Early, John, D.D., a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Bedford County, Va., Jan. 1, 1766, of Baptist parents. He was converted in 1804; licensed to preach in 1805; and in 1807 entered the Virginia Conference, wherein he continued laboriously and faithfully till 1815, when the growing necessities of his family obliged him to locate and engage in secular business. In 1821 he re-entered the effective ranks, and labored with marvellous success until 1846, when he connected himself with the Church South, and devoted his energies to establishing and operating the Southern Book Concern. In 1854 he was elected to the episcopacy; in 1866 was granted a supernumerary relation, and died in Lynchburg, Nov. 5, 1878. Bishop Early was full of the missionary spirit, and everywhere awakened missionary zeal; was one of the chief founders of Randolph-Macon College; was a man of great energy and devotedness, and held a high position in the esteem of the Church. Eastburn, Manton, D.D., LL.D., a bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born in England, Feb. 9, 1801, being a brother of James W., the English bishop. His parents came to America when he was a boy. He graduated from Columbia College, New York, in 1817, and in due time thereafter from the General Theological Seminary in the same city. He was ordained assistant minister of Church in 1822; became consecrated bishop of the Church of the Ascension in 1827; was consecrated bishop of Massachusetts Dec. 29, 1842; and died in Boston, Sept. 12, 1872. Bishop Eastburn published several addresses and essays, and edited Thornton's Family Prayers. See Drake, Dict. of Amer. Biog. s. v.; Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1873, p. 183.

Easter-eggs. The egg was the symbol of creation in Egypt, and of hope and the resurrection among early Christians; and the custom of giving colored pasch eggs on Easter morning is found in the East, in the Tyrol, in Russia, in Greece, in many parts of England, where it may be traced back to the time of Edward I, and was observed at Gray's Inn in the reign of Elizabeth. In France the pasch egg is eaten before any other nourishment is taken on Easter day. Taney puddling, according to Selden, is a memorial of the bitter herbs eaten by the Jews; and peculiar cakes in some places formed the staple fare on this day. Paul II issued a form of benediction of eggs for England, Scotland, and Ireland. Henry VIII received a paschal egg in a case of silver filigree from the pope. The Jews regarded the egg as a symbol of death.—Walcott, Sac. Archaeol. s. v. See Egg.
EASTERWINE (or Bosterwine), conditor-abbot of Wearmouth, was the nephew of Benedict, the founder of that monastery, and was born in 650. At the age of twenty-two he renounced his secular prospects, was ordained in 679, and devoted himself with singular humility and affection to the duties of his recluse life. He died March 7, 686.

EASTLAKE, Sir CHARLES LOCK, an English painter, was born at Plymouth in 1793. He studied under Fuseli at the Royal Academy, and at the Louvre in Paris. He went to Rome in 1813, and remained there many years. In 1814 he was appointed secretary to the royal commission on fine arts; from 1815 to 1817 he was keeper of the National Gallery; and in 1850 he was knighted, made president of the Royal Academy, and director of the National Gallery. He died in Piccadilly, Dec. 23, 1863. Among his most noted works are: Christ Weeping over Jerusalem; Pilgrims Arriving in Sight of Rome; Christ Blessing Little Children; Hagia and Isaiah; and the Raising of Jairus's Daughter. He wrote Matters of Old and New Painting, and Contributions to the Literature of the Fine Arts (posthumous; edited by lady Eastlake). A History of his life was published by lady Eastlake in London in 1870.

EASTON, THOMAS, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, graduated from Glasgow University; was licensed to preach in June, 1807; presented by Rev. L. Douglas to the rectory of Kilbirnie in 1809, and ordained March 22, 1810. He died April 5, 1856, aged seventy-nine years. In his learning, knowledge, modesty, and moral worth were combined with meekness and piety; he published six different works, chiefly of a local theological character. See Fusi, Eccles. Scoticae, iii. 777.

EATON, JOHN H, LL.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Wells, Me., June 22, 1748. He was converted at the age of twenty-two, licensed to preach in 1788, and in 1796 was ordained pastor of the Church in Wells, the service being performed by Mr. Berwick. After his resignation, in 1820, Mr. Eaton was engaged for several years in evangelistic labors in the sections of the country in which he lived. His death took place in December, 1831. See Millett, History of the Baptists in Maine, p. 442. (J. C. S.)

EATON, Joseph, a veteran Baptist minister, was born at Wells, Me., June 22, 1748. He was converted at the age of twenty-two, licensed to preach in 1788, and in 1796 was ordained pastor of the Church in Wells, the service being performed by Mr. Berwick. After his resignation, in 1820, Mr. Eaton was engaged for several years in evangelistic labors in the sections of the country in which he lived. His death took place in December, 1831. See Millett, History of the Baptists in Maine, p. 442. (J. C. S.)

Eaton, Joseph H., LL.D., a Baptist minister, brother of Rev. G. W. Eaton, D.D., was born in Berlin, Delaware Co., Oct. 9, 1812. He graduated from the Hamilton Literary and Theological Institution (now Madison University) in 1837, and for three years thereafter was engaged in teaching. He was elected professor in 1841, and in 1847 president of what is now Union University, Monticello, Thebes, and Memphis. He took place in 1848, and in 1853 was pastor of the Church in the same place, having also the oversight of several county churches. His health broke down under these excessive labors, and he died, Jan. 12, 1859. See Cathcart, Baptist Cyclop. p. 658. (J. C. S.)

Eaton, Peter, D.D., a Unitarian minister, was born at New York, March 25, 1766. He studied under the Rev. Phineas Adams, graduated from Harvard College in 1787, taught a school for one year at Woburn, and then passed some time in the study of theology. Having received license, he preached his first sermon in Harford, Jan. 10, 1789, and on the following was installed as pastor there. In 1819 he preached the annual sermon before the Legislature of Massachusetts, and in 1820 resigned his charge at Boston. In 1845 he removed to Andover, where he remained until his death, in April, 1848. Dr. Eaton published many valuable sermons. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii. 222.

EBAL, MOUNT. We extract some additional particulars from Lieut. Conder's Test. Work in Palestine, i. 88:

"There are three curious places on Ebal: one of which is a rude stone building, enclosing a space of fifty feet square, and surrounded by twenty feet thick, and as a part of the hill itself, showing that the place was inhabited there. The Samaritans call it part of a ruined village, but it is used as a mill. The second is the great monument erected within the hill, and which are the curiosities near Huweil, called the 'Tombs of the Sons of Israel.' The place is in some cases the little cave and ruin called Nabi-Salama, which is the hill near which one has given her name to the mountain. It is perched on the side of a precipice, and is held sacred by the Moslems, who have a tradition that the bones of the saint were carried thither through the air from Damascus. The third place is a site and elevations which has not been previously recognized. It is a little Moslem Mulkam, said once to have been a church, called 'Amad ed-Dhi, or Monument of the Faith.' The same thus preserved has no connection with Samarian tradition, but it is undisputed that the sacred places of the passtrinity represent spots famous in Bible history. It seems possible that the site thus reverenced is none other than the mountain eminence of the Ark of Solomon, which Joshua erected, according to the Biblical account, on Ebal, and not on Gerizim, as the Samaritans believe. The site is near Jericho, and having all fitness for the hill-top on which this monument stands is called Huweil el-Kady, ' Hill of the Judge.' It was here that the Crusaders planted Dan, the sacred cedars of Lebanon, during the Second Crusade, in 1145. John the Baptist was also imprisoned here. See note 4." orders in 1899; in 1840 became chaplain of St. Castor's, at Coblenz; was called in 1848 as episcopal secretary to Treves, and appointed the same year professor of dogmatics at the clerical seminary there. In 1850 he became member of the chapter, and was consecrated in 1862 bishop of Treves. After Arnold's death, in 1864, his name was stricken from the list of candidates as persona regi minuta grata, but he was elected in 1867 by the chapter. In 1869 and 1870 he was at Rome as member of the Vatican Council. The Prussian "Folk-Laws" brought him in 1873 in conflict with the government, and as he could not pay the fines, he was imprisoned in 1874. He died May 8, 1876, leaving De Tituli Sedis Apostolicae, etc. (Treves, 1846). (B. F.)

EBERMANN, VITUS, a German Jesuit, was born in 1597. In 1620 he joined his order, was professor of philosophy and theology at Mayence and Wittringen, and died April 8, 1675, leaving De Controversiis Variorum Theologorum Dissertatio: — Persolae Ecclesiae et Variorum Homiliarum Collectio: — In vinylum et Coeli: — In vinylum Catholicon Helveticum Oppositum: — Bellarmianae Vindicatae (4 vols.) — Justo Exposito cum Litterarum Doctissimis. EBON VERSION

EBON VERSION OF THE SCRIPTURES. Ebon is the most southerly of the Marshall Islands. These islands are the second group of Micronesia, beginning from the east with the Gilbert Island. The first scripture in this language was the gospel of Matthew from cap. vii. to xi. This translation was printed at Elson, between 1858 and 1860. The work was done by the pioneer missionaries, Rev. E. T. Doane and G. Pierson. A version of Mark, prepared by Mr. Doane, was printed at Honolulu in 1866. The Rev. R. G. Snow prepared for the press the gospel of Matthew and John, and the Acts, and revised Mark for a reprint. In 1871 he prepared the gospel of Luke and a revision of Matthew for the press. In 1875 Genesis was issued from the mission press at Elson, translated by J. F. Whitney, who also resumed the work on Romans, left unfinished by Mr. Snow, and translated the epistles from 1 Corinthians through Philippians. These were printed at the end of the Bide House Press in 1882. With the writer with the book of Genesis and the three epistles of John. The Rev. E. M. Pease, who joined the mission in 1877, has resumed the work of translation of the rest of the New Testament. EBRABABARITES, an order of monks among the Mohammedans, who derived their name from their founder, Ebrabar, the scholar of Nacchendeli, who came from Persia to Europe in the 14th century to propagate their faith. They professed to surrender all cares about worldly concerns, and to give themselves wholly up to the contemplation of eternal objects. They were esteemed heretics by the Mohammedans generally, because they refused to go on pilgrimage to Mecca, alleging that the journey was unnecessary, as they were permitted in secret, while sitting in their cells, to behold the holy things.

EBOARD, Johannes, a celebrated composer of Church music, was born at Mulhausen, on the Unstrut, Prussia, in 1553. Having received some instruction in music at home, he became, at the age of eighteen, the pupil of Orlando di Lasso at Munich. In 1574 he was again at Mulhausen, where he resided four years, and edited, together with Johann von Burgk, his first master, a collection of sacred songs called Cypriandi Sacrae Helmboldi (1577). He was for some time engaged in a private family, and in 1583 became assistant conductor, and twelve years later first chapel-master, at Königseberg. In 1598 he became chief conductor of the cathedral choir in Berlin, and died in 1611. Eccoard's works consist exclusively of vocal compositions, such as songs, sacred cantatas, and chorales for four or five, and sometimes for seven, eight, or even nine voices. They are instinct with a spirit of true religious feeling, and possess an interest were their artistic value. Eccoard's setting of "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott" is still regarded by the Germans as their representative national hymn. Eccoard and his school are in the same way inseparably connected with the history of the Reformation. Of his songs a great many collections are extant. See Encyclop. Brit. (9th ed.) s. v.; Grove, Dict. of Music, s. v.

ECCLESIA (the Church), one of the eight primary persons in the system of Valentine (q. v.), and held to be the archetype of the lower one on earth. The gnostic likewise had a heavenly Church, but not a distinct being. This notion is evidently a corruption of the scriptural idea of the heavenly Jerusalem, and tendencies to a fanciful separation of the Church triumphant and the Church militant are noticeable in the Shepherd of Hermas (Vic. vii. 4) and in Clement's Second Epistle to the Corinthians (chap. xiv.).

ECCLESIA APOTOLICA, a name applied by some of the early fathers to the Church of Rome, on account of the prevalent belief that the apostles Peter and Paul both taught at Rome, and honored the Church by their martyrdom.

ECCLESIA MATRIS (Mother Church), a name given in ancient times to the cathedral church, to which all the clergy of a city or diocese belonged.

ECCLESIA CAUSIDICUS (Church legeres), the name formerly applied to ecclesiastical chancellors. See CHANCELLOR.

ECCLESIAE, in the East, was the sacerdot, who had general charge of the church and its contents, and summoned the people by bells or other means. The minor ecclesiastical officials were under his authority.

ECCLESIAJERON, a term sometimes used in early times to denote the church building as distinguished from the ecclesiastics or members of the Church in it.

ECCLESIASTES, Book or. A somewhat fuller discussion of the points relating to the authorship of this composition is appropriate, in view of the confident assertion of many critics, especially in Germany, that the contents forbid its ascription to Solomon. We might fairly appeal to the opinions of modern scholars by that of the great Hebraists, certainly in nowise their inhabitants, who seem to have found no such difficulty even in the linguistic peculiarities of the book as to require a later than the Solomonic age for its production. The direct evidence of the writer himself, in the opening verse, he who is least treated by these so captivated by critical bibles, for while most of them are compelled to admit that "the Preacher, the son of David, king in Jerusalem, can only point to Solomon, they yet evade the argument as if this were merely a nom de plume; and Plumptre (Utah Bridge, introd. ad loc.) does not hesitate to compare this with the pious forgery of the apocryphal book of "The Wisdom of Solomon." The attempt to justify this pseudonym by the modern practice of fictitious authorship will apply very well as far as the assumption of the fame title Kohled, is concerned, but not to the very nature of the book as an addition "son of David, king in Jerusalem," for such a precise and misleading designation is unprecedented in the history of trustworthy literature. The book is either Solomon's or a forgery.

The anonymous author of The Authorship of Ecclesiastes (London, 1880, 8vo) has nearly exhausted the arguments in favor of the Solomonic date, as derived from a comparison of Solomon's other writings, and he extends the inquiry into the minute of style and phraseology with a thoroughness that ought to shake the confidence of the holders of the opposite view. As to the alleged Aramaism in Ecclesiastes, there are certainly more more decided than appear in Deborah's ode (Judg. v.; pure Chabaiam on), ver. 13; so Ps. ii. 12).

Delitzsch, in his Commentary on this book (Clark's translation, Edinburgh, 1877, p. 190 sqq.), has collected a formidable "list of the Hapaxlegomena, and of the Words and Forms in the Book of Kohlethes belonging to a more recent Period of the Language" than Solomon: and this has been pointed out to by later critics generally as conclusive against the Solomonic authorship. The writer of the above monograph justly remarks (p. 32), "A cursory glance at the list, however, seems sufficient to shake one's confidence in it; and if it be faithfully scrutinized, it shrinks down to almost nothing." Accordingly he examines several of these words, as specimens, and shows conclusively that they do not sustain the position. It is worth our while to analyze this list, and it will serve as a slender basis of efforts for the conclusion based upon it. There are ninety-five of these words enumerated by Delitzsch, of which, by his own showing, fifteen (besides one which he has overlooked) are found, in the same form and sense, more or less frequently, in writings of the early or middle Hebrew (Moises to Isaiah), and may therefore be set aside as wholly irrelevant. Of the rest, twenty-six words occur elsewhere only in the Talmudic writers or the Targums, in the same form and sense, and therefore, if they prove anything, prove entirely too much, for they would argue a substantiation, which we know is impossible, since the Sept., translation of Ecclesiastes, now extant, carries the original up to the time of the Prophets at least. Still further we may reduce the list by excluding nineteen words which appear in substantially the same or some closely cognate form in one or more Targum writers, and thirteen others which are used by them in a slightly different sense. Deducting all these immaterial peculiarities, there remain only twenty-one words, or less than one fourth in the list, that are really pertinent to the question. Of these, again, eleven are found in a single book only (strictly speaking, eleven), and therefore determine nothing as to its age, being such forms as, for ought we know, might have been employed by any writer. Once more, we ought in fairness to exclude certain particles and dubious forms (явление, явление, явление), which are vague and inconclusive. The actual residuum available thus dwindles down to six words only, namely, бъл (xii, 5), съ (iii, 1), съ (x, 10; xi, 6), зъли (viii, 1), зъли (ibid.), and съ (i, 17: ii, 22; iv, 16), which is no greater number than can be pointed out in Job and some other pre-exilian books. None of these half-dozen words is sufficiently distinctive in itself to throw much light on the date of the writing. The evidence is too negative, and the terms are not like some modern terms, which we can trace to a specific source and occasion when they were first coined or introduced. The cognate dialects exhibit all of them in the same or similar significations, and of most of them (perhaps even the last two are exceptions) the Hebrew itself has the root in no very remote sense. They are neither foreign nor technical terms.

The same line of argument is applicable to the peculiar infections and constructions added by Delitzsch in the same connection. They have been greatly exaggerated in relative number and importance. The book of Ecclesiastes is singular in many of its forms and phrases no one can doubt, but that these peculiarities are such as specifically belong to the later Hebrew has not been made out. We have several books written in the post-exilian period, but Koheloth does not wear their impress, either in general or in particular. The only other book in the canonical Hebrew Scriptures analogous to it in teaching is Proverbs, and we have nothing in apocryphal Jewish literature that compares. We must therefore turn to the Wisdom of Solomon, which is only extant in Greek (which is the original), and was evidently modelled after Koheloth. That Solomon was a perfectly classical writer is not to be assumed, either from his era or what else we know of him. The effort to express philosophical ideas in the inadequate Semitic tongue may well explain many of the harsh terms and strange constructions of Ecclesiastes. Certainly we gain nothing by attributing the book to some unknown writer of some indefinite age, concerning whom nothing can be proved or disproved. Subjective arguments on a question of authorship are of the most deceptive character, as the well-known attempt to determine who wrote The Letters of Jesus has proved. One good historical statement, whether made in the writing itself or by traditional testimony, outweighs all such speculative and conjectural data. Until some candidate better accredited than Solomon shall be brought forward, in deserting him we shall be forsaking the substance for a shadow.

Ecclesiastical Res. (1) The term is used, in a wide sense, to denote all matters belonging to the Church, as opposed to things secular or worldly. It also indicates the priestly office and duties. It is likewise used in reference to "spiritual" things of a material or material. To the former class belong the invisible gifts and graces bestowed by God upon the soul; to the latter, the outward acts or objects connected with such gifts, as the sacraments and other religious rites. From this it is sometimes applied to the vestments of ministers, as well as to the beneficent institutions over which the Church has jurisdiction. (2) The narrower sense of the term designates the property of the Church.

Ecclesiastical Commission, in English law, is a standing body invested with very important powers, under the operations of which extensive changes have been made in the distribution of the revenues of the Church of England. In 1838 two commissions were appointed "to consider the state of the several dioceses of England and Wales, with reference to the amount of their revenues and the more equal distribution of episcopal duties, and the prevention of the necessity of attaching by commendam to bishoprics any benefice of substance, or cure of souls; and to consider also the state of the several cathedral and collegiate churches in England and Wales, with a view to the suggestion of such measures as might render them conducive to the efficiency of the Established Church, and to ascertain the best mode of providing for the compensation of bishops, with special reference to the residence of the clergy on their respective benefices." Upon the recommendation of these committees a permanent commission was appointed by 6 and 7 Will. IV, c. 77, for the purpose of preparing and laying before the crown important schemes as should appear to them to be best adapted for carrying into effect the alterations suggested in the report of the original commission and recited in the act. The first members of this commission were the two archbishops and three bishops, the lord-chancellor and the principal officers of state, and three laymen named in the act. By a later act (3 and 4 Vict. c. 113), all the bishops, the chiefs of the three courts at Westminster, the master of the rolls, the judges of the Prerogative Court and Court of Admiralty, and the deans of Canterbury, St. Paul's, and Westminster, were added to the commission; and power was given to the crown to appoint four and the archbishop of Canterbury to appoint two additional lay commissioners, who are required to be "members of the United Church of England and Ireland, and to subscribe a declaration to that effect. Five are a quorum; but two bishops at least must be present at any proceeding under the common seal of the commission, and if only two are present they can demand its postponement to a subsequent meeting. Paid commissioners, under the title of Church estates' commissioners, are also appointed by the crown, and confirmed by the archbishop of Canterbury. These three are the joint deciders of the commission, and constitute, along with two members appointed by the commission, the Church estates' committee, charged with all business relating to the sale, purchase, exchange, letting, or management of any lands, tithes, or hereditaments. The schemes of the commission having, after due notice to persons affected thereby, been laid before the queen in council, may be ratified by orders, specifying the times when they shall take effect; and such orders, when published in the London Gazette, have the same force as acts of Parliament. Bickle, Joseph, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born in London, England, Oct. 11 (O. S.), 1756. When about seventeen years of age his father moved with his family to America, and settled in Morristown, N. J. Soon after his arrival Joseph was sent to the College of New Jersey, from which he graduated in 1772; and, in order to prosecute his theological studies, he remained at Princeton. May 7, 1776, he was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New York. The Old South Church, Boston, having been renamed a constitutional church, the dispersion occasioned by the Revolution, chose him for their pastor in 1778; and he was ordained Oct. 27, 1779. In 1808 he was provided with a colleague, Rev. Joshua Huntington. He died in Boston, April 30, 1811. In temperament Dr. Eckley was ardent. Although frequently called upon to preach on important occasions, he was not remarkable as a speaker, being inclined to abstraction and possessed of an unmusical voice. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ii. 337.

Bolithon, Thomas, a Franciscan of the 14th century, was born at Ecbulane, Cheshire; was bred a Franciscan in Oxford, and died in 1340. He wrote a book on the succession of the Franciscans in England, with their works and wonders, from their first coming in to his own time, dedicating the same modestly to a fellow-friar. Another work of his is, De Impugnatione Ordinis sui per Doctrinam. See Fuller, Worthies of England, i. 276.

Economist (a steward), called by Possidius provost of the church-house, was a priest, as stated by Isidore Pelusianus, appointed by the Council of Chalcedon in 451, and elected by the clergy in the East, to discharge the same duties as devolved on a medieval treasurer, provost, or steward, and somen for an English cathedral. In the Western Church he is met with in the 4th century, and was a deacon at Milan in the time of Ambrose. His office was contemporaneous with the restriction of an archdeacon to spiritual duties. In the vacancy of the see, by the councils of Chalcedon and Trent, he acted as receiver-general and administrator of the episcopal revenues. At Kilkenney, St. David's, and Exeter, as now at Windsor, he received the capitation rents, and at Westminster provided the common table and paid the servants' wages. At Hereford two economists, lastly, rendered half-yearly accounts of the great commons.

Epaphras (épaphrás), that portion of an office which is said audibly in contrast with that which is said silently; especially the doxology, with which the secret prayers generally conclude.

Ecot (confession of sins). The duty of confession of sins is reckoned by Mohammedans to be the fifth and fundamental article of their religion. It is in the doctrine of the Koran that God will pardon those who confess their sins.

Ecstacy, a kind of diviners among the ancient Greeks, who were wont to fall into a trance in which they continued a considerable time, deprived of all sense and motion, and on their recovery they gave marvelous accounts of what they had seen and heard. In Roman Catholic countries, also, many stories have been told of individuals who have been in a state of ecstatic, or trance, during which they are said to have seen and conversed with the Virgin Mary and other saints.

Ecstasy (περιτριθήματα) were gifts of a peculiar kind, which began to be made to churches probably about the middle of the 6th century. They are first mentioned by Theodoret, who tells us that when any one obtained the benefit of a signal cure from God in any member of his body, such as his eyes, hands, or feet, he then brought his ecstasy, the image or figure of the part cured, in silver or gold, to be hung up in the church as a memorial of divine favor. Such a practice prevailed among the ancient Greeks and Romans, and also among the Egyptians. The same custom was known among the Philistines, as we may infer from the case of the "golden earrings" and mice (1 Sam. vi. 4). In Roman Catholic countries representations of parts of the body healed are often seen suspended upon the walls of churches.

Eddy, Thomas Mears, D.D., a distinguished Methodist Episcopal minister, son of Rev. Augustus Eddy, was born in Newton, Hamilton Co., O., Sept. 7, 1825. He received a careful religious training; consecrated himself to the Saviour very early in life; and in 1842 entered the Indiana Conference, filling its most important appointments. In 1856 he was elected editor of The Northwestern Christian Advocate. During his editorial career of over thirty years, this periodical came out semi-weekly, issuing fourteen thousand to about thirty thousand copies. At its close he re-entered the pastorate, in connection with the Baltimore Conference. In 1873 he was elected missionary secretary, and as such was laborious and successful to the close of his life, Oct. 7, 1874. Dr. Eddy was a clear, logical, pathetic preacher; a forcible, sprightly writer; a genial companion, and a devout man. EDELEN, Christian Ludwig, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born in 1678 at Liebenau near Halte. He studied at Halle, and was the tutor of the famous count Zinzendorf. In 1706 he was appointed rector at Gröningen, and in 1710 was made assistant of the pastor Christian Müller at Schwerin, near Halberstadt, whom he succeeded in 1723. He died Sept. 18, 1742, leaving some fine hymns still used in the German Church: "Auf, auf, mein Geist, bestrachte," "Christen erwarten in allerlei Füllen." See Koch, Geschichte des deutschen Kirchenliedes, v; 219 sq.

Edelmann, Gottfried, a Lutheran minister of Germany, was born Dec. 20, 1650, at Marolissa, in Upper Lusatia. He studied at Leipzig; was first pastor at Holzkirch, in his native province; in 1693 accepted a call to Lauban, and died there in 1724, leaving a number of hymns. Edelmann, Hirsh, a Jewish scholar of Germany, who died at Berlin, Nov. 21, 1838, is the author of ימין, or the Narrative for the Jewish Passover, with critical notes and scholia (Kölnberg, 1843). He also published the Jewish Prayer-book, with glosses and scholia (ibid.); and edited The Song of Solomon, with Semeia Seferon's commentary (Dantzig, 1846). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 222. (B. P.)

Eden. The locality of Paradise has recently been investigated afresh by Friedrich Delitzsch (Wo lang das Paradies, Leipzig, 1891), who places the garden of Eden in that part of Northern or Upper Babylonia which immediately surrounds the site of Babylon itself. He associates the name Eden with the non-Semitic edin ("plain"), instead of the well-received Hebraic derivation, and compares the Semitic name Karduni ("garden of the God Duni"), of the district around Babylon. He regards "the river going forth from Eden to water the garden" as that system of watercourses, with one general current, which irrigated the ishmuu between the Tigris and the Euphrates at its narrowest point, just above Babylon. The other two of the four principal "heads" of the stream he thinks were perhaps half-natural, half-artificial, canals flowing out of the Euphrates—the Palikopas on the west, and the Sham-En-Nil on the east. He has not actually found in the Chaldean records the names Fishon or Gichon, but he believes the former to be the Accadian pisn ("water-vessel"), and the latter is supposed to be the Babylonian Guphm di, possibly pointing to one of these canals. The precariousness of this identification is evident at a glance, and well supports the fanciful character of many of that learned Orientalist's interpretations. See Paradis, in this volume.

Edmondson, Jonathan, A.M., an English Wesleyan minister (nephew of Jonathan Catlow, an early Methodist preacher, who withdrew a short time before his death from a congregation of a disagreement with Wesley on the doctrine of sin in believers; cousin of James Cat- low, who died when about taking orders in the Church of England, and of Samuel Catlow, a Socinian minister, and father of Jonathan Edmondson, of the Wesleyan Conference), was born at Kingsley, Yorkshire, March 24, 1767. He was converted in 1784, was sent by Wesley to the Epworth Circuit in 1786, and retired a super- numerary at Portsmouth in 1826. He died July 7, 1842. Dr. Edmondson was eminently a holy and laborious minis- ter, and was highly esteemed by his brethren. In 1814 he was made one of the general secretaries of the Mis- sionary Society, in which office he labored beyond his strength. In 1818 he was elected president of the con- ference sitting in Leeds. He was a voluminous reader, a diligent student, a lucid expositor, an evangelical preacher, and a faithful pastor. During his busy min-

Edson, Theodore, D.D., LL.D., an Episcopal clergyman, was born at Bridgewater, Mass., Aug. 24, 1793, being descended fifth in the line from Samuel Edson, who came to Salem soon after the landing of the Pilgrims at Plymouth, and was one of the origin of the Edson family of Bridgewater. The writer received his academic education at the Andover Phillips Academy; graduated at Harvard College in 1822; studied theology with the Rev. Dr. Jarvis of Boston; and in March, 1824, conducted the first religious service in East Chelmsford, now Lowell, after John Eliot, the apostle to the Indians. In April of the same year he was ordained for St. Anne's Church, which was consecrated in March, 1825, at which time Dr. Edson was admitted to full orders. From that time until within a few days of his last illness he conducted the services of that Church with dignity, solemnity, and inms. He died in Lowell, after a long, useful, and singularly devoted life, June 25, 1883.—Boston Advertiser, June 26, 1883. (J. C. S.)

Edward, Saint, was the son of Edgar, king of the Saxons, and the beautiful Ethelfleda, who died shortly after his birth, in 961. In 973, when Edgar died, Edward and his brother, who was named Cnut, was elected to the crown, much to the discontent of Elfrida, his step-mother, who wished her own son, Ethelred, on the throne. In 979 (or 978), Edward was poisoned at Corfe Castle, by his own people, according to Henry of Huntingdon, or, as was probably by order of Elfrida, who, in 973, was deserted by her husband, and William of Malmsbury record. Malmsbury says that a light from heaven shone over his grave at Wareham, and wonders were wrought there and miracles of healing: and that Elfrida, at length terrified and conscience-stricken, retired to the convent of Wwerwell to repent for her wickedness. The young Edward was not a martyr for the Christian faith; but being a good youth, and unjustly and cruelly slain, the people looked upon him as a saint and called him Edward the martyr; and so he was a place in the Anglican and Roman martyrology. He is commemorated on March 18. His body was afterwards translated to the minster at Shaftesbury (June 20), and his translation is set down on Feb. 18. See Baring-Gould, Lives of the Saints, iii, 324 (March 18); Butler, Lives of the Saints (March 18); Fuller, Worthies of England, i, 243; Green, Hist. of English People, i, 96; English Church, Hist. of England, i, 147, 148.

Edward, a Scotch prelate, was formerly a monk of Ceasar in Forfarshire, and was promoted to the see of Brechin about 1260. It is said that he walked through the whole kingdom, with Eustathius, abbot of Aberbrooch, preaching the gospel wherever he came. See Keith, Scotch Bishops, p. 169.

Edwards, Jonathan, D.D., an English divine and able antagonist to Socinianism, was born at Westham, in 1603, and in 1635 became a servant of Christ Church, Oxford, where he was admitted A.B. October, 1635. He was rector of Kidlington, Oxfordshire, which he exchanged, in 1631, for Hinton, Hampshire; was elected principal of Jesus College in 1636, and treasurer of Llandaff in 1637. He held other important offices, and died July 20, 1712. His publications are, Remarks upon Dr. Sherlock's Examination of the Oxford Decrees, etc. (Oxford, 1695, 4to);—A Preservation against Socinians (in 4 parts);—A Vindication of the Doctrine of Original Sin (Oxford, 1711, 8vo). Edwards, Peter Cuthbert, a Baptist minister and educator, was born near Society Hill, S. C., Feb. 8, 1819. He was converted in early life, studied in South Carolina College and graduated from the theological institution at Newton, Mass, in 1844. After studying for a time in the Union Theological Seminary, New York city, he became, in 1845, professor of Biblical literature and exegesis in Furman Theological Institution; and on the removal of the seminary from Fairfield District, S. C., to Greenville, he was appointed professor of ancient languages, which office he filled with rare ability until his sudden death, May 15, 1867. See Gen. Cut of Newton Theol. Institution. (J. C. Edwardston, Thomas, an English divine of the 14th century, was so named from his birthplace in Suffolk; was educated at Oxford; became an Augustinian in Clare; was a great scholar; and acted as confessor to Lionel, duke of Clarence, whom he attended to Italy; returned to his native country, and died at Clare in 1396. Pits thinks he had an archbishopric in Ireland; but this is disproved by the judicious sir James Ware (De Scriptoribus Ordinis) ii, 826). Perceval颈 Edwardston was temporarily intrusted with an archbishopric in Italy. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), iii, 167.

Edwen, a female saint of Saxon descent, is commemorated in Wales on Nov. 6.

Bedel-korban (festival of the sacrifice), a festival celebrated among the Persian Mohammedans in honor of the patriarch Abraham. The day before the feast about four hundred camels are collected from the neighboring country, and the first that rises, after resting, is chosen for the sacrifice, shot, and speared. See Gardner, Faiths of the World, s. v.

Egan, Michael, a Roman Catholic prelate, was recommended to the pope, by archbishop Carroll, for the see of Philadelphia, June 17, 1805, "as a man endowed with all the qualities to discharge with perfection the function of the episcopacy, except that he lacks robust health, large experience, and eminent firmness in his disposition. He is a learned, modest, humble priest, who maintains the spirit of his order in his whole conduct." He was accordingly appointed October 28, 1810. During his short episcopacy the Sisters of Charity were (in 1814) established in his city. Egan died July 22, 1814, and was succeeded by Marnehall. Ehinger, Elisa, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Sept. 7, 1758. He studied at Wittenberg and Tübingen, and was in 1787 court-preacher at Albertsburg, in Lower Austria. Being obliged to leave the country on account of intolerance, he went in 1805 to Rothenburg, on the Tauber, was made rector there, and accepted a call in 1807 to Augsburg. In 1829 he had left the Augsburg confession and went to Schulpfaffing. Being recalled to Augsburg, he stayed there only a short time, and went in 1835 to Regensburg, where he died, Nov. 28, 1868. He is the author of a large number of writings, of little value for our time. See Jocher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. Brucker, Commentarii de Vita et Scriptis Ehinger (1775). (B. P.)

Ehinger, Johann, grandfather of Elisa, was born at Lauenburg in 1488. For some time he was a monk, but professed the Evangelical religion, and in 1637 became preacher at St. Stephen's, in Augsburg. Being obliged, on account of his religion, to leave the place in 1651, he became general superintendent of Halb-Neuburg, assisted in introducing the evangelical doctrine into the Palatinate, and died at Augsburg in 1757, having been recalled there in 1555, after the treaty of Passau had been signed. pastorate at Graba, near Salford; was in 1619 deacon at Langensalza, in 1696 superintendent at Heldrfingen, and in 1698 was made doctor of divinity and pastor principal at his native place, where he died, Oct. 28, 1716. His life and writings are to be found in Wittenberg, 1657: — Des Consensus Orthodozio de Christo (ibid. 1698), etc. See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Bilunny, a Welsh saint in the first half of the 7th century.

Bimbetha (or Binette), Staid, a virgin, commemorated December 29, is said to have been one of the companions of St. Ursula.

Bimbin (or Evin), an Irish saint, son of Eoghan, and bishop of Ros-glas and Ros-mic-Triuin, A.D. 589, is commemorated Dec. 22.

Binari (or Einarson), Geisser, an Iceländish theologian, lived about the middle of the 16th century. He studied at Hamburg and Wittenberg, where he heard Luther and Melanchthon, and in 1540 was elected bishop in place of Paulmon. In 1541 the government granted the ministers the privilege of marriage, of which they had been deprived since 1532, and this innovation, occasioned many disputes. During these troubles Einari died. Such was the animosity against him that by order of the government his bones were disinterred and his ashes scattered to the winds. He left a translation of the Proverbs of Solomon in Norwegian (Horal, 1550). See Hofer, Nov. Biog. Germale, s. v.

Einem, Johann August Christoph von, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Osterweddingen, near Magdeburg, Nov. 28, 1730. He studied at Halle, and in 1754 was appointed teacher at a high-school in Berlin. In 1759 he was also appointed preacher at Trinity Church there, and in 1768 accepted a call to the pastorate at Genthin. He died Oct. 24, 1810, leaving, De Pelagianismo etque ac Finicismbo ac Ecclesiae Jesu Christi Acredo (Halle, 1762): — Praktische Lebensbrechungen verstorbenen und nachlebenden Geistlichen (Stendal, 1767). His best work, however, is his continuation of Moscheim’s Church history. See Düring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, etc.; Wiener, Handbuch der theolog. Lit., i. 555, ii. 52. (B. P.)

Einem, Johann Just von, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Göttingen, Aug. 11, 1655. In 1712 he was chaplain at Bergen, in 1728 pastor at Osterweddingen, near Magdeburg, and died in 1744. He wrote, Anweisung zum Studiren aus Lutherischen Schriften gesetzt (Magdeburg, 1727): — Anweisung zur Hermeneutica aus Evangelischen Schriften (ibid. 1728): — Handbuch der Pelagianischen (Helmstedt, 1730); — Introductio in Bibliothecam Graecam J. Einarh (or Eynardus), Suzet, a solitary of Alton, in Westphalia, is commemorated March 25.

Einborn, David, a Jewish rabbi, was born at Dipsick, in Bavaria, Nov. 10, 1809. He attended the rabbinical school at Fürth, and the universities of Erlangen, Würzburg, and Munich. At the latter place he took his degree as doctor of philosophy in 1834. His first charge was at Hopstahle, and while exercising there he attended the second conference of Reform Jews at Frankfurt-on-the-Main, in 1845. A little later he succeeded Holbeim (q. v.) as chief rabbi of Mecklenburg-Schwerin. In 1851 he was called to Ponthos by the Reformed congregation, where he advocated extreme measures for those days; his liberalism aroused the dissatisfaction of the government, and his temple was closed. In 1855 he landed at Baltimore, and was appointed rabbi of the Hare Simai congregation there. His known opposition to slavery aroused the ire of the Baltimoreans, in the days of '61, and he was called to Philadelphia by the Reform congregation. In 1866 he went to New York to take charge of the temple "Adon Jeshurun," which in 1878 was consolidated with the "Anshe Chezeh," under the name of "Beth El." On July 12, 1879, he retired from his office, and died Nov. 27 of that year. He published, Das Prinzip der Messianis, etc. (Leipsic, 1854): — Olith Tami (Balti- more, 1856). After his death two volumes of Sermons were published. See Morais, Eminent Israelites of the 19th Century (Philadelphia, 1880). (B. P.)

Einsiedel, George Hanbold, a German divine and statesman, was born in 1521. He studied theology, and was one of the zealous hearers of Luther, Melanch- thon, and Schafi, defending the Reformation with his word and with the sword in the war of Schmalkalden. He was counsellor of the princes Moritz and August der Starke, of Saxony, from 1576 to 1598. Einsiedel died in 1592. See Hofer, Nov. Biog. Germale, s. v.

Eisenachmidt, Leonhard Martin, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Ingolstadt, Nov. 5, 1727, of Roman Catholic parentage. In 1718 he was professor at Neuburg, in 1722 at Munich, and in 1724 at the Aschaffenburg gymnasium. In 1728 he joined the Evangelical Church, and was made rector of the gymnasium at Schweinfurt, and died May 27, 1796. He wrote, Unterschied der römisch-katholischen und der evangelisch-protestantischen Kirche (Leipsic, 1798): — Das römisch-katholische Messenb (Neustadt, 1799): — Über die Versuche neuerer Zeit, etc. (ibid. ed.): — Die Gebrauche und Stellungen der römisch-katholischen Kirche (ibid. 1830): — Über die Unfassbarkeit des ersten allgemeinen Concil zu Nieda (ibid. ed.): — Über die Unfassbarkeit der allgemeinen Concilien der Katholischen Kirche (ibid. 1851). Ehliah. We extract some interesting details concerning this noted valley from the latest description, that of Lieut. Conder (Test Work in Palestine, ii, 187, 190):

"The Great Valley of Eliah (Wady es-Sunt) is the highway from Philistia to Hebron; it has its head not far from Tellamleh, and runs down northwards, past Kellah and Hareth, dividing the low hills of the Shephelah from the rocky mountains of Judah; eight miles from the valley-head stands Shochoh, and Wady es-Sunt is here a quarter of a mile across; just north of this ruin it turns round westward, and so runs, growing deeper and deeper, between the rocky hills covered with bruswood, becoming an open vale of rich corn-land, flanked by ancient terraces, and finally debouching at the cliff of Tell es-Saffah. About two and a half miles south of the great angle near Shochoh there is a very large and ancient terracclim, one of the few old trees of the species along the course of the valley, which took its Hebrew name of Eliah from them. This terracclim is towards the west side of the vale, just where a small tributary ravine joins Wady es-Sunt; and near it are two ancient wells, not unlike those at Beerseba, with stone water-trenches round them; south of the ravine is a high, rounded hill, almost isolated by valleys, and covered with ruins, a natural fortress, not unlike the well-known Tels which occur lower down the Valley of Eliah."

"Two points require to be made clear as to the episode of David's battle with Goliath: one is the meaning of the expression Goliath or 'ravine': the other is the source whence David took the 'smooth stone.' A visit to the spot explains both. In the middle of the broad, open valley we found a deep trench with vertical sides, impassable except at certain places—a valley in a valley, and a natural barrier between the two hosts; the sides and bed of this trench are strewn with rounded and water-worn pebbles, which would have been well fitted for David's sling. Here, then, we may picture to ourselves the two hosts, covering the low, rocky hills, opposite to each other, and half hidden among the lentick bushes; between them was the rich expanse of rolling barley and the red banks of the torrent, with its white, shining bed; behind all was the distant blue hill-walls of Judah, whence Saul had just come down. The mail-clad champion advanced from the west, through the low corn, with his mighty lance, perhaps topped with feathers, his bronzed helmet shining in the sun; from the east, a ruddy boy, in his white shirt and sandals, armed with a goat's-skin sling, came down to the brook, and, according to the poetic fancy of the rabbi, the pebbles were given voices, and cried: 'By us shalt thou overcome the champion fallen from an unseen cause, and the wild Philistines fled to the mouth of the valley, where Gath stood crowning, and Joppa the porticoed in the midst of a sacred cliff, a foundation stone, the key to the high-road leading to the corn-lands of Judah, and to the vineyards of Hebron.'" Elduwen (or Elduwen), fifteenth bishop of St. Davida.

Eleazar, a teacher of the Maccabees, is commemorated as a saint, Aug. 1 (July 29).

Eleazar ben-Ahar, a famous Jewish teacher of the 1st century of our era, was one of the most celebrated disciples of Jochanan ben-Nachhu (q. v.). One of his recorded maxims is found in Aboth, ii, 19: "Be quick to study the law, and know what thou shouldst return in answer to the Epicurean, and remember before whom thou laborest; for the master who employed thee is faithful, and will recompense thee the reward of thy toil." As a teacher, he was so highly esteemed that to attend his lectures was regarded like fulfilling a commandment (Cholin, fol. 106). See Hamburger, Recal. Yogedoph, ii, 155 sq.; Becher, in Frankel-Gratz's Monatschrift, 1882, p. 241. (B. P.)

Eleazar ben-Azaria, a Talmudic teacher of the 1st century of our era, belonged to a noble priestly family. When Gamaliel the younger was deposed at Jabneh, Eleazar was elected president of the college, although only seventeen years of age. One of his first measures was to remove the doorkeeper and give free admission to the college to all, whereas Gamaliel had excluded every disciple who was not "the same inwardly as outwardly." It is added that when anything is recorded as having happened יִּשְׁפֹּ֣ת רָעָ֖ו on that day; the occasion of Azaria's accession is referred to; and the day is described as one in which all the pending controversies were decided. When Gamaliel was reinstated, Ben-Azaria acted as vice-president, and, according to the Talmud, matters were so arranged that on three Sabbaths in the month of Gamaliel acted as president, whereas the fourth was given to Eleazar. Hence the saying: "Whose Sabbath is it? The Sabbath of rabbi Eleazar ben-Azaria." A saying of his is recorded in Aboth, Eledanus, legendary bishop of Dumbarton, said to have been appointed by king Arthur, A.D. 519.

Eleemosynarius. (1) See Alms. (2) The word also designates the "executor" of a will, when distributed for pious purposes.

Eleison. See Kyrie.

Elements, Eucharistic. The Latin word elementa does not appear to have been used in this technical sense in the early ages of the Church, though it is a very natural word to express the component parts of anything. The unaccompanied elements on the altar are called, in Eastern liturgies, "the Mysteries;" the bread alone, "the Salt," from its being divided by lines in the form of a cross. When the elements have been placed on the altar they acquire other names, having more distinct reference to sacrifice, as "the Lamb," or "the First-born." The elements are also called "symbols," "types," "visible forms," as outward representations of inward and spiritual grace.

Throughout the Church, bread and wine have always been recognized as the elements in the eucharist, with but few exceptional cases. No sect, called "Judaism," or "tyranny," used cheese to the bread. Some sects used no wine, but water alone; while others used wine in the evening service, but not in the morning.

1. Composition of the Bread.—The Church has been throughout unanionous in regarding the bread as the material for the bread, it being regarded as the superior grace. The great controversy has been, Shall the bread be leavened or unleavened? The principal arguments bearing on this question are the following: It has generally been assumed in the West that the Last Supper was eaten at the feast of the Passover, and that therefore the bread used was unleavened, which was the only kind the Jews were allowed to eat at that time. But it is contended by some writers of the Greek Church that the Last Supper was held on the 18th Nisan, when leavened bread was still used; and there is no direct statement, either in the New Testament or in the writings of the early fathers, to indicate that unleavened bread was used; on the contrary, the fact that only "bread" was mentioned would lead to the inference that only common bread was meant. Justin Martyr simply speaks of bread, and as he is giving a particular description of the Christian rites, it seems most probable that he would have mentioned the fact had any particular kind of bread been used. Epiphanius says that the Ebionites, in imitation of the saints in the Church, celebrate the Passover yearly with the Church with unleavened cakes. Innocent I. refers to the bishops leavened bread, said to have been called by him "fermentum," in distinction from the unleavened. Cyprian, and still later, Isidore of Seville, in their discussions, leave out all mention of leaven as an ingredient in the eucharistic bread, which they would hardly have done had it been in use. But Alcuin (A.D. 790) says that the bread should be perfectly free from leaven of any kind. Rabanus Maurus (A.D. 819) likewise directs that the bread should be unleavened according to the Hebrew custom. It has been inferred by some that the eucharistic bread was introduced between the latter part of the 9th and the 11th centuries, for the reason that Photius of Constantinople (A.D. 887) never mentioned the use of unleavened bread; while Michael Cerularius, also patriarch of Constantinople (A.D. 1064), frequently does. The silence of Photius would only show that he did not use unleavened bread at all; a clear proof that the Western churches generally, in the 7th century, were thought to agree with the Maronites and the Armenians in this respect.

On the whole, then, there is distinct evidence that...

unleavened bread was used in the eucharist by the Latins, and by some eastern sects, in the 7th and 8th centuries; and there is strong evidence that it was used at Rome. In liturgical Eastern Church, there can be no doubt that leavened bread has been used from a very early period indeed; if not from the very first, at any rate from the time when Judaizing sects insisted on using unleavened cakes, like those of the Passover, in the Lord's Supper.

The Syrian Christians, besides the leaven which is common to almost all Oriental communions, mix with the bread a little oil and salt, a practice which they defend by many mystical reasons. The modern Greeks eagerly advocate the mixture of salt, which (they say) represents the life; so that a sacrifice without salt is a dead sacrifice.

In regard to the character of the bread, the sixth canon of the Council of Toledo (A.D. 693) enacts that no other bread than such as is whole and clean and especially prepared shall be placed on the altar of the Lord.

The form of the loaf used by the Jews was round, and somewhat less than an inch thick, and six or eight inches in diameter. Oblates were frequently used, and impressed with a cross.

The Composition of the Cup.—With regard to the element of wine there has been less controversy, though it is an interesting and unsettled question whether the cup was mixed at the institution of the sacrament by our blessed Lord himself. Lightfoot (Temple Service, i. 691) says that he drank pure wine performed his duty; so that, although it seems probable that our Lord used the mixed cup, yet it is not certain that he did so.

The Babylonian Talmud calls water mixed with wine "the fruit of the vine;" but it would appear that the same term is used for pure wine in Is. xxxii. 12; Hab. iii. 17; so that nothing positive can be ascertained from the use of that term. On the whole, it seems probable that our Lord used a mixed cup, and it is acknowledged on all hands that, with the exception of a few heretics, the Church used wine mixed with water. Justin Martyr and Cyprian both justify the mixing of the two.

The third Council of Carthage orders "that in the sacrament of the body and blood of the Lord, nothing else be offered but what the Lord himself commanded, that is, bread, and wine mixed with water." The African code, both Greek and Latin, has this same canon. The Church of Jerusalem and of St. James at Sardis, as has already been seen, hold the same view, and the liturgies of Basil and Chrysostom order the deacon to put wine and water into the cup before the priest places it on the altar. In like manner, in some form or another, the mixing is mentioned in the liturgies of Ethiopia, Nestorius, Severus, of the Roman and other Oriental Churches. A peculiar rite of the Byzantine Church is the mixing of hot water with the wine. In the liturgy of Chrysostom, after the fraction of the oblate, the deacon, taking up the vessel of boiling water, says to the priest, "Sir, bless the boiling water;" the priest then says, "Blessed be the fountain of thy saints forever, now and always, and for ages of ages;" then the deacon pours a small quantity of the boiling water into the chalice, saying, "The fervency of faith, full of the Holy Spirit, Amen." The principal deviations from the received practice of the Church in this matter have been the opposite usages of the Aquarists and Eunomites, who used no wine at all in the eucharist, and of the Armenians, who mixed no water with the wine.

Some in the 7th century offered milk for wine in the eucharist; others communicated the people not with wine properly so-called, but with what they made themselves. A peculiar instance of an addition to the cup is the dropping of milk and honey into it, according to the Roman rite, on Easter eve, the great day for the baptism of catechumens.

The wine in use in the Church has in general been red, and wine from a desire to symbolize as much as possible the blood of our Lord. Various mystical reasons have been given for the mixture of the water with the wine. Besides the presumption that our Lord used the mixed cup at the first institution, the allusion to this as a further reason that blood and water flowed from his pierced side. In the comment on Mark, ascribed to Jerome, another is given: that by one we might be purged from sin, by the other redeemed from punishment. Alcuin (Epist. 98) finds in the three things, water, flour, and wine, which may be placed on the altar, a mystical resemblance to the three heavenly witnesses of 1 John vii. 7.

Eleonara (or Elewara), a virgin martyr with Sponsaria, in Gaul, in the reign of Diocletian, is commemorated May 2.

Elarius, a Cambrian monk (different from the martyr in Jersey), died cir. A.D. 660, and is commemorated June 13.

Eleabaham, an Ethiopian king, hermit, and saint (commemorated in Rome, Oct. 22; in Ethiopia, May 15), concerning whom the early hagiographers tell discordant stories, seems to have lived in the 6th century.

Eleuchadus, bishop of Ravenna, A.D. 100-112, commemorated Feb. 14, is said to have been originally an eminent Platonic philosopher, converted by Apollinarius on a visit to Rome.

Eleucius, bishop of Cyzicus, one of the most influential members of the Semi-Arian party in the second half of the 4th century, was a man of high personal character. At the instance of Aecius he was deposed, A.D. 380, but returned the next year, and finally seems to have fallen under the general condemnation of the Macedonian heretics, A.D. 383.

ELEUTHERUS

ELEUTHERUS, martyr at Cæsarea, in Cappadocia, perhaps under Hadrian, commemorated Sept. 27.

Elevation of the Host. The lifting up of the pate and consecrated element of bread was instituted by pope Honorius III (cir. 1210), and he directed that it should be adored when elevated, or carried to the sick, the people reverently bowing. Cassius quotes as his authority for this custom Psa. lxiii, 16. Anastasia Sinita alludes to this ceremony; and it appears as early as, perhaps, the fourth century in the Greek Church; it has been traced in England in the 11th, in France in the 12th, and in Germany and Italy before the 18th century. Thomas Aquinas and Bonaventura mention the elevation of the pate only; the elevation of the chalice was of later date. The ringing of little bells at this time was introduced by William of Paris, and generally enjoined by Gregory XI.

Elevation of the Host. (From an Old Illumination.)

Elf (old Scandinavian, Alfar; Anglo-Saxon, Elf; Danish, Ele; German, Alp; apparently meaning white), is Norse, British, and German popular superstitious belief, a being between deity and man. The Edda names three classes of elves: Light, Dark, and Black; the first of whom inhabit the pure regions of light, the second mountain-grottoes and caves, the third the infernal regions. But this threefold division seems to have been soon abandoned for a dualism. Snorre Sturlesson (died 1241) says: "In Alheim there live the people of Light, Alfs, and under the earth are the Dark-Alfs, both entirely different from each other in appearance and powers: the former shining with a brightness that eclipses the sun, the latter darker than pitch." The light elves are cheerful, pleasant beings, sometimes invisible, sometimes visible; they enjoy the company of men and gods. On the contrary, the dark elves shun the light, and only leave their gloomy habitations at night; and in case the sun finds them still on earth, they become petrified by his rays. The dark elves are greatly misformed. They have monstrous noses and bellies, bones thin as a spindle, bald or horned heads. However, they are quite skilful, and not only expert in all powers of magic, but possess a rare knowledge in all metallic works; but with all their labors there is always an accompanying curse. The dwelling of these is ever in the thickest darkness; but they light up their dismal habitations by means of brilliant precious stones and shining metals. Some dwell in stones, others in the earth, still others in the sea. They eagerly steal unbaptized children of Christians, raise them in their stone or rocky dwellings, and bring some of their own hateful, malformed children as substitutes, which can only be got rid of by rubbing their feet with fat and roasting them over the fire. The child cries unmercifully, whereupon the elves return and bring back the stolen child, in order to save their own from the tortures. The light elves are entirely different in every respect; justice and fairness are sacred to them. They never harm any one; even when they have been wronged they only revenge themselves by teasing. They find great pleasure in associating with Christians. As they have human forms and are extraordinarily beautiful, it is not seldom that they form intimate relations with men. If children follow from such intimacy, these must be bathed entirely in the sacred water for baptism, as otherwise they will not be enclosed with immortal souls. The time of the elves' appearance is after sundown, in cheerful, summer moonlight nights; then they often appear in swarms, to enjoy themselves and follow every imaginable sport. Their favorite pastime in the dance; they pass whole nights occupied with this amusement, and wherever in the field or pasture a company of elves have danced, there the grass grows greener and fresher. We are accustomed to suppose the elves to be very small, but they can take on any form or size they choose. Sometimes they are hateful, sometimes beautiful; sometimes large, at other times small; just as suits their purpose. The Scots and Irish still hold to the belief that their respective countries are pre-eminently loved and visited by the elves. The most pleasant and animating stories may be found there relating to these beings; and whenever a cloud of dust is seen to rise from the road, the people, believing that the elves are changing their dwelling-places, bow in reverence before them. They often teach men their arts of magic; and, although the information they impart is very meagre, still the persons so instructed become powerful, and are feared and loved.

The music of the elves above everything else, and although their music is simple, still it exerts upon man a most wonderful influence. The piece of music entitled "Elf-kings" forces every listener, even the table and chairs, to dance as long as the music lasts; but the player cannot stop playing, for the arm and hand using the instrument is likewise charmed and bewitched: either he must play the piece backward exactly, or somebody must come behind and cut the strings of the violin. Some have said that the elves are angels banished from heaven, who have not sunk into hell, and in this respect there is great similarity between them and the peris of the Persians. The latter are also pleasant, supernaturals beings, but deprived of heaven, still not banished to hell. The elves often in their songs, express a hope of a coming deliverance; this song immediately becomes a weeping and wailing if any one is so cruel as to disturb them in their hopes. The belief in elves has given German poets of modern days material for the most beautiful and most animating romantic tales. Compare the fable "The Elves," in Ludwig Tieck's book Phantasië; also the novel of the same, entitled Die Vögelchenrie; and especially a passage in the story of "Cordelia," by A. Treuburg (Friedrich Vischer), in the Jahrbuch schweizerischer Dichter, by Mörthke and Zimmermann. Some myths of dwarfs, witches, sprites, etc., make all these appear as the nearest relatives of elves.

Elfan (Lat. Alfanus) appears in the legend of king Lucius, in his application to pope Eleutherus for Christian instruction, and is said in Welsh writers to have been abbot of Glastonbury; by others, of London, in the 2d century.

Eilian, a Welsh saint, confused with St. Hilary, is celebrated in August.

Elias (Armen. Ephiias). (1) Patriarch of Armenia, was born at Arjich. He was bishop of the Penunians, and was raised to the dignity of a patriarch in 708, after the death of Sahag or Isaac III. He showed himself as one of the most violent adversaries of the Council of Chalcedon. At this time, the princes who governed the Aghovans (Albanians) took pains to make her subjects adopt the doctrine of the Council of Chalcedon, and to unite them with the Roman Church; but this displeased the nobility, at whose suggestion Elias wrote three letters to the bishop and to the princes, in order to induce them to renounce the enterprise. But as these remonstrances remained without effect, he resorted to violence and persecution. The Arabians were then masters of Armenia, and the patriarch addressed himself to the emir, or kalyph, accusing his adversaries of forming a conspiracy with the emperor of the Greeks, in order to escape from the authority of the Moslems. In consequence Nerses and the princes were laid in chains, by the order of Omar II, and a new bishop was given to the Albanians. Elias died A.D. 718. (2) Occupied the patriarchate from A.D. 760 to 787, with the exception of an interval, during which he was expelled by the patriarch Theodoret. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Elias Hal-Levi ben-Haimjain of Constantinople, who flourished in the 16th century, is the author of a ritual for the Jewish congregations in Greece, printed at Constantinople in 1602. He also wrote various Talmudical decisions. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i. 236 sq.; Jocher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lehren, s. v. (B. P.)

Elias, bishop of Jerusalem. (1) A.D. 494–513. He was an Arab by birth, and received his education in one of the Nitrian monasteries; but being expelled by Timothy, Eiusus in A.D. 487, he took refuge with St. Euthymius. He afterwards resided in a cell at Jericho. He was a strict ascetic, and took an active part in the Ahbasian controversy, in consequence of which he was finally banished to Elia, on the Red Sea.
(2) Cir. A.D. 760-797. He was for a time deposed on the charge of image-worship, brought by Theodorus, an ambitious mook, in 768. He was represented at the second Council of Nica in 787, by John, a priest, and Thomas prior of the convent of St. Catherine in Egypt, who also represented the patriarchs of Alexandria and Antioch. (3) Died about 907. In 881 he sent a letter to Charlemagne; likewise, also, to the prelates, princes, and nobles of Gaul. A Latin translation of the letter (it is not probable that the original was in this language) may be found in the Speculum of D'Acchery (Fara, 1723, vol. iii).

Elia, Apocalypse of. Under this title an apocyphal work was current in the 2nd century, from which, according to Origen (Homily 85 on Matt. xxvii, vol.
iii, 918), the Pauline quotation "Eye hath not seen," etc.
(1 Cor. ii, 9), is said to have been taken. The same was repeated by Zacharias Chrysopolitanus (Harmonicon Ecceplificum, ch. 160); and by Georgius Syneculus, who writes that it was Chrysostom who introduced it.
This view was, however, early controverted by Jerome, who, referring to 1 Cor. ii, 9, says: "Solem hoc loco apocryphorum quidam delirantia sectari, et dicere dequo de Apocalypsi Eliae testimonium summum sit, cum in Eisis justa Hebraicum ipsi legitur: A seculo non auditus auribus perperum." (Epistola 101 ed Pamckolius; comp. also, on Isa, ixiv, 4 in lib. xvi in Hxms, iv, 761, ed. Vallarsa.) It is probably the same work which is rejected in the Apostolic Constitutions, iu, 14, and in the Synopsis Sac. Script. ascribed to Athasamus, i, 154. See Fabrius, Codex Pseudo-Epiphanius, i, 1072; Smith, Dict. of Chris. Biog. a. v.

Eliot, Jared, M.D., a Congregational minister, son of Rev. Joseph Eliot, was born at Guilford, Conn., Nov. 7, 1685. While Yale College was yet located at Killingworth, he graduated from it in 1706. In October, 1709, he was ordained pastor of the Killingworth Church, as successor to the Rev. Mr. Pierson, and retained this position until his death, April 22, 1768. From 1730 to 1762 he was a fellow of Yale College. In 1722, the day after commencement at Yale, a number of prominent men assembled in the college library to consider a paper signed by some of the leading clergymen of Connecticut, among whom was Dr. Eliot, in which a doubt regarding the validity of Presbyterian ordination was expressed. In October following, according to arrangement, the divine right of Episcopacy was discussed before a large number of clergy and laity.
As the result, some bowed themselves Episcopalians, while Dr. Eliot and others were convinced of the inferiority of Presbyterianism. It is said of him that he was the chief physician of his time in the colony, being eminent also as a botanist and as a scientific agriculturist.
Through him the white mulberry was introduced into Connecticut, and with it the silkworm, concerning which he published a treatise. In 1761 he received a gold medal from a society in London for his processes of extracting iron from black sand, for he was likewise a mineralogist. His linguistic acquirements were also of a superior character. His agricultural tastes led him to devise various ways for draining swamps and reclaiming marshes, and he published several essays on agriculture. A large number of farms in the colony belonged to him. So conscientious, however, was he as a clergyman that he never omitted preaching on the Sab-
both during forty successive years. Dr. Franklin frequently visited him, and the two maintained a correspondence. Socially he was very agreeable, and among his people he was regarded as a great preacher.
A few of his sermons were published. See Sprague, Annals of the mer. Pulpa, i, 270.

Eliot, John, D.D., a Unitarian minister, was born in Boston, May 31, 1754. He prepared for the East in the North Grammar-school in Boston, and in 1772 graduated from Harvard College. Soon after his graduation he took charge of a school in Roxbury, where he remained one year. He studied theology at Cambridge. In 1775 he commenced his labors as a preacher at Dover. In 1776 he received an earnest request from several leading members of the Episcopal Church at Halifax, N.S., to become an assistant to their aged pastor, but declined. He officiated for a short time as chaplain to the recruits of Colonel Marshall’s regiment, then raised in Boston for the expedition to Canada. After this he passed several months at Littleton as the assistant of Rev. Daniel Rogers, and during the winter of 1778-79 supplied the First Church in Salem. In 1779 he was ordained and installed pastor of the New North Church in the same town. In 1804 he was chosen a member of the corporation of Harvard College. He was also a member of most of the literary and charitable societies in Boston and vicinity, and in some of them he held important offices. Dr. Eliot died Feb. 14, 1818. He published several single Sermons. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 92.

Edossa, the prophet, is commemorated as a saint in various Christian calendars on June 14 (Oct. 12, Oct. 15).

Elios of Armenia. (1) Elected patriarch A.D. 938. (2) Died A.D. 954. (3) An account of the death of Theocharus (Haghioglouzautour) is, and established the seat of his administration at Agatho- mark, on lake Van. His enemies deposed him by means of intrigues and betrays in 941, and he died A.D. 943. (2) Born A.D. 1461. Being first bishop of Erivan and then vicar-general of the patriarch of Armenia, he became patriarch in 1505, after the death of Chaduineus I, and ruled with wisdom. He was well versed in theology, rhetoric, and sacred history. He died in 1575, leaving in MS. a Commentary on Genesis.—Life of St. Gregory, in verse.—and forty-five Sermons. See Hoefer, Notiz, Büch, Gesch., ii, 4.

Eliisa ben-Abush (surnamed Acher, i.e., "the other one," after his apostasy) was a pupil of the famous rabbi Akiba (q.v.). He was the son of a wealthy citizen of Jerusalem, and was early initiated in the study of the law, but afterwards apostatized from Judaism. It is related of him that while attending the Jewish council he was often noticed to carry with him writings of the "Minim" (probably of Gnostics), and that he had even been in the habit of quoting Greek poetry. One of the most intimate friends and pupils of Eliisa was the famous rabbi, Meir (q.v.), who seized every opportunity to invite his friend to return into the bosom of the synagogue—a proposition to which Eliisa refused to accede, as forgiveness could not be granted to one who had so wantonly abused the gifts bestowed upon him. When Acher lay on his deathbed, Meir hastened to his side, and renewed, this time effectually, his solicitation on this subject. Legend has it that Meir spread his cloak over the grave of Acher; a cloud of smoke rose from it, and Meir turned away with the somewhat blasphemous application of Ruth iii, 18, "Tarry this night (of time), and it shall be in the morning (of immortality) that he the All-merciful will deliver and ransom thee; but if he be unwilling, then I will redeem thee." See Hamburger, Real-Encyklop., ii, 156 sq.; Bacher, in Frankel-Gritzner's Monatschrift, 1884, p. 294 sq.; Jellinek, Eliasha ben-Abuij, genannt Acher (Leipz., 1847). (B. P.)

Ellis, abbots of Whitton, in the 6th century.

Ellwood, John Wallack, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Beverly, Mass., May 2, 1797. For several years he pursued the business of a silversmith, relinquishing that occupation in 1810 to enter the Andover Theological Seminary. In 1812 he was ordained over the Church in Bath, Me., where he labored with great fidelity and success until 1843, when ill-health compelled him to resign his charge. He died at Bath, Aug. 19, 1860. Dr. Ellwood was a man of great wisdom and prudence, firmness and independence of opinion, benevolence and self-control; he took a deep interest in the great religious and moral enterprises of his day, and held responsible positions on the Boards of his church; he was a firm conservative; religious convictions resulted from his labors. Three of his sermons were published in 1851. See Cong. Quarterly, 1860, p. 420.

Ellott, Charles, D.D. See vol. iii, p. 1042.

Ellott, David, D.D., L.L.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Sherman's Valley, Perry Co., Pa., Feb. 6, 1877. To the age of sixteen he had only the educational advantages of the rural district in which he lived; but in 1862 he entered the classical school in Tuscarora Valley, and in the spring of 1894 went again to the town of Mifflin, where he spent one year. In 1865 he became an assistant of Rev. Matthew Brown, in the academy of Washington, at the same time making preparation to enter the junior class of Dickinson College, where he graduated Sept. 28, 1868. He studied theology with Rev. John Linn, Rev. Dr. Culbertson, of Zanesville, O., and Rev. Joshua Williams, D.D., of Newville, Pa. He was licensed to preach as a probationer by the Presbytery of Carlisle, Sept. 26, 1811; and Feb. 19, 1812, received a call to settle as pastor of the Church of Newburg, where he served until 1829. In 1849 he was sent to become president of Washington College, but declined. He was often sent as a member to the General Assembly, and was moderator of the presbytery in 1831, 1834, and 1838. He died March 18, 1874.
Dr. Elliott was successful as a preacher and pastor, a thorough student, successful educator, wise in the management of all affairs in the assembly, equal to the most trying crisis, a man greatly loved and honored by all. See Brownson, Memorial.

Elliott, James E., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal deputy, brother of bishop Elliott of Georgia, was born in Charlotte, S. C., in 1829; ordained deacon in 1841; ministered successfully at Beaufort, Grahamsville,
S. Michael’s, Charleston, Madison, Ga., and St. Paul’s, Charleston; was editor of the Christian Witness, Boston, from 1868 to 1870; and died at Charleston, June

Elliott, Jared Leigh, D.D., a Presbyterian minister and author, was born in Washington, D. C., 1800. Died on his deathbed in 1853. Most of his boyhood was spent as a sailor. He afterwards studied in the academy at Princeton, N. J.; graduated from the College of New Jersey in 1831; spent three years at Auburn Theological Seminary, N. Y.; then one year in Princeton Theological Seminary. He was licensed to preach as a missionary by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, Oct. 26, 1835. His successive fields of lab or were, as stated in the column of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., 1834; of the Mariners’ Church, Philadelphia, Pa., 1853; of the first and second churches of Washington, and of the Church at Frederick, Md., 1836-39; chaplain in the C.
S. Navy, 1841; army, 1861-81. He made many long sea-voyages, and was attached to the South Arctic Exploring Expedition in 1840. Dr. Elliott died at Washington, D. C., April 18, 1861. See Necrology of Presbyterian Church, 1862.

Ellis, Clement, an English divine, was born in 1690 near Penrith, in Cumberland, and was educated at Oxford. In 1693 he was appointed a prebendary of Southwell. He died in 1700. He published a number of sermons and theological treatises (1661-1700), and some works issued after his death, in the Parable, with an Account of his Life and Writings (1704, 8vo).—The Scripture Catechist. See Chalmers, Hist.
D. of Brit. And Amer. Authors, 4 v.

Ellis, William, an English Congregationalist minister, was born at Wisbeach, Aug. 29, 1724. Being converted when quite young, he offered his services to the London Missionary Society; was educated for mission work at Gosport, and, in January, 1816, was sent to Tahiti, the largest of the Society Islands. In 1822 he went to the Sandwich Islands, and greatly assisted in establishing Christianity there, preaching frequently in Hawaiian; he assisted in the arrangement of the alphabet; wrote the first hymns; baptized the first convert, the queen-mother, Keo-puo-lani; and shortly afterwards preached her funeral sermon. In 1824 his wife’s health gave way and compelled their return to England by way of Boston. He remained there for three months in the northern states, rendering great service to the American Foreign Mission Board by telling the story of the Hawaii mission. For six years after his arrival in England Mr. Ellis was agent of the London Missionary Society among the county auxiliaries. In 1841 broken health compelled him to resign official life, and he settled at Haddonfield to the quiet duties of a country pastor. In 1862 he went to Madagascar, reorganized the mission which had been nearly ruined by the persecutions of the late queen, saw the native church and its work restored. A bitter visitation was the schools reopened and the press at work, and in 1865 returned to Haddonfield, where he died, July 9, 1872. Mr. Ellis published, Missionary Narrative of a Tour through Madagascar, or Oceheke (London, 1826, 8vo;
2nd ed. 1827, 2 vols. 8vo); Polynesian Researches (1829, 2 vols. 8vo; last ed. 1833, 4 vols. 12mo);—Tradition of the South Sea Missions (1831, 8vo);—History of Madagaskar (1832, 2 vols. 8vo);—History of the London Missionary Society (1841, 8vo), and other valuable works. See (London) Comp. Year-book, 1878, p. 825; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, 4 v.; Life, by sale, commemorated Dec. 11.

Ellwood, Thomas, a Quaker writer of some reputation, was born at Crowell, near Thame, in Oxfordshire, in August, 1635, where he was educated. He united with the Society of Friends in 1658; became a preacher, and died March 1, 1713. The following are some of his publications:—Forcery no Christianty (1674, 12mo):
—The Foundation of Tithe Shaken (1692, 1720, 8vo; Wickham, 1690, 4to);—Sacred History (1705-06).
He was an intimate friend of Milton. After perusing the MS. of Paradise Lost, he returned it to the author with the remark, “Thou hast said much here of Paradise lost, but what hast thou to say of Paradise found.”
To this timely hint the world is indebted for Paradise Regained. See Chalmers, Hist. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Elmacin (or Elmakyn), George, an Egyptian historian, known in the East by the name of Hs-Abim, was born in 1228. He was a Christian, and occupied the place of keith, or secretary, at the court of the sultnans of Egypt, an office usually filled by Christians. In 1256 he succeeded his father, Yasar el-Amid, who had held the office of secretary to the council of war under the sultans of Egypt for forty-five years. Elmacin died at Damascus in 1278. He wrote a History of the Saracens, consisting of annals which extend from the time of Mohammed to the year 1117. It is principally occupied with the affairs of the Saracens in Egypt, but contains some passages relating to the eastern Christians. It was published, in Arabic and Latin, at Leyden, in 1625. Other editions have also appeared. See Encyclop. Brit. 9th ed. s. v.

Elmendon, Anthony, D.D., a (Dutch) Reformed minister, was born in Ulster County, N. Y., in 1818; graduated from Rutgers College in 1836, and from the New Brunswick Theological Seminary in 1839. The first eight years of his ministry were passed in quiet country churches (Hurley, N. Y., 1840, Hyde Park, 1843). He then removed to Brooklyn, and after three years of earnest work in the new Church on Bedford Avenue (1847-51), started in his own house the Sunday-school and congregation of the North Reformed Church, Brooklyn, which is the monument of his courageous, indefatigable, and successful labors. Worn out with toil and feeble health, he resigned his charge but a few months before his death, which occurred in 1866.
He was a careful sermonizer, a diligent student, and an eloquent preacher. His pastoral efficiency was wonderful. (W. J. R. T.)

Elmenhorst, Heinrich, a Lutheran theologian, was born Oct. 19, 1832, at Parchim, in Mecklenburg, studied at Leipzig and Wittenberg, and accepted a call in 1690 to Hamburg, where he died May 21, 1704.

Elmaley, Peter, D.D., an English scholar and divine, was born in 1773, and educated at Westminster School and at Merton College, Oxford. In 1798 he was presented to Little Horkesley, a small chapelry in Essex, but becoming master of a fortune by the death of an uncle, he devoted himself to literary studies, and particularly to Greek literature. He lived for a while in Edinburgh, where he was intimately associated with the founders of the Edinburgh Review, and contributed to that periodical several articles. He also edited with consummate ability several classical works. In 1816 he made a voyage to Italy in search of manuscripts, and passed the winter of 1818 in researches in the Laurentian library at Florence. The next year he was appointed to assist sir Humphry Davy in the unsavvailing task of trying to decipher some of the papyri found at Herculaneum. He died March 8, 1825. Dr. Emaley was one of the most accomplished Greek scholars of his day. See The New Amer. Cyclop. of We., 111; ( Lond.) Annual Register, 1825, p. 292; Hart, English Literature, p. 439.

Elo, Saul, St., ELIO.

Eliot, Lieut. Conder (Test. Work in Palest., ii, 286) proposes to identify this site with that of Beth Ello, a village marked on the Ordnance Map (sheet xiv) at eleven miles northeast of Jimzu (Gimzio), in a plain, without any traces of antiquity; and Tristram (Bible Places, p. 51) concurs in this location, which, however, is without the boundaries of Dan. But Elom-beth-hamon, which is probably the same place, the former identifies much more plausibly with Beth Anan, which is laid down at two and a quarter miles south of Beth-wr-Efoka (Upper Bethoron), and described (Memoirs to the Survey, iii, 16) as "a small village on the top of a flat ridge, near the main road to the west are the remains of a khan, with water, and about a mile to the east is a spring. It was a sef of the Holy Sepulchre in the 12th century."

Eloquia, abbot of Lagny, commemorated as a saint Dec. 5, was a Hibernian or Scot who accompanied St. Fursey to Belgium as a missionary about the middle of the 7th century.

Ellotherus (or Elsetherus), twenty-seventh bishop of Avignon, A.D. 475.

Elpepdephus, bishop of Cuicul or Cuizis in Numidia, A.D. 349.

Elpenips, one of the forty-eight martyrs of Ly-ona (q. v.);

Elpidiphds and companions, martyrs in Persia, A.D. 380; commemorated Nov. 2.

(3) Bishop of Palestine, A.D. 374.

(4) Bishop of Saltares in Armenia, deposed A.D. 360.

(5) Bishop of a maritime town in the East, A.D. 376, excommunicated by Eustathius.

(6) Bishop of Dioniysia in Bostra, A.D. 341.

(7) Bishop of Leodicea in Syria, deposed A.D. 404 for attachment to the cause of Chrysostom, but restored in 414.

(8) Bishop of Lyons, cir. A.D. 424.

(9) Two bishops of Therasia in Galatia, one A.D. 461, the other A.D. 692.

(10) Saint, first of the four recorded bishops of Atelia in Campania, cir. A.D. 400.

(11) Bishop who, with eleven companions, is commemorated Sept. 1.

(12) Bishop of Damietta, who fled to Constantiopolis, A.D. 487, to escape the Eutychians.

(13) Bishop of Volterra, A.D. 501.

(14) Bishop of Ancyra in the early part of the 6th century.

(15) One of four brothers, all Spanish bishops, in the first half of the 6th century.

(16) Bishop of Thessalon, A.D. 581.

(17) Bishop of Catania, cir. A.D. 580.

(18) A bishop, probably of some eastern see, censured by Gregory the Great, A.D. 597.

(19) Bishop of Tarazona (Tirano), A.D. 653-658.

(20) Bishop of Astorga, A.D. 654.

(21) Pat- ron of the town of St. Euphemia in Pismusium, said by some to have been a Cappadocian by birth, and who died A.D. 893.

(22) Abbot of the monastery founded by Timotheus in Cappadocia, where he died before A.D. 420.

(23) Archimandrite of Constantinople, A.D. 448.

(24) Surnamed Rusticus, a deacon of Lyons, a skilful physician, and a friend of Eunomius, in the time of The- odoric, king of the Ostrogoths; the author of some poems still extant (see Migne, Patr. Lat., lixii, 545).

(25) Martyr under Julian with several others, commemorated Nov. 16.

Elpidophorus. (1) An apostate during the persecution by the Vandal king Hunneric, A.D. 484.

(2) Bishop of Alestum in Carta, A.D. 588.

Elpia (hope), one of the sions in the system of Val-entinus (q. v.);

Elpia, a (mythical) martyr, daughter of Sophia; commemorated with her sisters, Pistas and Agape, Sept. 17.

Elstob, William, an English clergyman and anti-quary, was born at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Jan. 1, 1678, and was educated at Eton and Catharine Hall, Cam- bridge. In 1696 he became a fellow of University Col- lege. In 1702 he was appointed rector of the united parishes of St. Wiffin and St. Mary Bothan, London. In 1708 he published an edition of Ascham's Latin letters. He died in 1714. The following are some of his publications: An Essay on the Great Affinity and Mutual Agreement between the Two Professions of Love and Divinity (Lond. 1704);—Sermons (1704, 4to);—A Translation into Latin of the Saxon Homily of Lupus, with Notes by Dr. Hickes (1701).

Elswich, Johann Herrmann, a Lutheran divine, was born at Rendsburg, in Holstein, June 19, 1684, and was educated at Sondershausen, Celle, Halle, and Würtemberg, at which last university he took his mas- ter's degree in 1717. In 1717 he was invited to become pastor of the Church of St. Caspar and Damian, at Stade. He died there, June 10, 1721. For a list of some of his works, see Chalmers, Dic. Dict. a. v.; Jücher, Allgemeines Gehlert-Lezikon, a. v.:

Eltekeb. Lieut. Conder suggests (Test. Work in Palest, ii, 386; see Quar. Statement of Travels, Explor. Fund., January, 1881, p. 51) that this is the present Beirut Luka, which is laid down on the Ordnance Map one and three quarter miles south-west of Beirut-ur-Efoka (Luter Bethoron), and described in the Memoirs to the Survey, iii, 16 as "a small village on a main road at the foot of the hills, supplied by cisterns; with ancient foundations among the houses;" and in this identification Tristram concurs (Bible Places, p. 51).

Eltinge, Wilhelmus, D.D., a Reformed (Dutch) minister, was born near Kingston, N. Y., in 1775, graduated at Princeton College in 1796, and pursued theological studies with Dr. Theodorick Huy, at New York. He was licensed in 1798, and passed his long ministry at Paramus, N. J. From 1799 to 1811 he likewise served the adjoining church of Saddle River, and from 1811 to 1818 the first Church of Totowa, now Paterson. He resigned the latter in 1850, and died in 1861. Dr. Eltinge was a man of respectableness.

statements, and of great firmness and decision. He was a very prominent actor in the ecclesiastical troubles in Bergen County which led to the secession in 1622, and the organization of the “True Reformed Dutch Church,” of which he was a strong and life-long opponent. See Corwin, Memoir of the Rev. Church in America, p. 253. (W. J. R. T.)

Elton, Rowan, D.D., a Baptist minister and scholar, was born at Burlington, Conn., in 1790. He graduated from Brown University in 1818, engaged in teaching for two or three years; was ordained at Newport, R.I., Jan. 11, 1817; became pastor of the Second Baptist Church there, but resigned in 1822 on account of his health, and two years after was settled in Windsor, Vt. Being professor of Greek and Latin in Brown University, he spent about two years abroad, chiefly in Germany, in study, and assumed his chair in 1827. He retired from his office in 1845, and in 1846 took up his residence in Easton, in the south of England, where he remained twenty-two years; then removed to Bath, where he lived two years, during all which period he preached almost constantly in the vacant pulpits of Baptist and Independent churches, and wrote for the press. For several years he was one of the editors of the Baptist Review. He returned to America in 1869, and died in Boston, Mass., Feb. 5, 1870. He left by his will, among other bequests, one of $20,000 to Brown University to establish a professorship of natural theology, and nearly as much to Columbia University to establish a professorship of international and moral philosophy. Among the published writings may be found an edition of Calleman’s Clandestine Sermon—a volume of President Marcy’s Brevia (1844)—and a Life of Roger Williams (1853). (J. C. S.)

Eluron, an Egyptian bishop, A.D. 847.

Ewlandus, bishop of Trevixo, in 492.

Ewert, Edward, an evangelical theologian of Germany, was born at Cannstatt, Feb. 22, 1805. In 1830 he commenced his academical career at Tübingen, was in 1835 appointed professor of East Zurich, and from 1839 to 1841 acted as professor at Tübingen. Bodily infirmities obliged him to retire from his academic activity, and he accepted the pastorate at Mößingen. In 1850 he was placed at the head of the Schöntal Seminary, where he labored until 1864, when he retired. He retired entirely from active work. He died June 9, 1865, at his native place, having published, De Animism Jo. Apriolica (Zürich, 1838)—Annotatio in Gal. ii., 1-10, etc. (Tübingen, 1852)—Quaestiones et Observationes ad Philologium Sacrum N. T. Test. Pertinentes (ibid. 1860). He also contributed to several theological reviews. See Kütbel, in Herzog-Plitt, Real-Encyklop., u. c.; Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i. 818. (B. P.)

Elwin (or Aluna), Swain, one of Breaca’s companions in her voyage from Ireland to Cornwall; commemorated Feb. 22.

Elwoold, abbot of St. Illky’s (now Lanwix Major), in the second half of the 8th century.

Elwog (Lacl. Elugua), bishop of Llandaff, in the second half of the 8th century.

Elwystyl (or Eligstil), suffragan bishop of Llandaff, in the first half of the 6th century.

Ely, Alfred, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at West Springfield, Mass., Nov. 8, 1778. Leaving a clericalship at the age of twenty-one, he prepared for college at the Hartford (Conn.) grammar-school, and graduated from the College of New Jersey in 1804. After a term at college for one year, he was ordained over the Church in Mount, Mass., in 1806, where he was an active minister for thirty-six years, and died July 6, 1868. Dr. Ely was an able preacher and theologian, and his ministry was greatly blessed to the spiritual and moral elevation of his people. Twenty-one of his sermons and addresses were published. See Cong. Quarterly, 1867, p. 187.

Ely, David, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Lyme, Conn., July 7 (O. S.), 1749. He graduated from Yale College; in October, 1771, was licensed to preach; and Oct. 27, 1773, was ordained colleague with Rev. Jedediah Mills in Huntington, Conn. He died there, Feb. 16, 1816. During the Revolution he was a zealous patriot. Though he made no pretensions to style, he had a talent for communicating the truth, which strongly impressed it upon the memory. His facility and felicity in quoting Scripture were excelled by few. About a hundred pupils were prepared by him for Yale College. From 1778 he was a member of the corporation of Yale; was, for a long time, secretary of the same, and one of the prudential committees. See Sprague, Amsden of the Amer. Pulpit, ii. 4.

Ely, Samuel Rose, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at West Springfield, Mass., Dec. 29, 1803. He graduated from Williams College in 1880, studied theology for two years in Princeton Theological Seminary, and was ordained by the Presbytery of Western N. Y. Dec. 12, 1844. He served as pastor at Carmel, from 1844 to 1847; at Westhampton, from 1846 to 1846; at Brooklyn, in 1850; and as stated supply at Roslyn, from 1853 until his death, May 11, 1878. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem., 1881, p. 82.

Elymas, a presbyter, martyred in Persia under Decius; commemorated April 22.

Elysium, in Greek and Roman mythology, is the abode of the blessed. According to Homer, it lies in the mild sunlight, this side of Oceania; whether it is an island or not is not mentioned. Here lie the heroes of what is called Elysium, where the Oceans river the heroes live in peace, and where the earth yearly brings forth three harvests of fruits. According to Pindar, the citadel, Kronos (Saturn), is on the islands of the blessed. Here cool, refreshing sea-breezes blow, gold-glittering flowers bloom on the trees, and along the springs. The heroes decorate their persons with them. They only reach this blessed abode who pass a threefold test in Hades and on earth by keeping themselves unstained by crimes. Besides Rhadamanthus, whom Kronos selected as his successor, Pindar mentions Minos and Achilles as being here. Virgil gives another description of the Elysium: “Laughing sere fills the fields with a purplish light; a distinct sun and distinct stars shed their light upon them.” Here are those who reached the goals designed for them, and went to their country there who lived a spotless life, sacred poets, and those who, being the worth of Phoebus, discoverers who benefited mankind by their arts, etc.

Elzewir is the name of a family, the members of which are known by their publications of theological works, more especially of the New Test. Louis Elzewir, who had embraced Calvinism in France, had to leave his country in 1546, and went to live in England where he established a book-store, which soon became known by the publication of Drusi Ebraicerum Questiones libri duo (1588). The descendants of Louis established themselves at Utrecht, Amsterdam, and at other places. His grandson, Isaac, was appointed in 1689 university printer at Leyden, and this privilege remained with the family until 1712. The Elzivers published such works as Dr. Pérenne’s Pravdanime, in 1655, and Richard Simon’s Historie Cri. du Pieux Testament, in 1680, which the Church of Rome tried to suppress. What assures the Elzevir a honorable place in the history of theology is the fact that they issued several editions of the Greek New Test., which became popular and authoritative for a long period. The preface to the second edition, published in 1638, boldly proclaims, “Textum ergo habes, nunc ab omnibus receptum; in quo nihil immutatum aut corruptum danus;" hence the name textus receptus, or commonly received standard text. All the Holland editions were scrupulously copied from the Elzevir text, and Wetstein could not get authority to print his famous Greek Text. (1751-52) except on condition of following it. See BERNUS, in Lichtenburger's Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.; but more especially Alphonse Willems's Histoire et Annales Typographiques (Brussels and Paris, 1880, 2 vols.), where a history of the Elzevier family and a list of their publications is given. Emant, of Cluny, an Irish saint, said by some to have been a bishop; commemorated July 1.

Emmanuel, Bn. S. Salome. See Emmanuel.

Emmanus, slain by thieves at Chartres in the 6th century, is said to have been a Cappadocian pilgrim to Rome and other cities of Italy; commemorated May 16.

Ember Days. These are days of fasting occurring quarterly, in commemoration of the seasons (Lat. quatuor tempus), whence by contraction the German Quattendorf derives the English Ember. We find them at an early period associated with the invoking of God's blessing on each of the four seasons in turn, and the special striving by prayers and fasting to merit such blessings. They were celebrated at Nativity, Easter, Pentecost, and Advent. About the 5th century Gallican they were selected as the most fitting for the ordination of the clergy. In the Eastern Church there is no trace whatever of an observance of the Ember seasons. The passage of Athanasius, which some have quoted in support of a different conclusion, merely proves the existence of a fast at Pentecost. As regards the Gallican Church, the Ember seasons do not seem to have been established much before the time of Charlemagne. The second Council of Tours (A.D. 567), in prescribing the fasts to be observed by monks, makes no mention whatever of the fasts of the four seasons. The observance of the Ember days is purely a Western institution. It was, doubtless, at first a rite merely of the local Roman Church, whence it gradually spread throughout the West. The history of the development of the custom is probably thus: Fasts were celebrated at the times of Lent, Pentecost, and the Nativity; these periods would roughly correspond with three of the four seasons, and thus some bishop of Rome, Leo or one of his predecessors, may have conceived the idea of making them symbolize the return of the seasons, and so add a pious object to the fasts of the four. It would soon come to pass, then, that they would be spoken of as originally ordained with that view; the length of celebration settled, the fasts then became associated with the seasons, and were regarded as independent of Lent, etc. Thus they might occasionally fall outside of these seasons, and finally such irregularity may have caused the settlement of the matter as at present.

Embla, in Norse mythology, was the first woman created by the Asas, from a tree-trunk (Embôla, "the pine," while Ask, "the ash," was the name of the first man). She was endowed with feeling, motion, spirit, life, the senses of hearing and seeing, and was gifted with the power of speech. By Ask, her husband, she became mother of the human race.

Emboliam (also Embolis and Emboliom). (1) An inserted prayer; the name given to the prayer which in almost all ancient liturgies follows the Lord's prayer, found only in the two last parts. It is so called because it is interposed there, and what had been already asked in the Lord's prayer is expanded, and it is more clearly expressed what evils we seek to be delivered from, viz. past, present, and future. There are also added the names of the saints by whose intercession we strengthen our prayers, viz. the Virgin Mary, Peter, Paul, and Andrew. The embolism was usually repeated by the priest in a low voice, symbolizing the silence during the period that our Lord lay in the grave; but in the Ambrosian rite it was always pronounced aloud. This practice, which has left very faint traces in the Western Church, holds a more important place in Oriental liturgies. The embolism is not, however, found in the liturgies of Chrysostom and Basil, but appears in those of James, Mark, and Theodore the Interpreter, as well as in the Armenian, Mozarabic, and Coptic Basil. As examples of the shorter embolism we give that of the Church of Jerusalem:

"And lead us not into temptation, O Lord, the Lord of Hosts, who knowest our infirmity; but deliver us from the Fire One, and his works, and every deceit and will of his, for the sake of Thy Holy name which is called upon our lowliness;" and the Syriac Liturgy of St. James:

"O Lord our God, lead us not into temptation, which we defend of strength are not able to bear, but also with the temptation make a way of escape, that we may be able to bear it, and deliver us from evil, through Jesus Christ," etc.

(2) Embolism also designates the excess of the solar year over twelve lunar months, commonly called the Exect.

Embolium, a covered portico or cloister; in ecclesiastical language a cloister surrounding the external walls of a church, serving as an ambulatory in hot, rainy, and dirty weather, and also affording a convenient passage for the priests and ministers of the church from the bema and deiconstance to the narthex. These porticos were generally vaulted, and highly ornamented with mosaic pictures. Such porticos were found at St. Sophia, Constantinople; St. Michael, at Anaphus; and the Deipara, at Jerusalem.

Emden, JACOB ISRAEL, a Jewish writer of Germany, was born in 1696, and died at Altona in 1776. He is the author of numerous treatises, among which are, הָו לִי, a ritual for the whole year (Altona, 1745, 4 parts, and often; latest ed. Lemberg, 1869) — A Life of Jom Ephraemschütz, entitled, תְּרוֹמַת יְהוָה יְרוּשָׁלַיִם (Altona, 1792): — "The Wraper of Books" (ibid. 1763); a critique on the Sohar: — On the Fundamental Doctrines of the Cabala (ibid. 1765): — אַרְבָּעָה דִּבְרֵי יְהוָה, A Collection of Accounts Referring to Sabbath, his Pupils and Adherents (ibid. 1792; Lemberg, 1870). Empohdium (ιποποιυς) is one of the names for the one who marries a woman, and was used by some persons who were invested in baptism. The name is no doubt derived from the "enlightening" attributed to the baptismal ceremony. See Baptism.

Empyynthesis (ιμπαινους) is a contract by which the beneficidal ownership of real property is transferred by the proprietor to another, either for a term of not less than ten years, or for a life or lives, or in perpetuity, in consideration of an annual payment. It differs from letting in that it applies only to real property, and must last for at least ten years; while in letting only the use and enjoyment of produce is transferred. It is unlike feudal tenure in that it requires periodical payment, not personal service.

Ecclesiastical empythesis is a contract by which property belonging to a church, monastery, or other religious foundation, is granted. It requires the assent and must be for the benefit of the body granting it. This preclusion is taken to check the alienation of church property. See Alienation.

Empie, Adam, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born at Schenectady, N. Y. He graduated from Union College; studied medicine at Columbia College; then studied theology and was ordained deacon in 1809, and his first charge was in Hempstead, L. L., where he also taught the classics; became pastor of St. James, Wilmington, Del., in 1811; and in 1814 received an appointment as chaplain and professor of rhetoric in the United States Military Academy, West Point, N. Y.; became rector of St. James's, where he remained until declining health compelled his retirement. He returned to Wilmington in 1859, and died there Nov. 6, 1860, aged seventy-five years. Dr. Empie led a laborious life. He represented his church in Virginia on several occasions in the General Convention. Among his literary remains is a volume of Sermons, published in 1856. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1861, p. 696.

Emporagius, Eric Gabriel, a Swedish theologian, studied at Upsal, and taught physics there in 1837, and theology in 1841; was received as doctor by that faculty in 1847, and in 1854, after having filled other ecclesiastical positions, was appointed bishop of Halden in Norway. He died March 14, 1874, leaving, among other writings, Aedwvnoi Consolatorion, etc. (Uspal, 1829).—De Rerum Duratione (ibid. 1831).—Hierologicus (ibid. 1836).—De Disciplina Ecclesiastica (Stockholm, 1661). Enander, Samuel, a Swedish prelate, was born at Enby in 1607. After fulfilling several ecclesiastical functions, he was appointed bishop of Linköping. He died in 1670. His principal works are, De Intellctu et Voluntate Hominis (Uspal, 1629).—De Simulbibus Interioribus (ibid. 1632).—De Mundo (ibid. 1684). See Hoerer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Enceirium (ιχθυος) is the napkin with which the priest wipes his hands, and which he wears at the girdle. Germanus of Constantinople describes it as above, and says that "to have a napkin at the girdle is typical of him who washed his hands and said, 'I am innocent' (Matt. xxvii, 24)."

Encolpium (ιεκλπως) is a portable reliquary, worn around the neck. Such ornaments are of the highest antiquity. Chrysostom speaks of particles of the true cross, encased in gold, being suspended from the neck. The pectoral cross (q. v.), worn by the bishops, was also called Encolpium. Such are first mentioned by Gregory the Great. He sent one to Theodolinda containing a fragment of the cross, which still exists at Monza and is used by the priest of that ancient church when he officiates pontifically. Two amulets, given to this princess by the same pontiff for the use of her children, are preserved in the treasures of Monza. From Gregory we also learn that filings from St. Peter's chains were sometimes enclosed in golden keys. Gregory himself had sent one of these consecrated keys to Childebert, king of the Franks, to protect him from all evils. See Reliquary.

Endemann, Samuel, a Reformed theologian of Germany, was born March 18, 1727, at Carlshof. He studied at Marburg and Rinteln, was in 1746 preacher at Jesberg, in Hesse, and in 1748 at Haan. In 1750 he was appointed member of consistory, and in 1767 became professor of theology and Hebrew at the gymnasium in the latter place. In 1782 he accepted a call as professor of theology to Marburg, and died there May 31, 1789, leaving, Institutiones Theologicae Dogmaticae (Hanover, 1777, 2 vols.),—Institutiones Theologiae Mo-
Endowment, in ecclesiastical phrase, is the property given by the founder of a church for its maintenance, including the pay of the clergymen. Justinian compelled those who built churches to endow them; without competent provision for support no cleric was ordained to the church; whoever desired a parish church on his estate was to set apart a landed endowment for its clerks (A.D. 541); a bishop was not to consecrate a church until the endowment of it had been regularly secured by a deed or charter (A.D. 572); founders of churches were to understand that they had no further authority over property which they had given to the church, but that both the church and its endowment were at the disposition of the bishop, to be employed according to the canons (A.D. 685). According to the ninth Council of Toledo, A.D. 665, a bishop was never allowed on any monastic church in his diocese more than a fifteenth part of the Church funds: and on a non-monastic church, or church designed for his own burial-place, not more than one-hundredth part of the royal confirmation was required if one who held a fief from the king endowed a church.

Endress, Christian, D.D., a Lutheran minister, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., March 12, 1775. He graduated from the University of Pennsylvania in 1790; in 1792 was appointed tutor in the same university; preached his first sermon at Zion's Church, Philadelphia, in 1793; in 1795 was elected principal of the Congregational school of Zion and St. Michael; in 1801 resigned and removed to Easton, having accepted a call to the Lutheran Church in that place, and while there preached frequently to neighboring congregations. Until 1799 he was subject to the superintendence of the ministers or ministers of the Church in Philadelphia, but at the last-mentioned date he received a license from the ministerium of Pennsylvania, and was ordained at Reading in 1802. In 1815 he was chosen pastor of the Lutheran congregation at Lancaster, and died there in September, 1827. Sprague, Amner of the Amer. Pulpit, IX, 180, 107; Ecce Evangelii, vi, 22.

Enée, a French prelate and theologian, was notary or secretary to Charles the Bald, and was famed for his honesty and merit. In A.D. 853 he was elected bishop of Paris. On June 14, 859, he assisted at the Council of Savonnieres, near Toul; in 861 at that of Pitres-sur-Seine, near Rouen; in 862 at that of Soissons; in 864 at the second at Pitres-sur-Seine; in August, 866, at that of Soissons, and (October, 867, that of Noyon). He was also at the Council of Verberie on April 24, 869; in August, the same year, at that of Pitres-sur-Seine; and finally, in May, 870, at that of Aignigny. After various other services to the Church and State, Enée was made abbot of St. Denis and grand chancellor of the palace. He died Dec. 27, 870, leaving a book against Photius and the errors of the Greeks (printed in vol. vii of the Speculum of D'Achery and in vol. viii of Labbe and Coste's Concilia). See Hoefer, Nouv. Engelcken, Heinrich Ascanius, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Rostock, Aug. 15, 1675. He studied at the universities of his native place and Leipzig, and was in 1706 professor at Rostock, in 1718 superintendent and pastor of St. George's at Parnich, and died Jan. 13, 1734. He published a number of theological dissertations. See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexicon, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Engelien (Lat. Anglia), Willem van, a Dutch theologian, was born at Bois-le-Duc, Sept. 1, 1583. He commenced his studies in his native town, and finished them at Louvain, under the direction of Rausin, Follega, and Malders. In 1606 he taught both Greek and philosophy at the College of Fock; was received into orders in 1607; in 1614 appointed canon of St. Pierre and professor of morals; in 1616 elected president of the College of Viglius, and was made doctor of theology on Oct. 11 of the same year; was in 1618 made the president of the College of Pope Adrian VI; in 1648 was appointed to the bishopric of Ruremon, but did not remain there; he died at Louvain, Feb. 8, 1649, without having received his bulla from Rome. He was celebrated in dogmatical theology and scholastics, and vigorously opposed the doctrines of Janensius.

England, John, a Roman Catholic prelate, was born in Cork, Ireland, Sept. 28, 1786, and was educated at Cleeve. He was ordained priest Oct. 3, 1806, and appointed to the North Chapelry of Cork, and chaplain of the prisons. In May, 1808, he began the publication of a monthly magazine called The Religious Repository. He was made professor of the theological college of St. Mary in 1812, and in 1817 parish priest at Brandon; 1820, was appointed bishop of the new diocese of Charleston, S. C., where he established an academy and theological seminary, and taught in both of them. He went to Rome in 1839, and was appointed by the pope apostolic legate to Hayti. He died at Charleston, April 11, 1842. Bp. England founded several churches, and charitable institutions; and left a number of writings, most of which appeared in the periodical press. A complete edition of his works was prepared by bishop Reynolds (Baltimore, 1849, 5 vol. 8vo).

Englert, Johann, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Schweinfurt, Dec. 29, 1688. He studied at Leipzig, was in 1713 preacher at Offenroth, and in 1715 sub-deacon at his native place. In 1725 he was appointed professor of theology and of Hebrew at the gymnasium there, and in 1732 he succeeded his father, Johann Matthäus (q. v.), as pastor primarius and inspector of the gymnasium, and died Feb. 25, 1751. He published Die Gedichte des Propheten Jesaja (Schweinfurt, 1725; Jena, 1726) — Disp. de Singulare Dei Provectu Circa Scholarum (Schweinfurt, 1734) — Questions in Tria Prima Copiae Gentes (ibid. 1744). Enna (Lat. Endura) is the name of several Irish saints, the most noted of whom was the son of Conall Derg, chief of the Orielis, whom he succeeded on the throne, and became a famous warrior. Being suddenly converted to Christianity, he renounced the throne, and after studying in the monastery of Mancenus, in Britain, thence went to Rome, and, returning to his native land, became abbot of Aran, in Killane bay, where he probably died, c. A.D. 542. He is commemorated March 21.

Ennathas, Saint, a virgin, martyred in Palestine under Diocletian, by being scourged through the streets of Caesarea, and then burned. She is commemorated Nov. 18.

Ennemond, Saint. See Ansemundus.

Enoch, the translated patriarch, is commemorated in some calendars of saints on Jan. 22 or July 19.

Ens (or Enzo), Giuseppe, called the Younger, was a court painter to Riddolfo II, and flourished about 1600. In his celebrated Tomb of Christ, at Ognissanti, he styled himself Jo. Hesitarius. He gained such an immense reputation in his time for his pictures, that pope Urban VIII made him a chevalier of the Order of the Holy Cross. He painted several altar-pieces for the churches of Venice. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Ens, Jan, a Protestant theologian of Holland, was born at Quaeycy in West Friesa, May 9, 1682. Entalma (ἐραμος) is the Greek name of the document by which a bishop confers on a monk the privilege of hearing confessions.

Ethnosophical Letters were letters anciently addressed by newly installed bishops to foreign bishops, announcing their promotion to the episcopal office, and giving an account of their faith and orthodoxy. They received in return letters of peace and Christian fellowship. A faithful and tender messages was sent, as an indication of a withdrawal from communion with the rest of the Christian world.

ETHNORHISTIC SERMON is the sermon preached by a bishop on the occasion of his enthronization (q. v.).

Enthronisation. (1) The solemn placing of a bishop on his throne. See Bishop.

(2) The word is also used to designate the placing or "enthroning" of relics of the saints in the altar of a church, on consecration. See CONSECRATION OF CHURCHES.

(3) The installation of a presbyter is sometimes designated by the same word.

Enthusiast. Those who pretended to prophesy by the motions of an insensible demon, which they thought to be the Holy Spirit. See ECUESTRI

Entrance. Two of the most remarkable ceremonies of the Eastern Liturgies are the Lesser and the Greater Entrance—that of the word and that of the sacrament.

I. The Lesser Entrance is the bearing in of the book of the gospels in solemn procession.

"Then the priest and the deacon, standing before the holy table, make three genuflections. Then the priest, taking the holy book of the Gospels, gives it to the deacon; and so, going out by the north side, with lights going before them, they make the lesser entrance."

That is, the deacon and priest pass from the sanctuary into the chapel of the prothesis, which is to the north of it, and so out into the body of the church, where, by a devious path, they return to the holy doors, which are open; the volume, often decorated with great magnificence, is laid on the holy table, whence it is again taken to the ambo, when the gospel is to be read.

This “Entrance” corresponds to the carrying of the gospel by the deacon to the ambo or rood-loft in the Western Church, once a rite of great importance; for the book was preceded not only by tapers, but by a crucifix.

II. The Greater Entrance. This ceremony has, like others, been developed from very small beginnings into great prominence and magnificence.

The liturgy of St. James simply alludes, in passing, to the bringing in of the elements. St. Mark’s liturgy is even more vague.

In the Armenian rite the celebrant lies prostrate before the altar while the Great Entrance is made; in this (anomalously) the elements are spoken of as the body and blood of Christ before consecration.

In the much more developed rite of Constantinople, after the chanting of the Cherubic hymn, the ceremony proceeds as follows:

During the previous part of the eucharistic office, the elements have remained on the table in the chapel of the prothesis. At the proper point, the deacon ceases the altar and the sanctuary, and then goes before the priest into the prothesis. The priest then lifts the “sar,” or cloth, from the chalice and paten, and lays it on the deacon’s shoulder, and then places upon it the paten, covered with the towel and veil. The deacon takes hold of these with his left hand, bearing the censer in his right; the priest takes the chalice and follows the deacon, and as preceded by tapers, they move round to the holy doors, as in the lesser entrance. In great churches, where there are dignified clergy and many attendants, this procession is one of great magnificence. Where there is but a single priest and no deacon, he bears the paten on his shoulder, supporting it by his left hand, and the chalice in his right hand before his breast.

In the Coptic St. Basil, the Great Entrance is made at the very beginning of the liturgy; the directions for it are very curious and minute.

"The priest goes to the Takaddemet (Prothesis) from which he shall take the lamb (i.e. lamb), looking attentive-ly that there be no flaw in it. . . . When he hath all that he needs, the lamb, the wine, and the incense . . . he takes the lamb in his hand and wipes it lightly, as Christ the Lord was first washed with water before he was presented to Simeon the priest; then he shall bear it round to the altar in his hands, as Simeon bare him round the temple. At last, the priest shall lay it down on the altar and shall place it on the paten, which signifies the cradle; and shall cover it with a linen cloth, as the Virgin did at his Nativity."

A deacon seems to have borne the cruet. See Introit.

ENTRY INTO JERUSALEM. This event in our Lord’s life is very frequently represented in the earlier art of

The Christian Church, occurring on some of the first sarcophagi, though not, it seems, in fresco or mosaic in the catacombs or elsewhere, except in an ancient mosaic in the Vatican and one from the basilicas at Bethlehem. The earliest MS. representation of it is probably that in the Rabula or Laurentian Evangel. The treatment is almost always the same; the Lord is mounted on the ass, sometimes accompanied by his mother, and the multitude with their palm branches follow, or lay their garments before him. His right hand is generally raised in the act of blessing. The multitude frequently raise their hands in thanksgiving. In one of the oldest MSS. of the New Testament, in existence, the Gregorian Evangelist of St. Cuthbert, the Lord is represented seated on the ass, with a first-century raiment, carrying a large whip—evidently with reference to the scourge of small cords used in the expulsion of buyers and sellers from the temple. There is a certain variety in the examples taken from the different carvings. Sometimes Zachaeus is represented in the "fig or sycamore tree" behind the Lord, as if to call attention to the beginning of his last journey at Jericho.

Entychites, a sect of the followers of Simon, who, according to Clemens Alex. (Stromata, viii, 17; p. 900), derived this name from their promiscuous (entychyomai) sexual intercourse at the night meetings. Others write the name Entychides or Euchites.

Euny was always reckoned an odious sin, and one of the first magnitudes; but there are no distinct penalties attached to it, inasmuch as, before it could bring a man under public discipline, it required to be displayed in some outward and vicious action, which received its appropriate punishment.

Eunous or Eunoniis, a French saint, was of noble birth, and became bishop of Arles, A.D. 492. He assisted, Sept. 2, 499, at the conference between the Catholic bishops of Burgundy and the Arian prelates at Lyons, in the presence of Gondebad, king of Burgundy, who favored Arianism. About the same time Eunous was involved in the dispute with Avitus of Vienne, concerning the primatial right of their respective churches, which was brought before pope Symmachus, and finally decided in favor of the see of Arles. Eunous was allied with Ruficius of Limoges, and with Fomesus, abbot of Arles, and has left us his correspondence with those saints. He died A.D. 16, 502, and is commemorated on Aug. 80. Epact. In determining the epact we either find the number of days required to make up the lunar to the solar year, and so the number of the moon’s age on Jan. 1, on, and following Jan. 1, we may use March 1, which comes to the same thing, and has the advantage of avoiding the ambiguity of leap-year. The old Latin cycles of eighty-four years indicated Easter by means of the epacts of Jan. 1, and the day of the week on which Jan. 1 fell.

The method of determining the months (lunar) was as follows: For the first month of the year, that month was taken whose age was expressed by the epact. The day of December on which it commenced is found by subtracting the epact (when more than one) from thirty-three. For the month next was always counted from that hollow and full succeeded by turns, so that the last month in the year, in a common lunar year, was hollow, in an intercalary year full. From the last begins the new moon of the following year.

The Easter moon being found, Easter-day was, according to the Latin rules, the Sunday which fell on or next after the 16th of the moon, not therefore later than the 22d of the moon. The choice of the month was determined thus: New moon must not be earlier than March 5, and full moon not later than March 21; the first of these rules sometimes having to give way to save the violation of the latter.
The following rule is given for the epact of Jan. 1, viz., multiply the golden number by eleven, and divide the product by thirty, the remainder is the epact. But this rule will not give the epacts mentioned above, which were constructed as we have just described—wi-th a salus luna, or addition of twelve after the 19th year of the cycle, etc. v.

Ephrem (or Ephraim), patriarch of Antioch, a Greek, and was born in the second half of the 5th century. If the epitaph of Amias (ο Ἀμιας), which Theophanes gives in it, indicates the place of his birth, he was born at Amida, in Armenia, near the source of the Tigris. He first had civil employments, and under the reign of Justin I obtained the high dignity of a count of the Orient. In the years 522 and 526 Antioch was almost wholly destroyed by earthquakes, and by famine, which were the consequences of them. The inhabitants, who were touched by the compassion which Ephrem showed for their disasters, and by the help which he extended to them, appointed him successor to the patriarch Euphranius, who was buried under the ruins of the city.

All the writers on Church history praise his conduct as a patriarch, his charity towards the poor, the zeal and vigor with which he opposed heretics. Not satisfied with condemning, in a synod at Antioch, those who tried to revive the errors of Origen, he also wrote divers treatises against the Nestorians, the Eutychians, the Severians, the Acoephali, and in favor of the Council of Chalcedon. Towards the end of his life he was forced by the emperor Justinian to subscribe to the condemnation of three of the decrees of the Council of Chalcedon, which he had theretofore warmly defended. Ephrem died A.D. 545. His works are known to us only by their analysis, which Photius has given in his Bibliotheca; they made together three volumes, which were consecrated to the defense of the dogmas of the Church, and particularly of the decrees of the Council of Chalcedon. The first volume contained a letter to Zenobius, advocate of Eudaimon, and member of the sect of the Acoephali; letters to the emperor Justinin-ian: to Anthimus, bishop of Trapaena; to Dometianus Syncretistes at Tarsus; to Bracienus, and to the Nestorians, and to others. The acts of a synod (συνόδος σφυγών) were kept by Ephrem, on the subject of certain heretical books, panegyrics, and other discourses. The second volume contained a treatise in four books, in defense of Cyril of Alexandria, and of the Synod of Chal-

Ephraim, patriarch of Armenia, was born at Sis in 734. The objects of his study were poetry, eloquence, theology, history, and chronology. The pope appointed him bishop of Sis, but his health and his talents and of the influence which he possessed with the united Armenians. After the death of his brother, Gabriel, in 771, he was raised to the patriarchal see of Sis, and died in 784, leaving, Explanation of the Psalms of David;—Collection of Sacred and Profane Poetry:—A Poem on Genesis;—Rules of Armenian Versification;—Collection of Letters, both in prose and in verse:—Chronological History of the Armenian Patri-

Ephraim, bishop of Mylasa, in Caria, lived anterior to the 5th century, and is commemorated Jan. 24 at Leucas, near Mylasa, where he had been interred. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Epictetus, a Roman Stoic philosopher, was born at Hierapolis, Phrygia, in the 1st century, and was 75 years of age when he was a slave. His name is unknown. He was involved in the persecution by which Domitian banished all philosophers from Rome, and retired to Nicopolis, in Epirus, where he opened a school of Stoic philosophy, and held those conversations which have been preserved in the Manual and philosophical lectures, compiled from his discourses by his pupil Arrian. His teachings are summed up in the formula, "Bear and forbear." Recognizing only will and reason, his highest conception of life was to be passionless under whatever circumstances. "Man," he said, "is but a pilot; observe the star, hold the rudder, and be not distracted on thy way." He is supposed to have committed nothing to writing.

Epigonatium (ἐπιγονατία), a portion of the sacerdotal habit, used in both the Greek and Roman churches, consisting of an appendage somewhat resembling a small maniple, on the right side hanging from the girdle. In the Roman Church it is worn only by the pope. In the Greek Church it is borne by all bishops, and consists of brocade, velvet, or some stiff material, a foot in dimensions, with a cross wrought upon it, and tassels hanging from the three lower corners. It is not used in the English Church.

Ephesusa, a heresiarch, was a disciple of Novatius, and came to Rome about A.D. 200, and there propagated his master's opinions. See NOVATIANS.

Ephesus, sacred games celebrated among the ancient Greeks in the time of vintage, before the invention of the wine-press. They intended with one another in treading the grapes, who should soonest press out the must, in the meantime singing the praises of Dionysus, and begging that the must might be sweet and good.

Epimanicia, the maniples or hand-pieces of the priests of the Greek Church. They are provided with epimánica for both arms, while the maphila (q. v.) of the Roman priesthood is worn on the left hand alone.

Epistolarion, a triumphal hymn used in the communion service of the early Church. It consisted of the words, "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of Hosts!" It has sometimes been confounded with the Triasigion (q. v.).

Epiphanius, a branch of the CARPATHIANS (q. v.).

Epiphanius, bishop of Armenia, lived in the latter part of the 7th century. After having been one of the most distinguished scholars of the patriarchal school, he retired into a desert near Tavrus, where he was taken to discharge the functions of abbot of the monastery of Sourp Garbel (St. John the Baptist), in the province of Daron, to which dignity was joined the title of bishop of the Mhamigons, borne by Epiphanius for twenty years. In A.D. 899 he assisted at the Council of Garin (Erzerum), and wrote, The History of the Monastery of Sourp Garbel:—The History of the Council at Ephesus:—Commentary on the Psalms of David and on the Book of Proverbs:—Sermons. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Epiphanius, fourteenth bishop and fifth patriarch of Constantinople, A.D. 538-586, seems to have been a quiet and prudent person, well fitted for that violent age, when the great popular sedition occurred in that city (A.D. 581), and when the emperors prescribed the policy of the Church. His letters to pope Hormisdas are extant, also the sentence of the court which he held against Severus and Peter (Migne, PatroL Græc. lxxxvi, 785 sq.).

Ephiphanus of Jerusalem, a Greek hagiographer, lived probably in the 12th century. Allatius (De Synodum Scripta, p. 106) and Fabriusus (Codex Apophylly, n. 2) have given an extract from the Life of the Virgin by this author; the entire work has been published since in the Analecta Hiaritana. Ephiphanus is also the author of a History of St. Andrew, the apostle (Allatius, De Synodum Scripta, p. 90), and of a Description of Jerusalem (published by Ferdinand Morelli in his Esperito Theatrum, Paris, 1620, and by Allatius, Σημειώσεις). A MS. in the Bodleian Library contains a treatise entitled Epiphanus Monachi et Presbiteri, Character B. Virginis et Domini Nostrí, which differs from the Life of the Virgin cited above, but seems to be by the same author. The same is also true of the MS. entitled De Disantio quator Evangelistarum Circum Resurrectionem Christi, which is found in the same library. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bioi. Générale, t. v.

Episcopa, a name sometimes given in the early Church to the wife of a bishop. The word is used in this sense in the second Council of Tours, where it is said that if a bishop have not a wife there shall no train of women follow him.

Episcopa, a name given to the deaconesses (q. v.) of the ancient Christian Church.

Episcopate, the office of a bishop (q. v.).

Episcopi Senatus (Bishops of the Senate), a name given in the canon law to the chapter of a cathedral (q. v.).

Episcopiasam, a name sometimes given to the deaconesses of the early Church.

Episcopus Judæorum (bishop of the Jews). The Jews of England, under the first Norman kings, had over them an officer under this title, licensed by the crown, who judged and ruled them according to their own law.

Episcopus Regionarius, a bishop in the early Church, whose labors were confided to no particular place, but who wandered about from one district to another.

Epísemón (ἐπισέμων, i. e. distinguished), a catalogistic word much used in the Gnostic system of Marcus, and hinted at by several of the early Church fathers.

Epísomène (ἐπισομομένη), a name given by the Cappadocian Christians to Ascension day (q. v.), probably because on that day our salvation was perfected.

Epistemonarch (Gr. ἐπιστεμαναρχ, to know, ἀφικν, a ruler), an officer in the Greek Church, whose duty it is to guard the doctrines of the Church, and to examine all matters relating to faith.

Epistlisthe, the first lesson in the communion service of the Church of England, deriving its name from the circumstance that it is generally taken from the apostolic epistles; though sometimes from the Acts, and occasionally from the Old-Test. writings. The form was derived from that of the Greek and Latin churches, where it was usually denominated the "Apostle." It has been in use in the English Church since the time of Augustine of Canterbury, a period of twelve hundred years. See Hook, Church Diet. s. v.; Staunton, Eccles. Diet. s. v.

Epistler, an ecclesiastical officer mentioned in the canons of the Church of England, and in the injunctions of queen Elizabeth, whose duty it was to read the Epistle in collegiate churches. He was required to be dressed in a cope. The office is now obsolete.

Epistòlē Synodikē, a name sometimes given to circular letters (q. v.), but more generally used to indicate the circular letters by which a primate summoned a council of the Church in ancient times.

Epitrachellon (Gr. ἐπιτραχέλων, and τριακχυμέν, the neck), a vestment of the Greek ecclesiastics, which, instead of being put round the neck like a scarf, is joined at the centre, and has an office left at its upper end that it may be passed over the head. See Solor.

Epomageon, a name given by the natives of Chili, in South America, to the deer, as being strong and powerful.

Epulone, a special order of priests among the ancient Romans. They were first appointed B.C. 198, to preside at the Epulum Jovis (q. v.) and similar feasts, and were usually three in number, although they were at one time supplemented by another ten.

Epulum Jovis (the feast of Jupiter), a festival of the ancient Romans, held in honor of the father of the gods. At these the gods themselves were supposed to be present; for their statues were brought on rich beds, with their pulvinaria or pillows, and placed at the most honorable part of the table as the principal guests. The care of this apparatus belonged to the epulones (q. v.).

Equitio (Lat. equus, a horse), two festivals celebrated by the ancient Romans, the one in February, the other in March, in honor of Mars, the god of war, in which horse-racing was the principal amusement.

Equetius, bishop of Hippo Diarbetus, notorious for his turbulence, against whom the Council of Carthage, A.D. 401, took steps towards a deposition.

Erectias. See Hecaleus.

Ebard (Eberhard), a Bavarian bishop, lived about 679. He was the brother of St. Hilulphus, archbishop of Treves, who appointed him in the administration of his see. He was consecrated originally bishop of Arlash, in Ireland, but finally of Ratisbon, yet without a stationary location. He is often given the title of the Blessed, and is commemorated Jan. 8 (also Jan. 6, Feb. 9, April 14, and Oct. 9). See Hoefer, Nouv. Bioi. Générale, s. v.; Smith, Dict. of Christ. Bioi. s. v.

Erasmus, Stain (commonly called Elmo, also Ermo), was bishop of some see near Antioch, and is said to have returned to Firmie, in Campania, and then to have suffered martyrdom under Diocletian. The acts of this saint, given by the Bollandists, are entirely apocryphal. It is pretended that the body of Erasmus was preserved at Gaeta, with the exception of some parts which were given to the monastery of Mt. Cali at Rome, and some to those of St. Orestes. St. Erasmus is invoked by the sailors on the Mediterranean against tempest and other danger, and for this reason they have given his name to an electric phenomenon which often appears on top of the masts of vessels during a storm. He is also the patron saint against the stomach-ache, on the tradition that he suffered martyrdom by eversion. He is commemorated June 2 (or 3). See Jameson, Sacred and Legendary Art, p. 629.

Erasmus, Johannus, a Dutch theologian, lived in 1598. He was very learned, even according to the testimony of his adversaries. He knew Hebrew well, and had corrected Tremellius and Junius's version of the prophets. Having been appointed rector at Antwerp, he confessed the doctrine of the Unitarians, but William, prince of Orange, prevented his making progress, and obliged him to leave Holland. Erasmus first retired to Poland, and then into Transylvania, where the Unitarians made him minister at Claudiopolis, on the condition, however, that he would not teach that the Son of God was created before all other things. Erasmus gave a great conference on this subject with Faustus Socinus. He went from Claudiopolis to Cracow, and asked permission of the Unitarians to explain his names for not believing "that Jesus Christ was not at all the Son of God before his birth by his mother." Socinus was appointed to answer him. The dispute lasted two days, but ended in the satisfaction of neither party. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Erath, Augustin, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born Jan. 28, 1648, near Augsburg. In 1673 he was appointed professor of theology at Dillingen, and died Sept. 5, 1719. He is the author of many writings, enumerated in Jörcher, Allemannisches Gelehrten Lexicon, s. v. (B. P.)

Brito, in Greek mythology, was one of the nine muses; her songs were so touching and charming that they moved even the most callous hearts to love; hence also her name (fromLogos, love). She is said to have been the first to compose elegiac or plaintive verse. She is generally represented with the lyre on her arm and a plectrum in her hand.

Erikram, Heinrich Wilhelm, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born July 8, 1810, at Eichgrau. For his academic career he prepared himself at the Wittenberg Seminary, and commenced his theological lectures at Berlin in 1838. In 1853 he accepted a call to Königsberg, and died there, Jan. 19, 1863. He is best known as the author of Geschichte der protestantischen Sekten im Zeitalter der Reformation (Hamburg and Gotha, 1848). (B. P.)

Erc (Lat. Hercus) is the name of several Irish saints, the chief of whom was bishop of Slane, of royal descent, who died A.D. 512, aged about ninety years, and is commemorated on Nov. 2.

Erbenhert (or Erchempert), an Italian historian, was descended from the dukes of Benevento. The castle of Pilata, where he resided with his father, Adelgare, was taken in August, 881, by Pandonulf, count of Capua, and Erchenhert was carried away a prisoner, but escaped and took the habit of a monk at the request of the benefactors of Monte Cassino. At the age of twenty-four he was elected abbot of a convent near Rome; but was driven from it by Arnulf, and returned for the rest of his days to his cell. He wrote a Chronicle, an extended history of the Lombardia, which is believed to be lost, although an abridged edition, from 774 to 989, as a continuation of the work of Paul Diaconus, was published by Antonio Caracciolo (Naples, 1626); by Camillo Pergirgin, in his Historia Principum Longobodorum, etc. (ibid. 1643). There is also attributed to Erchenhert, De Destructione et Renovatione Caesarum Civitatis Romanae, De Immediatis Inscriptionibus, De Lege Donad. I, Epistola Cypari, extending from 851 to 879, in verse: Acta Translatum Corporis St. Matheei, Apostol. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Breant (or Erenat), an Irish saint, commemorated Jan. 8 and Oct. 30, was a virgin of Duncan, A.D. 460, who died, it is said, of love for St. Benignus, but received and spent her days in preparing and embroidering sacred vestments.

Eraviraph, an impostor who flourished in Persia in the 8d century, and was considered the real restorer of the doctrines of the Magi. He professed to have fallen into a deep sleep, during which his soul made the journey to paradise, being seven days on the way.

Erabus (loso, darkness), in Greek mythology, is the infernal region, the subterranean, chaotic night; being represented as son of Chaos and Caligo. Erabus does not seem to be identical with Tartarus. His descendants are the following, by Night: Age, Death, Fate, Planets, Earth, Epithus, Erato, Lacon, Alcmena, Eupros, the three Parcae, Dispute, Evil, Malice, Nemesis, Euphrosyne, Friendship, Sympathy, Styx, and Sleep.

Eremburt, Saint, eleventh bishop of Toulouse, was born at Villiécilicoire, near Poissy. He became a monk in 618 at the abbey of Fontenelle, which then was directed by Wandregisius. Being appointed by Clothaire III to the see of Toulouse, about 656, he governed it twelve years with prudence, and then resigned, and dwelt for some time at his native home, but finally retired to the monastery of Fontenelle, where he died in 671 or 678. He is commemorated May 14. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Erendiganus, Rivo, a Swiss theologian, lived in the second part of the 17th century. He was a Capuchin, and defiriter and provincial of his order. He wrote, Manutulcct Scurdarotus (Lucerne, 1674):—Coenadurnm Spirituale (ibid. 1680):—Revelationes S. Bri ginus (ibid. 1699):—Speculam Animatum Thomas de Kempis (ibid. eod.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Brevant, Melchisedec (i.e. Melchizedech of Erivan), an Armenian doctor, was born in 1559 at Vejan. He early devoted himself to monastical life, and after studying under the famous doctor Nerses Pehkhw about fifteen years, left his monastery, which was situated in the island of Lim, in the centre of the lake of Van, in order to visit Armenia. He planted a great number of institutions of education, and returned to his monastery. The patriarch, Moses III, sent him out again as director of the patriarchal school of Echmiadzin. He died at Erivan in 1631, leaving several MSS. on grammatical, rhetorical, and philosophical subjects. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Ergas, Joseph ben-Immanuel, a Jewish rabbi, who flourished at Leghorn in the 18th century, is the author of Kedushat ha-B创新发展, a Philologian of Reyputation and Caba list, written in the form of a dialogue (Amsterdam, 1736):—טנ-ז מ' ריקק יכדרה, Introduction to the Science of the True Cabala (ibid.):—a collection of decisions, ר' מ' יכדרה דג (Leghorn, 1742). See Furst, Bibl. Jud. I, 247; Jörcher, Allemannisches Gelehrten Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Erbhard, Thomas Aquinas, a German theologian of the order of the Benedictines, who lived in the first part of the 18th century, wrote, Gloria S. Benedicti (Augsburg, 1720):—Opus Rhetoricon:—Die Bibel Latinsch und Deutsch (ibid. 1726):—Manuale Bibliorum (1724):—Polycratea Germanica, etc. (1729):—Commentaria in Universem Bibliam (Augsburg, 1733):—De Institutiones Christi (about 1739):—Concordianum Bibliorum Wessenfontana (Augsburg, 1751). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Eribert, archbishop of Milan, A.D. 1015, took a prominent part in the intrigues that then divided Italy. He was a notorius warm supporter of the emperors and of the House of the Hohenstaufen, which subsisted till 1570. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Erie of Brandenburg, twenty-sixth archbishop of Magdeburg, was son of John I, elector of Brandenburg, and was elected in 1728. He had a stormy administr-

Eris (Ipg, strif), in Greek mythology, was the personification of Discord, the daughter of Night. When the deities were merrily assembled at the wedding of Peleus and Thetis, Eris threw an apple among them, bearing the inscription "To the most beautiful." Juno, Venus, and Minerva claimed it. Had Jupiter decided in favor of one he would have incurred the bitter enmity of the others, and hence he refused to announce his opinion; therefore Paris was authorized to decide. Paris, a man of unreckoning, wisdom and fame, offered by the nearest goddesses, had no influence with him; for Venus promised him the most beautiful woman of Greece as a possession. That goddess therefore received the prize of beauty; Paris carried off Helena, the Trojan war was the result, and all the deities took part in it: Juno and Minerva as enemies of the Trojans; Venus, Apollo, and Mars on the side of those against whom war was made.

Erskenwald, the fourth bishop of the East Saxons, whose episcopal see was London, was brother of St. Ethelburga, and is said to have been born at Stallington, in Lindsey, of a noble family. From Bede we learn that he was already noted for sanctity when raised to the episcopate in 676. He died in 690, and is commemorated April 30 as the founder of St. Paul's (where his remains were interred), and also of one or two monasteries.

Erkligt, in Greenland mythology, are the spirits of war, living on the east side of the country, cruel, and enemies of man. They are represented as large men with animal heads. Probably this superstition came from an ancient tradition, which gives to the northern coast of Greenland very warlike inhabitants, who sometimes pressed to all parts of the island in plundering and devastating expeditions, and destroyed all living beings.

Erkling, in Norse mythology, is probably akin to Elfr, the ruler of the ethereal beings which are called elves (q. v.). He is not a dangerous person, but often abducts children of Christians before they are baptized, not from any evil motive, but because he takes a great joy in them, and because the elves generally glory in coming into contact with human beings. He is represented as an unusually large, bearded man, with a shining crown and a wide, trailing mantle.

Erlørnsworth, in Greenland mythology, is the ruler of the air, the evil principle. He is cruel and cunning; waylaying those who are on the way to heaven, and lives on their vitals, which he tears from them.

Ermelindis (or Hermelinda), Saint, was born at Arles, near Lyons, about 550. She was of a rich family of Brabant, and was but twelve years old when she resolved to consecrate herself to God. Some time later her parents tried to induce her to marry, but she cut off her own hair in their presence and hid herself in the solitude of the vicinity. She only left her cell, with bare feet, when she assisted at the divine services. Two young men, brothers, and lords of the place, having designs upon her chastity, Ermelindis retired to a more secluded place called Meldris (now Meldarta), near Hugard (Brabant), and subsisted there on fruits and herbs till her death, about A.D. 611. Forty-eight years afterwards her obscure tomb was discovered, and a chapel was erected over it, which has since perished. She is commemorated on Oct. 29. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog., s. v.

Ermenare (Hermariant), twenty-sixth bishop of Autun, A.D. 678, piously buried the mutilated remains of his predecessor, St. Leger.

Ermenfrid, abbot of Cuisance, in Franche-Comté, entered monastic life, about 627, at Luxeuil; and coming into possession, by inheritance, of the monastery at Cuisance, restored it, and died there in old age. He is commemorated on Sept. 25. See Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog., s. v.

Ermen (also Mermoc), the name of several Irish saints, one of whom was uncle, and two others nephews, of St. Columba.

Ernest of Saxony, forty-first archbishop of Magdeburg, was elected to that see Jan. 19, 1476; but the pope stipulated that he should consecrate him, and he had a long contest with Archbishop Michael of Anhalt and the citizens of Magdeburg before he secured quiet possession of the see. He died Aug. 8, 1513. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Ernest, Günter Gottlieb, an Evangelical preacher of Germany, was born June 25, 1739, at Coburg. He was reared at Jena, for some time employed by the minister for ecclesiastical affairs at Hildburghausen, and died there, June 28, 1797, being court-preacher at the time. Most of his publications were sermons. See Döring, Die Gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, s. v. (B. P.)

Ernest, Heinrich Friedrich Theodor Ludwig, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born May 27, 1814, at Brunswick. He studied at Göttingen; was in 1838 deacon at his native place, in 1842 pastor at Wolfenbüttel, in 1843 superintendent, in 1850 member of the consistory, and in 1858 general superintendent, and died at Wolfenbüttel, Aug. 17, 1880. He published Exposition of Luther's Smaller Catechism (1861), which is used in many places as the official manual for religious instruction. He also wrote, Ur sprung der Sünde nach Paulinischen Lehrbegriff (Göttingen, 1862, 2 vols.): —Die Ethik des Apostels Paulus (6th ed. ibid. 1890). His earliest work was De Prudentia Christi in Apostoli Instituti Suprientia atque Prudentia (ibid. 1884). See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol., i, 882 sqq. (B. P.)

Ernest, Jakob Daniel, a German Protestant theologian, was born at Rochitz, Dec. 8, 1640. He studied till the age of fifteen under his father, Daniel, and at Leipzig and Altenburg. In 1663, minister of the gospel at Ebytsch, rector at the gymnasium of Altenburg in 1678, deacon in 1688, archdeacon in 1688, and finally consistorial assessor in 1705. He died Dec. 10, 1707. His principal works are, Prodomus Apanachismatum (Altenburg, 1672): —Selecta Historiae Episcoporum infantum (ibid. 1690). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Ernest, Johann Christian, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Feb. 18, 1695. He studied at Wittenberg and Leipsic, and died superintendent in Langensalza, in 1770. A list of his writings is given in Jocher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lehzikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Ernest, Johann Heinrich Martin, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Nov. 26, 1755, at Mitttwitz, near Cronach, and died at Coburg, May 10, 1836. He wrote, Irene. (Sitzbach, 1828): —Uber Censor- und Bücherbörse, etc. (Leipsic, 1829): —Der Kirchen-Staat (Nuremberg, 1830). See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol., i, 888; Winer, Handbuch der theolog. Lit. ii, 610; ii, 391, 382. (B. P.)

Eromanian Version of the Scriptures. This language is spoken in the island of Eromanga, one of the New Hebrids group. The version of Luke's gospel, which was published in 1844, was begun by the Rev. N. Gordon, who was cruelly massacred by the natives in 1846. The work was completed by his brother, the Rev. James I. The latter has since translated the book of Genesis, which was printed at Sydney in 1868, and was followed by Matthew's gospel in 1868, at London. In 1876 the Acts of the Apostles, which were translated by the Rev. H. A. Robertson, were published at the request of the New Hebrides mission at Sydney. These are at present the only parts of the Scripture translated into this language. (B. P.)

Erovas, grand priest to the gods of Armenia. He was the brother of Erovari II, who intrusted him with the direction of the supreme national council, and also placed in his care the fortress of Pazaran, the ecclesiastical capital of Armenia. Sempad the Parastrid, who had taken possession of that place after the death of Erovan, drowned Erovas in the river Akhouriann, A.D. 80, and took away his treasures and his five hundred slaves. See Hoer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Erskine, Charles, a cardinal of Scotch descent, was born at Rome, Feb. 13, 1738. After entering the profession of a lawyer when still quite young, he attained a rare knowledge of Latin and philosophy, and was honored by Pius VI, who himself had been a lawyer. During the French revolution, Erskine was sent on an embassy to London by that pontiff, remained there for eight years, and when he came back to Italy under Pius VII received the cardinal's hat. When afterwards he went to Paris he was welcomed by the consular government. Erskine died March 19, 1811. See Hoer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Erskine (or Araskine), Henry, a Scotch divine, one of the youngest of the thirty-three children of Ralph Erskine of Shiefeld, was born at Dryburgh in 1624, where he received his early education. He took his master's degree at the University of Edinburgh in 1645, was ordained to the ministry by the Presbyterianists in England, to the living at Cornhill, in Durham, but was soon ejected by the act of uniformity, in 1682, and returned to his own country. But the persecutions carried on in Scotland required him to take refuge in Holland. In 1687, when king James's toleration was pronounced in Holland; and in 1691, on the re-establishment of the presbytery in 1689, he was appointed minister of Chirnside, in Berwickshire. He died Aug. 10, 1696. He never published any of his works. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Fasi Eccl. Scot., 1, 427, 451.

Erskine (or Erskyn), John, a Scotch clergyman, of Dun, knight, son of John Erskyne, of Dun, was born about 1598; studied first at the University of Aberdeen, then on the Continent. Having imbued the doctrines of the Reformation, he taught them to the son of Alexander Stratton, a neighbor who paid the forfeit of his life for his opinions, at Edinburgh, in August, 1534. He led many other persons to embrace the new principles, and secured for them safety and protection. When the English invaded Montrose, in 1548, Erskine supported by his townspeople, resisted them with a loss of eight hundred of the invaders. He lived a retired life till John Knox appeared, in 1555, when he joined him at Edinburgh, took part with his followers in their public services, and was coadjutor with Knox till a succession took place. He was one of the eight appointed by parliament, in 1557, to witness the marriage of the queen with the dauphin of France. On his return, in 1558, he assisted in forming a Church of the Reformation, became an exhorter, drew up an address to the queen dowager against the Romanists, with whose dissimulations, in 1559, the people at Perth became so enraged that they attacked the monasteries, and cast down the images, sparing only the places of worship through the influence of Erskine and Knox. He was nominated by the lords and barons, in July, 1560, the first minister at Montrose under the Reformation, sat in the first General Assembly, 1560, and was appointed superintendent of James VI and Mary, in 1561. Of the fifty-six General Assemblies, he attended in the capacity of the moderator over five of them, three times in succession. He was a member of the convention at Leith in 1561: had to summon princes, and three regents of the university, and try them for teaching popery, in 1567 and 1568, and on their refusal to accept the new faith they were deprived by the privy council. He several times offered his resignation, which was always declined, and he died March 12, 1588, having been secular only to Knox in accomplishing and securing the work of the Reformation. He governed his portion of the Church with singular wisdom and authority, disallowing all innovations. He was a man of courage, zeal, learning, prudence, generosity, and liberality. He compiled and published part of the Second Book of Discipline. See Fasi Eccl. Scot., iii, 387.

Erskine, Thomas, of Linlathen, Scotland, a writer on theology and politics, was born Oct. 13, 1727. After being educated at the high-school of Edinburgh and at Durham, he attended the literary and law classes of the University of Edinburgh, and in 1810 became a member of the Edinburgh faculty of advocates. On the death of his elder brother, in 1816, he succeeded to the family estate of Linlathen, near Dunde, and retired from the bar, spending the remainder of his life in the discussion—either by conversation, by letters, or by literary publications—of the most important religious questions. He died at Edinburgh, March 20, 1870. His principal works are, Remarks on the Internal Evidence for the Truth of Revealed Religion (1820)—an Essay on Faith (1822); and the Unconditional Freedom of the Gospel (1828). These have all passed through several editions, and have also been translated into French. He also wrote, The Crucifer Serpent (1861)—The Doctrine of Election (1868)—a posthumous work entitled Spiritual Order and Other Papers (1871), and various essays. Two volumes of his Letters, edited by William Hanna, D.D., with reminiscences by dean Stanley and principal Shairp, appeared in 1877. See Encyclop. Brit. 9th ed. s. v.

Erskine, William, a Scotch nominal prelate, was minister of Campsay and commendator of Paisley. He was a titular bishop of Glasgow in 1385, but was never consecrated. He held the office but two years. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 262.

Erthal, Franz Ludwig von, a German prelate, was born at Lohr-on-the-Main, Sept. 16, 1730. He studied law at Wurzburg, and when thirty-three years of age became a member of the chapter there. The emperor Joseph II appointed to his house the several high positions, and in 1779 he was made prince-bishop of Bamberg and Wurzburg. His government was in every respect an excellent one. He died Feb. 16, 1795, leaving, Zeit und Eiicht der Christen (Wurzburg, 1728) in Latin, and Ich und der Mensch (Boppard, 1747). Erwin, Alexander R., D.D., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Louisiana, Jan. 12, 1820, of pious Baptist parents. He joined the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1850; was licensed to preach in 1848, and in 1842 entered the Tennessee Conference. In 1848 he was appointed president of Clarksville Female Academy; in 1854 re-entered the regular work; in 1859 was appointed president of Huntingville Female College, and died Jan. 10, 1890. Dr. Erwin was a manly and dignified in appearance, humble and cheerful in spirit, extensive in knowledge, and energetic in labor. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M.E. Church South, 1890, p. 212.

Brythraeus, Joschim (1), a Lutheran theologian, was born Dec. 19, 1837, at Bela, in Upper Hungary. He studied at Wittenberg, and was for some time archdeacon in his native county. When the local preachers were dismissed from Hungary, he went to Poland, and was appointed pastor at Stettin, where he died, March 21, 1859. He wrote, Dissert. de Attributis Dei; Synopsis Biblica; Sido Liggio Scriptura; Brevisarium Biblicum; Apologiae Sacrae; Expositio Com

EBSIAS OF EGYPT, who lived about the end of the 4th century, was abbot of some monastery in that country, and left a large number of MSS., nearly all in Greek. Anamnsi compiles some in Arabic and Syrian, but these are probably translations from the Greek. Several have been published, viz., Chapters on the Aesthetic and Quiet Life (Kephalas kepia deinosias kai hymnos), in Gregorius of Nyssa, in the Theoricae Quaestorae of Peter Porsin (Paris, 1684); Processus seu Concilii Postica Tironumius (Augsburg, 1759); Orivtonios, a Latin translation of twenty-nine discourses, or rather apothegms, published by Franc. Zini, with other asceretical writings by St. Nilus and other theologians (Veince, 1574); Dubitaciones in Vieinon Exegetica, in MS. in the royal library of the Escorial in Spain, has been described by Montfaucon, but has not been printed. It is doubtful if all these works are by the same author, as there may have been several writers of this name in Egypt. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s. v.; Smith, Dict. of Christ. ESCHERICH, ANDREAS CHRISTIAN, a German divine and philologist, was born at Nuremberg, March 24, 1663, and was educated at Altdorf, where, in 1684, he received the poetic crown. He went to Jena and taught the classics with considerable reputation. He travelled through Germany and Holland, and on his return assisted his father in the Church of Weehd, in Nurember-

g. In 1691 he was appointed inspector of the schools of Altdorf, and in 1696 was recalled to Nuremberg as dean of the Church of St. Mary, and professor of elocuence, poetry, history, and the Greek language in St. Gile's College, to which office, in 1705, was added that of pastor of St. Clare. He died Sept. 24, 1722. Some of his philological dissertations were printed in 1700, in the Syntagma Secundum Dissertationum Philologicarum (Rotterdam, 8vo.). His Epitome eis Commentariis in Fragmenta Orphica, was published at Nuremberg (1702, 4to.). He translated into German, Allix on The Truth of the Christian Religion, and On The Coming of the Messiah. ESCHRITKES (enlightened), a Mohammedan sect who give themselves to contemplation. Their meditations pertain chiefly to God, whom they, unlike the other Mohammedans, believe to be a trinity of persons. Wherever the Koran conflicts with their doc-

tines they consider it abrogated. They hold in much greater contempt the gross notions of Mohammed, con-erning the sensual pleasures of paradise, and consider man's supreme happiness to consist in the contemplation of divinity. It is one of the most respectable of the Mohammedan sects, resembling more nearly than any other, both in faith and practice, ordinary Christians.

ESCOBAR (del Curro), JUAN, a Spanish theologian, was born at Puente de Cantos (Andalusia); taught law with success at the College of Santa Maria and at the University of Seville; became afterwards inquisitor at Malaga, but was dismissed from that office in 1518, leaving, De Pristata Sancti Officii Inquisitionis, etc. (Lyons, 1657): — De Uroque Foro (Cordova, 1642): — De Confessarum, etc. (ibid. cod.): — De Frua Cumunicia (ibid. cod.): — Autilogia, etc. (ibid. cod.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

ESCOBAR, MARINA de, a Spanish foundress of religious orders, was born at Valladolid, Feb. 8, 1554. Although the daughter of rich parents, she refused marriage. She had visions very frequently, in which Sts. Gertrude, Brigitta, and Mathilda appeared to her. In 1582 a number of women desired to share her mode of living, and retired under her guidance to a monastery, to which she gave the name of Recolección de St. Hrudgel. She died June 9, 1633. Her Life, begun by P. Del Puente, was finished by P. Cachupin, the provincial of the Jesuits of Castile (Madrid, 1665). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

ESCOCER PEDRO SUARES DE, a Spanish theologian, was born at Medina; belonged to the order of the Hermits of St. Augustine, and went into Spanish America, preaching the Catholic faith in Mexico. He became successively first theologian of the cathedral of that city, prefect of the province, and bishop of Guadalupe. He died at Tlaxcapan in 1581, leaving, Ex- cata del Purgatorio Celestial: — Silica de la Perfeccion Eclesiastica: — Reduz de Principios: — Sermones de los Evangelios de Todo el Año (Madrid, 1601). EDRANS [Armen. Etr or Estris], catholics or uni- versal patriarch of Armenia, was born at Parhajin- guard (in the province of Ararat). He was educated from his childhood at the patriarchal palace, and after having filled the office of doorkeeper to St. Gregory the Illuminator, was elected to succeed the patriarch Chris- topher III, who died A.D. 628. A short time after that the emperor Heraclius, on his return from his expedi- tion against Chosroes II, king of Persia, stopped at Gare, on his march from Palmyra to the Eupha- rimus, and undertook to unite the Armenian Church with the Greek. To this end he tried to conciliate the feelings of the Armenians who had submitted to his rule. He gave them as governor-general a very popular person, the monk Pard. He treated the patriarch with distinction, and gave him a part of the city of Gogh. At the order of the emperor, Edrians called together a council (A.D. 629) in the city of Gare, where a great number of bishops, doctors (ver- table), and Armenian princes, likewise several Greek doctors, came together. During the conference of one month, the reunion of the two churches was decreed. The Council of Chalcedon was recognised as the fourth General Council, and it was concluded that the feast of the nativity of Jesus Christ is to be celebrated separately from that of his baptism. Most of the Pevor-Armenian bishops adhered to the decisions of the council. Many of the theologians who had attached themselves to the anathematized doctrines received Edrians very coldly when he came back to Tefin, the seat of his administration, Ctesiphon, he loudly disapproved of his last acts. The chief of this party, John Malargometi, was ill-treated by order of the patriarch and sent into exile as a here-etic. Edrians died in 689, of sorrow, it is said. He has been sufficiently judged by his compatriots; the historia- nian John VI Catholics and Michael Asori (or the Syrian) call him ignorant, while the Armenians unitedly reverence him as a saint. During his time Armenia was ravaged by the Arabs, who massacred thirty thou- sand people in the city of Tefin. Nerses III, bishop of Dailk, succeeded Edrians. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

EBER, HANS, a Dutch theologian and heliast, was born at Amsterdam, Jan. 2, 1596. He was preacher at Ost- and Wester-Blocker, at Naarden, Middelburg, and finally at Amsterdam. In 1753 he was called as professor of Hebrew antiquities at Leyden, where he had been teaching theology before, and died there in 1756. He was the author of the same year, leaving, Monis Maiormidis Constitutio de Sigilla (Leyden, 1767): — Oratio de Supremo Ecclesiae Doctore (ibid. 1740): — De Reprimine Ecclesiae (ibid. 1741): — De Pontifical Theologia (ibid. 1751). ESORA

ESORA (Judith; e. 4) is thought by Lieut. Conder (Teni Work in Palestine, i, 386; comp. Qvar. Statement of the Pal. Explor. Fund, January, 1891, p. 82) to be the present "village of Esora," on the south side of the Orontes, near of Nabi-bout, but not noticed in the Memoirs accompanying the Survey.

Epaphroditus, a Latin name, was born in Martinos de las Posadas (old Castile), in 1602. He studied civil and canonical law, which he taught when very young at Cuenca; then became auditor at Seville, and director of the royal council of Navarre. Philip II appointed him some time treasurer of certain provinces. He was a great friend of Loyola and most influential in the settlement of the negotiations and affairs of Italy, and finally bishop of Siguenza. In 1568 Epaphroditus received the cardinal's hat. In the exercise of his high functions he was remarkable for his equal severity against iniquitous judges and heretics. He died Sept. 5, 1572. See Hefner, Novus. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Esperance (Lat. Esperaros), Charles de', a French theologian, was born at Depeña in 1591; became pastor at Andorra in 1629, but soon went to France, where he died, April 25, 1598, leaving English translations of some small treatises, especially Les Erreurs Populaires en Points de la Religion, etc. (La Haye, 1639) — La Manuduction du Corps de Christ (ibid. 1640) — L'Usage duouverte Dominicales (Lond. 1646). See Hefner, Novus. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Espece (Lat. Esperus), Charles de', a French theologian, was born of noble parents at Châlons-sur-Marne, in 1611, and became a doctor of the Sorbonne and rector of the University of Paris. Cardinal de Lorraine employed him in various important missions. Cardinal de Richelieu engaged him to assist in the preparation of the Livre de L'Oratoire et de l'Oratoire du Pape, in 1656, and at the Conference of Poissy in 1651. He died Oct. 5, 1571, leaving, Institution d'un Prince Christien (Lyons, 1569) — Traité des Observances Catholiques — Des Commentaires sur les Épitres de Saint-Paul à Timothée et à Titus, full of long discussions on hierarchy and ecclesiastical discipline; also several controversial treatises, some in French and others in Latin. All these were collected at Paris in 1619. See Hefner, Novus. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Espinac, Pierre de', a French prelate, born early in the 16th century, was the son of Pierre d'Espinac, lieutenant of the king in Burgundy. He became canon, dean of the Church of Lyons, and finally archbishop there, after the death of his uncle, Antoine d'Albon, in 1574. The clergy chose him as their orator in the assembly of Bôis, and he became chief of the deputation of the Catholics at the celebrated deputation of Suresnes. He died Jan. 9, 1599, leaving, besides addresses on the above occasions, Exhortation au Peuple de Lyon (1588) — Un Hymne — Des Poesies Françoises (not printed). See Hefner, Novus. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Espinay, Charles de', a French bishop, born of an ancient family of Brittany about 1530, became commendatory abbot of Tronchet, of St. Gildas du Bois, and prior of Galhard and de Bécérel, was appointed in 1558 bishop of Dol, but before being consecrated assisted at the Council of Trent. He was active in the ecclesiastical troubles of his time, and died in September, 1591. See Hefner, Novus. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Espinay, Jacques de', a French prelate, was apostolic prothonotary of the holy see, and succeeded by his intrigues in being appointed bishop of St. Malo, Jan. 9, 1496. Nicholas V transferred him, March 16 following, to the see of Rennes, but the duc of Brittany, Pierre II, violently opposed these changes. In the end, Espinay was deprived even of his patrimony, and although suffering from the gout was confined in a prison, where he died, Jan. 9, 1422. See Hefner, Novus. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Espinel, Vickert, a Spanish writer and ecclesiastic, was born at Ronda, in the province of Granada, about 1551. He was educated at Salamanca, and served as a soldier in Flanders. His ecclesiastical position seems to have been that of chaplain at Ronda, but he resided chiefly at Cordoba. He died about 1604. See Hefner, Novus. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Estella, Dirk de', a Spanish ascetic writer, was born at Estella in 1524. After studying at the universities of Salamanca and Salamanca, he entered the monastic life, and gained the confidence of Philip II, who iclever, consulting with his theologian. He died Aug. 1, 1578, leaving De La Vida del Evangelista San Juan.
Estes, Daniel Gordon, D.D., a Protestant Episcopalian clergyman, graduated from the General Theological Seminary; ordained in St. Louis, Mo., in 1853, and in the following year became rector. In 1857 he resided in Amherst, Mass.; subsequently became rector of St. James's Church in that place, and continued to serve that parish until 1872. He died Aug. 9, 1873, aged fifty-three years. Estouville, Guillaume, a French prelate, was born before 1403. He studied at the University of Paris. Entered early the Benedictine order, and was raised to the highest dignity, being successively bishop of Mauvise, Digne, Beziers, Ossa, Velletri, and Port-Sainte-Belle. He was also archbishop of Rouen. He had, among other abbeys, those of St. Owen de Rouen, of Jumieges, of Montebourg, and of Mont St. Michel, together with the priories of St. Martin-des-Champs, at Paris, Grand Pré, and Beaumont en Auge (Normandy). In 1437 he was made cardinal-priest by Eugenius IV, with the title of San Martino de Monte Monti. He lived in Rome under Nicholas V, and took part in the election of that pontiff. In 1477 Sixtus IV appointed him chamberlain of the Church of Rome. D'Estouville died dean of the sacred college, Dec. 22, 1483. He bestowed his immense wealth on several ecclesiastical and literary institutions. See Hofer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a.v.

Estrees, César d', a French prelate, was born at Paris, Feb. 5, 1626. When quite young he was appointed bishop of Lyon. Louis XIV charged him several times with negotiations, in which showed a profound knowledge of the affairs of the Church and of those of the State. D'Estrees obtained the cardinal's hat in 1674. In 1680 he resigned the bishopric of Lyon in favor of his nephew, and went to Rome on public affairs. He was eventually made abbot of St. Germain-des-Près, and died dean of the French Academy, Dec. 18, 1714. See Hofer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a.v.

Estrees, Jean d', a French prelate, was born in 1666, and became abbot of St. Claude. Louis XIV went on an embassy to Portugal in 1692, and finally to Spain in 1703. In January 1716, he was appointed archbishop of Cambrai, and died March 8, 1718, without being consecrated. See Hofer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a.v.

Etam. The rock thus designated in the account of Samson's exploits (Judg. xv) is regarded by Lieut. Conder (Quart. Statement of "The Pal. Explor. Fund," Jan. 1875, p. 12) as the remarkable chasm or cave near the present Beit-A dib, eight miles west by north from Beersheba, and described in the Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey (iii. 23) as a cavern some two hundred and fifty feet long, with an average height of fire to eight feet and a width of about eighteen feet, entered at the end by a vertical shaft called "the well," six by fire feet wide and twenty feet deep. The village is a small one, standing on a bare knoll of rock some sixty to one hundred feet above the surrounding ridge, with cisterns to the houses, and a few traces of antiquity. The place is in the vicinity of Samson's adventures, and the identification is accepted by Tristram (Bible Places, p. 48).

Etam of Sinimen (1 Chron. iv, 32) will in that case be a different place, for which Lieut. Conder suggests (True Work in Palæst. ii, 386) the present ruin Ailaun, laid down on the Ordnance Map at eight miles south by east from Beit-Jibrin, and described in the accompanying Memoirs (iii, 278) as "a mound with foundations; a square cell is cut in the rock opposite the ruin on the south."

Etam of Judah (2 Chron. xi, 6), as still different, has been confirmed at Wady Urtas by the recovery of the name in Ain-Aidin, a spring on the hillside, south-east of the pools of Solomon (el-Buraks), one of the four that feed the reservoirs (Memoria to the Ordnance Survey, iii, 90).

Ettampes-Valenay, Achille d', a French prelate and general, was born at Tours in 1589. He was for a long time a valiant captain of the Knights of Malta. At the siege of Montauban he attracted the attention of Louis XIII, who assigned him a company of cavalry in his regiment. After the capture of La Rochelle, where he commanded as vice-admiral, he became major-general. Immediately after the restoration of peace he returned to Malta. Pope Urban VIII charged him with the command of the pontifical troops against the duke of Parma, and as a reward gave him the cardinal's hat. The new prelate showed as much vigor in the council as he had at the head of the army. He was involved in a contest between Mazarin and the court of Rome. He died in that city in 1646. See Hofer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a.v.

Ettampes-Valenay, Léon d', a French prelate and theologian, brother of the preceding, was born about 1585. He entered the ministry, and obtained, while quite young, the abbey of Bourgueil-en-Vallassé, which he represented as deputy to the Estates-general of 1614. In 1620 he succeeded his cousin Philippe Hurault in the see of Chartres, and in 1647 was transferred to the archiepiscopate of Rheims. He introduced himself in the assembly of the clergy of 1636 by maintaining the royal authority. He died at Paris in 1651, leaving a poem in Latin, in honor of the Virgin (Paris, 1695) : a Ritual, for the diocese of Chartres (ibid. 1637). See Hofer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a.v.

Etchen (Echeus, or Etlan), commemorated Feb. 11 in the Irish and Scotch calendars, was bishop of Clunia-foina, in Meath, of royal descent, originally a physician. He seems to have been born cir. A.D. 490, to have lived on the borders of Osmary, and died A.D. 578.

Eternâla, a Christian sect, supposed to have arisen about A.D. 260, deriving their name from their belief in the eternity of the world. They maintained that the earth will continue in its present state, even after the resurrection of the dead.

Ethelbert. (1) Saint, king of the East-Angeles, beheaded in 792 (rather 794) by order of Offa, king of Mercia, and was buried May 3, as the son of Hereford. (2) Saint, martyred with his brother, St. Ethelred, at the court of their cousin Egbert, king of Kent, in the 7th century, and commemorated on Oct. 17. (3) Archbishop of York (called also Adelberht, and usually Albert), a kinsman and pupil of archbishop Egbert, and the teacher of Alcuin, was consecrated to the see April 24, 767, and in 773 pope Adrian sent him the pallium. He made an excellent archbishop, continuing his fraternal habits, and devoting himself to the interests of the Church. In 772 he appointed Fairbald bishop of London, and died at York, Nov. 8, 781 or 782. (4) Bishop of Withern, in Galloway, consecrated June 10, 777; died Oct. 16, 797.

Ethelburga is the name of several early English abbesses, one of whom is especially entitled saint. She was sister to Erikenwald, bishop of London; was by him appointed first abbess of the monastery at Barking, Essex, which he built and endowed. Here she led a very austere life, and died in 676. She is commemorated on Oct. 11.

Ethelgar, archbishop of Canterbury, was educated at Glastonbury, where he was a favorite pupil. In 964 he was appointed abbot of Newminster at Winchester, and on May 2, 986, he was consecrated to the see of Selby.
For more than eight years Ethelgar was bishop of Selsey. In 588 he was translated to the see of Canterbury. All hopes and expectations seem to have been disappointed by his death, Dec. 3, 589. See Hook, Lives of the Bps. of Canterbury, i. 428 sq.

Ethelhard, archbishop of Canterbury, does not seem to have figured in history until his consecration to that see, July 21, 739. His first public act was to assist in nominating representatives to attend the council which the emperor Charles had called to assemble at Frankfort, one of the most important councils ever held in the West. His administration was one of success and satisfaction to his people. He was especially instrumental in securing, in 802, the pope's recognition of the sovereign right of the Church. He died May 12, 805. See Hook, Lives of the Bps. of Canterbury, i. 255 sq.; Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. a. v.

Ethelnoth, archbishop of Canterbury, was the son of Egelmear, the earl, and was a Glastonbury man. He obtained the grant of additional privileges for the monastery from Canute, and is reported to have written its history. He was first dean of Canterbury, then dean of Canterbury, and chaplain to Canute, the king. Other preceptors he declined until a vacancy occurred in the see of Canterbury. In 1020 the see was vacant, and Ethelnoth was nominated by the king as primate of England. Having settled his affairs in Canterbury, he hastened to Rome, as a temporary solution, and proceeded to Rome in 1022, where he was received with distinction by Benedict VIII. From Rome he went to Pavia to visit the tomb of St. Augustine of Hippo. Ethelnoth seems to have been a church restorer. He repaired all the churches, and churches which his predecessors had only patched over. He displayed both firmness and discretion during his administration. He died in October, 1038. See Hook, Lives of the Bps. of Canterbury, i. 476 sq.

Ethelred, archbishop of Canterbury, is said to have been bishop of Winchelsea before his appointment to Canterbury in 670. He was educated as the monastery of St. Augustine. After his appointment to the see, he went immediately to Rome for the pallium, as was required in those days. During Ethelred's administration it is said that Cænellea came to Canterbury to be consecrated by him to the see of Lambeth. This plainly shows that the spiritual supremacy of the English Church already extended, at least, over the south-eastern part of Wales. In the episcopate of Ethelred, the same Church gave proof of its revived energy, by opening a correspondence with the Christians of the far East, especially with those then existing in India. These things occurred towards the close of Ethelred's life. He was cordial in his co-operation with the king, and took many steps towards the reformation of the Church. To him also is due, at least, the merit of carrying into effect the will of the sovereign. He died in 689. See Hook, Lives of the Bps. of Canterbury, i. 298 sq.

Ethelwold (Lat. Æthelwald), bishop of Lindisfarne, cir. 724-740, was originally a servant under St. Cuthbert, and afterwards abbot of Melrose, and lived through many vicissitudes in those days of peril. He is commemorated on Feb. 12.

Ether is identified by lieutenant Conder (Tenn. Work in Palestine, ii. 836) with a ruined site, el-Atr, one mile north-west of Beit-Jibrin; but it is doubtful if the territory of Simeon extended so far north. Van de Velde's Tell Athan, "a little to the northeast of Beer-sheba," which is adopted by Tristram (Bible Places, p. 42), does not appear on the Ordnance Map.

Ethiopian Monks. Monasticism spread rapidly up the Nile into Ethiopia, and gained as strong a hold there as in Egypt or Syria, if not a stronger. All the monasteries in Ethiopia professed to obey the so-called "Rule of Antony," but with different observances. An attempt at reformation, such as invariably recurs in the life of a monastic order, was made in the 7th century; Tecla-Haimanot being the second founder or Benedict of Ethiopian monasticism. He endeavored to consolidate the system under a superior-general, second in ecclesiastical rank only to the patriarch of Ethiopia, who was to visit and inspect the monasteries personally or by proctor. Several of them, however, preferred to retain their independence, like Congregationalists. Monks swarmed in Ethiopia long after the first fervor of asceticism; and the congregation of the Ethiopian Church was monastic. The story of a military order of monks, like the knight-templar, originating in the 4th century, is purely fabulous. See Helyot, Dict. des Ordres Religieux, ii. 222 sq.

Ethnophrœnés (from Ἐθνοφρόν, a nation, and φοβίσω, to think), a name sometimes applied to the heretics of the 7th century, who sought to combine pagan customs and ceremonies with Christianity.

Etaba, a dignitary of the Aboriginal Church, next in authority to the Abuna (q. v.).

Etu, an object of worship in the islands of the Pacific, consisting of some bird, fish, or reptile, in which the natives believed a spirit resided. For an account of this worship see Williams, Missionary Researches.

Eucadires, priests of the ancient Carthaginian deities, also called Aecidres (q. v.).

Eucherius, the thirty-second bishop of Orleans, was born there, of noble parents, towards the close of the 5th century; devoted himself chiefly to a monastic life at Jumièges; was elected to the see on the death of his uncle, in 717; administered it with remarkable success, but was banished to Cologne, in 732, by Charles Martel, apparently for resisting a confiscation of the Church revenues; and died at a place near Liege in 738 (or 742). He is commemorated Feb. 20.

Buchomën (from εὐχομαι, to pray), a name sometimes applied to those of the catechumens (q. v.) who remained to receive the minister's prayers and benedictions. See GENEFLECTENTES.

Budes de Roucroumet, sixty-eighth bishop of Béziers, belonged to one of the oldest families of Burgru- dury, and succeeded, Feb. 9, 1298, Guillaume de La Tour. He fell into a quarrel with his people, in 1275, concerning the expenses of the see, which resulted in his discomfiture. He died June 28, 1301. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.

Bunfrouus. See EPHPHRONIUS.

Eugenius, a Catholic bishop of Carthage, was elected to that see in 480 or 481. In 488 he was banished by the Arian party to Tripoli, where he remained until 484, when he returned to his diocese. But the next king banished him to Gaul, where he remained the rest of his life. He died at Vienne, Sept. 6, 506. He left Expositio Fidei Catholicœ (printed in Migne, Patrol. Lat. viii). See Chalmer, Biog. Dict. a. v. Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. a. v.

Ethiopian Monk.
Eugenius, bishop of Toledo, the second of that name, was first a clerk of the Church there, and on being chosen bishop, retired to Saragossa in a monastery; but being discovered, was brought back to Toledo, and ordained in 646. He presided at the councils held at Toledo in the years 659 and 656, and died in 657. He was the author of several works, particularly a treatise on the Trinity, two books of miscellaneous, and one in prose and verse, which were published by father Simond at Paris (1619, 8vo; also in 1696; Variae, 1709, in the Bibliotheca Max. Patrum; Lyons, 1677, xii. 345). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Bukterol Olkoi (οἰστρόπιον, οἱ οἰρότηται, οἱ Φυλάκες, a house), a name sometimes applied to ascetic Christian churches.

Bulogium, the consecrated bread of the Greek Church.

Bulystras, bishop of Apamias, in Bithynia, one of Chrysostom's most loyal adherents, banished to Misynab, beyond Borrah, in Syria, A.D. 406.

Bunenides. See Furies.

Buphemia, Saint, of Chaldesdon, suffered martyrdom in the time of Galerius, c. A.D. 307. Her anniversary is Sept. 16.

Buphemius (by some Euthymius), third patriarch of Constantinople, A.D. 405-406; was a learned historian and orthodox presbyter of that city, but became involved in the jealousies between the Greek and Roman ecclesiastics, and was finally deposed by the emperor Anastasius. He died in 518.

Buphrosia (or Buphrosynia), daughter of Pharnabazus of Alexander, early in the 5th century, fled from home to avoid marriage, and was received into a neighboring monastery, where, under the assumed name of Sauraphatis, she concealed her sex for thirty-eight years. Her father meanwhile visited her, without recognizing her, and was converted to Christianity. On her death-bed she discovered herself to him, and he became a monk. She is commemorated by the Latins, Feb. 11; by the Greeks, Sept. 25.

Buphyrates, a heretic of the 2d century, was the founder of the sect of Ophtolites or Serpentarians, one of whose dogmas was, that the serpent by which our first parents were deceived was either Christ himself or Sophia (wisdom) concealed under that form, for which reason they paid a kind of divine honor to certain serpents kept for that purpose. In most points he adhered to the Oriental or Gnostic philosophy, of two opposite principles, with the moon and other dreams of those sects. Origin did not consider the disciples of Euphrates as Christians, but as calumniators of Jesus Christ.

Buphrobus or Buphronius. (1) Bishop of Antioch, intrusted by the Arian party, A.D. 332-334. (2) Bishop of Colonina, in Armenia; afterwards metropolitan of Nicopolis, A.D. 375. (3) Ninth bishop of Antioch, not before A.D. 402; commemorated Aug. 3. (4) The eighteenth bishop of Tours, A.D. 555-572, who resisted the violent encroachments of the civil power, died in his seventieth year, and is commemorated Aug. 4.

Euripus, in Greek mythology, is the east, or, rather, south-east, wind, bringing to the Greeks close, damp weather, and heavy storms. Therefore he is represented on the tower of the winds with flowing hair, tangled beard, and of early aspect. See EAST WIND.

Eusebia, Saint, abbess of Hamay or Hamsige, daughter of Adalbrand, a Frankish lord, and of St. Rictrude, was born in 637. She was educated by her grandmother, St. Gertrude, abbess of Hamay (Hamaticum), and was elected to succeed her in 649; but as she was only twelve years old, Rictrude, who at that time was abbes of Marchiennes, let her come into her convent with her whole community, by order of the king, Clovis II. Eusebia, who could not forget her monastery of Hamsinge, therefore rose secretly in the night with one of her friends, and went there to chant the service, and came back the following morning to Marchiennes. Her mother found this out, however, gave her a severe chastisement, and engaged many bishops and abbots to remonstrate with her, but they found her inflexible, and advised Rictrude to leave her at liberty. When only thirteen years old, Eusebia returned to Hamsinge as abbess, and governed her community with humility, mildness, and prudence. She died in 660, and is commemorated March 16. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Eusebius, the name of a very great number of early Christian ecclesiastics, of whom we mention a few of the most noted. (1) Bishop of Antioch, c. A.D. 450-454. (2) Bishop of Cieszyn, in Cappadocia, A.D. 862-870, a friend of Gregory Nazianzen. (3) The twenty-second bishop of Milan, A.D. 449-465. (4) Bishop of Pselium, c. A.D. 481-457. (5) Bishop of Tarragona, c. A.D. 619-632. (6) Bishop of Valentinianop-

Eustachius (or Eustathius), said to have been named Placidus before his conversion, a noted saint, is commemorated by the Latinas Nov. 2, and by the Greeks Sept. 20, as a military martyr, along with his wife Theopista, and his two sons, Agapius and Theopistus, at Rome, under Hadrian, A.D. 118. His Acts are evidently spurious, but his martyrdom is undoubted. Many churches are dedicated to him, especially one at Rousa, and one in Paris. Baronius thinks he may have been the Placidus who was a general under Titus (Josephus, War, iii, 4, iv, 183), but that would make him very aged. See Jameson, Sacred and Legendary Art, p. 792.

Eustathius. (1) Abbob of Luxeuil (Franche-Comte), born in Burgundy about 560, succeeded St. Columbanus in 610, labored as a missionary among the Varaci in 616, and died in 625; commemorated March 29 (by others Oct. 11). (2) Bishop of Attalia, resigned in 431. (3) Bishop of Berytus, in Syria, elected for time-serving herey, in 457. (1) Patriarch of Alexandria, 901-905.

Eustochium. (1) Fifth archbishop of Tours, 443-460, is commemorated as a saint, Sept. 19. (2) Patriarch of Jerusalem, 544-556.

Eustorgius, bishop of Milan, 512-518.

Eustates, one of a class of martyrs to whom a festival is dedicated in the Greek Church on Dec. 15.

Eustathius, a Greek theologian, who lived in the 6th century, wrote a treatise on the Condition of the Soul of Man after Death, printed for the first time by Leo Allatius, in the De Occidentalium aitque Orientalium. The author has been identified with Eustathius, the biographer of Eutychius, of the 6th century.

Eutrochatius, bishop of Nice, flourished in the beginning of the 12th century, and was noted for his polemic writings in divinity, and his philosophical works. His Greek commentaries on Aristotle's Analytica, and on his Ethica, are still extant; the former published at Venice in 1534, the latter at the same place in 1536, and at Paris in 1543.

Euterpe, in Greek mythology, one of the muses, who presided over lyric poetry. See cut below.

Eutharius, bishop of Tyana, an earnest Nestorian, was an acknowledged leader of that party in the Council of Ephesus (A.D. 431), and for some time afterwards. He was ultimately banished to Sicydon, and thence to Tyre, where he died. He wrote a treatise, usually published with the works of Athanasius.

Euthymius, abbot of Pharan, in Judaea, was born in Melitene (Armenia) in 377. He was educated under bishop Otreius, who ordained him priest, and instructed him with the direction of the monasteries of Melitene. In 406 he went to Palestine, and retired into a cell near Jerusalem. Soon after he was joined by a great number of recluses, who chose him as their superior. His authority extended over several monasteries. Euthymius converted to Christianity a large number of Arabians, and brought back to the orthodox Church several Nestorians and Manicheans. Through his entreaty also the empress Eudoxia, the wife of Theodosius the younger, entered into the bosom of the Catholic Church. There was also attributed to Euthymius the power of performing miracles. He died in 473. After his death he was revered as a saint, first in the East, and then in the West. See Hoefer, Nouvelle Biographie Generale, e. v.; Smith, Dictionary of Christian Biography, e. v.

Eutropius, bishop of Valencia, in Spain, towards the end of the 6th century, originally abbot of the monast. of Servitians, was associated with the most influential Spanish ecclesiastics of his time.

Eutychites (from εὐθυς, good, and τρόφευς, fortune), a heretical sect ministered to by Theodoret as before the 5th century. They held that our souls were placed in our bodies only to honor the creators, that we ought to be afflicted at nothing, and to be equally pleased with vice and virtue. They also taught that Christ was the son of an unknown god.

Eutychianus, a celebrated monk in the mountains separating Phrygia and Bithynia, in the time of Constantine the Great.

Eutychius. (1) Bishop of Eleutheropolis (Hebron), in Palestine, in the middle of the 4th century, was deposed for semi-Arianism. (2) Sub-deacon of Alexandria, martyred by the Arians, A.D. 356. (3) The last of the line of Ravenna, A.D. 727.

Evagrius. (1) Orthodox bishop of Constantinople for two months in 870. (2) Bishop of Antioch, cir. A.D. 888-892.

Evagius, a Scotch prelate, was appointed the first bishop of the see of Argyle in 1200, by bishop John. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 284.

Evangel (Gr. εὐαγγέλιον, good tidings), a name often applied to the gospel. Hence the term evangelical (q. v.).

Evangelical Adventists. See Adventists, Evangelical.

Evangelists, the name given in the Greek Church to the deacons who read the gospels in the course of divine service.

Evangelists, The Four. Representations of, in Christian Art. The adoption of the four creatures of the apocalypse (iv, 6) as images of the evangelists does not seem to have taken place generally, or is not recorded on Christian monuments, before the 5th century. It involves, of course, a peculiarly impressive connection between the beginning of the visions of Ezekiel and the unveiling of heaven to the eyes of John. The application of each symbol to each writer may be referred...
Evangelists. In the British census of 1851 four congregations returned themselves as worshipping under this name, probably to avoid being identified with any sect.

Evans, Benjamin, D.D., an English Baptist minister, was born at Bilston, Staffordshire, May 13, 1803. As a boy his thirst for knowledge was intense, and he excelled in drawings on Staffordshire pottery-ware. He was converted in his youth, joined the Baptists, and at twenty entered Horton College, Bradford, Yorkshire. In 1825 he accepted an invitation as pastor to a very small EVANS, JAMES, the celebrated Canadian missionary among the Indians, brother of Rev. Ephraim Evans, D.D., entered upon the missionary work at St. Clair, Ont., in 1824. He labored at Rice Lake, Credit, Ancaster, and other places. To his mental vigor and indomitable perseverance the Indians are indebted for many advantages. Not the least of these is a written and printed character of their language, invented by Evans. He left behind him many papers, both in print and manuscript—a private journal, translations, Indian vocabularies, letters, etc. He died suddenly, while on a visit to England, at Kelby, Lincolnshire, Nov. 25, 1848. Evans was a warm friend of Mrs. Grimke, an enterprising explorer, a devoted missionary, and a humble Christian. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1847, p. 462; Carroll, Case and his Contemporaries (see index, vol. v).

Evans, James Harrington, a Baptist minister of John Street Chapel, London, was born about 1785. He died about 1849. His works are, Dialogues on the Trinity (Lond. 1819, 8vo)—Sermons on the Spirit of Holiness (1839, 4th ed. 12mo). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s.v.

Evans, John, L.L.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Anglesey, Monmouthshire. He was pastor of a congregation of General Baptists, Worship Street, London, from 1792 to 1827, and died in the latter year, leaving a number of theological sermons and other works, for a list of which see Watt, Bibl. Brit., and the Gentleman's Magazine, 1809. See An Attempt to Account for the Infidelity of the Late Mr. Gibbon. His best-known work is a Brief Sketch of the Different Denominations into which the Christian World is Divided (1794). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s.v.

Evans, Jonathan, an English Congregational minister, was born at Coventry about 1748. He was converted in 1778 or 1779, and shortly after began to work with much earnestness for the salvation of his irreligious neighbors. In 1782 he turned his attention more particularly to the parish of Foleshill, near Coventry, and was so successful as to purchase, in 1784, a building for a place of worship, and eventually a chapel was built. In 1796 a church was formed, chiefly of those who were the fruits of his ministry, of which he was ordained pastor, April 4, 1797. He died Aug. 81, 1809. Mr. Evans was a plain, earnest preacher, and was always in winning souls. He was the author of three fine hymns, commencing, "Come, thou transfiguring spirit," "Hark! the voice of love and mercy," "Let saints on earth their anthems raise." See (Lond.) Evangelical Magazine, 1847, p. 128.

Evéillon, Jacques, a French theologian, and grand- vizier of Angers under Marsac, Pouquet, Miron, De Reiul, and Arnaud, was born at Angers in 1752, and obtained his preferments in consequence of his superior knowledge of ecclesiastical laws and customs. He died at Angers in 1861. He was the author of an excellent treatise, Des Echanges et des Monotirés (1672). See Chalmers, Bibl. Dict., s.v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Bibl. Générale, s.v.

Eveleigh, John, D.D., provost of Oriel College, Oxford, and prebendary of Rochester (1781), was born in 1747. He died Dec. 10, 1814, leaving The Trinity (1781);—Sermons Preached before the University of Oxford (1785);—Plutarch of Persons in the Goodheath, Prorod (1797). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s.v.

Evetett, Robert, D.D., a Congregational minister, of North Wales, Jan. 2, 1791. He studied under Rev. Thomas Jones, of Newmarket, also in the Denbigh Academy; began preaching in 1809, but two years later entered Wrexham Theological Seminary, and completed a four years' course. He was ordained pastor in Denbigh in 1812; dismissed in 1829; came to America and began to minister to the Welsh Congregational Church, Utica, N.Y., in July of the same year. This charge he resigned in 1823, and in the following year became acting pastor at East Windsor, where he remained until 1833, when, for a time, he served the Presbyterian Church at Westervill. In April, 1838, he was installed pastor of the two Welsh congregations of Steuben, a position which he retained until the close of his life, although, during the last few years, he preached only occasionally. He died there, Feb. 26, 1875. The Welsh people had long revered him, and they raised in his honor four hundred dollars as a testimonial. "Stromegraphia" is the title of a work which he published at Denbigh in 1816, in which shorthand writing was first adapted to the Welsh language. Sixty editions of his First Catechism were published in Wales, being first issued at Denbigh in 1822. This was republished in America, and passed through several editions. At Steuben he published a Larger Catechism; also Arranged, an aid to reading Welsh, of which fifteen editions were printed prior to his death. In January, 1840, he published the first number of Y Cedwiwch Americanaidd (The American Missionary), a Welsh Congregational monthly, which was edited, after his death, by his son. In 1843 he published Y Tynewser (The Philanthropist), devoted to emancipation and temperance; and from 1850 to 1852 he edited Y Detholiad (Elocution). Two Welsh hymnbooks, published in 1809 and 1846, were in large part prepared by Dr. Everett. See Cong. Quarterly, 1876, p. 426; 1877, p. 814.

Everton, Silvester, D.D., an English prelate of the 18th century, took his name from Everton, a village in Bedfordshire. He received the lord chancellorship of England in 1246, and was very skillful in customs of chancery. The next year he was consecrated bishop of Carlisle. With the rest of the English bishops he boldly requested of Henry III that all foreigners and insufficient persons might be put out of their bishoprics. The king retorted on the bishops, singling out Silvester as to the point of insufficiency. Everton lost his life by a fall from a horse, in 1254. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), i. 188.

Evigilator, an officer in Greek monasteries, whose duty it was to waken the monks for nocturnal and annual services. Another officer of the kind was the excitor, who had to waken a monk asleep in church.

Evocatio, a religious ceremony observed by the ancient Romans when besieging a town, in which they solemnly called upon the deities of the place to forsake it and come over to their assistance. They usually attempted to bribe the gods by promising them tenebræ and festivities.

Evodus, according to tradition, the first bishop of Antioch, after A.D. 42.

Evolution. The important relations which the scientific subject has assumed to religious literature
It is in the midst of these phenomena, and viewed from the scientific standpoint, the continuous transformation and differentiation of an identical substance. More specifically, it is the continuous unfolding of a material existence according to such method that constituent parts which were germinal or potential became actual and functional, and according to such an order that the primitive existence is successively more differentiated, with parts progressively more and more specialized in structure and function. It is the passage from the homogeneous to the heterogeneous. It implies continuity, extension, and an ever-extending farther and farther, led to the formation of worlds. Such views were extended by Epicurus and the Roman Lucretius; and long afterwards, similar theories, but with more theistic leanings, were entertained by Torricelli, Galileo, and Spinoza. The Greek atomists attributed the lateral motions of the atoms to chance—a concept that remains the animated nature of atoms which was revived in the monads of Gassendi, Leibnitz, Rosmini, Campanella, Bruno, and Maupertuis; and reproduced in the conscious atoms and molecules of Hückel, Elsberg, and other modern philosophers. The evolution of the system, through the intervention of vortices was undertaken in the well-known theory of Descartes (Principia Philosophiae, 1614); and Kepler made use, also, of a vortexal movement in the matter of a primitive chaos, but invoked the Empedoclean conception of attractions and repulsions for the initiation of the primitive motions. The speculations of Swedenborg (Principia Rerum Naturalium, 1735-38) also posited vortexal atomic motions, which expanded to conical movements and led to the differentiation of worlds. These various speculations (more fully set forth in Winchell's World Life, or Comparative Geology, pt. iv.) opened the way for the better-defined and better-defended nebular cosmogonies of Kant and his successors. The evolution of the earth's physical features by means of fire and water was first undertaken by Leibnitz (Practopos, etc., 1749, first, in abstract, in Acta Eruditorum, Leipzig, 1685). These eminent thinkers, whom, in this connection, we can only mention, all conceive the earth and the solar system to have originated through the progressive differentiations of a primitive chaotic matter. This is the conception of modern evolution.

Meantime the notion of a material continuity in the succession of the organic world was repeatedly shadowed forth. Empedocles taught the progressive origination of organic forms. Aristotle maintained that immanent divine mind determines in nature a tendency towards improvement and perfection. It is only later, when it was discovered that the races of men, however diverse, are derived from a common origin, and this through the continual survival of those best fitted for the environment. In later times, Sir Matthew Hale (Primitive Origin of Mankind, 1674, p. 211), in his treatise on the preservation of the struggle for existence in the animal. De Maillet (Tellurien, Amsterdam, 1748), attempted to explain how animal forms undergo transmutation through the influence of changed environment; and Lamarck (Philosophie Zooloqique, new ed., 1879) to this influence added the principle of use and disuse, and admitted also an underlying inherent conatus towards beneficial change. These very concise references to the history of opinion may be supplemented by a perusal of the article on Evolution in the Encyclopaedia Britannica, and by a study of the works to which the references in this progres of this article. Within our restricted limits it would be more profitable to proceed to an outline of the evidence of evolution as at present understood.

III. The Scientific Evidence. — 1. Isogonic Evolution. The processes of change in the topographical and hydrographic features of the earth's surface are so familiar that we almost fail to note the fact that these re cent transformations are but the last terms of a series of changes which have moulded the globe and imparted to it the features that complete its fitness for the reception of organic populations. But, in fact, the filling and drainage of a pond or lakelet in a human lifetime is the same kind of work as that which spread the deposits of the fossil shell, the remains of marine life, over large portions of southern Russia, the pampas of Buenos Ayres, and the steppes of southern Siberia. The alluvial sediment left by a Mississippi overflow of this year is only one of the succession of contributions which, in ages past, have formed the entire delta, the great rivers, the delta Growth conglomerate; the hillside waste; the mountains wear out; whole shore-lines rise or sink; and the integration of these minute annual changes between vast limits of time shows that all the grander features of our planet have grown into existence by progressive transformations of the original matter. All this is obvious.

So it is obvious that the observed and admitted tenor of events implies an ancient course of change, in times so remote that the conditions had not yet approached to those revealed in the human period. The changes and stages of geological history enumerate these changes. It is not necessary to assume that all or any of the conclusions of science are exact in reference to the particular events of the geological past; it cannot be doubted, however, that research has successfully shown that the present is the result, and that the living and waters and gases which we observe are only a transformed portion of the material of the primeval world. The actual earth has passed, by material continuity, from a primitive state, in which all its physical conditions were extremely different from the present, to the present. Its mountains, rivers, islands, and seas have progressively come into existence. Its different portions have become more and more differentiated. It was once more homogeneous. It has undergone a real evolution.

But the geognostic data which pass before our observation disclose the primitive world in a process of emergence from a molten state. The world's history has been a history of cooling; and there are numerous indications that the actual records of geology note only the last stages of the world's cooling history. We have not the space at command, nor is it necessary, to enter into an enumeration of the grounds upon which science has traced terrestrial evolution backward to a nebular state, and even to a remoter one, in which the matter of the whole solar system is disclosed in a process of common evolution, under the action of the same forces as are observed in the meteorological phenomena of the earth's surface in these times, before human eyes. That our planetary system has had a nebular history is almost unanimously admitted by the science of the present. The chief divergences of opinion concern only some details of that history. This conclusion implies a material continuity through the totality of the changes. Rocks and ocean and atmosphere have grown out of fire-mist and nebula. World-life is a grand spectacle of evolution, and it illustrates continuity and unity of method on a scale of vastness which is deeply impressive. The details of the events may be disputed; but according to the interpretation of the "nebular" view, such as the want of ascertainable ratio between meteorological phenomena, distances from other worlds, and periods of revolution of our own planets and the obliquity of their orbits, some celestial bodies actually moving in the opposite direction. Experiments with the spectrum show that they are not all composed of the same elements. Moreover it is impossible to see, if space were at first filled with less resistant particles, that the sun's heat could have radiated. For these and other reasons some some of the ancient astronomers, Proctor, and Sir William Herschel, have wholly discarded the theory as insufficient and disproved. The question is a purely scientific one, of no especial interest to the botanist, so long as he confines his attention to the phenomena of matter, motion, and life, with their laws and properties, be attributed to the divine fiat. But the attempt to identify the "nebular" theory of cosmogony with any part of the narrative in the first chapter of Genesis is executed in other forms. Whatever therefore may be of that theory, Moses is not responsible for it, and revelation has nothing to do with it.

Trans. Nov. 21, 1888). Laplace, in apparent ignorance of Kant's remarkable speculation, brought the conception of nebular cosmogony to a rigorously scientific statement (Exposition du Systeme du Monde, 1796); and the general form of his theory enters into the most recent cosmological speculations, though the progress of discussion, with the necessity of some modifications, and has greatly extended the scope of the generalization. That which for years was known as "the nebular hypothesis" has strengthened into a nebular theory, accepted now with almost the same confidence that once attached to the Newtonian gravitation. This is the verdict of science on a question in its own appropriate field. No dissent from the outsider is deserving of consideration; though, of course, exceptions taken by a scientific minority must be honestly examined. For a discussion of alleged difficulties of nebular cosmogony, see Winchell's World Life, p. 155-198.

According to this conclusion, the cosmic realm is the grandest conceivable exemplification of the method of evolution pursued in nature. This evolution guides and determines all the processes of universal activity. The total inorganic universe, as we now know it, is the final outcome of the method of efficient activity revealed in nature, and it has been exerted upon identical portions of matter from the dawn of chemical history to the present. The question of fact, so far as concerns certain facts, is entirely a question of detail concerning the more or less complete universality of natural law.

2. Organic Evolution.—This is a greater and more serious question. Does a material continuity run through the succession of organic types which have appeared and disappeared in the history of the world? Are the higher species of the modern world derived from the lower species of the ancient world? Are the diversified types derived from a common ancestry? Is man's bodily organism the outcome of genealogical descent? That these queries must be answered affirmatively seems to be the inevitable conclusion from an enormous amount of modern research. The proofs are numerous and diverse; but we may range them along five lines of argumentation, converging towards the conclusion.

(1.) Ontogony.—By this we mean the history of the individual. This, beyond all controversy, is an evolution. The succession of changes from the beginning of consciousness to maturity is great, but they are wrought in the same identical being. Still greater ontogenetic transformations may be traced back through the ages of the individual.

The "nebular theory" here referred to is upon the supposition that the universe originally existed in the form of a nebula, which expanded, and, having set out space, and that all the heavenly bodies have resulted from this by rotation and gradual condensation through cooling. Most of the phenomena which we observe, such as sphericity, orbital and axial rotation, together with earthquakes and volcans (as showing the still liquid central mass), are thought to have been produced upon this hypothesis, and the fact that nebulae are yet discovered in the starry spaces is held as confirmatory of it. On the other hand, some of these nebulae have already been resolved by powerful telescopes into a mass of separate stars, and the present phenomenon is therefore strong that such is the composition of all of them. Comets are too little known to be of much weight in the argument. Many astronomers who have investigated the nebula, such as the "nebular" view, such as the want of ascertainable ratio between meteorological phenomena, distances from other worlds, and periods of revolution of our own planets and the obliquity of their orbits, some celestial bodies actually moving in the opposite direction. Experiments with the spectrum show that they are not all composed of the same elements. Moreover it is impossible to see, if space were at the time filled with less resistant particles, that the sun's heat could have radiated. For these and other reasons some of the ancient astronomers, Proctor, and Sir William Herschel, have wholly discarded the theory as insufficient and disproved. The question is a purely scientific one, of no especial interest to the botanist, so long as he confines his attention to the phenomena of matter, motion, and life, with their laws and properties, be attributed to the divine fiat. But the attempt to identify the "nebular" theory of cosmogony with any part of the narrative in the first chapter of Genesis is executed in other forms. Whatever therefore may be of that theory, Moses is not responsible for it, and revelation has nothing to do with it.
however divergent, we shall find that they resemble each other in more points than the number of their differences; and the argument for their common descent is of the same nature as in the case of the negro and Scandinavian. This, then, is an indication of the nature of the argument from morphology, and shows that we can only present the indication (for further details, see works on zoology and botany). Some striking animal portraits may be found in Johnson, Natural History (2 vols. 8vo); Cassell, Natural History (1888, 6 vols. 8vo); Knight, Animated Nature (2 vols. 8vo); Brehm, Tierleben (9 vols. 8vo). Details of structure in Owen, Comparative Anatomy (3 vols. 8vo); Häckel, Generelle Morphologie der Organismen (vol. i); Gegenbaur, Grundriis der vergleichenden Anatomie (8vo); Huxley, Manual der vergleichenden Anatomie (8vo), etc.

