See Freewill Baptist Register, 1872, p. 84. (J.C.S.)

Allen, Richard (1), an English Baptist minister, who flourished at the close of the 17th and the beginning of the 18th century, is said to have been a man of good endowments; and though he had not the advantages of a learned education, yet by constant application he became a good Oriental scholar. His public ministry began in the reign of Charles II., and he was a victim to the persecuting spirit which brought such discomfort to the Dissenters. He was fined and imprisoned and subjected to innumerable annoyances. On one occasion, as he was preaching a Thursday lecture, he, with ten other persons, was seized and thrown into Newmarket, where he remained until some of his friends had secured his release. In 1695 he became pastor of a church, meeting in Paul's Alley, London, and continued in that relation for nearly twenty-two years. His death occurred Feb. 20, 1717. He was the author of the following works: An Essay to Prove, Synopsis of Psalms with Compiled Verses, a Christian Duty, and to Resolve the Doubt concerning it (1890, 8vo): — A Brief Vindication of an Essay to Prove Singing of Psalms, etc. (1696, 8vo) — A Doctrinal Death: the End of a Truly Christian Life (1790, 8vo), a sermon at the funeral of Mr. John Griffith: — A Discourse on the Death of King William III (1702, 4to) : — A Sermon on the Union of England and Scotland (1707, 8vo) : — Biographia Ecclesiastica (2 vols, 8vo). He was one of the most eminent ministers of the New England Churches, and flourished in the first four centuries and part of the fifth. See Haynes, Baptist Cyclop. i, 18-20. (J.C.S.)

Allen, Richard (2), a minister of the denomination of Friends, was born at Cork, Province of Munster, Ireland, in 1786. He was one of the first pupils admitted into the Waterford School, and for many years was connected with that institution. His services were not limited to the education of the young; but for upwards of a century he was a useful minister among the Friends. He often travelled as a messenger of Christ through his own country and Great Britain, and once visited Canada. He died Jan. 5, 1875. See Annual Monitor, 1874, p. 1.

Allen, Samuel (1), a minister of the denomination of Friends, was born in London, England, Nov. 15, 1771. His ministry did not extend beyond the central and southern counties of England. His standard of right in religious and social and commercial affairs was a high one. His appeals to others were not always made in that spirit of charity which "hoped all things." Towards the end of his life he suffered with many bodily infirmities which often induced mental depression. He died at Hitchin, Oct. 22, 1868. See Annual Monitor, 1870, p. 2.

Allen, Samuel (2), brother of two other ministers in the British Wesleyan Methodist Conference, was born at Fetcham, Surrey, in March, 1800. He was converted at the age of fourteen, ordained in 1818, and appointed to Ceylon, where he labored with much success for fourteen years, following health and death in his return to England. He retired from circuit work in 1853, and died at Wavertree, April 11, 1878. He was a faithful and discriminating pastor, and his ministry was valued for its thoughtful exposition of Scripture. He was a diligent student of the Scriptures in the original, and collected and collated revised versions with great care and scholarly care. See Minutes of British Conference, 1878, p. 87.

Allen, Stephen Thompson, a Protestant Episcopal minister of the diocese of Quincy, Ill., was ordained, and soon after began his ministry, at Aurora. In 1865 he removed to Muscatine, Iowa, as rector of Trinity Church, and held this position until 1868, when he returned to Aurora as rector of his former parish, Trinity. In 1871 he became rector of Grace Church at Galesburg, Ill., and continued to officiate in that parish until the date of his death. He died in Aurora, May 3, 1878, aged sixty-nine years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1878, p. 106.

Allen, Thomas, an English clergyman and writer, was born in 1572. He was educated at, and became fellow of, Merton College, Oxford; became the literary friend and assistant of Sir Henry Savile; and died in 1636. He published Observationes in Libellum Chrysostomi in Esaiae. See Wood, Athenae Oxonienses; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, a. v.

Allen, Thomas D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Acroam County, Va., Dec. 26, 1801. He was taught the fear of the Lord from childhood; experienced conversion about 1820; and subsequently emigrated to Ohio, where, in 1829, he united with the Ohio Conference. In 1834 he transferred to the Baltimore Conference, in which his burning zeal overcame his constitution, and in 1853 he was a man of thorough devotion and unflagging energy. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1886, p. 468.

Allen, Thomas G., a Protestant Episcopal mini-
Allen, Timothy, a Congregational minister, was born at Norwich, Conn., Sept. 1, 1715, and graduated at Yale College in 1736. He was ordained pastor at West Haven in 1738, but four years after was dismissed by the Consociation for some little improprieties of speech. This was at the time of the great awakening, and Mr. Allen was one of the preachers from whom the excitement was catching. He was for a while a teacher of a kind of theological school in New London called “The Shepherd’s Tent.” He was settled in Ashford in 1757, remaining there seven years. His next charge was Chesterfield, Mass., from which he was not dismissed until he was eighty-one years of age. He died there, Jan. 12, 1806. Mr. Allen was somewhat eccentric in his manners, but was a man of genius and talents, of strict morals, and a powerful preacher. He published several Sermons, and two pamphlets, entitled, respectively, Salvation of All Men Out of All Dispute, and An Essay on Outward Christian Baptism. See Cong. Quar., 1806, p. 267.

Allen, William, a Unitarian minister, was born at Stoughton, Mass. He graduated at Harvard College in 1801; was ordained pastor of a church at Chelmsford, Nov. 16, 1808; and died in 1845. He published several single Sermons. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 58.

Allen, William (1), a Christian martyr, was a laboring man, and lived at Somerton, England. He was burned at Walsingham in September, 1556, because he would not adhere to the rules and regulations of the Romish Church. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, vii, 381.

Allen, William (2), a Baptist minister, was born in Maine about the year 1750. He received a license to preach from the Church in Columbia, and not long after received a call from the First Church in Jefferson, of which he was ordained pastor in 1809. During the long period of twenty-seven years he was the devoted and faithful minister of this church, his pastorate closing with his death in 1836. See Millett, Hist. of the Baptists in Maine, p. 433. (J. C. S.)

Allen, William (3), D.D., a Congregational minister and writer, son of Thomas Allen, was born at Pittsfield, Mass., Jan. 2, 1754. He graduated at Harvard College in 1779, and studied theology under the Rev. Dr. Pierce, of Brookline. He began preaching in Western New York in 1804; after some months he returned to Massachusetts, and was made a regent of Harvard and assistant librarian. In 1809 appeared the first edition of his American Biographical Dictionary, containing notices of some 700 Americans—the first work of the kind published in this country. The second edition of this Dictionary was published in 1832, and contained over 1800 names; and the third edition, published at Boston in 1857, contains about 7000 biographies. In 1810 he was ordained pastor of the Church in Pittsfield, as his father’s successor. In 1817, when Democratic principles were already organized, he was elected president of the tribunal of mathematicians. We are indebted to him for a census of the habitants of each province of China for the twenty-fifth and twenty-sixth years of the reign of Khieng-loung (1760 and 1761). He obtained these statistics from Heoupon, and translated them into Chinese. The whole was sent to the tribunal of mathematicians in Europe in 1775. The conquering Tartars for a time suppressed this census-taking, fearing that it would reveal the secret of their forces to the Chinese. He confirmed all the calculations of the celebrated missionary Aniot, and gave the proof of the progressive augmentation of the Chinese population. The census obtained by Allenstein is found in the Description Générale de la Chine, 4th ed. p. 288. In the twenty-fifth year of the reign of Khieng-loung the population numbered 196,837,977, and the following year 158,214,624. Allenstein died in 1777. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Allerton, Ralph, a Christian martyr, suffered under the reign of queen Mary, being burned at Elizabeth on Sept. 17, 1557, for rejecting the Romish priests. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, viii, 405.

Allesbrooke, Robert, an English Congregational minister, was born at Darley Oaks, Needwood Forest, Staffordshire, in 1835. Subsequently his parents moved to Worcestershire, where he was converted. He removed to London, and was engaged in ragged-school teaching and out-door preaching. From London he went to Spring Hill College, to better prepare himself for the ministry. In 1863 he was ordained at Elyeaston, Derbys, where he laboured but a few months; and on Dec. 27 of that year died. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-

Allet, Jean Charles, a French designer and engraver of portraits and sacred history, was born in Paris about 1668. He lived many years in Italy, and probably died at Rome in 1732. The following are some of his principal works: The Crucifixion, after Andrea Pozzo;—The Shepherds,—The Virgin, Mary and St. Joseph Adoring the Infant Jesus:—The Saviour Brought before Pilate:—Annunciation Restoring Sight to St. Paul:—The Vision of St. Paul. The last two are considered Allet's best works on historical subjects.

Alley, Miss Isabella T., a missionary of the Protestant Episcopal Church, who died at Cavalla, Africa, Sept. 29, 1856, left a comfortable home in Virginia in October, 1855, going out in company with Rev. Robert Smith to identify herself with the mission at Cape Pal-mas. See Amer. Quart. Church Rec. 1857, p. 144.

All-fools-day, a name given to the first day of April, on account of an absurd custom, which prevails in various parts of the world, of ridiculing people and imposing on them in a variety of ways. Numerous explanations of the origin of this custom have been attempted. Among them are the following: (1.) In France the person imposed upon is called poisson d'Avril, "an April fish," which is thus explained. It is contended that the word poisson, through the ignorance of the people, is corrupted from passion, and that the expression is a corruption of the original, which was almost entirely lost. The intention, it is contended, is to commemorate the mocking of our Lord by the Jews. As the passion of Christ took place about this time of the year, and as the Jews sent him backwards and forwards, from one officer to another, to mock and torment him, so we send about from one place to another such persons as we think proper subjects for our ridicule (see Bellingen, Etymology of French Proverbs, 1656; and Gentleman's Magazine for July, 1783). (2.) Another attempt to explain it has been made by referring to the fact that the year formerly began in Britain on March 25, which was supposed to be the day of the incarnation of our Lord. So April 1, being the octave of March 25, and the close of the festival both of the Annunciation and the New Year, became a day of extraordinary mirth and festivity. (3.) It has also been explained as having a Jewish origin. It is said to refer to the mistake of Noah in sending the dove out of the ark before the water had abated on the first day of the Hebrew month, answering to our month of April; and, to perpetuate this delicacy, it was thought proper that whoever forgot so remarkable an event should be sent on some fruitless errand similar to the ineffectual message upon which the bird was sent by the patriarch. (4.) It has been shown that the practice of making April-fools on the first day of that month has been an immemorial custom among the Hinduts at a celebrated festival held about the same period in India, called the Huli festival (see Pearce, Asiatic Researches, vol. ii.). (5.) Maurice, in his Indian explanations of the origin of this custom has shown that the ancient Hinduts, who were residing both in England and in India, had its origin in the ancient practice of celebrating with festival rites the vernal equinox, when the new year of Persia anciently began.

Allibond, John, D.D., an English clergyman, was born in Buckinghamshire, and educated at Magdalen College, Oxford. He was for some years head-master of the free-school adjoining Magdalen College, and afterwards became rector of Bradwell, in Gloucestershire, where he died, 1646. He was an excellent Latin poet and philologist. See Allibone, Dict. of B. and A. Aut. a. v.

Allibond, Peter, an English clergyman, was born at Warden, near Sandy, in Bedfordshire, about 1560. He was educated at Magdalen Hall, Oxford, and travelled for some time beyond the seas, after which he became rector of Cheshneys, Bucks. He died in 1629. He translated several religious works from the French and the Latin. See Wood, Athenae Oxonienses, a. v.

Allin, Edmund, a Christian martyr, was a miller, dwelling in the parish of Frittenden, Kent, England. He read and explained the Scriptures to his friends, and in this way was the means of bringing many souls to Christ. His course was soon found out by some popish priests, and he was arrested, examined, and cast into prison, where he suffered miserable torments. He was afterwards burned at Maidstone, in 1557. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, viii, 521.

Allin, Frederick, an English Congregationalist, was born at Lancing, Sussex, Jan. 25, 1921. While at school at Portsea, he was converted under the ministry of the Rev. T. Cousins. He received private instruction from the Rev. Joseph Turnbull at Brighton, and afterwards at Boulogne. He was admitted as a student at Highbury College in 1839, and left in February, 1840, to commence his ministerial labors at Highbury Chapel, Brighton. Here he laboured for a few months, and afterwards to the Grand Parade Chapel, where he was ordained July 8, 1846. Upon the failure of his health, he left Brighton in March, 1848, and went to the vicinity of London. Having recovered strength, he preached for a time at Highgate, but found it necessary soon to remove to the more genial climate of Penzance, in Cornwall, at which place he became, in the summer of 1850, co-pastor with the venerable John Foxell. He died March 29, 1852. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1858, p. 204.

Allin, John, (1), a Congregationalist minister, was born in 1596. After graduating, as is supposed, at the University of Cambridge, he entered the service of the Church of England. It is thought that he is the man who was silenced at Ipswich by bishop Wren, on account of his Nonconformity, and removed to London. In 1637 he removed to New England, being obliged to escape thither in disguise. Immediately after his ar-ival he became a resident of Deatham, Mass., and afterwards of his town. On April 1, 1641, he was ordained as pastor of the Congregational Church in that place. In 1646, when an attempt was made to bring the colonists into subjection to the British Parliament, he was chosen spokesman for his Church, and presented a paper sustaining the magistrates of the colony who were determined on resistance. One of the leading controversies of this period grew out of the decision of the Synod in 1652 that persons who had been baptized in infancy, and whose lives were moral, might claim baptism for their children. President Chauncy, of Harvard College, wrote a work in opposition to this view, to which Mr. Allin replied, supporting the Synod. This controversy was a protracted one, and Mr. Allin took a prominent part in it. Though not elegant, his written style is marked by simplicity and force. Occasionally he shared the labors of Eliot in his benevolent visits to the Indians. He died at Deatham, Mass., Aug.

Allin, John, (2), an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Satcombe, near Holsworthy, Aug. 19, 1809. He united with the Church in his eighteenth year, with the ministry in 1834, became a supernumerary at Bristtol in 1876, and died April 24, 1878. His aim was to do his Master's work in his Master's spirit. In pastoral duties he was diligent (being especially attentive to the sick and needy), amiable, and judicious. See Minutes of British Conference, 1878, p. 41.

Allin, Rose, a Christian martyr, was one of the five who were burned at Norwich in the middle of the 16th century for the testimony of Christ and his Gospel. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, vii, 381.

Allin, Thomas, one of the most honored ministers in the Methodist New Connection, and one of the most venerable for years and attainments, was born at Broseley, Shropshire, England, Feb. 10, 1784. He had but a moderate education, but was converted at thirteen, and then saw the advantages of mental culture. Removing into Staffordshire, he became a useful local preacher, and in 1808 began to itinerate, though with disinterest and solemnity. He had the natural gift, exalted piety, and an affectionate disposition. His circuit life extended only to twenty-five years. A delicate constitution obliged him to become a supernumerary in 1833, having travelled in only twelve circuits, but for more than thirty years he rendered greater service to the cause of God in his retirement than he had done in his activity. He became distinguished as a preacher, and men of culture gathered from various churches to hear him in his later years; yet he was as diligent and faithful as a pastor as he was eminent as a preacher. For many years he was corresponding member of the annual committee which gave him the authority of a presiding elder in the Connection of the Methodist Church. He was president of the Conference in 1822 and 1846, and for many years secretary of the missions. In addition to these important duties, for some years before any college was established in the body, Mr. Allin guided the studies of a succession of young men who had been chosen for the ministry, and he was theological tutor to the Connection. He was also the author of several polemical publications, which were of great value when written, and a volume of chaste and elegant sermons, published after his death, was soon bought out. Paralysis overtook him at the age of eighty-one; but the serene, luminous atmosphere in which he lived enabled him to rally, and the childlike simplicity of his life made old-age delightful, even beautiful. His earthly pilgrimage closed at Cheddle, in all the calm of a summer sunset, Nov. 7, 1866.

Allio, Matteo, an Italian sculptor, lived in the 17th century. He executed some works in the Church of Sant' Antonio at Padua in 1633, and some very elegant pilasters, which are highly praised by writers. In the Chapel of the Dominican Church at Padua there is a statue of San Lorenzo Giustiniano by Matteo, which, being inferior to one of Sant' Antonio by Bronzini, placed by the side of it in 1667, is said to have caused the artist's death, owing to the serious way in which he took the matter to heart.

Allio, Tommaso, an Italian sculptor, lived in the 17th century, and was brother to Matteo. In the chapel of the Dominican Church at Padua there are two statues by Tommaso—one of Faith and the other of Hope; in the Church of Sant' Antonio also, one of Hope and one of Charity; and some statues in the chapel of the Church of San Benedetto.

Alloll, Joseph Franz, a Roman Catholic prelate of Germany, was born at Sulzbach, Aug. 10, 1755. He studied at Munich, Amberg, and Landshut; received holy orders in 1816; and went to Vienna, Rome, and Paris for the sake of studying Oriental languages. In 1821 he was appointed Privatdocent at Landshut, and advanced in 1823 to the chair of exegesis and Oriental languages. In 1827 he went to Munich, where he lectured until 1855. He was not called to Ratisbon, to leave this place again in 1838 for Augsburg, where he died, May 22, 1873, as cathedral provost. Of his many works, the most important is Die heilige Schrift des Allien u. Neuen Testament. Aus der Vulgata, mit Bezug auf den Grundtext, neu übersetzt und mit kurzen Anmerkungen erläutert (6 vols. Nuremberg, 1830-35, and often since). Besides, he published, Historische Alterskunde der Hebräischen Sprache und ihrer Geographie (Munich, 1821):—Über die inneren Motive der kanonischen Horen (Augsburg, 1848; French transl. by Dodille, Des Motifs Intrinsèques des Heures Canonicale, Châlon-sur-Saône, 1865). See Literarischer Handweiser für das Kultur. Deutshland, 1875, p. 240. (B. P.)

Alliott, Richard, LL.D., an English Congregational minister, was born at Nottingham, Sept. 1, 1804. He was thoughtful and serious from early childhood, and mental exercises were more pleasurable to him, when a boy, than physical. He joined his father's (Rev. Richard Alliott) Church, and became exceedingly useful in teaching young men both in the Bible and in general knowledge. His convictions and tastes led him to seek the ministry as his profession and joy. Mr. Alliott completed a course at Homerton College, and studied for two sessions (1826-27) at the University of Glasgow. He became assistant minister to his father in 1827, and in 1830 was ordained as co-pastor. On the death of his father, in 1846, he succeeded to the entire pastorate. In 1843 Mr. Alliott accepted the pastorate of the Church in York Road, Lambeth. In 1849 the Western College invited him to its presidency, which he accepted. In 1856 Chestnut College pressed his claims on his attention, and he exchanged the provincial for a metropolitan chair. In 1866, because of his wife's ill-health, Mr. Alliott removed to Birmingham, and occupied the theological and philosophical chairs at Spring Hill. Soon after he connected with his professorship the pastorate at Accock's Green. But he was not privileged to occupy these posts of honor and usefulness long. He died Dec. 20, 1863. Mr. Alliott did not succeed to his father's position and influence, but he excelled his predecessor in the few duties which remain. Besides a few miscellaneous sermons and articles, he published only the Congregational lecture in 1854, and an octavo vol. entitled Psychology and Theology. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1865, p. 217.

Alliott, William, an English Congregational minister, brother of the Rev. Richard Alliott, Jr., was born at Castlegate Parsonage, Nottingham, July 22, 1807. He united with his father's church at Castlegate, and thence proceeded to Wymondley College and the University of Glasgow to study for the ministry. He was ordained to the pastorate of Howard Chapel, Bedford, in 1832, where for thirty-five years he made full proof of his ministry. His death occurred Aug. 12, 1867. Mr. Alliott was not a modest, able, and modest, able, and was not a humbler, but was a useful one. See Wilson, Preb. Hist. Alumni, 1860, p. 271.

Allison, David, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Galefoot Farm, in Orchiltrie, Ayrshire, Scotland, in 1798. He graduated at the University of Glasgow with the honors of a baccalaureate. He was licensed in 1821, and died July 7, 1858. As a preacher he was clear and perspicacious. He was not a popular preacher, but was a useful one. See Wilson, Preb. Hist. Alumni, 1860, p. 271.

Allison, John, an English Baptist minister, was born at Craven, Yorkshire, in 1788, and was converted in early life. Soon after his decision to enter the ministry, he pursued a course of preparatory study at the Academy in Bradford, and then settled in a village near that place, where he remained nine years. Subsequently he was pastor at Ogden fifteen years, and at Chapelfold, near Dewsbury, for ten years. His life was a laborious one. He preached three times a week, once or more, called to Raitzen, to leave this place again in 1838 for Augsburg, where he died, May 22, 1873, as cathedral provost. Of his many works, the most important is Die heilige Schrift des Allison, Matthew, a Presbyterian minister who died July 8, 1872, aged seventy-seven years, was a member of the Presbytery of Huntington, and was pastor of the Presbyterian churches of Millinton and Lost Creek, Pa. See Presbyterian, Aug. 3, 1872.

Allison, Thomas, a minister of the Associate Church, was born in Pennsylvania, June 8, 1771. He pursued his classical studies at Canonsburg Academy (now Jefferson College), and studied theology under the direction of the Rev. Dr. John Anderson. He was licenced early in the year 1800, and preached in various places until some time during the following year, when he was installed as pastor at Mount Hope, Pa. In this charge he continued to labor until near the close of his life, when failing health induced him to resign. He died in April, 1840. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, IX, iii, 71.

Allucella (transmutation) is a term used by Zwingli, in his controversy with Luther, to indicate that the identification of the two natures of Christ is only figurative and nominal. See Hagenbach, Hist. of Doctrines, ii, 486.

Allogenes ('αλλογένης). (1.) Revelations of "Allogenes," as of Zoroaster and others, are mentioned by Porphyry (Vita Plot. 5 18) as appealed to by the Gnostics contemporary with Platonius. But it seems probable that the Porphyrian "Allogenes" was the putative author of the principal work of the following book. (2.) An apocryphal book or series of books bearing this name is said by Ephiphanus to have been used by the Sethians, the Archontics, and, apparently, the sect which he calls the "Gnostic."

Alloprosalois (favoring now one, then another), in Greek mythology, was a surname of Mars, given because of the uncertainty of war.

Allori, Cristofano (called Bronzino), an Italian painter, was born at Florence in 1577. He was the son of Alessandro, and by him was instructed in the art for a time. He became a good colorist by imitating the works of Ludovico Cardi, called Cigoli. He did several fine pieces of work for the churches and convents of Florence, and for the palaces of the Medici; also many admirable portraits of the most eminent men of his time. The St. Julian of the Pitti Palace is the grandest of his productions, though his picture of Judith with the Head of Holofernes is better known. Many copies of his works are to be found throughout Italy. Owing to the indulgences that were often seduced him from his labors, his works are extremely rare and he himself comparatively little known. He died in 1621.

Alouez, Claude Jean, an early Jesuit explorer of the Northwest, was born in France in 1620. He went to Quebec in 1658, and spent some years in the Algonquin missions on the St. Lawrence. In 1665 he founded the Mission of the Holy Ghost at Chemon ergon, on Lake Superior. He then began collecting data concerning the Mississippi; explored Green Bay, where he founded the Mission of St. Francis Xavier; and labored among various tribes of Indians. In 1676 he permanently established at Kaskas nia, III., the mission begun by Marquette; but in 1679 retired at the approach of La Salle. His last field of labor was among the Micmacs on St. Joseph's River, where he died in 1690. His contributions to the Jesuit Relations, concerning the ideas and manners of Indians of that time, are said to possess great value.

Alloway, William, an English Congregational divine, was born at Trowbridge, June 15, 1800. In his seventeenth year he was converted at Tabernacle Church, Trowbridge. In 1830 he entered Hackney College as a student for the ministry. Having completed his course in 1834, he offered himself to the London Missionary Society to work among the freed blacks of Jamaica, and was immediately sent. Mr. Alloway occupied successively three stations of the mission—Dry Harbor in 1835, Porus in 1842, and Ridgemount, Mandeville, in 1856, where he died Jan. 18, 1877. Mr. Alloway's work was characterized by the intelligence and thorough devotion of his converts, and his high standing as a counsellor among his fellow ministers. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1878, p. 805.

Allston, Washington, an eminent painter, was born of honored parentage at Georgetown, S. C., Nov. 5, 1779, and was a graduate of Harvard College in the class of 1800. He developed early in life his enthusiastic poetic and artistic love for the fine arts. Such was his desire to perfect himself in what he meant to make his profession that, having disposed of his patrimonial estate, he embarked in 1801 for the Old World, and became a pupil in the Royal Academy in London, of which Benjamin West was the president. Subsequently he spent several years in Paris and in Italy. During the eight years he was abroad, he made the acquaintance and secured the friendship of some of the most eminent painters and poets in Europe. Returning to America in 1809, he passed two years in this country, and then crossed the ocean again, and remained seven years (1811-18). Domestic afflictions were greatly blessed to him in the cultivation of his talents and tastes, and he came back to his native land an altered man. Having built a studio in Cambridge, Mass., he devoted himself to religious art, producing some of the finest paintings in that department that have seen the light in modern times. The subjects of some of these were, The Dead Man Resolved by the Bones of Eliahu;—The Angel Liberating Peter from Prison;—Jacob's Dream;—Elisabeth in the Desert;—Staël and the Wuch of Endor;—and Belshazzar's Feast, his last work, which he left in an unfinished state. His other works were, Spalatro's Vision of the Bloody Hand;—Gabriel Setting the Guard of the Hebrews;—Three Pages;—and others. He died suddenly at Cambridge July 8, 1843. In a sermon preached after his decease by Rev. Dr. Albro, the religious character of Allston was portrayed in a most attractive light. See Allbone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v. (J. C. S.)

All-sufficiency of God is that power or attribute of his nature whereby he is able to communicate as much blessedness to his creatures as he is pleased to make them0 conscious of receiving. As his all-sufficiency is that whereby he has enough in himself to denominate him completely blessed, so his all-sufficiency is that by which he has enough in himself to satisfy the most enlarged desires of his creatures and to make them completely blessed. See Attributian of God.

We practically deny this perfection—1. When we are discontented with our present condition and desire more than God has allotted for us (Gen. iii, 5; Prov. xix, 3); 2. When we seek blessings, of what kind soever, in an indirect way, as if God were not able to bestow them upon us in his own way, or in the use of lawful means (Gen. xxi, 35); 3. When we use unlawful means to escape imminent dangers (ch. xx, xxvi; 1 Sam. xxi, 15); 4. When we distrust his providence, though we have had large experience of his appearing for us in various instances (Josh. vii, 7; 9; 1 Sam. xvii, 1; 2 Chron. xiv, 11; xvi, 8; Psa. lxvii, 19); 5. When we doubt the truth or certain accomplishment of the promises (Gen. xviii, 12; Psa. lxxxvii, 8; Isa. xl, 14); 6. When we decree great changes, though called to them by God, under a pretence of our unfitness for them (Jer. i, 8, 6).

The consideration of this doctrine should lead us—1. To seek the means of our salvation and not in human things (Jer. ii, 13); 2. To commit all our wants and trials to him (1 Sam. xxx, 6; 2 Cor. xii, 8, 9; Heb. xi, 19); 3. To be courageous in the midst of danger and opposition (Psa. xxxvi, 1); 4. To be satisfied with his dispensa-
Allyn, Henry, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Windsor, Conn., about 1813. He emigrated to Illinois in 1832; was converted in his seventeenth year, and received license to preach in 1839. Six years later he was ordained deacon, in 1840 elder, and in 1851 entered the Southern Illinois Conference, wherein he labored until his death, Nov. 27, 1855. Mr. Allyn was laborious, zealous, spiritual. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1856, p. 165.

Allyn, Norman, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Hartford, Conn., Jan. 23, 1810. No record of his life-work is accessible other than that he was a member of the Southern Illinois Conference, served the Church as a delegate and earnest minister for nearly thirty years, and that hundreds were added to the Church through his instrumentality. He died March 27, 1864. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1864, p. 205.

Allyn, William (cardinal). See ALLAN.

Alma (bounteous, i.e. "the giver of food"), in Roman mythology, was a surname of several deities, but more especially of Ceres, goddess of food (or of plenty).

Almachius, a martyr at Rome, is commemorated as a saint on Jan. 1 in old Roman lists.

Almahad, a principal deity of the Himyarites of Southwestern Arabia.

Almali, Nathanael. In, a Jewish physician of Saragossa, who flourished in the 13th century, is known only as the translator of Maimonides's Mishna-commentary on the Seder Kodashim. For the benefit of the Jews of Rome, he made the Hebrew translation from the Arabic. The translation was finished, together with a preface, by the translator in 1298. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i. 89; Grätz, Gesch. d. Juden, vii. 584. (B. P.)

Almarias (or Armaries), a name used in ancient English records for the muniments or archives of a church library.

Almarche, John, a martyr, was in prison for some months in Turin, Piedmont, in 1538, where he sustained much cruelty, being racked to death. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv. 440.

Almaricus of Chartres. See AMALRIC.

Almery (or Aumbery), the medieval hatch; a cupboard occasionally used for keeping broken meat; hence a confusion was made in calling the "almonry" the place of alms-giving, and the "almoine" that where the dole of fragments from the conventual tables was daily made. The word is derived from armarium, and usually designates the wall-closet or locker for keeping the alms furnished in an alms-plate, the dole used in baptism and confirmation, and the holy oil for the sick. In many cases the eucharist reserved for the last communion was stored in an aumbery near the altar, as is still the case in Italy. In the cloister the books used in reading-time were kept in an aumbery placed either within the church close to the door, or else a locker adjoining it at the north-east angle. The Greeks had an aumbery for holding the vestments of the religious—

a sort of hanging wardrobe over the altar; from the 5th century presses for the same purpose were erected in the sacristies of the Western Church. The Carthusians had two aumbries, one on the right for the vessels, and another for books. Aumbries to contain proces- sional crosses, the bier, taper-stands, and burial furniture occur in walls near the cloister and cemetery. All the keys were locked up by the sacristian at night in a master-aumury until early in the morning. Usually the aumury is provided with a slab. Up to the 16th century the piscina had a small upper shelf for the chalice; and even in later examples a small crevice for holding the cruets and vessels is found. Sometimes a small ledge for the calamus appears; and until the 18th century the marks of holes for the hinges of doors are visible: after that date, however, the aumury became common.

Almoll, Solomon ben-Jacob, a Jewish physician, who flourished in the Levant at the beginning of the 16th century, is the author of Ḥelak Ḥamas, or a grammatical treatise on the Sheva (Constantinople, 1520):—אַלָּמַל, דְּרוֹסָא, a Hebrew lexicon, only reaching to the letter Nun (ibid.). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i. 39 sq.; De Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 59; Steinacher, Bibliog. Handbuch, p. 5; id. Catalogus Libr. Hebri. in Bibl. Bodl. p. 2292. (B. P.)

Almond-tree, the symbol of St. Mary, in allusion to Aaron's rod, which blossomed in a night; but M. Montambret conceives the plant to be dedicated to the Holy Trinity.

Almonry, a room where alms were distributed, generally near to a church, or forming a part of it. See ALMERY.

Al-moshaf (Arab. the volume), one of the names of the Koran (q. v.).

Almoshtari, the planet Jupiter, was adored as a divinity by the ancient Arabs.

Almosnino, Moses ben-Baruch, a Jewish rabbi, was born about 1500. He was the son of a Spanish family which was driven from the peninsula by the decree of 1492 and settled at Salonica. He received an excellent education in almost all branches of science and literature, and was one of the greatest pupil orators of his age. He died about 1580. Besides a number of astronomical works, he wrote, נַשְׁבַת יְיֵי (Salonica, 1572; Venice, 1597); a philosophical commentary on the five Megilloth:—ὁ πρῶτος μετοχή (Salon. 1663), a commentary on the Pirke Abot:—בִּין הָרָאִים (ibid. cod. and often), an apology for the Mosaic law and the Alms-bag, a small purse, of velvet or other cloth, used for carrying alms during divine service.

Alms-basin (or Alms-dish), a vessel of metal in which to receive the bags containing the "alms for the poor and the other devotions of the people" for presentation on the altar. They are made of brass, pewter, or more precious metals. Ancient examples frequently have representations in relief of the temptation of Eve or the return of the two sons from Canaan; modern specimens are commonly adorned with texts of Scripture.

Alms-basin of the 16th Century.

Alms-bowl, a vessel used by the priests of Buddhism for the purpose of receiving the food presented as alms by the faithful. These priests are strictly forbidden to eat any food not given as alms, except it be water or some substance used to clean the teeth; and when in health, the food that a priest eats must be procured by his own exertions in carrying the alms-bowl from house to house in the village or city near which he resides. When going to receive alms, his bowl is slung across his shoulder, and is usually covered by the outer robe. It may be made either of iron or of clay, but of no other material. It must first be received by a chapter, and then be officially delivered to a priest whose bowl is found, on examination, to be in the worst condition. No priest is allowed to procure a new bowl so long as his old one has not been bound with five ligatures to prevent it from falling to pieces. When a priest visits a house with the alms-bowl, he must not do anything to attract the attention of the inmates, but remain silent until he is observed; then if anything is given, he receives it, otherwise he passes on. Buddha says, "The wise priest never asks for anything; he disdains to beg; it is a proper object for which he carries the alms-bowl; and this is his only mode of solicitation." The priest is forbidden to pass by any house, when going with the bowl to receive alms, on account of its meanness or inferiority. When he visits a village, house, or street three successive days without receiving anything, he is not required to go to the same place again; but if he receives only the least particle, it must be a separate offering. When his bowl is sufficiently filled, he is to return to his dwelling and eat the food he has received, of whatever kind it may be. The bowl is also carried by the priestesses, or chief female recluses, who go from door to door in the same manner as the priests, receiving the contributions of the faithful. See Hardy, Eastern Monachism.

Alms-box (or Alms-chest), a receptacle fastened to the wall of, or standing on, a pillar in a church, for receiving the general offerings from the poor during public service. This usage is mentioned in the fourth Council of Carthage (where this receptacle is called sacarium and gasophylacium), and by St. Augustine (De Diversis, serm. 50). It was appointed by canon 84 of the Synod of London (1662) to be presented in every parish, to the intent that parishioners may put into it their alms for their poor neighbours. See Landou, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Alms-day (or Alms-Saturday), the Saturday before Passion Week, i.e., preceding Palm Sunday; so called because contributions for the poor during Lent are sometimes given out on that day, so as not to interfere with the solemnities of the coming Holy Week. The Secret in the Sarum office for the day referred both to the alms-giving and the alms-distribution.

Alms-man, a name for male inmates of an alms-house, or house of charity. Some of the 16th-century alms-houses were erected out of the spoils of the suppressed monastic institutions.

Almuitum (or Amess) is often confounded with, but is wholly distinct from, the amicus (amicitus). The amess was a hood of fur annually worn while reciting the offices by canons, and afterwards by other distinguished ecclesiastics, as a defence against the cold. At times it fell loosely on the back and shoulders, and was drawn over the head when occasion required; the ends, becoming narrower and usually rounded, hung down in front like a stole, for which, by some modern writers, it has been mistaken. The amess has a certain similarity to some of the academical hoods now in use. There are very many specimens of this vestment represented on memorial brasses, one of the best of which—a figure of Sir John Stodely—remains in the Church of St. Mary Magdalen, Upper Winchendon, Bucks. This garment is still used in the Latin Church, some of the bishops and abbots of which wear amesses of ermine lined with purple. In the Church of England its use appears to have been wholly discontinued.

Almy, William, an American philanthropist, a member of the Society of Friends, was born Feb. 17, 1761. He became a cotton-manufacturer at Providence, R. I., where he amassed a large fortune and endowed a large boarding-school. He died Feb. 5, 1836.

Alcoa, a holyday observed by the heathen laborers of America. After they had received the fruits of the earth, in honor of Dionysus and Demeter.

Alôôé (or Alvêôé), in the mythology of the inhabitants of the Andes, was an evil spirit which the Chilians regarded as the originator of all evil and destruction. They also believe that they would live forever if this spirit did not come to take them away in death. They adorn that the white people (Spaniards) brought this evil demon to their country, and that previous to his coming death was entirely unknown.

Alohim (the god), the name of a group, or possibly triad, of Sidonian divinities, to whom temples were erected by Eshmunzer II, king of Sidon.

Alóôis, Pietro, an Italian poet and theologian, was a native of Caserte. He entered the order of Jesus, and became professor in the colleges of Naples and Lecco. He died in 1667. He wrote, Cultura Epigrammatica (Lyons, 1665; Naples, 1664) — Commentarius in Evangelia Quadraginta (Paris, 1668). See Hoefer, Nouv. Bibl. Générale, s. v.

Alôôisius, Johannes, a martyr, was sent down from Geneva to certain parts of Calabria in 1559, there to be their minister. He was subsequently sent for to Rome, and there suffered martyrdom. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 471.

Alôôozza (or Alôozza) (the powerful) was the name of a goddess worshipped by several tribes in Arabia, especially at Nakla, near Mecca. A tree (Akazie) was dedicated to her. The Arab Dalen was the first to dedicate this tree to her. He also built her a temple, which was said to give out musical sounds when any one entered it. When Mohammed introduced Islam, he destroyed the temple and the tree, and slew the priestess.

Alpan, an Etruscan goddess who waits upon Turan, or Venus. She is winged, with ear-rings and necklace, and bears two palm branches, which she strikes together. She may be compared to the Greek Graces.

Alpanu (or Alpnu), an Etruscan goddess, with coronet, ear-rings, tuinc, and mantle, and a star behind her head, who is represented on one mirror as embracing the goddess Akhuvitir, on another as embracing the goddess Thaur, and on a third as attracting the love of a youth called Famu.

Alpedrinha, Jorge da Costa, a Portuguese prelate, was born at Alpedrinha, in the province of Beira, about 1406. He is more commonly known by the name of cardinal de Alpedrinha, in remembrance of the place of his birth; but he was in reality cardinal of the capital of Portugal, and was one of the most able theologians of his time. Born of a noble family in the enjoyment of opulence, he received a brilliant education, became a priest, and was first bishop of Evora, from which he became archbishop of Lisbon. He was loaded with favors by Edward and his son, and it is said that he received more ecclesiastical revenue than any other prelate of his time. He was appointed counsellor of Alfonso V, and had charge of the education of Catharine, daughter of king Duarte. The credit of cardinal Alpedrinha became proverbial, and he maintained his influence in all the affairs during the reign of Alfonso V. In the time of João II he was prince-regent, and held the direction of affairs. Old causes of dissension still existing, however, eventually led to trouble between the youthful prince and the cardinal. At length, wearied of these dissensions, Alpedrinha be- took himself to Rome, where he acquired as much influence as he had at Lisbon, and under Sixtus IV, Innocent VIII, Alexander VI, Paul III, and Julius II he served with the interests of Portugal. He returned to Rome, Sept. 19, 1508, at an extremely old age. The fragments of his Letters still preserved bear evidence of great wisdom. See Hoefcer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alphanus, an Italian ecclesiastic, was successively a monk of Monte-Casino, abbot of St. Benedict at Salerno, and archbishop of that city. He attended a council, held by Nicholas II, at Beneventum, and subscribed his own name to the act of condemnation mentioned under his name. He also deacon mentions some of his writings, as an Account of the Martyrdom of St. Christina; and Hymns, all given in the Italia Sacra, tom. ii.

Alphæa (also Alphonia), in Greek mythology, was a surname of Diana, derived from Alpheus, god of the river from whose per seucution she was com pelled to fly among the naiads of Lycia, and blacken her face with mud, that the god might not find her. A temple was erected here in her name, and also a statue of black marble in remembrance of this occurrence.

Alpheus (or Alyphus) was bishop of Apamea, in Syria Secunda, and attended the council of Nicaea (A.D. 787). He was 820, and Antioch (422). He was one of the adherents of whom Eunoeus of Cesarea was the see of Antioch.

Alpheus, in Greek mythology, was a god of a river, the son of Oceanus and Tethys, famous for his love for the nymph Arethusa, who bathed in the river which he ruled over. She refused his proposal and fled, leaving her dress behind her. Alpheus was already close upon her, when she,1 wished to heighten the river with a cloud. However, Alpheus followed the cloud, when it was suddenly changed into water. Alpheus now changed himself into his watery form and sought to mix his stream with hers, but Diana removed her to the island of Ortigia. Again Alpheus found a way to her, and Arethusa, not wishing to withstand such a passionate love, permitted him to mix his waves with hers. The ancients related some very wonderful things about these two streams. The Arethusa was said to become of a red color when the blood of the sacrifices at Olympia flowed into Alpheus. The latter is also said to have slain his brother, and in despair he threw himself into the Nysanthus River, which subsequently bore his name. The water was said to possess the virtue of giving to those who washed in it fortuitous gifts of health and beauty. The Alpheus River rises on the southern limit of Arcadia, and runs through Elia, in Peloponnesia.

Alphonso (Alfonso) of Santa Maria, archbishop of Burgos, distinguished himself at the Council of Basle (1431-48), from which, with the other Spanish prelates, he withdrew when the synod proceeded to depose Eugenius IV. He left an abridged History of the Kings of France and Spain, the Emperors, and Popes.

Alphonso (Alfonso) de San Victor was bishop of Zamora, and a Benedictine. He moved to the see of Toledo, thence to Orense, and lastly to Zamora, where he died, in 1660. He composed the Rule of St. Benedict, in Spanish (vol. i, Madrid, 1415; vol. ii, Toledo, 1651).

Ailrich, William P., D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in 1818. His first pastorate was at Newcastle, Del. He was for many years connected with Princeton College, Pa., filling the chair of mathematics and natural philosophy. He served several churches successively as pastor in the neighborhood of Washington. He died at Winterset, Ia., Dec. 31, 1868. As a student he was laborious and patient, an instructive and amiable gentleman. See Presbyterian, March 26, 1870; Gen. Catal. of Princeton Theol. Seminary, 1872. (W. P. S.)

Alrunen, in German mythology, are prophesying women, to whom the ancients paid the greatest respect and honor. The Gothic historian Jornandes relates the following: "The Gothic king Filimer found certain women among his people, whom he called Alorningen. As these women were somewhat suspicious-looking charac ters, he banished them from his kingdom, and compelled them to wander about in forsaken places. Thus they came in contact with other people of the woods, called Feigenfrauen, and thus originated this horrible generation of human beings. Vetus says of them, 'We have seen, dwelling in the reign of Vespasion, Weleda, a certain deity, universally worshipped as a goddess; but in earlier times also the Germans worshipped Aurinia and other women.' It is not quite clear, however, that the name Aurinia is the same as Alrunen.

Aracon, Thomas Louis de Henin Lieterard, cardinal, a Belgian prelate, was born at Brussels in 1590. He was distinguished even more by his lofty character and the sanctity of his manner than by his illustrious ancestry, which ran back to Thierry of Alsace, count of Flanders. Although a younger son when he was consecrated to the ecclesiastical calling, he became the elder by the death of his brother, Charles Louis Anthony, prince of Chima, and lieutenant-general in France and Spain, who died in 1740. Thomas, then cardinal-archbishop of Mechlin and primate of the Low Countries, immediately transmitted the principality of Chima to his younger brother, Alexander Gabriel, governor of Oudenaarde. After the taking of Brussels by the French, he addressed a letter to Louis XV, expressive of his faith in a Higher Power, and suggesting the sentiment contained in the Te Deum, which they were ordered to chant. He died Jan. 6, 1759. See Hoefcer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

A-Smeri is the name of the person who, the Mohammedan legend, formed the golden calf for the worship of the Israelites in the wilderness. They represent him as a chief among the Israelites, and they believe that some of his descendants inhabit an island bearing his name in the Arabian Sea.

Alscheich, Moses ben-Chajim, one of the most distinguished Jewish commentators and preachers of the 16th century, was born at Safet, in Upper Galilee, about 1520. He was rabbi of his native place, where he died about 1598. "His merits as an exponent of Scripture are incontestable: chief of the expository labors of his predecessors. He generally gives the literal interpretation first, and then endeavors to evolve the recondite and allegorical sense, so that his commentaries may be regarded as a useful synopsis of the various Midrashic and Cabalistic views of Scripture" (Ginsburg). He wrote, מדרשים על השעם, a commentary on the Pentateuch (Venice, 1601 and often) — מדרש משלי, a commentary on Proverbs (ibid. 1591) — מדרשים על התנאים, a commentary on the Psalms (ibid. 1605) — מדרש רחל, a commentary on Ruth (ibid. 1601) — מדרש על ספר ישעך, a commentary on Esther (ibid. ed. 1610) — מדרש על ספר איוב, also a commentary on Job, in the twelve minor prophets (Flurtch, 1765) — מדרש על ספר ישעך, a commentary on the earlier prophets (Offenbach, 1719) — מדרש על ספר ישעך, a commentary on the later prophets (Flurtch, 1765) — מדרש על ספר ישעך, a commentary on Ecclesiastes (Venice, 1601) — מדרשים על ספר ישעך, a commentary on Lamentations (ibid. ed.) — מדרש על ספר ישעך, a commentary on Daniel (Amst. 1726) — and קצירה מנעון, a commentary on Job (Jesuits, 1727). Alents, John George, a German Reformed minister, emigrated to America in 1757; was pastor of a Church in Philadelphia, and while serving there accepted a call to Germantown in 1758, where he remained until 1762. From Germantown he was called in 1763 to Wenz's Church in Montgomery County, and was especially active in its erection. Here he labored seven years, and died in 1769. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the German Ref. Church, ii, 97.

Al-Strat, the sharp bridge which the Mohammedans believe to be laid over the middle of hell, and which must be crossed by all at the close of the solemn judgment, whether destined for Paradise or torment. They believe that the just will pass over it like lightning, but that the wicked will be an age in passing it, and will fall into hell fire.

Alsop, Vincent, a celebrated English Nonconformist divine, was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge. He received ordination at the hands of a bishop, and settled as assistant master in the free school of Oakham, Rutland. Here becoming dissatisfied with his former ordination, he was ordained "in the Presbyterian way," and afterwards presented to the living of Wilby, Northamptonshire, but was ejected by the Act of Uniformity in 1662. He then preached privately at Welbourn, and at Stillingfleet's Mischief of Separation for his Nonconformity. He wrote a book against Sherlock, called Antiozzo, which procured him much celebrity as a wit, and, in addition, an invitation to succeed the venerable Mr. Caution in Westminster. Here he drew great crowds to his chapel. His Mischief of Separation, in answer to Stillingfleet's Mischief of Separation, and his Melius Inquirendum, in answer to Dr. Goodman's Compassionate Inquiry, remain historical landmarks in the history of Nonconformity. He died May 8, 1703. See Encyclop. Brit. a. v.

Alston, Nathaniel, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Preston, Lancashire, in 1812. He was converted young; became a local preacher at the age of sixteen; entered the ministry in 1834; became a superintendent after forty-one years of active service; retired to Fareham, and died of paralysis, Aug. 7, 1878. He was a close student, an original, evangelical preacher, a master of his profession, although timid. See Minutes of Conference (Lond. 1879), p. 12.

Alston, Philip William Whitmel, a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born on Fishing Creek, in Warren Co., N. C., Feb. 28, 1813. His mother dedicated him to the Lord from his birth, and took care that his education should be conducted accordingly. The family removed to Edenton, N. C., when he was about five years of age; and here, in process of time, he began his academic course under the Rev. John Avery, D.D. In 1822 he attended Shocco Springs Academy, in the same state. In January, 1826, he entered the University of North Carolina and graduated in 1829, but remained at the university as a resident graduate during the next year, when he removed to the University of Richmond, in Virginia, and remained there until appointed for two or three years in reading and study. In 1834 he joined the Protestant Episcopal Church, and in the following year was a deputy to the General Convention. In June, 1838, he was ordained deacon, and exercised his ministry at Randolph until February of the next year, when he became rector of Calvary Church, Memphis, a position which he held until the close of his life. He died at Columbia, Tenn., June 17, 1847. Mr. Alston was distinguished for his taste for the fine arts, possessing considerable skill in drawing. As a preacher, his manner was earnest, but quiet. His social qualities were in the same order. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 754.

Alston, William J., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the diocese of New York, entered the ministry in 1859, and in the following year became rector of St. Philip's Church, New York city; in 1862 he was rector of St. Thomas's Church (African), Philadelphia, in which he remained until 1872, when he returned to his former charge, St. Philip's. He died May 26, 1874, aged forty-seven years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1875, p. 144.

Alsop, Asaph II., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Wilson County, Tenn., Dec. 17, 1826. He professed conversion in 1848, and was admitted into the Tennessee Conference in 1850. Early in 1856 he retired to his native place, where he died, Aug. 31, 1856. Mr. Alsop was an excellent preacher and a devout Christian. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1856, p. 669.

Alsvidur (eisiv), in Norse mythology, is one of the two horses that draw the wagon of the sun; the other is called Askravur.

Alt, Johann Karl Wilhelm, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born Oct. 1, 1797, at Hoyenwerda, in Upper Lusatia. He studied at Leipzig and Halle; and, after passing his theological examination in 1817, he became tutor in a noble family. In 1821 he was promoted as doctor of philosophy; was appointed deacon at Eisleben in 1822, and advanced to the pastorate in the same place in 1829. In 1835 he was called to Hamburg; was honored in 1836 with the degree of D.D.; and was appointed in 1860 as senior of the Hamburg ministerium. He died Dec. 28, 1869. His theology was that of vulgar rationalism. His publications are mainly sermons, in a list of which is given by Zachold, Bibl. Theol. i, 18–20. See Hamburger Correspondent, Jan. 12, 1870, No. 10. Altan Jidarki Burchan (the golden and imperishable), in the mythology of the Mongolians, was one of the holy prophets who came from heaven from time to time to warn the world. He appears to have lived in that period of time in the world's history when the ages of men had come down as low as thirty thousand years.

Altani, Antonio, an Italian prelate and diplomatist, was employed by pope Eugenius IV in several important affairs, especially as nuncio to the Council of Basle. Two new nunciateur,one in Scotland in the time of James I, the other in England in 1497—were in- trusted to him by the same pontiff, who also made him bishop of Urbino. Nicholas V, successor of Eugenius, also sent Altani as nuncio to Spain in order to negotiature for the marriage of the emperor Frederick III and Eleanor, infant princess of Portugal. Altan died at Barcelona in 1446, after more than twenty years of service and labor. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s.v.

Altanes, in Roman mythology, was a south-west- erly wind, believed to be a son of Tellus because he was thought to come out of the earth.

Altar. Christian, the table or raised surface on which the eucharist is consecrated.

1. Names of the Altars. — I. Trapesa (τραπέζα), a table; as in 1 Cor. x, 21. This is the term most commonly used by the Greek fathers and in Greek liturgies; sometimes simply the table by pre-eminence, but more frequently with epithets expressive of awe and reverence. St. Basil in one passage (Ep. 78) appears to contrast the tables of the orthodox with the altars of Basilides. Sozomen says (Hist. Eccles. ix, 2, p. 368) of a slab which covered a tomb that it seemed to show that he was familiar with stone tables.

2. Thiasisterion (θιασίστεριον, the place of sacrifice), the word used in the Sept. for Noah's altar (Gen. viii, 20), and both for the altar of burnt-sacrifice and the altar of incense under the Levitical law, but not for heathen altars.

This word in Heb. xiii, 10 is referred by some commentators to the Lord's table, though it seems to relate rather to the heavenly than to the earthy sanctuary. In Ignatius, too, it can scarcely designate the table used in the eucharist. But by this word Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. x, 4, 44) describes the altar of the great church in Tyre, and again (Pameg. i, 57) he speaks of altars erected throughout the world. Athanasius, or Pseudo-Athanasius (Disp. contra Arianum), explains the word "table" by this term. This name rarely occurs in the liturgies. It not infrequently designates the enclosure within which the altar stood, or bema (see Mede, Works, p. 382 sq.).

3. The Copts call the altar Hilasterion (ἱλαστήριον), the word applied in the Greek Scriptures to the mercy-seat, or covering of the ark; but in the Coptic liturgy of St. Basil they use the ancient Egyptian word Fmam-nershoush, which in Coptic versions of Scripture answers to the Greek theskeisterion.

4. The word Bemos (Βόμος) is used in Scripture and in Christian writers generally for a heathen altar (so 1 Macc. i, 54, 59). The word is, however, applied to the Levitical altar in Ecclesiastics (i, 12), the work of a gentilizing writer. It is generally repudiated by early Christian writers except in a figurative sense:

Clement of Alexandria (Stromata, vii, 717) and Origen (Contra Celsum, viii, 389) declare that the soul is the true Christian altar (boma), the latter expressly admitting the charge of Celsum that the Christians had no material altars. Yet in later times it was sometimes used for the Christian altar.

5. The expression mena Domini, or mena Dominica, is not uncommon in the Latin fathers, especially Augustine. An altar raised in honor of a martyr frequently bore that name: as "mena Cyriani." The word mena is often used for the slab which formed the top of the altar.

6. A Rams is frequently applied by Tertullian to the Christian altar, though not without some qualification. Yet it is repudiated by the early Christian apologists on account of its heathen associations. In rubrics, ars designates a portable altar or consecrated slab. Ars is also used for the substructure on which the mena, or altar proper, was placed.

7. But by far the most common name in the Latin fathers and in liturgical dictum is altar, a "high altar," from altar. This is the Vulgate equivalent of thiasisterion. So Tertullian, Cyprian, and Augustine. Yet Cyprian speaks (Ep. 59, § 15) of "diaboli altar," so uncertain was the usage. In the Latin liturgies scarcely any other name of the altar occurs than altar. The plural, altaria, is also occasionally used by ecclesiastical writers, as invariably by classical authors, to designate an altar. The singular altarum occurs in later writers, but is also used in a wider sense for the bema, or sanctuary; so also altaruris.

8. In most European languages, not only of the Romanesque family, but also of the Teutonic and Slavonic, the word used for the Lord's table is derived, with but slight change, from altar. In Russian, however, another word, prestol, properly a throne, is in general use.

II. Parts Composing Altars. — In strictness the table or tomb-like structure constitutes the altar—the steps on which it is placed, and the ciborium, or canopy which covered it, being accessories.

The altar itself is composed of two portions—the supports, whether legs or columns, in the table form, or slabs in the tomb-like, and the mena, or slab which formed the top.

Table-altar. (From a Mosaic in the Church of St. Apollinaris-in-Classe at Ravenna.)

The expression cornu altaruris (horn of the altar), often used in rituals, appears to mean merely the corner or angle of the altar, no known example showing any protuberance at the angles or elsewhere above the general level of the mena, although in some instances the central part of the surface of the mena is slightly hollowed. By the cornu evangeli is meant the angle to the left of the priest celebrating; by cornu epistolat that to the right. These phrases must, however, it would seem, date from a period subsequent to that when the Gospel was read from the ambo.

III. Tomb-altars. — The change from wood to stone as the material of altars in the early Church was not only for reasons of durability and elegance, but probably grew in part out of the necessities of the times, especially the celebration of worship in the catacombs of Rome; and this in turn gave rise to the custom, espe-specially prevalent there, of combining an altar and a tomb together. Hence the form gradually changed from the flat table, or mensa, to the chest, or arca.

It was, however, not only in Rome that the memorials of martyrs and altars were closely associated. The eighty-third canon of the African Code (A.D. 419) orders that the altaria which had been raised everywhere by the roads and in the fields as memoria martyrum should be overturned when there was no proof that a martyr lay beneath them, and blames the practice of erecting altars in consequence of dreams and "inae revelations." The most clear proofs of the prevalence of the practice of placing altars over the remains of martyrs and saints at an early period are furnished by passages in Prudentius. The practice of placing the altar over the remains of martyrs or saints may probably have arisen from a disposition to look upon the sufferings of those confessors of the faith as analogous with that sacrifice which is commemorated in the eucharist; and the passage in Revelation (vi, 9), "I saw under the altar the souls of them that were slain for the Word of God," no doubt encouraged or instigated the observance. The increasing disposition to venerate martyrs and their relics fostered this practice. See Tomb-altar.

Combination of the Table and Tomb in an Altar. (From the Basilica of St. Alessandro on the Via Nomentana at Rome.)

It is difficult to find the date at which it became customary to incise crosses, usually five in number, on the mensa of an altar; but they are found on the portable altar which was buried with St. Guthbert (A.D. 687). Two are to be seen on the oaken board to which the plating of silver was attached, and two on the plating itself, but it is quite possible that originally there were five on each. In the order for the dedication of a church in the sacramentary of Gregory the Great, the bishop consecrating is desired to make crosses with holy water on the four corners of the altar; but nothing is said of incised crosses.

The practice of making below the mensa a cavity to contain relics, and covering this by a separate stone let into the mensa, does not appear to be of an early date.

IV. Structural Accesories of the Altar.—Usually, though not invariably, the altar was raised on steps, one, two, or three in number. From these steps the bishop sometimes preached. Beneath the steps it became customary, from the 4th century, at least, at Rome and wherever the usages of Rome were followed, to construct a small vault called confessio. This was originally a mere grave or repository for a body, as in the Church of St. Alessandro, near Rome, but gradually expanded into a vault, a window or grating below the altar allowing the sarcophagus in which the body of the saint was placed to be visible.

In the Eastern Church a piscina is usually found under the altar. What the antiquity of this practice may be does not seem to be ascertained; but it may have existed in the Western Church, since in a Frankish missal, in consecrating an altar, holy water is to be poured ad basem.

The altar was often enclosed within railings of wood or metal, or low walls of marble slabs. These enclosures were often mentioned by early writers under the names ambitus altaria, circuitus altaria; the railings were called concessi, and the slabs transverse.

Upon the ends of the columns and arches of silver were often fixed, and veils or curtains of rich stuffs suspended from the arches. Pope Leo III gave ninety-six veils, some highly ornamented, to be so placed round the ambitus altaria and the presbyterium of St. Peter's at Rome. For the canopy over the altar, see Ciborium.

V. Appendages of the Altar.—In ancient times, a feeling of reverence prevented anything from being placed upon the altar but the altar-cloths and the sacred vessels with the elements. Even in the 9th century Leo IV (De Cura Pastorali, § 8) limited the objects which might lawfully be placed on the altar to the shrine containing the consecrated elements; hence the code of the Gospels, and the pyx, or pyx, in which the Lord's body was reserved for the viaticum of the sick.

The book of the Gospels seems anciently to have been frequently placed on the altar. With regard to the relics of saints, the ancient rule was, Ambrose tells us (Ad Marcellinum, epist. 85.), that they should be placed "under the altar," and this was the practice of much later times. The passage of Leo IV quoted above seems, in fact, the first permission to place a shrine containing relics on the altar, and that permission was evidently not in accordance with the general religious feeling of that age.

In the liturgy of the Christian Church, the consecrated bread was generally reserved in a vessel made in the form of a dove and suspended from the ciborium, or perhaps in some cases placed on a tower on the altar itself. Gregory of Tours speaks distinctly (De Gloria Martyrum, 1, 86) of the deceased taking the turris from the sanctity and placing it on the altar; but this seems to have contained the unconsecrated elements, and to have been placed on the altar only during celebration; nor does the reservation of the consecrated bread in the turris, capsa, or pyx on the altar appear to be distinctly mentioned by any earlier authority than the decree of Leo IV quoted above.

No instance of a cross placed permanently on the mensa of an altar is found in the first eight centuries. Crosses were seen in the sanctuary in the 4th century. The cross was found on the summit of the ciborium, as in the great Church of St. Sophia at Constantinople, and in Rome, according to both St. Vital in Gaul, suspended from the ciborium over the altar, but not on the mensa of the altar itself. A cross was, however, placed on the altar during celebration. The third canon of the second Council of Tours (A.D. 567) probably means that the particles consecrated should not be arranged according to each man's fancy, but in the form of a cross, symbol of the crucifixion.

Tapers were not placed on the altar within the period we are considering, though it was a very ancient practice to place lights about the altar, especially on festivals. Flowers appear to have been used for the festal decoration of altars at least as early as the 8th century. They appear as decorations of churches as early as the 4th century.

VI. Number of Altars in a Church.—There was in primitive times but one altar in a church. Augustine speaks (On 1 John, tract 3) of the existence of two altars in one city as a visible sign of the Donatist schism. But in the time of St. Basil there were no fewer than three or four altars in Neocesarea. The Greek and other Oriental churches have even now but one altar in each church; nor do they consecrate the eucharist more than once on the same day in the same place. They have had, for several centuries, minor altars in side-chapels, which are really distinct buildings. Such side-chapels are generally found where there has been considerable contact with the Latin Church.

Some writers rely upon the arcosolia, or altar-tombs in the catacombs, as proving the early use of many altars. Two, three, and more such tombs are often found in one crypt, and in one case there are as many as eleven arcosolii; but there is a deficiency of proof that such tombs were actually so used, nor is their date at all a matter of certainty in the great majority of cases.

The practice of considering the tomb of a martyr as a holy place fitted for the celebration of the eucharistic sacrifice, and such celebration as an honor and consolation to the martyr who lay below, probably led first to the use of several altars in a crypt in the catacombs where more than one martyr might rest, and then when the bodies of several martyrs had been transferred to one church above ground, to the construction of an altar over each, from a wish to leave none unhonored by the celebration of the eucharist above his remains. Such ideas were prevalent as early as the beginning of the 5th century, but after the 5th century, and indeed long after, the disturbance of the relics of saints was held a daring and scarcely allowable act, and was prohibited by Theodosius and much disapproved of by pope Gregory the Great; nor was it until some centuries later that the increasing eagerness for the possession of such memorials was gratified by the dismemberment of the holy bodies.

It has been contended that more than one altar existed in the Cathedral of Milan in the latter part of the 4th century. Ambrose more than once uses the plural altare in connection with the church, but altaria frequently means an altar. In the Theodosian Code altaria are stated to be necessary in churches. At the end of the 6th century we find distinct traces of a plurality of altars in Western churches. Gregory of Tours speaks (De Gloriar Martyrum, i, 83) of saying masses on three altars in a church at Braine, near Soissons; and Gregory the Great says (Epist. v, 60) that he heard that his correspondent Palladius bishop of Sutri mentioned, he had placed in a church thirteen altars, of which four remained unconsecrated for defect of relics. Moreover, the Council of Auxerre (A.D. 578) forbade two masses to be said on the same day on one altar, a prohibition that probably contributed to the multiplication of altars, which was still further accelerated by the disuse of the ancient custom of the priests communicating with the bishop or principal minister of the church, and the introduction of private masses, more than one of which was frequently said by the same priest on the same day. Bede mentions (Hist. Ecler. v, 20) that Acca, bishop of Hexham (deposed 752), collected for his church many relics of apostles and martyrs, and placed altars over their venerations, placing a separate canopy over each altar within the walls of the church. There were several altars in the church built by St. Benedict at Aniane. In the 7th and 8th centuries the number of altars had so increased that Charlemagne, in a capitulary (802-806) at Thionville, attempted to restrain the eucharistic multiplication. This was not very effectual, and in the 9th century the multiplication of altars attained a high point. In the plan of the Church of St. Gall, in Switzerland, prepared in the beginning of that century, there are no less than seventeen altars. The will of Fortunatus, patriarch of Grado (died c. 829) also affords proof of the increase in the number of altars then in active progress. In one oratory he placed three altars, and five in another.

VIII. Places of Altars in Churches.—From the earliest period of which we have any knowledge, the altar was usually placed, not against the wall, as in modern times, but on the chancel of the apse. When the apse was oblong, the chancel was usually the apse. When it was invariable, the church ended in an apse; when the end of the church was square, the altar occupied a corresponding position. The officiating priest stood with his back to the apse and thus faced the congregation. In St. Peter's at Rome, and a very few other churches, the priest still officiates thus placed: but there is probably an equivalent in many churches in Italy, where the altar retains its ancient position, it is very rarely that the celebrant does so.

Exceptions at an early date to the rule that the altar should be detached are of the greatest rarity, if we except the tombs in the catacombs, which have been supposed to have been used as altars. It is possible, also, that in small chapels with rectangular terminations, the altar for convenience have been placed against the wall. When, however, it became usual to place many altars in a church, it was found convenient to place one or more against a wall; this was done in the Cathedral of Canterbury, where the altar enclosing the body of St. Wilfrid was placed against the wall of the eastern apse; in the early altar of the cathedral, occupied the normal position in the eastern apse, and the original high altar was placed in the same manner in the western apse. In the plan of the Church of St. Gall, prepared in the beginning of the 9th century, only two of seventeen altars are placed against walls.

In a few cases the altar was placed not on the centre of the choral arc of the apse, but more towards the middle of the church. In some early churches at Rome, the altar occupies a position more or less advanced. In the time of pope Gregory IV (A.D. 827-844) the altar of Santa Maria in Trastevere stood in a low place, almost in the middle of the nave; the pope therefore removed it to the apse; so the altar of Santa Maria Maggiore in the time of pope Hadrian I (772-795). It is thought by some that in the large circular or octagonal churches of the 4th and 5th centuries the altar was placed in the centre.

In the churches of Justinian's period constructed with central domes, there is usually a sort of chancel intervening between the central dome and the apse; when such is the case, the altar was placed therein.

VIII. Use of Pagan Altars for Christian Purposes. —Pagan altars, having a very small superficialities, are evidently ill suited for the celebration of the eucharist; nor would it appear probable that a Christian would be willing to use them for that purpose. Nevertheless, traditions allege that in some cases pagan altars were so used; and in the Church of Arijie, in Servia, a heathen altar sculptured with a figure of Arys forms the lower part of the altar (Mittheil. d. k.-k. Central-Comm. zur Erforschung und Erhaltung der Baudenkmale [Vienna, 1865], p. 6). Such altars, or fragments of them, were, however, employed as materials (particularly in the bases) in the construction of Christian altars.

ALTAR, DOUBLE, an altar so constructively erected that it might serve for two chapels. In some old examples a pierced screen divided it from north to south, in which case the two sides of the priests would have faced each other had they celebrated contemporaneously. In most cases, however, the division was made by a screen which stood east and west, that is, supposing the altar to have been placed in its customary position. A double altar still exists, and is used at Bologna, without any screen to separate it; at which altar the officiants face the congregation.

ALTAR, HIGH, is (1) that altar which is the chief, cardinal, or principal altar in a Christian Church; (2) the altar which is ascended by a large number of steps, and the level of which is raised, elevated, or heightened above the nave; (3) the altar at which the bishop sits in the eastern part of the choir or chancel; (4) the altar at which high mass is commonly sung on Sundays and chief festivals.

ALTAR OF OUR LADY, that altar which stands in the lady-chapel of cathedrals, or in the side-chapel (one of which in most parish churches was ancienly dedicated in honor of Mary). Here "Mary mass" was said.

ALTAR, PORTABLE, a small tablet of marble, jasper, or precious stone used for mass when said away from the parish altar, in oratories or other similar places. It was termed "super altar," because commonly placed upon some other altar, or on any decent and fitting construction of wood or stone. A special license was needed to enable a cleric to possess and use a portable altar, which license was anciently given by the diocesan, but was afterwards reserved to the pope. Examples of such licenses are common in certain medieval documents, and are frequently referred to in the last testaments of the clergy.

ALTAR OF THE ROOD, that altar which, in England, anciently stood westward of the rood-screen in large churches, and at which ordinarily the parish mass was sung.

ALTAR STONE (or SLAB), that stone which should be without spot or blemish, and consequently entire, which forms the upper and chief part of a Christian altar. In the Church of England, the law requires that the lower portion of the altar be of wood. At Westminster Abbey, and in hundreds of other churches, the slab is found of stone or marble.

ALTAR, WOODEN, an altar made of wood. Anciently the altar was usually constructed in the form of a table, and hence was called the "divine" or "holy table." The wooden altar-table on which Peter is said to have offered the Christian sacrifice is still preserved at Rome. In the Eastern churches the altars are commonly of this material. The same has been the case in the Church of England since the religious changes of the 16th century. Slabs of stone should be, as they frequently are, placed on the top of the table, which slabs, being marked with five crosses, are that part which is specially consecrated with prayer andunction.

Altar-bread, the bread made use of in the Christian communion. This was originally unleavened (see Luke xxii, 15), and this custom, which is a matter of discipline and does not touch the essence of the eucharist, is still observed by the whole Latin Church, by the Armenians, and by the Maronites. The Ethiopian Christians also use unleavened bread at their mass on Maundy-Thursday, but leavened bread on other occasions. The Greek and other Oriental churches use leavened bread, which is especially made for the purpose with scrupulous care and attention. The Christians of St. Thomas likewise make use of leavened bread composed of fine flour, which by an ancient rule of theirs ought to be prepared on the same day on which it is to be consecrated. It is circular in shape.

stamped with a large cross, the border being edged with smaller crosses, so that when it is broken up each fragment may contain the holy symbol. In the Roman Catholic Church the bread is made thin and circular, and bears upon it either the impressed figure of the crucifix or the letters I.H.S. Pope Zephyrinus, who lived in the 3d century, terms the sacramental bread "corona sive oblata sphericum figum." a crown or oblation of a spherical figure (Benedict XIV, De Sacri- ficio Masse, i, 6, 4), the circle being indicative of the Divine Presence after consecration. The Orientals occasionally make their altar-bread squares, on which is stamped a cross with an inscription. The square form of the bread is a mystical indication that by the sacrifice of Christ upon the cross salvation is purchased for the four corners of the earth—for north, south, east, and west; and, moreover, that our Blessed Saviour died for all men. In the Church of England unleavened bread was invariably made use of until the changes of the 16th century. Since that period, however, with but few exceptions, common and ordinary leavened bread has been used. The ancient rule has never been theoretically abolished, for one of the existing rubrics runs as follows: "It shall suffice that the bread be such as is usual to be eaten, but the best and purest wheat bread that conveniently may be gotten."

Altar-bread Box, a box to hold the wafers, or altar-breads, before consecration. Such receptacles were anciently of boxwood or ivory. The example given in the illustration is of ivory mounted in silver.

Altar-card, a modern term used to describe a printed or written transcript of certain portions of the service for holy communion; more especially those parts which, having to be said by the officiating priest in the midst of the altar, he requires to have placed immediately before him. The altar-card, therefore, is placed in that position.

Altar-carpet, a carpet spread in front of the altar, over the steps of the deacon and subdeacon, as well as over the whole of the upper platform, or presbytery, on which the officiant stands as minister. In mediæval times Eastern carpets were commonly used for this purpose. Modern changes have not as yet produced anything superior or more fitting. Green is the proper color for use, as harmonizing with any other shade of green, and as contrasting duly and well with all the other ecclesiastical colors.

Altar-cerecloth. See Altar-linen.

Altar-cloth (linteumen, polia; ἀφρωμ, ἀπλω-μα, etc.), an ordinary term for that covering of the altar which, made of silk, velvet, or cloth, is placed over and around it. The altar-cloth is usually made in two portions: first, the antependium, which hangs down in front and is often richly embroidered; and, secondly, the superfrontal, which covers the slab and hangs down about six inches, both in front and at the sides. Such cloths, of different kinds and of various materials (originally of linen only), appear to have been in use in the earliest Christian times. See Smith, Dict. of Christ., Antiq. s. v.; Lee, Gloss. of Liturg. Terms, s. v. See Superfrontall.
Altar-cross, a cross of precious or other metal placed behind the centre of an altar to signify that every grace and blessing bestowed upon the faithful is given for and through the death of our Lord upon the cross of Calvary. In recent times a figure of Jesus Christ has sometimes been affixed to the altar-cross. See Crucifix.

Altar-curtains, hangings of silk, damask, satin, or other fitting material, suspended on rods so as to enclose the ends of an altar. In large churches they are found very convenient for protecting the altar-tapers from currents of air and draughts. Their color varies with the ecclesiastical season.

Altar-frontal, another name for an altar-cloth. Sometimes, however, frontals were made of wood in panels, richly painted, representing figures of saints or angels. In other cases the most elaborate mosaic-work was introduced for the permanent adornment of altar-frontals, on which symbols and representations of types of the blessed sacrament of the altar were appropriately placed. There were also frontals made of the precious metals, in which beaten-work, chasing, and embossing were discreetly and tastefully adopted for their greater beauty and richness.

Altar-herse, a term sometimes used to describe the frame on which a temporary canopy was erected over an altar on special solemnities and festivals of the highest rank. Altar-herses were sometimes used at funerals of royal and noble persons. Their hangings were often adorned with heraldic devices. See Hearse.

Altar-lights, those lights which are placed either upon or immediately behind the altars of some churches to symbolize generally the light of the Gospel and the twofold nature of our Blessed Lord, who in the Nicene Creed is called “Light of Light,” and is the true Light of the world. At the offering of the Christian eucharist two lights are commonly used; but the law of the Church of England is that they must not be placed upon the altar. They may stand behind it or at its sides. See Candlestick.

Altar-linen, those linen cloths, three in number, which are used to cover the altar-slab. The first is a cloth duly prepared with melted wax (hence called the altar-cercloth); the second is a cloth to protect this first cloth; and the last is the cloth of linen which, placed over the top of the altar, hangs down to the ground, or nearly so, at either end of the altar.

Other than the parochus who were specially appointed to say mass for specific intentions at private, chantry, or privileged altars.

Altarium, a word sometimes used to designate not merely an altar, but the space within which the altar stood. The plural is also used in a similar sense by St. Ambrose and in the Theodosian Code. The same extended sense is found in some modern languages, e.g., in Portuguese “altar-mór” (great or high altar) is used in the sense of choir or chancel.

Altar-lantern, a term occasionally found in old records describing the lanterns which were used in lieu of simple wax-tapers for the altar when erected temporarily and out of doors. Abroad they are found in the sacristies of many churches, and are frequently used, carried on either side of the crucifix at funerals, solemn processions of the blessed sacrament, in those parts of the Church where reservation of the holy eucharist is practiced.

Altar-ledge, a step or ledge behind an altar on which the ornamenta, i.e. the cross, candlesticks, and flower-vases, are placed. Behind some altars there are more than one step, especially in those of Roman Catholic churches, from which benediction with the blessed sacrament is given.
Altar-piece, a painting placed over the altar. The practice was unknown to Christians during the first three centuries, but it gradually crept in, particularly in the 4th century. In the Council of Elberiks in Spain, A.D. 305, it was decreed that pictures ought not to be in churches, lest that which is painted on the walls be worshipped and adored. In Roman Catholic churches, particularly in Roman Catholic countries, paintings of Scripture scenes and incidents by the most eminent artists are used as altar-pieces. The same custom has crept into some Protestant churches. In the Church of England, for instance, it is no uncommon thing to see paintings hung above the altar, although they are not to be found in other parts of the church. The English Reformers were violently opposed to the practice, and during the reign of Elizabeth a royal proclamation was issued prohibiting the use of either paintings or images in churches. The practice had become very general at the time of the Reformation, but was then checked by the Protestant movement. Even at this hour, however, Roman churches, and many Anglican churches, attach great importance to the altar-piece, not so much as an ornament, but as an encouragement to the practice of the invocation of saints. See IMAGES; INVOCATION.

Altar-protector, the name given to a covering of green cloth, baize, or velvet which, exactly fitting the top of the altar, is placed on it at all times when the altar is not in use, to protect the sacred linen from dust and defilement.

Altar-rails. The part of the church where the communion-table or altar stood in the ancient churches was divided from the rest of the church by rails. Eusebius says the rails were of wood, curiously and artificially wrought in the form of net-work, to make the enclosure inaccessible to the multitude. These the Latins called cancelli, and hence our English word chancel (q.v.). According to Simeon, to lay hold of the rails is equivalent to taking sanctuary or refuge at the altar. Altar-rails are almost uniformly found in Episcopal churches in England.

Altar-screen, the partition between the altar and the lady-chapel seen in large churches.

Altar-side, that part of the altar which faces the congregation. In correctly orientated churches this is, of course, the western side; but where altars are placed against the north and south walls of collegiate or cathedral churches, as is constantly the case on the Continent and in the Anglo-Roman communion, the altar-side will be that against which the priest stands when ministering at the same.

Altar-steps, the steps below and about the altar in a Christian church. They are usually at least three in number, independent of, and in addition to, the platform, predella, or dais on which the altar is actually placed. Sometimes there are more in number than three; if so, they are either five, seven, or fourteen. The latter would pertain to the high-altar of a collegiate church or cathedral.

Altar-stole, a medieval ornament, in shape like the ends of a stole, hanging down over the front of the antependium of the altar, indicating that the altar itself is constantly used, and symbolizing the power and efficacy of the Christian communion.

Altar-taper (so called because they taper in shape), the wax candles used in those candlesticks which are placed on or about the altar; ordinarily those tapers which are lighted during the celebration of the Christian sacrament. Custom in the West expects that at least two be lighted, even at low celebrations; at high celebrations in the Latin Church, as also in some English churches, six tapers are then ordinarily lighted. They symbolize (1) the fact that our Blessed Saviour, "God of God, Light of Light, Very God of Very God," is the True Light of the World. They are "the taper, because of joy and peace, the sign of the part of the faithful that Christ is born into the world (a) naturally, i.e. by nature; (b) sacramentally, i.e. in the eucharistic mystery.

Altar-tomb, a raised monument resembling a solid altar. This is a modern term; the expression used by Leland is high-tomb. See TOMB.

Altar-tomb, Porlock, Somerset, c. 1500.

Altar-vases, vases of latten, brass, china, or earthenware, specially made for holding flowers to decorate the altar; (e) the custum does not appear to be of any very great antiquity, beautiful and appropriate as it is. Churches were anciently decorated with bunches and branches, and their floors strewn with rushes, bay and yew boughs; but the formal introduction of flowers in vases on the altar-ledge is of no higher antiquity than the early part of the last century.

Altar-vessels, those vessels which are ordinarily used in the sacrament of the altar; viz: (1) the chalice, (2) the paten, and (3) the ciborium. The chalice is a cup of precious metal, the paten a plain circular plate of the same, and the ciborium—used to contain the sacramental species under the form of bread—is a covered cup surmounted with a small cross, from which the faithful are communicated when the communicants are numerous, and in which the holy sacrament is reserved for the communion of the sick. The cruets for wine and water, and the bread-box, in which, or the plate on which, the breads are placed, are not actually "altar-vessels," being found on the credence-table, their proper place, during the Christian communion.

Altar-wall, the wall behind an altar against which the reredos or altar-piece stands. See ALTAR-PIECE; HEREDOS.

Altar-wine, wine used in the sacrament of the altar; this should be of the pure juice of the grape. The twentieth canon orders it to be "good and wholesome." Tent wine is ordinarily used in England, as being more appropriate in its symbolism; but light-colored wine is not uncommonly adopted. Clarinet, wanting in some particular the true nature of wine, is forbidden by several Western decrees. See WINE.

Altdorfer (or Altorfer), Albert, a German painter and engraver, was born at Altdorf, in Bavaria, in 1488. He probably studied under Albert Dürer.
There are some of his paintings at Ratisbon which are much praised. He was quite distinguished among that class of artists which was called the little masters. He executed over one hundred and seventy prints, of which the following are a few of the principal ones: The Virgin and Infant, with two children, one holding a pot, dated 1567.—The Repose in Egypt.—The Virgin Sitting, with the Child upon her knee, and St. Joseph standing by, with a staff in his hand.—Our Saviour on the Cross. These, and many other historical and mythological subjects, and some wood-cuts. History gives no account of his death.

Al tehi ka-abotheka (אַל-טְהִי-קָא-אָבוֹתֶהַּקָּא), i.e. Be not like thy Fathers, is the title of a satirical epistle written by Profat Duran (q. v.), and published some years ago by rabbi Wise of Cincinnati, in an English translation, in his paper, the Israeldite. The pomposity and affected airs of these Cincinnati rabbis—"A Relic of Great Significance," respectably subscribed to "religion peddlers"—sufficiently indicates the animus of the publication, and is a poor apology for this effort to bring before modern readers a medieval epistle full of invectives against christianity. (B. P.)

Altemarchites, a Mohammedan sect, also called Manuchchites; both names having reference to their belief in the Pythagorean doctrine of the transmigration of souls. See METEMPSYCHOSIS.

Altenburg Conference. Altenburg is a city of Germany, capital of Saxe-Altenburg, twenty-six miles south of Leipzig. A conference of divines was held there in the year 1568, by order of Augustus, prince elector of Saxony, and John William, duke of Weimar. The occasion of the call was the disputes between the different parties of Lutherans in reference to the atonement of Christ. The subjects discussed were the Majoristic, Synergistic, and Adiaphoristic contentions. The debaters were in part Missian and in part Thuringian divines. As all the transactions were in writing, the conferences were protracted to a great length; and on one single expression in the article on justification the discussion lasted five months. See Moheim, Hist. of the Church, bk. iv, cent. xvi, sec. iii, pt. ii, ch. i; Sagittarius, Introduc. ad Hist. Eccles. pt. ii, p. 1542.

Alten-Oetting (or Altötting), a village of Upper Bavaria, pleasantly situated in a fertile plain near the river Ister, is frequented by thousands of Roman Catholics from Austria, Bavaria, and Swabia, on account of a famous image of the Virgin Mary (the Black Virgin) which it possesses. The Redemptorist fathers, invited here in 1835, have built an educational institution, virtually a revival of the old Jesuit college erected in 1778. It was formerly a culla regia, several kings having held their courts there, and various princes having made pilgrimages to it. It contains also the tomb of Count Tilly, called Tilly's Chapel, which is held in such veneration that Maximilian I and numerous others of the royal Bavarian family have had their bones interred in it.

Altenstein (or Altenstaig), Johann, a German Catholic theologian, lived in the first half of the 16th century. He was for a time professor at Tubingen, and published, Vocabularium Vocabula in Operibus Grammaticis Patrum Comitum (Tubingen, 1508; Hagenau, 1512 and 1515.)—Vocabularium Theologicum (Hagenau, 1517).—Commentaria in Hierico Variationi Tractatus Vetus (Strasburg, 1515).—Acta Epistolomnl (Hagenau, 1512). See Hofer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Altercatio, in Roman mythology, is the personified vice of dispute.

Alternate Presentation, The Right of. In the Church of Rome the right of alternate consists in the power of presenting, alternately with the pope, to the collative benefices; so that if the pope confers benefices which fall vacant in the month of January, the bishop confers those which become vacant in February, and so on. The exception is made with regard to the see of Rome. Certain benefices are benefices vacated by resignation, and those the patronage of which belongs to lay persons; and, with regard to bishoprics, confers the collation to which, for other reasons, belongs to the pope: as, for instance, benefices becoming vacant in curia, i.e. by the death of the incumbents. The presentation of the titular deacon of Rome. Cardinals are exempt from the reservation of the alternate, and collators in all countries possessing a concordat at variance with the alternative. The form of the alternative is given by Lotterius, lib. ii, De Bebenificiis.

Alteserra, Antoine Dadin, a famous French historian and canonist, was born at Guyenne in 1602. In 1644 he was appointed professor of jurisprudence at the University of Toulouse, and died in 1682 as dean of his faculty. His extensive knowledge of the Greek and Latin Church fathers as well as of the history of the councils made him an authority in that department and acquired for him the high esteem in which he was held by the French clergy. Of his many works we mention, De Origine et Statu Feudorum pro Moribus Galliae (Paris, 1619).—Innocentii 111 P. M., seu Commentarii Perpetuam in Singulas Decretales hujuscem Fontifex, que per Libros V Decretalium sarsum sunt (ibid., 1666).—In Epistolas Gregorii Magni (Tolos, 1689).—A selection, see Originae, seu Monumenta Libertatis (Paris, 1674; Halle, 1792).—De Nota et Observationes in X Libros Historiarum Francorum Gregorii, Terraeuorientis Episcopi, et Supplementum Fidei Gregorii (Tolos, 1769).—De Nota et Observationes in Anastasiam de Vita Romanorum Pontificum (Paris, 1688).—In Libros Clementini Commentarii (ibid., 1782).—De Arx Ecclesiae et Acciditio Vindicia adversus Caroli Ferrei et aliorum Tractatus de Abusu (Paris, 1708, and often). A complete edition of his works was published at Naples in 1766–80. See Ingler, Beiträge zur juristischen Biographie (Leips., 1778–80), v. 51 sq.; Adelung, Fortsetzung und Ergänzung zu Jörchers allgemeinen Gelehrten-Lexicon (ibid., 1793, 1795), s. 538 sq.; Micheaud, Bibl. Altrid, bishop of Hildesheim from 851 to 874, is said to have been a monk at Corvey before his elevation to the episcopate. The ordination performed by his predecessor, bishop Elbo, who died March 20, 851, he declared null and void, because he regarded the translation of Ebo from Rheims to Hildesheim as in conflict with the laws of the Church. He took an active part in the affairs of Church and State, and was present at the synods held at Ulm in 852 and at Echternach in 853 and 856, and at Cologne in 873. He founded many monasteries, and through his efforts the cathedral at Hildesheim was built, which he dedicated in 872. He died Aug. 15, 875. Althofo, in Norse mythology, was one of the orig-Aolithof, first created by the gods. He was famous for his skill in metallurgy.

Aolithof, Christoph, a Lutheran theologian of Germany; was born Nov. 9, 1656, at Herscheid. He studied theology at Wittenberg, Leipsic, and Jena. In 1629 he was called as professor of theology and dean to Altdorf, but resigned his deanship in 1637. In 1659 he was made master of divinity, and in 1644 he was appointed general superintendent at Cumbach, where he died, May 11, 1650. A catalogue of his theological works, comprising a commentary on the Pauline epistles, a Gospel harmony, polemical writings against Calvinists and Catholics, sermons, etc., is given by Zeltner, Bibl. Theol. Altfyr., p. 288 eq. See also Will, Nürnberg Ger. Lexikon, i. 26; v. 27; Witten, Mem. Theol. p. 187; Tholuck, *Das akademische Leben im 17. Altdoerler (or Altdigier), da Zefio, an Italian painter, lived in the 14th century. He seems to have been the first Veronese painter of any note. Vasari says he executed, with great skill, a single picture on the history of the Jewish War, according to the account of Flavius Josephus, on the four walls of the great hall of the Palazzo de' Scaglieri. He painted also at Padua in the old Church of San Giorgio.

Altno, Council of (Concilium Altinense). Altno is a city of Italy, situated on the Adriatic Gulf. It was formerly an episcopal see, but its destruction compelled the removal of the bishop's chair to Torcello. The council was held in 602; and in it Paulinus of Aquileia imposed the help of Charlemagne against John, duke of Venice, who had thrown down from the top of a tower John, patriarch of Grado. See Labbe, Concil., vii., 1187.

Altis, in Greek mythology, was a surname of Jupiter, derived from Altis, the name of a sacred forest near Olympia.

Altmann, a monk of Hautevilliers, in the diocese of Rheims, who lived about A.D. 860, wrote The Life of St. Sidulphe, the confessor (see Mahillon, Sec. Bened., i., 369). Sigbertus of Gemblours attributes to him A Life of Nivara, bishop of Rheims; also of the Empress Helena and others. See Cave, Historia Literaria, s. v.

Altmann, bishop of Passau, was born at Westphalia between 1010 and 1020. He studied at Paris, and for a number of years he stood at the head of the cathedral school at Paderborn. Here he became known to Henry III, who appointed him provost of Aix-la-Chapelle and made him one of his chaplains. In 1064 he accompanied the empress Agnes to Palestine, and succeeded Egilbert, who died in 1065, in the bishopric of Passau. He entered upon his office in very troublesome times. Being one of the strongest partisans of the system of Gregory VII in Germany, and zealous for the glory of his Church, he built monasteries everywhere, and introduced ecclesiastical discipline. When in 1074 he published the papal bull concerning celibacy, he would have been killed by the married priests, were it not for the help of some of his servants who rescued him. This resistance, however, gave him the more courage, and he proceeded with inexorable severity against the disobedient ones, whom he deprived of their offices, and even excomunicated the cathedral provost Egilbert, who was at the head of the opponents. With Gebhard of Salzburg he fought for the cause of the pope, and he was the only one of the bishops of South Germany who did not appear at Worms on Jan. 24, 1076, where the deposition of the pope was the subject of deliberation. He published the excommunication of the emperor, and was present at Ulm in 1076 as papal legate. In 1077 he was deposed by the emperor and driven away from his see. He went to Saxony and afterwards to Rome, where he reported to Gregory concerning the atrocities perpetrated at Passau by the king's adherents, and returned his bishopric to the pope, because he had received it from the hands of the laymen. The pope, however, confirmed him in his dignity, and invested him with full power for the election of an anti-king. In 1081 he again occupied his see, for Liupolt of Austria allowed him his protection while Henry had crossed the Alps. But when Liupolt was beaten by the Bohemians in 1082 at Mailberg, Altmann was again obliged to leave Passau, and went to Güttweig, where he died, Aug. 8, 1091. Weles' Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Alto, an Irish missionary of illustrious family who arrived in Bavaria about A.D. 743. He lived a hermit life in a forest about midway between Augsburg and Munich. Pepin granted him a part of the forest for the purpose of erecting a monastery and a church. The latter was dedicated by St. Boniface, and the monastery was called, after him, Alto-Münster. Altmann corrupted afterwards into Alt-Münster. The exact date of his death is unknown, but his memory is revered Feb. 9. See Langman, History of Ireland, iii, 189.

Altolbello, an Italian painter, was a native of Cremona, and lived in the early part of the 16th century. He appears to have studied under Bramante, and Vasari extols him as superior to most of the Lombard painters of his time. He painted frescoes in the Church of Santo Agostino, and also in the cathedral of Cremona. History gives no account of his death.

Alton, Abel, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Westfield, Mass., June 16, 1803. He began his Christian life at the age of ten; joined the Methodist Church at 18; preached at the New York Conference in 1828, and was immediately transferred to the Maine Conference. His latter years were spent laboring in the Providence Conference. He died in Marion, Mass., March 11, 1867. As a preacher, Mr. Alton was clear, methodical, instructive, earnest; as a pastor, devoted, zealous. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1867, p. 102.

Alton, William of, so called from the town of Alton, in Hants, was a Dominican who flourished some time before 1267. A MS. in the library of St. Victor of 1267 speaks of the postil of William of Alton upon Ecclesiastes and the Book of Wisdom. These latter postils were published at Rome in the works of St. Bonaventura. He also left Commentaries on Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Joshua, Judges, Ruth, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Lamentations.

Altor, in Roman mythology, was a surname of Pluto.

Altira, an Etruscan goddess, answering to one of the Greek Graces. She was represented as a nude and beautiful woman, with a crown and necklace, and generally in the company of the Graces and Euterphes.

Altschul, Naftali Ben-Asher, a Jewish printer in the city of Prague (1469), whose father had carried on the same profession, is the author of a commentary on the Old Testament, and grammatical, compiled from the best authorities, entitled *ה(system in allusion to Gen. xlix. 21). The text is in Hebrew and the notes in Jewish-German (best ed. Amsterdam, 1777-78, 6 vols.). He also wrote a manual for preachers, Wörter der Gehendheit , Words of Beauty, in thirty-two sections of commonplace, arranged in alphabetical order (Lublin, 1602). See Fürst, Bibliothek Judaica, i. 44; Eberleth, Introduction to Hebrew Literature, p. 447; De' Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Ger., transl.), p. 42. (B. P.) Aluberht (1), the fifth bishop of the South Saxons at Selsea, is known only by the appearance of his name in the lists. His date must fall between 747, when his predecessor Sigga was at the Council of Clovesho, and 765, when his successor signs.

Aluberht (2) was consecrated bishop of the East Saxons, or of the Old Saxons, in 767. Simeon of Durham calls him Aluberht, and names him as bishop of the Old Saxons of Germany. If this be true, he was the last bishop consecrated in England for Germany, and identical with the missionary Aluberht (q. v.). In the MS. (more authoritative) used by Hovevien, he is called Alberht and made bishop of Essex; and thus corresponds with Eadberht, the ninth bishop of London in the ancient lists, and with an Alberht who signs various charters between 775 and 785. As, however, there were contemporary bishops, Alberht at Hereford and Eadberht at Leicester, he cannot be identified with certainty, but is, most probably, the bishop Eadberchus who attests the proceedings of the legitimate council of 787.

Albert, an eminent Anglo-Saxon missionary, who went over from England and joined Gregory in the superintendence of his school at Utrecht. Persuaded by Gregory, he returned to England to seek episcopal consecration. During the year he spent there, he enjoyed the society of the celebrated Alcuin, then superintending his famous school at York. Having received consecration, he returned and continued to assist Gregory in training missionaries for the Frisians and ordaining them to that office. See Life of St. Liudger; Pertz, Mon. Germ. ii, 407.

Alulphe, a monk of St. Martin, of Tours, who lived at the end of the 11th century, composed a selection of thoughts and extracts from the works of St. Gregory, and entitled Gregorialis. Mabillon has given the preface to his Analecta (vol. i). Another work is attributed to him, Opus Exceptionum (Paris, and Strasbourg).

Alur (Old Eng. alorre). This word appears generally to have signified the gutter, passage, or gallery in which persons could walk behind a parapet on the top of a wall, or in other situations, especially in military architecture, where the alur becomes of the highest importance. The term, however, was sometimes used for passages of various kinds. Lydgate used the word for covered walks in the streets. So in the form alter it signifies an alley or walk in a church or cloister. See AMBULATORY.

Alush. Mr. Rowlands (in Fairbairn's Dict. s. v. "Hephitism") regards this as identical with the Wady es-Eskh reported by Dr. Stewart (Tent and Khan, p. 157) as "a large valley coming down from the hills to the east [north] and eventually falling into Wady Sheikah;" evidently the Wady es-Eskh of the Ordnance Map, at the junction of the great wadis Berrar and el-Akhash, north of Wady es-Sheikh, near the eastern termination of Wady Feiria at Wady Salaf.

Alva (or Alba), Fernando Alvarez de Toledo, duke of, a Spanish general and statesman, noted for his persecuting cruelty, was born of an illustrious family in 1508. He was educated by the direction of his grandfather, Frederick of Toledo, who instructed him in military and political science. He carried arms when very young at the battle of Pavia, commanded under Charles V in Hungary, chief at the siege of Tunis, and in the expedition against Algiers. In his earliest military efforts, his cautious disposition led men to believe that he had but little talent in that direction. His pride was offended at the low estimation in which he was held, and his genius was roused to the performance of exploits deserving of a permanent remembrance. In 1547 he was general-in-chief at the war against the Smalaldian League, winning his greatest honors in the battle of Mühlberg, in which he totally routed the Protestant forces. The elector, John Frederick of Saxony, was taken prisoner, and the duke, who presided in the council of war, sentenced him to death, and strongly urged the emperor to execute the sentence. In 1554 he went with the Spanish crown-prince to England; and in 1555, shortly before the accession of that prince as Philip II, he was commissioned as commander-in-chief of the army sent to attack the French in Italy and pope Paul IV, the irreconcilable enemy of the emperor Charles V. He gained several victories, and received Milan, advanced to Naples, where the intrigues of the pope had stirred up a rebellion, and confirmed there the Spanish authority. He afterwards conquered the States of the Church and frustrated the efforts of the French. Philip, however, compelled him to contract an honorable peace with the pope, which Alva wished to humble. A few years later the Netherlands revolted, and Alva advised the king to suppress the insurrection by severity and force. The king intrusted him with a considerable army and unlimited power to reduce the rebellious provinces. Scarcely had he reached Flanders when he established the Council of Blood, at which he put the head of the insurgents, General de Ramel, and his most distinguished adherents to death. This tribunal condemned, without discrimination, all whose opinions were suspected and whose riches excelled their avarice. The present and the absent, the living and the dead, were subjected to trial, and their property confiscated. Many merchants and mechanics emigrated to England, more than 100,000 men abandoned their country, and others resorted to the standard of the proscribed prince of Orange. The cruelty of Alva was increased by the defeat of his lieutenant, the duke of Aremberg, and he caused the counts of Egmont and Horn to be executed on the scaffold, June 8, 1568. He afterwards executed the count of Nassau and of Jemmeningen. William of Orange soon advanced with a powerful army, but was forced to withdraw to Germany. The duke stained his reputation as a general by new cruelties; his executioners shed more blood than his soldiers. The pope presented him with a consecrated hat and sword, a distinction formerly conferred only on princes. Holland and Zealand, however, resisted his arms. A fleet, which was fitted at his command, was annihilated, and he was everywhere met with insuperable courage. This and perhaps the fear of losing the favor of the king induced him to request his recall. Philip willingly granted it, as he perceived that the resistance of the Netherlands was rendered more obstinate by these cruelties, and was desirous of trying milder measures. In December, 1578, Alva proclaimed an amnesty, resigned the command of the troops to Luis de Requesens, and left the provinces. His parting advice was that every city in the Netherlands should conform to the ground rules he had given, and to be permanently garrisoned, and he boasted that during his six years' rule he had executed 18,000 men. But to this number must be added those who perished by siege, battle, and merciless slaughter, and the number cannot be computed. He had kindled a war which burned six years, cost Spain more than her finest troops, and seven of her richest provinces in the Netherlands. His cruelties were inhuman. Every conceivable mode of death and torture was wreaked upon the victims of his royal master's vengeance. At the sack of Haarlem three hundred citizens, tied two and two and back to back, were thrown into the lake, and at Zutphen five hundred more were drowned in the same waters in the river Yssel. Thousands of women were publicly violated, and unborn infants ripped from the wombs of their mothers. Yet Alva complained of the ingratitude of the Netherlands in return for his clemency! He was well received at Madrid, but did not long enjoy his former credit. One of his sons had seduced one of the queen's maids of honor under a promise of marriage, and was for that reason arrested.
His father assisted him to escape, and married him to one of his relatives contrary to the will of the king. In consequence, Alva was banished from the court to his castle at Uzeda. Here he lived two years, when the troubles stirred up by Don Antonio, prior of Crato, who had been crowned king of Portugal, made it necessary for Philip to call out Alva to subdue the enemy. Accordingly, in 1581, he led an army to Portugal, drove out Dom Antonio, and reduced the entire country to submission. He made himself master of the treasures of the capital, and permitted his soldiers to plunder the suburbs and surrounding country with their usual rapacity and cruelty. Phillip was displeased with this, and disposed to institute an investigation; but knowing the character of the duke, and fearing a rebellion, he de-sisted. Alva died Jan. 21, 1582. He was of a proud mien, and of a stern and overbearing aspect; he was strong and tall in frame; he slept little, wrote and labored much. It is said of him that in sixty years of warfare against different enemies he never lost a battle, and was never taken by surprise. But pride, severity, and cruelty tarnished his fame, and have condemned him to lasting infamy. See McCutchion, History of the Dutch Revolt: also the arts.

Alvarez, Baltasar, a Spanish Jesuit, was born at Cervera in 1533, and died in 1580. He left, among other works, Tractus de modo et ratione logendi de Rebus Spirituallibus, against the Illuminati who had sprung up in Spain. See Antonio, Bibl. Script. Hisp.

Alvarez, Baltasar, a Portuguese Jesuit, was professor of theology at Evora. He died at Coimbra, Feb. 12, 1630. He wrote Index Expurgatorius Librorum ab Exerto Luthero. See Antonio, Bibl.

Alvarez, Bernadino de, a Spanish philanthropist, founder of the order of St. Hippolytus, was born at Seville in 1514. At the age of fourteen years he went to Sicily and the Levant. He reached Spain rolled himself in the Mexican army; but, for bad conduct, was sent to the Philippines, from which he escaped and took refuge in Peru. Having amassed wealth, he founded hospitals several at Mexico in 1567, at Oaxtepe, at Vera Cruz, at Acapulco, and in other cities of New Spain. These hospitals were occupied by a charitable association of St. Hippolytus, the statutes of which were approved by Pope Innocent XII, and printed in Mexico in 1621 and 1718. Alvarez died in 1584, and was eventually canonized. See Hoefer, Nouv.
Bibl. Générale, s. v.

Alvarez, Diego, a Spanish Dominican friar, was born at Rio Seco, in Old Castile, near the middle of the 16th century. He was taken in infancy, and remained there for thirty years in Spain and at Rome, to which latter place he was sent in 1596 in order to sustain the doctrine of St. Thomas against the disciples of Molina in the assemblies of De Auxilia; but he left to his companion Lemos the brilliant part of this celebrated dispute. He died at Naples in 1635. He published, in defence of the opinions of his order, De Auxilia Divina Gratia (Lyons, 1611) — Concordia Libri Arborii cum Prædicatione (ibid. 1622). These works failed to gain him the archbishopric of Trani, in the kingdom of Naples. He was considered the chief the-ologist of his school, and was the author of certain commentaries upon Isaias and upon the Summa of St.
Thomas; he is also the author of several learned works, as De Incarnatione Divini Verbi Disput. 80 (Lugdun.
1614)—De Pseudo Polybios, etc. (Trani, 1629).

Alvares, Fernando. See ALVA, DUKE OF.

Alvares, Francisco, was mass priest and chaplain to Dom Manuel, king of Portugal, about the year 1515. He was a native of Coimbra, and at that time advanced in life; but of his early history nothing is known. He visited Abyssinia in company with the Portuguese ambassador, Duarte Galvam, returning to Portugal in 1516. He passed seven years there, and returned to Portugal, landing at Lisbon, July 25, 1527. He had explored a considerable part of Abyssinia, and an interesting account of his travels was published in 1540, entitled A True Account of the Country of Prester John. He died about 1540.

Alvares, Gonçalo, a Portuguese Jesuit, and misionary to the East, was born at Villaviciosa, in the first half of the 16th century, of a noble family.
Having studied at Coimbra, he joined the Jesuit Order at that place, Jan. 1, 1549. Being a man of profound learning, he was chosen by St. Francis of Borja to fill the important office of visitor to the Indies. He set out on this mission in 1568, and arrived there the following September, in the ship which conveyed Don Luis of Altayde. He accomplished his work, returned to China, and organized the first system of studies at Macao. On his way back to Japan, in order to continue his labors with Manoel Lopes, he was shipwrecked and drowned July 2, 1578. He wrote Carta a São Francisco de Borja, General de Companhia. This letter was useful to many historians, as well as another, entitled Oriente Conquistado, written at Souza. See Hoefer, Nouvelle Biographie Générale, s. v.

Alvares, Loranno, a Spanish painter, studied at Valladolid and Madrid under B. Carducci. In 1688 he went to Murcia, and executed some fine work for the convents of that city.

Alvares, Luis, a Portuguese Jesuit, was born at São Romão, in the bishopric of Coimbra, in 1618, and died at Lisbon in 1709. This ascetic writer is regarded as a classical composer, and is the author of a great number of works, among others, Amor Sagrado Offerenciado.

Alvares, Manoel, a Portuguese Jesuit, was born on the island of Madeira, June 4, 1526. He was well versed in the Greek and Hebrew languages, and, above all, in the Latin language and literature, which he taught at Lisbon and Coimbra thus gaining a high reputation. He filled various offices in his order, and died at Lisbon, Dec. 30, 1693. His Latin grammar, entitled De Institutione Grammatica, was published first at Lisbon in 1572, and was adopted in nearly all the schools of his order. Some of his companions, as Eus, Ricardi, Torsellini, prepared abridgments; others, criticisms.
Alvarez is the author of a more celebrated work, entitled De Musica, Poëtorum, et Numerum. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bibl. Générale, s. v.

Alvares, Paula. See PAULA ALVAREZ.

Alvares, Thomas, a Portuguese canonist, born at Lyra, was first treasurer of the Chapel Royal. He devoted himself to the study of the rubrics of the missal and Roman breviary, and published the result in certain Observations (Lisbon, 1615, 1629).
Alvaro, Pelagio, a Spanish theologian, was born near the close of the 15th century. He studied canonically at the age of 15, and was a pupil of St. Thomas and the companion of William Ockam and Raymond Lully. He became grand-penitentiary of pope John XXII of Avignon; bishop of Sylves, in Algovers; and apostolic nuncio to Portugal. He died at Seville in 1522. He wrote, De Planctu Ecclesiae Libri Duo (Lyons, 1517; Venice, 1550). This work, commenced at Avignon in 1520 and completed in 1525, is set forth in a manner more profoundly. Trithemius attributes to him, Speculum Regum Libri Unus:—Super Sententias Librum Quatuor:—Apologia:—and other unpublished works. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alvelda (or Albelda), Juan Gonzales de, a Spanish Dominican, was born at Navarrete, diocese of Calahorra. In 1568 he was called to Rome, and appointed first regent of the college of St. Thomas della Minerva. After three years he returned to Spain, and filled the first chair in theology at Alcala, from 1612 to 1622, when he died. He wrote a Commentary on the first part of the Summa of St. Thomas (Alcala, 1621).

Alvintzi, Peter, a Hungarian Protestant ecclesiastic of the 17th century, was born in Transylvania. He completed his studies at the best universities of Switzerland and Germany, and became pastor in Hungary. His religious zeal led him into a warm controversy with the Jesuit Peter Pazmany, archbishop of Granada. He wrote in the Hungarian language a number of controversial works, among which one, published in 1616, entitled The Catholic Itinerary, in which the author compares the two religions, the Protestant and the Catholic. He also composed a Hungarian Grammar. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alviset, Bavolet, a learned French Benedictine, was born at the commencement of the 17th century, at Besançon. During the wars which then desolated the Franche-Comté he returned to Italy and entered the brotherhood at Monte-Casino, under the name Virginius. He wrote a treatise upon the privileges of the monks, entitled Murenuic Sacra Vestis Sponsae Regis Aeterni Vermicularia; Opus de Privilegiis Ordinis Regularium (Venetia, 1661). This work was put in the Index by the court of Rome, and reprinted at Kempent in 1673. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alvord, Caleb Mattoon, a Methodist Episcopalian minister, was born at Southampton, Mass., May 3, 1815. He received an academical education in his native town; experienced religion at Miscokeet, Fla., in 1839; was licensed to preach in 1841; and to exhort at Marion in 1841; and to preach at Watumpka, Ala., in 1842. He followed the profession of teaching until 1858, when he united with the Providence Conference. In 1865 he was appointed a teacher in the Conference Seminary, where he continued until his death, Jan. 6, 1873. Mr. Alvord was characterized by a joyful Christian experience. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1873, p. 39.

Alvord, John Watson, a Congregational minister, was born at East Hampton, Conn., April 18, 1807. Having spent some time as a student, in Oneida Institute, he studied one year in Lane Seminary. In 1836 he graduated from the Oberlin Theological Seminary, and Sept. 16 of that year received his ordination. For one year he was acting-pastor in Maumee City, O.; and then, from 1838 to 1842, held the same position at Barkhamsted, Conn.; March 16, 1842, he was installed pastor in Stamford, of which Church he remained in charge until Oct. 14, 1846. In November of that year he was installed pastor of Phillips Church, South Boston, Mass., from which he was dismissed March 24, 1852; from 1858 to 1866 he was secretary of the American Tract Society in Boston; from 1866 to 1870 was superintendent of schools in connection with the Freedmen's Bureau at Washington, D. C.; the next four years was treasurer of the Freedmen's Savings and Trust Company. He died at Denver, Col., Jan. 14, 1880. See Cong. Year- book, 1881, p. 16.

Alvord, Samuel, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born in Massachusetts in 1784. For several years he was a member of a Free-baptist church, and subsequently joined a Calvinist Baptist church. His doctrinal views inclining him more to the Free-will Baptists, he joined that denomination, and was a preacher among them for many years. He died at Hamilton, Ill., Aug. 18, 1871. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1871, p. 82. (J. C. S.)

Alwig (Alulc, Alwilh, Alwiochus, Alwine, or Alwine), the fifth bishop of the Lindasa (or people of Lindsey), was consecrated by Tarewine, archbishop of Canterbury, A.D. 735. He subscribed several chapters from 736 to 747, and in the latter year attended the Council of Clovesho. He died, according to Simeon of Durham, in 750.

Alwis, in Norse mythology, was a dwarf who skillfully and secretly won the attention of the daughter of Thor and married her. Thor, the omnipotent hero, being very angry, delayed the marriage until the sun arose, when the dwarf, not able to endure the light of day, was changed into a stone.

Alwitra, in Norse mythology, was a heroine and companion of the Walkyrir.

Alynius, in Greek mythology, was a surname of Mercury, after the city of Alyme, where he was worshipped.

Alpyius. See Alphehus.

Alpyius, a learned architect, was commanded by the emperor Julian to rebuild the Temple of Jerusalem, with the avowed object of falsifying the prophecies of our Saviour with regard to that structure. It is said that while the workmen were excavating the foundation, balls of fire issued from the earth and destroyed them. Alpyius died about A.D. 363.

Alpyius, bishop of Cesarea, in Cappadocia, was one of the metropolitan to whom the emperor Leo wrote respecting the Council of Chalcedon and the death of Proterus. He is also mentioned as assisting in the deposition of Lampetus, a Macedonian, whom he was consecrated, and who was convicted of immorality. See Lubbé, Concil. iv, 1904 sq.; Photius, Bibl. 52.

Aizog, Johann, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born at Olbin, Silesia, in 1808. He studied at Breslau and Bonn; received holy orders at Cologne in 1834; was made doctor of theology at Münster in 1833; the same year he was appointed professor at the Clerical Seminary in Posen; in 1845 he was called to Hildersheim; and he died at Freiburg, March 1, 1878, where he had been laboring since 1853. He wrote, Universalgeschichte der christl. Kirche (Mentz, 1841; 9th ed. 1859 and often; Engl. transl. by Pabisch and Bryne) :—Manual of Universal Church History (Cincinnati, 1874), vol. i and ii,—Grundriss der Patrologie (Freiburg, 1880). (B. Am ("I am"). See Jehovah.

Am (or Amam) (devourer), a demon of the Egyptian Index who is mentioned in the Ritual of the Dead.

Ama, in Indian mythology, was a popular name of the goddess Bhaumani, or Parvati.

Ama (or Amilla), the vessel in which wine for the celebration of the eucharist was offered by the worshippers. The word is used by Columella and other classical authors, but the earliest instance of its use as a liturgical vessel which has been noticed is in the Charta Cornutana of A.D. 471. Silver "ama" are mentioned (Ordo Romani, I, 5) among the vessels which were to be brought from the Church of the Saviour, now known as St. John Lateran, for the pontifical mass on Easter-day; and in the directions for the pontifical mass itself (ibid.), we find that after the pope had entered the senatorium, or presbytery, the archdeacon following him received the amula, and poured the wine into the larger chalice, which was held by the subdeacon; and again, after the altar was decked, the archdeacon took the pope's amula from the oblationary subdeacon, and poured the wine through the strainer into the chalice (v. c.); then those of the deacons, of the primicerius, and the others. The amula, which may not have been identical with the amule, seem to have been church-vessels provided for the purpose of the oblation. Among the presents which pope Adrian (772-795) made to the Church of St. Adrian at Rome were an "ama" and also an "amula" of silver, which weighed sixty-seven pounds (Liber Pontificalis, p. 546). They were, however, often of much smaller size, and the small silver vessels preserved in the Museo Cristiano in the Vatican are deemed to be amules. They measure only about seven inches in height, and may probably date from the 5th or 6th century. On a similar vessel of larger size, probably of the 4th century, the miracle of Cana is represented in a tolerably good style. The material of these vessels was usually of silver, but sometimes gold, and they were often adorned with gems. Gregory the Great mentions (Epist. I, ixii, 359) "amulae," probably of onyx, or glass imitating onyx.

Amalblia, Sr., was born in the 5th century at Riom, in Auvergne, about two leagues from Clermont. Having received the order of priesthood, he was appointed to the cure of his native place, where he labored indefatigably, and built the churches of St. John Baptist and St. Benignus. He died at Clermont, Nov. 1, 464, and was buried in the Church of St. Hilary; but his body was afterwards translated to Riom, and interred in the Church of St. Benignus, which is now called by his name. This festival is celebrated June 11, the day of his translation, or, according to Ruinart, Oct. 19. See Gregory of Tours, De Gloriarum Confess, xxxiii, 921 and note by Ruinart.

Amaelius, a bishop whose deposition is set down in the martyrology of Bede on July 14.

Amad. Tristram thinks this is the "little mound with traces of ruins, called Un el-Amad, five miles west of Wady el-Malek" (Bible Places, p. 215); meaning the Un el-Amad of Robinson (Later Researches, p. 118, note), who observes that "the people of Bethlehem [Beit-jehan of Zebulun adjoining] said there were no columns there," as the name ("mother of columns") would imply. The place is laid down on the Ordnance Map as Unam el-Amad, a village without any signs of ruins, one mile south of west from Beit-jehan, in the hills north of the plain of Esraileon; but the situation is rather to the east to have been included in the territory of Asher.

Amadeo (or Amedei), Giovanni Antonio, an Italian sculptor, was born at Pavia in 1400. His principal works are the monuments of the Venetian general, Bartolomeo Colleoni, in a church at Basella, near Bergamo.

Amadesi, Giuseppe Luigi, an Italian canonist, was born at Leghorn, Aug. 28, 1701. He was keeper of the celebrated library of the archbishopric of Rattenburg. He compiled, arranged, and indexed a large number of writings which he employed in gathering up his learned works. He became one of the important citizens of Rattenburg, and was one of the founders of the literary unions which were organized in the palace of the marquises Casare Rasponi. He was four times sent to Rome by the archbishops, where he transacted well much important business. He died at Rome, Feb. 8, 1775. He published, De Jurisdictione Rerummatutum Archiepiscoporum in Civitate et Dioecesi Ferrarum (Ravenna, 1746); De Jure Rerummatutum Archiepiscoporum Deputatorum Notariis, etc. (Rome, 1792); De Comitatu Areganteano, etc. (Ibid., 1798); and many other works, of which a complete list may be found in vol. i of a work upon the writers of Bologna by Fantuzzi. He assisted in the composition of the burlesque poem entitled Bertholò con Bertholdino e Cacarrera. The seventeenth canto, with notes, is by him. See Hoefer, Nouv. Encycl. Générale, s. v.

Amadeus, bishop of Lausanne, was born at Côte-Saint-André, a little village in Dauphiné. His father, Amadeus, was a relative of the emperor Henry V, and became a Cistercian monk in 1119; his son entered the same order at Clairvaux, where he studied under St. Bernard. In 1139 he was appointed abbot of the Cistercian monastery at Hautecombe (Aïleuw), near Genoa. Under his guidance the monastery profited greatly and was in a very flourishing condition. After the deposition of bishop Guido I of Lausanne, Amadeus was elected in 1144 to the see as the twenty-third bishop of Lausanne, and was consecrated Jan. 21, 1146. The rights and privileges of his bishopric and Church were defended against all opponents, especially against the count of Geneva, the protector of Lausanne, who was finally deposed. The emperor, Conrad III, confirmed all the rights and privileges of the Church of Lausanne, and the emperor Frederick I esteemed Amadeus highly. He ruled his Church until his death in 1158. He is the author of some homilies, written in honor of the Virgin Mary, which were edited by Sopherus (Beale, 1517), and are contained in Bibl. Patrum (printed by P. Gibbon, Antwerp, 1603). Amadeus is among the saints of the Order of Citeaux. See Gallia Christiana, xxv, 346-348; Marrinques, Annales Cisterci. ad Annam 1158, c. 5; Chabert, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchen Lexikon, s. v. (B. F.)

Amadeus (or Amedeus) of Portugal was a Franciscan, whose real name was João de Mendes, son of Rodrigo Gomez de Sylva and Isabella, his wife, both of whom died not long after his birth. He was born about 1420, and died at eighteen, but left his bride the instant he was married, and went into Spain, where he fought against the Moors under John II. Determined after this to embrace the monastic state, he became a hermit of St. Jerome. In 1452 he joined the order of the Franciscans and went to Italy. In 1453 he was elected the 38th General of the Order, and in 1455 the new General of the Order received him as a lay-brother. He soon attracted attention on account of his austere penance and wonderful power of prayer. He then connected himself with some others for the purpose of observing most rigidly the rules of St. Francis. Having received holy orders in 1459, he was permitted to build and consecrate the regular observance atCremona, Brescia, and Milan. In the latter place he succeeded, by the help of the duke as well as with that of the archbishop, in founding the monastery of Maria della Pace in 1469. When the general, Francis of Reveere, was elected to the see of St. Peter's, under the name of Sixtus IV (v. c.), the society was presented with the monastery and Church of St. Peter's at Rome, while Amadeus was elected confessor to the pope. Here he spent ten years, highly honored by the pope, princes, and ecclesiastical dignitaries. In 1452 he betook himself to visit the convents in Lombardy, where he was taken sick, and died, Aug. 10, in the monastery of Maria della Pace. His successors worked in the same spirit, and soon convents of the Amadians were founded all over Italy and Spain. Under pope Pius V the Amadians, by means of an apostolic constitution, dated Jan. 28, 1568, were united with other orders. A Book of Prophecies filled with the most idle reveries, many of them opposed to sound doctrine, has been attributed to Amadeus. See Washing, Amal. Minor., Helyot (ed. Migne), vii; Tossin, Histor. Seraph. fol. 156; Grammer, in Wetzet u. Welte's Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v. (B. F.)

Amadeus VIII, count, afterwards duke, of Savoy, is known in history for allowing himself to be elected at the Council of Basle, under the name of Felix V, antipope to Eugenius IV. He was born Dec. 4, 1353. In 1416 Savoy was made a dukedom by the emperor Sigismund, who also invested Amadeus, in 1422, with the county of Geneva. In 1430 Amadeus founded the hermitage at Ripaille, where he retired with five other knights, after having left the affairs of his estates in the hands of his brother. Amadeus received the title of hermit, and spent five years there, until the year 1439, when the schismatic party of the Council of Basle elected him antipope. Although warmly attached to Eugenius IV, his vanity led him to accept the offer, and the more so as he was told that he was "obliged to help the Church." He now received as Pope Felix V, and all his successful, and was consecrated at Basle July 24, 1440, as pope Felix V. For nine years he occupied his pontificate, which he voluntarily resigned in 1449 in favor of Nicholas V, the successor of Eugenius, whom he regarded as the right pope. He died at Ripaille, Jan. 7, 1451. See Muller, Schweizerische Geschichte, iii, 2; 91; Ebene, in Welte's Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v. (B. F.)

Amador, Rebello, a Portuguese Jesuit, was born at Mezão Froio, in the bishopric of Oporto, in 1539, and died at Lisbon in 1622. He wrote, Algumas Capitulos Tirados das Cartas que Vieram este Anno de 1588 dos Padres da Companhia de Jeu que andam nas Partes da India, China, Japão, e Reino de Angola, impressos para poderem com mais Facilidade Comunicar a muitas Pessoas que as pedem. Colleciona por o Padre Amando Rebello, da Mesma Companhia, Procurador dos Provincias da India e Brasil (Lisbon, 1688). This book is very rare, and difficult to be obtained even in France. See Hoefer, Noue. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Amasea, in Greek mythology, was the surname of Ceres in Troyes.

Amalairreus, Fortunatus, a friar of Madeloc, was archbishop of Treves in 810. The following year he established again the Christian religion in that part of Saxony which had been converted to Arianism by Theodore, the bishop of Verulam. He visited the first Church in Hamburg, and went in 813 as an ambassador to Constantinople in order to ratify the peace treaty which Charlemagne had concluded with the emperor Michael Curopalate. He died the following year in his diocese. He wrote a treatise on baptism which was printed with others under the name of Alcinus. This treatise, in response to a letter in which Charlemagne consulted the metropolitans of his states upon the sacrament. See Hoefer, Noue. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Amalberga (St. and widow) was born about the beginning of the 7th century, of noble parents, in Austrasia. Her uncle, Pepin, married her against her will to a great lord named Thierry, but after the death of her father, afterwards St. Phalradis. Upon the death of her first husband, Pepin forced her to marry a second time, count Wigier, a nobleman of Brabant. Of this marriage were born Sta. Gudula, Reinilda, and Emelbertus (or Ablebertus). She took the veil at Maa- beuge, where she died about A.D. 670, July 10, on which day her festival is celebrated in the Low Countries.

Amalger (Lat. Almagerus), a friar of the 10th century of the Abbey of St. Gall, in Switzerland. He is mentioned by one of his contemporaries as being very skilful in the fine arts, especially in architecture. See Hoefer, Noue. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Amalric. See Amarduth.

Amairio (or Arnault), an influential chief in the crusade against the Alliages (q. v.), was born about the middle of the 12th century. He was first abbot of Poblet, in Catalonia, then of Grandeselve, and lastly of Citeaux. He was in the enjoyment of this last dignity when, in 1204, Innocent III associated him with the legates Raoul and Pierre de Castelnau in the mission to extirpate throughout France the heresy of the Albi- genes. He preached a crusade against them; many of his contemporaries, several of whom were princes and lords, took part in it, and he was nominated generalissimo of the crusaders. In 1209, after taking several castles and many times routing the enemy's forces, he besieged and took Beiers; sixty thousand inhabitants were massacred, and the town plundered. He then besieged Carcassonne and banished its inhabitants. He was presented to the archbishopric of Narbonne in 1212; thence he went into Spain with the troops, and contributed to the defeat of a Moorish king. On his return to France, he was embroiled in a quarrel with Simon de Montfort, about the title of duke of Narbonne, which he had assumed. He died Sept. 29, 1225.

Amalricians. See Almericians.

Amalricus Augusti, of Beiers, in Languedoc, took the vows in the Order of St. Augustine, and about 1382 was made abbot of the monastery of St. Mary de Aspiron, in the diocese of Ulim, Germany. He compiled a Chronicum Pontificale, taken from upwards of two hundred other chronicles, and arranged in alphabetical order. The last year of which he relates is 1170, the year XXII, whom it may be therefore supposed he did not long survive. Baluze has given a portion of the work in his Vita Pop. Armen. vol. i. See Cave, Hist. litt. ii, p. 68.

Amalteo, Girolamo, an Italian painter of the 16th century, brother and scholar of Pomponio, was highly regarded, and he was the author of a Treatise on XXII, whom it may be therefore supposed he did not long survive. Baluze has given a portion of the work in his Vita Pop. Armen. vol. i. See Cave, Hist. litt. ii, p. 68.

Amalteo, Pomponio, an Italian painter of the Venetian school, was born at San Vito, in Friuli, in 1505. He was a pupil of Pordenone, whose style he closely imitated. His works consist chiefly of frescos and altar-pieces, and many of them have suffered greatly from the ravages of time. He died in the year 1584.

Amalthia (Ἀμαλθια), in Greek mythology. As to this name, the poets differ in their interpretations, some holding it to be the name of a goat that nursed Jupiter, others affirming it to be a nymph who weaned the child Jupiter with the milk of a goat. The nymph was a daughter either of Oceanus or of the god of the sun, of Melissus or Hammonius, or of Olenus, a son of Vulcan. The goat whose milk she used in weaning Jupiter broke off one of its horns on a tree. The nymph filled this with green herbs and fruits, and brought it to Jupiter, who placed it among the stars. Mercury gave this horn to Hercules when he went out to capture the castle of Geryon. It is also in the possession of the god of the river Achelous. Another story runs as follows: The Libyan king Ammon married an exceedingly beautiful maiden, Amalthia, and gave her a tract of land which had the appearance of a horn. This tract of land was subsequently called the Horn of Amathus. This horn is made use of in the Germain works of art, and is found especially in the representations of the goddess of fortune, as a symbol of her abundance.

Amancius, St., was a priest of Tiferum, or Cita di Castello, in Umbria. He lived in the 6th century, in the time of St. Gregory the Great. The fame of his miracles induced Floridus, bishop of Tiferum, to make him known to St. Gregory, who brought him to Rome and lodged him in the hospital for the sick, where he is said to have performed many wonderful cures. His festival is marked on Sept. 26, and his history is contained in ch. xxxv of the 3d book of the Dialogues of St. Gregory.

Amandus, St., was born in Bordeaux, and was donated priest to St. Delphinus, bishop of that city, and was godfather to St. Paulinus. In 404 he succeeded Delphinus in the see; and it is said that when St. Severinus (q. v.) retired to Bordeaux, Amandus, through extreme humility, compelled him to take charge of the government of that Church. He governed the Church with such wisdom that he is one of the most saintly prelates of his time. The substance of one of his letters is found in the Epistles of St. Jerome, to whom it was addressed. He is commemorated in the martyrlogies on June 18, his birth on Feb. 6, and his translation on Oct. 26.

Amandus (called Fogeta) was abbot of St. Bavon, at Ghent, in the 14th century, and was very zealous against the Lollards (q. v.), and in this instance that pope Clement VII entirely put an end to them. He resigned his abbacy before his death, which happened in 1594. He composed a treatise, De Eus Carnium, and other works.

Amandus, Hermann, was a Franciscan, professor of theology, and provincial of the province of St. Wenceslaus, in Bohemia. His works are, Philosophia ad Mentem Augustini Bernardi et Scoti (1576, 4 vols. fol.);—Tractus Theologicus in lib. 1 Sententiarum, etc. (Cologne, 1690, fol.);—Commentaria in lib. 4 Sententiarum, etc. (ibid. ed. fol.);—Ethica Saecra Speculativa-practica, seu Disputationes Morales de Virtutibus Theologiae et Moralibus (Wurzburg, 1698, 2 vols. fol.);—Capistrana Triumphala, seu Historia Fundamentalis de S. Ioanne Capistrano (Cologne, 1700, fol.).

Amandus, Johann, doctor of theology and super-sintendent at Goslar, where he died, in 1580, was formerly a Roman priest, but soon embraced the doctrine of the Lutheran Reformation. He was called as first Luthian preacher by his friend, at the time of his first sermon, Nov. 29, 1523. He soon came in conflict with his colleague Brismann, whom Luther had sent there, and the result was that he had to leave the city. His unruly temperament did not suffer him long in one place, and thus he had to go from city to city. His meritorious services caused riots everywhere, and he was finally put in prison by the duke of Pomerania. He appeared again at Goslar, was appointed superintendent, and built a new school; but here also he caused difficulties between the bishops and the magistrates which resulted in disturbances, changed the liturgy, and was suspected of being a secret adherent of Zwingli's doctrine of the Lord's supper. He wrote, Von geistlichen Streit der Christen (1524). See Corvinus, Wahrh. Bericht, dass das Wort Gottes oth Tumult oth Scheermery zu Goslar und Braunsberg vnd Nuernberg wehr (Wittenberg, 1539); Arnoldt, Historia d. König. Universität, ii, 475. (B. F.)

Amandus Zierizenisz, so called from his native place, Zierizee, in the island of Schouwen, in Zeeland, was born in the 15th century, and died at Louvain in 1584. Being a good Hebrew and Greek scholar, he was regarded as an ornament of the Franciscan Order, in which he labored as priest, preacher, and later as lector of theology in his monastery. He wrote commentaries on Genesis, Job, Ecclesiastes, etc., which he left in manuscript. Of his published works we mention Chronica ad Exercitio Mundii ad Annam 1334 (Antwerp, apud Sim. Cocum, 1584).—Allgemeine deutsche Biographie, s. v. (B. F.)

Amani is a holy book of the Moslems, which contains precepts for a well-ordered, rational mode of life.

Amano Watia, in Japanese mythology, is a cave in Japan in a mountain of the province Isje, near the ocean, in which the highest of their gods, Ten-Sio-Dai-Dun, hid himself in order to prove that he was the supreme god from whom all light comes; for when he had hidden himself, the light of the stars went out, and only returned when he again appeared. In the cave is found an idol, sitting upon a cow, which is called Dai-Niz-to-Rai. Pilgrimages are often made to this cave.

Amanius is the name of two saints commemorated in old Roman martyrlogies—one a martyr at Rome, Feb. 10; the other of Noyon, June 6.

Amanus, or Hamanus (the Sun), an ancient deity of the Persians, mentioned by Strabo, the same as the Phoenician Baal.

Ama, in Hindú legend, was a highly respected philosopher at the court of king Vikramáditya. He was the king's favorite, and had several surnames, as "the divine," "the lion." For twelve years he lived a secluded life in the woods because there he believed Buddha to live. In a certain place called Buddhagaya he built a temple, and decorated it with numerous images of deities. He wrote books, some of which have been translated into Latin and English, and are of much value in the study of the Sanscrit language.

Amaral, Prudentius de, a Portuguese, was born in Brazil, 1676, and entered the Company of Jesus, July 30, 1690. Paralyzed with dropsy, he died in college at Rio Janeiro, March 27, 1715, leaving two works: Os Feitos dos Bispos e Arcidvescos da Bahia, which contains a history of the bishops and archbishops of the diocese of San Salvador (Lisbon, 1710) ;—A Book of Elegies in Praise of the Blessed Virgin, in MS.

Amarandus (or Amarantus), St. and marty, was put to death at Albi, in the 3d century, under the emperor Decius, or under Commodus and Allemanni, who ravaged Gaul in the time of Valerian and Gallienus, and made many martyrs. His tomb is shown at the village of Vians, near Albi. His festival is kept on Nov. 7. See Greg. Turonensis, c. liii, liii.

Amarapura, a Buddhist sect in Ceylon, which arose about the commencement of the present century. It seems to have originated from Burmah, and is now considerably extended in its influence, including priests of all castes. The object of this sect is to bring back the doctrines of Buddhism to their pristine purity, by discarding from them caste, polytheism, and other corruptions. The following are the peculiarities of this sect in its present form in Ceylon, as given by R. Spence Hardy: "(1.) They publicly preach against the doctrines of Hinduism, and do not invoke the Hindu gods at the recitation of piri (a mode of exorcism). (2.) They give ordination to all castes, associating with them indiscriminately, and preach against the secular occupations of the Siamese priests. (3.) They do not acknowledge the authority of the royal edicts, that they have anything to do with their religion; neither do they acknowledge the Buddhist hierarchy. (4.) They do not follow the observances of the Pasc-Buddhas, unless sanctioned by the Brahma. (5.) They do not use two seasons; nor employ two priests when Bana (the sacred writings) is read, nor quaver the voice, as not being authorized by Buddha. (6.) They expound and preach the Wisaya (a portion of the sacred writings) to the laity, while the Siamese read it only to the priests, and then only a few passages, with closed doors. (7.) They perform a ceremony equivalent to confirmation a number of years after ordination, while the Siamese perform it immediately after. (8.) They lay great stress on the merit of the pad-pinkama (or feast of lamps), which they perform during the whole night, without any kind of preaching or reading; whereas the Siamese perform only by a few lamps in the evening and repeat Bana until the morning. (9.) The Amarapuras differ from the Siamese by having both the shoulders covered with a peculiar roll of robe under the armpit, and by leaving the eyebrows unshorn."

Amaravati, in Hindu mythology, is the residence of the god of the sun, Indra.

Amaravati, in Hindu mythology, was the daughter of Vishnu and Sakshita; she was the wife of Subramanya, a son of Siva.

Amaru (the circle of the day), an Accadian name of the deity Marid, the son of Hea.

Amarynthia, in Greek mythology, was a surname of Dione, from the city Amaranthyn, in Euboea, where magnificent feasts were celebrated, which were called by the same name.

Amat, Felix, a Spanish ecclesiastical historian, was born at Sabadell, in the diocese of Barcelona, Aug. 10, 1750. He entered the Church in 1767, and, after taking his doctor's degree at Granada in 1770, was made professor of philosophy at the University of Granada. He afterwards became director of the seminary, and in 1783 was made archbishop of Palmyra by the pope, and in the same year abbot of St. Bifodonio, in the abbey of Charles IV. Being suspected of favoring the French cause against the Spanish, he was compelled to leave Madrid in 1812, and in 1814 was banished to Catalonia. He died in a Franciscan convent near Salent, Sept. 28, 1824. His chief work is his Tratado de la Iglesia de Jesu Cristo, or ecclesiastical history from the birth of Christ to the close of the 18th century (Madrid, 1798-1803). Besides, he wrote Observaciones sobre la Figura, del Apostolado Eclesiástico (Madrid, 1817-1829); published under the pseudonym of Don Macario Padua Melato:—Seis Cartas a Ireneo (ibid. 1817);—Deberes del Cristiano en Tiempo de Revolucion (Madrid, 1818). These last two works were published by the nephew of the author.

Ama-Teru-Oon-Gami, in Japanese mythology, is the son of Isanagi and Isumari, the progenitors of the human race. He belongs to the seventh generation of the heavenly deities; but of the five generations of earthly deities he is the first. He was the oldest and the only fruitful son of his parents. His children are the Japanese, born in a time when they themselves were half-deities, and lived very much longer than the present human beings. In a direct line of succession, the emperors follow him; therefore his name, which signifies the great god of the imperial generation, is one of the names of Japan. During this time he performed the most stupendous miracles, and proved himself the only and true god. The province of Ise is his residence, and there stands the most renowned of his triumphs. The great feast which is celebrated in his honor is called Matsuri. His successor in the kingdom was his son Osu-Mi-Nino-Mikoto.

Amato (or Amatus), a friar of Monte-Casino, and afterwards bishop, lived in the 11th century. He composed several Latin poems, and among others four books, which he dedicated to pope Gregory VII, entitled De Geras Apostolorum Petri et Pauli. These works have been lost; and this is a great misfortune, if we may credit the opinion of Girmanus Dionysius, who calls him an admirable versifier. The canon Mari says that one MS. has been preserved in the Library of Monte-Casino, which contains a history of the Normans, in eight volumes, compiled by Amatus. See Hoefner, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Amato, Francesco, an Italian painter and engraver, executed a few paintings. The following are the principal ones: St. Joseph Seated, Reading a Book, with the apostles, near him; and St. Joseph with the Prodigal Son. These are upright prints, inscribed "Francesco Amatus inv.".

