Koch, Ignatius, D.D., a Protestant Episcopalian clergyman, first appears in the record as rector of St. John's Church, Western, Missouri. In 1855 he became rector of St. John's Church, Valparaiso, Ind. The following year he was a teacher in Palmyra College in Missouri. In 1867 he was appointed a missionary to the German population in Mausville, Ky., and served in this relation until about 1870, when he was elected principal of St. John's Academy, Jacksonville, Fla., besides performing missionary work in adjacent places. He remained until his death, which occurred Dec. 8, 1872. See Proc. Evangelical Church, 1873, p. 134.

Kohlbrügge, Hermann Friedrich, the founder of the Dutch-Reformed congregation at Elberfeld, was born at Amsterdam, Aug. 15, 1808. He was of Lutheran parentage, and after studying theology became preacher to a Lutheran congregation in Amsterdam. But the rationalism of his colleagues brought about a conflict which resulted in his deposition. He took the degree of doctor of theology at Utrecht, and after living for several years in retirement joined the Reformed Church. While travelling through the Rhine regions in 1834, where just at that time a kind of revival took place, he published other works, and made a deep impression. After many difficulties, the Reformed congregation at Elberfeld, which had separated from the state establishment, chose Kohlbrügge for its minister (1847), constituting itself as a member of the Church of the Netherlands. At Elberfeld Kohlbrügge labored with great success till his death, March 5, 1875. Besides a considerable number of sermons, he published, Das siebente Capitel des Briefes Pauli an die Römer (5d ed, 1853);—Wozu das Alte Testament (ed.), etc. See Zuchold, Bibli. Kohler, Anthony, an eminent Roman Catholic author, was born at Kaisersberg, near Colmar, July 13, 1771. He was ordained priest in April, 1796, joined the fathers of the Sacred Heart, and in 1799 he served those who were taken with the plague in Hagenbursen, and was appointed chief chaplain of the Austrian military hospitals in Padua, whose moral and physical state was described as frightful. He exercised the ministry in Upper Germany and in Prussia until, in 1805, he entered the Society of Jesus. In 1807 he was sent to America, a part of the time superior of the Jesuit missions. In 1809 he visited Thomas Faine on his death-bed, and com-

KOI VERSION OF THE SCRIPTURES. The Kośa (or Kūnkā) is the proper language of the Konca, a long, narrow tract of land, the continuation of Malabar and Canara. It is a dialect of the Marathi, influenced by the Davidian languages of South India. It is spoken by upwards of one hundred thousand inhabitants, chiefly on the western coast. The majority of the people belong to the Hindu faith, but many are Roman Catholics; some of them speak the language with a mixture of Portuguese words. A version of the New Testament into this language was executed at Serampore about the years 1806 and 1810, and was printed in the Devangari character. In 1821 the Pentateuch left the press. Of late (1886) the gospels of John and Matthew have been published by the Madras Auxiliary Society, in a revised form, so as to be better understood by all classes. See Bible of Every Land, p. 125. Kouren of the Thousand Lamas, a celebrated lamasery in Tartsuy, which dates from the invasion of China by the Manchoues. The ground and revenues were given by a Chinese emperor, who had recently come into possession of the throne, in token of his gratitude for a favorable prophecy given by a lama before his conquest. It was designed originally to maintain a thousand lamas, but has made such progress that it now contains more than four thousand. Krauth, Charles Fosterfield, D.D., LL.D., an eminent Lutheran divine, eldest son of Dr. Charles Philip Krauth (q. v.), was born at Martinsburg, Va., March 17, 1828. He graduated from Pennsylvania College, Gettysburg, in 1859; studied theology under Drs. Schmucke and Schmidt; was ordained in 1842, and became pastor in Baltimore, Md. He subsequently resided in Winchester, Va. (1848-65), and Pittsburgh, Pa. In 1859 he was called to the pastorate of St. Mark's Lutheran Church, Philadelphia, and two years afterwards became editor of the Lutheran and Missionary. In 1864 he was appointed professor of theology and Church history in the new Lutheran Seminary, in Philadelphia, and in 1868 professor of philosophy in the University of Pennsylvania, of which he became vice-provost five years subsequently, a position which he retained until his death, Jan. 2, 1883. He had continued preaching, having temporary charge of various churches in the same city, and spent some time in the West Indies in 1852, a visit which occasioned his Sketches of the Danish West Indies. He is the author of a large number of works, among which we mention, a translation of Tholuck's Commentary on John; Constructive Reformation (1872); Berkeley's Philosophical Writings (1874)—and an enlarged edition of Fleming's Vocabulary of Philosophy (1877). He was several times president of the Lutheran council, a member of various literary societies, and a member of the American Committee on Bible Revision. His rare attainments, ripe scholarship, genuine catholicity, wise conservatism, and noble spirit made his influence wide and deep, not only in his own denomination, but far beyond it. See Luth. Church Rev, July, 1883.

Kritta (or Satya), the age of truth, according to the Hindu system, being the earliest in the history of the human race, the one in which man sprang from the hand of his Creator, pure and sinless, not divided into conflicting orders, and with all his faculties working together in harmony.

Kritzler, Heinrich, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born in 1829. For a time preacher in St. Petersburg, Russia, he was called in 1874 as professor of the theological seminary at Herborn, and died April 11, 1878. He wrote, \"Die Heldenzeiten des Christenthums\" (Leipsic, 1856)—Humanität und Christentum (Gottingen, 1867, 2 vols.)—Die deutsche evangelische Kirche in der Gegenwart (1869)—Christliche Kirche (Wiesbaden, 1874). Kabiriyana, the military caste of the Hindus, sprung from the arm of Brahma, whose office it is to protect their fellows from internal violence and outward assault. Their duties are to defend the people, give alms, and read the Vedas; and at any age up to twenty-two and twenty-four they must be invested with the mark of the caste. It no longer exists, however, as a distinct caste or division of society.

Kulik (or Kulikoff), one of the chiefs of the Nogus, a serpents, in Hindu mythology, who complained to the Lord of the universe that for no fault of his he was continually tormented by the Suras, or inferior gods. In answer to his prayer, Brahma is said to have enjoined that he should receive adoration like the devas from each human being, and that mortals who refused to pay such worship to him should be cut off by some unnatural death, and deprived of the power of rising higher in the scale of created beings. See Hardwick, Christ and Other Masters.

Kumao-Goo, a species of oread in use among the Japanese for the detection of crime. The goo is a piece of paper, formally sealed with the signet of the Kamaboko (q. v.), on which are drawn several mysterious characters, and the figures of various ill-omened birds. All goos are not of equal value; the most powerful, and those most dreaded by the demons, come from a place called Kumao. The oracle above named consists of a black inked cross attached to a small piece of paper, and is dipped in a certain quantity of water. If he be guilty, the goo twinges and gripes him in the most violent manner, till he is obliged to confess his guilt.

Kumao Version of the Scriptures. The Kumao dialect is closely allied to the Hinduwee, and is spoken in the province of Kumao, subject to Great Britain. A version of the New Test. was commenced at Serampore in 1814, and was completed at press about the year 1826. It has never been reprinted since. See Bible of Every Land, p. 123. (B. P.)

\textbf{Kunze, John Christopher, D.D.}, a Lutheran minister, was born in Saxony, and educated at the Orphan House and the University of Halle. Upon a request from the St. Michael and Zion churches at Philadelphia, Pa., he was selected by the theological faculty of Halle, and ordained as rector of those churches in 1854. For fourteen years he was connected with the Lutheran congregations in Philadelphia, under various names, and then he accepted a call to a church in New York city, where he labored about twenty-four years. At one time he was professor of Hebrew in Columbia College. At his request the Synod of the Reformed Church of Hartsick Seminary he was made professor of theology in that institution, a position which he continued to hold until his death, July 24, 1807, at the age of sixty-three years. It was said of him that he was the most learned theologian of the Lutheran Church in America. His library was extensive, and he had a large acquaintance with Oriental literature. As a preacher, he was distinguished for eloquence and the instructive character of his discourses. With the assistance of Mr. Streib, he published an \textit{English Lutheran Hymn-book} in 1785, see \textit{Gen. Ass. Rev. of Evang. Luth. Church}, vili, 277; \textit{Lutheran Observer}, Feb. 15, 1853.

\textbf{Kupay}, in the mythology of the Persians, was an evil spirit, whom they did not worship, but at the mention of whose name they spat on the ground, a sign of contempt.

\textbf{Kurdish Version of the Scriptures}. The Kurdish is in all probability a remnant of the old Parsi or Parsi language, and bears much resemblance to modern Persian. Like most dialects used merely for oral communication through a large extent of territory, the language of the Kurds, having no literature or written standard of appeal, undergoes very considerable alterations and modifications in different places, by intermixture with the language of neighboring nations. Thus the Kurds dwelling in the Ottoman empire have adopted many Turkish words, while corrupted Syriac words have crept into the dialects of the tribes who live in the vicinity, or have embraced the religion, of the Nestorian Christians. In 1822 the Rev. H. Leeser, proposed to the British and Foreign Bible Society to have a version in Kurdish made. The preparation of the version was intrusted to bishop Schevris, at Tabreez. In 1827 Mr. Leeser forwarded to the committee the portions of the New Testament which had been translated. But this translation was not intelligible to the Kurds. In 1856 the above society published in Armeno-Kurdish the gospel of Matthew, which was followed by the other gospels. In the Armeno-Kurdish dialect the entire New Testament is now extant. See \textit{Bible of Every Land}, p, 92. (B. P.)

\textbf{Kurko} was a god of the Lithuanians, or heathen Prussians. His seat was not at Romove, where the gods of the ancient Prussians presided; but everywhere in the forest his idol stood under mighty oak-trees. The first-fruits of the field were sacrificed to him.

\textbf{Kurma}, in Hind\textit{h} mythology, is the incarnation of the god Vishnu as a tortoise. When the mountain Mandar left the Milky Sea, for the purpose of preparing the drink of immortality, it threatened to sink in the waves; but Vishnu, in his second incarnation, supported it as a tortoise, and thus the world now stands.

\textbf{Kurudu}, in Lamism, is one of the seven holy relics placed on the altar in the temple of the Lamaiiste deity. It is a drum, in which all the prayers are written on a long strip of parchment, wound around two rolls. If one of these rolls is turned by a crooked handle, the prayers wind themselves around this roll from the other. Thus these prayers all appear in order under the cover of Kurudu. Praying, among the Kalnmucks, Tatars, Mongolians, etc., means to turn this handle and let God read them. Those praying continue their daily occupations during prayer without disturbing the sanctity of the act.

\textbf{Kusa}, the sacred grass of the Hindoos, on which the Yogi, or Hindoo ascetic, is required to sit motionless and meditate.

\textbf{Kusa Bolivia of the Scriptures}. The Kusala is a dialect spoken in Strong Island, Micronesia. In 1868 the gospel of John was published in this language by the American Bible Society. (B. P.)

\textbf{Kusala, meri}, among the Buddhists, which is included in Karma (q. v.). "There are three principal meanings of the word \textit{kusala}, viz., freedom from sickness, exemption from blame, and reward; but as used by Buddha, its primary sense is that of idiom or expression. It has a cognate use in the word \textit{kusa}, the sacrificial grass that cuts with both its edges the hand of him who lays hold of it carelessly. That which is cut by kusala is \textit{klahin}, evil desire, or the cleaving to existence. \textit{Akusala} is the opposite of kusala. That which is neither kusala nor akusala is \textit{akusala}, it is not followed by any consequence; it receives no reward, either good or bad." \textbf{Kuster, Samuel Christian Gottfried}, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Havelberg, Aug, 18, 1782. From 1804 till 1829 he was director of the teachers' seminary; in 1830 he was appointed superintendent and first preacher at the Friedrichs-Werdem Church, and died at Neustadt - Eberswalde, Aug, 22, 1838, doctor of theology. Besides sermons and ascetical works, he published \textit{Die Paulusen, mit Einleitungen und Anmerkungen bearbeitet} (Berlin, 1822). See Zuchold, \textit{Hibl. \textbf{Kutscher, Johann Baptist}, a Roman Catholic priest, was born April 11, 1810, at Wiese, in Austro-Silesia. He studied at Olmizt, was made priest in 1838, and doctor of theology in 1834. For a time on till 1851 he acted as professor of moral theology at Olmzt, was then appointed court-chaplain at Vienna, and in 1862 cathedral-provost and general-vicar of the Vienna diocese. He was the right hand of cardinal Rauchelt (q. v.), and took an active part in all ecclesiastical affairs. At the special request of the latter he was appointed his successor, and his appointment as prince-archbishop of Vienna was made in 1876. In 1877 he was made cardinal, and died Jan, 27, 1881. He was a very moderate prelate, and Austria owes it to him that she was enabled to bring about the present religious legislation, without coming into a bitter conflict with the Roman see. He always went with the government party. He wrote, \textit{Die gemachten Ehren, von dem katholisch-kirchlichen Stadtpfeiffer} (3d ed. Vienna, 1842). (B. P.)

\textbf{Kutuchta}, the chief priest of the Balass-Tatars and Western Mongolia. Formerly he was subject to the Dali-Lama (q. v.), of Thibet, but in course of time he made a schism among the Lamists, and established himself on an equal footing with the Dali Lama himself. He is considered as a very sacred personage, and there is more or less of mystery always connected with his person in the minds of the common people.
KUZMANY, ALEXANDER DE, a Scotch prelate, was elected bishop of Aberdeen in 1357. He here re¬mained until about 1376, when he was sent on an embassy from king Robert II to renew the ancient league with France, and died at Scone the year after his return, in 1382. Labaree, Benjamin, D.D., LL.D., a Congregational minister and distinguished educator, was born in Charlestown, N. H., June 3, 1801. He graduated at Dartmouth College in 1826, and at Andover Theological Seminary in 1831; was ordained at Bradford, Mass., Sept. 26 of the same year, and for a time was a home missionary in Tennessee. From 1832 to 1837 he was professor of an¬cient languages, and president of Jackson College; for the next three years secretary of the Central American Educational Society. He was called to the presidency of Middlebury College, Vt., in 1840, and remained in office twenty-six years. From 1867 to 1889 he resided in Hyde Park, Mass., preaching for a part of this time at South Weymouth. His residence thereafter was in West Roxbury (1870-73), Charlestown, N. H., and Walpole from 1880 till his death, Nov. 18, 1885. See Boston Al¬bion, Nov. 21, 1881; Trienn. Catalogue of Andover Theol. Sem., 1870, p. 94; N. Y. Observer, Nov. 22, 1888; Cong. Labbé, Martin, a French prelate and missionary, was born at Le Luc, near Caen. He entered the Socie¬ty of Jesus, and requested to be sent to the foreign missions. He went to Cochinchina in 1768, and re¬turned in 1827. In 1807, he also made a second visit to the East Indies. After a short sojourn in Europe he returned to Cochinchina, where he lived fifteen years, in the midst of fatigues and perils. He died in 1789, leaving a letter to pope Clement XI, on the worship of the Church of China also a memoir on the persecutions. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Labergens, Gottfried, a Roman Catholic theolo¬gian of Germany, was born at Fulda, May 6, 1802. He received holy orders in 1825, and was appointed at the same time professor of Oriental languages and of Old-Test. exegesis. In 1829 he was cathedral dean, in 1830 became doctor of theology, and died March 13, 1873, at his na¬tive place. He wrote, Die Vereinigung Interpretation (Fulda, 1836)—Katholische Homeristik (Ratisbon, 1841)—Grammatik der Hebr. Sprache (Paderborn, 1867). (B. F.)

Labouchère, Pierre Antoine, a noted French Protestant painter, was born at Nantes, Nov. 29, 1807, and studied in Germany and in England. He had been placed at first in a commercial house at Antwerp, and made, in 1827, a journey to the United States, as secretary of M. Bates, and in 1832 went to China as supercargo of a vessel of Nantes, which belonged to his elder brother. Painting, however, seems to have been his preoccupa¬tion, and a visit to Antwerp decided his voca¬tion, and he accordingly became a pupil of Paul Dela¬roche. He died at Paris in 1873. Labouchère chiefly painted historical subjects, especially those of the Reformation in Germany. He left a set of subjects drawn from the life of Luther, which have been engraved, and are accompanied with a text by Miret d'Aubigné. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

La Bruyère, Stephen de, a French prelate, was elected bishop of Nantes some time before 1215, and was involved in a contest with Peter Maucier, duke of Brittany, on the privileges of the clergy, which resulted in the bishop's forcible expulsion from his diocese in 1219. He withdrew to Rome, but after some months returned to his functions, and died at Nantes, Feb. 8, 1227. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Labyrinth. At St. Berin's, in St. Omer, there was one of those curious floors, representing the Temple of Jerusalem, with stations for pilgrims, and actually vis¬ited and traversed by them as a compromise for not going to the Holy Land in fulfillment of a vow. The labyrinth was destroyed in 1768; and Jerôme and Amiens shared the same fate in 1823. There is a round labyrinth in the centre of the nave of Chartres, inlaid with lead; another, of encaustic tiles, in the chap¬ter-house of Bayeux; and a third, of octagonal shape, in the nave of St. Quentin.

La Chapelle. On the identification of this place, Liest. Conder remarks (Test Work, ii, 168): "We visited Um Lass, the site proposed by Dr. Rob¬inson, and could not but conclude that no ancient or important city ever stood there, nor has the name any radical similarity to that of La Chapelle. (This is surely a mistake, as it originated in at least the name of the more can be said in favour of his own proposal.) Much nearer, indeed, would be the title of Imm, applying to a large au¬cropli at the foot of the hill, and in the proper position for La Chapelle. The modern site means a 'water-pip,' and, if it is a corruption of the Chapele, it would afford a second instance of a change which seems to have taken place in the case of Michmash—"The Capping Ange," and tells us to Teill el-Heyt is not much greater than that given in the Omission for La Chapelle, while the proximity of Einan of students who came under his influence at the university, now scattered all over the land and in other nations, bear cheerful testimony to his great personal worth. As a thinker and writer he was bold, independent, and progressive, fervent in his attachment to truth, ardent in his devotion to the Church, broad in charity, and incapable of bigotry or cant. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1879, p. 47.

Leda (or Lado), in Slavonic mythology, was the goddess of beauty and love, worshipped in Kiev. Lel (love), Did (return love), and Poli (marriage) were her sons. There are still traces of an idol worship in the festival early celebrated at Lada and Did, which falls on the Thursday before Whit Sunsultintide.

Ladvocat, Billaud Nicolaus, a French prelate, was born at Paris in 1620. He entered the ministry, was received in the Sorbonne, Dec. 24, 1652, and became canon of Notre Dame and vicar-general of the coadjutor of Paris, Albert de Conti, cardinal of Rez, whom he assisted for several years in his political intrigues, in the administration of his diocese, and whom he accompanied to Rome in 1675. In 1677 he obtained the episcopal see of Boulogne-sur-Mer. He governed his diocese wisely, where he also founded a seminary and some establishments of instruction and of charity. He died April 14, 1681, leaving Francois Pottier (Paris, 1679), which maintains that the Virgin Mary was taken up into heaven bodily. He also composed the first rules which were observed in the Hôtel Dieu de Paris. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Laetusius, Laurentius, a Lutheran minister of Germany, was born in Franconia, April 15, 1572. He studied at Jena and Wittenberg, was in 1595 elected, and attended the colloquy at Ratisbon in 1601; in 1602 he was rector at Heilbronn, in 1605 first preacher at Onolbach, and died July 26, 1684. He wrote, Criterium Fidei: Index Heresivm Contraevangelistarum et Schismatvm, etc.; Emessius Arctici de Persona et Officio Christi Bellarmino Opposita. See Freher, Theorvm Eruditorvm; Witte, Diarium Biographicum; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Laetus, Georom, a preacher at Lublin, Poland, who died March 27, 1649, is the author of, Pergeratian Pauli Romana: --Comment. Prac. in Politia Conversionis: --De Ratione Concomitandi ad Methodum Dominici Conformata. See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit., i. 559; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

La Perronnays, Jules Bazile Ferron de, a French prelate, was born at the castle of St. Marie-les-Anciens, Jan. 9, 1693. After he had finished his studies, he entered into orders, and followed cardinal Ferrier to Portheims from Rome, to the conclave which elected Clement XIV, in 1709. On Dec. 24 of the same year he was nominated bishop of St. Brienc, and was transferred to the bishopric of Bayonne in 1774, and to the episcopal see of Lusitania, which he resigned until 1790. He refused to take the oath to the civil constitution of the clergy, and left France in 1791. He was pursued by the French soldiers, and retired to Bavaria, where he died, May 15, 1799. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Laftau, Pierre François, a French prelate, was born at Bordeaux in 1685. He studied among the Jesuits, and for some time was very active in the affairs of Jansenism. He was sent to Rome as an ambassador, was consecrated there bishop of Siserton in 1719, and took possession of his see the following year. He is said to have been immoral ever in life, but afterwards a pattern of piety. Laftau died at Siserton, Apr. 3, 1764, leaving several works on practical religion, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Lafo al-jemmin (the thief on the right hand), a festival observed by the Syrian Christians in commemoration of the penitent thief. It occurs on the octave of Easter.
LAFORET, NICOLAS JOSEPH, a Roman Catholic theologian, was born in 1823 at Grafe, Namur (Belgium). In 1848 he was called as professor to Louvain, and died Jan. 26, 1872. He wrote, Histoire de la Théologie Dogmatique:—Vie et Travées d'Arnold Tüx.—Les Dogmes Catholiques, in L'Apostolat et la Civilisation:—Histoire de la Philosophie. (B. F.)

Laga, in Norse mythology, was the goddess of the refreshing springs and waters. She lives in Siouqabekr, a silver palace, by which the waters of the earth flow. Odin visits her daily to bathe there.

Lagarto, Pedro, a Portuguese prelate and theologian, was born at Setubal about 1524. In 1540 he journeyed to Rome under the rule of Arrabida, who had then the rule of St. Francis; afterwards studied theology at Salamanca, and was elected in 1576 provincial of Arrabida. He died July 28, 1590, leaving Summa Divina Omnium Notabilium. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Lagomarsini, Geronimo, a celebrated Italian Humanist, was born Sept. 30, 1486, at Porto-Santo-Maria (Spain). In 1708 he went to Italy, and commenced his studies in the College of the Jesuits at Prato, in Tuscany. In 1721 he began to teach rhetoric at the College of Arezzo. Four years afterwards he went to Rome to complete his theological studies, after which he returned to Arezzo. In 1722 he was appointed to the chair of rhetoric at Florence, and in 1751 to that of Greek in the Collegium Gregorianum at Rome, which position he occupied until his death, May 18, 1773. He left several works on classical literature, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Lagraune (de l'Arville), Henri de, a French prelate, was born at Calais in 1618, of an ancient family of the 15th century, which had been settled at Berry. He went to Poland about 1674, where he finally devoted himself to the Church, and was consecrated cardinal, in 1695, by Innocent XII. After the death of Sobieski, his son-in-law, he was made prince and rector of the queen of Poland, and was nominated to the see of Rome, where Lagrange died seven years afterwards, May 24, 1707. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Lagrenée, Louis Jean François, an eminent French painter, was born at Paris, Dec. 30, 1724, and studied under Charles Vanloo. He gained the grand prize of the French Academy for his picture of Joseph Exequelis, in the year 1741. He was then in Russia, and at the time of his visit to London, and was employed by Antonio Verrio upon the large picture of St. Bartholomew's Hospital. He was also unanimously chosen by the commissioners to paint the cupola of St. Paul's. He died in Paris, June 17, 1793. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Lagus, Daniel, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born in 1618 at Colberg, Pomerania. He studied at Königsberg and Wittenberg, and in 1658 doctor of theology, and for some time professor of theology at Greifswald. He died May 30, 1676, leaving, Comment. Super Epistolam Pauli ad Galatian, Ephesians, Philippenses:—Examen Trium Confessionum Reformatstrarum, Marchiaca, Lipsiensiæ et Thorntoniæ:—Vindicatio Evangeliorum Dominicalium et Festivalium contra Thoma, Stapelton.:—De invicem Jesum Deunctou et Pat. nec. in:—De Omnipresentia Humana Christi Nature:—De Honore Operum Necessitate ad Salutem. Lahe, a tablet suspended in a Buddhist Wihară (g. v.) in Ceylon, upon which anything might be written which was intended for the information of the priests.

Lahana, in Lamaism, are heavenly spirits who, long before the creation of the world, lived in unspeakable felicity, which was of an earthly nature. Above the earth there were twenty worlds inhabited by these beings, the highest four of which were so purified that their inhabitants lived without food. When the world was created many of these Lahans descended to it, and became so earthly they were subjected to its laws. When they ate of the fruits of this earth they became black, and the sun and moon were therefore created to give light to this otherwise dark world. The human family, including the sinned animal world, is indebted to the Lahas for their existence.

Lahamm is doubtless the present Khurbet el-Laham, located on the Ordinance Map at two and a half miles south of Beit-Jibrin, and described in the accompanying Memoirs (iii, 283) as "foundations, heaps of stones, wells, cisterns, and caverns. The masonry seems probably of Byzantine date, but the site to be older.

Laïn, Saint. See LÆTITIUS.

Laing, John, a Scotch prelate, was first rector of Tannadice, in the shire of Angus, and Linlithgow, and was next preferred to the office of high treasurer in 1465, which office he held until 1468, at which time he was made lord-register, and about the same time enjoyed the rectories of Suthet and Newlands. He was promoted to the episcopal see of Glasgow in 1474; was made lord high chancellor in 1482, and died Jan. 11, 1482-83. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 235.

Lairesse, Gerard, an eminent Flemish painter, was born at Liege in 1640. He studied under Bertholet Flemael, and at the age of sixteen had gained considerable reputation from his efforts. He visited Utrecht, and afterwards removed to Amsterdam, where his reputation rose so high that the Dutch esteem him their greatest historical painter. He died at Amsterdam in 1711. The following are some of his best works: The Fall of our first Parents; Adam and Eve Driven from Paradise; Joseph and his Brethren; The Child Jesus. See Clarmes, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Lalisa, Giuseppe Maria, an Italian prelate, was born March 24, 1775, at Rome, of Bavarian parentage. He was educated at first among the Jesuits, and finished his studies at the University of La Sapienza, where he also took the degree of a doctor in utroque jure, and was ordained priest. A short time after he became vicar-general to cardinal Galleli, and commendatory abbot of Subiaco. In 1817 he was appointed bishop of Hippone in paribus, and administrator of the diocese of Anagni. He died at Terentium, July 18, 1836, leaving De Universa Christi Ecclesia. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Lakshana, a Hindû name for the characteristic beauties or signs of a supreme Buddha. These were divided into three classes: 1. The two hundred and sixteen qualities-lakshanas, of which there were one hundred and eight on each foot; 2. The thirty-two Mahapurușa-lakshana, or superior beauties; 3. The eight Aṣaṅgāyujana-lakshana, or inferior beauties.

Lakshmi, in Hindû mythology was the goddess of beauty and loveliness, the wife of Vishnu, generated from the form of the sea, similar to Venus Analogysme of the Greeks. She is also the goddess of plenty, and as such is called Sri or Skirt. She is also the goddess of felicity, and thus identical with Mangala Devatā. She often serves poet as an ideal of womanly beauty.

Lakrum. This site Trelewney Saunders Map of the O. T.) confounds with that of Adam, locating it at Danum; perhaps from misunderstanding the ambiguous language of Tristram (Bible Places, p. 278), who thinks that "La­krum may be traced in Kbr Kuma," which is laid down on the Ordinance Map at two and a quarter miles southwest of Denmark, and eight miles west from the south end of the Sea of Galilee. The accompanying "Memoir" (1551) say of it: "There are ruins in this village, and portions of fine limestone columns, but no capitales. There are also remains of churches." The "Lambs" are mentioned in the twenty-second chapter of the sixth volume of "De Saint-A à Monseur". It was a doctor of the Sorbonne, abbot of Notre Dame de Valcrimont, and wrote "De Iniquo Pe Tur Voluntatis: — La Grande Victoire: — Examen de la Conduite des Réligieuses de Port-Royal, etc." (1564). — Lettre sur le Libéral M. Ch. M. of "De la Foi des Réligieuses de Port-Royal (1667, 2 parts)." See Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.

Lallouette, Ambrose, a French theologian, was born in 1634 at Paris, and died May 9, 1724. He wrote "Discours sur la Prédication Religieuse: — Histoire des Traductions Françoises de la Bible," and "Du Sens des Différents Points de Morale: — Avis pour Livre Utilité de l'Exemple. See Mourer, Dictionnaire; Jächer, Allgemeine gelehrter Lexikon, s. v.

La Marche, Jean François, a French prelate, was born in the diocese of Quimper in 1729, of a noble family from Brittany. He became a priest in the church of La-Chapelle, where he left the army to embrace the ecclesiastical call. He was a first canon and grand-vicar of Treguier, then abbot of St. Aunin des Bois, and in 1772 was elected bishop of St. Pol de Leon. At the commencement of the Revolution, La Marche refused to obey the civil constitution, and Jan. 8, 1791, fled to London, where he was befriended by Burke and other Englishmen, who charged him with the distribution of means of relief to the French emigrants. This position he held until his death, Nov. 25, 1806. He wrote "Mandement also a Lettre Pastorielle et un Ordonnance, the last in London, Aug. 20, 1791, to warn his diocesans against schism. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Lamasery, a collection of small houses built around one or more Buddhist temples in Tartary and Thibet, as a residence for the Lamas. See LAMAS.

Lamb, Andrew, a Scotch prelate, was bishop of Aberdeen, and resident of the city of Galilee, in 1619, which he held until his death in 1638. See Keihl, Scottish Bishops, p. 167-281.

Lambert, Bernard, a French theologian, the last of the Jansenistic school, was born at Salernes, Provence, in 1738. When made professor of theology, Lambert published some trains, which were at once censured by the Rouen see, and he had to leave Limoges in consequence. He then went to Grenoble, where he remained some time. The episcopal see of Lyons was then occupied by the famous Montazer, who gathered about himself all opposed to the Jesuits, including Lambert. When Lambert went to Paris, monsieur de Beaumont, an opponent of the Jansenists, was archbishop there, and refused to receive father Lambert into his diocese; but some bishops interfered in his behalf, and he was admitted on condition that he would write only against philosophers and unbelievers. Lambert died at Paris, Feb. 27, 1813. Of his many writings we mention, "Apologie de l'État Religieux: — Traité sur le Secrét de l'Eglise-Christ" (1778); "Idée de l'Événement des Secours Selon les Sentiments de ses Vertébres Défenseurs" (1786); "Traité Dialectique et Moral de la Justice Chrétienne" (1785); "Introduction à l'Histoire de l'Église" (1796); "Exposition des Prolégomènes et des Promesses Faites à l'Église" (1806, 2 vols.), a work in which he admits the doctrine of the Millenniumarians, and the theory of those who regarded the pope as antichrist. See Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.

Lamberton, William, a Scotch prelate, was chancellor of the Church of Glasgow in 1292, and elected bishop of St. Andrews in June, 1298. Bishop Lamberton strenuously opposed the encroachments made by King Edward I of England upon the constitution of Scotland, and contributed his hearty endeavors to set and keep King Robert Bruce upon the Scottish throne. He died in 1298. He built a palace for the bishop of St. Andrews, also ten churches belonging to the diocese; and did a great many other good and noble works. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 21.

Lami, Bernard. See LAMY.

Lami, François, a French Benedictine, was born at Montreuil, near Chartres, in 1636, and died at St. Denis, April 4, 1711. After having served in the army, he embraced a monastic life at the age of twenty-three. In spite of his controversies with Bossuet, Malachrène, Arnauld, Nicole, Dupin, and others, he was highly esteemed by all who knew him for his sincerity and piety. He wrote "De la Connaissance de Soi-Même" (Paris, 1694-98, 6 vols.; improved ed. 1700); "Le Nouvel Athéisme Révéré, Contre Spinoso" (1696); "Vérité Évidente du Gouvernement de Dieu" (1694); "De la Connaissance de la Trinité" (1694); "Les Conclusions du Pèlerin sur la Profession Religieuse" (1697); "La Supposée sur l'Engagement au Service de Dieu" (1703); "L'Incidence Amen à la Religion par la Raison" (1710); "Les Gémissements de l'Amour sous la Tyrannie du Corps" (1700); "Conclusions sur Divers Effets du Tonnerre" (1700). See Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.

Lamp, The, a ceremony practiced by the Maronites (q. v.), by way of anointing for the sick. They make a cake somewhat larger than the consecrated wafer of the Romanists, and put upon it seven pieces of cotton twisted with little pieces of straw, and place all together in a basin with some oil. Having read a portion of one of the gospels and epistles, with some prayers, they set fire to all the cotton. They now anoint with this oil the forehead, breast, and arms of every one present, and particularly the sick person, saying at each unction, "May the Almighty, and his sacred unction, pardon all thy sins, and strengthen thy limbs as he did those of the poor man who was troubled with the palsy." Then they let the lamp burn till all the oil is exhausted. This rite is administered to the sick, and is not confined to the dying, as in the case of extreme unction in the Roman Catholic Church.

Lampadophoria (from λαμπάδας, a torch, and φως, to burn'), ancient Grecian games, celebrated in honor of Prometheus, Athens, and Hephaestus, who taught men the use of fire. The game consisted in carrying an unextinguished torch through certain distances by a successive chain of runners, each taking it up at the point where another left it, and the one who permitted it to go out losing the game.

Lampadón Homéra (from λαμπάδας, a torch, and ἡμέρα, a day), the name given to the fifth day of the Eleusinian Mysteries (q. v.), because on that day the initiated marched two and two in procession, each with a torch in his hand, to the temple of Ceres in the Eleusia.

Lampeter Brethren. See APOSTOMONE.

Lamps, Christian. Many of these of ancient manufacture have been discovered in the catacombs and elsewhere. They were in general of similar form to those used by the Romans at the time, but often with Christian emblems upon them. See Fish.

Lamps, Festival of, a feast celebrated annually in Raisajuli, in honor of the Hindu goddess, Lakshmi (q. v.). The festival is called Dviti, and every city village, and encampment exhibits a most brilliant spectable from the illumination. On this day it is incumbent upon every votary of Lakshmi to try the chance of dice, and from their success in the Dewali the prince, the chief, the merchant, and the artisan foretell the state of their coffers for the ensuing year.
LAMPSACUS, COUNCIL OF (Concilium Lampaecum), held at Lampsa, on the Hellespont, A.D. 364, as Pagi shows. Orthodox bishops were invited to it; and it is described as a council of Homoussians by Sozomen (vi, 7) if the reading is correct. But those who directed it must have been really Semi-Arians; for they professed to be partisans of the Homoussian formula, and of the creed published at Antioch, besides sitting with Macedonius, by whom the godhead of the Holy Ghost was denied. What made Sozomen think well of them probably was that they were treated with marked favor by Valentinian; while they condemned the extreme party which Valena espoused, and which he ordered them into exile for dissenting from. On this, too, they seem to have despached a still more orthodox account of themselves to Rome, which contained Liberius (Sozomen, iv, 12; comp. Mansi, iii, 378).

Lamson, William, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Danvers, Mass., Feb. 22, 1812. He studied at the South Reading (now Wakefield) Academy, graduated from Waterville College (now Colby University) in 1835, and was a tutor there one year. In the autumn of 1837 he was ordained pastor of the Church in Gloucester, Mass., where he remained until 1839, and then went to the Newton Theological Institution and studied two years. He was pastor in Thomaston, Me., about two years (1841 and 1842), and then returned to Gloucester as pastor until 1848. His next settlement was in Portsmouth, N. H., and his last in Brookline, Mass. (1858-75), where he died, Nov. 20, 1882. See Catcart, Bap. Encycl. p. 669. (J. C. S.)

Lance (λάγγας, callutas), a liturgical instrument of the Greek Church, in the shape of a small knife formed like a spear, is used in the common Greek rite in the preparatory office of prothesis, to divide the host from the holy loaf previous to consecration. This earlier fraction, the primitive antiquity of which is doubtful, is distinctly symbolical, and has no reference to the subsequent distribution, for which another fraction has always been made. The typical allusion to the circumstances of our Lord's Passion receives greater force and vividlness in the Greek Church, from the use of the "holy spear" for the division of the loaf, as commemorative of the piercing of our Lord's body by the Roman soldier. The priest makes four cuts to separate the host from the oblation, and also stabs it more than once, accompanying every cut or stab with appropriate texts of Scripture, e.g. "He was led as a lamb to the slaughter." "One of the soldiers with a spear pierced his side," etc.

The use of the holy spear is not found in the purely Oriental liturgies, e.g. those of the Syrians and Egyptians, a fact which leads Renan to question whether the rite is of primitive, or rather of later origin; since these churches borrowed their discipline from the Greek Church in the earliest ages. It is entirely unknown in the Western Church.

Länderer, Karl Adolphi Ferdinand, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Schönebeck, near Magdeburg, Jan. 4, 1756. For some time rector of the Lyceum and preacher, at Stolberg, in Saxony, he was called as member of consistory and preacher to Neustadt in 1828, and died in 1865, a doctor of philosophy. He published sermons and some ascetical works. See Zuchold, Bibl. Thel. ii, 761 sq. (B. P.)

Lansing, Friedrich von, a German writer, was born at Leipzig, March 12, 1618. He studied at his native place, was master of philosophy in 1640, and died Oct. 30, 1685. He was a bookseller at Leipzig, and was influential as a Controversiaster Germanico-Hebraico-Graecae (Leipzig, 1677, fol, often reprinted; best edition that of Rein-ecius, 1713). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 173; Jöcher, Algemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Landsca, Council of (Concilium Landesense), Three such are given in Mansi (ix, 768 sq.) dated A.D. 560, but, even if genuine, they were simply meetings of the bishop, his three abbots, and his clergy, for excommunicating or abasing great offenders: in the 1st case Meirc, in the 2d Morgan, bishop of Glamorgan; in the 3d Gwaedrach, king of Gwent; all of them under Oucedanus, third bishop of Landes, and therefore sees near the 7th century. "The book, however, in which these records occur is a compilation of the 12th century" (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils and Documents, i, 125, 147).

Landal, William, a Scotch prelate, was early rector of the Church of Kinkell, and was promoted to the see of St. Andrews in 1341. He was still bishop of St. Andrews and present at the famous Parliament, April 4, that year. He died in the abbey of St. Andrews, on St. Thecla's day, Oct. 15, 1385. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 24.

Landerer, Maximilian Alberz von, a German theologian, one of the most learned and able, though not one of the best known, representatives of the school of theology occupying an intermediate position between the old supranaturalism and modern rationalism, was born at Maulbron, Württemberg, Jan. 14, 1810. He studied at Tübingen, where Donner (q. v.) was his fellow-student. In 1839 he was deacon at Goppingen, in 1841 professor at Tübingen, and died April 15, 1878. Rejecting the Hegelian principle of absolute knowledge, Landerer emphasized the religious experience in the department of systematic theology. He did not, however, forcibly separate it from the revelation of the Scriptures. The central doctrine in systematic theology he regarded as the person of God and man in the frame of contact with him, the more highly they learned to respect him. Landerer published very little. For the first edition of Herzog he contributed thirteen articles, the most prominent of which was the one on Melanchthon. For the Jahr- bücher für deutsche Theologie he wrote on "The relation of grace to the freedom of the will in the application of salvation." After his death some of his former pupils published from his manuscripts, Zur Dogmatik. Zwei akadémische Reden, together with Landerer's Gedächtnissrede auf F. C. Baer (ed. by Baer and Weis, Tübingen, 1879); Predigten (ed. by F. Lang, Heilbronn, 1880); — Neueste Dogmengeschichte von Semmelius bis auf die Gegenwart (published by Paul Zeller, 1881). See Worte der Erinnerung an Dr. M. A. Landerer (Tübingen, 1878); Wagenmann in Jahrbücher für deutsche Theologie (1878); Württembergische Kirchen- und Schulblatt (ed.), No. 26-28; Protestantische Kirchenzierung (ed.), No. 20; Schmidt, in Pfiff, Herzog, Landi, Gasparo, an eminent Italian painter, was born at Piacenza in 1766, and studied the grand puglia of David and Colin in the Academy of Paris. After gaining the prize of the Accademici delle Belle Arti, he was sent to Rome by the marquis of Landi, and studied under Pompeo Batoni. After gaining a number of prizes at the exhibitions, he was chosen professor of the Academy of St. Luke, and was made pope Pius VI. In 1818 he was commissioned by the French government to execute several works, and was appointed a director of the School of Design established in the convent of Appollinaris. His masterpiece is the picture in the Church of the Dominicans at Piacenza, representing Christ Ascending Mount Calvary. He died at Rome, Feb. 24, 1830. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Landis, Robert Wharton, D.D., an eminent Presbyterian divine, son of Samuel Calvin Landis, a descendant of the old Huguenot family of Calvin, was born at Philadelphia, Pa., Jan. 1, 1869. He was converted at seventeen, joined the Baptist Church, of which his parents were members, and commenced his theological studies in the same year. He remained but fifteen months at an academy, and three months under a private tutor. On entering upon his college career at twenty he united with the Presbyterian Church, was licensed in 1831, and ordained in 1832. He continued his studies while carrying forward his work as pastor, and became possessed of rare literary attainments. In 1855 he was pastor at Providence and Norristown; in 1862 at Allenport; in 1864 at Pittsburgh; in 1865 at Hillsdale, N. Y.; in 1867 at Albany, N. Y.; in 1846 at Cohoes, N. Y.; in 1848 at Greenhills; in 1856 at Maysville; in 1857 at Paterson, N. J.; in 1856 at Iona, Mich.; in 1860 at Somerset, Ky.; in 1867 at Wilmington, Del. In all these places his preaching was attended with marked effect. At entering upon this vocation, he was a large, awkward youth, but was converted. In 1868 he became professor in Danville Theological Seminary, where he remained one year. He died at Danville, Ky., Jan. 24, 1883. Dr. Landis was the author of several valuable works, and contributed largely to the religious and literary journals. See Nevins, Preb. Encyclop. s. v.

Landon, Seymour, a veteran Methodist Episcopal minister, was born May 3, 1798, at Grand Island, in Lake Champlain, N. Y. He was converted in 1815, and in 1818 joined the New York Conference. He served the following charges: Charlotte Circuit, Vt.; Ticonderoga District, N. Y.; the Albert Butler, Vt.; Chazy Circuit, N. Y.; Whitehall Circuit; Poultney, Vt.; Sandy Hill and Glen Falls, N. Y.; York Street, Brooklyn (twice); Lansingburgh, N. Y.; New York; Rhinebeck; Newburgh; Sugar Loaf; Hudson; Hempstead, L. I.; Sag Harbor; West Wimsett, Conn.; Grand Street, Brooklyn, L. I.; Greenpoint; Southport, Conn.; Watertown, N. Y.; Mount Vernon; Astoria, L. I.; Amityville and New Bridge; Springfield; Orient. He was president of Hartford and Long Island districts. He died at Jamaica, L. I., July 29, 1880. His effective ministry dated from 1802 when he was seventy-four years old, after an active ministerial career of fifty-five consecutive years. In 1852 and 1860 he was a delegate to the General Conference, and in 1856 and 1864 he was a reserve delegate. He was a man of excessive diligence, with a conscience, soundness and firmness equally marked. Of majestic figure and handsome face, his amiability of disposition and other personal qualities made him a welcome ornament in every circle of society. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1881, p. 80.

Landri (Lat. Landericus), Saint, twenty-eighth bishop of Paris, occupied that see about 650, under Clodius, between Audelbert and Chrodebert. He showed his love for the poor by supporting the sick and the poor in Paris in 651, by sacrificing all his own means, and self-sacrifice. Even the vessels of the altar to help them. A tradition generally accepted in the diocese of Paris, and admitted by the Bollandists, attributes to St. Landri the building of Notre-Dame. The final day on June 8, but he is usually commemorated June 10. He was interred in the Church of St. Germain l'Auxerrois, then called St. Germain le Rond. See Histoire, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Smith, Dict. of Christ. Antig. s. v.

Landriot, Jean François Anne Thomas, a distinguished French prelate, was born at Conches-les-Mines in 1816, and died at Rheims in 1874. He was vice-general of Autun, in 1856 bishop of La Rochelle, and in 1866 archbishop of Rheims. He published, Discours et Instructions Pastorales (1856-60, 5 vols.); Conference, Allocutions, Discours et Mantements (1856-64, 3 vols.): La Feme Forte (1803; 6th ed. 1888); La Feme Nueve (1863, 2 vols.; 7th ed. 1874); La Feme Chrisme (1862, 2 vols.; 6th ed. 1874); La Christ d'Ecclési, (1865, 2 vols.); La Christ d'Ecclési (1866). Lane, Aaron D., a veteran Presbyterian minister, was born at Lansburgh, N. Y., Jan. 29, 1737. He studied at the Lenox Academy, Berkshire Co., Mass.; graduated from Union College, N. Y., in 1816, and from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1825. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Columbia, Oct. 26, 1819; was ordained pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Waterloo, Seneca Co., N. Y., in 1821, having served as stated supply for nine months. At Waterloo he continued to labor zealously and successfully over fourteen years, until compelled by bronchial affection to cease from preaching. He continued, however, to labor among his former people, loved and appreciated, until his death at Waterloo, Nov. 2, 1888. See Necrology, Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1891, p. 11. (W. F. H.)

Lane, Edward William, an English Orientalist, was born Sept. 17, 1843, at Hereford. He studied at Cambridge, and spent some years in Egypt (1825-28; 1883-85). He published An Account of the Manners and Customs of the Modern Egyptians (Lond. 1836, and often; Ger. transl. Leipzig, 1856); Selections from the Koran (Lond. 1843); Letters to a Society to the Middle Ages (1858). In 1847 he went for a third time to Egypt, and after his return, in 1849, began the publication of his main work, Arabic-English Lexicon, of which he published five parts (1863-74), and died Aug. 9, 1878. Lane's nephew, Stanley Lane Poole, continues the work of the deceased. (B. P.)