(8.) Palaeontology. The doctrine of the descent of all living species from a common remote ancestor implies that in former times the divergences of organic types were less than at present. Such a retral convergence of genealogical lines is precisely what palaeontology shows. Within historic times this convergence is almost imperceptible; but as soon as we enter the sphere of geology no fact is more conspicuous. To take an example which has been much bruited, the domestic horse, now so widely differentiated from five-toed quadrupeds, we find it in the very immediately preceding the present true horses lived, in which the development of the second and fourth digits, or splint bones, of the modern horse was more developed. Further back were horses with the same bones terminated by dangling hoofs. Still further back were horses having these hoofs more developed, and reaching the ground. But these horses had other splint bones, the rudimentary condition of a first digit, and in remoter times these rudiments are found terminated by dangling hoofs, and in still remoter, by functional hoofs. So we trace the sequence of the types back to the one which we consider the first, and which, when we consider the corresponding divergences in the teeth, tibiae, and other structures, would show us the transition of the antecedents to the one which we consider. The same, or a similar kind of relationship, in the case of the descent of the horse, leads back, therefore, to a five-toed quadruped. If we take the modern ox or sheep or pig or camel or rhinoceros, we shall be able to trace back similarly a succession of primitive types, through the four-toed, the five-toed quadruped; and in every case such a quadruped approximates the form which stands at the beginning of the equine succession. The details of facts establishing such a generalization are accessible to all readers in the writings of Leidy, Cope, Marsh, Gaudry, Owen, Huxley, and other palaeontologists. See Cope's memoirs in reports of surveys under Hayden and Wheeler, and brief papers in American Naturalist; Marsh, in American Journal of Science (ser. ii); Leidy, U. S. Geol. Survey of the Territories (vol. i); Ancient Fauna of Nebraska (1853); and Extinct Mammalia of Dakota and Nebraska, in the Jour. Acad. Nat. Sciences (Phila. 1869, vol. vii.). In a manner precisely similar the two types of modern birds—"flying" and "running"—may be traced back along two successional lines, to Mesozoic Saurian reptiles. So, progress has been made in tracing lines of succession among invertebrate and plant groups. The facts show what the doctrine of descent requires, a gradual convergence backward of all the lines of organic succession.

But, if these successions are genealogical,† there must have been intermediate forms, some of which would have intermediate characters, some resembling marsupials and eutheropods would be admitted close kin to some of the lowest vertebrates. Indeed, if we compare any two representatives of the animal kingdom, * But on this question we have, in the book of Genesis, material proof which cannot safely be neglected; and it is more definite than the scientific. —En.

itted no missing links. It is the aim of palaeontology to discover traces of all the links; but obviously the fact is that the result of the fragment-ments of a meteorite which exploded in the sky before the Christian era. The work of palaeontology is necessarily incomplete; the relics of many types which once contributed to the continuity of the successions worked out remain undiscovered. There are, indeed, many missing links in our knowledge; but the trend of discovery is such as to imply that no missing links interrupted the continuity of the actual successions.
Every year's acquisition of new facts narrows the great gaps, and closes up some of the smaller ones. Some successions have been reconstructed with marvellous completeness; beyond question much more must remain to be accomplished; and we may logically forecast the future state of the evidence and anticipate the conclusion. So we reason from palaeontology, and it seems entirely logical to conclude that in the actual life-history of our planet the successions of specific forms were nicely graduated from the rude and generalized types of the remote past to the large-brained and highly specialized types of the present. But this admission does not establish any genetic connections running through the several series. Each species may have resulted from the creation of others. Only the probabilities can be drawn from embryology and morphology suggest geometric descent in palaeontology. The facts of paleon-tology might be as are, with every species a primordial and persistent form; but the establishment of these graduated successions establishes what must have been the fact on the theory of common descent, and constitutes a link in the chain of argument.

(4.) Variability.—Is it within the economy of nature that organic types shall undergo indefinite secular variation, or maintain essential permanence? Within the historic period few undomesticated species are known to have varied to any marked extent; but all those domesticated have become differentiated, and sometimes to a striking extent. The different breeds of horses, cattle, dogs, fowls, and pigeons differ to such an extent that many of them, but for our knowledge of their common origin, would be set down by any naturalist as distinct species. They are distinct species in the same sense as the jaguar and the ounce and the panther are distinct. The elde Agassiz, though no evolutionist, used to proclaim the different races of men as widely different from monkeys.
The suggestion that these divergences have not arisen in a state of nature seems to possess no relevancy, for it is still shown that the aptitude to vary is possessed by nature's organisms. Moreover, the influences brought to bear on these animals through man's treatment are the same in kind as those which sometimes arise from natural operations; they only differ in intensity, and thus accelerate changes for which nature fitted, and perhaps destined, the being. Finally, the changed forms result from the same kind of action of the same physiological forces as are in play in animals uninfluenced by domestication. Only powers like those of digestion, respiration, growth, and adaptation have been employed in the development of these varieties, and these are the functional activities of all animals. It would seem, therefore, that the results of domestication may be fairly appealed to as tests of the permanence of species. (See Darwin, Animals and Plants under Domestication.)

But it appears that great variations sometimes occur among animals and plants in a state of nature. Con-fl ict between individuals and the conditions of their survival are factors which produce adaptive changes in the species. The same species of birds, mammals, and molluscs, in their wide range across a continent from east to west, and from north to south, are found to vary according to the latitude, longitude, altitude, and other circumstances. A thorough knowledge of this variability in North America has led to the recording of large numbers of intermediate tional Acad. Jan. 1888; Amer. Jour. Sci. xii, Jan., March, and May, 1888; Ridgeway, Amer. Jour. Sci. 19s, 45, 454, 455). Similar extreme variability is observed in many invertebrate species, both recent and extinct.

Haeckel, in a remarkable work on calcareous sponges, has reached the conclusion that all the forms belong to one species, so gradual are the transitions between the several nominal species (Die Kiechtmacher der Pflanzen, 8vo).
Many forms of fossil shells formerly regarded as distinct species have more recently been united, simply because series of intermediate forms became known.
Hilgendorf has traced minutely the secular variations of a species of Planorbus (Umbra planorbus multiformis in Steinheimer Bi reefs), and Hyatt has extended these studies (Proc. Amer. Assoc. 1890, and "Anniverwork has been done among Palaeozoic brachiopods.
The theory of altered or changed environment is sometimes accelerated by human interference. One or more permanently gill-bearing in its native elevated home, loses its gills when kept near the sea-level, and becomes a land salamander. In Japan certain leeches and plana-rions have become adapted to land life, and a fish, even (Percy et al., 1890) the lamprey, may be forced to undergo a transitional state. Certain brine shrimps are reported by Smukauveich as undergoing important structural changes in the course of a few generations, when the brine is gradually fresened ; and return to the original state as the salinity is again restored (Zeits. wiss.

the Pribilof Islands becomes thickened, short, losing the tail, and undergoing great change of voice. Certain domestic pigs in Texas are well known to have become swollen and fat.

Through hybridity, also, probably, result forms divergent from recognised species. Among cultivated plants hybrids are not uncommon. In the wild state the number of reputed hybrid forms may be judged from a glance at the manual of both of the Floral and Fauna of New Zealand; Candolle, "Étude sur l’Espèce," in the Bibliothèque Univ. de Genève, Nov. 1862; Hooker and Thomson, Flora Indica, vol. i, Introductory Essay, London, 1855; Gray, Amer. Jour. Sci. II, xii, 184; Naudin, Flora of the Vegetable Kingdom. Among animals, fertile hybridity, as well as infertility, is pretty well established. From the hare and the rabbit has arisen a self-sustaining hybrid now extensively employed in Europe for food. Fertile hybrids of the common Chinese geese are extensively reared in India, as also in England and in America; while several generations of the hybrid from the mallow and muscovy ducks are reported living in Mt.
21 Jan. 1874). Carl Vogt reports fertile hybrids of the wolf and dog, as also of the goat and sheep, and the later is confirmed by Haeckel; Von Tschudi and Vogt both report the same phenomena in the deer and the bear. The fox and dog. The same is alleged of the buffalo and bison. Without relying on the intervention of hybrid-ity, enough has been observed of the power of organic forms to adapt themselves permanently to the permantent, and the fertility very rarely extends to successive changes of the environment to fully establish the conclusion that it is the economy of nature to permit structural variations without limits.* If a full survey of the facts to which we have too briefly alluded justifies the conclusion, as we think it does, then no bar exists. All the successive genealogical lines may have arisen through the continued variation of primitive forms; and that the latter, also, may have arisen through variation and descent from one primordial, life-endowed being. This extreme conclusion, however, is not at all necessary to the proof of a method of evolution in the view of all the successive genealogical lines may have proceeded from any such number of beginnings as the state of the observed relationships may allow.

(b) Comparative Embryology.—A careful study of the aspects of the developing embryo of a higher vertebrate, as indicated above, under "Ontogeny," shows that it reaches, in ascending order, a succession of stages which may be enumerated and defined. Now the facts to which we wish to direct attention particularly, constitute a series of significant parallelisms. (a) Ontogenetic parallelisms. Research shows that every higher embryo, equally with the mammalian, reptilian, and plant embryo, possesses characters of reptiles, birds, quadrupeeds, and quadramana. The embryo chick is absolutely indistinguishable from the embryo of man until about the sixth day of incubation. Even invertebrates pursue a course of development closely parallel with that of the earlier stages of the mammalian embryo. (Häckel, Naturliche Schöpfungsgeschichte, xi Vortrag; Anthropogene, xiii—xix Vorträge; Balfour, British Assoc. Address, 1880, Nat. Adv. xxii, 418.) (b) Taxonomic parallelisms. The succession of aspects presented by the mammalian embryo is closely paralleled in the steps taken by the stages of living animals. The disappearance of the nucleus of the egg results in a simple cytotode, which is paralleled in the living world by Prototreme, the lowest known animal. The new-formed nucleus gives the ovum the character of *Amphio*idea. The "morula" mass resulting from the division of the ovum is paralleled by Lepranula. The spheroid formed of a single layer of cells corresponds to the larvae of Plumaca. The invagination of this, forming a two-walled spheroid, or "sestula" is paralleled by the larvae of Protozoea. The four-layered, ciliated, larva from Vertebrata is paralleled by the Sphenotheca, Meinertia, Sertulata, and Trichocidium. The spheroid-the embryo of Chordata—is the natural stage of the embryo of all the higher classes of animals. It is paralleled in the early larval stages of the Protozoa, Deuterostomia, Gastrozoa, Porifera, Coelenterata, Echinodermata, and Chordata. (c) Palaeontological parallelisms. It was simply shown by the elder Agassiz that the geological succession of organic types presents an order identical with that of the fossiliferous strata. The principle has, indeed, found useful application in the recognition of the relative rank of animals. (See especially, Essay on Classification.) This has been more fully illustrated by Häckel (see citations above). Owning, however, to the recognised imperfection of our knowledge of extinct life, this parallelism is less detailed than the others. We know specifically, however, that the primitive form, Lophotrochozoa, must have been akin to Amphioxus and Lepranula. That the transition grade was reached by Scolelepsis, from the Pelmatozoa; that the shark type was attained in the Upper Silurian and Devonian; the transition from aquatic to terrestrial creatures, in the Amphibia of the Coal Measures, with some advance in the Trias; that reptiles succeeded in the Mesozoic, and birds appeared on their decline; that the lowest mammalian types existed in the Jurassic, and higher types followed through the Tertiary; that the lowest fossilized animals were of Lower Eocene age, and that tailed monkeys, anthropoid apes, and men followed in due order.

The established facts of comparative embryology show a prolonged and detailed succession of organic conceptions literally three times repeated. The doctrine of chances demonstrates that this must result from some mutual dependence and connection among them. The palaeontological succession must result from the order of succession under a law of development as primitively exemplified in the evolution of the individual. In the latter, each successive stage arises demonstrably by continuity with the preceding. The palaeontological series consists of the final terms of many genetically related embryonic series successive in the extinct world. The taxonomic series consists of the final terms of many genetically related embryonic series simultaneous in the actual world. It is evident that terms in each series are therefore materially connected through the embryonic series of which they are several parts.*

IV. Evolution Theory.—While most evolutionists believe that the intellectual and moral elements of man are equally, if not more, marked off by the same continuity as the mammalian embryo is from the reptilian, that of a long process of improvement, Mr. A. R. Wallace holds that both body and mind of man may have arisen in a different manner. (Wallace, Contributions to the Theory of Natural Selection, Am. ed. 1871; Address at Glasgow Meeting Brit. Assoc. 1871, Amer. Jour. Sci. III, xiii, 577.) While St. George Mivart limits the exception to man's psychic nature (Genesis of Species, 1871; Lessons from Nature, 1876). The majority of evolutionists maintain that man's body is so intimately identified in structure with that of lower animals that it is incredible that he has not participated in the common history. As to his psychic nature, it is held to be identical in many of its manifestations with the purposes of brutes, and a strong presumption hence arises that even man's highest powers exist genetically in the lower animals.

The speculations of theorists concern chiefly the causes, conditions, and instrumentalities on which organic evolution depends. De Millet, in a work whose title (Tellianum, 1748) was an anagram of the author's name, represents that organic beings possess an aptitude to use or disuse structures, and that changes, either accidental, or induced by the animal's putting forth efforts to exercise changed functions. Lamarck (Philosophie Zoologie, 1805; new ed. by Martiens, Paris, 1873) maintained that primitive rudiments of the great divisions of the organic kingdom arose by spontaneous generation; that these were endowed with an inherent tendency to improvement, which becomes effective especially through use and disuse of organs, while the influence of external conditions determines use and disuse. The author of the Vestiges of Creation, 1844, suggested that the principle is not in operation on our planet, that the relative rank of animals is the result of competition among various species, and that the struggle for life and the theories of narcotic selection was suggested simultaneously by Charles R. Darwin and A. R. Wallace (*Jour. Linnean Soc. London, August, 1855; preceded by Wallace's paper in Ann. and Mag. Nat. Hist., September, 1855), and this was most industriously and ably elaborated and illustrated by Darwin in a subsequent series of publications which have constituted an epoch in the history of science. The "Origin of Species" by Means of Natural Selection, 1859; "The Descent of Man, 1871; Expression of the Emotions, 1872; Invertebrates Plants, 1875; Effects of Cross- and Self-Fertilization, 1876, and numerous other works and memoirs bearing more or less directly on the question of natural selection. This theory is not to be identified with the broad doctrine of evolution, as is commonly done. It assumes that a method of evolution exists in nature, and undertakes to explain by what means and agencies it is carried on. Recognising the fact that a perpetual struggle exists among individuals for existence, and for most favorable conditions of life to succeed the best, while the feeblest tend to perish, the obvious and necessary inference is drawn that the species is perpetuated by its best representatives, and thus undergoes continual improvement, precisely as when man intervenes to improve the breeds of domestic animals. Darwin inclined at first to consider this tendency a full explanation of organic progress, but later he admitted other influences, including, like Lamarck, an inherent inus towards improvement, and the effects of use and disuse of organs. For an ample exposition of the theory see the articles "Darwinism" in the Encyclopaedia Americana. That a process of natural selection goes on, and that its tendency is what Darwin claims, all must admit. But there is a growing belief that organic advances and relapses require an appeal also to other conditions, instrumentailities, and causes. For instance, professor Parsons, of Harvard, inclined to regard specific variation as the result of extraordinary births (Am. Jour. Science, July, 1860, II. xxx, 1), and soon afterwards Richard Owen advanced an almost identical idea (A Nat. of Veretbrates, chap. xi.; Am. Jour. Science, 1862, 11), Galton's theory is practically the same (Hereditary Genius, 1869, p. 363-388). Kolliker varied this conception by suggesting heterogeneous generation through organic and parthenogenic reproduction—a profound misapprehension of proper generation (Uber die Darwin'sche Schöpfungsgeschichte, 1864). Huxley, while accepting Darwinism for what it is worth, has indicated some qualifications and additions (Lay Sermons, Addresses, and Reviews, 1862; On the Origin of Species, 1863; Critiques and Addresses, 1869, etc.). He holds particularly that nature sometimes makes mistakes; that the process of natural selection goes on among the molecules of the organisms, and that there exists an inherent tendency of organisation to vary. The latter point he emphasizes. Alpheus Hyatt, in 1898, pointed out that degradational metamorphosis of the individual is the type, and could not rationally be referred to natural selection, which acts in the contrary direction. An internal law fixes the duration of the species as of the individual. Specific advance he attributes to habitual aceleration of embryonic development. In the advanced age of species the reverse takes place, and thus the decline of a species reproduces, in inverted order, the succession of types which appeared during the rise of the species (Mem. Boston Soc. Nat. Hist., 1867, i, p. 2; Am. Nat. Nutrall, June, 1870, iv, 220; Fossil Cephalopoda, Museum Comparatur Zool. Cambridge, 1872). Professor E. D. Cope varied this conception by attributing the recession of organic types to the influence of retarded development (Synopsis of Cephalopedia of Penn. 1866; "Origin of Genera," in the Proc. Acad. Nat. Science, Phila. Octob. 1869; "The Hypothesis of Evolution," in Lipp. Mag., 1869, and University Series, Phila., 1873). "The Method of Creation of Organic Types," in the Proc. Acad. Nat. Science, Phila, 1871, and other papers). Probably the suggestions based on rate and duration of embryonic changes are all available. At the same time it is quite conceivable that the principle of natural selection obtains in embryonic life in conditions immediately present with the embryo and those external conditions which produce them—the circumstances surrounding the female parent, or even the male. This belief is expressed by Spencer's "Physiological Unity," Darwin's "Pan-genesis," Elsberg's "Plastidate Hypothesis" (Proc. Amer. Assoc. 1874, 1876), Hackel's "Perigenesis" (Die Perigenesis, 1876; Die heutige Entwickelmslehre, etc., 1879; Nature, Oct. 4, 1877, and Proc. Scien. Monthly Suppl.), and Brookes' "Law of Heredity" (New York, 1882). Still, it must be admitted that in some cases widely variant forms, as in the Ancon breed of sheep, arise suddenly where, to all appearance, some other condition not yet known determines the divergence. We think also it must be finally admitted that the organism is affected by an implanted destininity, which works steadily towards conformity to the environment, and employs the several agencies mentioned for the accomplishment of this result. In the history of the world the environment has undergone a progressive differentiation and improvement. Organization has advanced correspondingly. When the environment remains persistent, or deteriorates, organic forms persist or even deteriorate to a corresponding extent. If, however, no existing theory of organic evolution proves final, the fact of organic evolution remains highly probable.

V. Light on the Doctrine of Essentialism

We are now in the position to consider pre-liminarily, that the question of evolution is simply one of fact. In ascertaining whether a method of evolution is a fact in the natural world, we are not concerned in anything outside of this simple inquiry. It is of no import whether the result is effected by necessity—by a free will, by inherent forces, by implanted forces or external forces, by material forces or spiritual forces, by mediation action or immediate action. We are not even concerned in determining what conditions are favorable, what instrumentailities are employed, whether the action is regular, whether the development is prolonged, accelerated, or retarded. All these questions are interesting—some of them may be important. The human mind cannot be restrained from investigating them. But it is important to understand clearly that a verdict on any one of these questions does not bear on the antecedent question of fact. If the fact exists, different persons may explain and interpret it differently. The explanation falls within the domain of science; the interpretation touches philosophy and theology. Scientific explanations are already available. Scientifically the important question remains: whether the action is materialistic or spiritualistic—that will depend on the antecedent philosophy of the thinker. They may be theistic or atheistic—that depends on the predisposition of the interpreter. Philosophical and theological opinions cannot rest on the ground. The fact of a method of evolution in the world is not responsible for them.

More categorically, we may state: (1) The fact of evolution implies nothing in respect to causation. It throws no light on secondary cause or first cause. It does not imply the evolution of life from inorganic matter. It knows nothing of beginnings; it discovers only a method of continuance; the beginning may have been a creation by fiat. It knows nothing of the cause or causes of continuance; it may be by immanent divine agency. (2) There is no assumption of inherent forces or necessary activities, or eternal matter. It is allowable to deny inherent forces and necessary actions, and hold to the creation of matter and force, and even to the identification of natural force with the divine volition. (3) There is no implication concerning the nature or origin of mind. It may be seen as a phenomenon of human organism; it may arise only in the human organism. (4) Nothing is implied concerning the interpretation of the activities going forward in the organism. We are at liberty to affirm that they imply choice, selection, intelligence. We are not at liberty to grasp the inquiries in the midst of the inorganic world, to affirm that...

the all-embracing method of evolution is itself the highest possible manifestation of intelligence and unity.

(5) We may also, if we please, maintain that the method of the world and the collocations of the world imply determination and motiva. Thus, in brief, the limitation, limitations, and the world, the former, and the whole, are parallel.

In spite of the speculative views of some evolutionists, the full acceptance of the doctrine does not conflict with any fundamental conception of Christian theology.

VI. Literature.—Many of the most important original works have been cited in the progress of this article. Some others not mentioned, but which are especially important, are:

C. D. P. Kant, "Critique of Pure Reason" (1781); David Hume, "A Treatise of Human Nature" (1738-1740); Immanuel Kant, "Critique of Pure Reason" (1781); Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel, "Phenomenology of Mind" (1807).

This only applies to the latter half of the 19th century, and the point referred to by the author is a chasm, as in the "mediation" (at the middle of the verse of a psalm) scarcely any variety was admitted, except such as arose from local use. Thus, in the various works on the subject, and in service books, varieties of endings are to be found of greater or less antiquity.

Evremond (Lat. Eremundus), Saint, was born at Bayeux of a noble family; married a high-born lady, but suddenly devoted himself to a monastic life in Fontenay; afterwards became abbot of Mont Maire, in the diocese of Sens, and died about A.D. 720 (others say before 584). He is commemorated June 10. See Smith, Dict. of Christ. Antiq. s. v.; Guérin, Les Petits Bollandistes, vi, 533.

Evroul (Lat. Ebroulus). (1) Saint, was brought up at the court of Childerick I and his successor, for his noted for his learning and wealth, and renounced all for a monk's life, and founded the monastery of St. Evroul; see Oucnus (Chiun), in the diocese of Liches (Liches), where he died in 566. He is commemorated Dec. 29.

(2) The eighth bishop of Noyon and Tournay, died A.D. 621 (according to others, before 575). (3) Saint, is said to have been abbot of the monastery of St. Fuscinianus, near Amiens, probably near the close of the 6th century. He is commemorated July 26.

Ewald, Christian Ferdinand, an Episcopal minister and famous missionary among the Jews, was born of Jewish parentage, Sept. 14, 1802, at Maroldweissach, near Bamberg. At the age of twenty he joined the Christian Church, studied at Basle, and was in 1826 licensed to preach the gospel. In 1829 he was called to London, and having duly prepared for missionary work, he connected himself in 1832 with the London Society for Propagating the Gospel among the Jews. In 1836 he was ordained by the bishop of London, having been previously in Lutheran orders. There are but few missionaries of the London Society whose labors of labor has been so lengthened in duration or so wide in extent. For nearly ten years he labored with great devotedness in one of the most trying portions of the Jewish mission field—the north coast of Africa—at Algiers, Tunisia, Tripoli, and other large towns. In 1835 he left Tunisia for a time and proceeded to Leghorn, and in 1841 finally left Tunisia to accompany the first Anglican bishop, Dr. Alexander, to Jerusalem as his chaplain, and for some ten years was earnestly engaged in the Holy City. An account of the work is given in his Missionary Labors in the City of Jerusalem. In 1851 ill-health compelled him to leave the East, and, being appointed principal of the home mission, he took up his abode in London. In 1872 a general debility of constitution rendered it necessary for him to resign his position. He died August 8, 1874. The University of Erlangen, of which Ewald was a graduate, on the publication of his German translation of the Talmud treatise Aboda Sarah, in 1856, conferred upon him de religione Christiana inter barbaras gentes propaganda optime merito, liguarum orientium grammatico, the diploma of a doctor in philosophy, and the University of Canterbury conferred upon him, in 1872, the degree of bachelor of divinity, as stated in the diploma, in consideration "of his uprightness of life, sound doctrine, and purity of morals; of his proficiency in the study of divinity, of Hebrew and Oriental languages and literatured; and also of his missionary labors and eminent services in the promotion of Christianity among the Jews.” (B. P.)

Ewald, Georg Heinrich August, one of the most learned Orientalists of our century, was born at Göttingen, Nov. 16, 1863. In 1820 he entered the university of his native city, and three years later received the degree of doctor of philosophy. After teaching for some time at the Wolfenbüttel gymnasium, he returned in 1824 to Göttingen, became professor at the university, and in 1827 was made professor. In 1837 he was expelled from his position for heresy, with six other professors, a protest against the revocation of the liberal constitution of 1833, which Ernest Augustus, king of Hanover, effected. In 1829 and 1836 he had visited France and Italy, and now (in 1888) he visited England. In the same year he was appointed professor at Tübingen, where he remained for ten years. The bitter feuds with his colleagues made his stay there very unpleasant, and it was a relief when, in 1848, he was recalled to Göttingen. In 1867 he refused to take the oath of allegiance to the king of Prussia, and this refusal was punished by his exclusion from the study of philosophy, although he was still allowed his salary and the privilege of lecturing. This latter privilege was withdrawn in 1868, on account of utterances against the king. He died of heart disease, May 4, 1875. Ewald's writings have found about as many admirers abroad as his enemies have found in his own country; but much of his work is seriously impaired by his dogmatic spirit. His independence often degenerates into self-conviction. His violent rationalism is conspicuous. His literary activity began in 1829, with the Composition der Grenz Krishna unter sucht, and only closed with an autobiography written during the last months of his life, which has not been published. Of his many writings we mention, De Meiosis Carinam Araciborum (Brunswick, 1825); Das hoch- bled Salomo's übersetz und erklärt (1826; 8d ed. 1866); - Libri Waleki de Mesopotamia Exegesi Historia pars (1827); - Kritische Grammatik der Hebr. Sprache (ed.); subsequently enlarged, and Ausführliches Lehr- buch der Hebr. claimed by Austria, France, and Spain, to exclude each see candidate at a papal election. This right has never been formally acknowledged by the curia, but the claim has always, since the 15th century, been complied with by the concordat, although the Jesuits, shortly before the death of Pius IX, asserted that this right should no longer be recognized. The bath was never long in use, in the old sense of the word, but tolerant rather.

Exedra, a name sometimes given by St. Augustine to the ambo (q. v.). It is often used in ancient writers as synonymous with the apsis (q. v.).

Exeter, sacrifices offered by the ancient Greek monarchy before setting out on any warlike expedition.
They were of the nature of divination, to ascertain whether the enterprise was to be successful or disastrous.

Exoctacolli, a name given to several officers of the army of Constantine, who were high in society, and in public assemblies taking precedence of the bishops.
Originally they were priests, but afterwards only de-cans. The college of the exoctacoli corresponded to the college of cardinals (q. v.) at Rome.

Exocionites (Exouzioniote), a name applied to the Arians (q. v.) of the 4th century, who, when expelled from Constantinople by Theodosius the Great, retired to a place outside the city. The name occurs in the records of Justinian, and frequently in the chronicle of Alexandria.

Exoteric. See ESOTERIC.

Exobothummi (Ishbuihovi), the first of the close classes of cætischemus (q. v.) in the early Church.
They were instructed privately outside the Church, and prevented from entering into the Church until they were more fully enlightened.

Expectatives, a term employed in the 14th century, when the French pontiffs residing at Avignon assumed to themselves the power of conferring all sacred offices, by which means they raised immense sums of money, calling forth the bitterest complaints from all the nations of Europe. Expectatives were abolished by the Council of Constance, March 23, 1426. See Expectancy.

Expiy, Louis Alexandre, a French prelate, was born Feb. 24, 1742, at Brest. He studied at Paris, and was ordained in 1765 by the then arched bishop of Pastor of St. Martin of Marseilles; in 1789 became deputy of the states-general; was consecrated bishop of the department of Finistere, Feb. 24, 1791, and shared the fate of twenty-five of his colleagues, who were beheaded, May 22, 1794, for having taken an appeal to the department of the West against the national conspiracy. See Hofer, Nouv. B. Générale, s. v.

Exsufflation, a part of the ceremony of baptism in the ancient Christian Church, in which the candidate would with his hands stretched out towards the West, and struck them together; then he proceeded thither to exsufflate or spit, in defiance of Satan. See Baptism.

Extispicium (Lat. extus, entrails, and specus, to look),
a name sometimes given to the ancient karanupica (q. v.), because it was their duty carefully to examine the entrails of the victims offered in sacrifice.

Exeuctaentia (Ẹxouzioniotes), a name given to the class of Ariots called Arians (q. v.), because they assumed that the Son of God might be called God and the Word of God, but only in a sense consistent with the having been brought forth from non-existence. See Arians; Scept-Arians.

Eybeneschutz, Jonathan, a Jewish rabbi, was born at Crows in 1690. He was not only a very learned Talmudist, but especially a follower of the cabalistic system of the pseudo-Messiah Chayon, whom he had met at Prague in 1726. At the age of twenty-one Eybeneschutz was president of a rabbinical college at Crazcow, which soon became very famous. From year to year the number of his pupils increased, and he was soon recognized as a great authority. His position shielded him from the bath which so long had been pronounced upon the followers of Sabbethai Zewi
(q. v.) and Chayon. To avoid all suspicion, Eyben-schutz himself pronounced the ban upon all the followers of the pseudo-Messiah, and in 1728 the congregation of Prague appointed him preacher. In 1740 he accepted a call from Metz, and in 1748, had the honour of Altona. It seemed as if with him an evil spirit had entered that place, which divided the German and the Polish Jews. When Eybeneschutz came there, the famous Jacob Edem (q. v.) lived there, and, like his father, who had proscribed Chayon and his followers, regarded himself as the keeper of orthodoxy. An opportunity was soon offered to Edem whereby his vanity and his desire for hereby-hunting should be satisfied.
At the time when Eybeneschutz came to Altona there was an epidemic in that city. Since every rabbi was regarded as a magician, the most famous physician was expected to put a stop to the disease.
Eybeneschutz prepared amulets, which he distributed among the people. For curiosity's sake one was opened, and lo! in it was written: "O thou God of Israel, whose dwellest in the beauty of holiness. Send down salves, and heal thy person through the merit of thy servant Sabbethai Zewi, in order that thy name, and the name of the Messiah Sabbethai Zewi, may be hallowed in the world." This amulet came into the hands of Edem. Eyben-schutz denied all connection with the adherents of Sabbethai, and as he had already gained a great influence, it was believed; at least, everybody kept quiet. But Edem was not quiet, and finally the ban was pronounced against Eybeneschutz. The matter was brought before the king, Frederic V of Denmark, who decided in favor of Edem. Eybeneschutz lost his position as rabbi of the congregation. As his best friends left him, in his perplexity he finally went to a former pupil of his, Mo-es Gerson Kohlen, who after his baptism had taken the name of Karl Anton (q. v.). Anton wrote an apology in behalf of his teacher, which he dedicated to the king of Denmark. This, and other circumstances, had such an effect that the whole affair was dropped, and Eyben-schutz was elected anew as rabbi of the congregation.
The Jewish community, however, became divided, and this division lasted as long as both Eybeneschutz and Edem were alive. Eybeneschutz died at Altona in 1768, and was followed twelve years later by his opponent Edem.
Both are buried in the Jewish cemetery of Altona.
Eybeneschutz wrote, יבנשeousת שלמה רבי יבנשeousת, sermons and comments (Hamburg, 1766): היבנשeousת שלמה רבי יבנשeousת, homiletical comments upon the Lamentations (ibid., 1765), etc. See

EYCK, HUBERT and JOHN VAN, two brothers, were Flemish painters, and natives of the small town of Maeseyck, on the river Maas. Hubert was probably born in 1386, and John in 1370. They established themselves at Bruges. They are said by some writers to have been the discoverers of oil painting.
They generally painted in concert until the death of Hubert. Their most important work was an altar-piece with folding-doors, painted for Jodocus Vytse, who placed it in the Church of St. Bavon, at Ghent. The principal picture in this curious production represents the "Adtion of the Lamb," as described by St. John in the Revlation. On one of the folding-doors is represented Adam and Eve, and on the other St. Cecilia. In the sacristy of the cathedral at Bruges is preserved a pict-

EYCKENS, Petrus, an eminent Flemish historical painter, was born at Antwerp in 1559, and was chosen director of the academy at Antwerp. His principal works in that city are, The Last Supper, in the Church of St. Andrew; St. Catherine Disputing with the Poguans, in the cathedral; and St. John Preaching in the Wilderness, in the Church of the Convent called Beggadien. At Mechlin, in the Church of the Jesuits, were two of his most admired works. He died in 1649. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Eythe, William, an English Calvinistic divine, was born in Wilshire about 1613, and entered the University of Oxford in 1629. In 1634 he was minister of St. Edmund's Church, Salisbury, and was ejected for non-conformity in 1662. He died in 1670. He published, Epistolae ad Viri Sermi Deaetis Literarum Variorum Quaestiones Exicibit (1632);—The True Justification of a Sinne Erreur (1654); in Latin, under the title of Vindicatio Justificationis Gratiae (ed.). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Eydel, Friedrich Hiermann, a Lutheran minister of Germany, was born Feb. 11, 1819, at Eisleben. He studied at Tübingen, was in 1856 pastor at Höningen, in 1861 at Maichenberg, where he died, April 21, 1883. He published Precher zu Modernen Geschichten (Stuttgart, 1862; 2d ed. 1866). See Koch, Geschichte der deutschen Kirchengeschichte, vii, 306. (B. P.)

Eyan, a hymn used in Mohammedan countries by the Musulim (q. v.), or public crier, who chants it from the minarets of the mosques in a loud, deep-toned voice, summoning the people to their devotions. The proclamation is as follows: God is great, four times repeated; I bear witness that there is no god but God, twice repeated; I bear witness that Mohammed is the prophet of God, twice repeated; Come to the temple of salvation, twice repeated; God is great, God is most great; there is no God but God, and Mohammed is his prophet. At the morning prayer the muezzin must add, Proser is better than prayer, twice repeated.

Exegetel, a Jewish Greek writer, who lived a century before Christ, is the author of a dramatic poem after the manner of Euripides, on the Deliverance of Israel from Egypt, entitled Ἱερώνυμος. Fragments of this poem are preserved in the Preparatio Evangelica of Eusebius (ix, 28, 29), and in the Stromata of Clement of Alexandria (i, 23, p. 414). They are given by Deitzsch in his Zur Geschichte der jüdischen Poesie (Leipsic, 1856), p. 211-219. The best edition of them, with translation and notes, is by Philipson (Berlin, 1860), entitled Exegetelou τοῦ Ἰουδαίου εὐρυτήρου Ἰωνίου ἱερώνυμου, etc. See Etheridge, Introduction to Hebrew Literature, p. 114; Ederer, Geschichte der Hoch猶太ische Literatur, p. 583 sq.: Hertfeld, Gesch. des Volkes Israel, ii, 491, 517-519, 579 (Leipsic, 1863); Fürst, Bibl. Ezangatai, George (Armen, Keor), an Armenian monk, was born about 1308. He was a disciple of the celebrated John Oroszneti, and a friend of Gregory Thaumaturgus. He was one of the greatest theologians of his century, and professor in a monastery near Ezanga. He wrote, Instructions how to Administer the Sacraments of Baptism, Confirmation, etc., Disputation of the Homilies of St. Gregory Nazianzen,—A Commentary on the Apocalypse,—fourteen Sermons. There is also attributed to him a Commentary on Isaiah. All these works remain in MS. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.
Faber, Eligius, a Carmelite monk, who died at Brussels in 1506, is the author of, De Origeni Religionum:—De Tratamento Christi in Cruce:—Commentarius in Evangelista, Epistolam Pauli, Libertas Ruth et Job. See Jöcher, Algemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Faber, Frederik William, D.D., an English clergyman and hymn-writer, was born at Calverley, Yorkshire, June 29, 1814. He was educated at Harrow and the University of Oxford, where he became a fellow of University College in 1837. About this time he gave up his Calvinistic views and became an enthusiastic admirer and follower of John H. Newman. In 1841 he travelled on the Continent, and on his return published Sights and Thoughts in Foreign Churches and Among Foreign Peoples, a work of great merit. He now became rector of Elton, in Huntingdonshire, but soon proceeded again to the Continent to study the methods followed by the Roman Catholic Church. Returning to Elton he devoted himself earnestly to his parish, but was constrained to adopt the Romish faith in 1845. On leaving Elton his parishioners sobbed out, "God bless you, Mr. Faber, wherever you go." He founded a religious community at Birmingham, called Wilfsidian, under the name Wilfrid, which Faber assumed. The community was ultimately merged in the oratory of St. Philip Neri, of which father Newman was the head; and in 1849 a branch of the oratory was established in London, over which Faber presided until his death, Sept. 26, 1863. He was a voluminous writer, although it is mainly as a hymn-writer that he will be known in the future. Among his finest compositions of this class are, The Greatness of God; The Word of God; The Eloquent Father; The God of my Childhood; The Pilgrimage of the Night; The Shadow of the Rock. Besides the work above mentioned, he published, previous to his conversion to Romanism, Treats on the Church and the Prayer-Book (1839):—A Sermon on Education (1840):—The Cherwell Water-Lily and Other Poems (1840):—The Sigmian Lake, etc. (1842):—Sir Lancelot, a poem (1844):—The Rosary, etc. (1845), and several other papers. After his conversion he published, Catholic Hymns:—Essay on Justification and Conjuration (1848):—The Spirit and Genius of St. Philip Neri (1850):—Catholic Home Manuals (1851):—All for Jesus (1854):—Growth in Holiness (1855):—The Blessed Sacrament (1856):—The Creator and the Creature (1857):—The Foot of the Cross, or Sorrows of Mary (1858):—Spiritual Conferences (1859), and other works. The only complete edition of his Hymns is the one published by Richardson & Son in 1861 (2d ed. 1871). His Notes on Doctrinal and Spiritual Subjects were edited by father Bowden, and issued after Faber's death. See his Life and Letters, by his brother, Encyclop. Brit. 8th ed. s. v.

Faber, Georg, a Lutheran theologian, was born at Uffenheim, in Franconia, in 1578, and studied at Wittenberg. In 1596 he was preacher at Lichtenau, in 1616 at Nürnberg, where he died, July 16, 1634. He is the author of, Institutiones Grammaticae Hebrazilae (Nürnberg, 1628):—Leccionia Hebrae, Institutio (Anspach, 1627):—Algemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Forst, Ibid. Faber, Matthias, a Jesuit, was born Feb. 24, 1567, at Altmühlstein, in Bavaria. In 1607 he entered the German College at Rome, received holy orders there, and returned to Germany in 1611. In 1687 he went to Vienna and joined the Jesuits, and died at Tyrnavus, in Hungary, in 1683. He is the author of a homiletical work entitled, Conciemania Opus Tripartitum, which has often been published (latest ed. Ratisbon, 1879). Besides he wrote, Rerum Naturalis Descriptio (Dillingen, 1667). See Jöcher, Algemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Literarischer Handwörterbi für das Katholische Deutschland, 1860, No. 266. (B. P.)

Faber, Philip, a Franciscan, and professor of theology at Padua, where he died, Aug. 28, 1830, is the author of, De Primitivi Petri et Pontifici Romani:—De Consuetudinis Ecclesiasticarum:—De Predestination. Fabiola, a Roman lady of an illustrious family. Being married first to a man who became lost in debauchery, she divorced herself from him, and being then but little acquainted with the commands of the gospel, she married a second husband of the same sort as the first. For this act she was excluded from the communion of the Church, to which she eventually returned, after public penitence, with extreme humility. She spent all her fortune for the relief of the poor, and for the establishment of a large hospital at Rome. In A.D. 258 she went to Palestine, and visited Jerome at Bethlehem. The invasion of the Huns into Palestine forced her to leave that country, and she returned to Italy, where she continued to consecrate her life to continual exercises of piety and charity. Fabiola died Dec. 29, 300. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Fabre, Jean, a French preacher, was born at Tarascon, in Provence, about 1570. He entered the order of the Carmelite friars in 1590, and was successively instructor and pastor there for forty-eight years, being enthusiastically attached to the doctrines of Melanchthon. He died in 1666, leaving De Deipunate Confess (1592). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Fabricius, Johannes (1), a German theologian, was born at Nürnberg, March 31, 1616. He studied at Jessen, Wittenberg, and finally at Altorfs, where he became professor of theology in 1649. He was appointed preacher in his native city, and died there about 1690. For his works, which are now of much interest, see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Fagan, Luke, D.D., an Irish prelate, was translated from the diocese of Meath to the see of Dublin in 1279. In 1326, the last of Dr. Fagan’s life, the act was passed (7 Geo. II, c. 6) whereby converts from the Roman Catholic faith, whose wives were of that persuasion, or whose children were educated in it, were prohibited, under severe penalties, from exercising the office of justices of the peace. This prelate did not in any way distinguish himself. See D’Alton, Memoirs of the Aps of Dublin, p. 466.

Fage, Durand, one of the French Illuminati (q. v.), was born at Aubais, in Languedoc, in 1801. After the suppression of the Compagnies in 1795, he submitted to the Church authorities, and was taken across the frontier into France, whence he passed to Holland, and in 1796 went to London. He died, probably, in England about the middle of the 18th century, leaving a work entitled Théâtre Sacré des Cévennes (Lond. 1707, 12mo); reprinted under the title Les Prophétes Protestantts (Paris, 1847, 8vo).

Falstaff, Christian Eik, a Lutheran theologian of Sweden, was born Aug. 30, 1780. In 1802 he was professor of theology at Upsala; in 1819 he was elevated to the episcopal see at Westerna, and died Aug. 6, 1866. He was one of the editors of the Ecclesiastical-Tidskrifter, and published a collection of his writings (Orebro, 1865, 66, 7 vols. (B. P.)

Fajolz, François Louis, a French Protestant theologian, was born at Yerund, in Berne, in 1707. He studied at Basle, where he was also preacher for some time. In 1751 he was called as French preacher to Casel, where he died, Oct. 20 the same year, leaving, Religions de l’Eau (Rotterdam, 1736);—Sermons Diverses (Hamburg, 1749);—Adversus Dissertationem Convenerionis (Marburg, 1743);—Les Paroles de la Vie Éternelle (Schwabach, 1743; Casel, 1752);—Sur la Folie de I’Atheisme (Schwabach, 1749);—Le Petit Catéchisme de Heidelberg (ibid. 1732). See Jöcher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon, a. v. (B. P.)

Fellyon, Michel Étienne, a French theological and historical writer, was born at Tarascon in 1759. He became a Sulpician of Paris, and was sent to Montreal in 1834 as visitor of the houses of that congregation in America. He died in Paris, Oct. 25, 1870. His literary work was confided chiefly to subjects connected with the History of Canada. His publications include, La vie de Madame d’Orléans, foundress of the Grey Sisters (1832);—Life of Madame d’Ossiere, foundress of the Grey Sisters (1832);—Life of the Venrerable Mr. Oller (1838);—Life of Mlle. Mauire, foundress of the Hôtel Dieu (1834);—Life of Mlle. la Ber, the regent of the Grey Sisters; and—a very extended History of the French Colony in Canada (1865-66, 3 vols. 4to), only a small part of his plan.

Falken, an Irish virgin saint, commemorated Jan. 1, was sister of St. Ennem, of noble lineage, and greatly aided him in his religious labors. See Smith, Dict. of Christ. Dict. a. v.

Fairbairn, Patrick, D.D., a Scotch Presbyterian minister, was born at Kallyburn, Berwickshire, Scotland, Jan. 29, 1805. He was educated at the school at Greenlaw, and sent to College at Edinburgh; licensed to preach in 1826; in 1830 went to the Orkney Islands with a family who had large possessions there, and was shortly after ordained pastor of the island parish of North Ronaldsay. In 1833 he was transferred to the parish of Saltoun, East Lothian, where he was when the disruption of the Scottish Church occurred, and he continued in the Free Church there until 1852, when he was appointed first assistant professor, and shortly after professor of divinity in the Free Church College at Aberdeen. In 1853 he was transferred to Glasgow, being the first professor appointed to the Free Church Theological College, and the next year was elected principal of the same. In 1867 he was appointed a delegate from the Free Church of Scotland to visit the churches in America. He died suddenly at Glasgow, Aug. 6, 1874. Dr. Fairbairn’s literary productions were numerous. Besides editing the Imperial Bible Dictionary (2 vols. 8vo), the following may be noted: An Exposition of the First Epistle of St. Peter (1828, 2 vols. 12mo);—Synopsis of Scripture (Edinb. 1845-47, 2 vols. 8vo; Phila. 1850, 8vo);—Commentary on the Psalms, translated from Hengstenberg (1845-48, 8 vols. 8vo);—Preacher, his Life, Character, and Mission (1849, 12mo);—Essai and the Book of His Prophecy (1851, 8vo);—The Revelation of St. John, translated from Hengstenberg (1851, 3 vols. 8vo);—Prophecy, etc. (1856, 8vo);—Hermetical Manual (1858, 8vo);—Pastoral Epistles (1874);—Pastoral Theology (posthumous, 1875);—Law in Scripture (1868). Fairchild, Abbeel Green, D.D., an eminent Presbyterian minister, was born at Hanover, N. J., May 2, 1776, and was early trained by a widowed mother. At the age of thirteen he commenced his classical course at Morristown; in November, 1812, entered the senior class in Princeton College, and graduated in September, 1813. In January, 1814, he made a public profession of religion, and united with the Presbyterian Church of Hanover; in the same year entered the Theological Seminary at Princeton. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New Jersey in April, 1816, and in September following he left the seminary and entered upon a missionary tour of six months in North Carolina, as assistant to Rev. Dr. Hall. Returning home in April, 1817, he spent two months in the missionary field in the north-western part of his native state. In September of the same year he entered upon another missionary tour, under the direction of the Western Missionary Society, spending three months on the wa-ue of the Monongahela, and then three months on the upper branches of the Allegheny. He was taken under the care of the Presbytery of Redstone, April 21, 1818, and was appointed stated supply to the congregation of George's Creek for half his time; on July 1 following was an ordination of an evil being; on Dec. 28, 1822, installed pastor of the churches of George's Creek, Morgantown, and Greensboro, Va., and for the first three years was obliged to make up the deficiency in his salary by teaching; in April, 1827, he was installed pastor of the Tent Church, Pa., where he served for thirty-six years. He died there in June 20, 1864. In Dr. Fairchild's the dignity and simplicity of the Gosp- el ministry were most beautifully combined and exemplified. Besides frequent contributions to the weekly religious press, he published The Great Supper;—Scripti- onal Baptism;—Unpopular Doctrines;—and What Pres-byterian Believers, all issued by the Presbyterian Board of Publication. See Gen. Col. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1861, p. 16; Nevin, Presb. Encyclopa. s.v. (H. O. R.)

FAIRFOWL (or FAIRFALL), ANDREW, a Scotch pres- byterian, was born at Dunfermline, Dec. 14, 1606; graduated from the University of St. Andrews in 1628; early be- came a member of the Free Church, was the first of the Reformed minister of Leith in 1632; afterwards at North Berwick, and then at Dunfermline in 1636. He was preferred to the see of Glasgow, Nov. 14, 1641, by king Charles II, and was consecrated in June, 1692. He died at Edinburgh, Nov. 2, 1653. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 263; Fasti Eccles. Scotiani, i. 578, 519.

Fairly (or Fairly). JAMES, A.M., a Scotch clergy- man, was promoted from regent in the Edinburgh University; admitted to the living at South Leith in 1625; transferred to the professorship of divinity in Edinburgh University in 1629; appointed to the college or second charge, Greigiarus Church, Edinburgh, in 1630; resigned July 28, 1657, having been elected bishop of Argyll, but was deposed by the assembly in 1638. He failed in his suit to obtain the living of Leith and other parishes, was recommended by the Commission of Assembly, and accepted in March, 1644, as minister at Larwood, and was presented to that liv- ing by the king in 1645. He died in February, 1658; aged about seventy years. He published The Museo Welcome, two poems. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiani, i. 43, 105, 299.

Fairy (variously derived from the Celtic, faer, "to charm;" Old English, fen, "a companion;" from faran, "to go," farum, pers; Arab, "a fairy;"") is either from the Late, faerus, through the medieval fae- ter, "enchant;" the French fae, thence faire, "illusion," an illusory or imaginary being, properly female, of supernatural but limited power, common to the popular belief of most European countries. The joy of romance resembles the Greek nymphs, generally represented as a damsel of almost angelic loveliness, who seduced knights into enchanted tales and palaces. Fairy-land was supposed to be sometimes underground, at others amidst wilderness, or even in the ocean. The English spirit or fairy was the lapland elections, called "Robin Goodfellow," corresponds to the German "Knecht Ruprecht," the Scotch "brownie," and the French "esprit follet," or "goblin" (goblin), and the Cornish "pixy." See ELF. Everything known of fairies in the way of sayings and fables came from the Romance people. There were at first only three of these beings, but soon their number swelled to seven, and later to thirteen. Since their num- ber was seven, these are six good and one evil, likewise twelve good, the thirteenth evil. This, probably, is a result of the influence of Christianity, which sought to bring the fairies, as heathen deities, therefore spirits of darkness, into disrepute, which, however, could not be accomplished at once. They are spoken of as super- human, long-liv'd female beings, sometimes good, some- times bad; the former adorned with all the charms of body and spirit, exceedingly beautiful and young, per- fect mistresses of all female arts, and ever ready to help the down-trodden, to lead the lost in the right path, by their gift of sorcery to make the invisible possible, and to use this power as becomes the perfect will of a good spirit; the evil fairies are not a little solicitous to have no power to undo the work of other similar beings. In the French Pyrenees it is believed that if fire be laid on the threshold of a fairy grotto, they immedi- ately change it into the finest thread. On New Year's day the fairies visit the houses whose inmates believe in them, and bring fortune and misfortune to speak out the name of a fairy on the mountains which they inhabit. The fairies are able assistants at births; therefore they are often taken as god-parents, and a place is reserved for them at the table. In France there is a Fête Aréa, which appears at country festivals during the harvesting season, and is diligently reaped; she drops fruit from the trees for good children, and during the Christmas season she distributes nuts and cake, similar to the German Frau Holde. Again, the fairies appear as giant - maidsens, carrying huge rocks on their backs, and pushing their way through the other hand they turn the spindle. On Sat- urdays the power of the fairies leaves them; they there- fore take all kinds of forms on this day, and try to elude the gaze of all eyes. They can hide in a tree, in a horn, in a sword, in a mantle, and this is the origin of the belief that such things are "gekry," that is, pos- sessed of a fairy.

For the literature of the subject see Shakespeare, Middawmmer -Night's Dream; Perrault, Contes de ma Mère l'Oye (1697); Knightley, Fairy Mythology (Lond. 1860); and Scott's writings.

FAITH-CURE. A popular name for certain sudden and remarkable cases of recovery in recent times claimed to have been effected by the power of faith in God alone, without the use of any medicine or physical remedy. We cite a few notable cases from the public prints:

"NEW HAVEN, Conn., March 27. A remarkable faith- cure is reported from the village of Noank. Mrs. Pan- nible S. Spencer, wife of ex-representative Spencer, has for many years been a victim of the opium habit and sickness. Her family is one of the wealthiest and most reputable in eastern Connecticut. She is now sixty-five years old. For forty years she suffered from an attack of ilh-health, and her physician prescribed opium. She is of a nervous temperament. The use of the drug as a medicine developed an appetite for it, to which she gave way after a time. She was also a great snuff-taker, and in addition there was the asthmatic trouble which was brought on by the drug. She was first treated by a local physician, and the doctor declared that an opium habit of forty years' standing was an in- curable disease. One day about a week ago two or three of Mrs. Spencer's friends met at her residence, and a season of prayer was determined upon. Prayers were offered and continued with earnestness by those present for some time. It was during this period Mrs. Spence- rier says she experienced a peculiar sensation of mind and body unlike anything she had felt before in Pittsburgh; July 28, 1864.

"CLEVELAND, June 29. A strange case of faith- cure came to light last week in the case of a young girl named Kerby, who has been an invalid's bed forty years, in a farm-house just out of Chardon, a small town near here. During that time she has been cut out of her feet and face, then only at the expense of great suffering. For twenty- eight years she has not "at any time, yet it is told of her that on Monday, after prayer and an exercise of faith, she arose from her bed, sat in a chair for an hour, and was able to walk once across the room.—The Tribune (N. Y.), July 1, 1884.

Mrs. E. J. Wumpy, wife of John A. Wumpy, a resident of the village of Norcross, twenty miles from the city of Atlanta, Ga., who had not been able to walk upon the bed for twenty-two years in consequence of extreme physical weakness and suffering, was enabled to rise and walk and go about and do as others do without any assistance. She was restored to her former state of health. This was done through the faith that God was able and would heal her by divine power. The fact is abundantly verified by Rev. W. A. Parks, a presiding elder of the North Georgia Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, who observed and witnessed it...—The Way of Holiness, quoted in The Law and Gospel, Paris, Ill., December, 1884.

Many similar instances might easily be collected. In fact, there is a regular hospital, conducted by Dr. Cullis, of Boston, where patients are all sorts of persons, old and young, who come for the healing of more or less trivial complaints. The treatment is by prayer and faith, with no other outward sign than mere touch. Professions of a

It is important to note that while the passage mentions the use of prayer and faith in the treatment of physical ailments, it is not a recommendation for medical use. The text acknowledges the effectiveness of faith in certain cases but emphasizes the importance of seeking proper medical care when necessary. The text also highlights the importance of continued medical research and education, as well as the need for a holistic approach to health and healing. The passage concludes with a call for continued study and exploration into the role of faith in medicine and healthcare. The text is a call to action for those interested in exploring the intersection of faith and medicine, encouraging them to pursue further study and research in this area. The text also highlights the importance of seeking proper medical care when necessary and emphasizes the need for a holistic approach to health and healing. spoke "the prayer of faith." This, however, as the whole passage shows, is not the petition of the patient merely, nor of a self-constituted committee or a few volunteers, but of the regular ecclesiastical authorities, duly and formally canvassed for that purpose. Most judicious expositors hold that this refers to the exercise of the gift "of healing" enjoyed by some early believers as a special endowment of the apostles, and that the direction has therefore ceased to be pertinent in later times. Such has been the practical comment of the Evangelical Church, departed from only by a few ecclesiastical bodies (with whom the exponent has been a signal failure), and by the Roman Catholics (who pervert it to teach "extreme unction"). See Augustino.

Fa'kon, a district in Japan in which there is situated a lake, at the bottom of which the Japanese believe is found a pond for children. On the shore of this lake are built five small wooden chapels, in each of which sits a priest beating a gong, and bowing a samanah. Fa'kon is also the name of a temple in Japan, famous for its relics. It contains the saras of the hero Camis (q. v.), still stained with the blood of those slain in battle; the vestments which were said to have been worn by an angel, and which supplied the place of wings; and the tomb of Joritomo, the first secular emperor of the Japanese.

Falck, Nathaniel, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Danzig, Oct. 11, 1693. He studied at Breslau and Wittenberg, and died at Jena, Aug. 18, 1693, leaving De Deumanolo Religione Autore Falco: Septuagintum Sacram Concordem Sacramentum, etc. See also Jocher, Algemeine Gelehrten-Lezionen, s. v. Falco, Juan Conchillass, a reputable Spanish painter, was born at Valencia in 1651, and studied in the school of Marco. He was much employed for the churches and private collections, and died in 1711. See Sponier, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Falconer, Colin, a Scotch prelate, was born in 1623, studied the liberal arts at St. Leonard's College, and graduated from the University of St. Andrews in 1645. He became a clergyman in 1651, and ministered to the parish of Esau, in the diocese of Moray, and a few years afterwards at Forres, where he continued until promoted to the bishopric of Argyle, Sept. 5, 1675, when he was translated to the see of Moray, Feb. 7, 1680. He died in 1707, and is included in the Scottish Bishops, p. 154, 592; Fasti Eccles. Scotici, iii, 152, 169, 177, 446, 452.

Falconer, John, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, son of Dr. David Falconer, graduated at Edinburgh University in 1679; became chaplain to the family of Wemyss; was admitted to the living at Caribee, May 29, 1686, but deprived by the privy council in 1689 for not praying for the king and queen. He was consecrated a bishop of the Non-Jurant Church at Dundee, April 28, 1708, having the district of Brechin assigned to him in 1708. He died at Lismadie, July 6, 1723, aged about sixty-four years. He wrote a tracts describing the various covenants of God. See Fasti Eccles. Scotici, iv, 413.

Falconer, Thomas, a learned layman, was born at Chester, England, in 1786, and died Sept. 4, 1792. He published, Descriptions for the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper (1786) — Chronological Tables from Solomon to the Death of Alexander the Great (1786). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Am. Authors, s. v.

Falconnier, Etienne Mathier, an eminent French sculptor, was born at Paris in 1716, and entered the school of Lemoine. In 1734 he was admitted to the Royal Academy, and was afterwards appointed professor and rector. Among his most important works in sculpture are Christ's Agony, The Annunciation, and Moses and David, in the Church of St. Roch, at Paris, also St. Ambrose, in the Church of the Invalides. He died in 1791. See Hoeffer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Fall is a name common to many Jewish rabbis:

1. Jacob Joshua, who died at Frankfurt-on-the-Main in 1756, is the author of Novellae on different treaties of the Talmud, for which see Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 271 sq.

2. Joshua ben-Alexander hak-Kohen, who died about 1629, was rabbi at Lemberg, and wrote commentaries on the Jewish ritual, entitled יודיע לארשי רבנו: he also wrote derashas on the Pentateuch. See Fürst, loc. cit. p. 273; De Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Ger. transl.), p. 108.

3. Joshua ben-Joseph, who died in 1648, was rabbi at Cracow, and wrote discussions on some Talmudic treatises. See Fürst, loc. cit. p. 273 sq.

4. Joshua of Lissa, was rabbi at Hamburg, and wrote under the title רדעי מבש, i.e., The Valley of Joshua, expositions on sections of the Pentateuch. See Fürst, loc. cit. p. 278; De Rossi, loc. cit. p. 108; Jocher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lezionen, s. v. (B. P.)

Fall, Ludwig, a Reformed theologian of Germany, was born in 1801. He was first pastor at Landshut, afterwards first preacher at the Reformed Cathedral Church in Breslau, and member of the Silesian consistory. He died at Waldau, near Liegnitz, Aug. 30, 1872, leaving a volume, of sermons, entitled אלומות את ימינו של יוחנן Christus (Breslau, 1848). See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 349, (B. P.)

Fan, Ecclesiastical. See Flabellum.

Fanes, a dissenting minister, and the originator of circulating libraries in London, was born in 1678, and died in 1748. He published several allusions and theological treatises in 1729. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Am. Authors, s. v.

Fano, Fidelis a, an Italian writer, was born Dec. 24, 1838, at Fano, Italy. In 1856 he entered the order of the Franciscans, and was ordained priest in 1859. Having been called to Rome in 1870, he published there Bonaventura Doctrina de Pontifici Primato et Infallibilitate: Ratio Nova Collectio Operum S. Bonaventurae (1874). After having ransacked almost all the European libraries with a view to editing a new and critical edition of Bonaventura's works, for which he seemed to have been specially adapted, he died Aug. 12, 1881, at the College of S. Bonaventura in Quaracchi, near Florence. His notes, comprising several folio volumes, are in the hands of F. Ignatius, one of the first assistants of Fidelis, who will probably bring about the publication of the works of the doctor Sorapuccius. (B. P.)

Fano, Menachem Asaria di, a Jewish rabbi, who died at Mantua in 1638, is famous alike for his Talmudic and Cabalistic lore. Most of his writings are on the Talmud, for which see Fischi, s. v.; De Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Ger. transl.), p. 103 sq.; Wolf, Bibl. Hebran., i, No. 772; iii, No. 1447. (B. P.)

Fano. (1) A head-dress worn by the pope when he celebrates mass pontifically. It is in the shape of a veil variegated, like the Mosaic ephod, with four colors, symbolizing the four elements, put over the head after the cope was vested with the alb, and tied round the neck, forming a kind of hood, the tiara or other head-dress being put on above
FARMA, Richard, D.D., a learned English divine, was born at Leicester in 1755, and educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, of which he became master in 1776. He subsequently became vice-chancellor and principal librarian of the university, and obtained prebends at Lichfield and Canterbury. He exchanged the latter for a canonry at St. Paul's. Both an English and Irish bishopric were offered him and declined. He died in 1797. In 1756 he issued proposals for publishing a history of the town of Leicester, from the MSS. of Thomas Stavely. He found the work too laborious, and gave his materials to John Nichols, who published it under the title, History and Antiquities of Leicester (1795-1811). See Chalmers, Biog. Faro (or Burgundofaro), Saint, was born in Burgundy about 592, being the son of Agneric, one of the principal officers of Theobert, king of Austrasia, and was educated at the court of that prince. In 618 he went to Rome to Clotari II, by whom he was highly esteemed. He then renounced the world, with the consent of his wife Blisedilade, received the clerical tonsure in Meaux, and was elected bishop of that city in 627. He administered his diocese with great zeal, died in 672, and was buried in the abbey of Sainte-Croix, near Meaux. He is commemorated Oct. 29. Roman, Nouv. Biog. Farfaro, Michael Angel, a native of Crete, who died March 6, 1715, joined the Minorites and studied at Padua. He was chaplain to pope Alexander VIII., and was elevated to the episcopate see at Trau, in Dalmatia, by Clement XI. He wrote, Conciones in Sacella Piontijica Habitat: Synopsis Controversiarum Grecorum cum Latinis in Casu Catholi Castamatione B. Jacobis de Marchis (3 vols.). The latter work made him the especial favor of the Roman see and the cardinale, which was designed for him. See Jöcher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon, a. v. (B. F.)

Farquharson, James, F.R.S., LL.D., a Scotch clergyman, son of the excise officer at Crail, was born in 1718; graduated at the University and King's College, Aberdeen, in 1738; was appointed schoolmaster of the parish the same year; presented by the prince regent to the living at Alford in August, and ordained Sept. 17, 1718. He died Dec. 8, 1845. His attainments in meteorological science were of a very high order. He was a frequent contributor to various learned periodicals, and corresponded with most of the learned men in Europe. He published, A New Illustration of the Latter Part of Daniel's Last Vision and Prophecy (Lond., 1838). His last work is An Essay on Cutting Grain with the Scythe, in the Transactions of the Highland Society; besides many papers in the Philosophical Transactions;—also An Account of the Parish. See Farii Eccles. Scotiensi, iii, 547.

Farr, Anson A., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Middlebury, Vt., Aug. 29, 1810. He joined the Church in 1826, and in 1839 entered the Troy Conference, wherein he labored earnestly and faithfully as a pastor, chaplain, and missionary until 1869, when he became ill, and died Nov. 4, 1874, honored as a sort of "veteran reservist" in all useful labor. See Minutes of the Annual Conference, 1875, p. 65.
FARRAR, ABBRAH. ECCLES, an English Wesleyan minister, was of a family somewhat distinguished in decimal lists. His father (John) was a Methodist mis-dent of the British and Foreign Bible Society in 1870, and is author of Dictionary of the Bible and other valuable works; his er elder son, Wesley, entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1846, and his youngest son is canon of Durham and author of the Critical History of Free Thought. Abraham E. was born at Sowerby, a village overhanging the vale of Todmorden, April 20, 1788. From 1797 to 1801 he was at the Kingwood School. Soon after his return home he gave his heart to God. He was arrited at an attorney at Sunderland, but in 1807 was rescribed into the ministry. His first field was Holderness, where this talent was not recognized, and where he was subcected to all the humiliating trials that mobs and persecutors made order the day of the week by the early Methodist preachers (Stevens, Hist. of Methodism, iii, 211 sq.; Smith, Hist. of W. Mecl. Meth., 451 sq.). He seemed to lose the confidence of his brethren, and in 1843 he was made to take the superintendence of some school in connection with his own work. The next year he was constituted with important offices. While the fire of youth was still burning upon the altar, and the gravity of age and the maturity of intellect gave evidence of long years of usefulness, he was suddenly called away. On April 1, 1849, in great pain, he preached an anniversary sermon in the East London Circuit, and died one week there.

Farrar was amiable, courteous, diligent, and sympathetic. He had a mind of critical, reflective, and ana-litical power. He wrote, The Condemner of Methodism Condemned (1814)—Religious Instruction of Children Entertainingly Related (1821)—The Juvenile Gospel
(1825)—The Benefits of Method's Advent, a sermon (1842)— Sketches of Popular Antiquities for the Young (1850). See

Fassil, HIRSH B., a Jewish rabbi, was born at Baumgarten, Moravia, in 1801. He was one of the first preachers at Prosniitz, in Moravia; and from 1851 until his death, in December, 1888, at Gross-Kaniza, in Hungary. He wrote, Das mosaisch-ribaische Civil-reclt (Gross-Kaniza, 1852-54, 2 vol.);—Das mosaisch-ribaische Gerichtsfuhr (ibid. 1888);—Das mosaisch-ribaische Tugend- und Rechtslehre (ibid. ed.);—
Das mosaisch-ribaische Strafrecht und strafrechtlienumeration of the months and days of the year, the various dates belonging to a calendar, and the several festivals arranged under their appropriate titles. From the adoption of the practice of preparing such tables, it was customary for the priests to proclaim the different festivals, for the information of the people.

Fáté (or Batassé) Version of the Scriptures.
This language is spoken on the island of Fáté, or Sandwich island, the centre of the New Hebrides. In 1865 the British and Foreign Bible Society, arranged with the Rev. D. Morrison of Errakor, and printed at Sydney in 1866.
From the annual report of the British and Foreign Bible Society for 1866 we subjoin the following:
"The history of the gospel in Fáté has been peculiar and interesting. For about a quarter of a century the brethren of the London Missionary Society have had native teachers from Samoa and Rotuma laboring on this island. Several of those devoted men were barbarously murdered by the natives; several more of them fell victims to the sickly climate, and some of them left the island to recruit their enfeebled health elsewhere. At times as many as six or eight stations were occupied by teachers, but, owing to the above causes, for the last ten or twelve years only one, or, at times, two stations could be kept open; the others relapsed to heathenism. But in one of these stations, Errakor, the chief of the natives and the wise of the people embraced Christianity; and although at one time for two years they had no teacher living among them, they held fast to the faith in the name of Christ. Before he was heathen. Errakor was like an oasis in the desert.
Six years ago we sent into this station a Pentecostal teacher.
One of them died about three years ago; the other died in August last. This year we reopened one of the old stations, and our missionaries from Fáté are expected next months ago, when we settled Mr. Morrison at Errakor, he found a population of one hundred and sixty, all Christian. Of these sixty were children. The present station there is another station at Pangó, about three miles distant, occupied by four people, the chief and a part of the people are Christians. Mr. Morrison has had no nosentials as yet from the heathen; but there is evidently a softening process going on around, and from the growing intelligence and increased vigor of Christian character observable at Errakor, there can be little doubt that from this centre the gospel may spread to the regions beyond, till all Fáté shall receive the gospel of salvation.
In 1870 the gospel of John was printed at Auckland,
New Zealand, the translation having been made by the Rev. James Cosh. This gospel was followed by the translation of that of Luke and the book of Genesis. In 1880 the Acts of the Apostles were, also print-ted, the translation having been made by the Rev. J. W.
Mackenzie. (B. F.)

Fathath (prefix or introduction) is the title of the first chapter of the Koran, which consists only of the following short prayer: "Praise be to God, the Lord of all creatures, the most merciful, the king of all acts of decision. Thee do we worship, and of thee do we ask assistance. Direct us in the right way, in the way of those to whom thou hast been gracious; not of those against whom thou art incensed, nor of those who go astray."

was married to Ali, the cousin of Mohammed, of whom she was the only wife. She died in 682. The Arabian dynasty of the Fatimites, which from 369 to 1171 ruled over Egypt and the northern part of Africa and latterly over Syria and Palestine, claimed to be descended from Fatima. The religious tenets of their adherents differed considerably from those of the orthodox Mohammedans, and in time they sought to give to the Koran an allegorical interpretation, so as to avoid obdiance to its literal precepts. The Shitee, including the Mohammedans of Persia, held both Ali and Fatimaci as well as the twelve Imams, in the utmost veneration, while they regard Abubeker, Omar, and Othman as usurpers of the caliphate. They venerate Fatima as a saint, and the Shitee afford us the only instance which occurs in Islamism of giving religious honor to a woman. She was one of the four women whom the prophet regarded as perfect.

Faudoas, Pierre Paul, Baron de, a French prelate, was born at Lalanne, April 1, 1750, of a noble family in reduced circumstances. Having entered into orders, he became titular of the abbey of Gaillac in 1758. During the revolution he was obliged to emigrate, and, returning to France, found himself compromised in some conspiracies of the royalists, but was advanced to the bishopric of Meaux in January, 1806. Thereafter he attached himself to the court of Louis XVIII, on his restoration, left him in a sort of disgrace until his death in 1819. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Fauns, a species of demi-gods, inhabiting the forests, called also Sylyene, satyrs. They were sons of Fauns and Fauna, or Fatias, king and queen of the Latins, and, though accounted semi-divine, were supposed to die after a long life. They were Roman deities, unknown to the Greeks, and were represented with horns on their heads, pointed ears, and crowned with branches of the pine, while their lower extremities resembled those of the goat. Later, when Greek mythology was introduced, they were often confounded with Pan. They were of a musical and voluptuous character. Female fauns are also spoken of.

Faust, Isaac, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Strasburg, June 10, 1631, and died there, a doctor and professor of theology. He wrote dissertations in Latin on various passages of Scripture. See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten- Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Faust, Johann, brother of Isaac, was born at Strasburg, Sept. 22, 1632, and died there, July 1, 1698, a doctor and professor of theology. He wrote monographs in Latin on several Scriptural subjects. See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Fay, Antoine de la. See LAFAY.

Faye, Jean de, a French prelate, was born in the second part of the 12th century, of a noble family of Touraine. He was dean at the cathedral church of Tours, when, in 1208, he was called to the metropolitan see of that city by the majority of the suffragan bishops, but not by the pope. He introduced the Minims into the city of Tours. He had great disputes with Maurice, bishop of Mans, whom he suspended from his pastoral functions; and excommunicated Pierre Maurici for persecuting Étienne, bishop of Nantes. De Faye died April 29 or 26, 1228. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Fayet, Jean Jacques, a French prelate, was born at Mende, July 26, 1787; studied law at Paris; entered the Minorite order at St. Sulpuie, and there directed the catechismal exercises. In 1811 he was ordained; became principal of the college of Mende in 1814; was made bishop of the northern part of Africa, and then of the Lebanon; went on a mission through the country; joined the editorial staff of Le Conservateur; went to Rouen as grand-vicar; in 1832 became assistant to the archbishop there; bishop of Orleans in 1842; and died April 4, 1846. FELLER, IGNATIUS, a Roman Catholic theologian and prelate of Germany, was a Moravian by birth. In 1818 he received holy orders:—was in 1829 professor of theology at the Lyceum in Olmütz; in 1827 first rector of the newly founded university there; in 1830 professor at the Vienna University; in 1831 court chaplain; and in 1840 court preacher there. In 1852 he was consecrated bishop of St. Pölten, and died Sept. 27, 1865. He wrote, Historia S. S. in Villam creatam Aquinata et Laur. Justinianni (Vienna, 1839).—Predigt vor der heilige Messe (ibid. 1844).—Der geistige Kampf in Predigten (ibid. 1861, translated also into Italian) (B. P.)

Feistir or DJONUS THE CULDEE. The word feistir, derived from "feil," the Irish equivalent of "vigil," is applied to the metrical festosy composed by Ænhus the Culdee about the year 800. It is the most ancient of six martyrlogies belonging to Ireland. It consists of three parts: (1) Five quaternains invoking a blessing on the poet and his work; (2) a foreface of one hundred and twenty quatrains; and (3) the festosy itself, in three hundred and sixty-five quatrains, for every day in the year.

FELDMOER, ANDREAS BERNHARD, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born at Hofgarten, in the Tyrol, in 1777. He took holy orders in 1806, and was for some time professor of theology at Innsbruck. In 1821 he was called to Tübingen, where he died, July 20, 1831. Besides contributing to the Tübinger Theologische Quartalschrift, he wrote Einleitung in die Bücher des Neuen Bundes (Innsbruck, 1810; Tübingen, 1830). See Winer, Handb. der theol. Lit. i, 18, 73; Liitzenkircher, Biogr. Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Feki, THE BLIND MEN OF, an order of blind devotees in Japan, instituted in A.D. 1150. There is a leg- end that their founder, Feki, was captured by Joritomo. The captive, though kindly treated, not being able to look upon his captor without an irresistible desire to kill him, protected his eyes and presented them to Joritomo. There is another more ancient but less nu- merous order of the blind, claiming as its founder a son of one of the emperors of Japan, who cried himself blind at the death of his beautiful princess. This last so- ciety is composed of none but ecclesiastics; the other consists of secular persons of all ranks. They are not supported by alms, like many other devotees, but most of them are mechanics, who earn their own living.

FELDBINGER, JEREMIAS, a Soicinian, who was born at Brieg, in Silesia, April 27, 1616, was for some time rector at Coslin, in Pomerania, and afterwards chorister at the principal school in Steitn. On account of his So- cian tenacious he had to give up his position, and went to Holland, where he died in 1687. He wrote, Demonstrationes Christianae (1653).—Die Lehre von der Heiligkeit, etc. (1654).—Epistola ad Christianos omnium Abissiniae Deum, Puttem, etc. (1672). He also translated into German the Confession of Faith, eccia Nomina Ecclesiastica, got in Polonia omnium Deum Prophecia (1659).

Felder, FRANZ CARL, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born Oct. 6, 1766. He studied at Dillingen, where Sailer was among his teachers. In 1789 he took holy orders, and in 1794 became pastor at Waltershausen, where he died, June 1, 1818. He published, Festsprüchlich (Ulm, 1804-5, 2 vols.): —Adversus Ruckersianum Sacrorum, —Katholische Religionslehre (Constance, 1806-8, 3 vols.): —Neues Magazin für Katholische Religionslehre (1809-16). 8 vols.: —Literaturzeitung für Katholische Religionslehre (Landshut, 1810-18, 7 vols.): —Gelehrten-Lexikon der Katholischen Geistlichkeit in Bayern und der Sachsen (ibid. 1818; the second and third vols. were edited by Waitsinger, 1820-22). See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschland., i, 597 sq.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit., i, 12, 856; ii, 42, 112, 151. (B. P.)

Feldhoff, FRIEDRICH AUGUST, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Elberfeld, Nov. 19, 1800. He studied at Heidelberg and Berlin; was for some time assistant in the Elberfelder pastor of his native place, and accepted a call to Nymwegen, in Holland, in 1828. In 1828 he was called to Wuppertal, and died Jan. 8, 1844. He wrote, Die Zeitlinie der heiligen Schrift (Frankfort, 1831): —Ueber die Jahre der Geburt und Anerkennung unseres Herrn (ibid. 1832): —Die Weltgeflugel der Genezis (Elberfeld, 1837): —Gnomen zur Geschichte des vier Weltalter (Barmen, 1840): —Christliche Gelehrte (ibid. ed.): —Friedliche Blüten (ibid.): See Koch, Gelehrte des deutschen Kirchengedenken, vii, 197 sq.; Zuchold, Bibl. Theol., i, 352. (B. P.)

Félici, GUILLAUME ADAM, professor and dean of the Protestant faculty of Montauban, was born at Octobre, in 1803. He studied at Strassburg; was in 1836 pastor at Bolbec; in 1838 called to the chair of ethics and horticulture at Montauban, and in 1853 was made dean of the faculty. In 1870 he retired from public activity, and died at Lausanne, Oct. 28, 1871. Félici was a very excellent preacher. Besides his contributions to Les Archives du Christianisme, L'Esquif, New York Observer, and the Evangelical Christendom, he published, Essai sur l'Esprit et le But de l'Institution Pratique, a prize essay (Paris, 1823): —Appel d'un Christien aux gens de Lettres (ibid. 1844); —Germe transl. by Dieliez, Berlin, 1848: —Histoire des Protestants de France (4th ed. Toulouse, 1861; translated into four different languages). See Bélecourt, G. de Félici, Professeur et Prédicateur; Recollin, in Lichtenberger's Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, v. v.; Zuchold, Bibl. Theol., i, 352 sq. (B. P.)

Félician, SOZ, was arrested at Rome for being a Christian, in company with his brother Primus. The two were brought before the emperor Maximian Herculæ, who, on their refusing to sacrifice to idols, condemned them to be publicly scourged. He then sent them to Promotus, the judge of Norimberg, a city four days journey distant from Rome. Promotus not being able to shake their resolution, beheaded them both, in the year 286 or 287. Mureri says that "the acts of these martyr do not seem authentic," however it be, the church honors their anniversary on June 9. See Hofer, Nov. Bisg. Générale. v.

Félician, a noted Donatist bishop of Musti, somewhere in Africa, deeply implicated in the controversy concerning Priscillianus, at the close of the 4th century, and finally deposed. See Smith, Dict. of Christ. Bisg. v.

Féliciano, DOMINICUS, an Italian prelate and poet, was born in the canton of Vaul in 1652. He was educated in philosophy, mathematics, jurisprudence, belles-lettres, and wrote very fluently in Latin. Being as first attached to cardinal Salviati, he became secretary to pope Paul V, who appointed him bishop of Foligno, where he died, Oct. 2, 1682. He left Rime Diversi, Morti, Espritsulii (Foligno, 1683), and several volumes of letters in Latin and Italian. See Hofer, Nov. Bisg. Générale. v.

Félicien de SAINT-JACQUES-DU-MONTE, a French Carmelite monk, was born in the beginning of the 17th century, at Nantes. He taught theology in his native town and at Bonnards; afterwards became prior of Agen; and at last definitor of the province of Touraine. He distinguished himself by his great knowledge and regular habits. Being suspected as a Jansenist, he returned to Nantes, where he died in 1683, leaving Defensio Præsidii Dietici (Bordeaux, 1657, 3 vols.): —Nove Eligosae Methodus (Paris, 1660). See Hofer, Nov. Bisg. Générale. v.

Félix is the name of a very large number of early Christians, among whom we notice the following: (1) Bishop of Aptunga, apparently in proconsular Africa; prominent in the controversy concerning the ordination of Cæcilianus (q. v.) to the see of Carthage, early in the 4th century. (2) The apostle of the East Angles and first bishop of Dunwich; died cir. A.D. 467, and commemorated as a saint March 8. (3) Donatist bishop of Idisia, in Numidia, in 361; guilty of great excesses. (4) Saint, bishop of Nantes, in Brittany, in 560; died Jan. 6, 582; commemorated July 7. (5) First bishop of Nocera (or Nocera), in Umbria, in 402. (6) Archbishop of Seleucia, a native of Armenia, martyred by the Saracens, and burned, but afterwards restored, and died Nov. 25, 724. (7) Metropolitan bishop of Seville; confirmed by the Council of Toledo near the close of the 7th century. (8) Bishop of Siponto; addressed by Gregory the Great in 591 and 593. (9) Bishop of Treves in 386; resigned about 398. (10) Bishop of Tubaza, murdered under Diocletian in 303, and commemorated as a saint Oct. 24. (11) Abbot of a little monastery in Byzacena, to which Fulgentius (q. v.) retired early in the 6th century. (12) Surnamed Genuanus, a reader, of Abitina, in Africa, martyred at Cartagene under Anulius, the proconsul, with Dativus (q. v.), and commemorated as a saint. Feb. 12. (13) A native of Scilla, martyred at Cartagene under Severus (A.D. 200 or 202), along with Perpetua (q. v.) and others; commemorated July 17.

Félix de CASTRILIO, SAINT, an Italian monk, was born at Castilion, Umbria, in 1513. He took the habit of a Capuchin, in 1543, at Ascoli. In 1548 he was sent to Rome as a mendicant friar. During a plague which desolated Rome in 1560, Félix made himself remarkable by his truly Christian zeal; as also during a famine in 1565. In spite of his privations and penances he lived to the age of seventy years. On June 17 he bestrayed him Oct. 1, 1565; Innocent X commenced his canonization Feb. 6, 1692, and Clement XI finished it, May 8, 1709. See Hofer, Nov. Bisg. Générale. v.

Fell, Samuel, D.D., a learned English divine, was born in the parish of St. Clement Danes, London, in 1596, and was educated at Christ Church, Oxford. In 1628 he was made Master of divinity; and had a prebend at Worcester. He was then a Calvinist, but, renouncing that system, he was made dean of Liebfeld in 1637, and in 1638 dean of Christ Church. He was appointed vicar-general in 1645, which office he retained until 1647. He died Feb. 7, 1648-9. He published some Latin Works; see Scriptorum Selectiorum Canonum, 2 vols., Indices Bibliographicus iuniores, 1676, 2 vols. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s.v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s.v.

Fellon, Thomas Bemard, a French Jesuit, was born at Avignon, July 12, 1672, and died March 25, 1759. He published, Paraphrase des Psaumes: — Traité de l'Amour de Dieu Selon François de Sales (Nancy, 1754, 3 vols.). See Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s.v.; Jocher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon, s.v. (B.P.)

Fela, a name common to several Protestant theologians:
1. Johann Heinrich, who was born at Lindau in 1750, and died at Konstanz in 1790, as the author of Cursus Confessionis Tetrapolitanae Fortensa (Göttingen, 1775). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit., 1, 392.
2. Johann Michael, professor of theology and preacher at St. Gall, was born there in 1761, and died Sept. 21, 1833. He is the author of Die Kirchliche Erbauung der Konfessionen (St. Gall, 1829), Demokrat katholischer Reformer im Vorzeugen (ibid. 1819). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit., 1, 559, 749.
3. Sebastian, was born Sept. 20, 1697, at Kempten, in Swabia. He studied at Halle and Jena, and died at Lindau, May 18, 1749, leaving De Protestantismo Justificativo (1718). See Jocher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon, s.v. (B.P.)

Fela, Christian Lebrecht, a Jewish convert of Prague, was born in 1640, and died in Hamburg in 1719. He was professor of Hebrew at various universities and gymnasias, and wrote, סדר חילגון תבנית בד', i.e., Hodegus Judaeorum (Leipzig, 1705): — Breviar et Præpiscis et Ad Limina Sancta (Sondershausen, 1707): — Breviar et Præpiscis et Ad Auctoretonum (Wittenberg, 1700). Felton, Nicholas, D.D., an English prelate, was born at Boddam, in Aberdeenshire, 1553, and educated at Pembroke Hall, where he became fellow Nov. 27, 1583. He was rector of St. Mary-le-Bow, Jan. 17, 1596, and some time of St. Antholin's, London. He was elected master of Pembroke Hall, June 29, 1616, and admitted rector of Great Easton, in Essex, Oct. 20 following; in the same year collated to a prebend in St. Paul's, and in 1617 promoted to the see of Bristol, to which he was consecrated Dec. 14. In 1618 he was nominated to the bishopric of Coventry and Lichfield, but translated to Ely March 11 of that year. He died Oct. 5, 1626. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s.v.

Feltus, Henry J., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in 1775. He was a native of Ireland, and came to America when quite a young man. Having been for some time a preacher in another communion, he was admitted into the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal Church in 1798. He officiated for a period, when he became rector of Trinity Church, Sweethourborough, N. J., whence he was called, in 1808, to the rectory of St. Ann's Church, Brooklyn, L. I., and thence, in 1824, to that of St. Stephen's Church, New York city. He died Aug. 24, 1826. Dr. Felitus was distinguished for piety, and fidelity in the discharge of all his ministerial duties. He was humble and affecionate, and much beloved and respected by his congregation. See The Christian Journal (N. Y.), 1828, p. 287.

Feuring, Johann Paul, a German theologian, was born at Nitreberg in 1616. Having been professor at Altdorf, he took part in the religious controversies of the time, and distinguished himself by his zeal against the writings of the Socinians, in opposition to whom he put forth, Anti-Otiorodius: — Defensio pro A. Graunero contra Hermannum. He died in 1691. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s.v.

Feun, John, a Roman Catholic divine of the 16th century, was born at Montacute, Somersetshire. He was educated at New College, Oxford, where he continued till ejected by the queen's commissioners for his zeal for Romanism. He was then schoolmaster at Bury St. Edmund's, till removed on the same account. He fled to Flanders, thence to Italy, and at last fixed his residence at Louvain, where he died in 1618. He wrote and translated many books, living to celebrate his fiftieth year of exile beyond the seas. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), iii, 156; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s.v.

Fensberg, Johann Michael, a German Jesuit, was born Feb. 9, 1751, at Oberndorf, in Switzerland. In 1778 he was professor at the gymnasium in Ingolstadt, in 1795 preacher at Seer, in 1805 at Vöhringen, near Ulm, where he died, Oct. 12, 1812. Fensberg is the author of several books which have been translated into various languages, and are found in Fuchs, Sammlung Erbauender Lieder (Kempten, 1812). See Sailer, Aus Fensbergs Leben (Munich, 1814); Koch, Geschichte des deutschen Kirchenliedes, vi, 558 sq. (B.P.)

Fenner, William, a minister of the Church of England, was born Jan. 21, 1831, at Southwark. In 1854 he entered the college of the London Jews' Society, and in 1857 was appointed lay missionary among the Jews of the duty of Pozen. In 1860 Mr. Fenner was to reopen the mission in Tunis, and was ordained by bishop Tomlinson of Gibraltar. He died at Tunis, July 22, 1874. (B.P.)

Fenouillet (or Fenuillet), Pierre de, a French prelate, was born at Annecy (Savoy), studied there, entered into orders, became theological tutor at Gap, and then went to Paris, where he became preacher to Henry IV. In 1607 he was nominated bishop of Montpellier, and in 1609 was consecrated at Avignon, but he became so zealous for Romanism that the Protestants complained of his rigor, and he abandoned his diocese and joined the royal army, July 2, 1621. He was afterwards busy in commissions until his return to Montpellier, Oct. 20, 1638. In 1642 he took part on some religious matters, he died there, Nov. 23, leaving a number of addresses, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s.v.

Feunis (or Fenris), in Scandinavian mythology, was a wolf, the frightful son of the evil Loke and the giantess Angerboda. The Asa knew the danger that threatened them from the children of this pair, therefore they brought Fenris up, in order to moderate his wildness, which was so great that only one Asa, the strong and wise Tyr, could bring food to him. The gods attempted to bind him, and laid two huge chains on him, Lending and Droma, but when he stretched himself they flew apart. Then the Asas ordered a band to be made, which appeared to be of silk, but was composed of the beard of a woman, the root of a mountain, the breath of a fish, the saliva of a bird, and the muscles of a bear; this was called Gleipnir. It was light, but the wolf did not allow it to be laid on him. Pari had become much stronger since tearing the two chains. The Asas began to persuade him, telling him that if he did not expose himself to some danger he would never become renowned; the band was certainly stronger than it appeared to be, but they would lose him in case he were too weak.

"If I do not free myself," Fenris answered. "I know what awaits me; therefore let it not touch my feet. There must be some magic in play; but if you are honest, let one lay his hand into my throat as an assurance of your sincerity." After much persuasion, Tyr assented to lay his hand into the wolf's throat; the band was adjusted, but when Fentir wanted to stretch himself, he found that the band gradually contracted. Then the Asas laughed, except Tyr, for his hand had been bitten off. Fentir is one-handed, and they might have killed the monster, but the sanctity of the place forbade it. They therefore took one end of the band, called Gelgia, drew it through a rock, Gjol, and with the aid of another rock, Twite, they, hammering the first still deeper into the earth, and Sven, who wanted to devour all who came near him, they put a sword into his throat, so that the handle lay in the upper, the blade in the lower jaw, and Fentir was made harmless. His body has grown so that by opening his mouth he touches heaven and earth. Eventually he will free himself, unite with his sister, the Midgdrænauke, and with the sons of Surtur, in war against the Asas, devour the sun, and even the god Odin; but finally the god Allvathur will tear his throat so far apart that he will die. Odin will come from his grave, and the world will be renewed. Fentir has three sons, Skoll and Hati, by the giantess Grige; Skoll persecutes the sun, Hati devours the moon. See Norse Mythology.

Fenton, Roger, D.D., an Anglican clergyman of the 16th century, was born in Lancashire, became fellow of Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, and was the laborious, pious, beloved, and learned minister of St. Stephen's, Wallbrook, London. He was a friend of Dr. Nicholas Felton, Collegiates and city ministers together. Fenton died in London in 1615, in his fiftieth year, leaving a testament against usury. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall).

Fenwick, Benedict Joseph, a Roman Catholic bishop, was born at Lelandown, Md., Sept. 3, 1782. He was made bishop of Boston, Mass., Nov. 1, 1825, a diocese which then had only three priests. He enlarged his cathedral, established schools, started a theological seminary, introduced the Sisters of Charity through Ann Alexa in 1832, saw the first synod of Boston assembled in 1842, the erection of a new see of Hartford in 1844, founded the College of the Holy Cross at Worcester, through the Jesuits, the great Catholic university of New England, and died in Boston after an energetic episcopate, Aug. 11, 1846, prudent, learned, and holy. See De Courcy and Shea, Hist. of the Cath. Church in the U. S. p. 659.

Fenwick, Edward, a Roman Catholic bishop, was born at Cincinnati, Jan. 13, 1822, a see which then included Ohio, Michigan, and Wisconsin. He built churches throughout his vast diocese, dedicated the Cathedral of Cincinnati in 1826, called in the aid of the Sisters of St. Dominic, Sisters of Charity, and the Poor Clares, founded in his city the Athenaeum, now St. Xavier's College, and in 1831 established the Catholic Telegraph, the oldest of American Catholic papers. Edward Fenwick died of cholera at Wooster, O., Sept. 26, 1832. See De Courcy and Shea, Hist. of the Cath. Church in the U. S. p. 547.

Fenwick, Michael, an eccentric preacher, connected with the early Methodist movement in England, commenced to preach in 1768, and travelled some time with Wesley, until the latter, on account of Fenwick's peculiarities, disapproved him. He almost idolized Wesley, and imitated him so accurately in speaking, praying, preaching, and writing, that it was difficult to discriminate between them. Though imprudent, his courage and zeal for Methodist never changed. He was a member of the circuit, nor was he ever acknowledged as a preacher for several years before his death. Yet he always attended the place of the annual conference, and continued there during its session, though he was not permitted to be present in conference after 1784. The conference therefore appointed him a pittance amounting to 20 guineas, and many generous friends in different parts of the kingdom, in the house of one of whom he lived (in Briddles- ton) for some years before his death, in 1797. See Atmore, Meth. Memorial, s. v.

Feolocild, archbishop of Canterbury, was consecrated June 9, 922, to that see, but died Aug. 29 following. He had formerly been abbot of one of the Kentish monasteries. See Hook, Lives of Alfa. of Canterbury, i, 283 sq.; Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Foralia, a festival of the ancient Romans, observed annually in honor of the manes of deceased friends and relations. It was instituted by Numa, and lasted eleven days. The family and acquaintances of the deceased went to the graves and walked round them, offering up prayers to the gods of the infernal regions in behalf of their dead friends. An entertainment was then prepared and placed on a great stone, and of this the dead were supposed to partake. During the entire days of the feast, no marriages were allowed to be celebrated, and the worship of the other deities was suspended, all their temples being shut.

Fortat, in Mohammedanism, is separation from God, the greatest and severest punishment for the damned.

Fober, Johann Jacob, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Strasburg in 1875. He studied at different universities, and died at his native place, Feb. 12, 1717; shortly after he was called there as professor of theology. He wrote, De Certitudine Theologica Naturale (Wittenberg, 1708);—De ii qua in Philosophia Morali Ermine Sumt (ibid. 1709);—De Theologia Experimentalis (ibid. 1711);—De Principio Cartesiæ de Omnibus est Dubitandum (ibid. 1716). See Jücher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexicon, s. v. (B. P.)

Ferdinand. See Fernando.

Ferdinand, Philip, a Jewish convert, was a native of Poland. He was professor of Hebrew at Oxford and Cambridge, instructed the famous Scaliger in the Talmud, and died in 1598. He wrote, Haec sunt Verba Dei, in which he treated of the Jewish precepts, laws, feasts, etc. (Cambridge, 1587). See Fürst, Bibliothek, i, 729; Wolf, Bibli. Hebr. i, No. 1823; iii, No. 1832; Jücher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexicon, s. v.; Rok, Die Evangelischen Lehrer von Deutschland und die Juden (Karlsruhe, 1844), p. 186 sq. (B. P.)

Fergus, Saint, a primitive Scotch bishop and confessor, commemorated Nov. 15 to 18, was probably of Irish birth, and passed through Scotland from the west southward, planting churches and converting the natives to Christianity. See Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Ferguson, John, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born in Kent County, Md., Dec. 8, 1751. A Scotch schoolmaster became interested in him as a pupil and took him to Edinburgh, paying the expenses of his education at the university. In 1782 he was an instructor in the Kent County School at Chestertown, Md. When Washington College, the oldest in the state, was organized in 1783, he was chosen professor of languages, mathematics, and natural philosophy, and held the position till 1793, when he was appointed president. After studying theology, he was admitted to deacon's orders, Aug. 5, 1786, to priest's, Aug. 7 of the same year, and became rector in St. Paul's Parish, Kent County, Md., where he served until 1799. In 1804 he retired to his farm, near Georgetown Cross Roads, where he spent the rest of his life. He died March 10, 1866. Of the General Convention of 1789, which framed the constitution of the Church, he was an active member. He was more distinguished as a scholar than as a preacher, see Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 342.

Ferguson, James, LL.D., a Scotch clergyman,

born in Dolphinston, studied at the United College, and graduated at the University of St. Andrews in 1768; was licensed to preach in October, 1768; presented to the living at Dolphinston in September, 1772, and ordained April 7, 1773; transferred to Pettinain, Feb. 22, 1780, and died May 18, 1803, aged fifty-six years, much esteemed for his talents. He published An Account of the Parish of Pettinain. See Fusti Eccles. Scotiæ, i. 221; ii, 332.

FERGUSON, Robert, D.D., LL.D., an English Congregational minister, was born in Glasgow, May 12, 1866; educated at Hoxton College, and entered upon his ministry at Haddington about 1826. He afterwards presented to the living of Castlegate, Haddington, ten years at Ryde, beginning with 1849, and then, returning to London, undertook the charge of Portland Chapel, St. John's Wood, but resigned six years later in order to devote his energies more directly to the establishment of the Pastors' Retiring Fund, of which he was one of the original founders. He died March 27, 1875.

As a preacher Mr. Ferguson was in a marked degree argumentative and rhetorical, though not to the exclusion of the practical. As a writer he was elegant, persuasive, and forcible. Among other interesting productions of his pen are, Sacred Studies:—Consecrated Heights:—The Penalties of Greatness:—Sacrifice:—Family Prayers. He was for some time editor of the Ecletic Review, and the Free Church of England Magazine. He was a fellow of the Antiquarian Society in 1854, and in the same year became a member of the Royal Irish Academy. He took great interest in the advancement of workingmen, and wrote for their benefit popular histories of England and Scotland. See (Loud.) Cong. Year-book, 1876, p. 351.

FERGUSON, James, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, born in Blair-Athol, was licensed to preach March 29, 1809; ordained to the pastorate of Dalkirch, 1810; as assistant at Inveresk; presented to the living of Beath by the earl of Moray in March, 1815, admitted May 4 of the same year, and died March 19, 1866, aged eighty-four years. He published An Account of the Parish. See Fusti Eccles. Scotiæ, ii. 578.

FERGUSSON, David, a Scotch clergyman, born in Dunoon, received the ordination of the presbytery to be the first Protestant minister at Dunfermline, in 1560. He was a member of thirty-nine assemblies, from June, 1563, to May, 1597, and moderator in those of 1572 and 1578. In 1567 Rossay discharged his care, and he was succeeded by a Mr. Baithe. In 1575 he was appointed visitor of the churches in the diocese from Forth to Tay and from the Ochils to Dunkeil. He died Aug. 28, 1598, at an advanced age. Though not educated at a university, yet from his good taste, lively fancy, piety, and integrity, he was highly useful in improving and enriching the Scottish language, and he was a favorite with all classes. He took a lively share in ecclesiastical affairs, wrote a diary of historical notes, and had a valuable library of books of theology and natural history. He wrote, An Answer to a Book of the Year 1637; A Defeat Benevoli (Edinb. 1653); a Sermon preached at Leith in 1572, and Scottish Poesies Gathered Together (Edinb. 1641). Some of his tracts were printed by the Bannatyne Club in 1860. See Fusti Eccles. Scotiæ, ii. 365.

Ferio (holidays), a name given by the ancient Romans to all peculiar seasons of rejoicing, including sacred feasts which had been consecrated to any particular god. The ferio were of several classes. Some of the public festivals were regularly observed, and the date of their occurrence was marked in the Fusti (q. v.). Such were termed Feria Statius or stated holidays. Other public festivals were held annually, but on any day of the month named the name of Feria Consecrata. The most solemn class of holidays were those appointed by the public authorities to be observed in consequence of some great national emergency or impending public calamity, and received the name of Ferio Impressionis. No lawsuits were allowed to be conducted during the public feria, and the people were strictly enjoined to abstain from work under penalty of a fine. The introduction of Christianity into Rome, and especially its adoption as the religion of the state, led to the abolition of the feria and the institution of Christian feast days. See Fusti Eccles. Scotiæ, i. 221; ii, 332.

FERLE LATINUM, a festival instituted by Terquinus Superbus, or perhaps at an earlier period, in honor of the alliance between the Romans and the Latins. It was held on Mt. Alban, and was originally dedicated to the worship of Jupiter Latarius. The festival continued for several days, usually five or six. An ox was sacrificed generally offered on this occasion by the men in office, amid the assembled multitudes, who engaged in rejoicings of all kinds. The two days immediately following the festival were considered sacred, and on them no marriages were celebrated. This festival was observed until the 4th century.

FERLE SACRAE, a festival of the ancient Romans, observed during a single day in seed-time, for the purpose of praying for the blessing of the gods upon the seed sown.

FERINGS, Richard de, an Irish prelate, was promoted and consecrated to the see of Dublin in 1299. Immediately upon his consecration he made arrangements for the convocation of Church lands alluded to by Carte in the introduction to his Life of Ormond. This caused some disturbance, but archbishop Ferings finally succeeded in bringing about an agreement in 1800. In 1308 he constituted the churches of Stagnoil and Tipperkerin prebends of St. Patrick's Cathedral. In 1329 he renewed the privileges granted by his predecessors to the dean and chapter of St. Patrick's, and particularly the exemption of their prebendal churches from visitations by the archiepiscopate. He did not succeed in his wishes as he died Oct. 13, 1306, while on his way from Rome. See D'Alton, Memoirs of the Apos. of Dublin, p. 114.

Fernald, Mark, a veteran minister of the Christian denomination, was born March 9, 1784, in Kittery, Me. He learned the trade of a carpenter, and at different times in his youth went to sea; but was converted in 1807, and united with a Free-will Baptist Church. The following year he began to preach, at once engaged in itinerant labor, and was ordained Sept. 29, 1809. For several years he was a travelling preacher, chiefly in New England. He became regular pastor at York in 1816. In 1818 he, with his family, went to Nova Scotia, but gradually became identified with the body called "Christians." He died at Kittery, Dec. 29, 1851, where he had been pastor for thirty-six years. See his Life, written by himself. (J. C. S.)

Fernald, Woodbury Melcher, a Universalist minister, was born at Portsmouth, N. H., March 21, 1813. He began his ministry in Nashua in 1833, received ordination the following year, and in 1838 moved to Cabotville (now Chicopee), Mass. In 1840 and 1841 he was located in Newburyport; then three years in Stoneham; in 1845 removed to Boston; embraced Swedenborgianism, and was ordained a preacher of that faith. He published, in the same year, a work entitled The Eternal Heave and Hell Confirmed by Scripture, and Grounded in the Realities of the Human Soul:—Compendium of the Theological and Spiritual Writings of Swedenborg (1854);—In His Providence (1859);—Memoirs and Reminiscences of the Late President Burroughs (1860); Cause of Character (1865)—a posthumous volume of Sermons, found marked for publication at his decease, was issued under the title, The True Christian Life, and How to Attain it (1874). He died in Boston, Dec. 10, 1873. Mr. Fernald was a voluminous and vigorous writer; a sounder, but not a pure, and spiritually minded man; and possessed of a metaphysical turn of mind. See Universalist Register, 1875, p. 124.

Fernandez, Alfonso, a Spanish Dominican, was born in 1573 at Placentia, and died after 1627. He is the author of Historia Ecclesiastica de Nuestra Tiempo —Concertatio Prudentiorum pro Ecclesia Catholica contra Heretics, Gentiles, Judeos et Agraevos. See Echard, De Scriptoriis Ordinis Dominiconorum; Antonio Bibliotheca Hispanica; Jocher, Allgemeine Gelehrt- Lexicon, s. v. (B. P.)

Fernando de Antonio, a Spanish Jesuit, was born at Oviedo, where he also died, May 14, 1628. He was for some time missionary in the East Indies, and after his return was preacher at Lisbon. He wrote, Commentari, in Visiones Veritatis Testamenti cum Paraphrasibus Capitum. See Antonio Bibliotheca Hispanica; Jocher, Allgemeine Gelehrt-Lexicon, s. v.

Fernando de Talavera, a Spanish prelate and theologian, was born at Talavera-la-Reyna (Old Castle) in 1445. He was a Hieronymite monk, became bishop of Avila, confessor and counsellor of Fernandino V, the Catholic, and of his wife Isabella. He encouraged them particularly in their enterprise against the Moors, which failed. He became a Jesuit, and the archiepiscopacy of that city, and labored very zealously in the propagation of the Catholic religion. The biographers pretend that he died in sanctity, May 14, 1507, and that several miracles took place at his tomb. In the church of Santa Maria de la que se debe celebrar la festividad de los dos Santos Judas, and was once temporarily banished by king Childebert under false suspicion. He died in 581, and is commemorated Jan. 4. (2) Martyr at Vienne, under Maximian, cir. A.D. 304, and commemorated Sept. 18, was a military tribune who befriended the Christians. (3) Fifth bishop of Uzes, said to have been born of a noble family in Narbonne, was educated by Roricus, bishop of Uzes, whom he succeeded in 533. He labored for three years among the Jews, and was once temporarily banished by king Childebert under false suspicion. He died in 581, and is commemorated Jan. 4. (4) Fourthteenth bishop of Li-moges, is said to have died in 599, and is commemorated Sept. 15. (5) Thirteenth bishop of Grenoble, is said to have been martyred A.D. 665, and is commemorated Jan. 12 (or 16).

Frere, William, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, was promoted from the professorship of civil history, St. Andrews; presented by the Earl of Balcarres to the living at Kilconquhar in April, 1813, which he held in conformability, and was also presented to the parishes of Johnstone, and was ordained Feb. 8, 1814. He died June 7, 1850, aged sixty-seven years. He was an energetic and laborious minister, whom Dr. Chalmers characterized as "the best minister in Fife, and the worst professor." He published A Catechism on the Evidence of Revealed Religion, with Questions on Natural Religion (Colinton, 1817), a Sermon preached at Kilconquhar in 1842, and An Account of the Parish. See Fasti Eccles. Scotienses, ii, 438.

Ferris, William, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Holland, Vt., July 20, 1818. In 1846 he graduated from the University of Vermont, and, after two years in Georgia, graduated from Andover Theological Seminary. He was ordained Dec. 9 following, at Barton, Vt., and remained with that Church until Dec. 13, 1854. From Feb. 9, 1855, until Sept. 7, 1877, he was pastor in Hinesburg, and in Plainfield from February, 1878, till his death, June 27, 1881. During twenty-four years he was a member of the corporation of the Vermont University. In 1856 and 1859 he represented Hinesburg in the State Legislature. He was the author of several pamphlets. See Cong. Year- Book, 1882, p. 80.

Ferris, Isaac, D.D., LL.D., an eminent Reformed (Dutch) minister, was born in New York city, Oct. 8, 1799. He graduated from Columbia College in 1816, and from the New Brunswick Theological Seminary in 1820; was licensed by the Classis of New Brunswick in the same year, and became pastor there in 1821; at Albany in 1824, and at the City of New York, in 1836, and was then chosen chancellor of New York University, and professor of moral philosopy and evidences of religion in 1852. After laboring seventeen and a half years, he was made emeritus, with the college debt paid and four professorships endowed. In 1870 he retired from active labor, and attended the World's Parliament in 1878. As a preacher, Dr. Ferris was clear, discriminating, earnest, and practical; and as an administrator he has seldom been equalled. He was very successful as a pastor, possessing personal magnetism which gained for FERUS was a Bohemian Jesuit, born in 1585, and died Jan. 21, 1555. He translated from the Latin into the Bohemian language the Lives of Ignatius Loyola and Francis Xavier:— The Glory of Ignatius, by Nicol. Luctanus:— The Spiritual Praxis, by Nicol. Spodratus, etc. See Alemagbe, Bibliotheca Scripturarum Societatis Jesu; Jocher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Feras, in Zende mythology, constitute the third rank of celestial deities, being the souls of every object that had life, to which, therefore, prayers were offered; a species of celestial manes.

Pescio, Congregation of, an order of monks founded about 1586 by Charles of Montecorvelli, who lived among the mountains of Pescia. It is also called Mendicant Friars of St. Jerome. The order was approved by Innocent VII, and confirmed by Gregory XII and Eugenius IV. See Gardner, Faiths of the World, s. v.

Pessel, Daniel, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born in Saxony in 1599; studied at Wittenberg, was in 1625 court preacher to the widow of the elector of Brandenburg, in 1630 superintendent and member of consistory at Cistern, and died Oct. 17, 1676, leaving A ctus Sacrae:—Theatrum Theologico-Politicum Historicum:—Promptuarium Biblicum:— Theologiae Mysticae:—Regnum Christi et Dei Mysticum:—Christianus der Engel; der Glaue (theol. Lk. i. 189); Jocher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Fessler, Joseph, a Roman Catholic theologian and bishop, was born Dec. 2, 1815, at Lecchin, in Vorarlberg, Austria, and studied at Brixen and Innsbruck. In 1857 he received holy orders, and was promoted in 1869 as doctor of theology at Vienna. In 1841 he was made professor of Church history and of canon law at Brixen, and in 1852 was called to Vienna. In 1862 he was appointed bishop of Nysa in partibus, and in 1865 succeeded Feigel as bishop of St. Petri. At the Vatican council he was first secretary from April 25, 1862, leaving Uber die Provinz NodeType und Dicresca-Synode (Innsbruck, 1849):—Institutiones Patrologiae (1850—52, 2 vols.):—Das Kirchliche Bücherselbst (Vienna, 1858):—Die Protestantische Tragödie (ibid., 1861):—Verneinung Schriften (Freiburg, 1869):—Die wahre und falsche Usurpation der Papst (Vienna, 1871). Feist, Johann Samuel, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born in Thuringia, Feb. 29, 1754. He studied at Leipsic, was in 1784 preacher at Trethenau, near that city, and died there, Nov. 16, 1765, leaving Uber die Vortheile der Leiden und Weisheit der Väter des Lebens (Leipsic, 1784; 2 ed. 1787; translated into Dutch). His other publications are of no importance. See Diting, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, 324; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lk. i. 499, 861; ii. 160, 186, 383, 385, 386 (B. P.)

Fête Dieu (Feast of God, the French name for Corpus Christi), a solemn festival observed in the Roman Church on the Thursday after the octave of Whit Sunday, for the performing of a peculiar kind of worship to our Saviour in the eucharist. The festival is said to have originated with pope Urban IV in 1264; but in consequence of the political commotions of the time, the bull appointing it was not universally obeyed. It was confirmed, however, by the Council of Vienne, in 1181, and further solemnized by pope John XXII, in 1316.

Feti, Domenico, an able Italian painter, was born at Rome in 1589; was a scholar of Lodovico Cardi, and afterwards studied the works of Giulio Romano at Mantua. There is a picture by him, representing the Miraculous Feeding of the Multitude, which is highly commended. Some of his other principal works are:—Christ Praying in the Garden; Christ Presented to the People by Pilate; Christ Crowned with Thorns; and The Entombment. Feti died at Venice in 1624. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bibl. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Bibl. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Fetáles, a college of ancient Roman priests, supposed to have been instituted by Numa, whose duty it was to see to that, in all transactions with other nations, the public faith should be maintained inviolate. In case of any injury from a neighboring nation, four fétiales were despatched to claim redress. One of these was chosen to represent the four. This deputy then proceeded to the court of the injuring tribe or nation, delivered his message, and waited thirty days for an answer. On his return the government would proceed in accordance with the message he had brought. It was a declaration of the right to the duty of the fétial deputy to return at once to the border of the offending country, and, throwing a spear pointed with iron or smeared with blood, to make a solemn declaration of war in the name of the Roman people upon the inhabitants of that land.

Fétus (from the Portuguese festus, "magician," and fétusar, "witch"), is a general name for the deities of the negroes of Guinea; each differing, according to the direction of his manouck or priest. The natives of Africa ascribe all their good-fortune to these gods, and make libations of palm wine in their honor. Some birds, the sword-fish, and certain stones are considered fetishes. These objects are worshipped at the foot of certain trees, are adored as household gods, and carried about by the devotees.

Fétva, in Mohammedanism, is a declaration that a public act is in conformity with the Koran. The right of granting this sanction belongs to the Sheik ul-islam, who usually consults the council of Ulama or religious council, in making his decision. No act of the Turkish government will be readily obeyed without the fetva, because not necessarily binding on the faithful. It has sometimes been used to deterhne sultans, and deliver them over to the fury of the Janizaries. The privilege was restored by Murad IV, and boldly beheaded the Sheik ul-islam for opposing his will.

Feuerdant, François, a French controversialist, a member of the order of the Discalceati (q. v.), and doctor of the Paris University, was born at Coutances, Dec. 1, 1559. In 1576 he was made doctor of theology, and died, guardian of the monastery at Bayeux, Jan. 1, 1610. He was a severe opponent of the Protestants, and a sort of Ishmael against his own co-religionists, when they differed from him. He wrote, Theokratia Cæsternica:—Divina Opuscula et Exercitii Spirituales de St. Ephrem, mise en François:—Censure Ecclesiae Orientali de Præceptis Nostri Suriæ Hebraicæ Doctrina Hieremia Constantiæ, Patriarchæ:—De Seu corum Bibliorum Autoritate, Veritate, Utilitate, Ob servatione & Interpretatione Ratione:—Biblia Sacra cum Glossa Ordinaria:—Reportes aux Docteur d'un Hérétique Convaincu, de la vérité des Impostures des Evange licoms, quibus Antiquissimos et Sopranissimos Ecclesiae Afrorum Doctorum Tertullianum et Cyprianum Vercet Lucernantique Lutheranæ et Calcinæ:—Homiliae 25 in Librum Jobam. Feuerbach, Ludwig Andreas, a German philosopher, was born at Landskut, Baviaria, July 28, 1804. He studied philosophy and theology at Heidelberg and Berlin. In 1829 he began to lecture on philosophy at Erlangen, and opened his lectures with a dissertation, De Ratione uno, Universiti, Infinita. In 1830 he published, anonymously, Gedanken über Tod und Unsterblichkeit, in which he denied the belief in immortality. As this book closed to him all and every academical advancement, he retired to Bruckberg, where he spent most of his life. In 1833 he published Geschichte der neueren Philosophie von Bacon von Verum bis Spinoza; in 1837, Darstellung, Entwickelung und Kritik der Leibnizschen Philosophie; in 1838, Pierre Bayle noch seinem Für ein Bild der Geschichte der Philosophie und Menschenfreundlichkeit der Mönche. In 1839 he joined the so-called left wing of the Hegelian school, became a very bitter opponent of his former master, and published Kritik der heiligen Philosophie, in the Berliner Jahrbiicher. Feuerbach now attempted an independent development in the direction of naturalism, or rather, materialism. In his principal work, Das Wesen des Christentums (Leipsic, 1841; Eng. transl. by George Eliot, Lond., 1853; new ed., 1881; Rus. transl. by Philosophie Theosophik, Lond., 1863), he defended the Christian doctrine and its history against the Hegelians. In 1845 he was again lectured publically at Heidelberg; but, when the revolution movement completely failed, he again retired to private life. Feuerbach died Sept. 15, 1872. His writings comprise ten volumes (Leipsic, 1845–66; 3d ed. 1876). See Grün, Ludwig Feuerbach in seinem Briefwechsel mit Nischnijs (Leipsic, 1874, 2 vols.); Beyer, Leben und Gießt Ludwig Feuerbach (ibid. 1873); Schaller, Darstellung und Kritik der Philosophie (ibid. 1872); Schaden, Uber den Gegenstand des theistischen und pausatheistischen Handbuches (1846); Franz, Uber die Atheismus (1844); Haym, Feuerbach und die Philosophie (1847); Bartholomay, Histoire Critique des Doctrines Religionneuse de la Philosophie Moderne (1850), i, 377; Matter, in Lichtenberger's Encyklop. des Sciences Religionneuses, etc.; Zschold, Bibl. Feuerborn, Justus, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, born in Westphalia, Nov. 15, 1887, was for some time court preacher at Darmstadt, afterwards professor at Marburg, and died at Giessen, doctor and professor of theology, Feb. 6, 1856. He wrote, Kibromorphose Christi, Fidei Eucharistiae Sacramentorum Colocinorum: Expositio Epistole Pauli ad Galatas: Theologia Jobea: Syneutica Disquisitionum Sacramentorum, See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 338; Freher, Theatri Eucharistiorum; Jocher, Allgemeines Geklehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Zschold, Bibl. Theol., i, 355. (B. P.)

Feuerlein, a name common to several Lutheran theologians, viz.: 1. Conrad, born Nov. 29, 1629, in Franconia, studied at different universities, and died at Nuremberg, May 29, 1704. His publications are mostly sermons.

2. Conrad Friedrich, son of Friedrich, was born at Nuremberg, July 15, 1634, and died there Aug. 22, 1742.

3. Friedrich, brother of Johann Conrad, was born at Nuremberg, Jan. 10, 1664, and died there Dec. 14, 1716.

J. Jacob Wilhelm, son of Johann Conrad, was born at Nuremberg, March 23, 1668. He studied at various universities; was in 1715 professor at Altdorf, in 1736 at Göttingen, and died there May 10, 1776. He wrote, De Dubitatione Cursusitiae Pericurum (Jena, 1711): An Existenza bei der Verstum Indemnativitlieb (Alt., 1717: Polylogus, sive Recognitum Claudii Romano Falsi Affectualiter (ibid. 1729): De Scripta Evangelica, ad Math. xxiii, 52 (ibid. 1730): De Liberou Arborito (ibid. ed.): De Historia August.

5. Johan Conrad, son of Conrad, was born Jan. 5, 1654, and called superintendent at Nordlingen, March 3, 1719. His publications are mostly sermons.

6. Johan Jacob, son of Conrad, was born at Nuremberg, May 9, 1670, and died there May 30, 1716. See Jöcher, Allgemeines Geklehrten-Lexikon, etc.; and Supplement to Jöcher, s. v.

Feurkag, Johann Heinrich, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Stiellis, in Holstein, March 7, 1672. He studied at Rostock, and Wittenberg; was in 1697 superintendent at Jensen; in 1708 provost at Kempen; in 1706 court preacher at Zerbst; in 1709 professor of theology at Wittenberg; in 1712 first court preacher and member of consistory at Gotha, where he died June 29, 1713. He wrote, Exegesis: Eucharisticolocinorum: Hisorica Colocinorum (Zerbst, 1707). See Möller, Cimbris Litwotata; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 763; Jöcher, Allgemeines Geklehrten-Lexikon, s. v. Févalier, Jean François Hyacinthe, count, a French prelate, was born at Paris, April 2, 1765. After studying at St. Sulpice, he entered into orders, and was soon appointed, by cardinal Fesch, general secretary of the great abmonry of France. He was active in political-religious affairs during Napoleon. On the restoration of royalty he was appointed rector of la Madeleine, where he did many good works. In 1786 he was made bishop of Beauvais, and in 1792 a count and peer of France. He died at Paris, June 27, 1830. See Hoefer, Nouv. bio. Générale, s. v.; Lichtenberger, Encycol. des Sciences Religionneuses, etc.

Feyerabend, Maurus, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born Oct. 7, 1754. In 1777 he took his doctor's degree for some time in the monastery at Ottobeuren, in Swabia; when it was closed in 1802, lived in literary retirement, and died March 8, 1818. He translated into German the Epistles of Gregory the Great (Kempten, 1807) —his Homilies (ibid. 1804); and the Writings of Cyril (Munich, 1817). See Döring, Die geklehrten Denker der Deutschen, Handbuch der Verwalt., 1, 404 sq.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 906, 907. (B. P.)

Ficam, an Irish saint, commemorated Oct. 12, was bishop of Skelibo (now Sletty), and is said to have been consecrated by St. Patrick. There are two hymns attributed to him; one (probably genuine) entitled The Prise of St. Patrick:—another (probably spurious), The Hymn on St. Brigida. See Smith, Dict. of Christ. Bio, s. v.

Pianello, a ceremony of betrothal as practiced in the Roman Church, after which an oath was administered to the man, by which he bound himself "to take the woman to wife within forty days, if holy Church will permit." See Pitius, Bartholomaeus, a Roman Catholic theologian, was born at Aix-la-Chapelle, Aug. 24, 1643. In 1662 he joined the Jesuits; was for some time professor of theology at Cologne, and died there, Feb. 13, 1706. He wrote, De Legem de pro Concilia Societatis (Cologne, 1682)—De Solutione et Delegatione Proprearum Presbyteriorum Anastomis et Uniones VIII e Innuociation II (ibid. 1689)—Vita Veritatis et Vita contra Atheos, Paganos, Judæos, etc. (ibid. 1689).
FIELD, Benjamin, an English Wesleyan minister of marked ability, was born at Sevenoaks, Kent, in 1823. He was converted when twelve years of age, under the ministry of Thomas Collins. He became a licensed preacher at the age of sixteen, was accepted as a candidate for the ministry in 1843, spent three years at the Richmond Theological Institution, and on July 2, 1846, was ordained; a few days after, with Gainsville and Morris, sailed as a missionary to India. For this work he had every qualification except that of physical adaptability to the climate, and he was soon stricken with fever. Returning to England, he travelled the Chatteria (1850), Luton, Bradford, Hackney, City Road, London, and Penzance (1864) circuits until he was compelled to desist through disease. In December, 1865, he embarked for Melbourne, Australia, where he spent the rest of his brief life. He edited the Wesleyan Chronicle for a year (1868). Mr. Field died in the city of Melbourne, Sept. 1, 1869. His piety and earnestness were successful in his peculiar branch of work, his love for souls, his watchfulness, and accumulated sorrows, won for him the love of all. Field wrote, Life of Mrs. C. E. Martin [his sister] (1862, 24mo): — The Penitent's Inquiry, an admirable tract, which has had a large circulation in England and Australia; — The Student's Hand-book of Christian Theology, and several treatises (Melbourne, 1868; enlarged ed., with a biographical sketch by Rev. John C. Symons, Lond. 1870, 12mo). Among the shortest presentations of a systematic Wesleyan theology this latter work is probably unsurpassed. See Symons, Memoir, Rev. J. W. Smith, Minutes of the British Conference, 1870, p. 12; Westminster Magazine, 1870, p. 1026.

FIELD, Edward, an English prelate, was born in 1801. He studied at Rugby and Queen's College, Oxford, where he gained a Methodist fellowship, was appointed public examiner in 1827, and was consecrated bishop of Newfoundland in 1844. He died June 8, 1876. See Greville, Life of Dean, 1876, i, 637.

FIESCO, a privilege enjoyed formerly by the archbishops of Rouen, in Normandy, in consequence of the miraculous deliverance which St. Romanus is said to have had from a dragon which infested the neighbourhood. The salut took with him a condemned malefactor, and required to the baumet of the monster. He then stripped him of his stole, bound him round the neck of the dragon, and ordered the criminal to lead it into the town, where it was burned in the presence of the assembled inhabitants. In reward for his bold feat the malefactor obtained his pardon; and in order to keep the remembrance of this wonderful deliverance, a custom was long preserved in the district of bestowing pardon on Ascension day upon a criminal, if he would only assist to carry in procession the shrine called the feria of St. Romanus.

FIESCO, Battarina. See CATHARINE of GENOA.

FIESCO, Giorgio, an Italian prelate, was archbishop of Genoa when pope Eugenius IV appointed him cardinal-priest, with the title of St. Anastasia, and bishop of Ostia. Nicholas V gave him the legation of Liguria. Giorgio Fiesco enjoyed the favor of Calixtus III and of Pius II. He died at Rome, Oct. 11, 1401, but his body was transferred to Genoa. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

FIESCO, Giovanni, an Italian prelate, was bishop of Vercelli, and was appointed cardinal-priest, with the title of St. Mark, in 1574, by pope Urban VI, who was very fond of him, and charged him with several important missions. Fiesco died in 1584. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

FIESCO, Guillaeino, an Italian prelate, was born in Genoa, and was the nephew of pope Innocent IV, who made him, in December, 1244, cardinal-deacon, with the title of St. Eustachius. The same pontiff gave him the protectorate of the Augustinians, and placed him at the head of one of the most pensioned colleges, to operate against Anagni. Guglielmo came back to Rome after the death of his uncle, and took part at the election of pope Alexander IV, on Dec. 12, of that year. He died in 1256, and was buried in the Church of San Lorenzo. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Fiesco, Luca, an Italian prelate, was appointed in 1398, cardinal-deacon, with the title of St. Mary in Via Lata, by pope Boniface VIII. Luca proved his gratitude Sept. 9, 1308, by delivering Anagni from an insurrection. On Jan. 6, 1309, he was at Aix-la-Chapelle, and assisted as legate-ordinary of pope Clement V, in the coronation of the emperor Henry VII of Luxemburg. John XXII sent him as legate to England. Fiesco died in 1386, and was buried in the metropolitan church of Genoa. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Fiesco, Luigi, an Italian prelate, succeeded his uncle Giovanni through the favor of pope Urban VI, and was apostolically appointed, in 1385, cardinal-deacon, with the title of St. Adrian. Boniface IX nominated Luigi legate of the holy see in Romagna, and obtained by his instrumentality the submission of several cities, among them Anagni. In 1404 Luigi refused to recognise Cosmo de' Medici ( Innocent VII), who had been chosen by sixteen of the twenty-three cardinals in place of Boniface IX. He put himself under the jurisdiction of the pope at Avignon, Pedro de Luna (Benedict XIII), whom he abandoned in 1409 or 1410, to join Pietro Pilargi (Alexander V). The successor of this latter pontiff, Baldassare Cossa (John XXIII), appointed Luigi governor of Bologna. In 1414 he attended at the Council of Constance, and in 1417 at the election of Ottone Colonna (Martin V). He was sent by this pontiff as legate into Sicily, and returned to Rome, where he died, April 8, 1423. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Fieschi, Niccolò, an Italian prelate, was bishop of Frejus and of Toulon. On the recommendation of Louis XII, pope Alexander VI appointed him, in May, 1503, cardinal-priest of St. Nicolas inter imaginum, afterwards with the title of the Twelve Apostles. Some time later Niccolò obtained the see of Embrun, and also that of Raveino. According to the account of his contemporaries, he was a just and liberal counsellor of pope Alexander VI, Julius II, and Adrian VI. It is said that he refused to be a candidate for the papacy in competition with Giulio de' Medici (Clement VII), the successor of Adrian VI. Fieschi died June 14, 1523. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Fiesole, Giovanni da. See Angelo. Pfynd, Thomas de, a Scotch prelate, was probably a dignitary in the Church of Ross before his promotion to the bishopric of that see in 1274. See Keight, Scottish Bishops, p. 167.

Fijian Version of the Scriptures. This language is spoken in the Fiji islands (q. v.). The principal dialect is that of Bau, and a translation of the New Testament was made into this idiom by the Rev. J. Hunt, in concert with other Wesleyan missionaries. The work was completed in 1849. In 1854 the British and Foreign Bible Society printed an edition of five thousand Fijian New Testaments, and in 1858 the same society issued an edition of five thousand gospels. In the meantime the missionaries employed in the Fiji Islands were diligently engaged in the translation of the Old Testament, which they completed in 1854. The printing of the work was first undertaken in England under the joint superintendence of the Rev. Mr. Calvert, a long resident in the islands, and the editorial superintendent of the British and Foreign Bible Society, in the year 1857. As Mr. Calvert, however, was compelled to return to his missionary field, the work was left in a unfinished state. The printing was consequently suspended, and a new editor was appointed by the Wesleyan Missionary Society, to whom the examination of the unfinished part of the text was confided, in order that such revision might be made as should secure harmony in grammatical construction and orthography. The Rev. H. B. Lyth having been selected for this important duty, finished the work in 1864, and the committee of the British and Foreign Bible Society announced to its supporters in the report for 1866 the completion of the entire Bible in the language of Fiji, a work upon the preparation of which a vast amount of care and anxious study had been expended. The following account of the reception of the Scriptures in Fiji, soon after their arrival, will be read with interest:

"How the natives rejoiced at the sight of the complete Bible! When I told them that the Bibles were to be distributed among the people of Fiji, they were placed on the table, and the dust next in the room was brought and sprinkled over them as the Scriptures. 'Here is the Bible complete—look at it, look at it!" On showing the copy to the king, he asked if we had plenty. 'Yes," I said, 'what about a chief who can read, and wish to have a Bible?" One of the chiefs said, 'We have not even got a copy to read; we were satisfied when I told him he should have one." (Report for 1866.)

The extensive circulation of the Fijian Scriptures made it necessary to print, in 1868, two editions of the New Testament, consisting together of six thousand and five hundred copies, and in 1870 another supply of three thousand copies. A revised edition of the Fijian Bible was published by the British and Foreign Bible Society in 1885. According to the annual report of this society, there were 26,846 copies, including the Revised Version, 8,556, and the Old Testament, 18,290. For linguistic helps, see Hazlwood, A Compendious Grammar of the Fijian Language, and his Fijian and English and English and Fijian Dictionary. (B. P.)

Fikosch, a mountain in Japan, to which an order of Jammahor monks go in pilgrimage once a year: an extremely difficult task, on account of the precipices with which it abounds. This mountain is believed to be a test of the character of a man, for if a wicked person should undertake the pilgrimage, the devil would enter into him on his first attempt to ascend the hill. See Jammahor.

Filastre (or Fialastre). Guillaume, the name of two French prelates, uncle and nephew. 1. Born in 1457 or 1458 at La Suze (Maine), studied at the University of Angers, became dean of Rheims, where he also taught theology and mathematics, and founded a library; took an active part in the political transactions of his time; was made prior of St. Ayas, bishop of Aix (in Provence), and cardinal. He died at Rome, Nov. 6, 1428. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

2. Born probably in Maine, early entered the Benedictine order, became prior of Sermais, abbot of St. Thierry. He was received into the name of doctor at Louvain in January, 1466; made bishop of Vexin, Sept. 20, Filipowski, Abraham, Hebrew scholar, was born in Poland in 1817. In 1840 he went to England and received an appointment as teacher of Hebrew and Oriental languages in the Jews’ College, Finsbury Square, London. Subsequently he became connected with the Colonial and Standard Life offices of Edinburgh, remaining in that city a number of years, and died July 11, 1872. Filipowski is well known as an editor of older Jewish works, such as of Abraham bar-Chiyah’s Sopher Heikhal, which treats of the mathematical and technical chronology of the Hebrews, Nazarenes, Mohammedans, etc. (London, 1831) — Menahem ben-Saruk’s Mekor ha-Meisharim, or first Hebrew lexicon (1844): — Anzela de’ Roma’s Sepher Marzuf Lakeshor or Vaseeratunah Orisca de Aseta Mundh (Edinbg. ed.) — Abraham Saccio’s Liber Judaeorum, or first Hebrew grammar (London, 1857). He also published Sepher Ha-amit, or treatises pertaining to the exegesis of the Old Test. (Leipzic, 1849), and Sepher Melchzodaik, or a Hebrew and Roman almanac (Leipzic, 1846). See Fürst, Bibl. Filipp, Sebastiano (called Rusticiano), an eminent Italian painter, was born at Ferrara in 1532, and was instructed by his father, Camillo. When eighteen years of age he went to Rome and entered the school of Buonsanuto. His great work is in the Cathedral of Ferrara, representing the Last Judgment, established his fame. Among his best works are the fresco of St. Catherine, in the church dedicated to that saint; and the Adoration of the Magi, in Santa Maria de Servi. He painted also the Virgin and Infants; St. John, and the Dead Christ supported by Angels. Filipp died in 1602. See Spener, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, a. v.

Filippo di Diano (Daughters of God), an order of nuns in France who devote themselves to visiting the sick. They repeat the Penitential Psalms once a week. Another religious order bearing the same name was formed in the 13th century, which afterwards became merged in the order of Fontevrault (q. v.).

Filippinius (or Filippicini), Vincente, a Jesuit of Seville, was born in 1566, and studied theology at Rome, April 5, 1622, leaving De Christianis Officis et Consulis Conscientiae (Lyons, 1626, 2 vols.): — Sapiens Universae Theologiae (ibid., 1628): — De Statu Clerici, de Beneficiis, de Pensionibus, de Spolia, de Clericorum Viis et Status, de Alimentatione Clerici Spiritualis. Filmore, Alasce, a Scotch clergyman, was born in Glasgow, Sept. 26, 1751; graduated at Glasgow University; was licensed to preach Aug. 2, 1780; presented to the living at the High Church, Paisley, ordained March 14, 1781, and died March 25, 1821. He was a warm friend of the Bible, missionary, and school societies, and aided by his advice the formation of auxiliary societies at Paisley and Renfrew. He wasgrave and cheerful in temper, and uniformly correct in lan- guage and matter, yet lively, entertaining, and instructive. He published Sermons, preached before the London Missionary Society (Lond. 1799). See Fusi Eccl. Scot., ii, 207.

Findlay, John (1), D.D., a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach May 7, 1769; called to the living at Norristown in March, and ordained June 15, 1780; promoted to St. Paul’s Church, Perth, in July, and died April 4, 1846, aged sixty-six years. He published an address, annexed to a sermon (Glasgow, 1803). See Fusi Eccl. Scot., ii, 619, 728.

FIRKOWITSCH

FIRKOWITSCH, ABRAHAM, a Karaite scholar, was born Sept. 27, 1586, at Lutsk, in Volhynia, and died July 6, 1784, at Shafut-Kale, in the Crimea. He is known for his zeal in collecting old manuscripts concerning the history of the Karaite Jews. The collected material he published in Masse u-Meruka (Eupatoria, 1683), and Abne Sikkaron (Wilna, 1782). Many of his manuscripts and epigraphs he sold to the Imperial Library at St. Petersburg. Although Firkowitz was highly esteemed among his co-religionists, yet some doubts were raised as to the genuineness of some of his pretended dates, said to be found on tombs and in manuscripts. What was a mere supposition while he was alive became a certainty after his death. Scholars like Strack and Harkavy examined his investigations, and proved that Firkowitz was guilty of wilful forgery, by which he deceived the literary world. See Jellinek, Abraham Firkowicz (Vienna, 1872); Harkavy, Abr. Firkowicz's Algjitudne Denkmäler in der Kirn (St. Petersburg, 1876); Deinard, Biography of Firkowicz [in Hebrew] (Warsaw, 1875); but especially Strack, A. FIRMIN, the name of several early saints and ecclesiastics, of whom we particularize: (1) Bishop of Amiens, a native of Pampeluna, ordained as a missionary bishop of Gaul, died probably A.D. 303, and commemorated Sept. 25. (2) Saint, fourth bishop of Uzes, born in Narbonne of noble parentage, c. A.D. 316; trained by his uncle, Porques, early ordained, and consecrated bishop A.D. 558; died in 558, and commemorated Oct. 11.

FIRMIN, GILES, an English Nonconformist divine, was born in Saffolick in 1617, and educated at Cambridge. He was ordained, and became minister at Shaftoft, in Essex, where he continued until he was ejected, in 1662, by the act of uniformity. He died in 1687, leaving several sermons and theological treatises (1652 sq.), the best of which is The Real Christian. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Auth., s. v.

FIRMINUS is the name of several early Christians, of whom we particularize: (1) A martyr with Rusticus at Verona, A.D. 304; commemorated in the Liturgy of the Cappadocian Census, deposed by the Oriental patriarch, and died A.D. 439. He left a number of letters, first published by Muratori, Anecdot. Grac. (Patar, 1767), also by Migne, Patrology, lxxvii, 1477. See Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

FISCHER, GEORG, D.D., a French theologian, commonly known as "Pastor Fisch," was born at Nyon, canton of Vaud, Switzerland, July 6, 1814. He studied at Lausanne, was for some time preacher of a small German congregation at Veray, till in 1846 called to Lyons, France, to become an assistant preacher to Adolphine Monod, who subsequently succeeded him. In 1855 he went to Paris as successor of Louis Bridel, and died July 3, 1881, at Vallorbe, Switzerland. Fischer took an active part in the Constitutional Synod of 1849, which formed the union of the Evangelical churches of France. From 1893 till his death he was president of the Synodical Commission, and thus directed the work of the Free churches. When, in 1856, the Evangelical Alliance was founded, he became the very soul of the branch of this society in France, and attended the meetings at London, Paris, Berlin, Geneva, Amsterdam, and New York. He was particularly interested in the South-African mission among the Basutos, in Mr. McAll's mission in Paris, and in every way he advanced the cause of the Gospel. See Lichtenberg, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuse, s. v. (B. P.)

FISCHER, JOHANN (called also Mentzer, from his native place, Mentzingen) (1589-1647), a Lutheran hymn-writer, was born about 1547. He studied law, and for some time practiced it at Frankfort-on-the-Main. From there he went to Strasbourg, and died in 1688. Many of his hymns are found in the hymn-books of the 16th and 17th centuries. A copy of his Gesangbuchlein, published in 1574, has been found in the British Museum at London, by professor Max Müller, and from a copy made by him, with the assistance of Herr von Bunsen, an edition was published at Berlin in 1849. FISCHER, Gottfried Angelus, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born at Munich, Nov. 5, 1831. He was for some time professor of philosophy and history at the gymnasium of his native place, received in 1817 a call as pastor to Niederviehbach, in Bavaria, and died in 1836. He wrote, Lehre der Katholischen Kirche (Munich, 1819): — Predigten über die acht Segen praeivam (ibid. 1834): — Vollstands Katholisches Religionsebuch (ibid. 1822, 1828); — Lehre und Gebetbuch für junge Katholische Kinder (Augusta, 1827). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 465; ii, 120, 243, 373. (B. P.)

FISCHER, Gottlob Busebus, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born May 28, 1769, at Golasen, in Lower Saxonia. In 1797 he was deacon, in 1801 archdeacon, in 1801 pastor at Rains, in 1819 superintendent at Saugershausen, and died in 1849, leaving, Predigten über die freie Texte (Eisleben, 1835, 1836, 2 vols.); — Christliches Predigtbuch (Saugershausen, 1836); — Christliche Betaten (Neustatt, 1834-36, 4 parts); — Jesus Christus, seine Erzahlung für verschieden Kinder (Leipsic, 1794); — Kirchliche Gebetsschungen (Neustatt, 1828-31, 4 vols.); — he also worked up the New Test. part to Düster's Die Bibel, als Erbauungsbuch für Gebildete (ibid. 1832). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. ii, 56, 74, 84, 144, 189, 257, 371, 364; Zuchold, 636. Theol. Lit. 890 sq. (B. P.)

FISCHER, Jacob Benjamini, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Nov. 3, 1744, Deserves to be mentioned for the great interest he took in having the Bible given to his people in their vernacular. The first Livonian or Lettish Bible was edited by his father, John, who died in 1795. The care of the second edition devoted on Ja- cob Benjamini, and it was printed at Königsberg in 1739. (B. P.)

FISCHER, Johann Friedrich, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Coburg, Oct. 10, 1724, became rector of the Thomas school at Leipzig, and died there, Oct. 17, 1795. He published, Commentatio de Status et Jurisdictione Judaicorum Secundum Legem Rom. Germ. (Strasburg, 1768):

Fish, Henry, A.M., an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Hooton-Pagnell, near Doncaster, Aug. 5, 1802. He joined a class in his eighteenth year, was accepted by the conference as a candidate for the ministry in 1823, became a superannuated at Kettering in 1843, a local preacher, and useful servant of the church during his long retirement, and died Jan. 16, 1879. He was a powerful preacher. "He had a quick discernment of the meaning of the text, and a faculty of clear, logical arrangement; and the Gospel which he proclaimed with noble eloquence and intense earnestness wrought deep conviction in the hearts of his hearers and turned many to righteousness, some of whom have ranked among the most gifted and devoted sons of Methodism." Mr. Fish published, Truth of the Christian Religion (Bristol, 1839);—Natural Theology (ibid. 1840);—The Works of Popery (Lond. 1848);—Methodism the Work of God (Bristol, 1839);—Death of Rev. E. Lewis, B.A. (Cong.), and the Wesleyan Methodists (ibid. 1863, 2 vols. 12mo). He also edited, with an introduction, A Poetical Version of the Psalms of David, by Charles Wesley (ibid. 1854, 8vo). He was for many years a contributor to Methodist periodical literature. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1879, p. 24; Wesleyan Minutes, i, 307; Osborne, Methodist Bibliography, p. 102.

Fish, Henry Clay, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Halifax, Va., Jan. 27, 1829; graduated from Union Theological Seminary, Va., A.B., 1850, and was ordained, June 26 of that year, over the church in Somerville, N. J., and in January, 1851, became pastor of the First Church in Newark, which office he held till his death, Oct. 2, 1877. Dr. Fish was the author of several works, among them, Primitive Piety Revived (Boston, 1865);—Pulpit Eloquence of the Nineteenth Century (N. Y. 1856, 1867);—The Hand-book of Revivals (Boston, 1874). His Bible Land Sketches (Hartford, 1876), was the outcome of a tour in the Holy Land. See Gen. Cat. of Union Theol. Sem. 1876, p. 38; (N. Y.) Examiner, Oct. 1877; Cathcart, Baptist Encyclopedia, a. v. (J. C. S.)

Fish, John H., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, graduated from the General Theological Seminary, N. Y.; in 1833 was employed as chaplain in the United States army, at San Salzo; in 1854 served in the same capacity at Jefferson Barracks, Mo.; in 1868 was removed to Fort Rice; in 1871 to Fort Randall, Dak., and there remained until within a short time of his death, which occurred at Montclair, N. J., Oct. 12, 1878, at the age of sixty-six years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1879, p. 168.

Fish, Simon, a zealous promoter of the English reformation, was born in Kent, educated at Oxford, and died about 1531. He published, The Supplication for the Beggars, a satire upon bishops, abbots, priors, monks, friars, and the popish clergy in general (1520).—The Fisher, Abel, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Putney, Va., June 19, 1787. He graduated from the University of Virginia, in 1811; studied theology with Rev. Nathaniel Keswick; was ordained an evangelist in Brandon, June 15, 1815; was pastor in Bellingham, Mass., twelve years; in West Boylston, three years; and subsequently in Sturbridge, Mass., Pawtucket, R. I., and Swansea and Sutton, Mass. He died at West Boylston, in the summer of 1849. He was one of the"fishers of the Baptist denomination in Massachusetts, and held in high esteem. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclopedia, p. 295. (J. C. S.)

Fisher, George H., D.D., a Reformed (Dutch) minister, graduated from Columbia College in 1821, and from the New Brunswick Theological Seminary in 1825; was licensed by the Classis of New Brunswick in the same year; was pastor at North Branch until 1830; at Fishkill until 1835; at Hudson until 1841; at Boome Street, New York city, until 1855; at Utica until 1859; at Hackensack, Second Church, from 1864 to 1870, and then was moderator emeritus there. He died Dec. 17, 1870. He was born in New York City, March 15, 1797. See Fishkill and Hudson, 4th ed. 1861; and Hackensack, 5th ed. 1869. He was the second pastor of the Second Reformed Church in Hackensack, and published, Divine Providence Proved and Illustrated, in the National Preacher (1848). See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America, 3d ed. p. 200.

Fisher, James, one of the four leaders of the secession from the Established Church of Scotland, and professor of divinity to the Associate (Burgier) Synod, was born at part of the United States, Jan. 29, 1697. He commenced his course in Glasgow in 1712, and closed it in St. Andrews in 1716; and then entered the Divinity Hall in the University of Edinburgh, where he continued six sessions. He was licensed to preach in 1722, and for some time supplied pulpits within the bounds of the presbytery. His first pastoral was at Glenisla, Forfarshire, and in 1725 he removed to Kinclean. In 1752 he took an active part in denouncing the encroachments of the British legislature on the ecclesiastical liberties of Scotland, before the General Assembly, which soon resulted in his being suspended from his pastorate. Mr. Fisher, with his other dissenting brethren, shortly afterwards constituted themselves into a presbytery, and with their respective congregations thus formed The Associate Presbytery. After various fruitless endeavors on the part of the General Assembly to induce Mr. Fisher to return to the Established Church, he, in 1741, was ejected from the church and manse of Kinclean, whence he removed to Glasgow in response to a unanimous call from a newly organized Church holding his views, which he served continuously for over thirty years. He died Sept. 29, 1757. Mr. Fisher was somewhat under the middle size, well proportioned, had a lively, affectionate, cheerful countenance, easy and alert in all his movements, was neat in dress, and orderly and punctual in all his affairs, an habitual early riser, and a conscientious, diligent student. His published works are, The Inestimable Value of Divine Truth, (Edinb. 1739);—Christ Jesus the Lord, Considered as the Inexhaustible Matter of Gospel Preaching (ibid. 1741);—The Character of a Faithful Minister of Christ (ibid. 1742);—The Assembly's shorter Catechism Explained by John Fisher (ibid. 1745); and A Questions and Answers (Glasgow, 1758, pt. i, 8vo; pt. ii, 1760);—Christ the Sole and Wonderful Door in the Work of Man's Redemption (ibid. 1756), and a few reviews. See Memorials of Alexander Moncrieff and James Fisher, in the United Presbytery at Ayrshire, 1799, p. 9; Psalms Ecclesiastic, 1760, ii, 802.

Fisher, John, D.D., an English prelate, was born in 1749. He received his early education at Peterborough and at St. Paul's School, London; in 1766 he was admitted at Peterhouse, Cambridge, where he took the degree of A.B. in 1770; in 1773 he was elected a fellow of St. John's College, and in the same year proceeded A.M., in 1780 B.D., and in that year was appointed tutor to his royal highness prince Edward, afterwards duke of Kent. In 1781 he was nominated chaplain to the king, and appointed one of the deputy clerks of the chancery; and in 1783 elected a fellow of the Society of Antiquaries. In 1755, his attendance upon prince Edward ceasing upon his royal highness going to Germany to finish his education there, he went to Italy for his health; but was recalled from Naples in 1786, and appointed by the king a canon of Windsor; he resigned his canonry in 1790 having been promoted to the deanery of Exeter; at the end of the same year was appointed preceptor to the princess Charlotte of Wales; in 1807 translated to the see of Salisbury, which position he held until his death, May 8, 1825. Bishop Fisher was an accomplished scholar and a sound divine; but owing to the numerous duties which devolved upon him he had but little leisure to devote to literary pursuits. He published a number of sermons delivered by him on special occasions, which possess superior merit. See The (Lonl.) Annual Register, 1823, p. 247.

Fisher, Jonathan Parker, D.D., an English divinity, was born about 1757. He was master May 7, 1774; proceeded A.M. Oct. 10, 1780; B.D. May 22, 1802; and grand compounder May 14, 1807. He died in 1838, being at the time sub-dean and canon-residentiary of Exeter Cathedral, and rector of Farrington, Devonshire. See The (Lonl.) Christian Rememberer, Second Series, 1838, p. 368.

Fisher, Nathaniel, a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at Delham, Mass., July 8, 1742. He graduated from Harvard College in 1768, and soon after the beginning of the revolution was in the service of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, as a schoolmaster at Granville, Nova Scotia. Having crossed the Atlantic for ordination in 1772, he was admitted to orders by the bishop of London, Sept. 23; not long after arrived at Nova Scotia as a missionary to the churches at Annapolis and Granville, and remained there till 1781. In the following year he was invited to the rectoryship of St. Peter's Church, Salem, Mass.; but on arriving in that commonwealth he was arrested as a subject of Great Britain, and imprisoned. On taking the oath of fidelity to the new government he was released. His ministry in Salem covered a period of thirty years, until his death, Dec. 20, 1812. Mr. Fisher was a member of the organization of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Massachusetts, and was secretary of the first convention of the churches of Massachusetts and Rhode Island in 1784. In 1790 he was one of those chosen to frame the constitution for the government of the Protestant Episcopal churches in Massachusetts; elected a member of the first standing committee of the diocese, and was one of the persons appointed to publish the revised Book of Common Prayer. A volume of Mr. Fisher's Sermons, edited by judge Joseph Story, was published after his death. His style of preaching was compact, dignified, and vigorous. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v. 329.

Fisher, Peter S., a pious and successful German Reformed minister, was born in Berks County, Pa., Oct. 11, 1804; studied theology under the Rev. Dr. F. L. Herman; was licensed and ordained in 1826, and placed over some congregations in the vicinity of Harrisburg. After a period of great success for about twenty years, he removed to Centre County, where he proved himself a faithful servant of Christ, and enjoyed the undiminished confidence of the people up to the time of his removal to Bucks County in 1857. Here he labored with his usual zeal, piety, and success. Mr. Fisher was always manifest in the various benevolent operations of the Church, especially in the cause of orphans. He died very suddenly, May 22, 1873, universally esteemed. He is thought to have preached about ten thousand sermons, added to the Church some fifteen hundred members, and solemnized two thousand marriages. See Ref. Church Mem., June 4, 1873. (D. Y. H.)

Fisher, Samuel R., D.D., a prominent minister of the (German) Reformed Church, was born at Morris- town, Pa., June 2, 1810. From his earliest childhood he evinced a spirit of piety, and became a full member of the Church when only fourteen years of age. About this time he was taken into the family of his pastor, the Rev. George Wack, in part as servant-boy and partly as student. Here he remained five years. In 1829 he matriculated at Jefferson College, Cannonsburg, and graduated in 1834. Soon after he began the study of theology in the Seminary of the Reformed Church, then located at Carlisle. He was licensed to preach in 1836, and became pastor of the Reformed Church in Emmittsburg, Md. He remained here only about three years, when, in 1840, he became identified with the Publication Society of the Reformed Church, located at Chambersburg, Pa., a position of much responsibility. He was prominent in the work of missionary and congregational extension, especially in the middle and south. At the close of the struggle for the cause in 1841 he returned to Philadelphia, where Dr. Fisher continued his labors, with slight changes, as editor-in-chief of the Reformed Church Messenger and superintendent of the publication interests of the Church. He died at Tiffin, O., whither he had gone from Philadelphia and the General Synod, June 5, 1861. During a period of forty years or more Dr. Fisher acted as stated clerk of the Synod of the Reformed Church in the United States. The duties of this office he performed with scrupulous exactitude and fidelity. In the meantime, also, he filled other stations of honor and responsibility, serving for many years as a member of the board of visitors of the theological seminary and as treasurer of the board of education. In every position which he occupied he rendered full and complete satisfaction. He was a man of good natural endowments, fine culture, and great skill in the practical application and use of his acquisitions. He was also noted for his extraordinary energy of character, perseverance, sterling integrity, and wonderful endurance. The amount of work which he accomplished was enormous. Besides the large amount of writing done as editor of the Messenger and stated clerk of the Synod, he published, Exercises on the Heidelberg Catechism; — Heidelberg Catechism Simplified; — Family Assistant, a book of devotions; — The Ruhm Fluge, translated from the German. He was also a frequent contributor to the Guardian and the Church Review. See Ref. Church Mem., June 15, 1881. (D. Y. H.)

Fisher, Samuel Ware, D.D., LL.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Morrilton, N. J., April 5, 1814. His father was an eminent Presbyterian minister in that town, his church being one of the largest in the state. Samuel graduated at Yale College in 1835; studied theology two years at Princeton, N. J., and one year at Union Seminary, New York. Shortly afterwards he was ordained pastor in West Bloomfield, N. J. Here he remained a little more than four years, and then was installed, Oct. 13, 1843, over the Fourth Presbyterian Church of Albany, N. Y. From Albany he removed to Cincinnati, and was installed as the same pastor of the same Presbyterian church and succeeded Dr. Lyman Beecher, entering upon the duties of his office in April, 1847. Here he had a brilliant and eminently successful ministry. A series of sermons preached by him to young men, Three Great Temptations, published in 1852, went through thousands of editions. He was one of the first and most vigorous president of Hamilton College, N. Y., and remained in office eight years. He was installed pastor of the Westminster Church of Utica, Nov. 15, 1867, and remained in that position till 1874. His death took place at his College Hill residence, Cincinnati, Ohio, Jan. 18, 1874. See Bio. Encyc. of Ohio, v. 23; Gen. Catt. of Union Theol. Semi, 1875, p. 18. (J. C. S.) FISHERMAN, in Christian Art. By this emblem our Lord and his disciples are frequently depicted on ancient monuments. The net is more rarely represented than the hook and line; but the net of St. Peter, with the Lord fishing with the line, is a device of the papal insignia. At San Zeno, in Verona, the patron saint is thus represented, and this subject is one of Alberti's frescoes. The lambs' sacrifice, Noah's ark, and others, on the bronze doors and marble front of that most important church, are specially valuable as connecting the earlier Lombard carvings with the most ancient and scriptural subjects.

of primitive church-work. This symbol, like the vine, is adapted from pagan decorations, which, of course, proves its antiquity.

Fiske, Nathan, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Weston, Mass., Sept. 9, 1738. He graduated from Harvard College in 1754; became pastor May 28, 1758, in the Third Precinct, Brookfield, and died there, Nov. 25, 1799. He had a genius for progressive improvement. His preaching was practical, and yet abounded in the beauties of literary composition. Besides several sermons, two volumes of his essays, entitled The Moral Monitor, are among his published works. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 571.

Pitch, Chauncey W., D.D., a Protestant Episcopalian clergyman, was for a number of years rector of the church in Piqua, O.; in 1861, of St. Stephen's Church, Terre Haute, Ind.; in 1864, of St. Paul's Church, Jeffersonville, and chaplain of the military hospital at that place; in 1866 was appointed post-chaplain at Fort Wayne, Detroit, Mich., a position which he continued to hold until 1875, when he removed to Jeffersonville, Ind., and died there, July 18, 1878, aged seventy-seven years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1879, p. 186.

Pitch, Elisha, a Congregational minister, was born at Winchendon, Conn., in 1746, and graduated from Yale College in 1766. After preaching for a time in Frankville, Mass., he was ordained, Jan. 19, 1772, at Hopkinson, N. J., as colleague with Rev. Samuel Barrett, who died the December following, when Mr. Pitch became sole pastor of the church. He remained in office until his death, Dec. 16, 1788. He was a fine scholar and poet, as well as an excellent minister. See Hist. of Mendon Almanac, 1884, p. 117. (J. C. S.)

Pitcher, James, one of the founders of the Roman Catholic Church in New England, was born in Boston, Mass., in 1803, and was confirmed by the first bishop of Boston, Dr. Cheverus. He attended the first Catholic school in New England, under Rev. Dr. Matignon, and was for a while teacher in the seminary attached to the old church in Frankville, where he had for one of his pupils, Dr. Williams, archbishop of Boston. He was ordained to the priesthood by Bishop Fenwick, Dec. 23, 1827. In 1829 he was sent on a mission to the Panamians in Maine, in the same year to New Hampshire and Vermont, and soon established his headquarters at Hartford, Conn., where he purchased the first Catholic church, established the Catholic Press, and extended his labors to every county in Connecticut. He established what is now the College of the Holy Cross, at Worcester, Mass., and helped build the Catholic cause at Northampton, Providence, R. I., Newport, and other places in those two states. In August, 1856, he was transferred to East Boston, Mass., where he founded four parishes. He also established several schools. He died in Boston, Sept. 15, 1861. Mr. Pitch compiled The Triumphs of Religion, edited the Manual of St. Joseph, a prayer-book, and was the author of A History of the Catholic Church in New England (1872). "His work is seen in the whole history of Catholicity in New England. No page can be written without his impress upon it. Wisdom filled his works; wisdom completed them. In life he promised to us what he really was, a model priest." (Bishop Healy.) See (N. Y.) Catholic Annual, 1886, p. 74.

Fitz, Daniel, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born in New Hampshire in 1716; graduated from Dartmouth College in 1748, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1825; was ordained June 20, 1828, pastor of South Church, Ipswich, Mass., and died there, Sept. 2, 1869. See Triun, Cut. of Andover Theol. Soc., 1880, p. 64.

Fitz-Geoffrey (or Fitz-Geoffry), Charles, an English clergyman, was born in Cornwall about 1575; educated at Hodgsmere-hall, Oxford; became rector of St. Dominic's, in his own county, and died in 1626. He was an excellent Latin poet. His publications are, Ae- sumnia sive Epigrammata, lib. iii, and Cenotaph, lib. i (1601)—a religious poem called the Blessed Birth-day (1604, 1830). He also published some Sermons. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. v. Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Fitzgerald, G. J., D.D., Hebrew professor in Dublin University; published Originality and Permanence of the Biblical Hebrew (1796) — A Hebrew Grammar, for the use of the students of the University of Dublin (1799). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer, Authors, s. v.

Fitzherbert, Thomas, a zealous Roman Catholic, was born in Staffordshire in 1592; educated at Oxford; in 1614 became a Jesuit at Rome, and was rector of the English college in that city for twenty-three years. He died in 1640, leaving a treatise concerning Policy and Religion (1600-10), and several Tracts in Defence of the Church. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer, Authors, s. v.

Fitz-James, Francois, Duc de, a French prelate and theologian, was born at Saint-Germain-en-Laye, June 7, 1709. He renounced his family dignities to enter the clerical life at the age of eighteen, and was appointed abbot of Saint Victor in 1727. He became bishop of Soissons in 1739, and afterwards succeeded cardinal of Avranches, as first almoner of Louis XV. This prelate taught the rigid doctrines of Jansenism. He died at Soissons, July 19, 1764, and after his death his works were published under the title, Oeuvres Posthumes (1769-70, 3 vols.). See Huet, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Fitz-James, Richard, an English prelate, and a distinguished benefactor of Merton College, Oxford, was a native of Somersetshire. He was educated at Oxford about 1459, and in 1465 was elected probatorian fellow of Merton College; in 1473 was prorector; in March, 1484, vicar of Minehead, and about the same time rector of Aller, in Somersetshire. In May, 1496, he was consecrated bishop of Rochester, from which, January, 1503, he was translated to Chichester, and in March, 1505, to the see of London. He died Jan. 15, 1522.

Fitz-Jocelin, Reginald, an English prelate, was the son of Jocelin, bishop of Salisbury, and was born in 1141. Early in life he was appointed archdeacon of Salisbury; when thirty-three he was elected to the important see of Bath and Wells, in 1174. He accompanied the archbishop-elect of Canterbury to Rome soon after, and was consecrated at the Church of St. John de Maurienne, in Savoy, by Richard, archbishop of Canterbury. On his return to England he was enthroned in great state. There was some opposition to this appointment. Reginald appears to have been a weak, well-meaning man, probably under the influence of his associates. In 1191 he was very unexpectedly elected to the see of Canterbury. Reginald sent to Rome for the pallium, and would have gone himself had he not been detained by illness. Meantime his illness increased, and he said "It is God's will that I should not be an archbishop, and may will submit to his." He died Dec. 26, 1191. See Hook, Lives of the Bps. of Canterbury, ii, 574 sq.

Fitzpatrick, John Bernard, D.D., a Roman Catholic bishop, was born of Irish parents, in Boston, Mass., Nov. 1, 1812. He received his education at Bos- ton, the College of Montreal, and the Saint-Sulpice Seminary, Paris. He was ordained priest in 1840, in 1844 was consecrated coadjutor-bishop of Boston, and in 1846 succeeded bishop Fenwick in the episcopate. He died Feb. 13, 1866.

Fitz-Ralph, Richard, an Irish prelate, is supposed to have been born in Devonshire. He was educated at Oxford, and in 1247 was created archbishop of Armagh. He was a strenuous opponent of the mendicant orders; and being in London at a time when a warm contest was carried on between the friars and secular clergy, about preaching, hearing confessions, etc., he delivered several sermons, in which he laid down nine conclusions against the mendicants. Upon a complaint made by the latter to the pope, Richard was ordered to appear at Avignon, which he did, and well defended his views. Miracles were attributed to him after his decease, in 1300, and a fruitless application for his canonization was made to Boniface IX. He wrote, Sermones ad Crucem Lo- dionem (1866);—Adversus Errores Armentor (Paris, 1612);—Defensio Cariturum aduersa Fratres Mendicantes, etc., (Paris, 1480);—De Lontubes. S. Des- pare. Boyle says that he translated the New Test. into Irish.

Fitzsimon, Henry, a zealous Jesuit, was born at Dublin in 1669, educated at Oxford, and died in 1644. He published a Justification of the Mass (1611)—5 Catalogue of the Irish Saints (1621), and some other theological treatises in defence of his faith. See Chairs, Biog. Dict. a. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, a. v.

Fitzsimon, Patrick, D.D., an Irish prelate, was dean of Dublin, and was appointed to the see of Dublin in 1708, having previously been parish priest of St. Audoen's. He filled this see six years, and died in 1730, in Francis Street, Dublin, in 1709. His life seems to have been so unobtrusive and purely ecclesiastical as to leave no materials of interest for a memoir. See D'Alton, Memoirs of the Bps. of Dublin, p. 471.

Fitzsimon, Walter, an Irish prelate, was a bache- lor of civil law, a learned divine and philosopher, preceptor of St. Patrick's Church, whose char- acter he represented as proxy in a parliament of 1478. On June 14, 1484, he was appointed to the see of Dub- lin, and consecrated in St. Patrick's Cathedral, Sept. 20 following. In 1487 this prelate was one of those who espoused the cause of Lambert Simnel, and were ac- cessory to his coronation in Christ Church. In 1488 Fitzsimon was permitted to renew his allegiance, and receive pardon through Sir Richard Edgecombe. In 1492 this prelate was made deputy to Jasper, duke of Bedford. While in this situation he endeavored to promote industrious habits among the more indolent of the people. In 1496 he held a provincial synod in the Church of the Holy Trinity, on which occasion an annual contribution for seven years was settled by the clergy of the province, to provide salaries for the lec- turers of the university in St. Patrick's Cathedral. In May of the same year he granted to John Alleny, dean of St. Patrick's, license to build a hospital for the relief of poor Catholics. In 1508 he was deputy to Gerald, earl of Kildare, and in 1509 lord-chancellor. He died May 14, 1511, at Finglas. See D'Alton, Memo- rials of the Bps. of Dublin, p. 171.

Flabellum (fem. Gr. ἱμάτιον). Among the evi- dences of the Eastern origin of the Christian religion is the use of this implement during the celebration of the eucharist. Having its birthplace and earliest home in a climate teeming with insect life, where food exposed uncovered is instantly blackened and polluted by swarms of flies, it was natural that the bread and wine of its sacramental feast should be guarded from defilement by the customary precautions. The flabellum having been once introduced among the furniture of the altar for necessary uses, in process of time became one of its reg- ular ornaments, and was thus transferred to the more temperate climates of the West, where its original pur- pose was almost forgotten.

The earliest notice of it as a liturgical ornament is in the Apostolical Constitutions, which direct that after the oblation, before and during the prayer of consecration, two deacons are to stand, one on either side of the altar, holding a flabellum made of thin membrane (parchment), or of peacock feathers, or of fine linen, and quietly drive away the flies and other small in- sects, that they strike not against the vessels. In the liturgies also of Chrysostom and Basil, the deacons are directed to fan the holy object with the flabellum of consecration. This fanning ceased with the Lord's Prayer, and was not resumed. Early writers furnish many notices of the use of the flabellum as an essential part of the liturgical ceremony. Moschus (Proft. Spirit., 196), when narrating how some shepherd boys near Apamea were imitating the celebration of the eucharist is childish sport, is careful to mention that two of the children stood on either side of the celebrant, vibrating their handkerchiefs like fans.

As the deacons were the officers appointed to wave the fan over the sacred oblations, its delivery constitutes a part of many of the Oriental forms for the ordinance to the discoantrum. After the stole has been given and placed on the left shoulder, the holy fan is put into the deacon's hands, and he is placed "at the side of the holy table to fan;" and again, the deacon is directed to take the fan and stand at the right side of the table, and wave it over the holy things. See cut under Elevation of the Host.

Although there is no mention of the flabellum in the Latin ritual books, there is no doubt that it was used by the Western Church at an early time. The fan appears to have gradually fallen into disuse there, and to have almost entirely ceased by the 14th century. At the present day, the only relic of the usage is in the magnificent fans of peacocks' feathers carried by the attendants of the pope in solemn processions on certain great festivals.

Though the original intention of the fan was one of simple utility, various mystical meanings collected round it. Reference has been already made to the idea that these feather fans typified the cherubim and seraphim surrounding the holy throne. Germanus also holds (Contemp. Rev. Eccl., p. 157) that the vibration of the fans typifies the tremor and astonishment of the angels at our Lord's Passion. We find the same idea in a passage from the monk Job, given by Photius, who also states (Cod. v. 35) that another purpose of the vibration of the fans was the raising of the mind from the material elements of the eucharist, and fixing them on the spiritual realities.

Flaccilia (sometimes written Flaccillia or Flaccidia), an early Christian empress, was a Spaniard by birth, or rather, perhaps, daughter of Antonius (prefect of Gaul); was married to Theodosius I, in 376, by whom she had several children. She was a woman of great virtue and charity; died apparently in 385, and is commemorated as a saint in the Greek Church on Sept. 14.

Flaccilus (written also Flacillius, Flaccillus, Flaccius, Placillus, and Flacitus), Arian bishop of Antioch, A.D. 383-342.

Flach, Siegmund Andreas, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Nov. 21, 1692, studied at Leipzig, where he was also adjunctus of the philosophical faculty, and died at Leisnig, in Saxony, in 1745, leaving, De Restitutenda Nonus Veritas Jesu, 21 (Leipzig, 1714):—De Cassi Stellorum in Fine Mundi (ibid. 1718):—De Vocibus έ ε θ λ χ γ ο μ ι ν ι ς in Epistola Jacobi (ibid. 1727):—Einführung zur Angloburschjachen Consession (ibid. 1730). Flacskensinus, Jacobus, a Finnish theologian and physician, a native of Mackyla, was provost of the cathedral of Abo. In 1665 he taught logic and metaphysics in that same city; in 1672 he lectured on theology, and died in 1696, leaving, Institutiones Pneumaticae (Abo, 1664):—Collegium Logicum (ibid. 1670). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biol. Générale, s. v.

Flackhaus, Johann, a Lutheran theologian and prelate of Finland, was born at Mackyla in 1636. He studied at the University of Abo, of which he became secretary in 1665. Still later he was successively connected with the faculty of philosophy, professor of mathematics in 1669, and pastor in 1682. Finally he became bishop of Viborg, and died July 11, 1708, leaving, among other works, Oratio Funeris in Abimun M. Aureum Thurioris, etc. (Abo, 1665):—De Eclesia Jussque Subjecto, etc. (1689):—Syllabe Systematum Theologicarum, etc. (ibid. 1685).—Chronologia Sacra (ibid. 1692):—Harmomia Funebripolica (ibid. 1701). Flaget, Benedict Joseph, a Roman Catholic prelate, was born at Courtenay, Aquerue, Nov. 7, 1763. He entered the Sulpitian seminary at Clermont, and after his ordination was received into the society of St. Sulpice. As the troubles of the French revolution came on he offered himself to bishop Carroll for service in America, and arrived in Philadelphia, Nov. 7, 1793. His first mission was at Vincennes, Ind., one of the oldest French settlements in the West, whence he was recalled in 1795 to assume a professorship in Georgetown College. On Nov. 4, 1810, he was consecrated bishop of the new diocese of Bardstown. His zealous labors extended to St. Louis and New Orleans. He established a seminary in his new diocese, and by the aid of priests like Bishop Spalding, Father J. Bayley, and the Missionaries of the Immaculate and Jesus fathers, institutions arose to meet the needs of his flock. In 1812 his resignation of his see was accepted, but, with Dr. Chaloner as coadjutor, he was reinstated. Bishop Flaget then visited Rome, where the pope urged him to travel through France and Northern Italy, to secure the assistance of the faithful. Cures said to have been effected by his prayers added to the force of his reputation. Returning to Kentucky, he resumed his toilsome labors. After his see was removed to Louisville, Dr. Chaloner resigned, and M. J. Spalding, afterwards the learned archbishop of Baltimore, succeeded him. Bishop Flaget closed his long and laborious life, Feb. 11, 1856. See Cath. Almanac, 1872, p. 57; De Courcy and Sheas, Hist. of the Cath. Church in the United States, p. 70, 538.

Flandern, Charles Worthen, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Salisbury, Mass., in February, 1807. He graduated at Brown University in 1839; pursued his theological studies with Rev. John Wayland, D.D. (a brother of Dr. F. Wayland), then pastor of the First Baptist Church in Salem; was ordained over the first Sunday in the year 1841, at Norwich, Conn., and remained there for nearly ten years, when he took charge of the First Baptist Church at Concord, N. H.; and subsequently was pastor of Baptist churches in Kennebunkport, Me., and Westboro and Beverly Farms, Mass. He died at Beverly, Aug. 2, 1876. (C. S.)

Flavius, the second of that name, bishop of Antioch, A.D. 498-512, was a weak and vacillating in moral character, originally a monk at Tilmugno, in Cilicia, Syria, later nuncio of the Church of Antioch at the imperial court in Constantinople, and was deposed in consequence of the Monophysite troubles at Alexandria, ending his life in banishment, A.D. 518. See Smith, Dict. of Christian Biog. n. s.

FlecK, Francis Ferdinand, a Lutheran theologian, was born at Dresden, April 5, 1800, and died, doctor and professor of theology, at Leipzig, in 1849, leaving, De Regno Christi (Leipsic, 1826); De Regno Divino (ibid. 1829).—Itin. Theologicum (ibid. 1831);—Wissenschaftliche Briefe, etc. (ibid. 1833-35. 2 vol.).—Die Verhältnis der Christenheit (ibid. 1842);—System der christlichen Dogmatik (ibid. 1847).—Der Fortschritt des Menschenverstandes (Igelsheim, 1848). He also edited Theologumena Nova, Vigiliae Ecclesiasticae, Schriften, etc. See Winer, Handwörter. Theol. Lit. 1, 440; Zuschke, Cath. Theol. i, 565. (B. P.)

Fleckeis, Eleazar ben-David, a Jewish rabbi, was born at Prague in 1754, and died there in 1826, leaving יד יד, a dissertation and criticism of the book of the Sabbathans in Prague, (1800); יד יד, a collection of derashas, in which he vents his rasa against the translators of the Bible, especially against the school of Moses Mendelssohn (1787); יד יד, with the holy names of God in the Scripture (1812). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 283 sq.; Spitz, יד יד, or Biography of Fleckeis (Prague, 1827). (B. P.)

Flemael (Fr. Filmael), Berthollet, an eminent Flemish painter, was born at Liége in 1614, and was pupil of Diirer, at Liége, whence he went to Italy, and studied the works of the great masters. He soon gained distinction, and was invited to Florence by the grand duke of Tuscany, to do some work. He went to Paris, and painted for the capula of the Carmelites, Eliphaz taken up into Heaven, and Eliakim Receiving the Mission of God. He also painted Acts of the Magi, for the sacristy of the Augustines. He returned to his native city in 1697, and was employed in many important works for the churches, the first of which was The Crucifixion, for one of the collegiate chapters of Liége, which gained him great reputation. Some of his other principal works are: The Crucifixion of Menas; The Assumption of the Virgin; The Conversion of St. Paul; The Raising of Lazarus, and The Crucifixion. He was elected a member, and subsequently a professor, of the Royal Academy at Paris. He died at Liége in FLEMING, Patrick, an Irish Roman Catholic ecclesiastic and writer, was born at Louth, April 17, 1699. He was appointed lecturer of divinity at Quebec, where he remained until the city was besieged by the elector of Saxony in 1631, when he was murdered. He published "Collectanea Sacra, or Lives of Irish and Scotch Saints" (1661). See Chalmers, "Bibl. Dict." s. v.; Allibone, "Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors," s. v.

FLEMING (or Flemmyngge), Richard, an English prelate, and the founder of Lincoln College, Oxford, was born at Crofton, in Yorkshire, about 1560, and educated at University College, Oxford. In 1460 he was presented to the prebend of South Newbold, in the church of York, and in 1470 was consecrated bishop of the university. In 1415, being rector of Benson, in Lincolnshire, he exchanged his prebend of South Newbold for that of Langford, in the Cathedral Church of York, and in April, 1429, was promoted to the see of Lincoln. In 1429 he executed that decree of the Council of Constance which ordered that the bones of Wyckliff should be taken up and burned. He died at Selsey, Jan. 25, 1431.

FLEMING, Thomas (1), D.D., an Irish prelate, of the family of the barons of Slane, was a Franciscan friar, and for some time a professor of theology in Louvain. He was made archbishop of Dublin, Oct. 28, 1623. In conformity with the proclamation issued by the king of England in Ireland, in April, 1629, the archbishop and mayor of Dublin seized upon several priests in that city in the act of saying mass, their ornaments were taken from them, the images battered and destroyed, and the priests and friars were delivered up to the soldiery. Between the years 1638 and 1640, Dr. Fleming's life appears to have been passed in the unobtrusive exercise of his ecclesiastical duties. In 1640 he presided at a provincial council, which was held at Tycrogher, in the county of Kildare. In 1642 archbishop Fleming, being much annoyed with the affairs of the country, sent the Rev. Joseph Eversell to appear as his proxy at the synod of the Roman Catholic clergy, which met at Kilkenny in May of that year. On June 20, 1648, archbishop Fleming and the archbishop of Tuam were the only prelates who signed the commission authorizing Nicholas Perceval, Sir Lucas Dillon, Sir Robert Talbot, and others, to treat with the marquis of Ormond for the cessation of arms. In July, 1644, he was present at the general assembly, when the oath of association was agreed upon, whereby every confederate swore to bear true faith and allegiance to the king and his heirs, to maintain the fundamental laws of Ireland, the free exercise of the Roman Catholic faith, and to obey the orders and decrees of the supreme council. In 1649 he was one of those who signed the declaration, at Clonmacnoise, reconciling all former differences. In October, 1650, this prelate, in person, at Galway, signed the document authorizing Dr. Nicholas French, bishop of Ferns, and Hugh Rochefort, to treat and agree with any Catholic prince, state, republic, or person as they might deem expedient for the preservation of the Catholic religion. He died about 1666. See D'Alton, "Memoirs of the Asps. of Dublin," p. 830.

FLEMING, Thomas (2), D.D., a Scotch clergyman, a native of Kirkmichael, was educated at the parish-school of Blairgowrie, at the grammar-school, Perth, and at the universities of St. Andrews and Edinburgh. He became tutor to Robert Hutton, Sept. 17, 1588, and was transferred to Finkle, Cupper, in 1580, and admitted April 18, 1811; promoted to Clackmannan, Sept. 4, 1822; admitted professor of natural philosophy in the university and King's College, Aberdeen; but in 1848, having become identified with the Free Church, he resigned his position, and was appointed professor of natural science in the Free Church College of Edinburgh. He died Nov. 18, 1957. His writings were chiefly scientific. See "Festi Ecles. Scottic.ii, 251, 494, 697; iii, 424, 697." public and private duty, and the strenuous opposition he gave to iniquity and vice. The benevolent institutions of Edinburgh and its environs derived much advantage from his friendly counsels and aid; he gave particular attention to the affairs of George Heriot's Hospital, the Orphan Hospital, the Edinburgh Education Society, and the Christian Knowledge Society. He published three single sermons (1790-1809) — Sermon (Edinburgh, 1826) — The Remains of a Parson of Kirkcaldy: Memoir of Robert Cuthbert, Esq., of Drum. He translated the Shorter Catechism into Gaelic, and assisted in revising the translation of the Scriptures into Gaelic. See Fasts Eccles. Scotticae, i, 641; ii, 516, 804, 824.

FLEMING, William, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, a native of Strathaven, studied at Glasgow University; was licensed to preach April 28, 1818; became assistant in succession to the Rev. Dr. Pollock, of Govan, and Dr. Taylor, of St. Enoch's, Glasgow; was presented by George IV, in February, 1826, to the living of Westruther, and ordained May 11; transferred to Old Kilpatrick in August of the same year. Having been elected professor of Oriental languages in Glasgow University, he resigned his benefice Oct. 23, 1822, and died March 3, 1866, aged seventy-four years. See Fasts Eccles. Scotticae, i, 627; ii, 302.

Flemish Version of the Scriptures. This is merely a dialectic variety of the Dutch. It is spoken in Brussels and Louvain, in Brabant, and even in parts of the neighboring departments of France. The first printed edition of the Belgic or Flemish Bible appears to have been that published at Delft in 1477, and again at Gouda in 1479. Other editions were published at Antwerp in 1518 and 1523. In 1526 another translation of the Scriptures into Flemish was made by several learned men, and published at Antwerp. The next edition was that of the Old Test., by William Vosterman, published at Antwerp in 1529; the New Test., was published in 1531, and again in 1588. This edition was followed by others, almost too numerous to be here specified. Many of these editions were afterwards prohibited by the Inquisition, and their continued publication was suppressed by the edict of Charles V in 1546. In spite of this edict, certain divines of the University of Louvain, among others Nicholas von Wingh, a regular canon of Louvain, undertook the revision and correction of the Belgic version according to the last revision of the Vulgate, and this revised edition was published under the auspices of the emperor, at Louvain, in 1548. After numerous editions of this version had been issued at Antwerp, it was revised and corrected by the doctors of Louvain, according to the text of the Vulgate, as revised by order of pope Clement VIII. This revised translation was printed at Plantin, at Antwerp, in 1599; again at Cologne in 1604, and at Antwerp in 1626; and it may, perhaps, be regarded as the standard Flemish version. Several other revised editions of this version followed. In 1717, Algildus Witt, a Ghent divine, published another version of the Belgic Scriptures, and about the same time another translation was commenced, by Andrew Scarrus, of Gorceum. Two volumes were printed at Utrecht in 1715-17, but the death of the translator, in 1719, put an end to the work, when he had carried it only as far as the Second Book of Kings. In 1745, a purely pure (ed. by John. Another Flemish translation, according to the Vulgate, was printed at Antwerp in 1717, and again at Utrecht in 1718. In 1820, in accordance with the wishes of the people, permission was given by the archbishop of Malines to print an edition of the Flemish New Test., translated by Maurice Duinkerchen. This appeared at Brussels about 1821; an edition of the whole Bible was printed at the same time from the Louvain edition of 1599. In 1837 the British and Foreign Bible Society published an edition of the Flemish Testament under the superintendence of her agent, Mr. W. P. Tiddye, then residing at Brussels. Two other editions of the Test. were printed of the entire Bible followed. Of late the British and Foreign Bible Society has undertaken a revision of the Flemish New Test., and in the report for 1871 we read that pastor De Jonghe has, “at the request of the committee, undertaken a translation of St. Matthew’s gospel from the Greek into Flemish, with the assistance of M. Matthysen, of Antwerp. This new version has been ordered, not so much in deference to the wishes of the Belgian Protestant clergy, who make use of the Dutch states-general version, but from deep-seated restrictions in the Flemish Bible, which was made from the Vulgate at the end of the 16th century, but to have a version made directly from the original. M. Matthysen is also superintending a new edition of the Louvain Test., in which the orthography will be conformed to that now in general use, and adopted by the Belgian government.” Of the revised edition the four gospels and Acts are now circulated. Up to March 31, 1884, the British and Foreign Bible Society had disposed of 248,075 parts of the Flemish Bible version. (B. P.) Fleiss, Johann Adam, a Lutheran theologian of Germ. This appeared Dec. 24, 1694. He studied at Altdorf, was in 1728 professor at the gymnasium in Bayreuth, and in 1727 court-deacon to the margrave George Friedrich Carl. In 1741 he was called as professor of theology and director of the gymnasium at Altona, and died there, Oct. 11, 1775. We wrote, De Erse Sciorum Fundamentis in Futurum, ex 1 Tim. 6, 10 (Al-

He attended Lawrence Academy at Groton; graduated from Williams College in 1851; the next year was principal of the academy in Westfield, and held the same position in 1855. Meanwhile (1853-54) he was in charge of Orleans Academy. From 1856 to 1862 he was principal of the high-school in Lee; and thereafter until 1865 occupied the same position in Lynn. Subsequently he was a resident student at Andover, was ordained pastor of the church in Hinsdale, Sept. 19, 1861, and died Nov. 29, 1882. See Cong. Year-book, 1883, p. 22.

Flint, James D., D.D., a Unitarian minister, was born at Reading, Mass., Dec. 10, 1779. He studied under the Rev. Ebiah Stone, and graduated from Harvard College in 1802; was engaged for a year or two as principal of an academy at Andover; then became a student of theology under the Rev. Joshua Bates, of Deerham. In due time he was licensed to preach; was ordained pastor of the Congregational society in East Bridgewater, Oct. 29, 1806; resigned in 1821; was installed Sept. 19 of that year over the East Society in Salem, and died there, March 4, 1825. His publications consisted chiefly of single sermons. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 407.

Flipart, Jean Jacques, a reputable French engraver, was born at Paris in 1728, instructed by his father, Jean Charles, became a member of the Royal Academy, and died in 1792. The following plates, among others, are by him: The Holy Family; Adam and Eve after their Fall; Christ Curing the Paralytic. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Flitner, Johann, a Lutheran theologian and hymn-writer of Germany, was born Nov. 1, 1618. He studied at different universities, was in 1646 deacon at Grimmen, near Greifswalde, and died at Stralsund, Jan. 7, 1678. His hymns are published in Himnisches Lust-
Flora, in Roman mythology, was the goddess of flowers, whose lively festival was celebrated on April 27. Her first temple was dedicated to her in Rome by the Sabine king Titus Tatius. Her festival, called Flora's, was instituted in the year of the city 516. It was celebrated by plays, dancing, and midnight debauches. The accompanying figure, after an antique statue, may be found in the museum at Naples.

Florence of Worcester, an English monk and chronicler, lived during the end of the 11th and beginning of the 12th century. He acquired a great reputation for learning, and died June 8, 1118. He wrote a Chronicle, which begins with the creation of the world and ends with the year of his death. That part of the work which relates to contemporary events is one of the most valuable of existing authorities. The Chronicle was continued from 1118 to 1141 by an anonymous writer. The most accessible edition is a translation, with notes, by Thomas Forester, in Bohn's Antiquarian Library. See Encyclop. Brit. 3d ed. s. v.

Florentina, a Spanish saint, commemorated June 20, was sister of Leander, Isidore, and Fulgentius, and became a nun and superior of the convent near Antigia (Ecija) about the close of the 6th century.

Florentius, a Scotch prelate, was elected to the see of Glasgow in 1202, but was never consecrated. He died at Rome. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 236.

Florus, Alphonso de, a Spanish Jesuit, who died in 1650, is the author of De Saco Apojo Martyrii, etc.—In Opusxxvii Ecclesiastici, See Alcamage, Bibliotheca Scriptorum Societatis Jesu; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexicon, s. v. (B. P.)

Flores, Enrique, a Spanish historical scholar, was born at Valladolid, Feb. 14, 1701. He entered the order of St. Augustin, taught theology at the University of Alcalá, and published a Cursus Theologiae (1732-38, 5 vols. 4to). He afterwards devoted himself exclusively to historical studies, and died at Madrid in May or August, 1778. He wrote, Clavus Historialis (1748); —La Esparta Boyrada (1747-49), a vast compilation of local ecclesiastical history, which obtained a European reputation, and of which twenty-nine volumes appeared in the author's lifetime, and others by later hands at subsequent dates: and other works of less importance. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bioü. Générale, s. v.

Florin, a presbyter of the Church of Rome, degraired for heresy in the latter part of the 2d century (Soc. Rom. Eccl. v, 15, 20).

Florius, Pierre, a French theologian, was born in the diocese of Langres in 1604. He became curate of Lais, a parish near Paris, and finally consecrated to the nuns of Port-Royal-des-Champs. He died Dec. 1, 1651, leaving, La Morale du Pater (Rouen, 1672); —Homilies sur les Ecritures (Rouen, 1671); —Traité de la Messe (ibid. 1679); —Recueil de Pieces Concernant la Morale Chrétienne (Rouen, 1745). See Hoefer, Nouv. Bioü. Générale, s. v.

Florius, Frans, an eminent Flemish painter, was born at Antwerp in 1592, and received sculpture under his uncle, Claude de Vriendt, until he was 16. When he turned his attention to painting, and entered the school of Lambert Lombard. He afterwards went to Rome and studied there several years. He was favored with the especial patronage of the counts of Hoorn and Egmont. He was received into the academy at Antwerp in 1599. His most esteemed work is, The Last Judgment, painted for the Church of Notre Dame, at Brussel, and now in the Museum there; in the Museum at Antwerp is his next best work, The Fall of Icarus. He died in 1575. See Spooren, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, viii, 180. Bioü. Drog. Dict. s. v.

Flower, Festival of, a classical festival of the Hindús, celebrated by the Rajpoots during nine days, in honor of Gauri, the wife of Mahakura or Incara. It takes place at the vernal equinox, the ceremonies commencing on the entrance of the sun into Aries, which is the opening of the Hindú year. Clay images are formed of Siva and Siva, which are immediately placed together. A small trench is then opened in the earth, in which barley is sown. The ground is irrigated, and artificial heat supplied until the grain begins to germinate, when the women with joined hands dance round the trench, invoking the blessing of Gauri upon their husbands. After this the young barley is taken up and presented by the women to their husbands, who wear it in their turbans. Various ceremonies are then performed during several days within the houses, at the close of which the images are richly adored and carried to the procession.

Flügel, Gustav Ludwig, a German Orientalist, was born Feb. 18, 1862, at Bautzen, in Saxony, and studied theology and philology at Leipzig. He continued his Oriental studies at Vienna under Hammer-Purgstall, and at Paris under De Saéy. In 1861 Flügel was called to Vienna to prepare a catalogue of the Oriental manuscripts of the imperial library. His main work is the Lexicon Bibliographicozum Encyclopaediam A. Hathi Khulfi Composition, which he published with a Latin translation and commentary, at the expense of the Oriental Translation Fund of London (London, and Leipzig, 1852-56, 3 vols.). He also edited a new edition of the Koran (Leipsic, 1834, 1841, 1850), and published Concordantia Coronis Arabicae (Lipsiae, 1842). Of his other writings we mention, Geschichte der Araber (1832-40, 5 vols.; 2d ed. 1864); —Al-Kidi, genannt der Muhadiyn der Araber (ibid. 1857); —Naxi, seine Lektüre und seine Schriften (ibid. 1862); —Die hussitischen Schuler der Araber (ibid. celi.).—Geschichte der Araber bis auf den Sturz des Kalifats von Bagdad (2d ed. 1864), besides contributions to German reviews and encyclopaedias. Flügel died at Dresden, July 5, 1870. After his death his Oriental works were published under the patronage of Kâlid al-Farâbî, of Ibn-al-nadin (1871-72, 5 vols. i and ii). FOLEY 402 FONSECA

Frost, THOMAS, D.D., a Roman Catholic bishop, was born in Baltimore, Md., March 6, 1822. He graduated from St. Mary's College in 1840, studied theology for six years, was ordained priest, Aug. 16, 1846, served missions in Montgomery County, in a few months was called to St. Patrick's Church, Washington, D.C. In 1848 was appointed secretary to archbishop Eccleston, and in 1851 was made chancellor. In 1864 bishop Spalding of Baltimore selected him as chancellor, and in 1867 as vicar-general. He was appointed to the see of Chicago, Nov. 19, 1869, was consecrated March 27, 1870, and died there Feb. 28, 1870. “In point of person and dignified bearing, Foley was one of the best specimens of a thoroughly Churchman on this continent. He was a fine pulpit orator, possessed great executive ability, and was beloved by all for his piety and charity.” See (N. Y.) Catholic Annual, 1890, p. 41.

Foligno, AGNORA DE, an Italian nun, was born at Foligno (duchy of Spoleto). She made herself famous by an exalted piety from her early life, but married a nobleman of her native town, yet did not discontinue her religious practices. Being left a widow in the prime of life, she devoted herself to the third order of St. Francis, and connected herself closely with Ubertino de Casal, a monk of the same order, who was famous for his mysticism. According to Ubertino’s report, it was Agnola who guided him into the way of salvation, sustaining him by her examples and advice. She assisted him also in writing the Arbor Vitae Crucifca Jesu (Venice, 1485), a rare and singular book, in which the authors pretend that Jesus himself was the founder of their order. Agnola submitted cheerfully to flagellations and mortifications the most painful, saying that “what is a mere task of love is a suffer freely for the one who is loved.” She composed a book, giving an account of her various temptations by the evil spirit, published at Paris in 1388, under the title, Theologia Cruces. She died Jan. 4, 1389. See Hoefer, Nov. Biog. General—e, s. v.