Amato, Giovanni Antonio d', the older (also called IV Vecchio), a Neapolitan oil and fresco painter, was born in 1475. He studied the works of Perugino, and imitated his style. There are several of his works in the churches of Naples. His favorite study was theology, and he was noted for his exposition of many obscure parts of the Bible. He died in 1555.

Amato, Giovanni Antonio d', the younger, a Neapolitan painter, was born in 1535. Some of his works are said to have been equal to those of Titian. His best work is the large altar-piece of the Infant Christ in the Church of the Banco de Poveri at Naples. He died in 1598.

Amato, Giuseppe d', an Italian missionary, was born at Naples about 1575. He was sent to Asia in 1783 by the Society for the Propagation of the Truth, and he became rector of five Catholic villages in the district of Dibayan, about ten leagues to the north-west of the city of Ava. These villages were inhabited by people of French descent, whom Alompra had made prisoners of war in 1757. Amato knew the people, and was acquainted with the natural history of the country. He had specimens of more than two hundred plants, and a collection of animals, which were lost in the war of the Birmans in 1824. He died at Moula in 1828. See Hoefner, Nouvelle Biographie Générale, s. v.

Amato, Michele d', an Italian ecclesiastic, was born at Naples, Oct. 3, 1682. Having made himself acquainted with the Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Syriac, Slavonian, French, Spanish, and other languages, he took orders, and became the rector of the Congregation of Apostolic Ministers, formed in the Church of Naples. He held many public offices, and in 1719 was charged with the care of visiting all the churches and chapels royal. He held Nov. 15, 1729. Among the works which he composed, and which have been printed, are, De Insalutani Specie et S. Christi Conficiendi Requisita (Naples, 1729, 8vo);—De Pietatis orb. Avium Eius Consuetudine opus quodam Christi Fideles in Anteepiscopali Chjonio (ibid. 1728, 8vo);—Dissertationes IV Historico-Dogmaticae (ibid. 1728, 8vo). He also left many MSS. concerning the worship of saints and their images, of the state of infants dying without baptism, of the precautions to be used in reading the fathers (Italian), on the Magi, and several others. See Bibliol. vii, 265; Mag. Bib. Ecles. p. 371.

Amator, Sr., was born of a noble family in Auxerre, in the time of the emperor Constantius. His parents afflicted him, without his consent, to Martha, a rich young lady; but when he and his bride went to church to receive the nuptial benediction from the bishop, St. Valerian, he, by mistake, or, as some think, by a special interposition of Providence, pronounced over them the office of consecration to the service of God, instead of the marriage prayer. Upon this they both embraced the monastic state, and Amator succeeded St. Helladius in the bishopsric of Auxerre, about A.D. 388. In spite of his holy and self-denying life, he was persecuted by slanders and calumnies; but his innocence was fully proved. In 387 he was chosen a bishop, and in 411 he was appointed Germainus his successor, although he had at one time had some difference with him. He is said to have been distinguished by the gift of miracles, both before and after his death. The ancient breviaries of Auxerre commemorate him on May 1, and the Latin martyrologies on Nov. 26.

Amato, Cola Filottero dell', an Italian painter, flourished in 1333. He lived in Ascoli di Ficino, and had a good reputation. He has a fine picture in the Oratory of the Corpus Domini, at Ascoli, which represents The Sacrifice in the Act of Dispen sing the Eucharist to his Apostles.

Amatus, St., of Remiomet. See Amet.

Amatus (or Aimé), St., bishop of Sens, and patron of Dijon. A Flodoard, was born in the century of pious parents. In 669 he was compelled to take the charge of the Church of Sens, which he governed with admirable vigilance and mildness. After a time king Thierry III banished him to the Monastery of St. Fursy at Peronne. Subsequently he was put in trust of the Monastery of Dijon (or Brioule), built on the river Lys, in Flanders, in the diocese of Treouane, where he died and was buried in 690. His body was translated to Douay in 870, where it now remains. The Roman martyrology commemorates him on the 3rd of Sept.

Amatus (or Amati), Vinzzzio, an Italian priest and musician, was born at Chinusia, in Sicily, Jan. 6, 1629. After finishing his studies in the Seminary at Palermo, he became master of the chapel of the cathedral of that place in 1665. He died July 29, 1670. He wrote, Sacri Concerti a Due, Tre, Quattro (Palermo, 1656);—Missa e Salmi di Vespri, e Compieta a Quarto e Cinque Voci (ibid. ed.);—Isaura, an opera (Aquilia, 1654). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Amaury of Chartres. See Amaury of Bena.

Amaury (Amalric, or Aimeric), patriarch of Jerusalem, occupied the patriarchal see from 1159, and assisted in the election of Amaury I as king of Jerusalem in 1155. A bond of friendship existed between him and the celebrated historian William of Tyre. He died in 1188. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Ambarach, Peter, a Jesuit and Orientalist, was born in 1663 at Gusta, in Phoenicia. He was educated from 1672 to 1685 at the Maronite College of the Jesuits at Rome, and returned in 1686 to Syria. He received holy orders from the Maronite patriarch Stephen of Abo, and was intrusted with the revision of Arabic liturgical works, and with their translation into Latin. The Maronites sent him to Rome in behalf of their Church; and while on his way home the grand-duke Cosmo III retained him at Florence for the sake of arranging a printing-office and the Oriental types bought by his father, Ferdinand. Afterwards he was appointed professor at Pisa. He died in 1687. Ambarach joined the Order of St. Benedict, and Clement XI added him to the commission appointed for the criticism of the Greek text of the Bible. In 1730 cardinal Quinini nominated him to the Latin translation of the Syriac work of Ephrem. The first two volumes appeared in 1737 and 1740; with the third volume he had advanced as far as the middle of the work when he died. The work was completed by Stephen Evodius Asemanii, and was published in 1745. The second volume contains also two treatises by Ambarrach on the eucharist. See Ecce Man, Universae Universae, i. v., 158; Bauer, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Amburvalia (Lat. amburvalia arvis, 'going around the fields'), a ceremony performed among the ancient Romans with a view of procuring from the gods a plentiful harvest. A sacrifice was offered to Ceres, but before doing so the victims, consisting of a sow, a sheep, and a bull, were driven amid a vast crowd past the cornfields in procession. The ceremony was sometimes private and managed by the master of a family, and sometimes public and performed by priests, who were called friates arvalis, or field brothers. This festival was held twice in the year—the first time either in January or April, the second time in July. See Scovestaurilla.

Amberger, Christoph, a German painter, was born at Nuremberg in 1490, and studied under Hans Holbein the elder. He executed a set of twelve pictures, representing the history of Joseph and his Brethren, which gained him great celebrity, though he succeeded better in portraits than in history. He painted the Emperor Charles V. in 1535. Probably no early example of a field with a gold medal and chain. He is supposed by some to have died in 1568, by others in 1550.

Ambest, the name given by the Hindús to the tree of immortality. It grows on the mountain of Meera, in Amaravati, the metropolis of India.

Ambitus (composit in music). In the earliest Church melodies, the compass did not in some instances reach, and in few did it exceed, a fifth. In Gregorian music the octave was the limit, but in later times this compass was much extended. A melody occupying or employing its whole compass was called continuus perfectus; falling short of this, continuus imperfectus; exceeding it, continuus plagumperfectus. Subsequently other interpretations have been given to the word ambitus.

Ambitus Altaria, an expression sometimes used for the enclosure which surrounded the altar. It was probably distinct from the presbytery, or choros cunorum (i.e. an enclosed space in front of the altar reserved for the use of the inferior clergy), and there was usually between the presbytery and the altar a raised space called the ambitus. In Roman times the ambitus altaria now exists. In St. John Lateran many fragments of marble slabs, with the plaited and knotted ornament characteristic of this period, are preserved in the cloister, and may probably be fragments of the ambitus mentioned above. The expression ambitus altaria may perhaps sometimes stand for the space, as surrounding the altar.

Ambler, James B., a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) and Presbyterian churches, was born in England in 1797. He was licensed to preach in his native country; and served in the same as pastor at Braddock from 1816 to 1818, when he came to America. His ministry was extended through the northern and central portions of New York State, in the Presbyterian Church, from 1818 to 1833; at which time he joined the Reformed Church, and therein remained till 1848, when he died. He was a man of sincere piety and untiring zeal, and his ministerial effects were effective and successful. See Corwin, Manual of Ref. Church of America (3d ed.), 1856.

Ambo. Something in the nature of an ambo or desk, no doubt, was in use from a very early period.
Bunson (Basilikos des christlichen Rom, p. 48) expresses his opinion that the amb is originally movable. In the earlier centuries much of the Church furniture was of wood, and the ambones were probably of the same material. Wherever a presbyterium, or chorus cantorum, existed, an amb was probably connected with it, being placed usually on one side of the enclosure. Where no chorus existed, the amb was probably placed in the centre.

Ambrose, Franoise d', daughter of Louis Ambrose, viscount of Thouars, was born in 1427. She was married to Peter II, duke of Brittany, who died in 1457. When in 1452 the general of the Carmelites, Johann Soreth, founded the Order of the Carmelites, with the sanction of pope Nicholas V, Françoise founded the first monastery in Brittany, and entered the same in 1457, where she died in 1485. See Lanoy, Vita Francisci ab Ambrosio, Ducissee Armoricse (Paris, 1604); Saint-Jean-Macé, Vie de la très Illustre, et Vert. Ambrose, Georges d', (1) a French cardinal and diplomatist, was born at Chaumont-sur-Loire in 1460. From his birth he was designed for the Church, as the younger son of the family. He studied canon law, and at the age of fourteen received the title of bishop of Montauban, and then became almoner of the king, although so young. He gained the friendship of the duke of Orleans, son-in-law of the king, who was similar to him in tastes, and was also of the same age. After the death of Louis XI, the duke of Orleans and Anna of Beaujeu each claimed the regency; but the latter was successful, and the duke was obliged to take refuge with Francis II, duke of Brittany (May, 1484). D'Ambrose, attempting to persuade the king in his behalf, was betrayed by a messenger, arrested, and imprisoned for more than two years. After the battle of Saint-Aubin du Cormier (July 28, 1488), Francis II was obliged to capitulate. D'Ambrose, exiled in the diocese of Montauban, sought to obtain liberty for himself and the duke of Orleans, whose interests were very dear to him. The attempt of the duke to assist in bringing about the marin a cave near the city, where he remained three years in prayer and fasting. Being discovered, he went to Rome, and thence to a hermitage on the Arnon, in Berry, where he died, in 770. His festival is observed Oct. 16, the day of his death.

Ambrose of Lérins, a monk of the third Order of St. Francis, and professor of theology, died in 1584. In his work, entitled Lampam Sacrum, he refers to the gospels, epistles of Paul, and the seven canonical epistles.

Ambrose of Naples was an Augustinian monk, and afterwards bishop (or rather administrator) of the Church of Mantua. He was one of the best preachers and most skilful doctors of his time. He lived about 1620, and died in 1681. His work, De Gratia, is of great utility and value.

Ambrose of Paris, a monk, was born in 1523, and died in 1604. His work, Consecrations super Salutationem Angel., is a work of great value in the field of mysticism.

Ambrose of Pisa, a Dominician, was born at Sienna, April 16, 1220, and assumed his habit when seventeen. After studying at Paris he went to Cologne, and preached with great success throughout Germany. Through his influence the city of Sienna made peace with Clement IV, who had placed it under interdict for favoring the party of Frederick II. Ambrose had the honor of being the first to write the Pontificate of Gregory X. He frequently refused the episcopate; and spent the rest of his life in legations and apostolic missions. He died at Sienna, March 20, 1286, on which day the Roman martyrlogy commemorates him. See Bollandus, Life of Ambrose.

Ambrose of Sora was so called because he relinquished the marquisate of Sorci to become a Capuchin. After the death of his wife, which happened when he was forty-seven, he obtained from Clement VIII a mission to the captive Christians in Algiers, where he died, in 1601. He left a treatise, On the Sacrament of Penance, and On Holy Living and Dying. See Bovonius, in ann. 1601.

Ambrose, abbot of St. Vincent. See AMBROSE, APTERTET.

Ambrose, Samuel (1), a Baptist minister, was born at Exeter, N. H., in 1754. He lost his father when he was but six years of age, and the care of his education devolved on his pious mother. It was not until the twenty-sixth year of his age that he became a Christian, and not long after it felt to be his duty to preach the Gospel. In 1782 he removed to Sutton, N. H. In April of this year a Church was constituted, of which he was ordained the pastor in October. He continued in this office eighteen years, preaching, however, in neighboring towns a part of the Sabbaths of the year. Soon after his settlement he was blessed with an extensive revival, which was quite general in Sutton, and reached to the neighboring towns. In 1800 Mr. Ambrose discontinued his ministerial services in Sutton, and removed his Church relations to New London, N. H. From 1800 to 1820 he was busily occupied in his Master's cause, chiefly as stated supply in a number of towns in New Hampshire, and as a missionary sent out under the direction of the Massachusetts Home Missionary Society in the destitute and sparsely settled portions of New Hampshire, Vermont, Maine, and Canada. "His journals, though imperfect, present him to us, amid hardships, toils, and labors, instructing the ignorant, comforting the feeble-minded, encouraging the weak, and preaching the Gospel to the poor." From 1820 to 1828 he made a few missionary tours; generally, however, during this period he was at his home during the week, preaching as occasion presented on the Sabbath. His interest in the kingdom of Christ remained unshaken until the close of life. He died May 30, 1830. See Amer. Baptist Magazine, xi, 97-104. (J. C. S.)

Ambrose, Samuel (2), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Maine, Aug. 6, 1815. He experienced religion at the age of fifteen, graduated at the Maine Wesleyan Seminary, and in 1840 entered the Maine Conference. In 1852 he located, moved to Illinois, and in 1860 associated with the Rock River Conference. In 1870 he superseded Mr. Ambrose in his home county, Ill., where he died July 25, 1874. Mr. Ambrose was a man of much devotedness. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1874, p. 137.

Ambrose, Thomas L., a Congregational missionary and army chaplain, was born in New England. He graduated at Bowdoin College in 1856, spent one year in Europe, studied at the Theological Seminary in New York, and in 1857 entered the Andover Theological Seminary. His health not allowing him to continue his studies, he was ordained in July of the following year, and in August sailed for Persia, where he labored three years as a missionary among the Nestorians. Returning to recruit his health in 1861, Mr. Ambrose received the appointment of chaplain to the 12th New Hampshire Regiment. He was taken prisoner at Chancellorville, remaining in the hands of the enemy for two weeks. While passing from the intrenchments to the Chesapeake General Hospital, Fortress Monroe, in the rear, he was wounded, and after three weeks of suffering, died, Aug. 19, 1862. Mr. Ambrose was "a noble, Christian man, of fine talents, sympathetic, and of indomitable courage, and was much respected by his regiment." See Cong. Quarterly, 1865, p. 421.

Ambrose, William, a Welsh Congregational minister, was born at Bangor in 1818. He received a liberal education partly in his own city and partly at Holyhead. His only charge was at Portmadoc, where he was ordained in 1837, and where he continued to labor till his death, Oct. 31, 1873. Mr. Ambrose was tall, gentlemanly, and commanding in appearance. As a preacher, he was polished, simple, persuasive, and very practical; as a poet, he took a high rank; as a speaker, he was chaste and masterly in diction, pointed in argument, abounding in scathing sarcasm, and very convincing in effect. He was a Christian of unimpeachable reputation and character. He was probably the most accomplished, heart-searching, and effective preacher that Wales ever produced. Mr. Ambrose was associate editor of the Welsh Word, the leading Congregational periodical of North Wales. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1874, p. 308.

Ambrosia, in pagan mythology, was (1) the name of the food of the deities, which gave eternal youth and immortality. This was conceived of as something material; and ambrosia is not only the food of the gods, but also the drink of the gods, as later writers have it. Homer also represents the gods as giving it to some of their favorites, as to Achilles; animals were also refreshed by it. Ambrosia is also a salve of the deities, which possesses the power of cleansing in a high degree; likewise an ointment for the hair. (2) One of the Pleiades, the daughter of Atlas and Pleione. (3) Festivals held in honor of Bacchus and Ceres. (4) A charm of ancient Greek, the same as the Brumalia of the Romans.

Ambrosian Hymns. Under the name of Ambrose, bishop of Milan (q. v.), there exist a number of Latin hymns which are generally ascribed to him; yet they are not all his, the name having been freely given to many formed after the model and pattern of those which he composed, and to series in some cases not given to him, but really belonging to him, and for which we have the authority of Augustine (Confes. i, 12; Retracat., i, 21; De Natura et Gratia, c. 63), are, Deus creator omnisium:—Aeterne rerum Conditor:—Jam surgit hora terrae:—Veni redemptor gentium (q. v.). Besides these hymns, we find a number of others, as, Deus Rex gentium:—Deus bonus:—Deus benignus:—Eterna Christi munera:—Jesu corona virginitate:—Splendor paternae glorii:—Jam lucis orto sidere:—Te Ambrosian Liturgy, and is the basis of modern tonality. Eventually scales extended in practice to pentachords, hexachords, septachords, and ultimately to octachords, as with us. The theory and practice of the octachord were familiar to the Greeks, from whose system it is believed Ambrose took the first four octachords or modes, viz. the Dorian, Phrygian, Hypodorian, and Hypophrygian, called by the first Christian writers on music Protons, Deuterons, Tritons, and Tetrads. Subsequently the Greek provincial names got to be misapplied, and the Ambrosian system appeared as follows:

PROTON, OR DORIAN.

DEUTERON, OR PHRYGIAN.

TRITON, OR AELIAN.

TETRAD, OR MYXOLIDIAN.

These scales differ essentially from our scales, major or minor. The 1st, 2d, 3d, and 4th Ambrosian scales or tones are not what we now call "keys," but "modes," differing from one another as the modern major and minor modes differ, in the places of their semitones. Melodies, therefore, in this or that Ambrosian "tone" have a variety of character analogous to that which distinguished our major and minor modes so very widely. Thus, one Ambrosian tone was supposed to be characterized by dignity, another by languor, and so on. The rhythms of Ambrosian music is thought by some to have consisted only in the adaptation to long and short syllables of long and short notes. "Of what we call time," says Forkel (Gesch der Musik, ii, 186)—the proportion between the different divisions of the same melody—"the ancients had no conception." He does not tell us how they contrived to march or to dance to timeless melodies—melodies with two beats in one foot and three in another, or three feet in one phrase and four in another; nor how vast congregations were enabled to sing them; and if anything is certain about Ambrosian song, it is that it was, above all things, congregational.

Whether Ambrose was acquainted with the use of musical characters is uncertain. Probably he was. The system he adopted was Greek, and he could hardly make himself acquainted with Greek music without having acquired some knowledge of Greek notation, which, though intricate in its detail, was simple in its principles. But even the invention, were it needed, of characters capable of representing the comparatively few sounds of Ambrosian melody could have been a matter of no difficulty. Such characters needed only to represent the pitch of these sounds; their duration was dependent on, and sufficiently indicated by, the metre. Copies of Ambrosian music-books are preserved in some libraries, which present indications of what may be, probably are, musical characters. Possibly, however, these are additions by later hands. It is certain that, in the time of Charlemagne, Ambrosian song was finally superseded, except in the Milanese, by Gregorian. The knowledge of the Ambrosian musical symbols, that in Ambrose's time, was, in another, and in such an age, have easily been lost, though the melodies themselves were long preserved traditionally.

Ambrosian Office (Ambrosianus ritus, or Mediolanensis Ecclesiae ritus), the office used in the Church of Milan (called the Ambrosian Church). Before the time of Charlemagne every Church had its own particular office, and there is good reason to believe that this office was in use in the Church of Milan before the time of St. Ambrose; but that when the popes compelled all the Churches of the West to adopt the Roman office, the Milanesi gave the name of St. Ambrose to theirs, in order to protect it, although he was not really the author of it. It may be, however, that St. Ambrose made all the offices of the original office of St. Ambrose to his Church; and the name of the office of St. Ambrose has been retained, to distinguish it from the Roman office in use in other churches. See Le Brun, Espr. de la Messe, ii, 176. See AMBROSIAN LITURGYP.

Ambrosianum, a word in old liturgical writing, denoting a hymn, from St. Ambrose having been the first to introduce metrical hymns into the service of the Church. Originally the word may have indicated that the particular hymn was the composition of St. Ambrose, and hence it came to mean any hymn.

Ambrosius, Tiburzus (Ital. Tesio Ambrogio), an Italian Orientalist, was born in 1469. He is said to have understood eighteen languages, especially the Syriac. At the age of pope Leo X, he opened a school for the Chaldean and Syriac languages at Bologna. He died in the Monastery of St. Peter at Pavia in 1540. He wrote, Introductio in Chaldaicum Etymonum, Syriacum et Armenian et eccle si sermonum et doctrinarum Lexicon (Pavia, 1539). See Jächer, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon and Suppl. s. v.; Götz, Merkwürdigkeiten der Dreyd. Bibil. i, 141; Colomesios, Galila Orientalis; Steinschneider, Bibil. Handbuch, s. v. (B. P.)

Ambulla, in Greek mythology, was a surname of Minerva, by which the inhabitants of Sparta worshipped her. The Dioscuri were also called Ambullii, and Jupiter Ambullus. The significance of the name is unknown.

Amé, St. See AMATUS.

Ame, rabbi, a Jewish teacher, lived at Tiberias in the 4th century. Together with his colleague rabbi Assé (q. v.), he performed judicial functions among his coreligionists. Both were highly honored, and were styled "judges of Palestine," the "noble pair of priests of Palestine." Both regarded the Samarians as heathen, because they sold Gentile wine to the Jews (Chaa., fol. 6 b). Ame would not allow that a Samaritan should be instructed in the law. Against the verbal interpretation of the Scriptures he propounded the thesis, "The law, the prophets, and the word of the wise contain hyperbolical expressions: the law, 'the cities are great and walled up to heaven' (Deut. i, 28); the prophets, 'so that the earth rent with the sound of them' (1 Kings xvi, 22); the word of the Lord, 'even morning and evening sacrifice was watered with a golden cup' (Tamid, fol. 29 a)." Another maxim of his was, "No death without sin, no pains without trespasses" (Sabbath, fol. 55 a). See Hamburger, Real-Encyclop. ii, 56 sq.; Gritz, Gesch. d. Juden, iv, 298, 301, 304, 307; Josel, Gesch. d. Juden. u. s. z. Seiten, ii, 160, 162, 165, 166. (B. P.)

Amedon, Moses, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Reedsborough, Vt., Oct. 10, 1794, of pious parents, who gave him a careful religious training. He experienced conversion about 1811, and in 1814 entered the New York Conference, in which he labored diligently until arrested by disease in 1829, when he retired to his residence at Watervliet Circuit, where he died, March 21, 1830. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1830, p. 78.

Amelgard, a Belgian priest, lived at Lige near the close of the 15th century. He was charged, it is said, by Charles VII with the revision of the work of the Church of Arc. He wrote, De Rebus Gestis Caroli VII. Historiarum Libri V.; De Rebus Gestis Ludovicii XI. Franciae, Historiarum Libri IV. An unpublished MS. is preserved in the National Library at Paris. A number of extracts from the history of Louis XI are found in Martiné and Durand, Veterum Scriptorum Amplissima Collectio. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Ameline, Claude, a French theologian, was born in Paris in 1656, being a son of the attorney at Chateslet. He for some time gave his attention to law, until, disgusted with the world, he entered the Brotherhood of the Oratory, April 29, 1660. In 1663 he received priest's orders, and was made chief chanter of the Church of Paris. He died in 1708. He published a work entitled Traité de la Volonté (Paris, 1684, 12mo). He also wrote a book against Quietism, entitled Traité du Faimor du Souverain Bien, etc. (ibid. 1699, 12mo). Some have attributed to him L'Art de Vine Hureux (ibid. 1690), which others have believed to belong to Louis Pascal. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Amelius, a Platonic philosopher of the 8th century, was born in Etruria. In the year 246 he went to Rome, where he attended for twenty-four years the lectures of the Neo-Platonist Plotinus, whose most famous pupil he became, as well as his apologist. Like all Neo-Platonists, Amelius tried to save heathenism, which was already on the wane. He was not only a pious heathen, but also attacked Christianity, especially Gnosticism, on the one hand, and Origen, on the other, he preserved the beginning of the Gospel of St. John, especially the Johannine doctrine of the Logos, in defence of Platonic philosophy. His writings, with the exception of the fragment, in which he makes reference to the beginning of the Gospel of St. John, are all lost. He died at Apamea, in Syria. See Espina, Plutarco Et Historiario: Odorot, Grac. Affect. lib. ii; Cyrilus Alexanderius, In Julianum, lib. viii; Hefele, in Wetzer und Welte's Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v.; Smith, Dict. of Class. Biog. s. v. (B. P.)

Amelius, Peter, an Augustinian monk of the 14th century, afterwards bishop of Singaglia. He was born at Aleth (Aleto), in Lauguedo, and not at St. Mab, as some assert. He accompanied Gregory XI to Rome when that pope transported the papal throne thither from Avignon in 1376; and he wrote an account of the journey, which Pappius Masson mentions. Amelius also wrote a Treatise of the Ceremonies of the Roman Church, published by Mabillon in vol. ii of the Museum Italianum, of 1729.

Amelotée, Denis, a French ecclesiastic and author, was born at Saintes, in Saintonge, in 1606. Soon after receiving priest's orders he became a member of the Congregation of the Oratory of St. Philip Neri. In 1645 he published a Life of Charles de Goudun, second superior of the Congregation, which, by some of its remarks on the abbots of St. Cyran, gave great offence to the Port-Royalists. Another work, containing a venomous attack on the doctrines of the Jansenists, still further embittered the feelings of the party towards him, and elicited from Nicole a satirical reply entitled Idée Générale de l'Esprit et du Livre du P. Amelette. Amelotée, in revenge, availed himself of his influence with the chancellor to prevent the publication of the newly completed Port-Royalist translation of the New Test., which had therefore to be issued at Mons, in Flanders. He thus secured a free field for a translation of his own, with annotations, which appeared in 4 vols. 8vo (1666—68). He died Oct. 7, 1678. See Encyclop. Brit. 5th ed. s. v.

Amenx, an inferior Egyptian deity who was represented as a man with the head of a sparrow-hawk.

Amenamen is a mystical title of the deity Amen-Ra in ch. clxv of the Egyptian Ritual of the Dead.

Amdene Honorable, in an ecclesiastical sense, is a sort of penance inflicted on offenders in some cases. It consists in walking barefooted and in a shirt only, with a rope tied round the neck, and before the church, or some other auditory, demanding pardon of God, the king, and justice for the offence committed. The ecclesiastical courts of Great Britain have the power to impose a somewhat similar penance on offenders by directing them to stand in the sight of the congregation and confess their evil deeds.

Am Ende, Christian Carl, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born on Oct. 3, 1730, at Lönnsitz, in Saxony. He studied at Kumbach and Erlangen; was appointed in 1755 adjunctus and rector at Kauffeuren; in 1788 he was made deacon and hospital preacher. He died Nov. 15, 1799. He contributed largely to different periodicals and reviews. His own publications were few, and of little value at present, with the exception of his edition of Sleidan’s work De Statuæ Religionis & Rerum Divinarum Commentarii ... multigui Ammoneus Illustrata (Francois-ad-Mons. 1785-86).

Seeing, Die gehörten Theol. Deutshlanda, 1, 7 sq.; Wirtz, Theol. Li, 1, 1; Zöpft, Nachlas von Leben, Verdiemten u. Schriften Ch. A. Am Ende (1804). (B. F.)

Am Ende, Johann Joachim Gottlob, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born in 1704 at Gräfenhainichen, in Saxony. He studied at Wittenberg, and succeeded his father as pastor at his native place. In 1748 he was called to Schulpforte, and in 1757 he was appointed superintendent at Freiburg, in Thuringia. The year following he was called to Dresden, having been honored by the Leipsic University with the doctorate of divinity. He died May 2, 1777. He wrote, Commentaria Epistolica de quibusdam N. T. Locis, Act. xiv. 27; 1 Cor. xvii, 2; Col. iv., 4 (Wittenberg, 1744); ... Christiana, i. e. Acta Apostolorum et Evangelii Origine in Latinum Translati et Carmine Heroico Expressa, Notisque Subjunctis Illustrata (ibid. 1759). Besides, he published a number of Sermons, which are enumerated in the Suppl. to Jöcher’s Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon, &c. (B. F.)

Amendola, Ferrante, a Neapolitan historical painter, was born in 1684, and studied under the celeb- rated Solimena. He painted many works at Naples, the best of which are two altar-pieces in the Church of the Madonna di Monte Vergine. His chief merit consisted in a practical facility of coloring.

Amendola, Tommaso, a Dominican who lived in the 18th century, is the author of Collectanea in Septem Ecclesiarum Sacramentis (Naples, 1699, 1719, 1729, 3 vols.); Collectanea in Ecclesiasticis Censuras et Pontificis Exequias (ibid. 1717, 2 vols.); Rerum Morales et Practicae (ibid. 1706); Collectanea de Justitia et Jure in Duos Tomos Dietici (ibid. 1727). Amennkanna (Amennakamti, or Amen- paruiusaka) is a mystical title of the deity Amen-Ra, the patron of the Egyptian Ritual of the Dead, enti- titled the "Chapter of the Boat.

Amén-Ra (Amen, the Sun; or the Self-sufficient, the Hidden) was the Supreme Being of the Egyptians considered as an abstract entity; all the other deities, even Ra himself, being but emanations from him. He was chiefly adored at Thebes, in Upper Egypt, and his worship was repeatedly overthrown and restored in Egypt during the principal dynasties.

Ammenra was a mystical title of the deity Amen- Ra, in ch. clxvi of the Egyptian Ritual of the Dead.

Amenius, a deacon, is commemorated in Bede’s martyrology as a saint on Nov. 10.

Amenet, was a Theban goddess. She was a form of the goddess Maat, the wife of Amen-Ra, and was repre- sented as wearing the sacred red crown.

Amenthes, the Grecised form of Rhotamaten, the mythological title of Osiris, as judge of the dead in Hades, and ancestor of the Egyptians.

Amentiti (the Hidden), in Egyptian mythology, was the general name of the underworld, or Hades, including the lower heaven, or Aahh, "fields of peace," with its twenty-one gates; Kerner, "good place;" Rusta, or purgatory; and Hell. It was under the special govern- ment of the setting sun as Osiris Rhotamaten, the judge of the souls of the dead; s of Horus and the funeral deities.

The great Hall of the Two Truths was there, and in it the examination of the soul of the deceased took place. There were also the fifteen gates of the House of Osiris, and the fourteen Abodes of Hell. Amentiti had its rivers both of separation and punishment, in that re- spect resembling the Hades of Greek mythology, which was doubtless copied from it. It is fully described in the great collection of funerary rituals called the Ritual of the Dead, and it was often spoken of as the country of the words of truth and the happy land of Osiris. Owing to the graves of the Egyptians being mostly excavated in the mountains on the western bank of the Nile, the island of the west side of the "hidden land" became synonymous; and the present name of the village of Erment is derived from that of one of the chief cities near the ancient Necropolis. For further details see Aahh; Atum; Horus; Kerner; Rho- tamaten; Rusta.

Amerbach, Vitus, a professor followed of Luther, and afterwards a Roman Catholic, was born at Wep- denhausen, in Braunschweig, and was ecclesiastical law, philosophy, and divinity at Wittenberg. He was professor of philosophy at Ingolstadt. He translated into Latin the orations of Isocrates and Demosthenes, the treatise of St. Chrysostom on Providence, and that of Epiphanias on the Catho- lice faith. He published also commentaries on Cicero’s Offices, on the poems of Pythagoras and Phœnixides, on the Triatia of Ovid, and on Horace’s De Arte Poetica. He died in 1557.

Ameretat (Immortality), in Zende mythology, was the name of the sixth of the heavenly Ambaspandas.

Amees, Bernice Darwin, a Methodist Episcopal min- ister, was born at Shoreham, Vt., Dec. 26, 1827. He experienced religion in early youth; graduated at Mid- dlebury College when twenty-six years of age; and during the next year was professor of Latin and Greek in the schools of Plain and Fort Edward, N. Y. He united with the Troy Conference in 1857, and, after serving the Church in the capacity of travelling preac- her a few years, he became affected with a broochal diffi- culty, and, resuming his work as teacher, assumed the principalship of the Providence Conference Seminary. During the last year of his work, he was secretary of the Christian Commission at Philadelphia. In 1868 he became principal of Mechanicsville Academy, and sustained that office until his death, Jan. 5, 1876. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1876, p. 82; Simpson, Cyclopedia of Methodism, &c. (B. F.)

Ames, Edward Raymond, D.D., LL.D., a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born near Amesville, Adams Co., May 20, 1810. He experienced religion in 1827, while a student in the State uni- versity at Athens, O. The following year he left col- lege before graduating, and became the first principal of the Lebanon Seminary, which has since become McKendree College, Lebanon, Ill. In 1838 he en- tered the Ohio Conference, and was appointed junior preacher on School Creek Circuit. On the division of the Illinois Conference in 1832 he became a member of the Indiana Conference, and was appointed junior preacher on the New Albany and Jeffersonville Circuit. The remainder of his active pastoral life was spent in the Indiana Conference, except one year in St. Louis.
After filling several important appointments and acting as presiding elder, he was, in 1840, elected missionary secretary, which office he held four years, travelling over 30,000 miles, extensively, visiting the Indian missions along the northern lakes and western frontier, and establishing schools among the tribes in Arkansas. Between 1844 and 1852 Mr. Ames was presiding elder in Indiana. He then was elected to the office of bishop, and in the performance of the active duties of that office spent the remainder of his life. He died in the city of Baltimore, April 25, 1879. Bishop Ames possessed a powerful physical frame and commanding presence. In his earlier ministry he had a strong voice, and spoke with great oratorical power and pathos. Great revivals everywhere attended his preaching. His strong character, keen quickness, clearness, comprehensiveness of perception, an unending will, and an intuitive perception of human character. In generalship he had few equals and no superiors in the Church he served. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1879, p. 84; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Ames, Moses, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born in Sullivan, Hancock Co., Mo., Dec. 8, 1812. He was converted in the spring of 1834, commenced preaching the following July as an itinerant, and was ordained by a council from the Sebec Quarterly Meeting, Sept. 22, 1839. He extended his labors to the Wellington and Springfield Quarterly meetings, his preaching being followed with blessed results. His last ministerial services were performed with the Dover and Foxcroft Church, seventy persons being added to the Church as the fruits of a revival conducted by him. He died in South Dover, Me., Sept. 30, 1860. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1862, p. 9. (J. C. S.)

Ames, William, an English Wesleyan missionary, was born near Wellington, Shropshire. He was sent as a missionary to the West Indies in 1818; labored with acceptance at St. Vincent; and was removed in 1821 to Demerara, where he soon fell a victim to putrid fever, dying, after seven days' illness, Oct. 1821. He was faithful to the duties of his calling. See Minutes of British Conferences, 1822.

Amasasopentao, the Zendic name of the heavenly beings who were called Amahasampids by the Persians. See Albimutum.

Amet. See Amatus.

Ametrites is the same given by Predestinatus to a sobræus, according to Philostratus (Harr. 116), followed by various philosophers in asserting that "there are infinite and innumerable worlds," appealing to apocryphal books of (heavenly?) prophets.

Amb., in Egyptian mythology, was the name of the exit gate of the funereal region of Amenti, or Hades.

Amharic Version. The earliest attempt to translate portions of Scripture into Amharic were made by Romish missionaries; but the date cannot be ascertained, since the MSS. have never been seen in Europe. An Amharic version of the entire Scriptures, which has superseded all others, was commenced about 1810 by M. Asselin de Cherville, French consul at Cairo. Providence directed him to an old man named Abu Rumi, a person well qualified for the work. After ten years labor this work was completed, and sold to the British and Foreign Bible Society for £1200. The MS. was brought to England by the Rev. Mr. Jowett. In 1824 the gospels were carried through the press by Dr. Lee, Mr. Jowett, and Mr. F. Platt, and in 1829 the entire New Testament was published, and in 1842 an edition of the whole Scriptures. In superintending the printing of these editions, Mr. Platt carefully compared Abu Rumi's edition with the original Greek and Hebrew, and inserted such corrections as seemed indispensably requisite, leaving a more complete revision for a future opportunity. Since 1875 there exists a revised edition of the Amharic Bible; the version having been made by the Rev. Dr. Krapf, aided by some young natives, for the British and Foreign Bible Society. For linguistic purposes, comp. Masaias, Lactiones Grammaticales pro Missionariis qui Africanis volunt Lingua Aamericam, etc. (Paris, 1867). See Amharic Language. (B. F.)

Amica (friend) was an epithet of Venus among the Athenians, because of her joining lovers.

Amice (amictus, an outer garment), a square-shaped linen cloth worn by ecclesiastics when they put on the alb (q. v.). Walsfrid Strabo, a pupil of Pahamus, enumerates the eight vestments of the Church, without including in them the amice. But in all the later liturgical writers the vestment is referred to by some one or other of its various designations (De Rubis Eccles. c. 24). There is no evidence of its use in England till nearly the close of the Saxo period. It is not mentioned in the Pontifical of Egbert (see Rock, Church of Our Fathers, i., 465).

1. Shape of the Amice, its Material and Ornamentation.—The amice was originally a square or oblong piece of linen, and was probably worn (Fig. 1) so as to cover the neck and shoulders. Early in the 10th century (A.D. 925) we hear for the first time of ornaments of gold on the amice (Migne, Patrol. cxxii., 468). From the 11th century onwards the richer amices were adorned with embroidery, and at times even with precious stones. These ornaments were attached to a portion only of the amice, a comparatively small patch, known as a plaga, or parura (Fig. 4), being fastened on so as to appear as a kind of collar above the alb (Fig. 5). An example is given of late date to show the shape of the parura, as, from the nature of the material, very early amices are not extant down so that the parura might appear in its proper place. To this position on the head is to be referred its later symbolism as a helmet of salvation.

2. How Worn.—All the earlier notices of the amice are such as to imply that it was worn on the neck and shoulders only. Honorius of Autun (writing cir. A.D. 1125) is the first who speaks of it as being placed on the head (Fig. 2) till the other vestments were arranged, after which it was let down so that the parura might appear in its proper place. To this position on the head is to be referred its later symbolism as a helmet of salvation.

Amico, Antonino de', of Messina, canon of the Cathedral of Palermo, and historiographer to Philip IV, king of Spain, acquired much reputation for his knowledge of history and the antiquities of Sicily. Of his numerous works on this subject some have been printed and the others are in manuscript. Among those printed are, Trium Orientalium Latinorum Ordinum, post Captam a duce Gothofredo Hierusaleme, etc., Notitia et Tabularia (Palermo, 1636, fol.): — Dissertatione Historice et Chronologicae de Antiquo urbis Syracusa-
AMICUS

AMICUS, a Christian confessor at Lyons, is commemorated in some old Roman martyrologies on July 14.

Amid Aha, in the mythology of the Kalmucks, is the goddess of flowers. By a simple act of the will she transforms flowers into men. She is represented very much like Herli Kan and Jamandags, in the centre of a number of goddesses, not seated, however, on a crushed man, but on a most beautiful flower.

Amida, in Japanese mythology, is the supreme god, sole sovereign in the regions of bliss, the father and protector of all spirits, without beginning and without end. He created the universe, rules the world, was in bodily form on the earth for more than a thousand years, performed the most stupendous miracles, and taught and converted men. There is a contradiction, however, in this, that he thereupon died voluntarily, and thus was raised to the godhead, since which time he stands as a mediator between God and men. Through him alone, and by his mediation only, can men be saved. At death they are placed for a time in hell, from which place they can be liberated by the priests upon mak-
AMMONIUS

Ammonat, Bartolommeo, an illustrious Florentine sculptor and architect, was born in 1511. He first studied under the distinguished Baccio Bandinelli, and afterwards at Venice under Jacopo Tatti, both pupils of Sansovino. He executed a colossal statue of Hercules at Padua by order of Marco di Mantova, a rich physician and a great patron of the arts. At Urbino he was employed to make the monument of duke Francesco Maria, in the Church of Santa Chiara. He made a handsome monument, which still exists in the Church of San Pietro at Montorio. As an architect, he designed and erected the new bridge of the Trinity over the Arno, at Florence, which still remains, and is considered one of the most elegantly designed and ingeniously constructed specimens of which the art can boast. He died in 1589.

Ammanati, Giacomo, also called Piccolomini, an Italian cardinal and historian, was born in 1492 at Vila Basilica, near Pescia, in Tuscany, of a noble family. He acted as papal clerk under Calixtus III. Pius II (Piccolomini) intrusted him with an important mission to Sigismund Malatesta, which still exists at the papal see. On account of his talents, learning, and energy, he became a great favorite with the pope, and received him into his family by adoption. In 1460 the same pope made him bishop of Pavia, and in 1461 cardinal (hence cardinalis Papiensis). Under Sixtus IV Ammanati received the archbishopric of Lucca and the cardinal-bishopric of Frascati. He died Sept. 10, 1479, at St. Leon's, near Bolusena, and was commemorated on the Rerum suo Tempore Gestorum Libri VII, comprising the period from 1464 to 1469, and thus forming a continuation of the commentaries of pope Pius II. They were published, together with his Epistolas, at Milan in 1506, and at Frankfurt in 1614. See Paoli, Disquisizionis Historia della Patria e Compendio della Vita del Card. G. Ammanati Piccolominidetto il Papiense (Lucca, 1712) Voigt, Ennia Silvio III (Berlin, 1863), p. 538 sq.; Stahl, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Ammanaskahbar, an Elamite deity, of whom nothing is known.

Ammas, in Greek mythology, was (1) a surname of Cybele as well as of Ceres. (2) The name of Diana.

Ammergau Passion-Play. See MYSTERY.

Ammerman, Oliver Valentine, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Brooklyn, N.Y., Jan. 10, 1804. He was left fatherless at the age of four; received a faithful training by his pious mother, who belonged to the Reformed Dutch church; experienced religion at the age of seven on the death of his mother; was licensed to preach in 1824; and in 1826 was admitted into the New York Conference, and appointed to Suffolk Circuit. He afterwards labored at Suffolk and Sag Harbor, Stamford, Redding, Sag Harbor, Sag Harbor and Bridgehampton, Stamford, Fairfield, Salisbury, Hillsdale, New Haven, Woodbury, Sangerger, Salisbury, Red Hook, Bedford Street and Duane Street (N. Y. city), Goshen, Rhinebeck, Red Hook, Sheffield, Shrub Oaks, Dobbs Ferry, Kensico and Northcastle, Hillsdale, and Fishkill Landing, thus closing forty-two years of effective service. The remainder of his life was spent as a superannuate. He died at Peekskill, N. Y., April 23, 1875. Mr. Ammerman was sympathetic, enthusiastic, had a rich experience, and was able and successful. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1880, p. 41.

Ammon (Amon, or Aumun), Sr., the founder of the celebrated settlement of ceonobites and hermits on or near Mount Nitra, was born about A.D. 285 in Lower Egypt. At the age of twenty-two he was married against his own consent, and after passing eighteen years with his wife in a state of virginity, he left her, with her consent, and retired to Mount Nitra, where he founded the monastery of that name, and collected a large number of hermits, who took him for their chief and guide. He was on terms of close friendship with St. Anthony, and was credited with the gift of miracles. He died about 318. The Roman martyrology makes no mention of him; the Greeks commemorate him Oct. 4.

Ammon is likewise the name of another Egyptian of the same century, a bishop, to whom St. Athanasius addressed his Letter on Chastity.

AMMON is the name of several other saints: (1) commemorated in the Hieronymian martyrology on Feb. 7; (2) commemorated in Jerome's martyrology on Feb. 9; (3) the deacon, with the forty women, his disciples, martyrs, is commemorated in the Byzantine calendar on Sept. 1; (4) commemorated in Jerome's and Bede's martyrology on Sept. 10; (5) martyr at Alexandria, according to the old Roman and Bede's martyrology.

Ammonaria, a virgin and martyr of Alexandria, commemorated in the old Roman martyrology on Dec. 12.

Ammonia, in Greek mythology, was a surname of Juno at Elis, whither her worship had been brought from Egypt.

Ammonius (1), a disciple of Pambo, and one of the most celebrated of the monks of Nitra. He was distinguished by the epithet ηπότροπος, in consequence of having cared of his ears to escape being made a bishop. In his youth he accompanied Athanasius to Rome; was a learned man, and is said to have been able to repeat the Old and New Tests. In the persecution under Valens he was banished to Diocesarea. After being in high favor for some time with Theophilus of Alexandria, he and his brothers were accused by him of Origenism; they took refuge in Palestine (sop. viii. 18), and afterwards at Constantinople, where they were well received by Chrysostom. They were also protected by the favor of the empress Eudoxia (Sozom. viii. 18), and even enjoyed Epiphanius of Salamis, who came to Constantineople at the instigation of Theophilus to convict them of heresy. Ammonius died soon after. He is perhaps the author of the Institutiones Asceticus, of which twenty-two chapters are extant. See Lambecius, Biblioth. Vindob. iv, 155.

(2) An Egyptian bishop in the 4th century. At the age of seventeen he was induced, by hearing a sermon by Athanasius, to become a monk, not having as yet even been baptized, and retired to Taberna. After passing two years there, under Theodorus, and fourteen at Nitra, he was, as several other monks, apparently made bishop by Athanasius, and banished by George of Cappadocia. At the request of Theophilus, he wrote an account of the ascent of the Holy Mountain.

(3) Bishop of Piacenza and, in part, of Elsearchia in the 4th century. Having been a monk, he was made bishop by Alexander. He was sent with Serapion and other bishops on an embassy from Athanasius to Constantinian; was banished shortly afterwards by the Arians; and returned in A.D. 362, in which year he was present at the council at Alexandria and Sardica.

(4) A solitary, near Canopus, in the 4th century. In the persecution by Valens he fled to Palestine, and thence to Sinai. There he was an eye-witness of the devastation of the monasteries and hermitages by the Saracens. Comedus supposes him, on returning to Egypt, to have been ordained presbyter by Peter, and thus identifies him with the Ammonius martyred with that bishop. He thence escaped to Memphis, where he made himself a cell. His narrative, in which he mentions also a similar devastation at the same time at Bethl, is edited in Greek, with Latin translation by Com- bett.

AMMONIUS is the name of several other saints: (1) a martyr commemorated in Jerome's and Bede's martyrologies on Jan. 31; (2) an infant of Alexandria, commemorated in the old Roman martyrology on Feb. 12; (3) commemorated in Jerome's martyrology on Oct. 6.
Amner, Richard, an English Dissenting minister, was born in 1736, and had charge of a congregation at Cosely, in Staffordshire. He died in 1833. He published an Essay on the Prophecies of Daniel, which for its historical accuracy and its strong anti-Roman tendency was long regarded as one of the most important works of its kind. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s.v.

Ammonius Prudentius, the supposed author of an Enchiridion, or manual of the Old and New Testa, called also Diatochoan, or Diptychon, in 196 Latin hexameters. These are divided into forty-nine tetrastichs, describing the principal events and characters of Scripture. Nothing is known of Ammonius except his name. The Enchiridion was first printed as his work in the Fabrician collection (Basle, 1562). Two other short compositions are ascribed to this author: Aegyptis Deum Martini Inocens Temporatai Peruscolum Ephi- gae, a short hexameter poem; and In Leonem Episcopum Barzagilensium Ecclesia Reddittum, an acrostic ode.

Amolo, archbishop of Lyons. See AMULO.

Amora (Aaron, interpreter, or expositor). In the narrower sense, this word designated those men who assisted the teachers of the law, in the schools and colleges of Palestine and Babylon, during the 4th, 5th, and 6th centuries, in interpreting the law to the people. In a wider sense, it designates all teachers of the law who, after the death of Judah the Holy until the close of the Talmud (A.D. 219-500), occupied themselves with the elucidation and development of those laws which were laid down in the Mishna. These teachers were called "amoraim." But as the force of these teachers, especially in large assemblies, was not sufficient, they were assisted in their lectures by a class of men who were styled "amoraim of the second order," to distinguish them from those of the "first order." The men of the second order became more and more indispensable to both teachers and hearers, and were well paid. But they soon abused their position either by abbreviating or expounding the text, and amora, to be heard. In consequence of this, R. Abba the passed a law that no amora under fifty years of age should be engaged.

The time of the amoraim of the first order may be divided into six epochs—the first from 219 to 290, the second from 290 to 320, the third from 320 to 573, the fourth from 573 to 627, the fifth from 627 to 662, and the sixth from 468 to 500. We cannot enter here minutely upon the lives and merits of the amoraim, some of whom have already been treated in former volumes, or will be treated in their proper place in this Supplement. The lives of some of these teachers have been written by Bacher, in Die Agada der babylonischen Amorait (Strasbourg, 1878). (R. P.)

Amos, the Hebrew prophet, is commemorated as a Christian saint in the Byzantine calendar on June 15.

Amos, bishop of Jerusalem (called by Nicephorus Neamton), succeeded John III as the fifty-seventh bishop, A.D. 594. According to Baronius, he had previously been abbot of a Syrian monastery. A letter from Gregory the Great to Amos is extant charging him with withholding communion with, and, if possible, to apprehend and send back to Rome, a runaway acolyte named Peter. He was succeeded by Isaac in 601.

Amos, A. G., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Troop County, Ga. He was converted in young manhood in 1865, was licensed to preach in 1871, and in 1872 entered the Savannah M. E. Conference and died Aug. 19, 1879. As a pastor, Mr. Amos was devoted and energetic; as a preacher, earnest, diligent, and successful; as a Christian, irreproachable in character. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1879, p. 92.

Amos, James R., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Chester County, Pa., July 31, 1822. He was educated at the Presbyterian High School of Philadelphia. He studied theology in the Ashmore Institute, Oxford, Pa. He was ordained by the New Castle Presbytery in 1859, and settled for Africa as a missionary in 1860. His health failed, and he returned to America in 1863. He died at Reading, Pa., Nov. 17, 1864. See Wilson, Pref., Hist. Almanac, 1866, p. 90.

Amouroux, Abraham Caspar L', a French sculptor, was born at Lyons in 1644, and studied under Couzon the elder. He did some very fine work in the cities of Lyons and Marseilles, but he was invited to Copenhagen in 1682, where he executed the gilded leaden statue of Christian V, king of Denmark, which was placed before the Royal Palace in 1688.

Amphelius of Messana is commemorated as a Christian saint in the old Roman martyrology on Nov. 29.

Amphian (Aphian, or Appianus), Sr., martyred at Cesarea, in Palestine, was born in Lyca, in Asia Minor. His name, which he sent him to Berytus, in Phocis, to be educated; and upon his return home, in 304, he tried in vain to convert them; whereupon he forsook his home and, leaving himself to the guidance of God, came eventually to Cesarea, in Palestine. Here, although not yet twenty years of age, he had the honor of being in the hand of the governor Urbanus, as he was about to offer sacrifice to an idol, and expostulated with him. Upon this he was thrown into prison, cruelly tormented, burnt, and thrown into the sea. This happened in 306, on April 2, according to Eusebius, on which day the Greeks commemorate him (Eusebii, De Mart. Palat., c. 45).

Amphilibus, an early British martyr, who converted St. Alban, and suffered with him in 266.

Amphilibus, a Scottish bishop, was the first bishop of the Isles, and flourished about 360. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 296.

Amphidromia, in Greek paganism, was a festival, among the Athenians, held a few days after the birth of a child. At this festival the child was carried about the house and thus shown to the family and the household; at the same time a name was given to it; the entire house was profusely decorated, and a supper ended the whole.

Amphitrites (the yearly), in Greek mythology, was a surname of Bucches, from his yearly festivals in Athens and his annual festivals in Thebes. See THEATRE.

Amphilomedon, one of the Centaurs.

Amphion, Sr., bishop of Epiphania, in Cilicia, who confessed the faith during the persecution of Maximian Daza. He was afterwards present at the councils of Ancyra, A.D. 314, and Neocesarea, held about the same time; and for a time occupied the see of Nicomedia, in the place of the Arian Eusebius; but he afterwards returned to Epiphania, where he died. He is mentioned in the Roman martyrology on June 12. See Balleit, June 12.

Amphirrhoe, one of the nymphs of the ocean.

Amphi theatre, a round or oval theatre, with tiers of seats, used chiefly by the Romans to exhibit the combats of gladiators or wild beasts. It was at least partially covered with awning. The general taste of that people for these amusements is proverbial, and they appear to have constructed amphitheatres at all their principal settlements. There are still considerable remains of them: in England the earthworks only exist at Cirencester, Silchester, and Dorchester; in France, much of the monastery exists at Arles, and at Nismes, in Languedoc; in Istria, at Pola; and in Italy, at well-known amphitheatres at Verona, Capua, Pompeii, and many other places the buildings exist with their marble very perfect. See THEATRE.
Amphithura (Gr. folding-doors), a name given by Chrysostom and Evagrius to the veils or hangings which in the ancient Christian churches divided the chancel from the rest of the church. They received this name from their opening in the middle like folding-doors. They were used partly to hide the altar part of the church from the catechumens and unbelievers, and partly to cover the eucharist in the time of consecration.

Amphitrite, in Greek mythology, was one of the Nereids or Oceanides, the wife of Neptune. She fled to Western Africa and hid herself near Atlas, in order to avoid marriage with Neptune. Neptune sent his messengers in every direction to find her. Delphinus was successful in persuading her to follow him as queen of the sea. Neptune placed Delphinus among the stars. Amphitrite became mother of Neptune by Triton, who, with his parents, lives on the bottom of the sea in a golden palace. Later, Neptune loved Scylla, whereupon Amphitrite changed the latter into a monster of six heads and twelve feet. With the poets Amphitrite is the personification of the Mediterranean Sea.

Amphidius is commemorated as a Christian saint at Rome in Jerome's martyrology on Oct. 14.

Amphodus is commemorated as a Christian saint in Jerome's martyrology on Oct. 11.

Ampulla (prob. for amb-olla, from its swelling out in every direction) was a flask for holding water and wine for the eucharist, and also a vessel (Αμφοτέρος) for the oil used in chrism (Opt. Milevitanus, Cistrica Domat. ii, 15, p. 42). One of the most celebrated of these utensils was the one said to have been brought from heaven by a dove at the baptism of Clovis, and afterwards used at the coronation of the Frankish kings (Hinmar, Hist. Eccles. Remensis, i, 13).

Ampullarius was, according to Pseudo-Eustathius (i, 68), a "Bithynian heresarch" who taught that all the wicked, with the devil and evil spirits, are purified by fire and restored to their primitive innocence; and, when his doctrine was impugned by the Church, alleged the authority of Origen, De Principiis.

Ampullaring Cloth, a cloth used to wipe away the oil used in extreme unction; so called because originally kept in an ampulla.

Amra, in Hindū mythology, is one of the most beautiful trees of India, and plays a great part in Indian mythology. Figuratively it is called the bridegrove. Its flowers are consecrated to Kamadeva, the god of love, who uses the bulbs for points on his arrows.

Amrita, in Hindū mythology, is the nectar of immortality which the gods on Mount Meru drink to lengthen their lives, for they are not immortal. The gods and giants are said to have carried the Mandar mountain into a sea of milk, wound the huge snake Ananclus around it, and turned the mountain so long that the milk became butter, out of which arose the moon, happiness, abundance, and all arts and sciences. Then came a genius carrying a vessel, full of this holy nectar. This caused a fierce combat between the gods and the giants, which Vishnu decided in favor of the former. The giants were thrown down the fearful precipice, and the gods enjoyed rest on the Meru mountain. Symbolism sees in this myth the turning of the earth on its axis, and interprets the snake as the equator bolting the earth. The combat is interpreted as a revolution of the earth, upon which the repose of the human race follows.

Amadorianus, the followers of Nicholas Amador (q. v.).

Amset, in Egyptian mythology, is (1) the mystical name of one of the planks of the Boat of Souls in ch. xcix of the Ritual of the Dead. (2) The Carpenter, a son of Osiris, and also one of the four genii of the dead who are commanded by the deceased to make an atonement for his sins, and to whose care the different viscera of the embalmed body were committed. He is generally represented in the form of an ovoid vase with a human head as a cover; and on the vase is often a prayer to the goddess Isis on behalf of the deceased. (3) One of the seven great spirits in the Ritual of the Dead.

Amnaspanos, in Zendic mythology, are the names of the six "immortal saints," a series of genii created by Ahuramazdu to assist him in the government of the world. Their names were Vohumano, Asavahasto, Khastavaharnya, Spentaarmaiti, Haurvatat, and Amerat. See Parzival.

Amser, Samuel, a distinguished modern engraver, was born at Schonau, in the canton of Aargau, Switzerland, in 1791. He studied under Lips and Hess, and practiced chiefly in Rome from 1816 until 1829, when he succeeded his former master, Hess, as professor of copper-engraving in the Munich Academy. He possessed wonderful skill in retaining the expression of the original from which he worked. He was a passionate admirer of Raphael, and had great success in reproducing his works. Amser's principal engravings are, The Triumphal March of Alexander the Great and a full-length Christ, after the sculptures of Thorwaldsen and Dannecker; the Burial of Christ and two Madonnas, after Raphael; and the Triumph of Religion in the Arts, after Overbeck, his last, on which he spent six years. He died May 18, 1849. See Encyclop. Brit. (9th ed.), s. v.

Amaswrtirnir, in Norse mythology, was an island in the Lyngia Sea, the scene of the victory of the Asa over the Fenris wolf, who was chained there. One of the Asa lost his hand in this conflict.

Amt, one of the mystical demons, called "the Devourer of the Dead," in the Egyptian purgatory. He had the head of a crocodile, the forefoot of a lioness, and the hind-quarters of a hippopotamus.

Amatussems, in the mythology of the Mongolians, is a root, on which the human beings and spirits living beyond the Sommer Olia mountain are said to subsist.

Amuila (medieval Latin) is the vessel in which the wine is contained which is offered at the mass. In French it is called burette. See Am.

Amulo (or Da Mula), Marco Antonio, an Italian cardinal, was born at Venice, Feb. 12, 1505. He studied jurisprudence at Padua, and was at first employed by the Venetian government in several important missions to Charles V. His virtue, his learning, his ability in these affairs, gained for him the esteem of pope Pius IV, who appointed him bishop of Rieti and cardinal and librarian of the Vatican. He died at Rome, March 18, 1570. He wrote, in Farraris, Orationes . . . ex Acta Concilii Tridentini (Venice, 1667); in La Logica, ed. (1738); and in his Pia Nova Scellata di Lettere di Diversi Nobilissimi Uomini (ibid. 1582).

Amulo (or Amolo), archbishop of Lyons, was illustrious both for his knowledge and piety. He wrote against Gaustianus, and died about the year 854. His works are printed with those of Arpo- datus.

Amun, another form of the Egyptian divine name Amun, which it was used as a prefix.

Amuravai, in Hindó mythology, was the daughter of Vishnu, sprung from unlawful love for the beautiful Lakshmi. The latter being married to Subramanja, a son of Siva, Vishnu arranged it so that Siva had no knowledge of this amour.

Amyus, in Phoenician mythology, was a son of the deity Agrotus. He is said to have taught men to construct villages and to rear cattle.

Amyot, Jacques, bishop of Auxerre and grand-archbishop of Lyon, was born at Melun, Oct. 20, 1514, and studied philosophy at Paris in the college of the cardinal Le Moine. Here he took the degree of A.M. at nineteen, and afterwards continued his studies under the professors appointed by Francis I. He went to Bourges at the age of twenty-three, and was made professor of Greek and Latin in the university there. It was during this time that he translated into French the A mours of Theagenes and Charicleus, with which Francis I was so well pleased that he conferred upon him the abbey of Belleozane. He went to Rome and translated Plutarch's Lives and Morals. Henry III conferred upon him the Order of the Holy Ghost, and at the same time declared him a grand-auxiliary of France should be commanders of that order. He did not neglect his studies in the midst of his honors, but revised all his translations with great care, compared them with the Greek text, and altered many passages. He died Feb. 6, 1538. Some of his other works are, his translation of Heliodorus (1547, fol.; 1549, 8vo) and of Diodorus Siculus (Paris, 1554, fol. 1587) — Daphnis and Chloe (1559, 8vo).

Ana, in Brazilian mythology, is the name of a demon who lived in caves in dark woods, and whom the wild tribes of Brazil fear.

Anabaptists. Of these people there were a large number of sects who had nothing in common except the one doctrine of the necessity of rebaptism. Such were—

1. The Adamites, who numbered no more than three hundred, and who ran about naked on the tops of mountains expecting to be caught up into heaven.

2. The Apostolos, who, acting upon the letter of our Savior's words, mounted on the house-tops and preached to the people. They are said to have derived their name from the Apostle, who separated from the Waterlandians in 1664.

3. The Turturists, or Slentzes, who observed an inviolable silence on religious opinions; seeing the Perfecti, who separated themselves from the world in order to obey the precept not to conform themselves to this world. They held that a smile or the smallest appearance of happiness in the conversation was sufficient to draw down the curse threatened by our Lord, in which case they used to say, "You shall marvel and weep." (Luke vi, 20).

4. The Trespassers, who held that after baptism it was impossible to commit sin, and consequently omitted the words "forgive our trespasses," etc., from the Lord's Prayer.

5. The Free Brothers, or Libertini, who declared all servitude to be contrary to the spirit of Christianity.

6. The Free Senators, who held that Saturday, and not Sunday, should be kept holy.

7. The Clanculardi, who held that in public it was a duty to speak of matters of religion as the necessity of persons did, but in private to confess one's real opinion.

9. The Manifestarians, who held exactly the contrary doctrine.

10. The Weepers, who endeavored to attain to the power of weeping constantly, believing it to be acceptable to God.

11. The Rajofoera, who held that feasting, revels, and God's mercy formed the most acceptable tribute to and the barter of souls.

12. The Idolferei, who took no particular part in religious matters and held all forms equally good.

13. The Macropamuci, who sought to shed the blood of Catholics and Protestants.

14. The Anti-Mariani, who refused all veneration whatever to the Blessed Virgin.

Anabata, a term for a hooded cope usually worn in out-door processions, frequently larger and longer than the closed cope. Anciently the hood was one that could act as a protection to the head from the mere flat, ornamental appendage found in the ordinary cope. It is no longer in use in the English Church.

Anacalypetria, in Grecian custom, were festivals which were celebrated on the day in which the bride appeared for the first time without a veil; at which festival she usually received presents from the bridegroom, from friends, and from her friends. The presents themselves were so named likewise.

Anacampteria (from anakymptho, to unbind), small buildings which were erected adjacent to ancient Christian churches, designed to serve as little hospitals or inns, where poor persons and travellers might rest themselves on their journey. They are supposed, also, to have served as lodgings for such as fled to take sanctuary in the church.

Anacea, a festival of antiquity held at Athens in honor of the Dioscuri, or Castor and Pollux, who were called A naces.

Anacées. Castor and Pollux were so called, either from the cessation of the war, dvoq, which they had undertaken to rescue their sister Helen, whom Theseus had carried off; or from their singular care to preserve the city Aphidna, which they had reduced to submission, from the ravages of the soldiers. The Greek word dvoq literally means kings.

Anachis, one of the four Lares revered by the Egyptians.

Anaclothra, a stone held in great veneration by the women of Megara, because on it Ceres was said by the Greeks to have reposed after her fatigue in the search of Proserpine. It was kept at Athens near the Prytaneum.

Anaclésus the pope is commemorated as a martyr in the old Roman martyrology on April 26.

Anactorón (dovúrpos, from dovúra, a sore, eigen), the dwelling of a king or ruler. In classical authors, it is generally a house of a god, especially a temple of the Eleusinian Demeter or of the Dioscuri; also, the innermost recess of a temple, in which oracles were given (Lobecb, I. głiosoph. i, 50, 62). Eusebius (Pamégry. c. 9) applies the word to the church built by Constantine, where the first Christian council was held. It is also used to mean a basilica, or with reference to the unusual size and splendor of the church, or with a reminiscence of the classical use of the word, it is difficult to say (Bingham, Christ. Ant. bk. vii, ch. i, § 5).

Anactotelæse, in ancient Greek ceremonies, was a title of the managers in the Cypriamian mysteries.

Anadema (anadómyna, a garment), an ornament of the head with which victors were adorned in the sacred games of the ancients.

Anadyoména, an epiphany of Venus, meaning emerging out of the waters. Under this title those worshiped her who had escaped drowning. The most celebrated picture of antiquity was that of this goddess by Apelles, for which his favorite mistress, Cam- paspe, was given him so generously by Alexander.
ANAGAMI

Anāgami (from an, not, and agami, came), one of the four paths by which, according to Buddhism, an individual may obtain an entrance into Nibbāna, or a cessation of existence. The being that has entered this path does not again return to the world of men, and lives a godlike life.

Anangulagadās, in Hindī mythology, are progenitors of the Brahmīs, who cannot be consumed by fire.

Anagogia, a feast held by the people of Eryx, in Sicily, to commemorate, as they alleged, the departure of Venus from them to Libya. They said that the pigeons, which abounded in that country, disappeared at that time, and accompanied the goddess in her journey. After nine years they returned, when the people celebrated another feast, which they termed Catagogiā, in honor of the return of the goddess.

Anaharath. Tristram suggests (Bible Places, p. 258) that this place is represented by the modern En Na'ahr, situated on the southern slope of the range of Jebel ed-Duby, or "Little Hermos" (Robinson, Later Researches, p. 339); a suggestion already made by Lietzmann (Jb. ii, 334). But it is difficult to run the boundary of Issachar so as to include this spot, and yet exclude the site of En-dor (if the latter be required by Josh. xvii, 11).

Anahid, in Persian mythology, was the name of the female genius Izd, the morning and evening star. The name is derived from the Indian Anahät, which signifies the pulse-beats of the blood in the ears, which the Indo-Europeans interpreted as the pulse-beats of the spheres. Anahid was originally not a goddess, but a mortal. Two fallen angels, Harut and Marut, sought to mislead her; but the maiden withstood every temptation, and therefore she was counted worthy of the honor of becoming a goddess. She was placed among the stars, wherein she shone with a light that was mixed with amber and musk; and her dress, covering her pearl legs and feet, glimmers in the dazzling brightness of the morning star.

Anainea, or Impudence, was a divinity among the Athenians.

Anaitis is the name of several Oriental female divinities, which are not easily distinguished.

1. In Persian mythology. The Cappodocians, Armenians, Persians, and Medes worshipped a goddess loved under this name, which the Romans and Greeks compared to Venus. She had two temples at Sacesene, in Armenia, which she divided among two Persian demons (Omanus and Andanatus), the temples being probably erected for the accommodation of the Persian armies or for trading caravans. In the neighborhood of Bactria there was a rock supported by walls, erected as a retreat for the armies; and soon there was built a temple with a female priesthood, so that the city of Zela, in Pontus, near-by, was entirely inhabited by these priestesses, which goes to show that every girl living there consecrated herself to the service of the goddess. Saidolation. soothing. and when the maiden, then the maidens, at the season of the new month, consecrated themselves to the service of the goddess, they were married, and no one considered it a shame to marry them." The true significance of Anaitis is difficult to determine, as there are only Roman and Grecian accounts of her. However, when we remember the character of the Asiatic natural religion, in which a male and female are always classed together (Vishnu and Bhavani, Basal and Astarte, Isis and Osiris, Venus and Adonis, Attes and Cybele), and when we consider that this temple had two male demons, we can only find in this worship another form of Asiatic natural religion.

2. A Semitic goddess of a warlike character, somewhat approximating the Bellona of classic mythology. She was represented as a nude woman standing on a lion, and sometimes on a crocodile, holding a spear or bow, and wearing a peculiar crown formed of tall feath reverence that they ordained a prayer to commemorate his death, which the Karaites offer up for him every Sabbath to the present day, and which is as follows: "Our Lord and God of our fathers, have mercy on our dead and on our fathers, and on all the holy dead of all his people, the house of Israel: chiefly and before all, on our rabbi Anan the prince, the man of God, the patriarch of the Captivity, who opened the way of the law, enlightened the eyes of the Karaites, and turned many from sin and transgression, and guided us in the right way." See Rule, Hist. of the Karaites Jews, p. 108 sq.; Grätz, Gesch. d. Juden, v, 174 sq.; Fürst, Gesch. des Karäerthums, i, 86 sq.; the Yerid in Hillel, in Hillel ve-Yehuda, 3 (Vienna, 1864). (B.F.)

Ananda (the infinite), in Hindú mythology, is a surname of Parabrahma.

Ananda Vuerdon, in Hindú religion, is a festival celebrated in the fall, to participate in which only they who are in duty bound who have inherited the usage from their forefathers, and it is customary for them to gather together and conduct the ceremony in order to keep themselves; for, once begun, it must be repeated yearly.

During the festival the participant fasts, and days and nights are spent in prayer, in which time a little food is taken only once. The Brahmins assemble in the house of the participant, and call upon the three great deities Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva—in whose honor the festival is kept and observed. By this custom the sacred deities of the Vedas are honored.

Anandatus, in Old Persian mythology. The Saki were accustomed, after the manner of the Cimmerians, to make raids into far-off countries, and went even as far as Bactria and Cappadocia. When enjoying a feast at one time, after having returned from such an undertaking, they were surprised by Persian soldiers during the night and slain. In memory of this occurrence a rock was surrounded by a wall, inside of which a temple was built to the Persian deities Anahis, Omanus, and Anandatus. Omanus is light, and Anandatus is a revelation, an incarnation of the same.

Ananden, in Hindú mythology, is the monstrous snake supporting the earth. The figures of the Indian priests represent her curled up, with her five heads erect. Vishnu, upon seeing the condition of the world, one time to have used two of her heads as a pillow, the third as a footstool, and on the fourth and fifth he laid his hands. Now the snake desired to know what he would do if another head should grow. Presently a sixth head grew, and from the body of Vishnu a third hand appeared; then a seventh head, and at the same time a third leg; and thus up to a thousand heads, when the snake saw fit to withdraw from further trial of Vishnu’s power. Every head of the snake sparkles with precious pearl, in which Vishnu’s image is reflected a thousandfold. Anandan was the huge snake which was wound round the Mandar Mountain. In the wars between the good and evil spirits the snake takes an active part.

Ananga (the bodiless), in Hindú mythology, was the surname of Kamadeva, god of love. The Brazilians have the same name for Ana, an evil spirit.

Ananias is the name of several Christian saints: (1) of Damascus (Acts ix, 10), commemorated in the old Roman martyrology on Jan. 26; in the Byzantine calendar on Oct. 1; in the Armenian on Oct. 15; (2) a martyr in Persia, commemorated in the old Roman martyrology on April 21; (3) a martyr commemorated with Azarias and Misare in the old Roman martyrology on Dec. 16; in Bede’s on April 28; in the Byzantine calendar on Dec. 17.

A. N. A. N. I. S. A. P. T. A. (anastepta) are the initial letters of the following words: Antidoton Nazaremi Augerat Neem Intoxicationes, Sanctificet Alimenta Pocus Trivialis Alma. This acrostic word is an amulet, which, according to the superstitions of former times, was said to do good service, especially against toothache. It had to be carried around the neck. Even to speak the word Anasipta three times was often quite sufficient.

Ananke (avény, necessity), in Greek mythology, was a personification of this idea in the Orphic theory of creation. She was a loved one of the Creator, and gave birth to Moira (destiny). The Parcae are also called her daughters. She is a powerful goddess, against whom the deities themselves do not battle. Upon Acrocorinth there was a temple of Ananke and of Biá (power), which no one was permitted to enter.

Ananya (the proud), in Hindú mythology, was a title of the god of love, Kamadeva.

Anaphora (avánopó, used in the Sept., Psa. i, 21, meaning "that which goeth up on the altar"; comp. Heb. vii, 27; I Pet. ii, 5).

1. In the sense of “lifting up” anaphora came to be applied to the celebration of the holy eucharist, whether from the “lifting up” of the heart which is required in that service, or from the “oblation” which takes place in that service.

In the liturgical dictio of the Copts, which has borrowed much from the Greeks, the word anaphora is used instead of liturgy to designate the whole of the eucharist service and the book which contains it; but more commonly its use is restricted to that more solemn part of the eucharistic office which includes the consecration, oblation, communion, and thanksgiving. It begins with the Sursum corda, or rather with the benediction which precedes it, and extends to the end of the office, thus corresponding with the preface and canon of Western rituals.

The general structure of the anaphore of Oriental liturgies is thus exhibited by Neale (Eastern Church, i, 463):

1. The Preface. (Sursum corda.)
2. The Prayer of the Triumphant Hymn. (Preface.)
3. The Triumphant Hymn. (Sanctus.)
4. Commemoration of our Lord’s Life.
5. Commemoration of Institution.

The Consecration.
6. Words of Institution of the Bread.
7. Words of Institution of the Wine.
8. Oblation of the Bread as is said about.

The Great Intercessory Prayer.
11. General Intercession for Quick and Dead.
12. The Prayer before the Lord’s Prayer.
13. The Lord’s Prayer.
14. The Embolism.

The Communion.
15. The Prayer of Inclination.
17. The Fraction.
18. The Consecration.
20. The Anitdoron, and Prayers of Thanksgiving.

Different parts are variously developed in different liturgies, and even the order is not always preserved. In the existing Nestorian liturgies the general intercession is placed before the invocation of the Holy Ghost, and other minor variations are found.

It is in the anaphora that the characteristics are found which distinguish different liturgies of the same family. In the introductory or proanaphoral portion of the liturgies there is much less variety. Thus, when the liturgy of Gregory Theologus or of Cyril is used, the proanaphoral portion is taken from that of St. Basil. The Ethiopian Church has twelve liturgies, which have the introductory portion in common. The numerous Syro-Jacobite liturgies all take the introductory portion from that of St. James; the three Nestorian from that of the apostles. See CANON; COMMUNION.

2. The word is sometimes used in liturgical writings as equivalent to the chalice; and has found its way in this sense, corrupted in form (νυμμίς), into the Syrian liturgies (Renautet, Litt. Oriesi. ii. 61).

Anar (or Onar), in Norse mythology, was the second of the three husbands of the giant daughter Not (night), by whom she gave birth to the goddess Jörd (earth). The word signifies work, in which, probably, a faint idea of creation work may be found.

Anargyres, Festival of the (from ἀ, not, and ἀγαρωρχ, money), celebrated by the Greek Church Nov. 1 in honor of two saints named Cosmus and Damianus, who were brothers, and both physicians. The Greeks called them Anargyres because they practiced medicine out of pure charity, without claiming any reward for their services. A legend mentions a miraculous fountain at Athens, near a chapel consecrated to these two saints. The fountain never flows but on their festival, as soon as the priest has begun to say mass, and in the evening it is dried up again.

Anastase, Olivier de Saint, a friar of the Order of Carmelites, was born at the beginning of the 16th century in Brussels and died at Brussels in 1574. His family name was De Croeck. He wrote, Le Jardin Spirituel des Carmes, etc. (Antwerp, 1659-61); Le Concert Surnaturel d'Amour entre la Mère de Dieu et les Serviteurs de l'Ordre du Mont-Carmel, with Égal Avantage des deux Côtés (ibid. 1661); Apologues Moraux, traduits de la Saint Cyrille, et Gribich de Petites Pièces de Poésie et de Conclusions (ibid. 1669); Pleurs Mystiques Calculata ad Meridieanum Desolati (Belgium, ed.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, v. 1.

Anastasi, Giovanni, an Italian historical painter, was born at Sinigaglia in 1654. In the Church of Santa Lucia in Montalbode there are three of his works. Lanzi says there are many of his works in the Church della Croce at Sinigaglia. His manner was easy, though not refined.

Anastasia is the name of several Christian saints: (1) a martyr of the time of Nero, said to have been a pupil of St. Peter and St. Paul, commemorated April 15; (2) the martyr under Diocletian whose nativity is celebrated in Roman lists on Dec. 25, and in the Byzantine calendar (as φαμακοπανία, or dis-solver of spells) on Dec. 25 (Neale, Eastern Church, introd. p. 786); (3) a special martyr (σαβακαμπάρ) of Rome commemorated in the Byzantine calendar on Oct. 29; (4) the daughter of an eminent Greek family of Constantinople. Her beauty attracted the attention of the emperor Justinian, but she resisted his dishonorable proposals, and retired to Alexandria, where she lived as a monk for twenty years, her sex remaining unknown until her death, in A.D. 597. She is commemorated March 10.

Anastasi is the name of several saints in various calendars, of some of whom we have given details elsewhere: (1) the monk, a martyr in Persia, commemorated in all the oldmartories on Jan. 28; (2) saint, at Chersonesos; (3) the pope, April 27 (old Roman and Bede), or Oct. 28 (Armenian); (4) saint, May 2 (Bede); (5) the Cornicularius, martyr, Aug. 21 (old Roman); (6) Aug. 26 (Jerome); (7) bishop, Oct. 13 (Bede and Jerome).

Anastasia is further the name of several other early Christian celebrities: (1) saint and martyr, who succeeded St. Anastasius in the patriarchate of Antioch, and was cruelly tortured and burned to death by the Jews, whom he had labored to convert (see Baillot, April 31); (2) a Spanish priest and monk, martyred by the Saracens at Cordova in 833 for having publicly refuted the errors of the Koran (see Baillot, June 14, vol. ii).

Anastasius, bishop of Anchira, was one of the metropolitanos to whom the emperor Leo writes concerning the death of Proterius (A.D. 436). His answer is preserved in the letters of the emperor to this metropolitan (ed. Orelli, iv. 1291 sq.). He was also present at the Council of Constantinople in 455.

Anastasius, a presbyter of Antioch, was celebrated in ecclesiastical history as the confidential friend and counsellor of Nestorius, whom he accompanied on his elevation to the archiepiscopal seat of Constantinople. Here, in a sermon preached by him, Anastasius uttered the words that destroyed the peace of the Church for so many years—"Let no one call Mary Theotokos. She is but a human being. It is impossible for God to be born of a human being." Nestorius, by supporting and defending Anastasius, adopted the language as his own. In A.D. 490 Anastasius endeavored to bring about an accommodation between Cyril and Nestorius. After the deposition of Nestorius he still maintained his cause, and animated his party at Constantinople. Tillemont identifies him with the Anastasius who, in 434, wrote to helladius, bishop of Tarsus, when he and the Oriental bishops were refusing to recognize Proclus as bishop of Constantinople, bearing witness to his orthodoxy, and urging them to receive him into communion.

Anastasius Apocrisarius, of Rome, suffered much for the faith from the Monothelites in the 7th century under Constans II. He wrote an epistle to Theodosius, a priest of Gangra, on the death of St. Maximus, in which he cites fragments from the writings of Hippolytus, bishop of Porto. It is contained in the collections of Anastasius and the works of St. Maximus.

Anastasius Cassinensis, a friar of Monte-Castino, lived in the last half of the 9th century. He was librarian of pope Stephen III. He is often confounded with Anastasius the librarian, who lived near the close of the 9th century. He is supposed to be the author of Historia de Translatione Partis Reliquiarum Sancti Benedicti et Sororum ejus Scholasticae, the MS. of which is in the library of Monte-Castino. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, v. 1.

Anastasius of Cluny, a monk and hermit, was born of a noble family at Venise. Being anxious to devote himself entirely to the service of God, he left his country and retired to Mont-Saint-Michel, where he embraced the monastic life; this was somewhat before the middle of the 11th century. Finding, however, that the abbey of his monastery was guilty of simony, he left it, and betook himself to an island in the sea, where he led a hermit's life. His fame reached the ears of Hugo, abbot of Cluny, who visited him in his solitude and induced him to return with him to Cluny, where he remained seven years, an example of all good to the brethren, diligently perusing the Greek and Latin fathers, and laying the foundation of his future admirable exhortations. Gregory VII directed the abbot of Cluny to send him to Spain to preach to the infidels, a work to which he applied himself with alacrity and zeal, but with little fruit, and he soon returned to Cluny. Afterwards he began to sigh for his hermit life, and then the recommendation to retire into the mountains, where he abode in solitude three years instructing the people. He died, on his return to Cluny, October 16, about the year 1086, at a place now called Doydes, in the diocese of Rieux. A small work of Anastasius containing his faith on the subject of the eucharist is extant; it was written to William, ab-Anastasius, abbot of the monastery or Sr. Eutymius, in Palestine, about 740. In the year 749 St. John Damascene wrote against a notation in the Acta of the ascetic of the Trisagion, which he referred to the Son alone. The treatise against the Jews given by Caisius in his Antiquitates (III, i, 123, and contained in vol. xii of the Bibl. Patrum) is attributed to this writer, but erroneously, since the writer speaks of a space of more than four hundred years having intervened since the destruction of Jerusalem. Cellarius, however, who attributes the work to this Anastasius, makes him to have lived in the 9th century. See Cave, Hist. Lit., i, 628.

Anastatus, in Grecian ceremonies, was a sort of cake baked at Athens on the occasion of the Arrephoriais.

Anat (or Anatu), the feminine Sacti of the Assyrian deity Anu. She was the wife of Annis, and the impersonation of passive reproductive matter. Her chief title was "the Lady of Death and Life." Under the name of Anatis she was worshipped by the Egyptians, in which case she was regarded as a feminine form or wife of the god Reephe.

Anathemāta (from ἀναθήματα, to lay up), the general name applied in the ancient Christian Church to all kinds of oaths in churches, whether in the structure itself or in the vessels and utensils belonging to it. The name was so applied because these things were set apart from a common use to the service of God. In this sense anathemāta is used in Luke xxii, 5 for the gifts and ornaments of the temple. Accordingly, in early times, all ornaments belonged to the church, as well as whatever contributed to the beauty and splendor of the fabric itself, were reckoned among the anathemata of the Church.

But the word is sometimes used in a more restricted sense to denote those gifts particularly which were hung upon pillars in the church as memorials of some great mercy which men had received from God. Hence Jerome speaks of men's gifts hanging in the church upon golden cords, or being set in golden sockets or sconces. From this custom of presenting gifts to churches, there appears to have arisen, about the middle of the 5th century, a peculiar practice noticed by Theodoret, that when any one obtained the benefit of a signal cure from God in any member of his body, as his eyes, hands, feet, or other part, he brought what he called his ectypoma, or figure, of the part in silver or gold, to be hung up in the church to God as a memorial of his favor. In a restricted sense, the term anathemāta is used to designate the covering of the altar.

Anatocism (from ἀνατόκω, upon, and τόκος, birth), a term applied to gratuitous contracts of such a nature that they bound the borrowers to pay interest upon the interest, or compound interest. Such contracts were condemned both by the canons and the civil law.

Anatolia, St., was a Roman virgin, espoused to a young Roman named Aurelian; but when her sister Victoria had taken the resolution to forsake her suitor and embrace the virgin state, Anatolia determined to do the same. However, she succeeded not in the new path, for two reasons: first, to use any means to force their consent to their marriage, but in vain, and they were in the end put to death. The festival of Anatolia is marked in the Roman Church on July 9. See Baille, July 9.

Anatolius of Constantinopon, who died in A.D. 458, marks an era in Greek ecclesiastical poetry. He left those who were satisfied to imitate the classical writers, for he declared that the new faith opposed to the Council of Chalcedon, and showed himself a partisan of the heretical doctrines of the Jacobites. He died in 649. He is probably the author of a Greek work on Heresies, which is found in M.S. in the Imperial Library of Vienna. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Anatolius, father of Constantine, was appointed to this see in 629 by the emperor Heraclius. He declared his opposition to the Council of Chalcedon, and showed himself a partisan of the heretical doctrines of the Jacobites. He died in 649. He is probably the author of a Greek work on Heresies, which is found in M.S. in the Imperial Library of Vienna. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Anastasius, patriarch of Constantinople, was promoted by the influence of the emperor Leo Isaurus after the abdication or deposition of Germanus. According to one account, force was employed by the emperor to intimidate those who opposed the election; and when the populace, headed by some nuns, rioted against the new patriarch for remaining in his image of Christ from the time they entered the church, the ringmen were executed. Anastasius favored the iconoclasts, which led to his excommunication by Gregory III. He was very complaints to the emperor when he seized the throne; for which he was most ignominiously punished on the return to power of Constantius. He was, however, allowed, in mockery, to retain his see, and died in 768. By some chronologies he was made patriarch in 728.

Anastasius, Martin, a learned Benedictine of Monte-Casino who took the habit of his order July 22, 1593. He wrote, among other works, the following, De Monogamia B. Anna Parenti Deipara (Cænepont, 1635):—Vita di Santa Rosalia V. Pulcrissima—Concordia IV Evangeliorum—De Censura Ecclesiastic (all still in M.S.)—Londres, Eccl. Dist., s. v.

Anastasius, bishop of Nicea (1), was present at the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. Not having arrived, he was represented in the earlier sessions by two presbyters, but later he appeared and subscribed in person. At the thirteenth session he was charged by Eunomius of Nicomedia for ordaining his metropolitan rights over the churches of Bithynia; and the decision was given against him. The bishop of Nicea was henceforth to retain the title without exercising the jurisdiction of a metropolitan.

Anastasius, bishop of Nicea (2), was present at the Synod of Constantinople, A.D. 518, and signed the letter to the patriarch John concerning Severus. His name also appears attached to the letter of the synod of 520 to Hormisdas, on the appointment of Epiphanius. He took part, also, in the proceedings of the Council of Constantinople, A.D. 538. To this Anastasius is probably to be ascribed the Commentary on the Psalms (in MSS. Bibl. Cost. p. 383).

Anastasius of Palestine, lived during the last half of the 11th century. He was the author of Tractatus de Jejuno Gloriosissimae Deiparaeque Servandum et ut Legitimam, a work originally written in Greek, but translated by Cotelerius into Latin, in Vetera Monedulae Ecclesiae Grecae, iii, 321. He also wrote Inpsii τριώς Ἀγίων Βραβίων, which remains in M.S. at the Imperial Library of Vienna. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Anastasius the Sinaite, the younger (saint and martyr), succeeded Anastasius the elder in the see of Antioch in 599. He labored with great zeal for the conversion of the Jews, who revolted and killed him. He showed himself so zealous in the cause of the Græco-Byzantine translation of the work of Gregory the Great De Cura Pastorali, as well as of a treatise in Greek upon faith. A Latin translation of this last is found in the Bibliotheca Patrum. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Anastasius the Sinaite, the third of the name, patriarch of Antioch, was appointed to this see in 629 by the emperor Heraclius. He declared his opposition to the Council of Chalcedon, and showed himself a partisan of the heretical doctrines of the Jacobites. He died in 649. He is probably the author of a Greek work on Heresies, which is found in M.S. in the Imperial Library of Vienna. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.
staniptole. To Anatolius also was due the decree passed at the Council of Chalcedon (451) that Constantinople was the second place upon earth, patriarchal in sees. He governed his Church eight years in peace. His compositions are few and short, but they are usually very spirited. Of his hymns we mention, Ζωοράς ῥουμίσαι; "Fierce was the wild billow!"—Δυνάμει ἅμα ἄνθρωποι. "The day is past and over," an evening hymn, greatly admired; Αἰχμή ἀργον θήρας ἄθετος. "The Lord and King of all things," for St. Stephen's Day—Μίηα καὶ παράδοσιν διάμοι. "A great and mighty wonder," a Christmas hymn. See Neale, Hymns of the Eastern Church, p. 55 sq. Anaxagoras, an eminent Greek philosopher, was born at Clazomenae, in Ionia, about B.C. 500. Inheriting wealth, he was able to give his time wholly to study. When twenty years old he went to Athens, where among his pupils were Pericles, Euclides, and Socrates. Accounts differ somewhat as to the nature of the persecution which drove him from Athens. It seems, however, to have been superstitious. He was condemned to death, but by the eloquence of Pericles the sentence was commuted into banishment for life. He retired to Lampscus, on the Hellespont, where he died at the age of seventy-two. It is not easy to ascertain what were the opinions of Anaxagoras in philosophy. Fragments of his works have been preserved, but even these are contradictory. But we are certain that he had a deeper knowledge of physical laws than any of his predecessors or contemporaries. His great contribution to ancient philosophy, however, was his doctrine as to the origin of all things. He held that all matter existed originally in the condition of atoms; that these atoms, infinitely numerous and infinitely divisible, had existed from all eternity; and that order was first produced out of this infinite chaos of minutiae through the influence and operation of an eternal intelligence (νοῦς). He also maintained that all bodies were simply aggregations of these atoms, and that a bar of gold or iron or copper was composed of inconceivably minute particles of the same material; but he did not hold that objects had taken their shape through accident or blind fate, but through the agency of the eternal mind, which he described as infinite, self-creative, and unmixed with anything else. He declares that it is "the most pure and subtle of all things which has all knowledge about all things and infinite power." His theory is thus only one step from pure theism. He makes the work of the Eternal commencement with Providence, not with creation. The fragments of Anaxagoras have been collected by Schauberh (Leips. 1827) and by Schorn (Bonn. 1828). See also Baethgen, Fragments of Anaxagoras, p. 236-232.

Anaya y Maldonado, don Duno, a Spanish prelate, was born at Salamanca about 1360. He was bishop of Salamanca when he was sent as ambassador to the Council of Constance with Martin Fernandez of Cordova. Appointed bishop of Salamanca in 1401, Anaya founded there a college designed to afford gratuitous instruction to the clergy. He was very industrious and fortunate. This college, the first of the kind in Europe, was known by the name of San Bartolomé el Viejo. This generous act was imitated by other prelates. Anaya died in 1440. See Hofer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Anazarba. Councils or Concilium Anazarbaicum. I. Held in A.D. 431, to confirm the deposition of St. Cyril of Jerusalem and the condemnations of Arius and the teaching of Nestorius. II. Held in 433 or 435. In this council many bishops, following the example of Theodoret, put themselves in communion with John of Antioch.

Anbebeh, in Hindī mythology, is the boundless ocean, which arose of itself.

Anbert, in Hindī mythology, is the fruit of eternal life from the tree of Parajeti, which grows on the Meru Mountain.

Ancestor-worship, a form of idolatry very common among the Chinese, and frequently practiced by others. The South Sea Islanders worship their deceased ancestors, but it is difficult to ascertain how much of divinity they ascribed to them. The Sintoiasts of Japan, the Armenians, and many of the ancient heathens observed this form of worship. Both Cicero and Pliny say that this was the ancient mode of reverence of the gods. In the Zend Avesta the fire was burned as a sign of the presence of the deity. Small oblations were presented to the gods in the owners of the fire. In later times the whole system of Greek and Roman mythology is tinted with the deification of men of renown. Even the veneration which the early Christians entertained for the martyrs degenerated at length into a superstitious idolatry, which not only besought their intercessory prayers, but venerated their relics. In the Armenian church it occupies several seats in the Temple on a hill that overlooks the Bosphorus, whole Armenian families, of two or three generations together, are often to be seen sitting round the tombs and holding visionary communications with their deceased friends. According to their belief, the souls of the dead pass into a place called Gogene, which is not a purgatory, for they suffer neither pain nor pleasure, but retain a perfect consciousness of the past. From this state they may be delivered by the alms and prayers of the living, which the pious Armenians give liberally for their friends" (Conder, View of all Religions). For the modes of ancestor-worship among the Chinese, see China.

Anchiesta, Miguel, a Spanish sculptor, was born at Pampluna in the early part of the 16th century. He studied at Florence, and acquired, according to Bermudez, the reputation of one of the best sculptors of his time. He made the beautiful stalls of the choir of the Cathedral at Pampluna, which are considered the finest in Spain. There are one hundred and forty of them. He also executed other beautiful pieces of work for the alar of Santa Maria at Tafella, and the great altar of the Cathedral at Burgos.

Anchor (as a symbol). By the early Christians we find the anchor used sometimes with reference to the stormy ocean of human life, but more often to the tempests and the fierce blasts of persecution which threatened to engulf the ship of the Church. Thus the anchor is one of the most ancient of emblems; and we find it engraved on rings, and depicted on monuments and on the walls of cemeteries in the Catacombs, as a type of the hope by which the Church stands firm and wins out of the storms which surrounded it. In this, as in other cases, Christianity adopted a symbol from paganism, with merely the change of application.

The symbols on sepulchral tablets often contain allusions to the name of the deceased. An anchor upon ains bearing names derived from Spee, or Ebric, has been found a number of times (De Rossi, De Monument, etc. p. 18; Mai, Collect. Vatican, p. 449 ). In some cases, above the transverse bar of the anchor stands the letter E, probably the abbreviation of the word Elijos. Further, we find the anchor associated with the fad, the symbol of the Saviour. It is clear that the word fad means the hope in Christ, or A The hope in Jesus Christ" is a formula common on Christian tablets.

The transverse bar above the ring gives the upper part of the anchor the appearance of a cruz anzata [see Cross]; and perhaps this form may have had as much influence as the cross of the Anchor symbol by the Christians as the words of Paul. The anchor appears, as is natural, very frequently upon the tombs of martyrs (see Lupi, Severe Epitaph. p. 136 sq.; Boldetti, Osserv. p. 366, 370).

Anchorees, a female anchoret.

Ancholle, in Roman mythology, was the name of a small oval shield, which was cut on the side, and was said to have fallen from heaven under Numa's reign. The nymph Egeria and the Muse had made the welprovince of Phrygia Pacatiana, first under the metropolitans of Laodicea, and afterwards under Hierapolis. Many speaks of this city as one of the first of Phrygia. Several Church councils were held there.

1. Held about Easter, 914. Eighteen bishops only were present, among whom were Vitalis of Antioch and Marcellus of Ankyra (well known in the history of St. Athanasius), Lupus of Taras and Amphiion of Epiphania. Twenty-four (some say twenty-five) canons were drawn up, chiefly relating to the case of those who had been persecuted during the persecution of Maximin.

1. Orders that priests who, after their fall, have sincerely repented shall be permitted to retain their rank, but excluded from all exercise of their office.
2. Orders that no unordained deacons.
3. Orders that those who have been forcibly made to sacrifice shall be admitted to communion; and that laymen should not by such violence be incapacitated from receiving holy orders.
4. Orders that those who have been induced to sacrifice by threats, etc., shall, upon repentance, be received as hearers from the time of holding this synod to the great day (Easter): after this, as prostrators for three years, and for two years more as communicants without offering. In case of sickness and danger they might be received under limitation.
5. Orders that those who have sacrificed twice or three times, even under violence, shall fulfill a penance of six years.
6. Enjoins a penance of ten years upon those who have led away their brethren.
7. Animal persons who, at the time of their being made deacons, declared their intention to marry, to do so, and to remain in the ministry; those who did not so declare shall, if unmarried, be ordained to the priesthood.
8. Enjoins the ordination of those who sacrificed before baptism.
9. Forbids the ordination of priests or deacons without the permission of the bishop in writing.
10. Depri ves those of the clergy who obstinately, through superstition, refuse to touch meat, and vegetables cooked without it.
11. Enacts that Church property unlawfully sold by priests during a vacancy in the bishopric shall be reclaimed.
12. Excommuni cates those who, having been appointed bishops, and refused by the persons in the parish to which they have been appointed, wish to evade other parishes.
13. Enjoins seven years’ penance for adultery.
14. Enjoins five years of penance to those who use oath-taking and follow the customs of the Gentiles.

See Labbé, Concil. i, 1456, 1480.

II. Held in 358, by certain Semi-Arian bishops, headed by Basil of Ankyra and George of Laodicea. They condemned the grosser blasphemies of the Arians. The pure Arians taught that the Son of God is but a mere creature, but the semi-Arians believed him to be more than a created being; and even like to the Father, but independent of the substance of the Father, as he is similar to him. The Eusebians favored this latter notion, and drew up a long exposition of the faith, which they presented to the bishops; in which, by establishing that the Son is of like substance with the Father, they cunningly implied that he is not of the same substance with him, and additionally emphasized the term consubstantial. The Semi-Arians sent a deputation to Constantius, and obtained the suppression of the second confession or formulary of Sirmium, made in 357. See Labbé, Concil. ii, 789; Sozomen, iv, 18; Epiphanius, Hist. lxxi.

III. Another synod of Semi-Arians was held at An Kyra in 374, at which Hypius, bishop of Parnassus, was deposed.

ANCYRA, THE SEVEN VIRGINS OF, are commemorated by the Armenian Church on June 20 as fellow-martyrs with Theodotion, or Theodorus, of Salatia, the first bishop of Ankyra of whom we have any account (Neale, Eastern Church, Introd. p. 506).

ANDAL, RARD, a Dutch theologian, was born near Breda in Brabant, in 1665. He studied at Frank- ecker, where he died as professor of theology, Sept. 12, 1727. He was a great adherent of the Cartesian system of philosophy. He wrote, Epist. Apolog., adversus Utr. Huberum et H. Wittzum in qua praefer alia De-traits of the distinguished Herder, Carlo Porta, and Schiller; afterwards he executed a beautiful plate of the Fying Magdalene, by Correggio:—the Repose in Egypt, by N. Poussin:—and Mater Amabilis, by Sassoferrato.

Andersen, Pietro, a distinguished Italian engraver, brother of the preceding, was born in 1784. He studied under his brother and also F. Palazzi. He was in the school of Longhi nine years. He assisted that master in the production of many of his admirable works, among which was Exequy's Union, a large composition. He visited Rome in 1802 for the second time, to make drawings of the Heliodorus and Attic of Raphael. His principal works are, Moses Defending the Daughters of Midian, after N. Poussin:—The Adoration of the Shepherds, after Titian:—a Holy Family:—Heliodorus:—Flight of Attic:—St. John.

Anderson, Abraham, D.D., an Associate minister, was born near Newville, Cumberland Co., Pa., Dec. 7, 1789. He served as a soldier in the war of 1812-15, and on his return in the latter year he entered Jefferson College, where he studied four years, and graduated in 1817. He then began the study of theology, first under the direction of Dr. John Anderson for one year, and then under the general direction of the presbytery for three years, at the same time pursuing a medical course under Dr. Letherman. In 1818 he was chosen professor of languages in Jefferson College, and retained the position until 1821. In October of that year he was licensed, and, after iterating about two months in Pennsylvania and Ohio, he was sent by the synod into the Southern States, where he was soon settled as pastor at Steele Creek and Bethany, N. C. In 1831 he came North on account of his health, and preached at Hebron, N. Y., for some time; but returning to Carolina in 1832, he found himself in an embarrassing position on account of the slavery agitation then going on, and was accordingly settled at Mount Hebron in the summer of 1833. In 1847 he was elected professor in the theological seminary of the Associate Church at Canonsburg, Pa., and professor extraordinary of Hebrew in Jefferson College, which positions, in connection with the collegiate charge of the congregation at Miller's Run, he held until the close of his life. He died May 9, 1855. He published a few pamphlets. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, IX, iii. 107.

Anderson, Alexander, A.M., a minister of the Free Church of Scotland, was converted in 1850. He lived five years after; and they were five years of such holy zeal, such heavenly piety, such earnest love for Christ, that, young as he was when taken from the world, he left a cloud of light in the Church militant through which he passed to heaven. See Christian Observer, March, 1859.

Anderson, George M., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Chesterfield County, Va., Aug. 20, 1799, of pious parents, who early instructed him in religion. He experienced conversion when about fourteen, and in 1816 united with the Virginia Conference, wherein he served the Church faithfully until 1825, when he was ordained, which relation he held until his decease, Dec. 7, 1833. Mr. Anderson was zealous, acceptable, and successful. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1834, p. 278.

Anderson, Henry, an English Methodist preacher, father of the Rev. John Anderson, was born at East Sutton, Yorkshire, in 1766. He early participated in the frivolity and dissipation characteristic of the neighborhood, and it was not until his twentieth year that he was converted under Methodist preaching. He entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1791, and labored incessantly until 1822, when the Conference granted him a supernumerary relation. He resided for some years in Gainesborough. In 1840 he removed to Hull, where he died.
ANDERSON

Jan. 31, 1843. Mr. Anderson was a studious, pious, and affectionate man. See Wesleyan Meth. Mag. 1847, p. 591; Minutes of British Conference, 1848.

Anderson, Isaac, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Rockbridge County, Va., March 26, 1780. At the age of twenty, he united with the Presbyterian Church. In 1802 he was licensed to preach by the Union Presbytery, and was ordained and installed pastor of Washington Church, Knox Co., Tenn., where he labored successfully for nine years. In 1811 he accepted a call to the New Providence Church, Maryville, Tenn., where he performed the principal part of the labors of the church until his death in 1857. He was a man of commanding power, of glowing zeal, and untiring and successful industry. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 55.

Anderson, James (1), a Presbyterian minister, was born in Scotland, Nov. 17, 1768, and was ordained by the Irvine Presbytery Nov. 17, 1798, with a view to his settlement in Virginia, America. He sailed March 6, 1799, and arrived in the Bannaphanock April 27, but the state of things not warranting his stay, he came northward, and was received by the Presbytery on Sept. 20, and settled at Newcastle. In 1784 he was directed to supply the people of Kent County monthly on a Sabbath, and also to spend a Sabbath at Cedar Creek, in September. He was called Jan. 17, 1787. He died in New York city. Public worship was held in the City Hall. Troubles arose, and the Synod in 1792 pronounced his conduct unjustifiable, and wrote to the ministers in Boston not to countenance him. He was called, Sept. 24, 1796, to Donegal, on the Susquehanna, and accepted. In September, 1792, he gave every fifth Sabbath to the people on the Swatara, and joined the congregation of Derry. The Presbytery of Donegal held its first meeting on Oct. 11, 1792, and Anderson was one of the four members. In 1756 the Presbytery sent Anderson to wait on the Virginia governor and solicit its favor in behalf of the Presbyterians of the eastern counties. He performed his mission satisfactorily. Mr. Anderson died July 16, 1740. He was a man high in esteem for circumspection, diligence, and faithfulness as a Christian minister. See Webster, Hist. of the Presb. Church in Amer. (1857); Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iii, 19.

Anderson, James (2), an English Wesleyan minister, was born in 1767. He entered the itinerancy in 1789, and travelled in the South of England, as well as in several circuits in Ireland; became a supernumerary in Liverpool in 1828; and died April 13, 1840. See Minutes of British Conference, 1840.

Anderson, John (1), D.D., an Associate minister, was born in England, near the Scotch border, about 1748. After completing the usual course of studies, he was licensed by the Associate or Secession Church of Scotland, but on account of a weak voice and hesitating manner of speech, was not sent on the Gospel mission. He came to America in 1788, arriving in Philadelphia some time in August. He spent several years in preaching in various sections of this country, and in 1788 he crossed the Allegheny Mountains and preached to congregations in Beaver County, Pa. He was ordained in Philadelphia Oct. 31, 1789, preached awhile in Eastern Pennsylvania, and in 1790 returned to the scene of his former labors. He was settled as pastor over the congregations of Mill Creek and Harman's Creek, Beaver Co., in 1792. He was chosen professor of theology for the Associate Church during the same year. "A small two-story log building was erected on the farm on which he lived for the accommodation of his theological students. A library was also collected, consisting of about a thousand volumes of rare and valuable works, most of which were donations from the brethren of the Associate Church in Scotland. In his office of professor he continued until the spring of 1812, when, owing to the infirmities of age, he desisted. He lived as a retired member of his pastoral charge until his death, which occurred April 6, 1830. The number of students under his care was usually five or six, and perhaps never exceeded ten. His chief employment as a professor was in reading Marshall's Medalla Theologiae. These he enlarged on each repetition of the text, and they became so voluminous that, although he read each day of the week except Sunday and Saturday from the middle of the day till three to five o'clock during the four months of the session, he was not able, with his last class, to finish the whole system during the four years of their attendance. Among his publications are, Essays on Varned and Varieties of the Present State of Religion (Gloucester, 1817)—A Discourse on the Divine Osidence of Singing Praise (Phil. 1798)—The Scripture Doctrine of the Appropriation, etc. (ed.)—Tenditius Cantus Dominici (1800)—Precious Truth (1806)—and a Series of Dialogues on Church Communion (Yorkburgh, 1809). See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, IX, lii, 17.

Anderson, John (2), an eloquent Wesleyan minister of England, was born at Gibraltar, Spain, where his father was garrisoned, Jan. 28, 1741. He entered the Methodist Society in 1808, the ministry in 1812; travelled many of the prominent circuits, such as Reading (1819), Manchester (1821), London, West (1824), City Road (1827), Leeds (1850), Manchester (1865), Leeds, West, and Liverpool, and Liverpool, and Liverpool, and Liverpool, after severe suffering, April 11, 1840. Anderson was one of the eminent men of the Methodist Church of his time, to the principles of which he was most firmly attached. He preferred the charges against Dr. S. Warren in 1844, and his name was prominent in that celebrated case. He was tender and ardent in his friendships, fervent in his piety, and zealously devoted to the duties of his calling. Few men of his time exceeded him in the eloquence and power of his pulpit and platform efforts. A speech he delivered at Leeds in 1850 on the abolition of slavery was pronounced by lord (then Mr.) Brougham as the most eloquent and masterly he had heard on that subject. He was subject of the third sketch in Everett's 2d vol. of Wesleyan Takings. He published a Sermon, on the death of Adam Clarke (Leeds, 1882). See Minutes of British Conference, 1840; Wesleyan Meth. Mag. 1846, p. 417, 501; West, Sketches of Wesleyan Preachers, p. 322-335.

Anderson, John (3), an English Congregational minister, was born at Burnham Market, Norfolk, Feb. 17, 1797, and was educated in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. He was admitted to the church in 1816, and became much engaged in preaching in the neighboring villages. Mr. Anderson
ANDERSON entered Hoxton College in 1817. In 1821 he commenced preaching at Market Rasen, Lincolnshire, and in 1824 was ordained first pastor of the Church in that place. In 1826 he accepted a call from the Church at Dalton-in-Furness, and was removed to Lincolnshire, and in 1822 to Wymondham, in his native county, where he labored until his death, Sept. 5, 1866. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1867, p. 268.

Anderson, John (4), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Frederick County, Md., Dec. 24, 1803. He removed early in life to Pennsylvania, was converted in 1829, and in 1834 entered the Baltimore Conference. In 1839 he was transferred to the Missouri Conference. Upon the adhesion of the Missouri Conference to the Church South, he declined to accompany it, but labored, under the direction of the bishops, in Illinois until the Conference was reorganized. In 1854 he was retransferred to the Baltimore Conference, and upon its division in 1857 he became a member of the Baltimore Conference, and continued such until his decease, Sept. 10, 1867. As a preacher, Mr. Anderson was clear, earnest, and successful; as a man, cheerful, and a favorite among the masses. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1866, p. 28.

Anderson, John A., an English Congregational minister, was born in the parish of Clatt, Aberdeen, May 29, 1831. He was brought up for church work, at the age of sixteen years. He attended for one session at King's College, Aberdeen, and then entered the Theological Hall. Here he continued four years, attending also the classes at Edinburgh University. In 1858 Mr. Anderson was ordained over the Church in Kilsyth, where he labored for a year or more with great success; and then, becoming suddenly ill, was called, Oct. 9, 1859, to his reward. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1860, p. 175.

Anderson, John Henry, son of the Rev. John Anderson, now of the British Conference, and grandson of the Rev. Henry Anderson (died 1848), was born at Oakham, Rutland, England, July 4, 1841. He spent six years at Kingswood School. He was accepted for the ministry in 1861. In consequence of failing health, he undertook a voyage to the Mauritius. He became worse in the southern seas, died Jan. 2, 1880, and his body was committed to the deep. His imagination was vigorous, and his discourses were marked by freshness of thought and originality of style, while they were richly and successively engrafted. The pastorate of the pastorate of the Church at Kilsyth, he continued until his death. He died May 26, 1874, aged thirty-six years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1875, p. 145.

Anderson, J. Rush, M.D., a Methodist Episcopalian minister, was born in Montgomery County, Pa., in 1824. He was led to Christ at the age of thirteen; was removed from early childhood under the pious influence; graduated at Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia; and in 1844 entered the Philadelphia Conference, in which he labored with diligence and success until his death, Nov. 8, 1863. Dr. Anderson was genial in spirit, honest, frank, decided, faithful, able, and more zealous than physically strong. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1866.

Anderson, Patrick, an English Congregational minister, was born at Peterhead, Aberdeenshire, Scotland, in April, 1806. He was blessed with a loving, cheerful, and pious home. He received the elements of a good education in his native town, and in 1820 removed to Aberdeen, and received an academical training at Marischal College. On leaving in 1824, having taken his degree of A.M., he resolved to devote himself to the ministry, and proceeded, after spending a session at the University of Edinburgh, in 1825 to become a student at Homerton College. Here he lived and labored till his death, July 11, 1868. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1869, p. 237.

Anderson, Robert, a Congregational minister, was born in 1817, in England probably. "In the year 1849 he and other fellow-laborers accompanied Dr. Lang in the 'Clifton' to Australia." On arriving at Melbourne, Mr. Anderson was informed of the call for help in a ministerial line at Van Diemen's Land, whither he at once proceeded. For a time he was engaged in supplying the pulpit at Collins Street Chapel, Hobart Town; and afterwards engaged as a colonial missionary in the Richmond district. In June, 1852, he removed to Victoria, and became pastor of Kyetana, where he remained till the death, June 18, 1855. Many of the trophies which he won for Christ. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1856, p. 208.

Anderson, Rufus, Jr., a Congregational minister, was born at Londonderry, N. H., March 5, 1765. His preparation for college was made under Rev. Dr. Morison, and in 1791 he graduated at Dartmouth College. His theological studies were prosecuted under Rev. Joseph McKeen, his brother-in-law, the first president of Bowdoin College. After candidating for some time, he was ordained pastor of the Second Church in North Yarmouth, Me., Oct. 22, 1794. For nearly ten years he remained in this charge, when his inadequate support and impaired health compelled him to ask for a dispensation. His next pastorate began in Wenham, Mass., June 10, 1805, and he continued to preach until the latter part of 1818. He died at Wenham Feb. 11, 1814. Although he had collected materials for a History of Missions, he did not complete his work. He was considered a very able minister. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, II, 386.

Anderson, Rufus, Jr., D.D., LL.D., a Congregational minister, son of the preceding, was born at North Yarmouth, Me., Aug. 17, 1796. He graduated at Bowdoin College in 1818, and at Andover Theological Seminary in 1822. During the next two years he was an assistant of the secretaries of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions; and from 1824 to 1829 held the office of assistant secretary. From 1832 to 1866 he was foreign secretary of the same organization. During this period of service he twice visited the Levant— in 1828-29 and in 1845; in 1845-55 he visited India, Syria, and Turkey; and in 1868 the Hawaiian Islands. He was a fellow of the American Oriental Society. He died at Roxbury, Mass., May 80, 1880. Besides the many sermons, tracts, and papers which he published, as secretary of the American Board, he issued other works of value, among which may be mentioned the first Christian Almanac (1818)—Peleponnesus and the Greek Islands (1845, 1846, and 1846; in three volumes, in two parts, and in two parts, respectively);—The Work of Missions Progress (1846);—Missionaries, the Blind Preacher of Mission (1851)—Missions in the Levant (1860)—The Hawaiian Islands (1864)—Synopsis of Lectures on Missions (1867), delivered at Andover Theological Seminary;—Foreign Missions: their Relations and Claims (1869);—History of the Sandwich Islands (1870);—History of the Missions of the American Board of Commission for Foreign Missions to the Oriental Churches (1870);—History of the India Mission (1874). See Cong. Year-book, 1881, p. 16.

Anderson, Samuel, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Norway, May 3, 1824. He emigrated-ed to Chicago, Ill., in 1849; soon after was powerfully converted, and in 1853 began his itinerant career in connection with the Wisconsin Conference. His physical constitution was never strong, and undue exertion in pastoral labors caused his death, March 16, 1860. Mr. Anderson was a scholar, speaking four languages readily. As a preacher, he was logical, eloquent, pathetic. He possessed a vast amount of theological lore, and a burning zeal for the salvation of his countrymen. He did gigantic work in Wisconsin and Minnesota for the mission. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1860, p. 266; Simpson, Ogd. of Methodism, s. v.

Anderson, Samuel James Pierce, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Virginia, and spent the early part of his ministerial life as pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Norfolk, Va. After resigning this charge, he went to St. Louis, Mo., where he was successful in building up a strong Church, which remains as a memorial of his labors. He died near St. Louis in 1873. See Presbyterian, Sept. 29, 1873. (W. P. S.)

Anderson, Thomas (1), a Presbyterian minister, was born in Cumberland County, Pa., Jan. 1, 1791. At the age of eighteen he became a member of the Presbyterian Church, Neshaminy, Mercer Co., Pa. His early home was at Granville, in Hunting and Creek partly at home, partly at Greensburg Academy, sometimes teaching, sometimes laboring with his hands, until he was fitted for college. He graduated at Washington College, Pa., 1820. After graduating, he removed to the town of Mercer, and took charge of the academy in that place. He taught for five years, paid off his college debts, and pursued his theological studies under the directions of Mr. Tait. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Erie, Dec. 28, 1825; began his ministerial labors regularly at Concord, Venango Co., Pa., May 7, 1826; was ordained by the Presbytery of Erie, Sept. 3, 1826; the same year, and installed as pastor. At the division of the Presbytery in 1838, Mr. Anderson adhered to the New School. In 1848 he removed to Huntington, Ind., where he organized a Church in November of that year. He was released from this charge Jan. 9, 1848, and died Dec. 22, 1853. See Hist. of Presbyterians in Erie.

Anderson, Thomas (2), an English Congregational minister, was born in London, May 10, 1799. At the age of eleven he was left an orphan, and went to live with an uncle at Bath. He was converted at the age of fifteen. In 1816 Mr. Anderson entered Cheshunt College, and in 1819 he was engaged in supplying Zion Chapel, Dover, and other places in the connection. He was ordained in 1821 at Eastley, and his first charge was at Kidderminster, from which place he removed to Zion Chapel. At the close of fifteen years' labor in this place, feeble health compelled his resignation. His death occurred Nov. 30, 1875. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1877, p. 541.

Anderson, William (1), an English Congregational missionary to South Africa for more than half a century. He arrived at the Cape of Good Hope in September, 1800, with the late Rev. James Reid of the Kat River Settlement. Mr. Anderson commenced the Griqua Mission in 1801, and formed the station in Griqua Town in 1804. He remained in this position for sixteen years, and then (1820) removed to the Caledon In-station. Subsequently he was removed to Pascalie-derp, and continued to labor honorably and successfully for thirty years. His exact age at death is not known, but he must have vanged on eighty years. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1864, p. 217.

Anderson, William (2), a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Madison County, Va., Jan. 4, 1806. He grew up in ignorance and sin; experienced conversion in his sixteenth year; received license to preach in 1829; was for several years a member of the Virginia Conference, and became a member of the Georgia Conference on its organization. Subsequently he superannuated, and, after suffering for years with paralysis, died in 1859. Mr. Anderson was richly endowed with native intellect, and employed it zealously in expressing his faith in the Cross. His pure and upright example was a vast power for good. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1859, p. 146.

Anderson, William (3), a minister in the Free Methodist Church, was born at Emmiskillen, Ireland, March 30, 1825. He was brought to Canada East when three years of age, was converted at the age of thirteen; went to Illinois in August, 1866, and united soon after with the Free Methodist Church in St. Charles, and the following year was received into the Illinois Annual Conference. He died at Belvidere, Boone Co., Ill., Aug. 4, 1868. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the F. M. Church, 1866, p. 54.

Anderson, William E., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Cumberland County, III., Sept. 5, 1837. He experienced conversion in his ninth year; was appointed class-leader when but sixteen; received license to exhort two years later, to preach in his twentieth year, and in 1858 entered the Illinois Conference. He fell at his post in Havana, Ill., March 25, 1868. Mr. Anderson was a useful preacher, whose close Dwight conversions witness the genuineness of his call to preach. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1868, p. 211.

Anderson, William C., D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was a member of the Presbytery of New Albany. For some years he was president of Miami University, O., and was afterwards pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, San Francisco, Cal. His health being frail, he lived in retirement at Germantown near Phil-

Anderson, William R., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Ross County, O., June 21, 1810. He was converted in his fourteen year; received license to preach in 1836, and entered the travelling connection of Conference, in which he labored faithfully until his death, Feb. 25, 1846. Mr. Anderson was deeply and fervently pious. His abilities were above the average. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1846, p. 75.

Andeshan, in Chaldaean-Persian religious worship, was the name of the first sacrificial high-priest, whom Nimrod appointed to the service of his fire-worship. It is said to have been he who, upon Nimrod's command, threw Abraham into the fiery oven when the latter sought to convert the king from his idolatry to the true worship. But the fire did not consume the holy man, and this miracle converted even the heart of the hardened priest.

Andeux (or Andiulus), St. See Andeolus.

Andhatamsira, in Hindu mythology, is one of the twenty-one subdivisions of the Nārī, or hell of the Hindus, of which the dark god Jema is manager, who sees all the deeds of men through a glass.

Andhrimmer, in Norse mythology, is the cook who prepares the boar in Walhalla for Einheriar. His cooking-vessel is called Eldhrimmer, and is so large that all the gods can be plentifully supplied by it in one meal. The boar possesses the characteristic that every evening, after he has been devoured, he comes to life again from the remaining bones, so that on the following day he may be killed and eaten again.

Andiangu (or Anidiangu), in Norse mythology, is the name of a heaven which is higher than the ANDOCHIUS heaven of the Asas, and lies south of it. Into this heaven the deities will go at the end of the world.

Andocius (or Andocius), saint and martyr, was a priest and disciple of St. Polycarp of Smyrna, and was sent by him to preach the Gospel to the Gauls. When in the country about Autun, he was denounced to the governor of the province as having been taken in the performance of his priestly functions at Sedeclo, or Sanliue. By order of the governor he was flogged, beaten to death with clubs, and thrown into the fire. The continuous prayers of the Christians at Autun kept his festival in Sept. 24. See Baillett, Sept. 24.

Andrada, Alfonso de, a Spanish Jesuit, was born at Toledo in 1590. He was a member of the college of St. Bernardi at Toledo, and taught philosophy at the Athenaeum of that place. He was sent on a mission to the Indies, and found time to write more than thirty volumes, of which Nicholas Antonio gave the titles, and of which the greater part have been published. He died at Madrid in 1658. We notice some of his works, as follows: El Buen Soldado Católico, y sus Obligaciones (Madrid, 1642):—El Estudiante Perfecto, y sus Obligaciones (1643):—El Buen Cordero, que debe guardarlo el Hombre para Cumarla el Cielo (1648, 1657):—Idea del Perfecto Prelado, y Vida del Cardenal Arzobispo de Toledo, Don Baltasar de Mosco y Sandoval (ibid. 1658):—Tarones Ilustres de Campaña de Jesus (ibid. 1672). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Andrada, Gregorio Lope de, a celebrated Portuguese prelate, was born in June, 1565, at Azambuja, in the district of Santarem. He entered the Augustine order, and distinguished himself as a preacher in the principal cities of Spain and Portugal. Philip IV appointed him archbishop of Orentra, in the vice-realm of Naples. He died in June, 1635. The works of Andrada, conisting of sermons, homilies, discourses, and theological treatises, were published in three volumes by Gregorio Rodriguez (Madrid, 1656). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Andrada, Francisco Rades, a Spanish priest of the Order of Calatrava, lived at the end of the 16th century, and wrote a Chronicle of the Orders of St. Jago, Calatrava, and Alcantara (Toledo, 1572).

André de Saint-Nicolas, a French Carmelitine friar, was born at Laon, about 1560, and died at Besançon in 1713. He wrote, De Lápide Sepulcrali, Antiquis Burgundo-sequentiorum Comitibus, Venustione, in Sancti Joannis Evangelistae Basilica recese Posito (Besançon, 1698):—Leiters en Forne de Dissertatio sur la Prandesi Découverte de la Ville d'Arene en Franche-Comté (Dijon, Micard, 1698). The author here combats the opinion of Dunod upon the situation of the ancient city of Avenches, near Lake Antre and Moirons. Several other MSS. of this friar are pre-

André, John George, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Helen, county of Nassau, Germany, Aug. 22, 1828. He emigrated to New Orleans in 1846, and in the following spring settled in Louisville, Ky. In 1848 he was converted; in 1850 received license to preach; and six years later entered the travelling connection of the South-west German Conference, and in it continued faithful until 1863, when hemorrhage of the lungs compelled him to retire. He died Aug. 19, 1872. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1872, p. 81.

André, Yves Marie, a French Jesuit, was born May 22, 1675, at Chateaulin, in Lower Brittany, and settled at Caen, where he was professor regius of mathematics from 1726 to 1759. He died Feb. 26, 1764. He is chiefly known by Essai sur la Beau, of which a new edition was given in the collection of his works in 1766 (5 vols. 12mo). His Traité sur l’Homme is highly es-teened.

Andrea of Anellino, St., an Italian ecclesiastic, was born at Castro Nuovo, in the kingdom of Naples, in 1221. He entered the ecclesiastical court of Naples, which he left in order to consecrate himself entirely to the Brotherhood of the Theatines. The reforms which he introduced into this order raised a strong opposition against him, in the midst of which he died, exhausted by fatigue and old-age, in the convent of the Theatines. He was canonized in 1724 and placed in the Limbo of saints. Naples and Sicily chose him as one of their patrons. His religious works were printed in five vols. (Naples, 1738-34), and his Letters in two vols. (ibid. 1732). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Andrea, priest and canon of Bergamo, lived near the close of the 9th century. He wrote a History from the time of the entry of the Lombards into Italy down to the death of the emperor Louis II, about A.D. 874. This History was published by Muratori in vol. i of his Antiquitates Italicae. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Andrea, monk of Vellomobamba, and priest of San Fedele di Strami, in the diocese of Arezzo, was at Parma in 1061; then at Cadolo, and simoniacal bishop of Castelnuovo; he was elected abbot of Pomposa, and appointed to Alexander II. Andrea was strongly opposed in this election, and was banished by the clergy. He died in 1106. He wrote, Sancti Arvali Vitae (inserted in Puri-cell’s De Sanctis Martyribus, etc. [Milan, 1657]):—

Andrea, Antonio, an Arragonese, a Franciscan friar, and a disciple of Scottus, flourished about the beginning of the 14th century. He wrote, among other works, a treatise on the Principles of Gilbert de la Porrie (Venice, 1512, 1517).

Andrea, Giovanni Antonio, bishop of Aleria, in Corsica, was born at Vigezzano in 1417, and was the friend of the celebrated cardinal Nicolas Cusa, who advanced him to the post of secretary to the apostolic library, or librarian at the Vatican. He was particularly instrumental in introducing the art of printing in Italy and fixing it at Rome. He died in 1475, or, according to Trithemius, in 1438. He is known to the literary world not so much for his original componitions as by the canons he bestowed upon so many valuable works when the invention of printing was introduced at Rome by those celebrated printers Conrad Sweeneyhym and Arnold Pannartz. The works he superintended were, in 1468-9, Epitomæ Ciceronis ad Familiares, Hieronymi Epitome, and editions of Julius Caesar, Livy, Virgil, Lucas Aurelii, Apuleius:—and in 1470-1, Lectantius, Cicero’s Orations, Cyprian, Ovid’s Metam., Pliny, Quintilian, etc.

Andrea, Giovanni d’, a famous Italian canonist of the 14th century, was born at Mugello, near Florentine, and went to Bologna and studied under Peter Comestor. In the year 1330 he was professor at Padua, but was soon recalled to Bologna, where he acquired the highest reputation. He died of the plague at Bologna in the year 1348. Among his best works were his Gloss upon the Sixth Book of the Decretals (Rome, 1476, and five editions afterwards at Pavia, Basle, and Venice) and Glossae upon the Clementines (Strasburg, 1471). He enlarged the Speculum of Dur-rant in 1347.

Andrea Pisano, a distinguished Italian sculptor and architect, was born at Pisa in 1270, and studied under Nicola and Giovanni Pisano. Andrea was employed at the Duomo of Pisa as one of the assistants, under Giovanni, and after this he was employed to execute some small figures in marble for the Church of Santa Maria al Ponte al Pia. His success in these works led to his being invited to Florence to assist in completing the façade of the Cathedral of Santa Maria del Fiore. He executed two marble statues of St. Peter and St. Paul, which were placed in the façade. As an architect, he designed the Castle of Scarperia, the Arsenal at Venice, and the Church of San Giovanni. He died in 1529.

Andrea, Samuel, a Reformed theologian of Germany, was born in 1640 in Dantzic. He studied at Heidelberg and Groningen, and in 1665 was appointed professor of Greek and philosophy at Heidelberg. In 1674 he was called to Marburg, where he died, Jan. 6, 1699. His numerous writings are given by Jörcher and Ade-lung, as well as in Niederer’s Historische Gelehrten geschich-te. In his work, Aus dem Leben der ersten und Zweiten Hälfte des 17ten Jahrhunderts, ii, 299: Allgemeine deutsche Biogrphie, s. v. (B. P.)

Andrea, Andrea, a Mantuan painter and engraver, was born, according to Brulliot, in 1560; by others he is supposed to have been born in 1540. He is little known as a painter. The following are a few of his principal works: Pharaoh’s Host Destroyed in the Red Sea, and Return of the Magi, oil, parmigiano (1555): — the Virgin and Child, with St. John presenting a bird and a female saint holding a lily, after Giacomo Ligozzi: — Christ Curing the Leper and Christ Curing the Paralytic, after Francesco de Nanto da Salusia: — and The Triumph of the Church.

Andreas BARKAFUS (so called from his long beard), a celebrated civil and canon lawyer of the 15th century, was born in Sicily, from which place he went to study at Bologna, where he attracted the admiration of every one. His memory is said to have been so retentive that he could remember everything that he read, and could repeat off-hand two hundred arguments proposed to him in the course of a day. In law he made a reputation that he was called “the Monarch of the Laws.” He was present at the Council of Basle, and died about 1476, leaving many works on the civil and canon law. See Mongitore, Bibl. Sic. vol. I.

Andreas, bishop of Cesarea, in Cappadocia, flourishing about A.D. 500. He wrote a Commentary on the Apocalypse, which is extant in Greek and Latin among the works of the Nestorians. He also wrote a commentary on the Spiritualita, of which only some fragments remain. See Mosheim, Hist. of the Church, bk. ii, cent. v, pt. ii, ch. ii.

Andreas, a celebrated archbishop of Lund, in Sweden, while young travelled through Germany, Italy, France, and England, and on his return was appointed chancellor of Canute VI, who sent him to Rome to plead the cause of his sister, who, without sufficient motive, had been divorced by Philip II, king of France. Andreas pleaded the case of the queen so well that the pope, Celestine III, obliged king Philip to receive her back again. Returning to Rome, Andreas was seized by the French in Burgundy and detained for some time. After his release, he was elected archbishop of Lund and possessed a considerable revenue, and confirmed the pope Innocent III in 1201. After the death of Canute, in 1203, Andreas crowned his brother, Waldemar II, his successor. He accompanied him in his crusade against the Livonians. On account of his age and infirmities, he retired to an island (Isula Fama) of Moller, where he died, June 24, 1228.

He made a Latin translation of the Laws of Skåne (published by Huitfeld, Copenhagen, 1590) and wrote The Laws of Zealand (published in Danish by Huitfeld, ibid.),—Hexameron, a Latin poem on the six days of the creation: — On the Seven Sacraments, a poem. These two poems have been preserved in manuscript in the archives of the Cathedral of Lund. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Andreas von Stauffelstein, a German Benedictine of the Monastery of St. Michael at Bamberg, died in 1509. He wrote, Chronicon Monasterii Sancti Michaelis prope Bambergam (in MS. at the Library of Munich): — Opus Invierno de Sanctis Ordinis Sancti Benedicti (in MS. at Munich; an extract of it is found in Pea, Theaurus; an Italian translation has been found in Maffei, Vite di XVII Confessori di Cristo). Ziegelbauer mentions a number of other works in MS. at Bamberg and other libraries. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Andreol, Gugnio, an Italian sculptor and delineator, settled in Gubbio in 1498. He painted many beautiful designs upon table-service, and executed in this material two beautiful bass-reliefs for altar-pieces—one for the Church of San Domenico, and the other for the house-chapel of the Bentivogli family. He was living in 1522.

Andrea, Antonio, a Franciscan monk of Spain, native of Tauste, in Arragón, lived near the close of the 13th century or at the commencement of the 14th. He was a zealous partisan, and one of the best commentators of his master, John Duns Scotus. The insinuating manner in which he taught the doctrines of his master gained for him the surname of "Doc- tor Ubique." He wrote, Commentaria in Liber Veterem Aristotelis, scilicet in Isagogen Porphyrii, Pragmatisca et post Pragmatisca Aristotelis (Ven- ice, 1477): — Questiones super XII Libros Metaphysicae (ibid. 1491): — In Quatuor Libros Sententiarum (ibid. 1572, 1578). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Andres, Johann Baptist, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born at Königshofen, in Würzburg, Aug. 11, 1768. He studied at Würzburg, where he was made doctor of philosophy. In 1798 he was appointed licentiate of theology, and, in order to enlarge his knowledge, travelled extensively visiting the different universities on his journey. In 1808 he was appointed professor at Würzburg, and he accepted in the following year a call to Salzburg, where he remained till 1818. In this year he was called to Landshut, where he died, Sept. 26, 1823. He wrote, Prima Origines Impendimentorum Matrimonii inter Christianos Dierimnitum, Quo pro Consecutu Doctoratus Theologicae Licentiae Praeside, etc. (Würzburg, 1798). See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, i, 10 sq. (B. P.)

Andres, Johann Bonaventura, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born at Nuremberg, May 29, 1746. At a very early age he joined the Order of the Jesuits. After it was abolished, in 1773 he entered the clerical seminary at Würzburg, where, on presenting a dissertation, he was made licentiate of theology. In 1774 he received holy orders; was appointed in 1775 professor of rhetoric at the gymnasia in Würzburg, and in 1780 professor of philosophy at the university there, where he also lectured on homiletics and pedagogics. He died as doctor of theology and director of the gymnasia of Würzburg and Min- nesotz, May 16, 1822. He published, Principia Fidei (Würzburg, 1774): — Magazin für Prediger (ibid. 1788-99, 9 vols.): — Archiv für Kirchen- und Schulschriften (ibid. 1804-1809, 24 vols.): — Beiträge zur Gelehrten Deutschlands, i, 12 sq.; Winer, Handbuch der theolog. Lit. ii, 42. (B. P.) Andreucci, Andrea Germonino, an Italian Jesuit, born at Viterbo in 1684, was much in the employment of the bishop of Pavia, and wrote many works, among them De Sacrauctia Um Exequiarum creribus aut varias sectas ecclesiasticas (Rome, 1729): — The Life of St. Emidius, Bishop of Ascoli, in Italian (ibid. 1728): — De Episcopo Titulari Tractatus Canonico-theologici (ibid. 1782): — Opuscula Moralia de Ecclesiastica (ibid. 1783), in four parts: — De Dignitate, Officio, ac Privilegiis Cardinalium (ibid. 1784): — De Patriarchatu Antico (ibid. 1785): — De Vita Ambrosii (ibid. 1786): — De Observantiu Episcopo in Authentican-Andrew, Sr. (the Apostle). A letter entitled The Priests and Deacons of Achaia, who are said to have been present at the martyrdom of St. Andrew the apostle, A.D. 65, and to have written an encyclical letter concerning his passion, is still extant in Latin, in Lipomannus and Surius, dated Nov. 30, and is defended by Bellarmin, Possevius, and Labbe as genuine. Alexander Natalis (Hist. Eccles., 1, r, 8) also boldly affirms its genuineness, but fails in his proof, for his argument rests upon the testimony of the fathers, whereas he cites none earlier than Athenaeus, bishop of Osnara, in Spain, in 789, while it is notorious that it was ranked among the apocryphal books by St. Philastrius of Bresse and popes Innocent I and Gelasius. An argument for its genuineness used by Baronius—viz., that parts of it are read by the Roman Church in the Office of St. Andrew—can hardly be entailed to any weight, since it cannot be denied that apocryphal and spurious writings have found their way into the breviary. Cave (Hist. Lit. vol. i) attributes the work to a monk of the Middle Ages. M. Wog, professor of ecclesiastical antiquities in the University of Leipzig, published (in 1749) a dissertation in defence of the authenticity of these acts, which he supposes to have been written in A.D. 67. See Baronius, A.D. 69, No. 34; Dupin, Hist. Eccles., 1, 42.

ANDREW, St., Festival of. This was anciently placed on the same level as the feast of St. Peter himself (Krazer, De Liturgia, p. 529). Its natal day is Nov. 30. The hymn Nunc Andreas solemnia for his festival is dedicated to the Venerable Bede. Jerome's martyrology places his translation on Sept. 5, but others on May 9 or Feb. 5.