Lafrancho (or Lanfranchi), Giovanni, an eminent Italian painter, was born at Parma in 1581, and studied under Agostino Carracci. At the age of sixteen he painted a picture of the Virgin with Saints, which was greatly admired, and placed in the Church of San Agostino, at Piacenza. At the age of twenty-two he visited Rome, became the pupil of Annibale Carracci, who employed him in the Farnese palace, and in the Church of San Jago, where he executed a number of works. His fresco paintings in San Agostino, particularly his Assumption of the Virgin, were greatly admired. Among his other good works were Moses Striking the Rock, Abraham Offering Isaac; and The Flight into Egypt. He procured the commission to paint the cupola of San Andrea della Valle. It was a wonderful work of art, and represented The Virgin seated in the clouds, surrounded with saints, and contemporaries of Christ, which he filled up with the upper part of the picture. In 1646 he was invited to Naples to paint the cupola of the treasury at that place. He was employed by Urban VIII to paint a picture for the Church of St. Peter, representing an angel walking on the sea. He died at Rome in 1647. There are a number of excellent plates by him, as follows: The Messenger of Moses Returning from the Land of Canaan; also a series of pictures of subjects from the Passion of Christ, for the chapel of the Crucifix. See Hoefer, Biog. Gravure, a. v.; Spenner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, a. v.

LANFREDINI, Jacopo, an Italian prelate, was born at Florence, Oct. 26, 1670. He became civil auditor of cardinal Camerlingue in 1722, and the following year was declared domestic prelate, member of the consistorial congregation, and referendary of both signatures. Benedict XIV made him cardinal priest March 16, 1727. Clement XIII, his compatriot, appointed him, in 1730, to a canonship in St. Peter's. After having been successively secretary of the congregation of the council, voter of the signature of grace, datary of the penitentiary, he, in 1735, made cardinal, and bishop of Osimo and Ciompi, in the bishopric of Ascoli. He died May 16, 1741. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Gravure, a. v.

LANGE, Heinrich, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born Nov. 14, 1828, at Fremmen, in Württemberg. He studied at Schöntahl and Tübingen, and was in 1848 appointed pastor at Wartau, in Switzerland. Here he commenced, in 1859, the publication of the Zeitschriften aus der reformirten Schweiz, the organ of the newly reformed church party. In 1863 he was called to Meilen, and in 1871 he was elected pastor of St. Peter's at Zurich. He died Jan. 13, 1876, leaving Predigten (St. Gall, 1852). Versuch einer christlichen Dogmatik (Berlin, 1858; 2d ed. 1858). Ein Gang durch die christliche Welt (1855). Drei durchschneidende Unterruh, 1862-65, 2 vols.: Religiöse Charaktere (1862). See Mayer, Heinrich Langa. Lebensbild eines freisinnigen Theologen (Basle, 1877); Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, a. v.; Zuchold, *Bibl. Theol. ii, 763. (B. F.)

Lange, John, an eminent minister of the Society of Friends, was born at Vassalborough, Me., in 1790. He felt a special interest in the North American Indians, and about 1840 was appointed one of a deputation sent out by the New England Yearly Meeting to the Indians west of the Mississippi River, with a view of suggesting and maturing plans for their improvement. President Grant appointed him on the Board of Indian Commissioners, a position which he held till his death. "Both as a commissioner and as a private citizen he served the government several times in missions of great delicacy and difficulty, accomplishing the service to the satisfaction of the government, and in close amicable relations with the tribes visited." He is represented as having been "a man of splendid physique and great vigor, both of body and mind, yet gentle and unassuming in manner, genial and sympathetic, most appreciative of a joke, and foxy enough of self to work for the good of his fellow." He died at his native place, May 25, 1879. See Friends' Review, xxiii, 681. (J. C. S.)

Langbein, Bernhard Adolph, a Lutheran theologian, was born in 1815 at Wurzen, Saxony. In 1841 he was deacon at Meissen, in 1858 church counsellor at Dresden, in 1866 first court-preacher there, and died July 17, 1873, doctor of theology. Langbein was one of the most prominent preachers of Germany, and the author of many volumes of sermons and ascetical works. Of the latter we mention, Die Reise aus dem irischen nach dem himmlischen Vaterhaus (2d ed. Leipsic, 1869). Tägliche Erquickung aus dem Heilblumen (2d ed. 1866). Der christliche Glaube nach dem Bekenntnis der lutherischen Kirche (1873). See Zuchold, *Bibl. Theol. ii, 763 sqq. (B. F.)

Lange, Friedrich Albert, a German philosophical writer, and son of the famous theologian Johann Peter (q. v.), was born Sept. 28, 1828, at Wald, near Solingen. He studied at Zurich and Bonn, in 1852 professor of philosophy in Cologne, and in 1855 private donor of philosophy at Bonn. In 1861 he was appointed professor at the Duisburg gymnasm, was called in 1870 to Zurich, in 1873 to Marburg, and died Nov. 21, 1875. His best work is Geschichte des Mat- rialismus und Krisich seiner Belastung in der Gegenwart (Leipsic, 1865; 2d ed. 1873-75, 4 vols.: Engl. transl. by E. C. Thomas, Boston, 1877 sqq., 8 vols.). See Vaihinger, Hartmann, Dihring und Lange (Leipsic, 1876). (B. F.)

Lange, Friedrich Conrad, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born May 12, 1738. He studied at Copenhagen, was in 1771 con-rector at Altona, in 1778 court-preacher at Glückstadt, in 1788 member of the consistory, in 1788 doctor of theology, and in the same year provost and first pastor at Altona. He died Jan. 9, 1791, leaving, besides sermons, De Resurrectione Corpor- atorum Nostrorum per Spiritum Sanctum (Altona, 1787); De Jesu Christo, Mortuo quidem quod corpus Nullares factum (ibid. 1782). See Düring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, a. v.; *Wenzel, Handbuch der theolog. Lit. ii, 89, 141. (B. F.)

Lange, Johann Christian, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Dec. 25, 1699, at Leipsic. He studied at his native place, and commenced his academic career there in 1634. In 1637 he went to Giesenh, was in 1710 member of consistory and super- tendent, in the same year doctor of theology, in 1718 general superintendent, and died Dec. 16, 1746. He wrote, Theologia Christiana in Numeris (Leipsic, 1792): Ordo Soltius sub Ratioe Theologici Problematis De- fensatus (Giesenh, 1794; 2d ed. 1744); Thomais sco- pet suos ev. Philosophiae Partibus Depravate (1719); De Antiquissimo en Novissimo Theoloc ho hoc est, etc. (1716). See Düring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutsch- lands, a. v. (B. F.)

Lange, Johann George, a German missionary among the Jews, was born in Silesia, Nov. 30, 1804. In 1824 he was admitted to the mission seminary at Berlin, and in 1826 he was appointed missionary to London Jews' Society, and entered their seminary in 1827. In 1829 he was appointed as missionary, and stationed at Amsterdam. Towards the end of that year he was sent to Warsaw. In 1841 he was station- ed at Warsaw, and the latter was again placed at Warsaw in 1855. Towards the end of 1854 he was sent to Breslau, where he died, Aug. 14, 1869. Mr. Lange was not ordained, but had from the Evangelische Consistory die regular permission to preach in the Prussian churches, and to give lectures to the Jews. (B. P.)

Lange, Johann Lobegott Ferdinand, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born Sept. 26, 1798. He commenced his academic career in 1824, was professor of philosophy in 1828, and in 1838 doctor and professor at Jena, and died in 1837. His Beiträge zur ältesten Kirchengeschichte (Leipzig, 1828, 1831, 1832, 1833), Die Kästene in der Evangelischen Kirche (Jena, 1834), and the Abhandlungen zu den christlichen Theologien der Zeit, die von den damals bekannten Philosophen, in der Zeit des 18. Jahrhunderts und der vorangehenden Jahrhunderte (Leipzig, 1835) were written by him. He died in 1837. See Winer, Handbuch der Theol. Lit., iii. 288, 367, 592, 589, 837 (B. P.)

Langec (or Langiac), Jean de, a French prelate, was born at Langec in Auvergne, near the close of the 15th century, of a noble Scottish family. He early embraced the religious life, and entered into a monastery, where he obtained a thorough knowledge of theology, with the usual benefits, being preceptor of the Hoetel Dieu of Langec, rector of Coulanges, count of Brionde, dean of the chapter of Langec, archdeacon of Reims, treasurer of the Church of Puy, count of Lyons, provost of Brionde, abbot of St. Giles des Bois, of St. Lo, of Chartil, of Eu, of Pibrac, then bishop of Avranches, a see which he resigned in favor of Robert Cenalis, after occupying it six months, and took possession of the bishopric of Limoges, June 22, 1338. He was also prothonotary of the sacred see, councilor of the grand council, grand-grandson of the king in 1336, and grandproctor in 1361, master of the Order of the Golden Fleece in 1365, prior of the monastery of Our Lady of Langec in 1358, and later of the monastery of St. John of the Temple in Paris. He was elected bishop of Avranches on March 27, 1354, and died in Avranches on February 5, 1355. He was buried in the cathedral of Avranches. See his biography in the Annales de l'Université de Paris, 1848, and in the Annales Universitaires, 1850.

Langheim, Nicolaus, a French prelate, raised to the see of St. Brieuc in 1654, was invested by Pius IV, Aug. 8 of the same year, and took the oath of the king, Feb. 8, 1655. His administration was full of trouble. In 1657, in effect, taken the part of the League, he became one of the active counselors of the duke of Mercœur. But the citizens of St. Brieuc and the better part of the diocesan clergy remained faithful to the cause of the king and stood with all their might against the encroachments of their bishop. Langelier was nevertheless a distinguished prelate, who well understood canonical questions. He died at Dinan, in September, 1659, leaving a Nota in Canonum, the manuscript of which was used by the 12th century. See his biography in the Annales Universitaries, 1850.

Langhans, Friedrich, a Swiss rationalist theologian, was born in 1829. He studied at Berne, where he became a member of the ministerium in 1858. He died April 17, 1880, at Berne, as professor of systematic theology. He was one of the main movens and promoters of the reform movement, and his writings, Pietismus und Christenthum in dem Spiegel der äusseren Mission (1849); Pietismus und äussere Mission vor dem Richterstuhrl ihrer Verheerender (1866); Das Christenthum und seine Mission im Lichte der Weltgeschichte (Zürich, 1854) and Die Geschichte der Heiligen (1867) were translated into English. See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol., ii, 764-777; Mach, Biographische Skell of Lange, in the Introduction to the American edition of the Biblical Work; Koch, Gesch des deutschen Kirchenleides, vii, 803 sq. (B. Church in Auburn, N. Y. Here he remained twelve years, and his own enthusiasm kindled a corresponding feeling in the hearts of those who heard his preaching and saw his labors, and more than a thousand souls were converted and added to the Church. During a part of the time he occupied the chair of theological instruction in the Theological Seminary. In 1829 he took charge of the Second Presbyterian Church in Utica, and in a short time five hundred persons were converted under his ministry. In 1838 he was installed pastor of a Free Church in New York city, then worshipping in Masonic Hall, but was obliged to retire in 1835 on account of ill-health. For the next ten years he labored chiefly as an evangelist in central and western New York, and one year in Illinois. In 1846 he returned to New York city, and took charge of a feeble church in Chrystie Street. In 1848 he assumed the care of the church on Clinton Avenue, Brooklyn, where his labors were crowned with great success, but, his health giving way, he was obliged to leave in 1855. In the spring of 1856 he removed to Walnut Hills, Cincinnati, O., where he supplied the Vine Street Congregational Church. For fourteen weeks he preached twice each Sunday, until the second Sunday in December, when he suddenly failed. This was his last sermon. He died at Walnut Hills, March 19, 1857. Dr. Lansing projected the Auburn Theological Seminary, and by his personal efforts secured an endowment of $100,000. He was elected a member of the board of trustees of Hamilton College. He published Sermons on Important Subjects (1825). See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iii, 407; Nevin, Presb. Encyclopedia, s. v.

Lao, Andrea, an Italian Carmelite, and professor of theology at Padua in the 16th century, was one of the most powerful and learned supporters of papacy in his time. After having published a dogmatic treatise of small importance, Disputationes Theologica ad D. Thomam et de Conscientia, he made himself conspicuous and popular among the clergy by publishing Brevis de Summis Disceptationibus ec. (8d ed. Rome, 1668). See Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Lao KYUN, in Chinese theology, was the originator of a religious sect, whose followers are called "children of immortality." He came two hundred years after Confucius. His priests were magicians and sorcerers.

LAQONiNACTES (λακώνινακτες), an officer in the Greek Church, whose duty it is to collect together the deacons and the prophets.

LAPACCI, BARTOLOMIMO, an Italian prelate, was born about 1596 at Florence. He was admitted to the Dominican order, received, in 1427, the diploma of doctor, and was, at the Council of Florence, one of the ten theologians who maintained the articles of union of the Greek with the Latin Church. Pope Eugenius IV compensated him for this service by appointing him, in 1439, master of the sacred palace in place of Tornopemela, who was made cardinal. Being sent to Greece in 1443, in company with F. Candelmer, he became bishop of Argoli. Two years later he was at Constantinople, where he dwelt in public harmony with Mark of Areopagite. At this time he occupied the see of Corin, and, abandoning it when the Turks became masters of the city, he retired to Florence, where he died, June 21, 1446. He wrote De Sensibilibus Deditis Pararei (Venice, 1498), and manuscript treatises upon several points of theology, also sermons, etc. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Lapland Mythology. The accounts on this subject are very scant, because the Lappe never had a public divine worship, but conducted their religious services privately in their homes. They had a conception of a supreme being, which the North American Indians call the Great Spirit, the Lapiers, Januma. The frequent journeys in Germany and Scandiaavia. At what period he definitely embraced the Reformation is not known. In 1560 Languet entered the service of the elector of Saxony, which he left in 1577. The last years of his life he spent in the Netherlands, in intimate connection with William of Orange. Languet died at Antwerp, Sept. 30, 1581. His letters, which are of the greatest interest for the history of his time, were edited by Ludovicus, under the title Arcana Seclorum XVI, Hubert Languet Epistolae (Halle, 1609). But his main work, Vindiciae Nostrae Tyronianae (Edinburgh and Baile, 1579; French transl. by François, Paris, 1581; German by Freitazk, Leipzig, 1846). In an elaborate manner he treats the question whether subjects (for instance, Protestants) have a right to revolt when oppressed for their religion's sake by their princes. Langian, John, D.D., an Irish clergyman, was born at Cashel in 1578, and educated in the Irish college at Rome, and in the university of Paris. He was ordained to the chair of Hebrew, divinity, and the Scriptures, at Pavia, where he remained until the university was desolated in consequence of the war in 1796, when he returned to Ireland, and was elected to a similar position in the College of Maynooth. He declined the appointment, however, and was chosen to a position in the record tower of Dublin castle in 1799, and remained there until 1821, when he was seized with insanity, and died in a lunatic asylum at Finglas, near Dublin, July 7, 1828. He published, Institutiones Biblicae (1794):—Ecclesiastical History of Ireland to the Thirteenth Century (Dublin, 1822, 4 vols.). See Appollin. Amer. Cyclop. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Lanini (or Lanino), Bernardino, an eminent Italian painter, was born at Verocelli about 1522, and studied under Geradonzi Ferrari. He was much employed at Milan and Novara, where he painted the personification of The Devity in the dome of the cathedral, also several subjects from the life of the Virgin, and the picture of Our Saviour after the Flagellation, between San Gerardo, in San Ambrogio, and Novara. He died about 1578. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Lanitho, a demon of the air, worshipped by the inhabitants of the Molucca islands.

Lansang, Dirck Cornelius, D.D., an eminent Presbyterian minister, was born of a distinguished family at Lansingham, N. Y., March 3, 1785. He graduated from Andover in 1804. While in college he was converted, and immediately felt impelled to preach the gospel. He studied theology under Rev. Dr. Blatchford of Lansingham, and was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Columbia in 1806. In the autumn of that year he went to an unvisited field and trestid from house to house over a circuit of twenty-five miles, and soon gathered a church where the town of Oonida now stands, and continued pastor for eight years. Then, on account of failing health, he retired to a farm, preaching as he was able till he became pastor at Stillwater, where he remained two and a half years, and two hun-latter see three forces of nature combined in the supreme god. They have the god Tiermes, thunder, the god Storjunkare, the ruler of earth, protector of the woods, and the goddess Bawe, the sun. These three were united in Jamula. Besides these supreme deities they have numerous others, who are subordinate, but not less powerful; they either the other in certain ceremonies, or the earth, or the sea, as, for instance, the spirits of air, the water deities, mountain deities, and the dread evil deities of death, who separate the soul from the body, giving the latter to corruption, and bringing the former into distant regions of good hunting and fishing. They made sacrifices of that which they considered most costly, young male and female reindeer. They offered sacrifices generally in the fall for the whole people. This was the only custom which pointed to a public divine worship. They had no priests nor temples; therefore every father of a household was priest and magian for his family, and taught his own sons. In the autumn, if none of the three gods accepted the offerings, they were sad, because the gods were angry. Although Christianity has entered among them, there are many heathen, who still adhere to their original superstition.

LAPPISH VERSION: or THE SCRIPTURES. The Lappish version is to the Lappish. The earliest religious work in the Lappish language is a manual containing the Psalms, the Proverbs, the book of Ecclesiasticus, the dominical gospels and epistles, published at Stockholm in 1668. This work was not generally understood, on account of its peculiarity of the language in which it was written, and accordingly another manual was published in 1669. It is not known at what time the New Testament was translated into Lappish. The first edition of which there is any account was published in 1755, from which a new edition was printed by the British and Foreign Bible Society in 1811. In the same year the Old Testament was published. Of late efforts have been made to give to the Laplanders of Russia, Sweden, and Norway versions in their respective vernacular, and there exist now, besides the Lappish version proper, a New Testament and Psalms in Norwegian-Lapp, the gospel of Matthew in Swedish-Lapp, and the same gospel in Russ-Lapp. See Bible of Every Land, p. 322; Quaest. Versionem. (B. P.)

LA POYPE (de Vertre), JEAN CLAURE DE, a French prelate, was born in 1655, of an ancient family of Poitiers, and was made a bishop of Lyons, and in 1702 was called to the episcopal see of Beveriae. This he refused, and the same year became bishop of Poitiers. In 1716 he was one of the prelates who signed the article demanding of the pope an explanation of the bull Unigenitum. He died Feb. 8, 1722, near Poitiers. He was in part author of an estimable work entitled, Compendium Institutionum Theologicae (Poitiers, 1708). The questions are here treated with great precision and method. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Lararium, that part of an ancient Roman house which was appropriated to the Larves (q. v.), and where the morning devotions were offered up.

Larentalia, a festival in the time of ancient Romans, which was held in honor of a god, Larentinus (q. v.). It was also observed in honor of the Larves generally.

La Roche (a.ym.) CHARLES ANTOINE DE, a French prelate, was born at the chateau of Mainzat, Feb. 17, 1657. He was at first canon of St. Peter's at Moxon, and vicar-general of Limoges, before being con-secrated bishop of Sarrepta, Aug. 5, 1725. He occupied successively the sees of Tarbes, 1729, Toulouse, 1740, Narbonne, 1752, before being appointed grand almoner, July 18, 1760, and archbishop of Rheims, Dec. 5, 1762. He was created cardinal in 1771, invested the following year with the abbey of St. Germain-des-Prés, and consecrated on Trinity Sunday, 1771, in St. Peter's, on July 17, 1775, having previously baptized him, given to him his first communion, and confirmed his union with Marie Antoinette of Austria. He presided over all the assemblies of the clergy of France from 1760 to 1775, having assisted at all the preaching of the pulpit from 1755. He was at the time of his death dean of the French episcopacy, having as his coadjutor Alexander Angélique, de Talleyrand Perigord, afterwards archbishop of Paris. He was distinguished for his modest piety and extreme benevolence. He died at Paris, Oct. 27, 1777. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

La Roche (Aymon), RAELP DE, a French prelate, was born about 1160. He was a Cistercian monk, was at first abbot of Igy, in the diocese of Rheims, and in 1224 was deemed worthy to succeed St. Bernard at Clairvaux. Having occupied this see for eight years, he was called to govern the Church of Agen, from which Gregory IX. transferred him, in 1235, to the metropolitan see of Lyons. Here he died March 5, 1236. His memory is celebrated March 8, and he is called the Happy Ralph de la Roche. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

La Rochefoucauld, DOMINIQUE DE, count of St. Elpis, a French prelate, was born in 1713 at St. Elpis, in the diocese of Mende. He was a descendant of a poor and ignorant branch of the house of La Rochefoucauld, which the bishop of Mende, of Choiseul, discovered in one of his pastoral visits. Frédéric Jerome de la Rochefoucauld, archbishop of Bourges, made known this discovery, and took upon himself the conduct of the studies of young Dominique. He placed him at the Seminary of St. Sulpice, and having made him grand-vicar, gave him the archbishopric of Alby in 1747. Being a member of the assemblies of the clergy in 1750 and 1755, he zealously defended the rights of the Gallican Church, and was invested with the abbey of Cluny in 1757. Two years later he was transferred to the see of Rouen, and in 1778 made cardinal. Elected deputy of the clergy of the bailiwick of Rouen to the States-General in 1789, he came out strongly against the principle of the revolution. He was one of the signers of the protest of Sept. 12, 1791, against the innovations made by the national assembly in the matter of religion. In the preceding April he had published a pastoral instruction, which the tribunal of Rouen had condemned, and burned; and he obtained the laws of the constituent assembly. After Aug. 10, 1792, the cardinal La Rochefoucauld retired to Germany, and died at Munster, Sept. 2, 1800. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

La Rochefoucauld, FRANÇOIS DE, a French prelate, was born at Paris, Dec. 8, 1558, being the son of Charles La Rochefoucauld, count of Etrichet, and of Fulvie Pie de la Mirandole, lady of honor to the queen. He was destined by his uncle for the priesthood, and completed his studies at the College of Clermont in a very brilliant manner. At the age of fifteen he was invested by the cardinal of Guise with the rich abbey of Tourens, and scarcely had he reached his twenty-seventh year when Henry III appointed him bishop of Clermont. Being a partisan of the Holy League, he sought to excite Auvergne in revolt against the king; but the inhabitants of Clermont revolted against him, and he was obliged to take refuge at his chateau in Moxon. In 1589 the bishop of Clermont called an assembly of the states of his province at Bliom. La Rochefoucauld addressed them in a vehement discourse, in which he accused the king of being in harmony with the Protestants. This led the assembly to embrace the station of the sacred union. His father, who governed the League, was killed in 1590, and Henry IV abolished some years later. The bishop of Clermont yielded, and composed a work upon the spiritual authority of the popes, remaining silent upon the temporal power. Some time after Martha Brusacier excided the wonder of the credulous world. François de la Rochefoucauld, his brother, Alexandre, travelled from city to city, interrogating the ecclesiastics as to the assembling of the real presence of Jesus Christ in the eucharist. They were at length obliged to desist from this ridiculous business. François de la Rochefoucauld yielded, and in 1607 was made cardinal and bishop of Sens. In 1618 his testament was read, and almoner of France, and in 1619 of the abbey of St. Genevieve. In 1622 he was made president of the Council of the States, and charged with the reformation of the abbies of France. This reform occupied the rest of his life. He died at the abbey of St. Genevieve, Feb. 14, 1645, and an elegant tomb was erected for him. Full of zeal for literature, La Rochefoucauld enriched various libraries with Greek and Latin MSS. He wrote, Statuts Syndicus per l'Eglise de Clermont (1599) — Statuts Syndicus for l'Eglise de Sens, (Paris, 1621). — De l'Autorité de l'Eglise en ce qui concerne l'Etoile et la Religion (Paris, 1604). His Life was written by La Marinière (Paris, 1647). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

La Rochefoucauld (BAYERS), François Joseph de, a French prelate, was born at Angoulême in 1735. He was bishop of Beauvais in 1772, and by this title was a prince of France, and was sent by the clergy of the bailiwick of Clermont-Beauvais, to the States-General, which became the constituent assembly. He there defended the privileges of the clergy. Chabot having denounced him before the legislative assembly as taking part in an anti-revolutionary movement, he fled with his brothers to the church of St. Genevieve, to the house of their sister, the abbess of Soissons, and then started for Paris. They were arrested at Carnes, and assassinated at Paris, Sept. 2, 1792. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

La Rochefoucauld, Frédéric Jérôme de Roye de, a French prelate, was born July 16, 1701. He was son of François de la Rochefoucauld, of Roye, count of Rouncy. He embraced the ecclesiastical calling, and in 1729 was called to the archbishopric of Bourges. Elected coadjutor of the abbey of Cluny in 1738, he became titular abbot in 1747, by the death of the cardinal of Avignon. The same year he was made cardinal, and the following year was sent to Rome as ambassador. In 1755 the king appointed him to the abbey of St. Vindirille, and charged him at the same time with the conduct of the abbey. He presided over the assemblies of the clergy in 1750 and 1755. In 1756 Louis XV made him grand almoner. He died April 29, 1757. He was a prelate of mild and conciliatory character. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

La Rochefoucauld (BAYERS), Pierre Louis de, a French prelate, brother of François Joseph, was born in 1744 in the diocese of Perigueux. In 1770 he was made commendatory prior of Nanteuil by the cardinal, the bishops of Louiseville, and general of the clergy in 1775, which office he held until 1782. In 1782 he was called to the bishopric of Saints. Being sent to the States-General by the jurisdiction of the men of Saints, he voted at the national assembly with the minority. Having taken flight with his brother, the bishop of Beauvais, he perished in his flight at Paris, in the prison of Carmes, Sept. 2, 1792. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

La Rocheposay, Henri Louis Charlesjean de, a French prelate, son of Louis Charlesjean, was born Sept. 6, 1577, at Tivoli, Italy. Having been educated by the celebrated mother of St. Francis of Sales, he received at the age of 25 the four minor orders in 1596, and the priesthood at Paris at the hand of Henry de Gondi, who was then cardinal of Rezé. Coadjutor of Geoffroi de St. Hilaire, bishop of Poitiers, he succeeded him in 1611, and bore witness three years later to his fidelity to the king by opposing the entrance of the prince of Condé and his troops. The bishop's conduct of this prayer appears little in conformity with the canons, and gave rise, on the part of the celebrated Jean du Verdier de Hauranne, abbot of St. Cyran, to a defence, ingenious as well as paradoxical: Apologie pour l'Adorer Saint Charles de la Rocheposay, etc. (1618). La Rocheposay assisted at the ordination held at Rouen in 1627, under the presidency of Gaston of France, then at the synod of Bonneaux, and at the general assembly of the clergy in 1628. He occupied himself zealously in trying to purge Poitou of the doctrines of Calvinism, by means of public and private conversation. He wrote, as Recueil des Actions de Philosophie et de Théologie: — Rémergues Françoises sur St. Mathieu (Poitiers, 1619) : — Exercitations in Marcius, Luciis, Jocumem et Acta Apostolorum, etc. (Nîmes, 1626). — In Generis (1628) : — In Librum Job (ed.): — In Esodum in Libros Nu- merorum, Josue et Jicudicem (1629): — In Prophetas Mai-iores et Minores (1809) : — Dissertationes Ethico-Politica. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Laron (or Loron), Jourdain de, a French prelate, was at first provost of St. Leonard, which position he occupied until the death of Girard, bishop of Limoges. The archbishops of Bourges, the commissaries of the archbishop of Bordeaux and Besançon, Amanu, Isomber, and others, who were at that time engaged in the work of Gourdon, and he, a prelate of the realm of France, accompanied it to the court, and then to the church of St. Jourdain and his whole diocese. Jourdain, after a time, made a journey to the Holy Land. On his return, in 1528, he consecrated his cathedral. In 1531, at the Council of Bourges, he discourse against the armed people, and was at that time elected by the country, which discourse was received by the bishops. He died in 1602. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Lartigue, Patrick, a French spiritualistic philosopher, was born in 1801 at Beaune. He had taught with great success at different colleges, and was successively rector at Cahors, Limoges, and Lyons. The last mentioned, he held till 1844. He was ambassador to Rome, and was ambassador to Rome, and was ambassador to Rome, and was ambassador to Rome. In 1856 he took his admission, and died at Paris in 1875. He published, Cours de Philosophie: — Examen des Doctrines de la Religion Chrétienne (1859), a kind of manifesto of deism: — Réfraction Religieuse (1869), a kind of religious programme of the future, designed to unite all on the ruins of positive religion. See Dumur, in the Révue chrétienne, 1861, p. 581 sq.: Lichtenberg, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Larouw, Friedrich, a German Orientalist, who died at Berlin, Oct. 3, 1870, is the author of, De Diele- thum, Liberum, etc. (Heilbronn, 1866); De heiligen Athanasius, Bischof von Alexandria, Festabend (Leipsic, 1852) : — Die Genesis übersetzt und schier neue Stellen erläutert (Berlin, 1843). (B. P.)

Larue, Charles de, a French Benedictine, was born at Corbie, July 12, 1684, and joined his order at Meaux. Being charged with the edition of the works of Origen, he only succeeded in publishing the first two volumes. While superintending the print of the third volume, he was seized with a paralytic stroke, and died Oct. 5, 1758, at Paris. See Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Larue, Vincen de, a French theologian, nephew of the foregoing, was also born at Corbie. He continued the work commenced by Sabatier, Bibliothèque Sa-Lasaulx, Amélie von, a Roman Catholic philanthropist, sister of Ernst (q. v.), was born at Coblenz in 1837. She joined the Sisters of St. Ann in 1845, and as sister Augustine was made mother superior at Nancy. She was sent, in 1849, to Bonn, and took charge of the hospital of St. John the Baptist. In the German wars against Schleswig and Austria, and during the Franco-German war of 1870, she proved herself a true German. Her early education, which she received from pupils of Hermes, whose views were condemned at Rome, her connection with the Catholic professors of the University of Bonn, who refused to subscribe to the decisions of the Vatican council, led her to oppose the papal dogmas. She cared not for the menaces of the Ultramontanes, but followed her calling as before. Her self-denying and faithful attention to her onerous duties finally broke down her health. While on her bed of sickness, the general mother superior of Nancy demanded of her that she should recant and accept the Vatican decrees, but would not yield. When she was obliged to leave the place of her lifelong activity, and died in 1872. When she was dead, the dress of the order was taken from her corpse. See Reichen, Amalie von Lasaulx (Bonn, 1878): Lecoutre, Courte Notice sur Amélie von Lasaulx (Bonn, 1847); Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Lasaulx, Ernst von, a German antiquarian, was born at Coblenz, March 16, 1805. He studied at Bonn and Munich, spent some time at Vienna, Rome, Athens, Constantinople, and Jerusalem, was in 1853 professor of philology at Würzburg, in 1854 professor at Munich, and was deprived in 1847. In 1847 he was a member of the German National Assembly, and went with the Roman Catholic fraction in all religious questions. In 1849 he was reappointed to his professorship, and died May 10, 1861. He published, Der Untergang des Heiligenstums durch die christlichen Kaiser (Munich, 1864); — Die Philosophie der schönsten Künste (1860); — Uber die theologische Grundlage aller philosophischen Systeme (1856); — Wahrheit der Thatsachen gegründeter Philosophie der Geschichte (ed.); — Des Sokrates Leben, Lehre und Tod (1857); — Die prophetische Kraft der menschlichen Geister. 2 vols. (1858); — La Cité et l'Église (1858). Among the last four books were put on the papal index. See Holland, Erinnerungen an Ernst von Lasaulx (Munich, 1861). (B. P.)

La Saussaye, Daniel Chasles de, a Wallon preacher and Dutch publicist, was born at La Haye, Dec. 10, 1810. He studied at Leyden, was preacher at the Wallon Church in Leeuward (1843-45), and at Leyden (1848-62). Here he edited a periodical entitled Ernst et Vrede (1853-58), in which he defended the ethical principle and supernatural in Christianity against the so-called "modern theology," inaugurated by J. H. Scholten. In 1862 he accepted a call to Rotterdam, where he was editor another periodical. In 1868 he was called to the chair of dogmatics and Biblical theology, which was formerly occupied by P. Hofstede de Groot, and died shortly afterwards, Feb. 13, 1874, doctor of theology, a distinction conferred upon him by the Bonn University. He published Documents pour la Confirmation du Peuple Juif Expliquée par son Avocat (Leyden, 1849); — Témoignages contre l'Expirit du Sécole (Amsterdam and Leyden, 1852); — Réflexions sur l'Ésasse et les Besoins de l'Église (Leyden, 1855); — Appréciation de la Doctrine de l'Église Réformée, de J. H. Scholten (Cologne, 1863); — La Crie Religieuse en Hollande (Leyden, 1860); — Sermons (Leyden and Rotterdam, 1860-65, 5 vols.); — Une en Royaume, i.e. Life and Tendency (Rotterdam, 1865); — Le Surnaturel dans l'Histoire (Groningen, 1874). See Lichttenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Lasaron. Concerning this place Keith remarks (Commentary, Josh. xii, 18), "Knobel supposes it to be the place called Sarum, to the west of the lake of Tiberias, and conjectures that the name has been contracted from Lasaron by the sphericism of the liquid. This is quite possible, and one could well imagine Saro- mon so far to the north. Bachiene and Rosenmuller imagine it to be the village of Sharom, in the celebrated plain of that name, between Lydda and Ascal. Never- theless, Condor (Text Work, li, 389) and Trelawney Saunders (Map of Egypt) adopt the above position at Saruma, which is laid down on the chart on the south side of the Zered. They are six miles west of the south end of the sea of Galilee, and described in the accompanying Memoirs (i, 414, quoting from Guérin) thus, "The houses are rudely built on two hillocks, which lie round a valley watered by a spring, which is dried up in part of the chamber, the roof of which is formed of large slabs, and which is preceded by a large vaulted chamber in very regular cut stones, the whole of ancient appearance." Eusebius and Jerome state (Onomast, s. v. Sarona) that the region between Tabor and the lake of Tiberias was called Sharom in their time.

Lassen, Christian, a famous German Orientalist, was born Oct. 22, 1800, at Bergen, Norway. He studied at Christiana, Heidelberg, and Bonn, spent some years at London and Paris copying and comparing Indian MSS, and published with Burnouf the Essai sur le Pali (Paris, 1841). Having returned to England, he commenced his academical career by publishing Commentario Geograpico atque Historico del Pantapota- mia Indica (Bonn, 1827). In 1830 he was made professor, and died May 8, 1876. He published editions of J ayadeva's Gita Govinda (1837): — Gymnosophista, sive Indica Philosophia, Documenta (1839): — Anthologia Sacrèica (1838; new edition by Gildemeister, 1865, 1868): — Institutiones Lingua Pracritica (1837); but his main work in Indicæ Academicae kündige (1844-62, 4 vols.; 2d ed. vol. i, 1866; vol. ii, 1873). In his Die alter crisisch, he published the first time the cuneiform inscriptions. (B. P.)

Lassenius, Johann, a Lutheran theologian, was born at Waldau, in Pomerania, April 26, 1658. He studied at different universities, and travelled extensively. On account of his writings against the Jesuits he was imprisoned at Vienna. He was taken to the Turkish fleet, where for the greater part of a year he was a slave to the Turks, but he managed to escape. He took his degree as doctor of theology at Greifswald, was appointed court-preacher at Copenhagen, and died Aug. 29, 1692. He was a very prolific writer, and wrote a great mass of apologetic works. See Möller, Cimbricia Literata; Jocher, Allgemeine gelehrten-Lezungen, s. v.; Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. ii, 769. (B. P.)

Lathrop, John, D. D., a Unitarian minister, was born in Norwich, Conn., May 17, 1740. He graduated at Princeton College in 1763. For some months after his graduation he was engaged as assistant teacher in Moore's Indian School at Lebanon, Conn., and at the same time studied theology. He was licensed soon after this, labored as a missionary among the Indians, and in 1767 was invited to settle both at Taunton and Haddington. In 1768 he accepted a call to become pastor of the Old North Church in Boston, preaching in that city until his death, Jan. 14, 1816. He became a member of the Corporation of Harvard University in 1778. He was also one of the counsellors of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, vice-president of the Massachusetts Bible Society, and president of the Massachusetts Congregational Charitable Society. His publications consisted of single sermons. See Sprague, Amos of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 68.

Lattl, Jean Baptiste Maria Anne Antonio, Duke de, a French prelate, was born in one of the Isles of Sainte Margaret, March 6, 1671. Being destined for the ecclesiastical calling, he entered the Seminary of St. Sulpice at Paris, and was ordained priest in 1784. Shortly after he was appointed grand-vicar of the bishop of Vence, who charged him with representing him at the balliwick assembly of his diocese at the convocation of the States-General. On the breaking-out of the French Revolution Latil refused to take the oath of the civil constitution of the clergy, and withdrew to Coblenz, but in 1792, having returned to France, he was arrested at Montfort l'Amaury, and remained for some time in the prisons of that city. Having recovered his liberty, he returned to Paris, and settled at Ermelo, where he devoted himself to preaching. He had determined to set out for America, when the count of Artois sent for him, in 1794, and made him almoner. Latil from this time never left this prince, and at the restoration became his almoner. Appointed Bishop of Aymecles, in partibus infidelium, he was consecrated April 7, 1816, became bishop of Chartres in 1821, and archbishop of Rheims, Aug. 11, 1824. He consecrated Charles X in the metropolis of Rheims, May 29, 1825. He was made a peer of France in 1826, made count by Charles X, and also minister of state. Filled land made him cardinal, March 12, 1826, and the king gave him the title of duke. The same year he signed the declaration of the clergy of France touching the independence of the temporal power in civil matters. He was accused, however, of having taken part in the great conspiracy of Château-Jaufre, and of urging Charles X to adopt measures which aided the revolution of July. In view of this Latil fled to England. He soon returned to France and maintained his episcopal see, but refused the oath as peer of France. He died at Gémenos in December, 1839. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Latimer, James Elliah, D.D., a Methodist Episcopalian minister, was born at Hartford, Conn., Oct. 7, 1859. He graduated from Wesleyan University in 1848, and the same year became teacher of languages in Newberry Seminary, Vt., and of Latin and geology in Genesee Wesleyan Seminary, Lima, N. Y.; in 1851 principal of New Hampshire Conference Seminary, Northfield, N. H.; in 1854 principal of Fort Plain Seminary, N. Y.; in 1850 joined East Genesee Conference, and was pastor in Elmira and Rochester, where he made a deep and permanent impression by his learning and devotion. After this he traveled and studied in Europe. In 1869 he became pastor of a Church in Yen Yan, N. Y.; in 1870 professor of historic theology in school of theology of Boston University, and in 1874 dean and professor of systematic theology in the same school. He died at Auburndale, Mass., Nov. 27, 1884. Professor Latimer took a high rank as a student of historic literature. He possessed a genial temper, and was greatly beloved by all under his instruction. His sermons, essays, and lectures are highly commendable. See Alumii. Rec. of Weld. Univ. 1861, p. 91; Math. Rec. March, 1886.

Latinius, Latinius, an Italian critic, was born at Viterbo in 1515. He acted as secretary to cardinals Farnese and Colonna at Rome, and died Jan. 21, 1588. He wrote, Observationes et Emendationes in Tertullianum; Bibliotheca Sacra et Profana (edited by D. Macer, Rome, 1659); Epistolae, Confessio et Observationes Sacra Profana Eruditione Omnia (2 vols.). See Ehr. Tact. Eruditorum: Dialogus de Statua; Johcer, Allgemeines (Lehrbuch. Leix. Ebenau, s. v.). (B. P.)

Latziunis, Bartholomaeus, a German controversial writer, was born at Arlon, Luxemburg, in 1485. He taught Latin at Treves, and rhetoric at Cologne and Freiburg. In 1534 he was called to Paris, and visited Italy in 1539. In 1541 he was appointed counsellor at the earl of Moray's court at Edinburgh, and died in 1566. Of his controversial writings we mention, Responsio ad Epistolam Buceri (1548); Adversus Bacurum de Controversiis Quidam Laudam Altera In- finens; Responsio ad Convicium et Calumnias Petri Da- lenii (concerning the communion and the sacrifice of the mass, Frankfurt, 1558); De Docta Simplicitate

Prima Ecclesia (1559). At the instance of the emperor Charles V, he also took part in the Ratisbon Colloquy in 1546, and was appointed by him imperial counsellor in 1548. See Du Pin, Bibl. Eccles. XXI, 164 sq.; Jocher, Allgemeines (Lehrbuch. Leix. Ebenau, s. v.); Wagemann, in Piut-Herzog, Real-Encyclop. s. v. (B. P.)

Latônas, in Greek mythology, was the daughter of Ceus and Phoebus, therefore a Titanide. Being loved by Jupiter, she reaped the hatred of Juno. The latter took an oath from the earth not to grant Latona a place, and persecuted her by the frightful dragon Python, which she had reared. At last an island, Delos, arose from the sea, which had not existed when Juno exacted the oath, where Diana, hardly born, assisted her mother in the birth of her twin brother Apollo. Being one of the oldest goddesses, she was everywhere highly worshipped. Apollo and Diana would not forgive the smallest insult to their mother, as is fully shown by the fate of Niobe, with whom she had stood on intimate friendship. Herodotus relates that she was also worshipped in Egypt.

LaTour (D'Auvergne Laugravie), Hugues Robert Jean Charles de, a French prelate, was born at the chateau of Auzeville, near Toulouse, Aug. 14, 1758. In 1776, after the death of his cousin, a canon of Carcassonne, he moved to Paris, where he entered the Seminary of St. Sulpice, and pursued a course of theology under Emery. In 1779 and 1785 he was secretly ordained sub-deacon, deacon, and priest by the bishop of Limoges of Argen- teau. He returned to the oath to the civil constitution of the clergy, and withdrew to Picardy, to the house of his aunt, the countess of Vergy, and there performed secretly the offices of his ministry at Amiens. He was finally arrested and thrown into prison. A contractor of the republican army rescued him by taking him into his service. The first consul appointed him bishop of Arras, May 9, 1802. The young bishop reconstructed his diocese, and founded in it all sorts of institutions. On all occasions he manifested his admiration for the chief of the state, who had restored peace to the Church, and advanced the glory of France. The events of 1814 modified his opinions, and on April 8 he sent his approval to the act of forfeiture of the emperor. The restoration brought to him an offer of the bishopric of Rheims, which he refused. The government of July offered still more important archbishoprics. LaTour refused, and remained in his see, but accepted the Roman purple, Dec. 14, 1840. He died July 20, 1851. He left some catechisms, sermons, etc. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Latinius, Saini, traditional first bishop of Ses, commemorated June 20, is said to have been sent into Gaul by Clement of Rome, and is assigned to a period earlier than A.D. 500. He is believed to be the saint popularly known as St. Lain, whom the Rollandists place at the beginning of the second century.

Lau, Johann Theodor, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Schleswig in 1818. In 1843 he was appointed second pastor at Hettstadt, near Husum, and died Dec. 20, 1873. He is the author of, Geschichte der evangelischen Kirche in Schleswig (Hamburg, 1867). See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. ii, 770. (B. P.)

Lau, Hardrasskin Otto Konrad, bishop of Viborg, was born in 1865. Having completed his theological studies, he was appointed to a pastorate in the island of Bornholm. In 1884 he was made bishop of Viborg, and held this position till 1877, when feeble health obliged him to retire from his ecclesiastical duties. He spent the remainder of his life at Copenhagen, and died May 27, 1892. He was highly honored by the congregations as well as by the ministers of his diocese. (B. P.)

L'Aubespine, Gabriel de, See Aubespere.
L'AUBESPINE, Sebastien de, a French prelate and diplomatist, was born in Besou in 1518. His high station won for him from Francis I the gift of many ecclesiastical benefices, especially that of the abbey of Basse Fontaine, in the diocese of Troyes. Being sent to Switzerland, he there combated the influence of the emperor, in 1540. At the Diet of Worms, he prepared the work of the honorary ambassador, the count of Morin, a man more distinguished by his ancestry than by his own merit (1545). Henry II afterwards sent him to negotiate with the people of Strasburg in 1548, and to modify the treaty of alliance with the Helvetic cantons. In 1550 he was charged with an embassy to Flanders, but he soon resumed his former functions in Switzerland, and still negotiated with ability and honor. Then he was appointed ambassador to Philip II of Spain. From 1558 he held the bishopric of Limoges, in which city he already held the rich abbey of St. Martial. After rendering various services to the king, and being driven from the court, he withdrew to Limoges, and devoted all his attention to works of piety connected with the episcopcy. Here he died in 1562, and was interred in his cathedral. For mention of his works see Hœuf, Nouv. Biog. Générale, &c.

Lauder, Alexander, a Scotch prelate, was rector of Ratto, promoted to the see of Dunkeld in May, 1440, and died Oct. 11 following. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 87.

Lauder, George, a Scotch prelate, was vicar of Crail in 1425, and was afterwards master, or preceptor, of the Hospital of St. Leonard's. He was promoted to the bishopric of Argyle as early as 1427, and was still bishop in 1462. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 287.

Lauder, Robert, a Scotch prelate, was probably promoted to the see of Dunblane in 1448, and in 1451 was sent jointly with the bishops of Glasgow and Moray into England. He was probably bishop there in 1463. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 177.

Laudato, Thomas, a Scotch prelate, was preferred to the see of Dunkeld in 1452, which see he retained until 1476, when he resigned his charge on account of advanced age. He died Nov. 4, 1481. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 89.