Foliot, Gilbert, a monk of Cluny, was abbot of Gloucester 1139, and of Hertford in 1148. He was also bishop of London in 1168. He died in 1198, having Expositio in Cant. Coriandorum (ed. Junius, 1638). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Foliot, Robert, canon of bishop Gilbert Foliot, was native of Hertfordshire. According to Bale (De Scriptoribus Brit. cent. iii, No. 8), he lived for a long time in France, where he got the surname of Robertus Melodunensis (Robert of Melun). He was first tutor to Becket, by whose favor he succeeded his kinsman in the see of Hertford. He wrote several books, of which that on The Stewardship of the Old Law is the most remarkable. According to bishop godwin (Lives of the Bishops) Robert de Melun (also bishop of Hertford) was a distinct person from Robert Foliot, and the latter was advanced bishop after the death of Becket. He is also called the archbishop of Gloucester. He died in 1186. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), i, 404.

Fonda, JESSE, an early Reformed (Dutch) minister, was born at Watervliet, N. Y., in 1726. He was converted in youth, and graduated from Union College with the Class of 1748. The Class of 1748 were invited to preach in 1809, his theological course having been pursued with some neighboring ministers. He then began a course of systematic and thorough study, which gave high tone to his future ministry. His first settlement was at Nassau, from 1808 to 1813, in connection with the Dutch church. He was married. His marriage took place very suddenly and so rapidly as a preacher that he was called in the latter year to the First Church of New Brunswick, N. J. Here he sustained himself with marked ability in the presence of the professors and students of the college and theological seminary. In 1817 he removed to the large and flourishing church at Montegomery, N. Y., where he labored until his decease in 1827. Mr. Fonda published several pamphlets upon subjects of current interest, and was the author of a valuable practical volume upon the Sacraments, which elicited considerable attention as the result of the debate over the baptism of John the Baptist; viz. that it was not Christian baptism. See Magazine of Ref. Dutch Church, November and December, 1827, ii, 226, 283, 340; Steel, Centennial Discourse; Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America, s. v. (W. J. L. T.)

Fonsec, ARNOL and ISAAC DIAZ, two brothers of Portuguese descent, were both strict adherents of orthodox Judaism. When they found that the teachings of the Bible were not in harmony with those of the rabbi, they questioned them with regard to their doubts, which finally had the result that on Feb. 28, 1712, they were both excommunicated from the Jewish community. They then united with the Christians who were suspected of being Atheists, and to counteract this suspicion the two brothers appealed to the pastor of the Reformed Church, Her. Siberras, requesting him to examine them. He did so, and openly declared them to be believers in the Christian religion, and that they had studied the Old Testament with so much attention of the New brought them to the knowledge of the Messiah, and six months after their excommunication from the synagogue they were received into the Church. The two brothers published, in the Dutch language, in 1714, the reason for their apostacy. The first work was a different study of the Old Testament in the light of the New brought them to the knowledge of the Messiah, and six months after their excommunication from the synagogue they were received into the Church. The two brothers published, in the Dutch language, in 1714, the reasons for their apostacy. The first work was De Evangelische Christendom en de Juden (Carlsruhe, 1884), p. 415 sq. (I. F.)

FONSECA (Sonnet). ANTONIO da (better known by the name of Antonio dos Chaves), a celebrated Portuguese theologian, was born at Vilafranca, June 28, 1631. He studied at the University of Evora, and after the death of his father engaged as a simple soldier, but having killed a man in a duel, fled to Brazil. At Bahia he was reformed from a life of licentiousness by reading a treatise of P. Lins da Graça, and from that time resolved to become a Franciscan. He returned to Europe, and, after some relapses of faith, joined the order of St. Francis of Evora, May 16, 1652. Afterwards he studied theology at Coimbra, established a seminary at Torres Vedras in 1678, and there died, with the rank of full professor, Oct. 20, 1687. He left the following works, posthumously published: Fateus de Amor Divino (Lisbon, 1688) — Obras Espirituais (ibid. 1684, 1685, in 2 parts) — O Padre nosso Commentado (1698). — Espelho do Espírito em que deve viver e Compor-se a Almas (1695) — Sermos Genuinos (1690), besides a number of ascetical writings still in MS. See Hoefer, Nov. Biog. General, s. v.

FONSECA, JUAN RODRIGUEZ de, a Spanish prelate, was born at Toro in 1451. He became successively dean of Seville, bishop of Badajos, of Cordova, of Valencia appointed archbishop of Granada, and completed several diplomatic missions. While dean of Seville he was charged with the ordering of the armament destined for the discovery of the New World. Being consulted before on the project of Christopher Columbus, he agreed with the scheme as a missionary. He never forgive him for having succeeded, and let pass no occasion for doing him harm, especially after the death of Isabella, when Fonseca, being charged with the management of affairs regarding the New World, pursued with all his hatred the family of Columbus. He was less hostile to Fernando Cortes and to La Casa, who challenged and obtained. in 1590, the dissolution of the council of which this prelate was president. Being a hard man, fanatic and passionate, Fonseca became a great friend of the inquisitor Torquemada. He died at Burgos, March 4, 1584. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s. v.

Font, Baptismal. The material in the Western Church was, as a rule, stone; frequently porphyry, or other rich marbles. In the Eastern Church the font was usually of metal or wood, and seldom or never possessed any beauty (Neale, Eastern Church, i., 214). The usual form of the font was octagonal, with a mystical reference to the eighth day, as the day of our Lord's resurrection, and of regeneration by the Spirit (comp. Ammon. Epist. 20, 44). The piscina is sometimes found of a circular form, and is occasionally, though very rarely (as at Aquileia) hexagonal. Gregory of Tours (De Glor. Martyr. lib. i., c. 28) speaks of a font in the shape of a cross, in Spain. The form of a sepulchre is stated to have been sometimes adopted, in allusion to the Christian's burial with Christ in baptism (Rom. iv., 4).

The piscina usually formed a basin in the centre of the baptistery, rather beneath the level of the pavement, surrounded with a low wall. It was entered by an ascent and descent of steps. According to Isidore Hispal. (Orig. xv., 4; De Diec. Off. ii., 24) the normal number was seven; three in descent, to symbolize the triple renunciation of the world, the flesh, and the devil; three in ascent, to symbolize the confession of the Trinity, and a seventh, "septimus . . . qui et quartus," at the summit of the enclosing wall, for the officiating minister to stand on. But the rule concerning the number was not invariable. At Noætra, the number of steps is five, two in ascent, and three in descent. The descent into the piscina of St. John Lateran is by four steps.

Font, Consecration of. In the 4th century, the ceremony of blessing the water to be used in baptism was already regarded as of high antiquity (see Basil the Great, De Spiritu Sancti, 27; Ignatius, Ad Ephes. 18; Ireneus, Haer. i., 21, § 4; Tertullian, De Baptismo, 4; Cyprian, Epist. 70, 71; Sedatus of Thuburum, Sententiae Episc. 18, in Cyprian's Works; Cyril of Jerusalem, Catech. iii., 3; Ambrose, De Iis qui Initiantur, 5). Probably the earliest form extant, which cannot be assumed with certainty to be older than the beginning of the 4th century, is that of the Apostolical Constitutions (vii., 43), in which the priest, after a recitation of the mercies of God, analogous to the preface of the eucharistic office, proceeds, "Look down from heaven, and sanctify this water, and grant grace and power that he who is baptized according to the command of thy Christ may with him be crucified and die, and be buried and rise again to the adoption which is in him, by men, he removed this immense mass, weighing about 750,000 pounds. For this undertaking he was created a knight of the Golden Spur, and a Roman nobleman. He afterwards erected other obelisks in Santa Maria Maggiore. He died at Naples in 1657. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hooke, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Fontana, Francesco Ludovico, an Italian prelate, was born Aug. 28, 1705, at Casali Maggiore (duchy of Milan); entered the Barnabite order in 1767; eventually became professor of eloquence in the College of Milan, where he acquired great facility in the Greek language. He accompanied to France in 1784, the Pope, Pius VII, who was on a tour in France, and on the return of the pope to Rome was made cardinal, March 8, 1816, placed at the head of the congregation of the Index, still retaining his title as superior-general of the Barnabites. He died at Rome, March 19, 1824. See Hoofer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Fontana, Lavinia, an eminent Italian painter, daughter of Prospero Fontana, was born at Bologna in 1552, and studied under her father. She painted a number of works for the Bolognese churches, of which the best are, The Miracle of the Lovers; The Annunciation; and The Crucifixion. She subsequently went to Florence, and had much success. After her death in 1607 she was buried in the church of Santa Maria della Scala, Florence. Her portrait is in the Louvre. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Fontana, Prospero, an eminent historical and portrait painter, was born at Bologna in 1512, and studied under Francesco. His masterpiece is at Bologna in Santa Maria della Scala. In the same church is an admirable picture of The Annunciation, by him. He also executed the Descent from the Cross, in the Bolognese Academy. He died in 1597. See Hoofer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Fontanelle, Ferdinand, a French Protestant theologian, was born at Nîmes, May 15, 1737. He studied at Geneva, and entered the ministry in 1821. While discharging his ministerial duties at his native place, there occurred, in 1824, a vacancy in the theological faculty at Montauban. Fontanelle made an application and passed such an excellent examination that his appointment became a matter of course. Rumors from Nîmes having reached the faculty as to some liberal opinions of the candidate, it was thought best to prepare a theological formula which Fontanelle was to sign, but he refused to do this on conscientious grounds. In 1829 he succeeded M. Olivier Desmont at Nîmes, and died there, Jan. 9, 1862. Of his writings we mention, besides his many articles in the Évéhélique: Catéchisme Évangelique (8th ed. 1867).—Histoire Sainme, in questions and answers (4th ed. 1866).—De l'Unité Religieuse dans l'Église Réformée de France (1844).—De la Lutte Engagée dans les Églises Protestantess (1842). Fontinalia, a festival celebrated annually among the ancient Romans on Oct. 13, when the wells were adorned with garlands, and flowers thrown into them.

Foote, Charles Henry, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Lenox, Mass., June 17, 1825. He prepared for college at Rochester, N. Y.; graduated from Williams College in 1844; took the degree of A.B. the same year at the academy at Mendon; studied law one year; graduated from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1854; was licensed by the New Brunswick Presbytery, and afterwards ordained pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, New Brunswick. After an unsuccessful pastorate of three and a half years, he removed to the West; in 1866 was installed pastor at Jerseyville, Ill.; next at Cairo, in 1868; over the North Church of St. Louis, Mo., in 1871; over the Walnut Street Church, Evanston, Ind., in 1876, and at Ionia, Mich., in 1878, where he died, June 28, 1880. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem., 1881, p. 72. (W. P. S.)

Foote, James, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, son of the Rev. James Foote, minister of Rettertain, graduated from Marischal College and the University, Aberdeen, March 81, 1782; was licensed to preach July 25, 1784; afterwards presented to king George III to the living at Logie, and ordained Dec. 21, 1789; promoted to the third charge at Aberdeen in November, 1824, and admitted June 23, 1825; joined the Free Secession May 24, 1848, and died June 25, 1856, aged seventy-four years. He published four single Sermons (Dundee, 1818; Lond. 1819); Lectures on the Gospel by Luke (Glasgow, 1818, 6 vols.);—Pastoral Letter to the Congregation of the Free East Church (Aberdeen, 1844);—A Treatise on Effectual Calling (Edinb. 1846);—A Sermon in the Free Church Pulpit (vol. i). See Finti Eccles. Scoticae, iii, 473, 835.

Foote, William Henry, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Colchester, Conn., Dec. 29, 1794. He entered Yale College in the junior year; spent some time teaching, and then entered and studied for one year in Princeton Theological Seminary. Having been licensed by the Presbytery of Winchester in October, 1818, he accepted a call at Greensville, in Virginia, until June, 1822, when he organized and afterward became pastor of a church in Woodstock. In November, 1824, he became pastor of the congregations of Mount Bethel, Springfield, and Romney; about 1838 agent of the Central Board of Foreign Missions, laboring within the bounds of the synods of Virginia and North Carolina. While thus engaged, he gathered the materials for his volumes, afterwards published, of Sketches, Historical and Biographical, of the Presbyterian Church in Virginia and North Carolina. In 1846 he returned to his old charge in Romney, and continued till 1861. During the war he was occupied in lower Virginia as agent for Hampden-Sidney College, also in supplying vacant pulpits, and in Petersburg, during Grant's siege, as chaplain to the hospital. He returned to Romney and Springfield (now in West Virginia), and labored till his death, Nov. 22, 1866. See Quarterly Record of Yale College, 1870; Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem., 1881, p. 27.

Footprints, Monumental. Sepulchral slabs have been found in the catacombs and elsewhere incised with footprints. The two feet as a rule point the same way, though sometimes, but rarely, they are turned in opposite directions. A slab in the Kirchermuseum has two pairs of footprints pointed contrary ways, as of a person going and returning (fig. 1). Some of these slabs are certainly Christian, though the fact in other cases is uncertain. A slab given by Boibleti, inscribed with JANUARIA IN DIES at one end, bears the sole of a foot, with IN DIES incised upon it, at the other. Perret gives a slab erected by a Christian husband to his wife, with a pair of footprints incised on it, not bare, as is customary, but used for shoe or boot. In other cases, more rarely, we find a single foot seen in profile.

The signification of this mark is much controverted. Some regard the footprint as the symbol of possession, denoting that the burial-place had been purchased by the individual as his own. This view is based on a
The same name is frequently found on seal rings. The sole of the foot bears sometimes the name of the owner, e.g. FORSTYNS (Boldetti, p. 506; Perret, vol. iv, pl. xi, No. 4); ARRHVO (Arrighi, ii, 698; Agincourt, Sculpt. pl. viii, No. 23), from the catacombs of St. Agnes; sometimes a Christian motto or device, e.g. AVSIA IN ZNO (Perret, u. a. No. 5), and the monogram of William Forbes of Corse, was born about 1565; studied at St. Salvator's College, and took his degree from the University of St. Andrews in 1583; was admitted to the living at Alford in 1585. He was commissioned in 1605 to wait upon the king to inform his majesty what the assembly of Aberdeen had done in opposition to the royal pleasure, having been the moderator of the Class. The privy council condemned him to be imprisoned, first in Edinburgh castle, then in the castle at Blackness. In 1606, he, with five others, was tried at Linlithgow on the charge of treason, declining to acknowledge the authority of the privy council, and banished, Oct. 29, 1606, for life. He went to Stettin, where he became the minister to the British merchants at Middle- burgh, laid the foundation of a Scottish church there in 1611, removed to the church at Delft in 1621, was displaced by order of the British government, and died about 1634. He published, The Scot's Hope, and its Infallibility (1608); — Two Sermons (ed.); — A Treatise Tending to the Clearing of Justification (1614, 4to); — A Treatise how God's Spirit may be Discerned from Man's Spirit (Lond. 1617); — Four Sermons on 1 Tim. vi (1635, 4to); — Certain Remarks Touching the Estate of the Kirk in 1605, 1606; — Three Letters to James VI (1611). See Fasti Eccles. Scotiaca, iii, 545.

Forbes, Lewis William, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, graduated at the university and King's College, Aberdeen, March 29, 1811; was licensed to preach July 4, 1815; presented to the living at Boharm in June, and ordained Aug. 14, 1816; was elected moderator of the General Assembly in May, 1832, and died Jan. 8, 1854, aged sixty years. He occupied a prominent position in the Church in the North, was most exemplary in the discharge of his duties, and much esteemed. He published the sermon he preached at the opening of the General Assembly in 1808, and also An Account of the Parish of Boharm. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiaca, iii, 228, 898.

Forbes, Patrick, a Scotch clergyman, son of the Rev. Francis Forbes of Grange, graduated from Marischal College and the university, Aberdeen, in 1788; was appointed schoolmaster of the parish of Boharm, May 1 following: licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Strathbogie, May 8, 1797; presented to the living at Boharm in May, and ordained Aug. 14, 1800; promoted to Old Machar, second charge, April 25, 1816; was elected moderator of the General Assembly in May, 1829, and died Oct. 13, 1847, aged seventy-two years. He published Considerations on the Constitution of the Church of Scotland (Edinb. 1841), and translated Principles of Interpretation of the Old Testament, by J. H. Pareau, in the Biblical Cabinet, vol. viii. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiaca, iii, 229, 488, 898.

Forbin-Janson, Charles Auguste Marie Joseph, Comte de, a French prelate, was born in Paris, Nov. 8, 1745; early became a politician, but shortly after entered the seminary of St. Sulpice; was ordained in 1811, immediately became grand-vicar of the diocese of Chambery; was consecrated bishop of Nancy and Toul in 1824; during the political dangers following he took refuge in Canada, but returned to France, and died near Marseilles, July 12, 1844. See Hoefer, Nouv. Dict. Générale, s. v.

Ford, James, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, graduated from Edinburgh University, April 14, 1748; was licensed to preach Nov. 26, 1746; ordained July 31, 1751, as minister to the congregation at Winfrord; presented by the earl of Lauderdale to the living at Lauter; admitted Sept. 27, 1758, and died Sept. 24, 1810, aged eighty-six years. He published two single Sermons (1777-78), and An Account of the Parish of Lauter. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiaca, i, 521.

Ford, Simon, a divine and Latin poet of some notoriety, was born in East Ogwell, Devonshire, in 1619, and educated at Magdalen Hall, Oxford. In 1651 he was vicar of St. Laurence, Reading, of Northampton in 1659, and in 1865 of Old Swanford, Worcestershire. He died in 1699. He was one of the translators of Plutarch's Morals, printed in 1684, and published a number of sermons, Latin poems, etc., from 1646 to 1696, a list which will be found in Athen. Oxon. See Chalm.

FORDICDIA, a festival celebrated annually in the month of March among the ancient Romans. It was instituted by Numa, in consequence of a general barrenness which happened to prevail among the cattle. The name was derived from the sacrifice of a Forda, that is, a calf, with a calf's head.

Fore-jotre, in Norse mythology, was the principal Jote, i.e., the oldest giant, the forefather of the ancient Forjotiantian deities, who ruled over Scandinavia prior to the Asas, and were driven out by Odin. Their history lies so far in the past that little is known of them save their name; but from this we deduce a mythology personifying nature. Fore-jotre had three sons: Eger, the sea; Kare, the air; Loge, the fire; and one daughter: Iain, theft. This last was the wife of Eger, and by him she had nine daughters: Himing-lis, the heaven-threatening; Dufa, the deep; Biologradla, the dark-thirsty; Heffring, the rising; Udur, the falling; Raun, the rustling; Bylgris, the storm; Driðna, the threatening; Kogla, the flood. Kare, the air, produced Frosta, the frost; the latter produced Sní-thingace, the icy snow. Loge, the third son of Fore-jotre, married Gled, the flame; and by him she had Einmira, the coal, and Eia, the ashes. See Norse.

FOREMAN, ANDREW, was prothonotary apostolic in Scotland in 1449, in 1501 was promoted to the see of Moray, and together with it held in commendam the priories of Pittenweem in Scotland, and of Cottingham in Yorkshire. About 1506 he was appointed by king James IV as his ambassador, to procure a personal conference between him and Henry, king of England. In 1514 he was translated to the see of St. Andrews, and in 1517 was also perpetual commissary of the monastery of Dunkerron. He died in 1522. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 35, 146.

FORMALIST, a sect of thinkers which arose in the 12th century, as a compromise between the doctrines of the Nominalists and Realists. They professed to hold an intermediate place between the two parties, abstracting the forms of things, and assigning to them the place of essence. Duns Scotus is said to have originated formalism, although the elements of the doctrine were to be found in the writings of medieval philosophers anterior to his time.

FORMAN, AARON PARKER, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born Nov. 12, 1827, in Halls County, Mo. He was converted at the age of eleven; graduated from Centre College, Ky., in 1849, with the highest honors of his class, and from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1853; preached that year in Hannibal, Mo., and in March, 1854, was ordained pastor there. In 1864 he was called to St. Joseph, where he acted with great prudence, fidelity, and zeal. In 1870 broken health compelled him to resign, and travel in Minnesota and Colorado; and after serving in the Price Street Church, St. Louis, Mo., in March, 1872, he became pastor of the Church in Canton, Miss. He died at Courtland, Ala., Oct. 14, 1875. Dr. Forman was a man of great gentleness and amiability of character, combined with unusual firmness and sound judgment; an excellent scholar, a popular preacher, and a beloved pastor. See Gen. Capt. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 178. (W. P. S.)

FORMOSA, RELIGION OF. The Formosa is a large island in the China Sea, called in Chinese T'ai-wom, 245 miles in length from north to south, and about 100 miles in breadth at the broadest part, containing an area of 14,882 square miles. The religion of the islanders is polytheistic in its character, there being recognized among them a plurality of deities, two of whom are regarded as supreme, one of them residing in the north, and the other in the east. The one is a guardian of men, the other, who is a goddess, the guardian of women. They acknowledge also an the state with religiousness in the most heathen and evil spirit. There are two gods of war, a god of health, a god of forests, and a god of cornfields. They have also household gods, who preside over the several departments of nature. The worship of the gods, which consists in religious meetings, sacrifices, libations, and fasting, is conducted by priestesses called Jung, who work themselves up to a frenzy, or fall into a trance, during which they pretend to hold familiar intercourse with the gods. The Formosans acknowledge the immortality of the soul, and always erect a bamboo hut for the dwelling of the spirit of a departed relative or friend. They also hold to future rewards and punishments, but have no idea of the resurrection of the body. An attempt was made by the Dutch in the 17th century to Christianize the island, but without success. They are now in gross heathenism.

FORMULA, in ecclesiastical phrase, is a profession of faith.

FORSACILIA, a festival celebrated among the ancient Romans in honor of the goddess of baking, Forza. It is said to have been instituted by Numa, and the time of its celebration was announced every year by the Curio Maximus.

Fornari, Maria Victoria, an Italian foundress of a religious order, was born at Geneva in 1562. She was married to Angelo Strate, by whom she had five children, who all devoted themselves to the Church. After the death of her husband, she instituted the order of the Celestial Annunciation, which had over a hundred houses in Italy, Germany, and France. The nuns were dressed in white robes, with a light blue shawl. She died Dec. 15, 1617. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Fornari, Niccolo, an Italian prelate, was born at Rome, Jan. 28, 1788. He studied with arduousness, was recieved into orders, and devoted himself to instruction in theology. Pope Gregory XVI made him nuncio to Brussels. He was afterwards appointed a chief com-misioner of the congregation of studies. Fornari was made cardinal in petitio, Dec. 21, 1846, and proclaimed as such Sept. 30, 1850. He was for some time papal nuncius at Paris, where he died, June 18, 1856. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Forrest, John, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Edinburgh, Scotland, Sept. 19, 1799. He graduated from Edinburgh University, studied theology, received a call from the Scotch Presbyterian Church of Charleston, S. C., in June, 1822, and being ordained by the Edinburgh Presbytery, was in due time installed pastor. He continued there until his death, which occurred in July, 1873. (W. P. S.)

Forrester, Walter, a Scotch prelate, was first a canon of the Church of Aberdeen, next was made sec-tary of state, and then promoted to the bishopric of Brechin in 1401, where he was still ruling in 1415. See Reitlinger, Biog. Bishops, p. 168.

Forste, in Norse mythology, was a son of Baldur, and Nanna, the lovely daughter of Nef. He was the god of peace, union, and friendship; pacifying every quarrel. A beautiful palace called Glimir, resting upon golden pillars, and covered with silver shingles, was his throne, which constituted the most righteous judgment-

Forster, Froben, a German philosopher and ecclesiastic, was born Aug. 80, 1709, at Königgrätz. He studied medicine, and also took holy orders in 1738. In 1744 he was called to Salzburg, but in 1747 was recalled to his monastery, and became its prior in 1750. In 1762 he was made abbott, and died Oct. 11, 1791. He wrote, besides philosophical treatises, De Scripturis Sacris Vulgo Editionis (Salzburg, 1749), and edited Alexius Opera (ibid. 1777, 4 vols. fol.). (B. P.)

Forster, Heinrich, D.D., an eminent Roman Catholic prelate of Germany, was born Nov. 24, 1800, at Gross-Glogau. He studied at Breslau, and received holy orders in 1825. While chaplain and pastor at Lauchhammer his pulpit abilities became known, and he was called, in 1837, as cathedral-dean to Breslau. When bishop Diepenbrock died in 1853, Forster was appointed as "persona gratissima" his successor. At the Vatican council he belonged to the opposition party, but finally yielded, and accepted the dogmas of faith. Not obeying the recalled May-laws of the Prussian government, he was deposed, in 1875, from his office, and fled to the castle in Johannisburg, in Austria-Silesia, where he died, Oct. 20, 1881. He is the author of, Lebensbilb Diözesan (Breslau, 1869).—Predigten (ibid. 1871, 7 vols.);—Dichtungen (ibid. 1878) (Breslau, 1880, 2 vols.). Forster, Johann Christian, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Auersthal, in Thuringia, Oct. 6, 1724. He studied at Leipzig, was in 1792 after-noon-preacher at Naumburg, and in 1794 cathedral-preacher there; in 1800 accepted a call as superintendent to Weimarsfeld, and died there at the end of that same year. He published a number of ascetical books. See Doring, Die gelehrten Thüringen Deutschlands, i, 418 sqq.; Winer, Handbuch der theolog. Lit. ii, 182, 207, 215, 252, 321, 366, 394. (B. P.)

Forsyth, John Alexander, LL.D., a Scotch clergyman, son of John Forsyth, graduated from the university and King's College, Aberdeen, in 1786; was licensed to preach Oct. 15, 1790; presented by the king to the living at Bethelius, in succession to his father, in January, 1791, and ordained Aug. 24 following. He died June 11, 1843, aged seventy-four years. To his knowledge of theology and the pastoral office he added a profound knowledge of chemistry, and was of great service to the British government in the manufacture of gunpowder. He was the discoverer, in 1803, of the percussion-lock, which was afterwards universally adopted, both in the army and by sportmen; but he never received any public reward. See Fusti Eccles. Scott. omm. iii, 485.

Fortgriese, Niccolao (I), a Dominican of Sienna, was born in 1180, made bishop of Aleria in 1194, and died in 1270, leaving Postilla in IV Prophetus Majores, et IV Evangelior, in Epistolas Pauli et in Apocalypsei; —Comment. in Dionysium de Divinis Nominalibus; —De Dubuis in Christo Nativitate; —De Caritatis. Fortiguerra (or Forteguerrl), Niccolo (2), an Italian cardinal of the 15th century, who rendered important military and diplomatic service to popes Eugenius IV, Nicholas V, Pius II, and Paul II, and was a liberal patron of learning, died at Viterbo in 1473, aged about sixty-five years. See Zuchold, Handbuch der theolog. Lit. i, 741, 752; Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 367. (B. P.)

Fortiguerra, Niccolo (3), an Italian prelate and poet, named the Younger, to distinguish him from an ancient member of his family, the cardinal of the same name, was born at Pistoia, Nov. 20, 1474. While still young, he showed quite a disposition for poetry; but after he had been made doctor, in 1500, he went to Rome, and distinguished himself there by his knowledge. He accompanied into Spain the papal legate, Zonduradari, and on his return to Rome became honorary chamberlain to Clement XI, canon of Santa Maria Maggiore, and referendary of two chancelleries. About 1498 he was admitted into the Confraternity of the Arcades, under the name of Nicaluio Tucio. In 1715 he imprisoned a poem in the manner of Berni, Du Pulci, and Ariosto. He died Feb. 17, 1735, leaving several orations, addresses, and other minor pieces, for which see Jurin, Script. Ital. (B. P.)

Fortlage, Arnold Rudolph Karl, a German philosopher, was born June 12, 1806, at Osnabrück. He first studied theology at Göttingen and Berlin, but, attracted by Hegel's lectures, betook himself entirely to the study of philosophy, which he continued in 1829 at Munich, under Schelling. In the same year he commenced his philosophical lectures at Heidelberg; in 1845 he was at Berlin, and in the following year accepted a call to Jena, where he died, Nov. 8, 1881. Of his works we mention, Die Lichten des Hegelschen Systems der Philosophie, etc. (Heidelberg and Leipzig, 1869).—Philosophische Arbeiten; Philosophische Schriften. (Heidelberg, 1885).—Avelli Aquiniani Doctrina de Tempora (ibid. 1886).—Genetische Geschichte der Philosophie seit Kant (Leipzig, 1884).—Das System der Psychologie als empirischer Wissensschaft aus der Beobachtung des inneren Stumes (ibid. 1890, 2 vols.).—Arck Psychologische Vorträge (Jena, 1869).—Sechs Psychologische Vorträge (1870).—Vier Psychologische Vorträge (1874).—Beiträge zur Psychologie als Wissensschaft aus Spekulation und Erfahrung (Leipzig, 1875). As a supplement to his System. His position concerning the philosophy of religion Fortlage had already defined in the Durstellung und Kritik der Beweise für das Dunit Gottes (Heidelberg, 1840). The belief in God is not a matter of rational persuasion, but rests entirely on moral motives. Religion is essentially a moral state, and only the translation of this state into the idea is the dogma of God's existence. His speculative speculation had the peculiar fate that it commenced with the secondary factor of the religious consciousness, and found itself, and this against its own will, only toward the end driven back to the theoretical in turn, so rich in consequences, commenced with Kant. So far, the philosophy of religion, instead of advancing, has only been protracted. But Kant, too, needs to be supplemented; the purely transcendental belief, emanating from a moral and religious need, asks for precise points from which it connects with the material world; it nec-

Fortune, in Roman and Greek mythology, “chance.” This goddess, called Tyche by the Greeks, was represented at Ephesus in a small temple, by the horn of Amalthea, and a small whirled Cupid, which signified that the love-affairs of men were furthermore more by fortune than by beauty. Pindar, therefore, called her one of the Parcae, or goddesses of destiny. The Fortuna of the Romans had temples in various parts of the city, and in several cities of the empire, those at Antium (Horace, Od. i, 35) and Franaeae being the most celebrated.

(2) Another set of forty martyrs is commemorated on May 20, as having suffered in Persia, A.D. 375. (3) Forty virgins are said to have suffered on Dec. 24, under Decius, at Antioc, in Syria.

Foscarari (Lat. Forcararii), Egidio, an Italian Roman Catholic prelate, was born at Bologna, Jan. 27, 1512. He entered the Dominican order, and in 1544 became prior and inquisitor at his native place, and afterwards bishop of Modena. He was imprisoned for heresy by Paul V, but vindicated by Pius IV. He entered the Council of Trent in 1561, in which he assisted Forrerius and Leonardo Marini in preparing the catechism, and incited the making of the missal and breviary. He died at Rome, Dec. 28, 1564. He was frugal, modest, and austere, and devoted much time and money to the poor and to the reclamation of the vicious classes.

Foss, Archibald Campbell, a Methodist Episcopalian minister, son of Rev. Cyrus Foss, was born at Philadelpia, N. Y., March 6, 1890. He spent two years of his youth as a clerk in a dry-goods store in New York city; entered Ameinian Seminary at the age of seventeen; became highly honored for his scholarly and Christian character; received license to preach; entered the Sophomore class of Wesleyan University at the age of nineteen; became professor of theology by teaching during vacations; graduated in 1852, and immediately joined the New York Conference. His appointments were: Lenox, 1852 and 1853; Morrisania, 1854 and 1855; Thirtieth Street, New York city, 1856 and 1857; St. Paul's, 1858 and 1859; the next year with Dr. McClintock, Tarrytown, but labored there one year, and being appointed to the fessorship of Latin and Hebrew in Wesleyan University, he removed thither, and there continued two years; Roughkeepis District, 1862 to June, 1865; Thirtieth Street, New York city, July, 1865, to 1867, and finally to Sing Sing, in 1868, where he labored one year, and then removed to the effective ranks and sailed to England. In 1869 he preached one month in Florence, Italy, and another in Lausanne, Switzerland. Early in 1870 he left his pleasant home for a tour through the principal cities of Italy. He returned to Clarens, Fortunatus, an Italian hagiographer, was born at Verceil in the beginning of the 6th century. He has been confounded sometimes with Fortunatus Venantius. He was a soldier, and acquired by his knowledge the surname of the Phoopher of the Lombards, and was elevated to the episcocopate; it is not known, however, in what, however, he was obliged to leave his church, but for what reason is unknown; retired to France, where he bound himself in friendship with St. Germanus, bishop of Paris; and died at Chelles, near Paris, about 658. Venantius wrote the Life of St. Marcellus. The Life of St. Hilary has also been attributed to him. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Smith, Dict. of Christ. Antig. s. v. (B. P.)

Fortunatus's (Venantius) HYMNS. Fortunatus is the author of the following hymns: Verses Begn Prodeunt (q. v.), translated into English ("The royal banners forward go") by Neale, in Medieval Hymns and Sequences (Lond. 1867), p. 6:—Quem Terra, Pontus, Althara (English translation, "The God whom earth and sea and sky," in Hymns Ancient and Modern):—Purganda (q. v.):—Gloria Patri (the original is found in Trench, Sacred Latin Poetry, p. 130 sq., and an English translation, "The blessed cross shines now to us," in Lyra Messianica, p. 220 sq.):—Salter, Festi Dies, 400th Venerea (q. v.):—Agnus Domini, Sacer, on the nativity of Christ;—Tibi Lucea Petennis Author, on baptism:—The poetry of Venantii Prudentius, says Mr. Yule (Dict. of Christ. Antig. s. v.), represents the expiring effort of the Latin muse in Gaul. Even the poet himself felt the decadence not merely of language, but of thought, which characterizes his verse.

"Ast ego sensu inops..."

Pace gravae, semeone levis, ratione pigrecens,

Menae lease, orte carus, nunc rursi, omnes cercens,

Vit. St. Martin, v. 88-89, and it is difficult to dissent from the severe judgment he has passed upon himself. His style is pedantic, his taste bad, his grammar and prosody seldom correct for many lines together. Two aspects of his poetic powers, however, display a simplicity and pathos which are foreign to his usual style. One of these treats of the marriage of Galesameta, sister of Brunellet, with Chilperic; the other is the elegy upon the fall of Thuringia. For what is of real merit in these two pieces we are in all probability indebted to the genius of the author rather than to any sudden access of inspiration in the poet himself." See Trench, Sacred Latin Poetry: Daniel, Theauras Hyemologicus, i, 109 sq.; Bormann, Uber das Leben des lateinischen Dichters Fortunatus (Fulda, 1849). (B. P.) carried out at the public expense under the special care of the presbyters of the "titles" in Rome. When Christianity became the established religion, the Fossari evidently established a kind of property in the catacombs, which authorized them to sell graves either to living persons for their own burial, or to the friends of the deceased. This state of things seems to have had a widespread but transient existence. A fosser's pick has been discovered by De Rossi in the cemetery of Callistus, much oxidized, but still recognizable. See Marigoggi, Dict. des Eng. Chrétiens, s. v.

Foscarin, Charles de la, an eminent French painter, was born at Paris in 1640, studied under Charles le Brun, and having gained the prize of the academy, he was sent to Italy with the royal pension. On his return to Paris he was immediately taken into the service of Louis XIV., and painted four fine pictures for the apartments of the Tuileries. His next work was a fresco painting in the chapel of St. Eustache, representing Adam and Eve, and the Marriage of the Virgin. In 1693 he was elected a royal academian. That following are some of his best paintings at Versailles: The Sacrifice of Phinehas; The Infant Moses Saved from the Nile; The Resurrection; The Nativity; The Adoration of the Magi. He died at Paris in 1716. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Fosta, in North German mythology, was a goddess worshiped by the Frisians. She stands in close union with Hertha, the goddess of the earth. Both are goddesses of peace, and it is singular that they appear armed. In the temple of Fosta, on Heligoland, she was represented with bow and arrow at her back, a helmet on her head, five arrows in her left hand, and four ears of corn in her right. She was worshipped in Holstein and Denmark.

Foster, Edmur Burroughs, D.D., a Congregational minister, grandson of Rev. Edmur Burroughs, D.D., of Hanover, N. H., was born at Hanover, May 26, 1813. He studied at Kimball Union Academy; graduated from Dartmouth College in 1837, and spent one year at Andover Theological Seminary. From Aug. 18, 1841, to Jan. 7, 1847, he was pastor of the Second Church, Hanover. After supplying the church in Pelham for several months, he was installed pastor of it, June 21, 1848, and remained until January, 1853; thereafter he was pastor of the John Street Church, Lowell, Mass.; in 1861 at West Springfield; and in May, 1863, was reinstated at Lowell, where he died, April 11, 1882. After 1853 he was assisted by a colleague. Among his publications are the following: Sermons on Baptism (1843);—Duty of Young Men (1856). See Cong. Year-book, 1889, p. 22.

Fothad, a Scotch prelate, was deprived in the first year of his administration of the see of St. Andrews (1592), by king James VI. He died in 1611 or 1612. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 6.

Fotherby, Martin, D.D., dean of Canterbury, was born at Great Grimsby in 1559, educated at and became a fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. In 1596 he was prebendary of Canterbury, and in 1618 bishop of Salisbury. He died March 12, 1619, leaving four Sermons (1698);—The Clearing of Four Trifling Anatomical Athetists (1622). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Alibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Fothergill, George, D.D., an English divine, was born at Lockholme, in Haverstone Dale, in 1705, and educated at Oxford, where he became fellow. He was elected principal of Edmund Hall, Oct. 17, 1751, vicar of Bramley soon after, and died Oct. 5, 1760. His works were published in 1756, 1757, 1758, and some Sermons in 1761 and 1762. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Alibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Fouques (Late, Poles), a French prelate, was born about 850, and educated in the church at Rheims, where he was eventually a canon. He afterwards became abbot of St. Beintun, and in March, 883, archbishop of Rheims. He greatly improved the diocese, but at length became so deeply involved in the political con- fusion of the times that he was assassinated in 900. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Fouques (surnamed the Great), a French writer of sacred history, was born in the first part of the 11th century. He was the thirty-first abbot of Corbie; assisted as such at the Council of Rheims in 1014, and at the Council of the General States in 1063, at Corbie. He is noted for his long contest for the privileges of his Church against two bishops of Amiens. He died in 1095. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Fountayne, John, D.D., an English clergyman, was born at Merton, near Dorking, about 1714. He was educated at Catherine Hall, Cambridge, of which he became fellow; and was successively prebendary of Salisbury, canon of Windsor, and dean of York. Twice in his life, if not often, he might have been advanced to the episcopal bench, but declined it. He died Feb. 14, 1802. He was exemplary in the discharge of every relative and social duty; hospitable, benevolent, and a lover of good music. See The (London) Christian Observer, February, 1802, p. 144.

Fouquet (or Fouquet), Louis, a French prelate, who died in 1708, bishop and count of Agde, and master of the royal oratory, became involved in trouble and finally retired from his diocese. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Fourmont, Michel, a famous French Orientalist, was born at Herluy, Sept. 28, 1690, and died at Paris, Feb. 5, 1746. He was professor of the royal college in Paris, and member of the Academy of Inscriptions. Many of his dissertations are found in the Mémoires of the academy. See Lichtenberger, Erycnon, des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.; Frecret, Éloge de l'abbé Fourmont, in Académie des Inscriptions, vol. viii., 482; Jäsch, Allgemeines Geflecht-Lexikon, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Fourmont (baron de la Contamine), Marie Nicolas, a French prelate, was born at Gex ( Ain ), Dec. 27, 1760; educated in Paris; became professor of theology at Orleans; after the Revolution went to Paris as a preacher; was appointed (1805) chaplain, afterwards almoner to the emperor, and bishop of Montpellier, July 15, 1806; was nominated, in 1817, for the archbishopric of Navarre, but was not confirmed, and died at Montpellier, Dec. 29, 1834. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Fowler, Charles James, LL.D., a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach by the Aberdeenshire Presbytery in 1828; elected minister of the church at Roxburghe Place, Morningside, Edinburgh, and ordained Aug. 7, 1834; transferred to St. Luke's, Glasgow, Feb. 24, 1839; stationed at Barlanark, Dec. 24, 1840, and died at Torquay, England, March 16, 1865. He published The Right Improvement of Divine Judgments (a sermon, 1851);—lectures on The Evidence of Received Religion, on Infidelity, and on Sabbath Schools:—A Preface to Watson's A Paley for the Bible. See Fasti Eccl. Scotiae, vol. iv., i. 131, ii. 43.

Fowler, Joseph, an eminent English Wesleyan minister, was born at Little Horton, near Bradford, Yorkshire, May 18, 1791. He was educated at the Bradford Grammar-school, converted under the preaching of John Crosse, vicar of Bradford, and in 1811 admitted into the ministry. In 1818 he was elected secretary of the conference, and it was owing to failure of health that he was not elected president in 1849 or 1850. He died, after acute suffering, in the Chapel-house, City Road, London, March 17, 1851, being the only preacher who has died there since Wesley. Joseph Fowler was a prolific preacher, a judicious superintendent, an unwearying pastor, and a large-hearted friend. He was the leader of the liberal section of the conference. See Stevenson, City Road Chapel, p. 324 sqq.; Welth. Method. Magazine, 1861, p. 406, 518; 1852, p. 242; Minutes of the British Conference, 1851; Welth. Theologian (Lond., 1841), i. 351.

Fowler, Philemon Halsted, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Albany, N. Y., Feb. 9, 1814. He received his preparatory education at the academy in his native place; graduated from Hobart College, Geneva, in 1832, and for one year was tutor in that institution; was licensed by the Albany Presbytery, Oct. 15, 1835; graduated from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1836; served as pastor elect the Second Presbyterian Church of Washington, D. C.; and in 1839 was installed in Elmira, N. Y., where he remained until 1849. In 1851 he became pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Utica, where he labored till 1874. In 1866 he was made a member of the Joint Committee on Union, on the part of the New School General Assembly; in 1869 was elected moderator of the General Assembly; in 1875 was elected moderator of the General Assembly, and was moderator of the words of institution, and therefore a direct imitator of our Lord's action; (2) purely symbolical fractions after the consecration has been completed; (3) the necessary fraction for the distribution of the bread among the communicants. For the illustration of each of these in their various ritual forms, see Smith, Hist. of Christian Antiq., s. v.
FRAHN, CHRISTIAN MARTIN, a famous German Orientalist, numismatist, and historian, was born at Ross tock, June 4, 1784, where he also pursued his Oriental studies. In 1807 he was appointed professor of Oriental languages at Kazan, and in 1815 chief librarian and di-ger of the Asiatic Museum at St. Petersburg, where he died, August 6, 1851. He published a number of other works, Recension Numorum Muhammadorum (St.

Petersburg, 1826), to which must be added his Opa culpa Posthumae (ed. by Dorn, ibid. 1855-77, 2 vols.)—Im Passamen und anderer Araber Berichte über die Rosens älter Zeit (ibid. 1829) —Topographische Gebiete der Aus-spiegelung von alten arabischen Glauben in Rhuddlan

FRANCISCHI, Baldassaro (called di Volterra), an eminent Italian painter, was born at Volterra in 1611, and studied under Matteo Roselli and Gio. de

San Giovanni. Among his great frescos is the cupola of the Cappella Niccolini, in the church of Santa Croce at Florence; and in the vault of a chapel of Santa Maria

Maggiore is a picture of Enea, which is considered a great production. He died in 1651. See Hoefer, Nouv.

FRANCHI, Antonino, a reputable Italian painter, was born at Lucca, July 14, 1654, studied under Baldas-saro Francischi, and settled at Florence. He painted a number of works for the churches, among which his picture of Christ Giving the Keys to St. Peter, in the papal church of Capograsso, at Lucca, is considered his masterpiece. He died July 6, 1729. See Hoefer,

Fine Arts, f. v.

FRANCHI, Giuglielmo, an Italian convert from

Jews, of the 16th century, is the author of, 176-181, also Hebrew grammar in the Italian language

(Bergamo, 1591, and often) —Alphabetum Hebrewum, or a Hebrew reader (Rome, 1596). See Fürst,

Hebr. iii, 237. (B. P.)

FRANCHINI, Giovanni, an eminent Italian ecclesiastical historian, was born at Modena, Dec. 28, 1638.

Having entered the order of the Minorites, he became theological to Francis II, duke of Modena. He died in his native city, April 4, 1685, leaving several works on the history of his order, for which see Hoefer, Nouv.

FRANCA. See FRANCESCO; FRANCE.

FRANCIAC, Erasmus, a Lutheran hymn-writer, was born Nov. 19, 1577, at Lübeck, and died at Nuremberg,

Dec. 29, 1694. Some of his hymns are still to be found in German hymn-books. See Mölleri, Cimbria Lutherana,

Franco, Alfonso, an emigrant painter of Messina, was born in 1653. His best pictures were in Messina, a Taking Down of the Cross, in the Church of San Francesco di Paolo, and the Dispute of Christ with the Doctors, in San Agostino. He died in 1754.

Franco, Battista (called il Semerli), an eminent painter and engraver, was born at Venice in 1498. He went to Rome and studied the works of Michael Angelo. He painted in fresco the choir of the Metropolitical Church at Urbino; and a picture in oil representing the Virgin and Infant, between St. Peter and St. Paul. There are several easel pictures from the life of Christ in the cathedral at Osimo. The following are some of his works: Musaeus Standing the Rock; Abraham Meeting Melchizedek; Abraham about to Sacrifice Isaac; The Israelites Gathering Manna in the Desert; St. Jerome Holding a Skull; The Virgin and Infant with St. John; St. John the Baptist; The Adoration of the Shepherds, with the Child in the Clouds. He died in 1541. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Célebres, s. v.; Spuner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

François, Claude, a French eclesiastic, was born at Paris in 1559, and made his profession at the abbey of the Benedictines of St. Yvannes, March 21, 1569. In 1606 he aided in effecting a radical reformation within his congregation, revised the principal articles, and became a deputy to Monte-Cassino to consult the constitutions of that monastery. In 1610 he was sent to Paris to secure the approval of the new regulations by the eclesiastical superiors and Louis XIII, and frequently served as a president and counsellor of the works of Michael Angelo. He died in Paris, Aug. 10, 1632, leaving several works relating particularly to the affairs of his order, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Célebres, s. v.

Frank, a name common to several Lutheran hymn-writers, of whom we mention the following:

1. Michaele, born March 14, 1609, and died Sept. 24, 1667. His hymns are collected in Geselliges Hymnpflug (Coburg, 1657), and Geistlicher Lieder ersten Zwölf (ibid. 1662). See Koch, Geschichte des deutschen Kirchenliedes, iii, 435 sq.

2. Peter, a brother of Michael, was born Sept. 27, 1610, at Breslau. He was preacher in 1645, and died July 22, 1675. See Koch, ut sup., p. 441 sq.; Ludovici, De Hyminae et Hymnopiae Hemenbergicis, p. 21; Wezel, Hymnographia, l.

3. Sebastian, oldest brother of the three, was born Jan. 18, 1606, and died April 12, 1669. He suffered very much from the miseries of the Thirty Years' War. See Ludovici, De Hyminae, etc.; Winterfeld, Der eczang. Kirchengesang, ii, 468-472 (Berlin, 1845); Koch, ut sup., p. 451 sq. (B. P.)

Franke, Karl Christian Leberecht, a Protestant theologian, was born Nov. 1, 1746, and died May 1, 1783, at Halle, doctor and professor of theology. He wrote, De Dies Dominici Apud Veteres Christianas Celebratione (Halle, 1826)—Geschichte der Hallischen Reformation (ibid. 1841). Besides, he published sermons, for which see Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. 2, 64; Zschokke, Bibl. Theol. 273 sq. (L. P.)

Franke, David (1), a Jewish author of Germany, born at Berlin in 1779, was director of the Jewishes schools at Dessau, and died in 1865. He published, Zeitzeitschri für Beforderung der Kultur und Humanität unter der jiid. Nation (1806-1840)—Genemäntigtes Blättter für Wissensch. Schule und Leben (Dessau, 1829)—Die Lage der Juden in der ältesten und neueren Zeit (ibid. 1890). With M. H. Bock he translated the Pentateuch and Joshua into German (ibid. 1815). See Fürst, Bibliothek. i, 291. (B. P.)

Franke, David (2), ben-Neftali Hiracz, a Jewish rabbi, who was born at Dessau in 1765, and died at Berlin in 1821, is the author of a commentary on several treatises of the Jerusalem Talmud. See Fürst, Biblioth. i, 290 sq. (B. P.)

Franke, Zacharias, a Jewish theologian, was born at Prague, Oct. 18, 1801. He studied in the University of Pesth, and received the degree of doctor of philosophy in 1831. In the spring of 1838 he was intrusted with the district-rabbinate of Leinentz, in Bohemia, and in the temple at Teplitz, his seat of office, the service received a new cast, owing to the German sermon which he was the first to introduce in the Bohemian synagogue. In 1838 he was called to Dresden as chief rabbi for Dresden and Leipzig. At Dresden, Frankel battled for justice at the bar of public opinion, and secured for the Jews the right of citizenship by his Die Einfüllung der Juden in theologischer und historischer Belebung (Dresden, 1840; 2d ed. 1847), followed by Der gerechte Begriff nach mosaisch-talmudischem Rechte (Berlin, 1841), which promoted the cause of his Prussian co-religionists. In 1854 Frankel was called to Breslau to organize the Jewish theological seminary, whose director he became. He died at Breslau, Feb. 15, 1875. In the Christian world he is the author of Vorwort. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Célebres, s. v.; Loeser, Wissensch. Biblioth. der 19ten Century (Philadelphia, 1880), p. 81 sq. (B. P.)

Frankenberg, Abraham von, a German nobleman, an adherent of Jacob Böhme, was born June 24, 1593. He studied at Breslau, where he became acquainted with Böhme's writings. The latter's philosophy influenced him so much that he now betook himself entirely to mystic contemplations, and in order to do this with greater effect, he retired to his country-seat. He died June 25, 1632. For his writings and hymns see Arnold, Ungarische Kirchen- and Ketzer-Historic, ii, 410 sq.; Wezel, Hymnographia, iv; Weismüller, Geschichte der Churfürste Hofreitschaft, 2, 137-150; Jocher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Koch, Geschichte des deutschen Kirchenliedes, iii, 287 sq. (B. P.)

Frankfurter, Naphtali, a Jewish rabbi of Germany, was born Feb. 13, 1810, at Oberndorf, in Württemberg; studied at Heidelberg and Tübingen, was rabbi at Braunsbach, accepted in 1840 a call to Hamburg, and died there in 1866, leaving, amongst other works, Stillstand und Fortschritt (Hamburg, 1841)—Die Verantwortlichkeit des Volkkellers in jetziger Zeit (ibid. 1844). In connection with Berthold Auerbach he published Gallerie der ausgezeichneten Israelis (Stuttgart, 1843; 2d ed. 1845; 3d ed. 1847).—Kunzreither, i, 278 sq.; Allgemeine Zeitung des Judendamns, 1866, col. 268; Fürst, Bibliothek. i, 296 sq. (B. P.) FRANKLAND, Benjamin, A.B., one of the men representing the scholarship of the English Wesleyan Connection, was born at St. Ives, Cornwall, in May, 1819. He was a descendant of Dr. Benjamin Frankland, emi-scent as the great Puritan schoolmaster of his time (see Dr. Isaac Venn, pp. 241, 342). He was the son of Rev. Benjamin Frankland, and brother of Rev. W. J. oseph Frankland. He was educated at the Woodhouse Grove School (1829-33), and the University of Dublin (1837 sq.); and was for ten years tutor at Woodhouse Grove, and six months master at Wesley College, Sheffield, where he was converted when eighteen years of age, entered the ministry in 1845, and throughout his various circuits from Didsbury, in 1845, to Islington, London, in 1863, his ministry was greatly prized, especially by the thoughtfully and cultured, and his personal character was profound and affectionate esteem. In 1864 he succeeded J. Gilchrist Wilson as assistant editor of the Wesleyan Methodist Magazine and other connectional publications, and on the death of the lamented Thornton, in 1865, the entire duties of editorship devolved on him, shared however, in 1868, by the appointment of a colleague, Benjamin Gregory. This editorship he held until his unexpected death after a short illness, Jan. 17, 1876. Besides his scholarly contributions to the Magazine, Frankland wrote, Outlines of Literary Culture (London, 1853, 12mo):—Introspectionism (ibid. 1861) crown bro.).—Biblica et Literaria, but not Israel (Exeter, 1872, 12mo):—The Wesleyan Conference (London, 1852, 8vo). See Western. Meth. Magazine, 1876, p. 192, 742, 844; Minutes of the British Conference, 1876, p. 19.

FRANKLAND, Thomas, an English divine, was born in Lancashire in 1838, and was educated at and became a fellow of Brazenose College, Oxford. He became a preacher, afterwards a physician, and died in 1890. His published works are, The Homos of the Lords Spiritual (1861):—The Annals of King James I and King Charles I (ed.). See Chalmers, Bib. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

FRANZONI, Luigi, an Italian prelate, was born at Genoa, March 29, 1769; studied under the direction of Zanobi Benucci; was ordained priest in 1814; became first an urban missionary, bishop of Turin in 1831, and died March 26, 1862. He was an ardent champion of Ultramontanism, for which he was imprisoned in 1840, and took refuge in Lyons. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s. v.

FRASER, Edward, a talented colored Wesleyan preacher, was born a slave in the island of Barbadoes. He was in youth so appreciated by his master that he was given a good education and made his confidential clerk. Converted in Bermuda, becoming a local preacher and called into the ministry in 1827, he was given his liberty at the request of the British Wesleyan Conference, and labored in several of the West Indian islands. As a preacher, he was thoughtful, calm, dignified, clear in exposition and powerful in application. He moved with dignity and grace among the people of his charge, training the young, comforting the sick, and relieving the poor. On perplexing questions his well-balanced mind and clear, logical views made him powerful among his brethren. He was for eighteen years district secretary. For the cause of missions and education he twice visited England, where the memory of his noble pulpit and platform deliveries are still remembered. At the annual missionary meeting in Ex- ther Hall, London, in his visit of 1837-38, he delivered a powerful address. He died at Grateful Hill, Jamaica, in 1872, aged seventy-four years. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1872, p. 41; Smith, Hist. of West. Methodist, iii, 366, 367; Everett, Wesleyan Centenary Tolzley, ii, 14.

FRASER, James, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, graduated from the university and Marischal College, Aberdeen, in 1771; was licensed to preach Feb. 8, 1779; pre-

FRASER, Paul, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, a native of Inverness, graduated from the university and King's College, Aberdeen, April 30, 1756; was ordained by the Presbytery of Lorn, Sept. 2, 1761, as missionary at Glencoe, from which he was removed to that of Fort William; was admitted minister of the parish of Craig-nich in 1765; transferred to the second charge of Glencoe, May 28, 1769, admitted June 17, and died “Father of the Church,” Oct. 2, 1827, aged ninety-five years. For a time he held the chairmanship of the 98th Foot regiment, and the 5th regiment of Fencibles. He published An Account of the Parish of Inverary. See Fusi Ecles. Scotocime, iii, 4-6.

FRATRECHIEL. See FRATRECHIELL.

FRATZSCHER, Heinrich Wolfgang, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, born at Erfurt, Nov. 12, 1694, studied at Halle, was in 1720 magister at Erfurt, in 1738 professor, accepted in 1744 a call as general-superintendent of the duchy of Coburg, and died July 14, 1787. He wrote: De Jesu Christi u. u. (Erfurt, 1712):—De Necessitate et Utilitate Lectionis Script, Sacram in Fontibus (Erfurt, 1738). See Joccher, Alte-

FRASWIAH, certain feithistic spirits worshipped by the early inhabitants of Media.

FRAVITTA (Phravittas. Flavita, or Flavianus), twenty-third bishop of Constantinople, A.D. 489, is said to have acquired his position by a remarkable fraud, having been originally a presbyter of the Church of St. Theoia, in the suburbs of that city. He died within four months, and the trick was exposed.

FRASER, John (1), a Scotch prelate, was abbot of Melrose, and promoted to the see of Ross in 1485. He was witness to an agreement between the community of Lindithgow and the priory of St. Andrews in 1497, and was one of the king's privy council in 1506. He died Feb. 5, 1507. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 189.

FRASER, John (2), D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Ireland in 1808. He was a descendant of the celebrated Scotch Fraser family, which gave so many distinguished officers to the British army. At the age of nineteen he went to the United States and entered the woods of Maine as a lumberman. In 1831 he joined the New York Conference, and began his itinerant career on the shores of lake Champlain. For twenty-five years he continued to preach in that region, then embraced in the Troy Conference. His appointments were Middlebury, Poultney, and Grand Isle in Vermont; Albany, Troy, Schenectady, Lansingburg, and two terms as presiding elder in New York. In 1856 failing health induced him to remove to Ohio, where he joined the Ohio Conference, and was stationed as presiding elder three years each in Columbus and Zanesville. In 1866 he was transferred to the Southern Illinois Conference, and stationed first at Alton, then at Brighton, and last at Lebanon, where he died, Feb. 17, 1871. Dr. Fraser was a man of the purest character, a scourer of all hypocrisy and double-dealing; thoroughly read in theology, was powerfully fluent, and an eminently successful revivalist. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1871, p. 281.

Fraser, William, a Scotch prelate, was promoted to the see of St. Andrews in 1279, and was consecrated at Rome by pope Nicholas III, June 14, 1290. About the same time he was lord chancellor and witness to king Alexander III. In 1298 he was chosen to be one of the regents of the kingdom, and after the death of queen Margaret he yielded a forced submission to Edward I of England. He died at Arbroath, Sept. 18, 1297, in the Scotch Bishops' War.

Freda was a god of war among the Frisians, who was worshipped with another similar figure, Weda, which caused the Romans to make a comparison with Castor and Pollux. They appear armed, with wings projecting from their shoulders.

Frédégaire (Lat. Frédégaris), a French ecclesiastic in the middle of the 7th century, has left a series of chronological, and of Burgundy in particular, from Gregory of Tours to his own time (published as a sequel to the works of the former, Basle, 1568, 8vo, and later).

Freder, Johannes (1), a Lutheran theologian and hymn-writer of Germany, was born Aug. 29, 1510, at Camburg, Brandenburg. He studied at Wittenberg, was in 1537 called to Hamburg, in 1547 to Stralsund, in 1549 to Greifswald, and in 1556 to Wismar, where he died, Jan. 25, 1562. See Jöcher, Allgemeine Gehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Koch, Geschichte des deutschen Kirchenlebens, i, 421 sq; Mohnicke, Johannes Frederics Leben und gesamthe Gedichte (Stralsund, 1840); Zachold, Bibl. Theol., iii, 377. (B. V.)

Freder, Johannes (2), son of the preceeding, was born at Hamburg, Jan. 6, 1544. He studied at Wittenberg and Rostock, was professor of theology at the latter place, and died in 1594. He edited Dav. Chryspini Sermones, etc. (Stralsund, 1586); als auch Articulorum Symboli Apostolici de Filio Dei: Liber de Spir. sanct. Dicipulorum. He wrote, Theses de predico- natione Hominum in Christo ad Vitam et Salvationem. See Jöcher, Allgemeine Gehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Molleri, Gesch. der Literatur, s. v.

Frederick III of Saxony (usually styled the Wise), was born at Torgau, Jan. 17, 1463, and succeeded his father Ernest as elector in 1486. He is chiefly known as the founder of the University of Wittenberg, and the friend of Luther, whom he carried off for safety to the Warburg; but he had not the courage to establish the reformed faith in his dominions. He became administrator of the empire in 1519, and declined the imperial crown. He died May 5, 1525. See the literature by Klöppel, in Plitt-Herzog's Real-Encyclop. s. v. See LUTHER.

Frederick III of the Palatinate (called the Pious), was born Feb. 14, 1503, is the son of John, born 1565, a son of Simmern, and Otto Henry as elector-palatinate in 1559. In 1537 he married a Lutheran princess, and adopted the Reformed faith, which he introduced into his dominions, despite an effort in 1566 to secure an imperial edict against him. He died Oct. 26, 1576. See the literature in Plitt-Herzog's Real-Encyclop. s. v. See REFORMATION.

Fredet, Pierre, D.D., a Roman Catholic priest, was born at Schasat, France, about 1801; educated at Clermont; became a member of the Society of St. Sulpice, and came to Baltimore in 1831, where, till his death, he labored in the work of the missions, and was attached to St. Mary's Church. He is said to have been a diligent and thorough student, and a voluminous writer. See Hough, Amer. Biog. Notes, p. 149. (J. C. S.)

Frédol, BERNHEM DE (called the Elder), a French prelate, was born at the château de la Vienne about 1250; became successively canon at Béziers, Narbonne, and Paris; and archbishop of Armagh in 1305. He was employed by the pope in several literary and diplomatic functions, and died at Avignon, June 13, 1283, leaving a few works on canon law, for which see Hoefer, Novis. Biog. Generale, s. v.

Freeman, Bernardus, a Reformed (Dutch) minister, was born in Westphalia, and licensed there; came to America in 1700; was refused by the Church at Albany for want of education; became a missionary to the Mohawks (1726-30); was placed at various places on the island of Long island, and died in 1743. He was a man of great natural ability, and the author of several works in the Mohawk language, for which see Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America, 3d ed. p. 263.

Freeman, George W., D.D., missionary bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the south-west, was born at Sandwich, Mass.; taught a large boarding-school in Warrenton, N. C.; was ordained rector of Christ Church, Raleigh, where he remained for many years; then of Emmanuel Church, New Castle, Del.; consecrated bishop Oct. 28, 1844, in Philadelphia, Pa., and died at Little Rock, Ark., April 22, 1858, aged sixty-nine years. See Amer. Quart. Church Rev. 1856, p. 340.

Free-thinking Christians, a sect which arose in London in 1796, professing to be a Christian Church founded on the principles of free inquiry. They were originally a body of Universalists, who separated from their congregations by rejecting the doctrine of the trinity, the atonement, and many other doctrines held by orthodox Christians generally. Their next step was to dispense with the sacraments, and deny the immateriality of the soul. Finally, they rejected the Bible, and held the meetings of the sect to be still holding their meetings on the Sabbath as a matter of convenience. They assembled for purposes of discussion and debate on religious and social questions.

Fregoso, FEDERICO, an Italian prelate, was born at Genoa about 1400; early took religious orders; became bishop of Gubbio in 1507; died on account of political troubles to Rome, but returned to Genoa in 1518; was of great service in the civil war ensuing; male cardinal in 1519, and died at Gubbio, July 18, 1541.

Freia, in Norse mythology, was the most excellent among the Aesir next to Frigg, the wife of Odin, being daughter of the dark Niord and the lovely Skadie. Freia was the goddess of the moon, in the ancient Scandinavian religion of nature. Later she was the goddess of love. She favors suitors, and finds great pleasure in songs, which she teaches to the skald. She loves and desires all the dark Niord and the shady Skadie. In order to secure greater swiftness she makes use of a pair of falcon wings, which she allows other deities to use. The glittering necklace which the dwarfs presented to her is called Brising. Freia was married to Odin, and had two daughters by him: Hnoss (beautifi- ful) and Ægishjalmr (active). Some time after, Odur made a journey, and as he did not return, Freia sought him, travelling through many countries, and assuming different names: Mardol, Horn, Geton, Syr, Vandyas; but it was all useless. She therefore shed bitter tears, which were changed into gold. Her journey made her known in all lands, and she was worshipped under various names. In North Germany, Denmark, Friesland, and Saxony, she retained the name Freia. She was represented with helmet, armor, bow, and sword, above in male, below in female dress. Odin receives valiant warriors into Valhalla; Freia receives all virtuous and brave men to her heavenly court. She is fair and charming. She herself loves mostly to stay in her hall, Sessrumun, and has melancholy thoughts about her departed husband, Odur. The Sweet’s dedicata a a number of temples to her, among which that at Upsala was the most celebrated. Her name is connected with the German verb “freien,” to soo, and the sixth day of the week, Friday, is named after her.

Freid, Rosker, D.D., an English clergyman, was born in 1667; educated principally at Westminster; elected to Christ Church, Oxford, in 1686; engaged in the famous controversy about the epistles of Phalaris, and died in 1751, leaving some Latin and English poetry; for which he published a Collected Poems; published a Sermon, preached before the House of Commons (1711), and Cerco’s Orations (1724). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Auth., s. v.

Freir (or Frey), in Norse mythology, was the son of Njord; the latter became one of the Asas, after showing his power to perform wonders. Freir’s mother was Skade. His sister Freia represents the moon, and correspondingly he represents the sun. Freir is called the most excellent of the Asas. He rules over the rain and sunshine, and must be invoked for fruitful years and for peace. He presides over wealthy people, gives to mardna their lovers, and restores to women their husbands, when taken in battle. Freir once seated himself on the throne of Hisabi, from which he could look over the whole world. This throne was designed only for Odin, and Freir was immediately punished for the liberty he took by becoming enamoured of a Jote maiden, namely, the beautiful Gerdur, daughter of the mountain-giant, Gymn, and of Aurboda. When he came home, he either ate nor drank, nor said anything. A consuming melancholy fell upon him, and no one dared to talk with him. Even his father Njord asked after him, and at last, to find out what was the trouble. Freir said he loved the beautiful Jote maiden, and could not live without her any longer. Skimmer then went out to woo Gerdur for him, after he had asked Freir for his trusty sword, which had been made by dwarfs, and possessed the singular faculty of killing of itself the one who once drew him. Freir gave it to him, and thus, when he was attacked by the powerful Beli, he was forced to stay him with the horns of a reindeer. Skimmer brought back the favorable answer that after nine nights Gerdur would appear to him. Then Freir said, “I cannot wait so long, for a single night is longer than a whole month.” Gerdur is the northern light personified. Freir lives with her in Alhheim. As god of the sun, he also possesses the gold-colored boar, Gullinbursti. Besides this he owns the horse Bludhogdr. He also has a skilful air-vessel, called Skibladneri, made by dwarfs, the sons of Yvold. Oaths are given in Freir’s name, in which case usually a boar is sacrificed to him, and a ring dipped in its blood, which is held by the sw eerer, who says: “So help me, Freir, Njord, and the mighty Asas!”

Freitag, Augustin M., a Redemptorist preacher, was born in Hanover, of Lutheran parentage, in 1686. At the age of 21 he joined the American College Church, and commenced his preparatory studies for the priestly office at Gottingen. After coming to America, he completed his studies at Columbia, Md., and joined the Redemptorists. He was ordained priest in 1808, and assigned to duty in New York City. After serving there for some years he was transferred to Boston, Mass. In 1802 he returned to New York city, became assistant-rector of St. Alphonso’s, and died there July 26 of the same year. Frémont, Martin, an eminent French painter, was born at Paris in 1657. He produced a fine picture of St. Sebastian, at Paris, when very young; afterwards visited Rome and studied the works of Michael Angelo; spent fifteen years in Italy, then returned to Paris in the reign of Henry IV, who appointed him his painter, and employed him in the chapel at Fontainebleau, the ceiling of which subjects represent the Old and New Testaments, among them Noach and his Family Entering the Ark, and The Annunciation. He died at Paris, June 16, 1619. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Frémont, Charles, a French monk, was born at Tours in 710; entered the order of Grammont at the age of eighteen, and conceived the idea of bringing back the monks to the rigor of their primitive rule. Despite his superiors, through the protection of cardinal Richelieu, he succeeded in establishing the ancient discipline, not only in the house of Thierr, in Anjou, which he had founded for his order in 1610, but also in six or seven other houses, which had become nearly ruined. He died in 1689, leaving La Vie, la Mort et les Miracles de Saint-Etienne, Confesseur, Fondateur de l’Ordre de Grammont (Dijon, 1647). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

French-Basque Version. See Basque French Version. The British and Foreign Bible Society, since its inception of Bible work in France and the French-speaking countries, circulated the translations of Martin, Osterwald, and De Scay; the latter for the use of Roman Catholics. In 1869 the same society published a revised edition of Osterwald’s New Test. The object of this edition was to bring it as far as possible into conformity with the original editions, and to do away with the needless alterations which have been introduced by various printers or editors. On the same basis the Old Test. was published in 1871. In 1875 the Rev. Arnold Bovet addressed a communication to the agent of the British and Foreign Bible Society in Germany, the subject of which was the present condition and character of the French Protestant versions. In how far Mr. Bovet’s suggestions were carried out we do not know, but in the report for the year 1877 we read that a committee have laboured throughout the year in remedying certain minor defects in several of the French editions, in order to make them more perfect and more uniform. Several new versions of the Scriptures in French have been urged on the committee, but they did not see their way to the adoption of any of them; they hope, however, that the present activity in Bible translating and revision may lead to the production of a version more accurate and more acceptable to the French people than any which they now possess.” From the annual report published in 1884 it appears that the Société Biblique de France had undertaken a revision of Osterwald, and that this revised recension has also been adopted by the British and Foreign Bible Society. The report reads thus: “The committee have resolved to adopt the recently revised version of Osterwald. The revision of the New Test. was completed by Mons. Frossard in 1869. A conference of pastors at Paris appointed a commission to examine the version, and they expressed the wish in the following year that the Société Biblique de France should publish it. In 1886 a committee, consisting of M. Bouchot, M. Kruger, W. Monod, and M. Byse, began the revision of the Old Test. In 1877 the number of revisors was raised from four to thirteen, namely, professors Bois, Bruston, Chapuis, and Corentin, and pastors Le Sauvageau, Kruger, Monod, Laufer, Bormand, Byse, Favez, Frossard, and Monnier. All the books of the Old Test. were revised.

at least twice, the greater part three times, and some (Paulinas, Daniel, Hœsa, Joël, Amos, etc.) four times. The direction of the work was intrusted to priest Frank Vermeil, with whom were associated M.M. Matter and Fredenfeld, in the publication commenced. Since then 17,000 of the 8vo and 16mo Bibles have been sold, and 150,000 copies of the revised New Test., since its publication. The basis of the revision of the New Test. was the Textus Receptus. The committee of the British and Foreign Bible Society, in taking up this latest revision in 1857, said its object, "has been the hearty approval of the Société Biblique de France."

The British and Foreign Bible Society has also undertaken since 1879 the printing of De Sacy’s Bible, collated with the folio of 1759, and with alternative readings from the originals for all passages liable to misconstruction.

Outside of the Bible societies, there were published La Sainte Bible, Texte de la Vulgate, Traduction Françoise en Regard, avec Commentaires Thél., Moraux, Phil., Hist., etc., Religions d’Apres les Meilleurs Francais Anciens et Contemporains, (Paris, 1862-82, 16 vols.). In this Bible work, the commentaries of German, French, English, and American scholars have been made use of. Thus, Alexander’s Commentary on Isaiah, Lyman Abbott’s Notes, and even Smith’s Dict. of the Bible, have been used. Even in this work, however, of Roman Catholics, we must mention the Protestant Bible work by Reuss, La Bible, Traduction Nouvelle avec Introductions et Commentaires, (Paris, 1874-81, 16 parts.). The different parts have the following titles, besides the Preface and Introduction Générale and Table Générale des Matières: I. Histoire des Involution depuis la Conquête de la Palestine jusqu’à l’Ézékiel (Livres des Juges, de Samuel et des Rois); II. Les Prophéties; 3 vols.; III. L’Histoire Sainte et la Loi (Pentateuque et Josué), 2 vols.; IV. Chronologie Ecclésiastique de l’Ancien (Chron. Écclésiastique), 2 vols.; V. Politique Lyrique (Le Patriarches, les Consuls, les Conquêtes, le Conte des Conquêtes); VI. Philosophie Religieuse et Morale des Hébreux (Josh, les Prophètes, l’Écclésiastique, l’Ecclésiaste, la Suprématie, Conques Moraux (Joshua, Tobias, Susanne, Proverbes du Roi David), Baruch, Maccabées); VII. Littérature, Politique, et Politique (Ruth, Maccabées, Daniel, Esther, Judith, le 3me Livre des Maccabées, l’Histoire du Bel et du Serpent, l’Épitre de Jérémie); VIII. Histoire Ecclésiale, (Synope des Témoins Premiers Ecclésiastiques); IX. La Théologie Johannique; (Évangile Épître de Jésus-Christ); X. L’Histoire Posthume (Actes des Apôtres), 2 vols.; XI. Les Épîtres Pauliniennes, 2 vols.; XII. Les Épîtres Catholiques; XIII. L’Apocalypse.

Last, but not least, we mention the new translation of the Old Test. from the Hebrew text by the Rev. Dr. Louis Segond, published at Geneva in 1874 (2d ed. Nancy, 1877; 3d ed. Geneva, 1879), and the new translation of the New Test. from the Greek, published in 1879. His work has been accepted by the University Press, Oxford, England. This version is regarded as a decided improvement upon all others, and as worthy of national official sanction. French, John W. D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the diocese of Maryland, graduated from the General Theological Seminary of New York, was for some years rector of St. Mark’s Church, in Washington, D.C.; in 1857 was chaplain at the Military Academy, West Point, N.Y.; in 1866 was appointed professor of moral philosophy in the same institution, and continued there until his death, July 7, 1871. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1872, p. 137.

French, William, D.D., an English clergyman, was born in 1786, and educated at Caius College, Cambridge. In 1809 he was master at Jesus College, and canon of Ely in 1832. He died in 1849, leaving New Translations of the Proverbs of Solomon (1811); New Translations of the Book of Psalms (1842). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Frendorff, Solomon, a Jewish writer, and professor at the students’ teachers’ seminary in Hanover, who died in 1880, is the author of Frenz, Fassade der Punctuativa und Accentuierung der hebräischen Sprache (Hanover, 1847)—Die Massora Magna nach den ältesten Drucken (ibid, 1879, which on the first part, Die Massora in alphabetischer Ordnung, was published). He also edited the massoretic work, הדרקון, (ibid, 1864), a description of which is given under Otsok ve-Otsok in this Cyclopedia. (B. F.)

Frenzel, a name common to several German authors, of whom we mention:

1. Abraham, was born in November, 1650, at Koel, studied at Wittenberg, and died April 15, 1740, at Schimnau, near Bernstadt. He wrote, De Originaline, Libri sive, libri de (Bautzen, 1693-96)—De Duas Scripturas et Scripturarum de Scriptorum (published in Hoffmann’s Scriptores Rerum Lauriscorum, 2 vols.); De Inscriptionibus Propriae Sacrorum (published also in Hoffmann’s work). Besides, he left in manuscript a Dictionary of the Wendish Language, works on the manners of the people of Upper Lusatia (extracts from which were published by Frenzel, in Corpus Maxi Sacrorum, Bautzen, 1808-82). See Jocher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

2. Michael, born Feb. 2, 1628, studied at Leipzig, was pastor at Koel, and died June 29, 1706. He translated the New Test. into the Wendish language, also the Psalms, and Luther’s catechism. See Jocher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

3. Michael, Jr., brother of Abraham, was born Feb. 14, 1667, studied at Wittenberg, and died as deacon at Hoyerswerda, Feb. 11, 1722. He wrote Diaristio de Imaginalia et Antiquorum (Wittenberg, 1691).

4. Solomon Gottthold, son of Michael, Jr., who was born in 1701, and died deacon at Hoyerswerda, March 22, 1768, is the author of a Wendish Catechism (Lobau, 1788). See Jocher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Fresco, or wall-painting in water-colors, was very common in the early ages of the Christian era, and was gradually introduced into sacred places, especially churches and the catacombs, portions of it still remaining. The subjects are usually Scriptural, though sometimes painted. See illustration on p. 417.) See also under Wall-painting, s. v. See Painting.

Fremond, Charles Alphonse du, a very eminent French painter, was born in Paris in 1611, and studied in the school of François Perrier, after which he visited Italy. In 1656 he returned to his native city, where he painted, among other works, a fine picture of St. Margaret, for the church of that name. He died in Paris in 1665. He was occupied during a long period of his life in preparing for publication his admirable poem on art, De Arte Graphica, which was issued after his death. See Spoerer, Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Dict. Générale, s. v.

Freudentheil, Wilhelm Nicolai, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Stade, in Hanover, June 8, 1851. He studied at Göttingen; was in 1792 professor of literature and history at Zelle; in 1796 subrector; in 1805 con-rector; in 1809 rector at Stade; in 1816 was called as deacon to Hanover; in 1829 was pastor of the Holy Ghost, and was honored in 1841 by his alma mater with the theological doctorate. He died March 7, 1855. Besides his Commentaria in Codice sacro more, etc. (Göttingen, 1791), he contributed some fine specimens to German hymnology. See Winer, Handbuch der Theol. Lit., I, 108; Schröder, Lexicon der Hamburger Schriftsteller; Gieckeken,

Frey, Franz Andreas, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born July 20, 1763, at Bamberg, where he also studied, and took holy orders in 1795. In 1798 he commenced his lectures on canon law at the university of his native place, and died there, June 24, 1830. He published, Disput. Theor. de Hebr. nom de Principia Theologiae (Bamberg, 1787) — Kritischer Commentar über das Kirchenrecht für Katholiken und Protestantten (ibid. 1812–20, 3 vols.). See Darmst, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, i, 433 sq.; Winer, Handbuch der theolog. Lit., ii, 9; Zachtdl, Bibl. Theol. i, 380. (B. P.)

Frey, Jean Jacques, an eminent Swiss engraver, was born at Lucerne in 1681, and after acquiring the elements of his art in his own country, went to Rome, where he studied for some time under Arnold van Westenbour. The following are some of his many plates: The Holy Family; St. Jerome; St. Joseph Presenting Cherries to the Infant Christ; St. Andree Kneeling before the Cross; St. Bernard; The Adoration of the Shepherds; The Archangel Michael. He died at Rome in 1732. See Hoefer, Nouv. Hist. Generale, a. v.; Spooner, Hist. of the Fine Arts, a. v.

Freyenmoet (or Frymuth), John Caspar, a Reformed (Dutch) minister, was born in Switzerland in 1733, came to America in his youth, and lived at what is now Port Jervis, N. Y., then the centre of the Dutch churches situated on the Delaware river—Minisink, Walpack, Smithfield, and Matamuckmack—which sent him to Holland to be educated for the ministry and ordained as their pastor. He returned in 1741, and ministered to them until 1756. His great popularity as a preacher, and his deep piety and zeal, caused an active strife for his services between the churches referred to and those in Ulster County. He removed to Columbia County in 1756, and continued until his death, in 1778, the acceptable and useful minister of the churches of Kinderhook, Claverack, Livingston Manor, Red Hook, and Schodack. He favored the ordination of ministers in this country, and was a conservative in the early Coetus party, but indignantly withdrew when they proposed to organize a classis. His social qualities were of a high order, and his prudence and skill in settling delicate ecclesiastical cases brought him into frequent request upon official commissions. See Sluysen, Hist. Discourse at Port Jervis; Zachtdl, Centennial Discourse at Claverock; Corwin, Memoir of the Reformed Church in America, a. v. (W. J. R. T.)

Freytag, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich, a German theologian and scholar, was born at Lüneburg, Sept. 19, 1788, and educated in philology and theology at the University of Göttingen. From 1811 to 1813 he acted as theological tutor there, then went to Königsberg as sub-librarian; in 1815 became a chaplain in the Prussian army, in which capacity he visited Paris; afterwards resigned his chaplaincy, and remained in Paris to prosecute his Oriental studies under De Saéy. In 1819 he was appointed professor of Oriental languages at Bonn, and continued in that position until his death, Nov. 16, 1861. Besides publishing a compendium of Hebrew grammar (Kurzegefasste Grammatik der hebräischen Sprache, 1835), and a treatise on Arabic versification (Darstellung der Arabischen Verskunst, 1839), Freytag edited two volumes of Arabic songs (Haussere Carmani, 1838–39), and three of Arabic proverbs (Arabum Proverbia, 1838–43). His principal work, however, was his Lexicon Arabicum-Latinum (1830–37), which rapidly superseded the earlier lexicons. See Encyclop. Brit. 9th ed. a. v.

Frisco, in Norse mythology, was the third god with Odin and Thor, who were worshipped in the great temple at Upsala (then the capital of Sweden). According to the latest researches he is one with Freyr.

Friday, the Mohammedan weekly Sabbath, commencing at the preceding sunset. The Mohammedans regard it as the chief of all days. The public services, which occupy only a portion of the day, the rest being devoted to business and recreation, commence at noon, and besides the usual prayers there are additional ceremonies performed, including the reading and reciting of parts of the Koran from the reading-desk, and the delivery of sermons from the pulpit by the Imam.

FRIDERICI, Jeremiah, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Leipzig in 1596, studied in the same city and became master of arts, catechist, and preacher, and died there, Sept. 6, 1766. He wrote, Die Heilige Prophezei (Leipsic, 1715); De Danubio (ibid. 1713); De Zecherlin (ibid. 1718); De klooster (ibid. 1713); De Deo, Patriarches Jacob (ibid. 1729); Sixtini Auguste Parmena (ibid. 1730). Friell, Council of (Concilium Forisjudicale), was held A.D. 736 (not 791), as Pagi shows, under Paulinus, patriarch of Aquileia, who letter to Charlemagne, formerly misconception with the synod of Altino, A.D. 787; amasses three causes for its meeting: (1) the order of faith; (2) ecclesiastical discipline; and (3) recent outrages, probably by the Huns. The first of these is explained in his speech, which is an elaborate apology for the reception into the Western creed of the Arian "and the Son," which Charlemagne had attacked, and the pope vindicated, the second Nicene Council for not having in their; Paulinus himself endeavoring to prove both right. The resemblance between parts of this speech and the Athenian creed has been remarked, and is very strong. Besides it is observable that all priests are requested to commit to memory the entire exposition of the Church of the Pope's Prayer is prescribed. Of the canons, the first threatens simony; the 2d drunkenness; the 4th and 5th deprave secular emoluments and amusement for the clergy. By the 10th, a divorced person is forbidden to marry again till the former partner dies; and by the 13th all are prohibited from working on Sun-

Froh, in Norse mythology, is a deity of the second grade, worshiped by the Goths and Danes as the ruler of the winds. He received bloody, often human, sacri-cesses, which he himself instituted. According to other accounts, black animals were sacrificed to him by the Danish king, Hading, which later were replaced by human sacrifices; they are called Froebott. Others make Froeh the son of La Mothe and the daughter of the Revolutionary War, and was compelled to flee from his congeregations when the British occupied Long Island. From 1776 to 1780 he supplied the churches of Frommann, Andreas, a German philosopher, was born at Coburg, Aug. 11, 1591, and died March 28, 1666. He wrote, Dissertationes de stabilita Athelzian, ad Pas. xiv, De Meta Pouliv et. Cc. xiv, Oct. 1, 1774; De Pustoriophobiae Explicatio et Implicito, Formulis et In-

Frommann, Georg Carl, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born April 9, 1809, at Lautern, near Coburg. He studied theology at Jena, Bonn, and Berlin, with Bleek, Nitzsch, Schleiermacher, and Neander for his teachers. He commenced his theological lectures at Jena, and his Dissertation der johannesischen Lehr- beweis, published in 1833 in the Studien und Kritiken, proved later a very useful text. In 1837 he was appointed professor of theology, and in 1839 published his Dissertation in an extended form, in consideration of which the Rostock University honoured him with the doctorate of theology. In the same year he was called as pastor to St. Peter's, in St. Petersburg, where he stayed for twenty-five years, accompanied with great blessing. In 1865 he resigned his position, and made Berlin his residence, where he lectured as honorary professor. In 1868 he was recalled to St. Petersburg as general superintendent, but in 1876 was paralysed, and returned as an invalid to Jena, never to resume again his work. He died Dec. 5, 1879. He also wrote, De Disciplina Aequasi, que in Vitræ Eccles. Christianæ Obrinusæ Fervent (Jena, 1833). See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol., i, 390. (B. P.)

Fronteau, Jean, a French archaeologist and controversialist, was born at Angers in 1614. After completing his studies in his native city, he took the habit of a regular canon in the abbey of Toussaint, at Angers. He was called to Paris in 1634, and engaged to teach philosophy, and then theology, at the abbey of St. Genevieve, and was made chancellor of the University of Paris. Being suspected, however, of Jansenism, he was exiled to the diocese of Angers in 1661, but soon called back to Paris, where he remained until his death, April 17, 1662. He wrote, Summa Toton Philosophiae (Paris, 1640); — Thomæ à Kempis Viducatus (ibid. 1650); — Discours sur l'Épître aux Hébreux (ibid. 1650); — Orphéon au Temple (1640). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Frosch, Johann, the reformer of Augsburg, originally belonged to the Carmelites. In 1516 he was made licentiate of theology at Wittenberg, under the presidency of Luther, and in 1517 prior of the Carmelite monastery at Augsburg. When Luther openly broke with the Church of Rome, Frosch, too, began to preach the pure gospel at Augsburg, and in 1522 he was appointed by the city council as evangelical preacher. In 1527 he held a dispute with the Anabaptists at Augsburg, and in 1531 was dismissed by the council because he leaned towards Zwinglianism. Frosch went to Nuremberg, and died there in 1533. See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Kreß, Gesch. der deutschen Kirchengesch., i, 405; ii, 475. (B. P.)

Froossard, Benoît Daniel, a Flemish Lutheran theologian, youngest son of Benjamin Sigismund (q. v.), was born June 26, 1802, at Paris. At the age of fifteen he was sent to England, where he came into direct relationship with some distinguished members of the Friends, who made a lasting impression on him. Having returned to France, he studied theology at Montauban, and presented as his thesis for the degree of bachelor of divinity, Accord entre le Réal de Motte sur l'École du Genre Humaniste et les Phénomènes Écologiques. In 1825 he was called to Nimes, and in 1827 appointed director of the seminary which was to be established beside the theological university at Montau- ban. In 1848 he resigned his position, and made his home at Bagudres-de-Bigorre, at the foot of the Pyre- nees, where he died, Jan. 25, 1881. He was a great zeal for the Protestants scattered about the Pyrenees was so effective and so laborious that he was styled "the apostle of the Pyrenees." He wrote, L'Ami de la: — Les Archites Écologiques: — Le Livre Réelle: — Le Livre des Poïtes: — Le Cathéchisme Hébreu. See Lichter- berg, Inventaire des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.; Zuchold, Bibl. Theol., i, 391. (B. P.)

Frosthio, a French prelate, was born in the second part of the 8th century. He was educated at the monas- tery of Gorze, became abbot of St. Evre, at Touf, and bishop of that city in 818. During the revolt of Ber- nard, he proved himself faithful to the cause of Louis the Doyen, and took an important part in the con- ciliar councils which judged the rebel bishops. He left twenty-one letters, which were published by André Duchesne, in his Historia Francorum Scriptores, ii. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Fryxell, Anders, a Swedish historian, was born Feb. 7, 1735, at Hasselbo, in Dalaband. In 1822 he was teacher, in 1828 rector of the Marien school at Stockholm, in 1833 professor, and in 1836 pastor at Sunne, one of the largest parishes of Sweden. In 1840 he was received into the Stockholm Academy, and in 1845 made doctor of theology. He died March 21, 1881. He is known as the author of Berichte aus der Söder- lancischen Geschichte, of which more than forty volumes have been published since 1823. (B. P.)

Fuchs, Adolph Friedrich, a Lutheran theologian, was born Dec. 27, 1738, at Nurem- kirchen, in Mecklenburg-Strelitz. He studied at Göt- tingen, was in 1778 rector at the gymnasium in Prenzlau, in 1781 rector of the cathedral-school at Ratzeburg, and in 1810 superintendent of the Göttingen diocese. He died April 12, 1828, leaving Der Brief zu den Propheten oder Projekt der Gat- Ratione ad Reliques de Libri Hagiographyorum (Ros- tock, 1797). See Döring, Die gekirchensch. Theologen Deutschland, i, 466 sq. (B. P.)

Fuchs, Johann, a Protestant theologian, was born at Antwerp, Nov. 26, 1568, became pastor at Illiers in 1590, and died at Helmsbruck, Nov. 26, 1622, professor and doctor of theology. He edited, *Poeckens Robert Testimonis SS. Petronio de Genaro Exeuntiothia Illustrata Usque: Epistola Libri II de Spiritu S. (?)

Fuga, Ferdinando, an eminent Italian architect, was born at Florence in 1569, and studied under Gian Battista Fugini. In 1725 he was sent to Naples by cardinal Giudiere, to erect a chapel in his palace. He also built the份额, etc. He died at Florence, Feb. 7, 1792. See Bihg. Universelle. a. v.; Spooner, Bihg. Hist. of the Fine Arts. a. v.

Führich, Joseph von, a Bohemian painter, was born at Krasceau in 1800. His admiration for the pictures in the wayside chapels of his native country led him to attempt a sketch of the Nativity for the Christmas festival in his father's house. He became the pupil of Bengler in the Academy of Prague in 1816, and in 1825 went to Rome, where he added three frescoes to those executed by Cornelius and Oberbeck in the Palazzo Massimi. In 1831 he finished the Triumph of Christ, now in the Racqueti Palace at Berlin. In 1834 he became curator, and in 1841 professor of composition in the Academy of Vienna. After this he completed the monumental pictures of the Church of St. Nepomuck, and (1854-61) the vast series of wall-paintings which cover the interior of the Lichenzed Church at Vienna, which was presented to him as a knight of the order of Francis Joseph. He died March 13, 1876. "Führich has been fairly described as a 'Nazarene,' a romantic religious artist, whose pencil did more than any other to restore the old spirit of Dürer and give new life to ancient religious and Scriptural legends." His principal works are: *Illustrations of Titian's Genoese, The Lord's Prayer, The Triumph of Christ, The Road to Bethlehem, The Exaltation of Christ, according to Thomas Kempis, The Prophet Job, and the verses of the Psalter. See Eycloph, Bdth. ed., a. v.

Führmann, Wilhelm David, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Soest, May 15, 1764, and was in 1806 preacher at Hamm, and died Jan. 20, 1815.

Fulborn, Stephen de, an English prelate of the 13th century, was born at Fulborn, Cambridgeshire. In 1274 he became bishop of Waterford and lord treasurer of Ireland; hence he was preferred archbishop of Tuam, and was elected to have given to the Church of Glastonbury, England, indulgences of an hundred days," probably, as Fuller supposes, so many days to all in his province who went on a pilgrimage to that place,—"an over-papal act for a plain archbishop." He died in 1298, and was buried in Trinity Church, Dublin. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), i, 228.

Fulcran, saint and bishop, was a native of Lodove, archiepiscopate of Narbonne, France, in the 10th century, and from his childhood exhibited marked piety. He was educated by the Theodoric, bishop of Lodove, who ordained him. On the death of the Theodoric, the city elected Fulcran to be his successor, and he was consecrated at Narbonne by archbishop Imerick, Feb. 4, 949. His zeal and humility endeared him to his flock, as did also his abundant charity in time of famine. For a harth word ("The man desires to be burnt") spoken by a bishop who had fallen into heresy, he heard was actually burned by the people, he was filled with remorse, twice went to Rome to do penance, tore the clothes from his back, bade his companions beat him through the streets with thorn branches, and made his confession in the Church of St. Peter. When near his death, multitudes poured to Lodove to receive his blessing. Fulcran died in 1006. He is celebrated in the Gallican martyrology (Feb. 19), and his life has been written by bishop Bernard Guido, compiled from ancient notices in the lives of this saint, published by Belonius. See Baring-Gould, Life of the Saints. 1872, 294.

Fulford, Francis D.D., a Canadian prelate, was born at Sidmouth, England, in 1803, and educated at Exeter College, Oxford, of which he became a fellow in 1825. He held prominent positions in the Church of England, and in 1850 became lord-bishop of Montreal and metropolitan of Canada. He died in Montreal, Sept. 9, 1868. His writings include Sermons, etc.; Progress of the Reformation, etc., and other works.

Fulke of Stamford, was born in Somersethshire, made treasurer of St. Paul's, London, and then by papal bull declared archbishop of Dublin in 1256. He died in his manor of Finglas in 1257, and was buried in St. Peter's church of the Chaple of St. Patrick. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), iii, 94.

Fulla (or Volia), in Scandinavian mythology, was a goddess, the sister and companion of the goddess Freia.

Fulker, Richard, D.D., an eminent Baptist minister, was born at Beaufort, S. C., April 22, 1804. He studied under Rev. Dr. Brantly, entered Harvard University in 1820, but on account of ill-health left during his junior year, and became a lawyer in his native state. In 1823 he was converted, under the preaching of Rev. Daniel Barker, joined the Baptist Church, was ordained the next year pastor at Beaufort, and in 1847 removed to Baltimore to take charge of the Seventh Baptist Church. In 1856 he visited Europe, and during his pastorate at Beaufort was engaged in a controversy with bishop England on the Roman Catholic claims, as well as with Dr. Wayland on the slavery question. He died in Baltimore, Oct. 20, 1876. Dr. Fuller was a most amiable, learned, and noble specimen of Christian manliness and power. Besides Letters on the above controversies and several Sermons, he published an Argument on Clone Communion (1849), and was one of the editors of the Baptist Hymnbook. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclopa. a. v.; Drake, Dict. of Amer. Bihg. a. v.; Life, by Cathart (N. Y. 1870).
FULRAD

(Fulrad), an early French prelate, the son of wealthy parents in Alsace, became fourteenth abbot of St. Denis, in Paris, about 750, and was for many years ambassador of kings and popes, who conferred upon him the most special privileges. He died in 784. See Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Gen. s. v.

Fulton, William, D.D., a Protestant Episcopalian clergyman, officiated, after his ordination, in Fremont, O.; about 1839 removed to Chicago, Ill.; and in 1860 to Cedar Rapids, la., where he became rector of Grace Church; in 1864 of All-Hallows' parish, Snow Hill, Md.; and in 1870 of St. Stephen's parish, Salisbury, where he died, Dec. 6, 1877, aged forty-nine years. See Proc. Episc. Alumni, 1879, p. 168.

Fumel, Jean Felix Henri de, a French prelate, was born at Toulouse in 1711; studied at St. Sulpice; was consecrated bishop of Lodève in 1750; distinguished himself by his episcopal ability, his anciest charity, and his attachment to the authority of the Church, and died Jan. 2, 1780. He wrote several funeral orations. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Funeral Service, that part of the liturgy which the Church of England appoints to be read at the burial of the dead. It is said to have been of very great antiquity, and was used both in the Eastern and Western Churches. This service is read over all the dead indiscriminately, with the exception of those who died unbaptized, of self-murderers, and those who die under the sentence of the greater excommunication.

Furies (Zumenedes or Dirae), mythical personages, either daughters of Nox and Acheron, of Terra and the blood of Saturn, of the Earth and Darkness, of Erin, or the Contestation, or of Jupiter. Their names were Alecto, Megera, and Tisiphone. Some add a fourth, called Lyssa; though others recognize but one Fury, called Adrastia, daughter of Jupiter and Necessity, and the avenger of all vice. Their office was to force persons guilty of crimes committed in secret to confess their guilt. They punished their incorrigible clients with insanity. They were represented as of vast size, old, quadrupedal, and terrible to behold. They wore a dark robe with a serpent as a girdle. The uncultured age took pains to connect everything horrible with these frightful forms: eyes emitting flame, snake-hair, claw-hands, with viper scourgences. Their dwelling-place is an iron palace in the infernal region, where they torture those who arrive in Tartarus without being reconciled to the gods. With the progress of civilization the myths of these deities had many changes; the bloody pictures disappeared, and in their place were substituted the Eumenides (q. v.).

Furinalia, an annual festival celebrated by the ancient Romans in honor of the obscure goddess Furina. It was observed towards the end of July, and the services were conducted by a flamen.

Furini, Francesco, an eminent Italian painter, was born at Florence in 1594, and studied in the schools of Passavagno and Roselli, and then went to Rome. Among his finest works was a picture of The Three Graces, in the Palazzo Strozzi. He painted a number of large works for the churches, the best of which are at Borgo San Lorenzo, near Florence, representing St. Francis Receiving the Stigmata, and the Conception of the Virgin. He died in 1649. See Spooner, Eng. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Fürst, Julius, an eminent Hebrew scholar of Germany, was born May 12, 1803, at Zerkenow, in the duchy of Posen. He studied at different universities, and after having taken his degree as doctor of philosophy, took up his abode at Leipzig. He studied there the lectures at the university in 1839. In 1864 he was made professor, and died Feb. 9, 1873. He published, Lehrbüchel der aramäischen Idiole (Leipzic, 1865):—Perlenkunde aramäischer Gnomen und Lieder (1866).

FURSTENBERG

Furstenthal, Jacob Raphel, a Hebrew scholar, was born in 1781, and died at Breslau, Dec. 16, 1855. He published, Selichoth, or the penitential prayers, with a German translation and Hebrew commentary (Breslau, 1823-4, 2 vols.);—he also translated into German Pakuda's (q. v.) רבי יקותיאל נבון, or, Duties of the Heart (ibid. 1853)—Maimonide's More Nebuchim (only the first part, Krotoschin, 1859)—Ababa's Memorath ha-mo'or (ibid. 1842). A very valuable work of his is Robinsonische Annalen (Breslau, 1834). See Hoefer, Bibl. Jud. i, 307 sq., where a complete list of his works is given. (B. P.)

Fürstenberg, Ferdinand von, a German prelate, was born at Bilsen, in Westphalia, Oct. 21, 1826. Dedicated to the Church from infancy, he became canon of Hildesheim, and finally canonized sacerdote of pope Alexander VIII. He was chosen bishop of Paderborn, April 20, 1661, and took possession the following October. He administered his diocese with a remarkable spirit of equity, encouraged public instruction, caused new school buildings to be erected, attended to a careful distribution of instruction, preached successfully in behalf of various missions, and raised for this object 102,740 thalers. In 1678 he became bishop of Munster, after having been the coadjutor of his predecessor, also vicar-general of the pope for the countries of the North. He died June 26, 1683, leaving some poems and other works. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Fürstenberg, Franz Egon von, a German prelate, was born at Strasburg, May 27, 1669. He was minister to the elector of Cologne, Maximilian Henry. His attachment to Louis XIV led him to contribute to the formation of the Ligue de Rhin, contracted in view of the peace between the king and several electors of Germany. In 1685, when he was induced the elector of Cologne to leave to the disposal of the king of France the places of Nieuw and of Kaiserswerth. He was appointed bishop of Metz in 1658, but in 1668 resigned this position for that of Strasburg. He devoted himself to recovering from the hands of the Lutherans certain domains which formerly belonged to the Church of Strasburg. This prelate died April 1, 1682, a little after the re-establishment of the Catholic faith in the Catholic Church of Strasburg, and after the recall of the canons in accordance with the submission of Strasburg to the king of France. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Fürstenberg, Wilhelm Egon von, surnamed Prince William, brother of Franz, was born in 1670. Like his elder brother, he was councillor to the elector of Cologne, Maximilian Henry, and declared himself a partisan of France. Incensed at this, the emperor removed him, Feb. 18, 1674, then imprisoned him successively at Vienna and at Neustadt. Fürstenberg did not regain his liberty until after the peace of Nimeguen. Called to the bishopric of Metz in 1663, he resigned this following year. He was appointed bishop of Strasburg on the death of his brother in 1682. In 1682 he commenced the Jesuits the direction of a seminary and college founded by him. In 1686, through the representation of the French government, he received from pope Innocent XI the hat of a cardinal. He was elected coadjutor of Maximilian
Henry, elector of Cologne, Jan. 7, 1688; but the court of Rome, then at variance with the court of France, did not ratify this election, and another candidate, prince Clement of Bavaria, bishop of Ratisbon, succeeded him. In compensation for this he received of Louis XIV the duchy of Germanen-De-Pres, where he went to dwell. He died at Paris, April 10, 1704. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bio. Générale, s. v.

Futtafihi, in the mythology of the South Sea islands, is the mightiest among the gods of the sea, whom the inhabitants of the Friendly Islands worship. Many sacrifices of fruits and flowers are given to him and his wife Pakowa.

Fyffe, Robert A. D. D., a Baptist minister, was born of Scotch parents, Oct. 20, 1816, at Saint-Philippé, near Montreal. He studied at Madison University, N. Y., and graduated at the Newton Theological Institution in 1842; was ordained at Brookline, Mass., and was pastor in Perth, Can., the same year. In 1843 he removed to Montreal to take a position as professor in the college there; next year became pastor of a church in Toronto; in 1848 was again pastor in Perth; about 1850 removed to Warren, R. I.; in 1853 to Milwaukee, Wis.; in 1858 to Toronto again, over the Bond Street Church; in 1860 was elected president of the Canadian Literary Institute at Woodstock, and died there, Sept. 4, 1878. Few Baptist ministers in Canada have accomplished more for the denomination which he so ably represented than Dr. Fyffe. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclopedia, s. v. (J. C. S.)

Fyflet (or Fyttot), i. e., four-footed, a term used to describe a mystical cross, made from the combination, in a cruciform arrangement, of four Greek gammas, thus (fig. 1), or thus (fig. 2); occasionally the small y was employed, thus (fig. 3). It was also called Gammatism (Γαμματισμός), the Greek term for this mystical device, it is used forming part of the ancient Secret Disciplines in the primitive Church. See Gammadia.

Funeral Pall, a covering for the coffin during the procession, to church, during the service in church, and until the coffin is afterwards placed in the grave. Anciently palls were either of violet or black, adorned with a cross, and sometimes richly embroidered with flowers, heraldic devices, or figures of saints.

Fynia, in Norse mythology, was one of the Åsas who live with Friggia, in Wingolf, in the palace Fensalir. She is very beautiful. Funeral Pall of the 16th Century. has long flowing drapery and a delicate color of skin. A golden band on her forehead characterizes her as a goddess, and she is the confidential adviser of the wife of Odin, as well as her private maid.

G.

Gabbaba (or Gabbatha), properly a bobe; hence a penile lamp of similar form, for a church, made of different metals—gold, silver, brass, and electrum. These lamps were frequently embossed, or decorated in bas-relief, and ornamented with lilies, heads of griffins or lions, or even fashioned in the form of animals. Like the corona used for lighting, they very often had crosses attached to them.

Gabriel, Festival of, is celebrated by the Greek Church on March 26, in honor of the archangel Gabriel.

Another holy day, called the Feast of Sts. Gabriel and Michael, is held in honor of the two archangels, on Nov. 1, by the Greek Church.

Gabriel (surnamed Severus), a Greek prelate, born in Monemvasia in 1557, was ordained bishop of Philadelphiat, at Constantinople, by the patriarch Jeremiah. Seeing that his church contained few Greeks, he withdrew to Venice, where he was bishop of the Greeks living there. His writings were published by Simon, under the title, Fides Ecclesiae Orientalis (in Greek and Latin, 1671). They comprise two treatises, one relating to the sacraments, the other entitled Apologias, published for the first time at Venice in 1600. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bio. Générale, s. v.
GABRIELLI

Gabrielli, a heretical prelate, lived in the latter half of the 17th century. He belonged to the Roman branch of the Gabrielli family. Actions both foul and strange have been imputed to him, such as making sacrifices of human blood at the reunions of his friends. Francis Picchetti, called also Cecco Polignano, had been sent to assassinate the marquis of Buffalo, but the emissary being seized, exposed his accomplices, among them Gabrielli, who was confined in a convent of Monte Cassino, and deprived of his income. Afterwards he was conducted to the château of Perugia by the order of Innocent XI. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Gabrielli, Giulio, an Italian prelate, was born at Rome, Aug. 20, 1758; became Bishop of Sinigaglia, and cardinal-priest, Feb. 23, 1801, and on March 27, 1808, pro-secretary of state under Pius VII. On account of his incessant recriminations, Gabrielli was arrested by order of Napoleon, and on June 17 was superseded by cardinal Pecci. After the removal of the pope, Gabrielli went to France, and was banished to Saumur. In 1813 he was permitted, with several other cardinals, to accompany the pope at Fontainebleau. He afterwards returned to Rome, where he was likely to be elected pope, but died in 1822. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Gabinoz, Augustino, an Italian fanatic, was born at Brescia, and lived in the latter half of the 17th century. He was chief of a sect of fanatics called the Cicerellii of the Apocalypse. He declared his intention of defending the Catholic Church against the anti-christ whose reign he believed to be approaching. He gave as emblems to his followers a sable and staff of command in the form of a cross, a sparkling star, and the names of three angels, Gabriel, Michael, and Raphael, upon their clothing. They numbered about twenty-four, mostly artisans. On Palm Sunday of 1694, Gabinoz attacked, sword in hand, upon the ecclesiastics, claiming their homage. He was accordingly imprisoned as a madman. A number of his proselytes were arrested upon the confessions of one of them, and the rest dispersed. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Gacle, Georg Christoph, a Lutheran theologian, was born at Hof, in Bavaria, in 1736, and died at Sulzbach in 1801. He wrote De Peculiiis et Constatia, etc. (Sulzbach, 1783); Geschicht des Herzogthum Sulzbach (Leipsic, 1847). See Winer, Handbuch der Theol. Li. ii, 19, 215; Zuchold, Rath. Theol., i, 399. Gadara (now Um-Keis). For a recent and full account of the present condition of this interesting site, see Merrill, East of the Jordan (N. Y. 1881), p. 145 sq.

Gadsten, Christopher P., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was assistant minister in Charleston, S. C., for many years, until 1859, when he became rector of St. Luke's Church in that city. He was a member of the standing committee of his diocese, a member of the board of missions to the colored men and freedmen of South Carolina, and a deputy to the General Convention. He died July 24, 1871, aged forty-five years. See Proc. Episc. Almanac, 1872, p. 127.

Gaetic Version of the Scriptures. This language is spoken in the Highlands and Western Isles of Scotland. It was not till the year 1767 that a New Testament, in the Gaetic tongue was provided for the Scotch Highlanders in the translation of the Rev. James Stuart of Killin. The work was published at the expense of the Society in Scotland for Promoting Christian Knowledge. The first edition consisted of 10,000 copies, and a larger edition of 21,500 copies was issued by the same society in 1796. The next step of the society was to obtain a Gaelic version of the Old Testament. To facilitate the work, the Old Testament was divided into four parts, two of which were allotted to the Rev. Dr. John Stuart, of Uss, the son of the translator of the New Test.; a third part also, afterwards fell to his share, although it had been the first instance before from another hand. The remaining fourth part, consisting of the prophetic books, was translated by the Rev. Dr. Smith, of Campbelltown, and, on its completion, was found to differ altogether in style and execution from the other portion of the Bible translated by Dr. Stuart. The whole version was completed for the press in 1801. In consequence of many complaints concerning the discrepancy in style between the prophetic and the other books, the society resolved in their next edition to subject the prophetic books to a thorough revision, that they might more conformable to the other parts of the version. This plan was effected in 1807, and 20,000 copies of the Old Testament with the New Testament were printed at Glasgow, under the care of the Rev. Alexander Stewart, of Dingwall. In the same year the British and Foreign Bible Society published, in London, an edition, consisting of 20,000 Bibles and 10,000 Testaments, but not being sufficient to satisfy the urgent demands for more copies, from time to time other editions followed. The total number of Gaelic Bibles and Testaments printed by the British and Foreign Bible Society up to March 31, 1884, was 100,126. The first number, however, was not in the Gaelic, but the 50,000 copies of Bibles and Testaments furnished to the Highlanders by other societies between 1810 and 1829. See Bible of Every Land, p. 188. (B. P.)

Gaetano, Antonio, an Italian prelate, was born in 1566. He was archbishop of Capua, for several years munici of Vicenza and Madrid, and died in 1624. He was learned, and handled satire with much ability. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Gagarin, Ivan S., a Jesuit, was born in Russia in 1814. For some time he held an appointment in the Russian diplomatic service, and joined his order in 1835. Afterwards he devoted a good deal of attention to the differences between the Eastern and Western churches, and published as the result of his studies a considerable number of books.
GALEN

Galen (de Montaigne), François de, a French prelate, was born Jan. 6, 1744, at the chateau of Montaigne. He was at first almoner of the king and grand valet of Rheims, and in 1782 became bishop of Tarbes. He was strongly opposed to the innovations of the assembly, and retired to Spain in 1789. Nevertheless, in 1791 he came to Toulouse as protest in a public sermon against the new order of things, and to explain his refusal of the oath. The French conquists obliged him to flee to Portugal, and at the time of the concordat he resigned, Nov. 6, 1801. He died near Lisbon in 1806, leaving fifty-seven writings upon ecclesiastical matters. See Hoefer, Nouv. Dict. Général, i. 367.

GALATINO, PIERO DE, a Franciscan of the 16th century, professor of theology and philosophy at Rome, is the author of De Arsacca Catholicae Veritatis, etc. (Ortona di Mare, 1818, and often).—Opus de Theologia: Commentaria in Apocalypsin: De Ecclesiae Catholicae Institutiones, Deformationes et Reformations: Ostium Apertum seu de recta Summa Scripturae Interpretatione, etc. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 814; Wolf, Bibl. Hebr., i, 971; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

GALBEY, THOMAS, a Roman Catholic bishop, of the order of St. Augustine, was placed in the see of Hartford, Conn., March 19, 1876. He zealously continued the work of his predecessors till the close of 1878, when, his health failing, he set out for a convalescent of his order near Philadelphia. He became so ill in the car that he was removed to a hotel in New York, where he died, Oct. 17, of the same year. See De Courcy and Shea, Hist. of the Cath. Church in the U. S. p. 5, 7.

Gale, Nahum, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Auburn, Mass, March 6, 1812. He studied at Phillips Academy, Andover, graduated from Amherst College in 1837, and four years after from the East Windsor Theological Seminary. He was ordained at Ware, June 22, 1842, of which church he was pastor until 1851, when he became professor of ecclesiastical history and the pastoral charge in the East Windsor Seminary, retaining that position until 1858. On Sept. 1 of that year he was installed pastor of the Church at Lee, and died in Newburyport, Sept. 18, 1876. Among his published works are, Pilgrims' First Year in New England (1857)—Memoir of Rev. Bennet Tyler, D.D. (1869).—Conversion Through Personal Effort (1866).—Prophet of the Highest (1876). See Cong. Quarterly 1857, p. 415.

Galen, Christoph Bernhard Matthäus van, a German prelate and general, was born in Westphalia in 1604. Having completed his studies, he traveled in various parts of Europe, entered as colonel the service of the elector of Cologne, and made, from 1687 to 1647, several campaigns against the French and Swedes before the treaty of peace at Munster, he accepted a command in that city, afterwards obtained the provestship, and in 1650 was elected bishop-prince. The inhabitants objected to some of his regulations, and he was obliged to adopt special measures to compel their obedience. In 1664 he was appointed by the general commander of the army of the empire against the Turks. Returning to his bishopric, he allied himself in 1665 with Charles II, king of England, against the people of Holland, but Louis XIV interposed between the belligerent parties.
In 1672 Galen took arms against the states-general, but Leopold I of Germany obliged him to make a treaty with them in 1674. This bishop, fierce and war-loving, died at Huy, Sept. 19, 1678. See Hoefer, Now. Biog. Génerale, s. v.

Galeas, DOMINICO, an Italian prelate, lived in the latter half of the 17th century. He was bishop of Kuvo, and wrote Ecclesiastica in Matrimonii Potestas, adversus Io. Lauom Doctrinam, etc. (Paria, 1677), which was followed by a reply from Launoy. See Hoefer, Now. Biog. Génerale, s. v.

Galeasini (Lat. Galesinina), Pietro, a learned Italian ecclesiastical antiquary and apostolical notary, who died about 1590, devoted most of his time to researches in ecclesiastical history. He endeavored to correct and illustrate the Roman Martyrology, by remodelling it and adding a number of new facts concerning the saints. He wrote the Lives of the Saints of Milan (1683), and a Commentary on the Pentateuch (1687). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict., s. v.

Galleon, GATIEN DE, a French theologian, was born at Angers, Oct. 27, 1658. Having received the degree of doctor of civil and canon law at the age of twenty, he entered into orders: in 1688 he made canon and prebendary of St. Martin, and abbot of Tours; only after official and grand victor: but his close attention to his duties threw him into a dangerous illness. He returned to Angers and there recovered his health. Persuaded that the sparing of his life was a miracle, he consecrated himself more wholly to the service of God. In 1707 he was appointed bishop of Aggloece and coadjutor of the bishop of Babylon. He started for Persia, and died there soon after his arrival at Isphahan, Sept. 27, 1712. He wrote some works, for which see Hoefer, Now. Biog. Génerale, s. v.

Galiameum is the name given to the catechumenal oil in the Greek Church. It is considered as sanctified by the blood of Martyris et holy chrism (q. v.) which are mixed with it.

Gall, ALESSANDRINO, an eminent Florentine archtect, was born in 1691. He resided seven years in England, and on his return to Tuscany was appointed state architect by Cosmo III. He was invited by Clement XIV to Rome, where he erected three superb monuments: the façades of the Sacro Monte di Fiorentini and S. Giovanni Laterano, and the Cornini chapel in the latter edifice. He died in 1737. See Hoefer, Now. Biog. Génerale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Galla, Saint, was a daughter of Symmachus, a Roman senator, who died in the former part of the 6th century; she became a widow at a very early age, and took the veil at St. Peter's monastery. She is commemorated Oct. 5.

Galla Version of the Scriptures. The Galla language is spoken by the Gallas (q. v.). While Dr. Krapf resided in Shoa, between the years 1838 and 1842, he translated the gospels of Matthew, Luke, and John, the epistle to the Romans, and the book of Genesis. The gospel of Matthew and five chapters of the gospel of John were printed in Roman letters, the copies being designed for distribution among the Galla tribes around Shoa, where the Church missionary society was established and the establishment of a mission. The opposition of the Abyssinian priesthood led, however, to the abandonment, in 1844, of the Shoa mission, and the station was accordingly transferred to the Wanki country, where it was hoped that opportunities for a wider dissemination of the Bible than that originally contemplated by the society might accrue. But these hopes have been doomed to disappointment. Of late the translation of the Bible into the Galla language has again been taken up by the Rev. Dr. Krapf, and among the translations published, the British and Foreign Bible Society announced, for the year 1876, the New Testament, there are also printed the books of Genesis and Exodus, the latter having left the press in 1877. For the study of the language, see Tutachek, Dictionary and Grammar of the Galla Language (Munich, 1844-45). (B. P.)

Gallina, SERVATIUS, a Reformed preacher of Holland, who died near the end of the 17th century, is known as the editor of Lactantius's works, published at Leyden in 1660; he also edited the Sublime Oracles (Amsterdam, 1687-88); and wrote Disserationes de Sublime, and Opuscula de Oraculis (ibid. 1698). See Jocher, Algemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i. 908. (B. P.)

Galland, THOMAS, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Hull. He was converted at the age of fifteen, under the ministry of W. E. Miller, and being designed for the ministry of the Church of England, was educated at Cambridge, where he graduated a master, of arts. He entered the Methodist ministry, but still prosecuted his studies. He was one of the advanced liberal members of the Conference, but, with independence of thought, he deferred to the peace and unity of the Church. With an unbridling princeness, he was tender and charitable towards others: with great vigor of intellect, he was simple, frank, and ingenuous; with an anxious desire for the freedom of the Church, he had a fixed concern for Christian order. He was a leader in the institution of that body and of its spiritual government, and ably advocated all its great interests. His ministry, which began in 1816, was evangelical, ardent, and powerful; and he was withal a diligent and faithful pastor. He died suddenly at Hull, May 12, 1843, aged forty-nine years. Galland was wealthy and liberal. As a pulpit expositor of Scripture, he was, perhaps, without an equal in his day. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1843; Stevenson, City-Road Chapel, p. 266; Smith, Hist. of West. Meth. iii. 85, 225, 244, 350, 355, 412, 419, 475, 478; Everett, West. Centenary Tawings, vol. ii, sketch 3.

Gallardo, MATTEO, a reputable Spanish painter, resided at Cordova in 1657. There is a picture of Christ, and several of the Virgin, by him, which are highly commended. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Galla, PHILIP, an eminent Dutch engraver, was born at Haarlem in 1637, and early established himself at Antwerp. The following are some of his prints: Solomon Directed the Building of the Temple, a set of prints of subjects from the Old and New Testament; Abraham Sacrificing Isaac; Christ with the Two Disciples at Emmaus. He died in 1612. See Hoefer, Now. Biog. Génerale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Gallil, priests of Cybele (q. v.) among the ancient Romans, who received the worship of this goddess from the Phrygians. They were selected from the lowest class of society, and were allowed at certain times to ask alms from the people. The chief priest among them was called Archigallus.

Gallical Councils: councils held in France, but at some place unknown.

I. A.D. 555, at Poitiers or Toulouse, possibly. St. Hilary, writing to the Easterns, A.D. 980, says he, five years before, the bishops of France sent to the communion of the Arius bishops Umacius and Valens, and of Saturninus of Arles, who had espoused their cause. The opening chapters of his work addressed to Constantius are thought to have emanated from this council.
GALLIET

II. A.D. 576. There seems a reference to one such in a law of that year, dated Treves, of the Theodosian code, but it is not known where or for what object.

III. A.D. 444. in which Hilary of Arles presided, and Cledonius of Besançon, where this council may have met, therefore, was accused of being husband of a widow, and deposed. On appealing, however, to St. Leo he was restored, as having been condemned on a false charge. Both their letter to him and his answer are preserved among his epistles.

IV. A.D. 678, at some place unknown; when St. Leodegar or Leger, bishop of Autun, was deposed as having been accessory to the death of king Childeric II five years before.

V. A.D. 678 or 679, against the Monothelitians; as appears from the reference made to it by the Gallican bishops subscribing to the Roman synod under pope Agatho, preserved in the 4th act of the 6th council, but they do not say where.

VI. A.D. 796, at Tours possibly, where Joseph, bishop of Mans and a suffragan of Tours, was deposed for cruelty.

VII. Three more councils may be grouped under this head, usually called Councils of Auvergne, but this name is misleading; it means the town Clermont, not called, not the province. When the town changed its name to Clermont, councils held there subsequently were styled by its new name, while the earlier retained its old. We save confusion, therefore, by classing them under Gallican. The first was held Nov. 6, A.D. 585, in the second year of king Theodebert, and passed sixteen canons, to which fifteen bishops, headed by Honorus, metropolitan of Bourges, subscribed; his suffragan of Auvergne subscribing second. Their canons deprate lay influences in the appointment of bishops, and lay interference between bishops and clergy. No furniture belonging to the Church may be used for private funerals or marriages. The appointment of Jews as judges, and marriages between Jews and Christians, are denounced. Presbyters and deacons marrying are to be deposed. In a collective note to king Theodebert, the bishops entreat that neither the clergy, nor others, living in his dominions may be robbed of their rightful possessions, and in their fifth canon they declare all spoliations of Church property null and void, and the spoilers excommunicated wherever it occurs. Several other canons are given to this council by Duhesme. The second, A.D. 549, was attended by ten bishops, but only to receive the canons passed at the 5th Council of Orleans. The third, A.D. 588, was occupied solely with a dispute between the bishops of Rhodes and Cahors.

Gallifet, Joseph, a French theologian, was born in 1663, near Aix (Provence). He entered the Jesuit order, became rector, then provincial, of the College of the Trinity, at Lyons, where he had completed his studies, and was regarded as the principal promoter of the devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus. In 1728 he became minister general of the Jesuits at Rome. He died about 1740, leaving several works on devotion, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Gailim. Lieut. Conder suggests (Text-Work in Palest. ii, 336) as a representative of this site the present Beth-Jala, doubtless meaning the place of that name a few miles south of Jerusalem (see Ekhla); but the passage in Isaiah (x, 90) requires a position north of that city.

Galloche, Louis, a reputable French historical painter, was born at Paris in 1670, and studied under Louis Boullongne. He was a member of the Royal Academy. Among his works are the Departure of St. Remigis, in the Church of St. Denis; The Good Samaritan, and The Resurrection. He died in 1761. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Gallonitis, Antonius, a priest of the congregation of the oratory, was a native of Rome, and died there in 1605. His works were numerous, but he is chiefly known by his Tractatus di Martirio, etc. In 1591 he published his History of the Virgins:—The Lives of Certain Martyrs (1687).

Gallucci, Angelo, an Italian Jesuit, was born at Macerata in 1558, became a famous preacher, professor of eloquence in the College of Rome, and died Feb. 28, 1674, leaving a number of sermons and other works, for which see Bivog. Universale, s. v.

Gallucci, Tarquinio, an Italian Jesuit, was born at Sabina in 1574, became professor of rhetoric, and finally rector of the Greek College in Rome, and died there July 28, 1649, leaving some commentaries on classical works.

Gallus, Saint (1), sixteenth bishop of Clermont-Ferrand, was born in the city (Auvergne) about 480, of patrician parents. In order to escape marriage, he took refuge at the monastery of Corcon (Cromon or Courtom), and there embraced the monastic life. St. Quintinns, then bishop of Auvergne, ordained him deacon, kept him near himself, and drew him into literary pursuits. Later, this deacon, at the request of Gallus, appeared in the court. Here he remained until 527, when St. Quintinnus died, and Gallus was elected to succeed him. He distinguished himself by his gentleness and charity. Being uncle of St. Gregory of Tours, he took charge of the education of his nephew. St. Gallus assisted at the first two councils of Clermont-Ferrand, Nov. 8, 585 and 549, as well as at the second, third, fourth, and fifth of Orleans—June 23, 583; May 7, 588; Aug. 31, 541; and Oct. 28, 549. The hagiographers affirm that he possessed the gift of miracles. By his prayers he arrested the flames which threatened the destruction of the city, and at another time delivered the citizens from the fearful ravages of disease. He died about 553, and his body is preserved in the Church of Notre Dame du Port, at Clermont-Ferrand. He is honored by the Church July 1. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Gallus, Saint (2), twenty-third bishop of Clermont-Ferrand, lived in the 7th century. He was elected in 650, and is honored as a saint in his diocese on Nov. 1. He wrote a Lettre Adressée à Saint Didier, évêque de Cahors, which Usher falsely attributes to St. Gall of Auxerre. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Gallus, Nicolas (properly Ihla), a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Köthen, June 21, 1516. He studied at Wittenberg, was in 1542 deacon at Ratisbon, which place, however, he had to leave on account of the Interim (q. v.). He went to Wittenberg to occupy the pulpit of Crusiger, who was prevented from discharging his ministerial functions by sickness. From Wittenberg Gallus went to Magdeburg, but returned again to Ratisbon in 1558, and died there in 1570. In connection with Flicus (q. v.), Gallus opposed the Interim and Osiander, and defended his Church against the intrusion of all and every error. See Salig, Vollandutsche Historie des Augsburgerischen Confession, ii, 1008 sq.; Jöcher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.; Herzog-Plitt, Reüt-Encyclop. s. v. (B. F.)

Gallus, Robertus, a French mystic, lived at Orange in 1291. He derived his name from his French origin, and was provincial of a monastic order called according to Ouden, he was very pius, but of little note. He believed himself endowed with the gift of revelation, and wrote several works in this line. The only one which has come down to us was published at Paris in 1513, at the house of Htinig Stephen of Toul. It is entitled Liber Trium Virtor (namely, Herma, Ugolinus, and Robert Gallus himself), et Trium Spiritualium Verginum (the Gally, Henri, D.D., an English divine, was born at Beckenham, Kent, in August, 1696, and was educated at Benet College, Cambridge. In 1724 he was chosen lecturer of St. Paul's Covent-garden, and in the same year was instituted to the rectory of Wavendon or Wavendon, Beds. The incumbents preferred him to a prebend in the Cathedral of Gloucester in 1728, and three years later to one in Norwich. He died Aug. 7, 1769. He was the author of two sermons on the Misery of Man, preached in 1725:— The Moral Condition of Man (Epiph. 627, s. v.). Both were highly esteemed. See Hoefer, Nova Biogr. Générale, s. v.

Gamilde Ben-Jeshurun (surnamed Balfraoz, i.e. the Last) terminated the long dynasty of the house of Hillel. Though styled patriarch, yet his power was hardly more than nominal. The Jewish population was divided into five sects of Rabbinical opinions; and the strong opposition of the foreign synagogues became, the less they were disposed to appeal to the patriarchal see, though its existence was still regarded with a certain complacency. But the thing itself was now to end. The emperor Honorius had inhibited the transfer of contributions from the West to the patriarchal coffers at Tiberias; and Galimade himself, under the charge of contumacy, in the erection of synagogues contrary to the imperial law, by an edict of Theodosius was stripped of his secular title of "prefect" in the year 405 (Cod. Theodosii, iv, 22). It may be that this was the same Galimade whom Jerome mentions (Epist. 57, § 3) as an enemy of Hesychius. Galimade died without an heir, and, thus with his death, this shadow of dignity, which he retained in Jewish circles, entirely passed away. See Etheridge, Introduction to Jewish Literature, p. 139; Hoefer, Dict. of Christ. Biog., s. v. (B. I.)

Gallia, Bernhard, prince-bishop of Brixen, was born Aug. 21, 1674. He was for some time preacher at Freiburg, made suffragan bishop and vicar-general at Feldkirch in 1820, in 1823 consecrated prince-bishop of Brixen, and died in 1856. He wrote, Dias de la Divina Verdad (Fribourg, 1870):— Bibliothek Geschicht der Weltliteratur durch Jesus den Sohn Gottes (ibid. 1860):— Die katholische Religions (ibid. 1796-99, 3 vols.):— Gebet- und Betrachtungsbücher für Christen (6th ed. 1836, etc.). See Winten, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i. 61, 463, 456, 478; ii. 241, 259, 267, 272, 346, 352, 388, 386. (B. P.)

Galvam (or Galvao), Francisco Fernandez, a Portuguese orator, was born at Lisbon in 1554. He entered the ecclesiastical ranks, and acquired great renown as a preacher. He was regarded as a classical writer in Portugal. To the vigorous study which gained for him the title of doctor of theology, he added the gift of a powerful memory. He died in 1610. His works have appeared under the following titles: Sermos do Doutor Francisco Fernandez Galego Arceiho de Cereira (Lisbon, 1811);— Sermos dos Festas dos Santos (ibid. 1813);— Sermos do Fresto do Cristo (ibid. 1616). He had as editor a writer of merit, Amado Vieira. See Hoefer, Nova Biogr. Générale, s. v.

Galvam (or Galvao), João, count of Argamil, was a warlike Portuguese prelate, born at Evora in the 15th century. He was the son of Ruy Galvao, secretary of Alfonso V, and succeeded his father. He became prior of the convent of the Augustines, and in 1451 accompanied princess Leonora, as she went to be married to the emperor Frederick III. On his return, in 1451, he became bishop of Coimbra. Alfonso V sent him in 1453 later to Africa. At Arrilia and Tangier he fought so valiantly that the king conferred upon him the title of count of Argamil, which title ever afterwards belonged to the bishop of Coimbra. The archbishopric of Braga being vacant, Galvao was called to it by Sixtus IV in 1490. He died Aug. 4, 1445, at a very advanced age. He left in manuscript, Jornada da Emperatriz Dona Leonor. See Hoefer, Nova Biogr. Générale, s. v.

Gamalade (or Gamalade) (a surname called 'Balfraoz', i.e. the Last) terminated the long dynasty of the house of Hillel. Though styled patriarch, yet his power was hardly more than nominal. The Jewish population was divided into five sects of rabbinical opinions; and the strong opposition of the foreign synagogues became, the less they were disposed to appeal to the patriarchal see, though its existence was still regarded with a certain complacency. But the thing itself was now to end. The emperor Honorius had inhibited the transfer of contributions from the West to the patriarchal coffers at Tiberias; and Gamalade himself, under the charge of contumacy, in the erection of synagogues contrary to the imperial law, by an edict of Theodosius was stripped of his secular title of "prefect" in the year 405 (Cod. Theodosii, iv, 25). It may be that this was the same Gamalade whom Jerome mentions (Epist. 57, § 3) as an enemy of Hesychius. Gamalade died without an heir, and, thus with his death, this shadow of dignity, which he retained in Jewish circles, entirely passed away. See Etheridge, Introduction to Jewish Literature, p. 139; Hoefer, Dict. of Christ. Biog. (B. I.)

Gamalade, a Scotch prelate, was an Englishman by birth, consecrated by Roger, archbishop of York, and promoted to the see of the Isles in 1181. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 298.

Gambara, Giovanni Francesco, an Italian prelate, nephew of Uberto, was born at Brescia, Jan. 17, 1533. He was son of Giacomo Francesco, count of Prato Albinio, who rendered great service to the house of Austria, and distinguished himself among the Latin poets of his time. Giovanni, after having been educated at Perugia and Padua, was sent to the court of Charles V. He afterwards returned to Rome, performed various offices under Julius III and Pius IV, and was made cardinal in 1561. Pius V appointed him bishop of Viterbo. He died at Rome, May 5, 1587. See Hoefer, Nova Biogr. Générale, s. v.

Gambara, Lattanzio, an eminent Italian painter, was born at Brescia in 1541, and was instructed in the schools of Giovanni Bellini, Titian, and Rembrandt, and most studied production is his fresco in the dome of the cathedral at Parma, representing subjects from the life of Christ. Some of his other admired works are, Christ Slaying Abel; Moses and the Brazen Serpent; Samson and Delilah; Judith with the Head of Holofernes; Joel and Jeremia; The Taking Down from the Cross. He died in 1574.

Gambara, Uberto, an Italian prelate, was born at Brescia, near the close of the 15th century. He was the son of Gian Francesco, count of Prato Albinio, who abandoned the side of the Venetians after the battle of Chiara in 1399, and joined the French in order to save the city of Brescia, his native place. This desolation irritated the Venetians against him, but they were appeased through the intervention of pope Leo X, a particular friend of the count. This pontiff called the young Uberto to himself, and sent him as nuncio to Portugal. Clement VII sent him to solicite, in 1527, the aid of the king of England against Charles V. Gambara accosted himself with success in this mission, and on his return was appointed bishop of Tortona. Paul III made him cardinal in 1539, and confided to him the legation to the Holy See. In this position Gambara adroitly favored the designs of the Farnese, and afforded them much aid, by placing them in possession of these principalities. He died at Rome, Feb. 14, 1549. See Hoefer, Nova Biogr. Générale, s. v.
Gamelia, the name applied to a sacrifice among the ancient Greeks, which the parents of a girl about to be married were accustomed to offer to Athena (q. v.), as the day before the marriage. In time the word came to be applied to marriages solemnities in general.

Gamellina, a Scotch prelate, was archbishop and first-chancellor of St. Andrews in 1250. He was made bishop of St. Andrews in 1255, on St. Thomas's day, and consecrated on St. Stephen's day of the same year. Here he continued until his death in 1271. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 18.

Gamæa (γαμηα, λη γαμμα), a cruciform ornament, embroidered on the borders or woven into the texture of ecclesiastical vestments, both in the West and East. It takes its name from being composed of two capital gamma (Γ) placed back to back, thus: Γ and a cross was inscribed. Vestments so decorated were known by the name of polychiarion (πολυχαϊριον).

Ganapatyas, the worshippers of Ganesta (q. v.). They can scarcely be considered as a separate people, Ga- nateya being worshipped by all the Hindus as having power to remove all difficulties and impediments. Hence, they never commence a journey or engage in any important work without invoking his protection. Some, however, pay this god more particular devotion, and therefore may be considered as especially entitled to be called Ganapatyas.

Ganesa, a Hindû deity, was the son of Siva and Parvati. He is considered the god of prudence, who removes all hindrances, and corresponds to the Greek Hermes, or the Roman Mercury, the great teacher and presiding deity of authors. Ganesa is always addressed as Siva's son when he appears alone, on account of the new moon is painted with the froth of Gangâ. He is generally represented sitting cross-legged, with four arms and hands, and having the head and proboscis of an elephant. Ganesta had formerly six classes of worshippers; in the present day he cannot boast of any exclusive adoration, although he shares a kind of homage along with all the other gods. See Pulkar.

Ganga Sagor, a sacred island among the Hindûs, situated at the union of the great western or holiest branch of the Ganges with the Indian ocean. It is low, flat, and swampy, yet it is one of the most celebrated places of pilgrimage in India, in accord with the peculiar sacredness of the waters at this point. On the island stands a ruinous temple dedicated to Kapila, the founder of the Sankhya system. This temple is usually occupied by a few disciples of Kapila, and crowds repair thither twice every year, at the full moon of November and in January, to perform obsequies for the benefit of their deceased ancestors, and to practice various ablutions in the sacred waters. As many as 300,000 pilgrims have resorted to this sacred spot from all parts of India in a single year.

Gangas, the idolatrous priests of the inhabitants of Congo, in western Africa. They acknowledge one Supreme Being, but worship also a number of subordinate deities who preside over the different departments of nature. These priests teach the people to worship their deities by various rites and ceremonies, but chiefly by donations of food and clothing, which they apprehend will be of their own use. They make the people believe that they can bring down blessings upon them, avert judgments, cure diseases, and dispel witchcraft.

Gangae Theodos, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born Nov. 1, 1809, at Bergen. In 1833 he received holy orders, in 1858 joined the Benedictines at Augsburg, was in 1842 professor of philosophy and psychology at the Augsburg Lyceum, in 1848 rector of the same, and died Sept. 15, 1875. He was a follower of Günther's philosophical system, and wrote, Die Metaphysische Psychologie des heil. Augustin (1844-47):—Augustin's Precisioin über das Verhältniss von Glau- ben und Wissen (1854):—Augustin's Lehre von Gott dem Dreieichigen (1865). (B. P.)

Ganinannesas (from Singhalese gana, an assembly), a name applied in Ceylon to the novices as well as the priests among the Buddhists.

Ganu Bakshis, a division of the Sikhs (q. v.) in Hindustan, who are said to have derived their name from their founder. They are few in number and of little importance.

Gannett, Ezra Stiles, D.D., a Unitarian minister, was born at Cambridge, Mass., May 4, 1801. He was educated at Phillips Academy, Andover, and Harvard College, where he graduated in 1825. He then spent three years in the Cambridge Divinity School, and was ordained colleague-pastor with Dr. William E. Channing, June 24, 1824. He remained in that charge until his death, Aug. 28, 1871. He founded The Scripture Interpreter, edited for some years The Monthly Miscellany, and was joint editor with Dr. Alvan Lamson (q. v.) of The Christian Examiner. He also published numerous discourses.

Ginsbacher, Johann Baptist, a German composer of church music, was born at Sterzing, in Tyrol, in 1778. He was educated under various masters until 1802, when he became the pupil of the celebrated Abate Vogler. Through this connection he became acquainted with Weber and Meyerbeer, and a friendship sprung up among the three young musicians which was dissolved only by death. Ginsbacher was director of the music of St. Stephen's Cathedral, Vienna, from 1829 until his death, July 18, 1844. His compositions include choral and church music, including more than seventeen masses, besides litanies, motets, offertories, etc. He also wrote several sonatas, a symphony, and one or two minor dramatic compositions. See Encyclop. Brit. 9th ed. a. v.

Ganabet, a French monk, and celebrated reformer of various monasteries, was born in the early half of the 10th century, of a noble family. The record of the foundation of the abbey of Bourgueil, in 991, mentions him as the abbot of St. Julien of Tours at that period. He was also simultaneously abbot of Bourgueil-en-Vallee, of St. Pierre de la Couture, at Mous, of Maille- sur-l'Ancre, and of the Houle, in the diocese of Orleans. The Historiographi de la France states that he reformed these monasteries, and that he established a great number of charters, which we are unable to mention. About 1000 he went to Rome, and obtained of pope Sylvester the confirmation of the privileges of St. Julien. In 1061 he engaged in important discussions with a certain knight named Gautier, upon the subject of the immunities of Bourgueil. The same year he received of queen Bertha various manors. He died at Bourgueil, Sept. 25, but there is much uncertainty about the year, some making it 1066, others 1067. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.

Gantesviller, Johann Jacob, a Lutheran theologian, born at Basle in 1631, was professor at Herborn in 1650, in 1655 at Hanau, in 1678 at Duisburg, and died March 25, 1691. He wrote, Mystertiis Urin. et Theologi. Delineatio (Hanau, 1674):—Scrubinius Theologiæ Compendium de Lembi (Duisburg, 1682.)—Strieder, Hessische Gelehrte Geschichte; Miscell. Duis- burgi, i. 560; Jocher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, a. v. (B. P.)

Geon (גאון, excellence) is the academic title of the Jewish presidents of the colleges of Sora (q. v.) and Pumbeditha (q. v.). The title originated, according to the Jewish historian Gritz, cfr. A. J. 608. When Ail, the son-in-law and vizier of Mohammed, was elected caliph (A.D. 655), and the Isma'iliyya were divided into two parties, one for and the other against him, both the Babylonian Jews and the Nestorians decided in his favor, and rendered him great assistance. All rewarded Rabbi Isaac, then president of the college of Sora, with the title "Gaon." Accordingly, the word is either of Arabic or Persian origin, and properly belonged to the presidents of the Sura college, who alone bore the appellation at the beginning. The president of the subordinate sister college at Pumbeditha was called the head of the college, נביא עלי by the Babylonians, and the appellation Gaon, whereby the presidents were sometimes styled, obtained at first among the non-Babylonian Jews, who were not thoroughly acquainted with the dignities of the respective colleges in Babylon. It was only after the year 917, when Pumbeditha became of equal importance with Sora, and especially when, after the death of Saadia (q. v.), the college at Sora began to decay altogether, and Pumbeditha continued alone to be the college of the doctors of the law, that the presidents of its college, like those of Sora, were described by the title of Gaon. The period of the Gaonim comprises the time from A.D. 658 to 1040, and is divided into that of the First Gaonim, from A.D. 658 to 760, and that of the Later Gaonim, from A.D. 760 to 1040. The only literary productions of the First Gaonim were the works of the period and original compositions in the favorite form of questions and answers (פָּנָס וָנָפָס). To this period also belongs the beginning of the Neo-Hebrew poetry, or the so-called פְּלִטִין (פִּלִּטִין), a term obviously taken from the Greek, and the poet was, in like manner, called פלטִיון (פַּלְטִיִּי). Now these πληθυντής, written either in the form of the acrostic or arrangement of words, strophes, and lines, or ρῆμα (Ῥήμα) or metre (μετρόν), are to be found in the Maimonides or synagogue rituals of the different countries, and consist of קמחוכ (Kemachoth, i.e. that part of the morning service which comprises the three benedictions) for the morning prayer; Pentecostal Prayer (חֵיחָא וָחָא; Elsevier (Elsevier); Rabbah (Rabbah); Petitiones (Ρηματα), etc. Of the liturist among the later Gaonim, we notice Mar Zemach I, ben-Paltu, of Pumbeditha (872-890), the author of a Talmudic lexicon called "Aruch," which however, is not the same as the Arch of Nathan ben-Jechiel (q. v.). Zemach's lexicon has not yet come to light. Excerpts were published by Rapaport, from the collection made by Saccotto in the Hebrew essays and reviews, called בִּיקּוּרֵה קַטִיטְמ (Vienna, 1880), xi, 81 sq. Other excerpts were published by Geiger in Zeitschrift d. D. M. G. (Leipzig, 1888), xi, 144. Zemach is also supposed to be the author of the chronological account of the Tanaim and Amoraim (תנאים ו硬盘, which was edited by Luzzatto in the Hebrew אוספים, iv, 184, and Contemporary with Paltu was Nachshon ben-Zadok (q. v.) of Sura, A.D. 881-889. Another writer of this period was Simon of Kahana or Meir, in Egypt, who composed a compendium of the most important halachoth from both Talmuds, with the title Great Halachoth (בער יִתֵּנֵה), about the year 900. To this period also belongs Ibn Koreish (q. v.) and Saadia (q. v.). With the latter's death the last sunset light of the Sorian academies had passed away, and by the year 948 the school had to be closed. In order to secure its further existence, four young men were sent out, never to return again, to interest their rabbis co-religionists in this old school of learning. The young men fell into the hands of a Spanish cousin. Among these captives was Moshe ha-Ba'ali (q.v.). While the Sorian school was closed, that of Pumbeditha was presided over before its final close by two men, Shefira Gaon (q. v.) and Habi ben-Sha'ira (q. v.).

With the exception of the authors we have named already, the following are the most important in the Gaonic literature anonymous. We mention מִשְׁרְחַן אָסָף (Misraḥan Esaf), on part of the book of Numbers; the Midrasḥ Ḥa'am (מִדְרֶשׁ חָאָם); the chronicle, entitled הָיְתָה הַמֵּסֶכֶנֶא of Joseph ben-Gorion, which is a translation of an Arabic book of the Maccabees, the Tarikh al-Makkabin, Joseph ibn-Gorion. This book, says Dr. Gritz, was afterwards translated by an Italian Jew, who, by his additions to it, displayed great skill in his Hebrew style, which translation is generally known under the title, Josippon (q. v.). Besides the Josippon or Pseudo-Josephus, we must mention an ethical midrash, entitled תַּמְעָה (Tumucha) or תַּמְעָה (Tumucha) of Judah ha-Levi, the Midrash Tumchuna or Timuchuna Jelumda. (B.P.)

GARAFOLUS, GABRIEL, an Augustinian monk of Italy, who died at Spoleto in 1435, wrote Adversus Heresies, etc., Against the Heretics, etc. He was Abbot of the monastery of Spoleto, and one of the foremost disputants with the heretics. See Ugelli, Italia Sacra; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Garcasius, Johannes, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Dec. 19, 1550, at Hamburg. He studied at Wittenberg, and in 1576 professor of theology and president of the University of Namur, in 1580 vice-chancellor, and first preacher at Brandenburg, and died Jan. 22, 1575. He wrote, De Fregenda Figuris Cateli (Wittenberg, 1556)—: De S. Laurentio Martyre (ibid. 1562)—: De S. Joanne Baptista (ibid. ed.)—: De Mogia ex Orienti (ibid. ed.)—: De S. Martino Episcopo Taronensi (ibid. 1568) —: Commentarius in Hortae de Spiritu et Sempiternitate (1575) —: De Infantifico Heroida (ibid. ed.)—: Collatio summi Pontificia V. et N. T. (Leipzig, 1574). Garcin (de Tassy), Joseph Hélodore Saccard Vervo, a famous French Orientalist, was born Jan. 30, 1794, at Marseilles. In 1817 he went to Paris, where he studied under Sylvester de Sacy. The latter especially interested him in the vulgar Arabic spoken by the Musulmans of India, and to this he devoted himself entirely. A chair for Hindustani was especially created for him at the college in Paris; he succeeded Talleyrand as member of the Academy of Inscriptions, in 1838, and after Mohl's death, in 1876, he was made president of the Asiatic Society. Garcin de Tassy died Sept. 2, 1878. He published, Rudiments de la Langue Hindoustouni (Paris, 1829, with app. posthum., 1844) and Rudiments de la Langue Hindoustouni (Paris, 1847):—Les Oeuvres de Wat, Cible du Poète de Dackan (with a translation, 1834):—Les Aventures de Kurnup (ibid. ed.)—:—an edition of the Penam-Nand of Saadi, "Mantik ul-Atair" (The Language of the Gossips)—:—Dictionnaire des Musulmans (from the Arabic, 1837-40)—:—Poésie Philosophique et Religieuse des Persans (1857)—:—Rhétorique et Proseologie de l'Orient Musulman (1875). Gardiner, John, D.D., an English divine, was born about 1756. He was educated at Tiverton, whence he went to the University of Glasgow, where he studied civil law. He entered himself in the Middle Temple, with a view to qualify for the bar. An irrepressible impulse induced him to exchange the law for the Church, and in consequence he repaired to Wadham College, Oxford. In 1781 he took possession of the vicarage of Shirley and rectory of Draxford, in the county of Derby, the portion to which he was purchased by his father, with whom he afterwards resided for some years at Wellington, performing gratuitously the duty of curate in that parish. In 1789 he undertook the same office at Taunton, and there continued till his father, in 1726, purchased for him the Octagon Chapel at Bath, where he officiated till his death in 1838. He also served as a magistrate for the county of Somerset. Dr. Gardiner published a number of sermons, and led an invaluable life in English, and a volume of Sermons (Bath, 1802, 8vo). See "The Christian Remembrance" (London), Sept. 1838, p. 668; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Gardiner, John Sylvestor, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born at Haverford-West, South Wales, in June, 1765. At the age of five years he was sent by his father to the care of his grandfather, and then a resident of Boston, where he attended school, and after three or four years returned to his father, who was attorney-general on the island of St. Christopher, W. I. Shortly after, John was sent to England, where, from 1776 to 1782, he was a pupil of the famous Dr. Parr. After this he visited his father in the West Indies, and in 1785 went to Boston, which became his permanent home. Partly under the tuition of his father and partly under that of Judge Tudor, he studied law, but abandoned it to enter the ministry, officiating as lay-reader at St. Helen's, 1789, and studying theology. He was ordained deacon in New York City, Oct. 18, 1787, and presbyter, Dec. 4, 1791. For a while he preached at St. Helena, Beaufort, S. C., and then was elected, in 1792, to the presidency of Trinity College, Cambridge, where he remained until 1794. In 1805 he was appointed chaplain to the board of the American Bible Society. He was ordained priest in 1816, and in 1836 was appointed chaplain to the board of the American Bible Society. He was ordained minister in 1816, and in 1836 was appointed chaplain to the board of the American Bible Society.

Gardiner, Richard, an English divine, was born at Hereford in 1591, educated at the school there, and at Christ Church, where he was canon in 1629. In 1630 he was chaplain to Charles I. He died in 1670. In 1645 he published several sermons. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Garnarde, Étienne, a French priest, was prior of the church of Paris, chancellor of the kingdom, and length senescal. Forced, at the end of seven years, to resign these functions, as they were incompatible with the ecclesiastical calling, they transferred them to Amory of Montfort, count of Evrée, without the consent of the king, who seized his chateau at Livry as a punishment, but afterwards consented, about 1192, to receive Garnard and Amory into his favor, on condition that they should resign their claims to the office of senescal. Garnarde died in 1150, at Orleans, where he had consecrated his nephew, Manusse, bishop. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Garnett, Henry Highland, D.D., a colored Presbyterian minister, was born in New Market, Kent Co., Md., April 15, 1815, of parents who escaped from slavery, in 1834, to New Hope, Pa., and the next year came to New York city, where the lad went to school, and at the same time served as a cook. In 1831 he entered a high-school; in 1835 went to Canaan Academy, N. H.; next to Orphan Institute, N. Y.; in 1840 settled as a teacher in Troy; studied theology under Dr. Bonner; was licensed to preach in 1842, and the next year installed pastor of the Liberty Street Presbyterian Church in that city. The same year he delivered an eloquent speech in Buffalo, before the Liberty Party convention. He addressed the state legislature in January, 1844, and in 1846 he presided at the Delavan Temperance Union, at Poughkeepsie. About this time the late Gerrit Smith appointed him an agent for the purpose of distributing a great gift of lands in this state among colored men. In 1850 Dr. Garnett was invited to lect- ure at Oxford in England at the request of the Duke of Kent, and was elected a delegate to the Peace Congress at Frankfort-on-the-Main. At its conclusion he travelled through Bavaria, Prussia, and France. In 1852 he was sent by the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland as a missionary to Jamaica, West Indies. While there he married a young Englishwoman, and the pulpit of the Shiloh Presbyterian Church, then at Prince and Marion Streets, New York, and soon became the leader of the colored population in that city. In 1861 he revisited England, as the president of the African Colonization Society, but soon returned, and volunteered as chaplain to the colored troops at Riker's Island. He early took an active interest in the poorer people of his race, and organized several charitable societies which care for all the colored people who try to support themselves. Dr. Garnett was the first colored man who, on any occasion, spoke in the national capital, where he preached on Sunday, Feb. 12, 1865, in the hall of the House of Representatives. In April of that year he was called by the Fifteenth Street Presbyterian Church of Washington, D. C., and accepted the call, staying there several years. In 1868 he returned to his former church, the Shiloh, and was its pastor until the autumn of 1881, when he accepted the appointment of United States minister and consul to Liberia. He died at Monrovia, Africa, Feb. 13, 1882. See The (N. Y.) Tribune, March 11, 1882.

Garney, Robert Edward, an English divine, was born atbury St. Edmund's, on May 1, 1753, and educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. He was ordained deacon March 3, 1776, and soon after entered into the curacies of Nowton and Great Welnham. He was ordained priest, June 18, 1777; in 1782 became college preacher at Cambridge, and in November, 1797, was advanced into the seniority, but resigned in 1799. He died June 24, 1802. His writings were numerous, but all anonymous.

Garutier, Jean, a French Reformed theologian, was born at Avignon in the beginning of the 18th century, and died at Cassel, in January, 1754. He succeeded the late Pierre Brunelius (q. v.), as pastor of the Church in Strasbourg, which was founded by Calvin in 1538. He rejected with disdain the Interim (q. v.), which Charles V was about to introduce in Strasbourg in 1549. He left the city, but returned in 1552, to leave it again in 1555. In 1555 he was appointed professor of theology at Marburg, and three years later court preacher at Cassel. He published Confession de la Foi Chrétienne de Strasbourg (Strasbourg, 1549, 1552; transl. into English, Lond. 1662) — De Epiistola Pauli ad Hebr. Declamatio (Marburg, 1559). See Strieder, Hist. Garretson, John, D.D., a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, was born at Six-Mile Run, N. J., Nov. 9, 1801. He graduated from Union College in 1823, and from the New Brunswick Theological Seminary in 1826; was licensed by the Classis of New Brunswick, and became missionary to Kinderhook Landing (Stuyvesant) and Columbia city, the N. Y., the same year; at Middleburg in 1827; at Schraalenburg, N. J., in 1833; at Brooklyn, N. Y., among the Classis of New York, in 1833; at Belleville, N. J., in 1837; corresponding secretary of the Board of Domestic Missions in 1849; pastor at Canastota, N. Y., in 1859; at Oswego Outlet in 1861; at Esopus in 1865; also stated supply at St. Remy; at Lawrenceville, Pa. (Presbyterian), in 1866; at Cortlandtown, N. Y., in 1869; then two years without a charge, until he became rector of Hertseg Hall in 1574, where he died. He was clear and discriminating as a preacher, wise in counsel, and of broad and well-wrought plans for the advancement of the Church. See Gorwein.

Garrison, William Lloyd, a leading abolitionist, was born at Newportbury, Mass., Dec. 12, 1804. His mother was early left a widow, and poor, so that the son, after various attempts at learning a trade, was at length apprenticed to a printer in his native town, where he soon began to write for the journals, and in 1826 became proprietor of the Free Press. This not succeeding financially, he started in 1827 the National Philanthropist, in the advocacy of moral reforms, and in 1838 the Liberator, a fierce opponent of slavery, which was continued till the act of emancipation during the civil war. He was often in personal peril by the violence of the friends of slavery. He visited Eng- land several times in furtherance of his principles, and was received there with great enthusiasm. He died May 24, 1879. He published Somnets and Other Poems (1848), and a selection from his Speeches and Writings (1852).

Gartlanid, Francis Xavihr, a Roman Catholic bishop, was born in Dublin in 1605; ordained in the Phila- delphia in 1622; consecrated bishop of Savannah, Ga., Nov. 19, 1850, and died of yellow fever in that city, Sept. 20, 1853. See De Courcy and Shea, Hist. of the Cath. Church in the U. S., p. 167.

GGtinner, Herr von, an eminent German architect, was born at Coblenz in 1752, and while young visited Italy, France, and Spain. He afterwards settled at Munich, and was appointed by Louis I professor of architecture in the Royal Academy of Arts in that city. In 1822 he was appointed director of the state manufactury of porcelain and glass paintings. He erected a number of edifices at Munich, among which were the university, the triumphal gate, the clerical seminary, and the Church of St. Louis. After the departure of Von Constantin to Berlin, Von Gütter became director of the Academy of Fine Arts, having formerly been nominated chief architect and inspec- tor-general of the plastic monuments. He died in 1847.

Gaspari, Johann Baptist von, a German histor- ian, was born in 1702, and died at Vienna in 1768. He wrote, De Trinitatis Aquitabe: — De Protestan- tium Strasburg, and died at Prague in 1762. See L. Gaspari, De Trinitatis Aquitabe: — De Protestan- tium Strasburg, and died at Prague in 1762. (B. P.)

Gaspari, Giovanni, Comte de, an eminent layman of the French Protestant Church, was born at Orange (France), July 12, 1610. He studied law at Paris and took an active part in French politics, and in 1842 he represented Bastia in the House of Deputies. Religious subjects, however, engrossed a large share of his attention. In 1848 he published Intérieur Grémush de l'Europe et de l'Eglise de la Foi: — Un Grand Peuple qui se Relie (1861). He was a member of the Légion d'Honneur, and his English translation was published in New York (3d ed. 1863). Gass, Joachim Christian, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born May 26, 1766. He studied at Halle, was in 1795 military chaplain, in 1807 preacher at Berlin, in 1810 professor of theology at Breslau, and died there, Feb. 12, 1831. A friend and pupil of Schleier- macher, Gass also represented the theology of his master. As a member of his constituency, he was an active part in the ecclesiastical affairs of his province. He wrote, Eiierung von dem Reichstag zu Speyer in Januar 1829 (Breslau, 1829)—Jaehrbiicher des Protestantischen Kirchen- und Schulenwesens von und für Schlesien (1817— 20, 4 vols.)—Ueber das Wesen der Kirchen: — J. Gasset, Vincent, a Roman Catholic prelate, was born in the Tyrol in 1809. In 1866 he was professor of theology at Brixen, member of parliament in 1848, bishop of Brixen in 1856, and prince-bishop in 1859. He died in 1872. He was the head of the Tyrolese Ultramontanists, and also the Jesuits to use their influence in the universities and schools. (B. P.)

Gastaldi, Geronimo, an Italian prelate, was born at Genoa in the early part of the 17th century, of an ancient Genoese family. He embraced the ecclesiasti- cal career, and went to Rome. In 1566, Gastaldi, al- ready a prelate, was designated for the archbishopric of Benevento, with the nomination of general commissary of the hospitals, and was after- wards appointed general commissary of public health, and so faithfully did he perform his duties that he se- cured the archbishopric of Benevento, the cardinalate, and the legation to Bologna. Several monuments erected at his expense at Rome and Benevento attest his charity and munificence. He gave his observa- tions concerning contagious diseases in a work which was published at Bologna in 1604, the year previous to his death, suggesting certain precautions and remedies. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bioe. Gén. (B. P.)

Gastaud, François, a French theologian, was born at Aix about 1660. He entered the congregation of the Oratorians at the age of fourteen, but after five years withdrew, having studied philosophy at Marneilles and theology at Arles. He was ordained priest, and for several years worked at Aix with great success. His brother, a distinguished advocate, having died about 1700, abbé Gastaud, after two years of study, was ap- pointed counsellor to the parliament of Aix, and obtained a license to practice from the court of Rome. He also succeeded his brother in 1717 gained an important suit against the Jesuits. This affair, together with his predilection for the Jansenists, made enemies who at-

Gatian, Saint, apostle of Tournai, was born at Rome, according to the ancient annalists. His arrival among the Gauls took place, according to Gregory of Tours, under the consulate of Decius and Grotius, i.e., in 150 or 231. When he presented himself at the metropolis of Lyons he found his pagan companions to be most part, very docile. He preached during the day in the city or in the country round about, choosing to address the lower class, and at night concealed himself from the violence of enemies. The city of Tours reverenced him as the chief of his bishopric. He labored for five years to diffuse the Christian faith, and at the time of his death, which occurred Dec. 20, 301, the Church of Tours was founded. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale,
s. v.; Smith, Dict. of Christ, Biog. s. v.

Gatti, Bernardo (called Soverio), an eminent Italian painter, was born at Cremona, and was a scholar of Correggio. Some of his best works are his Repose in Egypt, in St. Sigismund's, at Cremona, Christ in the Manger, at St. Peter's, in the same city; and the Dead Christ, in the Magdalen, at Parma. A great number of his works have been taken to other countries, particularly to Spain. He died in 1578. See Hoefer, Nouv.
Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Gatti, Giovanni Andrea, a Sicilian prelate, was born at Messina in 1429. He entered the Dominican order, and, while young, taught in their convent at Messina, excelling all his contemporaries in philosophy and theology, civil and canonical law, belles-lettres and elocution, Greek, and especially familiar with Latin and Hebrew. To his extensive knowledge was added a very remarkable memory. From Messina he went to Rome as professor. Florence, Bologna, and Ferrara enjoyed successively his lectures, which had become celebrated throughout all the scholastic world. He was among the most familiar friends of Bessarion, who caused him to be appointed, in 1468, commendatory abbot of two Benedictine convents in Sicily. According to Fontana, he had already performed the functions of bishop of Messina. Emperor I. conferrd upon him the bishopric of Cefalu, and employed him in various missions to the holy see. The sovereign pontiff promised him the bishopric of Catania by apostolic letters of Dec. 18, 1507; but king Ferdinand objected, and Gatti resigned it. He returned to Cefalu and devoted himself to the administration of his diocese. Feeling that death was near, he resigned his functions in 1548, and went to end his days at the convent of Messina, where he commenced his religious life. He died in 1484, and was interred in the Cathedral of Messina.

Gaucher, Saint, was born at Meulan, Normandy, in 1060. At the age of eighteen, under the direction of Raignier, he resolved to devote himself to prayer and the austerity of penitence in solitude. In the invitation of Humbert, canon of Limoges, he went to Limousin, and there dwelt in a hermitage in the forest of Chavaignac. At the end of three years he obtained from the canons of St. Etienne of Limoges authority to build a monastery in a place known as Salavitas, called el-Muleshah), which falls into the Mediterranean between Gaza and Hebron; whereas Lieut. Conder gives substantial reasons for rejecting this location, and in favor of Tell es-Safak, the Blanche-Garde of the Crusders. This place is described in the Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey (ii, 440).
Gaudenzio, Pagani, a Roman Catholic theologian of Italy, was born at Frosinone, in the canton of Grisons, about 1565. In 1627 he was professor at Pisa, and died Jan. 1, 1649. He wrote, De Dogmatibus et Ritibus Vetus Ecclesiae Hereticorum: De Dogmatum Origine cum Philosophia Platonica Comparatione: Della Morte di S. Giovanni Evangelista Diaconisul, and other works. See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. ii. 899; Jäckel, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Hahn, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s. v.

Gaudioso, Saint, bishop of Tarazona, in Arragon, under king Guendamer, was noted for his bold profession of the orthodox faith. He died in 580, and is commemorated on Nov. 3.

Gauttler, Gottfried, a Lutheran theologian, was born Nov. 17, 1684, and died at Leipzig, magister in 1717, catedratic in 1721, pastor of St. Thomas in 1741, doctor of divinity the same year, and died Feb. 20, 1745, leaving, Disputations de Epistola Christi muñegoc: De Jurisdictionem Dei curar Dominum: De Christo Exegota: Das Leben Ahoa, Kompa in Israel, etc. See Jäckel, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Gaufr, Louis, an eminent French painter, was born at Rochelle in 1761, and studied under Taraval. In 1784 he carried off the grand prize of the Academy for his picture of the Syrophoenician Woman. He went to Rome, and there with the royal pension produced several pictures which greatly increased his reputation. Among his other works are The Roman Matrons Sending their Jewels to the Senate, The Angels Appearing to Abraham, and Jacob and Rachel. He died at Florence, Oct. 20, 1801. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biogr. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Gauli, Giovanni Battista (called Baccio), an eminent Italian painter, was born in 1639, and was instructed in the art in Genoa, after which he went to Rome, where he studied the works of the best masters. The ceiling of the Church del Gesù, at Rome, is his most celebrated performance, representing St. Francis Xavier taken up to heaven. The following are some of his principal pictures: The Madonna and Infant; The Death of St. Servato. He also gained reputation by painting the angels in the dome of St. Agnes. He died in 1663.

Gault, Jean Baptiste, a French prelate, was born at Tours, Dec. 29, 1595. He and his elder brother, Eustache, having in view the ecclesiastical calling, pursued their studies at Le Flêche, then at Paris, and finally at Rome. After a sojourn of eighteen months in the latter city they returned to France, and entered the congregation of the Oratorian. Jean received the order of priesthood at Troyes, and directed successively the houses of his order at Langres, Dijon, and Le Mans. He was also charged with various apostolic missions to Spain and Flanders. His brother, who had shared his religious labors, died the last of April, 1646, and the Cardinal of Merco, St. Lambert (founder of the Abbey de la Couronne, afterwards bishop of Angoulême), and St. Faucier, Gaucher, at that time an octogenarian, returning from Limoges, where he had held an assembly concerning the affairs of his convent, a false step caused him to strike his head violently against a stone, which place is still called Le Pas de St. Gaucher, and where a chapel was erected. This accident caused his death three days later at Auray (1140), whither he had been carried. He was canonized by pope Celestin III, and his remains are in a chapel by St. Stephen, bishop of Limoges, Sept. 18, 1194. In Limousin and Normandy his festival is celebrated April 9. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s. v.

Gautier, John, an eminent English Wesleyan minister, was born at Chester, March 21, 1764. He was converted by remarkable providences, and called to the ministry by Wesley in 1785. He was president of the conference in 1817. In 1855 he was laid aside by a stroke of paralysis, and died at Chelsea, London, June 19, 1859. He had a vigorous understanding, a remarkably retentive memory, and a vivid imagination. In 1812 Gautler revised and republished Rev. David Simpson's Plea for Religion and the Sacred Writings. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1859; Stevenson, Hist. of Day Road Chapel, p. 660 sq.

Gautier, Jacques, a French Jesuit, was born in 1562, died at Grenoble, Oct. 14, 1638, professor of theology and Hebrew. He wrote, Tabula Chronographic a Status Ecclesiae Catholicae: Anatomia Ca lestici: Index Controversiarum ad Evangelia Accommodata. See Alemagne, Bibliothea Scriptorum Societatis Jesu; Jäckel, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Gautier, François Louis, a Jewish theologian, was born at Paris, March 29, 1596. He was rector of Savigny-sur-Orge, and performed for fifty-two years the pastoral functions with great zeal and charity. He died at Paris, Oct. 9, 1780, leaving, Réflexions Chrétiennes sur les hut Biéruitou (Paris, 1778). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Gauthier, Jean Baptiste, a French theologian, was born at Louviers in 1665. He was for a long time connected with Colbert, bishop of Montpellier, whose instructions and mandates he published. After the death of that prelate he settled at Paris. He died Oct. 30, 1755, near Gaillon, leaving a large number of works, directed especially against the Jesuits and infidels. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s. v.

Gauthier, Nicolas, a French controversialist, was born at Rheims in the last quarter of the 16th century. Having renounced the Church of Rome, he went to Se- dan for the study of theology; but suddenly left that place and the Protestant Church, and wrote, Descou- verties des Fraudes Sedonaires (Paris, 1619): - Réponse...

Gauëttier de Contauansy (Lat. de Constantia, or de Constantius), a prelate of Normandy, was born about 1140. Little is known of his life prior to 1173, when he was vice-chancellor of England and canon of Rouen. He was regarded with favor by the king of England, who, in 1177, confined to him a mission to the Court of Flanders, and in 1180 sent him with an embassy to the court of the young king, Philip Augustus. Gautier, who added to his other ecclesiastical honors the canonship of Lincoln and the archdeaconship of Oxford, greatly desired the bishopric of Lisseux, but did not obtain it. A vacancy, however, occurring, he was made bishop of Lincoln, and soon after passed to the metropolitan see of Rouen. From this time the name of the archbishop of Rouen is continually mingled with the policies of the day. In 1188 he agreed to accompany king Henry II on the crusade. In return for services rendered to prince Richard, he was invested with the regency of the kingdom, Oct. 8, 1191. After an absence from his diocese of four years, in which time he had obtained the liberty of the king, who had been a prisoner in Germany, he had to apease some difficulties between the canons and citizens of Rouen. In 1194 the church of St. Ouen of Normandy suffered greatly from the war between the kings of France and England. Gautier defended vigorously the ecclesiastical rights, and sent an interdict to Normandy, which, however, he was unable to sustain. In 1200 he had charge of promulgating the statutes of the bishopric of Poitiers, the interdict sent by Peter of Capua against the king of France. In 1204, Philip Augustus becoming master of Normandy, Gautier solemnly delivered to him the attributes of the ducal crown. He died Nov. 6, 1207. There remain to us only a few letters of Gautier, scattered among the contemporaneous annals of Rouen; of his death, it is said that he also wrote a history of the crusade of Richard, but nothing remains of it. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Gautier de Mortagne (Lat. Wolterus de Mauritium), a French theologian, was born at Mortagne, in Flande, in the early part of the 12th century. He taught rhetoric at Paris, in one of the schools established upon the St. Genevieve mountain. But he soon gave up belles-lettres for theology and philosophy, and taught these two sciences at Rheims, Lyons, and other places. From 1136 to 1148 he had as disciple Jean de Salomon. In 1148 he was consecrated canon of Laon, and became successively dean, and bishop of that church. He died at Laon in 1175. He wrote five short theological treatises in the form of letters, which occupy twenty pages in the Speculum of D' Archery. The more interesting of these letters is addressed to Abelard, who claimed to explain philosophically the mysteries of Christianity. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Gautin, a French prelate, natural son of Hugh Capet, became abbé of Fleury after the death of Abbon in 1006. He sent to Brittany the monk Felix to reform the monastery of Diokles in that country. In 1020, he was raised to the dignity of prelate in this vacancy; but the opposition of the inhabitants hindered him for a long time from taking possession of his see, and only through the intervention of the pope, Benedict II, he entered upon the see in 1014. In 1022 he was at the Council of Orleans, which condemned the heresies of Stephen, and in 1024 at the Council of Paris, where he debated the question of the apostleship of St. Martial. He died in 1080. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Gebhard, John G., an eminent German and Dutch Reformed minister, was born at Waldorf, Germany, Feb. 3, 1730. He received his classical education at the University of Heidelberg, and completed his theological studies at Utrecht, in Holland, where he was licensed in 1771. The same year he emigrated to America, and officiated in the German churches of Whitpain and Worcester, Pa., for three years. In 1774 he removed to New York city, as pastor of the German Church, and in 1776 accepted the call of the Dutch Reformed Church of Claverack, Columbia Co., where he continued until his death, Aug. 16, 1826. Mr. Gebhard mastered the Low Dutch tongue in three months so as to be able to preach in it. He founded the Washingtonian Institute of Claverack in 1777, and was its principal for many years. He was a spirited, earnest, and pietistic preacher, a good theologian, a leader in educational movements, a great lover of peace, a sagacious, prudent adviser, having full control of himself, and large influence over a wide region of country. He threw the whole weight of his character and office into the cause of his adopted country during the Revolutionary war. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church, ii, 226; Zachriske, Claverack Centennial; Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America, s. v.; Magazine of the Ref. Dutch Church, Oct. 1826, p. 282. (W. J. R. T.)

Gebser, August Rudolph, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Jan. 19, 1801, in Thuringia. In 1829 he commenced his academical career at Jena, was in 1839 professor of theology, in 1839 professor, superintendent, and first cathedral preacher at Königsberg.

Geddes, Andrew, a reputable Scotch portrait painter, was born at Edinburgh about 1789, and was early instructed in the art in the academy there. In 1814, he visited London, and about 1825 he was an associate of the Royal Academy, and in 1828 visited Italy, Germany, and France. On his return he painted an altar-piece for the church of St. James at Garlie Hill; also a picture of Christ and the Samaritan Woman. He died in 1844. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, etc.

Gederah (or Gederotham) of Joshua xx, 36. Lestor considers this as agreeing with the position of the ruin Jedirkh, nine miles south of Ludd (Memoirs of the Ordnance Survey, iii, 43). But this is perhaps better suited to the requirements of Gederah (Josh. vii, 41), which Conder (Trans. Work, iii, 336), locates at Katrul in Wady Sura.

Gedicketz, Lambertus, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Gardelegen, in Saxony, Jan. 6, 1663. He studied at Halle, where he was military chaplain in 1709, and died at Berlin, Feb. 21, 1785. He wrote, Prima Veritatis Oedipus der Christi Religion (Berlin, 1717).—Historischer Ueberblick von dem Reformationswerk Lutheri (ibid. 1718).—Erklärung der Lehrer von der wahren Gegenwart des Leibes und Blutes Christi (ibid. 1722).—Christliche und bezügliche Vertiefung der Lutherischen Litaneien. —Abschied von der alten, Rationale Rationes Theologicae zum Heraus. von Huskujer (1726). Geiger, Abraham, a Jewish rabbi of Germany, was born at Frankfurt-on-the-Main, May 24, 1818. He studied at Heidelberg and Bonn, and won a prize for an essay on the question proposed by the Benedictine philosophical faculty, On the Sources of the Koran, which was printed in 1838 with the title, Was hat Mohammed aus dem Judentum aufgenommen? In November, 1852, he was invited to fill the rabbinical chair at Wiesbaden, which he quit in 1859 for Breslau. In 1859 he was elected chief rabbi in his native town, which appointment he held until 1869, when he was called to Berlin, where he died, Oct. 23, 1874. As early as 1858, Geiger published his Wissenschaftliche Zeitschrift für jüdische Theologie, which was discontinued in 1841. In 1862 he began the Jüdische Zeitschrift, a periodical devoted to Jewish literature, but important also for the Christian student. In addition to this he published monographs on Maimonides, on the exegetical school of the rabbis in the north of France, on Elijah del Medi- llo, and on the Kabbala. He contributed also to Hebrew periodicals numerous articles on Rabbinical literature, as well as to the Journal of the German Oriental Society, chiefly on Syrian and Samaritan literature. His Reading-book on the Mishnah is full of valuable and entertaining literary and ethnographical information, and is the highest importance for the appreciation of the particular dialects of the Mishnah and the Talmud. His main work, however, Uebersicht und Uebersetzungen der Bibel (1857), which advocates the theory that the Sadducees derived their name from the high-priest Zadok, contains the results of twenty years' study, and is still very important for Biblical criticisms, especially in reference to the Samaritan text of the Pentateuch, and to that of the Septuagint. Geiger, from the very outset of his career, belonged to the party who were anxious to reform the Greek text in accordance with the necessities of the age, without, however, entirely breaking with the traditions of the past; and though a reformer of the Reformers, yet in his Das Judentum und seine Geschichte (1865-71, 3 vols.), Geiger shows himself a narrow-minded and bigoted Jew, by making Jesus Christ the final and object of human civil and religious aspiration, who never uttered a new thought. After his death, Lud- wig Geiger, a son of Abraham, published Nachgelassene Schriften (Berlin, 1875-77, 5 vols.), containing some older essays, formerly published, and other material since Geiger's death. Geisel, JOHANNES von, a Roman Catholic prelate of Germany, was born Feb. 15, 1796. In 1818 he received holy orders, and in 1819 proceeded to the sacred ordination in Speyer, and in 1822 member of the chapter, in 1836 dean, and in 1887 bishop of Speyer. In 1842 he became the caudunator of the archbishop of Cologne, in 1846 his successor, and died Sept. 8, 1864. Geisel was one of the main promoters of Ultramontanism in Germany, especially in Prussia, and the pope acknowledged his endeavors by making him cardinal in 1850. Geisel's writings and addresses were published by Dumont (Cologne, 1869-76, 4 vols.). See Remling, Kardinal von Geisel, Bischof von Speyer und Erzbischof von Köln (Speyer, 1873); Baudet, Der Erzbischof von Köln, Kardinal von Geisel und sein Zeitalter (Cologne, 1882). (B. F.)

Geissenhainer, FREDERICK W., D.D., a Lutheran minister, son of REV. Frederick W. Geissenhainer, a distinguished Lutheran preacher, was born at New Harrower, Montgomery Co., Pa., June 28, 1797. He came to New York city with his father, at the early age, and was licensed as a minister in 1816. His first pastorate was at Vincent, Chester Co., Pa., where he remained ten years. Fourteen years following he was pastor of St. Matthew's Church (English), in Walker Street, New York city. The congregation of Christ Church at that time possessed the property of St. Matthew's, and took that name. Dr. Geissenhainer then founded a new organization, and established the Church known as St. Paul's. The preaching was in a hall on Eighty Avenue; but the church was erected in 1845, on the corner of Eighty Avenue and Fifteenth Street, mainly through the liberality of Dr. Geissenhainer himself. It was a large and handsome stone structure. The organization began with eleven poor families, but soon increased to 1500 communicants. During the last three years of his life he was aided by his son, in the pastorate. As preacher, he was terse, vigorous, and powerful, having complete control of the English and German languages. He died in New York city, June 2, 1878. See Lutheran Observer, July 4, 1879.

Geijroed, in Norse mythology, was a mighty giant who once outwitted the cunning Loke, but at last fell by the power of Thor.

Gelder, ARNOLD VAN, an eminent Dutch painter, was born at Dort in 1645, and acquired the elements of design under Samuel van Hoogstraten, but afterwards went to Amsterdam and entered the school of Rembrandt. Among his principal historical works are a picture of the Reapers, representing Solomon on his Throne surrounded by his Soldiers, at the Hague, A Jewish Synagogue. His master-piece was a picture at Dort, representing Bathsheba Entering David to Leave his Kingdom to Solomon. His last work was the Sufferings of Christ. He died at Dort in 1727. See Hoefer, New. Biogr. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biogr. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Gelderman, VINCENT, a reputable Flemish painter, was born at Mechlin in 1539. Among his best works is a picture of Susanna and the Elders, and a Return from the Cross, in the cathedral at Mechlin.

Gelent, NICOLAS, bishop of Angers, was born about 1223. In 1250 he succeeded Michael de Villorieux, and during each of the thirty years of his episcopacy he held synods, whence emanated the statutes which D'Achery has collected in his Sicilicopism, which are of interest as giving a knowledge of the course of that period in all kinds of all kinds which the episcopal authority strove in vain to repress. Gelent died Feb. 1, 1290. See Hoefer, New. Biogr. Générale, s. v.

Gelouien (or Gheylouen), ARNAUDEL, a Dutch theologian, was born at Rotterdam, and lived at the close of the 15th century. He was a minister at the Augustinian order, at the monastery of Volnert, where he died in 1442. He wrote a moral treatise, entitled Two Oeuvres, Sire Speculacum Conscientiae (Brussels, 1476), which was the first book issued from the press of the Frères de la Vraie, and introduced the art of typography at Brussels. See Hoefer, New. Biogr. Générale, s. v.

Gélu, Jacques, a French prelate, was born in the diocese of Treves about 1370. He studied at Paris, where his talents attracted the attention of the duke of Orleans, the brother of Charles VI, who took him into his service. After the assassination of the duke of Orleans by the duke of Bourgogne, Gélu entered the service of the king, was in 1407 president of the parliament of the Dauphiné, and in 1414 archbishop of Tours. He attended the council at Constance, and was also present at the concile held in 1417. In 1425 being intrusted by the dauphin with a mission. In 1421 he left Naples, retired to his episcopal seat, and died Sept. 17, 1492. When in 1429, he was asked by the court of France concerning the validity of the revelations of Jeanne d'Arc, he spoke very favorably of her divine mission, and remarked that God has revealed himself more than once to virgins, as, for example, to the sibyl. See Martène, Thesaurus Illi; Boulliot, Biogr. Arden. (1880), i, 490; Paulmier, in Lichtenberger's Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.; Hoefer, New. Biogr. Générale, s. v. (B. F.)

Gematria, a word borrowed from the Greek, either meaning a corresponding to the number, or, as phasisqurias, denotes, among the Cabalists, a rule according to which the Scripture was explained. The idea of this rule was, since every letter is a numeral, to reduce the word to the number it contains, and to explain the word by another of the same quantity. Thus, from the words,
"Lo! three men stood by him" (Gen. xviii, 2), it is deduced that these three angels were Michael, Gabriel, and Raphael, because הוהי הבשלהי, and lo! three men, and אלהי הכהנים בירח, these are Michael, Gabriel, and Raphael, are of the same numerical value, as will be seen from the following reduction to their numerical value of both these phrases:

\begin{align*}
5 + 100 + 300 + 80 + 800 + 5 + 60 + 5 + 6 &= 701 \\
5 + 10 + 100 + 200 + 30 + 80 + 1 + 20 + 10 + 40 + 6 + 80 &= 692 \\
1 + 10 + 80 + 200 + 400 + 6 &= 701.
\end{align*}

From the passage, "And all the inhabitants of the earth were of one language" (Gen. xi, 1), is deduced that all spoke Hebrew: דודל the syllable being changed for its synonym דודה, and סדר 5 + 100 + 4 + 80 = 409, is substituted for its equivalent סדר = 1 + 8 + 400 = 409. Or the word שד in the passage, "For behold, I will bring forth my servant, the Branch" (Zech. iii, 8), must mean the Messiah; for it amounts numerically to the same as שד כבי = 888. So שדכבי must be the Messiah. See CAMEL (B. P.).

Gemblot, Laurence, archbishop and grand-chancellor of Poland, was born about 1500. He commenced his studies at Posen, and completed them at Ingolstadt. He was sent as ambassador to Rome to Pope Clement VIII. Returning to Poland, he made abbot of Kelm and Chelmno, and in 1609 became grand-chancellor of the crown. In 1618 he obtained the bishopric of Kutawa, and in 1626 was made archbishop of Gnesen, and primate of the kingdom, the highest ecclesiastical dignity in Poland. He died in 1624, leaving Exhortatio ad Principes Poloniae, cum a S. R. M. Omnium Incepti Regni Poloniae Ordinarum Consensis, etc. See Holder, Nouvelle Biographie Générale, s. v.

Gems, in Ecclesiastical Art. Precious stones were employed in very early times for a great variety of ecclesiastical purposes, some articles, such as chalices, etc., being made wholly of stones more or less precious, and others, such as altars, etc., being decorated therewith. The most artistic purpose, however, was their use for seals, especially for engraving emblems of a religious character, chiefly taken from Scripture, particularly the fish, the dove, the lamb, a ship, or some other emblematic device. Occasionally a historical subject is attempted. The monogram of Christ almost always appears on them.

GEMS, THE THREE SACRED, among the Buddhists, are Bodhisattva, the sacred books, and the priesthood. Their worship is universal among the Buddhists, and they constitute the sacred triad in which these people place all their trust. The assistance they derive from the triad is called karana (protection), which "is said to destroy the fear of reproduction, or successive existence, and to take away the fear of the mind, the pain to which the body is subject, and the misery of the four hells." By reflecting on the three gems, scepticism, doubt, and reasoning will be driven away, and the mind become clear and calm. See Hardy, Eastern Monarchies, p. 166, 169.

Generation, Eternal, is a term used as descriptive of the Father’s communicating the divine nature to the Son. On this subject we excerpt the following remarks from Buck’s Dict. of the Bible, ed. Henderson:

"The Father is said by some divines to have produced the Word, or Son, from all eternity, by way of generation; on which occasion the word generation raises a peculiar idea: that process which is really effected in the way of understanding is called generation, because, in virtue of the Word becomes like him from whom he takes the original; or, as St. Paul expresses it, the figure or image of his substance: i.e. of his being and nature. Hence it is, they say, that the second person is called the Son; and that in such a way and manner as never any other was, is, or can be, because of his own divine nature, being the true, proper, and natural Son of God, begotten by him before all worlds. Thus, he is called his own Son (Rom. viii, 3); his only begotten Son (John iii, 16). Many have attempted to explain the manner of this generation by different similitudes; but as they throw little or no light upon the subject, we shall not trouble the reader with them. Most modern divines believe that the term Son of God refers to Christ as mediator; and that his sonship does not lie in his divine or human nature separately considered, but in the union of both in one person (see Luke i. 35; Matt. iv. 1; John i. 49; Matt. xvi. 16; Acts ii. 29, 32; Rom. i. 4). It is observed that it is impossible that a nature properly divine should be begotten, since begetting, whatever idea is annexed to it, must signify some kind of production, derivation, and inferiority; consequently, that whatever is produced must have a beginning, and whatever had a beginning was not from eternity, as Christ is said to be (Col. i. 16). That the sonship of Christ respects him as mediator, will be evident, if we compare John x. 28, with John xiv. 28. In the former it is said, ‘I and my Father are one;’ in the latter, ‘My Father is greater than I.’ These declarations, however opposite they seem, equally respect him as the Mediator of the Son; but if his sonship primarily and properly signifies the generation of his divine nature, it will be difficult, if not impossible, according to that scheme, to make them harmonize. duties with extraordinary wisdom and devotion. He applied all his power against the heresies of Norian and Jovinian, founded the abbey of Moulien, as well as the hospital of St. Esprit, at Clermont, and the Church of St. Symphorien, where he ministered, and which from that time bore his name. He is honored June 3. The Bollandists have published his deeds, and committed the authenticity of other acts collected by various authors. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Smith, Dict. of Christ, Biog. s. v.

GENIUS, Soist, thirty-eighth bishop of Lyons, was prior of the celebrated abbey of Fontenelle, founded in the 7th century. He employed himself in repairing several monasteries, among which were those of Corbie and Fontenelle. On being made archbishop of Lyons, he showed great ability in that office, but finally retired to the abbey of Chelsea, where he died in 679. He is honored Nov. 8. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Smith, Dict. of Christ, Biog. s. v.

GENETHILLA (Gevetih, birthday-fasts), the festivals among the early Christians held on the anniversary of the death of any martyr, terming it his birthday (q. v.), as being the day on which he was born to a new and higher state of being.

Genga, Bartolomeo, an eminent Italian architect, son of Girolamo Genga, was born at Urbino in 1518, and was instructed by Vasari and Ammanati, after which he visited Rome. He erected the church of San Pietro, at Mondovi, which surpasses, says one master, any other edifice of its size in Italy. He died at Malta in 1558. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Genga, Girolamo, an Italian painter and eminent architect, was born at Urbino in 1476, and studied successively under Luca Signorelli and Pietro Perugino. Most of his works have perished, but mention is made of some historical subjects in the Petronii palace at Siena, The Resurrection and The Assumption. As an architect he gained considerable eminence, and was more employed in this capacity than as a painter. At Pesaro he restored the court of the palace, built the Church of San Gio. Battista, and erected the façade of the cathedral. He died in 1531. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

GENIUS, in Roman mythology. The belief in invisible protecting spirits, or beings who care for the welfare of single persons, is found among many people and nations, but nowhere was the doctrine of genius so perfect as in Rome; there was a distinct belief in deities, who were given to every man from the time of birth. These deities were worshipped partly on general festive days, partly each for himself. Thus a genius was especially a protecting spirit of man. This belief extended still further; every important work and object had its genius or genii.

GENIUS OF THE EMPEROR. In the early centuries of the Church, one of the tests by which Christians were detected was, to require them to make oath "by the genius or the fortune of the emperor?" an oath which the Christians, however willing to pray for kings, constantly refused, as savouring of idolatry. Thus Polycarp was required to swear by the fortune of Caesar; and Sertiusius, adjured Spurius, one of the martyrs of Seilin, "at least swear by the genius of our king," to which he replied, "I do not know the genius of the em-pereor of the world."

Figures of Antonius Pitts and his Wife Paunstum.
(From a Monument in Rome.)

Minucius Felix reproaches the delirium of the em-pereor, and the heathen practice of swearing by his "genius" or "daemon;" and Tertullian says, that although Christians did not swear by the genius of the Caesar, they swore by a more august oath, "by their salvation." We do not, says Origen, swear by the em-pereor; but we will swear more than by any other reputed deities; for (as some at least think) they who swear by his fortune swear by his daemon, and Christians would die rather than take such an oath.

Gen. Ko, a Buddhist monk, was born at Sak-Syoun about A.D. 1132. He introduced a new Buddhist doctrine into Japan, which soon attracted a great number of disciples. A woman of the court of the mikado was converted to this religion, which circumstance protected great excitement, and a sentiment of hatred, mingled with an impetuous desire for vengeance in the heart of the mikado. Gen-Ko was banished, one of his most ardent disciples put to death, and others persecuted. He died A.D. 1212. See Hoefer, Nouv.

Gentile, Luigi Primo, a reputable Italian painter, was born at Brussels in 1666; acquired the elements of design and then visited Italy, where he gained a high reputation. He resided at Rome for thirty years, and was admitted to the Academy of St. Luke in 1650. Among his works are the picture of St. Ambrose, in San Marco, at Rome; also The Nativity and St. Stefano, in the Cappuccini at Pesaro.
One of his best productions is a picture of The Crucifixion, in the chapel of the Trinity, in the Church of St. Michael at Ghent. He died at Brussels in 1657.

Geoffery of Coldingham, an ecclesiastical Anglo-Norman historian, lived at the commencement of the 12th century. Associated with Durham, he obtained the position of sacristan in the priory of Coldingham, in Scotland. He wrote A Short History of the Church of Durham, from 1152 to 1214, which work was first published by Wharton. Raine has given a more complete edition in his Historia Dunelmensis Scriptorum Treas

Geoffrey (or Stephen) of Llandaff, was brother of Urban, and was consecrated bishop of that see in 1107. He wrote a Life of the Welsh saint Telvou, or Geoffroy Baron, a French ecclesiastical writer, lived at the commencement of the 12th century. He was one of the most celebrated scholars, or master professors, of the school of Angers. He succeeded in this office Marboile, who was ordained bishop of Rennes in 1096. Little is known of his life, excepting that under his direction the school of Angers flourished, and that he still lived in 1110. There is no foundation for the belief of Pitts, that Geoffroy was English. There is a commentary preserved in the Abbey of Citeaux with this inscription, Gaufriedi Hobinius super Mathemat.