Andrew, saint and martyr, a tribune, who, together with many soldiers whom he had converted, suffered martyrdom about A.D. 257, under Galerius Maximianus, in Cilicia or Armenia. They are commemorated by the Greek and Roman churches Aug. 19. Their acts given by Surius and Metaphrastes are spurious. See Baillet, Aug. 19.

Andrew, a Scottish bishop, was promoted to the see of Argyile in 1304. He was living in 1327. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 286.

Andrew, a Scottish prelate, was elected bishop of Caithness in 1150, and was the first bishop of that see. He was bishop there in the reign of king David I, and was witness to a donation by this prince to the Monastery of Dunfermline, and was also witness to the same king's donation of Lochvene, etc., in the time of Robert bishop of St. Andrews. He was bishop there in the time of king William, and of Matthew, and the two Simons, bishops of Aberdeen, Moray, and Dunblane. He was also witness to the donation of the Monastery of Abernethy. He was present at the Council of Northampton in 1176. He probably died Dec. 30, 1184. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 205.

Andrew, St., of Cretz (or of Chrysus), who lived sixty years later than Andreas Cretensis (q. v.), was also born in the island of Crete. When the emperor Constantine Copronymus published a decree against iconoclasm, Andrew went to Constantinople, and boldly reproached him with his conduct, which so enraged the monarch that he ordered him to be hanged; but as Andrew was conveyed to the place of execution, a man wounded him so miserably in the foot that he died of this and other ill-use. This happened in A.D. 761. The Greeks and Latins commemorate him on Oct. 17. See Baillet, Oct. 17.

Andrew, a Jew of Cyrene, surnamed Lucanus by Eusebius, and "the man of light" by Abulfaraj, a fanat-16th century, and left a work concerning the popes, archbishops, bishops, abbots, and abbesses of his order who have been canonized; also a Life of St. Odo, the apostle of Fomerania.

Andrew, bishop of Samogata, and the friend of Taddeo. He was about A.D. 450 AD, at the command of John of Antioch, two pieces in refutation of the celebrated anathemas of St. Cyril, and eight Letters, given by Lupus. See Cave, Historia Literaria, i, 419.

Andrew, Asbury, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Caroline County, Md., in 1825. He removed to the vicinity of Fort Wayne, Ind., in 1859; entered the Ohio conference in 1860, and in 1864 entered the Indiana Conference, in which he filled acceptably the appointments assigned him until his supernumeration, which took place six years previous to his death. He died July 19, 1870. Mr. Andrew was a man of deep piety and respectable preaching ability. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1871, p. 114.

Andrew, James Osgood, D.D., a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Wilkes County, Ga., May 3, 1794. His father, the Rev. John Andrew, was one of the early itinerant Methodist preachers. His mother's maiden name was Crosby. She was possessed of a strong intellect, fine taste, and deep piety—elements that strongly marked the bishop's character. He was an extensive reader from his childhood, joined the Church at the age of thirteen, soon became class-leader, and when eighteen was licensed to preach. His first pulpit efforts were among the negroes, and were crowned with success. His first attempt before his friends was considered a failure, and he concluded to never attempt again to preach; but his presiding elder secured his entrance into the South Carolina Conference in 1812, and he began his regular ministry as assistant on the Saltketter Circuit. In three years he began to fill the best appointments in the Conference, and thus continued, with growing popularity, until 1822, when he was elected bishop. He entered upon his work as bishop with great reluctance, fear, and trembling, saying, "The Conference has laid upon me a work for which I am not prepared, and have had no experience whatever." In 1866 he supernumerated, but continued to preach as health would permit until his death, March 2, 1871. Bishop Andrew through his third wife became an owner of slaves, although he had no pecuniary interest in them. His ownership was so arranged that he could not liberate them had he wished. However, because of such ownership, the Northern majority of the General Conference suspended him from his office. His action caused a deep division in the Methodist Episcopal Church. He would gladly have resigned to preserve the union, had it not been sanctioning, as he considered, a false, fanatical, and unconstitutional principle, and had it not been for the earnest protests of the Southern delegates. The plan of separation was therefore agreed upon, and the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was organized, with bishop Andrew at its head. In the meridian of life bishop Andrew was a noble-looking man, somewhat under six feet in height, well proportioned, and sallow of countenance—the prevailing type of his region. His features were chiselled with marked outlines of strong expression, and his voice was strong and melodious. He was warm and devoted in his friendships, liberal in his benefactions, sympathizing in spirit, and a special friend of the colored people. He wrote much for the Church papers, and published a valuable work on Firmly Government, and a volume of Miscellanies. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1871, p. 649; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s.v.

Andrew, Samuel, a Congregational minister, was born at Cambridge, Mass., Jan. 29, 1656. He graduated at Harvard College in 1675; for a few years was tutor there, and while thus engaged, preached in Milford, being ordained pastor there Nov. 18, 1685. Mr. Andrew was one of the original projectors, founders, and trustees of Yale College; and when Rev. Mr. Pier- son, the first rector, died, he became rector pro tem. He held his pastorate from the establishment of the college in 1700 until his death. In the convention from which emanated the Saybrook Platform, assembled at Saybrook, Conn., in 1708, he was a prominent member. He died Jan. 24, 1738. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 269.

Andrews, Gerard D.D., an English divine, was born at Leicester, April 8, 1756. He was educated at Westminster School and Trinity College, Cambridge. In 1772 he returned to Westminster as an assistant master, where he remained till 1784. One of his clerical duties was that of an occasional assistant preacher at St. Bride's, Fleet Street; afterwards he was engaged at St. James's Chapel, in the Hampstead Road. In 1780 he served as chaplain to the high sheriff of Leicester; in 1788 was presented to the rectory of Zeal-Monachorum, Devonshire; in 1791 was chosen alternate evening preacher at the Magdalen, and in 1799 at the Foundling Hospital. In 1800 he was presented to the rectory of Mickleham, Surrey; and collated to St. James's Aug. 10, 1802. His rectory of Mickleham having become vacant, he preferred his living to the parish of Zeal-Monachorum, which he was presented to, and instituted Sept. 7, 1802. In 1809 he was elected dean of Canterbury, and he thereupon finally left Mickleham. In 1812, on the translation of bishop Sparkes, he was offered the bishopric of Chester, but declined it on the plea of his advancing years. He died June 14, 1836. Dean Andrews in the pulpit was argumentative, but not impassioned; conclusive, but not eloquent; a good rather than a great preacher. He published several special sermons. See (Lond.) Annual Register, 1825, p. 254.

Andrews, Abraham, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in England about 1744, and emigrated to the United States in 1796. He had been a reputable member of the Methodist Society about forty years, and in the land of his adoption maintained great strictness of life as a Christian and minister until his death in August, 1800. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1801, p. 97.

Andrews, Benjamin, L.L.D., an English Wesleyan minister, was born in London, Nov. 1, 1785. His ancestors were among the Huguenot refugees in England, and in 1750 were received into the membership of his first class in the Foundery. Andrews united with the Church in early life, made high attainments as a scholar, and received his degree from the University of Aberdeen. He entered the ministry in 1814, became a supernumerary in 1855, and died at Richmond, Sur- rey, May 3, 1868. His entire course was marked by sterling integrity of character and unwavering devotion to Methodism. His ministry was an awakening and earnest one. See Minutes of British Conference, 1868, p. 29.

Andrews, Charles W., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the diocese of Virginia, was rector of Trinity Church, Shepherdstown, Va. (afterwards West Virginia). He entered part of his ministerial life. He died May 24, 1875, aged sixty-seven years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1876, p. 149.

Andrews, David O., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born June 4, 1819. He experienced religion in 1839, and in 1844 received license to preach and was admitted into the Memphis Conference, in which for nine years he continued a model of his tribe, faithful and zealous. He died in 1853. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1853, p. 462.

Andrews, Ebenezer B., L.L.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Pennsylvania. He was of a ministerial family, the sacred calling being the profession of his father and five sons, of whom he was the youngest and the first to depart this life. He received his education at Williams and Marietta colleges, and pursued his theological studies at Princeton Seminary. He was ordained as a Presbyterian minister in the Presbyterian Church at Housatonic, Mass., and subsequently became pastor of the New Britain Church, Conn., where he remained until he was elected professor of geology at Marietta College in 1851. He filled this appointment with great ability and success until 1861, when he was appointed on the Geological Survey of the State of Ohio. He was earnest and unceasing in his work, ready to make any sacrifice for the public good. He felt it his duty during the war of the Rebellion to accept the office of major in the Thirty-sixth Regiment of Ohio Volunteers, which had been tendered him unsolicited by the governor of Ohio, and served two years as major and commanding officer. He was recently appointed one of the members of the Board of Inspection of the United States Mint, Philadelphia. He published several valuable papers, and a work on geology for the use of colleges and schools. He died at Lancaster, O., Aug. 14, 1880. See N. Y. Evangelist, Aug. 26, 1880. (W. F. S.)

Andrews, Edward F., D.D., a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, became rector of Christ Church, in Augusta, N. Y., in August, 1836, which position he held for seven years, when he resigned. After an interval of eighteen months, he became rector of the same church, and retained the office for a second period of seven years. He died at Binghamton, March 5, 1857, of which place he had been a resident for thirty years. See American Church Review, July, 1867.

Andrews, Elisa, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Queensbury, N. Y., in 1802. He was converted when about eighteen, and in 1824 entered the New York Conference. When, in 1832, the Troy Conference was set off, he was included within it; in 1857 he was transferred to the New York Conference, and in it labored zealously and successfully until his death at the age of 84, in 1874. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1845, p. 601.

Andrews, Elissa Deming, a Congregational minister, was born at Southington, Conn., in 1783. He graduated at Yale College in 1808; was ordained pastor of the Church in Putney, Vt., June 25, 1807; was dismissed May 27, 1829; and died in Michigan in 1852. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 558.

Andrews, George B., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of diocesan rank, was rector for many years of Zion Church, Wappinger's Falls, N. Y., his rectoryship covering a period of more than a quarter of a century. He died Aug. 22, 1875, aged ninety years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1876, p. 149.

Andrews, George Clinton, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Salem, Pa., Sept. 30, 1840. He was converted in early life; was licensed to preach in 1866; studied at Wyoming Seminary from 1864 to 1866; served as supply, Herrick Centre charge in 1867, Oregon charge in 1869, Lackawaxen charge from 1870 to 1872, and in 1873 was admitted into the Wyoming Conference and appointed to Pleasant Valley charge. His subsequent appointments were: 1875, Osborn Hollow; 1876-77, Triangle; 1878, Union Centre; and in 1879 he superannuated. He died at Franklin Forks, July 12, 1879. Mr. Andrews was self-denying, laborious, and faithful. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1880, p. 86.

Andrews, George W., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Gloucester County, Va., Oct. 27, 1808. He experienced religion in 1829, and in 1841 entered the Virginia Conference. In it he labored as diligently as his health would permit until 1851, when he superannuated and settled on a farm in Mecklenburg County, where he spent the remainder of his life in farming, teaching school, and frequent preaching. He died June 11, 1854. Mr. Andrews was a modest, unassuming minister, and possessed good natural and acquired pulpit gifts. See Minutes of Annual Conference of the M. E. Church, South, 1854, p. 246.

Andrews, Henry, an English Wesleyan missionary, was converted early. He left England in December, 1822, and died of yellow fever in Trinidad, W. I., Oct. 30, 1858, in the twenty-fifth year of his age. His zeal was fervent, his dedication unreserved, and his charge was rising under his care. See Minutes of British Conference, 1854.

Andrews, John (1), a clergyman of the Church of England, came from that country with the Rev. Richard Clarke in 1758. He had been educated at St. Mary's Hall, Oxford; had been ordained deacon by the bishop of Gloucester, Dec. 8, 1756, and priest by the bishop of Oxford, Dec. 24, 1759. In 1778 he was assistant minister of St. Philip's Church, Charleston, S. C., which he resigned Nov. 9, 1776, to return to England. After this he was appointed minister at Stinchcombe, in Gloucester, and afterwards was vicar of Marden, in Kent. In 1783 he published the Scripture Doctrine of Grace, an answer to a treatise on the same subject by the bishop of Gloucester. A volume of his Sermons was published after his death. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, 1849, p. 140.

Andrews, John (2), D.D., a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born in Cecil County, Md., about six miles from the head of Elk River, April 4, 1746. His preparatory studies were acquired at the Elk School, and he graduated from the College of Philadelphia in 1765. Before completing his course, he had become a tutor in the grammar-school, where he taught one year, and then assumed charge of a classical school at Lancaster. While there he studied theology under the Rev. Thomas Barton. He was ordained deacon Feb. 2, 1767, in London, England, and on Feb. 15 was admitted to priest's orders. Before leaving England he was appointed missionary to Lewes, Del., by the Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts. For three years he discharged the duties of his position, when he became missionary to York and Carlisle, Pa., fixing his residence at York. Soon after the governor of Maryland appointed him rector of St. John's Parish, Queen's Co. His want of sympathy with the views of the Revolution rendered his residence intolerable, and led to his return to York, where he opened a classical school. After some years, he returned to Maryland, and on April 13, 1782, became rector of St. Thomas's Parish, in Baltimore Co., devoting half of his time to this parish and the other half to St. James's, adjoining it. He still continued to preach schools. In 1784 he was influential with others in organizing the Protestant Episcopal Church of Maryland, independent of all foreign jurisdiction. In 1785 he was placed at the head of the newly established Academy of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Philadelphia. From November, 1786, to the following April he supplied the pulpits of the united churches of Christ Church and St. Peter's in Philadelphia during the absence, in England, of the Rev. Dr. White. In 1789 Dr. Andrews was made professor in the College and Academy of Philadelphia; and in 1791, when that institution and the University of the State of Pennsylvania were united under the title of the University of Pennsylvania, he was elected its vice-provost. After filling this position for more than twenty years, he was elected, in December, 1810, to the office of provost, which he resigned, Feb. 2, 1815, on account of failing health. He died in Philadelphia, March 29, 1815. He published, Elements of Logic (1800)—Elements of Rhetoric and Belles-lettres (1813)—and several Sermons. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 246.

Andrews, John (3), D.D., a Unitarian minister, was born at Hingham, Mass., March 8, 1764. He graduuated from Harvard University in 1786, and afterwards studied theology at Cambridge. He then accepted a call to settle as assistant pastor over the First Church at Newport, and was ordained in 1788. In 1808, when the senior pastor died, Mr. Andrews took sole charge of the parish, and labored therein until May 1, 1830, when he resigned his office. After his resignation he preached occasionally to one or two societies in the vicinity of Newportport. He died Aug. 17, 1845. Dr. Andrews, while not a great man, was emphatically a good man. His life was a beautiful exhibition of the Christian graces. As a preacher he was eloquent and practical. He was called upon to deliver the Dudcian Lecture and to preach several occasional discourses, which were published. For fifty years he was a trustee, and for half that time the treasurer, of Dummer Academy. He was also one of the delegates from Newport-port in the convention for revising the constitution of his state. See (Boston) Christian Examiner, 1846, p. 24.

Andrews, Joseph D., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Giles County, Tenn., in 1822. He professed religion in his youth; in 1839 received license to preach, and was recommended to the Tennessee Conference to be transferred to the Arkansas Conference. He died in 1860. Mr. Andrews was remarkable for his cheerful Christian character. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1860, p. 282.

Andrews, Josiah, an English Congregational minister, was born at Lichfield, Dec. 27, 1821, of earnest Churchmen. At a very early age he gave his heart to God, and became an active Christian. He preached his first sermon in a barn when he was about fifteen years old. At the age of seventeen he went to Georgetown, Demerara; and after laboring some time he returned to England, and became pastor of the Church at Long Stratton, Norfolk. Soon after he sailed for Jamaica as a missionary of the auspices of the Missionary Society, and, at the close of seven years, returned to England, and became the pastor successively of sevcral churches, the last of which was that of Shanklin, where he labored four years. He died April 8, 1878. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1879, p. 290.

Andrews, Lemuel, a minister of the Episcopal minister, concerning whose life no further information is accessible than that he labored four years in the miniistry, maintaining an upright, zealous, Christian character, and by his devotedness to his calling endearing himself to his parishioners. He died in 1791. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1791, p. 41.

Andrews, Lewis, an English Wesleyan minister, was born in London in 1790. He became a member of the Methodist Society at the age of nine; entered the ministry in 1808; and travelled, among others, the Loughborough, Ashby, Birmingham, and Mansfield circuits. He died on the latter circuit, Dec. 2, 1818. He was a man of piety and talent. See Wesleyan Meth. Mag. 1820, p. 521; Minutes of British Conference, 1819.

Andrews, Lewis Freemian Wilson, a Presbyterian minister, son of the Rev. Manly Wilson, a Presbyterian minister, was born in North Carolina, Sept. 7, 1802. He removed, when quite young, with his parents to Chiliicooto, O.; given a classical education; graduated as M.D. at the Transylvania University, Lexington, Ky.; and for several years practiced as a physician in Cleveland, O., and about Pittsburgh, Pa. In 1850 he embraced Universalism; in 1851 was ordained a preacher of that faith; became pastor of the Second Universalist Church in 1852; labored in 1854 in Montgomery, Ala., as preacher, and editor of the Gospel Evangelist; in 1855 as pastor in Charleston, S.C. In 1860-37 as senior editor of the Southern Pioneer and Gospel Visitor, Baltimore, Md.; and subsequently removed South and published the Evangelical Universalist. He died at Americus, Ga., March 16, 1875. Dr. Andrews was abundant in labors in long and frequent missionary journeys; generous and free-hearted, natu-really energetic, profound, and able. See Universalist Register, 1876, p. 116.

Andrews, Robert L., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was reared in Williamson County, Tenn. He experienced conversion in early life, and in 1829 was admitted into the Tennessee Conference. He soon rose to distinction in the Church, and filled many important and responsible stations. In 1864 he located in Mississippi, and there died in 1865. Mr. Andrews was agreeable in person, gentle in manner, amiable in disposition, and deep and unbroken in piety. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1866, p. 67; Simpson, Cyclopaedia of Methodism, s. v.

Andrews, Silas Millon, D.D., a minister of the Presbyterian Church, was born in Brown County, N. C., March 11, 1805. His parents were Scotch-Irish Presbyterians, and emigrated to this country at an early day. After a preparatory training, Mr. Andrews entered the University of North Carolina, and graduated from there in 1825. Though he had the ministry in view, he devoted three years to teaching in a classical academy. He then entered the Princeton (N. J.) Theologiical Seminary, where he graduated in 1831. His first charge after his ordination, and his last, was at Doyle-town, Pa. On December 19, 1849, he was elected to the chair of the Synod of Philadelphia, and continued in the faithful discharge of the duties of that office until the reunion of the Church in 1870. For nearly half a century he broke the bread of life to his beloved people. He died at Doylestown, March 7, 1881. See N. Y. Observer, March 17, 1881. (W. P. S.)

Andrews, Thomas, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Madison County, O., April 10, 1835. He graduated at Jefferson College in the class of 1856, and entered the United Presbyterian Seminary in Allegheny at the opening of its next session. He was licensed as a minister in 1859, and received a call from the United congregations of Calcutta and East Liverpool, O., and was installed as pastor in April, 1861. He died of con-

Andrews, Thomas J., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Berwick, Me., Feb. 12, 1826. He experienced a change of heart at the age of fourteen; received license to exhort in 1848; studied at Concord Biblical Institute; and in 1852 joined the New Hampshire Conference. He married with zeal, but until ac-tidentally killed, Aug. 21, 1854. Mr. Andrews was a warm friend, an affectionate husband, a sincere Christian, and a faithful minister. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1856, p. 527.

Andrews, Wells, A.M., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Hartland, Conn., Nov. 21, 1877. In 1807 he was converted, and decided to study for the ministery. He entered Jefferson College, Pa., where he graduated with the honors of his class in 1812. In 1814 he entered Princeton Theological Seminary, N. J.; in 1816 was ordained by the New Brunswick Presbytery, and went to Wilmington, N. C., and after laboring there a short time was called to the pastorate of a Church in Alexandria, Va. In 1837 he was ordained as the moderator of the church circuit of the Indian (then Virginia) Theological Seminary. He died Feb. 14, 1867. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1868, p. 192.

Andrews, William (1), a missionary of the Church of England, came to preach to the Mohawk Indians in New York as a successor to the Rev. Thoroughgood May. At a meeting of the Commission-ners of Indian Affairs held in Albany, he was greeted by the sachems with great respect; but his mission proving unsuccessful, he abandoned it in 1719. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v. 91.

Andrews, William (2), a missionary of the Church of England and a native of Ireland, after having been for some time in America, went to England in 1770; was ordained by the bishop of London, and appointed to Schenectady, N. Y., by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts. In 1771 he opened a grammar-school, but ill-health led him in 1773 to migrate to Virginia, and he resided for some time in Williamsburg. The mission of Johnstown having become vacant, he applied for it. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vi, 91.

Andrews, William (3), a Congregational minister, was born at Ellington, Conn., Sept. 28, 1762. He graduated at Middlebury College in 1800; studied theology with Dr. Burton, and was ordained pastor at Windham, Conn., in 1808. In 1818 he was installed at Danbury, and in the year following at South Cornwall, where he remained until his death, Jan. 1, 1858. "He was a man of grave deportment, good learning, and sincere piety." Of his six sons, five have been preachers, one being president and another professor at Marietta College, O. See Cong. Quarterly, 1861, p. 294; Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ii, 237.

Andrews, William (4), a Canadian Methodist minister, was born at Leeds, Yorkshire, England, in October, 1817. He united with the Wesleyan Methodist Church in 1832; emigrated to Canada in 1842; was received into the ministry in 1846. He labored thirty-six years, and died April 14, 1879. He was a good man and true. His son, Wilbur W. Andrews, is a missionary in the Winnipeg District. See Minutes of the Toronto Conference of the Meth. Church of Canada, 1879, p. 19.

Andrews, William Williams, an English Methodist preacher, was converted when young under a sermon by W. Hopper. He joined the Bible Christians, and became a local preacher; went to America to avoid entering the ministry, but the call to do so pursued him. He returned to England, went to the Shebbear Institution, was accepted for the ministry in 1850, and was installed in six homes without that acceptance. He died March 5, 1878, at Ware, Somerset, aged forty-two years. See Minutes of Conferences of Bible Christians, 1878.

Andrews, Wyatt, a Methodist Episcopal minister, of whose life or sphere of labor no record is accessible further than that he was full of faith and Christian zeal. He died in 1791. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1791, p. 40.

Andresel, Bartholomew Philibert Picot d', a French priest, was born at Salins in 1757. He participated in the highest assemblies of the clergy held in 1782 and 1786, and was titular of the wealthy abbey of St. Jacut in Brittany. He emigrated to England, but returned to France under the Consulate, and assisted in editing certain papers, among others the Journal des Curés, and afterwards became inspector-general of the university. He died at Versailles, Dec. 12, 1825. He translated into French Fox's work, History of the Reign of James II (published in 1809). D'Andresel was the editor of the Excerpta e Scriptoribus Graecis of M. Mollevaut, professor, brother of the poet of that name (Paris, 1815). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Andries, Johann Baptist, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born Dec. 8, 1836, at Rosskirch. In 1865 he received holy orders, and died Nov. 2, 1872, at Ketsenberg, in Hanover. He published, Alphonis Sulamomnis Doctrina de Jurisdictione Episcopalis originis ac Ratione. Ex variis a saeculo commentationes conscripta ... apst. ordine dispositae notisque illustravit (Mayence, 1871);—Cathedra Romana, oder der apostolische Lehrprinzip (vol. i, ibid., 1872). See Literarischer Handwiser für das katholische Deutschland, 1872, p. 551 sq. (B. P.)

Androgéos, in Greek mythology, was the son of Minos and of Pasiphae, whose death was the cause of the tribute of the seven maidens and young men which the Athenians were obliged to render to the Minotaur (q. v.). Androgóes was so proficient in all gymnastic exercises that he won all the prizes at the festival of the Panathenaea at Athens. This gained for him the friendship of the Pallantides (sons of Pallas), but caused also the hatred and envy of Polygos (q. v.), who thought such a friendship dangerous to himself, as it was possible Minos might help the Pallantides and drive him from the throne. He therefore sent spies to Gnoe, in Attica, secretly to lay in wait for Androgóes and murder him. When Minos became acquainted with what had happened, he came to Athens and sought redress for the dreadful crime, begged Jupiter for revenge, and made war upon Athens. As an answer to his prayers, great want and pestilence came upon Attica, which would only cease when its inhabitants would pay the tribute for the murder of Androgóes. This tribute consisted in the yearly sacrifice of seven young men and seven maidens as food for the Minotaur.

Androgynicas, in Greek mythology, were women with four arms, four feet, two heads, and a union of male and female functions. They were very courageous, and even attempted to besiege Jupiter on Olympus. Their ferocity caused him not a little trouble. Jupiter, not desirous of crushing them, as the Giants, separated the male from the female, and authorized Apollo to heal the parts so separated. Of the manner in which this was done, man still carries the mark in the navel; Apollo tied the skin into a knot at the exposed point. In this separation their original strength departed; however, love, the highest virtue, and desire, the strongest passion, are indebted to this separation for their existence.

Andromeda, in Greek mythology. Cepheus, the son of the Ethiopian king Belus, was married to Cassiopeia, who was so proud of her beauty that she maintained her pre-emience over the Nereids. The latter complained of their case to Neptune. The angry god showed himself above the waves of the sea, overflooded Ethiopia, and sent a frightful monster through the land, who devastated the entire country. The oracle of Jupiter Ammon said that Andromeda, the daugter of Cepheus and of Cassiopeia, who had been tied to a rock as a punishment for the boasting of her mother, must be sacrificed to the frightful monster. Perseus met her by chance during his flight with her in prison. In order that Perseus might not think the gods punished her for her own crimes, Andromeda related to him why she was condemned to this torture. Hardly had she finished, when, in the distance, the sea began to foam and the frightful monster came rushing on. The disheartened parents saw the death of their daughter drawing near. Then Perseus asked them if he might have her hand in case he liberated her. This was readily granted, and half the kingdom. The monster drew nearer and nearer. Perseus got up with the winged shoes loaned to him by Mercury, and with the petrifying head which he had taken from the Gorgon Medusa, and, holding this before the monster, changed him into stone. The marriage took place; but the brother of Cepheus, Phineus, to whom Andromeda had been promised, began a bloody siege. Perseus was compelled to sum up all his courage to guard himself against his enemy. At last he brought forth his Medusa head, at the appearance of which Phineus was changed into stone. Perseus thereupon took Andromeda to his own country, and she bore him many sons and daughters. The gods placed the entire family—Cepheus, Perseus, Andromeda, and Cassiopeia—among the stars.

Andronia (from ἀργυρός, a man), a term used to denote that part of the ancient Christian churches allotted to the poor, who had no business. The men occupied the left of the altar, on the side of the church, and the women the right, on the north side. They were separated from each other by a veil or lattice. In the Eastern churches, the women and catechumens occupied the galleries above, while the men sat below. In some churches a separate apartment was allotted to widows, or virgins.

Andronicus, the name of several saints commemorated in various early calendars: (1) saint, April 5 (Bede); (2) May 13 (Jerome); (3) "apostle," with Justin (Rom. xvi, 2), May 17 (Byzant.); (4) finding of relics, Feb. 22 (ibid.); (4) Sept. 27 (Jerome); (5) "holy father," Oct. 9 (Byzant.); (6) martyr, Oct. 10 (Jerome), Oct. 11 (old Rom.), Oct. 12 (Byzant.).

Andronicus, Sr., the companion of St. Probus and Taurus.

Andronicus, Camaterus, a relative of the emperor Manuel Comnenus, and governor of Constantinople, who, about 1150, wrote a book about the Latins, in the form of dialogue between the emperor Manuel and a Roman cardinal, concerning the procession of the Holy Spirit. Becus, or Vecus, the Romanizing patriarch of Constantinople, replied to this work. Andronicus also wrote a work in the form of a conference between the emperor and Peter, the patriarch of the Armenians, and a Treatise on the Two Natures of Jesus Christ.

Andronicus, the elder, emperor of Constantinople, was the son of the emperor Michael, and began to reign in 1283. He disapproved of all that his father had done in the case of the union, and recalled the orthodox clergy who had been ejected on account of their opposition to that act. On account of their proceedings, Clement V excommunicated him; and in 1295 his grandson, Andronicus, revolted against him, and obliged him to yield up the throne to him. Upon this Andronicus the elder retired into a cloister, where he died in 1328. He was a man of parts, and had been used to hold a dialogue between a Jew and a Christian in the Bibl. Potinum, which was printed at Ingolstadt in 1616. The three works mentioned in the preceding article as the composition of Andronicus Camaterus have also been attributed to this emperor.

Andros, Thomas, a Congregational minister, was born at Norwich, Conn., May 1, 1759. He saw service and endured great hardships in the Revolutionary war, especially in connection with his imprisonment in the famous old "Jersey" ship New York in which it is said eleven thousand persons perished. He was ordained at Berkley, Conn., March 19, 1778, where he remained for forty-six years (1788-1834). He died Dec. 30, 1845. He published several Sermons, and A Narrative of his Imprisonment and Escape from the Jersey Prison-Ship. See Allen, Amer. Biog. v. 1. See C.S.

Androtius, Fulvius (Ital. Fulvio Androtti), an Italian Jesuit, was born in 1528 at Monticelo, in Ancona. At the age of thirty-two he joined the Order of the Jesuits, and died as the head of the college at Ferrara, Aug. 27, 1576. He wrote, Della Frequenza della Communione (Brescia, 1618);—Dello Stato delle Vedute (ibid. 1614). His general writings were published by F. Adorno under the title Opere Spirituali (Milan, 1575). They were also published separately as Meditazione della Vita e della Morte di Jes. Christ. (Brescia, 1618). They were translated into Latin, French, German, and Dutch. Andrus, Jared, a Congregational minister, was born at Bolton, Conn., in May, 1784. He was converted at the age of thirty. He hesitated to enter the ministry until, appealing to the lot, a favorable indication was given. He was ordained pastor of the Church at Chaplin, Conn., in 1820, where he labored for ten years, and then removed to North Bennington, Vt., thence to North Madison. On the first Sabbath of 1832 he preached with great earnestness from the text "This year thou shalt die," and on Nov. 11 of the same year the text proved a prophecy of his own demise. See Cong. Quart. 1860, p. 178.

Andrus, Joseph Raphael, an Episcopal clergyman, was born at Cornwall, Vt., in 1791. He was a graduate of Middlebury College in the class of 1812; studied at Yale College as a resident graduate in 1812-13; and for one year (1816) he was a student at the Andover Theological Seminary. He took orders in the Protestant Episcopal Church and was ordained priest April 22, 1817. During the years 1816-17 he was a preacher at Marblehead, Mass., and in Northern Vermont. Subsequently he went to Virginia, where he was a preacher for not far from four years (1817-21). In 1821 he received an appointment as an agent of the American Colonization Society, and went to Africa in the interests of the society in 1821. In 1823 he arrived at the isle of Liberia, July 28, 1821. See Andover General Catalogue, p. 31; Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 565. (J. C. S.)

Andrus, Loyal B., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Cornwall, Vt., Jan. 18, 1809. He experienced conversion when about twenty-one years of age, and in 1849 joined the New York Conference. In 1861 he superanuated, and sustained that relation until his death, near Yonkers, March 27, 1873. Mr. Andrus was peculiarly gifted in prayer, and was highly esteemed for his piety. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1873, p. 47.

Andruzzì, Luigi, an Italian theologian, count of Sant' Andrea, was born about 1688 or 1689 on the Isle of Cyprus. He probably belonged to a Venetian family. From 1709 to 1722 he was professor of Greek in the University of Bologna. He wrote several controversial works against Dositeus, patriarch of Jerusalem, for the defence of the Roman Catholic Church, as his opponent had attacked the infallibility of the pope, and revived the famous dispute upon the Filioque. He died near the middle of the 18th century. Among his principal works we notice, Venus Graecia de Sancta Romana Sede Praecellentem, sive Responsio ad Dosithenm Patriarcham Hierosolimitanum (Venice, 1719);—Consensum tam Græcorum tam Latinorum Patrum de Proces-
"For eleven and a half years Mr. Geddie devoted all this spare time to the preparation of this work. For the last seven and a half of these years I was associated with him in this work. Since I left the Islands, fully three years ago, I have been on a farewell voyage of the 'John Williams', I have been chiefly occupied in this work. Although many years ago there was not a sentence of the Anitene language reduced to writing, I am happy to think that this is both a faithful and idiomatic translation."

The Old Testament, having been published in parts from time to time, was finally carried through the press in 1878 at London by the Rev. J. Inglis. The announcement is thus made in the Bible Society Monthly Reporter, January, 1880:

"Another translation of the entire Bible is now ready. For the past two and a half years the Rev. J. Inglis, of the Free Church of Scotland and Mission to the New Hebrides, has been in this country carrying the Old Testament through the press, the New Testament having been printed previously. Mr. Inglis brought over with him contributions raised by the natives of the small island, sufficient to pay the whole bill for printing. He expresses a just pride in the redemption to the people of Anitene. He has had in full for every copy of the Scriptures they have received; and he expresses his thankfulness that, with the counsel and assistance of the society's officers, the cost of the printing of the Old Testament is much less than he and his colleagues had anticipated. According to the seventy-seventh annual report of the British and Foreign Bible Society, 20,630 copies of parts of the Scripture had been disposed of up to February 1881. See Bible of Every Land, p. 392 sq. (B. P.)"

Aner. Tristram suggests (Bible Places, p. 203) that "this may, perhaps, be recognised in the modern village of Anin, near Taanuk, where are the remains of an ancient site;" meaning, doubtless, the Anin marked on the Ordnance Map as three and a half miles south-west of Taanuk. Lieut. Conder, on the other hand, regards this place as the representation of Anem, and suggests the modern Eldar as the site of Aner (Test Work, ii, 334). Neither suggestion seems to be called for.

Anfal (Arab. the spoil) is the title of a chapter in the Koran which lays down the rules in regard to the distribution of spoils taken from the enemy. The arrangement of Mohammed on this subject was that the fifth part was to belong to God, to the prophet, to his relations, to orphans, to the poor, and to pilgrims. One interpretation of this rule practically excludes God from the parties entitled to the spoil. Others suppose that the title is to be literally followed by subdividing a fifth part of the booty into six portions, and that the portions belonging to God and the prophet are to be used in repairing and adorning the temple of Mecca.

Anfodius, Dominiu (Ital. Domenico Anfodisi), a native of Taggia, in the state of Genoa, who lived in the beginning of the 17th century. He embraced the Franciscan order, and was sent by the pope to the University of Salamanca in his old-age, when blind, retired among the Fathers of the Oratory of that place. He wrote, De Sacramentis Riformatorum Cultu, Veneratione, Translatione attque Identitate (Brescia, 1610) — published an edition of the Acts of the Council of Alcobga, held by Vincent Lancastrelli, the bishop of that see — and some other works.

Angas, in Hindū mythology, were holy books belonging to the Shastras. They are six in number—one pertaining to the articulation of words, another to religious usages, a third about grammar, a fourth concerning witchcraft, a fifth about astronomy, and a sixth is an explanation of hard words in the Vedas.

Angas, William Henry, an English Baptist minister, was bom in the year 1781. For many years he devoted his time, his talents, and his fortune to the interests of his denomination and religion. He took special interest in cultivating fraternal associations with the Mennonites, most of whose churches he visited, making them acquainted with the principles and objects of the Baptist missions to the East and West Indies, and enlisting their sympathies and co-operation in the work of carrying the Gospel to the heathen. He also took a deep interest in the Moravians, and we are told that there was not a settlement belonging to that interesting people in Continental Europe which did not gladly open its doors to receive him as a friend and a brother. The English Baptist Missionary Society sent him in 1800 to visit their stations in the West India islands, and his labours were productive of great good. Late in his life he directed his special attention to the promotion of the religious welfare of sailors, and at the time of his death was gratuitously supplying the Baptist Church at South Shields, England, with a view to benefiting that interesting class of men. His death, which was sudden, occurred at South Shields in September, 1802. See New Baptist Miscellany, 1802, p. 482. (J. C. S.)

Ange de Sainte-Joseph, a Barefooted Carmelitte of Toulouse, whose real name was La Brosse, lived in Persia, and was an apostolic missionary; he was also provincial of his order in Languedoc. He died at Perpignan in 1597. The following are some of his works: Gazophylacium Lingue Persarum (Amst. 1684, fol.) —Castigation in Angelum a S. Joseph, alius dictum de la Brosse. His reputation as a Persian scholar was great in his own country.

Ange de Sainte-Rosalie, a Barefooted Augustinian and a learned genealogist, was born at Blizis in 1589. He was professor of the new Faculty of Genealogie et Chronologie of the Faculty of France and the Grand-officiers of the Couronne, begun by père Anselme, the first edition of which appeared in 1672 (2 vols. 4to), and the second in 1712; but his death, which occurred at Paris in 1726, prevented its completion.

Angekoks are the physicians, witches, and conjurers among the Greenlanders and Esquimaux. They can hardly be called priests, for there is no specific form of worship among these tribes. The Angekoks pretend to live in communication with the spirits, and understand the art of substantiating this assertion by various ceremonies and tricks, so that they are held in great respect and fear, and are consulted in all difficult cases, XI.—6°.
ANGELI

ANGELI, Filippo, a priest, was born in the territory of Perugia, and died at Padua in 1577. He wrote Missae Privatae Praeaxis (Padua, 1677). This work is divided into three parts. The first contains a resolution of all the doubts which may arise concerning private mass; the second relates to the rubrics concerning the private mass; the third contains a metaphysical praxis according to the canons and rubrics.

ANGELI, Francesco Antonio DEGLI, an Italian Jesuit, was born at Sorrento, about 1567. He was employed in the foreign missions in India, and afterwards in Ethiopia, where he went in 1605. His piety caused him to be held in high esteem at the court of the Emperor, whom he induced to abjure the Euchistic errors. He died in 1623, after having translated into the Ethiopian language the Commentary on Maldonatus on the Gospel of Matteo and John.

ANGELI, Paolo DEGLI (or Paul de Angelis), an Italian antiquary, was born in Syracuse, and died at Rome in 1647 as canon of the Church of Santa Maria Maggiore. He wrote several artistic works, for which he Hoefer, Nov. Bihg. Generale, s. v.

ANGELICA (Angélica vestis) is the dress of certain Greek monks of St. Basil. These monks are divided into two classes; those who have received profession are called monks of the great and angelic habit, and novices are called monks of the lesser habit.

The monkish dress was also so called, which the laity in England were formerly in the habit of putting on shortly before their death, in order to take part in the prayers of the monks. A monkish dress thus dressed in the monastic habit in the hour of death is called in old books monachus ad succurrendum. The custom is said to exist still in Spain and Italy.

ANGELICAL DOCTOR. See AQUINAS.

ANGELICO, Giovanni da Fiesola, a Dominican friar of Italy, was born in 1387, and was a disciple of Giottino. He was employed by Nicholas V to paint historical subjects in his chapel. He was called by some the Angelic Painter, because he never took up his pencil without a prayer. He always painted religious subjects. He was offered the archbishopric of Florence as a reward for his talents by Nicholas V, but refused the honor. He died in 1448.

ANGELICUS CODEX, of the Greek New Test., belonging to the Angelica Library of the Augustinian monks at Rome (A 2, 13), designated formerly Pustenari (so called after its possessor, the cardinal Pasquini), and designated by the letter G, but now L 2, contains Acts from viii, 15, μοι τοι Στέφανοι, and the Catholic and Pauline epistles down to Heb. xii, 10, παρευρο

It belongs to the 9th c. and was collated by Schols, Fleck, Tischendorf (1840), and Tregelles (1840). (B. P.)

ANGELIERI, DONAVVENTURA, an Italian monk of the Order of the Minorites of St. Francis, was born at Marsala, in Sicily, near the middle of the 17th century. He is known by the singularity of the titles of two books which he published, followed by twenty-four others on the same subjects. The first is entitled Liber Vaticani; the second, Liber Ordinis Ordo, et Subordinatio Cunctorum, quoad Euse, Fierii, et Operari, Vigniti Quatuor Voluminibus Divisa; Pars Prima, etc. (Venice, 1686). This was published under the pseudonym Lorio Betani. The second volume was entitled Liber Magicae Academicae; Pars Secunda, Primo Eorum Naturallium, Secundum Infirmamentum, Tertium Incurabilitum Continens, etc. (ibid. 1687). See Hoefer, *Nov. ANGELIS, AGOSTINO d’, a Roman Catholic divine of Italy, was born in 1606 at Angri, in Naples. He joined the Order of the Somaschi, and lectured on philosophy and theology at Rome. In 1667 he was made bishop of Umbratello, and died in 1681. He wrote, Lectiones Theologicae de Deo Clare Vise, Omnis Scientiae, nos Prædestinante, Omnis Creatura in Summam Creatricibus (Rome, 1664).—De Deo ut Trino ut Incarnato (ibid. 1669).—Homilias ecclesiasticas cum Sacris Canones, Concilia, etc. (ibid. eod.).—De Recto Ubi Opinionis Probabilis (ibid. eod.). ANGELIUS appears to have been the immediate successor of Acaelius (q. v.) as Novatian bishop at Constantinople, A.D. 446, and to have held his see till his death, in 475. While defending the flourished he was known to the Homoussians, he fled from Constantinople (Socrates, Hist. Eccles., ii, 38). As a Homoussian he was persecuted and banished by Valens. He was consulted by Nectarius when Theodosius opened his plan for restoring peace to the divided Church in 888. Doubting his ability in disputed questions, the Pope lector, Sisinnius, to represent him. He also named him as his successor, but the people preferring Marcian, he yielded to them on the condition that if Sisinnius outlived Marcian he should be the next bishop.

Angelone was a religious writer of the Bene-dictine order. The time of his birth is unknown. While young, he entered the Monastery of Luxeuil from whence passed to the school of Falais. He then went to the court, where he received much favor from Lothaire. He afterwards retired to Luxeuil, and gave himself up entirely to the work upon the Scriptures. His style was clear and precise. He died in 864. He wrote in Latin commentaries On Genesis — On the Books of Kings (Rome, 1565) — On the Canticles (Cologne, 1551, by John Prail) — On the Four Gospels. See Hoefner, Nouv. Biog. Angels and Archangels, in Christian art. The early artistic representations of these reproduce the ideas concerning them which have prevailed in the Church, and these came before us in a series of monum-ents which date prior to the 5th century.

I. First Centuries. — These monuments are, for the first five hundred years or more, almost exclusively from the West, and probably not earlier than A.D. 400. D'Agincourt (Histoire de l'Art, v, 5) thinks that the earliest of these is a representation of Tobias and the angel in the Cemetery of St. Priscilla, and of the 5th century. This monument is a humble one, commonly assigned to apostles and other Scripture personages, but is without wings.

II. Fourth and Fifth Centuries. — The first representation of angels in mosaic is supposed to be that of the Church of St. Agatha at Ravenna, and believed by Cisamisius to belong to the beginning of the 6th century. The first to which a date can be positively assigned are those in the Church of Santa Maria Maggiore at Rome, put up by Xystus III A.D. 432—440. On the "Arcus Triumphalis" of this church is a series of mosaics of great interest, among them being the Worship of the Magi, in which four archangels appear as ministering to a king, and thus teaching the divinity of Christ. To this period is to be assigned the diptych of Milan, containing angels as created beings doing service unto Christ.

III. Sixth Century. — In this century we notice the following examples: the triumphal arch of the Church of Sta. Cosmea and Damiano at Rome, about 530; and the mosaics of St. Michael the Archangel at Ravenna, about 545.

IV. From A.D. 600 to 800. — Art monuments of this period are few in number, and contain nothing to call for special note. In the 7th and 8th centuries particularly, the wings of angels became more and more curtailed in proportion to the body. One such example in sculpture is Michael and the Dragon. See Michael.

Eastern and Greek. — Early monuments of Christian art in the East are very rare, many having been destroyed by the iconoclasts, the Saracens and Turks. The earliest example of an angel in a MS. of Genesis, Imperial Library at Vienna, believed to be of the 4th or 5th century. It is a human figure, winged, and without nimbus or other special attributes. The fiery sword, etc., spoken of in Gen. iii is there represented not as a sword in the hand of the angel, but as a sword which the angel has in his hand. Next in date is the Ascension, in a Syrian MS. of the gospels, A.D. 588, written and illuminated at Zagba, in Mesopotamia, in which is a representation of the order of angels designated as "thrones" and cherubim, known as a Tetramorphon (q. v.). Four other angels in human form and winged are represented as ministering to their Lord; two as bearing him up in their hands, two offering him crowns of victory, while two other go to men, asking of the apostles, "Why stand ye gazing up into heaven?" According to Dionysius (Celestial Hierarchy), celestial beings are divided into three orders. In the first are the "thrones," the seraphim, and cherubim; in the second are dominations, authorities, and powers; and in the third, principalities, archangels, and angels.

VI. In Later Greek Art. — The language of the Painter's Guide of Panselinos, a monk of Mount Athos in the 11th century, may be regarded as embodying the unchanging rules of Greek religious art from the 8th century to the present time. The writer says, as to the first order, that "the thrones are represented as wheels of fire compassed about with wings; their wings are full of eyes, and the whole is so arranged as to produce the semblance of a royal throne. The cherubim are represented by a head and two wings. The seraphim have six wings, whereof two rise upward to the head, and two are outward, and two are inward a few if for flight." Of those in the second order he says, "These are clothed in white tunics reaching to the feet, with golden girdles and green outer robes. They hold in the right hand staves of gold, and in the left a seal formed thus §." Of the third order he writes, "These are represented vestes, as warriors, and with golden girdles; and hold in their hands javelins and axes."

VII. Attributes of Angels. — The two sources of information respecting the attributes regarded as proper to angels in these early times are Dionysius and actual monuments. Dionysius says that angels are represented as of fire in regard to their intellectual qualities of man, and of his heavenly gaze, and the lordship and dominion which are naturally his; that bright vesture, and that which is of the color of fire, are emblematical of light and of the divine likeness; while sacerdotal vesture serves to denote his office in leading to divine and mystical contemplation, and the consecration of their whole life unto God. He mentions, also, girdles, staves or rods (significant of royal or princely power), spears and axes, instruments for measurement or of constructive art, among the insignia occasionally attributed to angels. Turning to monuments, we find to these to be notably:

1. The Human Form. — In the earlier monuments angels were represented as men, and either with or without wings. The prevailing opinion, however, of early Christian writers was that this manifestation was not actual flesh, but only a semblance.

2. Wings. — Heavenly messengers have been represented in all ages of the Church as furnished with wings. As to the number of these wings, two only appear in the earlier representations. No examples of four or of six wings are known earlier than the 9th century.

3. Vesture. — The vesture assigned to angels, in various ages of the Church, has ever been such as was associated in men's minds with the ideas of religious solemnity, and, in the later centuries, of sacerdotal ministry. In the mosaics of the 5th and 6th centuries, at Rome and Ravenna, we find white vestments generally assigned them, resembling those of apostles. In manuscripts believed to be of the 7th century (St. Sophia, Theodos. salonica), angels have colored outer robes over a long white tunic, and their wings colored too, red and blue prevailing — red as the color of flame, and symbolical of holy love; blue as significant of heaven, and of heavenly contemplation or divine knowledge.

4. The Nimbus. — Before the 5th century angels were sometimes represented without the nimbus, but after that era this ornament is almost invariably assigned to them.
5. The Wand of Power.—Only in exceptional instances, during the first eight centuries, are angels represented as bearing anything in the hand. Three examples may be cited, in mosaics, of the 6th century, at Ravenna, in which angels attendant on our Lord hold their hands, which may either represent the rod of divine power, or, as some have thought, the "golden reed"—the "measuring reed," assigned to the angel in Rev. xxi, 15, as in Ezek. xl, 3. The representations of archangels, particularly of Michael, as warriors with sword, or spear, and girdle, are of later date.

6. Instruments of Music.—In the Ravenna mosaic already referred to, the "Seven Angels" are represented holding trumpets in their hands. In the later traditions of Christian art, representations of angels as the "choristers of heaven" have been far more common, various instruments of music being assigned to them.—

ANGELS OF CHURCHES (Bishop). It does not appear that the bishops of the primitive Church were commonly spoken of under this title; nor, indeed, did it become the ordinary designation of the episcopal office.
Instances, however, of this application of it occur in the earlier Church history, e. g. in the Life of St. Cyprian (lib. Iv, c.
29), who so styles Serapion, bishop of Thomas.

By Presbyterian writers the angel of the vision has been variously interpreted: 1. Of the collective presbytery; 2. Of the presiding presbyter, which office, however, it is contended, was soon to be discontinued in the Christian Church, as a part of its foregoing corruption; Of the messengers sent from the several churches to St. John.
On the other hand, as St. John is believed on other grounds to have been pre-eminently the organizer of episcopacy throughout the Church, so here in this wonderful vision the holy apostle comes before us very remarkably in this special character; and in the text, in which he delivers, under divine direction, to each of the seven churches through its angel, many recognise a most important confirmation of the evidence on which they claim for episcopal government the precedent, sanction, and authority of the apostolic age.

Anglius Pacion (the angel of peace). In the ancient Greek Church et the catechumens were taught to offer in their prayers a special petition "for the angel of peace." St. Chrysostom often mentions this petition in his Homilies; as in his third, upon the Colossians, where he says, "Every man has angels attending him, and also the devil very busy about him. Therefore we pray for the angels for supplication for the angel of peace." In a sermon, he tells his auditory, "They might know there were angels of peace by hearing the deacons al-yways in their prayers bidding men pray for the angel of peace." This undoubtedly refers to the foremen-tioned form of prayers, wherein the catechumens are directed to ask of God the protection of "the angel of peace." See Bingham, Christian Antiquities, bk. xiv, ch. v, sec. 4.

1588 he was sent with an embassy to Cosmo de' Medici.
In 1592 he assisted at the assembly of the clergy at Angerboede, in Norse mythology, was a powerful giantess, a Jetten or Jote woman, wife of the evil das-mon Lokri, and by him mother of three frightful monsters—of the abominable goddess of death, Hel (Hela); of Fenris, a wolf, whose open mouth reaches heaven and earth; and of the huge snake Jormungand.

Angeronina (or Angeronia), in Roman mythology, was a woman, whom comittories are found.
For the most part, mythologists are agreed that she was the goddess of fear and apprehension. She was represented with a sealed mouth, in explanation of which it was said that secrecy and silence were the best remedy for fear and apprehension. Her statue stood in Rome on the altar of Volupia, goddess of pleasure, by whom she was ruled. Others say her sealed mouth denoted that the name of Rome was to be kept secret.

Angeronia was a festival in honor of the godess Angeronia, which was celebrated yearly on Dec. 12, when sacrifices were offered to her in the Temple of Volupia at Rome.

Angers, Councils of (Concilium Anedagense). Angers is an episcopal city of France, sixty-seven leagues from Paris, and the principal town in the department of Indre-et-Loire. It was here that the Council of
I. Held in 452, in order to consecrate a bishop to the see of Angers; Leo, archbishop of Bourges, presided.
The council, before separating, made twelve canons for the better maintenance of discipline. The first is to the effect that since the emperor had granted to the bishops the power of trying civil causes, the clergy should, in every case of difference among themselves, apply to them instead of the lay authorities. The clergy were forbidden to engage in any secular business.
Wandering monks were to be excommunicated; assaults and mutilation were forbidden. The fourth canon declines those of the clergy who would not abstain from intercourse with all "strange" women, i.e. all who were not near relations.
II. This council was held about 1055, against Berenger (q. v.), who maintained that the body and blood of our Lord are not really present in the eucharist, etc.
He was convicted in twelve councils, of which this is one.
III. Held Oct. 22, 1273, by John de Monseoreau, archbishop of Tours. Five canons were made, one of which punished excommunicated clergy with the loss of the profits of their benefices as long as the period of excom-unication lasted. The second canon forbade the bishop's officials to require any fee for sealing letters of orders, under pain of suspension or excommunication.
IV. This council was held March 12, 1365, by Simon Renou, archbishop of Tours, and seven of his suffragians. Thirty-four articles were drawn up, the first re-leaving to proceedings at law, others to the immunities of Church, and a few tend directly to the correction of morals.

V. A provincial council of Tournai was held at Angers in July, 1448, by John, archbishop of Tours, with his suffragans. Seventeen regulations were made for the reformation of abuses. The third orders all priests to say the Office for the Dead, with three lessons at least, every day, and the Office of the Holy Ghost. The fourth forbids giving the daily distribution to those of the clergy who were not present at the holy office. The fifth forbids all talking in the choir. The council also orders, in canon seven, that the Word of God should be preached only in churches, and with becoming dignity; and forbids the preacher to make use of loud cries or extravagant gestures: it also forbids clandestine marriages, and the silly tumult and noise made in derision when any one marries a second or third time, commonly called chartarur.

VI. Held in 1588, being a continuation of one held at Tours in the same year, which, on account of the plague, which had broken out in that city, was transferred to Anvers. Several regulations were made: First, upon the subject of holy baptism, directions were given as to the choice of god-parents; it was also forbidden to be-batize, even conditionally, in cases where that sacrament was not administered by hand, provided the matter and form of words and intention had been preserved. Secondly, confirmation, the holy eucharist, the sacrifice of the mass, marriage, orders, the celebration of the festivals, and the worship of relics were treated of.
Thirdly, the subjects of reform, ecclesiastical discipline, the duty of bishops, canons, curates, etc., were discussed; among other regulations, the monks were ordered to preserve the tonsure large and distinct, and to shave their beards. Fourthly, a rigid abstinence from meat every Wednesday and during all Advent was enjoined them. With respect to nuns, it was forbidden to appoint any one to be abbess or prioress under forty years of age and eight of profession.

Matters concerning the burial of the dead, ecclesiastical jurisdiction, visitations, the preservation of ecclesiastical property, seminaries, schools, and universities were also discussed in this council, and the regulations agreed upon were confirmed by a bull of Gregory XIII of the same year, and published by order of king Henry III. See Labbé, Concil. xv, 1001.

Angeya, in Norse mythology, was one of the nine Jote, or giant, maidens, who bore the god Heimdall on the border of the earth. They were all mother to him, Odin being his father.

Angilbert, archbishop of Milan, lived in the first half of the 5th century. Being called to the archiepisco-capacy in 429, he applied himself first to the re-es-establishment of discipline in his diocese, and summoned from France two monks, Leutgaire and Nildemar, who assisted Anngillo (called Roccadore), a Neapolitan painter, lived about 1450, and studied under Antonio Sodoma. He executed and painted some works for the churches and palaces of Naples, one of the best being a picture in the Church of San Lorenzo, representing the Virgin and Infant, with saints. He died about 1459.

Angiolo, Francesco, an Italian Jesuit, was born in 1735. He studied at Bologna, and was appointed professor of literature at the college of the Jesuits in Modena, where he died in 1785. At the period of the suppression of this order in Italy, he retired to Verona, where he translated into Italian the history of the Jews, by Josephus—Gioseffo Flavio, Delle Antichità de Giudei (Verona, 1779-80; Rome, 1792; Milan, 1821).
He also translated into Italian several tragedies of Sophocles and Euripides—Elettra, Edipo, Antigone.—Trag-gedie de Sifo, et le Ciclope de Euripide, Traduction Ildustrée d'Agar (Rome, 1785). The translator here united certain poems in Italian, Latin, Greek, and Hebrew.
At the tidings that the empress Catherine of Russia accorded an asylum to the members of the Order of Jesuits, Angiolini went to Russia with his two brothers, and became professor in the newly founded universities of Yolotsk, Wit胙sk, Mohilow, and Moscow.
He left Italy in 1780, and was the first to introduce the establishment in Russia, continued by Ignatius Peter Buoni down to 1820. It is uncertain whether or not this work was ever published. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog.

Angiras, in Hindu mythology, are certain deities emanating from Brahman, to whom he committed the power of mothers. They are thefellows of the similar deities Vasis-tari, Brigu, Daksha, Marish, Narada, Palaha, Pitastya, and Varishka.

Angitia (the strangler), in Roman mythology, was a goddess of the inhabitants round about the Fucinian Sea, who, well versed in the knowledge of poisons and their antidotes, received her name from her skill in strangling snakes. Some have placed her in Greek mythology, where she therefore called her a daughter of Eetes, and thus a sister of Medea.

Angles, Joseph, was a Franciscan of the province of Compostella, and native of Valencia, Spain, who rendered himself famous in the 16th century. He governed the Reformed nuns of Madrid in the quality of concessor, and finally was raised to the see of Bosa, in Sardinia. He wrote, Flores Theologicorum Quaestionum in Primum Librum Sententiarum (Lyons, 1584)—Flores in Secundum Librum Sentent. (ibid, 1587, 1597)—Flores in Tertium Librum Sentent.—Flores in Quintum Li-brum (Burgos, 1885).—Landon, Ecles. Dict. s. v.

Anglican Councils, a designation given to the English general councils, of which the precise locality is unknown; e. g. A.D. 766, one of bishops, presbyters, and abbots, held by archbishop Cuthbert to appoint June 5 to be kept in memory of the martyrdom of St. Boniface and his companions; A.D. 797 or 798, held by Ethelheard preparatory to his journey to Rome, to oppose the archbishopric of Lichfield.

Anglo-Calvinists is a name given by some writers to the members of the Church of England, as agreeing with the other Calvinists in most points excepting Church government.

Anglo-Saxon Versions. The gospelss, besides being published by Marshall and Thorpe, were also publiished in 1865 by Bosworth; and an admirable edition of the Anglo-Saxon gospels is now in course of publication at the Cambridge University Press, under the editorship of the Rev. W. W. Skeat. In this edition the readings of all the MSS., including the Lindisfarne and Rushworth glosses, are carefully given. Excellent descriptions of the MSS. and of the printed editions are furnished in the introductions to part ii (St.
Mark) and part iii (St. Luke). (B. P.)

Ango, Pierre, a French Jesuit, lived in the last half of the 17th century. He was a native of Caen, and wrote several works on physics: L'Optique, divisée en trois livres, ou l'on démontre: 1st La Propogation et les Proprietes de la Lumière; 2nd La Vision; 3rd La Figure et la Disposition des Verres qui servent a la perfectionner (Paris, 1682).—Pratique Générale des Fortifications, pour les tracer sur le papier et sur la terre sans aucun borné à aucune méthode particulière (Moulins, 1679). He also wrote other works. See Angradius. See Aigradus.

Angoulême, Louis Emmanuel de Valois, duc d’, a French noble and prelate, was born in 1596. He was at first comte d’Alais, then bishop of Agde, and finally Anghrani (Agyriani, or Aygynani), Michael, (more commonly known as Michael of Bologna, where he was born about the middle of the 14th century and entered the order of Carmelites), studied at Paris, and in 1354 was named regent of the Carmelite convent in that city; subsequently, about 1372, he was appointed definitor of the province of Bologna. The great schism which divided the Roman Church after the death of Gregory XI caused vast division also among the religious orders, and especially among the Carmelites. The convents of France, Spain, Scotland, and Naples attached themselves to the party of Clement VII, as did also Bernard, the seventeenth general of the order, who for that reason was deposed by pope Urban; and in a general chapter held at Bruges in 1373, and in another at Milan in 1381, Michael Angriani was elected in his place. However, in 1386, he was deposed by Urban himself without any cause being assigned, upon which he retired into the convent at Bologna, where he died, Nov. 16, 1400 (according to the most probable opinion; Trichemius says in 1415). His works are, Questiones Disputatae; Commentarii in Psalmos, commonly called opus victoriae inconscriti (Alcalá, 1524)—a work on the Conception of the Blessed Virgin—a book on St. Matthew's Gospel—a book on St. Luke—Postils on St. John—Postils on the Apocalypse—Sermons—Dictionarium Divinum (unfinished)—and many others.

Anghraenau, in Hindu mythology, was the planet Clow, or Mongalen (our Mars); also the genius Div, over whom he rules, and whom he leads through his great path.

Anglier, Michel, a celebrated French sculptor, and brother of Francois, was born at Eu, Normandy, in 1612. He visited Rome in 1641, where he became the pupil of Algardi. He executed works for the sculptor of St. John the Baptist, and for several colleges of Paris. In 1651 he returned to Paris and assisted his brother in his works for the mausoleum of the duke of Montmorency, his greatest work. Michel made for queen Anne of Austria the principal sculptures in the Church of Val de Grace, of which the Nativity, in marble over the altar, is considered his masterpiece; also the sculptures of the great altar of St. Denis de la Chartre. This artist was professor of the Academy of Arts in Paris, and wrote fourteen discourses on sculpture. He died at Paris in 1656.

Anguli Mai, in Hindu mythology, are the books which the Hindus generally call Karrick, after a pious philosopher, who had been taught by Buddha himself.

Angus, John, a Dissenting minister, was born at Styford, Northumberland, England, in July, 1724. When sixteen years old, he entered the University of Edinburgh, where he remained two years; afterwards removed to London, and studied under the tuition of Mr. Eames and Dr. Marrat; was ordained to the pastorate of the Dissenting congregation in Bishop's Stortford, Hertford, Oct. 26, 1748, which he held till the time of his death, Dec. 22, 1802. Mr. Angus belonged to the Calvinistic school of thought, yet was singularly free from any bitterness towards those who conscientiously differed from him. In all the duties of the pastoral office he was diligent and faithful; those of friendship and good neighborhood, almost unparalleled. See Theological Magazine, April, 1808, p. 138.

Anghusus (1), a Scottish bishop, became bishop of the Isles in 1427, and was witness to a charter in the same year. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 304.

Anghusus (2), a Scottish bishop, was made bishop of the Isles Nov. 25, 1475. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 805.

Anb-naru, the Egyptian abole or heaven of Osiris.

Anhur (that which brings to heaven) was an Egyptian deity who is always represented as in a marching attitude and robed in long clothing. He wears a head-dress of four plumes, with the head of the ram, the emblem of celestial deity. He holds a cord in his hands, which is supposed to symbolize one of the forces of the universe. He was a form also of the solar god, Shu, and in that character he had for his consort the goddess Tefnut (the heavenly bow). He was the Anaru, or master of the Mers of the Great House, whose anhur was chiefly worshipped in the city and nome of Abot, which was situated on the eastern bank of the Nile, in the Thebaid, and was afterwards called by the Greeks Tithinis.

Anianus, Sr., the successor of St. Mark in the patriarchate of Alexandria, was a shoemaker whom Mark is said to have converted soon after his entrance into the city, and whom he is said to have established on the episcopal chair two years afterwards. St. Anianus governed the Church of Alexandria about twenty-two years—viz. four years under Mark, and eighteen years after his death. He is supposed to have died Nov. 26, A.D. 80; nevertheless, the Roman martyrology marks his festival April 25—vix. April festival—vix. His other festivals are:

Anianus, called also Adrianus by Sozomen, presbyter of Antioch, was ordained bishop of that Church at the Council of Seleucia, A.D. 359, in the room of Eudoxius, who, together with Acacius and others, had been deposed. The Acacian party immediately after the synod made a new bishop, who occupied him into the hands of the civil authorities, by whom he was sent into exile. The subsequent fortunes of Anianus are unknown. Nicephorus gives four years to his episcopate, but his numbers are not to be trusted.

Anianus, an Egyptian monk who lived about the year A.D. 401. He composed a Chronology, in part agreeing with that of Dionysius Exiguus. He died at Eusebia, then called Eusebium. It is mentioned by Georgius Syncellus.

Anianus, Sr. (vulgarily called St. Agnas), bishop of Orleans, was born in the 4th century at Vienne, on the Rhone. In his early youth he left his home and retired to a cell which he had built for himself, where he spent his time in reading, prayer, and mortification. After a time he left his solitude to place himself among the disciples of Eusebius, bishop of Cæsarea, and delitered him into the hands of the civil authorities, by whom he was sent into exile. The subsequent fortunes of Anianus are unknown. Nicephorus gives four years to his episcopate, but his numbers are not to be trusted.

Anichini, Pietro, an Italian engraver, lived in the 17th century. His principal works are, A Holy Family (1655)—The Good Samaritan; and the Portrait of Cosimo di Tuscany.

Anignon, Michael, See Aniuntus.

Animals or living creatures are often represented in sacred buildings within mouldings and on tombs merely as ornaments from early days, such as dolphins, doves, griffins, monsters, birds, and the like. In the medieval period, effigies rest their feet on a lion or dog, the types of constancy and strength; but in the catacombs and in the images of the JsonConvert, the lamp, the lamb, the hart, the stag, the dove, peacocks, and fish are emblems. The lion represented vigilance; the lamb, innocence; the hart, flight from sin; the hare or the horse alluded to the Christian course (1 Cor. ix. 24; 2 Tim. iv. 7); the dolphin typified speed and diligence, and, from heathen fables of Elijan and Pliny, loving affection; while birds, Anjos, Luiz dos, a Portuguese monk born at Oporto, lived in the beginning of the 17th century. He entered the Order of the Hermits of St. Augustine, and became confessor to Alexis de Menezes, archbishop of Prague. He conceived the design of compiling the history of his order in the form of annals, and for that purpose traversed Spain, France, and Italy to collect materials; he, however, only published the Life of St. Augustine (Coimbra, 1612), and died in 1625. He also wrote the Garden of Portugal, an account of some of the saints and illustrious women of that country.

Anka, in Oriental mythology, was a monstrous bird that had the power of reason and speech. He still lives on the mountain of Kar, and was in the world before Adam. The Persians call him Simorg, the Talmud Jakneth.

Anka, a minor Egyptian goddess, was the wife of Khnum the creating spirit, and the Anais of the Greek writers.

Anker-hold is the cell or place of abode of an anchoret or anchoress.

Anker-but is a North-country term for the hut of an anchoret.

Ankh (life) is the name given by the ancient Egyptians to the emblem in the form of a handled cross, somewhat resembling the Tau of St. Anthony's cross. The cause of its significance is unknown, but as an emblem of life it is always borne in the hands of the gods, and symbolically laid on the lips of the mummy to revive it, or held over the king at his mystical baptism. As a hieroglyphic, it is simply the determinative of all things relating to the ear. It is the most common of all the Egyptian symbols.

Ankhiam, in Egyptian mythology, is a peculiar sacred flower. It was probably the lotus.

Annam, among the ancient Egyptians, was the name of a high sacrental dignity, the emblem and vestment of which was a panther's skin, and the long lock of hair peculiar to the infantile Horus. The title is said to mean literally "husband of his mother." It was specially connected with the worship of the Ithyphallic god Khem.

Anneruthen (salt lake of the sea), in Egyptian mythology, is a mystical lake near the heavenly Nile in Hades. It is figured in the vignette to ch. cx of the Ritual of the Dead.

Annuff is a mystical epithet applied to the eye of Horus in ch. cxxv of the Ritual of the Dead.

Ann (or Annat), in Scotch law, signifies the half-year's stipend payable for the vacant half-year after the death of a clergyman, to which his family or nearest of kin have right, under an act of the Scottish Parliament passed in 1672. It is a right that does not belong to the clergyman himself, but to his next of kin absolutely, and therefore can neither be assigned nor disposed of by him, nor attached for his debts. See ANNATES.

Anna was the Accadian name of the god Anu.

Anna Commenna. See COMENNA, ANNA.

Anna, Matthew, was a Dominican of Cefalu, in Sicily, who rendered himself celebrated in the 17th century by his Italian poetry. He published at Palermo, in 1641, a poetical paraphrase of Ps. cxviii, and the tragedies of Thomas Alcina and St. Margaret.

Anna Perenna, in Roman mythology, was a goddess or nymph whom the Romans honored in a joyous feast, which was annually held on March 15. She is often confounded with Anna, sister of Dido. The story runs as follows: After the death of Dido, Jarbas, king of the Getuli, conquered Carthage, causing Anna to flee to Battus, king of Malta; and when her brother, Pygmalm, threatened her and Battus with war, she fled to Italy to Zanes; but here also she was threatened with death by a bishop named Lavinius. Warned by Dido in a dream, Anna threw herself into the river Numicus, and was afterwards honored as a nymph of the river under the name of Anna Perenna. Some call Anna Perenna the goddess of the moon, others a nymph who brought up Jupiter. As Anna is the feminine of the Latin year, and Perenna signifies duration, she probably held her place as one of the constant goddesses of Latium. In a poem by Statius, Anna was the first of the Graces, and the personification of the river Tiber. Her festival, occurring in the spring of the year, when the earth begins to yield fruits, possibly suggests the thought that the old saying of the distribution of bread by her to starving Roman soldiers belongs to the oldest traditions of her being; and that the conception of her as a river nymph denotes the fertilizing virtue of water.

Annalist, an officer in a religious house who was authoritatively and solemnly commissioned by its ruler or chapter to write the annals of the institution, and to record such public events as bore upon religious or ecclesiastical questions. Many such annals and records have been published.

Annals (or Annals), in Church phrase, is (1) a term used to describe anniversary masses for the faithful departed in general, which were commonly said on All-souls’-day, or for the souls of particular individuals upon the anniversary of their decease. These latter were sometimes solemnized half-yearly, or on the festival of the particular saint. Other terms for annals were Year-minds and Obits. (2) The written records of religious houses. (3) This term was also secondarily applied to masses said for deceased persons, either daily or weekly, throughout the year succeeding their decease, or annually, on the anniversary of their decease, for the space of three, seven, or twenty-one years.

Annan, John Ebeneser, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Baltimore, Md., about 1803. He prepared for college in the Classical School at Gettysburg, Pa., and graduated at Dickinson College in 1824. On his graduation, he was chosen professor of mathematics in Miami University, Oxford, O., but remained there only a few years, when he entered Princeton Theological Seminary, and after attending one session, was licenced May 16, 1829. He labored for a few months as a missionary in Ohio, and was ordained at an evangelist at Baltimore in December of the same year. He was installed as pastor of the Presbyterian church at Petersburg, Va., July 10, 1830; but was overcome with a fever, and died Aug. 10 of the same year. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, IX, iv, 14.

Annan, Robert, an Associate Reformed minister, was born in the town of Cupar, Fife, Scotland, in 1742. He was educated at the University of St. Andrews, and studied theology under the venerable Alexander Moncrieff, one of the original Seceders. He was licensed by the Associate Presbytery of Perth when only about nineteen years of age, and shortly after sent by the Synod as a missionary to the American colonies. He arrived in New York in the summer of 1761, and, after four years of labor as an itinerant, he was ordained and installed as pastor at Neelytown, N. Y., in 1765. During the struggle for independence, Mr. Annan was a warm advocate of the American cause, and labored both publicly and privately to that end. In 1783 he removed to Boston as pastor of the Federal Street Church. In 1786 he accepted a call from the Old Scots Church, Spruce Street, Philadelphia. He removed to Baltimore in 1801 or 1802, where he remained in charge of a new congregation formed in that city until 1812. He then retired to a home which he had purchased in York County, Pa., where he remained until his death, Dec. 5, 1819. He published, An Overture Illustrating and Defending the Doctrines of the Westminster Confession of Faith (1787)—A Concise and Faithful Narrative of the Steps that led to the Division in the Associate Body of the United States (1789)—The Universal Salvation (1790)—The Connection between Civil Government and Religion (ed.). See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, IX, iv, 11.

Annay (God) is the Turanian word for the idea of deity in the abstract. It is derived from An, "a star."

Annat (or Annates), François, a French ecclesiastic, was born at Bayonne, Feb. 6, 1590, and became a Jesuit in 1607. He was professor of philosophy at Toulouse six years, and of divinity seven years. He was invited to Rome to act as censor-general of the books published by the Jesuits and theologian to the general of the society. On his return to his own province, he was appointed rector of the colleges of Montpellier and Toulouse. In 1643 he assisted as deputy of his province at the eighth Congregation General of the Jesuits, held at Rome. He was appointed to discharge the office of provincial of France, and while engaged in this he was chosen confessor to the king (1654), which office he filled for sixteen years. He died at Paris June 14, 1670. He wrote several books, some in Latin, which were published in 3 vols. 4to (Paris, 1660).

Annat, Pierre, a French ecclesiastic writer, nephew of François, was born in 1638 at Villecomtat, in Bourgogne. He was for a time professor of philosophy at Toulouse, and entered the Congregation of the Christian Doctrine, of which he was elected general in 1694. He was generally regarded as an exceptionally modest man, of perfect simplicity and honesty. He died at Paris in 1715. He wrote Methodus ad Poniaram Theologic Apparatus, in Gratiam Candidatorum (Paris, 1700; Venice, 1701). See Hoefer, Nat. Biogr. Générale, s. v.

Anne, St. See Anna, St.

Annedotus, a Chaldean fish-deity, a form of Hea, said to have had the body of a fish entire, but underneath his fish’s head to have had a human head, while human feet appeared under his tail. This monster was said to spend the whole day among men without taking any food, teaching them letters, science, and the principles of every art, the rules for the foundation of towns, the building of temples, the measurement and boundaries of lands, seed-time and harvest—all that could advance civilization; and then at sunset he returned to the sea and passed the night in the vast region of waves, for he was amphibious. See Lenormant, Chaldæan Magic, p. 157.

Annemondus (otherwise spelled Aumemonus, Chamenmundus, Enemundus, and commonly St. Chau- mond), saint and martyr, was bishop of Lyons, and was also called Dafnisius. He succeeded Viventius in the see of Lyons about the middle of the 7th century. Mild, humble, prudent, just, and full of zeal and vigilance, he discharged all the duties of a faithful bishop. About 660, under the ministry of Bathilda, widow of Clovis II, he was accused of a state crime, and upon the strength of a royal order for him to attend court to justify himself, he was inveigled into a journey thither and murdered in the road, in the territory of Chalon-sur-Saône. His body was transported to Lyons, and his festival is kept Sept. 28.

Annenberg, in German antiquity, is a mountain near Schöningen, in Brunswick, on which was a heathen altar for sacrifices. The superstition of the people tells of nightly dances of the spirits of forefathers, and many fables of spirital appearances are recounted.

Annibale, Domenico, cardinal, representative, and arch-priest of the basilica of the Vatican, was sent in 1710 into Austria as nuncio extraordinary. In 1727 he published at Urbino the following work, Menologium Georgorum, Iusus Basilii Imperatoris Graecae olum Editum, Municiporum et Liberalitatis S. P. Benedicti XIII in Tres Partes Divisum, etc., in Mag. Bibl. Eccles. p. 478.
ANNIGONI, Giovanni, one of the first-fruits of the Methodist mission in Italy, was born at Parma in 1855. He labored for several years in his native place as a local preacher. Four years before his death he was called into the ministry, and in Padua, where he first labored in this capacity, his preaching was very popular, and he gave promise of usefulness. His last station was Parma. He died Nov. 24, 1872. See Minutes of the British Wesleyan Conference, 1873, p. 46.

Annings, in Greenland mythology, is the personified moon, the brother of Malina (sun). Like most of the deities of the Greenlanders, these gods were once men. Annings loved his beautiful sister, and in the latter, order to discover her unknown lover, made her hands black with soot, and rubbed it on the face of him clasping her in his arms. Thereupon she fled out of the hut and lighted some moss to see who her lover was. The latter, however, advanced toward her, and she was compelled to flee, as he did not desist from his pleasure. He lighted a flagot, which soon went out, and he was compelled to follow her in her own light; for which reason the moon gives a more dim light than the sun. He became the moon, and she was changed into the sun, always followed around by Annings. Plagued by his passion, he does not eat, and gets thinner and thinner (last quarter), until he disappears entirely (new moon); then he goes hunting sea- lions, and returns stronger and better-looking (first quarter), until he appears in all his beauty and splendor (full moon). The spots on the moon are the marks of the soot which Malina rubbed on his face.

Annona, in Roman mythology, is the blessed goddess of the yearly harvest. She was prayed to for rich gifts of the field and cheap prices of food, and was represented as a female, her right shoulder bare, otherwise dressed. In her right hand she carried an ear of corn, in her left a corona.

Annori, Hieronymus, a Reformed theologian of Switzerland, was born Sept. 12, 1697, at Basle, where he prepared himself for the ministry. In 1739 he was called as pastor to Wallenburg, where he died, Oct. 10, 1770. He was one of the prominent preachers of the Gospel in his day, and the author of many hymns, which were published in 1739 under the title Erb- cher, oder Choralhymnus, and which were afterwards translated for the Basle hymn-book published in 1743. See Koch, Geschichte des deutschen Kirchenliedes, vi, 95 sq.; Haagenbach, Kirchengeschichte der 18. und 19. Jahrhunderts (Basle), p. 182 sq. (B. P.)

Annotinum Pascha, a festival celebrated, according to some authorities, on the day following the octave of Easter. It is placed on the Thursday before Ascension-day in an ancient ritual of Vienna; but later authorities mention it as having been celebrated on various days, as on the Saturday after Easter-day.

As to the meaning of the expression there are various opinions. Several of the older authorities supposed it to be the memory of the Easter of the preceding year. If this anniversary was specially observed, when it fell in the Lent of the actual year it would naturally be omitted or transferred to a period when the fast was over. Probably, however, Annotinum Pascha is a term equivalent to anniversar Pascha; and it is so called because in olden times at Rome those who had been baptized at Easter celebrated the anniversary of their baptism in the next year by solemn services. To this calling to mind of baptismal vows the collections of the Gregorian sacramentary for the day refer. It had become obsolete before 1100.

Annals. See Annales.

Annularia are chaplain priests who celebrated the commemoration masses for the departed on their anniversaries. Their usual pay was three marks yearly. At Exeter there were twenty-four, who acted as subdeacons of the cathedral; at Wells, fourteen; both corporations lived in a collegiate manner. The name was preserved at Llandaff so late as 1575.

Annulet (a little ring) is a small, flat fillet encircling a column, etc., used either by itself or in connection with other mouldings. It is used, several times repeated, under the ovolo or echinus of the Doric capital.

Annunucbi, in the magical texts, is the name of certain Assyrian deities, the offspring of the deity Anu, or the sky. They inhabited the lower world, and were called the deities of the earth.

Anados, in Greco-Babylonian mythology, was the son of Kissare and Assaras, and the first member of the Divine Triad. His analogue was the Anu of the Assyrians.

Anouke was an Egyptian warlike goddess, possibly of Syrian origin, represented as a woman with a spear in her hand, and with a peculiar crown formed of high feathers curving upwardly from the helmet, and a white bonnet upon her head. She was the third member of the great Nubian Triad, and her worship dates to the period of Osirisine III, of the 12th dynasty. Her festival took place on the 28th of Paophi and the 30th of Atyerh.

Anp, in ancient Egyptian mythology, was one of the sacred names of the ram deity Meha.

Angt was another form of the name of the Egyptian goddess Anuk.

Anquetil, Louis Pierre, a French ecclesiast and historian, was born in Paris, Jan. 21, 1728. He became director of the Academy at Rheims, and in 1757 published a history of that city. In 1759 he became prior of the Abbey of la Roë in Anjou, and soon after director of the College of Senlis. In 1766 he obtained the curacy or priory of Château- Renard, near Montargis, which he exchanged at the commencement of the Revolution for the curacy of La Villette, in the neighborhood of Paris. During the Reign of Terror, he was imprisoned at Saint-Lazare. He became a member of the second class of the National Institute, and was soon employed in the office of the Minister of Foreign Affairs. He died Sept. 6, 1808. He left a number of historical works; but his style is not commendable, and he seems to lack the elements of a true historian. For a list of his works, see Biographie Universelle, s. v.

Anru, a name of the Egyptian Elysium, which occurs in the Ritual of the Dead.

Anrut (the sterile) was the Egyptian name of one of the mystical regions of Hades. It is described in ch. xvii of the Ritual of the Dead. It was also the northernmost gate of the house of Osiris in the Egyptian Karmet.

Ansa (statues) was the name given by the Koranic writers to the sacred stones, or betylia, which were worshipped and anointed with oil by the ancient Arabians.

Ansaldi, Carlo Agostoni, brother to Casto T., was born Sept. 28, 1771, and assumed the habit of the Order of St. Dominic. He is well known by his beautiful poetical effusions, all of which are consecrated to divine subjects, but he was not less celebrated as a preacher.

Ansaldi, Casto Innocente, an Italian antiquarian, was born May 7, 1710, at Piacenza. In 1726 he joined the Order of the Dominicans, and studied at Bologna and Rome. In 1735 he went to Naples as professor of philosophy; in 1745 he was made professor of theology at Brescia; went to Ferrara in 1759; then to Turin where he died, in 1774. He wrote, >Patriarchi Joseph Religio a Crimenibus Basiagui Vindicata< (Naples, 1728, and often) —>De Martyribus sinae Sanguine altera adv. Dodwellium Diss. (Milan, 1744) —>De Formis Judaorum Buciaca (Brescia, 1745) —>Herodoto Historie Indicii Vindex (ibid. 1746) —>De Authenticis S. Scripturae quae habet SS. Petri et Pauli (Verona, 1747) —>De Practico Sacco ad Hebraice ante Capitivum Cognatum (Milan, 1748) —>De Baptismate in Spiritu et Igmi (ibid. 1752), etc. See Jöcher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon, Suppl. s. v.; Mazzucchelli, Scrittori d'Italia, s. v. (B. F.)

Anselmi, Giovanni Andrea, an Italian oil and fresco painter, was born, according to Soprani, at Volfri, a small town near Genoa, in 1584. His principal work was the cupola in the Church of the Santissima Annunziata at Genoa. There are many of his works in the churches and palaces of that city. He died in 1638.

Ansaloni, Giordano, an Italian missionary, was born at Sant'Angelo, in Sicily. He pursued his studies and became a Franciscan. In 1625 he was sent to the Philippine Islands, where he was appointed to serve the sick-hospital at Manila. Here he learned the Chinese language, and in 1632 was chosen to go as a missionary to the Christians in Japan. He died a martyr, Nov. 18, 1634. He completed a Latin translation of the Lives of the saints of his order, from the Spanish of Ferdinand Castiello.

Ansaloni, Vincenzo, a Bolognese historical painter, lived, according to Lanzi, about 1615, and studied under Ludovico Carracci. He has some fine works in the chapel of the family of Floraventi, in the church of Sant Stefano in Bologna, representing the Martyrdom of St. Sebastian, and in the Church of the Celestine Monks there is a fine work representing the Virgin and Infant in the clouds, with Sts. Roch and Sebastian beneath. Zani says he died young.

Anser was an early Chaldean deity, after whom the town of Assur was named.

Anser, André Joseph, a French historian and ecclesiastical writer, was born in Artois, 1759, became a Benedictine, and attached himself to the Order of Malta. He was an advocate of Parliament and doctor of laws of the faculty of Paris. He was also made prior of Villecins, and a member of the academies of Arras and the Arcadia of Rome. He died in 1790. The works of Anser are, >Exposition sur le Conçue des Canons de Soloman< (1727, 12mo) —>Histoire de St. Maur, Abbé de Glunfey (1772, 12mo) —>Esprit de St. Vincent de Paul (1780, 12mo) —>Histoire de St. Firacre (1784).

Anaspasa (or Creux-Anaspasa), the handled Taurus, was the emblem of life which was always held in the hands of the Egyptian deities. The nature of the object and the reason of its symbolism are unknown. See AKH.

Ansbach, St., was born in the early part of the 7th century at Chaussé, a village in Vexin, France. He was bishop of Rouen after the death of St. Ouen, in A.D. 688, and assisted the states of the kingdom assembled at Chichy by Thierry III. Pepin, mayor of the palace, received by the enemies of Ansbart, banished him to a monastery in Hainaut to end his days in the performance of religious duties. He died in 698. His body was conveyed to the Abbey of Fontenelle. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Anschutz, Johann Christoph, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Dec. 11, 1745, at Wiedersbach, in Henneberg. He studied at Coburg and Leipsic, and was inducted at Bürenstein. In 1761 he was called to Liebenau; and finally, in 1765, to St. Michael in Saxony, where he died, June 21, 1814. He is the author of twenty-six hymns, which were published under the title Geistliche Lieder nach bekanntem Melodien (1788). (B. F.)

Anse, COUNCILS OF (Concilium Aenarianum or Anesae). These council were held in Anse, a small town of France, on the Salome, in the diocese of Lyon.

I. Held in A.D. 990, concerning the privileges of the Abbey of Cluny, which were confirmed. Several canons were published, of which none only remain. See Martene, Theaur. Anec. tom. iv.

II. Held in 994, on discipline. See Mansi, Concil. tom. i.

III. Held in 1025. At this council, Gaustin of Mâcon complained against Bouchard, archbishop of Vienne, for having ordained certain monks of Cluny, although that monastery was in the diocese of Mâcon. Odilon, the abbot, exhibited the pope's privilege exempting the monks of Cluny from the jurisdiction of their own bishop. The council, however, declared the privilege to be null and void, being contrary to the canons. See Labbe, Concil. ix. 859.

IV. Held in 1092, concerning the ordination of the monks of Cluny. The papal privilege, which permitted the monks of this monastery to be ordained by any bishop whom the abbot chose, was declared to be contrary to the canons, and null.

V. Held in 1070, concerning a donation made to the abbey of Tibe-Barbe.

VI. Held in 1077, on discipline.

VII. Held in 1106, at which Anselm of Canterbury was present. Hugo, archbishop of Lyons, demanded a subsidy to repay the expenses of his voyage to Jerusalem.

VIII. Held in 1112, against investitures.

IX. Held in 1299, under Henry de Villars, archbishop of Lyons. See Gall. Christ. tom. iv.

Anseigrt (or Anusus, Ansersus, Anselius, finally Anselm), bishop of Troy, was raised to the episcopacy in A.D. 912, and became, according to Mabillon, chancellor to the king of France, Ralph or Rodulp. Prelate and warrior according to the spirit of the epoch, he was wounded in 925 in an engagement with the Normans, who at that time ravaged Burgundy. In 949 Hugo, the grand, duke of France, sent him against Louis IV of Outremer. In an encounter with Robert, count of Troy, he returned to the court of Ortho, who gave him more troops with which to besiege the episcopal city; but these abandoned him after the defeat of their compatriots before the gates of Sens. He then attempted to pillage. The authors of Gallia Christiana put the tragic event in 959, and suppose that the bishop was restored to his bishopric the year following; but the first date is more trustworthy. See Anes, Roum. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Anselm, canon and theologian of the Church of St. Lambert at Liege, and afterwards dean of Namur, lived about the year 1000. The bishop of Cambrai was interested in him on account of his eminent merit, and his successor went with Anselm on a pilgrimage to Rome. He died, it is supposed, about 1056. He prepared >Histoire des Évêques de Liége>, commenced by the canon Alexander, and continued by Anselm from about 1050 to 1056. The work is composed of two parts—the first containing a history of the first twenty-seven bishops of Liege, and the second the bishops down to Vazon inclusive. This second part is found in Martène, from an ancient MS, more than six centuries old, found in the Abbey of St. Hubert, which belonged to M. de Craszier. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Anselm, Sr., born at Mantois, of noble parents, was raised in 1061 to the bishopric of Lucca, by Pope Alexander II, having received investiture at the hand of the emperor Henry, by the ring and pastoral staff; he was afterwards seized with remorse, resigned his see, and retired to Cluny. In 1078 Gregor IV recalled him, but on this occasion, he consecrated him in the bishopric. This pope employed him in various legations, and, among others, in 1084, charged him with the office of reconciling to the Church, as his legate in all Italy, those who deserted the emperor's cause. He died in 1086, having written two books against Guibert the antipope and his followers; and a work, composed of sentences from various authors, to show that the powers of the Church are not under the control of the king or Cesar. See Canisius, Antiq. Lecti. vi, 202, 285; Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, 150.

Anselm, NICOLAS. See ASCELIN.

Anselm, a friar of the Abbey of St. Remi at Rheims, was a writer of the 11th century. Nothing is known of his life except that he wrote in 1056, at the wish of his priest, a history of the foundation of the Church of St. Remi, in 1049, by pope Leo IX. His book is entitled Histoire de l'Église de Saint-Remi de Reims, and contains different parts: first, description of the new church; second, of the voyage of pope Leo IX to Rheims, from which the book was called by Siegbert L'itinéraire du Pape Léon IX, and dates the council held on this occasion, Oct. 2 and 3, 1049; dedication, and removal of the body of St. Remi in October, 1049: Recueil de quelques Miracles, with a letter from the pope to Francis concerning a celebration of the anniversary of the removal of St. Remi. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Anselme, ANTOINE, a celebrated French preacher, was born Jan. 18, 1652, at Isle-Jourdain, in the district of Armagnac. Son of a renowned surgeon, he studied at Toulouse, and devoted himself to preaching; he first appeared at Gimont with great success, where he received the surname Petit Prophète; which he always retained. He went to preach at Toulouse; the marquis of Montеспain, charmed with his eloquence, invited him to become the education of his son. Anselme went with his pupil to Paris, where he met with the same success. Madame de Sévigné praised him very highly. In 1681 the French Academy chose him to pronounce the panegyric of St. Louis, and he also preached at the court and in all the great parishes of the capital. In 1710 he became a member of the Academy of Inscriptions; and died August 8, 1737, in the Abbey of St. Sener, which Louis XIV had given to him in 1699. He wrote the ode printed in the Recueil de l'Académie des Jeux Floraux de Toulouse;—the panegyrics of the saints and the funeral orations at Paris in 1718, with his portrait:—Sermons pour l'Avent, le Carême, et sur divers Sujets (Paris, 1731);—several dissertations inserted in the Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres (1724 and 1729). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Anselmi, GIOVANNI, a Veronese painter, was born in 1572; studied under Balestra; painted the cupola of Saint Andrea at Mantua, and other reputable works in France. He died in 1727.

Anselmi, MICHEL ANGELO, an Italian painter, was born at Sienna in 1491, and studied under Gio. Antonio Vercelli, called Sodoma. One of his first works was a large painting representing the crowning of the Virgin Mary. He also painted some pictures for the churches of Parma. Lanzi says he died at Parma in 1554.

ANASTASIUS. See ANSÉGIS.

AnsaUX, JEAN JOSEPH ÉLÉONORE ANTOINE, an eminent French historical and portrait painter, of the present century, who was born at Liege in 1764, and studied under Victor Delorme. There are three pictures by him in the Church of St. Paul at Liege. He ranks among the first artists of the modern French school. He died in 1840.

AnselY, SAMUEL, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Warren County, N. J., date unknown. He embraced religion in early life; entered the itinerancy when young, and continued in it about twenty years, during which time he travelled extensively from Virginia to Georgia, and from the sea-shore to the mountains. He died in April, 1887. Mr. AnselY was a consistent, devoted, energetic Christian. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1858, p. 574.

Anso, a monk and abbot of Laube or Lobbes, in Belgium, was the author of the lives of Sts. Ursus and Emninus, his predecessors. He succeeded the abbot Theodulfus in 776, and died in 800. The Life of St. Ursus is interesting as containing evidence on certain points of ecclesiastical discipline, such as the use of holy water. The Life of St. Ermini was written before 768, and is marked by the same conciseness of detail and style as the preceding. See Cave, Hist. Lit. i, 687; Acta SS. April 3, 375.

Anson, WILLIAM, a Methodist Episcopal minister. No data concerning his birth or conversion are accessible. He travelled as an itinerant in Ontario, Canada, two years; in 1809 went to the United States, and there preached for two years, and then returned to Ontario. In 1823 took a superincumbent relation, and resided to his farm in Saratoga County, N. Y., where he continued until his death, July 17, 1848, in about his eightieth year. He was a man of undoubted piety, sterling integrity, and good preaching abilities. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1849, p. 340.

Anstudius. See AUSTROUS.

Anstius. See ANSÉGIS.

Anta, a warlike Egyptian goddess, who is generally represented as wearing a white mitre similar to that of Osiris, ornamented with two feathers, and brandishing a kind of double axe in her left hand, while she holds a spear with her right. She is very rarely represented on the Egyptian sculptures, and is not found before the time of Amenhotep I., of the 18th dynasty. She was properly a Syrian or Asiatic goddess.

Anta Kalpa, in Hindû mythology, is the twelfth part of the duration of the world, and the eightieth part of a Kalpa, the fourfold duration of the world.

Antæ (Lat.), a species of pilasters used in Greek and Roman architecture to terminate the pteromata, or side walls, of temples, when they are prolonged beyond the face of the end walls. The first order of temples, according to Vitruvius, is called "in anta," because the pronaoi, or porch in front of the cell, is formed by the projection of the pteromata terminated, with antæ, with columns between them.

Antamtappes (the dark well), the place of final punishment into which, according to the Indian Brähmins, the wicked are cast, and from which they never can return. There they are lacerated with thorns, pecked by mad crows with steel beaks, bitten by dogs, and stung by serpents.
ANTARA, in Hindû mythology. Three hundred and sixty of our years make one year of the gods, 12,000 years of the gods one generation of the gods, and 71 such generations or combinations. This equals 8,280,000,000 in our fiscal years. This, however, must not be confounded with the days of Braham; for one day of Braham is 4,320,000,000,000 years; and day and night again as long—namely, 8,640,000,000,000 years. See NAHRANAH.

Antechapel. (1.) A transeptal building at the west end of a collegiate or conventual chapel, by which access is mainly gained to the building itself. (2.) The outer part of a chapel, which lies west of the rood-screen in the same.

Antechurch, a term used to designate an approach to a church, situated at the extreme west end of the building, of which it forms the main entrance.

Ante-communion, in a liturgical sense, is that part of the order for the holy communion which precedes the exhortations, prayers, etc., connected with the actual celebration of the eucharist. It has for many ages been customary to view the communion service as embracing three main divisions: 1. The ante-communion, or the preparatory portions; 2. Thecommission, proper, following the consecration of the elements. And, 3. The postcommunion, or the prayers, anthems, etc., which follow after the reception of the sacrament. The English and American prayer-books differ somewhat in assigning the limits of the antecommunion. In the first book of Edward VI it appears to have embraced the offertory; and in the English prayer-books now in use, the rubric extends it "until the end of the general prayer (for the whole state of Christ's Church militant here on earth)." In the American Prayer-book the rubric does not authorize the minister to proceed further than the end of the Gospel, unless "when there is a communion." In the primitive age the holy communion was administered on every Lord's day at the least, and the ante-communion formed an integral part of the regular liturgy or service. But it was also used in a detached form, as with us. It appears, also, that in the Middle Ages a practice prevailed, under the appellation of misa sicca or misa nautica. The earliest notice of this practice, according to Bon, is in the writings of Petrus Cantor, who flourished A.D. 1200. It appears that it was called extensively in the West for some centuries afterwards. The misa sicca, or "dry service," as it was called, consisted of a repetition of all the preparatory and concluding parts of the liturgy, omitting the canon. No elements were laid on the table, and there was neither consecration nor general communion. This it was imposed in the Church of England, when there was no communion. See Origines Liturgicae, i, 164, 165.

Antefixe (or Antefixes) are ornamental tiles on the top of the cornice or eaves at the end of each ridge of tiling, as on the choragic monument of Lysicrates at Athens; sometimes of marble, but generally of terracotta ornamented with honey-suckle, or other decoration moulded on them. Also lions' heads carved on the upper mouldings of the cornice, either for ornament or to serve as spouts to carry off the water, as on the Temple of the Winds at Athens.

Antelmi, Joseph, a French ecclesiastical historian, was born at Fréjus, July 25, 1648, and died June 21, 1697. He was canon of Fréjus, and first published a book, Le Sacrifice de Célestin, in 1680. In 1689 he wrote a dissertation, De Initia Ecclesiae Foro Juliano, in which he designed to extend. In 1694, by the aid of père La Chaise, he obtained the position of grand-vicar and official with the bishop of Pamiers. In 1689 he published upon the works of St. Leo the Great and of St. Prosper certain sketches directed against Pasquier.Quesnel, who had attributed works belonging to St. Prosper to St. Leo. Antelmi also wrote, De Iota Sancti Martini, Turonensis Episcopi, et quorumdam ejus Gestorum Aetatebus. He gave to the convent of Cl. Ludovicum Thomassium de Musange; Assertio pro Unico Sancto Eucherio Lugdunensi Episcopi, Opus Posthumum; accessit Concilium Regisus sub Rotasigno Metropolitano Aquensis A. 1685; nunc primum proditum integrum, et notis illustratum, Opera Caroli Antelmi, descripti Episcopi Grassensi, Frapastrosi Commentatoribus (ibid. 1729). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Antelmi (or Antelmi), Léonce, grand-vicar of Fréjus and provost of the cathedral of that place, lived near the close of the 17th and the commencement of the 18th century. Père Lelong attributed to him a work on the life of Francis Picquet, consul of France and Holland at Aleppo (Paris, 1782); but Peyrand claimed that it belonged to Charles Antelmi, bishop of Grasse. The preface, however, indicated that it was commenced by Charles and continued by his brother Léonce. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Antelmi, Nicolas, a French theologian, was born in the last half of the 16th century, and died March 3, 1646. He was vicar-general of the diocese of Fréjus, and was very intimate with the learned patron of literature Peiresc, and furnished the brothers Gaucher and Louis de St. Martha for their Gallica Christiana the catalogues of the bishops of Fréjus, which he had edited upon the more ancient documents of the bishopric. Nicolas Antelmi wrote Adverseevoria, which was quoted in the treatise of Joseph Antelmi, De Inuittia Ecclesiae Foro Julianensi (Aix, 1680), p. 170. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Antelmi, Pierre, a French theologian, nephew of Nicolas, was born at Fréjus near the commencement of the 17th century, and died Nov. 27, 1668. He studied theology and jurisprudence at Paris. He wished to follow in the footsteps of his uncle, whom his old age, had raised a dissension concerning the celebrated Peiresc in establishing, like him, a rich cabinet of antiquities. He applied himself with ardor to the search for monuments of his native country, and formed a very beautiful collection. Afterwards he yielded up his cabinets in favor of the bishop of Fréjus. He gave to him, and to other things, the beautiful trivet of bronze, upon which Peiresc wrote a dissertation. Peiresc died in 1637, and Antelmi abandoned the study of antiquities in order to devote himself to theology. He restored the ancient rites and rejected all the fabulous traditions concerning St. Léonce, the patron of the Church of Fréjus. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Antemision. See Antemensemium.

Antenatâle Domini, another name for Advent, the time immediately preceding Christmas-day. See Staunton, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Antepagmata, dressings or architrave of a doorway. This term does not include the frame of the door, which is of wood, but only the stone decorations, or stucco, when that material is used.

Antependium (or Ante-pendium,) a veil or hanging in front of an altar. The use of such a piece of drapery no doubt began at a period when altars were first constructed with cancellated fronts. The veil hanging in front would protect the interior from dust and from profane or irreverent curiosity. In the 7th and 8th centuries, and costly stuffs are often mentioned as suspended "before the altar," as in the case where pope Leo III gave to the Church of St. Paul at Rome a red veil which hangs before the altar, having in the middle a cross of gold embroidery and a border of the same. It is possible, however.
Antes, Henry, a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, was born in America in 1726. He has been often referred to as "the famous and active German Reformed layman of Frederick township" (now Montgomery County, Pa.) from 1730 to 1748. He was a prominent mover in an organization to unite all religious souls in what was called "The Congregation of God in the Spirit." He himself issued a call to all Christians in 1741 to meet at Germantown, which was followed by six successive meetings in the first half of 1742 of like character, called symo

ods. It was through these meetings that the aforesaid organization was perfected. It received all evangelical Christians without interfering with their creeds. In 1742 Mr. Antes was himself licensed by this Synod to go forth and preach, which seems to have been successful, as he is spoken of by all in the highest terms. This effort, while it may have shown the longings of the Christian world for closer union, was premature, and was exhausted by 1748. In 1747 a Lutheran, and in 1748 a Reformed, synod were organized. About the same time the Moravians organized, and each drew its own material to itself. Mr. Antes joined the Mora vians, but on account of certain vestments which were introduced into their communion service, he left, or separated from, them in 1750. After his separation, he assisted them frequently, thereby showing that he was kindly disposed towards them. Upon his separation from the Moravians he became an Independent, and so remained until 1755, when he died, beloved and respected by all. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America, 3d ed. p. 166.

Antes, John, a missionary of the Moravian Church, was born March 4, 1740. He was sent from this country to Hermhut, in Germany, in 1764. Five years after, he went as far as Cairo, in Egypt, with the purpose of engaging in missionary work in Abyssinia, but on account of the condition of the country for which he deemed good reasons, to abandon his undertaking. Subsequently he returned to Germany, where he remained for some time, and then, in 1808, he went to England, where he died, in the city of Bristol, Dec. 17, 1811. He was the author of a work entitled Observations on the Manners of the Egyptians, and he wrote also a Memoir of his own life. See Allen, Amer. Biog. s. v. (J. C. S.)

Anteverta (also Anteverta), in Roman mythology, is a goddess representing the knowledge of the past, as her sister Postverta represents the knowledge of the future. Both are called sisters of the prophe

y, and goddess Carmenta, and they are even represented as the same with her, or a personification of the same goddess. According to some, they are goddesses of births—Anteverta attending to the births with the head first, Postverta to those with the feet first.

Antathasmyira, in Hindit mythology. Nark, or Hell, is divided into twenty-one parts, one of which is called Antathasmyira.

Anthelmus, Sr., bishop of Bellay, was the son of a gentleman of Savoy, named Hardowin. He was born in 1107, became a monk of the Carthusian Order, and in 1141 general, which office he filled for twelve years with great zeal and firmness. In the great schism caused by the antipope Octavianus, he managed so that the whole order of Chartreux adhered to Alexander III, the lawful pope. In 1168 he was created bishop of Bellay, and excommunicated Humbert, count of Sa

voi, who had unjustly imprisoned a cleric of the dio cese of Bellay. The pope having absolved the count, Anthelmus retired in disgust to the Grande Chartreuse, whence he was forcibly brought back to Bellay, and died June 26, 1178.

Anthophoria (from ἀνθοφορία, a flower, and φέρω, to carry away), an ancient festival celebrated in Sicily in honor of the heathen goddess Proserpine (or Persephone), in commemoration of her return to the Fier after her wedding with the god of the spring, after being carried away by Pluto; accordingly, it is a flower festi val. Festivals of the same kind were held in honor of other deities, on which occasions maidens walked in processions carrying baskets filled with flowers, while a tune called Hierakion was played on the flute.

Anthestheria, an Athenian festival held annually in the month of Anthesterion, corresponding nearly to our February, at which time the wine of the previous vintage was considered fit for use. The object of the festival was to celebrate the arrival of that season and the beginning of spring. It lasted three days, from the 11th to the 15th of the month. On the first day, called Pithegia, or "jar-opening," libations were offered from the newly opened jars to the god of wine, all the house hold, including servants or slaves, joining in the festi vities of the occasion. The second day, which was named Choes, or "the pouring," was a day of merrymak

ing. The people dressed themselves gayly, some in the mode of the rustic Bacchus, others in the guise of Bacchus, and paid a round of visits to their acq uaintances. Drinking-clubs met to drink off match es; while others did not forget deceased relations, but poured libations on their tombs. On the part of the State, this day was the occasion of a peculiarly solemn and state ceremony in one of the temples of Bacchus, which for the rest of the year was closed. The Basil issa (or Basilissima), wife of the Archon Basilissus for the time, went through a ceremony of marriage to the wine god, in which she was assisted by fourteen Athenian matrons called Gerara, chosen by the Basilissus, and sworn to secrecy. The third day was named Choros, or "jubilation." The feast was offered annually in his capacity of a god of the lower world; rejoicings and games were held; and though no tragedy was allowed to be performed in the theatre, yet there was a rehear sal, at which the players for the ensuing dramatic festi vales were selected. See Encyclop. Brit. (5th ed.), s. v.

Anthiasists, a sect of heretics who held all labor to be sinful, and therefore passed their time in sleep. St. Philastrius mentions them in his work on heresies, but does not specify the time when they appeared. Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Anthimus, bishop of Tyana, joined with Basil, A.D. 372, in subscribing a circular letter addressed by the Oriental bishops to those of Italy and Gaul; but immediately after discussions broke out between them. On two several occasions we find Anthimus in a position of antagonism to Basil. (a) When the province of Cappadocia was divided and Tyana became the capital of the second division, Anthimus insisted that the ecclesiastical arrangements should follow the civil, and claimed metropolitan rights over several of Basil's su fragans. (b) On another occasion Faustus had applied to Basil to consecrate him to an Armenian see; but, as he did not produce the proper authority, the consecration was deferred. He immediately applied to Anthimus, who at once complied with his request, thus setting canonical rules at defiance. A reconciliation seems to have been effected, as we find Basil and Anthimus in friendly terms. Except in connection with Basil and Gregory, nothing is known of this prelate.

Anthon, Henry, D.D., a clergyman of the Prote stant Episcopal Church, was born in New York city, in March, 1755. His father, Dr. G. C. Anthon, though of German birth, was educated in this country, and settled in New York at the close of the 18th cen Theory. Henry Anthon, the son, was the brother of Charles, the classical scholar. He was ordained dea con in November, 1816, and took charge of the parish in Red Hook, N. Y.; removed to South Carolina in 1819; was called to Trinity Church, Utica, N. Y., in 1821, and remained until 1829, when he accepted the pastorate of St. Stephen's Church, New York city; and became pastor of Trinity Church in 1831, which position he held until 1836, when he was chosen rector of St. Mark's, in the Bowery, spending in this parish the last twenty-four years of his life. He died in New York city, on the 5th of December, 1856. His funeral was conducted by the Rev. Artist Carey's ordination, July 2, 1843, and circumstances attending it, led to Dr. Anthony's separation from those with whom, ecclesiastically, he had formerly been associated. He was at one time editor of the Protestant Churchman, and was one of the founders of the Evangelical Knowledge Society, as well as the Church Missionary Society. He was thoroughly honest in his opinions, and was distinguished for his tenacity of purpose, intellectual strength, and purity of character. See Amer. Quart. Church Rev. 1861, p. 187.

Anthony, John, a native Wesleyan missionary, was born at Galie, Ceylon, Aug. 28, 1795. He was converted about the time of the commencement of the mission in Ceylon. His ministry was useful and zealous. He was a man of simplicity in his manners, yet powerful in his prayers and sermons. He died at Colombo, July 24, 1845, where he had labored for several years, and his death was deeply felt both by the Church of which he was pastor and by his European brethren. See Minutes of English Wesleyan Conference, 1846.

Anthony, a disciple and imitator of St. Simeon Stylites, Bishop of Cappadocia, about A.D. 460, and wrote the Life of that saint. See Evagrius, Hist. Eccles. I, xiiii, 270; Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, 448.

Anthony of Bologna (or of Verceil), so called from the place of his birth, was a Franciscan of the Congregation of Regular Observants. He was a very celebrated preacher, and flourishing about 1480. His Quaestiones Exegetice Christiansae Fidei was printed at Venice in 1492, at Lyons in 1504. He also wrote a Treatise of the Virtues (Haguenau, 1512), and another Quaerogesta on the eternal fruits of the Holy Spirit, given by Walding, De Scriptoribus Ord. Minor. p. 29. See Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, 195.

Anthony the Blessed, a Dominican of the 15th century, was a native of Pietmont, who received the religious habit at the hands of St. Antoninus, archbishop of Florence. In leaving Sicily for Naples, he was seized by corsairs and carried to Tunis, where he abjured the Christian faith, and embraced Mohammedanism in 1459. He quickly, however, repented, resumed his religious dress, and in a numerous assembly of the infidels declared himself to be a Christian and ready to die for the faith. Upon this he was stoned to death. It is said that his body resisted the flames into which his persecutors had thrown it, and was subsequently buried at Carthage by the Christians in a Genoese church. His Life was written by Francis de Castiglione.

Anthony, St., surnamed Cauleas, the second patriarch of Constantinople of the name, was born about 829. At the age of 30, he retired into a monastery, of which he afterwards became abbot, and where he did vast good by his wisdom, excellent government, and rare example. In 894 he was raised to the patriarchal throne, to succeed St. Stephen. When in this elevated position he relaxed nothing from his former disciplined life; he spent his days in penance and prayer, in visiting and comforting the poor and sick, and in other deeds befitting a Christian bishop. After governing his Church two years, he died, Feb. 12, 896, the day on which he is commemorated. See Orosius Christ. i, 250; Baillet, Feb. 12.

Anthony, St., of Larnia (also called Antonius Cyrus), was the son of a man of name in Pannonia, named Secundus. After the death of his father, Anthony retired into different solitudes, and lived a strictly ascetic life, until at last, to avoid the persons who flocked to him on account of his reputation for sanctity, he retired into the monastery of Lerina, where he died at the end of two years, about 326, aged about forty-eight years. His name occurs in the modern Roman martyrology, December 28. His Life, by St. Emundius of Pavia, is in Suria. See Baillet, December 28.

Anthony, St., of Lithuania, a martyr, met his death at Wilna in 1328, by Olgar, grand-duke of Lithuania. He had, with his brother, renounced Paganism, in order to embrace the Christian religion. The grand-duke of Lithuania, having tried in vain to cause them to renounce the new faith, put them to death. The anniversaries of these two devout and men of Jesus Christ are celebrated April 14. See Hoefer, Nouv. Hist. Générale, a. v.

Anthony Melissa (so called from the sweetness of his discourses) was a Greek monk, and is said to have lived about 1140. He wrote, Libri II. Locorum Communiosis, or of sentences collected out of the fathers concerning the virtues and vices, published at Paris, in Latin, 1575, 1590, and contained in the Bibliothèque Fratres, tom. iv. It is remarkable that in the introduction of some sermons, attributed to Trithemius and others to St. Anthony the Great. See Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, 219.

Anthony le Quien, founder of the Congregation of the Holy Sacrament of the Order of St. Dominic, was born in Paris, Feb. 23, 1001, and assumed the habit of his order Aug. 16, 1022. He was a man of strictly religious and austere life, and was the means of withdrawing multitudes of persons from the paths of sin by his example and his preaching. He founded a Reformed congregation of his order, and styled it the Congregation of the Holy Sacrament. He died Oct. 7, 1576, leaving several works of piety; among them, one On the Devotion to the True and Holy Sacrament of the Lord Jesus Christ: another On the True Means of Arriving Soon at the Highest Christian and Religious Perfection: a third On the Love of Jesus towards the Soul, etc.

Anthony de Raimpogollis (Antonius Rampelogus), an Italian monk of the Order of Augustine Hermits and a doctor in theology, flourished at the beginning of the 16th century, and especially distinguished himself at the Council of Constance in 1418 by his eloquent sermons against the Hussites. He wrote, for the use of the young persons of his order in the monastery at Naples, a work entitled Figura Biblica, which possesses strongly curious, and which was placed upon the Index Expurgatorius. It was printed several times in Paris and elsewhere. His Dictionarium Pomperum de Scelationum Humanae was published with the above, at Paris, in 1497, 8vo. He is also reputed to be the author of the Aureum Bibliothorum Repertorium. See Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, 121.

Anthony of St. Michael was a native of Aries, in Provence, and recollct of the province of St. Denis. He was a man of piety, zeal, and knowledge, and founded the Confraternity of the Guardian Angel, for which he acquired a considerable extension by his discourses and writings. He died July 18, 1650, leaving, among other works, The Rules of the Confraternity of the Guardian Angel: Two Books on Angels: On the Eotechnies of the Erotic Life: The History of the Passion of our Lord, in Latin and French.

Anthony, George, a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, officiated in 1585 at Jamestown, R. I., serving St. Matthew's Church, and continued so to do until the close of his life. He died in 1686. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1687, p. 101.
any doubt about their consecration; and where that was the case the sanctifying power of this cloth was considered sufficient to remedy the defect. In the Oriental ritual there is an order for the consecration of these cloths, which, owing to the scarcity of consecrated buildings at the present time, are much used by the Greeks to supply the need of a consecrated altar. This consecration ought to take place only at the dedication of a new church. "Relics being pounded up with fragrant gums, oil is poured over them by the bishop, and, distilling upon the corporal, is supposed to convey to them the mysterious virtues of the relics themselves. The holy eucharist is celebrated on them for seven days." These Antimensia must be sufficiently large to cover the spot occupied by the paten and chalice at the time of consecration. The Syrians, instead of these, consecrate slabs of wood, which appear to be used even on altars which are consecrated. In the absence of an Antimensium of any kind, Syriac usage permitted the consecration of the eucharist on a leaf of the Gospels, or, in case of urgent necessity, on the hands of the deacon.

See Gehr, Eucharisticum, p. 468-654; Suicer, Theaur. p. 377; Martene, lib. i., cap. iii., art. 6. No. 7. See Antimensium.

Antichinthepisidia. Among the present ruins of this once important city are a large building, probably a church, of prodigious stones, of which the ground-plan and the circular end for the bema still remain. There are also the ruins of a wall, of a temple of Dionysus, and of a small temple. Another construction, apparently of the principal temple, is cut in the rock in a semicircular form, in the centre of which a mass of rock has been left, which is hollowed out into a square chamber. Many of the ancient structures, with several broken fluted columns, are spread about the hollow. See Lewin, Life and Epistles of St. Paul, i. 137 sq.

ANTIOCH IN SYRIA. The great interest attaching to this place as the seat of the mother Church of the Gentile world, justifies us in a few additional particulars respecting its modern condition. The city is now accessible only on horseback, by way of Aleppo. It is thought to contain about six thousand inhabitants, including a few Christians. Since the last earthquake (April, 1879), which overthrew one half of the houses, an almost entirely new town has sprung up, consisting, however, of unsubstantial buildings rudely constructed of irregular fragments of stone, held together with mud or inferior mortar. The interior of the town consists of dreary heaps of ruins and unsightly houses, interspersed with rubbish and garbage. The bazaar is insignificant. On the east side of the town is a large silk-factory. Near it are the houses of the vice-consuls, all of whom (except the French) are natives, and speak their own language only (generally the Turkish). On the river Orontes are a number of large water-wheels for irrigating the gardens. See Budeker, Palest. and Syria, p. 578.

Antioch. By way of supplement, we notice—
12. Antiochus (XIII), surnamed Asiaticus, son of Antiochus Eusebes, succeeded in ascendency the throne of Syria in B.C. 69; and, after a reign of four years, was expelled by Pompey, and Syria became a province of the Roman empire. See Appian, Syr. p. 49, 70; Justin, xi, 2; Clinton, Fasti Hellenici: the Civil and Literary Chronology of Greece (Oxford, 1851), p. 344–348. (B.P.)

Antipanion (Avriron), a Greek term for a border or edge-band, corresponding to the Latin "apparel."

Anti-pasch (or Antipascha)? (Avriron), Low-Sunday, the Sunday after Easter-day, Domincas in albis, the Sunday within the octave of Easter.

Antipatria. The identity of this place with the modern Kefr Saba seems to be conclusively proved by the general coincidence in location and distance from other known towns, and especially by its agreement with Caphar-saba, which Josephus repeatedly states was the old name of Antipatris. Nevertheless, both Lieut. Condor and Major Wilson contend (Quar. Statement of the "Pal. Explor. Fund," July, 1874, p. 184 sq, 192 sq.) for its situation at Ras el-Ain, six miles to the south, for the following reasons: (1.) The abundant water and fertility of the spot, in accordance with the representations of all ancient writers; whereas at Kefr Saba there are only two indifferent wells. (2.) The naturally favorable site of Ras el-Ain for a city, especially the strong mil-

Antipendium. See Antependium.

Antiphon-lectern, a lectern which stands in the centre of the floor of a choir, chancel, or chapel, facing the altar, at which the antiphons are solemnly chanted. Here the cantors stand at certain periods of the service in order to command a full view of the choir, and so as to enable the choir to follow them both in time, tune, and due regularity. See Lectern.

Antiphonon (ἀντιφώνον) is, 1. The alternate chant of the two sides of a choir; 2. A verse or vernicle used as a key-note to a psalm or canticle; 3. An anthem sung during the Liturgy in the Eastern Church.

Antipope, the chief of a party who causes a schism in order to dethrone a pope lawfully elected, and to assume his place. Twenty-seven such illegal competitors for the papacy are reckoned from the third century to the present time, viz.:

1. Novatian, who disputed the see with Cornelius, in 201.
2. Urculanus, with pope Damascus, in 267.
3. Eutarius, with pope Boniface I, in 418.
4. Laurentius, with pope Symmachus, in 498.
5. Dioscorus, the deacon, with pope Boniface II, in 559.
7. Theodore and Pascual, with pope Sergius, in 667.
8. Theophylact, with pope Paul I, in 757.
9. Constantine, forcibly held the see thirteen months after the death of Paul.
10. Philip, a monk, declared pope by the faction of Waldirpus, in 766.
11. Zosimus, disputed the see with pope Eugenius II, in 854.
13. Sergius, with pope Formosus, in 891.
14. Boniface, after the death of Formosus, in 906, driven out by pope Stephen VII.
15. Leo, disputed the see with pope John XII and Benedict V, in 900 and 964.
16. Gregory, with pope Benedict VIII.
17. Silvester III and John XXII contested the see with pope Benedict IX; all three resigned in favor of Gregory IX, in 1344.
18. Minchus (styled Benedict), contested the see with pope Nicholas II, in 1009.
19. Cadolus (Honorius I), with Alexander II, 1061.
20. Gulbert of Ravenna (Clement III), with Gregory VII, in 1073.
21. Theobald (Celestine II), with Honorius II, in 1194.
22. Peter (Anacletus II), with Innocent II, in 1139.
23. Octavianus (Victor IV), with Alexander III, in 1159.
24. Peter (Nicholas V), while the see was in France pope John XXII arrested him.
25. Robert (Clement VII), began the great schism in 1378, and held the see at Avignon, against popes Urban VI and Boniface IX.
26. Peter of Luna (Benedict XI, XII, or XIII, according to different writers), held the see thirty years at Peniscola, Spain, against Boniface IX and his successors.
27. Giles de Mynoz, a Spaniard (Clement VIII), opposed pope Martin V five years, viz. from 1494 to 1499.
28. Anastasius, or pope Felix V, is also reckoned among the antipopes by Roman writers; but, having been elected in the Council of Basle, lawfully assembled, in which Eugenius IV had been previously deposed, he cannot justly be regarded in that light. Felix renounced the pontificate in 1449.

Antiquari, a name given to copiers of ancient books and documents in religious houses. They were generally regulars belonging to some order, and lived in monasteries.

Antiquario, Jacopo, an Italian prelate, and native of Perugia, was born near the middle of the 15th century. He was secretary to cardinal Savelli, legate of Bologna, then of the duke of Milan, John Galeazzo Sforza; and was employed in several important matters. He remained at Milan after it had been conquered by the French, and delivered a discourse, which he pronounced in the name of the people of Milan, on a solemn occasion, and which was published under the title Oratio Jacobi Antiquarii pro Populo Mediolanensi, in Die Triumphi Ludo- vici Galliarum Regis et Mediolani Ducis de Frantis Ve- neritis (Milan, 1509). He obtained rich benefits of pope Alexander VI; and distinguished himself by his regularity of morals, his ability, and by the support which he lent on all occasions to people of learning. He died at Milan in 1512. A collection of his Latin letters were printed at Perugia in 1519; several are also found among those of Angelo Poliziano and in other collections. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Antist, Vincent Justinian, a Spanish Dominican, was born in Cordova. He was prior of his order, and died in the year 1599, leaving many works. Among them are, Notes on the Opuscula of St. Vincent Ferrer: — A Defence of the Images of St. Catherine of Siena, etc., in Latin:—A Life of St. Vincent Ferrer, and lives of some other saints, in Spanish:—A Treatise on the Conception of the Blessed Virgin (Madrid, 1615).

Antistes. This title appears to have been common to bishops and presbyters in the early Church. As the name sacreus is common to both estates in respect to the offices of divine service, which were performed by both, so in respect of the government of the church, which they were intended to direct, we find them designated alike—sometimes as "presbyters," as marking their age and dignity; sometimes in respect of their "cure" or charge, as "antistes" prepositor. For example, in the first canon of the Council of Antioch, A.D. 341, the bishop and presbyters are both expressly classed together thus, and the corresponding title of "antistes" is evidently extended to the second order of the ministry by St. Augustine. This usage of the word agrees with that of archimandritos in the Jewish synagogue, and may have been suggested by it.

Antisthenes, the founder of the Cynics, was the son of Antisthenes, an Athenian. He flourished B.C. 366. In his youth he fought at Tanagra (B.C. 420), and was a disciple of Theron, an elder of the Cynics, and then of Diogenes, whom he followed until his death. He is said to have been instrumental in securing the punishment of the persecutors of the latter philosopher. He taught in the Cyno-sarges, a gymnasium for the use of Athenians born of foreign mothers, near the Temple of Hercules. From this circumstance some derive the name Cynic, while others derive it from xnoías, a dog, on account of the habits of the sect. He died at Athens in the age of seventy. His writings were very numerous, chiefly dialogues.

His philosophical system pertained chiefly to ethics. The wise man, he claimed, conforms his acts to perfect virtue; and pleasure is not only unnecessary to him, but a positive evil. He is said to have held that pain and infancy are blessings. He did not, however, contemn the pleasures which spring from the soul, and the enjoyments of a wisely chosen friendship. The aim of the true man must be to become, as far as possible, independent of everything outside, using it as needful, but not desiring it as a gratification. Such a mastery of self he called virtue, and it was enough for happiness. Once attained, it can never be lost. Antisthenes did not encourage the formality of a school, and even drove away the curious and enthusiastic with his staff except Diogenes, who would not go away; but he taught his example and by his sarcastic words. The Cynics adopted a peculiar garb; at first, perhaps, for reasons of economy, but subsequently as a symbol of his profession. "A rough cloak, which could be doubled to counterfeit an inner garment, and served the purpose of a night covering; a wallet, in which provisions could be carried; a staff to support his steps, and perhaps something from which to drink, constituted the property of the barefooted Cynic; and to these was afterwards added a long beard." The followers of Antisthenes lived on the aims of the public, and wandered from place to place. Many of their habits were decidedly indecent. Whatever they had to do, they deemed it proper to do in public. There is no citizen of the world, and not of a particular city. Some of the Cynics even maintained the advisability of a community of wives. Antisthenes was a voluminous writer; his works, according to Diogenes Laertius, filled ten volumes. Of these scarcely anything is left. The fragments which remain have been collected by Winckelmann (Antisthenes, Fragmenta [Turici, 1842]), and this small work, with the account of him given in Ritter, Gesch. der Philosophie (vi, 4), will supply all the information that can be desired. See Smith, Dict. of Greek and Rom. Biog. and Mythol. s. v.; Eucypol. Brit. (9th ed.), s. v.

Anticoncubinators, those who endeavor to subordinate the character of Christ and Christianity to the interests of this world, are held to be the great majority. They have been rejected by the Old Testament and sunk down to infidelity. With many their infidelity is a mere negation; they have renounced authority, and can receive nothing without evidence. Still, they are open to conviction. Another and increasing party places themselves in direct and active antagonism to all systems of belief, which they regard as fettering the understanding and unnecessarily restraining the inclination. In Germany and elsewhere on the Continent of Europe, the writings of Mozart have been profusely translated (q.v.) and have done much to alienate the Jews from all the old standards, and to create a reckless spirit of speculation and infidelity. Rationalism has taken the place of Judaism. Since the death of Mendelssohn, in 1785, the Anti-Talmudists have been every year growing in numbers in Europe. See Ka-riets.

Antithés, a name given to all those Jews who reject the Talmud, whether they adhere to the teachings of the Old Testament or not. By far the greater portion of the Anti-Talmudists have gone further than simply to reject the Rabbinical teachings. They have also rejected the Old Testament and sunk down to infidelity. With many their infidelity is a mere nega- tion; they have renounced authority, and can receive nothing without evidence. Still, they are open to conviction. Another and increasing party places themselves in direct and active antagonism to all systems of belief, which they regard as fettering the understanding and unnecessarily restraining the inclination. In Germany and elsewhere on the Continent of Europe, the writings of Mozart have been profusely translated (q.v.) and have done much to alienate the Jews from all the old standards, and to create a reckless spirit of speculation and infidelity. Rationalism has taken the place of Judaism. Since the death of Mendelssohn, in 1785, the Anti-Talmudists have been every year growing in numbers in Europe. See Ka-riets.

Antithéos (ἀντιθεός, opposed to God), a Greek epithet for Satan.

Antoine, Paul Gabrini, a French Jesuit, was born Jan. 21, 1679, at Lunelville, in Lorraine. He joined his order in 1711, lectured on theology and philosophy at Pont-à-Mousson, and died Jan. 22, 1743. He wrote, Theologia Moralis (Nancy, 1781, and often, 5 vols.):—Theologia Universa Dogmatica (ibid. 1785, 7 vols.):—Lectures Christianes par Forme de Meditation sur les Grandes Verites de la Foi (ibid. 1785):—Démonstration de la Vérité de la Religion Chrétienne et Catholique (ibid. 1793). Antoll, Jacob Bar-Samson, a Spanish rabbi, was born in the kingdom of Naples during the reign of the emperor Frederick, in the first half of the 13th century. He was son-in-law of Samuel ibn-Tibbon, the celebrated translator of the works of Maimonides. Antoli distinguished himself in the crowd of Rabbinical commen- tators, in that he strengthened himself by the study of philosophy; but this was considered a dangerous innovation, and called forth violent opposition, for the most part, from his colleagues. He died in 1328. He wrote, Malvad Mattaemutin, containing philosophical sketches of the Pentateuch, which have been partially preserved in R. M. de Hennezel's, a Hebrew translation of the Primalconsenta of Aristotle:—Sepher Medina; this is a translation of the Arabic comentary of Averroes upon Aristotle:—a Hebrew translation of the Arabic work of Alfarag, entitled Elbotes of Astronomy. He also prepared other translate-Bibl. Jud. i, 46.

Antolianus, St., a martyr of Avuirue, who suffered under Chrobus, one of the German kings of Pome-ania, about 266.—Landon, Eccles. Dict. a. v.

Antolinés, Don José, a Spanish historical and portrait painter, was born at Seville in 1639, and stud-tied under Don Francisco Rizi. There are two fine pictures by this master in the Church of La Maga-lena at Madrid, representing the Miraculous Conception and the Good Shepherd. He died in Madrid in 1765.

Anton, Karl, a convert from Judaism, and lector of Jewish literature at the Helmstüdt University, was born at Mitau, in Courland, Sept. 11, 1722. He descended from a very learned family, to which belonged Bar-eruf, celebrated in MS. in the Yale H. L. Vital, and is. He was the famous Elieschutz, whose lectures he attended at Prague, and for whom he not only preserved a grateful heart, but wrote in his favor when accused of heresy.
In the year 1748 he embraced Christianity, taking the name Karl Anton instead of his former Jewish name, Moses Gerson Kohen. The Jewish historian Dr. Grätz, in his partisan manner, especially when referring to Hebrew Christians, speaks of Anton as of having embraced Christianity out of worldly interests, without bringing any proof to make his assertion good. Anton — the date of whose death we cannot give—wrote, Nachricht von dem dem folgenden Meissens Subkathari Zevi (Wolfgangstätt, 1752):—Einleitung in die jüdischen Rechte (Brunswick, 1756):—Wahr Gründen welche einen Jud zu Jesum Christum führen können (Helmst. 1758):—Entwurf der Erklärung jüdischer Gebräuche (Brunswick, 17... 8, etc.).

Anton, Konrad Gottlob, professor of Oritental languages at Wittenberg, was born in 1745, and died July 4, 1814. He published, Rationem Prophetae Mes-hanus Interpretantis Cerisinsiam Nostroque Astati Aco-modassimatis Exponit (Desau, 1786):—Abhandlung von der allen hebräischen Tonkunst, a treatise published in Paulus's Neuens Reperiturum, iii, 26 sq., in which he regards the accents as musical notes, according to the melody of Hebrew hymns is to be decided. This idea he further developed in his musical exposition of the Song of Songs, Salomons Carmen Melicem (Vizeb. and Lips. 1800). Besides, he wrote De Verstimmung Librum Jonas Interprettantis Ratione (1744), and Nova Lect I Stam. et, 19 Interpretandi Ratio (1780). See the biography in the Programm published by his son, Karl Gottlieb Anton (Göritz, 1816); Rosenmiller, Handbuch für die Lit., Bibli. krit. u. Expres., iv, 146; Allgemeine deutsche Biographie, a. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol.

Anton, Paul, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born in 1681 at Hirschfeld, in Upper Lusatia.
He studied at Leipzig; accompanied, in 1687, prince Friedrich August of Saxony on his tour through France, Spain, Portugal, and Italy; was appointed, in 1689, superintendent of Prince Albert, at Saxagh, in 1702 court-secretary at Eischain; at the suggestion of Spener he was called, in 1695, to Halle as professor of theology and member of the Magdeburg Consistory; and died in 1780. He was one of the founders of the Pietistic School at Halle, where he had labored together with the famous Franke. Of his writings, the most important is his Collegium Anthesierum (edited by Schwentez in 1782).
See Herzog, Real-Encyclop. a. v.; Lichtenberger, Ency clopedia des christlichen Lebens in der Stadt Halle.

Anton, Ulrich, Duke of Brunswick, was born Oct. 4, 1638, and studied at Helmstädt. He was a very learned man, pupil of two of the most distinguished scholars of the day, and a good and pious sovereign. The stain in his career is that in extreme old-age he embraced the Roman Catholic religion, avowed-ly from political motives, and then again revenged Lutheranism on his death-bed. But except for this inconsistency, he deserved and enjoyed the esteem of his people. He died March 27, 1714. He wrote several hymns, which are extremely good, graceful in form, and deep in feeling; and have become very well known, viz., Wer Geduld und Demuth liebt (Engl. transl. in Winkworth's Christian Singers, p. 225, "Patience and humility"):—Nach dir, o Herr verlanget mich (Engl. transl. in Lyra Germ. i, 145, "O God, I long thy to see"):—Nun treu ich wieder aus der Ruh (ibid., p. 229, "Once more from rest I rise again"):—Lasch dich, Gott, den erschauern (ibid., p. 150, "Leave all to God"). See Antonelli, Giacomo, an Italian cardinal and statesman, was born at Sonnino, on the Neapolitan frontier, April 2, 1806. Though of an ancient family, he was the son of a herdsman, and was educated at the Grand Seminary of Rome, where he attracted the attention of Gregory XVI, who raised him to the prelacy and appointed him to several important offices, in 1845 to that of minister of finance. After the accession of Pius IX, he became cardinal, June 12, 1847, and in 1848 prime-minister, in which position he won at first the favor of the popular party. After the assassination of the pope's political adviser, Bossi, Antonelli urged Pius IX to leave Rome, and joined him at Gaeta in November, 1848, where he conducted the negotiations which resulted in the pope's return to his capital under the protection of the French army, April 12, 1850.

He now became secretary of foreign affairs, and maintained a conservative policy, to the great exasperation of the Liberals. He, however, maintained his position against his opponents, and did all in his power to stem the tide of events in Italy. In 1867 he became curator ad interim of the University of Rome.
After the death of cardinal Ugolino, he became dean of the Order of Cardinal Daemons in January, 1868. He

Acting as if Europe were still under the temporal and spiritual power of the pope, he fulfilled the functions of prefect of the Propaganda with all the bias of a reactionary mind. During the French Revolution he was one of the chiefs of the assembly of the State, and proposed, in concert with the fiscal Barbier, more extreme measures. In the meantime, he supported the vote of Jan. 15, 1791, for the sanction of the civil constitution of the clergy, decreed by the National Assembly of France, July 12, 1790. In 1800 he concurred in the election of Pius VII, and accompanied that pontiff on his voyage to Paris in 1804. He was driven from Rome in 1808 by the French, but was conveyed to Spoleto, and died at Sinigaglia, Jan. 28, 1811. In his youth he had written a life of the interdict of Innocent VIII., duke of Parma, which gave to Valtorta the idea of a piquant article entitled Le Roiyana mise en Interdît. Nevertheless, his letter to the bishops of Ireland showed that he held the same opinions of intolerance that were ascribed to him earlier. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Antonius, Sr., a virgin, who suffered martyrdom in Numidia with St. James, Marianne, and others in A.D. 599, under Valentinian. See Ruinart, p. 224, 225.—Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Antoniano, Silvio, an Italian cardinal, was born at Rome, Dec. 31, 1540. Son of a cloth-dealer, he at first applied himself to the study of the fine arts, and obtained the name of Il Poetico. He gained by his talents the favor of Hercules II., duke of Ferrara, who appointed him bishop of the age of the archbishop of Ferrara. At the death of his patron, he was called to Rome in 1559 by Pius IV., who made him secretary of cardinal Charles Borromeo. While acting in this capacity he wrote the Acta of the Council of Milan, and thereby gained a number of friends and patrons. Afterwards he was appointed professor of belles-lettres in the College of Sapienza at Rome. His lectures were brilliant, and it is said that on the day when he commenced the explanation of Cicero's oration Pro Marcello he had twenty-five cardinals in his audience. He was one of the most distinguished members of the Academy of the Vatican, established by cardinal Borromeo. He at length gave up belles-lettres in order to devote himself entirely to the study of philosophy and theology. He was ordained priest in 1557, and was appointed a little later secretary of the Sacred College. The popes Gregory XIII. and Sixtus V. confided to him several missions, which he performed successfully. Finally, Clement VIII. made him cardinal of the basilia of the Vatican, and then cardinal, March 3, 1598. He died Aug. 15, 1608. He wrote, Dell' Educazione Cristina de' Figliuoli Libri Tre (Verona, 1584; republished at Cremona, and then at Naples)—Orationes Tredicim (published after his death [Rome, 1610] by Joseph Castiglione). His Life is found in this last work. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Antonius, a bishop who wrote (A.D. 292) to Cyprian to assure him of his adherence to him and Cornelius against Novatian. He was afterwards much shaken by a letter from Novatian defending his doctrine and accusing pope Cornelius of laxity. Cyprian seemed, however, to have convinced him of the excellence of Cornelius's life and policy as well as of the danger of Novatian's rigour.