Lauder, William, a Scotch prelate, was preferred to the see of Glasgow in 1406. He was bishop there and died at Millar, April 14, 1424. He died about 1426. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 248.

Laudiati, a society which was instituted in Florence, in 1316, for the performance of religious lauds. The society still exists, and is in active operation.

Lauze, Johann Gottfried, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Dec. 20, 1688. He studied at Leipsic, in 1708 was rector-at Quedlinburg; in 1710 deacon, in 1715 pastor at Duffin, and died May 80, 1721. He wrote: Meditations Exercito-practicæ; Apparatus Exercito-homileticus; Historia Arcana Vindicibusj Testamenti ad Judic. II et Sam. 111; Disput. Sur le Turrum et Campaunum Usus in Ecclesia Deo Dis- plicat; See Lépurius, Germania Literata Viva; Jügel, Liturgia Anglicanae Gelatinæ-Lexicon, &c. (B. P.)

Launfola, in Norse mythology, was a Jote-woman, the wife of the giant Farbaute, and the mother of Loke, the evil one among the Aesir.

Launwatter, in the mythology of the Finns, was an evil goddess, whose children were the plagues and sicknesses of men.

Launoy, Matthieu de, a Roman Catholic theologian, was born at Ferté-Alais, but embraced the Reformation at Geneva in 1540, and was admitted to the evangelical ministry. He was pastor at Heidelberg in 1578, afterwards at Sedan, where he had adulterous relations with one of his cousins, and was thus obliged to leave the place. Being excommunicated, he allied Protestantism, and became one of the most furious preachers of the League. To justify his second apostasy he published, Défense de Launoy (Paris, 1578), and Déclaration et Refutation, &c. (1579). To secure the favor of the Catholics, he published Réponse Chrétienne à ces Articles, &c. (1581). In consideration of his return to the Church of Rome, he was made Bishop of St. Germain de Soisson, and, with Boucher, was one of the first four pillars of the League. He belonged to the council of sixteen who decreed the assassination of president Brison. After the capitulation of Paris, Launoy went to Flanders, where he probably died. See Labitte, De la Sté Fédérale des Architectes de la Ligue et la France Protestantte; Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, &c. (B. P.)

Laurel, a plant which was sacred to Apollo, the god of prophecy, and much used by those who pretended to inspiration. The heads of ancient seers were usually adorned with laurel wreaths, while they carried in their bands a laurel branch as a magic wand. The heads of victors in the national games were also crowned with laurel wreaths; hence the expression, "winning the laurels."

Laurence (1), a Scotch prelate, was elected bishop of the see of the Isles in 1249, but was drowned the same year. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 296.

Laurence (2), a Scotch prelate, was made bishop of the see of Argyle about 1251. About 1269 he ratified to the monks of Paisley the churches of Kilman and Kilkeran. He was still bishop in 1299. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 286.

Laurent, Johann Theoton, a French prelate, was born July 6, 1604, at Aix-la-Chapelle. He made himself especially conspicuous by his opposition to the Heresies of the day, and in recognition of his merits he was appointed bishop of Cherson, in partibus infidelium. As he could not reside in Hamburg, where he intended to live, he went to Rome, and was in 1841 appointed apostolic-vice at Luxemburg, but was recalled, in 1848, on account of his too rigorous procedure. He retired to Simpelvelde, in the province of Limburg, and died Feb. 20, 1884. (B. P.)

Laurentia. See ACCA.

Laurentide, Pierre Sebastien, a French Roman Catholic historian and publicist, was born Jan. 21, 1758, at Houg (department of Gers). In 1817 he was professor of rhetoric at the College Stanislas in Paris, and in 1818 professor of English history at the Polytechnic Institute. In 1823 he was appointed inspector-general of the public schools, but he lost this position in 1826 on account of his opposition to the ministry headed by Villèle, whom he had attacked in his journal, La Quotidienne. Laurentide now devoted himself entirely to his journal, which, for a time, was called L'Union Monarchique, and after 1848 merely L'Union. Laurentide died at Paris, Feb. 9, 1876. Besides his articles, he published, De la Justice au xixe Siècle (1822); De l'Origine et de la Cérémonie des Conclusions Humaines (1826); Introduction à la Philosophie (1828); Théorie Catholique des Sciences (1836; 4th ed. 1846); Histoire de France (1841-43, 8 vols.); Les Rois et le Peuple (1860); Rome et le Peuple (1861); Histoire de l'Empire Romain (1861-62, 4 vols.); L'Allemagne Scientifique (1862); Le Livre de M. Romans sur la Vie de Jésus (1860). See Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, &c. (B. P.)

Laurentius, a German hymn-writer, was born June 8, 1660, at Husum, in Holstein, and died May 29, 1722, at Bremen. He published Evangelia Melodica, or spiritual hymns and songs, according to the Christian year, some of which have been translated into English; thus, In te, gratuitum tuae providentiae, thou essential Word," in Lyra Germ. i, 15): — Wer in dem Horren sich erheben ("Is thy heart arthirst to know," in Lyra Germ. ii, 45): — Jesus war hat dich getrieben ("Jesus! what was that which drew thee," in Hymns from the Land of Luther, p. 79;—Fleiss ihr Augen, fleiss von Thronen (ibid. p. 92);—Ermutigt euch ihr Frommen (ibid. p. 51). (B. P.)

Laurentius, Saint. In early Christian art St. Laurence usually carries a copy of the gospels, to denote his office of deacon. In the Church of St. Laurence in Agro Verano, at Rome, there is a mosaic of the 6th century, representing the martyr with an open book in his hand, on which may be read the words "dispersiat, his superabit" (Coppini, Vet. Mon. tab. lxvi, 2), in allusion to his kindness to the poor.

Laurentius, a Scotch prelate, was promoted to the see of Dunblane in 1160, and was witness to a charter to the abbey of Dunfermline. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 170.

Laurentius, Jacob, a Dutch theologian, who died at Amsterdam, March 19, 1664, is the author of, De Fatale Tripartita: Pollicita Papistico de Purugiorio, Limbo Patrum et Puororum:—Comment in Epist. Jacobii ac Ultrixque Petri:—Expositio Septem Tripartitorum qua Johannes in Insula Puthmo Scriptum:—Apologia Catholica Heidelbergensis contra Coppo Henricum:—Expositio in Loca Difficultates Epistolarum Pauli:—Expositio Historiarum Ioannis Chrysostomi:—De Vera et Legitima S. Scripturae et Patrum Autoritate. See Witte, Diarium Biographicum; Jäcner, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Leizikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Laurentius, Paulus, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born March 30, 1554. He studied at Leipzig, was superintendent at Dresden, and died Jan. 24, 1624, doctor of theology. He wrote, Erklärung u. Auslegung der 2 Bücher Samuelis:—Erklärung des Propheten Amos:—Predigten über den Propheten Jonas:—Erklärung des zweiten Samuel:—Expositio Symboli Athanasii, etc. See Witte, Diarium Eruditorum; Jäcner, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Leizikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Lauretti (or Laurenti, Tommaso called il Siciliano), an eminent Sicilian painter, was born at Palermo about 1530, studied under Sebastiano del Piombo, and settled early in life at Bologna. He subsequently visited Rome, at the invitation of Gregory XIII, to finish the ceiling of the Sala de Constantino. He was honored with the appointment of president of the Academy of St. Luke. He died about 1610. Among his principal works at Rome are the fresco paintings of the History of Brutus; at Bologna are the Coronation of the Virgin, in Santa Mattia; the Resurrection, in San Giacomo Maggiore. He died about 1592. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Laurie, Robert, a Scotch prelate, was first minister and then dean of Edinburgh. He was advanced to the see of Brechin about 1670. He was allowed to retain his deanery, and continued to exercise a particular ministry at the Church of the Holy Trinity in Edinburgh until his death in 1677. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 168.

Lauterbach, Erhard, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, who died Dec. 16, 1649, at Naumburg, doctor of theology, is the author of, De Predestinacione:—De Iowa Christi Regio:—De Justificatione Hominis Peculator Corum Deo:—De Trinitatis Solis Paschalis:—Syntagma de Principiis Fidel Articulati. See Witte, Biographia Biographicum; Jäcner, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Leizikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Lauterbach, Samuel Friedrich, a Lutheran theologian of Poland, was born at Branitz, Oct. 20, 1652. He studied at Breslau and Wittenberg, and died at his native place, June 4, 1728. He is the author of, Arianos Socionismi Olim in Polonia (Frankfort and Leipsic, 1725):—Vita, Passionis at Fidae Valoriae Herborgeri. See Winer, Handbuch der Theol. Lit. i, 770; Jäcner, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Leizikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Lavabo (I will wash) is a term expressing the act of washing the priest-celebrant's fingers prior to the celebration of mass. This occurs in the English rite, by custom, after the offertory. The act is performed as a sign of the purity with which he should approach the altar. In the Roman rite, before the priest assumes the sacrament of Absolution, he washes the tips of his fingers. This custom seems to have been almost universal. Wheneuer sacrifice was about to be offered, the minister of the altar performed special ablutions. Such customs were current among the Jews, having been ex

Lavalette, Louis de Nozaret d'Epernon, a French prelate, was born at Angoulême in 1558, and was the third and last son of the duke of Epernon. Being destined by his parents for the ecclesiastical calling, he was sent while very young to the abbey of St. Mesmin of Gard, Bardon, in 1611; of Gimont, St. Victor de Marseille, the Grasse, etc., in 1621. As archbishop of Toulouse he assisted at the States-General held at Paris. Promeoted to the Roman purple, Jan. 11, 1621, he took part in the assembly of the clergy the same year, and of that held at Paris in 1625. In 1628 he resigned the archbishopric of Toulouse in favor of Charles de Montcholt, his former preceptor, and devoted himself to military service. At his death, which occurred Sept. 29, 1638, the pope refused him the honors customarily rendered to a cardinal, under the pretext that he had commanded the armies of the heretics against the Catholics. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.
LAYER

LAYER OF REGISTRATION, a name sometimes given in the early Christian Church to baptism.

Laevina, in Roman mythology, was a protecting goddess of thieves and deceivers at Rome, who had a temple near the Larenvian gate.

Law, James, a Scotch prelate, was promoted to the see of Orkney in 1606, where he continued until 1615, when he was translated to the bishopric of Glasgow. See his Work "Ritualem," p. 227.

Lawa Allal, in the mythology of the Laplanders, was one of the three deities who are constant companions of the sun.

Lawkapadam, in Slavonic mythology, was worshiped by the Poles as a field-god, and his favor entreated before ploughing.

Lawrence, Francis Ebbingham, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was a graduate of St. Paul's College, at College Point, N. Y., and in 1832 of the General Theological Seminary; in 1838 he was assistant minister of the Church of the Holy Communion, New York city, and remained such until 1839, when he was chosen rector, and continued in that relation until his death, June 30, 1879, at the age of fifty-three years. See Proc. Episc. Almanc, 1880, p. 171.

Lawrence, Samuel, D.D., an English Presbyterian clergyman, was born at Nantwich, Cheshire, in 1638. His father was a Dissenting minister. He was educated at the Anglican University, became tutor in the Book of Common Prayer, and was later appointed as minister first at Newcastle, Stafford, in 1714. In 1727 he became pastor at Newcastle-on-Tyne, but his health failing, in 1728, he had to go south, and settled at Monkwell Street, London, where he had a crowded audience for many years, and his ministry was very successful. He was learned, serious, cheerful, modest and polite, zealous and pious. He died, Oct. 1, 1760, and is buried in Bunhill Fields. See Wilson, "Dissenting Churches," iii, 208.

Lawson, George, D.D., an eminent Scotch divine, was born March 13, 1674, near West Linton, Peeblesshire. At twenty he had finished his studies, and was licensed to preach. In 1711 he was ordained pastor of the Bergher Secession Church at Selkirk, where he continued during the remainder of his life. For more than thirty years he was also professor of divinity in the school of theology at the same place, and died there Feb. 21, 1765. He was a man of much learning, extensive scholarship, and earnest piety. Dr. Lawson published many volumes of Sermons and Lectures; also Discourses on the Whole Book of Esther, etc. (Edinb. 1804, 12mo); London, 1809, 12mo);--Lectures on the Whole Book of Ruth (Edinb. 1805, 12mo)--Lectures on the History of Joseph (1807, 2 vols. 12mo);--Exposition of the Book of Proverbs (1821, 2 vols. 12mo; posth. pub. from 80 MS. vols. left by the author). See Macfarlane, Life (Edinb. 1861; N. Y. 1861).

Lebassor, Levi, a Jewish scholar, was born in 1822 at Filehne, duchy of Posen. He studied philosophy and Oriental languages at Berlin, and in 1854 became rabbi at Pressburg. When Dr. L. Franke (q. v.), the director of the Jewish rabbinical seminary, died, he was called in 1876 as his successor. Lazarus died April 16, 1879. He was a great Talmudist, and a clever thinker. In 1877 he published a very interesting brochure, Zur Charakteristik der talmudischen Ethik. (B. F.)

Lebrzari, Donato. See Bramante.

Lee, in the philosophical system of Confucius (q. v.), is the ultimate immanent element of the universe. It is the absolute, regarded in association with material essences, and manifesting itself in virtue of such association as the cause of organization and order. The spirit of man is strictly a substance with the principle. The Le, therefore, is identical with the Ti-ki, the Great Extreme. Beyond it, as the highest pinnacle of heaven, the one ultimate power, the entity without an opposite, no human thought is capable of grasping. The absolute is like a stem shooting upwards; it is parted into twigs, it puts out leaves and blossoms; forth it springs incessantly until its fruit is fully ripe; yet even then the power of reproduction never ceases to be latent in it. The vital juice is there; and so the absolute still works and works indefinitely. Nothing hinders or can hinder its activity until the time arrives when it will be duly ripened, and activity gives place to rest.

Leech, Beriah N., D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Middletown, Vt., April 28, 1801. He joined the Church in 1815, and was ordained in October, 1826, over the Church at Cornwall. His subsequent pastorates were in Middlebury, Frederica, Wyoming, Hamilton, and by the family in Middletown, Conn. His useful life closed Jan. 23, 1869. See Calhoun, Baptist Encyclop., p. 676. (J. C. S.)

Leavitt, Jonathan, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Cornish, N. H., Oct. 21, 1800. He was educated at Kimball Union Academy, graduated from Amherst College in 1828, and was a member of Andover Theological Seminary. He was ordained as pastor at Berfield in 1835, was installed in 1837, and remained until 1840, when he was next installed pastor of Richmond Street Church, Providence, R. I. He was without charge from 1838 until his death, at Providence, Oct. 7, 1877. See Tern. Occ. of Andover Theol. Sem. (1870), p. 90. (W. P. S.)

Leavitt, Joshua, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Heath, Franklin Co., Mass., Sept. 8, 1794. He graduated from Yale College in 1814, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1819. He soon secured a lucrative practice in his native town, and afterwards in Putney, Vt., but left it to enter Yale Divinity School, where he graduated in 1822. He was ordained as pastor of the Congregational Church in Stratford, Conn. After a highly successful pastorate of three years he resigned and became secretary of the Seaman's Friend Society, and editor of the Seaman's Magazine, New York city. In 1831 he became the editor of the New York Evangelist; in 1837 of the Emancipator; in 1848 managing editor of the Independent, retaining this position till his death, which occurred Jan. 16, 1873, in Brooklyn, N. Y. Dr. Leavitt was a man of great suavity of manner, a graceful writer, and an eloquent speaker. He published, "Essay in Respecting (1839); Christian Lyre (1831);" and a series of Readers (1847).

Leblanc, Guillaume, a French prelate, was born at Alby in 1661. The position of his uncle, a distinguished theologian of the same name, sided his access to ecclesiastical honors. Having been chamberlain to pope Sixtus V, he was appointed, in 1580, to the bishopric of Polesene, and was consecrated, in 1591, with the episcopal see of Grasse. This reunion, which the chapter of Vence vigorously repelled, became to Leblanc a great source of embarrassment and litigation. He was even the object of an attempted assassination, and sought to destroy the act of union by the parliament of Aix. He died at Aix, Nov. 21, 1681. For mention of his works, see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Leblanc (de Bourbon), Jean Claude, a French prelate, was born in Paris, May 26, 1753. After being canon-regular of St. Genevieve before the Revolution, he bequeathed in 1791 the revenues of the abbey of St. Genevieve, and subsequently of St. Étienne du Mont. He was chosen archbishop of Rouen on the death of Gratian; consecrated Jan. 18, 1800, at Paris, and held in his metropolitan church a council of the bishops of his diocese the following October. In 1801 he was elected legate to the Roman council in Paris. After the signing of the Concordat, he gave in his resignation, and in 1802 was appointed bishop of Soissons. He established a seminary in his episcopal city. Being invited, in 1815, to be present at a reception of the emperor after his return from the island of Elba, Leblanc wrote to the minister to give assurance of his fidelity to Louis XVIII. This declaration was published, and the bishop of Soissons withdrew to England. The return of the king recalled him to his diocese, and in 1817 he was appointed archbishop of Arles, re-establishing the Concordat. He resigned in 1822, withdrew to the Seminary of Foreign Missions at Paris, took charge of the Savoyard, and was appointed member of the chapter of St. Denis. He died July 13, 1825. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Lebonah. The modern site, el- Lubban, is laid down one mile and a half ten miles north of Berlin (Bethel), and is briefly described in the Encyclopaedia Britannica (liv. 266, 426) as well as by Guérin (Samarie, ii, 112). Five pillars still remain standing, which seem to have been part of an ancient chapel.

Lebrecht, Frießkreutz S., a Jewish scholar, was born at Memmelsdorf, Bavaria, in 1800. He made his Travels in and around the rabbinical seminary in Pressburg, Hungary, and his philosophical at Halle, under Gesenius. In 1832 he went to Berlin, where he died, Oct. 13, 1876. Lebrecht contributed largely to the Literatur-Blatt des Oriente (1841-44), and in connection with Bissehut edited a dictionary of David Kimchi, called Liber Redicem. Besides, he wrote an essay, Handschriften und erste Ausgaben des babylonischen Talmuds, published in Wissenschaftliche Blatter aus der Welt Ephraimischen Lehranstalt in Berlin (1862) and Die Synagoge, in Monograph für die Wissenschaft des Ju- denbundes (Berlin, 1876), p. 27-40, 77-93. See Fürst, Bib. Jud. ii. 226 sq. (B. P.)

Lebrun, Jean Baptiste (surnamed Desmarets), a French scholar, was born at Rouen, and partly educated at Port Royal. He labored in different dioceses, and died at Orleans, March 19, 1731, never having been willing to proceed to a higher order than that of acolyth. He left an edition (the second) of the Latin work of John, bishop of Avranches, De Principiis Officiis (Rouen, 1672), as well as the edition of St. Paulinus, with notes, etc. (Paris, 1685). — A Concordance of the Books of Kings and Chronicles (Lat.). — Le Voyage littéraire de France, published under the name of the Sieur de Molon (Paris, 1718, 8vo).—The Breviaries of Orleans and Noyon, the edition which passed in MS. to his brother, a bookseller at Rouen, and from him to Langlet du Fresnoy, who published it (2 vols. 4to). He was working at a new edition of the Martyrology of Usuardus when he was put into the Bastile, where he remained five years. See Landon, Eccl. Dict. s. v.

Le Camus, Étienne, a French prelate and theologian, was born at Paris, Nov. 24, 1632, of an ancient family in the magistracy. He became doctor of the Sorbonne in 1656, and almoner of the king, Louis XIV, while still a minor. He was appointed bishop of Grenoble in 1671, and from that time a great change took place in his life. He inclined to the party of the partisans of St. Genevieve, and subsequently of St. Étienne du Mont. He was chosen archbishop of Rouen on the death of Gratian; consecrated Jan. 18, 1800, at Paris, and held in his metropolitan church a council of the bishops of his diocese the following October. In 1801 he was elected legate to the Roman council in Paris. After the signing of the Concordat, he gave in his resignation, and in 1802 was appointed bishop of Soissons. He established a seminary in his episcopal city. Being invited, in 1815, to be present at a reception of the emperor after his return from the island of Elba, Leblanc wrote to the minister to give assurance of his fidelity to Louis XVIII. This declaration was published, and the bishop of Soissons withdrew to England. The return of the king recalled him to his diocese, and in 1817 he was appointed archbishop of Arles, re-establishing the Concordat. He resigned in 1822, withdrew to the Seminary of Foreign Missions at Paris, took charge of the Savoyard, and was appointed member of the chapter of St. Denis. He died July 13, 1825. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Le Cancean, a species of divination (q.v.), performed by means of a basin, with wedges of gold or silver marked with certain characters. The wedges were suspended over the water, and the demon formally invited, when he gave the response in a low hissing sound passing through the water.

Lech, John, an Irish prelate, was elected to the bishopric of Dunkeld, Scotland, in 809, and was canon of the Church. In 810 he was promoted to the see of Dubloth, where he was bishop and lord treasurer of Ireland. He died Aug. 10, 813. See D'Alton, Memoirs of the Archbishops of Dublin, p. 120.

Le Courtray, Pierre François, a French theologian, was born at Rouen in 1681. At the age of sixteen he was admitted to the congregation of St. Genevieve, and soon he instructed there in philosophy and theology, was canon in 1701, and librarian in 1711. A dissertation which he published at Brussels in 1725, under the title Sur la Vérité des Ordinations des Anglais, called forth the opposition of Gervaise, Hardouin, and Lequeun, and an assembly of twenty-two bishops who refuted the arguments of M. de Condren, together with Le Courtray's rejoinder to his opponent. Finally he was excommunicated by the abbot of St. Genevieve and cardinal Noailles; but about the same time the Oxford University made him doctor of theology. He intended to write against the ordinaries, but, afraid of being imprisoned, went to England, where he was received by archbishop Wake of Canterbury. Le Courtray died at London in 1776. He published a French translation of Sarpi's History of the Council of Trent, with notes (London, 1736, 2 vols.). See La France Protestante (1786), p. 305. See also the Histoire des Hommes Curieux: Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Le Coq, Claude, a French prelate, was born at Plounevez Paray, Brittany, Sept. 2, 1740. He pursued his studies at the College of Quimer, and was a professor of theology at the time of the suppression of the Order of the Premonstratensians. In 1790 he was elected constitutional bishop of the department of Ille-et-Vilaine, and the same year deputy at the legislative assembly. During the Reign of Terror he was imprisoned and sent to Mont Michel, where he remained confined for nearly two years. In 1795 he resumed his episcopal duties, and adhered to the encyclicals published by the synod of the constitutional bishops reunited at Paris. Le Coq presided over the national council of the same bishops, held at the capitole from Aug. 15, 1797, to Nov. 12 of the same year.
In 1789 he assembled a synod at Bremen, but the priests of his diocese did not all recognise his authority. Being called to the presidency of the council of 1801, he opposed the project of a French sacramentarian. At the time of the Concordat of the first consul with the pope, Le Coz resigned, and was appointed archbishop of Bamberg, which he accepted, known to the Pope by letters on the Inspiration of the Holy Scriptures (1852).

Lecoeur, John, LL.D., a Scotch Baptist minister and missionary, was born at Glasgow, Sept. 2, 1803, and became a Baptist in 1820. He was educated at the Haldane Institution, Grantown, in the north of Scotland, in the Baptist College, Bristol, and the University of Glasgow. He was ordained pastor in India at Edinburgh, July 5, 1825, and sailed from Liverpool on the 25th for the mission station at Serampore. He began work as tutor in the college, and preacher of the gospel. In 1835 he was ordained co-pastor of the church at Serampore. In 1837 he sailed for England for the benefit of his wife's health, and to awaken greater interest at home in the mission in India. In 1838 he was induced to settle as pastor of the church at Irvine, Ayrshire. He removed to London in 1848 as pastor of the Baptist Church in Hammersmith. In 1850 he was sent, with his colleague, James Russell, as a deputation to India and Ceylon, in which they spent some four months. He resigned his pastorate in 1868, and removed to Bath for rest and recuperation. He afterwards engaged in various public labors, and at the close of 1867 accepted the pastorate at Kennington, Kent. He ceased to preach in 1870, and died March 16, 1874. See (Lond.) Bapt. Hand-Book, 1875, p. 284.

Lecoeur, William, D.D., a Scotch divine, was born in 1706, educated at the University of Edinburgh, licensed to preach in 1731, ordained minister of Beith in 1736, elected professor of theology in the University of Glasgow in 1749, principal of that University in 1758, and died in 1785. He was held in high estimation by his brethren in the ministry, having been elected by them, in 1740, to the moderatorship of the Synod of Glasgow and Ayr, and in 1737 of the General Assembly. He was a ripe theologian, a powerful preacher, and a warm advocate of all institutions of a worthy character. A collective edition of his sermons, with a life of the author, by James Wardrow, D.D., was published (Lond. 1789, 2 vola. 8vo; new ed. 1816, 2 vola. 8vo). See The (Lond.) Christian Observer, Dec. 1815, p. 768; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Le Faucheur, Michel, one of the most famous Protestant preachers of the 17th century, was born in the neighborhood of Geneva in 1655. In 1667 he was ordained, and appointed pastor at Annonay. His fame as a pulpit orator was soon made known, and the authorities of Geneva wished him to come there. But Le Faucheur declined, and in 1609 went to Paris. In 1612 he was called to Montpellier, and at different periods represented the churches of Languedoc at the synodical assemblies. He died at Paris in 1657, leaving, Sermons:—Traité de l'Action de l'Orateur (Paris, 1657).—Traité de la Cène du Seigneur (Geneva, 1635). See Bayle, Dict. Historique; Haag, La France Protestant, vi; Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. F.)

Legge, John. See LUCIFER.

Legge, Grundy, LL.D., a Scotch Congregational minister, was born at Hougham, Aberdeen, Oct. 10, 1802. He became a student of King's College, Aberdeen, in 1819, completing his curriculum in 1825, and receiving his degree of M.A.; was converted in 1828; entered Highbury College to prepare for the ministry in 1850, and in 1852 became pastor at Bristol. In 1856 he accepted the pastorate of the Independent Chapel, Leicester, and in that capacity continued till his death, Jan. 24, 1861. In 1859 he was chairman of the Congregational Union. Dr. Legge was a man of noble qualities, endowed with a strong intellect, a glowing imagination, a loving heart, and great constancy of purpose. His principal publications were, Principles of Nonconformity:—Christianity in Harmony with Man's Nature, Present and Progressive.—The Range and Limitations of Human Knowledge, besides several sermons. See (Leob.) Cong. Year-book, 1802, p. 247.

Logobien, CHARLES, a French Jesuit, was born at St. Malo in 1658; in 1671 he entered the society of Jesus; shortly after taught at Tours; then removed to Paris, where he became first secretary, and afterwards superintendent, of the missions of his order to China. He visited China 1702, a collection of letters from missionaries in China, etc., entitled Lettres Edifiantes et Curieuses, Écrites des Missions Étrangères. He died March 5, 1708, at Paris. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Le Gouverneur, GUILLAUME, a French prelate, was born at St. Malo. After being canon, then dean of the cathedral of his native place, he became bishop, Jan. 29, 1610. He assisted as deputy of the clergy to the states of Brittany in 1614, founded in his diocese several establishments of charity and religion, and occupied his time in collecting the ecclesiastical regulations laid down by his predecessors. He died at St. Malo, June 25, 1650. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Legras, LOUIS DE MARILLAC, Madame, foundress of an order of nuns, was born at Paris, Aug. 12, 1591. She was daughter of Louis de Marillac, brother of the celebrated guard of the seals, and of the marshal of this name. In 1619 she married Antoine Legras, secretary of the queen Marie de Medicis. Being eventually left a widow, she devoted herself entirely to religious matters. In connection with Vincent de Paul she bore an important part in the establishment of various charitable institutions. They founded the institute of men of charity called les Grèves, on account of the color of their costume. Placed at the head of a community of this order at Paris, Madame Legras devoted herself with great self-abnegation to the care of the sick. She aided Vincent de Paul in bestowing large charities in various ways. Her death occurred at Paris in 1632. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Le Hennuyer, JEAN, a French prelate, was born in 1497 at St. Quentin. He was successively chief almoner of Henry II, Francis II, Charles IX, and Henry III. Appointed bishop of Loudun in 1557, and afterward of Lisleux, he was spiritual director of Catherine de Medici, wife of Henry II. In this position he always showed a disposition to persecute the Protestants, although some acts to the contrary have been falsely attributed to him. He died in 1578. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Lehrli. On the identification of this name Lieut. Conder remarks as follows (True Track in Palestine, i. 276):—"A little way north-west of Zorah, seven miles from Belt 'Atab, is a low hill, on the slope of which are springs called 'Ayn Aphan and Mahbir, or the foundations of the place of baptism. Close by is a little Moslem chapel, dedicated to Shelh Nedhir, or 'the Nazarite chief'; and, higher up, a ruin with the extraordinary title Ism Allah—'the name of God'. The Nazarite chief is probably Samson, whose memory is so well preserved in this small district, and the place is perhaps connected with a tradition of one of his exploits. The Ism Allah is possibly a corruption of Esm Allah—'God's name',—and, in that case, the hill mentioned might be the battle of Hamath Lehrli. Finally, we were informed by a native of the place that the little caravan settlements called Al Kha, in which we supposed the Ism Allah, or 'fountain of the crier' (Judges xiv. 19). To that say this hill certainly represents Hamath Lehrli—the hill of the jaw-bone—would be too bold. It seems, however, clear that a tradition of one of Samson's exploits lingers here; the site is not inappropriate for the scene of the slaughter of the Philistines, with the jaw-bone, and we have not succeeded in finding any other likely site."

Lehmann, WILHELM FRIEDRICH, a Lutheran minister, was born Oct. 16, 1820, in Wittemberg. In 1824 he came with his parents to America. He studied at the theological seminaries of Columbus, O., and Philadelphia, Pa., and was for some time preacher at Somerset, O. In 1846 he was appointed professor at the University of Cincinnati. He died Dec. 1, 1880. For many years he was president of the Lutheran Synod of Ohio. (B. P.)

Lehmann, ADAM THEODOR ALBERT FRANZ, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Soest, Dec. 2, 1777. He entered the ministry in 1801, was in 1819 dean and pastor at Amagapach, and died Aug. 14, 1857, doctor of theology. He wrote, Die Lehre von der Versuchung des Menschen mit Gott durch Christum (Sulzbach, 1821).—Über die Taufe (Heidelberg, 1867).— Aufsätze theologischen Inhalts, etc. (1853).—Die Rechtsfertigung der evangelischen Kirche in ihren Fragen momentan dargestellt (1856). Leib Olmaï, in the mythology of the Laplanders, was a deity of the atmosphere, who made the weather favorable to hunting and fishing.

Leifittbus, in Norse mythology, was one of the rivers of hell, which take their origin from the spring Hvergelmer.

Leightoun, HENRY DE, a Scotch prelate, was consecrated bishop of Moray, March 8, 1414, where he continued ten years. In 1424 he was translated to the see of Aberdeen. He was one of the commissioners sent to London for negotiating the ransom of king James I, and returned home with him. He died in 1441. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 118-142.

Leinburg, JOHANN LEHM VON, a Roman Catholic prelate of Germany, was born in 1521. For some time dean at Bregenz and Innsbruck, he was in 1789 appointed prince-bishop of Brixen, and died April 24, 1884. He was a man of peace, and tolerant against non-Catholics. (B. P.)

Leinbach, THOMAS HARTMAN, an earnest and successful minister of the German Reformed Church, was born in Berks County, Pa., Jan. 18, 1802. He studied privately under the Rev. Dr. F. L. Herman; was licensed and ordained in 1822. After serving for several years a few congregations, located partly in Lancaster and partly in Berks County, he accepted the call from the church of Lebanon, where he concluded his long and useful ministry, March 31, 1864. Father Leinbach was celebrated as a "catechist," which eminently fitted him for the particular field to which he was called. He was besides a very able, earnest, and effective preacher, and a most conscientious and successful pastor. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church, ir, 175. (D. Y. H.)

Lemcke, Heinrich, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Dec. 31, 1601, at Lubeck. He studied at different universities, and died at Bergen, Norway, March 7, 1673. He wrote "Vindiciae Liturgiae Apostolicae, Vitae et Mortis Testimonia; — Vindiciae In- carnatis Veri Messae Promissae ex Thalmod et Rabbinico Scripta Druma; — Schola Populatarum Reformata. See Moller, Cimbria Litteratur; Jocher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Leckion, s. v.

Lemoine, Jean, a French prelate, was born at Creusy, in the 18th century. Having completed his studies, he took the degree of doctor of theology at the University of Paris, and made a journey to Rome, where he was well received, and appointed auditor of the rota. His commentary upon the sixth book of the Decretals, which he wrote at Rome, gained for him the title of Bonifieur VIII cardinal. Boniface VIII authorized him to legislate to France in 1302, and in this position he strove to re-establish the peace between Philip the Fair and the holy see. He acted with so much discretion that he won the esteem of the king without losing his credit with the pope.

Lemmon, Andre, bishop of Noyon, aided him in the founding of the college which bore the name of the cardinal Lemoine. He died in 1316, and the two brothers were laid in the same tomb. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Lemnos, Johann Canutus, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born in 1573, at Lenna, near Upsala. He studied at Wittenberg, Helmstadt, and Rostock, was professor of Greek and Hebrew at Upsala, and died April 26, 1669, doctor of theology, archbishop of Sweden, and pro-chancellor of the Upsala. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v., and Vol. IX of this work. Lenet, Philippert Bernard, a French monk, was born at Dijon, Aug. 24, 1677. Having been received among the canons regular of St. Genevieve, he soon distinguished himself by his piety and learning. For a time professor at Senlis and at Provins, he became director of the seminary at Rheims, and abbot of Grand-Val-des-Ecolos, in the diocese of Langres. Being accused of Jansenism, Lenet was obliged to retire from his position, and died in 1748. He wrote some works, for which see Index Librorum. See also Hoefer, Encyclopaedia, s. v.

Leneuve, John, an English clergyman and biographer, was born Dec. 27, 1679, and educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. He became rector of Thornton-le-Moor, Lincolnshire, about 1721, and died about 1741. He was an industrious collector of biographical materials, and has given to the world several important collections. They include, Lives of the Most Illustrious Persons who Died in 1711-12 (London, 1718-14, 2 vols. 8vo): — Pauci Ecclesiæ Anglicanae (1718), of which a new edition was published (1854, 3 vols. 8vo) by T. Lenfant, David (2, P. B.) French Dominican, who died at Paris, May 31, 1888, is the author of Concordaniae As-summtionis (1720) and Antiquitates Poste-ramum (2 vols. 1724).

Lenfant, Jacques (2, P. B.) French writer, born at Besançon, Oct. 5, 1674. He studied theology at Paris, and took holy orders, but soon exchanged his clerical dress for that of a politician and diplomatist. He died Jan. 16, 1755. Of his numerous works we mention the following, bearing upon theology: Novum Jesu Christi Testantium Notae Historiae et Criticae Illustratum (Paris, 1706, 8 vols.; reprinted 1785); Imitation of Jesus Christ, Traditae et Recut (1771); Traité Historique et Dogmatique du Secret Inviolable de la Confession (1713 and often); Réfutation des Érroures des Mauvais Hommes des Temps Modernes (1781).

Lenfant, Léonce (2, P. B.)
Travels in上限 and Modernes sur les Apparitions, les Visions et les Songes (1751, 4 vols.). He also edited Lectiuris Lactantii Opera Omnia (1746).

Lengnich, Karl Benjamin (2, P. B.)
Lutheran theologian of Germany, who was born at Dantzic, Feb. 19, 1748. He studied at Leipzig and Basel, and was second preacher at his native place, and died Nov. 5, 1796, leaving, Predig-ten (Dantzic, 1770); Der Beitrag zur Kenntniss selten un-merkwiirdiger Bücher (ibid. 1776, 2 vols.).

Lemont, Charles (2, P. B.)
French archaeologist and numismatist, was born in Paris, June 1, 1802. In 1828 he travelled in Egypt, was in 1837 conservator at the national library, and after 1855 acted as Guizot's sub-stitute at the Sorbonne, where his lectures, savoring too much of Romish orthodoxy, often caused disturbances, especially in 1846, when he had to give up his lecturing. In 1848 he was called as professor of Egyptian archaeology at the College of France, and died at Athens, Nov. 24, 1839. Of his works we mention, Trésor de Numismatique et de Gymnique (1806-50, 5 vols.); Éléments du Monuments Chrétographiques (1844-87, 8 vols.).

Lenormand, François (2, P. B.) Son of Charles, was born in Paris, Jan. 17, 1857. He pursued the same studies which distinguished his father. In 1862 he was sub-librarian of the Institute, in 1874 professor of archaeology at the l'École des Hautes Études, and died Dec. 10, 1888, leaving;

Manuel d'Histoire Ancienne de l'Orient jusqu'à ses Guerres Indiennes (3d ed. 1869, 9 vols. trans. into German, Ber-lin, 1869, 2 vols.; 2d ed. 1871); Lettres Archéologiques et Épigraphiques (1871-72, 4 vols.);

Leo, Gottlob Eduard, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born in 1808, and died at Waldenburg, May 7, 1881, member of consistory and doctor of theo-lology. He is the author of, Geschichte der christlichen Religion (1840), Kritisches über die Lehren des Georgi-ber's (Dresden, 1846); Stimmen aus der Kirche (1845);
Paulus Epistola i ad Thimotho (1846); Ge-schichte der Reformation in Dresden und Leipzig (1849); Das Leben August Hermann Francke's (1846). See Zeitschrift für Erziehungswissenschaft (1846).

Leo, Zedrich, a famous German historian, was born at Rudolstadt, March 19, 1759. He studied at Breslau and Jena, and commenced his academic ca-reer at Erlangen in 1820. In 1824 he was at Berlin, accepted a call to Halle in 1830, and died April 24, 1878. Leo was orthodox in religion, and conservative in politics, and from this standpoint wrote his Lehr-buch der Universalgeschichte (Halle, 1832-44, 6 vols.; 3d ed. 1849-58). Liberalism found in him a violent op-ponent, and the liberal tendencies in State and Church he assailed in Studien und Schriften zur Naturgeschichte des Staates (ibid. 1833), Die Hegelgegen (1838), Sigmund Tempera (1840), more especially in the Kreuzzei-lung, the organ of the political conservatives, and in Evangelische Kirchenzeitung, the organ of orthodoxy. His political tendencies were acknowledged by king Frederick William IV, and in 1863 he was made a privy councilor. See Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.; Brockhaus, Conversations-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Leo, Rudolf, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born May 6, 1806, at Rudolstadt. He studied at Jena and Göttingen, was tutor of prince Günther of Schwarzburg-Rudolstadt from 1829 to 1839, and professor at the gymnasium of his native place from 1839 to 1844. In the latter year he was appointed second deacon, in 1851 court-preacher and member of consistory, and in 1852 general-superintendent. He retired from the ministry in 1879, and died Jan. 18, 1883. (B. P.)

Leonard, Alexander S. T.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in New York city, June 29, 1806. He graduated from Columbia College in 1823; was engaged in mercantile pursuits for twenty years; ordained deacon in 1844; assistant at St. Clement's Church, N. Y.; rector of Emmanuel Church, in the same city, from 1849 to 1865, and died there, May 17, 1878. See Prof. Episc. Almanac (1879, p. 109; Church Almanac, 1879, p. 188).

Leonhard, Matteo d'Udine, a famous Domini-can, who died in 1470, provincial of Lombardy, was a doctor of law and divinity. He preached in the principal cities of Italy, especially at Florence, before pope Eugene IV and his court. His Sermones have often been printed. See Lichtenberger, Encycl. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexi-kon, s. v. (B. P.)

Leonetti, Ottavio (called il cors. Podorosco e Podoro-sano), an eminent painter and engraver, was born in Rome in 1578. Among his historical works is The Virgin and Infant, in Santa Maria della Minerva; The Assumption, San Eustachio, and St. Carlo, St. Francesco, and St. Nicholas in San Urbano. He was chosen director of the Academy of St. Luke, and was appointed knight of the order of Christ, on which occasion he painted the Martirdom of St. Martin, for the Church of the Academy. As an engraver, he did not excel very well. He, however, executed a number of prints of works. He died in 1630. See Hoefler, Novis. Biog. Geographia, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

The leopard is held in great dread by the natives of different parts of Africa, not only on account of its ferocity, but from the superstitious notion that wicked men metamorphose themselves into these animals, and commit all sorts of works without the liability or possibility of being killed. In southern Guineas in small villages are sometimes abodoed by their inhabitants, because they are afraid to attack these animals on account of their supposed supernatural powers. In Dahomey, the leopard is accounted so sacred that if any one should kill it he would be convicted of having committed sacrilege, and would be offered in sacrifice to the offended deity. The leopard is there looked upon as an impersonation of the supreme god, whom they call Sch. If any one is killed by a leopard, his relatives rejoice at the event, and treat the animal with great kindness. See Leopard.

Lepcha Version 665 L'ESPIEN

Lepcha Version of the Scriptures. Lepcha is an aboriginal monoincline in the north-east India, near Darjeeling. The first attempt at a translation into that dialect was made by the Rev. W. Start, in 1855 or 1856, who printed the gospel of Matthew at his own expense. The Calcutta Auxiliary Bible Society published, in 1871, the gospels of Matthew and John, Genesis, and part of Exodus.

Lepsius, Karl Richard, a noted German Egyptologist, was born at Naumburg, Dec. 28, 1810. Well prepared by seven years of classical training at Pforta, he went in 1829 to Leipsic and Göttingen to study philology. When he took his degree, he showed at once by his dissertation that he knew how best to utilize the principles of comparative philology by applying them to the so-called Rosetta stone, published by the French scholar, and by the aid of his classical scholarship. He took for his subject the Umbrain Inscriptions, and thus laid the foundation of what has proved in the end one of the most successful achievements of the science of languages—namely, the decipherment and grammatical analysis of the Egyptian hieroglyphics. In 1838 he went to Paris to attend lectures, and study in libraries and museums. In 1834 he published Paleographie als Mittel für die Sprachforschung, for which was awarded by the French Institute the Prix Volney. In 1835 another essay of his, Über die Anordnung und Verwendung der Altegyptischen alphabetischen, dithophonischen, palatalischen und altägyptischen Alphabeta, was read before the Berlin Academy; and in the same year, while still at Paris, he wrote his paper, Über den Uebrigen und die Verwandtschaft der Zahnziffern in die griechischen, semitischen, und der koptischen Sprache. At the time of his residence at Paris, Champollion's star was just rising, but Egyptian studies were only in their infancy. Lepsius felt attracted towards these new studies. Having acquired the first principles of the decipherment of hieroglyphics from Champollion's works, he proceeded from Paris to Italy, which was rich in Egyptian antiquities. He spent some time with Rosellini, at Pisa, and then settled down to steady work at Rome. Here he was attracted by Bunsen, who did everything he could for him. By his Lettre à M. Rosellini sur l'Alphabet Hieroglyphique (1857), Lepsius took his position as one of the leading Egyptologists of the day, and thus entered upon a career which he never left again. But, although Egypt formed the principal object of his studies, his classical tastes, too, found ample food in Italy, as was shown by his work on Inscriptions latine de l'Antiquité. He translated the works of Ovca (Leipsic, 1841), and by his papers on Die türkischen Prasensagent in Etrurien (1842). From Italy he went to England, where he spent two years studying in the British Museum, and shaping plans for future work. In 1842 he found Lepsius established as professor in Berlin. In the meantime he had published some of his best-known works—his Auswahl der wichtigsten Urkunden des ägyptischen Alterthums (1842, fol. with 23 tables), and Das Todtenbuch der Ägypter (cod. with 79 tables). In the same year followed the great expedition to Egypt, projected by Bunsen, and carried out at the expense of the king of Prussia, Frederick William IV. Lepsius was the leader, and he acquitted himself of this most difficult task with perfect success. Every student of Egyptology knows the fruits of that expedition, as gathered partly in Denkmäler aus Egypten und Thracioisch (1849-59, 12 vols., of the largest folio, with 894 tables). In 1849 he published his Chronologie der Ägypter, one volume; the second never appeared. Without enumerating the many works which he published after his return from Egypt, we will state that in 1866 he went to the land of the Pharaohs once more, and this second expedition was crowned by the discovery of a new trilingual tablet, a worthy companion of the Rosetta stone. In 1869 he paid his last visit to the land of his lifelong love, being present at the opening of the Suez canal, and afterwards travelled with the crown-prince of Prussia to Upper Egypt and Nubia. The last years of his life were devoted chiefly to the elaboration of his Uberbau, a work of enormous labor, full not on of new materials, but of new views on the relationship of the numerous languages of Africa. "Taken all in all," says Max Müller, "Lepsius was the perfect type of the German professor, devoted to his work, full of ideals, and convinced that there is no higher vocation in life than to preserve and to add to the sacred stock of human knowledge, which, though it is seen by the few only, has to be carried, like the Ark of the Covenant, from battle to battle, and kept safe from the hands of the Philistines." Lepsius died July 10, 1884, only one day after Dörner and Lange. Like a Christian, he prepared himself for his last journey, being strengthened before his departure by the Lord's Supper, which he received from the hands of the court preacher, Dr. Kögel. Besides having received different orders from the hands of kings, he was made doctor of theology by the Leipsic University in 1859. He also introduced the so-called missionary alphabet, or Standard Alphabetic for Reducing Uncertain Languages and all the Graphic Systems to a Uniform Orthography in European Letters, a system which gained support both by scholars and missionaries. See Max Müller, in the Academy (Lond. July 19, 1884): Ebers, Richard Lepsius, ein Lebensbild (Leipsic, 1884; a list of Lepsius's works is found in Sitzungsber. der philosoph. naturw. Gesellschaft zu Berlin, 1884; reed e auf Karl Richard Lepsius, read before the Berlin Academy of Sciences, July 2, 1885 (Berlin, 1886). (B. P.)