Geoffroi de Bar (Lat. Gaufroidus de Barro), a French prelate, was born in the early part of the 13th century. Doctor of theology, canon, archdeacon, and, after 1273, dean of the Church of Paris, he was appointed cardinal by pope Martin IV, March 25, 1281.
He died at Rome, Aug. 21, 1283. For mention of his writings, see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Geoffroi de Beaure, a French hagiographer, was born near the commencement of the 13th century. He entered the Dominican order, and more than two-ty years performed the functions of almoner, confessor, and intimate counsellor to Louis IX, whom he accompanying in the crusade of 1248, sharing his captivity, and with whom he returned to France in 1254. He also took part in the crusade of 1270, and assisted at the last moment of Louis IX. Returning to France, he wrote, by order of pope Gregory X, the life of the saint. He died about 1274. Geoffroi was not a polished historian; he was a religious hagiographer, who kept within the bounds of collecting the religious customs, the prayers, the confessions, the austerities of the monarch, and all the acts of piety and charity which gained

Geoffroi Cou de Cerc (Colum Cerc), a French
prelate, was born in the latter half of the 11th century. He embraced the religious life, and was successively prior of St. Nicäe of Rheims, and abbot of St. Medard of Soissons. When Abelard was confined in this abbey, Geoffroi loaded him with kindness, and the illustrious philosopher caused the remembrance to be handed down to posterity. Geoffroi revived the love and culture of letters in the convents of the order of St. Benedict, preaching in all the re-establishment of monastic discipline. In 1121 he became bishop of Châlons, at the wish of St. Bernard, his friend. Nine years later he assisted at the Council of Sens, and, in spite of his affection for Abelard, he could not but adhere to the judgment passed against him by this assembly. He died at Mortain, 1143. Of three letters written by him, the first is found in the Bibliotheca Clarissimæ of Duchesne, the second in the Spicilegium of D'Achery, and the third in the Miscellanea of Baluze. For other works see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Geoffroi d'Ev, a French prelate, was born at Ev near the close of the 12th century. He pursued his studies at the University of Paris, where he first took the degree of doctor of theology, then that of doctor of medicine. He was appointed canon of the Church of Amiens, and in 1222 was raised to the episcopal see of that city. He patronized the celebrated archtect, Robert de Luzarches, and caused the work on the cathedral of Amiens to be executed in the space of ten years. He died at Amiens, Nov. 25, 1286. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Geoffroi de Lèves, a French prelate, was born in the latter half of the 11th century. After the death of Yves, bishop of Chartres, the chapter of this Church elected Geoffroi to succeed him. Count Thibault, indignant at this election, concerning which he had not been consulted, drove the new bishop from the city, and pillaged the houses of the canons who had given him their votes. Robert of Arbrisselles appealed the count, and Geoffroi, a peaceable possessor of his bishopric, was consecrated at Rome by Pascal II., in 1116. He assisted at several councils, and distinguished himself by his eloquence. He had a contest with Geoffroi of Vendôme, relative to the privileges of this abbey. If we may credit Abelard, the bishop of Chartres was the only one, at the Council of Sens, in 1121, who did not wish to be of which he was the object. Nevertheless, twenty years later, he signed the condemnation of this philosopher. In 1127 he accompanied Étienne de Senlis, bishop of Paris, to Rome, and in 1132 he received the authority of legate, in which position he was to contest the candidature of Aquitania, of the antipope Anacletus, and, with the aid of St. Bernard, succeeded in restoring to the subjection of pope Innocent, duke William, whom the bishop of Angoulême had involved in the schism. He received from the holy see various missions for the extirpation of schism and heresy, and always conducted himself in an irreproachable manner in the exercise of these functions. He died Jan. 24, 1149. Some of his letters and charters have been collected in the Gallia Christiana. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Geoffroi du Loroux, a French prelate, was born at Loroux (Lorotariurn), a town of Touraine, near the close of the 11th century. He distinguished himself by his knowledge of theology, and it is believed that he publicly taught this science at Poitiers. In 1131 St. Bernard wrote to engage him to publicly take part in theIconoclasts against Anacletus. In 1135 he was elected bishop of Poitiers. Allied in friendship with (Geoffroi, bishop of Poitiers, and attempted to preserve him at the Council of Rheims, in 1148, from ecclesiastical censure. Two years before he had presided, as legate of the holy see, at the Council of Beauvais, where the divorce of Louis the Younger and Eunoia was published. He died at Bordeaux, July 18, 1158. Five letters of his remain, addressed to Sugyr, and collections by Duchesne, Scriptores, iv, 500-506, etc. Some manuscript sermons are attributed to him, and a commentary on the first fifty Psalms of David, written in Latin, appears in the edition of Duchesne. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Geoffroi de Maçon, a French theologian of the 12th century, was one of the twenty-nine persons commendable for their birth and knowledge, whom Bernard, on his voyage to Flanders about 1146, decided to embrace the Franciscan life in the presence of St. Francis, a year later, prior of this abbey, and refused the bishopric of Tournay. He still lived in 1171. For mention of his works, see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Geoffroi de Vendôme (Lat. Gaufriedus Vindémianus), a French cardinal, was born at Angers in the latter half of the 11th century, probably of one of the important families of Anjou. Being placed while very young in the monastery of La Trinité de Venâme, he there distinguished himself by his firmness of character and the extent of his knowledge, so that he was promoted from the rank of novitiate to the dignity of abbot, Aug. 21, 1088. The year following he went to Rome, where Urban II. made him a cardinal, with the title of St. Prisus. In 1094 he was at Saumur among the prelates charged by the pope with acquitting Foulques of Anjou. In 1096 he assisted at the Council of Clermont, and in 1097 was found at the Council of Saintes. In 1115 (Geoffroi engaged in a quarrel with Geoffroi, abbot of Angers. The legate Umbald called him, in 1126, to the Council of Orleans, but he responded to him that an abbot of Vendôme, vassal of the holy see, obeyed the orders of the pope, and not those of a bishop or any other apostolic mandator. He was endowed with brilliant qualities, and would have occupied the highest positions in the Church had he been less imperious and sullen. He died at Angers, March 26, 1132. His writings were collected and published, in 1610, by P. Sarmond. This collection offers five books of letters, six treatises, and various dogmatic subjects, hymns, and sermons. The master which he most often treated of was that of investitures. A Commentaire sur les Pasques is unpublished. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Geoffroi (or Godefroi) de St. Victor, a French ecclesiastical writer of the 12th century, was canon of the abbey of St. Victor at Paris, but information concerning his life is wanting, except that he taught literature and philosophy for a long time before retiring to the cloister. Some regard him as the same person as a sub-prior of St. Barbe, bearing the same name, and of whom several letters were published by D. Martemine. Various works of the latter exist in manuscript at the Imperial Library; for further mention see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Geoffroi du Vignois, a French chronicler of the 12th century, was born at Clermont d'Excideuil (Périgord) about 1140. He was educated at Limoges, and there received the monastic consecration in 1159, was ordained priest at Benenetus, abbey of Marche du Limousin, in 1167, by Gerard, bishop of Cahors, and appointed prior of Vigeois, in Lower Limousin, June 14, 1178. The details of his life are found only in his history, and in a most important one upon the history of Perigord and Limousin. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Geomancy (from γῆ, the earth, and πρωτος, divination), one of the four kinds of divination (q. v.) mentioned by Varro.

George is the name of numerous early ecclesiastics, among whom the following may be mentioned: (1) The second patriarch of Alexandria by that name, A.D. cir. 611; (2) first patriarch of Antioch by that name, A.D. cir. 645; (3) patriarch of the Nestorians, A.D. 660; (4) second patriarch of Antioch by that name, A.D. cir. 680; (5) the forty-fourth bishop of Constantinople, and first patriarch of that see, in 1098-99.
GEORGE

at Trebizond near the commencement of the 15th century.
He was esteemed by John Palaeologus II, emperor of Constantiople, whom he accompanied to the Council of Florence in 1439. On his return to Trebizond, he performed historical duties for the emperor. After the taking of Trebizond by the Turks, in 1461, he was in favor with the sultan, Mahomet II, and obtained an important place in the seraglio. He died about 1465, having embraced Mohammedanism.
He wrote a work entitled, Ad Testamentum Novum Ducum, related against the union of the two churches, from which Alattus has given extracts in his De Consensus Uniusque Ecclesiae. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale,

George of Cyprus (afterwards called Gregory), patriarch of Constantinople, was born in the early part of the 13th century. He occupied an important position at Constantinople at the time of the accession of Andronicus Palaeologus the elder, in 1289. He was a man of learning and eloquence, and revived the Attic dialect, which had for a long time fallen into disuse.
Under the reign of Michael Palaeologus, father of An-dronicus, he was in favor of the union of the Greek and Latin churches, which Michael greatly desired. But the accession of Andronicus, who was opposed to this union, modified his sentiments. At the death of Joseph, Andronicus was called to the vacant see. The emperor, desiring to put an end to the existing troubles concerning the union of the two churches and the schism caused by the deposition of Armenians, patriarch of Constantiople in 1286, wished to place a layman in the position; therefore George was rapidly advanced through the various degrees of monk, deacon, priest, and consecrated patriarch in April, 1288, under the name of Gregory. The Armenians at first refused to recognize him, and at length were excommunicated by him.
He severely punished the adherents of John Becius, or Vecuss, ex-patriarch, and zealously advocated the union of the Greek and Latin churches, which sentiment appeared particularly dangerous to Gregory.
He expressed his opinions upon this subject in a book, titled, Έξωχρις τού τόμου τῆς πιστίως, which excited so much opposition that he was obliged to abandon his see in 1289, and accordingly retired to a monastery.
He died the following year, and his death is believed to have been caused by a chill or fever. For his trans-

George (Saint), named Mihail Mihailović, abbot of Mile-Timirida, was born in Thrialet about 1014.
He was at the age of seven years consecrated to the monastic life. Carried to Constantinople by the Greeks, who took him prisoner in 1021, he remained there twelve years, and obtained a thorough knowledge of the sciences and the Greek language. Returning to Georgia, he entered a monastery, from which he went forth privately to make a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, and afterwards to Mt. Athos, where in seven years he translated a large part of the Bible into the Georgian language. The remainder of his life was spent in an analogous occupation. He composed a life of St. Euthymius, some theological treatises, and translated a large number of works of the Greek fathers. About 1051 he became abbot of the Georgian convent of Mt. Athos, called Myla Temis, where he died and was canonized by the emperor Constantine Monomachus. King Bagrad IV offered him the bishopric of Mingrelia, but he declined, and even abandoned the office of abbot, returning to a monastery in Tauris. In 1059, king Bagrad put him under a charge of the education of his son, George II. In 1072, George II was consecrated June 28 or 29. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, v.

George of Nicomedia, a Byzantine theologian, who lived in the latter half of the 9th century, was keeper of the archives of the great church of Constan-tiople. He was the friend and correspondent of Pho-tius, and became archbishop of Nicomedia. Several of his homilies and three of his hymns are found in the Novum Auctarium of Combes, vol. i. Combes confounded the author with George the Pisanian. In the unpublished works of George we mention a chronicle, but it is difficult to distinguish between this and the chronicles of the other Georges. See Hoefer, Nouv.

George the Sinner (Ἀμαρωλός), a Byzantine chronicler, lived near the middle of the 9th century.
He wrote a chronicle which extended from the creation down to the reign of Michael III, son of Theophilus and Theodora. This man must not be confounded with other Georges who also wrote chronicles, as George Cedrenus, George Synceleus, George of Nicomedia, and George the Monk. The chronicle of George was copied by Cedrenus, Theophanu, and Michael Glycas. See

George (Керкеш), patriarch of Armenia, succeedsed Sophomon A.D. 792. He died in 795, and was successed by Joseph II. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale,

George II, patriarch of Armenia, was born at Karni. Educated in the patriarchal palace, he was raised to the patriarchate in 876, after the death of Zachary III. He was a poor man, who had got nothing well his Church. He was one of the principal signers of the petition addressed to the caliph, requesting the title of king for the prince Achod, governor of Armenia.
Being sent as ambassador by Sempad, successor of Achod, to Akhbar, the Arab general who came to intrude Armenia, he was retained as a captive, and did not regain his liberty until near the conclusion of the treaty, and by means of a ransom. He died in 897. He is the author of a letter addressed to John, a Syrian patriarch, in which he expresses the rites of the Armenian Church. His successor was Marahel III (Ekhardt-

George III was born at Lorhi, and occupied the patriarchal see of Armenia from 1071 to 1073. When Gregory II had abdicated, in order to retire to the Black Mountain, in the Taurus, George, who had been his secretary, was elected patriarch. Irritated because a great number of priests still addressed Gregory II as the true patriarch, he treated with great severity those who denied the regularity of his election. Being deposed in 1073, he retired to Tarsus, where he soon after ended his days. Gregory II took the place which George III had occupied for two years. See Hoefer,

Georges, Jean François, a French ecclesiastic and diplomatist, was born at Bruyères, Lorraine, Jan.
19, 1731. He entered the Jesuit order, taught, with some success, rhetoric and mathematics, in the colleges of Pont-à-Mousson, Dijon, and Strasbourg, and later became secretary to Rohan, ambassador to Vienna. In 1774 he became vicar-general, and administered the diocese of Strasbourg. He afterwards retired to Freiburg, and occupied himself in editing his Mémoires, until the grand-prior of Malta called him to his aid.
He refused a bishopric, preferring the office of vicar-general of Vosges, and a quiet dwelling in the little village of Bruyères, where he died, Nov. 14, 1818, leaving six volumes of memoirs in MS, published by his nephew (Paris, 1817 or 1820). See Hoefer,

Georges, Dominique, a French theologian, was born at Curi, near Longwy, Lorraine, in 1613. He completed his course of philosophy at the College of the Jesuits at Pont-à-Mousson, entered orders, and was appointed, in 1637, curate of Circourt. Some time after he returned to Paris, went into the community of St. Nicolas-du-Chardonnet, and later into the abbey of the reformed Cistercians. At the age of forty years he was placed in charge of the abbey of Val Richer. In 1664 he was sent with the abbots of La Trappe to Rome, to solicit a general reform of the order of Citeaux. On his return he established this reform in his abbey at Val Richer, which was a cause of some extreme austerity that many were unable to follow it, and he was obliged to modify it. He died Nov. 8, 1693. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Georgi, Christian Shomund, a Lutheran theologian, was born at Luckau, July 20, 1701. He studied at Wittenberg, and commenced his academic career in 1723, was professor of philosophy in 1726, professor of theology in 1728, and was honored with the doctorate of divinity in 1748. He died Sept. 6, 1717, leaving De Chaldeographismis, Robbaminis et Persaminis (Wittenberg, 1726);—De Ebraroma, Nori Test. (ibid. 1726-27);—De Dialecto Nori Testamenti (ibid. 1730);—De Italo-Latincis Nori Text. (ibid., ed.);—De Persa-Nori Test. (ibid. 1731);—De Latincis Graeca Nori Federis (ibid. 1732);—De Judicium Nori Testamenti ad Ebraroma (ed.);—Hierocritica Nori Testamenti (ibid. 1733);—De Non Servata ad Varias Vet. et Nori Text. Georgius, Adolph S., a Platonist, was born in 1681, in Moravia. In 1695 he joined his order, was its general in 1724, and died as bishop of Raab, Nov. 24, 1748. He wrote, Ревизия, i.e. teacher and witness (Frankfort, 1711; a work written in Hebrew for the conversation of the Jews, which he had formerly published in Latin. Gerald, abbot and bishop of Mayo, is believed to have been of Saxon lineage, and to have accompanied Colman from Lindisfarne in 664. He is commemorated on March 33.

Geraldin, Alexandre, a Nepotian prelate, first bishop of Hispaniola, afterwards San Domingo, then Haiti, was born in 1455 at Amelia (Umbria). He belonged to a noble family, and devoted himself to the service of Spain. His brother having been sent on a mission to Francis II, duke of Brittany, Alexandre accompanied him, and remained in France until September, 1496. On his return, he was appointed the tutor of the princes, and obtained aid for Christopher Columbus for his voyage of discovery. He was afterwards charged with several diplomatic missions. He first obtained the bishopric of Voltterra, then of Monte Cervino (1494). In 1520 he was appointed to the bishopric of Hispaniola. He immediately retired to his new diocese, where he employed himself with true evangelical zeal until his death, which occurred in 1525. For mention of his works, see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Gerard of Douay, third son of Wantar III, lord of Douay, lived in the 13th century. He was priest and canons of the Church of Senlis, and bishop of Chalons-sur-Marne. He met at Douay, Oct. 17, 1266, with the bishops of Arras and Tournay, in order to remove the body of St. Ame, which the three bishops bore upon their shoulders from the Church of St. Ame of Douay to a small hill situated on the outskirts of a city upon the road to Arras. He was one of the benefactors of the abbey of Chimounin, to which he left a goodly number of manuscripts. He resigned his bishopric in 1219, and retired to the abbey of Toussaint, near where he died some years later. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Gerard of Liern, a Dominican, was born about 1220. He aided in the establishment of the Fête-Dieu, and died about 1276. He wrote several religious works. De Doctrinia Cordis gained great popularity, as attested by the large number of manuscripts. It was published several times, and translated into French by W. Colet (Douay, 1601; Lyons, 1608). His Sermones and De Testamento Christi, with others of his writings, are forgotten. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Gerard (Saus) of Toul, was born in 955, of a patrician family. While very young he entered the chapter of St. Peter of Cologne, his native city, in order to pursue his studies, and at the age of twenty-eight was promoted to the episcopal see of Toul. Consacrated at Treves in 968, and enthroned the same year, he led an upright, charitable, and studious life, and devoted himself very closely to the instruction of the numerous pupils under his care. He labored throughout his diocese, scattering the word of God, and aiding those of his subjects who were impoverished by war or pestilence. He spent as little time as possible at the imperial court, notwithstanding the wish of Otto II to the contrary. He visited Rome, and in company with twelve persons who travelled on foot in procession, went from Toul to the tomb of the apostles Peter and Paul, the principal object of their devotion. On his return to Toul, he was granted authority that enabled him to exercise the episcopal power, which he had committed to the hands of his brother. Gerard died April 22, 994, was canonized fifty-seven years afterwards, and pope Leo IX, Oct. 22, 1051, removed his remains. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Gerard, John. See GERHARD, JOHANN.

Gerard, Mark, a reputable Flemish painter, engraver, and architect, also an illuminator and a designer, flourished about 1590. He went to England about 1589, and was appointed painter to queen Elizabeth. As a designer, he executed a set of fourteen plates on the Passion of Christ. He died in 1598. He is said to have been an able architect, but none of his works are mentioned.

Gerafixm, a celebrated anchorite of Palestine to the middle of the 5th century, was a native of Syria, who embraced the views of theotokos of Jerusalem, but was restored to the true faith by Euthymius. He founded a large laura near the Jordan, characterized by extreme austerity, and died there, March 4, A.D. 675.

Gerard, Saint, born at Aurillac about 855, of one of the most powerful families of Auvergne, was lord of the southern part of Upper Auvergne, and his domains extended nearly to Perigord and Aquitania. He devoted himself to the study of sacred books, and finally desired to withdraw to a cloister and devote all his wealth to the Church of Rome, but was deterred from this by Gausbertus, bishop of Cahors. In 901 he founded, at Aurillac, a convent, under the control of the Benedictines, and attempted in vain the building of a cathedral. His piety led him to undertake numerous pilgrimages to the tombs of St. Peter and St. Paul. He is said to have made seven voyages to Rome, and to have traversed Upper Italy. Returning from one of these journeys, he died at St. Cirq, near Figeac, Oct. 8, 902, having freed all his slaves. His kindness and benevolence gained for him a great reputation, and legends attribute to him a great number of miracles, performed both during his life and after his death. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Gerber, Christian, a German theologian, was born at Göttingen, March 27, 1660. He studied at Zeitz and Leipsic, and having completed his education at Dresden, became a tutor in the family of the Prince of Hohenzollern in that city, and afterwards at Göttingen in 1679. He continued his studies, at the same time practicing medicine. His last years were full of religious controversies. He died March 24, 1731. His principal works are, Historie der Kirchen-Ceremonien in Sachsen und Dresden, 1728; Historie der Stadtkronungen in Sachsen, ibid. 1725, 1726, 4 parts; Geschichte des Reichen Gottes (2 parts). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit., i, 627; ii, 304; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-lebens, iv, 275 sq. (B. P.)

Gerberoy, Richard de, a French prelate, was in 1192 dean of the church at Amiens, and in 1194 became bishop of that see. It was during his episcopacy, in 1196, that the head of John the Baptist is reputed to have been conveyed from Constantinople to Amiens by a crusader named Wallon de Sartou. He died in 1210. One of his contemporaries, Richard de Fournival, attributes to him various works, among others, a book entitled De Quatuor Virtutibus et de Ave Marias, which appear to be lost. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Gerbert, Olympe Philippe, a French prelate, was born in 1786. He lent his aid to the journal L'Avenir until it was censured by Gregory XVI, and wrote for L'Institut Catholique, a monthly review, founded by M. Benoist, a series of articles on the philosophy of religion which were quite noteworthy. He was for a long time vicar-general of M. de Salinis (bishop of Amiens), was appointed bishop of Perpignan, Dec. 19, 1858, consecrated June 29 of the following year, and died in 1864. He became known to the public as one of Lemanu's assistants in editing the journal L'Avenir in 1830; but before that time he had already published Des doctrines philosophiques sur la Cérémonie des Reports avec les Fonduclons de la Théologie (Paris, 1826). In 1831 he published, Coup d'œil sur la Contre-riforme Chrétienne, and Considerations sur le Jugeme général de la Piété Catholique. More important is his L'expulsion de Rome (1844-50, 5 vols). Gere, John Avent, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Chester, Mass., April 8, 1792. He was converted in 1822; joined the Baltimore Conference in 1823; and in it, as well as in the East Baltimore and Central Pennsylvania Conferences, served the most responsible appointments. He was a delegate four times to the General Conference, viz., 1840, 1844, 1852, 1873. He died at St. Louis, Pa., June 5, 1879. He was fearless, yet humble, a man of prayer and power, strong in intellect, and energetic. See Minutes of An-

Gerhard, Karl Theodor, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Breslau, Sept. 17, 1773. In 1800 he was pastor at his native place, and remained there until his death, Nov. 28, 1841. He published, Predigten (Breslau, 1835, 2 vols.);—Gezeiten der Morgerei und Abend (1834); See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit., ii, 136, 237, 290, 387; Zucholli, Bibl. theol. i, 419. (B. P.)

Gerhardt, David Gottfried, a Lutheran theogian of Germany, was born May 9, 1734. He studied at Halle, was preacher at Breslau in 1759, pastor priorius and professor in 1778, member of consistory in 1786, and died Aug. 20, 1808. He wrote, De Autori-

tude Archologie (Halle, 1757); — Dictum Johannsenum I. Epist. 5, 7 (Breslau, 1764), besides a number of Sermons. See During, Die deutschen Kanzelredner, p. 62 sq.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit., i, 721; ii, 290. (B. P.)

Gerhauser, Johann Balthasar, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born Sept. 24, 1768, and died at Dillingen in 1825, a professor of theology and director of the clerical seminary at Ulm. He was a friend of Ueber die Passionen (Munich, 1817): — Charakter und Theologie des Apostels Pauli (Lausbath, 1816). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit., i, 81, 294. (B. P.)

Gerzim, Mount. We extract some further particulars from Bädeker's Syria and Palestine, p. 334.

"Mr. Gerzim rises to a height a little less above the sea-level than that of Betul (which is 298 feet above). It is composed almost entirely of annular-like terraces (terri-formations). The summit consists of a large flat platform, extending from north-west to south-east for the north end of which are the ruins of a castle. The building, as a castle, was probably erected at Justinian's time, although the walls, five to ten feet thick, consisting of drafted blocks, may possibly belong to a still older structure. The castle forms a large square, and is flanked with four towers; the east side are remnants of several chambers, one of which has a Greek cross over the door. Near the burial-ground to the north-east rises the Muslim wady of Sheik Ghdemim, and on the north side of the castle there is a large reservoir. Of the church which once stood here, the lowest foundations only are extant. It was an octagonal building with an apse towards the east, having its main entrance on the north, and chapels on five sides. To the south of the castle are walls and cisterns, and there is a paved way running from north to south. Some massive constructions a little below the castle, to the south, are shown as the stones of the altar which Joshua is said to have erected here (viii, 30-34). In the centre of the plateau the Samaritans point out a projecting rock as having once been the site of the altar of their temple. Over the whole mountain-top are scattered numerous cisterns and smaller paved platforms, resembling the places of prayer on the area of the Haram at Jerusalem. The whole surface bears traces of having once been covered with houses. Towards the east there are several paved terraces. At the south-east corner, the spot where Abraham was about to slay Isaac is pointed out. Near it, to the north-west, there are some curious round steps. The summit commands a noble prospect to the east lies the plain of El-Mekkene, bounded by gentle hills, with the village of Askar lying on the north side, and that of Kefr Kallim on the south; further to the east is Raph. The valley to the south is Wady Awaroth, to the east. In the distance, rise the mountains of Gilbaid, among which Nebi Qoba towers conspicuously. Towards the north the Great Hermon is visible, but the greater part of the view in this direction is shut out by Mt. Eint. Towards the west the valleys and hills slope away to the blue band of the distant Mediterranean.

Mt. Gerizim, from the North-east.

The following description of this memorable site is from the most recent and trustworthy account (Conder, Test Work in Palestine, i, 62 sq.): "South of Nablus rises the rocky and steep shoulder of Gerizim. The mountain is L-shaped; the highest ridge (1848.5 feet above the sea) runs north and south, and a lower ridge projects westwards from it. The top is about 1000 feet above the bottom of the valley east of Shechem. As one walks up from the villages to the mountains, the outline of Gerizim is very fine; the lower part consists of white chalk, which has been quarried, leaving

The image contains a page from a book with text in German. The text appears to be discussing historical and theological topics, possibly regarding German councils and events. The page includes references to various historical figures and works, such as Gerlach, Gerlach, Gerlach, and Germain. The text is dense and appears to be a continuation of a larger discussion on theological and historical matters.
German Evangelical Association of the Western States of German Protestants in America corresponding to the United Evangelical Church of Germany. It was instituted at St. Louis, Mo., May 4, 1841, by seven ministers of the United Church of Germany. The object in view in forming this body is stated in the first paragraph of the revised statute as follows: "The object of the association is to work for the establishment and spread of the Evangelical Church in particular, as well as for the furtherance of all institutions for the extension of the kingdom of God. By the Evangelical Church we understand that communion which takes the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments as the Word of God, and our only infallible rule of faith and practice, and commits itself to that exposition of the Scriptures laid down in the symbolic books of the Lutheran and Reformed churches, chiefly the Augsburg Confession, Luther's Catechism, and the Helvetic Confession, so far as these agree; and where they differ, we hold aloof to the relevant passages of Scripture, and avail ourselves of that freedom of conscience which prevails on such points in the Evangelical Church." It will thus be seen that the main purpose is to unite in one body the Lutheran and the German Reformed Churches.

German Version of the Scriptures. By way of supplement we add the following. It is a well-known fact that, during his life, Luther made changes and corrections in each new edition of the Bible translation he published. His last edition, that of 1545, was by everybody acknowledged to contain some errors, and among these was the omission of twelve whole verses. The issue in 1546, one year after his death, contained a number of changes from that of a year earlier. For nearly two centuries Luther's translation was published only by private individuals, who could and did introduce changes and deviations from the last edition of the translation. The result was that, gradually, the Christians of Germany became convinced that a return to the authentic shape of Luther's own translation should be made. The first movement in this direction was made by the Caesarean Bible Institute, founded in 1712 at Halle. This institute in many, but not in all, places restored the original text of Luther, and was followed by the various Bible societies. Finally, in the year 1857, the German Bible societies decided to go to work in a systematic manner toward the attainment of this object. The Caesarean Institute took the lead, and the German ecclesiastical authorities cooperated and aided in the work. A twofold object was proposed; first, to put the orthographical and grammatical features of the translation into modern shape; and secondly, to correct the text to restore a harmonious text. The first of these tasks was intrusted to the hands of Dr. Frommann, of Nuremberg, the greatest authority on the language of Luther's day. For the second object, two committees of theologians were appointed, one for the New Testament, which did its work in 1861 and 1866, and published it in 1867, and one for the Old Testament, which worked from 1871 to 1882. The leading scholars of Germany, as Nitzsch, Twesten, Rieth, Beyschlag, Köstlin, Meyer, Brückner, Schlotmann, Tholuck, Kamphausen, Kleiner, Bertheau, Delitzsch, Thiesen, and others, constituted these committees. The result of years of scholarly toil was published at Halle, under the title, Die Bibel, oder die geistige Heilige Schrift des Alten und Neuen Testaments nach der deutschen Uebersetzung Dr. Martin Luthers, Erster Abdruck der im Auftrage der deutschen evangelischen Kirchen errichtete Bibel (Sopramm. Probabebel), in 1883. This book is now in the hands of the churches for criticism, which were to be set in by the fall of 1885; but the time has been lengthened by the Prussian authorities one year. Then the revision will receive its final shape, and will eventually be published by all the Bible societies of the German empire. In order to facilitate the examination of the work, the revisers have printed in "fat" or spaced letters, i.e. German italics, all those passages where Luther's original version differs from the modern editions, and also wherever the committees have made an entirely new rendering. The former class of passages are distinguished from the latter by having small hyphens before and after them. Like the revised English Text, this Probabililität is criticised by the wise and unwise, and has already created not a small literary battle on the subject of revision. Some are dissatisfied on dogmatical grounds, otherwise because the revisers did not act more radically. The last word has not yet been spoken.

Various other German translations have been given in commentaries and separately, but they are all of private value. (B.P.)

Germanus, a Scotch prelate, was probably the first bishop of the Isle, and was appointed by St. Patrick, the apostle of Ireland, in 447. To him the cathedral church of the Isle of Man, within the precincts of Peel Castle, is dedicated. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 258.

Germanus, archbishop of Patras, one of the promoters of the Greek insurrection, was born about 1771. He resided at the Court of Amsterdam, and died in 1827. He was secretary and dean to the metropolitan of Argolis, then to Gregory V., patriarch of Constantinople, and finally to the archbishop of Cyprus. In 1806 he became archbishop of Patras. When Ali Papa provoked the insurrection of the Greeks, Germanus put himself at the head of the insurgent party, and ever since his name has been connected with the history of that period. In the interest of Greece he went in 1822 to Italy. He sought the protection of the great powers then assembled at the Verona Congress. When the provisional government was created, Germanus was appointed minister of religious affairs, and held this office till his death. German, Friedrich Heinrich, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Holstein, Sept. 29, 1776. He was rector at Glückstadt in 1809, court preacher at Augustenborg in 1809, and died in 1859. He published, Beurthe zur allgemeinen Hermetik (Altona, 1828); Die par-hermeneutische Interpretations- und Tempel-Schaff (Leipsic, 1821); Die hermetischen Mängel der sogenannten grammatist-historischen Interpretationen (Halle, 1834);—Uber die Vernachlässigung der Hermetik in der protestantischen Kirche (ibid. 1887);—Kritik der mithysischen Bibliothek (ibid. 1839).—Die edle oder raffirte: Glühen oder Wissen? German (Sl.) The Flay (Germanus Flaviacum), in the district of Beautvais, is said to have been born of a noble Frankish family at Civitarranda or Waranda, and died on the 29th of August, 582. He was elected bishop of Beauvais, and founded a monastery near Flaviacum; but retired, c. A.D. 648, to the monastery of Pentalium, near Rouen, of which he became abbot. Later he withdrew to a cave near the Seine, where he was ordained presbyter, but finally returned to Paris, where he presided till his death, Sept. 24, 658. See Wetzer, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.
GERMON

GERMON, BARTHOLOMÆUS, a Jesuit of Orleans, was born June 17, 1683, and died there, Oct. 2, 1718. Before his De Venerabilis Hierarchia, Ecclesiastical Codices Correctores (Paris, 1718), he made himself known by his controversy with Mahillon, against whose work, De Arte Diplomatica, he wrote. See Long, Bibl. de la France; Winet, Handbuch der theolog. Lit. i, 922; Jocher, Alcmeoneis Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Germolino, ANASTASIO, an Italian canonist and jurist, was born in Piedmont in March, 1551. He belonged to the ancient and noble family of Cena. For some reason unknown to Mahillon, against whose work, De Arte Diplomatica, he wrote. See Long, Bibl. de la France; Winet, Handbuch der theolog. Lit. i, 922; Jocher, Alcmeoneis Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Gerson, ANATOLIO, an Italian canonist and jurist, was born in Piedmont in March, 1551. He belonged to the ancient and noble family of Cena. For some reason unknown to Mahillon, against whose work, De Arte Diplomatica, he wrote. See Long, Bibl. de la France; Winet, Handbuch der theolog. Lit. i, 922; Jocher, Alcmeoneis Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Gerson, NICLAUS, a native of Palestine, about the middle of the 6th century, was finally expelled from his monastery, and spent the rest of his days in homeless misery. See Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog., s. v.

Gerahm ben-Joshua (commonly called Rabben Gerahm, at the Ancient, also Maor hay-Golah, i.e. "the light of the Exile"), was born in France about the year 960, and died in 1028. He is the reputed founder of the Franco-German rabbinical school, in which the studies of the Babylonian collie were continued. He is the founder of monogamy among the Jews, and wrote a commentary on the Talmud, and some hymns and a penitential prayer, which are extant in the Machsor, or Festival Ritual of the Jews. Gerard, CHAPLET ben-MOSES, a Venetian rabbi, who lived in the latter half of the 17th century, was endowed with precocious education, and died at about the age of seventeen. He wrote Jed Chasdim (Venice, 1700). See Hoer, Noue Biog. Generale, s. v.

Gerahm ben-SALOMON, a Spanish rabbi, native of Catalonia, who lived in the latter half of the 18th century, was the father of Rabbi Leon da Bcahola (Kal-son), and wrote Shaare Haq-Shamaym (first printed at Venice, 1847; in four parts). The first treated of the four elements; the second, of astronomy; the third, of the heavens and earth, according to the principles of Averroes; the fourth, of theological matters. See Hoer, Noue Biog. Generale, s. v.; Fürst, Bibl. Jud., i, 329.

Gerson, CHRISTIANUS, a Lutheran minister of Germany, was born of Jewish parentage, Aug. 1, 1669, at the Recklinghausen theologate of the German church, and received his rabbinical education at the seats of learning in Fulda and Frankfort-on-the-Main. For a long time he supported himself and his family by instructing in Hebrew. While at Essen, a poor Christian woman brought her New Test. to him, which she pawned. Out of curiosity he commenced reading that book, which finally resulted in his conversion. He left his family and went to Brunswick, where he applied to the duke Heinrich Julius, begging that through his influence he might be instructed in the full truth of the Christian religion, and be baptized. He was received into the Church of St. Martin, at Halberstadt in 1600, and took the name of Christianus. He remained a considerable time at Halberstadt, and then went to the University at Helm-stadt, where he obtained the degree of Doctor of Theology. But he did not stay long at the university; he instructed the students in Hebrew and rabbinical literature, corresponded with Buxtorf and Wagensell, and even received a call from the king of Denmark to Copenhagen, as teacher of Hebrew and rabbinical literature at the university. In 1612 he was ordained, and appointed deacon, and afterwards pastor at Berg, in the principality of Anhalt, and died Sept. 25, 1627. Gerson’s son, whom the Jews had concealed for five years, also became a Christian, while his wife, who resisted the truth, was divorced from him in 1605 through the consistory of Wolfenbüttel. Gerson is the author of Jüdischer Timulm, der fürnehmste Inhalt des Talmud un dessen Widerlegung (Goerlitz, 1607; 6 ed. 1608, transl. into Danish and French) — ידיה של ה𝘁למודית דעוות (Halberstadt, 1610). Gerson, Jean, a French theologian, brother of Jean Charilet, was born at Gerson about 1384. He went, as did his brother, to pursue his studies at Paris, at the College of Navarre, where he was admitted to the number of the students of theology of King Charles V. His love of solitude led him to enter the order of Celestines. He took the vows in 1409, at the monastery of the Holy Trinity, at Limay, near Normandy. After having performed the duties of sub-priest in various communities of his order, he was found at a convent in Lyons, where he gave a refuge to his older brother. This token of attachment was due to the chancellor, who sincerely loved him. Jean Gerson was at the time of his death prior of the house of Lyons, and carried with him to the tomb the reputation of a saint. He died in 1454, leaving, Epistola ad R. P. Anselmon, Celestium, de Operibus Josuam, Cancelleri, Fanum sui, in vol. i of the works of chancellor Gerson. The homonymy of these two brothers caused Trauctatus de Eleuentia Mentis in Deum, etc., to be attributed to one of them, but it belongs to the other, a German Franciscan, who died in 1440. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bibl. Générale, a. v.

Gersonides, Magister Leo. See Ralbag.

Gervais, prior of St. Generis, in the diocese of Mann, and a French historian, lived in the 13th century. All that is known of him is that, at the request of Robert of Thorigny, who became abbot of Mont St. Michel, he wrote a History of the Counts of Anjou and of Maine. After remaining for a long time unpublished, it was inserted in the Recueil des Historiens de France, xii, 532, from a manuscript in the Imperial Library, belonging to the monastery of St. Victor. Gervais de St. Generis is often confounded with Gervaise of Canterbury. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bibl. Générale, a. v.

Gervaise, Nicolas, a French missionary and prelate, brother of François Armand, was born at Paris about 1602. He chose the ecclesiastical calling, and became a Jesuit; he had attended the mission to Siam. Here he remained four years, and became acquainted with the language, religion, customs, literature, legislation, and history of that people. On his return he published the result of his observations. He brought to France two sons of the king of Macassar, and after presenting them at court, gave them as far as possible a French education. He was afterwards rector of Vannes. The provost of Suèvre-pres-

GESSNER

Mer yielded to him his charge, which position Gervaise held for a long time, and during this time he published a great part of his works. Annoyed with the idea of proselytism, in 1724 he went to Rome, and obtained the title of bishop of Horren. Soon after his consecration he gathered together a number of clergymen, embarked with them for Central America, and commenced his labors upon the shores of the Aiqua, one of the tributaries of the Amazon. After three years he was murdered by the Caribs, Nov. 20, 1729. He left several works. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bibl. Générale, a. v.

Gerwyn, Saint. See Berwyn, St.

Géry, André Guillamaux, a French monk and orator, was born at Rheims, Feb. 17, 1727. He entered the congregation of St. Genevieve in 1742, taught philosophy and theology in the colleges of his order, preached with success at Paris, and became successively rector of St. Leger de Soissons, and of St. Ireneus at Lyons. He was elected general superior of his order in 1778. His long intimacy with two prelates not in subjection to Rome, MM. de Fitz-James and Montazet, led to his being suspected of Jansenism. He died in October, 1796, and his works were collected and published at Paris in 1788. He also wrote Dissertation sur le Véritable Auteur de l’imitation de Jésus-Christ (Paris, 1758). See Hoefer, Nouv. Bibl. Générale, a. v.

Gessius, August, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born in 1718, was in 1744 professor of Greek at Heidelberg, in 1745 general superintendent of the Church, and first preacher, and died Jan. 6, 1773. He wrote, Praxis in Capite Inimici (Göttingen, 1740) — Christi Decoro Gentis suum A commodissima (Hildesheim, 1744) — Historia Passiones Jesu Christi Harmonica (Wolfenbüttel, 1745) — Opinioeula de Deo GLORIET et 3 Sum, xxvii (1746) — In Verbo Christi Mor. tr, 12, at Luc. xvi, 10 (esot.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Bibl. Générale, a. v.; Jücher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, a. v. (B. P.)

Gess, Wolfgang Friedrich, a Protestant theologian of Germany, born at Stuttgart, Jan. 24, 1751, was in 1778 deacon, in 1799 superintendent at Neustadt, in 1814 chaplain at Heilbronn, in 1787 superintendent, and died Oct. 3 of that year. He published, Briefe über einige theologische Zeitmaterien (Stuttgart, 1797) — Merkwürdigkeiten aus dem Leben und Schriften Hinemars, etc. (Göttingen, 1806) — Worte des Totes und der Erbauung bei Begräbnissen (Stuttgart, 1799). See Winer, Hand-

Gessel, Bernhard Friedrich, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born April 6, 1811, at Dantzig, studied at Königsberg, where Herbert especially attracted him. In 1838 he was called as military preacher to Thorn, in West Prussia, and died there, March 14, 1861. Giesel belonged to the Liberals of the Protestant Church. He wrote very little. See Zuch- old, Bibl. Theol. i, 435. (B. P.)

Gesner, Georg, a Swiss theologian, was born in 1764 at Diebendorf, near Zurich. He was for some time professor at his native place, in 1828 superintendent at Neuenburk, in 1837 resigned his position, and died in 1839. He published, Nikolodrus oder die Lehre Jesu vom geistigen Gotteswirte (Zurich, 1814) — Der sichere Gang durchs Leben (Stuttgart, 1826) — Schicksale der Wahrheit unter den Menschen (1818-20) — Christliches Handbuch (Zurich, 1817) — Der christliche Glaube in seiner Fruhzeit (Stuttgart, 1836). GESSNER, Solomon, a distinguished Swiss poet and engraver, was born at Zurich, April 1, 1730, and is principally known by his poem on the Death of Abel. Among his works are several vignettes and other ornaments for his Death of Abel and his Pastoral. They are dated 1769, 1771. He died March 2, 1788. See Hofer, Nouv. Biog. Geysir, SAKULF GOTTfried, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Jan. 12, 1740, at Göttingen. He studied at Wittenberg, was in 1777 professor of theology and Hebrew language, and in 1777 at Kiel, and died June 15, 1808. He wrote, Dissertationes Tres de suo Putram (Wittenberg, 1765):—Poetae Graeci Antiquiores, Interpretat Sacrarum Literarum Magistrat (ibid. 1768):—De Dubitationibus contra Historiam Recentem Jussi Christiani (Kiel, 1778):—Aphorismi Ethici in summ Scholaram (ibid. 1789). See Dürer, Die gelehrte Theologen Deutschland, s. v.

Gezelius, Georgius, a Swedish biographer, was born in 1736. Like others of his name, he devoted himself to the ecclesiastical calling, became archdeacon of Lillköyka in Norway, and later almoner to the king of Sweden. He died March 31, 1788. With several learned men of his country, he wrote, Frisök ti et Biographik Lexicon (Stockholm and Upsal, 1776). In 1780 he added a supplementary volume. This work was revised and published without the name of the author under the title, Biographische Lexicon (Upsala, 1800). See Hofer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Gezelius, Joannes (1), a Swedish prelate, was born Feb. 3, 1615, in the parish of Gezel, as from which he derived his name. He was professor of theology at Dorpat, Livonia, at which time belonged to Sweden. Promoted successively to various dignities in the Church, he was appointed in 1644 bishop of Abe, in Fineland, where he died, Jan. 20, 1690. He commenced a Swedish commentary upon the Gospels, which he left incomplete. See Hofer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Gezelius, Joannes (2), a Lutheran bishop of Sweden, son of the foregoing, was born in 1647 at Dorpat. In 1674 he was professor of theology at Abe, in 1684 superintendent at Narva, in Esthonia, succeeded his father in 1690 as bishop of Abe, which position he resigned in 1713, and died April 10, 1718. He wrote, Notice of the most remarkable monies in Germany and Poland, 1707—1712. De Insectis Sacrificiis in Germania (1671):—De Defensione Jehovae contra Saturnum, ex Zechar, iii, 1, 2 (1748):—Fasciculus Homileticorum Dispositionum (1638):—Decisions Casuum Conciliorum (1688). He also compiled a commentary upon the Bible, which was commenced by his father. See Hofer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jöcher, Almegnesischen Geschichte—Lexicon, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit., ii, 185. (B. P.)

Gezer. This locality has recently been discovered in Told Jezreel (Mound of Jezreel), lying near the village of Abú Ghosh, The following account of it is from Condert (Test Winz. Pilgr., i, 1 sq.):—'The exact site of the town [Gezer, or Jezreel, or isolated] is at once clear, for the site is an outlier—to use a geographical term—of the main line of hills, and the position commanded the road at the important point. As is the case with many equally important places, there is not much to be seen at Gezer. The hillside is terraced, and the eastern end occupied by a builders' formation, probably the ancient citadel. Tombs and wite-presses, cut in rock, are found round, and there are traces of Christian buildings in a small chapel, and a tomb, apparently of Christian origin. The spring still on the east there is a fine spring, which wells up in a circular ring of masonry: it is called Ayn Yerdel, or the 'Spring of the Gatherings,' and its existence is of strong argument in favor of the antiquity of the neighboring site. . . .

The most interesting and curious discovery was made in 1747 at Gezer. M. Gezelius was shown by the peasants a rude inscription deeply cut in the flat surface of the natural rock. It appears to be in Hebrew, and to read 'Boundary of Gezer: (supposed by him to mark the limits of this as a Levitical city), with other letters, which are supposed to be the Greek word Ales. M. Gezelius has brought forward an ingenious theory that Alkes was governor of Gezer at the time this boundary was set, and he supports it by another inscription from a tomb on which the same name occurs. This theory might seem very risky, were the Greek words not strongly confirmed by the discovery of a second identical inscription close to the last, containing the same letters, except that the name Alkes is written upside down. Both the true words are hard to read, being rudely formed, but they are deeply cut, and of evident authority, while it can scarcely be doubted that the inscription is the same in both cases. M. Gezelius attributes them to Macabean times; it is curious that they should come to light in the course of a collection of no definite distance from the town, and unmarked by any column or monument. Altogether they are among the many archaeological practices of the Parisians and their users and meaning will probably always remain questionable.'

A full description of the locality and ancient remains, with a topographical map, may be found in the Memoirs to the Ordinance Survey, i, 417 sq.

Ghasat, ISAAC ibn—See ibn-GHAITH, ISAAC.

Ghase, one of the three kinds of Mohammedan ablations. Three rules are observed in its performance: 1. Those who do it must resolve to please God. 2. The body must be thoroughly cleaned. 3. The water must touch the whole skin, and all the hair of the body. The somuc (q. v.) requires five additional circumstances: 1. That the Bismillah (q. v.) be recited. 2. That the palms of the hands be washed before and after the ablation. 3. That the water be emptied in the washing-place. 4. That before the prayers some lustration should be made with peculiar ceremonies. 4. That to cleanse the surface of the body the skin should be rubbed with the hand. 5. That all this be continued to the end of the ablution.

Ghaz, a flight of steps leading down from a Hindū temple to the waters of the Ganges or other sacred stream. It is often constructed at great expense, and highly ornamented, being regarded as the most sacred part of the building.

Ghaznī Khan, a holy Mussulman, who first subdued the country of Dinangopore, India, to the Moslem power. His integrity and humanity gained him the worship, not only of the Moslems, but even of the Hindūs themselves, who often perform long pilgrimages to his tomb at Shergath.

Ghașpore was the favorite residence of Ghaznī Khan (q. v.). The place is remarkable for a sect of Brahmins who reside in it, practicing religious ceremonies, and strengthening and practicing the ancient Pythagoreanism. They hold to the doctrine of the emanation of the soul, and many others different from the ordinary Hindūs, but keep the knowledge of their religious forms a profound secret.

Gheyn (or Ghein). James, the elder, an eminent Flemish designer and engraver, was born at Antwerp in 1655, and was instructed by his father. The following are some of his prints:—The Life and Passion of Christ; The Four Evangelists; The Adoration of the Trinity; Christ Preaching to the Jews; The Annunciation; A Repose in Egypt. He died in 1615. See Hofer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spohrer, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Ghiberti, LORENZO, a Florentine painter, and very eminent staturist, was born in 1378, and instructed by Starnina. About 1488 he went to Rimini, and was much engaged in painting on one of the doors of the baptistery of St. Stephen, at Florence. His masterwork is The Offering up of Isaac. He completed three statues of St. John the Baptist, St. Matthew, and St. Stephen, for the Church of San Michele; two bas-reliefs for the baptistery of the cathedral of Siena. All these works are still preserved. The reliquary of St. Zenobius and the two doors are, to this day, among the finest specimens.
of the art in Italy. He died in 1655. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Ghoffor, in Lamiism, is one of the supreme gods of Islam. He is the mighty protector of the earth, the sacred doctrines and morals, but because of his cruelty he is counted among the eight frightful Barchanes. He has a horrible head with open mouth, three large flaming eyes, and coral-strings made of skulls hanging about his neck. He carries in his six arms all kinds of monstrous instruments, and rides an elephant.

Gibarian, a Mohammedan sect who denied the free agency of man, and taught that God is the author of all the actions of man, whether good or bad.

Giacobasso, Clemente, an Italian prelate, nephew of Domenico, was born in the latter half of the 15th century. He became canon of St. Peter of the Vatican, bishop of Massa, secretary of Paul III, and auditor of the sacred palace. In 1586 he was made cardinal, with the title of St. Anastasius, and soon after sent on a mission to Charles V. Called in 1589 to the legateship of Perugia and Umbria, he, in the performance of these duties, died at Perugia, Oct. 7, 1640. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Giacobasso (Lat. Jacobitius), Domenico, an Italian prelate, was born at Rome in 1448. Destined to a religious calling, he studied particularly canonical law and ecclesiastical history. He became auditor of the rota, and was successively bishop ofLucera, of Massa, and of Gravina. After having served the Church under Sixtus IV, Innocent VIII, Alexander VI, Pius III, Julius II, and Leo X, he was appointed by the last-named pope, cardinal, with the title of St. Bartholomew of Insula, in 1517. At the death of Adrian VI, he would have been elected pope but for the French party. He died at Rome, July 2, 1522. He wrote, A Treatise on Concilia, in Latin, which is not highly esteemed on account of its inexactness. This treatise forms the last volume of the collection of Labbe. The first edition appeared at Rome in 1538. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Giacomelli, Michiel Angelo, titular archbishop of Chalcedon, was born in 1650, at Pistoia. He was for some time librarian to cardinal Fabroni, and then to cardinal Colligola. He died in 1774. He wrote, Tract. Benedicti XIV de Factiva Jesu Christi (Paris, 1745); B. Gior. Grimatico del Sacerdocio Libri VI (Volgarese (Rome, 1757)); Omnia di S. Crisostomo (ibid., 1758); Philius Episcopi Enumeratio in Canonicis Conciliorum (ibid., 1772). See Jücher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit., i, 617. (B. P.)

Glattino, Giovanni Battista, a Jesuit and professor at Rome, was born at Palermo in 1601, and died Nov. 19, 1682. He translated into Latin Pallavicini's Istoria del Concilio di Trento (Antwerp, 1670, 3 vola. fol.), and published Orationes Sacrae XVII. See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit., i, 667; Jücher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Gibbethon is identified by Conder (Tent Work, ii, 387) with Kibbêd, the position of which he does not indicate, and by Tristram (Bible Places, p. 61), with "the ruin Gebutha, north of Jaffa."

Gibbon, Johann, a Jesuit, and rector of the Jesuit college at Trèves, was born in 1544, at Whinton, England, and died Dec. 5, 1595. He wrote, Dialogo di Sacra e Comunione, Ostacolata da una Specie:—Conflitto Virulento Disputatios Georgio Schon:—Concertatio Ecclesiae Catholicae in Anglia. See Jücher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Gibbona, Orlando, an eminent English composer of church music, was born at Cambridge in 1588, and at the age of twenty-three was appointed organist of the Chapel Royal. He died in 1625. He composed the tunes for George Wither's translation of Hymns and Songs of the Church, and many other pieces of church music. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. de Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Albion, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Encyclopedia Brit. 9th ed. s. v.

Gibbons, Richard, a learned English Jewist, was born at Winchester in 1549, and died in 1682, published F. Ribera Com. in Duodecim Proposita Mones (1612), and several other works. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. de Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Gibbe of Benjamin. Lient. Conder strongly impugns (Quar. Statement of the "Palest. Explor. Fund," April, 1874, p. 61) the identification of this place with Tullei el-Fal, but this view is retained by Tristram (Bible Places, p. 118).

Gibell, Abraham, a Lutheran theologian, who died in 1629 at Burg, pastor primarius, is the author of De Geminis Lexicographia Chaldaica Constitutum (Wittenberg, 1666); Grammatica Lingue Libri (1663); Artificium Acentuum (ed.); Strigilis 120 Errorum Bellumini (1665); Explicatio Locis Jerem. xxxvii., 16. Gibeon. A full description of this place, especially of the numerous rock-hewn tombs in its vicinity, is given in the Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey, iii, 94 sq.

GIBEON, POOL OF (2 Sam. ii, 13). The following interesting account of the waters in the vicinity of Gibeon is given by lient. Conder (Quar. Statement of the "Palest. Explor. Fund," October, 1881, p. 285 sq.): "El-Jib, the modern village, occupies the north end of a detached hill some 200 feet high, surrounded by broad, flat corn valleys on every side. The inhabitants state that the old city stood on the south part of the hill: and here, in the sides of the natural scarps which fortify the site, we visited and explored some twenty rock-cut tombs. There are eight springs on the hill, the largest, or the last, being one of the finest supplies of water in this part of Palestine. One of the springs is called el-Birkâh (corresponding to the pool or 'pool of the above passage), and flows into a rock-cut tank measuring eleven feet by seven, the water leaping from a small cave. This place is south-west of the village, and close to the main road east and west through Gibeon. The pool is cut in the face of a cliff, and has a wall of rock about three and a half feet high on the west. Above it grows a pomegranate tree, and near it are tombs in the cliff."
“It is possible, however, that the great spring (‘Aln el-Belle) is the place intended in the episode of Jacob’s encounter, as it wells up in a chamber some thirty feet long and seven feet wide, reached by a descent of several steps, and there is said to be a passage with steps leading up from the back of the cave to the surface above. As the water is some five feet deep, and the passage is now stopped up, we did not attempt to enter it. It is clear, however, that a door of some kind once existed at the present entrance to the cave, and it would appear that the inhabitants of Gibeon were thus able to close their spring below, and to obtain access to it from above within the city. The spring in question, like many of the fa-nous fountains in Palestine, is held sacred by the Pelisbin. An earthenware lamp is occasionally lighted in the chamber. Close by is a little rock chamber with a rude masculine wall.”

Giberti, Giovanni Matteo, bishop of Verona, was born at Palermo in 1493, and died in 1543. He was one of those prelates who, before the Council of Trent, showed a serious interest in the reform of the Church, drawing his inspiration from Pietro Caraffa, with whom he was intimately acquainted. Thus Giberti insisted upon a better preparation and stricter examination of the clergy, and though his efforts were of no avail on account of the opposition from the clergy, yet he exercised considerable influence on Carlo Borromeo (q. v.).
Giberti wrote, Constitutiones Gibertianae: — Constituti per le Monache: — Capitoli di Regolazione Patta sopra le Stipe: — Monitones Generales: — Capitoli Della Societa di Caritas: — Edita Selecta: — Lettere Sciolte. See Ballerini’s biography of Giberti, in the introduction to the latter’s works, which were published under the title, schichte der Stadt Rom, vol. iii; Benrath, in Flitt-Herming, Real-Encyclop., a. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-

Gibier, a French theologian, was born at Bourges in the latter half of the 16th century. He was educated by the cardinal de Berulle, studied theology, and received the degree of doctor at the Sorbonne in 1612.
The previous year he had, with four other priests, under the direction of Peter de Berulle, then also a simple priest, formed the nucleus of the congregation of the Oratorian. His general, who had introduced into France the order of Carmelites, made Gibier his vicar-general.
He was at the same time commendatory of Jully, a house then occupied by the canons regular. The laxity which characterized these monks led him to seek their reform from the cardinal de La Rochefoucauld. The house of Jully was united with that of St. Genevieve, and later to the congregation of the Oratorian. It is claimed that, owing to modesty, he refused the bishop-rice of Nantes. He died at the seminary of St. Magloire, of which he was first superior, June 6, 1620. He wrote, De Libertate Dei et Creatura (Paris, 1630): — La Vie et les Grandes de la Très-Sainte Vierge (ibid. 1637): — Catechismo de la Maniéra de Vierge Purificat (posthumous, ibid. 1655). He was allied with the most learned and distinguished men of his time. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Gén., s. v.

Gibbon is the name of a remarkable idol-temple in Japan. It is a large but narrow building, in the middle room of which stands a huge idol surrounded by many others of smaller dimensions. Around this temple are thirty or forty smaller temples, all arranged in regular order.

Gibson, Edward Thomas, M.R.A.S., M.S.B.A., an English Baptist minister, was born at Falmouth, Nov.
11, 1818. He was educated at the naval school at Greenwich, and when about fourteen years of age entered the navy, which, however, he speedily relinquished. He was converted at the age of seventeen, and some years afterwards began study for the ministry at Bradford Baptist College. In 1854 he became pastor of the church at Guilshborough, Northamptonshire. In 1859 he accepted an invitation to the pastorate of the Baptist Church at Crayford, Kent, which he served for eighteen years. Failing health forced him to resign his charge, Oct. 7, 1877. He died at Brockley, Jan. 21, 1880. He was a diligent student, especially of the Oriental languages, of several of which he possessed a surprising knowledge. He contributed some translations to Spurgeon’s Treasury of David. See (Loncl) Bapt.

Giddings, George P., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was rector in Quincy, Ill., for a number of years previous to 1857. In that year he became rector in Booneville, Mo., remaining there until 1859, when he removed to Palmyra as principal of a female school. He died May 1, 1861. See Prot. Episc. Alhmanac, 1862, p. 52.

Brandenburg, was preacher in 1745 at Kesselsdorf, in Silesia, in 1755 deacon at Görlitz, in 1774 archdeacon there, and died Dec. 28, 1788. He wrote, Historische Nachricht von der Bibelübersetzung Martin Luthers (Augsburg 1774), a valuable work for Luthers's new text and his Gehilfen um die Katechismen (Görlitz, 1782). See Wiener, Handbuch der theolog. Lit. i, 167; ii, 213. (B. P.)

Gieseler, Georg Christoph Friedrich, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Laede, May 1, 1760. In 1791 he was pastor at Petershagen, near Minden, where the famous church-historian, Johann Kaspar, was pastor; he was his pupil. In 1809 he was first preacher at Warther, near Bielefeld, and died March 14, 1839, a doctor of theology. He wrote, Das Abendmahl des Herrn. Ein liturgischer Versuch (Bielefeld, 1835). See Wiener, Handbuch der theolog. Lit. ii, 9; Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 438; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Gibbon, Andrew, D.D., an eminent English Baptist minister, was born at Bristol, Aug. 17, 1700, being the son of Rev. Emanuel Gibbon, Baptist pastor there. He was converted in early life; studied at an academy in Tewkesbury, and under the direction of Rev. Dr. Ward of Gresham College; he was settled at Nottingham, in 1727, and then removed to his native place as assistant to Rev. Bernard Firkett. In December, 1729, he removed to London as pastor of the Little Wild Street Church. For many years Mr. Gibbon acted as chaplain in the family of Sir Richard Elyea. In 1734 he visited Edinburgh, where he was honored with the freedom of the city. In 1737 he was appointed assistant librarian of the British Museum, which position he held until his death, June 19, 1784. His private collection of coins was one of the most curious in Great Britain. His attendance at the museum did not render him inactive to his pastoral duties. For a period of twenty-four years he preached, in connection with several ministers of the Independent denomination, once a month, the Sabbath evening lecture at St. Helen's Church. As a preacher, he was full of anima- tion. See Bibl. Mem. Amer. Bapt. Magis- torum new series, v. 385. (J. C. S.)

Gifford, Richard, an English clergyman, was born in 1725, and was rector of North Okendon, Essex, in 1772. He died in 1807. He wrote remarks on Ken- nicott's Dissertation on the Tree of Life in Paradise: -Outlines of an Answer to Dr. Freely's Disquisitions on the Adam and Eve. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Giftschütz, Friedrich, a Roman Catholic professor of theology, who was born in 1748, and died at Vienna, June 5, 1788, is the author of, Vorlesungen über die Pastoralrhologie (Vienna, 1785; 5th ed. 1811). See Wiener, Handbuch der theolog. Lit. ii, 34. (B. P.)

Gill of Santo Inrego (Lat. Agathii Luxurion), one of the propagators of the Dominican order, who was born in the diocese of Vigo in 1184. He was the son of don Rodrigo Pelago, governor of Coimbra, and one of the grand officials of the crown. He completed his studies at Coimbra, and while still young possessed two priories and three canonships in the chapters of Braga, of Coimbra, and of Odivelas. He neglected theology, and devoted himself to physics and medicine; went to Paris to perfect himself in these sciences, and there received the degree of doctor. In 1224 or 1225 he resigned all, entered the Dominican order, became a model of Christian virtue, and rapidly reached the highest honors of his order. In 1249, at a convocation of his order at Trevea, he resigned his provincialship of Spain. He used his influence in re-establishing harmony between the king, don Sancho II, and his brother, the young Alfonso. He died at Santarem, May 14, 1265. Some churches of Portugal desired he was their bishop, and he was invited by the bishops of Viseu to fix his festival on the Sabbath after the Ascension. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Gilbey, Earle, D.D., an English divine, was descended from a highly respectable family in Kent. He was educated at the Charter-House, where for a conscientious churchman he was his parson. In 1814 he entered University College, Oxford, where he graduated in due course. His first exercise of the ministry was in London, where he served a Church for some years. In the year 1795 he was instituted to the living of Barby, in Northamptonshire, which he held till his death, Oct. 2, 1818. He distinguished himself as a diligent, faithful, and successful minister of Christ. He was a firm friend of the British and Foreign Bible Society, and much rejoiced in witnessing the establishment of an auxiliary institution in the county of Northampton in 1812. He was a man whose benevolence endeared him to all who needed his help. It was his meat and drink, whether in the pulpit or out of it, to lessen human misery and produce happiness. See The (Lond.) Christian Observer, February, 1814, p. 65.

Gilbert, Sir Robert, a member of the nobility of Avonwater, was first abbot of a monastery which bore his name in the diocese of Clermont. He passed his youth at the courts of Louis the Gross and Louis the Younger, and was reckoned among the bravest and most pious knights of his time. After preaching in behalf of the second crusade, he accompanied the king to the Holy Land. TheResult of the expedition threw a profound sadness into the heart of Gilbert, who attributed it to the sins of the crusaders. He resolved to consecrate himself entirely to a monas- tic life, with the approval of his wife and daughter. Having consulted the bishop of Clermont and the abbot of Dilo, he gave half of his goods to the poor, and re- served the remainder for building two monasteries, one for men and the other for women. The latter was es- tablished at Aubetere, under the invocation of St. Gervais and St. Protas. His wife, Petronille, assumed the management, and at her death her daughter, Ponce, succeeded her. Gilbert retired to a place named Neuf Fontaines. He there constructed a monastery, was elected abbot, and ruled with great wisdom. On one side of the monastery was a large hospital for the sick and the dying. On June 1, 1152, and the third Sunday of July, he was interred in the hospital cemetery. The third ab- bot caused his remains to be transferred to the church. Robert of Aurecrer published the life of St. Gilbert in his Chronique. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Gilbert (1), a Scotch prelate, was bishop of Dun- keld for about twenty years, but when he took his seat it was unknown. He was bishop there in 1220, and also in the twenty-eighth year of the reign of King Alexander II. He died in 1256. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 79.

Gilbert (2), a Scotch prelate, was elected to the see of Galloway in 1258, and was probably consecrated with the High Church of York the same year. He died in 1255. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 272.

Gilbert (3), a Scotch prelate, was a native of Gal- loway, and was elected to the see of the Isles in 1231. He probably died in 1265. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 301.

Gilbert, surnamed Cinoaldus, a Benedictine of Normandy, who died in 1114, is the author of, Allercatia Synagoge et Erotice:—Comment in Exiunum et Jeremiam:—Biblia in Canonum Continuam:—De Casu Diaboli. See Biblia De Scripturibus Barbara : PDC-

De Scriptoribus Angliae; Oudin, De Scriptoribus Ecclesiasticis; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, a. V. (B. P.)

Gilbert of Holland, flourished A.D. 1290, a scholar and divine, took his name from a district in Lincolnshire. He was invited by St. Bernard to live with him at Clairvaux, became his scholar, continued Bernard's sermons, writing forty-six in a style scarcely discernible from Bernard's. Abbot Trithemius, the German, speaks of Gilbert as a learned and eloquent author. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), ii. 296.

Gilbert, bishop of London, who died in 1134, is the author of a Treatise in Veneris et Nostrae Crudinitatem: —Comment, in Jobum, Themas Jeremiah et Alqitn Tulmoesa: —Homilia in Cantica Solomonis: —Comment, in Psalmus. He wrote a work on the Holy Scriptures, which is still in existence. His works are still in MS. On account of his great learning, Gilbert was styled 'Universalis.' See Oudin, De Scriptoribus Ecclesiasticis; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, a. V. (B. P.)

Gilbert of Westminster, a scholar of the first part of the 12th century, was first a monk, then abbot of Westminster. He gave himself up to the study of divinity under the guidance of Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury, and attained to great knowledge of the Scriptural studies in France, visited Rome, and on his return he reported to have had a dispute with a learned Jew, which afterwards he reduced to the form of a dialogue, and, publishing it, dedicated it to St. Anselm. He died in 1117, and was buried in Westminster. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), ii. 115.

Gilbert Island Version of the Scriptures. This version is designed for the people of Gilbert islands, Micronesia. In 1869 the first parts of this version, which was prepared by the Rev. Hiram Bingham, of Honolulu, were published by the American Bible Society. The version of the entire New Testament was published in 1872, which proved to be a great boon to the heathen inhabitants. In 1875 a new edition was needed, which was published after a careful revision by the original translator in 1878. (B. P.)

Gilderseleeve, Benjamin, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born near Norwalk, Conn., Jan. 5, 1791. He graduated from Middlebury College, Vt., in 1814; the same year removed to Georgia, and began to teach in Mount Zion Academy; in 1817 he entered Princeton Seminary, and remained there a little over one year; in 1819 commenced editing a paper called The Missionary; in 1825 was ordained by Bishop White, at Athens, Ga.; in 1827 removed to Charleston, S.C., and became editor of The Christian Observer, which post he held until 1843; then he removed to Richmond, Va., where he was sole editor of The Watchman and Observer, and then co-editor of The Central Presbyterian. During his residence in Richmond he preached wherever he found an open door, especially in the Virginia penitentiary. He died June 20, 1875. At seventy-five blind- ness began to come upon him, and he then applied himself to the memorizing of large portions of Scripture and the best hymns, that he might be able to continue his ministrations long after his eyesight left him. He was a place where he could find bearers he was abundant in labor. See Necro! Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1876, p. 4.

Giles, Samuel, D.D., a Congressional minister, son of major Ezekiel Gile, was born at Plaistow, N. H., July 22, 1700. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1725, and was ordained to the ministry in Boston the same year. In 1729, he was ordained pastor of the Church in Milton, Mass., Feb. 18, 1700; and died in October, 1826. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i. 580.

Gillilan, George, a minister of the Scotch Presbyterian Church, was born in Scotland, Jan. 20, 1813. He was educated at the Glasgow College and at the United Secession Church. His first call was to a congregation at Schoollynd, Dundee, where he continued his pastoral labors until his death, Aug. 13, 1878. In 1842 he began to write sketches of the principal characters of the day, for newspapers, and they were afterwards printed in book form under the title of Tales and Literary Portraits. This was followed by two other series of the same character. In 1850 he published The Bard of the Bible, which has been severely criticized for its grandiloquent style. He edited an edition of Bryam's Poems, and among his other works are, The Book of British Poets, Ancient and Modern, and The Martyrs, Heroes, and Bards of the Scotch Covenant. He also published, The Grand Discovery:—History of a Man:—Christianity and our Era:—A Discourse on Hades:—and Five Discourses on the Abuse of Talent. He finally edited the popular edition of the popular Poets of Britain, with notes. (W. P. S.)

Gill, Alexander, D.D., an English clergyman, was born in London in 1597, and was educated at Trinity College, Oxford. In 1635 he became head master of St. Paul's school. While usher of St. Paul's he had charge of the education of John Milton. He died in 1642. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. a. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, a. v.

Gill, Henry, D.D., an English Congregational minister, was born at Tiverton, Devonshire, in 1828. He was led to an early decision for Christ; entered Hackney College in 1844, and at the close of his curriculum, in 1847, became pastor at Haverhill, Suffolk. In 1864 he accepted an invitation from the committee of the Bible Society to visit its auxiliaries in North America. This mission occupied him more than eighteen months, in which he proved himself admirably adapted for the work. On his return to England, he was appointed one of the London district secretaries, his chief duties being connected with the Sunday-schools of all denominations in and around the metropolis. He died at Lewisham, Nov. 4, 1870. Dr. Gill was industrious, affectionate, acceptable, and successful in all his labors. In addition to a few tracts and pamphlets, he published Early at the Temple, and The True and Beautiful. See (Lond.) Comp. Year-book, 1871, p. 311.

Gillane, John, was consecrated a bishop in the Episcopal Church of Scotland in 1727, and bishop of Dunblane in 1731. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, a. v.

Gilles de Roye (Lat. Epigilia de Roya or Reia), a French chronicler and theologian, was born at Roye, Picardy. While very young he entered the ranks of the Cistercians, and was sent to Paris to complete his studies. He received the degree of doctor of theology, and taught for nineteen years in various colleges of the order of St. Benedict. He was then appointed abbe of Roye, and died at the age of sixty. He resigned these functions, and retired to the convent of the Dunes, Bélgïum, where he remained eighteen years, devoting his time to meditation and study. He died at the abbey of Sf'armavis, near Berne, in 1478. He wrote, Opus Visutum Chronomii seu Chronic, an abridgment of the history of John Brandon, a monk of Dunes, remaining in manuscript. Gilles de Roye carried it down to 1465, and it was continued by Adrian of Bult, of the same convent, down to 1478. Andrew Schot discovered it about twenty years later, and it was published by Sweert (Frankfort, 1620). He also left some commentaries upon the Master of Sentences. See Hoofer, Novis, Biog. Générale, a. v.

Gilles, Jean, a French prelate, was born in Normandy. He studied theology and law at Paris, and became chaplain to the metropolitan church. Then, most alone among the high clergy of France, Gilles refused to acknowledge Clement VII (Robert of Geneva). He abandoned his benefice, and retired to Italy to Urban VI., who made him provost of Liege and auctor of the Rota. He was afterwards sent by the Sacred college as nunzio to Rheims, to Treves, and to Co... logne. In 1405 Innocent VII made him cardinal, with the title of St. Cosmo and St. Damian. He assisted at the concile, Nov. 30, 1406, which elected Gregory XIII, but abandoned that pontiff when he discovered that the latter held his own interests as paramount to those of the Church, and that he rejected the means proposed for the termination of the schism (1408, 1409). Gilles returned to France, where he died about 1418. He left some fragmentary writings. See Hoefel, Nouv. Biog. Cathol., v.

Gillespie, Thomas, father of the Relief Church in Scotland, was born at Clearburn, near Edinburgh, in 1708. He received a careful religious training, was educated at Edinburgh, Perth, and Northampton, licensed to preach in 1740, and ordained in England in January, 1741. In August following he settled as pastor of Carnock, where he continued, with unwearied diligence and much success till 1752, when he was deprived from the Church of Scotland. He, however, continued actively engaged in preaching, first, in the churchyard of Carnock, beside the church which had so often echoed to his voice; but he was compelled to leave this spot and betake himself to another, from which he was speedily driven, and at last was compelled to take his position on the public highway, where, during the whole summer and autumn, he proclaimed the Gospel to immense crowds. In the following September he removed to Dunfermline, where, in 1758, the Relief Church was founded. He continued with unabated zeal till his last sickness, which soon closed his life, Jan. 19, 1774. Mr. Gillespie was a man of truly apostolic excellence. Conscience was the power that bore away his life. His intellectual abilities were excellent, but his goodness was his greatness. See United Presbyterian Fathers, p. 217; Fusti Eccles. Scot- ticeni, ii, 580.

Gillett, Elliphalet, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Colchester, Conn., Nov. 19, 1768. After graduating at Dartmouth, in 1791, he taught school in Wethersfield. Under the direction of Rev. Dr. Spring, he studied theology at Newportport. In August, 1795, he was ordained pastor of the Church in Hallowell, Me. At his own request he was dismissed from this charge in May, 1827. He died there, Oct. 19, 1848. Dr. Gillett was of great influence in that section of the state. When the Maine Missionary Society was organized in 1807, he was chosen its secretary, which office he filled until the close of his life. The cause of home missions had in him an ardent advocate. His mind was of a supersensitive order, and was highly cultivated. Addicted to metaphysical discussions, he was a ready, logical, and keen debater. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Philos., ii, 377.

Gillet, Louis Joachim, canon and librarian at the abbey of St. Genevieve, in Paris, was born July 28, 1866. In 1717 he was pastor at Mahon, in the Malo bishopric, but resigned his position in 1740. He died Aug. 28, 1753, leaving Nouvelle Traduction de l'Histoire Joseph, (published after his death, 4 vols., 1756). See Jocher, Allgemeines Giecheln-Lexikon, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit., i, 157. (B. P.)

Gillett, Ezra Hall, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Rush, N. Y., July 5, 1823. He graduated from Yale College in 1841, and from Union Theological Seminary, N. Y., in 1844. He remained a resident licentiate until 1845, when he was ordained pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Harlem. He continued in that position as efficient and successful pastor until 1870, when he accepted the appointment of professor in the New York University, and occupied that position until his death, Sept. 2, 1875. Dr. Gillett wrote, besides frequent articles for the periodical press, a Life of Haus (1861) — History of the Presbyterian Church (1864) — History of the Reformed Church (1875). (W. P. S.)

Gillette, Abram Dun, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Cambridge, Washington Co., N. Y., Sept. 8, 1807. He studied in the preparatory department of Hamilton Institution, graduated from Union College, was ordained in Schenectady, and in May, 1831, became pastor of the Baptist Church in that place, where he remained four years, then removed to Philadelphia, and became pastor of the Sansom Street Church. In 1839, the Eleventh Street Church (Philadelphia) having been formed under his leadership, he became its pastor, holding that office until 1862, when he accepted a call to Calvary Church, as it is now called, in New York city. In 1864 he removed to Washington, D. C., and was pastor of the First Church in that city five years. He then went to England, where he delivered a series of lectures to the students of Mr. Spurgeon's college and, for a time, was the stated supply of a Church near London. For two years after his return (1872-74), he was corresponding secretary of the American and Foreign Bible Society. From 1874 to 1879 he was pastor at Sing Sing, N. Y., which was his last regular pastorate. He died at his summer home, Bluff Head, on the shore of lake George, Aug. 24, 1885. Dr. Gillette was the author of several memorial volumes, and frequently contributed to various journals. See The Watchman, Aug. 31, 1882. (J. C. S.)

Gillette, Charles, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at Granby, Conn., in 1813. He graduated from Connecticut College in 1836. In 1844, after becoming one of the professors in the Virginia High School, near Alexandria; and afterwards a student in the theological seminary in that city. He was ordained in 1842, and in October of that year was sent out as a missionary to Texas; established himself at Houston, and successfully labored there and in the regions adja- cent until the close of 1851. During the next five years he had charge of the diocesan school and of St. Paul's College. In 1856 he accepted the rectorship of St. David's Church, Austin, from which he removed to St. Paul's Church, St. Augustine, O. T. He died in 1869. See Amer. Quart. Church Rev. Jan. 1870, p. 634.

Gloeh. Liant. Ceintur thinks (Memoirs to the Ordnance Survey, iii, 818) that this may be represented by the ruined site Julis, which the Map lays down at three and a half miles north-north-west of Helmsley, but admits that we should not expect a location so far north. Gimp. In Norse mythology, is heimr, or the most charming of all regions of the spirit world. As the ancient Scandinavians considered warlike plays and drinking the greatest of all joys, so also this imperish- able heaven is furnished with weapons and golden drinking-horns. It is the eternal dwelling-place of Allfather, the seat of all the good and pious, who there partake of undisturbed blessedness. At the destruction of the world, Walhalla, the ordinary seat of the deities, Asgard, and all that belongs to it, will be destroyed; even the still higher heaven, Uddalag, and the next highest seat of the light-spirits, Viðblain, will perish; but Gimp, extending high above all these, will not even be touched by the frightful Ragnarokr (destroyer), but will stand with the eternal god, to receive the valiant warriors, as the old plan has it, and at last the fluid mass concealed in Ginnunga-gap.
Giotto, Anguillotto (called Ambroggiotto and Giotto di Bondone), a famous ancient Italian painter and architect, was born in 1350 near Florence. One of his earliest works is a picture of The Annunciation, which is considered very beautiful. He was highly honored, and his works were in great demand. The noble families of Verona, Milan, Ravenna, Urbino, and Bologna were eager to possess his works. In 1346 he was employed at Padua to paint the chapel of the Nunziata all' Arena. In 1348 he was invited to Naples by king Robert, to paint the Church of Santa Chiara, which he decorated with subjects from the New Test. and the Mysteries of the Apocalypse. He was also distinguished in the art of mosaic, and executed the famous Death of the Virgin at Florence. As an architect he erected the bell-tower of Santa Maria del Fiore. He died at Florence, Jan. 8, 1385. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Giovanni (Battista di Tondo), an eminent Spanish sculptor and architect, flourished about 1550. He visited Rome for improvement, and acquired great reputation. He was invited to Naples by the viceroy, don Pietro di Tolo, who appointed him state architect. He erected the Church of San Giacomo degli Spagnuoli. His work gained for him the commission that Philip II appointed him architect of all the royal works of Spain. He removed to Spain in 1559, and began the erection of the Escorial three years later. He continued to superintend this work until his death in 1567.

Giovanni di Matteo (or Matteo di Giovanni), an eminent Sienna painter, flourished from 1450 to 1491. He painted first in his native city in fresco. His masterpiece was the Murder of the Innocents, a subject which he repeated both at Sienna and at Naples. Some of his paintings are still to be found in the collections of noble houses at Sienna.

Giovanni di Paolo, a reputable painter of Sienna, flourished about 1457. There are some of his works in the churches at Sienna. His Descent from the Cross, in the Osservanza, painted in 1461, is considered good.

Giovanni da Pisa, an eminent Italian sculptor and architect, the son of Niccolo da Pisa, flourished during the early part of the 14th century. He erected the public cemetery at Pisa, at Naples the façade of the cathedral of St. John, and as a tribute of friendship to Pisa, he executed many works at Arezzo, Orvieto, Perugia, Pistoia, and elsewhere.

Girac, Francois (Barbeau de), a French prelate, was born at Angoulême in 1732. Destined from his infancy for the ecclesiastical calling, he was appointed successively vicar-general of the diocese of Angoulême, dean of the cathedral, and sent by the ecclesiastical province of Tours to the assembly of the clergy in 1765. His uprightness and conciliatory spirit led to his being called soon after, in 1766, to the bishopric of St. Briec, and three years later to that of Rennes, where he remained until the Revolution. Being then forced to go into exile, he attached himself successively to princes de Metternich, and Stanislas Poniatowski, last king of Poland. Returning to France, Girac, who counted thirty-five years in the episcopate, sent in his resignation, in view of his long labors and feeble health, and accepted a canonicat in the chapter of St. Denis. He died Nov. 29, 1829. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Girard la Pucelle (Lat. Giraldaus Petula), professor of ecclesiastical law at Paris in the 12th century, and bishop of Coventry. He took a lively part in the contests which St. Thomas of Canterbury maintained against the king of England, and after a life full of agitation, having for a long time resided at Cologne, be grew to England, was appointed bishop, and died soon after, in 1184. Many of his contemporaries bestow great praise upon his knowledge of theology, philosophy and jurisprudence; but none of his works remain. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Girard, François, a French ecclesiastic, was born about 1739 at La Guillotière (at that time dependent upon Dauphiny, and still one of the suburbs of Lyons). He was a pensioner in Paris, where he was appointed, in 1781, rector of the parish of St. Landry. At the commencement of the revolution he showed great enthusiasm for the new ideas, and was one of the first rectors of Paris to submit to the civil constitution of the clergy. These patriotic sentiments gave him a kind of independent position, which, after the suppression of his church, in 1791, caused his election to one of the episcopal vicarages of bishop Gobel. Two years later the convention appointed him to assist Marie Antoinette in her last moments, and to conduct her to the scaffold. He was appointed canon of the Church of Notre Dame, at Paris, after the restoration of Catholic worship, at his own expense he repaired the chapel and gave an annuity for its preservation. He died at Paris, Nov. 7, 1781. An anonymous treatise, entitled Instructions sur la Constitution Civile du Clergé, etc., published at Paris in 1791, is attributed to him. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, No. 8721, and given to an author named Giraud. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Giraud, Stephen, an American philanthropist, was born at Bordeaux, France, May 21, 1750. He began life as a sailor at the age of thirteen, and ten years later became a master and captain. He settled in Philadelphia, Pa., in May, 1777, and began his eminently successful mercantile career. During the prevalence of the yellow fever in Philadelphia in 1798, 1797-98, raging with unwonted violence, Mr. Giraud devoted himself personally, fearless of all risks, to the care of the sick and the burial of the dead, not only in the hospitals, of which he became manager, but throughout the city, supplying the suffering public with money and provisions. Two hundred children, whose parents died of the fever, were in a great measure intrusted to his care. In 1812 he purchased the building and a large part of the stock of the old United States bank, and commenced business as a private banker, with a capital of $1,200,000, which was afterwards increased to $3,000,000. During the war of 1812 he rendered valuable services to the government by placing at its disposal the resources of his bank, and subscribing with unprecedented liberality to its loans. He died Dec. 28, 1881. He contributed liberally to all public improvements, and erected many handsome buildings in the city of Philadelphia. He was profuse in his public charities, but exacting to the last fraction due him. Notwithstanding his extraordinary attentions to the sick, he never had a friend. He was a freethinker in religion, and an ardent admirer of Voltaire and Rousseau. Although he was uneducated, his success in business had been such that his property at the time of his death amounted to about $8,000,000. Of this vast estate he bequeathed only $160,000 to his relatives. The remainder was devoted to various public charities, including hospitals, asylums, schools, etc.; $500,000 to the city of Philadelphia; $300,000 to the state of Pennsylvania; and his principal bequest was $2,000,000, besides certain other property, together with a plot of ground in Philadelphia, for the erection and support of a college for orphans. The committee which directed the building of the college, and it was in the near vicinity of this city, was to be erected, and the admission and management of the inmates. He required that the pupils be instructed in the purest principles of morality, but they must be left free to attend such religious tenets as their mature reason may lead them to prefer. No ecclesiastic, minister, or missionary of any sect whatever is allowed to hold any connection with the college, or even be admitted to the premises as a visitor. The officers and instructors of the institution are eighteen in number, and the inmates about five hundred.

Girardet, Jean, a reputable French painter, was born at Luneville, Dec. 18, 1790, instructed in the school of Claude Charles, and after spending some time there went to Italy, where he remained eight years studying the works of the great masters. There are many of his works at Metz, Verdun, and other cities of Lorraine. His Dessins from the Crimea, in one of the churches at Nancy, is considered his best production. He died at Nancy, Sept. 2, 1778. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Girardon, François, an eminent French sculptor, was born at Troyes (Champagne), March 16, 1629, studied with statues in the churches of Troyes, and produced a picture of The Virgin, which was much admired. In 1657 he was admitted to the Academy at Paris; in 1659 was appointed professor; became director in 1674, and chancellor in 1695. There are many of his productions in France. The mausoleum of Cardinal Richelieu, in the Church of the Sorbonne, was considered his masterpiece. He died in 1715. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Giraud, Père, a French cardinal, was born at Montpellier, Aug. 11, 1791. Belonging to an ancient family, he was designed for the magistracy, but at the age of fifteen went to the seminary of Clermont to study philosophy, and while there developed a taste for belles-lettres and ancient classics. In October, 1812, he entered the seminary of St. Sulpice, where he studied theology and the sacred Scriptures. Three years later he was ordained priest. In 1818 he was sent as a missionary to Auvergne. He was rector of the cathedral of Clermont in 1825, when he was invited to preach during Lent at the Tuileries. A royal ordinance appointed him to the see of Reims, Jan. 9, 1830, and all the signs of a criticism concerning certain propositions of the bishops. It was much esteemed by the court of Rome by the archbishop of Rouen. He was appointed archbishop of Cambrai, Dec. 4, 1841. He was made cardinal, June 11, 1847, and Apr. 1, 1849, went to Gaeta, where Pius IX was a refugee. It was supposed with some reason that he was commissioned by M.M. de Falloux and Drouyn de Lhuys to induce the pope to accept the hospitality of France. He died at Cambrai, April 18, 1860. The works of Giraud have been collected and published several times. The third edition appeared in 1852. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Girard, Ecclesiastical (écrevisses, écreueux, or ecreu- luma), a cord of linen, silk, worsted, or other material, with tassels at the extremities, by which the alb is bound round the waist of him who assumes it. It is fastened on the left side. When putting it on, the cleric says the Oratio or equivalent to it in terms: "Preceinge me, Domine, zona tua justitiae, et stringe in me dilectionem Dei et proximi." This cincture is as old as the days of St. Gregory the Great; formerly ample in size, and broad, and often adorned with gold and gems. In the 6th century it was first introduced to its present form. It was a sacred character. It represented the cord with which our Lord was bound; and alludes to Luke xii, 35; Eph. vi, 4; 1 Pet. i, 13.

Girdlestone, Charles, a minister of the Church of England, was born March 6, 1797, and graduated at Oxford in 1818. He became successively fellow of Baliol College, university examiner, vicar of Sedgely (Staffordshire) in 1826, rector of Alderley (Cheshire) in 1837, of Kingswinford (Staffordshire) in 1847, and died April 29, 1881. He was a voluminous writer on religious subjects, from the Low Church point of view, and published, among other religious works, A Family Commentary on the Bible (1852-54): — The Book of Psalms, according to the two authorized translations, in parallel columns, with marginal notes (1856): — Christendom Sketched from History in the Light of Holy Scriptures (1870). (B.P.)

Girodet-Trioson, Anne Louis, an eminent French painter, was born at Montargis, Feb. 5, 1776, studied under David, and at the age of twenty gained the prize of the Academy for his picture of Joseph's Brothers. He gained great renown in France by his picture of The Deluge. Many of his works are in the private collections of France. He died at Paris, Dec. 9, 1824. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bio-graphie de l'Art, s. v.; Spooner, Biography of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Giron (Garcia de Loyzaga), Don Pedro, a Spanish priest and scholar, was born at Talavera in 1542. He was the son of Pedro Giron, member of the Council of Castile. He pursued his philosophical and theological studies at Alcala. Being appointed canon of Toledo, became archdeacon of Guadalaxara on the withdrawal of his uncle, Lopez de Caramejal. In 1565 Philip II called him to his court as amanuensis and master of the chapels, and a little later intrusted to him the teaching of his little son, don Philip. In 1596 cardinal Albert of Austria appointed him grand-vicar of the archdiocese of Toledo. In 1598 he obtained the title of archbishop of the diocese which he governed. He died Feb. 29th, 1630, leaving some works, for which see Hoefer, Gitanos (or Spanish Gypsy) Version of the Scriptures. This version is intended for the gypsi (Gypsy being in Spanish Gitano). For the history of these people, and the translation of the gospel of St.

Luke for them, compare the article Gypsy. In consequence of a fresh demand for the book, the translator has since added to his former work, which was printed in 1875. Some copies have been sent out to Spain, and satisfactory tidings have been received concerning their acceptance among the gypsies.

Giustiniani, Agostino, an Italian Orientalist of the preaching order, was born at Genoa in 1470. At the age of fourteen years he entered the convent of the Dominicans of Santa Maria del Castello, at Genoa.
By the authority of the doge and the archbishop of Genoa, his parents sent him to Valencia, in Aragon, where he contracted a serious disease. This caused him to again adopt his former project, and he returned to Pavia, took the Dominican habit in 1488, and chanted his Christian name from Pantaleon de Agostino. The study of Greek, Arabic, Hebrew, and Chaldee so absorbed his attention that he neglected theology and philosophy, and indifferently performed his duties as preacher and confessor. He taught in several schools of his order, but in 1514 resigned his duties as professor in order to devote himself exclusively to the editing of a polyglot Bible. Being appointed bishop of Nebbio, in Corsica, he assisted in 1516–17 at the Late-ran council, and contested some articles of the concordat with Francis I and Leo X. The cardinal having fallen into disgrace, the bishop of Nebbio withdrew to Boniface Ferrier, bishop of Irvea. Francis I, then ruler of the country of Giustiniani, invited him to remain in his kingdom. The king increased his pension, and appointed him his chaplain of the House of the Province of Paris. Giustinian was the first who taught this language there. He remained five years in France, during which time he made a voyage to the Netherlands and England, where he met with Erasmus and Thomas Morus. Recalled to his diocese by certain affairs, he remained there until the time of his death, which occurred while returning from Genoa to Corsica, in 1586. He wrote a number of works, for mention of which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Giustiniani, Angelo, an Italian prelate, was born on Scio in 1520. He joined the Franciscan order, went to Italy prepared with valuable manuscripts, taught theology at Padua and Genoa, and accompanied cardinal Ferrara to France. Giustinian took part in the discussion of Poissy, then was appointed grand almoner of the duke of Savoy, and bishop of Geneva. He arsisted at the Council of Trent. Pope Pius IV confided to him an important negotiation with the king of France, in which he acquitted himself well. In 1578 he was obliged to resign his bishopric on account of a violent attack of gout. He died Feb. 22, 1596, leaving Giustiniani, Fabiano, an Italian canon and theoologist, was born at Legnano, a diocese of Genoa in 1578. His father changed his original name of Turancetti for that of Giustiniani, having been adopted by a family of that name, not wishing to take part in the corruption of Luigi Fieschi. In 1597 he entered the congregations of St. Philip of Neri, and was placed in charge of the library of Santa Maria de Vallecillos, and there he formed a taste for study. In 1616 he was appointed bishop of Ajaccio, at which place he died, Jan, 8, 1627. He wrote Index Universali Materiarum Biblieorum (Rome, 1612). This work contains many bib-lio graphical errors. He also wrote other works. See

Giustiniani (of Chios), Leonardo, an Italian prelate of Genoese origin, lived in 1483. He was archbishop of Mitylene when that island was taken by the Turks. He left a letter upon the subject of the taking of Constantinople, address, and other heads of a some other works, for which see Hoefer, *Nouv. Biog.
Générale, s. v.*

Giustiniani, Orazio, an Italian cardinal and theologian, was born at Genoa near the close of the 16th century. He was of that branch of the Giustiniani family to which the sire of Chios belonged. Having studied theology at Rome, he entered in 1552, the conagregation of twenty-five years, the congregation of priests of St.
Philip of Neri, and advanced rapidly to the higher positions of his order. Urban VIII appointed him first librarian of the library of the Vatican. He was char with an important negotiation with the patriarch of Constantinople, and acquitted himself so much to the satisfaction of the pope that he bestowed upon him as a reward the bishopric of Montalto, in 1640. He restored harmony between the bishops of Montalto and the pope, a task that pleased him. In 1649 Innocent X appointed him bishop of Nocera, and the year following he was made cardinal, with the title of St. Onuphrius. Soon after the pope chose him as his grand penitentiary. He became again first librarian of the Vatican library, and died at Rome in 1649. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale et Universelle.

GIUSTINIANI (Di Monno), Paolo, an Italian prelate and commentator, was born at Genoa in 1444. He was the son of Pietro Pellegrino Giustiniani, ambassador to the duke of Milan. At the age of nineteen years Paolo entered the order of Minorite preachers. Some years later he was made doctor of theology, and elected prior of the convent of St. Dominic, at Genoa. In 1484 he was regent of the studies of his order at Perugia. When, at the death of Sixtus IV, the Genoese were expelled from the States of the Church, Giustinian-i returned to his native country and devoted himself to preaching. In 1486 he was elected provincial of Liguria. In 1499 Innocent VIII chose him as master of the sacred palace. This pontiff confided to him several important missions, and in 1494 appointed him inquisitor-general of all the Genoese possessions. In 1498 Alexander VI made him apostolic commissary, and authorized him, with the governor of Rome, to examine a large number of Christians accused of heresy. In this he distinguished himself by the severity of his judgments. He was one of the judges who, in September, 1498, condemned Pietro d’Aranda, bishop of Calahorra, and steward of the pope, to perpetual imprisonment for heresy. He was recompensed for his zeal by the gift of the bishopric of Scio, and being sent as legate to Hungary. He died at Buda in 1509, leaving commentaries upon some of the books of the Bible. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Gliadiatorii, Christiani Vices Concerning. Some pagan moralists expressed more or less strongly their disapproval of the gladiatorial shows, as being inhuman and demoralizing; but they were too popular to be checked by such remonstrances; and nothing effectually done to stop them until they were opposed and finally suppressed by the intervention of Christian princes, such as the Christian heros of the Church. The Church expressed its abhorrence of these barbarous games as soon as it came in contact with them, not only by disowning attendance at them, but by refusing to admit gladiators to Christian baptism. Charioteers, racers, and many others are included in the same condemnation; probably because the public exhibitions in which they took a part were more or less connected with idolatry. For the same reason such persons, if they had already been received into the Church, were to be punished by excommunication. The edict prohibiting the exhibition of gladiators was issued by Constantine in A.D. 325, just after the Council of Nice had been convened. Forty years later, Valentinian forbade that any Christian criminals should be condemned to fight as gladiators; and in A.D. 367 he included in a similar exemption those who had been in the imperial service about the court.

In the year 404, while a show of gladiators were exhibiting at Rome in honor of the victories of Stilicho, an Asiatic monk named Telemachus, who had retired to Rome for the purpose of endeavoring to stop this barbarous practice, rushed into the amphitheatre, and strove to separate the combatants. The spectators—enraged at his attempt to deprive them of their favorite amusement—stoned him to death. But a deep impression was produced. Telemachtus was justly honored as a martyr, and the emperor Honorius, taking advantage of the feeling which had been evoked, effectually put a stop to gladiatorial combats, which were never exhibited again.

GISTANES, GEORGE, a Scotch prelate, was a native of Dunbar, and minister at St. Andrews; was preferred by the king to the see of Caithness in 1600; and thence was translated to the see of St. Andrews in 1606, but was not consecrated until 1610. He was called commissioner for uniting the two kingdoms in 1604. He died May 2, 1615. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 41-217.

GLAIR, JEAN BAPTISTE, a French Orientalist, was born at Bordeaux, April 1, 1778, and died in 1879. He published, Lexicon Manuale Hebraicum et Chaldæicum (1830; new ed. 1845)—Principes de Grammaire Hibrarique et Chaldæique (1832; 3d ed. 1845)—Chro-

GLASNER, JUSTUS MARTIN, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Gotha, Oct. 8, 1636, as Heinrich Pfitz. He studied at Helmstedt and Halle, and was in 1727 preacher at his native place, and took the degree of doctor of theology in 1733. On account of controversies with his superiors and colleagues, he was deposed from his of-cie, and died at Vienna, Jan. 22, 1756. He wrote, De Intercursione Reipublicae:—De Draconico Ein-gegn Regum Aegyptiorum ad Execl. xixz-xvzvi.—Specimens Anti-Judaicorum de Genuino Judæorum Messia:—De Demonstratione Spiritus S. Jerum esse Verum Messiam:—Dissertation Philologica de S. Simone Filio Joachiti, Aucto-

GLEIG, GEORGE, LL.D., a Scotch prelate, was born at Boglehill, Kincairdineshire, May 12, 1758, and educated at King's College, Aberdeen. He took orders in the twentieth year of his age, and continued his education of a congregation at Pittenweem, Fife, whence he removed in 1790 to Stirling. He was twice chosen bishop of Dunkeld, but the opposition of the primates rendered the election null. In 1808 he was consecrated assistant and successor to the bishop of Brechin, in 1810 GLONDONING was preferred to the sole charge, and in 1816 was elected priest of the Episcopal Church of Scotland. He died at Stirling, in February, 1839. He was a frequent contributor to the Monthly Review, the Gentleman's Magazine, the Antiquary, the British Critic. He also wrote several articles for the third edition of the Encyclopaedia Britannica, and on the death of the editor, Colin Macfarquhar, in 1738, was engaged to edit the remaining volumes. He also published, Directions for the Study of Theology (1827); various Sermons, and other works. See Walker, Life of Bishop Gleig (1879); Encyclop. Brit. 9th ed. s. v.

Glendoning, Matthew, a Scotch prelate, was a canon of Glasgow, and was afterwards made bishop of that see in 1389. He appears to have sat there until his death in 1408. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 246.

Glöckner, Hieronymus Georg, a German philosopher, was born at Freiberg in 1715. He studied at Leipzig, was in 1741 bachelor, in 1742 magister, and in 1754 professor of philosophy. He died Feb. 5, 1757. Besides his contributions to Teller's Bible-Work, and translation of Calvin's Biblical Dictionary into German, he wrote, De Libertate Dei Aecessus Recensiorum Quaedam Phantoma; De Westenmacherogoriae Fidei in N. Test. Vols. (Leipzig, 1754). See Jöcher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 133. (B. F.)

Glossen Ordinaria, the common exegetical manual of the Middle Ages. It consisted of short explanatory comments, compiled by Walafrid Strabo, following for the most Rabanus Maurus.

Glover, Livingston M., D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Phelps, Ontario Co., N. Y., in 1820, and, after leaving the necessary training, entered Western Reserve College, graduating in 1840. He afterwards graduated at Lane Theological Seminary, and was ordained pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Jacksonville, Ill., where he labored with great success for upwards of thirty years. He was a delegate of the General Assembly to the Free Church of Scotland. He died at Jacksonville, July 15, 1860. See (N. Y.) Observer, July 20, 1860. (W. F. S.)

Gloves (χιορδαίς, goutus). It would seem that gloves, in the strict sense of the word, were unknown to the early Greeks and Romans (Casaubon, Annales, in Athen. xii, 3). That they were in use, however, appears from several ancient Egyptian paintings (Cypres, viii, 8, 17). The European custom of wearing them seems to have originated with the German nations, as the Teutonic origin of the common Latin word for them clearly shows: and although, as an ecclesiastical and courtly fashion, they did not appear till the 12th century (the first exant mention of them in that character being as late as A.D. 1150), they had been used for centuries as articles of practical convenience. Thus we find them mentioned in the life of St. Columbanus, by Jonas Bobbienas (formerly included among the works of Bede, c. 29). In this instance, the gloves are spoken of as used "for purposes of labor," but sometimes they were obviously of a costly nature, for in the will of Riculfus, bishop of Helena (ob. A.D. 946), in a long list of valuable articles, he mentions "one pair of gloves" (Migne, Patrol. cxxxi, 468).

Gloves symbolized the hiding of inquity by the merits of our Saviour, and recalled the blessing upon Jacob when he wore gloves of skins. William of Wykeham's gloves are praised in the Eulogy of Druon. Candidates for degrees in medicine formerly gave gloves to the graduates of the faculty in that university, in return for their escort to the doors of the convocation house. Bishop Ken contributed to the rebuilding of St. Paul's the cost of his consecration dinner and a hundred pairs of gloves. At St. Andrew's, Holborn, the clergy were given gloves at Easter, and some noblemen used to send a pair to any bishop or dean whom they heard preach. In 1836 the University of Oxford presented gloves to the members of the royal family and King Charles I.

Glick, Ernst, a Lutheran theologian, was born in Saxony, Nov. 10, 1662. He studied at Wittenberg and Leipzig, and accepted a call extended to him by the general superintendent, John Fischer, in 1674, to Livonia. On his settlement in Livonia he was grieved to find that the people were still destitute of the Scriptures in their native tongue. He thereupon threw himself assiduously to the task of producing a translation of the entire Scriptures from the sacred originals; and with this object in view he repaired to Hamburg, there to qualify himself for the undertaking, by studying Hebrew under Edzard, the celebrated Hebrew. After his return from Hamburg, in 1680, he was appointed military-preacher at Dulsamunde, where he also adopted Catharine Bedendiek, afterwards empress of Russia, as his daughter. In 1688, Glick was appointed pastor at Marienburg, in Livonia, and translated the Bible into the Lithuanian, which was published at Riga in 1689, the New Test. having been published in 1685. When Marienburg was taken by Peter the Great (Aug. 6, 1702), Glick was transported with other citizens as prisoners to Moscow. Owing, however, to the fact that he had been the father of Catharine, he was soon released, and was appointed inspector of all the high-schools of Moscow. Here he studied the Russian language, and commenced a translation of the New Test. into the Russian tongue. He died, however, May 5, 1705, before finishing his task. (B. F.)

Glycon, Michael, (Μηχάνη ὁ Γλυς), a Byzantine historian, probably of the 13th century, was a native either of Constantinople or Sicily (hence called Siculus). He wrote some letters to the last Constantine, and a History (Βιβλίος χρονικόν), in four parts, from the Creation to the death of Alexis I Comnenus (1118), first published in a Latin translation by Leunavius (Basle, 1572, 8vo; best ed. by Beeker, 5th ed., in the Bonn collection of the Byzantines, 1866, 8vo).

Glycon, John (Ἰωάννης ὁ Γλύς), or perhaps Glycous (Γλύκους), was patriarch of Constantinople from 1186 to 1230. He was regarded as a man of great wisdom and oratorical skill. Nicerius, who was his pupil, praised him greatly. At length, enchanted by age and disuse, he resigned the dignity of patriarch, and retired to the monastery of Cynostra. Being an elegant and correct writer, he attempted to purify the Greek language from the barbarisms with which it was surcharged. For his works see Hefker, Nov. B. G.%, s. v.

Gobat, Samuel, D.D., missionary bishop of Jerusalem, was born Jan. 26, 1799, at Cremine, a village near Munster, in the canton of Berne. In 1821 he entered the missionary seminary at Baile, and in 1824 went to Paris for the purpose of continuing his Oriental studies, particularly Arabic, under the celebrated Sylvester de Sacy. In 1825 he entered into the service of the Church Missionary Society at London, and in the year following embarked upon his mission to Abyssinia. But owing to the unsettled state of that country, he could not begin operations until 1830, and left in 1832. He returned in 1839, but was detained his mission to Abyssinia, and so, in September, 1836, he returned to Europe. From 1839 to 1842 he was at Malta, assiduously engaged in revising the Arabic Bible, and other learned labors. In 1842 he went to Baile, afterwards to Berne, and returned again in 1843 to Malta, to inaugurate and take charge of the Malta Protestant College. He had opened the college, and the seeing that the Protestant college where he had opened the college, Mr. Gobat received an intimation that the king of Prussia had expressed an anxious desire to nominate him to the Anglican episcopate in Jerusalem. He was much surprised at the intelligence, but felt bound in conscience not to refuse the call, without violating his principles of being "obedient to the Lord in all things." "Wherefore," were his words, "I felt persuaded that the call was from God; and herein I ground my hope, that God will bless me, and make me a blessing. On Sunday, July 5, 1846, Mr. Gobat was consecrated at St. Michael's, as bishop of the United Church of England and Ireland in Jerusalem. His work in the Holy City, during the thirty-three years which he spent there, was very successful and vigorous. His annual letters from the Holy City were always looked for with interest, and read with the deepest attention. In the last letter, published in 1877, he stated that there were thirty-three Protestant schools in Judea, Samaria, Galilee, and beyond Jordan, containing between 1200 and 1500 children of both sexes. He died at Jerusalem, May 5, 1879. He wrote A Journey of Three Years in Syria and Transjordania (London, 1847). Someachenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.; S. Gobat, his Life and Work, by the earl of Shaftesbury (London, 1884). (B. P.)

Göbel, Karl, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born Feb. 18, 1808, at Solingen. He studied at Erlangen and Berlin, and was in 1887 appointed pastor at Altwied, near Neuwied-on-the-Rhine. In 1846 he was appointed successor to professor Krafft, at Erlangen, and in 1857 he was called to Posen as pastor of St. Peter's, and member of consistory. He died there April 24, 1861, a doctor of theology and member of the upper consistory. He published, Der heilige Rock, ein evangelisches Zeugnis (Neuwied, 1845); Evangelisches Zeugnis gegen die Irrlehren des Gilluyn und Johannes Ronge (Erlangen, 1849); -Osterbeete Heilglütern Christlicher Hoffnung (2d ed. 1860); -Stephanus, der Prediger des Gottes der Herrlichkeit (1855). -Das alte Testament gegen Vorurtheile und Missverständnisse der Gebildeten unserer Zeit verteidigt (1865). See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol., 1, 447. (B. P.)

Göbel, Sebastian, a German theologian, was born at Dresden in 1628. He was at first pastor of the Church of Nicolai, at Leipsic, then abbot of the convent of Bergen, near Magdeburg, in 1659. He died in 1684, leaving Methodologia Homiletica, -De Pastiche Fideles, Deus cum Hominibus: -Christiana Viva Regula: -Theatros Evangelicis: -Columbia Faminarii Celestis, seu Sacrum Orandi et Contandi Libellus. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Godard (or Gilgard), bishop of Rouen, was born at Salency, near Noyon, about 400. According to some he was the son of Nectarius, who was count and twin brother of St. Medard, but the earliest records contain no such information. As successor to Rasbal, he received the priesthood at the hands of the bishop of Vermand, then the capital of the Vermandois. He was elected bishop of Rouen near the close of the 5th century, and brought many idolaters to the Christian faith. He aided in the conversion of Clovis I, together with his co-laborers St. Remy, St. Woisat, and St. Medard. In 511 he assisted at the first Council of Orleans. He discovered in St. Landolus an especial talent, although but twelve years of age, and consecrated him bishop of Coutances. The theologians attributed this to divine revelation. He died at Rouen, June 8, about 580, and was interred in the Church of the Virgin, but his remains were afterwards reinterred in the abbey of St. Medard, at Soissons, under the reign of Charles the Bald, which probably led to the conclusion that Godard was brother of Medard. These two saints are honored on June 8. According to Mabillon, Fortunatus wrote the life of these two saints, but it is uncertain. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Godard, Kingston, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, a graduate of the General Theological Seminary, was rector for several years in Philadelphia, until 1859, when he became rector of Christ Church in Cincinnati, Ohio. In 1862 he returned to Philadelphia as rector of St. Paul's Church. In 1866 he removed to Fort Richmond, N. Y., as rector of Andrew's Church, where he remained until the close of his life, Oct. 24, 1875, at the age of sixty-three years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1876, p. 150.

Godard, William Stanley, D.D., an English clergyman, was born in 1753. He was rector of Repton, Derbyshire, England, in 1784. He published in 1796, on the visit of the bishop of Winchester (1811): -Sermon at the consecration of bishop Howley (London, 1814). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Godertberta, Saint, was born at Boves, near Amiens, about 640. She was consecrated by St. Eligius, bishop of Noyon, in the presence of Clotaire III (from 655 to 689). The hagiographical writers say that she was the wife of a society of twelve women, whom, with uniriting devotion, she instructed according to the strict rules of the gospel, and by her own virtuous example. By her faith she is said to have arrested the flames, and when a violent pestilence attacked Noyon, she caused its cessation by assembling the citizens together in penance. She died about 700. Her remains were for a long time in the cathedral of Noyon. She was canonized, and her memory is honored April 11. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Godehard, Saint, bishop of Hildesheim, was born at Ritenburg, near Fulda, in 801. He was educated at the court of the archbishop Frederic of Salzburg, and when thirty-one years of age entered the monastery of Niederaltaich, and became its abbot in 977. His excellent administration of the monastery attracted the attention of the emperor Henry II, who charged him with reforming the monasteries of Hersfeld, Tegernsee and Freising. Having succeeded in this task, he retired to his own monastery in 1012. When Bernard, the bishop of Hildesheim, died, he was made his successor in 1022, and died May 5, 1038. He was canonized by Innocent III in 1181. His festival is on May 4. Godeline de Ghistleles, Saint, a martyr of the 11th century, was born at Ghistleles, in Flanders. She was religiously trained from her youth at the château of Long Fort, in Boulonnais. She was married to Bertholf, who was likewise a nobleman, and was also a priest, but to death. Her festival is on July 6. Legend attributes to her many miracles, and her life was written by Dragon, priest of Ghistleles, one of her contemporaries. Another, published in German, was entitled Godeline Boeck, in Gothic characters, ornamented with coarse wood engravings. This book was translated and published by Louis de

GODSCARD, JEAN FRANÇOIS, a French ecclesiastical writer, was born at Rocquemont, near Rouen, March 10, 1728. He was successively secretary of the archbishop of Paris, prior of Notre Dame de Bon Repos, near Venelles, canon of St. Louis du Louvre, and prior of St. Honoré de Paris, where he died in 1800. He wrote, Vie des Pères, des Martyrs, et des Autres Personnes Saints (from the English of Alban Butler, Villemarque and Paris, 1768, 1778, 1784), containing a large number of anecdotes which, true or doubtful, afford philosophy, history. It has got among historians note translated from the Latin of Lecanis, Paris, 1776:—Fondements de la Religion Chrétienne (translated from the English of Chaloner) :—Table Alphabetique (of the Memoires de Trevoux down to 1740), and several theological works. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Godet des Marais, Paul de, a French prelate, was born at Tacle, near Blois, in June, 1649. He completed his studies at the Seminary of St. Sulpice, Paris, and became bishop of Chartres, confessor of madame Maintenon, and superior of the royal house of St. Cyri. On his promotion to the episcopacy he gave all his revenue to the poor. Nov. 21, 1655, he condemned several propositions taken from the works of madame Gisors and P. Lescou. He claimed also to bring Fosion to arraignment. In a speech signed with the cantonal of Nueilles and Bessac, a declaration which was sent to Rome by which he condemned the Maximes des Saints. He founded four seminaries and schools for the instruction of the young. He died Sept. 25, 1700. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Godwin, Thomas, D.D., an English prelate, was born at Oakingham, in Berkshire, in 1517, and was educated at Magdalen College, Oxford. In 1565 he was made dean of Christ Church, Oxford, and had also a prebend in the cathedral of Lincoln. In 1566 he was promoted to the deanery of Canterbury. In 1576 he was one of the ecclesiastical commissioners. He was consecrated bishop of Bath and Wells in September, 1584. He died Nov. 19, 1590. Among the Parker MSS. in Benedict Church, Cambridge, is a sermon he preached before the queen at Greenwich, in 1566, concerning the authority of the councils and fathers.

Goerge, Hugh William, a Dutch theologian and physician. After receiving the degree of doctor of medicine, he practiced at Middelburg, where he acquired a great reputation. He understood very well the dialects of north Europe, and the classical languages, and occupied his leisure with archaeology and translating several ancient authors. He died at Middelburg about 1643. For further mention of his works, see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Goetschius, John Henry, a Reformed (Dutch) minister (son of a German minister who was sent over, probably in 1738, from the fatherland, to labor among the Quakers in and around Pennsylvania), was born in 1718, in Switzerland, studied in the University of Zurich, and under Rev. G. H. Doratius, in Pennsylvania, who, with Rev. J. T. Frelinghuyzen, licensed and ordained him in 1738. He was settled successively in North and South Hampton, Pa. (1738), in Jamaica, Newtown, and vicinity, on Long Island (1740), and at Hackensack and Schraabenburgh, N. J. (1748), where he died, Nov. 14, 1774. The validity of his ordination having been questioned, he was newly examined and reordained in 1748, under the authority of the General Conference. But while men disputed, God honored his faithful services, both before and after his second ordination, with frequent and great revivals. His whole ministry was contemporaneous with the agitation of the vexed question of education and ordination in this country, and especially in his last and longest pastorate in New Jersey, were the churches divided and troubled by its unfortunate developments. When the church was locked against him on Long Island, he preached on the steps, or under the trees, or in barns, or in private dwellings. It is related that on one occasion the chief of the state, and in the few days he was there, gave out the entire 119th Psalm to be sung, to prevent his preaching. Once, when in danger of forcible resistance to his entering the church at Hackensack, he girded on his sword, and with it entered the pulpit, for in those days it was not unusual for clergymen to carry their swords, and carry it into the pulpit and place it behind them during the service. Yet Mr. Goetschius was a man of peace, a learned, pious, godly, faithful, and eminently successful preacher of the gospel in troublous times. He was also the theological instructor of a number of young men who rose to eminence and power in the Church, and who were the apostles of a liberal and independent ecclesiastical polity. Among these were professor Romeyn, the younger Frelinghuyzen, Leesveld, and others. He was one of the original trustees of Rutgers College, and a leader in the broad movements of his denomination. "He was below the middle size, of a vigorous constitution, abrupt in speech, but his language was clear and expressive." One of his pupils, Dr. Solomon Froelich, describes him as "a gentleman of peace and piety, a thorough observer of the scriptures, and an accomplished theologian." See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America, s. v.; Taylor, Annals of Classis of Bergen, p. 189; Autobiography of Dr. S. Froelich. (W. J. H. T.)

Goldren, Adolph Wilhelm von, a Lutheran theologian, was born May 13, 1865, at Copenhagen. He studied at Kiel and Jens, was preacher at the latter place in 1872, member of consistory in 1725, and rector at Hamburg in 1871. He died July 24, 1874. Besides translating into German Buddeus's work, De Atheismo et Superstitione (Jena, 1729), he wrote Dis. Inaug. Theologica de Fermento Phaenomenum (1801). See Thiese, Hamburger Gelehrten-Geschichte; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Goldenen, T. C., M.D., D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in England, April 16, 1818. He emigrated to America in 1849, settled near Kingston, Wis., and the year following entered the Wisconsin Conference, wherein he successively served Cascade, Sheboygan Falls, Omro, and Fond du Lac, two years each. He was then transferred to the West Wisconsin Conference, and stationed at La Crosse. When the North-west Wisconsin Conference was formed he became a member of it, and was appointed presiding elder of La Crosse district from 1863 to 1864; elected a delegate to General Conference in 1866; Eau Clair district from 1868 to 1866; delegate to General Conference in 1864; located from 1865 to 1869; readmitted to the Upper Iowa Conference in 1870, and for three years was stationed at Mount Vernon, and then was appointed presiding older of Vinton district. He died May 29, 1879. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1879, p. 50.

Golden Age is a term used in the Greek and Roman mythology to denote the reign of Saturn (q. v.), when justice and innocence were supposed to have prevailed throughout the earth, and the soil to have produced all that was necessary for the subsistence and enjoyment of mankind.

Goldhorn, David Johann Heinrich, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Leipzig, July 31, 1810, and died there, professor of theology, Dec. 21, 1874. In connection with Gerson, he published, Bibliotheca Patrum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum Selecta (Leipzig, 1838):—wrote besides, Commentatio Historicno-Theologica de Ssuum Principii Theologia Abelardi (ed.).—Die theologische Literatur des Jahres 1840 and 1841 (1842-44). Goldhorn, Johann David, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Sept. 12, 1774. After having served at different places as preacher, he was called to Leipzig in 1856 as professor of theology, and died Oct. 6, 1862. He published, Eucharistischen Buche Jonas (Leipzig, 1803):—De Puerorum Innocentia in Sermonibus Sacris, etc. (1828):—Predigtgen und Kasualreden (8 vols.). See Winer, Handbuch der theolog. Litt. i, 28, 88, 869; ii, 56, 66, 172; Zachold, Biblioth. theologi. i, 448 sq. (B. P.)

Goldborough, Godfrey, D.D., an Anglican bishop of the 16th century, was born in Cambridge, bred in Trinity College (pupil of archbishop Whitgift), became afterwards fellow thereof, prebend of Hereford in 1566, archdeacon of Salop in 1589, was consecrated bishop of Gloucester in 1589, and died March 26, 1604. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), i, 253.

Goldschad, Gottfried Conrad, a Lutheran minister of Germany, was born May 18, 1719. He studied at Wittenberg, was in 1744 regent of the Kreuzschule at Dresden, in 1750 rector of St. Anne, and died in 1767. He wrote, De Mandato Christi Jo. xxii, 15-17 (1780):—Chorus Marianus Gloriam Christi Celebret in Sp. Laviti, 26 (1751):—Septem Septuagesimae ante Du Harmoniam et Apoc. i, 6 (1752):—De Provincia Pacifica et Exinatorus Justia Ecclesiae et Deo Promissia ex Esaia xi, 17 (1750):—Solomoniae et Justinianae Institutiones Constitution ac Præsum ex Proo. xxvi, 6 (1760):—Historiae Nachricht von der Parnische nach Dresden (1745). Goldsmith, John, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Riverhead, N. Y., April 10, 1794. He graduated from the College of New Jersey in 1815, and from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1819; was ordained a minister by the Presbytery of New York, Nov. 17, the same year; preached at Newtown, L. I., thereafter until his death, April 6, 1854. See Gen. Col. of Princeton Theol. Sem., 1881, p. 22.

Goldwell, James, LL.D., an English priest of the 16th century, was born at Great Chart, Kent, educated in All-Souls' College, Oxford, promoted prebend of Hereford in 1461, dean of Salisbury in 1468, secretary to king Edward IV, and at last made bishop of Norwich in 1472. He repaired the church at Great Chart, and founded a chapel on its south side. He died Feb. 15, 1498. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), ii, 137.

Goldwell, Thomas, an English priest, was born at Great Chart, Kent. Being a Benedictine, he was by queen Mary preferred bishop of St. Asaph's in 1558, but quitted the land in the first year of queen Elizabeth's reign, and, going to Rome, induced the pope to grant indulgences to those who made a pilgrimage to the well of St. Winifred, in his diocese. He died in Rome about 1581. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), ii, 137.

Goldol, John, an Armenian patriarch of Constantinople, was born at Bales, and educated in the monastery of Amenbolu. During his patriarchate three churches belonging to the Armenians of Constantinople, which had been burned down, were rebuilt with taste and elegance. He also built several schools. The only writing of which he is the author is a profession of faith, which he addressed to the papal court at Rome. He sought to re-establish the harmony between the national church of Armenia and the united Armenians or Roman Catholics. He was accused of softness by his people, and seeing that the preaching of the missionaries gave occasion to troubles, he closed their churches. Goldol died in 1741. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Goltz (Lat. Golzius), Hendrik, a pre-eminent Dutch engraver and painter, was born at Mülbech, in thul, was born about 1558, and studied engraving under Theodorus Cuermert. He afterwards visited Italy, and studied the works of Raphael, Michael Angelo, and P. da Caravaggio. He began painting at the age of forty-two, and executed a number of fine pictures. The following are some of the principal: The Life and Passion of Our Saviour; Christ and the Apostles: The Circumcision: The Adoration of the Magi: The Holy Family: The Temple of St. Anthony: The Holy Family: The Nativity: The Murder of the Innocents: The Annunciation: The Last Supper: The Full of Adam and Eve: The Dead Christ Supported by an Angel. Goltz died at Haerlem in 1617. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Gomari, a name sometimes applied to the Calvinists in Holland in the 17th century, after Francis Gomar (q. v.), an eminent opponent of the Armenians in the synod of Dort.

Gomes, Joan, a reputable historical painter of Madagascar, was born in 1550. He painted several subjects from the life of St. Jerome; also the large picture of the Martyrdom of St. Ursula. He restored the Annunciation and the St. Jerome Penitent, by F. Zuccaro, which Philip II had rejected and ordered to be restored, the first of which was the Crucifixion, with the Virgin Mary and St. John. As an engraver, he was far more distinguished: his prints number over five hundred. The following are some of the principal: The Life and Passion of Our Saviour; Christ and the Apostles: The Circumcision: The Adoration of the Magi: The Holy Family: The Temple of St. Anthony: The Holy Family: The Nativity: The Murder of the Innocents: The Annunciation: The Last Supper: The Full of Adam and Eve: The Dead Christ Supported by an Angel. Goltz died at Haerlem in 1617. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Gomidas, an Armenian patriarch, was born at Agatha, in the canton of Arakadzin. He was bishop of the Mambigians, when he was elected patriarch in 617. He was succeeded by John III, Gomidas, and erected a magnificent church, dedicated to St. Hripsimia. He died in 623, leaving Nerpogh Hripsim ("Hymn in honor of St. Hripsime"), which is still contained in the Armenian liturgy. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Smith, Diet. of Christ. Gondi, Pierre de, a cardinal-bishop of Paris, was born in 1583. He studied jurisprudence at Toulouse, and theology at Paris. Before 1589 he was bishop of Gien and Langres. In the latter he resided. In the following year he became bishop of Paris. A short time after the death of his brother, Henry III sent him to Rome to ask of the pope permission to alienate from the revenues of the clergy 60,000 gold florins. During the league, the Spaniards sought in vain to draw him into their party. He refused the cardinal's hat, which Sixtus V offered to him in 1588, except on condition of

GONDRI, LOUIS HENRY de PARDAILLAIN de, a French priest, was born at the castle of Gondrion, in the diocese of Auch, in 1620. He studied at the College de la Fleche, at the University of Paris, and in the Sorbonne. Being a relative of the bishop of Sens, Octavius of Bellegrand, he was appointed his coadjutor in 1645, and succceeded the following year. He was one of the first who censured the Aology of the Caesars. In 1658 he signed the letter of the assembly of the clergy to pope Innocent X, in which the prelates recognised only the five famous propositions of Jansenius. He disapproved of the work of the Jesuits of the 18th century, and contributed to the deliverance of pope Clement VII, who had been kept in prison by Charles V. The pope rewarded him by appointing him a cardinal, and archbishop of Modena in 1627. He died in 1629. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

GONZAGA, FIORE de, an Italian cardinal, was born in 2 Nov, 1549. Cardinal Ercole de Gonzaga educated him with much care, and at the age of sixteen Scipione had perfectly acquired the ancient languages. He then studied philosophy at the University of Padua. In 1568 he founded in that city the Academy of the Eterei, of which he was the president, the principal patron, and the remainder of his life. Finally he entered into the ministry, and was appointed patriarch of Jerusalem. In 1587 he received the cardinalate from pope Sixtus V. He was the intimate friend of Tasso. He died Jan. 11, 1598, leaving several pieces in verse, which were published among others, in 1587, of the Academy of the Eterei. In 1597 the abbott Marotti published Commentarii di Vita sua, memoirs written in Latin by Gonzaga. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

GONZAGA, SIGISMONDO de, an Italian captain and cardinal, was born in 1515. In his military career he distinguished himself as a clever general. In 1549 he was made cardinal by Julius II, whom he defended with considerable energy against his numerous enemies. In 1551 he was appointed bishop of Mantua, and died there in 1555. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

GONZALVO, MARTIN, a Spanish religious impostor of the 16th century, was born at Coruna, and called himself the angel Michael, to whom he attributed the service of the place of Lucifer, and who would some day fight against antichrist. The Inquisition burned him, but his disciple, Nicolas de Calabros, sought to outrage him after his death as the son of God, and preached that the Hour of the Second would become incalculable, and that at the day of judgment Gonzalvo would deliver by his prayers all the condemned. De Calabros also perished in the flames. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

GON-ZAR, Kin-ZO, a Japanese Buddhist monk, was born in 788, in the district of Taka-Tki, a province of Yamato. One day his father saw in a vision an Augustus being embrace her in his arms, and shortly afterwards she bore this son. In his twelfth year he entered a hermitage. About the year 796 he commenced the publication of a commentary in eight parts, of Fu-Ke-gyô (in Chinese Fa-Houa-King), or sacred book of the Japanese. After his death in 827, he received the name of So-degaya. He is famous in Japan for having possessed such a high degree of knowledge on the Buddhist dogmas, and among others for having fixed the actual order of the Japanese alphabet. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

GOOD SONS, Orden der, a religious congregation of the third order of St. Francis, was founded in 1616, at Armantieres, in a small town in Flanders, by five pious artisans. In 1626 they adopted the third rule of St. Francis. The order progressed gradually, and in 1670 consisted of two congregations, that of Lisle being added to the first one formed. Shortly after a third was formed at St. Omer, and Louis XIV gave them the direction of various public hospitals. They practiced great austerity, and used the discipline of the scourge three times a week.

Goode, William H., D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Warren County, O., June 19, 1807. He began school-teaching at the age of seventeen, in Green County, afterward removed to Madison, Ind., where he continued teaching, and studied law; was admitted to the bar before he was twenty-one; experienced religion about this time; at the age of twenty was elected president of Gallatin County Seminary, Pulaski, Ky., which position he held for two years; then returned to Indiana and followed farming seven or eight years; was licensed to preach in 1835; in 1836 entered the Indiana Conference, and was appointed to Lexington Circuit. A few months later he was elected principal of the New Aliquippa Seminary. Subsequently he was sent to Jeffersonville and Indianapolis stations; in 1842 was appointed presiding elder of South Bend District, but in the middle of the year was transferred to the Arkansas Conference, and appointed to Fort Coffee Academy and mission, Choctaw nation. In 1851 he removed to N. Y., where he remained till 1858, and then removed to Cleveland, O., as pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, where his work was marked by very great success. In 1872, after securing the settlement of the Rev. H. C. Haydn as associate pastor, he left for a visit to foreign lands, but the health of the latter required confinement, and he died at Lausanne, Switzerland, July 11, 1874. As a preacher, Dr. Goodrich was scholm speculative and theoretical, never dogmatic nor sectarian, but eminently spiritual and practical. A very strong point in his character was his downrightness and reticulating common-sense. He was remarkable for insight into the character of all with whom he had to do.

Goodsell, Buel, a veteran Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Dover, N. Y., July 25, 1793. He was converted at the age of sixteen; in 1814 was received into the New York Conference, and served Granville Circuit, Mass. and Conn.; in 1815, Stowe, Conn.; in 1816, Chazy Circuit, N. Y.; in 1817, Middleborough, Vt.; in 1818-19, St. Alban's Circuit; in 1820-21, Chazy Circuit, N. Y.; in 1822, Charlotte Circuit, Vt.; in 1823-26, Champlain District; in 1827, Fitchburg, N. Y.; in 1828-29, Schenectady; in 1830-31, New York City; in 1832-33, Troy District; in 1838-39, John Street, New York city; in 1840-41, North Newburgh; in 1842-43, White Plains; in 1844-45, York Street, Brooklyn; in 1846-47, Willett Street, New York city; in 1848-49, Norwalk, Conn.; in 1850-51, Hempstead, L. I.; in 1852-53, New Rochelle, N. Y.; in 1854, East Brooklyn, L. I.; in 1855-58, Long Island District; in 1859-60, Greenpoint, Brooklyn; in 1861-62, Rocksaway, L. I.; and thereafter East Chester and City Island, N. Y., until his death, May 4, 1868. Mr. Goodsell was a laborious, faithful, and successful minister. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1864, p. 89.

Goodsell, Dana, a veteran Presbyterian minister, was born at Bradford, Conn., Aug. 28, 1808. He entered Princeton Seminary in 1827, and remained there over two years; began a year's service in Mississippi as agent of the American Sunday-school Union, Oct. 8, 1827; in the autumn of 1828 he traveled in the South, and at Lowell, Mass. He was ordained and installed as pastor at Plainfield, Sept. 27, 1837, and dismissed Sept. 25, 1839; was next installed pastor at South Amherst, Mass., April 21, 1841, and after laboring there with much acceptance, was dismissed Nov. 12, 1846. Subsequently to 1847 he traveled in the South, in the service of the American Tract Society, preaching to destitute churches, and distributing religious books. In failing health he next went to North Carolina, where he accumulated much property, which was lost on the opening of the civil war in 1861. He the returned to the North, and henceforth spent most of his time in Philadelphia, where he preached as opportunity offered, and engaged in other Christian labor. In his old age he lost the remainder of his property and was cast upon the charity of the world. Becoming very feeble, he was taken, June 17, 1874, to "The Old Man in the Hills," and died there, Feb. 19, 1876. Mr. Goodsell was a man of strong intellect and firm convictions, wonderfully gifted in prayer, quiet and devoted. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1877, p. 24.

Goodspeed, Edgar Johnson, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in Johnsburgh, Warren Co., N. Y., May 31, 1831. He entered the University of the State of N. Y., at Buffalo, in 1848, and in 1852 graduated at Union College, Schenectady, and graduated from the University of Rochester in 1853, and from the Rochester Theological Seminary in 1856. Immediately he was ordained pastor of the Central Baptist Church in Poughkeepsie, and in the fall of 1856 removed to Janesville, Wis., in the same capacity, where he had eminent success. On the formation of the Second Baptist Church of Chicago, in 1864, he was called to be its pastor, and for several years labored with great constancy and success. In the winter of 1870, he was suddenly prostrated by asthma, and spent several months in Europe. On his return he received for his colleague his brother, Rev. T. W. Goodspeed; and in 1876 was forced to resign. He next spent a year and a half at New Market, N. J., in entire retirement from the cares, and in 1877 he accepted a call to the Central Church of Syracuse, N. Y. In 1879 he took charge of the Benedict Institute, Columbia, S. C., with the hope that a milder climate would benefit his health. The school largely increased under his administration; but in the midst of his usefulness he died, June 12, 1881. He was a member of the board of trustees of the Chicago University and of the Theological Seminary. He was editor of Coburn's Commentary on the Bible, and wrote The Wonderful Career of Moody and Sankey in Great Britain and America:—The Life of Jesus, for Young People:—The Lives of the Apostles, for the Young:—The Great Fires in Chicago and the West:—A History of the Centennial. See Chicago Standard, June 23, 1881. (J. C. S.)

Goodwillie, Thomas D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Barnet, Caledonia Co., Vt., Sept. 27, 1800. His parents were natives of Scotland, and emigrated to the United States in 1803. He graduated from Dartmouth College, N. H., in 1820, and 1823 was licensed by Cambridge Presbytery, and in 1826 installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Barnet. He was a man of large experience, and an accomplished scholar. He travelled extensively through Europe in order to recuperate his health, as well as to study the workings of Catholicism. He was a life member of the American Bible Society. Dr. Goodwillie died Feb. 11, 1867. He possessed good natural ability, carefully cultivated and improved by study and intercourse with men. See Wilson, Prec. Hist. Amaran, 1868, p. 265.

Goodwin, Benjamin, D.D., an English Baptist minister, was born at Bath, Oct. 10, 1754. Educated at the Blue School, began to learn Latin, Greek, and Hebrew while an apprentice, but went to sea, and was pressed into the navy. In 1802 he returned to Bath, was converted, and joined the Church in 1803. In 1806 he became an itinerant evangelist, and in 1809 settled as pastor at Clappling-Sodbury. In 1811 he removed to Dartmouth, and in 1815 to Great Missenden, Bucks. In 1822 he was appointed classical professor at Horton, where he continued to labor with unintermitting vigor during many years. In 1838 he entered heartily into the controversy on property, in 1830 delivered lectures against "colonial slavery," and in 1834 lectured on the atheistic controversy. In 1838 he became pastor of the Baptist Church at Oxford, and took a leading part in reconciling the differences which had arisen in the Scripture mission. In 1849 he took part in the jubilee at potassium of the founding of the Baptist missions. In 1848 he exposed the evil tendency of Dr. Pusey's teaching on the eucharist. In 1846 he returned to Bradford; in 1850 was chairman of the London meeting of the Baptist Union; in 1858 enlarged and redesigned his lectures on atheism, which in 1855 he delivered to Rawdon; at the age of eighty joined in the Baptist Union meeting; in 1868 he wrote two elaborate essays on the Future State, and died Feb. 20, 1871. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1872.

Goodwin, William H., D.D., LL.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Goodwin's Point, New York, Dec. 29, 1803. He was educated by his youth and was brought up at nineteen years of age, and the next year entered the Genesee Conference. His appointments were: first in his native place, then Ovid, Catharine, Brockport, East Rochester, Lyons, Canandaigua, Vienna, and Penn Yan. In 1848, on the division of the conference, he became a member of the East at Bath, at which he was served Lyons, East Rochester, Elmira, Geneva, Hornellsville District, Elmira District, Rochester District, Geneva, Clayton Springs, Bushville, Ovid, and in 1874 Dryden, where his health failed, and where he died, Dec. 17, 1879. Mr. Goodwin was transferred from Ontario and Livingston counties in 1854; and in 1865 was appointed regent of the University of New York. He was, in personal appearance, very prepossessing; tall, well developed, noble; in character, frank, generous to a fault; had a voice rarely equalled in depth, fullness, and sweetness; imagination fertile and chaste; a mind of great natural strength, finely cultured in logic and rhetoric; and a sincere enthusiasm that overcame all obstacles. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1876, p. 188; Simpson, Cyclo. of Methodism, s. v.

Gopis, in Hindu mythology, are the nine beautiful maidens who accompanied the youthful Krishna and with him danced at night on the plains of Agra. Krishna is the Apollo, and these Gopis are the muses of the Hindoos. The number nine might be doubtful, were not Krishna represented riding on an elephant, which is artistically composed of the forms of these Gopis.

Gordon, Adam, a Scotch presbyter, was dean of Caithness and minister at Pettico, and was bishop of the see of Caithness. When he was made bishop is not known. He died at Elgin, June 4, 1588. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 214.

In 1570 he preached in John Knox's pulpit, at Edinburgh. In 1570 he was a judge in the Court of Session. He died in the same year. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 279, 307.

Gordon, John (1), a Scotch preslate, was made bishop of Galloway Feb. 4, 1588, and consecrated at Glasgow. After the revolution he followed king James to Ireland, and then to France, and while at St. Germain's read the liturgy of the Church of England to all Protestants who came to hear. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 288.

Gordon, John (2), D.D., F.S.A., a Church of England divine, was born at Whitworth, Durham, in 1725. He was a graduate of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, where he took the degrees of A.B. in 1748, A.M. in 1752, and D.D. in 1755, at Peterhouse; and was elected a fellow of Emanuel College in 1751. At his decease, which occurred Jan. 19, 1783, he was precentor and archdeacon of Lincoln, and rector of Henstead, Suffolk. He was the author of a New Estimate of the Manners and Principles of the Times, 3 parts: — Occasional Thoughts on the Study of Classical Authors (1762); — and two Sermons preached at Cambridge. See (Lond.) Annual Register, 1783, p. 69.

Gordon, Thomas, a noted religious writer, was born in Kirkcudbright, Galloway, Scotland, about 1684, and had a university education. While young he went to London, at first as a teacher, and afterwards as a writer, becoming widely known for his political and religious articles and pamphlets. He died July 26, 1750. He published, Tacitus Translated into English (1728-31): — The Independent Whig, or a Defence of Primitive Christiani(y (1732); — Sallust Translated into English (1744): — two collections of tracts: I. A Cordial for Lost Spirits (1730); II. The Pillars of Priestcraft and Orthodoxy Shaken (ed.). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Gordon, Thomas Patterson, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Monongahela City, Washington Co., Pa., July 23, 1818. He graduated from Jefferson College, Canonsburg, in 1844, and from the Theological Seminary at Allegheny in 1847, and was licensed by Ohio Presbytery, and ordained pastor of the Buffalo Church in Cumberland, where he labored till 1842 with great acceptance. Gorgonia, in Greek mythology, were daughters of Phorcys and Ceto, of extraordinary beauty, but because of their pride were changed by the gods into snake-haired monsters. Their heads were covered with dragon-scales, they had teeth like byenias, brazen hands, and wings. Their appearance was so horrible that all who saw them were transformed into stone. Their names were: Stheno, Euryale, and Medusa; the latter is usually called Gorgo. The first two were immortal, Medusa was not. When Perseus was ordered to get the head of the Gorgon, only Medusa could have been meant. See Medusa.

Gorham, Nicholas, an eminent Dominican of the 14th century, was born at Gorham, near St. Alban's, Hertfordshire, educated at Merton College, Oxford, went to France when a young man, spent the rest of his life there, and died in Paris about 1400. "Many and learned are his books," says Thomas Fuller, "having commented on almost all the Scriptures, and no hands have fewer spots of pitch upon them who touched the superscription of that age" (Worthies of England, ed Nuttall, ii, 51).

GOOLEWSKI (Lat. Goolewski), Adam, of Bobele, an adherent of Socinus, lived in Poland in the first part of the 17th century, and wrote works in Latin (Rakow, 1607, 1620). Their object is to refute the system of Kekkerman and of Martin on the divinity of Jesus Christ. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Generale, s. v.

GOOLICKI, Wawrzyniec (Lat. Golellicus, Lauren tius Grimaldi), a learned Polish ecclesiastic, was born about 1553, and educated at Cracow and Padua. He took orders in the Roman Catholic Church, and was successively appointed bishop of Kaminietz and Pozen. He was active in public affairs, and was frequently engaged in political matters. Through his influence the Jesuits, who were separated from the schools established at Cracow, He was also a strenuous advocate of religious toleration in Poland. He died Oct. 81, 1607. His principal work is De Optimo Senatore, etc. (Venice, 1669), of which there are two English translations, A Commentary on the Coward of Good Counsel, and The Accomplished Senator, done into English by Mr. Oldsworth (1733). See Encyclop. Brit. 9th ed. s. v.

GOOSMAN, John, D.D., a Reformed (Dutch) minister, was born in New York city in 1784. He graduated from Columbia College in 1801, and studied theology with Dr. Alexander Froud and John M. Mason; was licensed by the Presbytery of Washington in 1804, and supplied the Presbyterian churches of Lancingburg, etc., until 1805, when he became pastor at Kingston, to which, for three years, Hurley was attached. In 1835 he removed to the Second Reformed Church, Philadelphia, Pa., but remained only one year. After he had officiated as a stated supply in Port Byron Presbyterian Church (1834-41), and Coeymans and New Baltimore. In 1842 he became pastor of the Reformed Church, in Hudson, and remained eleven years, resigning on account of years and health. But he could not be idle even in retirement, as he engaged in the public work in the little country charge of Flatbush, Ulster Co., in 1854. He resigned in 1859, and died in 1865. Dr. Goosman was a man of commanding presence and genial manners, gifted with brilliant genius, artless as a child, generous and disinterested, full of vivacity and cheerfulness, humorous and witty, transparent, sincere, and attractive. His mind was quick, active, philosophical, and powerful, and his reading covered a wide range in literature and theology. In the pulpit he often exhibited a rare and wonderful eloquence. His sermons were filled with apt and illuminating, governed by a most faultless taste, and enriched by his knowledge of the best authors and of our English tongue. His memory was uncommonly retentive. His style was rich, terse, accurate, nervous, strong, and beautiful. In every good work he was a leader. GOSPEL, Book of the, the name of the volume from which the lessons were read. We extract an account of it from Walcott, Sac. Arch. ed. v. See Evangelistaria.

"This volume, usually splendidly illuminated and bound in jewelled covers, always stood on the altar upon a stand, and the latter is called in 1640, in England, a desk: with degrees of advancement, in 1558 it stood in the midst of the altar. Two tapers, according to Amalarius, were carried before the gospel-keeper to represent the light of the gospel in the world, and other candles, signifying the law and the prophets, were extinguished, to show their accomplishment in the gospel. In St. Augustine's time the gospel was read on the north side, in allusion to the prophetic verse, Jer. III, 19; and the old sacramentaries added, because it is preached to those cold in faith, but at Rome, because the men sat on the south side, and the women on the north, the deacon turned to the former, as mentioned by Amalarius, probably in imitation of Cor. xiv, 35. The Gospels Animar speaks of reading from the north side as a new innovation, which he charges with the use of Hereford and Seville. In some parts of England, however, the south side was still observed as late as the 18th century. When the epistle was read on the lowest, the gospel was read on the upper choir steps from a lectern: on principal festivals, Palm Sunday, and the eve of Easter and Pentecost, they were read in the round loft. As at St. Paul's, in cathedrals of the new foundation, also, and in all cathedrals, the canons of 1668, a gospel-keeper and epistolarus, or deacon and subdeacon, who is either minor canons or priest-vicars, are appointed; they are to be vested and equipped in the same manner as the celebrant in the Epistle, that is, in cope. In 1180 all these were to be canons at York, by pope Alexander III's order. Anasta-half of his scabbard, to show that all were ready to fight for death for the gospel. There was a curious English medieval superstition of crossing the legs when the gospel from the first chapter of St. John was read. The Gospels were apparently intended to be read in the Rogation processions.

Gospels, Apocryphal (or Spurious). By way of supplement we add the following. At an early period two classes of these works were noted: first, such as have reference to the infancy of Christ, Evangelia Infantia, and, second, those which speak of his passion Evangelia Passionis Iesu Christi. The following are now extant:

1. Protoevangelium Jacobi, or, according to its title in the manuscript, The History of James concerning the Birth of Mary (Ἡ ιερά ιωάννη πρ辽宁省 γιννη υοντος Μαρίας). See Tischendorf, Evangelia Apocrypha (Leipsic, 1858), p. 1-49; Wright, Contributions to the Apocryphal Literature of the New Testament, Colclected and Edited from Syriac MSS. in the British Museum (London, 1865).

2. Evangelium Pseudo-Matthaii sive Liber de Ortus Beatae Mariae et Infantis Salutaris. See Thilo, Co-dez Apocryphi New Test. p. 387-400; Schade, Liber de In-fanitia Mariae et Christi Salutaris (Halle, 1869); Tischendorf, l.c. p. 105-114.

3. Evangelium de Nativitate Mariae, which seems to be another form of 2. See Tischendorf, l.c. p. 105-114.

4. Historia Iosephi Fabrici Lignarii. See Tischendorf, p. 115-138.

5. Evangelium Thomas. Tischendorf, who discovered difficulties in this text, traces it back to a manuscript in Greek and one in Latin. The Greek titles are (1), θωμα ἵων φιλοσοφος ὤρα τας πατεδος του Κυριου; (2) Σύνολημι του χιου; (3) Ἄποστολον θωμα περ της πατεδος ἀναστασης του Κυριου. The Latin title is, Tractatus de Puericia Iesu Secundum Thomam. A Syriac text with an English translation was published by Wright (London 1875).

6. Evangelium Infantis Arabicum. See Tischendorf,

7. Evangelium Nicodemi, consisting of two separate works, (a) Gueta Pilati and (b) Decretus Christi ad Infernos. Both these works were joined together at an early date, though the combination did not receive the name it now bears until after the time of Charlemagne.
The original title of the first work was 'Ὑμνογεγα τον Κυριον ιουν Ιωαννη Χριστον προσιται ιν Πο ριον του Κυριου' and the Latin title is, Acta Pilati (in Gregor. Taron. Hist. Franc. i, 21, 24) or Acta Pilati (Justin Mart. Apol., i, 85). The author of the Acta Pilati was probably a Jewish Christian, and the work is of some importance for the explanation and further eluc-diation of the mystery of the Passion. See Hofmann, Leben Jesu, p. 264, 379, 386, 396; Tischendorf, Pilati circa Christum Judicio quid Latina Apograph Etia Pilati (Leipsic, 1865); Lisch, Die Pilatus-Alten (Kiel, 1871).

The second part of the Evangelium Nicodemi, the Decretus Christi ad Infernos, or Διγεγα τοι τας πατεδος του Κυριον ιουν Ιωαννη Χριστον και της αγιων αναστασης is of very little importance. In connection with these two works, Tischendorf gives some other apocryphal fabrications, which together form a group by themselves: namely, Epistola Pilati, included in the apocryphal Acta of St. Peter and St.
Paul (Greek text in Tischendorf, Acta Apost. Apocryph.
p. 18); which is a letter, addressed to the emperor Claudius Tibereus, containing a report of the resurrection of Christ; Epistola Domiti Pilati, another letter by him, in which he speaks of the same event; and the letter of his voice by the mean of a letter of Pilate after the emperor, his condemnation and execution. A forget of later origin is the Latin Epistola Pilati ad Titos (in Tischendorf, l.c. p. 414 sq.). To these Evangelia Apocrypha, which only constitute the smallest part of apocryphal gospels, the following must be added:

8. Evangelium Secundum Egyptiacum, i.e. 'the Gospel Secundum Egyptian,' in the four main among the Encratites (Clom.
Alex. Strom. iii, 9, 540 sqq.; Potter, iii, 552) and the

9. Evangelium Aeterum, the work of a Minorite of the 13th century, and condemned by pope Alexander IV.

10. Evangelium Andre, mentioned by pope Innocent
I (Epist. 6, ad Exuper.) and St. Augustine (Contra Advers. Leg. et Prophet, 20).

11. Evangelium Apollinis, probably a mutilation of one of the canonical gospels.

12. Evangelium Apostolorum, mentioned by Origen (Hom. in Luc.; Ambros. (Proem. in Lucam); Jerome (Proem. in Matt.)

13. Evangelium Rhabr, mentioned in the Decree-men Galatii, vi, 10, and in the catalogue of Anastasius Sinaita (by Credner, Gesch. des Kanons, p. 241).

14. Evangelium Bartholomaeus, mentioned by Jerome, Pref. in Matt.; Gallus, Decretum, vi, 12.

15. Evangelium Basilid, mentioned by Origen,

16. Evangelium Ceritas, seems to have been the Gosp, el according to Matthew, in some unascertained, and in this mutilated shape accepted by the Coptic.

17. Evangelium Ebionitarum, of which fragments are found in Epiph. Harae, xxiv, 16, 21.

18. Evangelium Ezra, in use by some gnostic (Epiph.
Harae, vii, 2, 5).

19. Evangelium Secundum Hebrews, one of the oldest apocalyptic productions, written in Chaldee with Hebrew letters, used by the Nazarenes, and translated into el according to the Hebrews (London 1879).

20. Evangelium Jacoba Majoria, found in Spain in 1595, and condemned by Innocent XII in 1692.

21. Joannis de Traniuti Mariae, not published by Tischendorf.

22. Evangelium Judae Isacharote, used by the Canities.

24. Evangelium des Fulbarri Lucianus, Apocrypha and Evangelio des Fulbarri Itzocan, Apocrypha. See Griesbach, Prolog. in ed. Narr. Test. iii; Hug, Einleitun

25. Evangelium Marcianorum, comprising

(a.) The Evangelium Thomae, different from the one given under 5.

(b.) The Evangelium Yurum.

(c.) The Evangelium Philippi.

(d.) The Evangelium Abd, also called Mocius, i.e. The Buskilia.

26. Evangelium Marci, a mutilation of the Gospel according to Luke, by the founder of the famous anti-Jewish sect.

27. Mariae Interrogationes Majoris et Minoris, two works of obscene contents, used by some Gnostics.

28. Evangelium Marci, mentioned by Origen, Jerome, Eusebius, Gallus, and Beda.

29. Narratio de Legali Christi Sacerdotio, comp.
Suidas, s. v. Τηγογις.

30. Evangelium Perfectionis, used by the Basildians and other Gnostics.

31. Evangelium Petri was in use in the congregation of Rhousus, in Cilicia, towards the close of the 2d century.

32. Evangelium Philippi, used by the Gnostics.

33. Evangelium Simionis, or as it was called by the Apostolikon et Oracles in a Mundi, i.e. Book of the Four Corners and Hinges of the World, divided into four parts.

34. Evangelium Secundum Syros, probably identical with the Evangelium Secundum Hebrews.

35. Evangelium Tabula, a compilation from the four gospels hence also called Diakonos (οδίς παραπτωμα).

St. Evangelium Valentinii, which is perhaps the same as the Evangelium Veritatis under the title of Constantinians, and differing widely from the canonical gospels. See Hofmann, in Herzog-Plitt, s. v., A polychryph des Neun Testament; Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Gosse, the name is applied to the priest in the English Church who reads the gospel in the communion service, standing at the northern side of the altar. In some cathedrals one of the clergy is appointed especially to perform this duty; hence the name.

Gör, KARL ERNST FRIEDRICH, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born June 18, 1757. In 1787 he was deacon in 1814 pastor at Bieversdorf, near Erlanden, and died June 8, 1856. He wrote, Der Verfall des öffentlichen Celts im Mittelalter (Guben, 1839); — Die Seelen-Feste (Erlanden, 1826). See Winer, Handbeh der theol. Lit. i, 576, 619. (B.P.)

Gossen, ANDREAS ARNOLD, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Dec. 20, 1700, in East Frisia. He studied at Halle, was preacher in 1725, in 1741 court-preacher at Aurich, in Prussia, and died Dec. 9, 1759. He was the author of a collection of sermons. In the schol. 1738, Das Evangelium in dem tie Kapitel Jesu (Bremen, 1738); — Das Evangelium in dem Kapitel Jesu (1786); — Das Evangelie - lich-katholische Kirchen Gläubigenehrismus (1789); — Richtig Mittleraasse in der Grundswehr der Evangelie- lich-katholischen Kirche (1747). See Neubauer, Recht- kehler Theologen; Jücher, Allgemeines Gelehrtn-Lexi- zens, s. v. (B.P.)

Goss, ISAAC, D.D., F.R.S., a Church of England divine, well known in London as a most intelligent purchaser and collector of books, and conspicuous at all public sales by his diminutive person, who was born 1744. He was of a refugee French family, and was the son of a modeller in wax, settled in London. He displayed from his childhood an extraordinary passion for rare books, and was educated at Exeter College, Oxford. He became eminent as a preacher, notwithstanding his personal disadvantages, but never sought or obtained a preferment. He was a good scriptural critic, and excelled as a bibliographer. He died Dec. 21, 1812. See (London.) Amul. Regist., 1812, p. 182.

Gossen, STEPHEN, an English divine and poet, was born at Kent in 1564, and was educated at Christ-

Church, Oxford. He became rector of St. Botolph, Bishopsgate Street, London, which poet he retained unti 31 years of age. He was distinguished for his position to the dramatic entertainments of the day. His death occurred in 1623. His publications are, The School of Abuse (1587); — Plays Composed in Four Actions;— The Trumpet of Wele. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Gossuin, an abbot of Anchin, theologian and scholastic philosopher. He was born at Anchin in 1086. He was one of the most distinguished students of the University of Paris, where he soon gained the reputation of an excellent grammarians and dialectician. Being admitted to the school of Joselin de Vierzy, who later became bishop of Soissons and also minister of Louis VII, king of France, Gossuin was appointed, by his master, to bring to Abadal, the rival of his teacher, a challenge on science. On his return to his native city, Gossuin entered into orders, and became successively minister of several monasteries. He was at the abbey of An- chan when pope Innocent IV charged the bishop of An- chien of Abelard, who had been condemned to con- fesse and silence. Afterwards he was appointed abbot of Saint-Pierre-de-Chêlons, and of Lobbes, in Hainaut, but he refused to accept. Gossuin finally ac- cepted the abbey of Anchin, and governed wisely this opulent monastery. He assisted at the Council of Rheims in 1147, where he gained the friendship of St. Bernard. Gossuin died in 1166. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Goth, BÉRAND DE, a French prelate, brother of pope Clement V, and son of Bérand I, lord of Villandruit (diocese of Bordeaux), was appointed to the archiepiscopate of Lyons in 1298. Bérand made his brother Bertrand de Goth his vicar-general. This appointment led to a long controversy. Bérand was made cardinal- bishop of Albano in 1294, by Celestine V. Boniface VIII appointed him his legate in France, to restore peace between the kings of France and England. Bé- rand died on his return from England, without having seen the end of the dissension, July 12, 1297. See Hoe- fer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

(Goths) (Gotiones, Gotones, Gotiones, in Tacitus and Phiny), a German people, originally dwelling along the Baltic sea between the Vistula and the Oder. Their native name, Gotikindus, is preserved in the Fragments of bishop Ulphilas. The latter form, Gothi, does not oc- cur until the time of Caracalla. At the beginning of the 8th century they are spoken of as a powerful nation in the regions of the lower Danube, where the Getæ and Scythians of former times had lived, and the name of Gothæ or Getæ or Scythæ is sometimes applied to them. The different tribes composing this people were: 1. The Gothi Minores or Musogothi, who became permanently established in Moesia, and devoted themselves to agricul- tural pursuits; 3. Peter of Montfort, Oestrogoths of the Palus Maeotis (Procop. Bell. Goth. iv); 8. Theifeld, in Dacia, a branch of the Vistagoths (Ana-mum, Marcell. vii, 13; xxxi, 8; Eutropius, vii, 9); — 4. Pepidius; — 5. Ruditius; — 6. Sciri and Tuscilingi; — 7. Herediti; — 8. Thuringes; — some writers include also the Alans and Vandals among the Goths. The nation of the Goths was divided into several principal groups; the Dacians, who occupied the sandy steppes of the East, and the Visi- goths, who inhabited the more fertile and wooded countries of the West. Zosimus and Ammianus Marcellinus frequently mention the Greutings or Grautings and the Thuringes or Tervingi, concerning whom different opinions are entertained by modern writers. They were, perhaps, the leading tribes among the Ostragoths and Vistagoths respectively. The language of the Goths re- sembled the ancient dialect of the Franks very closely. They wore beards, and suffered their yellow hair to grow long. The royal dignity among them was hered- itary.

The occupation of Dacia by this people took place during the reign of the emperor Philip (A.D. 244-249), and was immediately followed by aggressive wars against the Romans, in which Messia, Macedon, and Greece suffered from their incursions, and the armies of the emperor Decius were twice defeated and de- stroyed. Between 258 and 269 they ravaged the coasts of Europe and Asia Minor with a fleet of which they had become possessed. Potitus, Trapezus, Chal- lenon, Nicomedias, Nicopolis, Apamias, and Cius fell before their assaults: Cynicus was destroyed; and the coast of Greece, from the south of Peloponnese to Epip- rous and Theassaly was ravaged, Illyricum in particular being literally ravaged. In 269 Crete and Cyprus were swept by their destructive power, and Cassand- drea and Thessalonica were besieged; but in that year the emperor Claudius defeated them in three great battles, which earned for him the name of Goticus, and broke the barbarian power. A period of comparative quiet, interrupted by few and unimportant expedi- tions, now continued till 595. In that year the emperor Aurelian ceded to them the province of Dacia. In 382 they followed their king, Arrius, across the Danube, but were defeated, and concluded a peace which lasted until the family of Constantine vacated the imperial throne. In 375 vast swarms of Huns and Alans poured out of Asia and drove back the Ostr-
Goths upon the Visigoths, which latter people thereupon obtained permission to settle in Thrace, at that time lying desolate, the condition being imposed by the emperor Valens that they should embrace Christianity. Insolent usage, which they were called upon to endure at the hands of Roman officers, soon drove them into rebellion, however, and in the war which ensued they completely defeated the army of Valens in 378, and killed the emperor himself by burning a cottage which he had entered in his flight. From that time they exercised an important influence over the affairs of Constantinople, and were for a time regularly engaged in the service of the Roman empire. The application of the Ostrogoths for admission to the Roman empire was at last granted, and in 489, when threatened by the Huns, was denied, and they were compelled to seek refuge in the mountains until after the defeat of the Huns in 493, when they obtained a settlement in Pannonia and Slavonia.

In 398 the Visigoths, led by Alaric, invaded and devastated Greece, till the arrival of the Roman general Stilicho, in the following year, compelled their retreat. In 400 they invaded Italy, but were defeated. A treaty was thereupon made between Alaric and Stilicho, which transferred the services of the former to the Western emperor in return for an annual allowance. A second invasion was occasioned by the delay of the Romans to meet the demands of Alaric for pay, and a western province as a home for his nation, took place 408-410. In 408 Rome was subjected to a severe blockade, from which it relieved itself by the capture of the emperor in 411. In 410 with Alaric's demands led to a second siege, in which Ostia was occupied, Rome unconditionally surrendered, and the empire transferred to Attilus, but soon restored to Honorius. In 410 an assault upon the Visigoths, made with imperial sanction, provoked the solitude and sack of the city, Aug. 24-30. After the death of Alaric the Visigoths established a new kingdom in Southern Gaul and Spain, which reached its highest prosperity during the latter half of the 5th century, but was soon afterwards harassed by the Franks, in Gaul, and wholly overcome about two centuries later by the Saracens.

After the overthrow of the Huns the Ostrogoths in Pannonia became so powerful that the Eastern empire was obliged to purchase peace with them by large sums of money. This, the king, Welinian, lost his honor into the bargain, for they actually joined the Visigoths in the West. Other bands, under various leaders, traversed the Eastern empire, and were finally settled between the Lower Danube and Mount Ienisma, in the very heart of the empire. In 467 king Theodoric, after previous attempts to settle the empire, managed to establish himself upon Constantinople, whereupon that monarch, to save his capital, authorized the Goths to invade Italy and expel the usurper Odoacer. The enterprise was undertaken in 488, and completed in 493, at which time Odoacer was assassinated, and all his strongholds were in the possession of his adversary. Theodoric remained undisputed master of Italy during a prosperous reign of thirty-three years; but on his death his kingdom was attacked by foreign enemies, and became the prey of the Eastern empire, and the Ostrogoths ceased to be an independent people.

Christianity was introduced among the Goths about the middle of the 5th century, by prisoners taken in their wars, and there is evidence that a continuous tradition of orthodox Christianity existed from that time among the tribes who bordered on the Euxine. A Gothic bishop was for a time present in the Council of Nice, and even earlier Athanasius (De Incarn. Verb. § 51 sqq.; Migne, xxv, 187 sqq.; Neander, Church History, Engl. transl. iii, 179) alludes to the influence of Christianity over Gothic (7 barbarians; while Chrysostom (Ep. xiv; Migne, lii, 189) and Dionysius (Hist. Goth. iv, 4; ed. Bonn. ii, 475) both speak of applications made to the emperor for a successor to recent Gothic bishops. The propagation of Christianity among the Visigoths was carried forward principally by bishop Ulpianus, who bore the same name as the former; he was not successful from the very first to excite the hostility of the heathen and call forth persecution. Ulpianus and many of his converts fled across the Danube and settled in the neighborhood of Nicopolis. The particular form of teaching adhered to by Ulpianus was that of Ariamnus, which had already taken deep root, and was yet more firmly established when Fruligers, who had rebelled against the king, Athanarian, consented to become a Christian and an Arian in order that he might secure the support of the Roman emperor, and when, as in Germany, the Visigoths were obliged to take refuge against the Huns in the territories of the empire ruled over by the Arian, Valens. Subsequently efforts were put forth to win them to Catholicism, especially by Chrysostom, who became patriarch of Constantinople in 388, but with little result.

The Goths continued to be fanatical Arians, and became even violent persecutors after their settlement in Gaul and Spain, until the stubborn resistance of the Catholic party was strengthened by the accession of the Franks, and the Gothic king, Recared, solemnly passed over to the Catholic faith.

The Ostrogoths, though Arians, were not fanatical adherents of that creed, and Theodoric especially manifested a tolerant spirit towards the Catholics. Chrysostom's missionaries were zealously employed among these tribes, and achieved noteworthy successes. In 476 Charles the Great in the Church in the Middle Ages, and the surname of Gothic was borne by the bishop of Capha as late as the 14th century.

In closing this article a few words respecting the culture of the Goths are required. The introduction of Christianity, and contact with the civilized subjects of Rome, did much to raise them above other German tribes in point of civilization. Ulpianus, in the 4th century, formed a new alphabet out of those of the Greeks and Romans, which was generally adopted by the German peoples, and is essentially the same as that still in use in Germany. The pagans preserved, under the "black-letter" alphabet. His translation of the Scriptures into the Gothic language is, in the fragments which still survive, the most ancient document of the German language now extant. No other monuments of the Gothic language of considerable importance have been preserved than a few fragments in Visigothic, among which was probably the first existing among German tribes, and the authorship of which is usually ascribed to their king, Eutric, of the 5th century.

the Saxons. Gotteskalck was defeated by Bernhard, duke of Saxony, and taken prisoner. He returned to Christianity, and after his release from prison went to the court of Sultan the Great, spent ten years in Denmark and England, and after his return to Wendland in 1443 he united Holstein, Mecklenburg, Pomerania, and the Brandenburg marches into one powerful Wendland empire. He now became one of the most zealous missionaires in his country, translated the liturgical formulas and sermons of German missionaries into the vernacular; he built schools, churches, monasteries, and preached to his people. In spite of all his efforts, there lingered yet among his countrymen a heathenish fanaticism which found vent in an inscription that broke out in 1606, and in which Gotteskalck was murdered on January 2. Gotteskalcksson, Oddur, the translator of the New Testament into Icelandic, son of the second bishop of Holum, in Iceland, was educated in Norway, and visited Denmark and Germany. The doctrines of the Reformation began to excite a general sensation throughout the north of Europe, and his attention was forcibly arrested by the truths which were then unfolded. We are told that, for three successive nights, he prostrated himself half-naked before the Father of lights beseeching him to open the eyes of his understanding, and to show him whether the principles of Rome on those points were correct or erroneous. The result of his prayers and meditations was a deep-rooted conviction that the cause of the reformer was the cause of God; and with the view of obtaining further information he repaired to Germany, and attended the lectures of Luther and others. On his return to Iceland he entered the service of bishop Osgunnand. The latter wished Gotteskalcksson to become a priest, but he declined the offer, because, as he said, he had no voice for singing. As the servant of bishop Osgunnand, he commenced the translation of the New Testament into Icelandic; and, to avoid persecution, he selected a small cell in a cow-house for his study. He completed a version in 1599; but finding it impossible, from the state of public opinion, to print it in Iceland, he sailed for Denmark, and published it at Copenhagen under the pseudonym of Evangelist III, in 1599. Besides this translation he published Buggenhagen’s history of the sufferings and resurrection of Jesus Christ, and Junich’s sermons on the Catechism in Iceland. He died in 1557. See Jocher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. F.)

Götze, George Friedrich, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Hangau, April 9, 1750. He studied at Halle, became doctor of divinity and pastor primarius in his native place, and died there, Feb. 8, 1813. He published Seremo and some ascetical writings. See Doring, Die gelehrt Theologen Deutschlands, s. v.; Winer, Handbueh der theol. Lit. ii, 158, 157, 160, 163, 175, 178, 181, 184, 204, 206, 290. (B. P.)

Götze, Raphael, a Swiss theologian, poet, and teacher, was born at Götz of Mitichhoff (Thurgovia), in 1559. He studied at Chur and Zurich, and went to Geneva in 1580, where he held a disputation on predestination, under the auspices of Theodore Beza. Two years afterwards he went to Basle, where he again assumed the presbyterial power. In 1588 he received in Zurich the title pedagogus alumnorum, and in 1592 became, in the same city, professor of the New Test., and deacon at the cathedral. Four years afterwards he was made archdeacon, and thereupon introduced many religious regulations into his parish. Unfortunately he gave himself up to alchemy, which brought him into debt, to escape which he died in 1601. After wandering about for six months, he went to Marburg, where the landgrave Maurice appointed him professor of theology. He died there, Aug. 20, 1625, leaving Tractatus adversus Alburm Triumcardum, de Providentia; —De Pescato in Spiritu S. —De Gratuita Electorum Salute, etc.; —Historia Capucinica Belgicae. Gouda, Jan van, a Dutch Jesuit, who died Dec. 29, 1650, at Brussels, was for some time professor at Antwerp and also at the University of Paris. In his sermons he was especially severe against the Protestants, and his co-religionists styled him therefore malteus hereticorum and merus Catholicorum. His writings are mostly directed against ministers of the Reformed Church. See Alemagbe, Bibliotheca Scriptorum Sociaetatis Jesu; Barman, Tractament Eruditorum; Jocher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Goudimel, Claude, a French musical composer, was born about 1510 in Franche-Comté. He lived at Rome in 1540 when Palestrina studied there. In 1556 he was at Paris, and kept a note-printing establishment there. In 1562 he joined the Reformed Church, and was at Geneva in 1563. He was a victim of the Huguenot massacre at Lyons, Aug. 24, 1572. He prepared the music for Clement Marot’s and Theodore Beza’s translation of the Psalms (1565). Some writers assert that he also composed Huguenot hymns, such as are still sung; but this is a mistake. See Feiss, Biog. des Musiciens; Haag, La France Music.; Doun, Clément Marot et le Poëtique Huguenot, and the same in Lichtenberger’s Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.; Grimes en in Plitt-Hersig, Real-Encyclop., s. v.; Grove, Dict. of Music, s. v. Gouffier, Adrien, cardinal of Bois, had at first the title of protonotary of Bois, then he became bishop of Coutances in 1508. Francis I asked for the cardinal’s hat for him of pope Leo X, in the conference of Bologna, which this pontiff granted in 1515. In 1519 Gouffier obtained a charge as a legate in France. He was already grand almoner, and held the bishopric of Alby and other considerable benefices. He died in the castle of Villeneuve-sur-Indre, July 24, 1525. See Hoefner, Nou. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Gouge de Charpygneux, Martin, a French prelate, was born about 1580, in Bourges. After the death of his brother John, who was treasurer of the duke of Berry, Martin was appointed to fill his place. He became bishop of Chartres in 1506, and was transferred to the see of Bourg in 1415. He was arrested for being connected with the revolution of the palace, but on account of his great talents he soon returned to his former honors. Under the reign of Charles VII, Gouge became royal councillor. In 1425 he resigned his civil functions, but resumed them until Nov. 8, 1428. He died Nov. 29 or 26, 1444. See Hoefner, Nou. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Goujet, Claude Pierre, a French theologian, was born at Paris, Oct. 19, 1697. In 1720 he was canon of St. James’s in his native place, and died Feb. 1, 1767. He translated Grotius’s work on the truth of Christianity into French (Paris, 1724) and other Latin works, and published Maximes sur la Paix et sur la Communion (1729); —Bibliothèque des Artistes Écclésiastiques du XVIIIe Siècle, pour Servir de Continuation à celle de Mr. Dupin (1738, 8 vol.); —Histoire du Pontificat de Paul V (1736, 2 vol.). Goulet, Robert, a Roman Catholic theologian of the 16th century, is the author of Tetramorion Evangeliorum, quorum integri Textus sub una Narratione Seu Historia Ordine Continenter. He also edited Paulus Burianus Scripulam Scripturarum. See Pomponius, was an importation from Geneva, and called the lawyer's gown, in distinction from the wide velvet-sleeved gown still worn by other graduates, poers at Winchester, and often with an ermine hood by procors at Oxford. Russet white and black gowns were worn by mourners at funerals.

Goethe, Christian Gottlieb, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Aug. 28, 1748. He studied at Tübingen, was in 1760 vicar, in 1777 preacher, at Stuttgart, and died Dec. 10, 1809. He published, Ueber die Gottheit in heiligen Betrachtungen und Liedern (Stuttgart, 1776) — Beiträge zur Geschichte der Kirchenliteratur (1784), and composed some hymns, which are still in use. See Goethe, Geschichte des deutschen Kirchenlebens, vi, 309 sq. (B.P.)

Gozlin (Lut. Gouelms), a French prelate and statesman, was born about the beginning of the ninth century. According to some he was the son of Boricon, count of Aisnier, and to others the natural son of Louis the Gentle. He became a monk at Rheims about 848, and soon after abbot of the Abbey of Lessines. Gozlin, like most of the abbots of that time, was also a warrior. In 858 he was made prisoner by the Normans, and had to purchase his liberty by a heavy ransom. After 855 he held the office of chancellor to Charles the Bald, and about 863 he was appointed bishop of Paris. He died April 10, 886. See Hoefn. Nov. Biog. Generale, s. v.

Graal, The Holy, a name in mediæval tradition for the precious dish (parapsis) or cup used at the Last Supper, said also to be the vessel in which our Lord turned water into wine, and in which Nicodemus or Joseph of Arimathæa received the Saviour's blood at the crucifixion. Other legends describe it as a cup originally given to Solomon by the queen of Sheba. It often appears in the Arthurian laws, and probably arose from a Druidic origin. The Genoese claim to have it in the cathedral treasury, where it is known as Sacro Catino. It is of glass, of hexagonal form, with two handles, and is three feet nine inches in circumference. It was cracked in its removal from Paris, whither it had been taken under Napoleon. Sometimes the graal supports a bleeding spear, as on a crucifix at San Gimignano. Church, Court of St. The chloroform is often represented holding a penon and a graal opposite the sanguine with drooping head, and a banner of three points, the staff broken.

Grabau, Johann Andreas August, a Lutheran minister of Germany, was born March 18, 1804, at Wolmirstedt, near Magdeburg. He studied at Halie, was in 1834 pasteur at Erfurt, but was suspended in 1836 because he refused to accept the Prussian agenda (q. v.). In 1839 he came, with a number of his adherents, to America, and settled at Buffalo, N. Y., where he founded a Lutheran congregation, to whom he preached till his death, June 2, 1873. Grabau was president of the Lutheran Buffalo Synod, founded the Martin Luther College, and was for some time editor of the Kirchliches Informatarium and of the Wochen Kirche. (B.P.)

Grabe, Martin Sylvester, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Weissensee (Thuringia), April 21, 1627. He studied at Königsberg, was professor there in 1660, in 1662 at Jena, in 1677 general-superintendent of Pomerania, and died at Cottbus Nov. 28, 1686. He published, among other writings, Disp. in Gal. iv. 4— in Joh. xvi., 3—Contra Socinianos:—De Unione Inuarrum in Christo Naturarum:—De Persp. Grabner, Theophilus, father of the foregoing, was born in 1686. He studied at Wittenberg, where he was in 1711 professor at the gymnasium in Freiburg, in 1730 rector at Meissen, and died April 15, 1750, leaving De Planeta Hebdrominem ad Zach. zii, 11 (Wittenberg, 1709); De Sacra Judaeorum Peregrini in Hortia Ruta Focia (1710); De Excommunicatione per Insanam (ed.); De Symbolo Jerusalemitico et Jordanensi, Incolumitum ad Jo. xxi, 22-29 (Meissen, 1737). --- De Theophilop Episcopo Antiocheno (1744). See Jocher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Gräber, Franz Friedrich, a Protestant theologian, was born in 1784 in Prussia. He studied at Halle, and entered upon his ministerial duties in 1808. After he had occupied different pastorate, the king of Prussia appointed him, in 1846, a member of the general synod, and made him general-supernintendent of Westphalia. In 1856 he retired from his office, and died in 1857. He published Das Verlorene Paradies, Predigten (Elberfeld, 1839). See Winer, 4th ed. der theol. Lit., ii, 116; Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 490. (B. Grace, Actual. See Actual Grace.

Grace at Meals was customary among the Jews (Lightfoot, Hora Hebr. on Matt. xx. 36, and forms are contained in the Talmud (Berachoth, vii). Numerous examples occur in the New Test., and early Christian writers abundantly confirm the practice (Chrysostom, Hom. xlix; Clement of Alex. Thed. i, 14, § 77; also Tertullian, Cyprian, and others). Examples of forms occur both in the early Eastern and Western churches, and the Galatian Sacramental acts forth quite a number. See Smith, Dict. of Christ. Antiq. s. v.

Gradengo, Giovanni Agostino, an Italian priest, was born at Venice, July 10, 1723. He studied under the direction of Domenico dall'Onazio; entered the Benedictine order in 1744; in 1749 was called to teach philosophy at Mantua, and later canon law; in 1756 returned to Venice, where, in 1762, he founded an academy of ecclesiastical history; refused the bishopric of Gorizia in 1765, but in 1770 became bishop of Canedo, and died March 16, 1774, leaving a large number of short publications, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Gradengo, Giovanni Geronimo, an Italian priest, was born at Venice, Feb. 19, 1708. While young he was appointed minister of the Theatines and occupied several important chairs at the Seminary of Brescia. On Jan. 27, 1766, he was appointed archbishop of Udine. He died June 30, 1786, leaving Lettera al Card. Quirini, etc. (Venice, 1744); --- Lettera Iustissima Civitatis Super Probabilissimo (Brescia, 1750); --- De Caro Pastorali (Udine, 1736); --- De Sicco Apostolo Hebraeo (Rome, 1766), and other pieces, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Gradin, a French term for a step behind and above the level of the altar-slab, for placing the cross and candlesticks upon, so as not to interfere with the altar itself.

Gradual (Gradulâ, Grop.). Strictly only the first verse of the anthem sung was thus called. The rest was technically styled the "verse." The mode of singing it was not everywhere the same, but that in which one sang alone for a while and many responded was probably in use from the very infancy of the Church. From Easter to the Saturday in Whitsun week inclusively the Gradual was followed, and at last supplanted, by the Alleluia. This had been long known in the West, and used, though not prescribed, on public occasions of religious joy. At Rome it was only sung on Easter day.

The Tract was another anthem sometimes sung after the epistle. Originally it was always from the Book of Psalms. The Tract in all probability was nothing more than the Gradual as it was chanted in seasons of humiliation. Very soon, however, a Tract was often sung by itself; that is, a single cantor added to the anthem, which was sung continuously by the cantor without any assistance from the choir. The Gradual and Tract were sung from the same step of the ambo from which the epistle was read. The fact that the Gradual and Tract were both sung from the lesson-desk, and that by a single cantor detached thereby, like the readers, from the choir, seems to indicate their common origin in that extended use of the Book of Psalms with the rest of Holy Scripture which we know to have prevailed during the first ages.

Graf, Johann Heinrich, a Lutheran minister, was born Nov. 19, 1797, at Lindow, in Brandenburg, Prussia. In 1828 he entered the missionary seminary at Berlin, and in 1829 the Hebrew College at London, to prepare himself as a missionary to persuade the Jews among the Jews. He remained in England till 1827, when he was sent to the Rhenish provinces on a missionary journey. In the same year he was appointed to the mission-station at Posen, was ordained there in July, and died there, Aug. 12, 1832. (B. P.)

Grasso, Giuseppe, an Italian ecclesiastic and educator, was born at Buttistella, in Weimar, May 3, 1802, and educated at Jena. In 1828 he obtained a curacy in the State Church at Weimar, and in 1829 was made rector of the town school at Jena. In 1840 he was also appointed extraordinary professor of the science of education in the University of Jena, and in 1842 he became head of the burschenschaft in Cassel. He afterwards occupied various positions in the educational field, and in 1849 entered the house of representatives of Hesse, and became noted as an agitator. He was imprisoned in 1852 for having been implicated in certain revolutionary movements. On his release he withdrew to Geneva, where he engaged in educational work till 1855, when he was appointed director of the school of industry at Bremen. He died in that city, July 21, 1866. His works were chiefly on educational subjects. See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit., i, 363. (B. P.)

Grafenhausen, Finkmann Friedrich, a Lutheran theologian, was born Feb. 17, 1414. For some time des incomes at Taucha, in Saxony, he was called in 1780 to Leipsic, and died March 18, 1828. He wrote Animadversiones in loc. Epist. Pauli ad Philipp., i, 5, 12 (Leipsic, 1822). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit., i, 363. (B. P.)

Graham, Andrew, a Scotch pretate, was elected and consecrated to the see of Dunblane, July 28, 1755. He was also pastor of the Church of Dunblane until his death. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 180.

Graham, Archibald, a Scotch prelate, was first pastor at Rochmary, in the Isle of Bute, and from there proceeded to the see of the Isles in 1699, and continued until the revolution in 1688. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 310.

Graham, Charles, an Irish Wesleyan missionary, was born at Tullinmagrakin, near Sligo, Aug. 20, 1750. After laboring for twenty-one years as a local preacher, he was, in 1770, appointed by Wesley as a missionary in Ireland. Few of the Irish preachers had severer trials from mobs than Graham, but he courageously met them. For six years he and Ouseley traversed Ireland together, bringing the light into its darkest quarters. Graham afterwards labored in Ulster, Armagh, Kilkenny, Wexford, and other parts of Ireland, and he died suddenly near Athlone, April 23, 1824. His powerful appeals to his street congregations were pathetic, and sometimes overwhelming; the multitudes heard, trembled, and fell before him. See Stevens, Hist. of Methodism, iii, 121, 409 sq.; 416 sq.; George Smith, Hist. of Wesleyan Methodism, vol. ii (see Index, vol. iii); William Smith, Hist. of Wesleyan Methodism in Ireland, p. 286; Minutes of the British Conference, 1824; Reilly, Ouseley (N. Y. 1848); Arthur, Life of Ouseley (London, and N. Y. 1870); Campbell, Life of Charles Graham (Dublin, 1868, 12mo; Toronto, 1889).

Graham, George, a Scotch prelate, was bishop of Dunblane from 1699 to 1726, and from which he died in 1730, and was consecrated to the see of Orkney in 1615, where he continued until 1688. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 181, 227.

Graham, John, D.D., an English prelate, was born in Durham in 1734. In 1854 he was appointed prebendary of Lincoln, having formerly been rector of Wilt-tingham, Cambridgeshire. At one time he was one of the chaplains of prince Albert, consort of queen Victoria. He was consecrated to the bishopric of Chester in 1848, which he held until he closed the life of his June, 15, 1865. During his administration seventy-eight new churches were consecrated by him in his diocese. See d'Alton, Life of Bishop Graham.

Graham, Patrick, a Scotch prelate, was bishop of Brechin in 1643, and was translated to the see of St. Andrews in 1646. He undertook a journey to Rome in 1647, and while there the controversy concerning the superiority of the see of York over the Church of Scotland was renewed. He obtained sentence against that see, and that town was established to be erected into an archbishopric, and the pope also made him his legate within Scotland for three years. On his return he found the king's clergy and courtiers all opposed to his transactions. He was put in prison, where he died in 1678. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 160-164.

Graham, Samuel Lytle, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Liberty, Va., Feb. 9, 1794. He studied under Rev. J. Mitchell, and subsequently at the New London Academy, and graduated at Washington College, Lexington, in 1814. After this he became pastor in the family of Judge Nash of North Carolina. In 1817, he was appointed to the chair of Theology at the Presbyterian Seminary, and was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New Brunswick. He acted for a while as missionary in Indiana, and subsequently in Greenbrier and Monroe counties, Va. In 1821 he removed to North Carolina, and became pastor of Oxford and Grayson Creek churches. After remaining there seven years he took charge of the Oxford Church, where a gracious revival followed his labors, in 1830. In 1834 he became pastor at Clarksville and Shiloh, and in 1838 professor of ecclesiastical history in Union Theological Seminary, Vicksburg, which position he retained until his death at Prince Edward, Oct. 29, 1851. He contributed several papers to the Princeton Review. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem., 1881, p. 20; Nevin, Presb. Encyclop. s. v. (W. P. S.)

Graham, Sylvester, a Presbyterian minister and reformer, was born in Shrewsbury, Conn., in 1749. From childhood he was troubled with weak digestion and rheumatism, and was compelled to abandon one employment after another on account of poor health. He finally studied at Amherst College, and became a Presbyterian preacher about 1826. In 1830 the Pennsylvania Temperance Association, which then was the only temperance organization, elected him as a member of the board of directors of the society, and he served as such until his death. This led him to the study of human physiology, by which he became convinced that the only cure for intemperance was to be found in correct habits of living and judicious diet. This idea was set before the world in permanent form in his Essay on Cholera (1822), and Graham Lectures on the Science of Human Life (Boston, 1839, 2 vols.). He died at Northampton, Mass., Sept. 11, 1851. His other publications were a Lecture to Young Men on Charity: a Treatise on Bread-Making, from which we have the name "Graham bread"; and the Philosophy of Sacred History, in which a single volume was finished by him, and published after his death. In this work he attempted to show the harmony between the teachings of the Bible and his views on dietetics. See Appleton's Amer. Cyclop. viii, 142.

Grall. (1) Gradale, gradual, that which follows in degree, or the next step (gradus) after the epistle, a book containing the Order of Benediction of Holy Water, the Offices, Introit, or beginning of the Mass, the Kyrie, Gloria, Alleluia, Pro, Tract, Sequence, Creed, Offertory, Sanctus, Agnus Dei, and Communion and Post-Communion, which precede the Eucharistic solemn mass. In France it denotes the Antiphonar, which was set on the gradus or analogium. (2) A verse or response, varying with the day; a portion of a psalm sung between the Epistle and Gospel while the deacon was on his way to the rood-loft. Their intruction into the Church is attributed variously to Celestine, 430, St. Ambrose, Gelasius, 490, or Gregory the Great, c. 600, who arranged the responses in order in his "Antiphonar." Rabanus says the name is derived from the custom of singing the grail on the steps of the ambo, and others that it is derived from the taken from the responsoy, gradation, or succession, or to the altar-step. These verses were formerly chanted, either by a single voice or in chorus. When the chanter sang to the end tractum, they were called the Tract; but when he was interrupted by the choir, then the name was a Verse, Responsory, or An-

upon his estate in Dinwiddie County, and preached in eight or ten of the neighboring counties. In October, 1825, his dwelling was burned down, and he removed to Lawrenceville. In 1838 he accepted a call to the parish of Halifax Court-house, and removed there, and he continued to reside till his death, March 5, 1871, aged seventy-five years. See Obituary Record of Yale College, 1871; Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1872, p. 127.

Grammlich, Johann Andreas, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born July 1, 1699, at Stuttgart. He studied at Tubingen and Heidelberg, was in 1716 court-chaplains at Stuttgart, and died April 7, 1728. He wrote, Erbauende Betrachtungen auf alle Tage (Stuttgart, 1724; new ed. by Boch, Breslau, 1863);—Vereinigte Betrachtungen von Christi Leiden und Tod (Tubingen, 1722; new ed. by Koppen, 1862); also Annotations on the Acts of the Apostles, on the epistles of Peter, John, and James. See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 461 sq.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 182; Koch, Geschichte des deutschen Kirchenleides, p. 66 sq. (B. P.)

Grammont, Antoine Pierre de (1), a French prelate, was born in 1651. He entered the ministry when quite young. Alexander VII offered him the deanship of the chapter of Besançon, but he declined. Some time later he was consecrated archbishop of that see. When Louis XIV invaded Franche-Comté in 1668, Grammont made every exertion for defence. On the second invasion, six years later, he resigned the position of his cathedral, and thereafter occupied himself by raising various schools in his diocese. He died May 1, 1688, leaving behind him the priesthood, of the breviary, of the ritual, and a catechism of his diocese. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Grammont, Antoine Pierre de (2), a French prelate, nephew of François Joseph, was born in 1665. After finishing his studies at the College of Louis-le-Grand, in Paris, he became a soldier at eighteen years of age; was wounded before Spire, and taken prisoner. Being exchanged, he received command of a regiment of dragons, which bore his name. When peace was restored, Grammont returned to his province, where his uncle supplied him with a canonicate of the chapter of Besançon. He was nominated archbishop of that city by Louis XV, in 1753, and died Sept. 7, 1754. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Grammont, François Joseph de, a French prelate, nephew of Antoine (1), was coadjutor of his uncle under the title of bishop of Philadelphie, and succeeded him in the see of Besançon. He reconstructed the archiepiscopacy, and gave new editions to the breviary and the ritual, also published a collection of synodal statutes, and left his fortune to the seminary. He died Aug. 20, 1715. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Grammont, Gabriel de, a French prelate, succeeded his brother in the bishopric of Couserans, and also of Tarbes in 1522. He was sent on various diplomatic missions. In 1532 he was made bishop of Poitiers, and finally archbishop of Toulouse. He died March 26, 1534, leaving in MS. a collection of letters relating to his various embassies. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Grammur, in Norse mythology, was the famous sword of the hero Sigurd. It was the most excellent that had ever been made by dwarfs. Sigurd proved it in two ways: he cut in two a large piece of steel, and, behold, the sword had not even the slightest scratch; then he laid it in the river, which carried a light woodale against it, and the latter was cut in two.

Granacci, Francesco, a reputable Florentine painter, was born in 1477, and studied under Ghirlanda- iano and under Signorini with Brunelleschi for five years. Among his principal pictures are those of St. Zacharias and St. Francis, near the Virgin, under a lofty canopy, and The Assumption, in San Pietro Maggiore. He died in 1544. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the First Frie, in Paris, s. v.

Granada, Luis de. See Luis de Granada.

Grancolas, Jean, a French theologian and member of the Jesuits, he was born at Paris in 1601. In 1635 he took his degree as doctor of divinity, was chaplain to the duke of Orleans, and died in 1732. He wrote, Traité de l'Antiquité des Cérémonies des Sacrêments (Paris, 1692);—Instructions sur la Religion, Tâtes de l'Écriture Sainte (1688);—La Science des Confesseurs (1696);—L'Ascétique Disciple de l'Église (1697);—Heures Sacrées (col.);—Traité des Lutrigies (1698); Histoire Abrisée de l'Église de la Ville et de l'Université de Paris (1729, 2 vols.). He studied at Rome, was professor at Florence and Pisa, and died at the latter place, July 21, 1742, leaving Martysymphonies Compiègnes, Quatorze dévotions Camaldulènes, La Vía del Padre D. Guido Grandi, Scritta del Uomo Discorso; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 714. (B. P.)

Grandier, Philippe André, a French theologian, born at Strasbourg, Nov. 9, 1712, entered into holy orders, was canon and keeper of the archives of the bishopric there, and died Oct. 11, 1777. He wrote, Histoire de l'Église et des Princes-Évêques de Strasbourg (1776, 1778, 2 vols.);—Histoire Ecclesiastiques, de la Province d'Alsace (1781);—Essai Historique sur la Cathédrale de Strasbourg (1782). Besides, he left in MS. a great deal of matter pertaining to the Church history of Strasbourg, which was published in six volumes, by Liblin, under the title, Oeuvres Historiques Inédites de Grandier (Colmar, 1865). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 823; Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des sciences Religieuses, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Grandin Martin, a French theologian, was born at St. Quentin in 1698. He commenced his studies at Noyon, continued them at Amiens, and finished them at Paris, in the college of the cardinal Le Moine, where he afterwards taught philosophy. He was doctor of the Sorbonne, and taught theology there more than fifty years. He was born in 1698, and died in 1730, leaving a work of value entitled, Institutiones Theologicae (Paris, 1710). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Grandison, John, an English prelate of the 14th century, was born at Asperton, Herefordshire. He was prebendary of Exeter and York in 1305, archdeacon of Nottingham, Oct. 12, 1310, and dean of Wells. While holding these preferments, he became chaplain to pope Clement V, who employed him as his nuncio in France, Spain, Germany, and England, where he attracted the notice of Edward III. He was consecrated to the see of Exeter, Oct. 18, 1327. He was enormously rich, founded Ouestrey of Mantes, Bishop's Teignmouth, erected the see of Teignmouth, built the west front of Exeter Cathedral, annexed Radway to his see, and compelled all ecclesiastics in his diocese to bequeath their goods to him to complete his buildings. He died July 16, 1369. Bishop Grandison had great trouble with the archbishop of Canterbury. See Hook, Lives of the Bishops, iii, 507; Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), ii, 74.

Grandpierre, Henri, a Reformed theologian of France, who died at Paris while director of the missionary institute, in 1875, is the author of some ascetical works, as Trialse et Consolation:—Le Guide du Fidèle à La Table Sacré:—Les Aspirations Chrétienes. Grant (or Grant), Edward, D.D., an eminent English scholar of the 16th century, was educated at Westminster School and Christchurch, or at Broadgate Hall, Oxford. He was born at Westminister, 157, where he continued until 1691. He was placed at Westminster in 1577, in Ely in 1669, and died in Sept. or Oct. 1601. He published, Institutionis Graecae Grammaticae Compendiosa (1587) — Græce Linguæ Speculum (1577). Chalmers, Biog. Dict. a. t. v. — Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Biog. s. v. (B. P.)