Antonius, Johannes, a Dutch Dominican of Nimeguen, was born in the first half of the 16th century, and died in 1588. He wrote several works highly esteemed by the fathers of the Church, of which the following are some of the principal: Opera omnia; Summa Gratii, Epist. Nunnarum, Creationis Hominis; Supplement Haemarri Basili Magni, Interprete Dionysio Romano ex quo, nunc primum typis excusum (Cologne, 1537):—Paulini Nolani quarto quarto Opera Omnia, H. Graevii studio restituta et illustrata (ibid. 1600):—Epistolorum D. Hieronymi Deus I, ab Henrico Graevio

Antonides, Theodorus, a Dutch theologian, who lived in the first half of the 18th century, wrote commentaries on the epistles of St. James, St. Peter, and St. Jude, and upon the book of Job. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Antonides, Vincentius, a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, was born in Holland (7) in 1670. He was pastor of Bergen, in Friesland, Holland, from about 1695 to 1705, at which time he came to America. He served as pastor in the following places: Bushwick, Flatbush, Brooklyn, New York, Gravesend, and Jamaica, from 1705 to 1744. He died July 18, 1744. He was a gentleman of extensive learning, exemplary piety, kind, benevolent, and charitable to all; and resigned under all his afflictions, losses, calamities, and misfortunes, which befell him in his own person and family. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America (3d ed.), p. 167.

Antonius, St., the patron of Sorrento, in Naples, was born in the 8th century, and entered a monastery, observing the rule of Monte-Casino. Upon the death of Boniface, he was made abbot of St. Agrippinus. He died Feb. 18, 880, but his festival is observed on the 14th.

Antonius of Trento, in Naples, a Franciscan, was vicar of the province of St. Nicholas of that order, and died in 1459, leaving many works, among them, Sermones Quaestiones et Topicum Interrogations (Venice, 1588; Lyons, 1565, 4to).—Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Antonio de Fantis, a Franciscan of Treviso, was one of the most sublime defenders of the doctrine of the Scutus in the 16th century. Besides a Commentary on the first and second of the Sentences, he wrote Tabula Generalis Scotorum Substantiatis Sectionibus Olot.—Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Antonio de Ferrari, an Italian sculptor, lived, according to Vasi, about 1450. He executed three statues for the Cathedral of Siena, and made some of the works for the external embellishment of the cathedral. In the year 1467 he executed a statue of St. Peter.

Antonio of SANTA MARIA, a Spanish Franciscan, was born at Placentia, in Estremadura, about 1521. Early distinguishing himself in letters, he took the degree of doctor at Salamanca, where he returned to Rome, and was employed in the apostolic chamber. Upon his return he assumed the habit of the Franciscan Discalcedes. He died at Segovia, July 18, 1602, leaving many works. See Saint-Antoine, Bbl. Univ. Francis.

Antonio of SIENNA, OF THE CONCEPTION, a Portuguese Dominican, who died in 1588, was the author of the Annals and the Library of Dominicanus.

Antonio de Yrbez, a Benedictine, wrote a history of his order in seven decades, and died some time before 1621.

Antonio Florentino, an Italian architect, who lived about the year 1560, was born at Cava, near Naples. He studied at Rome, established himself at Naples, and built there the Church of Santa Caterina a Formiello.

Antonio Margarita (Malgarita, or Margarita), a German rabbi, lived in the early half of the 16th century. His father presided over the synagogue of Ratisbon. He was converted to Christianity in 1522; became professor of Hebrew at Augsburg, Leipzig, Vienna, and finally at Meissen with Schlegel. His works point clearly to his conversion. He wrote, Der gans
ANTONIO

ANTONIO, Nicola, a Spanish bibliographer, was knight of the order of St. Iago, and canon of Seville, where he was born, in 1617. He studied at Salamanca, and afterwards travelled to Rome as envoy of the king of Spain. While there, pope Alexander VII made him canon of the Cathedral of Seville, the income arising from which appointment he spent entirely in amassing a splendid library of more than thirty thousand volumes, by the aid of which he compiled his well-known Bibliotheca, or library of Spanish writers, in Latin (vol. iii and iv, Rome, 1672; vol. i and ii, ibid. 1686). A few treatises by him were collected (Antwerp, 1659). He died in Spain in 1684.

ANTONIUS RAMPALOGUS. See Anthony OF RAM-PIGOLLUS.

ANTOSANDRIANOS, a term applied to Melamcthon and other Lutherans who opposed the doctrines of Andreas Osiander (q. v.). See also OpSANDRIANOS.

ANTRIM, PREBISTERY OF, a section of the Irish Presbyterians. See Presbyterian Church in Ireland. (q. v.) He separated from the main body in 1740 from a disinclination to subscribe to the Westminster Confession of Faith. They adopted thearian, or New Light, principles, and may be identified with the Scotch section known as the New-Light Burghers. See Anti-BURGHERS.

ANTRIPM was god of the sea among the Wends and Prussians. He belonged to the twelve great gods who were held as the symbols of the months.

ANTUALGANUMEN was a goddess in Chili, and was worshipped as a woman of the god of the sun.

Anu, in Assyrian mythology, was the first great deity of the upper triad Anu, Eliu or Bel, and Hea—or Heaven, Earth, and Hades. His residence was in the upper, or seventh heaven, which was called the heaven of Anu, and was symbolized by an emblem resembling the Maltese cross, which was often worn round the necks of the Chaldean kings. He was called “The God of Heaven,” “Anu the King,” “The Great God,” “The God of the World,” “The Chief of the Gods,” and “Father Anu.” The Assyrians regarded him more in the light of the Zeus of the Greeks, as a divine and benevolent ruler. The Akhet, or on the other hand, looked upon him simply as the spirit orfetch of heaven, in which case he was called Anu, or, still more simply, Nu. His wife Anatu, was simply a feminine form of himself. She was the goddess of life and death, and was the Anaitis of the Egyptians.

Anub, St. See Anuph.

Anunit was an Assyrian or Chaldean goddess worshipped by the early monarchs. She is supposed to have been the goddess of the Venus of the Greeks. Anunit was also a star which was identified by the Assyrians with the goddess Ishtar, the daughter of the moon god, Sin.

Anunngage was the Acadian deity called the Archangel of the Abyss, a form of Hea.

Anuph (Anub, or Nob), St., was a monk of Soisits in the 4th century, and brother of St. Po- men. When the monasteries there were devastated by the Manici, a Moorish tribe, he retired with his brother to Terenthi. So strong were his ascetic principles that it is said he refused to see his own mother.

Anuvara is the first rank of ascetics among the Jainas (q. v.). This degree of asceticism can be attained only by him who forsakes his family, entirely cuts off his hair, holds always in his hand a bundle of peacock’s feathers and an earthen pot, and wears only clothes of a tawny color.

Annwyd, Edward, a Welsh Wesleyan minister, a native of Llanegryn, Merionethshire, entered the ministry in 1808, had a long, useful, and influential course, and died in February, 1857, in the seventieth year of his age. For sixteen years he was chairman of the North Wales district. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1857.

Anxur (Anxurus, Anxyrus, Anzur, or Azur), that is, without a beard, was a title under which a god was worshipped as a child of Ammon, and particularly in Anxur, a city of the Volaci.

Anyon, John, an English Congregational minister, was born at Whittle, near Chorley, in the year 1796. He was ordained at Inglewhite, near Preston, and afterwards removed to Pendlebury, near Manchester. In 1845 Mr. Anyon accepted a call to Park, near Ramsbottom, where he labored with much success nearly twenty-two years. He died Nov. 7, 1867. See (London) Congregational Year-Book, 1869, p. 298.

Anysius, Sr., succeeded St. Ascholius in the see of Thessalonica, in Macedonia, in 383. He took part with Chrysostom in his sufferings, exchanging letters with him, and disapproving of the acts of his enemies. He is commemorated Dec. 30. See Baillet, Dec. 30.

Ao was an Assyrian deity called “The Intelligent Guide,” “The Lord of the Visible World,” “The Lord of Knowledge, Glory, and Life.” His most usual symbol was a serpent. In concert with the other great divinities, the city of Durharyakin (Khursabad) was dedicated to Ao by Sargon II.

Ao was also, according to Wilkinson, the name of an uncertain Egyptian deity, sometimes called Mou. He was represented as a kingly figure, with an upright feather on his head.

Aos, in Greco-Babylonian mythology, was the son of Kissare and Assaro, another third member of the first divine triad. By his wife Danke he was the father of the demigod Bel.

Aoura (or Bailot) was a beautiful valley in the Elytian Fields of the ancient Egyptians, which had to be passed through by the deceased before his trial by Osiris and the forty-two assessors.

Apa (Apy) was an Egyptian amulet, representing the flying scarabaeu, an emblem of the sun and of Pthah-Sokari-Osiris, and indicating the idea of self-existence, or the changes or phases or transformations through which the soul passed in the future state.

Apan, in Hindu mythology. The breath of life which is in man is called, according to the Hindu doctrine, Pran. The different parts of this breath bear different names; that part which causes the separation of various useless parts from the body of man is called Apan.

Appa, in Egyptian mythology, was the simpler form of the name of the evil serpent Apepah.

Apparchas were first-fruits which were usually sacrificed by the ancients.

Apason, in Greco-Babylonian mythology, was the son of Sige, the primitive father of the gods by his wife Inthe. Apason was derived from the Acadian Apan, the deep.

Apathe (disappointmnt), in Greek mythology, was the personified daughter of night, and sister of dreams.

Apturias, in ancient Greek usage, is a name for an Athenian-Ionian festival of the people. The origin of the name is unknown. The most probable explanation is that the name is somewhat related to the phratrias, which were subdivisions of the Athenian nationality, and denotes a reunion festival of these phratrias.
That there was no want of feasting and good wine at this festival is self-evident from the character of Grec-cian festivals. The celebration occurred in the month Pyanepison (which began in the latter part of October) and lasted three days. All Athenians and all Ionians resident in Athens, with the exception of the Ephesians and the Colophonians, were admitted to this festival.
The meaning of Apane (disappoirtment, de tection) lies close to Apatia, a surname often given to Venus and Minerva. It is said of Venus that she was waylaid by giants in the region of Phanagoria, in the Taurian Chersonese, and then called Hercules to help her, who hid her in a cave, and to whom she gave the giants one after another, in order that he might kill them by this means of deception. Of Minerva it is said she deceived Æthra, the daughter of king Pittheus of Trozen, in a dream, in which she asked her to come to her Temple on the island of Sphaira, where Neptune then lived with her.

Apollon, CLAUDE MARC ANTOINE V, a French prelate, was born at Montbrison about 1723. In his youth he followed the profession of arms, which he gave up in order to embrace an ecclesiastical calling. Appointed bishop of Dijon, then archbishop of Auch, he devoted his life entirely to acts of beneficence and the practice of all other virtues. Several noble acts of self-sacrifice are related of him. He died at Paris in 1785. He wrote, Instructions Pastorales. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bio-graph. génèrale, s. v.

Apellite, in Greek mythology, is the east wind.
He is represented, as seen in the Tower of Winds at Athens, flying in a horizontal direction, with a light mantele, in which he carries flowers and fruits, with frowning hair, and looking out upon the world with a friendly open face. The east wind brought light, fruitful rains from the sea, therefore he is represented thus.

Apelles, a monk and priest near Acorius, in the Heptanomia, in the 4th century. He had been a smith, and a legend is related of his chasing Satan with a red-hot iron. He was famous for working many reputed miracles. See Niceph. Hist. xi. 34; Sozomen, Hist.
vi. 28.

Apellis Evangelium. This apocryphal Gospel is mentioned by Jerome in his Proem. ad Matth., and by Bede, hist. Comment. in Luc. Perhaps it is only a mutated Gospel like that of Marcion. See Origen, Epist. ad Caros suos in Alexandria (ed. Basil. 1557, i.
881, in Rufini Apologia pro Origeni); Epiphani. xlv. 2.

Apex (or Ævex), Sr., bishop of Touli, was by birth rich and noble. He married a lady named Amanda, by whom he had many children. At the bar he formed an acquaintance with St. Paulinus, who was then employed in the affairs of St. the emperor. The example and instructions of this holy man had the effect of disgusting him with the world; and, with his wife's consent, he vowed continence, quitted all his public employments, and retired to one of his estates in the country, where he gave himself up to prayer and mortification.
He had not, however, long tasted the delights of his new mode of life before he was made priest, and elevated to the bishopric of Touli, in Lorraine.
Such, at least, is the account given by those who make Aper the bishop of Touli to have been the same with Aper the friend of Paulinus, bishop of Nola. Others maintain that they were distinct individuals, and make Aper of Touli to have been a hermit. In the sea of Touli, it seems to have been honored in the Church before the middle of the 7th century, when Salaberga, abbess of Laon, caused a church which she had built to be dedicated in his name. He is commemorated Sept. 15.
See Baille, Sept. 15.

Aperu was a hieratic order in the ancient Egyptitan temples, analogous to that of the novices in Cathobolin convents.

Apet was an Egyptian goddess, represented under the form of an upright hippopotamus, with long pendent breasts, generally leaning upon a peculiar cross-like instrument, which has been regarded as a sign of protection. She appears to have been substituted for the goddess Man in the lower times of the empire; and her title is given as the Good Nurse; "The Great One who bears the Gods," "The Great Mother of east Marse.
married to his Mother," i. e. the Ithyphallic Horus.
She was also, under the title of "The Great Ta Ouer," or Thoeerus, represented as an avenging deity, having a lion's head and armed with a long straight knife, in which character she was called "The Nourisher of those who approach to the Flammen (of hell)."

Apewesh, in Persian mythology, was one of the evil mighty genii which Ahriman created to fight against the genii of light, created by Ormuzd. This genius fights with Tashter in the great final battle.
The latter is the water, and Apewesh is the drought (not fire, which is holy). Apewesh will finally be overcome.

Apox, a stitched cap, somewhat resembling a helmet, with the addition of a little stick fixed on the top, and wound about with white wool, properly belonging to the ancient Flamen (q. v.).

The word is also used by Jerome to express a small hair-stroke, with which the Jews embellish the top of some of the Hebrew characters, placing it over them in the shape of a curve. These are used especially in the books read in the synagogues, and in the Mezzuzoth
(q. v.).

Apherus (Guide of the Roads), in Egyptian mythology, was the name of the divine jackal Anubis.

Aphian, Sr. See AMPHIAN.

Aphraates, JACOB, named the Persian Sage, a Syrian writer of the 4th century, is said to have been born of idolatrous parents. After his conversion he left his country, and went first to Edessa and afterwards to Antioch, where he did not cease from warning the faithful in every way against the Arian heresy. The Greeks commemorate him as a saint on Jan. 29; the Latinos, April 7. See Theodoret, lib. iv.; Baille, April 7; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v. He is the author of homilies, which were erroneously ascribed by N. Antonelli to Jaocb of Ninibia (comp. S. Jacobi Enarration Opera Omnia in Armeno in Lat. Gennonis Translata (Roma, 1746)); and likewise by Gennadius, who copied Antonelli. G.
Wright published them in 1869, under the title The Homilies of Aphraates, the Persian Sage, edited from Syriac MSS. of the 6th and 7th Centuries (London).
Eight of these homilies were translated into German by Bickell, in the Bibliothèque der Kirchenalter, vol. iii.
(Keimpent, 1874). More recently this writer has been treated by Schönfelder, Aus und über Aphraates, in the Theologische Quartalschrift, 1878, p. 195-256; and by Sasse, in Prolegomena in Aphraatis Sapientia Persa Beronum Homileticis, Dissertatio Inauguralis (Lipta.

APhrodisia is the name of several festivals in honor of Aphrodite, or Venus, which are celebrated at various places, but particularly at Cyprus. Mysteries were performed, to which only the initiated were admitted, who offered a piece of money to the goddess.

Apo Dia (from dom, "the house," i. e. "the protector of the home") was, in ancient Slavonian mythology, a god whose protection the people invoked when they left their homes.

Aptia (Earth) was, according to Herodotus, the name of a Scythian deity answering to the Tellus of the Greeks.

Apriarius was a priest of Sicca, in the province of Mauritania, who, having been guilty of immoral conduct, was deposed and excommunicated by his bishop, Urban. He appealed from his judgment to the pope, although that step was forbidden by several African councils; and, although the Council of Nicæa had determined that the affairs of the clergy should be settled in their own province, nevertheless, Zonimus, according to Baronius, received the appeal of Apriarius and readmitted him to communion. The African bishops refused to admit this pretension of the pope, with regard to the right of appeal to Rome. See Africa, Council of.

Aptius (the who is on the hill) was an Egyptian goddess, worshipped in the city of Tuna, in the Oxyrhineht or eighteenth nome, on the western side of the Nile, in Middle Egypt.

Aptamenu was an Egyptian deity who was generally represented with a jackal's head and holding the Uia, or Cucuba staff, the emblem of a divine life. He was another form of the deity Apherus.

Apoceres is a name for the Sunday in the Orthodox Church which corresponds to the Ascension Sunday, so called because from it the fast from flesh begins, though the more strict observance of the Lenten fast does not commence until the following Sunday. The whole of the preceding week is also named from this Sunday, and is a kind of carnival.

Apodamus, Sr., was one of the eighteen martyrs of Saragossa.

Apodinon (απόδινος) is one of the ecclesiastical hours in the Greek Church, corresponding with compline in the West.

Apodosis (απόδοσις, return). When the commemoration of a festival is prolonged over several days, the last day of this period is called in the Greek calendar the "apodosis" of the festival. For instance, on the Thursday before Pentecost is the apodosis of the Ascension. In this case, and in some others (for instance, the Exaltation of the Cross and the Transfiguration, the apodosis coincides with the octave; but this is not always the case. Sometimes the period is more than an octave. Easter-day, for instance, has its apodosis on the eve of the Ascension, but generally it is less; the Nativity of the Theotokos (Sept. 8) for instance, has its apodosis Sept. 12.

Apollinaris Ludii were games celebrated annually by the ancient Romans in honor of Apollo, and instituted during the second or third century, B.C. 212. The priest presided, and ten men were appointed to see that the sacrifices were offered after the manner of the Greek. At first the day was chosen by the priest, but in the year U.C. 545 they were appointed to be held regularly about the nones of July.

Apollinaris, Sr. (1), first bishop of Ravenna, in the 1st or 2d century; suffered much, and even unto blood, in his attempts to plant the faith. Some accounts say that he was martyred by the heathen, but Peter Chrysologus denies this; however this may be, the Church honors him as a martyr on July 23. See Balaec, July 23. (2.) The conversion of St. Timothy, both being mastered together at Rheims in the 3d or 4th century. Their festival is on Aug. 23. (8.) (St. Diplomatus.) Bishop of Valence, on the Ithon; was the son of St. Isicnc, and elder brother of St. Arthus, both of whom were bishops of Vienne. Having been consecrated bishop, he continued to wage inexorable war against all vice and heresy, until Sigismund, whom he had expelled from Burgundy, banished him for attending a synod at Lyons, in which Stephen, the royal treasurer, was excommunicated for incest with his wife's sister. He afterwards returned to his see; and in 517 he attended the Council of Epaone. He died probably in 525, and is commemorated on Oct. 5. See Balaec, Oct. 5.

Apollonia, a festival sacred to Apollo at Agiale, observed annually in honor of the return of that god with his sister Artemis, after having been driven to Cretce on the conquest of Python.

Apollonio, Jacopo, an Italian painter, was born at Bassano in 1584. He was a pupil of Jacopo da Ponte. His best work is the Martyrology of St. Perone, which is in the church dedicated to that saint. There is also a Magdalenne in the dome of the cathedral at Bassano, and a picture of St. Francis at the Riformati. He died in 1624.

Apollonius, Sr., a solitary and deacon in the Thebaid; was taken prisoner at Antioch, in Egypt, in 311. The judge who presided over his trial condemned him to be burned with Philipian, whom he had converted when in prison; but, "the fire being miraculously quenched," he was carried before the prefect of Alexandria, who caused them both to be cast into the sea with his first judge, who, together with many people, had been converted by the miracle which he had witnessed. The Latin commemoration is on March 7. See Ruinart, p. 487. See also Apollonius.

Apollonius (1), an imaginary bishop of Corinth, referred to by Prædestinatus (i, 23). (2.) An imaginary bishop of Ephesus (ibid. 26, 27). He is perhaps the same spoken of by St. Jerome as a person of great wisdom who lived about the end of the 2d century, under the emperors Commodus and Severus. He wrote in Greek against the heresiarck Montanus, and Priscilla and Maxilla, the two women whom he induced to forsake their husbands and to follow him as his prophets. He reproved them for their avarice, and ridiculed their doctrine and their prophecies. A fragment of this work will be found in Eusebius, lib. vi, cap. 18. Tertullian, after his fall, wrote a book, now lost—the seventh book De Ecstasy—which was especially directed against this work of Apollonius. One writer makes Apollonius to have been bishop of Antioch; but nothing at all certain is known about his country. See Cave, Hist. Lit., i, 86. —London, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

(3.) A "companion" of one of the Antonines, who vainly tried to persuade Bardeian to abjure Christianity (Epiphanius, Har. 477.). (4.) A correspondent of Theodorit, probably not a Christian, to whom he wrote, commending the excellence of his moral sentiments, and urging an acknowledgment of the giver (Theodoret, Ep. 78). (5.) Count, prefect of the East in 442, and great chamberlain, to whom Theodoret wrote with reference to the calumnies spread against him at Constantinople (ibid. 108). He was in office at the Council of Chalcedon, 451 (Labbé, Concil. iv, 851, etc.).

Apollonius (or Apollonii), Willem, a Reformed theologian, was born at Veer, in Zealand, at the commencement of the 17th century, and died in 1657. He published, Disputations de Lege Dei (Middelburg, 1655). But he is especially known by his controversy with Nic. Vedei upon the limit of the power of a sovereign in ecclesiastical affairs. The work is entitled "De Magistri Sacra, seu de Jure Magistraturi circa sacra Ecclesiasticae, contra Nic. Vitellii Tractaturn de Episcopo Constantini Magni" (Middelburg, 1649); it appeared in his "Historia Contensionis inter Imperium et Sacerdotium" (Halle, 1722). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Apollos (or Apollonius), St., an abbot and confessor for the faith. At the age of fifteen years he retired into the Thebaid, where he lived a rigid and ascetic life, his only food being the wild herbs which the earth produced. After forty years of this solitary life, he applied himself to the conversion of the heathen; and having brought over many to the faith, remained there, and was martyred, dying at the age of 385. The Greeks commemorate him on Jan. 25. See Beillet, Jan. 25.

Apolystikon (ἀπολυτικόν). In the Greek Church, the conclusion of the office or form of dismissal is called Apolysis (ἀπόλυσις). The Apolystikon is composed of troparia, or verses suited to the particular day or festival which are such after the dismissal. See Suicer, s. v.; Goar, Eccl. p. 32, 123.

Aponynos Deus, a name under which Jupiter was worshipped at Elis, and Hercules, as well as Jupiter, at the Olympic games. These deities were supplicated under this name to destroy or drive away the flies which were so numerous and troublesome at the great sacrifices.

Aponima, in Greek mythology, is the holy water whereby both the criminal is justified and the body of the dead is purified.

Aponte, Pedro, a Spanish bishop of Majorca and theologian, lived in the early part of the 16th century. He was first apostolic inquisitor in the province of Aragon and at the Balearic Isles, when he aspired to episcopal honors. In 1519 he wrote, at the request of Leo X, a "Brevisarium Ordinis Redemptorvm SS. Trinitatis." Aponte himself bore a part in this monastic order. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Apopapás (ἀποπάπας), a Greek term for an ex-priest.

Aphoros, in Egyptian mythology, was the name of the great serpent of evil inhabiting the lower world, whose office it was to seduce the souls of the deceased into error or forgetfulness as they crossed the waters of the infernal Nile on their way to the Kemetor, or Egyptian Paradise. To protect the souls of the justified from this terrible enemy, they were accompanied by the deity Horus, and strengthened by the goddess Nut with the water of life and heavenly food. The terrible ordeal once passed, and the soul of the deceased acquired by Osiris and the forty-two assessors in the Hall of the Two Truths, they afterwards assisted the benevolent Horus to fight against and conquer the serpentine enemy, who was then brought captive to the throne of Ra, the sun deity, tortured with knives, bound with ropes, and eventually slain.

Apompees, certain days on which the Greeks offered sacrifices to the gods called Pompasios, or conductors by the way, referring probably to Mercury, whose employment it was to conduct the souls of deceased persons to the shades below.

Aporrhantierion, a water-vessel of the ancient Greeks which was used for consecration and purification previous to entering the temple.

Aporrhæa, in Greek mythology, were the holy things with which those desirous of being consecrated in the Eleusinian mysteries were made acquainted. They were partly symbols of the blessings of the Eleusinian deities, partly relics of art, which were shown to the candidates, touched and kissed by them.

Apostle Spoons, a series of twelve spoons, in precious metal, the handles of which are adorned with representations of the apostles. Anciently they were frequently given as baptismal presents by godparents of the upper classes to their godchildren. Several ancient examples of single spoons exist on which the Blessed Virgin or the patron saint of the child is also represented.

Apostles (Lat. Apostoli), is the title given, in pre-lithical churches, to certain letters customary in matters of appeal.

APOSTLES IN CHRISTIAN ART.—1. Eastern and Greek Churches.—Among these the only representations of the twelve apostles known are the following: In an early Syriac manuscript of the Gospels, written at Zagba, in Mesopotamia, in A.D. 588, now in the library of the Medici at Florence, is a picture of the Ascension, in which twelve (not eleven only) apostles are represented, the Virgin Mary standing in the midst of them. Of about the same date are some mosaics in the Church of St. Sophia at Thessalonica. Separate representations of many of the apostles will be found among the illuminations of the "Menolog. Græc. of the emperor Basil.

2. Early Monuments in the West.—These are very numerous in Italy and in France, and of very various kinds—as, for example, in mosaics, frescos, marble sarcophagi, and even in vessels of glass or ornaments of bronze.

3. Costume and Insignia.—The dress is a long tunic reaching to the feet (with rare exceptions confined to some of the Roman catacombs), and with a pallium as an outer garment. The insignia by which they are designated are generally a roll of a book, commonly in the left hand, indicative of their office as preachers of the divine Word; or a chaplet, also held in the hand, significant either of the martyr's crown, or the crown of victory, which the Lord bestows upon those faithful unto the end. The scroll is sometimes replaced by a book of the more modern form (usually, however, the distinctive mark of a bishop). See Tiara.

4. Mode of Representation.—In Western monuments of the first eight centuries, the twelve are almost invariably represented as standing, or as seated, on either side of our Lord, who is either figured in his human person or (much more rarely) symbolically designated. In many early monuments there has been an evident attempt at portraiture in the case of the two "chiepest apostles." Of the rest, some are represented as of youthful appearance and beardless, others as bearded and of more advanced years.

5. Symbolical Designation.—The most common is that of twelve sheep, usually represented six on either side of our Lord, who is generally seen standing upon a rock, whence flow four streams. The two groups, each of six sheep, are in most cases exhibited as issuing from two towers representing Bethlehem and Jerusalem. Another symbol is that of twelve doves. Paulinus, bishop of Nola, speaks of a mosaic picture on the roof of the apse of his church, on which was delineated, in silver, a mound surrounded with a 'corona' of circle of light, to use his own words—and round about this corona the figures of twelve doves, emblematic of the twelve apostles. Other symbols are palm-trees, vines, and other trees, to which a mystical reference was given.

6. Special Insignia.—Another mode of designating the apostles individually is found in the enamels used in the Church of St. Peter at Chartres. The twelve are there represented with the following insignia: St. Peter with the keys; St. Paul with a sword; St. Andrew with a cross, saltier-wise; St. John with a chalice; St. James the Less with a book and a club; St. James the Elder with a pilgrim's staff, a broad hat with scallop-shells, and a book; St. Thomas with an architect's square; St. Philip with a small cross, the staff of which is knotted like a reed; St. Matthew with a pike (or spear); St. Matthias with an axe; St. Bartholomew with a book and a knife; St. Simon with a saw.

Apostles. Equal of, is a term applied to (1) bishops supposed to be consecrated by apostles, as Abercius of Hierapolis (Oct. 20); (2) holy women, who were companions of the apostles, as Mary Magdalene, Junia, and Thecla; (3) princes who have aided the spread of the faith, as Constantine and Helena in the Orthodox Greek Church, and Vladimir in the Russian Church; (4) the first preachers, or "apostles," of the faith in any country, as Nina, in the Georgian calendar.

Apostles' Coats is a term frequently found in parish and churchwardens' accounts, indicating the garments worn by performers in the mediæval miracle or mystery plays.

APOSTLES' FESTIVALS, FASTS, etc.—I. Festivals.

1. In the Apostolic Constitutions we find abstinence from labor enjoined on certain "days of the apostles;" but what these days were does not appear, though the injunction betokens a great festival.

2. The first Sunday after Easter appears to have been sometimes called "The Sunday of the Apostles." This Sunday was one of the highest festivals in the Ethiopic calendar.

3. In the West, the commemoration of all the apostles was anciently joined with that of the two great apostles, Peter and Paul.

4. The Festival of the Twelve Apostles is celebrated in the Orthodox Greek Church on the morrow of that festival, June 30.

5. In the Armenian calendar, the Saturday of the sixth week after Pentecost is dedicated to the Twelve Holy Apostles; and the Tuesday in the fifth week after the Ascension of the Cross is dedicated to Ananias of Damascus, Matthias, Barnabas, Philip, Stephen, Silas, and Silvanus, and the Twelve Apostles.

6. On May 1 occurs the Festival of Sts. Philip and James and (some add) All Apostles.

7. July 15 is, in the Roman calendar, the Feast of the "Division of the Apostles."

II. Fasts.—I. As early as the Apostolic Constitutions, we find the week following the octave of Pentecost marked as a fast. 2. There is a collect for a fast in the mass in the Leонine sacramentary.

III. Dedication.—A church dedicated to the Twelve Apostles, second in splendor only to that of St. Sophia, was built at Constantinople by Constantine the Great, who intended it for the place of his own sepulture. He also dedicated at Capua, in honor of the apostles, a church to which he gave the name of Constantinian.

XI.—7

The ancient church at Rome dedicated to the apostles is said to have been begun by pope Pelagius I (555-560), and completed by his successor, John III (560-573).

Apostoli, Pietro Francesco Deoli, an Italian theologian, was a native of Novara. He studied canonical law under Marco Antonio Ometto of Padua. He afterwards distinguished himself as a preacher at Faenza, Genoa, Milan, and Naples, and at last became successively chaplain of cardinal Oriani, counselor of the Inquisition, and finally abbot of Grazie di Novara, where he collected a choice library. He died in 1650. He wrote, Delle Lodì di S. Carlo Borromeo Passeggiare (Rome, 1617)—Plura ad quinque Libros Decretalium Quatuor: De Indemnitate Ecclesiasticà, in Rosini, Lices Lateralisium Illustrium Scriptorum Elogia, and in Cotta, Museo Novarese. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Apostolical Briefs are letters despatched by the pope to princes and magistrates on public matters.

Apostolical Chamber is the council to which are intrusted all the pope's demesnes, from which the revenues of the Holy See are derived. It meets in the pope's palace a few weeks, and consists besides the cardinal's great chamberlain, of the governor of the Rota (who is the vice-chamberlain), of the treasurers-general, an auditor, a president (who is controller-general), an advocate-general, a solicitor-general, a commission, and twelve clerks of the chamber. One of these clerks is prefect of the grain, a second of the provisions, a third prefect of prisons, a fourth prefect of streets, while the remaining eight are deputed to take cognizance of various causes, each privately in his chamber. The members of the chamber meet in the apostolical palace on the eve of St. Peter to receive the tribute of the several feuatories of the Church.

Apostolic See (1), an episcopal seat founded by an apostle; (2) a title given to the three sees of Antioch, Ephesus, and Rome.

Apostolical Visitations, Congregation of the. See Congregation.

Apostolicum. See Apostolus.

Apostolicus is a title once common to all bishops (the earliest instance is from Venantius Fortunatus, in the 6th century, addressing Gregory of Tours; yet the word is not used here absolutely and by itself, but rather as an epithet), but from about the 9th century restricted to the pope, and used of him in the course of time as a technical name of office. It is so used, e.g. by Rupertus Tuitiensis, in the 12th century; but had been formally assigned to the pope still earlier, in the Council of Rheims, A.D. 1049—"because only the pontiff of the Roman see is primate of the universal Church and apostolicus" and an archbishop of Compostella was excommunicated at the same council for assuming to himself the name of the apostolic see (so that, in the Middle Ages, apostolicus, or, in Norman French, apostole or the apostole, which = apostolus, not apostol, became the current name for the pope of the time being). The Constantine in the 5th century, recognizes the name as then appropriated to the pope by ridiculing his being called "not apostolus, but apostolicus," as if the latter term meant apostolus custus, for which Claudius's Irish opponent, Dungal, takes him to task.

Apostolus, Petrus ab (or Pietro degli Apostoli), an Italian religious writer of the middle of the 16th century. He wrote, Vita d'Andrea Cornisi, bishop of Fiesole (Florence, 1493)—Kalendarium Perpetuum Ordonis Carmelitarum (Venice, 1588)—Ceremoniale Ordinis Carmelitarum (Rome, 1616) without the name of the author. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Apostolium is a church dedicated in the name of one or more of the apostles. Thus Sozomen speaks of the basilicas of St. Peter at Rome as the apostolium of Peter; and the same writer, speaking of the church which Epidius built at the Oak (a suburb of Chalcedon) in honor of Sts. Peter and Paul, says that he called it apo-tolium from them.

Apostolus is (1) the formal missive of the judge of a lower court, whereby a cause was transferred to a higher court to which appeal had been made from him.
See APPEAL. (2) Apostolus (or Apostolism) is one of the Church books in use among the Greeks, which contains the words of Gregory Thaumaturgus says (Serm. ii, "De Anunn. B. Virg.", p. 19), "When the gospel is read, or the apostolicon, do not attend to the book or to the reader, but to God speaking to thee from heaven."

Apostolians, a Mennonite sect, followers of Samuel Apostol (q. v.).

Apostrophos (or Ataphos), among the Greeks, was that one who was buried outside of the family burial-place, or the unfortunate one whose bones were not buried.

Apostazmënos (apotææmivocis), a Greek name for one who has renounced the world; a monk.

Apostolës (apotóelëta), small figures and images of wax made by magical art among the ancients to receive the influence of the stars, and used as helps in divination. Hence judicial astrology was sometimes called the apo tolësartical, or divination by wax images. All divination by wax images was looked upon by the early Christians as idolatry, and for this practice Eunomius Seminus was condemned as engaging in an art unworthy the character of a Christian bishop.

Apothosis (apóthesis), the dedication or the ceremony by which the ancient pagans converted kings, heroes, and other distinguished men into gods. In Rome a decree of the Senate was sufficient to secure to any man divinity; but in Greece the honor could be conferred only in obedience to the oracle of some god. The following account by Herodian of the apotheosis of the emperor Severus will serve as an illustration of the process: "After the body of the deceased emperor had been burned with the usual solemnities, they placed an image of wax exactly resembling him on an ivory couch, covered with cloth of gold, at the entrance to the palace. The Senate, in mourning, sat during a great part of the day on the left side of the bed; the ladies of the highest quality, dressed in white robes, being ranged on the right side. This lasted seven days; after which the young senators and Roman knights bore the bed of state through the Via Sacra to the Forum, where they set it down between two amphitheatres filled with the young men and maidens of the first families in Rome, singing hymns in praise of the deceased. Afterward the bed was carried out of the city to the Campus Martius, in the middle of which was erected a kind of square pavilion, filled with combustible matter, and hung round with cloth of gold. Over this edifice were several others, each diminishing and growing smaller towards the top. On the second of these was placed the bed of state, amid a great quantity of aromatics, perfumes, and noxious fruits and herbs; after which the knights went in procession round the pile; several chariots also ran around it, their drivers being richly dressed and bearing images of the greatest Roman emperors and generals. This ceremony being ended, the new emperor approached the pile with a torch in his hand, and set fire to it, the spices and other combustibles kindling at once. At the same time they let fly from the top of the building an eagle, which, mounting into the air with a firebrand, was supposed to convey the soul of the deceased emperor to heaven; and from that time forward he was ranked among the gods."

Apparebit repentina (Studem will appear) is the begining of an anonymous Latin poem based on Matt. xxv, 31-46. Like the Lamentations of Jeremiah, it is alphabetic. "This rugged but grand Judgment hymn," as Mr. Styles says it, is certainly as old as, if not a good deal older than, the 7th century. For Bede, who belongs to the end of this period and the beginning of the 8th, refers to it in his work De Moria. It was then almost or altogether lost sight of, but Cassander published it in his Hymni Ecclesiastici. Although, according to Trench, "wanting the high, lyrical passion of the Dies Irae, yet it is of some semblance, Dayrell well saying of it,
"Juvt carmen fere totum e Scriptura Sacra descriptum comparare cum celebrissimo illo extremiti judicij praeconio, Dies irae, dies illa, quæ majestate et terroribus, non sancta simplicitate et fide, superatur." We subjoin the first lines in the original:

Apparibit repentina dies magna Domini,
Fora solutæ voluntate Impromptu populos.
Brevia totus tunc parebit prætes præteresse secalum.
Tutum simul cum claritudi præteresse secalum.
Clangor tubus per quaternas terræ plagas concluens
Vivat una mortuosa Christo ciet obviam.

These run, in Neale's translation,

"That great day of wrath and terror,
That last day of woe and woe,
Like a thief that comes at midnight,
On the souls of men shall come;
With the pride and pomp of ages
All shall utterly have passed,
And they stand in anguish owning
That the end is here to last;
And the trumpet's pealing clangor
Through the earth's four quarters spread,
Waxing kind and looking awesome,
Shall convok the quick and dead."

For the original, see Rambach, Anoth. christl. Gesänge, p. 126; Daniel, Theoseus Hymnus, i. 194; Trench, Sacred Latin Poetry, p. 290 sq. In English, it is given by Neale, Medieval Hymns, p. 9 sq.; Benedict, Medieval Hymns, p. 35 sq.; Schaaf, Christ in Säulen, 329. (See Appendix.)

The general movements are defined by Raspach, Bisleri, Sim-rock, and Königsfeld, in their collections of Latin hymns.

Appendini, Francesco Maria, an Italian priest, husband, and philologist, was born at Poirino, near Turin, Nov. 4, 1768. He was educated at Rome, took orders in the Roman Catholic Church, and was sent to Ragusa, where he became professor of rhetoric. When the French seized Ragusa, Napoleon placed him at the head of the academy in that city. After the Austrian occupation, he was appointed principal of the Normal Institute at Zara, where he died in 1837. See Encyclop.
Brit. (9th ed.), a.v.

Apphia (or Apphia), St., the supposed wife of Philemon, the disciple of Paul, is said to have been married to her husband at Colose, Nov. 22, during the reign of Nero. See Baillie, Nov. 22.

Appian (or Apphian). See AMPHIAN.

Appiano, Paolo Antonio, an Italian Jesuit preac-cher and historian, was born at Ascoli in 1619. Having become a member of the Arcaeiini Society, he allied himself with the learned Magliabecchi and the poet John Baptist Saginoli. He was appointed recorder of the Inquisition; but he was especially noted as a preac-cher and an historian. He died at Rome in 1709. He wrote, among other works, Vita di San Emanuele, Primo Vescovo d'Ascoli, con una Descrizione della suddetta Città (Rome, 1702, 1704) mentioned in the Journal of Trevoz—Vita di Cecco d'Aosco, a poet and philosopher

Appleby, David, an English Congregational minister, was born at Abberton, near Colchester, Feb.
Appleyard, John, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Selby, Yorkshire, June 12, 1788. He was brought up in the Church of England; joined the Methodist body in his twenty-first year. He was converted on the Shepton-Mallet, Banwell, Taunton (1812), Stroud, Redruth, St. Austell, Sherborne, Weymouth, and Frome circuits. He died of pulmonary consumption at the last-mentioned place, June 26, 1826. Mr. Appleyard was an indefatigable student and an excellent and successful preacher. See Weal, Hist. of Methodist, iii, 16, 17.

Apponius, who probably lived about the middle of the 7th century, is the author of a commentary on the Song of Songs, which the Venerable Bede cites (Cont. Cant. iv, 5, ed. Migne, PP. Lat. xci, 1162). His exposition may be called the mystico-prophetic. He takes the Song of Solomon to be a continuous picture of the history of revelation from the creation to the final judgment. In vii, 1-18, Apponius finds an indication of the ultimate conversion of the Jews after much suffering. The Expositio was first printed at Freiburg in 1588, then again at Lyons in 1677, in vol. xiv of the Bibliotheca Patrum. See Ceillier, Histoire des Auteurs Sucrets (Paris, 1862), xi, 807 sq.; Peters, in Wetzer and Walte's Kirchen-Lexikon (2d ed.), s. v. (B. P.)

Apprice, John, a Christian martyr, because of his unbelief in the Romish Church, suffered death by burning at Stratford-le-Bow, May 15, 1556. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, viii, 140.

Approbation, Episcopal, for Consecration. In the Church of Rome, no priest, regular or secular, can lawfully or validly administer the sacrament of penance without having first obtained the permission of the bishop who has in his power to limit the permission in any way he likes, and to revoke it when he pleases. This regulation is founded on the pretenue of the power to forgive sins having been principally given by our Lord to the apostles themselves, and their successors the bishops, as well as upon the constant practice of the Romish Church.

Aprigius, bishop of Beja (Ecclesia Poenins), in Portugal, not Spain, as Cave and Moretti have it, was a man of great eloquence and learning, who lived about 540, and wrote An Explanatio of the Apocalypse, of which Isidore of Seville speaks highly. It is now lost; but Loesius, in his Notes to the Catalognus, of Valesius, that he once saw in Spain a voluminous MS. on the Apocalypse, formed out of the works of Victorinus, Isidore, and Aprigius. See Cave, Historia Literaria, i, 520.

Apprington, bishop of Chales, in Syria Prima, was a leading member of the Eastern party at the Council of Ephesus, A.D. 431, who supported John of Antioch in the deposition of Cyril, etc., and was deputed as one of the commissioners to the emperor at Constantinople as proxy for the metropolitan Alexander of Apamea. He shared in the ultimate reconciliation between Cyril and the East (Labbe, Concil. iii, 1127, 1183; Baluze, Coll. Nov. Concil. p. 597, 597, 577, 719, 724). See for the name of an ancient Egyptian funeral ceremony called the "Opening of the Mouth."
APSARAS

AQUARIUS

Aquarius, in Hindú mythology, are the heavenly virgins, 600,000,000 in all, whose office it is to solace the gods and the souls of departed men.

Apsund and Sund, in Hindú mythology, were two brothers, who formerly were good spirits; but, tempted by the desire for the earthly, they fell from God, and were therefore banished by him to the Pastals, the hell of the Hindús. All wars which Indra and his Divs or Dējolās must carry on have their cause in these two evil demons, who always stand in the front of his enemies.

Aptēra (guide of the road) was a name of the god Amaus, as conductor of the souls on the road to the lower world, and under which title he was worshipped in Thebes.

Aque Bajulis, the bearer of holy water; the priest's clerk or assistant, who lived on the alms of the people, certain fees on Sundays and festivals, and certain sheaves of corn in harvest; the medieval parish-clerk.

Aquamanile is the basin used for the washing of the hands of the celebrant in the liturgy. The aquamanile with the uræus are the basin and ewer of the sacred ceremony. In the work called the Canons of the Fourth Council of Carthage, it is laid down that a subdeacon should receive at his ordination, from the hands of the archdeacon, an aquamanile (corruptly written aqua et mansile) as one of the emblems of his office. These directions are repeated verbatim in the office for the ordination of a subdeacon in a subdeacon in a subsequent Gelasian sacramentary. In the Greek office, the word used in the same connection perhaps includes both uræus and aquamanile. In the Ordino Romanus, the acolytes are directed to carry an aquamanile (among other things) after the pope in the great procession of Easter-day. Aquamanilia of great splendor are frequently mentioned in ancient records. Besides arius of Auxerre is said to have given to his Church one "weighing two pounds and ten ounces, having in the centre a wreath of lilies," etc. Brunnhilda, queen of the Franks, offered, through the same Desiderius, to the Church of St. Germanus one "weighing three pounds and nine ounces, having in the centre Neptune with his trident." See URCUS.

Aquamarinium (or Acula) is a vase of holy water, placed by the heathens at the entrance of their temples, that the worshippers might sprinkle themselves. Two of these vessels—the one of gold, the other of precious stones—were given by the Emperor Constantine to the Temple of Apollo at Delphi; and the custom of sprinkling themselves was so necessary a part of their religious offices that their method of excommunication was to prohibit to offenders the approach and use of the holy-water pot. It is admitted by Roman Catholics that "hence was derived the custom of holy Church to provide purifying or holy water at the entrance of the churches." This vessel was called by the Greeks perirhakieron (q. v.).

Aquarius, in mythological astronomy (Gr. Υψηλοκύος), is the constellation in which Ganymedes is thought to have come, because it comes directly under the Eagle, the bird of Jupiter, that conveyed Ganymedes to this god, and also because he carries a vessel for water. According to others, he is Denealon or Cercops: the first, because of the flood which took place in his time; the second, because in his day no wine, but water only, was used. The Waterman is represented as kneeling, upsetting an urn, from which flows a stream of water. He borters on the east on Capricorn, and on the west on the Fishes, and is made up, according to Flamsteed, of 106 stars.

Aquaro, Mattia d', an Italian ecclesiast, was born in the kingdom of Naples. He entered, while young, the Order of St. Dominic, and taught philosophy and theology at Turin and Venice. In 1572 he taught at Naples; and in 1584 he was definitor of his province and professor of theology at Rome. He died at Naples in 1595. He wrote some additions to his Commentary of Capreolus on the Sentences, and published an improved and valuable edition of these commentaries at Venice in 1580. He treated upon the number of the principal philosophy of Aristotle and the scholastic philosophy, among which are, Oratio de Excellentia Sacra Theologia (Turin, 1559; Naples, 1572):—Lectionum in Primarios Philosophiam ut dici solet Principia (ibid. 1571; Rome, 1575):—Disquisitiones in XII libros Prima Philosophiae Aristotelis (ibid. 1584):—Formalitates jurid. Doctrinarum D. Thomae (Naples, 1605, 1628), a work commenced by Alfonso di Marchio of Aversa. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, t. v.

Aquaticus, a name for certain heretics who believed water to be a principle coeternal with God. See AQUET.

Aqua vetere. John de, was a Carmelite monk of Mechlin, who died in 1507, at the age of seventy-four. He wrote, Fasciculus Temporum et Ordinis, lib. iii. In the first part, he pretends that Elijah and the prophets were the founders of his order; in the second, he gives the number of saints of the order; in the third, a chronological account of the generals. His other works are, Manuale:—Dialogus inter Carmelitam et Carthusiam:—Epistola Familiaris, etc.

Aquaviva (or rather Aquaviva), a name common in the Venetian vices.

1. Francesco, of Naples, was born in 1655. Under Innocent XI he was appointed vice-legate of Ferrara, and Alexander VIII appointed him inquisitor of Malta. Under Innocent XII he went as nuncio to Spain, when Charles II and Philip V occupied the throne. Clement XI made him cardinal of San Baratone, and Philip IV of Spain appointed him the representative and protector of Spain at the Roman see. He died in 1725 as bishop of Sabina.

2. Giovanni Vincente, in 1687 was bishop of Meli and Rapolla, and in 1542 cardinal-priest. He died in 1556.

3. Giulio was born at Naples in 1546. Under pope Pius V he represented the interests of his Church in Spain during the reign of Philip II. To reward him, the same pope made him cardinal-deacon of San Calisto. He died in 1574.

4. Ottavio (the elder) was born in 1560 at Naples. Under Sixtus V and Gregory XIV he occupied many high ecclesiastical positions, and in 1591 was made cardinal. Under Clement VIII he represented his Church at Avignon, where he had to encounter many difficulties with the Huguenots. At last he succeeded in bringing over Henry IV to the Catholic Church. In 1605 Leo XI made him archbishop of Naples, where he died in 1612.

5. Ottavio (the younger) was born at Naples in 1608. In 1654 Innocent X invested him with the purple. He died in 1674.

6. Troiano was born in 1524 at Naples. He was very intimate with Benedict XIII, and under Clement XII was made cardinal of Santa Cecilia in 1732. Philip V of Spain and Charles III of Naples appointed him their representative at the Roman see. At the wish of Philip, he was made archbishop of Toledo. His influence was of great importance at the election of Benedict XIV. He died in 1747.

Besides, there are mentioned a cardinal Papinius, who flourished in 772 under Adrian I; cardinal Stefano, who lived under Boniface V; and Pasquale of Aragon, who was born in 1719 at Naples, and died under Clement XIV in 1788. (B. P.)

Aquel (from aqua, water), a Christian sect which arose in the 2d century, who allege that water was not created by God, but was created with God. They are thought to have derived this notion from Hermogenes, a celebrated painter at Carnaghe. The same notion was promulgated by Thales, the founder of the Ionic school of Greek philosophy, who flourished B.C. 640, and whose fundamental tenet was that water was the primary Aquila is the name of several Christian saints: (1) Wife of Seccius, martyr, commemorated Jan. 29. (2) Husband of Priscilla, July 8; July 14. (3) Martyr in Arabia, Aug. 1.

Aquila, Bernardino d', an Italian Franciscan of Fossa (or of Aquila), was made proctor of his order at the court of Rome. He was a man of extreme piety; and Peter Rudolphus does not hesitate to state that he had the gift of miracles. He died, aged eighty-three, in 1553. He wrote, Historia Brevis de Canonibus et Illustribus Vivia Provincia S. Bernardini; Quodlibet Scholasticum; Quadragesinale; Peregrinus, on the Discourse of Jesus Christ to the Disciples on the Way to Emmaus: Cesturia in Memor, Passionis Jesu Christi: Vita S. Bernardini Senensis: Vita B. Filippiti Aquiliani, etc.

Aquila, Francesco Farone, an eminent Italian designer and engraver, was born at Palermo in 1676, and settled at Rome about 1700. The following are a few of his principal works: The Repose in Egypt, with St. Joseph at Work in the background: The Last Supper, after Albano: The Dead Christ in the Lap of the Virgin Mary, with Mary Magdalen and St. Francis, after Caravaggio: With a Glory, the Virgin Mary, St. Ambrose, and St. Charles Borromeo, after Carlo Maratti: The Bank of St. Peter, after Lanfranco.

Aquila, Pietro d' (1) (surnamed Scutus Minor and Doctor Sufficient), was a Franciscan of the province of St. Bernardino and bishop of St. Angelo. He flourished between 1220 and 1252, and left a small but learned Commentary on the Four Books of the Sentences (Speyer, 1460; Venice, 1584, 4to; Paris, 1585, 8vo; and Venice, 1600, 4to). See Saint-Antoine, Bibl. Univ. Franc.

Aquila, Pompeio dell', an Italian painter, was born at Aquila, and lived about 1570. He executed a fine painting in the Church of Santo Spirito at Rome, representing the descent from the cross, of which there is a print by Horatius de Sanctis, 1572.

Aquilacina (Lat. ob aqua eliciendo, from bringing forth water) were heathen festivals celebrated at Rome, during a great drought, with the view of obtaining rain from the gods.

Aquiline, RaphaeL, a convert from Judaism who flourished in Italy about 1571, is the author of a treatise on the "truth of the faith," entitled Trattato Fio, nel quale si contengono cinque Articoli pertinenti alla Fede Cristiana con l'Ebraica Osservanza, estratti delle Sacroanticae Sacritae Scripturae (Pesaro, 1571, 1581). According to Wolf's testimony, who gives a full descriptic of this work, it is full of mistakes; wherever he sought for and found Old-Test. types of the cross. He also wrote, Dela Hebraica Medaglia, detta Magnem David et Abraham (ibid. 1621), ed. by A. G. Angiusciola. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i. 47; Wolf, Bibl. Hebr. iii, 392 sq.; Schott, Jud. Merkwürdigkeiten, 78; Ewalt, Israel u. d. Kirche, p. 77. (B. F.)

Aquilinus is the name of several Christian saints, besides the one below: (1) Martyr in Africa, Jan. 4. (2) Commemorated Feb. 4. (3) Of Isernia, commemorated May 16. (4) Presbyter, May 27. (5) Saint, July 16; July 17.

Aquilinus, St., was born at Bayeux about 620. He served in the army under Clovis II; and, although married, observed continence with his wife. About 658 he was made bishop of Evreux; after which he entirely devoted himself to the good of his people, and lived in a cell close to his cathedral church, practicing the greatest austerities. In 688 he attended the Council of Rouen, under St. Ansbertus. Towards the close of his life he labored under loss of sight, an affliction which he is said to have demanded in prayer. He died in 695, having ruled his Church forty-two years. His festival is marked on Oct. 19 in the Roman martyrology; but the Church of Evreux commemorates him on Feb. 15. See Baillet, Oct. 19.

Aquinas (St.), Thomas, Hymns of. Thomas wrote not only in prose, but also in poetry, and the produce of his muse he dedicated, above all things, to the glorification of the Virgin Mary and the eucharist. He composed a Psalterium Mariæ, and a poem (Omni die die Macedoniae, nea anima) known under the title of Salleiologia. Sallustius, Thomas. When pope Urban IV, in 1261, brought about the general observance of the Feast of Corpus Christi, Aquinas, at the instance of that pope, prepared the officium, or order of worship, for that feast, into which the following hymns, still in use in the Roman Church, were introduced by Aquinas:

These hymns are not only translated into English, but also into German. The first, by Caswall, in Hymns and Poems (Lond. 1873), p. 161, commences thus:

"O Godhead hid, devoutly I adore thee,
Whose only art within the forms before me;
To thee my heart I bow with bended knee,
As falling quite in contemplating thee,"

Dr. Neale, who renders the same lines thus—

"Humbly I adore thee, hidden Deity, Which beneath these figures art conceal'd from me;
Wholly in submision thee my spirit bails:
For in contemplating thee it wholly falls," remarks on this hymn, "It is worthy of notice how the Angelic Doctor, as if afraid to employ any pomp of words on approaching so tremendously a mystery, has used the very simplest expression throughout." No. 2 is also translated by Caswall, loc. cit., p. 71:—

"Sion, lift thy voice, and sing:" and in another rendering is found in Lyra Eucharistica, p. 125:

"Laud, O Sion, Thy Salvation;" and a third in Hymns for Christian Worship, No. 394:

"Sing, my tongue, the Saviour's glory." For No. 3 see the art. FANGE LINGUA; and for No. 4, the art. SACRIS SOLEMNIS. No. 5 is given by Caswall, loc. cit., pp. 65:

"The Word, descendng from above;
and in Hymns Ancient and Modern:

"The heavenly word proceeding forth."

It is remarkable that Dr. Trench, in his Sacred Latin Poetry, does not mention any of Aquinas's hymns. (B. F.)

Aquino, Louis Henri d', of Paris, son of Philip, was professor of Hebrew at Paris, where he published, Πτέρυγα τῆς ἤλεκτης ἱπποδρομίας, or Rashiš Slōhiq in Librum Esther in Versione Latina, etc. (Piacenza, 1622, 8vo). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i. 47; Wolf, Bibl. Hebr. iii, 752 sq.; Schott, Jude. Merkwürdigkeiten, 78; Ewalt, Israel u. d. Kirche, p. 77. (B. F.)
of laborious study and consuming toil. His premature death was probably accelerated by the close and continuous mental application with which he sought the completion of his great task. The translation was subsequently confided to the Rev. Dr. Van Dyck, in order to re-examine the parts already prepared, and to continue the work from the point at which it had been left by the departed scholar. Dr. Van Dyck possessed undoubted qualifications for this resumption of the work, he being a competent and accurate translator having a thorough knowledge of the Arabic language. With immense pains, inflexible perseverance, and unflagging energy, he applied himself to his editorial labours till the entire Bible was finished, and a translation was formulated which, in point of idiomatic exactness, fidelity to the originals, and general excellence, may well satisfy the most fastidious scholars.

When it is considered that the Arabic language is spoken by more than one hundred millions of the human race, it would be difficult to exaggerate the value and influence of the great undertaking which had reached its final stage in the year 1865. The text was completed at press in New York in 1867 under the title El-Kîdîb el-Muyaddas. The superiority of this translation being recognised everywhere, the British and Foreign Bible Society were induced to pay for their own use, and shared in the expense of printing with the American Bible Society. Since 1870 this version has been published with a vowel-elled text, the work also of the Rev. Dr. Van Dyck. (B. P.)

Aracani are priests among a negro tribe on the West Coast of Africa. The standard or banner which they carry in processions is a white scarf, on which are painted human bones and ears of rice.

Arachiele, Cacciaturu, an Armenian theologian and philosopher, was a native of Erzerum, in the plain of Armenia. At the age of fifteen years he went to Rome and completed his studies at the College for the Propagation of the Faith; then went to Constantinople, and afterwards to Venice, and became known for his preaching. He died at Venice in 1740. He wrote, Summa Universae Theologiae:— Universae Theologiae Speculatio, Dogmatix, Positiva, et Moralia Opus:— an Armenian poem in which Jesus Christ is compared with Adam, now in the Library of Paris:— an Introduction to the Christian Life, also written in Armenian. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s. v.

Aradillas, Alfredo González, a Spanish theologian, who lived in the last half of the 17th century, wrote, Exercicios del Rosario de la Virgen (Seville, 1622):—Custilla e Spiritual y Divina, a dialogue between Christ and man, the first part of which was published at Granada in 1648. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s. v.

Araf (or Arafah) is an intermediate place between the heaven and hell of the Mohammedans, which corresponds to the Romish purgatory. See Al-Shat.

Ararat, Station on. It is laid down as one of the most important practices to be observed by the Mohammedans who go on pilgrimages to Mecca that on the last day of the last month of the Arabian year, called Dhul Chaija, the pilgrims must resort to Mount Ararat, in the vicinity of Mecca, to perform their devotions. The Mohammedans have a tradition that Adam and Eve, after they were turned out of Paradise, were separated for a hundred and twenty years, and that at last, as they were in search of each other, they met on the top of this mountain and recognised each other, to their mutual delight.

Araron (in Spain), Council of (Concilium Aragonense), was held in 1082, in which it was decided that the bishops of Aragon should be chosen from the monks of St. Iago de Peña (see Labbé, Concil. ix., 1173).

Another was held in 1408 in favor of the antipope Benedict XII.
ARAGON

ARAGON (or Boria), Alfonso, a preacher of the Augustinian Order and a Spanish theologian, who lived in the first half of the 17th century, wrote, Vida de la Bienaventura da Ritta de Cassia (1618). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

ARAGON, Fernando de, archbishop of Saragossa, a Spanish historian, was the son of Ferdinand, king of Castile and Aragon, and became bishop in 1539. He died Jan. 20, 1575. He left in manuscript, Historia de los Reyes de Aragon, and some other works. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

ARAGON, Fernando Ximenes, a Portuguese theologian, lived in the early part of the 17th century. He became archbishop of Braga, and composed the following works, Restaurarum et Renovarum Homem:—Doctrina Católica para Instrucion e Confirmacion de los Fiéis, and Exercícios das Sete Superstícioes, e de Particular do Judaismo. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

ARAGON, Pedro de, a Spanish Augustinian friar and theologian, native of Salamanca, lived near the close of the 16th century. He taught theology, and wrote the following works, In Secundum Secundus Thomas de Justicia et Jure:—In Tertiam Thomas de Mysteries Vita Christi et utrisque Adventus. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

ARAGON, Simone Tagliavini D', an Italian cardinal and Sicilian publicist, was born May 20, 1550. He was son of Charles of Aragon, duke of Newfoundland, and became cardinal in 1588. He died at Rome in 1604. He wrote, Constitutiones pro Cleri et Populi Reformatione:—Sermones Sacri in Synoda Habitus:—Explanatio nonnullorum Decretarum Pontific. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

ARAGONESE, Sebastiano, an Italian painter and designer, a native of Brescia, lived in the last half of the 16th century. His style of design was more remarkable than his painting. He succeeded especially in the reproduction of ancient medals. He designed all the marbles in the city of Brescia with their inscriptions. Lanzi speaks of one of the paintings of Aragones, Our Saviour between two Saints. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

ARALDI, Alessandro, an Italian painter, was a native of Parma. His master was John Bellini, of Venice. He painted several pictures for the churches of his native place, among which we especially notice the Annunciation as possessing especial merit. Lanzi ranks him among the good painters of the mixed or old-fashioned style. He died about 1528. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

ARALDI, Giovanni Francesco, an Italian Jesuit and theologian, was born at Cagli in 1522. He aided in founding the Jesuit college at Naples, and died May 10, 1559. He left a Compendium Doctrinae Christianae. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

ARAMA, Isaac (also called Baal-Akedah), a celebrated Jewish philosopher and commentator, was born in Zamora about 1460, and was one of the 300,000 Jews who were expelled in 1492 from Spain. He went to Naples, where he died in 1494. The work which immortalized his name is called Akedath Isaac (אֶקֶדַת יִשְׂרָאֵל), The Litigation of Isaac, a philosophical commentary on the Pentateuch and the five Megilloth, consisting of one hundred and five sections, and containing some of the severest strictures of the views of Aristotle, as well as some of the most beautiful moral sayings. It is from this work that Arama received the name of Baal-Akedah. He also wrote, a separate commentary on Esther (Constantinople, 1518);—ementia, The Hand of Aboladom, an exposition to the book of Proverbs (ibid. s. s.; Leipzig, 1539);—and הָרָעָב הֵרָעָב, The Heavy Vison, written against Mohammedans and Chris-

ARAMA, Meir (also called by way of distinction, יִשְׂרָאֵל אֲבָרוֹן; the Ramban Meir), a Jewish writer, son of Isaac, was born at Saragossa. He accompanied his father to Naples in 1492, and after his death (1494) emigrated to Salonica, where he died in 1556. He wrote valuable annotations on Isaiah, Jeremiah, Job, the Psalms, the Song of Songs, and the book of Esther, which are distinguished for their brevity and for logically evolving the sense of the inspired writers. "His style is very laconic, and being a thorough master of the Hebrew language, he generally gives the true sense of the Scriptures in a very few words, without taking the student through the process of verbal criticism, as Ibn-Ezra does." His commentary on Isaiah and Jeremiah, called יִשְׂרָאֵל אֲבָרוֹן, Light and Perfection, and his exposition of the Song of Songs are printed in Frankfurter's great Rabbinical Bible (Amsterdam, 1724- 27, 4 vols. fol.); the commentary on Job, called יִשְׂרָאֵל אֲבָרוֹן, which he wrote in 1506, was published in Venice, 1517-67; the commentary on the Psalms, יִשְׂרָאֵל אֲבָרוֹן, composed in 1518, was published in Venice, 1590. Sekten, iii, 119; Etheridge, Intro. to Hebrew Literature, p. 418. (B. P.)

ARANAS, Jacinto de, a Spanish Carmelite and publicist, lived in the early part of the 18th century. He became commissary-general of his order and doctor of theology. At the time of the War of the Spanish Succession, he sustained the interests of Philip V. He wrote a work entitled El Señor Felipe V es el Rey de las Españas, escrito por su deber, poniendo en evidencia la Torre Inconstrastable de Secundo Darío, Porseguido Vicarióso (Pampeluna, 1711). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aranda, Francisco, a Spanish sculptor, native of Toledo, lived at the commencement of the 16th century. He was one of the sixteen sculptors who worked on the tabernacle of the Cathedral of Toledo in 1560. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

ARANDA, Juan, a Spanish sculptor, brother of Francisco, lived at the same period. He was also one of the sixteen sculptors who worked on the tabernacle of the Cathedral of Toledo. He executed some other works for the Cathedral of Jaen, one being the Concepcion, and two statues of the king of Spain. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

ARANEUS, Clement, a Dominican of Ragusa, in Dalmatia, who lived in the middle of the 16th century, is the author of Commentarius in Epistolam ad Romanos (Venetia, 1547), in which he is very severe upon the Lutherans. See Mireus, Script. Sac. XVII, in Fabricii Bibl. Eccl. p. 150. (B. P.)

ARARAT. This mountain has lately been ascended by Brice, who gives a graphic description of it (Transacucanias [London, 1857], p. 242 sq.)

ARATI, a Hindu ceremony designed to avert the effect of evil glances, consists in placing upon a plate of copper a lamp made of paste of rice flour; and when it has been supplied with oil and lighted, the women take hold of the plate with both hands, and, raising it as high as the head of the person for whom the ceremony is performed, describe a number of circles in the air with the plate and the burning lamp.

Arator, a subdeacon of the Roman Church in the time of pope Vigilius, was a native of Lutargia. In A.D. 536 he gained reputation as an advocate in a mission to Theodoric the Ostrogoth on behalf of the Dalmasiots; in consequence of which he was made private secretary and intendant of finance to Athalaric, his successor. He subsequently left court, received ordination, and was elected subdeacon A.D. 541. He wrote Historia Apostolorum ex Loca Expressa, in Latin verse, which, with other poetry, he dedicated to Vigilius (ed. princeps, Milan, 1492, 8vo).

Ararau, Antonio de, a Portuguese missionary, was born in the island of Terceira. He entered the company of Jesus, and went as a missionary to Brazil. He died in 1632.

Araraujo, Duarte de, a Portuguese, was for six years general of the military Order of Christ. He was employed for fifteen years at the court of Rome by King Philip II, and wrote the Life of St. Irene (Coimbra, 1579). He died in 1599.

Arauzo, Francisco de, a Spanish theologian, was born in Galicia of a good family. He entered the Order of St. John, and, in 1601, having finished his studies, taught theology at Bruges, Alcalá, and elsewhere. He succeeded Peter de Herrera in the chair of theology at Salamanca, where he taught for twenty years. King Philip IV had formed so high an estimate of him that he used to say that he would follow the opinion of Arauzo alone, though it was opposed to the combined opinion of all the theologians. In 1648 he was made archbishop of Segovia, in which situation he lived precisely as he had previously done, strictly observing in his palace all the rules of his order. He resigned after a time, and retired into a convent of Dominicans at Madrid, where he died in 1664, leaving several works on theological and philosophical subjects.

Arawack Version. The people to whom this language is vernacular inhabit the sea-shores and the banks of rivers in British Guiana, in Surinam, or Dutch Guiana, and in the province of Venezuela. The people of Dutch Guiana were supplied by the American Bible Society with the Acts in their own vernacular in 1851 from a MS. in their possession, but concerning which we have no further information. For linguistic purposes, see Quindt, Arawakische Grammatik, in Schomburgk, Reise in British-Guayana (1840-48); Brinton, The Arawak Language of Guiana, in Trans. Amer. Phil. Soc. Arba Kanphoth (ארבעה כנפוחות), i.e. the four wings, is the common expression for the talith katan, "small vestment," and talit. According to the rabbins, the Jews are obliged to wear fringes the whole day; but, in order to avoid the odium and ridicule likely to be incurred by the singularity of appearance in such a dress as the talith gadol, or great talith, they use it only at prayers, either in the synagogue, or at home if prevented from going to the synagogue. In order, therefore, that they may fulfil the injunction of wearing the fringes the whole day, which were designed to remind them of God's precepts, not only during prayers, but all the day long, they have another kind of vestment for that purpose, called by some talith katan, or "small vestment," and by others arba kanphoth, or "four corners." It consists of two quadrangular pieces, generally of wool, the same as the talith gadol, joined together by two broad straps, and a space left sufficient for the head to pass between, exactly like a popish scapular; from each of the corners hangs a fringe, so that the wearer may act according to the tradition of the rabbins, "two fringes are to be turned in front and two at the back, in order that the wearer may be surrounded by precepts." This small talith is worn constantly; some Jews make it into the shape of a waistcoat, or jacket, and use it as an inner garment. The talith katan, as worn by the Jews in Poland, Russia, and the East, is very long, and so made as to present the fringes to their view (although it is used as an inner garment) and thus remind them of God's commandments; but the Jews on the Continent, in England, and America, if they wear it at all, wear it in such a way as not to be visible. See Fringe. (B. P.)

Arbain (Arab. forty), a word applied by the Mohammedans to denote the forty traditions. Mohammed promised that whosoever should teach the faithful to understand this number of traditions, to instruct them in the way to heaven, should be exalted to the highest place in paradise. The consequence has been that Mohammedans have come to believe that the number of traditions in reference to the Mohammedan religion, which in their aggregate form bear the name of Arbaain.

Arbasia, Cesare, an eminent Italian painter, was born at Saluzzo, and flourished in the latter part of the 16th century. He studied under Federigo Zucccheri. In 1579 he visited Spain and executed a picture of the Incuramation of the Mother of God in the cathedral at Malaga. In 1583 he executed a fine work in fresco in the cathedral of Cordova, representing the martyrs who suffered in that city. He probably visited Rome in 1588. He died in Spain in 1614.

Arbiolo Dies, Antonio, a Spanish ecclesiastic, was born at Tarragona, in the diocese of Tarragona, Spain, in 1646, and entered the Order of Franciscans at Saragossa. He was charged with many offices in connection with his own order and the Inquisition, and was distinguished for his learning and the facility with which he resolved the most difficult cases. He lived a quiet and holy life, refused the see of Ciudad Rodrigo, and died in 1726, leaving several theological works, all of which have been more than once printed at Saragossa, Murcia, and Barcelona. Among them is one entitled Defensio Civitatis Mysticae Mariae a Jeru Agreda, contra Censuram Parissienni.

Arbitrators, Ecclesiastical. At an early period in the history of the Christian Church, bishops came to be invested by custom and the laws of the State with the power of hearing and determining secular causes submitted to them by their people. From the natural respect with which the pastors were regarded, they were considered to be the best arbitrators and the most impartial judges of the common disputes which occurred in their neighborhood. The office thus assigned by custom to the bishops or pastors of the Church was afterwards confirmed and established by law when the emperor became Christian. Eusebius says, in his life of Constantine, that a law was passed by that emperor confirming such decisions of the bishops in their consistories, and that no secular judges should have any power to reverse or annul them, in the absence of the bishops; the case was to be referred before all other judges. By the Justinian Code the arbitration of bishops was restricted to causes purely civil, and it was further decreed that they should only have power to judge when both parties agreed by consent to refer their causes to their arbitration. In criminal causes the clergy were prohibited from acting as judges.
both by the canons of the Church and the laws of the State, except such as incurred ecclesiastical censure. Sometimes they found it necessary to call in the assistance of one of the clergy, a presbyter, or principal deacon. Accordingly, the Council of Tarragona mentioned not only presbyters, but deacons also who were deputed to hear secular causes. The office of arbitrator was sometimes committed to intelligent and trustworthy laymen, whereas the practice of the office of lay chancellor (q. v.) may have had its origin.

Arbogast, St., was bishop of Strasburg from A.D. 669 to 678, the year of his death. He gained the favor of the king, Dagobert, who gave him, among others, the fortress of Issenmburg and the city of Ruffach, with all the surrounding domains. Arbogast ordered that at his death his body should be interred in the place reserved for bishops, and remains were removed some time after to the collegiate church which he had founded at Strasburg. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arboreus, Jean, a French theologian, native of Laon, lived in the early part of the 16th century. He was doctor in the Sorbonne, and wrote, besides certain commentaries on the Bible, Theologiae Tomus I et II, seu Expositio Difficultatium Locorum Veteris et Novi Testamenti (Antwerp, 1540), an introduction bearing some analogy to the Sic et Non of Abelard, an edition of which he also prepared. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arborolatry, the worship of trees, was a very common practice among ancient pagans, and is still in use to a limited extent. In the Greek and Roman mythology, nearly every deity had his favorite tree; as the oak, sacred to Jupiter, and the laurel to Apollo. Among the ancient Canaanites sacred groves were common [see Grove]; and the people of Syria, Samos, Athens, Dodona, Arcadia, Germany, and many other places had their arboroleshines. It is said that holy trees still exist among the Northern Finlanders. An enormous oak, called the Tree of the Mother, was set up in the old churchyard, and was the focus of pious devotion. The Apostle to the Germans. It was beneath oaks that the ancient Druids performed their sacred rites and worshipped the Supreme Being under the form of an oak. The prominent place of the Ygralolin, in Scandinavian mythology, the Bo-tree and Banian in Buddhism, are further examples of the prevalence of this form of idolatry. See Judaism; Buddhism; Tree of Ygrasell.

Arbulo, Margarette Pedro de, a Spanish sculptor, flourished in the early part of the 10th century, Bermudes says that from 1569 to 1574 he was occupied upon the altar and stalls of the church of San Asenio, in the Rioja, Castile. He received for this work 7857 ducats. He died at Briones in 1608. See Spoor, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arc (or Arcilla), a name applied to several ecclesiastical recepiacles.
1. A chest intended to receive pecuniary offerings for the service of the Church or for the poor (Tertullian).
2. It is used of a box or casket in which the enshrinement was reserved. Thus Cyprian speaks of an "area in which the sacrament of the Lord was," from which fire issueth and laymen, and from this casket he archdeacon when he was imprisoned, and also that which Paulinus Petricordius says was committed to the charge of a dean chosen for the purpose.
3. Among the prayers which precede the Eucharistic Canon is one superb artice lice majorum. The prayer itself suggests that this area was used for precisely the same purpose as the paten (q. v.), inasmuch as in both cases the petition is that in or upon it may be perfected the body of the Lord. It may have served the purpose of an Antimissium (q. v.).

Its use was probably not limited to the case of unconsecrated altars. The Copts applied the term "mercy seat" to the Christian altar; and this area may have been an actual chest or arks, on the lid of which the mercy-seat inscription took place.

Arcadius, St. (1), martyred in Mauritania during the persecution under Valerian or Diocletian. He was cut to pieces by degrees; and at last, Jan. 12, killed by being cut open. See Baille, Jan. 12.

Arcadius, St. (2), martyred, with others, in 457, under Generic, the Arian king of the Vandals, who carried him and his companions from Spain into Africa. Their memory is honored on Nov. 18. See Ruinart and Baillet, Nov. 15.

Arcadius, surnamed Thaumastorita, bishop of Cons- tance in the Isle of Cyprus, lived in the 8th century. He wrote the Life of Simeon Stylites, the younger, extracts of which are found in the Acts of the Second Council of Nice. Some other MS. works are attributed to him. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Atoe, Josse de, a Spanish sculptor, who flourished about 1657, studied under Juan Martinez Montanes, and did several fine pieces of work at Seville, among which are eight colossal stone statues over the balustrade of the Church of the Sanctuary, in the cathedral.

Arcere, Louis Etienne, a French priest of the Oratory, was born at Marseilles in 1698, and is chiefly known by his History of the Town of Rochelle and the Country of Anna (1766, 2 vols. 4to, and in 6 vols. 12mo). He died Feb. 7, 1792. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arch in Christian Art. The influence which the arch has had in effecting changes in architecture is much greater than is generally supposed. Not only may the deterioration which took place in the Roman be ascribed to it, but even the introduction of Gothic architecture may be said to be owing to it; for the arch gradually encroached upon the leading principle of Classical architecture—namely, that the horizontal lines should be dominant—until that principle was entirely abrogated, and the principle of the Gothic—namely, the dominant vertical line—took its place.

In the early Christian churches in Rome the arches are usually brick, resting upon marble columns, and are frequently concealed behind a horizontal entablature. When once the open application of the arch above the columns had been introduced, it appears never to have been abandoned, and the entablature was interrupted to suit the arch, the principal object aimed at being an appearance of height and spaciousness; and in some instances in Roman work the entablature is omitted entirely, and the arch rises directly from the capital of the column, as in Gothic architecture. In the 5th and 6th centuries, a piece of entablature is preserved over the capital in Byzantine work, as at Ravenna, and in the Church of Santo Stefano Rotondo in Rome. When, after the dominion of the Romans was destroyed, and the rules governing the true proportions of architecture, from which they had themselves so widely departed, were entirely lost, the na-Roman Arch, Brixworth, Northamptonshire.
tions of Europe began again to erect large buildings, they would naturally endeavor to copy the structures of the Romans; but it was not to have been expected, even supposing they were capable of imitating them exactly, that they would have retained the clumsy, and to them unmeaning, appendage of a broken entablature, but would have placed the arch at once on the top of the column, as we know they did: hence arose the various national styles which preceded the introduction of the pointed arch, including the Norman.

The earliest Norman arches are semicircular and square-edged, as in the remains of the palace of William Rufus at Westminster, not recessed (or divided into orders) and not moulded. As the Norman style advanced, the arches became much enriched with mouldings and ornaments, and recessed, often doubly or trebly recessed, or what Prof. Willis calls divided into two or more orders. The form of the arch also by this time begins to vary very much: a stilted arch is often used, sometimes for greater convenience in vaulting; in other instances, like the horseshoe arch, apparently from fashion only. The form, however, is of very little use as a guide to the date of a building either in this or in the later styles; it is always dictated by convenience rather than by any rule, and it is probable that the pointed arch came in exceptionally much earlier than has generally been supposed. The mouldings and details both of the arch itself and of the capitals are a much better guide to the date than the form of the arch.

Antiquaries are not agreed upon the origin of the pointed arch, some contending that it is an importation from the East, and others that it is the invention of the countries in which Gothic architecture prevailed. It is, perhaps, more true that the Gothic style in which the pointed arch is so chief a feature was gradually developed from the mixture of the Romanesque and Byzantine. But, be its origin what it may, the pointed arch was not introduced to general use on the western side of Europe till the latter half of the 12th century. From that time it continued, under various modifications, to be the prevailing form in the countries in which Gothic architecture flourished until the revival of the Classical orders. One of the best-authenticated instances of the earliest use of the pointed arch in England is the circular part of the Temple Church of London, which was dedicated in 1185. The choir of Canterbury Cathedral, commenced in 1175, is usually referred to as the earliest example in England, and none of earlier date has been authenticated; although it seems probable that many pointed arches of the transitional character with Norman details are at least as early as the middle of the 12th century, if not earlier, as at Malmesbury Abbey, St. Cross, etc.

The only forms used by the ancients were the semicircle (Fig. 1), the segment (Figs. 2, 3), and ellipse (Fig. 4), all which continued prevalent till the pointed arch appeared, and even after that period they were occasionally employed in all the styles of Gothic architecture.

In the Romanesque and Norman styles, the centre, or point from which the curve of the arch is struck, is not unfrequently found to be above the line of the impost, and the mouldings between these two levels are either continued vertically, to which arrangement the term stilized has been applied (Fig. 5), or they are slightly inclined inwards (Fig. 6), or the curve is prolonged till it meets the impost (Fig. 7): these two latter forms are called horsehoe arches. Pointed arches are sometimes elegantly trefoiled or cinquefoiled, etc. (Figs. 16, 17), of various proportions, are frequently met with, especially towards the end of the style, but they are principally used in panellings, niches, and other small openings.

Simple pointed arches were used in all the styles of Gothic architecture, though not with the same frequency. The lancet arch is common in the Early English style, and is sometimes used in the Decorated, but very rarely in the Perpendicular: the drop arch and the equilateral abomb in the first two styles and in the early part of the Perpendicular, but they afterwards, in great measure, gave way to the four-centred. Plain and pointed segmental arches also are frequently used for windows in the Decorated and Perpendicular styles, but not often for other openings. With the Decorated style was introduced the ogee arch (Fr. arcade en talon), Fig. 18, which continued to be used throughout the Perpendicular style, although less frequently than in the Decorated. It is very common over niches, tombs, and small doorways, and in Northamptonshire in the arches of windows but the difficulty of constructing it securely precluded its general adoption for large openings. About the commencement of the Perpendicular style the four-centred arch (Fig. 19) appeared as a general form, and continued in use until the revival of Classical architecture. When first introduced the proportions were bold and effective, but it was gradually more and more depressed until the whole principle, and almost the form, of an arch was lost; for it became so flat as to be frequently cut in a single stone, which was applied as a lintel over the head of an opening. In some instances an arch having the qualities of the four-centred arch is met with, the sides being perfectly straight, except at the lower angles next the impost (Fig. 20): it is generally a sign of late and bad work, and prevailed most during the reigns of Henry VIII., Elizabeth, and James I. The four-centred arch appears never to have been brought into general use out of England, although the Flamboyant style of the Continent, which was contemporary with our Perpendicular, underwent the same gradual debasement. The depressed arches used in Flamboyant work are flattened ellipses (Fig. 21), or sometimes, in late Perpendicular, ogees, and not unfrequently the head of an opening is made straight, with the angles only rounded off (Fig. 22). This last form and the flattened ellipse are very rarely met with in England.

There is also the rampant arch (Fig. 24), the impost of which are at different levels; and what is called a flat arch (Fig. 25), which is constructed with stones cut into wedges or other shapes so as to support each other without the use of a centre; and such stones set ingeniously is often displayed in the formation of these.

Notice must also be taken of a construction which is not unfrequently used as a substitute for an arch, especially in the style which is referred to as perhaps being Saxon, and which produces a very similar effect (Fig. 26). This form consists of two straight stems set near their edge and leaning against each other at the top, so as to form two sides of a triangle and support a sini pericentum weight; excepting in the style just alluded to, these are seldom used except in rough work or in situations in which they would not be seen.

There is one form given to the heads of openings which is frequently called an arch, although it is not one. It consists of a straight lintel supported on a corbel in the upper part of the arch. It is particularly introduced in the Early English style, and is seen in the flat-headed arches (Fig. 27), on the side of a door or window, and from its resembling a man's shoulders with the head cut off. These heads are most commonly used for doorways. In the southern parts of the kingdom they are rare, and when found are generally of Early English date; but in the North they are much more frequent, and were used to a considerably later period.

As the arch forms so important an element in the Gothic style as distinguished from the entablature of the Greek and Roman styles, it is introduced in every part of the building and receives a great variety of ornamentation. In the Norman style such ornaments as the zigzag and the key are common, but in the Early English style the dog's-tooth in the hollows is very frequent. In the Decorated style the arches are not usually more rich than in the Early English; the mouldings are not so bold nor the hollows so deep, and the plain chamfered arch is very common in this style. When ornament is used, the ball-flower or the four-leafed flower takes the place of the dog's-tooth. The arches of the Perpendicular style are often profusely moulded, but the mouldings less bold and less deep even than in the previous style; they are sometimes ornamented with the foliage peculiar to that style, and sometimes also quite plain.

Archacolyth. Formerly, in some cathedrals, there was a dignitary so named; he was the chief of the acochyth, as the archpriest, archdeacon, and archsubdeacon were of their respective orders.

Archange de Lyon, a French preacher of the Capuchin Order who lived at the close of the 17th century, wrote, Oraison Funèbre de M. Jean de Myapgou, Bishop de Châlon-sur-Saône;—Oraison Funèbre de M. Jean-Armand Mîtte de Choisivière, Marquis de Saint-Chamond (Lyon, 1686). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Archange de Rouen, a French theologian of the Order of St. Francis, lived near the close of the 17th century. He wrote, among other works, Abrégé de la Vie de St. Vincent (Paris, 1687);—Paroles du Nouveau Testament pour Éclairer les Gens du Monde sur l' Importance du Salut (Ibid. 1891);—La Vie de St. Elisabeth, Fille du Roi de Hongrie, Duchesse de Thuringe (Ibid. 1892);—La Règle du Tierce Ordre de St. François (Ibid. 1796). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Archange de Valognes was a Capuchin of Normandy in the 17th century, who exercised, in the island of Jersey, the functions of apostolic missionary. He wrote a book entitled Le Directeur Fidèle (Rouen, 1645, 6 vols. 8vo).

Archangello di Borgo Novo (or Archangelus di Barugono), an Italian theologian of the Order of Minorites who lived in the last half of the 16th century, applied himself to scholastic philosophy, and studied Hebrew and the Talmud. He wrote, Trattato ossia Dichiarazione della Virtù e Dignità del Nome di Gesù (Ferrara, 1557);—Apologia pro Defensione Doctrina Calaba contra Petr. Garsiùm (Bologna, 1604);—Codex Naturalis Solonae (Venice, 1599). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Archangels are represented as the seven principal angels or rulers of the heavenly choir. Scripture gives us the names of four—viz., Michael, Gabriel, Raphael and Uriel; tradition supplies the other three—viz., Chamael, Jophiel, and Zadkiel. Michael is represented as the guardian and protector of the Jewish Church; and when the synagogue gave place to the Church of Christ he became the patron of the Church militant. He is of stature of five times. Gabriel was the archangel who announced to Mary the conception of our Blessed Lord, and to Zacharias the birth of John the Baptist. Raphael was the guardian and protector of Tobias. Tradition says that it was Raphael who appeared to the shepherds by night, announcing our Blessed Lord’s nativity. Uriel appeared to Eudras to interpret God’s will to him (2 Eudras iv.). It was Chamuel who wrestled with Jacob. Tradition also says it was he who appeared to our Lord in the garden of Gethsemane. Jophiel was guardian of the tree of knowledge of good and evil, and drove out Adam and Eve from Paradise. It was Zadkiel who stayed the hand of Abraham when about to offer up Isaac. See ANGELS.

Archangiolo della Presentazione was a monk of the Order of Barefoot Carmelites, and reader in theology in Italy, who flourished about the middle of the last century, published The Thirteen Books of the Confessions of St. Augustine of Hippo (Florence, 1757, fol.), illustrating various points, etc., and also wrote a Life of St. Monica (Sienna, 1757, 4to), in Italian.

Archangels, Antonio dos (in Lat. Antonius de Archangelis), a Portuguese preacher of the Order of St. Francis, was born in 1632. He taught philosophy and theology, distinguished himself in preaching, and died in 1682. He left a number of sermons. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Archard was a monk of Citeaux, and master of the novices at Clairvaux, in the time of St. Bernard, who composed a Life of St. Gervais the Hermit (Douai, 1626), edited by Raisiais. Archard lived about 1140. Cave calls him “philosophus insignis et theologus illustris.” He also wrote some short Sermons to the novices. See Dupin, Bibliothèque Unive, ii, 374; Cave, Hist. Lit., ii, 218.

Archari, the name given toNãoes in the monasteries of the Greek Church. See CLOWDREYS; NOATIVE.

Archbishop’s Cross, a cross affixed to a staff borne before an archbishop, primate, or metropolitan, to signify and symbolize archiepiscopal jurisdiction. See CROZIER.

Archbishop’s Mitre, a mitre similar in kind to that worn by a bishop. In England, for the last hundred and fifty years, the fillet or band round the head has been made after the model of a duke’s coronet, to signify the high temporal rank of the wearer.

Archbishop’s Morse, a cope-brook or cope-clasp, on which the arms of the see of an archbishop are embroidered. Anciently the archbishops of Canterbury commonly left their personal vestments and ornaments for the use of their successors in their see.

Archbishop’s Pastoral Letter, a formal letter written to the faithful of his province by an archbishop, relating either to those general or particular subjects of which he can properly and legally treat, or else to some public event or religious duty to be considered by the Christian people under him.

Archbishop’s Visitation. 1. A visitation by an archbishop of any particular place, church, religious house, or college within his own diocese and jurisdiction of which he is the ecclesiastical ordinary. 2. A visitation in the diocese of one of his suffragans to reform, amend, correct, or reverse a judgment or determination of the said suffragan in any ecclesiastical question. 3. The visitation of any college out of his own diocese, of which he is the legal and customary visitor and the acknowledged ordinary, for a similar purpose.

Archbold, Israel, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Harrison County, Va., Nov. 24, 1807. He received a careful religious training; experienced religion at the age of twenty; was licensed to preach in 1834; and in 1855 united with the Pittsburgh Conference. Between 1846 and 1859 he held a supernumerary relation. He made several attempts to resume the active work, but his health forbade; and he died May 18, 1859. As a man Mr. Archbold was frank, generous, and noble-hearted; as a husband and father, affectionate; as a preacher, original and laborious; and as a Christian, deeply pious and self-sacrificing. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1860, p. 71.

Archdeaconry is the district over which the authority of the archdeacon extends. Of these there are a number in every diocese proportioned to its extent. See ARCHDEACON.

Archdeaconin, Richard (Mac Gillia Cuddy), a Jesuit, was born about the year 1619 at Kilkenny, Ireland, and joined his society in 1642 in Belgium. For fourteen years he acted as professor of exegesis and scholastic theology at Louvain and Antwerp, and died at the latter place Aug. 3, 1683. He is known as the author of Theologia Tripartita, which was first published at Louvain in 1611 under the title, Tractatus Controversiae Fidei ad Faecem Memoriae Divino Legis Legis, etc., and was also published as a manual among the clergy, was often reprinted; the best edition is the one which appeared at Dillingen in 1694 (3 vols. fol.). By a decree dated Dec. 22, 1700, the work was prohibited with the remark “donee corrigatur.” Later editions, as those of Antwerp, 1718; Cologne, 1737, 1744, etc., contain the required corrections. See Sotwell, Bibl. Script. Soc. Jes.; Hurter, Nomenclator, ii, 874 sq.; Comely, in Wetzer u. Welte’s Kirchen-Lexikon (2d ed., s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Archdruid was the chief of the Order of Druids (q. v.). The order in every nation, where their religion prevailed, had a chief priest, or Archdruid, who possessed absolute authority over the rest. There were two in Britain, residing in the islands of Anglesey and Man. The Druids rose to their principal dignity through six different gradations, distinguished by their costumes, of which the Archdruids constituted the sixth or highest. They were completely covered by a long mantle and flowing robes, wearing an oaken crown, and carrying a sceptre; in the occasion of the famous ceremony of cutting the mistletoe, it was the office of this functionary to climb the oak and cut the mistletoe with a golden sickle.

Archeg, a martyr, was one of seven who were burned at a place called The Little Park, in Scotland, on April 4, 1519. The principal cause of his being martyred was teaching his children the Lord’s Prayer and the Ten Commandments. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 557.

Archey, J. G., a Presbyterian minister, was born near Churchville, Harford Co., Md., in September, 1842. He graduated at Dickinson College in 1861, and in 1865 at Princeton Theological Seminary. He was licensed by the Presbyterian Church in 1867, and ordained to the ministry in the same year. He was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Clearfield, Pa., where he remained until death, which was occasioned by the car in which he was sleeping falling over an embankment three miles west of Pittsburgh, Jan. 12, 1889. See Presbyterian, 1889. (W. P. S.)

Archies, Dean of. See ARCHIES, COURT OF.

Archevolti, Samuel, a Jew, who lived in the 16th century, is known for his labors in Hebrew exegesis. He is the author of a grammatical work, entitled יְבַנְיָם יְךָרִים, an extensive sūrā was divided into thirty-two chapters, of which the twenty-sixth and twenty-seventh chapters are devoted to the accents, the twenty-eighth and twenty-ninth to the style, the stichioth and steganography, and the thirty-first and thirty-second to the modern Hebrew metres.
ARCHFLAMEN 205

Archiflamen, one of the chief priests, or flamines, among the ancient Romans. See Flamen.

Archifraternities are those religious orders, in the Roman Catholic Church, which have given origin to others, or have authority over them. They convey to those to which they are subject their laws and statutes, their mode of dress, and their peculiar privileges.

Arch. This place has, with great probability, been identified with the present Ais Arik, a small modern village with a Greek Church adjoining, laid down on the Ordnance map four and one eighth miles west of El-Birch (Conder, "Tent Work," ii, 104; Tristram, "Biblical Places," p. 176).

Archibald (1), a Scottish bishop, was dean of the Church of Moray, and was consecrated bishop of the see of Moray in 1253. He was bishop here in the years 1256, 1268, 1260, 1268, 1269, and 1287. He was also bishop here in 1290. During his episcopate William, earl of Ross, gave to the Church of Moray the lands of Carboll and other lands lying in the shire of Ross. See Keith, "Scottish Bishops," p. 159.

Archibald (2), a Scottish bishop, was archdeacon of Moray, and elected to the see of Caithness in 1275. He is said to have made a solemn composition of an affair that had long been in debate between his predecessors, Gilbert, William, and Walter, bishops of Caithness, and William, father and son, earls of Sutherland. He died in 1288. See Keith, "Scottish Bishops," p. 210.

Archibald, Henry, a Baptist minister, was born at Musselburgh, Scotland, in 1786. He came to the United States in 1818. His early religious associations were with the Established Church, but soon after his conversion he united with the Independents. Not long after he came to the United States he changed his views on baptism, and connected himself with the Baptist Church in Chatham, Conn. Feeling that it was his duty to preach the Gospel, he gave up a lucrative business, was licensed by the Church of which he was a member, and was ordained in Suffield, Conn., May 28, 1825. The churches with which he labored were in Connecticut, New Hampshire, New Jersey, and Vermont, his ministerial life continuing until within three years of his death. Mr. Archibald possessed more than ordinary talents, and was especially familiar with the Scriptures. "Gifted by nature with a strong mind, he brought all his powers to bear upon the one work of preaching Christ, and him crucified." He took a prominent part in the various forms of the New Testament. He was especially active as the advocate of antislavery. He died at the residence of his son, Rev. T. H. Archibald, in Mount Holly, Vt., Dec. 4, 1859. See "Watchman and Reflector," Jan. 5, 1860. (J. C. S.)

Archibald, Robert, a Presbyterian minister, graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1772, and was licensed by Orange Presbytery in 1773. In October, 1778, he was ordained and installed pastor of the Church of Rocky River, where he continued to labor with great success until 1792, "when he became an advocate of the doctrine of universal salvation. In consequence he was suspended from the ministry in 1784, and in 1787 was deposed." See Sprague, "Annals of the Amer. Palæs," iv, 119.

Archibald, William Kerr, a Presbyterian minister, son of Rev. G. D. Archibald, D.D., professor of pastoral theology in Danville Theological Seminary, Ky., was born at Allegheny, Pa., in 1852. At the age of sixteen he was admitted to the Church; graduated at Hanover College, Ind., in 1874, and studied theology in Danville Seminary. In April, 1877, he was ordained to the Presbytery of the Presbyterian Church in the South, upon a call to the pastorate from the Church of Pee Wee Valley, Ky. He was, however, never installed as pastor, but after a year of very acceptable service, he withdrew from the field in consequence of ill-health, which terminated in his death at Danville, Ky., Dec. 8, 1878. Mr. Archibald was gifted with a manly mind, a warm and generous nature, and an ardent piety. (W. P. S.)

Archicantor is the name of the prior or principal of a school of sacred music, of the kind established as early as the 6th century, and which became common in various parts of Europe, particularly in France and Germany. The title of the head officer of these schools was "Reverendus Ecclesiae Canonicus," and his post was highly respectable and lucrative.

Archidioecesis is a title given to two noted canons who were both archdeacons of Bologna—viz. Guido Baitius and John de Anania.

Archimagus was the sovereign pontiff of the Magi among the ancient Persians. He was the head of the whole religious system. He resided in the principal fire-temple, a building which was held in as great veneration by the Persians as the temple at Mecca by the Mohammedans, and to which every one of that sect thought himself obliged to make a pilgrimage once in his life. Zoroaster first settled the fire-temple at Balch, between the Persian frontiers and Hindustan, where he himself, as the archimagus, had his usual residence. But after the Mohammedans had overrun Persia in the 8th century, the archimagus was placed in the necessity of removing into Kerman, a province in Persia lying on the coast of the Southern Ocean towards India. This temple of the archimagus, as well as the other fire-temples, was endowed with large revenues in lands. When the archimagus approached the consecrated fire, he was washed from head to foot, perfumed, and dressed in a vestment white as snow. He bowed to the ground before the flaming altar, and then, assuming an erect posture, he offered up the appointed prayers with bitter sighs and groans. See ZORAMAG.

Archimimus, a Christian confessor, is commemorated in some martyrologies March 29.

Archinto, Alberico, an Italian prelate, was born at Milan. He was archbishop of Nice in 1747; governor of Rome in 1753; and finally became cardinal. He died at Rome in 1758. See Hoefer, "Nouv. Biog. Générale," s. v.

Archinto, Alessandro (1), was an Italian theologian. Charles V, for whom he performed various missions in Milan, gave him the title of count. He died at Milan in 1577. He wrote: "De Beatae Marie Magdalenae Pudicitia ac Virginitate:—Dialogus in quo Philippo Patroculo ac Pompilio Discertentibus quia sit Viulcum Iniquitatis ex XVI Capite Lucam quam duoluminisse explicatur:—Dialogus Alter, in quo eosdem in eos qui pro Salvatore Servatorum servantur, Colloquentes ficti.

All of these works are found in MS at the Ambrosian Library of Milan. The first two are also found in other libraries, particularly in the Casa Archinto. See Hoefer, "Nouv. Biog. Générale," s. v.

Archinto, Alessandro (2), an Italian Jesuit and a miscellaneous writer, was born at Milan in 1577, and died in 1645. He wrote a "Compendium of Rhetoric:—the Rules of Rhetoric:—an historical Treatise, which is preserved in MS. In the Casa Archinto:—also several Archives are the prelates, or first classes of the clergy, in the Russian Church (q. v.). This name includes the whole episcopal order, who are distinguished by the titles of metropolitans, archbishops, and bishops—titles, however, which are not attached to the see, as in England, but are merely personal distinctions conferred by the sovereign, and give the possessors no additional powers, for every bishop is independent in his own diocese, or dependent only on the synod. They are obliged to live rigid and reclusive lives, to abstain from animal food, and they are not permitted to marry. See Archieratus.

Archimandrites is a word which occurs in the canon of the Synod of Aachen, but apparently nowhere else. If the reading be genuine, it would appear that in some dioceses the subdeacons as well as the deacons had their primates; but it is probable that the reading should be subarchidioecumen, which may have been another name for the officer known to some Western dioceses as secundarius, and by another title among the Greeks.

Architrave (Gr. and Lat. = chief-beam), the lowest division of the entablature, in Classical architecture, resting immediately on the scabius of the capital; also the ornamental moulding running round the exterior curve of an arch, and hence applied to the mouldings round the openings of doors and windows, etc. See Column; Order.

Archive was the title of a record which was kept in the early African churches, by which bishops might prove the time of their ordination—an important consideration, insomuch as the oldest bishop, by the rules of these churches, was regarded as chief bishop or metropolitan. One record was kept in the primate's church, and another in the metropolis of the province.

Archivolts (French from Lat. arcus volutus), the under curve or surface of an arch, from impost to impost. The archivolts are sometimes quite plain, with square edges, in which case the term soffit is applicable to it. Figurative archivolts are used in Romanesque styles, including those buildings in England which are by some considered as Saxon and in the Early Norman. In later Norman work it usually has the edges moulded or chamfered off, and towards the end of that style, and throughout all the Gothic styles, it is frequently divided into several concentric portions, each projecting beyond that which is beneath (or within) it.

Archon (ἄρχων, ruler), a name in the Greek Church for several officers.

1. Archon of the Antimins, the keeper of the antimins.

2. Archon of the Contakion, or keeper of the book containing the kontakia, or hymns used on various occasions in the Greek Church (Goar says, "s. i. Librum Missalem in Liturgia"), which seem to have been composed by Romanus.

3. Archon of the Photo or Illuminato (ἄρχων τῶν φώτων) had charge of the newly baptized.

Archon, Louis, a French ecclesiastical writer, was born at Riom, Sept. 4, 1645. At the age of fifteen years he entered the College of Navarre, and in 1662 he commenced his studies at Paris, and having won the favor of the cardinal of Bouillon, he was appointed chaplain to Louis XIV and priest of Saint-Gilbert-Neuf-Fontaines, in the diocese of Clermont. He died Feb. 25, 1717. He wrote, Histoire Ecclesiastique de la Chapelle des Rois de France sous les Trois Rois de nos Rois jusqu'à l'année 1700, Paris, 1716, and a third volume, which includes the reign of Louis XIV, has not been published. See Hoefer, Nouv. BioG. Générale, s. v.

Archontici. See Ascopithetes.

Archimboldi, Antonio, a Milanese ecclesiastic, was son of Giovanni Angelo, archbishop of Milan. He studied law at Pavia in 1556; and, among other ecclesiastical functions, he performed those of apostolic prothonotary. Philip II, king of Spain, conferred on him, in 1557, the honor of senator of Milan, and he became, under the title of l'Archevétre, member of the Academy of the Afflenti. He was versed in the Greek language. His death occurred in 1578. From him we have the following translation: D. Basili Magis Homiliae et Antenellae Arctimboldo pertinente (Milan, 1559) and D. Basilii Magis de Vera et Incorrupta Virginis Liber A. A. Interprete (ibid. cod.).—D. Basili Magis de Gratia Arctimborn Actione Liber e Graeco in Latinum translatus (ibid.)—Gregorius Nazianzeni Homiliae IV, e Graeco in Latinum translati (ib. A. A. Argellati and others attribute to him a translation of certain of St. Chrysostom. Piccinelli believes him to be the author.

Arcimbaldi, Giovanni, an Italian prelate, cardinal, and archbishop of Milan, author of various works, was born at the commencement of the 16th century. Being a member of the College of Jurists in 1436, he was intrusted by the dukes of Milan with important missions. He became successively ducal councillor, president of the tribunal of Entrate Stradonierische, bishop of Novara in 1468, cardinal in 1473, and archbishop of Milan in 1487. He resigned in 1488, had his resignation published in 1515, and was still in possession of his benefice in favor of his brother Guido Antonio. He died at Rome Oct. 2, 1491. His works, which still remain in MS., are as follows: Statuta Plobii Gandiansi, Anno MCDLXIX. — Statuta Riporii S. Juli, Anni MCDLXX. et MCDLXXXV. — Statuta pro Cleri Regni carpiniensi, et Moneta, in Moneta Libri III. The work entitled Catalogo degli Eretici, published in 1514, has been attributed to him, but is probably the work of his son, Giovanni Angelo. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arcimbaldi, Guido Antonio, an Italian prelate, was archbishop of Milan. In 1476 he accompanied the celebrated John James Trivulzio to Palestine; and was many times intrusted by the dukes of Florence, the Venetians, and the kings of Naples, Hungary, and Spain. He became archbishop of Milan in 1488 by the resignation of his brother Giovanni. He died Oct. 18, 1497. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arcimbaldi, Ottavio, an Italian prelate, was born at Milan in 1471. He was a member of the College of Jurists; and distingushed himself by his great learning. He had, it is said, a perfect knowledge of Hebrew, Greek, and Latin. Appointed archbishop of Milan in 1503, he died before taking possession of his see. The six sonnets which Argelotti attributes to him, and which he indicates as first in the collection of the Academy of Transformation of Milan in 1548, are rather the work of Ottavio, son of Giovanni Angelo. This academy was not founded until 1546. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arciszewski, Elias, a Polish theologian, father of the celebrated governor of Brazil, lived in the 16th century in the city of Schmielge, where he was pastor. He wrote and published the preface of a celebrated treatise on the veneration entitled De Jrrencia, by Rupert and Sozanni spoke with high praise of the knowledge of Arciszewski. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arco, Alexius (or Alfonso del), a Spanish painter (also called el Sordillo de Pereda, on account of his deafness and from the name of his master, Pereda). He executed historical paintings. But his impelled by motives of cupidity, wished him to unite himself with conductors less skilled than himself. He died at Madrid in 1700 in great poverty. His wife then accepted relief from the marquis of Santiago, and her two daughters took the veil. His works are found in many villages of Spain. The most noteworthy is the Baptism of St. John, in the Church of the city saint, at Toledo. Other paintings of his are the Miraculous Conception, and The Assumption, in the Cloister of the Trinitarios Descalzos at Madrid:—also a picture of St. Teresa, in the Church of San Salvador. His coloring was charming, but his designs were faulty. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Aronnati (1), an Italian Franciscan monk and composer of music, was born about 1610. He entered this order while very young, applied himself diligently to the study of music, and wrote for the Church a large number of masses, motets, and other fragments of music. He was appointed master of the chapel of the Convent of St. Francis of Bologna in 1658, in place of Guido Montalbani; but he died soon after, in 1657. His musical works may be found in the library of the convent. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aronnati (2), a learned Italian Jesuit, was born in 1615. He came of a noble family of Milan, entered the Order in 1635, and resided in the College of Jurists in 1647. He wrote, Prolegomena Posthumae in Graecia Rhetorvm Bra

Arcos, Cristóval, a Spanish priest and translator, a native of Seville, lived in the early part of the 16th century. He wrote a translation of De Bello Rhodio of J. de La Fontaine, and not of Fontanus, as Jocher claims:—La muy illuminated cousina y Cronica de la Historia del Mundo, by Rodas (Seville, 1549);—Itinerario del Venerable Varrón Patricio Romano (ibid. 1590). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arcosolium is a term supposed to denote those tombs hewn in the rock of the Catacombs of Rome (and elsewhere) in which there is an arched opening above the portion reserved for the deposition of the body, the grave being dug from above downwards into the reserved portion below the arch. Others suppose it to mean the sepulchral chambers, or cubicula, in which the great majority of these tombs are found. In the tombs of this kind the receptacle for the corpse was sometimes covered by a slab of marble, or sometimes a marble sarcophagus was inserted. In a sarcophagus the sarcophagus projects forward into the chamber, and the sides of the arch are continued to the ground beyond the sarcophagus. Such slabs or sarcophagi have been supposed to have served as altars during the period of persecution, as being the resting-places of saints or martyrs, and in some instances this may have been the case; but the far greater number of these tombs are, no doubt, of later date, being simply the monuments used by the wealthier class. The bishops and martyrs of the 3d century were placed, not in these arcosolia, or monumenta arcuata, but in simple foci—excavations in the wall just large enough to receive a body placed lengthwise. In the 4th and 5th centuries the humble loculus was altered into the decorated monumentum arcuatum, and the whole sepulchral chamber, in many cases, was richly adorned with incrustations of marble, with stucco, and with paintings. An excellent example of this is afforded by the chamber in the Cemetery of Calixtus, in which the remains of Pope Eusebius (390-403) and Militaries (or Melchiades, 311-314) were placed, a part of which is represented in the annexed wood-cut. In the walls of this chamber are three large arcosolia, in front of one of which was a marble slab, with an inscription by pope Damasus commemorating pope Eusebius. The whole chamber has been richly decorated with marble incrustations, paintings, and mosaics. These decorations it would seem reasonable to assign to pope Damasus, who undoubtedly set up the inscription. In the year 1863, in the Cemetery of St. Callixtus, an unviolated arcosolium was discovered; in this a marble sarcophagus was found, in which lay a body swathed in numerous bands of linen exactly in the manner shown in the early representations of the raising of Lazarus. These arcosolia were often decorated with paintings, either on the front of the sarcophagus or on the wall above it. One of the most remarkable instances is the tomb of St. Hermes, in the catacomb near Rome, dedicated by his name. The tombs of this class are more usually found in the cubicula, or small chambers, than in the galleries of the catacombs; in the former, two, three, or more are often found. Martigny seeks to draw a distinction between those found in the cubicula, which he thinks was often or generally those of wealthy individuals made at their own cost; and those in the so-called chapels or larger excavations, which he thinks were constructed at the general charge of the Christian community. In one such chapel in the Cemetery of St. Agnes, near Rome, there are eleven such tombs. It is claimed that such chapels, specially connected with the veneration of martyrs, do not usually date from an earlier period than the 4th or 5th century.

Arculf (c. 680 – 740), a Frankish bishop, lived in the last half of the 7th century. He is known by his journey into Palestine, which he undertook with Peter the Hermit, a native of Burgundy. He spent nine months in exploring the holy places, especially of Jerusalem and its surroundings. He then visited Damascus and Tyre, going afterwards to Alexandria, to the Isle of Crete, and to Constantinople. He returned to Rome by sea, visiting Sicily on his way. It is said that, desiring to revisit his native country, he again embarked on the sea, and was thrown by a tempest upon the coast of Great Britain, and came to the Isle of Hy, in Ireland.

Adamnan (c. 674 – 725), a monk of the Monastery of the Isle of Hy, treated him very kindly, and to him he related his adventures. Adamnan wrote out this recital, and in 698 presented it to Alfred, king of Northumberland. It consists of three books, of which the first contains Arculf's description of Jerusalem, the second gives his travels in the Holy Land, and the third presents the wonders of Constantinople. Bede gives an extract of it in his Hist. Eccl.

Ardèche, a department of France, in the region of the Rhône valley.

Ardhman (c. 645 – 720), a Spanish painter and architect, was born at Madrid in 1664. In 1689 he went to Granada, and there did much painting. In 1694 he became chief master of the Cathedral of Toledo; in 1700 he received a similar appointment at Madrid; and again in 1702, from Philip V, who placed him over the Alcázar and other palaces of Madrid, with a salary of four hundred ducats per annum. As an architect he designed the decorations at the celebration of the funeral of the dauphin of France in 1711, and of the queen Maria Louisa of Savoy in 1715, at the Convent of the Incarnation at Madrid. In 1719 he designed the principal part of the palace and gardens, the Collegiate Church, and the great altar of San Ildefonso. He was known also as an architectural and scientific writer. He was living, probably, in 1730.

Ardene, Jean Paul de (1620–1695), a French priest of the Oratory, and brother of Esprit Jean (de Rome d'Ardène), was born at Marseilles in 1620, and gained several academical prizes for his poetical essays. He became superior of the college of his congregation. The last half of his life was passed at Sisteron, where he died, Dec. 5, 1769. His works are, Traité des Tulipes:—Amné Claude:—Traité des Oeillet (1762).

Ardente, Alessandro, a Piedmontese painter who flourished from 1660 to 1692. There is a picture of the Conversion of St. Paul by him, at Turin, in the Monte della Pietà, which is considered a grand piece of painting. Ardenne was painter to the Court of France, and died at Paris in 1757.

Arderne, James, an English divine, dean of Chester, was a native of Cheshire, and was educated in Christ's College, Cambridge. In 1673 he became a fellow-commoner of Brasenose College, Oxford. He held the livings of St. Botolph, Aldgate, London, from 1666 to 1682, when king Charles II bestowed upon him the deanship of Chester. He died Sept. 18, 1691. His writings are, Directions concerning the Matter and Style of Sermons (1671, 12mo):—Conjectura circa Eravoyn D. Clementis Romani, cui subjecturitas Caritatum in Epiphanius et Paternius de Eucharistia, de Calvinii Clerici, et de Oratricionibus pro Vitis Francis (London, 1688, 4to). He printed some single Sermons. See Chalmers, Biographical Dictionary, s. v.; Allibone, Dictionary of British and American Authors, s. v.

Ardisia, a goddess, said by Pliny to have had a temple adorned with fine paintings, under the name of Junco Ardisia, and a similar altar of Lucina Ardisia.

Ardinghelli, Nicola, an Italian cardinal, was a native of Florence. After having been associated with cardinal Farnese (elected pope afterwards under the name of Paul III), he became secretary of cardinal Alexander Farnese, nephew of the pontiff. Paul III charged him with the reconciliation of Charles V with Francis I. He accompanied cardinal Alexander into Italy, and from Germany and France, and on his return was made cardinal himself. He died in 1547 at the age of forty-five years. He wrote a book, entitled *De Negotiatione sua pro Pace Ineunda inter Carolum V et Franciscum:—also some poetical sketches. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Ardo was a monk of the Abbey of Arian, in the diocese of Montpellier. He was originally called Smaragdus, and was one of the first disciples of St. Benedict of Arian, whose Life he wrote. Many other works go under the name of Smaragdus; but there is a great controversy among the learned whether they belong to this or another writer. The Life of St. Benedict is certainly his, and may be found in Mandus, Observ. de Martyrolog. Benedict. lib. ii; also in Mabillon, Sac. Benedict. iv.

1. He was highly esteemed by Charlemagne, and died March 7, 848, aged sixty-six. See Cave, Historia Literarii, ii, 23.
Ardorno, Benjamin, a German rabbi, lived probably in the 16th century. He wrote a treatise entitled "Mikneh Yisrael," a shape of which was first printed at Venice in 1552, which was a work of authority among the Jews. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Ardoult, Maestro, an Italian architect and sculptor, a native of Venice, lived in the 16th century. There is at the monasterie del Carmine, of that place, a Madonna and Child, bearing the name of this artist; and it is said he laid the first foundations of the Church of San Petronio of Bologna. He has been confounded with another Ardoult, beadle of the College of Medicine at Bologna, a painter and engraver upon wood, and a botanist. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Area, a space within which monuments stood, being protected by Roman law from the acts of ownership to which other lands were liable. In the Roman catacombs care has evidently been taken lest the subterraneous excavations should transgress the limits of the area on the surface. This reverence of the Roman law for burial-places enabled the early Christians, except in times of persecution, to preserve their relics and to consecrate their tombs. The tombs of the martyrs were especially so preserved, where meetings for worship were held and churches frequently built. So the Acta Proconsularia of the trial of Felix speak of the area, "where you Christians make prayers." These areas were frequently named after some well-known person buried there; thus St. Cyprian is said to have been buried "in the area of the procurator Caudianus." In another work, certain citizens are said to have been shut up in area marratum, where, perhaps, a church is intended. The name area is also applied to the court in front of a church.

Arelius (or Arelius; vulg. Arely), st. bishop of Nevers, is only known by his subscriptions to the acts of the Councils of Orleans (549) and Paris (551). He is honored on Aug. 16 at Decize, near Nevers. See Baillet, Aug. 16. See also ARDUSIS.

Areola (or Areus), that is, the warrior, or to whom prayers are addressed, was a title of Jupiter, as ARITA was of MINERVA.

Aremberg, Charles d', a French monk of the Order of Capuchins, was born in 1593. He was son of Charles of Ligne, duke of Aremberg, and entered his order in March, 1616. He wrote, Flores Seraphici, sive Icones, in quibus continentur Vite et Gestas Illustrium Ordinis Fratrum Minorum Sancti Francisci Capuccinorum, qui ab Anne 1595 usque ad annum 1616, in eodem Ordine, ac Vite Sanctorum florettur (coronne, 1640-41): Cygnus Seraphicus, sive Sactum Vitae in Defensionem Amnitati Fratrum Capuccinorum (ibid. 1643). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Areona (Lat.), the floor of an amphitheatre, a wooden floor covered with sand for the athletes to wrestle upon was here applied to the area itself, often confounded with the area or open space, and in that sense applied also to the body of a church.

Arenaria is a name sometimes applied to the Catacomb (q. v.).

Arend (or Arent), Caius, a German theologian, was born in the Duchy of Holstein in 1614. In 1633 he went to the University of Rostock to study under Laurentius and the year following he was made professor of philosophy. In 1638 he went to Sweden as instructor of the young and as merchant. There he performed ministerial functions in several localities. During the Thirty Years War he was often the victim of a long series of hostilities, against which he opposed this maxim: "Patience devours the Devil." He died in 1691. He wrote, Grammaticus christischer Hebräer (Glinkstald, 1666): Drei schöne Amaranthen auf dem Sarg Dr. Christiani von Stöckens (ibid. 1865). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arenda, Council of (Concilium Arendense), was held in December, 1473, at Arenda, in Spain, in order that some remedy might be applied to correct the ignorance and immorality of the clergy. Alfons, archbishop of Toledo, with his suffragans, made there twenty-nine rules of discipline, among which are the following: viz. that no one shall be admitted to holy orders who is not acquainted with Latin; that the clergy shall not wear mourning; that bishops shall not appear in public without the rochet; that they shall never wear any garment made of silk; that they shall cause the Holy Scriptures to be read at their table; etc. The other canons relate to such cases as fornication among the clergy, clandestine marriages, simony, shows and dramatic representations held in churches, sports forbidden to clerks, duels, rapes, etc. This is the same with the Council of Toledo of the same year. See Labbe, Concil. xiii, 1473.

Arentius, Bernardus (Bernhard Arim), a Lutheran minister, was one of the earliest clergymen of his denomination in New York city, succeeding the Rev. Jacob Fabricius as pastor of Trinity Lutheran Church, at the south-west corner of Broadway and Rector Street. This church was erected in 1671, and was built of logs. Mr. Arentius became its pastor about the year 1700, the services were held in the Low Dutch, the date of his death is unknown. See Quar. Rev. of Evang. Luth. Church, vii, 272.

Arepel, Samuel, a Jewish writer of Safed, in Upper Galilee, who lived during the 16th century, is the author of הלא עארפל, or epistles on the Pentateuch (Venice, 1569), חכם עארפל, or a commentary on Ecclesiastes (Constantinople, 1591), and, more briefly, מורה עארפל, or a commentary on the alphabetic Psalms and the Songs of Degrees (Venice, 1576), etc., and a commentary on the Canticles (Safed, 1579). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 50; De Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Ger. transl.), p. 46; Etheridge, Intro. to Heb. Literature, p. 415. (B. P.)

Aresi, Paolo, an Italian theologian and preacher, was born at Cremona in 1574. He was of a Milanese family, and his father was invested with the dignity of podesta at Cremona. He entered the Order of Theatines in 1598. Eight years afterwards he was professor of philosophy and theology at Naples and Rome. His success in preaching was not small; and he became in this capacity extended throughout Italy. He became confessore to the princess Isabella of Savoy; and in 1629 pope Paul V made him bishop of Tortona, which position he held for twenty years. But he did not relinquish his theological studies. His devotion to literature did not interfere with his episcopal functions. He died June 13, 1644. He wrote, In Libros Aristotelis de Generazione et Corruptione (Milan, 1617): De Agua Transformatione in Sacrifico Massa (Tortona, 1622); Antwerp, 1622; Velutanius sive Apocryphi (Milan, 1677, with the Life of the author by P. Sondragi): Arte di Predicare Bene (Venice, 1611): Imprese Sacre con Tripliottici Discorsi Illustrate ed Arricchite (Verona, 1618; Frankfort, 1702). This is the most remarkable work of this author. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.
ARESON, an Icelandic bishop and poet, was born in 1484. While very young the death of his father left him to the care of his mother, who taught him to write and to chant Latin. At the age of twenty years he took holy orders, and acted as preacher in the parish of Helgastad, in Reikjadal. At that time bishop Gottschalk, of Holum, sent him on a mission to Norway; and so well did he execute his commission, and so much skill did he display, that he was chosen to succeed the bishop as his death. This excited the jealousy of certain aspirants for the position, especially of a certain Bodur, who founded his protestation against the election on the ground that Areson was ignorant of Latin. Areson responded to him in Icelandic verse. But another and more formidable opposition presented itself. Ogmond, bishop of Skalholt, claiming the vacant seat, marched against him at the head of troops. After some difficulty, Areson was established in his position in 1524.

He passed the remainder of his life in religious disputes. A conflict was raised between him and the king of Denmark, Frederick III, occasioned by the tendency of that prince to introduce Lutheranism into the States. Areson claimed that he overreached his prerogative in meddling with spiritual affairs. After a long struggle Areson and his two sons were put to death, Nov. 7, 1559; after which Protestantism made rapid progress in Iceland. Areson was the first to introduce printing into his country. At Holum Poggius published, in 1580, Manualia Pastorum. As a poet he was without doubt, the most distinguished of his time. He wrote a poem, entitled PiaLargratur, or Lamentation on the Passion; and a paraphrase upon Psalm li in the Theodiscum Vituboc of 1612. His other poems are found in Harboe's History of the Reformation in Iceland. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aretas, Sr., was an Arabian martyr who, together with three hundred and forty Christians, was beheaded by Dunaan, king of the Homerites, about the year 559, in the city of Nagan. The Greek monoglia mark his festival on Oct. 24. See Ballett, Oct. 24.

Aretas, bishop of Capadocia, composed A Commentary on the Apocalypse, which was printed in Greek at Venice in 1582 and 1568, for which Grammata afterwards published it in Greek and Latin at Paris (1631). See Cave, Historia Literaria, i, 520.

Aretas (or Aretas), a Greek priest and theologian of Cesarea, lived in the early half of the 10th century. He left a work upon the Translation of St. Euthymius, patriarch of Constantinople. Aretas the priest must not be confounded with the bishop of Cesarea. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aretino, Francesco, a Franciscan of the strict observance, in the 16th century, wrote, Espositio in Regulam FF. Minorum (Florence, 1594); Interpretatio Commentariorum Chrysostomi in Evang. S. Johannis (Paris, 1418).

Aretino, Guido, of Arezzo, so called because he was born in that city, was a Benedictine monk, and, according to some, abbot of the Monastery of Pompodis, near Ravenna. He discovered six notes in music, in chanting the hymn of St. John, thus:

In the time of pope John XIX, Guido went to Rome, and was favorably received by the pontiff. Baronius, in his Annales, gives a letter written by him to a monk of Pompodis, in which he describes his journey. This monk had assisted him in compiling his Antiphonarium, which he presented to the monastery upon his return. He also wrote a musical work, called Micrologus, and another on the Measure of the Monochord.

Aretino, Leonardo Bruno, an Italian writer of the fifteenth century, was born at Arezzo. At the solicitation of Poggius, his intimate friend, he was made secretary of pope Innocent VII, and afterwards, in 1418, of John XXIII, with whom he attended the Council of Constance. Poggius addressed to him his celebrated letter upon the punishment of Jerome of Prague. After the council he was made chancellor of the republic of Florence, which office held till his death, in 1448. He was buried in the Church of Santa Croce, where a full epitaph adorns his splendid tomb. He was guilty of the dishonesty of translating the (Gothic) History of Procopius into Latin, and publishing it as his own; but the deceit was discovered shortly after his death. He wrote also the Historia del Popolo Liberi (Terra di Roma), Epistolae VIII (Ibid. 1521; Baele, 1585, 8vo), etc. See Cave, Hist. Lit., ii, App. p. 122.

Aretino, Pietro, an Italian writer, was born at Venice, and died in 1556. His boldness in criticising public men obtained for him the sobriquet of the "Phil of That Time." He composed the following works:--

-- The Penitential Psalms:--The Life of the Blessed Virgin; of St. Thomas Aquinas; St. Catherine of Siena, etc.

Aretual, Cesare, an Italian painter, was born at Modena, and lived about 1590. He imitated the works of Bagnacavallo, and surpassed all artists then living as a copyist of the works of great masters. He could assume the style of almost any painter, and pass off many of his copies as genuine. He was so successful in imitating the works of Correggio that he was employed to restore the painting executed by that artist for the tribune of the Church of San Giovanni at Parma, where it still remains. In the Church of San Giovanni del Monte, in Parma, is a fine altar-piece by this master, representing the Virgin and Infant, with two female figures embracing each other.

Arey, St. See Areugius, St.

Ares, in Persian mythology, is one of the six mighty fish spirits (agathodemos) in fish forms) which Ormuzd created as protecting spirits of the tree of life, Gurgad, which stands in the sea, Fere, king of the sea, and another monster which Ahriman created. The latter has the appearance of a frightfully large turtle. It seeks to gnaw at the tree and to swallow the fish. Ares is the life-giving principle of the water, therefore figuratively father of the aquatic beings. Ares is also called king of all things in heaven.

Aresco, Francesco da, an Italian friar of the Franciscan Order, was born in 1553. He filled various positions, particularly that of confessor of Ferdinand I, grand-duke of Tuscany. His sermons were eloquent, and he wrote several theological works. He died in 1616. The following works have reached several editions: Summa Theologiae Speculativa et Moralis, ae Commentarii Scholasticae in Tertium et Quaternum Sententiarum Librum Joannis Duns Scoti (Venice, 1681, 1615, 1616, 1619);--Criminale Canonicum (Ibid. 1617; Perugia, 1669). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arezco, Scipione Burali da, an Italian cardinal, was born at Altı, near Gaeta, in 1511. He studied law, received the degree of doctor at Bologna, and met with so great success as advocate at Naples that Charles V appointed him in 1550, member of the collaterall council of the kingdom of Naples. In 1557 he retired to a monastery of the Order of the Theatines, where he took the name of Brother Paul. His talents and services were not, however, overlooked, for in 1562 Philip II appointed him to the archiepiscopal see of Brindisi, which honor he declined. Several bishoprics were suc-cessarily offered him, but he persisted in his refusal of them. Two years after, delegated by the city of Naple, he undertook a difficult mission to him; he went to protest against an attempt of Philip II to introduce the Spanish Inquisition into Italy. His success greatly augmented his popularity among the Neapolitans. He was immediately called to Rome, where he occupied successively different ecclesiastical positions until 1568, when his health made bishop of Palermi. In 1570 he was made cardinal, and in 1576 the pope made him archbishop of Naples, where he died in 1578, and was interred in the Theatine Church of St. Paul. His test-tament and a letter in Latin upon the motives which prompted him to refuse the see of Brindisi are found in his biography published by Bagatta, a brother of his order (Verona, 1698). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arezzo, Tommaso, an Italian cardinal, was born at Orbietto, Tuscany, Dec. 17, 1756. He was the younger son of Claudio Maria Arezzo, says Aretius, the historiographer of Charles V. He was placed in the College of Nazareno at Rome, which at that time had illustrious professors. He studied rhetoric under Francesco Tasso, philosophy under the celebrated Beccaria, and theology under Molinelli. In 1777 he entered an ecclesiastical college in order to study civil and canonical law. Among his ecclesiastical honors, he was charged with the duties of chancellor. Pius VI sent him as vice-legate to Bologna, and appointed him successively governor of Ferrara, of Pernigo, and of Macerata. In 1798 Arezzo abandoned this position and retired into Sicily, where his family originated. Two years after, he returned to Rome and was appointed archbishop in partibus of Seleucia, in Syria, and in 1781 ambassador extraordinary to the court of Russia, in order to co-operate in the union of the Greek Church. The death of Paul I caused him to leave St. Petersburg, and he went as legate to Dresden. Upon the invitation of Napoleon, he presented himself before the emperor at Berlin (1807), who sent him to Rome to arrange the difficulties which existed between France and the Holy See. Not having succeeded in this mission, his conduct was taxed with perfidy, the more so as he was appointed governor of Rome in place of the prelate Cavallini. He was arrested in September, 1808, but finally obtained his liberty and retired to Florence. He escaped sentence of death by fleeing to Sardinia in the guise of a Jesuit priest. He was appointed Bishop of Torres-Mon-cardinal of St. Peter's, and on Sept. 29 of the same year he went as legate to Ferrara. He refused the bishopric of Novara and the archbishopric of Palermo, which the king of the Two Sicilies offered him. In 1830 he was called to the vice-chancellorship of the Church and appointed bishop of Sakin. He died at Ferrara, Feb. 5, 1832, and was interred in the Church of St. Lawrence. The memoirs of Arezzo, so valuable concerning the ecclesiastical history of his time, were never published. Cardinal Arezzo was the founder of the academy called "Degli Arriati" at Ferrara, and he re-established the Confraternity of the Holy Name, which was founded in that place by St. Ignatius. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arfelia, in Roman mythology, was the name of the water which was sprinkled about at death-sacrifices as a libation for the subterranean gods.

Argaz, Gregorio, was a Spanish Benedictine of the 17th century. In a monastery of Old Castile he wrote a history of the Spanish Church, entitled Población Eclesiástica de España, y Noticia de sus Primeras Nuevas Hallazgos en los Escritos de San Gregorio, Obispo de Cremona y en el Canto de la Virgen de San Benito. The first volume of this work was published at Madrid in 1667. the second in 1668, and two others in 1669. Argaz was convicted of having forged the documents from which he had written this work; but this was one of the frauds considered justifiable by the ecclesiastics. He published in 1670 a defence of his work entitled Instrucción Histórica apologética para Religiosos, Eclesiásticos, y Siglares (Madrid). Besides several other collections, he also published Obispado de España, which was never published. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Argull, John, an English clergyman and writer, was born in London, and educated at Christ Church, Oxford, where he graduated A.M. in 1655. He afterwards studied divinity, took holy orders, and obtained the living of Hatfield, in the county of Suffolk. He died at Chelbiton, near Halesworth, in October, 1660. He published, De Vera Prolinnitus (1640);—and Introduccio ad Artem Dialeticam (1650). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Wood, Athenae Oxonienses; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Argelli, Cesare (also called Poltroni, after his mother), an Italian canonist, archbishop of Avignon, was born at Bologna in 1677. He studied jurisprudence, was made LL.D., became judge of the Court of Appeals at Rome, and archbishop of Avignon the year before his death, which occurred in 1648. He wrote, De Lege-

Adrian. tollend. (Venice, 1611);—De Acquirenda Pos-sessione, etc. (ibid. 1655). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Géné-

Argimir, Sr., of Cabra, in Andalusia, was martyrised by the Saracens June 28, 856, for abusing the false prophet Mohammed. See Baillet, June 28.

Argivio, a name of June, from Argi, among the Greek sacrifices called Heraia were celebrated in her honor. They made her image in gold and ivory, holding a pomegranate in one hand, and in the other a scepter, upon the top of which stood a cock, because Jupiter changed himself into that bird when he fell in love with her.

Argonauts of St. Nicolas and the Chileans was a military order instituted by Charles III of Spain to go to the end of the 14th century. The patron of the order was St. Nicolas, and the knights wore a collar formed of shells and silver hooks, from which hung a ship, with the motto Non credo tempori. Their name of "Argonauts of St. Nicolas and the Hermit" arises from this collar. They were of the order of St. Benedict, and wore on days of ceremony a large cape or mantle of white silk, over which they hung the collar.

Argonne, Noël, a Carthusian who was born at Paris in 1634, and died at Gaillon in 1704, published in 1668 a work entitled Traité de la Lecture des Pâtes de l'Église. The second edition was published in 1697, and is divided into twelve parts. Part i treat of the authority of the holy fathers, by whom he intends the doctors of the first twelve centuries. He remarks that Protestants are agreed neither as to who are to be considered as the fathers of the Church, nor as to the degree of deference to be paid to their writings. In pt. ii he treat of the necessity of scholastic theology; in pt. iii he delivers a scheme for reaching the fathers with advantage; and in pt. iv he speaks of the use to be made of these writers.

Argota, Hieronimo Contador D', a learned Portuguese Theatine monk, was born at Collares, in Estremadura, July 8, 1676, and was one of the first members of the Portuguese section of the Pontifical Institute. He contributed various historical papers to their Memorias. His chief works are, De Antiquitatis Conventus Brasilior-Augustiani (lib. iv, 1728, 4to, and 1738, an improved edition):—Memorias para a Historia Eclesiástica de Braga (Lisbon, 1732-44, 3 vols. 4to). His other works were sermons and lives of saints. He died at Lisbon in 1749.

ARGUE 212 ARIMINUM, COUNCIL OF

Argue, James, a preacher among the English Methodists, was an Irishman, from Crossford, County Cavan, born in 1805. He was brought under the influence of religion in early life with the New Connection; became a missionary to his brethren in 1828, and for thirty years he labored with much success in Irish circuits. In 1861 he was removed to England, and travelled in seven circuits, enjoying good health for more than seventy years. He died in his work, at Clay Cross, County Derby, May 12, 1875. See Baggaly’s Digest.

Argyle, Jeremiah, an English Congregational minister, was born at Dorchester in 1782, and brought up to the trade of a white-smith. At the age of eighteen he enlisted as a soldier, and served two years, when he again resumed his trade; was converted, joined the Wesleyans, and went to preaching. In 1830 Mr. Argyle became a Congregational minister, and was ordained at Poole, where he labored till his death, Nov. 5, 1868. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1869, p. 190.

Arias, Francisco, a Spanish Jesuit, was born at Seville in 1533, and died May 23, 1605. He left some religious works, translated into French by Belon (Lyons, 1740). St. Francis of Sales commends them. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aribo, fourth bishop of Freisingen, in the 8th century, was a German Benedictine and abbot of the Monastery of Scheleldorf, in Bavaria, founded in 738. In 760 he was made bishop of Freisingen, and died in 783, leaving two works—Vita S. Corbiniani, the first bishop of Freisingen; and Vita S. Emmerani. Maillon has given the first in his Acts, vol. iii; the second will be found in Surius, Sept. 22. See Cave, Hist. Lit. i, 631.

Aribo, archbishop of Mayence, after Erkenbach had held many councils, made a voyage to Rome, and was very zealous in all that related to ecclesiastical discipline. He died in 1031. He wrote a Commentarius in XV Paulinos Graduum, dedicated to Berno, abbot of Reichenau. See Cave, Hist. Lit., i, 631.