Lerad, in Norse mythology, is a mighty tree, standing in Walhalla, in whose boughs the reindeer Eikhyrnr and the goat Heidrun live and find nourishment. From the droppings which fall from the antlers of the forest all the rivers of the world are formed.

Lercari, Nicolaus Maria, an Italian cardinal, was born at Tabia, Genoa, Nov. 12, 1675. He filled various offices at the pontifical court, and afterwards became successively governor of Lodi, of Benevento, of Camerino, of Ancona, of Civita Vecchia, and of Perugia. Being called to Rome in 1724 by Benedict XIII, with whom he had allied himself at Benevento, he was consecrated archbishop in putibus, and two years later appointed prime minister. The foreign ambassadors refusing to treat with him, under the pretext that his position was not sufficiently honorable, he was made cardinal in December, 1726. In his capacity of secretary of state he showed himself an able negotiator, and several times thwarted the purposes of the imperial court. In 1730, on the death of Benedict XIII, he was deposed of his honors, and arraigned before a congregation of cardinals to give an account of his administration. His integrity was established, but his influence was gone. He died March 20, 1757. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Lesches, in Slavonic mythology, were evil spirits of the woods, whose existence is still believed by the Russians and Lithuanians. They were similar to the Fyrians, or Fauns, of the Greeks and Romans, and were brought north probably by the latter.

L'Espin (Lat. Spina, or Spinus), Jean de, a French theologian, was born about 1506. At first a monk, he renounced Romanism in 1561, and joined the Reformed Church. After the Poissy Conquest, he was for some time preacher at Fontenay-le-Comte, and afterwards at La Rochelle. In 1564 he published his De la mort et du devoir de ses sacrificateurs. In 1568 he was pastor at St. Quentin, in 1572 at Paris, in 1576 at Saumur, in 1578 at Angers, and died in 1594 at Saumur. Besides his Discours, he published, Traité de l'Apostasie (1683):—Dialogue de la Cène (cod.), etc. See Maye, Dict. Hist. et Critique, s. v. "Spina." Le Stang, Christophe, a French prelate, was born at Brives in 1560. When not more than twenty years of age he was made bishop of Lodève, in which position he devoted himself to the destruction of Calvinism, then very rife in Languedoc, and for this he received of Henry III a pension of twelve thousand crowns per month. The League counted him among its most fervent advocates. He had a contest with the duke of Montmorency. Le Stang, lost all the revenues of his bishopric, and the palace which he had built was destroyed. To make amends. Henry III gave to him the episcopal house and the revenues of the bishopric of Carcassonne, which Montmorency had enjoyed. In 1604 he was made bishop of Carcassonne. Louis XIII made him guardian of his orders, and grand master of his chapel, member of his private council, and director of his finances. Le Stang continued to fill important offices until his death, which occurred at Carcassonne, Aug. 11, 1621. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Le Stonac, Jeanne de, foundress of an order of French nuns, was born at Bordeaux in 1536. She was the daughter of a councillor of the parliament of Bordeaux, and of Jeanne d'Eyguem de Montagne, sister of the celebrated philosopher Michel de Montaigne. Although her mother was a Protestant, her father and uncle made her adopt the Catholic religion. In 1537 she married Gaston de Montmorand. After the death of her husband she consecrated herself to the Virgin, and entered, in 1608, the house of the Feuillantes of Louise-House. Shortly after, Jeanne de Le Stonac placed herself at the head of a society of young ladies, the greater part taken from Calvinistic families. These new nuns bore the name of Jesuitines. Cardinal de Sorelius opposed the foundation of this order, but the pope favored it and ordered its consecration, which took place, March 23, 1606, and it was confirmed by a brief of Paul V, April 7, 1607. The order grew rapidly in importance. At the time of the death of Jeanne, she had control of twenty-nine houses of Jesuitines. She died at Bordeaux, April 2, 1640. After her death some of her bones were sent to the principal convents of the order, or were used, according to some hagiographers, to perform various miracles. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Le Strange, Louis Henri de (dom Augustin), the renovator of the order of La Trappe, was born at Vire in 1574. On his nomination as coadjutor to the archbishop of Vienne in 1780, he retired to La Trappe, in the department of Orne, near Mortagne, the seat of Cistercian monks since 1140, but reformed by the abbé de Rancé in 1662, and which has given its name to all monasteries which have adopted the rigorous rule of Rancé. See Trappists. In 1791 the French government seized the property of the monks of La Trappe, and Le Strange led twenty-four of the religious to Val Sainte, canon of Fribourg, Switzerland, where they were held a few weeks. He was sent back by the king, and Augustine placed at its head. On the invasion of Switzerland, in 1798, by a French army, the Trappists were compelled to flee. They wandered with their leader through various parts of Austria and Bavaria, until Paul I promised them hospitality in his states, and they established themselves in Russian Poland in 1799. In the following year the czar issued a space ordering all French emigrants to leave his territories. Augustine then led his brethren to Protestant Prussia, where he found a temporary asylum. Then it was that a party of them, guided by Urban Guille, embarked at Amsterdam for Baltimore, May 29, 1803. The deliverance of Switzerland, in 1804, soon permitted the monks to return to Val Sainte, and in 1805 Napoleon granted them authority to establish themselves in his empire. Mont Valerian, founded by the gates of Paris, soon beheld a monastery of this austere order arise, but when the emperor began to persecute the pope, the fervent disciples of Rancé and Le Strange resisted him. In 1810 Dom Augustine accordingly made his monks solemnly retrace the oath of fidelity to the constitution of the empire, and Napoleon ordered all houses of La Trappe to be closed, and the abbot Le Strange to be tried by court-martial; but Augustine escaped to Switzerland, and thence traversing Germany, pursued by the imperial police, embarked at Riga for London, and thence for the United States. There (in the city of Boston) he found a second colony of Trappists, under Vincent of Paul, awaiting him. Dom Augustin Le Strange arrived in New York in 1813, to which place he ordered Guille from Missouri, and Vincent from Boston, and concentrated the scattered and feeble forces of the brethren. The energetic Le Strange also founded a community of Trappist nuns. Meanwhile the fall of Napoleon opened France to the Trappists, and Dom Augustine returned to restore the black-robed monks to their home. He embarked for Harve in October, 1814, with twelve monks, the sisters and pupils, when he restored the order to Europe. Le Strange, the indefatigable and heroic successor of Bernard and Rancé, died at Lyon, France, July 16, 1832. See De Courcy and Shea, Hist. of the C. C. Church in the U. S. p. 370.

Lethe, in Greek mythology, is the stream of forgetfulness, out of which the souls drank when entering Elysium.

Lethra (now Leire), in the island of Zealand, the city of the gods among the ancient Danes. This was the holy place where the nation assembled to offer up their sacrifices, to present their prayers, and to receive the consolations and cures of the gods.

Lewis, Isaac, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Wilton, Conn., Jan. 1, 1773. He graduated from Yale College in 1794, with his twin-brother, Zech-ariah Lewis. Remaining at New Haven, he preached in the pulpit of the Congregational church at Yale, and was ordained pastor of Piscataqua, N. H., on Sept. 30, 1798. He was installed pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in Cooperstown, N. Y., in 1800; in 1806 of the Presbyterian Church in Goshen; and in 1812 preached in Bro- tol, R. I.; subsequently served in New Rochelle and LEWIS, William Henry, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at Litchfield, Conn., Dec. 22, 1803. He was professor of Anatomy in the Church of the Holy Trinity, in Brooklyn, N.Y., until 1861, when he became rector of Christ Church, Water-town, Conn., of which he continued to have charge until 1874. He died at the latter place, Oct. 2, 1877. He published, Sermons for the Christian Year:—Confession for Christ:—The Early Collects, besides several tracts. See Prot. Episc. LEWIS, Zocharias, a Congregational minister and editor, son of Rev. Isaac Lewis, D.D., was born at Wilton, Conn., Jan. 1, 1773. With his twin brother, Isaac, he graduated from Yale College in 1794, and was studying theology at Philadelphia under Ashbel Green, D.D., was licensed to preach in 1796; and in the same year was appointed tutor in Yale College, remaining in that office until 1799. While a theological student he was a private tutor in general Washington's family. Continued that his health was too much impaired to fulfill the duties of the ministry, he became the editor of the Commercial Advertiser, and New York Spectator, continuing in that employment until 1820. For six years he was corresponding secretary of the New York Religious Tract Society, out of which sprang the American Tract Society. Resigning this position in February, 1820, he was elected, in May, a secretary of the United Foreign Missionary Society, which office he held for five years. For several years he was editor of the American Missionary Register, which he began to publish in July, 1820. Died at New York, N.Y., Nov. 14, 1840. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 666.

Lha Ma, in Lamaism, is one of the five upper worlds through which the soul of the departed has to wander.

Lhamoghuprul, in Lamanian mythology, was the wife of the Thibetian king, Szanaz, one of the most beautiful, pure, and sacred nymphs of the lower heaven. See Cuo Congu.

Lha-Ssa-Moron, an annual festival observed by the Lamas of Thibet on the third day of the first moon, at Lha-Ssa. It lasts six days, and is designed to give the devout an opportunity to implore the blessings of the Telé-Lama, and to make a pilgrimage to the celebrated Buddhist monastery called Moron, which occupies the centre of the town. See Hse, Travels in Tibet and Thibet.

Lubamen, a name given by the ancient Romans to denote the bunch of hair which was cut from the forehead of the victim about to be sacrificed, and which was thrown into the fire as a kind of first-fruits.

Libanomancy (from Λιβανάς, the frankincense tree, and παυείν, divination), a species of divination (q. v.) which was performed by throwing a quantity of frankincense into the fire, and noting the odor which it emitted. If it burned quickly and gave out an agreeable smell, the omen was favorable; but if the reverse took place, it was unfavorable.

Libelli Pontentiales (certificates of penance), only documents from the Roman pontiffs of the 9th century by the Romish priesthood, granting immediate absolution to those who confessed their sins to the priest, and declared themselves ready to fulfill the appointed penance, even though they were not prepared to partake of the communion. Great opposition was made to this practice by the reformers in the time of Charlemagne. See PENITENTIAL.

Liber Albus (white book) of the ancient monasteries and guilds contained a personal history of visitors or benefactors, frequently recorded in the handwriting of the persons themselves commemorated.

Liber Albus, a festival observed annually by the ancient Romans on March 17, in honor of Liber or Bacchus. A procession of priests and priestesses, wearing ivy garlands, marched through the city, bearing wine, honey, cakes, and sweetmeats, along with a portable altar, having in the middle of it a fire-pan, in which the flames were burned. Thus borrowed by the Roman youths who had reached the age of sixteen were invested with the toga virilis or dress of manhood. The Liberales were much more innocent in their character than the Bacchanales (q.v.), and continued to be celebrated in Rome after the festival was suppressed.

Libera nos (deliver us) is the amplification of the petition, “Deliver us from evil,” in the Lord’s Prayer, found in almost all liturgies. For instance, that of the Gallican (which is variable) is on Christmas day:—Liber nos, omnipotens Deus, ab omni malo et custodi nos in omni opere bone, perfecta veritas et vera libertas Deus, qui regnas in secula seculorum. Many liturgies contain supplications for the intercession of saints in the Libera nos.

Liberi, Pietro, an eminent Italian painter, was born at Padua in 1605, and studied under Alessandro Varotari, also the works of the best masters, as Michael Angelo, Raphael, Correggio, and Titian. Among his best productions are the Murder of the Innocents, at Venice; Noah just Landed from the Ark, in the cathedral at Vicenza; and The Deux, in the Church of Santa Maria Maggiore, at Bergamo. Others of his grand pictures are the Destruction ofThrasybule's Host, in the cathedral at Vicenza; Moses Striking the Rock, at Bergamo; and the Sufferings of Job. He died in 1687. See Spooner, Biog. Libnah. Some would locate this place at Beit Jibrin, and others at Ibni, on the coast road, but Tristram (Bible Places, p. 44) and Trelawney Saunders (Map of the O.T.) accept the identification with Ashok vil Menasheh, which the Ordinance Map lays down at six and a half miles west of Beit-Jibrin, and the accompanying Memoirs describe thus (iii, 259): "A mud village on a flat plain, surrounded with arable land, and supplied by three wells. It is of moderate size, with two sacred places. The curious mound north of it is a remarkable feature in the landscape, two hundred and fifty feet high, and consisting of natural rock, but scarped, and appearing to have been artificially made steeper. On the top is a sacred mound, with a few hedges of prickly pear. This site is evidently ancient and important. The hills near it are of very white chalk, and the name Libnah signifies 'milk white.'"

Libra (a balance), the seventh sign of the zodiac. It was supposed that those who were born under this constellation loved equity. There were other kindred superstitions connected with this sign by the ancients.

Libs, in Greek mythology, was the south-west wind. He was represented in Athens, on the tower of winds, as a young man, clothed in a light mantle. In his hands he carries a ship's ornament. See NOTES.

Lichtenstein, Anton August Heinrich, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Aug. 25, 1758, at Helmstatt, where he also pursued his studies. In 1778 he commenced his academic career in his native place, was in 1777 rector at the Johanneum at Hamburg, and in 1782 professor of Oriental languages there. In 1798 he was called to his native place as professor of theology, general superintendent, and first preacher at St. Stephen's. to complete his theological studies under Bengstenberg, Staël, Neander, Twesten, and others. In 1842 he was ordained. Liebmann, who removed to Erlangen, and accepted a call from the Jewish Missionary Society at Strasburg. In 1845 he received a call from New York, to act as superintendent of the Jewish mission there, which he accepted. In 1847 he left his position, and in 1848 was appointed to the German Presbyterian Church at Paterson, N. J. From 1851 to 1854 he labored at New Albany, Ind.; accepted a call of the German Reformed Church at Buffalo, N. Y., where he remained till 1852, when the First German Reformed Church of Cincinnati, O., called him as its pastor. In 1856 he exchanged duties for the position of the pastor of the First German Presbyterian Church there, and fell asleep in Jesus, Nov. 3, 1882. (R. P.)

Lichtenstein, Moritz, a Lutheran minister of Germany, brother of Jacob, was born Jan. 3, 1824. Like his brother, he studied theology first at Erlangen, and subsequently at Halle. In 1856 he entered actively upon the ministerial career, by being man was imprisoned as an agent minister at Bürglen, in Franconia. In 1857 he was appointed to the living of Tann. The place proving injurious, Lichtenstein was transferred to Rittersbach, Central Franconia, in 1860, and died Sept. 3, 1876. (B. P.)

Lida, David de, a Jewish writer of the 18th century, is the author of ידיה, or רבי ידיה, as a cabalistic commentary on Ruth (Amsterdam, 1610) — יד實現, homilies on the Pentateuch (ibid. 1719) — ידיה על כל הימים, or a commentary on the daily precepts (1590). His writings were edited and published under the title ידיה על כל הימים, by his son (Frankfort-on-the-Main, 1737). See Finst., Bibl. Jud. ii, 247. (B. P.)

Liebmann, Franz Leonhard Bruno, a Roman Catholic theologian, was born at Molsheim, near Strasburg, in 1759. At the time of the French revolution, to avoid being imprisoned, he fled to Germany, but returned to his parochial work at Ermeloheim in 1795. In 1801 he was called to Strassburg as cathedral-preacher and episcopal secretary, but returned again to Ermeloheim in 1804. Liebmann was imprisoned under the pretext of having relations with the Bourbon family. He was released, however, in 1805, and his friend, the bishop of Mayence, appointed him superior of the clerical seminary and canon at the cathedral of Mainz. In 1806 he was called to Strasbourg as professor of Holy Scripture and theology, and in 1824 returned to his native city. He died in 1844, is the author of Institutiones Theologicae Dogmaticae (1819, 5 vols.), a work still used in the seminaries of France, Belgium, Germany, and America. It has also been translated into French in 1866. See Lichtenberger, Encyclo. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.; Winter, Handbuch der theolog. Lit. i, 807. (B. P.)

Lieber, Karl Theodore Albert, a prominent Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Schinkel, near Naumburg, March 3, 1806. He studied at Leipzig, Berlin, and Wittenberg, was in 1822 pastor at Kreisfeld, in 1825 professor of languages at Kiel, in 1831 at Leipzig, and in 1855 general superintendent and court-preacher at Dresden. He died June 24, 1871, at Meran, Switzerland. Lieber is the author of Aug. von St. Victor und die theologischen Richtungen seiner Zeit (Leip- nitz, 1882): — Die christliche Dogmatik aus dem christolo- gischen Prinzip dargestellt (Götterzunah, 1842); Die Reli- gion in Dogmatismus Christianam (Leipsic, 1854). Besides, he published Predigten in der Universitäts-Kirche ge- halten (Götterzunah, 1881; 2d ed. 1856): — Predigt-Be- treife zur Förderung der Erinnerung Christi in der Gemeinde (1845), and contributed largely to the Jahr- bucher für deutsche Theologie. Liemackner, Nicolas (called the Rose), an eminent Flemish painter, was born at Ghent in 1575, and first studied under Mark Gerards, and, after the death of that master, with Ottovens. The name of Rose was given when a boy on account of his ruddy cheeks. He was one of the most eminent painters of the Flemish school, and his works are in almost every town in the Low Countries. He painted sacred and historical subjects. In the Church of St. Nicholas, at Ghent, are two of his best works, The Good Samaritan, and The Fall of the Rebel Angels, which last is considered his masterpiece. Also in the Church of St. James are several of his works, one of which is a grand composition, representing The Last Judgment. He died at Ghent in 1614. See Hoeve, Nouv. Bibl. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Bibl. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Liovens, Liwenus, or Lwynws, Jan, a Dutch painter and engraver, was born at Leyden, Oct. 24, 1607, and was placed under the direction of George van Schooten, but when ten years of age was placed under Peter Lastman, and in a short number of years was so well instructed as to be quite young, which procured him a favorable reception at the court of England, where he resided three years. At Brussels, in the Church of the Jesuits, is his Visitatio of the Virgin, and in the Church of St. James, at Antwerp, a work called The Holy Family. In 1641 he returned to Leyden, where he executed his celebrated pictures of David and Bathsheba and The Sacrifice of Abraham. He died probably in 1668. The following is a list of some of his best prints: The Holy Family; The Virgin Presenting a Pear to the Infant Jesus; St. John the Evangelist; St. John the Baptist; Holding a Crucifix; The Raising of Lazarus. See Hoeve, Nouv. Bibl. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Bibl. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Lif and Lifthrasir, in Norse mythology, are two human beings who hide themselves with Ragnarok (destruction of the world), among the gods, and feed on dew. From them all men are born who will inhabit the rejuvenated earth after the fire of Surtur.

Lifian Version of the Scriptures. Life is a language spoken on the Loyalty Islands. In 1869 the book of Psalms, in the Life language, was printed in the island of Mare. In 1872 the New Tes, was printed in England, under the care of the translator, the Rev. M. Macfarlane, one of the missionaries at Lifu. In 1877 the Pentateuch was issued from the press, under the editorship of the Rev. S. C. Cregagh, of the London Missionary Society. From the report of the British and Foreign Bible Society of 1866, we learn that the completion of the revision of the translation of the Bible was made Aug. 29, 1884. The translator, Rev. S. C. Cregagh, is now copying the corrections made in the parts already printed, viz. Pentateuch, Psalms, and New Testament, and the first part of Isaiah; the whole is estimated at 92,510 lines. The whole is being prepared for publication." The same translator is also preparing marginal references. (B. P.)

Lichtenstein, John, D.D., a member of the Cincinnati Presbytery, was born at Hechingen, Hohenzollem, Germany, in 1818. The occasion of his conversion, or rather, his return to the Jewish faith, a companion who had become Christian. At different universities he enjoyed the teachings of such men as Merle d'Aubigné, Heusgenberg, Neander, Stahli, and Schelling. He was ordained in 1842, and was for a time a missionary among the Jews of Alace. He came to New York in 1843, on the invitation of the American Jewish Society for Ameliorating the Condition of the Jews, and was superintendent of their mission-house. He afterwards became pastor of a German Presbyterian Church in Paterson, N. J., and subsequently of a German Reformed Church in Buffalo, N. Y., where he remained eight years. He removed to Cincinnati in 1852, took charge of the First German Presbyterian Church, and continued there until his death, Nov. 3, 1882. He was a ripe scholar, an able preacher, and a thoroughly evangelical man. See N. Y. Observer, Nov. 28, 1882. (P. F. S.)

Lights, Feast of, a name applied by Josephus to the Jewish Feast of Dedication (q. v.).

Lights of Walton, a class of enthusiasts who appeared in the 17th century at Walton-on-Thames, Surrey, England. The story of their origin is related as follows: In the beginning of Lent, 1649, Mr. Fawcett, the minister of Walton, having preached in the afternoon, when he had concluded it was nearly dark, and six soldiers came into the church, one with a lighted candle in a lantern, and four with candles unlighted. The first soldier addressed the people, declaring that he had had a vision of a message from God, which they must listen to and believe on pain of damnation. The message consisted of five lights: 1. The Sabbath is abolished; 2. and here, said he, "I should put out my first light, but the wind is so high that I cannot light it." 2. Titles are abolished. 3. Ministers are abolished. 4. Magna Carter is abolished, repeating the same words as he had uttered under the first head. Then taking a Bible from his pocket, he declared that it is also abolished, as containing only beggarly elements, which are unnecessary now that Christ is come in his glory and full measure of his Spirit. Then taking the lighted candle from his lantern, he set fire to the pages of the Bible, after which, extinguishing the candle, he added, "and here my fifth light is extinguished."

Ligtisch, in Slavonic mythology, was the god of abatement and rest. The wives pray to him after having been angry with their husbands.

Lilekona (Aizvej), a long basket, in which the image of Dionysus was carried in the Dionysia. The Lilekona was the winning fan into which the corn was received after threshing, and was, very naturally, used in the rites of both Bacchus and Ceres. It was also employed to carry the instruments of sacrifice, and first-fruits of the crops. See Bacchus.

Lilenthal, Max, a Jewish rabbi, was born at Munich in 1815. He studied at his native place, and graduated in 1837 as doctor of philosophy. In 1839 he received a call as director of the Hebrew school at Riga, Russia. In 1845 he resigned his position and went to New York city, where he was elected rabbi of three congregations, an office which he, however, resigned to open a Jewish boarding-school. In 1855 he accepted a call to the congregation at Cincinnati, and died April 1, 1882. Besides sermons and addresses, he published, "Uber den Ursprung der judisch-aleumidischen Religionsgeschichte" (Heidelberg, 1839). He wrote several works in German, among others: "De Obligationibus Canonicis: De Prejudiculis Philosophici: De Sanctorum cum Christo Redivivorum Resurrectione; Ex Matt. xxvii., 52, 53; De Proto-Canonico et Deuterocanonico Scriptura Librit: De Ilia que

Lilith, the name of the first wife of Adam, according to rabbinical tradition. She was made of the earth as was Adam himself, and would not submit to be ruled over by her husband. Seeing no possibility of an agreement between herself and him, she fled away to the sea, where she became the mother of a race of demons. She was described by the rabbis as the first Adam, one hundred of her children were to die every day. Lilith became noted in Jewish legend as a destroyer of infants, and for this reason they adopted the custom of writing the names of three protecting angels on slips of paper or parchment, and binding them upon the infant to prevent its destruction. Among modern Jews, when a woman approaches the period of her confinement, the husband inscribes on each of the walls or partitions around the bed, along with the names of Adam and Eve, the words "Begone, Lilith." On the inside of the doors also he writes the names of three angels, which it is believed will defend the child from the injuries which it might otherwise receive from Lilith.

Lillic, Adam, D.D., a Scotch Congregational minister, was born in Glasgow in 1813. He embraced the religious views of his family, studied in the universities, and becoming animated by a strong missionary desire, offered his services to the London Missionary Society, studied three years at Gosport, and in 1826 sailed to India. His health failing caused his return to Glasgow in the following year. He then settled as teacher, soon afterwards as a candidate for the ministry, in 1833. Two years later he was appointed co-pastor at Musselburgh, and in 1834 accepted an invitation to the pastorate at Brantford, Ontario, where he continued during his life. In 1840 Dr. Lillic added to his pastorate the tutorship of the Canadian Institute for the training of local ministry. He died Oct. 19, 1863. Dr. Lillic was an eminent Christian and scholar, and a prosperous worker. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-Book, 1870, p. 305.

Lindsey, David, a Scotch prelate, was preferred to the see of Ross in 1600, and still continued his ministry at Leith until his death, which occurred about 1613. In 1604 he was one of the commissioners for uniting the two kingdoms. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 201.

Lindsey, Patrick, a Scotch prelate, was first minister at St. Tignan's, in Angus. In October, 1613, he was preferred to the episcopal see of Ross, and consecrated Dec. 15 of the same year. From this he was translated to the see of Glasgow, April 16, 1633. He died at Newcastle in 1641. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 292, 294.

Linden, Robert Thomas, a French prelate and politician, was born at Bernay (Eure) in 1748. He was pastor of the parish of St. Croix in that town, when he was elected depute of the clergy of the bailiwick of Evreux to the States-General of 1789. In 1791 he was elected constitutional bishop of Evreux. In November, 1792, he married publicly. In 1793 he resigned his episcopate, and all his offices in 1798, and lived thereafter in obscurity, until finally, by the law of amnesty of 1816, he was obliged to leave France. After staying some time in Switzerland and Italy, he was permitted to come home to France, where he died in August, 1824. He wrote, Lettre Circulaire au Clergé de son Diocèse:—Lettres aux Religieux des Monastères de son Diocèse. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Lindley, Daniel, D.D., a Presbyterian missionary, was born in America in 1800. After receiving his theological education, he was ordained, and went with five others to South Africa in 1844. In 1846 he established a mission on the Allovo river, Port Natal, and commenced his lifelong work of laboring to convert the Zulus to Christ. On account of the numerous wars in that country, his mission was broken up, and for a considerable length of time he was prevented from carrying out his great design. He lived, however, to see a great moral and civil revolution among the inhabitants of that country, and his zeal and perseverance in the great cause in which he was engaged were crowned with success. After tiring for forty years, he was obliged, on account of his wife's illness, to return to the United States. He travelled extensively throughout the country advocating the cause of missions, until 1877, when he was stricken with paralysis, by which he never recovered. Dr. Lindley died in New York in August, 1880. (W. P. S.)

Lindley, Jacob, D.D., a Cumberland Presbyterian minister, was born June 13, 1774, in western Pennsylvania, and was the fifth in descent from Francis Lindley, one of the passengers in the Mayflower. Jacob's father erected a block-house between the Monongahela river and Wheeling, as a defence against prowling Indians, in the winter of 1747 and 1775; and it was long known as Fort Lindley. Young Jacob became a communicant about 1786. For a time he was a student at an academy near his home, and at the age of eighteen entered the institution afterwards known as Jefferson College, at Cannonsburg, Pa. In 1798 he entered Princeton College, from which he graduated in 1800. Having studied theology for a time, he was licensed to preach by the Washington Presbyterian, and in 1805 removed to Beaver, O. The first board of trustees of Ohio University selected him to organize and conduct that institution, for which purpose he went to Athens in 1808. For several years he had charge of the infant college, and was the prime mover in securing the erection of the college buildings, and in founding the Presbyterian Church in Athens. During a part of twenty years labor there he was the only Presbyterian minister in this section of Ohio. About 1828 he was partially relieved by the appointment to the presidency of Rev. Dr. Wilson, of Chillicothe; although he remained about a year longer in the college as professor of moral philosophy and mathematics. Subsequently he spent one year at Walnut Hills, Cincinnati; then a year or two at the Flats of Grace creek; after which he accepted a call from the Upper Ten Mile congregation, within whose bounds was his birthplace. While here, in western Pennsylvania, he was a candidate from his presbytery for ordaining ministers to intercede with the Cumberland Presbyterians. Refusing obedience to the mandate, charges were brought against him, which he showed to be groundless, and then he demanded from his presbytery a letter of dismission. This was granted, and in this way his connection with the Presbyterian Church was severed. He became a Cumberland Presbyterian, but continued his pastoral relation with the Upper Ten Mile congregation for two or three years. Subsequently he took charge of a Cumberland Presbyterian congregation at Beverly (then Waterford), O. In 1837 he moved to Alabama, still preaching and teaching as opportunity offered. From 1848 Dr. Lindley spent his winters in the South, and his summers in the North. He died at Comedelle, Pa., Jan. 29, 1857. In 1846 he published a small volume, entitled Infant Philosophy. See Beard, Biographical Sketches, 2d series, p. 45.

Lindner, Friedrich Wilhelm, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born in 1779 at Weida. He commenced his academic career at Leipzig in 1806, was in 1826 professor of catechetics, retired in 1850, and died Nov. 1, 1855. He published, Die wichtigsten Thatsachen und Urtheile für und gegen Missionen- und Hibelgesellschaften (Leipzig, 1825);—Die Lehre vom Abendnachtle (1831). See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. ii, 800; Winzer, Handbuch der theol. Lit., i, 454, 587. (B. F.)

Lindner, Wilhelm Bruno, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, who died at Leipzig in 1876, doctor and professor of exegesis, was the author of: Di Observationes et Vigilantio (Leipzig, 1839);—Lehrbuch der christlichen Kirchengeschichte (1848-54, 8 vols.);—Bibliotheca Patrum Ecclesiastican Selectissima (1867);—Sermons, delivered in the University Church (1844);—Christological Sermons (1845). See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. ii, 800 sq. (B. F.)

Lindsay (properly Alexander William Crawford) Lord (known after the death of his father as Count of Crawford and Ballocharran), an English writer, was born Oct. 16, 1812. He was educated at Eton, and at Trinity College, Cambridge, and graduated in 1833 as master of arts. He then travelled extensively, and published in 1888 his Letters on Egypt, Edom, and the Holy Land, in two volumes. In 1844 he published A Letter to a Friend on the Evidence and Theory of Christianity, and in 1846 Progression by Antagonism. In 1861 he issued his Scipio; in 1870 (Eccumenicity in Relation to the Church of England, and in 1872 Euromac Inscriptions. He died at Florence, Dec. 15, 1880. A large work on comparative history of the religions of antiquity, on which he intended to publish under the title of The Religion of Noah, was left incomplete. (B. F.)

Lindsay, Alexander, a Scotch prelate, was preacher at St. Madoes, and bishop of Dunkeld, where he continued until 1658, when he renounced his office, adjured episcopacy, submitted to Presbytery, parted with the Presbyterian party, and accepted from the then rulers his former church of St. Madoes. He acquired the barony of Evelick, in the county of Gowrie. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 98.

Lindsay, David, a Scotch prelate, was minister at Dundee, made bishop of Brechin, and consecrated at St. Andrews, Nov. 23, 1519. He was translated to the see of Edinburgh, Sept. 17, 1534. He was deposed and excommunicated for reading the liturgy in the High Church of Edinburgh, July 23, 1537. He went to England, and died soon after. See Keight, Scottish Bishops, p. 61.

Lindsay, Ingeram, a Scotch prelate, was bishop of Aberdeen in 1442, and also in 1448, 1452, and 1456, when he probably died. See Keight, Scottish Bishops, p. 114.

Lindsay, James, D.D., an English Presbyterian clergyman, was born and educated in Scotland, where he began to preach. He came to London, and was ordained pastor at Monkwell Street in May, 1783. In 1787 he was appointed afternoon preacher to the Presbyterians at Stoke-Newington, where he fixed his residence, and opened an academy. In 1803 he removed to Old Ford, and received his diploma from Aberdeen University. He published two funeral sermons, and was minister at Monkwell Street in 1811. See Wilson, Diocesan Churches, iii. 215.

Lindsay, John, a Scotch prelate, was promoted to the see of Glasgow about 1325. This prelate was killed in 1385, while returning from Flanders to Scotland. See Keight, Scottish Bishops, p. 244.

Lindsay, William, a Scotch prelate, was minister at a consecrated bishop of the see of Dunkeld. May 7, 1677. He died in 1679. See Keight, Scottish Bishops, p. 99.

Linse, John, D.D., an Irish prelate, was appointed to the see of Dublin in 1734, and held the office until 1739, without being molested in any way. The act of King George William for disarming the Papists was enforced, and this caused some disturbance. He died in 1756. See O'Daly, Memoirs of the Archbishops of Dublin, p. 466.

Linn, James, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Sherman's Valley (now Perry County), Pa., Sept. 4, 1763. He graduated at Dickinson College in 1809, and studied theology with Dr. Williams. He was licensed to preach by the Presbyterian of Carlisle, Sept. 27, 1809, visited the congregations of Spruce Creek and Sinking Valley, and was ordained pastor in 1810. He was called to take charge of the churches of Bellefonte, Huntingdon, and Sun Run, but in 1829 was dismissed from the latter, that he might give his whole time to the former. In 1861 Rev. J. H. Barnard was appointed co-pastor, Dr. Linn died at Bellefonte, Feb. 23, 1888. See Presbyterian, March 14, 1888. (W. P. S.)

Linsley, Jocel H., D.D., a Congregationalist minister, was born at Cornwall, Vt., July 16, 1798. Under private tuition, and afterwards at the Addison County Grammar-school, he acquired his preliminary training, and graduated from Middlebury College in 1811. For a year he taught school in Windsor, and in 1812 began the study of law. In 1813 he was appointed tutor in Middlebury College, holding that position for more than two years, still prosecuting his legal studies. He was admitted to the bar in December, 1815, went into a law partnership, and continued in practice until 1822. Previously, in 1812, he was licensed to preach, and for a time studied at Andover Theological Seminary. After engaging in missionary labors in South Carolina he returned to New England, was ordained, in 1824, pastor of the South Congregational Church in Hartford, Conn., and remained until 1828, in which year he was installed pastor of the Park Street Church, Boston. He resigned to assume the presidency of Marietta College in 1835, and held that position for about ten years. Then for two years he was in the service of the Society for the Promotion of Collegiate and Theological Education at the West. In December, 1847, he became pastor of the Second Congregational Church in Greenwich, Conn., and died there March 22, 1868. He published a volume of lectures on the Relations and Duties of the Middle-Aged, besides orations, addresses, reviews, and sermons. See Cong. Quarterly, 1868, p. 380.

Luntner, George A., D.D., a Lutheran minister, was born at Minden, Montgomery Co., N. Y., Feb. 15, 1790. At an early age he was admitted to Union College. After graduation he studied theology, and was licensed to preach in September, 1818. The following year he accepted a call to the pastorate of Schoharie and Colonkill. He was one of the recognised leaders of his synod in opposition to what he called the "Quitting Party." In 1840 he was called to the church at Schenectady, when the other became disestablished with the old synod, and at a convention, in 1830, at Schoharie, the Hartwick Synod was organized, of which he was chosen the first president. In 1837 certain members of this synod withdrew, and formed the Francискan Synod, on the widest lutheran basis. The movement was revolutionary, and led to controversy and contests in the courts. He was pastor of the Church in Schoharie until 1849, a period of thirty years. From 1827 to 1831 he was editor of the Lutheran Magazine. In 1841 and 1845 he was president of the General Synod of the United States. The liberty of the Lutheran Church of America, published by order of the General Synod of 1882, was prepared by him. During his ministry he organized three new churches as the result of his work—one at Resaca- been, one at Middleburg, and another at Central Bridge. From 1857 until the close of his life he was president of the Schoharie County Bible Society. The last years of his life he visited the Lutheran churches in New York and New Jersey in behalf of the Foreign Missionary Society. He died Dec. 21, 1871. See Five Years in the Lutheran Ministry, 1876, p. 206.

Lirrup, Severin, a Lutheran theologian of Denmark, who died March 13, 1781, at Copenhagen, was bishop of Viborg, in Jutland, in 1720, and in 1725 court-preacher and professor of theology. He wrote, Specimen Calamum Populi-Cuarincioni in August, Confes. fve- riatam:--De Synagogis Paulina 1 Cor. c. 32, 32:--De Polymnia, Epiphan Ocarius, Societatis Pauli Apostoli:--Medelomega Ciber in Acta Selecta N. T. Loca, etc. See Moller, Cimbria Literatur; Jocher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Lion-worship was particularly prevalent in the city of Leontopolis, Egypt. The lion was the symbol of strength, and therefore typical of the Egyptian Hieracles, who was also sacred to the Egyptian Mervina. In southern Ethiopia, in the vicinity of the modern town of Shendi, the lion-headed deity seems to have been the chief object of worship. He holds a conspicuous place in the great temple of wady Owistic, and on the sculptured remains at wady Besat, at the former of which he is the first in a procession of deities, consisting of Rê, Neph, and Ptah, to whom a monarch is making offerings. According to Plutarch, "the lion was worshipped by the Egyptians, who ornamented the doors of their temples with the gaping mouth of that beast, and the Nile bore it in its sacred bark, and the sun was in the constellation Leo." Mithras, which is a solar god, was represented with a lion's head. In his mysteries the second degree was that of the lion. Adad, the god of the Syrians, was seated on the back of a lion, which represents his solar nature. In South America the first discovered mound laber, and an image of a lion, to which the natives offered human sacrifices. Dr. Livingstone, in his Travels in Africa, mentions a tribe who believe that the souls of their chief enter into lions, and therefore they never attempt to kill them; they even believe that a chief who wields his tomahawk for the lion's pelt, will be an imposter, and one he chooses, and then return to the human form; therefore when they see one they commence clapping their hands, which is their usual mode of salutation. LIPOVNICKY

Lipovnicky, STEPHAN VON, a Roman Catholic prelate, who died Aug. 12, 1883, bishop of Gross-Wartenberg, Hungary, took an active part in the political events of 1848. After the suppression of the Hungarian revolution he was condemned to death. Being pardoned by the imperial government of Austria, Lipovnicky, discharged clerical duties, and finally became the incumbent of one of the most important episcopal sees of Hungary. (B. P.)

Lippincott, CALEB ARMORE, a veteran Methodist Episcopal bishop, was born in Pemberton township, N. J., July 26, 1833. His parents were of Quaker descent, and he was brought up a moral youth, but was full of animal spirits. He was called to the ministry of the gospel at the age of 18. He was converted among the Methodists in 1825, commenced circuit work in 1829, and in 1830 entered the Philadelphia Conference, wherein he served Tuckerton Circuit, Warren Circuit, Newton, Frankford, Germantown, Philadelphia, and Asbury (West Philadelphia). He then, in 1842, was transferred to the New Jersey Conference, and was sent in turn to Birmingham Mission, Columbus Circuit, Northampton, Fremont, Bordentown, Morristown, Flanders, Rayleigh District, Stanhope, Hacketstown, Cross Street, Paterson, and Union Church in Swartz; then served Tidewater, and was then sent to Hurntow, Hope, Berkshire, Hurdonian and Longwood, and Chester and Denville, at which latter place he died, June 17, 1871. Mr. Lippincott was a man of remarkable powers of mind. He was a natural orator, possessed of marvellous powers of description; overflowed with wit and good humor, and was pre-eminent a revivalist. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1872, p. 84.

Lis (or Lyts), JAN VAN IER, a eminent Dutch artist, was born at Odenburg, Germany, in 1570, but studied at Leiden, under Henry Grisselinck, and afterward went to Italy, where he studied the works of Paul Veronese and Domenico Pieti. His subjects are principally taken from sacred history. The chief of these is a picture of Adam and Eve Mourning over the Body of Abel, and in St. Nicstol, at Venice, is a celebrated painting by him, representing St. Jerome in the Desert. He died at Venice in 1629. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Litauoland. There is a curious tradition among the Bechuanas in South Africa, to the effect that a monster of immense size, at a remote period of time, swallowed up all mankind except a single woman, who conceived miraculously and brought forth a son, to whom she gave the name of Litauoland. This son of the woman attacked the monster and was swallowed up alive, but being armed with a knife he cut open an outlet for himself from the belly of the monster, and thus he obtained deliverance, and all the nations of the earth in him. Thus saved, men sought, without success, to destroy their rescuer.

Littérature clericale (clerical letters), a name given by Cyprian to letters written by a bishop in ancient times to a foreign Church, and which were sent by the hands of one of the clergy, usually a sub-deacon.

Lithomancy (from lithos, a stone, and maevría, divination), divination performed by means of stones. The stone used for this purpose was washed in spring water by candle-light, and the person engaged in divining, having burned himself, covered his face, repeated a form of prayer, and placed certain stones in a certain order. Then the stone was said to move of itself, and in a soft, gentle mumur to give the answer. See DIVINATION.

Litta, LORENZO, a learned Italian prelate, was born at Milan, Feb. 23, 1756. After studying at the Clementine College, in Rome, he was appointed apostolic prothonotary in 1782, in 1793 became archbishop in partibus of Thebes, and the year following departed for Poland as nuncio. In 1797 he went in the same capacity to Russia. He died May 1, 1829, leaving Lettres diverses, etc. (Paris, 1809). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Little, HENRY, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Boscawen, N. H., March 30, 1800. He was converted at six years of age, graduated at Dartmouth College in 1826, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1829. The same year he was ordained as a missionary under the auspices of the American Education Society, for labor in the West. In 1831 he became pastor at Oxford, Ohio, and two years later Western agent of the American Missionary Society. In 1839 he was appointed pastor at Madison, Ind., a position which he occupied for ten years. The rest of his life was devoted to home missionary work in the Presbyterian Church. He died at Madison, Feb. 25, 1882. He was remarkably successful in pastoral labor, and in organizing missions and raising funds for their support.

Litttré, MAXIMILIAN PAUL ÉMILE, the leader of positivism in France, was born in Paris, Feb. 1, 1801. He at first chose medicine as his profession, and, though he did not practice, much of his varied intellectual activity was directed to the scientific and historical side of the subject. Indeed, his first work of great importance was his edition and translation of Hippocrates, the first volume of which appeared in 1888, while the last came out on the eve of the appearance of his famous Dictionnaire de la Langue Française. In the same year, when his Hippocrates appeared, he was elected a member of the Academie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres, and in 1844 he took Fauriel's place in the company charged by the Academy with the continuation of the Histoire Littéraire, in which he did much good work. A great part of his time and energy was also taken up by his connection with Comte and positivism (q. v.). He himself was, by temperament, inclined not to polemics against religion, but to a kind of ignoring of it in favor of science; and he had translated Strauss's Leben Jesu within four years of its publication. He adopted positivism, as it was then presented, as the great weapon of the Enlightenment, and produced in 1846 an excellent analysis of the Philosophie Positivo. His subsequent refusal to follow Comte (q. v.) in his later excursions gave rise to the acrimonious polemic between the party of which he was the chief, and the younger disciples of the Politique, the Synthèse, the Catholique, and the rest. A very few years before his death, Litttré, in his "testament," expressed his attitude towards Christianity, in words from which it is evident that he had no hostility, nor even indifference, towards Christianity. He simply could not believe in it. It was an extreme fiability, which his intellect could not overcome, as may be learned from his own words:

"Some plous souls have troubled themselves about my conscience. It has seemed to them, that not being an absolute Thesaurus by nature, and knowing nothing about its internal composition, it possessed grandeur and conferred blessings, there were weak. It was a pattern of faith, they thought, to entertain neither hostility nor contempt for a faith which has reigned for five hundred years among Christians, and which, even now, is the consolation of so many faithful souls. As I never experienced nor expressed repugnance or unreason in the teaching of any subject of the feelings that I have just sketched, and as age and illness warned me of my approaching death, they have never abandoned the hope that I might experience the same effect of divine grace, nor ceased to appeal from the mature man, too proud of his strength to trust in old men's counsel, accessible to the promptings of his weakness—I reply to these solicitations, without wishing to wound their feelings, by saying, I well believe their faith nor experience any misery at being unable to believe. I have questioned myself in vain. It is impossible for me to accept the conception of the whole which Catholicism imposes upon its true believers; but I feel no regret at being outside these creeds, and I can feel within me no desire to enter within their pale."

And yet he died, June 2, 1881, within the pale of the Catholic Church, having shortly before his death been baptized. Besides the works already mentioned, Littre also published, Conservation, Révolution et Positivisme (Paris, 1862);—Sémites en Comparaison avec les Aryens pour l'Équilibre du Monde (Leipsic, 1880). Compare Caro, Littre et le Positivisme (Paris, 1883). (B. P.)

LIVELY, EDWARD, D.D., an English divine of the 16th century, was professor of Hebrew and divinity in the University of Cambridge, a learned Orientalist, and one of the translators of the Authorized Version of the Bible. He died in 1605. He published annotations on several of the Minor Prophets (1687)—and Chronology of the Persian Monarchy (1597). See McClure, Translators Revised.

LIVERANCE, GALFIN, a Scotch prelate, was bishop of Dunkeld in 1295, 1299, 1247, and in 1248. He died at Tippemuir, Nov. 22 of the last-named year. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 79.

LIVENSE VERSION OF THE SCRIPTURES. The Livese is a dialect spoken by a remnant of the Finnish people in the peninsula of north-west Courland, known by the name of Livs, inhabiting Livonia, a name given to them by the western parts of the Baltic provinces of Russia. The Livs number about five thousand souls. The gospel of Matthew was transcribed for them into the Lettish character by the academician Widemann, at the expense of the British and Foreign Bible Society, and carried through the press in 1789. Living, a term often used in England to denote a benefit (q. v.).