Grant, Richard, an English prelate, is usually stated to have been dean of London, but this is very improbable. In 1221 he was chancellor of Lincoln, and in 1229 he consecrated to the see of Canterbury. His episcopate was short, and it seems that he was not as discreet as he should have been, which was so needful for the time. He died Aug. 3, 1231. According to Tanner, the following works were written by Richard Grant: De Fide et Legibus, lib. i. — De Sacramentis, Lib. i. — De Universo Corporali et Spirituali, lib. i. See Hook, Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, iii, 103 sqq.

Grasse, Zacharias, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Rostock, Oct. 6, 1671. He studied at his native place and at Greifswald, commenced his academic career in 1696 at Rostock, was in 1701 doctor, in 1704 professor of theology, and died Feb. 11, 1718, leaving, Systema Nostissimorum Controversiarum Rostockense (1709), Historia Literaria Talmudica Babylonica (ibid. 1696). — De Carthesii Methodo Conveniens Abhau. — De Quiduoam Locationibus in Crítica Ed. Legis: — De Victore Ad Edam ou Es. Izid. 1. 6. An Talmud et Crenemendia? Gratry, Auguste Joseph Alphonse, O.B.D., a French theologian, was born at Lille, March 30, 1805. He studied at Paris, became director of the College of Sainte-Barbe, in that city, in 1841, and chaplain of the superior normal school in 1846. He resigned this position in 1851, and, in connection with the abbe Petetot, founded the Oratory of the Immaculate Conception, which gave special attention to the conversion and instruction of the Parisian youth. In 1861 he was appointed vicar- general of Orleans, and in 1863 he became professor of moral theology in the Sorbonne. He attacked Renan and the Rationalists with great vigor in 1864; and in 1867 he was elected a member of the French Academy. He withdrew from the Oratory in 1869 on account of the unfriendly attitude assumed towards him by that institution, because of his connection with father Hyacinthe and the International League of Peace. He set forth his views of the position of the two parties in the Vatican Council in two letters, in 1870, but was constrained to retract in 1872. He died at Montreux, Switzerland, Feb. 6 of the same year. His principal works are, Étude sur la Sophistique Contemporaine (Paris, 1851; 4th ed. 1863); - De la Connaissance de Dieu (1853, 2 vols.; 7th ed. 1864), which received the prize from the French Academy: - Logique (1858, 2 vols.; 2d ed. 1860); - De la Connaissance de l'Éme (1858, 2 vols.); - La Philosophie du Credo (1861); - Commentaire sur l'Évangile Selon Saint-Matthieu (1863-65, 2 vols.); - La Morale et la Loi de l'histoire (1868, 2 vols.; 2d ed. 1871), in which he declares the French revolution to be the true regeneration of human society: - Lettres sur la Religion (1869); - Les Sources de la Rédemption Sociale (1871). Gray, John, a Reformed (Dutch) minister, descended from the Scotch Covenanters, was born in Aberdeen, Scotland, in 1792, and educated and ordained in that country in 1815. He led in prayer at the family altar, and bought a Bible, then a costly book, with his own earnings, of which he afterwards wrote the history, called Little Johnny and his Bible. In 1818 he went with his wife to Russian Tartary as a Presbyterian missionary. After seven years of labor there, he returned from his labors and engaged in ministerial work in England until 1838, when he returned to America, and spent the rest of his busy life chiefly as a missionary (Fallslough, N. Y. 1838-55; Schenck, 1855-56; Cohoes, 1847-48; Ghent, 1848-55; Cleveland, 1856-57). He died in 1863. He was an almost constant contributor to the religious press, and was the author of several of the most striking tracts of the American Tract Society. He was a close observer of men and things, an acute thinker and vigorous writer, full of strong points and memorable forms of expression.
His sermons, which were full of Christ, and his candidness was unexcelled. See Corwin, Manual of the Reformed Church in America, s. v. (W. J. T. R.) Gray, Joshua Taylor, Ph. D., an English Baptist, born in Davenport, Feb. 9, 1809, is the son of the Rev. W. Gray. He was early converted, baptized by his father in Northampton, and began to preach in his youth. He entered the Baptist College in 1827, and in 1830 was ordained pastor of the St. Andrew's Baptist Church, Cambridge. His mind not being suited to preaching, he opened a school at Brixton, but afterwards succeeded Mr. Bligh in his school near Bedford Square London. In 1849 he became the pastor of the Baptist Church at Hastings, but in 1850 was chosen classical tutor at the Baptist College, Stepney. In 1852 consumption set in; he visited New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, but was able to address only one American audience. He retired to his mother's house in Bristol, and died there, July 12, 1854. See (Lond.) Baptist Handbook, 1855, p. 49.
Gray, Thomas, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born in Boston, Mass., March 16, 1772. He graduated at Harvard University in 1790, and studied theology for a year there and under Dr. Stillman. After preaching in the Congregational churches, he was called to Plainville, Conn., where he was ordained, March 27, 1793.
In 1849 he resigned in favor of his colleague, Joseph H. Allen. He died at Jamaica Plain, June 1, 1847. Gray was an agreeable, practical preacher, although it was as a pastor he was most conspicuous. See Christ. Examiner, September, September, 1847, art. vii; Frothingham, Funeral Sermons (Boston, 1847).
Gray, William, an English priest of the 15th century, was son of lord Gray of Codnor, Derbyshire. He studied at Balliol College, Oxford, then at Ferrara, Italy, where for a long time he heard the lectures of Guiraud, an accomplished scholar. The English king appointed him his procurator at the court of Rome, and he afterwards was preferred to the see of Ely, in which he sat twenty years. In 1469 he served as lord-treasurer of England, being the last clergyman who discharged that office until the appointment of John Newtown (L. de Dunstan). He died Aug. 4, 1478, and was buried in the Cathedral of Ely.
He wrote many books, which have not survived, how-Grazian, Ercol., the Younger, an eminent Bo-lognese painter, was born in 1688, and studied under Donato Creti. He painted an immense number of works for the Bolognese churches, among which is the celebrated picture of St. Peter Consecrating St. Apol-losare. There are other works by him at Rome, The Duke of Mantua's Palace, the Archduke's church, the Augustinian Church at La Porta. He died in 1765. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bio., Geneal., s. v.; Spel-er, Bioi. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.
GREATON, Joseph, a Roman Catholic priest, was born about 1860; entered the Society of Jesus, July 5, 1706, became a professed father, Aug. 4, 1719, residing at St. Ignatius, Md., from 1721 to 1724; exercised his ministry in Philadelphia for nearly twenty years (1730-50);
returned to Maryland; and died at Bohemia, Sept. 19, 1752. Greaton's name is a prominent one in the early annals of Catholicism in Philadelphia. See De Courcy GREATRAKES, Valentine, a famous English thau-maturgus, was born at Affane, County Waterford, Irelland, Feb. 14, 1628. At the age of thirteen he was obliged, on account of the civil troubles, to leave the College of Dublin, and take refuge with his mother in England. Some time later he fought in Ireland against the royalists, and after the disbanding of his regiment, in 1656, retired to a quiet life. He now imagined that he had received from above the power of curing the sick, which he actually proved in several cases by simply laying on his hands. This, however, drew upon him the attention of the local authorities, and being summoned before the bishop of Lismore, he was condemned, and had to abate from his pretensions. He was afterwards called to England, where the countessa Conway was affected by a disease which he cured. He was then called to London, where he went about daily professing to cure invalids. He excited the jealousy of the physicians, who began to write pamphlets against him, but Greatrakes did not hesitate to refer even to members of the court. He died in Ireland about 1700.

language is spoken in the immediate neighborhood of Cape Palmas, and is supposed to extend considerably into the interior. At present the Grebos enjoy the benefit of having in their own vernacular the gospels of Matthew and Luke, the Acts of the Apostles, Paul's epistle to the Romans, his first epistle to the Corinthi-

Green, Alexander L. P., D.D., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Sevier County, Tenn., Aug. 24, 1807, and reared in Searcy County, Ala. He joined the Church in his ninth year; in 1824 was admitted into the Tennessee Conference; at the age of twenty-five was chosen a delegate to the General Conference, and was thus elected each session extcept one until his demise. He was one of the chief actors in securing a separation, in 1844, between the Methodist Episcopal Church North and South. For sixty years he gave his entire energies to the Church, dying in the midst of his labors, in Nashville, Tenn., July 15, 1874. Probably no man of his time made a more lasting impression upon his chosen denomination
Green, Thomas Hill, an English physician, was born in 1856. He was educated at Rugby and at Balliol College. In 1879 he took his bachelor's degree, began to study medicine at the Medical College of the University of Pennsylvania, and was installed as Professor of Anatomy in the University of Pennsylvania. He continued his studies at the University of London, where he was elected to the fellowship of Balliol College, especially Baur. Among the fruits of these studies were two essays on the Development of Dogma. In 1866 he commenced lecturing at Balliol, and in 1878 was elected to the office of Professor of Moral Philosophy, and shortly after resigned his tutorship. He died March 26, 1882.

For the North British Review he contributed, in 1866, on the Philosophy of Aristotle, and on Popular Philosophy in its Relation to Life. His main work followed in 1874, as part of a new edition of Hume's works by Green and Grote, in four volumes. The first three volumes, including the Treatise on Human Nature, were prefaced by lengthy introductory dissertations; one dealing with the theological philosophy of Locke, Berkeley, and Hume; the other with the ethical views of these writers and their contemporaries. "The former," says a writer in the Academy, "is a probably unequalled piece of minute and at the same time comprehensive criticism of the origins of current English philosophy." In November, 1867, professor Green began, in the Contemporary Review, a series of papers on "Mr. Herbert Spencer's Social Statics"; his Appeal to Reason: The Doctrine of Evolution to Thought. Besides, in several short reviews published in the Academy, he has made contributions of permanent value to the literature of philosophical criticism. See Contemporary Review, May, 1882. (B. P.)

Green, Valentine, an eminent English mezzotinto engraver, was born in Warwickshire in 1736. In 1765 he went to London and devoted himself to mezzotinto engraving, which, without the aid of an instructor, he elevated to a high degree of perfection. In 1769 he obtained the exclusive privilege from the king of Bavaria of engraving and publishing prints after the pictures in the Düsseldorf gallery, and in 1776 he published twenty-two prints from that collection. In 1767 he was elected a member of the Incorporated Society of Artists in Great Britain, and in 1774 an associate engraver of the Royal Academy. He died July 6, 1818. The following are some of his important works: The Stoning of Stephen; The Raising of Lazarus; Christ Calling to him the Little Children; Jacob Blessing the Sons of Joseph; Daniel Interpreting Belshazzar's Dream; The Annunciation; The Nativity; The Virgin and Child and His Adoring Angels; With his Lamb; The Adoration of Christ. Green, Abijah Emmon, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Greenfield, Saratoga Co., N. Y., Dec. 11, 1809. He was prepared for college at the academies at Johnstown and Amsterdam, N. Y.; graduated from Union College in 1834; went immediately to Princeton Seminary, and remained nearly three years; was licensed by the Presbytery of Albany, Oct. 15, 1835, and, after supplying Glenham Church, was ordained by the Presbytery of North River pastor at Cold Spring, May 16, 1836, from which charge he was released June 9, 1841. After a time he labored as stated supply successively at Highland Falls, Haveneraw, Rockland Lake, Highland Falls again, Southampton, Rensselaer- ville, Bleecker, and Hamptead churches, all in the state of New York, for various periods of time. After 1866 he resided on his health at Highland Falls. He died in New York city, Oct. 20, 1881. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem., 1882, p. 28.

Green, Maurice, an eminent English musician, was born in London in 1698. He composed cathedral music and made collections with a view to its publication. Before he was twenty years old he was organist of Winchester. In 1717 he was an organist of the church of St. Andrew's, Holborn. In 1726 of the chapel royal, and of St. Paul's in 1727. He died in London, Sept. 1, 1755. See Chalmers, Biog.
GREENLANDERS

Religion of the. These people, like the other Eskimos, spiritualize all objects that surround them. The spirits are called Innuet, i.e., nodles. Malina and Amiungua are the rulers of the sun and moon, but they were formerly placed in the heavens. Their food changes their color, for they sometimes red, sometimes yellow. The plants are women, who visit each other, therefore sometimes a number are seen together. The rulers of the atmosphere are Inuenternick and Ehrenbornick; the spirits of the sea are Koguenetokick and Koguenatokick, and the stars Sillagastok. The spirits of fire are called Ingeronin. The mountains are inhabited by great spirits and small gnomes, Tannerinon and Innarinnon. The gods of war, Egerl, the spirit of fire Nerrim Innuet, etc., are distributed everywhere, and they can be persuaded by mysterious means, only known to magicians, to become the protecting spirits of men. Such a guardian is called Tongak, but the great spirit, the ruler of all Innueats and Tongakas, is called Torgaseak. The wife or mother of this great spirit is a dreaded being; she is the daughter of the sorcerer who tore Diako (Greenland) from the mainland, and thrust it towards the north. She lives under the sea, and injures the fish-traffic. The invisible ruler of the universe, Scylla or Pirksonna, is the unimaginable, omniscient god. The Greenlanders have no divine worship with ceremonies. When a young man captures his first sea-whale, he lays a piece of fat or meat under a stone as a sacrifice, in order to insure good success in hunting. Sun and moon are sister and brother. The latter loved his sister, who was very beautiful, and he conceived the idea of putting out the lamps in winter, in order that he might care for and embrace her. She wanted to know who her lover was, and therefore covered her hands with rust, and thus blackened his face and clothes. Then she brought in the light, and, recognizing her brother, she fled. The brother lighted a bundle of moss in order to find his way and follow her; the moss would not ignite, the sister escaped, and was placed in the heavens. The sun still follows her, and the dark spot which he has are the stripes made by his sister's blackened hands.

Heaven, according to the Greenlanders, rests on the top of a mountain on the North Pole, about which it revolves. They have no knowledge of astronomy whatever, which is quite singular, as the stars and planets are the only means of reckoning time during the long half-year night. They have, however, the following theory as to the origin of thunder and lightning. They believe that living beings, preserved by a春天t, are angry with each other over a dry, stretched sealskin; as often as they strike the skin with their fangs, a peal of thunder is heard. When, then, the house trembles, and the burning rafters fall, the lightning is produced. The rain also has an explanation: The souls live in heaven on the brink of a land-sea sea. When this sea swells, the overflowing waters form the rain.

Their traditions also tell of Adam, Noah, and a flood. Kolak was the first man, from whose thumb there sprung the first woman, and from her came all human beings. When, after many years, the earth sank into the sea, only one man was left, who began a new generation. The Greenlanders have a twofold conception of souls: these are a shadow, or a breath. A dangerous journey must be made by all souls to heaven; for five days they must slide down a steep rock, which is therefore covered with moss.

Greenlandish Version of the Scriptures. At关于1722, Hans Egede (q. v.), a Norwegian clergyman, settled at Sodhaas (latitude 64° north), and his attention was soon arrested by the abject and deplorable condition of the natives. He applied himself to the study of their language, reduced it to writing, and translated the Psalms and the Epistles of St. Paul.

Son Paul completed the version of the New Testament, portions of which were published at Copenhagen in 1744, followed in 1758 by an edition of the Gospels and Acts, and in 1766 by the entire New Testament. This first attempt was very defective, but after the death of Egede (1789), undertook a new translation, which was printed in 1799. As this second attempt did not prove to be in any respect superior to Egede's version, Moravian missionaries undertook a third translation from Luther's German version, which was published in 1822 by the British and Foreign Bible Society, and in subsequent editions by the Danish Bible Society. A new and revised edition was published at Hennepin, under the personal superintendence of several retired missionaries from Greenland, in 1851; while of the Old Testament only some portions are published. It is said that while John Beck, one of the missionaries, was engaged in transcribing the version of the four Gospels, the curiosity of the savages being excited to know what he was writing, he read to them the history of the Saviour's agony on the Mount of Olives. Some of them laid their hands upon their mouths, as is customary among them when they are struck with wonder; but one of them, named Kasjnak, exclaimed in a loud and serious tone, "How was that? Tell us that once more; for I, too, would fain be saved," and finally became converted to God. Up to March, 1864, the British and Foreign Bible Society had distributed 2000 New Testaments, and 1200 portions of the Old Testament. See EgeMains Version. (B. P.)

Greenlaw, Gilbert, a Scotch prelate, was promoted to the see of Aberdeen in 1820, and was made chancellor of the kingdom in 1826. In 1432 this bishop was sent on an embassy to Charles VII, king of France, by Robert, duke of Albany. He died in 1434. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 28-112.

Greenleaf, Jonathan, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Newburyport, Mass., Sept. 4, 1785. He was deprived of the privileges of an academic education, and when he felt that he was called to preach the gospel, he began the study of theology under Dr. Bruer, president of Dartmouth College, at Hanover, N. H. He was licensed to preach by the Cumberland Association at Saco, Me., in September, 1814. After having filled several important charges, he was elected corresponding secretary of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions in 1836, in which capacity he labored with untiring diligence until 1841. He died at Brooklyn, N.Y., April 24, 1865. Dr. Greenleaf was the author of, Ecclesiastical Sketches of Maine:—History of the Churches of New York:—Thoughts on Paper:—The Genealogy of the Greatest Family:—A Doctrinal Catechism:—and five tracts entitled, The Missing Discipline; Experimental Religion; Sudden Death; Misery of Dying in Sin; and Shall I Come to the Lord's Supper? During his connection with the Seaman's Friend Society, he also edited the Sailor's Magazine. He contributed many valuable articles to the religious papers.

Greenleaf, Patrick Henry, D.D., a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was a native of Maine, and a son of the Hon. Simon Greenleaf. After graduating at Bowdoin College, he practiced law for several years, and then, turning his mind toward the ministry, pursued his theological studies under bishop Doane, and was duly ordained. He was connected successively with the dioceses of Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Indiana. For several years, he was rector of St. John's, Chicago, and also of St. Paul's, Cincinnati, O.; and in 1862 of Emanuel Church, Brooklyn, in which city he died, June 21, 1869, at the age of sixty-two years. See Amer. Quart. Church Rev., Jan., 1870, p. 653.

Greenvile (Granville or Greenville), Denis, D.D., an English clergyman, was born in Cornwall, and admitted commover of Exeter College, Sept. 22, 1857.
The rectories of Easington and Elwick, in the palatine of Durham, were conferred upon him. He was installed dean of Durham in 1694, and deprived of his preferments in 1690, on account of his refusal to acknowledge William and Mary. He died at Paris in 1708, leaving several theological works, sermons, etc. (1684-88). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Green, a mediæval term, which some assert to be derived from Grænas, signifying "a step." It is frequently employed by old English writers to designate the altar-steps, which anciently were two only; but others were added later, until, in more recent times, high altar-steps have been elevated on at least seven steps. There are some examples of this both in old and modern churches.

Greeting-house, a term sometimes applied in mediæval times to the chapter-house of a cathedral, where a newly-appointed bishop or dean received the greetings respectively of his flock, or the members of his cathedral. Such greetings, however, were as frequently given at the entrance of the choir, or in the sacristy. To an abbot they were sometimes tendered in the refectory, or even in the choir after the rites of installation.

Gregentius, Saint, bishop of Tepha, in Arabia, was born at Soiphon, "on the frontier of Asia," but other authorities say, at Milan, on Dec. 19 (his festal day). He went to Alexandria, where he embraced the life of an anchorite, and was sent to take charge of the Hermitries. He propagated Christianity among the idolaters of Yemen, and is said to have died in 552. There is a book extant, giving some details of part of his life, entitled: De eis in aegyptio Gregorius, Bari-Abruin (or Bar-Herbazib). See ABO-FARAJ.

Gregory (1), an Irish prelate, was elected to the see of Dublin, and went immediately to England, where he received his first orders as bishop, from Roger, bishop of Salisbury, Sept. 24, 1121, and was consecrated in the following October. After he had presided thirty-one years over his see, the archiepiscopal dignity was conferred upon him, at the Council of Kells. He died Oct. 8, 1161. See D’Alton, Memoirs of the Archb. of Dublin, p. 41.

Gregory (2), a Scotch prelate, was made bishop of Dunkeld in 1169. How long he sat is unknown. See Keener, Scottish Bishops, p. 73.

Gregory (3), a Scotch prelate, was bishop of Ross in 1161. He died in 1186. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 184.

Gregory (4), a Scotch prelate, was bishop of Brechin in 1242. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 158.

Gregory I., of Armenia (surnamed the Man- gornian), brother and successor of Hamazasb, having been given as a hostage to the Armenians from the time of the conquest of Armenia, was sent back into his own country in 660, to govern it, with the title of a patriarch. He relieved Bagdad from its calamities until the year 673, when he made himself independent. But four years later he perished, in 668, in an encounter with the Khazars, who had crossed the Caucasus and invaded Armenia. He erected several buildings, among which the monastery of Ardi, near Erivan, and the monastery of Edvard are particularly distinguishable. See Heeber, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Gregory II., of Armenia (surnamed Vpianis or Martysphulsiis), a patriarch of Armenia, the son of Gregory Magistros, died in 1036, at Garmir-Vankh, near Khesni. He was educated under the direction of his father, and made great progress both in science and languages. He inherited, in 1058, the government of the monastery of Medz, and not only the dignity, but the favor which he enjoyed at the court of Constantinople could make him attached to a secular life. He separated himself from his wife, sold all his goods, distributing the money among the unfortunate, and consecrated himself to the monastic life. Gregory is less known to us as an administrator than as a great writer and alector of letters. He gathered about him Greek and Syrian scholars, whom he charged with translating a large number of works, written in their own languages. These versions were revised by Armenian scholars, who improved their style. The patriarch himself put his hand upon a translation of a martyrology. See Heeber, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Gregory III., of Armenia (named Bahlavan, and surnamed the small Vpianis or Martyrophiliss), born in 1092. After the death of his uncle Basil, he entered consecrated patriarch in 1113, in conformity with the dispositions which were made by Gregory II. But several bishops found fault with the new patriarch as too young, and refused to recognise him. One among them, Davit of Aghdamaran, was consecrated patriarch at the Council of Drooro-Vankh. But this usurpation was condemned by a council convoked in 1150, by Gregory III., and composed of two thousand five hundred bishops and doctors, who established the principle that for the election of a patriarch in the future it should be necessary to have the unanimous consent of the four archbishops. Gregory lived in good standing with the Catholicos of the Russian Church, and died in 1166, having arranged that his brother, Nares IV., should become his successor. He left hymns, which are very well written, and which are still sung in the solemnities of the Armenian Church. See Heeber, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Gregory IV., of Armenia (surnamed Dyka, i. e. "the child"), succeeded to his uncle Nares IV. in 1173. He gained the admiration of his people by his imposing manners. Being charged by the emperor Manuel Comnenus to renew the offer of uniting the churches of Armenia and Greece, he convoked a council at Thessalonica in 1178, but, on account of disputes between the parties, the projected union failed of consummation. Gregory IV. died in 1198, leaving, Odanacer Oboj (poetical lamentation), on the capture of Jerusalem by Saladin in 1187,—six Letters, which were addressed by him to the emperor, and a copy of the latter of correspondence for the Council of Hromongia. See Heeber, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Gregory V., of Armenia (surnamed Murmess, i. e. "the young," and Kachar, "he falls from on high"), succeeded his uncle, Gregory IV., in July, 1193, although yet quite young. After having administered his office about one year, he conducted himself in such a manner as to make himself odious to the nobility as well as to the clergy. He was accused before Leo II. and was put in the fortress of Gobistair. He died in 1195. See Heeber, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Gregory VI., of Armenia (surnamed Abiord), nephew of Gregory IV., was elected after the deposition of Gregory V. The inhabitants of Great Armenia, and particularly the monks, refused to recognise him, because the place of his residence, the strong castle of Hromongia in Cilicia, or Little Armenia, was too far away. They chose as their patriarch Basil of Azi. When the persecution of the Armenians by the Greeks had broken out, Gregory VI. vainly tried to bring back the emperor Alexius to principles of tolerance. Under his patriarchate the Armenian Church had a good understanding with that of Rome. He died in 1204. See Heeber, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Gregory VII., of Armenia (surnamed Apropo- saras), was proposed as successor to Jacob I in 1287.
let his attachment to the doctrines of the Roman Church was so great that in his stead were elected Constantine II, and afterwards Stephen IV. On the death of the latter, who was a captive in Egypt, Gregory was appointed to fill his place in 1294. The residence of his predecessors at Hromogla had been destroyed, so that he took up his seat in Cilicia. His tendencies to substitute the Roman liturgy for the rites of the Armenian Church were regarded with disfavor by the monks of Great Armenia, who begged him to abstain from such unpopular innovations. Having taken the part of the prince Semwok, Mortking Thoro, Semwok's brother, he crowned him in 1297, and placed him in subjection to the pope. Towards the end of his life, Gregory occupied himself mostly with the reunion of the Armenian and Roman churches. He died in 1606. See Hoefer, Nov. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Gregory VIII, of Armenia (surnamed Khmiszakhd), succeeded Jacob III in 1411. He was a monk before his election. The inhabitants of Sis, who had poisoned his predecessor, made a conspiracy against their new chief, and were punished by the chief of the Namekikis in Cilicia, but rescued themselves again in 1416, deposing the patriarch, and putting him in a fortress for two years. He died shortly afterwards. See Hoefer, Nov. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Gregory IX, of Armenia (surnamed Mousopepian), succeeded Joseph III in 1440 as patriarch. Cilicia had been continually invaded at that time by different enemies, on which account some of the bishops wished to establish the patriarchal seat in a different part of the empire, less exposed to danger, and proposed to transfer the see of Sis to the monastery of Echmiadzin. But as Gregory would not consent, they began to attack him on account of his election, which, in fact, had taken place in a small assembly. Accordingly seven hundred bishops and doctors united, in 1441, at Echmiadzin, under the presidency of Zacharias, bishop of Hovuats-Tharcha, and elected Gurragas, a monk of Kharaabad, in the province of Kharchperun. The latter established himself at Echmiadzin, while Gregory continued in the city of Sis, being recognised only by the inhabitants of Cilicia. He died in 1447. See Hoefer, Nov. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Gregory X, of Armenia (surnamed Magaretzets), was elected patriarch, in 1448, to succeed Gurragas, whom Zacharias, bishop of Hovuats-Tharcha, had deposed. Yacoub Bey, of Erivan, governor of Armenia, imposed on him a heavy tribute, which, however, did not interrupt his preaching of the faith. He died in 1449. See Hoefer, Nov. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Gregory XI, of Armenia, was elected patriarch in 1536, after the death of Sarkis III. He died in 1541, and was succeeded by Stephen V. See Hoefer, Nov. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Gregory XII, of Armenia, succeeded Michael of Sebaspots as patriarch in 1562. He died in 1573, and was succeeded by Stephen VI. See Hoefer, Nov. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Gregory XIII, of Armenia, was born at Edessa. As he was in possession of a large fortune, the patriarch Melchesidech and his coadjutor, David, offered to transfer him to his dignity, if he would consent to pay them 100,000 ducats for the former name of Gregory XIII went to Joufik (near Isphahan) in 1602, to negotiate with the patriarch the conditions of the arrangement, but could not settle anything. Some inhabitants of that city took him to Echmiadzin, and elected him patriarch, Aug. 14, 1608. That dignity caused Gregory the inconvenience of being driven out of Armenia by the troops of Shah Abbas, requested the payment of all debts. Melchesidech being insolvent, they seized his successor, and forced him to leave the树脂 that they could not get. Shah Abbas required of him an enormous sum, and delivered him to his ministers, who put him to torture, in order to force him to disclose his treasures. Under protest the patriarch retired to Van, and then to Amor, where he died of grief in 1566. The patriarchal seal, having been retained vacant, was taken up by Melchesidech. See Hoefer, Nov. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Gregory VII, of Rome (Antipope). See Bur- don, Maurice.

Gregory of Huntwood, a monk of the 13th century, so called from the place of his nativity in Huntingdonshire, was bred a Benedictine monk at Ramsey, where he became a deacon, and was then sent by Malchesidech.

Gregory, Caspar Robbe, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Philadelphia, Sept. 17, 1824. He was prepared for college by his brother, Henry D.; graduated from the University of Pennsylvania in 1843; taught nearly two years in private families; graduated from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1847; was licensed by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, April 5, 1848; then taught a year, and was ordained an evangelist by the same presbytery, May 20, 1849. His first field of labor was as a missionary to the Chocotaw Indians at Spencer Academy, in the Indian Territory. In 1850 he left the mission on account of ill-health. He next supplied the church at Ousea, Madison Co., N. Y., from April 20, 1851, until it was closed as its pastor, Feb. 3, 1852, continuing his labors until 1862; was installed pastor of the First Church of Bridgeport, N. J., May 12, 1864, and was released Oct. 7, 1873, immediately becoming professor of sacred rhetoric in Lincoln University, Pa. He died there, Feb. 26, 1882. Dr. Gregory was an earnest man, his preaching of a high quality, his piety, and his fervor was devoted and faithful. See Necrol., Report of Princeton Theol. Sen., 1882, p. 46.

Gregory, Henry, D.D., a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born Sept. 24, 1803, at Wilton, Fairfield Co., Conn. He graduated at Hobart College in 1829; was ordained deacon in 1829, and presbyter in 1831; officiated first in Moravia, N. Y.; was called to Calvary Church, Homer, in 1833; went as missionary to the Menomonee Indians, near Green Bay, Wis., in 1836; returned to Homer in 1838; was elected rector of St. Paul's Church, Syracuse, N. Y.; became president of St. Jaxman's College, in the same city, in 1848, but resigned in 1857 on account of impaired health; subsequently accepted the presidency of De Veaux College at Suspension Bridge, remaining in that position two years, when he established the Church Book Depository, at Paterson, Feb. 3, 1852, continuing his labors until 1862; was installed pastor of the First Church of Bridgeport, N. J., May 12, 1864, and was released Oct. 7, 1873, immediately becoming professor of sacred rhetoric in Lincoln University, Pa. He died there, Feb. 26, 1882. Dr. Gregory was an earnest man, his preaching of a high quality, his piety, and his fervor was devoted and faithful. See Necrol., Report of Princeton Theol. Sen., 1882, p. 46.

Gregory, John, an English churchman of the 17th century, was born of humble parents at Amersham, Buckinghamshire, England, Nov. 10, 1665. He was educated at Christ Church College, Oxford, where for many years he studied sixteen hours a day. He became an exquisite linguist and general scholar, his modesty setting the greater lustre to his learning. He wrote notes on Dr. H渲染's book of \textit{Civil and Ecclesiastical Law}. He was chaplain of Christ Church, and was thence preferred prebendary of Chichester and Sarum. He died at Kidlington, Oxfordshire, in 1416. His \textit{Opera: Posthumae} are faithfully set forth by John Gugurn. See Fuller, \textit{Worthies of England} (ed. Nuttall), i. 208; Allibone, \textit{Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors}, s. v.

\textbf{GREGORY, SAMBLIAK, a Russian prelate, was a native of Bulgaria, and became metropolitan of Kiev in 1414. He went to the Council of Constance in 1418, and died the year following. It is certain that this prelate was a Catholic, for his name is found in one of the ancient liturgies. \textbf{Grenville, WILLIAM DE, an early English prelate, was born of a noble family in Cornwall; became canon of York, dean of Chichester, chancellor of England under king Edward I, and finally archbishop of York. His confirmation to this last preferment was delayed until he had paid the pope nine thousand five hundred marks, which reduced him to such poverty that he had to be relieved by the clergy of his province. He had this compensation—he was consecrated by the very hands of pope Clement V. He highly favored the Templars, but persons so greatly opposed as they were by the pope and Philip of France had more fear of losing than hope of gaining by his favor. He was present at the Council of Vienna (1311), where he had a high place assigned him. He died at Cawood in 1315, and was buried in the Chapel of St. Nicholas, leaving the reputation of an able statesman and a good scholar. See Fuller, \textit{Worthies of England} (ed. graduated from Dickinson College in 1808 with the first honors of his class; studied theology privately; was licensed by the New Castle Presbytery in 1810; ordained pastor of the Church at Reading in 1814, and died June 26, 1825. See Sprague, Amosa of the Amer. Pulpit, iii, 407.

Grier, John Nathan Caldwell, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born June 8, 1792, at the Forks of the Brandywine, Pa. In 1809 he graduated from Dickinson College; subsequently studied theology with his father, Rev. Nathan Grier; was licensed by the New Castle Presbytery, April 7, 1812, and engaged in preaching to vacant churches in Delaware. In 1814 he succeeded his father as pastor at the Forks of the Brandywine, and after a long and fruitful ministry there, he resigned in 1873, and retired to his farm. He died at New Castle, Sept. 12, 1880. See New York Observer, Sept. 23, 1880. (W. P. S.)

Griesinger, Georg Friedrich von, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born March 16, 1724. He studied at Tubingen, was in 1766 des chew at Stuttgart, in 1766 member of consistory, in 1799 doctor of theology, and died April 27, 1828, leaving, De Decretum Reformationis Gereoriae Humani (Tubingen, 1758) := De Compendia Anglorum Romanum ex Operis Redivivis (1766) := Theologia Dogmatica (1828) := Inicia Theologia Moralis (1826) := Einleitung in die Schriften des neuen Bundes (1799) := Uber die Authentizit der authentischen Schriften (1804) := Uber den Pentateuch (1808) := Uber die Satzungen der Apothen der heiligen Schriften, von neuem und neuem Testamenten (1824). Griesinger, Johann Burohard, a Lutheran preacher of Germany, was born Dec. 17, 1638, at Worms. Being blind from his third year, he did not begin his studies until the age of nineteen. He went to the universities of Strauburg and Jena, and settled in 1696 at Konigsberg, where he became famous as a preacher. He died July 15, 1701, leaving, De Conceptu Quattuor Immutabilitatis Dei := De Genesia Nominae Tetragrammati. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bioü. Générale, s. v.

Grieg, Ivan (Lat. Gryphius), Leonardo, an Italian prelate, was born at Milan in 1457. In 1478 he was made bishop of Gubbio, and five years afterwards was transferred to the archbishopric of Benevento. He died at Rome in 1485, leaving (in the collection of Muratori, Scriptores Rerum Italicarum, xxv, 465) a small piece of poetry in hexameter, which narrates the exploits of Braccio da Sermonza with Aquila. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Griìln, in Greek mythology, was a fabulous animal, in size like a lion, with four clawed feet, two wings, and the hooked bill of an eagle. It seems to have been an Oriental conception. This fantastic creature is the centre of a rare circle of myths, and it is mentioned by Hesiod and Herodotus as the guard of the gold in the innermost of northern Ean-pei, which the one-eyed Arimaspe stole.

Griffin, Henry, D.D., an Irish prelate, was born July 10, 1768. He was originally a Roman Catholic, but entered Trinity College, Dublin, as a member of the Established Church; finished his under-graduate career, and gained a fellowship in 1811, which he held until 1829, when he became rector of Cloneacle, in the diocese of Armagh. On Jan. I, 1814, he was consecrated Lord Bishop of Limerick, Ardfeigh, and Aghaboe. He died at the University Club, Dublin, April 5, 1866. See Amer. Quar. Church Rec, July, 1866, p. 324.

Griffin, Nathaniel Herick, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Southampton, L. I., Dec. 28, 1814. He graduated from Williams College, Mass., in 1834; spent two years at Princeton Theological Society; was a tutor in his alma mater in 1836-37; became thereafter stated supply successively at Westhampton, N. Y., and at Franklin; was ordained by the Presbytery June 27, 1839; was pastor at Delhi; acted as assistant professor in Williams College (1841-42), and as a teacher in Brooklyn (1845-46); professor of Latin and Greek in Williams College (1846-53), of Greek (1853-57), a teacher in Williamsatstown, Mass. (1857-68), librarian there (1868-76), and died in that place, Oct. 16, 1876. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem., 1881, p. 99.

Griffin, David, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in New York city in 1742. His father was a native of Wales, who came to America in early life, settling on a farm on the East River. After preliminary study in his native city, David went to England and graduated in London as a student of medicine. About 1768 he returned to America, and began practice in the interior of the province of New York. A few years after he studied theology, went to England, was admitted to orders in August, 1770; soon after was sent to Gloucester County, N. J., as a missionary of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts. From the close of 1771 until May, 1776, he was rector of Shuburgh Parish, London Co., Va., where he entered the American army as chaplain of the 3d Virginia Regiment, remaining until the close of 1779. In 1780 he became rector of Christ Church, Alexandria, Va. Throughout the latter part of his life he was said to have enjoyed the confidence of General Washington, who was his patronizer for a number of years. It is reported that he was the first clergyman to propose a convention for the independent organization of the Church after the Revolution. In May, 1775, he was a member of the first convention that met in Richmond, Va., under the act of incorporation; and he was appointed a delegate to the ensuing General Convention. In May of that year he was chosen bishop, a sound and able divine, and was universally esteemed. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 270.

Griffiths, David, a Welsh Congregational minister, was born at Glamiswelch, Carmarghshire, Dec. 20, 1728. He was converted when about four years of age, studied two years at Neuwaddly Academy, three at Wrexham College, and three at the Missionary College, Gosport; was ordained as missionary to Madagascar, reaching his destination in 1821. He formed the first native Christian church in that island, but after being ten years on the field, when the missionaries were compelled to leave the country, he returned to England. Two years later he received a letter from the Queen of Madagascar, permitting him to return for five years, at his own expense, in the capacity of a trader, but in reality a missionary. He was again expelled from the island, and after travelling on sea and land about the coast of Africa, and the Comoro Isles, he returned to his native country in 1842, and published a history of Madagascar, in Welsh. In 1852 he established a church in Kington, Radnorshire. About this time, learning that Madagascar was free for mission work, he, in company with Messrs. Joseph Freeman and T. W. Meller, commenced a new and improved translation of the Bible into the Malagasy language, and finished it shortly before his death, which occurred at Windsor, March 21, 1863. Mr. Griffiths was emphatically practical. He could preach in three languages, and had a good knowledge of Greek, Latin, Hebrew, French, Chaldee, and Arabic. Besides his work on the Malagasy Bible, he translated into the language of Madagascar, The Anxious Inquirer, Friend of Sinners, Come to Jesus, It is a Tree of Life, and Treatise on the Resurrection; corrected former translations of Pilgrim's Progress, and several tracts; corrected and enlarged former works, English and Malagasy Dictionary; Malagasy and English Dictionary; Vocabulary of Malagasy and English; besides his History of Madagascar, he published, A History of Madagascar Martyrs, in English: "Malagasy Grammar; - Catechism; - Hymn Book; - Essay on Destiny; - The Poor Rich Man, and the Rich Poor Man, and several Tracts. Also left ready for the press, Perp of Day, and Lives upon Line. See (Lond.) Cong, Test.-Boo, 1864, p. 216.

Grigg, Joseph, an English Presbyterian, was assistant minister at the Silver Street Church, London, from 1743 to 1747, at which last date he married the widowed of Colonel Drew, a lady of much property, and retired to St. Alban's, where he preached for his dissenting brethren. He contributed to several works between 1756 and 1765, when he issued a small tract of Hymns on Divine Subjects. These were collected in a small volume by Daniel Seligwick, and published in 1801. Mr. Grigg died at Walthamstow, Oct. 29, 1768. One of his hymns, written when he was only ten years old, "Jesus! and shall it ever be," is still a favorite. See Gaskin, Hymn Writers, p. 68.

Grigg, Levett, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Tolland, Conn., Nov. 17, 1808. He graduated at Yale College in 1829, was engaged for a year and a half in teaching at Mount Hope Institute, near Baltimore, Md., studied at the Andover Theological Seminary two years, and acted as tutor in Yale College for the same length of time, while pursuing his theological studies in the Yale Divinity School. He was ordained at North Haven, Oct. 30, 1833, and remained as pastor till July 30, 1845, when he accepted a call to the Newton Street Church (Church of the Redeemer), New Haven. After supplying the pulpit of the Second Church in Millbury, Mass., for a time, he became, in 1856, pastor of the Church, where he continued fourteen years. For a time he acted as an agent of the Western College Society. His home, during the last years of his life, was in Bristol, Conn., and he died there Jan. 28, 1883. The high esteem in which he was held in this town is indicated by the circumstance that, as a token of respect, a vote was passed exempting his property from taxation. See The Congregationalist, Feb. 8, 1885. (J. C. B.)

Grillet, Jean, a French missionary, one of the first explorers of Guiana, was born about 1630. He joined the Jesuits, and was sent out to Guiana, where he became superior of the establishment of his order until the English squadron destroyed the colony, Oct. 22, 1677. In 1674 he made an exploring tour through a part of that country, of which on his return to France he published an account. Grillet died about 1676. See Hoefer, Notiz-Biog. Generale, s. v.

Grimaldi, Agostino, a Genoese prelate, third son of Lambert, prince of Monaco, studied belles-lettres and theology, and became a particular friend of Cardinal Bembo and Sabatini. In 1605 he was elected abbot of Lerins, and assisted in 1512 at the Council of Lateran. On account of some political offence, France I deposed him of all his revenues in France. Charles V indemnified him, and made him the bishop of Palencia (1514) and the archbishop of Oviedo; he had even designated him to pope Clement VII as cardinal, but Agostino died before his promotion, probably of poison, April 12, 1532. There are extant of this prelate several letters to illustrious men of his time. See Hoefer, Notiz-Biog. Generale, s. v.

Grimaldi, Domenico, a Genoese prelate, was born in 1592, being the son of Giambattista Grimaldi, lord of Montalbino. He had distinguished himself in the army when pope Pius V appointed him commissary-general of the galleys of the Church, in which capacity he took an active part in the battle of Lepanto. He afterwards entered into orders, and obtained the abbey of Mont Major-les-Arles. In 1581 Gregory XIII gave him the bishopric of Sarona, from which he was transferred, in 1584, to the see of Cavaillon, as archbishop and vice legate. He persecuted Protestants with rigor and cruelty, and died in 1599. See Hoefer, Notiz-Biog. Generale, s. v.

Grimaldi, Geronimo, a Genoese statesman and prelate, occupied the principal offices of the republic, and accomplished several diplomatic missions with success. After the death of his wife, he entered into the ministry, and easily attained the first dignities of the Church. He was made cardinal, with the title of St. Georges-in-Velatro. He obtained afterwards the archbishopric of Bari, and then that of Genoa, where he died in 1584. See Hoefer, Notiz-Biog. Generale, s. v.

Grimaldi, Giovanni Francesco (called II Bogogno), an eminent Italian landscape painter, was born at Bologna in 1560, and studied under the Caracci. He went to Rome for improvement, and soon rose to eminence. He was employed by Innocent X in the Vatican and at Monte Cavallo. He was invited to Paris by cardinal Mazarin, and was employed in the Louvre by Louis XIV. On returning to Rome he received numerous commissions; one, patronized by Alexander VIII and Clement IX, was twice appointed president of the Academy of St. Luke, and attained both fame and fortune. One of his best works was the Baptism of Christ. He died in 1638. See Hoefer, Notiz-Biog. Generale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

herself went to Vercelli, in 1779, and was appointed canon of the cathedral there in 1782. In 1811 he assisted at the Council at Paris, and took part in the commission appointed to revise the response to the emperor. He died Jan. 1, 1830. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Grimaldi, Niccolo, a Genoese prelate, was born Dec. 6, 1645. He was at first clerk of the apostolic chamber, and superintendent of the streets and roads of Rome. In 1656 he became prefect of the pontifical almonry. After having made good use of these different employments, he left them to become secretary of the congregation of the bishops and regulars, in 1701. Clement XI made him cardinal, May 17, 1706, and on Sept. 14 following he was made legate of Bologna. After being prefect of the Consulatus for several years, he passed over, June 8, 1716, to the order of the cardinal priests. He died Dec. 29, 1717, leaving an immense fortune. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Grimes, L. A., a distinguished colored Baptist minister, was born a slave at the South in 1808. While acting as a coachman in Washington, D. C., he attracted the attention and secured the friendship of the late Rev. Prof. D. H. Neale, then a resident of the city. He soon became a good scholar and a most acceptable preacher, holding for twenty-five years the pastorate of a colored Baptist Church in Boston. He died there, March 14, 1873. Mr. Grimes took a special interest in the education of colored men as a whole, and for several years was one of the most useful trustees of the Wayland Seminary, Washington, D. C. See The Watchman, March, 1873. (J. C. S.)

Grimm, Heinrich Adolf, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born Sept. 1, 1747, at Siegen, in Prussia, and died at Duisburg, Aug. 29, 1816, doctor and professor of theology. He published Romanae et Obiitiae Oraculum Smyreonicum (Duisburg, 1805):—Chald. Christomatie mit einem vollständigen Glossarion (1801):—Eregetische Aufsätze zur Auskunftung schweriger Stellen der Schrift (1798):—Der Prophet Jonas erklärt (1798).—Zur Wahrheit und Anfassung (1790). Grindrod, Edmund, an English Wesleyan minister, was born in Clay Lane, near Rochdale, Feb. 28, 1785. The family removed to Liverpool when Edmund was young. At about the age of twenty, when assisting his father in the sailing of a vessel, the crew having perished in a mariner, he witnessed the destruction of the vessel and the lives saved. In 1806 he was received into the ministry, and henceforward labored on some of the most important charges. In 1820 a great revival blessed his labors in Edinburgh; in 1827, with Christian gentleness and firmness, he withstood the torrent of opposition at Leeds on the question of slavery; in 1822 and 1833 he was secretary of the conference; in 1834 he was president of the Canadian Conference at Kingston; in 1834 and 1835, when stationed at Manchester, he again passed through a bitter conflict. In 1837 Grindrod was elected president of the British Conference at Leeds; in 1840 he went to his last appointment, fifth London or Lambeth circuit; in April, 1841, he underwent a severe surgical operation, and died May 1, 1842. He wrote, besides essays in periodicals, and several sermons, published collectively, The Duties, Qualifications, and Encouragements of Class-Leaders (London, 1813, 12mo):—Compendium of the Laws and Regulations of Wesleyan Methodism (ibaid, 1842, 8vo). See Wes. Meth. Magazine, July, 1842, September, 1846; Stevenson, City Road Conference, 1843. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1842; Smith, Hist. of Wes. Methodism, iii. 405 sq.

Grinfield, Edward William, an English clergyman and scholar, was born in 1784. He commenced his career as a teacher in 1818. From 1827 to 1843 he published little, being employed during that time on his Novum Testamentum Helveticum (2 vols. 8vo), the design of which was to show the close connection between the Septuagint and the Greek Testament. The next five years were spent in preparing the Scholia Helvetica (2 vols. 8vo). For fifty years he labored to elevate the Septuagint to its proper place as an interpreter of the Hebrew text. To this end he collected all the various editions of the book, and all the literature relating to them. In addition to the above, his publications are, An Apology for the Septuagint, in which its claims to Biblical and canonical authority are stated and defended (1859, 8vo), a number of sermons, and theological and other treatises. He died July 9, 1864. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Grinnell, Daniel T., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was rector of St. Paul's Church, Jackson, Mich., the most of his ministry being spent in this pasture. For a long time he was a member of the missionary committee of his diocese. He died June 2, 1868, aged fifty-five years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1869, p. 109.

Grischow, Johann Heinrich, inspector of the Hallé Bible Society, was born in 1866. After completing his studies, he devoted his talents entirely to the work of the society, founded by him at Darmstadt in 1853, and at Canstein (q. v.), and died at Halle, Nov. 6, 1754. He translated into Latin Bingham's Christian Antiquities (1724, 10 vols.), and, after being translated from the German into the Latin works of Spener, Francke, Freylinghausen, c. See Fischer, Almanach Katholischen Thursday, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der thsl. Lit., ii. 606. (B. P.)

Griswold, Rufus Wilmot, D.D., a Baptist minister and writer, who was born Feb. 15, 1815, at Benson, Rutland Co., Vt., and died in New York, Aug. 27, 1857, was literary manager of a number of journals in several of the principal cities of the Union, such as, The New Yorker, The Brother Jonathan, and The New World; in 1842 and 1843 editor of Graham's Magazine; and from August, 1850, to April, 1852, conducted the International Magazine. Besides these, he prepared numerous works, especially The Poets of America (1842), etc. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Duyckinck, Cyclop. of Amer. Lit., ii. 582.

ot an army for Froth; but the army was conquered, and became a prey of the strange king, who took the treasures and the mill on his ship, and ordered the maid to grind salt. This they did until midnight, and then asked the king whether he had enough, but Myasirna and her husband, the master of the ship, told them this so long that the ship sank, and the sea was made salt.

GRULICH, Friedrich Joseph, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Dec. 15, 1766. He entered the ministry in 1795, was archdeacon at Torgau, and died Nov. 19, 1839, leaving, Betrachtung über den neuesten Verkehr mit dem Leben Jesu (Leipzig, 1808)—Über die kirchliche Bedeutung des Kirchenjahres (Leipzig, 1827), and the treatises Ledeismogen (1826)—Über die Fronten in den Reden Jesu (1838). GRULICH, Martin, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born in 1685. He studied at Wittemberg and Leipsic, was preacher in 1725, and died at Torgau, Nov. 30, 1772, a superintendent. He is the author of a great many ascetical works, of no importance for the present times. The titles are given in full in Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Grundig, Christoph Gottlob, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Sept. 5, 1707. He entered the ministry in 1735, was tutor at Hennersdorf, near Annaberg, in Saxony, and died at Freiberg, Aug. 9, 1780. He is the author of a number of ascetical works mentioned by Jöcher in Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Grundtvig, Nicolai Frederik Severin, "the prophet of the North," was born Sept. 6, 1768, at Ulsby, a village in the island of Zealand. He studied theology at Copenhagen, was tutor in a private family in the island of Langeland from 1806 to 1808, teacher of history in a school at Copenhagen from 1808 to 1810, vicar to his father at Ulsby from 1810 to 1814, and again teacher at Copenhagen from 1815 to 1821. During those years of his youth and early manhood he lived like a monk, without being monkish. He only slept two hours, and for twenty years never in a bed. Before he was appointed to his pastorate, Grundtvig had already become known in the literary circles of his country. His earliest literary efforts were the Teaching of Ato, the Songs of the Edda, and Religion and Literature. From 1809 to 1822 he published a series of poetical and historical works—Novella Mythologica (1808); Opuscula Kämpelersc Undergang i Nord (c. Fall of the Kämpelers in the North, 1809), and the translations of Saxo Grammaticus (1818-22, 6 vols.), Snorre Sturlesi, and Beowulf's Draga—most of them referring to the heroic age of Scandinavian history, and all of them pregnant with a peculiarly stirring life. But his theological productions, also his sermons, more especially his Kort Begreb af Verdens Krones i Sammenhæng, i. e. View of the World's Chronicles (1812), attracted equal attention, as they ran out in a vehement denunciation of the frivolity with which the age had eliminated Christianity from its life. Attracted by the genius of Grundtvig, king Frederik VI, without consulting either the bishop or the consistory, appointed him pastor in Praesto (a small town in Zealand), and in the next year he was called to the chaplaincy at the Christian-Denmark Mission in Copenhagen. There he soon gathered a circle of friends and pupils, and soon built up an institution to which he gave the name of "Theological School," and which he called his "Theological Church," in which he requested Clausen either to renounce his heresy or to give up his professorship. Within eight days Grundtvig's Precept was three times reprinted. Clausen instituted a civil suit; Grundtvig was sentenced to pay a fine, and to publish nothing without permission of the royal censor. In 1826 he resigned his office, because he did not wish to serve a Church which seemed to give up the faith and the confession of his pastorate. Then for a while he undertook a literary work, My Literary Testament. From 1826 to 1889 Grundtvig lived in literary retirement at Copenhagen. From 1829 to 1881 he visited England, edited a theological monthly, Theologisk Muemelskrift; published the Song-Fyrk til den danske Kirke (1861; new editions, 1875-79), a collection of the hymns, partly original, partly translated. Meanwhile his influence spread far beyond the capital, and the "Grundtvigians" and "Grundtvigianism" increased from day to day. He was allowed to preach in the afternoon in the German Frederiks-Church, and the number of his adherents grew more and more. In 1889 he was pastor of the Varon-hospital-Church, and there he remained till his death, which took place Sept. 2, 1872. His party made itself especially felt in 1848, and brought about those liberties in church and school which in some cases were detrimental to religion. Grundy, Robert Caldwell, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Washington County, Ky., in 1809. He graduated at St. Joseph's College, Bardstown, in 1829, and at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1835. In 1836 he was ordained by the Transylvania Presbytery of Kentucky, and installed over the Presbyterian Church of Maysville, where he remained until 1858, when he removed to Memphis, Tenn., as pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church in that city. In 1868 he took charge of the Central Presbyterian Church in Cincinnati. He died at Dayton, O., June 27, 1865. See Wilson, Prep. Hist. Almanac, 1867, p. 153; Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 88.

Grüneisen, Carl von, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Stuttgart, Jan. 17, 1802. He studied at Tubingen and Halle, was in 1825 military preacher and court-chaplain, in 1835 court-preacher and member of the emperor's council, and died at his active place—Feb. 28, 1878. Grüneisen took an active part in the development of the church of Wittenberg, and for sixteen years presided at the annual meetings of the Eisenach Church conferences. He wrote Uber bildliche Darstellung der Gekreuzigten (Stuttgart, 1839); Über das Sämtliche der bildenden Kunst bei den Griechen (Leipzig, 1833)—Nicolaus Meinm, Leben und Werke (Stuttgart, 1837)—Ulema Kunstleben im Mittalter (Ulm, 1844)—Predigten für die Gebräudeln in der Gemeinde (Stuttgart, 1835)—Christliches Handbuch in Gebeten und Liedern (5th ed. 1869)—Ueber Gesangsebuchern (1839). In connection with Schnase and Schnorr von Carolsfeld, he founded in 1858 the Christliche Kunstblatt. See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 474; Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Grüneisen, Johann Peter, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Jan. 37, 1668. He studied at different universities, was in 1798 professor of theology at Rostock, and died Jan. 5, 1712, leaving Doctina Symbolica de S. Theologian Testibus Symbolica—Disputationes de Scintia Dei.—De Sobatho Hendomadali ad Gen. ii, 3;—De Singare Victorie ad Judice, iii, 31;—De Semine Domini Collectione;—De Christo ad Tit. ii, 14;—De Timore Dominii ad Prov. ix, 10;—De bißh ywstwv ad Matt. i, 1;—De Fide Matt. Genesologiae ad Matt. i, 6-11;—De Filio Dei ex Egypto Voscalo ad Matt. ii, 15;—De Jesus Nazareno ad Matt. ii, 22, 23, etc. See Jocher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.) Gruppe, Otto Friedrich, a German philosopher and antiquarian, was born at Dantzig, April 15, 1804. He studied at Berlin, but as he opposed the Hegelian system of philosophy, he was expelled from the university and was not re-enlisted even when the case was brought up to him, till at last, in 1844, he was made professor of philosophy. Gruppe died Jan. 7, 1876, at Berlin. He wrote Aristotel und das System seiner Philosophie (Berlin, 1851) — Die Entwicklung des Denkens (Berlin, 1855). These works were reprinted against Hegel. Of his poetical productions we only mention, Ruth, Tobias, &c. (1857). (P. P.)

Guadagni, Bernardo Gattano (or John Anthony of St. Bernard), an Italian prelate, was born at Florence, Sept. 14, 1574, being the son of Maria Magdalena Cornati, sister of pope Clement XII. He joined the barefooted Carmelites, at the convent of Arezzo, Nov. 11, 1700. He had been successively teacher of the novices, and several times prior and provincial of Florence, and was, on Dec. 20, 1724, appointed by pope Benedict XIII to the bishopric of Arezzo, and received from the hands of Clement XII the pallium on Nov. 26, 1730. In 1731 he was made cardinal, with the title of St. Martin del Monte. In 1732 he became vicar-general of Rome, which office he maintained until his death, after 1733. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Guadagnolo, Filippo, a Minorite and professor of Arabic in the college of the Sapienza at Rome, was born in 1596, and died March 27, 1656. In behalf of the Congregation de Propaganda Fidei, he translated the Bible from the Vulgate into Arabic, which was published in three volumes (Rome, 1671) — a work on which he spent twenty-seven years. See Winer, Handbuch der theolog. Lit., i, 58; Jocher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Toppi, Bibliotheca Neapolitana. (P. P.)

Guala (Bichieri), Giaocomo, an Italian prelate, was born at Verceil in the second part of the 12th century. At the age of twenty-one, after having studied canon law, he was made canon of the Eusebian Cathedral, and cardinal in the same year, by Innocent VII. In 1208 Innocent sent him to France as a legate to reform the habits of the clergy. For this purpose Guala wrote constitutions of ecclesiastical discipline. After having been commissioned also to reform the clergy of Lombardy, he was sent to Sicily by the emperor Frederick II, to persuade him to undertake a new crusade, but did not succeed. On his return to Italy he contributed to the foundation of the University of Verceil, but died before the finishing of his establishment, May 1227. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Gualdim (—Paes), a celebrated grand-master of the order of the Templars in Portugal, was born at Braga in the 12th century. He frequently fought against the Moors of the Peninsula. At the time of the second crusade he was provincial of the order of the Templars. During his five years' stay in the East, he distinguished himself at the siege of Ascalon in 1155; and in the following year came back to Europe, when he was made grand-master. In March, 1169, he laid the foundations of the magnificent castle of Thomar, which was henceforth to serve as the capitulary chapter of the Portuguese nation. In 1198 a vast body of Moorish soldiers advanced under the leadership of Yakub, son of Abu-Yussuf, against the doors of Thomar, determined to revenge upon the Templars that loss which they had suffered at Sandarem in 1147, to which the knights under his own active participation largely contributed, the Moorish army were repulsed. The Templars of Portugal were indeed a rampart to the Christian populations, and their order was respected, even though the pontiff was hostile to their convents. Gualdim-Paes died peacefully, in 1195, in his monastery. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Guaitierio, Filippo Antonio, an Italian prelate and scholar, was born at San Quirico de Fermo, March 24, 1606. He belonged to one of the first families of Ancona. His grand-uncle sent him, in 1672, to Rome, to study at the college of Clement. Antonio studied philosophy and theology, and was appointed rector of the university of Fermo, where his grand-uncle was the archbishop. At the age of nineteen he received the degree of doctor, and about 1684 was admitted to the number of the candidates for prelates. On Feb. 17, 1700, Innocent XII intrusted him with the noviciate to France, and Clement XI consecrated him in the abbey of the Trinity, the abbot of Tioni and Todi, and in 1709 made him cardinal with the title of Saint Chrysogonus. In France Guaitero had connected himself with the principal scholars, had examined all the monastic and other literary productions of the country, and afterwards published the collection of such works as were of great value, medals, both antique and modern, and instruments of rare precision; but all these literary or scientific treasures, being embarked at Marseilles, were lost on the passage. He began new researches, and succeeded in collecting a number of elements, useful for a universal history, which he proposed to write. But when he was settled down as a legate at Ravenna, the imperial troops invaded that city and pillaged his house, by which his books were either burned or dispersed. Later, Louis XV appointed him commander of the Oratory of St. John of God, with the title of Cardinal of the Scriptures, all his literary tastes, left no writings. He died at Rome, April 21, 1728. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Guard, Thomas, D.D., an eloquent Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in County Galway, Ireland, June 8, 1831. He was accepted by the Irish Conference of 1861 as a candidate for the ministry, and called to labor in the Western Conference. He was received into full connection in 1865. In 1862 he went to South Africa under the direction of the London Missionary Society, and spent nine years, chiefly at Grahamstown and Port Elizabeth. In 1871 he came to America on a visit, and at once became popular as a preacher and lecturer. On receiving an invitation to become the pastor of Mount Vernon Place Church, Baltimore, Md., he decided to make this country his home. He entered upon his pastorate in Baltimore in 1872. At the end of his term (in 1876) he became pastor of the Howard Street Church, San Francisco, Calif. In 1878 and 1879 he was pastor of First Church, Oakland, and in 1880 resumed his former relationship with the Mount Vernon Place Church, Baltimore. It was there that he closed his earthly career, Oct. 15, 1892. He was thoroughly acquainted with popular literature, and was a thorough Methodist theologian. As a lecturer and platform speaker he was almost without an equal. As a pulpit orator he was unsurpassed in his own or any age, and he could attract and hold the largest audiences of the most cultured people. As a pastor he was not successful, and was in some respects managing business of a kind. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1883, p. 35.

GUERNACCI, Mauro, an Italian prelate, was born at Volterra in 1701. He received the doctor's degree at Florence, where he pursued the course of Salvini. He was honored with the favor of Benedict XIV, who charged him to continue Chazan's Lives of the Popes, but in 1725 he was removed. In 1754 he discovered there the remains of Roman bath. He also made a collection of Etruscan antiquities, which he bequeathed to his native city. He died Aug. 21, 1785, leaving, Dissertatione sopra le Titi Tarsei (Florence, 1747);— Fisica et Re Geogra Pompelium Romanorum, etc. (Rome, 1751).— Origini Italiane (Volterra, 1768);— Poesie di Zolfo Arruamia (Lucca, 1769). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

GUEDEN, Heinrich Philipp, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Oct. 4, 1676. He studied at Heidelberg and Jena, was in 1700 pastor at Osterroda, took the degree as doctor of theology in 1720, was in 1722 pastor, general-superintendent, and professor at Göttingen, and died April 27, 1742. He wrote, Manuscript Problemata ad Theologiam Naturalem pertinentia;— De Bonificatio Germanorum Apollini (Helmsted, 1739). See Hoefer, Handbuch der Lit. i. 796; Jäckh, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

GUEDONN, Anselm Friedrich von, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born at Erfurt in 1723, and died May 16, 1789, leaving Geschichte des ersten christlichen Jahrhunderts (Würzburg, 1783, 2 vols.); Geschichte des zweiten christlichen Jahrhunderts (ibid. 1784, 2 vols.);— Geschichte des dritten christlichen Jahrhunderts (ibid. 1787, 2 vols.);— Geschichte des vierten christlichen Jahrhunderts (ibid. 1788, 2 vols.). See Winck, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i. 648. (B. P.)

Güder, Eduard, a Swiss theologian, was born June 1, 1817. He studied at Berne University, was pastor at Biel from 1842 to 1855, and thereafter pastor of the Rydeck Church, at Berne, until his death, July 14, 1882. In connection with his pastorate, he also held a professorship at the University. He published Der Ursprung der Erkenntnis Christi in den Toden (Bern, 1858):— Alle und in Allen Christus (sermons, ibid. 1857);— Die Thatsächlichkeit der Aufseracht Christi und deren Bestätigung (ibid. 1862). In 1855 he published the work of his teacher, Schnecktenburger, Vergleichende Darstellung des Lutheranischen u. reformirten Lehrbegriffes, on account of which he was made doctor of theology by the Königstein University. See Zuchol, Bibli. Theol. i. 475. (B. P.)

Guérard, Robert, a learned French Benedictine, was born at Rouen in 1641. He assisted Delfau in the revival of St. Augustine's works; while thus employed, he obtained the degree of doctor of theology in a satirical book entitled, L'Abbé Commençateur, and confined in the abbey of Aimounay, in Bugey. He took advantage of this exile to make a diligent search for ancient MSS., and discovered a great number; among others, St. Augustine's book against Julian, entitled, Quis Separatur. He was afterwards sent to Fécamp, then to Rouen, where he died, Jan. 2, 1715. He left Abrégé de la Bible (first published in 1707). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Guerich (1) (Lat. Guercus, Erechus, or Worecs) was a bishop and count of Nantes. His father sent him for his education to a monastery, and he was appointed to the episcopal see at Nantes, or the first vacancy. However, a few days after having received the news of his election, Guerich learned of the death of his brother. The people had made him bishop, but by virtue of a dispensation he was made count. He pre tended, nevertheless, to occupy the two positions simul taneously. He became famous by his war engagements with Conan le Tors (the crooked), count of Henné. The death of Guerich, in 988, was thought to have been caused by poison. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Guerich (2), a French prelate, was born in the first part of the 11th century, being the son of Alain, count of Caronnailles. Airard, bishop of Nantes, having been expelled from his episcopal see in 1052, by the people of Nantes, was immediately replaced by Guerich, who, without attending to his consecration, occupied the episcopal palace, and took the administration of the diocese. He had not even obtained consecration when he went to the Council of Rheims in 1059. He also attended the disputation of Angers in 1062, and presided at the Council of Tours in 1068. He was a friend of the monks of Marmontil, and sustained their pretensions in all the ecclesiastical assemblies. Guerich died July 31, 1079. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Guéranger, Prosper Louis Pascal, a French ecclesiastic, was born April 4, 1805, at Sablé-sur-Sarthe, in Le Mans. He studied at Angers and Le Mans, and received holy orders in 1827. For some time he was professor at Le Mans, and at the same time secretary to the bishop of De la Myre. With a view to restoring the order of the Benedictines in France, he retired in 1833 to the Benedictine abbey at Solesmes, where, with a number of friends, he commenced a monastic life according to the rules of St. Benedict. In 1836 he went to Rome, where he was consecrated bishop, and was appointed by Gregory XVI, abbot of Solesmes and president of the Benedictine congregation of France. He was opposed to the Gallican Church and her liturgies. In the spirit of his motto he published, Institutions Liturgiques (1840-59, 5 vols.);— Le Luxembourg (1844-56, 9 vols.; translated also into German at Mayence, 1875).— Essai sur la Liturgie Contemporaine (1856, written against Prince Albert de Broglie). When the Vatican council was opened, and the adher ents of the Gallican Church insisted upon their privileges, Gueranger, publisher of De la Monarchie Pontificale, which was highly praised by pope Pius IX. At the time of his death, Jan. 30, 1875, Gueranger was dean of Le Mans, Nantes, and St. Denis. Besides the works already mentioned, he wrote, Origines de l'Église Romaine (1836).— Histoire de la Sainte Cécile (1848; 2d ed. 1853; translated also into German, Ratisbon, 1851).— Mémoire sur la Question de l'Immaculée Conception (1850);— Enchiridion Benedictinum, Collectanea Regularium Vivam et Loudes, etc. (1862).— Les Exercices de Sainte Gertrude (2d ed. col.);— Essai sur la Sainte-Cécile (4th ed. 1865; Germ., trad. Eisenhardt, 1863).— La Règle de Sainte Remi (1868).— Sainte Cécile et la Société Romaine aux deux Premiers Siècles (1873). Guericke, Heinrich Ernst Ferdinand, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Feb. 25, 1808. He studied at Halle, was made a doctor of philosophy in 1824, licentiate of theology in 1825, on presenting De Schola, qua Alexandrinorum Florat, Catecheticum, and professor of theology at Halle in 1829, in acknowledgment of his biography of August Hermann Francke, and his Beiträge zur historisch-kritischen Einleitung ins Neue Testament. In 1833 the Tubingen faculty conferred on him the degree of a doctor of theology. He was a very strict Lutheran, opposed the exactions of the Prussian government, and took a leading part in the Lutheran and Reformed churches, and founded, together with Rudelbach, the Zeitschrift für die gesammte lutherische Theologie und Kirche, in 1840, which was continued till 1878, in connection with professor Deitsch. Guericke died Feb. 4, 1878. His works already mentioned, he wrote, Handbuch der Kirchen geschichte (9th ed. 1867-69, 3 vols.; translated into English by W. G. T. Shedd, N. Y. 1857-68, 2 vols.).— Allgemeine christlich Symbolik (Leipzig, 1861).— Historisch-kritische Einleitung ins Neue Testament (ibid. 1843; 2d ed. 1854).— Lehrbuch der christlich kirchlichen Archäologie (2d ed. Berlin, 1859). See Zuchol, Bibli. Theol.

GUÉRIN (Lat. Guerinus), abbot of Flavigny, in Burgundy, is a contemporary of Guérin, and was born about 626. He took part in the dispute in which his brother St. Léger, bishop of Autun, had engaged against Ebroin, a burgomaster of Neustria, and shared with him the alternative of triumph and the realisation. Ebroin, having obtained the support of his rival, brought them before the tribunal, after having cut out their eyes. Guérin, being charged with complicity in the murder of Childeric II, was tied to a stake and stoned to death in 678. He is commemorated as a martyr on Aug. 25 and Oct. 2. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

GUÉRIN, or Guérin), a French prelate, was born in 1281, and was first a friar of the order of the Hospitallers at Jerusalem, and succeeded, in 1213, to Geooffri, bishop of Senlis. He was one of the principal counsellors of Philip Augustus. Guérin recovered Tournay from Renaud, count of Boulogne. In 1214 he assisted in the celebration of the battle of Bouvines, in memory of which an abbey was founded in the diocese of Senlis, with the name of Notre-Dame de la Victoire. Louis VIII ascended to the throne in 1223, when Guérin continued his services to him as to his father, and received the title of chancellor. In 1226, two years after the death of Louis VIII, Guérin retired from the world, and entered the monastery of Châlons, where he died, April 19, 1230. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

GUÉRIN (Gérin or Guerin), whose surname and country are unknown, a master of the order of the Hospitallers of St. John of Jerusalem, succeeded Bertrand of Paris in 1426. At this time the Templars and Hospitaliters were divided; Thibaud VI, of Champagne, went to Palestine at the head of a crusade, and concluded a truce with the infidels after the battle of Gaza. The Templars subscribed to that truce. Richard of England followed next and an attack was made on the Templars, which led to the destruction of the Templars in 1309, and the quiet chamber for Maurice's eyes alone. Her Journal and Letters make two volumes of 400 pages each, and have gone through twenty editions in France. They have been translated into English, and republished in London and New York, edited by G. S. Tribot, and have had an extensive sale among both Protestants and Romanists. See (N. Y.) Cath. Almanac, 1872, p. 42.

GUÉRIN, Jean Baptiste Paulin, a distinguished French painter of history and portraits, was born at Tonkville, Oct. 1726. There are a number of fine historical pieces, by him, held in the Louvre, and in the churches of Paris. He was professor of painting to the Maison Royale de St. Denis. He died at Paris, Jan. 16, 1835. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

GUERRA, Giovanni (called de Modena), an Italian painter, designer, and architect, was born at Modena in 1544, and visited Rome at the age of eighteen, where he rose to considerable eminence. He executed a number of works for the chapels and churches during the pontificate of Sixtus V, and also made a great number of designs for frescoes of the Old and New Test. As an architect, he designed the Scala Santa at Rome, the Church of Santa Maria di Paradiso, and La Madonna delle Assi, at Modena. He died at Rome in 1618. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

GUÉVARA, Juan Beltran, a Spanish prelate, was born at Medina-de-la-Torres in 1541. He was sent on a mission to Naples, and wrote for pope Paul V against the Venetians for which pontiff rewarded him with the bishopric of Salerno. Guévara was afterwards bishop of Badajoz, and died archbishop of Cadiz. His contemporaries designate him as governed by passion and given up to imagination. He wrote Propaginumulit Ecclesiasticae Libertatis Adversus Leges Venetiae Later, etc. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

GUÉVARA, Don Juan Nino de, an eminent Spanish painter, was born at Madrid in 1632, and was instructed under Miguel Manrique. There are many of his works at Malaga, Cordova, and Granada. In the Church de la Caridad de Malaga, is a fine picture of 'The Triumph of the Cross'; and in the cathedral, 'The Ascension of Christ,' and 'The Assumption of the Virgin.' He died at Malaga in 1698. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Rome, Gen. Biog. Dict., s. v.

site pearls"—has been published. The two sisters died in 1656, within three months of each other. Mother Theresa observed those rare virtues which form the perfect religion of theExtrasensory, and was born about 626. He took part in the dispute in which his brother St. Léger, bishop of Autun, had engaged against Ebroin, a burgomaster of Neustria, and shared with him the alternatives of triumph and of persecution. Ebroin, having obtained the support of his rival, brought them before the tribunal, after having cut out their eyes. Guérin, being charged with complicity in the murder of Childeric II, was tied to a stake and stoned to death in 678. He is commemorated as a martyr on Aug. 25 and Oct. 2. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

GUÉRIN (Gerin or Guérin), whose surname and country are unknown, a master of the order of the Hospitallers of St. John of Jerusalem, succeeded Bertrand of Paris in 1426. At this time the Temp-Guí, the institutor of the order of the Hospitaliers of the Saint-Esprit de Montpellier, seems, in 1197, to have united several religious persons, and to have written down the rules of that new institution, which was recognized and confirmed by a bull of Pope Innocent III, April 23, 1198. This pontiff called Guí, with several of his co-workers, to Rome, where he charged them with the administration of the hospital of St. Mary in Saxony. The order founded by Guí had for its special object to offer hospitality to the sick, and was regarded as a military order. Guí died in 1208. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Guí d’Amiens (thirty-fourth bishop) was born about the beginning of the 11th century, being the son of Légerlame, I count of Ponthieu. He studied at the abbey of St. Riquier, and was appointed archdeacon of Amiens in 1043. The bishop of that city sent him some time afterwards to Rome, to obtain a sanction from the pope for the pretensions of the bishop. Guí returned to France without success, and was appointed bishop of Amiens in 1058. Ten years afterwards he accompanied, as almoner, Mathilde, the wife of William the Conqueror, into England. He died in 1076, leaving in Latin a piece of poetry on the battle of Hastings. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Guí d’Auvergne, a French prelate, was born about the end of the 9th century, in the diocese of Sens. He was educated at the Cathedral of Auvergne, under the care of the bishop Herifil, and became a canon there. He went to the court of King Raoul and Queen Emma, by whose influence he was appointed bishop of Auvergne, and was consecrated May 19, 938. He died Jan. 6, 961, leaving Responsoria and Antiphoner, in honor of St. Julian. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Guí de Bourbonne (or d’Auvernex), a French prelate, was born in 1290, being the son of Robert, count of Auvergne. After having entered holy orders, he became canon and afterwards chancellor of the Church of Amiens. In 1340 he was elected archbishop of Lyons, and two years afterwards was appointed cardinal by Clement VI. That pope, having reduced the jubilee from one hundred to fifty years, sent, in 1350, Guí, with cardinal Cessac, to Rome to reopen that holy year. A short time afterwards Guí was sent as legate to Hungary to settle a difference which had arisen between Louis, king of Hungary, and the queen Jeanette of Naples. At the same time his return to France Gregory XI sent him to Spain, to effect a reconciliation of the kings of Castile and Portugal. He died at Lerida, Nov. 25, 1373, and was buried at the abbey of Bouchet, in the diocese of Clermont. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Guí de Bourbonne (surnamed Gallus), a French prelate, was born in Burgundy about 1210. He was elected abbot of Citeaux in 1260. Two years afterwards he undertook a journey to Rome on business for his order. While there he received the promise of a cardinalate by pope Urban IV, with the title of St. Laurent in Lucania. Later he was sent in divers missions in France, Denmark, Sweden, and Germany. In 1267 he presided at the Council of Vienna. To him may be attributed the compilation of the acts of that assembly, found in Mano, Censide, xxiii, 1167-1174. A session at the Council of Lyons was May 20, 1274. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Guí de Saint-Denis, abbot there, and counsellor of kings Charles VI and Charles VII, was a doctor of canon and civil law, and well versed in sacred and profane letters. He assisted, in 1380, at the coronation of Charles VI, and in 1389 at the crowning of Isabella of Burgundy. He died April 26, 1389. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Guí (or Guisam) d’Étampes, a French prelate, was born about the middle of the 11th century. He studied in the famous school of La Mans, and became the disciple of Hildebert of Lavardin. He visited afterwards several other schools, and also went to England and other countries. He studied under the civilization of St. Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury. After his return he assumed the functions of a professor under Hildebert, and succeeded him in 1097 as director at the school of La Mans. According to the Histoire Littéraire, "Hildebert had more talent for composition and declamation than Guí, but he surpassed him in the liberal arts, which attracted to him a great concourse of students." Guí succeeded Hildebert as bishop of La Mans in 1126, and did not cease even then to occupy himself with the instruction of the schools. He died in 1155, and left no writings. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Guí de Luxemburg, king of Jerusalem, and first king of Cyprus, was born about 1140. He belonged to an ancient family of Limousin, which had distinguished itself in the first crusades. In 1180 he married Sibylia, the sister of Baldwin IV, king of Jerusalem, the widow of William of Montferrat. That princess brought him in dowry Ascalon and Joppa, and Baldwin, who had been attacked with an incurable disease, conferred upon Guí the government of the kingdom of Jerusalem. But his incapacity and pride made him unbearable to the lords, who disputed over the feeble remains of the Frankish power in the East. Baldwin's death in 1185 led to the clamor of the French lords, who, in order to take the power from Guí, urged his chamberlain, who in 1186 took back the power from Guí de Luxemburg to give it to the count of Tripoli. This gave occasion for a new civil war within the kingdom, which lasted till the death of Baldwin IV, in 1186. He had for his successor Baldwin V, a child of six years, the son of Sibylia and of William of Montferrat; but the youth died in 1186, shortly after his uncle, probably of poison administered to him by Guí. Having become heirless to the throne of Jerusalem, the sister of Baldwin IV announced her intention of separating from her husband, and of giving the crown to the most worthy of the French lords. She published the divorce in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre; Heracleius, patriarch of Jerusalem, pronouncing the separation. Sibylia, after having taken back the crown, gave it to Guí de Luxemburg, and thus disgusted most of the French lords. Soon afterwards a new Guí showed incapacity. Saladin, with his troops, continually invaded the country, and on the morning of July 4, 1187, threw himself with his Mohammedans upon a small body of Christian soldiers, who were encamped about the hill Hattin, near Lake Tiberias. Châtillon and other commanders were taken prisoners. Guí bought his liberty by restoring Ascalon to Saladin, and Jerusalem capitulated Oct. 2, 1187. Thus ended the Latin kingdom founded by Godfrey de Bouillon, after a duration of eighty-nine years. The only use that Guí made of his title of King of Jerusalem was in ceding it to Richard, in 1192, as a price of sovereignty over the island of Cyprus, which that prince had taken from the small Greek tyrant Isaac Comnenus; he also bound himself to pay back the twenty-five thousand marks which the Templars had given to Richard. Cyprus was afterwards devastated and nearly deserted; Guí people it again by drawing colonists from Armenia and Antioch. He also offered an asylum to a great number who fled from the domination of the Mohammedans in Palestine. After a peaceful reign of two years he died, in 1194, and transmitted his crown to his brother Amury. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Guí de Puy (thirty-first bishop), a French prelate, was born in the first part of the 10th century, being the son of Poulques the Kind, count of Anjou. He took holy orders, and was supplied with various abbots and benefices. But, the Church having interdicted the holding of several offices, Guí surrendered all his abbey rights back again, all that he had taken away from the monasteries, holding only the abbey of Carneri, which he administered with great regularity.
and order. He succeeded his brother Dragon in the episcopal see of Fory in 985, and died in 996. Gui left no works, but two pieces, which are of some interest in ecclesiastical history. The first is the manifestation by which he resigned his benefices (in Maillion, Annales Ord. Bened. i, 47); the second is a diploma, relating to the foundation of the monastery of St. Peter (in the Gallia Christiana, iii). See Hoefer, Nouv. Bio. Générale, s. v.

Guibé, Rokbert, a French cardinal, was born at Vitré, being of high parentage, which contributed to his early fortune. His ambition as well as his aptitude to conduct the most difficult affairs, rendered him at the head of the most remarkable men of his time. Being appointed bishop of Tréviers in 1488, he obtained his bula on May 20, but not yet having attained the age requisite to a canon, the pope intrusted the government of the diocese to a provisional administrator. In February, 1489, Guibé went to Rome on a message from Duke Francis. In 1498 he returned to Brittany, to be transferred from the see of Tréviers to that of Mâcon. He went to Rome a second time in 1502, and was appointed cardinal by Julius II, with the title of St. Au- tosias, Jan. 3, 1506. On Jan. 24, 1507, he was called to the episcopal see of Nantes, but, preferring his position at Rome, he did not remain long in his new church. He was legate of Avignon in 1511. The siege afterwards took away the revenues of the benefices from the cardinal, and Guibé resigned the bishopric of Nantes in favor of François Hamon, his nephew. Finally, in 1512, he was appointed at the Lateran Council, and died Sept. 9, 1513. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bio. Générale, s. v.

Guibert, abbot of Gembloux and of Florennes, was born about the year 1120, in Brabant. He lived for some time in the abbey of St. Martin, was elected abbot of Florennes in 1188, and five years later was placed at the head of the monastery of Gembloux; which communities he administered with wisdom, but resigned shortly before his death, which occurred Feb. 22, 1208. He wrote numerous works, e. g., A Poem on St. Martin, A Life of St. Hildegar, and several Letters, of which the majority have been published by Dom Martene, Amphiologia, ed. i, 916. A fire which broke out in the monastery of Gembloux at the end of the 17th century destroyed nearly all the works of Guibert. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bio. Générale, s. v.

Guichard, a French prelate, entered the order of the Cistercians and became abbot of Potigny, and in 1165 archbishop of Lyons, replacing thus another prelate, who had been deposed for bad relations with the emperor of Germany. Guichard rendered important service to his Church, and died about 1180. Several of his letters have been preserved. Dom Martene has published, in De Antiqu. de Eccles. Ritibus, iii, certain statutes which were promulgated by that archbishop, relating mostly to the divine service. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bio. Générale, s. v.

Guldacero, Agattho, an Italian Hebraist, born at Rocca-Carrugo (Calabria), was still living in 1539. After having taken holy orders, he studied Hebrew at Rome under a famous rabbi, and was appointed afterward to teach that language. His life was much in danger during the year 1527, and having retired to Avignon, he found a protector in the bishop of Apt, Jean Nicolas, who took him to Paris. Guldacero was appointed his professor by Francis I, in 1580. He interpreted at the College of France both the Hebrew and Greek texts of the Scriptures, and wrote, Grammatica Ebraica Linguae (Rome, 1514; Paris, 1599; under the title of Lexicon, Paris, 1587); a dozen treatises, or commentaries on the Psalms; a commentary on the Song of Solomon, with the Hebrew and Latin texts (Rome, 1586), and a commentary on the Deutero-Isaiahes (1831). See Hoefer, Nouv. Bio. Générale, s. v.

Guidicciioni, Giovanni, an Italian prelate and author, was born at Luca, Feb. 25, 1500. He received a careful education, and was quite successful in his studies at the universities of Pisa, Bologna, and Ferrara, where he obtained the degree of a doctor of law, and then went to Rome, where he connected himself with the principal literary men. By recommendation of his uncle, Bartolommeo, he entered the service of cardinal Farnese, who, on becoming pope under the name of Paul III, in 1534, appointed Guidicciioni governor of Rome, and called him in the same year to the bishopric of Posseburgo. Guidicciioni was afterwards sent on various more or less important commissions. He was made governor of the marches of Ancona in 1541, and died at Macerata, in August of the same year. For his letters and other writings, see Hoefer, Nouv. Bio. Générale, s. v.

Guidicciuoni, Christoforo, an Italian prelate and writer, was born at Luca in 1536. After being rector of the Church of S. Simeon in that city, he was appointed, in 1578, bishop of Ajaccio, in Corsica, and died in 1582, leaving Traditio Transportata Intus Greca nell' Italiana Faredda (Luca, 1547). See Hoefer, Nouv. Bio. Générale, s. v.

Guido, Fassio. See Conti, Guido, Rent. See Rennio.

Guidolin, Bernard, a celebrated French prelate, was born in Limosin, near La Roche-l'Abelle, in 1826. He entered the convent of the Dominicans at Limoges, Sept. 16, 1279. In 1293 he taught theology in the convent of Albi, in 1301 was appointed prior of Castres, and in 1303 of Limoges. Guidiloin went to Toulouse in 1310, where he enforced the inquisition against the Albigensians. In 1313 he was appointed procurator-general of his order at the court of Rome, and was charged by the pope. John XXII, with several negotiations, and on the conclusion of peace between France and Flanders, he was rewarded by being made bishop of Lodève (Lower Languedoc). He died Dec. 30, 1381. Some of his principal writings are: Tractatus Theologici Tangenti le Articles de Foi—Tractatus de Pauvreté de Jesus-Christ—Pratique de l'Office Inquisiteur: Le Mirroir des Saints—Une Chronique des Souverains Pontifices, etc. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bio. Générale, s. v.

Guigues, Joaquin de, a French Orientalist, father of Christien Louis Joseph (q. v.), was born at Pontoise, Oct. 19, 1721. He studied the Oriental languages under Foumont, whom he succeeded in 1745. When the French Revolution broke out, Guigues was deprived of his professorship and lived in great poverty. He died at Paris, March 25, 1794. He was a good linguist, and had the Chinese language a specialty, believed it to be the key to the Egyptian. See his Mémoire, dans Lequel on Prêvoit que les Chinois Sont une Colonie Egyptienne (Paris, 1769). His main work is Histoire Générale des Iles, des Turcs, des Mopols et des Autres Peuples Occidentaux (Paris, 1756-58, 4 vols.).

Gujon, André, a French prelate and orator, was born at Autun, in November, 1548. He became grand-vicar to cardinal de Joyeuse, and afterwards bishop of Autun. He made a voyage to Rome to receive his new dignity, and returned to France in 1586. He died in September, 1587, leaving Rémuneration à la Cour de Parlement de Normandie, etc. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bio. Générale, s. v.

Gujon, Jacques, a French prelate, a relative of the preceding, was born at Noyers in 1663. He entered the ministry, and, after success in teaching, died in 1735, leaving Apprêchement de Saint Paris, 1709) :—Eloge de Roux (1718):—Lamentations (1754):—and a very important MS. work entitled, Réflexions sur les Morus des Franpais. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bio. Générale, s. v.

Guldin, John C., D.D., a prominent minister of the German Reformed Church, was born in Berks County, Pa., in August, 1789. He was ordained in 1820, and settled as pastor over some congregations in Montana.
Guillaume, a French painter on glass, was born at Marseilles in 1475. He was a member of the order of Dominicans, and executed many excellent works in the south of France. In the cathedral at Arzazzio he painted several admirable works, among which were The Baptism of Christ, The Assumption of the Virgin, and the Monstrance of the Temple. He established a school for teaching the art of painting on glass. He died in 1537.

Guillaume, St John (1), a French regular canon, was born at St. Germain, near Crepy, about 1105. After being educated under the aegis of the abbots of St. Germain-des-Prés, he became canon of the collegiate church of St. Genevieve, but, on account of the laxity in discipline among the monks, accepted the provostship of Esparre. In the interval of regularity were established in the Church of St. Genevieve by the monk of St. Victor. Guillaume then returned there, and was elected sub-prior of the house in 1148. About the same time Absalon, bishop of Rosskild, in Denmark, wished to reform a monastery of regular canons on the isle of Eskild. Guillaume was sent there with three other canons, who abandoned him. After his arrival in Denmark, in 1171, he was made abbot of St. Thomas of the Paraclete. He re-established the discipline of that house, and lived under the greatest austerity until 1208. There are known of St. William, not less than a hundred letters, which were written in 1768, in the collection of Mazarin Scriptores. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Guillaume, Sted (2), a French prelate, was born in the borough of Artheil (Nivernais). He was descended from a noble family, educated by William the Hermit, archdeacon of Soissons, who was his uncle, and became first canon of the Church of Paris and of Soissons. He entered the order of Grammont, in the diocese of Limoges, and later went over to that of the Cistercians at the abbey of Pontigny. In 1181 he was made abbot of Fontaine, dean in the diocese of Sens, and afterwards of Chartres. There he was selected by Eudes of Sully, bishop of Paris in 1199, to occupy the episcopal see of Bourgoin. The epoch of his episcopate was marked particularly by the discussions with Philip Augustus, on the subject of the repudiation of Queen Elegiborga. The bishop, who took part of the question, was threatened with exile and confiscation, but without the royal indignation, and Philip, having decided to take back Elegiborga, was reconciled with the prelate. Guillaume died in 1209, as he was about to march out against the Albigensians, who had propagated their doctrine far as Berry. His body was deposed in the crypt of the basilica of St. Etienne of Bourgoin, and remained in that church until 1567, when the Huguenots, on their taking possession of the city, burned his remains. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Guillaume d'Albervey, a French abbot and theologian, lived in the 12th century. In 1165 and 1180 he was at the head of the abbey of Auberive, which was of the order of Cistercians, in the diocese of Langres. He composed various books, which have remained unedited, however; there are cited among them four letters on the last judgment and a treatise upon numbers, which reveals a profound knowledge of arithmetic. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Guillaume de Beaumont, a French prelate, was born in 1177, being a member of the illustrious family of Beaumont. After the decease of Guillaume de Cheviller, which took place in May, 1292, Guillaume de Beaumont united the suffrages of the people and of the clergy, and on Sept. 29, 1292, he was consecrated. In 1299 he put an end to disagreements between the monks of Ronceray and the friars of the Hospital of St. John. In 1228 he took an oath of allegiance to king Louis VIII. Finally, in 1266, he admitted the preaching friars into the city of Angers. He died in 1240. His works are very few, and of no importance; they are statutes which were published in 1680 by one of his successors, Henry Arnauld. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Guillaume de Blois (surnamed the cardinal of Champagne) was born in 1135. In his early childhood he was reconciled to his father, Bernard, who inspired him with the love of study and virtue. In 1164 Guillaume was elected bishop of Chartres, and in 1168 consecrated archbishop of Sens by the venerable Maurice, bishop of Paris. In the same year pope Alexander III, who was at that time in France, appointed him as his legate, on the occasion of a quarrel which had broken out between Thomas, archbishop of Canterbury, primate of England, and king Henry II. Owing to the prudence and zeal with which he transmitted his mission, he obtained the archepiscopal see of Rheims. Guillaume had the honor of crowning, at Rheims, his nephew, Philip Augustus, as associate with his father, Louis the Younger. He took advantage of the credit which he enjoyed with Louis the Younger to obtain from him the regulation which granted to the archbishops the perpetual privilege of having the sole power of consecrating the kings of France, a regulation afterwards confirmed by the bull of the pope. At the beginning of the reign of Philip Augustus, Guillaume fell into disgrace, and so turned his further attention towards the court of Rome, which shortly afterwards consented upon him the office of legate, and restored him to his dignity at the French court, and his call to the ministry of the state. Guillaume died at Leon about 1292. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Guillaume (Abbot) de St. Denis, was born at Gap, and lived in the 12th century. It seems that he had studied medicine before entering the monastic life. In 1178 he was placed at the head of the celebrated abbey from which he derives his name, and governed it with zeal and wisdom. But he displeased king Philip Augustus, and resigned in 1186. He was a man well instructed for his time, translating from the Latin the Logogy of St. Denis the Arcepagus, composed by Michael Synkelius, patriarch of Jerusalem, and a Life of the Philosopher Secundus. His writings remain in MS. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Guillaume de Deseret (Lat. Guillelmus or Willermo). See WILLIAM OF ACHAEMNE.

Guillaume (Saint) de Malavà, founder of the Guillenites, is supposed to have been a French nobleman who had chosen a soldier's life, and lived in dissipation. Being anxious to do penance, he went to Rome, where pope Eugenius III, in 1145, ordered him to make a pilgrimage to Rome. After his return to Tuscany, in 1153, he settled in a lonely chappel on the Sienna territory, in the diocese of Grosseto, where he spent his life in work and prayer. He died Feb. 10, 1157. Some time later some of his followers erected a hermitage with a chapel on the tomb of Guillaume, and from that time it became the shrines of the order of the Guillemites, who multiplied in Germany, Flanders, and France. See Hoefer, Not. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Guillaume de Mandaut, a French prelate and canon, was born of an illustrious family of Lodève. He was successively archdeacon of Nimes, provost of the Church of Toulouse, archbishop of Embrun about 1295, and was made cardinal and bishop of Palestine in 1312 by Clement V. In 1296 he was charged by Boniface VIII with grave matters. On the death of the Decebalus, together with Bérenger de Fréol and Richard of Silmas, to whom was added, some time later, Dinus, a professor of the Roman law at Bologna. Guillaume composed, about 1300, the Summa Libelli Eclesiastum, a very peculiar work, which contains some interesting details on the Church of Toulouse. Some time afterwards it was revised by John André, and dedicated to Bérenger (Cologne, 1573). Guillaume died at Avignon in November, 1321. See Hoefer, Not. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Guillaume (Abbot) de Marmoutiers, born in the latter part of the 11th century, and was a native of Britanny. Before he had taken the cowl he was an archdeacon of Nantes. After the death of Hilpoge, the monks of Marmoutiers selected him as their abbot, in 1104. Between these monks and the archbishop of Tours there existed at that time a grave dispute. Raoul, who occupied the see, was a metropolitan see, required that newly elected abbots should, in the ceremony of consecration, offer to him the oath of fidelity. The monks refused to render that homage, declaring it to be humiliating. Guillaume having accordingly refused, Raoul brought a complaint before the pope. During the debate, which agitated the whole province of Tours, Guillaume himself went to Rome, and there was consecrated. In 1105 he returned to his abbey. In 1106 he sat at the Council of Poitiers, and vigorously attacked a certain lord Marmou- taud, who had taken possession of the Church of Chalais. At the same time he was bishop of Aleth, the Church of St. Malo of Dinan. In 1109 he pleaded before the Council of Laon against the monks of Chemillé. He was one of the most famous of the abbots of Marmoutiers, and increased its wealth considerably. He died May 29, 1124. See Hoefer, Not. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Guillaume de Passavant, a French prelate, was born in Saintouge, in the beginning of the 12th century. When Rainaud of Martigné, his cousin, was nominated archbishop of Rheims, Guillaume succeeded him in that church, and executed there the functions of an archbishop until June 23, 1151. After that he was called to the episcopal see of Masa, where his name is found among the documents of the year 1145. He was proud and able to defend the privileges of the Church. Being asked by the monks of Marmoutiers to intervene in their favor against Guy de Laval, who had taken possession of one of their priories, he immediately excommunicated that powerful leader. In 1151 a vassal church (of Brilhan) had refused to give homage to its superior, the Church of La Couture, and Guillaume entered the rebel church to be demolished, for which he was excommunicated and banished from Rome in order to justify his conduct. St. Bernard wrote in his favor to Hughes, bishop of Ostia, and to pope Eugenius III. Guillaume died at Yvré, in the province of Maine, Jan. 26, 1187. See Hoefer, Not. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Guillaume (Saint) PICHON, a French prelate, was born in 1184, in the parish of St. Alban, of poor agriculturist parents. He was admitted in the community of the clerks of the Church of St. Brieuc, he soon distinguished himself among his colleagues, early obtained a canonicate, and in 1220 was appointed bishop of St. Brieuc. The bishops of Britanny at that time were engaged in a lawsuit with Peter Manclere. Guillaume being summoned to obey this formidable leader, responded by a sentence of excommunication. The reply of Peter Manclere was the exile of the prelate, and the imprisonment of the priests who were known as his most devoted partisans. But the court of Rome took up the defense of Guillaume, and made his exile of short duration. He had left his diocese in 1226, and returned to it again in 1231. He died in 1284. See Hoefer, Not. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Guillaume le Wallon, an abbot of St. Arnoul of Mez. It is believed that he received instruction at the school of Liége. On the death of his studies he retired to a cloister. His teacher wrote him a letter, engaging him to leave his retreat and to enter the ranks of the secular clergy, but Guillaume continued in his chosen vocation. In 1505 he succeeded Warin at St. Arnoul as abbot. In 1573 he was elected abbot of St. Remi at Rheims. Since the year 1071 that monastery had remained without a chief, and stood exposed to the ravages of archbishop Manassé. Guillaume had some warm disputes with the latter, and wished to resign. He wrote to the pope, and, not receiving any answer, set out for Rome. The pope received him kindly, and on his return archbishop Manassé relieved him. Guillaume retired to Mez, and although devoted to bishop Herman, he was so weak as to allow himself to be consecrated in his place, when the emperor Henry IV had expelled the latter from his see in 1686. The following year Guillaume attempted to meet the bishop in the presence of the chief members of the Church renounced the episcopate, and retired to the abbey of Gorze. He was intrusted with the care of the children educated there, and after some time bishop Herman gave him the abbey of St. Arnoul. He died about 1689. There are extant of Guillaume le Wallon a collection of seven letters to divers persons, one to Gregory VII, and two to archbishop Manassé, in which he reproaches him severely on account of his many vices. To him also is ascribed a fine prayer in honor of St. Augustine. See Hoefer, Not. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Guilin, Elieth, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was first employed as a teacher in Carrolton, La., about the year 1838. The next year he was rector of St. James's Church, Baton Rouge; in 1860 he removed to New Orleans, where, during the war, he served as chaplain in the United States army; in 1867 was made rector of the Church of St. John, in Brownsville, Texas, where he also served as chaplain in the army; in 1871 was at Fort Sill, in the Indian Territory, as United States chaplain; in 1874 was appointed to the same position at Fort Gibson; in 1877 removed to Texas, and served as chaplain with the Confederate forces in the year 1878 to Almonte Mines, Cal. He died in New Orleans, Jan. 17, 1878. See Prosp. Eccl. Amérique, 1880, p. 171.

John M., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, a graduate of the General Theological Seminary, was employed as rector of the Church in Bethesda, Conn., in 1856; the following year became assistant minister of a church in Baltimore, Md.; and shortly after was chosen rector of Trinity Church, Seneca Falls, N. Y., where he served six years. In 1865 he was elected rector of the Church of St. Germain-en-Laye. The Germans and Swiss had burned down (1867) his abbey of St. Ursin, in Champagne, in revenge for which the cardinal burned the castle of Bréme, near château Thierry, belonging to the duke of Oultillon. Cardinal Guizot, the apostatized, Dec. 24, 1858, See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Guizot, Louis (3), cardinal of Lorraine, archbishop of Rheims, and peer of France, was born, according to some, Jan. 22, 1573, according to others in May, 1585. He obtained the abbey of St. Denis and of Montier-en-Der, and also that of Chalils. He was never ordained, preferring monastic life, and exhibited that tendency in his later years, when he proposed to settle theological disputes by arms. In 1621 he followed the king on his expedition to Poitou, but fell sick at the siege of St. Jean d'Angely, and died shortly after (June 21, 1621). Charlotte des Essarts, countess of Romorantin, and one of the mistresses of Henry IV, is said to have been secretly married to the cardinal (Feb. 4, 1611), bearing to him three sons and two daughters. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Guizot, William, a learned English divine, was born at Allendale or Abbey-lead's Court, near Gloucester, in 1655, and was educated at Oriel College, where he was made fellow in 1674. He was ordained priest in 1677, and died Sept. 8, 1684. He translated into English, and illustrated with a commentary, Dr. Bernard's Minoris Ordinis Prima Tertia Tertia Septem (1690), and a tract, De Viatoris Humanae. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Guizot, François Pierre Guillaume, a noted French religious author, was born at Nimes, Oct. 4, 1787, being the descendant of a family of Huguenot pastors. He was educated at Geneva, and studied law at Paris. During the literary period of his life (1812-30), he was successively professor of history at the Sorbonne, secretary-general of the interior, journalist, etc. To this period belong his Du Gouvernement Républicain et de l'Etat Actuel de la France (1816)—Des Conspirations et de la Justice Politique (1821)—Des Moyens de Gouverner l'Empire (1826) (e. c.)—Les Fêtes de Mort en Matière Politique (1822) — Essai sur l'Histoire de la France (1823)—L'Histoire de la Résolution d'Angleterre (1827, 1828, 2 vols.)—L'Histoire de la Civilisation depuis l'Establishissement du Christianisme (1829). With the year 1830 Guizot's political career commenced, and it was mainly due to his efforts as minister of public instruction that a reform of the educational system of France took place. In the year 1816 Guizot published his Essai sur l'Histoire et sur l'Etat Actuel de l'Instruction Publique, in which he insisted that the state had the right of managing and controlling the public instruction. This idea he now developed, and introduced many improvements, especially in the primary and higher schools. In ecclesiastical respects, Guizot was the main support of orthodoxy in the Reformed Church of France. In 1828 he was chosen president of theconsistory, and was opposed to liberalism of any kind in religious matters. He was orthodox, and clung to the Creed of his Church. In 1827 he was obliged, on account of feeble health, to retire from the presidency of the synod. He died at Rome, Nov. 12, 1830. Of his works, we mention, L'Église et la Société Chrétienne (1861) — Méditations sur l'Essence de la Religion Chrétienne (1864; Eng. translation, N. Y. 1866) — Méditations sur la Religion Chrétienne dans ses Rapports avec l'État Actuel des Sociétés (1865-69, 3 vols.)—Les Vies de Quatre Grands
GUJERATI VERSION

Christiens Francois (1868; Engl. translation, Lond. 1869): —Memoires pour Servir à l'Histoire de mon Temps (1858-68, 9 vols.). He was one of the founders of the Société Bibliique in 1826, of the Société pour l'Encouragement de l'Instruction Publique in 1833, and of the Société Historique du Protestantisme Français in 1857. When, in 1861, Guizot had to make a reply to the address of the new academician, Père Laicardière, he defended and justified the papacy and the worldly power of the pope, whereas the Dominican praised Protestant America. This address of Guizot made a great stir. The Catholic papers, especially the Univers, rejoiced, and hoped soon to see Guizot return to the Church of Rome. But in spite of this Guizot remained in his Church, and from his words in his testament, "I die in the bosom of the enlightened Roman Catholic Church, which I created which I was born, and to have been born in which I rejoice," which have been quoted in full, we see that Guizot made all allowance to the Church of Rome, without becoming one of her members. 3. THE VERSION OF THE SCRIPTURES. The Gujerati takes its name from Gujerat, a district of the Punjab in India, and the principal province in which it is spoken, and is said by the Serampore missionaries to be the vernacular of a territory equal in point of extent to England. On account of its wide diffusion it has been appropriately designated "the grand mercantile language of foreign Indian marts." The Serampore missionaries were the first to undertake a Gujerati version of the Scriptures. In 1807 they commenced printing the gospel of Matthew, but little progress was made. In 1817 the press was resumed, and in 1820 the New Test, in Gujerati characters instead of the Sanscrit, was completed. The prosecution of this version was, however, resigned about this period by the Serampore missionaries to the agents of the London Missionary Society stationed at Surat. The Rev. Messrs. Skinner and Fyvie, of the London Missionary Society, published their version of the New Test. in 1821, at Surat. Shortly after the publication of the New Test. Mr. Skinner died, and the translation of the Old Test. was now carried on by Mr. Fyvie, and in 1826 a complete translation at press. In 1827 two editions, in a revised state, rapidly followed as the demand increased. Another version of the New Test. was made by the Rev. Messrs. Clarkson and Flower, and an edition of two thousand copies was issued from the press. This was subsequently revised and published as an edition of the New Test. according to the old translation of the Surat edition, subject to such slight changes as might be deemed necessary. This edition was completed at the Bombay press in 1833. Meanwhile, preparations for a revised edition of the entire Gujerati Scriptures were in active progress under the care of the Bombay Auxiliary Society, and an edition of the New Test., according to this improved version, was completed at the mission-press in Surat in 1856. The Old Test. was completed in 1861. Besides these two editions, the Serampore New Test. and the Surat version, in 1860 a new edition of the Gujerati New Test., for the special use of the Parsees, was announced. It was carried through the press in Bombay, in Parsee characters, by the Rev. Dunjeshbyh Nowrojee, and published in 1862. In this edition the religious terms are those generally used in religious and other literature. Of the latter edition up to March 1884, two thousand two hundred and forty-nine portions of Scripture were disposed of. See Bible of Every Land, p. 123. Günner, Johann Ernest, a Norwegian prelate and naturalist, was born in Christiansa, Feb. 26, 1718. He began his studies under the direction of his father, who was a physician, and then went to Copenhagen to continue them. In 1742 the king gave him means to go to Halle, and afterwards to Jena, where he studied philosophy, and became a member of the faculty. On his return to Copenhagen in 1758 he was made extraordinary professor of theology in the university. In 1758 the bishopric of Dronten was created, and he was consecrated bishop upon him. He died at Christiansand, Sept. 28, 1773, leaving, Hydrebv (Dronten, 1758) — Krigsforhandlninger (Copenhagen, 1768); — A Refutation of the Norsk Videnkjemmandeverkets Skriften (writings of the Academy of Science of Norway), etc. See Hecker, Norns. Günther, Johann, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born April 17, 1660. He studied at Breslau and Leipzig, was preacher and licentiate of theology at the latter place, and died Jan. 20, 1714. His writings are for the most part directed against the Roman Catholic Church. See Ranft, Leben der chorherrischen Gottselehren; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Günther, Wolfgang, a Lutheran theologian, was born in Saxony in 1856. He studied at Wittenberg, was preacher in 1611 in the vicinity of Annaberg, in 1615 pastor and superintendent at Friedland, in 1620 at Spandau, and died Jan. 16, 1656. He wrote, Accursius Trium Librorgum Ecclesiae Nostra Symbolicorum (Wittenberg, 1614) — Apologiae Thesauri super Aug. Confessionem (1615) — Disputatio Epistola S. Pauli ad Romam (1625). See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Guthrie, Karl von, a Roman Catholic theologian of Milawan was born in 1740. In 1779 he was professor of Church history at Innsbruck, but a step which he regretted, because both the monastic life and the religious views of the monks were not in harmony with his intellectual powers. More pleasant was his position as librarian to prince Esterhazy, at Vienna,

Günnaburg, Aaron, a Jewish rabbi, was born at Prague in 1736. He received his rabbinical education at his native place, and was appointed rabbi of the congregation of Liebhachowitz, in Bohemia. In 1846 he published, Dogmatisch-historische Böckcrung des alten Judenhauten (Prague), in which he boldly demanded the emancipation of the Jews, and grunted his demands on the words and promises of former Austrian emperors. In consequence of this publication he was obliged to leave his country, and came to America. He was elected rabbi at Baltimore, then at Rochester, N. Y., and last in Boston, where he died, July 19, 1873. (See Furst, Bibl. Jud., 1874.) (B. P.)

Gurley, Leonard El D.D., a Methodist Episcopal missionary, was born at Norwich, Conn., March 13, 1804. He moved to Ohio in youth, was converted, received into the Ohio Conference in 1828, was there three years on circuits, thirteen on districts, two in agency of Ohio Wesleyan University, twenty-eight in stations, and six in retirement. He was elected to the general conferences of 1845, 1856, and 1864, and died at Delaware, O., March 26, 1880. Dr. Gurley was genial, generous, and sympathetic. He was a strong advocate of temperance, wrote and spoke for the abolition of slavery, and gave $8000 to Ohio Wesleyan University and $10,000 to the Board of Church Extension. He published poems exhibit high talent. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1880, p. 314.

Gurlitt, Johann Gottfried, a Lutheran theologian and philologist, was born at Leipzig, March 18, 1754. In 1802 he accepted a call to Hamburg as director of the Johanneum, and professor of Oriental languages at A. F. 1540, and was there until June 14, 1827. Gurlitt was the teacher of the famous Church historian Neander. He wrote, Eunaturo Brevis Hymni 43 Dasidat (Hamburg, 1773) — Kurze Geschichte des Tempelherrenrechts (1824). "He was an indefatigable worker, and a solid preacher. His sermons were always well prepared. He pleaded with his hearers like a man who expected to meet them at the bar of God. Indeed, he often reminded them of the day of judgment. He took a deep interest in all the benevolent operations of the Church, and was for a time connected with the publication of its periodicals. His ministry was characterized by great earnestness and success."—See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Ref. Church, in N. Y. H.

Guthrie, Henry, bishop of Dun- keld about 1064, died in 1076. He published Memorien temp. Charles I (Lond. 1702). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Guthrie, John (1), a Scotch prelate, was promoted to the see of Moray from Edinburgh, in 1623, where he continued until he was deprived with the other prelates by the Glasgow Assembly in 1638. He then lived at Spynie castle till 1640, when he was forced to surrender it to Colonel Monroe, after which he retired to his own private castle of Guthrie, in the county of Angus. He died not long afterwards. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 122.

Guthrie, John (2), D.D., an English Congregational minister, was born at Milton, Kincardineshire, Jan. 30, 1814. He was kept in the Church from infancy through the care of pious parents; entered Edin- burgh University at the age of seventeen, where he took the degree of M.A., distinguishing himself in class works—graduated in 1839, and ordained pastor of the Secession Church at Kendrick. Shortly afterwards he was excommunicated from that church for maintaining the universality of Christ's atonement. He then, with others, formed the Evangelical Union, became the professor in the Theological Hall of the new body, and held the office from 1846 to 1861. From 1848 to 1851 he held the pastorate in Glasgow, whence he removed to Greenock, where he labored successfully for eleven years. Thence he went to Tolmers Square, London, but returned to Glasgow, where he assumed the pastorate of a new church, and filled the chair of apologists in the Theological Hall of the Evangelical Union. He died in London, Sept. 8, 1878. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1879, p. 316.

Guthrie, Thomas, D.D., an eminent Scotch pul- pit orator, philanthropist, and social reformer, was born July 12, 1803, at Brechin, Forfarshire, where his father was a country clergyman. He went through the cur- riculum of study prescribed by the Church of Scotland for candidates for the ministry, at the University of Edin- burgh, and devoted two additional winters to the study of chemistry, natural history, and anatomy. Meanwhile he was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Brechin in 1825; subsequently spent six months in Paris, study- ing the physical sciences. In 1830 he became pastor of the Church at Arbirlot, in his native county, and in 1837 was appointed one of the ministers of Old Grey- friars parish, in Edinburgh. Here his eloquence, com- bined with devoted labors to reclaim the degraded popu- lation of one of the worst districts of the city, soon won for him a high place in public estimation. In 1843 he joined the Free Church, and for a long series of years continued to minister to a large and influential congregation in Edinburgh. In 1846 and 1846 he per- formed a great service for the Free Church by his advocacy throughout the country of its scheme for prov- iding manses or residences for its ministers. His zeal was not diverted in mere denominational or sectarian channels. He came forward in 1847 as the advocate of the week-schools, and to him was due the rapid extension of the system over the kingdom is very much to be ascribed. He also earnestly exerted himself in many ways in op- position to intemperance and other vices. He possessed great rhetorical talent, and his style was remarkable for the abundance and variety of the illustrations he used. Few public speakers have ever blended solemnity and deep pathos so intimately with the humorous, his ten- dency to which has more frequently than anything else been pointed out as his fault. Dr. Guthrie always displayed a generous sympathy with all that tended to the upbuilding of the Church. He was a long-continued re- mainer of the General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland in May, 1862, and died near Edinburgh, Feb. 23, 1873. His most important published works are, The Gospel in Ezekiel, a series of discourses.—The Way of Life, a volume of sermons.—A Plea for Drunkards and Drunken Drunkenness:—A Plea for Villas, followed by a second and a third plea, the latter under the title, S Jed- time and Harvest of Rugged Schools:—The City, its Sins and Sorrows:— A Sufficiency Maintained and an Efficient Ministry (Edinburgh, 1852, 8vo). He was the editor of the new edition of Berriedale's Christian World Unmasked (ibid. 1856, 8vo). For some years before his death he acted as editor of The Sunday Magazine, founded in 1864, in which year he retired from his reg- ular ministrations. His Autobiography and Memoir was published by his sons (1875), and his Works (1873-75, 11 vols.). See also Popular Preachers, p. 88; Smith, Our Scottish Clergy (Edinb. 1840), p. 842; (Lond.) Guy, Thomas, an English philanthropist, founder of Guy's Hospital, was born at Southwark in 1644. Af- ter serving an apprenticeship of eight years, he began business as a bookseller, but in 1662 he became ordained pastor of the Church of England in the city of London. He published Bibles, which he at first imported from Holland, but afterwards printed for himself. He became master of an immense fortune, and died unmarried, Dec. 17, 1724. In 1707 he built three wards of St. Thomas' Hospital, and aided it in other ways. He built Guy's Hospital in 1691 at a cost of £6,000, and left an endowment of £219,499. He also made other gifts and bequests for hospitals and almshouses. See A True Copy of the Last Will and Testament of Thomas Guy, Esq. Gyöngyösi (de Pelsy), Paulus, a Hungarian Reformed theologian, was born in 1668. He studied in England and at Frankfort, and took the degree of doctor of divinity at the latter place in 1700. On returning to his country, he was pastor of the Reformed congregation at Kaschau, but he had to leave that place in 1724, and went to Frankfort-on-the-Oder, where he was appointed professor of theology. He died there in 1748, leaving De Fato Sancta Novi Testamenti Estate (Franeker, 1700)—Digp. Deum in humanitas am- erius Christi et Christianorum (ibid. 1700)—Ahydrate Pauca, pro Voce Vinicius Erestam; Ars Bibliothecavarsitatem (Basle, 1722), written against the bishop of Agram and the Jesuit Tsunon, who wrote against the Protestants; the publication of this work was the cause of his leaving the country—De Recurrentia Temporum Nori Test. Haak, Theodor, an English divine and natural philosopher, was born in 1603 at Neubrunn, near Weinsberg, in Germany, and was educated partly in his native country, and finally at Oxford and Cambridge. He then visited some of the Continental universities, and returned to Oxford in 1629, but without taking a degree was or- dialined in 1639, and sent as a descen to bishop Hall of Exeter. He gave himself up to literary pursuits, and was devoted to the interests of parliament during the rebellion. He died in London, May 9, 1690. He published the Dutch Antiques on the Bible (1657, 2 vols. fol.); was employed by the Westminster Assembly, and translated into Dutch the several theological works that were to have been the first to propose the Royal Society. Some of his letters appeared in the Philosophical Collections (May, 1692).

Haar, in Norse mythology, was a dwarf, made of and living in stones.

Haar, Carl, a German convert to the Church of Rome, was born Oct. 18, 1804. He studied theology at Tübingen, and became a Protestant minister. In 1843 he was dismissed from the ministry, having the year before published Die Glaubenszeugnisse des Protestantismus und Katholicismus. He joined the Church of Rome at Hamburg, in 1844, and published on that occasion, in his name, fremde Verleumdungen seines lieben Gemeinde- lehren, etc., Protestantismus und Katholizismus. He now set himself to write in the interest of the Church of Rome, and published Josephs und Konrads Freundschaften (Augs- burg, 1845)—Populäre Kirchengeschichte, mit besonderer Berücksichtigung der Reformationsgeschichte (2d ed. 1846) Beleuchtung grosser Vorurtheile gegen die Katholische Kirche (1857); Geschichte der Päpste (1860)—Die zwei Hauptfeinde des Christenthums (1866) Mater und Gnade (1867). After the Vatican council, Haa denounced again the Church of Rome, without returning to the Evangelical Church, and to justify him

Haas, Carl Franz Luftert, a Reformed theologian of Germany, was born Aug. 12, 1772, at Cassel. He studied at Marburg and Konigsberg. He seems to have a fairly extensive field of activity there in 1748, was professor in 1754, and died Oct. 29, 1789. He wrote, Das Historica de Merita Philippus Maganumini in Reformationem (Marburg, 1742) Die Euchhismus und Variis Euseis Sectis (ibid. 1746)—Ver- nach einer heutigen Kirchengeschichte (ibid. 1782). Habadin (or rather Chabatur), a subdivision of the Jewish sect of Chasidim, founded by Rabbi Solomon, in the government of Mohilef, in the 18th century. The name is composed of the initial letters of the three Hebrew words, ג"ע, נ"כ, מ"ב, "wisdom, intelligence, and knowledge." They may not improperly be termed the "Jewish Quietists," as their peculiarities consist in the rejection of external forms and the complete abandonment of the mind to abstraction and contemplation. Instead of the baptisms customary among the Jews, they go through the signs without the use of the element, and consider it their duty to disengage themselves as much as possible from matter, because of its tendency to control the mind in its ascent to the spiritual source of intelligence. In prayer they make no use of words, but simply place themselves in the attitude of supplication, and exercise themselves in mental ejacu- nations.

Habadalah (Hebr. א-ך-ל, distinction), a ceremony by which the Jew of the East is either consubstantiated with or separated from the other days of the week. It is performed after the concluding service in the synagogue, by reciting pa- pasages of Scripture and prayers, and the use of wine and spices. On Sabbath evening four benedictions are said, one over the wine, a second over the spice, the third over the light, "Blessed art thou Lord our God, king of the world, who hast created a shining light," and the last is, "Blessed art thou, Lord God our King, of the universe, who hast made a distinction (ἔσχαρος) between the holy and the common, between light and darkness, between Israel and the heathen nations, between the seventh day and the other six days of work; blessed be thou, O God, who hast made a distinction between the holy and the common." If for any reason a Jew is prevented from performing this ceremony, either at home or abroad, he is at liberty to substitute the following short benediction: "Blessed art thou, Lord God who hast made a distinction between things sacred and profane." See Buxtorf, Lex. Chald. Tulk. s. v. (B. P.)

Habert, Louis, a French theologian and doctor of the church, was born at Bais, in 1588, and died at Paris, April 17, 1718. He is the author of, Præstus ex Sacramentum of Penance (Paris, 1714, 1729), better known as the Præstus de Verduin. He also wrote Theologia Dogmática et Moralia de Usum Seminarii Catalanae (Lyons, 1679-12, 7 vols.), which was attacked and condemned by Freidouin. Being opposed to the bull Unigenitus, Habert was exiled in 1714, and only returned to Paris after the death of Louis XIV. Hachilah. Hill of. Lieut. Conder suggests for this spot (Quar. Statement of the "Palest. Explor. Fund," January, 1857, p. 47) "the high hill bounded by deep valleys north and south on which the ruin of Yehud is said to stand," and Tristram (Jude, A. R. Land, p. 60) coincides in this identification; but if this be the site of the ancient city Caín (q. v.), it can hardly be also that of Hachilah; and, in fact, the latter is not a proper name at all, as it invariably has the article (הַחֲכָלָה, as being a mere appendage of Ziph). Later, Lieut. Conder proposes another site (Tend Work, ii, 21): "This [hill] is known to the natives as El-Kelah, running out of the Ziph plateau towards the Dead Sea desert or Jeshimon, a district which, properly speaking, terminates about this line, melting into the Beersheba plain. On the north side of the hill are the Dreamers' ponds, the actual source of David's descent on Saul's pursuing guards." As to the "wood (choreas) of Ziph," he remarks (p. 89): "A moment's reflection will convince any traveller that as the dry, porous formation of the plateau must be unchanged since David's time, no wood of trees could then have flourished over this unwatered and sun-baked region. The true explanation seems to be that the word choras is a proper name with a different signification, and such is the view of the Greek version and of Josephus. We were able considerably to strengthen this theory by the discovery of the ruin of Khora in the valley of Hires (the same word under another form), close to Ziph, the first of which may well be thought to represent the Hebrew Choreas-Ziph. But the latter term likewise is a mere denominate, for it takes the article (.splitext, 1 Sam. xxii, 15, 18), and is elsewhere used plainly with reference to trees (Isa. xvii, 9; Ezek. xxxii, 9).

Hacke, Nicholas P., D.D., a German Reformed minister, was born in Baltimore, Md., Sept. 29, 1800. At the age of six years he was sent to a relative in Bremen, Germany, to acquire a thorough knowledge of the German language. He returned to America in 1816, and studied theology privately until 1819, when he accepted an invitation to preach to some congregations in Westmoreland County, Pa., returning to his studies the same year. He was licensed and ordained in 1819, and became pastor of the Greensburg charge, which he served fifty-eight years, and died there, Aug. 23, 1887. He was the greatest part of his life dedicated to the work of the church, and was named preacher exclusively in the German language. He was a student all his life, and used the English language with ease and grace. He was fully consecrated to his work, remarkable for his social powers, caring not for worldly honors, a model Christian gentleman, and faithful member of the gentry. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church, v, 800.

Hacker, Joachim Bernhard Nikolaus, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born Nov. 11, 1790, at Dresden. He studied at Wittenberg, and died at Zschepin, Saxony, Oct. 4, 1817, leaving some ascetical works, for which see Döring, Deutsche Konzilredner; Winer, Handbuch der theolog. Lit. ii, 386, 386. (B. P.)

Hacker, Johann Georg Augustus, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Dresden, Jan. 24, 1752. He studied at Wittenberg, was in 1784 preacher at Torgau, in 1789 pension-preacher at Dresden, in 1790 court preacher at Dresden, and died Feb. 21, 1819, leaving Diaries, Inauguralis de Descensu Christi ad Inferos (Wittenberg, 1802), and several volumes of sermons. See Döring, Deutsche Konzilredner; Winer, Handbuch der theolog. Lit. i, 486; ii, 92, 127, 161, 172, 173, 183, 386, 389. (B. P.)

Hackett, Horatio Balch, D.D., LL.D., an eminent Baptist scholar, was born at Salisbury, Mass., Dec. 27, 1808. In 1823 he entered Phillips Academy, Andover, and in 1827 Amherst College; became a hopeful Christian in 1828, and was valedictorian in 1830. He graduated from the theological seminary at Andover in 1834, spending one year meanwhile as tutor in Amherst College. The next year he occupied a position as teacher of classics in Mount Hope College, Baltimore, and became a member of the First Baptist Church in that city. He was adjunct professor of Latin and Greek in Brown University, 1833-39. In 1839 he was elected professor of Biblical Literature and Interpretation in Newton Theological Institution, and the same year was ordained to the Christian ministry. Two years of earnest devotion to the cultivation of the classes which came under his instruction were followed by a year spent in independent travel in long residence in Halle, Germany, attending the lectures of Tholuck, Geuenius, Rödiger, and other eminent scholars, and four months in Berlin, enjoying the instructions, especially, of Neander and Hengstenberg. After his return to America, in 1842, he presided over an amended edition of Plutschau's Kritik der Delen in the Protestantische des Wicked, devoting also much time to the study of French, Chaldæan, and Syriac, modern Greek, and Sanscrit. Two years afterwards he published a translation of Winer's Grammar of the Chaldee Language. The first number of the second volume of the Bibliotheca Sacra, January, 1845, contains his critique on the Life of Jesus, by Strauss. In the number of the same quarter for January, 1846, is an able article on the Sympathical Study of the Gospels, and Recent Literature Pertaining to it. The next year (1847) appeared his Exercises in Hebrew Grammar, and Selections from the Greek Testament to be Translated into Hebrew, etc. The result of some of his studies in connection with the preparation of this volume may be found in the January (1847) number of the Bibliotheca Sacra, in the form of two articles from his pen, The Structure of the Hebrew Sentence, and The Greek Version of the Pentateuch, by Thiersch. Then came his great work, the Commentary on Acts, the first edition of which appeared in 1852. He then made a second visit to Europe, his journey being extended to Palestine, and on his return spending several weeks in Germany. In 1855 he published his Illustrations of Scripture; Suggested by a Tour through the Holy Land. Soon after, he set out upon his third foreign tour, spending six months in Athens, for the purpose of devoting himself to the study of modern Greek, and thence making excursions in different directions on the slopes of the Peloponnesus. In 1860 the Bible Society published his Notes on the Greek Text of the Epistle of Paul to Philonem, as the basis of a revision of the common English version; and a Revised Version, with Notes. In 1864 appeared his Christian Memorials of the War. During the same year he wrote thirty articles for the original edition of Dr. William Smith's Dictionary. In 1861 he wrote an introduction to the American edition of Westcott's Study of the Gospels; in the winter of 1862 he began to edit an American edition of Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, aided by Dr. Ezra Abbot. He was also employed by Dr. Schaff to translate H. Boer- teman's Commentary on Philonem, for his edition of Lange's Commentaries, and Braun's Commentary on Philonemus, for the same series. He published in 1867, a second revised edition of Plutarchus de Seru Numistii Veri Dico, with notes prepared by himself and professor W. S. Tyler, of Amherst College. Professor Hackett's connection with the Newton Theological Institution closed with its anniversary, June 24, 1868. Two years were next spent in laborious study in his favorite department, translating and revising the books of Ruth and Esther for the Bible Union, and preparing the second, larger, more careful edition of Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, and upon translations which he engaged to make for Dr. Schaff; also, in 1870, spending several months, once more, in the Old World. Having been appointed to the chair of Biblical Literature and New Testament Exegesis, in the Rochester Theological Seminary, he entered upon the duties of his office in the fall of 1870. The same zeal and enthusiasm which characterized his instructions at Newton marked his teachings at Rochester. Five years of work were followed by another of those vacations in which he took so much delight, a vacation passed amid the scenes of the Old World. He returned, apparently greatly refreshed and strengthened, to enter anew upon his work, when the summons suddenly came, telling him that his work was done. He died almost instantly, Nov. 2, 1875, at his own home in Rochester, N. Y. His Memorial of H. B. Hackett, edited by C. H. Whitmore (Rochester, 1876). (J. C. S.)

Hackett, Thomas, D.D., an Irish prelate, was bishop of Down and Connor in 1672. He was deprived for simony in 1694. He published some Sermons (1672). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Hackett. See HARKUT. Haddariel. In the Talmud, is an angel of the heavens of fixed stars, and commander of fire; therefore more than twelve thousand flashes of lightning come from his mouth at every word he utters. He would not allow Moses to wander through the air, when the latter came, at the command of God, to receive the law. God chid him, therefore he offered his services, to go before Moses, and announce his words. Haddas, Jreuda, a learned Karaite Jew, was born towards the end of the 11th century, at Jerusalem, and died between 1150 and 1160. He is the author of a great work, bearing upon the literature of the Karaite Jews, entitled, א"ש מאר בק, also פוקיו פוקיו, first published at Koslov, 1836. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud., 1,538; Geschichte der Karaiten, ii, 211 sq.; Dr. Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Ger. transl.), p. 129. (B. P.)

Hadelin (Lat. Hadalianus), Sabat, priest and confessor, who died in 590, was one of the disciples of St. Remacle, and when that saint resigned his bishopric of Fougères, that he might retire into the peaceable monastery of Stanialawol, lately founded by St. Sigebert, king of Austrasia, he took with him the pious Hadelin. Remacle sent Hadelin into Distans, on the Meuse, in 669, and finding a quiet retreat at Celmis on the Loess, he dwelt there in a cave, and built a little chapel, on the site of which afterwards rose a collegiate church. St. Hadelin is the patron of five churches in the diocese of Liege and Namur. His hermitage still exists, and has never been without a pious successor. The body of the saint was buried there, but was translated to Vise, in the diocese of Liege, in 1338. He is mentioned in the martyrologies of Ado, Wyon, Menardus, those of Liege, Cologne, etc. There are two ancient lives, one by Notker, bishop of Liege (971-1007). See Barin-Goud, Lives of the Saints (sub. Feb. 2, his day), l, 49.

Hadeloga (or Hadologa), Saint, commemorated Feb. 2, is said to have been the first abbot of the nunnery of Kissingen, and a daughter of Charles Martel, in the 8th century.

Hadiq. The modern site, Hadikek, is laid down on the Ordnance Map as three miles east of Ludd, and is described in the accompanying Memoirs (ii, 257; comp. p. 322) as "a moderate-sized village on a terraced tell at the mouth of a valley at the foot of the hills, with a well to the east. There are remains of a considerable town round it; tombs and quarries exist; and the mound on which the village stands is covered with pottery."

Hadhath, a name given by Mohammedans to the sayings of Mohammed, which were handed down by oral tradition from one generation to another. There are said to be six authors of these traditions, among whom are Ayesha, the wife of the prophet; Abu- Fureira, his intimate friend; and Ibn-Abbas, his cousin-german. The collection of these traditions made by Khurasmi numbers 5316 sayings, all of which the devout Mohammedan ought to commit to memory, or, where that cannot be done, to transcribe them.

Hädahi-Khalfa (originally Mustafa ben-Abdallah, also known by the name of Kothel-Thotheli), a most celebrated Turkish historian, geographer, and biographer, was born at Constantinople about 1605. He was for some time secretary to the sultan, Murad IV, and died in 1668. His main production is a great biographical lexicon, Kehf al-fannah, written in Arabic, in which he gives the titles of more than 18,000 Arabic, Persian, and Turkish works, with short biographies of the authors. It is of the greatest value, since it enumerates a great many others which seem to have been lost. He also published a large work for his Encyklopädische Übersicht der Wissenschaften des Orients (Leipzig, 1806). A complete edition of Hädahi's text, with a Latin translation, was published by Flügel, Lexicon Bibliographicum et Encyclopaedicum (Lond. 1806-50, 7 vols.). Hädahi also published chronological tables, Ta'rikheh-al-tawarikh (translated into Latin by Reiske, Leipsic, 1765), and a geography, Deichlös-nund (Latin transl. by Norberg, Lund, 1818, 2 vols.).

Hennir, in Norse mythology. When the Wanes and Aesir had a long war, agreed on an armistice, they exchanged hostages. The Åsa got the Wani Niord, the Wanes the Åsa Hennir, who was very beautiful, but had no mental gifts, and soon the Wanes ceased to respect him. Both hostages remain in the power of their enemies until the destruction of the world, when they will return to their kindred.

Haer, Franciscus van der, a theologian and historian of Utrecht, who died at Louvain, Jan. 12, 1632, is the author of, Catena Aurea in IV Evangelia:—Concordia Historiae Sacrae et Profanae (1614)—Jesu Nascens, Missa Danici—Biblia Sacra Vulgata:—Expositio in Epistolam Pauli:—De Sacramentis. Haftai (beersers), a name given to Mohammedans who commit the entire Koran to memory, and are on that account regarded as holy men, intrusted with God's law.

Haftrang, in Persian mythology, is the god and ruler of the planet Mars, the light-giver and health-restorer. As he is the protector of the northern region and its stars, he may be the seventh constellation, because Hafti denotes seven.

Hagemann, Lorenz, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Wolfensteinat, Aug. 10, 1692. He studied at Jena, was preacher in 1719 at Bodenburg, in 1722 at Nonnhausen, in 1728 at Hanover, in 1748 general superintendent. He wrote An Humana Fveit Pheilosus Moralit (Jena, 1719), besides a number of ascetical works. See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. Hagenbach, Karl Rudolf, a Swiss theologian, was born at Basle, March 4, 1801. Besides the university of his native place, he studied at Bonn and Berlin, and in these places received the instruction of Locke, Schillermacher, and Neander. Having returned to Basle, he commenced his academical career by presenting Observationes Historico-Hermeneutica circa Origem Methodam Interpretanda Scriptura Sacra (1823), and six years later he was made professor ordinarius in the theological faculty. For fifty years he belonged to the Basle University, and exerted a wide influence, not only as a teacher, but also as a preacher. He died June 7, 1874. Hagenbach's first important work was Encyclopaedia et Methodologia der theolog. Wissenschaften (Basle, 1838; 11th ed. by Kuntsch, 1894; Engl. transl. by Crooks and Hurst, as vol. iii of Library of Biblical and Theological Literature, N. Y. 1884):—Jahrbuch der Dogmengeschichte (1840; 4th ed. 1867; Engl. transl. by Beech, Edinburgh, revised and enlarged by Dr. H. B. Smith, N. Y. 1861, 2 vols.; new ed. with preface by Plumptre, Edinburgh, 1860, 3 vols.):—Grundzüge der Homiletik und Liturgik (1863). His largest work is the Kirchengeschichte von der ältesten Zeit bis zum 19. Jahrhundert (Leipsic, 1869-72, 7 vols.; that part which treats of the 18th and 19th centuries has been translated into English by Dr. Hurst, N. Y. 1862, 2 vols.; new ed. with prefix by Plumptre, Edinburgh, 1860, 3 vols.):—Oecoloupad und Myeouia (Elberfeld, 1859);—Predigten (9 vols.). Hahn, Hermann Joachim, a Lutheran theologian, was born in 1867 at Irsee, in Mecklenburg. He studied at Leipsic, and in 1876 deacon at Dresden, and finally preacher there. He was stabbed by a fanatical Roman Catholic, May 21, 1725. He wrote De ics, qua circus Reeperam de Sibitho Doctrinam, a nova Namme Nesper in Dubium Visi sunt (Leipsic, 1728), besides a number of ascetical works. See Jocher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Hahn, Johann Bernhard, a Lutheran theologian, was born in Königsberg in 1865, and died there, July 8, 1755, doctor and professor of theology. He wrote, De Appellazione Lignam Hebrew quem dicit Sancta, ex Marian (Leipsic, 1715): de Feito Ebraorum Purim: Introductio ad Jesenium (1735): Introductio ad Jeremiam (1736): De Anna Ebraorum Jubilo (1746): De Ebræis in Nm. xi. 31. Hahn, Johann Friedrich, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Aug. 15, 1710, at Bayreuth. He studied at Jena and Halle, was preacher at Klosterbergen in 1748, and military chaplain at Berlin in 1746. In 1749 he was general superintendent, in 1762 member of consistory, and died at Aurich, in East Frisia, June 4, 1784. He published sermons and other ascetical writings. See Düring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, s. v. (B. P.)

Hahn, Johann Zacharias Herman, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Aug. 18, 1768, at Schneeberg, in Saxony. In 1800 he was deacon at his native place, in 1804 general superintendent and member of consistory at Gera. He died Nov. 22, 1828, doctor of theology, leaving, Public, Moral, und Religion in Verbindung (Leipsic, 1797-1800, 2 vols.): Geheimes Gesangbuch nebst Gebeten (Gera, 1822). Hahn, Philipp Matthias, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Nov. 25, 1739, at Scharhausen, in Württemberg. He studied at Tubingen, and died there, near Stuttgart, May 2, 1790. He was famous alike as a mechanic and theologian. A pupil of Oetinger and Bengel, he developed their theological system in his commentaries on different parts of the New Test., and his other writings. He published, Betrachtungen und Predigten über die Evangelien (Stuttgart, 1747); 3rd ed., revised according to his manuscripts, 1847: Erhauungsstunden über den Brief an die Epheser (published by his grandson, 1845): Erhauungsstunden über den Brief an die Kolosser (1845): Die Lehre Jesu und seiner Geselld (1866): Die Erklärungen der Briefe, Geschicht Jesu Christi (3 vols.): Ueber den Weg des Briefes an die Hebräer (ed. by Flattl, 1850). Hafi (of hajja) bar-Sherina, a Jewish rabbi, was born in 769 and died in 1065. He was the last pagan of Pumbadipta (q. v.), and was distinguished both for his personal virtues, and for an erudition which rendered him the most accomplished Jewish scholar of his time. He was a voluminous writer, and his works may be classified under the following heads: a. Talmudical; b. Exegetical; c. Poetical; d. Cabalistical; and e. Miscellaneous. Passing over his Talmudical works, we mention his treatment of the Scriptures, not extant, but cited by some of the later commentators, as Ibn-Ezra, David Kimhi, and others. Seefer han-nemavt, ד"ה ח"ג, originally called el-Chadé, i. e. "the gathering," arranged alphabetically after the manner of many other Arabic dictionaries, where the order is determined by the last radical of the word which is written under daleth. In this dictionary, written in Arabic, which extended to the Biblical Chaldee also, the language of the Mishna, as well as a comparison of the Arabic, and sometimes even of the old Persian, was applied to the explanation of Hebrew words, as may be seen from the quotations of Ibn-Ishlam (in his commentary on Numbers and Deuteronomy, preserved in Oxford, and where the dictionary of Haija is expressly called el-Chadé, as in Tanchum on Judges viii., 16), Ibn-Ezra (Deut. xxvii., 89; Isa. xli., 8; Amos i., 27; Ps. lviii., 10; Job iv., 15; vi., 10; xxii., 27; xxii., 82), David Kimhi (in his Book of Roots, also in his commentary on Isa. v., 6; xxxix., 14; Jer. xi., 6; Ezek. xii., 10), Haush (on Judg. iv., 19; Hos., iii., 4), and others. This dictionary, as well as several other treatises, is not extant. Of his poetic works, we mention Musam hasked, מַסָּה חַסֶּקֶד, also Musam birass, מַסָּה בִרְאָס, an exposition of the Pentateuch in Arabic verse (Constantinople, 1111 Latin trans. by Mercier, Paris, 1611; and Seidel, Leipzig, 1668); Shem Koli (שֶׁם כּוֹלַי), i. e. Hear my voice, in the Spanish Bible. Haloitis, a Mohammedan sect, who profess to believe in Christ as well as in Mohammed. They hold many of the doctrines pertaining to Christ in common with orthodox Christians. They also believe that he will come again to judge the world in the same body which he had on earth; that he will destroy Antichrist, and reign for a thousand years, at the close of which the world will be destroyed.

Haila, a town in Palestine, just under the northern brow of Carmel, on the shore near the mouth of the Kishon, seems to be alluded to as (near) the western terminus of Zebulon (Gen. xlix, 13, פִּרְרָה, χαβό̊, "haven;" see Deut. i, 7, "sicle;" Josh. ix, 1, "coast;" in both which passages the associated geographical terms are likewise technically used as proper names). In fact the present Arabic name (properly Chephak) is but the Aramaean form (קף, the core) of the Hebr. word (used in the above passages only). In the Talmud the old name reappears (קף, Chephak, the modern form; Græcized Ὁψα, see Reland, Palæst. p. 718). By the Greek and Roman writers, a place called Scymnum (Σκύμνον, Herodized Σκυμνο), Sekamun, doubtless as a mart for fish, is mentioned as situated in Phoenicia, near the foot of Carmel (see Reland, p. 1024). In the Middle Ages the place was called Porphyrgoum, a strange mistake, the real town of that name being north of Sidon. It was also known as Chephak, and the derivations given are very curious, either from Cephas or Caiphas. Hafia is now a small but growing town of about two thousand inhabitants, built close upon the sandy beach, and surrounded by a shattered wall. The interior has a dreamy look, which is not improved by the broken wall, and two or three rusty cannon lying about, half covered by rubbish. The only tolerable houses appear to be those of the consular agents, who abound here, as it is a frequent stopping-place, especially in foul weather, for the Levant steamers. There is a flourishing German colony in the neighborhood. The bay spreads out in front, its sandy beach sweeping gracefully to the low cliffs, on which the battlements of Acre are seen in the distance. In Haifa the Christians outnumber the Mohammedans; and there is a small community of Jews.
Few remains of antiquity are visible except some tombs in the rocks;
but the magnificence of former buildings is attested by the fragments of marble, granite, porphyry, and greenstone lying in the shingle on the beach. Two miles further south-west are the remains of another large town, at the place called Tell es-Senak. There there can scarcely be a doubt that this is the ancient Sycamorr, often mentioned, with Haifa, but a permanent village, and named from its sycamore fig-trees—a stunted specimen of which still stands near, with its little figs growing

Haight, Benjamin L., S.T.D., LL.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in the city of New York, Oct. 16, 1809. He graduated at Columbia College in 1828, and at the General Theological Seminary in the same city in 1831; was ordained that year, and became rector of St. Peter's Church in his native city; in 1834 of St. Paul's, Cincinnati; in 1837 of All Saints', New York; and the same year likewise professor of pastoral theology in the General Theological Seminary, retaining the latter position until 1855, when he was associated with Trinity parish in the same city. He died there Feb. 21, 1879.

Hair. CHRISTIAN MODES OF WEARING. In the early Church the clergy sometimes wore long hair, but by the custom of cutting it short, in distinction from pagans, soon became general, and at length shaving it altogether, even to a bare spot upon the crown, was introduced as a monkish habit. See TOSCANA. Penitents cut their hair short as a sign of humiliation. Laymen usually wore long hair, but ringlets were regarded as a mark of effeminacy. Women were enjoined to wear long hair, but modestly arrayed. False hair was strongly denounced.

Hair-cloth has often been worn by ascetics as a means of mortifying the flesh, especially hair-lust. The medieval church presuits were sometimes clothed with it, and candidates for baptism were often examined standing upon a piece of hair-lust. The dying and the dead were also covered with it.

Hairdressers, a skeptical Mohammedan sect, who profess to doubt everything, and to hold their minds in constant equipoise, maintaining that it is impossible to distinguish truth from falsehood. Their usual reply in discussion is, "God knows, we do not." They are, evertheless, scrupulous in their observance of Mohammedan laws and ceremonies, both civil and religious.

Haita, Fedeli, a Roman Catholic theologian, was born in 1801 at Waldahut, Baden. In 1820 he was made a priest, in 1845 canon at Freiburg, and died June 9, 1873. He wrote Die Katholische Abendmahlslehre
(Mayence, 1872). (B. P.)

Halkuyt, Richard, an eminent English clergyman and ethnologist, was born in London in 1553 and educated at Christ Church, Oxford. He died in 1616.

He published Divers Voyages touching the Discoveries of America, and the Islands Adjacent unto the Same

Halak, Mount. Jebel Madorak, with which we may probably identify this mountain, lies on the south side of a wady of the same name, five miles south-west of the pass of Sufah, and is a rounded, isolated hill, with numerous cairns on the base and summit. Arab tradition ascribes to a destructive shower, as a punishment for inhospitality on the part of the ancient inhabitants (Palmer, Desert of the Exodus, p. 351).

Halal, what is permitted and sanctioned by the Mohammedan law.

Halcyon, a mythological term equivalent to rest or quiet, especially applied to any season of repose;
Fig. drawn from the so-called "halcyon days," which are a fortnight, one half before and the other after the winter solstice, during which the bird halcyon, or kingfisher, was fabled by the Greeks to brood, the sea remaining calm during the time of incubation.
The myth originated in the classical story of Halcyone or Alexandra, the daughter of Rhodion and Eudice, or Egiale, who married Cyx, and lived so happily with him that the two compared themselves to Jupiter and Juno, and were punished for their presumption by being changed into birds. A more literal version of the story is that Cyx, having perished by shipwreck, Alexandra threw herself into the sea, and was metamorphosed into a kingfisher.

Halcyon Church, a denomination of Christians which is said to have arisen in the interior of the United States in 1802, who reject all creeds and confessions.
They hold that there is but one person in the Godhead, the Father, the Son, and that the Father reigns in the personality of the Anointed. They deny eternal punishment, and believe in the annihilation of the wicked. They baptize only adults, and that in a peculiar manner. The persons to be baptized walk down into the water in procession, attended by the congregation, and ascended with vocal and instrumental music. The ordinance is then administered in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ.
They devote their children to God, not by baptism, but by dedicating them in prayer, and placing them under the guardianship of the church members.

Hale, Benjamin, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at Old Newbury, Mass., in 1797.
He graduated at Bowdoin College in 1818, and immediately became principal of the Sacred Academy. In 1819 he entered the Andover Theological Seminary, and became a minister of the Congregational Church in 1822. The four years thereafter he spent as a tutor in Bowdoin. In 1827 he was called to Dartmouth College, N. H., as a professor, and held the office until 1835, when his professorship was abolished by the trusteers of the college. He was ordained deacon in the Protestant Episcopal Church in 1829, and presbyter in 1831. After his return from a visit to the West Indies, whither (after a tour for recuperation in the summer of 1834, he was elected to the presidency of Hobart College, in Geneva, N. Y. In 1852 he made a brief visit to Europe, and in 1856 resigned the presidency of the college, which he had held for twenty years, and afterwards lived in retirement in his native place. He died at Newbury-port, Mass., July 15, 1865. Dr. Hale was the author of several scientific and professional works; but his reputation rests largely upon his work as an instructor. See

Hale, Bernard, D.D., master of Peterhouse, in Cambridge University, was born of religious parents, and received his early education in the public school of Hartford, Conn. Afterward he removed to Westminster, thence to Peterhouse, of which he became a fellow, Hale, Enoch, a Congregational minister, brother of Nathan Hale, the Revolutionary martyr, and father of the Rev. Nathan Hale, of the Boston Daily Advertiser, was born at Coventry, Conn., in 1784; graduated from Yale College in 1773; was ordained pastor of the Church in Wapsington, Mass., in 1773, and died Jan. 14, 1807. He was secretary of the Massachusetts General (Congregational) Association from 1804 to 1824. See Cong. Quarterly, 1859, p. 99; Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ii, 572.

Hales, Stephen, D.D., F.R.S., a Church of England divine, was born Sept. 7, 1677. He entered Corpus Christi College in 1696, graduated A.B. in 1701, A.M. in 1706, and B.D. in 1713, greatly distinguishing himself, both as a botanist, anatomist, and astronomer. In 1710 he was presented to the perpetual curacy of Teddington, Middlesex, and afterwards accepted the living of Fodeck, Somersetshire, which he exchanged for the living of Farrington, Hampshire. On March 15, 1715, or 1716, he was elected a member of the Royal Society. In 1722 he published a valuable work on Vegetable Statistics, and in 1733 a sequel to it, entitled Statistical Essays. He published a very popular work on Temperance; and in 1739 an 8vo volume entitled, Philosophical Experiments on Sea-water, Corn, Flesh, and other Substances. Dr. Hales also published several sermons and many papers in the Phil. Trans., etc. He died at Teddington, Jan. 4, 1761. See Masters, Hist. of E. C. C.: Annual Register, 1764, p. 42; Gentleman's Magazine, vol. xix; Bath, Life of Hillside, p. 302; Lysons, Environs of Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, a. v.

Hales, William, D.D., an Irish divine, was born at Cork, April 9, 1747, and educated at Trinity College, Dublin, of which he became a fellow in 1769. Afterwards he served as a college tutor, and was very popular. In due time he was ordained deacon and priest; and in 1788 was appointed to the rectory of Killendrass, in Cavan, which he held till his death, Jan. 30, 1811. Dr. Hales was eminently faithful in all the duties pertaining to the ministerial office. He was amiable and unselfish, catholic in spirit, and blameless in life. His works are, Somorium Doctrina (1778):— De Motibus Plantarum (1782):—On the Equilibrium of the Power of the Supreme (1787-88):—The Rights of Citizens (1793):—The Scripture Doctrine of Political Government and Liberty (1794):—Methodism Inspected (1803-4):—Observations on the Proposition Exercised in the Lords of the Committee of the House of Commons in 1788:—A Chronology of (1800-14: his most important publication):—Origins and Purity of the Primitive Church in the British Isles (1818). Halibut. The modern representative of this place, Halibut, is described in the Memoirs accompanying the Ordinance Survey (iii, 305) as "a large stone village on a hill-top, with two springs and a well; also a fine spring below (Hin ed-Dhiweh). On the west is the mosque of Nebey Yaña, now in a partly ruinous condition, with a massive rock, and a number of the village. The hills on the north have vineyards on them, and there are other tombs here also." These last are elsewhere more fully detailed (iii, 329).

Hall. For this locality Lieut. Conder accepts (Text Work, ii, 877) the suggestion of the modern 'Alia, which is laid down on the Ordinance Map at nine and three quarter miles southwest of Es-Zib (Eclipsion on the coast), and described in the accompanying Memoirs (i, 170) as "a small square building of well-dressed stone, without draft, probably of the crusades; a large number of cisterns and traces of ruins." Among the latter are added, from Guérin, a description of several sepulchral chambers containing sarcophagi. The village of Malia, which lies half a mile north-west, is thought to represent the Meloth of Josephus (War, iii, 3, 7), and the Mahal or Chateau du Rol of the Teutonic knights (ibid. p. 149, 155).

Hall, Baynard Rush, D.D., a Reformed (Dutch) minister, was born in Philadelphia in 1738. At the age of four he was left an orphan, and heir to a large estate, which through mismanagement never came into his possession. In Union College, where he graduated in 1820, his reputation for ability and scholarship was of the first rank. He was educated with a view to the law, but Providence turned his steps to the ministry. He graduated from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1828, with bright promise of success, yet most of his life was spent in teaching. He was professor in Indiana University the same year, and taught in after-years in Trenton, Roughspear, Newburgh, and Brooklyn. In 1846 he left the Presbyterian Church and joined the Reformed Church in America, but remained on the church charge. He died in Brooklyn, L.I., Jan. 23, 1863. Dr. Hall published in early life a valuable Latin Grammar. His volume entitled The New Purchase, or Seven Years' in the West, enjoyed great popularity. Later in life he published a work of acknowledged merit, entitled, Teaching, a Science. He contributed freely to the religious periodicals. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America, s. v.; Christian Intelligencer, 1868, (W. J. R. T.)

Hall, Charles, D.D., a Presbyterian divine, was born at Williamsport, Pa., June 23, 1729. He graduated from Hamilton College in 1749; studied two years in Princeton Theological Seminary; was ordained evangelist, March 25, 1822; became secretary of the American Home Missionary Society in 1827; and so continued until his death at Newark, N. J., Oct. 31, 1853. See Gen. Coll. of Princeton Theol. Sem., 1881, p. 49; Nevin, Fresh, Cyclopaedia.

Hall, David, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Yarmouth, Mass., Aug. 5, 1704. He graduated from Harvard College in 1724; in November, 1728, supplied the pulpit in Sutton, and was ordained pastor Oct. 15, 1729. His church shared in the great revival of 1740. He died at Sutton, May 8, 1789. Dr. Hall was HALL, Edwin, D.D., a Presbyterian divine, was born at Granville, N. Y., Jan. 11, 1802. He graduated from the University of Vermont in 1824. He studied theology privately; taught in Middlebury for some two years; was ordained at Hebron, Aug. 27, 1830; was successive - ly pastor at Glenn's Falls and Sandy Hill for one year thereafter; at Bloomfield, N. J., the next year; over the First Congregational Church at Norwalk, Conn., for twenty years, 1835-54; was ordained in 1854 by the president of Christian theology in Auburn Theological Seminary, a position which he retained until his death, Sept. 8, 1872. He published several works on baptism, and other eccle siastical subjects. See Gen. Cat. of Auburn Theol. Sem. 1876, p. 207.

Hall, George, an English prelate, was born in 1612, and educated at Exeter College, Oxford. He was the son of the bishop of Norwich, became pre benda ry of Exeter in 1639, archdeacon of Devon in 1641, bishop of Chester in 1662, and died Aug. 29, 1686. He published Sermons (1656-66). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, a. v. 1

Hall, Gordon, Jr., D.D., a Congregational minis ter, was born in Bombay, India, Nov. 4, 1823. After preparatory study at Ellington, Conn., he graduated from Yale College in 1843, and from Yale Divinity School in 1847. After a term of service as tutor in the College, he was ordained pastor of the Church in Wilton, Oct. 25, 1848, and June 2, 1852, became pastor of Edwards Church, Northampton, Mass., and so continued until his death at Binghamton, N.Y., Nov. 5, 1879. Hall, Henry, a learned English divine, was born in London in 1716, and was educated at King's College, Cambridge, where he became a fellow in 1734. In 1750 he was collated to the rectory of Hatfielddown, and soon after to the vicarage of Hene. He was presented to the vicarage of East Peckham in 1756, and was at the same time librarian of Lambeth. He died at Hatfielddown, Nov. 2, 1763. See Chalmers, Bibl. Dict. a. v.

Hall, James, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Ayr, Aug. 22, 1744. When he was eight years old the family moved to North Carolina, and settled in Rowan County. He was blessed with pious parents, who taught him the truths of the gospel, and thus early he was brought into the Church. He graduated from Princeton in 1774; was licensed by the Presbyterian of Orange in 1775; in 1778 became pastor at Bethany, and there labored faithfully and successfully until his death, July 25, 1826. Dr. Hall was active in the scenes of the Revolutionary war. He published a few Sermons which he preached on national occasions. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iii. 391.

Hall, Jeremiah, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Swanseve, N. H., May 21, 1805. He pursued his classical studies in the Brattleborough Academy, Vt., and his theological studies at the Newton Seminary, where he graduated in 1830. He was ordained Feb. 8, 1831, and settled at Westford, and in 1834 became one of the pioneer laborers of his denomination in what was then the territory of Michigan, and assisted in the organization of the Church at Kalamazoo, of which he was the pastor eight years (1830-38), and subsequently at Ann Arbor, O. (1838-45). For some time he was the pastor of the Seminary of the Norwalk Institute; in 1851--56); president of Denison University (1858-65); and being a pastor for a time at Shell Rock, Ia., returned to Michigan, where he labored as occasion offered until his death, May 29, 1881. See Gen. Cat. of New Sem. p. 9. (J. C. S.) Hall, Samuel Read, LL.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Concord, N. H., Oct. 27, 1795. He was educated at Kimball Union Academy, and was for some years a teacher; studied theology with Rev. Walter Chapin of Woodstock, Vt.; was ordained at Concord, March 5, 1823, and remained pastor there until 1860. During this time he established and taught the first normal school in the country; afterwards became principal of the Teacher's Seminary at Andover, Mass., where he remained as such until 1847; then took charge of Academia, N. H. (1848-59); was pastor at Craftsbury, Vt., fourteen years; at Brownington twelve years, and thereafter, with the exception of two years, when he was acting pastor in Granby, remained without charge until his death, June 24, 1877. He was moderator of the General Convention of Vermont in 1859. He published, The Child's Assistant to a Knowledge of the Geography and History of Vermont (1827; revised ed. 1868); — Lectures on School Keeping (1829); — Lectures to Female School Teachers (1829); — The Arithmetical Manual (ed.); — Practical Lectures on Parental Responsibility, and the Religious Education of Children (1833); — A School History of the United States (ed.); — The Alphabet of Geology (1868). He assisted president Hiroeck in the geological survey of Vermont, and a part of section 7 of the American Museum Report on Northern Vermont was prepared by him. (W. P. S.)

Hall, Thomas, a learned English Nonconformist divine, was born at Worcester, July 22, 1610, and educated at Balliol College; was master of the free school at King's-Norton, and curate of the place; and died April 13, 1665. Among his works are many commercial tracts, and commentaries on some parts of the Scriptures. See Chalmers, Bibl. Dict. a. v.

Hall, Timothy, an English prelate, who was consecrated bishop of Oxford in 1688, and died April 10, 1690, published some Sermons (1684, 1689). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, a. v.

Hall, Westley, a minister of the Church of Eng land, was one of the Oxford Methodists. Of his origin and early life nothing is known. He became one of Wesley's pupils at Lincoln College, Oxford, and joined the Methodists some time prior to Oct. 25, 1732. The date of his ordination must have been as early as 1748, as he then refused a living. He was at that time in the service of a wealthy man, who died leaving the manor to soults." He married Wesley's sister, Martha, whom he afterwards abandoned, but after a very irregular and dissolute life, partly in the ministry, but chiefly as an open dresser, he became penitent, and died at Brixton, Jan. 25, 1794. (J. S. D.)

Hallahan, Margaret Mary, foundress of the congregations of St. Catherine of Sienna, was born in Lon don, Jan. 23, 1803. From her ninth to her thirtieth year she lived at service, part of the time in Belgium. In 1843 she received her habit as a member of the Dominican order. In April, 1842, she returned to England, and began teaching at Coventry. On Dec. 9, 1845, she laid the foundation at Coventry of the first English convent of Dominican nuns, which had a hard struggle there; although at Langton (1851), Stone (1853), Stoke-upon-Trent (1857), Ryhall (1864-66), and London the plans were in existence, but for some time were not successful. In October, 1868, mother Margaret, accompanied by Rev. Dr. Northcote, went to Rome, in order to obtain a definite settlement as to the future government of the increasing communities. It was deemed best that they should be united in a congregation under one superiors, with one novice, the whole to be under the government of the order of St. Dominic. She was appointed prioress-provincial of the newly formed congregation, which afterwards received the name of St. Catherine of Sienna. Her last work was the establishment of a house at Brompton. She died at Stowe, May 11, 1890. See Catholic Almanac (N. Y.), 1890, p. 53.
HALLAM, ROBERT ALEXANDER, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born at New London, Conn., Sept. 30, 1807. After some time spent in teaching, he graduated in 1832 from the General Theological Seminary of New York city, and in August of the same year was ordained deacon in Hartford, Conn., and went to Middletown as rector of St. Andrew's Church, where he was ordained presbyter, Aug. 2, 1833. He returned to New London in January, 1833, as rector of St. James' Church, a position which he held until his death, Jan. 4, 1877. In 1836 he published a volume of Lectures on the Morning Prayer, and a volume of Sermons; also, in 1837, a course of Lectures on Moses, and in 1873 a History of his Parish Church. See Obituary Record of Yale College, 1877.

Halldor, FRIEDRICH ANDREAS, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born in Thuringia, Sept. 15, 1869. He studied at Halle and Jena; was adjunctus of the philosophical faculty at Jena in 1721; professor of election in 1723, professor of theology in 1728, and died March 1, 1750. He wrote, De Letheo (Jena, 1717):—De Ecclesiis Luteranae (ibid. 1717):—Commentationes Philologicae in Quadrum Locum Vet. Test. (ibid. 1721):—Disp. in Quadrum Locum Novi Test. (ibid. rod.):—Vindiciam Trium Dictorum N. T. Luc. Lec. xxiiii, 34, Apoc. xii, 13, Rom. xi, 5 (ibid. 1756):—Scurtius ad Virgine Exoritum (ibid. 1749):—Comment. Theol. in Apoc. ii, 3 (ibid. 1749):—Praelectiones de Dini Mundi Creatoribus (ibid. 1741):—De Jesus Pace et Patre (ibid. 1748):—Christus Pulcherrimus Hominum Patre, z. e. 2 (ibid. 1749). Halley, Edward, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Scotland in 1818. He graduated from Edinburgh University, pursued his studies in theology under Dick and Chalmers; was ordained pastor at Leith, where he labored for ten years, and then removed to America. His first settlement was in Salem, Massachusetts, in 1832, where he labored as pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, after serving this Church ten years, he was called to the pastorate of the Second Street Presbyterian Church, Troy, where he remained seven years, and then became pastor of the Third Presbyterian Church, Albany. After two years' travel, in 1857, as it was said, his pastoral eminence, in 1857 he was chaplain of the State Senate. He died Oct. 31, 1881. Dr. Halley was unusually well read in classical and English literature, but his leading trait was his passion for preaching. For a great part of his ministry he followed the method of writing and speaking: he was at the same time ready, as few are, to respond to a sudden demand for a speech or a sermon. See New York Observer, Nov. 10, 1881. (W. F. S.)

Halley, Robert, D.D., an English Congregational minister, was born at Blackheath, near London, Aug. 18, 1796. He joined the Church at an early age, entered Homsom College in 1816, and five years later began his ministry at St. Neot's, Huntingdonshire. On the opening of Highbury College, in 1826, Mr. Halley was chosen resident and classical tutor, which post he occupied for thirteen years. In 1834 he published a reply to Rev. James Yates's letter, which letter defended Mr. Wellhaver's Improved Version of the Scriptures, entitled his reply, The Improved Version truly Designated a Creed. This pamphlet soon attracted special attention by its vigor, keenness of criticism, depth of scholarship, and its ability handling of the Greek text. In 1849 he removed to the Atlantic, which he retained until his death at Sweedsborough, N. J., Aug. 28, 1867. He was a man of childlike, catholic spirit, and possessed a peculiar union in prayer. He was eminent as a preacher. His theology was that of moderate Calvinism, and he held it with genuine charity towards all who differed from him. He was also a decided philanthropist, and was thoroughly versed in the literature of that question.

Dr. Halley wrote a History of Puritanism and Nonconformity in Lancashire:—Lectures on the Sacraments:—The Lord's Supper. See (Long.) Cong. Year-book, 1877, p. 387; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, n. v.

Hallier, François, a French prelate, was born at Chartres in 1555. He was doctor and professor of the Sorbonne, and syndic of the theological faculty at Paris. While at Rome in 1652 he was the main instrument of having the five propositions of Jansenius condemned. In 1656 he was made bishop of Cavaillon, and died in 1659. He was denied Defensae Ecclesiasticae Hierarchiae (Paris, 1623):—Monies ad Ordinarios et Ordinatos (1684):—De Sacris Electorum et Ordinationum ex Antiq. et Novo Ecclesiae Viva (1636, 3 vols. fol.). Hallock, William Allen, D.D., a Congregational minister, son of Rev. Moses Hallock, was born at Plainfield, Mass., June 2, 1794. He graduated in 1819 from Williams College, and in 1822 from Andover Theological Seminary; the next three years was agent for the New England tract Society, and in 1825 was made corresponding secretary of the American Tract Society, which he was largely instrumental in founding. He was ordained in Middletown, Mass., Oct. 5, 1836, and became honorary secretary of the Tract Society in 1870, and so continued until the close of his life in New York city, Oct. 2, 1880. He was for several years editor of the American Messenger, and besides several tracts, wrote and published the following:—The Life of Harlan Pope:—The Venerable Mayhew:—Life of Rev. Moses Hallock:—Life of Rev. Dr. Justin Edwards. See Conn. Year-book, 1881, p. 24.

Hallum (or Halom), Robert, D.D., an English prelate of the first part of the 15th century, was of the blood royal of England, says Pits (De Scriptoribus Britannicis, an. 1410), but in what way is not said. He was educated in Oxford, became chancellor of that university in 1406, afterwards archdeacon of Canterbury, bishop of Salisbury, and June 6, 1411, was made cardinal. He was one of the three prelates sent to represent the English clergy in the Councils of Constance, in which last service he died at Goteby Castle, in 1417. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), iii, 829.

Hallowtane (1) a sacred or holy court, presided over by an ecclesiastic; (2) a visitation by a bishop of some particular parish or church.

Halsey, Abram Ootbouth, D.D., a Reformed (Dutch) minister, was born in New York, Nov. 3, 1798. He graduated from Union College in 1822, and from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1827; became pastor at North and South Hampton in 1829, a position which he retained until a few months before his death at Sweedsborough, N. J., Aug. 28, 1867. He was a man of childlike, catholic spirit, and possessed a peculiar union in prayer. He was eminent as a preacher. His theology was that of moderate Calvinism, and he held it with genuine charity towards all who differed from him. He was also a decided philanthropist, and was thoroughly versed in the literature of that question.

HALSEY, J. Foster, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Schenectady, N. Y., July 12, 1800. He received his preparatory education at Newburgh Academy; graduated from Union College in 1819; taught with his father at Newburgh; studied theology with his brother, and was licensed by the Presbyterian of North River, N. Y., Jan. 1, 1823; spent from 1823 to 1826 at Princeton Seminary; was ordained by the Presbytery of New Brunswick at Freehold, N. J., June 14, 1826, and on the same day installed pastor of the Old Tennant Church in that place, where he labored until May 5, 1829; was agent in New Jersey for the American Bible Society, 1829; was elected to the Assembly N. Y. in 1829 and 1830, for the American Tract Society, and in Pittsburg, Pa., in 1830 and 1831, in the Sunday-school cause. He went to Allegheny City, and was installed pastor of the First Church of that city, July 1, 1831, and labored there until released, April 29, 1836. He was a professor in the Marion Male College, an Missouri, in 1835 and 1836; principal of Raritan Seminary for Young Ladies, at Perth Amboy, N. J., from 1836 to 1848; was installed pastor at West Bloomfield, now Montclair, Jan. 8, 1853, where he remained until 1857. He was also the last elected and installed pastor of the First Church of Norristown, Pa., May 11, 1856, where he labored twenty-four years. Here he died, March 24, 1882. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1882, p. 12.

Halsey, Luther, D.D., LL.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Schenectady, N. Y., Jan. 1, 1794. After receiving a preparatory education, he graduated from Zachory College in 1816; then entered upon the study of medicine, but soon relinquished it for theology, and in 1816 was ordained pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Blooming Grove, Orange Co., N. Y., where his labors were blessed in the ingathering of many souls. In 1825 he was appointed professor of theology in the Allegheny Theological Seminary, and in 1827 professor of ecclesiastical history and Church polity in the Auburn Theological Seminary. In 1844 he again took charge of the Blooming Grove Church, and in 1847 accepted the chair of Church history in the Union Theological Seminary. For several of the last years of his life he occupied a retired relation. He died in New York, Oct. 29, 1880. See New York Observer, Nov. 11, 1880; Gen. Cat. of Auburn Theol. Sem. 1882, p. 279. (W. P. S.)

Hamadyrae were certain rural deities in the pagan theology, or nymphs of the woods, whose fate depended on particular trees with which they were associated.

Hambræus, Jonas, preacher to the Swedish ambassador at Paris, and professor of Oriental languages there, was born in 1586. He studied at Upsala, Greifswald, and Rostock, and was professor of Hebrew at Upsala, accompanied some noblemen on their travels in 1620, and settled at Paris as professor of Oriental languages. In 1655 he became preacher to Hugo Gratius, and died in 1655. He wrote, Dips. de Accusatius Hebrews (Greifswald, 1610); — Institutio Hebraica Compendiosa (Rostock, 1618); — Introductio Theologiae Latinae-Scandi (Stockholm, 1622). He translated into Swedish the Ethicos Christianus of Durenus (Rostock, 1618); also Erasmus' Päraēlæthd ad Christianum Omnem, ut Liber-Assiudini et Legati Verbum Dei (1620). See Harmbræus, Dips. I. et II. in Post. Josai Hambræus (Upsala, 1745, 1749); Moller, Cymbra Literata; Skierman, Biblia Svecogothica, p. 813; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Hambug, a noted city of Germany. When the reformation was introduced there in 1529, the city adopted the Church constitution prepared by Bugenhagen. It was thefirst martyr preyed upon, that all non-Lutherans should be excluded from the city and its territory. In 1567 members of the Anglican Church, in 1806 members of the Dutch Reformed Church, and in 1844, by the peace of Westphalia, Roman Catholics, were allowed to preach in the city, but the Presbyterians, citizens, nor could they celebrate worship in public. These latter restrictions were removed by the new civil constitution of Sept. 28, 1860. The Lutheran Church is governed by a synod consisting of fifty-three members, of whom sixteen are clergymen, thirty-five laymen, and two senators, and by an ecclesiastical council consisting of nine members, viz. four laymen, three ecclesiastics, and two senators. The ecclesiastical council has the executive power, and carries out the resolutions of the synod, which meets every five years. In the year 1815, a territory comprising an area of about eight square miles, had a population of 406,014, of which about eighty-nine per cent, were Lutherans, 15,736 were Jews, 7,771 were Roman Catholics, and 5,585 belonged to other evangelical denominations. See Titt- Herzog, Reut.-Encyclopa. s. v.; Statistik des hamburgischen Staates (Hamburg, 1825). (B. P.)

Hamel, Jean Baptiste Du, a French philosopher and theologian, was born in 1624 at Vire, in Normandy. In 1668 he was chancellor at Bayeux, in 1666 secretary of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, and died Aug. 6, 1706. He published, Biblia Latina Vulg. etc. (Paris, 1706 ed.) — Theologia Speculativa et Practica (1691)—Theologiae Christianae Systematis Accords Commentarius (1694, 4 vols.). See Winer, Handb. der theol. Lit. i, 60, 291; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Hamelin, a French prelate of the 12th century, was the nephew of Odon, dean of St. Martin, Tours, and a scholar of that church from the year 1186. He was elected bishop of Le Mans in December, 1190, and consecrated by pope Celestine III at Rome in the beginning of the following year. He established in all the parishes of his diocese the capitation jurisdiction, and being deified to the interests of the king of England, refused to render it to the French king. Upon this the revenues of the bishop were confiscated by the latter, who ordered also the suspension of the divine service in the Church of Le Mans. These troubles were settled in 1204. Hamelin abdicated about the middle of Lent, 1214, and died probably Nov. 1, 1219. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Hamelvold, Ysbrand van, a former professor of theology at Utrecht, who died May 9, 1812, at Amsterdam, is the author of Aardrijkskunde des Bijbels, met Korten (Amsterdam, 1750, 6 vols.; Germ. transl. Biblische Geographie, übermit Anmerkungen, von Born, Jena, 1792, ed. 1792; — A Briefe Beschreibung der Geschichte der Christen (Harlem, 1799 sq. 23 vols.). See Winer, Handbuch der theolog. Lit. i, 149, 537; Fürst, Bibl. Jud., i, 860. (B. P.)

Hamet, a Mohammedan prophet, who began to teach on the western coast of Africa in 1792. He rejected the ancient doctrine of the Caliphs, but introduced certain modifications into the Moslem faith, and thus gathered a number of followers. Hamet was finally killed, and his followers soon dispersed.

Hamill, Hugh, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Norristown, Pa., Feb. 28, 1810. He received his preparatory education at Norristown Academy; graduated from Rutgers College, N. J., in 1827; entered Princeton Theological Seminary in November of the same year, and left in April, 1830; then spent the winter of 1831-32 at Yale Divinity School; was licensed by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, April 30, 1838; and was evangelist at Buffalo, N. Y., Oct. 31, 1832; became stated supply at Black Rock (now the Breckenridge Street Church, Buffalo), from Nov. 1, 1830, until Nov. 1, 1838; began to preach at Elkton, Md., and Penderchurch, Del., where he was installed as pastor of the church in January, 1834; in 1837 became connected with the High School at Lawrenceville, N. J., where he remained thirty-three years; but about 1870 was obliged to withdraw from the work of teaching on account of impaired hearing, and in 1873 took up his residence at Newark, Del., where he spent his remaining years in study, and died Aug. 1, 1891. He was a man of fine scholarship, and his life and works are fully set forth in the SeeRoy Report of Princeton TheoL Sem., 1892, p. 20.

Hamilton, Alfred, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Culpepper Court-House, Va., May 1, 1805. He was educated at Jefferson College, Pa., graduated from the Western Theological Seminary, Allegheny, in 1829; was licensed by the Ohio Presbytery, and commissioned by the Board of Domestic Missions to make a tour through Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee. In 1835 he accepted a call to the old church of Fagg's Manor, Chester Co., Pa., in New Castle Presbytery, where he remained for twenty-three years as pastor. He died in Chicago, Ill., Sept. 13, 1867. He was for some years associate editor of the Northwestern Presbyterian. See Wilson, Prefab. Hist. Almawuc, 1866, p. 103.

Hamilton, David, a Scotch prelate, was bishop of Argyll in 1506. He was witness to the grant which James, earl of Arran, made to James Hamilton, his son, of the lands of Finnitt, in 1537. He also held in communion of Dryburne, in the city of Edinburgh, and obtained the abbot of Sandal, in Kintyre, to be annexed to his episcopal see. He was still bishop in 1520. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 289.

Hamilton, David Henry, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Canajoharie, N. Y., Oct. 29, 1813. He graduated from Union College in 1839; studied and preached in Amsterdam, and in 1846-47 at the Auburn Theological Seminary in 1841; entered upon his ministry in 1845 in Trumansburg; subsequently was pastor of three other churches, in New Haven, Conn., Jacksonville, III., and Ripley, O. There was an interval of two years between his labors in New Haven and Jacksonville, which was spent in study at the University of Berlin, Germany. He died at Kingsborough, N. Y., July 4, 1872. As a preacher and pastor he was highly prized. He toiled incessantly, and seemed to rest in labor that would utterly break other men down. In these efforts hundreds and thousands were converted, and the churches quickened and strengthened. His autobiography, an inductive system of mental science, a large octavo of seven hundred pages, published in 1878, is a monument not less to his industry than his mastery of philosophy, and his remarkable powers of independent, bold, and accurate thinking. He had spent years in the preparation of a second volume, which he left unfinished, in which the system of theology was to be elaborated in accordance with his mental science. See Gen. Cut. of Auburn Theol. Sem., 1889, p. 273. (W. P. S.)

Hamilton, Gavin, a Scotch prelate, was first a minister at Hamilton, and afterwards promoted to the see of Galloway in 1598, and because the revenue was small, king James gave him the abbey of Dundrennan. He was consecrated bishop of Brechin, Oct. 20, 1610, according to the form of the Church of England. He had also a grant from the priory of Whiten annexed to the see of Galloway. Here he sat till his death, in 1614. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 280.

Hamilton, Henry Parr, an English divine, son of Dr. Alexander Hamilton of Edinburgh, was born there in 1794, and educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated with high honors in 1816. He held a living for several years in Yorkshire, and in 1850 was made dean of Salisbury. He died Feb. 9, 1860. Dean Hamilton published, The Principles of Analytical Geometry: Analytical System of Conic Sections: Remarks on Popular Education:—The Education of the Lower Classes, and several sermons.

Hamilton, James (1), a Scotch prelate, was reader at Petten, in the diocese of Moray, and afterwards rector of Spot, in East Lothian. He was elected to the see of Glasgow in 1547. In 1558 he was put into the see of Argyll, and about the same time got the subdeanery of Glasgow in commendam. It is not certain whether he was ever consecrated a bishop. He became a Protestant at the Reformation. In 1566 he granted a life pension to Alexander Stewart. He was still bishop in the see in 1575. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 289.

Hamilton, James (2), a Scotch bishop, was born in August, 1610, and ordained minister at Cambusnethan in 1634. He was then called to London by the king, and consecrated bishop of the see of Galloway in 1661. He died in 1674. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 281.

Hamilton, James (3), M.D., an intimate friend and helper of John Wesley, was born at Dunbar, Scotland, in November or December, 1740. When about the age of eighteen he was appointed surgeon to the Innsian...

of his hearers. His thoughts were original and often humorous; his arguments ingenious and irresistible; his style simple; the effect of his discourses sometimes marvellous. He worked with his might. Oneusley declared that he never saw a more indefatigable laborer. Broken down in the labors of the ministry, he was compelled to retire from the active service in 1816. He was one of the eight preachers who received a rebus of the Irish Conference for the administration of the Lord's Supper. He died Oct. 8, 1848. See Stevens, Hist. of Methodism, iii, 420, 435; Minutes of the British Conference, 1844; Smith, Hist. of Wesleyan Methodism, iii, 24, 25.

Hammerschmidt, Johann Florian, a Roman Catholic theologian, was born May 4, 1652, in Bohemia. He was chaplain at Budweis, rector of the archiepiscopal seminary at Prague, and died there in 1737, dean and apostolical prothonotary. He wrote, Magnalia S. Andreae (Prague, 1685); — Magnalia S. Joannis Bapt. (Ibid, 1690); — Magnalia S. Ioannis Exempiata (Ibid. et ibidem, 1700). See Jücher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit., i, 566, 567. (B. P.)

Hammon (Josh. xix, 28). Tristram thinks (Bible Places, p. 298) that this is one of the mounds "just north of Alma [see USSR], bearing the name of Hammon." This is not the case. It is not on the Ordinance Map, nor in the accompanying Memoirs. The Hamul which has been thought to be the best representative of Hammon is laid down on the Map at one and a half miles north-east of Nahmah, as Ain-Hamul; which is described in the Memoirs (i, 107) as "a large perennial spring of good water, irrigating gardens and turning a mill near its source; a plentiful supply." No ancient ruins are noted in the immediate vicinity. Treaswney Saunders locates it (Map of the O. T.) at Khobel el-Illina, ten miles south-east of Tyre, which consists simply of "large heaps of stones." (Memoirs, i, 176) without any special marks of antiquity.

Hammond, Charles, LL.D., a Congregational minister, son of Dr. Shubael Hammond, was born at Union, Conn. June 15, 1818. He studied at Monson Academy, and graduated from Yale College in 1839; entered the New Theological Seminary and from 1842 to 1844 attended Yale Divinity School. In the meanwhile (1839-41), he was principal of the Monson Academy, and afterwards again occupied that position (1844-1853). From this time till 1853 he was connected with the Lawrence Academy, at Groton, and then was a third time chosen principal of the Monson Academy, a position which he retained until his death, Nov. 7, 1878. He was ordained an evangelist, Oct. 5, 1856, at Tolland, Conn. He was the author of many educational articles, and published several pamphlets. See Cong. Year- book, 1879, p. 487.

Hammond, William, an English Calvinistic Methodist minister, was born at Battle, Sussex, Jan. 6, 1719. In 1745 he published a volume of original Psalms, Hymns, and Spiritual Songs. Among these were several which are found in many of our modern collections: Ich, of some before the church to God's, and awake and sing the song. Mr. Hammond was an educated man, having been connected with St. John's College, Cambridge. Later in life he joined the Moravian Brethren, and, upon his decease, Aug. 19, 1788, was interred in their burying-ground in London. He was the author of a volume entitled The Mirror of the Gospel. See Belcher, Historical Sketches of Hymns, p. 163. (J. C. S.)

Hamrul, the angel who was regarded by the ancient Persians as the inspector of the heavens.

Hamza, in the mythology of the Druze, was a prophet of the Egyptian god Hakem, whom the Druze call the angel of the desert. Hamza is said to have been born seven times he has come from heaven to earth. The sacred books of the Druze call Hamza the guide of the compass, the straight road to the only salvation, the establisher of truth, the Imam of all times, the holy spirit, the final cause of all causes. He was the highest, nearest to the god Hakem. He was so highly esteemed by the latter that he ordered all angels to worship him, which they all did except Sethum (Satan), and for this reason the latter was damned. The four other prophets, Israel, Mahomed, Selami, and All, are called Hamza's wives.

Hamaz, a mediæval term for a drinking-cup.

Hanau (or Huna), Solomon, a Jewish writer of the 18th century, is the author of, היעי וברב, another grammatical work (Amsterdam, 1736); — היעי וברב, also a Hebrew grammar (Berlin, 1738, and often); — היעי וברב, a compendium of Hebrew grammar (Hamburg, 1718); — היעי וברב, a treatise on the Hebrew accents (1718, 1762); — היעי וברב, a grammatical commentary on the daily prayers (1725). His works were opposed by different Jewish writers, against whom he wrote רכש, and הכף ובני דברי העון פורת (Furtth, 1744). He left a number of philological works in MS. See Furtth, Bibl. Jud. i, 379 sq.; Steinschneider, Bibl. Handbuch, s. v.; De Rossi, Dizionario Stemmi (Genoa, trans.), p. 122. (B. P.)

Hanbalites, one of the four orthodox sects of the Mohammedans, which derived its name from Ahmed Ibn-Hanbal, a devout follower of the prophet. He maintained the eternity of the Koran, and thus brought upon himself the vengeance of the caliph al-Mutasem, who held that the Koran was created. Hanbal was imprisoned and scourged; but he continued to propagate his opinions until his death, which occurred about the middle of the 8th century. The Hanbalites prevail principally in the wilder districts of Arabia, whose austere tenets are being well suited to the simple manners of the Bedouin.

Handcock, Christian, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was rector, for several years, in Charleston, S. C., and in 1858 in Radcliffesborough. At this time he was president of the standing committee of his diocese, a position to which he was re-elected several successive years. In 1866 he retired from the active duties of his church, and in 1867 was elected honorary rector of the same church. He died in 1870. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1871, p. 118.

Hand, Aaron Hicks, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Albany, N. Y., Dec. 8, 1811. He graduated from Williams College in 1837, and from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1837; was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick the same year, and ordained by the Presbytery of Flint River, Ga., in 1841. He became stated supply of the churches of Roswell and Marietta in 1858, and remained until 1841. He then became pastor of the church in Berwick, Pa., and accepted a call to the Church of Greenwich, N. J. His last charge was the Palisades Presbyterian Church in N. Y., where he remained eight years, and was in consequence of infirmity compelled to resign. His labors in all the churches of which he was pastor were attended with revivals. He died at Easton, Pa., March 3, 1880. See New York Observer, March 16, 1880. (W. P. S.)

Hanna, Thomas, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born Oct. 4, 1759. He graduated at Jefferson College, Pa., in 1818; was licensed by the Chartiers Presbytery in 1819; in 1821 became pastor at Cazle, O.; in 1850 at Washington, Pa.; and died Feb. 9, 1864. As a preacher he was clear and methodical, though his doctrines and mode of treating them was not according to the modern school. See Wilson, Prefl. Hist. Almanac, 1865, p. 205.

Hanna, William, D.D., LL.D., a Presbyterian minister, son of Rev. Dr. Samuel Hanna, was born at Belfast, Ireland, in 1808. He received his literary and theological education at the University of Glasgow, Scotland, and entered the ministry in 1855, in which he spent a laborious and useful life, and died May 25, 1882. He wrote the biography of Dr. Chalmers, and also of Wycliffe, and an interesting history of the Huguenots, besides several other valuable works.

Hannapes, Nicolas de, a French prelate, the last of the Latin patriarchs of Jerusalem, was born at Hannapes, in the Ardennes mountains, about 1252. At the age of twelve he joined the Dominicans at Rheims, afterwards studied at the convent of St. Jacques, Paris, was ordained priest, and taught theology. He was called to Rome by pope Innocent V, where he exercised the functions of grand-penitentiary, later was selected by Nicolas IV as patriarch of Jerusalem, and in 1299 apostolic legate in Syria, Cyprus, and Armenia. Jean d'Are was taken by the Turks, and the mission was broken up. Hannapes died in 1291, leaving, Vortetum Fictorumque Exempla, et Sacra Historia Exempla (Thibingen, 1663):—Dietu Salutis Nicolai de Hannapoli, ord. Provinc. (Mayence, 1609):—Nicolai Patriarchi Hierosolymitanae, Typicon de Jurisdictio Grecorum, etc. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Hannathon. For this site Triest suggests (Bi-ide Places, p. 258) Deir Hanna, meaning doubtless what is laid down on the Ordnance Map as Deir Hanna, three miles south-west of Maghar (the locality which we had conjectured), and thus described in the Memoirs (1.364):—"High walls all round the village, which is built of stone. The walls have round towers, and were built by Hannathon. At the corner of the West gate, there is a wall on the top of a high ridge, and contains about four hundred Christians. It is surrounded by olive groves and arable land. Water is obtained from cisterns and an old paved birke, [pool] to the north of the village." No ancient remains are noted in the immediate vicinity. Mr. Trewhill Saunders coincides with this locality (Map of the O. T.). Lieut. Couder, however, prefers (Tract Work, ii, 337) Kefr 'Abda, which is too far north, being five miles south-west of Sodaf, and equally destitute of any traces of antiquity (Memoirs, i, 205).

Hannauer, Georg, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born in 1847. In 1848 he was made priest, in 1851 professor of philosophy at the Lyceum in Ratisbon, and died Jan. 11, 1868. He wrote Ueber den Ursprung der Ideen nach Thomas von Aquin (Ratisbon, 1855). (B. P.)

Hanneken, Menno, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born March 1, 1595, at Blaaben, in Oldenburg. He studied at Gieven, was in 1619 corrector at Osnabrug, and in 1626 professor at Magdeburg, where he was 1646 superintendant at Lübeck, and died Feb. 17, 1671. He wrote, Scultt Veritatis Catholica contra Thomam Heinrici:—Synopsis Thologiae:—Expositio Epistolae Pauli ad Ephesios:—Doctrina de Justificatione Hominis coram Deo:—Grammatik Hebraica:—Quattuor Disput. de Augustana Confesionis Inquiratia; Trea Disput. Hannken, Philip Ludwing, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, son of Menno, was born at Marburg, June 5, 1637. He studied at different universities, was in 1663 professor of eloquence at Giezen, in 1668 doctor and professor of theology there, in 1688 professor at Wittingen, and died Jan. 16, 1706, leaving, Ammendtia Philologiae in Jesu Nave Declarata, etc. (1693):—Mysterium Antichristi Ostensum;—Disputationes de Provocidet, de Sacramentis Christi ad Deonum Dei, de Baptismo Primorum Chilidum ad Christum Conversum, de Auro de Soliarius in Judas Prodoliorum, de Moribus Regni Christi Illiique Oppressi Pietatem et Milleses:—Exercit. in Psalm. lib. i, 2:—Bibl. Hannover, Nathan, ben-Mosse, a Jewish writer of the 17th century, is the author of היסאר הערית, or a history of the persecution of the Jews in Poland, Lithuania, etc. (Venice, 1656; transl. also into Judeo-German):—דיאלוג על תרבות, a dictionary of the Hebrew language, with the corresponding German, Italian, and Latin words (1713). The 2nd edition (Leipsic, 1715) was partly written in Hebrew, partly in German. The French was edited by Koppel ben-Wolf, Amsterdam, 1701. See Först, Bibl. Jud. i, 861 sq.; De Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Ger. transl.), p. 122. (B. P.)

Hansch, Michael Gottlieb, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Sept. 22, 1683. He studied at Leipzig, where he also lectured from 1769 to 1771. It was his intention to publish Kepler's manuscripts, which he had bought at Dantzic, but he only succeeded in publishing the first volume, as he could not get the support necessary for such an undertaking. Hansch died in 1752, leaving, De Justificatione Fideum sub Veto Tristimio;—De Medici Consecratione;—De Humanitate Hominis (1702):—De Medici Consecratione;—De Humanitate Hominis (1702):—De Fundamentali in Fide Dissensu (1706). Hansell, William Forde, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in Philadelphia, Dec. 6, 1815. He graduated at the University in 1845, and in 1867, from Ewell Theological Seminary in 1848; was ordained in 1849 in the First Baptist Church in Philadelphia, and became pastor of the Central Baptist Church in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., April 1, 1849. In April, 1855, he was released from that church, and installed pastor of the Ninth Street Baptist Church in Cincinnati, O., Feb. 5, 1854. His services ended here July 18, 1858. For several years he resided in Philadelphia without pastoral charge. Removing to Hartford and Spring- field, April 12, 1874, he became deeply interested in that field, remaining there and organizing a Church, which was constituted May 18, 1875. The last time he appeared in public was before the annual meeting of the Hartford Baptist Association as the representative of that new Church. He died Nov. 26, 1875. Dr. Hansell's sermons were admirably clear; sound in doctrine, graceful in construction and expression. He dwelt specially on the person and work of the Lord Jesus Christ. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1877, p. 109.