Aridius (Aredius, or Areadius; vulgarly called Arige, or Aricide), St., bishop of Lyons, succeeded Secundinus about 608, and died in 613. What possible title this bishop has to be enrolled among the saints of the Church it is hard to conceive. Procopius, in his Chronicle (p. 605, 609, Ruinart’s ed.), plainly attributes to him not only the deposition and banishment of St. Desiderius, bishop of Vienne, in the Synod of Chalon-sur-Saône in 603, but his treacherous murder on his return home in 607; and Aimonius corroborates this accusation. Le Cointe tries hard (tom. ii, upon this year) to exculpate Aridius. However, the Church of Lyons commemorates him on Aug. 12.

Arillaga, Basilio Manuel, D.D., superior of the Jesuits in Mexico, and rector of the College of San Idefonso, of whose early life we have no record, died in the prison of San Idefonso, Aug. 25, 1867, of the privations to which he was subjected. Dr. Arillaga was over eighty years of age, and was arrested by the Liberal authorities, together with bishop Ormaclaza of Vera Cruz. He was probably the most erudite scholar that Mexico ever produced; and had, at one time or another, under his tutorship the most prominent and eminent men of his country. In 1865 the abbe Testory, head-chaplain of the French forces, wrote a pamphlet in defence of the nationalization of Church property, characterizing the Mexican clergy as ignorant and corrupt; to which Dr. Arillaga replied in three pamphlets, a masterpiece of learning, statistics, wit, and sarcasm, bringing upon the abbe Testory the indignation of all uninterested foreigners then in Mexico, and contributing more to the estrangement between the native Imperialists and foreign interventionists, and to the downfall of the empire, than any other power. The memory of Dr. Arillaga will ever be revered by Mexicans, without distinction of party. See Appleton’s Annual Cyclop., 1867, p. 597.

Arimathaea. The only suggestion of a modern site for this place, except Ramleh, which has been offered, is that of Rentish, “a miserable hamlet on an isolated ledge of rock which protrudes in the midst of the plain” not far south of Ludd; but Dr. Robinson, who suggests the possible identity, gives urgent reasons against it (Later Researches, p. 141). In the absence of any other plausible site, we may as well acquiesce in that of Ramleh. For a further description of this place see Porter, Handbook for Syria, p. 112; Bädeker, Palest., p. 133 sq.; Conder, Tent Work, i, 6 sq. See Ramah.

Ariminum, Council of (Concilium Ariminense), held in 359 by order of the emperor Constantius, at Rimini, or Rimino, in Italy. All the bishops of the West were summoned, the emperor promising to supply them with the means of travelling and subsistence. The whole number present was about four hundred; collected from Italy, Illyria, Africa, Spain, Gaul, and England. Of this number eighty were Arians, headed by Ursacius and Valens. The Catholic bishops wished to anathematize the Arian and all other heresies; but were opposed by Ursaces and Valens, who objected to the use of the word "consubstantial," maintaining that it was far better to use the expression "like the Father in all things." The orthodox bishops then declared the formulay of Valens and Ursaces to be utterly at variance with the true faith, and confirmed the acts of Nicæa, which both bishops had already subscribed to. As Valens and his party refused to acquiesce in this decision, the council proceeded to declare them heretics, and excommunicated and deposed them. This decree was signed by three hundred and twenty bishops; and the doctrine of Arians, as well as that of Photinus and Sabellius, was condemned. Both councils were addressed to the emperor, whose mind had been so prejudiced by the Arians that when the Catholic deputies arrived at Constantinople they were refused an audience, and were for a long time, upon one pretext or other, kept without any answer; the emperor delaying matters with the hope that the bishops, wearied out and separated from their churches, would at last yield to his wishes and give up the terms "substance" and "consubstantial." Further, the Arians having compelled the ten deputies of the council, in spite of themselves, to come to Nice, in Thrace, and having intimidated them by threats and worn them out by violence and ill-usage, obliged them at last to consent to abandon the two obnoxious expressions, and to receive a confession conformable to that drawn up at Sirmium two years before. The emperor sent orders to the prefect Taurus not to suffer the council to separate until this confession, which entirely suppressed the words  οὐσία and ἐποίουσα, had been subscribed by all the bishops. With the exception of twenty they all gave way, and signed this confession of faith, known as the formulary of Nice or Ariminum. This triumph being won, a deputation, headed by Valens and Ursaces, was sent to Constantius; and the formulary was circulated throughout the eastern empire. Tens of orders were written by all who should refuse to sign it. St. Hilary says that the acts of the Council of Ariminum were annulled throughout the world; and pope Liberius assured the whole East that those who had been deceived or overcome at Ariminum had since returned to the truth; had anathematized the confession agreed to in that council; and had subscribed the Nicene Creed. See Labbe, Concil. Sacr., ii, 794 sq.

Arindodi, in Hindī mythology, is a highly honored half-goddess of the Tamul inhabitants of India. She was an example of virtue and of household ruling; and even now she is placed over the heavenly household deities.

Aringhi, Paolo, an Italian theologian and writer, died in 1576. He published Roma Subteramcina Norisima (Rome, 1651). This is a translation of an Italian work, in which Bosio gave interesting observations upon the Catacombs, published after his death by Severano. Aringhi has added his own discoveries to the original—Monumenta Infelicislat, sive Mortes Pecatorum Passionis (Rome, 1654):—Triumphus Pessimorum, sive Saeche Paniandium Mortes (ibid. 1670). Aristes, Epistile of. In spite of the many editions and translations which exist of this famous epistle, furnishing us with the history of the origin of the Septuagint (q. v.), no critical Greek text has as yet been given to the public. That it could have been done alone may be seen from Hody's remark in his De Bibliorum Textibus, etc. (Lond. 1683): "Non me furic servari in Bibliotheca Regia Parisiana, alisque quibudam, exemplaria iatius MS. Sed de tal opusculo, quod tantum fustum postossicium penitus relictus, amicos sollicitare et in particularia legere, opere pretius existimavit. Eas curas delineu illis, quibus tanti esse videbatur." But such a disparaging opinion is ill becoming any scholar, and the world at large will never be served by such measures. Perhaps others have been of the same opinion as Hody. At any rate, whatever has been written on this subject will needs be sifted, since we now possess the first critical edition, published with great acumen, from two Parisian MSS., by Prof. Schmidt, in Mera's Ägyptische, vol. iv., etc., 1842. It is entitled Alix Taunamen (Halle, 1869), i, 242 sq. Schmidt is inclined to the opinion that the author of this sūraya, as Epiphanius calls it, was neither a Greek nor one sufficiently acquainted with the Greek language. On the contrary, he thinks that the author was a Jew who lived at the court of Ptolemy. Here, Diacrocricus su- per Aristea de LXX Interpretibus (Amsterd. 1705), and especially the most recent work by Kurz, Arista Epistula Ad Philocretam (Bern, 1872). See Aristes.

(A. P.)

Aristian, one of the elders from whom Papias professed to have derived traditional information (Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. iii, 39), and described by him as a personal follower of our Lord. Beyond this, however, there is no trustworthy information about him. The Roman martyrology (p. 102) states, on the authority of Papias, that he was one of the seventy-two disciples of Christ. It commemorates his martyrdom at Salamin on Feb. 22. Cotelerius thinks that he may be identical with the Aristos who is given as the first bishop of Smyrna (Apost. Conc. vii, 45).

Aristo is mentioned by Lucianus (Cyp. Ep. 22) as the last of the group of Christian martyrs imprisoned with him (A.D. 250) at Carthage; and already dead of hunger, thirst, heat, and crowding into two cells. They seem to be the same commemorated in Africa as saints on April 17.

Aristo, St., and his companions, martyred in Campania about 286, having been originally converted to the faith by St. Sebastian. They were all who should refuse to sign a treaty, drawn up at Sirmium two years before. The emperor sent orders to the prefect Taurus not to suffer the council to separate until this confession, which entirely suppressed the words  οὐσία and ἐποίουσα, had been subscribed by all the bishops. With the exception of twenty they all gave way, and signed this confession of faith, known as the formulary of Nice or Ariminum. This triumph being won, a deputation, headed by Valens and Ursaces, was sent to Constantius; and the formulary was circulated throughout the eastern empire. Tens of orders were written by all who should refuse to sign it. St. Hilary says that the acts of the Council of Ariminum were annulled throughout the world; and pope Liberius assured the whole East that those who had been deceived or overcome at Ariminum had since returned to the truth; had anathematized the confession agreed to in that council; and had subscribed the Nicene Creed. See Labbe, Concil. Sacr., ii, 794 sq.

Aristo of Pella, in Palestine, by birth a Jew, but converted to the true faith, flourished about 186. Mention is made by the author of the Chronicle of Alexander of Apelles and Aristo, who presented apologies to Hadrian, and whom he, says Eusebius praises in his Ecclesiastical History; but nothing of the kind is to be found in Eusebius, and Cave thinks it likely that he has confounded the names of Aristides and Aristo. However this may be, Aristo of Pella wrote a book, entitled A Disputation between Jason and Papiasus, so, at least, St. Maximus says. Whether this Jason was the same Jason of Thessalonica (Acts xvii, 5; Rom. xvi, 21) is very doubtful. Papiasus was an Alexandrian Jew, who, as he appears to have been convinced and baptized, this Disputation for a long time existed in Greek; and Origen entirely refuted the arguments of Celsus, who endeavored to bring it into contempt. It is now entirely lost, although some writers (upon the strength of an expression used by Eusebius, by which he appeared to them to quote from Nicolas Fabrus, when, in reality, he quotes from Jerome) have imagined that it is still in existence. It was translated into Latin by another Celsus, who lived before the time of Constantine. See Cave, Hist. Lit. i, 39.

Aristoctitus, a Manichæan author, of whom nothing is known except that he wrote a book entitled Thesophrus: His name is only mentioned in the Greek form of abjuration (ap. Coteler, Patres Apost. i, 544), which states that he endeavored in this work to prove that Judaism, Paganism, Christianity, and Manichæism were one and the same religion; and that, to deceive Christian readers, he occasionally attacked Manes with vehemence. See Bezaubere, Hist. du Mach.-, ii, 454.

Aristotle (called also Floravum): his family name was Alberi), a celebrated Italian architect of the 15th century, was a native of Bologna. He went to Russia at the entreaty of the czar Ivan III, and, with the permission of the Senate of Venice, to Moscow, where he repaired the Kremlin, which threatened to fall into ruins, owing to the poor quality of cement which had been used. He then taught the Russians the use of metal pieces and found them a considerate and efficient cement. Among the churches we notice a very beautiful bridge; the Church of the Assumption, a magnificent work of Greek-Roman architecture, dedicated in 1479; the Cathedral of St. Michael; the Belvedere Palace; and the walls of the Kremlin. He was given, it is said, as an honorary distinction, the right to stamp his likeness upon coins; and in certain cabinets of medals pieces are found bearing the name Aristotelis. He wished to return to his native country, but the czar would not allow him to do so. Aristotle then summoned the engravers and founders from Italy, among the latter Bossio, who made in 1488 the famous cannon known under the name of our poukhnik. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arius, in the Glossic book Pietas Sophis (367 sq.), was a female archon presiding over the second place of punishment; in form an Ethiopian negro.

Ariurdia (children of the sun) were a sect found in Asia, and particularly in Armenia and the adjacent countries, where they had maintained themselves from the olden times; having sprung from a mixture of Zoroastrianism and heresies. They derived their name from their worship of the sun. Between 833 and 854 this sect took a new form and a new impulse from a person named Sambat, who settled at Thondracus, whence his sect received the name of Thondracian (q. v.).

Arje, Judah Jacob, a Spanish rabbi of the 17th century, who exercised his functions at Hamburg, then at Amsterdam. He wrote, Tabitha Hechal (in Spanish, Middelburg, 1642; translated into French in 1643 under the title Portrait du Temple de Solomon)--Tractatus de Chershesis (Amsterdam, 1647), in Latin: a Spanish version of the Psalms, with the text (ibid. 1671), and other works. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arkhate was an Etruscan divinity who was represented as an old bald- headered man in a cloak, who warns Parnass against the blandishments of the goddess Alpaca.

Aradi, Alessandro, an Italian historical painter, was born at Parma about 1470. He studied at Venice under Giovanni Bellini. In the Church of the Carmelites at Parma is a picture by this master, representing the Anunciation, which is highly praised by the critics. He died in 1528.

Arleri, Pietro, an Italian architect, was born at Bologna in 1338. His family were of German origin (named Arlet). In 1356 he was employed in the construction of the Cathedral of St. Vitus at Prague, commenced in 1348 under the direction of Matthias of Arras. Arleri continued this work until 1386. He also constructed the Church of the Saints at Prague; that of Kolin upon the Elbe; and the bridge of Moldau. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Arlies, Councils of (Concilium Arelatense). Arles (Arlate) is an ancient archiepiscopal see in Lower Provence, on the left of the Rhone, seven leagues from its mouth, about one hundred and eighty-six leagues from Paris. It is said to derive its name from ara elata, a high altar raised here in pagan times. Several councils were held here.

I. The first was a general council of the West, held in 314, by the emperor Constantine, upon the subject of the Donatists. The emperor, in order to get rid of the importunities of these schismatics, who were dissatisfied with the Council of Rome in the preceding year, granted them a fresh hearing, which gave rise to this council.

The number of bishops present was very large—from Africa, Italy, Sicily, Sardinia, and, above all, from Gaul. Among the names subscribed we find those of the bishops of Arles, Lyons, Vienne, Marseilles, Autun, Rheims, Cologne, Rouen, and Bordeaux. Pope Sylvester sent two priests and two deacons. It appears that the matter was examined with even greater care than at Rome in the preceding year. Caelestinus was acquitted, and his accusers condemned. It was also ruled by this council, in opposition to the general practice before this time in the African Church, that persons who have received the form of baptism at the hand of heretics ought not to be rebaptized; and that if it shall appear from their answer that they have been baptized in the name of the Father and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, it shall be enough that they be confirmed in order to receive the Holy Ghost. There were also composed the twenty-two celebrated canons of discipline which bear the name of this council. See Labbe, Concil., 1, 1421.

II. Held in 385, by Constantius. The emperor, happening to be at Arles, lent himself to everything that the Eusebians suggested to him. Already they had invited pope Liberus to attend the council, who, however, sent Vincentius, the aged bishop of Capua, and Marcellus, a Campanian bishop, to demand of Constantius that the place of rendezvous should be Aquileia instead of Arles. Many other bishops were present, but their names are not noted. To request the same thing; but, reasonable as the request was, Constantius took offence at it. In the council the first thing which the Arians required was the condemnation of Sta. Athanasius. Vincentius, on his part, insisted that the true faith should be set forth and defended; but Valens, on account of the empress, persisted in requiring that before anything else was done, the legislates should renounce communion with Athanasius; which they, carried away by the example of others, and, it may be, induced by threats, did, promising no more to communicate with him. When, however, the council had gained this point, they refused to condemn Arius. Photinus of Sirmium, Marcus of Ancyra, and St. Athanasius were condemned here.

III. This numerous council of French bishops was held in 428 (or 429) at Arles or Troyes, at which deputies from the English Church were present, seeking help against the heresy of Pelagius. Germanus, bishop of Auxerre, who was a bachelor of Troyes, who was sent to proceed to England, in order that, having confounded the heretics, they might lead back the Britons to the Catholic faith.

IV. Held about 442, and seems to have been gathered from several ecclesiastical provinces, since it speaks of the obligation of the metropolitans to submit to its decree, and gives itself the title of the great council. It was assembled by Hilary of Arles, and drew up fifty-six canons. One forbade the elevation to the rank of subdeacon of any one who had married a widow. According to Fagi, this council opposed St. Leo against Hilary, who assumed the right of assembling councils in Gaul.

V. Held about the year 458. The subscriptions of the bishops are lost. Fifty-six canons were published, many of which are taken from the councils of Nicæa, Constantinople, and Orange.

10 and 11. Relate to the penance of those who rebelled in time of this council.

15. Forbids a dean to administer the communion when a priest is present.

16. Permits a dean to grant the chiroom to heretics at the point of death who wish to become Catholics.

See Labbe, iv, 1010.

VI. Held in 455, under Ravennus, bishop of Arles, owing to a dispute between Faustus, abbot of the monastery of Lerins, and Theodore, bishop of Fréjus, concerning the jurisdiction of the latter over the monastery.
still practiced in the Church. The fifth canon orders that in all parish churches belonging to the religious, curates taken from the community, or perpetual vicars, shall be placed, without the permission of the minister without the license of the bishop. Theodore, on his part, leaving the care of the lay portion of the monastery in the hands of the abbot. See Labbe, iv, 1023.

VII. A provincial council, convened in 468 by Leon- tius, archbishop of Arles, to oppose Mamertinus, archbishop of Vienna, who had encroached upon the province of Arles. The council of 1267 held about A. D. 705, to con- sider the errors of Lucidius, and was composed of thirty bishops. According to Faustus, they spoke strongly upon the subject of predestination; condemned the opinions of Lucidius upon the subject; and insisted that he should condemn him himself. Lucidius obeyed, and in a letter to the council retracted his errors.

X. Held in 524, under Cassarius, bishop of Arles. Sixteen bishops were present, and four canons were drawn up relating to ordinations, one of which enacts that no man be made deacon under twenty-five years of age. See Mansi, iv, 1622.

XI. Held in 554, under Saporus, archbishop of Arles. Here seven canons were drawn up, the second and fifth of which are to the effect that monasteries, whether for men or women, should be placed under the jurisdiction of the bishop of the diocese. See Mansi, vi, 779.

XII. Held in 595, under a vicar-general at Ferrara, and later the auditor of cardinal Alexander of Este. The canons of Arlotti have been printed in Scajoli, Parnaso dei Poeti Inegnti, and in the collection of Guasco. See Hoefer, Neue Biographie, Generale, s. v.

Armagnac. See Fitz-Ralph.

Armagh, Council of (Concilium Armachianum), was held in 1171, and ordered that all the English who had been kept in a state of slavery in Ireland should be set free. The council acknowledged that the Irish were subject to the authority of England. This appears to be the same with the Council of Waterford in 1158, in Labbe, Conciliarii, x, 1183. See ibid., x, 1452; Wilkins, Conciliarii, i, 471.

Armagni, one of the potent names said by Jerome (Ep. lxxxv, 8) to have been current among the "Bastidians" of Spain in the 4th century. Probably identical with Armagon.

Armandus of Bellevue was a native of France, who entered the Order of St. Dominic, and was made master of the sacred palace. He flourished about the year 1226, and died before the year 1334. He wrote, "Sermon on the Psalms" (Paris, 1519): — Meditations and Prayers (Menfia, 1508): — An Essay on the Difficult Terms used in Philosophy and Theology (Venice, 1596).

Armani, Piermartino, an Italian historical painter, was born at Reggio, in the Modenesian, in the year 1613. He studied under Lionello Spada, with whom, according to Landi, he painted some works in the Church of Santa Maria at Reggio. He died in the year 1699.

Armarius, in monastic establishments, is the pre- centor and keeper of the church books. Armarius is continually used by Bernard for canon and magister ceremoniam.

Armellini, Geronimo (called also Armenini and Jerome of Faenza), a native of Faenza, was general in- quisitor of the Catholic faith at Mantua about 1516. He is supposed to have filled the same position in sev- eral other cities of Lombardy. He wrote a treatise on the sery of heretics according to Sextius Senensis, he wrote against a Calabrian astrologer named Tiberio Rossaliano, who believed that one could easily foretell the deluge by the aid of astronomical calculations, based upon the conjunction of the planets. Echard affirms that the MS. of this work is preserved in the Library of the Vatican; but Mazzucelli states that he was unable to find it either printed or in MS. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Armellini, Mariano, a Benedictine monk and voluminous historian of his order, was born at Ancona, and became a canon in the church of Monza in 1758. He died in the Monastery of Foligno, May 4, 1787. His works are, Bibliotheca Benedictina-Casinaenonis; Bibliotheca Sympothica Ordinis Sancti Benedicti.

Armenia, Council of (Concilium Armenium). A council was held in Armenia, simultaneously with another at Antioch, in 438, condemning the works of Theodorus of Mopsuestia and Diodorus of Tarsus, lately translated into the language of Armenia and Diodorus there.

Armenian Versions. At present there exist three Armenian versions—viz. the Ancient, the Ararat, and the Modern Armenian versions.

I. Ancient Armenian.—Part of the history of this version has already been given under ARMENIAN VERSION (q. v.), and we add here the following: In 1775 a body of learned men at Paris undertook a new and corrected edition of the Armenian Scriptures, to be accompanied with a Latin translation. One of the savants was the abbé Villefroy, for many years a resident among the Armenians. This edition is said to have been the prophet Habakkuk alone appears to have been published. In 1789 the New Test. was printed at Venice, under the editorship of Zobrah, a learned Armenian divine, from MS. authorities, and it was reprinted in 1806. The same scholar prepared and published in 1805 a critical edition of the entire Bible at Venice, at the expense of the monks of the Armenian convent of the island of St. Lazarus, in the lagoons of Venice. This edition was printed chiefly from a Cilician MS. of the 14th century (A.D. 1319); but the editor collated it with eight MSS. of the whole Bible and twenty of the New Test., the various readings of which are subjoined in the lower margin. From this edition the Psalms were published very often; the last edition in 1856. The New Test. was published repeatedly, lastly in 1868; the gospels alone in 1869. A new critical edition of the entire Scriptures was published again in 1869. Besides the Venetian editions, the Armenian Bible was published at St. Petersburg in 1817, and at Moscow in 1843. Some years ago a colony of the Mechitarists established a printing-office at Vienna, and published the New Test. in 1864.

II. Ararat Armenian.—This idiom is spoken in the whole of Armenia, except in the pashalik of Erzerum, and near an inhabited village in the province of Erzerum. Armenians who are dispersed between the Black Sea and the sources of the Euphrates, and thence through Persia and part of Mesopotamia, down as far as the Persian Gulf. The first edition of the New Test. in this dialect, as translated by the German missionary A. H. Dittrich at Shushi, was completed in 1815, and printed at Moscow. A second edition was soon found necessary, and was ordered by the British and Foreign Bible Society. In the meantime the German missionaries had been preceding (encouraged by the Basle Missionary Society) in the translation of the Psalter from the Hebrew, which was not published till the year 1816. Of a revision of the text was undertaken by Mr. Amirchanjanz, in behalf of the British and Foreign Bible Society. The Psalms and the New Test. were published in 1879, after having been revised by the Rev. Dr. Riggs of the American Bible Society. As for the Old Test., Mr. Amirchanjanz is now proceeding with the same, and it is to be hoped that a final form of it is now finished.

III. Modern Armenian.—This dialect, which has adopted many Turkish words, has Constantinople for its centre, and is spoken in the neighboring territories, in Asia Minor, and in the pashalik of Erzerum. From its centre it is also called the dialect of Constantinople. Into this dialect the New Test. was translated by the learned Armenian Dr. Zobrah, of Constantinople. In the year 1892 he completed his work, which he had commenced in 1821. In the year following an edition of one thousand copies of this version was printed at Paris, at the expense of the British and Foreign Bible Society. A new and revised edition was printed at Smyrna, which was followed by another edition, in parallel columns with the ancient version, in 1856. In 1886, in the interest of the American Bible Society, the missionaries in Smyrna proceeded with the translation of the Old Test. into modern Armenian, and completed the work in 1857, which was printed by the American mission at Constantinople for the British and Foreign Bible Society. From time to time this version has been revised and new editions printed. See Bible of Every Land, p. 79 sq.

Armott, Thomas, an English Wesleyan minister, was born in Staffordshire, Dec. 29, 1877. He entered the ministry in 1818; became a superintendent in 1844; and died Oct. 22, 1864. He was happy and useful. See Minutes of British Conference, 1865, p. 13.

Armillum (armil), an embroidered band of cloth of gold, jewelled; sometimes, but not invariably, used at the coronation of English sovereigns. In the form for the coronation of George II, the following direction occurs: "Then the king arising, the dean of Westminster taking the armil from the master of the great wardrobe, putteh it about his majesty's neck," etc. Its symbolism was the divine mercy of the Great Ruler of all things encompassing the sovereign crowned.

Arminius, Fulgentius, bishop of Neso in 1669, voluntarily renounced the episcopacy in 1689 in order to live in retirement. He wrote, Gli Immortali Cipressi: Descrizione de' Funerali d'Ant. Carrafa, duca d'Andria (Zerani, 1645);—Panegirici Sacri, Discorsi, etc. (Bologna, 1631; 1689); —L'Amabissac a Ubbida resita fatta alla Santità di Clemente X, in Nome di Carlo II, Re della Spagna, etc. (Bologna, 1671)—IL Triomfo del Dottore, Funerale per Donna Giusa di Sangro (Naples, 1674). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Armitage, John, an English Independent minister, was born at Chester in 1728. He was educated with a view to commercial pursuits, apprenticed at Liverpool, and converted when sixteen years of age. About 1808 he went to reside in London, but did not unite with the Church of England until 1815. In 1816 he removed to Newport, Monmouthshire, and soon afterwards began to preach in different places as he had opportunity. In 1822 he, with others, established in Newport a Seaman's Society; and afterwards succeeded in obtaining the erection of the Marine's Church. He was also engaged in the establishment of workmen's Tract Society, and was an active supporter of the British and Foreign Bible Society and other institutions of a similar character. In 1831 he gave up business, and retired to the village of Bassaleg. Here, through his efforts, a chapel was obtained, a Church was formed, and a Sunday-school was established; and in 1836 he was appointed pastor of the Church which he had thus gathered. In the following year he became pastor of the Independent Church at Horningsham, Wilts; and having served it a little more than three years he returned to the business which he had forsaken. In 1842 he again retired from commercial pursuits and took up his abode at Carleton; and while resident here he commenced raising a congregation at Pillgwenly, near Newport, and succeed-and in providing a chapel and forming a Church, which he soon handed over to a suitable successor. In 1849 he was rector of the parish of The Holy Trinity Church at Oakhill, Somerset, where he remained till his death.
Oct. 9, 1848. Mr. Armitage was pious, amiable, and in the discharge of all his duties, prompt and conscientious. See the (Lond.) Evangelical Magazine, 1850, p. 567.

Armitage, William Edmond, S.T.D., a bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born in New York City Sept. 4, 1814, at Columbia College in 1849, and at the (Episcopal) General Theologiocal Seminary in 1852. He was assistant minister in 1853, at Portsmouth, N. H.; and was missionary in Augusta, Me., during the following year. Subsequently, until 1859, he was rector there; in that year he became rector of St. John's Church, Detroit, Mich., and continued to serve this parish until 1866, when he was consecrated in that place as assistant bishop of Wisconsin, Dec. 6. His episcopal residence was in Milwaukee.
He died in New York City, Dec. 6, 1873. See Prot. Episcopal Almanac, 1875, p. 144.

Armogaustus, Sr., suffered martyrdom in Africa about A.D. 465, under the heretic king of the Vandals.
He was a Bishop. He lived with a maiden to which, says the legend, snapped like spider's web at the prayer of the saint, who was then condemned to the mines. He is commemorated March 29. See Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Armogen is, in the system of the Barbelote (Ophiites) as expounded by Irenaeus (108 ed. Massuet), the second "szygyy," consisting of "Christ" (the Primal Light) and "Incorruption." It thus brings into existence four luminaries or derivative lights to attend upon "Autogenes," the product of the first "szygyy." Of these the "first and great" luminary was "Soter" (Saviour), who was called Armogen.
The name is variously written Armogones, Armoge, and Armogenes, and the same. See Vallarsi's note on Jerome, Ep. lixxv. 3. No satisfactory interation is known; for conjectures, see Harvey, On Ireneus, loc. cit.

Armoric, Council in (Concilium Americanum), was held A.D. 555 to excommunicate Macion, bishop of Vannes, who had renounced tenure and celibacy on the death of his brother, Chnano, count of Brittany.

Armoricana Version. See BURTON VERSION.

Armouria is an ancient term, sometimes applied to a shrine or temporary receptacle for the eucharistic elements. It is in the form of an architectural recess or niche without doors, and is not to be confounded with the tabernacle or sambury. See SACRA-RIUM.

Armour, John, an English Congregational minister, was born at Great Waltham, Essex. In youth he was of a trifling disposition, but at the age of eighteen he was converted, and became very active in Christian labor and in visiting the sick. Mr. Armour received his education at the University of Glasgow, maintaining himself by the labor of his own hands. In 1820 he was licentiate, preacher, and after a time became co-pastor of the Independent Church. In 1842 he went to Canada, organized a Church in Stewarton, Halton, and af-later was pastor at Warwick, Pytchon, Sarnia, New Durham, and Kelvin, which last he resigned in 1868. He died Dec. 16, 1869. See (Lond.) Cong. Yearbook, 1871, p. 301.

Arms. In the early Church it was generally forbidding to wear arms within the Church, even when seeking an asylum. The clergy were also particularly forbidden to wear arms. The Council of Macon, A.D. 581, inflicted on offenders the penalty of thirty days' imprisonment, with fasting on bread and water. The Synod of Winchester, A.D. 1070, also forbade it. Clement V allowed the clergy to carry arms when necessary for self-defense, as did also St. Charles Borromeo. See WAR, CHRISTIAN VIEWS OF.

Arms, Clifford S., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Canaan, Columbia Co., N. Y., June 4, 1796.
He graduated at Union College, Schenectady, in 1824, and at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1827. He was pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Madison, Morris Co., N. J., from 1822 to 1851, and Ridgeway, Orange Co., N. Y. from 1851 to 1863. He died Nov. 25, 1863.

Arms, Selah Root, a Congregationalist, was born at Deerfield, Mass., Feb. 21, 1789. His preparatory studies were with the Rev. W. B. Stow, of Wilmingtom, Vt., and at Williamstown (Mass.) Academy. He graduated at Williams College in 1818, and at Andover Theological Seminary in 1821. For two years he preached at Windham and Cavendish, Vt., and for eight years at Graham and Windham, over which two churches he was ordained in 1825. In 1834 he removed to Livingstonville, N. Y., returning in a year and a half to Windham again. In 1849 Mr. Arms removed to Springfield, Vt., hoping to find the climate more congenial; but after a year and a half, however, as he was pleased to do. He died suddenly, Nov. 9, 1866.
Mr. Arms was a well-read theologian of the old school, an instructive preacher, and faithful pastor. See Cong. Quarterly, 1867, p. 206.

Armson, Thomas, an English Wesleyan minister, was born in Shropshire, Jan. 16, 1799. He was converted among the Methodists in youth, was a Congregational minister at thirty-two years of age. He had on account of inquiries into theology, was received into the Methdist ministry in 1824, and died Aug. 3, 1863. Arsmo was a man of devout spirit; his ministrations were evangelical, and he combined sterling integrity with much kindness and generosity of disposition. See Min-tes of British Conference, 1866, p. 120.

Armsley. These unauthorized additions in a church were made before 1555, when we find the taunt made to Cranmer, "Down with Christ's arms" (the roof), "and up with a lion and dog" (the Tudor greyhound). Wolsey first changed the arms of York into their present form—the keys of Peter with the crown, instead of gulles, a pall, and crozier or.

Armstrong, Amzi D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Hoosac, Columbia Co., N. Y., Dec. 13, 1811. He was never connected as a student with any college; was licensed to preach by the New York Presbytery in 1794; and in 1796 was appointed pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Mendum, Morris Co., N. J. He

Armstrong, Francis, an Irish Wesleyan minister, was born in the County of Limerick, probably in 1756. He was converted in youth under the Methdist ministry; was called into the work in 1877, and continued therein until his settlement as a supernumerary at Rathamun in 1832. Yet he was still active in furthering the work of God in the mission on which he was settled. He died June 30, aged eighty. His sermons were plain, his pieties sincere, and his friendship steadfast. See Minutes of British Conference, 1856.

Armstrong, George R., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Woodford County, Ky., in 1810. He was educated at Hanover College, Ind., and studied theoloogy in Hanover Seminary. He was ordained by the Madison Presbytery in 1845, and labored as a missionary in Crittenden, later in Lincoln, and there died.
He died May 18, 1865. Energy and fidelity marked the whole course of his ministry. See Wilson, Prob. Hist.
Almanac, 1866, p. 91.

Armstrong, Gustavus, an Irish Wesleyan minister, was born probably in 1758. He entered the connection in 1792, labored long and successfully, and died March 25, 1832, aged seventy-four years. "He was a sincere and unalterable friend." See Minutes of British Armstrong, J. S., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Hillsborough, O., about 1825. He studied and practiced law during his young manhood; emigrated to Illinois in 1854, and, after laboring several years as local preacher, in 1869 entered the Southern Illinois Conference. He died June 10, 1874. Mr. Armstrong possessed a brilliant intellect, and was a thorough courageous student, a discursive, a popular preacher, and an excellent disciplinarian. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1874, p. 126.

Armstrong, James (1), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in the County of Leitrim, Ireland, Dec. 25, 1803, and emigrated to the United States when about twelve years old. In 1827 he entered the Ohio Conference; became a member of the Cincinnati Conference on its organization, and in 1871 superannuated, which relation he sustained until his death, July 1, 1874. Mr. Armstrong was eminently social and cheerful in disposition, extremely modest, fervent in piety, sound and practical in mind, and a success as a pastor. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1874, p. 100; Simpson, Cyclopaedia of Methodist, s. v.

Armstrong, James (2), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in 1823. His early life is unrecorded. He entered the Maine Conference in 1854, served efficiently fifteen years, and afterwards sustained a superannuated and superannuated relation until his death, in Cambridge, Mass., Nov. 22, 1877. As a preacher, Mr. Armstrong was original, able, and eloquent. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1878, p. 65.

Armstrong, James Francis, a Presbyterian minister, was of Irish extraction. He was born at West Nottingham, Md., April 3, 1790. He graduated at Princeton College in 1773; was licensed by the New castle Presbytery in 1777, and in 1782 was settled at Elizabethtown, N. J. He died Jan. 19, 1816. He was an able preacher and a good pastor. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iii, 390.

Armstrong, John (1), an Irish Wesleyan minister, was born near Newton-Butler, Fermanagh, in November, 1778. He was converted in youth, and with Arthur Noble was appointed to the Derry and Antrim Mission in 1816. He spent forty-four years of active service in the province of Ulster, and fifteen years in retirement. He died at Lurgan, Aug. 1, 1875. His mind was naturally vigorous, and his sermons were quiet, original, and delivered with dramatic power. He was one of the most popular and useful preachers of his day in the north of Ireland, and an indefatigable pastor. See Minutes of British Conference, 1876, p. 53.

Armstrong, John (2), D.D., a bishop of the Church of England, was born at Bishop Wearmouth, Aug. 25, 1818. He was educated at Charterhouse School; became a curate at Lincoln College, Oxford; took his degree of A.B. in 1836; was soon after ordained deacon and priest, and served a curacy in Somersetshire; was afterwards curate of Clifton; was elected in 1841 priest-vicar of Exeter Cathedral, and subsequently became Saint's-day preacher in that cathedral; was presiding bishop of the diocese of St. Paul's, Exeter, in 1848; and about this time began writing for the press. In October, 1845, he exchanged livings with the Rev. J. H. S. Barr, vicar of Tidenham, Gloucestershire, to which he then removed. Soon after he commenced the reform of the female-penitentiary system, begun by an article in the Guardian, which resulted in a new system in the establishing of several new institutions, and, the distinguishing feature of which is, that the penitents are under the care of unpaid gentlewomen instead of paid matrons. The Tracts for the Christian Seasons, edited by him and published at Oxford, began in 1849, and met with great success. These were fol lowed by a second series; and then he began the Parochial Tracts, during the issue of which he published the Sermons for the Christian Seasons, all of which were successful. He died at Oxford, on the 28th of October, 1858; and was buried in South Africa, and consecrated at Lambeth in 1838. He died May 16, 1856. During his short episcopate bishop Armstrong had established a grammar-school and begun a diocesan college for the training on the spot of a ministry for his diocese. He also wrote, "Pastor in His Childern" (2d ed. 1857); "Remarks on Church Penitentiaries" (1858); and other works. His Life has been written by Rev. T. T. Carter (1857). See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1856, p. 468.

Armstrong, John (3), D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Oxford, Pa., March 11, 1825. He received his preparatory education at New London Academy. He passed through his sophomore year at La fayette College, Pa., and then went to Washington College, Lexington, Va., where he graduated in 1850. The same year he entered Princeton Seminary, and graduated in 1853. He was licensed by the Newcastle Presbytery and ordained an evangelist. After serving as a missionary at Clinton City, Mo., he became a stated supply at Hazelton, Beaver Mountain, and Weatherly, Pa., where he remained ten years. He then preached as stated supply at Muscatine, Iowa; and after remaining a year was installed pastor. After laboring with great zeal and success ten years, he was released. In 1874 he was appointed, by the Synod of Iowa, South, as financial agent for Iowa College; as the result of his labors and self-sacrificing devotion, Parsons College was founded and located at Fairfield, Iowa. He was elected professor of history and moral philosophy, and subsequently its president. He died at Fairfield, Aug. 13, 1879. See Necrology of Presbyterian Alumni, 1890, p. 173.

Armstrong, John W., D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Wollishow, England, Sept. 20, 1812. He emigrated with his parents to Quebec, Canada, in 1824; received an early religious training; experienced religion at the age of sixteen; entered Cazenovia Seminary in 1855; became principal of the Nichols Academy, Tioga Co., in 1859; of Red Creek Academy, Wayne Co., N. Y., in 1841; and in 1842 was admitted into the Black River Conference. In 1850 he was elected to the chair of natural sciences in Cazenovia Seminary; and later, principal of the Gouverneur Seminary. In 1854 he became principal of Fidley Seminary, Fulton; in 1856 he returned to pastoral work; in 1857 he accepted the principality of Aminita Seminary; and in 1859 again resumed pastoral work. From 1865 to 1869 he was head-master of the State Normal School at Oswego; and then became principal of the Normal and Training School at Fredonia, N. Y., where he remained until his death, Aug. 12, 1878. He was a man of rare intellectual endowments, and by habit and desire a student in the highest sense of the term; and by his own, personal efforts attained great eminence as a linguist, scientist, physiologist, mathematician, and artist. Yet he stood highest in his character as a cultivated Chris tian man and minister. Meek, sympathetic, edifying, and zealous in the relations he bore to humanity, he everywhere won the highest esteem. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1878, p. 25; Simpson, Cyclopaedia of Methodism, s. v.

Armstrong, Joseph, an English Wesleyan minister, was born near Carlisle in 1777. He was converted at the age of twenty-three, and entered the ministry in 1808, preaching the first five years in Wales. Some of his first literature work was The Head of a new society, The Tracts for the Christian Seasons, edited by him and published at Oxford, began in 1849, and met with great success. These were fol lowed by a second series; and then he began the Parochial Tracts, during the issue of which he published the Sermons for the Christian Seasons, all of which were successful. He died at Oxford on the 28th of October, 1858; and was buried in South Africa, and consecrated at Lambeth in 1838. He died May 16, 1856. During his short episcopate bishop Armstrong had established a grammar-school and begun a diocesan college for the training on the spot of a ministry for his diocese. He also wrote, "Pastor in His Childern" (2d ed. 1857); "Remarks on Church Penitentiaries" (1858); and other works. His Life has been written by Rev. T. T. Carter (1857). See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1856, p. 468.

Armstrong, Richard (1), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Ireland Dec. 25, 1775. He expe revised conversion in his twenty-fifth year, and united with the Wesleyan Methodist Church. Soon after he was licensed to preach. In 1812 he emigrated to America, and was for four years imprisoned, consistent, and unyielding under the suspicion of the British Church Conference. In 1817 he became connected with the Baltimore Conference; and when the Pittsburgh Conference was formed he was made one of its members. In 1842 he became a superannuate, which relation he continued to sustain until his death, Aug. 16, 1855. As a Christian Mr. Armstrong's piety was profound, consistent, and uniform, absorbing all his affections, and employing all his energies. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1860, p. 70.

Armstrong, Richard (2), D.D., a missionary to the Sandwich Islands, was born in Northumberland County, Pa., in 1805. He graduated at Dickinson College in 1827, and studied theology at Princeton. In 1832 he went as a missionary to the Sandwich Islands, where he served as minister of instruction, prince-counselor, and president of the Board of Education. He died Sept. 23, 1860, from the effects of injuries received by a fall from his horse.

Armstrong, Robert, an Associate minister, was a native of Midholm, Roxburghshire, Scotland; but the date of his birth is not known. He was educated at the University of Edinburgh, and studied theology at Whitburn, under the Rev. Archibald Bruce. He was ordained to the ministry June 15, 1797; and shortly afterwards sent to the United States in answer to a call from Lexington, Ky., where he arrived in 1798. He was installed as pastor of certain churches in that vicinity April 28, 1799. Here he remained until 1804, when he removed with his entire congregation to Greene County, 0. They organized into two congregations—Massie's Creek and Sugar Creek. Here he labored for seventeen years, when the charge was divided, and he labored only at Massie's Creek until Jan. 9, 1821. From this time onward he had no pastoral charge, and died Oct. 14 of the same year. See Sprague, Annuals of the Amer. Jap. x, iii, 58.

Armstrong, Robert Leslie, a Congregational minister, was born at Carlisle, Cumberland, England, Nov. 9, 1803. He was religiously educated, but his aversion to religion was very great; he therefore engaged in most of the follies and sins of his time. Removing from Carlisle to America, he lived for many years in a manner of life somewhat changed. He here became greatly concerned for his soul's welfare when about fourteen years of age. He was converted, and at the age of fifteen he joined the Wesleyan Society, and became at once a class-leader and local preacher. On account of his pertinacity in excited youth, a change of place was resorted to with great advantage, as well as his preaching and addressing his immediate audiences, he became extremely popular in that district. These efforts proved too great for his strength, his health gave way, causing him to retire from active life for a time. Upon his recovery he joined the Independent Church at Wigtown, and for a time labored at Brompton, Birkenhead, and other villages. He now entered the academy at Isle, in 1822, and left in 1826. Having been invited to Worlsey, he accepted the call on leaving school. He entered on his duties with courage and hope; and during his ministry of twenty-five years he paid off the debt, enlarged the chapel, built a new schoolroom capable of accommodating three hundred children, and increased the membership to one hundred and thirty-five. He was seized with apoplexy, and died July 4, 1856. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1857, p. 165.

Armstrong, Sylvester, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in the State of New York in 1826. No record of his early life is accessible. In 1852 he entered the Troy Conference, and soon afterwards discontinued ministerial work and engaged in secular business. In 1856 he joined the New Jersey Conference. When the Newark Conference was formed, he became a member of it. He died at Plainfield, N. J., Jan. 7, 1863. Mr. Armstrong's ministerial career was brief; but there have lived few men who concentrated more vitality and zeal into so short a space of time. It was his habit to completely exhaust himself in the delivery of his sermons. He was original, had a ready command of language, was very pointed in discourse, and thrillingly eloquent. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1863, p. 38.

Armstrong, William (1), an Irish Wesleyan minister, was born at Glaslough, County of Monaghan, probably in 1724. He was converted in 1749, and entered the itinerancy in 1791. After a ministry of eight years he was obliged, by an injury received from his horse, to retire from the work. He died Feb. 20, 1837. He was a man of sincere piety, and manifested much patience during a long affliction. See Minutes of British Conference, 1837.

Armstrong, William (2), an Irish Wesleyan minister, was born at Sydare, County Fermanagh. He early sought the Lord. In 1803 he entered the ministry; became a superannuated at Dungannon in 1841; removed to Lisburn in 1844; and died at Armagh, Feb. 4, 1855, in the seventy-first year of his age. He was a zealous preacher. See Minutes of British Conference, 1855.

Armstrong, William (3), a Protestant Episcopal clergyman. His ordination occurred in 1819; and his first parish was St. Matthew's, Wheeling, Va., having succeeded his father, Rev. John Armstrong, who was the first rector of the parish. After serving twenty-two years in Wheeling, he resigned his charge, and became rector of Zion parish, Urbanna, Frederick Co., Md., where he died June 15, 1860, aged fifty-eight, beloved and regretted by all who knew him. See Arch. Quart. Church Rev. 1857, p. 309.

Arnaia, Nicolas, of Segovia, in Spain, became a Jesuit in 1577, and passed the remainder of his life in South America, where he was superior for thirty years. He died at Mexico in 1622, leaving some works of piety.

Arnaldo, Pietro Antonio, an Italian theologian, was born at Villafranca, near Nice, in 1638. He studied theology at the College of Brescia, and performed the duties of apostolic prothonotary after having received the degree of doctor. He died near the close of the 17th century. He wrote, Il Tribuglio Celeste in Lode de Nomi Sant di Gesù, di Maria, e di di Giuseppe (Milan, 1638), and published it at the age of fifteen—Elogia in Laudem Episcopi Niemienne—; Sanctum Optatam Pacia Augu- stianum ex Emblematibus, ut et Inventio Ex Bello Paz, Dissertatio Paromonica (ibid. 1658) — Honorable II, Principi Monaco, Valentino Duc, etc., Poetico Gratulatio (ibid.) — Il Giardini del Pienamente Oggi Visite nell' Anno 1673, Diviso in Principi, Dame, Prelati, Abati, Cavalleri, Ministri, etc. (Turin, 1688). This is a collection of odes and sonnets in praise of the more important personages of the court of Turin at that time:—Le Grandezza e le Glorie della R. Casa di Savoia, Oda Li- rica, etc., con Lettere al Duca di Savoia Carlo Emanu- ele II. This is preserved in the Royal Library of Turin. See Hoefer, Nunt. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arnason, John Magnus, a Danish theologian, was born in 1665, at Dyrafjord, Iceland. He was appointed bishop of Skalholt shortly after having received his master's degree. He reorganized the religious orders, and engaged in religious controversies with the clergy. He died Feb. 8, 1743. He wrote, The Life of Einar Thorsteinson, bishop of Holm (Copenhagen, 1700) — A Perpetual Calendar (Holm, 1707) — Translation of the Catechism of Luther, with a commentary (ibid. end.) — Donatus, Formulario et Loci Latinianidum (Copenhagen, 1734). See Hoefer, Nunt. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arnau, Juan, a Spanish historical painter, was born at Barcelona in 1595. He studied under Eugenio Caxes, and was chiefly employed in works for the churches and convents of Barcelona. In the Church of Santa de la Mar is a picture of St. Peter, to whom angels are presenting the keys; and in the Augustine Monastery, several pictures are preserved from the life of St. Augustine. He died in the year 1692.

Arnault (or Ernaud) was abbot of Bonneval, in the diocese of Chartres, about 1144. He was twice driven by the persecutions which he endured in that office to Rome, where popes Lucius II and Adrian IV received him honorably. From the latter he begged permission to resign and retire into his first monastery of Marmoutier, which he did, and died there. He was the friend of St. Bernard, and, at the request of the monks of Clairvaux, continued the History of the Life of St. Bernard, which had been commenced by William de St. Thierry. Another work of Arnault's, entitled Tractatus de Cardinalibus Christi Operibus (Paris, 1600, 1726; Oxford ed. of Cyprian, 1692), has sometimes been erroneously printed among the works of St. Cyprian. It is proved not to be the work of the latter—(1) because in a MS. of it in the library at Clairvaux it is plainly attributed to Arnault; (2) because the work itself declares the validity of baptism, by whomsoever administered, which is contrary to the well-known opinion of Cyprian; and it also alludes to many ecclesiastical rites which are subsequent to the time of Cyprian. Arnault also wrote, Tractatus de VII Fidei Domino in Oraculo Propoli (Antwerp, 1592)—Sermo de Laudibus S. Maria Virginis (in Bibl. Patr. xxii., 1280)—Tractatus de Operibus VI Dierum (Auxerre, 1609)—Meditaciones Variae; all the above are contained in the Oxford edition of Cyprian in 1862, at the end—Commentariolus in Psalmum CXXXII, et Opusculum de VII Donis S. Spiritus, discovered by Mabillon at Citaux (published by Casimir Oudin, Leyden, 1692). See Cave, Historia Literaria, ii., 236.

Arnault, Jacques-Louis Marie Angélique de Saint Madeleine, elder sister of Antoine Arnault, was born Sept. 8, 1591; became a nun at the age of eight, and, contrary to the usual order, abbes of Port-Royal-des-Champs at eleven years of age; the age of seventeen; she assumed the rule of Citaux into her abbey, and also revived the discipline of St. Bernard. She died Aug. 6, 1661.

Her sister, Jeanne Catherine Agnes de St. Paul, who died Feb. 13, 1671, published two books, one entitled L'image d'une Religieuse Purifiée et d'une Imparfaite (Paris, 1660)—the other, Le Chaplet Secret du Saint Sacrement (1663)—also Constitutions of Port-Royal (1721).

Arnauv, Francois, a French theologian, was born at Ile, a little city upon the Sorgue, near the Fountain of Vacluses, about 1740. A bachelor in the Sorbonne, he was appointed canon of the collegiate church of Ile, and prior-curate of Vacluses. In 1790 Arnauv was sent to Rome by the assembly convened at Carpentras. He was to arrange with Pius VI the interests of the part of the County of Venaissin which was under the dominion of the Holy See. After the compact of 1802, he was appointed titular canon of the metropolitan see of Paris, with the title of dean. He also had the honor of being the first general of the monastery of Corfu. He died Nov. 25, 1824. He wrote, Discours Apologétique de la Religion Chrétienne au Sujet de plusieurs-assertions du Contrat Social et contre les Paradoxes des Faux Politiques du Siecle (1778)—also a description of the Fountain of Vacluses and its surroundings. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arndt, Ernst Moritz, a German historian, was born Dec. 28, 1769, at Schoritz, in the Island of Rugen. In 1806 he became professor of philosophy at Greifswald, where his political writings so aroused the national spirit against the hated dominion of Napoleon that they may be regarded as having mainly influenced the combination which eventually restored the independence of Germany. After the restoration, he was appointed professor of history at Bonn in 1816, where he died Jan. 30, 1860. Arndt was one of the noblest German patriots, and, at the same time, a sincere, childlike Christian, whose spiritual poems belong to the finest gems of German hymnology, and for which cause he deserves to be mentioned here. He composed, Ich weiss an wen ich glaub' (Eng. transl. in Lyra Germ., ii, 216, "I know in whom I put my trust");—Geht nun hin und gehet mein Grabe (ibid. i, 241, "Go and dig my grave to-day"). See Koch, Geschichte des deutschen Kirchenlebens, vii, 20, 25, 140 sq.

Arndt, Friedrich, a Protestant doctor of theology, and one of the most prominent German pulpit orators of the 19th century, was born May 24, 1802. From 1833 he was preacher at the Parochial Church at Berlin, where he died, May 8, 1881. Zachold, in his Bibliotheca Theologica, containing the literature from 1830 to 1862, fills almost five printed pages with the publications of this learned divine. There is hardly anything in the homiletic literature of his time upon which he had not deeply impressed himself. He published sermons on the life of Christ, his sermon on the mount, parables, passion, etc. His lectures on the Bible, which were also reprinted by the American Tract Society, belong to the best productions of ascetical literature; and so likewise his Morgend- und Abendklänge, being prayers and meditations for the worshipper of the morning and evening. He was a very warm friend of the Berlin Bible Society and the Home Mission. For almost half a century this servant of the Master bore witness to the truth of the Gospel in the capital of the German empire; and Dr. Schaff, in his Germany: its Universities, Theology, and Religion, while speaking of the preaching of the Berlin, mentions Arndt as belonging to those "most fearless, pungent, heart-piercing preachers of the age, who attract the largest crowds of devout hearers, often bathed in tears of repentance and gratitude for the infinite mercy of God in Christ." (B. F.)

Arnee, Frank, a minister of the Society of Friends, was born in Bristol, England, Sept. 22, 1766. In 1787, after having spent several years as an apprentice at Milverton, he returned to Bristol, his native city, and entered into business as a wool-stapler. He was received as a minister in 1811. He visited many of the societies of England and Scotland, and by his influence contributed much to the cause of Christ. He died June 10, 1856. (See (Lon.) Annual Monitor, 1859, p. 31.

Arnett, William, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Hasley, near York, in 1785. He was converted in 1805, entered the itinerancy in 1811, became a supernumerary after twenty-seven years' labor, and died at Haslam Moor, near Bolton, Dec. 13, 1858. "He was a man of deep and ardent piety, of indefatigable diligence and inflexible integrity." See Minutes of British Conference, 1859.

ARNOLD

April 14, 1815. In early life he studied medicine, and afterwards was a Methodist preacher, but became an Episcopalian, and was ordained in 1832. Having received a dispensation for Episcopal ordination, he left the Church of England, and in 1839, he became rector of the Church of the Mediator, Philadelphia; and in November, 1852, he accepted the rectorship of St. Paul's parish, Milwaukee, Wis. His health failing in September, 1856, he resigned, and in the summer of 1857 became rector of Emanuel parish, Cumberland, Md., where he remained until his death, which occurred April 21, 1859. See Amer. Church Quar. Church 9 41 (1859).

Arnheim, Chajim, a Jewish teacher, who died Sept. 22, 1874, at Glogau, is the author of, Leitfaden beim Unterricht in der mos. Religion (Glogau, 1880):—Das Buch Job übersetzt, und kommentirt (ibid. 1886). Besides the translation of Job, he also contributed to the German translation of the Old Test. which was edited by Zums (Berlin, 1888); translated and edited the Jewish ritual, and is the author of a Hebrew Grammar, edited by D. Cassel (ibid. 1872). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i. 54; Steinhschneider, Hebraische Bibliographie, 1874, p. 28; id. Bibliograph. Handbuch, p. 15. (B. P.)

Arnkiel (or Arnkiel), Trogillus, a German historian and theologian, studied at Leipsic, Dorpat, and Kiel, and became minister of the Church of Apenrade. In 1595 he became a Christian Aliut of Holstein gave him to the superintendent of the Church which he was already pastor, but Arnkiel lost this position in 1684 by refusing to render homage to Christian V, king of Denmark, who had invaded a part of Holstein and Sleswick. In compensation for this sacrifice, the duke gave him in 1686 the administration of the church of the duchy. The peace of 1689 led to his return to Apenrade, when he resumed his ministerial functions, holding them until his death, which occurred in 1715. He wrote, Disputatio de Officio Redemptoris Christi (Kiel, 1686);—Disputatio de Paradoxi Territori (ibid, ed.);—Tractatus de Philosophia et Schola Epicurii (ibid. 1671);—Theologische Betrachtung des grossen geschlachten Cometen der A. 1680 und 1818 gesehen ist (Sleswick, 1861). Arnold Bosters (or Boschius), a German Carmelite of Ghent who flourished in 1489, was the intimate friend of Trithemius, Gagginus, and other learned men of his day. He died at Ghent in 1493, leaving two books which are an illustrous monument of the art of painting at Cologne, 1609, 8vo). He is said to have written a third volume, and other works which remain in MS. See Cave, Hist. Lit. ii. App. p. 211.—Landon, Ecles. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arnold (Arnould) of Buderich, a German theologian, was born at Buderich, on the Lower Rhine, in the second half of the 12th century. He was prior of the Augustines in the vicinity of Oulenuarde. He wrote, Odarium de Laude Dei, Libr. XII, contra Destructores Monasteriorum:—De Modo Servandis Ordinis Canonicorum Regularum et Diatirum. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arnold (Arnoul, or Arnulf) of Corbie, a German theologian, lived probably in the last half of the 11th century. Not much is known of this person. He is supposed to be the author of a translation or paraphrase of the Proverbs of Solomon in hexameter verse. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arnold (Arnoldus) of Freiburg, a German friar of the Order of St. Dominicus, was an astronomer, a native of Freiburg, in Brisgau, and lived in the 14th century. He left a MS. in the library of the monastery entitled Acohbitione Libelli Inangocius Judiciarum Astrorum, in MS. in the Library of Vienna. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arnold ab Ischa (or Icsa), a German monk and theologian, was persecuted and imprisoned for his opinions at the time of the religious wars of the Low Countries, near the close of the 16th century, and was obliged to take refuge in Louvain. He sojourned here several years, and finally returned to Colmenz, where he died, in 1618. He wrote, Sermones V gnomodo solemni in Christum sii Credendum:—Officiwm B. Mariae, in Flemish. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arnold, a Scottish bishop, was abbot of Kirklo, and became bishop of St. Andrews in 1158. The consecration was performed within the Church of St. Andrews by William, bishop of Moray, the pope's legate, in the presence of king Malcolm IV, and of the bishops, abbots, and princes of the land. He founded the Cathedral of St. Andrews, but died before the work was scarcely begun, in September, 1160. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 10.

Arnold of Leyden (also called Arnold de Tongres), a Flemish theologian, studied theology at Cologne, and attached himself to Evrard, bishop of Liege. He afterwards took the direction of the Laurentine Gymnium of Cologne, and became canon of the metropolitan chapter of the same place. He was a lively opponent of John Reuchlin. Arnold died in 1466. He wrote, Articulorum seu Propositionum XI et IIII male Sommonium ex libello Johannis Cogmnius sive Recchiuni ei Titulus: Tractatus Propositionum Alphabeticarum et Bibliographicarum si Episcopi Vaticani Testament (Cologne, 1512);—Commentary on Juvenal, in MS. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arnold of Lizio, a German theologian and friar who lived at Liege in the 14th century, wrote, Narratio et Liber de Mirabilibus Mundi, in alphabetical order. It is supposed that he is the same person as Arnold of Liege. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arnold of Lubex, first provost of Hildesheim, and then abbot of Lubex, died in 1212. He continued the Slovenian Chronicle of Helmoldus from 1171 to 1209, which is very important for the history of Denmark and the introduction of Christianity into Livonia. It was printed at Frankfort in 1556, more fully at Lubek in 1659, and with the last four chapters in 1660 by Mabnus, Opuscul. Hist. Lappen. It was edited in the Mem. Germ. Sts. xxvi; Laurent translated it into German (Berl. 1888). See Samus, Die Stufenchronik Arnold (Lubex, 1872); Schrödl, in Wetzr. u. Weitere Kirchenk. s. v. (B. P.)

Arnold of Meldorf, a German theologian, who lived in the 12th century, wrote, Liber Meditationum et Ahortationum ad Fratres in Varias Icias Sacrarum Scripturam, printed at Staphorh's Historia Ecclesiastica Hamburgen, vol. iii.

Arnold, archbishop of Mentz, was chosen prince elector of the empire in 1158. According to certain historians, he assisted greatly in the deposition of the emperor Henry I by the pope. During a revolt of the inhabitants of Mentz, he was massacred by the people in the cloister of St. James, in 1209, and his body interred without honor. Three years after, the emperor Frederic I destroyed the convent and the ramparts of the city. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arnoldus Olorus (or Cynanus), a German theologian, was a butt of persecution during the religious wars which desolated the Low Countries; and was not secure until he retired to Bois-le-Duc. He died in 1622. He wrote, Theor(ius Solvatius Septentrioni Astrorum (1611);—Explectio Missae et Canoni (1611);—Summa Virtutum et Virtuor (1615);—Doctrina Consolatoria contra Scrupulos et Pastimplinatrum (1612), written in Flemish, the title only being in Latin. All these works were printed at Bois-le-Duc. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arnold of Rotterdam (or of Holland), a Dutch theologian, was also called Gerleknor. He studied at Bologna and Padua, and became doctor of canonical law. He died Aug. 31, 1442. He wrote, Igne est seruor, or Speculum Conscolentiae, in two books—the first entitled De Legibus et Statutis; de Deccas Mortalibus, written in 1413:—the other, De Excommunicatione et aliis Consuris, written in 1424. This book is still known under the odd title of Gnotobosco, and was published at Tresse in 1809 by Hoefer, * Nouv. Biog. Générale*, s. v.

Arnold (or Arnold) of Verdal, bishop of Maguelone, in Languedoc, was also a historian. He applied himself with ardor to the study of civil and canonical law, and afterwards had charge of repressing the Albigenses, who troubled the southern part of France. Pope Benedict XII conferred upon him on this occasion, in July 1342, his pallium, blessing, and the title of rex per passionem reformator for the province of Narbonne. He also went in behalf of the same pontiff as ambassador to the emperor Louis IV of Bavaria, which mission he honorably fulfilled. He died in 1351. He wrote, Episcoporum Magaloniae Insulae Series, from 770 to 1353. This work appeared for the first time in the first vol. of Labbe, Noua Bibliotheca MSS., p. 756. See Hoefer, * Nouv. Biog. Générale*, s. v.

Arnold, André, a German theologian, was born at Nuremberg, Nov. 24, 1656. He first applied himself to the study of languages and theology at the University of Altdorf; then from 1680 to 1685 he travelled over the different countries of Europe. In 1687 he became professor of eloquence and the Greek language at Nuremberg, and was in 1694 appointed Professor of Theology and Doctrina of Athanasius, and De Unione et Incornatione of Theodore Abacara (Paris, 1885). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arnold, David W., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Frederick County, Va., March 16, 1816. He experienced religion at the age of sixteen; filled with marked efficiency the offices of class-leader, exhorter, and bishop; and from his superintendency, he crated the rerum personarum reformator for the province of Narbonne. He also went in behalf of the same pontiff as ambassador to the emperor Louis IV of Bavaria, which mission he honorably fulfilled. He died in 1351. He wrote, Episcoporum Magaloniae Insulae Series, from 770 to 1353. This work appeared for the first time in the first vol. of Labbe, Noua Bibliotheca MSS., p. 756. See Hoefer, * Nouv. Biog. Générale*, s. v.

Arnold, Ephraim, a Methodist Episcopal minister, of whose birth or early life no record is accessible. About 1835 he was a class-leader in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. In 1856 he joined the Arkansas Conference, and labored devotedly till his death, July 2, 1845. He was a young man of great promise. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1859, p. 21.

Arnold, Franz, a German theologian, native of Cologne, lived in the early part of the 16th century. He was one of the most distinguished adversaries of Luther. He wrote, Antwort auf das Büchlein Lutheri oder den katolischen Abschied (Dresden, 1531) — Der Unpartheisiche Laien (without the name of the author). This was a violent attack against Luther, who replied in the pamphlet entitled Wider des Meschler zu Dresden, which called forth from Arnold, Auf das Schmachbüchlein Luthers (Dresden, 1531). See Hoefer, * Nouv. Biog. Générale*, s. v.

Arnold, Friedrich August, a German linguist, was professor of Oriental languages and literature at Halle, where he was born, Nov. 16, 1812. He commenced his Oriental studies in his native city under Gesenius and Rödiger, and continued the same at Berlin under Benary, Bopp, and Wilken. He belonged to the German Oriental Society from its origin till his death, which occurred Aug. 18, 1869. He wrote, Septem Moalakht, Carmina Antiquissima Arabum (1850), an admirable work on the talmathia Arabica (1850) — Abriß der hebr. Formenlehre zum Gebrauche auf Gymnasien u. Universitäten (1867) — Sammlung und Beleuchtung aller Stellen der Bibel und des Josephus, welche auf die Topographie Jerusalems Bezug haben (1865, 1866). He also contributed to the first edition of Herzog's Real-Encyclopädie, and the quarterly of the German Oriental Society, for which see Der wissenschaftliche Jahresbericht über das Jahr 1853. (B. F.)

Arnold, George Adam, a German painter, native of Bamberg, in Bavaria, lived in the last half of the 17th century. He was a skilful painter of historical scenes. His Passage of the Red Sea by the Israelites was reproduced by the engraver Weygand in 1690. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arnold, George Cavitt, a Presbyterian minister, was born Feb. 19, 1825, in Allegheny County, Pa. In 1845 he entered Duquesne College, Pittsburgh, and two and a half years later the junior class of Jefferson College. In 1850 he entered the Reformed Theological Seminary of Allegheny; in 1853 he was licensed by the Monongahela Presbytery; and in 1855 he was sent as a missionary by the General Synod of the German Reformed Church. He was for many years one of the editors of the Christian Instructor. He wrote with great facility, and had a special fondness for the study of languages. He died Nov. 30, 1865. See Wilson, Prob. Hist. Almanac, 1865 p. 193.
Arnold, Isaac M., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Brunswick County, Va., June 15, 1804. His literary and religious education was greatly neglected in early life, but he was naturally affable and winning. In 1825 he entered the Virginia Conference and labored diligently nearly forty years. He died June 23, 1870. Mr. Arnold was remarkable for his uniform, cheerful Christian experience. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1870, p. 408.

Arnold, Joel Ranney, A.M., a Congregational minister, was born at Westminster, Vt., April 25, 1794. His father was a soldier in the Revolutionary War, made a profession of religion at the age of eighty-nine, and lived to be nearly a hundred and two years old. Joel was fitted for college at the academies in Pawlet, Vt., and Walpole, N. H., and entered Middlebury College in 1811. Subsequently he studied medicine and practiced about a year; then studied theology with his brother, Rev. Seth S. Arnold, and was ordained pastor of the Church in Chester, N. H., in 1820, remaining there for ten years. He was afterwards pastor successively at Waterbury, Conn.; Colchester and Westminster, Vt.; Middlebury, Conn.; Coventry and Vassalborough, Me. He died at Chester, Vt., Oct. 26, 1855. Mr. Arnold published two sermons and two articles in the New-Englander. See Cong. Quarterly, 1866, p. 45.

Arnold, John, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Great Barrington, Mass., in 1780. He was converted in 1796, and in 1815 joined the Genesee Conference. In 1830, on the division of the conference, he became a member of the Oneida Conference. In 1831 he was retired and subsequently, and so remained till his death, April 23, 1872. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1872, p. 131.

Arnold, Ralph, an English Wesleyan missionary, was born at Maclesfield. He was converted when eighteen; was accepted by the conference for mission work in 1857; sailed for the West Indies, and died at Panama, D. C., Aug. 11, 1865, aged thirty-five years. Of humble, unassuming spirit, he was in all things exact and honorable; in pastoral work he was assiduous, and his piety was both seen and felt. See Minutes of British Conference, 1866, p. 46.

Arnold, Samuel, Mus. Doc., a celebrated composer of music, son of Baron Arnold, was born in London, Aug. 10, 1740. He became composer to the Covent Garden Theatre about 1762, and was appointed organist to the king in 1785. He died Oct. 22, 1802. His publications covering a wide range of scholarship, eight odes, three serenatas, forty-seven operas, three burlettas, and other pieces. His most famous oratorio was that of the Prodigal Son. His Cathedical Music (4 vols.) is still popular. At the particular request of George III, he superintended the publication of a magnificent edition of all the sacred music of Handel, in score, of which he completed thirty-six folio volumes. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Arnold, Seth Shaler, a Congregational minister, was born at Westminster, Vt., Feb. 22, 1788. Mostly under the instruction of his pastor, Rev. Sylvester Sage, he prepared for Middlebury College, from which he graduated in 1812. He began the study of theology with his father and with Breckenridge, of Washington, D. C. Returning to Westminster in 1814, he continued his studies, and was licensed to preach in September of that year. During the winter, he was engaged in preaching in Massachusetts; and in June, 1816, was ordained pastor of the Church in Alstead, N. H., after having served them from May, 1815, as a supply. Here he remained in active service for twenty years, expending great and beneficent energies in the revival of religion in the years 1816, 1818, and 1826. During this period, he was one of the directors of the Home Missionary Society, and interested in all the benevolent and religious movements in the state. Having spent two years as a supply for the Church in Gilson, N. H. In 1836 he removed to Westminster, partly to relieve his aged father of the care of the farm, and partly on account of impaired health. For two years he supplied the Church in Walpole, N. H., and also, about the same length of time, the Church in Westminster. He was employed as a minister in Halifax, Vt., from October, 1832, to March, 1856; in Roxbury, N. H., for two years; and in West Townsend, for six years. In 1864 he retired from the ministry and resided in Amherst, N. H., where he was still active in the Sabbath-school, etc. He died there, April 3, 1871. He was erect and dignified in his carriage, and of a noble presence. As a preacher, he was instructive rather than sensational. See Cong. Quarterly, 1872, p. 93.

Arnold, Thomas Kerchever, an English clergyman and author, was born in 1806. He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and in 1838 began the publication of a series of introductory textbooks for the study of Greek, Latin, Hebrew, German, French, and Italian, which have been extensively used both in England and America. He prepared next a series of Greek and Latin texts for the use of schools covering a wide range of scholarship. He also published some papers on ecclesiastical subjects and a volume of Sermons.

Arnold, Wesley P., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. No mention is recorded of his birth and early life. He united with the South Carolina Conference in 1827, and served the various appointments assigned him with zeal and fidelity until his death, by apoplexy, Dec. 25, 1869. Mr. Arnold was a devoted and an able, diligent, and patient minister. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1870, p. 425; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Arnold, William, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born at Ashborough, N. C., March 4, 1876. He joined the Church at the age of sixteen; was licensed to preach in his twentieth year, and in his twenty-second year united with the South Carolina Conference. During the following twenty-two years he was an active worker; twice he was elected to the General Conference, and sixteen years he served as presiding elder. He died of pneumonia at Eatonton, Ga., Jan. 12, 1860. Mr. Arnold ranked among the first of the preachers in the state. He was an earnest and skillful preacher, gentle and amiably, and was beloved by all. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1860, p. 257.

Arnoldi or Arnold, Albert Jakob, a Reformed theologian and Oriental scholar of Germany, was born Oct. 1, 1750, at Herborn. He studied at Gromingen and Leyden, in the latter place under his uncle, the famous J. J. Schultens. In 1778 he was called to Hanau as professor of sacred philology and church history, and in 1789 he accepted a call to Marburg, which he retained until his death. Here Wilmber, Hufeld, and others were his pupils, who were always loud in praising his learning, piety, and theological moderation. He died Sept. 4, 1835. He wrote, Anmerkungen über Stellen der Sprache der Palomos (Frankfort, 1810); Chronicae des Pontificum adscripta (Frankfort, 1810); and Scripturis Graece Illustrati Specimen (Marburg, 1805): Observant ad gudam Justian Loca (ibid. 1796). Arnoldi (or di Arnoldo), Alberto, a Florentine sculptor of the 14th century, executed the colossal group in marble of the Madonna and Child, with two angels, in the Church of Santa Maria del Bigallo at Florence, which, until lately, has been ascribed to Andrea Pisano through the error of Vasari.

Arnoldi, Daniel Heinrich. See Arnold, Daniel II.

Arnoldi (or Arnold), Valentin, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Dillenburg, Jan. 26, 1712. He studied theology and the Oriental languages at Herborn. In 1739 he went to the Netherlands and spent seven years at Utrecht, Leyden, and the Hague in continuing his studies. In 1745 he was called as professor of philosophy and first preacher to Herborn. He lectured on almost all departments of theology. In 1755 he was made member of consistory; and in 1757 he took charge of the Academic Library. In 1764 all churches of the duchy of Nassau were committed to his care; and six years later, in 1770, he was made first professor of the theological faculty. Arnolfo died April 16, 1796. With all his vast learning, he wrote hardly anything.—Allgemeine deutsche Biographie, s. v. (B. P.)

Arnolfo (or Arnoul), archbishop of Milan, was raised to the archiepiscopacy in 1093, and was almost immediately deposed by the apostolic legate. He resumed his functions in 1095, after having made a reconciliation with Rome; accompanied Urban II to the meeting at Clermont; and preached in favor of the Crusade in the provinces of Lombardy. He was sent as an ambassador to the emperor Henry IV. In Argellati we find mention of a volume of Arnolfo, or Arnoul, entitled Conciones ad Populum, ut Crucem sucipiant. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arnon. This stream, the modern Wady Mœgh, is still the boundary between the Arab clans of the Beni Šâker on the north and the Kerak on the south. The southern bank is about 2180 feet deep and very precipitous, the northern about 200 feet less in height. The valley between is a tremendous chasm, about two miles wide at the top, which has been worn by the action of the stream in reaching the deep basin of the Dead Sea. See Porter, Handbook for Syria, p. 296; Bädeker, Palest, p. 302. The descent is graphically described by Tristram (Land of Moab, p. 140 sq.).

Arnon (or Arno) was a regular canon, who followed the rule of his order at Reicherspergh, in Bavaria, where he was dean of that community. He died in 1175, having written against Folmarus, provost of Trierfenstein, in Franconia, on the subject of the holy eucharist. His work is in the Bibl. Palatin. (Cologne ed.), tom. xiii, and in the Acta trium of Le Mire. He also wrote, Scutum Comuniciorum, in the Miscellanea of Duelli (Augsburg, 1728), vol. i, the design of which was to bring back the brethren of his order to live in its true spirit. This work is interesting, as showing the manner of life, customs, and observances of the regular canons at that period.—Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Arnot, David, a Scottish bishop, was elected to the see of Galloway in 1509. He was a native of Carnbee, and abbott of Cambuskenneth in 1503, which abbey he possessed until his election to the see of Galloway in 1509, where he sat until his death, in 1526. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 277.

Arnot, William, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Scotland in 1808, being the son of a farmer. After having passed through the University of Glasgow, he was licensed to preach in connection with the Church of Scotland. In 1843 he went out with the Free Churchmen, and became pastor of Free St. Peter's Church, Glasgow. For twenty years he stood in this pulpit, and gave to that people and the city of Glasgow the best days of his life. He then succeeded Prof. Rainey in the pastorate of the Free High Church, Edinburgh; and in that prominent position he spent the remaining years of his ministry. His excessive labors, in the prosecution of his duties as a pastor and in literary work, impaired his health; and a few days prior to the meeting of the Free Church General Assembly he left Edinburgh to try the effect of a change of scene and climate. But no permanent effect was experienced, and he realized that his work was done. Dr. Arnot was well known in America. He was twice in the United States—first as a deputy to the General Assembly which met in Philadelphia in 1870, and then as a member of the Evangelical Alliance which met in New York in the fall of 1878. He died in Edinburgh, June 3, 1875. He was the author of a number of popular works; among others we mention his Illustrations of the Book of Proverbs:—Parables of Our Lord:—The Church in the House. His first publication bears the quaint title, Race for Riches, and Some of the Fias into which the Runners Fall. But the book, bearing his name on the title-page, which has been read with more interest than any other is his Life of Dr. James Hamilton. He also wrote a "Memoir of James Halley," who, with Hamilton and himself, were college classmates. See "Proceedings," June 26, 1875. (W. P. S.)

Arnoul (or Arnulf), bishop of Rhodes, patriarch of Jerusalem, became chaplain to Robert II, duke of Normandy, whom he accompanied on the First Crusade; and was charged in 1199, by the Christian princes, with the administering of the revenues of the Church of Jerusalem. He plotted afterwards to obtain the patriarchate of the Holy City, and he attacked it in 1191, and was divinatisa, according to the strong expression of an historian. He died in 1118. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arnoul (Arnulph, or Barnulph), of Rochester (hence called Roffensis), who died March 15, 1124, was at first a monk at Beaulieu, afterwards prior of Canterbury, then abbot of Peterborough, and in 1114 or 1115 bishop of Rochester. He wrote Teutus Roffensis, a history of his bishopric (in Warbton, Anglica Sacra, i. 329-334, and ed. Harnius, Oxon. 1720): — Epist. ad Walchelinum, &c. (D'Achery, Spicil. iii. 464-471) : — Responses ad Lamberti Quaeciones, &c. (Ibid. iii. 471-474). The De Opere sec. Dierum et De septem Verbis Domini belong to Arnoul of Beuvray (q. v.). See Weitz, u. Arnoux, Jean, a French theologian and preacher, was born at Rom near the middle of the 16th century. He entered the Jesuit Order at the age of seventeen, and taught successively philosophy and theology. He preached at the court with success; became in 1617 confessor to Louis XIII, and at the death of the celebrated Cotton. He attempted the reconciliation of the king with his mother, Mary de Medicis. He engaged with the four ministers of Charenton—Montigny, Dumoulin, Durand, and Mestrezat—in a lively contest, which arrayed against him all the anger of the Protestant party. Already acknowledged a good preacher, he also proved himself not less able in controversy. He plotted more or less to maintain himself in his position, from which he was removed in 1621 by the jealousy of the constable De Laumes; and he was constrained to retire to Toulouse. The duke of Montmorency, who was decapitated Oct. 30, 1632, chose Arnoux to prepare him to meet death. Arnoux at Lyons in 1636. He was prior of the house of Henri IV prononce & Tournon le 29 Juillet, 1610, which appears to have served as a model for the eulogy of Marcus Aurelius by Thomas. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arensburger, Johann Christopher, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Nuremberg, Dec. 28, 1635. He studied at Jena, Altdorf, and Leipzig. In 1651 he received his first pastorate in appointment in his native city, where he also died, Dec. 10, 1696. He is the author of many hymns, which were published in Neue geistliche Lieder (Nuremberg, 1659: 2d ed. 1711): Anweisung zur Gottliebigkeit (Ibid. 1663): — Heilige Pfusen und christliche Pfusen (Ibid. 1680): — Heiliger epistolischer Bericht und Lieder, Gesel und Freud (Ibid. 1683). See Koch, Geschichte des deutschen Kirchenlieds, iii. 517 sq.; Wezel, Hymnographia, i. 86-91; Anal. Hymnol. i, ii. 13-19; Winterfeld, Der evang. Kirchengesang, ii. 456-462. (B. P.)

Arnu, Nicholas, a French Roman Catholic theologian, was born Sept. 11, 1629, at Meranourt, near Valenciennes, in 1644 he joined the Dominicans at Perpignan, and after completing his studies, he lectured on theology at Tarragona and Perpignan with such success that the first theological chair was given to him. The general of his order, John Thomas de Raccaberti, appointed him in 1675 professor of theology at Rome; but in 1679 he went to Padua as professor of metaphysics. He died there Aug. 8, 1692. He wrote, Clavis Theologiæ Thomisticae, in 4to. Paris. 1665; and Abel M. Doctrina manitu contra nos impugnatores (Bézier, 1672, 6 vols.; enlarged edition, Padua, 1686, 8 vols.). — Doctor angelicæ d. Thomas Ag. Divinae Voluntatis in "Summa Theologiae" interpers. (Romæ et Lugd. 1673, 1686, 4 vols.). Several other works of his still remain in MS. See Weitz, Scriptores, ii. 701; Wetzer, u. Welte's Kirchenlexicon, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Arnulf (or Arnulf), a learned prelate of the 10th century, was elected bishop of Orleans in 986. On Jan. 1, 988, he crowned Robert, son of Hugh Capet; he rebuilt the Cathedral of Orleans; and took charge of the council in June, 991, in the church of the Abbey of St. Basil, in order to depose Arnulf, archbishop of Rheims. Some years later he assisted at another council, held at the Abbey of St. Denis, near Paris. There it was proposed to take away the tithes from the monks and laymen and give them to the bishops. Abbo of Fleury, supported by the people, opposed this proposition violently. The writings of Arnulf are, for the most part, unpublished. One of the works he delivered to the council of St. Basil,—another, De Cartilagine, in the Library of the Vatican. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arnulf, archbishop of Rheims, natural son of king Lothaire, was first priest, then canon of Laon; and was elected archbishop of Rheims in 988. But as he had taken the part of prince Charles, his uncle, and had delivered to him the city of Rheims, the king, Hugh Capet, deposed him in 991, and placed upon the archepiscopal see the celebrated Gerbert (Sylvester II). Imprisoned at Orleans, Arnulf did not recover his liberty until the death of Hugh and the accession of Gerbert to the pontifical throne. He died about the year 1023. Certain letters of his are found in the Spicilegium of D'Achery. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arnulpf (St.), bishop of Soissons, son of Fulbertus, a gentleman of Brabant, was born in the 11th century. After his father's death he entered the Monastery of St. Medard at Soissons, where he lived three years in the practice of the greatest virtue (Sylvester II). At the end of that time he was made abbot, and in 1089 bishop of Soissons. He did great good in his diocese—reforming abuses, exterminating superstitions, and re-establishing religion in its purity. Gregory VII sent him into Flanders to restore peace to that province, torn by the dimensions of the nobles. While there he founded the Monastery of Oudenbourg, near Osten, where he retired after resigning the bishopric of Soissons, and where he died, Aug. 15, 1087. See Baillot, Aug. 15.

Arway, John, D.D., an English clergyman, was born in 1691, and educated at St. Edmund's Hall, Oxford. He received holy orders in 1618. Soon after he obtained the rectories of Holnet and Islington, which he enjoyed until the Civil War. In 1640 he returned to Oxford to serve the king, and was made archdeacon of Coventry. After the political troubles were over he went to Holland. While at the Hague, in 1650, he published two little pieces: — The Tablet and The Moderation of Charles I, the Martyr. Failing in his supplies from England, and his hopes having been frustrated, he was compelled to accept an offer to go to Virginia, where he died in 1653.

Asoer of Judah. The only noticeable relics of the ancient city at Wady Arrarh are a few wells in the valley, two or three of them built up with rude masonry, and some of them containing water. The valley is, in part, well watered and fertile, but contains no inhabitants at present.

Arondeau, Peter, a French martyr of the 16th century, was born in Paris. In 1559 he went to the town of Rochelle with a little parcel of wares to sell, and there joined the Church of Christ. When asked by certain popish priests why he did not attend mass, he said "he had been there too much already." They immediately imprisoned him, and he was condemned to death. He was faithful to the truth, and died Nov. 18, 1559. See Fox's Acts and Monuments, iv, 445.

Arondeus, Johannes, one of the Holland ministers of the Dutch Reformed Church in America, came hither in 1742, and was chiefly known as a violent opposer of all efforts to secure a ministry independent of the mother Church in the old country. He was settled over the churches in Kings County, L. I. (1742-47); and afterwards in New Jersey in Somerset and Middlesex counties, Easton, Kirtland, Harlingen, Six Mile Run, and Three Mile Run (1747-54). His name frequently occurs in the civil and ecclesiastical records; but he was always "a troublemaker in Israel." He was finally suspended by the Cocalus, or American Classis. His death probably occurred in 1754. Full accounts of his movements are found in the Millstone Centennial, by Rev. E. T. Corwin, and New Brunswick Historical Discourse, by E. H. Steele, D.D. (W. J. R. T.)

Arppana, among the Buddhists, is one form of entire self-control, or samadhi, which is "like a man who rises from his seat and walks steadily for the space of a whole day; as when it is received the mind continues in one even frame, undisturbed and unshaken." To attain this calm self-possession, it is necessary for a man to be careful in seven matters—viz. his residence, the road he traverses, his conversation, his company, his food, the season, and the position of the body.

Arrabo. See Arrile.

Arraes (or Arraiz), Amador, a Portuguese theologian, bishop of Portalegre, was born in 1530. He studied philosophy and theology, gave his attention to preaching, and became chaplain of king Sebastian. Philip II made him bishop of Portalegre. He performed the episcopal functions until 1596, when he resigned them and retired to the University of Coimbra. Arraes died in 1600. He wrote, Dialogos Morais (Coimbra, 1589)——Dialogi decem de Divina Provindencia (1604). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arrafa is the name of the female diviners of the ancient Arabians of the North Peninsula. They belonged to a distinct tribe, and held their office by hereditary succession; and they possessed the guardianship and right of service of various local temples. The male diviners were called Kahin.

Arrebo (or Arreboe), Andersen Christensen, a.
Danish theologian and poet, was born in 1587. He studied at Copenhagen, and became master of arts, then preacher under the patronage of the court of Denmark. In 1618 he was elected bishop of Trondhjem, at the advice of king Christian IV. Accused of witchcraft, he fled to Sweden in 1619, and retired to Sweden. In 1622 he was to move to Stockholm, where he lived until his death in 1637. He was one of the most distinguished prelates of Denmark. He wrote, Relatio i Vera om Chris- tian IV, des Kongen af Danmark (Copenhagen, 1611) — Danes Psalter sans regne (ibid. 1618, 1622). See Hoefer, Nou. Biog. Generale, s. v.

Arreniús, Claudius (Clas Arrehn), a learned Swedish historian, was born at Linköping in 1627, being the son of Arvid Claessen, a London merchant who had gone to Sweden. The son, after having studied at Linköping and Upsala, became (in 1657) a travelling companion of young Okenstener; afterwards professor of logic, etc., in the University of Upsala (1667-68); and eventually librarian (1689) and royal secretary (1693). He was en- nobled in 1664, and died at Stockholm in 1695. Among other works he left, Vida S. Aangsemire sic Aneuraxi Ge- mina (Stockholm, 1677, 4to), the one by Rembertus, the other by Okenstener; — Historia Christianarum Quas N sincere Ecclesiastica, Libri 4 Priorres, etc. (ibid. 1689, 4to); this is only a part of the entire work, the remainder of which is yet in MS. Arephoria was a festival observed among the ancient Greeks. It has been attributed to different deities, but most generally to Athena, in honor of whom it was celebrated at Athens. Four young girls were chosen every year from the most distinguished families. Two of these superintended the bearing of the peplus to Athena, while the other two were employed to carry the mysterious and sacred vessels of the goddess. At the close of the ceremony, the girls were dismissed and others chosen in their place.

Arbus or Arro Sponsalitis (also Arrohale). The custom of giving such pledges of espousal, of which traces are to be found in all parts of the world, has its root evidently in the view, common yet to many savage ages, of marriage as the mere sale of a wife, to which betrothal stands in the relation of contract to delivery. Among the Jews, betrothal was strictly a contract of purchase for money or money's worth (although two other forms were also admitted), the coin used being, however, the smallest that could be had. The earnest was given either to the wife herself or to her parents. It could not be of forbidden things or things common to a priestly use, nor was it customarily powerfully owned, unless such as might have been taken from the woman herself; but a lawfully given earnest was sufficient to constitute betrothal without words spoken.

The first legal reference among the Romans to the arrha on betrothal, and the only one in the Digest, belongs to the 3d century, i.e. to a period when the Roman world was already to a great extent permanently divided by foreign influences, at this time chiefly Oriental. About eighty years later, however, at a time when the Northern barbarians had already given emperors to Rome, the arrha appears in full development. Julius Capitolinus, who wrote under Constantine, in his Life of Max- iminus the Younger (killed 313), says that he had been betrothed to Junia Fadella, who was afterwards married to Toxotius, "but there remained with her royal arrha, which were these, as Junius Cordius relates from the testimony of those who are said to have examined into these things: a necklace of nine pearls, a net of eleven emeralds, a bracelet with a clasp of four jacinths, besides golden and all regal vestments, and other insignia of betrothai." Ambrose, indeed (A.D. 346-397), speaks only of the symbolic ring in relating the story of St. Agnes, whom he represents as replying to the governor of Rome, who wished to marry her to his son, that she stands engaged to another lover, who has offered her far better dowrym, and given her for ear- nest the ring of his alliance. To a contemporary of Ambrose, pope Julius I (336-352), is ascribed a decree that if any shall have espoused a wife or given her earnest, his brother or other near kinsman may not marry her. About a century later, the word arrha is used figuratively in reference to the Annunciation considered as a betrothai by Peter Chrysologus, archbishop of Ravenna in 433. In the days of Justinian we see from the Code that the earnest-money was a regular element in Byzantine betrothal. The reason of this development of the arrha within the Roman or Byzantine world of the 6th century is to be sought in some foreign influence. Among the barbarian races which overran the empire from the end of the 4th century, we find almost everywhere the prevalence of the custom of total payment for the marriage, or the prevailed of the custom of total payment for the marriage, which is the foundation of the betrothal earnest. In the earlier writers there is nothing to connect the betrothal earnest with a religious ceremony; and, indeed, the opinion has been strongly held that church betrothals did not obtain before the 9th century. What Honorius, Nicolaus Sallius, and other early authors recognize as the regular practice of betrothal by arrha, symbolized through the ring, yet the only benediction which he expressly mentions is the nuptial, not the sponsal. See BETROTHAL; SPONSALITY.

Arriaga, Gonzalo de, a Spanish theologian of the 17th century, was born at Burgos, in Castile. He belonged to the congregation of St. Dominic, and was appointed canon of the cathedral by Pope Urban VIII. He died Nov. 27, 1662. He wrote a great many good works, among them a Life of St. Francis and a Treatise on Vocal and Mental Prayer. See Chalmers, Biog. Diet. s. v.; Hoefer, Nou. Biog. Generale, s. v.

Arrighetti, Filippo, an Italian clergyman, was born in Florence in 1682. He studied at Fissa and Padua, and was appointed canon of the cathedral by Pope Urban VIII. He died Nov. 27, 1662. He wrote a great many good works, among them a Life of St. Francis and a Treatise on Vocal and Mental Prayer. See Chalmers, Biog. Diet. s. v.; Hoefer, Nou. Biog. Generale, s. v.

Arrighetti, Nicolò, a learned Italian Jesuit, was born at Florence in 1709. He taught natural science in the University of Sienna, and wrote several interesting treatises on fire and light. He died in 1767. See Hoefer, Nou. Biog. Generale, s. v.

Arrighi, Lorenzo, a monk of Bologna, in the Order of Santa-Croce, lived in the former half of the 17th century. After the suppression of the order he became a secular priest. He left, besides several Latin and Italian poems, Vita post. Urbani VII (Bologna, 1614, 1624, 4to). See Hoefer, Nou. Biog. Generale, s. v.

Arrighi, Paolo, an Italian theologian and publicist, was born in Florence in 1549, and died Dec. 16, 1587. He wrote On the Supremacy of the Princes (Florence, 1577). See Hoefer, Nou. Biog. Generale, s. v.

Arrigoni, Pompeo, an Italian cardinal, was born in Rome in 1552. At the close of his course of studies at Bologna and Padua he was made doctor of laws, and a little later the king of Spain chose him for his representative at Rome. He was appointed consistorial ad-voeate by Gregory XIII, and auditor of the suits of the apostolic court by Gregory XIV. At last, in the seventh month of the same year, he was created cardinal. He died at Naples, April 4, 1616.
We have from him a Latin discourse delivered at Rome, in the consistory, upon the Canonisation of St.
Diego of Alcala (Rome, 1588). Other works are attributed to him which have been contested by Mazzuchelli.

Arrington, Jona, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Indiana in 1848, date unknown. He experienced conversion when about twenty-two, soon began to exhort, and in 1807 entered the Virginia Conference, wherein he labored with zeal and fidelity until sickness, in 1815, obliged him to retire. He died in 1816. Mr. Arrington was correct and dis-criminant in mind, sound in doctrine, vigilant in duty, pious in example. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1816, p. 276.

Artoy, Béstan, a French theologian, lived at Lyons near the middle of the 17th century. He wrote, Quoetions Décidées sur la Justice des Armes des Rois de France et l'Alliance avec les Hérétiques et les Infidèles (1654).—Apologie pour l'Église de Lyon, contre les Nota-

Arsacius (vulg. Uracius), Sr., was a solitary of Bithynia, by nation a Persian, who suffered much for the faith under Licius, A.D. 320, after which he shut himself up in a tower in Nicomedia, where he was distinguished by the gifts of miracles and prophecy, according to Sozomen (iv, 16). He is said to have been divinely forewarned of the coming destruction of the city of Nicomedia by an earthquake, which happened Aug. 24, 358; before which, according to his own desire, he is said to have died in his tower, and while on his knees at prayer. The Roman martyrology marks his festival on Aug. 16. See Ruinart, p. 522; Baillit, Aug. 16.

Arsacius was the intruding archbishop of Constantinople, after the violent expulsion of Chrysostom, A.D. 404, under whom he had served as arch-brother. Eudoxia and Theophilius, having succeeded in their designs against Chrysostom, found in Arsa-cius, who had passed his eightieth year, a facile tool.
He was consecrated June 27, 404. Notwithstanding the influence of the court party, it was soon shown that the diocese considered him an intruder. The people of Constantinople refused to worship with him, but gathered in the outskirts of the city. The whole Western episcopate refused to acknowledge him, and pope Innocent strongly condemned his intrusion.
His episcopal see was, for he died November 11,

Arsenian, a party which arose in the Greek Church in the 15th century, deriving their name from Antorianus Arsenius (q. v.).

Arsenius, a monk of the Greek Church, lived in the middle of the 17th century, during the reign of Michael Fedorovitch. His most cherished desire was to introduce a reform into the old Church of Slavonia.
He was finally regarded as a heretic, and banished by the Arsenius, Aristobulus, archbishop of Monemba-sia, or Malvasia, in the Mores, was born near the middle of the 15th century. He was the son of Michael Apostolius, and was a distinguished scholar and philologist.

Excommunicated by the patriarch of Constantinople for his alliance with Rome, he sought refuge in Venice, where he died in 1355. We are indebted to him for a very rare book, entitled Preclura Dicta Philosophorum, Artemius, or Arthemiaus, saint and martyr, was a commander of the troops in Egypt, and was beheaded by Julian the Apostate in 362 for breaking idols and destroying the temples of false deities. He is commemorated by Greek and Latins on Oct. 90. See Athanasius, Ep. ad Solitarios.

Arter, Richard, an English Wesleyan minister, was converted in early life, entered the work in 1809, but in three months sank under his labors, and died in 1810, aged twenty-four. See Minutes of British Conference, 1810.

Arthur, Archibald, a Scottish clergyman, was born at Abbots-Inch, Renfrewshire, Sept. 6, 1744, and was instructed in his youth in the Grammar-school at Paisley. He afterwards finished his education at the University of Glasgow, where he became professor of moral philosophy; took a course in theology in the same institution; was licensed to preach in 1767, and soon after was appointed chaplain to the university and assistant to the Rev. Dr. Craig of Glasgow. In 1780 he was appointed assistant and successor to the learned Dr. Reid, professor of moral philosophy, and he continued to deliver lectures for fifteen years. He died June 14, 1797. One of his best works was Discourses on Theological and Literary Subjects.

Arthur, James Hope, a Baptist missionary to Japan, was born at Hartford, Conn., May 27, 1842, his family being emigrants from Scotland. He graduated at Brown University in the class of 1870, and took the course of study at the Newton Theological Institution. In July, 1873, he was ordained at Hartford, having been previously appointed as a missionary by the American Baptist Missionary Union to enter the Japan field. He spent a year at Yokohama in learning the language, at the end of which time he removed to Tokio, the capital of the empire, where he gave himself to the study and preaching of the gospel work as a missionary. Four years were devoted to this laborious service, and he had gathered a Church of twenty members, when disease compelled him to retire from his labors. He crossed the Pacific in May, 1877, with the hope that in California he might recover his health, but died at Oakland, Cal., Dec. 9, 1877. (J. C. S.)

Arthur, John W., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born near Badmin, Pa., May 4, 1818. He received a careful religious training; experienced conversion at the age of sixteen, and, after spending several years as exhorter and local preacher, he, in 1840, entered the Philadelphia Conference. In 1868 he became superannuated, and remained so till his death, Oct. 21, 1871. Mr. Arthur was amiable, frank, generous, confiding, sincere, uniform, and uncompromising. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1872, p. 24.

Arthur, Thomas, a Presbyterian minister, graduated at Yale College in the class of 1748, and on being licensed he was employed as a supply at Stratfield, Conn. He was ordained and installed, by the New York Presbytery, pastor at New Brunswick in 1746, and died Feb. 2, 1750. "He was a good scholar, a graceful orator, a finished preacher, an excellent Christian, steadfast, without a tincture of bigotry, cheerful in conversation, without the appearance of levity, of an amiable and engaging behavior, the darling of his people." He was one of the original trustees of New Jersey College. Two of his Sermons were printed. (W. F. S.)

Arthur, William, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Peebles, Scotland, in April, 1769. He received a classical education at Edinburgh, and was ordained to the work of the ministry at Paisley. In 1793 he came to America, and having preached for some time in New York and Albany, he was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Pequea, Pa., which position he held for more than twenty years. He died in 1827. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iii, 208.

Artigui, Antoine Gachat d', a French clergyman, was born in Vienne, Nov. 8, 1706. He was canon of the Church in his native place, and spent his life in literary research, the result of which was the composition of several important works (1749-56). He died at Vienne, May 6, 1778. See Chalmers, Biog. Hist. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Artis, Gabriel d', a French Protestant theologian, was born about 1660 at Milhau, in Rouergue. He is known by his works of controversy, directed especially against the Socinians. He died in London in 1732. Some of his works, though incomplete, are found in the Biographie Universelle of Michaud, according to the references given by Barbier. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Artom, Benjamin, chief rabbi of the Spanish and Portuguese Jews of Great Britain, was born at Asti, in Piedmont, in 1834. He received his theological education at Padua, and became minister of the Naples Jewish community. While Miss A. M. Goldsmith was travelling through Italy, she heard him preach at Naples, and was so charmed by his grace and eloquence that she immediately wrote to London, where the position of Hacham of the Sephardim had been vacant since the death of rabbI Molda, in 1828. After a brief correspondence, Dr. Artom was invited to London, and was elected chief rabbi for life, to the position of Hacham. For the first year he lectured in French, but soon mastered the English language; his sermons, a volume of which appeared in print a few years ago (1874), being models of pulpit eloquence. Dr. Artom's ministrations have been blessed with much success. The establishment of a Portuguese congregation at Manchester and of a branch synagogue in London are proofs of his activity. Personally popular on account of his gifts of mind and person, he was energetic in his efforts to rive the Sephardim of England, who for decades, satisfied with their reputation for respectability, had allowed their German-English brethren entirely to advance in communal eminence. This reproach Dr. Artom had rolled away, and in his decade in office he had commanded the esteem of the entire community. He died at Brighton, Jan. 6, 1879. At the funeral, which took place on the 8th inst., chief rabbi Dr. Adler and Rev. Prof. Marx were in the pulpit, while almost every Jewish notability in England was present. See Morris, Modern Israelites of the Nineteenth Century (Philadelphia, 1880), p. 15 sq. (B. F.)

Artontius (originally Kreitschkeb), i.e., "Cut-bread", Peter, a Polish ecclesiastical poet, was born at Groziski (Great Poland), July 26, 1552. After having studied at Wittenberg, he returned to Poland, where he displayed great zeal in behalf of Lutheranism, and was for twenty-three years Protestant minister at Thorn, where he died, Aug. 2, 1609. He wrote, Kamesotol, to test Fiesni Chreziasniebik (Thor, 1758), a collection of sacred songs;—Thanatomaichia cygbi Bogs Smierciea (ibid. 1600)—Dietia Duszna (ibid. 1601), a reply to an attack against the preceding work;—Nomenclator Rerum, Appellationes Tribus Linguis, Latina, Germanscia, Polonius, Explicata Judiciae (ibid. 1597; reprinted 1684). The hymns of Artontius are very highly esteemed, and they are still used in the Protestant churches of Poland. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Artopæus (originally Becker), Johann Christoph, a German historian, was born in 1626 at Strasburg. He devoted himself entirely to study, and was canon of the cathedral chapter of St. George, Strasburg. He died at his native place, June 21, 1726. He published a great number of theses and dissertations, both theological and historical, of which Audifferd has given a list in his Bibliotheca. He also wrote Serîa Disquisitio de Arundel, John, an English Congregational minister, was born at Selby, Yorkshire, Dec. 10, 1778. He was introduced to business at the age of eleven, and converted at sixteen. In 1799 he began to study for the ministry, and entered Rotherham College. His first charge was at Whitley, where he was ordained July 12, 1804, and in which he remained fifteen years. In 1819 he became the home secretary of the London Missionary Society; and in 1822 he accepted the pastorate of the Congregational Church in Union Street, Dublin, for which he held joint-appointment. In this Church he ministered with great efficiency for more than twenty years, when he was compelled, through protracted indisposition, to resign his charge; and in 1845 he retired from his office in the Mission-house. He died March 5, 1848. Mr. Arundel was an humble Christian, a faithful friend, a practical preacher, a devoted pastor, and a zealous officer of the society with which he was so long identified. See the (Lond.) Evangelical Magazine, 1848, p. 212, 561.

Arupa, in Hindu mythology, are the bodiless pure spirits, one of the three classes of living beings. They are subdivided into four classes, each of which has a separate dwelling; and the lowest is so high above the earth that it is not possible to take from that point to the earth. The souls of the dead are born again as Arupa, and do not need a transmigration through various stages in order to reach the heavenly bliss. They immediately step into heaven after their new birth as blessed spirits.

Aruspices (Lat. ab oris inspicendi, from inspecting the altars), soothsayers or diviners among the ancient Romans, who were supposed to have been originally from Etruria to Rome; and their chief duty was understood to be that of ascertaining the will of the gods from the appearance which the entrails of animals exhibited when offered in sacrifice upon the altars. But they were not limited to this mode of exercising their art; they were accustomed to examine all kinds of prodigies. See DIVINATION.

Arvahur (early awake), in Norse mythology, is a coursier, which, with another horse, Alswidur, is harnessed to the wagon of the sun.

Arvales, Frares (Lat. field brothers), a college of priests, among the ancient Romans, whose office it was to offer sacrifices for the fertility of the fields. They were twelve in number, and are said to have owed their original constitution to M. Porcius Cato. A gold badge of office was a chaplet of ears of corn fastened round their heads by a white band. Once a year they celebrated a three-days' festival in honor of Ceres, towards the end of May. See ARVARIA.

Arvanel, in Zendic mythology, was the sacred river from which the first created human beings drank.

Arvine, Kazlutz, a Baptist minister, was born in 1826, and was a graduate of Wayland University, in the class of 1841. He pursued his theological studies at the Newton Theological Institution, and graduated in the class of 1845. His ordination took place Nov. 6 of the same year, and he became pastor of the Church in Woosnocket, R. I. His other pastorate were with the Providence Church, New York city, and with the Church in West Boylston, Mass. He died at East Brookfield, July, 1851. As an author, Mr. Arvine is known as the compiler of Cyclopaedia of Moral and Religious Anecdotes and Cyclopaedia of Literary Anecdotes. See Newton General Catalogue, p. 29. (J. C. S.)

Arya is one of the four paths which, in the religion of the Buddhists, when entered upon, leads either immediately or more remotely to the attainment of nirvana, or cessation of existence. He who enters upon the Arya, or Aryahut, has overcome or destroyed all evil desires and the craving to existence. He is understood to know the thoughts of any one in any situation whatever. See Annihilation; Buddhism.
Asaph, Sr., is said to have been the disciple of St. Kentigern, who followed him in all of his excellences. Kentigern committed to his charge, at first, the care of his monastery; and when on his first charge, the consent of the people, consecrated him his successor in the bishopric. Asaph wrote the Ordinances of his Church:—A Life of St. Kentigern:—and some other works. How long he filled the see, and when he died, is altogether unknown, as also are the name and place. We are told of a bishop of St. Asaph in a general British council in 943, but his name does not appear.

Asas, in Norse mythology, was the general name of the Scandinavian gods. A crew to the origin of the name is found in Suetonius, Life of Augustus, where the author says, "Among some of the preoccupations of Augustus's death, is the circumstance that on one of his statues the lightning struck off the letter C from his title (name), so that instead of Caesar Augustus only Caesar remained, which, in the Etruscan language, signifies the gods; and it was considered as a sign that Augustus within C (one hundred) days would be placed among the gods. Although it cannot be certain whether the Etruscan Eatar and the Icelandic Eir are very remarkable, still this example stands so isolated here that we would not be justified in building upon it, especially as further evidences of linguistic and religious connection are missing. Three hundred years later we find the word Asa in the West, who says, "Arou sausa tsujja" (the Asas, gods of the Tyrrhenians). Three hundred years later still, A.D. 500, we hear from Jornandes that the Goths, after a brilliant victory over the army of Dominian, held their general as gods and called them Asas. It is remarkable that in many languages the word Asa is used as the designation of a sovereign deity. Still more remarkable is it, if philologists are to be trusted, that Mithras, the supreme god of the Persians, signifies nothing less than "the glorious, the great Asa." One of the oldest historians of Northern Scandinavia, Snorri-Sturluson, maintains that this divine name designated an ancient people of the North. He says:

"The great river Tanaqueli (Tama, Don) divides the world into three parts: the east is called Asia, the west Europe. The country in the east has been called Asaisheim, and the capital city Asasburg. In this latter city the celebrated child Odin was born. There was a place assigned for sacrifices in this city, with twelve priests. The latter were called Diar, or Drottin gods, or masters, and in Turkey Odin possessed great tracts of land and other property. At the same time the Romans, as the war became the rulers of the world. As Odin was a prophet and knew that his nation was destined to possess the northern country, he planned to become the ruler over his kingdom, and with the twelve priests he went to Gar-dariki (Russel), where many traces of a former kingdom of Northmen remain. Odin left his sons in this country; he himself, however, took his residence on an island, which is now called Odene-Atlanta (Odessa). Now they sent Gefon (one of the four supreme goddesses of the Asa) out in quest of new land; she came to Gyffe, who gave her as much land as she might plough with her steed! In the town where she was mother of four sons by a giant in Jutland, she changed them into steeds; and she grew so fond of them that she wished to build a large temple which she cut off from the country of Gyffe and brought into the sea, wherefrom it was called Sealand. Here she lived and married Odin's son, Skild. Odin, later, hearing of the riches of the country, selected a place of residence, and built there a great temple of Asa, and gave each of the twelve priests a dwelling. Thus sacrifices were brought to Odin as well as to his twelve companions, both in the north and south, and they were worshipped just as many gods."

Thus, according to the oldest Northern historian, the Asas were a foreign people, civilized, educated, spreading arts and sciences, thus winning the divine respect of the people. The male Asas were: Odin, the chief; Thor, the most powerful of gods and men; Freyr, the most gracious; Vidar, the silent; Baldur, the best, of shining form; Ali, or Vati, the archer; Heimdal, the watchman at the door of heaven; Uller, the warrior; Tyr, the courageous; Braga, the poet; Hoder, the blind. The female Aesir were: Frigg, Odin's wife; Íðunna, goddess of immortality; Freya, goddess of love; Gerda, Lada, Rinda, Geðiona, Fulla, etc. But all these gods and goddesses, notwithstanding their power and greatness, will perish at the destruction of the world. Alfalfa, the cow, is not conserved with time or space, lives forever: he is not mortal Aesir, but an immortal, eternal god. See Norse Mythology.

Ascelin (or Anselm), Nicholas, a missionary sent by Innocent IV to a Mongol chief in 1247. A description of his voyage, though incomplete, is found in the Miroir Historique of Vincent of Beauvais, which gives Simon of St. Quentin as companion of Ascelin. This was translated into French by Berge-
non. The tradition according to the treatise Yehumorth (Talm. Bab.), fol. 49, col. 2, runs thus: "It is related that rabbi Simeon ben-Azai found in Jerusalem a genealogy wherein it was written that Manasseh had killed Isaiah. Manasseh said to Isaiah, 'Moses, thy master, said, There shall no man see God and live (Ezkod, xxxiii, 20). But thou hast said, I saw the Lord sat upon his throne (Isa. vi. 1). Moses said, Wicked information is there so great that hath God so nigh unto them (Deut. iv. 7)? But thou hast said, Seek ye the Lord while he may be found' (Isa. iv. 6). Isaiah thought, 'If I excuse myself, I shall only increase his guilt and not save myself;' so he answered not a word, but pronounced the incommunicable name, and a cedar-tree opened and he disappeared within it. Then Manasseh ordered, and they took the cedar and saw it lengthways; and when the saw reached his mouth he died." In Tertullian (De Patrtinat., c. 14) we read: "His patiente viribus secatur Eneas et de Domino non possumis dominaretur; supra enim tegitur; totius Aet patrionum toto forto fereat k. r. a. Epiphanius, when speaking of the árionovos Χριστου, says their hereby was partly taken from the ἡμείας τοῦ Χριστοῦ. Until the 5th century the work was known, then it disappeared. In 1819 Richard Laurence, of Oxford, discovered an Ethiopic MS. in the Bodleian Library, which he published, with translations into Latin and English, under the title Ergata Isaiai Nabi. Laurence's book has of late been superseded by the excellent work of Dillmann, Ascensione Isaia Ethisphile et Latine. Cum Prologenit, Adnotationum Críticas et Exegeticis, Additis Versionum Latinum, etc. But the text is not very accurate: 94, 18, 2, 14 are Jewish, not showing the least trace of Christian influence; (2) vi, i and xi, 1, 29-40, the proper Ascension, is the work of a Christian. That this once circuculated as a separate book is probable from the fact that the translation, published by Angelo-Mai (in Scripturum Veterum Nova Collectio, 1824), ii, 11, 298 sq., contains this part only. (3) These two parts were united by a Christian editor, who added ch. 1 (except ver. 3, 4a) and xi, 42, 48. (4) This was again revised by another Christian hand, which added ii, 15-18, and xii, 2-22, together with i, 3, 4a; v, 13, 16; xi, 41. That the whole work as such was also extant in the Western Church is seen from the second Latin translation, found by Gieseler (Vetus Translatio-Lat. Visions Isaei [Göttingen, 1832]), where different parts of the whole work are quoted.

Ascesisone (or Ascensam), Abraham, a Por-

Ascetria is a name frequently applied to consecrated virgins in the ancient Church. See Nuns.

Aschaffenburg, Council of (Concilium Aschaffensbergense). This is a town of Germany, lately in the territory of Meiz, but now a principal town of the Bavaria. Gerard of Epperstein assembled a council here in 1292, after the death of pope Nicholas IV, while the papal chair was vacant. Some salutary constitutions for the good of the Church were drawn up.

Aschiari (or Archari), a Mussulman doctor, and chief of the Ascharians, maintained that the Supreme Being acts by general laws. He also held absolute predestinatin. He died at Bagdad in 940. See Chalmer, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Ascharians, a Mohammedan sect, the disciples of Archari (q. v.). They hold that God acts only by general laws, and upon this they ground the liberty of man and the merit of good works; but being the Creator, he must concur in all the actions of men accounting to their view of the subject. See Mor-

Aschem, Council of (Concilium Aschenuense). A council was held here, A.D. 763, under Tassilo II, duke of Bavaria, that passed fifteen decrees on Disciplin.

Aschrenbrenner, Beda, a Roman Catholic theo-degian of Germany, was born March 6, 1756, at Vielreich, in Lower Bavaria. At a very early age he joined the order of the Benedictines; from 1778 to 1780, studied dogmatics and church history; was appointed in 1781 professor of philosophy at Neuburg, on the Danube; and in 1786 professor of canon law and church history in the monastery of his order at Oeralieuth. Three years later he was called to Ingolstadt, where he died July 24, 1817. He wrote, Elementa Proteoctio-num Canonarium (Ratisbon, 1788, 3 pts.):—Brevarium Historis Ecclesiasticum (ibid. 1789).—Commentarius de...

Obligatione, quae Nationi Germanicae Incumbit, Concordia Aschenfelden Beneficia seu Vindobonensis etiamnam Tribute Serendi, etc. (Ingolstadt, 1796). See Doring, Die geklärten Theologen Deutschlands, i, 28 sq. (B. P.)

Aschenfeldt, Christoph Carl Julius, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born March 5, 1792, at Kiel. He studied at Göttingen and became pastor at Windbergen, in Holstein; in 1824 he moved to Flensburg, and in 1829 pastor primarius there; in 1850 he was appointed provost at Flensburg, where he died, Sept. 1, 1856. He is the author of some hymns, as Aus tridentinum Getaney (Eng. trans. in Schaff, Christ in Song, p. 553, "Amid life's wild commotion"). See Koch, Gesch. d. deutschen Kirchenleidet, v, 156 sq. (B. P.)

Aschkenasi (1782-1834), a general name for German Jews. See also ASHKENAZI.

Ascelpas (or Aesculapius), bishop of Gaza, warmly advocated the Nicene faith in the Council of Tyre in 335, and was deposed by the Arian majority in the charge of having overturned an altar. He joined Athanasius and Marcellus in their appeal to Julius, bishop of Rome; and was, with them, restored to his see by Julius in 341. In 343 he appeared at the Council of Sardis; and it is stated in the Synodical Letter drawn up by the orthodox bishops that he there produced a report of what had taken place at Antioch, where he had been acquainted by the verdict of the assembled bishops. His name appears among the seventy bishops to whom Alexander addressed an encyclical letter against those who had received Arius (Epiphanius, Her. lxxiv, 4).

Asclepiades, ninth bishop of Antioch and confessor, succeeded Serapion as bishop in 293. Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. vi, 11) mentions him as "having become conspicuous in the confessions during the time of the persecution" (of Severus). He was succeeded by Philetus in 218 (Nicephorus, Hist. Eccles. iii, 19; v, 26). See Baronius, sub ann. 203, 218.

Asclepiades, bishop of Tralles, is the reputed author of a letter to Peter Fuller against the silly fashions adopted by the latter to the Presbyter, about A.D. 483. The letter is contained in the collections of the councils; but both its authenticity and the existence of Asclepiades are disputed.

Asclepieia were festivals celebrated among the ancient Greeks wherever temples existed in honor of Aesculapius (q. v.); god of medicine. The most celebrated of these festivals was that which was held at Epidaurus, celebrated on the 20th of Thargelion, and at which a sacrifice was made of the piastre, which was dedicated by that of Sts. Paula and Eustochia. Asella remained alone at Rome, where Palladius testifies to have seen her, in 404, in a monastery, where she presided over several virgins. She died about 405, and is commemorated in the Roman martyrology on Dec. 8 (Jerome, Ep. 15, 90, 140).

Asenath, History of, "The Life and Confession of Asenath, daughter of Pentheus of Heliopolis; a Narrative (of what happened) when the beautiful Joseph took her to wife." Such is the full title of a short religious romance published by Fabricius. He gave it at first a Latin text; afterwards a much fuller Greek original of eight out of the nineteen chapters from an imperfect MS. The British Museum possesses a version, made from the Greek by Moses of Agi, about 550. The story is very simple. Asenath, a proud beauty, disdained all suitors excepting Pharaoh's eldest son, and treated with scorn her father's wish that she should marry Joseph. But when she saw him she declared that he was the man and that by his counsels she had learned to despise the bitter words she had spoken about his imprisonment and the occasion of it. She came to him with the greeting, "Hail, my lord, blessed of the Most High God." Joseph, however, repelled her; but, seeing her tears, laid his hand on her head, and prayed God to bless her. A few days later an angel appeared to Pharaoh's wife and told her he should consult her spouse. On his departure Joseph arrived, and the next day asked her of Pharaoh, and Pharaoh celebrated the marriage with great pomp. The book ends with a strange story: Pharaoh's son, being enamoured of Asenath, endeavored to procure the marriage in a secret manner; but was unsuccessful. This history is not very evident; the signs of Christian origin are not to be mistaken, though Jewish legend may have supplied materials. There is no evidence to show in what country the book was written.

Asenheim. See Asaheim.

Asera is the title of an Etruscan goddess who is armed with a hatchet. Aseria occurs in Etruscan inscriptions, and is thought to mean "a god." See also Asherah.

Asgard, in Norse mythology, is sometimes called the capital city of the fabulous country Asaheim; sometimes, again, the residence of the Asa deities. As the latter, it is a city, or a beautiful extended palace, which the Assas built in the centre of the earth. Around this palace, which covered the greatest part of the woods, in which, after their meals, the deities roamed about, this will continue until Ragnarok, the great night, shall break in upon them, when the deities will disappear. One of the palaces in Asgard is Walhalla (q. v.). There is still another palace in Asgard, Walaskifal, the residence of Odin, in which there is a high tower, from which he can view the whole world. Wotan is the friendly residence of the goddesses, and Glaadscheim the greatest place in Asgard, on which each of the twelve gods has an honorary residence. Over all these abodes, however, Odin's residence may be seen. There they hold judgment upon men and deities.

Ash, Benjamin, an English Congregational minister, was born at Malmsbury, Wilts, Sept. 26, 1797, of Moravian parents. He received his early education at the Fulneck Moravian Seminary. He entered the ministry in 1820 as pastor of several country districts, supporting himself by teaching school and farming. About 1836 he removed to Laxton, Nottinghamshire, where he continued until 1871. In later years he lived at Linton, and afterwards at Ripon, where he died, March 17, 1873. Mr. Ash was earnestly devoted to the Bible and Missionary societies and to evangelistic work in the country, and travelled many thousands of miles in his own conveyance to preach the Gospel. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1874, p. 310.

Ash, Edward, a minister of the denomination of Friends, was born at Bristol, England, in 1776. He was converted when only ten years old, while attending a boarding-school at Melksham, Wiltshire. In his twenty-fourth year he entered upon a course of medical study in London and Edinburgh, taking the degree of M.D. in 1825. In 1836 he removed to Norwich and began practicing as a physician. In 1892 he was led to address the call, which he had long felt, to the public ministry. In 1837 he retired from medical practice and returned to Bristol, his native city, where he died in 1873. Dr. Ash made a diligent and careful study of the original Greek. In 1849 he published a work in three volumes, consisting of Explanatory Notes and Comments on the New Testament. While on his death-bed he wrote several tracts, to be circulated after his death—viz. A Christian Believer in the Near Prospect of Death:—An Invitation. See Annual Monitor, 1875, p. 198.

Ash, James (1), an English Wesleyan minister, was born, probably in 1789. He was received into the work in 1813; preached on the Bricham, Axminster, Dunster, Hungerford, Tavistock, etc., circuits; became a supernumerary in 1824; was reduced by disease to great weakness, both of body and mind; and died, probably at Ax-

Ashby, George, F.S.A., an English divine and antiquary, was born in Red Lion Street, Clerkenwell, Dec. 5, 1734, and was admitted to the Chichester schools. He was admitted to St. John's College, Cam-minister, May 14, 1840. See Minutes of British Conference, 1840.

Ashby, James (2), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was a native of Ireland. His early life is unrecorded. At the age of twenty he embraced religion; served as a class-leader several years in Montreal, Canada; in 1838 removed to Milwaukee, Wis., where he received license to preach; and in 1840 entered the Rock River Conference. In 1844 he became superannuated. He held that station until his death, by consumption, in 1849. Mr. Ash was a plain, practical, and useful preacher, a faithful pastor, and a deeply pious Christian. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1849, p. 352.

Ash, William, an English Wesleyan minister, was born near Castleton, Yorkshire, in 1785. The greater part of his youth was spent at Farndale. He was moral from boyhood. He entered the ministry in 1811; retired from its active duties in 1829; settled at Whitby; and died in that city Oct. 8, 1863. Ash brought forth in open-air preaching, and he frequently addressed crowds in this way. He was a diligent student of the Bible; and he read it through, consecutively, once hundred and twenty times. He was open and confiding, simple and frank, with no small fund of humor; and sometimes illuminated with quiet satire. See Minutes of British Conference, 1864, p. 14; West. Meth. Mag., April, 1869, art. 1.

Ashamnu (אֲשָׁמַנְנְו), we have transgressed] is the beginning of a penitential confession, written in Hebrew characters, and offered on the Day of Atonement. It runs thus:

"We have trespassed; we have dealt treacherously; we have stolen; we have spoken slanders; we have committed iniquity; and have done wickedly; we have acted presumptuously; we have committed violence; we have followed falsehood; we have counselled evil; we have uttered lies; we have scorned; we have rebelled; we have blasphemed; we have reviled; we have acted perversely; we have swindled; we have been stiff-necked; we have acted wickedly; we have corrupted; we have done abominably; we have grown estranged and have caused others to err; we have turned aside from thy excellent precepts and institutions, and which hath not profited us: but thou art just concerning all that is come upon us; for thou hast dealt most truly, but we have done wickedly."

Ashan. Lieut. Conder suggests (Tent Work, ii, 324) as sites for the two cities of this name Aseliek and Hezekiel, with no small fund of humor, whose remains are about twenty years old. He was then a local preacher. In 1823 he entered the Missouri Conference. Between 1830 and 1884 he sustained a superannuated relation. He then located; and in 1845 he was readmitted into the active ranks, and thus remained until 1857, when declining strength obliged him again to become a superannuate. He died of epilepsy at the close of his last pulpit effort, Aug. 29, 1896. Mr. Asby was a man of prayer, and a zealous, faithful preacher. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1890, p. 201.

bridge, in October, 1740, and graduated in 1744. He was presented to the rectory of Hungerton, and in 1759 to that of Twyford, both in Leicestershire. In 1774 he accepted the college rectory of Barrow, Suffolk, where he resided constantly for thirty-four years. In October, 1780, he was inducted into the living of Stansfield, Suffolk. He died June 12, 1808. He was a valuable contributor to several important works. Bishop Percy, Mr. Grainger, Richard Gough, Thomas Harmer, James Harrington, and others acknowledge his intelligent aid. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Ashby, John, an English Congregational minister, was born at Kettering, June 29, 1805. In 1823 he united in fellowship with the Church, and engaged in village preaching. He entered the Newport Pagnel Institution in 1830 for better ministerial preparation. In 1835 he was ordained pastor at Thetford, Norfolk, where he labored until the close of 1847, when he accepted the pastorate at Stony Stratford, Bucks, where he died, June 1, 1863. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1864, p. 198.

Ashby, John Eyre, LL.D., F.R.A.S., an English Congregational minister, was born in London in 1829. From an early age he earnestly desired to enter the Christian ministry. In 1840 he took the degree of A.B. in the London University; in 1842 he entered Homerton College; on leaving it, in 1845, he became pastor of the Congregational Church at Arundel, and in the following year was ordained. In 1848 he accepted, in addition to his pastoral duties, a professorship at Brighton School; in 1852 he resigned his charge at Arundel, and took the oversight of the Church at Wor- dour. Subsequently he retired to Enfield, where he died, in January, 1864. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1865, p. 219.

Ashby, Mary, a minister of the denomination of Friends for nearly twenty years, was born in Middlesex County, England, in 1773. She was naturally of a timid disposition. Her convictions of duty were so strong that she could not desist from preaching, though her communications were short and infrequent. She made a constant study of the Holy Scriptures, especially those of the New Test. She lived an exemplary Christian life, and died in the triumphs of Christian faith, July 6, 1835. See Annual Monitor, 1837, p. 1

Ashby, Thomas, a minister of the denomination of Friends, was born near London, Jan. 10, 1762. Perhaps there were few, if any, of his brethren who had a deeper sense of ministerial responsibility than he had. After fifty years of ministerial labor, his life was terminated very suddenly, Dec. 20, 1841, by an affection of the heart. See Annual Monitor, 1843, p. 1.

Ashdod. The modern "Ashdud" is a moderate-sized village of mud houses, situated on the eastern declivity of a little flatish hill. On approaching it from the south, we have in the foreground a lake, 400 or 500 yards in circumference; beyond it a large ruinous khan and modern wely; beyond these the hill, its southern face covered by a multitude of diminutive gardens with stone fences that look like sheep-pens in the distance. Leaving the pond and khan on the left, we advance to the village over a naked slope of threshing-floors and brick-fields. The site is beautiful and commanding. Groves of olives, figs, and palms adjoin it on the east and north, covering the sides of the hill, and stretching along the undulating ground at its base. The plain, too, unfolds itself before us till it meets the dark mountains of Judea. The village is entirely modern, and does not contain a vestige of antiquity; but in the old khan to the south-west there is a granite column, and beside the little wely, near the khan, is a sculptured sarcophagus, with some fragments of small marble shafts. The southern side of the hill appears also, as if it had been once covered with buildings, the stones of which are now thrown together in the rude fences. The khan is comparatively modern, certainly not older than that at Ramleh" (Porter, Handb. for Syria, p. 279). Ancient masonry and fragments of columns are also detected in the walls of the houses and mosques. See also Conder, Test Work, ii, 166.

Ashdoth-Pisgah. This expressive term is now well ascertained to designate the springs known as Aqiq M'ass (Fountains of Moses) in the valley leading to the foot of Sinai, or Jebel Neha on the north, they are thus described by Tristram (Land of Moab, p. 348 sq.). See PISGAH.

"There are two fountains, or rather two groups of springs, birthing from the foot of a tall line of cliffs. The first group run for a short distance over a shelf of rock, shaded by some old fig-trees. A few yards farther on several smaller springs issue from fissures in the cliffs, soon uniting to form a broad sheet of rock, and then form a pretty cascade about twenty-five feet high.

"... The second of the twin 'Springs of Moses' bursts from a deep horizontal tunnel in the rock, about fifteen inches in diameter. The volume of water is greater than that of the other spring; and both fountains and streams are clear as crystal. This stream joins the other, after the cascade, by a series of smaller leaps." (See following page.)

Asho, Robert Hoadly, D.D., an English divine was born about 1751, and was educated at Pembroke College, Oxford. In 1775 he was presented to the perpetual curacy of Crewkerne-cum-Misterton, Somerset, which he held till his death, May 3, 1826. He published, for the benefit of an ingenious pupil, some Poetical Translations from Various Authors, by Master John Browne, of Crewkerne, a Boy of Twelve Years (1777; 4to); —also A Letter to the Rev. John Milner, D.D., F.S.A., Author of the Civil and Ecclesiastical History of Winchester; Occasioned by his False and Libellous Aspersions on the Memory and Writings of Dr. Benjamin Hoadly, formerly Bishop of Winchester. See the (Lond.) Annual Register, 1826, p. 249.

Asher (the city of Manassah). Lieut. Conder (Test Work, ii, 334) and Tristram (Bible Places, p. 196) identify this with Asirah or Aserah, which is laid down on the Ordnance Map under the name Tazeer, one and three fourth miles north-east of Tubas (Thebez), as a village in a valley (395 feet above the sea), with ancient cisterns, tombs, milestones, and wine-presses adjacent; being the same place indicated by Yau de Velde (Memoir, p. 289) and Porter (Handbok, p. 345).

Asher, WRIGHT, a Presbyterian minister, was a member of the Presbytery of Buffalo, and a missionary among the Seneca Indians for more than forty years, being very successful in his labors. He died at Cattaraugus, N. Y., April 13, 1875. See Presbyterian, May 1, 1875.

Asher Manuscript. This Hebrew codex is called after its author, Rabbi Aaron ben-Mose ben-Asher, who flourished about A.D. 900 at Tiberias. Asher was the most accomplished scholar and representative of the Tiberian system of vocalization and accentuation, and his model codex of the Bible (םינש תב תב), furnished with the points and according to the Western school, became the standard text of our present Hebrew Bibles. Of this codex Moses Maimonides (q.v.), who lived in the 12th century, writes thus: "The copy which we have followed is the famous codex of Egypt which contains the twenty-four books, and which has been at Jerusalem for many years, in order that other codices might be corrected by its text; and all followed it because ben-Asher had minutely revised it for many years and corrected it many times" (Yad ha- Chazakah, Seph. Theres, viii, 4). This codex, which for centuries had not been seen, is said to be still preserved at Aleppo. See Strack, Prolegomena Critica, p. 44 sq.; Bar and Strack, Dikduke ha-Tamim, p. 14 sq. (B. P.)

Ashkelon. The present site, called Ashulan, is thus described by Porter (Handbook for Syria, p. 276; comp. Conder, Tent Work, ii, 164 sq.): "The ruins of this ancient city occupy a splendid site facing the Mediterranean. Along the shore runs a line of cliffs nearly a mile in length, and varying from fifty to eighty feet in height. The ends of the cliffs are connected by a ridge of rock which sweeps round inland in the form of a semicircle. Within the space thus enclosed stood Ashkelon, and along the top of the ridge ran its walls. The ground sinks gradually for some two hundred or three hundred yards towards the centre, and then rises again as gradually into a broad mound, calcining at the top. The mound is triangular, and one wonders what mighty agency has been employed in their destruction. Huge masses of solid masonry, ten, fifteen, twenty feet in diameter, are thrown from their places and lie on the sides and at the base of the rocky bank. The cement that binds the stones together seems as firm as the stones themselves; and the old battlements, instead of having crumbled to pieces as most buildings do, rest in immense disjuncted fragments, which, had we power enough to move them, we might almost arrange in their places again. On the eastern side of the semicircle, at its apex, was the principal gate; and here is still the most convenient entrance. The path winds up through heaps of stones and rubbish, among which are great numbers of marble and granite columns; on the left are the shattered walls of a large tower, still of considerable height, and affording from the top the best general view of the ruins. Climbing up the broken battlements, we have Ashkelon spread out before us—no! not Ashkelon, only the place where it once stood. The northern and larger section of the site is now covered with gardens, divided by rough stone fences, and filled with vines, pomegranates, figs, and apricots, in addition to innumerable beds of olives and melons. Scarcely a fragment of a ruin can be seen from this spot except the broken wall. As I sat here one morning I counted five yokes of oxen plunging, two drawing water for irrigation, and twenty-eight men and women engaged in agricultural work! Such is one section of Ashkelon. The remaining portion is even more terribly desolate. The white sand has drifted over its southern wall, almost covering its highest fragments, and now lies in deep wreaths upon the ground within. The scene presents such an aspect of utter desolation that it is painful to look upon it—old foundations of houses, palaces perhaps, and the little vines that men still living had planted over them being alike swallowed up by sand. And the sand is fast advancing; so that probably in a century it will have passed the very site of Ashkelon will have disappeared. How true are the words of Zephaniah spoken twenty-five centuries ago. 'Ashkelon shall be desolate for ever (5, 9); and the woman Ashkelon too, 'Ashkelon shall not be inhabited' (5, 10)." "A wall is built with stones, and an garden is made by the men of judgement that cover the site still shows us something of the former magnificence of the city. Proceeding from the gate towards the top of the central mound, now crowned with a monstrous wely, we observe traces of a street once lined with columns. At about two hundred yards we have on the left a low area partially excavated, round which are from twenty to thirty large granite shafts and several smaller ones of marble, some of them nearly covered with soil and stones. Not a solitary column stands upright, and not a building can be traced even in outline, though a few stones of a wall are here and there seen in their places. Deep wells are frequently met with, with curbstones of marble or granite; columns, mostly of granite, exist in vast numbers—stones of them may be seen projecting from the ruinous wall along the cliff over the sea, and some lie half buried in the sands below. Hewn stones are not so plentiful as one would expect. But this is explained by the fact that Ashkelon formed the chief quarry from which the materials were taken to build the ramparts and adorn the mosques of Acre. The houses and walls of Yafa have also made large draughts on this place. And poor Lady Hester Stanhope, strangely enough, contributed to the wealth of ruin. Having heard or dreamt of some vast treasure buried beneath the old city, she got a firman from the sultan, assembled a band of workmen, and made extensive excavations; but the only treasure discovered was a portion of a theatre. Thus a variety of agencies have combined to render Ashkelon 'a desolation.' There is a little village beside it, but not a human habitation within its walls."
last was called by the Romans caesarea, whence the French ashkelon and our asherat are derived."

For further details, see the Zeitschr. d. Paläst.-Verins, 1879, p. 164 sq., where a plan is given, of which the one here exhibited is a reduction.

Ashkenazi is a name common to many Jewish writers, of whom we mention the following:
1. BIZALEL BEN-ABRAM, rabbi in Egypt, is the author of glosses and novellae on the Talmud, known in Talmudic literature under the title of בְּזֵלָא (Lemberg, 1861-71, 4 vols.). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 60 sq.
2. ELIEZER BEN-ELIA ROFFE lived in Egypt till 1561, when he went to Famagusta, in Cyprus. In 1576 he stood at the head of the Jewish congregation at Cremona, where he completed his הַזְּכָה, or commentary on Esther (Cremona, 1576). In 1580 he completed at Gnesen his commentary on the historical parts of the Pentateuch, entitled שְׁכִּינַת הַזְּכָה (Venice, 1588). About this time he was rabbi at Posen. He died at Cracow in 1586. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 62; De Rossi, Dizionario storico (Ger., transl.), p. 48; Perles, in Frankel’s Monatschrift, 1864, p. 371 sq.
3. ZEHI BEN-JACOB, of Woina, a famous Talmudist, went to Buda in 1666, where he remained till 1678. He then went to Adrianople, Sarajevo in Bosnia, Lemberg, Amsterdam, Altona, Hamburg, etc. He is also called Chabam Zebi. He is the author of a great many "decisions" touching the most varied topics. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 64; Frankel, Hirsch ben-Jacob Ashkenazi: eine Biographie, reprinted in Literaturblatt des Orients, 1846, No. 47. (S. P.)

Plan of the Remains of Ashkelon.

The following additional particulars are from Budeker’s Palestine, p. 316 sq.:

"On the hill, in the Wely Mohammad, which is shaded by sycamores (the sycamore fig. which flourishes here), are seen the still tolerably preserved towers which defended the principal gate, that of Jerusalem; but the remains are deeply buried in the sand. The outlet to the road is closed by a thorn hedge. The north side of the rampart is not easily visited, as they are concealed by luxuriant orchards, both outside and inside the walls. Among the orchards are found remains of Christian churches, and other relics of uncertain date. The orchards, enclosed by prickly-cactus hedges and thorn-bushes, belong to the people of Jora, a village of three hundred inhabitants, situated to the east of the ancient Ashkelon. Sycamores abound, and vines, olives, many fruit-trees, and an excellent kind of onion thrive in this favored district. This died at Cracow in 1586. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 62; De’ Rossi, Dizionario storico (Ger., transl.), p. 48; Perles, in Frankel’s Monatschrift, 1864, p. 371 sq.

3. ZEHI BEN-JACOB, of Woina, a famous Talmudist, went to Buda in 1666, where he remained till 1678. He then went to Adrianople, Sarajevo in Bosnia, Lemberg, Amsterdam, Altona, Hamburg, etc. He is also called Chabam Zebi (חַבְּאוֹ מֶזְּבַי). He is the author of a great many “decisions” touching the most varied topics. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 64; Frankel, Hirsch ben-Jacob Ashkenazi: eine Biographie, reprinted in Literaturblatt des Orients, 1846, No. 47. (S. P.)

ston to use in building, as distinguished from that which is unhewn, or rough as it comes from the quarry. It is called by different names at the present day, according to the way in which it is worked, and is used for the facings of walls. "Cleave hewn" or finely worked ashlar is frequently specified in ancient contracts for building, in contradistinction to that which is roughly worked.