Living, an English prelate, is first met with as bishop of Wells, to which see he was consecrated in 999. In 1013 he was translated to the see of Canterbury. He continued for seven years, but in that time did very little more than to repair the roof of the cathedral. He did not engage in hard work as an operative. An evening-school furnished him with the opportunity of acquiring some knowledge of Greek and Latin, and finally, after attending a course of medicine at Glasgow University, and the theological lectures of the late Dr. W. M. Thomson of the Scotch Independents, he offered himself to the London Missionary Society; by whom he was ordained as a medical missionary in 1840. In the summer of that year he landed at Port Natal, in South Africa. Circumstances made him acquainted with the Rev. Robert Moffatt, himself a distinguished missionary, whose daughter he subsequently married. A Scotchman, Livingstone proved himself a faithful and zealous servant of the London Missionary Society. The two most important results achieved by him in this period were the discovery of Lake Ngami (Aug. 1, 1849), and his crossing the continent of South Africa, from the Zambesi (or Lussemye) to the Congo, and thence to Loando, the capital of Angola, which took him about eighteen months (from January, 1853, to June, 1854). In September of the same year he left Loando on his return across the Continent, reached Linzanti (in lat. 18° 17' south, and long. 25° 50' east), the capital of the great Mabola tribe, and from thence proceeded along the banks of the Leambye to Quimilane, on the Indian Ocean, which he reached May 20, 1856. He then took ship for England, where he arrived Dec. 12 of the same year. The reception accorded him by his countrymen was most enthusiastic. Probably no traveller was ever more affectionately honored. This was owing not merely to the importance of his discoveries, though it would be difficult to overestimate them, but to the thoroughly frank, ingenuous, simple, and manly character of the traveller. In his publications he describes his Travels and Researches in South Africa, a work of great interest and value. "In all his various journeys," said Sir Roderick Murchison, at a meeting of the Royal Geographical Society, held shortly after Livingstone's return, "he had travelled over no less than eleven thousand miles of African territory. . . . By his astronomical observations he had determined the sites of numerous places, hills, rivers, and lakes, nearly all of which had been hitherto unknown, while he had seized upon every opportunity of describing the physical features, geology, and geographical structure of the countries which he had explored, and had pointed out many new sources of commerce as yet unknown to the scope and the enterprise of the British merchant." In 1858 the British government appointed him consul at Quimilane, whether he returned in the course of the year; it also furnished him with a small steamer, that he might pursue his explorations of the Zambezi River and its tributaries. Livingstone started up this river in January, 1859, but after ascending it for over two hundred miles his farther progress was impeded by the mountains. A few months of the Murchison's dying, he started for a second journey up the Shire, a branch of the Zambezi, and on the 18th of April discovered Lake Shirwa. Then followed the discovery of Lake Nyassa on Sept. 16. In 1864 he was ordered by the government to abandon the exploration of the lakes and, returning to England, he published his second book of travels, entitled A Narrative of an Expedition to the Zambezi and its Tributaries. In August, 1865, Mr. Livingstone left England on his third journey to Africa; discovered Lake Liemba in April, 1867, south of Tanganyika, and was afterwards heard of no more. Lake Mweru was found Lake Maero on the 8th of September. But after eight years of lonely wandering in a previously unknown region, and after achieving discoveries which will permanently benefit mankind, the heroic traveller was overtaken by death. Having made repeated attempts to follow the sources of the Nile, and being thwarted every time, in the last instance by severe illness, he requested his followers to take him to Zanzibar, as he was going home. After suffering intensely for several days, he died, May 1, 1873. His body was brought to England and interred in Westminster Abbey. See (Lond. Cyclopedia) "Lake Nyassa," and (Lond. Cyclopedia) "Lake Mweru," Jan. 1875, p. 14; Life, by Blaikie (Lond. 1878); Walker, Last Journals (ibid. ed.).

Livingtown, James, a Scotch prelate, was first rector of Fortriev and Weems, then dean of Dunkeld, and archbishop of Dunkeld in 1476, bishop of Dunkeld in 1482, and constituted lord chancellor, Feb. 18, 1483, and died at Livy, Saint, called the apostle of Brabant, was born in Ireland, it is said of noble parents, and received his education there. He was bishop of Dublin in 656. Being actuated by religious zeal, he intrusted his diocese in Ireland to the management of its archdeacon, and went to Ghent with three of his disciples, and, for a month, laid up mass at the tomb of St. Bavvo every day, and afterwards went to Esca and preached the gospel, and converted numbers. He was murdered by some of the pagan inhabitants, Nov. 12, 656. See D'Alton, Memoirs of the Archbishops of Dublin, p. 16.

Lloyed, Humphrey, D.D., etc., an eminent English divine and scientist, was born in Dublin in 1800. He entered Trinity College in 1815, was elected scholar in 1818, and graduated in 1820. In 1824 he was made fellow of (tutor) of Trinity College, and was soon ordained a minister of the United Church of England and Ireland. In 1831 he resigned the office of tutor, and was elected to the chair of natural philosophy, and afterwards gave his attention almost wholly to scientific investigations. He died Jan. 17, 1881. Dr. Lloyd was a fellow of the royal societies of London and Edinburgh, and honorary member of the philosophical societies of Cambridge and Manchester, and other scientific societies of Europe and America. In 1846 he was elected president of the Royal Irish Academy; in 1856 he was elected a fellow of Oriel College, Oxford; and in 1857 was chosen president of the British Association. His works are chiefly scientific. See Men of the Time, s. v.

Loane, Elias ben-Moses (surnamed Baal Shem), who died at Worms in 1596, rabbi, is the author of a cabalistic commentary on the Song of Solomon, entitled משנה רבה (Rabah, 1589), and on Koheloth or Ecclesiastes, entitled משנת רבה (258; 360; Ginsburg, Commentary on Koheloth, p. 74). Locàliâ, a name anciently given to ecclesiastics who were ordained to a ministerial charge in some fixed place. At the Council of Valencia, in Spain, a decree was passed that no priest should be ordained unless he would give a promise that he would be a loco. Indeed, ordination at large was not considered valid.

Lockwood, Samuel, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Norwalk, Conn., Nov. 30, 1721. After graduating from Yale College in 1745, he studied theology under the direction of his brother, Rev. James Lockwood, of Wethersfield. A society having been formed in Andover, in 1747, embracing Coventry, Lebanon, and Hebron, he was called to preach, as a candidate, in the beginning of the following year. Of this parish he was ordained pastor, Feb. 25, 1749, O. S. He died in New Lebanon, N. Y., June 18, 1791. His manner in the pulpit was marked by gravity rather than vivacity; but he was very popular with his people. See Sprague, Amills of the Amer. Puritans, i., 405.

Loeb, Tristram remarks (Bible Plate, p. 829), "may be placed near Jerash, where I found a fine ancient fountain and other remains."

Loder, Paris, a German prelate, was born about 1570 at the castle of Loderone, in the Italian Tyrol. He was the youngest of a nobleman's family, and was destined for the ministry. In 1619 he became prince-archbishop of Salzburg. In the midst of the excitement of the Thirty Years' War, he determined to preserve in that country a complete neutrality, and assured to the adherents of both creeds equal protection, which certainly was a singular example at that time. In 1629 he founded the University of Salzburg, which occupied a very distinguished place among all the other ones. After that he commenced the reconstruction of the cathedral, and founded several establishments for the public benefit. Loderone died at Salzburg in March, 1638. See Hoefer, New Biog. Générale, s. v.

Loebenstein, Altor, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, came to America in 1852, and located at the Femme Osage. In 1853 he established a school in the Osage country, and soon was employed as pastor in one of the Evangelical churches. The year succeeding he joined the Methodist Episcopal Church. He was appointed successively to Belleville, Ill.; Newport, Ky.; Buckeye Street, Cincinnati, O.; Indianapolis, Ind.; professor of theology at Wallace College, Berea, O., which position he held for eight years; Lafayette, Ind.; Toledo, O.; Walnut Street, Detroit, Mich.; Beaubien Street, East Saginaw. He died at the last appointment in 1881. He was a member of the Central German Conference. Minutes of Annual Conference, 1881, p. 8.

Loftus, Adam, D.D., an Irish prelate, was born at Swinseahead, in Yorkshire, and was educated at the University of Cambridge. In 1651 he was rector of Pains town, in the diocese of Meath. In 1652 he was appointed to the see of Armagh, and was consecrated by Hugh, archbishop of Dublin, at the end of that year. In 1654 he was elected dean of St. Patrick's. In August 1657, he was promoted to the see of Dublin. In 1658 this prelate consecrated Dr. Lancaster as his own successor in Armagh, at Christ Church. In 1673 he was appointed chancellor. In 1682 Loftus was one of the lords justices of Ireland. In 1683 he was the unjust judge that illegally sentenced the Roman Catholic archbishop of Cashel, Dermot Hurley, to the cruelties of death on Osmantown Green. In 1597 Loftus was again one of the lords justices of Ireland, and also in 1599. At the close of that year he was named as one of the three assistant bishops to the archbishop of Munster, and in 1603 had pardon of intrusion and alienation in reference to the manors, etc. He died April 5, 1605. See D'Alton, Memoirs of the Archbishops of Dublin, p. 240.

Lohengrin, in British fable, was the famous guard and protector of the sacred Grail. He saved Elsa, the princess, from a magician by coming to her as a swan. She married the valiant knight, but on condition that she would not inquire as to his ancestry. Finally she asked about this, and Lohengrin fled on his swan back to the sacred Grail.

Loll (or Lull), in German mythology, was a frightful god of the Franks, who had a sacred grove containing a brazen image in the region of Schweinfurt.

Lommatsch, Karl Heinrich Eduard, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Sept. 22, 1802, at Grosschönau, near Zittau. He commenced his academic career at Berlin in 1822, was in 1822 professor of theology at the theological seminary in Wittenberg, and died Aug. 19, 1882, doctor of theology. Lommatsch is especially known as the editor of De la Rue's edition of Origens Opera Omnia (Berlin, 1861-68, 25 vols.). (B. P.)

Long, Clement, D.D., LL.D., a Congregational minister, was born in New Hampshire in 1807. He graduated at Dartmouth College in 1828, studied theology for two years in Andover Theological Seminary as a member of the class of 1834, and was ordained. He was a tutor in Western Reserve College, and became professor of intellectual and moral philosophy in that institution in 1834; professor of theology in 1844; professor of theology in the theological seminary at Auburn, N.Y., in 1855; professor of intellectual philosophy and political economy in Dartmouth College in 1854. He died at Hanover, N.H., Oct. 14, 1861. See Tien. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem., 1870, p. 112.

Longstreet, Augustus Baldwin, LL.D., a Methodist minister, was born at Augusta, Ga., Sept. 29, 1775. He studied in the Litchfield (Conn.) Law School, and settled in his native state. In 1823 he represented Greene County in the state legislature, and the following year was made judge of the Superior Court of the state. During the Nullification excitement he established the Augusta Sentinel. In 1838 he entered the ministry, and from 1839 to 1848 was president of Emory College, in Oxford. He was then for a short time president of Centenary College, Jackson, La., and from 1849 to 1856 president of the University of Mississippi. Still later he was president of South Carolina College. He died Sept. 9, 1870. He was a frequent contributor to Southern periodicals, and published many separate works, among the best known of which is his humorous collection of Georgia Scenes. See Obituary Record of Yale College, 1872.

Longueil, Richard Oliver de, a French prelate, was born about 1410, of an illustrious family of Normandy. He was archdeacon of Eu, and became, in 1458, bishop of Coutances. Having been designated among other commissaries, by the pope, in 1455, to revise the proceeding in the case of Joan d'Arc, he exhibited, by elucidating the memory of that female hero, King Charles VII sent him as ambassador to the duke of Burgundy, and placed him at the head of his council. He also obtained for Longueil from the pope, Calixtus III, the cardinal's hat, in 1458. In his devotion to the Church that prelate ventured to propose in the parliament the Pragmatic Sanction, for which he was fined not less than 10,000 livres. Pius II gave him the bishoprics of Oporto and of St. Rufina, also the legateship of Umbria, and made him archpriest of the basilica of St. Peter. He died at La Fèreuse. Aug. 15, 1470. Loomis, Harmo D., a Congregational minister, was born at Georgia, Vt., Oct. 26, 1805. He received his preparatory education at St. Albans' Academy, and at a high-school in his native place; graduated at the University of Vermont in 1827, and in the same year entered Andover Theological Seminary, where he remained two years. He was licensed by the North-western Congregational Association of Vermont, Oct. 10, 1834. In 1835 he entered Princeton Seminary, but left in January, 1836, and became stated supply of the Union Presbyterian Church, New York city. He was ordained by a Congregational Council at Vergennes, Vt., Aug. 31, 1836. Soon after he accepted the position of chaplain for the American Seaman's Friend Society of New York, and began preaching to seamen in New Orleans, Jan. 8, 1837. This he did four years, spending his summers in the North and raising funds for the society. From 1841 to 1843 he preached as stated supply to the Presbyterian Church at Mount Joy, Pa. In the last-named year he entered upon the duties of corresponding secretary of the American Seaman's Friend Society, in New York, and continued in that office till 1871. He died in Brooklyn, Jan. 19, 1880. Dr. Loomis published a number of volumes and pamphlets, and did much to promote the temperance cause. He was a man of sincerity and earnest piety. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem., 1880, p. 25.

Lorck, Johann, a Lutheran theologian of Copenhagen, was born Jan. 8, 1723, at Flensburg, and died Feb. 8, 1785. He published, Die Bibelgeschichte in einigen Beibträgen erläutert (Copenhagen, 1779) — Beiträge zu der neueren Kirchengeschichte in den kaiserlichen dänischen Rheinern (1757-62, 2 vols.). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Litt., i. 69, 839. (B. P.)

Lord, Jeremiah Skidmore, D.D., a Reformed Dutch minister, was born at Jamaica, N. Y., May 10, 1812. He graduated from the University of the City of New York in 1836, and from the Union Theological Seminary in 1839; was ordained Aug. 20 of the same year, becoming pastor at Montville, N. J.; went to Gringsown in 1848, to Herrick, New York city, in 1848, and died there, April 2, 1849. See Gen. Cat. of Union Theol. Sem., 1876, p. 14; Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America, p. 336.

Lord, John Chase, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Washington, N. H., Aug. 9, 1805. He studied at Plainfield Academy, and Madison and Hamilton colleges, from the last of which he graduated in 1825. After two years' editorial experience in Canada he went to Buffalo, N. Y., began the study of law, and was admitted to the bar in 1828. He united with the First Presbyterian Church of Buffalo in 1830, and soon after entered Auburn Theological Seminary, from which he graduated in 1833, and was called to the Church at Geneseo, where a wonderful revival occurred. In 1835 he became pastor of the Central Church at Buffalo, and remained until he gave up effective work in the ministry in 1873. He died there, Jan. 21, 1877. Dr. Lord was the author of Lectures to Young Men (1838)—Lectures on Civilization (1851), besides sermons and pamphlets. See (N. Y.) Evangelist, April 26, 1877; Gen. Coun. of the Church, Truth, 1888, p. 265; Nevins, Presb. Encycl., s. v. (W. P. S.)

Lord, William Hayes, D.D., a Congregational minister, son of President Nathan Lord, was born in Amherst, N. H., March 11, 1824. He graduated from Dartmouth in 1843, and three years after from Andover Theological Seminary; was ordained pastor at Montpelier, Vt., Sept. 20, 1847, and afterwards at Burlington, March 18, 1877. He was a trustee of the Washington County Grammar School from 1853, and president from 1865. From 1847 to 1875 he was director of the Vermont Bible Society, and held the same relation to the Domestic Missionary Society from 1853 to 1877. After 1870 he was president of the Vermont Historical Society, of which he had been for some time previously a member. In 1856 he was appointed first commissioner of Vermont. He was moderator of the General Convention of Vermont in 1861; was corporate member of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions from 1873; and the following year became editor of the Vermont Chronicle. See Cong. Quarterly, 1875, p. 445.

Lore, Dallas Dayton, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Mauricetown, N. J., in 1815. He was converted at the age of fifteen, and at twenty-one was a school teacher. As an editor he was one of the most important charges. In 1847 Mr. Lore sailed for South America as a missionary, and for seven years was the pastor of a large and intelligent congregation in Bueno Ayres, proving himself eminently successful both among the foreign and native population. Upon his return he was sent on a tour of exploration to New Mexico to inspect the condition of the mission field. In 1856 he was transferred to the Newark Conference, and after serving several prominent charges within its bounds, received a transfer to the Genesee Conference, and was appointed to Grace Church, Buffalo. In 1854 he was elected editor of the Northern Christian Advocate, in which office he continued till his death, at his residence near Auburn, Jan. 20, 1875. As a theologian, Dr. Lore was diligent and comprehensive in his researches, and careful in his conclusions. As a preacher he was popular and practical. As an editor he achieved success by his strong and forcible style, by the boldness and wisdom of his conclusions, and by his devotion to the truth. His zeal in the cause of Christian missions was truly marvellous, and highly exemplary. See Minutes of the Annual Conference, 1875, p. 119; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodist, s. v.

Loretz, Andrew, one of the early pioneer ministers of the German Reformed Church in America, a Swiss by birth, was educated in Europe, and emigrated to America towards the close of the last century. About the year 1789 he commenced preaching and ministering in a wide field, embracing a large part of both the Carolinas, from Orange County, in North Carolina, to beyond the river Saluda, in South Carolina, a distance of two hundred and fifty miles. He died in 1812. Mr. Loretz was a man of superior natural ability, extroverted, and great zeal, and the preachers of the Reformed Church in America, and in his day, regarded as one of the best pulpits orators in the Carolinas. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church, iii, 15. (D. Y. H.)

Lorimer, Peter, D.D., an eminent English Presbyterian divine, was born in Edinburgh, Scotland, in 1812. He graduated from the university there, was ordained in the Episcopal clergy, though he was a Presbyterian pastor of the River Terrace Church, London, which was then in connection with the Church of Scotland. He was at one with those who, in 1843, formed the Free Church of Scotland, and along with his congregation became a constituent part of the Synod of Berwick in 1844, which, until recently, was known as the Synod of the Presbyterian Church of England. From that time forward the first desire of his life was the advancement of that Church to a position worthy of its name. He was connected with the London Theological College from the date of its establishment in 1845, when he was elected to the chair of Hebrew and Biblical criticism. He was the first principal in 1878, and died suddenly, July 29, 1879. He was the author of several valuable works, among them, The Life of Patrick Hamilton:—The Life of the Scottish Reformer, John Knox:—And A History of the Edinburgh Church, a work on which he had spent years of diligent research, but which he was only able to complete in part.

Loriquet, Jean Nicolas, a French Jesuit, famous on account of his historical falsifications, was born Aug. 5, 1760, at Epernay, Champagne. He was professor at the Seminary of Argentiere, which was closed by Napoleon in 1807. The events of 1814 made the Jesuits come forward in great numbers, and their colleges were multiplied. Loriquet was intrusted with the direction of the schools at Aix, Provence, and St. Acheul, Picardy, and the pupils who were under his charge were imbued with that spirit of patriotism which had been fostered by the society. In 1830 the people of St. Acheul destroyed the school there, and the reverend fathers had to quit the place. Loriquet went to Switzerland, where he worked in behalf of his order. Under Louis Philippe he returned to France, and died at Paris, April 9, 1846.

Lorraine (or Golfe), Claude, an illustrious French painter, was born in a small town of Champagne, in the diocese of Troyes, Lorraine, in 1600, and went to Rome early in life, where he made great improvement in his studies, and met with many reverses, and was almost penniless. Godfrey Waal admitted him into his academy, where he remained probably two years. Agratino Tassi became interested in Claude, took him into his bosom of his family, and made him his familiar companion. Claude, naturally of a religious disposition, feeling profound gratitude for the many benefits he had received, soon after leaving Tassi and quitting Rome, about 1625, performed a pilgrimage to the holy Virgin of Loreto, where he remained some months. After that he went to Florence, where he made a tour through Italy, traversing Romagna, Lombardy, and on to Venice, where he practised his profession for some time. In 1627 he returned to Rome, and soon found abundant employment. One of his earliest patrons was cardinal Bentivoglio, for whom he painted two pictures which established his reputation. About this time he was employed by cardinal Crescentzi to decorate the rotunda of his palace; he was also similarly engaged in the Muti of the Holy Apostles, and of the Medici alla Trinita de' Monti. These were succeeded by commissions from the duke of Bracciano, the duke de Bouillon, and the prince de Luxembourg, for each a picture. The fame of Claude now extended to every part of Europe, and he received commissions from the most distinguished persons. His works were not confined to Rome, Milan, Parma, Lom bardy, and Venice, but extended also to Paris, Lyons, Montpellier, Avignon, Antwerp, Amsterdam, and Madrid. He died Nov. 21, 1682. See Spooner, Bng. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Losing, Herbert, an English painter, was born probably at Hoxon, Suffolk, his father being an abbot, vicars in that age not being absolutely forbidden the order, and his father married the daughter of the abbess, when of old age. Herbert bought a better preferment for himself, however, giving £1000 to king William Rufus for the bishopric of Thetford. Simony was a fashionable sin at that time. He afterwards went to Rome, returned to England, removed his bishopric from Thet-foot to Norwich, built the fine cathedral there and five beautiful parish churches, and died July 22, 1119. See Fuller, Worthies of England (Nuttall), iii, 136.

LOTTO, LORENZO, an eminent Italian painter, was probably born at Bergamo in 1490, and apparently studied at Venice under Giovanni Bellini. His principal works are in the churches at Bergamo, Venice, and Re- canati. His picture of the Virgin and Infant is consid- erable among the best performances. In the Church of Santo Spirito is another exquisite picture of the Virgin and Infant, with St. John Standing at the Foot of the Throne, Embracing a Lamb. Other masterpieces are to be seen at Bergamo in the churches and private collec- tions, and place him almost upon a level with the first luminaries of art. He died in 1560. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

LOTZE, HERMANN RUDOLF, a philosopher of Ger- many, was born May 21, 1817, at Bautzen, Saxony. He studied medicine and philosophy with such success that, five years after his entrance to Leipzig University, he was able to qualify as a teacher in both faculties. In 1844 he was called to Göttingen as professor of philosoph- 1, before going there, however, he had published his metaphysics in 1844, and his logic in 1845. In 1881 he was called to Berlin, and died the same year. Lotze was a strong opponent of materialism in philoso- phy. "It is the glory of Hermann Lotze," says Joseph Cook, "to have broadened, by exact and not mystical methods, the philosophical outlook upon human nature, to have taken the emotions in all their ranges into view, as well as the intellectual faculties; and thus, gradually, through the direct methods of modern research, to have risen to a philosophy of the soul and of the whole composite nature of man, in harmony with the truth of all the sciences—mental, moral, aesthetic, and physical. Others, however, see in the philosophical system of Lotze a decided tendency to that insidious form of idealistic pantheism which comes near to deny- ing the objectivity of matter, or at least to resolving all phenomena into pure dentity. LOUIS, BISHOP OF LENS, Sept. 25, 542. He began as a monk in the monastery of the Isle of Sainte- Barbe, on the Saône, near Lyons. He became the su- premec of it, and Saint Virentiul, in the see of Lyons, in 528. He presided at the third council of Orleans, May 7, 538, at which there were passed thirty-three canons to restore discipline in the Church of France. He died Sept. 25, 542, and is said to have been buried in the her- mitage of the Isle of Sainte-Barbe. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

LOW, DAVISON, an Anglican bishop, was born in the neighborhood of Brechin, in Scotland, in 1768. He received his education at the University of Aberdeen, then studied with bishop Gleig at Stirling, and was settled in charge of the congregation at Pittenweem in 1799, where for more than half a century he fulfilled the duties of the pastorate with unusual success. Dr. Low was consecrated bishop of the united diocese of Argyle, Ross, and Moray, in 1819. Some years subse- quently he effected a separation between the dioceses of Ross and Moray and that of Argyle, retaining the superintendence of the former. He resigned the see in 1850, and died at Pettenwee, Jan. 26, 1855. He was especially intimate with Scottish traditions and historical lore, and was a captivating conversationalist. See Amer. Quart. Rev. 1848, p. 315.

Löw, Leopold, a Jewish rabbi, was born in 1811 in Moravia. He studied at Prague, and was in 1843 chief rabbi of Great Kazanica, Hungary. He took an active part in the revolution of 1848, and after its suppression was imprisoned and condemned to death. He was, however, pardoned, and in 1851 became chief rabbi at Szegedin, where he died, Oct. 13, 1873. Löw was a voluminous writer, his essays having been published in several volumes, under the title: Denkblätter (Szegedin, 1876). Still valuable are his Beiträge zur jüdischen Alterthumskunde (Leipzig, 1870) — Allgemeine Einleitung und Geschichte der Schriftanalyse (Great Kazanica, 1865). See First, Bibl. Jud. II (d. ii.), 265. (R. R.)

Lowder, Charles Flower, an Anglican clergyman, of the Church of England, and a man of high morals, and of English ritualism, was born at Bath, Jan. 22, 1816, and graduated at King's College School, London, and Exeter College, Oxford. He served his apprenticeship to London church-work under Skinner, at St. Barnabas, Finsbury, from 1831 to 1836. It was a time of vehement dispute in the Church, the ritualism of Skinner and Lowder consisted in (1) Procession of clergy and choristers from and to the vestry; (2) Obeisance towards the altar on entering and retiring from the sanctuary; (3) The eastward position; (4) Colonial coverings varied for the season on the altar. Bishop Blomfield allowed some of these, but disapproved of others. These troubles dragged on until the Lushington judgment disheartened the High-Church party, and the first decision of the privy council in December, 1855, was well-meant as a delivery by hearts which could not foresee the very different treatment which the Rubric on ornaments was to receive from that same body in the Ridgale judgment. Yet, at the beginning, the ritualism of St. Barnabas "roused such a storm and provoked such outrage that towards the end of 1850 the religious people of the district were so horrified by the blasphemous cries of the mob that they were fain to keep within their houses." In 1856 and 1857 Lowder took charge of mission congregations at Ratcliff Highway and Wellclose Square, where, amid many physical discomforts, and among the rough population of that way of life, recording among his parishioners a very noble life, full of unconscious greatness, to which the term heroic would be misapplied. He was not a man of brilliant abilities or social attractiveness, by no means eloquent as a preacher, not always a good judge of character, his asceticism impaired his health and his working force, yet one could speak of his calm, unexcited courage, his splendid patience, his unswerving laboriousness, his habitual, far-reaching charity, his burning love of souls, his intense loyalty to Christ as a personal Saviour. In 1858 Lowder welcomed a complex of the last tribe of the Egyptian Diakonia, since so conspicuous in the English Church. In 1859 six clergy were laboring in the parish, with a large staff of lay assistants, fifty-four services were held weekly, and six hundred children were under instruction in the six schools which had been set up. This outburst of missionary energy, with services so ritualistic, excited opposition. In September, 1859, Lowder came near being murdered by a mob lashed into fury, and in the beginning of 1860 the "whole service was interrupted by hissing, whistling, and shouts of "Bravo" were shouted out during the services and sermon; cushions and books were hurled at the altar... the clergy were spat upon, hustled, and kicked within the church, and only protected from greater outrages by sixty or eighty gentlemen who, unasked, came to the rescue." The mob-gutted St. George's Church of everything savoring of the Roman service, and the bishop (Tait) for the most part gave way to the rioters. After the storm had passed, the patience and Christian spirit of Lowder and his associates began to make itself felt upon the rough zealots. Some of them became converts, others in church in other areas, and priests in mission work. New agencies for good sprang up, one of which was the Working Men's Institute. The Church of St. Peter's, London Docks, was consecrated June 31, 1866, Lowder being its first vicar. Then came the visitation of cholera, which conquered the people and heeded their heart's allegiance for all to the pastor who gave himself up with such absolute devotedness to the work of helping them. Lowder did not set up a system in place of a Person, or his own office as the substitute for an absent, instead of the witness for a present, Lord. The root-ideas of concern was the heinousness of sin and the promise of pardon through the blood of Christ, and confession and absolution were freely offered to all those who needed it. He had rituals, because he thought it his duty to put before the eyes of the people the image of the worship of heaven, and his churchward appointments could be called to give an air of comfort and dignity—a lesson for the people to take back to their squalid homes. As the result, not only was open sin swept away from the streets of St. Peter's, where before streets were crowded by houses, but disconsolate cus-tomants of St. Peter's were lifted above the suffering life into joy and peace. Lowder's health, undermined for a long time, broke down in 1874 or 1875. In August, 1880, he went abroad, never to return. In the Tyrol, at Zell-am-See, at the age of sixty, among strangers, Sept. 9, 1880, this great and heroic spirit passed away. See Charles Lowder, a biography, by the author of the Life of St. Teresa (2d ed. London 1882; N. Y. ed.); Church of England Quart. Rev. April, 1882, p. 57 sq. Twenty-one Years in St. George's Mission, by REV. C. F. WELSH (London, 1888). Löwenthal, Issidor, a famous missionary and translator of the Bible, was a native of Poland, and of Jewish parentage. At the age of twenty he had to flee his country, being suspected by the government of conspiracy. He came to America, and at Princeton, N. J., went about as a pedlar, hawk- ing jewels and stationery. In or near Princeton, living a life of retired though literary habits, was a much-repected clergyman, who had more than one conversation with the eloquent pedler. Receiving in him the talent of no common order, he was ordered, with a bar in the prosecution of his studies. He appeal to some princely merchants of New York speedily procured the funds necessary to send the young man to Princeton College. At this time he was a bishop, but his course of studies, his intercourse with tutors, brought about his conversion, and he received baptism. Having completed his studies, he offered himself as a missionary to the American Presbyterian Board. To India he directed his steps, and fancying from what he had read that among the Afghans might be found traces of the lost tribe of the Israelite, he provisioned himself for a journey to the Afghan Pashawar, as a missionary to the Afghans. There, in 1836, he commenced his work. With rare ability and perseverance, he had so perfected himself in the difficult language of the Afghans as to prepare a translation of the entire New Testament, and although the work of translating the Old Testament had been discussed, and as the importance of giving the Afghans a complete Bible was deeply felt. Mr. Löwenthal had expressed his willingness to undertake this great and responsible task. But the Great Master had otherwise appointed, and before he had fairly entered upon the duty, he was assassinated, April 27, 1864. See

LUBERSAC, JEAN BAPTISTE JOSEPH DE, a French prelate, was born at Limoges, Jan. 15, 1740. He became first grand master of the archbishop of Arles, in 1758 abbot of the king, and in 1775 bishop of Treignier.
In 1780 he was transferred to Chartres. Having been sent by the clergy to the States-General, he refused to recognise the constitution of the clergy, and March 15, 1791, was forced to emigrate. In 1801 he resigned his bishopric and returned to France, was appointed a canon of the chapter of St. Denis. He died Aug. 80, 1822, leaving, Journal de l’Émigration du Clergé de

Lucchi, MICHELE ANGELO, an Italian prelate, was born at Brescia, Aug. 20, 1744. He made his profession at Monte Cassino, where he was appointed to teach philosophy and theology. He visited the principal libraries of Italy, and collected a number of ancient MSS., now in the Vatican. Pius VII called him to Rome, made him cardinal, Feb. 28, 1801, and intrusted him with the censorship of books. He died at Subiaco,

Lucena, LORENZO, a Spanish Roman Catholic theologian, was born in 1807. He was ordained deacon by the bishop of Cordova in 1830, and priest in 1831 by the suffragan bishop of Seville. For eight years he acted as professor of theology at the College of St. Pelagius, in the University of Seville, and for three years held the office of provisional president there. In 1842 he was appointed honorary canon of Gibraltar Cathedral, and reader in the Spanish language and literature in the Taylour Institution at Oxford in 1861. He as-isted in preparing the new edition of the Spanish Bible, generally known as that of Cipriano de Valera, and published by the British and Foreign Bible Society. He died at Oxford, Aug. 24, 1881. (B. P.)

Lucius, Saint, of Britain, lived in the 2d century.
Bede, in his Ecclesiastical History, says that in 154, under the Roman emperors, Marcus Aurelius and Verus, and during the pontificate of Eleutherus, a British king Lucius wrote to the pope, announcing that he wished to hand over to the Roman Church Eleutherus occasioned the communication, and sent priests to instruct the Britons in the Christian faith. A similar account may

Ludger, Sài, a German prelate, was born in Friesland and died on December 24, 889. He was prominent in the discipline of St. Gregory, who governed the school as well as the Church of Utrecht.
In 802 he is noticed at Rome, and next at Monte Cassino, where he stayed two years: finally returning to the barbarians, he preached the gospel to the Saxons and the Frislanders, where, about the same period, he became chief of the Church of Mün-

of Georgia, was born in Pittsylvania County, Va., Nov. 4, 1875, but went, when a child, to Georgia, and was reared in Oglethorpe County, where he spent his whole life. Socially, his relations were of a high character. One of his brothers, Wilson Lumpkin, was governor of the state three terms, and another brother, Joseph Henry, chief justice of the Supreme Court of Georgia. His ordination took place in 1809, and his ministry was exercised in different parts of the county in which he lived. Three new churches were formed during his life, through his personal efforts. Luperollina, a noted Roman festival, was celebrated annually on Feb. 16, in honor of Lupercus, the god of fertility, or, as is alleged by many, in honor of Pan. Plutarch calls it the feast of violets, and declares it to have been of a lustral or ceremonially purifying character. Whatever may have been its origin, it was in some way connected with the legend that Romulus and Remus were suckled by a she-wolf, and accordingly the rites of the festival of Lupercalia were observed in the Lupercal, the place where this nursing was supposed to have occurred. On the appointed day the Luperci (q. v.) assembled and offered sacrifices of goats and young dogs. A peculiar ceremony then followed. Two youths of high rank were led forward to the priests, who, having dipped a sword in the blood of one of the victims which had been sacrificed, touched their foreheads with it; after which some of the other priests came forward and wiped off the blood with a piece of woolen cloth which had been dipped in milk. The youths now burst into a fit of laughter, and the priests, in imitation, laughed. The fact characterized this festival began. The priests having feasted themselves, and indulged freely in wine, covered their bodies over with the skins of the goats which they had sacrificed. Thus fantastically dressed they ran up and down the streets, in the sound of the beating of goat-skin leather, with which they struck all they met, particularly the women, who hailed the infliction of the sacred lash as a species of ceremonial lustration. This festival was long observed in commemoration of the founding of Rome, but having been neglected in the time of Julius Caesar, it was revived by Augustus, and continued to be celebrated until the reign of the emperor Anastasius.

Lupercoli, the most ancient order of priests among the Romans. They were sacred to Pan, the god of the country, and particularly of sheepfolds, whose flocks he protected. Pan derives his name from apo, a shepherd, and traces their origin to the fabulous she-wolf which suckled Romulus and Remus. They formed originally a college, consisting of two classes: the Fubi, or Fubian, and the Quinabili, or Quinabillin. Julius Caesar instituted a third class, the Serapidi, but this is mentioned by neither Plutarch nor Julius. At first the Luperci were taken from the higher classes of society, but in course of time the whole order fell into disrepute.

Luther's (Two) Catechisms. By way of supplement to the article Luther (q. v.), we add that both the smaller one in the form of a continuous exposition, and the smaller one arranged in questions and answers, appeared in 1529, although the preparatory work dates back to the very beginning of Luther's reformatory activity. In 1518 John Schneider collected and published the various expositions of the Lord's Prayer which Luther had given in his sermons and lectures. This induced Luther to publish his exposition in an authentic form. In the same year he published a Latin exposition of the Ten Commandments, and in 1529 these sporadic efforts came to a preliminary consummation in his Enarrationes in Psalterium Germanicum, the Germ. version: — Enarrationes in Psalterium Germanicum: — Enarrationes in Psalterium Germanicum (Luther, 1529). After 1524 Luther's attention was very strongly drawn to the school. His An der Weltlichen Kirchen und Kloster’s life’s work in the Roman Catholic churches, consists of, I. The Ten Commandments; II. The Creed; III. The Lord's Prayer; IV. The Sacrament of Baptism; V. The Sacrament of the Altar; to which is added, in the editions since 1545, a sixth part, Confession and Absolution, or the Power of the Keys. Considering the smaller catechism as a whole, it is indeed the ripe fruit of many extenuations, full expression after many trials. Wherever Lutherans are found, this catechism too is used. See Flitz-Herges, Reel.-Encyklopaed., s. v. (B. P.)

Luther's Hymns. It was a saying among the Roman Catholics in the time of Luther, that "by his songs he has done more harm to the Romanists than by his sermons." And such is the fact. "For," says Mr. Coleridge, "Luther did as much for the Reformation by his hymns as by his translation of the Bible. In Germany the hymns are known by heart by every peasant; they advise, they argue, from the hymns, and every soul in the Church prays God, like a Christian, with words which are natural and yet sacred to his mind." Luther was intensely fond of both music and poetry, and his

poetical talent we best perceive in his hymns. Altogether he wrote about thirty-six hymns, which may be divided as follows: (a) Translations of Latin hymns; (b) Amplifications of German hymns from the Latin; (c) Correction and revision of German hymns; (d) Hymns based on the psalms; (e) Hymns based on other passages of the Bible; (f) Original hymns. Spangenberg, in his preface to the Cithara Lutheri, in 1545, speaks thus of Luther's hymns, "One must certainly let this be true and remain true, that, among all Meister-singers, from the days of the apostles until now, Luther is and always will be the most and most accomplished; in whose hymns and songs one does not find a vain or needless word. All flows and falls in the sweetest and neatest manner, full of spirit and doctrine, so that his every word gives outright a sermon of its own, or, at least, a singular reminiscence. There is nothing forced, nothing foisted in or patched up, nothing fragmentary. The hymns are easy and good, the words choice and proper, the meaning clear and intelligible, the melodies lovely and hearty, and in sum all is so rare and majestic, so full of spirit and power, so cheering and comforting, that, in sooth, you would not find his equal, much less the counter." The most famous of Luther's hymns is the Reformation hymn, Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott, which has been translated into very many languages. A collection of the translations of this hymn in nineteen languages was published by B. Pick (Rostock, 1799), and in an enlarged edition, comprising twenty-five languages (28 English; 2 Dutch; 1 Danish; 1 Swedish; 5 Latin; 3 French; 1 Spanish; 1 Russian; 1 Polish; 1 Bohemian; 1 Wendish; 1 Lettish; 1 Lithuanian; 1 Finnish; 1 Estonian; 1 Hebrew; 1 Accra; 1 Tahiti; 1 Zulu; 1 Hungarian; 1 Italian), was published by the same author in 1888. But this is not the only hymn which has been translated into English. In fact, all his hymns are translated, as may be seen from Pick's Luther's Hymns as a Hymnbook (Philadelphia, 1875). An edition giving the German text, with the English translation and notes, was published by Scribner's Sons (New York, 1885). (B. P.)

Lutherans, Separate. When, in 1817, the union between the Lutheran and the Reformed churches was established in Prussia, the protest of G. F. Scholtz, professor of theology at Breslau, found much sympathy among the Lutherans. For several years, however, the movement was confined within the boundaries of simple literary polemics, especially between Scheibl and David Schütz, also professor at Breslau. But when the bimonthly periodical Die Kirchenlinie was introduced, and the administration of the Lord's Supper by a cabinet order of 1830, Scheibl refused to obey, and asked permission to continue administering the Lord's Supper after the old Wittenberg agenda. The permission was not granted, and Scheibl was suspended. Soon he saw himself at the head of about two or three hundred families, who left the State Church and organized themselves into a new Church. They petitioned the minister of public worship to be acknowledged as a Church organization, but this he refused to do. The many reactions which Scheibl's stand induced him to take were very

in the meantime the party had progressed very rapidly under the leadership of professor Huchke. A synod was convened at Breslau in the year 1834, and it was declared that nothing but complete separation from the State Church, and the formation of an independent organization was acceptable to the Lutherans. The persecutions then began. Several ministers were kept in prison for many years. A number of well-to-do laymen were reduced to poverty by money fines. Not a few emigrated to America, among others, Grabau (q. v.) and Von Rohr, who formed the second Buffalo Synod. With the succession of Friedrich Wilhelm IV, in 1840, a change took place, and July 28, 1845, the concession for the foundation of a free Church was given, and in 1850 the Church numbered fifty pastors and about fifty thousand members. Similar movements took place also of Prussia, in Saxony, Hesse, and Baden. Perhaps no separation from the State Church made a deeper impression than that of Theodor Harms (q.v.) at Hanover-Bernburg. The reason for his separation was neither dogmatic nor constitutional, but a few changes which were introduced by the government in the marriage formalities. Harms refused to consent to these changes, and was suspended, Jan. 22, 1728. He immediately formed an independent society, which soon absorbed the majority of the old congregation. Meanwhile the relation between the Separate Lutherans and the State Church Lutherans was often very unpleasant, and bitter clerical disputes were not uncommon. To bring peace among the Separate Lutherans them- selves, and a party headed by pastor Dietrich, of Jabbel, organized the so-called Immanuel Synod in opposition to the party headed by Huschke of Breslau. This was in 1862. A similar split was caused in Saxony by the Misouri Synod. This synod was organized by a certain Stefan, who had emigrated in 1840 to America. Stefan, who was deposed of his office on account of gross immorality, was succeeded by the still living professor Walther of St. Louis, Mo. Some of the Missourians had returned to Saxony, and formed a Lutheran Synod, which soon occupied a prominent position, under the leadership of professor Ruhland. The latter soon made war against the Immanuel Synod as being un-Lutheran, and so likewise against the Separate Lutherans of Breslau. The Lutheran churches of the State Church and the Missouri Synod finally split, and a cause was caused among the Missourians themselves. The Separate Lutherans of Germany are now again against each other. See Pietz-Hertzog. Real-Encyklop. s. v.

Abo-Jumayy Hudaiki Ibn-Shapouri (1852). While on his travels he was taken sick, but at length arrived at Paphos, and died Jan. 25, 1854. The Mémoire sur les Jujifs d'Antioche ou Pelasgus, was published after his death in the Archives Israélites de Paris. (B. P.)

Lycca, a festival among the Arcadians, was celebrated in honor of Zeus Lycaon. It is said to have been instituted by Lycaon, the son of Pelasgus, who sacrificed a child on the occasion, and sprinkled the altar with its blood. Pausanias says that the Lyceas was celebrated in a manner similar to the Roman Lupercalia.

Lydda. Lydus, the modern representative of this place, is briefly described in the Mémoires accompanying the Ordnance Survey (ii. 252), and its traditional Church of St. George in detail (ibid. p. 267).

Lyell, Thomas, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in Virginia in 1775. While quite a young man he became a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church; and during that time he was one of the chaplains to Congress. In 1804 he was ordained deacon in the Protestant Episcopal Communion, and became rector of Christ Church, New York city, which position he occupied until his death, March 5, 1848. Dr. Lyell was elected secretary of the convention of the diocese of New York in 1811, which office he continued to hold annually until he declined re-election in 1816. Chosen a deputy to the General Convention in 1818, he was elected successively to the position during twenty-six years. He was a powerful extemporaneous speaker, and a preacher of more than ordinary ability. See Amer. Quart. Church Rev. 1848, p. 502.

Lynch, Patrick Niskan, D.D., a Roman Catholic prelate and scholar, was born at Clones, County Monaghan, Ireland, March 10, 1817. In 1819 his parents came to America, and settled at Cheraw, S.C. At that time there was but one priest in the state, Dr. Gallagher, though Dr. England arrived next year to be the first bishop of Charleston, and opened St. John the Baptist's Seminary, at which Patrick Lynch was one of the earliest pupils. He was sent to the College of the Propaganda, Rome, where he was one of the most brilliant students, and was ordained priest and graduated doctor of divinity. In 1840 he returned to Charleston, and became assistant pastor of the cathedral, of St. Mary's Church, principal of the Collegiate Institute, and vicar-general. On the death of bishop Reynolds, in 1855, Lynch became administrator, and on March 14, 1858, he was consecrated bishop of Charleston. The civil war soon came, and with it the destruction of his cathedral, house, and other Church property in Charleston and throughout the state. The rest of his life was a constant toil with debt, which was too much for his naturally robust constitution and vigorous mind, and brought him prematurely to his end. He died in Charleston, Feb. 26, 1882. Bishop Lynch was noted for his quiet benevolence and literary activity. In 1848 he took charge of a hospital during the yellow fever, and in 1871, on another outbreak of the disease, was never absent from his post. He was a thorough scholar, and a devoted student of applied science. He was a contributor to magazines, author of letters to the Catholic World on the Vatican Council, articles on the Blood of St. Januaries, in the same, now published anonymously in book form, contributed to the American Catholic Quarterly Review, and edited and revised Delarue's Series of Catechisms. He was pleasant and affable in social intercourse, and a fine orator. See (N. Y.) Catholic Annual, 1883, p. 37.

Lynd, Samuel W., D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Philadelphia, Pa., Dec. 23, 1796. He was baptized by Rev. Dr. William Stoughton in 1820; was well educated, and in 1824 was called to the pastorate of a church in Philadelphia, from which he was soon laid aside by severe illness. For a time, he, with his wife, conducted a female institution in Baltimore. In 1831 he began his labors as pastor of the Sixth Street Church, Cincinnati, O., his ministry being eminently successful. He remained here until 1843, when he removed to St. Louis, Mo., and became pastor of the Second Church in that city. About 1848 he was elected president of the theological institute in Covington, Ky., and remained in this position until 1854, when he took up his residence on a farm near Chicago. His other pastorates were at Lockport, Ill., the North Church, Chicago, and the Mt. Auburn Church, Cincinnati, O. He died at Lockport, Ill., June 17, 1876. See Minutes of Ill. Annuals, 1876, p. 14. He graduated from Dickinson College, Pa., in 1824; spent one year in Princeton Theological Seminary, and was ordained by the Erie Presbytery, Sept. 9, 1829, pastor of the First Church, Erie, Pa., which office he held until his death, at Avon, N. Y., March 24, 1871. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem., 1881, p. 54.