Hansen, Franz Volkmann Reinhardt, a Lutheran theologian, was born in 1815. In 1843 he was pastor at Keitum, in the island of Sylt, Schleswig, but was deposed by the Danish government in 1860. From 1852 to 1862 he was court-preacher to queen Amalie, at Athens, in 1864 provost and first pastor in Schleswig, and died June 28, 1873. He is the author of Drei Auge-

Hansen, Ludvig, a Lutheran minister, was born at Hildesheim, Feb. 1, 1664. He studied at Jena, in 1869 pastor at his native place, and died Feb. 28, 1694, leaving, Diso. de Dombonna (Jena, 1684): — Die Simpliciter Dei (ed.); — Die Salate Majorum in Fupi- lutum (1686). Hansen, Petrus, a Lutheran theologian, was born July 6, 1666, in Schleswig. He studied at Kiel, where he was deacon in 1714, in 1720 first pastor at Plon, Holstein, in 1729 member of consistory and superintendent, and died in 1743. See Feiring, De Auctore Studii de Abendea uo Schola Religionis Christiana (Plu, 1733): — Diss, Synod. de Diferentia inter Religiones Naturalem et Reelatum contra Tidmall (1738). Hansa, Markus, a Jesuit and Church historian of Austria, was born April 23, 1658, at Volfarkeramt, in Carinthia. He was educated in the Jesuit college at Eberndorf, studied at Vienna, and, after receiving holy orders, was for many years professor of philosophy at Graz. His indefatigable researches made him conceive the idea of producing a Germanica Sacrorum, after the pattern of the Gallia Christiana (Paris, 1656 sqq.). Ughelli s Italia Sacra (Venice, 1717 sqq.), and Wharton's Anglo-Saxa Sacra (Lond, 1691), and he undertook a journey to Rome with a view of examining the libraries there. In 1722 he published the first volume of his Germanica Sacra: Metropoliae Lauretanae cum Episcopatu Patavirinum, Chronologia Proposita (vol.); the second volume, published in 1729, is entitled, Archi- episcopatus Salisburgensis Chronol. Prop.; the third volume, published in 1754, is of a more academic style, Die Episcopatus Ratisbonensis Prodomus, sive Informatus Summara de Sede Antiqua Ratisbonensi. The freedom with which he treated local legends roused such an opposition to him that he felt compelled to renounce literary labor in 1736, but he encouraged others to continue his work. Hansa died Sept. 5, 1756, at Vienna, and his book was continued by Ussemann and others. See Backer, Ecri- vaina de la Compagnie de Jus, ii, 285; Werner, Gesch. der kat. Theologie, p. 192; Retberg, Kirchen-Ge- schichte Deutsclihland, i, 2 sqq.; Lichtenberger, Encyclopd. der Kirchengeschichte, s. v.; Plitt-Herzog, Real-Ency- clopa. s. v. (B. P.)

Hanseet, Gottfried August Ludvig, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Magde- burg, Sept. 7, 1761. He studied at Halle, where he was in 1782 teacher at the cathedral-school of his native place, in 1787 preacher at Tangermünde, in 1804 member of consistory and preacher at Berlin, and died Feb. 25, 1821, doctor of theology. He published homiletical and ascetical works, for which see Döring, Deutsche Konzelektredner: Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit., ii, 62, 94, 97, 118, 130, 148, 156, 158, 164, 168, 170, 172, 173, 175, 177, 193, 199, 206, 208, 209, 206, 227, 229, 357; Zuchold, Bild. Theol. i, 501. (B. P.)

Hannuman, the ape-god of the Hindus, son of Parvan, lord of the winds. There is a reference to Ha- numan in the Ramayana (q. v.), in which the monkey- chief is introduced as heading the nattes of Nilia, who had come to assistance of Rama. In memory of this service a small pagoda is erected to his honor in the temples of Vishnu.

Haphrah. This place, according to Strasrun (Bible Places, p. 257), "is probably represented by the little village of el-Afuleh, two miles west of Shunem, in the plain;" the position which we had assigned it [see ISACHAR], and which is adopted by Mr. Grove in Dr. Smith's Atlas. It is laid down on the Ordinance

Map at two and a half miles due west of Solan, and is described in the Memoirs (ii, 40) as "a small village of mud in the plain, supplied by two wells. This is possibly the Ophlah of the lists of Thothmes III (on the temple at Karnak). Compare el-Fuch (one mile to the east). It is also mentioned by Maria Sanuto (A.D. 1621) under the name of Afula."

There are other indications of antiquity. Leander suggests (Test Work, ii, 337) the identity of Haprah with Khurbet el-Farriyeh, which is laid down on the Ordinance Map far away from Shunem, at two and a half miles south of Alun-Krimhnsel (Jokmen), on the north edge of Mount Carmel; and is described as "a steep hillock with traces of ruins, and on the north a good spring in the valley" (Memoir, ii, 58, where a description and plan of the ancient tombs are given). In this latter location Mr. Trelawney Saunders coincides (Map of the O. T.).

Happersett, Rekk, D.D., a Presbyterian minis- ter, was born at Brandywine, Pa., July 81, 1810. He graduated from Washington College, Pa., in 1836, and from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1859; was li- censed by the Presby. General Assembly, N. J., in 1858, and ordained in 1841. In 1848 he was appointed agent for the Board of Domestic Missions, and in this position was eminently active and useful. In 1850 he be- came assistant secretary of the board, and in 1859 was elected corresponding secretary. He died Oct. 2, 1866. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanach, 1867, p. 154.

Happiness, absolutely taken, denotes the durable possession of perfect good, without any mixture of evil; or the enjoyment of pure pleasure unalloyed with pain; or a state in which all our wishes are satisfied; in which sense, happiness is only known by name on this earth. The word has, when applied to a state or condi- tion of human life, will admit of no positive definition, but is merely a relative term; that is, when we call a man happy, we mean that he is happier than some others with whom we compare him; or he is more gen- erally of others; or than he himself was in another situation. Moralsists justly observe that happiness does not consist in the pleasures of sense; as eating, drinking, music, painting, theatrical exhibitions, &c., for these pleasures continue but a little while, by repetition lose their relish, and by high expectation often bring disap- pointment. Nor does happiness consist in the abso- lute in labor, care, business, &c.; such a state being usually attended with depression of spirits, imaginary anxieties, and the whole train of hypochondriacal affec- tions. Nor is it to be found in greatness, rank, or elevated station, as matter of fact abundantly testifies; but happiness consists in the enjoyment of the Divine favor, a good conscience, and uniform conduct. Dr. Harms, in his travels through most of the holy places, was greatly promoted by the exercise of the social affections, the pursuit of some engaging end, the prudent constitution of the habits, and the enjoyment of our health.

Hara, one of the names of Sinai (q. v.).

Harms, Franz, a learned Dutch Catholic divine, was born at Utrecht in 1550, and educated in the academy there after he had travelled through Germany, Italy, and Russia. He was made canon of Bols-de-Duc, then of Namur and Louvain. He died at the latter place, Jan. 12, 1632. His principal works are, Biblia Sacra Expositionibus Priscorum Patrum Literaribus et Mystica Illustrata (1630); Coloss. Aureus in IV. Evangelii (1625); Visio Sanctorum.

in South Carolina and Georgia, and in 1858 was invited to California. He returned to South Carolina a second visit abroad, he devoted his ample means and willing services to the founding of a city mission on the corner of Madison and Gouverneur streets, New York city. He died Jan. 24, 1870. Dr. Hardensicht was a man of majestic frame, countenance, and bearing, handsome beyond most men, dignified, graceful, and cultivated. His preaching was earnest, evangelical, simple, direct, scriptural, and practical. "His fervor was intense. At communion seasons his face was radiant with emotion, and his tones thrilling with tenderness. He was a true pastor to the Church of his fathers, active in her benevolent boards, and held high rank among the first men of his period." He was a trustee of HARENBURG, JOHANN CHRISTOPH, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born April 24, 1696, studied at Heilstädt and was rector at Ganderstein in 1720. In 1735 he was pastor, and accepted a call in 1743 as professor of history and antiquities to Brunswick, where he died, Nov. 12, 1747. He wrote, Kurze Einleitung in die Köppische, sondern, Bibelinsinweise aile und neue Theologie (Heilstädt, 1719); De Speculativis Veterum, ad Loca 1 Cor. xvi, 12 (fol. ed.); Veri Diesmamens in und des Kirchenwesens (Celle, 1726); Die Kirchen zu Celle und Trelawney Saunders (Map of the O. T.).

Hariga, a word which, when pronounced along with Siva and Rama, is believed by the Hindustāni to bring down numberless blessings upon him who utters it. The moment these three sacred words escape from the mouth of the pious, but out of the house of the Brahman, as represented, the gods are so honored that they are not to find a resource equal to the merit. Such privileged persons are no longer obliged to pass into other bodies, but are straightway absorbed in Brahman.

Harington, EDWARD CHARLES, an Anglican clergyman, was born about 1807; graduated from Worcestershire College, Oxford, in 1837; was appointed chaplain in 1847, in 1857 resident canon of Exeter Cathedral, and died July 18, 1881. He wrote numerous works on Church history and policy, for which see Allibone, Dict. of Brt. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Harisbani, a sect composed of dervishes or sweepers in the western province of Hindustan, the members of which are very scarce, or, perhaps, entirely extinct.

Harless, GOTTLIEB CHRISTOPH ADOLPH, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Nuremberg, Nov. 15, 1798. In 1842 he published his Christliche Ethik, of which eight editions were printed, and which was also translated into English (Edinburgh, 1865). To this period belongs his activity as member of parliament in the Bavarian diet, where he so energetically fought for the cause of Protestantism that the ultra-monarchist minister, Abel, despised him from his professorship, and in 1845 sent him as member of consistory to Bayreuth. In the same year, however, he was called to Leipzic, where he labored as professor and preacher at St. Nicholai till 1847, when the king of Saxony appointed him court-preacher and vice-president of the consistory. In 1852 Harless was called to Munich as president of the Protestant superior consistory, and directed the affairs of the Protestant Church in Bavaria for twenty-five years. He died Sept. 5, 1879. Besides his Ethik, he published, De Revolutione et Fide (Erlangen, 1839); Commentarius über den Brief Pauli an die Epheren (1834; 2d ed. 1836); Die kritische Bearbeitung des Lebens Jesu von David Fr. Strauss beleuchtet (1836); Theologische Kryptologische Methodologie. (1837); De Supernaturalismo Gentilium seu de vita et ratione Superstitiis in Ratione Rerum Divinarum (1838); Ludwigmontium Evangelia Canonica Speculantum Pars I et II (1841, 1842); Die Sonntagslese, sermons (2d ed. 1860, 4 vols); Kirche und Amt nach lutherischer Lehre (1853); Die Ehescheidungsfrage (1861); Die Verhältnisse des Christenthums zu Kultur und Lebensformen der Gegenwart (1863); Der Kuss im Buche des Lebens (1864); Jakob Böhme und die Alchimisten (1870; 2d ed. 1872); Griechentüber aus der rühr. Kirche Lissands (1869); Staat und Kirche (1870). See Zuchold, *Bibl. Theol. i, 501-503; Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.; Stuhlmann, G. Chr. A. Harless, in Zeit- schrift für kirchliche Wissenschaft, 1880, ii and iii; and especially Harless's own work, Bruststücke aus dem Leben eines süddeutschen Theologen (Bielefeld, 1872-75, 2 vols.). (B. Harlor, John, an English clergyman and scholar, was born about 1594, at Churchdown, near Gloucester, and educated at Christ Church, Oxford. He was ordained as a Greek professor in that school in 1650, and in 1659 was presented to the rectory of Enderbst, in Hampshire. He died Nov. 1, 1670. His principal works are, Ecloga Sententiariarum et Similitudinum, et Chrysostomi Decretarum (Greek and Latin, with notes, 1625); Ecclesiastics ad Lambertum Oudelstodum (1641)-I Short Catechism. See Chalmers, Bibl. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brt. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Harmon (Heb. Harmon), יָרָם, probably from יָרָם, to be high; Sept. ὑψεῖς to *Poppaviv; Vulg. excelsus mons; A. V. "the palace"), a place only mentioned in Amos iii, 4, as to that which the inhabitants of Samaria would be led forth by their Assyrian conquerors, evidently, therefore, some unknown to us, which captivity. The ancient interpretations are obviously mere etymological conjectures, chiefly by a resolution of the first part of the name into יָרָם, a mountain; and the latter into a form of ג' ארמונ, or ג' רימון, which are unsuitable. Kimchi makes it equivalent to יָרָם, a town.

Harms, Thomas, brother of Louis (q. v.), was born in 1819. When thirty years of age he was called as missionary inspector to Herrmannsberg, and succeeded his brother in 1865. In 1873 Harms put himself at the head of those ministers who left the State Church and formed separate congregations. This separation was neither in the interest of the Church nor in the interest of the great missionary work with which Harms was intrusted, and the more so as he had not those talents which would become him so well. Friends of Harms had, therefore, often tried to heal the breach between the State Church and the Herrmannsberg Mission, but all efforts were in vain, on account of Harms being too headstrong a person. He died Feb. 16, 1865. Besides his biographical sketch, he has written an History of Louis (5th ed. 1877).
Harney, Martin, a Dominican of Amsterdam, was born May 6, 1634, and died at Louvain, April 22, 1704, professor of theology. He was an opponent of the Jansenists, and wrote L'Observance Raisonnable des Catholiques des Pays-Bas (Antwerp, 1636; transl. also into Latin). See Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.; Jocher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P. 1st ed.).

Harlish, Wilhelm, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Wilsnack, Brandenburg, Aug. 28, 1786. For some time first teacher at Teachers' Seminary, in Breslau, he was called in 1822 as director to Weinsel, and died Aug. 15, 1864, leaving, Luther's kleiner Katechismus für die Schulpflege (18th ed. Eis- leben, 1862) — Vollständiger Unterricht im evangelischen Christenthum (Halil, 1831, 2 vols.); — Entwürfe und Stoffe zu Unterredungen über Luther's kleiner Katechismus (1841—45, 3 vols.); — Erbauliche Betrachtungen über Luther's Katechismus (1856); — Die Geschichte des Reichen Gottes auf Erden (24 ed. 1844); — Die fünfzügige Stellung der Schule zu Kirche, Staat und Jesus (Erfurt, 1886). Harod, Spring of. Lieut. Conder suggests for this (Tent Work, ii, 69) the modern Ain el-Jezzun's "fountain of the two troops," described (Memoirs to Ordnance Map, ii, 81) as "a small spring of fresh water, with a considerable stream, between two larger ones, . . ." and laid down three miles west of Beisan. But this is to accommodate his theory of the location of Megiddo as near the Jordan. There is no good reason to desert the traditional site of Ain Jalād, which is briefly described in the same Memoirs (ii, 79).

Harosheth. The modern el-Harishiyeh, which is thought to represent the ancient site, is placed on the Ordnance Map nine miles south-east of Haifa, and is described in the accompanying Memoirs (i, 270) as "a miserable hamlet of mud, on high ground, with an open plateau to the east, and a spring below on the west (Ain el-Ghafir). The population in 1859 is stated by consul Rogers at one hundred and twenty souls, and the tillage at twelve feddans." According to the same authority, however (i, 26), "Goudin suggests that we have the ancient name of Harosheth or Harisa," three and a half miles south-west of Jibrin, in the north of Palestine, where "there appear to be no vestiges of ancient constructions, except a circular cistern cut in the rock. This identification is strengthened by the fact that the same word which occurs in the name Kir Harosheth, the modern Kerak, exists in the present local dialect of Moab under the same form, Harith or Haris" (ibid. p. 116).

Harpies (Ἄρπαι), in Greek mythology, were daughters of Thaumus and Electra (an Oceanid). Sometimes two, sometimes three, are mentioned, under the different names, Arīlo, Pasargē, Oxypetē, Ēlāns, Thyella, Achiōlē, Aēlopēs, Nīchos, and the like. In the descriptions of them there is also a great difference.

Antique Figures of the Harpies.

With Homer they are storm goddesses, fleet, but beautiful; Hesiod also calls them swift goddesses, but in Ἀχιλλευς they appear as hateful, winged monsters. They were usually represented as eagles with maiden faces. At times they had human arms and legs, which ended in claws and hens' feet. They were generally sent out by the gods to punish criminals.

Harpoeretes, in Graeco-Egyptian mythology, was the name of an Egyptian deity, which originated from the words ἡραπορεύομαι, i. e. "Har the child." This Har the Greeks usually called Horus, and distinguished him as Haros Harpoeretes from another Horus. Both were sons of Osiris and Isis. What the ancients say about Harpocrates is quite incomplete, and therefore dark as to its significance. That he was not the god of silence, as once believed, is now fully accepted. In Rome he was worshipped as such, but probably only because he had his finger in his mouth, which is but the figurative representation of sucking, and designates him as an infant. Beas and cherries were offered to him, and on special festive days he was fed, by men, with milk, his image being carried around in procession. Among animals, scorpions, snakes, crocodiles, lions, and reed were sacred to him. See Horus.

Harrison, Ellis, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in New York city, Jan. 22, 1790. He graduated from Princeton College in 1814, spent one year thereafter in the theological seminary there, was licensed by the New Brunswick Presbytery, ordained by the Baltimore Presbytery in 1817, and installed pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in Alexandria, Va.

Harsa (Hercia, or Harsa), a mediæval term, sometimes employed to describe any triangular candle-stick for tapera, but more especially used to designate that which is described in the office-leter of John's Church Week. In it, at this service, are placed fourteen unbledched wax candles to represent the apostles and the three Marys, with one bleached wax candle to represent our Saviour. They are all extinguished in the course of the morning service, save the last name.

Hart, John Sealy, L.L.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Old Stockbridge, Mass., Jan. 28, 1810. He studied at Wilkesbarre Academy; graduated from Princeton College in 1830, with the highest honors of the class; the following year taught as principal of an academy at Matches, Miss., and three years afterwards graduated from Princeton Theological Seminary. During the last two years of his course he also filled the position of tutor in the college. In 1834 he was elected adjunct professor of ancient languages in Princeton College, and filled that chair two years. He was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, Aug. 4, 1835. In 1856 he resigned his professorship in the college, purchased Edgehill School, in Princeton, and in 1842 was elected principal of the Philadelphia High School, continuing there until 1859, when he became editor of the periodicals published by the American Sunday-school Union, and in this connection he recurred to the Sunday-school work, in which he was elected principal of the New Jersey State Normal School, at Trenton, and held that position with distinguished usefulness and success until February, 1871. From 1864 to 1870 he also gave courses of lectures on English literature in Princeton College, where, in 1872, he was elected president of the belles-lettres and English literature, which chair he filled two years, returning in 1874 to Philadelphia, where he was engaged in literary pursuits until his death, March 26, 1877. Dr. Hart was the author of many volumes, an enthusiastic in the cause of education, a devoted Sabbath-school worker, of ele-

Hartgrop, in Norse mythology, was the wife of the Dweller in the Gulf of Glof and of a mighty giant.
She was a powerful sorceress, feared on account of her art, and worshipped with superstitious reverence.
By her assistance her husband descended alive into the infernal regions, to combat with Hela.

Hartley, Robert, a philanthropist, was born in England in 1706, and removed with his father to New York in 1788. He grew up with the expectation of entering the ministry, but was prevented by feeble health, and engaged in mercantile pursuits. He devoted his life to works of charity and mercy. He was the first to express the iniquity of the "swill milk" traffic. He visited Europe and learned the various syllables, and in 1838 he returned home a safe actor for the amelioration of the condition of the poor, which commanded the admiration and support of the wisest and best men in the city. He was secretary of the Hospital for the Ruptured and Crippled, and manager of the Presbyterian Hospital, Juvenile Asylum, and various charitable societies. He was an elder of the Madison Square Presbyterian Church, and abounded in works of piety and usefulness. He died in New York city, March 3, 1881. (W. P. S.)

Hartman, Johann Adolph, a learned German divine, was born at Münster in 1680. After being several years a Jesuit, he became a Protestant at Cassel in 1745, and was soon after made professor of philosophy and poetry. In 1722 he was appointed professor of history and rhetoric at Marburg, and died there in 1744.

Hartwell, Jesse (1), a Baptist minister, was born at Chelmsford, Mass., in March, 1781. He was continued at the age of sixteen, and ordained at Sandwich, Jan. 9, 1800. A large part of his life was spent in missionary work, under appointment from the Masachusetts Missionary Society. His tours extended beter New England to the Black River country, N. Y., and into different sections of Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Canada. He first went to Ohio in 1815, and is believed to have baptized by immersion the first convert in the Western Reserve. He died at Perry, O., Nov. 21, 1860.

Hartwell, Jesse (2), D.D., an eminent Baptist minister, was born at New Marlborough, Mass., in 1794. He graduated with high rank from Brown University in 1819; for two years thereafter was principal of the University, and was for a long time his theological studies.
He was ordained at Providence in 1821, and in 1823 went to South Carolina, and became an instructor in the Furman Theologiical Seminary, supplying vacant pulpits as opportunity presented.
He was called to a couple of churches in Alabama, and was an instructor in theology in what is known as Howard College, in that state. For several years he resided in Arkansas, where, as a preacher and teacher, he did good service. He became, in 1855, president of what was known as the Mt. Lebanon University, in Louisiana, and died there, Sept. 16, 1865. (J. C. S.)

Hase, a name for Etruscan soothsayers, who dirived future events from the inspection of the entrails of victims; an art afterwards introduced into Rome. See Aegypt. Divination.

Harvey, Sir George, a Scottish painter, was born at St. Ninian's, near Stirling, in February, 1606. He was educated in arts in the Trustees' Academy at Edinburgh, and in 1626 became an associate of the Scottish Academy; in 1629 was elected a fellow, and in 1646 became its president. He received the honor of knighthood in 1687, and died at Edinburgh, Jan. 22, 1676. His best pictures are those depicting historical episodes in religious history from a puritan or evangelical standpoint, such as Covenanters Preaching; Covenanters' Communion; John Bunyan and his Blind Daughter; Sabbath Evening; The Quitting of the Manse. He was also equally successful in subjects not directly religious. See Englebl. Brit. 9th ed. s. v.

Harvey, Joseph, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was a native of Connecticut. While pastor of the Church at Goshen, in that state, he became deeply interested in the conversion of the Sandwich Indians, and through his influence the first two missionaries to those islands, Messrs. Bingham and Thurston, were selected and ordained at Goshen, Sept. 29, 1813. Dr. Harvey died at Harvey, Mich., Feb. 4, 1873. See Presbyterian, March 1, 1873. (W. P. S.)

Hase, Theodor, a Reformed theologian, was born at Bremen, Nov. 30, 1682. He studied at Marburg, was in 1707 professor of sacred philosophy, and in 1708 preacher at Bremen, in 1723 professor of theology there, and died Feb. 25, 1731. He wrote, De Lexicon Jobi et Ceh Jona: — De evanegpti õxistia Christiana et Judaiæ oïais Objecta: — De Deo Imperatorio Tiberii quo Christiano Nuncius Summus. — Diss. v. de Baptismo Super Mortuis, de Agia Hierarchiâ sec per Eilias Conditis, de Templo Onias Heliopolitani, de Jesu Christo ad Dei, xxvii, 15, and contributed largely to the Bibliotheca Theol. Bremenis et Museum Philologico-Theologico. His dissertations were published at Bremen in 1718, and the Dissertations et Observationes Sacrorum Sylogos. See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 275, 279, 548; Jocher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 865. (B. P.)

Hasenfeld, Elias, a German Jew, who joined the Lutheran Church in 1587, is the author of Historia Jesuici Ordinis (Frankfort, 1688, and later, German tranal, by Melchior Leporcens, ibid. 1694). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 791; Jocher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Hassan, a Mohammedan teacher, was the eldest son of Ali, and the second of the twelve imams of that line. On the death of his father, in 661, he was immediately proclaimed caliph and imam in Irak; the latter or spiritual dignity he retained in reference to his followers. He was poisoned in 676 by a son of Moawiyah, as is supposed.

Hassell, Johann, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born in 1822. He studied at Breslaus, and was professor of exegesis at the Pelplin seminary. In 1859 he was appointed vicar-general of the Culin diocese, in 1863 became a member of the chapter, in 1867 cathedral provost, and died Sept. 8, 1868, at Hanau, on his return from the episcopal convention which had met at Fulda. (B. P.)

Hassell, Johann Gottfried, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Weimar in 1759. He studied at Jena, was in 1786 professor of Oriental languages at Köpenick, in 1788 professor of theology, and died April 12, 1806. He published, Liber Quarti Regum Syro-Alexandrini Specimen (Jena, 1789) — Saloom's Weisheit übersetzt mit Anmerkungen (ibid. 1784) — Idiognomon Dorica, etc. (ibid. eool) — Aussichten zu künftigen Aufklärungen über das Alte Testament (1785) — Das andere Buch der Maschobber neu übersetzt (1786) — Hebr. and soon after was appointed missionary to Burmah, where he arrived in February, 1886. He was in the employ of the American Baptist Missionary Union for more than forty years, during which time he visited the United States, first in 1849, remaining a little more than three years, and again in 1867, making a stay of about nine months. His first work was among the Peguans, or, as they are now called, the Talainos, into whose language he translated the New Testament, and issued from the press a number of tracts. He afterwards learned the Burmese, and was for a long time recognized as a missionary among that people. He died Sept. 13, 1876. See Amer. Bapt. Magazine, iv, 180. (J. C. S.)

Hatch, Frederick W., D.D., a Protestant Episcopalian minister, was ordained deacon in 1810, and presbyter in 1813, and had charge, successively, of the parishes in Edenton, N. C., and Frederick, Md., after which he removed to Virginia as rector of Fredericksville parish from 1820 to 1830. While there, Thomas Jefferson was his friend and parishioner. In 1832-1836 he officiated in Christ Church, Washington, D. C., and was chaplain to the United States Senate. In the latter year he removed to Poughkeepsie, N. Y.; in 1840 to Wisconsin, taking charge of the parishes in South, and Racine. In 1850 he went to St. Louis, Mo., in temporary charge of Christ and St. George’s churches; thence he travelled to California in June, 1856, laboring as a missionary in Marysville and other places. He died in Sacramento, Cal., Dec. 30, 1869, aged seventy-one years. Dr. Hatch was a fine linguist, and an indefatigable worker. See Amer. Quak. Church Rev., 1860, p. 180.

Hatik, in Norse mythology, was the son of the giant Gyge and the brother of Skoll; both are frightful wolves, and persecute the moon and the sun. At Ragnarok these monsters will succeed in devouring the heavenly lights. He probably symbolizes the moon.

Hatfield, Edwin Francis, D.D., an eminent Presbyterian minister, was born at Elizabethtown, N. J., Jan. 9, 1807. He graduated from Middle College College in 1829, spent two years at Andover Theological Seminary, was ordained pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church at St. Louis in 1832, in 1835 accepted a call from the Seventh Presbyterian Church, New York city, and remained its pastor for twenty-one years, enjoying a continuous season of revival, and receiving to its membership one thousand five hundred and fifty-six persons. A colony from this church, in 1866, organized a new church in the upstate part of the city. Dr. Hatfield became its pastor. He remained at this post until his health failed, and resigned in 1868. When he recovered his health he was appointed financial agent of the Union Theological Seminary, and afterwards acted as secretary of the Home Missionary Society. He died at Summit, N. J., Sept. 22, 1883. From 1846 he was stated clerk of the General Assembly, an office for which he was peculiarly fitted by his methodical habits and extensive acquaintance with the history of the Church. He was elected in 1883 moderator of the General Assembly, and performed the duties of that office with great ability. He prepared the year-book of the New York Observer during the time of its publication. Among his published works are, Universum as it Is (1841); Memoir of Ethel W. Balchun (1848); St. Helena and the Cotton Islands (1849); The History of Elizabeth, N. J. (1868); The Church Hymn-book, with Tunes (1872); The Chapel Hymn-book (1878). He spent much time and labor in preparing for publication the Minutes of the General Assembly. See N. Y. Observer, Sept. 27, 1863. (W. F. S.)

Hatfield, Thomas, an English prelate, was prebendary of Lincoln (1342) and York (1348), and was promoted to the see of Durham in 1345. He died near London, May 8, 1381. He was the principal benefactor, if not the founder, of the friary at Northallerton, in Yorkshire, for Carmelites, or White Friars. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Haug, Martin, a German Orientalist, was born Jan. 30, 1827, in Württemberg. He studied at Tubingen and Göttingen, and commenced his academic career at Bonn in 1844. In 1846 he went to Heidelberg, to assist Bunsen in his Bibelwerk. In 1859 he went to Isaiah of Samaria, returned to Germany in 1860, and accepted in 1868 a call to Munich as professor of Samaria. He died June 8, 1876, leaving, Die fünf Gebiete (Leipzig, 1858-80, 3 vols.): Essays on the Sacred Language, Writings, and Religion of the Parsees (Bombay, 1862); Über die Schriften und Sprache der zweiten Königreichsstattingen (Göttingen, 1853); Über die Pehlevi-sprache und den Buchdruck (1854); Essay on the Pahlavi Language (Stuttgart, 1870); The Book of Arda Vairav (Bombay and London, 1872-74). He edited and translated the Ararain Brahmanas of the Rigveda, his main work (Bombay, 1885, 2 vols.). Beside these, he published Über die überraschende Bedeutung des Werites Brāhma (Munich, 1868); Brāhma and the Brahmanas (1871). (B. P.)

Haul, in Norse mythology, is one of the rivers of hell, which spring from the antlers of the reindeer Éktherymns. Its new flows into the spring Hvergelmr, and forms all the rivers below.

Hanul de Vdranje, Gregor, cardinal and archbishop of Agram, was born April 28, 1787, at Tyrnau, in Hungary. He studied at his native place and at Graz, was in 1812 keeper of the archiepiscopal archives at Buda, in 1814 notary of the consistory, in 1825 dean, in 1832 great provost of Agram, and in 1857 bishop there. In 1848 he was ennobled and appointed first archbishop. In 1856 he was made cardinal, and died May 11, 1869. His pastoral letters are published under the title, Selectiones Exegeticae Literae et Dicionae Sacrae (Vienna, 1850-58, 3 vols.); besides he wrote Die Auto- uolaci, als Principe der Ordnung und des Wehrgelœrens in Kirche, Staat und Familie (1868). (B. P.)

Haundl, Christoph, a German Jesuit and "profectus studiorum" at Ingolstadt, was born at Altenheim, in Bavaria, in 1810, and died in 1869. He wrote, Definitio pro Juslibilitate Ecclesiae Romanae: —Institutiones Theologiae: —Cursus Theologicae S. Theologiae Speculativae Libri IV: —Controversiae de Justitia et Iure Privatario, etc. See Alemagbe, Bibliotheca Scriptorum Societatis Jesu; Winer, Handbuch der theolog. was forced to seek shelter in foreign countries. He first emigrated to Switzerland, and afterwards to Coblenz in 1722. The family Koen Kaski engaged him for their principal agent, upon which he left, but refused to direct all his attention. He returned to France in 1818, and became almoner to the prince of Angoulême, and after that bishop of Cahors in 1828. Being weakened by age and infirmities, he had to resign in 1842, and retired to his family at Toulouse. He died in December, 1849. See Hoefer, Nova, Biog. Cèdrait., s. v.

Haevecker, Johann Heinrich, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born in 1640. He studied at Helmstadt and Wittenberg, was in 1665 rector, in 1681 deacon, in 1683 pastor, and died in 1722, leaving: De Vida et Actu Atticorum Scriptorum (Wittenberg, 1683): — De Mundi Oris et Interitis (1684): — Morges- und Abend-Seyfer (1689). He also continued and edited some works of his father-in-law, Scriver (q. v.). See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexicon, s. v. (B. P.)

Haven, Erastus Otis, D.D., LL.D., a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Boston, Mass., Nov. 1, 1820, being a descendant of Richard Haven, of Puritan stock, who emigrated from the west of England, and settled in the town of Lynn, Massachusetts Bay Colony, about the year 1640. He graduated from the Wesleyan University in 1842, immediately took charge of a private academy in Sudbury, and thence went to Amenia Seminary, filling first the position of teacher of natural science, and afterwards becoming principal of the institution. In 1848 he entered upon the work of the ministry in the New York Conference, and occupied the following positions: Twenty-fourth Street (now Thirteenth Street) Church, New York city, 1848 and 1849; Red Hook Mission, N. Y., 1849; 102 Mulberry Street (now Third Avenue) Church, New York city, 1852. In 1858 he was elected professor of Latin in the University of Michigan, and the next year was made professor of English language, literature, and history. In 1856 he was elected editor of Zion's Herald, Boston, and filled the position with eminent acccomplishments. In seven years, following he was a member of the Senate of the State of Massachusetts; from 1858 to 1863 of the state board of education, and of the board of overseers of Harvard University. In the latter year he was elected president of the University of Michigan, filling that position till 1869, when he accepted the office of president of the University. Here he remained till the General Conference of 1872 elected him corresponding secretary of the Education Society. In 1874 he was called to the chancellorship of the new university at Syracuse. In 1889 he was a bishop, and was engaged in the duties of that office at the time of his death, which occurred at Salem, Oregon, Aug. 2, 1881. Although a fine preacher and a graceful speaker, he attained chief prominence among the Methodists of America for his sound scholarship, and his manifold interest in the cause of education. His principal published works are, The Young Man Advised (1855): — The Pillars of Truth (1866): — and a Rhetoric (1869). He contributed largely to the periodicals of the Church, and, as editor of one of the Church papers, took no small part in the discussion of many important denominational questions.

Haven, Gilbert, a bishop of the Methodist Episcopalian Church, cousin of the foregoing, was born at Malden, Mass., Sept. 19, 1821. His father, Gilbert Haven, Esq., was one of the pioneer Methodists of that section of the country. He received, however, a well-directed education, engaged in business, and early manifested such capacity as to have the most flattering offers of business connections; but feeling an ardent desire for a higher education, refused them all, prepared for college at Wesleyan University, Wilbraham, and graduated in 1838, and in 1846 graduated at Wesleyan University, Middletown, Conn. He was immediately employed as teacher of ancient languages at Amenia Seminary, Dutchess County, N. Y., and in 1848 was elected principal of the institution. In 1851 he joined the New England Conference, to which he served two years each at Northampton, Wilbraham, Westfield, Roxbury, and Cambridge. At the opening of the rebellion Mr. Haven was commissioned as chaplain of the Eighth Regiment of Massachusetts volunteers, served his time out (three months), then spent a year in extensive travel in Europe and Palestine, and as a result wrote and published his book on Great Britain and Western Europe, entitled The Pilgrim's Wallet. On his return he resumed the active ministry, and was stationed at North Russell Street, Boston, where, through his advice and influence, a church was purchased. In 1871 to 1877 he was editor of Zion's Herald, in 1888 and 1877 was a delegate to the General Conference, and by the latter was elected to the bishopric, May 24, 1872. In this office he devoted himself earnestly to its arduous labors, and with no conspicuous in the benevolent enterprises of the Church. He visited Mexico in 1878, and Africa in 1876 and 1877. His death at the home of his nativity, Jan. 8, 1880, was remarkably triumphant. Bishop Haven had a very extensive knowledge of books and men, a retentive and ready memory, a wonderful control of personal relations, and great popularity among his personal acquaintance. He was noted for his ardent interest in reformatory enterprises, his radical opposition to slavery, and his advocacy of political and social equality. His boldly enunciated views on these subjects gave him great reputation almost wherever the English language is spoken. He was equal to his faithfulness and the central doctrines of evangelical religion. He was a careful, successful pastor; a preacher of great simplicity, fluency, and power; and a vigorous and facile writer. Several of his publications are as follows: — Life of Father Taylor, the Sailor's Preacher: — Our Next-door Neighbor; or, A Winter in Mexico. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1880, i, 92; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.; Daniels, Memorials (Boston, 1869).

Haven, Joseph D.D., LL.D., a Congregational minister, was born at North Dennis, Mass., Jan. 4, 1816. He graduated from Amherst College in 1838, spent one year in the Union Theological Seminary, and graduated from Andover Theological Seminary in 1839. He was ordained Nov. 6 of the same year pastor of the Ashland Congregational Church, Unionville, where he remained seven years, was pastor of the Brookline Church four years, and was then appointed professor of moral and intellectual philosophy in Amherst College. After occupying this post for eight years he was called to a professorship in the Chicago Theological Seminary, which he occupied until his death, May 25, 1874. He is the author of a work entitled Moral Philosophy, including the Intellect, Sensibilities, and the Will (Boston, 1858, 12mo). (W. P. S.)

Haven, Samuel, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born in Framingham, Mass., Aug. 4, 1727 (O. S.). After graduating in 1749 from Harvard College, he was instructed in theology by Rev. Ebenezer Parkman. He was ordained, May 6, 1752, pastor of the First Church in Portmouth, where he ministered until his death, March 3, 1806. Possessing unusual powers of oratory, he attained an extensive popularity. Although poor himself, he ministered to the destitute with a profuse liberality, especially during the Revolutionary struggle. As a means of usefulness he studied medicine, and practiced gratuitously among the poor. After 1790 he only preached occasionally, and in the last year of his life he was incapable of performing the duties of his office. On account of his unusual pulpit talents, his friends likened him to Whitefield. His printed sermons are numerous. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, 4, 485.

Haven, Thomas, D.D., a Unitarian minister, was born at Wrentham, Mass., in 1748. He graduated at Harvard College in 1765, was ordained pastor of the Congregational Church in Reading, Nov. 7, 1770, and died May 7, 1792. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vii, 133.

Haverkamp, Siegfried, a Dutch scholar, was born in 1895. He was first preacher in a small village, but was called to Leyden as professor of history and Greek, and died April 25, 1742. He published, S. Fl. Tertulliani Apologeticus, etc. (Leyden, 1718);—Josephis Opera Omnia, etc. (Amsterdam, 1738, 2 vols. fol.);—Abduccius Huiusque Temporis, etc., (Leyden, 1740). See Winet, Handbuch der theol. Lit., I, 102, 131, 156, 584, 912, 913; First, Bibli. Jud. i, 866; Jöcher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Havestadt, Bernhard, a German missionary, was born at Cologne in 1715. He entered the society of the Jesuits, and devoted himself to preaching. In 1746 he was required to consecrate his missions of Chili. He started from Horta mar, in Westphalia, sailed from Antwerp to Lisbon, and arrived two months afterwards at Rio Janeiro, thence crossed the pampas and Andes to Chili, and reached Santiago, the capital of Chili, after a wearisome journey of fifty-five days. He spent five years at Concepcion, thoroughly exploring the country. Having a very good knowledge of the Chilidugu dialect, he was enabled to make some few converts among the Indians. On the abolition of the Jesuit order in the Spanish states, Havestadt was arrested, June 29, 1756, and conducted to Lima, whence, by way of Panama, he returned to Europe. He died at Münster after 1778, where his Observations appeared (1751-77). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biogr. Générale, s. v.

Hawaiian Version of the Scriptures. The Hawaiian is a dialect of the Polynesian language, spoken in the Sandwich Islands. When missionaries landed on the island of Hawaii, in 1820, they were a rude, illiterate people, whose language had never been reduced to writing. It was theirs to catch the fleeting sounds and give them permanent form on the printed page, and so energetically did they pursue their work, that before two years had elapsed they had begun printing in Hawaiian. To express the proper sounds of the language five vowels and seven consonants sufficed, but nine additional consonants were employed to give expression to the foreign and Bible names with which the Hawaiians would need to become acquainted. In 1820 a small edition of the New Testament was prepared for press, and in 1822 a small edition of the four gospels was printed at Rochester, N. Y., at the expense of the American Board and the American Bible Society. The entire New Testament was published at Honolulu in 1823, and a second edition was published in 1830. Portions of the Old Testament were also put to press from time to time, and the complete Hawaiian Bible appeared in 1839, only nineteen years after the arrival of the pioneer missionaries. Six years later it was estimated by Rev. Hiram Bingham, one of the translators, that twenty thousand Bibles and thirty thousand New Testaments had been issued, besides many thousand detached portions, and that the American Bible Society had contributed $42,420 towards this result. A bilingual Hawaiian and English New Testament was also prepared in 1867 by the American Bible Society, and of this more than ten thousand copies have been issued. See Bible of Every Land, p. 375. Hawkins, Edward, D.D., an Anglican divine, was born in Somersetshire, England, in 1789. He was educated at the University of Oxford. He was a member of the University of Oxford with distinguished ability. In 1828 he was appointed provost of Oriel College, to which office a canonry in Rochester Cathedral and the rectory of Purleigh are annexed. He came in contact with that Catholic movement of which Oriel College is the recognized centre, and its fellows, John Henry Newman and Edward Bouverie Pusey, the leaders. He was opposed to the movement. His own position on theological questions was in the ranks of the liberal or "Broad" Church. Dr. Hawkins was Bampton lecturer in 1840. He edited Milton's Poetical Works, with Notes, published a volume of Discourses on the History and Antiquities of the Old Testament, which was from 1847 to 1861 Ireland professor of exegesis in the university. He died at Oxford, Nov. 20, 1882. (W. P. S.)

Hawthorne, James, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Slatabon, Burlington Co., N. J., April 1, 1803, and in early life removed to Kentucky. He was educated with Rev. A. Smith, of Shelbyville, graduated from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1828, was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, Feb. 6, of that year; and Nov. 21, 1829, was ordained over the churches of Lawrenceburg and Upper Ben- son, in Franklin County, Ky., where he remained till April 4, 1838, after which he preached for various churches as a supply for three years. He was installed pastor of Plum Creek and Cane Run churches in Shelby County, Dec. 29, 1838; dismissed April 23, 1841, after which he supplied the Lawrenceburg Church about five years, and the Church at Princeton, Ky., for one year as a stated supply, and April 9, 1848, was installed as pastor there. For nearly thirty years he performed the duties of this pastorate with great earnestness and faithfulness. He was a man of spotless integrity, of a loving disposition, cultivated in mind, Christianlike in spirit. His long lines over rough roads in inclement seasons, while supplying weak congregations, had injured his health and laid the foundation for weakness in his later years. He died June 28, 1877. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem., 1878, p. 16. (W. P. S.)

Hawtrey, Edward Craven, D.D., an English divine, was born at Bornham, Bucks, May 7, 1763. He was educated at Eton College, Cambridge, in 1807, and in 1807 years later became a fellow of that college. In 1814 he was made assistant master of Eton College, in 1834 was appointed head master, and in 1855 was elected provost, which office he filled till his death. Dr. Hawtrey, as a member of the Roxburgh Club, was well known in literary circles, and his intimate acquaintance with books enabled him to collect a library of great value. He was an accomplished scholar in the French, German, and Italian languages. His It Trifoglio contains translations of the New Testament, with a New Greek, Italian, and German; the versions are from French and English into Greek—from Latin, English, and German into Italian—and from English into German, all executed with surprising accuracy. His administration at Eton gave evidence of superior wisdom and judgment, vastly advancing the college in classical pre-eminence. See Appleton's Annual Cyclopaedia, 1862, p. 683.

Hay, George, D.D., a Scotch Roman Catholic prelate, was born in the parental house at Edinburgh, Aug. 24, 1729. He was destined for the medical profession, but in the midst of his studies he was sum- moned to join the Highland army as surgeon, in 1745. After prince Charles's defeat, he was kept three months in Edinburgh Castle, and then detained prisoner a year in London. But by the act of the legislature he was set free. He was received into the Roman Catholic Church, Dec. 21, 1745, by father John Seton, S. J., of Garleton, who was on a mission to Edinburgh. On Sept. 10, 1754, he entered the Scotch College at Rome, where he completed his ecclesiastical studies and was ordained a priest. He returned to Scotland in 1759, was sent into Banffshire, where he labored for eight years. In 1769 he was made coadjutor to bishop Grant, vicar-apostolic of Scotland. In 1771 he appeared as an author, and began that series of doctrinal, moral, and devotional works which is still popular. In 1798 he received a second coadjutor in bishop Cameron, to replace bishop Geddes, deceased. A few years after- wards, feeling his end approach, he retired to the Seminary of Aquhorthies, and devoted his remaining days to devotion. He died Oct. 18, 1811. See (N. Y.) Cyclopedia Annual, 1880, p. 75.

Hay, Philip Courtland, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Newark, N. J., July 25, 1738. He was educated at Princeton and Nassau colleges; was licensed by the New Jersey Presbytery, at Paterson, in 1800, and became pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Mendenhall. Subsequently he was called to the Second Presbyterian Church of Newark, where he labored faithfully for twelve years. He died Dec. 27, 1860. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1862, p. 165.

Hay, William, D.D., a Scotch prelate, was born Feb. 17, 1647, and was educated at Aberdeen. He re- ceived the orders from Nick Spongall, and was first settled as minister at Kilconquhar, in Fife; from here he was removed to Perth, and afterwards consecrated bishop of Moray in 1688. He died at Castlehill, near Inverness, March 17, 1707. See Keith, Scottish Biog- raphy, p. 150.

Hayes, Nathaniel, D.D., a distinguished Eng- lish Baptist minister, was born near Exeter, Feb. 14, 1821. He pursued his studies at Stepmere College, at Edinburgh, and Glasgow; was settled first at Saffron, then at Broadmead Chapel, Bristol, where he remained eighteen years, during which time he attained to emi- nence among the ministers, and was distinguished for his denuncia- tion in England. Resigning his pastorate in Bristol, he accepted a call to Leicester, and died Feb. 16, 1873. See (Lond.) Baptist Manual-book, 1874, p. 274.

Hayes, Jean de la, a French Franciscan, was born at Paris, March 29, 1858. He was professor of philo- sphy and theology, court-preacher to queen Anne of Austria, and died Oct. 15, 1661. He edited the Biblia Magna (Paris, 1643, 5 vols.);—Biblia Maxima (1660, 19 vols.);—wrote Comment. in Genesis (3 vols. fol.)— Apparatus Ecclesiasticus:—Comment. in Apocalypsin. See Watten, Ducrot Biographie; Winer, Handbuch der thot. Lit. i. 186; Jocher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lezion- kum, s. v. (B. P.)

Hayer, Jean Nicolas Hubert, a French theolo- gist, was born at Sarrelouis, June 15, 1708. He taught theology and philosophy among the Recollets, and showed himself one of the strongest defenders of the Church in his time. He died at Paris, July 16, 1780, leaving, La Spiritualité et l'Immortalité de l'Âme (Paris, 1758)— Le Regle de la Foie Végée (ibid. 1761)—L'Apotropoïése du Ministère de l'Église Romaine (ibid. 1765):—Traité de l'Existence de Dieu (ibid. 1774)—La Charte de l'Université (1780). See Hoefer, Nouv. Dict. Géné- ral, s. v.

Haymann, Christoph (1), a Lutheran theo- lologist of Germany, was born Oct. 15, 1677, at Reichen- bach, Saxony. He studied at Leipzig, and died in 1751. His accession in the years are enumerated in Jocher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexicon, s. v. (B. P.)

Hayman, Christoph (2), a son of the above, was born Aug. 15, 1709. He died at Meissen in 1748, doctor and professor of theology, and superintendent, leaving, Comm. de simplic. (1746):—Versuch einer bib- lischen Theologie in Tabellen (ed. 1748):—Litterae Encyclo- pediae (1748). See Munzel, Gelehrtes Deutschland; Jocher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lezionkum, s. v. (B. P.)

Haymo of Feyversham, an ecclesiastical of the 13th century, was born at Feyversham, Kent, studied at the University of Paris, where Leland says he was "inter Aristotelice Aristotelissimus," became a Franciscan, served at the Church of St. Denis, and on his return to England was made provincial of his order. His eminence in counsel led to his call to Rome, where he was chosen general of the Franciscans. Pits entitles him "specul- um honestatis," yet Bate makes him an inquisitor and executor inquisitor, and at the command of pope Alexander IV he corrected and emended the Roman brevi- ary. He died at Anagni, Italy, where the pope in per- son came to visit him, in 1260. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), ii, 190.

Haymo of Hythe, an English prelate, was born at Hythe, Kent, and made bishop of Rochester in the twelfth century. His reign, to Edward I. his successor, was a short and obscure. In his native town he founded a hospital, and enlarged the episcopal palace. In his old age he resigned his bishopric, lived on his own estate, and died about 1255. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), ii, 185.

Haynes, J. A., D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in King's Queen County, Va., Dec. 13, 1822. He graduated from Columbian University, Washington, D.C., in 1848, was principal of Brington Academy for a year, and then entered upon a course of medical study, receiving his degree from the Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia, in 1848. Reverting his practice, he entered the Christian ministry, being licensed in 1858, and ordained in 1857. For a time he labored under the auspices of the State Mission Board, and then accepted an appointment as principal of the Clarke Female Seminary, at Danville, Va. Subsequently he was pastor of two or three churches in Virginia, a part of the time being engaged in teaching. He died in January, 1880. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclopedia, s. v. (J. C. S.)

Haynes, Samuel, D.D., an English clergyman, was educated at King's College, Cambridge, and was tutor to the earl of Salisbury, with whom he travelled, and who in 1737 presented him to the rectory of Hat- field, in Hertfordshire. In May, 1747, he was presented to the rectory of Cloothal. He died June 9, 1762. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. p. 270; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Hazar-gaddah. Tristram (Bible Places, p. 20) coincides in the location "at Jarroh or el-Ghufram", a group of ruins on a high murli peak with steep sides, very near el-Mib, on the road to Beersheba," and so Lieut. Conder (Quar. Statement of the "Pal. Explor. Fund," Jan. 1875, p. 25). But more recently the latter suggests (Test Work, ii, 337) Judeidah, the position of which he does not indicate.

Hazar-shual. The location of this place at Sues is acquiesced in by Tristram (Bible Places, p. 21), Lieut. Conder (Quar. Statement of the "Pal. Explor. Fund," Jan. 1875, p. 21), but not by the latter finally.

Test Work, ii, 337), nor by Trellawney Saunders (Map of the O. T.), who with less probability locates Jesus (Neh. xii, 26) there. It is laid down on the Ordnance Map as Khorbet Sareek, four and a half miles north-west of Tell-Milh, and described in the accompanying Memoirs (iii, 409) as "a prominent hill-top, crowned with ruins, consisting of foundations and heaps of stones. The hill is surmounted by a wall built of large blocks of flint conglomerate. Other ruins of a similar kind exist in the valley beneath."

Haselius, Ernest L., D.D., a Lutheran professor, was born at Neumark, province of Silesia, Prussia, Sept. 6, 1777. He was educated at his native place, Kleinweite, and Barby, studying theology at Neisny in a Moravian institution, and was licensed to preach by the authorities of that Church. In 1800 he was appointed teacher of the classics in the Moravian Seminary at Nazareth, Pa., where he remained eight years, having during that period been appointed head teacher and professor of theology in the theological department. Joining the Lutheran Church, he taught, in 1809, a private classical school, and then became pastor of the united congregations of New Germantown, German Valley, and Spruce Run; also conducting a classical school at New Germantown. In 1815 the Hartwick Seminary went into operation, and he was appointed professor of Christian theology and principal of the classical department. For fifteen years he served this institution, acting also as pastor of the village church. In 1880 he became professor of Oriental and Biblical literature and German language in the Theological Seminary at Gettysburg, but resigned in 1883 to take charge of the Theological Seminary of the synod of South Carolina, holding that position from Jan. 1, 1884, until his death, Feb. 20, 1838. Among his published writings are, Life of Luther; Life of Stilling; Augsburg Confessions, with Notes and Appendices; Materials for Catechization on Passages of Scripture; History of the Church in America. For some time he was editor of the Evangelical Magazine, published at Gettysburg. He was a most accurate classical scholar, and a very successful teacher. See Pennsylvania College Book, 1882, p. 157.

Hazar. Of the places thus simply designated, the latest authority among the makers of the following identifications: 1. Hazor of Naphthali (Josh. xi, 10, 11, 12; xii, 19; 1 Sam. iv, 7) is identified by Guérin (in Smith's Atlas) with Tell Hauran, south-east of Kedesh, and by Trellawney Saunders (Map of the O. T.) with Khorbet Harrak (evidently the same locality), which is set down in the Ordnance Map on the one hand and four miles north-west of Lake Huleh, and described in the accompanying Memoirs (i, 237) as "an important ruin on a hill-top. There are considerable remains of walls of good-sized masonry and foundations, with caves, and two rock-cut tombs, with loculi. A few stones are moulded, probably door-posts or architraves. There are a number of cisterns. The principal remains are on the top and the eastern slope of the hill. A zigzag path way formerly led down to the great spring of 'Ain el-Meliheh." This is the location proposed by Wilson and advocated by Guérin. Lieut. Couch, on the other hand, suggests (Test Work, ii, 337) Hadireh, which occurs in a Jebel and Meraj of that name, one and a half miles west of el-Khureibe (Robinson's site for Hazor), lying two and a half miles south of Kedesh, and three and a half west of Lake Huleh. Two, or both, seem to distinguish two Hazor in the above passages, and they locate the second on Hazor, a rock-cut tomb in Khorbet Hassiich (ten miles west of Kedesh), where are "foundations of walls, built with large, well-dressed stones, a few small columns and broken pieces mixed up with the ruins; eight rock-cut cisterns, one rock-cut birkeh [pool], and two rock-cut tombs" (Memoirs, i, 239; comp. p. 228). They seem, moreover, to identify this with En-Hazor (q. v.), although there is no spring there now, there was at 'Ain el-Meliheh, where Saunders locates the latter. This last, according places Edrei at Hazarah, but it should rather be identified with Khureibeih, and Hazzir and Hasshir will thus be left to represent a single Hazor, as the names respectively indicate. En-Hazor may then be appropriately assigned separately to Khor- bet Hassiich, half a mile north-west of a hill of the same name, and consisting of "heaps of stones and cisterns" (Memoirs, i, 596), laid down five miles north-west of Yakh, with several springs in the vicinity ('Ain el-Tabih, one and a half miles west, sufficiently copious to supply the rivers (Glub) and 'Ain el-Manther and 'Ain el-Diah, one mile south). But the specific point of Khorbet Hassiich does not accurately locate on the Ordnance Map, although several travellers speak of it here, and Tristram says (Bible Places, p. 278) "This is the only Ain-Hazor."

2. Hazor of Benjamin after the Captivity (Neh. xii, 88) is identified by Grove with Yarash, near Ashdod, which is out of the region indicated. It has usually been made the same with Baal-Hazor (q. v.), which Conder and Saunders reasonably locate at Tell Aser, four and a half miles north-east of Beitin (Bethl), as "a sacred place, an ancient baalim, which has indeed existed. There is a group of fine oaks on the hill-top, sacred, apparently, to a certain Sheik Haderah (the proper Arabic form of Hazor). The Hjil el-Assawir, or 'Men of Asur,' said to be companions of the Prophet, are supposed by the Moslems to have to appear as a probable survival of the ancient cultus of Baal on this lofty summit. Here Guérin found ancient cisterns cut in the rock, and vaulted houses still standing. In the middle of the plateau was a wely, dedicated to sheik Hassan, on the site of an old church, now destroyed, of which some ruins remain, especially four fragments of columns lying on great slabs which were once the pavement of the church; besides these a capital, on which was formerly sculptured a cross of square form" (Memoirs, ii, 371).

Lieut. Conder, however, suggests a separate location from this for the Hazor of the post-exilic history at Hazor (Test Work, i, 119), one mile east of Nely Samwil; a ruined site (Memoirs, iii, 43), four miles north-west of Jerusalem, with tombs, cisterns, and springs (Ain Malalah) adjoining.

3. Hazor of Judah (Josh. xv, 23) is combined by Saunders with the name following (contrary to the Heb. text, which has κατακληματίσσονται between) into the compound Hazor-Itnah, and located at en-Horo, which lies down a short distance south-east of Beersheba.

Hazor-Hadattah (Josh. xv, 25) is identified by Tristram (Bible Places, p. 18) with the ruins called Hadodah, a watch-tower on the edge of a bluff on the high ground at the head of the Zeweeval valley, south-west of the Dead Sea. This point is beyond the bounds of the Ordnance Map, but is situated in the same direction as the el-Hadira, with which we have identified the place, and where Saunders locates an imaginary Haven-Kinah (adopting the suggestion of Tristram, Bible Places, p. 16) and also Jugar (q. v.). See JUH.

Hea. One of the most important of all the Assyrian gods, as he combines in his numerous titles the attributes of several classic deities. His Accadian name was Eaniku, or the "Lord of the World" (earth), and his Assyrian name read phonetically Ea or Hea. He unites in his offices the attributes of Pluto (Hades of Poseidon (Neptune), and of Hermes (Wisdom). Hea, as the representative of the Greek Poseidon, was "Lord of the Abyss," sar abas, and was spoken of as Hea "who dwells in the great deep." In a list of his titles he is called "Lord of the Mudhuk," Glub (Wadi el-Mudhak) and it was Hea who taught Hasd Arda how to build the ark or ship (elapu) in which he sailed over the flood. In this character of the god of water and ocean he was associaed with a female deity, Baah, the “Vold,” who may be identified with the body of Genesis i. 2. Hea held dominion over a large number of spirits who dwelt in the abu, or the deep. In the character of the Greek Pluto, or lord of Hades, Hea himself seldom figured, but his consort, Nin-ki-gal, the “Lady of the Great Land,” appears very frequently. Hea, as lord of Hades, had the name of Nin-a-uzu, and his wife was called Nin-ki-gal. But it was in the character of the god of wisdom, the “god who knows all things,” that Hea figured most prominently, Nin-ni-ma-ki, “Lord of Wisdom,” or, as the Accadian expressed it, the “Lord of the Bright Eye.” It was Hea alone who could deliver man from the various spells and curses with which the complicated system of Chaldean magic beset him. He also delivered Ishtar from the power of Nin-ki-gal, in the legend of her descent into Hades. Hea had for his female consort, in his character of “Lord of Wisdom,” the goddess Dav-kina, the female deification of the earth, who was probably only another form of Nin-ki-gal, and resembles the classic Persephone or Proserpine; though perhaps Nin-ki-gal and Dav-kina may be better identified with Persephone and Ceres (Demeter), the “Mother and Daughter” of the Greeks.

HEACOCK, GROSVENOR WILLIAMS, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Buffalo, N. Y., Aug. 8, 1822. He graduated from Western Reserve College in 1840, and from the Auburn Theological Seminary in 1848; was appointed pastor of the Presbyterican Church in the native city, Oct. 20, 1845, and retained that position until his death, May 6, 1877.

Headstone, a monument placed at the head of a grave, as a memorial of the departed. Anciently, the cross in some form or other was invariably used, either simply, with floriated ends, within a circle, or in some other obvious form. During the 15th century the cruciform shape was displaced by other forms less Christian, neither artistic nor ornamental.

Healing. Touching, i.e. stroking the patient's face with both hands, to remove the scrofula, significantly called the king's evil, was practiced by the kings of France as early as Clovis or Philip I, kings of Hungary, and English sovereigns, from Edward the Confessor to queen Anne, who touched Dr. Johnson. Bradwardine says that crowds resorted to the kings of England, France, and Germany. Solemn prayer and the sign of the cross, first laid aside by James I, were used. Henry II and Edward I practiced the touch. The ceremonial took place on a progress, on Good Friday, monthly, quarterly, or at Michaelmas, Easter, and Whitsunday, and in 1680 from All-Saints' till a week before Christ- mas, and from Christmas till March I. The first form of service was drawn up in the reign of Henry VII. The gospel (Mark xvi, 14) was read while the king laid on his hands, and during another (John i, 1), as the words “the light,” an angel, noble, or medal with St. Michael stamped on it was attached by a white ribbon round the neck of the patient, who had to produce a certificate of his malady, signed by the parish priest and churchwardens, and was examined by the king's surgeon-in-waiting. The faculty of healing was popu- larly attributed also to the ninth son of a ninth son, or the servant of the servant of the king.

Healing-box, used for holding the chrism in extreme unction.

Healing-coin, a piece of money anciently given by kings to those persons who were "touched" for the cure of the king's evil. The coin was pierced and worn round the neck with a string or ribbon.

Healing-oil, the sacred unction, made of oil of olives and balm, for use in the sacrament of extreme unction.

Healing-pxx, the box containing the sacred oil for anointing the sick. See Pxx.

Healing was the Word of God is an ordinance of divine appointment (Rom. xii, 17; Prov. viii, 4, 5; Mark iv, 24). Public reading of the Scriptures was a part of synagogue worship (Acts xiiii, 15, 21), and was the practice of the Christians in primitive times. Under the former dispensation there was a public hearing of the law at stated seasons (Deut. xxxi, 10, 12; Neh. vii, 3, 5). It seems, therefore, that it is a duty incumbent on us to hear, and, if sensible of our ignorance, we shall also consider it our privilege. (1) As to the manner of hearing, it should be carefully (Prov. viii, 34; James i, 24, 25); attentively (Luke xxi, 40; Acts x, 38); with respect (Rom. x, 20, 22); with reverence (Ps. lxxix, 7); with faith (Heb. iv, 2); with an endeavor to retain what we hear (Heb. i, 1; Ps. cxix, 11); with an humble, docile disposition (Luke x, 42); with prayer (Luke xviiii). (2) The advantages of hearing are information (2 Tim. iii, 16); correction (1 Cor. xiv, 24, 39; Acts ii); conversation (Ps. ix, 7); Acts iv, 4); confirmation (Acts xiv, 22, xvi, 5); consolation (Phil. i, 30; Isa. xi, 1, 2; xxxv, 3, 4). See Preaching.

Heart-burial. The heart was often buried apart from the body in the place it loved well in life, as Del- vorigilla founded Sweet Heart Abbey in memory of the heart-burial of her husband. Richard II's heart was buried at Rouen. Robert Bruce desired his heart to be taken to the Holy Land in lieu of his pilgrimage, and lord James Douglas carried it round his neck in a silver case, hung by a silken cord. He threw it forward in advance of his men at the great battle of Salano, and covered it with his body.

Heath, NICHOLAS, an English prelate, was born in London, and educated at Christ College, Cambridge. He became successively archdeacon of Stafford, bishop of Rochester (1540), of Worcester (1554), archbishop of York (1556), and chancellor of England under the reign of Mary. He was deprived of his offices because he refused to take the oath of supremacy under Elizabeth, and died at Cobham in 1560. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Hebdomadaril, a name ancienly applied to monks from their weekly service.

Hebdummas Magna (the great week), an appellation given ancienly to the week before Easter, which was observed with great solemnity. The use of this term is thus accounted for by Chrysostom. "It was called the great week, not because it consisted of longer days or more in number than other weeks, but because at this time great things were wrought for us by our Lord. For in this week the ancient tyranny of the devil was dissolved, death was extinct, the strong man was bound, his goods were spoiled, sin was abashed, the curse was destroyed, paradise was opened, heaven became accessible, men and angels were joined together, the middle wall of partition was broken down, the barriers were taken out of the way, the God of peace made peace between things in heaven and things on Hebenstreit, Johann Paul, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born June 29, 1664, at Neustadt-on-the-Oria. He studied at Jena, where he also commenced his theological career. In 1697 the university at Altdorf honored him with the doctorate of divinity, and in 1710 he was professor of theology at Jena. Hebrew Language. The central position which this “sacred tongue” occupies in Biblical literature justifies us in supplementing the article in vol. iv by a somewhat detailed exposition of some of its leading lexical and grammatical peculiarities, and in doing so we take the occasion to call attention to some features of testimonial and poetic principles not usually apprehended. These illustrate the natural simplicity no less than the profound philosophy of the language.

1. Root Meanings.—It has generally been assumed that verbs are the only primitives in Hebrew, and hence the lexicons have constantly referred all words to some verbal root. But it seems more reasonable to analogize and more consonant with fact to admit a few primitive nouns, such as אֶבֶר, father; דָּוִד, brother; יִשְׂרָאֵל, water, etc. Accordingly we find יִישָׁר, scarcely used, except in Hiph. as a denominative from יִשָּׂר, hand, in the sense of stretching out the hand, e.g. in prayer or praise.

2. A more important fact, admitted by most lexicographers, and denied by late only by a few scholars, is that all the roots primarily seem to designate some physical act or condition, appreciable by the senses. This may be true of other languages, in the primitive forms, but it is eminently characteristic of the Hebrew. Not only were the forms based on it a foundation for poetic race, affected by and reflecting every shadow of the imagination, but their originally nomadic habits made them keenly sensitive to every accident and influence of Bedawin life. They had specific terms for pitching and striking their tents (יֵשָׁר and יָשָׁר respectively), for turning out of the road to stop at a house (יִישָׁר), and lodging over night (יִישָׁר), etc. They were on the constant lookout for an enemy (יִישָׁר), and they had a term for one of a hostile tribe (שָׁפָר) as opposed to יִישָׁר, in distinction from personal enmity (יָשָׁר) or individual opposition (יִישָׁר). The nice shades of climatic signification which are very imperfectly developed even in the best Hebrew lexicons, are shown with graphic clearness in terms for anger: יָשָׁר, to breathe hard with the first excitement; יִישָׁר, to glow with the rising passion; יָשָׁר, the flush of the hot blood; יָשָׁר, to froth with intense fury, etc. Attention to the ostensible sign of a root will enable us to note the steps of transition from a primitive to a derivative signification: e.g. יָשָׁר, to matter to one’s self in a brown study: hence to murmur in grudge, or meditate with pleasure. The constant usage of terms in a figurative sense, with an eye to their literal import, makes every word and phrase a picture, and renders even the proudest utterances highly poetical.

3. Hebrew synonyms, as thus appears, have received less attention than they deserve. The lexicographers, especially Gesenius, have occasionally traced distinctions in the use of words, and have freely compared many cognate roots, resolving most of them to certain supposed essential ideas, but this last has helped very little towards a practical discrimination of their real meaning and prevalent application, and not in general system of comparing verbs closely resembling each other has been instituted. Yet it is certain that in Hebrew, as in all other primitive languages, real synonyms are very rare, and in no other tongue, perhaps, are terms more distinctively employed, especially in the physical relations of life, however vaguely they may often have to be construed in their figurative and metaphorical applications. For example, the words relating to the senses are nicely correlated to each other, and finely shaded off in comparative strength. Thus רָעִים is to hear simply, the sound entering one's ears whether he will or not. But רָעִים is to pay attention to what is heard, as by look or gesture; hence to answer, as expected of one giving heed to another; and finally to speak, i.e. to reply to words or thoughts merely implied. Still advancing, רָעִים, a derivative from רָעִים, the ear (probably a primitive, for the root רָעִים does not occur), is to give ear, i.e. turn the ear in the direction of the sound, or listen, but not very intently. Finally, רָעִים is to prick up the ear, i.e. use the hand for increasing the volume of sound, or hearken earnestly. So likewise רָעִים is to see simply, without any special effort, idem; but רָעִים is to behold, or gaze intent, at some striking object, as in a vision, דָּבָר or שָׁמַע; and רָעִים is to look at closely, for the purpose of scrutiny or discovery, דָּבָר, while other terms are of special and narrow import, as רָעִים, to view, i.e. bring into the field of vision; רָעִים, to prop, as from a lurching-place; רָעִים, to watch, as an enemy.

In addressing, רָעִים is simply to call out the name of a person spoken to or of; while רָעִים is to say something, the words being added; and רָעִים is to speak, the language not being given; but רָעִים is to huddle, or cry out for help; רָעִים (less strongly, רָעִים) to shirk from distress or danger; רָעִים to groan in pain or sorrow; and רָעִים merely to talk loud, out of folly or (Piel in praise). Among pleasant emotions רָעִים is to be glad simply, as evinced by a quiet and satisfied demeanor; but רָעִים is to huddle, or cry out for help; רָעִים (less strongly, רָעִים) to shirk from distress or danger; רָעִים to groan in pain or sorrow; and רָעִים merely to talk loud, out of folly or (Piel in praise). Among pleasant emotions רָעִים is to fear, simply in a general sense; but רָעִים is to palpitate with sudden alarm (Niph. to be panic-stricken); רָעִים is to be frightened by some object of terror; רָעִים is to dread an impending cause of anxiety; רָעִים to shudder on the surface; רָעִים to quake in the interior; while רָעִים and רָעִים are merely to spit round under the influence of any violent feeling, whether crying through fear, writhing in pain, or jumping for joy (especially the former word). רָעִים is the week in the ankles, hence to totter, stumble, etc.; but רָעִים is to bend the knees, hence, to bow or fall; while רָעִים is to crouch on the haunches, like an animal in repose. For terms denoting forever, here is רָעִים, the everlasting, which forward or backward; hence time out of mind, everlasting; רָעִים, the terminus, a fixed point beyond which one cannot pass; and רָעִים, the goal or shining mark set up as far ahead as one can well see; while רָעִים simply denotes continuity. Of negatives there is רָעִים, not, the direct denial; רָעִים, far from it, the softer or deprecative disclaimer; רָעִים, by no means, the peremptory exclusive; and רָעִים, not at all, the absolute contradiction, of רָעִים, omission.

So in meteorology, רָעִים is a misty scud-cloud, so called from obscuring the landscape; רָעִים is a black thunder-cloud, so called from veiling the heavens; and רָעִים is a light flecto-cloud, so called from its resemblance to dust diffused in the sky. In brigandage רָעִים is an ambush for a surprise; while רָעִים is a covert for security; רָעִים a hiding-place for secrecy; and רָעִים or רָעִים merely a lair of wild beast, as screened by interlaced twigs. In orography and geography generally, Hebrew words are used with great precision. See TOPOGRAPHICAL TERMS.

II. Vocalization.—Syllabification is very simple in Hebrew, as the letters (all regarded as consonants) are the basis of articulation, and each (with the frequent exception of the quiescants) has its own vowel (expressed or implied) following. The pronunciation is in-dead. Again, as Hebrew ceased to be a living tongue after the Babylonian exile; but the sounds of the letters probably survive in the cognate Oriental languages, especially the Arabic, and the vowels supplied by the Masoretes doubtless represent some of those traditional sounds handed down to their own times. The latter form an ingenious and apparently complicated but really simple and natural series, of which the written signs are sufficiently distinct and philosophical.

The intricate chain of vowel-changes arising in declension is remarkable for its strict conformity to the laws of the vocal organs, and euphony is its fundamental principle. The tone usually rests on the final syllable, as being in general the most significant of grammatical relations, and hence an increment, as carrying the accent, has a constant tendency to shorten the preceding part of the word. The obvious forms of nouns and verbs, including the suffixed pronouns, are thus literally constructed, and the balance is preserved by abbreviating the beginning. In this system two features are of prime and universal influence, namely, the semitism of the root, and certain gutturals (indicating a series of peculiarities in their pointing), and the necessity of the tone for either a long closed or a short open syllable. By observing the effect of these principles and a few conventional form-signs, the grammar is wonderfully simplified and clarified.

II. Declension of the so-called "Tenses."—1. The "Preter" and the "Future." These are now well understood not to denote primarily time, but some other less palpable relation. The absence of a present tense is, we may remark in passing, really logical, for the present moment is but the dividing line between the past and the future, and shifts its position every instant. Ewald suggested the names "Perfect" and "Imperfect" in lieu of Preter and Future, maintaining that the former denotes a completed act, and the latter an incchoate; and some later grammarians, including Driver, in his ingenious monograph on the subject, have happily adopted this nomenclature. But besides the inexactness of these terms in themselves, and the liability of confounding such a use with that of the corresponding tenses in English, and still more in Greek and Latin, they will be found to be essentially erroneous. As a matter of fact, in most cases, these two verb-forms indisputably designate the two relations of time, anterior and posterior; and the consummation or incipience of the act or state is comparatively rare as an important shade of the thought. In very many, indeed, a majority of cases, the present tense (nominally future) in Hebrew is the equivalent of the English present future.

sometimes likewise to nouns) for the purpose of prolonging their sound, and thus naturally increasing their emphasis. With the Präter this is chiefly limited to the third person, as this alone is truly objective. With the Future, on the contrary, it is more appropriate in the first and second person, giving the future act a test or thorough significance, and softening the latter into a beseaching tone, an effect likewise produced when used with the Imperative.

Apopoaption consists in throwing off in the Future and Imperative the loosely cememted פ נ and ק of the particle, and in dropping out the "characteristic of Hiphil. It imparts a curt or peremptory stress to the shortened form, and thus serves to distinguish the predictable mood as an effect of the third person Future. The tendency to apoposition with "vav conversive" in the Future arises from its bringing the tone forward, in consequence of the close connection with the preceding context, and especially, it would seem, on account of the particle, which (as we shall see presently) that form appears to have originally included.

v. vav conversive."---This peculiarity, which the Hebrew alone of all the Semitic tongues exhibits, has been a sore puzzle to linguists, and only in recent times has received an intelligible explanation. It will serve as a crucial test of the following theory and its terminologies.

The text that in this case the vav is pointed with Patach and the Dagesh shows the assimilation of some older consonant; in fact, there seems to have been originally some particle like an adverb more closely pointing the sense than the simple "vav conjunctive" would have done, very much like the puerile phrase of simple story-tellers, who string each incident to the preceding by "and then." The Hebrew historian sets out with a genuine Präter (either expressed or implied), to indicate that he is stating other facts and he continues his narrative with "vav conversive" and a Future to denote a consecutive series, the latter members of which he conceives and represents as depending upon the others. This is his dependent and conceptual relation that requires a Future. The incidents are all facts (as the particle implied in the pointing intimates), but not isolated or independent facts. They may or they may not be logically or causally connected, but they are viewed by the writer as historically following each other, and he designates it as a kind of chart. A writer completing such a series, more or less extended, the writer begins a fresh series with another Präter, and continues it for awhile with "vav conversive" again. The whole history is thus divided off in a kind of paragraph style, and the close continuity of the subordinate statements is maintained in each paragraph. If he had used Präter with or without "vav connective" throughout, the incidents would have been merely the disjuncta membra of history, without any positive bond of unity. The style would have been, as we say, comparatively incoherent.

The explanation of "vav conversive" with the Präter is more difficult. From the absence of any special pointing, and the less frequency of its use, we are entitled to infer its comparative unimportance. In fact, it seems to be a kind of imitation, by way of conversive, of the "vav conversive" of the Future. A writer sets out with a Future (in form or effect), and continues the conceptual series by the Präter to indicate that he has now mentally transported himself into the region of fancy, and is describing things from that vivid impression. It thus resembles the "historic" languages, in which a writer views the scenes recounted as if actually taking place under his eye.

It can now be readily seen, in the light of the above explanation of these two "tenses," how in poetical passages (and all Hebrew is more or less poetical), the Präter and the Future (either simple or transformed by ere) may often be beautifully interchanged, according as the writer, for variety's sake, wishes to represent the same scene in adjoining hemistichs as either actual or conceptual; and this closer or more loose method of composition simplifies the process of translation and gives him a wider and nicer play of conception and expression. These are among the delicate shades of meaning which it is almost impossible to transfer to a version. For example, David says (Ps. iii. 6), "To Jehovah should I call (לָדְחָה יִנָּהוּל) [as I often have done], then he has heard me (גָּעָה יִנָּהוּל) " i.e. in plain prose, Whenever I call he hears me, but in poetic fervor, When I think of myself as calling, I immediately know myself as heard.

IV. Agglutinative Modes of Declension and Construction...-1. Of Prexes.-Of these ε, γ, τ, and μ are strictly inseparable, and as τ and μ, they probably represent original particles, as the Arabic article al (which assimilates, as in a Dageesh, with the "solar letter") indicates. Whether the characteristic ι of Niph'al, and the μ of its infinitive as well as of Hiph'il, Hoph'al, etc., had a similar origin is difficult to decide. The preformative of the Future may be more readily traced to the full forms of the personal pronouns.

2. By Suffixatives and Affixes.-The personal endings of the tenses, as well as the suffixes, are clearly fragments, somewhat modified, of the pronouns which they represent. The μ directive is probably an enclitic fragment of the article as a demonstrative. The feminine ending ι was a softened form, like μ para- gogic. The old constructive termination of masculine nouns was for both numbers, and the dual and plural absolutes were by intensive additions, like the decimal increase of the cardinal numbers. The frequent interchange of gender in the plural (notably in בְּעַשָּׁה, בְּעֵבָּרוֹ, etc.) proves that this was a later or comparatively unimportant variation. The feminine, as the weaker, takes the place of the neuter in Greek and Latin to express the abstract.

3. By juxtaposition.-Here we may enumerate three classes of amalgamation: (a) compounds, which are rare in Hebrew, except in proper names, and in cases of union by Makkeph (corresponding to our kphm only in removing the principal tone); (b) elipsis, by which certain particles are dropped as unnecessary, especially in the tenses of poetry; and (c) interchanges of the various parts of speech, which, as in English, allows nouns, particles, etc., to be freely used as adjectives, aliteria, etc., and conversely.

V. Emphasis.-Position of Words.-There the natural order of words is in contrast from the artificial arrangement of the Latin, and the purely grammatical of the English prevails. As with foreigners and children speaking a new language, the most important words come first (of course, after connectives, negatives, interrogatives, etc., which qualify the whole clause). Hence the predicate, as being of greater extension, precedes, and the subject or the adjective, which are but an accident of the verb or the noun, follows; except when special emphasis requires a different position, or when poetry in the parallel hemistichs calls for a pleasing variety. In this respect the Hebrew more closely resembles the Greek, which often resorts to the same expedient of emphasizing by a position near the head of the clause, like our "nominative independent." These nice shades of emphasis are difficult to render smoothly and adequately, but it might be done more accurately that in our Authorized Version, which is habitually negligent in this respect. For the prosodiac arrangement, see Poetrie, Hebrew.

HEBREW VERSION of the New Testament. If we may believe tradition, translations of parts of the New Test, already existed at a very early period. But as there is no certain information concerning such a version into the language of the Old-Test. Scriptures, the history of this work can only be traced back to the year 1557, when the gospel of Matthew was published in Hebrew by Sebastian Münster (q. v.). Great expectations were excited by this book at the time of its appearance, on account of an ancient tradition which prevailed in the Church, that Matthew originally wrote his gospel in Hebrew. It was very evident, however, that Münster's publication, הָרָעָה, had no pretension to be regarded as the text of the sacred original, nor even as an ancient version, for the language in which it was written was not the Syro-Chaldaic, current in Palestine at the time of our Lord, but the rabbinical Hebrew in use among the Jews of the 12th century. It was, moreover, full of solecisms and barbarisms, and bore indubitable marks of having been translated either directly from the Vulgate, or from an Italian version thereof. In an apology for this work, dedicated to Henry VIII of England, Münster states that the M.S. from which he printed was defective in several passages, and that he was compelled to supply the omissions as best he could from his own resources. It passed through several editions, and a Hebrew version of the epistle to the Hebrews was appended to it. Another edition of the same translation of Matthew, but printed from a more complete and correct M.S. (Prae- cens Editione, 1555, Supplementa Eratrum), known for the purpose from Italy, was published by Tillet, bishop of St. Brieux, at Paris, in 1556, with a Latin version by Mercier (Ad Vulgatam quod fieri potuit Accomodata). The latter was published again by Dr. Herbst, under the title, De Schenmo ben Schaphurth bein. Ungarung des Euang. Mathatiri nach den Drucken des S. Münster und J. du Tillet-Mercier (Göttingen, 1879). In this edition the editor proves that the author of this version was none else than Shem-Tob Isaac ben-Schaphurth (q. v.), who translated this gospel for polemical purposes. Passing over the number of translations of parts of the Testaments, we mention the version of the four gospels into Biblical Hebrew, made by Giovanni Battista Giona (q. v.), a converted Jew, and professor of Hebrew at Rome. He dedicated it to pope Clement IX, and it was published in Rome in 1660, at the expense of the Congregation de Propaganda Fide. But this translation, as professor Delitzsch remarks, fulfilled less than might be expected from a man born at Safet, in Upper Galilee, who, besides, was a Jewish scholar. The first translation of the entire New Test, into Hebrew was made by Elias Ha-Nagid (15th century), and published at Constantinople in 1600 in his Polgyot Test. According to the judgment of professor Delitzsch, it is of great value, and is still worth consulting, because in many places it is very correct. A revised edition was published in London in 1661, under the supervision of W. Robertson; but the greater part of this edition was consumed in the fire of London in 1666. A Corrected New Testament in Hebrew was published at London in 1798 by the Rev. R. Caddock, but it proved not to be acceptable to the Jews, for whose benefit it was published, and a new translation became a desirable object. In the meantime Dr. Buchanan began, from India a translation of the New Test., executed in Traversore, among the Jews of that country, the translator being a learned Jew. The M.S. was written in the small rabbinical or Jerusalem character; the style was elegant and flowing, and tolerably faithful to the text. Dr. Buchanan deposited the M.S. in the university library at Cambridge, after it had been transcribed by Mr. Yeates, of Cambridge, into the square Hebrew character. A copy was presented to the London Society for the Conversion of the Jews, and it was at one time thought that it would greatly promote the object of the society to print and circulate the produce- tion of a Jew, evidently master of his own ancient lan- guage. After much deliberation, however, a more strict- ly literal translation was still deemed desirable, and accordingly, in 1816, Mr. Frey and other learned He-traits executed, under the patronage of the Jews' Society, a new edition of the New Test. In 1818 this new edition left the society's press, and was speedily followed by another issue. The British and Foreign Bible Society assisted materially in this work by purchasing at various times to a large amount. After this version had been in circulation for some time, complaints from Hebrew readers in various parts of the world were laid before the Jews' Society Committee, concerning the rendering of certain passages. To insure minute accuracy, the committee determined on a thorough revision. They consulted some of the most eminent men in Europe, and professor Gesenius was recommended to them as the first Hebrew scholar of the age. To him, therefore, the version was confided, with a request of a critique upon it, and suggestions as to alterations. Gesenius went carefully through the work as far as the Acts, and likewise through the book of Revelation. Numerous other engagements, however, compelled him to resign the task. The work, together with Gesenius's notes, was then transferred by the Jews' Committee to Dr. Joseph Neumann (q. v.), a converted Hebrew, lecturer on Hebrew at the University of Breslau. Dr. Neumann commenced the work anew, and his revision, when completed, was acknowledged to bear the stamp of diligence, accuracy, zeal, and profound scholarship. The limited funds of the society, however, prevented the publication of this valuable revision, and thus it remained for some time in MS. At this very period, the publisher of the Polyglot Bible (Mr. Bagster), requiring a Hebrew version of the New Test. for the Polyglot, applied to the Jews' Society for the critical emendations they had been making; the improvements and notes of Gesenius and Neumann were in consequence handed to Mr. Bagster, and were incorporated in the new version executed for the Polyglot by Mr. Greenfield, and published in 1831. In comparing this edition of Greenfield with the second of the Jews' Society, published in 1821, the student will easily perceive that no little progress has not been made a very great progress in the work of translation, and that neither could stand the test of criticism. The Jews' Society resolved, therefore, on a revision of the edition of 1821. A committee, consisting of Dr. McCaul, the Rev. W. S. Alexander (afterwards Bishop of Jerusalem), the Rev. J. C. Reichardt, and Mr. S. Hoge (the well-known translator of Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress into Hebrew), was intrusted with the revision, which was commenced Nov. 14, 1836, and finished Feb. 6, 1838. The printing was commenced in December, 1837, and was finished in September, 1838. Duly considering and appreciating the labors of their predecessors, they endeavored to conform the Hebrew text as closely as possible to the Greek, following in most dubious cases the reading of the authorized English version; and were much pleased to find that, in very many places, even the collocation of the Greek words furnished the best and most elegant collocation of the Hebrew. They diligently consulted the Syriac, Vulgate, German, Dutch, and French versions, but in difficulties were generally guided by the Syriac. Their desire was, as far as possible, to furnish a literal translation, remembering that it was the word of the living God which they wished to communicate. They arrived at purity of style, but always preferred perspicuity to elegance. When the revision was finished, the MS. was read through by each person privately, and then by all together, confronting it again with the Greek text. Some alterations were then suggested, and even in the reading of the proof-sheets various little amendments were made. This new edition of the Hebrew Bible is a great improvement upon the former, proved by no means to be the ultimatum. In the year 1856 a new revision of the work was decided upon, and to the Rev. C. Reichardt (q. v.), together with Dr. H. Bisenthal, the task of revision was given. The edition of 1838 was carefully examined, and April 12, 1865, the work was completed. In 1866 the new edition, with vowels and accents, was published, which redounds to the honor of both revisers and the society. But this edition, in spite of the great amount of labor bestowed and the money spent upon it, proved itself not to be the complete desideratum, especially in view of the criticism concerning the text as well as the accents, which professor Delitzsch published in his Hebrew edition of St. Paul's epistle to the Romans. Considerations like these, especially the desire of realizing a hope cherished for about forty years, induced professor Delitzsch to undertake a new version of the New Test., on the basis of the Codex

Plan of Hebron.
Sinaiticus. This edition was published by the British and Foreign Bible Society in 1877. In 1878 professor Delitzsch published a second edition of his translation, taking for his basis the Textus Receptus of the Elzevir edition of 1624, respecting the exigencies of textual criticism in all the more important cases by bracketed readings. Thus a single parenthesis, ( ), indicated a passage with weak support, although from an early date; the same with a star, (*), indicated an important varying reading; a double parenthesis, ([ ]), indicated a late addition to the text; and brackets, [ ], indicated words well supported by ancient testimony, but lacking in the received text. This edition also sold rapidly, and the third edition, again revised, appeared in 1880, with a slightly larger page and type. A fourth edition was published in 1881, and so also a fifth in 1885. It should be observed that during all this time the translator had the constant help of many learned friends, especially of Dr. J. H. R. Bessenthal, who had traversed the same ground himself, and of the author of the work on Hebrew tenses, Rev. S. R. Driver of Oxford. See Delitzsch, The Hebrew New Testament of the British and Foreign Bible Society (Leipzig, 1883). (B. P.)

Hebron. A brief but excellent description of this venerable place is given in the Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey (iii. 305 sq.), and the latest and most complete account of the Haram enclosure there may be found in the same work (p. 333 sq.). We give some interesting particulars from Lieut. Conder's Tent Work in Palestine, ii. 72:

"Hebron is a long stone town on the western slope of a bare, terraced hill; it extends along the valley, and the main part reaches about seven hundred yards north and south, including the Mosque Quarter, and the Quarter of the Gate of the Corner. On the north is a separate suburb, named from the mosque of Aly Bukka, who died in 670 A.D.; on the south also, and west of the road, is another small suburb. The Haram stands above the middle of the main quarter. The Sultan's Pool, a large, well-built reservoir, occupies part of the valley. West of the city is an open green below the Quarantine, surrounded by hills which are covered with olives."

"The contrast between Hebron and Bethlehem is readily noticed; the town has a dead-slow appearance, and the solemn looks of the Mosaic sanctuary contrast with the officious garrulousness of the Bethlehem Christians. There are some seventeen thousand Moslems in Hebron, according to the governor's account; and about six hundred Jews are tolerated in the Quarter of the Corner Gate. The town is the centre of commerce for the southern Arabs, who bring their wool and camel's hair to its market. It has also a sort of trade in glass ornaments and in leather water-bottles, but the bazaar and stir of Bethlehem are not found in its streets; the inhabitants seem wrapped in contemplation of the tombs of their forefathers, and boast that no pagan Frank has yet desecrated the holy shrines with his presence, or built his house in the town." (See Plan on p. 325.)

Hecatea, apparitions which appeared during the performance of certain ceremonies in honor of the goddess Hecate (q. v.). An image of the goddess was formed of incense of Arabia, myrrh, storax, and certain animals called acaulosoi. These were all ground to powder, made into a paste, and moulded into an image of Hecate. Then, in the presence of this image, at midnight, under a lotus-tree, the ceremonies are duly performed, when the Hecatea appear and assume various shapes.

Hecate, in Greek mythology, is a mystical figure, wrapped in deep darkness, as described by Hesiod. She is called the daughter of the Titan Pentes by Asteria, but the accounts vary, sometimes Jupiter, at others Tartarus, being mentioned as her father, and Juno, Ceres, Pheme, etc., as her mother. She was the only one among the Titans who assisted Jupiter in the war with the giants; therefore she was not hurled into Tartarus, as were the others, but was endowed with great power in heaven, on earth, as well as in the infernal regions. She is usually represented triformate, from which circumstance she has the surname Tri- cephalus or Tripods, the three-headed. She possessed the keys to three roads, leading respectively to Hades, to heaven, and to a happy life on earth. Her work was usually at night, and therefore she has been confounded with the goddesses of the moon, Selene.

Greeks only on extraordinary occasions, consisting of about 1000. The word is sometimes applied to the offering of other animals than oxen; and it is used occasionally by some who volunteered to take two frigates from Sweden to their purchasers in one of the South American republics. After a tempestuous voyage, instead of reaching South America they landed in New York. Mr. Hedstrom soon made arrangements to return to Sweden, but on the eve of his departure was robbed of his money. He was shortly afterward led to Willet Street Methodist Episcopal Church, N.Y., experienced religion, and on reaching his Swedish home began holding Methodist class-meetings and prayer-meetings, the first ever held in that land. In 1880 he returned to New York, joined the New York Conference, and in it travelled the following circuits: Charlotte, Jefferson, Coeymans, Windham, Catskill, and Prattsville. In 1843 he was appointed to the Swedish mission, with his headquarters in the famous Bethel ship for Scandinavian seamen, foot of Carlisle Street, N.Y. He began by boarding, when possible, every incoming ship from Scandinavia or Denmark before it touched the shore, and distributing among the emigrants Bibles and tracts, telling them where they could find good temporary homes, and inviting them to the Bethel ship. In a single day he might be found in the counting-room of the different shipping houses, raising funds for the mission, far out on the deep seeking the lost sheep, at his desk answering letters from all parts of the world, at the bedside of the sick and dying, and pleading from his pulpit with the waiting throng to accept Christ. Thus he continued till his death, May 6, 1877. Mr. Hedstrom was thoroughly devoted to his work, had a simplicity of manner and fund of experimental Christianity that won the hearts of all. His religion was full of joy, and his life of success. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1878, i, 42; Simpson, Crisis of Methodism, ch. iv.

Heim, François Joseph, a French painter, was born at Belfort, Dec. 16, 1876. He studied in the École Centrale de Strasbourg, and in 1890 entered the studio of Vincent, at Paris. In 1897 he was commissioned to decorate the Gallery Charles X in the Louvre, and completed his decorations of the conference-room of the Chamber of Deputies in 1844. He was made member of the legion of honor in 1865, and died Sept. 29, 1895. Among his paintings of religious subjects are: Return of Jacob, in the Musée de Bordeaux; St. John; Resurrection of Lazarus, in the Cathédral Autun; Martyrdom of St. Cyr. in St. Germain; Martyrdom of St. Lawrence, in Notre Dame; and his great picture of the Massacre of the Jews, in the Louvre. See Encyclop., Brit. 9th ed. s. v.

Heimdall, in Norse mythology, is the son of Odin, born of nine Jote-maidens, so that all were mothers of this god. From them he inherited beauty and greatness, from his father wisdom and power, and Odin placed him to guard the Bifrost and the rainbow bridge. He lives in a beautiful palace, Himm tensing (heavenly castle), and gazes about to see whether mountain giants or other enemies come near the bridge. When he is awake the gods can safely slumber, for no one can approach without his knowing it. At night he can see a distance of one hundred miles, he hears the grass and hairs grow, and sleeps as little as an eagle. When enemies approach he takes his horn and makes a great noise, and the Ases and the Einheriar, and the heroes in Valhalla assemble for combat. This takes place especially at the destruction of the world. He has a surname, Gullintand (gold-tooth), from the fact that his teeth are made of gold.

Heiner, Elias, D.D., an esteemed German Reformed minister, was born at Tanemudy, Sept. 16, 1810. He early connected with the Church; studied theology in the seminary of the Reformed Church at York, Pa., under the Rev. Lewis Mayer, D.D.; was licentiated and ordained in the ministry of the Reformed Church in Emmentburg, Md. He was called to Baltimore in 1855, where he remained, faithfully preaching the gospel of the grace of God, to the close of his life, Oct. 20, 1863. Dr. Heiner was a man of respectable talents, good culture, deep piety, and great zeal, combined with a vast amount of practical tact. He was an acceptable preacher, a most excellent pastor, enjoying to the last the full and unabated confidence of his people. He took a deep interest in the cause of missions, as well as in all the other benevolent operations of the Church, and did much to extend the Reformed Church in the city of Baltimore by his earnest and disinterested labors. He published the first volume of Dr. Mayer's History of the German Reformed Church, to which he prefixed a sketch of the author's life and labors. See Hartaugh, Fathers of the Reformed Church, iv, 271. (B. P.)

Heinrichs, Carl Friedrich Ennet, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born in 1798. He was ordained for the ministry in 1825, and was from 1827 pastor at Detmold. He died Dec. 30, 1882, doctor of theology and member of consistory, leaving De eius quam Potestatem Conturbat ut Lutheram Succurrarum Reformatorum Serviunt Efflagendum (Göttingen, 1819). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 742. (B. P.)

Heinroth, Johann Christian Friedrich August, a German psychologist, was born at Leipzig, Jan. 17, 1773, and died there in 1848, a doctor and professor of medicine. He wrote, Psychologie oder Bewusstseiner Freiere Forschung, (Voss, Leipzig, 1807; English translation, 1813, 1814): — Der Schlußel zu demTHEKHEINRICHES

Heinsberg, Jean de, a Belgian priest of the 15th century, was at first canon of Liege and archdeacon of Hassay, and became bishop of Liege at the age of twenty-three. In 1444 he resolved to go to Palestine, in pursuance of a vow, but on arriving at Venice, wrote to the Holy See, and was refused permission. He died in 1459. See Hoefn, Voss. Diet. Geinscher, s. v.

Heinsohn, Johann Theodoric, a Lutheran theologian of German, was born at Hanover, July 5, 1665. He studied at Helmstädt, and continued his Oriental studies in England. In 1695 he was first preacher at Mele, in the duchy of Osnabrick, in 1696 general superintendent and court-preacher of East Prussia, accepted in 1711 a call to Hamburg, and died Sept. 21, 1726, leaving, De Nominatione et Essentia Dei (Helmstädt, 1690) — De Paradiso ejusque Amissione et Custodia (ibid. 1698). See Döring, Die gelehrt'n Theologen Deutschlands, etc., v. 1, Fürrer, Bibl. Jud. i, 375; Jücher, Allgemeines Gelehrten- Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Helric, Saint, a French monk, was born about 884, at Hergy, near Auxerre. It is supposed that his surname has been given to him more on account of his knowledge than for his actions. At the age of seven he was instructed by his parents to the care of the Benedictine monks of St. Germain d' Auxerre, from whom he received his first instruction. He afterwards went to the abbey of Fulda, where he was instructed by Haimon, a disciple of Alcuin. Some time later he left Fulda to go to Ferrières, to put himself under the discipline of the abbot Lupus. He died about 881. For his numerous writings we refer to Hoefer, Nouv. Bioigr. Genév. s. v.

Heli (coerer), in Norse mythology, was the daughter of Loke and the giantess Angerboda, sister of the wolf Fenris and the snake Jormungand. The three sisters were the most frightful creations of the infernal regions, and as the whole earth was the abode of Lupa. He died about 881. For his numerous writings we refer to Hoefer, Nouv. Bioigr. Genév. s. v.

Hela, in Slavonic mythology, was originally a Scythian divinity, but worshipped also by the Wends, although in another sense, and with the attributes of an evil and angry deity. She was represented as a large woman, with a lion's open mouth. She was imployed to protect from evil advice.

Heild, August H. M., a Lutheran minister, was born Feb. 22, 1806, at Knoop, near Kiel, Germany. After preparatory study at Kiel he entered the College of Reuzburg, and at the close of his theological course was ordained as a Lutheran minister. Instead of entering the pastoral work, he established the Held Institute at Kiel, which he conducted with signal ability for many years. In 1847 he arrived in America. For a time he was assistant pastor of St. Matthew's Church, New York city. Subsequently he founded St. Mark's Church, in Sixth Street. A division occurring in the congregation, a large portion followed him and formed the nucleus of St. John's Church, which at first held its meetings in the old Hope Chapel, and afterwards in the New York University building on Washington Square. In 1858 St. John's purchased the present church edifice in Christopher Street. For twenty-two years he was pastor of this church, and gathered about him one of the largest Lutheran congregations in New York. Two years before his death he was obliged to relinquish the pastorate on account of declining health. He died in New York city, March 23, 1881. See Lutheran Observer, April 8, 1881.

Heild, Carl Friedrich Wilhelm, a Protestant theologian, was born in 1830 at Treptow, Pomerania. In 1852 he was rector at Göttingen, in 1860 professor at Zurich, in 1866 at Breslau, and accepted a call to Bonn in 1867. He died May 30, 1870, leaving, Die Opere Jean Christ. Solbarii, etc. (Göttingen, 1860) — Jesus der Christ. 16 Apologetische Vorträge über die Grundlehren des Christenthums (Zurich, 1865) — Modemt Weltanschauung und Christentum (Breslau, 1866). See Held, Christian, a German convert from Judaism, in the 13th century, was the author of, Benedictus der Mosischer Prediger in Albu parochiae (Mainz, 1320; New York, 1877). See Wolf, Bibl. Heileph. Of Brit-LYF, which is now generally accepted as the modern representative of this place, the following is the description in the Memorial, 1614: "A village built of stone, containing about one hundred and fifty Modems (Tinënir says eighty Metawlehe), situated on a hill-top, with a few olives and arable land. Two cisterns and a bricket (pool) near by supply the water."

Heilperstein, Samuel D., a prominent German Reformed minister, son of Rev. John C. Albert Heilperstein, was born at Germantown, Pa., April 17, 1778. He studied privately, partly under Rev. Mr. Stock, and partly under Rev. Dr. Melshheimer. His theological studies he prosecuted under Rev. Dr. William Hendel, the elder, pastor of the Reformed Church on Race Street, Philadelphia. He entered the ministry in 1796 or 1797. After preaching for a short time in Montgomery County, he received a call to the Race Street Church, as successor to his theological preceptor, who died about this time. Here he labored for a period of thirty two or three years, and retired from the active discharge of the ministry, and spent the remainder of his days at his private residence in North Wales, Montgomery Co., where he died, Oct. 17, 1866. Dr. Heilperstein was a man of fine talents, thorough education, and superior pulpit abilities. He prepared a large number of young men for the ministry, and also took a deep interest in the establishment of the literary and theological institutions of the Reformed Church. In 1846 he published a work on didactic theology, which probably embodied the substance of his lectures to the students whom in earlier life he had under tuition. See Hartlaub, Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church, iv, 31. (D. Y. H.)

Heilgeland, in Norse mythology, was an island of the North Sea, also called Foestaland, from the god Foeste. It contained only herds, sacred to the god, an altar, and a spring, from which it was very beneficial.

Heilheim, in Norse mythology, is the kingdom of the cruel Hel (q. v.), large and extended, inhabited by thirty-two rivers, which spring from the spring of Hvergelmer, and one of which encircles the entire country. The golden-covered bridge, Gjalnar, spans this valley. A maiden giantess, Modgudr, who keeps guard here, inquires of every one his name and family, and shows them the way to the palace of Hel. A high iron latticework surrounds the kingdom, and after having passed this, the visitor finds himself in one of the nine worlds. There are two maidens keeping guard also in Hel's palace; they have iron blood, which, when it falls to the ground, causes quarrel and war. Hel's palace contains a hall, Eidiu, her table is called Hungur (hunger). Ganglato and Ganglot are her servant and maid, Korher bed, Blick and Bil her covering. In Helheim or Nifheim lives the evil snake, Nithog, which gnaws at one of the three roots of the ash-tree, Yggdraasil. There, in a cave, the dog Garmr lives, who is to bring about the death of an Asa at the destruction of the world. Helheim is not a place of punishment, but simply the dwelling-place of those who do not die of wounds on the battle-field. After the world, the gods are separated from the bad, the former go to eternal joy in Gimm (heaven), the latter to Nattrond.

Heling, Maurice, a Lutheran theologian, was born in 1529 at Friedland, Prussia. He studied at different universities, was in 1550 rector at Eisleben, in 1556 superintendent at Nuremberg, and died Oct. 2, 1559, leaving, Disputatio Eccleesiae Romanae de Jure Sacerdotis et Ministerii - De doctrina Librorum Josua, Judicium et 2 Librorum Samuelis et 1 Generis consonantio breves. See Zeitner, Leben und Schriften Helings (Altdorf, 1715); Jöcher, Allgemeine Geschichte-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.).

Helios, in Greek mythology (among the Romans Sol), the god of the sun, was one of the Titans, brother of Selene and Aurora, all three children of the Titan Hyperion and the Titanid Thia. Helios rides in the wagon of the sun, drawn by four flashing steeds, borne from sea to sea, and gives the world the day. Aurora precedes, opens the sun's portals, strews roses on his path, glowing rays and golden locks unfasten about his head, a light dress, woven from the breath of Zephyrus, flies about his hips, when he comes forth out of his palace. The latter lies in the west of the known world, where the sun sets. In order to come from here to the east, he sails back during the night in a golden canoe until he arrives again at the east. Near his palace were his herds and his gardens. As every god had a seat of worship, so Rhodes was especially sacred to Helios. Besides this the castle of Corinth belonged to him. According to Diodorus, Helios was a son of king Hyperion and his sister Basilea. The brothers of the king, fearing the latter would depose them in power, murdered him and drowned Helios.

Helkath-has-surim, Tristan thinks (Fibbla Places, p. 115) that a reminiscence of the battle here "seems to be preserved in a broad, smooth valley close to Giben [el-Jib], called Wady el-'Areak, 'the vale of the soldierly.'" It runs north-west from the village.

Helladinus, bishop of Carrae, in Cappadocia, succeeded his teacher, Basil the Great, in that see in 376. He attended two councils of Constantinople in 381 and 464. His life of St. Basil is cited by Damasus, but the authenticity of that work is doubted. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Hellegius, bishop of Tarsus, lived about A.D. 430. He made himself remarkable by his affection for Nestorius, and was deprived of his bishopric on that account. But it was restored to him after circumstances occurred on the condition that he would join himself with those who pronounced the anathema against Nestorius. There are extant of him six letters. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Helm, James Isbell, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, and afterwards an Episcopal, was born in Washington County, Tenn., April 23, 1811. He graduated from Georgetown College, Ky., in 1833, and from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1836. He was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of West Tennessee, June 23, 1838; labored as a missionary in Giles County in 1837 and 1838; was pastor at Salem, N. J., in 1840; teacher at Newton in 1852; at Philadelphia, Pa., in 1858, and at Princeton, N. J., in 1855. He was reordained in the Protestant Episcopal Church in 1860; was an assistant rector in St. Mark's Church, Philadelphia, Pa., from 1860 to 1862; rector at St. Paul's Church, Sing Sing, N. Y., in 1863, and at Princeton on Oct. 15, 1868. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem., 1881, p. 94.

Helmbraker, Theodore, an eminent Dutch painter, was born at Haarlem in 1624, and was instructed in the school of Peter Grebber. On the death of that master he visited Rome, and spent some time in Florence and Naples. He finally settled at Rome, where he executed for the church of the Jesuits a noble landscape, in which is introduced The Temptation of Christ in the Desert. At Naples, in the refectory of the Jesuits' college, are three sacred subjects, most admirably executed: Christ in the Garden; Christ Carrying his Cross, and To the Cenacle. Helmbraker died in Rome in 1694. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Sponsel, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Helmert, Charles Dowse, a Congregational minister, was born at Canajoharie, N. Y., Nov. 18, 1827. After spending two years in Hamilton College, he entered Andover from which he graduated in 1852. The two years following he was a teacher in the Deaf-and-Dumb Institution in New York City. In 1856 he graduated from Union Theological Seminary. The next two years he spent in Europe. He was ordained pastor of Plymouth Church, Milwaukee, Wis., Sept. 22, 1856; from December, 1806, to December, 1875, he was pastor of Union Park Church, Chicago, Ill.; from March, 1877, until his death, he was pastor of Tompkins Avenue Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. The degree of D.D. which he was conferred at Union Theological Seminary in 1878 by A. L. Beito College, was declined. He died April 29, 1879. See Cong. Year-book, 1880, p. 21.

Helmich, Werner, a Dutch Protestant divine, and one of the early promoters of the reformed religion in that country, was born at Utrecht in 1551. In 1579 he was chosen pastor of his fellow-citizens. In 1582 he was the first to preach the Protestant religion openly in the cathedral of Utrecht. He was pastor at Amsterdam in 1602, and died Aug. 29, 1606, leaving Analysis of the Psalms (1644).

Helmont, Joannes van, a Flemish painter, the son of Matthew, was born at Antwerp, April 17, 1688, and studied under his father, also the fine works of great masters at Brussels. His principal works are in the churches at Brussels. In the Church of Mary Hempfl, John D.D., an Associate Reformed minister, was born in Delaware County, Derry, Ireland, in 1761. He arrived at Philadelphia shortly after the close of the American Revolution. He was a tailor by trade. He graduated at Dickinson College in 1792, and was ordained at Green castle in 1794-95, went south on a missionary tour, and returned to Greens castle in May, 1795. In 1796 he was installed pastor of Hopewell, Union, and Ebenezer, remaining in this connection until a short time previous to his death, which occurred May 8, 1832. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, IX, iv. 62.

Hephaestus, son of Zeus, was the god of fire and metal-working. He was the god of the forge, where everything was made. He was also the god of the blacksmiths, and he was often represented as a blacksmith at his forge with a hammer in his hand. He was also the god of the工艺 school, and he was often represented as a teacher in the art of making things.

Hesiod, a Greek poet, was born in Greece and lived in the 8th century B.C. He is the author of the Works and Days, a poetical calendar, and the Theogony, a genealogical poem. His works were written in verse, and they are considered to be among the earliest works of Greek literature.
the Rev. Dr. Gros and Livingston. In 1792 he was licensed to preach the gospel, and the following year ordained, and installed as pastor of the Tulpehocken church in Bucks County, Pa. He resigned this charge in 1832, and removed to Womelsdorf, in the same county, where he died, July 11, 1846. Dr. Henderson manifested a deep interest in the cause of education, and in consequence had to suffer some persecution. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Reformed Church, iii, 58. (D. Y. H.)

Henderson, Isaac J., D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Natchez, Miss., Jan. 6, 1812. He graduated with the degree of M.A. in 1831, and from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1835. Soon after his licentiate he spent two years as an evangelist in Mississippi, Arkansas, and Louisiana; then came to Galveston, Texas; accepted a call, and in a short time secured funds for the erection of the first Presbyterian church there. About 1850 he accepted a call to Jackson, Miss. In 1852 he went to Prytania Street Church in New Orleans, and labored over eleven years. In 1866 he began to preach at Annapolis, Md. He died Dec. 8, 1875. Dr. Henderson was faithful, practical, and interesting to all classes. See Necrology, Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1875, p. 21.

Henderson, James, M.D., a Scotch Congregational medical missionary, was born in 1800, and received a careful religious training by a pious widowed mother. He began life as a shepherd-boy, but spent several sessions at the Edinburgh University. He offered himself with his characteristic zeal to medical work, and his thorough devotion, united with his remarkable surgical skill, soon raised the reputation of the Chinese hospital to the highest point. In June, 1865, he was seized with fever, and died July 31 following. See (Lond.) Corp. Vem.-book, 1866, p. 238.

Henderson, Matthew H., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was rector for several years in Newark, N. J., until about 1856; subsequently he removed to Athens, Ga., where he became rector of Emmanuel Church, and there remained until his death, Dec. 2, 1872. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1874, p. 186.

Henderson, Robert, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Washington County, Va., May 31, 1796. He left an orphan at an early age, he struggled hard in obtaining an education. He was licensed and ordained by the Abingdon Presbytery in 1788, and was pastor at Danbridge, Tenn., where he remained more than twenty years. He afterwards preached at Pisgah, Murfrees Spring, Nashville, and Franklin. He died in July, 1834. Dr. Henderson was a most earnest and vigorous supporter of gospel orders, especially as connected with the worship of God. See Sprague, Anecdote of the Amer. Pulpit, iii, 528.

Heraclea, a festival annually celebrated at Athens every five years in honor of the Grecon god Heraclès (q. v.).

Heracleides, surnamed Cyprus, from his place of birth, was liberally educated, became a monk under Evagrius, and deacon at Constantinople. He was an ardent fiend of Chrysostom, who caused his election as bishop of Ephesus in 401; but he was afterwards persecuted and murdered with that eminent ecclesiastic, and finally shared his exile.

Heracleteans, the followers of the philosopher Heraclitus (q. v.).

Heraclius (Eraclius or Bradis), bishop elect of Hippo, was designed by Augustine, Sept. 26, 426, to become his successor, but owing to some irregularity he was never inaugurated into that office, and the fall of Hippo into the hands of the Vandals abolished the see. There are attributed to Heraclius two sermons found among those of St. Augustine. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bio. Générale, s. v.; Smith, Dict. of Chr. Biog. s. v.

Heraclius (Eracl or Eberard), sixteenth bishop of Liege, was of a distinguished Saxon family, and was educated at Cologne under the care of Rathier, bishop of Liege. He became provost at the cathedral chapter of Church of Bonn, and entered upon the episcopal see of Liege in 956. He devoted his attention entirely to the cause of education, establishing new schools, and placing at their head wise men, whom he called from Germany and from France. In 960 he became involved in political troubles, during which he died, in 971. There is extant of him a letter, written about 948, to Rathier, bishop of Verona, on the miraculous healing of a cancer. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bio. Générale, s. v.

Hepbus, a Scotch prelate, was rector of Partoun and abbot of Dunfermline in 1515. In June of the same year he was constituted lord treasurer. In 1516 he began the bishop of Moray. He died in 1524. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 148.

Hepburn, George, a Scotch prelate, was early preferred to the provostry of Lincluden, and Feb. 9, 1598, was elected abbot of the monastery of Aberbrothock. In 1599 he made abbot lord treasurier, and in 1601, he was elected bishop of the see of the Isles. In 1612 he was a co-signatory both of Arbroath and Lochinvar. This prelate was slain with the king on the unfortunate field of Flodden, Sept. 9, 1513. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 305.

Hepburn, John, a Scotch prelate, was bishop of the see of Brechin in 1517, and was still there in 1532. He died in August, 1543. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 105.

Hepburn, John, a Scotch prelate, was bishop of Dunblane, and one of the lords of council in session in 1647. In 1647 he assisted at the consecration of John Livingstone to the see of Dunkeld. He was bishop of this see in 1658. He died in 1658. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 178.

Hepburn, Patrick, a Scotch prelate, was prior of St. Andrews in 1652, and in 1654 was made secretary, in which office he continued until 1657. He was advanced to the see of Moray in 1655, and at the same time held the abbey of Scome in perpetual commendam. He was bishop of Moray still in 1651, and probably in 1658. He died at Spynie Castle, June 20, 1753. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 159.

Hepher. This place Trelawney Saunders (Map of the O. T.) identifies with Khureh Kufir, which the Ordnance Map lays down eight miles northwest of Hebrom (and some miles east of Um-Burje, the neighborhood which we had conjecturally assigned), and the Memoirs describe (iii, 355) as "foundations and heaps of stones. It has the appearance of an old site, and an ancient road passes it."

Hoppe, Heinrich Ludwig Julius, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Cassel, Aug. 18, 1820. He studied at Marburg, was in 1844 doctor of philosophy and licentiate of theology, and commenced his academic career at Marburg. man count and prelate, was born in 1722. He became bishop of Laybach in 1772, and was one of the most ardent promoters of the ecclesiastical innovations of his day. Pending negotiations with the pope for his promotion to the archbishopric, he died, Oct. 7, 1787, leaving the poor and to the principal school of his episcopal city. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Herbert, a Scotch prelate, was abbot of Kelso, and chancellor of the kingdom. He was consecrated bishop of Glasgow in 1147, by pope Eugenius III. He died bishop of this see, in 1164. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 232.

Herbert, a French prelate, was born at Vouvray, in Maine. He was at first prior of Clermont, in Maine, and then abbot of Fontaines les-Blenches, in the diocese of Tours. Having got into a quarrel with Thiobald, count of Blois, he returned to Maine, where he became abbot of Clermont in 1179. Finally, in 1184, he made bishop of Rennes; in 1190 he accompanied Richard, king of England, to Domfront. While at Rennes he had a difference with Andrew, lord of Vitre, whom he excommunicated until he obtained his entire submission. In 1198 the pope sent him to Bourguieu, on the frontier of Tours, to restore the good order of that monastery. He died at Rennes, Dec. 11, 1198. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Herbert of Bosham was born at Bosham, Sussex, and being a good scholar, was a manuensis to Thomas à Becket, archbishop of Canterbury. He was present at the murder of that prelate, and wrote an account of it. Going over to Italy, he was by pope Alexander III made archbishop of Beneventum, and in December, 1178, created cardinal. The death of his deacon is unknown. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), iii, 244.

Herbert de Losing, a Norman prelate, was born at Hiesmes (paquis Oximinius), in Normandy, about the middle of the 11th century. He was a monk, and afterwards prior of the abbey of Fécamp. William Rufus called him to England in 1067, and made him abbot of Ramsey. By the royal favor, or some other means, Herbert became so rich that, in 1091, he bought from the king, for the price of 1000 livres, the bishopric of Thetford for himself, and the abbey of Winchester for his brother Robert. This most scandalous transaction was generally censured, and Herbert went to Rome to seek absolution from his sin. On his return to England he transferred the episcopal seat of Thetford to Norwich. At Thetford he founded a convent of monks of Cluny, and built a cathedral; also a monastery with two churches at Norwich; three churches at Elyham, at Lynn, and at Yarmouth. The last years of his life Herbert consecrated to the establishment of ecclesiastical discipline, thus effacing the spot upon his entry into the episcopacy. William of Malmesbury speaks of Herbert as a man of great knowledge, and Henry of Huntingdon mentions his writings. He died July 22, 1119. According to Bayle, he composed a book of Sermons, eighteen in number, two treatises, De Proelio Testamentum et De Fine Mundi, monastic rules, a collection of letters, and a treatise, Ad Astrumam, etc., for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Hereford (or Hereford), Nicholas, an English confessor of the 14th century, was educated doctor of divinity at Oxford, became a secular priest, declared against some practices and principles of the reigning religious opinions, married, and (1) that in the euchre he and his companions consented to the consecration of the elements, bread and wine still remaining; (2) that bishops and all clergy ought to be subject to their respective princes; (3) that monks and friars ought to maintain themselves by their own labor; (4) that priests ought to rule their lives, not by the pope's decrees, but by the word of God. From these positions many heretical opinions were drawn by his enemies. From Oxford he was exiled to London, and there, with Philip Repington, was made to recant his opinions publicly at St. Paul's Cross in 1382. Repington, a relapsed heretic, was renegade, persecuted his party, for which he was rewarded first with the bishopric of Lincoln, then with a cardinal's cap. Hereford's recantation did not much avail him, as archbishop Arundel's jealousy kept him a prisoner all his life. We know not the cause of his death, but we anticipated the Reformation, but he probably had not the stuff to make a Wycliffe or Tyndal. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), iii, 491; Fox, Acts and Monuments, iii, 26.

Hereford Use, a term employed to designate that rite which, taking its name from the cathedral of Hereford, was commonly used in some of the north-west counties of England, and in parts of Wales, prior to the Reformation. It differs only slightly from the use of Salisbury in the prayer of oblation and in the communion of the priest. The service-books of these rites are extremely rare, the MSS. no doubt, were everywhere destroyed. Only one printed edition is known—that of Rouen, dated 1509.

Herrla-Kan, in Kalmuck mythology, is the prince of hell; a frightful and evil-minded god, the judge of men, the other gods being too merciful to judge the guilty. To implore his favor large sacrifices are made to him. Sixteen judges assist him, one half being males, the other half females.

Herman of Cappenberg, a Jewish convert of the 12th century, was a native of Cologne. His Jewish name was Judah Lozi. After his conversion he entered the order of the Premonstratensians, and became abbot of Cappenberg, in Westphalia. He wrote Opusculum de Consecratione Sua, preserved in the university library at Leipsic, and printed with Raymond Murray's Pugio Fidei.

Herman also wrote Vita S. Godfridi Cappenbergensis, found in the Acta Sanctorum under Jan. 13.

Herman, Lebrecht Frederick, D.D., one of the early ministers of the Dutch Reformed Church, was born in the principality of Anhalt-Köthen, Germany, Oct. 9, 1761. He prosecuted his literary and theological studies in Europe, and for a while served as an assistant pastor in Bremen. In 1786 he emigrated to America, under the auspices of the synods of Holland, to aid in supplying the German churches in Pennsylvania with the means of grace. He labored for a short time in and around Easton, Pa., afterwards in Germantown and Frankford, near Philadelphia, and finally in Montgomery County. He died Jan. 30, 1848. Dr. Herman paid much attention to the training of young men for the ministry. He was in his day a prominent minister, and a learned and able theologian. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church, ii. 360. (D. Y. H.)

Hermes. We give the latest account of an ascent of this remarkable mountain (Conder, Tent Work in Palestine, i, 261 sq.):

"We commenced the ascent of some 5000 feet about 10.30 A.M. from Rasheiah, which is three hours distant, passing first through the fine vineyards, into which the snow often come down, from the summit, to eat grapes; thence along lanes with stone walls, passing clumps of wild rose, of oak, and of hawthorn, and honeysuckle in flower. We thus reached the bottom of the main peak, consisting entirely of gray rocks, worn by snow and rain into jagged teeth and ridges, covered with a loose chippings or gravel. It seemed impossible for horses, and still more for laden mules; to toil up; but the breeze grew fresher, and the bracing mountain air seemed to give vigor to man and beast. Resting at intervals, we gradually clambered up, passing by the little cave where the inhabited Druze retire, for three or four months, and perform unknown rites. Ridge after ridge of rock and gray gravel appeared, each seemingly the last, each only hiding one

He published, Kunstereträge (Glogau, 1855, 2 vols.); — Der katholische Schwalberger nach seinen Anspreechungen und Amtesverrichtungen (Breslau, 1869, 3 vols.); — Die Verwaltung der heiligen Basisskunststube (Paderborn, 1859). (B. P.)

Hersog, Johann Jacob, D.D., a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Bazel, Sept. 12, 1805. He entered the university of his native town in 1822, and afterwards studied at Berlin. From 1835 till 1846 he held a professorship of historical theology in the Academy of Lausanne, and was involved with his colleagues, the district of Venice and Chappaqua, in the struggles which resulted in the formation of the Free Church of the Canton de Vaude. Here, at Bazel, he published his Life of the Bazel Reformer, Ebdolamphadius (1843, 2 vols.). In 1847 Hersog was invited to fill a chair at the University of Halle, where, in 1848, he published in the university programme, De Origine et Pristio Statu Waldensium. In 1851 he received a commission from the Prussian government to visit Geneva, Paris, London, and Dublin, in order to investigate the sources for the history of the Waldenses. The result of this mission was his work, Die romanischen Waldenser, etc. (1853). At this time, also, he conceived the plan of his Reialt. Enzyklopädie für protestantische Theologie und Kirche, which was published in 22 vols. from 1854 to 1868. After beginning this work he had left Bazel for Erlangen, to succeed Dr. Ehrard as professor of reformed theology. In 1872 he retired from active academic duties. The last years of his life were occupied with his Abriss der gesammten Kirchengeschichte (1876-82, 3 vols.), and with the preparation of a second edition of his Reialt. Enzyklopädie, which at the time of his death had reached the tenth volume, or the second third of the entire work. He died at Erlangen, Sept. 30, 1882.

Besides the works already mentioned, he also published, General View of the Ruins of Heshbon from the North-west, with Jebel Neba in the Distance. (From a Photograph by the Editor.)

Heshbon is thought by Lieut. Conder (Quar. Statement of the "Pal. Explor. Fund," Jan. 1875, p. 25 sq.) to be el-Mesheba, at the foot of the white chalk peaks of el-Ghur, three miles west of Tell-Milh, in the vicinity of Beersheba; and Tristram (Bible Places, p. 20) accepts the identification; but it rests merely upon a presumed order of the names.

Hesperides, in Greek mythology, were daughters of Atlas and Hesperis, and are mentioned as being from three to seven in number. When Juno married Jupiter, all the gods brought presents. Earth brought forth a tree, on which grew golden apples. Juno commanded the sisters, Hesperides, to guard them. But the latter helped themselves to the apples. She therefore sent a son of Typhon and Echidna, the frightful, never-sleeping, hundred-headed dragon Ladon, to the tree, who scared everything away that approached. Hesperides was sent there to get three apples out of the garden for Eurytheus. According to Diodorus, the Hesperides were daughters of Atlas, weaned by Bursiris, and liberated by Hercules, whereupon the latter received the desired Mela (apples) from their father voluntarily.

Hess, Carl Ernest Christoph, an eminent German engraver, was born at Darmstadt in 1755. In 1776 he settled at Augsburg, and executed several fine plates, which gained him admission to the Academy in 1780. In 1782 the elector palatine appointed him engraver to the court, and in 1787 he visited Italy for improvement. On his return to Germany he remained some time at Munich, and afterwards practiced the art with great success at Düsseldorf until 1794. He returned to Munich. Among his esteemed productions are The Ascension; The Holy Family; St. Jerome. He died in 1792.

Hessius, Helius Eobanus, one of the most excellent Latin poets of Germany during the 16th century, was born Jan. 6, 1488, at Halberhausen, Hesse. He studied at Erfurt, was rector there in 1509, but left that place on account of the then existing troubles. In 1514 he was a monk of Erfurt, and in 1516 he was professor at the university. In 1526 he was called to Nuremberg, but returned to Erfurt in 1533, and accepted a call to Marburg in 1536. Hessius died Oct. 4, 1540. He observes a place here on account of his zeal for the Reformation. He made a metrical version of the Psalms, when he was called to Nuremberg, and the Hexameter Poems (Hessius Schwytert, Helius Eobanus Hessius, ein Lebenbild aus der Reformationzeit (Halle, 1784); Krause, Helius Eobanus Hesseus, sein Leben und seine Werke (Gottha, 1879). Hey, Wilhelm, a Protestant theologian of Ger­many, was born March 26, 1790. He studied at Jena, was court­preacher at Gotha, and died May 19, 1854. He published, Predigten (Hamburg, 1880, 1882): Er­zählungen aus dem Leben Jesus für die Jugend aktlerisch be­schrieben (1880). See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 592; Wi­ner, Handbuch der theol. Lit., ii, 106. (H. P.)

Heyde, Johann Daniel, a Lutheran theologian of Gernnay, was born April 27, 1714. He studied at Leipzig, was teacher at Gera in 1737, and died Aug. 12, 1785. His publications are sermons, partly his own, partly translations from the French of Massillon and Boul­bœme. See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutsch­lands, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. ii, 388; Jö­cher, Allgemeines Gelehrten­lexikon, s. v.

Heym, Albert, a Protestant theologian of Ger­many, was born in 1801. He studied at Leipzig and Berlin, was tutor of prince Frederick Carl from 1830 to 1844, and preacher at Sakrow from 1844 to 1848. In the latter year he was appointed court­preacher at Potsdam. He died Dec. 9, 1878. (B. P.)

Heym, Johann Gottlob, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Feb. 25, 1738. He studied at Wittenberg, and died at Dolzig, in Lower Lu­sa­nia, Jan. 24, 1788. His publications are several volumes of ser­mons. See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutsch­lands; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. ii, 192, 381; Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 558. (B. P.)

Heyne, Johann, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born in 1804 at Lee­bach, Silysia. He took holy orders in 1827, acted as priest at different places till 1857, when at his own request he was made custos of the cathedral­library at Breslau, with a view of persuading the archives there. He died Oct. 29, 1871. Heyne is the author of Dokumente Geschichte des Bistums und Hochstiftes Breslau (Breslau, 1860–68, 3 vols.). (B. P.)

Heynlin de Lapide, Johann, one of the last eminent representatives of scholasticism, was a native of Leiden, and a student at Leiden and Paris. In 1473 he settled at Banne, and, as a decided realist, caused, first at Banne, afterwards at Tübingen, whether he moved in 1477, so violent a contest between realism and nominalism that he finally determined to retire al­together from public life, in 1487. He spent the re­mainder of his life in a Carthusian monastery in Baze­le, and died in 1496. Heynlin wrote a commentary on Aristotle while at Paris, but it was not published until many years later, by his pupil Amerbach. He also directed the edition of the works of St. Ambrose, which were published by Amerbach in 1492. Hier, the second member of a mystical triad compiled by Lao­Tse, the celebrated Chinese philosopher. It is described as follows: “That which you look at and do not see is called I; that which you hearken after and do not hear is called Hii: that which your hand reaches after and cannot grasp is called Wei. These are three beings which cannot be comprehended, and which together make but one.”

Hidai, in Hindû mythology, is the collective name of the three highest castes of the Hindû—the Brah­mins, Kahetias, and Banians—priests, warriors, and business men.

Hidâning, in Norse mythology, are the warriors who fall in a battle, invited by the beautiful shield­maidens, Hidari. They fight until the destruction of the world.

Hicstum (Isis), a sect of orthodox aecatics about the time of the emperor Marcian, who lived in monas­teries, and spent their time in singing hymns, accom­panied with religious dances.

Hickman, Charles, D.D., an English clergyman, was a native of Northamptonshire, and was a student of Christchurch College, Oxford, in 1667. He was minister of St. Ebbe's Church, Oxford, and lecturer of St. James's, Westminster, in 1692; subsequently rector of Hognerton, Leicestershire, and finally bishop of Derry in 1702. He died in 1718, leaving some Sermons (1690–1719). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Hickman, Henry, an English Nonconformist di­vine, was a native of Worcestershire, and educated at Cambridge. He was a fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford, was deprived at the Restoration, and became preacher to the English congregation at Leyden, where he died in 1692. He published several controversial theological treatises (1659–74), the best of which ap­peared without his name—Apologia pro Ministris in Anglici (vulgus) Non­conformistas, etc. (1664). See Chal­mers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Hickok, Milo Judson, D.D., a Presbyterian min­ister, was born at New Haven, Vt., Aug. 2, 1815; graduated from Middlebury College in 1835; was professor in Delaware College three years; graduated from Union Theological Seminary, N. Y., in 1841; became a tutor in Middlebury College; and was ordained a Con­gregational minister, May 4, 1842. He became profes­ sor in Marietta College, O., and pastor of the Church in Harmar, two years afterwards he accepted a call as stated supply to the Presbyterian Church of Utica, N. Y., and in 1845 was installed pastor of a Church in Rochester. In 1846 he was stated supply of a Presby­terian Church in Buffalo, Canada; the next year he was installed pastor of the Church in Schenectady, Pa., where he remained until 1808. His health failing, he removed to Marietta, O., where he died, July 19, 1879. See Gen. Cat. of Union Theol. Sem. 1876, p. 19. (W. T. S.)

Hidalgo, Michael Cottillas, called the “Wash­ington of the Mexican Revolution,” was parish priest at Dolores, a small town in the Department of Mexico. He appealed to his parishioners, raised the standard of Mex­ican freedom, headed the dissentients, and was pro­claimed generalissimo, Sept. 17, 1810. He was joined by adherents from every side, and in six weeks was marching on Mexico city as the head of eighty-thou­sand men. Five provinces recognised his authority.
Hidalgo, however, unfortunately halted in his advance on the capital, the royalists had time to rally, and he was utterly defeated at Puente de Calderon, Jan. 17, 1811, and after in vain endeavoring to rally the national army, was captured by treachery while endeavoring to escape to the United States. He was executed ten days afterwards. On his death, Morelos, another priest, assumed the command; a congress of forty members was called, but after the defeat and execution of Morelos, it was dissolved by general Teran, who succeeded him. The revolt was entirely quelled in 1819. Mexico gained its independence in 1822, which, amid anarchy and continual turmoil, it has retained until the present, barring the French occupation of 1862 to 1867. To-day the grateful republic of Mexico repeats in her decorations and uses on her postage-stamp the mild features of her illustrious son, the priest-patriot, Michael Hidalgo y Costillas. See (N. Y.) Cather. Almanac, 1876, p. 105.

Hieracites, a heretical sect which sprang up at the end of the 3d or beginning of the 4th century, founded by Hieracas or Hierax (q. v.).

Hieratic Writing, a species of sacred writing used by the ancient Egyptian priests, especially the Hierogrammatists, a sect of the 22d dynasty. It is found chiefly on the papyri, and is an abbreviated form of the hieroglyphics (q. v.). The matter of these manuscripts consists almost entirely of texts in reference to purely religious or scientific description, and of religious inscriptions.

Hieroduci (from ἵεροδους, sacred, and δούλος, a servant), monks of the Russo-Greek Church (q. v.), who are also deacons.

Hieroduli, in Greek cultus, were persons employed in the service of a temple, especially in Syria, Phoenicia, and Asia Minor. They were females, living near temples, who hired themselves out to strangers. They were obliged to care for the decorations of the temple, ministering the veils, washing the altars, etc. The priests had no other income than the presents which pilgrims to the sanctuary brought, and in order to draw as much of them as possible, the surroundings of the temple were occupied by numbers of priestesses, who gave the presents they received to the temple, as is still the case in India with the Dawaiashis (Bajisdowis). In Cappadocia, in the temple-woods of the Comanian goddess, Strabo met over six thousand, this custom came to Greece and Sicily, especially in connection with the worship of Venus, and many a beautiful temple was built with the money thus obtained. See DIANA; VENUS.

Hierogrammatists (from ἱερόγραμμος, sacred, and παραγωγή, a writing), the sacred scribes among the ancient Egyptians. They employed the hieratic writing (q. v.), in transcribing religious writings on papyri, and in giving an account of religious rites and ceremonies. It was their duty also to expound the sacred mysteries as far as they were allowed to be made known to the people. They carried a wand, and were dressed in linen garments. See SCRIBE.

Hieromancy (from ἱερὀμᾰγγία, sacred, and μάγγια, divination), a species of divination among the ancient Greeks and Romans, which consisted in predicting future events by observing the various appearances which presented themselves in the act of offering sacrifices. See DIVINATION.

Hieromonachii (from ἱερόμοναχος, sacred, and μόνος, a monk), monks of the Russo-Greek Church (q. v.), who are priests. They are considered sacred monks, and occupy an exalted position in the Church, exercising functions on either the chief or the principal altar, the principal altar, containing the high altar, is sometimes called the “high chancel.” See ALTAR.

Hieronymi, Joseph, an English painter, was born at London in 1692, and was articled to an attorney in 1707, against his inclination. He employed his leisure hiss in painting, finally commenced it as a profession, and soon met with employment. Shortly after he was engaged in 1832 by the duke of Richmond to do some work. In 1782 he visited the continent for the purpose of seeing the Düsseldorf Gallery, and two years after he went to France in order to examine the galleries there. He executed a series of pictures, which were engraved and published in 1746. His sacred subjects were, The Good Samaritan; The Finding of Moses; Hagar and Ishmael. He died in 1780. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, a.v.; Rose, Biog. Dict. a.v.

Hill is the name given to the devil among the Finns. He is described as having only three fingers on each hand, but those armed with large nails, with which he tears in pieces all who fall into his power. He is supposed to reside in the forest, whence he sends out all manner of diseases and calamities, with which he afflicts mankind.

Hildrop, John D.D., an English clergyman, was rector of Wath, near Rippon, Yorkshire. He died in 1766, leaving a number of sermons, theological treatises, etc. (1711-92). His miscellaneous works appeared in 1754. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, a.v.

Hille, (1) an old English word, signifying to put on a roof or cover. In old documents it is sometimes spelled "helye," "hylle," and "hyle." (2) the covering of a church roof.

Hilgiers, Bernhard Joseph, a Roman Catholic divine, of Germany, was born in 1805. In 1827 he took holy orders, was pastor at Sieburg in 1828, took the degree as doctor of theology at Münster in 1834, commenced his academic career at Bonn in 1835, and died Feb. 7, 1874. He published, Uber das Verhältnis zwischen Leib und Seele im Menschen (Bonn, 1854);—Symbolische Theologie (1841);—Kritische Darstellung der Häresien, etc. (1857);—Homilien (published after his death, 1874). (B.P.)

Hilgord (or Hlegot), a French prelate, was at first canon of St. Genieve, and afterwards bishop of Soissons in 1055. But grave difficulties arose against his appointment, in consequence of which he resigned about the year 1056, but was restored to his diocese in 1059, and made a trụor of the Archbishop of Marmoutier. He died Aug. 4, 1104. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Dict. a.v.

Hill, Benjamin M., D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Newport, R. I., April 5, 1738. He entered the preparatory department of Pennsylvania University, but was prevented from proceeding to New Orleans, as a clerk; and subsequently studied medicine for a time in Philadelphia. He was converted in 1812; licensed in February, 1815; for two years preached in Leicester and Spencer, Mass.; in 1818 was ordained in Stafford, Conn., where he remained three years, and was then called to the pastorate of the First Church in New Haven, where he continued from 1821 to 1829. The next ten years of his ministry were with the First Church in

Troy, N. Y. In 1840 he became corresponding secretary of the American Baptist Home Mission Society, which position he held for twenty years. He died in New Haven, Jan. 15, 1881. See Christian Secretary, Jan. 19, 1881. (J. C. S.)

Hill, Charles, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in Kings County, Ireland, Jan. 6, 1800. In 1822 he became a student in Horton College, completing the course in two years, and then became pastor of the Church at Middletown. In 1834 he was appointed secretary of the Home Mission Society; in 1842 he became pastor of the Heneage Street Church, Birmingham, where he remained until 1851, when he removed to the United States; was pastor in Belvidere, Ill.; chaplain, for a time, to the Federal forces, engaged for a short period with the University of Chicago, and finally took up his residence in Belvidere, where he died in 1872. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1873, p. 273. (J. C. S.)

Hill, William Wallace, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Bath County, Ky., Jan. 26, 1815. He prepared for the ministry under the Rev. A. Sterling and graduated from Centre College in 1835; entered Princeton Theological Seminary the same year, and remained two years. He was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, April 24, 1838, ordained by the Presbytery of Louisville, Oct. 3 following, and installed pastor at Shelbyville, where he served four years. He then took charge of The Protestant Herald, published at Bardstown, but removed to Frankfort, as a more central place of publication. In November, 1844, he again removed with his paper to Louisville, and its name was changed to The Presbyterian Herald. As a religious newspaper it had few equals in the land. Its publication ceased in 1862, on account of the war. From 1845 to 1860 he was also corresponding secretary of the Western Executive Committee of the Board of Domestic Missions. He then founded Bellwood Female Seminary, near Louisville, and was its principal from 1862 to 1874. During these years he also preached more or less regularly at Plumb Creek, Middletown, and Anchorage. In 1874 he accepted the charge of the Synodical Female College at Fulton, Mo., and supplied the Presbyterian Church of that place. He left Fulton in 1877, and went to Sherman, Texas, where he commenced teaching in Austin College, preaching for the Church there at the same time. He died May 1, 1878. See Necrology of Princeton Theol. Sem., 1879, p. 39.

Hille, Wilhelm, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Feb. 16, 1603. He studied at Göttingen, was from 1824 to 1833 teacher at the gymnasium in Wolfenbüttel and Helmstedt, in 1833 pastor at Marienthal, in 1834 superintendent, in 1840 general superintendent and pastor principal at 11 Helmstedt, in 1845 principal of 11 Helmstedt. In 1875 he retired from his many positions, and died Oct. 2, 1880. As Christianity had become a reality in Hille, who had freed himself from the fetters of rationalism, he became to many a leader to Christ. He published, Orantia Ecclesiæ (Helmstedt, 1844);—Zeuogische von Christo (1859). See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 557. (B.P.)

Hillel Manuscript. Of the ancient Hebrew MSS., now no more extant, the most famous is the codex Hillel. As to this name there is a difference of opinion. From Jewish history we know that there were two rabbis by the name of Hillel, who lived in the first century before Christ, called Hillel I, the Great, the other who lived in the fourth century after
HILLEL MANUSCRIPT

Christ, called Hillel II. Some, as Schickhard (Jews Reg. Hellenor., ed. Carpoz, Leipsic, 1674, p. 89) and Cuneus (De Republ. Hebr., p. 159), attributed this codex to the elder Hillel; others, as David Gianis, in his Talmud, Daniel Buxtorf, in his De Cod. Hierosolym., etc. (Baalé, 1648), p. 838, attributed it to the younger Hillel. A third opinion is that this codex derives its name from the fact that it was written at Hilla, a town built near the ruins of ancient Babylon, so Furst (Gesetze der Muraudoen, p. 32 sqq., 158, note 14), and Ginsburg (Lever's Manusc. hebr., xiv, p. 320, note 40). But none of these opinions seems to be correct. Against the first two we have the explicit testimony of Abraham ben-Samuel Sukkuto (v. q.v.), who, in his Book of Genealogies, entitled Sepher Yezchias, says that when he saw the wonder of this codex (cited A.D. 1500) it was 900 years old. His words are these: "At the year 4956, on the 28th day of Ab (i.e. in 1196, better 1197), there was a great persecution of the Jews in the kingdom of Leon from the two kingdoms which came to besiege it. It was then that the twentv-four sacred books, which were written long ago, about the year 600, by rabbi Moses ben-Hillel, in an exceedingly correct manner, and after which all copies were corrected, were taken away. I saw the remaining two portions of the same, viz. the earlier prophets (i.e. Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings), and the later prophets (i.e. Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the twelve minor prophets), written in large and beautiful characters, which were brought to Portugal and sold in Africa, where they still are, having been written 900 years ago." Kimchi, in his notes to I Kings xvi, 4, says that the Pentateuch of this codex was extant in Toleto (apparently Tapaos, Facchini, ed. Filipowski, Lond. 1857, p. 220, col. 2). From this statement it may be deduced that this codex was written about the 7th century. As to the third opinion, deriving the name from Hilla, a town near Babel, we may dismiss it as merely ingenious. A better opinion is that of the name of Hilla (Hunca, p. 16), who says, "Fortasse tamen recte cognitius eum nuncn modo in Hispania suiuss. This is also the opinion of the famous critic Jedidia Norzi (v. q.v.), who remarks, on Gen. i, 5: "He was a very good Manesetic scholar, and a scribe in the city of Toleto." Whatever uncertainty may be about the derivation of its name, it is certain that this codex is very important for the criticism of the Old Test. Hebrew text, as the many quotations which we find in Norzi's critical commentary, entitled יִבְּשָׁבְש, published at Mantua, 1742-44, Vienna, 1818, Warsaw, 1800-66, and in Lonzano's critical work, entitled רְנֵר רְנֵר, indicate. In the 12th century this codex was perused by the Jewish grammarians, Jacob ben-Eleazar, as David Kimchi testifies in his grammatical work, Michalud (ed. Fürth, 1798, fol. 78, col. 2), and rabbi Jacob ben-Eleazar writes that in the codex Hillel, which is at Toleto, he found that the דולכ ה is read רפכה (Deut. xii, 1), and fol. 127, col. 2, in fine, he writes: "In the codex Hillel, which is at Toleto, the word רפכה (Lev. vi, 10) is written with a ה, and not ה, as our present text has it." We subjoin some readings of the codex Hillel:

Gen. iv, 8: In some editions of the Old Test. there is a space left between כָּנָר רָוָא and כָּנָר מַלִּים, and is marked in the margin by וּפָעֵי, i.e. space. The LXX, Sam., Syr., Vul., and Jerome, Targum and Targumion, add, "let us see if anything is written in the field." The space we have referred to is found in the editions of Buxtorf, Ménnevisz ben-Jerem., Walden, Nissel, Hutter, Chatsch., and Kings. But, says Luzzatto, the space is a mistake of the printer, for in the MSS. which he consulted, and in codex Hillel, there is no space. The addition "let us see if anything is written in the field," is not found by Synmacheus, Theodotion, and Onkelius. Even Origen remarks שְׂגַר הֶלְבּ הַשָּׁה אְסִד לְקָרְשָׁה אֲשֶׁר גִּבַּרְשָׁה (Tom. ii, 30).

Gen. iix, 16: In this codex, here Lonzano remarks that the second sem is written with קְבָּא, and in cod. Hillel. In the edition of Bar and Deltiscus the word is thus written, קְבָּא קְבָּא.

Gen. xix, 20: In this codex, here Lonzano says that מ is read רפכה, but in cod. Hillel it is written with a serep. In Bar and Deltiscus the word is thus written, מ רפכה.

Gen. xxvii, 25: In cod. Hillel, says Lonzano, the accent dages is in the god. In our editions it is, or rather under the bet, בָּר וְנַיְלַסִּיסְכָּל. In cod. Hillel, and write נַיְלַסִּיסְכָּל.

Gen. xxxii, 6: In cod. Hillel, remarks Lonzano, it is written מְדִילְבַּל, i.e. in the codex Hillel, the reading is with אִלּ הַלַּבַּל.

Gen. xli, 14: In cod. Hillel and other cod. the word רפכה is, i.e. מְדִילְבַּל.

Exod. ix, 3: In cod. Hillel, remarks Lonzano, it is written מְדִילְבַּל, i.e. in the codex Hillel, the reading is with אִלּ הַלַּבַּל.

Exod. xxxvii, 8: In cod. Hillel and in some other cod., remarks Lonzano, it is written with a serep. In Bar and Deltiscus it is written מְדִילְבַּל, i.e. that these two verses are not found in the codex Hillel. Similar is the remark in a MS. formerly belonging to H. Lottas, of Leipsic.

Prov. viii, 14: A great many cod., edita, and ancient versions, as Syriac, Vulgate, Targum, and even the Græcæ Veneras, read here מְדִילְבַּל, while the Commentators text and other cod. read מְדִילְבַּל, which is also supported by codex Hillel, and is adopted in Bar's ed. of Prov.

These few examples will show the importance of the codex Hillel for the text of the Old Test. (B. P.)

HILLGUR, JOHANN ZACHARIAS, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Jan. 1, 1698, at Chemnitz. He studied at Leipsic and Wittenberg, was in 1717 adjuct to the philosophical faculty at the latter place, in 1724 professor of philosophy, in 1725 superintendent at Sayda, in Saxony, and died Jan. 16, 1770. He wrote, De Libro Sacerdot. et Jus. x, 15 (Leipsic, 1714);—De div. leg. et Civil. audi. et Script. de Vol. Weigelii (1721);—De Plegia Magni a Horo. Hinduistic Version of the Scriptures. Hindu- stani (or Urdhu), the language of "Hindustan," or "country of Hind," is a mixed language, and owes its formation to the intercourse of the Mohammedan invaders with the conquered natives of India. At the time of the first Mohammedan invasions, which date from the 10th century, Hindu, or Hindi, was the prevailing dialect in Northern India. On their permanent settlement in India the Mohammedans adopted this dialect as the medium of communication with the natives, but they greatly altered it by the introduction of words and idioms from the Persian and Arabic, their own vernacular and liturgical languages. The new dialect thence arising was called Urdu (camp), or Urdu Zabun (camp language), because the language of the Mohammedan camp and court; it was also called "Hindu- stani," from the geographical region through which it ultimately became diffused.

The first translation of any portion of Scripture into Hindustani seems to have been made by B. Schulee, a Danish missionary. His version of the Psalms was published by Callenberg at Halle in 1746, and the New Test. in 1758. But the most important translation that has been made into this language is that of the New Test. by the Rev. Henry Martyn, which appeared, after much delay, at Serampore in 1808. This version has obtained such a high reputation that it led to a demand for an edition in the Devanagari (or regular Sanscrit) character, for the benefit of the Hindoos in the upper provinces. An edition in this character was published in 1817 by the Calcutta Bible Society. Subsequent editions of the Hindustani Scriptures were, however, issued in this dress, for it was found by experience that the Scriptures in the Hindu dialect (q. v.) were far more acceptable than in the Hindustani to the numerous class of natives who employ the Devanagari characters. For their use, as we shall have occasion to mention (see Hinduistic Version), Martyn's New Test. was eventually divested of its Persian and Arabic terms, and transferred into the Hindu dialect by Mr. Bowley.

While these editions were issued by the Calcutta Auxiliary, the publication of an edition in London had been contemplated by the British and Foreign Bible Society since the year 1815, and was published in 1819, under the superintendence of professor Lee. Four thousand copies of this edition were sent to Calcutta. The committee at the latter place now turned their attention to the publication of a Hindustani Edition of the Old Test. The first portion of the work published was the Pentateuch, which appeared in 1823, and in 1844 the Old Test. was completed, and editions, both in Arabic and Roman characters, were distributed. The Hindustani version of the Scriptures has undergone subsequent revision at the hands of a committee appointed for the purpose, and later editions, both of the Old and New Tests, have appeared. Some of these have been printed in the Arabic, and others in the Roman character. At present there exist four different versions in Hindustani, the first of which was published by J. Martyn, the second by Dr. Lee and others, the third Yate's version, and the fourth the Benares' version, so called from the place where it was made. See Bible of Every Land, p. 94.

Hinduistic Version of the Scriptures. Hindu- du (called Hindi by the Serampore translators), with its various dialects, is spoken in all the upper provinces of India. Its affinity to the Sanscrit is very remarkable, and about nine tenths of its words may be traced to that language. In idiom and construction Hinduistic resembles Hindustani; the chief difference between the two dialects consists in this, that while Persian and Arabic words and phrases predominate in Hindustani, the Hindu is entirely free from foreign admixture, and the proper mode of writing it is in the Devanagari or regular Sanscrit characters. Beside these, the Kity, or Kaithi, or writer's character, an imperfect imitation, and in some respects an alteration, of the Devanagari, is also used in writing and printing Hinduistic very largely by the trading community, and it is said that of the lower class of natives there are ten who read and write in the Kity for one who transacts business in the Devanagari.

A version into the Hinduidi language was commenced in 1802, and in 1807 the whole of the New and parts of the Old Test. were completed and ready for revision. It is one of the versions made by the late Dr. Carey. In 1811 the New Test. was published at Serampore, followed in 1819 by a second edition. A third was soon needed, and the Serampore missionaries determined to publish the version executed by the Rev. John Chamberlain. In 1819 the gospels in the Devanagari character were published, and in the following year another edition appeared. The whole of the New Testament was published in 1821. The Old Testament, in Dr. Carey's translation, appeared in 1818. From time to time new editions were published in both characters by the Serampore missionarial societies, each edition having been subjected to a careful revision.
HINDUWI VERSIONS

There also exists another Hinduwi version of the entire Bible, known as the Bowley translation, so called from its author, the Rev. William Bowley, for many years missionary at Benares. His New Testament was completed in 1825, but the version is not a new or independent translation, but is throughout substantially the same as Martyn's Hindustani version, from which it differs chiefly in the substitution of Sanscrit for Persian and Arabic terms. Martyn's Testament was thus adapted to the use of persons speaking the Hinduwi dialect, by Mr. Bowley, agent of the Church Missionary Society at Chunar. Being under the necessity of translating Scripture, he consulted the English A. V. in all passages where the Hindustani idiom required him to alter Martyn's renderings, referring at the same time to the best commentators on Scripture. In the same manner he undertook the transference of the Hindustani version of the Old Testament into the Hinduwi dialect, following in his translation of Isaiah the one made by bishop Lowth. The idiom of the version was excellent. After all, it was felt that a revision for the purpose of conforming his version to the originals and correcting the misapprehensions of the English idiom, was long overdue.

After the formation of the North India Bible Society in 1845, this matter was taken in hand, and a revision of the New Testament undertaken. The committee consisted of Messrs. Leopold, Kennedy, and Schneider, and the work was carried through the press at Secunderabur, under the superintendence of Mr. Schneider, in 1850 and 1861. These copies of the New Testament were destroyed during the mutiny in 1857. The Rev. J. Ullmann was then sent to England to bring out a new edition, which included a revision, and the whole was completed in 1862. In the New Testament committee, consisting of Messrs. Schneider, Leopold, Kennedy, and Owen, was appointed to revise the Old Testament. This was brought out in two volumes at the Allahabad Mission Press in 1852 and 1853. These copies, too, were destroyed in the mutiny, and another revised edition was completed under the superintendence of the former editor; of this the first volume was issued in 1866, and the second in the beginning of 1869. At present the Hinduwi version is undergoing a thorough revision. See Bible of Every Land, p. 106.

HINDUWI, DIALECTS OF THE, AND OF CENTRAL INDIA, VERSIONS IN. The Hinduwi comprehends many dialects, strictly local and provincial, which differ from each other chiefly in the different proportions of Sanscrit, Arabic, or Persian terms entering into their composition. At a very early period translations into these dialects of Candaree, and by the Serampore missionaries, but these translations were not afterwards reprinted; some have been practically discontinued. See Bible of Every Land, p. 106.

1. Brj, or Brj-bhaut. This dialect is spoken throughout the province of Agara. In 1811 the Rev. John Chamberlain, then stationed at Agara, commenced a translation of the New Testament, in this dialect, and in 1813 he had finished the translation of the gospels. After much delay the New Testament was completed at press in the year 1825.

2. Baghelkur. This dialect is spoken in a district between the province of Bundelcund and the sources of the Nerbudda River. A translation of the New Testament was commenced in 1814, and was published at Serampore in 1821.

3. Cnau, or Cnau-ruja. This dialect is spoken in the Dosh of the Gauges and Jumna. A version of the New Testament was commenced in 1815 at Serampore, and completed at press in 1822.

4. Kusula, or Koshala. This dialect is spoken in the western part of Oude. In 1820 the gospel of Matthew was published at Serampore, and the New Testament was completed at press in 1824.

5. Jupau, or Jupau. This dialect is spoken in the province of Jupau, east of Marwar, and west of Agra. Only the gospel of Matthew was published at Serampore in 1815.

6. Marwati. This dialect is spoken in the province of Jupau, or Marwar, north of Sind. In this dialect the New Testament is extant since 1821.

7. Odupu. This dialect is vernacular in the province of Mewar, or Oudepur. Only the gospel of Matthew has been published at Serampore in 1825.

8. Ojaja. This dialect is vernacular in the province of Malwa of Central India. A version of the New Testament was published at Serampore in 1824. (B. P.)

Hingnok, in the mythology of the Hotentots, is the name of the first woman, not born, but created. She is worshipped as their chief protecting goddess.

Hinton, John Howard, an eminent English Baptist minister, was born at Oxford, March 24, 1791. He received his collegiate education at the University of Edinburgh, and, having decided to enter the ministry in the Baptist denomination, began his labors at Havercourt, West, where he remained for some time, and then removed to Reading. Subsequently he accepted a call to become the pastor of a large congregation worshiping in Devonshire Square, Bishopsgate, London. In 1811 he visited America, returning to England, but once more took up his residence in Reading, where he became again a pastor, though not of the same church with which he had before been connected. Here for several years he continued to reside, until he retired from the Baptist, and removed to Bristol. He died there, Dec. 17, 1878. Mr. Hinton was a voluminous writer. Among the works which he published were his Memoirs of William Knapp, a distinguished Baptist missionary to the West Indies;—A History of the United States (2 vols. 4to), of which several editions have been published:—Theology:—Elements of Natural History, besides many smaller productions on the voluntary principle in education and religion. His works have been collected in seven volumes. (J. C. S.)

Hipparchus, a martyr at Samosata, with several others, A.D. 297, under Galerius, variously commemmo-rated from 15 March to 18 August. (B. P.)

Hippocratis, a festival held by the Areians in honor of Poseidon (q. v.), in course of which it was customary to lead horses and mules in procession gayly caparisoned.

Hippogrig, in the mythology of the Middle Ages, a fabulous animal, half horse, half griffon, which draws the air with preternatural swiftness. The Italian poet, Bojardo, seems to have invented it. Modern German poets use the name frequently for the muses' steed, Pegasus (q. v.).

Hirnologie (σιρνολογία), an office-book in the Greek Church, consisting mainly of a collection of the Hirmoi, but containing also a few other forms.

Hirmos (ἱρμός). The Canons, which so form an important part of the Greek office, are divided into nine odes, or practically into eight, as the second is always omitted. Each ode consists of a varying number (three, four, or five are the numbers most frequently found) of troparia, or short rhythmic strophes, each formed on the model of one which precedes it, and which is called the Hirmos. The Hirmos is usually independent of the ode, though containing a reference to the subject-matter of it: sometimes, however, the first troparia of an ode is called the Hirmos. It is distinguished by inverted commas ('"') in the office-books. Sometimes the first words alone of a Hirmos are given, and it is not unfrequently placed at the end of the ode to which it belongs.

Hirsch (or Hirs), a name common to many Jewish writers, of whom we mention the following:

2. Ben-Nissan, who flourished in the 18th century, wrote יד פואר, novellae on the Pentateuch (Amsterdam, 1755).

Hirsch, Paul Wilhelm, a Jewish convert of Germany in the 18th century, who joined the Church in 1717, is the author of פורק ובראש, or Entdeckung der Tekofot or das schädelige Blut (Berlin, 1717) — פרק ובראש, or, Das von Gott den Christen aufs neue gewordene Juden-Geschenk (1718) — Beschreibung des jüdischen Weihnachts-Festes (1718) — Das Judenmärchliche Zerstreuung zum Sabath (1722) — Beschreibung der berühmten Endes Robben Jochmans (1728) — Nachriff von der Bedeutung der beiden Redensarten: Kopore werden und Krie rennen (1780). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 386; Wolf, Bibl. Hebr. iii, 901 sq.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Hirsch, Theodor, a Protestant theologian and historian of German origin (born Dec. 17, 1809). At Danzig. He studied at Berlin, was for some time professor at the Friedrich-Wilhelms gymnasium there, and in 1833 at Danzig. In 1856 he was called as professor of history and librarian to Greifswald, and died Feb. 17, 1884. He published, Beitrag zur Reformationsgeschichte (Dantzig, 1842) — Die Ober-Pfarrkirche von St. Marien in Dantzig (1845) — Domgese Handels- und Gewerbegegeschichte unter der Herrschaft des Deutschen Ordens (Leipzig, 1868). He also edited, with Strehle and Toepken, Scriptores Rerum Prussiae (1888 sq.). (B. P.)

Hirschel, Solomon, a Jewish rabbi, was born in England in 1762. He was educated in Germany and Poland, and was for some time preacher at Prenzlau, in Prussia. In 1802 he was called to London as rabbi of the synagogue in Duke's Place, but gradually his jurisdiction was extended to all the Jews of the Ashkenazi Minhe (i.e. German rite) in London, and indeed in England. It was during his time that the scattered elements formed by the English Jews were gathered into one compact mass, and the Spanish and Portuguese Jews, and the German Jews, who were formerly spoken of as two distinct "nations," became closely connected together as members of the same creed. He died Oct. 31, 1842. (B. P.)

Hirschfeld, Hermann T., a Jewish rabbi and writer, who died at Charlottenburg, Prussia, June 10, 1884, at the age of seventy, is the author of, De Literatura Deiphracticos Hebraorum; Moleculogia und Religionsgeschicht (1842) — Tractatus Moralph, cum Scholia Hermeneutica et Glossario nec Individus (Berlin, 1842) —: Wissens eines Juden (Posen, 1846) —: Der Geist der talmudischen Auslegung der Bibel (Berlin, 1847) —: Untersuchungen über die Religion (Breisla, 1856) —: Über die Loser der Unwissheit der Juden bei den verschiedenen Völkern (1868). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 400; Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 561. (B. P.)

Hirt, Aloysius Ludwig, a Roman Catholic divine, professor of archaeology at Berlin, was born June 27, 1759, at Donaueschingen, Baden, and died June 29, 1836. He is the author of Der Tempel Salomons (Berlin, 1802). See Winer, Handbuch der theolog. Lit. i, 189; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 400. (B. P.)

Hirs, Hermann, a Swiss theologian, was born at Zurich, April 17, 1818. He studied at his native place and at Tübingen, and died at Zurich, April 17, 1871, where he had been laboring since 1857. Hirsbel belonged to the so-called Protestanten-Verein. See Lang, Protestantische Kirchenbriefen (May 20 and 27, 1871); Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Hirs, Ludwig, son of Bernhard (q. v.), was born at Zurich, Aug. 27, 1801, and died April 18, 1841, professor of Hebrew. He is the author of, De Pentateuchi Versionis Syriacus quam Priscum Vetus Indulsa (Leipsic, 1825) — De Chaldaice et Biblicae et Sabaecae Autoritate Critica (1829) — Das Buch Hiob erklärt (1839); 8d. ed. by Dillmann, 1889). Hitchcock, Calvin, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Westminster, Vt., Oct. 25, 1787, graduated from Middlebury College in 1811, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1814. His first settlement was at Newport, R. I., where he was ordained Aug. 18, 1815. This pastorate was finished Oct. 1, 1820, and he was installed at Randolph, Mass. Feb. 28 following, and remained there for more than thirty years, the date of his dismissal being June, 1851. His residence thereafter was at Wrentham, where he died, Dec. 9, 1867. He made frequent contributions to the Boston Recorder, and published some Sermons. See Cong. Quarterly, 1866, p. 286.

Hitchcock, Henry L., D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Benton, O., Oct. 31, 1818, and educated at the Benton Academy, graduated from Yale College in 1832, and spent some time as a student in the Lane Theological Seminary. He was licensed to preach in 1837, and installed at Morgan, O., the same year. In 1840 he began the publication of the Columbus, and the next year was installed pastor there. In 1847 he was elected president of Western Reserve College, after leaving which position he lived in retirement until his death at Hudson, O., July 6, 1873. See Nervin, Prob. Ency- clop. s. v.
Hitchcock, Samuel Austin, a philanthropic layman of the Congregational Church, was born at Brimfield, Mass., Jan. 9, 1794. On March 29, 1812, he left home in the midst of employments which he founded with a merchant of Dudley. In 1830 he went to Boston and entered a dry-goods firm, established for the sale of goods manufactured by the different cotton-mills—the first in New England. In 1818 he went to Southbridge as agent of the Hamilton Woodman Company. He united with the Old South Church, in Boston, May 11, 1823, and was afterwards connected with the Church in Brimfield. In 1840 he gave $10,000 to Amherst College, and this was followed by other amounts until the aggregate reached $175,000. To Andover Theological Seminary his donations amounted to $120,000. To the town of Brimfield he gave $10,000, in 1855, to establish a free school, and subsequent donations increased this to $80,000, and it was called the Hitchcock Free High-School. In 1871 he gave $50,000 to Illinois College. These are only samples of his munificence. His donations aggregated about $650,000. Mr. Hitchcock was withal a humble Christian, seeking no notoriety in the bestowal of his wealth. He died in Boston, Nov. 28, 1873. See Cong. Quarterly, 1874, p. 517.

Hippodamas (good advice), in Hindu literature, is a famous collection of ethical tales and fables, compiled from various books and other works called Pancha-tantra. It has often been printed in the original, and translated into various languages.

Elitites. All that is known concerning this important Canaanite people, whose history is often referred to on the Egyptian and Assyrian monuments under the name Kheta, has been collected by Wright, Empires of the Elites (Long, 1894).

Hittorff, Jacques Imack, a French architect, was born at Cologne, Aug. 20, 1758. He entered the School of Fine Arts in Paris in 1810, and became architect to the government in 1818. He made a study of the remains of Greek architecture in Sicily, and followed the Greek artists in applying colors to most of its architectural designs. From 1824 he was engaged in the construction of important public buildings, of which the Church of St. Vincent de Paul is regarded as his masterpiece. He was elected to the Academy of Fine Arts in 1852, and died in Paris, March 23, 1887. His principal productions are, Architecture antique de la Sicile (Paris, 1826-30, 3 vols.); Architecture polychrome chez les Grecs (1831); Memoire sur l'opera et petra (1866).

Hitzig, Ferdinand, a German exegetical scholar, was born at Hauningen, in Baden, June 23, 1807. He studied at Heidelberg and Halle, commenced his academic career at the former place in 1827, accepted a call to Zurich in 1822, went again in 1861 to Heidelberg as Umbrecht's successor, and died Jan. 22, 1875. At Zurich Hitzig publicly announced himself in favor of calling Strauss. Though on the one hand a man without fear or hypocrisy, and on the other of a pellucid temperament and caustic wit, which seemed to exclude personal piety and gentleness, yet Hitzig was of a pious nature, and not only loved the Old Testament, but sought to serve the kingdom of God by his investigations. He enjoyed the esteem of his colleagues and friends among all of his opponents. We can adopt the words of Keim, in the dedication of his History of Jesus (2d ed. Jan. 1875): "To the memory of F. Hitzig, the honest man without fear, the faithful friend without deceit, the pride of Zurich and Heidelberg, the bold, resolute architect of Biblical science." Hitzig's earliest and by many the best work is his Urkunde und Auslegung des Propheten Jesajas (Heidelberg, 1833); his other works are, Die Psalmen, historischer und kritischer Kommentar (1835-36, 2 vols.; new ed. 1868-69); Uber Johannes Markus und seine Schriften (Zurich, 1842); and Mykola, Prophet of Philadelpia (Leipizig, 1846); Die Spruche Solomons (Zurich, 1858); Die zwolf kleinen Propheten (3d ed. 1865); Jeremias (1841; 2d ed. 1866); Eschleim (1847); Ecclesiaster (ed.); Daniel (1860); Das Holocaust (1856); Hoh (1874); Geschichte des Volkes Israel (Leipzig, 1859). As to the value of Hitzig's commentaries and Commentaries in Solomon's song disagreeable and repulsive; that he, in an almost incredible manner, declared the first nine chapters of the Proverbs to have been the last composed, etc. But, in spite of this, Hitzig will always have a place among each of his readers. He has shown that his work will for a long time remain a fountain of instruction and quickening to many." Hitzig also contributed to Schenkel's Bibl. Lexikon, to the Zeitschrift der deutschen morgenländischen Gesellschaft, and other periodicals. See Kneucker, in Protestantische Kirche e. a. (1875, col. 191-198); Wessch, in Bodenke Biographien, i, 377-380 (Heidelberg, 1875); Dietzel, Geschichte des Alten Testamentes in der christl. Kirche (Jena, 1869); Kamphaeusen, in Stift Herzog's Real-Encyklop. a. v.; Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, iv. (1907).}

Hoadley (or Hoadley), John D., an Irish prelate, was born at Tottenham, Sept. 27, 1767, and was brother to the celebrated Benjamin Hoadley, bishop of Winchester. John Hoadley was chaplain to bishop Burnet, and by him installed chancellor and canon residentary of the Church of Salisbury, archdeacon of Sarum, and vicar of St. Edmund's, and after the death of his father, and his brother being made canon of Hereford, by his brother, when bishop of that see. He was advanced, June 8, 1772, to the see of Leighlin and Ferna. He was translated to the see of Dublin, Jan. 18, 1788. In November, 1789, Dr. Hoadley was of the privy council, when the proclamation was issued requiring all justices, magistrates, etc., to search and seize arms in possession of any Papist, and to prosecute any papist who should presume to carry arms contrary to the intent of the proclamation. Dr. Hoadley adopted the views of his predecessor, and what was then styled the Irish interest in the country. He died at Rathfarnham, July 19, 1786. See D'Alton, Memoirs of the Archbishops of Dublin, p. 330.

Hobal, an idol of the ancient Arabsians, was demolished by Mohammed after he had taken possession of Mecca. It was surrounded by three hundred and sixty smaller idols, each of which presided over one day of the lunar year.

Hoby, James D., an English Baptist minister, was born in 1788. In his youth he enjoyed the friendship and counsel of the Rev. Joseph Ivicey, and in 1813 became co-pastor at Maze Pond, Southwark. In 1824 he resigned his pastoral work, and devoted himself to the advocacy of the several Baptist funds which go to the support of the aged ministers and poorly paid pastors. He paid special attention to the claims of churches in debt, and resided successively in Birmingham, Weymouth, and Tewkesbury, in order to assist poor churches and visit each of those places. He took great interest in young ministers, and in the Foreign Missionary Society, and visited America in its behalf. He was widely esteemed and greatly beloved. He died at Catterham, Surrey, Nov. 20, 1871. See (Lond.) Baptist Itinerary, 1872.

Hog sâgô (do this), a form of words solemnly pronounced by a herald when the ancient Romans were about to engage in a public sacrifice. It implied that the whole attention of the people was to be fixed on the service in hand.

Ho-Chang, a name given in China to the priests or Buddha. They strongly inculcated on their followers the worship of the three gods. See Guan, the THREE SACRED.
HÖCK, Heinrich, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Hamburg, Oct. 18, 1700. He studied at Giesens and Wittenberg, and died at his native place, April 26, 1775, pastor of the Trinity Church. He wrote:

1. Das Evangelium aus den Entwürfen (Hamburg, 1738-40, 4 parts); —
2. Die Siegel der Propheten in den Leiden Jesu (1738, 1748, 2 parts); —

HÖCKER, Johann, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born in 1581. He studied at different universities, was in 1609 deacon at Tübingen, in 1614 superintendent, and died June 7, 1617. He wrote, Syllogle Ulltaxisarum Articulorum inter Augustanae Convocatisae Theologiae et Pentecostias et Contra mentioned (in the original name of Calvisianus Convocatorum): —

1. Convinced Theologico-Philosophico: —
2. Questions a Significat de Syllogis, Scripturae, de Transsubstantiatione. See Fuchlein, Memoirs Theologorum Wittenbergensium; Jöcher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. F.)

HODAMO, the priest of the inhabitants of the island of Soorita, in the Indian Ocean, off the eastern coast of Africa, who, when the moon was full, or at its rising, worshipped the moon, and in this purpose they had temples called Moqamado. The Hodamo was chosen annually, and presented with a staff and a cross as the emblems of his office.

HODGE, Charles, D.D., L.L.D., an eminent Presbyterian divine, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., Dec. 27, 1797, his father, Dr. Hugh Hodge, being an eminent physician of that city. Charles was fitted for college first at Somerville Academy, N. J., and at the age of fourteen entered Princeton, one year in advance, graduating with the highest honors in 1815. After another year of classical study, he entered the Theological Seminary at Princeton, and graduated in 1819. He was licensed by the General Assembly of Philadelphia, Oct. 31, 1819, and during the following winter preached at the Falls of Schuylkill, the Philadelphia Arsenal, and Woodbury, N. J. Receiving as a licentiate from the Presbytery of Philadelphia by that of New Brunswick, July 5, 1820, he was appointed the same year to supply the churches of Georgetown and Lambertville for a number of Sabbaths during the following winter, and the next year "for Georgetown, as stated supply for one half his time during the ensuing six months;" also to supply Lambertville and Trenton First Church during the next year. At the end of the years from 1820 to 1822, in May, 1822, he became assistant pastor in the original language of Scripture in the seminary, which position he held until 1822, and was then elected by the General Assembly to the professorship of Oriental and Biblical Literature. At this time he founded the Biblical Repertory, to which was added the title of Princeton Review, in 1829. In 1825 he went to Europe, and spent three years in the universities of Paris, Halle, and Berlin, returning in 1829. Dr. Hodge, after this, devoted all his hours not required in seminary duties to the conduct of his magazine, which was already beginning to take rank among American periodicals, and also to studies and researches for A Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, which was published in 1833. This work was abridged in 1836, and then rewritten and enlarged in 1845. In 1840 he published A Constitutional History of the Presbyterian Church in the United States, in two volumes. In the same year he was transferred from the chair which he had filled for eighteen years, to that of exegetical and didactic theology, to which he was united by that of polemic theology, in 1851, when the institution of the professor's chair was fixed by philanthropic friends and pupils commemorated his semicentennial as professor in Princeton Seminary. Dr. Hodge was chosen moderator of the General Assembly.—Old School —in 1846. He died in Princeton, N. J., June 19, 1878. His works published in connection with the above, were:

Quaestiones ad Ephesos (1841, 1842); —

The Way of Life (1849, published by the American Sunday-school Union; republished by the London Religious Tract Society, 1842) — What is Presbyterianism? (1850) — Certain Questions onAP, N. Y. (1856, 8vo) — A Commentary on First Corinthians (1857) — A Commentary on Second Corinthians (1858) — Reviews and Essays Selected from the Princeton Review (ibid. 1857, 8vo) — Selections from the Biblical Repertory and Princeton Review (ibid. 8vo) —What is Durvilläism? (1874). During this time he was constantly engaged in collecting materials for his Systematic Theology, and also in conducting the Review. It is said he contributed one fifth of all the articles published in that periodical. In 1872 the Review was united with the Presbyterian Quarterly and American Theological Review. The Systematic Theology, in three volumes, later published by the Princeton Theological Society under the title of Systematic Theology, is the work of Dr. Hodge. By this his power is best demonstrated, and will be transmitted to posterity. It is published in Scotland and Germany, and in all the world where Christian theology is a subject of study this work is held in the highest esteem, as the best exhibition of that system of Calvinistic doctrine known as Princeton theology. As a writer on theological, ethical, and ecclesiastical subjects, Dr. Hodge was easily at the head of all his contemporaries, and the distinguishing grace of his writings was their exquisite clearness. No one was at a loss to know what he meant by what he said. He intended every word, and the authority on which he relied. His theology was Biblical. In the profoundest discussions, a text of Holy Scripture is a rock on which his structure of argument rests. Therefore the rationalism of modern schools, infusing itself into his own Church and the literature of the day, was to him a shame as well as a sin, and he resented and resisted it with tremendous energy and effect; his blows were those of a giant. No man has been more persistently abused than Dr. Hodge. He has been represented as the incarnation of bigotry. Those who could not understand his arguments or detect a flaw in his logic had to fall back on the only weapon left in their artillery. No man was farther removed from intolerance, bigotry, and persecution, as all who knew him while living, and now revere and venerate him dead, know. See Recent Reports of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1874, p. 9; Memorial Discourses, by Drs. Paxton and Boardman; Life, by Dr. A. A. Hodge (1880).

HODGE, John, D.D., a learned and respected English Presbyterian clergyman, was educated at Taunton for the ministry, and had his first pastoral charge at Deal, Kent. He removed to Gloucester, where he preached for some years. In 1749 he accepted a call to the church in the City of Squamos, London. Squamos became enfeebled with age, church members died, and he resigned in 1762 and lived in retirement, preaching occasionally till he died, Aug. 18, 1767. He bequeathed his valuable library to the Taunton Academy, where he was educated. He published a volume on The Evidence of Christianity, and several single Sermons. See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, i, 354.

HODGES, Richmond E., a minister of the Church of England, was born in 1838. When an apprentice in London, Mr. Hodges found an old Hebrew grammar, which fascinated his mind, and made him determine to become a Semitic scholar. The result was that, after acting as scripture-reader for a short time, he was sent, by the Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews, first to Palestine, then to Algeria, where he stayed until 1865. A few years afterwards he resigned his connection with the society, in order to devote himself more fully to linguistic studies. For some time he was a tutor of the British and Foreign Bible Society, but a few years before his death he was ordained a clergyman of the Established Church of England. He died May 9, 1881. Mr. Hodges published Ancient Egypt (1861); in 1868 he brought out a new and revised edition of Craik's Ptolemaic History; and in 1876 he published a new ed. of Cory's Ancient Fragments.
and at the time of his death he was engaged upon As English Version of the Armenian History of Mose of Khotanoc. He also assisted in the Old-Test. portion of the work, known as The Holy Bible in Parchment and Sections, with Emendations of the Text, and contributed largely to the Encyclopaedia Britannica, and to the supplement to the English Encyclopaedia. Hodgson, Francis, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born of Wesleyan parents, in Driffield, England, in 1815. He sailed to the United States in his youth, and with his parents settled in West Chester, Pa., where he developed a noble manhood. He entered the Philadelphia Conference in 1828, and served consecutively, Dauphin Circuit; Elkton, Md.; St. George's, Philadelphia; Harrisburg Circuit; and Columbia. In 1838 he was transferred to the New York Conference, and stationed at Vestry Street charge, afterwards at Mulberry Street, Middletown; Hartford; and New Haven. In 1845 he received a retransfer to the Philadelphia Conference, and was sent to Trinity charge, Philadelphia; Salem, Pa.; Harrisburg; St. Paul's, Wilmington, Del.; St. George's, Philadelphia; Union; Lancaster, Pa.; South Philadelphia District; Fifth Street, Philadelphia; and Salem, Pa. He was transferred to the Central Pennsylvania Conference in 1868, and stationed successively at Danville, Harrisburg, and Chambersburg. A superannuated relation was granted him in 1876 with the Philadelphia Conference, and he retired to that city, where he died, April 16, 1877. Dr. Hodgson was a persuasive orator, a successful preacher, a profound theologian, and a skilful polemic, as well as a man of deep piety and unwavering devotedness to the Church. Hodur (or Hoeder), in Norse mythology, was a very powerful god of the Aesir, but blind; the son of Odin and Frigg, therefore Baldur's brother. The latter having been made invisible most fortunate, Loki showed the blind Hodur the small plant mistletoe, which the latter threw at Baldur, who died and was taken to Hel in the infernal regions. A third son of Odin avenged Baldur's death, by slaying Hodur and sending him to Hel. Hodur and Baldr remain good friends, because the former committed the injury involuntarily.

Hoek, Jan van, an eminent Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1597, was instructed in the school of Rubens, and became one of his most distinguished scholars, who returning to Flanders he was invited to Vienna by Ferdinand II; and painted the portraits of the imperial family, and some historical works for the churches and public edifices. Among his historical works is a picture of the Deposition from the Cross, in the Church of Our Lady, at Mechlin, highly commendend. He died at Antwerp in 1650. See Hoefnagel, Biog. Hoffmann, August Heinrich (better known as Hoffmann von Fallersleben), a German theologian, was born at Gottingen, Luneburg, April 2, 1776. After studying at Gottingen and Bonn, he devoted himself at first to theology, but afterwards betook himself entirely to the history of literature. He died Jan. 20, 1874. Hoffmann edited, in connection with Endlicher, Fragmenta Theotica Versionis Antiquissimae Er. S. Mathurae et Alipot Herarun (Vienne, 1846); —William's Uebersetzung und Auslegung des Hoheliedes (Breslau, 1827); —Geschichte des deutschen Kirchenleides bis auf Luther's Zeit (1832; 2d ed. 1861); —*Raimund und Benj. Hoffmann, Franz, a Roman Catholic philosopher of Germany, was born at Aschaffenburg, Jan. 19, 1804. He studied at Munich, was in 1834 professor of philosophy at Amberg, in 1835 at Wurzburg, and died Oct. 22, 1881. He published, Vorhalte zur spekulativen Lehre Hundert Jahre (1844); Spohr, Kant und Hegel (1846); Spohr, das letzte Glied der Prinzipien der Wahrheit (1849); Logik (1851); Romantik (1852); —Baudelaire (1856); —Rimbaud et le Dieu (3d ed. 1871); —Kriege und Staat (1872); —Philosophische Schriften (Erlangen, 1867-81; 4 vols.). Hoffmann, as a former pupil of Baader, contributed greatly towards propagating his master's philosophy.

Hoffmann, Ludwig Friedrich Wilhelm, general superintendent of Brandenburg, was born Oct. 30, 1806, in Leonberg, Wuerttemburg. His father was the founder of the religious colony at Kornthal (1819), and his brother, Christoph, was the originaor of a movement for the colonization of Palestine. Hoffmann studied at Tubingen, where David Strauss was his fellow-student; was in 1829 vicar at Heumaden, near Stuttgart, in 1834 at Stuttgart, and accepted, in 1839, a call to Basle as inspector of the Mission Institute. He remained there for twelve years, giving himself up with great enthusiasm to his duties and to the study of the history of the Church. During this period he published, Missionstudien und Vorträge (Stuttgart, 1847, 1851, 1853); —Missionsfragen (Heidelberg, 1847); —Die Epochen der Kirchengeschichte Indiens (1858); —Die christl. Literatur als Werkzeug der Mission (eod.). From Basle he passed to Hamburg as professor of church history, and accepted the call of Frederick William IV as court-preacher to Berlin. He exerted a greater influence over the king of Prussia than any other man, in favor of ecclesiastical union. Hoffmann was an indefatigable worker, and was very influential as an evangelical preacher, sympathizing with the theology of Bengel. He died Aug. 28, 1878. He published a number of volumes of sermons under the title, Ref am Herm (Berlin, 1858-59, 8 vols.), and Ein Jahr der Gnade in Christi (1846); —Die Frauen Deutschlands (1861-62); —Kanonische Staat und gen.-politische Stellungnahme im Alten Testament (1854). Hoffmann, Johann Christian Konrad, (afterwards honored by Bavaria with the title von Hoffmann), a German theologian, was born Dec. 21, 1810, at Nu geremberg. He studied at Erlangen, where the Reformed theologian, Kraft, exerised a lasting influence on Hoff mann. From Erlangen he went to Berlin in 1825, at a time when Hegel, Schleiermacher, Neander, and Heng-

... were lecturing. After teaching several years at the Gymnasium in Erlangen, he became rector of the university, and now devoted himself exclusively to theology. Thus he writes in 1855, "The more I occupy myself with Scripture exegesis, the more powerfully am I convinced of the certainty that the divine Word is one single work, and the more am I stimulated with the glad hope that our generation will witness the victory of the truth of inspiration. It is especially the wonderful unity of history and doctrine, which becomes clearer and clearer to me. The whole Old-Test. prophecy is but a seeing of the deepest signification of history. It is this spiritual and immemorial certainty that the prophecies of the prophets and apocryphal are false, while their doctrines are true; for here form and contents, fact and doctrine, are one, which is the distinguishing characteristic of revealed truth... I pray God to permit me to see the Christ, now crucified by his enemies, lifted up by himself, that I may place my hands in the print of the nails, and may know him in the glory of his victory, whom I have heretofore loved in the humility of his conflict and suffering." In 1858 he commenced his academic career, and presented as his dissertation the work Der christliche Schriftgebrauch, in which he makes David the author of that psalm, but denies the common Messianic interpretation, by referring the psalm to the angel of Jehovah. In the year 1841 he was made professor, and published the first part of his famous work, Weisungsgem. und Erklärung (1842). In 1843 he became Doctors' Church, and was rector in 1843. His return to the latter place marked a new period of prosperity for the university, to which he devoted all his energies. He died Dec. 20, 1867. Hofmann took not only a deep interest in ecclesiastical matters, but also in political affairs, and was for several sessions a member of the Bavarian Parliament. Among Hofmann's first publications were some historical works, Geschichte des Aufsturzes in den Stürmen unter Ludwig XIV (1877); — Lehrbuch der Weltgeschichte für Gymn. (1879; 2d ed. 1880); — De Bellii ab Antiquo Epist. Adversus Pseudem. Guitt (1883). His first effort in theology was Die siebenzehn Jahre des Jeremiau und die siebenzehn Jahrhundert des Nuremberg (1886). Concerning this latter work he wrote to a friend: "If I am correct, I cause a great revolution in the Asyrian, Chaldean, Egyptian, and Jewish Chaldean, Jerusalem was destroyed in 605 B.C.; the seventy years of the Captivity go from 605 to 585, the sixty-two-weeks of Daniel (7 x 62 = 484) from 605 to 171, the sixty-third from 171 to 164. Thus the results of both investigations which I made independently, agree in the same conclusion, namely, that Jeremiah prophesied, and not in unison with the other." Weisungsgem. und Erklärung im allein und neuen Testament (1841-44) appeared at a time when two views of prophetic criticism: explained it away as presentiment, Hengstenberg petrified it into simple prediction. Hofmann brought prophecy into close connection with history, and treated it as an organic whole. History itself is prophecy; each period contains the germ of the future, and prefigures it. Thus the entire sacred history, in all its essential developments, is a prophecy of the final and eternal relation between man and God. The interpretation of Christ marks the beginning of the essential fulfillment; for this is the only realization of the intended perfect communion with God, when it is joined with the body of believers. The word of prophecy connects itself with prophetical history, both corresponding with each other. Each event in the course of history is followed by a progress of prophecy. When God gives divers forms to the history of the Old Testament, he thus exhibits the different sides which are comprehended and united in the person of Christ. Prophetic in the course of history becomes ever richer in form and content, pointed only to one goal—the God-man. He is then again the starting-point for new prophecy and new hope, for his appearance is the prefiguration of the final glorification of the congregation of believers.

The permanent value of this work consists in the proof that the Old and New Test. are parts of a single history of salvation; displaying the gradual realization, by divine interpositions, of redemption for the race. Between 1852 and 1856 Hofmann published his second great work, Schriften bez. ... (2 vols.; 2d ed. 1857-60). In this work he attempted to prove the authenticity and divine origin of Christianity from its reliability. He united the method of doing this from single passages of Scripture, and himself sought to use the Biblical record in its entirety as one organic whole. He started from the idea that, to understand Christianity, it was not necessary to describe religious experiences, nor to rehearse the doctrines of the Scriptures and the Church, but to develop the simple fact that makes us Christians, or the communion of God with man, mediated by Christ. Herein he differs fundamentally from Schleiermacher, who starts out from the sense of absolute dependence in the Christian's experience. Hofmann starts with the new birth. The results at which they arrive in their systems are therefore so entirely different. With Hofmann all is historical, with Schleiermacher, nothing. This work aroused opposition. The defenders of the doctrine of the atonement, and the charge was made against him of denying the atonement altogether. Hofmann had expected opposition. For a time he kept quiet, but finally he replied in Schriften über eine neue Weise, alle Wahrheit zu lehren (1866-69). Without continuing the controversy, Hofmann wrote his great recent work Schriften über die neuen Testament (1862 sq.), in which he endeavored to prove scientifically the inspiration of the Scripture and the integrity of the canon. After Hofmann's death there were published, Theologische Ethik (1878); — Enzyklopaedie der Theologie (edited by Bestmann, 1879); — Biblische Wissenschaft (edited by Volck, 1880). See Stichlin, J. Chr. K. v. Hofmann, in Luthardt's Allgemeine Luthersche Kirchenzeitung (1878); Grau, Erinnerungen an J. Chr. K. v. Hofmann, Leonard, professor of Oriental languages at Jena, who died Dec. 14, 1757, is the author of, De Ancilla Ebrae ad Exk. xxi, 7 (Jena, 1712); — Die Zeitliche Hebr. und der Sprach. Sprach. der Jer. (Jena, 1726); — Die Singulare Hebr. und der Sprach. Sprach. der Jer. (Jena, 1726). On the basis of these two works, he wrote his great work Der Anachronismus der Hebräer zu den folgenden Geschichten (1728). See Göttler, Gelehrtes Europa, ii, 484; Jücher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Förster, Bibl. Jud. 4, 404. (B. P.)

Hofstätter, Heinrich von, a German prelate, was born in 1865 at Aindling, in Upper Bavaria. He studied at first jurisprudence, and was already promoted in 1829 as "doctor utriusque juris," when he betook himself to the study of theology, received holy orders in 1833, and was in 1836 appointed cathedral-dean at Munich. In 1889 he was made bishop of Passau, and died May 12, 1875. (B. P.)

Hofstede de Groot, Pieter, a distinguished Dutch theologian, was born Oct. 8, 1892, at Leerdam, in East Frisia. In 1826 he was preacher in the Reformed Church, in 1829 professor at the university in Groningen, but resigned his professorship in 1872. He died Aug. 27, 1884. Hofstede was the head of the so-called "Groningen school," the adherents of whom called themselves the "Evangelicals." They represent the theologico-ecclesiastical middle-party, between the "Liberals" and the "Orthodox," and their organ, Waarheid in Liefde, edited by Hofstede de Groot, Parenau, and Van Goor (1867-73), is the best exponent of this school. Hofstede de Groot published several works: De Bibliographia Theologi Christiani (1840; 4th ed. 1851), and dogmatica et apologetica Christiana (1845). His own works are, Theologia Naturalis (1884; 4th ed. 1861); — Institutiones Historiae Ecclesiae Christi (1885); — Opere...
HOGAN, William, of some notoriety in Catholic controversy, a young priest of inferior education but good natural parts, who had been dismissed from Maynooth for a breach of discipline, left the diocese of Limerick in 1818 or 1819 for New York. He was first employed in the ministry in Albany, but left that city, against the wish of Dr. Connolly, then bishop of New York, and was temporarily installed by Rev. Dr. De Bary, administrator of the see of Philadelphia, Pa., as pastor of St. Mary’s Church in that city. In December, 1820, bishop Conwell took possession of the see, and having reason to suspect Hogan’s conduct in Ireland and a desire to withdraw his faculties, Hogan continued to officiate at St. Mary’s in spite of the censure of his bishop and the refusal of the archbishop of Baltimore to entertain his appeal, the trustees of the church supporting Hogan. On Feb. 11, 1821, Conwell excommunicated Hogan, appointed other trustees, occupied the church for some months, but in the summer of that year Hogan and his party took possession of the church. Bishop English of Charleston, visiting Philadelphia, and having promised Hogan a mission in his diocese, induced Conwell to grant him power to abate the troublesome ecclesiastical on proper submission. On Oct. 18, 1821, England absolved him; but the next day Hogan, hearkening to the advice of his trustees, restrained, said mass at St. Mary’s, and resumed his functions as pastor. England re-excommunicated him, and ordered the members now constituting the interfering church and went to St. Joseph’s, where the bishop had installed William V. Harold, former pastor at St. Mary’s. The two parties became more and more exasperated; the orthodox (as De Courey and Shear term the party who went with the bishop) hoped to defeat the schismatics by electing a new board of trustees. Every male occupant of a seat was an elector. The election took place in the church on Easter Tuesday, 1822, and led to sad results. The disorder was frightful; blood was shed; and the schismatics triumphant. But Hogan as pastor of the city returned from Rome, bringing a papal brief (Aug. 2, 1822), which solemnly condemned the schismatics of St. Mary’s. On Dec. 10, 1822, Hogan submitted, and received from Conwell his exact and removal of censures. On the 14th of the same month the unhappy priest, circumvented by the trustees (it is said), objectcd that the authenticity of the brief had not been shown, and continued to officiate and preach at St. Mary’s. He published violent pamphlets against his diocesan and bishop English, whom he sought to compromise. Hogan at length grew tired of his rebellion, left Philadelphia for the South, married, became a custom-house officer in Boston, went into the pay of the enemies of Romanism, published some books to stimulate the Know-Nothing movement. (Popery as it Was and Is, Boston and New York, 1842; Numererus and Auctor Confession, recently reprinted at Hartford,) and died in 1851 or 1852. The above account is from the standpoint of the opponents of Hogan. The historians of the Roman Catholic Church think the troubles of which Hogan was the victim were due largely to the trusty system, whose influence in the Catholic Church they deem pernicious, and it has caused many local schisms, of which this of St. Mary’s was the most celebrated and scandalous, and was not healed for many years. For an account of this schism, and voluminous documents, see HOGAN, William, a celebrated painter, was born at Basle in 1597 or 1698, apprenticed to an engraver at an early age, and at the expiration of his apprenticeship entered the Academy of St. Martin’s Lane. His first painting was a representation of Wanstead Assembly. He engraved some prints for Benjamin’s Military Punishments of the Ancients. As a painter, he had a great facility in catching a likeness, and adopted a novel method of grouping families. He therefore devoted himself to the delineation of the calamities and crimes of war, and the vices and follies of the Universal age. His series of The Harlot’s Progress; The Rake’s Progress, gained him great reputation. He was an eccentric genius, and his talents were eminently in burlesque and satire. He did not excel in historical painting, but among his principal plates there are some good works by him, representing The Good Samaritan; The Pool of Bethesda; Paul Before Felix; Moses Brought to Pharaoh’s Daughter. He died Oct. 26, 1764.