Ashley, George Herod, a Congregational minister, was born at Ashbourn, Derbyshire, England, Sept. 19, 1844. He graduated from Olivet College in 1872, remaining there as tutor until 1873. From 1873 to 1877 he was professor of Greek and Hebrew in Drury College, Missouri, being the first professor of that college. He was ordained as an evangelist at Carthage, Mo., Dec. 28, 1874, and remained as such until his death, which occurred at Springfield, Mo., July 20, 1877.

Ashley, Jonathan, a Congregational minister, was a native of Westfield, Mass. He graduated from Yale College in 1720, and was ordained pastor of the Church at Deerfield, Mass., in 1738. He died in 1789, aged sixty-seven years. He possessed a vigorous mind, and was an earnest, pungent preacher. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 207.

Ashley, William, a Baptist minister, was born at Hillsborough, N.C., in 1798. In early life he removed with his parents to Claiborne County, Tenn. While pursuing his studies at Anderson Seminary, he enlisted, in November, 1814, in a company of volunteers to serve in the war against Great Britain, and was in service at Mobile when the battle of New Orleans was fought. His conversion, in connection with that of his brother, occurred in the autumn of 1815, and he united with a Free Will Baptist Church. In 1817, having decided to give himself to the work of the ministry, he was an itinerant preacher in several of the Southern and Southwestern States. Coming east, he spent a winter in St. Catherine's, Canada, and in 1820 and 1821 was engaged in abundant and successful evangelistic labors in the Eastern States and Nova Scotia. In the town of Liverpol it is said that an extensive revival broke out, and such was the general interest that business was for the time partially suspended, and great numbers were converted. He was settled in several places for brief periods as a Free Will Baptist minister. Later in life he united with the Calvinistic Baptists, and was pastor of several churches under that denomination. He died in South Gardiner, Mass., June 6, 1860. See Watchman and Reflector, July 19, 1860. (J. C. S.)

Ashley, William H., a Congregational minister, was born in 1713, and graduated at Yale College in the class of 1730. He was ordained in 1738, and became pastor of the Church in Deerfield, Mass. He died in 1780. He is said to have possessed a strong and discerning mind and a lively imagination, and was a pungent and energetic preacher. He published a few discourses, among which was a sermon at the ordination of John Norton, Deerfield, in 1741. See Allen, Amer. Biog., s. v. (J. C. S.)

Ashman, William, an early Methodist preacher, was born at Conford, Somersetshire, England, in 1754. He was converted as a result of Wesley's visit to the parish acting as an itinerant; he was about thirty of thirty to thirty he was a class-leader and steward; a local preacher at thirty-one; and, at the age of thirty-four, he left a lucrative business to preach, at Wesley's request, in the east of Cornwall. He desisted from the work in 1798, and thereafter was a class-leader in his native place. He died at Halcomb, Somersetshire, Feb. 9, 1818. See Jackson, Early Meth. Preachers, v, 296; West. Meth. Mag., 1818; Minutes of the British Conference, 1818.

Ashnah. Tristan identifies one of the cities thus named (Josh. xv, 36) with the modern Asotia (Bible Places, p. 48), which is laid down on the Ordnance Map under the name of Aslin, one mile north-east of Surah (Zorrah), as a ruined village with a cistern adjoining. The other Ashnah (Josh. xx, 48) he regards (Bible Places, p. 48) as the present Asch, six miles south-east of Beir-Jebir; but this is certainly the Jedna of Eusebius and Jerome, who both speak of Asma as a separate place. Lieut. Conder merely gives (Tent Work, ii, 334) Ghasheina as the site of one of the two towns called Ashnah, without indicating its locality or distinguishing which.

Ashor is the general name of the four months which, among the Mohammedans, as well as among the ancient Arabs, was regarded as the rainy season. These months were Moharram, Rejeb, Dulkadha, and Hal-hagga. No war could be lawfully begun or carried on in these months; and most of the Arabian tribes observed this so punctually that even the murderer of a father or brother was not to be punished or any violeace committed before that time. These months are sacred in the Koran, and their careful observance enforced, except in the case of war against infidels.

Ashon, Charles, D.D., an English clergyman, was born in 1665. He became chaplain to Patrick, bishop of Ely, who presented him to the living of Retenden, in Essex. He was also, for a time, chaplain of Chelsea Hospital. He died in 1701, and his obituary notice is in the Collegium, Cambridge. He died in March, 1752, leaving an edition of Justin Martyr, published after his death by Mr. Kellet. See New General Biographical Dictionary, s. v.

Ashon, James, a Bible Christian minister, was born at Bedfor, in the County of Devon, England, Jan. 20, 1819. His conversion took place at a prayer-meeting in 1836. He commenced his itinerant ministry on the Falmouth Circuit in 1841. After laboring sixteen years in England, in 1857, at the earnest request of the Missionary Committee, he left the home work for the distant field of Australia. He and his family landed at Adelaide, Feb. 15, 1858. After filling, acceptably, several appointments in the early part of the year 1874, he died on Dec. 14 of the same year. See Minutes of Conferences, 1875.

Ashton, Robert, an English Congregational minister, was born at Hull, March 1, 1798. He joined the Church in early life; entered Hoxton College in 1819; settled at Dedham in 1824, at Warmminster in 1832, and at Putney in 1834. Mr. Ashton relinquished the regular pastorate in 1846, and became secretary of a Society, probably of the Wycliffe Society, of the Christian Instruction Society, of the Surrey Mission, and of the Christian Witness Fund. In 1847 he became joint secretary of the Congregational Board of London Ministers; in 1849 editor of the Congregational Year-book; and in 1852 joint secretary of the Congregational Union of England and Wales. He died July 21, 1878. Mr. Ashton published, by subscription, an edition of the works of John Robinson, with a memoir and annotations, in 3 vols. 1851. See London, Cong. Year-book, 1875, p. 297.

Ashton, Thomas (1), an English clergyman, was born at Tenedly, Lancashire, in 1631, and was educated at Oxford, where he took his degree of A.B. Feb. 7, 1650. He was the son of two of the leaders of the holy orders. He was appointed to preach at St. Mary's July 25, 1654; and his sermon proved so very inadecent that he came very near being expelled. He was finally obliged to quit his fellowship. In 1656 he was intrusted with a commission from the protector to be chaplain to the English forces in the island of Jersey. He died soon after. His publications were not very important.

Ashton, Thomas (2), an English divine, was born in 1716, and educated at Eton and at King's College, Cambridge. He was tutor to the earl of Plymouth in 1740. Soon after this date he was presented to the rectory of Aldingham, in Lancashire, which he resigned early in 1749. On May 3 of that year he was presented to the rectory of Sturminster-Marshall, in Dorsetshire. In 1761 he was presented to the living of St. Botolph, Bishopsgate; and in May, 1762, was elected preacher at Lincoln's Inn, which he resigned in 1764. He died March 1, 1775. He published a number of single Sermons (1745-70);—some Letters and Pamphlets on the question of elective aliens into the vacant places in Eton College, 1752; and Chalmers, "Desc. Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Allibone, "Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v."

Ashton, Thomas (3), an English Wesleyan minister, was born in London in 1768. He feared God from his youth, and received his first ticket of membership from Wesley. He entered the ministry in 1801; continued therein until 1827, when he settled in Bath, where he died, May 18, 1804. See Minutes of British Conferences, 1854.

Ashtur is the tenth day or tenth night of Moharram, which is the first month of the Arabic year. The word also signifies ten days or ten nights. In ch. lxxix of the Koran, God is introduced swearing by the ten nights. The Mohammedans generally fast on this day for three reasons: (1) because the ancient Arabsians observed it as a fast-day before the time of Mohammed; (2) because on this day Noah left the ark; and (3) because on this day God pardoned the Ninavites.

Ashwell, Thomas, an English Congregational minister, was born at Faversham, Kent, about 1804. In due time he joined the Wesleyans, and began his first ministerial labors among them. Ultimately he joined the Independents, and did his first ministerial work for them at High Wymose, Bromsgrove next enjoyed the benefit of his labors, from 1803 to 1847. His health failing, he resigned his charge, returned to his native county, and, when sufficiently restored, accepted a light charge at Pembury. In 1833 he took the oversight of the Church at Redditch, which he held until his death, Aug. 23, 1860. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1861, p. 198.

Ashworth, Caleb, an English Dissenting minister, was born in Northamptonshire in 1709. He served an apprenticeship to a carpenter; but having a taste for learning he was sent to the academy kept by Dr. Doddridge. He was afterwards ordained minister of a Dissenting congregation at Daventry; and succeeded Dr. Doddridge as president of the college of which he held with eminent success for twenty-three years. He died at Daventry in 1774. He published three Funeral Sermons on the deaths of Dr. Watts, Mr. Floyd, and Mr. Clark:—also a Collection of Tunes and Anthems:—a Hebrew Grammar:—and an Introduction to Plane Trigonometry.

Ashworth, Richard, an English Baptist minister, was born at Cloughfold, in the Forest of Rosendale, Lancashire, Oct. 4, 1799. He lost both his parents when a child, and, until his twenty-fourth year, he had no fixed dwelling-place. In 1823 he united with the Baptist Church in Goodshaw; and in 1827 was invited by the Church to engage in the work of the ministry. In the fall of 1829 a Church was formed at Lumb; and March 24, 1831, a new meeting-house, capable of seating six or seven hundred persons, was dedicated, the lot of ground on which it was built being given by a benevolent gentleman who was a member of the Established Church. In this place he labored until death removed him, Aug. 19, 1837. See English Baptist Magazine, 1837, p. 207, 208. (J. C. S.)

Asia, Council of (Concilium Asiaticum). A council was held A.D. 245 in Asia Minor, against Nestus; but at what place is uncertain.

Asiatic. Nymphs thus named attended Diana.

Asiah, according to Mohammedan legend, was the daughter of Mozeahem and wife of Pharaoh, who lived at the time of Moses. As she was willing to give ear to Moses, Pharaoh tortured her; but the angels mitigated the hardness of his heart, and took the child up into Paradise. The Mohammedans worship her as divine, as she was one of the four women who reached perfection.

Asinaria, a term of reproach against the early Christians. That the Jews worshipped an ass, or the head of an ass, was a current belief in many parts of the Gentile world. Tacitus says that there was a consecrated image of an ass in the Temple; the reason for this special honor being that a herd of wild asses had been the means of guiding the Jews, when they were in the desert, to springs of water. Plutarch tells virtually the same story. Diodorus Siculus says that Antiochus Epiphanes found in the Temple a stone image representing a man sitting upon an ass; but, on the other hand, Josephus adduces the fact that no such image had been found in the Temple by any conqueror as an argument for the groundlessness of the calumny. The same belief appears to have prevailed in reference to the early Christians. It is mentioned by both Tertullian and Minucius Felix; but, though referred to in later times, appears to have died out in the course of the 3d century. A somewhat similar reproach made by the Jews against the Christians in Africa is probably to be connected with the mediæval "Festival of the Ass" rather than with the earlier calumny.

The origin of the reproach has been a subject of various speculations: (1) It has been considered to have arisen somewhere in the Gentile world, and to have been applied to the Jews before the Christian era. (2) It has been considered to have arisen in Egypt, and on this hypothesis two explanations have been given. Tanaquil Faber thought that it was a corruption from the name of Onias, who built a Jewish temple at Heliopolis; and Baron Alexander von Humboldt thought that the Egyptians wholly perverted the expression "Pi iao (= mouth of God)" into "Pleo," which, in an Egyptian vocabulary edited by Kircher, signifies "ass." (3) It has been viewed as a calumny of the Jews against the Christians, which was reflected back upon the Jews themselves. (4) It has been regarded as having originated from the use of the ass as a symbol by some Gnostic sects. That the ass was thus used is clear from the statement of Epiphanius. Between these various hypotheses the question must be left undecided.

A slight additional interest has been given to it by the discovery at Rome, in 1866, on a wall under the western terrace of the Pantheon, of a graffito which forcibly recalls the story mentioned by Tertullian. The graffito in question represents a caricature, evidently directed against some Christian convert of the 2d century. Upon a cross is a figure with a human body wearing an inchus, but with an ass's head. On one side is another figure raising up his head, possibly in the attitude of prayer. Underneath is written "Alexame- nos is worshipping God." The form of the letters points to the graffito having been written towards the end of the 2d century, about the very time at which Tertullian wrote. This graffito is now preserved in the Library of the Collegio Romano in Rome. See Ass.-worp.

Ask, in Norse mythology, is the first created man. The three mighty Ass-Odin, Wile, and We—once assembled together on the sea-shore. There they found two trees, an ash and an alder. Odin gave them breath and life; Wile (or Hônir), spirit and power of motion; We (or Lodar), blood, speech, beauty, and the sense of hearing. The godforefathers of the Asas called the ash tree Ask (Ash), and the other Elbla (Alder). Thus originated the first man and the first woman.

Askew, Josiah F., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Burke County, N. C., in 1814. He experienced religion at the age of 239 fourteen; received license to preach while a student at Randolph Macon College, Va., in 1887; and in 1840 entered the Virginia Conference. During the few years that his health permitted, his services were highly acceptable and exemplary. A pulmonary disability obliged him to locate, and he retired to Georgia. He died Nov. 7, 1848. Mr. Askew was characterized by whole-heartedness, piety, zeal. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1843, p. 202.

Askin, George, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was a native of Ireland. His early life is wrapped in obscurity. Arriving in America he, in 1801, entered the Virginia Conference, and in it served the Church with more than usual zeal and acceptability until his death, Feb. 28, 1816. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1816, p. 277.

Askin, Thomas, a Christian martyr, was burned at Newbury, with Julius Palmer, July 25, 1556, because he would persist in reading the Scriptures and saying his prayers, contrary to the papist orders. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, viii, 201.

Askins, William H., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Virginia July 8, 1803. He experienced religion in 1820; and in 1823 joined the Kentucky Conference. In 1830 he was transferred to the Illinois Conference, and labored faithfully until poor health compelled him to cease. He died at his home on the Scioto, Ohio, Oct. 6 in that year. Mr. Askins was a popular and successful preacher. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1833, p. 214.

Aslin, John, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Gedling, near Nottingham, in 1785. He entered the ministry in 1804, and labored with fidelity, acceptance, and usefulness for forty-two years. He retired from the active work in 1846; and died suddenly, May 27, 1849. Aslin was a faithful minister and diligent student, especially of the Scriptures. See Minutes of British Conference, 1849.

Asman, in Persian mythology, was an Ized, the director of the twenty-seventh day of each sun-month: heaven, also, and the genius of the same, carry this name.

Asmouq (or Asemq), the name of a demon which, according to the Magi, or Zoroastrians, is one of the principal emisaries of Ahriman, who is their prince, and author of all the evil in the world. Asmouq's function is to sow discord in families, lawsuits among neighbors, and wars between princes.

Asnekoth, Saadia ben-Levi, a Jewish writer of Morocco, who lived in the 17th century, is the author of an Arabic version of Genesis, Psalms, and Daniel, which is preserved in the British Museum at London, MS. No. 5556. That he is the author of this version may be seen from the superscription given at the beginning of the book of Genesis:

As this version is of recent date, its value cannot be great. See Döderlein, in Eichhorn's Repertorium für bibl. und morgenländische Literatur, ii, 153 sq.; Wolf, Bibl. Hebr. iii, 863; De Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 49; Bauer, Critica Sacra, p. 324. (F. E.)

Asor, in Hindu mythology, are evil spirits. As their teacher and leader they have Shukra, the planet Venus; and exemplary. A pulmonary difficulty obliged him to locate, and he retired to Georgia. He died Nov. 7, 1848. Mr. Askew was characterized by whole-heartedness, piety, zeal. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1843, p. 202.

Ascorah, in Chaldaean philosophy, is the first uncreated substance which arose out of chaos; which, with Kisra, likewise an uncreated substance, produced the three fundamental principles—Anos, Illinos, and Aos.

Asovahistos (the pure better one), in Zendic mythology, is the second of the heavenly Amshaspands.

Asp, Matthias, a Swedish theologian and philologist, was born May 14, 1696. He studied at Lund and at Upsal, and was made master of arts in 1716. After having travelled in Holland, England, France, and Germany, he obtained, on his return to Upsal, the chair of Greek and Hebrew, which he exchanged in 1737 for that of theology. He died July 8, 1763. He wrote, Deputatio deb Homero (Upsal, 1714);—De Ordine et Praecepta Facultatem Munita (1715);—De Templo Cathedrall Linncensi (1752);—De Usu Archeologian Romanam in Sacris (1785);—De Suderkopia (1786). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Asplekki, in Slavonic mythology, was one of the household goddesses who inhabited the dwellings of men. It was said that they dwelt in dark corners.

Asperges, Thuc, is a short service introductory to the mass in the Roman Catholic Church, consisting of portions of the fifty-first Psalm, certain verses and responses, and a collect, during which the congregation is sprinkled with holy water by the priest-officiant.

Aspersorium. The stone stoup or holy-water basin commonly found at the right-hand entrance of ancient churches, from which the faithful, taking holy water on entering, blessed themselves, making the sign of the cross. Many of these stoupes, however, were destroyed, both by the Reformers and the Puritans. In the accounts of All-Souls' College, Oxford, in 1548, there is a charge pro lapidibus ad aspersorium in introtu ecclesie, the remains of which may still be seen. 2. The term is sometimes applied in Church inventories to the aspergill, or holy-water brush. See ASPERGILLUM.

Aspertino, Guido, a Bolognese painter, was born about 1460; studied under Ercole di Ferrara, and became a distinguished historical painter. His chief work was The Crucifixion, in the cathedral at Bologna, in 1491. He died in the prime of life.

Aspertus (or Ansbertus), a German ecclesiastical writer, was born about 850. It is an error that he was successively secretary, andguard of the seals of King Arnulf. In 891 he became bishop of Ratisbon. He is regarded as the author of a part of the Annales Fuldenenses. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aspetti, Tiziano, an Italian nobleman and sculptor, was born at Padua in 1565, and was the nephew of Titian. He studied under Jacopo Sansovino at Venice, and did excellent work there in marble and in bronze. There are a number of his works in the Church of Sant' Antonio at Padua.

Asphalonus, a presbyter of Antioch and a zealous adherent of the heretic Aetius, was deputed by Eudoxius, after he had taken forcible possession of the see of Antioch, A.D. 358, to proceed to Constantinople and obtain the recognition of his position in the see. Eudoxius had obtained his object, and was just about to start for Antioch with the emperor's letters of authorization when the deputies from the Council of Anzala arrived, and by their representations induced the weak Constantius to declare himself against the Anomoeans and recall his letters. A document of a very different kind was substituted, denouncing the intrusion of Eudoxius, speaking of him in the most violent terms, and forbidding him to appear in the Christian assemblies (Sozomen, Hist. Eccles. 1314).
Asplund, John, an early Baptist minister, was born in Sweden not far from the year 1750. About 1775 he visited England for the purpose of obtaining employment, and for a short time was a clerk in a merchant house. Subsequently he entered the British navy, and came in an English man-of-war to America. While his ship was on the coast of New Jersey, he landed in North Carolina. In 1782 he united with Ballard’s Bridge Church, Chowan Co., N. C. Subsequently he removed to Southampton, Va., where he was set apart to the work of the ministry. He returned to Europe in 1785, and visited England, Denmark, Finland, Lapland, and Germany. Returning to America, he spent much time travelling through the states for the purpose of collecting statistics concerning the Baptist denomination. The results of his labors he published in a small folio-volume in 1791. In the prosecution of his work, he travelled about seven thousand miles in about eighteen months, chiefly on foot, and gathered up a vast fund of information. In order to enlarge his Register and to make it as perfect as possible, he again set forth on his extended tours, travelling this time ten thousand miles, and forming the acquaintance of seven hundred Baptist ministers. He published the second edition of his Register in 1798. His was a quiet spirit, but having been brought up with a view to carrying on mercantile, I have been accustomed to keeping accounts; and I now prefer accounts of souls with their faces set Zonian to those which only respect money or trade.” His death occurred in Maryland, whither he had removed, and where he was drowned in 1807. See Lives of Virginia Baptists, p. 315; Vol. I. (J. L. S.)

Aspiril, Joseph, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born near Delaware City, Del., Nov. 12, 1817. He embraced religion in his fifteenth year; received license to preach in 1837, and in 1840 united with the Philadelphia Conference, in which he labored zealously until his death, May 28, 1876. Mr. Aspiril was an exemplary Christian, a dear friend of the Word of God, a devoted husband and father, and a pure and true friend. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1877, p. 32.

Asrael is an angel to whom the Mohammedans believe the souls of the dead are intrusted.

Ass is a name for the mysteries of the Koran, which, according to some of the Mohammedan doctors, are so profound that those who have obtained a knowledge of them are unable to explain them to others, either by word or pen.

Asw. We give the following additional particulars on this animal:

I. This is the rendering in the A. V. of several Hebrew and Greek words.

1. Ασσαρίων, from the redskin color; Sept. βοσκότος, βοσκεῖν, to feed in 1 Sam. xxvi, 20; Vulg. dominus; A. V. “ass,” “he-ass”) denotes the male domestic ass, though the word was no doubt used in a general sense to express any ass, whether male or female. The ass is frequently mentioned in the Bible; it was used (a) for carrying burdens (1 Sam. xxvii, 8; Gen. xxxii, 19; I Kings. xxiv, 3; 2 Sam. xvi, 2; 1 Chron. xxii, 17); (b) for riding (Gen. xxii, 3, etc.); (c) for ploughing (Deut. xxii, 10; Isa. xxxii, 20); (d) for gathering at the mill (Matt. xvii, 6; Luke xxii, 3); (e) for war baggage (2 Kings vii, 7, 10); (f) for breeding mules (Gen. xxxvi, 24; I Kings iv, 29; Esth. viii, 10, etc.).

Although the flesh of the wild ass was deemed a luxury among the Persians and Tartars, yet it does not appear that any of the nations of Canaan used the ass for food. The Mosaic law considered it unclean, as “not dividing the hoof and chewing the cud.” In extreme cases, however, as in the great famine of Samaresa, when “an ass’s head was sold for an eighth piece of silver” (2 Kings vi, 25), the flesh of the ass was eaten.

Many commentators on this passage, following the Sept., have understood a measure (a chomer of bread) by the Hebrew word. Dr. Harris says, "no kind of extremity could compel the Jews to eat any part of this animal for food," but it must be remembered that in cases of extreme need parents ate their own offspring (ver. 29; Ezek. v. 10). This argument, therefore, fails to the ground; nor is there sufficient reason for abandoning the common acceptation of these passages (1 Sam. xvi. 20; xxv. 19), and for understanding a measure and not the animal. For an example to illustrate 2 Kings loc. cit., comp. Plutarch, Artax., i, 1029, "an ass's head could hardly be bought for sixty drachmas." The Talmudists say the flesh of the ass causes avarice in those who eat it; but it cures the avaricious of the complaint (Levysohn, Zool. des Talm. § 105). The Jews were accused of worshipping the head of an ass. Josephus (Condr. Apion. ii. 7) very indignantly blames Apion for having the impudence to pretend that the Jews placed an ass's head of gold in their holy place, which the grammarians assented Antiochus Epiphanes discovered when he spoiled the Temple. Plutarch (Sympos. iv, 5) and Tacitus (Hist. v, 3, 4) seem to have believed in this slander. It would be out of place here to enter further into this question, as it has no scriptural bearing; but the reader may find much curious matter relating to this subject in Bochart (Hieroz. iii, 199 sq.). See ASS-Worship.

2. Αἴθων (ἁθών) of uncertain etymology; Sept. ἄιθος; ἄιθος ἄθλεις ἡμιονος; ἄιθος ἀθλεον τοις Vulg. astra (astra) ("she-ass"). There can be no doubt that this name represents the common domestic she-ass, nor do we think there are any grounds for believing that aithōn indicates some particular valuable breed which judges and great men only possessed, as Dr. Kitto (Phys. Hist. Pat. p. 383) and Dr. Harrius (Nat. Hist. of the Bible, art. "Ass") have supposed. Aithōn in Gen. xi. 16; xli. 23, is clearly contrasted with camōn. Balaam rode on a she-ass (aithōn). The asses of Kish which Saul sought were she-asses. The Shunammite (2 Kings iv. 22, 24) rode on one when she went to seek Elisha. They were she-asses which formed the especial care of one of David's officers (1 Chron. xxvii. 30). On the other hand, Abraham (Gen. xxii. 3, etc.), Achan (Josh. xv. 18), Abigail (1 Sam. xxx. 20), and the disobedient prophet (1 Kings xiii. 23) rode on a chamōn.

3. 'Ayir (אייר), from its heet; Sept. πωλος, πολος νιος, νος, βοις [in Isa. xxx. 24]; Vulg. pullus assina, pullus onager, jumentum, pullus asini; A. V. "foal," "ass colt," "young ass," "colt"); the name of a young ass, which occurs Gen. lix. 21; xxiii. 16; Judg. x. 11; xii. 14; Job xi, 12; Isa. xxx. 6, 24; Zech. ix. 9. In the passages of the books of Judges and Zechariah the 'ayir is spoken of as being old enough for riding upon; in Isa. xxx. 6 for carrying burdens, and in ver. 24 for tilling the ground. Perhaps the word 'ayir is intended to denote an ass rather older than the age we now understand by the term foal or colt; the derivation "to be spirited" or "impetuous" would then be peculiarly appropriate.

4. Pére (퍼레); Sept. ὄνος ἄγριος, ὄνος ἐν ἄγρῳ, ὄναγος, ὄνος ἰπτηος, ἀγρος ἐκτηος: Vulg. ferus homo: A. V. "wild man," in Gen. xvi. 12; elsewhere onager, "wild ass"); the name of a species of wild ass mentioned in Gen. xvi. 12; Job vi. 5; xi. 12; xxiv. 5; xxxii. 5; Psa. civ. 11; Isa. xxxii. 14; Jer. ii. 24; Hos. vii. 9. It is a "wild ass," in Job xxi. 23, 24; 33, 5; 39, 5; and its domesticated form is called the "asian ass" to distinguish it from the "african ass.

5. 'Arôd (אַרוֹד), perhaps from its flight; omitted by the Sept. and Vulg., which versions probably supposed 'arôd and pére to be synonymous; A. V. "wild ass"). The Hebrew word occurs only in Job xxxix. 5: "Who l复印 out the pére free, or who hath loosed the band of the 'arôd?" The Chaldee plural 'arodếsh (אַרוֹדֶש) occurs in Dan. v. 21; Nebuchadnezzar's "dwelling was with the wild asses." Bochart (Hieroz. ii. 218), Rosenm. (Sichel, in T. 7, loc. cit.), Lucas (Commer. in Job, loc. cit.), and Gesenius (Thesaur. s. v.) suppose 'arôd and pére to be identical in meaning. The last-named writer says that pére is the Hebrew and 'arôd the Ara- man; but it is not improbable that the two names stand for different animals.

II. The subject which relates to the different animals known as wild asses has recently received very valuable elucidation from Mr. Blythe, in a paper contributed to the Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal, 1859, a reprint of which appears in the October number of The Annals and Magazine of Natural History, 1860. This writer enumerates seven species of the division Asinus. In all probability the species known to the ancient Jews are Asinus hemippus, which inhabits the deserts of Syria, Mesopotamia, and the northern parts of Arabia; and

Asinus vulgarius of North-east Africa, the true onager or aboriginal wild ass, whence the domesticated breed is sprung; probably, also, the Asinus onager, the koulan, or ghorkour, which is found in Western Asia from 45° north latitude southward to Persia, Beluchistan, and Western India, was not unknown to the ancient Hebrews, though in all probability they confounded these Ghorkour, or Koulan (Asinus onager). Specimen in British Museum.

The Asinus hemippus, or jiggat, which was separated from Asinus hemippus (with which it had long been confounded) by Is. Saint-Hilaire could hardly have been known to the Jews, as this animal, which is, perhaps, only a variety of Asinus onager, inhabits Thibet, Mongolia, and Southern Siberia—countries with which the Jews were not familiar. We may therefore safely conclude that the Aithōn and Pére of the sacred writings stand for the different species now discriminated under the names of Asinus hemippus, the Assyrian wild ass; Asinus vulgarius, the true onager; and ASS-WORSHIP

Perhaps, Asinus ounger, the koulan, or ghokhurn, of Persia and Western India. See Wild Ass.

Asa-worship was attributed to the Jews by the Gentiles, according to Josephus and Tacitus, and afterwards to the Christians, owing to the mention of the animal in the history of Balaam, the victory of Samson, the stable of Bethlehem, the flight into Egypt, and the entry on Palm-Sunday into Jerusalem. At Beauvais, on Jan. 14, the Feast of the Ass was observed yearly. An ass bearing the image of the Madonna was led in procession to St. Stephen's Church, where an absurd prose was sung, with the refrain "Hez, Sire Asse," during the mass. At Chalons-sur-Marne the bishop of fools rode mounted on an ass. At Autun the principal canons held the four corners of the golden housings of the ass; and at Cambray a picture of the ass was placed behind the high-altar from Palm-Sunday to Maundy-Thursday. Naugorgue says that on Palm-Sunday a wooden ass with a rider was drawn upon wheels through the streets to the church door, where the priest blessed the palms as talismans against storm and lightning, and then laid down before it and was beaten with a rod by another priest. Two "hublores" then alighted to the entry of our Lord into Jerusalem, and the ass, anointed with branches, was drawn into the church. In some places the ass was hired out and led through a town, while boys collected bread, eggs, and money, half of which was given to the hirer. See Asiarch; Onolatry.

Asaf, an idol of the Korishite Arabians. Every tribe and every family, as well as that of Koreish, had a particular idol, which they worshipped.

Asshidon, William, an English clergyman, was born at Middleton, Lancashire, in 1641, and educated at Brasenose College, Oxford. He took orders, and published at Oxford, in 1670, A Treatise against Toleration, which reached a second edition in the following year. Four years after he appeared his work Of Scandal and of Persecution, which obtained for him the living of Beckham, in Kent, in 1675. At this period he was a warm advocate of the divine right of kings, and published the Royal Apology, in favor of king James II, in which he upheld the scriptural doctrine of obedience to the kingly authority (Lond. 1685). But in the course of three years his opinions changed, and he put himself forward as the champion of the prince of Orange and his wife, in a work called An Apology for the Reigning Sovereign (ibid. 1688). He also wrote many works against the Dissenters, especially the Anabaptists and Socinians. In 1701 he published the first part of his Explication of the Church Catechism; and in the year following, Directions for Prayer, as well as A Project for Establishing in each Diocese a Fund for the Relief of Poor Clergymen. In 1703 he published his Defence of the Immortality of the Soul; and in 1706 his chief devotional work

He also gave to the public, in that year, A Treatise on the Possibility of Apparitions; and subsequently, A Collection of Prayers for all Occasions, taken from Taylor, Cozin, Ken, and others; and a Defence of the Clergy, in reply to a work entitled The Rights of the Christian Church. The above are but a few of the many writings which he left. He died at Beckenham, Sept. 17, 1711. See Wood, Athen. Oxoniens.

ASSIGNIES. JEAN D', a French monk of Citeaux, and a Brabantine theologian, was born in 1592. He became subprior of the Monastery of Cambon; then, in 1618, priest of the Monastery of Nizelle, in Brabant. He died in 1642. He wrote, Vies des Personnes Illustres en Sar- tasie de l'Ordre de Citeaux (Douay and Mons, 1598, 1606): —Allomettes Vies pour embrazer l'âme à la Haine du Péché et à l'Amour de la Vertu, par la Consideration de la Passion de Jésus-Christ (Douay, 1629). He also wrote several other works. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

ASCARI (אֶסָרָי), a city of Maanasseh, mentioned in the Talmud (Josephitha Miv'avoah, iv), and, according to Rabbi Schwarz (Palest, p. 160), identical with Azirah, a village five miles (one hour) north of Nabhlis (Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 291), meaning, probably, the Asirat el-Habab laid down on the Ordnance Map two miles north of Nabhlis.

ASSON. See SUNNA.

ASSOROS, in Greco-Babylonian mythology, is the brother and husband of Iskare, and father of the first divine triad—Anos, Illinos, and Aos. His analogue was the Assur of the Assyrians, with his wife Sera.

ASSOS. The present condition of this town, although in ruins, fully illustrates the language of Luke in speaking of Paul's journey, being about half-way between Troas (q. v.) and Mitylene (q. v.), and therefore a convenient resting-place in the track of the coasting-trade (see Lewin, Life and Letters of St. Paul, ii, 88). (See also illustration on following page.)

field makes the date A.D. 44-45, and Schmidt and Merx A.D. 50-64. Schürer rather prefers the date as given by Ewald or Wieseler.

III. Author of the Work.—From the attitude taken by the author towards the leading Jewish sects in ch. vii and x, some regarded him as a Pharisee, others as a Sadducee; but since he does not appear to coincide fully with either of these parties, Schürer agrees with Wieseler that the author belonged to the so-called Zealots.

IV. Place of Composition.—It is hardly doubtful that the book was written in Palestine; and, with this supposition, it was originally written in Hebrew or Aramaean. With certainty it cannot be asserted, although there is no doubt that the present Latin translation was made from the Greek.

For the literature, see Schürer, Handbuch der neutestamentlichen Zeitgeschichte, p. 586 sq. (B. P.)

ASSUNTO, ONORIO DELL', an Italian monk of the Order of Carmelites, and theologian, was born in 1639. When he entered this order, he gave up the name Giallo Carlo Guidetti, and took the name of Onorio, and theologian and disputant in several Italian cities. He was admitted to all the degrees of the hierarchy, and became provost-general of the order. He died at Rome Jan 15, 1716. He wrote, among other works, L'Anima Divotta in Spirito e Virtù verso il Bambino Iddio (Milan, 1677, 1680); — La Vita Ispirata del Dottore dell' Assunzione della Vergine (Venice, 1678) ; — Breve Istruzione per Ispedire bene il Tempo della Presente Vita (Venice, 1685); — La Prudenza dello Spirito che conduce alla Vita Eterna (Rome, 1707). ASSURANCE, Tit., is a name for a test fixed by the Parliament in 1680, when it repealed the Act of Supremacy in Scotland and established Free-bylery, by which all the clergy would be elected to fill the vacancy that should happen in Parliament were obliged to declare before God that they believed William and Mary to be king and queen of judæ as well as de facto, and engaged to defend their title as such. The same, together with the Oath of Allegiance, was required to be signed by all in any public trust or office, civil, military, or ecclesiastical.

ASSURIANS (or Assuritans) were a Christian sect which sprung up in the middle of the 4th century, being an offshoot of the African Donatists. They held that the Son is inferior to the Father, and the Holy Ghost to the Son. See DONATISTS.

ASSYRIA. The recent explorations in that country, especially those of Massa, Smith and Rassam, have been so intimately connected with those relating to Babylonia that some of them will be more appropriately considered under that head; but in many respects both countries can conveniently be considered together. Indeed, the two powers were nearly coextensive as to territory, the one merely being the sequel of the other. The separate history of the Assyrian empire is, in fact, but that of Nineveh, its capital, in the treatment of which, in connection with that of the several kings mentioned in Scripture, especially Pul, Tiglath-pileser, Shalmaneser, Sargon, and Sennacherib, details of special Biblical interest are given. We here gather up some additional particulars under general heads.

I. Origin.—The name Assyria itself primarily denoted the small territory immediately surrounding the primitive city, "the city of Assur" (thought to be the Ellasar of Genesis), which was built, like the other chief cities of the country, by Turanian tribes, in whose language the word signifies "to water marsh." It stood, according to the latest Assyriologists, on the right bank of the Tigris, midway between the Greater and the Lesser Zab, being represented by the modern Kalâh Shergât. It appears to have remained the capital city... long after the Assyrians had become the dominant power in Western Asia, but was finally supplanted by Chaldean power. The Ninevites offered a brave resistance, under Nino, the king of Nineveh (now Nebbi Yunus and Kuyunjik), and Dur-Sargina (now Khorsabad), some sixty miles farther north. See NINEVEH. The city of Babylon itself, however, was of earlier origin, and formed the centre of a province or monarchy at times more or less prominent, until it lost its independence on the foundation of its rival Nineveh. See BABYLON.

II. Assyrian Monarchy.—Under this head we present a historical abstract in the words of an acknowledged expert (Prof. Sayce, in the last ed. of the Encyclopædia Britannica, s. v. "Babylonia"), although we dissent from many of its synchronisms.

"We possess an almost continuous list of Assyrian kings. It is, however, a somewhat inexact list; the names are corrupt, and the dates are defective. The period of which we give the chief events of Assyrian history is that of the formation of Nineveh and the rise of the Assyrian empire. The first event of any great importance is the invasion of the Eastern provinces by Tiglath-pileser I, in the 11th century B.C. The date of this invasion is not certain, but it is about 800 B.C. that Assyria, under Tigrash-pileser, advanced into Mesopotamia and destroyed the Babylonian empire. The chief events of this period are the invasion of the city of Babylon, the destruction of the Babylonian kingdom, and the establishment of the Assyrian empire in the land of Babylonia. The Babylonian empire was destroyed by the Assyrians, and the Assyrians extended their dominions over the country of Babylonia, until they became the rulers of the entire region. See BABYLON.
ASSYRIA

106. Sennacherib is a typical representative of the great warriors and builders of the second Assyrian empire, and is thus placed in the front rank of the conquerors of the world. His invasion of Judah, the founder of which he was, was a campaign of Egyptian religious wars, of which he had to escape from the Babylonian king; but, however, before his towns had been ravaged, a heavy treaty was imposed on him, and his ailing and demented son was solemnly punished. At the commencement of this campaign, Sennacherib had reduced Tyre and Arpad; and, indeed, the commerce of that commercial centre caused a transfer of trade to Carcmebishi. Babylon had shaken off the yoke of Assyria at this time, but there was a second Babylon, who had escaped from his captivity at Nineveh, but was soon reduced to obedience again and placed under the government of his native town. However, the year after the Judean war, Babylon rebelled once more under the indomitable Merodoch-lu,Nahri, son of A-Ba-lu. The interregnum, however, which marks the last eight years of Sennacherib's rule, cannot be said to have centered to give trouble and settle the Assyrian yoke.

"Meanwhile, Sennacherib had been constructing canals and annexing the territory of the Turish, and building himself a palace at Nineveh on a grander scale than had ever been attempted before. His wars were interrupted by his husband's taxation of his subjects. Soon after he found himself to be confronted by the veteran army of Earslu, his father's youngest son, and his favorite son. Ears-lu's army, however, was driven out of Armenia; but in January, 660, he defeated them at Khantarbat and was proclaimed king. Soon afterwards he established his court at Babylon, where he governed in person during the whole of his reign. After the affairs of Chaldea, he turned his attention to the countries of the east, which were directly under his control; and, where Earslu had destroyed and its inhabitants removed to Assyria, an event which exercised a profound influence upon Assyrian history. A more complete amalgamation of the reigions was into the heart of Arabia to the kingdom of Huz and Buz, 560 miles distant from Nineveh, 280 miles of the march being through arid desert. The Assyrian army accomplished a feat never since exceeded. In the north, also, it penetrated equally far, subjugating the Cappadocians, receiving the submission of Tsin-pates the Cimmerian, and taking possession of the copper-mines on the most remote frontiers of Media. All this part of the country was now in the hands of Aryan setters, and each small town had its independent chief, like the chieftains of the eastern desert. In the south and west, the Assyrian empire was in contact with an Aryan population, and among the twenty-two kings who served under the Assyrian standard, the Cappadocian and Aram-Ayrian were in touch with the Cyprian princes with Greek names. The most important work of Ears-lu's reign was the establishment of Ears-lu's power on the ancient throne of the Medes, the rule of a single power for some twenty years, and, by fusing the nations of Western Asia into a common empire, to their differences, they spread an equalized civilization, and first struck on the idea of universal empire. In B.C. 672 the land of Assyria was divided into twenty governments. Valiant efforts to shake off the Assyrian supremacy were made from time to time, but, just as Babylon had, so to the foreign Chaldai for the chrispionship of its independence, so Egypt found its leaders in the century now passing away. In 663, 662, and on the 14th day of Tayar in the following year he associated his son, Assur-bani-pal, with him in the kingdom. On his death, however, in 665, he left sole king. One of his first acts was to appoint his brother

Sullu-sun-yas (Sunnunghe) governor of Syria, and the 'grand marquise' of ancient Assyria. The empire on his accession was the richest by sea and land of its age. The treasures and products of the world flowed into Nineveh, and its name was feared from the frontiers of Egypt to the Caspian. Whatever power there was asserted the superiority of the Assyrian troops, though they drained the empire of money and men; and the luxury with which they lived was the foundation of the national strength. Assur-bani-pal, in spite of his victories, his buildings, and his patronage of arts, was a man of stern character, and the military expeditions formerly conducted by the king in person were now intrusted to his son, Assur-bani-pal. He was the first to send an expedition to the southward advance of the Cim-merians, those who were thus driven upon Asia Minor, and to quell a revolt which had broken out in Egypt. Two campaigns were necessary to effect this, of which the incursions of Lydia had sent tribute to the formidable Assyrian monarch. War had also broken out with Elam, which was subdued, after a hard struggle, and his army on the capital made a general incursion into the country and Elam. A general insurrection then suddenly broke out, headed by Assur-bani-pal's own brother, who had been summoned from Babylon and Assyria, not with standing his independence; the wandering tribes of Northern Arabia—Kedar, Zabam, Nebatites, etc.—were labelled, and sum and plunder taken on Babylonians and Elamites. Babylon and Cuthah were reduced by famine (649), Sennnachar-bani-pal, the iron sword was carried through Elam. After a prolonged war, in which Assur-bani-pal was aided by internal dissensions, Shushan was plundered and razed, and the whole of Susiana reduced to a wilderness. This happened in 648. Assur-bani-pal's buildings were unrivalled for and grandeur, and his palaces glittered with the precious metals and were adorned with the richest sculpture. The library which he formed at Nineveh far surpassed any that had ever existed before; literary works were collected from all sides; the study of the dead la-guages of Accad was encouraged, grammars and dictionaries were compiled, and learned men of all nations were attracted to his court. The Assyrian art was at its best, and Assur-bani-pal's character was stained by cruelty and sensibility. Under his second name of Sin-haddina-pal, he appeared even less so. He was succeeded in 625 by his son Assur-chilii. His death was the signal for a general revolt. Nabopolassar, the viceroy of Babylon, made himself independent; and Assyria, shorn of its empire, was left to struggle for bare existence. In the same year, Nineveh was taken and burned by the Babylonians and Medes."

and yet became quite considerable from her position as an entrepôt; but the commerce of Babylon was considerably extensive and lucrative. Both nations imported as well as exported; and the shipping upon the Tigris and Euphrates must have been enormous. See Costmerce.

V. Arts and Sciences.—These included both useful and ornamental branches. Architecture was highly developed; but, from the nature of the two regions, the buildings of the Babylonians were of brick and painted paneled. Architectural ornament was carried up to the imposing height with terraced stories, while those of the Assyrians were of stone (at least for facing), especially the soft alabaster of the adjoining mountains, carved with elaborate figures, and usually of two stories only. See Architecture. For similar reasons imposing tombs were common among the Assyrians, while the Babylonians chiefly buried the dead in terra-cotta caskets. See BURIAL. The progress of luxury is easily traced in both nations, in the effeminacy of personal ornaments, in the later period. The massive limbs of kings, soldiers, and even private persons are seen on the monuments loaded with jewelry, decked with embroidery; and the hair is always elaborately curled, even to the beard. See Ornament. Sculpture and painting were highly cultivated; but there is a total lack of perspective in the productions of both. Intaglio was the favorite method of engraving, and bas-relief in cases of considerable magnitude, as indicated on the monuments show; but under what system remains unknown. The decorative arts were proportionately well developed. Pottery was of an elegant form, and glass was known. Among the metals, gold and copper were highly wrought, but iron appears to have been scarce.

Astronomy was the chief science, and for this Babylon became famous. Observatories were erected in Ur, and the Tower of Belus probably had some such use. The stars were designated, and a calendar was adopted, with an intercalation as often as required. The year, however, was the isagog or defective one. Eclipses were calculated, cycles were used, and the night was divided into watches. The lunar changes were noted, and some traces of meteorological observations are found. Arithmetic was systematized, the unit being 60, and squares and cubes were calculated. The sundial, the clepsydra, the lever, and the pulley were known; and the use of the cuneiform inscriptions argues the use of the lens.

VI. Language and Literature.—The speech of the original inhabitants of the Mesopotamian valley is a question of great difficulty and dispute, as is, indeed, their ethnological relation. The extant records, however, are characterized by cuneiform characters, so far as the region in question is concerned, may conveniently be divided into two branches—the Assyrian and the Babylonian dialects—the latter being characterized by a preference for the softer forms and a fuller use of the vowels. Both belong to the Semitic class of languages, and thus are strongly related to the Hebrew and the Arabic. With the aid of the texts, grammars, and lexi-cons now readily accessible, scholars have no difficulty in mastering the elements of the written language of either nation, and in satisfactorily determining the meaning of the literature remaining. (Classes are regularly formed in London for instruction of beginners in cuneiform philology.) Much of this has been translated into European languages, and convenient abstracts may be found in Baxter's series of little volumes entitled Records of the Past, and in the Transactions of the (London) Society of Biblical Archæology. More elaborate works, giving the original texts, have been published by the learned Assyriologists Rawlinson, Oppert, Lenormant, Menaut, Schrader, and others. See Sayce, Assyrian Grammar (Lond. 1872), p. 18 sq.

The literature of Assyria and Babylonia, so far as it hitherto discovered, is almost entirely buried in th mounds of those ruined cities of that region, and consists of arrow-headed inscriptions on clay tablets, sculptured walls and figures, or engraved gems and cylinders. The late Mr. George Smith succeeded in deciphering the cuneiform inscriptions of ancient Babylonia and brought a whole new picture of ancient civilization to light, thus helping to establish the reputation of that branch of learning as the Library of Sargon at Nineveh. Manuscripts on papyrus or other materials of a frail character, if they existed among these people, have utterly perished. The works thus far recovered, besides the sculptured inscriptions (which chiefly relate to regal annals), are largely religious, consisting of hymns and mythological poems. Two whole epics have been restored from pieces of different copies—one on the Deluge, and the other on the descent of Ishtar into Hades; while the fragment of a third describes the war of the seven spirits against the moon. See the recent volumes of Mr. Smith and the other works above cited. Other treatises exhaust contain fables, and a few exhibit legal documents and chronological treatises of later date and little interest. See Sayce, Babylonian Literature (Lond. 1878).

VII. Religious Beliefs.—The basis of these appears to have been a polytheistic conception of daemonological powers residing in natural objects; and this led to superstition practices for the purpose of appeasing the supposed spirits. Prominent among these supernatural influences was a sort of triad, consisting of Na or Anna (the sky), Ea (the earth), and Mulge (the underworld). This reveals an astronomical element, which was eventually developed into a complicated system under various new deities allied to the other Oriental forms of idolatry. Thus in Babylon especially, where the mythology was more elaborately refined, Bel as the sun-god was the principal deity; and his female counterpart (under whatever title) was associated with him in power. Subordinate deities innumerable crowd the Pantheon. From the distinction of sex thus introduced, naturally sprang a licentious worship, notices of which abound in all ancient authorities, and traces of which clearly appear in the legend of Ishtar (the Assyrian Venus) above mentioned. The whole system, at length, was characterized by the grossest features of sensuous image-worship. At the same time the superstitions were accompanied by great indulgent devotees were wont upon by the sprites and goblins of the nature-defilement, and sorcery and magic were the ruling arts of professional experts. See Divination.

Aska, Andrea della, a Neapolitan painter, was born in 1673, and studied in the school of Solime-

no. He afterwards went to Rome, and introduced something of an imitation of Raphael into the Neapolitan style. He died at Naples in 1721. His works, especially the Nativity and the Adoration of the Magi, in the Church of Sant' Agostino, were greatly admired.

Asatians were heretics of the 9th century who followed a certain Sergius. He renewed the Manichaeist errors, and the emperor Michael Cephalas exacted a severe judgment against these sectarians. See Baroni-us, Annales, A.D. 818.

Asato, Francesco Maria della, an Italian prelate, archbishop of Noto, was born Aug. 23, 1654, at Naples, and died at Otranto in 1719. His principal works are, Prima Diocesana Synoda Sancta Tusculana Ecclesie, a Card, Vincentio Marra Thesino celebrata, Am. 1708 (Rome, 1708), ed. A. Salustio della Santa Visita Apostolica (Otranto, 1700);—Martyrologium diocesanae Apulianae, etc.;— adjectis Martyrologias Ordinis S. Benedicti, Dominici, Francisci, Augustini, Carmeli, etc. (Benevento, 1716). See Hoefer, Nurn. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Asten is a name of the ibis-headed deity Thoth, by which he was venerated in the Temple of Denderah.

Aster (or Asterisk) is an instrument used by the Greeks in the liturgy—resembling a star of precious metal, surmounted by a cross, which is placed on the patent to cover the host, and support a veil from contact with the eucharist. It recalls the mystic star of the magi, which is commemorated as the priest censes the aster. In modern times the arches are riveted together at the point of intersection, but so loosely as to admit of one arch being turned within the other for convenience of carriages. See Neal, Eastern Church, Introdi. p. 350; Daniel, Codex Liturgicus, iv, 336, 390.

Asterisk.

Asterius (1) (or Asturius), St., was a Roman senator who undertook the care of burying St. Marinus, martyred at Cesarea, in Palestine, in 261 or 262. The Latinus honor St. Asterius on March 3 as a martyr, together with Marinus; but Eusebius says nothing of this story, which appears to depend upon Rufinus (Hist. vii. 13). The Greeks also honor him as a martyr, separately, Aug. 7. See Ruinart, Acta Sincora, p. 264.

Asterius (2) was the teacher of Acacius, bishop of Berza, whom he accompanied in 372 to Edessa, to summon thence the famous solitary St. Julianus Sabas, whose pupil he had been, to support the orthodox faith at Antioch during the persecution of the Catholics by Valens (Theodoret, Vet. Patr. p. 380).

Asterius (3) (Comes Orientis), in 398, carried out with prudence and tact the orders of the emperor Arcadius for the secret removal of Chrysostom from Antioch when elected to the see of Constantinople (Pallad. 43). See CHRYSTOSOTON.

Asterius (4) was a presbyter belonging to the Arius party at Antioch without a head. By compelling Dorotheus to leave his see, Asterius took the lead, in conjunction with some neighboring bishops, in an application to the Eunomians to be received into communion with them. This negotiation broke down in consequence of the demands of the Eunomians that the condemnation of Eutis should be recalled and all abuses reformed (Philastorius, Eccles. Hist. xi. 1).

Asterius, Turcius Rufus, was a patrician who, in 494, enjoyed the consular dignity together with Flavius Priscianus. He is plainly different from Flavius Asterius, who was consul in 449, although sometimes confounded with him. When out of office he edited some poems of Suidas, and among them a Collection of the Old and New Testaments, in elegiac verse, which has sometimes appeared under the name of Asterius himself, as in the Bibl. Patr. ix. 464, and which some writers maintain to be the actual work of Asterius. See Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 446.

Asterius, Urbanus, was a writer in the Montanist controversy of the 2d century. He is only known by a reference to a Λόγος κατά Αστερίου Ομοπλανίνον, which occurs in an anonymous work against Montanism, fragments of which are preserved by Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. xvi. 17). On the supposition that this reference was a note by Eusebius or by some ancient scholiast, Valerius, Tillemont, Cave, and others have ascribed to Asterius the authorship of the work in question. Since, according to the most obvious interpretation, the reference to Asterius forms part of the quotation, Asterius was probably a Montanist replied to by the writer.

Asteano, an Italian theologian, native of Asti, in Piedmont, gained a certain celebrity as a cassian. He died in 1830. He published a Summa de Belco, or Summa Asteeana, published for the first time in 1469, and reprinted several times down to the 16th century. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s. v.

Aston, D. W., an English Congregational minister, was born at Kenilworth in 1778. In 1797 he became a scholar in the free grammar-school of his native town. He was entirely ignorant of evangelical truth till he was sixteen years old, when he heard a local preacher in a cottage. This resulted in his conversion, when he also became an occasional preacher among the Wesleyans, though never formally connected with that body. He studied for two years under a Mr. Moody, of Warwick, his friend and guide; after which, under the same man's direction, he settled at Stratfordon-Avon, where he was the means of converting his own mother and also the lady who afterwards became his wife, as well as many others. In 1803 he removed to Buckingham, where he toiled excessively for forty-seven years. It was his privilege, during his life here, to see quite a transformation of this till now "unenlightened" district. He was for six years the secretary of the North Bucks Association. Increasing infirmities caused him to resign his charge in 1850, and he retired to Hull to pass his remaining days. He died Jan. 9, 1852. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1853, p. 205, 266.

Aston, Thomas, an English Congregational minister, son of a farmer, was born at Kenilworth in 1785. When about ten years of age his family moved to Hill-Morton, Leicester. In early manhood he forsook the Established Church and became an Independent. In 1814 Mr. Aston was admitted to the Academy at Hackney. His first pastorate was at Crepton, Northamptonshire, where he was ordained in 1817, and preached in a bold and heart-searching style. In 1825 he removed to Wingrave, and for thirty-three years labored with great success. He was regarded as "the father of his people." To him the anxious and distressed carried their sorrows and joys, their burdens, and the remnants of their deliverances. He died at Birmingham, Feb. 5, 1861. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1862, p. 349.

Astorga, Emanuell d., Baron, an eminent musical composer, was born in Sicily, Dec. 11, 1681. He was patronized by the emperor Leopold I, at whose court he passed some years. After the death of that sovereign, in 1705, he travelled considerably throughout Europe. He died Aug. 21, 1786. His chief work is a Stabat Mater, which is much admired. He also composed operas and cantatas.

Astor, Giovanni Antonio, a learned Italian clergyman and antiquary, was born at Venice, Jan. 16, 1672, and soon made extraordinary proficiency in classical and polite literature. In 1688 he entered the Church. He became a member and secretary of the Academy of the Animosi at Venice, and was also a member of that of Arcadia at Rome, under the name of Demade Olimpio. In his latter days he was master of the choir and canon of the ducal Church of St. Mark. He died at Venice, June 28, 1743. He carried on an extensive correspondence with the most eminent scholars of his age. His writings are few in number.

Astorini, Elia, an Italian theologian, was born at Calabria in 1653. He took holy orders at the age of sixteen years, and devoted himself with ardor to the study of philosophy; and with so much zeal did he propagate the new doctrine throughout the kingdom of Naples that he was accused of magic. Fortunately for him, the Inquisition decided to spare him on account.
Astraea, in Greek mythology, was a goddess whose descent is given differently. She was either a daughter of Jupiter and Themis, or of Astraeus and Hemera (goddess of the day), or of Apollo and Chrysothemis, and she is also often declared one and the same with Ceres, Isis, Fortuna, and Themis. In the Golden Age she caused justice and equity among men. When this age ceased, she left the earth, and was placed in the heavens as the constellation of Virgo.

Astragal (the knuckle-bone), a small semicircular moulding or bead either encircling a column or in other situations.

Astragalomancy is a species of divination anciently practised in a temple of Hercules in Achaea. It consisted in throwing small pieces with marks corresponding to the letters of the alphabet, the accidental arrangement of which formed the answer required. See Divination.

Astrae. Paul Thérése David d', a French prelate, was born at Tours (Var), Oct. 15, 1772. The son of piety which he manifested from early youth were never abandoned in his ecclesiastical career, though beset by vicissitudes and painful tests. He bore the evils of the Revolution with a grand Christian resignation. Secured by the mock declination of M. de Turgot, he was appointed, several years after, vicar-general of the metropolis. In 1807 he delivered a discourse at Notre Dame on the re-establishment of religion in France. At the death of the cardinal of Bellay, archbishop of Paris, he managed the vacant see until the coming of cardinal Maury. Charged by the pope, in 1809, to send to this prelate a brief enjoining him to return to his bishopric in Montfiascone, it appears that he received at the same time the bull of excommunication hurled against Napoleon. On March 16, 1850, he succeeded the cardinal of Clermont-Tonnerre as archbishop of Tours and Nantes. Liberty of instruction, reclaimed by the French clergy at first as a right, then as a promise of the charter of 1830, had in Astras an intrepid defender. He protested on this occasion against the doctrines of M. Gatin Arnoult, professor of philosophy of Tours. An attempt was made to reform the liturgies, but he opposed it. It is said that these difficulties at Tours prevented him from being made cardinal for a time, but this honor was finally accorded to him Sept. 29, 1850. He died Sept. 29, 1851. He wrote, Discours sur le Rétablissement de la Religion en France (1807)—Des Appels comme d'Ans en Milliere de Religion (Paris, 1814); Picot does not believe him to be the author of this work—La Vérité Catholique Démontrée, ou Lettres de Monseigneur l'Évêque de Bayonne, actuellement Archevêque de Toulon, a l'Évêque d'Orlées (Toulouse, 1838). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Asulai, a name common to several Jewish writers, viz.: —

1. Abraham, who died in 1644, had devoted his life to the study of the Cabala, and published a commentary on the Zohar to Genesis (Venice, 1655) — אֱלֶמוֹן צֹהָר — ה' יבִּירוֹ בֵּי מִשְׁכְּבֵי, a Cabalistic exposition of the leading articles of that science (latest ed. Lemberg, 1860). His grandson was

2. Chajim Joseph David, born at Jerusalem in 1726, and died at Leghorn in 1807. He is the author of about fifty works in many branches of Jewish learning, but is best known by his ה' יבִּירוֹ בֵּי מִשְׁכְּבֵי, a bibliographical history of Hebrew literature (pt. i, Leghorn, 1774; pt. ii, Leghorn, 1784; pt. iii, Leghorn, 1784; best ed. Wilna, 1864, 2 vols.) — ה' יבִּירוֹ בֵּי מִשְׁכְּבֵי, a continuation of the above (Leghorn, 1796; pt. ii, 1798; further appendices in 1796 and 1801). An entire edition of these several portions was published (Wilna, 1852, 2 vols.) by J. Ben-Jakob, preceded by a biography of Asulai by Carmoly. He wrote also, דִּבְרֵי דָּבְרֵי דָּבְרֵי, derashas, or homilies, on the Pentateuch (Leghorn, 1799): — אֱלֶמוֹן צֹהָר — ה' יבִּירוֹ בֵּי מִשְׁכְּבֵי, a commentary on the same part of Scripture (ibid. 1800): — אֱלֶמוֹן צֹהָר — ה' יבִּירוֹ בֵּי מִשְׁכְּבֵי, a commentary on the five Megiloth (ibid. eod.), on the Psalms (ibid. 1801; Vienna, 1859). Besides, he wrote commentaries on the Zohar: — יבִּירוֹ בֵּי מִשְׁכְּבֵי, an introduction to the Talmud, in 2 pts. (Leghorn, 1790–93). His Iggaroth, or correspondence with contemporaries, was first published in 1867. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud., 66–70; De Rossi, Dizionario Storico (German transl.), p. 50; Etheridge, Introd. to Heb. Literature, p. 481; Zwaan, Zur Gesch. u. Literatur, p. 240 sq. (B. P.)

Asuman, in Persian mythology, was one of the good genii, whose protection, however, is only vouchsafed for on the twenty-seventh day of each month, which day also carries his name. The affirmation of the Magi that he is the angel of death is contradictory, for the latter is not bound to certain days.

Asynia, in Norse mythology, was the general name of the goddesses in the family of the Asas, and also of the maiden descendants of the former.

Atachon, in the mythology of the North American Indians, was the name of the supreme god, the god of the creation among the Algonquins.

Ate-entik, in the mythology of the North American Indians, was the female ancestor (foremother) of human beings; but because she allowed herself to be enticed by Hogouaho she was thrown into the sea. A turtle carried her on its back, and the fishes built for her an island of clay, the earth. She is now the god of death, an enemy to all living beings, and lives solely on snakes and blood. As queen of souls she lives in the kingdom of the spirits, and receives that which is buried with the dead as a tribute.

Atahokan (the great rabbit), in the mythology of the North American Indians, is a curious surname of the creator of the earth among the Iroquois. He is generally called Michiho. The aborigines of the banks of the St. Lawrence River believe he created the great lakes—Ontario, Huron, Erie, and Superior— for catching beavers; therefore after a successful fishing expedition thank-offerings are brought to Atahokan. The great lake Ontario is a sacred body of water with them, and the large pieces of copper which are found on the banks are held and prayed for by priests of this god, yet without using them. According to some, Atahokan brooded on the face of the waters and thus produced animals of various kinds; next he went down into the deep and brought forth a grain of sand, and out of this he created the earth, and then placed his animals on this planet and populated it with human beings.

Atarbius, bishop of Neocesarea, was apparently a relative of St. Basil (Ep. 210); but there had been a long estrangement between them, and Basil writes to him to resume friendly relations for the sake of the Church (Ep. 61). He does not appear to have responded. Betrayed into Sabellianism, he avoided Basil, who endeavored to hold a personal interview with him upon the subject at Nicopolis. At the Council of Constantinople (A.D. 381) we find him subscribing through Cyril the reader. Although Tillemont makes him an Armenian bishop, there can be but little doubt that his see was Neocesarea; for (1) he is so designated in some MSS. of Basil's letters; (2) his character, etc., entirely agree with the description of an unnamed bishop of Neocesarea (Ep. 204, 207, 210); (3) he represents the province of Pontus Palatinum. Of which Neocesarea was the metropolis.

Ataroth-Addar. This place, if the same as Ataroth simply in the same enumeration of cities on the boundary between Benjamin and Ephraim, cannot have been situated between Janoah and Naarath, and at the same time between Archi and Japhlet; therefore Josh. xvi, 7 means that the line went from Janoah in opposite directions to Ataroth and Naarath respectively. See Taanith. Lieut. Conder appears to regard this as a different place from that called simply Ataroth, which he locates at Tel el-Trum, without defining its position (Temp. Work, ii, 384); while he identifies (ibid. p. 105) Ataroth-Addar with Ed-Dârîeh, a small ruined lay down on the Ordnance Map as Kharbet Darâih, one mile and an eighth south of west from Beit-ur el-Talha. Dr. Tristram makes this Ataroth to be the same with Ataroth-Addar, but fluctuates as to its position, in one place (Bible Places, p. 116) identifying it with modern Kharbet Mullah, and a half north of Ramah (two widely different places; he evidently means Attara), while in another (ibid. p. 176) he calls it the "village of Tirsh," which the Ordnance Map lays down as Er-Tireh, one mile and an eighth south east of Beit-ur el-Thoika. The true modern position of which the Ordnance Map lays down on the thoroughfare half-way (a mile and three fourths) between Bireh (Beeroh) and Er-Râm (Ramah), with ruins and a pool and tombs adjacent.

Atef Crown is the crown generally worn by the Egyptian deity Amen-Ra. It consisted chiefly of two uplifted ostrich feathers besides a tall white cap, with the ram's horns, uraei, and solar disk in front. It was supposed to represent the kingship of Egypt, the uraei cap signifying light, the two feathers truth, the uraei serpents royalty, the ram's horns generative power, and the solar disk divinity. It is repeatedly mentioned in the Ritual of the Dead, and represented on the bas-reliefs, coffins, and statuettes.

Atef-nefru (the most lovely disk) was the name under which the special worship of the solar deity Aten-Ra was introduced into the Egyptians by Amenhotep III at the instigation of his queen, Taia.

Aten-Ra was the name of the deity of the solar disk, who was originally one of the minor deities of the Egyptian mythology. He was represented as a solar disk giving forth rays, each of which terminated in a hand holding the cross of life. In the time of Amenhotep IV, the wife of that monarch, queen Taia, attempted to make absolute and universal the worship of Aten-Ra, whom she maintained to be the same as the Syrian deity Adonai, and the worship of this god, yet without using them. According to some, Atahokan brooded on the face of the waters and thus produced animals of various kinds; next he went down into the deep and brought forth a grain of sand, and out of this he created the earth, and then placed his animals on this planet and populated it with human beings.

Atef (or Atarbius), Sr., was an Alexandrian martyr, burned alive with Heron and Isidora during the Decian persecution in 250. See Ruinart, Acta Sinc. p. 127.

Atash, in Persian mythology, is the holy fire which breaks forth from the naphtha-springs; and, lighted by Ormuzd himself, is worshipped as divine. As a consequence of this high honor, various other words are joined to Atash—as, for instance, Atehashbram, the prayer, which is said five times a day, when the observance is the fire, building a fire; Atehsesh is a metallic vessel formed like a vase, with a great cover, to preserve the holy fire; Atehashgh is the small chapel in the temple where the Ateeshian was with the fire in it; Ateeshkanah, the fire temple itself.

Athe bu-Harem (or Al-bakem Im-Ata), surname Medamudan (the veiled), a Moselem impostor, was born at Merv, Khurasan, in the 9th century. He was by trade a fuller, and pretended to be the embodiment of the living spirit of God. By his knowledge of philosophy and chemistry he was enabled to perform wonders and draw about him a large number of followers. Having lost sight of God, he cut off his hand and set himself up as a preacher; and, in his ignorance, he always wore a veil, declaring that no one could behold his face and live. The caliph Mahdi sent an army against him, which besieged him in the castle of Keb, and caused him to put an end to his own life in 780. Some say that he set fire to his castle and threw himself into the flames, followed by many of his disciples; others say he poisoned himself. He was a very learned and still others, that he threw himself into a caldron of acid, which he hoped might consume his body and create the impression that he had been removed by divine agency. He is the hero of The Veiled Prophet of Khurasan, in Moore's Lalla Rookh.

Athenasia, Síst, and widow, was abbess of Tymia, in Greece; and was born in the island of Egiurn at the beginning of the 9th century, of noble and pious parents. She was first married, against her will, to an officer of the imperial army, who was soon killed; and the emperor Michael, having by an edict commanded all the marriageable virgins and widows to marry, she was compelled to receive a second husband, with whom she lived in the practice of every kind of charitable work, and whom she finally induced to renounce the world; upon which she converted her house

ATHANASIUS, Saint and martyr, was a deacon of the Church of Jerusalem. He was scourged and put to death by order of Theodosius, an impious and wicked monk and zealous upholder of Eutyches, who had intruded himself into the see of Jerusalem, during the pontificate of the patriarch about the year 452. During the twenty months which Theodosius held possession of the see, he perpetrated the most unheard-of cruelties against the Catholics. St. Athanasius is commemorated on July 5. See Baillet, July 5.

Athanasius, bishop of Anagastus, in Cilicia Secunda, and metropolitan, was a disciple of St. Lucas of Anioch, reckoned by Arius, in his letter to Eusebius of Nicomedia, among the bishops who coincided with him in doctrine. The great Athanasius accuses him of having, previous to the Council of Nicea, written blasphemies equal to those of Arius, of which he gives a specimen. He is said by Le Quien, on the authority of the Lib. Sacrum, which he so aptly supported before the Council of Nicea. Philostorgius tells us that when Aetius was expelled from his master's house, after his unlucky victory in argument, Athanasius received him and read the Gospels with him.

Athanasius, bishop of Anchiala, was raised to that see by the Arian Acacius of Caesarea in 360. Notwithstanding this inauspicious beginning, he gave unquestionable proofs of his orthodoxy by taking an active part in the Synod of Tyana, in 367, at which the Nicene symbol was accepted. By St. Basil he is commended as a bulwark of orthodoxy; and Gregory Nyssen praises him as valuing the truth above everything.

At his death, in 368 (or 369), Basil wrote a letter of condolence to the Church of Ancyra, on the loss of one who was truly a pillar and foundation of the Church. See Smith, Dict. Christ. Biog. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Athanasius, patriarch of Constantinople, lived in the latter half of the 13th century. He succeeded George, or Gregory of Cyprus, in 1289. Four years afterwards he abdicated and John was put in his place. His successor's nephew was put in his place two years later; but he was again deposed. Some treaties attributed to him are found in the Library of the Fathers. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Athanasius, bishop of Naples in 877, through the influence of his brother Sergius, duke of Naples, against whom he conspired the following year. Sergius was deposed, made prisoner, and delivered to pope John VIII. Athanasius became duke in place of his brother; but he did not long enjoy the fruits of his crime. He was excommunicated in 887. Athanasius joined the Saracens, took part in their enterprises, and shared theirbooty. He seems to have failed neither in courage nor military talent. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Athanasius, bishop of Perrha, known to us in connection with Domnus II, bishop of Antioch, in the middle of the 5th century. He was present at the first Council of Ephesus, supported Cyril of Alexandria, and signed with him. Having had grave charges brought against him by his clergy, he refused to meet them when summoned by his metropolitan Pamphilus of Hierapolis, and voluntarily resigned his see. Domnus summoned a council to consider the matter; but Athanasius refused to appear, on the ground that Domnus was his personal enemy, and he was unanimously condemned by default and deposed from his bishopric. See Cave Hist. Lit. i, 479; Labbé, Concil. iv, 717-754.

ATHANASIUS, an Arian bishop who succeeded Philip in the see of Sycthopolis about 372. He is charged by Epiphanius with pushing his Arian tenets to the most absurd and extravagant extremes that the Holy Spirit were creatures, and had nothing in common with the divine nature (Harr. Ixxiii, 37, p. 885).

Athar, Chajim Ihn, a Jew of Sala, in Barbary, went to Jerusalem in 1742, where he became the teacher of Chajim Asulai. He died there in 1748. He is the author of Zemon ha-Nah, a commentary on the Pentateuch (Venice, and others). He also wrote novellies on some treatises of the Talmud. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 70; De' Rossi, Dizionario Storico (German transl.), p. 49 sq. (B. P.)

Atharvan (or Atharveda), in Hindu mythology, is the fourth part of the Veda, formerly lost, and reconstructed from tradition. It contains prayers for the pacification of the gods, and malevolent on enemies.

Athierland. See Adelard.

Athelm, archbishop of Canterbury, was first heard of as a monk of Glastonbury, and then as bishop of Wells. He was translated to Canterbury in 914, and occupied the metropolitan see for nine years. During this period nothing memorable occurred in the Church. Athelm appears to have had the happiness of reaping the fruits which result from the seed wisely sown by his immediate predecessors, under the direction of Alfred. He died Jan. 8, 923. See Hook, Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, i, 334 sq.

Athena, a name given Minerva by the Greeks, because she was never nursed as other children, but was brought forth from her father's head in full strength. Plato, however, thinks she was so named because of her skill in divine things, while others say because she was never enslaved.

Athenensia, a festival held in honor of Athena (q. v.) among the ancient Greeks.

Athenæum is a general name for the temples of Athena; a temple at Athens, dedicated to Athena, in which poets and orators assembled to recite their works and instruct the young. From this the name was applied to a school founded at Rome, on the Capitoline Hill, by the emperor Hadrian, which long continued an institution of great influence. In the reign of Theodosius I it became the seat of government and residence of the government, five of dialectics, one of philosophy, and two of jurisprudence. In modern times the term is applied to literary institutions, public reading-rooms, lyceums, etc.

Athenogōnes was a martyr who lived at the same time with Clement of Alexandria, and who is said by St. Basil to have been burned to death. Before his death he composed a morning and an evening hymn, which he left as a memorial of him to his disciples (St. Basil, De Spiritu S. cap. 29). See Fabricius, Bibl. Græc. v. i.

Atheron, John, a minister of the Methodist New Connection, was born at Liverpool near the close of the 18th century; was converted in 1809, and devoted all his time to acquiring religious knowledge and to useful Christian labor. He entered the ministry in 1814, and for six years earnestly preached the Gospel in five circuits. In December, 1818, he took cold, which led to his death, at Chester, Aug. 3, 1819. He was a sincere Christian, and zealous in the service of God. See Minutes of the Conference.

Atheron, William, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Lambeth-Green, Lancashire, in 1775. He entered the ministry in 1797, and occupied some of the most important charges, such as Aberdeenshire, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Durham, Liverpool, Bath, London, etc.; was elected president of the conference in 1846, and was actively engaged in the ministry until within a fortnight of his death, which took place after a most painful illness, Sept. 26, 1830. Mr. Atherton had a clear, precise, and independent thought and purpose, together with an ability on pulpit and platform which made his influence widely felt throughout the Methodist Connection in England. He wrote a Life of Lady Maxwell, with an Introduction by Rev. J. Gilchrist Wilson (Lond., 1800). Atherton is the subject of one of rev. J. Gilchrist Wilson’s many elegant and beautifully written literary portraits—not greatly to the advantage of the former—in the Wesleyan Centenary Tavking (3d ed. Lond. 1811), No. VII., i, 147–171. "But," says the artist, "take him as a whole, rather than in detail, and we have at once a rarity—a man of much more exalted powers than many who are more generally held in respect; a man whose laudable vice, in every discourse, is made to withe, and error is compelled to shelter itself in darkness," etc. (p. 170). He published also an Address on Wesleyan Methodism (1809). See Minutes of the British Conference, 1851, p. 562; also Hill, Alphabetical Arrangement of the Wesleyan Ministers (Lond. 1817).

Athey, Walter, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Virginia, Sept. 14, 1798. Little is known of his early life. In 1827 he was admitted into the Pittsburgh Conference; in 1828 he was smitten with paralysis, and remained in a helpless condition until his death, Oct. 24, 1874. Mr. Athey was a plain, earnest preacher, thoroughly versed in Methodism and one of her most powerful defenders. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1875, p. 34.

Athias is a name common to several Jews who excelled as typographers and writers, of whom we mention the following:

1. Isaac was of Spanish descent, and flourished at Amsterdam in the beginning of the 17th century. He wrote a translation of the first four books of the Psalms into Spanish, with thirteen precepts, Tesoro de Preceptos (Venice, 1627; Amsterdam, 1649). He also translated the book יפתנשא of A. Troki into Spanish, Fortificacién de la Fé, which is in MS. See Frey; Bibl. Jud. i, 71; De' Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 60.

2. Joseph, the printer, contributed largely to the cause of Biblical learning by his correct editions of the Greek Testament, which he published in 1651 and 1657 and which were followed by a second edition in 1661, 1667, and 1680. The States-General of Holland decreed him a gold chain and medal as a mark of their appreciation of his merit. But the correctness of these editions was tested by Samuel Maresius of Groningen, who published an epistle in 1669 against both editor and printer. In reply to this epistle Athias wrote Causa de Odricus (Leyden, 1670). Atpk kut. Justo Defensor. In 1671 he published Apokaliptam, Aburandam, et Judocum Rephraseionem Viri Celeb. D. Sum. Maresii, reprinted in Crenius, Annales Christianos-Historico-philologische, i, 121 sq. He also edited the Biblia Hispanica, published at Ferrara in 1538 (Amst. 1601), and the Bible in Judeo-German, by Joseph mitzenhausen (ibid. 1679). See Frey, Bibl. Jud. i, 71; Basnage, History of the Jews, p. 741.

3. Solomon of Jerusalem. In 1549 his Commentary on the Psalms, הרוחות שים, based on Rashi, Kimchi, and others, was published together with the Hebrew text of the Psalms at Venice. See Frey, Bibl. Jud. i, 71; De' Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 60. (B. P.)

Athingani. See Paulicians.

Athonas is a name given by the Mohammedans to the procession made by pilgrims seven times round the Kaabah, or Black Stone, in the Beit-Allah, or Temple of Mecca, during the feast of Ramadán (q. v.).

Athy or Athyry, in Egyptian mythology, was a goddess of night, who, as such, was the hidden cause of all things. She was principally worshipped at Athribis, in the Delta, which city is said to have received its name from her. Upon certain coins of Athribis she appears as a womanly figure, with a spear in her left and a bird in her right hand. The Egyptians declared their Athor to be the Aphrodite of the Greeks and the Venus of the Romans, who identifies with the dove sacred to Venus as a symbol of fruitful brooding. Later Egyptologists, however, doubt her identification. Her name signifies "the abode of Hor," and she is closely associated with Isis (q. v.). She probably represented the lower hemisphere, into which the sun sinks at night, and so came to be regarded as the goddess of the under-world. She appears on the monuments in various forms, such as a female, a cow, or a hawk, with the characteristic emblem of the disk and the horns. See Rawlinson, Hist. of Egypt, i, 364 sq.

Atkin, Daniel, an English Congregational minister, was born at Kendal, Jan. 10, 1770. In 1788 he was removed to Warrington, and became united in Christian fellowship with the Independent Church. In 1820 he became pastor at Tidswell, near Buxton, thence he removed to Hilton Lane, Worsley, near Manchester, and from there to Tideswell, Derbyshire. In 1834 he became pastor of Bethesda Chapel, Leigh. He died Oct. 12, 1858. Mr. Atkin was mighty in the Scriptures. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1859, p. 191.

Atkin, George, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in High Hall, Lincolshire, England, April 16, 1726. He emigrated to New York state with his parents at the age of seven; experienced conversion in his twelfth year; removed to Kentucky in his twenty-first year, spent four years in school-teaching, and in 1818 entered the itinerancy in the Kentucky Conference. In 1819 he located and retired to Knoxville, where for seven years he taught school. In 1826 he re-entered the travelling connection, and died Jan. 29, 1827. Mr. Atkin was argumentative, agreeable, benevolent, zealous. See Methodist Magazine, xi, 172.

Atkin, Thomas, an English Congregational minister, was born at Warrington in 1806. He received his collegiate training at Rutherford College and the University of Glasgow. He began his ministry in 1832 at St. Paul's, Wigan, where he labored six years, and then became pastor at Glossop, remaining there till his death, Jan. 30, 1876. Mr. Atkin was clear in discernment, forcible in expression, and fearless in everything. His thorough devotedness, genial, unassuming kindness, faithfulness, and zeal gave him great influence. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1877, p. 341.

Atkin, Elieisha, a Congregational minister, was born at Middletown, Conn., Oct. 28, 1756. He graduated at Yale College, in 1773, and was a chaplain in the Revolutionary Army. He was ordained pastor of the Church in Killingly in 1774, where he remained until his death, June 14, 1839. "He was esteemed a good scholar and a handsome writer, and did much in education, especially in training pupils for college." He published three sermons. See Cong. Quarterly, 1861, p. 16.

Atkins (or Etkins), James (1), D.D., a Scotch prelate, was born in the town of Kirkwall, in the stewartry of Orkney, and was educated at Edinburgh; from there he went to Oxford in 1638 to finish his theological studies under Dr. Prideaux. On his return to England, he obtained from the king the Church of Birse, in the stewartry of Orkney. He was excommunicated for heretical opinions, and returned to Scotland. In 1652 he was a chaplain to the Duke of Argyll, and in the restoration of 1660, was made Bishop of Echternach, a see in the Duchy of Luxembourg. He was no present to the British government under Charles II., and in 1677 he was removed to the bishopric of Argyll, with a年薪 of 1,000 pounds. He died in Echternach, Dec. 14, 1703. He wrote several epistles and a treatise against the Bishop of London. He left a large number of manuscripts, which, however, have not been published. Atkinson, Thomas, a Scotch gentleman, was a young officer in the English army, and was captured by the French in 1652, and sold into slavery in the West Indies. He was restored to his liberty in 1654, and returned to England, where he became an active member of the Society of Friends. He was imprisoned in the Fleet for a time, and was finally allowed to go abroad. He settled in New York, and was one of the founders of the city of Amsterdam. He was a member of the Assembly of the State of New York, and was a prominent man in the society of Friends. He was the author of several pamphlets and essays, and was known for his radical opinions on religious and political questions. He died in 1690.

nicated for drawing up a declaration in behalf of the Presbytery of Orkney expressing their loyalty and allegiance. He returned to Scotland in 1853, settled in Edinburgh, and remained there until 1860. In 1867 he was elected and consecrated bishop of Murray, Scotland, and in 1880 was translated to the see of Galloway. He died at Edinburgh, Oct. 28, 1887.

Atkins, James (2), an English Wesleyan missionary, was born at Salisbury, Wilts, in 1808, and became a member of the Church at the age of seventeen, under Isaac Bradrack. In 1820 he received an appointment to Pembroke, and afterwards to Tenterden and to Ipswich. In 1834 he went to Jamaica, W. I., where he labored energetically and successfully until his death at Kingston, Jan. 24, 1845. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1845.

Atkins, John W., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Mount Vernon, Me., Dec. 17, 1807. He experienced conversion in 1824, and in 1827 received license to preach and entered the Maine Conference.
In 1852 he retired from the active ranks and settled at Sac, where he remained until his death, May 27, 1868. See Minutes of the New England Conference, 1850; Minutes of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South Conference, 1851; Minutes of the Wesleyan Methodist Conference, 1852.

Atkins, Richard, a Christian martyr, was born in Hertfordshire, England. He was often known to rebuke the popish priests, and to advise the young of the Romish Church not to worship idols, but to pray to the true God. On one occasion, at the celebration of mass in a church, he threw down the chalice with the wine and snatched the cake from the priest's hand, for which some worshippers rose and beat him sorely.
He was taken and sent to prison; while there, he was often visited by many Englishmen, who tried to persuade him to recant; but he told them they were in the wrong way, and not he, and he wished that they would, instead of trying to get him to forsake his faith, pray for it. He was again brought before their commander, and while on his way to the place of execution, being almost naked, he was often burned with torches by four men who walked on either side of him. When he reached the place, they burned his legs off first. Although his suffferings were great, he did not cease to exhort the people to come to Christ. He was burned at Rome in 1591. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, viii, 742.

Atkins, Samuel G., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Salem, Mass., about 1798. He experienced religion early in life, and in 1822 united with the New England Conference, in which he served the Church faithfully until his death at Dorchester, Mass.,
Feb. 27, 1826. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1826, p. 52; Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1825, p. 75.

Atkins, Thomas, a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, began his ministry in 1864 as rector of Christ Church, Dresden, Me. In 1866 he removed to Gardiner, Me., where he resided without regular work until his death, which occurred Jan. 22, 1868. See Prot.

Atkinson, Christopher, an English Methodist preacher, was born at Sheffield, Dec. 14, 1782. He was brought up in the Church of England, but was converted at a Methodist revival when quite young. He joined the New Connection soon after it was formed, and became a useful local preacher. He entered their ministry in 1807, and continued his labors with acceptance and success for forty-nine years. Age and weakness made him an supernumerary in 1859, when he settled his home at Leeds, and for eleven years labored as he had strength. He was pious, humorous, earnest, useful, and died in peace, May 15, 1866. See Minutes of the Conference; Tyerman, Oxford Methodist, p. 371.

Atkinson, Miles, an English divine, of whose birth, early life, or entrance on the ministry we have no record, officiated in the parish church of Leeds nearly fifty years. The congregation which he succeed tended his preaching was one of the largest in the kingdom, and he is supposed to have converted several thousand persons. He died in February, 1811. As a minister he declared the whole counsel of God, as a pastor was most diligent, and as a Christian humble and faithful. See (Lond.) Christian Observer, April, 1811, p. 271.

Atkinson, Thomas (1), a Canadian Wesleyan Methodist minister, was a native of Ireland, and emi-nigrated to Canada when very young. In 1847 he united with the Wesleyan Methodist Church at Newburg, Ont., and was received into the ministry in 1855.
He spent the greater portion of his life west of the city of London, and died at Maitland, Ont., Dec. 29, 1874.
Atkinson was a man of glowing zeal for the salvation of men. With one exception, he held a camp-meeting in every county he traveled. The work of his con-gressed all his time and energies, and he was only hap-ny when actively engaged in it. See Carroll, Case and his Contemporaries (Toronto, 1867-77, vols. 12mo, v.
249; Minutes of the Canada Conference (Toronto, 1875.

Atkinson, Thomas (2), D.D., LL.D., a Protestant Episcopal bishop, was born about 1808; and consecrated bishop of the Diocese of Western Canada in 1853. He died at his residence in Washington, D. C., Jan. 4, 1881.

Atkinson, Timothy, a Congregational minister, sen of Rev. Charles Atkinson, was born at Ipswich, England, July 4, 1806. After engaging in business in London, he turned to the ministry, and was educated at Homerton College. In 1852 he was ordained pastor at Hounslow; two years after was pastor at Halstead; in 1857 he went to Canada. In 1858 he commenced his labors in the work of the Colonial Missionary Society and organized a Congregational Church in Quebec. On account of the severity of the climate, he removed to Lowell, Mass., in 1845, and in the following year organized the High Street Church, of which he was installed pastor, where he remained ten years. In 1858 he succeeded Dr. Gridley in the presidency of Amherst College. In 1865 he returned to Quebec; in 1866 to acting pastor of Bridge Street Church, Brooklyn, N. Y.; from 1853 to 1855 was secretary of the American Congregational Union; in 1856 was installed pastor of the Church at Westminster, Conn., from which he retired in 1864; from 1864 to 1867 he was acting pastor of an Independent Church at Nahant, Mass.; and from 1867 to 1870 occupied the same relation to the Second Church, Orange Valley, N. J. At Norton, Mass., he officiated from 1872 until the date of his death, June 29, 1875. See Cong. Quarterly, 1876,
p. 419.

Atkinson, William Mayo, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Powhatan, Va., April 22, 1796. He graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1814, and returned to Virginia and began the practice of law. He was licensed in 1833, served for several years as agent of the Virginia Bible Society, became pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Winchester in 1839, and agent of the Education Board of the Presby-Atla, in Norse mythology, was a giant maiden who, with her eight sisters, sleeping on the sea-coast, was surprised by Odin. By him the sisters became the joint mother of the god Heimdal.

Atlaibos, in Slavonic mythology, was a domestic god of the heathen Poles.

Atlanides were the seven daughters of Atlas by his wife Pleione, after whom they were also styled Pleidae ("sailing"), because they were supposed to able to navigation. Their respective names were Stero-pe, Celena, Electra, Alecyone, Maia, Merope, and Tetygete.
They were each in great reputation for wisdom and justice, and on this account were adored as goddesses.
With their mother they were pursued five years by Orio, till Jupiter, prevailed on by their prayers, took them into the heavens, where they form the constella-Atma, in Hindu mythology, was the surname of Brahma, the all-penetrating spirit of the world. All souls come from Atma; they occupy the heart in the body, and are the cause of all sensual and voluntary functions, and therefore are rewarded or punished for the good or evil which the being did during life.

Atocha, our Lady of, a name given to the Virgin Mary, under which she has a chapel dedicated to her at Madrid. She is represented in the dress of a widow, with a chaplet in her hands; and on festival days she is conveyed, in the sun, decked out with the finest garments, and adorned with the richest jewels. See MARIOLATRY.

Atochians were heretics of the 13th century who held that the soul died with the body, and that all sins were equal. See Cent. Magd. 13th cent. cap. v.—Lan- dón, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Atonists, a sect of philosophers in ancient Greece, usually ranked as atheists. The system seems to have originated with Leucippus, and to have been carried to a more systematic form by Democritus. The fundamental principle of the system was the eternal existence of matter in the form of an infinite number of atoms in infinite space. See DEMOCRITUS; Epicurus; Leucippus.

Atonement. Theory of. The moral grounds or explanations of Christ's death on behalf of sinful man usually assigned are two—namely, the demands of justice, which could only have been satisfied, and the claims of authority, which could only thus be adequately maintained. Both of these essentially resolve themselves into one—namely, the requirements of the divine government, which, it is supposed, would be endangered by pardoning the sinner without the infliction of the punishment which he has merited. This proposition, plausible as it seems, is, however, based entirely upon the human point of view, and regards the atonement as a transaction in which the Almighty is affected by exterior considerations altogether such as apply to earthly rulers and mundane affairs. It may reasonably be doubted whether we have a right to assume that the Divine Being is thus hammer-struck, or whether we present the atonement in its most favorable and impressive aspect by this course of reasoning. Such statements may be profitable by way of illustration of the divine method of procedure; but they are hardly satisfactory as a logical exposition of the reasons operative in the divine mind. We should, of course, speak cautiously in all such premises; but if we speculate at all upon the subject, we should do so in such a manner as to justify adequately the ways of God.

We apprehend that the final cause of this central feature of the redemptive scheme is to be found not so much in any consideration of vindictive or governmental policy or necessity as in its remedial power. Scripture gives the true key to its economy in the words of Christ himself: "God so loved the world that he gave his Son," etc. It was suggested by divine love in the person of the Father, and it was carried out by the same self-sacrificing, uncalculating love in the person of the Son. That impulse to make other beings happy beyond the godhead, which prompted the original creation, likewise induced the yearning to restore man to happiness after he had fallen. This is the only Biblical and tenable view of the subject in its ultimate theology.

If now it be further asked, Why was the particular method of substitutional redemption adopted? we reply, in like manner, Because divine love chose to suffer itself rather than see the object of that love suffer. Such is the nature of all true love. It rushes spontaneously to the rescue, and interposes itself between the danger and the victim. There is no cool balancing of probabilities, risks, or advantages. It was not simply nor properly because there would be a gain in the suffering of one another, nor in the increase of one's own, but because the Sufferer was more able to endure than the finite race. Such a quantitative analysis of the transaction belittles it to a mere commercial affair. Nor does disinterested love stop to inquire whether its devotion will be altogether successful. It freely offers itself if there be the least hope or opportunity of thereby averting the doom of the beloved. It begets the privilege, and will only be restrained by insurmountable obstacles. The only real difficulties in this case would be the refusal of the judge or that of the culprit himself. The former is obviated by the fact of the unity between the persons of the Trinity, which makes them necessarily conscious of the purpose and consequences; the latter by the conscious guilt and helplessness of the penitent sinner, who accepts this as his only possible mode of escape. See VICARIOUS SUFFERING. The final cause of Christ's atonement thus appears in its moral effect upon the will of the subject of redemption, by awakening any susceptibility of condemnation and gratitude left in his nature. The spectacle of the Divine Sufferer on the cross was the last resort for winning back the erring (John xii, 32). Dying love alone has power to constrain to penitence and faith.

On the other hand, the strictly governmental view of the atonement falls short as an ultimate vindication of its morale in at least three essential respects. First, as such it is a signal failure in point of fact. Christ's atonement has not, as a rule, restrained mankind at large from sin, either prophylactically or-punitively; but, on the contrary, has rather led to the extension of crime, particularly sacerdotal, partly by making the person of the victim conspicuous and partly by inducing a general sense of direct impunity. Secondly, and more conclusively, as a purely governmental device, the atonement violates the most fundamental principle of all jurisprudence by proposing to excuse the guilty and punish the innocent. Thirdly, as a magisterial act it exalts offenses of such magnitude as the person of the victim, and again in that of the finally impenitent. All that we can justly say in behalf of the so-called governmental theory of atonement is, that as a secondary or subordinate design its most important advantages are indirectly subserved by the remedial economy. But we cannot consistently regard God as shutting up his abhorrence by the exigencies or results of his own sovereignty.

Once more, should it be inquired, If the love of God be of such an all-constraining character, why might it not have been more fully indulged by refraining from all punishment whatever? we answer, This is substantially the fact, when the word punishment is properly defined and understood in the case. Christ was not "punished" at all: he suffered indeed, but his anguish was not penal; it was voluntarily undergone for the sake of its effect upon others. Nor is the final and eternal sentence upon the impenitent sinner so much a positive and direct infliction as a deprivation of privilege... him incapable of either sin or misery; but he chose to confer upon him this tremendous capability because (as we reverently conceive) the virtue of impiety is necessary greater than that of impiety, and the glory of redemption transcends even Edenic innocence. In a word, confirmed (because voluntary and tested) conformity to the divine will is, in truth, the only perfect happiness in the universe—and by reason of God's own nature this must be the case; and this means only that supreme love to God is the sole unalloyed bliss. All who fall short of this, therefore, whether in this world or the next, are proportionately miserable by the very constitution of their being. The atonement sprang from the pure love of God, and is calculated to restore a reciprocity of it in the human breast. Its eventual failure in any man is the final perdition.

God, we repeat, doubtless could have obviated the consequences of man's fall by some less costly means, or he might, we presume, have arbitrarily prevented man's sin altogether; but we see no way by which he could so effectually have exhibited his infinite and ceaseless love for the race as by sending his Son to die for its salvation. At all events, this is the method of redemption which he has actually chosen, and we feel compelled to believe that he selected this in order to manifest the full extent of his interest in his fallen creatures. The catastrophe, we suppose, was permitted in order that the remedy might be possible; and both illustrate the magnitude of the divine nature in the highest conceivable degree.

We are not deterred from this explanation of the atonement by the Socinian abuse of it, which represents Christ as dying, like a mere hero, for the sake of example to his fellows. Nothing short of self-sacrifice of any part of God will satisfy the conditions of our view. The offended and injured parent must himself intervene for the rescue and recovery of the contumacious and ruined child. The undying love of the Creator only can save the lost creature. It is this sublime devotion alone that can conquer the rebel and reform the depraved. The God-man is essential no less as a crowning attraction upon the cross than as a model in the pathways of life. The atonement extends from the manger to the sepulchre; and it is divinity that lends it all its commanding lustre.

Not in the above view of God's fatherly feelings towards the sinner do we overlook his hatred of sin. But this latter we regard as rather an emotion of grief and regret (humanly speaking) than of resentment or indignation, as directed towards the person of the offender. We can only arrive at a just notion of the divine sentiments by comparing them with those of an earthly parent towards his repentant child. The soul of the latter is hateful, but the sinner is still loved with pity and benevolence. The temper and bearing of Jesus in his entire earthly career must beautifully illustrate this combination.

Additional Literature.—Bushnell, God in Christ, and other works (proceeds upon the purely speculative theory); Knapp, Christian Theology (reviews the leading opinions, and concludes that "God chose this extraordinary means from the impulse of his own benevolence"); Van Oosterzee, Christian Dogmatics (treats of its external relations only); Martensen, Christian Dogmatics (clearly contrasts Anselm's and Abelard's views, which respectively represent the severe and the benignant theories of all later discussions); Steinmeyer, Passion of our Lord (from the German, Edinb. 1879, p. 6 sqq; contains the latest positions and inclines to the satisfaction theory); Milley, The Atonement in Christ (adopts the governmental theory). ATONEMENT, THE DAY OF, Modern Observance of. In the treatise Hilchoth Taharah, c. 1, 2, we read, "At this time, when there is no temple and we have no altar, there is no atonement but repentance. Repentance atones for all sins; yea, though a man be wicked all his life and repent at last, none of his wickedness is mentioned to him (Ezek. xxxiii, 12). The Day of Atonement itself also atones for them that repent (Lev. xvi, 30)."

Without considering the contradiction contained in this statement, we will mention the fact that the rabbi, in spite of repentance and the Day of Atonement, have felt the need of something more, which would a little better resemble real sacrifice than atonement; and hence has arisen the custom of sacrificing a cock on the eve of that solemn day. The following account of this custom is given in the Pentateuch: "Order of the Atonements. On the eve of the Day of Atonement the custom is to make atonements. A cock is taken for a man, and a hen for a woman; and for a pregnant woman a hen and also a cock, on account of the child. The father of the family first makes the atonement for himself—for the high-priest first atoned for himself—then for his family, and afterwards for all Israel." The order is as follows: He takes the cock in his hand and says these words:

"The children of men that sit in darkness and the shadow of death, being bound in affliction and iron; he brought them out of the shadow of death and led them out of their bands asunder. Fools, because of their transgression, and because of their iniquities, are afflicted. Their soul abhorreth all manner of goodness, and they draw near unto the gates of death. Then they cry unto the Lord in their trouble; he saveth them out of their distresses. He sendeth his word and healeth them, and delivereth them from their destructions. Oh, that men would praise the Lord for his wonderful works to the children of men (Psalm xvii) ! If there be for him an angel, an intercessor, one among a thousand, to show unto man his uprightness the he is gracious unto him, and saith Deliver him from going down to the pit; I have found a ransom" (Job xxx, 28).

While moving the atonement round his head, he says,

"This is my substitute. This is my commutation. This cock goeth to death, but may I be gathered and enter into a long and happy life, and peace into peace."

He then begins again at the words, "The children of men," and so he does three times. Then follow the various alterations that are to be made, when the atonement is for a woman or another person, etc., and there is added "as soon as one has performed the order of the atonement, he should lay his hands on it, as the hands of the high-priest discharges the duties of his office before the destruction of the second Temple is read and heard, and the ceremonies of the day close with the words "Next year we shall be in Jerusalem." (B. P.)

Atri, in Hindo mythology, were certain deities emanating from Brahma, whom he invested with the power of creation.

Atrapos, in Greek mythology, was one of the Parcae, or Fates; and it is she who cuts the thread spun by the other two, Clotho and Lachesis, who is the bringer of death. She is generally represented as a woman with a pair of scissors. See PARCA.

Attbeira, in the mythology of the Antilles tribes, was worshipped by the ancient inhabitants of Hayti as the mother of the omnipotent, unseen Being. Her servants were protecting spirits of the seasons, of hunting, of health, of fisheries, etc.
ATTACANTI

Attacanti (or Atavanti), Giacomo, an Italian ecclesiastic, was a Servite and of a noble family in Florence, and distinguished for his genius and acquirements. Cosimo de’ Medici made him professor of theology at Pisa, and the pope appointed him general of his order. He collected a library of more than three thousand volumes in his convent at Pisa, and died at the age of eighty-one (in 1607), leaving many works still in MS., both in Italian and Latin; among them an immense work in twenty-five volumes, called Ager Domini, containing the treasures of wisdom and divine knowledge.

Attacanti (or Atavanti), Paolo, an Italian writer, was a monk of the Order of the Servites, born of a noble family of Florence, who entered the order in 1427. He acquired early a high reputation, and taught theology at Sienna; was made provincial of the province of Tuscany; and was charged by Pius II with the direction of the Hospital of the Holy Spirit at Rome. He quitted this employment and retired to Florence, where he died in 1499, aged eighty. His works are, Dialogus ad Petrum Medicum, de Origeni Ordinis Servorum (1471); —Vita B. Joachimi et Francisci, Servatorum, Ord. Serv., MSS.; —Breviarium Decr. Decret., Setti, etc.; —Thesaurus Concessoriorum (Milan, 1479); Letters; Sermones; Comment. in XII Prophetae Minores, et in Apocalypse, S. Johan. (1583); —Sermones de Sanctoribus; —Breviarium Tomis Juris Canonici (Milan, 1479); —Quadragesimale de Reditu Pecatorum ad Deum (ibid. ed.); —Expositio in Paulinos Pontificiales (ibid. ed.). He wrote many other works, none of which have been printed. —See Mag. Biblioth. Ecclesi. p. 694; Hofer, Nover. Diop. Generale, &c. v.

Attachment. Letters of Attachment are letters, added to others, to put the latter in execution. Sometimes they were called letters-potent, and were required in France and elsewhere before the papal bulls, etc., could take effect within the kingdom. Attala (or Attallas), Sr., second abbot of Bobbio (Bobbiam), was born in Burgundy. He first entered the Monastery of Lerins, and afterwards that of Luxeuil, where his friend St. Columbanus presided, whose fortunes he followed. In the year 612 Columbanus founded the Monastery of Bobbio, in the Milanese, and became the first abbott; and, upon his death, Attala was elected to succeed him. Many of his monks, finding the strictness of his rule to bear heavily upon them, withdrew; but several were induced to return by the miserable death which had overtaken some of their fellow-relatives. He died March 10, 627. See Baillet, March 10.

Attalia. The situation of this place made it a natural port of the adjacent region, and hence Paul readily found here a vessel coasting to Antioch, in Syria. See Lewin, Life and Letters of St. Paul, i, 155.

Attalus, Sr., one of the martyrs of Lyons in 577.

Attardi, Bonaventura, an Augustine monk, was born at St. Philip of Agire, in Sicily, and became professor of Church history in the University of Catania. In 1578 he was made provincial of his order in Sicily and Malta.

Attardi, Pietro, a learned priest of the Oratory, was born at Girgenti, in Sicily, in 1645. He XI.—9 was a man of intense application to study, taking no other sleep than he could get with his head resting on his books. His vast abilities and learning, and extraordinary memory, caused him to be much employed by his bishop in difficult matters. He died in 1714, leaving, among other works, Lecture et Antiphons SS. Gregorii et Gerlandi, Episcop. Apgreg. Agrippinorum, a S. C. Ritual approbatus et laudatu.

Atttenborough, Thomas Beardsley, an English Congregational minister, was born at Ilkestone in March, 1810. He had not the advantages of Christian nurture, and underwent many trials in his attempts to serve God. Against the wishes of every relative he had, in his seventeenth year he openly professed Christ, connected himself with the Wesleyan Church, and began to preach. In 1840 he adopted Congregational views, and did his first pastoral work at Hope Chapel, Wigan. He first settled at Sedbergh, and removed to Brampton, where he was ordained. In 1849 Mr. Attenborough accepted the pastorate of the Church at Winslow, Bucks, where he labored nine years, and then removed to Newark-on-Trent. Here he devoted his best powers to the Church until stricken down by paralysis. Mr. Attenborough died Sept. 25, 1874. He was a man of catholic spirit; a special friend of the humber classes. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1875, p. 210.

Attakahā is the title of a commentary on the sacred books of the Buddhists among the Singhalese, which, until recently, was regarded as of equal authority with the text. The text was orally preserved until the reign of the Singhalese monarch Wattagamani, who reigned from B.C. 104 to B.C. 76, when it was committed to writing in the Island of Ceylon. The commentary was written by Budhagaha, at the ancient city of Anuradhapura, in Ceylon, A.D. 420. See Hardy, Eastern Monachism, p. 1, 157, 171, 187.

ATTIRET, JEAN DEXIS, a French Jesuit and painter, was born at Dale, July 7, 1702. He studied at Rome, and had already produced some good pictures when he entered the Society of the Jesuits at Avignon. In 1737 he went to Peking, China, at the solicitation of the French Jesuit missionaries stationed there, and was employed by the emperor Kien Lung. He died at Peking, Dec. 8, 1756.

ATTIS (or ATYS), a beautiful Phrygian shepherd and priest of the goddess Cybele, who was deified after his death and worshipped as the sun. Julian calls him the great god Attis, and Lucian mentions a golden statue of Attis placed among those of Bendis, Anubis, and Mithras, who were all adored as the sun. He is often represented with Cybele in ancient monuments, and is sometimes pictured alone, holding a pastoral pipe in his right hand and a crook in his left.

ATTO, THE BLESSED, was a native of Badajoz, Spain, according to some, or of Florence, according to other writers, general of the Order of Vallombrosa, and raised to the see of Pistoia in 1133. After governing the Church for twenty years, he died in 1158. He wrote, Life of F. Gaudentius, the founder of his order (Madrid, 1612 (?)—Life of St. Bernard, Abbot of St. Sernus, Bishop of Parma and Card. —Qua S. Bernardus, etiam Cardinalis Existent, pro sua Religioni generis:—Letters:—On the Transition of the Relics and of the Miracles of St. James the Apostle. See Antonio, Bibl. Hosp. ii, 16; Negri, De Script. Florent. p. 72.

ATTOR (or Hatton), an Italian prelate, who was made in 915 bishop of Vercelli, in Piedmont, and died about the year 900, is the author of Statuta Ecclesie Vercellensis; Collectio Coronarum; De Pressuris Ecclesiasticis; Polypticus (polipticos, so called from its various contents)—A Commentary on Paulus's Epistles; Lais Arcanum. Some of these writings were published by D'Achery in his Spicilegium; a complete edition was published by count Buont di Signore (Vercelli, 1768, 2 vols. fol.). See Herzog, Real-Encyclop. s. v.; Natalis, Hist. Eccles. vi, 192; Oudin, Suppl. Script. Eccles. p. 805; Dupin, Nouvelle Bibl. vii, 37. (B. F.)

Attributes of God are the several qualities or perfections of the divine nature. Some distinguish them into the negative, and positive or affirmative. The negative are such as remove from God whatever is imperfect in creatures; such are infinity, immutability, immortality, etc. The positive are such as assert some perfection in God which is in and of himself, and which in the creatures in any measure is from him. This distinction is now mostly discarded. Some distinguish them into absolute and relative; absolute ones are such as agree with the essence of God—as Jehovah, Jah, etc.; relative ones are such as agree with him in time, with some respect to his creatures—as Creator, Governor, Preserver, Redeemer, etc. But the more commonly received distinction of the attributes of God is into communicable and incommunicable ones. The communicable ones are those of which there is some resemblance in men—as goodness, holiness, wisdom, etc.; the incommunicable ones are such as there is no appearance or shadow of in men—as independent, immutability, immensity, and eternity.—Buck. See those different articles in this work.

ATTWATER, HENRY S., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the diocese of Kansas, was born at Blanford, Mass., in 1714. He was ordained by bishop Hobart in 1829; labored faithfully and acceptably in the churches at Malone, Little Falls, and Mount Morris, N. Y., and in those at New Preston, Bethany, Kent, and Poquetannock, Conn. He died at Cedar Vale, Dec. 28, 1879. See Whittaker's Almanac and Directory, 1881.

ATTWOOD, THOMAS, a musical composer, was born in London in 1677. After receiving some elementary instruction, he was sent abroad to study at the expense of the prince of Wales, in 1788. He studied two years at Naples, and then proceeded to Vienna, where he became a favorite pupil of Mozart. On his return to Lon- don he became one of the chamber musicians to the prince of Wales. In 1790 he was chosen organist of St. Paul's, and the year following he became composer to the chapels royal. His court connection was further confirmed by his appointment as musical instructor to the duchess of York and afterwards to the princess of Wales. For the coronation of George IV he composed the anthem The King shall rejoice. In 1821 king George appointed him organist to the chapel of the prince of Wales at Brighton. Soon after the establishment of the Royal Academy of Music, Attwood was chosen one of its professors. He wrote the anthem O Lord, Grant the King a Long Life, which was performed at the coronation of William IV; and he was composing a similar work for the coronation of queen Victoria when he died, March 24, 1838. His services and anthems were published in a collected form, after his death, by his pupil Walmesley, and are frequently used in cathedral worship. See Encyclop. Brit. (9th ed.) s. v.

ATUM (or ATMU) was the Egyptian deity of the setting sun, or darkness. He was called the "Sun who reclines himself," and was represented as an erect human figure wearing a crown composed of an expanded lotus, surmounted with four upright feathers, like those on the crown of Amen-Ra. He was specially adored at Heliopolis in Lower Egypt. He is also called Tum (q. v.).

ATWATER, HORACE COWLES, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Homer, Cortland Co., N. Y., March 14, 1819. He studied for three years in the Yale Divinity School, and during these three years, being a licensed preacher of the Methodist Episcopal Church, preached in the villages of New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania. He then spent twelve years in ministerial work in connection with the Methodist denomination in southern New England, being ordained at Fall River, Mass., April 3, 1847. In 1857 he went to the West, and was employed for some years in evangelistic work under the auspices of the Congregational churches. His longest settlement was in Alexandria, O., from 1861 to 1867. He labored chiefly in North Carolina and Tennessee under the direction of the Presbyterian Church, and in 1870 settled in Elizabethtown, Tenn., as state supply of the Church there, but, after the presidential election of 1876, was dismissed from this relation as a penalty for his vote for president Hayes. He died at Elizabethtown, Feb. 7, 1879. See Obituary Record of Yale College, 1879.

ATWATER, JASON, a Congregational minister, was born in Mount Carmel Society, Hamden, Conn. He studied theology in the seminary of Yale College, and was ordained as pastor in Middlebury, Conn., Oct. 20, 1830. In November, 1834, he was dismissed from this charge. After the he resided for several years in New-town and Southbury, Conn., preaching to the Congregational churches in those towns. The latter days of his life were spent in West Haven, in the town of Orange, Conn. He died April 1, 1880. See Obituary Rec- ord of Yale College, 1880.
Atwater, Noah, a Congregational minister, was born at New Haven, Conn. He graduated at Yale College in 1774, where he was a tutor from 1778 to 1781. He was ordained pastor of the Church in Westfield, Mass., Nov. 21, 1781. His last sermon was preached on the twentieth anniversary of his ordination, and was published. See Sprague, Annals of the Am. Pulp., i, 587.

Atwater, William W., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Burlington, Vt., Feb. 15, 1814. He experienced conversion in 1832, received license to exhort and preach in 1841, and in 1842 united with the Troy Conference. In 1850 he located in his native town, and for six years followed printing. He published a Vermont Directory and the Vermont Courier, a newspaper. In 1856 he was again admitted into the Conference, and continued to serve in the parsonate until 1871, when, being appointed secretary of the Vermont State Temperance Society, he retired to Burlington and commenced the publication of the Vermont Witness. He died Aug. 8, 1878. Mr. Atwater was a man of unceasing activity; he had a passion for work; was honest, fearless, pronounced, persistent, and a champion in the temperance reform. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1879, p. 44.

Atwell, James, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Montville, Conn., June 11, 1737. He experienced religion early in life, and in 1762 entered the travelling connexion of the Oneida Conference. In this relation he labored until a few years before his death. Mr. Atwell excelled as a pastor; visiting the lowly, warning the ungodly, comforting the poor and distressed, and enlightening the doubting. He was a man of warm affections, sound common-sense, and well versed in theology. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1860, p. 167.

Atwell, John, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Grafton, N. H., March 26, 1788. He experienced conversion in early life, and in 1810 entered the East Maine Conference, in which he labored faithfully until 1859, when he became superannuated, and retired to Orono, Me., where he died, May 30, 1868. Mr. Atwell was a practical, diligent, devout, fluent, accepted minister. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1869, p. 142.

Atwell, Paul P., M. D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Haverhill, N. H., March 28, 1801. He experienced religion at the age of twenty-three while pursuing a medical education; received license to preach in his twenty-eighth year; and in 1833 entered the Troy Conference, which he served faithfully for fourteen years, and then, on account of infirmity, resumed the practice of medicine. In 1850 he retired to Schuylerville, where he died, June 13, 1873. Mr. Atwell was a good man, true to God and his Church. He was an able minister, and much beloved. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1874, p. 65.

Atwill, William, a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the diocese of Western New York, was born in Elmira, N. Y., and was ordained as a priest in the Diocese of Long Island. He was rector of St. John's Church, Bath, N. Y., from 1866 to 1887, and was later a rector of St. Andrew's Church, Bath, N. Y., from 1887 to 1897. He died in 1897. He was known for his eloquence and his dedication to the Church.

Atwood, Anson S., a Congregational minister of Connecticut, was born at Woodbury, Aug. 1, 1790, and graduated at Yale in 1814. After spending some time in home missionary labor, he accepted a call from the Church at South Mansfield, where he was ordained in 1819. This was his only pastorate—one of almost forty-three years. During this period, he had seven revivals, and received into the Church four hundred and twenty-one persons. He died at East Hartford, July 22, 1866. Mr. Atwood was firm in his convictions of duty and in his opinions, a faithful preacher and laborious pastor, with a slight dash of eccentricity in his manner. See Cong. Quarterly, 1866, p. 389.

Atwood, John, a Baptist minister, was born at Hudson, N. H., Oct. 8, 1736. He was a graduate in the theological class connected with Waterville College in 1822. For two or three years subsequent to his graduation he preached as a supply in Readfield, Me., and in New London and Pittsfield, N. H. His ordination took place in New Boston, N. H., May 18, 1825. Here he was at one time a selectman, and subsequently became pastor of the Church in Fanchester, and held the office one year; then removed to Hillsborough, where his ministry covered a period of seven years. About the year 1847 he was elected State treasurer, and was in office six years, during a part of which time he served as chaplain of the State–prison. The Democratic party in New Hampshire, in 1851, nominated him as their candidate for governor of the State. Having given offence to the party by the utterance of his free-soil sentiments, he was abandoned by them. For about twenty years he lived on his farm in New Boston, occasionally preaching, as opportunity presented, until his death, which occurred April 29, 1873. Mr. Atwood was highly respected for character and talent. See Supplement No. 1 to the Colby University Hist. Record, p. 6. (J. C. S.)

Atwood, Thomas, a Baptist minister, was born at Plymouth, Mass., not far from the year 1810. In early life he followed the sea, and became first officer of several merchant-ships. Soon after the excitement connected with mining in California commenced, he went, in 1849, to the Pacific Coast, with a company made up of persons residing in the Old Colony, and there he remained for ten years. While there he was ordained to the work of the ministry, and spent several years in this capacity at Stockton, and labored as an evangelist among the miners. In 1859 he came back to the East, and for nearly twenty-five years he devoted himself, with but little cessation, to his ministerial work. His settlements, during this period, were in each of the New England states, Vermont and Maine excepted, and in the State of New York. He met with abundant success as a preacher of the Gospel, and witnessed repeated revivals of religion. He died at Marshfield, Mass., in the summer of 1880. See The Watchman, Sept. 16, 1880. (J. C. S.)

Aubemont, Jean Antoine, was a Dominican of the Low Countries, who took the habit at twenty years of age, in 1632, at Ghent. He studied at Cologne, and taught philosophy at Louvain, where he took his doctor's degree in 1632. Afterwards he was made apostolic missionary in Holland. He died suddenly in 1666, leaving many works, among them, Orationum Per. Tomam de Aquino (Louvain, 1639, 4to).—Druidibus quaeris de Primatu, Authoritate, et Infallibilitate R. Pont. Tridentatur, Lovainenses, etc. (Liege, 1652, 4to).—Praemissae Historiae Apud Hieronymum et Etiam de Hostieitate Ecclesiast. Declarationem Parisiis, 1652, facsim. (Cologne, 1683, 8vo).—A new edition of the Life of St. Rose of Lima, by P. Leo (Louvain, 1688, 12mo), etc.

Aubert, St. See Audebertus.

Aubert, bishop of Avranches, lived in the early half of the 8th century. He founded Mont St. Michel, with which according to the custom of the time of leg- end is connected. Here he at first established a monastery; then the Benedectines. The body of St. Aubert was interred at Mont St. Michel. Being discovered more than three hundred years later, these remains attracted numerous pilgrims, among others Louis XI, who established on this occasion the Order of St. Michel. See Hoefer, Nouv. Dict. Générale, s. v.
AUBERT

Aubert, Augustin, a French portrait, historical, and landscape painter, was born at Marseilles in the year 1781. His principal subjects are from sacred history, and are held in considerable estimation in France.

Aubert, Michel, a Parisian painter and historical engraver, was born in 1700. He died in 1757. Some of his principal plates are, The Circumcision, after Ciro Ferri.—St. Francis, after Guido.—The Reconciliation of the Exiles, after C. Leblanc.—Portraits: Edmund, Queen of England; Charles Emmanuel, Duke of Savoy; Charles Stuart.

Aubery, Antoine, a celebrated French parliamentary advocate, died in February, 1655. He published, a General History of the Cardinals (vol. i, 1642). In the following years he published four other volumes, and dedicated all to cardinal Mazarin, who, in return, granted him a pension. In 1649 he published a work on the pre-eminence of the kings of France over the emperor and the king of Spain—a Life of Cardinal Joyeuse (1634)—a Life of Cardinal Richelieu (1660)—a Treatise on the Dignity of Cardinal (1678)—a Treatise on the Pope (cit. 1678)—and a Life of Cardinal Mazarin (1695). See Biog. Universelle, iii, 5; Dupin. 17th Cent.

Aubespine, Gabriel de l’, a French prelate, was born in Paris, Jan. 26, 1759. He was the son of Guillaume d’Aubespine, baron of Châteaueneuf. In 1604 he succeeded his kinsman, Jean d’Aubespine, in the bishopric of Orleans. He inherited a talent for negotiation, and a spirit so successful that many affairs were intrusted to him. He assisted at the assembly of the bishops of the province of Sena in 1612, and there signed, with regret, the condemnation of the famous book of Richer. He died at Grenoble, Aug. 15, 1630. He wrote, De Veteribus Ecclesie Ritus (1623):—De L’ancienne Police de l’Eglise sur l’Administration de l’Eglise;—Notes upon the canon of the several councils collected by Labbe:—also Notes upon Tertullian and upon Ophthalmia of Milevia. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Generale, s. v.

Aubin, St., bishop of Angers, was born at Vannes, Brittany, in 469. He retired to the Monastery of Cincilias, since called Tintillant, of which he afterwards became abbot, and held that office for about five years. In 528 the people of Angers almost forcibly compelled him to become their bishop, in which capacity he attended several councils; and signalized himself by his zeal against incestuous marriages, especially at the third Council of Orleans. He died in 550, and was buried first in the Church of St. Peter, but was afterwards translated to the Church of St. Stephen, and then forward called St. Aubin’s. He is commemorated March 1, the day of his death, and June 30, the day of his translation. See Baillet, March 1.

Aubin, Gabriel Jacques, a Parisian historical painter and engraver, brother of Augustin, was born in 1724. He engraved some plates from his own designs, the principal of which are, Six Statues of the Christian Virtues.—View of the Louvre Exhibition of Paintings in 1758.

Aubin, N., a French writer and Protestant minister, was born at Loudun near the middle of the 17th century. He took refuge in Holland after the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes; and published a translation of the Life of Michael Roger, by Brandt, in 1698:—Dictionnaire de Marine (Amsterdam, 1702):—Histoire des Dribbes de Loudun; ou, De la Possession des Religieuses Ursulines, et de la Condemnation et du Supplice d’Urbain Grenier, Curé de la même Ville (ibid. 1658). This author is said to have met with a great deal of success, was afterwards published under the titles of Crues Effets de la Vengeance du Cardinal de Richelieu (ibid. Roger, 1716), and Histoire d’Urbain Grandier (ibid. 1730). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Generale, s. v.

Aubrey, Thomas, a Welsh Wesleyan minister, was born at Cefn-coed-y-emer, near Merthyr-Tydvild, May 13, 1868. He was received into the ministry in 1826; soon took a prominent place among the most popular preachers of his native land; was appointed chairman of the North Wales District in 1854; continued in that capacity for eleven years; devised the North Wales Chapel Loan Fund for the relief of encumbered Church property; became a superintendent in 1865; and died at Ely, Nov. 15, 1877. "He was truly a great man, a mighty preacher, a faithful, wise, and loving pastor. His mental faculties were vigorous, penetrating, inductive, and logical. His application to study was intense, and of theology and philosophy he had a clear and comprehensive knowledge. God had endowed him with a remarkable eloquence—an eloquence calm and subdued, at other times vehemence and elevated. His native language he studied, its genius he admired; he discovered much of its neglected wealth, and wielded its oratorical force with ability and energy."—See Minutes of British Conference, 1868, p. 11.

Aubriot, Jean, a French prelate, belonged to the family of the provost of Paris, Hugh Aubriot, and was raised to the bishopric of Châlon-sur-Saône at the commencement of the year 1386. He gained great favor with the duke Eudes of Burgundy, who greatly approved of this prelate. He died in 1401, and in 1439, had made Aubriot the executor of his will. Aubriot died about 1357. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Generale, s. v.

Aubry, Jean Baptiste, a French Benedictine of the Congregation of St. Vannes, was born at Deyvillier, near Epinal, in 1836, and became prior of the house of Commercy. He died about 1895. His works are, Questions Philosophiques sur la Religion Naturelle:—L’Histoire des Auteurs Stoques et Eclectiques:—Questions Metaphysiques sur l’Existence et la Nature de Dieu.

Auch, Council of (Concilium Aureum), was a council of the province called by Hugo the White, legate. It was ordered that all the churches of Gascony should pay a quarter of the tithe to the cathedral, St. Orens and a few others being exempted. See Labbe, Concil. ix, 1195.

Auchmuty, Samuel, D.D., a missionary of the Church of England, was born in Boston, Mass., in 1721. His father, Robert Auchmuty, a Scotchman, was a lawyer, and for several years a judge in the Court of Admiralty. Samuel received his education at Harvard College, graduating in 1742. Five years after he was ordained deacon by the bishop of London, and received an appointment as missionary from the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts. He became assistant to Dr. Barclay, rector of Trinity Church, New York city; and, also, was catechist to the colored population, entering upon his duties March 8, 1748. St. George’s Chapel in Beckman Street being opened in 1752, Mr. Auchmuty and the rector supplied the two churches, and both in 1764, he succeeded the late Dr. Barclay, deceased; and shortly after his induction St. Paul’s Chapel was opened for public worship. When the Revolution opened, he espoused the cause of the royal government. The American army having taken possession of the city of New York, April 14, 1776, he removed with his family to New Brunswick, N. J., where he remained until the British army, under general

H owe, regained possession of New York, in September following. Being anxious to reach the city, on account of loss of property by fire, he vainly sought to pass the American lines. Compelled to escape by night, his health suffered from the exposure; and this was eventually the cause of his death, which occurred in New York city, March 4, 1777. See Sprague, Annales of the Amer. Pulpit, vol. 1, p. 127.

Auctor, a bishop, of whom nothing further is known, is remembered as a saint in Bede's Martyrology on Aug. 9.

Audax (saint and martyr) was originally a magician, but is said to have been converted by St. Anthoni, a Ro- man virgin, and suffered for the faith by order of Faustianus, governor of the country of the Sabines, who had wished to employ him against that saint. See Bail- let, July 9.

Audebert, Ann, a martyr, was taken, on her way to Geneva, and brought to Paris; and there, by the council, adjudged to be burnt at Orleans, in 1849. When the rope was put around her neck, she called it the wedding girdle wherewith she was to be married to Christ. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 405.

Audebertus (Aubertus, Aubertus, Aub- ort, or Hauert, probably the same originally as Alber), St., bishop of Camrât and Annas in 668, is said to have been very charitable and religious. He founded many churches, and died in 668. He is comemo- ratored on Dec. 16.

Audenaerd (or Oudenaarde), Robert Van, a Flemish painter and engraver, was born at Ghent in 1663, and died there in 1745. He studied first under Francis Van Mierop, and subsequently with John Cleer. When quite young, he visited Rome, and studied with Carlo Maratti, under whose instruction he became a reputable historical painter. He painted several pic- tures for the churches of Ghent, among which is the great altar-piece in the Church of the Carthusians, representing St. Peter appearing to the monks of that order, considered his best work. In the Church of St. Januarius in a picture of St. Catherine Refusing to Worship the False Gods. The following are some of his principal plates: Portraits — Cardinal Sacripinti (1693); Cardinal Taruri; Cardinal Ottoboni. Subjects after different Italian masters — Hagar in the Desert; The Sacrifice of Abraham; Rebecca and the Servant of Abraham; David with the Head of Goliath.

Audentius, a Spanish bishop and theologian, probably lived in the second half of the third century. According to Gennadius, he wrote a treatise De Fide aedius Hereticos, in which he vindicated the Trin- ity against the Manicheans, Sabellians, Arians, and Photinians. Audience, a court formerly held by the archbishops of either province of England; that of Canterbury was removed from the palace to the Consistory Place of St. Paul's. All cases, whether contentious or voluntary, which were reserved for the archbishop's hearing were tried here; and the evidence was prepared by officers called auditors. When the court was no longer held in the palace, the jurisdiction was exercised by the mas- ter and official of the Audiencia. He is now represented by the vice-general, official of the Archbs and Audiencia, whose court was held in the hall of Doctors' Com- mons.

Audifax (saint and martyr), was the son of St. Marius and Martha, also martyrs. He is commemorated on Jan. 20.

Auditor, in ecclesiastical phrase, is (1) a judge of the tribunal of the Rota at Rome; (2) of the Apostolic Chamber at Rome (Auditor Caerum Apostolicam); (3) of the court at Rome.

Audley, Edmund, an English prelate, was educated at Lincoln College, Oxford, and in 1463 took the degree of A.B. In 1471 he became prebendary of Faren- don in the Church of Lincoln, and in October, 1475, attained a like prebendary in the Church of Wells. In the same year, on Christmas-day, he was made archdeacon of the East Riding of Yorkshire; in 1480 he was promoted to the bishopric of Rochester, and in 1492 was translated to Hereford; thence to Salisbury in 1502. About this time he was made chancellor of the Most Noble Order of the Garter. In 1518 he gave four hundred pounds to Lincoln College, and bestowed upon the same house the patronage of a chantry, which he had founded in the cathedral church of Salisbury. He contributed also to St. Mary's Church in Oxford. He died Aug. 23, 1524, at Ramsbury, in the County of Wilts.

Audradius Modicus, chorosignis of Sens, lived in the 9th century, and is chiefly celebrated for the visi- ons which he claimed to have had relating to the sus- pension of the intestine hostile then prevailing in France. He visited Rome on that errand in 849. He was deposed, together with the other Gallican chorosignis, by a Council of Paris. His prophecies, or visions, were committed to writing, and will be found in Duchesne's Collection of French Historians, and in the Collection of Dom Bouquet, viii, 389. Audran, Benoît, a French engraver, was born at Lyons in 1661, and was the second son of Germain Au- dran, from whom he at first received instruction. He afterwards studied under his uncle, the celebrated Gérard Audran. He was a member of the Academy of Painting, and was appointed engraver of the Mint. He died in 1721. The following are some of his principal religious subjects after various masters: The Baptism of Jesus Christ; The Rope of Dejounia; Moses and the Brazen Serpent; The Saviour with Martha and Mary; St. Paul Preaching at Ephesus; The Elevation of the Cross.

Audran, Charles, a Parisian engraver, brother of the elder Claude, was born in 1594. He visited Rome, when quite young, for improvement. He after- wards returned to France and settled in Paris, where he had wonderful success. He died in 1674. The following are a few of his principal sacred subjects after different masters: The Baptism of Christ; The Stoning of Stephen; The Conception of the Virgin Mary; The Virgin Mary and Infant Jesus Treading on the Serpent.

Audran, Claude, a French painter, third son of Claude, Sr., was born at Lyons in 1644, and died at Paris in 1684. He was employed by Lebrun in sev- eral sketches. His principal sacred pictures are, The Beheading of John the Baptist, and The Miracle of the Five Loaves. See Hoefer, Nouve. Biog. Générale, v.
AUGER

Auderan, Gérard (or Gérard), a celebrated French engraver, the son of Claude the elder and the nephew of Charles, was born at Lyons in 1640. He probably studied under Carlo Maratti. He resided in Paris three years, and executed a portrait of Clement IX, which gained him so much reputation that the great Colbert, himself a liberal patron of the arts, invited Audran to return to Paris. After his return, he was seen carousing with the engraver to the king. He may be said to have carried the art to its highest perfection, especially in his large historical plates. He died in 1703. The following are a few only of his principal plates: Portraits and subjects from his own designs—Pope Clement IX, of the family of Raspeigulli; Andrea Ar- gol, Marchese di Torcelli; St. Paul Walking on the Sea; The Woman Taken in Adul- ter y; The Descent of the Holy Ghost. See Spooner, Bibi. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Bibl. Générale, s. v.

Auderan, Jean, a French engraver, was born at Lyons in 1667. He was the brother of Benoît, and the second son of Germain Audran. In 1707 he was appointed engraver to the king, with apartments in the Gobelin. He gained a high reputation, and died in 1756. He engraved some of the chief sacred works after various masters: Our Saviour in the Dark Preaching; The Infant Saviour Regarding the Cross Presented by Angels; The Miracle of the Loaves; The Resurrection of Lazarus; The Resurrection of Christ; The Descent from the Cross; The Disciples at Emmaus. See Spooner, Bibi. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Bibl. Générale, s. v.

Auderan, Louis, a French engraver, third son of Jermaine, was born at Lyons in 1670. He first studied under his father, but finally under his uncle Gérard. He died at Paris in 1712. His chief sacred work is The Massacre of the Innocents. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bibl. Générale, s. v.

AUDRY. See ALDRICUS.

Audry (or Etheldreda), saint and virgin, queen of Northumberland and abbess of Ely, was the daughter of Anna, king of the East Angles, who was slain in battle by the pagans in 634. Although twice married—first to Tumbert, a king of the East Angles, and secondly to Egfrid, king of Northumberland—she preserved, as has been said, her virgin state, and obtained leave of her second husband to retire into the monastery of Beltingham. She afterwards built a monastery on the Isle of Ely, in the river Ouse, which had been granted to her by Tumbert. Thomas of Ely, in his Historia Elenisii, says that this took place in the year 673, and that St. Audry collected both monks and nuns, and was made first abbess by St. Wilfrid of York. She died June 29, 679, and was honored by the Church of England as a saint within a short period of her death. See Bailliet, June 23; Anglia Sacra, 1, 594; Godwin, De Prax. Angl. p. 247.

Audumla (or Audhumbla), in Norse mythology, was a cow which arose when the ice in Ginnung-ga, the Northern Chaos, thawed. This cow licked the salt icebergs and thus created the first god, Buri, the latter produced Börr, who was the father of Odin. The giant Ymir was nourished by her milk.

Audur, in Norse mythology, was the son of the dark Nuit (night) and of Naglari (air or ether). It is unknown in what relation his name, Audur (matter), stands to the doctrine of the creation.

Aufer, John Gottlieb, S.T.D., a missionary bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church for Cape Palmas, Africa, and parts adjacent, resided, in 1865, in Gambier, O, and the year following removed to Philadelphia. In 1867 he was appointed missionarv to Cape Palmas; in 1870 he was also appointed to St. Carol's, and in this station was elected, in 1872, bishop of the African Mission. He was consecrated in St. John's Church, Georgetown, D. C., April 17, 1870. He died Feb. 16, 1874, aged forty-one years. See Prof. Episc. Almame, 1875, p. 144.

Auerbach, David, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Limburg, Sept. 2, 1668. He studied at Leipsic and Wittneben, was in 1624 bachelor of theology, and in 1639 professor extraordinary. In 1640, when he was called as superintendent to Borna, he received the degree of doctor of divinity, and he died April 14, 1647. He wrote, Dissertatio Theolog. de Regi- lione Coegendi (Lipsiae); De Tractationibus Scripta Pontificiorum (ibid.); —De Vitis Christianorum Oppositis Votis Monastici (ibid. 1624); —De Dicto Hab- dice, ii, 3 (ibid. 1635); —Requiesci Tractatus Calculini quem M. Auerbach, Isaac Levin, a Jewish rabbi of Germany, was born at Inowraczlaw, in the duchy of Posen, about the year 1785. His primary education he received, according to the custom of the time, in the Talmudic schools of his country. At an early age he went to Berlin in order to acquire a more liberal education. For a long time he stood at the head of a Jewish girls' school in Berlin and for one forty years he was the leader of the Btder Society. He was one of the first to introduce regular preaching into the German synagogues, and for over a quarter of a century he acted as preacher of the synagogue at Leipsic. He died at Dessau, July 6, 1858. He published, Sinus dei sollicitio, a very fine work on Hebrew and cabalistic language for which he received the diocese of Berlin, the order of a doctor of the reverend father in Berlin, and the order of an honorary officer in the imperial service. He died at Dessau, July 6, 1858. He published, Sinus dei sollicitio, a very fine work on Hebrew and cabalistic language, 1833, etc. See Fürst, Bibl. Augendus, a Carthaginian (Cyprian, Ep. 41) who joined against Cyprian in the faction of Felici- nunus. In Epist. 42 he is excommunicated by bishop Caldonius, along with Repostus, Irene, Paulus, So- phonius, and Solissius. Possibly the same Augendus (id. Ep. 44) reappears as a deacon of Novatians sent to Come by the bishop of Sutri under the name of Mutius. In his case he would, after his excommunication, accompany Novatus to Rome and join Novatian, and return, as Novatus did, to push the Novatianist cause against Cyprian.

Auger, Edmond, a French Jesuit, was born in 1530 at Allemann, in the province of Tuyeres. He became a Jesuit at Rome under St. Ignatius. He taught classical studies in Italy, and went to France in order to devote himself to the conversion of the Protestants. He was arrested at Valencia by the baron Des Adrets, and condemned to be executed, but was finally saved on account of his eloquence and power. One can but admire his zeal at Lyons in the midst of the pestilence. He became confessor and preacher of King Henry III, after whose death his superiors sent him to Italy. He was very fierce against the Huguenots, whom he tried to convert by all means. That he converted 40,000 Huguenots near Lyons is more than exaggeration. He died at Como, June 17, 1591. He wrote, Le Pédagogue d'Armés au service de l'Arme divine par lequel il propose de réveiller et achever heureusement une bonne guerre victorieuse de tous les ennemis de son État et de l'Église (Lyons, 1658): —Des Souvenans de L'Eglise Catholique (Paris, 1657): —Catechismus Parvus, h.e. Augmentation is a term in Scotch ecclesiastical law denoting a portion of the ancient tithes placed under the superintendence of the Court of Session, and granted by them to an incumbent, as they shall see cause. The ordinary way of obtaining it is to raise a process before the courts.

While the appropriations were in the hands of monks and other ecclesiastical persons or bodies, the bishop had power to augment the endowment given by such proprietors to the vicarages of churches where they held the tithes and profits; nor is there any reason to doubt that the bishops in the present day possess the same power over appropriations, both lay and clerical. Such was the opinion of the law officers given to Morton, bishop of Durham. See Watson, p. 140, 305; Johnson, Clergyman's Vade-mecum, p. 82; Kenney, On Improprations, p. 145.