LYON. James Adair, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born near Jonesborough, Tenn., April 19, 1814. He graduated from Washington College in 1822, and afterwards from Princeton Theological Seminary; was ordained as an evangelist by the Holston Presbytery, and after serving, for five years, as a stated supply, the churches of Rogersville and New Providence, became pastor of the Columbus Church, Miss., where he remained six years. He then spent a year in foreign travel, and after his return was installed pastor of the Westminster Church, St. Louis, Mo. In 1830 he established a select high-school for young ladies there, which he taught three years, and returned to his old charge at Columbus. In 1830 he was elected professor of mental and moral science in the University of Mississippi, at Oxford, where he held for ten years, when failing health compelled him to resign. As a writer, he contributed largely to the Southern Quarterly Review. He was moderator of the General Assembly, and repeatedly elected to important positions in connection with literary and theological institutions, among them to the presidency of Washington College, and the chair of didactic theology in Danville Seminary, Ky. He died at Holly Springs, Miss., May 15, 1882. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem., 1888, p. 31. (W. P. S.)

M. Macarath. For this site Mr. Tyrwhitt Drake proposes (Quar. Statement of the "Pal. Explor. Fund," April, 1874, p. 76) the Mons Marden where St. Ethynius found ruins (Acta Sanctorum, i. 304), now Kilbrer Mire, near Mar Saba, on a round, isolated hill, containing the remains of an aqueduct, wells, and cisterns (Memorials to the Ordnance Survey, iii, 212); but Lait. Conder suggests (Quar. Statement, Jan. 1875, p. 13) an ancient site near Beit Aïrum, where a valley has the convenient natural name, Wady el-Moghair. This latter ruin is laid down on the Ordnance Map, two miles north-east of Hebron, without any name attached. Later, however, Lait. Conder suggests (Trav. Work, i, 338) Beit Ummar, six miles north of Hebron, probably the Bethuvat of Ezechias (Onomast, s. v. Bathulaham). It is "a small but conspicuous village, standing on the watershed, and visible from some distance on the north. An ancient road passes through it. Half a mile north-east is a good spring, Ain Kufin. The mosque has a small tower to it. The surrounding neighborhood is covered with brushwood" (Memorials to Ordnance Survey, iii, 305).

Mab, in poetic art, is queen of the fairies (q. v.).

Macarian. See Macarius Zosimus, and Macarians of Alexandria.

Macarites is the name of a Jewish sect, whose founder is believed to have been Benjamin Nahavedi (q. v.), a Karait, who flourished about the opening of the 4th century. Their most peculiar doctrine was that God is too elevated to reveal himself directly to man, and that revelation was therefore made by messenger—an angel, a vice-god. If the Bible speaks of God's manifestation to man, it refers, they held, to the manifestation of the divine being in the person of his messenger, not to God himself. This angel was the creator of the world, not God himself. (Quite like the evolution theory in our day, advocated by Miavart, who likewise held that God was only indirectly the creator of the world.) In this and many other respects the Theacitee much resemble the Mohammedan sect of Mochaites. See Fürst, Gesch. d. Kardinalthons, i. 28 sq.: Rule, Karaite, p. 105, 109; Grätz, Gesch. d. Juden, v. 280 sq., 518 sq.

Macassar (and Bugis) Version of the Scriptures. The Bugis and the Macassar dialects are the most prevalent of those spoken among the various native states comprised in the large island of Celebes. They both resemble the Malay; the Bugis being the most cultivated of the two, and possessing a separate alphabet. A translation in each of these dialects was be-

Machir of Toledo, who flourished towards the end of the 14th century, is the author of א""ש א""ש א""ש, or an eschatology of Judaism, in three parts—the first treat of the sufferings in the Messiahian time, of the advent of the Messiah, resurrection, last judgment, and world to come; the second treat of reward and punishment, paradise and hell; the third of the oral law (Kimini, 1256 and often); a Judeo-German translation appeared at Furtth in 1659, and the first part was translated into Latin by Hulianius, Tractatus de Messia (reprinted in his Theologia Judaica, Breda, 1658). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. ii. 285; De' Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Ierome, transl.), p. 190 sq., and his Bibliotheca Judaica Antichristiana, p. 61. (B. P.)
Mack, Martin Joseph, a Roman Catholic theologian of New York, was born Feb. 17, 1805. In 1832 he was professor of New Test., exegesis at Tübingen, and in 1839-40 rector magnificus of the university. His publication, The Church of the Israelites (Tübingen, 1840) brought him into conflict with the government. He was deposed from his office, and relegated to the Ziegelschäf parish in Württemberg. He died Sept. 24, 1845, leaving Bericht über Straßburgs kritische Beurtheilung des Lebens Jesu (Tübingen, 1857); — Commentarius in libros Prophetarum by Antiqua Poeta (2d ed. 1841). See Winse, Handbuch der theolog. Litt. i, 552. (B. F.)

Mack, William D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Flushing, L. I., July 29, 1807. He graduated from Union College, Schenectady, in 1831, and from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1834. He was licensed by the Presbytery of New York, Feb. 4 of that year; ordained at Rochester, Feb. 5, 1855; and subsequently was pastor at Knoxville and Columbia, Tenn. In 1866 he became a volunteer evangelist, devoting half his time to the Presbytery of Columbia, and the other half later on to the Presbytery of Alabama. From the time of the division of the General Assembly, in 1861, he adhered to the southern portion. He was for some time president of Jackson College at Columbia. He died Jan. 10, 1879. See Necrology Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1879, p. 81.

MacKenzie, Murdoch, a Scotch prelate, was born in 1599, received an Episcopal ordination, and was chaplain to a regiment under Gustavus Adolphus. After his return from Germany he became minister at Contin, next at Inverness, and afterwards at Elgin. He was made bishop of the see of Moray, Jan. 18, 1662. From this he was translated to the see of Caithness in 1667, where he continued until his death, in February, 1688. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 152-228.

Maclean, John Finlay, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Manilus, Onondaga Co., N. Y., Feb. 7, 1803. He graduated from Union College in 1825, studied three winters (1825-28) in Princeton Theological Seminary, was licensed in 1828, and ordained pastor of the Church at Geneva in 1830. He edited the Christian Magazine at that place, afterwards settled at Hagerstown, Md. (1845), and Pittsburgh, Pa. (1845). He was president for a time (1855-58) of the Western University of Pennsylvania. He died at Pittsburgh, March 14, 1883. See Necrology Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1883, p. 18.

Maclean, a Scotch prelate, was early minister at Morven, Dunoon, and Eastwood, from which last charge he was advanced to the see of Argyle in 1660. He died there in 1687. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 292.

Maclean, Rosker, a Scotch prelate, was probably bishop of the Isles about 1549. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 307.

Macleod, Norman D.D., a Scotch Presbyterian minister, was born June 3, 1812, at Campbellton, a seaport of Scotland, and educated at a school in Morven, and at Glasgow University, where he was exceedingly popular. In 1837 he obtained his first ministerial charge, the parish of Loudoun, in Ayrshire, which he served for five years. About this period the disruption of the Scotch Kirk took place, and in the controversy which preceded and followed, Mr. Macleod took an active part. He adhered to the Established Church of Scotland, and in 1843 was appointed to the parochial of Dalkeith. In July, 1851, he was inducted minister of the Barony parish, Glasgow, which contained 97,000 souls. At this time he assumed the editorship of Good Words, designed as a popular periodical, with a spirit and aim decidedly Christian. Of his journey to the Holy Land in 1867, he gave a full account in his Eastward. He was also the author of several other popular works. In 1862 he was chosen by the General Assembly to represent the Church in India; and his reception, when he returned, was very warm. He was unanimously elected by the General Assembly to the office of moderator, in 1869. From 1871 his health gradually declined, and he died June 16, 1872. Dr. Mack was a genial, large-hearted man, whose untiring energy and Christian philanthropy placed him in the first rank of public benefactors. See (London) Christian Observer, December, 1876, p. 907; Memoir, by his brother (Loinds). 1876.

MacMahon, Bernard, D.D., a Roman Catholic divine, was born in Ireland in 1816. He studied for the priesthood in France, and about 1842 went to Africa with the first vicar apostolic of Cape Colony, Mgr. Griffith, and he continued until the last to labor among the English-speaking Catholics of the colony. He was soon after made vicar-general, holding that position under bishops Grimley and Leonard, or to his death. He was a hard worker, a close student, and a model priest. Pius I appointed him domestic prelate. He died at Cape Town, Feb. 1, 1882. See (N. Y.) Cath. Annual, 1883, p. 117.

Macnaughton, Donald, a Scotch prelate, was elected bishop of Dunkeld in 1436, and died on his way to Rome the same year. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 87.

Madagascan Version. See MALAGASI.

Madhavias, an order of Hindi mendicants, founded by Madho, an ascetic. They travel up and down the country soliciting alms, and playing on strung instruments.

Madhavacharia, a division of the Vaisnavas of the Hindu, founded by Madhavacharya (q. v.). They have their headquarters at Udipi, where their founder erected a temple, and deposited an image of Krishna. Their appearance is thus described: "The ascetic professors of Madhavacharya's school adopt the external appearance of the Daordes, laying aside the Brahmatical cord, carrying a stick, a gourd, and a water-pot, going bare-headed, and wearing a single wrapper stained of an orange color with an ochre clay; they are usually adopted into the order from their boyhood, and acknowledge no social affinities nor interests. The marks common to them and the lay votaries of the order are the impress of the symbols of Vishnu upon their shoulders and breasts, stamped with a hot iron, and the frontal mark, which consists of two perpendicular lines made with Gopuchandana, and joined at the root of the nose like that of the Sri Vaisnava; but instead of the red lines on the centre, the Madhavacharies make a straight black line, with the charcoal from incense offered to Narayana, terminating in a round mark made with turmeric."

Madmannah. For this site Lien. Couder suggests (Tent Work, ii, 338) Um Dinmeh, twelve miles north-east of Beersheba, consisting of "heaps of stones, foundations, and two or three caves" (Memoria to Ordinance Survey, iii, 399); but the name has little resemblance.

Madon is perhaps the modern ruin Khurbet Madin (Couder, Tent Work, ii, 338), a quarter of a mile south of Hattin, near Lake Tiberias, consisting of "heaps of ruins, some dressed stones" (Memoria to Ordinance Survey, i, 403).

Madrasias are colleges in Mohammedan countries, for the training of priests who are to officiate in the mosques.

Madraso, José MADRADO Y AGUDA, a Spanish painter, was born at Santander, April 22, 1781. He studied at the Academy of Madrid, under David in Paris, and in Rome, where he was born in 1818, became director of the Academy, and afterwards of the museum. He died there, May 8, 1859. Among his principal paintings are Jesus in the House of Ammania; The Sacred Heart of Jesus; and The Settling of Becket.

A temporary structure, the roof having several breaks or compartments, gradually decreasing in size as they approach the top, in the form of a pagoda, or of a pyramid composed of several platforms. There is one of these structures in the precincts of nearly all the "specials" (q. v.). In the centre of the interior area is an elevated platform for the convenience of the priests, and the people sit around it upon mats spread on the ground. The platform is sometimes occupied by several priests at the same time, one of whom reads a portion of the sacred books, in a tone between singing and reading. The Maduwa is also used for other purposes. In it there is a labyrinth made of withes ornamented with the coconut leaf; and the people amuse themselves by finding their way through its intricate mazes. In some instances lines are drawn upon the ground in an open space, and these lines are regarded as the limits of the regions assigned to particular demes. Dancers approach these lines and defy the demons, receiving the applause of the people for their boldness.

Magaw, Simeon, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, graduated from the University of Pennsylvania in 1837. Having received ordination, he became a missionary of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, and served as such in Dover and Duck Creek, Del. In 1879 he was invited to St. Paul's Church, Philadelphia, but did not accept the rectorship until January, 1881. In 1878 the Rev. Joseph Filmore became his assistant, and Dr. Magaw continued rector until 1884. He was vice-provost of the University of Pennsylvania from 1872 to 1891. About 1880 he aided in founding the Philadelphia Academy, which had a brief existence. He was secretary of several of the early conventions of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Pennsylvania. His death occurred in Philadelphia, Dec. 3, 1892. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v. 246.

Magra, James, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Bart Township, Lancaster Co., Pa., Jan. 1, 1775. He graduated from Franklin College, Lancaster, about 1799. After studying theology, he was licensed, Dec. 16, 1801, by the Presbytery of Middletown; preached as a missionary for a year or two; and was ordained April 4, 1804, pastor of the Church in West Nottingham, Cecil Co., Md. Here he remained till 1810, when a church was formed in Upper West Nottingham, which he also served till 1821. In 1822 he organized a church at Charlestown, of which he was pastor till his death, Oct. 20, 1885. Besides preaching, Dr. Magraw was engaged for many years in teaching. (J. C. S.)

Magner (Lat. Miner), Dominico, a Roman Catholic prelate, was born March 28, 1604, and died March 4, 1672, at Viterbo. Michel, Daniel, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Aug. 14, 1580, at Stuttgart. He studied at Tübingen, and travelled through Switzerland, France, England, Holland, and Germany. In 1724 he was appointed professor at Tübingen, and in 1730 was made doctor of divinity. He died Jan. 20, 1752. He wrote, De Fide Harpastri Sermonis (ibid. 1741–42). — De Locau Eccles. iii, 19–21 (ibid. 1743). See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, s. v. (B. P.)

Mallin, François de, a French prelate, was born at Paris, Mar. 4, 1558. In 1700 he was appointed archbishop of Aries, and in 1710 he succeeded the famous Le Tellier in the archbishopric of Rheims. Mallin distinguished himself by his ardent zeal for the Roman see. When the bull Unigenitus was promulgated, he forfeited much of his influence. His pastoral epistles were often suppressed by the parliament. Pope Clement XI, in consideration of his great services, made Mallin cardinal without consulting first the court of France, and the latter forbade the archbishop to wear the insignia of his new dignity. But these prohibitory measures were not always carried out, and Louis XV allowed him to wear the cardinal's hat. Mallin died in the abbey of St. Thierry, Sept. 18, 1721. Malin, Thomas, D.D., moderator of the Free Church of Scotland, was ordained pastor of the High Church in Edinburgh in 1832, which position he held until his death, May 23, 1881. In 1880 he was a delegate from the Free Church Assembly to the General Council of the Presbyterian Church held in Philadelphia. He possessed five talents as a preacher, and proved himself a successful pastor.

Maisonn, Johann Georg, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Neu- stadt-on-the-Aisch, May 24, 1730. He studied at Erlangen and Halle, and acted for some time as an assistant at different schools. In 1779 he was appointed to the pastorate at Dottenheim, and died Jan. 29, 1784. He wrote, Expositio Psalmorum Sacrorum (Culmbach, 1771); — Super Matth. xvi, 18 (ibid. 1772); — De Miscellanea (ibid. 1774); — De Loco Rom. iv, 13 (ibid. 1776); — De Immortalitate (ibid. 1779); — In Philipp. iv, 13 (ibid. seq.). Majal, Mathieu (called Denys, from his birth-place), a young Huguenot minister, "the martyr of Vence," was a pastor at Vivaneau, who, having attended the national synod of Besançon, Aug. 19, 1744, was arrested for treason Feb. 1, following, and despite the entreaties of his parishioners, was executed Feb. 2, 1746, on the esplanade of Montpellier, at the age of twenty-six years. Major, Johann Tobias, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Jena, Feb. 2, 1615. After completing his studies at Leipsic and Jena, he travelled through Holland, France, and Italy, was made in 1645 doctor of theology, and elected professor at Jena in 1646. He died April 23, 1655. Makkedah. "El-Mughir ('the Cave'), the site which captain Warren proposes for Makkedah, is a remarkable place, and one of the most conspicuous sites in the plain. A promontory of brown sandy rock juts out southwards, and at the end is the village, climbing up the hillside. The huts are of mud, and stand in many cases in front of caves; there are also small excavations on the north-east, and remains of an old Jewish tomb, with Kokim. From the caves the modern name is derived, and it is worthy of notice that this is the only village in the Philistine plain at which we found such caves. The proximity of Gederoth (Katrak) and Naannah (Na'aneh) to El-Mughir also increases the probability that captain Warren's identification of El-Mughir with Makkedah is correct, for those places were near Makkedah (Josh, xvi, 41)" (Corder, Early Work, ii, 174). This position is defended at length by the same writer in the Quarr, Statement of the "Pal. Explor. Soc." 1875, p. 165. The place is situated nine miles north-east of Ashdod, and is briefly described in the Memoirs accompanying the Ordinance Survey, ii, 41, and its antiquities, ibid. p. 427.

Makos, a god of the ancient Slavonians, who was represented partly as a man and partly as a fish. At a later period he presided over rain, and was invoked when the fields were in want of water.

Malagasi Version of the Scriptures. Malagasi is the language spoken on the island of Madagascar (q. v.). The gospel was not proclaimed to the people.

Makos, a god of the ancient Slavonians, who was represented partly as a man and partly as a fish. At a later period he presided over rain, and was invoked when the fields were in want of water.
of this issue till 1818, when the Rev. Messrs. Jones and Beaver were sent to labor among them; the Church
Missionary Society, the British and Foreign Bible Society, and the Bible Socieity of New York, occupied the greater part of the time of the missionaries during eleven years. The New Test. was completed in 1825, and, after having been revised twice, was printed in 1830. Parts of the Old Test. was printed in 1828 and 1830, and about the latter year the whole of the Old Test. was printed at Madagascar. The persecution, well known in history, commenced about this time, and lasted till 1841. The Rev. Messrs. Freeman and Jones (formerly missionaries in Madagascar) had,
in anticipation of the day when they might be enabled to resume their labors, employed the press therein return to England in the complete revision of the Malagasi Scriptures. This revision has been accomplished, and, in the immediate prospect of the island becoming again open to the efforts of the Christian ministry, the British and Foreign Bible Society determined to print an edition of five thousand copies of the Malagasi Bible from the revised MS. This work was accordingly completed, under the editorial care of the Rev. Mr. Griffithus (formerly a missionary on the island), with the aid of the Rev. Mr. Hext, who, after seeing the Malagasi the completion of the New Test., with the Old Test. as far as the 10th chapter of Judges, it had been deemed advisable to suspend further progress. The revision of the text had advanced as far as the end of Job. This work given up in 1856 was again resumed, and the completed parts of the Old Test., left by the late Rev. Mr. Griffiths, together with a profusion of MS.
corrections, very difficult to decipher, was happily brought to an end in 1864, through the able assistance of Mr. Sauerwein and the editorial superintendent of the British and Foreign Bible Society. A revised edition of the Malagasi New Test., with marginal refer-ces, was printed at London in 1869, under the care of the Rev. R. G. Hartley, of the London Missionary Society, while the Old Test., under the editorship of the Rev. R. Toy, was published in 1871. For a long time the need of a thorough revision of the entire Bible in the Malagasi had been felt. From the report for 1873
we learn that a joint board, representing all the missions on the island, has been formed for the purpose of securing, as far as possible, a thoroughly accurate and idiomatic standard version of the Bible text in the language.
This board has ever since been at work, and from the report for 1885 we learn that the preliminary revision of the Bible was completed Sept. 15, 1884. See Bible of Every Land, p. 386. For linguistic purposes, see Parker, A Concise Grammar of the Malagasy Language (B. F.).

MALAY VERSION OR THE SCRIPTURES. The Script-
tures, either in whole or in part, were translated into Malay several times. The first translation was made by John Van Hassel, a director of the East India Company, formed in 1602. When he had completed a version of the gospel according to Matthew, he handed over the MS. to Peter de Carpentier, the general of the company, and soon after, in 1612, another version, prepared by Albert Cornelisoon Ruyl, was delivered to the same individual, in order that the two versions might be compared. Ruyl's was preferred, and he was devoted himself to the completion of the New Test.; but only lived to translate as far as the close of the gospel of Mark.
His MSS. were sent to Holland, and were printed with the Dutch version at Enkhuizer in 1625, and again at Amsterdam in 1639. Van Hassel, far from being discouraged at the preference with which Ruyl's version was regarded, persevered with his translation, and completed a version of the four gospels, of which Luke and John were published at Amsterdam in 1640. Van Hasset also translated the Psalms, in concert with Justus Heinsius, for four years, previous to the Dutch Church in India. The first portion of this version was printed at Amsterdam in 1648, and the entire Psalter appeared in 1649. Heurn likewise translated the Acts of the Apostles into Malay, and revised the gospels of Van Hassel and Ruyl, according to the text of the Low or Belgie version of 1637. This revision, together with the Acts, and the Dutch version in the margin, was printed at Amsterdam in 1651. This was reprinted at Oxford in 1677, at the expense of the Hon. Robert Boyle, and under the superintendence of Dr. Hyde, keeper of the Bodleian Library. A second impression of the same work, in every respect similar to the first, was printed at Oxford in 1704, and the copies were sent to the East for distribution. These, and all the editions above mentionedin, were printed in the character of large type, length, in 1668, the whole New Test. was printed at Amsterdam in Roman letters, translated by Daniel Brower. He lived and died in the East, he also prepared a version of the book of Genesis, which was printed in 1662, and again in 1667, at Amsterdam. A standard Malay version of the Old and New Test. was com-enced by Dr. M. Leidekker, a Dutch minister of Batavia in 1685. He translated most of the books of the Old Test., twice; and in the New Test., had advanced as far as the 5th verse of the 6th chapter of the epistle to the Philippians when he died. The work was completed by his pupil, the Rev. Mr. Voon der Vorm, who in 1702 was sent to Java in 1702, and there completed the work. After his death Petrus Van der Vorm was appointed complete the work, which he did before the close of the year. In 1722 the Dutch government appointed four ministers to examine and correct the work. Besides Van der Vorm, there were Arnoldus Brandts, Op-fine, and Heinrich Monschau, who completed the work in 1728. Two copies appear to have been made, one in Roman, and the other in Arabic characters. The former was printed at Amsterdam (1731-35), under the care of the Rev. G. H. Wessely and Dr. Bermath, aided by two Malay chaplains. The latter was published at Batavia in 1758, under the direction of the Dutch governor, Jacob Monck.
In 1813 George Livett, Esq., resident at Amboyna, addressed
the Calcutta Bible Society in behalf of the Amboynese Christians, who were almost destitute of Bibles. The society had three thousand copies of the Malay
New Test., printed at Serampore in 1814, the text being that of 1731. This edition was in Roman characters. But as there were Malay districts where the Arabic was still in use, the same society determined upon printing two editions of the Scriptures, one in Roman, the other in Arabic letters. The former was completed in 1817, when the entire Bible from the text of 1731-33 left the press; the latter was not published until 1822, the text of 1758 having been carefully revised and corrected for that purpose by the Rev. Mr. Hutchings and major McClintock. These editions were printed in London, other supplies of the Malay Scriptures were prepared in London, at the earnest request of the Auxiliary Bible Society at Amboyna. In 1819 the New Test. in the Roman character, from the text of 1735, was printed by the British and Foreign Bible Society, under the care of professor Lee, and in 1822 the entire Bible from the same text was issued. In 1820 the Netherlands Bible Society supplied the Malays with the New Test.
which was printed at Haarlem, and in 1824 the whole Bible was published for the Malays by the same society, in an edition of five thousand copies. These editions were printed in Arabic characters from the edition of 1758, under the superintendence of professor Wittern.
In 1822 the same society printed an edition of New Tests and Bibles in the Roman character from the text of 1735. In 1830 the Calcutta Society printed, at Ser-ampore, an edition of two thousand five hundred copies of Matthew's gospel, in Arabic characters, as the first step forward giving a fresh edition of the entire New Test.
This measure was adopted in consequence of the desire manifested among the Western Malays themselves to read the Scriptures—and a careful study of the facts before, for the Bible had previously been urged upon them rather than freely accepted, and their Mohammedan prejudices had been deemed impregnable. In conse-

fluence of their increased demand for the "Englishman's Koran," the Calcutta Society published, in 1833, a revised edition of one thousand copies of the Gospels and the Acts, and one thousand five hundred copies of the entire New Testament, from the edition corrected by Mr. Hume, and the first English version was undertaken under the care of the Rev. Messrs. Thomson and Burn, of the London Missionary Society. Another version of the New Testament, less literal and more idiomatic than former translations, was executed by the agents of the London Missionary Society and of the American Bible Society, at Calcutta. It was translated by the Arabic and Roman characters were printed in 1836, under the care of the Rev. B. P. Keasberry. The latter had also undertaken a translation of the Old Testament, of which he had already prepared a considerable part, when his death, in 1825, put a stop to the work. Since 1814 the Java Auxiliary Bible Society has contemplated the plan of publishing the New Testament in Low Malay, which is spoken in the lower parts of Java. An edition of the New Testament in the Low Malay, which was commenced by Mr. Robinson, a Baptist missionary, and completed by Dr. Stedman, was published at Singapore in 1838. Some Christians at Sourabaya prepared a translation of the Psalms, which was printed at Amsterdam in 1847, under the care of professor Vetti, by the Netherlands Bible Society. In 1877 the British and Foreign Bible Society took possession of the translation of Exodus of Mr. J. L. Marten, which the Rev. E. W. King, who brought it to England from Java, superintended. See Bible of Every Land, p. 860.

MALAYALIM VERSION OF THE SCRIPTURES. The Malayalam is spoken along the western coast of Peninsular India, from cape Comorin to the borders of Ceylon, and from the sea to the western Ghats. This region, sometimes distinguished by the general name of Malayala, comprises the British district of Malabar, under the Madras presidency, and the territories of the several rajahs of Travancore, Cochin, and Coorg. The natives in general are Hindoos. When Dr. Buchanan, at the beginning of the present century, visited the Syrian Christians at Malaya, he found that several attempts had been made to render the different stages of the languages, without success, to effect a translation of the Scriptures into Malayalam, their vernacular language. At the suggestion of Dr. Buchanan the design was carried into execution, and the bishop, Mar Dionysius, engaged to superintend the translation. On his second visit to Travancore, in 1807, Dr. Buchanan found that the translation of the four gospels had been completed by Timapah Pillay and Rembar, a catamar or priest of the Syrian Church. The translation had been made from the Tamil version of Fabricius, and an edition of the thousand copies of these gospels was printed at Bombay at the expense of the British and Foreign Bible Society. Timapah Pillay was subsequently placed under the superintendence of the Rev. Mr. Thompson, at Madras, in order to complete the translation of the New Testament, which was accomplished in 1813. This version, however, did not prove satisfactory, and Mr. Spring, chaplain at Tellicherry, proposed to enter upon a complete revision of Timapah Pillay's version, so as to render it acceptable to the natives of Malabar; while Mr. Bailey, who was stationed at Cottayam, endeavored to execute a new translation for the benefit of the inhabitants of Travancore. Both these translations were completed in 1819, and on examination Mr. Bailey's version was preferred by the Madras Bible Society, at whose expense the New Testament was published at Cottayam, in 1820. The translation of the Old Testament was likewise completed by Mr. Bailey the same year, and this work was submitted to a sub-committee, formed in 1822, in connection with the Madras Society, for the publication of a Malayalam version of the Old Testament. In 1836 some of the New Testament was published in Madras, under the care of Mr. Bailey, who had been compelled to visit England on account of his health. The remainder of the New Testament was printed by him at the mission-press in Cottayam. Complete editions of both the Old and New Testaments in Malayalam have since been issued from Cottayam press. The language is now in current use, but, however, admitted to stand in need of further revision, and a publishing committee was appointed for the purpose. In the report for 1866 we read that the revision of the New Testament has been completed, together with that of the first three texts of the Pentateuch. In 1868 the revision had proceeded as far as the end of the second book of Samuel, while in 1866 we are told that the Old Testament had been reprinted, with a few corrections. In 1871 we read that "the New Testament, in this southern Indian language, is about to be revised," but that the results of the committee has not yet been fully decided upon. The bishops and pastors in the Syrian Church of Malabar have undertaken to aid the English and German missionaries in the work." The meeting of delegates appointed for that purpose took place, according to the report of 1872, in 1871, at Cannanore. The delegates present were the Rev. Messrs. Baker and Justus Joseph, of the Church Missionary Society; and Fritz and Miller, of the German Base Mission. The work of the delegates progressed very slowly. In the report for 1871 we read that the revision of the New Testament was carried on as far as Hebrew, and that the Rev. H. Baker, convenor of the delegates, "I trust in a few months to see the end of the New Testament, and shall hope to praise God for enabling me to do the little I have done towards this edition." His wish, however, has not been fulfilled, for to use the words of the report for 1878, "the Malayalam Revision Committee has lost its senior member, the Rev. H. Baker, of the Church Missionary Society, Cottayam. This, together with the dialectical differences in the language as spoken in North and South Malabar, has made the task very difficult. The revision has been carried on, however, in the New Testament, to the end of James, the first two gospels having undergone a second revision." From the report for 1883 we learn that the revision of the New Testament had been brought to a close in 1882, and that an edition of eight thousand copies has been printed. The Old Testament is now in course of preparation. See Bible of Every Land, p. 145. For linguistic purposes, see Gunter, A Malayalam and English Dictionary. (B. P.)

Malbin, Meir Libish, a Jewish author and rabbi, was born in Russia in 1810. In his early youth his intellectual powers fired the utmost admiration; in his sixteenth year his fluency in the Talmud was extraordinary, his memory enabling him to repeat folio after folio. When eighteen years of age he became rabbi at Wewschen, in the province of Posen. From Wewschen he was called to Kempen, and after a long residence there, to Bucharost. Being obliged to leave Rosmania on account of his opposition to the Jewish Reform party, he returned to Russia. After a short residence there he went to Könsberg, in Prussia. Malbin died Sept. 8, 1879, at Kiev, on his way to a new position at Eestotschau, in Russia. He wrote commentaries on the Pentateuch, the five Megilloth, and Isaiah, for which see Libermann, Encyclopaedia Biblica (Vienna, 1881), s. v. In his expositions he proved himself not only an elegant Hebrew writer, but also a deep thinker. (B. P.)

Malcolm, a Scotch prelate, was bishop of Caithness at the time of the parliament in Scone, April 8, 1637. He died in 1641. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 218.
Malcolm, Howard D., LL.D., a Baptist minister, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., Jan. 19, 1799. He graduated from Dickinson College in 1815, entered Princeton Theological Seminary in 1818, and remained two years; was licensed to preach at Sampson Street Church, in Philadelphia, June 8 of the same year; became pastor in Hudson, N. Y., May 14, 1819; first general secretary of the American Sunday-school Union, and travelled widely in its service, but resigned this position in 1823. He soon after became pastor of Federal Street Church, Boston, Mass. In 1833 he went abroad as a deputy of the Baptist Triennial Convention, to visit its foreign mission stations in India, China, Siam, and Burmah, and on his return published, in two volumes, an account of his travels. Next, he was pastor of Sampson Street Baptist Church, Cincinnati, Ohio, Nov. 23, 1849. He was president respectively of Georgetown College, Ky., and of the University of Lewisburg, Pa., which latter position he held, Aug. 5, 1857. On account of an affection of the throat the later years of his life were devoted to the Baptist Historical Society. He died March 25, 1879. Dr. Malcolm was president of the American Peace Society, and vice-president of the American Foreign Bible Society. Among his published volumes are, Bible Dictionary (1829, 1838),-Travels in Southern Asia (1839),-Extent of the Abolition (1838),- Theological Review (1827, 1828). He also edited many volumes. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1879, p. 18.

Maldivian Version of the Scriptures. The Maldivian language is a very mixed one, containing more Cingalese, Hindustani, Sanscrit, and Arabic words than the Malay. The nation has two alphabets of their own, one very peculiar, the other resembling the Persian. The four gospels were translated into Maldivian by Dr. Leyden, for the Calcutta Bible Society, but for various reasons had not been printed up to 1869. See Bible of Every Land, p. 150.

Maliseet Version of the Scriptures. The Maliseet is a dialect spoken by the Indians of New Brunswick. In most parts of the province, and in the possession of the gospel of John, which was translated by the Rev. S. T. Rand, and published by the British and Foreign Bible Society. Before the publication of this gospel they were only acquainted with such brief references and quotations of Scripture as are found in the Roman missal. (B. P.)

Mallet, Friedrich Ludwig, a distinguished Reformed theologian of Germany, was born Aug. 4, 1703, at Braunschweig, near Wetzlar. He studied at Herborn and Tubingen, and was in 1725 appointed assistant to pastor Buch of St. Michael’s, at Bremen, whom he succeeded in 1717. In 1727 he was called to the pastorate of St. Stephen’s, and died May 5, 1805. Mallet was a most excellent preacher, and a prolific writer. His publications, however, are mostly polemic, caused by the rationalism and infidelity which he sought to combat. See Zuchli, Bibl. Theol. ii, 849 sq.; Hufeld, Friedrich Ludwig Mallet (1665); Meurer, Zur Erinnerung an Friedrich Ludwig Mallet (1666); Wilken, Friedrich Mallet, der Zeuge der Wahrheit (1872); Plitt-Herzog, Real-Encyclop. s.v. Malinkrodt, Pauline von, founder of the Seminary for Christian Women, was born Minden, Westphalia, June 3, 1817. She was the sister of Hermann von Malinkrodt, the eminent leader of the Catholic party in the Prussian legislature, a speaker and politician of great power, who died suddenly in Berlin, May 26, 1874, aged fifty-three years. When living with her father in Minden, Pauline set up a little asylum for blind children. She resolved to secure a permanent organization for carrying out her designs, Aug. 21, 1843. In November, 1850, she took her vows, and soon the sisters of Christian Charity was established. For twenty years the new institution enjoyed the favor of both civil and ecclesiastical authority. In May, 1872, the laws against the Catholic Church were passed by the Prussian government, and every house not devoted exclusively to nursing the sick was closed, and its inmates dispersed. In April, 1878, mother Pauline yielded to her last illness in America. She died after two years’ residence in America, and with her a detachment of sisters, and founded a house in New Orleans. In order to make proper provision for the American undertaking, she established another house at Wilkesbarre, Pa., which is for America what the house at Paderborn had been for Germany. In 1874 laws of red tape were introduced in the American government to make a foundation in their country. In 1876 she went to Rome, and received the pope’s approval of her congregation and the erection of two provinces for North and South America. She sailed for America in October, 1878, by way of Cape Horn, and visited every house in the two Americas. She then set out to visit her houses in Belgium, Germany, and Bohemia, returning to Paderborn in March, 1881. There she died, April 30 of that year. There were then (1881) twenty-eight houses of the sisters of Christian Charity in the United States, and four in South America. See (N. Y.) Catholic Annual, 1882, p. 94.

Maltese Version of the Scriptures. The Maltese spoken by the natives of Malta is a curious mixture of Arabic and Italian, the grammar being Arabic, but a large number of Italian words have been grafted into the vocabulary. Many years ago the four gospels were translated into Maltese by Dr. Vargali, and printed at the expense of the Church Missionary Society. Afterwards the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge had the work revised, and the remainder of the New Testament, translated by Dr. Camilleri, a native of Malta, and a clergyman of the Church of England. The book, however, did not meet with that acceptance which had been hoped for, owing not so much to any defects in the translation as to the awful ignorance of the people, and their benighted adherence to the priests. A deep interest having been taken by a few Englishmen living on the island in the spiritual welfare of this people, the question was again raised of printing a gospel in the Maltese, as there are about 10,000 Maltese, principally women and children, country people and villagers, who read their own language. In 1870 a translation of Matthew’s gospel was made by a native, and sent over to England, and finally, in 1873, the MS. had been examined and revised by the editorial superintendent and by the Rev. Dr. Camilleri, it was printed under the editorship of the last-named gentleman, and the orthography was made as simple as possible, so as to present no difficulties to those who were able to read at all in their mother tongue. This was in 1871. In the report for 1872 we read: “The edition of Matthew in this language having proved a great boon to religious inquirers among the Maltese, it was resolved that the Acts of the Apostles should be printed. A third portion, namely the gospels proper, was sent to John, who, has now begun the work, and is about to be printed. The services of the Rev. Dr. Camilleri have proved exceedingly valuable in aiding the preparation of these works.” The two gospels and the Acts are the only parts of the New Testament which the Maltese people at present see. See Bible of Every Land, p. 33. (B. P.)

Maluk Dais, a subdivision of the Ramavadri Vaishnavas of Hindustan, founded by Maluk Dais, who lived in the reign of Akbar the Great, in the 16th century. They worship Vishnu, in the character of Ram, and accept as their chief authority the Bhagavata Gitā. The adherents of this sect are said to be numerous, especially among the laboring and trading classes, to the latter of which their founder belonged. The principal estabishment of this sect is at Kara Manikpur, the birthplace of the founder, and still occupied by his de-

Manchoo (also Manchoo, Manchadaw) Ver-

tion of the Scriptures. The Manchob belongs to that region of China, an extreme region lying north of Corea and north-east of China proper. It is also the court language of Pekin. An imperfect and very unfaithful translation of part of the Scriptures into Manchob is said to have been executed by some Jesuit missionaries; and in 1818 an abortive attempt towards the production of a version was made under the su-novation of the governor of Irukata. The execution of this important work ultimately devolved upon Lipoff-rozoff, a learned member of the Russian Bible Society, who had resided fourteen years at Pekin, by appointment of the Russian government, with the view of studying the Chinese and Manchob. The translation was carried on under the superintendence of Dr.
Pinker, and in 1822 an edition of the gospel of Matthew was printed at St. Petersburg, at the expense of the British and Foreign Bible Society. The awful flood that has swept over all in that city has precluded the greater part of this edition. The entire New Text was published by the same society in 1883, the translation of Mr. Lipoffrozoff having been revised by Mr. George Borrow, of Norwich. This edition, which is beautifull-ly printed, was forwarded to London, and there it pro-

the translation of the Scriptures in this widely extended language. He translated a portion of the Bible accurately into Mandingo, in London under his superintendence, in 1838, by the British and Foreign Bible Society. The translation of the other three gospels is still in manuscript. See

MANN, Samuel, LL.D., an English Baptist minister, was born at Leicester, Nov. 26, 1821. He was educated at Bristol College, and spent a few terms of study in the Glasgow University. In 1846 he accepted the pastorate of the Church at Shepparton, Victoria, where he remained fifteen years. His labors were marked by his industry and influence was widely felt. He contributed to the Eclectic Review, the Christian Spectator, and other periodicals; and in 1857 took the entire editorial management of the Baptist Magazine. In 1861 he became book editor of the Religious Tract Society, an office which he held in a high degree of efficiency. His talents for the next fifteen years were devoted to the elevation of literature to the Christian standard. In 1876 he became secretary of the same society, and remained an efficient officer until the close of his life, Sept. 18, 1901. Among his publications may be mentioned his Sermon to the Parliament, a work of six sermons, and his other works are his Ray of Light, a treatise on the Bap- tism of Jesus, and his London of the Pharisees. See (London) Baptist Hand-book, 1882, p. 561.

Manners, George B., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born at New Haven, Conn., Aug. 8, 1883. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1877; studied law; for several years was secretary of civil and military affairs, but afterwards entered the ministry; and for about nine years was rector of the parish in Montpelier, Vt., where he lived and organized. In 1884 he was charge of St. Peter’s Church in Bennington, where he remained until death, Nov. 17, 1886. See Amer. Quart. Church Rev., April, 1888, p. 151.

Mansfield, Richard, D.D., a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born at New Haven, Conn., in 1724. He graduated from Yale College, and devoted two years to study as a resident graduate. For three years, from 1744, he was principal of a grammar school in New Haven. In 1748 he was ordained in London by the archbishop of Canterbury, and received an appointment from the Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts. Returning to America in 1749, he began his missionary work in Derby, Conn., in connection with West Haven, Waterbury, and Norbury, a position which he retained until his death, in April, 1820. In 1775 he was compelled to flee for a time from his churches and family to the town of Hempstead, L.I., where he was kindled to the English crown. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v. 181.

Mantelhau Version. See MANCHU.

Mantelletum. A large capsule of silk reaching from the neck to below the waist, with open spaces for the arms on each side. It is commonly worn over the coat, and is doubtless the foreign equivalent to the English chimeter. Anciently it was of scarlet satin in England. Foreign bishops commonly wear mantelletum of blue, with aum of purple silk, lined with silk of the same color, only lighter in shade. Abroad, in some places, monsignori, canons, vicars-general, apostolic prothonotaries, and other doctors in canon law wear the mantelletum; in which case it is usually of black, though sometimes of scarlet or brown silk. The mantelletum is by some affirmed to be of the same origin.

Mantle, The Praying, an insect said to have been worshipped formerly by the Hottentots. It derives its name from the erect position and motion it assumes when alarmed. It was regarded by the Hottentots as a creature of bad omen, and to kill, or even to injure it, was looked upon as in the highest degree unlucky.

Mantra, a secret, the communication of which forms the chief ceremony of initiation in all Hindu sects. It generally consists of the name of some deity, or a short address to him: it is conveyed by the teacher to the disciple in a whisper, and is carefully concealed from all the uninitiated. The word mantra is also employed generally to denote a spell or enchantment, and also a hymn or a prayer.

Manuscripts, Hebrew. That Hebrew MSS. exist at a very early time may be seen from the following passage in the Mishnah (Sopherim, vi, 4): "B. Simon ben-Lakish says, three codices (of the Pentateuch) were found in the court of the temple, one of which had the reading דב, the other דב, and the third different in the number of passages wherein נא is read with a yod. Thus in the one codex it was written יבנ, in the other דב, while the two other codices had נא; the reading of the two was therefore declared valid, whereas that of the one was invalid. In the second codex, דב was found (Exod. xxiv, 11), while the other two codices had יבנ; the reading in which the two codices agreed was declared valid, and that of the one invalid. In the third codex there were only nine passages which had נא written with a yod (as it is generally written נא with a yod), whereas the other two had eleven passages; the readings of the two were declared valid, and those of the one invalid."
The minae prescriptions contained in the Talmud concerning the material, color, letters, writing instruments, etc., for the manuscripts, only prove the fact that such manuscripts existed, otherwise St. Jerome could not have written "Yeterim librorum fidel de Hebraico voluminiibus examinando est." (Epist. ad Lucian. III.) The greatest care was exercised in writing the MSS., and three mistakes were sufficient to make a copy worthless (Men. 109a, col. 2).

When the study of the Talmud was no longer attractive amid the disorder and frequent closing of the Babylonian academies, and ulterior development of the traditions became exhausted, attention was more directed to Scripture. The number of MSS. increased, and to them the various systems of vowel-points and accents, together with the first elements of grammar, were appended. But not all of these MSS. are now extant, some of them being quoted, or quotations made from them by different writers. In treating, therefore, of the different MSS., we shall have to speak of two kinds—of such as are lost, and of such as are extant.

A. Lost Manuscripts.
1. The Codex Hebraeus. Concerning the צ"ש Лиљיאן Элла Левски writes thus: "The Pentateuch of Jericho is doubtless a correct codex of the Pentateuch derived from Jericho. It discusses the plains and desertors as נטנש, the abominations (Lev. xlii, 27), which is the Pentateuch without the second and the third verse twice in the same chapter (Num. xii, 13, 12), of which the first is plains (in the Jericho codex), and the second desertors."
2. The Codex Sinaiticus. Life Moses ben-David Naphtali, a contemporary of Ben-Asher, published about A.D. 680-682. He distinguished himself by his edition of a Hebrew text of the Hebrew Scriptures in opposition to Ben-Asher, in which he had no great success, inasmuch as the general opinion was that his Text was not very significant, and was almost entirely confined to the vowel-points and accents. The codex itself is lost, but many of its readings are preserved, e.g. by Kimchi in his Grammar and Lexicon, while a complete list of these different readings is appended to Ben-Asher's edition of the Hebrew Bible. It is noted that, in his Commentary, p. 137, sec. 46, it has also given the variations between these two scholars.

The most important difference between Ben Naphtali and Ben-Asher is the reading of מ"ע כ"ב in Song of Songs, vii, as two words, while Ben-Asher reads it as one word, מ"ע כ"ב, both readings having the same meaning.

In a very evident form these various readings are traced by Bar and Delitzsch in their edition of the different parts of the Old Testament, on Genesis, p. 81, Job, p. 60, Psalms, p. 118, Proverbs, p. 156, Isaiah, p. 139, Jeremiah, p. 106, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Daniel, p. 91, 195, Ezech., p. 112.

Our printed editions have for the most part the readings of Ben-Asher, and Ben Naphtali very seldom. However, however, when Ben Naphtali is found, with the exception of such codices as have the Babylonian system of punctuation, and which always follow Ben-Asher, the editor is in the edition in which the reading מ"ע כ"ב (i.e. Ben Naphtali's) is found: Bomberg's Rabbinic (1617) and his fourth edition (1518); Stephen's (1563); Minnigerode's (1546); Hutter's (1587); Antwerp Polyglot (1570); Henry's Hebrew Bible (1676-1682); John's (1694); Bickersteth's (1839); Basle edition (1897); Hahn-Rosenmüller's (1868).

B. Extant Manuscripts.
1. In order to have a correct opinion of the codices extant, the following points must be observed:

   1. Whether the MS. was written for public or private use.
   2. Whether the MS. was written for public or private use.
   3. Whether the MS. was written for public or private use.
   4. Whether the MS. was written for public or private use.

The Jews themselves distinguish in the synagogue roll (1) the Talmud, with sharp corners and a peculiar ornament, used by the Rabbinical and Samaritan sects; (2) the Bible, ancient and modern, used by the Roman Catholic and Eastern, German and Polish Jews; (3) the Mishna, more modern than the Talmud, and written in a different hand from the former, known only in the sacred copies of the Spanish and Oriental Jews.

2. Whether the copyist, in writing and correcting the MS., had regard to some version or not.

What is the date of.