Holbein, Hans, an eminent Swiss painter, designer, and wood-carver, was born at Basle in 1498, although some think he was a native of Augsburg. He was the son and scholar of John Holbein, who settled at Basle, and resided there during the rest of his life. At the age of fifteen Hans manifested great abilities, and painted portraits of himself and his father which were engraved in 1512. He was invited by an English nobleman to visit England, but declined the invitation. Several years afterwards he formed an intimacy with Erasmus, and painted his portrait. The latter persuaded him to go to England, and gave him a letter to Sir Thomas More. On arriving in London he sought out that nobleman, who received him with kindness, giving him apartments in his house. One day Holbein, happening to mention the nobleman who some years before had invited him to England, Sir Thomas was desirous of knowing who he was, and on the close of the year the archbishop of Marvich (Marcel) returned from Rome, bringing a papal brief (Aug. 2, 1822), which solemnly condemned the schismatics of St. Mary’s. On Dec. 10, 1822, Hogan submitted, and received from Conwell his exact and removal of censures. Lyme, and Leyden. The most important of these are a set of wood -cuts, entitled, The Dance of Death, which, complete, consists of thirty -three upright plates, but is seldom found above forty -six. There are also, by Holbein, a set of ninety small cuts of subjects from the Old Test., which were published at Lyme in 1535. He made a number of designs from the Bible, which were engraved and published at Leyden in 1547. Holbein died at London in 1543. For a list of his works, see Spooner, *Bibl. Holcomb, Frederick, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, officiated for many years in Trinity Church, Northfield, Conn., until 1861, when he became the minister of Christ Church, Boston. In 1865 he was residing in Watertown without regular pastoral work. In 1868 he officiated in Christ Church, Harrington, in the neighborhood of Watertown, and continued in this work until his death, May 29, 1872, at the age of eighty-five years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1873, p. 126.

Holda (or Holla), in German mythology, was originally a friendly goddess of the ancient heathen Germans, probably the one mentioned by Tacitus, and compared with Iaia. The name is derived from the German hold, or hold, "mild." After the introduction of Christianity the goddess became a spectre, but still with friendly rather than threatening attributes. The myths about her are nowhere so spread as in Hesse and Thuringia. The popular belief in Holda (Frau Holla) is spread over the Rhine into Northern France and Lower Saxony. She is represented as a heavenly being, encircling the earth; when it snows she makes her bed so that the footsteps fly. She enjoys seas and wells; at noon she is seen bathing and disappearing in the stream. Mortals reach her dwelling through a well. Her yearly procession on Christmas is supposed to bring fruitfulness to the country, but she also rides with the furious army, or leads it. She loves music, but her song has a sorrowful tone.

Holebeck, Laurence, an English scholar, probably a native of Lincolnshire, was bred a monk in the abbey of Ramsey, and was one of the first Hebrew scholars of his age, a language then so unknown, even to the priests, that in the reign of Henry VIII, Erasmus, with his keen wit, says, "they counted all things Hebrew which they did not understand." (Dial. per Helg. Ev.). Holebeck made a Hebrew dictionary, counted exact in those days. Pines complains that Robert Wakefield, the first Hebrew professor at Cambridge, purloined this dictionary to his private use. Holebeck died in 1410. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), ii, 290.

Holiness, Beauty of, is a phrase occurring several times in the English Bible (always as a translation of the Heb. hadrath k'dhes, י'רֶשֶׁה גֹּיֹן, ornament of sanctity. 1 Chron. xvi, 29; 2 Chron. xx, 21; Ps. xxix, 2; cxvi, 9; in the plur. of the cognate term יַעַדָּר, ἱδρα, Ps. cxv, 3, which simply denotes splendid garments, such as are worn on festive occasions, i. e. "holiday suit," not necessarily the sacred priestly vestments, since it is usually, if not exclusively, applied to non-sacerdotal persons.

Hollar, Wenzelaus, an eminent Bohemian engraver, was born at Prague in 1607, studied at Frankfurt under Matthew Merian, and at the age of eighteen published his first plates, an Ecce Homo, and the Virgin and Infant. He made the tour of Germany. At Cologne he formed an acquaintance with the earl of Arundel, who took him into his employment. About this time the civil war broke out, in which Hollar became involved on the side of the royalists, and was made a prisoner by the opposite party in 1645. On obtaining his liberty he went to Flanders, and settled at Antwerp. In 1662 he returned to England, but gained little encouragement. He died March 28, 1677. There are about two thousand four hundred prints by this artist, and some of them possess considerable merit. The following are only a few of his sacred subjects: The Virgin Suckling the Infant Jesus and Carrying St. John; The Holy Eucharist; The Ecce Homo, with many figures; The Queen of Sheba Visiting Solomon; The Magdalene in the Desert Knelling before a Crucifix. See Spooner, Bibl. Hist. of the Fine Arts, a.v.

Holley, HORACE, LL.D., a Unitarian minister, was born at Salisbury, Conn., Feb. 12, 1781. He was fitted for college at Williams-town, Mass.; graduated from Yale in 1803; studied law for a few months; and then commenced the study of divinity under president Dwight of Yale, whom he succeeded in preacher in December, 1804, and was ordained and installed minister of the congregation in Greenfield, Sept. 18, 1805. He resigned this charge Sept. 15, 1808, and was installed as pastor of the Hollis Street Church, Boston, March 8, 1809. He accepted an invitation to the presidency of Transylvania University in 1818, and held that office till 1827, when he resigned it, with a view to taking charge of a seminary in Louisiana, but was attacked with yellow fever in New Orleans, and died July 31, 1827. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vii., 265.

Holliday, William Harrison, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Berkeley County, W. Va., Aug. 8, 1835. He was converted at the age of eleven, preached his first sermon at sixteen, entered Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pa., in 1853, and in 1855 was admitted to the Baltimore Conference. He served as junior pastor successively on Westminster Hillsborough, and Warrenton circuits. In 1858 he was sent to Summerfield Circuit, late in that year was transferred to the Iowa Conference, and appointed to Cascade; returned a year later to the Baltimore Conference, and subsequently served Baltimore, South Bend, and Montgomery circuits, South Baltimore Station, East Washington, Winchester District, East Tub, and Hartford Avenue. He died March 23, 1879. Dr. Holliday was a self-sacrificing, warm-hearted, heroic, successful preacher. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1879, p. 15.

Hollingworth, Richard, D.D., an English clergyman, was born at Westminster, and rector of St. Botolph's Aldgate. He published six sermons (1763-93), and several treatises upon the famous Essex-Hussite controversy. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Holmboe, Kristoffer Andreas, a Norwegian Orientalist, was born March 19, 1796. In 1825 he was professor at Christiana, resigned his office in 1826, and died April 2, 1828. He is the author of, "Travs ved Buddhisme en Norske Areal i Introductio de Christiania" (1837); Bibelk Real Ordbog (1868). (B.P.)

Holme, John Stanford, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in Philadelphia, March 4, 1822, and was a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania. John S. prepared for college at New Hampton, N.H.; first studied law in Philadelphia; but afterwards graduated at Madison University in 1850, and became pastor of a church in Watertown, N. Y. Four years later he was called to theorate of the Pierrepont Street Baptist Church, now the First, of Brooklyn, where he remained for some years, and then organized Trinity Baptist Church of New York, and was its pastor for fourteen years. He resigned that pastorate to accept that of the Riverside Baptist Church, at Eighty-sixth Street and the Boulevard, but his health failing, he passed much of his time resting in Europe. He died at Clifton Springs, N. Y., Aug. 26, 1884. Dr. Holme was noted for his literary attainments, having prepared the Plymouth Collection of Hymns for the Baptist churches, and compiled a regular copy book, entitled "Light at Evening Time." For some time he had been a member of the staff of The Homiletic Monthly. See Cathcart, Bapt. Encyclopedia, s. v.

Holmes, David, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Newburgh, N. Y., March 16, 1810. He became a printer; his brother was entered the Onedia Conference, filling many of its best stations till 1853, when he was transferred to the Southern Illinois Conference. After effective labors in it of five years he was transferred to the North-west Indiana Conference, wherein he served La Porte, Delphi, and Pittsburgh. From 1861 to 1866 he was principal of Battle Ground College, and in 1867 principal of North-western Indiana College. In 1868 he re-entered the regular work, and served successively Simpson Chapel, Greenwood; Brookstown; Monticello, and Battle Ground, Mich. He died Nov. 14, 1878. Dr. Holmes was a ripe scholar, an excellent logician, a thorough educator, an able preacher, and an author of merited repute. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1874, p. 86; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Holmes, Obadiah, a Baptist minister, was born at Preston, Lancashire, England, in 1666, and was educated at Oxford. He arrived in America in 1686. He continued a communicant with the Congregationalists, first at Salem, and then at Rehoboth eleven years, when he became a Baptist, and joined the Baptist Church in Newport, R. I. In 1652, when the minister, Mr. Clarke, sailed for England, Mr. Holmes took charge of the church in Newport, and this relation he held till his death, Oct. 15, 1682. Mr. Holmes underwent great persecution for his religious principles, being imprisoned for several months, and publicly whipped by the Puritan authorities in 1661. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vii., 265.

Holobolus, Manuel (Μανουήλ Ολόβολος), a Byzantine prelate and philologist, who lived in the latter part of the 13th century. From his infancy he was attached to John Lascaris, who was placed upon the throne at nine years of age, and shared with Michael Palaeologus the title of emperor. When Michael's son, and of whom, to be laicized and sent into exile, Holobolus, who then was still a student, could not conceal his indignation, and for this impudence the emperor ordered that his nose and lips should be cut off. He was then imprisoned in a monastery, where he pursued his studies with so much success that he was put in charge of the younger monks in 1297. Shortly afterwards the emperor was reconciled to Holobolus, and conferred upon him the dignity of a rhetor, or lecturer on the Holy Scriptures. During the discussions which took place between the Greek and Latin churches, on the subject of a reunion, he opposed energetically the proposition of Michael Palaeologus. He was consigned to a monastery at Nicæa in 1273. The emperor soon after brought him back to Constantinople with a cord around his neck. A long captivity followed; he regained all the sentiments of Holobolus, for he took part, in 1293, in the deposition of the patriarch John Voccus, a partisan of the Latin union. Holobolus left Political Verses on Michael Palaeologus, which are cited in the Glosarium of Du Cange, under "P電ραπο οι Ρωμανοι." See Hofer, Nowe. Biog. Græc. s. v.

Holocaust (αλακαστος, wholly burned), a kind of sacrifice wherein the whole offering was burned or consumed by fire, nothing being left for the feast. Among the heathen it was analogous to the Scripture burnt-offering.

Holon of Judah. For this place Lien. Conder conjecturally proposes (Text Work ii, 387) Brit Al-Arán, a large ruin nine and a half miles west of Halihal, containing "foundations, caves, cistern, with heaps of stones and remains of an ancient road" (Memoirs of Ordnance Survey, iii. 221); and Trelawney Saunders (O. P. Sept. 1876) locates the Khirbat of Halihal, three miles south-west of Hebron. The latter position is possible, but the former is not within the required group of towns.

Holtsuf, Barthold, a Reformed theologian of Germany, was born at Rügenwade, Pomerania, Dec. 11, 1687; died in 1777. He was professor of philosophy at Freiburg, in 1696 court-preacher at Steins, in 1896 professor, and in 1896 doctor of theology at Frankfort, and died in 1717. He wrote De Prodestinatione, Electione et Reprobatione, and a great many theological treatises, which were published in one volume in 1714. See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten- Lexicon, s. v. (B. P.)

Hooker, Edward William, D.D., a Congregational minister, son of Rev. Asahel Hooker, was born at Goshen, Conn., Nov. 24, 1794. He graduated from Middlebury College in 1814, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1817; was ordained at Green Farms, Aug. 15, 1821, over which church he remained pastor until 1829, when he became associate general agent of the American Temperance Society, and was editor of the Journal of Humanity. He was installed pastor of the Church at Bennington, Vt., Feb. 22, 1822, and was dismissed in the spring of 1823. From Aug. 23 of the latter year, for four years, he was professor of sacred rhetoric and ecclesiastical history in the Theological Institute of Connecticut, at East Windsor Hill. From 1829 to 1856 he was the regular pastor of the church at South Windsor; after which, until 1862, he served in the same relation at Fair Haven, Vt. He died at The Mort Atkinson, Wix, March 31, 1875. Dr. Hooker was a trustee of Middlebury College from 1834 to 1844, and was a corporate member of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions from 1840. Among his published works are, Life of Thomas Hooker: Early Conversions: — Ehba Leeus, etc.; also several pamphlets, among them, Marks of Spiritual Declension: — Plea for Sacred Music: — Believing the Truth: — Character and Office of the Holy Spirit, etc., with various printed sermons. He was also a writer for various magazines and other periodicals. See Comp. Quarterly, 1876, p. 437.

Hooker, Henry Brown, D.D., a Congregational minister, son of Dr. Thomas Hooker, was born at Rutland, Vt., Aug. 8, 1802. After attending the Castleton Academy, he entered Middlebury College, from which he graduated in 1824. Four years later he graduated from Andover Theological Seminary. He was ordained an evangelist, Oct. 10, 1825, and for one year was a home missionary in South Carolina. From May 2, 1827, to May 17, 1836, he was pastor in Lansboro, Mass.; from February 1837, to June 1838, was pastor in Falmouth; from 1838 to 1873 was secretary of the Massachusetts Home Missionary Society, and continued to assist in the office of that society until his death, July 4, 1881. From 1844 to 1851 he was a member of the Massachusetts Board of Education; from 1845 he was a corresponding member of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. The American Tract Society published eight tracts from his pen; and he also wrote three tracts for the Tract Society of Boston. He was also the author of two Sunday-school books: Plea for the Heavens, and Put Off and Put On. See Comp. Yearbook, 1882, p. 38.

Hooker, Herman, D.D., an Episcopal clergyman, was born at Poultney, Vt., about 1806. He graduated from Middlebury College in 1825, studied two years in Princeton Theological Seminary, and subsequently took orders in the Protestant Episcopal Church; but on losing his position as a bookseller in Philadelphia, he removed to New York, where he died, July 25, 1885. He is the author of The Portion of the Soul (1855) — Popular Infallibility — Use of Adversity: — Maxim: — The Christian Life.

Hooker, Horace, D.D., a Congregational minister and author, was born in 1738. He was a graduate of Yale College, and was remarkable for his upright character and purity of his style as a writer. He early, in connection with Rev. Thomas H. Gallaudet, LL.D., undertook the preparation of religious books for the young. Among them are, The Youth's Book of Natural Theology, in two parts, and a series of twelve volumes of Bible Histories. As an essayist, he was author of a period of more than twenty years he was secretary of the Connecticut Missionary Society; also for several HOOLE, Elijah, D.D., an eminent Wesleyan missionary, was appointed in 1819 to Bangalore, in the Mysore country, to which, in 1823, Serupagapatam was added. "He rapidly acquired an accurate knowledge of the Tamil, one of the first-fruits of which was a translation of the Methodist Hymns. It was thus that he laid the foundation of that proficiency as an Oriental scholar which was afterwards duly acknowledged by the Royal Asiatic Society and other learned bodies; at the same time travelling widely and laboring with unwearied diligence in his evangelical efforts, and enduring hardship as a good soldier of Christ." After nine years he returned to England sick, and was never afterwards free from pain. From 1830 to 1835 he was superintendent of schools in Ireland. Removing to London, he was, in 1834, appointed assistant secretary, and in 1836 one of the general secretaries of the Missionary Society; a position he held to the end of his life. In the administration of missionary affairs his punctuality, suavity, and diligence rendered him singularly efficient, and his unobtrusive services became more and more valuable every year. He was also honorary secretary of the British Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, and the Home also for the University of the Asias, in London. Gentle, uniformly cheerful, Dr. Hooie was to the end of life a diligent student. He died in London, June 17, 1872, in the seventy-fifth year of his age. Dr. Hooie wrote, Madras, Mysore, and the South of India: A Narrative of a Mission to those Countries, from 1820 to 1828 (2d ed. Lond. 1844, 12mos.):—The Year-Book of Missions (Lond. 1847, 8vo):—The Missionary, a poem from the Swedish, edited by Dr. Hoole (1851, 8vo):—Byrum and the Wesleyans (1861):—Indians' Ta- les (1860). See Minutes of the British Confer- ence, 1872, p. 32; Stevens, Illust. of Methodist, iii. 346; Osborn, Meth. Bibliography, p. 117.

HOOPER, William, D.D., L.L.D., a distinguished Baptist minister, was born near Wilmington, N. C., Aug. 8, 1792, being a grandson of William Hooper, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence. He graduated from the University of North Carolina. He was a graduate of the Chapel Hill, in 1809; studied theology one year at Princeton; was appointed professor of ancient languages in his alma mater in 1817; took orders in the Episcopal Church in 1818; was rector of a church in Fayetteville from 1822 to 1824; changed his sentiments on baptism, and joined a Baptist Church; returned also to the University of North Carolina, first as professor of rhetoric, and then resumed his former chair as professor of ancient languages. In 1838 he was called to South Carolina, where, for eight years, he was in the department of instruction in the Furman Institute. He was then chosen president of Wake Forest College, N. C., and held this office for six years. He was pastor in Newbern, then president of the Chowan Female Institute, and for the last years of his life was engaged in teaching at Fayetteville and Wilson. He died at Chapel Hill, Aug. 19, 1876. See Gen. Cott. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 15. (J. C. S.)

Hopkins, Henry Harvey, D.D., a Presbyterian missionary, was born in Washington County, Pa., Nov. 12, 1804. He graduated from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1828; was licensed by the Presbytery of New Castle

the same year; obtained permission to labor without the bounds of the presbytery, and at once proceeded to Clinton, La. He went to Big Bend and Taylorsville, Ky., and served as pastor. This relation continued about nine years, and was dissolved April 2, 1844. Dr. Hopkins next took charge of two churches at Cane Run and Plum Creek, in Shelby County, and subsequently of a church at Owensboro. He died April 13, 1871. He was a devoted pastor, a wise counselor, practical, judicious, and of large Christian experience. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1876, p. 28.

HOPKINS, John, an American philanthropist, a member of the Society of Friends, was born in Anne Arundel County, Md., May 19, 1735. He received a liberal education, and engaged in the wholesale grocery business, from which he retired in 1847 with an ample fortune. He then became president of the Merchants Bank, and a director of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. He died in Baltimore, Dec. 24, 1873. Mr. Hopkins' benefactions amount in the aggregate to over $4,000,000. In 1878 he founded the Hopkins Free Hospital of Balti- more, at a cost of about $4,000,000. He also founded an orphanage for colored youth, a convalescent hospital, and the Johns Hopkins University. This institution is located at Clifton, near Baltimore, and has four hundred acres of land and an endowment of $5,000,000. Poor and deserving youths of Maryland and Virginia receive free scholarships.

HOPKINS, Josiah, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Pittsford, Vt., April 26, 1776. He never attended college, though he had a good academical education. He was licensed by the Paulet Congregational Association in 1809, and was ordained pastor of the Congregational Church in New Haven, Vt., in 1811. He subsequently became pastor of the First Presby- terian Church in Auburn, N. Y. He died at Geneva, June 27, 1832. See Wilson, Pref. Hist. Amanaes, 1863, p. 298.

HOPKINS, Samuel, Sen., a Congregational minister, son of John Hopkins, of Waterbury, Conn., educated at Yale College in 1718; was ordained pastor in West Springfield, Mass., June 1, 1720, and died suddenly in October, 1755, in the sixty-second year of his age. He published a Select Memoirs relating to the Hou- stonian Indians (1750). See Sprague, Annales of the Amer. Pulpit., i. 519.

HOPKINS, Samuel, Jun., D.D., a Congregational minister, son of the foregoing, was born in West Springfield, Mass., Oct. 31, 1729. He graduated from Yale College in 1749, and was a tutor there from 1751 to 1754; was ordained pastor at Hadley, Mass., in 1755, and died there, March 8, 1811. A volume of sermons was published by him in 1759. In many respects he was a remarkable man, distinguished for his good-hum- mor, and his Calvinism was of a type opposed to Hop- kinianism. See Sprague, Annales of the Amer. Pulpit., i. 520.

HOPKINS, Theodore Asa, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Hartford, Conn., July 25, 1805. He graduated from Yale College in 1824; studied theology privately, and was licensed by the Cayuga Pres- bytery, June 19, 1829. In 1829 he accepted a call from the Congregational Church at Pawtucket, Mass. His ministry there was successful and very acceptable. In 1836 he accepted a call from the First Presbyterian Church in Brooklyn, where he remained until his death, Nov. 18, 1847. See Sprague, Annales of the Amer. Pulpit., iv. 741.

HOPPENSTEDT, August Friedrich Ludwigo, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born March 22, 1765. In 1799 he was inspector of the Teachers' Seminary at Hanover, in 1792 court-chaplain, in 1796 superintendent, in 1800 general superintendent at Harburg, in 1815 at Gelnhausen. He died April 18, 1820, doctor of theology, abbot of Loccum, and director of consistory at Hanover. He published, Predigten (Hanover, 1818-19,

Hopper, Christopher, one of the most efficient early Methodist preachers, was born at Low-Coalburne, Ryton Parish, Durham County, England, Dec. 25, 1722. In his Autobiography (in Jackson's Lives) he gives an interesting account of his conversion under Methodist preaching, about 1745, and of his subsequent labors after 1749. For fifty years he preached throughout the land, in churches, ale-houses, cockpit, now before a conference, then before a mob, now amid the prayers and tears of the people, and now amid rotten eggs, the sound of horns and bells, brickbats, blows, and broadswords. For one year (1780, Dec. 25, 1778, the first time with Wesley). In 1751 he and Wesley visited Scotland, the latter returning in a few days, but Hopper pressing on, and in 1759 introducing Methodism as far as Old Aberdeen and Peterhead, thus planting Methodism in North Britain. Wesley being absent from the conference at Bristol in 1747, Hopper was elected president. After 1790 he resided chiefly at Bolton, preaching till January, 1802. He died March 5 following. Hopper played an important part in British Methodism, and not merely in extending its borders. He was one of the men who gave it Brampton and Benson, and his melting prayers contributed to its peace and union during the critical conferences of the last decade of the 18th century (see Entwistle's Memoirs). He was of an original turn of mind, had fine natural abilities, was a diligent student, a pioneer preacher, and a seal-saver. See Early Methodists (New York, i, 170; Crowther, Portraits of Methodism, p. 350); Stevens, Hist. of Methodism, i, ii, (see index); Smith, Hist. of W. S. Meth., i, ii (see index); Wycliffe, Meth. Mag., Sept. 1803; Everett, Kemp and Able Little Sketch; Wesleyan Centenary Tokens (ed. ed. Lond., 1841), i, 352.

Hoppus, John, L.L.D., an English Congregational minister, was born in London in 1759. He studied theology at Rothenham and Dunbar, then proceeded to the University of Glasgow, where he took his degree of M.A., and was the most distinguished pupil of his year. Thence he returned to London and took the minster of a church in the Temple Church, where he labored two years. He next became professor of mental and moral philosophy and logic in University College, London, which chair he occupied for thirty-six years, preaching frequently and writing extensively. He died in London, Jan. 29, 1873. The life of Dr. Hop- pus was an exemplification of his oft-repeated assertion that "No service a man can render his generation is greater than this, to try to justify the ways of God to men." He wrote a masterly exposition of Bacon's Novum Organum, and many other treatises for the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge—a prize essay on Schism as opposed to the Unity of the Church—a valuable pamphlet on The Crisis of Popular Education, as well as contributing largely to the Psychological Journal and Esoteric. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1876, p. 541; (Lond.) Evangelical Magazine, 1876, p. 261.

Hordicia (or Hordiccia), an ancient Roman festival, celebrated April 15, in honor of the goddess Tellus. On these occasions thirty pregnant cows were sacrificed.

Horem. The Hurah, which is accepted by Conder (Travels in Iraq, pp. 357 and Trianam (Bible Places, p. 274), but not by Saunders (O. T. Map), as the representative of this ancient site, is written Kharbet el-Kharah on the Ordnance Map, three and a half miles north-west from Yafín (Iron), and so in the accompanying Memoirs (i, 242), "beaps of stones and cisterns, on a small tell [mound]; a birkeh [pool] in the valley." This last authority states (line 205) the people called Hurah, which is laid down at two miles south-east of Tibrin, and described (ibid. 118) as "beaps of small unheawn stones, with two olive-presses and a spring at the ruin," an identification not adopted by Saunderson.

Horey, in the mythology of the negroes in East Africa, was a demon, having a resemblance to the devil, whose image probably reached Abyssinia through the Christians. Those people practise circumsicion in the thirteenth or fourteenth year. Before the youths are thus dedicated they are exposed to the persecution of this demon, and are supposed to escape by a fall, deep bowl or cry. As soon as this cry is heard, victuals are prepared and placed under a tree. They are always found to have been eaten. If the food does not suffice, Horey steals a boy and devours him, keeping him in his stomach until more food is brought, whereabouts he gives him no satisfaction. These demons have been ten or twelve days in the stomach of this monster.

Horman (or Horamen), William, an English author, was born at Salisbury, Wiltshire, about 1670. He was educated at Exon and at King's College, Cambridge, was made valedictorian at Exon, where he spent the remainder of his days, and died April 12, 1555. He was one of the most general scholars of his age. He wrote on Orthography:—On the Quantities of Peaumate Syllables: — A Chronicle, Commentaries, and Other Eng. Texts, i, 588. [P.S.]

Hornblower, William Henry, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Newark, N. J., March 21, 1820. He graduated from Princeton College in 1838; studied law one year; graduated from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1842; became a missionary to the "Fines" in 1843; was ordained pastor at Pateron in 1844, and labored there with great success and usefulness until 1877, when he was elected by the General Assembly professor of homiletics, pastoral theology, se- cred rhetoric, and Church government in the Western Theological Seminary, Allegheny City, Pa. He died there, July 16, 1885. See N.Y. Observer, July 19, 1885; Neigr., Pred. Encyclop. s. v. Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem., 1884, p. 28. (W. P. S.)

Hornby, John, D.D., a native of Lincolnshire, bred a Carmelite, received his degree at Cambridge, flourished in 1754, and was buried at his convent in Boston. He participated in a great controversy over the priority of the Benedictines and Cistercians, pleading for the precedence of the former, and Horbury preaching and writing for that of the latter. The judges were John Donwick, the chancellor, and the doctors of the university, and they confirmed the opinion of Horn- by, under the seal of the university. Henry VIII made them friends by thrusting both out of the land. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), ii, 288.

Horne, Robert, an English prelate of the 16th century, was born in Durham, educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, advanced dean of Durham in 1551, and prebend of York in 1552, but in the persecution under Mary he fled to Germany, and, fixing his residence at Frankfort, became the head of the episcopal party. On returning to England he was made bishop of Winchester, Feb. 16, 1560. He was a worthy man, but ground between the papists and sectaries, who spat upon his name, and twisted his person as daws are fondly deformed, apparently having no worthy cause for their opposition. He died in Southwark, June 1, 1580. He published an answer to Fucckenham's Declaration of Scripturns of Conscience (1568), touching the oaths of supremacy. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nut- tall), ii, 288.

Horne, Thomas Hartwell, D.D., a minister of the Church of England, was born in London, Oct. 20, 1780. He was a scholar at Christ's Hospital, but did HORNEMANN, CLAUDIUS FRIEDRICH, a Danish theologian, was born in 1751, in 1801 professor of theology at Copenhagen, and died in 1830. He wrote, Specimen Exercitationum Crit. in Ver. LXX Interpret. ex Phile. (1-iii, Göttigen, 1773-78):—Observations ad Illustrationem Dogmatis in Conc. Vetus, Text. ad Phile. (Göttigen, 1779):—Observationes ad loc. quatuor LXX (1773):—Observationes de Harmonia Linguarum Orientis, Ebratiae, Chaldaeæ, Syriacæ et Arabice (1826-29):—Scripta Graeca, Græc. HORNER, JAMES, D.D., a minister of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland. He was Dr. M' Dowell's colleague in Mary's Abbey, Dublin, ordained co-pastor in 1791, and died in January, 1845. He was intrusted by the synod of Ulster with the management of much of its public business, and was remarkable for his tact and shrewdness. He was one of the first missionary agents of the synod, and was also appointed by it on the committee for the preparation of a code of discipline. See Reid, Hist. of the Presb. Church in Ireland.

Hora, FRIEDRICH THEODOR, a Lutheran theologian, was born in 1810 in Hanover. He was in 1835 pastor at Grafenstein, in 1845 at Strasburg, and died there in 1882, president of the consistory. Horning was a strict Lutheran, and founded, in 1849, the Lutheran Missionary Society. He wrote, Evangelisch-lutherische Kirche, and with Kelltemple he published Handbuch für die Kirche Augsburger Confession. He also edited Kirchenblatt für die Kirche Augsburger Confession. See Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Horror, a passion excited by an object which causes a high degree of fear and detestation. It is a compound of wonder and fear. Sometimes it has a mixture of pleasure, from which, if predominant, it is a denomination a pleasing horror. Such a horror seizes us at the view of vast and hanging precipices, a tempestuous ocean, or wild and solitary places. This passion is composed of a mixture of wonder and fear, and well-tempered awe of religion. Horror and terror seem almost to be synonymous; but the former refers more to what disgusts, the latter to that which alarms us.

Horse-sacrifice, a ceremony celebrated by various ancient nations, in which a horse was offered in sacrifice to a deity, usually the sun. The Massagetae, a great and powerful nation, of whose territory extended beyond the Araxes to the extreme parts of the East, sacrificed horses to the sun. The practice prevailed in Persia in the time of Cyrus, and may have been anterior to that sovereignty. Horses were sacrificed to Neptune and the deities of the rivers, being precipitated into the sea or into the rivers. The Lacedaemonians sacrificed a horse to the winds, which, by their force, carried the ashes of the victim to a distance. Among the ancient Romans a horse was sacrificed annually to Mars in the Campus Martius, in the month of October. The blood that dropped from the tail of the horse, when he was called, was carefully preserved by the vestal virgins in the temple of Vesta, for the purpose of being used at the Pulliilia or shepherd festival. In the Rig Veda are two hymns in honor of the horse-sacrifice, called Asvamedhika, which describes the horse as "dark, and decorated with rich trappings, the variously-colored goat going before him." The horse is led three times round the sacrificial fire; he is then bound to a post and slaughtered with an ax; and the flesh is tossed on a spit, boiled, made into balls, and eaten; and finally "The horse proceeds to that assembly which is most excellent; to the presence of his father and his mother (heaven and earth)." Go, horse, to-day, rejoicing to the gods, that (the sacrifice) may yield blessings to the donor. The horse-sacrifice at this day is one of the great annual ceremonies of the Hindus.

Horsey, JOHN, an eminent English clergyman and antiquary, was born in 1685, at Mid-Lothian, and was pastor of a dissenting congregation at Morpeth. He died in December, 1731. He wrote Roman Antiquities of Britain (published posthumously, 1732). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1862, p. 741.

Horton, WILLIAM, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born at Newburyport, Mass., March 14, 1804. He graduated from Harvard College in 1824; from Andover Theological Seminary in 1827; was ordained deacon in November of that year, and presbyter Oct. 15, 1830. He was pastor at St. Paul's Church, Windor, Vt.; in 1835 of Trinity Church, Saco, Me.; at St. Thomas's Church, Dover, N. H. (1839-47); at St. Paul's Church, Brookline, Mass. (1849); at St. Paul's Church, Newburyport (1858). He died there, Oct. 29, 1883. See Tren. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 75; Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1864, p. 669.

Hossah. For this place Lach. Conder suggests (Tract Work, ii. 156) that Ouziyeh, meaning apparently (see Memoirs to Ordinance Survey, i. 51) el-'Eshtyeh, laid down at six and three quarter miles south-east of Tyre, and described (ibid. p. 48) as "a village built of stone, containing seventy Druses; situated on a ridge, with two cisterns. There are two caves to the north of the village.

Höschke, RUBENS HAH-KHEN, a Jewish rabbi of Prague, who died in 1674, is the author of יבשך יבשך, a kind of midrashic collectaneum (Prague, 1660) —דניר רביעי דניר רביעי, a cabalistic midrash on the Pentateuch, with extracts from Mechilta, Pesikta, Zohar, (Wilnemorsf, 1681). This latter work, without any value, must be distinguished from the famous midrashic work entitled Yad Shimeon. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i. 412 sqq. (B. P.)

Hosman, GUSTAV CHRISTOPH, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born in May 16, 1803. He studied at Leipzig and Kiel, was deacon in 1821, and professor of theology at Kiel in 1780. In 1734 he was appointed first court-preacher, in 1749 general superintendent, and died July 10, 1766. He wrote, Diep. Exeg. ad Gal. iii. 19 (Kiel, 1780):—Hypotropa Chro-

Hospitium, a place sometimes attached to monasteries in former times, with the view of affording temporary relief to travellers, and in which a certain number of the poor were relieved by a daily alms. It was also called a Xenodochium.

Hossein, the second son of Ali and Fatima, and the third of the twelve Imams, was born A.D. 625. He endeavored to dissuade his brother Hassan (q. v.) from resigning the caliphate in favor of Moawiyah, but on finding his remonstrances unavailing, he entered heartily into the support of the new caliph, and even served in his army when the Samarians first attacked Constantinople. On the death of Moawiyah, in 679, his son Yezid succeeded, but Hossein contested the caliphate with him, having been deceived by the promise of powerful support from the professed adherents of the house of Ali. Overpowered by numbers, and deserted by many of his followers, he fell by the hand of one of Yezid's soldiers, on the 10th of the Momian month Moharem, A.D. 680. A splendid mosque was erected over the place of his burial. The place, which was named Mezeh Hossein (the place of Hossein's martyrdom), is a favorite resort of pilgrims to this day.

Hossein's Martyrdom, anniversary of, a religious solemnity observed both in Persia and India with extraordinary splendor. It lasts for ten days, during which the Shiites keep up continual mourning for the martyr's fate, giving themselves up to sighs and groans, fasting and tears. They abstain from shaving their heads, from bathing, and even from changing their clothes. The observances consist of a series of representations of the successive scenes in the life of Hossein, from the date of his flight from Medina to his murder in the palace of Korbela; and the exhibition of each day is preceded by the reading in a plaintive note a portion of the history of Hossein.

Hostia, an animal among the ancient Romans which was destined for sacrifice. Sometimes the whole victim was consumed upon the altar, and at other times only the legs and intestines were burned. It was the smoke ascending from the sacrifice that was considered pleasing to the gods, hence the more numerous the animals the more pleasing the sacrifice. This was, no doubt, the reason for offering a hecatomb. The animal selected for sacrifice must be free from all blemishes and diseases of soul. If it was of the larger sort of beasts the horns were marked with gold; if of the smaller sort it was crowned with the leaves of that tree which the deity for whom the sacrifice was designed was thought most to delight in.

Hotchkins, Velona R., D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in Springfield, Oneida Co., N. Y., June 8, 1815, and graduated from Madison University in 1838. His pastorates were in Poultney, Vt. (1839); Rochester, N. Y.; Buffalo (1849-54), also, subsequently, from 1863 until his death, and in Fall River, Mass. From 1843 to 1865 he was a professor in Rochester Theological Seminary.
Dr. Hotchkins was ranked very high as a scholar and an able preacher, and was regarded as one of the strongest men in his denomination. He died in Buffalo, Jan. 4, 1882.

Hothum, William De, D.D., an Irish prelate, was born in England, but educated at Paris. In 1290 he decided to become a Dominican friar, and was twice provincial of that order in England. He was appointed to the see of Dublin, Dec, 8, 1297; consecrated at Rome in 1298 by the pope, and died on his return, at Dijon, Aug 27 of the same year. See D'Alton, Memoirs of the Archbishop of Dublin, p. 110.

Houghton, Daniel Clay, D.D., a Presbyterian minister (N. S.), was born at Lynton, Vt., in 1814. He graduated at the University of Vermont in 1840, subse-sequently taught a few years in Western New York, and then entered the ministry in the Methodist Episcopal Church. He was one of the founders of Geneseo College, in Lima, N. Y.; was for some years professor of moral and intellectual philosophy in the college, and at the same time acted as financial agent. In 1853 he joined the Presbyterian Church, and in 1854 was appointed editor of the Genevese Evangelist. He died July

House, Erwin, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Worthington, O., Feb. 17, 1824. He was converted at the age of thirteen; graduated at Woodward College, Cincinnati, in 1846; received license to preach in 1849, and in 1850 entered the Cincinnati Conference, of which he was a member till his death, May 20, 1875. Mr. House commenced contributing to the press as early as 1857; in 1847 was employed as assistant editor of the Ladies' Repository, and from March, 1851, to December, 1852, had sole editorial charge of the magazine. He published, Sketches for the Young (1847) — The Missionary in Many Lands — The Homilist: — Scripture Cabinet: — The Sunday-school Handbook. He was a hearty advocate of temperance. As a speaker to children he had very few equals. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1873, p. 116; Simpson, Cyclopedia of Methodism, s. v.

Hoven, Jan Daniel van, a Dutch theologian, was born Aug. 20, 1705, at Haarlem. He studied at Marburg and Utrecht, was in 1728 professor at Lingen, in Westphalia, in 1739 member of consistory, in 1738 professor at Campen, and died in 1739. He wrote, Spec-

Hovey, Edmund Otho, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in East Hanover, N. J., July 15, 1801.
At twenty-one years of age he began his preparation for preaching the gospel, at Thedford Academy; in 1828 graduated at Andover College, and in 1831 from Andover Theological Seminary. He was consecrated to the Presbytery of Newportport the same year, and sent as a missionary to Walash, La. His great work was in founding and building up Wasbash College, Crawfordsville, Ind., of which, in 1844, he was appointed financial agent and professor of rhetoric. Subsequently he was made professor of chemistry, mineralogy, and geology.
He was also treasurer and librarian. He died there, March 10, 1877. See (N. Y.) Evangelist, March 29, 1877.

pursued a course of theology under the direction of Dr. Gay. He preached his first sermon in 1783; was appointed to a tutorship at Cambridge, and during this time filled vacant pulpits in the neighborhood on the Sabbath. He accepted a call to the First Church in Springfield, in November, 1784, and was ordained April 27, 1785. He resigned this charge on account of ill-health, Jan. 25, 1809. In 1819 he became pastor of a new Unitarian Church in the first parish of Springfield. He remained there until his death, Jan. 23, 1857. See Springfield Pulpit, viii, 1811.

Howard, Leland, A.M., a leading Baptist minister, was born at Jamaica, Windham Co., Vt., Oct. 13, 1793. He was converted about 1810, and commenced to preach in 1812. He was a "born preacher," and placed himself under the tuition of Rev. Joshua Bradley, of the Baptist Church in Windsor, for one year, and then pursued his studies under the direction of Rev. James W. Winchell, of the First Baptist Church in Boston, Mass. He was ordained pastor in Windsor, Vt., Nov. 16, 1817, where he remained seven years, and then of the First Baptist Church in Troy, N. Y., five years, when he moved to his former parish in Windsor, Vt., and had charge five years. His other pastorates were Brooklyn, N. Y., Newport, R. I., Norwich, N. Y., Fifth Street Church, Troy, N. Y., Hartford, Conn., and, in 1852, he went to Rutland, Vt., and was pastor ten years, and then there, May 2, 1867. He was chaplain of the House, in the legislature of Vermont, in 1831, and of the Senate in 1861. (J. C. S.)

Howard, Leonard, D.D., an English clergyman, was rector of St. George's, Southwark, London. He died in 1767, leaving a number of Sermons (1766-81), and a collection of Letters and State Papers (1759-56). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Howard, Robert, an Irish Catholic prelate, was born in 1661, became bishop of Kilalla in 1726, of Elphin in 1729, and died about 1740. He published some Sermons (1730). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Howard, Roger S., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was employed, in 1637, as a teacher in Belsey, Me., and remained there until 1659, when he became rector of St. Stephen's Church, Portland. In 1681 he removed to Vermont; in 1682 became rector of Trinity Church, Rutland; in 1687 of St. James Church, Proctor, and in 1690 president of Norwich University, and rector of St. Mary's Church, Northfield; in 1687 was called to the rectorship of the Church of the Reconciliation, Webster, Mass.; in 1679 he removed to Greenfield, where he died, April 16, 1860, aged seventy-two years. See Whittaker, Almanac and Directory, 1861, p. 178.

Howard, Solomon, D.D., LL.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born Nov. 14, 1811. He joined the Church in 1828, graduated from Augusta College, Ky., in 1833, and entered the Ohio Conference in 1835. After eight years of successful work in the pastorate, he was for two years principal of the Ohio Wesleyan University. From 1845 to 1852 he was in educational work in Springfield, O. In 1852 he was elected president of the Ohio University, at Athens, where he remained for twenty years. He died Aug. 11, 1873, at Mansfield, Ohio. He was a delegate to the General Conference of 1856. He was emphatically an educator, and many a poor young man will remember his sympathy for him in his struggles for an education. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1873.

Howard, William D., D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., July 28, 1814. He was educated at Dickinson College, and in 1833 became a student of theology with Dr. William Neill. He was licensed to preach in 1837, and the next year ordained pastor of the Frankford Church, now in the bounds of Philadelphia. In 1849 he removed to Pittsburgh, to take charge of the Second Presbyterian Church, where he continued to labor faithfully until his death, Sept. 22, 1876. He published occasional Sermons. See Presbyterian, Sept. 30, 1876. (W. P. S.)

Howe, George, D.D., a distinguished minister of the Southern Presbyterian Church, was born in 1802. In 1833 he was elected by the General Assembly to the presidency of the theological seminary at Charleston, S. C., and subsequently became president of that institution, which position he retained until his sudden death, April 15, 1883. For half a century his life had been devoted to the great work of training young men for the ministry, and though dead he yet speaks through the living lips of hundreds who went out from this school of the prophets. See (N. Y.) Observer, April 19, 1883. (W. P. S.)

Howe, Obadiah, D.D., an English clergyman, was vicar of Boston, Lincolnshire. He died in 1582, leaving The Universal Examine and Questioned (1648) — Sermons (1664). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Howell, Thomas, an English prelate, was born at Naugamarch, Brecknockshire, educated a fellow of Jesus College, Oxford, was made canon of Windsor in 1696, bishop of Bristol in 1696, and died in 1716. He was a most learned and a most excellent preacher. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), iii, 515.

Howley, William, D.D., an English prelate, son of William Howley, D.D., was born Feb. 12, 1765. In his youth he attended the Winchester School, from which he went to the University of Oxford, obtaining a fellowship at New College. In 1784 he was elected fellow of Winchester College; in 1802 was appointed regius professor of divinity; and in September, 1813, succeeded Dr. Randolph as bishop of London. On the decease of Dr. Manns Sutton, in 1828, he became archbishop of Canterbury. He died Feb. 11, 1848. Besides being president of many charitable institutions, he was a fellow of the Society of Antiquaries, and a member of the Royal Society of Literature. See Amer. Quart. Church Rev. 1848, p. 149.

Howman, John, an English Catholic divine, was born at Feckenham, Worcestershire, about 1516, of poor parentage. He was educated by the Benedictines of Evesham, and afterwards at Gloucester College; in 1539 became chaplain to the bishop of Worcester, afterwards to Bonner, and vigorously opposed the Reformation in England. In 1549 he was imprisoned in the Tower, but was released on the accession of Mary, who made him dean of Westminster. Elizabeth offered him the archbishopric of Canterbury on condition that he should become a Protestant, but he refused, and was again imprisoned in 1560. Being released in 1563, he finally retired to the Isle of Ely, and died at Wisbeach in 1565, leaving an account of his Conference with Jane Grey (London, 1564, 1626), besides some Sermons and a few controversial pieces.

Hoyn, Franz Heinrich, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born in Holstein, July 20, 1639. He studied at Helmstedt and Giessen, was in 1665 third preacher at Norder, East Frisia, in 1683 pastor primarius, and died May 20, 1659, leaving De Una Logistica in Theologia (Giesens, 1660); — De Un Metaphysicas in Theologia (eod.); — De Principe Theologis (eod.); — De Deo (eod.); — De Questione Ubium Ecclesiae Lutheri Feueri ante Lutherum (1664), besides writing numerous ascetical works. Carolina became pastor of the Beech Island Church. His next pastorate was in Washington, Ga., and his third and last was in Athens, where he labored with much zeal and efficiency for nearly thirty-six years. He died July 12, 1866. See Wilson, Presby. Hist. Almanac, 1867, p. 437.

HOYT, Ova Phelps, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at New Haven, Vt., May 26, 1800. He graduated from Middlebury College in 1821, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1824. Soon after he began to labor as pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Pottadam, N. Y., where he remained until 1800, then took the agency of the American Home Missionary Society, and resided in Utica. There while he was editor of the Western Recorder for a year and a half. He was stated supply at Cambridge in 1825; at Detroit, Mich., in 1829; at Kalamazoo, in 1840; district secretary of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, in 1852; supply at Elkhart, Ind., in 1860; and from 1863 resided in Kalamazoo, Mich., until his death, Feb. 11, 1866. See Wilson, Presby. Hist. Almanac, 1867, p. 299.

Hrerdinair, in Norse mythology. When the Asas journeyed through the world, Odin, Hoenir, and Loke came to a river with a waterfall. There they found a vaper, devouring a salmon. Loke killed the vaper, and it was brought to the village, where they sought a night's lodging of the rustic Herdinair, who was a pow- erful warrior. Herdinair had he seen, when he called his two sons, Tofner, and Reigen, and told them that the strangers had killed Otter (viper), their brother. Herdinair immediately went to the Asas, who promised to pay him as much money in reparation as he desired. The sorcerer tore off the skin from the killed viper, and ordered it to be filled with red gold. Odin sent Loke into the land of the black elves to seek gold. There he found the dwarf Andwari, who gave him all the money he had in his possession. But the elf still had a small ring on his hand, which Loke ordered to be given to his wife with a ring of silver, saying, "The ring will be the death of its possessor."

The hide was filled, and the ring laid on top, and thus the Asas were free from all debt. Herdinair's sons wanted a share of the gold, but he refused them. They consulted with each other and slew their father. Now Reigen thought he might take one half, but Tofner forbid him, ordering him to go off, or he would befall him which came upon his father. Reigen fled to king Hallfrek, and became his smith. Tofner changed himself into a snake, and guarded the gold. The smith found an avenue into it, and his son's ring, appointed a guard where Tofner was. Sigurd dug a ditch near by where Tofner was accustomed to get water, and waited there for him, and finally slew him. Sigurd then went to Reigen and killed him. Next he rode to Tofner's dwelling, and took all the gold along with him. Sigurd then came to the Hinderlaj; there he found a beautiful woman, who called herself Hildur, but whose real name was Brynhildur. He married her and rode to king Gunki, who had two sons, Gunnar and Hogni, and one daughter, Gudrun; the latter he married, and entirely forgot Brynhildur. She invited Gunnar and Hogni to murder Sigurd; but they, being bound together by an oath, could not become traitors to him; so the third broth- er, Guttorm, killed him while asleep, with a sword. King Atli, the brother of Brynhildur, married Gudrun, the widow of Sigurd. He invited Gunnar and Hogni, but was anxious for the money upon which he made war upon them, caught them, and killed both. Shortly after, Gudrun, to avenge the murder of her brothers, killed two of Atli's children, and gave the king some nectar to drink from the skulls of his own children. Thus eventually the whole generation of Nifungur was annihilated.

HRUGNER, in Norse mythology. Thor, the mighti- est of the Asas, had gone on a journey to kill magicians and giants. Odin rode on his wonderful horse Sleipner to Jotunheim, and thus came to the mightiest and most frightful of giants, Hrugner. Odin began to boast of his horse, and Hruger, to punish him, pursued him on his own horse, Guiflaf. Odin, however, struck Hruger a start of Hruger that the latter could not overtake him, although he followed him to the walls of Asgard. Here the gods invited him to their drinking-bout, which in- vitation he accepted. He became drunk, and began to tell what wonderful things he intended to do. The Asas, tired of his boasting, mentioned Thor's name, and suddenly the mighty hero appeared, raised his frightful mien, and inquired who had invited the boasting giant. Hruger argued with Thor that it would be small honor to him to kill him unarmed, and challenged Thor to a duel on the boundary of Grotungakagi. This Thor accepted. The giants in Jotunheim now made a monstrous man of clay, and not finding a heart strong enough, they took out that of a horse, and called him Mokkurklath. Hruger also armed himself. His head, heart, and club were all of stone. Thus armed, he waited for Thor. Thor came with thunder and lightning, and threw his hammer at the giant. The latter threw his club at Thor. The two frightful weapons struck each other in the air. The stone club burst, a part falling on the earth, the other striking Thor on his head and stunning him. The hammer of Thor shattered the head of Hruger so that he fell, his mon- strous foot resting on Thor's neck. The huge man of clay fell at Thialf's hand. None of the Asas could remove Hruger's foot from Thor's neck until Magni, a son of Thor, came and lifted off the foot without any exertion. Thor presented him with the giant horse, Guiflaf.

Huettoqquixqui, in Mexican mythology, was the high-priest. His word was not only advisory, but decisive. He also crowned the king. He opened the breast of the sacrifice, and tore out its heart.

Huettoquilnuitl, in Mexican religion, was one of the three great festivals, celebrated by human sacrifices, in honor of the great mother of the gods. It took place on the last day of the eighth month.

Huematcin, a Mexican sage, lived at Texcoco in the 7th century, and was considered a doctor by excellence of that Athens of the New World. "To him has been attributed the composition of Tromozitti (the divine book), a sort of encyclopedia, which gave information, it is said, of the emigrations of the races of the Aztecs after their departure from the borders of Asia until their arrival upon the plateau of Anahuc, specifying the various huts which the invading nation was obliged to make on the borders of the Rio Gila. It has been affirmed that the Tromozitti was consigned to a few Aztec books that were condemned to the fire, without being examined, by the bishop of Mexico, Zumarraga. It is possible that, in point of mythology and history, the importance of these hieroglyphic collections has been exaggerated, and so it is hardly possible now to estimate the extent of the literary losses which Mexico suffered. If the work of Huematcin had been preserved to our time, we might have some information to establish the real signification of the Mexican hieroglyphics. When we remember that the palace of Texcoco embosomed certain departments inhabited only by people who occupied themselves with special studies, and recall what has been told of the great treasures which were stored up both at Mexico and at Texcoco, and consecrated exclusively to the study of the kingdom of nature, it is difficult to limit the office of Huematcin to that of a simple theorist, who developed barbarian traditions and fantastic ideas. This learned Aztec seems to have derived his learning from close observation. See Nov. Rerum Gent., s. v.

Hughes, John, a Wesleyan Methodist minister, nephew of John Thomas, vicar of Caerleon, Monmouthshire, was born at Brecon, County Brecon, May 17, 1776. He was educated at the grammar school at Brecon, and, under the care of Rev. David Griffiths, Dr. Coke and other distinguished persons received their education at the same place and under the same master. In 1790 Hughes was converted under a sermon by John McKeeny, and joined the Methodist Society. His parents designed him for the Established Church, but young Hughes could not conscientiously enter its ministry. In 1798 he became a resident with his uncle at Caerleon. In 1798 he was appointed by the Conference to the Cardiff Circuit. In 1800 he and Owen Davies were appointed the first missionaries in North Wales. In 1805 he was superintendent of the Welsh Mission in Liverpool. His remaining circuits were, Swansea, Bristol, Glasgow, Northwich and Warrington, Macclesfield, Newcastle-under-Lyne, etc. In 1832 he became a superintendent of the circuit at Wrexham. He died in Christmas Week, 1815, 1843. Hughes deliberately declined a life of ease and honor, and, contrary to the wishes of his friends, chose the toils and privations of the Methodist ministry. From this course he never swerved. He was a most diligent worker, producing, amid the pressing duties of his itinerancy, works of great and lasting value. In 1803 he published a new edition of the Welsh Hymn-Book: he translated part of Dr. Coke's Commentary on the New Testament (1809): while at Macclesfield, 1813, he wrote A Plea for Religious Liberty, a reply to Joseph Cook's "Civil" The Danger of Section, pamphlets which were the result of a controversy respecting the...
Sunday-schools originated by David Simpson, and which were now carried on by the Methodists; History of British Literature (London, 1818, 2 vols., 8vo), a work which received the encomiums of Dr. Thomas Burgess, Bishop of Salisbury, then Bishop of St. David's, of Sharon Turner, in a letter to the author, of Price, of David M'Nicol, and of the Eclectic Review. It embodied the results of many years' antiquarian research, and is a work of great value. Hughes also wrote a work on fish, a work entitled Historical and Miscellaneous Observations, consisting of Memoirs of Remarkable Persons and Occurrences among the Cymry, translated from the Welsh, with notes and illustrations. The manuscript has been deposited in the British Museum. He received several prizes, premiums, and medals from the Celebrated Society for his literary productions. His last work was the Memoir and Remains of Fussell, which he finished in 1839. Hughes, Obadiah, D.D., an English Presbyterian clergyman, descended from a distinguished Puritan family, was born at Canterbury in 1695. He completed a liberal education in Scotland. He was first assistant minister, then co-pastor at Maid Lane, Southwark, and later at St. Barnabas, Walworth. In 1721 he was called to the seashore of London, and used the riches he brought him in doing good. He was one of the preachers at Salters' Hall in 1784 against popery. He preached the funeral sermon on the death of Nev. Samuel Say, in 1746, at Westminster, and the church called him to succeed Mr. Say in the pastorate. He suffered much from the death of friends, and himself died Dec. 10, 1751. See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, iv. 96.

Hugo (or Hovv), a Scotch prelate, was a monk of Arbroath, and bishop of Dunkeld in the tenth year of king Alexander II. He was witness to a charter by king William, dated at Forfar. He died in January, 1214. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 78.

Hugo, a cardinal, bishop of Ostia, was born in France, and probably, as the authors of the Histoire Litteraire assiette, in the diocese of Beauvais. He became at first a Cistercian monk, then abbott of Trois Fontaines, in the diocese of Chartres. Pope Eugenius made him cardinal about 1151, in spite of the opposition of St. Bernard, who was sorry to lose such a man. Hugo died in 1158. To him are attributed some commentaries on the Old and New Testament, also a book on the miracles of pope Eugenius. But these indications seem to be conjectural, and it may not be supposed that they are erroneous. However, there is one of his letters which has been written on occasion of the death of Eugenius. See Hovv, Novo, Bibl. Genealogica, s. v.

Hultzslopoelchi (also Mexitl), in Mexican mythology, is the supreme deity of the nation, the bloodthirsty god of war. The two sons of a woman, Coatli-cue, were gods of war, who were killed by their mother, and being afraid of the disgrace of an illegitimate birth, resolved to murder her. Just as they were in the act of doing so, Hultzslopoelchi sprang out of her body, a god of war, carrying in his left hand a shield, and in his right a spear. He soon conquered his mother's murderers, and pillaged their houses. When the Aztecs left their dwelling-places, travelling for one hundred and sixty-five days, to find a more southern country, they were directed by this god, whose idol they carried before them through the Valley of Mexico. He erected a wooden temple, which later became the site of one of stone. In this temple his image stood, frightful and terrible. The most horrible sacrifices were made in honor of this god. Hundreds of slaves and prisoners were offered to him. At the dedication of his temple, ten thousand human beings were sacrificed, by opening the breast when yet alive, tearing out the heart, and offering it to the idol on a golden spoon. See MEXICAN RELIGION.

Hujukthin, in the mythology of the Caribbeans, is the heaven which lies above the visible heaven. There are all earthly joys in tenfold greater measure. His trees bear better fruit, the field flowers more beautiful. Fishing is easier and less dangerous. Every man has many wives who care for him. Sickness and death are not known there.

Hulkok, Yokish, the modern representation of this site, is laid down on the Ordinance Map three and three quarter miles north-west of the shore of the Sea of Galilee (from Khan Minveh), and is described in the accompanying Memoirs (i. 364, 420) as a "stone-built village, containing about two hundred Moslems; surrounded by arable land, and situated at the foot of a good hill, and many cisterns are found in the village. Guérin says that, in 1875, the village was reduced to about twenty houses. There are traces of ancient remains at this village, and a rock-cut birkeh [pool] with steps leading down to it, also cut out of the rock.

Huld, in Norse mythology, are the mild, womanly elves, or women of the woods, who are supposed to be seen in the mountains of snow in Norway. See HOLDA.

Huller, Georg, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born in 1812. He took holy orders in 1836, was sub-regent at Aschaffenburg in 1839, in 1843 cathedral-dean at Wurzburg, and died June 22, 1870. He published Die Idee des Götlichen in der Wissenschaft und die sogenannte freie Wissenschaft (Wurzburg, 1867). After his death were published three volumes of his Völkspredigten, edited by Joseph Hultcr (Augsburg, 1871-73).

Huller, Wilhelm, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born March 7, 1871, in Westphalia, and died at Iselborn, Feb. 1, 1865, superintendent and doctor of philosophy. He published, Die preeussischen Kirchen- und Gesetze über die evangelischen Kirchen, über die evangelisch-lutherische Staatslehre (Essen, 1825); Evangelische Hauspostille (Düsseldorf, 1827); Die Grundzüge der Aufweckung des Lazarus (Leipzig, 1835);—Christus und die Söldner in Jacobobrunnen (1837)—Predigten und Gesänge über die Epiphanen der Sommer- und Fasttage des Kirchenjahres (1838, 1839). Hulstius, Anton, a Dutch divine, was born in 1615, at Kitha, in the duchy of Bergen. In 1644 he was preacher and professor of Hebrew at Breda; afterward, he was in a controversy of Hebrew at Leyden, and died Feb. 27, 1685. He wrote, De origine et diffusione juris Romanum, cum Jacobo Abendana super Hugonis ii, 9 (Leiden, 1666);—Abruabenilla Comm. in LXX Hebdamadivus Danieli cum Confutationibus (1658);—Authenticus Codici Liber Sacri Contra Criminalias Et, Vivas Vindicat. Huldus, Heinrich, a Reformed theologian of Poland, was born Oct. 10, 1654. He studied at different universities, was in 1670 professor of theology, in 1681 professor at Danzig, and died March 29, 1723. He wrote: Summa Theologiae, seu Liber de Morte et Opere et Sacra Duo, Dissertat. in Commentariis, ed. 1685; Vite Ithil, Ubach et Samuel ari in Quarto Parmesiae Solomoniae Cumplia Commentaria Propheciae (1683):—De Vilibus Prophetae Sacrifici (Amsterdam, 1701):—Comment. in Ezra Pericopae Prorogacionis ad bona sub V. Humphrey, Heman, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Simsbury, Conn., March 26, 1775. He graduated from Yale College in 1805; was pastor of the Congregational Church in Fairfield, Conn., from 1807 to 1817; in Pitsfield, Mass., from 1817 to 1822; president of Amherst College from 1823 to 1845; and then retired to Pitsfield, where he died, April 13, 1861. Dr. Humphrey was the author of, Tour in France, etc. (2 vols.):—Domestic Education: Letters of a Son in the Ministry:—Life and Writings of Professor W. Fiske:—Life of T. H. Gallaudet:—Sketches of the History of Revivals. See Appleton's Annual Cyclop. 1861, p. 542.

Humphreys, Zeplhaliah Moore, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, son of Rev. Heman Humphrey, D.D., was born at Amherst, Mass., Aug. 30, 1824. He graduated from Amherst College in 1843; held the Union Theological Seminary in 1846 and 1847; graduated from Andover Theological Seminary in 1849; preached in Milwaukee, Wis., one year thereafter; was ordained in October, 1850, pastor at Racine; became pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Milwaukee in 1856; of a Presbyterian Church in Chicago, Ill., in 1858; of Calvary Church, Philadelphia, Pa., in 1868; professor in Lane Theological Seminary, Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1873; and died there, Nov. 13, 1891. He was moderator of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in 1871. See Rev. Hist. of U.S. Occ. of Union Theol. Sem. 1867, p. 55; Trien. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 180.

Humphreys, Hector D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at Canton, Conn., June 8, 1797. He pursued his studies at the academy in Westfield, and graduated in 1818 from Yale College. His purpose was to enter the ministry of the Congregational Church; but having abandoned this project, he joined the Protestant Episcopal communion, and was admitted, after due preparation, to the bar. When Washington College was established, he was elected its first professor of ancient languages. His predilection for the ministry led him to resignation, but he continued to discharge the duties of his professorship until 1831, when he was appointed president of St. John's College, Annapolis, Md. He died there, Jan. 25, 1857. Although familiar with all branches of literature, he devoted himself particularly to natural science, and he published many articles urging the application of chemistry to agriculture. See Amer. Quar. Chart. Rec. 1857, p. 146.

Hunddecker, Johann Peter, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born in 1751, and died Jan. 26, 1836. He published, Hultiache Gotteserrehrung erchristlichen Familien (Hillesheim, 1784, and later)—Strahlen des Lichts aus den heiligen Italien des Tempels der Wucht und Erwarmth (Leipzig, 1824)—Hultiache Freude fur gebildete Genossen des heiligen Abendmahls (1821, 2 vols.)—Weihgeschehen. Ermreckerungen zur Ansicht in den heiligen Tagen der Einsamkeit und der Theat.-Dienst (1825, 2nd ed. 1829). See Winner, Handbuch der Lit. i. iii. 330, 382, 332, 387, 375, Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i. i. 396. (B. P.)

Hundershagen, Karl Bernhard, a Reformed theologian of Germany, was born Jan. 10, 1810, at Friedewald, Hesse. He studied at Giessen and Halle, commenced his academic career at the former place in 1830, and accepted a call in 1834 as professor in the newly founded university of Berne. In 1848 his anonymous work, Der deutsche Protestantismus, seine Vergangenheit und seine heutigen Lebensfragen, appeared, and fell like a flash of lightning in that troubled period. "This remarkable work," says Schaff (in his Germany, 1877, 2d ed., ii. 231), "gave the outburst of the political earthquake of 1848. The author develops, first, the nature and object of Protestantism in its original form, then he traces the rise and power of recent anti-Christianity in Germany, its causes and effects, following it out even to the moral destitution of German emigrants in foreign countries; and finally he discusses the movements and questions which agitated the country in the last ten years before the revolution. He accounts for the development of modern infidelity in the bosom of German Protestantism, to a considerable extent, by the political reaction since the Congress of Vienna, which crippled the free motion of national life, violently suppressed all political discontent, and indirectly forced the bitter hostility to the existing order of things to vent itself intellectually upon the Church and Christianity. He thinks that a healthy religious life of a nation can only unfold itself on the soil of national political freedom, and he shows that a free England and the United States prove better than all arguments." This work made Hundershagen's reputation, and he was at once called to Heidelberg as professor of New Testament exegesis and Church history, where he continued to labor for twenty years (1847-67). In 1867 he accepted a call to Bonn, where he spent his last years in peaceful and friendly relations with his colleagues, although a great sufferer in body. He rejoiced in the restoration of the German empire in 1870, and greeted the hour of his departure with Christian fortitude and Christian wisdom. He died June 22, 1879, in Paris. Hundershagen was one of the most prominent and original theologians which the Reformed Church of Germany has given in this century to the service of the Evangelical Church. His peculiar importance consisted in this, that in his own way he showed how certain features of the Reformed Church might be advantageously applied to the living Christianity of the day. He emphasized the ethical principle in Protestantism over against a mere dogmatic or critical fundamentalism, and laid stress upon the social element in the Church, which was languishing for the reason of its abnormal condition as the State. Besides the work mentioned above, Hundershagen published, De Apostolis Archiarchiaco Lugdunensis Vita et Scripta (Giessen, 1831):—Epistolas Aliquot Ineditas Martini Buceri, Ioannis Calvini, Theodori Bem Aulaire ac Historiam Ecclesiasticam Magna Britanniae, Eddidit (Berne, 1840):—Uber den Einfluss des Calvinismus auf die Ideen von Staat und stadtteuberbürgerlicher Freiheit (1842):—Die Conflitete des Zwingiismus, Lutheranismus und Calvinismus in der bernischen Landeskirche von 1522-1538 (1845):—Die Bemhrns-Grundsätze der evangelischen Kirche in Boden (1861):—Uber die Natur und die geschichtliche Entwicklung der Humanitätsidee in ihrem Verhältniss zu Kirche und Kirchen (1862):—Der Weg zu Christo (vol. 1). A collection of his essays and shorter writings was published by professor Christ. Hopke (Giessen, 1874, 2 vols.). See Christlieb, K. B. Hungarian Version of the Scriptures. The Benedictine missionaries, who, at the beginning of the 11th century, brought Christianity to the Magyars, transmitted to them also a translation of the Psalms, the gospels and epistles, as essential parts for the divine service. In the life of Margareth, daughter of king Bela IV, who died in 1271, we are told that she read the Psalms and the history of the passion of the Saviour in the Hungarian dialect—Hungarico idiomate (see Pray, Vita S. Elisabethae et R. Margarit, 1770). In consequence of the many invasions made into Hungary, only a few texts have been preserved. Thus we find parts of the Old Test., translated by the Franciscana Thomas and Valentinus, in a Vienna codex, written between 1356 and 1444 (according to Réványi, Antiq. Lit. Hung. Pesth, 1863, in the year 1450). The translation is made from the Vulgate. The four gosbels are preserved in a Munich codex. Both were edited by Döbréntei, Régi magyar nyelvemlékek (1838), i. 3 sq.; (1842), iii. 17 sq. Psalms, Song of Solomon, and the gospels are found in a codex of the episcopal library at Stuhlweissenburg (specimens in Tudor, Magyar N. Irodalmi Története, Pesth, 1862, i. 247). The second complete translation of the Bible was made by L. Bóthori (died 1456); it is supposed that this translation is preserved in the codex Jordánzky at Grun. This codex was written in 1519, and contains Exodus vi—Judges, and all of the New Test. with the exception of the Pauline epistles. The first printed edition of the Pauline epistles, by B. Kornjáthy, was published at Cracow in 1583; the gospels, by Gabriel Pannonius Pestinius, at Vienna in 1536; the complete New Test., by John Sylvestor, was published in 1541; another in 1564; and the complete Bible, from the original in the inal, which the Jesuit Stephen Szántó (Latin Arator) prepared towards the end of the 16th century, was never printed, whereas the translation from the Vulgate, made by the Jesuit George Káldi (Stent Biblii, az ifok Kerez-vizsgában bevez rächt drak-bríoló, Vienna, 1681), is still in use among the Roman Catholics; and was often reprinted (Tymanu, 1732; Buda, 1783; Erlau, 1802-65; the latter edition revised in accordance with modern orthography, see Danko, De S. Scriptura, Egyes. Interp. Comm., Vienna, 1867, p. 243 sq.). A revision of Káldi's New Test. was made under a Reformated pastor in Hungary, in 1689, in behalf of the British and Foreign Bible Society. The first Protestant edition of the whole Bible appeared at Visoly, near Giuns, in 1689. This is the present authorized version of Hungary. The translation was made from the originals, compared with the Vulgate and several other Latin versions, by Gaspar Caroli, or Karolyi, a Magyar by birth, pastor of the Church at Giuns, and dean of the Brethren of the Valley of Kaschau. He had studied at Wittenberg, where he had imbibed the principles of the Reformation. His version was rendered in a printing-office that was established for that purpose by count Stephen Bathory. The sheets, as they passed through the press, were corrected by Albert Molnar, subsequently regent of the college at Oppenheim. He afterwards subjected the whole to a careful revision, and published an improved edition of the same in 1688, with a slight revision, limited to orthographical and syntactical errors, made by pastor Berke. (B. P.)

HUNGARIAN-WENDISH VERSION. See WEN-

DISH-HUNGARIAN VERSION, n. v.; SLAVONIC VERSIONS. By way of supplement we add that an edition of the New Test. in Hungarian has been published in 1688, with a slight revision, limited to orthographical and syntactical errors, made by pastor Berke. (B. P.)

HUNS. For a general description of this people and their history see vol. iv. It is the design in this place to pay some attention to particulars which are merely alluded to in the former article, and especially to examine the question of Attila's influence upon Christendom. The Huns are of a more comparatively recent origin, and its derivation is lottatott egész Szent írás, Magyar nyelvre fordított Károlyi Gáspár díjak. Molnar subsequently published other editions of the Bible, and separate editions of the New Test. The edition of 1688 is the most interesting, since it is accompanied with a Magyar translation of the Heidelberg catechism, the liturgy of the Hungarian churches, and a metrical version of the Psalms.

When the different editions were exhausted, another revision of the Hungarian Bible was undertaken by count Stephen Bethlen Dz'fhtar, brother to prince Gabriel Bethlen. He assembled a number of learned men to prepare the work, and established a printing-press at Waradin. In 1657 the revision was completed, and printing was commenced; but in 1660, when the city of Waradin was taken by the Turks, almost half the copies were lost or destroyed. The remaining copies were saved, and taken to Claudiopolis, or Koloszar, in Transylvania, where the edition was completed in 1661. Another edition (the sixth) of the Bible was published at Amsterdam in 1694—86, by K. M. Totuspoli, by whom a separate edition of the New Test. of the same was printed during the same year. The seventh eddition of the Bible was published at Cassell in 1764, edited by John Ingenbrand. In 1730 an edition was published at Utrecht, Sient Bibli, az-as: Istennéh és Lj Testamentum, az általános és világgazdasági fordítóként Károlyi Gáspár, which was followed by others in 1737 and 1794. In Basle also an edition was published in 1751, and at Leipzig in 1776.

Another revision of the Hungarian Bible, which, perhaps, ought rather to be regarded as a new translation, was executed by Dr. Comarin, pastor of Debrecen, but he died before it could be committed to press, and the MS. was sent for publication to the celebrated Viringe. Perhaps the edition published in Holland in 1716—17 was from this MS. The Jesuits prevented its circulation, and seized and destroyed 3000 copies.

In 1812 a Bible society was formed in Presburg, but with the exception of an edition of the Bible in 1823, no editions of the Hungarian Scriptures appear to have been published by that society. In 1814 Dr. Pinkerton found at Utrecht upwards of 2000 copies of the authorized Hungarian Bible, belonging to the above-mentioned edition of 1794. These copies were purchased by the British and Foreign Bible Society, and transmitted to Presburg for circulation.

When, in 1837, Hungary became accessible to the operations of the British and Foreign Bible Society, the publication of the Scriptures was commenced in Hungary itself, and the total number of Hungarian Bibles and Testaments printed by the British and Foreign Bible Society up to March 31, 1884, was 561,810.

As Carry's Bible abounds in archaic expressions, some of which sound rude and coarse to modern ears, the British and Foreign Bible Society has of late made arrangements to secure a faithful revision. A small number of a revised New Test. was published in 1876 with the intention of eliciting the criticisms of Hungarian scholars, with a view to a revised text. As the text has been fixed, the British and Foreign Bible Society published, in 1883, an edition of 10,000 New Tests, as revised by bishop Filo. See Bible of Every Land, p. 829. (B. P.)

alleging uncertain. The usual theory, that it is only the Chinese Hun-jo transferred into the dialects of the West, is not so well established as to make it impossible, or even unlikely, that Chinese writers may have first found the name used by Byzantine historians, and appropriated it from them. It is evidently a collective name designating a people composed of many distinct tribes, which are mentioned in some detail by early writers.

This people belonged to the Turkish family, and can best be accounted for, so far as that portion which enters into European history is concerned, by regarding it as included among the Scythian tribes, of which the later classics make mention. An Asiatic branch, whose western limits did not reach beyond the modern Turkestan, is wholly outside the scope of our inquiry. The Huns of history are first discovered as occupants of the district about the Caspian Sea, lying to the north and north-east of the Alans, who occupied the Caucasus and adjoining regions. Emerging thence, they engaged in a bloody struggle with the Alans, whom they defeated and afterward incorporated with their armies; and the allied nations then precipitated themselves into the Goths, whose territories lay beyond and contiguous to those of the Alans, and, by forcing them from their homes, produced the general irruption of barbarians into the Roman empire. In the revolt of the Goths against the empire the Huns crossed the Danube as allies of their recent enemies, and entered the land of Rome on a footing more insidious than the Goths, they were yet able to impose a tribute, under their king Rous, upon the Romans. Bleda and Attila, the sons of Mundzuk and nephews of Rous, succeeded the latter in 453; and after the death of Bleda, many of the authority of those who have been caused by his brother, while others deny the charge, Attila became the acknowledged head of the vast hordes collected under or affiliated with the Hunnish name, and entered on a career of conquest and diplomacy which made him the most noted personage of his age, and under the embellishing hand of legend and myth has secured to him and his followers a notable place in the recollections of the world for all time. Seven hundred thousand warriors, Huns, Alans, Avars, Bulgarians, Avars, and many other tribes are said to have followed him into battle. An expedition into Persia for plunder is attributed by some writers as his first distinct enterprise; but history gives clear evidence of but three campaigns conducted by Attila, all of them European wars.

1. An invasion of the Eastern or Byzantine empire in 441, in which he defeated the emperor Theodosius II in a disastrous battle, and ravaged the province of Greece, and after several years of desultory warfare conquered a peace in 447, which gave him possession of a territory in Thrace. Having devastated the country south of the Danube, he accepted an indemnity from the emperor, and renounced all claim to its control. In addition, he exacted, however, an annual tribute and the return of deserters from his army.

2. An incursion into Gaul in 450, during which he took the towns of Treves, Metz, Rheims, Tongres, Arras, Lam, St. Quentin, Strasbourg, etc. Orleans, which was the objective of this movement, according to the Roman general .Eius when the gates had already been opened to the Huns, and pillage was beginning. Attila thereafter met reluctantly to .Chalons on the Marne, and was there attacked by the united armies of .Eius and Theodoric, the Visigoth king, and defeated in a terrible battle in which his horseriding was a slighter of from 250,000 to 300,000 men—the last great battle ever fought by the Huns. Returning to his possessions on the Danube, he prepared for a new campaign, which he undertook.

3. In 452. The ostensible reason alleged for his incursion of that year into Italy was the refusal of the emperor Valentinian III to confer upon him the hand of his sister Honoria, accompanied by a dowry of half the empire. He crossed the Julian Alps and laid siege to Aquileia, then the second city in Italy, and at the end of three months overcame its obstinate resistance. A century later the historian Jermundes could scarcely trace the ruins of the place. Other towns were sacked, e.g. Milan, Pavia, Parma, and quite certainly also Ve- rona, Mantua, Brescia, Bergamo, and Cremona. The whole of Lombardy was ravaged, and Attila was preparing to march on Rome when an embassy from that city, headed by Pope Leo the Great, succeeded in persuading him to a peaceful evacuation of Italy. Retiring into Pannonia by way of Augsburg, which he plundered, he consigned himself by adding a new wife, Illidra, Hilda, or Myeloth, to the large number which he already possessed; but on the morning after this marriage he was found dead, having ruptured a blood-vessel or been feebly dealt with, A.D. 453. His kingdom fell to pieces almost as soon as the great king was dead; the different nations which had followed his banner became alienated from each other, and separated, some to serve in the armies of the empire, others to seek alliance with tribes in the north and east, which were of similar race and character with themselves.

The effect of the Hunnish invasions was indirectly beneficial to Christianity. The Burgundians, for example, when threatened by Attila's uncle, Oktar or Uptar, submitted to be baptized, in the hope that they might thus acquire power to resist the foe. The deliverance of Troyes in the Chalons campaign by the supplications of bishop Luspinus, in the name of Rome and the Christian church, of those of Leo the Great, convinced the mind of that and succeeding ages that piety could accomplish what armies might fail to achieve. The profound impressions wrought upon the mind of Christendom appear most clearly, however, in the legendary histories of Attila, which are preserved in three distinct currents of tradition—the Latin, Germanic, and Hungarian.

The Latin legends originated in the reaction from the panic into which Attila's conquests had thrown the whole of Europe, and sprang from ecclesiastical sources. They seek to explain his successes by exaggerating his power, and both chronology and geography are violated in the attempt to magnify his career. They describe sieges and captures which never took place, make the Hunnish army sweep over the whole of France, derive the name of the city of Strasbourg from the fancy that Attila made four roads through the city walls, and despatch the broken remnants of his army after the battle of Chalons into Spain to fight the Moors. In the title "The Scourge of God," applied to Attila, these Latin legends reach their culmination. A hermit of Cam- pagne says that before Chalons and — in the Chalons province by the legend—"Tu es flagellum Dei—but God breaks, when he pleases, the instruments of his vengeance. God will take this sword from thee and give it to another." At Troyes Attila announces himself to St. Lupus as "the king of the Huns, the scourge of God," whereupon the bishop responds, "Welcome, then, scourge of the God whom I serve. Enter, and go where thou wilt." The Huns are, however, smitten with supernatural blindness, and see nothing until they have passed through the city and out at the opposite gate. Those who areCtued endow Attila's name with the attributes of sarcasm, pride, and hideous ugliness, joined with a sardonic humor, while others go to the opposite extreme, and describe him as a champion of the pope and extirpator of heresy. Some of the latter sort even represent him as preaching menial marriages, and contracting marriages, and portioning virtuous maidens. One reports that a great battle was fought by Attila under the walls of Rome, on the conclusion of which the dead rose again and continued the fight with great fury for three days and nights; and the location, with all its details, was afterward pointed out.

The Germanic legends differ widely from the Latin. In them Attila is a hero, the type of royal majesty, furnished with almost superhuman bravery and strength. He is as wise as Solomon, and richer and more generous than he. The great Theodoric and Hermanaric are always associated with him, as his inferiors. The oldest of these legends is a fragment of the 9th century at Fulda, which proves that they were circulated in the Frank dialect in Gaul during the Merovingian period. The Germanic form of Attilla legend was current in England also at an early period, and receives its fullest development in the Icelandic and Scandinavian handling. The episode of Walter of Aquitaine and the Vèhelungenlied are offspring from the primitive stock of this tradition.

The Hungarian legends associate Attilla with all the phases of their early national life. Deriving the Magyar name from a stag, the son of Japhet and king of Scythia, they trace it down to Attilla and his son Arpad, the common patrons of the Magyars and Huns. When the Magyars become Christians, it is because Attilla, by his docility under the hand of God, whose scourge he was, has prepared the way for their conversion through his merits. He is the inseparable patron of that people, changing when they change, and living through all the stages of their national existence.

Attila was not only a barbarian, but also a heathen, and while he fought Rome rather than the Church, and even for the sacred cause of the Germanic representatives, the success of his arms was universally felt to be destructive to Christianity. In the course of time, accordingly, the minds of writers, saturated with ideas derived from the churchly legends, discovered that so mighty an instrument of the principle of evil as Attila could be no other than a villain himself; and artists, under the same influence, represented him as having almost diabolical features and goat's horns. See frontispiece to Italian legend of Attila, frequently printed at Venice in the later years of the 16th century.

With the history of the Huns, down to the time when the name and people became extinct, see the article Huns in vol. iv.

Literature.—For the early history Ammiannus Marcellinus and Priscus, especially the latter, are the principal sources. Sidonius Apollinaris notices the invasion of Gaul. Later authorities are Jordanes,Procopius, Agathias, Gregory of Tours, and Cassiodorus. Jordanes was a Goth, bitterly hostile to the Huns, and open to the charge of excessive cruelty; but he is the only authority for certain portions of Attila's history.

As Attila's action in the Guisnes, and the Guisnes must be assigned the first place, as it furnishes all the speculations upon which the earliest accepted history of the Huns is based. Gibbon's account in the Decline and Fall (Milman's ed. vol. vi) is scarcely more than an abridgment of the Gentzian. See also Creasy, Descriptive Dictionary of the World (Chicago); Nodder, Teller des Südlichen Ruhslande; Klemm, Attila (1827); v. Müller, Attila, der Held des 6. Jahrhunderts (1860); Herzberg, Attila, or the Triumph of Christianity (1838); Grimm, Deutsche Heldennamen (Göttingen, 1823); Zenus, Deutsche u. Nachbarvolker unter Attila, etc. Also, Bertaux, Vita San Leone Primo et di Attila FIGLIO di Dio (Mantua, 1614, 4to). Gibbon gives leading authorities on Attila. Huntingtonians, a class of Antinomians (q. v.) in England, followers of William Huntington (q. v.), a Calvinistic Methodist preacher of London. Huntington maintained that the elect are justified from all eternity, an act of which their justification in this world by faith is only a manifestation; that God sees no sin in believers, and is never angry with them; that the imputation of our sins to Christ, and of his righteousness to us, was actual, not judicial; that faith, repentance, and holy obedience are covenant conditions on the part of Christ, not on our part; and, finally, that sanctification is not a condition of justification, but rather renders it more obscure. These doctrines still continue to be taught in a number of chapels, especially in Sussex.

Hurd, Carlton, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born in New Hampshire in 1736. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1819, and from the Theological Seminary in 1822; was ordained, Sept. 17, 1823, pastor at Fryeburg, Me., and died there, Dec. 6, 1855. See Tren. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 51.

Hurd, Isaac, D.D., a Unitarian and subsequently a Trinitarian minister, was born in Cambridge, Dec. 7, 1765. He graduated at Harvard College in 1806; completed his theological studies at Divinity Hall, Edinburgh, Scotland; and preached his first sermon in London. He was ordained pastor of the Unitarian Society in Lynn, Mass., Sept. 15, 1813, and was dismissed by the Society on May 22, 1816. Although he had so far changed his sentiments as to become an avowed Trinitarian, he was called to be the pastor of the Second (Unitarian) Society in Exeter, N.H., and was installed, Sept. 11, 1817. "Notwithstanding a conscientious difference of opinion on certain important points, he continued to enjoy the cordial respect and affection of his people." In his advanced years his society secured for him the services of colleague pastors. He died at South Reading (now Wakefield), at the residence of his son, Oct. 4, 1866. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpsm. (1865-67), 446; Nervology of Harvard College, p. 115. (J. C. S.)

Huret, Grégoire, a reputable French engraver, was born at Lyons in 1610. The following are some of his principal plates: Life and Passion of Our Saviour, a set of thirty-two; The Blowing of Stephen; St. Peter Preaching; St. John Crowning with Thorns; The Holy Family with St. Catharine. He died at Paris in 1670. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spoooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Huscanawer, a ceremony formerly practiced by the North American Indians of Virginia when they wished to prepare a candidate for the priesthood, or for enrollment among their great men. The principal men of the place where the ceremony was to be performed selected the handsomest and most vigorous youths for the purpose. They shut them up for several months, giving them no other sustenance than that of roots, berries, etc., which strongly affected the nervous system. The result was that they quite lost their memory; they forgot their possessions, parents, friends, and even their language, becoming at length deaf and dumb. The purpose of this strange treatment was that it might give the novices the serious impressions of infancy, and to relieve the mind of all prejudice.

Husseyites, the followers of Joseph Hussey, a learned but eccentric divine, formerly of Cambridge, who held the Antinomian view of Tobias Crisp (q. v.). He maintained that the pre-existence of Christ's soul, or rather, of a spiritual or glorious body, in which he appeared to Adam, Abraham, and others; this body being the image of God in which man was created.

Hutangi, an apartment which is generally found in the houses of the wealthy Chinese, and devoted to ancestor-worship (q. v.). The room contains the image of the most illustrious ancestor of the family, and a record of the names of all the members of the family. Twice a year, generally in spring and autumn, the relations hold a meeting in this room, when rich presents of various kinds of meats, wines, and perfumes, with wax candles, are placed on the table with great ceremony as gifts to their deceased ancestors.

Hutch. (1) A medieval term for a chest, box, or hoarding-cupboard, found in use in the Vision of Piers Plowman. (2) This word was sometimes applied to an ambury for the sacred vessels of the altar, as in the accounts of the Temple: a cup, or harbour; a mental or baptismal shell, stoles, and towel used in baptism. (4) Any locker for books, church music, sconces, etc.
HUTCHINS, Richard, D.D., a minister of the Church of England, was Herry's tutor, and a very faithful member of the Oxford Methodist Society. He became a fellow of Lincoln College, Dec. 8, 1720; sublector, Nov. 6, 1739; bursar and librarian, Nov. 6, 1742; rector, July 5, 1735; and died Aug. 10, 1781. His only publication in Latin was 'Seuvergendi Secundum Johannem (1748, 8vo, p. 51). "In more respects than one Dr. Hutchins continued an Oxford Methodist long after all his old friends had been dispersed." See Tyerman, The Oxford Methodists, p. 570.

Hutchinson, John Russell, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Columbia County, Pa., Feb. 2, 1735; graduated from Jefferson College in 1786, and studied two years in Princeton Seminary. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, April 22, 1789, and went to Mississippi the following October. He preached at Rodney, Miss.; Baton Rouge, La.; Vicksburg, Miss.; Bethel Church, Prytane Street, and Carrolton, New Orleans, La. Jan. 1, 1834, he became connected with the College of Louisiana. In 1842 he was called to occupy the chair of ancient languages in Oakland College, Miss., which he held twelve years, and for a time, in 1851, he was acting president. In 1864 he removed to New Orleans, purchased a lot in the city, and established a classical school of a high order. In 1869 he took charge of the public academy in Houston, Texas. He died Feb. 24, 1878. He was a preacher for nearly half a century, and in his prime a man of marked ability. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1878, p. 17.

Huth, Caspar Jacob, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Frankfort-on-the-Main, Dec. 25, 1711. He studied at Jena, commenced his theological career in 1735, was professor of theology at Erlangen in 1743, and died Sept. 14, 1759, leaving, Pauker Spiritus Erleangen (1743); De Schilbii Vaticiniim (ed.); Spee Regiomontani Vica per Resurrectionem Christi (1746); Fides Matris Vicentiana (1748); Schola Bethlehemiensis (ed.); Petrus non Petra (1757); Questions Theologicae (1758), etc. See Ditting, Die griechischen Theologen Deutsclandg, s. v.; Jüchter, Holy, Pravia Celebri Lrsenia, s. v.; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 418 sq. (B. P.)

Huth, Johann Ernst, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, who died at Altenburg, Jan. 4, 1873, superintendent, is the author of De Loop Epitaphii Pauli vs Colossas iii, 19, 20 (Altenburg, 1834). See Uzchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 690.

Huther, Johann Eduard, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Sept. 10, 1807, at Hamburg. He studied at Bonn, Göttingen, and Berlin; was in 1842 religious instructor in the gymnasium at Schwerin; in 1853 pastor at Wittenfieden, near Schwerin; and died March 17, 1890, leaving, Cypriae iahre von der Kirche (Gotha, 1839); Commentar über den Brief Paulii an die Kolosser (Hamburg, 1841); "Der Religions-Unterricht in den Gymnasiu" (Rostock, 1848). For Meyer's Commentary he prepared the epistles to Timothy and Titus and the Catholic epistles. See Zschulz, Bibl. Theol. i, 690 (B. P.)

Hutter, Edwin W., D.D., a Lutheran minister, was born at Allentown, Pa., Sept. 12, 1813. After attending the village school he entered a printing-office. When seventeen years of age his father died, and he succeeded him as editor and proprietor of two weekly newspapers, one German, the other English. For several years he resided at Washington, D. C., as private secretary to James Buchanan, then secretary of state. Removing to Baltimore, Md., he studied theology under Dr. B. Kurtz, at the same time discharging the duties as office editor of the Observer. Subsequently he took charge of the Church, and the church and school upon which he ever entered, and which he served with great success for twenty-three years. The Northern Home for Friendless Children was founded largely through his influence. He died in September, 1873. See Fifty Years in the Lutheran Ministry, 1878, p. 194.

Hutterian, the followers of Hutter, an Anabaptist leader in Moravia in the 16th century. See Anabapt.

Hutton, Manius Smedes, a Reformed (Dutch) minister, was born in Troy, N. Y., June 9, 1803. He attended the school of the famous utilitarian teacher, Joseph Nelson, in New York city; graduated from Columbia College in 1823, and from the theological seminary at Princeton in 1826. He was licensed to preach the same year by what was then known as the Second Presbytery of New York, and as missionary to the Dutch Church (Dutch) Church in Ulster County, N. Y., in 1827 and 1828. The latter year he was called to the Presbyterian Church in German Valley, and remained there until 1834, when he was called to the city of New York to become the colleague of the late Rev. Dr. James M. Matthews, then pastor of the South Reformed Church in Exchange Place, the church which he had attended when a boy and up to the time of leaving the city. After the great fire of Dec. 16, 1835, which destroyed most of the lower part of the city, including the Exchange Place Church, the church was removed, and the pastor went to the patron in which built the edifice on the east side of Washington Square. The new church was dedicated in 1841. For many years this was one of the best-known churches in the city. The neighborhood was one of the most fashionable in the metropolis, and the congregation, a very large one, numbered among its members many of the most intelligent and wealthy of the residents of the west side. After the resignation of his colleague Dr. Hutton remained sole pastor until 1876, when the church disbanded, caused by the removal from time to time of so many of its members to the upper parts of the city. Thereafter Dr. Hutton continued without a charge until his death, April 11, 1880. Dr. Hutton was a trustee of Columbia College, a member of the Council of the New York University, president of the Board of Education of the Reformed Church for the education of young men destined for the ministry, and a director in the Bible and tract societies. By virtue of his descent from revolutionary stock, he was a member of the Society of the Cincinnati for the state of New York, and general chaplain of the society in the United States. He published a number of Sermons and Addresses, for which see Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America, s. v.; also Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1882, p. 15.

Hutton, Matthew (1), D.D., an English prelate, was presb. of Ely in 1560. Margaret professor of divinity in Cambridge in 1561, regius professor of divinity in 1562, master of Peterhouse Hall and prebend of London the same year, dean of York in 1567, bishop of Durham in 1580, archbishop of York in 1595, and died Jan. 15 or 16, 1606.

Hutton, Matthew (2), D.D., an English prelate, was presb. of York in 1734, canon of Windsor in 1736, prebend of Westminster in 1739, bishop of Bangor in 1743, and archbishop of York in 1747. He was translated to Canterbury in 1756. He died March 17, 1758, leaving occasional Sermons (1741, 1744, 1745, 1747). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Hwergemel, in Norse mythology, is the spring in the centre of Holheim and Nidhheim, in which the drops collect that fall from the antlers of the reindeer Aesirnym. There are so many of them that the spring supplies thirty-seven rivers of hell. The spring is inhabited by many snakes, who gnaw at the root of the world ash-tree, Ygtrial.

Hypatia, an ancient festival, celebrated annually at Amycla, in Greece. It lasted three days, on the first and last of which sacrifices were offered to the dead, and lamentations were held for the death of Hypatius, all the people laying aside their garments and partaking only of simple cakes, with every sign of grief.
and mourning. The intermediate day, however, was spent in mirth and rejoicings, scenes being sung in honor of Apollo, while the youth spent the day in games of various kinds.

Hyads, a common appellation given to the seven daughters of Atlas by his wife Aethra, viz. Ambrosia, Euflora, Patithoe, Coronia, Plexaria, Pytho, and Tyche. These virgins bewailed so immediately the death of their brother Hyas, who was devoured by a lion, that Jupiter, out of compassion, changed them into stars and placed them in the head of Taurus, where they still retain their grief, their rising and setting being attended with extraordinary rains (fus, to rain). Some make them the daughters of Lycurgus, born in the isle of Naxos, and translated to the skies for their care in the education of Iacchus; probably because their rains were of great benefit in forwarding the vintage.

Hyen, a name applied by Porphyry to the priestesses of Mithras, or the sun.

Hydiaphoria (from ἢδαιαφίασις, water, and ἤδαιος, to bear), a ceremony in which the married alien women carried a vessel with water for the married women of Athens as they walked to the temple of Athena in the great procession of the Panathenaea.

Hydromancy (from ἰδαιαφίασις, water, and παράσις, divination), a species of divination, in which, by the aid of certain incantations, the images of the gods were seen in the water. The practice was brought from Persia, and employed by Numa and Pythagoras.

Hydronastatic (Ὑδροναστατίκα), a Greek term for those who anciently pretended to celebrate the holy communion with water.

Hygda, in Greek mythology, was the goddess of health, the daughter and constant companion of Aesculapius. See Hek.

Hyneck, Ludwic, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born July 4, 1793. He studied theology and philology at Leipzig, and received the degree of doctor of philosophy in 1817, on presenting his Adiutatio in Recensentia Ecri Libros Exeuntud Rationem. In 1827 he was made licentiate of theology by the Marburg University, for writing Quod sit quod Debeat Religioni

I.

Iacchagōi, those who were appointed to carry the statue of Iacchus (the mystic Bacchus) in solemn procession at the consecration of the Eleusinian Mysteries (q. v.). Their headdresses were crowned with myrtle, and they beat drums and brazen instruments, dancing and singing as they marched along.

Iaian Version of the Scriptures. The Iaian is a dialect spoken in Uvea, one of the Loyalty islands. A translation of Luke for the twelve hundred Protestants of Uvea, and two tribes in New Caledonia, was prepared by Rev. S. Ella, and printed in 1896. Mr. Ella has continued since, assisted by a native pundit, in the preparation of the New Test., which was printed at Sydney in 1874, and to which were added the Psalms in 1879. (B. P.)

Ialidaboath (prob. for יִלְדָּבֹא, the name given by the Ophites, in the 24th century, to the Deivurige or world-former. See Ophites.

Ithar (or Ebur; Lat. Iberius), bishop of the island of Berery, in Wexford Harbor, Ireland, where he died in 508, is commemorated April 23, and famous for having driven away the rats from Leinster.

Ibleam. The modern site, Jelomeh (or Jelomex, as Testament, Bible Places, p. 221, and Conder, Test Work, ii, 337, incorrectly write), is thus described in the Morocco accompanying the Ordnance Survey (ii, 84): "It stands in the plain, surrounded with arable land, and is supplied by cisterns. It has a koubbeh (domed place of prayer) on the north side. This place seems not improbably the Kaliium of the lists of Thothmes, mentioned in the same group with Sannach, Anahoret, and other places on the plain (Quar. Statement of the Pal. Explor. Fund), July 1876, p. 147.)"}

Tbn-Al-Atbir, an Arabian historian, was born in 1160 at Jazirat Ibn-Omar, in Mesopotamia, and died at Mosul in 1291. He is the author of a large historical work, giving the history of the world to the year 1250, which was edited by Tornberg, under the title, Ibn-al-Atbir Chronicon quod Perfectionis Inscriptus (Leiden, 1898-71, 12 vols.). Icheri, in the mythology of the Caribbeans, are the good protecting spirits accompanying fishermen and hunters.

Icoz, a sect of religiousmen in Japan, who celebrate the festival of their founder annually in a peculiar manner. Under the impression that the first act of feet in the temple is entitled to peculiar blessings, they all rush towards the same spot, and person is often killed in the press.

Idalah. For this site Tristram (Bible Places, p. 247) and Conder (Text Work, ii, 387) propose ed-Dolah, on Carmel, eight and a half miles south-east of Haifa, and thus described in the Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey (i, 281): "A stone village of moderate size, on a knoll of one of the spurs running out of the main water-shed (or ridge) of Carmel. On the south there is a well, and a few springs on the west. On the north is a little plain, or open valley, cultivated with corn. The inhabitants are all of the race of Muslims, numbered by consul Rogers in 1859 at 800 souls." But this position is entirely beyond the borders of Zebulon, and the modern name Dolah is too indefinite for identification, being likewise applied to another village on the ridge of Carmel, six and a half miles farther south. The site Keffa Eshik (proposed by Schwarz) lying one and a quarter miles south by west from Tell Keimun (Jokneam), is described in the Memoirs (ii, 60) as "evidently an ancient site," with traces of ruins and broken pottery on the hill and tombs in the vicinity; a good supply of water, and a small mill. The village of Jedda is an entirely different locality, two and a half miles west of Semniah, and destined of antiquities (Memoirs, i, 270).

I'dan (or I'dafeld), in Norse mythology, is the dwelling-place of the twelve great judges in Asgard, whom Odin had appointed to judge all things.

I'dera Rabba (אִדֶּרֶת רַבָּה, i.e. the Great Assembly, is the title of one of the many parts which compose the Sohar, the famous theaurus of Jewish mysticism. It is called "Great Assembly," because it purports to give an account of the teachings which the rabbi Simon ben Jochai (q. v.) delivered to his disciples, who congregated around him in large numbers. Upon the summon of the Sacred Light, his disciples assembled to listen to the secrets and enigmas contained in the Book of Mysteries. The Sanhedrin is chiefly occupied with a description of the form and various members of the Deity; a disquisition on the relation of the Deity, in his two aspects of the aged and the young, to the creation and the universe, as well as on the diverse gigantically members of the Deity, such as the head, the beard, the eyes, the nose, etc., a dissertation on pneumatology, demonology, etc. It concludes with telling us that three of the disciples died during these discussions. This part of the Sohar is translated in the second volume of Rosenroth's Kabala Demudata. (B. P.)

I'dera Zutta (אִדֶּרֶת צוּתָה, i. e. the Small Assembly, is, like the I'dera Rabba (q. v.), also one of the component parts of the Sohar. It derives its name from the fact that many of the disciples of rabbi Simon ben Jochai had died during the course of the cabalistic revelations, and that this portion of the Sohar contains the discourses which the Sacred Light delivered before his death to a small assembly of six pupils, who still survive, and congregated to listen to the profound mysteries. It is to a great extent a recapitulation of the I'dera Rabba, occupying itself with speculations about the Sephiroth, the Deity, etc., and concludes with recording the death of Simon ben-Jochai, the Sacred Light, and the medium through whom God revealed the contents of the Sohar. The I'dera Zutta, too, is translated into Latin by Rosenroth, in the second volume of his Kabbala Demudata. (B. P.)

I'de, George Barton, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Coventry, Yt., in 1806, his father being a well-known Baptist clergyman, Rev. John Ide, who, in 1806, had moved from New York to northern Vermont. His father gave him the best education he could secure for him, and he decided to enter the profession of law, the study of which he commenced, without having taken a collegiate course, at the age of eighteen, in the village of Brandon. He graduated from Middlebury College with the highest honors in 1830; soon after was ordained at Derby, Conn.; was invited, in 1834, to a church in Albany, N. Y.; in 1835 to the Federal Street Baptist Church in Boston, Mass.; in 1838 to the First Baptist Church in Philadelphia, Pa., and in 1852 to Springfield, Mass., where he died, April 16, 1872. Dr. Ide was one of the most distinguished ministers of his denomination. He published several works, among which were Life Sketches of Life Truths, and Bible Pictures. He also wrote several Sunday-school books. See The Watchman, April, 1872. (J. C. B.)

I'de, Jacob, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Attleborough, Mass., March 29, 1785. His pastor, Rev. Nathan Holman, assisted him in preparatory studies, and he graduated from Brown University in 1809, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1812. He was ordained Nov. 2, 1814, over the Church in West Medway, Mass., and died in office, Jan. 5, 1880, although relieved from active service in 1865. Besides numerous sermons and other literary labors, he edited the works of Dr. Nathaniel Emmons, in seven volumes. See Cong. Year-book, 1881, p. 28.

I'dentism (or Identity), the doctrine, advocated by Fichte and Schelling, of the entire identity of God and the universe, or of Creator and creation. This ultimately coincides with Pantheism (q. v.). See Krauth-Pfleming, Vocub. of Phil. Sciences.

I'dind, the term used by the Kaffirs to denote sacrifice. Sacrifices are offered to their ancestors, and not to God; and these only in cases where they wish to avert some apprehended evil.

I'diomblia (fully e lmblia, i. e. peculiar struphe) are stichera that have no periods the rhythm of which they regularly follow. They are usually said at lands and vespers on special occasions, sometimes at the burial of a priest. See Smith, Dict. of Christ. Antiq. a. v.

I'duna, in Norse mythology, is the loveliest of the Aesir, the goddess of eternal youth and immortality; not created or born, but existing from the beginning. She is the wife of the wise Braga, the god of the poetic art. In her keeping are the apples of rejuvenation, without which even the gods would become aged, therefore they daily eat the same.

I'dya, the wooden tablets employed by the Japanese, containing inscriptions commemorative of the dead, mentioning the date of his decease, and the name given to him since that event. The hya are carried in the funeral procession, along with the body, to the grave. and one of them is placed over it, remaining there seven weeks, when it is removed to make way for the grave-stone. Another is set up in the best apartment of the house during the period of mourning. Sweetmeats, fruits, and tea are placed before it; and morning, noon, and night food is prepared for it as for a living person. The whole household would pray before it morning and evening during seven weeks, and other religious ceremonies are observed.

I'dgau, Treaty OF, a celebrated compact, ratified at I'dgau, in Bohemia, which closed the long-protracted war between the Hussites and the Roman Catholics. It was dated Nov. 50, 1453. See Hussites.
Ignispicum, a species of divination practiced by the ancient Romans, consisting of observations made on the flames ascending from the sacrificial altar.

Icon. As a representative of this Conder suggests (Tent Work, ii, 857) El-Khisam, four and a half miles northeast of the city (in the Mimas triangle of the Litany); but this is an entirely modern village of about three hundred Christians and two hundred Druses (Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey, i, 88), and the name has little resemblance. Tell Dilnin, the more probable representative, is beyond the limits of the Ordnance Survey.

Ilko-sin, the sect of the worshippers of Amidas (q. v.), the most numerous and powerful ecclesiastical body in Japan.

Iluhi (the divine) of Akbar was a system of philosophical deism introduced by Akbar, the emperor of Delhi, in the latter half of the 16th century. He proposed to found a new creed on the basis of universal toleration, combining in one religious body the Hindûs, Mohammedans, and Christians, along with the followers of Zoroaster. His object in establishing a new creed was both political and religious; he was the only one of the emperors who regarded India as his country, and who sought to efface from the memory of the Hindûs the fact that they were a conquered people. Iku, or the divine system, was essentially eclectic in character. The fundamental point on which Akbar insisted was the great doctrine of the Divine Unity, by which he declared was but obscurely revealed in the prophets. But while he thus adopted a Mohammedan basis for his creed, he took care at the same time to declare his entire disbelief of the divinity of the Koran. From the time of his rejection of the Koran, the emperor proceeded himself to be an imperal inquirer after truth, and accordingly he conversed openly with the teachers of every religion. He finally decided upon a system, which was the revival of Zoroastrianism in a modified form. Having acquired sufficient influence over the theologians, doctors of the law, and learned men, to secure their public recognition of him as the sole protector of the faith, Akbar propounded his creed, which was accepted by several Hindûs and Mohammedans. Encouraged by his success, he now ordered the abolition of the old confession of Islam, "There is no God but God, and Mohammed is his prophet," and the substitution of another, "There is no God but God, and Akbar is the vicer of God." He next abrogated the five daily prayers, the ablations, fasts, alms, and pilgrimages enjoined upon the faithful. He abolished the religious services on Friday nights, and declared the umpire and the judge. He ordered that that should be considered as clean which was declared by the Koran to be unclean. He permitted the sale of wine, and the practice of games of chance. He forbade the marriage of more than one wife, and enjoined the postponement of the circumcision of boys until twelve years of age, and even then the ceremony was to be entirely optional. He finally ordered the era of his own accession to the throne to be used instead of the Hegira. At first he received considerable support from various sections, but his system became monastic and the persons present had been accursed, and of his son Jehangir, the empire returned to Islamism.

Illocet (for ire licet, "you may go"), a solemn word pronounced at the conclusion of the funeral rites among the ancient Romans. It was uttered by the proconsul or some other person at the close of the ceremony, after the bones and ashes of the deceased had been committed to the funeral pyre. In the persons present he was thrice sprinkled with pure water from a branch of olive or laurel for the purpose of purification. From the occasion on which the word illocet was employed, it is sometimes used proverbially among Roman authors to signify all is over.

Ilthibas, in Greek and Roman mythology, is the goddess of birth, the daughter of Jupiter and Juno, born on Crete, in the Aminian cave, and sister of Hebe, Mars, and Vulcan. Homer speaks of a number of Ilithbies, daughters of Juno, who send the arrow of pain, but help those in childbed. Often Ilithibas is identified with Juno, who is sometimes, since Juno is the goddess of marriage. The Greek Ilithibas was also identified with Diana, probably because the latter, being the goddess of the moon, a certain influence over birth might be credited her. She is also called Lucina, or genetrix. Fidar and Ovid make her the daughter of Juno. In a Grecian temple erected to her she was represented as wearing a loose robe, and holding in one hand a flame and in the other a censer.

Illoso, Guntibaly de, abbot of St. Frontes, Spain, who died in 1580, is the author of Historia Pontificalis et Churci (Salamanca, 1574; continued by L. de Habia, M. de Guadalazarra, and J. Banos de Velasco, Madrid, 1678, 6 vols. fol.). See Winer, Handbuch der theolog. Lit. i, 682; Jocher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, a. v. (B. E.)

Illostrius, in Chaldaic mysticism, was the second of the three primary principles of the Chaldeans, created by Ammon and Anidra, and afterward removed from the two natural forces, the creating and conceiving principles, Asuron and Kiassar.

Ilmarinen, the third of the great deities of the Finns, and the god of earth and metals.

Imam, a name applied by way of excellence to each of the chiefs or founders of the four principal sects of the Moslems.

Imamate, the office of an Imam, or Mohammedan priest. See Imam, Vol. iv, p. 506.

Imams, the Twelve, the twelve Islam chiefs, according to the Persian Mohammedans, who belong to the Shiites. Ali (q. v.) is reckoned the first Imam, and immediate spiritual successor of the Prophet. Hasan (q. v.) and Imam, being the sons of Ali. He was a feeble-minded prince, and surrendered his caliphate to Mowishah, retaining only the spiritual office. Hossein (q. v.) was the third of the line. He was succeeded by his son Ali, the fourth Imam, who, from his constancy in prayer, received the name of "the Imam of the Carpet," and "the glory of pious men." He died in 712, and was succeeded by his son Mohammed, the fifth Imam, who was a diligent student of magic, and received the name of "the possessor of the secret." The sixth Imam was Jaafar, the son of Mohammed, who was thought to be equal to the son of Solomon. Jafer nominated his son Ismail his successor, but the heir-apparent having died prematurely, he named his second son Musa his heir. Ismael, however, had left children; hence parties arose, some holding to one as the lawful Imam, others to the other. The two sects were called Ismaelites (q. v.) and Ashurites (q. v.). The claim of Musa to be the seventh Imam has been generally admitted. Ali, the son of Musa, was the eighth Imam. He is called by the Shiites "the beloved," and his tomb, termed Meshed Ali, is a favorite object of pilgrimage. The ninth Imam was Mohammed, the son of Ali, who lived in retirement at Bagdad, where he died at an early age, leaving behind him so great a reputation for benevolence that he received the name of "the generous." His son Ali, the tenth Imam, was but a child when his father died, and having been seized by the caliph Motawakkil, was a determined enemy of the Shiites, he was confined for life in the city of Askar, from which circumstance he is called "the Askerti." He was poisoned by order of the caliph in 868. His son and successor, Hasan, was also murdered by poisoning, leaving but a son, Muhammed Akl. In the office to his son Mohammed, the twelfth and last Imam, who, at his father's death, was a child only six months old. He was kept in close confinement by the caliph, but at about the age of twelve years he suddenly disappeared; the Sonnites allege that he was drowned in the Tigre, but the Shiites deny the fact of his death, and assert that he is wandering over the earth, and will continue so to wander until the appointed period shall arrive when he shall claim and receive universal empire.

Immer, Albert, a Protestant theologian, was born Aug. 10, 1604, at Unterseen, Switzerland. He studied at Bern, was in 1636 vicar at Burgdorf, in 1640 pastor at Bâzès, and in 1830 professor of theology at Berna. In 1881 he retired from his professorship, and died March 23, 1884. Besides some theological essays and lectures, he published Hermeneutik des Neuen Testaments (Wittenberg, 1873; Engl. translation by A. H. Newman, Andover, 1877).—Neutestamentliche Theologie (Bern, 1877).

Impanation (from *in pan, "in the bread"), the doctrine that Christ's presence is in the bread in the Lord's supper. It is synonymous with consubstantiation (q.v.).

Inauguratio, the ceremony by which the ancient Romans consecrated a person or thing to the gods. It was performed by the augurs (q.v.), who offered prayer to the gods, asking them to show by signs whether they accepted the consecrated object. If the signs appeared favorable, the consecration was regarded as complete. The kings of Rome were inducted by the augurs as the high priests of the people; but the inauguration of the city was performed upon the 21st of March.

Incense-boat, a vessel for containing incense, often formed like a boat: hence its name. Examples of these are numerous in old inventories of church furniture. See NAVE.

India, Mythology of. See HINDUISM.

Indus Raymi, in Persian mythology, is the principal one of the four known festivals of the sun, celebrated yearly in honor of the supreme deity in the Araya. It began when the sun was at its height, and moved towards the equatorial region. At the first ray of the sun all fell on their knees and worshipped the benevolent god. After this festival eight days were spent in unbroken pleasure.

Indo-Portuguese Version of the Scriptures. Indo-Portuguese is a dialect spoken by the Portuguese settlers and their descendants in Ceylon and various parts of the Indian seas. A translation of a part of the Scripture into this dialect dates back to the year 1817, when the Wesleyan missionary, Newsword, stationed at Negombo, in Ceylon, commenced a translation of the New Testament, for the benefit of this people, which was printed at London in 1838. A second edition appeared at Colombo in 1838, and the Pentateuch and Psalms were printed in 1838. A revised edition of the New Testament was published in 1855. (B.P.)

Indra, in Hindu mythology, is the god of the sun, one of the twelve Adityas, the son of the god Kashaya XII—19. and Aditi, a deity of the second class, but very much worshipped. He rules over space, and is king of all genii who live in space, or in the superterrestrial paradise. Daily he rides around the earth. He sees and knows everything, for he has a thousand eyes. His wife is called Sachi, by whom he had a son, Jayaansha. The mountain Meru, towards the north pole, is his dwelling-place. Amarasati is the name of his celestial city, Wardayanta is his palace, Navilana his garden. Airmawata is his first elephant, and Mattala charioteer. He rules over wind and rain.

Induction (Lat. inducere, "to infer") is the philosophical name for the process of real inference—in other words, the act or process of reasoning from the known to the unknown, or from the limited to the unlimited. "All things that we do not know by actual trial or ocular demonstration, we know by an inductive operation. Deduction is not real inference in this sense, since the general proposition covers the case that we apply it to; in a proper deduction, the conclusion is more limited than the premises. By the inductive method we obtain a conclusion much larger than the premises; we adventure into the sphere of the unknown, and pronounce upon what we have not yet seen.... Accordingly, it is now considered a part of logic to lay down the rules for the right performance of this great operation." One of the greatest problems of inductive inquiry is that peculiar succession denominated cause and effect. Mill, in his Logic, has consequently illustrated in detail the method to be adopted to ascertain definitely the true causative circumstance that may precede a given effect. They resolve themselves mainly into two. One is, by comparing together different instances in which the phenomenon occurs. The other is, by comparing instances in which the phenomenon does occur, with instances, in other respects similar, in which it does not. These two methods may be respectively denominated the method of agreement, and the method of difference.

There are many problems growing out of the application of induction to the great variety of natural phenomena. "Thus, the great induction of universal gravity was applied deductively to explain a great many facts besides those that enabled the induction to be made. Not merely the motions of the planets about the sun, and the satellites about the planets, but the remote and previously unexplained phenomena of the tides, the precession of the equinoxes, etc., were found to be inferences from the general principle. This mode of determining causes is called the deductive method. When several agents unite in a compound effect, there is required a process of calculation to find from the effects of the causes acting separately the combined effect due to their concurrent action, as when the path of a projectile is deduced from the laws of gravity and of force. It is the deductive stage of science that enables mathematical calculation to be brought into play with such remarkable success as is seen in astronomy, mechanics, etc.

"The circumstance that phenomena may result from a concurrence of causes, leads to the distinction between ultimate laws and derivative or subordinate laws. Thus, gravity is an ultimate law; the movement of the planet in ellipses is a subordinate law. These inferior laws may be perfectly true within their own limits, but not necessarily so beyond certain limits, of time, place, and circumstance. A different adjustment of the two forces that determine a planet's motion would cause a circular or a parabolic orbit; and therefore when phenomena result from a combination of ultimate laws acting under a certain arrangement, they are not to be generalized beyond the sphere where that arrangement holds. These inferior laws are sometimes mere inductions that have not been resolved into their constituent laws, and then they go under the name of 'Empirical Laws.' Thus, in the hands of Kepler, the elliptic orbit of the planets was only an empirical generalization, ascertained by the method of agreement; Newton converted it into a derived law because he showed that it resulted from the more general laws of gravity, etc. The earlier stages of induction present us with many of those empirical laws: in some subjects, as physiology, medicine, etc., the greater number of inductions are of this character. The cure of disease is especially an example of this; many medicine can have its efficacy traced to ultimate laws of the human system. Hence the uncertainty attending the application of remedies to new cases, and also the want of success that often attends them in circumstances where we think they ought to succeed. Induction applies also to the laws of causation, to the laws of uniformities, and to those of coexistence. See Mill, Logic, especially book iv.

Indulgences. The use of this word by ecclesiastical writers is derived from that of the jurists, who employ it to designate a remission of punishment or of taxes, especially such a general amnesty as was sometimes pronounced by the emperor for extraordinary occasions of rejoicing. Hence the word passed into ecclesiastical usage in the sense of a remission of penalties for offences against church discipline and order.

Usually there were four stages or degrees through which offenders had to pass before they obtained a full release from the punishment due to them: (1) remission of the civil pain; (2) hearers; (3) penitents; (4) bystanders; and usually several years had to be spent in each. Now the bishop, according to St. Gregory, might, in proportion to their conversion, "restrain the period of their penance; making it eight, seven, or even five years instead of the usual ten. Whatever the length, the repentance exceed in depth what it had to fulfill in length, and compensate, by its increased zeal, for the much longer time required in others to effect their cure." Eventually this system was greatly extended, until it reached the abuses that provoked the Reformation.

Indulgences (indulgentia), a name sometimes applied to baptisms in the early Christian Church, as being, when bestowed, blessed by the Holy Spirit, with absolution or the remission of sins. It was esteemed the most universal absolution and the greatest indulgence in the ministry of the Church.

Inferno were sacrifices which the ancient Romans offered at the tombs of their deceased relatives at certain periods, consisting of victims, wine, milk, garlands of flowers, etc.

Infermity, Monastic. In his enumeration of Christian duties Benedict (Regula, c. 4) specifies that of visiting the sick; and elsewhere he speaks of it as a duty of primary and paramount obligation, for quotes the words of Christ, "I was sick, and ye ministered unto me." Beyond, however, saying that the sick are to have a separate part of the monastery assigned to them, and a separate officer in charge of them, that they are to be allowed meat and the luxury of baths, if necessary, that they are not to be exacting, and that the brethren who visit them on are not to be impatient, he gives no precise directions. Subsequently it was the special duty of the "infirmarius," the "celleratorius" (house-steward), and of the abbot himself, to look after the sick; no other monk might visit them without the leave of the abbot or prior. Everything was to be done for their comfort, both in body and soul, that they should not miss the kindly offices of kinsfolk and friends; - and, while the rigor of the monastic discipline was to be relaxed, whenever necessary, in their favor, due supervision was to be exercised, lest there should be any abuse of the privileges of the sick-room. The "infirmarius" was to enforce silence at meals, to check conversation in the sick-room at other times, and to discriminate carefully between real and fictitious ailments. The sick were, if possible, to, recite the hours daily, and to attend mass at stated times, and if unable to walk to the chapel, they were to be carried thither in the arms of their brethren. The meal in the sick-room was to be three hours earlier than in the common refectory. The abbot might allow a separate kitchen and "buttery" for the use of the sick monks. The rule of Cassius of Arles ordered that the abbot was to provide good wine for the sick, the ordinary wine of the monastery being often of inferior quality. See Hospitall.

Informers. This class of men originated before the Christian era, and, indeed, before the establishment of the Roman empire. When persecution arose against Christianity, informers naturally sought to gain, and probably some credit with the civil authorities, by giving information against those who practiced Christian rites, since the secret assemblies of Christians for worship came under the prohibition of the Lex Julia. Terrullian states (Apologia, 5) that Tiberius threatened the accusers of the Christians, but the story rests only upon his statement. He also claims M. Aurelius as a protector of Christians. Titus issued an edict, forbidding slaves to inform against their masters or freedom against their patrons. Nerva, on his accession, republished this edict. "Jewish manners," i.e. probably Christianity, is especially mentioned as one of the subjects on which informations were forbidden. In Pliny's well-known letter to Trajan we find the informers in full work. The Christians who were brought before him were asked to offer him an anonymous statement, containing a list of many Christians or supposed Christians. Trajan, in his answer, though he forbade Christians to be sought out (i.e. by government officials), did not attempt to put a stop to the practice of delation; those who were informed against, if they continued in their practices, must be punished. Thus informers were a large part of the suffering arising from unfaithful brethren who betrayed their friends. See Diktate.

Inge, Hugh, D.D., an Irish prelate, was born at Shepton Mallet, in Somersetshire: educated in William of Wickham's school at Winchester, and made perpetual fellow of New College, Oxford, in 1504. He travelled in foreign countries. On his return he was successively prebendary of East Harptree, sub-chancellor of the Church of Wells, warden of Wapulham, in the diocese of Lincoln, of Durting, in Somersetshire, by the presentation of Richard the Abbot and the convvent of Glastonbury, and of Weston. In 1504 he was in Rome, at which time he was one of King Henry's orators, selected to take the renunciation of all prejudicial clauses in the apostolic bulls for the translation of cardinal Hadrian to the see of Bath and Wells, and of the others that followed. In 1512 he was appointed bishop of Meath, where he remained ten years. In 1521 he was promoted to the see of Dublin. In 1527 he was made chancellor of Ireland. He repaired the palace of St. Stephen. He died in Dublin, Aug. 8, 1528. See D'Alton, Memoirs of the Archbishops of Dublin, p. 162.
INGELRAM

INLAGA

INGELRAM, called also by some Newbigging, a Scotch prelate, was rector of Peabees and archdeacon of the Church of Glasgow, and when in this office he was made chancellor in 1570, and consecrated bishop of the see of Glasgow in 1574. He died Feb. 2, 1174, leaving, Epistola de Diversis: — De Evangelia Dominica: — Rationes Regni Administrati. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 233.

INGELRAMME, a German prelate, brought up in the schools of Genehovt and St. Arnold, was made bishop of Metz in 768, being at the same time prior of Sensone. He died in 791. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

INGEN, a hero-god of Japan, was a native of China, who lived about 1650. He was a zealous Buddhist, and was looked upon as an illustrous saint. But he was more especially venerated because, in answer to a kiss, or special prayer which he offered, a plentiful rain had fallen in a time of drought.

INGHAM, Richard, D.D., an English Baptist minister, was born at Stansfield, Yorkshire, in 1810. For some years he was a student at Oxford University, and afterwards in the academy of the celebrated Rev. Dankevill, archdeacon of Wiltshire. He was ordained a Baptist Church, Dec. 28, 1832; licensed to preach, April 5, 1833; gave up his secular business in 1835, and pursued a course of theological study at Wisbeach; was ordained April 2, 1839, in Bradford, and remained pastor of the Tetley Street Church, then when he removed to South. His next pastorate was in Halifax, from 1834 to 1862. After two or three brief pastorates in other places, he returned to Bradford and became pastor of the Infirmary Street Church. His death took place June 1, 1873. He published in 1865, his Hand-book on Christianity Baptism, and in 1891 his Christian Baptism, its Subjects and Modes. He also published his Appeal to Friends, on the subject of baptism. At the time of his death he had completed an extended work on the Church Establishment. Dr. Ingham filled a high place among the scholars and preachers of the branch of English Baptists with which he was identified, the "General Baptists," corresponding in most respects with the Free-will Baptists of the United States. See (London.) Baptist Hand-book, 1874, p. 277. (J. C. S.)

INGILIS, Alexander, a Scotch prelate, dean of Dunkeld, and archbishop of St. Andrews. After the battle of Killiecrankie, he was chosen bishop of Dunkeld in 1488. But the pope, being displeased because he had not been consulted first, annulled the election. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 91.

INGILIS, David, D.D., L.L.D., a Reformed (Dutch), and an author, Presbyterian minister, son of Rev. David Inglis, was born June 8, 1824. He graduated from the University of Edinburgh in 1841; studied divinity under Dr. Chalmers and John Brown; was licensed by the Presbytery of Carlisle in 1848, and came to America in 1846. He served the Presbyterian Church in the following places: Scots Church, Detroit, Mich. (1846); stated supply at Washington Heights, New York city; Bedford, N. Y. (1847); St. Gabriel Street, Montreal, Canada, in July, 1852; Hamilton, Ontario (1865); professor of systematic theology in Knox College, Toronto (1867); Southern Baptist Seminary, Louisville, Ky. (1857); where he died, Dec. 15, 1877. Dr. Inglis was a powerful and eloquent preacher of the great truths of the gospel. He was prominent in the deliberations to further the union of the different branches of the Presbyterian Church of Canada, in the success and conclusion of which he greatly assisted. His publications are, Exposition of International Sunday-school Lessons in Sover and Gospel Field (1874-77); Historical Sermon in Commemoration of the Twenty-fifth Anniversary of the Church on Brooklyn Heights (1875); many contributions to periodicals, in course of preparation at his death. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America, 3d ed. p. 317.

INGILIS, James, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Philadelphia, Pa., in 1777. He graduated from Columbia College in 1795; studied theology privately, and was licentiate of the New York Presbyterian Church in 1801. In 1802 he accepted a call to the First Presbyterian Church of Baltimore. He died Aug. 15, 1820. He published, A Sermon on Fastings, Humiliation, and Prayer (1808): — A Missionary Sermon, preached in Philadelphia in 1812: — and A Discourse, delivered in the First Presbyterian Church of Baltimore in 1814. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpi, iv, 278.

INGILIS, John, a bishop of the Church of England, was born in New York city, Dec. 9, 1777, where his father, Charles Inglis, D.D., was rector of Trinity Church. He received his education at King's College, Windsor. In 1800 he went to England to advance the interests of his alma mater; in 1801 he took orders, and was appointed to the mission of Aylesford. In 1816, Rev. Dr. Stansew, rector of St. Paul's, became bishop of Nova Scotia, and Dr. Inglis succeeded him as rector, and, in 1826, to the bishopric of Nova Scotia, was at that time included New Brunswick, Newfound-land, and Bermuda. He died in London, Oct. 27, 1850. See Amer. Quurr. Church Rev., 1851, p. 154.

INGERSOCh are the spirits of fire among the Greenlanders, and live along the strand. They were formerly human beings, but when the flame came they were changed into spirits of fire.

INGRAM, Jospekh H., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at Portland, Me., in 1809. He entered Yale College, but did not graduate; went to Buenes Ayres, South America, as a commercial clerk: was for several years after his return a teacher; and about 1830 became professor in Jefferson College, near Natchez. While here he was likely known as a writer of novels, etc., as The South-west, by a Yankee: — Lu- fite: — Burton: — The Quadrum, etc. About 1847 he was confirmed as a member of the Protestant Episcopal Church, at Nashville, Tenn., where he established a flourishing seminary for young ladies. He was ordained deacon in 1851, and priest in 1852, became missionary at Aberdeen, Miss.; afterwards was rector of St. John's Church, Mobile, Ala.; then at Riverside, Tenn.: removed to Holly Springs, in 1858, where he revived St. Thomas's H. I. He died there, Dec. 18, 1890. Beside various religious pamphlets, Dr. Ingraham was the author of The Prince of the House of Du-ivic: — The Pillar of Fire: — and The Throne of David, which were very popular. See Amer. Quurr. Church Rev. 1861, p. 186.

Initial Hymn. See Introit.

Initiàtt, a name applied to the faithful in the early Christian Church, as being initiated, that is, admitted to the use of sacred offices, and to the knowledge of the sacred mysteries of the Christian religion. Hence the fathers, in speaking of any doctrines which were not explained to the catechumens, were accustomed to say, "The initiated know what is said." St. Ambrose addressed a work especially to the Initiati.

INLAGA are a class of spirits whose worship forms the most prominent feature in the religious practices of Southern Guineans. They are the spirits of dead men; but whether good or evil, even the natives themselves do not know. The spirits of their ancestors the natives call Akoombo; but the Inlagas are the spirits of strangers, and have come from a distance. Sick, and especially nervous persons are supposed to be possessed with one or the other of these classes of spirits, and various ceremonies are performed to deliver them from their power. The patient is first tried by the priest, to ascertain which class of spirits has possession of him; he is then exorcised, and when sufficiently recovered, sent about his affairs, but under certain restrictions, lest his disease return.
INNES, John (1), a Scotch prelate, was consecrated bishop of the see of Moray, Jan. 23, 1407. He died April 25, 1414. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 142.

INNES, John (2), a Scotch prelate, was dean of Ross, and chancellor of the see of Caithness about 1447. He died in 1448. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 214.

INNAROLIT are mountain spirits of the Greenlanders, extraordinarily small, but quite expert.

Intercolai dies were days, among the ancient Romans, which were devoted partly to the worship of the gods, and partly to the rise of many business.

Irascibility, an attribute ascribed to God in the Scriptures. For example, Paul (I Tim. i, 17) calls him"the king eternal, immortal, invisible." Jesus says (John i, 18) "No man hath seen God at any time." He is therefore the invisible God.

Ispagog, in Slavonic mythology, was an idol of the Winds, brought to light by recent antiquaries, probably worshipped on Rojmg as a god of healing.

Iserius, Joannes (surnamed "the Long"), a Benedictine abbot of St. Bertin, was a native of Ypres, Belgium, and died in 886. He is the author of a History or Chronicle of his monastery, from the year 590 to 1294. It has been inserted, under the title of Chronica, in the Historia Monasterii S. Bertini, in the Theaurum Novar Annalium, etc., iii. 446 sq. (1717). He also wrote a life of Erkembod, published in the Acta Sancta, under April 12. See Andrit, Bibl. Irish Version of the Scriptures. The Irish or Erse language is now little known except as the vernacular of an illiterate population, but it was once the language of literature and science. The Roman letters are often used in Erse compositions, but the Irish have an ancient alphabet of their own, for which they feel a truly national predilection. The origin of this alphabet is very uncertain; it bears some resemblance to the Anglo-Saxon, and it has been questioned whether the Saxons derived their alphabetical system from the Irish, or vice versa. In the dedication of the Irish Prayer-Book of 1688, it is confidently asserted that the Saxons borrowed their letters from Ireland.

The first printed New Testament, in the Irish characters, was published in 1692. When bishop Bedell was appointed to the see of Kilmore and Annagh, in 1629, he undertook the translation of the Old Testament. Not being acquainted with the language, he commenced to study the same at the age of fifty-seven. His next measure was to secure the services of native Irish scholars, and with their help the version of the Old Testament was completed in 1640, to remain in MS. till 1681. After due examination and revision it was published in London in 1696, together with the New Testament.

My was suffered to roll away before any efficient measures were taken to reprint the Scriptures in Irish, until, in 1809, an edition of 2000 New Testaments, conformable to the accredited version of bishop Bedell, was published in Roman characters by the British and Foreign Bible Society. Other editions followed in 1813, 1816, and 1817. In the latter year also a complete Irish Bible was issued, the version of Bedell being employed as the text of the Old Testament. In the course of the following year 3000 copies of the New Testament, in the Irish character, were published, and in 1824 the entire Irish Bible appeared in the vernacular. From the report of the British and Foreign Bible Society for the year 1881 we learn that a revised edition of the New Testament is to be published. In order to bring about such a revision, twenty-five thousand dollars was voted by Congress. Threats of compulsion Irish scholars, and their corrections of archaisms, obsolete words, and orthographical errors will be examined by the chief reviser and editor, the Rev. James Goodman, Canon of Ross, and professor of Irish in the University of Dublin. As the first installment of this revision the Gospel of Luke was published in 1884. See Bible of Every Land, s. violet. (B. P.)

Irmin (Irmen, Irmin, Irmin), etc., in German mythology, seems to have been a principal god of the ancient Saxons. At Eresburg, now Stadtbergen, on the Dimel, the famous pillar Irmin is said to have stood, that was destroyed by Charlemagne in 774, during the Saxon struggle for right, courage, war, military honours, and warlike arts to the Germanic nations; therefore it is quite possible that Irmin was a god of war.

Ir-Nabaah, Deir Nuhhkhed, the probable representative of this site, lying one and a half miles north-east from Beit-Jibrin, is merely described in the Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey (iii, 155), "as a ruinous birkah [pool], and a cave with two hundred and fifty niches [for burial]."

Iron. The modern representative of this site, Foras, located four miles north-west from El-Jish (Ahab or Gischala), is described in the Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey (i, 283), as "a stone village, containing about 200 Metawileh and 200 Christians. It is situated on the edge of a plain, with vineyards and arable lands; to the west rises a basalt hill, called el-Burj [the castle], full of cisterns, and supposed to be the site of an ancient castle; there are large stones strewn about; three large birkah [pools] and many cisterns to supply water; one of the birkah is ruined." The remains of a large church in the village are described in detail (p. 288).

Iroquois Version of the Scriptures. This version is of very recent date. There are also Iroquois Indians in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario who have not understood the Scriptures in Mohawk, published by the British and Foreign Bible Society. For the benefit of these Indians, the Four Gospels were published in 1880 at Montreal. The translation was made by chief Joseph Ousakettore, revised by Jean Dion and the Rev. T. Laforte. Chief Joseph had all qualifications for the translation, since, in 1865, under the direction of the Roman Catholic missionaries at Oka, and with the approval of the Roman Catholic bishop of Montreal, he prepared a translation into Iroquois of the Gospels and Epistles used in the Misson. (B. P.)

Isepol is conjectured by Conder (Test Work, ii, 357), to be represented by the modern Rysip, as one of the peaks of the sandstone hills. This place lies about a half mile north of el-Jib (Gibeon), and is thus described in the Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey (iii, 15, also 155): "A small hamlet on a ridge, with a spring to the west, and many rock-cut tombs...Traces of ruins: cisterns cut in rock, and rubbish-stacks, with ruins of a modern village and a Mukhtari."

ISAAC, SAMUEL M., a Jewish rabbi, was born at Leewarden, Holland, Jan. 4, 1804. His father having emigrated to England, young Isaac received his education there. In 1835 he came to New York to take charge of the congregation Benai Jeshurun, where he was employed in the Congregation Beth Israel. In 1857 he commenced the publishing of the Jewish Messenger, which was intended to uphold conservative Judaism against the so-called Reformed party. In 1877 Isaac retired from his ministry of the Shabbethai congregation, with which he had been connected since 1845, and died May 19, 1878. He was highly respected, not only by his own coreligionists, but also by Christians. (B. P.)

Tarkovsky, a sect of Russian dissenters, which arose about the middle of the 17th century. The cause of their separation was a difficulty concerning the revision of the church books. This book was printed in 1602, under the care of John Basilius, from manuscripts, which, being considered incorrect, were somewhat altered in their printed form. The changes introduced were regarded by some as teaching unsound doctrine, and a sect arose which adhered to the former books, and called themselves Storoveretin, or believers in the old faith. These dissenters, however, were comparatively few in number till about the middle of the following century, when, in consequence of a revision of the church books by the patriarch Nikon, the cry of unsound doctrine was again raised, and the number of dissenters increased. This sect was tolerated by the state under Alexander I.

Ine (or Ije), the name of a central province of Japan, to which the religious sect of the Shiuritiens requires each of its adherents to make a pilgrimage once a year, or at least once in their life. In Ije is the grand Mudra temple of Tevui-Dai-Jin, which is the model after which all the other temples are built. Ije is a place of no natural attractions. It is rather regarded as a monument of antique poverty and simplicity. The Mudra where the pilgrims pay their devotions is a low wooden edifice with a flat thatched roof, and on entering nothing is to be seen but a metallic mirror, which is regarded as a symbol of the deity, and some white paper, which is considered the emblem of purity of heart. The worshipers do not presume to enter this temple, but look through a lattice window from without while they say their prayers.

Ishaar, one of the chief deities of the Assyrians and Babylonians alike, although she was generally one of the goddesses of a second rank. She was the daughter of the moon-god Sin, and was identified by the Chaldeans with the planet Venus. She was essentially a warlike goddess, and was called the "Goddess of Battles and of Victories," in which attribute she was often represented as giving a bow to the Assyrian king in token of his victory over his foes. She was also, as the goddess of productive nature, the keeper of all the treasures of the earth, and hence was regarded as Allat, the "Queen of the Spear or Divining-rod." In another form of the same principle she was the goddess of sensual indulgence. She was the special protectress of Ezech, and in her character of Anna, or Nana, of Nineveh, while she was distinguished also at Arbela, another great seat of her worship, as Ishaar of Arbelah. Her offices, names, and attributes were various, and there appears to have been two Ishaar, mother and daughter, one the great nature goddess, the other the heroine of one of the mythical legends, called the "Descendent of Ishaar into Hades." There is a considerable amount of confusion yet remaining to be cleared away with regard to the relations of Ishaar to Dercrines, Bilti, Achatarsh, and Isthar; but generally the mythologies agree in making her the goddess most brought into contact with men and the under world.

Ising, Johann Christian, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Oct. 24, 1617, in Austria. He studied at Königsberg, and died there, July 4, 1684, cathedral dean. He wrote Exercitaciones histor. chronol. geograph. & ethnol. in pentateuchum & in hebdomadis. See Arnold, Historie der königreichischen Universitét; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexicon, s. v. Ismailīyah, the followers of Ismail or Ismael (q. v.).

Isaard, Joachim Jean Xavier d', a French prelate, was born at Aix, in Provence, Oct. 23, 1766. His family originated in Dauphiné, and was a very ancient one. He lost his father when he was a child, and was placed into the seminary of Aix by his mother. When the Bourbons took refuge upon the continent, they found some support in the family of Isaard. About that time he departed for Italy, and connected himself, in 1794, with the count of Provence, at Verona. On his return to his native city in the same year he associated himself with a royalist band, and, it is said, was instrumental in saving the life of Lucien Bonaparte. When Pius VII was brought as a captive to France, Isaard followed him. Napoleon proposed to him some high employments, and even a place in the senate, but he refused. After the death of cardinal Fesch, in May, 1889, Isaard was designated to replace him in the senate. He died at Paris, Oct. 8 of the same year. See Hoefer, Nov. Biog. Generale, s. v.

Isocrate (from isos, equal, and eisocratēs, Christ), some followers of Origen, who were charged with maintaining that the apostles were raised to equal glory with their master. They were condemned by a council at Constantinople in 553.

Isolani, Giacomo, an Italian legislator and cardinal, was born at Bologna. He had obtained a great reputation as a scholar, being well versed both in civil and canonical law. When, after the loss of his wife, he decided to enter the ministry, he soon became distinguished in his new position, and after he had filled several important functions, pope John XIII made him cardinal in 1414, and left him his vicar at Rome, where he was made prisoner by the troops of Ladislao, king of Naples. He was set at liberty by the efforts of Giacomo Sforza Attenbole, and Felice Maria Visconti made him governor of Genoa. He died at Milan, Feb. 19, 1431, leaving several Consilii and other works on law. See Hoefer, Nour. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Isaiah, the angel who, according to the Mohammedans, will sound the trumpet which is to summon the world to judgment on the last day.

Isthman Games, one of the great national festivities among the ancient Greeks, which derived its name from the island of Corinth, where it was celebrated. They were held every third year, in honor of Poseidon, or, as some allege, every fifth year. See GAMES.

Istio, in Teutonic mythology, was one of the three sons of Mannus, and the father of one of the three races of the Germans.

Ithun, in Norse mythology, is held imprisoned under the ash-tree Yggdrasill. Probably this Ithun is identical with Íðuna, who guards the rejuvenating apples of the gods.

Itoqay, a household god among the Mongol Tartars. He is the guardian of their families, and presides over all the products of the earth. The Tartar does not presume to dine until this god and his family have been first served, by covering the mouths of the idols with grease. When the people have defied them they throw out the fragments, expecting them to be devoured by some unknown spirits.

Ittus Sopherim (אִיתוּס שּׁפְּרִים, oblatio scribatur) denotes the removal of a superfluous vation which had crept into the text. The Masorites have noticed five instances of such a superfluous  שָׁמִית in Gen. xviii, 5; xxiv, 55; Numb. xxxi, 2; Psal. lxviii, 26, and to the word תְמוּני in Psa. xxxvi, 7. Ivon, Dwight, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in West Springfield, Mass., Sept. 20, 1805. He graduated at Brown University in 1833, and was ordained pastor of the First Baptist Church in Springfield, Mass., soon after. He removed to Alton, III., in 1836, to take charge of the Baptist church in that place, where he had a very successful ministry. The climate proving unfavorable to his health, he returned to New England, and became pastor of the Second Baptist Church in Suffield, Conn., in 1859, and continued in office until 1874. His pastoral here was one of great ability, and singularly blessed. He took a deep interest in the establishment of the Connecticut Literary Institution, a seminary of a high order, under the patronage of the Baptists of Connecticut. He resigned his pastorate in April, 1874, and removed to Conway, Mass., where he performed miscellaneous duties as his health would permit, until his death, Dec. 22, 1875. (J. C. S.)

Iucuna was the goddess of love and all joys, the Venus of the Mexicans.

IxiK in Grecian mythology, was the son of Aion and Persephone, king in Themis. He married Dia, the daughter of Deuneus, but refused to pay the promised wedding presents to her father, wherefore the latter took possession of a number of horses of Ixion as a substitute. Ixion promised to give Deuneus what he wanted, but caused him to fall into a cave of red-hot coals, under the pretence that it was a cave of gold. It was so great a crime that no man would purify him. Jupiter did this himself, and was so pleased with Ixion that he fed him at the table of the gods. A new crime sprang up in the heart of the murderer. He longed for the love of Juno. Juno forsook him, and formed Nephele (a cloud), by whom Ixion became father of the Centaurs. Finally, Jupiter's patience becoming exhausted, he threw him into Tartarus, where he remains, tortured by the Furies, along with Sisyphus and Tantalus. His penalty is to turn a wheel which perpetually recoils.

Ixtlilxochitl is the Eaclesipius of the Mexicans, the protecting god of the medical art.

Izdubar (or Gisdubar, Mass of Fire) is, according to the newly discovered Izdubar Tablets, an early mythical Assyrian hero, who was probably a form of the solar deity. He was a great chieftain, and delivered the city of Ezech when it was assailed by the giants. He had for his wife the goddess Ishtar, who proved unfaithful to him, and sent some monstrous bulls to destroy him. These animals he was enabled to slay by the assistance of his faithful friend and adviser, the deified sage Heban, who was ultimately killed by an unknown insect or reptile, called a Tombkiki. Jazubur afterward, becoming afflicted with a cutaneous disorder, went by the advice of his boatman, Urmius, to seek the sage Adrahasis, who, having survived the Deluge, was supposed to be able to cure him of his malady. Adrahasis complied with his request, and related to him in considerable detail the legend of the flood. Upon returning to the sea, Jazubur set up a monument in memory of his cure, and of the story related by his benefactor, and then, by the aid of enchantment, had the soul of Heban raised up to commune with him. Jazubur seems after these events to have become a king, but his history is so mixed up with a mythological series of legends that his real character is uncertain, as also are, of course, his parentage and birth.

Jazubur, in Persian mythology, is a name of the twenty-eighth good genie of the second rank, who recognizes Ormuzd and his seven assistants, the Amshaspands, as their ruler. The Izdards are male and female beings of greatest purity and mildness, created by Ormuzd, the representative of the highest, invisible god, and superintend the year, the month, the day, the hour, guide men on life's journey, command the animal and vegetable world, and rule the natural laws and elements, and are in constant combat with Ahiran and his evil spirits.

Isquierdo, Sebastiano, b. Jesus, was born at Alcaraz, Spain, in 1601. He was rector of the colleges at Murcia and Alcala, and died about 1680. He wrote, "Opus Theologicum et Philosophicum:—Praxia Exercitium Spirituum. See Alemagne, Bibliotheca Scriptorum Societatis Jesu; Jocher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexicon, s. v.; Antonii Bibliotheca Hispanica. (B. P.)"

Jazeb, Isaac, a Jewish rabbi of Constantinople, who died at the beginning of the 17th century, is the author of "Zed al-Qudum," a commentary on the Hagirograpa, consisting of ten different parts: 1, Zeb al-Qudum, i.e., the Song of Songs; 2, Zeb, i.e., on Ruth; 3, Zeb, i.e., on Deuteronomy; 4, Zeb, i.e., on Psalms; 5, Zeb, i.e., on Lamentations; 6, Zeb, i.e., on Job; 7, Zeb, i.e., on Daniel; 8, Zeb, i.e., on Ezekiel; 9, Zeb, i.e., on Esther; 10, Zeb, i.e., on Proverbs. Written in Hebrew, with a commentary on the Psalms (Sakonika, 1571). See De' Rossii, Dissertatio Storica (Germ. trans.), p. 185; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. ii. 2.

Jazeb, Joseph b-Abrakham, a Jewish rabbi of the 16th century, belonged to those exiles who left Spain in 1492. Jazebat settled at Adrianopole, where he became rabbi preacher. He wrote "Zed al-Qudum," or system of Jewish dogmatics (Ferrara, 1564):—Zeb, i.e., on Deuteronomy, or Dogmatics of Judaism, printed with the system:—Zeb, i.e., on Psalms (Sakonika, 1571). Jasafarites, a Mohammedan sect who held in highest reverence the memory of Jasafar, the sixth of the twelve Imams. An unsuccessful attempt was made by Nadir Shah to assimilate the Persian Mohammedanism to that of the Turks, acknowledging Jasafar as the head of the new national faith. See Jasafar, THE TWELVE.

Jassar, Khurbet Sdr, the probable representative of this locality, is laid down at seven miles west of Amman, with notes of a pool, tower, and sarcosystem adjoin the, on the reduced Map of the Ordnance Survey in the fragment published east of the Jordan; but the Memoirs containing details have not appeared. It is situated on the road running along the south side of Wady Sdr. Tristram says (Bible Places, p. 287):—It consists of a group of grass-grown mounds and rows of foundations at the very head of the valley, above a marshy spring, the highest source of the Seir." Merritt says (East of the Jordan, p. 405), "Near we made to be 3400 feet above the sea-level," the Map indicates 1900 feet.

Jabbok. Wady Zurko, the modern name of this stream (which must be carefully distinguished from the Zora Main, farther south, near Gelilbez), has been explored by Dr. Merrill, whose account closes thus (East of the Jordan, p. 365):—"Its winding course is remarkable, making it in this regard unlike any other river of Syria. The Jordan is more crooked, having almost insurmountable short bends; but the Jabbok is a river that has cut far out into the desert and at times has been uncontrolled, a great and powerful race, which existed from the earliest advent of the Hebrews in this region close down to a period subsequent to the time of Christ. . . . Its capacities are great, because every acre can be reached by irrigating canals. Even at present it is very extensively cultivated, and contains many fine farms. On the hill-sides there are, at certain points, some narrow canals, of which a few can be traced to a distance of five or eight miles."

Jabneel, a goddess worshipped by the Laplanders, the mother of death. Her dwelling was deep in the bed of the earth, and the departed remained with her, until her destiny was decided by the judges of the infernal regions.

Jabnool of Naphthali is identified by Conder (Ten Work, ii. 337), with Yemam, a modern village with a spring of the same name, four miles south-west of the Sea of Tiberias, but with no special signs of antiquity (Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Map, i. 865).

Jabneh. The modern site Yebneh is located midway (four and a quarter miles) between Akir (Ekron) and the shore, and is thus spoken of in the Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey (i. 411) as the "most convenient point" in the modern village occupies a strong position on a rounded hill, the houses being mostly of mud. The only remains of interest noted were the church in the village and the mosque west of it," which are described in detail.

Jachmann, Johann Gottlieb, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Breisach, Jan. 8, 1727. He studied at Leipzig, was in 1752 corector of the Magdalene Gymnasium at Breisach, in 1767 provost of St. Mary's and St. George's churches, at Oels, Silesia, and died Feb. 15, 1775. He wrote, De Sabbato ante Legem Mosaicum Existente (Leipzig, 1748):—Spicilegium Observationum (Copenhagen, 1749):—Observatio Ereptica in Iis xxxi, 19 (1749):—De Beregini Edtione N. Test. Germanica (Breisau, 1757):—De Josepho, pro-rege Aegiptiorum (1764):—De Justin, Mariyto et Philosopho (1765). See Jocher, Allgemeines Gehlearten-Lexicon, s. v.; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. ii. 5. (B. P.)

Jackson, Abner, D.D., I.L.L.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, graduated from Trinity College, Hartford, Conn., in 1837, and taught there for several years.
In 1858 he was made president of Hobart College, Geneva, N. Y., and also held the Starrin professorship of the evidences of Christianity. In 1867 he removed to Hartford, Conn., becoming president of Trinity College, where he was also Hobart professor of ethics and metaphysics, and continued in that position until his death, April 15, 1874, aged sixty-three years. In 1878 he became the first bishop of the General Convention, and was one of the standing committees in 1871. See Prof. Epic. Almanac, 1875, p. 14.

Jackson, Charles Davis, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at Salem, Mass., Dec. 15, 1811. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1833; studied theology at Andover Theological Seminary; was engaged in teaching several years; ordained deacon in 1841, and presbyter in 1842; served as rector of St. Stephen's Church one or two years; of St. Luke's, Staten Island, from 1848 to 1847, and thereafter of St. Peter's, Westchester County, N. Y., for more than twenty years. He died June 28, 1871. He was the author of a work on Popular Education, and another on The Relation of Education to Crime, besides Sermons.

Jackson, Henry, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Providence, R. I., June 16, 1798. He graduated from Brown University in 1817, and studied theology at Andover Theological Seminary for over a year (1820); was ordained in 1822; then took charge of a Baptist Church in Charlestown, Mass.; next of the First Baptist Church of Hartford, Conn. (1836); of New Bedford, Mass. (1839); and of the Central Church, Newport, R. I. (1847), and continued there until his sudden death, March 2, 1848. See Trien. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 48.

Jackson, John, D.D., an English prelate, was born in London, Feb. 22, 1811. After studying at the Reading School, under Dr. Richard Valpy, he entered Pembroke College, Oxford, where he graduated in 1833, in the first class in classics. He was appointed to the head-mastership of Islington Grammar-school in 1836. In 1846 he was made rector of St. James's Church, Piccadilly, an appointment which soon made widely known his qualities as a preacher of singularly impressive earnestness and his powers as the administrator of a large and populous district. In 1847 Dr. Jackson was appointed chaplain to the queen, and in 1845, 1850, 1862, and 1866 he was a select preacher at Oxford. In 1862 he was made canon of Bristol. In 1868 he delivered the Boyle lectures in London, and in the same year was make bishop of Lincoln. He was transferred to the see of London, Jan. 4, 1869, and died Jan. 6, 1884. Dr. Jackson published many sermons and charges, and a popular pamphlet on The Sufficiency of Little Gifts.

Jackson, Samuel Cram, D.D., a Congregational minister, son of Rev. Dr. William Jackson, was born at Dorset, Vt., March 18, 1802. He graduated from Middlebury College in 1821, and studied for some time in the law school at New Haven, Conn.; graduated from Andover Theological Seminary in 1826; was ordained June 6 of the following year as pastor of West Church, in Andover, from which he was dismissed in September 1836, and became vacant agent of the State Board of Education, also acting librarian of the State Library, which office he held until 1877. He died July 26, 1878. Dr. Jackson published, Blessings of the Year, a sermon at Andover, Dec. 30, 1827. - Funeral Discourse by G. R. Perot, Methuen, May 10, 1889. - Thanksgiving Sermon, Nov. 28, 1859. - The License Law Vindicated. - Religious Principle a Source of Public Prosperity: The Massachusetts Election Sermon (1845). See Cong. Year-book, 1879, p. 45.

Jackson, Thomas, an eminent Wesleyan Methodist minister and writer, was born at Sancton, Yorkshire, Dec. 17, 1749. He received no education till the age of twenty, but by extraordinary diligence in reading and study, continued with unabated vigor through a long life, he attained to a high degree of learning, though he was never a first-class scholar. He was converted in youth, entered the ministry in 1804, and soon brought into notice by his fine, spirited, and faithful manner in which he discharged the various duties of a young Wesleyan minister. While at Wakefield he had a sharp contest with a Dissenting minister of Holmfirth, Rev. J. Cockin, on the "Five Points," and his letters to the general present at the General Convention, and was one of the standing committees in 1871. See Prog. Episc. Almanac, 1875, p. 14.

Theological Controversy, The Times of Charles the First, The Commonwealth and the Restoration, the writings of Wesley, Fletcher, etc., and The Early History of Methodism were thoroughly studied, so that in these fields Jackson became a recognized authority. In these lines have great and enduring value. During his first year at Wakefield (1814) he read through with care nearly sixty volumes, and he never subsequently diminished the amount of his reading. From 1824 to 1843 he was editor of the Magazine and Book-room publications, and during these eighteen years he did an amount of ministerial and literary work that is marvellous. During the centenary year of Methodism (1838) he was made president of the conference, was requested to prepare a volume on the subject of the centenary, describing the origin, progress, and benefits of Wesleyanism, and was appointed to preach the centenary sermon before the conference; yet Jackson went through all this extra work, and the great success of the movement was largely due to his pen, preaching and pleading, his godliness and leadership. It is felt through all his life; in 1849 he was for the second time elevated to the presidency. For nineteen years (1843-62) he was theological tutor at Richmond, being painstaking, peripatetic, comprehensive, and copious in his lectures, and "unutterably anxious to perpetuate sound doctrine." He became a supernumerary in 1862, taking up his residence in the suburbs of London, and preached and wrote as long as he was able. "His old age was beautiful. Always calm, cheerful, benign, often overflowing with kindness and love, he carried a happy influence wherever he went, and excited universal love and admiration." He died at Shepherd's Bush, near London, March 10, 1873.

A list of Mr. Jackson's numerous works, which are largely contributions to Methodist biography and literature, may be found in Osborn, Methodist Bibliography, p. 122. See Recollections of My Own Life and Times, by Thomas Jackson (London, 1873); Minutes of the General Conference, 1873, p. 25; Smith, Hist. of Weal. Jacob, Idriss, is the name of a Jewish teacher who lived the great part of the 2nd century of our era. We have a recorded maxim of the teacher in the primitive Talmud Abot: "This world is like a vestibule before the world to come; prepare thyself at the vestibule, that thou mayest be admitted into the hall. Better is one hour of repentance and good works in this world than all the life of the world to come; better is one hour of refreshment of spirit in the world to come than all the life of this world." (ib. iv, 22, 24.)

Jacob Erlendsen, a Danish prelate, was originally dean of the chapter of Lund, in which capacity he was appointed the Council of Lyons in 1245. He afterwards became Bishop of Roskilde, and archbishop of Lund in 1253. He died May 10, 1274. See Hoefer, Nouv. Bio. Générale, s. v.

Jacob ben-Isaac of Prague, who died about 1628, is the author of לְיַס הָעָדְנָה, or a Judeo-German midrash on the Pentateuch, the five Megilloth and Haftaras (Amsterdam, 1648, and often; partly translated into Latin by Sauter, Helmstädt, 1660; Eng. trans. by Hamburger, Lond. 1826); and the work on the modern Hebrew language, the La Semana Intrudile, by B. Jacobazzi (Lat. Jacobitus), Dominico, bishop of Lecra, was employed in various important affairs by Sixtus IV, and was created cardinal in 1517 by Leo X. He died July 2, 1527. He left a Treatise on the Council. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Jacobbi, Adam Friedrich Ernst, a German divine, who died April 3, 1807, superintendent and member of consistory at Cranschilde, in the duchy of Gotha, is the author of, Neeuer Religionszustand in Holland (Gotha, 1777);—Katholizisationen über 12 ausserste Stelle des heiligen Schrift (Weimar, 1778);—Religion aus der Bibel in Unterreden von den Hauptthemen dessen (ibid, 1784). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i. 824; ii. 270, 854. (B. P.)

Jacobbi, Johann Friedrich, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Jan. 16, 1712. For some time preacher at Osterode and Brunswick, he was called in 1758 as general superintendent of Liegnitz to Celle, and died March 21, 1781. He wrote a number of ascetical works. See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i. 28, 385, 418, 438, 488; ii. 40. (B. P.)

Jacobins, a name applied in France to the Dominicans (q. v.), because their principal convent was situated near the gate of St. James (Jacobus), in Paris. At the commencement of the first French revolution the meetings of its most zealous promoters were held in the hall of this convent, and from this circumstance Jacobin came to be another name for revolutionist.

Jacobites, the adherents of James II of England, particularly the non-jurors, who resided from the high Episcopal Church simply because they would not take the oath of allegiance to the new king, and who in the public services prayed for the Stuart family. They were much lessened by the defeat of the Pretender in 1745, and still more so by his death in 1788. See Nov-Jurors.

Jacobites, Order of, a Romish order of mendicant monks, established by Innocent III in the 13th century, but which soon ceased to exist.

Jacob, Michael, D.D., a Lutheran minister, was born in Franklin County, Pa., Jan. 18, 1808. In 1823 he entered the preparatory department of Jefferson College, Cannonsburg, from which he eventually graduated. While there he joined the Presbyterian Church. After teaching in a boarding-school several months at Belair, Md., he moved in April, 1829, to Gettysburg, where he taught mathematics in the Gettysburg Gymnasium, afterwards Pennsylvania College, in which he was elected professor of mathematics and natural science. Having studied theology privately, he was licensed to preach in the fall of 1829. He was repeatedly president and treasurer of his synod, and for a time was secretary of the General Synod. For several years he was editor of the Linecan Record and Journal. In 1865 his department was restricted to mathematics. The following year he withdrew from college instruction. He died July 22, 1871. Although a voluminous writer, very little of his work was published beyond a number of review articles and a small volume entitled Notes on the Battle of Gettysburg. See Fifty Years in the Lutheran Ministry, 1878, p. 228.

Jacob's Well. The following is the latest description of this spot: (Bir Yakh), taken from Lieut. Conder's Test Work in Palestine, i. 71. A full account is given in the Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey, ii, 172 sq.

"The tradition of Jacob's Well is one in which Jews, Samaritans, Moslems and Christians alike agree. There are also other reasons which lead to the belief that the tradition is trustworthy; the proximity of Joseph's Tomb and of Sychar, and finally the fact of a well existing at all in a place abounding with streams, one of which is within one hundred yards' distance. No other important well is found near, and the utility of such a work can only be explained on the assumption that it was necessary for the patriarch to have water within his own land, surrounded as he was by strangers, who may naturally be supposed to have guarded jealously their rights to the springs. By digging the well Jacob avoided those quarrels from which his father had suffered in the Philistia country, pursuing a policy of peace which appears generally to have distinguished his actions.

"The well then, as being one of the few undoubtedly ancient sites made sacred by a feast of Christ, is a spot of utmost interest that any near Shechem. Its neighborhood is not marked by any very prominent monument, and, indeed, it would be quite possible to pass by it without knowing of its existence. Just east of the gardens of Dalatia, a dusty mound by the road half covers the stump of three granite columns. After a few minutes' search a hole is found south-west of them, and by this the visitor descends through the roof of a little vault, apparently modern. The vault stretches twenty feet east and west, and is ten feet broad, the hole in the pointed arch of the roof being in the north-east corner. The floor is covered with fallen stones, which block the mouth of the well; through these we let down the tape and found the depth to be seventy-five feet. The diameter is seven feet six inches, the whole depth cut through alluvial soil and soft rock, receiving water by infiltration through the sides. There appears to be occasionally as much as two fathoms of water in the chamber, and for a time it is impossible to enter the little vault. It is built on to a second, running at right angles northwardly from the first, and the communication is now walled up. On the second vault there are said to be remains of a tessellated pavement, and the bases of the three columns above mentioned rest on it. For the ribbons which come out through the roof—such a sufficient proof that the vault is modern.

JACOBUS, Heinrich Friedrich, a German professor of canon law, was born June 8, 1864, at Marienwerder, Prussia. He studied at Königsberg, Berlin, and Göttingen, commenced his academic career at Königsberg in 1826, was professor there in 1831, and died March 19, 1868. He published, De Codicibus Gregoriani et Hymnogamien (Königsberg, 1826):—Kirchenrechtliche Ver- suche zur Begründung eines Systems des Kirchenrechts (1831):—De Fontibus Juris Ecclesiae (Köln, 1838):—Geschichte der Quellen des Kirchenrechts des Preussischen Staats (1837–44; 8 vols.):—Das evangelische Kirchenrecht des Preussischen Staats und seiner Provinzen (Halle, 1841–66; 2 vols.). See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 633 sq. (B. P.)

JACOBSON, Israel, a Jewish rabbi of Germany, was born at Halberstadt, Oct. 17, 1768. He was one of the earliest promoters of reform among his coreligionists. In 1801 he founded an educational establishment at Seesen, in Westphalia, in which Jewish and Christian boys were taught side by side. When the kingdom of Westphalia was evacuated by Napoleon, he had the care of the government; a consistory was established, and he was made its president. In 1805 Jacobson introduced into his synagogue an organ, German hymns, confirmation, and the German sermon. The example set by him was followed by others. When, in 1815, the kingdom of Westphalia was buried under the ruins of Napoleon's empire, Jacobson settled at Berlin, where he established again a private temple of the modern style, in which he officiated as high-priest. He died Sept. 18, 1826. See Jos. Jacobson und die neuen Richtungen in der Irrationale Anschauungen, i, 29 sq.; Kaseliritsch, Bibliothek jüdischer Kanzelducker, i, 136; McCaul, Sketches of Judaism and the Jews, p. 61 sq. (B. P.)

JACOBSON, Jacob Hirsch, a Jewish ascetical writer of Germany, who died at Dresden, Jan. 10, 1885, is the author of Pirke Abot oder Rabbinische Gnomologie (Hebrew text with German translation and commentary; Dresden, 1840):—Israelitisches Verbrechen (Hebrew and German, 1845):—אֶלְעָשׁ אֶלִישָׂע קֵנֶי יְשׁוּעַ—Auszüge Israelitischer Kanzelvorträge zu religiöser Er- lehrung und Erbauung:—Kathedrals Leitfaden beim Unterricht in der irationalen Religion (7th ed. 1876):—Die Geschichte der heiligen Schriften (3d ed. 1875). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. ii, 5 sq. (B. P.)

JACOBSON, William D., an English prelate, was born at Great Yarmouth, Norfolk, in 1803. He matriculated at St. Edmund's Hall in 1823, migrated shortly afterwards to Lincoln College, on obtaining a scholarship there, and, in 1829, having taken his degree, became a fellow of Exeter. He was made bishop of Chester in 1865, and died at Oxford, July 12, 1884. The history of his bishopric is told in his new edition of Nowell's Catechisms, his reprint in six volumes of the Works of Bishop Sanderson, and his edition of the Remains of Clement, Ignatius, and Polycarp (1838; 4th ed. 1866, 2 vols.). (B. P.)

JACOBUS, James.

JACOBUS Baradus, a Monophysite bishop of Edessa, is said to have been born at Tela or Constantia, fifty-five miles east of Edessa, towards the close of the 5th century. He was early trained in the ministry, became a noted ascetic, was called to the Byzantine court, but lived there a complete recluse, and was made bishop nominally of Edessa, but virtually metropolitan, A.D. 541. Amid the disastrous and troublesome period in which he lived, his courage and energy prolonged the cause of the party to which he belonged, especially in the famous quarrel with Paul of Antioch, which suddenly, July 30, 578. A Legum in incorrectly ascribed to him (Renaudot, Lit. Or. i, 382), also a Catechumen, largely used by the Jacobites (Cave, Hist. Lit. i, 524). See Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

JACOBUS SARUGENIS, made bishop of Botna, a little town in the district of Sarog, in Osmancinæ, at the age of sixty-seven, A.D. 519, and who, in two years afterwards, is the author of very many ecclesiastical works, both in prose and poetry, chiefly of a ritualistic or epistolary character, for which see Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

JACOBUS, McLachlan, Williams, D.D., LL.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Newark, N. J., Sept. 19, 1816. He entered the sophomore class at Princeton College in his fifteenth year, and graduated in 1834 with the highest honors. In 1835 he entered Princeton Theological Seminary, where he not only regularly graduated, but spent a fourth year in study, at the same time assisting professor J. Addison Alexander in the department of Hebrew. In 1839 he was received by the Presbytery of New York, and in September was ordained pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Brooklyn, N. Y. At the close of his twelve years pastorate, the church was one of the most prosperous in the city. In the fall of 1850 he made a tour through Europe, Egypt, and Palestine, and returned with greatly improved health. During his absence the General Assembly, in May, 1851, had elected him professor of Oriental and Biblical literature in the theological seminary at Allegheny, which position he accepted on his return, and was released from his pastoral charge, Oct. 21, 1851. In January, 1858, in addition to his work in the seminary, he accepted a call to the Central Church of Pittsburgh, which he served for twelve years with a marked success. In 1866 he made a tour through Europe. He was moderator of the last General Assembly of the Old School Church in 1869, and conjointly with Rev. P. H. Fowler, D.D., presided at the opening of the first reunited assembly in 1870. He presented the able report on sustentation, which was adopted by the General Assembly of 1871, and was secretary of that scheme for three years, until it was merged into the Board of Home Missions in 1874. In 1876 he was elected secretary of the Board of Education, but declined the position that he might continue in the ministry. The last year of his ministerial labors, 1876, he conducted a meeting of the Synod of Pittsburgh, and taken an active part in its proceedings. On the day preceding he had taught his seminary classes as usual. In 1848 Dr. Jacobus, while in Brooklyn, published the first volume of his Notes on the New Testament. Other volumes followed at intervals, the two volumes on Genesis appearing in 1864. These commentaries have had an immense sale, and are found among all denominations of Christians. Besides these he was the author of many other and smaller works. Dr. Jacobus stood in the front rank of the Biblical scholars of his age. As a preacher he maintained all through his ministry a high position, while on the platform his addresses were always happy and effective. He was a most energetic and persistent worker, and his industry was untriting. See Necrology, Report of Princeton Theol. Sen. 1877, p. 86.

JACOBY, Ludwigo S., a Methodist Episcopal mina, was born in New Strietz, Mecklenburg, Germany, Oct. 21, 1818. His parents being pious Jews, he was devoutly trained, and liberally educated, especially in the ancient languages. In 1835 he was baptized by a Lutheran minister. In 1838 he emigrated to the United States, and settled in Cincinnati, O., as a physician. He also devoted himself to teaching. About that time he was spiritually converted, under the preaching of Dr. Nast. In 1841 he was sent to St. Louis, Mo., to start the first German mission in that city. Desiring to labor more immediately for his countrypeople, he was sent, in 1849, to Bremen, Germany, where he formed a Methodist Episcopal Society. There he continued, faithful in the work of supplying elder, pastor, editor, book agent, and superintendent for twenty years. He then returned to the United States, and was transferred to the South-western German Conference, and stationed at Eighth Street charge, St. Louis.
In 1873 he was made presiding elder of St. Louis district, whereon he labored faithfully until near his death, which occurred in St. Louis, Mo., June 21, 1874. Dr.
Jacoby's life was full of devotedness and energy, and his death full of peace and blessings. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1874, p. 88; Simpson, Cyclop. of Jaenbert, archbishop of Canterbury, received his education at St. Augustine's, and was consecrated at

The great event of this episcopate is the conversion of the bishopric of Lichfield into a metropolitan see by Offa, king of Mercia, and the consequent spoliation, with the loss of dominion, authority, and dignity, of the archbishop of Canterbury.

There was much to render the last years of Jaenbert's life melancholy, for the prospects of his country were gloomy in the extreme. Thwarted and discomfited to the last, Jaenbert perceived that his orders to be buried at St.
Augustine's would not be obeyed by his chapter if he died without the walls of the monastery; and he therefore sought an asylum in the place endear'd to him by the reccollec-tion of younger and happier days.

He commanded his stone coffin to be prepared; his episcopal robes were arranged by his bedchamber; his soul was comforted by the psalms sung and the Scriptures read to him by brethren who could sympathize with him in his fallen fortunes.

He died Aug. 11, 790. See Hook, Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, i, 242 sq.

Jaeshik, in Lamiism, was a Buddha, who brought Buddhism to Thibet, A.D. 407. Jakshamuni, the fifth divine Burchan, and the supreme god of the Lamiists, called him to spring forth out of the beautiful Padmaflower, knowing what sanctity he would thereby receive, and authorized him to bring about the salvation of men.

Jaeshik undertook, however, only to save the men living in the snowy countries of the north; and he promised to carry out this plan with all perseverance, though his head should split into ten and his body into a thousand parts. He first descended into the kingdoms of hell, and visited the kingdom of monsters (Bridid), then that of animals, of men, of evil genii, Assuri and Tágrí, and there destroyed all pains and torture; for as soon as his holy mouth spoke the saving words, "Om-ma-nipad-ma-hum," hell no longer existed. After having accomplished so much, he began his journey on earth and travelled through the countries beyond the mountains of snow. There also he spoke his magic words, developed evil, brought good from heaven, and led men to the true religion. Next he ascended into the country of the delites on the Red Mountain. There, to his consternation, he again saw many millions of beings unmercifully tortured by being bathed in the Otang Sea, or sea of fire. The tortures of these unfortunate brought forth a tear from each one of his eyes, out of which there sprang two goddesses, who promised to assist him and, placing themselves in his eyes, their power was manifested by the glances of Jaeshik. He spoke the above-mentioned six words also here, saved the doomed, and converted them to faith in the supreme god Jakshamuni, so that his work was almost finished. But all the saved were not yet strong in the faith, and it troubled him.
He longed for the blessed land of eternal happiness, his home; and suddenly his head split into ten parts and his body into a thousand. Burchan joined the latter again; and consoled him by saying that his body would become the holiest sanctuary of the world.
The thousand parts were to become so many hands, each with one eye, and were to represent so many monarchs.

Jafé, Mardechai ben-Abraham, a famous Jew-lish author, resided in 1561 at Venice, whence, during a persecution of the Jews, he retreated to Bohemia, and became rabbi in the synagogues of Grodno, Lublin, Kremnitz, and Prague. He is the author of the Lebu-shim, a series of ten works, which hold a high place in the classics of modern Judaism. The general title of the series is לברשין, Royal Apparel, from Est.
viii, 15; and the collection itself is sometimes called Lebush, or Lebush veirashman, or the "Vestment of the Crown of God," (4) Lebush vaiz vatreinom, or "the Vestment of fine linen and purple," (5) Lebush in Shukhan, or "the Vestment of the City of Shushan.
These five treatises turn upon the objects of the ritual codes of the Arba Turim of Jacob ben-Asher (q. v.), and the Shulchan Aruch of Joseph Karo (q. v.).
The remaining five lebushim are exegetical, cabalistic, and philosophical. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. ii, 7 sq.; Eber-rig, Introduction to Hebrew Literature, p. 457; De' Rossi, Jafé, Samuel, a rabbi at Constantinople in the latter part of the 16th century, is the author of homilies on the Midrashim, on the Pentateuch, and on Esther, Lamentations, and Ruth. He afterwards published them under the title of רבי יוסי. He also published homilies on the Haggadah of the Palestinian Talmud.

honored sacrifices, which the Brahmins offer to the sun and the planets, and at which strictly no one from any other caste is allowed to be present. In the spring of the year a certain spot is selected and cleansed, but it is built, in which several hundred Brahmins can be accommodated with seats; in the centre of this the holy pillar is erected, Mahadeva's symbol. Around this a fire is kindled by rubbing together two pieces of wood; and the arch that can find room crowds into the hut. The remaining Brahmins surround the holy place, so that no profane eye desecrate the sanctuary. Then a widow is strangled (blood is not allowed to be shed); the liver is roasted with butter, divided in as many parts as there are Brahmins, and given to them on a plate of brass, which they are obliged to eat. Whoever does this is said to be specially purified and made sinless; and the Brahmin who kindled the fire and performed the sacrificial ceremony may take a part of the fire to his home, where he is to keep it constantly burning, and at his death he is permitted to have his funeral pile kindled with it, by virtue of which he enters paradise immediately, without any transmigration of his soul. Of course, under the English rule these barbarities are no longer permitted.

Jäger, Johann Wolfgang, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Stuttgart, March 17, 1647, and died there on the 19th of April, 1720, doctor of theology, chancellor, and provost. He is the author of: Historia Ecclesiae, etc. (1710, 2 vols. fol.; Hamburg, 1703, 1717) — Examen Quiritium: — Separationis Hodierna sub Examen Vocalum: — De Doctrina Communis et Individuata: — Compendium Theologicum Positivum. Jagatai-Turk [Tartar] or Tekke Turoman Version of the Scriptures. This dialect is vernacular to the Uzbek and Turkish tribes of Turkestan and Central Asia, and a version of any part of the Scriptures into it is of a very recent date. In 1873 Rev. James Basset had completed a translation of the gospel of Matthew, with the assistance of a mirza from Meshed. After a careful revision made at Teheran, the translator carried his version through the press in London. A new and revised edition of this gospel was again printed at Tiflis, and most of the vowel points, which were so numerous in the first edition, were omitted. (B. P.)

Jagnepawadam, in Hindustan, is the cord of the Brahmins, a sacred mark or sign of the highest caste, which is allowed to carry under severe penalties. It is made of nine threads of wool, which are long enough to be wound one hundred and eight times around the hand (because of the one hundred and eight legends of Brahmas). These nine threads are divided into three parts, corresponding to the three Vedas, or holy books, and they are then suspended over the right shoulder, so as to touch the hip under the left arm. This Brahmin-cord places him who carries it above the reach of the civil law.

Jagouth (Yaghuth), one of the five principal gods of the ancient Ardians. He was usually represented in the form of a lion, and is mentioned by name in the Koran.

Jahed, Ahmad-Usman-Abb, a Mohammedan doctor of the sect of the Mutazalites. The name of Jahed, by which he is generally designated, is only a surname given to him on account of his brilliant eyes. He was thoroughly acquainted with Greek literature. He gained a great many adherents by his writings and eloquence. Among his theological books one is cited as being composed in favor of Ali, and containing more than a thousand traditions respecting him. The best of his works, according to Ibn-Khallikan, who cites but two of them (the others being largely borrowed from Greek writers). Jahed died at Bossara, A.D. 869. See Hofer, Neue Bibl. Graec., s. v.

Jahant, Jedid, a Benedictine, was born at Mittenwald, Bavaria, March 17, 1750. In 1770 he joined his order, was in 1778 professor at the Salzburg Gymnasium, and in 1803 professor of theology. In 1811 he retired from public duties, and died Dec. 4, 1822. He published, Predigten (Munich, 1809, 2 vols.) — Kathechismus (Würzburg, 1811) — Handbuch zum Unterrichte in der christkathol. Glaubens- und Sittendislehre (1821), and other ascetical works. — See Jahant, Jedid, in Handbuch der theol. Lit. ii, 112, 241, 267, 346, 387. (B. P.)

Jakobi, Adam Friedrich, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Oct. 27, 1738. He studied at Jena, acted for some time as private tutor, went in 1758 as military chaplain to Holland, and was in 1759 appointed superintendent by duke Ernest of Gotha. Jakobi died April 3, 1807. He wrote, Diss. Theologicai de Pecatii Apostolorum Actualibus (Jena, 1754) — Exercitatio Eretico-Theologica de Monomogia (Gotha, 1776), besides a number of historical and pedagogical works. See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, s. v. (B. P.)

Jakabnun, in Lamasism, is the supreme god of the Thibetians, identical with Buddha of India, an incarnation of Vishnu, who appears for the fourth time to save men. He is the present sovereign of the universe. After him there will yet come nine hundred and nineteen Bhumis, before the salvation of men shall be finished. The inhabitants of Thibet, Mongolia, Tartary, China, and Japan hold him to be the only god, creator and giver of their religion.

Jalaguier, Prosper Friedrich, a French Protestant theologian, was born Aug. 21, 1758. Having acted as pastor at several places, Jalaguier was called in 1853 to Montauban, to fill temporarily the chair of Christian ethics. Two years later he was appointed professor of dogmatics, and occupied this office till his death at Montauban, March 22, 1864. He published, Le Teolomage du Dieu (1851) — Authentique du Nouveau Testament (ed.) — Inspiration du Nouveau Testament (ed.) — Simple Exposé de la Question Chrétienne (1852) — Un Principe Chrétien et du Catholicisme, du Rationalisme et du Protestantisme (1855) — Une Vie de la Question Scripturaire (1863). In these works he defended with great firmness the reality of a supernatural revelation and the authority of the Scripture, against the writers of the Revue de Strasbourg. See Lichtenburger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Jaldaaboth. See Ialdabaoth.

Jalinder, in Hindu mythology, was one of the mighty demons which, sprung from Danu, are classed and recognised under the name of Danuvas. He was dreaded by all the gods, because he was unconquerable; but this was only by the marvellous virtue and the vigour of his wife, who favored no one in heaven or on earth. The demon challenged Shiva, and fought with him in Mahadeva's form, and would have come off victorious had not Vishnu come to the assistance of the god. This he did by taking on the form of a demon just like Jalinder, and, coming to the wife of the latter, overcame her virtue, and immediately the demon's strength left him, so that he was conquered and killed.

Jalkut (בָּלָ֖ק) i. e. collection, is the title of a Midrashic catena of traditional expositions from upwards of fifty different works of all ages, many of which are of great value. This Midrash extends over the whole Bible. A lectionary is the one of Jalkut, written at Warsaw (1876-77). The author of the Jalkut is Simeon Cara (q. v.). (B. P.)

Jallof Version of the Scriptures. This dialect (also called Jalof, Wolof, Gallu, etc.), is spoken by a large tribe near Bathurst, Gambia, West Africa, numbering about 10,000 souls. It is also known from the Foreign Bible Society, at the request of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, resolved to print a tentative edition of 50 copies of the gospel of Matthew. The translation was made by Rev. R. Dixon, of Bathurst, Gambia, who had used his version in the services, and found it was understood and liked by the people. See Bible of Every Land, p. 407. (B. F.)

Jama in Hindû mythology, is the ruler of a division of the infernal region (Nark), and the highest judge there, who decides whether the departed souls are to be admitted to heaven or go to hell, in which latter case they begin their wanderings through life anew. A mirror, made of pure fire, portrays to him the deeds of all men. On a golden scale, held by his assistants, he weighs human deeds, and leads those found wanting to Nark, the others to Suerga (heaven). He is a protecting spirit of virtue and justice, and the most honored companion of Shiva. Nevertheless, he is represented in a frightful appearance, with hideous features, a number of arms, heavy weapons, and riding on a black buffalo with four horns. He lives in Jampur (city of Jama).

Jambawat, in Hindû mythology, was an Avatar, an incarnation of the supreme god, in the form of a giant bear. Rama (an incarnation of Vishnu) appeared for the purpose of conquering Ravana, the giant king of Ceylon. The gods all supported the latter, with armies of apes, of bears, and other animals. Brahma gave the bears a king, Jambawat, who came out of the mouth of the god, and possessed the spirit of Brahma. He now wished to make the expedition to Ceylon alone, but Krishna sought three days with him, until he had recognised the supremacy of Vishnu (whose incarnation Krishna was). Then he followed Rama, with his entire army of bears, and assisted him in conquering Ceylon and its ruler.

James, John Thomas, D.D., an Anglican colonial bishop, was born in England, in 1726. He was educated at the Charter House and at Christ Church, Oxford, became vicar of Filton, Berkshire, and was elevated to the see of Calcutta. He arrived in that city, Jan. 15, 1828; on June 23 he set out on a visitation to the Upper Provinces of Bengal, and died while on his way to the island of Penang, Aug. 22 of the same year. Bishop James had acquired some celebrity as an author and traveller. He wrote Journal of Travels in Germany, Sweden, Russia, Poland, etc. (London, 1816, 4to):—Ways in Russia, Poland, etc., prepared in colors:—The Flemish, Dutch, and Lombard Schools of Painting (London, 1822, 8vo). James, William, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Albany, N. Y., in June, 1737. He received an academic and collegiate education, and was ordained about the 25th year of his age. He was pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church in Rochester, N. Y., from 1825 until 1830 or 1831, and then for a time of the Third Presbyterian Church in Montgomery Street, Albany. He died in 1868. JAM MASTA

Jam Moesta, in Tibetan mythology, is one of the eight fearful gods (N admon- Dobhot), who by their might destroy evil, protect the world, and are zealously worshipped by the followers of Lamaism. Jamdunga is an emanation of the god Monsurabi. Jakshiamani, the supreme god, gave him the most hateful appearance that he could devise, in order that he might conquer the frightful Takhtatishalsba, the most dreaded of all evil demons, who continually seeks to destroy the world. In this form Jamdunga is of a bluish color, surrounded by flames of fire, and has ten heads, in three rows, of which is that of a bull, another that of a goat, and the rest distorted human faces; but the last and topmost one is that of a beautiful maiden, to denote his divine nature. Twenty arms carry the deadliest weapons and instruments of torture, and with twenty feet he walks on a heap of crushed men. See JAMADANGA.

Jama, in the mythology of the Antilles, was the mother of the great spirit Jokahunia, whom Tunatika sent to the earth in his stead. This goddess was worshipped on the island Quispuesque (Hayti). She had an idol there, at whose side two servants stood, one to call the gods together, when the goddess wanted to send them out to fulfill her wishes, the other to punish the disobedient.

JAMMABOS, in Hindû mythology, was an Avatar, an incarnation of the supreme god, in the form of a giant bear. Rama (an incarnation of Vishnu) appeared for the purpose of conquering Ravana, the giant king of Ceylon. The gods all supported the latter, with armies of apes, of bears, and other animals. Brahma gave the bears a king, Jambawat, who came out of the mouth of the god, and possessed the spirit of Brahma. He now wished to make the expedition to Ceylon alone, but Krishna sought three days with him, until he had recognised the supremacy of Vishnu (whose incarnation Krishna was). Then he followed Rama, with his entire army of bears, and assisted him in conquering Ceylon and its ruler.

James, John Thomas, D.D., an Anglican colonial bishop, was born in England, in 1726. He was educated at the Charter House and at Christ Church, Oxford, became vicar of Filton, Berkshire, and was elevated to the see of Calcutta. He arrived in that city, Jan. 15, 1828; on June 23 he set out on a visitation to the Upper Provinces of Bengal, and died while on his way to the island of Penang, Aug. 22 of the same year. Bishop James had acquired some celebrity as an author and traveller. He wrote Journal of Travels in Germany, Sweden, Russia, Poland, etc. (London, 1816, 4to):—Ways in Russia, Poland, etc., prepared in colors:—The Flemish, Dutch, and Lombard Schools of Painting (London, 1822, 8vo). Their founder lived about the 6th century. He wandered about in deserts, and climbed the steepest mountains, subjecting himself to the severest privations. His followers, on entering the order, made a solemn vow to renounce all temporal advantages for the prospect of eternal happiness. In course of time they became divided into two orders, called Tōjōfu and Fonsaifu. The former are obliged to go on a pilgrimage once a year to the mountain of Fikosan (q. v.). The other order of Jammabos are obliged annually to pay a visit to the sepulchre of their founder, which is also situated on the top of a high and almost inaccessible mountain. In preparation for this hazardous undertaking, they practice frequent abductions and severe mortifications. During their pilgrimage they eat only herbs and roots. On their return they go to Miao, and present a gift to the general of the religious order to which they belong, who, in turn, bestows some honorable title on the pilgrim. At their original institution the Jammabos were Shintoists, but they have blended that form of religion with the worship of strange gods. See SHINTO.

Jammy, Pierre, a Dominican of Languedoc, who died in 1652 at Grenoble, doctor of divinity, is best known as the editor of the works of Albertus Magnus (21 vols. fol., Lyons, 1651). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit., i., 914; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Jan, Johann Wilhelm, a Lutheran theologian, was born Nov. 9, 1681. He studied at Wittenberg, in 1718 professor of eloquence, in 1714 of history, in 1719 doctor of theology, and died at Ansbach, Aug. 27, 1725. He wrote, Judicia Eruditiorum de Origine Electorum: —Historia Ero Christianae: —De Cenam Romanorum Primo: —De Articula Subsociaibis Augustae Confessae Fundamento: —De Liturgia Orientalibus in Doctrinae de S. Erasuris, etc., see Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit., i., 611. (B. P.)

James, Edwin Lee, a Methodist Episcopal minister, twin brother of bishop E. S. James, was born at Sheffield, Mass., April (his biographers say May) 27, 1807. He spent his boyhood near Salisbury, Conn., receiving the rudiments of an English education, was converted while teaching school in Columbia, N. Y.; and in 1832 entered the Philadelphia Conference. His appointments were, Asbury Church, West Philadelphia; Elizabeth, Plainfield, and Irvington, N. J.; Asbury Church, West Philadelphia; then to Haldingtown, Middletown, and Ossela Circuits, Del.; then Elkon and St. George's Church, Philadelphia; then was transferred to the New York Conference, and set in turn to Mulberry Street Church; South Second Street, Williamsburgh; South Fifth Street (which was organized); Bridgeport and Middletown, Conn., in 1854 and 1855, presiding elder of New Haven District; South Fifth Street, Williamsburgh, three years; John Street and Forysth Street, New York city; Flushing and Whitney, L. I.; Summerfield Church, Brooklyn, in 1866, Central Church in 1867, and John Street, New York city, in 1868 and 1869, where he closed his pastoral life. In 1870 he was appointed district secretary or agent of the National Temperance Society and Publishing House, which office he held until his death, Jan. 10, 1875. Mr. James was among the foremost of saintly men; an uncomplaining saint; a man of extraordinary power in prayer; of rare eloquence in exhortation, an ingenious, instructive, effectual preacher, a sound theologian, and a devoted temperance worker. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1875, p. 51; Sippin, Cyclo. of Methodism, s. v.

Janes, Edmund Storer, D.D., LL.D., a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born highly respectable but not wealthy parents, at Sheffield, Mass., April 27, 1807. He was converted in 1820, and united with the Methodist Episcopal Church. From 1824 to 1830 he was engaged in teaching, during which time he studied law with the intention of making it the profession of his life; but in 1830 joined the Philadelphia Conference, and during the first few years of his ministry, in addition to his work as a minister and his theological studies, which were thorough if not broad, studied medicine. He was ordained deacon in 1832, and elder in 1834, and after filling various important charges, was, in 1838, appointed agent for Dickinson College. In 1840 he was elected financial secretary of the American Bible Society; and in 1844 was elected to the bishopric in conjunction with bishop Hamline, they being the last of the bishops who received the vote of the unied Church. For more than thirty-one years he dis charged his duties in the episcopal office, travelling in all the states except Florida, and in most of the territories, besides being president of the Missionary Society, of the Board of Church Extension, and of the Sunday-school Union and Tract Society for the Methodist Episcopal Church, as well as being one of the managers of the American Bible Society, of the directors of the American Colonization Society, of the trustees of the Wesleyan University at Middletown, Conn., of the Drew Theological Seminary, and president of the Minard Home, Morristown, N. J. Bishop Janes is in many respects one of the most remarkable men in the history of American Methodism. He inherited the sterling mental and moral qualities of his Puritan ancestors; possessed a mind of a high order, enriched by generous culture, and disciplined by the severest tests of life. He was a model platform speaker, ready, earnest, and impressive; a preacher of rare power, grace, and eloquence; and an administrator of peerless activity, clearness, decision, patience, and comprehensiveness. He was a man of inflexible principle, thorough, conscientious, and unerring in his judgment and decision; and a Christian gentleman, in the truest sense of the word. He died Sept. 18, 1876. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1876, p. 365; Simpson, Cyclo. of Methodism, s. v.; Life, by Dr. Highway (N. Y. 1882).

Jangamas, a Hindu sect, the essential characteristic of which is wearing the Lingam (q. v.), or symbol of creative production, on some part of the dress or person. The typical Jangama, in size, made of cotton and linen, is commonly worn suspended in a case round the neck, or sometimes tied in the turban. In common with the worshippers of Siva generally, the Jangamas smear their foreheads with ashes, wear necklaces, and carry the sacred seed of the Priyadarsi tree. The clerical members of the sect usually stain their garments with red ochre. They are not numerous in Upper India; but in the south of India the Jangamas, or Lingayats, as they are often called, are very numerous, and the officiating priests of Siva commonly are of this sect. They are also known as Lingayets and as being very numerous in the Deccan. Besides the Jangama priests of Kedaraham, a wealthy establishment of them exists at Benares.

Jähnisch, Rudolph, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Hamburg, May 22, 1750. He studied at Göttingen, was catechist in his native city, and in 1796 pastor of the Lutheran Church at Amsterdam. In 1796 he was recalled to Hamburg, and died April 7, 1825, pastor primarius of St. Catharina's. He wrote, Conclusiones de Animis Humanis Libertate (Hamburg, 1770) — Predigten iiber die sonst- und freiheitlichsten Evangeln (1797-1804, 8 parts). See Döring, Die gebrüchlichen Theologen Deutschlands, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit., i., 149. (B. P.)

Janoah, (1) Of Ephraim. Of Kukret Yamma, the modern representative of this place, the Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey (i., 355) give only this notice: "Traces of ruins above a spring." (2) Or Nafyat-nah. The Jumālah, thought by some to represent this place, is a double village, nine and three quarter miles south-east from es-Zib (Ecliptipa, or Achaib), which would fall on the border between Asher and Naphtali, and is thus described (from Gador) in the Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey (1, 138). "Cisterns cut in the rock, and many cut at scattered distances over the soil, surrounded by a number of eminences and a sand building material, show that we are here on the site of a small ancient city, the name of which is faithfully preserved in its modern name." Lieut. Conder, however, distinguishes this locality from the Jansoah of 2 Kings xv, 29 (see the Memoirs as above, i, 96; but no description of the place is given), which he regards as the Jassak lying four miles south of the Leontes (Nahr Kasmiytel), and six and a quarter miles east of Tyre; but this would fall within the tribe of Asher.