Augsburg, COUNCILS OF (Concilium Augustanum), Augsburg (Augusta Vindelicorum) is a city of Swabia, and capital of a principality belonging to Bavaria, situated on the left bank of the Wertach river, thirty miles north-west of Munich. Two councils were held there.

I. Held on Aug. 7, 952. Twenty-four bishops from Germany and Lombardy were present at it, among whom Ulrich, bishop of Augsburg, was the most illustrious. The council passed eleven canons. It was forbidden to all the clergy, from the bishop to the subdeacon, to marry, or to have women in their houses, or to keep dogs or birds for sporting, or to play at any game of chance. The sixth canon orders that all monks shall submit to the bishop of the diocese and receive his correction. See Labbe, Concil. ix, 635.

II. Held Nov. 12, 1548, by cardinal Orth, bishop of Augsburg, at Dillingen, on the Danube. Thirty-three regulations were drawn up relating to discipline and morality. Among other things, it was ordered that open sinners should be proceeded against canonically, and that those who were found incorrigible should be handed over to the grand-vicar; that the deans of chapters should watch over the conduct of the canons, and be careful to punish those who were guilty of drunkenness, gaming, debauchery, fornication, etc.; that those who were possessed of many benefices should resign all but one within a year; that those of the monks who neglected their rule and covered their drunkenness or immodest conduct, or who were suspected of heresy, should be corrected; that nuns and other female religious should not leave their nunneries, nor suffer any man to enter them unless for some absolute necessity; that preachers should not advance untruth or doubtful; that they should accommodate their sermons to the capacity of their hearers; that they should avoid all obscure and perplexing subjects; that one uniform order should be observed in the administration of the sacraments, and no money be taken for the same, according to the apostolical tradition at the council of Trent, ancient canons, laws, and usages; that none but serious tones should be played upon organs; that everything profane should be entirely done away with in all solemn processions. See Labbe, Concil. xiv, 567.

AUGELUS (Augerius, or Augustus), an alleged martyr in Britain, bishop of Augusta or London, under Diocletian (Mart. prol. Feb. 8).

AUGUR, an officer, among the ancient Romans, who performed duties of a priestly kind in their state. According to Roman law, one of the Roman patricians was said to have appointed a college of augurs, three in number. To these Numia afterwards added two. The Oulquinian law, passed B.C. 300, increased the number to nine, of them being chosen from the plebeians. In the time of the dictator Sulla they rose to fifteen, a number which continued until the reign of Augustus, when their number was declared unlimited except by the authority of the emperor. One of them devoted his office during life, and was distinguished by wearing a long purple robe reaching to the feet and thrown over the left shoulder. On solemn occasions a garland was worn upon the head. The chief duties of augurs were to observe and report supernatural signs. The auguries were also the repositories of the supranatural law, and had to advise on the expiation of prodigies and other matters of religious observance. The sources of their art were threefold: first, the formulas and traditions of the college, which in ancient times met on the nones of every month; secondly, the augurala libros, books of the augurs, which were extant even in Seneca's time; thirdly, the commentaria augurum, commentaries of the augurs, such as those of Messala and of Appius Claudius Pulcher, which seem to have been distinguished from the former as the treatises of learned men from received writings. The college of augurs was finally abolished in the time of the emperor Theodosius. See DIVINATION.

Augustales, an order of priests instituted by the Roman emperor Augustus, whose duty it was to preside over the worship paid to the Lares Augustales. The same name was borne by another order of priests appointed by Tiberius to manage the worship paid to Augustus. They were chosen by lot from the principal persons of Rome, and were twenty-one in number. Similar priests were appointed to attend to the worship paid to other emperors who were deified after their death. The management of the worship was committed to the Sodales Augustales, while the sacrifices and other parts of the worship were performed by the Flaminia Augustales.

AUGUSTI, FRIEDRICH ALBRECHT (originally Joshua ben-Abraham Eschel), a Lutheran minister of Germany, was born June 30, 1691, at Frankfort-on-the-Oder. His Jewish parents educated him according to their own. While yet a boy, he expressed a desire to go to Jerusalem. At that time a man by the name of Jechuel had come to Frankfort with a view of collecting money for his coreligionists in the Holy Land, who urged the boy's parents not to oppose his wishes. Permission having been obtained, he both stayed for some time in the Holy Land, but on the way our young traveller was attacked by a gang of Tartar robbers and made a slave. A coreligionist from Podolia redeemed him and set him free. From Smyrna he went to Poland, and continued his studies at Cracow and Prague. He returned to Frankfort before he undertook a journey to Italy; but arrived in Sandershausen, on the night of Nov. 25, 1729, he was maltreated by a gang of robbers who had broken into the house in which he resided. On the following morning he was found, to all appearance, lifeless. He recovered, however, and during his continued stay at Sandershausen, he became acquainted with the superintendent of that place, the Rev. Dr. Reinhard, who finally became the instrument of leading Joshua to Christ. On Christmas-day, 1732, he was baptized under his new Christian name, his sponsors being the reigning princess and the prince Augustus of Schwartzburg-Sondershausen, the duke of Saxe-Gotha, the duchess of Brunswick-Wolfenbüttel, and the princess-palatine Charlotte Christina. After his baptism, he decided on the study of divinity. He entered the gymnasium at Gotha, and in 1727 he commenced his theological studies at Jena and Leipzig. In 1729 he was appointed lecturer at the gymnasium in Gotha, and in 1734 minister of the parishes of the duchy of Saxe-Gotha, where he preached until his death, May 13, 1782. Augusti wrote Disa de Avventos Christi Necessitate (Lips. 1794) — Atporiosi de Studii Judeo-Augustin, Michael of Saint, a Carmelite, was born at Breslau in 1621. He took the habit in 1638, and was the master of the novices, prior, and three times provincial of his order. He wrote, Introductio in Terram Carmeli, etc. (Brussels, 1652; also in Dutch): Institutionum Mysticae Libri IV (Antwerp, 1671, 4to):—The Life of the Venerable Fr. Arnold: and other works.

Augustine of Pavia (Ticinensis), a regular canon of the Congregation of Lateran in that city, died about 1520, leaving Vita B. Monisce, the mother of St. Augustine:—Eucharistia Christianarum Religionem:—Regula Sanctissimi Patris Augustini (all at Brescia, 1511). He is also said to have written Compendium Speculii Cruici, a commentary on the Psalm Deus in nomine Domino, and a Treatise on Learned Ignorance (Milan, 1606). His Chronicon Augusti remains unpublished. See Cave, Historia Literaria, ii, app. p. 224.

Augustine of the Virgin Mary, a Carmelite, was born at Léon, in Brittany, and took the vows at Rennes in 1640. He wrote, among other works, Theologia Thomistica Cursus (Paris, 1660, 6 vols. 12mo):—Privilegia omnium Religiosarum (Lyons, 1661, 8vo).

Augustine's Oak, CONFERENCES AT, BETWEEN Augustine of Canterbury and the British bishops.

I. In A.D. 602 or 608, and probably at Aust on the Severn, or some spot near to it, with a view to induce the British bishops to give up their Easter Rule and to co-operate with Augustine in preaching to the Saxons. The first conference was only preliminary (Augustine, however, working a miracle at it, according to Bede) and led to

II. A more formal conference, shortly after, in the same year, at the same place, at which seven British bishops were present, with "many learned men," especially from Bangor monastery (near Chester), then under Dudo as its abbot. On this occasion Augustine limited his demands to three, conformity in keeping Easter and in the baptismal rite, and co-operation in preaching to the Saxons; suppressing, if Bede's account is complete, all claim to the jurisdiction which Gregory the Great had bestowed upon him over the British bishops and saying nothing of the tonsure, but disgusting the Britons by refusing to stand up at their approach—a token, according to the words of a certain anchorite whom they had consulted, that he was not a man of God, and therefore was not to be followed. The conference accordingly broke up without any other results, and when Augustine returned to Canterbury he wrote some angry words, which unfortunately came true a dozen years afterwards, when he was dead, in the slaughter of the Bangor monks at Chester. The baptismal differences have been supposed to relate to trine immersion; by others to have referred to the washing of the feet, which the Britons are supposed to have attached to baptism; but both are conjectures only.

Augustinians (Augustiniani, Augustinians), (1) the name given to those schools and divines who profess to follow the doctrine of St. Augustine on the subject of grace and predestination. They were divided into Rigid and Mitigated. See Augustinian Monks. (2) Heretics of the 16th century, followers of the teaching of one Augustine, a premonstratian. (3) Disciples of Augustine Marlorat (q. v.), an apostate monk of the Order of Augustines.

Augustino (properly Augustin), Antonio, a Spanish prelate, was born at Saragossa, Feb. 25, 1516, of noble parents. He studied at various universities both in Spain and Italy, and acquired a high reputation in the civil and canon law, in languages, ecclesiastical history, etc. In 1547 he was made bishop of the Rota, and in 1564 Julius III sent him as his nuncio into England. Paul IV made him bishop of Alifa, and in 1558 he became bishop of Lerida, in Spain. He attended the Council of Trent in 1562 and 1574, and in this last year was made archbishop of Tarra- gona, in which he governed till his death, in 1586. He is considered one of the greatest men that Spain has produced, and his piety and wisdom were equal to his learning. The following is a list of such of his works as relate to ecclesiastical subjects: III Anquet Collectionum Decretalium, cum Notis (Paris, 1610, 1631, fol.); Constitutiones Processuallae et Synodales Tarra- gonianum (Tarragona, 1589, 4to.); Causes Notas Prostatiuallae, cum Notis (ibid. 1582; Paris, 1641); this edition contains also the following work: *Epitome Juris Pontificii, in 3 pts. (Rome, 1611, 1614; Paris, 1641, 2 vols. fol.); *De quibusdam Vocatium Canonum Ecclesiatricum Consistoriorum Judicature et Censura, contained in pt. ii of the preceding work: De Emendatione Gratiani (Tarragona, 1586; Paris, 1672, 8vo, with the notes of Stephen Baluze); Bibliothea Ant. Augustini Librorum M.S.S. Graec. et Latina. Index (Tarragona, 1586, 4to.); *Epistola ad Hieron. de Caesur. Augustino (or Agostino), Giuseppe, a Jesuit of Palerno, born in 1573, left Nucleus Canumi Consistencii, etc. (Palerno, 1638, 1640), and two volumes of Commentaries on the Summa of St. Thomas.

Augustino (Agostino), Ottavio d', a priest of Palermo, doctor in theology and apostolic prothonotary, was born in 1615. He refused the bishoprics of Lipari, Massa, and Ischia, but held, among other appointments, that of consoler of the Congregation of the Index at Rome. He died in 1682, leaving works in Italian and Latin of no great importance.

Augustinus Patricius (1), of the family of Ficcolomini, bishop of Pienza in the 15th century, wrote the Life of Fabianus Buxminus and an Account of the Reception of the Emperor Frederick I by Paul II at Rome, both of which are given by Mabillon in his Museum Italicum, i, 251. He also wrote a work on the ceremonies of the Church of Rome, entitled *Ceremonia, in Sacerdotum, in which Marcellus, archbishop of Cons, afterwards attributed to himself. Mabillon gives this book also. See Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, app. p. 193; Dupin, Hist. Eccles. Writers, iii, 76.

Augustinus Patricius (2), Caves makes to be the same with the last, but Dupin expressly says is different from him, and that he was secretary of cardinal Ficcolomini. He flourished about 1490, and wrote a History of the Assembly of Rome till his death, when he was present with the cardinal whom Paul II sent to disobey the command of the German against the Turks. He also wrote, at the desire of his master, a History of the Councils of Basle and Florence, which is given in Labbe, xiii, 1498. See Cave, Historia Literaria, XI.—9
Ault, Horatio, an English Congregational minister, was born at Uttoxeter, Nov. 9, 1806. When about the age of ten he joined the Independent Church at Lichfield, and began preaching in the neighboring villages. A few years later Mr. Ault removed to Derby, where he devoted himself earnestly to Christ's service. In 1835 he removed to Repton, and in the following year was ordained. Here he labored twenty years. In 1854 he was invited to Killarney, where he remained fourteen years, only leaving it when his health failed. His death occurred on June 4, 1871, at Scaldwell, near Northampton, where he had gone in 1868 for rest and recuperation. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1872, p. 304.

Ault, William, an English Wesleyan missionary, was converted in early life, entered the ministry in 1809, and in 1815 sailed as one of six missionaries who were to introduce Methodism into Ceylon. On the passage Ault's wife died, and her remains were committed to the deep. Mr. Ault was sent to Batticaloa, a small island on the east coast of Ceylon. His sufferings and privations on this passage hitchhiker severely tried him. He had to remove, of eight months, when he sank under disease (April 1, 1815), "Possessing rare qualifications for the work he had undertaken, his success in raising a respect for and an observance of at least the external form of religion was truly remarkable. . . . By the establishment of eight schools for the education of Hindu children, and by his overtures to the prejudices of the Brahmins, he contributed to succeed in introducing the New Test, as the only school-book of the more advanced scholars, he has laid the foundation for the propagation of our faith" (Ceylon Govt. Gazette). See Harvey, Cyclop. of Missions, 1854, p. 234 sq.; Minutes of British Conference, 1816.

Annacharius (or Annarius), St., bishop of Auxerre, was of a rich and noble family of Orleans. After living some time in the court of Burgundy, he placed himself under the discipline of Syagrius, bishop of Autun. He made such advances in knowledge and piety that in 571 or 572 he was chosen to succeed St. Eucherius, bishop of Auxerre. In 578 he convened a synod of the abbots and priests of his diocese, in which fifty-two canons of discipline were drawn up. He died Sept. 25, 605, on which day his festival is marked in the martyrologies. His remains were buried at Auxerre; but were afterwards disinterred and enclosed in a golden chest, which was plundered by the Hungarians in 1567. The relics, partially dispersed, are said to have been preserved in a hollow pillar in the crypt. See Baillet, Sept. 25.

Aundlang. The cosmogony of the ancient Norse people speaks of a threefold heaven. The lowest, in which the deities and heroes dwell until the destruction of the world, is called Asgard; the second is Aundlang, in which the Assass, as many as survive the great and frightful battle with the sons of Muspelheim after the great night Ragnarok, will dwell; and Gimbol is the third and real heaven.

Aupert. See ANSERBAT.

Aurae (the airs), a sort of aerial beings resembling the sylphs of modern poetry. Their chief discrimination is the veil they either hold in their hands or else wave over their heads. They usually occur on the painted ceilings of the ancients.

Aurand, Henry, a Presbyterian and Reformed minister, was born at Reading, Pa., Dec. 4, 1805. He entered Princeton Seminary in 1824, and remained there a little more than one year; he then left and took a collegiate course at Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pa., where he graduated in 1830. He next studied theology with Dr. George Duffield, of Carlisle. During the years 1831 and 1832 he taught in the Deaf and Dumb Asylum in Philadelphia. He prepared to labor in the German Reformed Church, and was licensed and ordained by the council of Zunkau. In 1834 he accepted a call to become pastor of the German Reformed Church at Carlisle, where he was installed, and labored fifteen years; in 1849 became pastor of what was termed the Benders and Bender'sville charge, in Adams Co., Pa., consisting of no less than seven churches, scattered around so as to be about eight miles distant from each other. His usual Sabbath work for nearly seven years was a ride of about twenty miles and three sermons. In 1856 he removed to New Berlin, Pa., and for nearly two years had charge of the German Reformed Church at that place. About 1858 he began to preach in the New Galistown Church in New Galistown, Pa. After preaching here nearly two years, he removed to Columbus, N. Y., and took charge of the Reformed Dutch Church, which he served until the spring of 1863, and then removed to Illinois. Here he had no regular field of labor, but filled vacancies here and there for a short time. In 1865, he went to Fulton County to supply several destitute places with the Gospel, expecting to be gone three months. He was soon taken ill, and returned to his home at the end of four weeks, and died Oct. 8, 1876. He was a true and faithful minister of Christ, and was never so happy as when preaching the Gospel. See Necrology of Princeton Theological Seminary, 1877, p. 29; Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America, p. 168.

Aurbode, in Norse mythology, was a giantess, the wife of the giant Gymer, and mother of the most beautiful giant maiden Gerda, whom Freir chose as his wife.

Aurea (1), saint, virgin, and martyr, was a Spanish nun in a monastery near Cordova. Her parents, who were Saracens, themselves, in 596, carried her before the judgment seat and accused her of being a Christian. For a moment she was frightened, but she promised everything, but quickly repented, and evinced the firmest determination to abide in the true faith; whereupon she was beheaded, July 19, 586. See Baillet, July 19.

Aurea (2), St., abbess of St. Martial at Paris in the time of Dagobert I and Clovis II. St. Eligius in 633 founded a nunnery at Paris in honor of St. Martial of Limoges, where he gathered together three hundred nuns and placed them under the conduct of St. Aurea, who governed them until the year 666, when, together with one hundred and sixty of the sisters, she died of the plague. Her body is preserved in the Church of St. Martial, which afterwards was dedicated in part under the name of St. Eligius, and given to the hospital.

Aurelia, saint and virgin, was a relative of St. Adrians, martyred at Rome in the year 257, who, having come from Greece, passed some time in watching and praying, day and night, at his tomb, at the end of which time she died, and was buried with him. She is commemorated Dec. 2. See Baillet, Dec. 2.

Aurelian, Sr., bishop of Arles, was born in that city in 499, and succeeded Auxanus in that see in 546. Pope Vigilius esteemed him so highly that he at once sent the pallium without waiting for the request, and made him his vicar and legate in the kingdom of Chiliebert. Aurelian, with the king's aid, restored and maintained discipline in the Church, and built two monasteries at Arles, besides other religious houses. In 549 he attended the Council of Orleans, and died June 16, 551. He wrote two rules for the convents he had founded, which are found in the collection of Holstein and in the Annals of Le Cointe. A letter to king Theodbert is found in Frevre and in the collection of Duchesne. Some writers erroneously credit him with Aurelius of Lyons, who lived at the end of the 9th century. See Baillet, June 16.

Aurelio, Ludovico, an Italian ecclesiastical, was a native of Pergaia and canon of St. John of Lateran. He was considered by pope Urban VIII one of the most learned historians of his age. He published an abridgment of Vincent's Universal History in 1623, another one of Baronius's Annals, and another of Bovon's great work on ecclesiastical history (9 vols. fol.). He died at Rome in 1637.

Aurelius, saint and martyr, a Spaniard, was the companion of St. George the Deacon, and was martyred by the Saracens in the 9th century.

Aurelius, St., bishop of Carthage, was born in Italy or Gaul, and retired to Italy in order to give himself up more completely to the service of God. About the beginning of the year 892 he was elected to succeed Genethlius. He was the intimate friend of St. Augustine, to whom he wrote immediately after his election to demand his prayers and counsels, and composed various homilies and labored much for the conversion of the Donatists and Pelagians. His death occurred in the year 425 or 426, and he is commemorated in the ancient calendar of the Church of Carthage on July 20. See Baillet, July 20.

Auremon, a French hagiographer, abbot of Maires, native of Channay (Poitou), lived at the close of the 6th and beginning of the 7th century. It is said that St. Junien, first abbot of Maires, predicted his birth and destiny, regarded him as his son, and instructed him in religion and literature. Auremon was ordained priest, and in 587 succeeded St. Junien as abbot of the Monastery of Maires, and followed the example of his predecessor. He wrote the Life of St. Maires, the portion of which still extant is published with that written by Boitius. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aureus Codex, a Greek MS. of the Gospels. The royal library at Stockholm has for a long time possessed this splendid codex, whose contents were not known until 1835. J. D. Böhler betook himself to the examination of the same, the results of which he published under the title Codex Aureus, sine quattuor Evangelia ante Hieronymum Latine Translatato. E Codice Mennauceo partim Purpureo ac Litteris Aureis inter extremon quinatimus et ulterius septemuncus sacram, ut videmus scripto, qui in nova Bibliotheca Voloniani acsercat. Nunc primum exanavint alque ad verbam transscripti et editi (Christiania, 1878). This codex, as the title indicates, contains four gospels (Luke xxii, 9-30 excepted) in a Latin translation before the time of Jerome. This is Mr. Belchem's opinion. Mr. Gebhardt, however, in a review of this publication in Schütter's Literaturzeitung, 1878, p. 359 sq., is rather inclined to think that this codex belongs to a later date than Jerome's Vulgate; and, to make his assertion good, he quotes a number of passages in which the Codex Aureus agrees with the Vulgate. When and where the index was written is yet an open question. After all, this publication is a valuable contribution to the text of the New Test.; and Mr. Belchem's Prolegomena, comprising fifty-six pages, contain a great deal of valuable information. See Manuskripts, Biblical, (B. P.)

Aurifex (Germ. Goldschmied) is a name common to a number of German theologians and scholars of the Reformaion period.

1. Andreas, elder brother of Johannes (1), was born in 1512 at Breslau. He studied at Wittenberg, where he enjoyed the friendship of Melanchthon. Having com- pleted his philological studies, he betook himself to the study of medicine at Padua, and after his return was appointed in 1546 court-physician to duke Albrecht of Prussia, and professor of physical sciences and medicine at the Königsberg University, who reigned the duke was very great, and he strongly influenced his lord and master in the Orientarian controversy; and this the more so since he was the son-in-law of Andreas Osiander. When he was rector of the university in 1554, the professors were appointed from the rank of Osianarians, and Andreas Osiander was deposed, even Melan- chthon's son-in-law, Salinus, having to leave. Aurifex was attacked by Flacius in 1555 in his Christliche Warnung und Vermuthung an die Kirche Christi in Preussen, who called him a dog's physician who treated the ministers of the church at his pleasure. The more he was attacked, the higher he rose in the favor of his master; and when he suddenly died, Dec. 12, 1559, the Osianarian party had lost its strongest supporter in Prussia. See Herzog, Reall-Encyklop., s. v.; Hartknoch, Preuss. Kirchengeschichte, p. 321 sq.; Baczko, in Ersch und Gruber, vi, 417.

2. Johannes (1) was born at Breslau, Jan. 30, 1517. He studied at Wittenberg, where he became greatly attached to Melanchthon. Having taken the degree of master, he commenced lecturing in the philosophical faculty, and was appointed its dean in 1548. In 1550, at the recommendation of Melanchthon, Aurifex was called to Rostock as professor of theology and pastor of St. Nicholas' Church. He delivered the first degree of doctor of theology, having presented for his thesis Disputatio de Ecolonia. In 1554 he was called to Königsberg, a time when the Orientarian controversy was in vogue. His position was a trying one. He strove to mediate between both parties, but in vain. At last he left Königsberg for his native city, in 1555, where he soon was appointed pastor of St. Elizabeth's and inspector of the churches and schools. He died Oct. 19, 1568. Aurifex was a man of great practical talent. See Baczko, in Ersch und Gruber, iv, 417; Corpus Reformat. vol. vi-x; Herzog, Reall-Encyklop., s. v.

3. Johannes (2), a zealous Lutheran, and editor of the Lutheran works, was born about the year 1519. Having studied at Wittenberg, where he attended the lectures of Luther, Melanchthon, and Bugenhagen, he acted for some time as tutor of the count of Mansfeld (1540-44), and as chaplain during the French war. After his return to Wittenberg, he labored for the cause of Luther, was made a close friend of poor Eisleben, and witnessed his death. The position which he took after his master's death was not surprising. In the controversies which soon followed, he sided with the Flacians against the Philistines, Osianarians, etc. In 1561 Aurifex was dismissed, and was appointed in 1566 pastor at Erfurt, where he died, Nov. 18, 1575. The Lutheran Church is indebted to Aurifex for the German and Latin edition of Luther's works which appeared at Jena, 1555-58. In 1562 and 1565 he published two volumes of German writings of Luther, which were waiting in the editions of Jena and Wittenberg; and in 1556 the first volume of Luther's Latin letters, which were followed by a second in 1558. In 1566 he also published Luther's Colloquio, or table-talk. See Motschmann, in Exequid. literar. (2d collection, Erfurt, 1730), p. 211 sq.; Erhard, in Ersch und Gruber, vi, 416; Bindseil, in his edition of Luther's Tischreden, ed. in connection with Forstmann, iv, p. xx sq.; Frank, Gesch. der protest. Aurifex (or Aurifius, Ital. Buonfigli), Nicholas, an Italian theologian, was born at Sienna in 1529. He belonged to the order of Carmelites and distinguished himself as a preacher. In 1560 he went to Rome, became abbot ordinary upon his return. In 1578 he became dean of the faculty, then provincial for all Tuscany. He died in 1601. Aurifex wrote, among other works, De Dignitate Vita et Moribus Clericorum (Venice, 1568; Cologne, 1610):
Aurillac, Council of Aurillac, Council of (Concilium Aurillacum).

This is a town in Haute-Anjou where two councils were held—viz. one in 1278, against exceptions (Martheo, Thev. vol. iv), and the second in 1297, under Simon, archbishop of Bourges, to afford succour to the king (ibid. p. 214).

Aurinunus, Vicenzi, an Italian theologian and Dominican, was a native of Aquila and lived in the latter half of the 17th century. He wrote, Del Corso de Morale all' alta Vite, e de' Novissimi Reggimenti chique (Vico, 1598). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aurillius, Magnus, a Swedish theologian, was born in 1673. He accompanied Charles XII to Pultowa and to Bender as chaplain, and was witness of the famous resistance which the Swedes offered to the Turks. He was also a member of the tribunal which condemned the baron of Görtz to capital punishment as the accomplice of Charles XII in his ambitious projects. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Auric, in Norse mythology, is one of the streams called Elfwægcor encasing the Poison River.

Aurinulde Verdala, born of an ancient family of Carcassonne, and bishop of Maguelone (or Montpellier) in 1339, died in 1351, leaving a Commentary or History of the Bishops of Maguelone, printed by P. Garicol in his work on the Bishops of Maguelone and Montpellier (Toulouse, 1685, 2 vols. fol.). See Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, app. p. 36.

Aurogallus, Matthias, a German philologist, who died at Wittenberg, Nov. 11, 1543, is the author of, Compendium Grammaticae Hebrew et Chaldaic (Wittenberg, 1525, 1531)—De Ebrais Usuris, Regiunum, Populorum, Fluminum, Montiaue et aliorum Locorum Notinum (ibid. 1526; enlarged ed. Basle, 1539). See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Steinschei- de, Bibliographisches Handbuch, s. v. (B. P.)

Aurora (Gr. Αὐρώα), in Greek and Roman mythology, is the goddess of twilight, who brings up the light of day from the east. She was the daughter of the Titan Hyperion and his sister Theia, or his sister Euryphaessa. She was sister to Helios (god of the sun) and to Selene (goddess of the moon). She is the constant companion of the god of the sun, opening the golden door with rosy fingers and strewing roses in his path. By Aresius she was mother of the winds Zephyr, Eurus, and Notus, and also of Hemera, the constellation. Besides this, she favored four mortals and gave birth to them children. The first was Orion, whose love she only had for a short time, as Diana slew him with her arrows; another was Clitus, son of Manlius, whom she brought to the place of the immortal gods because of his beauty; a third was Tithonus, the son of Laomedon, king of Troy; the fourth was Cephalus, whom she abducted from his wife Procris and later returned again, and by whom she had a son, Phaethon.

Auscense, Concilium. See AUCH.

Ausenda was a deity of the ancient Prussians and Lithuanians of whom little is known, but he is believed to have been implored by the sick for help.

Auska, in Slavonic mythology, is a goddess belonging to the attendants of Perun, or Frikun, the god of thunder. She personifies the heaven and evening twilight, and with Breksta, the night, she forms the period of twenty-four hours which we call day.

Ausonius, Sr., first bishop of Angoulême, was a disciple of St. Martial of Limoges, and may be called the apostle of Aquitaine. He lived in the time of the emperor Gallienus, when Chroclus, king of the Germans, made an irruption into Gaul and caused many of the faithful, among whom was Ausonius. He is commemorated June 11. See Baillie, June 11.

Auspicies (Lat. avis, a bird, and specio, to look at), originally divination by birds, but subsequently all kinds of augury. See AUGUM. Among the ancient Romans, the singing of birds, the direction of their flight, the very motion of their wings, were viewed as having a meaning which was, in some cases, capable of being explained by all, but in others only explicable by the regularly authorized augurs. Auguries were taken on every occasion of importance, such as the entering upon expeditions, the celebration of marriage, the election of magistrates, the war-making of war, and many others. At an early hour the augur went forth to an open place on the Palantine Hill, or perhaps in the Capitol, and, with his head veiled and a rod in his hand, he pointed out the divisions of the heavens and solemnly declared corresponding divisions on the earth. This augural temple, as it was called, was then separated into four parts—east and west, north and south. A sacrifice was offered, at the close of which a set form of prayer was repeated, when the signs were expected to appear. On his way home, if the augur came to a running stream, he again repeated the form of prayer and purified himself in its waters. Sometimes on a military expedition the auspices were taken from the feeding of tame birds in a cage. If on throwing them pulse they refused to eat, or uttered a cry, or fluttered with their wings, the sign was unfavorable; but if they ate with agility, striking the earth quickly and sharply with their bills, the sign was favorable. A favorable omen was sometimes obtained by previously keeping the birds without food for some time. See Divination.

Auspicius, Sr., bishop of Toul, was one of the most learned prelates of his time. He was the friend of Sidonius Apollinaris, who is mentioned in his Letters. He died in 474. The first volume of the collection of Duchesne contains an epitaph in verse of St. Auspicius, addressed to the count Arbogastes, then governor of Treves. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Auschwrey was one of the twelve deities of the ancient Prussians and Lithuanians whom they implored in time of poor harvests.

Aussigny, Thibauld d', bishop of Orleans, lived near the latter half of the 15th century. He is the one, without doubt, who conducted Villon to the prison of Meung-sur-Loire. He wrote, Histoire du Siège d'Orléans et des Fais de Jeanne la Pucelle:—Diplomates de Provinces pro Libertate Urbis Aure- lianae, which is found in the Library of the Vatican, No. 770. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.
AUSTEN, Andreas, a Reformed theologian of Germany, was born at Dantzic, July 25, 1658. He studied at different universities, and in 1685 was appointed pastor at Mollenbeck, near Rinteln. In 1686 he was appointed professor of Greek and of Oriental languages at Rinteln, and in 1690 was called to Elberfeld, where he died, Sept. 6, 1703. He wrote, Tpiaq Questiconum: An Adamus aute Exam habuerit Uzovem, qua Appellata Lilith? An karaqeluyov Nouchi fuerit Universitad an Particularia? An Moses fuerit Cornutus (Rinteln, 1685); and, in his Disputatio theologica, Michael, nunc Diamantiniopetionis, Samuelis, ex 1 Sum. xxviii (ibid. ed.); — Dies. Philol. de Velaminie Mullerius, ex 1 Cor. vii, 10 (ibid. 1690); —De Mortis Genere quo Judas Proditor Vita sua Colophonem imposit (ibid. 1688); —Theses Philolog. de Lingua Omnia Prima Hebrewa (ibid. 1690); — and Continuatione I Ioae Lingoeb Hebrews Appellationibus (ibid. 1690). Auster, in Roman mythology, is the Latin name for Nérōc, the south wind; represented as son of Aurora and Astraea. See Notus.

Austen, Benjamin, a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born in 1836. He received his theological training at Gambier, O., and was admitted to the order of deacons by bishop McLavine Aug. 21, 1850. Subsequently he was rector of the parishes in Mansfield and Pineville, O., after which he removed to Swansea, Mass., and became rector of Christ Church. Resigning his charge after a year's service, he accepted a call to the rectorship of St. James's Church in Amesbury, Mass., where he officiated for two years, and died Dec. 18, 1855. His character was marked by fervent piety. See Amer. quar. Church Rev. 1855, p. 100.

Austen, David Rogers, a Congregational minister, was born at Bridgeport, Conn., Feb. 28, 1807. He graduated at Union College in 1827, and at Yale Seminary in 1839; was ordained at Ludlow, Mass., in 1833; dismissed Sept. 5, 1836; installed at Starbridge, May 1, 1839; dismissed Oct. 1, 1841; installed at South Norwalk, Conn., May 18, 1853, and dismissed in 1866. After this he remained without charge, and died Nov. 8, 1879. See Statistics of Cong. Ministers, 1879.

Austen, James B., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Surrey County, N. C., Aug. 18, 1806. He experienced religion at the age of ten; received license to exhort in 1824, to preach in 1825, and in 1826 was admitted into the Ohio Conference. He became a supernumerary in 1848, in 1853 retired from active service, and finally settled at Logan, O., where he died, Sept. 27, 1857. Mr. Austen was a plain, practical man, uniform in piety, and an earnest, devout minister. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1855, p. 294; Simpson Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Austen, John, an English writer of the time of the Commonwealth, died in 1669. He published, The Christian Moderator; or, Persecution for Religion Condemned by William Birchly (1651) — an Answer to Tillocon's "Rule of Faith"— and other works. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Austen, Leonard, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Randolph, Vt.; died unrecorded. He professed conversion when about fifteen; received license to exhort in 1831, and in 1836 was licensed to preach and admitted into the New Hampshire Conference. In 1852 failing health compelled him to retire from the active ranks, and he died in 1865. Mr. Aus- ten was a successful preacher, though neither brilliant nor imposing. He was extremely affable, kind, and spoke with a heart-melting pathos that led hundreds to Christ. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1863, p. 103.

Austen, Lyman C., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Macon, Mich., July 3, 1846. He ex- perienced religion in his sixteenth year, and in 1869 entered the Michigan Conference. He died at Pewamo, Mich., Dec. 24, 1873. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1874, p. 107.

Austen, Richard Thomas, a Congregational minister and educator, was born at Waldoboro, Me., May 6, 1809. He graduated from Bowdoin College in 1831. After teaching some months in Thomaston, Me., he went to Boston in 1832, where he was for a year assistant in a private school. He then entered the Di- vinity School at Cambridge, but left after one term for want of funds. To sustain these, he took charge for a considerable time of the Cambridge Grammar-school, and, without neglecting the duties of the latter position, resumed his theological studies, which in 1836 he creditably completed. On Sept. 28, 1836, he was or- dained as minister of the Church in Wayland, and after two years spent there he returned to Cambridge, where he became principal of the high-school. This position he was at length obliged to relinquish because of declin- ing health. The last two years of his life were spent as pastor of the Church in Lunenburg, Mass., where he died, Jan. 18, 1847. Mr. Austen was a man whose piety shone out above all his actions. As a preacher, he was earnest and practical; as a teacher, eminently successful. See The Christian Examiner (Boston, 1847), xiii, 311.

Austen Canons are regular canons who assumed this title after the Council of Lateran, in 1139, when pope Innocent imposed upon them the rule drawn up by St. Augustine of Hippo in his 160th epistle. Lynd- wood says some wore a linen rochet and black open cope; others white linen or woolen, and a close black cope and cross on it. Some, again, wore all white and a cross; and others wore hoods like monks, or shoes like seculars. They were introduced in England in 1105 through the influence of Athelwulf, confessor to Hen- ry I at Castell. They held one hundred and sixty-one priories in England, including the cathedral of Carlisle, and the churches of Bristol, Hexham, and Christchurch, Hants; Oxford, Waltham, Dunstable, St. German, Lan- ecroft, Cirencester, Cartmel, Dorchester, Oxon, Walsing- ham, Newstead, Worksop, Bolton, Dunmow, Bridling- ton, and St. John's Colchester; Guisborough, Kirkham, Thornton, St. Bartholomew's, and St. Mary's Oversey, London. Their naves were also parish churches and served by vicars. They held several cathedrals— Carlisle, St. Andrews, Milan, Palermo, Patti, Cefalu, Chiasme, Tortosa, Pampeluna, Saragossa, and Salz- burg.

Austen Friars (or Eremites). Volaterranos and Alavezos place the Augustinians after the Dominican and Franciscan orders; but Adrian of Ghent and Polorite of Verril give them the first rank. Their earliest appearance as hermits has been referred to a very early date; but, according to the most trustworthy authors, they were founded by William, duke of Aquitaine and earl of Poitou, about the year 1100, and were known as Williamities. Alexander IV gathered their scattered communities into a single order under a prior-general, and removed them into cities and towns. In 1254 they settled in England at London, where the nave of their church remains; and at Woodhouse, in Wales, in 1232, they left the wilds for towns. The wore a black robe and girdle, and observed the socalled rule of St. Augustine, which was adopted by all the other mendicant orders. They were famous in disputa- tion, and the "keeping of Aunts" formed a ma- terial part of the act of taking an M.A. degree at Oxford.

Austoo, James, a Christian martyr, was one of the five who were burned at Islington, Sept. 17, 1557, be- cause he would not worship the images, and, by preachment, incited others to refuse likewise. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, viii, 405.

of the godly five who were burned at Islington, Sept. 17, 1557, because she would not consent to the popish idolatry and superstition. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, viii, 403.

Austrebertha, saint and virgin, abbess of Pavilly, in Normandy, was born in 638, in the territory of the city of Calvados. She died in 698. Be- fried, count-palatine, and of St. Framette or Franman, who was also of royal blood. In 649, in order to escape marriage, she received the veil from St. Omer, bishop of Terouanne. Afterwards she became abbess of Port; and in 672 first abbess of Pavilly, a nunery founded by St. Philip. In 684 she established a new house in Normandy, in 715, in a place called Amiens, and in 718, in the house of the Order of the Church. In 707, she was called a mother of the world, self-denial, and mortification, and died Feb. 10, 704. She is commemorated Feb. 10. See Balliet, Feb. 10.

Austregisilus (Austrille, or Ottille), Sr., bishop of Bourges, was born at that place, Nov. 29, 551. In his youth he was received into the house of King Gontran, who conceived a great liking for him, and he received the name Mopparius. While there, a man falsely accused him of a fault which he had himself committed; and, as no other means of arriving at the truth could be found, the king ordered them to decide the question by single combat. While Austregisilus waited for his enemy on the field, news came to him that the latter had been killed by a fall from his horse. In gratitude to God for this deliverance, Austregisilus resolved to withdraw from court, and repaired to Aunai, bishop of Auxerre, who brought him up in his church. He was afterwards ordained priest by Etherius, bishop of Lyons, who also made him abbot of St. Nazier. After twenty years spent in the discharge of this office, and in fasting, prayers, and mortification, he was made bishop of Bourges, Feb. 15, 612, and governed his diocese with piety and wisdom for twelve years. He died May 20, 624, on which day he is commemorated. See Balliet, May 20.

Austremenion (or Stromenius), Sr., apostle, and first bishop of Auvergne, was one of the seven illustrious missioners sent into Gaul by the pope about the middle of the 3d century (A.D. 250, according to the Hist. of the Martyrs of St. Suturninus). He confined himself principally to Auvergne, and is reckoned the first bishop of Auvergne, which see was afterwards transferred to Clermont. The Church of Auvergne honors him as a martyr on Nov. 1. See Balliet, Nov. 1; Gregory of Tours, i, 29, 23.

Austria, in Norse mythology. The cosmogony of the Scandinavians teaches that the visible firmament of the sky is nothing but the skull of the giant Ymir, which the sons of Bö-Odin, Vili, and Ve—placed there after they had slain the giant. They lifted this heaven with four corners above the earth, and on each corner placed one dwarf, Auri, Sudri, Westri, Nordri (East, South, West, North).

Austradia (or Austradia), saint and virgin, abbess of Lux, was the daughter of Blandinus Boseon and Salabarna, his wife. She was born in the diocese of Toul about 634, and took the veil when twelve years of age in a monastery of the city of Lux, of which her mother was abbess. Upon the death of the latter, she, although she was unmarried, unanimously elected to suc- ceed her in the government of the house, which was a double monastery of monks and nuns, the latter amounting to more than three hundred. She acquit- ted herself of her charge with wonderful piety and fidelity, but she did not escape the calamities and in- justice which were the lot of the times. She was a martyr by bloody violence, and suffered much from the rapacity of the bishop of the diocese, Mauergius, who wished to take possession of her abbey. She died in 688 or 707. See Balliet, Oct. 17.

Auswellus was a god of the ancient Prussians. He was their Ascalapius—gave health, and helped the sick and feeble.

Authentic is a term applied to the sounds con- necting the final in Gregorian music with its octave, or a melody in which they only are employed, in con- trast to the Gregorian, which admits of connection with the preceding and the following. The authentic, with its octave, the fifth above it, which were called plagal (q. v.). In Ambrosian music authentic scales only were employed, and of these only four: the Phrygian (D—D), Dorian (E—E), Hypolydian (F—F), and Hypophrygian (G—G). The Dorian (E—E), Hypolydian (F—F), and Hypophrygian (G—G) have connection with the number of the Church scales (tones or modes), were subjected to the same classification. Authentic scales are characterized by the harmonic division (6 : 4 : 3) of their octaves; e. g. C—G—C; the plagal by the arith- metical division (4 : 3 : 2); e. g. G—C—G. Authentic melodies are thought to have generally greater dignity and strength than plagal. A good modern example of the former is the well-known German chorale Eine feste Burg ist unser Gott, and of the latter the Evening Hymn, attributed to Tallis; and it would be difficult to find in pure melodic music better examples of the sublime and the beautiful. The relations of subject and answer in the modern tounal fugue (as when C—G are "answered" not by G—G, but by G—C) obviously grew out of the division of scales into authentic and plagal.

Authorized (ENGLISH) Version of the Holy Scriptures. The Anglo-American Revision. This, as an organized effort, originated, after long previous discussions, in a convention of Catherbury, which at its session May 6, 1870, took the following action, proposed by a committee which consisted of eight bishops, the late deans Alford and Stanley, and several other dignitaries:

1. That it is desirable that a revision of the Authorized Version of the Holy Scriptures be undertaken.
2. That the revision be so conducted as to comprise both marginal renderings and such emendations as it may be found necessary to insert in the text of the Author- ized Version.
3. That in the above resolutions we do not contemplate any new translation of the language, or any new language, except where, in the judgment of the most competent scholars, such change is necessary.
4. That in each necessary change the spirit of the language employed in the existing version be closely followed.
5. That it is desirable that Convocation should nominate a body of its own members to undertake the work of revision, who will at liberty to use the co-operation of any eminent for scholarship, to whatever nation or religious body they may belong.

The report was accepted unanimously by the Upper House and by a great majority of the Lower House. A committee was also appointed, consisting of eight bishops and eight presbyters, to take the necessary steps for carrying out the resolutions of the Convoca- tion of York, owing mainly to the influence of archbishop Thomson, did not fall in with the movement, and is therefore not represented in the committee on revision. But a favorable change is gradually taking place, and some of the most influential members of the Convocation, as Dean Howson of Chester, are hearty supporters of revision.

The committee of bishops and presbyters appointed by the Convocation of Canterbury at its first meeting, the bishop of Winchester, Dr. Samuel Wilberforce, pre- sided, adopted a series of resolutions and rules as the fundamental principles on which the revision was to be conducted, and the individuals to be engaged in the work. Of these, the following regulations for the revisers are the most important:

1. That the committee, appointed by the Convocation of Canterbury at its last session, separate itself into two companies, the one for the revision of the Authorized Version of the Old Test., the other for the revision of the Authorized Version of the New Test.
VIII. That the general principles to be followed by both companies be as follows: 1. To introduce as few alterations as possible in the text of the Authorized Version consistently with faithfully.
2. To limit as far as possible the expression of such alterations to the language of the Authorized and earlier English versions.
3. That each company to give twice over the portion to be revised during a provisional second time finally, and on principles of voting as hereinafter is provided.
4. That the text to be adopted be that for which the evidence of the earlier manuscripts is most preponderating; and that when the text so adopted differs from that from which the Authorized Version was made, the alteration be indicated in the margin.
5. To make or return no change in the text on the second dual revision by each company except two thirds of those present approve of the same, but on the first revision to decide by simple majorities.

6. In case of proposed alteration that may have given rise to discussion, to defer the voting thereupon till the next meeting whenever the same shall be required by one third of those present at the meeting, such intended vote to be announced in the notice for the next meeting.

7. To revise the headings of chapters, pages, paragraphs, italics, and punctuation.
8. To refer, on the part of each company, when considered desirable, to divines, scholars, and literary men, whether at home or abroad, for their opinions.

9. That the work of each company be communicated to the secretary as it is completed, in order that there may be no deviation from uniformity in language as possible.

X. That the special or by-rules for each company be as follows:

1. To make all corrections in writing previous to the meeting.
2. To place all the corrections due to textual considerations first, those of the left-hand margin, and all other corrections on the right-hand margin.
3. To transmit to the chairman, in case of being unable to attend, the corrections proposed in the portion agreed upon for consideration.

The following is a list of the persons appointed for the work in Great Britain in pursuance of the above action of the Convocation and the invitations growing out of it as the two bodies of revisers were finally constituted, omitting the names of such as failed to serve, whether by reason of death, resignation, or otherwise.

Old Testament Company

Prof. J. Bissett, St. Andrews.
Prof. R. E. Browne, D.D., of Winchester (chairman).
Prof. C. E. Pugh, M.A., London.
T. Cheney, Esq., London.

Prof. C. Short, LL.D., New York city.

On Dec. 7, 1871, the following constitution was adopted by the American revisers, having been already ratified by the British committee:

I. The American committee, invited by the British committee to the revision of the Authorized English Version of the Holy Scriptures to co-operate with them, is composed of Biblical scholars and divines in the United States.

II. This committee shall have the power to elect its officers, to fix its rules, and to fill its vacant places.

III. The officers shall consist of a president, a corresponding secretary, and a treasurer. The president shall conduct the business of the committee in correspondence with the British revisers. The secretary shall conduct the home correspondence.

IV. New members of the committee and corresponding members must be nominated at a previous meeting and elected unanimously by ballot.

V. The American committee shall co-operate with the British companies on the basis of the principles and rules of revision as laid down by the British committee.

VI. The American committee shall consist of two companies—the one for the revision of the Authorized Version of the Old Testament, the other for the revision of the Authorized Version of the New Testament.

VII. Each company shall elect its own chairman and record secretary.

VIII. The British companies will submit to the American companies from time to time such portions of their work as have passed the first revision, and the American companies will transmit their criticisms and suggestions to the British companies before the second revision.

IX. A joint meeting of the American and British companies shall be held, if possible, in London before final adjournment.

X. The American committee to pay their own expenses.

The American companies held their first session for active work Oct. 4, 1872, and have been from time to time furnished with advanced copies (for strictly private use) of the revised texts prepared by the British companies. These they return with their own suggestions, and the views of the respective committees on both sides of the Atlantic are then interchanged un-
Autumn, in the mythology of the ancients, was represented as a young man with a basket of fruit in one hand and carrying a dog with the other.

Autun, COUNCIL OF (Concilium A autunense). This was one of the most ancient churches in France. Several councils were held here.

I. Held in 677. Six canons of this council have come down to us, one of which orders that all priests and others of the clergy shall commit to memory the Creed of Athanasius. See Labbe, Concii, vi, 585.

II. This council was convened in 652 to consider the matter of Robert, duke of Burgundy, whom Hugo, abbot of Cluny, brought before the council and induced to make satisfaction to Haganon, bishop of Autun, and others whom he had plundered and otherwise injured. See Richard, Hist. Univ. i, 464; Labbe, Concil. ix, 1163.

III. Held by order of pope Gregory VII by his legate, Hugo, bishop of Die, in 1077. Several French and Burgundian bishops and abbots attended. Manassus of Rheims, who, having been cited, refused to appear, was suspended from the exercise of his office, having been accused of many and of usurping that of archbishop. Certain other French bishops were brought to judgment at the same time. See Mansi, Conciliarum, vii, 360.

IV. Held Oct. 16, 1094, by Hugo, archbishop of Lyons and legate, assisted by thirty-two bishops and several abbots. They renewed the sentence of excommunication against the emperor Henry and the anti-pope Guibert; also, they excommunicated Philip of France for marrying Bertrade during the lifetime of his lawful wife; but Philip, by a deputation to the pope, averted the storm for a while, and obtained a delay in the execution of the sentence until the feast of All-Saints in the following year. See Labbe, Concil. x, 499.

Auvergne, COUNCIL OF (Concilium Auverniense), was held in 533, with the consent of king Theodebert, Honoratus of Bourges presiding. Sixteen canons were published.

3. Forbids to wrap the bodies of the dead in the consecrated cloths.

6. Forbids marriage between Christians and Jews.

7. Forbids to place the coffin used to be laid over the body of the Lord upon the corpse of a priest.

12. Of the ceremony of ordination.

15. Orders the country priests to celebrate the feasts of Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide with their bishops in the city.

See Labbe, Conciliarum, iv, 1084. See CLERMONT, COUNCIL OF.

Auvergne, PIERRE d', a French scholastic writer, lived at the close of the 13th century. He was canon of Paris, and had a great reputation as a philosopher. In 1272 the rectorate of the University of Paris being vacant, the legate of the pope chose Auvergne for the position. The time of his death is not known. He wrote Summa Quaestionum Quodlibeticarum. See Hoyer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Auvergne, FÉLIX HENRI, a Parisian historical painter, was born at Montfaucon in January and died in the commencement of the 17th century. He was prior of St. Odon de Dosset, and died July 19, 1661. He wrote, La Vie de Jeanne Aboucha, s. v.; Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Autographs of the prophecies, gospels, etc., are the identical or original documents written by the respective authors of the books of Scripture. Copies taken from these are termed autographs. None of these original MSS. are now remaining; nor could their preservation be expected, without the intervention of a miracle, during the space of nearly eighteen centuries. It seems exceedingly probable that divine Providence permitted them to be early withdrawn from public inspection, lest, like other relics, they should become objects of idolatrous veneration. It is even asserted by Peter, bishop of Alexandria in the 4th century, that an original of John's gospel was not only preserved, but worshipped, at Ephesus (Michaelis, Introductio, i, 250). See Manuscripts, Biblical.

Autophy, An, a tragedy acted in Spain on the occasion of the procession of the holy sacrament. They were performed in the public streets with torches, though in the light of day. The author is said to have been a Jew, and closed the devotion of the sacrament.

Aubert (Aubertus, or Ausbertus), AMBROSE, a Benedictine, was born in the south of France, probably Provence, in the early part of the 8th century. He was brought up in the court of king Pepin, whence he passed into Italy, and took the vows in the Convent of St. Vincent, on the Volturno, in the diocese of Venafro, Italy, of which he was afterwards, about 777, made abbot; which office, however, was disputed with him by Poton, who had also been elected by the Lombards. The case was carried before pope Adrian for decision, who ordered both parties to come to Rome; but Aubert died on the road, July 19, 778. Trithem (1546) had been able to find only the following of Aubert's writings: In Cantica Cantorum Lib. 1. -- Epistolarum ad Divos. Lib. 1. -- De Cupiditate Lib. 1. -- In Apocalypse Joannis Lib. X. The Battle of the Virtues and Vices, included among the works of St. Augustine, and which are under the name of St. Ambrose in some MSS., has been attributed to Aubert. He also wrote some Lives and Homilies, and a tract On Concinnatio, which is in the library of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, in MS. But this second list has been almost entirely assigned, by Cave, to the abbot of Monte-Casino. See Dupin, Hist. of Eccles. Writers, ii, 80. -- Landon, Eccl. Dict. s. v.; Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Aubry, a general agreement is attained. A few points of difference will doubtless still remain, concerning which a memorandum may be made in an appendix to the final work. Each committee holds a monthly session of several days, in which every change is carefully and deliberately discussed, and a conclusion reached by vote according to the rules given above. The New Test. has thus been all gone over, and was published separately in England on May 17, 1881, and in this country three days subsequently. Immense editions were immediately sold, and more than a dozen reprints were issued with the greatest dispatch. The general verdict of the English press was unfavorable on the ground of unnecessary changes, but American criticisms have been more lenient. The popular opinion here seems to be that of the Atlantic, that while, on the whole, great improvements have been made, yet the revisers have exceeded their commission by introducing many trivial changes, which in some cases are, moreover, inelegant and offensive. The prospect of the revision in its present form taking the place of King James's version for public use is not clear. The issue of the Old Test. will follow probably in 1884. When published, the entire Bible as revised will go forth on its own merits, but with the prestige of the highest scholarship and the most laborious criticism attainable for such a purpose from all the leading denominations of English-speaking Protestant Christians. The exact time must determine. See Dr. Schalf's Revision of the English Version of the Holy Scriptures (N. Y. 1873).

AUXBEUFF

AUXBEUFF, a French preacher and theologian of the University of Paris, lived at the commencement of the 15th century. The emissaries of the cardinal of Savoy having insulted the procession of the university which only received the good news of the recovery of Charles VI, Auxbeuff maintained, in an eloquent address, that the cardinal should repair the injury done. This address is found in MS. at the National Library. Auxbeuff, on account of his merits, became confessor of Isabella of Bavaria, wife of Charles VI, and gained a great reputation by the sermons which he delivered in the church of Paris. These were translated into Latin and published at Paris in 1521. They are also found in MS. at the National Library. See Hoefer, Nouvelle Biographie Générale, s. v.

AUXENTIUS, the name of two early Christians.

1. Saint, bishop of Mopsuestia, in Cilicia, was originally a soldier under the emperor Licinius. He refused to offer sacrifice to Bacchus, was consequently compelled to renounce his military profession, and afterwards, i.e. about 321, became bishop of Mopsuestia. In A.D. 360 he received Aeuthius on the occasion of his banishment. He gained a reputation for virtue and sanctity, and died a holy death. See Baillière, Dec. 18.

2. Saint and martyr, suffered with St. Eustatius in the Diocletian persecution in Armenia Minor when St. Blasius was bishop of Sebastia.

AUXERRE, Council of (Concilium Autunio-dorensis), was held about the year 578, under the bishop Aumainius, with seven abbots and thirty-four priests of his diocese. Forty-five canons were enacted, which, however, appear to have been made solely to enforce the execution of those of the Council of Mâcon in the preceding year.

9. Forbids dances, singing of women, and feasting within churches.

10. Forbids two masses to be said at the same altar in one day.

11. Forbids to give the holy eucharist or the kiss to the dead.

12. Forbids the deacon to wear a pall or veil (velum) over his head.

13. Forbids bairuls in the baptistery.

14. Forbids to bury one corpse upon another.

15. Forbids work on Sunday.

16. Forbids priests, deacons, and subdeacons, after having broken their fast, ever to be present in church during mass.

17. Forbids a woman to receive the eucharist with her hand bare.

18. Forbids a priest to dance or sing at feasts.

See Labbé, Concil. v, 556.

AUXILIUS, a French theologian, concerning whom nothing is known but his works, and that he lived about 894. He wrote De Ordinationibus Formosius Pape, seu Contra Interimam Discordiam R. Ecclesia, first published by John Morinus, at the end of his work on ordinations (Paris, 1565; Antwerp, 1694); also contained in Bibl. Patrum, i, 129. Auxilius had been ordained by Formosus, and in this work defends the validity of his ordinations. Mabillon, in his Analecta (ed. Paris, 1729), p. 28, gives another work by this author—viz., a Dialogue on the Matter of Formosus. See Cave, Hist. de l'Ét., ii, 68; Dupin, Hist. de l'Ecl. Writers, ii, 128.

AUXILIUS, bishop of Carlitgae, lived at the beginning of the 5th century. Chrysostom wrote to him from Cæcarius, A.D. 406, commending his zeal in promoting the peace of the Church (Ep. cxix). He was present at the councils held at Carthage in the years 411, 415, 416; that of Cirta in 412, Milleville in 416. See Mansi, Concilium, iii, 1336, etc.

AUXBEAUX LISABER, in Slavonic mythology, was a god of the Poles and Silesians, among whom it is thought he denoted the supreme ruler of all things.

AV, a mystical Egyptian deity, is represented as a cyanocephalic, with the solar disk on his head, holding a viper in his left hand and the Ankh cross in his right, while the folds of the serpent Mehen are over his head and around him. He was the form of the deity Khnumis, and is figured in the Book of the Lower World.

Avadontas are a kind of anchorites among the Brahminus who practice great austerity, abandoning their wives and children and denying themselves all the comforts of life. They renounce all earthly possessions, and clothe themselves only with a piece of linen cloth around the waist. They subject the charity of the devout. Many of them are too indolent even to ask for food, but lay themselves down on the bank of some river, where the country people bring them milk and fruits in abundance.

AVALKITA (the Manifested) is a Sanscrit title of the Supreme Being as a revealer of himself to man.

AVANÇON, GUILLAUME D', a French prelate, was born in Dauphiny about 1580. After having been chamberlain of the king, he was appointed archbishop of Embrun in 1561. He distinguished himself by his zeal against the heretics at the Council of Trent in a discussion with Poissy and certain of the clergy at Blois in 1577 and 1578. The following year, being appointed by Lesdiguières chief of the Huguenots, he was obliged, in order to avoid then retirement, to spend the rest of his life, to spend the rest of his life, and married the charter of the devil. Many of them are too indolent even to ask for food, but lay themselves down on the bank of some river, where the country people bring them milk and fruits in abundance.

AVALOKITA (the Manifested) is a Sanscrit title of the Supreme Being as a revealer of himself to man.

AVANZI, GIUSEPPE, an Italian painter, was born at Ferrara in 1655, and studied under Costanzo Cattanio. There are here seven pictures in the Church of the Madonna della Pietà at Ferrara. His best work, The Marriage of St. Catherine, is in the Church of San Domenico. Many of his works possessed no merit. He died in 1718.

AVARD, ADAM CLARKE, a Wesleyan Methodist minister in Nova Scotia, was born in the island of Guernsey. When he was about six years old (1808) his parents emigrated to Prince Edward Island, and Adam commenced the study of law in Charlottetown. He was converted under the ministry of John Hick, and entered the ministry in 1818; labored at Newport and Wilmot, N.S., and Fredericton, N. B.; saw revivals attend his preaching, and in 1829 was appointed by the British Conference to commence a mission among the Esquimaux of Labrador. But in the midst of extensive usefulness in Fredericton death intervened, March 15, 1821. Humble, yet dignified; zealous, but cautious; social, yet serious, Avard had a pleasing style and a dignified countenance. See Hoefer, Memorials of Ministers in Eng. Brit. America (Halifax, N.S., 1872, 1874), p. 7; Minutes of the British Conference (5vo ed.), 1821, v, 203.

Avedik, a provincial of the Armenian schismatics at the close of the 18th century. Having obtained the patriarchate by the aid of the mutifi, he organized in 1701 a persecution against the Catholics. The French ambassador to Constantinople, Ferriol, demanded and obtained reparation in the name of the inhabitants. In order to make satisfaction, the imprisonment of the patriarch was ordered. He was confined in the prison of Messina, and died in 1703. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

AVEILLON, JEAN JOSEPH, a French theologian, was born in Paris in 1820. He entered the congregation of the Oratory, and there published a work which he had prepared at Paris while he was superior of the house. He was intimate with Bossuet. Aveillon died May 29, 1713. He wrote Méditations pour les Sénateurs et pour les Gens du Monde. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.
Aveline, Pierre, a Parisian designer and engraver, was born in 1710, studied under Jean Baptiste Poyly, and died in 1760. He gained some reputation, but most of his works were long unrecognized. The following are a few:

The Wrath of Neptune:—Diana and Acteon:—The Infant Moses Brought to the Daughter of Pharaoh:—Noah Entering the Ark:—The Rope of Europa:—A Dog with a Game.

Avellar, Francisco Gomez de, a Portuguese prelate and statesman, was born Jan. 17, 1739, in the vicinity of Alhandra, where his parents dwelt in humble circumstances. At the age of fourteen he was placed under the care of his uncle, a vicar, and distinguished himself by the rapid progress he made in his studies. He accompanied cardinal Pacci to Rome, where he obtained the favor of Pius VI. He was appointed by Maria I to the bishopric of Algarve, and was consecrated April 26, 1783. He performed all the duties of his office, and conferred large benefits upon the people. During the French invasion, he displayed such great prudence and energy that in 1808, at the proclamation of independence, nearly the entire government of this province was given to him by the regent. He was governor and captain-general of Algarve until his death, which occurred Dec. 15, 1816. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Avellino, Osoppo, an Italian painter, was born in Naples in 1674. He studied under Solimena, and afterwards went to Rome, where he painted the vault of the Church of San Francesco di Paola, which is considered his best work. In the Church of Santa Maria de Montesanto is an altar-piece by him representing a subject from the life of St. Alberto. He died in Rome in 1741.

Avenarius, Johannes (1) (third of the name), a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Zipsendorf, where his father was the Protestant minister, in the last half of the 17th century. He wrote, Theses de Veritate (1686)—Plagnetie Handbuch (1698)—Sententiae de Formula Latina-Germanica (Plauz, 1699).

Avenarius, Johannes (2) (fourth of the name), a Protestant theologian of Germany, son of Matthew Avenarius, was born Nov. 10, 1670, at Steinbach. He was preacher at Berka, then deacon and archdeacon at Schmaiskald, then preacher at Gera. He died at Gera, 1719. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Avendaño, Alfonso de, a Spanish Dominican who died at Valladolid, Oct. 11, 1506, is the author of,

Commentarius in Psalmmum cxviiit (Salamanca, 1584; Venice, 1587)—Commentarius in Evangellum Matthais (Madrid, 1592, 2 vols. fol.). See Antonio, Bibliotheca Hisp.; Echard, De Scriptoris Ordinis Dominicanorum. (B. F.)

Aventinus, Sr., was born at Bourges in the 5th century, and brought up in the seminary of St. Lupus, bishop of Troyes. Camelianus, the successor of St. Lupus, made Aventinus eccosmus of his Church; but after a time he left this situation, and retired into a monastery on an island in the river Oze (Oza), where he discharged the duties of abbot until, about 534, St. Fidelus (Fale) was substituted for him, when he departed into a solitude, "prope Verreria," where he died in the year 537. He is commemorated Feb. 4. See Greg. Turon. De Glor. Confess. p. 949; Baillet, Feb. 4.

Aventinus, Sr., of Chitraudd, was made bishop of Chartres after St. Souleium, who had been elected against his will, but fled to avoid the dignity conferred upon him. In the subscriptions of the councils of his time Aventinus is sometimes called bishop of Chartres, and sometimes of Châteauneuf. He died in 528. See Baillet, Feb. 4.

Aventor. See Adventitus.

Aver, William, an English Wesleyan minister, entered the itinerant work in 1720, and died in Finsbury, Cornwall, Jan. 25, 1855, aged sixty-seven. He was converted in early life, and conducted his long ministry with assiduity and usefulness. He was an humble and thorough Christian. He wrote a Letter to a Member of the New Connection (Perryn, 1814, 8vo). See Wesleyan Tithings, i, 303; Minutes of the British Conference, 1838.

Avercorin is reserved rent, as corn, paid to monasteries.

Averett, Alexander, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in South Carolina, Jan. 1, 1788. He joined the Church in 1810, and was licensed to preach in 1818. In 1844 he united with the Georgia Conference, and in 1866 he died in Columbus, Georgia.

Averhausen, Joseph, a German theologian, was born at Kempten, July 8, 1664. He entered the Order of Jesuits and taught theology at Cologne, and later at Rome. He died July 23, 1743. Among several highly esteemed sermons, we notice a funeral oration on Joseph Clement, Archbishop of Mainz (Cologne, 1724). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Averill, James, a Congregational minister and chaplain, was born at Griswold, Conn., May 29, 1815. He was the eldest child of his parents, who died on two successive mornings and were buried in the same grave. He was educated at Plainfield Academy, Amherst College (graduating in 1837), and the Yale Divinity School (1840). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Averoldi, Girolamo, a Capuchin friar and Italian theologian, a native of Brescia, lived at the commencement of the 17th century. In one of his works he maintains that the assumption of the Virgin was a popular opinion was considered by the Inquisition, and although he abjured this heresy, he was imprisoned for three years in the dungeons of the Holy Office. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Averoldi, Ippolito, an Italian theologian, a native of Brescia, lived probably in the early half of the 17th century, and was a Capuchin friar. He wrote, Icones nominalis et Plenitum Abraxasliam Literae Libri Apeulosci Intelligens et Commentarii Elegantissimus Loca Difficultas Illustrata (Brescia, 1668). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Averoni, Valerio, an Italian theologian, a native of Florence, lived during the latter half of the 16th century. He was a monk of the congregation of Vallombro.

AVERROES (or Avrboh), ABU-L-WALID MOhammed Ibn-Ahmed (surnamed el-Hajj), an illustrious Arab philosopher and physician, was born at Cordova, Spain, in 1120. The name is a corruption of Abenor Ibn-Rashid. He studied theology, jurisprudence, medicine, and philosophy under the best masters, and was intimate with men who were leaders of scientific thought in Spain in the 12th century. Like his father, he was distinguished for his varied knowledge, and succeeded him in the office of mufti, or chief judge of Andalusia, and subsequently held the same office in Morocco. He stood high in the esteem of successive rulers, especially of Al-Mansur, who, perhaps unjustly, could not reconcile the philosophy of Avreroes with his professed devotion to the Koran, and perhaps also impelled by personal animosity, banished him for several years, but finally restored him to his office. Avreroes died at Morocco, Dec. 13, 1198. It is difficult to understand how a man of his position and influence, who was a prince of the school of the philosophers, in which the historians, it is enveloped in vague and puerile circum-stanctials; but according to Ibn-Abi-Oceibia, the real cause was that of the Mohammedan priesthood to the culture of philosophy and the study of the ancients.
This is somewhat confirmed by the fact that Averroes did not suffer alone. A general persecution raged; everywhere philosophers, physicians, poets, and others of like pursuits, were in danger; and before the close of the century the light of scientific genius in Southern Spain had gone out. Averroes's writings are numerous, and embrace almost every subject of human knowledge. He is said to have written nearly eighty treatises, most of which pertain to medicine and the kindred sciences; but he is chiefly known in modern times as a commentator on Aristotle and Plato.
The first edition of his works was published in a Latin translation at Venice in eleven volumes (1582-86), the commentaries filling eight volumes, while the remaining three contain his refutation of Al-Islami's work against the Greek philosophy, his great medical work, Kulliyat (incorrectly Colliget), and miscellaneous treats. His philosophy inclined towards pantheism and materialism. His doctrines were denounced by the University of Paris, after which Leo X issued a bull against them. See Rerum, Avreroes et Arte (Paris, 1852); Müller, Philosophie und Theologie von Averroes

AVERROISTS is a name for those who hold the opinions of Averroes (q. v.).

AVERTNUSCUS, in Roman mythology, was a deity who was implored to avert any threatening danger.

AVESIO, RAPHAEL, an Italian monk of the Order of Clerks Regular Minor, was of San Severo, near Salerno, in Naples. Five times he was elected general of his order, and was twice the bishop of Nocera and Nardo, both of which he refused. He died at Rome, June 10, 1567, being sixty-eight years of age. Averso was a man of singular piety, modesty, and learning, and won all hearts by his many admirable qualities. Among his works, which are numerous, are, De Ordinis et Monatnii Sacramentia Tractatus (Bologna, 1642, 4to) — De Exsufflation Sacramentum et Sacrificio, de Pudicitia Saccr. et Ex-terna Unicntia Tractatus etc. (Ibus, 1640, 4to) — De Fide, Spe, et Charitate Tractatus Theol. (Venice, 1660, 4to).

Avery, Abraham S., a Presbyterian minister, was born at East Lyme, Conn., in 1792. He studied theology with a private minister, and joined Alton Pres-byteries April 4, 1856; labored some months with Met-tropolis Church in Muscatine, III.; was dismissed to Paupskila Presbytery, O., April 7, 1859; and died at Lawrenceburg, Ind., Sept. 3, 1868. He was thoroughly consecrated to the work of the ministry. See Norton, Hist. of Presb. Church in Illinois.

Avery, Austin Wakefield, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Campton, N. H., Nov. 18, 1838.
He became a hopeful Christian in early life, and in the fall of 1856 went to the institution at New Hampton, N. H., with a view to preparing himself for the Christian ministry. He was formally licensed to preach Dec.
14, 1858, and early in 1859 he left New England and went to Puducah, Ky., where his brother was residing and engaged in teaching. Finding him in poor health, he took his place in that town. He was a warm advocate for who he supplied the pulpit of the Baptist Church in Puducah, and also held meetings for the colored people. In the fall of 1859 he labored with the Washington Street Church in Dover, N. H. The winter of 1860 was spent in Christian work in various sections of the State of New York, and he was ordained at Parabola, N. Y., on April 20 that year. The following spring he spent in Minnesota, and the remainder of the year was occupied mostly in ministerial service in Parabola and the towns adjoining. Wishing to enjoy better facilities for study, he made arrangements to place himself under the tuition of Rev. Ransom Dunn, pastor of the North Bennet Street Church in Boston. When, however, he reached Boston early in 1861, he found Mr. Dunn in such poor health that he was forced to resign, and Mr. Avery was chosen his successor in the following March. More than once he sought relief during the next two or three years from his pastoral work, but his Church was un-willmg to part with him; and it was not until March 13, 1865, that they consented to accept his resignation.
A brief pastorate at Haverhill, Mass., closed his labors on earth. His death took place Oct. 7, 1865. See

Avery, Charles, a Methodist Protestant minister, was a native of Watchet, County N. Avalon, N. J., July 10, 1748. He obtained his education chiefly by private study, experienced religion in early life, and served a long career as local preacher in the Methodist Episcopal Church. In 1829 he identified himself with the Methodist Protestants and joined their Ohio Conference. He died at his residence in Allegheny City, Pa., Jan. 17, 1876. Mr. Avery's speciality was philanthropy.
He founded the first Methodist Protestant Church in Allegheny City; endowed the Preachers' Aid Society of the Pittsburgh Conference with twenty-five thousand dollars, called the Avery Fund; erected an ample college building in Allegheny City for the benefit of peoples of color; besides making liberal donations to dif-cerous institutions, as hospitals, missionary associations, etc.
See Bassett, Hist. of the Methodist Protestant Church,
p. 886.

Avery, David, a Congregational minister, was born in Norwich (Franklin), Conn., April 5, 1746. He was converted under the preaching of Whitefield; fitted for college by Dr. Wheelock; graduated from the sophomores of Yale in 1769; pursued theology under Dr. Wheelock; preached on Long Island as a licentiate; was a missionary to the Oneida Indians; was installed pastor at Gageborough, now Windsor, Vt., March 23, 1773, where he remained Avery, Eleazer James, a Baptist minister, was born at Brattle, Conn., Jan. 6, 1815, and was a graduate of Brown University in the class of 1845, also of the Newton Theological Institution in the class of 1849. His first pastorate was with the Church in Addison, Massachusetts, in 1851, at his ordination taking place in 1850. He was pastor in Pembroke, Me., in 1851-52, when he resigned, and held the position of principal of Worcester Academy (1852-54), then of Lewis Academy (1854-58), of Shelburne Falls Academy (1868-68), and finally of Peddie Institute, Highstown, N.J., where he died, Sept. 29, 1893. His Catalogue of Newton Theol. Inst. p. 34; The Watchman, Oct. 20, 1881. (J.C.S.)

Avery, Ephraim, a Congregational minister, the son of the Rev. John Avery of Truro, Mass., was born in 1712. He graduated at Harvard in 1731, and was ordained over the Church in Mortlake, Conn., four years after. This charge Mr. Avery retained until Oct. 20, 1754, when he died. He was the foremost among Massachusetts ministers of the time. See Cong. Quarterly, 1859, p. 530.

Avery, Fernald, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born in April, 1835. Hopefully converted in 1853, he decided to enter the ministry. With a view to fit himself for his work, he commenced to study at New Hampton in 1859, but on account of his health was obliged to leave the institution. In October, 1860, he had so far recovered as to be able to preach, and was licensed by the Corinth (Vt.) Quarterly Meeting. He took charge of the Church in Williamstown, and in 1841 was ordained as its regular pastor, sustaining this relation for three years and a half. In August, 1864, he removed to New Haven, and spent two years of study at New Hampton, which he prosecuted until the following March. He was once more laid aside by sickness, and lingered until death relieved him of his sufferings. He died at Corinth, Oct. 13, 1866. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1868, p. 87. (J.C.S.)

Avery, John (1), a Congregational minister, preached in England for some time, and came to America in 1634. For a short time he resided in Newbury, Mass., but receiving an invitation to preach at Marblehead, he accepted it in order that he might minister to the poor fishermen. He was on his way thither when the vessel in which he had embarked was shipwrecked, and the whole company, consisting of twenty-three persons, were drowned except two, Mr. Avery being one of the victims, Aug. 14, 1635. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 137.

Avery, John (2), D.D., a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, graduated at Yale College in 1813, and was ordained deacon Oct. 22, 1817. In 1825 he was rector of St. Paul's Church, Edenton, N.C., where he remained until December, 1835, when he removed to Greene County, Ala. There he organized a Church called St. John's in the Prairies, and served this Church and the one at Greencastle at the same time. In the Convention of Alabama in 1836, he was chosen president, and he died Jan. 17, 1837, on board the steamboat on which he was returning home from Mobile. He was distinguished for his extensive theological learning and sound judgment. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 754.

Avery, John A., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Bradford, Vt., in 1795. He was educated at Middlebury College. In 1824 he was ordained by the Congregational Association of Woodstock, Vt., and labored as home missionary within the bounds of the Plymouth and Bridgewater congregations. For six years he was editor of The Religious Recorder, published in Syracuse, N.Y. He died in Syracuse, April 28, 1863. See Wilson, Prob. Hist. Almanac, 1864, p. 88.

Avery, Joseph, a Congregational minister, was born at Dedham, Mass., in 1751. He graduated at Harvard College in 1771; was ordained pastor of the Church in Holden, Mass., Dec. 12, 1774; and died March 5, 1824. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 944.

Avery, Park, a Baptist minister who died in 1797, was for many months the companion and an intimate friend and counsellor of the Rev. Silas Burrows. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vi, 107.

Avery, Samuel, a Wesleyan minister in Nova Scotia, was born at Grand-Pré, Horton, N. S. He was educated at the Mount Allison Academy, N. B.; was received into the ministry in 1854; preached at Wilmot and Shelburne; became a supernumerary in 1861; and died on Dec. 1, 1870. See Catalogue of U. College of the Lungs, Oct. 15, of his twenty-ninth year. Devoutness of spirit, tender¬ness of conscience, and holy resolves characterized him. See Huestis, Memorials of Methodist Ministers in East. Unit. America, p. 11.

Avery, Samuel Waters, a Baptist minister, was born at Jefferson, Me., July 4, 1814. He was fitted for college by the pious work of his mother, Mrs. Mary Avery, and entered Waterville College in the class of 1840. He was engaged in teaching for two years (1841-43) in Richmond, and for a time directed his attention to the study of law. On becoming a hopeful Christian, he went to the Newton Theological Institution in the fall of 1844, graduating in the class of 1847. After supplying for a few months the Church in East Winthrop, he was ordained in Lubec, Me., in May, 1849, and was pastor there two years, at Searsport six years (1851-57), Fayette six years (1858-64), Lisbon Falls three years (1865-68). In April, 1867, he opened a drug-store at Lisbon Falls, but still continued to preach. He was secretary of the New Hampshire Mission Convention from 1858 to 1872. He died suddenly Oct. 17, 1868. See Necrology of Colby University, p. 12. (J.C.S.)

Aveugle, Jean (the younger) 1*, a French priest of the Oratory and theological writer, died in 1672. He distinguished himself as a preacher, and wrote Delices Pasteur. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aviau (du Bois de Sanzay), Charles François V., a French prelate, was born Aug. 7, 1736, at Bois de Sanzay, diocese of Poitiers. He was studied at the school of the Jesuits at Fléchê, and at the Seminary of St. Sulpice at Paris. He was at first canon and grand¬vicar of the diocese of Angers, and was appointed, in 1789, archbishop of Vienne. Refusing to sign the civil constitution of the clergy, he left France in 1792, and retired to Aviau. In 1798 he returned, in disguise of a peasant and travelled, preaching in the mountains of Vivaraïs and of Forez. After the compact, he was called, April 9, 1802, to the archie¬piscopal see of Bordeaux. He devoted his time and money to works of beneficence, and died at Bordeaux, July 14, 1826. His posthumous letters were published in the Mémorial Catholique for May and June, 1827; they were upon Ultramontanism and Gallicanism. He also wrote, Traité Faneuse de Louis XIV* :—Écrit sur la Prét à Intérêt du Commerce (Lyons, 1749). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

AVILA

AVIVUS (or Oseillo), GABSR AB (or Patavinius), an Italian engraver, was born at Padua about 1580, and probably studied under Giorgio Ghisi. His principal work was a large volume, in five parts, containing the full-length portraits of the princes and emperors of the house of Hapsburg, and the figures of the clergy. The following are some of the best of his single prints on sacred subjects: The Espousals of the Virgin Mary:—The Woman Taken in Adultery:—The Scouring of Christ:—Christ Crowned with Thorns:—The Last Supper.

AVIGNON, COUNCILS OF (Concilium Aquiniense), in France.
I. Held in 1060, by the cardinal Hugo, abbot of Cluny, legate. Achard, who had usurped the see of Arles, was deposed, and Gibelin elected to his place. Lantelme was also elected to the see of Embrun, Hugo to that of Grenoble, and Desiderius to that of Cavallian. See Labbe, Concill xi, 390.

II. This council was held Sept. 6, 1208, by Hugo, archbishop of Riez, and published twenty-one canons. The first recommends to bishops to preach more frequently in their dioceses; the second relates to the extirpation of heresies; and the preface to the acts of the council laments the general prevalence of wickedness. In the third, held, or in one held, in 1215, the inhabitants of Toulouse were excommunicated for not driving out the Albigenses, according to order. The count of Toulouse was conditionally excommunicated. See Labbe, Concill xi, 41.

III. Held May 27, 1279, by Pierre (or, according to some, Bernard) de Languisel, archbishop of Arles. They drew up a decree containing fifteen articles, for the most part setting forth the usurpations and invasions of ecclesiastical property which were made, the violence committed upon the clergy, and the disregard of excommunications. However, they provided no other means of opposing these evils than the passing of fresh canons. See Labbe, Concill xi, 1590.

IV. Held in 1282, by Bertrand Amamuri, archbishop of Arles, together with his suffragans. Of the canons published ten only are extant, which, among other things, enjoined the faithful to attend on their own parish churches—which in many places were disregarded—and to go there, at least, on every Sunday and holiday. See Labbe, Concill xi, 1174.

V. Held June 18, 1328. Three archbishops, eleven bishops, and the deputes of several others who were absent attended. They drew up a rule containing fifty-nine articles, chiefly relating to the temporalities of the Church in its jurisdiction. They assume, generally, as an incontrovertible maxim that the laity have no authority over persons or property ecclesiastical; a maxim evidently false, if it is to be extended to every possible case. Moreover, they complain bitterly of various abuses proceeding from the hatred which the laity bear towards the clergy; but it does not appear that they took any steps to lessen the grounds of this hatred, unless it were by an accumulation of censures and penalties.

Orders. That the masses of the Blessed Virgin be celebrated once a week.

Grants an indulgence to those who pray to God for the pope.

Grants an indulgence of ten days to those who devoutly bow the head at the name of Jesus.

Orders the secular powers to forward a captured cleric to his own judge free of expense.

Against administering poisonous drugs.

Of proceedings against the exempt.

On the punishment of excommunication, all abusive conversations in the houses of bishops, or in the presence of their officials.

Permits both archbishops and bishops travelling in dioceses not their own to bless the people.

To the condition in which benefices ought to be left by those leaving them.

See Labbe, Concill xi, 1717, 2476.

VI. Held Sept. 3, 1357, by three archbishops and seveteen bishops. They published a decree containing sixty-nine articles, being chiefly a repetition of those drawn up in the preceding council. Among other things, it is enacted that parishioners shall receive the eucharist at Easter only at the hands of their proper curate. By canon five it is ordered that incumbents and all persons in holy orders shall abstain from eating meat on Saturdays in honor of the Virgin, that by so doing they may set a good example to the laity. This injunction to fast on Saturdays had been made three hundred years before, upon occasion of the Trêne de Dieu, but had not yet, it seems, been universally established; other regulations of the council relate chiefly to the usurpation of Church property and acts of violence committed on the persons of the clergy. See Gall Christ, i, 322; Labbe, Concill xi, 1850.

VII. Held Sept. 7, 1457, by the cardinal Pierre de Foix, archbishop of Arles and legate. The chief purpose of this council was to confirm the acts of that of Basle relating to the immaculate conception of the Blessed Virgin. It was forbidden, under pain of excommunication, to preach anything contrary to this doctrine or to dispute concerning it in public. All curates were enjoined to make known this decree that no one might plead ignorance. See Labbe, Concill xiii, 1403.

VIII. Held in 1594, by Francis Marin, archbishop of Avignon. Sixty-four canons were published, relating chiefly to the same subjects treated of in the synods held in various parts of France, etc., after the Council of Trent.

Provides for teaching the rudiments of the faith to adults as well as children.

Orders sermons on all Sundays, and every day in Lent and Advent.

Of the sacraments.

Orders that the baptismal water be renewed only on Holy Saturday and the eve of Whitsunday, unless need require; and that a silver vessel be used to pour it into the font.

Of relics and images.

Of behavior in church.

Of Lent.

Of processions.

Of legacies, wills, etc.

Of medical men.

Against duelling.

Of Jews: orders them to keep in their houses on Easter-eve and Easter-day.

See Laphé, Concill xv, 1434.

AIVIGNONIATA, a sect of Romanists which arose during the 16th century at Avignon, France, reviving the errors of the Calabrians (q. v.). The originators of the Avignonists were Grabiase, a Polish nobleman, and Pernetti, abbe of Burgal, a Benedictine to whom is attributed a work entitled The Virtues, Power, Clemency, and Glory of Mary, the Mother of God (1780).

AVILA, ALFONSO DE, a Spanish Jesuit, was born at Belmont in 1545, and died, according to one authority, at Valladolid, Jan. 19, 1615; according to another, at Malaga, May 21, 1618. He wrote two volumes of Sermons (Antwerp, 1610). An Alfonso Avila, a Jesuit, perhaps identical with the above mentioned, wrote in Spanish, in 1583, a treatise on St. Bernard the second bishop of Avila.

AVILA, ESTÉBAN DE, a Spanish Jesuit, was born at Avila in 1523, and died at Lima, April 14, 1607. He published, De Conscribo Ecclesiasticum Tractatus, Compendium Summa, seu Manua-

AVIGNON, COUNCILS OF (Concilium Aquiniense), in France.
I. Held in 1060, by the cardinal Hugo, abbot of Cluny, legate. Achard, who had usurped the see of Arles, was deposed, and Gibelin elected to his place. Lantelme was also elected to the see of Embrun, Hugo to that of Grenoble, and Desiderius to that of Ca

AVILA, GIOSEPPE MARIA, a Dominican of Rome, was so well known to all that he was chosen by the pope Urban VIII in 1640 to preach to the Jews. He was made bishop of Campagna, in Naples, and died in 1656, leaving a Panegyric of St. Thomas Aquinas (Rome, 1634).

AVILA, HERNANDO DE, a Spanish painter and

AVILA, ESTÉBAN DE, a Spanish Jesuit, was born at Avila in 1523, and died at Lima, April 14, 1607. He published, De Conscribo Ecclesiasticum Tractatus, Compendium Summa, seu Manusculptor to Philip II, was a native of Toledo, and after the death of his former master, Francisco Comontes, in 1556, he was appointed painter to the Cathedral of Toledo in his place. In 1568 he finished two altar-pieces for a chapel of that cathedral representing St. John the Baptist and the Adoration of the Kings. In 1576 he designed the principal altar of the nunnery of Santo Domingo el Antiguo at Toledo.

Avila, Sancho de, a Spanish prelate and theologian, was born at Avila in 1536. He was a successively bishop of Murcia, of Jaen, of Murviedro, and of Placentia, and died in 1625. He wrote a work in Spanish, A treatise on the veneration due to the relics of saints (Madrid, 1611) — Sermones (Baeza, 1615) — a Spanish translation of one of the treatises of St. Augustine (Madrid, 1601, 1626). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aviñon, Bartolomeo, of Aragon, a Dominican, was deputed to Rome to obtain the canonization of St. Louis Bertrand. While there, in 1623, he wrote in Spanish a life of that saint, together with An Account of the Process of Canonization, which was at once translated into Italian by J. Caesar Boltifango, and printed at Rome in 1629 (Svo).

Avis, James, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born near Shepherdstown, Va., Jan. 7, 1736. He received the best religious training in early life from a pious, devoted mother, but wandered into folly and sin; was converted years afterwards, and in 1809 entered the itinerant ranks of the Baltimore Conference. In 1821 he was transferred to the Kentucky Conference, three years later returned to the Baltimore Conference, and in 1824 was transferred to the Virginia Conference, in all of which he continued with zeal, fidelity, and great success. He died in 1825. Mr. Avis was a man of unquestionable integrity, great energy, and indefatigable industry. See Methodist Magazine, viii, 366; Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1823, p. 475.

Avistupor (scarcrow), a name of Priapus, who had temples erected to him as the tutelary deity of vineyards and gardens, which he defended from thieves and destructive birds. His image was usually placed in gardens, holding in his hand a sickle.

Avitable, Pietro, a Neapolitan missionary, was a Theatine of Bisont in 1607. He was appointed by the Congregation of the Propagandists prefect of the missions in Georgia and the Indies. He died at Goa in 1652, as declared in F. de Sales, Acta Sanctorum, and Pontificum Urbanii Vii Historica Relation (Rome).

Avitus, Sr., was born about 490 in Périgord. He was of a patrician family, and Bollandus, in his Acta Sanctorum, informs us that in his youth he served in the army of Alaric II, king of the Visigoths, and in the battle of Vouillé against Clovis he was taken prisoner, but his conduct so gained the confidence of his master that he was liberated. A vision which he had determined him to preach the Gospel, and he accordingly entered the monastery at Bonneval, in the diocese of Poitiers. He went into a desert place and built a chapel and a cell, and dwelt there forty years as a hermit; this gained for him a high reputation for sanctity, and some have attributed to him certain miracles. He died in 570, and his anniversary is celebrated June 17. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Avitus (St.), third abbot of Micy, or St. Mesmin, near Orleans, was the son of a laborer of Beausse. He was received into the abbey of Micy, and appeared so meek and simple that many of the monks thought him a replaced in infirmity; he wished to follow more completely a religious life led him to retire into solitude, whence he was recalled by Maxi- minus, abbot of Micy, and succeeded him about 529. He gave much valuable advice to Clodmir, the son of Clovis, and warned him that if he killed Sigismund, king of Burgundy, he would not long survive him, which prediction was justified by the event. See Baillet, June 17.

Avitus (St.), abbot of Châteaudun. If this Avitus was not the same with the last, which Le Coiteur asserts to be, two of the same name are to be found: one, Micy (under the rule of St. Maximinus), whence this Avitus retired with St. Calais to Châteaudun, in the diocese of Chartres, where he built a monastery and ruled it as abbot until his death, in 580. A strong testimony in favor of the opinion that there was but one Avitus is that St. Maximinus, in the Vita of St. Calais, who states that the abbot Avitus, shortly after his election, left the abbey to go and form another community in the Dunois. See Baillet, June 17; Henschelius, Acts of St. Avitus.

Avogadro, Pietro (called Bresciano), an Italian painter, was born at Brescia, and flourished about the year 1750. He studied under Pompeo Ghioti. His chief work is the Magnificat of Sts. Crispino and Crispiniano, in the Church of St. Joseph, at Brescia.

Avont, Pieter van der, a Flemish landscape painter and engraver, was born at Antwerp about 1619. The following are some of his principal religious prints: The Virgin Mary and the Infant Jesus: —St. John and St. Anne: —The Virgin and Infant in the Clouds: — The Mass: —A Ascending to Heaven: —The Virgin Sucking the Infant.

Avoury (Adovera) is the picture of a patron saint depicted on a square gilt vane of metal, which was attached flag-wise to a staff and carried in funeral processions.

Avranches, Council of (Concilium Arracienae), was held May 22, 1172, the cardinal legates Theodinus and Albert presiding. Henry II of England, having taken the oath which the pope's legates required of him, and annulled all the unlawful customs which had been established in his time, and done penance, was absolved on account of the assassination of Becket. Among other things, Henry engaged —(1) not to withdraw from the obedience of the pope Alexander III or of his successors so long as they continued to acknowledge him as Catholic king of England:—(2). That he would not hinder appeals to Rome;—(3). He promised, at the coming Christmas, to take the cross for three years, and in the year following to set out for Jerusalem, unless the pope should grant a dispensation, and in case he should be obliged to go to Spain to oppose Alfonso the Sarracener. This was rather an assembly of the council. The real Council of Avranches, in this year, was not held until Sept. 27 or 28. The king then renewed his oath, adding to it some expressions of attachment and obedience to Alexander. Twelve canons were then drawn up, enacting, among other matters, that it should not be lawful to appoint minors to the benefices with cure of souls; that the incumbents of parishes who could afford it should be compelled to have an assisting priest; that it should not be lawful for a husband or wife to enter upon a monastic life while the other continued in the world. Abstinence and fasting during Advent were recommended to all who could bear it, and especially to the clergy. See Labbe, Concil. x, 1457.

Avrigny, Hyacinthe Robillard, a French historian, was born at Caen in 1675, and admitted at Paris into the Society of Jesus Sept. 18, 1691. He took a course in theology, and then was sent to Alençon, where he was employed as procurator of the college. He died probably at Quimper, in 1719. His works are, Mémoires Chronologiques et D'ormoniques, pour Servir à l'Histoire Ecclesiastique depuis 1600 jusqu'en 1718, avec des Reflexions et des Remarques Critiques (1720, 4 vols, 12mo):—Mémoires pour Servir à AVRIL, PHILIPPE, a French Jesuit and missionary, lived in the latter half of the 17th century. He was sent by his superiors to penetrate into China, and embarked June 19, 1685, at Leithorn upon a ship destined to follow the Hudson, and travel into Louisiana, America, and Persia; but he was arrested by the governor of Astrachan, who obliged him to return by way of Russia and Poland, and on Sept. 30, 1680, he landed at Toulon. He published his adventures under the title Voyage en divers États d'Europe et d'Asie (Paris, 1692). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

AVRILLOT, BAYEUX (more commonly known by the name of Acroye), founder of the Carmelite Order in France, was born in Paris, Feb. 1, 1565. At the age of fifteen she desired to enter a monastery, but her parents, not approving of this, married her to Peter Acarie, master of accounts at Paris, and one of the warmest partisans of the League. At the submission of Paris to Henry IV in 1594, he was obliged to flee, and thus she was deserted and left in straitened circumstances. She bore trials with courage, and having found an asylum for her children, founded the Carmelite Order, and became directress of one of the houses of reformed Carmelites, and engaged one of her friends, Madame Sallier, to publish a couvain, in the same vicinity. Madame Acarie took the veil under the name "Sœur Marie de l'Incarnation." She finished her days in the retirement of the Carmelites house at Fontoile, April 18, 1618, and was canonized by Pius VI in 1791. Several French works, the titles of which are given in Latin, are attributed to her: De Conceptione Virginis Mariae; and De Vita Interiori. Centum circiter Monita Spiritualia. Vera Exercitia Omnium Animaus quae Vitam easse conseqvi dierentur Utilia (Paris, 1622). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

AVUN, a personage of Etruscan mythology. He is represented on a mirror as a warrior armed with a spear in company with the male Turan.

AWANI - AOTHIN, in Hindî mythology, is an August festival sacred to Siva. The Hindûs of the first three classes assemble, cut their hair, bathe in consecrated waters, and pray God for the forgiveness of the sins which they committed in the year that has passed.

AWANI-MULON, in Hindî mythology, is also an August festival sacred to the worship of Siva, held in memory of a minor, and he performed it as a favor to his holy, penitent worshipper Maukevasser.

Awa Se Juko Mikotto, in Japanese mythology, was the sovereign of Japan and half god. With him closed or ended the golden age of the god-men. He was the fifth ruler in the second generation of the oldest emperors of Japan, who were all demigods, and he reigned 836,042 years.

AWCOCK, JOHN, a Christian, suffered martyrdom in the middle of the 16th century. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, vi, 98.

AWETHIS is a hell of the Siamese which is 666 miles wide. Into this hell Dewahada was cast, the constant persecutor of the founder of Lamanism. He was fastened by iron bars which went through his body in three directions, so that he could not move. His head hangs in a vessel of fire, and his feet burn eternally.

AWICHO is a place of future torment among the Buddhists.

AXFORD, WILLIAM, an English Congregational minister, was born at Westbury, Wiltshire, in 1824. While a young man he gave himself to evangelical work, and labored zealously as a home missionary in Liverpool, Prescot, and Wandsoworth. He was educated at Cotton End, and settled in the pastorate at Castle Donington, in Leicestershire. After three years he removed to Clayton West, Yorkshire, where he was ordained. In 1865 he removed to Charnham and Lyme Regis, and in October of the following year began to devote his entire time to the latter. In the autumn of 1868 he became pastor of Colliburst-street-Chapel, Manchester, and in 1870 of the Church at Peasley Cross, St. Helens. Here he labored for little more than three years, when, in the midst of usefulness, he was smitten down with an illness from which he never recovered. He died Dec. 23, 1870. See Catholic Monthly, January, 1871, p. 908.

Axiomancy (from αἴξων an axe, and μονή procession, divination) is divination among the ancient Greeks by means of an axe or hatchet. A hatchet was fixed in equipoise upon a round stake, and the individual towards whom it moved was regarded as the guilty person. If suspicion rested upon any persons not present, their names were repeated, and the person at the repetition of whose name the hatchet moved was concluded to be guilty of the crime of which he was suspected. Another mode of practicing the art was by laying an agate-stone on a red-hot hatchet and watching its movements.

Axionius, one of the "Eastern" school of Valentinians, is said by Barbeisan (Aplémeniq) by Hippolytus (Ites, vi, 83). Eulogius, Bishop of Axionius, was a friend of Tertullian, when Tertullian wrote against the Valentinians, Axionius "alone at Antioch vindicated the memory of Valentinus by completely keeping his rules."

Axeley, JAMES, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born on New River, Va., in 1776, but shortly afterwards removed with his parents to Livingston County, Ky., where he spent his early years in farming and hunting. He made a profession of religion in 1801 and 1802, and in 1805 his name appears in the Minutes of the Western Conference as on trial. His appointments were: 1805, Red River Circuit; 1806, Hocking; 1807, French Broad; 1808, Appalassas; 1809, Power's Valley; 1810, Holston; 1811, Elk; 1812, presiding elder of Wabash District; 1813–16, Holston District; 1817–18, Green River District; 1819–21, French Broad District; in 1822 he located, settling on a farm near Madisonville, Tenn. He became a very thrifty farmer, and did much successful work as a local preacher. He was afterwards reduced to poverty by enduring for an acquaintance who failed. He maintained an unspotted character till the close of his life. He died Feb. 22, 1838. Mr. Axeley was a highly acceptable and effective preacher, a man of great power over the masses. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vii, 414; Simpson, Cyclopedia of Methodistism, s. v.; Stevens, History of the Methodist Episcopal Church, iv, 386, 372, 375, 405, 406, 430, 451.

Axionius, JOACHIM, a theologian, jurist, and poet of Brabant, was preceptor of Philip of Lalaing, and travelled in Italy, Spain, Palestine, and Greece. He then retired to Antwerp, where he became an attaché of the council of archbishops. He died Aug. 25, 1605. He wrote, De Laicorum et Sacerdotum Aequitatem Naturae et Aristotelis aliquis Philosophias: Magna Plutonia Oratio in Sepulchrum Christi (Dillingen, 1599): Dábat du Corps et de l'âme, et Jugement de Dieu qui la Termine (a dialogue of the Greek philosopher Gregory Palamas, published at Lyons in Latin and at Paris in Greek), and other works. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Axtell, Anthony DEY, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Geneva, N. Y., March 5, 1834. He was educated at Williams College, Mass., and studied in the Theological Seminary at Auburn, N. Y. He was ordained by Troy Presbytery in 1864, and labored at Oleon and at Lansingburgh, N. Y. He had several urgent calls to the pastorate of churches within the bounds of his own presbytery, but his health was rapidly failing. He made a visit to St. Paul, Minn., but he soon became worse, and was advised by his physicians to hasten home. He died Oct. 17, 1866. See Wilson, Preb. Hist. Almanac, 1867, p. 270.

Axtell, Daniel C., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Mendham, N. J., in 1800, but removed in his childhood with his father to Geneva, N. Y. He graduated at the College of the City of New York, in 1823, and was ordained to the Gospel ministry in the Congregational Church at Princeton, N. J., in 1830, and preached at Auburn, N. Y., until 1836. He died of hemorrhage of the lungs in 1837. See Sprague, Annales of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 454.

Axtell, Henry C., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Mendham, N. J., in 1802. He graduated at Hamilton College in 1825; was tutor there in 1825-28; studied theology in Princeton Theological Seminary, N. J., and in 1830 he was ordained as pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Lawrenceville, N. J. In 1835 he accepted a call to the Second Presbyterian Church in Orange, N. J., but in 1838 resigned his charge on account of ill-health, and removed to St. Augustine, Fla. He became a member of the Presbytery of Georgia in 1840. In 1843 he was appointed chaplain at Fort Brooke, Tampa Bay, which post he held until 1849, when he was transferred to New Orleans Barracks. He remained at this post until 1853, when he became disabled from duty, and removed to Philadelphia, where he died in 1862. He contributed to the Princeton Review in 1831 an article on "Biblical Eloquence and Poetry," and in 1834 "A Memorial of James Brainard Taylor." See Biblical Repertory and Princeton Review; Index to Princeton Review; Sprague, Annales of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 454.

Aulurus (or Ancurus), in Roman mythology, was the name of the supreme god among the Volscians. He is thought to be one with Veiovis, an Etruscan god of dangerous character. He was represented as a youth and armed.

Ayala, Martin Perez de, a Spanish prelate, was born at Higie, in the diocese of Carthagena, in 1504. He studied at Alcala, and entered the military order of St. Jago of the Sword at Salamanca. He accompanied Francis de Mendoza, bishop of Jaen, to Rome, and on his death was declared by Germany to contribute to the errors of the Protestants. Charles V sent him to the Council of Trent, and in 1548 nominated him to the bishopric of Guadix, in Granada; thence he was translated to the see of Segovia, and on his return from Trent he was, in 1564, made archbishop of Valencia, which Church he governed during his death, Aug. 5, 1566. His portrait, "Archbishop de De Dieu," appeared in the atque Ecclesiasticis Traditionibus deque Auctioritate ac Vi eorum SS. Assertiones (Cologne and Paris, 1549; Venice, 1551; Paris, 1562).

Ayala, Pedro, a pious Spanish Dominican, was born at Arenas in 1676. He assumed the religious habit at Avila, whence he proceeded to Alcala, where he was made professor of theology. By order of his superiors he accepted the see of Avila, and went on foot to possess it, accompanied only by one monk of his order, May 5, 1728. The benefits which he conferred upon his diocese were innumerable; his palace was a kind of monastery where prayer and study were the constant occupations. Clement XII made him his nuncio at the court of Spain, with the title and powers of legate a latere, and for three years he continued to discharge the duties of this difficult but honorable post, and succeeded in reconciling the two courts. The only reward for his services which he claimed was permission to resign his bishopric, which he obtained in 1738. He retired to the poorest convent of his order in Spain—viz. that of St. Rosa, near the village of Montebelan, where he died, May 20, 1742. He left several pastoral instructions and some treatises on moral theology. His Life was written by a historian of his order.

Ayars, Charles W., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., Feb. 22, 1836. He experienced religion in his eleventh year, received license to preach in his nineteenth year, and in 1856 entered the Philadelphia Conference, in which he served with zeal and fidelity until his decease, Nov. 18, 1869. From childhood Mr. Ayars was characterized by an earnest, consistent, and progressive piety. He was a diligent and well-informed student, preacher, and pastor. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1870, p. 49.

Ayars, James, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born near Bridgeton, N. J., Feb. 20, 1805. He was converted when a youth of twenty years old, and in 1829 was admitted into the Philadelphia Conference, where in he filled the following appointments: Bargaintown, Cape May, Newton, and Essex Circuits; Paterson, New Brunswick; Halsey Street, Newark; Burlington, Long Branch, New Brunswick; Green Street, Trenton; Rahway; Prospect Street, Paterson; Haverstraw, N. Y.; Trinity, Jersey City; Water Street, Elizabeth; was a supernumerary during 1856-60 because of an inflammation of the throat, but engaged as secretary of the American Sunday-school Union in the West. In 1861 he resumed his position in the active ranks, and was stationed first at Nyack, then at St. Paul's, Staten Island. He was president of the Newark District from 1864 to 1867; on Elizabeth District from 1868 to 1871; was pastor at Montclair and at New Providence. In 1877 his ill-health obliged him to become supernumary, and he continued to reside at New Providence till his death, Jan. 50, 1880. Mr. Ayars was remarkably successful as an evangelist, and was a faithful and wise administrator of the Discipline. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1880, p. 35.

Ayars, James B., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., Aug. 21, 1800. He was the subject of early religious impressions, and was converted in 1816; and soon began to exercise himself in every possible Christian enterprise, exhorting, preaching, and visiting. In 1822 he entered the Philadelphia Conference, in which he served till his superannuation, which relation he held during the last nine years of his life. He died March 9, 1873. Mr. Ayars was greatly devoted to the Church. Punctuality, zeal, faithfulness, and ardent piety characterized his life. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1873, p. 145.

Aybar, Pedro Ximenes, a Spanish painter, lived at Calatayud near the close of the 17th century. He had for his master Francisco Ximenes of Tarragona, whose style he adopted. He executed in 1682 for the collegiate Church of Santa Maria at Calatayud three paintings: The Holy Family,—The Epiphany,—The Nativity. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bio. Générale, s. v.

Abybert, Sr., a roodless priest of the Order of St. Benedict in Hainault, was born about 1000 at Espain, in Flandre. He lived for many years with another priest in a secluded cell, where they observed the strictest discipline. He went to Rome on foot, and after his return entered the Abbey of Crespin in Hainault, where he continued twenty-five years. The twenty-five last years of his life he spent in a cell he had dug in a barren desert, and died on Easter-day, 1140. He is mentioned in the martyrologies on April 7. See Baillit, April 7.

Aydelotte, Benjamin P., D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in 1795. His earlier years were spent in the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and though after entering the Presbyterian Church he did not sustain the relation of pastor, yet he supplied the vacant chairs for several years with great acceptability and usefulness. The greater part of his life was employed in teaching the classics in the schools of Cincinnati. He was possessed of great amiability, and an enlarged benevolence which prompted him to engage in every philanthropic enterprise. He was greatly esteemed by all for his many good qualities. He died in Cincinnati, Sept. 10, 1880. (W. P. S.)

Ayenar, in Hindit mythology, was the son of Siva and of Vishnu, the latter of whom was the mother, having taken the form of the nymph Moyeni. He was worshiped in small temples as protector. Goats and cocks were sacrificed to him, also horses made of clay.

Ayer, Francis C., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Cornish, Me., Nov. 1, 1813. He was converted in 1843, received license to exhort in 1846, and in 1849 joined the Maine Conference. He died at Bowdoinham, Me., May 10, 1872. Mr. Ayer was eminent for his saintliness, affability, affability, and piety. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1873, p. 73.

Ayer, John S., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Freedom, Me., in 1795. He experienced conversion at the age of twelve, and in 1818 joined the Maine Conference. In 1826 he located and engaged in business. In 1867 he re-entered the Conference and was put on the superannuatory list, which relation he sustained until his death. He was kind, persuasive, fluent, and eminently pious. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1876, p. 90.

Ayer, Joseph, a Congregational minister, was born at Stonington, Conn., May 19, 1793. He graduated at Brown University in 1822, and having studied theology with Rev. Timothy Tuttle of Ledyard, Conn., he was ordained at North Stonington in 1825, where he was engaged in the ministry for eleven years. He was elected an installed pastor at Hanover, where he remained eleven years. In 1831 he became pastor at South Killingly, having labored there two years previously as stated supply, and continued in charge until 1836. The following year found him installed at East Lyme. Subsequently he was acting pastor at Stonington, Freeport, and for two years, when he became the regular minister, in 1870. On his eighty-second birthday he resigned, and thus closed a long and useful ministerial career. He died at Somerville, Conn., Dec. 28, 1875. See Cong. Quarterly, 1876, p. 419; 1877, p. 812.

Ayers, Alexander, a Baptist minister, was born in Cortland County, N. Y., in 1813. He was converted in 1830, and united with the Church of the Pilgrim Covenant in Virgil, N. Y. In 1833 he was licensed, and was ordained in 1838 in Chenango County, where he spent most of his time preaching in different churches until the spring of 1853, when he removed to Illinois. A brief illness closed his life at his residence in Sherman, Connecticut, April 17, 1877. He was a faithful pastor and a man of prayer. See Free-swill Baptist Register, 1856, p. 91. (J. C.S.)

Ayeshah the favorite wife of Mohammed, and was born at Medina in 611. She was the daughter of Abu-Bekhr, and was betrothed to the prophet at the age of nine years. The twenty-fourth chapter of the Koran was written by the prophet to silence all those who doubted Ayeshah's purity. She survived her husband forty-six years, and took an active part in the contest against Ali, who took her prisoner, but suffered her to go unharmed. Her opinion was sought sometimes on difficult points in the Koran, and had the force of law with many of the Sunnites. She died at Medina about 676. See Ali: KULAN: MOHAMMED.

Ayglor, Bernard. See AGOGL, BERNARD.

Aynman, in the mythology of the South American natives, is the originator of all kinds of diseases and other evils. He is greatly feared, and small things are offered to him, which are thrown into flowing water. The vicious and cowards go to him after death to be tortured by him in the most outrageous manner.

Aynman, Michael. See ANGHIANI.

Aylliff, John, an English Wesleyan missionary, was born in London. He emigrated to South Africa in 1829; was admitted as a probationer for the ministry in 1827; was the first missionary appointed to the Fingoe tribes; was manager of the large and important Industrial Hall-school at Haddo Town; visited England in 1860; was soon disabled by disease, and died at Port Louis, Orange Free State, May 17, 1862, in the sixty-fourth year of his age. Aylliff was faithful to his trust, enduring privation and encountering danger in his earnest and faithful service.

Ayliffe, Richard, an English Congregational minister, was born at Basingstoke, Hants, June 2, 1790. He was converted in his twelfth year, and in his fifthteenth year was apprenticed to an ironmonger in the town of Buckingham. He joined the Congregational Church in his eighteenth year. At the close of his apprenticeship, he entered Dr. Bogue's academy or seminary at Gosperton. "About the termination of his studies, the Lady Batham was desirous of introducing an evangelical ministry into the borough of Stockbridge, Hants. By the advice of his venerated tutor, Mr. Ayliffe, in 1814, undertook the commencement of the work, in which he continued till his death." This was really a mission work, and every kind of opposition was manifest. He had no chapel, and service was conducted in a hired room, often with much confusion and noise; personal violence was threatened against the young pastor and all who gave heed to his teachings. By his efforts, however, aided by the liberality of the lady already alluded to, a chapel was erected in 1817, and endowed for the Protestant Congregational Dissenters. From 1814 to 1854 he labored unobtrusively and patiently, sowing the seeds of everlasting life, "waving every man, teaching every man;" and his labors were not without success, for what was, at the commencement of his work, a barren wilderness, showed at the close some resemblance to a garden adorned with fruits and flowers. He was of retiring habits, and his name was very seldom seen or his person known. After forty years of service, he died in peace, March 24, 1854. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1856, p. 2034.

Ayilworth, Reuben A., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Half Moon, N. Y., April 13, 1792. He was converted in 1810, and was admitted into the New York Conference in 1817; was transferred to the Genesee; located in 1829; admitted to the New York Conference in 1886; superannuated in 1844; and died at Hampden, O., Sept. 8, 1880. He was slight and weak physically; gentle, affable, winning, a most polished Christian gentleman; faithful and holy. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1880, p. 243.

Aymaras. See ADEMAR.

Aymarás are the earliest known inhabitants of the mountain valleys of South-eastern Peru and South-western Bolivia, to be found principally in the Peruvian province of Puno and the Bolivian provinces of La Paz and Oruro. Though distinct in language, they physically resemble the Indians of the great Quechuan or Inca family, who were indebted to them for a part of their religious rites and the knowledge of the arts. They worked skillfully in gold and silver, tilled the ground, built splendid edifices ornamented with sculpture and painting, and were somewhat versed in astronomy. Their poetry and religion were spiritualistic, their priests were bound to celibacy, and the dead were held in religious veneration. They have embraced Christianity, and are zealous observers of all the rites of the Roman Catholic faith, introducing, however, some relics of paganism. The Aymarás probably number 200,000 at the present day. In early times they worshipped the sun, and believed the present luminary to be the fifth, and that, after a long period of darkness, it emerged from the sacred isle in Lake Titicaca. Their tombs, sometimes large square buildings with a single opening through which the body was introduced, contained twelve bodies placed feet to feet around a cavity, sitting in their clothes. Some of these tombs are small houses of sunburnt bricks; others
Ayer, a square town of several stories, containing each a body; but the rate be the size, there were always joined in groups, with opening facing the east.

Ayer, Richard J., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Standish, Me., Nov. 15, 1843. He embraced religion in his fourteenth year, and in 1826 entered the Maine Conference. During the following forty-eight years of his itinerancy, eighteen were effective, nine superintendency, and twenty-one superannuated; died Jan. 17, 1874. His death was characterized by sound judgment, fluency, energy, and deep piety. Overwork disabled him. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1874, p. 76.

Ayer, William, an English Congregational minister, was born at Petrockstow, Devonshire, in 1800. He was brought up in the Church of England, but afterwards adopted the principles of Congregationalism. He studied with a view to the ministry at Homerton College, but because of ill-health he did not complete his course. Mr. Ayer's first charge was in Northamptonshire; from there he removed to Ullenhurst, Leices tershire, and then to Long Ickington; from thence to Southam, and finally to Morpeth, where he was pastor for twenty-five years, residing there until his death, April 30, 1877. His services as preacher were in frequent request. See (London) Cong. Year-book, 1878, p. 304.

Ayres, Enos, a Presbyterian minister, was ordained by the New York Presbytery, before May, 1750, as the minister of Blooming Grove, Orange Co. He graduated at 1748, and his name stands first on the roll of alumni. He died in 1765. See Webster, Hist. of Presb. Church in America (1857); Alexander, Princeton College in the Eighteenth Century.

Ayres, Hiram M., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Pennsylvania in 1840. He experienced religion at the age of seventeen; graduated at the Illinois Wesleyan University in 1868, and in the same year was admitted to the Central Illinois Conference. He died Aug. 4, 1870. Mr. Ayres was an earnest, faithful, successful preacher and pastor. His life was a beautiful representation of the highest development of the Christian graces. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1870, p. 217.

Ayres, Robert G., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Stark County, O., in 1853. In 1868 he entered the Southern Illinois Conference, but in 1881 failing health obliged him to retire from active service. He died Aug. 21, 1862. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1862, p. 211.

Ayres, Thomas, an English Baptist minister, was born in 1781. He was ordained pastor of the Church at Keynsham, near Bristol, in the year 1813; and remained there forty years. He died Nov. 25, 1853. See (Londo.) Baptist Hand-book, 1854, p. 46. (J. C. S.)

Asabe-Kaberi is, according to the Koran, a punishment of the wicked inflicted in the grave. A frightful monster, with whom they must endure companionship, administers constant floggings until the day of resurrection, when the evil-doers are instantly cast into hell.

Azad, according to the religious doctrine of the Orientals, is the first production or creation of the supreme being, the primary essence of reason, which is entirely light; the second production, the spirit, coming out of the former.

Azadans and Azades, Christian martyrs, a deacon and a eunuch, were killed in Persia under Sapor II about A.D. 341. The latter was a favorite of the king, and was put to death instantly upon his own mere profession of Christianity, to the king's great grief.

Azambuja, Don João Esteves de, a Portuguese prince, was born in the 14th century in the small borough from which he took his name. He belonged to an ancient family, and first pursued a course of arms, which he abandoned in order to devote himself to study and to enter the order. The founder of the order of Avis esteemed him highly; so much so that, after he had passed the various degrees of the ecclesiastical hierarchy, he was raised, in 1402, to the archbishopric of Lisbon. In 1409 he was sent to the Council of Tissa, and left Italy in 1411 for Jerusalem. On his return to Portugal, already at an advanced age, he was, in 1411, made cardinal priest by Gregory XII with the title of St. Peter ad Vincula. Wishing to be consecrated by the pope himself, he went to Rome, but as he was about to return to Lisbon fell ill at Bourges, where he died. Jan. 28, 1414. His body was brought to Lisbon, and was buried in the convent of the Dominicans which he had founded in 1392. He wrote Statutes of the Monastery of St. Saviour. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s.v.

Azariah de Rossi. See Rossi.

Azariel ben-Menachem, a Spanish rabbi, was born at Valladolid about 1160. He distinguished himself as a philosopher, Cabalist, Talmudist, and commentator, as his works indicate. He was a pupil of Isaac the Blind, and later became the orator of the Spanish Jews. He was master of the celebrated R. Moses Nachmanides, who was also a distinguished pillar of Cabalism. Azariel died in 1238. He wrote A Commentary on the Ten Sephiroth by Way of Questions and Answers ("ר בת הדר נאטר אלפיא לאריאס ה'ספירות המפשיכו על ציון לאון ומتحمل"), which was first known through the Cabalistic works of Meir Ibn-Gabbai entitled נאטר האלפיא וה.capture המפשיכו על ציון לאון ומتحمل, The Path of Faith (Padua, 1568), and א"ר א"ל"פ מצרי, The Service of Holiness, also called ו"נ ו"ר, The Vision of God (Mantua, 1545; Venice, 1567; Cracow, 1578). It was published in German by Warschauer's work entitled A Volume of Cabalistic Treatises (ז"ס ו"נ ו"ר, 1784), and recently in Berlin (1860). A lucid analysis of Azariel's Cabalistic philosophy is given by Jellinek, in his Beitrag zur Geschichte der Kabbalah (Leipzig, 1859), which is translated by Ginsberg in his Kabbalah (p. 95 sq.), and by Dr. Goldammer in the Israeliite (Cincinnati, Feb. 7 and 14, 1873). See also Grütz, Gesch. d. Juden, vii, 69-78; Jost, Gesch. d. Juden, u. s. Secten, iii, 71. (B. F.)

Azazi, in Mohammedan superstition, are powerful spirits standing next to the throne of the Supreme God.

Azeez, in Oriental tradition, was an idol which Abraham's father, Terah, worshipped. Because Abraham broke this and other idols he was accused by his father, before the prince Nimrod, of blasphemy and of abuse of idols, and thrown into a fiery furnace; but his body was not consumed.

Azekah. Dr. Tristram (Bible Places, p. 44) thinks this is "probably the modern Deir el-Aashik," which the Ordnance Map lays down as Deir el-Ashik, a deserted locality on a slight eminence a mile and a quarter south-west of Wady Surâr, and seven miles north-west of Shuweikeh (Socoh), containing the remains of a church and traces of other ruins; but, aside from the tolerable agreement in name, there is little to commend this identification.

Azem. Of this place Dr. Tristram thinks (Bible Places, p. 28) a trace remains in the name of the Azaizim Arabs who occupy the region in question. See lsm.

Azevedo, Ignacio de, a Portuguese ecclesiastic, was born at Oporto in 1527 of an illustrious family. He entered the Society of Jesus as a novice at Coimbra in 1548, and some time after received holy orders and was named rector of the College of St. Antony at Lisbon by St. Ignatius. Dom Bartholomeus de Mar-tyres, the celebrated archbishop of Braga, called him from his studies at Lisbon to associate him with himself in his diocesan visitations; and in 1560 a Jesuits' college was established at Braga, of which Azevedo was made superior. In 1569 he made profession of the four vows, after which he was employed for three years, with the authority of visitor, in Brazil. He returned to Europe, visited Rome, and in 1570 obtained permission to return to Brazil with a large company of missionaries; but the ship which conveyed him was taken by Soria, the viceroy of Viceroy of Peru, and the queen of Navarre, who murdered the missionary and his thirty-nine companions, July 15, 1570. The Roman Church, by a papal bull dated 1742, honors them as martyrs. In 1745 G. F. de Beauséjour, a Jesuit, published a Life of the Venerable Ignatius.

Azevedo, João, a Portuguese theologian, was born at Santarem, Jan. 27, 1665. He studied theology, and entered the Order of the Hermits at St. Augustine. He died at Lisbon, June 16, 1746. He wrote, Tribunal Theologicum et Juridicum contra Subdulos Confessariorum in Sacramento Pementitiam ad Venerem Sollicitantes (Lisbon, 1726).

There was another Portuguese theologian of the same name, a canon and inquisitor, who was born at Lisbon about 1625, and died Nov. 19, 1677. He was doctor of civil law, and left several minor works on the subject, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Azevedo, Luiz de, a Portuguese missionary, was born in 1573 at Chaves, upon the frontier of Galicia. At the age of sixteen he entered the Order of St. Augustine, and in 1586 he was sent to complete his novice. In 1588 he was then appointed master of novices and rector at Tana. About 1604 he started for Abyssinia in company with Lorenzo Romano, and there founded a school and converted to Christianity the king of the country, Seltame. He was perfectly acquainted with the different dialects of Abyssinia, particularly the Amharic. He died Feb. 22, 1634, in Mekeke, and the name was given him a translation of the New Test. into Amharic, a catechism in the same dialect, and a grammar in Amharic and Latin.

There were two others of the same name as the above—a Spanish monk of the Order of St. Augustine, a native of Medina Campo, who died in 1600, and who published Discursos Morales en las Fiestas de nuestra Señora (Valladolid, 1600); and a Portuguese Dominian who published a treatise on the education of children. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Azevedo, Silvestre de, a Portuguese Dominian, was sent to Malacca, and entered the kingdom of Cambay about 1608, when he softened the hearts of the reigning prince and induced him to grant him permission to preach the Gospel. He converted many, and died in 1587. It is said that the king before permitting him to preach required of him a Treatise on the Mysteries of the Faith in the language of Cambay, which he executed in 1585; but the work is unknown in Europe. See Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Azevedo-Coutinho, Joze Joaquim da Cunha, a Portuguese bishop, the last inquisitor-general of Portugal and Brazil, was born in the district of Campos dos Goitacazes, Brazil, Sept. 8, 1742. He commenced his studies at Rio de Janeiro, and went to Coimbra to finish them. He entered the order, and was almost immediately intrusted with many important affairs. In 1791 he took part in the great question of political economy, and defended before the government the interests of Brazil. This was the epoch of the publication of his excellent work entitled Ensaio Economico sobre o Commercio de Portugal e suas Colonias. In 1794 he was appointed bishop of Pernambuco, and four years later published at London, Analyse sur la Justice du Commerce du Brésil et des Colonies, a response to the motion brought forward in the English Parliament to abolish slavery. He was chosen bishop of Elvas, and in 1818 of Beja, and in the same year received the title of inquisitor-general. He was appointed to represent the interests of the capital before the Cortes, which he did with zeal and ability. This was his last work. He died Sept. 12, 1821. He wrote Memoria sobre a Conquista do Rio de Janeiro por Duque Trémis in 1711, which was first published in 1816 in Memorias Historicas, and again in 1819 in a work published at London by Thompson. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aziluth (also Azieluth), of Cabalistic mythology, is the general name of the ten personal emanations of the Supreme Being, of which the Sephiroth formed the first triad viz. the Lord of Spirits, Lord of the Eldest One, and the Lord of the Other Powers.

Azizus, in Syrian mythology. At Edessa, in Syria, the god of the sun was worshipped with Monimus (Mercury) and Azizus (Mars) as deities connected with him. By Monimus the change of the sun seems to be designated, and by Azizus the sun's strength.

Azael, according to the Talmud, is the angel of death. Because he did not heed the request of the earth not to carry dust to heaven, out of which human beings might be made who would afterwards be cursed, God gave him the office of angel of death. The Arabs call him Abu-Jahja; the Parsees, Mardad.

Azran, in Oriental tradition, was the daughter of Adam and the wife of Abel. Cain loved her, and therefore slew Abel.

Aze-ka'h is the name of a sect which arose in the East headed by Naft ben-Azrach. They refused to acknowledge any superior power on earth, whether temporal or spiritual. They became a powerful body under the reign of the caliphs, declared themselves the sworn enemies of the Ommandes, but were at length overpowered and dispersed.

Azynus (from כַּנֵּשׁ, unleavened), fully, panis azynus, i. e. unleavened bread. The practice of the Latin Church of consecrating with unleavened bread was opposed by that of the Greek Church, which has always maintained the use of leavened bread in the holy mysteries. The chief reasons urged in support of this opinion against the schoolmen are the following:

1. That the holy eucharist was originally consecrated from the oblations of the people, which, past all doubt, consisted of common bread and wine, and what remained was consumed by the priests, with the laity, as a holy mystery. See 2 Epiphanius notices it as a rite peculiar to the Ebonites that they consecrated with unleavened bread and water only.

2. That the ancient usage was that the bread used was common bread, "panis sustitutus." See Ambrose, De Sacr. Iv. 4.

3. The sixth canon of the Council of Toledo, A.D. 693, which condemns the practice of some priests who contented themselves with using common bread ("de panibus sanctis nubanti prelibatis ... auferunt") cut into a round form, and orders that the bread used at the altar shall be made on purpose (Labbie, vii, 1327).

4. The tenth canon of Council of Constatinople, A.D. 785, which directs that "bread be offered by the faithful, and not crusta," "non crusta" (Johnson, Eccles. Canons, vol. 1), where cardinal Bona thinks that the "crusta" implied unleavened bread.

5. The silence of the ancients as to the use of unleavened bread, whereas they do often speak of leavened bread.

6. The silence of Photinus, who, when enumerating every possible cause of corruption set the Latin omits all notice of their use of unleavened bread.

8. The fact that no law on the subject of the use of unleavened bread before time of Photinus exist.

Azzi, Oratio degli, an Italian theologian, a native of Parma, lived at the close of the 17th and the commencement of the 18th century. He entered the Order of Minorites, in which he was known by the name of Oratio di Parma. He wrote, Pozzo Profondo Scopo to alla Cattedra Gregoria (Venice, 1702)—Riflessioni sopra la Genesi (ibid. 1710, 1716);—Esposizioni Letterali e Morali sopra la Scrittura (ibid. 1736-46). See

AZZOGUIDI, Antonio Maria, an Italian theologian, son of Valerius Felix, was born at Bologna in 1697.
He entered the Order of St. Francis, and pub-

AZZOLINI, Decio (synonym the younger), an Italian prelate, was born at Fermo, in the States of the Church, in 1623. He became cardinal in 1664, and died at Rome in 1689. He wrote Eminentissimi Cardinalis Azzolini Aphorismi Politici, translated into Latin by Henning (Osnaburg, 1691). We find in Muratori and Cresimbeni poems by Azzolini. See Hoefer, Nouv.
Biog. Générale, s. v.

AZZOLINI (or Mazzolini), Giovanni Bernardino, a Neapolitan painter, flourished about 1510. In Genoa, where he resided, there are several of his works in the different churches. In the Church of San Giuseppe are two pictures by him representing the Annunciation and the Martyrdom of St. Apollonia, which are much more praised by Soprani. He excelled in wax-work. See Spooner, Biog. Hist.

Ba (the soul), in Egyptian mythology, was one of the five component parts of the human being. See Akh, Kha, Khebra, etc. It was represented as a human-headed bird, often with a cross in its claws.

Baader, Johann Michael, a German painter, was born in 1736. He studied at Paris in 1759, and in 1788 went to Eichstadt, his native city, to serve as painter to the bishop of that place. He painted pict-

Baader, Tobias, a Bavarian sculptor, lived in the latter half of the 17th century. He executed several works for the churches and convents of his native country. Chief among them we notice, Christ on the Cross, with his Mother.—The Virgin with the Infant Jesus.—St. John the Baptist. See Hoefer, Nouv.

Baal of Simeon (1 Chron. iv, 38) is regarded by Luit. Conder (Tent Work, ii, 334) as the present Unum Baghleh, but this location is far from the probable sites of the associated places. Conder (ibid.) identifies it with Baalath of Simeon (Josh. xv, 29).

Baal Akedah. See ARAHAM, ISAAC.

Baal-Berith is a person who, among modern Jews, acts as joint master of ceremonies along with the operator in the rite of circumcision (q. v.). He is to hold the child on his knees while the circumciser is performing the operation. As a preparation for his duty he must wash his whole person.

Baal-hamon. Luit. Conder suggests (Tent Work, ii, 335) that this is the modern Belcham; but this seems to be the site assigned to Helem (q. v.). See also BELMEX.

Baal-tamar. Luit. Conder proposes (Tent Work, ii, 335) for this the present Ateraa, but the names correspond but slightly.

Baalath (Josh. xix, 44; Josephus, Ant. viii, 6, 1) is referred to by Luit. Conder (Tent Work, ii, 334) as identical with the present ruins at the village of Bel'ain, seven miles east of Jimzah, and ten west of Beitin, a position to which Tristram accedes (Bible Places, p. 51), even though he elsewhere (ibid. p. 198) adopts Van de Vedde's location at Deir Balat.

Baalath-beer (Bealoth or Ramath-negev).
"From the incidental notices and the names we gather that it was a watering-place of importance (Beer-Baalath and had artificial tanks; that it was on a commanding height (Ramath); that it was on the frontier, and we might expect traces of fortification to remain. All these conditions are fulfilled in Kurubah, south-west of Dhullam, where alone for many miles water is always found in plenty, and where the ravine is crossed by a strong dam to retain it. The walls of a fortified town are yet clearly to be traced, with extensive ruins, and it is at the head of the most frequented pass into Palestine from the south-east." (Tristram, Bible Places,
p. 17).

Baardsorps (or Baardsorps), MARUSIN KORNE-LIUS, a priest of the Netherlands, son of Kornelius, a physician and diplomatist, lived in the early half of the 17th century. He encouraged the ecclesiastical state, made a pilgrimage, and on his return became director of the hospital at Putteryken, founded in 1525. He left all his possessions to this hospital for the maintenance of poor children, who were to be educated and taken care of until the age of nine years. See Hoefer, Bab, a word signifying father, and used by the ancient Persian magi to denote fire, which they considered the father and first principle of all things, as taught by Zoroaster. (q. v.).

Bab, John, an Armenian theologian, studied theology and history at the monastery of Mirawank in Armenia, and gained great renown for his learning. He died near the close of the 7th century, and left in manuscript, a Commentary on the Four Gospels.—Examina-

Baba, a Turkish impostor who lived in the early half of the 13th century, appeared in the city of Ama-sia in 1240, and required his disciples to adopt as their profession of faith that there existed one God, and that Baba was his envoy. The Mohammedans attempted to arrest Baba, but he escaped them, and collected an army with which he sustained several engagements against them; but finally, by the aid of the Franks, the Mussulmans drove him out and dispersed his sect. See

BABA LALIS

Baba Lal is a Hindū sect sometimes included among the Vaishnavā (q. v.) sects. In reality, however, they adore but one god, dispensing with all forms of worship, and directing their devotions by rules and objects derived from a medley of Vedanta and Sufi tenets.

Babæus was a leading member of the Nestorian Church planted by Barsamias in Persia, who, though originally a layman, and as such married, succeeded Acacius as archbishop or patriarch of Seleucia, after a two years' vacancy of the see, in the year 496. Babæus thus became the head of the Persian Church, in which capacity he summoned a synod by which the Nestorian body was completely organized. Among the canons passed by this synod was one granting permission to bishops or presbyters to marry once. See Assemani, Bibl. Orient. III, ii, 79, 381, 429; Neander, Church History (English translation), iv, 285.

Babbitt, Pierre Teller, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born in New York city, Feb. 12, 1811. He graduated at Yale College in 1831; the three years following he devoted to teaching, and then entered the General Theological Seminary of the Protestant Episcopal Church in New York city, where he graduated in 1835; he was ordained deacon in the same year, and was advanced to the priesthood in 1837. He officiated for a short time in 1836 in St. Paul's Church, Woodbury, Conn., and then removed to Boonville, Mo., where he did frontier work as a minister and teacher until 1858, when he accepted the rectorship of St. Luke's Church, Erie, Pa. A year or two later he went to Hudson, N. Y., as rector of Christ Church, but contracting the asthma, he was compelled to remove to a milder climate. He went to South Carolina and took charge of the parochial school in Charleston, performing missionary work also. In 1848 he returned to his old parish at Woodbury, but in 1856 removed to North Carolina to take charge of a school near Raleigh. After a brief service there, he went to Tallahassee, Fla., as assistant minister of St. John's Church, but in 1853 came North again, and accepted the rectorship of Grace Church, South Middleton, N. Y. In 1862 he removed to St. Mark's Church, Newark, N. J., and in October, 1865, became the head-master of Drawbridge Institute, Westerfield Springs, N. Y. In 1869 he became rector of the Episcopal Church at Bainbridge, Ga., and continued there till his death, April 1, 1881. See Obituary Record of Yale College, 1881.

Babbitt, Amzi B., a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, was born in New Jersey. He graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1816, and at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1819. He served for a time in the Presbyterian Church in Peques, Pa., and in the Second Reformed (Dutch) Church of Philadelphia (1834-35), also in the Presbyterian Church at Salisbury, Pa. He died in 1846. See Corwin, Manual of the Reformed Church of America (3d ed.), p. 168.

Babbitt, Carlisle, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Vermont, March 19, 1808. In 1831 he entered the itinerant ranks of the Kentucky Conference. He located and moved to Illinois in 1855, and in 1857 united with the Southern Illinois Conference, in which he labored with anxious zeal and fidelity until his decease, June 26, 1864. Mr. Babbitt was a devoted father and husband, and an excellent minister. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1877.

Babcock, Cyrus Giles, a Baptist minister, graduated at Brown University in 1816, and was licensed to preach in 1817. He was called to the pastorate of the Baptist Church at Bedford, Mass., but he declined the call because of ill-health. He died in March, 1817. See Sprague, Annuals of the Amer. Pulpit, vi, 387.

Babcock, E. C., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the Diocese of New York, a graduate of the General Theological Seminary, was engaged for a number of years as missionary in Greenpoint, N. Y., until about 1856, when he ceased to perform regular ministerial duty. He died about 1859. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1860, p. 93.

Babcock, James, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Washington County, N. Y., in March, 1800. He experienced religion in his sixteenth year, but lost it again by yielding to worldly fascinations; was reconverted in 1823; received license to preach in 1825, and was admitted into the Pittsburgh Conference. In 1828 his health so failed that he was obliged to become superannuated, and he died Feb. 8, 1829. Mr. Babcock was diligent, pious, and useful. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1831, p. 114.

Babcock, Rufus, D.D., an eminent Baptist minister, was born at Colebrook, Conn., Sept. 18, 1798. He graduated at Brown University in the class of 1821, and soon after was appointed tutor in Columbian College, Washington, D. C. During his connection with the college, he pursued his theological studies under the direction of the president, Rev. Dr. Stoughton. He was ordained in 1823 as pastor of the Baptist Church in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., where he remained four years, and then removed to Seth P. Boker, and took charge of the First Baptist Church in that place as associate pastor with the Rev. Lucas Boker, D.D., whom he succeeded on his retirement to accept the office of corresponding secretary of the Baptist General Convention. He was chosen president of Waterville College in 1833, and occupied that position for nearly four years, when he returned to the active ministry, and was pastor in Philadelphia and in New Bedford, Mass.; a second time in Poughkeepsie, and in Paterson, N. J., when he retired from the pastorate and performed service in the interests of some of the leading benevolent organizations of his denomination and of the American Sunday-school Union. He died in Salem, Mass., May 27, 1875. Dr. Babcock contributed much with his pen to various magazines and religious newspapers, and published several works, among which were the following: Claims of Educational Societies (1829) — Making Light of Christ (1829) — Memoir of Andrew Fuller (coll.) — Sketches of George Whitefield (1830) — Abridgment of Babcock's Abstractions (1832) — History of Watertown College (1836) — Tales of Truth for the Young (1837) — Memoir of John Mason Peck (1848) — The Emigrant's Mother (1859). Babcock, Samuel B., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the Diocese of Massachusetts, was rector in St. Paul's Parish, Dedham, Mass., for many years, covering nearly the whole of his ministerial life. He died Oct. 25, 1873. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1874, p. 139.

Babcock, Samuel B., a Methodist Episcopal minister, who in the early days of Methodism entered the itinerancy within the bounds of the Pittsburgh Conference, and did valiant service until his death, in 1864 or 1866. He was characterized as a preacher by earnestness and pathos, and his efforts were blessed with many extensive revivals. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1865, p. 28.

Babez was the head of a heretical sect among the Mohammedans which arose in the beginning of the second century of the Hegira. He made an open profession of impiety, and embraced no religion or sect, and in Asia he was called the founder of the mystery religion. His practices and teachings were gross and licentious to the last degree.