The Jews employed different dates in their MSS. Some used the "Solecistic" or "Greek" era (סיקסレビュー), called also סולוקס or סולוקוס, which was employed until the 11th century, and caused entirely in the year A.D. 1611. Another computation was the reckoning from the destruction of Jerusalem (A.D. 90), as 2149 B.C.

3. What is the date of.

In order to find out to which year A.D. one of the dates of the Seleucid or Greek era, or of the Jewish computation, either from the creation or from the destruction, corresponds, it must be borne in mind that the Jewish civil calendar commences with the month תשרי, corresponding to our September or October, and the Seleucid era with the first of October, 315 B.C.

In Jewish MSS. we frequently find the small era, or קנה כ"נ, and in one codex of Kennicott's is an epigraph which states that it was written in the year 64, that is 5064.

By adding to this number the number 240 (i.e. the difference between the Hebrew and Christian calendars) the year 6644 is obtained. This is the date according to the era of the destruction of Jerusalem, which is 307 B.C. from the given figure, then the year 700 after the destruction would be 900-700 = 200, or A.D. 1905 would be the year 1917 after the destruction (i.e. 1965-5064 = 1917).

4. Where the codices were written, as there is a difference between the Spanish and the German, the Eastern and Western codices.

(a) As to the Spanish and German codices, there is a great diversity of opinion. Kennicott and Den Rosel speak of the German very highly, while Jewish authorities prefer the Spanish codices. Thus Elia Levi tells us, "Most of the conclusions I shall be able to base is upon the one that I relied on, and it is their method which I followed.

... The Spanish codices are more correct than all other

... (b) As to the Eastern and Western codices. At the beginning of the Christian an there were two rival academic, one in the other in Babylon. Both had their talmud (e. q. v.), respectively known as the Palestinian and Babylonian Talmud, but also their codices, which they differed from each other. And thus we find in Biblical as well as in Biblical codices marginal notes, giving the Western Talmud in the one and the Eastern Talmud in the other.
These codices were first collected by Jacob ben-Chayim in the Rabbinc Bible (Venice, 1699), under the title, ספירות Chayim does not give the source from which he took these variants, but Morinus (Exeget. Biblic. p. 499, Paris, 1699 ed.) testifies that he saw a list of these variations in some MSS.

As to the Eastern and Western readings, which were published by Chayim, we must observe (1) that some occur in the Pentateuch; (2) that those readings only refer to letters and words with two exceptions, viz. Jer. vi. 6, where the Eastern write ר"ש, י, &c.; with a mappik, and Amos iii. 6, where they note י, י, i.e. ר"ש with a mappik; (3) they seldom change the sense, as for the most part they are the same; and (4) they are used in permutation or transposition, of quiescent letters (Lamen, v.
31, מ"ס is read by the Occidentals, while the Oriental have מ"ס; (4) there are two hundred and sixteen various readings in Chayim's Bible (and in all Rabbinc Bibles which follow, viz. Job, xxii; Judges, xii.; Sam., x.; Kings, ii.; Isa. xvi; Jer. ii.; Ezek. xxiii; Minor Prophet, xxiii; Chron. ii.; Prov. vi.; Ruth, vii.; Song of Songs, vi.; Ecclesiastes, vi.; Esther, iv.; Ezra, t.
vi.; and the Western Jews follow the reading of the Western ומ"ס, and thus it happens that in the one or the other codex we find another reading from that of the Eastern codices.
Thus, in 5 Kings viii. 17, 18, (q. v.) remarks on the reading ר"ש, י, &c.;
that those codices which read ר"ש follow the Babylonian ומ"ס, but the Palestinian codices, which we follow, give in the list of variations ר"ש.

II. After these preliminaries, we will speak of the example

1. The Codex Asher. See Asher Manuscripts.

2. The Codex Cabilia. This codex contains the proph-estics in Cabilia, at the monastery of thekartes.
It was written in 1688 after the destruction of the temple, or in the year 4618 of the creation.

3. Codex Kennic. 126. This codex contains the last preserved, and is preserved in the British Museum (Stowe, 4195). See Stowe Codex.

4. The Codex of Damascus and Gaster. The latter codex the first and most valuable among Damascus belonging to the family Gaster. It is regarded as very sacred, and the Jews themselves are only allowed to look at it once a year, that on the feast of ה"ס (i. e., the "Joy of the Law"), which takes place at the termination of the Feast of Tabernacles. Dr. Margulion, who saw it, says that this codex "deserves the palm for beauty and execution."
According to a notice added later on the title-page, it should belong to the 5th century. Another codex, Dr.
Margulion, and Judges, is at the Monastery of near Damascus. There is a synagogue at that small place which is considered the most ancient in the world; and, moreover,
Hebrew writers affirm that it is built over the cave of Eliah. The MS. has by no means a fine master-script, and is much more modern. A most odious anathema is written on the cover, against any one selling or stealing it" (Pilgrimage to the Land of my Patrons, i. 35).

5. Codex Kennicottian. Of these we enumerate the following:

(a) Codex 56—containing the Pentateuch and Haphtoroth, written about 1018 or 1019, now in the Imperial Library at Vienna.

(b) Codex 566—containing the Pentateuch, Haphtoroth, and Megilloth [1, e. g. Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Esther, and John the Baptist, etc.] written by the hand of D. Franc. Convent. (p. 29, xiii. 399, ed.) of the end of the 10th century. It commences with Gen. 11, 13.

(c) Codex 61, Judges, Samson, and Ruth Biblioth.
Laurent, pl. ii, pars ii, cod. 45, of the beginning of the 18th century.

4. Codex 154—Prophet, with both Targums (Carlela, Biblioth. pubbl.), A. D. 1106. This is the famous Codex Brutschinian, which has the epithet—"in the year 866
A. M. and 1256 since the destruction of the Synagogue, the Targum, according to this codex, has been published by

Besides these we may mention:

5. Codex 156—Protestant, without points (Mediolan Bibl.
Ambros. 1671). A very rough and poor copy. Of various readings, the following are marked by De Rossi:

Exod. xl, 31, a/29, as also Sept., Vulg., Syr.
Lev. xi, 12, a/29, as also Sept., Vulg., Syr.

xxv, 5, q/29, as also Sept.

6. Codex 201—Prophet, and Haphtorot, of the 19th century (Hamburg Bibl., Komer). Jewish follows the book of Samuel, and 1 Kings, Ezekiel, and Isaiah follows Jeremiah.

7. Codex 292—Bible of the 18th century (Parisi Bibl.
Reg. 10).

8. Codex 294—Prophet and Haphtorot, of the 19th century (Regiomontal Bibl. Reg. 48)

9. Codex 296—Rabbin's Codex. Of these we particularize the following:

(a) Codex 256—fragments of Leviticus and Numbers, 40,
4th century, containing Lev. xxii, 19 to Num. i, 20.
Lev. xxi, 4, a/29, as also Sept.

(b) Codex 268—Pentateuch, in 4to, 9th or 10th century, commencing with Gen. xiii, 14 to Deut. xv, 12.
Exod. xxv, 5, כ/29, as also Sept.
Lev. xxvii, 29, as also Sept.
Exod. xxviii, 29, as also Sept.
Lev. xi, 29, as also Sept.
Deut. i, 40, כ/29, as also Sept.
Lev. iv, 14, כ/29, as also Sept.
Lev. iii, 14, כ/29, as also Sept.
Deut. i, 40, כ/29, as also Sept.
Lev. vi, 2, כ/29, as also Sept.
Deut. xxi, 40, כ/29, as also Sept.

(c) Codex 274—Pentateuch, Megillah, Haphtoroth, in 4to, 11th or 12th century

(d) Codex 274—Pentateuch, with points, 4to, 11th or 12th century: it ends with Deut. xxxii, 51, and has the Manu-

(f) Codex 274—Pentateuch, with points, 4to, 11th or 12th

(g) Codex 274—Pentateuch, with points, 4to, 11th or 12th

(h) Codex 274—Pentateuch, with points, 4to, 11th or 12th

(i) Codex 274—Pentateuch, with points, 4to, 11th or 12th

(j) Codex 274—Pentateuch, with points, 4to, 11th or 12th

(k) Codex 274—Pentateuch, with points, 4to, 11th or 12th

(l) Codex 274—Pentateuch, with points, 4to, 11th or 12th

(m) Codex 274—Pentateuch, with points, 4to, 11th or 12th

(n) Codex 274—Pentateuch, with points, 4to, 11th or 12th

(o) Codex 274—Pentateuch, with points, 4to, 11th or 12th

(p) Codex 274—Pentateuch, with points, 4to, 11th or 12th

(q) Codex 274—Pentateuch, with points, 4to, 11th or 12th

(r) Codex 274—Pentateuch, with points, 4to, 11th or 12th

but are enumerated by Bähr and Delitzsch in the different parts of their Old-Test. edition, have been made use of by the latter, and are given in a very convenient form in the Appendices Critica et Museum, viz. Geneva, p. 74 sq.; id. p. 53-56; Psalms, p. 83-129; Proverbs, p. 30-44; Isaiah, p. 60-82; Ezekiel, p. 79-107; Minor Prophets, p. 59-85; Daniel, p. 62-85; Ezra-Nehemiah, p. 99-119 (these last three books printed together).

Of the St. Petersburg manuscripts, professor Delitzsch has also made use in his commentary on Song of Songs (p. 178-184) and Ecclesiastes (p. 425-435), published at Leipzig in 1872. A comparison of the Codex Babylonicus from the year 916, and of the MS. from the year 1009, with Hahn's edition of the Old Test., which in the main is a reprint of Van der Hout's, has been made by Strock with reference to Isaiah, and the result was published in the Zeitschrift fur Literatur, Theologie, 1877, p. 17-52. All these various readings do not essentially impair the authority of the Masoretic text, nor materially alter the meaning of any important passage. (B. P.)

Manwantara, a great period of time in Hindu chronology, including seventy-one maha-yugas, or divine ages, being the reign of one Manu (q. v.), with his posterity and grandsons. The name is derived from the fourteen Manus who reigned in succession extended to one thousand maha-yugas, or one dya. (B. P.)

Manx. (See MANNA.)

Maori or New Zealand Version of the Scriptures. The Maori is the most cultivated of all the Polynesian dialects. See New Zealand. The first copies of portions of the New Test. were printed in 1829, having been translated by the Rev. Mr. Yate, but the first complete edition of the New Test. did not appear till 1840. A second was printed in 1842, and a third in 1844, all at the expense of the British and Foreign Bible Society. A revised edition by bishop William Williams of the Rev. T. W. Meller was published more recently. The Old Test. was completed in 1866, the translation being that of the Rev. R. Maunsell. In 1859 a revision of the Bible was undertaken, which was completed in 1867. This revised edition has also been printed since. See Bible of Every Land, p. 503. (B. P.)

Maphrida, the second dignity of the Jacobite Church (q. v.) in the East.

Maracana, idols of the Brazilian Indians. The word is a corruption of Tamarauc, which is the name of a certain fruit about the size of an ostrich's egg, and shaped like a gourd. These idols, indeed, were nothing more than the fruit Tamarauc dressed up in beautiful feathers, and fixed on a staff, which the priests stuck in the ground and ordered the people to bring food and drink before it.

Maraca is the name given in the South Sea islands to a heathen temple. All were uncovered, and resembled oratories rather than temples. The form of the interior or area was frequently that of a square or parallelogram, the sides of which extended forty or fifty feet. Two sides of this space were enclosed by a high stone wall; the front was protected by a low fence, and opposite, a solid pyramidal structure was raised, in front of which the images were kept and the altar fixed. These piles were often immense. Within the enclosure, the houses of the priests and keepers of the idols were erected. Ruins of these temples are found in every situation; on the summit of a hill, on the extremity of a point of land extending into the sea, or in the recesses of an extensive and overgrowing grove.

Maramba, an idol of the negroes of Angola, Congo, etc., in Africa. It stands erect over against the temple dedicated to some particular service, in a basket formed like a bee-hive. To this divinity the negroes make particular application for success when they go hunting or fishing, and for the relief of such as are sick. Those also charged with crime are obliged to plead their cause before it. In order to do this the accused prostrates himself at the feet of the idol, embraces it with the profoundest veneration, and says, "Behold, Maramba, thy servant is come to justify himself before thee." If the defendant is guilty, he is said to fall dead on the spot. The devotees usually carry little images in small boxes about with them, which they hang at the head of their armies, and he is presented with the first morsel, and the first cup of wine served at the king's table.

Marathi Version of the Scriptures. The Marathi, which is spoken by the Marathas or Mahrrattas (q. v.), may be regarded as a branch between the Sanscrit dialects of northern India and the languages of the Deccan. Some of the words and idioms are obviously of equine origin with the Bengalee, while in others a notable approximation may be detected to the Tamil, Telinga, and the other languages of the South. Two different characters are used in writing Marathi, the Mahrui Mohdeh, a kind of running hand, which is derived from, and still retains a strong resemblance to the Devanagari (or Sanscrit character), and the Balbouch or Balbouck, which appears to be almost, if not quite, the Devanagari itself. The former, vulgarly termed Modi, is most generally understood, being employed in all translations of sacred books; but the latter is preferred for printing, because it possesses several letters in which the Modi is deficient; it is, besides, uniform and regular in appearance, while the Modi varies as much in style as the handwriting of different individuals in Europe.

A version of the Scriptures in Marathi was commenced at Serampore in 1804. The first few copies of the gospel of Matthew were printed in the Devanagari character, but this character was soon replaced by the Modi, as the more generally intelligible to the natives. This latter character was employed in all the subsequent Serampore editions. In 1811 the New Test. was completed, and in 1820 the Old Test. left the press. A second and revised edition of the New Test. appeared about the year 1825.

Another version of the Marathi Scriptures was commenced in 1817 by American missionaries, and in 1826 the entire New Test. was published by them, with the aid of the Bombay Auxiliary and the British and Foreign Bible Society. An improved and carefully revised edition of this Test. was printed in 1850. In 1844 the Bombay Bible Society undertook another revision of the Marathi New Test. and determined upon issuing an edition in the Balbouch character. The printing of this edition was commenced in 1853, but in the same year it was found necessary to print a separate edition of the Modi, or current character, for the use of the lower class of natives.

While these editions of the New Test. were in course of preparation, the American missionaries, together with the Rev. J. Dixon of the Church mission at Namack, zealously prosecuted the translation of the Old Test. into Marathi, which was completed at the American mission press in 1855. Mr. Dixon, by whom the greater part of this important version was made, did not live to see the completion of this edition at press. From the report of the British and Foreign Bible Society for 1863 we learn that the entire Bible has been revised, published, and put into circulation. In the report for 1881 it is stated that the revision of the entire Bible has again been inaugurated, with the assistance of Rev. Baha Padmanji. The revision work is still in progress.

See Bible of Every Land, p. 136.

Marbury, Alexander M., M.D., D.D., a Proteas... tast Episcopal clergyman, was rector in Petererville, Mi., for seven years preceding 1858, when he became rector of St. Paul's, Aquasoo, in which relation he remained until his death in 1874. See Protop. Episc. Al- monor, 1874, p. 138.

Marcello, Benedetto, an eminent Italian composer of sacred music, was born at Venice, July 24, 1680. He made a thorough study of music under various masters, and at the same time studied law and became an advocate, holding several offices under the government. He was a member of the Council of Forty, and treasurer at Treviso, where he died, July 17, 1739. His most esteemed work is his music for Giuntiniani's version of Fifty Psalms, of which a fine edition was published in London, in 1707. The copies are printed in Latin and Italian, with English words. His other works consist of oratorios, masses, cantatas, madrigals, and different parts of the Roman Catholic service. He also left a MS. treatise on music.

Marchant, Jacques, a Roman Catholic theologian, who died in Convent, Belgium, in 1648, is the au- thor of Rationale Evangelicisum (transl. into French by Ricard, Le Rational des Pâtiheur de l'Ecclesié, Paris, 1876, 4 vols.): — Hortum Pastorum (French, Le Jardins des Pasteurs), a treatise on faith, hope, and charity: — Virgo Aurosa Flores (French, La Vergé d'Auroze), an ecclesiastical life: — Continuationis Mar- cianis, on the seven sacraments. Marchant's works were published in French by Ricard and Berton, in nine volumes. See Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.; Jocher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (II. P.)

Marcus, a Scotch presbyte, was a native of Gallo- war, in Scotland, and was promoted to the see of the Isles in 1275, and consecrated the same year. He was also lord high-chancellor of Scotland. He held a synod at Kirk-Bradden in December, 1291, where thirty-nine canons were made. He died in 1308. See Scottid Bisexps, p. 300.

Marenah. The ruined site, Khurvet Marenah, is three quarters of a mile south-west of Beit-Jibrin, and consists merely of "traces of ruins, cisterns, and caves" (Memoirs to Ordnance Survey, iii, 284).

Margadon, James, D.D., an Irish presbyte, was born in 1600, at Driqghilton, in Yorkshire, and re- ceived his education in Peterhouse College, Cam- bridge; was promoted to the parish of Watlass, in 1635 was advanced to the deanship of Waterford; in 1637 to that of Derry, and in 1639 was made dean of Christ Church, Dublin. Throughout the troubled period of 1641 has charity succeeded to the duties of pasto- ral office. In July, 1647, he joined in a re- monstrance to the commissioners of the English Parlaiment, praying liberty for the use of the common prayer in their respective churches, and rejecting the directory ordered to be used instead. Soon after, the was obliged to flee to England, where he was thrown into pris- on. He finally was released, and sought refuge in Lon- don. When Charles II was restored to the throne, Margadon was selected to fill the metropolitan chair of the province of Dublin, and was consecrated Jan. 27, 1660. He was placed in the diocese of the Alvyde: but we cannot catalogue his archiepiscopal achievements. The Bolak Museum, and the many magnificent volumes in which he has recorded the re- sults of his labors, are, after all, the noblest monuments to his memory. His De Venerabilibus (1673-75, 5 vols.); his Monuments Divers (1872); his Abode (1870);
dained deacon, and took charge of St. David's Church, Cherasaw, S. C. Having been ordained to the priesthood, March 14, 1890, he continued there until 1891, when he was called to the organization and care of a city mission, worshipping in St. John's Chapel, Charles- town. He died in that city, Nov. 7, 1876. See Obituary Record of Yale College, 1877.

Marshall, George, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Pennsylvania in 1806. He graduated from Jefferson College, and entered upon his ministry at Bethel in 1832, in which relation he continued until his death, April 30, 1872. Dr. Marshall was well known in western Pennsylvania as one of the leaders of the Presbyterian Church. In the councils of his church he was always heard with respectful attention, and his words were direct and weighty. See Presbyterian, May 18, 1872.

Märten, Karl Andras August, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born April 18, 1774, and died March 17, 1882, at Halberstadt, doctor of theology and first preacher. He wrote, Über die symbolischen Bücher der evangelisch-lutherischen Kirche, etc. (Halberstadt, 1830).—Über Petrusmän, sein Wesen und seine Gesehichte (ibid., 1826).—Theophanes oder die göttliche Offenbahrung (ibid., 1819).—Kleistereos oder Untersuchung über die Freiheit des menschlichen Willens (Magdeburg, 1825).—Jesus auf dem Gipfel seines inneren Lebens (Halberstadt, 1811). See Winer, Handbuch der theolog. Lit., i, 655, 180, 596, 689, 500; ii, 125; Zuchold, Bibliothek der theolog. Lit., ii, 585. (B. P.)

Martensen, Hans Lassen, one of the most prominent Danish Lutheran theologians, was born Aug. 9, 1806, at Flensburg. He studied at Copenhagen, and in 1822 passed the ecclesiastical examination and received a gold medal. The same year he was called from the government a travelling scholarship, and visited Berlin, Munich, Vienna, and Paris, giving particular attention to the study of the philosophy of the Middle Ages. On his return to Denmark, in 1836, he became a licentiate in theology, submitting a thesis on the Autonomy of the Human Conscience, which was afterwards translated from the Latin into Danish (1841), and into German (1845). The next year he began to lecture to the younger students in the University of Copenhagen on moral philosophy. The material of these lectures was published as Outline of a System of Moral Philosophy, in 1841. His lectures on Speculative Dogmatics, from 1840, when he became professor ordinarius, awakened extraordinary interest. "It was a new and unheard-of gospel, in charming language, that flowed from his inspired, enrapturing lips. Never did philosophy begin with one more promising for his lecture-room, but men advanced in years, of various callings, were found regular hearers." His popularity became greater still when, in 1845, he became court-preacher, and his Hegelianism began to give a coloring to the thoughts of his generation. The public was thoroughly prepared to receive his doctrines gladly when, in 1849, he published the most successful and famous of his contributions to theological literature, Christian Dogmatics, which has been translated into most European languages, even into modern Greek, and has exercised as wide an influence on Protestant thought as any volume of our century. In Germany it has enjoyed a popular reputation even wider than in Scandinavia, and has been honored by a formal refutation from the propaganda at Rome. It was not, however, unchallenged at home, a severe attack upon it having been made by Nissen in 1851, and supported secretly by Kirkegaard (q. v.). In 1854, when bishop Myntset died, Martensen, who had refused the bishopric of Slesvig, accepted the primacy of Denmark, and began his administrative labors in the Church with acts of great heroism and determination. In consequence cordially detested, and violently attacked by all those sections of the Danish Lutheran body which wavered to this side or to that from a hierarchic orthodoxy. A great part of Martensen's time and energy henceforth was taken up with polemics against Grundtvig, Nielsen, the Catholics, and the Irvingites. Many of his later writings are of this purely controversial character, his Exposition of the So-called Grundtvigianism, which he styled "a leaven, but not a principle," his Catholicism and Protestantism, against the teachings of the Vatican Council, his Den Catholicisme and Christendom. The time at his command, after faithful administration of his duties, was, during his earlier years, devoted to the preparation of his System of Christian Ethics (1871–79; German, 1878–79; English, 1873–89) and his plans to execute the work in the line of his early studies of the mystics, on the Mystics (1879; German, 1882; English, by T. Rysh Evans, 1885).

As a fitting conclusion of his literary activity, he published his Autobiography (1888). Dr. Martensen died, Feb. 8, 1884, and was buried with great solemnity in his own cathedral of Our Lady. The king and the Conservative party knew what they owed to the rigid Tory prelate, whose face was set like a dint against the modern spirit in politics, in literature, in philosophy. He was a great man, a man who did honor to Denmark. It is not the critics of his own country only, it is the more impartial Germans, who have declared Hans Lassen Martensen to be the greatest Protestant theologian of the present century. Martigny, Alexandre, a French archeologist, was born April 22, 1806, at Sauverny, France. He received holy orders in 1832, and died Aug. 19, 1860, at Bayeux. He is the author of the famous Dictionnaire des Antiquités Christiennes (Paris, 1864; 2d ed. 1877). In 1855 he published a French translation of De Rossi's Bulletin de la Société d'Études Cristianes (B. P. G.)

Martin, better known as abbé Chaffrey, a Roman Catholic French writer, was born at Abries in 1818. In 1830 he received holy orders, and was appointed professor at the seminary in Embrun. He was honorary canon of different chapters, and died at Paris in 1872. He published, Le Panorama des Publications (1861–55, 5 vols.; 1861–68;—La Bibliographie des Précédéateurs (1867–68, 4 vols.);—Théologie Morale en Tableaux (1857);—Rapport de la Doctrine Chrétienne (1857; 2d ed. 1859–63, 3 vols.);—Portraits Litéraires des Plus Célèbres Précédéateurs Contemporains (1859);—Mémoires de Précédéateurs (4 vols.; 1861–64);—Mémoires Nouveaux sur les Mystères de Notre Seigneur Jésus-Christ (1860, 2 vols.);—Vies des Saints à l'Usage des Précédéateurs (1861–68, 4 vols.). logic, intellectual and moral philosophy, in the University of New York city, which position he held until his death, Dec. 26, 1883. Among the clergy and literary circles professor Martin enjoyed a large acquaintance. He was very popular among the students, and gave up his whole time to the university. He contributed largely to many religious journals, and was the author of several books. One of his many lectures was delivered before the Yale Theological School, entitled The Theology of the Doctrine of the Forces. See N. Y. Observer, Jan. 3, 1884; Cong. Year-book, 1884, p. 93. (W. P. S.)

Martin, Bon-Louis Henri, a celebrated French historian, was born at St. Quentin, Feb. 20, 1810. He studied at Dijon, Paris, and all the young men of his epoch, fell under the influence of the romantic school, and commenced his literary career with writing verses for periodicals. But he soon betook himself to his life-long study of the history of France. Paul Larroux suggested that Martin should help him in preparing an immense historical work in forty-eight volumes. It was not to be a history of France, but a collection of extracts from chronicles and histories, extending from the earliest period to 1830. The first volume appeared in 1833, when Martin's colleague deserted him, and he encountered difficulties in 1836. He wrote the first volume of a history of Sciences; and believing his studies had fitted him for the task, he commenced the prodigious labor of writing a complete history of France. His interest in the history of the Gauls makes his first volumes more attractive of all. As successive editions were called for, he spent his time in adding to, revising, and completing, his book. He published, in 1870, entirely an extension of the knowledge of the time. In 1878 and 1879 he published a history of France from the oldest times to 1600, in four volumes, and added in 1886 to his great work. In 1878 he was elected a member of the Académie Française, in place of Thiéry. Martin died Dec. 14, 1888. With him expired the last of the great historians bred in the school of Thiéry. See Hambouz, Henri Martin (Paris, 1865). (B. P.)

Martin, Conrad, a Roman Catholic prelate of Germany, was born May 18, 1812, at Grisemar, Prussia, and studied under Allioli and Dollinger, as well as under Genesius, Tholuck, and Tuch. For some time religious instructor at Cologne, Martin was, in 1844, appointed professor and inspector of the clerical seminary in that city. In 1856 he was elected bishop of Paderborn, and from that time was the obedient servant of the papal see. As a member of the Vatican Council, he belonged to those bishops who advocated the infallibility of the pope. He was the first who openly protested against the Prussian Magistracy of 1873, and thus he came into conflict with the government. He was fined, and finally imprisoned at Wesel. He escaped into Belgium, and died in exile, July 19, 1879, at St. Guibert. He was buried at Paderborn. He wrote, Lehrbuch der katholischen Religion für höhere Lehranstalten (5th ed. Mayence, 1873);—Lehrbuch der katholischen Moral (5th ed. ibid. 1865). —Die Wissenschaft von den göttlichen Dingen (2d ed. ibid. 1869). —Die Arbeiten des vatikanischen Konzils (Paderborn, 1870). —L'actuïmi Comitéi Documentarum Collecto (ibid. 1871). —Drei Jahre aus meinem Leben (Mayence, 1875), describing his imprisonment and escape.—Niekerk bei Jesu- seits (ibid. 1877). —Zeitbilder (ibid. 1879, posthumous). Martin, Jacques, a Protestant theologian of Geneva, was born in 1794. While yet a student, he was obliged to take part in the campaigns against Germany; in the first Napoleonic invasion. He fought in the battles at Leipzig and Waterloo, and in 1815 went to Geneva. For two years he followed commercial pursuits, and then betook himself to theological study. In 1818 he was enrolled as a student, and in 1822 graduated, presenting for his thesis, L'Unité de la Foi.

Martin soon distinguished himself both as an instructor and pulpit orator, and his writings were not only reprinted, but some of them, as L'Oratio Dominica- cole, were even translated into other languages. He died in 1874. See Bouvier, Jacques Martin, Publicateur Pastorale, in the Etudes Religieuses (1877), and the same author's Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, a. v. (B. P.)

Martin, James, D.D., an Associate minister, was born at Albany, N. Y., May 2, 1796. He graduated from Union College, Schenectady, in 1819, and after a course in theology in the theological seminary of Philadelphiana, commenced preaching on Sept. 2, 1822, and was soon after called to charge of an Associate Reformed congregation at Albany. He edited the Religious Monitor in 1833. In 1842 he was elected professor of didactic theology and Hebrew in the theological seminary at Cannonsburg, Pa. He died June 15, 1846. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, IX, iii, 112.

Martin, Johann, a Reformed theologian, who died at Gruiningen in 1665, is the author of, Analyxis Popula- ris in Malachium Prophetaem: —Analyxis Populairis in Epistolas ad Philippenses et Thessaloniciens. See Bentheim, Holländischer Kirchen-Staats- Jocher; Algetz, Kirchen-Staats- Jocher. (B. P.)

Martin (Parchot), Joseph, a Protestant theologian, was born at Ivrea, Oct. 14, 1802. He studied at Geneva, was for some time pastor at Lumenay, and in 1829 at Lyons, where he labored with his former class- mate, Adolphe Monod. In 1837 he was called to Paris, but after two years of work was obliged to retire from the active ministry for a time on account of an incurable disease. In 1839 he commenced publishing a monthly journal, entitled Le Disciple de Jésus Christ. In 1853 he founded L'Alliance Chrétienne Universelle. On the following basis he set up the Crenc and Father of all men; love of all men, the immortal creatures and children of God; love of Jesus Christ, the son of God and Saviour of mankind." Adolphe Monod was the first who wrote against the principles of this journal. In 1861 the consistory of Paris appointed the younger Athanasé Coquerel as his assistant, and made him retire, under the pretext of beryc, in 1864. In spite of the protests of his medical advisers, Martin resumed his ministerial functions. In 1868 he succeeded Athanasé Coquerel, the father, as president of the presbytery. He died May 14, 1873, at Lyons, in the 71st year of his age. See Lichtenberg, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, a. v. (B. P.)

Martin, Samuel, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Chesterfield Level, Lancaster Co., Pa., Jan. 9, 1767. He was converted in his twenty-second year, graduated from the Union University of Pennsylvania in 1790, was licensed by the Baltimore Presbytery in May, 1788, and soon after was installed pastor of the congregation at Slateridge, York Co., laboring there faithfully for five years, and then accepted a call from the congregation of Chamesfors, where he remained until 1812. He died June 29, 1845. Dr. Martin published several ser- mons: two in which the doctrine of election is proved and illustrated (1806); one on Regeneration, printed in the Synod Street Lectures; and one entitled Children are an Heritage of the Lord. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, IX, iii, 292. (B. P.)

Massa. The ruins of this strongtown, now called Seebach, are minutely delineated in the Memoire accompanying the Ordinance Survey (iii, 417 sq.). See also Tristram, Land of Moab, p. 46 sq. The following, from Conder's Tent Work (ii, 140), embraces the chief points:

"The rock of Massa measures 550 yards east and west, by 450 yards north and south, and its cliffs are 1000 feet in height above the plain on the east. Two paths lead up to the plateau on the top, that on the east being a winding ascent, now almost impassable, but by which Captain Warren went up; this is apparently the path called the 'Serpent's' by Josephus. The second path on the west, ascends from a narrow sloping bank of white marl, which is about 1000 feet high, and which Josephus calls the 'White Promontory;' upon this rises the great ramp, about 800 feet high, which the Roman piled up against the rock during the siege. The reason why it seems almost incredible that human efforts could have accomplished it in so short a time. At the top of the ramp the masonry wall which the builders have built as a foundation for their engines, before discovering the great tragedy that had been connected within the fortress, where the garrison had fallen by one another's swords. "A fatiguing climb brought me to the plateau at the top. Here is a polished arched archway, indicated by masons, and scored with the tribe-marks of the Jews and Roshbelden Arabs, which were on a former occasion mistakes by a distinguished Frenchman for planetary signs. "We fell to work at once with tape and compass to plan and describe the masts. The buildings are principally on the north-eastern part of the rock, and there are of various dates. The most ancient appear to be the long rude walls, resembling the buildings at Herodion (debel Petreul), but the majority of the masonry is to be ascribed to the Christians of the 6th or 13th centuries. There is a chapel on the plateau, and also a cave, in which I found a curious inscription with crosses, which is, apparently, a new discovery. It is painted in red, and resembles some of the 12th and 13th century inscriptions near Jericho. "The most extraordinary feature of this most remarkable place has yet to be noticed. The Romans to their attack on Massa followed the same method which had reduced Jerusalem. On the south-eastern part of the unhappy mountainous wall of circumvallation. Looking down from the summit, the ruins of the wall—a dreary precipice, running across the plain and up the southern hill, could be distinctly traced. "Two large camps, also walled with stone, lay spread out behind this line on the west and east, and six smaller ones, like redoubts, on the low ground; the entire length of the wall was not less than 2000 yards, as on our plan, and the whole remains almost as it was left eighteen hundred years ago."

Massbeathans, the disciples of Masbeathus, who is said by some of the ancients to have been a follower of Simon Magus (q. v.).

Masius, Hector Gottfried, a Lutheran theologian, was born April 13, 1653. He studied at different universities, went to France in 1682 as chaplain to the Danish embassy, and was made in 1685 doctor and professor of theology at Copenhagen. He died Sept. 27, 1709, leaving, Defensae de Religion Lutheranae:—Re- vicius de dem Unterschied der lutherischen und reformierten Lehre:—De Profanatione Iustitiae Constantin:—De Pauli Pauli:—Scholasticum Trivia Sacra, Schleicht 1, 2, Condatum Conciliis Tridentinis; 2, De Polymathia Scripturum Sacrorum; 3, De Synagoga, Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theolog. MASON, Sumer R., D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Cheshire, Berkshire Co., Mass., June 14, 1818. He was for two years a member of Yale College (1839-1841). He became a member of the Baptist Church in New Haven, and devoted the next seven years to teaching, most of the time in Nashville, Tenn., where he was licensed to preach, Sept. 7, 1844; and studied theology under Rev. Dr. Howell. He was ordained pastor of the First Baptist Church, Lockport, N. Y., Aug. 22, 1849; then became pastor of the First Baptist Church in Cambridge, Mass., March 4, 1855, where he continued an able and successful minister until his death, Aug. 26, 1871. A volume of his sermons and essays, edited by Rev. A. Hovey, D.D., with a sketch of his life and character (by G. A. Storrs, D.D.), was issued by the Riverside (Cambridge) press in 1874. (J. C. S.)

Massaro, Robert, D.D., an Irish Methodist preacher, was born at Londonderry in 1790. He joined the Methodist society in his eighteenth year, and in 1811 entered the ministry of the Irish Church. He was a pious, prudent, intelligent, and devoted Methodist preacher for nearly fifty years, and in 1859, from failing health, became a superannuumary, but as a scholar and gentleman he continued to labor as treasurer of the Methodist Annuitant Society and Auxiliary Fund, and closed his useful life in Dublin, March 3, 1871. He filled several official positions in Irish Methodism, was an able advocate of the British and Foreign Bible Society, and a useful guide to young ministers in studying the original text of the Holy Scriptures.

Massoch, Stephen C., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, first appears in the records as a missionary in St. Louis, Mo., in 1857, and remained there until 1859, when he was appointed to the "Mission of the North-west," which was then under the jurisdiction of Joseph C. Talbot, D.D., missionary bishop. Dr. Massoch was especially to minister to the Germans and Bohemians in Osage, Neb. Shortly after, he removed to Fort Leavenworth, and in 1854, from failing health, became a superannuumary, but as a scholar and gentleman he continued to labor as treasurer of the Methodist Annuitant Society and Auxiliary Fund, and closed his useful life in Dublin, March 3, 1871. He filled several official positions in Irish Methodism, was an able advocate of the British and Foreign Bible Society, and a useful guide to young ministers in studying the original text of the Holy Scriptures.

Math, the residence of a monastic community among the Hindis. It consists of a number of buildings, including a set of huts or chambers for the Mathiast or superior, and his resident Chela or disciples; a temple sacred to the deity whom they worship, or the Samadh, or shrine of the founder of the sect, or some eminent teacher; and one or more sheds or buildings for the accommodation of the mendicants or travellers who are constantly visiting the Math, both ingress and egress being free to all. The number of permanent pupils at a Math ranges from three or four to thirty or forty; besides whom there is also a considerable number of out-door members. Most of the Mathas have a small endowment of land, which they either let at a fixed rental, or cultivate on their own account. Besides this they receive generous contributions from lay votaries, alms gathered by members who go out to seek them, and the profits arising from traffic covetiously carried on.

Matahna (ματάθνα, a lesion), a name usually given in the ancient Greek writers to the creed, probably because the catechumens were obliged to learn it.

R. Cotton, LL.D., an English Congregational minister, was born at New Windsor, Manchester, Nov. 8, 1606. He graduated from Glasgow University, studied two years at Homerton Theological College, was ordained June 11, 1633, and the same year proceeded to India in the service of the London Missionary Society, settling in Benares, where he resided till May, 1838, then left for Mizapore, in order to establish a new mission in that city, laboring there the rest of his missionary life with great success. He wrote tracts, theological treatises, and works of a varied character, both in Hindú and Urdu. He died April 21, 1787. See (Lon.) Evangelical Magazine, July, 1877, p. 220; (Lon.) Cong. Yearbook, 1876, p. 925.

Mathieu, Jacques Marie Adrien Césaire, a French prelate, was born at Paris, Jan. 28, 1798. He studied law, but afterwards betook himself to the study of theology, entered the seminary of St. Sulpice, was ordained priest, and became secretary to the bishop of Evreux in 1823. In 1833 he was appointed bishop of Langres, and in the following year he was raised to the archbishopric of Besancon. In 1860 he was made cardinal. As a member of the senate he was a zealous defender of the rights of the Church, and, in spite of the interdict of the government, he published the papal encyclical of Dec. 8, 1864. Mathieu died at Besancon, 1875. Of his brochure on the mission of France see the Encyclopédie de la Vie Chrétienne (1888). See Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Matsyavatara, in Hindu mythology, is the incarnation of Vishnu as a fish, the Majádha, with the surname Cesá. The facts are told as follows: Brahma had fallen asleep, the giant Hayaitsa stole from the sleeping god the four Vedas, the laws of the world, and the lawless world now sank into the kingdom of night. Then Vishnu saved the world in the form of a fish, by following the giant, who hid under the sea, and compelling him to surrender the books.

Mattheson, L. J., D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Laurens, Otsego Co., N. Y. He pursued his studies at Hamilton, graduating from the college there in 1858, and from the theological seminary in 1860. His pastorates were at Watertown and Sing Sing, Brattleboro., Vt., and Troy and Cortland, N. Y., where he died, May 5, 1878. (J. C. S.)

Matthew, John, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Spring Garden, N. C., Jan. 19, 1772. He was licensed to preach in 1801, by the Presbytery of Orange, and crossed the desert country to Natchez, Miss., acting as a missionary there. In April, 1803, he returned to North Carolina, and shortly after received a call to the churches of Natchez and Grassy Creek, where he continued till 1806, then removed to Martinsburg, Va., and after a year resigned this for the charge at Shepherdstown. Here he continued till 1836, preaching as stated supply of this Church and that of Charlestown, and frequently also at Harper's Ferry. He next took a charge at Martinsburg and Charles town, and when the theological seminary was established at Hanover, Ind., he was invited to become professor. He died at New Albany, May 19, 1848. His publications are, Letters on the Divine Purpose, and The Influence of the Bible.

Matthew, John Daniel, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Shepherdstown, Va., June 9, 1805. He graduated from Jefferson College in 1827, and from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1831. He was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of Georgia, became a stated supply of St. Mary's in 1832, and subsequently of the First Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia. In 1835-36 he was installed pastor of Opequon and Cedarville churches. He became pastor of the Church at Norfolk in 1837, and after five years removed to the McChord Church, Lexington, Ky. After this he supplied the churches of Hopewell, Paducah, and Henderson. For six years he was superintendent of public instruction in Kentucky, after which he supplied the churches of Jackson Street, Mobile; Second Church, Baltimore; New York Avenue Church, Washington City; Portland Avenue Church, Louisville, Ky., and Demorest, Tex. He died at Dallas, March 7, 1884. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem., 1884, p. 18.

Matthews, Joseph M'Dowell, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Augusta County, Va., Dec. 8, 1804. At the age of ten he removed with his parents to Kentucky, and, settling on a farm, was given a thorough private academical education, which he increased by personal effort. He joined the Church at the age of eighteen, was licensed to preach in 1825, in 1827 began a school or academy for boys in Hillsborough, O., which he continued till 1831, when he entered the Ohio Conference. In 1831-32 he served the Church in Chillicothe, and in 1833 in Cincinnati. There his health failed, and he retired to a farm, where he spent nearly six years. In 1839 he opened the Oakland Female Seminary, where he did noble work until 1856, when he took charge of the Hillisborough Female College. In 1860 he became president of Jessamine Female College, Nicholasville, Ky., but in 1863 returned to Hillsborough, and opened a private boarding-school. In 1872 he again accepted a call to the presidency of Hillsborough Female College, where he remained until ill-health led him, in 1877, to resign his office, and retire to his home in the vicinity of Hillsborough. He died, Aug. 5, 1879. See Minutes of Annual Fall Conferences, 1879, p. 15.

Matthews, Robert C., D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Shepherdstown, Va., April 2, 1822. He was educated in Illinois, where he practiced law until he was converted, then, after two or three years in the theological seminary, was ordained and installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Monmouth, Ill., Dec. 20, 1852. His labors in this Church were attended with great success; he died there, Nov. 15, 1881. See N. P. Obser., Dec. 1, 1881. (W. P. S.)

Matthiä, Christian, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born in 1854. He studied at Strasburg and Giessen, was in 1814 rector at the gymnasium in Durlach, in 1818 professor of theology at Altoldorf, in 1829 professor at Sora, in Denmark, in 1820 at Leyden, and in 1842 pastor of the Lutheran congregation at the Hague. In 1845 he resigned his position, retired to Utrecht, and died Jan. 22, 1855. He wrote, Exeretatis Metaphysicae zii.—Methodica Scripturae Sacrae Loca Vindicandi Ratio.—Historia Pastoricae.—Antiqua Typoi Evangelii Matthii.—Epistolologica Bibli- co,-etc. See Moller, Cimbria Litterarum; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Matthiä, Wolf Christian, a Lutheran theologian of Denmark, was born Jan. 28, 1734. He studied at Kiel, was in 1762 military preacher, in 1770 pastor at Rendsburg, in 1778 member of consistory, and died Jan. 29, 1787. He wrote, Dias. Historia Samuela, Sauli et Davida, ad Amorum rationes Digesta (Kiel, 1752)—Beschreibung der Kirchenverfassung in den Herzog- thümern Schweflcy und Holstein (Flensburg, 1776-86, 2 vols.)—Schriftstellerische Betrachtungen über das Leiden und Sterben der Marteryen (Kiel, 1786). See Dorner, Die celebri- ten Theologen Deutschlands, s. v.; Wiener, Handbuch der theol. Lit., i, 833. (B. P.)

Matthä, in Roman mythology, was originally an ancient Italian goddess of day-dawn, and later confounded with Lenoea (q. v.), and with Alburna (q. v.). Her festival was celebrated June 11, at which mothers took the children of their sisters on their arms, because Ino (Leucothea) had brought up her sister's son, Bacchus.

Mauchart, Immanuel David, a Lutheran theo- logian of Germany, was born June 2, 1754, at Tübingen, was in 1783 dean at Nürtingen, in 1806 superintendent at Neuen, Württemberg, and died Feb. 6, 1806. He wrote, Aphorismen über das Erinnerungsengel in Berührung auf den Zustand nach dem Tode (Tübingen, 1792) Kirschliche Statistik des Königreichs Württemberg evangelisch lutherischer Antheile (Stuttgart, 1812) — An- wandtliche für Confraternen und Neuenfimtert (Tü- bingen, 1795). See Wiener, Handbuch der theol. Lit., i, 477, 489, ii, 974. (I. P.)

Maai fata (altar-raising), a religious ceremony in Polynesia. Numbers of figs, with abundance of plant- tains, were placed upon the altars, which were newly ornamented with branches of the sacred mirco, and yellow flowers of the cocoyam-tree. These rites extended to every marae in the island, and were designed to se- cure rain and fertility for the country gained by con- quest or recovered from invasion.

Mauksch, Johann, a Lutheran theologian of Ger- many, was born Aug. 14, 1817. He studied at Leipsic, and died at Danzic, June 8, 1868, doctor and professor of theology. He wrote, Nota Philologic-Theologic Notitiae Dei Naturaeem Dei Selecta Scripturae Dictata Explicatae—Paulus anti-Calciniani, Absolutum De- cretam per Tatum Epistolam ad Romans Eludens:—Scripta anti-Papistica:—Exeretatis de Univer- sitatis Greciae:—De Ecclesia in Oecumenicae Progrommate de Propagatione Mensis ex Ps. I. de Altemut Mosaicz en Ps. ex. 7, etc. See Witt, Memoria Theologorum; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Maupertuis (or Maupertusts), Jean-Baptiste Didier de, a French ecclesiastical writer, was born at Paris in 1750. He was educated at the Jesuit college of Louis-le-Grand, and for a time dedicated himself to poetry and literature. In spite of his talents he did not achieve anything, owing to the life of dispara-

Maurer, Franz Joseph Valentin Domink, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Rothen- well, Feb. 14, 1755. In 1820 he received holy orders, but in 1821 joined the Evangelical Church. For some time he was collaborator at the Thomas School in Leipzig, but afterwards retired to Stuttgart, devoting himself entirely to literary work. He died in 1856. He published, Commentarius über das Buch Josua (Stuttgart, 1831) Commentarius Grammaticus Criticus in Loc. Testamentum (Leipsic, 1853, vol. i contains all the historical books, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Lamentations; vol. ii, Ezekiel, Daniel, and the minor prophets; vol. iii, Psalms and Proverbs). There is great disproportion in the mode of treatment. All the historical books from Genesis to Esther are comprised in two hundred and fifty pages, and it is only after Isaiah that the treat- ment of the minor prophets is commenced, and then very valu- able. Maurer's work was continued by August Heil- igstedt. Besides, Maurer published, Praktischerer Cursus über die Formenlehre der hebr. Sprache (Leipsic, 1855):— Kurzerfasseter bekräftiger u. chalädischer Wörter- buch (Stuttgart, 1851). See Wiener, Handbuch der theol. Lit., i, 14, 194, 203; Zuchold, Bibl. Theol., ii, 861 q.; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. J., iii, 385 q. (B. P.)