Jansen, Edelinus Franciscus, a Dutch Dominican, who died in 1715, was one of the most famous canonists of his time. He wrote, Autorius D. Thomae Aquinatis (1604); — Certissimum quid Certissinae Veritatis pro Doctrina Doctrinae Angelici; — Controversia in Herodicum Opusculum (Antwerp, 1673); — Suprema Rerum Emendationis Praelectiones in Hildesheim (1600); — De Gratia gratias (1622); — De Gratia gratias (1600); — Exemplum sub Cap. 44; — De Gratia gratias (1600). He is described by the Prebendary of New Castle, Sept. 26, 1810; spent one year in Italian preaching; became pastor at Pettigrove, N. J., May 18, 1812; and died there June 9, 1865. He was moderator of the Synod of New Jersey, and was a member of the Board of Foreign Missions. See Wilson, Pred. Hist. Almanac, 1866, p. 115.

Japan. This archipelago in eastern Asia consists of one large island, Honshu (mainland or continent), not called Nippon by the natives, but formerly so named by foreigners, three other large islands, Shikoku (four provinces), Kiusiu (nine provinces), and Yezo (unexplored land), a number of outlying islands, Sado, Oki, Iki, Tsushima, Awaji, Gotô, etc., and the more distant groups, the Kuriles (smokers), Bonin (so named), and Riu Kiu (hanging fringe-tassel or sleeping dragon), with nearly four thousand islets. The area of this empire, called by the natives Nihon or Nippon (surnise), or Dai Nihon Koku (great land of the sun's root, or origin), is, by survey of 1884, 146,371,723 square miles, and the population, by census of 1874, 38,623,373 souls. Japan contains nearly 15,000,000 people, and, with the islands immediately south and north to it, may be called Old Japan (native Oyashima, great islands), because historically it was conquered and colonized in early times. New Japan consists later acquisitions and colonies, such as Yezo and Riu Kiu.

The origin of the dominant race in Japan is not yet entirely clear to scholars, but traditions all point to Corea and northern Asia as the ancestral seats of that conquering race which, near the Christian era, descen- ded upon the land over which they saw the sun rise. They found other races on the soil whom they subdued. Many of the subjugated were doubtless of near Asian origin, like their conquerors, but there were also the straight-eyed, black-haired Ainios, who now occupy only Yezo and the Kuriles, whither they were in early times (from the 4th to the 13th century of our era) driven. The conquerors, by the superior force both of their fetiches and dogmas, as well as of their valor, arms, and agriculture, made conquest only after long struggles. The farmers and warriors finally pacified the fishers and hunters, and established both their political rule and imported religion, Shintô, over "all within the four seas." The first mikado or emperor, deified as Jimmu Tennó (heavenly king), is said to have begun to reign B. C. 667, in his myia or palace-temple, near the miyako (city) of Kiotô—but of Japanese dates, until the introduction of alphabets and writing, with methods for keeping record of time, from China, in the 8th century and later, no one can speak with certainty, and Japanese traditions that antedate the Christian era are chronologically worthless.

The first form of government was a rude species of feudalism, in which the mikado was suzerain, and his relatives or captains were rulers of the conquered land, which was divided into provinces paralleled in its institutions. The order of things continued until the 7th century, when the centralized system of pure monarchy, introduced from China, was carried out, and the mikado, as sole ruler, was assisted by six boards or ministries of government, and all provincial officers were appointed in and sent out from Kioto. Several centuries were necessary to bring this method to perfection, and in the distant provinces military families who had kept the peace and put down insurrections at first made themselves necessary to the central government, and later, at the capital, transferred their energies to ambitious schemes in the palace itself. The introduction of Buddhism led the mikados to neglect the sceptre, and to become Buddhist monks, or live in gross licentiousness under cover of a professively holy life. This paved the way for the rise of the shoguns (known later as kubo sama, "Tycoon," etc.), who gradually concentrated the powers of the executive in their own hands, while nominally the mikado was the fountain of honors. Exaggerating the mikado's "spiritual" importance for his own ends, the shogun usurped the functions of military and civil government, and held the executive, the treasury, and the appointing power. Yoritomo, at Kamakura, in 1192, began the dual system of government, which, with slight intermissions, lasted until 1688, though Iyeyasu, at Yedo, in 1604, established the order of anointing or modern with which, until 1688, foreigners had been most familiar. Side by side with this spectacle of two rulers and two capitals grew up the elaborate feudalism of Japan, which has so attracted the attention of students, and which in its perfected development was unique in Asia.

The introduction of Portuguese Christianity into Dai Nippon, as given by professor Schem in volume iv, is in the main an admirable one. We note only the following needed corrections: Tanegai (seed island) for Tanegi, Ibisho for Fide Tose, Iyeyasu for Ieyazu, Kou for Kyou, Iwai for Ryo, etc. We may add that, in 1877, most interesting relics—documents, books, tapestry—of the Japanese embassy to the pope were discovered, and that while in Japan, in 1878, the writer identified the place of imprisonment and beheading of Jean Baptiste (the last Catholic priest) who, in 1709, landed in Japan, and was never again heard of until the Rev. S. R. Brown, D.D., unearthed the account of his inquisition and trial, written by a Japanese scholar. Further, the recently found correspondence of the Dutch superintendents of Doshima requires us to relieve the Hollander of all the odium resting on their names for assisting with cannon to crush the "Christian" insurrection at Shimabara, in 1627 (not "at the close of the 16th century"), in which very much fewer than seventy thousand were either concerned or arrested.

For two centuries and a half after the expulsion of the Romish priests, the supposed extinction of Christianity, and sealing of all the doors of the empire against foreign influences, Japan rested in peace in the calm of despotism. But while the successors of Iyeyasu, in Yedo, attempted to keep the dualism of feudalism and national isolation were permanently established, great currents of thought began to move under the surface. These were finally to break out in floods that should sweep away the old and bring in a new era never dreamed of by any of the men of modern Japan. These movements were intended to effect the overthrow of the shogun and his abseasment as the emperor's vassal, the replacement of the mikado on his throne as sole ruler, the abolition of the feudal system, the disestablishment of Buddhism, and the restoration of Shintō as the state cultus. All was ready, or nearly so, for upheaval, when the squadron of American steamers, under commodore Matthew Calbraith Perry, swept into the bay of Yedo, July 8, 1853. After his treaty, and those made later by Townsend Harris, our consul-general, and the Europeans and Europeans and Chinese, the mikado was delivered out of his seclusion and overthrown, and a new era opened. The government, and all provincial officers were appointed in and sent out from Kioto. Several centuries were necessary to bring this method to perfection, and in the distant provinces military officers who had kept the peace and put down insurrections at first made themselves necessary to the central government, and later, at the capital, transferred their energies to ambitious schemes in the palace itself. The introduction of Buddhism led the mikados to neglect the sceptre, and to become Buddhist monks, or live in gross licentiousness under cover of a professively holy life. This paved the way for the rise of the shoguns (known later as kubo sama, "Tycoon," etc.), who gradually concentrated the powers of the executive in their own hands, while nominally the mikado was the fountain of honors. progress made by the Japanese, results either directly or indirectly from missionary labor, suggestion, or stimulus. In addition to their preaching, teaching, translation, and healing, they have conferred upon natives and foreigners alike a lasting benefit of incalculable importance by their aid to the mastery of the language, and their other valuable publications. The following statistics of Christianity in Japan are from the paper read before the Osaka Conference in April, 1888:

Of the dangers that beset the churches of Christ in Japan we do not here speak, but refer the reader to the following recent works for a more thorough study of the country and people, and the work for Christ in the sunrise kingdom.

Literature.—Transactions of the Asiatic Society of Japan (1874-85), vol. i-xiv; Léon Pagès, Histoire de la Religion Chrétienne en Japan; Griffis, The Mikado's Empire (New York, 1876; 4th ed. 1884); Coren, the Hermit Nation (ibid. 1883); Bird, Heathen Trucks in Japan (ibid. 1881); Reit, Japan (ibid. 1884), and the works of Baron De Hubner, E. Warren Clark, E. J. Reed, Isabella Carruthers, W. Gray Dixon, Henry Faulds, and others. (W. E. G.)

Japanese Version of the Scriptures. The honor of translating the first portion of Scripture into the language of the country and the European colonies of the West Indies was conferred on the late Dr. Gutzlaff (q. v.). About the year 1835 three shipwrecked Japanese mariners arrived at Macao on their voyage homewards, and during the few months that they remained in that city Dr. Gutzlaff availed himself of their aid in translating the gospel of John into their language. This translation was printed at Singapore about 1838. In this version the text used for God was Gokuraku, the term the Buddhists use for paradise or the state of supreme bliss. For Loga or the Word he used Kenboku mono, the wise or clever person; for Holy Spirit he used Kiri, inspiration. While in England Dr. Gutzlaff proposed, in 1849, to the British and Foreign Bible Society, to have the Scriptures printed in the Japanese tongue. The Acts of the Apostles and the epistles of John were consequently printed according to Gutzlaff's translation.

As the style of his version was found inferior, and little likely to prove acceptable to the better educated in Japan, a new translation was undertaken by Dr. Bettelheim, a medical missionary and convert from Judaism. He was sent to the Loochoo islands in 1846, and while there made a translation of the New Testament. While in Hong Kong he published the gospel of Luke, under the care of the bishop of Victoria, and at the expense of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. It was printed on blocks, in royal octavo size, with Gutzlaff's Chinese translation at the top of the page, and Bettelheim's, in the Loochoo dialect, at the bottom, in Katakana, or the character used for scientific works. When Bettelheim left Japan in 1854 he took up his residence in Chicago, and from this place he offered, in 1860, to sell his translation to the United States government. The government, wishing to know its merits, sent a copy of one of the gospels and a grammar he had compiled to its minister resident in Japan, Mr. Harris, to be examined by scholars there and reported on. Mr. Harris not knowing what better to do, sent it to Drs. Brown and Hepburn, two missionaries, but whether from the peculiarity of the dialect, or out of very imperfect knowledge of the Japanese language at that early day of their residence there, they could not make anything out of it. It was then sent to Mr. Harris with an unfavorable report. Dr. Bettelheim, however, revised his work in Chicago, with the assistance of a Japanese, bringing it more into conformity with the pure Japanese. This revision, consisting of the four gospels and epistles, was published by the British and Foreign Bible Society, and purchased by them. It was printed at Vienna in 1872 for that society, in the Hiragana character, which is more generally understood in Japan than the Katakana, in which it was written.

This publication was the only direct effort made by the missionaries for a literary medium for something better could be prepared. The committee appointed by the missionary convention commenced its sittings in June, 1874. There were invited to meet and participate in the work of the translation the Rev. R. S. Maclay, of the American Episcopal Mission, D.D.; Mr. John Hatton, of the American Baptist Mission; the Rev. John Piper, of the Church Missionary Society; and the Rev. W. B. Wright, of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. Mr. Piper and Mr. Wright, owing to their residing at such an inconvenient distance, could not meet the committee. Mr. Hatton and Mr. Brown sat on the committee about eighteen months, until January, 1876, when he resigned, and continued to prosecute the work of translation alone. The other members of the committee continued at the work of translation and revision with but slight interruption, Dr. Maclay being absent about eighteen months, owing to the duties of his office, and Dr. Brown being compelled through ill-health to cease work in July, 1879. The committee finished their work of translation and revision of the New Testament, Nov. 8, 1879, about five years and six months after they had commenced it. The work was again revised and published in the following order: Luke, August, 1875; Romans, March, 1876; Hebrews and Matthew (revised), January, 1877; Mark (revised), April, 1877; epistles of John, June, 1877; Acts, September, 1877; Galatians, January, 1878; Ephesians (revised), May, 1878, 1 Corinthians, August, 1878; 2 Corinthians, September, 1878; Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, Philemon, James, 1st and 2d Peter, Jude, Colossians, Revelation, 1880. As to the literary style of the translation—a matter of no small importance—the following statement, made by the Rev. J. C. Hepburn, on the occasion of celebrating the completion of the Japanese version of the New Testament, April 19, 1880, at Tokyo, will be of interest:

"In this country, where, from the earliest times, the Chinese language and literature has had such a powerful influence upon the cultivation and language of the people, it was, at the very first, a matter of considerable anxiety how our work should be brought out to make it most acceptable and useful. The conclusion was not difficult to arrive at; that, giving the one hand the highest style, the only intelligible, the only educated, scholarly, and comparatively very small portion of the people, and the other hand, range of the colloquial, which, though easily understood, might make the Scriptures contemptible— we should choose that style which, while retaining the character of the so-called ornamental, was easy and intelligible to all classes. We thus adhered to the vernacular language of the Japanese, and to a style which may be called classical, in which many of the best books intended for the common reader are written. And our more enlarged experience has given us no reason to regret our first determination, but rather to be more and more satisfied with it, and to believe that in this, as well as in many other cases, we have been under the guidance of a kind all-ruling Providence."

The committee had assistance from several Japanese scholars, among whom Mr. Okuno and Mr. Matsuyama are mentioned. Of the latter it is said, "He has been a minister of the word, practically from the first and his whole work. He has been our chief dependence, assistant, and arbiter in all cases of difficulty. Whatevver virtue there is in our Japanese text, it is, mainly, if not altogether, owing to his scholarly ability, the perfect knowledge of the vernacular, his own language, his great care, and identifying himself with the work. At present the New Testament is circulated in Japan in the following editions:

1. The Standard, or Kanonkyō, New Testament. This is the Japanese version of the Standard New Testament, in Roman letters. The translation was done by Dr. Hepburn. The Daily Gazette of Yokohama, Oct. 16, 1880, has the following notice concerning it: "The labors of the Japanese-English and English-Japanese translation committee, was the first work of its kind published in this country, and notwithstanding the more elaborate and copious arrangements, it still retains a claim to our notice for accuracy and general usefulness. In the midst of other accomplishings, the New Testament has found time to make itself not unworthy of its literary reputation a complete Romanized version of the New Testament, a piece of work which can be but imperfectly estimated by its extent, which is one hundred and fifty-three closely printed royal octavo pages."

2. The Revised, or Sōkankyō, New Testament. In this the common cursive Japanese character is used, almost alone, with but very few Chinese characters. It is intended to meet the wants of the more literate. The first volume will appear in a few days, and the entire work will be finished by the close of the year. It will be a volume slightly thinner than the Standard New Testament. The Rev. Mr. Knox, of the Presbyterian Missionary Society, has contributed the preliminary preface."

3. The Shinshikyō, New Testament. In this style the usual abbreviations are used, with many Chinese characters. It is thought that this will be the best suited with the scholarly classes. It is of just about the same size and of the same cost and of almost the same weight. The proof-reading of this work has been under the superintendence of Dr. Hepburn.

4. The Shinshikyō, or Shin, New Testament and Psalms. The New Testament was prepared by the Rev. D. C. Greene and the Rev. W. F. C. Hepburn, D.D. This is an adaptation of the Bridgman and Cuthbertson Chinese translation for the use of Japanese readers. In the words of Dr. Greene, "The work is known is the name given to the diminutive characters written on the right side of the Chinese ideographs. These, which consist of the most part of the Japanese phonetic characters, serve to supply the terminations of the Japanese verbs and such particles as are not found in the Chinese compound. Besides the brackets, certain numerals and arbitrary signs placed on the left of each bracket on the Japanese phonetic character, by the insertion of these marks, this book becomes substantially a translation into Japanese of the Chinese version of the sacred books."

A commencement with the translation of the Old Testament into Japanese has also been made. Delegates of the Protestant missions in Japan met in Tokyo, May 10, 1878, to consider principally plans for translating the Old Testament. A permanent translation committee was authorized, consisting of one member from each mission, to be elected by the mission itself, who should have had experience in the work of translating the different portions of the Old Testament, to various sub-committees; and the results of their labors are to be submitted to a general revising committee, to be appointed by the permanent committee. The revision committee is made up of Dr. Hepburn, Bewn, Maclay, and the Rev. Messrs. Green and Piper. As to the progress made in the Old Test. translation, we learn from the different reports of the British and Foreign Bible Society that most of the books have been translated, and that some have already been printed. Besides the British and Foreign Bible Society, compare also the Bible Society Record of the American Bible Society. (B. P.)

Japhia. Its modern representative, Yâqu, lies one and a half miles south-west of Nazareth. It contains to ancient remains, except a few broken columns, and about thirty cisterns. For a description of the numerous tombs cut in the rocks see the Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey, i. 334 sqq.

Jarnuth of Judah. The modern representative of this place, Kharabat el-Turmac, lies one and a half miles north-west of Beit-Nettif, of which the Memoirs to the Ordnance Survey give only this meagre description (iii. 120): "Heaps of stones, foundations, and cisterns," with a reference to "section A, Jarnuth," which contains no allusion to it.

Jarrom, William, an English Baptist minister, was born at Ely Place, Wisbeach, Cambridgeshire, July 29, 1814. After leaving school he spent some time in study at home, and in teaching the classics. He was for some time a pastor of a church at Northampton, where he also conducted a school. He resigned his pastorate in 1841, but continued his school until he went as a missionary to China in 1845. While there, he labored at Ningpo with much success. He returned to England in 1851, and settled at Ischam in 1852. He removed to Kegworth in 1856, where he opened a boarding-school, and preached frequently. In 1869 he went to Barton as co-pastor, and in 1874 to West Vale, near Halifax, as pastor. He finally removed to Coningby, near Boston, Lincolnshire, where he taught and preached until a few days before his death, Feb. 28, 1892. See Baptist Hymn-book for 1888, p. 265.

Jattir. The modern representative of this, Kharabat Attir, lies four and a quarter miles south-east of ed-Dhoberiye, and nine and three quarter miles north of Tell Mihl (Moladah), and is thus described in the Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey (iii. 408): "Foundations, and heaps of stones; a great many caves; a ruined masonic tomb; several fallen pillar-shafts and cisterns. There is a kubbeh [dome] at the ruin, which stands on a knoll. Many of the caves have masonic arches to the doors. A large building remains, four corners of which are being kept. Below the ruins on the hill-side is a large oil-press.

Jaubert (De Barrault), Jean, a French preslate and theologian, was the son of Emeri, count of Barrault, and studied at La Flèche, both philosophy and theology, as an abbé of St. Pierre de Soissons, in the diocese of Limoges. He was consecrated bishop of Buzza at Rome, in August. 1612. Two years afterwards he was at the assembly of the clergy at Paris. He had been designated as grand-almoner to Henrietta Maria of France, queen of England, but the Protestants succeeded in preventing him from getting that position. In 1630 he was appointed archbishop of Arles. He presided over the assembly of the clergy, in 1632, at Paris, where he died, July 80, 1643, leaving Errors et Frausès Remarquables (Bordeaux, 1622-31). See Hoefer, Nouv. Bioj. Générale, s. v.

Jauk (or Yauk), one of the five deified men mentioned in the Koran as having been worshipped by the ancient Arabians. They are supposed to have been ancient Egyptians who had been distinguished for their virtues. The Arabians represent Jauk under the figure of a horse.

Javanese Version of the Scriptures. The language spoken on the island of Java is, next to Malay, which is distinct from it, the most polished and most cultivated of Polynesian dialects. Since A.D. 1490, when the Javanese embraced Mahometanism, there are two principal styles of language, called buko kromo and buko spoke. The buko kromo is the higher style, used in addressing persons of superior rank, etc.; and the buko spoke is the lower style, used in addressing persons of lower rank; it is also found sometimes in older writings, and in narratives, etc.

The preparation of a Javanese version was first suggested by Dr. Wm. Hunter of Calcutta, in 1812. When the Java Bible Society was formed, in 1814, the translation was one of the first things considered, but the language was found very difficult of acquisition to Europeans. At length the Rev. Gottlob Brückner, a native of Germany, stationed as minister of the Dutch Church at Samarang, undertook the difficult task. In 1820 he commenced the translation of the New Test., which was printed in 1831 at Serampore. The translation of the Old Test. was undertaken by the Rev. Mr. Gerické, a missionary of the Netherlands Society. In 1851 he completed a version of the Psalms, which he sent to Holland, to the Netherlands Society, for publication.

Mr. Gerické also made a fresh translation of the New Test., on the basis of the preceding. The printing was conducted by the Rev. Mr. Hooper, the editor of the translator, Professor Hoorsin assisting him in the correction of the proofsheets. The revised New Test. was issued in 1848, and in 1857 the Old Test. was also published, under the auspices of the Netherlands Society. Of late, however, the British and Foreign Bible Society has undertaken to publish a revised edition, at the request of the Rev. P. Janz of Djapara, supported by Mr. Hassenden, the society's agent in Singapore. "The people of Java," the report of the British and Foreign Bible Society for 1885 states, "are said to number 19,000,000. Of these, 5,000,000 are Javanese, 8,000,000 Sundanese, and 3,000,000 Malays. From many sources the committee learn that the existing version of the Bible is full of errors, some of which give a false meaning to the passages in which they occur, and that for practical purposes it is almost worthless. Mr. Hassenden has returned from a journey in Java, where he found the want of an intelligible version of the Scriptures." This induced the British and Foreign Bible Society to authorize the Rev. Janz, who for over thirty years has been a missionary in Java of the Baptist Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in the Netherlands, and who, besides, is the author of a Javanese Grammar and Dictionary which have reached a third edition, and of several religious books in the Javanese tongue, to prepare a new version. In this work of retranslation Mr. Janz has the aid of two educated native Christians. In its revised form the gospel of Luke was printed at Singapore in 1884. See Bible of Every Land, p. 869. (B. P.)

Jawas were the physicians, priests, and advisers of the small kings among the nations inhabiting Florida. They claimed to have converse with the spirits.

Jeanart, Edward, an eminent French engraver, was born in Paris about 1680, and studied under Bernard Picart. The following are some of his best works: The Meeting of David and Abigail; John the Baptist Baptizing the Jews; The Interview between Jacob and Rachel; The Finding of Moses.

Jeble (or Jebatu), in Japanese mythology, was the younger brother of the sun deity, but because he was ill-formed he was cast off by his parents. He lived by fishing, and amassed great wealth. After his death he was worshipped as god of the sea, and as one of the seven gods of wealth. He is represented by the god of waters, the protector of sailors and fishermen, sitting on a lotus-flower, or on a rock, with a line and a hook in his hand, and a fish beside him.

Jehud. The probable representative of this place el-Yehudiyeh, eight and a quarter miles south by east from Yafa, is described in the Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey (ii, 258) as "a large mud village, supplied by a pond, and surrounded by palm-trees. Mr. Drake states the population at 800 to 1000 souls. According to the Samaritans, Judah (Neby Holab) was buried here."

Jehuda ben-Eliezer, a Jewish writer of the 14th century, is the author of ה' חזקパイנ וס, or a commentary on the Pentateuch, in which he especially explains difficult passages of Rashi. This commentary, in which more than one hundred Jewish authorities are quoted, was published at Leghorn in 1785. See Furst, Bibl. Jud., iii, 84; De Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Ger. transl.), p. 141. (B. P.)

Jehuda ben-Ilai, a Tanait of the 2d century, and teacher of the famous Judah ha-Kodesh (q. v.), was a cooper by trade. While he spent his days in manual labor, he spent his nights in persevering study. After attaining the degree of rabbi, he still labored at his trade. So far from being ashamed of this, he gloried in it, and used sometimes to have a tub or hoseheet of his own workmanship brought into the lecture-room, which he used as a pulpit. His honest integrity procured him the title of ha-achad, or "the Just." In the dedication of his exposition he paid particular attention to the third book of Moses, or Leviticus, and it is considered that the book "Sifra" was first composed by him, though more fully elaborated afterwards. See Hamburger, Beit Ruchalk, ii, 452 sq.; Bacher, Die Agada der Talmuderie (Strassburg, 1884), p. 101, 128, 199, 255, 246, 267, 291, 441. (B. P.)

See Furst, Bibl. Jud., i, 52. (B. P.)

Jejeeboy, Sir James, a Parsee philanthropist, was born in Bombay, July 15, 1783. He made voyages between Bombay and China, and amassed a large fortune, possessing at his death about £4,000,000. As early as 1822 he released the debtors confined in the jail by paying their debts; and his donations to public objects were estimated at about £1,500,000. He received the honor of knighthood from Queen Victoria in 1842, and a gold medal in 1843. He endowed hospitals, schools, medical institutions, and other benevolent establishments. A school at Bombay for the education and support of poor Parsee children he endowed at an expense of £250,000. He built comfortable places of refuge for the convenience of travellers in various parts of the country, the causeway which unites the islands of Bombay and Salsette, the water-works at Poona, the bridges at Earla, Parta, and Bartba, and many other public works. In 1857 he was advanced to the dignity of a baronet. He died at Bombay, April 14, 1858. A statue was erected to his memory in the town-hall of Bombay, and exposed to view Aug. 1, 1859. Jejum (figure-trending) is a ceremony observed annually among the Japanese, of trampling upon the crucifix, and images of the Virgin Mary and other saints. It was designed to express the abhorrence of the Japanese for the religion which the Jesuits had tried to introduce into their empire. The images were about a foot long, cast in brass, and kept in a particular box for the purpose. The ceremony took place in the year 1855 in the presence of the Emperor. Each house was entered by turns, and the messengers carrying the box. The images were laid upon the bare floor, and the list of the household being called, they were required in turn to tread upon them. Young children, not yet able to walk, were held in their mothers' arms, so as to touch the images with their feet.

Jelf, Richard William, an English clergyman, was born in London in 1786, and educated at Oxford, where he graduated in 1820, and became a fellow of Oriel College and a tutor. In 1826 he became preceptor in the royal family. He was made canon of Christ Church in 1831, and principal lecturer to King's College, London, in 1844. He died in Oxford, Sept. 19, 1871. Among his published works are, Sermon, Doctrinal and Practical (1835);-The Means of Grace (Hampden Lectures, 1844); and a new edition of the Works of Bishop Jewell (1847-48, 8 vols.).

Jemina, the judge of the wicked after death, among the Japanese, who beholds in a large mirror all the most secret transactions of mankind. Intercession by the priests with Amidas in behalf of the sinner, and liberal presents on the part of his relatives, are sure to release him before the expiration of the allotted time for punishment. The figure of Jemina, the king of the devils, is in the temple; and on each side of him are two large devils, one acting as his secretary, and registering in a book all the sins of mankind, while the other dictates what the secretary is to record. This idol is situated in a temple of Jemina, a short distance from Miasco, in a delightful grove. The walls are covered with frightful pictures of torments which the wicked are supposed to undergo. This temple is resorted to by crowds of people from all parts of the country, with oblations and money in their hands, to redeem the souls from dreaited punishments. See Jana.

Jenichen, Gottlieb Friedrich, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born March 26, 1680, and died at Leipzig, Sept. 17, 1735, professor of ethics. He is the author of Handbuch der theologischenalen and praktischen Christenheit (Leipsic, 1714). See Handbuch der theolog. Lit., i, 632. (B. P.)

Jenings, Samuel, a distinguished minister of the Society of Friends, was born at Coleshill, Buckinghamshire, England, about 1650, and emigrated to New Jersey in 1680, having for some time been an approved minister in his denomination. Soon after his arrival he was appointed by governor Byllinge, of New Jersey, as his deputy. This position he occupied until 1689, when the Provincial Assembly chose him governor of the colony for one year. Up to the time of his removal to Philadelphia, in 1692, he occupied the highest offices in the province. In Pennsylvania his abilities were highly appreciated, and he was nominated to the commission of the peace. When the controversy arose with George Keith (q.v.) he became one of his most zealous and active opponents, and in the early part of 1694 sailed for London as respondent in the appeal of Keith to the London Yearly Meeting, where he ably vindicated the cause of his American brethren from the aspersions of their detractor. On returning from England he removed from Philadelphia to Burlington, his former home in New Jersey. In 1702 he was appointed a member of the Provincial Council, and in 1707 was elected speaker of the assembly, "in which station he distinguished himself by a bold and fearless opposition to the arbitrary misuse of the bigot-ed lord Cornbury." In his spiritual vocation we are told that he was "an able minister of the gospel, and labored much therein, to the comfort and edification of many people, both in the province of New Jersey and other places. He was one of those rare individuals in whom was concentrated a variety of qualifications and mental endowments, by which, under the sanctifying power of truth, he was made eminently useful to his fellow-men, both in his ministerial and civil capacity." He died at Burlington in 1708. See Bowden, Hist. of Friends in America, ii, 254. (J. C. S.)

Jenky, T. W., D.D., a Welsh Congregational minister, was born in South Wales in 1796. He gave early evidence of earnest piety; began to preach while in his youth, studied at Homerton College, and settled first at Oswestry in 1828. While in that border-town of his native country he published The Extent of the Atonement, by which he acquired both literary and theological celebrity, and which led to his being appointed to the theological chair, eventually to the presidency, of Coward College. Meanwhile he removed to Stafford, and there wrote and published On the Union of the Holy Spirit and the Church in the Consecration of the World. In 1837 he relinquished his charge in Stafford, and, proceeding to Germany, formed friendships with the distinguished theologians of that country. When Coward College was amalgamated with Highbury and Homerton colleges, in 1850, Dr. Jenky's services were no longer required. Being anxious to do good, he went to Rochester, to establish a new interest in that town; and after a short visit to America returned and labored there to his dying day, May 26, 1854. Dr. Jenky was social in his habits, an impassioned lover of music, and no less enthusiastic in his devotion to theological science. See (Lond.) Cbr. Year-Book, 1859, p. 263.

Jennings, Oradiah, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born near Baskegrudge, N. J., Dec. 13, 1778. He was educated at Jefferson College, Cannonsburg, Pa. He studied law for some years, and was admitted to the bar in 1800. He joined the Presbyterian Church in 1811, was licensed to preach in 1816, by the Presbytery of Ohio, and soon afterwards accepted a call to the Presbyterian Church in Steubenville, O., where he labored with great ability and success for six years, and then accepted a call to Washington, P.a. In 1828 he removed to Nashville, Tenn., where he remained till the close of his life, Jan. 12, 1832. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 349.

Jenny, Robert, L.L.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, son of archdeacon Jenny of Wanetong, in the north of Ireland, arrived in America in 1745, as a missionary of the Society for Propagating the Gospel, having been appointed assistant to the Rev. William Vesyey, rector of Trinity Church, New York city. In 1722 he was transferred to Nyc, and remained there until 1728, when he assumed charge of the church in Hempstead, L.I. In November, 1742, by license of the bishop of London, he became rector of Christ Church, Philadelphia, which post he held until the close of his life. His ministry covered fifty-two years. He died in January, 1762, aged seventy-five years. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 16.

Jericho. For a description of Tell es-Sultan, supposed to be the site of the ancient city, see the Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey (iii, 222). The following account of the locality in general is from Conder, Tent Work, ii, 2 sq.:

"Reaching Jericho we were again disappointed. The long groves, which appear so charming at a distance, are entirely composed of thorny shrubs. The doom or zippas grows into a tree, with small green leaves and formidable prickles; the sisk, another species, forms long hedges of brier, of which it is said the cruel 'crown of thorns' was woven, for which reason it is called spina Christi. Jervis, William Henley, a minister of the Church of England, was born in 1815, and educated at Harrow, where he won some of the first prizes in the school at the unusually early age of fifteen, and at Christ Church, Oxford, where he took a second class in 1835. He was for some years rector of St. Nicholas, Guildford, and held, up to his death, a prebendal stall at Heytesbury—abolished by recent legislation, so that the dignity died with him, Jan. 27, 1882. Mr. Jervis, who took his wife's name some years ago, was a son of the late Dean Pearson of Salisbury, and one of the three sons of Canon Beer of Rochester, near Rochester. To the general public he is best known as the author of a learned and interesting work on the History of the Church of France, from the Concordat of 1801 to the Close of the First Empire (London, 1872—82, 3 vols.). The hill is surrounded by a wall built of large blocks of fine conglomerate. Other rocks of a similar kind exist in the valley beneath." The place proposed by Schwarz is probably Ezhur, one and a half miles north-east of Surah (Zorah), and two and a quarter miles south-west of Kesia (Cheesalon), "a small village near the foot of the hill, with a well to the west, and olive-trees beneath." Jeshua (Ez-rue) BEN-JOSEPH, a Jewish writer of the 15th century, is the author of "Hamshah ha-Parchekei ha-Birahim," or a methodology of the Talmud (Constantinople, 1510, and often since). It was translated into Latin by L'Emiter, under the title, "Clarum Talmudicam" (Leyden, 1635); also by Bagurschen, "Clarum Talmudicam Maximarum" (Hanau, 1714); and by Streuer, "Logica Hebrewana Rudiimenta" (Jena, 1697). Jeter, Jeremiah Belt, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in Bedford County, Va., July 18, 1802. His early education was limited. He was converted in 1821; began to preach in 1822; was ordained May 4, 1824, at High Hills Church, Sussex County, where he remained about two years; then removed to Campbell County, and became pastor of the Hill's Creek and Union Hill churches. In the autumn of 1827 he was installed pastor of Morattico Church, in Lancaster County, and subsequently of the Wicomico Church, in Northumberland County. In the latter part of 1855 he was called to the pastorate of the First Baptist Church in Richmond, where for thirteen years and a half he was eminently successful. In the fall of 1849 he was called to the Second Baptist Church in St. Louis, where he remained three years, and then returned to Richmond to become pastor of the Grace Street Church. He resigned in 1870. He became the senior editor of the "Religious Herald," the leading organ of the Baptist denomination in the south, in 1866, and occupied that position till the close of his life, Feb. 18, 1880. Among the books of which he was the author were, "Memoirs of Rev. A. W. Claxton:" - "Memoirs of J. L. Shuck, Missionary to China." - "Memoirs of Rev. Andrew Broaddus:" - "Memoirs of Rev. Daniel Witt:" - "Campbellism Examined:" both of these works placing Dr. Jeter among the first polemic writers of his times. The "Christian Mirror" and the "Seal of Heaven" were published by the American Tract Society. See "Religious Herald," Feb. 26, 1880. (J. C. S.)

Jethiah. For this place Lieut. Conder suggests ("Travels," ii, 388) Beit Fil, a ruined site four and a quarter miles south-east of Yafe (Ajalon), containing "foundations and a Mukam" ("Memoirs to Ordnance Survey," iii, 80).

Jezreel. Zer'inn, the modern representative of this noted place, is briefly described in the "Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey" (ii, 88), but more graphically by Conder ("Travels," i, 124):

"Crossing the valley, we see before us the site of Jezreel, on a knoll five hundred feet high. The position is very peculiar, for while on the north and north-east the slopes are steep and rough, on the south the ascent is very gradual, and the traveller coming northwards is astonished to look down suddenly on the valley, with its two springs, one (Aiin Jilaf) welling out from a conglomerate cliff, and forming a pool about one hundred yards long, with muddy borders - the other (Aiin Tabba), the Crumender's Fountain of Tabbanah, where the Christian armies were fed miraculously for three days on the fish which still swarm in most of the great springs near. "The main road ascends from near these springs and passes by the 'Dead Spring,' which was reopened by the governor of Jaffa, and now forms a shallow pool between rocks of black basalt, covered with red and orange-colored lichen, and also full of little fish; thence it passes on the east side beneath the knoll of Jericho (Jezreel) to the plains on the south. Climbing up to the village, we are again struck by the absence of any traces of antiquity; the buildings, including the central tower, are all modern, and only the great mound beneath, and perhaps some of the ruinous cisterns, seem ancient; yet the site is..."

Jidan-Jombaya, in Lamanism, was a young, beautiful god, a Barchuan, assistant or friend of Jakhamunia, when the latter founded his religion. He usually is placed beside the statue of the supreme god in the Lama temple, and is represented as a very soft, feminine personage, with four arms, the body light-yellow color, the dress blue. Jidan-Jombaya was instructor of astrological and other secret sciences, and taught the wise men in these branches.

Jijela (or Jiemons), in Slavonic mythology, was a youthful goddess of hunting, comparable in many things to Diana of the Romans, but wanting the hostile attributes of the latter. She was regarded as a friendly companion, and as giving success in hunting. She subdues the wild animals, drives the reindeer within range of the hunter, and favors the most courageous and most worthy; hence many young people, whose family situations were not positively known, were called her sons and daughters, in case they were beautiful and daring. She is also said to have been the goddess of love, at least, she was implored by the Slavs for children, unless she mistook for the similarly named Jijola, who was worshipped as the goddess of marriage.

Jilabog was a Wendian and Slavic deity, representing the moon, with a half-moon on the breast, and the arms raised in the form of a half-moon. He was also a god of time (his name is from Jusa, "time"), because the Wends measured their time according to the moon.

Jinaas, saints among the Jainas (q.v.) in India. A saint is called a Jina, as being the victor over all human passions and propensities. He is supposed to possess thirty-six superhuman attributes, four of which regard his person; eleven refer to his supernatural powers, four are of his remaining unifier, as the celesti-alian origin, as the raining of flowers and perfumes, the sound of heavenly drums, and the menial offices rendered by Indra and the gods. The Jinas are twenty-four in number, and, although similar in their general character as national heroes, each one has a more complete color, stature, and longevity. Two of them are red, two white, two blue, two black, the rest are of a golden hue, or a yellowish brown. In regard to stature and length of life, they undergo a gradual decrease from Rishabha, the first Jina, who was five hundred poles in stature, and lived 8,400,000 great years, to Mahavira, the twenty-fourth Jina, who had degenerated to the size of a man, and was not more than forty years on the earth.

Jina (i.e. genie), according to the Mohammedans, intermediate race between angels and men. They are said to be made of fire, but with grosser bodies than the angels, to propagate their species, and, though longlived, not to be immortal; also to have inhabited the earth previous to Adam, under a succession of sovereigns.
Mohammed professed to be sent as a preacher to them as well as to men. In the Koran there is a chapter bearing the name, in which they are introduced as says:
"These among us who are upright and upright, and there are some among us who are otherwise;
we are of different ways, and we very thought that we could by no means frustrate God in the earth, neither could we escape him by flight; therefore, when we heard the direction, we believed therein. There are Moslems among us, and others who swerve from righteousness."

ate of Bohemia, was born June 19, 1798. In 1818 he was made bishop of Budweis, in Bohemia, and died Feb.

John of Valois, Saint and queen, was the daughter of Louis XI of France and Charlotte of Savoy, and was born in 1456. She was plain in face and somewhat deformed, and her father, who wished a son, treated her becomingly but with dislike instead. Once, on one occasion the king rushed into the room to kill her,and her life was only saved by the countess of Linières.
In her twelfth year Joan was married against her will to duke Louis of Orleans, who also treated her with coldness and contempt. Louis XI died in August, 1483, and the regency was vested in him as Charles VI, and the regency of his elder sister Anne. The husband of Joan, thinking the regency ought to have been intrusted to him, endeavored to stir up an insurrection, was sus-cessful, and fled to Francis II of Brittany the bitter foe of his brother. War broke out, and Joan stood out as an angel of peace and reconciliation between the contesting parties. Twice she obtained pardon for her captured husband, and he as often returned to his perfidy. After the death of Charles VIII, April 7, 1498, the duke of Orleans ascended the throne L. Louis XII. He at once obtained a divorce from pope Alexander VI, by taking an oath that his marriage with Joan was not complete. He gave her the duchy of Berry and Fontaine.
She resided at Bourges, where she spent time and revenues in the exercise of charity. In 1500 she founded the order of the Annunciatory for women. Joan took the habit herself in 1504, but died Feb. 4, 1506, and was buried at Bourges. Her body was torn from its resting place in 1562, and buried by Calvinists. She is commemorated in the French martyrology on Feb. 4. Her canonization began under Clement XII, and was completely finished by Pius VI, in 1766, in which last year was venerated at Bourges from the time of her death.

JOCELINE, a Scotch prelate, was elected bishop of the see of Glasgow in 1174, and consecrated by Echlin, archbishop of Lunden, in Denmark, June 1, 1175, in Charvalle. He died at Melrose in 1199. He enlarged the cathedral of Glasgow, and is said to have rebuilt it in the same state it continues, and dedicated it in 1197. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 235.

Jocelyn (or Joceline) of Wells, an early English prelate, was born and educated in Somersetshire, of which he became the bishop in 1208, and was the first to fix the title of Bath and Wells to the old see of Glaston. The monks of Glastonbury purchased their exemption from the territory of the see by pertaining with four manors to the new diocese of Wells. Jocelyn, with archbishop Langton, was banished on account of obstinacy against king John. After five years exile in France he returned to his see, and devoted himself to the beautifying and enriching of his cathedral. He erected some new prebends, and to the use of the chapter appropriated many science, increasing the revenues of the offices, and he gave three manors to the episcopal see. He, with Hugo, bishop of Lincoln, was the first founder of St. John's, in Wells, and at his own cost built a chapel at Wokey, and another at Wells. The cathedral of Wells was his masterpiece, however. He died Nov. 19, 1243. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), iii, 93.

Jocelyn, George Bemis, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at New Haven, Conn., Jan. 3, 1824. Shortly afterwards, with his parents, he removed to Cincinnati, and from thence, in 1830, to New Albany, Ind. He was converted at the age of fourteen. In 1842 he graduated at Indiana Asylum Seminary. He was licensed to preach in 1843, and in the same year was admitted to Indiana Conference, and appointed to Poiil Circuit. In 1844 he was sent to Rockport, where his health soon failed; at his own request he was discontinued, and, removing to Vincennes, Ind., opened a select school. A few months later in the same year he was placed in charge of the preparatory department of Vincennes University, which position he held till September, 1849, when he returned to New Albany and opened the De Pauw Female College. In 1853 he was elected professor of mathematics and natural science in Whitewater College, and in 1855 to the presidency of the same institution. Failure of health led him to spend 1858 as agent for a western railway company, and for the Northwestern University. In 1857 he was transferred to Muncie, Ind., and appointed to First Baptist Church, Des Moines; in 1859 to Zion Church, Burlington; and in 1861 was elected president of Iowa Wesleyan University at Mount Pleasant, serving meantime as pastor of University and Asbury Chapel. In 1864 he was elected president of Albion College, Mich., and transferred to that position in 1868. Re-signing his presidency in 1869, he was transferred to the Michigan Central and stationed at Division XIX.- 20

Street, Grand Rapids. In 1871 he was re-elected president of Albion College, which office he sustained till his death, Jan. 27, 1877. Dr. Jocelyn possessed large natural endowments, intellectual and spiritual, which he patiently and thoroughly cultivated, placing him in the foremost rank of instructors of his age. As a preacher he had few superiors in power of thought, perspicuity of style, and impressiveness of manner. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1877, p. 105; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Joel, David, a Jewish writer, was born at Schwerin, in the duchy of Posen, in 1818. After having completed his studies he was rabbi at Schwerin and then at Krotoschin. In 1873 he was called to the Talmudic chair of the Rabbinical Seminary at Breslau, where he died, Sept. 8, 1882. Joga, in Hinduism, is the world's age, according to which the whole Indian chronology is regulated. The earth, according to this system, stands 12,000 divine years, of which each contains 360 common years, together, 4,320,000 of our years. These 4,000,000 years are divided into four Jogas, which have their particular names. The first is called Krita-Joga, and lasts 4,320,000 divine years; the second, Treta-Joga, lasting 3,000 divine years; the third, Dwapar-Joga, lasting 2,000 divine years; and the last, Kali-Joga. In this we live, and it lasts 100,000 divine years. Between each of these Jogas there is a twilight period, after the first, of 800,000 divine years, after the second, of 600,000 divine years, after the third, of 400,000 divine years, and after the fourth, of 200 divine years. This entire period is called Mahab-Joga, or Sadr-Joga. 1000,000,000,000,000 years of our years, and this makes one day of Brahman. The night is equally long, together, 8,640,000,000,000,000. In this night all things are dissolved until Brahma wakes up and re-creates them. Such a Sadir-Joga, taken 860 times, forms a year of Brahman, namely, 3,110,400,000,000,000 of our years. Brahma lives 100 such years, namely, 311,040,000,000,000,000 years. After Brahma's death an equally long period of destruction follows. After 622,080,000,000,000,000 years Brahma comes to life again, and the circle of days and nights begin anew. The last-mentioned figure forms a day of Vishnu; 360 of these days form one of his years. His life lasts 100 such years, making a round sum of 22,354,800,000,000,000,000,000. Probably Shiva would have a still longer life had the Shivasites not made their god immortal.

eastern Buddha, and seems to be identical with Drooted.
He is represented as a child, wound about by an angry snake; although it seems not to be the child, but the snake, that is the evil demon, for Krishna killed the monstrous snake Kaalikai, as a child, by treading on its head.

Jogues, Isaac, a French Jesuit missionary, was born in Orleans, Jan. 10, 1607. He entered the Jesuit school at Rouen in 1624, studied theology in Paris, and took orders in 1636. He was sent as a missionary to Canada the same year, and reached Quebec July 2.
He labored earnestly among the Hurons and Dinmondies for several years. In 1649, in company with father Rene Gondouin, he went to Sault Ste. Marie to establish a mission among the Algouques. He returned to Quebec with a party of Hurons for supplies for the mission, and on his way back fell into an ambush of Iroquois, when almost the whole party was killed and Jogues taken prisoner. He was now subjected to the most cruel punishment, and afterwards condemned to death. He became aware of his impending fate through the Dutch citizens of Albany, and effected his escape. He made his way to New Amsterdam (New York), and from there sailed to Europe. He returned to Canada in 1644, and in 1646 went with M. Bourdon to confirm the peace in the Mohawk castles. Peace being established, he set out, Sept. 27 of the same year, to found a Mohawk mission, but was put to death by the Mohawks at Caughnawaga (now Fonda), N. Y., Oct. 16, 1646. A Life of Jogues, by the Rev. Felix Martin, appeared at Paris in 1875.

Johannsen, Johann Christian Gottberg, a Lu-

Holstein. In 1768 he was preacher at Glückstadt, was called in 1782 as pastor primarius of St. Peter's at Copenhagen, and died in 1806, doctor of theology. He pub-

John is the name of several early Scotch prelates:
1. Consecrated bishop of the see of Glasgow in 1115.
Succeeding to the see after he made a visit to the Holy Land. He rebuilt and adorned the cathedral church, and consecrated it in July, 1136; divided the diocese into two archaconacies of Glasgow and Tewitdale, set up the offices of dean, subdean, chancellor, treasurer, secrattary, chanter, and accesor, and settled a prebend upon each of them out of the donations he had received from the king. He was witness to a charter of St. David's to the monastery of Newbottle in 1140. He died May 28, 1147. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 292.
2. A monk of Sais, in Normandy, and bishop of the see of the Isles about 1181. See Keith, Scottish Bishops,
p. 49.
3. Consecrated (with Hugh) bishop of St. Andrews in 1178. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 12.
4. Bishop of Caithness in 1185, and witness to king William in a donation to the abbey of Kilmoun, at the time when Hugo was chancellor of the kingdom. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 206.
5. Bishop of Galloway in 1199. He became a monk of Holyrood House in 1200, and died in 1209. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 272.
He died in 1207. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 105.
7. Probably bishop of the Isles in 1226. See Keith,
Scottish Bishops, p. 299.
8. Bishop of Dunkeld in 1356, and was still such in 1365. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 84.

9. Probably bishop of the Isles about 1388. See
Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 504.
10. Bishop of Ross in 1420, and witness in the same year to a resignation made by William Graham of his earlship of Kersdale into the hands of Thomas, earl of Moray. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 109.
11. Bishop of the Isles about 1400, and privy-council-lord to king James IV, from whom he received the abbeys of Isolnachil in 1507. See Keith, Scottish Bishops,
p. 805.
12. Bishop of Argyile in 1499. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 298.

in 1524. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 806.

John of Chur (surnamed Rüberg). From the beginning of the 14th century we often meet in the mystic writings of South Germany with the name of Friends of God (q. v.). One of them was John of Chur, the son of a rich merchant. Suddenly arrested in a wild career, he gave himself up entirely to mystic contem-plations. He renounced all his fortune, to which he had fallen heir by the death of his father, and distributed it for benevolent purposes. He regarded suffering as a special gift of divine grace, and even evil thoughts, doubts, and all other forms of disease, he believed to be patiently endured rather than striven against, for they were dispensed by God. He taught that the perfect man "has become one with God, when he wants nothing else except what God wills." About the year 1357 he spoke of himself and his friends who were with him as one spirit into a society. From indications in his writings we conclude that Chur, or Coire, in the canton of the Grisons, Switzerland, was his native city. In 1365 he determined to separate himself from the bustle of the town, and in company with two friends, led by a little black dog, they went into a mountain, where they built a chapel. By and by they were joined by two others, and of these "five men," John of Chur speaks in a separate treatise. He probably died in 1382. His writings consist of letters and tracts. See Acquav., Het Klooster

John "the Constant," elector of Saxony (1252-32), one of the most zealous of the princely supporters of the Reformation, was born at Meißen, June 30, 1468.
He early imbibed a love for a military life, and in several campaigns under Maximilian I, against the Hungarians and Venetians, displayed great decision and courage. When the Reformation struggle began he was already fifty years of age, but followed it up from the very beginning, and with his son, John Frederick, soon became a follower of Luther, of whose sermons he often took notes. He bade the priests of his realm preach the gospel and administer the sacraments according to the institution of Christ. At the diet of Spires, in 1529, he openly espoused the cause of his father, in connection with the other evangelical princes.
He was threatened by a league of Catholic princes, formed at Breslau in 1529, with exile from his land and people unless he delivered up Luther and restored the old order of things. He expressed his refusal to comply by withdrawing his troops, which, however, he did not become necessary to use. At the second diet of Spires, in 1529, he signed a protest against the action of the majority, which forbade all religious innovations or discussions on the mass until the convention of an ecclesiastical council. He acknowledged obedience to the emperor, except where it conflicted with the honor of God and the salvation of souls. In 1536, his conduct was heroic. In spite of all personal annuities he stood firmly by the side of the evangelical princes and cities for six years, which forced upon the emperor the religious yearning of the Diet of Speyer, 3 November 1536, of the same year. Luther preached his funeral sermon from 1 Thess. iv., 13-16, and Melanchthon pronounced a memorial address soon after in Latin. Luther honored him as a pious, sincere prince. John was a man of peace, and yet a good friend to the Church. See Spalatin's Biography, in Meurer, Script. rerum Germ. iii., 1008 sq.; Ranke, Deutsche Geschichte im Zeitalter der Reformation, iii.; Greschel-Bittau, Geschichte des südbairischen Völkes und Staates, i. 419 sq.; Pfitt, Einleitung in die Augustana; Pfitt-Hertzog, Real-Encyklopädie, v.; Lichtenberger, Kalendar des Science Religionis, s. v. (B. G.)

John, patriarch of Constantinople, known for his connection with the measures of the emperor Michael Palæologus, looking to the union of Christendom. He at first refused his aid, and declared the Latins heretics, for which he was imprisoned. While in prison he found leisure to examine the older Greek classics, and to comprehend the dimensions of the Eastern and Western churches, and these investigations changed his mind. He was released and made patriarch, but after the death of the emperor retired to a monastery, in 1263. He was again restored, and again exiled, dying in 1269 in Byzantium. The Greek Church excludes his name from the number of the orthodox, but not the Latin Church; hence his writings are found in Leo Allatius's Græcia Antiqua, tom. i. ii. See Gass, in Pfitt-Hertzog, Real-Encyklopädie, s. v. (B. G.)

John of Darlington, an Irish prelate, was a native of Darlington, Durham, trained a Dominican, and a great disputator, opera omnia, ed. Cottrell (Paris). Henry III made him his confessor, "whom he valued more of the same kind than a prince used him in so conscientious an office." He afterwards became archbishop of Dublin, being the choice of pope John XXI., in order to settle impartially the rival claims of William de la Corner, king's chaplain, the choice of the prior and convent of Trinity Church, and of Fromund le Brune, the pope's chaplain, the elect of the dean and chapter of St. Patrick's. The pope set both aside. John was also collector of Peter's Pence in Ireland to pope John XXI., an event which involved his nativity. He wrote many books. Returning to England, he died in 1284, and was buried at Preaching Friars. See Fuller, Worthies of England, i. 486.

John of Flanders, a Flemish prelate, was the son of Guido, count of Flanders. He became at first procurator of St. Peter of Lille, and of St. Donatian of Bruges. Nicholas III provided him with the bishopric of Metz, Jan. 1, 1290, but he neglected the duties of that charge, and only took its revenues to acquire grounds at Flanders. After a short time he was appointed bishop of Liege, and took possession of his new church, Oct. 31, 1292. In 1293 he got into difficulties with the sheriffs of Liege, and left the city, taking with him his clergy, and retiring into the borough of Huy. His exile lasted twenty-two months. After his return to Liege he made a league with his brother-in-law, the bishop of Brou, against Reginald of Guelders. In 1298, while hunting, according to the custom of those times, he was seized and imprisoned for five months, until he paid a ransom. He died Oct. 14, 1292. He published, in 1297, Syndal Statutes, collected by D. Martine, Theol. Medic. iv. 829. See Hoefer, Real-Encyklopädie, s. v. (B. G.)

John of the Grate (so-called from an iron grating which surrounded his sepulchre), Saint, bishop and confessor, was a Breton, born in 1098. He made rapid progress in his studies, and was made bishop of Alet. As a bishop his life was emblazoned by a series of lawsuits at the court of Marmoutiers. He wished to remove his episcopal see to the island of St. Malo, Alet being exposed to pirates. But the monks claimed the Church of St. Malo, the pope decided in their favor, and Lucius II. at length condemned John to lose his see. He then retired under the protection of St. Bernard in Clairvaux, until, on the death of Lucius (Enguerrand III) was elevated to the papal throne. John appealed again and was heard. His rights were restored, and the monks of Marmoutiers were obliged to cede the Church of St. Malo to the bishop. It was during his bishopric that the strange heresy of the fanatical Eon de l'Étoile (q. v.) broke out, and he tried by persuasion and instruction to disabuse of their heresy such of the enthusiasts as overran his diocese, and succeeded in converting many. John of the Grate died Feb. 1, 1163. He immediately received popular reverence as a saint, and numerous miracles are said to have augmented the reverence of the people. In 1517 Denis Brignonet, ambassador of the king to Rome, obtained from Leo X permission for him to be commemorated in a solemn office as a confessor bishop. Monignor Antoine Joseph de Launay, last bishop of St. Malo but one, John Real, is of the same opinion. During the revolution they were ordered to be cast into the sea, but the order was countermanded, and the sexton was required to bury them in the common fosse in the cemetery. In November, 1790, M. Manet, a priest who had remained throughout the Reign of Terror, washed the bones of John of St. Malo, verified the relics. In a sealed box, March 7, 1825, they were deposited in their ancient shrine, and Nov. 16, 1839, by the sanction of the pope, they were finally installed with great ceremony, and are now in the Church of St. Malo. The authorities for the life of John of the Grate are Albertinus Magnus of Morlaix, and the letters of Bernard and Nicholas of Clairvaux. His festival is observed as a double by the Church of St. Malo, in Brittany, and his name appears in Sesse's supplement to the Gallican martyrology. See Baring-Gould, Lives of the Saints, ii. 26 (sub Feb. 1, his day).

John, a metropolitan of Kiew, was raised to that dignity in 1164 by the patriarch of Constantinople, Lucas Chrysophaergus. He is famous for his letter to pope Alexander III. of which a rare book entitled Kievolos (Moscow, 1644) gives some extracts. John died May 12, 1166. See Hoefer, Nomina Bish. Generalis, s. v.

John of Monmouth (so called from the place of his birth), archbishop of St. Andrews. He was chosen bishop of Llandaff in 1296, after a vacancy in that see of seven years, the pope remitting the election to archbishop Kilwinry, who called John of Monmouth. He became a great benefactor to the bishopric, procuring for it, among other revenues, the rectory of Newland. He was a learned and pious theologian. He died April 8, 1323. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), ii. 434.

John Baptist of Salema, a Jesuit, and friend of pope Clement XI. was born in 1670. He accompanied the nephew of the pope, Alband, to Germany and Poland as theological adviser, and succeeded in converting Frederick Augustus of Saxony to the Church of Rome. In acknowledgment of this deed John Baptist was made cardinal, and died in 1729. He is the author of Specimen Orientalis Ecclesiae (Rome, 1706). See Lichtenberger, Encyclopedia des Sciences Religieuses, vii. 138.

John Frederick (summarized the Magnanime), elector of Saxony, son of John the Constant (q. v.), was born at Orgau, June 30, 1563. Brought up in the Church of the Reformation, he became its unwavering advocate, and, like his father, he was on terms of most intimate friendship with Luther, with whom he carried on an uninterrupted correspondence. He was a great benefactor to the endowment of Wittenberg University from the sequestered revenues of convents, and in 1548 founded the University of Jena. His relations to the emperor were unpleasing. In 1586 he entered into a reaffirmation of the Smalcald league, by which the Protestant princes bound themselves to mutual protection for ten years. In 1544 the emperor Charles V was left free to give his whole attention to the affairs in Germany. A war broke out in 1546 between the United Provinces and the retaken prisoner at Muhlburg, April 24, 1547. He remained in prison till 1552, and died at Weimar, March 3, 1564. John Frederick remained true to the cause of the Evangelical Church in spite of his many misfortunes. JOHNS, Timothy, D.D., a Presbyterian minister of Welsh extraction, was born at Southampton, L. I., May 24, 1717. He graduated from Yale College in 1737, was ordained by the New York Presbytery, Feb. 9, 1743, pastor at Morristown, N. J., and had great success in his ministry there, which closed with his death, Sept. 17, 1794. In 1777 general Washington, on one occasion, composed a poetical ballad with his congregation while in the vicinity. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iii, 16. (W. P. S.)

JOHNS, Henry Van Dyke, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at New Castle, Del., in 1868, being the youngest son of the Hon. Kenton Johns, chief justice of Delaware and United States senator. He graduated from Princeton College, afterwards studied at the General Theological Seminary, N. Y., and continued his theological studies under the direction of his brother, bishop Johns of Virginia. His ministry began at Wilmington, Del.; he was for a time rector of the Church at Frederick, Md.; thence he was called to Trinity Church, Washington, D. C.; subsequently to Cincinnati, O.; then to the rectory of Christ Church, Baltimore, Md., where he continued until 1853, when Emanuel Church was built by a portion of his congregation, and he became its rector, a position which he occupied until his death, April 22, 1859. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1859, p. 352.

JOHNS, John, D.D., LL.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at New Castle, Del., July 10, 1796. He graduated from the College of New Jersey in 1819; studied one year at Princeton Theological Seminary; in his eighteenth year joined the Protestant Episcopal Church, and, June 10, 1819, was ordained deacon, and in 1820 presbyter. His first parish was All-Saints' Church, Frederick, Md., and in 1829 he became rector of old Christ's Church, in Baltimore. In 1857 a new church was erected, called the Church of the Messiah, of which he was rector until he became assistant bishop of the diocese of Virginia, May 21, 1842. In 1849 he was elected president of William and Mary College, where he remained until 1854. He died at Alexandria, Va., April 5, 1876. He was a leader of the Evangelical side of his Church, and commanded admiration from men of all shades of opinion by the purity of his life and the sincerity of his convictions. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1877, p. 12.

JOHNSON, George Henry Sacheverell, an eminent Anglican clergyman and mathematician, was born at Hambledon, about 1668. He graduated from Queen's College, Oxford, in 1688, obtained several scholarships and a tutorship therein, became professor of astronomy in 1689, of moral philosophy from 1692 to 1645, preacher at Whitehall in 1692, dean of Wells in 1694, and died Nov. 6, 1701. He published a Treatise on Optics (1686) — Sermone (1687) — and wrote the annotations on the Psalms in the Speaker's Commentary. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1877, p. 12.

JOHNSON, Samuel, a Unitarian writer, was born at Salem, Mass., Oct. 10, 1822. He graduated from Harvard College in 1843, and from Harvard Divinity School in 1846; became pastor of a "Free Church" at Lynn in 1853; in 1870 removed to Salem, and in 1876 to North Andover, where he died, Feb. 19, 1882. Although not an ordained minister, he was intimately associated with the humanitarian tendencies of modern education, an ardent opponent of slavery and abolitionism; writing eloquently on kindred subjects of reform. He published A Book of Hymns (1846) — The Worship of Jesus (1865) — and Oriental Religions (his principal work, vol. i, Boston, 1872).

JOHNSON, Samuel R., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, graduated from the General Theological Seminary, 1826, and has for many years a professor of systematic divinity there, and a prominent member and secretary of the standing committee of his diocese. In 1872 he became rector of St. Thomas's Church, Amenia Union, N. Y., and died Aug. 18, 1873. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1874, p. 188.

JOHNSON, William L., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was a graduate of the General Theological Seminary, rector in Jamaica, L. I., for at least eighteen years, and died there, Aug. 4, 1870, aged eighty years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1871, p. 116.

JOHNSON, John, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Orange County, N. Y., Jan. 10, 1819. He graduated from the College of New Jersey in 1801; studied theology privately in Princeton; was licensed by the New Brunswick Presbytery in October, 1806. In 1807 he accepted a call to the united congregations of Newburgh and New Windsor, N. Y. In 1810 he was released from the congregation of New Windsor, but remained as pastor at Newburgh until his death, Aug. 26, 1855. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 394.

JOHNSON, William O., D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Ireland, April 17, 1822, but received his education in this country. He was pastor of the Kansas City Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, Pa., for more than thirty years, and his services in every department of Church work were constant and uniting. He died suddenly, Jan. 16, 1888. See (Phila.) Presbyterian, Jan. 20, 1888. (W. P. S.)

JOHNSTONE, Of Tell Kermim, the modern representative of this place, a brief account may be found in the Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey (ii, 48), and of the few remaining antiquities (p. 69). A brief description is given by Lieut. Conder (Teni Work, i, 131).

"North of Lelouf the great Wady el-Milh runs down from the white plateau of the 'Breezy Land,' which separates it from the southern end of Carmel. Here at the mouth of the river Tell el-Milh or Mount carmel, which are remains of a little Byzantine chapel, and of a small fort erected by the famous native chief Dhuram 'Amr. The Samaritans have a curious legend connected with this site. According to them Job was challenged by the Magi, and encouched here with his army in seven walls of iron. A dove carried his message thence to Nebi, king of the tribe east of Jordan, who came to his assistance. The magic walls fell down, and the king of Persia, Shobak, was transfixed by an arrow which nailed him on his horse to the ground. "The present name is a slight modification of the ancient Jokneam of Carmel, but the Crusaders seem to have given it a new origin, and transformed Kelmou into Calmous, or Monti Calm, whence the curious legend that Calm was here slain with an arrow by Lamech, which was not proved to be the murder referred to in the Song of Lamech (Gen. iv. 23). The chapel no doubt shows the spot once held to be the site of the death of Calm, but the derivation of the name was as fanciful as that of Halsa from Cephas or from Calaphas the high-priest."

JOKTHEEL of JUDAH. For this town Tristram proposes (Bible Places, p. 40) Kerheret Mechererith, near Gates. The nearest word is the Arabic equivalent of the Hebrew," and a writer in the Quart. Statement of the Pal. Explor. Fund (January, 1881, p. 53) proposes the "large ruin Kellthouf, south of Gezer, as the words are from similar roots." But both these identifications are very precarious. Jones, Alexander, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at Charleston, S. C., Nov. 8, 1796. He graduated from Brown University in 1814; pursued his theological studies under the direction of bishop Griswold, at Bristol, R. I.; took charge of a school for some years in Barstowt, Ky.; was ordained deacon in 1822, and in the same year became rector of Zion Church, in Charleston, Va.; in 1851 of St. Paul's Church, in Richmond, and afterwards was settled as rector of St. Peter's Church, in Perth Amboy, N. J., where he remained seventeen years (1857-74); and then having a stroke of paralysis, he was obliged to abandon all ministerial labor. He died at Perth Amboy, Feb. 15, 1874. "He had a high rank among the clergy of the Episcopal Church for scholarship and useful service, and was a gentleman of genial manners and refined taste." (J. C. S.)

Jones, Arthur, D.D., a Welsh Congregational minister, was born at Llanrwen, Denbighshire, Feb. 12, 1776. He was converted when about eighteen years of age, joined the Calvinistic Methodists, and soon became an exhorter and preacher. He was ordained at Bangor in 1810, where he labored earnestly as pastor; in 1815 he removed to the Welsh churches at Deesport and Woolwich, Kent; in 1823 he returned to his former charge; in 1854 he retired to a private life, and died, Feb. 25, 1860. He published several tracts and sermons, besides his work entitled, Fygioian Athrouvithour (doctrinal points). See (London) Cong. Year-book, 1861, p. 215.

Jones, Inigo, an eminent English architect, was born in London in 1572. He went to Venice and studied the works of Palladio, and his reputation procured him the appointment of chief architect to Christian IV, king of Denmark, who, in 1606, brought Jones with him to England. He was induced to remain, and was appointed architect to the queen, and subsequently to Henry, prince of Wales. He invented many ingenious decorations and wonderful machines. Among his works are the palace of lord Pembroke, at Wilton, in the county of Wilts; the queen's chapel, st. James; the façade of Holyrood House; and Heriot's Hospital, Edinburgh. He died in London, July 21, 1652. A collection of Inigo Jones's architectural designs was engraved by Knyff and Hollar after drawings by Kent in 1722 and 1724. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Jones, John Collier, D.D., an English divine, was born at Plymouth, Devonshire, Oct. 7, 1770. He graduated from Exeter College, Oxford, June 6, 1792, and was ordained the same year a fellow of Merton College. Entering holy orders, he became curate of Mortlake, in Surrey, but afterwards accepted a chaplaincy on board the Namur, and was present in the action off Cape St. Vincent, in 1797. In 1808 he became one of the tutors of his college; in 1812 a public examiner; select preacher in 1819; and on the death of Dr. Coke, was appointed to the rectorslp of Exeter. Dr. Jones's other official appointments were, delegate of accounts in 1824; vice-chancellor from October, 1828, to 1832; and joint curator of the Sheldonian Theatre in 1829. He was also vicar of Kidlington, and an acting magistrate for the county of Oxford. He died in 1836. His indefatigable integrity, gracefulness of manner, and kindness of disposition won for him the esteem and love of all with whom he came in contact. See (Lond.) Christian Remem- brancer, Sept. 1836, p. 568.

Jones, John Emlyn, L.L.D., a Welsh Baptist minister, was born near Newcastle Emlyn, Carmarthenshire, Jan. 8, 1820. He was baptized at the age of thirteen, and received a good education; was ordained in 1842 co-pastor at Pontypredil; was then pastor in Eldow Vale; then in Cardif; in 1865 removed to Merthyr; in 1869 to Llan- dudno, North Wales, and finally returned to Eldow Vale, where he died, Jan. 18, 1873. He was ever busy with his pen, as with his tongue, contributing largely to both the Welsh and the English newspaper press. He published Welsh translations of Gitia's Commentary and Hamilton's Grammar. He wrote Hanes Prydwen Ffer a myn yr Henerol o Dentref anghen ("The History of Great Britain for the Past Half Century"). For several years he was busily engaged in writing his Y Parha bifyll, Sefy, Hener y Holl Fyd ("The History of the Whole World"), one volume of which was published. See (Lond.) Baptist Handbook, 1864, p. 282. (J. C. S.)

Jones, Samuel Beach, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Charleston, S. C., Nov. 22, 1811. He studied at Yale College; spent four years in Princeton Theological Seminary (1832-36); acted one year as assistant secretary of the Board of Missions; was ordained in 1837; became professor of Hebrew in the Oakland Seminary, Miss., in 1838; was in 1844 the first Presbyterian Church at Bridgeport, N. J., from 1839 to 1864; preached in Fairfield from 1870 to 1875, and died at Bridgeport, March 19, 1883. See (N. Y.) Observer, March 22, 1883. (W. P. S.)

Jones, Thomas (1), D.D., an Irish prelate, was born in Lancashire, and educated at Christ College, Cambridge. His first promotion was to the chancellorship of St. Patrick's Cathedral; in 1851 he was elected its dean; in May, 1854, dean Jones was promoted to the see of Meath, and on May 12 was consecrated in St. Patrick's Church. Having presided over that see twenty-one years, he was transferred to that of Dublin in 1865, and was consecrated Nov. 9 of the same year. In 1861, he, and the other archbishops of the Established Church, held a council in Dublin, wherein it was decreed that the suffragans should reside in their respective dioceses, visit all the churches, and institute such regulations as would best be calculated to prevent sectarianism and extirpate popery. In 1813 he was one of the justices in commission with sir Richard Wingfield. In 1814 he had a grant of the temporalities of the bishoprics of Kilmore and Ardagh during vacancy. Being the episcopacy of archbishop Jones he repaired a great part of Christ Church. He died at his palace of St. Sepulchre's in April, 1819. See D'Alton, Memoirs of the Archbishops of Dublin, p. 250.

Jones, Thomas (2), an English divine, was born near Harrow, Middlesex, London, April 2, 1752. He was educated at the grammar-school of Yatradineging, and ordained in the harvest year 1774. He lived at Langleevin and Eglwyssach from 1774 to 1778, he removed to Leintwardine, Herefordshire, England, thence to Loughor, Glamorgan, and from this place to Oswestry. His next curacy was Lopponing; and in 1785 he was appointed to the living of Creation, Northumberland, where he remained till the increasing infirmities of age obliged him to resign his office in 1838. He died Jan. 7, 1845. His works are, Jonah's Portrait (1818, 12mo; 9th ed. 1846, 8vo); — Scripture Directors...

Joppa. Of the modern Yafa (called Jaffa by the Europeans) a tolerably full account is given in the Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey (ii, 275 sq.); and the description by Lieut. Conder (Test Work, i, 1 sq.) contains some interesting particulars:

"The town rose from the shore on a brown hillock; the dark, flat-roofed houses climbing the hill one above another, but no prominent building breaking the sky outline. The yellow, gleaming beach, with its low cliffs and sand-dunes, stretched away north and south, and in the distance the dim blue djeddeh hills were visible in shadow.

"Jaffa is called the port of Jerusalem, but has no proper harbor at present. In ancient times the 'Moon Pool,' south of the town, now silted up, was perhaps the landing-place for Hiero's rafts of cedars-wood; but the traveller passes through a narrow opening in a dangerous reef running parallel with the shore, or, if the weather be bad, he is obliged to make a long detour round the northern end of the same reef. By ten in the morning the land breeze rises, and a considerable swell is therefore always to be expected. The entrance through the reef is only sufficient for one boat, and thus every year boats are wrecked on the rocks and lives lost. It is said that each year at least one person is killed by the sharks close to land. The little Russian steamer was anchored about two miles from shore, and pulled considerabily. The decks were crowded with a motley assemblage, specimens of every Levantine nationality. Each deck passenger had his bedding with him, and the general effect was that of a great rag-bag, with human faces—black, brown, and white—arranged and umbrellas sticking out of the rags in unexpected places. Apart from this, a sort of dress is worn by the Bedouins, with their huge head-shawls, not unlike a canvas Belle in effect, bound with a white cord round the brow. They wore their best dress, the black hair cloak, with red slippers. The rugged dark faces with white beards and sun-roughed eyes wore a curious mixed expression of assumed dignity and hidden curiosity concerning the wonders of civilization surrounding them. The coloring of these various groups would have been a treat to an artist. The dull rich tints were in sharp and there by patches of red leather and yellow silk. Like all Oriental colors, it was saved from any gaudiness of effect by the large masses of dull brown or indigo which predominated. The steamer was soon beset by a fleet of long, fat boats with sturdy rowers, and into these the passengers were precipitated, and their luggage dropped in after them. This was the end of the danger of being capsize below the accommodation-ladder. As we rowed off, and sank in the trough of the waves, our boat turned and we all ran through the shallows of the Near East, were visible high up on the crest of the hills, and not far from the tents the men of the garrison were at ease; the women closed their eyes, the rowers got into a regular swing, chanting a rude rhyme, and, waiting for the wave, we were surprised to see the ugly black rocks to smooth water close to the wharf. The landing at Jaffa has been from time immemorial an exciting spectacle for the feasts of the Dead Sea, and the old pilgrims (Sawmif) who, from his sins or from the bed of the dead ten, are waked up by the sound of the bells when you awake in the south of the shore of the Dead Sea, helps us to a great storm in the offing. We have now the account of the Nile toll. As the surf breaks on the rocks and the surf fighting on the shore. The little port made by the reef has been long the only deep place south of Acre where landing was possible; but the storms which have covered the beach with modern wrecks were equally fatal to the Mediterranean.

"The town of Jaffa contains little of interest, though it is sufficiently striking to a new-comer. The broad effects of light and shadow are perhaps enhanced here by the numerous arched streets and the height of steps which climb from the sea-level to the higher part of the town. The houses of Jaffa are cut in the wall, which stretch inland about a mile and a half, and extend more than a mile along the promontory. There are thick groves surrounded by old cacti, hedges, and the wild vines between them deep in sand. Sweet water is found in abundance at a moderate depth. The west of the oranges is said to be at times perceptable some 100 feet high on the base of the cliffs, which rise 100 feet above the sea. The oranges are the fruits of the oranges of the oranges. How this African wanderer can have made his way across districts entirely unfitted for his tribe, to produce oranges and olives, is easy to explain."

"Outside the town on the north-east is the little German colony of the white houses of which were built originally by an American society which was almost exterminated by fever. They have been broken up by internal differences, caused, I understand, by some resemblance in the views of the chief of the Brigham Young. The German society has been bought in by the German settlers, members of the Temple Society, with the view of bringing in settlers to form a new town."

The soil of the Jaffa plain is naturally of great fertility. Even the negligence of the peasants produces fine harvests. The Germans ploughed deeper, and were rewarded by a crop of billows, which to a good farmer would have been a subject of satisfaction as proving the existence of virgin soil, only requiring to be worked up by inheritance. At this time of the year, the barley had been gathered in, and only the dry stubble was left.

JORDAENS, JAXON, an eminent Flemish painter, was born at Brussels, 1584, studied with Adam van Oort, and copied the pictures of Titian and Veronese. He was employed by the king of Spain to do some important work. His paintings are very numerous, and abound in the churches and public edifices of the Netherlands. Some of the most celebrated are St. Apollinaire, in the church of the Augustines at Antwerp; Christ Disputing with the Doctors, in that of St. Walburg at Furnes; The Triumphal Entry. He died at Antwerp, Oct. 18, 1678. There are a few other etchings by him, among which are the following: The Flight into Egypt; Christ Driving the Money-changers from the Temple; The Desert from the Cross. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

JORDAN VALLEY. We extract some interesting particulars on this, the one great river of the Holy Land, from Lieut. Colonel's Text Work in Palestine, (ii, 50 sq.), which well summarizes the facts known in clear and compact form. (See map on following page.)

"The Jordan Valley is not only the most remarkable feature of Palestine, but one of the most curious places in the world. It has a perfect counterpart, nowhere, and the extraordinary phenomenon of clouds blowing as a rule below the level of the Jordan, while in the west, and some few European eyes have seen, but which we witnessed in the early storms of the spring of 1874.

"The Jordan rises as a full-grown river, issuing from the cave at Banias, about 1000 feet above the level of the Mediterranean. In the short distance of twelve miles it has fallen not less than 500 feet, passing through the cliffs of marl, and reaching the Jabbok Lake. This lake is four miles long, and from its southern extremity to the north end of the Sea of Galilee is a distance of only about a mile and a half; the second lake has been determined, by our line of levels, as being 600 feet below the level of the Jordan in the lake, and a half miles there is a fall of 1000 feet, or more than sixty feet to the mile.

"The Sea of Galilee is twelve and a half miles long, and thence the Jordan flows sixty-five miles, measuring in a straight line (the bend makes it a good deal more) a distance of above 70 miles on the land, and a distance of 40 miles from the Sea of Galilee to the Dâmeh ford is a distance of forty-two miles, and a fall of only 400 feet. From the Dâmeh ford to the mouth of the lake are twenty miles, with sixty feet fall, and thence to the Dead Sea, with ninety feet fall.

"It will be seen from the above that the total direct length of Jordan is about 104 miles, or only half the length of the Nile; but the fall to the Sea of Galilee over sixty feet to the mile; thence to the Dâmeh, at first forty feet, afterwards not quite sixteen feet per mile; from the Dâmeh to the ‘Anjez not more than four and a half feet to the mile; and for the last ten miles, about nine feet per mile. The break down of the immense chasm may thus be said to be made in its greatest intensity in the Sea of Galilee.

"The valley may be divided into eight sections. First, the portion between Bantous and the Huleh, where it is some five miles broad, with steep cliffs some 2000 feet high on either side, except where the road cuts through the sea. From the Huleh to the Sea of Galilee, where the stream runs close to the eastern hills, and about four miles from the base of the cliffs, and in which there are many high bared mountains, there is 800 feet above the lake.

"By the Sea of Galilee to the neighborhood of Beîlân, the valley is only one and a half miles broad west of the river, and about three feet of water, the bed is a dry bed; then, as it enters the Beîlân, the valley is only one and a half miles wide at the river, and about three feet of water; the bed is a dry bed; then, as it enters the Beîlân, the valley is only one and a half miles wide at the river, and about three feet of water. The bed is a dry bed; then, as it enters the Beîlân, the valley is only one and a half miles wide at the river, and about three feet of water. The bed is a dry bed; then, as it enters the Beîlân, the valley is only one and a half miles wide at the river, and about three feet of water. The bed is a dry bed; then, as it enters the Beîlân, the valley is only one and a half miles wide at the river, and about three feet of water. The bed is a dry bed; then, as it enters the Beîlân, the valley is only one and a half miles wide at the river, and about three feet of water.
Angerboe, also the sister of the wolf Fenris and the blue Hela. The gods threw Jormungandi into the ocean, where she grew so as to encircle the earth. When she drinks, there is low tide; when she gives back the water again, it is high tide. Thus she will live until Ragnarok (world's end) comes. Thor will then slay her with his midsnær, or hammer, but will himself be drowned in the poisonous streams issuing from her mouth.

Jose ben-Chalifte (surnamed the thinker), a Jewish rabbi, was born at Sepheria, in Palestine, about the year 80 A.D. Involved in the political schemes of Rabbi Akiba (q.v.), he was obliged, in the year 124, to save himself from the Roman sword by fleeing to Asia Minor, from whence, on the death of the emperor Hadrian, in 136, he returned to Sepheria, and died as the head of a school in that place, in 150. Jose's life is said to have been an edifying example of moral conduct, diligence in acquiring and communicating knowledge, and an amiable modesty and humility. "I would rather," said he, "be a learner in a school than be founder of the school. I would rather, in the fulfilment of my duty, die a bitter death, than be infamous in the too well beaten way. I would rather overdo my duty than fail in it. I would rather collect for the poor than, by distributing among them, gain consideration for myself. I would rather be unjustly blamed, than really do what is wrong." Jose is the author of a historical work, which has been preserved, and is possessed of lasting interest, the Seder Olam (q.v.). Joseph ben-Joschua ben-Meir (surnamed Has-Sefard, i.e. "the Spaniard"), was born in 1496 at Avignon, whither his father had retired on leaving Spain. He is the author of a historical work, entitled Chronicles of the Kings of France and the Ottoman Sovereigns, in two parts, the first from the JOSEPHINISM. Under this term we generally understand those ecclesiastical reforms which were introduced by Joseph II, German emperor from 1780 to 1790. It was Joseph's object to form a national Austrian Church, congruent with the territory of the state, closely connected with the strongly centralized secular government, and as far as possible independent of Rome. As on many points along the boundaries, Austrian dominions ranged under the authority of foreign bishops, a new bishop was placed in the diocese of Vienna, and it was carried out with little ceremony. A new oath of subjection to the temporal ruler was demanded of the bishops. All imperial decrees were sent to the bishops, and again by them to the pastors, who had to mark them over to their flocks from the pulpit. On the other hand, no papal bulls or briefs could be published in the country without an imperial "place." Connected with this movement was the education of the clergy. The theological students were forbidden to visit the "Collegium Germanico-Hungaricum" in Rome, which institution was replaced by the "Collegium Germanicum et Hungaricum" at Pavia. The philological and theological schools in the monasteries were closed, and diocesan seminaries were opened under the superintendence of an imperial committee. For the divine service Latin was prescribed, and the Latin was abolished. Pilgrimages outside of the country were forbidden. Rules were given in respect to the luxurious ornamentation of the churches, the magnificent processions, the brilliant illuminations. All religious orders not engaged in teaching, teaching, or nursing the sick, were dissolved. Between 1780 and 1786 the number of monasteries sank from 2186 to 1425, and that of monks and nuns from 64,890 to 44,280. On Oct. 15, 1781, an edict of religious toleration was promulgated, according to which the Evangelicals of the Augsburg Confession obtained the full freedom of worship. Civil disqualifications arising from denominational differences were abolished. Even the position of the Jews was improved. Previous to that edict of toleration, on May 4, 1781, an imperial decree had enacted that the oath of obedience to the pope, and the "Profession jedes Trinitat," usual at the distribution of degrees, were abrogated, and that the bulls "In censa Domini" and "Unigenitus" were to be torn out of the books of the liturgy. The Roman curia became, of course, greatly alarmed at these proceedings, and in January 1782, pope Pius VI went in person to Vienna. He was politely received without affecting any change, and the more so as the emperor had the support of the most influential prelates of Austria-Hungary. Joseph, however, died Feb. 28, 1790, and his early death prevented his reforms from taking root. During his immediate successors the old order was again revived. Josephites is the name of a congregation of missionary priests of St. Joseph, organized at Lyons in 1566, by a certain Croiset, a native of Champlotte, in Burgundy, and a surgeon by profession, who consecrated himself to the service at the hospital in Lyons. The first object of these priests was to act as missionaries in the country, and then to engage in charitable works in the different colleges. There exists also an organization of females, known as "Sisters of St. Joseph," which was instituted by the bishop of Puy in 1650. These sisters, besides doing charitable works, have to care for the hospitals, govern the houses of refuge, and are charged with the instruction of orphans and little children in the schools, and with visiting the sick. Their vows are very simple, and they can always be relieved from them by the bishop in whose diocese they live. See Helyot, Hist. des Ordres Monast., viii. 186 sq.; Lichtenburger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Joseph's Tomb (Koub Yair) is briefly described in the Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey, ii. 194, and more popularly in Lieut. Couder's Test Work, ii. 74, as follows:

"About six hundred yards north of the well of Jacob is the traditional tomb of Joseph, venerated by the members of every religious community in Palestine. The building stands on the road from Balata to Ascalon, at the end of a row of fine fig-trees. The enclosure is square and roofless, the walls whitewashed and in good repair, for, as an inscription on the south wall, in English, informs the visitor. It was rebuilt by Mosul Rogers, the friend of the Samaritans, in 1858. It is about twenty-five feet square, and on the north is another building of equal size, but older and partly ruined, surmounted by a little dome. The tomb is that of a sepulcher of the most ancient date, and of the Messiahlogenia a long block, with an arched or vaulted roof having a pointed crown, and inclosed by a wall, on which three Jews were seated at the time of our second visit, book in hand, swinging backwards and forwards as they crouched on a small bench—a practice doubtless appropriate to the place.

"The most curious point to notice is, however, the existence of two pillars, one on the north, and one directly opposite on the south, at the foot of the tomb, having shallow cupshaped hollows at their tops. These hollows are blackened by fire, for the Jews have the custom of burning sacrifices on them, small articles, such as handkerchiefs, gold lace, or shawls, being consumed. Whether this practice is also observed by the Samaritans is doubtful.

The tomb points approximately north and south, thus being at right angles to the direction of Moslem tombs north of Mecca. How the Mohammedans explain this disregard of orientation is so respected a prophet as our Lord Joseph; and such is our very beautiful, and perhaps the rule is held to be only established since the time of Mohammed. The veneration in which the shrine is held by the Moslem priesthood is, at all events, not diminished by this fact."

Joshua's Tomb. Lieut. Conder gives the local traditions on the subject as follows (Test Work, i. 78):

"The 'Holy King Joshua' is said to have been buried near Kef Hare, which lies 2 miles south of Timnath Hees. This village is nine miles south of Nablus.

"The Jewish pilgrim, rabbi Jacob of Paris, visited Caphar Cheere—presumably Kef Hare—in A.D. 1655, and mentions the tomb of the saint. The same place, and Caleb and Samaria, in the following letter of Samuel of Caphar Cheere, which he addressed to his friend, the rabbinic scholar, Chaim Meir of Damascus. The letter states the site of these tombs, both placing them within the bounds of Samaria. The crusading writers point to the same site for Joshua's tomb, and the Jowett, William, a Church of England divine, was born in 1789. He graduated at St. John’s College, Cambridge, in 1810, and was the first clergyman of the Church of England to volunteer, in 1819, for the foreign service of the Church Missionary Society. His field of labor was in the countries in the Mediterranean, and the fruits of his observations were, Christian Researches in the Mediterranean from 1815 to 1820, and Christian Researches in Syria and the Holy Land in 1823 and 1824. He was also the author of Time and Temper: A Manual of Selections from Holy Scripture, with Thoughts on Education (4th ed. 1852)—Helps to Pastoral Visitation (2d ed. 1848, 8 parts). From 1832 to 1840 he acted as clerical secretary to the Church Missionary Society; for many years held the Sunday evening lecturership of St. Mary’s, Aldermansbury; and in 1851 succeeded the Rev. R. Hirstereth as St. John’s chaplain. He died at Clapham, Surrey, Feb. 20, 1855. See Hardwick, Annual Biography, 1868, p. 208.

Joyce, Thomas, a Dominican, proceeded D.D. in Oxford, and, living there, became provincial of his order both in England and Wales. From this place, without ever having any other preference, pope Clement V created him cardinal of St. Sabine—a contradiction, as some call attention, between the friar’s profession and practice. He had six brethren, all Dominicans, and Fuller, refusing to liken them to the seven sons of Sceva (Acts xix, 14), all exorcists, terms them “a week of brethren, whereof this rubricated cardinal was the dominical letter.” Thomas flourished in 1810, and was buried in his convent at Oxford. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), iii. 12.

Juana, Juan Baptista, an eminent Spanish painter, was born at Valencia in 1528, and studied at Rome, but afterwards settled at Valencia. He is ranked by the Spanish writers as one of the greatest artists of the glorious age of pope Leo X. Pacecho bestows upon him the highest encomiums, and Palomino Velasco does not hesitate to prefer him to Morales, or even to Raphael himself. Juana limited himself to subjects of sacred history, and his works are entirely confined to the churches and convents of his native city. There is a fine picture by him representing The Baptism of Christ, in the Cathedral of Valencia. There are three others, representing The Nativity; The Martyrdom of St. Ives; The Burial of a Monk. Another fine picture is a Dead Christ, in the Church of San Pedro. He died in 1579.

Jubilation, Gift of, a privilege allowed by theologian mysticism to be granted to eminent Roman saints, by which they are enabled in their last moments to sing a triumphant death-song.

Jubin (or Gebuln), Saint, a French prelate, was the son of Hugues III, count of Dijon. Having entered the ministry, he was appointed archdeacon of the Church of Langres. In 1077 he attended the procession. Council of Lyons at Autun, became archbishop of Lyons, and died there, April 15, 1082. He is involved in cases of gout and the stone, with which he had himself been afflicted during his life. There are extant of Jubin six letters, one of which addresses the priority to his see, printed by Descordes, Dom Liran, Baluze, etc. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.}

Judaeo-Arabic Version of the Scriptures. This is not properly a version, but Arabic in Hebrew. characters. As early as 1830 the printing of an edition of the Arabic New Test. in Hebrew characters was suggested to the British and Foreign Bible Society. Nothing, however, was done for the many thousand Jews in Egypt, Tunis, and the whole north of Africa, Yemen, Syria, and Mesopotamia (to whom the Arabic is vernacular), until 1846, when the Bombay Auxiliary Bible Society commenced for their use an edition of the gospels of Matthew and John, with the Acts of the Apostles, and the epistle to the Hebrews, under the superintendence of the Rev. Dr. Wilson of Bombay. The first volume was published in 1847, and has ever since been circulated. (B. P.)

Judæo-German Version of the Scriptures. Like the above, this is the German New Test. in rabbinical characters. The first edition of this testament was printed at Cracow in 1640; the work was executed by John Herzog, a converted Jew, on the basis of Luther's version; but the book of Revelation is omitted. In 1820 the London Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews undertook to furnish the German Jews with copies of the German Scriptures in rabbinical characters. The society's first edition appeared in 1822: the German New Test. was from Luther's text translated by Meyer at Frankfort in 1819, and the transcription into rabbinical characters was made by Mr. Judah D'Allemagne of London. In 1859 the British and Foreign Bible Society published the Judæo-German Old Test., under the care of Rev. R. König; and in 1860 the book of Psalms was carefully revised by Rev. W. Edwards of Besalou, was printed at Vienna. (B. P.)

Judæo-Persian Version of the Scriptures. This is the Persian New Test., in Hebrew characters, and designed for the Jews in Persia. When, in 1841, Dr. Haberin applied to some Christian friends for aid in printing the Scriptures to the Persian Jews, he received in reply from Herat a copy of Martyr's Persian New Test., written in Hebrew characters, under the care of Dr. Login. Dr. Haberin laid the version before the Calcutta committee, and they agreed to refer the matter to the British and Foreign Bible Society. The latter requested the Calcutta Seminary to print an edition of two thousand New Test. In this form, and arrangements were made to have the edition printed at Calcutta, under the eye of the Rev. Dr. Yates. The death of the latter rendered this plan abortive, and after the Bombay government had transmitted to London manuscript copies of the Judæo-Persian gospels, an edition of one thousand copies was completed at London in 1849, under the superintendence of the Rev. Dr. Wilson of Bombay. These are all the printed parts extant. (B. P.)

Judæo-Spanish Version of the Scriptures. The Judæo-Spanish is spoken by the Jews of Turkey, who are descendants of the Jews formerly settled in the Spanish Peninsula, but forcibly ejected from Spain in 1492, and from Portugal in 1497, by the merciless mandate of Ferdinand and Isabella. As to the versions of the Old Test., and Románico Túytorro. A translation of the New Test., into Judæo-Spanish was undertaken by the British and Foreign Bible Society at the suggestion of Dr. Pinkerton, and, in 1829, the Rev. Mr. Levee, their agent in Turkey, undertook the translation. Dr. Pinkerton, who seldom read or write except in Hebrew, was afterwards revisal, and reprinted at Athens in 1844. In 1874 the British and Foreign Bible Society undertook a careful revision of the New Test., with the assistance of the Rev. J. Christie of the Scottish Missionary Society. This new edition was printed at Constantinople in 1877, and has since been revised. In the Old Test., in Judæo-Spanish, with Hebrew in parallel columns, has also been published by the American Bible Society. (B. P.)

Jüdd, Bethel, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born at Watertown, Conn., in the spring of 1778. He graduated from Yale College in 1797, and immediately entered upon his preparation for the ministry; was ordained deacon in 1798, and his ministerial life covered sixty years of activity. At different periods he was engaged in the dioceses of Connecticut, New York, Western New York, Maryland, North Carolina, and Florida, and was one of the early presidents of St. John's College, Annapolis, as well as rector of the Church in that city. Among the missionary stations was that of St. Augustine, Fla. During fifteen years he was rector of St. James's Church, New London, Conn., a charge which he received on leaving appointed president of the Episcopal Academy, Cheshire. He died at Wilmington, Del., April 8, 1858. He was a ripe scholar, and an earnest and effective preacher. See Am. Quart. Church Rev. 1856, p. 342.

Juel was the most noted festival of the Scandinavian worship, which was celebrated in the longest night as a new year's celebration. Sacrifices and vows were made to the gods for fruitfulness for the coming year. In honor of the god Freir a huge boar was butchered, and the sacrifice, called the Jula-pig or Julablot, was made in the presence of the king. A golden boar was brought into the hall, all laid their hands on it and ate the meat without biting. Then four weeks of eating, drinking, dancing, and playing followed. The name Yule for Christmas is thought to have thus originated.

Juhles, a name given to aerial spirits or demons among the Laplanders, from whom they receive a sort of adoration, though no statues or images of them exist. Their worship is conducted under particular trees. On Christmas-eve, and the day following, they celebrate the festival of the Juhles. On this occasion they rigidly abstain from animal food; and they carefully reserve some fragments of the food employed, which they suspend in a box behind the house, for the refreshment of the spirits.

Juligné, Antoine Éléonore Léon, Lelecro de, a French prelate of high family, was born at Paris in 1728. He studied in his native city, became bishop of Chalon in 1764, and during the French revolution took refuge at Châlons; afterwards residing finally at Augsburg. In 1802 he returned to France, but lived privately in Paris till his death, March 19, 1811. He left some ecclesiastical works, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Julien, Simon (called Julian of Parmo), an eminent French painter, was born at Toulon in 1736, studied under Bardou at Marseilles, and afterwards visited Paris, where he became a pupil of Carlo Vanloo, and gained the grand prize of the Royal Academy. He then visited Rome with the royal pension, and remained in that city ten years. On returning to Paris he soon gained a reputation, and was elected an académicien. Among his best performances is an altar-piece for the chapel of the archbishop of Paris, at Conflans, representing St. Anthony in a Trance. He died at Paris, Feb. 28, 1800. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Juluka, in the mythology of South America, is a mighty spirit, living on fish, and was of circular form, being of gigantic size, walks over land and sea, and his head projects far above the clouds. His forehead is decorated by a beautiful bandage, made of the feathers of the hibou, splendidly colored; this he shows morning and evening. It is the rainbow. The remainder of the body remains hid in the clouds. If this spirit does not find enough to eat he causes sickness among the inhabitants. See Joulouka.

Jumala, the supreme deity of the Laplanders. He was represented by a wooden idol in human form, seated on a sort of altar, with a crown on his head and a bowl in his lap, into which the devotees throw their voluntary offerings.

Jumonuti, a village on the banks of the river Jumna, which is considered by the Hindus as a spot of remarkable sanctity. Pilgrimage to this place from the low countries was thought to impart to the adventurer virtues almost equal to deification.

Junge, Christian Gottfried, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Nuremburg, Oct. 20, 1748. He studied at Altdorf, commenced his ministerial career in 1769, was in 1783 professor of theology at Jena, in 1739 pastor at his native city, and died March 27, 1814. He wrote, De Duratione Parnarum Infernalis, etc. (Altdorf, 1783).—De Parnarum Divinitate et Emanatibus (ed.). Besides a number of ascetical works and sermons, he published the third edition of Didierlein's Summa Institutionum Theologiae Christi (1798). Junkheim, Johann Zacharias Leondard, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Anspach, Sept. 18, 1756. He studied at Göttingen, was in 1754 vicar at his native place, and two years later pastor there. In 1757 he was rector of the gymnasium in Anspach, in 1764 court-preacher, and died Aug. 17, 1790. He wrote, De Argumento pro Religione a Constantino Martyram (Göttingen, 1753).—Progr. ad 1 Petr. i, 2 (1765).—De Providentia Divina (ed.).—Deae Quaestion Symodulam (1780-90). He also published Sermones. See Döring, Die gelehrtten Theologen Deutschlands, s. v.; Fürst, Bibl. Jdid. ii, 157; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit., i, 394, 444; ii, 288. (B. P.)

Junkin, David X., D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born near Mercer, Pa., Jan. 8, 1838. He graduated at the University of the South, at Sewanee, and studied two years at Princeton Theological Seminary. In 1853 he was ordained pastor at Greenwich, N. J.; in 1841 became professor of belles-lettres in Lafayette College; in 1848 pastor of the F Street Church, Washington, D. C.; in 1849 became chaplain at Annapolis, Md.; in 1856 pastor of the North Church, Chicago, Ill., and in the same year at Newcastle, Pa. He died at Martinsburg, W. Va., April 22, 1880. Dr. Junkin was an eloquent and successful preacher, and a ready writer, being the author of several valuable books, among which is one entitled The Oath a Divine Ordinance, and an Element of the Social Constitution (N. Y. 1845, 12mo). See New York Observer, May 6, 1880; Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 83. (W. S. P.)

Justi, Johann Carl, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Münchhausen, Hesse, Dec. 8, 1753. He studied at Marburg and Göttingen, was in 1774 deacon at Marburg, and commenced his academical career in 1775. In 1779 he was professor, and succeeded his brother as first pastor of St. Elisabeth. He died May 12, 1800, leaving, Weisungsurkunden: Maria um die Israeliten, Deutsch. zwill. Justinus, archbishop of Canterbury, accompanied Laurentius and Mellitus when they departed from Rome, in 601, to join the mission at Canterbury. He was a Roman by birth; was also first bishop of the see of Rochester. He was translated to Canterbury in 624. His death is said to occur the 51st year of his episcopacy. The great event of his short occupancy of the latter see was the extension of the Kentish mission to Northumbria. This was effected by the marriage of Edwin, the king of Northumbria, with Ethelburga, the sister of Eadbald, king of Kent. Justus consecrated Paulinus, July 21, 625, to be archbishop of York. He died Nov. 30, 627. See Hook, Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, i, 100 sq.

Justah, a modern representative of the Muisa is thus described in the Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey (iii, 810):

"A large village standing on a ridge. It is built of stone, but some of the inhabitants live in tents. The women wear the elder costumes. On the south there are rock-cut tombs, and rock wine-presses are found all around. The inhabitants are a persecuted people. The church is most beautiful. South of the village are scattered olive-woods, which are conspicuous objects; on the west, a little lower, under a cliff, is a small olive-press; to the south-west a few figs. The inhabitants are very rich in flocks; the village owns, it is said, 11,000 sheep, besides goats, cows, camels, horses, and donkeys. The abbot alone has 200 sheep."
KADISH-BARNEA

KADISHE, version

KADISH-BARNEA. The search for this interesting locality, and the controversy concerning its site, still continues. The most recent and enterprising explorer is H. Clay Trumbull, D.D., editor of the Sunday-School Times, who has made an elaborate and extended work on the subject (Kadish-Barme, Its Importance and Probable Site, etc., New York, 1884, 8vo). After great pains, while on a trip through the Sinaitic desert, he succeeded in reaching 'Ain Kadise, which, in his map of the region, accompanying his volume, he locates fifty-five miles west, by north east of Petra, and near the north-east of the castle of Nukil. His description of the spot is as follows (p. 272):

"It was a marvellous sight! Out from the barren and stunted thorny desert-waste, we had come with magical suddenness into an oasis of verdure and beauty, unlooked for and hardly conceivable in such a region. A rose-red carpet covered the ground. Fig-trees laden with fruit nearly ripe enough for eating, were along the shelter of the southern hillside. Strips and flower-beds showed variety and interest, and the water gurgled under the waving grass. We had seen nothing like this in the desert. Yet it was the same old Wady Feiran! "It equaled in loveliness of scene by any single bit of landscape, of like extent, even there."

"Standing from the north-eastern sweep of this picturesque recess was to be seen the large single mass, or a small hill, of solid rock, which appears looks as if it were the castle of the inhabitants, by Moses, to cause it to 'give forth its water,' when its flowing stream had been exhausted. From underneath this rugged spur of the north-eastern mountain range issued the now abundant stream."

A circular pool, some fifteen feet in diameter, from the bottom with time-worn limestone blocks, was the first receptacle of the water. A marble watering-trough was near this well—better finished than the troughing at Beersheba, as it seemed like primitive workmanship. The mouth of this well was only about three feet across it, and the water came to within three feet of the top. A narrow rock-walk westerly from this well, and down the slope, was a second well, stoned much like the first, but of greater diameter; and here again was a marble watering-trough. A basin or pool of water, larger than either of the wells, but not stoned up like them, was seemingly the principal watering-place. It was a short distance south-western from the second well, and it looked as if it and the two wells might be supplied from the same spring, the same submarine source—the springs under the rock. Around the margin of the pool, as also around the stoned walls, camel and goat daub—as if of rocks and heds for centuries—was trodden down and commingled with the limestone dust so as to form another shallow pool. Another step lower, the larger pool, lower down the slope, was supplied with water by a steam which rippled and cascaded along its narrow bed from the second pool; and yet beyond this, westerly, the water gurgled away under the grass as we had met it when coming from the south. A third and last step, the water flowed away from this pool, from which this oasis opened. The water itself was remarkably pure and sweet; unequaled by any we had found on leaving the desert.

Meanwhile the late indefatigable Rev. F. W. Holland, after several ineffectual attempts, had at length successfully achieved a visit to the same spot, and an account of it from his field-book is given in the Quarterly Statement of the "Pal. Explor. Fund" for Jan. 1884. The accompanying sketch map of his route places 'Ain Kadishe at about the same distance as above from Petra and Nukil respectively, and gives it an elevation of one thousand four hundred and eighty-five feet above the sea. The place is thus described (p. 9):

"There are three springs, two on the hill-side, and one in the bed of the wady; from the lower spring on the hill-side a good stream of water flows for about one hundred yards down the wady, forming pools at which the goats are watered; but the stream curves to the south, and the upper spring on the hill-side is a poor one now; it is built round with large stones, the depth of water being two or three feet. There is a rude stone trough here and at the lowest spring. The three springs are not more than thirty yards apart. The northern wady, which lies throughout, has a reflection in the springs, nearly fifteen feet deep, between stony jurs. As one ascends, the mountains become lower and less steep; there is more vegetation; there is more; it is more shady; there are chalk cliffs, the upper, hard limestone (ummumatic); large stones lie down in the bed of the wady. There are a few fig-trees and a bed of coarse grass. About fifty yards higher up the wady than 'Ain Kadishe..."
there is a deeper well with four old watering-places; there are also traces of others near."

Both these explorers strongly identify the site with Kadesh-barnea, and the conclusion has been adopted by a large number of Biblical scholars. The name and character of the place have certainly been established as coincident, but still the position is unsatisfactory. 'Ain Kades is nearly midway between the Arabah and the Mediterranean, and after all the arguments of Dr. Trumbull and others, this seems too far west to suit the requirements of the Scriptural account, particularly the journeys of the Israelites. Especially is the attempt to remove the well-established position of Mount Hor to some locality west of the Arabah, for the purpose of accommodating this identification (as Dr. Trumbull does not hesitate to do) too Herculean an undertaking. That the comparatively late name, "Idumea," may have been extended so as to include the region immediately south of Palestine, we may very well concede, without admitting that the older designation of "Edom" ever passed the Arabah, which is the natural and still-existing boundary. The reasoning of Dr. Trumbull to the contrary, however ingenious and learned, seems too much like a piece of special pleading for a foregone and favorite theory, and parts of it are clearly defective, especially as to the conquering march of Joshua (Josh. xv, 18, where "from Kadesh-barnea even unto Gaza," evidently marks the eastern and the western limits respectively), the alleged contradiction between the refusal of a passage by Edom to the Israelites, and their burial of Aaron on the traditional Mount Hor (for they did not thereby acquire any title or cress the territory), and the imaginary "Wall Road." See Smith, "We cannot help thinking that more thorough exploration of the north-eastern part of the Sinai desert will yet bring to light other cases of a similar character, and among them one still bearing the not uncommon name of Kadesh, or perhaps some trace of the distinctive term Barnea. Lieut. Conder expresses a similar conviction (Quar. Statement of the "Pal. Explor. Fund," Jan. 1885, p. 21 sq.)."

Kadr, At, the title of the ninety-seventh chapter of the Koran, which contains an account of God's sending down the Koran from heaven to Mohammed. It represents God as saying, "The night Al Kadr is better than a thousand months." Which night this is has not been definitely ascertained.

Kadroma, in Tibetian mythology, was a goddess who, changed into an ape, married the god Cenreali, likewise an ape, and by him became the mother of the entire population of Tibet.

Kaffir Version of the Scriptures. The Kaffir is spoken by the Kaffren (q. v.), and was reduced to writing by the Rev. W. H. Boyce, a Wesleyan missionary, who, in connection with the Rev. Wm. Shaw and W. J. Shrewsbury, commenced in 1880 a translation of the Scriptures, which was completed in the course of four years. This translation, however, formed but the basis of that eventually published, and it was not till 1841 that, after a very careful revision, the New Test. was published. A vigorous revision was again undertaken, and in 1845 the revised New Test. was published, which was used by all the missionaries laboring among the Kaffir tribes. A new and again carefully revised edition of the New Test. was completed in 1854 at the Mount Cokes Wesleyan mission press, and in 1859 the entire Old Test., after a careful revision, was completed at press. In 1865 the committee of the British and Foreign Bible Society announced that the revised Kaffir Bible, which had been slowly progressing for some time under the editorial supervision of the Rev. J. W. Apple- yard, was completed and ready for circulation. The features of this revised edition were, that "very laborious efforts have been made to render the work an accurate and faithful translation of the Hebrew and Greek texts; and the proficiency of Mr. Appleyard in the knowledge of the Kaffir language, combined with great critical care, afford every reasonable guarantee that this version of the Holy Scriptures will prove correct, intelligible, and idiomatic, and in all respects admirably adapted to the people among whom it will now circulate. Its appearance, after long and earnest expectation, will be hailed with peculiar satisfaction by all missionaries laboring where the Kaffir language is spoken." In 1869 the report of the British and Foreign Bible Society again announced that the translation of this Bible was about to undergo revision: "A board of revisers, which consists of representatives of the various churches in South Africa, has been formed, and its labors already commenced. The difficulty here, as in so many other cases, is to make the translation idiomatic without sacrificing the exact sense of the sacred original." In 1871 the four gospels were announced as completed, and one of them was printed as a specimen, in order to elicit further criticisms, if needful, before the text is finally settled. In 1874 the board of revisers lost one of its most valuable helpers, the Rev. J. W. Appleyard, shortly after the revision of the New Test. was completed, which was issued together with the revised Old Test. in 1878. The revision of the Old Test. is still in progress; from July 8, 1874, to Jan. 22, 1892, the Old Test. was revised up to Jeremiah xxi. See Bible of Every Land, p. 426 sq. (B.P.)

Kager, Johann Matthias, an eminent German painter, was born at Munich in 1566, and went to Italy while young, where he spent several years studying the best works of the great masters. He died at Augsburg in 1634. His works are chiefly in the churches and public edifices of Munich. He etched a few plates from his own designs, among which are the following: The Adoration of the Shepherds; The Baptism of Christ by St. John; The Holy Family by St. Francis Surrounded by the Monks of his Order; The Virgin and Child in the Clouds. Kaguru Version of the Scriptures. The KAGANA

KAGANA BAR-TACHILPA, a Jewish writer, was born at Pum-Nahara about 330, was in 287 rlector at the college of Pumbabitha, in Babylon, and died in 413.

KAGANA is the author of an hagiographical work, entitled Penina de Rab Kahan (סנה משיח וสภาף), comprising a cycle of legends both from the Jewish and the Pagan, for all the festivals and principal Sabbaths of the year, and embodying the traditional explanation of those portions of Scripture. This midrash was for a long time only known from citations found in the Jalkut and Aruch. In the year 1868, however, S. Buber published, at Lezak, an edition of the Penina according to a MS. which had been found at Zefath, and copied in Egypt, with critical annotations, emendations, etc., and an elaborate introduction.

KAHLER, Ludvig August, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born March 6, 1775, at Sommerfeld, Prussia. Having completed his studies, he was appointed in 1796 preacher at Canig, near Guben, in 1809 deacon and in 1812 archdeacon at Cobus, in 1819 member of consistory, preacher, and professor of theology at Königsberg, where he died in 1856, a doctor of theology.

He published, Christliche Sittenlehre (Königsberg, 1832); 5th ed. to the various newer life, the Catholicism of the bishops (ibid. 1828); Supranaturals and Rationalism in their immediate and practical influence. (Leipzig, 1818); Über Schwärmerei, Begeistervung, schädliche und wohltätige (Königsberg, 1838); Frederik den heiligen (2d ed. 1839); Christliche Lehre nach der heiligen Schrift (2d ed. 1839); Wissenschaftlicher Abriss der christlichen Sittenlehre (ibid. 1835, 1836).

KAHLER, Wigand, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, nephew of Johannes Käbler (q. v.), was born at Wolmar, Hesse-Cassel, March 27, 1699. He studied at Rinteln, where he also commenced his academic career, and where he died, Nov. 14, 1747, professor of theology, having taken two years the degree of doctor of theology at Göttingen. He wrote, De Veris et Fietis Textus Sacri Trajecti accusationis:—De Metho Studii Theologici:—De Dogmataphi; τής καιγίς απο Ρωμ. xiii, 19:—De Innocentiis Dei circa Lapsam Primaum Petrum. KALOMTSA, in Persian mythology, as represented in the Zend-Avesta, is the first man, who proceeded out of the right hip of the bull Abudat after Ahriman had the same killed. He was both a man and a woman, the object of worship by the angels. Ahriman's plan to destroy the generation which was to populate the earth did not succeed. He therefore sent a Dea, Assurjad, besides a thousand other genii of the infernal region, to battle against him. Kalomtash withstood thirty years before he succumbed. The Hydraulic flowing from his body crushed the earth. The seed grew into an immense tree, which, instead of fruit, bore ten human pairs, one of which, Meshia and Meshiane, were the progenitors of the human race. They, too, were seduced by Ahriman and live sinful and condemned, suffering the punishment of their sin unto the resurrection.

KALOMTSA, Gottlieb Philipp Christian, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Hof, May 7, 1781. In 1801 he was teacher at the gymnasium of his native place, in 1809 deacon at Münchberg, in 1814 at Erlangen, in 1816 professor of theology there, and died in 1845, member of consistory and doctor of theology. He wrote, De Apologizec Evang. Josuæ Consiliai (Erlangen, 1821-25); Grundriss eines Systems der neutestamentlichen Hermeneutik (ibid. 1817); De Mosaiica Symbolis et Genis (ibid. 1827); Commentarius in Priora Genesis Capitis (1830); Literaturgeschichte der melanesiokanischen Original-Ausgabe der ausgeraubten Confession (Ni-remberg, ed.);—Linguarum Anotiscy Usus in Nov. Test. etc. (1831);—Die biblische Theologie oder Judentum und Christentum (Erlangen, 1814, 1821, 2 vols.);—Collectiun der davidischen Könige in Jerusalem (1829);—Das Hohelied von C. C. Zechmann auf Schubert (1825);—Erklärung der fünft Paenumächer (1827);—Über die Urgeschichte (1840).

KALOMTSA, Niklaus, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Nov. 8, 1784. He studied at Wittenberg and Erlangen, was in 1763 rector at Redwitz, and died March 14, 1800. He published, De Lutheri Interpretis (Hof, 1768);—De Johnsonii Iuliani Martyrii (ibid. 1769);—De Infusioni R. M. S. Sexta, etc. (1771);—De Mortuia Lutheri in Hymnodiis (1772);—De Voto Paulino 3. KALA MAHA, the male form of the Hindú god Siva, in his character of the great destroyer, of all things.

KALANDERS-BROTHERS. See CALEDARIUM FRATER.

KALASTRI LINGA, in Hindú mythology, is one of the commonest representations of Siva. A pious Indian had noticed that the right eye of the god wept. Immediately he took out his right eye and put it into the idol. Soon after the left eye began to run, and the friend of the god sacrificed his left eye, and, as he was blind, he made use of his foot to find the spot where this eye was to be put in.

KALED. See ADAI.
Kalewa, in Norse mythology, was one of the first gods of the far north, reigning long before the Aesir, a mighty giant, and father of the hunter Hiidn, an evil god, whose frightful habitation is a place of damnation.

Kali-age. See KALIYUGA.

Kalka Purana, one of the sacred writings of the Hinduj, which is chiefly devoted to a recital of the different modes of worshipping and appeasing the goddess Kali (q. v.). See PURANAS.

Kalnalk, in Hinduj mythology, is a monstrous thousand-headed snake. Vishnu sought to capture it, riding on his giant bird, Garuda. When the serpent saw him coming he hid in the river Jumna, whose water it poisoned. When Vishnu, in his ninth Avatar, was still a boy, he decided to deliver the world from this reptile and its offspring. The reptile encircled him with a thousand fangs, but the god walked on its heads and crushed them all but one. He then sent it to the infernal regions, where its poison is used to torture the damned.

Kalisch, Marcus M., a Jewish writer and commentator, was born at Treptow, Prussia, May 16, 1828. He studied at Halle and Berlin, and took the degree of doctor of philosophy in 1848. In the same year he left his native country on account of political disturbances, and went to England, where he took up a permanent residence. He became secretary to chief rabbi Adler, at London. Here he published his Historical and Critical Commentaries on Genesis, Exodus, and Leviticus (1855-72, 4 vols.):—Hebrew Grammar (1863, 1884, 2 parts):—Bible Studies: I. The Prophecies of Balaam; or, The Hebrew and the Hebrew (1877); II. The Book of Jonah (1878). Kalisch died Aug. 23, 1885. (B.P.)

Kalki (or Kalkin, also called Kalkhit), the tenth Avatar, or incarnation of Vishnu, which is yet future, and in which he will appear at the close of the Kaliyuga (q. v.), "when the practices taught by the Vedas and the institutes of the law shall have ceased." According to the Vishnu-Purana, he will then be born "in the family of Vishnuyatraus (i.e. possessing the glory of Vishnu), an eminent Brahmin of Sambhala village, endowed with the eight superhuman faculties. He will then destroy all the barbarians and thieves, and all whose minds are devoted to iniquity." The expectations of the Hinduj, in reference to the deliverance from present evils by Vishnu, is remarkably similar to the Hebrew expectation of the coming Messiah.

Kalmuck Mythology is nearly related to that of Tibet, the latter extending through India, China, Cashmere, Tartary, and far north. But this mythology has been greatly altered and modified by climatic, social, and other circumstances. According to the fables of the Zongarian Kalmucks and Tartars, the earth was originally covered with water. A great wind-storm arose, causing such a commotion of the waters that from the ensuing chaos eighty mountains sprang up, half of which formed a great range. Seven gods descended from heaven to visit the earth, and several of them satisfied their hunger. The earth then contained honey, and not knowing its origin, two of the deities at once began to eat it. The other five, losing the privilege of returning with the other five. They then populated the earth. There are a thousand deities, who reign alternately. Six have finished their reign; the seventh, Shak Jumeni, rules at present. Maitiri (the prophet), will follow. But before he begins, the world will come to an end, the destroyer will come, surrounded by seven suns, which will set fire to the world. A rain-storm, following, will put out the fire, and Maitiri will go to heaven to take possession of his throne. Then the earth will be entirely depopulated, all men having gone to paradise, and the inhabitants of hell will come up to inhabit it. Their spirits take possession of other animals, from the lowest insect upwards, and thus the transmigration will continue, until the worst spirit of hell shall have become human, and worthy of paradise. To reach that happy place is usually only possible at the end of each world period, but those men who have led a holy life reach the gates of paradise at death.

Kalmuckian Version. By way of supplement to the article RUSSIA, VERSIONS OF, 21, we will add that the British and Foreign Bible Society has published, in 1884, the four gospels, in the translation of professor Vizhnjeff, who is also preparing the remainder of the New Test. (B.P.)

Kalybe. See CHAPU.

Kama, in Hinduj mythology, is the Indian god of love; verbally the word means "desire." He is the son of heaven and disappointment, and is also called the heart-entering, bodiless, restless god, surmounts which are all very significant. Tenderness (Retti) is his wife, and Versity (blooming-time) his companion, who continually fills his quieter with buds as arrow-points. His favorite residence is at Agra, for there the women are the most beautiful of all portions of India. Kama has a visible form, but because he disturbed Hara, the ruler of creation, in his practices, the latter burned him to ashes by one look, and since then he is called bodiless. He is represented riding on a parrot. His bow is made of sugar-cane. His arrow-points are the rosy-red blooming buds of the amra-tree. The gods sought to induce Siva to a new marriage, and therefore turned to the god of love, under whose influence Siva soon married.

Kamdeva, in Hinduj mythology, is the divine cow that can fulfill all desires, produced while the Amrita was in process of preparation, by turning the mountain Mandar into the sea of milk. She was presented by Indra to the Brahmin Jamadagri, who was therefore supernatural, wealthy, and honored everywhere. An evil-minded king, Shawkawer, ruler of Ayadhy, came to him with his whole train of followers, and enter-liament was given with the aid of the cow. Then he demanded the cow, which was refused, whereupon the evil king made war on the Brahmins; but the cow slew all his army, and ascended again to heaven. The king sought revenge by killing the wise Brahmin; thereupon the cow hurried to the son of the murdered Brahmin, Pārāṣa Rama, and called him to avenge the death of his father; the cow so assisted him that the evil king was slain.

Kamisimo, a garment of ceremony among the Japanese, worn on festival and other solemn occasions. It consists of two parts, a short cloak without sleeves, called kurogeno, and a short petticoat, called rakamono, fastened about the waist by a band.

Kampfer, Peter Christian, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born Nov. 13, 1702. He studied at Rostock, was in 1736 professor of metaphysics there, in 1789 deacon, and took his degree as doctor of divinity in 1748. He died May 16, 1758. His writings are, De Usu Terminorum Exegeticorum (Rostock, 1750); — De Litteria Atque Puncta in Scriptura Veteris Testamenti Hebraica (ibid. 1734); — De Origine Atque Indole vo Keri et Cheth (ibid. 1759); — De Litteria, Vocbula et Accentibus in Scriptura V. colic theologian of Germany, was born Nov. 12, 1851, at Wickede, in Westphalia. He studied at Paderborn, Münster, and Berlin, took the degree of doctor of philosophy in 1859, and commenced his academic career in Bonn, where he was also made professor in 1861. He died Dec. 3, 1872, a member of the Old Catholic Church. He published, De Georgia Wicelio (Paderborn, 1869); — Die Universität Erfurt in ihrem Verhältnis zur Reformation (Tübingen, 1858-60, 2 vols.); — De Joanne Cruo Robinoni (Bonn, 1862); — Zur Geschichte des Mittelalters (ibid. 1864); — Johann Celcin, seine Kirche und sein Staat in Griechenland (Leipsic, 1869, vol. i). Kamyu Murunna (desire for death), modes of suicide formerly prescribed in the Hindū Shastras (q. v.). The commonest mode is drowning in the Ganges, but sometimes the suicide submits to being buried alive. There was formerly an instrument kept by which a person could decapitate himself. It consisted of a sharp crescent-shaped knife, with a chain and stirrup to each horn. The devotee placed the sharp edge on the back of his neck, and his feet in the stirrups, then gave a violent jerk with his legs, and his head was instantly severed from his body.

Kanah or Assur. The modern village Kanah, which has usually been identified with this site, lies seven and a quarter miles south-east of Tyre; but this is too far south for the requirements of the Biblical account (Josh. xix. 28). The antiquities in the vicinity, including the remarkable figures on the rocks, are described in the Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey (i, 64). A more probable position is that of 'Aīn Kanah, "twenty miles farther north, on the edge of the hills, ten miles inland, but in sight of Sidon." claiming aloud, 'Ho! Sambhu Bhairava—Ho! lord of 1805. He studied at Tübingen, where he became inti mately acquainted with William Hofacker. After fill pastor of the colony of pietists at Kornthal. In 1845

he was dean at Münster, and in 1847 at Herrnberg.
In 1850 he was made general superintendent and mem ber of the superior consistory, and in 1852 he became the greatly beloved and influential pastor of the "Stifts kirche," at Stuttgart, where he preached twenty-seven years, 1847–1874. Kapf is, in fact, the most per fect representative of the type of piety prevailing in Württemberg in the last generation; as a preacher he was not eloquent, but his earnest manner won the heart.
His influence as pastor was very great, and yet he found time to write. He published, Predigten über die

Kara, Joseph ben-Simeon, a Jewish writer of the

Karaite-Tartar (or Crimean Tartar) Ver sion of the Scriptures. The Karaite-Tartar is vernacular among the Karaite Jews of the Crimea. As to this division among the Jews, see KARAITES.
They have long been in possession of a Tartar version of the Old Testament. When and by whom it was made is unknown. When Dr. Pinkerton was travelling in the Crimea he purchased a complete copy of this version.
The two books of Chronicles do not appear to have been inserted in this version, but it comprises the other books of the Old Testament. The translation is such, that although the words are mostly of Tartar origin, yet it would not be intelligible to any Tartar nation. The words are ranged in exact order of the Hebrew, and the style, construction, grammatical observances, and idioms are all conformable to the Shemitic type. This version is, in fact, in fact, as the Hebrew in its character, that to the Turks and Tartars is it a sealed book. See Bible of Every Land, p. 350.
In point of practical utility it is deficient, and for this reason the British and Foreign Bible Society only pub lished a small edition of the book of Genesis in 1819, at the mission press of Astrakhan. A subsequent edition of the entire Old Testament was published by the Jews of South Russia. The imperial library at St. Peters burg is now in possession of some codices which were lately procured, and are described by Strack in the Catalog der Hebr. Bibliothek der kaiserlichen öffentlichen bibliothek in St. Petersburg (Leipsic, 1875), p. 167 sqq., which he conjointly published with A. Harkavy.
On page 169 we find the first three verses of the book of Leviticus, of which we subjoin the first, together with the Hebrew:

Hebrew |
| Arabic |

It must be observed that the first word does not belong to the translation, but it is the first word of the Hebrew text, which is always placed at the beginning of each verse. Dr. H. Dalton, in his Das Gebet an Herrn in dem Sprachen Russlands (St. Petersburg, 1870), gives the Lord's Prayer in the Karaite-Tartar which was prepared by the late A. Firkowitz (q. v.). (B. P.)

Karaas (or Turkish-Tartar) Version of the Scriptures. The version generally denominated the Karaas is so called because of a town of that name, on the border of the Caspian Sea, was the place of its publica tion. It has been improperly termed the Noğay version, on account of its having been found intelligible to the Nogays, a tribe of Tartars dwelling on the banks of the Kuma and Kumia, in the steppes to the north ward of Mount Caucasus. A more correct designation for this version is that of Turkish-Tartar, because it consists principally of words that belong in common to the Turks and Tartars. It exhibits the Turkish lan guage in a comparatively pure state, and has a mon thoda in style and language with such books as are circulated among the Tartars in the south of Russia, and is there for intelligible to all the different Tartar tongues scattered through that extensive region.

The first version of the Scriptures written in this plan, unadorned Turkish style was that published at Oxford in 1665. The translation was made by William Beverwyck, formerly chaplain to an English ambassador at the Porte. This version, not being free from faults, was used by Mr. Brunton, Scottish missionary at Karasam, as the basis for a new translation, for which he was eminently fitted on account of his thorough knowledge of the language. In 1687 he published the gospel of Matthew. He completed the translation of the New Test., and died while it was carried through the press. After his death the sheets were corrected by Mr. Frazer, and the edition was completed in 1818. In 1815 another edition of this translation was published, with a few emendations and an introduction by Mr. Dickson, one of the Scottish missionaries, who also undertook a translation of the Old Testament about the same time.

The Psalms were completed and published at Astrakhan in 1815, and a second edition in 1818. The Pentateuch was published in 1878. Other books of the Old Testament were translated, but not printed. From the annual report of the British and Foreign Bible Society for 1883, we learn that Mr. Salmon is examining the text of the New Testament with a view to a new edition, the previous edition having been exhausted. From the report of 1884 we learn that the revision of the New Testament, having been completed, the Bible Society's committee have decided to print a new edition, and that the reviser is now engaged in examining certain MS. translations of the Old Testament, handed over by the National Bible Society of Scotland to the British Society. See Bible of Every Land, p. 347. (B.P.)

Karen Version of the Scriptures. Karen is a language spoken by the Kareens, Kareens, or Careens, a wild and simple people scattered over all parts of the Barmese territories, and of the British provinces of Tenasserim; they are also found in the western portions of Siam, and northward among the Shyana. See Bible of Every Land, p. 15.

Till a comparatively recent period, however, Karen, which is remarkably harmonious and well adapted for poetry, was totally unknown to Europeans. About 1865, the missionaries of the American Baptist Missionary Society, Wade and Mason, acquired the language, and for the first time reduced it to writing, by employing the Barmese alphabet, with a few additional characters to express the peculiar sounds of the language. These two missionaries translated the entire New Testament into Karen, which was printed, in 1845, at Tavoy, by the aid of the American and Foreign Bible Society. Besides the translation into the Karen, translations into the different dialects prevalent among the Kareens were made. The Karen has four principal dialects, the Bghai, Sgau, Pwo, and Moppah. Into the latter dialect nothing has as yet been translated. As for the others, they exist in the Bghai-Karen, parts of the Bible published since 1859, and at present there are published Genesis, and twenty chapters of Exodus, Psalms, St. James, and St. John's epistles.

Pwo-Karen, Psalms, Daniel, and Jonah since 1861, added to which was Isaiah.

Sgau-Karen, the Pentateuch since 1864.

The Karen language has been treated by Wade, in Grammar of the Karen Language (1871). (B.P.)

Karma, a term used by the Buddhists to denote action, both meritorious and otherwise. When a human being dies, his Karma is transferred to some other being, regulating all the circumstances of his existence.

Karma-visaya, one of the four things which, according to Buddhism, cannot be understood by one who is not of their number. Karma-visaya denotes how it is that effects are produced by the instrumentality of Karma (q.v.). The other three things which only a Buddhist can understand are, (1) Irudi-visaya, how it was that Buddha could go, in the snapping of a finger, from the world of men to the Brahma-lokas; (2) Lokan-visaya, the six universal circles of the universe, or how it was first brought into existence; (3) Buddha-visaya, the power and wisdom of Buddha.

Karsen, Hermann Rudolph A., a Lutheran theologian of Germany, member of consistory and doctor of theology and philosophy, was born at Rostock, May 20, 1801. In 1825 he was ordained as assistant preacher, and in 1828 he was appointed second preacher of St. Mary's, at his native place. In 1848 he was called as pastor to Dobberan, at the same time being appointed superintendent of his diocese. Two years later he was called as pastor primarius to the Schwerin cathedral. In 1876 he retired from the ministry, and died March 20, 1882. He is the author of: Lehrbuch der christlichen Religion (Rostock, 1838); — Die Kirche und das Symbol in ihrem inneren Zusammenhange (Hamburg, 1842); — Grundzüge der populären protestantischen Dogmatik (Rostock, 1842); — Die protestantische Kirche in ihrer zeitgemäße Reorganisation (Leipsic, 1850); — Die letzten Dinge (8d ed. Kartan. The site which we have proposed for this is marked as Kham Kukam, four and a half miles north of Safed, on the Map of the Ordnance Survey, but is not described in the accompanying Memoirs. Tristram suggests (Bible Places, p. 274) a trace of the name in Wady Kerheru, which he vaguely describes as "running down to the sea."

Kashmir Version. See in Russia, Versions of.

Kasi (the magnificent) is the ancient name of Beares, and the name by which it is still called among the Brahmins.

The priest who performs the Purkar-Kusina forms a small circle which he can easily fix his eye on. The circle must be of clay of a light-red color, placed upon a frame made of four sticks, covered over with a piece of cloth, a skin, or a mat, upon which the clay is to be spread free from foreign substances. After preparing the earth-circle according to these and other directions with the utmost exactness, the priest sits down, and, gazing upon the circle, meditates upon the evil arising from the repetition of existence, and the best modes of overcoming them; on the benefits received by those who practice the odgyan, or other modes of asceticism, and on the excellence of the three gems; and he must endeavor to secure the same advantages. He must continue to gaze and meditate until he receive the nemrita, or inward illumination, by which all asceticism will be removed, and purity attained.
In performing the Apo-Kaisia the priest pours water into an imhs-bowl or similar vessel, and having chosen a retired place, must sit down and meditate, gazing upon the water, and reflecting that the perspiration and other fluids of his own body are composed of the same material.

The Tepos-Kaisia is practiced by taking wood, dry and firm, cutting it into small pieces, and placing it at the root of a tree, or in the court of the wahara, where it must be ignited. He must then take a mat made of shed leaves, and kneeling on the tree skin or on it in an aperture one span and four inches in diameter, he must place it before him, and, looking through the aperture, he must meditate on the fire, and reflect that the fire in his own body is of a similar nature, flickering and incessant.

The Wayos-Kaisia is performed by sitting at the root of a tree, or some other convenient place, and thinking of the wind passing through a window or the hole of a wall; the Niki-Kaisia, by gazing on a tree covered with blue flowers, or a vessel filled with blue flowers, or a blue gashen covering the sky; the Pihu-Ka-sia by gazing on a golden-colored object; the Lokhat-Kaisia on a circle made with vermilion; the Oadatu-Kaisia on a vessel of lead or silver, or the orb of the moon; the Allos-Kaisia by gazing on the light passing through a hole in the wall or the side of a vessel; and the Duhos-Kaisia by gazing at the sky through a hole in the roof of a hut, or through a hole of the prescribed dimensions in a skin.

From the practice of Kaisia in any one of its forms a Buddhist expects to derive many advantages. More especially does he expect the power of working miracles, according to his speculating the Kaisia. The Kaisia is exercised in fourteen different ways. See Hardy, Eastern Monarchia, p. 252 sq.

Kavanagh, Hubbard Hinde, D.D., a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Clark County, Ky., Jan. 14, 1802, and was of Irish extraction on his father's side. When young he learned the printing business. He was converted at sixteen, and at twenty-one became an itinerant minister.
For some years he was engaged in the work of a circuit preacher, but gradually rose to the highest positions in the Church, and in 1856 was elected bishop. He died March 19, 1884. Before the division of the Church he was a member of the general conferences of 1832, 1836, and 1844, on the last occasion leading the Kentucky delegation. At this time he seems not to have taken part in the question of the abolition of slavery, and made no declaration respecting it. He fully sympathized with the position of the Southern delegates, and his name was signed to all their documents. Bishop Kavanagh was closely identified with the Southern Church from its origin, and one of the most vigorous men, physically and intellectually, that Methodism has placed in the episcopacy. His presence was commanding, his voice good, his language copious, and his power in the pulpit great. See (N.Y.) Christian Advocate, March 27, 1884; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.; Minutes of the Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1884, p. 155.

at Strasbourg, Feb. 14, 1821. For some years assistant librarian at the university of his native place, and private tutor from 1843 to 1855, he accepted, in 1858, a call as preacher to Stossweller. In 1868 he went to Neshof, in Alsace, was appointed professor of theology at Strasburg, and on the death of Dr. Frey in 1874, there, June 17, 1874, he was made professor. He is one of the belonged to the so-called liberal Protestants, and contributed largely to the Revue de Théologie. He published De Justina Martyria Doctorum (Strasbourg, 1850), but his main work is Das vorzeitliche Buch der Urgesschte Israel und seine Erweiterung (1869). (B.P.)

Kasan-Tartar Version of the Scripture. The Kazan-Tartar number about a million souls.
A translation of the gospel of Matthew, in this dialect, was prepared by professor Hliminski, which was printed in 1873. This was tentative. The British and Foreign Bible Society being satisfied with the translator's abilities, agreed, in 1877, to print the gospels in the Arabic and Cyrillic characters, so that they might be read by Mohammedans of Kazan, who would not read them in the Russ character. As professor Hliminski proceeded very slowly in the preparation of the gospels, at the suggestion of Dr. Gottwald, the committee agreed to send Mr. Saleman, of the University Library, for six weeks to Kazan, to arrange with some one for the purpose of bringing out a New Test, in the language of the people, adapted from some of the sister dialects. Mr.
Saleman was to edit the work at St. Petersburg, and refer to Mr. Hliminski for the more literal version. To the Kazan-Tartar version, this was agreed upon in 1880.
During the year 1882 the gospel of Matthew, translated by Mr. Saleman, was printed at the Kazan University Press, under the care of professor Gottwald, the censor's authorization having been obtained for the entire New Test. In addition to the gospel of Matthew, that of Mark is to be printed during the year 1885. (B.P.)

Ke, one of the entities and essences in the dualistic system of the Chinese philosophers. It consists of matter most ethereal in its texture, and may be styled the ultimate original element of the universe, the primary material is dependent on, and other essences rest, or from which they have been gradually evolved. The Ke when resolved into its constituent elements, gives birth to two opposite essences, Yang and Yin. See CHINA.

been with great probability identified with Telli Abu Kedesh, lying two miles south east of Lejjun, and described in the Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey (ii, 69) as "An artificial mound, with traces of ruins, scattered pottery, and glass; and on the north are springs."

Kedesh of Naphtali is now represented by Kedes, four and a quarter miles north-west of the lake of Huleh; its extensive ruins are curiously described in the Memoirs (i, 226 sq.) accompanying the Ordnance Survey.

Keene, Samuel, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in Baltimore County, Md., May 11, 1734. He graduated from the college in Philadelphia in June, 1759; was ordained deacon by the bishop of Rochester in the palace at Fulham, England, Sept. 21, 1760; and presbyter eight days after. He became incumbent of St. Ann's parish, Md., March 30, 1762; of St. Luke's parish, Queen Anne County, July 17, 1767; and in 1779 he was rector of Chestert parish, which he served for two years, and then took charge of St. John's parish, Queen Anne and Caroline counties, probably in connection with St. Luke's, where he remained until 1792, living on his own estate. In 1803 he appears to have resigned St. Luke's, although still residing there, and in 1805 he became rector of St. Michael's Church, Talbot County, where he remained until his death, May 8, 1810, but after 1807 ceased to be his rector. He was one of the committee of examiners appointed in 1783, one of the superintending committee of 1788 and 1789, and one of the standing committee from 1788 to 1789. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 811.

Kehein, Joseph, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born Oct. 20, 1898, at Heidelberg, near Mayence. He studied at Giessen, was in 1892 teacher at the gymnasium in Darmstadt, in 1897 at Mayence, in 1895 director of the seminary at Monzaix, and died March 25, 1876. He published, Geschichte der katholischen Kirchebereedsamkeit (Ratisbon, 1848); 2 vols.:—Zur Geschichte der deutschen Bibelübersetzung vor Luther (Stuttgart, 1851);—Katholische Kirchenlieder, Hymnen, Psalmen (1859-65, 3 vols.);—Lateinische Sequenzen des Mitteitllers aus Handschriften (1878);—Das deutsche katholische Lied in seiner Entwicklung (1874). Keilah. The modern representative of this, Khurbet Khil, lies seven miles east of Beit-jilin, and eight and a quarter north-west of Hebron, and is a ruined village with two wells to the north, and a large terre- bithin to the south. It is only cursorily mentioned in the Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey (iii, 314). In the neighborhood west of it the English engineers "found a sacred place dedicated to Nebiy Nonmen, the name now attached to a sacred tree near the ruin called Khurbet Shermeh," which Lieut. Conder explains as a travesty of the native Nphes Nennama, or "Monument of the Faithful," and equivalent to Barak Sultuk, which Soongmen says (Hist. Eeeds, vii, 29) was the name of a place in his day ten stadia from Keilah, where the tomb of Micah was still found (Quar. Statement of "Pal. Explor. Fund," July, 1877, p. 142).

Keim, Carl Theodor, one of the most prominent theologians of Germany, was born at Stuttgart, Dec. 17, 1825. He studied at Maulbronn and Tübingen, where Baur exercised a great influence on him. For some time pastor at Eisingen, he was called, in 1860, as professor of New-Test. exegesis to Zurich, and in 1873 to Giessen, where he died, Nov. 17, 1874. Keim published, Die Reformation der Reichstadt Ulm (Stuttgart, 1851);—Schweizerische Reformationsgeschichte bis zum ausserger Reichstag (1858);—Ambrosius Blarer, der schweizerische Reformer (1860);—Reformationsblätter der Reichsstadt Eisingen (ed.). When he went to Zurich he turned his studies to the beginnings of Christianity, and in this department won a lasting reputation by the following works: Die geschichtliche Würde Jesu Christi (Zurich, 1860);—Der geschichtliche Christus (1865; 2d ed. 1866);—Die Geschichte Jesu von Nazaret (1867-72; 8 vols.; Engl. transl., Jesus of Nazareth, Lond. 1873-82; 6 vols.), a life of Jesus from a rationalistic standpoint, though very learned and instructive. A popular form of this life of Jesus he published under the title, Die Geschichte Jesu nach den Ergebnissen heutiger Wissenschaft (Zurich, 1874; 2d ed. 1875). At Giessen he published Celsus wahres Wort (1875), and five years later his last work, Aus dem Urchristenthum. After

KELLMANN, CHRISTIAN, a Lutheran hymn-writer of Germany, was born Feb. 27, 1607, in Bohemia. He studied at Wittenberg, was in 1643 con-rector at Zittau, and in 1639 rector. He died Jan. 13, 1662. Of his many hymns some have been translated into English, and several of them (e.g. "Dass solt ich nie verlassen," in the Moravian Hymn-book, No. 392) :-

KELTHE, ALFRED D., D.D., a Presbyterian minister of the Free Church of Scotland, was born in Keith Hall, Aberdeen, in 1791. He received his education at Marischal College, Aberdeen. From 1818 to 1843 he was a clergyman of the Established Church of Scotland, at St. Cyrus, Kincardineshire, and subsequently a minister of the Free Church, but for many years, on account of failing health, he was unable to attend to parochial duties. The first edition of Evidences of the Truth of the Christian Religion, Derived from the Lives of the Nagel's History of Prophecy, a work which became a text-book in the colleges of England and Scotland, was published in 1828 (last ed., by his son, with photographic illustrations). Several other works on similar subjects, among which was Christianly Demonstrated, were published between 1831 and 1861. As one of the depositaries of the Scottish Church in France, he visited many of the scenes of Scripture prophecy, and an account of this mission was published under the title of A Narrative of the Mission to the Jews. Dr. Keith died at Buxton, Feb. 8, 1880. See N. Y. Observer, Feb. 18, 1880. (W. P. S.)

KEMP (or KEMPE), JOHN, a distinguished Anglican prelate and statesman, was born at Laneitch, in the parochial rectory of Long, in Staffordshire, in the county of Kent. He was educated at Canterbury; became a fellow of MerTon College, Ox ford, and graduated in laws; but confined his practice to canon law; and in 1413 was employed as a military man, to hold musters at Caen, and to inspect troops. The first dignity to which he was called was the archdeaconry of Flamborough, which he held for some years, and in 1417 was appointed, but he was in possession of it in 1419. In January of the same year Kemp was elected to the see of Rochester. The following year Henry V made him keeper of his privy seal; and within two years he was nominated chancellor of the duchy of Normandy. He was translated to the see of Chichester, Feb. 28, 1421; was again translated, and sat as bishop of London, Nov. 17 of the same year. On his appointment as a member of the council, which took place immediately after the accession of Henry VI, Kemp resigned the great seal of Normandy. He was sent, in May, 1425, with a letter from the council, in the king's name, to the duke of Bedford, regent of France; and was also commissioned to thank the regent, in the name of the king, for his diligence and service in the government of France and Normandy. In February, 1424, he went to the marches of Scotland, to treat for the release of the king of Scots. About a month before his translation to the see of York, which occurred in 1426, Kemp was appointed to succeed Beaufort as lord high chancellor of England, which office he retained six years, and then retired on the plea of ill-health. He resumed this office, however, in 1450. In 1433 he was chosen to represent the Church of England at the Council of Basle; he was also in the year following at the head of an embassy to France, and again in 1439. In the latter year Kemp was made archbishop of Canterbury, and took the title of St. Batha. He established a college at Wye as early as 1431. He enjoyed many important positions up to 1452, when he was appointed archbishop of Canterbury, July 21. Kemp attended to his duties faithfully to the last. He died suddenly, Feb. 24, 1454. See Hook, Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, v, 188 sq.

KEMP, JOHANN, a convert from Judaism, and professor of Hebrew and archaeology at Upsala, where he died in 1714, translated the New Test. into Hebrew, with annotations. Under the title, הבש יבש, he wrote an apology of Christianity, based upon the famous cabalistic storehouse, the Zohar. A specimen was published under the title, Phosphorus Orthodoxus Fidei . . . ex Hebr. ed. F. S. Leisler Deprompto, by A. Norden (Amsterdam, 1720). KENDALL, JAMES, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Sterling, Mass., Nov. 3, 1878. He graduated from Harvard College in 1895; passed two years as assistant teacher in Phillips Academy, Andover, and, at the same time pursuing his theological studies under the direction of Rev. Dr. Tappan, professor of divinity at Harvard College; was licensed by the Andover Association in 1895; in the same year was chosen tutor of Gresham College, and removed to Cambridge. He commenced preaching at Plymouth, as a candidate, in 1799, and was ordained there in January, 1800. He was the sole pastor of the Church for thirty-eight years, preaching frequently in other pulpits, and died March 17, 1859. Dr. Kendall published a great many single sermons. In his theological views he is believed to have been an Arian. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 427.

KENNARD, JOSEPH H., D.D., a distinguished Baptist minister, was born of Quaker parentage near Haldonfield, N.J., April 24, 1798. While residing in Wilmington, Del., he became a Christian, and united with the Baptist Church in that city, where he was licensed to preach, Sept. 5, 1816. In 1819 he was agent for fortieth mission in Delaware and New Jersey, and became pastor in Burlington, N.J., Nov. 14, 1819, and in January, 1822, of the Second Hopewell (N.J.) Church, where he remained until called to the Blockley Church, in what was then the suburbs of Philadelphia, Oct. 4, 1825. His labors in this field were abundant and successful. He acted also as a missionary in all the sections of country around his home. In January, 1832, he became pastor of what is now the Fourth Baptist Church in Philadelphia, and six years thereafter of the Tenth Baptist Church, where his labors were attended with remarkable success. He died there, June 24, 1866. With all the great benevolent societies of his own denomination he was in hearty sympathy, and with a truly Christian spirit he labored with his brethren of other denominations for the promotion of the cause of God and humanity. See J. Spencer Kenward's Memoir (Am. Baptist Soc. Phila., 1876.)

Kenne, Walke, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Washington County, Pa., May 8, 1808. He was converted in his nineteenth year, licensed to preach in 1831, and in 1832 entered the Pittsburgh Conference. His fields of labor were: Connellsville Circuit, Pennsylvania; Liberty Street, Pittsburgh; Wheeling, Va.; agent for Allegheny College; Smithfield Street, Pittsburgh; Beaver Street, Allegheny City, Wheeling; presiding elder of Barnsville District, O.; secretary of the Wesleyan Sabbath Union, Washington, Pa.; and Chagrin Street, Wheeling. In 1862 he was transferred to the Newark Conference, wherein he served Central Church and Clinton Street, Newark; in 1836 was transferred to the Philadelphia Conference, wherein he served Trinity Church and Wharton Street, Philadelphia; Asbury, Wilmington, Del.; Fifth Street, Philadelphia; St. Stephen's, Germantown; Idle one year, 1866; Easton, Md., 1867-68; Oldess, Del., 1870-72; presiding elder of Dover District, Wilmington Conference, from 1873 till his death in Smyrna, Del., June 24, 1875. Dr. Kenney was well educated, though not a college graduate. He excelled as a preacher, a model in piety, cleanliness, instructiveness, and spirituality. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1876, p. 29.

Kenreai, in Thibetan mythology, is the mighty arranger of chaos. Not born of men, but created by the supreme god, he adopted as an ape the name Prauropo, took the goddess Kadroma as female ape, by the name of Drasina, and populated Thibet with whence the whole earth became inhabited. We find him in a second incarnation, under the name of Guia-thris-thengo, in Thibet, where he was teacher of the people, lawgiver, and king. He taught them agriculture, civilized them, and left the kingdom, which he had reigned over for ninety-one years, to his son, from whom there were twenty-two, who together ruled one thousand one hundred and two years.

Keramiana, a Mohammedan sect, deriving their name from their founder, Mohammed ben-Keram, who maintained that God is possessed of a bodily form.

Keari, a Hindit sect who worshipped Devi in her terrible forms, and were wont to offer up human sacrifices, and to impale their victims to this sect still remaining in India are those who inflict upon themselves bodily tortures, and pierce their flesh with hooks.

Kerbela, among the Mohammedans, is a place held by the Shiites (q. v.) as peculiarly sacred, because it is the seat of the tomb of Hussein (q. v.), the son of Ali. It is situated in Asiratic Turkey, twenty-eight miles north-west of the ruins of Batrarah. It is a favorite place of pilgrimage to the Persian Mohammedans, who carry away small portions of the sacred soil, put it in little bags, which they place before them during their devotions to bow their heads upon, and thus worship on holy ground. The pilgrims resuming annually to Kerbela are estimated at eighty thousand, and they bring with them from Persia the second and third corsas annually to be interred in the sacred spot.

Kerfoot, John Barrett, D.D., L.L.D., a Protestant Episcopal bishop, was born in Dublin, Ireland, March 1, 1816, and educated at Flushing Institute and St. Paul's College, New York, where he graduated in 1834. He took deacon's orders in 1832, and priest's orders in 1837, and became president of St. James's College, Maryland, in 1842, and continued in that relation till 1864, when he became president of Trinity College. He was consecrated bishop of Pittsburgh, Pa., Jan. 25, 1866, and remained in that office until his death, July 10, 1881.

Keriath or Sironx, in Tell el-Kurirlein, lies twelve miles south of Hebron, and is thus described in the Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey (iii, 409):

"Traces of a large ruin and caves; apparently a large town."

Kerfoot says that the ruins cover an extent of at least 180 metres in circumference. The direction of many streets can be distinctly marked. The houses, some of which are large, are strewn everywhere over the ground, appear to have been constructed of materials regularly cut; most of them have cellars below them, and are all built of stone.

He also observed at the western end of the site the ruins of a Christian church, with a fine rectangular structure, originally some 180 by 80, and a choir of two semicircular apses. He found on this site a large heap of well-cut stones marked its outline. It was 80 paces long by 17 broad, and was preceded by a square area 20 paces on each side.

Kerkasaandi, in Hindu mythology, was the first Buddha, who appeared at the time when men reached the age of forty thousand years, to take their sins upon him. He does not now reign; the present reign is the fourth, and is called Shagkaamunii.

Kern, Friedrich Hierich, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born April 20, 1798, and died at Tubingen, Feb. 8, 1842, doctor and professor of theology. He wrote, Observationes ad Librum Jobi (Tubingen, 1828):—Commentationis de Virtute Christiana (part i, 1828):—Der Brief Jakobis untersucht und erklärt (1838).

See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 666; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit., ii. 206, 485. (B. F.)

Kern, Gottlob Christian, a Lutheran hymn-writer of Germany, was born Jan. 18, 1792. He studied at Tubingen, and was in 1820 deacon at Besigheim, Wurttenberg, in 1824 professor at the theological seminary in Schonstuhl, and died Aug. 5, 1855. Of his many hymns, one has been translated into English, as Drunkenness is ever to be curbed ("Oh, how could I forget Him?"

Kern, Johann, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born July 30, 1756. He studied at Tubingen and Gittingen, was in 1781 professor at the gymnasium in Ulm, and after 1790 preacher there besides. He died Jan. 17, 1801, leaving, Algemeine Chronologie fur die Zeiten nach Christi Geburt (Leipzig, 1779):—Der Katholizismus und der Protestantismus in ihrem gegenseitigen Verhaltnissen (Ulm, 1792):—Die Lehre von Gott (1796):—Die Lehre von der Freiheit und Unterbliehkeit der menschlichen Seele (1797). Kerma, in Galla mythology, was a god, represented with horns and deer-ears, on a bas-relief found at Notre-Dame, Paris, in 1702.

Kerr, Richard Hall, D.D., an English clergyman, was born in Dublin, Ireland, Feb. 8, 1769. He graduated from Trinity College in 1788, was ordained and appointed domesitic chaplain to the bishop of Sodor and Man in 1789, and in the following year went out to India, where he was appointed principal of the Portuguese College at Mankeim, Bombay. In 1793 he became one of the East India Company's chaplains; in 1798 the superintendent of the Military Orphan Asylum at Egmore, Madras; and in the same year junior chaplain of Fort St. George, which office he held in addition to the presidency of the orphanage. In 1804 he was appointed senior chaplain of Madras, in which position he served earnestly till his death, April 15, 1808. Dr. Kerr was an accomplished scholar, an impressive preacher, and very zealous in all his duties. See The (London) Christian Observer, Feb. 1812, p. 80, 150.

Kesson, Andrew, LL.D., a Wesleyan preacher, the son of a minister of the Established Church of Scotland, was born in Glasgow in 1814. He was educated at the university of that city, from which he received his degree, early united with the Methodists, began to exhort at the age of fifteen, was received by the British Wesleyan Conference in 1840, and devoted all his attainments to the missionary cause. For fifteen years he was principal of and Government National Training Institution in Colombo, Ceylon, for native Christian schoolmasters. He was eminently fitted for such work by his scholarly attainments, his gift of teaching, and his interest in the work. On his return to England he devoted seventy-three to the training of the training students. His pastoral labors were unceasing; his unassuming kindness made him the true friend of the poor, and his genial disposition won the love of all. His life was pure and upright, and his piety was beautiful in its unaffected meekness, its implicit trustfulness, and its unflagging fidelity. He resided in London during the latter part of his life. Kesson died while on a visit to Jersey, July 19, 1879. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1879, p. 40.

Kessler, John S., D.D., a learned and pious minister of the German Reformed Church, was born in Switzerland, Aug. 17, 1799. After graduating at the canton school of Chur, he pursued and completed his theological studies at the University of Basle in 1821, and soon after, at the early age of twenty-two, he was ordained to the gospel ministry at Devos, in the canton Glaris. In this field he labored up to 1844, when he emigrated to America and became pastor of several congregations in the vicinity of Woodstock, Vt. In 1845 he received a call to become assistant pastor to the Rev. J.C. Buecher, in Reading, Pa. He removed to Baltimore in 1847, and took charge of a German congregation lately organized. In this charge he spent seven years of earnest labor, when he was called to assist his son in carrying forward an institution established in Allentown, Pa., to train young men for the profession of teaching. In connection with his duties in the seminary, he also had charge of several country churches. Here he ended his long and useful life, Dec. 22, 1864. Dr. Kessler was a man of superior talents, finished education, amiable disposition, and great humanity. He contributed largely to the Kirchenzeitung, and also to Dr. Schaff's Kirchenfreund, and is the author of an unfinished work, Biblical Dictionary. He also aided in getting up a German hymn-book for the use of the Reformed Church. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church, iv, 167-174. (D. Y. H.)

Kestner, Christian August, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born in 1794, and died at Jena, Oct. 27, 1821, professor of theology. He is the author of, Uber den naturlichen Kufmunder den beiden ersten Schaffs, Conference Chur, Jena, 1819, and Chur, 1818. Also, Die Eschieb Auctoritate et Fide (1815). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit., i, 573, 575, 829. (B. P.)

Kettler, Wilhelm Emanuel, Baron von, an eminent German ecclesiastic, was born in Münster, Westphalia, Dec. 25, 1811, of a noble race, renowned in German annals in the Church and in the field. From 1834 to 1839 he entered the Jesuits at Breg, then to the universities of Göttingen, Berlin, Heidelberg, and Munich. At Heidelberg he had as fellow-student von Bismarck, afterwards prince-chancellor of the German empire. In 1838 the young Baron entered the army, and from 1834 to 1838 he occupied important civil situations in his native town. In the latter year he returned to Munich to study theology; in 1841 he was ordained priest, and was pastor at Beckum, Westphalia, two years, Hopsten, three years, and provost of the Church of St. Hedwigis, Berlin. In 1849 he received into the Church of the distinguished nobleman von Ida, cousin of Hahn-Hahn. In 1860 he was appointed to the bishopric of Mayence, where his labors were incessant and fruitful. He reopened the Episcopal Seminary, which had been closed for a quarter of a century, May 1, 1861, and furnished it with a fine staff of professors. After twenty-five years it was closed by order of the German government. Monsignor von Ketttler opened the smaller Seminary of Mayence, Aug. 11, 1864, and May 8, 1869, the one at Düsseldorf, both of which disappeared under the new German code. He conducted the most extensive correspondence and research in that ecclesiastical spirit, introduced severe examinations, and reinvigorated the body ecclesiastical of his diocese. In 1850 bishop von Ketttler recalled to Mayence the order of Capuchins; in 1856 he reconstituted the Jesuits in his diocese; in 1854 he established a congregation of Franciscan Sisters, whose duty it was to care for the indigent sick; in 1856 he founded an asylum for unemployed domestics; in 1854 the countess of Hahn-Hahn established at his suggestion a convent of Sisters of the Good Shepherd, wherein the pious foundresses remained till her death. Two years after he introduced the Sisters of the Perfect Adoration. In the same year he founded the orphanage of St. Mary at Neustadt for poor and unprotected girls, and placed it under the direction of the congregation of Finten (a village near Mayence), a charitable association of religious women, devoted to the free instruction of the poor, which he himself had founded in 1851. For poor orphans he instituted the hospital of St. Joseph at Klein- zimmern, also a school of the Christian Brothers at Mayence. In the last-mentioned year he laid the foundation stone of the new Workers' Circle, at the expense of many thousand members in Germany, and, as a companion to it, the Catholic Casino, established at the Hotel Frankfort, Mayence. Baron von Ketttler was at once a patriotic German and a devoted son of the Church. He was a man of action in the national assembly, member of the platform, and in the pulpit. He was a man of gigantic frame, princely bearing, tempered by Christian sweetness, a model for his priests, and beloved by his people. When on his fifth visit to Rome, in 1877, to assist in the fiftieth anniversary of the episcopate of Pius IX, he caught the typhoid fever, of which he died, July 13 of the same year. Von Ketttler's literary works were mostly of a polemical character, mainly on questions of present interest, bearing the stamp of his inebriated character, practical mind, and vast knowledge of men and books. See (N. Y.) Cuth. Almanac, 1878, p. 81. Ketttler, Georg F., D.D., a Methodist. Episcopal divine, was born in Boston, May 18, 1817. He received an exhorter's license in 1840, in 1841 was licensed to preach, and soon took charge of the Church in Haddam, Conn. In 1847 he was received into the New York Conference, and in 1849 was appointed pastor of the church in Madison, Madison, and Windsor, Conn. In 1847 he was appointed pastor of Vosey Street Church, New York City. Afterward he had charge of churches in Poughkeepsie, Rhinebeck, Philadelphia, and Brooklyn. He died in the last-named place, March 19, 1888. Dr. Ketttler was a most efficient preacher and pastor. He faithfully taught the principles of divine revelation to bear upon questions of practical ethics with a subtle power that amounted to genius. Some of these sermons are said to have been read with remarkable power. See Minutes of Anual Conference, 1884, p. 92.

Keux, JOHN LE., an eminent English architectural engraver, was born in London in 1788, and studied with Humphrey. He was employed nearly all the choice publcations in England, illustrative of Gothic architecture, that appeared in his time, as Britannia's Architectural Antiquities, Cathedrals, etc.; Gothic Specimens and Gothic Examples; the plates of the first volumes of Neale's Churches. He died in 1846.

Khalsa, one of the Vaishavas (q.v.) sects of the Hindus, founded by the Khalsa, was an order of Hindus, fxed in a distinctive form of worship. They are few in number, and either reside in certain limited districts or lead wandering lives.

They are distinguished from the other Vaishavas by the application of clay or ashes to their dress or persons. Those who resided in fixed establishments dress like the other Vaishavas, but those who lead a wandering life go either naked or nearly so, smearing their bodies with a pale gray mixture of earth and ash. They worship Siva, Vishnu, Sita, and Hanumun.

Khanda, in Buddhist philosophy, are the elements of the existence of which there are five: 1. The organized body, or the whole of being, apart from the mental processes; 2. Sensation; 3. Perception; 4. Discrimination; 5. Consciousness. The four last Khandas are results or properties of the first, which must be un-denied and included in the soul as well as the body.
At death the Khandas are believed to vanish entirely.

Khandoa, in Hinduism, is an incarnation of Siva, which is also called Bhairav (q.v.).

Kharejites (or recollers), a Mohammedan sect, who originally withdrew from Ali, and maintain that the Imam need not be of the tribe of Koresh, nor even a freeman, provided he be just and qualified. They maintain, too, that if unfit he may be deposed, and that the office itself is not indispensable.

Khafite, in Zenda mythology, are a series of wicked beings, who were especially created to punish the criminals of mankind. They were destroyed in the deluge by Tashter, the creative spirit.

Khas Version of the Scriptures. The Khasi (or Khasse) is the language of the Garo, Chiahs, Cwans, or Khassas, a race of Tutar or Chinese origin, ruled by a number of petty rajahs, who form a sort of confidedacy. The first version of Holy Scripture in this language was prepared by a lady. She was the widow of one of the chiefest of the country, and Dr. Carey praised himself of her intelligence in translating the New Testament. The preparation of this version occurred ten years: it was printed at Serampore in 1826.
For about seven years it remained a sealed book, for opportunity occurred of distributing it among the people for whom it had been prepared. In 1832 some of the missionaries at Serampore visited Cherrapoonji, a place in the Khasi country, and their attention was drawn afresh to the spiritual wants of the people. A missionary station was formed there, and Mr. Lish, the first missionary who entered upon the work, turned his attention to a revision of the Khasi version, and in 1841 he produced a new or amended translation of the gospel of Matthew, which was printed at Serampore in Roman characters. In 1841 the Rev. Thomas Jones of the Welsh Calvinistic Methodists occupied this station, and executed a new translation of Matthew's gospel, in Roman characters, which, in 1842, he published in the British and Foreign Bible Society. A small edition was printed as an experiment. After its value and fitness were fully attested by competent persons, the translation of the entire New Testament, was continued by the missionaries engaged on the above station. In 1874 the British and Foreign Bible Society announced that the translating and printing of the New Testament into this north-east Indian mountain dialect has been brought to a successful conclusion by the Rev. W. G. Lewis, who was materially aided in his labors by the late Rev.
W. T. Melder. The report for 1879 states that the mis-ionaries of the Calcutta Methodist Foreign Missionary Society were revising the New Testament. The Rev. W. G. Lewis, who read the proofs, is engaged in revising manuscript translations of parts of the Old Testament, and is also translating the book of Psalms.
Since then the Pentateuch has been published (1884). See Bible of Every Land, p. 17. (B.P.)

Khata (or scarf of blessings), an article considered indispensable in Tibet, because it bestows upon the individual who possesses it many blessings from above.
It is a piece of silk, nearly as fine as gauze, and of so pale a blue as to be nearly white. It is about three times as long as it is broad, and the two ends are usually fringed. They are of all sizes and prices, for a Khata is an article which neither rich nor poor can dispense with, and they are used on all imaginable occasions.
See Huc, Travels in Tartary, Tibet, and China.

Khatib, an ordinary Mohammedan priest, who conducts the worship of the mosque on Fridays. He records the prayers, and often preaches a short sermon. He is generally a very learned man.

Khattrn, a recitation of the entire Koran, which occupies about nine hours, and is customary at the funerals, weddings, and public festivals of Mohammed-anas, being regarded as meritorious in those who bear the expense.

Khedjum, a mythical flat-nosed satyr, with crown, standing on a leopard's skin, with a tail, on an Etruscan mirror, is conjoined with the goddess Minitukh.

Khem (or Horus-Khem, "The Bull of his Mother"), an ithyphallic deity of the ancient Egyptians, who was usually represented as standing upright, with his right arm extended in the act of scattering seed, and having behind it the threshing instrument, which is usually called a flagellum. His left hand and arm are closely enveloped in a thick robe, which swaths him like a mummy. His phallus is erected; and his headdress consists of two upright plumes similar to those of the deity Amen-Ra: he wears a large and richly-ornamented collar round his neck. Mythologically, Khem represented the idea of divinity in its double character of father and son. As father he was called the husband of his mother, while as a son he was assimilated to the god Horus. He properly symbolized generative power, and was the presiding deity of the dead, but submitting to a state of rigidity and inanimate over which he could not strip his left arm was fixed. In the one hundred and forty-sixth chapter of the Egyptian Ritual of the Dead, the deceased is said to exclaim, when his soul is reunited to his body, "that he has overcome his hardships, and that it is given him to extend his arm." Khem was also the symbolic deity of vegetable life, and it was probably in allusion to this theory that in a vignette to the Book of the Dead, the new birth of the deceased is represented by a tree growing out of his person while he lies upon a bier. The great festival of germination, in the Egyptian handwriting, was held in honor of the god Khem, and it is fully figured on the walls of the palace temple of Rameses III, at Medinet Habu. See Rawlinson, Hist. of Ancient Egypt, i, 331 sq.

Khemah, one of the principal female disciples of Buddha (q.v.).

Khirkhah (from roka), a name given to the dress generally worn by dressers (q.v.), which Mohammed-anas claim was the dress worn by the ancient prophets.

Khudum. See Gotama.

Khors, a god worshipped by the ancient Slavonians, an image of whom existed at Kioff before the introduction of Christianity. They were accustomed to offer to this deity the karoyg, or wedding-cake, and to sacri-ifice hens in his honor.
Khotheh, a prayer which Mohammed was accustomed to recite, and in which example he was followed by his successors. It consists of two parts: the first appropriated to the deity, the prophets, the first four caliphs, and the umma in general; the second includes the prayer for the reigning sovereign. Other khotheh are offered at certain stated seasons.

Kirshna. See Krishna.

Khumbandas, an order of beings among the Buddhists, who are believed to be the attendants of Viradhana, one of the four guardian Devas. They are monsters of immense size and disgusting form, have blue garments, a sword and a shield, and are clothed in the情形, and are mounted on blue horses. They form one of the thirteen orders of intelligence exclusive of the supreme Buddhhas.

Kiel, Tobias, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Ballstedt, near Gotha, Oct. 29, 1584. He studied at Jena, and died as pastor of his native place in 1627. He is the author of several hymns, one of which, Hier Gott nun sehnsucht den Himmel an, has been translated into English (Lyra Germ. ii. p. 579), "Lord God, now open wide thy heaven." See Koch, Geschichte des deutschen Kirchenleibes, ii. 208 sq.: Brückner, Kirchen und Schulen Studi um in Herzogthum Gotha, vol. iii (1786). (B. P.)

Kienzle, Heinrich Wilhelm, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Berlin in 1816. He studied at Strasburg, was pastor at Colmar in 1842, in 1858 at Strasburg, and died in 1876. He published, Sieben Jahr-Flamen oder Lehr-Visite (Basle, 1844): Enzyklopädie der Wissenschaften der protestantischen Theologie, etc. (1845); Comptes rendus de l'Académie (Paris, 1870). Besides, he contributed to the Studien und Kritiken, Herzog's Real-Enzyklopädie, Revue de Théologie, Revue d'Alsace, etc. See Lichtenberger, Enzyklopädie der Theologische Religionswissenschaft, etc. Zuchold, Bibli. Theol. i. 668. (B. P.)

Kierkegaard, Sören Aaby, a Danish philosophical and theological writer, was born May 5, 1813, at Copenhagen. He spent his whole life in his native city, and, being rich and unmarried, became a father to the poor. In 1838 he published pseudonymously From the Popes of a Lieing, and in 1841 a dissertation On the Idea of Irony. In 1847 he came to Copenhagen to join himself with Schelling's philosophy. In the following year he returned home, and from 1848 to the time of his death, Nov. 11, 1855, he devoted himself entirely to literary activity. In 1843 he published his Whether—Or, in two parts, representing respectively the mathematical and the ethical type of life, and placing indirectly before the reader the question: Which of these two types ought to be chosen? In the same year he published a small collection of Sermons: : Bits of Philosophy (1844); : Stations along the Road of Life (1845); : Lilles of the Field (1849); : Training for Christianity (1856); : How Christ Looks upon Official Christianity (1855), etc. During twelve years he prepared about thirty volumes for the press, and about as many he left in manuscript. All his writings, as it would seem, were executed according to a preconceived plan; and the subjects chosen were so written that all criticism grew silent. According to Kierkegaard Christianity is no scientific theory, but life and existence. Hence he rejected altogether the ideas of creed, Church, priest, etc. A Christian is, according to him, an insolated individual, alone with God, and in contact with the world only through suffering. Some of his writings were translated into German. As yet we have no biography which gives a satisfactory representation of his philosophical and religious standpoint. See the article "Kierkegaard," in Nordisk Konversations-Lexikon (1872); Petersen, Dr. Sören Kierkegaard's Christiansensforkynselse (Christiansen, 1877); Martensen, Christliche Ethik, § 69, 70, where Kierkegaard is compared with Vinet; Lüthke, Kirche. Kilickef, Bryan B., D.D., a Protestant Episcopalian clergyman, was born on the island of Barbadoes in 1807. He became rector in 1853, at Kittanning, Pa.; about 1857 of two churches, All-Saints, in Paradise, and Christ Church, in Leacock; and in 1864 returned to Kittanning. In 1866 he was rector of Grace Church, Mount Washington, and in the following year was made a missionary under the ecclesiastical authority of the diocese, residing at Kittanning, and officiating at McKeesport and vicinity, in which service he continued until within a short time of his death, April 11, 1872. Kimball, Joseph D., a Reformed (Dutch) minister, was born at Newburgh, N. Y., Aug. 17, 1820. He graduated from Union College in 1839, and from Newburgh Theological Seminary in 1843; was licensed by the Associate Reformed Church the same year; was pasted to the charge from 1843 to 1844 at Brearley; at Brockport: at Fishkill-on-the-Hudson, from 1845 to 1865; at Brooklyn, from 1865 to 1874, and died Dec. 6 of the latter year. Dr. Kimball was an able theologian, a laborious preacher, and a sympathetic pastor. See Corwin, Manual of the Reformed Church in America, 2d ed. p. 326.

Kincad, Eugenio, D.D., a distinguished Baptist missionary, was born at Mount Zion, Pa., in 1797, and brought up in southern New York. He was one of five students who formed the first class in what is now Madison University, Hamilton, N. Y. While pursuing his studies, he decided to become a foreign missionary. The war between England and Burmah led to the temporary postponement of his plan. Meanwhile he was pastor, for a time, of the church at Galway, and then, for five years, performed missionary labor in the mountainous district of central Pennsylvania. In the spring of 1830 he sailed from Boston to Bombay, and on reaching Maulmain towards the close of that year. He commenced at once the study of the language, giving twelve hours a day for six days to his work, and preaching on the Sabbath to the English soldiers stationed in that part of the country. Having acquired knowledge of the language, he spent a year preaching to the Church in Rangoon, and then went to Ava, the capital, and subsequently spent three months in visiting every town and village along the banks of the Irrawaddy. For nearly two months he lived in his boat, subjected to severe hardships; but he heroically continued his work among the natives, and at the end of fifteen months had baptized one hundred converts, and organized them into a church. After many years spent in laborious service for his Master, Dr. Kincad returned, in 1865, to the United States broken down in health, and spent some time in residence in Girard, Kan., where he died, April 3, 1888. See Cathcart, Baptists' Encyclopädie, p. 658. (J. C. S.)

King, George Ives, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Adams, N. Y., June 1, 1815. He studied at Lowville, graduated from Union College in 1838, and from Auburn Theological Seminary in 1844; was licensed to preach, and ordained to the pastoral care of Columbus, N. Y., in April, 1840; and for a time was principal of Union Academy, at Belleville, preaching to two feeble churches on alternate Sabbaths. In the fall of 1843 he was ordained pastor of the Westerwelle Church, by the Presbytery of Utica. In 1846 he contracted throat disease by overwork, and then spent two years travel-

King in the Southern States to restore his health; in 1848 he was installed pastor of the Church at Hanover, N. J.; in 1856 the First Church in Quincy, Ill., in 1866 the First Church in Jerseyville. He died in New Orleans, La., March 12, 1875. See Hist. of the Presb. Church in Illinois, vol. 1; Gen. Cat. of Auburn Theol. Sem..

King, John, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Chestnut Level, Lancaster Co., Pa., Dec. 5, 1740. He was educated at Philadelphia College; studied theology privately; was licensed by the Second Presbytery of Philadelphia in March, 1767; in 1769 was called to the professorship of Arabic and Theology at King's College, Chester, Pa., where he remained within a short time of his death, which occurred July 5, 1811. See Sprague, Amsa of the Amer. Pulpit, iii, 281.

King, Jonas, D.D., an eminent Congregational missionary, was born at Hawley, Franklin Co., Mass., July 29, 1792. He graduated from Williams College in 1814, and from the Theological Seminary at Andover in 1819. At the foundation of the new college at Amherst, in 1821, he was elected professor of Oriental languages and literature, having spent a part of the intervening time in missionary labors in the Southern States, and in 1822 was appointed rector in Christ's Church, New York, to prepare himself for the duties of his professorship. He offered his services to the American Board for three years, and in September, 1822, left Paris for Malta. In January, 1823, he reached Alexandria, in Egypt. There, with others, he spent three months preaching, distributing tracts and copies of the New Testament, and some time in the Holy Land, he returned to his native country in 1827. Having been invited to proceed to Greece in one of the vessels which was to carry out supplies to the afflicted inhabitants of that country, he resigned his professorship, but in 1830 he again put himself under the direction of the American Board, and in 1831 established a school at Athens, where he remained until his death, May 22, 1869. He wrote numerous works in modern Greek, and, on account of some sentiments thus expressed, he was sentenced to fifteen days' imprisonment and expulsion from the kingdom. The sentence, however, was not executed, on account of an official protest. His principal work is The Oriental Church and the Latin (N. Y. 1865). See Tren. Cat. of Amherst Theol. Sem., 1870, p. 1819; Memoirs of our Miss. Missionaries, p. 109; and his Memoir (N. Y. 1879).

King, William, D.D., an English Independent minister, was born in Wiltshire, June 9, 1701. He had pious parents, who educated him at the University of Utrecht, Holland, where he began to preach. He returned to England, and was ordained pastor at Chesham, Bucks, in April, 1725. He had offers of preferment in the Church, but being a dissenter from conviction, he refused them. In February, 1740, he settled as pastor at Hare Court, London, in 1748 was appointed one of the merchants' lecturers at Pinner's Hall, and delivered one hundred and ninety-two lectures there, the last in January, 1769. He was also evening lecturer at Silver Street, and a lecturer at Lime Street. He died March 4, 1769, and was interred at Bunhill Field. See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, iii, 299.

Kingo, Thomas, a famous hymn-writer of Denmark, was born Dec. 15, 1834, at Stangerup, in the island of Zealand, Denmark. He was a wealthy man, and was appointed pastor of his native parish in 1868, and bishop of Funen in 1867. He died in 1703. Kingo was a poet born, and a powerful Christian character, and he has given the Danish Church some of its best hymns. He published揍udelige Sang-Book, a collection of hymns, 1764; and another collection in 1781. He also compiled, at the instance of the government, a new hymn-book, known as Kingo's Paaalmbog, 1899, which is still in use. Kingsley, Charles, an eminent English clergyman and writer, was born at Holme Vicarage, near Dartmoor, Devonshire, June 12, 1819. He graduated from Magdalen College, Cambridge, in 1841; the same year became curate of Eversley, Hampshire, and rector in 1844, a position which he retained for the rest of his life. In 1859 he was appointed regius professor of history at Cambridge, but resigned in 1862, on being offered a canon's living at Selwyn College. In 1867 he was exchanged for one in Westminster Abbey. He was also chaplain in ordinary to the queen, and one of the chaplains to the prince of Wales. He died Jan. 23, 1875. Kingsley belonged to the "Broad Church" party, and was an earnest advocate of social improvement. He wrote a large number of popular works, most of them of a fictitious character, but highly instructive, the most noted of which perhaps was his Hypatia (1853)——also Alexandria and her Schools (1854). He frequently contributed to Fraser's Magazine, the North British Review, and wrote some articles for the Encyclopaedia Britannica (8th ed.). He was also known as a poet. See his Letters and Memoir, by his widow (Lond. 1876, 2 vols. 8vo., abridged ed. N. Y. 1877).

Kinos Version of the Scriptures. The Kinos is vernacular to the tribes of the Wanika, in eastern Africa. The late Dr. Krapf, who laid the foundation of the grammar and lexicography of the language, prepared the Kinos version of the gospels of Luke and John, and of the epistles to the Romans and Ephesians. But only the gospel of Luke was printed in 1848 at Bombay, in the American Mission press. In 1881 the gospel of Matthew was published, the translation having been made by the Rev. Thomas Wakefield, a missionary at Ribe since 1861. See Bible of Every Land, p. 438. (B. P.)

Kinnemund, Alexander, a Scotch prelate and doctor of theology, was bishop of Aberdeen, April 1, 1329. While he was in office there, the city of Aberdeen was burnt by thirty English ships, in 1338. He died soon after. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 110.

Kippurim (קִפּוּר, expiations, atonement), a name given by the Hebrews to the great day of atonement (q. v.), because on that day the sins of the whole people were understood to be expiated or pardoned.

Kirchhofer, Johannas, a Protestant theologian, was born Dec. 15, 1800, at Schaffhausen, in Switzerland. He studied at GTXingen and Halle, was in 1837 pastor at Hofwyl, in 1840 professor of Oriental Languages and Humanitatis, in his native city; in 1842 he was elected dean of St. John's, and in 1854 pastor there. He died Feb. 27, 1869. Kirchhofer took a very active part in the ecclesiastical affairs of his country. For a time he was the president of the synod, and as such exercised a great influence upon the younger theologians. Of his writings we mention especially, Quellen-samm'lung zur Geschichte des neutestamentlichen Coemus (Zurich, 1842-44)——Leitfaden zur Bibelkunde (2d ed. Stuttgart, 1860). See Dr. Johannes Kirchhofer, Dekan.

Kirghese-Tartar Version of the Scriptures.
The Kirghese-Tartrar is a dialect spoken by the Kirghese in Siberia and Turkestan. In 1818 the New Test. was translated by Charles Frazer, a Scottish missionary. Since this mission was abandoned, nothing was done for the circulation of the Word of God among this people, numbering about 1,500,000. In 1879, however, the British and Foreign Bible Society issued an edition of three thousand copies of Mr. Frazer's New Test., it being printed at the Kazan University press, under the care of professor Gottwaldt, who arranged the verses in the new edition as they stand in the Greek and English, besides revising a few passages which were badly translated. See Bible of Every Land, p. 849. (B. V.)

Kirjath-jearim. Lieut. Conder regards this as a different place from the simple Kirjath, and was inclined at first to locate it at Sobi (Test. Work. i, 22), but finally at Khurbet Ermo, two and a quarter miles south of Chesalon or Escla (Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey, iii, 46 sq., where he argues the question at length); but most geographers still incline to the position at Kuryet Enab (or simply el-Kuryet), a full description of the archeology of which is given in the same Memoirs (iii, 132 sq.).

Kirk, Edward Norris, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born in New York, Aug. 14, 1802. He graduated from the College of New Jersey in 1820, studied law eighteen months, and in 1824 graduated from Princeton Theological Seminary. He acted for a Kirklam, Robert, a minister of the Church of England, was one of the Oxford Methodists. He, in connection with the Wesleys and Mr. Morgan, were the four young men who began, in November, 1729, to spread evenings together, reading, chiefly, the Greek Text,—the inception of that movement which has so changed the religious life of the world. He was the son of Rev. Isaac Kirklam, of Stanton, in Gloucestershire; was a very intimate friend of Wesley's, and earned in his desire for higher life, faithfully keeping the rules of the Oxford Methodists. In 1731 he left Oxford and became his uncle's curate. Their facts are the limit of our knowledge concerning him. It is to be regretted that no record of his life can be found. See Tyerman, The Oxford Methodists, p. 1.

Kist, Nicolaus Christian, a Dutch theologian, was born April 11, 1738. After having completed his studies at Utrecht he was made doctor of theology in 1788, and was called as pastor to Zoolen, in the province of Gelderland. In 1825 he was appointed professor of theology at Leyden, and inaugurated his lectures by a discourse on De Progressione Insigni Humana in Dogmatice Historiae Christianae Animadversione. In connection with his colleague, Royemaker, he published Archief voor Kerckelijke Geschiedenis, Inzonderheid van Nederland (Leyden, 1829-49, 20 vols.; supplement in 2 vols., 1852-54). With W. Moll he published Archives Historiques-Ecclesiastiques (Amsterdam, 1857-59, 2 vols.). Of his other works we mention, Oriatene in qua Ecclesiasticae Reimaniae Christianae Spiritual Endowment (Leyden, 1838): De Vrije Wil de de Mensch een Reëel en Zedelijk Vrijweekend Wezen (1859). Kist died Dec. 11, 1865. See Wissel, Handbuch der theol. 1. 5, 544, 574; ii, 111; Zabert, Bibl. Thed. 12, 1869 sqq.; Liebensteiner, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Kitchen. This part of a monastic establishment invariably adjoined the refectory, behind it, in Benedictine houses, and on the side, usually, in Cistercian arrangements. The ordinary shape was square, but there were exceptions; thus, a boat-form was adopted at Mount St. Mary in England, and at Château de Villers, Sauxmsur, and Vendôme, an octagon at Pontlevoy, Caen, Durham, Glastonbury, and with little apses at Fontevraud. At Westminster there was a vaulted way to the hall; at Canterbury a covered alley; but in the smaller orders a hatch or window formed the means of communication. The kitchen was a kitchen for the infirm and the abbé had his own kitchen.

Kitchener was the marketer and purveyor who bought the provisions for kitchen use, and was overseer of the cooks, butchery, and fishponds. He visited the sick every morning; and saw that the broken meat was reserved for the poor.

Kitu, homage or reverence paid by one person to another among the natives of Japan. Inferiors being seated on their heels, according to the Japanese fashion, testified their respect for their superiors by laying the palms of their hands on the floor, and bending their bodies so low that their foreheads almost touched the ground. The superior responded by laying the palms of his hands upon his knees, and nodding or bowing, more or less low, according to the rank of the other party.

Kitwara, a deity among the savages in Virginia. They represented this god with a lighted pipe in his mouth, which a priest, cunningly concealed behind the idd, smoked, thus proving the god to be alive.

Klaproth, Heinrich Julius, a German Orientalist, was born in Berlin, Oct. 11, 1783. In 1802 he published, Asiatisches Magazin, and was made adjunct to the academy for Asiatic languages at St. Petersburg: Reise in den Kaukasus und Georgien zu der Anschauung der in 1790 und 1806 (Halle, 1812-14, 2 vols.; trad. into French, Paris, 1825). In 1812 he left the Russian civil service, went in 1814 to Italy, in 1815 to Paris, where he was made professor of the languages of Asia in 1816. He died Aug. 20, 1855. Besides the above works, he published, Geschichte der Beschreibungen des Kaukasus (Weimar, 1814); Reise nach Georgien und Inoreiiti (Berlin, 1815); Zeitschrift für die Gesellschaft der geographischen Freunde in Leipzig (1822); Asie Polgitique (1825); Théorie de l'Asie (1834); Mémoires relatifs à l'Asie (ed.); Collections d'Antiquités Egyptiennes (1829); Examen des Travaux du feu M. Champollion sur les Hiéroglyphes (1825); Aperçu Général des Trois Royaumes, Traduit de l'Original Japonais-Chinois (1839). (B. P.)

Klausing, Heinrich, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Dec. 29, 1765, in Westphalia. He studied at Wittenberg, commenced his academic career there in 1786, and was doctor of theology in 1710. In 1719 he was called to Leipzig as professor of theology, and died Oct. 2, 1743. His writings are very numerous, and his titles are given by Jocher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lehizion, s. v. (B. P.)

Klein, Anton, a Roman Catholic theologian, was born in 1788. In 1811 he received holy orders. He was for some time professor of Church history at Göttingen and Vienna, and died at the latter place, April 9, 1867. He is the author of Historie Ecclesiae Christianae (Göttingen, 1827, 2 vols.); Geschichte des Christenthums in Oesterreich und Steiermark (Vienna, 1840-42, 7 vols.) (B. P.)

Klemm, Johann Conrad, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Nov. 23, 1655. He studied at Tübingen, was in 1687 professor there, and died Feb. 18, 1717. He wrote, De venae sbiipinac ad 1 Cor. xir, 11: Vide ct. Kleutgouw, a Jesuit, was born at Dortmond, Sept. 11, 1630. In 1631 he joined his order, and received holy orders in 1857. For some time he lectured on rhetoric and philosophy at Freiburg and Brigg, Switzerland, went to Rome in 1843, where he became professor at the Collegium Germanicum. He died at St. Anton, in Tyrol, Jan. 14, 1853, leaving, Die Theologie
Knight, Franklin Lafayette, D.D., a Presbyterian Episcopal clergyman, was born in Maine, in August, 1824. He graduated from Bowdoin College in 1846; after teaching for several years, was elected professor of Greek and Latin in a Southern university; in 1855 he was ordained, and, for some time, was assistant minister in the state of Maine; in 1859 he was invited to be chaplain to the bishop of New Jersey. For a few years he was principal of the Diocesan Training and Theological School, in Tennessee. Resigning this position, he removed to Washington, D.C., where, during the remainder of his life, he was assistant minister in the Church of the Epiphany, and also in St. John's. He died there in April, 1876. Dr. Knight was a classical teacher of repute, of blameless life, retiring in disposition, highly esteemed and respected. See History of Bowdoin College, p. 632. (J. C. S.)

Knight, Richard, D.D., a Wesleyan Methodist minister, was born in Devon, England, in 1788. He was accepted by the British Conference, and sent to Newfoundland in 1816. He endured persecutions and hardships, escaped perilously, was appointed to Halifax, N. S., in 1822, labored therefor principally in Nova Scotia, and died at Sydney, N. S., March 2, 1874. Apparantly stern and unapproachable at first, a kind heart and large sympathies swelled in Knight's stalwart frame. Indulge when right, humble, dignified, zealous, cautious, courageous, yet gentle; he was an excellent preacher, well-read, and one of the ablest and most prominent ministers in the Methodist Episcopal Church. Dr. Knight was a strong friend of temperance, and published an address on the subject. He also published a Lecture on the Genius and Authenticity of Revelations (St. John's, N. B., 1830). See Hoestis, Memorial of Meth. Ministers in Canad. America, p. 36; Morgan, Bibliotheca Canadensis, p. 214.

Knoll, Albert Joseph, a Roman Catholic theologian, was born in 1796. He received holy orders in 1818 at Trent, and joined in the same year the order of the Capuchins. In 1820 he was teacher of religious philosophy, in 1823 professor of dogmatics, in 1847 custos-general at Rome. He died at Bolzen, Tyrol, March 30, 1863. Knoll published, Institutiones Theologiae Generalis seu Fundamentalis (Innsbruck, 1846; 4th ed. 1865) — Expositio Regularis F. P. Monium S. P. Franscens Assisi Congregata (Ibíd, 1857) — Institutiones Theologiae Dogmaticae - Polonicae Concinnatae (Turin, 1862-64, 6 vols.). After his death was published Institutiones Theologiae Theoreticae seu Dogmatico-Polonicae (1865, 2 vols.). (B. P.)

Knolton, Miles Justin, D.D., a distinguished missionary of the American Baptist Missionary Union, was born at West Wardsborough, Vt., Feb. 8, 1825. When quite young he was sent to the academy at West Townsend, and while there determined to enter the Christian ministry. His college and theological studies were pursued at Madison University, Hamilton, N. Y., where he graduated in 1855. He was ordained at West Wardsborough, Oct. 8 of the same year, and, with his wife, Lucy Ann (St. John), embarked for China. And arrived in June, 1854, at Ningpo, where, with singular earnestness and marked success, he labored for nearly twenty years. He died there, Sept. 10, 1874. Among the qualities which made him a model missionary were his remarkable singleness of purpose, his persistence in active labor, and his gentle bearing towards the people. See Amer. Bapt. Mission Quarterly, v. p. 91. (J. C. S.)

Knox, Andrew, a Scotch prelate, of the same family with the Scottish reformer, was born at Ranfurly, in Renfrewshire. He was educated at Glasgow, was first minister at Lochwinnoch, and then at Paisley. King James made him bishop of the Isles in April, 1806, where he distinguished himself by his attention to the propaganda of religion. In 1822 he was translated to the see of Raphoe, in Ireland, where he remained until his death, Nov. 7, 1853. See Biogr. hist. of the Free Church in Ireland; Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 508.

Knox, Hugh, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Ireland, and came to America in 1751. He spent several years in teaching, leading a somewhat dissipated life; but he shook off his follies and entered Nassau Hall, and graduated in 1754. He studied divinity with President Buren, at his ordination preparatory to his accepting a call to the island of Saba, the New York Presbytery was so much pleased with his trial sermon on the Dignity and Importance of the Gospel Ministry, that they unanimously requested it for publication. A sermon preached by him, On the Source of Human Inequality, was published by Bishop Hobart in 1808, and became the subject of much controversy on the distinction between natural and moral inequality. The Presbytery corresponded with him yearly through Dr. Rodgers, and expressed regret on hearing of the declining condition of his health. The celebrated Alexander Hamilton, in early boyhood, was placed under the instruction of Dr. Knox. He published two volumes of sermons on interesting subjects, at Glasgow, in 1772. He spent the closing years of his life at St. Croix, and died there in October, 1870. See Webster, Hist. of the Free Church in America.

Knox, John P., D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Savannah, Ga., July 28, 1811. He graduated from Rutgers College and the Theological Seminary, New Brunswick, N. J., and was ordained pastor of the Reformed Church of Nassau, N. Y. After this he served as pastor of the Reformed Church at Utica, for two years. He then went to St. Thomas, W.I., where he spent ten years of ministerial labor, and then returned to the United States and accepted a call, in 1855, to the Presbytery Church at Newtown, L. I. In this old church he labored with zeal, and was published for his death, June 2, 1882. See N. Y. Observer, June 8, 1882.

Knox, Thomas, a Scotch prelate, and son of Andrew Knox, was made bishop of the Isles upon his father's translation, in 1622. He died in 1626. See Knox, Robert, Bischof.

Knox, William Eaton, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Knoxboro, Oneida Co., N. Y., Oct. 16, 1829. He graduated from Hamilton College in 1840, and pursued his theological studies at Auburn Seminary. In 1844 he was ordained pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Watertown, and in 1848 of that in Rome. In 1870 he accepted a call from the First Presbyterian Church at Elmira, where he continued for the rest of his life. He died at Blue Mountain Lake, in the Adirondacks, Sept. 17, 1888. He occupied an elevated position among his clerical brethren. See N. Y. Observer, Sept. 28, 1888; gent. Cat. of Auburn Theol. Sem., 1888, p. 70.