Babel, in the book of Baruch of the Gnostic Justin, is the name of the first of the twelve maternal angels born to Elohim and Edem (Hippolytus, Hær. xxvi, 151). She is identical with Aphrodite, and is enjoined by her mother to cause adulteries and desertsions among men in revenge for the desertion of Edem by Elohim. When Hercules is sent by Libor to overawe the maternal angels, Babel, now identical with Omphale, beguiles and enfeebles him. She may possibly be the Baalit, or female Baal, of various Semitic nations; but it is better, on the whole, to take Babel as a form of Barbolo.

Babenstuber, Léodvico, a German philosopher, was born at Leoben, in 1693. In 1718, he joined the Order of the Benedictines, and acted for a number of years as tutor at the Salzburg University. In 1716 he retired to his monastery in Ettal, and died there in 1726. He published, Problematum et Theorematum Phi-

Babe, JAMES, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Hanover County, Va., July 25, 1724. He was educated at Hampden Sidney College, Va., and spent three years at the Associate Reformed Seminary. N. Y. In 1813 he entered Princeton Theological Seminary, where he spent two years. He was licensed as a minister in 1821, and his ministry extended over a large part of the states of Maryland and Virginia. He died Aug. 19, 1863. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1865, p. 73.

was born in 1570. His master was Peter Neefs, and he excellled as a representative of the interior of churches.

him. He died in 1624. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, Babi, in Egyptian mythology, was the surname of the evil god Typhon, who murdered the good Osiris.

Babia, in Syrian mythology, was the goddess of childhood, the protecting genius of the newly born children among the inhabitants of Damascus.

Bablos was a heathy deity of the ancient Poles.
The discovery of the training of bees was attributed to this deity, whose wooden statue was often found near beehives.

Babin, François, a French theologian, was born at Angers, Dec. 6, 1651. He was canon, grand-vicar, and dean of the Faculty of Theology of Angers, where he died, Dec. 19, 1734. He edited the first eight volumes of Conferences du Diocèse d'Angers, a highly esteemed and widely circulated work. His style was pre-excellent. He was the author of a Journal, or Relation Fàde de Tout ce qui s'est Passe Babolencus (Bobaicen), Sr., was a French monk, of whose life very little is known. He is supposed to have been born in Burgundy. He was St. Babolencus, or Bobolencus, abbot of Bobbido—and, like him, was brought up, it is probable, in the monastery of Luxeuil, either under St. Columbanus or his successor, Eustasius.

When Blidegusius, archdeacon of Paris, founded the monastery of Saint-Maur-des-Fossés in 988, he requested that he be consecrated archbishop of Luxeuil, and the monastery should be appointed abbots; whereupon St. Walbertus, who had succeeded Eustasius, sent Babolencus. He died in 660 or 670, and his festival is marked in the martyrology of June 26. See Landan, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer,

Babylonia. The recent explorations into the monuments of this country have led to many new conculsions respecting the early ethnic relations of the Babylonians. These we give in the résumé of one of the most accepted experts (Prof. Sayce, in the last edition of the Encyclopaedia Britanica); premises, however, that we do not fully acquiesce in some of them, especially the chronology, and that we are not at all inclined to regard the geographical identifications as fully determined.

"Geographically, as well as ethnologically and historically, the whole district enclosed between the two great rivers of Western Asia, the Tigris and Euphrates, forms but one country. The writers of antiquity clearly recognised this fact, speaking of the whole under the general name of Babylonia, as our author would therefore have been a more accurate designation. It naturally falls into two divisions, the northern being more or less mountainous, while the southern is flat and marshy. Along the near approach of the two rivers to one another at a spot where the undulating plateau of the north sinks suddenly into the Babylonian alluvium tends still more completely to separate them. In the earliest times of which we have any record, the northern portion was not subdued un-</n>}

cruched beyond the banks of the Euphrates upon the territory of the Semitic nomads (or Sut). Here stood Ur, a very early capital of Chaldaea, and Babylon, with its suburb Borsippa (Birs Nimrud), as well as the two Sipparas (the Sepharvaim of Scripture, or the two spires of the city), with the cabins of the fertile plain on the left side of the river. The Araxes, or 'River of Babylon,' was conducted through a deep valley into the heart of Arabia, irrigating the great plain, which was watered by the Tigris and Euphrates. Above and below this sea, from Borsippa to Kutha, extended the famous Chaldaean marshes, which were not navigable by the Babylonian canal builders. On the other side of the river, the Euphrates was Ecbatana (now fair), which was established by the Medes, and, between the sea of Nejef and Ur, on the left side of the Euphrates, was Ecbatana (now Mshaf), formed the tetrapolis of Sumur or Sinjar. This north-western part of Chaldea was also called Gaddumyas or Gud-dul after the accession of the Cassite dynasty. South-eastern Chaldaea, on the other hand, was termed Accad, though the name came also to be applied to the whole of Babylonia. The Caldai or Chaldeans, as the inhabitants of Babylonia were called, were the first to accept the Assyrian alphabet of the Sumerian people. A number of books and literature. Naram-Sin and his father, Sargon, had not only subdued the rivers of Babylonia, but had successfully invaded Syria, Palestine, and Egypt, as it would seem, Egypt. At Agana, a suburb of Sippara, a battle was fought in which a Sargon had been killed. The successors of the Sargon in his works on astrology and astronomy, copies of which were made in later times for the libraries of Assyria. Indeed, the legendary history of Naram-Sin, the first king of Babylonia that his person became surrounded with an atmosphere of mystery. Not only was he regarded as a sort of eponymus of literature, but his name was a term of reproach whose title was 'the deviser of law and prosperity.' J, and Dar- imba (Arak) alone need be mentioned. The cultivation of the land was divided among the chief of which carried off the waters of the Euphrates towards the Tigres above Babylon. The name of this chief or, Ar-Malch, entering the Tigres a little below Bagdad, the Nahr-Malcha running across to the site of Seleucia, and the Nahr-Malcha, the Malcha, none of which is a thing. The region of the Euphrates, on the other side of the Euphrates, supplied an immense lake in the neighborhood of Borsippa. So great was the force of the water from the Malcha, that, in the time of Nebuchadnezzar, the grain commonly returned two hundredfold to the sower, and occasionally three hundredfold. Bali (H. N. A. 1, 2), in accordance with a proverb, 'cut off, and you will have good for sheep, and Berosus remarked that wheat, barley, sesame, oil, apples, and many kinds of shells grew wild, as wheat still does in the neighborhood of Assur. A Persian poet celebrated the three hundredth anniversary of the palm (Strabo, xvi, 1, 14); and Ammianus Marcellinus (xxiv, 5) states that from the point reached by Julian's army to the shores of the Persian Gulf was one continuous forest of verdure. The primitive population of Babylonia, the builders of its cities, the originators of its culture, and the inventors of the art of writing, and most of the art developed, belonged to the Turanian or Ural-Altaic family. Though their language was very ancient, they are the only people who have preserved the origin of Chaldean civilization and writing. They were, at all events, the most popular people in the Semitic world, and it is to them that the Assyrians ascribed the origin of Chaldean civilization and writing. The story that they were sometimes named, were named first in the royal Ulus out of respect to their prior settlement in the country.

"The supremacy of Ur had been disputed by its ancient rival Erech, but had finally given way before the rise of Babylon. The last of the Sumerian monarchs, Ur and Karak in its turn was succeeded by Larsa. Elamite conquest seems to have had something to do with these events, but the later Chaldaean period of which our present knowledge is fixed by an inscription of Assur-bani-pal—"Ogel Khishshu, the Elamite, conquered Chaldea at a time when it was divided into three districts, not having been already reigning there: and, Cuvardil-mating not only Charles the Great, but also the whole of the latter part of the history of the monarchs of Babylonia. His son and successor took an Accadian name and extended his sway over the whole country. Twice did the Elamite tribe of Cassil, or Kossama, furnish Chaldea with a succession of kings. At a very early date the united Kossama dynasties claimed homage from Syria, Gutim, and Northern Arabia, and rededicating the images of native Babylonian gods which had fallen into disuse, they lived in the splendor and expense. The other Cassite dynasty was founded by Khammmaraq, who established his capital at Babylon, which he occupied for the title of "king of the land of the Nippur, or of empire in the south. The dynasty is probably to be identified with that called Babylon by Berosus, and it was probably during its decline that Shalmaneser, the first to supreme Accad as the language of the country. Khammmaraq was the last king to bear the Babylonian name, and a Semitic inscription of his is now at the Louvre. A large number of canals were constructed during his reign, more especially the irrigation works built along the banks of the Tigris. The king's attention seems to have been turned to the subject of irrigation by a flood which he himself claimed as the result of a fire. His first conquests were in the north of Babylonia, and from this base of operations he succeeded in overthrowing Naram-Sin (or Rim-Ak) in the south and making himself master of the whole of Chaldea. Naram-Sin and a queen had been the last representatives of a dynasty which had attained a very high degree of glory both in arms and literature. Naram-Sin and his father, Sargon, had not only subdued the rivers of Babylonia, but had successfully invaded Syria, Palestine, and Egypt, as it would seem, Egypt. At Agana, a suburb of Sippara, a battle was fought in which a Sargon had been killed. The successors of the Sargon in his works on astrology and astronomy, copies of which were made in later times for the libraries of Assyria. Indeed, the legendary history of Naram-Sin, the first king of Babylonia that his person became surrounded with an atmosphere of mystery. Not only was he regarded as a sort of eponymus of literature, but his name was a term of reproach whose title was 'the deviser of law and prosperity.' Popular legends told of his mysterious birth—how, like Homer and Alcides, he was found in a reed bed and raised by the waves, and that the king of Babylon was carried by the stream to the dwelling of a ferryman, who reared him as his own son until at last he came to the throne. As 'the constituted king—for such is the meaning of his name—took his seat upon the throne of his ancestors. It was while still in infancy that he united Egypt, Arabia, and Egypt, Arabia, and he conquered the Egyptians, Sennacherib, and the Medes. The kingdom of Assyria took its rise. Its princes soon began to treat with their southern neighbors on equal terms; the boundaries of the two kingdoms were settled, and intermarriages between the royal families took place, which led more than once to an interference on the part of the Assyrians in the affairs of Babylonia. Finally, in the 14th century B.C., Tiglath-Pileser of Assyria captivated Babylon and established a Semitic line, which reigned there, which continued until the days of the later Assyrian empire. From this time down to the destruction of Nineveh in 612 B.C., Babylonia was the seat of power in Western Asia. Occasionally, it is true, a king of Babylon succeeded in defeating his aggressive rival and invading Assyria; but in the main the monarchy of the Assyrians was overthrown. The Assyrians grew more and more powerful at the expense of the weaker state, until at last Babylonia was reduced to a mere province or dependency of the mighty empire. The history of the next period—namely, that of Assyrian domination—properly belongs under Assyria (q. v.). On the downfall of Nineveh, Nabopolassar, the last of the Babylonian dynasty of Babylonia, who had achieved his independence, transferred the seat of government to the southern kingdom. We cannot, on account of this later Babylonian empire by an additional extract from the same source, embodying the views of the latest investigators, in whose results, however, especially some of their dates, we do not fully concur.

Nabopolassar was followed in 606 B.C. by his son Nebuchadnezzar, who in 604 B.C. succeeded to the throne of Babylon the mistress of the world. The whole East was overrun by the armies of Chaldea, Egypt was invaded, and the city of Babylon was left with its system of fortifications. The systematic explorations are carried on in Babylonia, however, our knowledge of the history of Nebuchadnezzar's empire must be derived from his own inscriptions, although we possess numerous inscriptions which record the restoration or construction of temples, palaces, and other public buildings, and from these bears the boast of Nebuchadnezzar, mentioned by Berosus, that he had built them in the fifteenth year. Nebuchadnezzar succeeded his father in 501, but he was murdered two years after and the crown seized by his son Bel-shalmaneser, the son of himself son of Bel-simmu-iscun, 'king of Babylon.' Ner- ga-sharezer reigned four years, and was succeeded by his son, a mere boy, who was put to death after nine months of captivity (B.C. 555). The power now passed from the house of Nabopolassar; Nabu-nahid, who was raised to the throne, being another family. Nebuchad-nessar's empire already began to show signs of decay, and a new enemy threatened it in the person of Cyrus the Persian. The Lydian monarchy, which had extended its sway over Asia Minor and the Greek colonies, had some time before come into hostile collision with the Babylonians, but the famous eclipse foretold by Thales had parted the combatants and brought about peace. Cyrus of Lydia and Nabu-nahid of Babylonia now formed an alliance against the common foe, who had subjected Media to his rule, and preparations were made for checking the Persian advance. The rashness of Cyrus, however, in meeting Cyrus before his allies had joined him brought on disaster. Susa was taken, and the Persian leader occupied the next fourteen years in consolidating his power in the north. This respite was employed by Nabu-nahid in fortifying Babylonia, and in constructing those wonderful walls and hydraulic works which Herod-otus ascribes to queen Ninoecia. At last, however, the attack was made; and after spending a winter in drain- ing the Gnydes, Cyrus appeared in the neighborhood of Babylon. Nebuchadnessar, Nabu-nahid's eldest son, as we learn from an inscription, was left in charge of the city while his father took the field against the invader. But the Jews, who saw in the Persian monotheists and deliverers, formed a considerable element of the army; and Nabu-nahid found himself deserted and compelled to take refuge in Borsippa. By diverting the channel of the Euphrates, the Persians contrived to march along the dry river-bed and enter the city through an unguarded gate. Babylon was taken, and Nabu-nahid shortly afterwards submitted to the conqueror, receiving in return pardon and a residence in Carmania. He probably died before the end of Cyrus's reign; at all events, when Baby- lon tried to recover its independence during the troubles that followed the death of Cyrus, it was under imposers who claimed to be Nebuchadnessar, the son of Bab- luniad.

BACCA. Peter, a Hungarian theologian, lived probably in the last half of the 17th century. He wrote Defensio Simplicitatis Ecclesiae Christi adversus Decisionem Questionum aliquot Theologorum, ejusque Vindicia Brevissima (Vienna, 1634). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Baccaccio, or Beccaccio, probably Bacc about Sitzingbourne, in Kent), where two councils (Conveneri Baccaccidenti) were held, viz.:

I. In 652, by Whtred, king of Kent, who renewed and confirmed the privileges of the Church in his kingdom. See Labbe, Cons. vi, 1356.

II. In 796 or 798, by Athelard, archbishop of Canterbury, in which those privileges, etc., were again confirmed. See ibid., vi, 1149.

Baccarini, Jacopo, an Italian painter, was born at Baccarini the year 1600, and studied under Orazio Tali. He died in the year 1682. Two of his best works are The Repose in Egypt and The Death of St. Alassio, in the Church of San Filippo in Reggio.

Bacche, or Bacchantes) were priestesses of the god Bacchus (q. v.). They were also called Menades (from μηναυας, to be mad) in consequence of the frantic ceremonies in which they indulged in their sacred festivals. They wrought themselves up to a high pitch of enthusiasm, when with dishevelled hair and half-naked bodies, their heads crowned with ivy, and a thyrsus, or rod twined with ivy, in their hands, they threw themselves into the most ridiculous postures, celebrating the sacral orgies with the most hideous cries and furious recitations.

Bacchana, the sanctuary or inner temple of the god Bacchus. (q. v.). By the Greeks they were called Dionysia, in honor of Dionysus (q. v.), their name for Bacchus. Among the Romans the Bacchanales were carried on in secret and during the night, when the mysteries of the god of wine characteristically indulged in all kinds of riot and excess. At first only women were initiated, and the orgies were held during three days in every year; but after a time the period of celebra- tion was changed from the day to the night, and the feasts were held during five nights of every month. Men were now admitted as well as women, and licentiousness of the coarsest kind was practiced. They became the focus of all public and private crimes. In B.C. 196 a decree was promulgated prohibiting such assemblies and authorizing the consuls to investigate and punish all violations of the statute, not only in the city of Rome, but throughout all Italy. Great numbers were apprehended and thrown into prison, while the most criminal were put to death. By this decree the Bacchanales were finally suppressed. They were afterward celebrated, however, in a more innocent form; although even then they gave great offence to persons of pure habits. See Liberalia.

Baccharius (or Baccharius) (1) an ecclesiastical writer of the Latin Church, probably of the fifth century. It appears that he was of Irish descent, a disciple of St. Patrick and contemporary of St. Augustine. His books, De Fide, and the letter to Marcius, De Reparatione Lapsi, were inserted in the Bibliotheca Patrum. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bacchius (2), an Italian monk and theologian, lived probably in the latter half of the 16th century. He wrote Bacchius Monachi Opuscula de Fide et de Reparatione Lapsi, ad Codices Bibliotheca Ambrosianum, nec non ad Priores Editiones custoditi, Dissertationes et Notas aegi Francisco Flortum, Canonici Theologus S. Patriarchali Ecclesiae Aquileiensi (Rome, 1790). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bacchillus (Bacchylus, or Bacchylides), bishop of Corinth, about the end of the 2d century took a leading part, with Polycrates of Ephesus and Theophylact of Cæsaræa, in the Quartodeciman Controversy. In A.D. 196 he held one of the councils convened in various parts of the Christian world to declare that the practice of their churches was in accordance with that of the Roman Church. Eighteen bishops assembled at Corinth under his presidency and pronounced against the Quartodecimans. He also wrote a letter on this point which Jerome commends as a graceful composition, but which seems to have been lost before Jerome's time. See Cave, Historia Litera- ria, i, 94.

nino, in the duchy of Parma. He studied at the Jesuit institution, and entered the Order of St. Benedict in 1658, when he took the name Bernardus. Prepared by his studies, he devoted his attention to preaching. Having became secretary of the abbot of St. Benedict of Ferrara, he accompanied him to Venice, Placentia, Ferrara, and Bologna, and became among the celebrated litterati of the time. In 1688 he devoted himself entirely to the study of literature. In 1688 he became theologian of the duke of Parma, who desired to secure a man of such merit. In 1689 he introduced into the regulations of the Benedictine Order of St. Alexander of Parma the establishment of the canon, which resulted in being obliged to leave Parma. The duke of Modena appointed him in 1691 counsellor of the Inquisition. After some journeys in the interests of science, he refused the offers of Cardinal Aguirre, who wished to retain him at Rome, and was appointed librarian of the duke. In 1704 he was made cardinal of his order at Modena. He received other ecclesiastical honors, and died at Ferrara, Sept. 1, 1721. He wrote, Oratio in N. Esguei della Ser. Margherita de Medici, Duchess of Parma (1705);—De Ecclesiastica Hierarchia Origeni bis Dissertatio (Modena, 1708). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bacchi. See BACHIS.

Bacchus, Sr., lived in the 3d or 4th century. He was denounced to the emperor Galerius Maximianus, and was beheaded. He was served by Bacchus; and, when he constantly refused to sacrifice to Jupiter, he was sent to Antiochus, prefect of the East, who had orders to torment him until he renounced the faith or died. After every other species of torture had failed, he was beaten to death with clubs at a little town of Syria called Bambassia, on the Euphrates. His body was secretly interred, and afterwards translated to Rasaphe, in the diocese of Hierapolis. He was buried with his friend, St. Sergius, and is commemorated Oct. 7. One of the cardinal deacons at Rome derived his title from St. Sergius and Bacchus, and a church was built in their honor by Justinian at Constantinople. See Butler, Oct. 7.

Bacchylus. See BACHILLUS.

Bacci, Carlo, an Italian Benedictine and theologian, was born April 25, 1629. From Florence, where he taught theology, he went to Poland and there founded the Congregation of Cassini. He afterwards returned to Rome, where he died, in 1685. He wrote, De Medit. et disc. philosophicae; De Medici, 1687. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bacci, Giacomo Antonio, rector of the Seminary of Lucua, died about 1750, and wrote Etichius Libri V in 111 Tomos Distributi (Lucua, 1760, 8 vol. 4to). See Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Bacciochi, Ferrante, an Italian painter, was a monk of Ferrara, of the Order of Filippini, but of uncertain date. One of his best pictures was The Stoning of Stephen, in the Church of San Stefano.

Bach, Johann Sebastian, a German musician, "to whom," in Schumann's words, "music owes almost as great a debt as a religion owes to its founder," belongs to a family whose earliest notices go back to the beginning of the 16th century. The progenitor of the Bach race was Veit, who died in 1619. He is said to have been a baker and to have moved into Hungary, with many other Evangelicals, for protection from persecution. But under the emperor Rudolf II, the Catholic reaction gave the Jesuits the upperhand, and this caused Veit to return home as a baker, and as a baker live in Magdeburg, where he was suspected of a sacred character, called the Israelites in the Wilderness, and most of his music was written for the harpsichord.

mon-school education. Rev. Joseph Underwood of New Sharon, Me., became his theological tutor in 1827, and in 1831 Mr. Bacheller became pastor at Machiasport, Me. He was dismissed in 1849, but continued to reside at that place and to officiate as acting pastor a part of the time until a few weeks before his death. As acting pastor he supplied Joscelyn from 1847 to 1849, and from 1850 to 1853; Whitcomb from 1850 to 1855, and from 1855 to 1861, and again in 1865; also supplied Whiting from 1851 to 1852. He died at Machiasport, Sept. 27, 1875. See Cong. Quarterly, 1876, p. 419.

Bachelot, Eliajah, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Stonbridge, Mass., in 1772, of pious parents, who early gave him the fear of God. He experienced religion at the age of sixteen; soon after wandered away into folly and sin; in 1792 was reconverted, and in 1798 entered the travelling connection of the New England Conference. Six years later he located and removed to Homer, N. Y., and four years after returned to his itinerate career. For five years he continued to preach, then ill-health obliged him to again locate, which relation he held until his decease, Dec. 19, 1821. Mr. Bachelot was a man of the strictest moral and religious integrity. See Methodist Magazine, v. 80.

Bachelot, Jean Alexis Augustus, a French theologian, was born in 1790 near Mortagne. He first taught at Paris, and in 1824 he became lecturer on theology. He was appointed by the pope apostolic prefect to the Sandwich Islands, and also proceeded to Honolulu. Once installed, he raised a contest with the Anglican missionaries and was forced to leave the place. He took refuge upon the shores of California. He intended to go to the islands in the South Pacific Ocean, but died from the fatigue of the voyage in 1838. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bacherius (or Bakere), Peter, a Flemish Roman Catholic preacher, was born at Ghent in 1517. At the age of twenty he became a Dominikan, and studied under Peter Soto. He was one of the most celebrated preachers of his day, and died Feb. 12, 1601. He wrote, Miroir de la vie chretienne:—Hommages sur les epitres de LXX (Douai, 1599, 1604):—Hommages sur les gospels pour tous les dimanches de l'année (Louvain, 1576):—Querelle Conjugale entre l'Homme et la Femme, etc.

Bachhiarius. See BACHIALDUR.

Bachleu, Jan Hendrik, a Dutch religious writer, brother of Willem Albert, was born in 1706, and died in 1799. He published some moral and theological works, of which the principal are, Eerste Beginselen der goddelijke Waarheden (1759):—De Leer der Sacramenten, etc. (1771). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bachja ben-Abish, a Jewish rabbi who flourished in the 13th century, was a judge at Saragossa. In 1291 he wrote his ר在那里 לב רוח ורסコביה שער לברור, a commentary on the Pentateuch, "grammatical, philosophical, allegorical, and cabalistical," condensing much of former commentators (Pesarco, 1650; Leiberg, 1683, 5 vols.). He also wrote ר?option1, a commentary on Job (Amst. 1678):—ר?option2 ורסコביה ורסCo, a collection of sixty derashas, or sermons (Const. 1515; Warsaw, 1870):—also a curious book on food and meals, entitled Sefer Skulchan Arba (בכר ספר שולחן ארבעה, "the book of the square table") (1st ed. Mantua, s. a.; last ed. Wilna, 1818), in which he discusses the time of eating, the mystical signification of food, the moral import of fasting, the manners of the table, the feasts of the Jews, and Nebuchadnezzar's festivals to the just in the world to come. Bachman, John, D.D., LL.D., an American minister and naturalist, was born in Dutchess County, N. Y., Feb. 4, 1790. He was licensed to preach in 1813, and became pastor of the German Lutheran Church in Charleston, S. C., in 1815. He died Feb. 25, 1874. He was a collaborator of Ausburn in his great work on American ornithology, and the principal author of The Quadrupeds of North America. Among his other publications may be mentioned, Defence of Luther and the Reformation (1838):—Design and Duties of the Christian Ministry (1848):—The Doctrine of the Unity of the Human Race Examined on the Principles of Science (1850):—Characteristics of Genera and Species as Applicable to the Doctrine of the Unity of the Human Race (1854). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Bachmann, Johann Friedrich, a German Protestant doctor of theology, was born July 21, 1799, at Drossen in the Neumark. He studied at Berlin and Halle, and after completing his studies acted for some time as preacher at Lisbon. In 1829 he was appointed preacher of the Louisestadt Church at Berlin, and in 1845 first preacher of St. Jacob's there. He labored with great blessing in his vast parish, and the government acknowledged his services by appointing him, in 1862, member of consistory, and in 1870 supreme councillor of consistory. He died July 25, 1876, at Cassel, where he had gone to repair his broken health. Besides Sermonen and some catechetical works, he published a monograph on the famous Easter hymn, Jesus meine Zuversicht (Berlin, 1874):—Zur Geschichte der Berliner Gesangbücher (ibid. 1856):—Michael Schirmer nach seinem Leben und Denken (ibid. 1859). He also wrote Handbuch der literatur, ii, 105, 117; Zachold, Bibl. Theol. i. 60; Zum Gedächtniss des Dr. Bachmann (Berlin, 1876). (B. P.)

Bachor von Echt, Reinhard, a German theologian, was born in 1544. He became burgomaster of Leipsic, where he established himself as a trader; but later he was banished from that place for his Calvinistic doctrines. He was imprisoned at Wittenberg, where he died in 1614. He wrote, Catechesi Polonicae Testamenti Scripturae ad Sententiam Patrum qui Primus a C. N. Annis in Ecclesia claruervnt Ornata.

His son, bearing the same name, was born at Leipsic in 1575. He was a distinguished jurist and professor at Heidelberg in 1619. Deprived of his employment during the Thirty Years' War, he took refuge in the Palatinate, where he went to Heilbronn in 1662, and later returned to Heidelberg, where he devoted himself to the study and preparation of his works. According to several writers, he abjured the Catholic faith before his death, and embraced the doctrines of Lutheranism. He wrote Nota et Animadversiones de Tredleri Deput (Heidelberg, 1617-19), and several other works. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bachtan, in the mythology of the Arabs, is the stone on which Hagar is said to have been delivered of Ishmael, the son of Abraham, and to which Abraham tied his camel when he went to offer Isaac. The Arabians, who consider themselves the descendants of Abraham through Ishmael, worship this stone as the same with that in the Kaaba at Mecca.

Bacis (or Bacchis) was (1), in Egyptian mythology, a sacred bull at Hermomakh, in Upper Egypt. It was also called Ouphis, and must not be confounded withApis of Memphis. Large bristly horns grew on its body, and ran in the opposite direction from that on other animals. (2) One of the earliest emperors in Greece. He was at Tarentum in Boeotia, and in the nymphs of the Corycian grove endowed him with the gift of dification after having taken leave of his friends. Bach was probably only a designation of a soothsayer; therefore the number of Baches—one emperial, an Archadian, and also some women—were thus named.

Backer (or Bakker), Jakob van (Jacopo da Palermo), a Dutch historical painter, was born at Antwerp in 1550. While young he was employed by Palermo, a dealer in pictures, after whom he was sometimes named. Palermo kept Backer employed constantly, and sent his pictures to Paris, where they were very much admired. Backer painted some original picturesque pictures, three of which are, Adam and Eve, A Charity, and A Crucifixion. He died in 1560.

Backereel, Gilles, a Dutch painter, was a native of Italy and contemporary with Rubens. He competed with Vandyke in an altar-piece in a church at Antwerp. In the cathedral at Bruges is an altar-piece by Gilles Backereel representing St. Charles Borromeo administering the sacrament to a numerous group of persons attacked by the plague. In the Church of the Augustinians at Antwerp is another admirable altarpiece by him of the crucifixion. Some of his works are also at Brussels in the Church of the Franciscans.

Backereel, Willem, a Dutch painter of the 16th century, resided in Italy and painted landscapes. In the Low Countries he adorned the churches with pictures, and gained some eminence as an artist.

Backhouse, Benjamin, an English Congregational minister, was born at Wells, Somersetshire, in 1822. He received his education at the grammar-school of that city, supplemented by private tuition and a five years' course at Springhill College, Birmingham. On leaving college he declined a living in the Church of England and became a Congregational pastor at Bolton, Lancashire, to which he removed in 1848, where he remained but a short time. He was afterwards pastor of the Old Meetinghouse, Scarborough, for twelve years. In 1862 Mr. Backhouse took his family to Heidelberg, Germany, with a view to permanent residence. While there he held divine service on Sunday afternoons in St. Peter's Church. In 1865 he took up his residence at Bedford, with a view to secure better educational advantages for his sons. The Bible Society Committee chose Mr. Backhouse in 1870 to be their agent in Australasia. He arrived at Melbourne April 25, 1871, and immediately threw himself into the work, visiting in succession for one summer the New South Wales, South Australia, Tasmania, and New Zealand; lecturing, preaching, forming new committees, and holding conferences. His work was marked by a great distribution of Bibles in these colonies. He returned to his home in Melbourne, July 1876, literally worn out, and died there Aug. 26, 1877. Mr. Backhouse was characterized by his unflagging love for his work, unassuming, gentle disposition, and consistent Christian life. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1878, p. 304.

Backhouse, Edward, an English minister of the Society of Friends, was born at Darlington, May 8, 1808, and at the age of eleven removed with his parents to Sunderland, where he ever afterwards resided. He began his ministerial labors in 1852, and was recorded as a minister in 1854. He died May 22, 1879. See (Lond.) Annual Monitor, 1860, p. 20.

Backhouse, James, a minister of the Society of Friends, was born at Darlington, England, July 8, 1794. He was recorded as a minister in 1824. A little later, in 1830, the date of his life may be said to have been one of unceasing service for his Master. Nearly ten years of his life were devoted to a visit, undertaken as a missionary, to the Australian colonies, the Mauritius, and South Africa. As a naturalist and botanist he was eminent. For many years he was connected with the Botanical Establishment at York. His journeys to different countries proved valuable in a scientific as well as a religious point of view. He was a convert from the Unitarian faith, and was an earnest and consistent advocate of the cause of temperance. For many years he was connected with the York Friends' Tract Association, and much of his time was spent in writing tracts. He died Jan. 20, 1869. See (Lond.) Annual Monitor, 1870, p. 6.

Backhouse, John, a minister of the Society of Friends, was born at Darlington, England, in 1784. In 1813 he began to preach, thus yielding to a duty which he had long felt. He was unassuming and simple in all his ministrations. He travelled extensively through England and Scotland, preaching in various places. He died Aug. 17, 1847. See (Lond.) Annual Monitor, 1848, p. 14.

Backhouse, William, a minister of the Society of Friends, was born at Darlington, England, in 1779. "Integrity and simplicity adorned his Christian walk, and in him the poor and afflicted found a faithful and sympathizing friend." On June 9, 1844, being the day previous to the time appointed for his leaving home as a missionary to Norway, he went to a meeting in usual health, rose to address the assembled company, but before a word was uttered fell lifeless to the floor. See (Lond.) Annual Monitor, 1845, p. 20.

Backhouse. See BACKER.

Backos. See BACON.

Backus, Almond Luce, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Herkimer County, N. Y., Sept. 16, 1820. He was converted in 1838; was licensed to preach in 1845, and in 1856 entered the Geneseo Conference. In 1872 he was transferred to the North-west Indiana Conference, and in 1875 was granted a super-numerary relation, which he held till his death, at Stockwell, Ind., Jan. 10, 1876. Mr. Backus was a man of rare endowments, stalwart in frame, and energetic; forcible in manner, sound in theology. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1876, p. 367.

Backus, Jay S., D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in Washington County, N. Y., Feb. 17, 1810. After pursuing a partial course of study at Madison University, he was ordained as pastor of the Church in Groton, N. Y., where he had a successful ministry. He rendered great service during this period to his brethren in the ministry as an evangelist, preaching for them in times of special religious interest. His other pastorates were in Auburn, N. Y., in two churches in the city of New York, in the city of Syracuse. For some years he was associated with Dr. Pharchellus Church as editor of the New York Chronicle, now The Examiner. In 1862 he was chosen secretary of the American Baptist Home Mission Society, a position which with great credit and usefulness he filled for many years. He died at Groton, July 9, 1872. See Baptist Encyclopedia, p. 54. (J. C. S.)

Backus, Samuel, a Congregational minister, was born at Canton, Conn., Oct. 16, 1782. He was a student for college at Plainfield Academy, of which he was afterwards preceptor, and studied at Union College (1811) and theology with Drs. Benedict and Yates. He was ordained pastor of the Church in North Woodstock, Conn., in 1815, where he remained till 1830. His next charge was Palmer, Mass., where he labored ten years
He then went to Brooklyn, N. Y., and was employed as a city missionary while strength permitted. Here he died Nov. 27, 1862. Mr. Backus was a grandson of Rev. Isaac Backus, author of History of the Baptists; and he himself published Sermons:—a tract on temperance:—and a little work entitled Prayer-meeting Assistant. See Cong. Quarterly, i, 1861, p. 338; ii, 1863, p. 56.

Backus, Simon (1), a Congregational minister, was a native of Norwich, Conn. He graduated at Yale College in 1724, and was ordained pastor of the Church at Newington, Conn., Jan. 25, 1727; was a chaplain in the colonial service at Cape Breton, and there he died in 1745, aged about forty-five years. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 281.

Backus, Simon (2), a Congregational minister, son of the preceding, graduated at Yale College in 1759; was settled as the first pastor of the Church in Granby, Mass., in October, 1762; resigned his pastoral charge in March, 1784, and died in 1828, at the age of eighty-seven. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 291.

Bacmeister, Lucas (1), a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Linz, Oct. 18, 1550. He studied at Wittenberg, and was appointed in 1559 court-preacher in Halle. In 1561 he was called to Rostock as professor of theology and pastor of St. Mary's; received the degree of D.D. in 1564; was appointed in 1592 superintendent of the city of Rostock, and died there July 9, 1608. He is the author of, Vom christlichen Bann, kurzer und gründlicher Bericht aus Gottes Wort; Luther's Schriften. Die der kirche Christi zu Rostock zusammengenommen (Rostock, 1565);—Historia Ecclesiariarum Rostochii, s. Narratio de Initio et Progressu Lutherianismi in Urbe Rostochio. See Kreys, Rostocker Ger. iv, 38, appendix, p. 26; Kirchen- und Gel.-Gesch. ii, 24-73; Allgemeine deutsche Biographie, s. v. (B. L.)

Bacmeister, Lucas (2), son of the preceding, was born Nov. 11, 1570, at Rostock. He studied at Strasburg and Wittenberg, and was made professor of theology in 1600. In 1604 he was appointed superintendent at Rostock; in 1605 was made doctor of divinity, and died Oct. 12, 1638. He wrote, Disputationes contra Decreata Concilii Tridentini:—Tractatus de Lege:—Disputationes de S. S. Trinitate, etc. He was also the author of a number of German hymns which are still in use in the German Church. See Jörcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; and especially Tamnius's Biography of Bacmeister (Rostock, 1668); Koch, Gesch. d. deutschen Kirchenleides, iii, 114 sq. (B. F.)

Bacon, Christopher, an English minister of the Society of Friends, was born in 1622. In his younger life he was a soldier in the king's army. In 1656, while attending a Friends' meeting to which he had gone to ridicule what he might hear and see, he was brought under the power of the Spirit. Subsequently he became a diligent and faithful minister for more than twenty years, visiting in his preaching tours London and various parts of England, also in Wales and under his powerful declarations of the truth many were converted. His residence was at Pottery Hill, Somersetshire. He died Oct. 29, 1678. See Piety Promoted, i, 79, 80. (J. C. S.)

Bacon, David, a Congregational minister, was born at Woodstock, Conn., in 1711. During his early years he taught school, and then was under the tuition of Mr. John Edwards, an eminent man and writer. Subsequently he became a missionary to the Indians around Lake Erie, and started on foot and alone for the wilderness, as it then was. For a time his headquarters were at Buffalo Creek, now the city of Buffalo, and he preached to the Seneca tribe, but tarried only a short time among them. On his return to England, he was sent to America, and engaged in teaching and preaching with the Chippewas (Ojibways). Mr. Bacon'sordination for this work occurred after his return from his first journey to the Indians, in Hartford, Dec. 30, 1800; and he set out with his wife for his chosen field of labor Feb. 11, 1801. Arriving at Detroit, he immediately opened a school, and shortly after his wife organized another—a girls' school; but he did not lose sight of the fact that his mission was especially to the Indians. Although Detroit was at this time the largest and most important city west of the Alleghenies, the size of the place was inconsiderable. It was enclosed by ceder pickets about twelve feet high, close together; at each side were strong gates which were closed at night, and no Indians were permitted to come in after sundown or to remain overnight. The schools were popular, but the people were opposed against "an Englishman" militating against Mr. Bacon's usefulness. His next movement was to the Maumee River, where, in endeavoring to ingratiate himself with the Indians, he endured great hardships. Afterwards he visited the tribe at Arbreroche; and with the Indians at Mackinaw he seemed to be better pleased than with any others of his acquaintance. They were principally Ottawas and Chippewas. He had some difficulty still in mastering their language. Mackinaw was at that time one of the remotest outposts of the fur trade. The Indians strenuously objected to the missionary, but Mr. Bacon maintained his residence there until about Aug. 1, 1804, when he sailed for Detroit; and some time after we find him in Hartford. After continuing for a considerable length of time in the service of the Missionary Society, he returned again to Connecticut. In the summer of 1806 he went to the Western Reserve, O., and established his temporary home at Hudson, O., which was surveyed for settlement in November through the influence of Mr. Bacon. In 1807 he removed to Tallmadge, O., and in January, 1808, assisted in organizing a Church there. In May, 1812, he left Tallmadge for Connecticut, and taught school in Litchfield for a few months. In 1813-14 he removed to Albany, the parish now known as the town of Prospect, Conn. The following year he resided in the parish of Westfield, in Middletown, preaching there and in Middlefield. Early in 1815 he removed to Hartford and became interested in the publication of Scott's Family Bible. He was also the publisher of an edition of Dr. Fox's Family Instructor. He died at Hartford, Aug. 27, 1817. See Cong. Quarterly, 1876, p. 1, 260, 387, 562.

Bacon, Davis, a Universalist minister, was born at Greenfield, Mass., Aug. 15, 1813. He removed to Fulton County, N. Y., in boyhood; received a liberal education; taught school in Harrison County, Ky., from 1839 to 1842; then returned to New York, and in the following year went to Harrisburg, where he engaged in teaching and preaching for nearly two years. Later he removed to Mount Healthy, O., where, under the auspices of the Miami Association, he preached several years. In 1853 he removed to Pittsburgh, Pa.; spent his latter years travelling and preaching in various places, and died Jan. 10, 1871. Mr. Bacon was a pure, faithful, and energetic pastor. See Universalist Register, 1872, p. 125.

Bacon, Francis, a Catalan, of the Order of Mount Carmel, lectured at Paris in the 15th century, and has left a selection of the choicest passages of the fathers to aid preachers in composing their sermons.

Bacon, Frederick Stanley, a Universalist minister, was born at Middletown, Conn., May 1, 1831. He received a high-school education, graduated at St. Lawrence University in 1860, and was baptized and ordained at Nunda, N. Y., in 1868. He preached successively at Titusville, Pa., Nunda, and finally at Belfast, Me., where he died suddenly of apoplexy, Oct. 14, 1873. Mr. Bacon was an efficient organizer of new churches, an eloquent preacher, fine elocutionist, a lover of aesthetics, earnest and faithful. See Universalist Register, 1874, p. 131.

was born at Mashburn, near Sheffield, in 1798. He was converted at the age of fifteen; entered the ministry in 1816; sustained an injury in November, 1892, which laid the foundation of a painful disease and terminated his life at New Haven, Feb. 24, 1866. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1835.

Bacon, George Blagden, D.D., a Congregational minister, son of Rev. Dr. Leonard Bacon, was born in New Haven, Conn., May 23, 1836. His preparatory studies were prosecuted in the Hopkins Grammar-school, New Haven, and afterwards he entered Yale College with the class of 1856. During his collegiate course, he took a voyage for a voyage, ship "Portsmouth," as captain's clerk and agent-pusher of the United States ship "Portsmouth," to Siam and China, and was absent from 1853 to 1858. He received from Yale College both degrees, A.B. and A.M., in 1856. From 1858 to 1860 he was a member of the Yale Theological Seminary, and from 1860 to 1861 of Andover Theological Seminary. In the last-mentioned year he was ordained pastor of the Orange Valley Church, N. J., which position he held until his death, Sept. 15, 1876. He was vice-president of the American Missionary Association, a trustee of the American Congregational Union (1864-75), and a director of the American Bible Society. Besides a large number of Sermons, he published The Land of the White Elephant (a volume on Siam), and other works. See Cong. Quarterly, 1877, p. 407.

Bacon, George W., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the Diocese of New York, became in 1866 assistant minister of the Church of St. John Baptist, New York city, a position in which he remained until his death, Dec. 25, 1874. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1876, p. 149.

Bacon, James Monroe, a Congregational minister, was born at Newton, Mass., Jan. 3, 1818. Having completed his preparatory course at Phillips Academy, Andover, in 1838, he turned his attention to the ministry. In 1841 he sailed for Savannah, Ga., thence to Europe, in consequence of impaired health. In December, 1843, he began to study with Rev. Jacob Ide, D.D., of Medway, Mass., and in the following year was licensed to preach. His first pastorate was over the Church at Littleton, Mass., of which he was ordained pastor Oct. 8, 1846, and after three years' labors resigned his charge. In 1849, the town of broken hill, he returned to Newton. He was installed pastor of the Union Evangelical Church and Society of Amesbury and Salisbury, Mass., June 25, 1851, and resigned Oct. 9, 1855. For thirteen years from the summer of 1856 he was pastor of the First Church, Essex, Mass. The second year of this pastorate was marked by a revival, which converted many, including the author of this article. On Nov. 2, 1870, he was installed pastor of the Church in Ashby, Mass., in which office he died, Jan. 3, 1878. See Cong. Quarterly, 1871, p. 347.

Bacon, Joel Smith, D.D., a distinguished Baptist minister, was born in Cayuga County, N.Y., Sept. 3, 1802. Before entering college he was engaged in teaching in Amelia County, Va. He was a graduate of Hamilton College, Clinton, N. Y., and of the Boston Theological Seminary. For ten years he was pastor of the First Church, Cambridge, Mass., and of Trinity Church, South Boston, Mass. In 1830 he was installed pastor of the Newton Church, N. Y., in which he died, Jan. 3, 1878. See Cong. Quarterly, 1871, p. 347.

Bacon, Joseph Smith, D.D., a distinguished Baptist minister, was born in Cayuga County, N. Y., Sept. 3, 1802. Before entering college he was engaged in teaching in Amelia County, Va. He was a graduate of Hamilton College, Clinton, N. Y., and of the Boston Theological Seminary. For ten years he was pastor of the First Church, Cambridge, Mass., and of Trinity Church, South Boston, Mass. In 1830 he was installed pastor of the Newton Church, N. Y., in which he died, Jan. 3, 1878. See Cong. Quarterly, 1871, p. 347.

Bacon, John (1), a Congregational minister, was born at Canterbury, Conn., and was a graduate of the College of New Jersey in 1765. He was settled as colleague with Rev. John Hunt over the Old South Church in Boston, Sept. 25, 1771; but in consequence of some differences in theological opinions, he was dismissed Feb. 8, 1775, and removed to Stockbridge, Mass. He now entered public life, and filled various offices, to which he was called by his fellow-citizens; among which were those of associate and presiding judge of the Common Pleas, a member of the state Senate—of which also he was at one time the president—and member of Congress. He died Oct. 20, 1820. See Allen, Amer. Bio. a. v. (J. C. S.)

Bacon, John (2), an eminent English sculptor, was born at Southwark, in Surrey, Nov. 24, 1740. At the age of twelve he was bound as an apprentice to a china-manufacturer, where he first was employed to paint the ware, but, discovering a taste for modelling, he was soon employed for this purpose, and in less than two years he modelled all the figures for the factory. He progressed rapidly; and received nine premiums from the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, etc.—the first in 1758 for his figure of Peace. In 1768 he began to work in marble, and invented an instrument, now in general use by English sculptors, for transferring the form of the model to the marble. In 1776 he received the first gold medal from the Royal Academy, and in 1770 was elected an associate of that institution. He was commissioned to execute a bust of the king for the hall of Christ College, Oxford, which won him the royal patronage. In 1777 he executed the monument to the memory of Guy, the founder of Guy's Hospital, which was considered so admirable that the city of London engaged him to erect a monument to the earl of Chat ham. In 1778 he was elected Royal Academician, and completed the beautiful monument to the memory of Mrs. Draper in the cathedral church at Bristol. He had several other principal works in Westminster Abbey and in St. Paul's Cathedral. He died in London, Aug. 7, 1799.

Bacon, John (3), an English Wesleyan minister, was born in Buckingham, England. He entered the ministry at the age of twenty; began the work in 1829; labored at Ipswich, Horsham, and Keighley: became a superannuated in 1836 at Salford, and died June 30, 1838. He devoted his utmost energies to the work of the ministry, and many souls were converted under his labors. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1838.

Bacon, Leonard, D.D., LL.D., an eminent Congregationalist, was born in New York, Nov. 16, 1862, at Detroit, Mich., where his father, David, was at the time missionary to the Indians. He graduated at Yale College in 1829, and at Andover Theological Seminary in 1824, and in March, 1829, he became pastor of the Central, or First, Congregational Church in New Haven, Conn., a relation which continued for the greater part of his long life, although he became only pastor emeritus in September, 1866. At this latter date he was chosen acting professor of revealed theology in Yale College, and in 1871 lecturer in the same institution on ecclesiastical polity and American Church history. He died at New Haven, Dec. 24, 1881.

As a sermonizer Dr. Bacon was able, but not brilliant. But when any subject of contemporary interest engaged his attention and aroused his enthusiasm his sermons were powerful and convincing. Thus, although he was neither a great preacher nor a subtle theologian, he was a man of real force and decided individuality, who not only had much to do with shaping the course of his own denomination, but who also succeeded in directing the currents of public thought on many important questions. He loved an argument, not for the pleasure of displaying his dialectic skill, which was by no means small, but because he was thoroughly in earnest in what he believed, and thought and regarded it as a conscientious duty to argue the case with the heat and vigor of genuine conviction. He was ranked as a conservative in his views of Congregational polity and ecclesiastical government, and he had an antiquarian taste which predisposed him to habits of special research; but he always kept abreast of the time, and was often considerably in advance of the general public opinion, like all of his opinions, were well defined and vigorously promulgated. He early espoused the colonization scheme, and became the pillar of the society in New England. In his younger days he had considerable ability as a platform speaker, and he used that talent arduously in opposition to the abolitionists and their belief as expounded by William Lloyd Garrison. Dr. Bacon’s views on colonization were materially modified about 1850. When the war broke out he took a decided stand for the Union, and met on common ground with the abolitionists. Dr. Bacon was long intimately connected with the government of Yale College, and had a large influence in deciding its general conduct. For many years he was a member of the college corporation. In regard to the college government he was extremely conservative, not favoring any great changes in the curriculum or in the make-up of the corporation. Personally, Dr. Bacon was genial in manner, and had a quiet sort of humor that made his letters and controversial articles interesting to a wider public than a denominational preacher usually commands. Finally, and above all else, he was genuine in life and speech—a true friend to all humanity.

Dr. Bacon devoted much attention to journalism and authorship. From 1826 to 1838 he was one of the editors of the Christian Spectator, a religious magazine published at New Haven. In 1843 he aided in establishing the New-Englander, a bimonthly periodical, with which he was associated at the time of his death. In connection with Drs. Torr and Thomson he founded the N. J. Historical, remaining one of its editors until 1883, and, with a brief season of interruptions, he continued to contribute to its columns until his death. Among his published works are, Life of Richard Baxter (New Haven, 1881, 1883, 2 vols. 8vo);—Manual for Young Church Members (ibid. 1883, 1885);—Historical and Biographical Dictionary of New England (1833);—Slavery Unreared (N. Y. 1846, 8vo);—Christian Self-Culture (1848);—With many addresses in pamphlet form. See N. Y. Evening Post, Dec. 24, 1881; N. Y. Tribune, Dec. 25, 1881; Drake, Dict. of Am. Bacon, Sir Nathaniel, an English amateur painter, was born in 1644, and was the brother of the great Sir Francis Bacon. He studied in Italy, but painted in the style of the Flemish school. Several of his best works are to be seen at Culford, in Suffolk. They are portraits of himself and his mother, and a Cook and Maid with Fowls.

Bacon, Phanuel, an English clergyman and writer, was educated at Magdalen College, Oxford, became rector of Balden, and died in 1783. He published a volume of hymns called Hymns, Devotions, Songs, etc. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Bacon, Robert, an eminent English divine, was born about 1168, and studied at Oxford, where he subsequently read divinity lectures. He is thought to have been either the father or the elder brother of Roger Bacon. His death occurred in 1218. He wrote, "Glosses on the Holy Scripture:"—On the Psalmist:—Discourses and Lectures. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Bacon, Samuel, was an American missionary. In 1829 he, by the government of his country to establish a colony in Africa, and on March 9 of the same year he arrived at Sierra Leone with eighty-eight colored people. They penetrated as far as Campell, upon the Sherbro River; but on the way he contracted a malady, of which he died, May 3, 1820. See Hoeffer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s. v.

Bacon, William, an English Wesleyan minister, commenced his work in 1812; labored uninteruptedly for forty-two years; became a subscriber to the city of Lincoln, and died June 16, 1860, aged seventy-two. He had the solid qualities that make a good preacher, minister, Christian, and theologian. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1860.

Bacon, William Thompson, a Congregational minister, was born in Woodbury, Conn., Aug. 24, 1812. He entered college at the age of twenty-one, after several years of mercantile life. He graduated at Yale College in 1837. After graduation he studied theology in the Yale Divinity School for three years, and was ordained Dec. 28, 1842, pastor of the Congregational Church in Trumbull, Conn., but resigned on account of ill-health May 29, 1844. In that year and thereafter he edited the New-Englander, a quarterly magazine published in New Haven, and in the latter year joined in establishing the New Haven Morning Journal and Courier, which he edited until 1819. For the next year or two he supplied the pulpit of the Congregational Church in South Britain, a parish in Southbury, Conn.; and in 1838-39 he was pastor of the old Church in Trumbull. He also conducted a boarding and day school in Woodbury for some years. In 1866 he went to Derby, Conn., and became editor of the Derby Transcript, which he conducted with vigor. He died at Derby, May 18, 1891. His literary tastes were already marked while in college. He was one of the first board of editors of the Yale Literary Magazine. He published three volumes of poems, the last in 1880. See Obituary Record of Yale College, 1881.

Bacot is the high-priestess of the idol-worship in Tonguin. The title descends from one of these female Dalai Lamas to the next. They are said to be perfect soothsayers, and they are held in great respect among the people.

Bacoue, Léon, a French prelate, was born at Casteljaux, in Lower Guienne, in 1608. He abjured the Protestant faith, in which he had been brought up, became a Recollect, and in 1672 was created bishop of Gandâve, whence, in 1686, he was translated to Pamiers, where he died, Jan. 13, 1694. He was the only converted Huguenot raised to the episcopate in the reign of Louis XIV. He wrote a Latin poem on the Education of a Prince (Toulouse, 1670), and some other works. See Biographie Universelle, iii, 192.

Bacrevantatz, David, an Armenian theologian, was born at Bacaen, a city of Greater Armenia, in the early half of the 7th century. After having studied philosophy in his native country, he became interpreter in the service of the Greeks of Constantinople. In 647 he was charged by the emperor Constantius with the establishment of harmony between the two peoples. In an assembly held the following year at Thouin, being sent by Constantius, he delivered a speech in favor of peace. He then returned to Constantinople, where he died. He wrote, The Gate of Wisdom:—Sermon on the Conformity in Profession of the Greek Church with that of the Armenians. See Hoeffer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s. v.

Bactahtites, a sect of Mohammedan monks among... the Turks, whose name is derived from their founder, Bactash. They wear white caps of different pieces, with turbans of wool twisted like a rope; their garments are also white.

Bacurdus was a Celtic local deity, whose name was among the inscriptions found in the city of Cologne, but of whom nothing further is known.

Bad, the name of an angel or genius who, according to the tradition of the Magi, presides over the winds. He also superintends every event which happens on the twenty-second of each month in the Persian year.

Badal was the name of a Tartar tribe, of whom nothing more is known save that they worshiped the sun or a piece of red cloth suspended in the air.

Badalini, Giovanni Battista, an Italian theologian, lived in the early part of the 16th century. He taught philosophy and theology, and devoted himself successfully to preaching. He wrote Fragmentarium Theologorum Moralisum, seu Canuum Conscientiae Diversorum Collectio (Singenigilla, 1780).

Badalocchio, Sisto (surnamed Rosso), an Italian painter and engraver, was born at Parma in 1581. He was of the school of Annibale Carracci, by whom he was highly esteemed for design. His principal engravings are the series known as The Table of Kings, which were executed by him in conjunction with Lanfranc. His paintings are few in number, but the best of them are at Parma. He died in 1641 or 1647. See Encyc. Brit. (9th ed.), s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine arts, s. v.

Badcock, Josiah, a Congregational minister, was born in Milton, Mass., in 1732. He graduated at Harvard College in 1772; was ordained pastor of the Church in Andover, N. H., April 30, 1782; was dismissed July 13, 1809, and died Dec. 9, 1831. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ii, 32.

Badcock, Robert G., an English Wesleyan minister, was born in London in 1820. He joined the Methodist Society in 1839; entered the ministry in 1846; became a superintendent in 1869 on account of ill health; resumed the work in two years, and died Sept. 11, 1878. He was faithful, affectionate, earnest, and prayerful. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1879, p. 16.

Badehorn, Sigismund, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born May 21, 1585, at Grossenhenry. He studied at Leipzig, where he was also appointed professor of Hebrew in 1610. In 1611 he was called as deacon to the church of St. John in Leipsic and in 1629 as superintendent to Grimma, where he died, July 9, 1626. He wrote Armatura Duxdidica (Leipsic, 1629). See Jocher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Dietmann, Christschische Priesterchaft, ii, 1071. (B. P.)

Badegille, a French prelate, was mayor of the palace under Chilperic I, and became by the favor of that king bishop of Mons in 581. He assisted at the second Council of Magon, held in 585, and, with the other bishops, signed the synodal constitutions. This bishop, so unworthy of his office, died in 585. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bademus, St., was born in the 4th century at Bethlapar, Persia. He embraced the monastic life, and shut himself up in a monastery which he had built near his native town. In the persecution under king Sapor, about 293 A.D., 243, he was cast into prison. He was put to death April 8, 376, although he is commemorated by the Greeks on the following day. See Ruinart, Acta Sincera, p. 604.

Baden, Laurids, a Danish theologian, was born in 1616. He became rector of Horsø, his native city, in 1648, and died in 1689. He wrote Himmelslige, which was published several times, at Copenhagen in 1670 and 1740 especially. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Badenoth is the name of a bishop attached to a Kentish charter of 765 (Kemble, Cod. Diploms, i, 137; Mom. Angl. i, 166). The name is given in some lists of the bishops of Rochester in the middle of the 9th century, where it is, perhaps, a mistake for Tawnoth. There was no bishop of this name in 765, the bishop of Rochester then being Eardulf. The title is probably a clerical error.

Badeto, Arnold, a French theologian, of the Dominican Order, lived in the early half of the 16th century. He was successively doctor of theology, prior at Bordeaux, and in 1531 inquisitor-general at Toulouse. He wrote Breviarium de Mirobolibis Mundi, (Avignon, 1455); Margarita Vivorum Illustrium (Lyons, 1559); Margarita Sacra Scriptura (bdl. ed.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Badetto, Vincenzo Maria, an Italian Dominican and ecclesiastical historian who lived in the latter half of the 17th century, wrote Annalium Ordinis Prudicitarum (Rome, 1696); pt. i was published in connection with Mamachi, Polidori, and Christianopolo. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Badewine, see Baduvini.

Bade, Sepulchral, in ecclesiastical ceremony, is an emblem of the sex or occupation of an interred person; as the instance, the euche, mirror, or sword for a woman, as at Lona; shears or a sword for a man.

Badgley, Oliver, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born near Springfield, N. J., April 11, 1807. He experienced conversion in 1823, and in 1832 joined the Philadelphia Conference. He became superintendent in 1837, efficient in 1844, and superannuate again in 1868. He died Oct. 1, 1863. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1863, s. v.

Badger, Henry, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Bilton, Oct. 16, 1815. In 1837 he was received by the conference and sent to Sierra Leone, where he labored for fifteen years, during the last five of which he was general superintendent. He was twice colonial chaplain. After laboring on eleven circuits at home, he became superannuate at Stow-on-the Wold, Gloucester, where he died, Dec. 24, 1877. Mr. Wold had vigor of mind, a high sense of honor, generosity; and, in his missionary both at home and in the mission field, was highly acceptable to his hearers. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1878, p. 27.

Badger, Joseph (1), a Presbyterian minister, was born Feb. 28, 1757. He graduated at Yale College in 1785, and on Oct. 24, 1787, was ordained pastor of the Church in Blandford, Mass. He spent much of his life as a missionary connected with the Connecticut Missionary Society; and died there May 4, 1846. See Sprague, Annals of the American Pulpit, iii, 476.

Badger, Joseph (2), a distinguished minister of the Christian Connection, was born at Gilmanton, N. H., Aug. 16, 1792. When ten years old, he removed with his father to Crompton, Lower Canada; was converted in 1811, and in the following year was inducted by a Baptist minister. About this time he began to exhort and preach with great success. It should be stated, however, that he refused to connect himself with any particular denomination. In 1814 he received ordination, probably from the Free-will Baptists. After laboring in Lower Canada for about two years, he visited New England, where his powerful preaching was followed by a great revival. He entered the ministry in 1817, and very soon he labored in the state of New York. Here he found earnest co-workers, and the numerous churches that sprang up and were organized under their care became associated as the "Christian Connection," that is, those who were determined to reject all sectarian names. In 1825 Mr. Badger was one of the organizers of the Christian Connection and the various places in Ohio and Kentucky; and there he found a denomination of Christians with views exactly corresponding to his own, having already formed conferences in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Tennessee, Alabama, and Kentucky; comprising three hundred preachers and fifteen thousand brethren, worshipping one God in one person, having no creed but the Bible, and calling no man master but the Lord Jesus Christ. He also preached a while in Boston, but eventually returned to the state of New York, where for several years he had editorial charge of the Palladium, then the organ of the Christian Connection, which he conducted with judgment and ability. He died May 12, 1832. Mr. Badger was a man of deep piety, untiring energy, great earnestness, commanding eloquence, and was rewarded with much success in the salvation of souls. See The Christian Examiner (Boston, 1864), ivii, 49; Holland, Memoir of Rev. Joseph Badger (N. Y. 1854).

Badger, Milton, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born in Andover, Conn., May 6, 1800. He graduated at Yale College in 1823, and was immediately appointed principal of an academy in New Canaan, Conn., from which, at the end of the year, he retired to pursue the course at the Andover (Mass.) Theological Seminary. Here he spent two years, and then accepted a tutorship in Yale College, continuing, meanwhile, his studies in the theological department of the college, and completing his course in 1827. The pulpit of the South Church in Andover, Mass., being vacated by the resignation of Rev. Justin Edwards, D.D., M. Badger was called, and duly ordained as a minister to the church Jan. 3, 1828. His ministry in this place is characterized as a continuous revival, extending over the seven and a half years of his pastorate. In May, 1835, he was elected to the office of associate secretary of the American Home Missionary Society, in which he distinguished himself by his ardent zeal and great sagacity, and in which he continued until the time of his death, which occurred in Madison, Conn., March 1, 1873. See Cong. Quarterly, 1875, p. 1.

Badger, Stephen, a Congregational minister, was born at Charlestown, Mass., in 1729. He graduated at Harvard College in 1747, and spent his life as a missionary among the Indians at Natick, Mass, where he was ordained March 27, 1758. The fifth volume of the Massachusetts Historical Collections contains an article concerning the American Indians, and especially those of Natick with his name attached by the author. He died in the last-named place, Aug. 28, 1808. See Sprague, Annals of the American Pulpit, i, 302.

Badia, Carlo Francesco, an Italian preacher, was born at Ancona, June 20, 1675. He preached in the principal cities of Italy, and was appointed, in 1730, president of the University of Turin, where he died May 4, 1761. He wrote, Prediche Quaresimali (Turin and Venice, 1749):—Pianigiaci, Ragostramenti ed Orazione Diversa (Venice, 1750). See Hoefer, Nouv. Bioch. Générale, s. v.

Badia, Tommaso, an Italian theologian and prelate, was born at Modena about 1483. He entered the Dominican Order, and was sent by pope Paul III to the Council of Worms in 1540, where he distinguished himself by his zeal for the Catholic religion. He died at Rome, Sept. 6, 1547. He accomplished a great part of the compilation of the Consilium Delectorum Cardinalium et aliorum Prelatorum de Essequenda Ecclesia, Paulo IIII jubente, Conspectum et Exhibition (Rome, 1548). The letter from Badia to the cardinal of Contarini, concerning the Synod of Venice and the presence in the prolegomena of the third part of the Epistles Selecte of cardinal Pole. He also wrote, Questiones Phyische de Anima:—De Immortalitate Anima:—De Providentia Divina:—De Pugna Duorum Anglorum Homini Antiomum:—Tractatus contra Lutheranos. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bioch. Générale, s. v.

Badiali, Alessandro, an Italian painter and engraver, was born at Bologna, and died about 1626, or according to others in 1643. He studied under Flaminio Torri, and painted several pictures for the churches and public edifices of his native city. The following is a list of his principal works: The Virgin Mary Seated with the Infant Jesus on her Lap:—A Bishop and Monk Kneeling:—The Holy Family:—and Christ Taken Down from the Cross. See Spooner, Bioch. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Bioch. Générale, s. v.

Badiat al-Jin, in Persian mythology, "the wildness of the demons." The spirits to whom God entrusted the world and the world above, he drew upon themselves his anger, and were banished to the wilderness (badiat). From jin we have jinian, "kingdom of the spirits."
Badunna was a goddess of hunting and forests among the Frisians and Goths. She was represented with a shield and a bow and arrows; but the representations of her extant undoubtedly belong to a late period, and are therefore not trustworthy.

Baduvini (Badwin, or Badwine) (1), the first bishop of Camborne in East Anglia, appointed on the division of the bishopric consequent upon the illness of bishop Bisi (Bede, Historia Ecclesiarum, iv, 5). The date of his nomination is given by Florence of Worcester as 673. His name as witness is attached to a Mercian charter of 693 (Kemble, Cod. Diplom. xxxvi). He died before 706, in which year Nothbert was elected pope. He was the decree of the Council of Clovesho of 716; possibly the person who mediated between Wilfrid and Aldfrid about 704.

Baeck, Joachim, a French theologian, was born at Utrecht, Aug. 10, 1652, and died at the same place, Sept. 24, 1692. He wrote a work upon the conscience, in French (Brussels, 1610).—L'Interprétation, ou l'Avocat des Frais Catholiques (Brussels, 1610).—L'Adeissaire des Mauvais Catholiques (Bois-le-Duc, 1614).—Le Ban de tous les Héritiques, des Politiques et des Catholiques Corrompus (Antwerp, 1615). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Baedan (Baetan, or Baotan, probably different forms of Baithen) is the name of several saints.

(1.) Son of Brecon, celebrated Nov. 29; but in putting him on this day neither O'Gorman nor Maguire gives a place where he is venerated. He is given among the saints of Derry. At Cuildaff there is a custom of ploughing diseased cattle into a pool of the river and praying at the same time to St. Bodhan (Stat Acc. Irel. ii, 611).

(2.) Of Clontuskert, now Clontuskert, near Lanesborough, in the barony of South Ballintubber and County Roscommon. His death is put by the Four Masters in 804.

(3.) Baedan Mor, celebrated Jan. 14, was the son of Lugaidh and Cainer. In Mart. Doney, he is called "abbot of Inis-mor. A.D. 712." On his father's side, he came of the race of Cathair Mor, who is said to have reigned in Ireland, A.D. 120-122.

Bacher (Bavus), a Swiss theologian and physician, was born in 1486. He taught belles-lettres at Strasburg, where he studied theology and medicine, and afterwards established himself at Basle. He became rector in 1529 and 1532. His rectorate was the means of restoring peace to the university, which had been divested of all religious questions by the Council of 1568. He wrote Commentaire sur L'Apologete de Saint Jean. See Hoefer, Nouvelle Biographie Générale, s. v.

Baell, in Hindë mythology, is a spirit with three heads that reigns in the eastern section of hell. He teaches the art of making one's self invisible. Sixty-six legions of spirits serve him.

Baeng (Baengius), Peter, a Swedish theologian, was born in 1658 at Helsingborg, in Scania, and studied at Upsala and other universities. In 1655 he was called as professor of theology to Abo, and in 1668 king Charles XI of Sweden appointed him bishop at Viborg. He organized the different churches and schools of his diocese, and died in the year 1696. He wrote, Commentarius in Epistolam ad Héronos; — Sancti Ansardi Vita; —Commentarius ad Sacramentum et Santa Catherinæa—Chronologia Sacra. See Pipping, Memoria Theologorum; Jöcher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lezion, s. v.; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Baer, Charles Alfred, a northern missionary, was born at Lancaster, Pa., Aug. 28, 1811. After graduation, he engaged in teaching at home for five years and... in October, 1858, he entered the theological seminary of the Lutheran Church at Gettysburg. He was in due time ordained a minister of that Church, and for the two years prior to his death was pastor of a Church in Norristown, Pa. His care for the sick and wounded at Gettysburg seriously impaired his health, and he died at Norristown in September, 1863. See Obituary Record of Yale College, 1864.

Baele, John, a Methodist Episcopalian minister, was born in Rockingham County, Va., Oct. 9, 1794. He was of noble German origin. His neighborhood had very few religious privileges in his childhood, yet at the age of fifteen he embraced religion, after having spent five years in seeking it. He soon became greatly exercised as to his duty to preach the Gospel, and instinctively shrank from such momentous responsibility, pleading filial duty and limited education. But his father released him from all home obligations, and the Church, considering him worthy, thrust upon him a license to preach. He dared not resist; and having once entered the ministry, he gave himself to all its duties with that characteristic firmness, energy, and consecration which always win, and before his race was run became one of the most admirable in virtue, ambition, and usefulness; the most honored and able of all his colleagues. In 1814 he entered the Baltimore Conference, and for nearly fifty years was a champion in its itinerant ranks—twenty-eight on circuits and stations, fifteen as presiding elder, and nearly seven as agent of the Maryland Bible Society. His last years were spent as agent of the Baltimore City Bible Society. He died March 11, 1878. The human secret of Mr. Baele’s great power in the ministry lay in his wonderful familiarity with the Bible, the logical tendency of his mind, and his singleness of heart toward God.
See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1879, p. 12.

Baerle (Barlabas), Gaspar van, a Dutch poet, theologian, and historian, was born in Antwerp, Feb. 12, 1584. He studied theology at Leyden, and was elected professor of logic there in 1617. He became an Arminiian and wrote in defence of Arminius and the Remonstrants, for which he was at length deprived of his professorship. He next studied medicine, but did not practice, remaining in Leyden giving private instruction till 1631, when he became professor of philosophy and rhetoric at Amsterdam. He died in Amsterdam Jan. 14, 1648. He was an excellent Latin poet, and contributed to history records of the government of count Maurice of Nassau in Brazil, and of the reception given to Maria de’ Medici at Amsterdam in 1638.

Younger) calls his father Colman, and his mother Functa.

Betylion (or Batylos) is the name of an anointet stone worshipped among the Greeks, Phrygians, and other nations of the East; and supposed by modern naturalists to be the same with our ceranum, or thunder-stone. The Batylos, among the Greeks, is represented as the same with the Abudr among the Romans. The Betylia of the ancient mythologists are considered by some as a kind of animated statues, invented by Calus, in his war against Saturn. They were greatly venerated by the ancient heathen; many of their idols were no other; and in some parts of Egypt they were planted on both sides of the public roads. Though honored as being the mother of the gods, they were commonly shapeless stones. See Stone-worship.

Baezik, Joachim, a Dutch ecclesiastical writer, was born in St. Willibrord, Utrecht. He was part of the states of the United Provinces. He died in 1619. He wrote in Dutch a great number of polemical works

Bag was a Persian deity, who is said to have given Bagdad its name. A temple was built for her by the wife of King Cyrus.

Bagais (or Vagais), COUNCIL of (Concilium Bagojean), was held A.D. 394 in Numidia, at which three hundred and ten bishops, under Primian, the Donatist primate of Carthage, condemned Maximian, the Catholic bishop of that city.

cation of the preserver, Vishnu.

Bagawa or (Bhagavat) (the most meritorious) is a name of Buddha (q. v.).

Bagby, Richard H., D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Stevensville, Va., June 16, 1820. He pursued his studies, in part, in the Virginia Baptist Seminary, now Richmond College, and completed them in Columbian College, where he graduated in 1859. He studied law, and was admitted to the bar, but finally decided to enter the ministry, and was ordained in 1842. He accepted a call in 1842 to the Church in Bruinton, King and Queen Co., Va., where he remained for twenty-eight years. In 1870 he was elected associate secretary of the State Missionary Society, Va. He rendered efficient service in promoting the interests of his denomination in that state. He died Oct. 29, 1870. See Baptist Encyclopedia, p. 56. (J. C. S.)

Bagê is a term used to denote the mysterious silence observed by the Zoroastrians as a part of their building on Skinner Street, New York city—a branch from the old Lutheran Trinity Church, in 1748. Efforts were made in 1746 to unite the two congregations, but without success. Mr. Bager's parochial was prosperous, and the Skinner Street building was abandoned, and a stone church, 34 x 60 feet, was erected at the comer of Frankfort and William Streets—the land in Skinner Street being retained for a burial-ground. This was purchased by the German Church, and became generally known as the Old Swant Church. See Quarterly Rev. of Ev. Luth. Church, vii, 276.

Baggaly, William, an English Methodist preacher, was a native of Sheffield, born in 1808. He was left an orphan at the age of eight, but his pious mother took him regularly to the New Connection church, where he gave his heart to God in his youth, and his life to the service of God and his Church. He became a local preacher at eighteen, entered the ministry in 1828, and was privileged to exercise that ministry in nineteen of the most prominent circuits of England during more than fifty years. His aptness for business served him more official work than any other of his brethren. During four years he superintended the Irish mission of 1855 and 1656, and attended the first general Conference. He was a guardian, representative, treasurer, and manager of the Benevolent Fund for twenty-nine years; secretary of the Chapel and Quauntary Funds for ten years; and treasurer of the Auxiliary Fund. He was master of all the departments of the Connection, and author of a Digest of the Minutes, Institutions, Doctrines, and Ordinances of the New Connection —of which two editions were issued. He was a pastor, preacher, a brother, a friend. He ceased not his labors till apoplexy suddenly ended the earthly pilgrimage at Birmingham, Sept. 28, 1873. He was interred at Sheffield Cemetery. See Minutes of the New Connexion Conference, 1880.

Bagge, Oscar, a Protestant theologian of Germany, who died in 1868, is the author of Ein Wort der Verständ-

Bagvero, in Hindii mythology, was the supreme god of the Barjesu in NepaL. His descent is obscure. In the Mahabharata he possessed a body of horrible, whose riches were said to surpass those of the famous palace built by Shah Geahn at Delhi. His great festival was called Jatra.

Bagraden (or Bhaghirat), in the mythology of India, was a powerful prince in the family of the chil of the sun, the son of Tebin and father of Vis-vanah, a figure who possessed a body of the world, was so holy, and his three thousand years of penance so strict and meritorious, that the deities con-

Bagni, Biagio, an Italian theologian who flourished about 1610 as canon regular of the Congregation of San Salvo. His works were generatia, was general of that congregation, and wrote, Cerimonie Observandae a Recolentibus Officium Divinum et a Celebrantibus Missas Majores (Rome, 1610)—De Orationum Spiritualiam Exercitio (ibid. 1613)—De Precipuis S. R. Ecclesiae Dignitatis (Bologna, 1625-49), and other works. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bagnoleseia (Bagnoli, or Bajolli) (Bagnola, or Bazzolai), so called from the town of Bagnoli, in Languedoc, were, Manicheans of the 8th century who rejected the Old Test. and part of the New. They declared that God could do nothing of himself; that he did not create the soul of man when he created the body; that the world is eternal, etc. These heretics were also called Concordanist, or Cazacolai. In the 8th century there was a sect of the Cathar called by the same name.

Bagge, a nymph who instructed the Tuscan to divine by thunder. It is pretended that she was the sibyl Ergythra, or Eryphyle.

Bagot, Jean, a French Jesuit, who was born at Rennes in 1880, and died as professor of philosophy and theology at Paris, Aug. 22, 1684, is the author of, Disseratation de Pantomima.—Libertas et Gratia, Defensio contra Jansenius.—Defensio Juris Episcopalis et Libertatis, qua Fideles gaudent in Missis et Confessionibus de Praeceto.—Disseratation de Veritate unitis Religionis Christianae. Bagot, Richard, a prelate of the Church of England, was born in 1782. He was the third son of the first lord Bagot; was educated at Rugby School, thence went to Christ Church, Oxford, and in 1804 became fellow of All-Souls' College. He was consecrated bishop of Oxford in 1829, and was transferred to the bishopric of Bath and Wells in 1845. He died at Brighton, England, May 15, 1854. He was not distinguished intellectually, but was courteous and noble-hearted. See Amer. Quart. Church Rev. 1854, p. 465.

Bagshaw, Christopher, an English theologian, studied logick, philosophy, and theology, and passed successively from Protestantism to Catholicism, without especially attacking himself to either religion. He died at Paris in 1825. He wrote, Dedratico Motum inter Jesuicis et Socordates Seminariorum in Anglia (Rouen, 1801). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bagshaw, Edward, an English clergyman, son of the lawyer of the same name who became famous for his opposition to royalty, was born in 1629, and educated at Christ Church, Oxford. He took holy orders in 1655, and became second master of Westminster School, when the famous Dr. Busby was headmaster. Since the two could not agree, Bagshaw was displaced, and was for some time chaplain to Arthur, earl of Anglesey. He published numerous controversial works, directed against Baxter, L'Estrange, Morley, bishop of Worcester, and others. For some attack upon the government, in his later years, he was subjected to twenty-two weeks' imprisonment in Newgate. He died Dec. 28, 1671. Bahaman is the name of an angel who, according to the Persian magi, presided over oxen, sheep, and all other tame animals.

Bahed is the name of a fast in the Ethiopic calendar, observed on Ter 10—Jan. 5.

Bahil, Matthias, a Hungarian theologian, who died nearly the last half of the 18th century, translated the work of Cyprian upon the origin and progressive march of the papacy in Bohemia, for which he was persecuted. Being obliged to leave Hungary, he went to Biege, where he published his history and trials under the title Tractatue über die Abttritt der Protestanten in Ungarn (1747). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bahman, in Persian mythology, was, after Ormusd, the first created of the seven Amshaspands, chief and protector of the rest, the king of light and genius of good-will. Every second day of every month, and the entire second month of winter, are sacred to him. When Ahriman and Ormusd shall combat for the possession of the world, Bahman, besides Mah, Gosh, and Ram, will be arrayed against the evil demons Ashmoh, Akumana, and Tarmad.

Bahnunteh, in Persian mythology, is the great festival which is celebrated in honor of Bahman (q. v.) with great pomp on the second day of the second month of winter.

Bahn, Christian August, a German theologian and miscellaneous writer, was born May 28, 1703. He studied at Wittenberg, became preacher, then chaplain of a regiment of riflemen, which he accompanied to Poland. On his return he was made archdeacon of Frankenstein, and later pastor at Sachsenburg. He died Oct. 7, 1766. He wrote, Schellinimum de Alpha et Omega Grammaticorum (Meissen, 1781), and several other works. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bahn, Nikolaus, a German theologian, was born in 1664. He studied at Jena, and became pastor at Dob- ra and elsewhere. He died in 1704. He wrote, Das unschuld vergossene Blut (1699)— was neue Licht, Die von Morgen erst aufgeschlossenen Sterne der welche in 1715 viel tauende Räume in den südlichen Wäldern, etc. (1714), and other works. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bahnmaier, Jonathan Friedrich, a Protestant theologian, was born July 12, 1774, at Obersteinfeld, near Marbach, in Württemberg, where his father was minister. He studied theology at Tubingen, and assisted his father in his ministry until his death, in 1803. In 1805 he travelled on the Continent, and in 1806 was appointed to the Church at Marbach. In 1810 he removal to Ludwigsburg, and from 1815 to 1819 he was professor of theology at the University of Tubingen. Being unreasonably deprived of this position, he was appointed dean of Kirchheim, and in that office he died, Aug. 18, 1841. He wrote, De Miracula N. Test. Melete-meta (Tubingen, 1797), besides a number of sermons and ascetical works which he published; he also wrote some very fine hymns, one of which, Walter, Walter, nun and fern, has been translated into English (Lyra Germ. ii, 89)." Spread, oh spread, thou mightest Word." See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Literatur, i, 392; ii, 101, 130, 143, 159, 233, 326; Koch, Geschichte des deutschen Kirchenle-

Bahr, Carl Wilhelm Christian, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born June 23, 1801, at Heidelberg. He studied at Heidelberg and Berlin from 1818 to 1822; was in 1824 appointed deacon at Pfor-zheim, and in 1825 at Bethlehem. Here he wrote his Commentar zum Kolossenbrief (Basle, 1833), and his Symbolik des monastischen Cultus (2 vols. Heidelberg, 1837–39; 2d ed. 1874). Thus he became known to the literary public, especially by the last work, and the degree of doctor of divinity was conferred on him. In 1838 he became a member of the Oberkirchenrat in Carnarvon, and took an active part in the ecclesiastical affairs of the duchy of Baden till he retired, March 1, 1861. After his retirement from public affairs he wrote the commentary on the books of Kings for Lange's Bibelwerk. He died May 15, 1874, at Offenburg. Of his work he mentions we made him Honorary member of Bahrdt, Johann Friedrich, a Protestant theo-larian of Germany, was born June 11, 1719, at Lübbecke, in Lower Lusatia. He studied at Leipzig, and was in 1744 appointed to the Bishop's Latin School at Breslau. In 1741 he was called as pastor to Schönfeld, near Dresden; and in 1745 as court preacher and superintendent at Dobruck. In 1747 he was called to Leipzig as catechist and preacher of St. Peter's; in 1748 he received the degree of doctor of divinity, and in 1755 he was appointed professor of theology. He died Nov. 6, 1775, as pastor primarius of St. Thomas's. He wrote, Abhand-

Bahirum. Lient, Conder accepts the Targum's identification of this place with Almon or Alemeth (now Alma), which he thinks is sufficiently near to the "top of the hill," while the existence of numerous rock-cut cisterns, with narrow mouths, illustrates the incident of the concealment of Jonathan and Ahimaaz (1 1881, p. 45)—a very slender ground for the conclusion, as such cisterns abound in nearly every ancient locality in Palestine.

Bai was the name of a special Egyptian priesthood, which was attached to the worship of the god Apis. It was held by hereditary descent. Its duties and ceremonies are as yet unknown, but were probably sacrificial, as it is hieroglyphically expressed by a knife.

Balaz is said to have been the son of Simeon, king of the Bulgarians, who was so great a magician as to be able to transform himself into a wolf, or any other ferocious beast, whenever he wished to go out among his people to test their fidelity. He also had the power of rendering himself invisible by the aid of powerful demons.

Balas, in the religious legends of India, is one of the great philosophers, the son of Porosor, and of his wife, Sofias. The time of this person was not known, but of his wisdom the Vedas give evidence, which he collected, arranged, and divided into chapters and books.

Balban, in India mythology, is the shining, ethereal wagon of heaven, on which the souls of the good are carried into Paradise near the mountain Meru.

Bailey (Lat. ballium), a name given to the courts or wards of a castle formed by the spaces between the circuits of walls or defences which surrounded the keep: sometimes there were two or three of these courts between the outer wall and the keep, divided from each other by gate-walls. The most frequently re-tained long after the castle itself has disappeared; as the Old Bailey in London, St. Peter's-in-the-Bailey in Oxford.

Bailey, Dudley P., a Baptist minister, was born in Yarmouth, Me., about 1810, and was a graduate of Bowdoin College in the class of 1829. Having received a license from the Church in Yarmouth, he began his ministry in Greene, Me., in 1832, of which Church he was ordained pastor in 1835, where he remained one year, and then removed to Wayne, Me., where his ministry continued for two years (1836–38). Resigning at Wayne, he went to Cornville, Me., where he was pastor from 1839 to 1845. In 1844 he became pastor of the Church in St. Albans, Me., where he remained many years. His death occurred about the year 1875. See Millet, Hist. of the Baptists of Maine, p. 483. (J. C. S.)

Bailey, Giles, a Universalist minister, was born in Aeworth, N. H., May 7, 1816. He received a liberal education; began teaching school at the age of seventeen; took private instruction in theology; was licensed to preach in 1839, and ordained in 1840. He labored successively two years, or seven years in Brunswick, three years in Oldtown, three in Dexter, Me.; two in Claremont, N. H.; eight in Gardiner, two in Belfast, Me.; and then removed to Reading, Pa., where, after nine years of faithful labor, he closed his life, May 14, 1878. Mr. Bailey was an able, energetic, instructive, and interesting preacher, often thrilling his hearers with his impressive powers. He was a frequent and valuable contributor to his denominational papers, and was for some time editor of the Universalist, and three years editor of the Register. See Universalist Register, 1879, p. 92.

Bailey, Haman, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Tennessee, but the date is unrecorded. He received a careful religious training; experienced conversion at a very early age, and in 1840 united with the Alabama Conference, and labored with unpreachingthe usefulness and acceptability until his decease, Jan. 11, 1845. Mr. Bailey was a thorough Bible student, a diligent preacher, a laborious pastor, and a devout Christian. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1845, p. 594.

Bailey, J., a Scotch Baptist minister, was born in 1785. That he was a minister of ability and established reputation appears from the circumstance that he was called to be pastor of the Scotch church in Nottingham, in Park Street. His death took place at Lenton, June 7, 1840. See (Lond.) Baptist Handook, 1841, p. 81. (J. C. S.)

Bailey, James W., a Universalist minister, was born in New Hampshire about 1814. He spent his youth in Claremont working upon The Impartialist, a Universalist paper, and preparing for the ministry. The date of his ordination into the ministry is not recorded. He had various stations in New Hampshire, Vermont, and New York, and died at Lima, N. Y., in May, 1864. Mr. Bailey was a practical Christian; was modest and cheerful, ardent and earnest. See Universalist Register, 1865, p. 32.

Bailey, John M., a Free will Baptist minister, was born in August, 1764. When a little more than twenty years of age, he became a Christian under the preaching of Rev. Benjamin Randall. Not long afterwards he began to preach, and continued to serve his Master through a very long term of years. He retained his mental faculties till the close of his long and useful life, and died in Woolwich, Me., Oct. 5, 1857. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1856, p. 86. (J. C. S.)

Bailey, Luther, a Unitarian minister, was born in Canton, Mass., and was a graduate of Brown University in the class of 1808. He pursued his theological studies with Rev. Dr. Richmond, of Dorchester, Mass. Before settling as a pastor he was engaged in teaching in Wrentham and Bradford, Mass., and for three years had charge of the Bristol Academy, Taunton, Mass. He was ordained pastor of the Church in East Medway, Mass., in November, 1816, where he remained twenty-seven years. On retiring from the pastorate, he continued to reside in East Medway. Although solicited to take charge of other churches, he declined, but acted as a supply of destitute churches until the close of his life. He lived in the period of the Unitarian controversy in Massachusetts, and became a moderate Socinian, classing himself, however, in most of his religious sentiments with evangelical Christians. He published a few occasional sermons. His death occurred at East Medway, Dec. 19, 1861. (J. C. S.)

Bailey, Phinias, a Congregational minister, was born in Landaff, N. H., Nov. 6, 1727. He was in the watchman's class when, in 1716, he commenced the study of theology with a view to the ministry. He was licensed in 1728, preached for a short time at Rich- mond and Waterbury, Vt., and was ordained pastor of the churches at East and West Berkshire in 1824. After a pastorate of nearly ten years, he removed to Beek- manton, N. Y., and in 1841 to Helton, N. Y., returning four years after to East Berkshire. His next charge was Albany, Vt. (1852–57), where he died, Dec. 14, 1861. Mr. Bailey's ministry was very successful. Energy was his distinguishing characteristic; his mind was vigorous, his sermons original and clear, his theology was Bailey, Robert, an Irish Wesleyan minister, was born in the County of Fermanagh. He was converted while young; called to the ministry in 1806; labored successfully, but lost his health after thirty-three years of their ministry. He was ordained a missionary, and died suddenly of cholera, Oct. 18, 1832, aged sixty years. He was zealous and persevering. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1833.

Bailey, Rufus C., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in 1779. He was converted at the age of twenty-three, and entered the Maine Conference in 1826. In 1842 he became superannuated, and in 1856 resigned from the conference in which he had labored, owing to which he suffered a mental stroke in 1865 by paralysis, of which he died, Oct. 24, 1866. Many conversions attest Mr. Bailey's fidelity and Christian zeal. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1867, p. 135.

Bailey, Rufus William, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Yarmouth, Me., April 13, 1799. He graduated at Dartmouth College in 1813; taught in two academies; commenced the study of law with Daniel Webster; and entered Andover Theological Seminary, completing his studies under Rev. Francis Brown, D.D., president of Dartmouth. His first charge was Norwich, Conn., where he was ordained in 1819. He was at the same time professor of moral science in the Military School. In 1826 he succeeded President Hum- phrey of Amherst College at Pittsfield, Mass. His health failing, by medical advice he sought a warmer climate. The remainder of his life was spent in the South in teaching and literary pursuits. He also traveled six years in Virginia as agent of the Colonization Society. In 1854 he was elected professor of languages in Austin College, Huntsville, Texas, and in 1858 president, in which office he continued till his death, April 25, 1863. Mr. Bailey was the author of a volume of slavery entitled The Issue (N. Y. 1837, 12mo):—eight sermons entitled Domestic Duties; or, The Family on Earth a Nursery for Heavens (Philadelphia, 1808):—Daughters at School.—The Beginnings of Evil (Am. Tract Soc.):—Primary Grammar and Manual of English Grammar, two works which have been extensively introduced into Southern schools. See Cong. Quarterly, 1865, p. 550.

Bailey, Silas, D.D., LL.D., a Baptist minister, was born in Sterling, Mass., June 12, 1809, and was a graduate of Brown University in the class of 1824. After leaving college he taught in the Upper College of the American Asylum for five years. In December, 1839, he was settled as pastor of the Baptist Church in East Thompson, Conn., and afterwards for a time in Westbrook, Mass. While residing in the latter place, he was appointed to a professorship in Granville College, Ohio, of which institution he was afterwards the president. In 1852 he was elected president of Franklin College, Ind., holding the office for eleven years, at the end of which time he became pastor of the Baptist Church in Lafayette, Ind. Resigning his pastorate in this place, he became a professor in the Kalamazoo (Mich.) Theological Seminary, and for some time acted as president of Kalamazoo College. He returned to Lafayette in 1869 with impaired health, to recruit which he made an extended tour to Europe and the East in 1873. On his way home he died in Paris, June 30, 1874. (J. C. S.)

Bailey, William (1), an English Baptist minister, was born at Bourton, Gloucestershire, May 18, 1771. After having worked at a trade for some time, he removed to Gosport, where he was converted under the ministry of Rev. John Bogue. Subsequently he took up his residence in London, where he was baptized Oct. 9, 1796. His first membership was with an Independent Church in Windsor, to which place he had removed. He joined a Baptist Church in Datchet in 1811, and soon after was appointed a deacon, and was licensed to preach. The pastor being laid aside, he supplied the pulpit for four years, and at length was ordained. He now relinquished his business and devoted himself to his ministerial work. He pastored the Church at Datchet continued from August, 1819, to the close of 1843, when, on account of the infirmities of age, he resigned. His death took place June 30, 1844. See (London) Baptist Handbook, 1846, p. 41. (J. C. S.)

Bailey, William (2), an English Baptist minister, was born at Woodhouse Eaves, Leicestershire, Aug. 5, 1819, and was educated in the General Baptist College, Leicester, for the missionary work, and was set apart to that service May 13, 1845. He set out for Calcutta shortly afterwards, and arrived there Oct. 2 of the same year. He resided for some time at Cuttack, Khunditur, and Pillep, but for the greater portion of his mission- ary career he was located at Berhampore, Ganjam. He twice returned to England on furlough, in 1855 and in 1866; and was compelled by failing health to abandon the work entirely in 1873, landing in England on May 15 of that year. He died at Leicester, Sept. 8, 1890. He was a contributor to the Sunday at Home and Boys' Own Paper, and published The Life of Ern.; or, The Dayspring in Southern Orias, and Light in the Jungles. See (London) Baptist Handbook, 1881, p. 821.

Bailey, William Metherall, an English Methodist preacher, was a native of Cornwall, being born at Thorne, Jacobstow, May 21, 1795. He was vivacious and blithesome in youth, and when converted, about the age of twenty, he was as lively and active in the service of God. He joined Mr. O'Bryan, and began to itinerate in 1818, and for fifty-two years he did the work of an evangelist in many of the Bible Christian circuits. He was a simple, earnest, self-denying, faithful pastor and preacher, and many souls were the fruit of his ministry. He closed a long and useful life at Shanklin, Isle of Wight, March 2, 1878. See Minutes of the Conference, 1878.

Bailey, Winthrop (1), a Congregational minister, was born at Northborough, Mass., in 1784. He graduated at Harvard College in 1807; was tutor in Bowdoin College in 1810;—was ordained at Brunswick, Me., May 15, 1811; was dismissed in April, 1814; was installed at Polham, Mass.;—was afterwards dismissed and installed at Greenfield, Mass., in Oct. 1825; and died March 16, 1835. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, 1, 617.

Bailey, Winthrop (2), a Presbyterian minister, was born in Berlin, Mass., June 3, 1817. After receiving a common-school education, he entered the Theological Seminary at Princeton, N. J., where he graduated in 1847. He was licensed by the Long Island Presbytery in 1847, and was installed the same year as pastor of the Presbyterian church at Oyster Bay, Long Island, N. Y. He died April 30, 1865. See Wilson, Hist. Presb. Almanac, 1866, p. 91.

Baillères, JACQUES MARIE JOSÉPHÉ, a French prelate, was born at Toulouse, March 31, 1798. Being ordained priest in 1822, he performed successively the functions of secretary-general of the bishop of Verdun, of vicar-general, and of superior of the Seminary of Bayonne and the vicar-general church of Toulouse. He was appointed bishop of Luçon by the royal ordinance of Aug. 15, 1845, and took possession of his see, Jan. 11, 1846. In 1849 M. Lanuinais, then minister of public instruction and public worship, having sent an Israeliish professor of philosophy to the College of Napoleon—Vendée, the bishop of Luçon ordered the professor to be expelled from the lyceum, and the authority of the latter was maintained in that city, where Catholicism had so strong a hold. A conflict of ecclesiastical jurisdiction occurred between Baillères and the bishop of Bordeaux concerning the conduct of a rector of the diocese of Luçon, in which the judgment of the bishop of Luçon prevailed. He published, on this occasion, a work entitled Des Sentences Épiscopales. He died at Rome, Nov. 9, 1872. See Hofer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Balliu, David, a Dutch painter, was born at Leyden in 1854. His principal works were portraits and interior views of temples and churches. He died in 1868.

Balliu (or Balliu), also Baleau, Bernard, a Dutch engraver, was born about 1625. One of his best works is Christ between St. D'Alcachia and St. Mary Magdalen. His plates are executed entirely with the graver.

Balliu (or Balliu), Pierre de, a Flemish engraver, was born at Antwerp about the year 1614. He studied the works of the great masters in Italy. Returning to Antwerp about the year 1635, he engraved several works of celebrated Flemish masters—John Backer (Dutch painter), John Byler, Honore Urphes, and others. The following are the principal: The Crucifixion: The Reconciliation of Jacob and Esau:—Christ Praying in the Garden:—Christ Bound to the Pillar.

Balliu, PASCAL, a Spanish monk and theologian, who died at Villareal in 1592, wrote, Principes Mysterios de la Vida de Christo, etc. See Hofer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bally, John, a Congregational minister, was born near Blackburn, in Lancashire, England, Feb. 24, 1844. After studying under the celebrated Dr. Thomas Harrison, he commenced his ministry in Chester, England, at the age of twenty-two; but after a short time, on account of his Congregational principles, he was imprisoned in Lancashire jail. When he was released, he travelled through Ireland, preaching so constantly as to injure his constitution. About fourteen years he spent in Limerick, where he enjoyed a happy and useful ministry. While here he was offered, in case he should conform to the Established Church, a duke's chaplaincy, with a deanery and a bishopric whenever a vacancy should occur; but he rejected the offer. Notwithstanding his irreproachable character, he was again thrown into prison. During his imprisonment, his Church, divided into seven companies, were accustomed to visit him every day, each company in turn, until it was prohibited. No release would be granted unless he promised to leave the country. In 1684, accordingly, he came to England, accompanied by Thomas, his younger brother, who was also a minister. At first he resided in Boston. In August, 1685, the Church at Watertown corresponded with him concerning a settlement in that place. The next year he was formally called, and Oct. 6 he was constituted their pastor. In November, 1687, his brother Thomas removed to Watertown as his assistant. In 1692 John removed to Boston, although the reasons of his removal are unknown: mental depression, in consequence of his brother's death, probably formed a part of them. In July, 1698, he was invited to assist Mr. Allen, pastor of the First Church in Boston, as public teacher, and here he remained until the close of his life, which occurred Dec. 12, 1697. A volume of his discourses was printed in Boston in 1689. Cotton Mather describes him as a man of eminent holiness, and of remarkably tender conscience. His preaching was of a spiritual cast, and he was unquestionably an able man. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 201.

Bain, Geo., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born near Baltimore, Md., July 6, 1798. He was a levelling orphan when about nine years of age; experienced conversion in 1818; and in 1820 received license to preach, and was admitted into the Baltimore Conference, and immediately transferred to the Virginia Conference. He died May 27, 1850. Mr. Bain's accomplishments were thorough, Biblical, and Methodistic. His piety was deep and fervent. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1850, p. 282.

Bain, Hope, a Universalist minister, was born in Aberdeen, Scotland, May 30, 1726. He removed soon after, with his parent, to the West Indies; later to Baltimore, Md.; served in the war of 1812, in a Baltimore company of volunteers; was a member of the Presbyterian Church for several years; and became agent of the American Sunday-school Union for the Mississippi Valley in 1860. He embraced Universalism in 1841, and was ordained a preacher of that faith in 1848, at Norfolk, Va. In 1851 he moved to North Carolina, wherein before the Rebellion he preached in twenty counties, and afterwards in six. He died at his home in Goldsborough, N.C., Oct. 5, 1876. See Universalist Register, 1877, p. 110.

Bain, James, an Irish Congregational minister, was a native of Dundee, Scotland, but removed to Belfast, Ireland, while yet a young man, and decided to consecrate himself to the ministry. He was educated at the Belfast College, and spent the two years succeeding the completion of his studies (1887–88) in evangelistic work in the County Antrim, preaching at two principal stations, Strabill and Ballycraigy. In 1893 he was ordained over the Church at Strabill, which he succeeded in building up to a large extent by earnest labors. A new chapel was built in 1893, and afterwards enlarged, the whole being completed in 1911. His pastor continued in this Church for more than forty years, with eminent success in all its departments. His health failed in 1878, and he was compelled to retire, and his charge in 1880. He removed to Londonderry the following year, and died July 17, 1881, having been in the ministry forty-two years. See (Loud.) Cong. Yearbook, 1897, p. 284.

Bain, John, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in the Highlands of Scotland, Jan. 3, 1804. He emigrated to the United States in 1829; soon after became a local preacher; and in 1835 entered the Pittsburgh Conference, in which he labored vigorously and with faithfulness until his death, in 1872. Mr. Bain was learned, pious, and affable. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1872, p. 86.

Bain, William TA, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born near Norfolk, Va., Oct. 30, 1844. His early advantages were limited. He was a remarkably well-read young man, and in possession of a good memory and an irrepressible perseverance, he trained himself to be a good thinker and fine preacher. He was converted in 1867, immediately joined the M. E. Church, and was shortly afterwards licensed to preach. In 1870 he was admitted to the Virginia Conference, and ordained deacon in 1871. He served Hillsborough Circuit as junior preacher. He was preacher in charge at Manassas three years, after which he served similar terms at Princess Anne and Fairmount respectively. His last appointment was Pocomoke City, Md., where, after a few weeks' labor, he died, on May 15, 1888. Success attended his work. As a preacher, he was studious, prayerful, and laborious. His sermons were clear, logical, and spiritual. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1881.

Bainbridge, Thomas, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Appleby, England, Oct. 26, 1792. He received a careful religious training from his pious mother; did not experience conversion, however, until his twenty-fourth year; became a local preacher the same year; afterwards emigrated to the United States; and in 1833 united with the New York Conference. He espoused the antislavery and temperance causes with great zeal. He became superannuated in 1853, and died March 10, 1862. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1862, p. 73.
Baine, Joseph, an English Baptist minister, was born in Downshire, Scotland, about 1755. Early in life he removed to England, and about the year 1800 was called to the pastorate of a Church at Portsmouth, Hampshire. After remaining here for a time, he took charge of the Church at Southsea, in the same county, and then removed to Harlow, where he was pastor for twenty-seven years. While minister in this place, he rendered efficient service to his denomination by raising funds for the erection of chapels in Connaught. He died Feb. 8, 1860. He was "a good minister of Jesus Christ," the style of his preaching being plain, experimental, and affectionate. He is represented as having a liberal, catholic spirit. See Haynes, Baptist Cyclopaedia, i, 77. (J. C. S.)

Bainerd, Nehemiah, a Presbyterian minister, was a native of Haddam, Conn. He graduated at Yale College in 1782; was ordained pastor of the Second Congregational Church in Glastenbury, Conn., in April, 1784; and died Nov. 9, 1842. See Sprague, Annals of the American Church, ii, 149.

Baines, Thomas Duckle, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Doncaster, Yorkshire, in 1808. When young he indulged a naturally gay and pleasure-loving disposition, at the same time regularly attending the parish church. At the age of twenty-seven he heard a Methodist preacher, was converted, declined prominent station for the ministry of the Establishment, was received by the Wesleyan Conference, and sent as a supply to Grimsby in 1838. At the conference of 1864 he was appointed to Wisbeach, and on Sunday, Jan. 28, 1866, while riding from one appointment to another, he was killed by a fall from his horse. Baines was painstaking, cheerful, and generous. His style of preaching was argumentative, and he possessed considerable theological knowledge. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1866, p. 19.

Baines, William, one of Wesley's early helpers, was for some time master of Kingswood School, near Bristol. He afterwards procured ordination from the friendly bishop of Bath and Wells, and for several years preached in churches near Bristol. Mr. Wesley invited him to London to assist curate in his chapels there. For some time he continued in connection with Wesley's work. He seems to have been much agitated by the political contests which stirred the English mind during the time of the American Revolution. He died Dec. 27, 1777. His talents were not great, but he was a sensible and learned man. His name does not appear on Hill's "list of ministers who have died in the work." See Atmore, Meth. Memoral, s. v.

Bainham, James, an English martyr, was a son of Master Bainham, a knight of Gloucestershire. He was a good Greek and Latin scholar, and a very pious man. He was taken and whipped at the tree, and afterwards sent to the Tower to be racked. After he had thus been tortured, he was brought before the bishop of London, and examined, Dec. 15, 1591. Again he was brought before the bishop, Feb. 1, 1592. This examination proved unsatisfactory, and he was again confined in the prison until Feb. 8. Then the sentence of condemnation was given against him, and he was taken to Newgate and burned in Smithfield, April 30, 1592. While in prison he was very cruelly handled: for two weeks he lay in the bishop's coal-house in the stocks, with irons upon his legs; then he was carried to the lord chancellor's house, and there chained to a post for two nights; thence he was carried to Fulton, where he was cruelly handled for a week; then to the Tower, where he lay a fortnight, crouched with whips to make him revoke his opinions. From here he was carried to Barking, previous to his martyrdom. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 697.

Baint, Giuseppe, an Italian musical critic and composer of church music, was born at Rome in 1775. He took priest's orders, and was instructed by his uncle, Lorenzo Baini, and by Jannacoii. He served for several years as one of the bass singers in the choir of the pontifical chapel, and in 1814 became musical director. He died at Rome in 1844. His compositions were very numerous, and of the most excellent quality. His Missere was long performed in the services of the Sistine Chapel during Passion week. His Life of Palestrina (1828) ranks very high as a work on musical history and criticism. See Encyclop. Brit, (5th ed.), s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bainians, in the religion of India, are priests of the Mariatata, belonging to the pariah caste. Their name was given them from the instrument (bains) with which they accompany their singing, begging before the temple of their goddess.

Baimadu is an idol of India, worshipped in a pagoda on the banks of the Ganges. It is held in so great veneration that as soon as the pagoda is opened the Indian priests, or Brahmins, fall flat on their faces, and some, with large fans, keep away the flies from the object of their devotion.

Baique (Bákás), or Baiís (Bāis), a Greek term for a palm-branch. See PALM-TREE.

Bairam. See BEIRAM.

Baird, Thomas D., a Presbyterian minister, was born near Guilford, County of Down, Ireland, Dec. 26, 1778. His early education was guarded by religious parents. In 1812 he was licensed to preach by the South Carolina Presbytery, and accepted a call to the Broadnax congregation, which was in Pendleton District. He held several responsible positions in the Church, all of which he discharged faithfully. He died in January, 1839. He was the author of The Science of Prayer. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iii, 480.

Baird, Thomas F., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Antrim, Ohio, Sept. 14, 1824. He was educated at Madison College, Antrim, and studied theology in Allegheny Seminary, Pa. He was licensed by Muskingum Presbytery, and ordained by Big Spring Presbytery in 1861 as pastor of Clifton Church, Pa. Here he labored until June 14, 1865, when he died. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1866, p. 257.

Baird, William S., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born at New Liberty, Pa., Nov. 4, 1815. He experienced religion in early life; graduated at Allegheny College in 1841; and in 1842 entered the Baltimore Conference. Between 1850 and 1866 he had charge of the Wesleyan Institute at Staunton, Va. During the following years he was presiding elder of Winchester. In March, 1872, he took charge of the Baltimore Episcopal Methodist, in connection with which he died, Aug. 13, 1874. Mr. Baird was meek and quiet in spirit, frank and genial in disposition, a devoted friend, and an exemplary Christian. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1875, p. 136; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Baithen, a name of many forms, and frequent occurrence in Irish hagiologies. See also BARDAN. Several appear as mere names, or with a simple designation; but others have a history, more or less distinct, such as

(1) Soa of Alla, of Cinuine-de-an, in Down, commemorated Oct. 6, is believed to have flourished at the close of the 6th century, as he is mentioned in company with three other Baithens, who were connected with St. Columba, or lived about the same time. He is perhaps the Baithen commemorated at Tech-Baithin, in Ardee. See Colgan, Acta SS. p. 369; Lamian, Eccles. Hist. Ire. in. 308.

(2) Baitan (or Boetan) of Cluan-an-dobhair, in the present King's County, Aengus and Marianus, in the Festalologies, commemorate him Dec. 1. Little is known of him; the Mart. Doney. (p. 355) identifying him with Mobaot (Dec. 13) of Cluain-fonnabhair, while Colgan (Acta SS. p. 588, c. 3, App.) mentions "Beodan, who is also Mobaecus, son of Sinell, etc., abbot of Cluan- dohbair (Dec. 13)."

(3) Baotan (or Baotan), abbot of Cluain-Micnois (A.D. 663, March 1), was descended from an ancient Connacht family, and succeeded Aedlugh, 651, as abbot of Clannacnoise, now called also "The Seven Churches."

(5) Son of Finnach, commemorated May 22, was the son of Conall Cnannach, and had his church at Inisbaithin, now "within the townland of Inishbohoen (or Inisboheen) in the barony of Dungarvan, county Waterlow." Colgan thinks he was a disciple of St. Ciaran (q. v.), and thus has flourished about A.D. 550. The exact date of his death is unknown. See O'Donovan, Four Masters, i, 374.

(6) Abbot of Iona, June 9, was the son of Brendan, pupil of Cuana, first abbot of St. Columba at Iona. He was one of the twelve companions of St. Columba who came with him from Ireland, and was closely associated with that saint till his death. He is also known as Concha, and of him was related the curious story of three empty chairs being shown to him in heaven, for St. Ciaran, St. Columba, and himself. He ruled four years in Iona after Columba's death, and died June 5, 600. "His principal church was Teach-Baithain, now Taighboinyre, barony of Raphoe, county Donegal." *See O'Curry, Lect. on Manann and Cust. Anc. Ire.; Bolland, Acta SS. (Jun.) ii, 235.

(7) Son of Macon of Lannleir, (June 18), Marty. Talnaught gives "Paradom oinna Baithin," and Marty. Doneg. has also this saint along with his brother Fuaradhran, abbot of Lannleire, now the old church of Lynn, county Westmeath. See O'Donovan, Four Masters, i, 342.

(8) Bastian of Monu (March 93) was, according to Colgan (Acta SS. p. 728), abbot of Killboeain, son of Eugeneus, and one of the six brothers of St. Corbamac. He followed his elder brothers, Corbamac and Diermit, into the scene of their missionary labors in the north of Ireland. Afterwards he took up his abode and entered his church at Killboeain, under the patronage of the three noble families of Cinel-Decli, Clnsn-Scoba, and Sillirhidhein. He, perhaps, returned to his native province of Munster, and died abbot of Moin. He is supposed to have lived about the beginning of the 6th century. See Colgan, Acta SS. p. 728; Kelly, Col. Ir. Saints, p. 108.

(9) Baithinus, Bathinus, or Bothanus, a Scotch-Irish bishop (Dec. 25, 638), and especially connected with Shetland and Thuile. The register of the priory of St. Andrews, giving the taxation of the churches in the archdeaconry of the Lothians, assigns one mark to the "Ecclesia St. Boythani." The parish of Gifford, or Yester, in East Lothian, was anciently called St. Bothanas, and that of Bows is also supposed to take its name from this saint. It is, however, difficult to identify him with certainty.

Baius (or De Bay), Jacques, a Roman Catholic divine of Belgium (nephew of Michel), who died as professor of theology at Louvain, Oct. 5, 1614, is the author of Institutio Christiana Religionis Lib. II.

- De Verebarili Eucharistica Sacrametum et Sacrificio Missae Lib. III. See Andrew Bibliotheca Belgica; Bayle, Dictionnaire Historique et Critique, s. v.; Jocher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Swerti Athenae Belgica; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Baiwe, in the mythology of Lapland, is the sun, the sun of menstruation, chased by the Lapp. The moon is thought to be her husband. She has a catalogue of all animals, and the protectoress of the reindeer. Female calves of reindeer were offered to her. The bones of such animals were laid upon the table as her symbol.

Baise, Noël Philippe, a French clergyman, was born at Paris, Oct. 28, 1672. He was director of the house of St. Charles, and edited the catalogue of the library of this house. He died in his native city, Jan. 4, 1746. He wrote a eulogy of P. le Semelier, published in the Merveille de July, 1728, and other articles found in the supplement to Moréri, as well as an abridged history of the Christian sects for the Gallia Christiana. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Bajardo, Giovanni Battista, an Italian painter, was born at Genoa about 1620. He executed several fine pieces for the churches and public edifices of Genoa, particularly for the cloister of Sant' Agostino, and for the portico of San Pietro. Soprani says he died in 1657.

Bajnus, in the mythology of India, is the third incarnation of Brahma in the third periodic age. His mother was Ghandari, who gave birth to him four hours after the embrace of a Rishi. Immediately after birth he went into a wood. His father, having received a revelation of his whereabouts, sought him, and made him a prophet. As such he is called Mung. He is the author of Uraka, Bhagavad, and other poems, which he wrote under the name of Vivas. His son, Sukadeva, excelled the father in purity and virtue, so that the heavenly Apsars, six hundred millions of beautiful ethereal maidens, were not at all concerned at bathing in his presence; but they quickly dressed when his father appeared.

Bajulius. (1.) A conventual officer whose duty it was to receive and distribute the legacies and money given for divine service and obits. Bishops and abbots also had domestic servants so called. (2.) Persons who carried the cross, candles, etc., in processions.

Bakaca, Thomas, an Hungarian bishop, was born at Erdöd in 1430, and studied at Vienna, Bologna, and Ferrara. He acted as secretary to cardinal Hippolyt von Este, and thus became known to Matthias Corvinus, who employed him in the same capacity, and placed the archives of the government under his care. In 1489 he was appointed bishop of Raab, and under Wladislaw II he received the bishopric of Erlen in 1494, and three years later he was made archbishop of Gran. Pope Alexander VI made him cardinal in 1500, and pope Julius II patriarch of Constantinople in 1507. He died June 11, 1521. Bakaca served his church and country faithfully, and his merits were especially appreciated by the Roman see. See Danks, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirkkreidzenon, s. v. (B. P.)

Bakantibol. See Vacantiv.

Bake, Henry, an English Congregational minister, was born at Bishop Monkton, near Ripon, Nov. 26, 1800. His early educational advantages were very meagre. He joined the Methodists at the age of fifteen, and soon after became a local preacher. He had strong desires for the stated ministry, and, on his marrying, joined the Congregationalists, began to preach for them, and in 1838 was ordained to the pastorate at Wetherby. In 1842 Mr. Bake entered the town mission work in Leeds, where he preached three years; and then preached successively two years at Wakefield, ten years for the combined churches of Cowick and Polling-ton, six years at Malpas, in Chesire, and six years at Wellington. In 1869 he retired to Stone, where he died, April, 1876. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1877, p. 342.

Bake, Reinhard, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born May 4, 1587. In 1616 he was appointed deacon and in 1617 pastor of the Cathedral Church at Magdeburg. When Tilly (well known in the history of the Thirty Years' War) had the cathedral church opened, in which, according to some, one thousand, according to others four thousand, people had taken refuge—this happened on May 12—Bake met him with the following slightly changed verses (see Virgil, En. ii. 324),

"Vae, si dies et ineluctabil futum Magd'burg'! Fuit illius hoc et ingens Gloria Parthenopeus!"

All efforts of the Jesuits who followed Tilly to convert Bake to their faith were in vain. In Tilly's secretary Balse found a friend, and thus succeeded in flying to Grimms, where he was made pastor and superintendent. In 1640 he returned, as first cathedral preacher, to Magdeburg, where he died, Feb. 19, 1657. See Allgemeine deutsche Biographie, s. v. (B. F.)

Baker, Abijah Richardson, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born in Franklin, Mass., Aug. 30, 1803. He was prepared for college in Medway and Brooks Academy, graduated at Andover in 1831, and at Andover Theological Seminary in 1835. From 1836 to 1837 he was a teacher in Phillips Academy, Andover, Mass.; and was ordained in 1838 as pastor of the First Trinitarian Congregational Church in Medford, continuing in that position until 1846. The following year he was agent of the Massachusetts Sabbath-school Union. In 1851 he was called to the Centenary Church, Lynn, Mass., remaining until 1854, when he became acting-pastor of the West Needham Church. He left in 1861, and in 1864 was acting-pastor of E Street Church, South Boston, where he continued until 1866, when he removed to Dorchester, Mass., without charge. Here he died, April 30, 1876. In addition to a number of sermons, he was the author of a School History of the United States; and was the editor of six volumes of The Mother's Assistant, and of as many volumes of Happy Home. His wife was widely known by her writings, under the nom de plume of "Madeline Leslie." See Congregational Quarterly, 1877, p. 469, 469. BAKER, Albert, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in the city of Baltimore, Sept. 15, 1820. He experienced religion in 1835; and in 1889 entered the Baltimore Conference, wherein he served the Church until his death, Oct. 19, 1842. Mr. Baker was a vigorous, devoted, and very promising young man. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1818, p. 533.

Baker, B. P., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Wayne County, O., May 2, 1822. He emigrated to Indiana with his parents in 1834; experienced religion at the age of fourteen; received license to preach in 1866, and was admitted into the North Indiana Conference, wherein he labored faithfully until his death in October, 1875. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1876, p. 37.

Baker, Charles, an English Congregational minister, was born at Petersfield, Hampshire, in 1705. He was converted at the age of nineteen through the prayers and influence of his sister, and joined the Independent Church in 1814. He accepted a call from the Church at Horsham, Tarrant, Hants. Thence he removed to Wilton, Wiltshire, and in 1862 retired to Horsham, where he died, Dec. 28, 1866. See (Lond.) Congregational Magazine, 1867, p. 253.

Baker, C. V., an English Baptist minister, was born at Sainthill, Kentisbeare, Devon, July 28, 1817. He was converted and baptized Sept. 2, 1838, when he began immediately to preach in the neighborhood of his home with great success. He was educated for the ministry at the Baptist Academy, Taunton, from which he went out in 1842, and was soon settled at Redruth, in Cornwall. He soon, however, removed to Grampound, in the same county. In 1845 he removed to Braintree, Devonshire, and settled in 1846 beginning solo pastorate of that Church. He was engaged during the last fifteen years of his life as agent for the British and Foreign Bible Society, and continued pastor of his Church until his death, July 13, 1874. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1875, p. 372.

Baker, David Augustin, an ascetic writer and convert to the Romish Church, was born at Abergavenny, in England, Dec. 9, 1576. He studied at Oxford and London, and became a Benedictine at Padua in 1600, and received holy orders at Rheims. In 1624 he was sent to Cambray as spiritual father of the newly founded monastery of English Benedictines. In 1633 he went to Douay, and in 1638 as missionary to England, where he died, Aug. 8, 1641. He was the means of bringing many to the Church of Rome. His ascetical writings were published in extracts under the title Sancta Sophia (Douay, 1657). His life was written by Norbert Sweeney, and translated into German by Troxler (Einsiedeln, 1876). See Mittermiller, in Wetzler u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. F.)

Baker, Elijah, a Baptist minister, was born in Lunenburg County, Va., in 1742. He made a profession of his faith in 1769, and became a member of the Church at Meherin, in his native county. Soon after he began to preach, and was ordained pastor of the Church in Malone, Mecklenburg County, Va., where he remained a year, and then devoted himself to the work of an evangelist; and, as the result of his labors, several churches were established on the eastern shore of Virginia. For three years, 1773-74, he confined his labors chiefly to the counties of Henrico, New Kent, etc., and finally located on the eastern shore, being the first Baptist minister who preached in that section of the state. He became pastor of the Northampton Church in 1778. Subsequently he was imprisoned in Accomac jail, and an unsuccessful attempt was made to get rid of him by sending him out of the county. Finally, he was permitted to perform his ministerial duties unmolested. He died Nov. 6, 1786. Says Dr. Lemon, in whose house he died, "I found the Israelite indeed, the humble Christian, the preacher of the Gospel in the simplicity of it, and the triumphant saint in his last moments." His death was remarkably peaceful, and he seemed rather translated than to suffer pain in his dissolution. See Haynes, Baptist Cyclopaedia, i, 71, 72; Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpite, vi, 846. (J. C. S.)

Baker, Eli, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Berne, N. Y., about 1833. He experienced conversion in 1856, received license to preach soon after, and in 1866 entered the Troy Conference. In 1871 failing health obliged him to desist from active service, and he died Feb. 18, 1872. Mr. Baker's ministerial career was eminently effective, owing to his Christian zeal and devotedness. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1872, p. 43.

Baker, Francis M., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the diocese of Virginia, was rector of the Church in Richmond, Va., from 1852 to the last, and added, the following year, special work in Patronsburg, Va. In 1858 he was chosen rector of Grace Church, Richmond, Va., where he continued to reside after his active ministry had ceased. In 1878 he was appointed secretary and general agent of the Diocesan Missionary Society, Richmond, Va. He died April 24, 1879. See Prot. Epic. Almanac, 1890, p. 170.

Baker, George, an English clergyman, was collated archdeacon of Totness March 26, 1740, and died Jan. 8, 1772, aged eighty-six. He published a sermon on the "Respect Due to a Church of God" (1773). See Lc Neve, F. J. (404); Allbone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Baker, George W., a Free-will Baptist minister, was born in Litchfield, Me., Oct. 22, 1803. At the age of nineteen he removed with his father's family to Marion, O., where, with the exception of two or three brief intervals, he ever afterwards resided. In 1827 he united with the Church in Marion, and soon after was impressed that he was called of God to preach the Gospel. His discouragement arising from a want of preparation for the work was very great; but he persevered, and at length was licensed to preach, resolving, however, that he would decline regular ordination. This resolution he found himself unable to keep when he saw what a blessing followed his labors. During nearly all his ministry, he had the special pastoral care of one or more churches. His preference, however, was for itinerant revivals, to which he devoted himself with great zeal and earnestness for a half century. He died at Marion, Oct. 11, 1881. He was endowed with fine and strong powers of mind; was vigorous and strong in thought; had a good knowledge of human nature; had genius and consequent originality in illustration; was a diligent student of the Bible, deeply pious and spiritual; had a large and varied vocabulary but few words seemed improper to a Christian, and had great power in winning souls to Christ." Under his ministry it is estimated that not less than three thousand persons became professed Christians, the larger part of them being baptized by himself. Of these, over twenty-five entered the ministry. See Morning Star, Nov. 28, 1881. (C. C. S.)

Baker, Greenberry R., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Westmoreland County, Pa., May 1, 1825. He received a careful religious education; was converted in early life; moved to California in 1856; was licensed to preach in 1860, and in 1862 entered the California Conference. Two years later he was appointed a member of the University of the Pacific, which position he held till his decease, Oct. 28, 1889. Mr. Baker's preaching abilities were more than ordinary, and, coupled with his extraordinary zeal and fidelity, made him eminently successful. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1870, p. 212.

Baker, Henry, an English Congregational minister, was born at Bicester in 1828. He was converted in his sixteenth year, entered in Harvard College in his eighteenth year, and after a three years' course was ordained pastor at Summertown, near Oxford. In 1854 Mr. Baker removed to Lewisham, where he labored beyond his ability until 1867, when he was compelled to resign the pastorate. In 1869 he retired to Bicester, the home of his boyhood, and there died June 4, 1871. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1872, p. 305.

Baker, James (1), an English Wesleyan minister, was born of Nonconformist parents in London in 1789. He was converted under the instrumentation of the Methodists, was called into the ministry in 1814, became a supernumerary in 1844, residing in London, and died March 5, 1855. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1855.

Baker, James (2), an English Congregational minister, was born at Barnstaple in April, 1816. While still a youth, he united with the Church. He soon began to preach in surrounding villages, and, after being a tutor for many years, entered the Western College in order to fit himself for the ministry. His first charge was Credinton, which he entered in 1848, and soon added the neighboring parishes of Sandford, where a handsome and commodious chapel was opened for divine service Oct. 8, 1848. His labors were attended with great success. In October, 1852, his health declined, and he died Dec. 3, 1853. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1854, p. 217 sq.

Baker, James E., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was a native of North Carolina. In 1850 he emigrated to Missouri, and in 1857 experienced religion, and united with the Baptist Church. In 1859 he joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, soon after was licensed to exhort, and in 1861 was admitted into the Missouri Conference. He was twice driven from his field of labor by the Confederates. He died Dec. 31, 1863. Mr. Baker was an honest, faithful, diligent minister. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1863, p. 7.

Baker, James Sears, a Congregational minister, was born in Marcellus, N. Y., Feb. 9, 1822. He graduated at the Geneva Medical College in 1846, and practiced medicine in Geneva and Canandaigua—two years in the former and three in the latter place; after which he removed to Marcellus, where he practiced as a dental surgeon from 1851 to 1865. Having been ordained in 1865, he was installed pastor in the following year at Madison, N. Y. In 1867 he was acting pastor at Otisco, holding this position until Dec. 1, 1872. From 1873 until the date of his death he was acting pastor of the Congregational and Presbyterian churches in Onondaga Valley. He died at Syracuse, N. Y., Nov. 14, 1875. See Cong. Quarterly, 1876, p. 420.

Baker, Joel, an English martyr, was from London, and suffered martyrdom in the 16th century. The chief objection against her was that she would not only not receive the cruelties inflicted on her by the magistrates, but also refused to bless a friend of hers lying at the point of death not to put any confidence in it. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 175.

Baker, John (1), a Protestant martyr, was an Englishman by birth, and dwelt in Cadiz, Spain. He was apprehended and burned in Seville, Nov. 2, 1558, for his faithful adherence to the truth. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, viii, 516.

Baker, John (2), an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Bideford, Devonshire, in 1738. He was brought to Christ at the age of seventeen; entered the itinerancy in 1818; went to Western Africa as a missionary the same year; labored at Sierra Leone and St. Mary's (1819-20) until repeated attacks of fever compelled him to leave with a broken constitution. He also labored at Nolita, near Curacao, W. I., in 1832 and sailed for home from 1833 to 1834. His last illness seized him while in the pulpit, and he died at Brighton, Nov. 17, 1845. He had a vigorous understanding, and his discourses were original and replete with evangelical truth. He was ardently attached to the whole economy of his Church, and supported it with firmness and integrity. He retained his missionary ardor to the last. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1846.

Baker, John (3), a Congregational minister, was born at Edgecomb, Me., May 30, 1811. In 1831 he graduated at Bowdoin College, was converted and took charge of Monmouth Academy. His theological training was acquired at Andover and Bangor. He commenced his ministry at Monmouth, Me., in 1835, and was ordained in 1838. In 1839 he removed to the town of Kennebunkport, supplying the two churches there for fourteen years. His next charge was Wilton; after preaching there four years, he left to visit his family connections in Edgecomb, never, as it proved, to return. He was stricken with fever and erysipelas while at his early home, which proved fatal Oct. 27, 1859. Kind, patient, cheerful, Mr. Baker was "a brother beloved." See Cong. Quarterly, 1860, p. 237.

Baker, John (4), a Baptist minister, was born in Stonington, Conn., Sept. 26, 1805. In November, 1822, he united with the Church, and not long after was licensed to preach. For some time he combined the la-
Baker, John Christopher, D.D., a Lutheran clergyman, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., May 7, 1792. In consequence of the death of his father in 1785, he was taken into the family of his maternal grandparents, where he remained until ten years of age. In 1802 his guardian, Godfrey Haga, placed him at Nazareth Hall, a Moravian Seminary in which he never recovered his studies. He returned to his home in East Greenwich, where he lingered a little more than two years, dying Jan. 16, 1809. As an illustration of the kind and amount of labor he performed, we are told that from December, 1805, to October, 1806, he traveled 2935 miles, mostly on foot, made 730 visits, attended 226 meetings, preached more than 100 sermons, and baptized 140 persons. See R. I. Biog. Cyclop., p. 381. (J. C. S.)

Baker, Osmon Cleander, D.D., a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born at Marlow, N. H., July 30, 1812. His father, Dr. Isaac Baker, was noted for his intelligence and integrity. His mother was a woman of unusual excellence. Both were devoted Christians. He was one of fifteen children in the family. His labors were confined chiefly to places in Connecticut and Rhode Island, and were followed by remarkable revivals. His home was in East Greenwich, R. I., where he resided from 1812. While engaged in prayer in the Church on Block Island, he had a stroke of paralysis, Jan. 5, 1830, from which he never recovered. He returned to his home in East Greenwich, where he lingered a little more than two years, dying Jan. 16, 1809. As an illustration of the kind and amount of labor he performed, we are told that from December, 1805, to October, 1806, he traveled 2935 miles, mostly on foot, made 730 visits, attended 226 meetings, preached more than 100 sermons, and baptized 140 persons. See R. I. Biog. Cyclop., p. 381. (J. C. S.)

Baker, Joseph, a Universalist minister, was born at Concord, N. H. He worked in a woolen-mill until the age of thirty-four; had but few literary advantages; embraced Universalism, and began about 1836 to preach that faith at Swainston Falls and Alburgh, Vt. In 1839 he removed to Jeffersonville; in 1843 to St. Albans, Vt.; in 1851 to Grantsville, Wis.; in 1859 to Oskaloosa, Ia. He was a member of the Baptist Church at Philadelphia, Pa. He died of apoplexy, Feb. 20, 1873. Mr. Baker was noted for integrity and purity of character. See Universalist Register, 1874, p. 117.

Baker, Samuel, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Baltimore, Sept. 13, 1798. He removed to East Tennessee with his father when about five years old; soon after was left an orphan; was noted for his uprightness of life; moved to Ohio at the age of seventeen; experienced conversion about that time; received license to preach in 1815, and in 1816 entered the Seminary of Cincinnati, which he attended residually until the remainder of his life. In 1852 he was elected bishop, and performed with exemplary diligence and success the various duties of that office until stricken down by paralysis in 1866. He partially recovered, and served two years longer. Finally a second stroke of paralysis overtook his death. Dec. 20, 1874. In 1843 his home bishop Baker was eminently happy, and beautifully exhibited the excellence of his character—punctuality, devotedness, and uniform piety. He possessed a ready apprehension, sound judgment, retentive memory, moderate imagination, a calm temperament, deep religious convictions, and an all-controlling conscientiousness. He was never ostentatious, impetuous, or eccentric. As a teacher he was laborious, learned, lucid; as a preacher eloquent only in unction; as a bishop sagacious, solicitous, and strictly honest. His work on the Discipline exhibits his unwavering Methodistic characteristics. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1872, p. 140; Simpson, Cyclopedia of Methodism, v. v.

Baker, Sarah, an English minister of the Society of Friends, was the widow of George Baker, of Ashburnham Fields, near York. She appeared as a minister about 1814. She spoke with great simplicity, but her words were edifying and instructive. Her labors were confined to the district in which she resided. She died June 11, 1866. See (Lond.) Annual Monitor, 1851, p. 2; 1867, p. 10.

Baker, Thomas (1), an English clergyman and learned antiquary, was born at Crook in 1656. He was educated at the free school at Durham and St. John's College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship in 1672. He was ordained to the ministry by bishop Barlow in 1686, and became chaplain to Crewe, bishop of Durham, who gave him in 1687 the rectory of Long Newton. He incurred the displeasure of his bishop by refusing to read James III's Declaration of Indulgence, and was disgraced for the refusal. Baker declined to take the oaths to William III, and resigned Long Newton, Aug. 1, 1690, after which he retired to St. John's College, in which he was protected till Jan. 20, 1716 or 1717, and was afterward recalled to some of his fellowship. He continued to reside in the college until his death, July 2, 1740. The only works he published were, Reflections on Learning, showing the Ineffectiveness thereof in its Several Particulars, in order to Enforce the Usefulness and Necessity of Revelation (1705–10), and his posthumous Sermon on the Death of General Sercorn for Margaret, Countess of Richmond and Derby (1708). His Life has been written by Robert Masters (1784) and by Horace Walpole (in the 4to ed. of his works). See Encyclop. Brit. (9th ed.) s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Baker, Thomas (2), an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Winteringham in 1862. He was converted when eighteen years of age, and was proposed as a candidate for the ministry in 1829. He preached on the Bedford, St. Albans, Canterbury, Rye, Swansea, and other circuits. He died of apoplexy, Dec. 8, 1848. He was a man of prayer; his preaching was practical and profitable, and he devoted to his work. See Minutes of British Conference, 1849.

Baker, Thomas (3), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Monongalia County, Va., Dec. 6, 1806. He experienced conversion in 1828; received license to preach in 1832; and in 1833 was admitted into the Pittsburgh Conference, and in its active ranks served the Church until his death, April 4, 1845. Mr. Baker was a man of great meekness and deep piety. He was a powerful, instructive preacher. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1845, p. 620.

Baker, William (1), an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Peasmarsh, Sussex, Sept. 15, 1785. He received his first appointment in 1808; became a superannuate in 1857; spent the remainder of his life in Gloucester, and died June 7, 1877. He was an indefatigable laborer of unsullied reputation. See Minutes of British Conference, 1877, p. 98.

Baker, William (2), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Connecticut, Oct. 9, 1801. In 1831 he entered the Philadelphia Conference, in which he labored, bringing many to Christ, until his death, Sept. 30, 1841. Mr. Baker possessed good preaching abilities and the highest order of piety. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1842, p. 908.

Baker, William A., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Westmoreland County, Pa., June 14, 1821. He removed to Ohio in early life; there experienced conversion; received license to preach in 1847; and in 1849 joined the North Ohio Conference. In January, 1862, he was appointed chaplain of the Forty-sixth Regiment of Ohio Volunteer Militia, and was in the bloody battle of Shiloh. Immediately after the battle he was detailed by the regiment to carry home the money the soldiers wished to send to their friends. Soon after his arrival he was prostrated by sickness, and finally an attack of diphtheria ended his life, Aug. 23, 1862. In social life Mr. Baker was diffident and taciturn, but in the pulpit fearless and bold. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1862, p. 148.

Baker, William Richard, an English Congregational minister, was born at Waltham Abbey, Sept. 8, 1798. He was a lively, precocious, and generous lad. After having attended school successively at Colchester, Ashburnton, and Witham, and spending some time as a sailor, visiting foreign ports, he received an appointment in the Wesleyan Horse, Greenwic Circuit, but this time he was converted, and soon after entered Wymondley Academy to prepare for the ministry. On leaving college in 1821 he settled at Ramsey, in the Isle of Man, and after a lapse of five years removed to Shetron Mal-convert the world. The evil spirits, fearing that it would be snatched from their grasp, took the form of charming Peris, lovely maidens, and thus misled the disciples of the philosopher. The latter, in order to bring the disciples back, changed himself into a monstrous horse, Balacho, Balaeus lived about the same time as St. Ephrem. He must not be confused with Beleus, an Egyptian monk; nor with a disciple of St. Ephrem, whom that father, in his Testament, accuses of apostasy from the faith. See Cellier, Hist. des Ant. Eccl. x, 464.

Balaeus, a Syrian author who wrote several hymns; one of which was On the Death of the High-priest Aaron. According to Gregory Barhebraeus, Balaeus lived about the same time as St. Ephrem. He must not be confused with Belus, an Egyptian monk; nor with a disciple of St. Ephrem, whom that father, in his Testament, accuses of apostasy from the faith. See Cellier, Hist. des Ant. Eccl. x, 464.

Bala-Naela (sea-men), in the mythology of the Caribbeans, the Europeans. They are regarded as creations of evil spirits of the sea.

Balance as a Christian symbol. In this relation it appears sometimes upon Christian tombs. A sepulchral stone from the Cemetery of St. Cyril displays this instrument in conjunction with a crown; it may also be seen upon a marble slab taken from a cemetery of the Via Latina, accompanied by a house, a fish, by a doubtful object which has been taken wrongly for a candelabrum, and by a mummy set up in a niche. A monument of the same nature represents a balance with a weight. Another example is found in the Church of St. Cecilia at Rome.

Balance with Weight. (From the Catacombs.)

Some antiquaries have supposed that the balance is symbolic of judgment or justice. It is true that it is found, doubtless with this signification, on coins of Gordian, Diocletian, and other emperors of pagan Rome. The medieval artists, again, have frequently made use of this idea; for instance, in the tympanum of the great doorway of Notre Dame in Paris, and in that of the cathedral of Autun, where it may be considered as a translation in sculpture of the words of the Apocalypse (xxii, 12). But in the first two instances which we have mentioned—almost the only examples transmitted to us by Christian antiquity properly so called—it is important to observe that mention is made of the contract entered into between the purchasers of the tombs and the fossores ("grave-diggers") Montanus and Calceus. It is therefore more natural to suppose that the balance symbolizes purchase and sale.

Sometimes upon tombs the balance is simply indicative of a trade; as, for example, on the slab of a Roman money-changer found in the Cemetery of St. Priscilla. Bronze balances were found in a Frankish sepulchre of the Merovingian period, where in all probability they indicated the tomb of a monetary officer, or fiscal agent, or accountant of some kind. This is rendered almost certain by the fact that a balance in the Faussett collection was found in the same tomb with a "touch-stone" for the trial of metals. Another was found in an ancient tomb in Kent.

Balanus (Ballvin, or Ballonus), a Christian saint celebrated on Sept. 3, is said by Colgan to have been brother of St. Gerald, and one of the four sons of Cusperius, king of England. Balanus and his brothers accompanied Colman, bishop of Lindisfarne, to Iona, and retired with him into Cumbria. In Ireland, Balanus took up his residence at Techb saxon, parish of Ath-na-riogh. He flourished at the close of the 7th and the beginning of the 8th century. See Colgan, Life of St. Gerald; Grub, Eccl. History of Scotland, i, 88-97.