Mauritian Creole Version of the Script- urs. This version is intended for the mixed popula- tion of Mauritius. A translation of the gospel of Mat- thew was made by the Rev. S. H. Anderson, who was born in Mauritius, and spent thirty-two years on the island, ten of which he was minister to the Protestant negroes. The same gentlemen also states that the Mauritian Creole is spoken by 550,000 of the 600,000 inhabitants of the island, and that it is the only medium of communication among all the languages and dialects of the island. Mr. Anderson's translation was published during the year 1884 by the British and Foreign Bible Society, and as the report of that society for 1885 states, "the whole consignment was bought up before it was even unpacked, and that half of it was secured by the bishop Royton for the inhabitants of Seychelles." (B. P.)

Mauritii, Friedrich Maximilian, a Lutheran theo- logian of Germany, was born at Basle, Aug. 17, 1724. He studied at Halle, was for some time private tutor, in 1757 rector at Minden, in 1769 professor of theology and member of consistory at Biszow, and died March 1775. See Per, P. Theologorum, xii, 21. Peters, Des perennium et floridae creditum ex Psal. 7, etc. See Witt, Memoria Theologorum; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Mauritius, Caspar, a Lutheran theologian of Ger- many, was born March 2, 1615. He studied at Rostock and Königsberg, was in 1644 professor at Rostock, in 1650 doctor of theology, in 1662 pastor at Hamburg, and died April 14, 1675. He wrote, Exercitatio Colocientissimae, Logique, Politique;—In Formulacre Conformatio;—Theses de Confessional et Absol- lutione Priscac:—Disertationes de Gratia Irresistibilis:
Maurus, a Scotch prelate, was first abbot of Inchaclaire, a rural and remote bishop of the see of Dunblane in 1319. He was bishop there in 1333. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 175.

Mauro ura (the red sash), a very sacred relic, held in the highest estimation by the natives of Tahiti, one of the Society Islands. It was a piece of network, about seven inches wide and six feet long, upon which the red sash of the sacred image of the deified god was fastened. It was used in the inauguration of their greatest kings, just as the crown is with us, and the most honorable appellation which a chief could receive was Ariti mauro ura, King of the Red Sash. A new piece, about eighteen inches in length, was attached at the inauguration of every sovereign; to accomplish which several human victims were required. The first was for the mua reni, or the stretching it upon pegs in order to attach to it the new piece. Another was necessary for the fastu reni, or attaching the new portion; and a third for the paio reni, or stretching the sacred image over the new sash. This not only invested the sash itself with a high measure of solemn importance, but also rendered the chiefs who wore it most noble in public estimation. See Williams, Narrative of Missionary Enterprises in the South Sea Islands.

Mausoleum, a name originally applied to the magnificent sepulchre erected by Artemisia, at Halicarnassus, B.C. 582, to the memory of her husband, Mausolus, king of Caria. The term now designates this costly tomb.

Maut (or Mut), a chief Egyptian goddess, the wife of Amen-Ra, and the second member of the great Theban triad. She was considered as the mother goddess par excellence, or the great receptive female principle; and she was generally represented as seated upon a throne, wearing either the Pahtet, or sacred double crown, or else the body and plumes of a vulture as her head-dress. She was dressed in a long robe, often richly ornamented, and she held in her right hand the usual Oraz-ansata, and in her left the papyrus staff of the goddesses. Her chief titles were, “The Mother,” “The Lady of Heaven,” and “The Regent of all the Gods.” The vulture was both her symbol and her sacred bird. Her analogues were in some of her attributes, the Coele and Cabele and Thermisia of the Greeks, and possibly the Bone Dea of the Romans.

Maxwell, John, D.D., a Scotch prelate, was first minister at Minnich, and then in the city of Edinburgh in 1620. He was advanced to the see of Ross in 1633; deprived in 1638, and fled to England for protection. He died Feb. 14, 1644. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 209.

Maxwell, Robert, a Scotch prelate, was rector of Forbolton in 1521, and soon after provost of the collegiate church in Dunbarton. He was bishop of Orkney till after 1536. He built the steeple in his cathedral, and furnished the steeple with a set of bells. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 229.

Maxwell, John Heinrich (1), a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Feb. 5, 1658. He studied at Wittenberg, where he was professor of Oriental languages at Giessen, and after Sept. 3, 1719, doctor of theology. He published, De Canone Veteris Test. (Giessen, 1689) — Annales mundi apud uulgares Coclevi Lexem (Frankfort, 1689, fol.; 2d ed. 1714) — Dissertatio IV de Sacra Scriptura (ibid. 1690) — Selectiv. Vet. Testamenti Oracula Explicata, etc. (ed. 1692) — Biblia Hebraica (ibid. 1692) — De Lustrationibus et Purificationibus Hebræorum (ibid. ed.) — De Sylva Ura Symbolica (ibid. ed.) — Theologia Dorstina (ibid. 1693) — Liberatus Logica Eiusque Accumulationibus Necestis et Utilibus (ibid. 1696) — Theologia Jeremiana (ibid. 1708) — Theologia Structura (ibid. 1704), etc. See Doring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, s. v. (where 105 titles of his writings are given); Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. Maust; Joücher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexicon, s. v. "Maxus." (B. P.)

May, Johann Heinrich (2), a German theologian, son of the foregoing, was born at Durlach, March 11, 1688. He studied at Altdorf and Jena, was professor at Giessen, and died June 13, 1732. He published, De Jure Anni Seculi Christi Gregis (Giessen, 1707) — Monumen. Trott. de Jure Anni Septimi et Jubilei (1708) — Juris Funda- tura (1710) — D. Isaacii Abenbolnii de legislanturius (1712) — Observationes Sacrae (1719-18) — 1716-27) — Diss. de Scheuchsz (1728) — De Turra Pontificiæ Maxi- timi (1728) — De Aria et Altiviria Veteran (1732). See Doring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, s. v. Joücher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexicon, s. v. "Mauzel." (B. P.)

Mayan Version of the Scriptures. Mayan is the vernacular of a tribe of Indians inhabiting Yucatan, a peninsula to the east of Mexico, projecting northward between the gulf of Mexico and the Caribbean sea. In 1654 only a part of the gospel of Luke was published by the British and Foreign Bible Society in this dialect. In 1859 the gospel of John was published in England, the translation having been made by the Rev. R. Fletcher. See Bible of Every Land, p. 468. (B. P.)

Mayer, Georg Karl Wilhelm, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born in 1807 at Aschaffenburg, Franconia, where he received his holy orders in 1837, was cathedral chaplain at Bamberg in 1836, in 1842 was appointed professor of theology at the lyceum, in 1862 member of the chapter, and died July 22, 1868. He wrote, Geist und Natur im spezifischen Systeme Giessers (Bamberg, 1842) — Der Mensch nach der Glaubenslehre der alten Kirche (1854, 5 vols.) — Commentator über die Briefe des Johannes (Vienna, 1851) — Aechttheit des Evangeliums nach Johannes (ibid. 1854) — Die patriarchalischen Verhältnisse und die messianischen Pfaltzen (Nördlingen, 1859) — Menologische Prophethethi (Vienna, 1868-66, 2 vols.). (B. P.)

Mayrthai, a future Buddha, who is said to appear at the end of five thousand years from the death of Gotama Buddha, and will continue for ages to be the teacher of the human race.

Mayronius, François, a Franciscan, and doctor of the Sorbonne, styled doctor illuminatus, who died in 1525, is the author of, Commentaris in Genesis: — De Articulis Fidei, Compendium Librarum S. Augustini de Civitate Dei: — Comment. in Augustini Librum Contra Julianum: — Comment. in Dionysium Areopagitetum de Mystica Theologia: — 1500 Questions de Variâ Locis Sacrorum Scripturarum et Dubia Theologiæ: — Comment. in Orationem Didaci, etc. See Gasdill, De Scriptoriis Ecclesiasticiis; Joücher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexicon, s. v. (B. P.)

McAll, Robert Stephens, LL.D., an English Congregational minister, was born at Plymouth, Aug. 2, 1792. He was educated at Hoxton Academy and at the University of Edinburgh, studying medicine chiefly. At the age of twenty-one he became pastor at Macleod. In January, 1827, he accepted the charge of the Mosley Street Church, Manchester, where he died, July 27, 1838. He was a preacher of rare eloquence. See (Lowd.) Erang. Magazine, January, 1839, p. 1.

Macleay, Catherine, foundress of the Sisters of Mercy, was born in Edinburgh, Scotland, Sept. 29, 1737. When of age she formed a regular system for the distribution of food and clothing to the needy, and called in the lame and blind to partake of her bounty. She also erected, in 1824, a large building in a fashionable quarter of Dublin. She made a novitiate at the Presentation Convent in Dublin, professed Dec. 12, 1831, and was appointed by the archbishop superior of her order, the objects of which were, the education of the poor and the protection of good women in distress. When the cholera visited Dublin, in 1832, she and her sisters nursed the hospital patients until they recovered. The women admitted into her houses of refuge were taught various useful employments, and, as soon as possible, provided with good situations. Her order developed rapidly. Many ladies of distinction joined it. Houses were established in New York, and houses were founded in Ireland during her lifetime, and two in England, and in the course of forty years there were over two hundred convents of the order in Great Britain, United States, Newfoundland, South America, Australia, and New Zealand, with more than three thousand sisters. She died in Dublin, Nov. 17, 1845. Her life was written by Mother Austin of New Orleans (New York, 1866). See (N. Y.) Cath. Almanac, 1882, p. 73.

McBride, John, a very prominent minister of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland during its early history, who suffered persecution from the Established Church because he boldly advocated the rights of independence, was a native of Ireland, educated at the University of Glasgow, where he was enrolled in 1666. About 1670 he was ordained by the Presbytery of Tyrone to the pastoral charge of the congregation of Clow, in the county of Armagh, where he officiated nearly twenty years. In 1694 he succeeded Rev. Patrick Adair as minister of the Belfast congregation, where he labored until his death in 1718. He was a popular preacher, and an able and expert disputant. See Reid, Hist. of the Preb. Church in Ireland.

McCabe, Edward, a Roman Catholic prelate, was born in Dublin in 1816. In 1866 he was appointed parish priest of St. Nicholas, one of the poorest and most populous localities in Dublin. Archbishop Cullen appointed him one of his vicars-general in 1863, transferring him to the important parish of Kingstown. In 1873 he was appointed bishop of Galway. In 1876 he was appointed bishop-auxiliary. He was confirmed cardinal by the pope, March 24, 1879, and died Feb. 18, 1885.

McCabe, James D., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was rector of a church in Wheeling, Va., in 1853; in 1857 he was serving in Baltimore, being rector of St. Stephen's; in 1861 he was rector of St. James' Parish, Travey's Landing, Md., where he remained until 1867, when he was chosen rector of Zion Church, in Urbana; to this charge he was added the pastorate of St. Peter's, Montgomery County, in 1871. In 1878 he was elected in Baltimore without regular charge. He died Apr. 1, 1875, in his forty-seven years. See Prot. Epic. Almanac, 1876, p. 149.

McCabe, John Collins, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, ordained deacon in 1847, was rector for many years in Hampton, Va., until 1855 or 1856; then he became rector of the Church of the Ascension, Baltimore, Md., remaining until 1860, when he accepted the call to the rectorate of St. James' Church, West River, and remained until 1863. Subsequently he went to Virginia, and, immediately after the civil war in the South, became rector of St. Matthew's Church, Bladensburg; in 1868 he was rector of St. Ann's, Middletown, Del.; in 1876 rector of Trinity, Chambersburg, Penn. He died Feb. 27, 1875, aged sixty-five years. See Prot. Epic. Almanac, 1876, p. 149.

McCaffrey, John, D.D., a Roman Catholic scholar and divine, was born at Emmitsburg, Md., Sept. 6, 1806. He was educated at Mount St. Mary's College and Theological Seminary, which was founded in 1828, at which time he was ordained priest in 1831, priest in 1838, and was almost immediately made president of that college, a position which he resigned in 1871. He was twice offered the mitre, but declined. He died at the college, Sept. 25, 1881. See (N. Y.) Cath. Almanac, 1882, p. 64.

McClure, Alexander, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Hanover, Washington Co., Pa., Sept. 22, 1817. He graduated from Washington College in 1841, after which he entered upon a course of theological training. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Washington in 1845, and ordained an evangelist; served for a time the churches of Wolf Run and Unity as a stated supply, and afterwards at Clayville, where he was installed, Dec. 6, 1852. He died there, April 18, 1881. See Nevin, Presb. Encyclopedia n. v. (W. P. S.)

McClinktock, John David, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Nicholas County, Ky., Feb. 24, 1838, and was graduated from Hanover College, Ind., in 1858, and from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1862; was licensed by Philadelphia Central Presbytery the same year, and ordained an evangelist, April 11, 1864, by Ebenezer Presbytery, at Augusta, Ky. He first supplied the Church of Flemingsburg in 1862; in November, 1865, he was called by Mother of God, and was transferred to the Western (now Huntington) Church, doing evangelistic work until April, 1865, when he took charge as stated supply of Catlettsburg Church, Ky., in connection with Huntington Church; was installed pastor of the latter Church, June 7, 1873, by Greenbrier Presbytery, and released May 15, 1876; installed pastor of Columbus Church, Miss., by the Presbytery of Tombeckbee, April 29, 1877, a relation which he held until his death, Dec. 12, 1881. See Necrolog Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1882, p. 54.

McCluskey, John (1), D.D., a Roman Catholic prelate, was born at Brooklyn, N. Y., March 20, 1810. He studied at Mount St. Mary's College and Seminary, Emmitsburg, Md.; was ordained priest, Jan. 9, 1834; studied two years in Rome, and one in France, and on his return became pastor of St. Joseph's Church, New York. He became first president of St. John's College, Fordham; in 1842 resumed the rectoryship of St. Joseph's Church; in 1843 was coadjutor of Bishop Hughes; in 1847 first bishop of Albany; in 1866 archbishop of New York; in 1875 cardinal-priest; and in 1878 cardinal of the Catholic Church. He died Oct. 10, 1886, at New York, as a very zealous prelate, establishing religious and charitable houses in his diocese, and actively promoting the interests of his Church.

McCluskey, John (2), D.D., a Roman Catholic divine, was born at Carlow, Ireland, in 1817, soon after which his parents settled in Brooklyn, N. Y. In 1830 he entered Mount St. Mary's College, Emmitsburg, Md., where he was ordained, Dec. 13, 1840, and at the solicitation of the college authorities was allowed to remain as professor. He was made vice-president in 1841, and on the retirement of Dr. McCaffrey, in 1871, he became president, which position he held until his death. On the appointment of Dr. Watterson to the episcopate of Columbus, in 1880, he once more resumed the presidency. He was connected with the college for thirty-five years, devoting heart and soul to its work, and never taking a vacation. He was kind to all, generous and beloved by all. He died at Emmitsburg, Dec. 24, 1880. See Catholic Annual, 1883, p. 61.

McFarland, Francis, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in County Tyrone, Ireland, Jan. 8, 1788. His parents came to America in 1739. He graduated at Washington College, Pa., in 1818, and spent over one year thereafter at Princeton Theological Seminary. He was ordained evangelist by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, N. J., Aug. 1, 1822; became pastor at Bethel, Va., and died at Staunton, Oct. 10, 1874. He was for six years secretary of the Board of Education of the Old-school Presbyterian Church. See Presbyterian, Oct. 28, 1871; Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 344.

McFarland, Francis Patrick, D.D., a Roman Catholic priest, was born at Franklin, Pa., April 6, 1819. He studied at a private academy in his native town, and then at Mount St. Mary's Seminary, Emmitsburg, Md. He was ordained priest in St. Patrick's Cathedral, New York, by Archbishop Hughes on May 18, 1845, and was for one year thereafter professor at St. John's College, Fordham. Thence he went to St. Joseph's Church, New York city, where he remained three months, when he was transferred to the pastorate of the church at Watertown, N.Y. In 1851 he was appointed pastor of St. John's Church, Utica, and remained there until his election to the episcopacy of Hartford, March 14, 1858. This diocese then included Connecticut and Rhode Island, and Providence was the seat; but in 1872 Hendrickson was appointed to the see of Providence, and McFarland removed to Hartford, where he died Oct. 12, 1874. Bishop McFarland was modest, dignified in office, zealous, and studious. See (N. Y.) Cath. Almanac, 1875, p. 105.

McGill, John, D.D., a Roman Catholic priest, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., Nov. 4, 1809. During his childhood his parents moved to Baltimore, Ky., where, at the College of the Holy Cross, he was educated in law, and was admitted to the bar, and practiced his profession there and at New Orleans. He then embraced the Catholic faith, studied and was ordained priest, June 13, 1830. He subsequently studied at Rome, became missionary in Kentucky, and was the zealous colleague of Dr. Spalding. His Conferences on the dogmas of the Church, at Baltimore, made him distinguished as a controversialist. He was editor of the Catholic Advocate, pastor at Lexington, Ky., and on the division of Virginia into two dioceses, and the translation of bishop Whelan to Wheeling, Dr. McGill was appointed bishop of Richmond, and consecrated, Nov. 10, 1850. His labors were great. As a learned and convincing preacher he was pre-eminent. His controversial sermons were, it is said, unsurpassed. He took an active part in the councils of Baltimore for twenty years, and was an earnest member of the Council of the Vatican. While attending its sessions his health failed him, he returned home, and died at Richmond, Va., Jan. 14, 1872. See (N. Y.) Cath. Almanac, 1873, p. 42.

McGuire, Edward C., D.D., a Roman Catholic priest, was born in the borough of Winchester, Va., in 1793. In 1818 he officiated for one year as lay-reader in the Church at Fredericksburg, when he was ordained deacon, and after a rectorate of forty-five years at St. George's Church in that city he died there, Oct. 8, 1858. Dr. McGuire was a very successful minister of the gospel. See Amer. Quart. Church Rev. 1859, p. 680.

McHale, John, a Roman Catholic priest, was born in 1791 at Tubber-narive, County Mayo, Ireland. After completing his education, he became lecturer and professor of dogmatic theology at Maynooth, holding the position of assistant professor for several years. He was also archbishop of Killala, "cum jure successionem," and consecrated with the title of bishop of Monama "in partibus infidelium." On the death of Dr. Kelly he was promoted to the archiepiscopal see of Tuam, which he held until his death, Nov. 7, 1881. He published Essays on the Doctrines of the Catholic Church, which was translated into French and German. He translated sixty of Moore's Irish Melodies into the Irish language, retaining the same metre as the originals. In 1861 he produced a large octavo volume, comprising six books of Homer's Iliad, with an Irish translation in heroic metre. (B. P.)

McJilton, John N., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at Baltimore, Md., in 1805. He was ordained deacon in 1841: for a long time chaplain of the Maryland Hospital, in that city, and subsequently he held the rectorship of Mount Zion Church, added to his labors; in 1867 he was rector of that Church and of the Church of the Messiah; in the following year he went to New York city, officiating there until 1874, after which he resided, without special work, in that city until his death, April 13, 1875. See Proc. Episc. Abs. Me., 1875.

McKean, Silar, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Corinth, Vt., March 16, 1791. He received his preparatory studies at Haverhill Academy, and his theological studies were conducted by Rev. Stephen Fuller at Berkshire. He was ordained pastor of the Church in Bradford, Vt., May 18, 1815, and remained there two years; the following year he was reinstated, remaining there twenty-four years. Subsequently he became acting pastor of the Church at Fairlee, and four years thereafter returned to Bradford, where he died, Dec. 10, 1877. He was moderator of the General Convention of Vermont in 1846. Dr. McKean published several sermons and addresses. (W. P. S.)

McKinley, Daniki, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Carlisle, Pa., Dec. 7, 1800. He graduated from Dickinson College in 1824; spent more than a year thereafter in Princeton Theological Seminary; was ordained deacon at Carlisle, Pa., Oct. 30, 1827; was pastor at Bedford, 1827-31; Carlisle, 1833-38; agent for the Board of Foreign Missions, 1838-41; pastor at Chambersburg, 1841-47; pastor of Sixth Church, Pittsburgh, 1850-52; agent for the Board of Domestic Missions, 1852-54; and died at Chambersburg, Dec. 7, 1878, aged 78. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem., 1881, p. 39.

McKinney, Samuel, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in 1805. Many years before removing to Texas he resided in Tennessee, where the early part of his ministerial life was spent. He became a member of the Convention in 1851, and a leading minister of the Southern Presbyterian Church, indefatigable in advancing all its interests. He was the first president of Austin College, Texas. He died at Huntsville, Nov. 7, 1879. (W. P. S.)

McKown, J. Le Grange, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Guilderland, N. Y., Aug. 15, 1824. He was of Scotch-Irish descent, and reared in the Reformed Church, but at the age of fourteen united with the Methodists. At seventeen he entered Troy Conference Academy, and later graduated from Wesleyan University, Middletown, Conn., in 1849. He was an assistant to the Quarterly Conference the same year, but ill-health soon obliged him to retire from regular pastoral work, though not from active duty. For eight years he gave his energies to the education of youth, during which time he was professor of Newark Wesleyan Seminary, president of Richmondville Union Seminary, of McLain, William, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Ohio, and served several churches as pastor. His last charge was the First Presbyterian Church of Washington City, D.C., which position he resigned to become financial secretary of the Colonization Society, with which he was identified for many years. He died in Washington, Feb. 15, 1873, aged sixty-six years. See (N. Y.) Observer, Oct. 1, 1873. Hence he was V. P. S.

McLean, Daniel Veatch, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, and member of the Presbytery of Monmouth, N.J., who died at Red Bank, Nov. 23, 1869, was an able preacher, a good scholar, and a friend of temperance, education, the Bible cause, and every Christian and benevolent enterprise. (W. P. S.)

McLeod, Alexander, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was rector for a number of years at Huntington, Pa.; in 1857 at Clearyfd, having charge of St. Andrew’s Church, and subsequently serving, in addition, as missionary at Philippi. In 1864 he was chaplain in the United States Hospital, Wilmington, Del., whence he was sent, in 1866, to Fort Delaware, as army chaplain. In 1871 he was removed to Fort Leavenworth, Kan., serving in the same position. He died at Meadville, Pa., Feb. 9, 1877, in his seventy-seventh year. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1878, p. 169.

McLeod, John Niel, D.D., a Reformed Presbyterian minister, was born in New York City, Oct. 11, 1806. He graduated at Columbia College in 1826; studied theology under his father, with whom he was associated in business. He was ordained in 1833. He died in New York, April 27, 1874. He had been for many years stated clerk of the synod of his denomination, and professor in the theological seminary then at Philadelphia.

McMaster, Alexander N. D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Mercers, Pa., Nov. 17, 1807. He graduated at Union College, and, after completing his theological studies, was ordained pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Galway in 1833, whence he went in 1838 to Pittsburgh, subsequently to Westfield, and finally to Poland, O., where he labored with zeal and success for twenty-four years, until failing health obliged him to resign. He died at Leetonia, Oct. 2, 1892. See (N. Y.) Observer, Oct. 12, 1892. (W. P. S.)

McMaster, Sterling Y., D.D., LL.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at Guilford Court House, N. C., Dec. 13, 1813. He graduated at the State University, was ordained in 1846, and officiated in 1853 as rector of a church in Altamont, Ill. In 1858 he removed to Palmyra, Mo., as president of St. Paul’s College in that place, and remained in this position until 1861, when he became chaplain of the 27th regiment of Illinois Volunteers, United States army; in the following year he officiated as rector of Christ Church, in that place, where he remained until his death. He died Nov. 5, 1875. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1878, p. 150.
He died March 28, 1840. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iii. 322.

McSparran, JAMES, D.D., an English clergyman, graduated M.A. at the University of Glasgow, Scotland, in 1709, and was selected by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts as a missionary over the Narragansett Parish, R. I. He was ordained Aug. 21, 1720, as deacon, by the bishop of London, and Sept. 25 following, as presbytery, by the archbishop of Canterbury. Besides officiating in Narragansett, he was required to preach at Bristol, Freetown, Swansea, and at Little Compton. In 1726 he assisted in establishing the Church in New London, Conn. In 1736 he visited England, and again in 1754. He died at South Kingstown, R. I., Dec. 1, 1757. He published a work entitled America Dissected, etc. (Dublin, 1738). See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v. 44.

Meinwerk, bishop of Paderborn from 1009 to 1010, was not only a noble descendant of Halberstadt and Hildesheim, but became royal chaplain under Otto III. Henry II made him bishop, and took him to Italy in 1013. Meinwerk also accompanied Henry's successor, Conrad II, to Italy in 1026, and by the composition of Meinwerk thus reduced by a great deal the power of the church. By the abuse of the royal patras he was enabled to devote much of his time in the interest of the school and in founding new monasteries. He died June 5, 1036, but was not canonized until 1756. His life is found in Pertz, Monumenta Germaniae, viii, 104-161. Melcher, Johann Wilhelm, a Protestant theologian of Germany, who died at Freienwalde, Feb. 19, 1880, is the author of, "Erklärung der vier kanonischen Evangelien" (Berlin, 1847):——"Das Verständnis der Heilsgeschichte" (1850). See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. ii, 869. (B. P.)

Melcher, Joseph, a Roman Catholic prelate, studied and took his doctor's degree at Modena, was ordained in 1808, and became chaplain to the court. In 1843 he came to Rome, where Bishop Rosati, and was stationed at Little Rock, Ark., whence he was transferred to St. Mary's Church, St. Louis, Mo., of which diocese he became vicar-general. He remained pastor there until he was made the first bishop of Green Bay, Wis., July 22, 1888. He introduced several working orders, such as the Passionists, the Franciscan Teresians, Servites, etc. Dr. Melcher died Dec. 20, 1878, at the age of sixty-six, leaving a flock of 60,000 and sixty-nine churches. Melchor, Johann, a Reformed theologian of Germany, was born in 1546. He studied at different universities: was in 1567 pastor at Frech, in the duchy of Jülich, in 1672 at Kattekirchen, in 1677 at Düsseldorf, in 1682 doctor of theology, and died at Dillenburg, Oct. 15, 1693. He wrote, Clara Propositioni Codicis Canicorum Salomonis Subcomitata in Propriis Quatuor Paralipem. Melchior, Solomon Inz, a Jewish writer of the 16th century, was a resident at Constantinople, where he published, in 1564, his "P." "The Perfection of Beauty," scholion on the Hebrew Bible. It has been repeatedly edited, but the best edition is that of Amsterdam (1666, fol.), with Abendana's additions. It is a very valuable contribution to grammatical exegesis, since it is brief and condensed, giving almost exclusively grammatical observations, for which there are no other sources from Kimchi's writings. It has been highly valued among Christians, and several parts of it have been translated into Latin; that on Ceniteles, by Chr. Molitor (Altdorf, 1659); on Joshua and Malachi, by Nik. In the Christian Church, Conditions of. We may premise in general that, with the exception of the Quakers or Friends (q.v.), the one essential and universal mode or sign of admission to Church communion is baptism (q.v.), and that all bodies of Christians except those of the Baptists (q.v.) administer the rite to infants as well as to adults, the parents or friends of the former engaging, either formally or presumptively, as sponsors (q.v.), the future assumption of the baptismal vows on the part of the children baptized, who meanwhile occupy a subordinate or preparatory stage of membership as catechumens (q.v.).

I. Basil Principles—1. Of an Ideal Character. The Church of God, in its broadest sense, consists of all who, whether on earth or in heaven, have been redeemed by Jesus Christ, and quickened by the Holy Spirit, and have no character of the same or better God’s favor. The visible Church is the whole number of those who, on earth, participate, in some degree, in the common Christian life, faith, and organic fellowship. The conditions of church-membership will vary according as the visible Church, in the forms or modes designed to be regarded as one, universal, unchangeable, and divine, or otherwise. Again, the Church may be viewed as uniform in its standard of ethical and spiritual life, but diverse in its dogmatic and organic fellowship. The dividing lines of membership must, therefore, depend largely upon the following ideals:

1. The Christian Life. What is it? And when does it begin? Here comes in the question of infant or adult membership. See PREDICATION. The term “life,” like the term “death,” is ambiguous, meaning both the hidden force which renders spontaneous action possible, a favorable environment, in forms of existence above the mineral, and the activity resulting from that force. When a man loves God and his neighbor he is said to be spiritually alive, but this must mean that he exhibits in action a force, the existence of which must have preceded the display of it. Unless we arePelagians, we must attribute the origin of spiritual life, the capability of spontaneous religious activity, to the influence of God’s Spirit on the human mind. Accurately to determine the beginning when life begins is impossible, the spiritual as in the physical realm: all that can be done is to fix a period beyond which it is not reasonable to believe that the life-giving contact is delayed.

Put that period of death, or birth from above, at baptism, and the conditions of membership will assume one aspect: put it at the moment of conscious self-surrender and faith, and they will assume another.

“Life,” however, means not merely capacity for spontaneous action, but, also, action itself—living. He is alive who acts holily. He is dead who lives in sin. On our conceptions of what the divine standard of living is, and of the time when and the means by which the transition from mere capacity for living to actual living, the moral change, renewal, or conversion, occurs, will depend the conditions of membership in our churches. Is there such a divine and unchangeable standard? Does it, if it exists, cover principles only, or overt acts alone, or motives also? How far are motives capable of being tested by Church authorities? Is the beginning of Christian living coincident with such faith as secures reverence of obedience to known divine law, or with the faith that gives assurance of acceptance? To what extent is individual liberty in the application of fundamental principles of holy living admissible? If the relation of Christian love to amen-
ments or business is doubtful, have Church authorities the right to excommunicate him in whom spiritual life may still exist, and whom God may still, in a measure, approve? A just separation from the Church of Christ is separation from Christ. Is it right to enforce, in what profession he may be, that the Church of Christ should be legitimate only in a voluntary club, organized for special purposes within the Church, but not cotermi-nous with the Church? On the decision given here will greatly depend the conditions of membership in Christian organizations.

(2) The Ideal of Doctrine. — One department of church work is, by the application of truth, to lead into action the latent spiritual capability implanted by the Spirit of God. This implies the instruction of those formally enrolled in the organization. What shall they be taught? Has Christianity any one, universal, unchangeable, and divine standard of doctrine? If so, is it confined to facts, or does it embrace theories, also? What are the facts? How much, if any, of this code of doctrine must be demanded of members of the Church? On the answer to these questions will also depend the conditions of membership.

(8) The Christian Ideal of Organic Fellowship. — Is there a divinely authoritative standard of organic Church relations? Are divine blessings promised to Christians in their organic capacity, or in their individ-al capacity alone? If a divinely approved standard of life and truth are universally imperative, and if failure to reach that standard is an object of mercy only when circumstances have rendered perfection impos-ible in him who, nevertheless, sought conformity to that standard, can the preservation, propagation, and enforcement of life and truth in the world be left to purely voluntary religious organizations, guerilla warfare, and free-lances? Or is there one visible organism, superior to all clubs and societies, the heir of special promises, as long as it is faithful to its obligations, and one, a just expectation of which is excitation from within? Our Lord did not condemn him who cast out devils, even when he followed not the disciples, were not his preparatory instructions, his special commission, and his peculiar promises given to the disciples whom he was organizing? Let covenant blessings, with corresponding obligations, be attached, even when they are not exclusively so, to a visible organism; and introduction into that organism must bring at once, if they have not been received before, the promised blessings; and these blessings are then to be retained, not sought for, unless after a period of amenity, when they have been forgiven. Let covenant blessings be the inheritance of individuals only, apart from all organic connection, on the occasion of personal acts; then, prior to those acts, it cannot be assumed that such blessings are ever given, even when the individuals concerned are the infant children of believers; while the discredit thrown upon any organic connections possible prior to the personal actions must react on the conditions of membership assumed subsequently to these acts.

2. Principles of a Practical Character. — (1) The title of Church membership further depend upon the source whence we derive our knowledge of the constitution of the Christian Church. The life of one of the original apostles continued beyond the date of the "Acts of the Apostles," and of the Epistles: must the form of the Church which existed prior to the writing of these books be authoritative, and the form which history shows to have probably arisen with his sanction be ignored? Is the constitution of the Church one of cast-iron? When was it cast? At the close of the New-Test. canon? After the first three general councils? After the first seven? Or is there a living, spiritual, ever present with the Church, guiding it by Scripture, by reason and common-sense, by history and the evident necessities of spiritual life in changing circumstances? Is our knowledge of the constitution of the Church gained from the Bible alone, or from the Bible and something else? The conditions of member-sip will be determined by the answers given to these questions.

(2) These conditions are affected, also, by principles of Scriptural interpretation. What language did the apostles use? Was Hebrew or Greek the language used? Is his word to be interpreted by Hebrew or by Greek analogies? If he uses the term "hagios," or if his reporters use it in rendering the word he may have employed, must the Church limit her conduct by the latest edition of Liddell and Scott? Or are the words of New-Test. Scripture to be regarded as so much the product of the Holy Spirit that all modifying human literary elements are eliminated from them? Is there a development of practice indicated even in the New Test., and must any given passage be interpreted as of perpetual obligation by etymology, apart from the light thrown upon it by this principle of de-development? Have we any right to say that the governing office of the apostolate was to be changed, but that the introduction of Christian families, as well as adult converts, into the Church was to lead to no change? In a word, must the practices which are legitimate in the Church be limited by a system of interpretation based upon a bald literalism? Or may rites and ceremonies vary when interpretation judges of the obligation of such forms by the light thrown upon them from the living, perpetually-speaking Providence, so long as the decision is not contrary to the spirit and principles of the New Test.? These questions will suggest the bearing of harnemoneus on membership in the Church.

II. Illustrations of these Principles in the Practice of Different Denominations. — 1. Ancient Episcopalian Churches. — These include the Greek or Eastern Church, with its various branches, the Roman Church, the English or British Church, and the National Churches of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway.

(1) The Greek Church. — "Previous to baptism, the child, though not two months old, must be solemnly initiated into the Church, as a catechumen, through the medium of its sponsors, when exorcism is used." Four prayers, with blowing on the child's mouth, forehead, and breast, and commands to the evil spirit to depart and return no more, precede the true immersion or affusion of baptism. In Alexandria and the Syrian, or Jacobite, Church affusion exists. Among the Armenians both forms are united. The Copts, in exorcism, make the sign of the cross thirty-seven times.

(2) The Reformed Church. — An infant is not baptized when less than three months of age; baptism is administered immediately after baptism, and answers to confirmation in the Western Church. Within seven days after this another washing occurs, followed by tonsure, or cutting the hair in the form of a cross. Confession four times in the year is prescribed, but is generally practiced but once, as is also communicant. In the absence of a priest or a deacon, lay baptism is recognized, if it has been administered in the name of the Trinity. Chirstian only is enforced where such baptism has taken place. The Montenegrin Church in South Albania, however, re-applies some of the Catholic doctrines. The church of the Greek Church recognizes the baptism of no other Church is denied by Archbishop Platon, in his supplement to M. Duten's (Evres Milles, ii, 170: "Baptismum aliarum ecclesiarum Christianarum non e ritu eis putamus, at qui ex ritu genuino et iterato baptizate, sed solo sacrisce baptismate, recipimus." ("We do not consider the baptism of other Christian churches invalid; and we receive those who come to us from them only by anointing them with the holy chrism, without repeating their baptism.") Submission to the will of the Church is demanded. The communion is administered in both kinds, even to infants, bread and wine being mixed together, and given in a spoon by the officiating priest. Adult candidates then reverentially salute the clergy by hand-kissing, and are congratulated by their friends as orthodox Christians.

No Russian who has been educated in the Greek Church can lawfully depart from it.

(2) The Roman Church.—The leading conditions of membership in this Church are involved in her definition of the term “Church,” as “the society of the faithful who are baptized and united, by the profession of the faith, in the sacraments, in the same worship, to each other, and who are under one head in heaven, viz. Christ, and one head on earth, viz. the pope, his vicar.” “The Church, though it consists of good and bad members, does not include heretics, schismatics, or (at least in the full sense of membership) persons severed from her unity by the greater excommunication.” “Whether ‘pure schismatics’ (i.e. persons holding the full faith of the Church, but separated by schism) may still be called members of the Church” is a question “agitated in the theological schools.” Baptism is believed to be “the origin of spiritual life, and the door of entrance into the Church.”

The candidate is presented at the door of the church-building, receives catechetical instruction, submits to exorcism, has salt put into his mouth, and the sign of the cross made upon different parts of his body, is washed with water, and anoints his head. baptism by affusion with water is performed by the bishop and his assistants. Baptism is attended by more or less solemn ceremony, and is followed by profession of faith, baptism by immersion, and profession of faith. The sign of the cross is made on the forehead.

(3) The Church of England.—This Church regards the spirit and principles of the Bible as forever binding; but she refuses not the guidance of subsequent providential direction. Her terms of membership are founded upon the following principles. The Church’s ideal of life, doctrine, and order, as given by Christ and his apostles, is divine and, wherever possible, imperative. Life is most important; and, while order is not indifferent, it may be subject to the demands of truth and life. The Church, by its own nature, claims the whole of the human society that have joined her in the name of the Trinity, follows either immediately or, as is usual, at from seven to twelve years of age. Confession at least once a year is imperative. The greater excommunication reserved is only for the most heinous offences.

nominal expression of evil and good, and attend "the ordinances of God." The communion is not refused to godly persons, though they belong to the con-

are sometimes sent, for confirmation, to the Church of England.

(5) The Methodist Episcopal Church of the United States of America.—*The conditions of membership in this Church are: first, that the candidate be an adult;

a member of a Wesleyan church by the transition from a voluntary society of adults formed for a special purpose to a self-governing

Church. Membership begins by reception as a pro-rator, on giving evidence of desire for salvation from sin. After six months, on recommendation of the leaders and stewards, baptism having been received, and satisfactory assurances of faith and loyalty having been given to the preacher in charge before the Church,

full membership is conferred. Members of other bodies are received, on recommendation from the proper authorities, and on renunciation of loyalty to the principles and practices of the M. E. Church. Baptized children of Methodist parents, though regarded as in visible covenant relation with God, and as objects of the Church's care, do not seem to be in any sense members of the Methodist Church until, after having attended class-meetings, and being publicly confessed, they are in regular form. After reception into full membership, attendance upon class-meeting, while strongly recommended, is no more imperative than attendance upon other useful services. For crimes duly proved, members may be expelled; after removal to parts unknown, the name may be dropped; on transference by certificate to another denomination, and on withdrawal while character is unimpeached, membership ceases.

(6) The Methodist Church of Canada.—This conforms to the conditions of membership among the English Wesleyans. Usually, attendance upon class-meeting being essential, dancing and similar amusements being for-bidden, and children, though baptized, not being members of the organization.

(7) The Wesleyan Methodist Church of the United States

(dating from 1842).*—*This adds to the usual Methodist conditions of membership special rules against secret societies, as Freemasons, Odd-Fellows, etc., intoxicants and tobacco.

(8) Apostolic Catholic Church (dating from 1832).*—

In addition to baptism, "the conditions under which a member of this Church is received are: residence within the congregations gathered under the restored apostleship" are that he should fully and boldly recognize the authority of this apostleship, so that he can sincerely

work with it, submit to the commandments of the apostles, recognize the grace of Christ in them, and all the ministries authorized by them. Should any, after more or less time, lose their confidence in these restored ministries, and separate themselves from the congregations, they are still remembered and prayed for as negligent or lapsed members, and their names are kept on a separate register.

(9) Reformed Episcopal Church.—*Baptism and confirmation admit to this Church persons born of parents within its pale. Communicants of other denominations are received by letter or other satisfactory evidence of membership, confirmation being optional with them. As no discrimination between denominations is made, there seems to be no guarantee that even baptism has been duly received. Assent to the principles, doctrine, discipline, and worship of the Church is demanded. Membership may cease during life by prescription, or when written off the roll by the Court of Ordination, or by withdrawal, or by exclusion by the Church courts for offence. Some differences of practice exist in different localities.

3. Presbyterian Churches, in which the Right of Ordination Resides in a Body of Presbyters.—*These churches are governed by principles which do not differ fundamentally, though they differ in details and in verbal expression, from those of episcopal churches. The basis of Church membership is the covenant of grace which Christ condescends to make with his people, of which covenant faith is the essential condition, and baptism the visible sign, and, as children of the Church, and own person exercise faith, their membership must in the first instance rest upon the faith of their parents, until they come to an age intelligently and voluntarily to embrace and profess Christ themselves. Every child of the parents of his birth a citizen of God's kingdom and an heir of its privileges, in the condition of subsequent personal faith.

One parent, at least, or one guardian, in the absence of parental custody, if "presumptively believing," must make "an express engagement to train the child to godliness." Children are to be taught the Catechism, the Apostles' Creed, and the Lord's Prayer, to pray and to obey Christ. Baptized children are under the government of the Church. In baptism, there is a grace "conferred by the Holy Ghost," yet the grace of regeneration is not necessarily connected with baptism, but is in so many of "such as that grace belongs unto."

The first element in the process of regeneration is the quickening power of the Holy Spirit exerted directly on the soul. These principles differ not substantially from those of the Church of England, which can be professed without any change in the relation to Pelagianism.

Hooker defines regeneration as "that infused divine virtue of the Holy Ghost which gives to the powers of the soul their first disposition towards future newness of life;" and he says that "grace is not absolutely tied to sacraments," but that, in sacraments, "God imparts the saving grace of Christ to all that are capable thereof." Though differences of opinion may exist as to the appropriateness of words to the representation of facts, yet, on the facts themselves, both Presbyterians and the Church of England seem to agree. Another cause for the separation of these baptizated adults are received on profession of faith in Christ and on baptism. The enforcing of doctrinal conformity to the theological standards is not necessary or universal. The faith in Christ demanded is not necessarily such as brings assurance of forgiveness. Proper letters from other evangelical churches are admitted to membership. Censures are given for offences against lawful authority, nature, and Christianity, and excommunication awaits contumacy. These principles generally apply to Presbyterian churches in all lands, the Reformed Presbyterian Church, the Associate Church, the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, the Dutch Reformed Church makes confirmation the public reception of members after examination in Bible and Church history and doctrines. Presbyterian Lutherans consider confirmation to be the public reception of candidates, with the blessing of the minister, after a doctrinal examination; but variety of practice arises from the large congregational liberty allowed. The United Presbyterians of the United States prescribe rules against the use of hymns, secret societies, and open communion.

4. *Congregational Churches, or those in which each

Congregation is Supreme over its own Affairs.*—(1)

Orthodox Pseudoepiscopalian Churches.—Credible personal faith in Christ and consecration to his service are the sole conditions of entrance, the individual Church being the judge of such credibility. Child baptism, personal faith and consecration, are in no sense members, but are to be watched over, that they may become such.

Opinions and practice differ as to what children are eligible for baptism, whether those of members only, or of members of other congregations. Some may be baptized to other churches, and, in some instances, resignation without transfer, lead to erasure of the name from the church roll; and contumacious offences lead to exclusion by the Church. The Evangelical Union, or Morsonians, differ from other Congregationalists chiefly in the Arminian doctrines professed, and in making saying faith, on which members are accepted, to be such that it is not only invariably accompanied by assurance of acceptance, but that it renders prayer before it, and for it, an offence.

(2) Orthodox Antipasobpist Church.—"The Church should not baptize persons in whom the divine life has been begun by regeneration, and who have been baptized on profession of their faith in Christ as their Saviour." Hence, on profession and immersion, if the profession satisfies the local Church, membership is conferred. Excision is similar to that in the other churches. Some Baptists in England do not regard baptism with water as essential to membership. Free-Wil Baptists receive baptized persons of other evangelical churches on testimony of a letter of recommendation by vote of the local Church. Some Denominationists have similar conditions of membership: a trine immersion, with laying on of hands and prayer, and the observance of the seventh day of the week, instead of the first. "Disciples of Christ" demand immersion on profession of faith in Christ, and acceptance of the Bible as the rule of life. "An ordinan capacity of the congregation, on conduct judged by them intolerable. Mennonites baptize none before eleven or twelve years of age, and then by pouring water on the head. Strict Mennonites prohibit head-dresses, fine clothing, and rich furniture, and advocate the separation of the excommunicate from society in course.

(8) Unitarians.—These are generally Congregationalists, though in Transylvania they are Episcopal, and in Ireland Presbyterian. In the United States the authority that receives into membership is, in many cases, a circle of persons known as the "Church," inside of a larger organization known as the "Society" or parish. Baptism, and the signification to the pastor of a wish to join with, in some churches, a public recognition by giving "the hand of fellowship," usually admits to membership; but intimation to the pastor of a desire for membership, and consent of his advisers, is probable, would admit to fellowship, even without baptism or public reception. In many congregations the renting of a sitting, and qualifying for a vote in parish business by accepting the by-laws of the congregation, entitle to all the privileges of membership. There is no form of exclusion. Simple forms of covenant sometimes exist. "An unformulated consensus of opinion, a fidelity in public worship, a reverential support of the Lord's Supper, a deep interest both in piety and ethics, and a readiness in benevolent work," are not always absent,

(4) Universalists.—Persons, whether baptized in Universalist churches or not, of years of discretion, usually sixteen, are received by a majority vote of the congregation, after application has been made one month previously, in open meeting of the Church, in person, by a friend, or by letter. Strangers must present evidences of Christian faith and character. The only profession of faith authorized by the whole body is given in three articles, which recognize (a) the Bible, as containing a revelation of God's character, and man's duty, interest, and the conditions of the kingdom of God, and the work of Jesus Christ, by one Holy Spirit of grace, who will finally lead all men through holiness to happiness; and (c) the obligation of good works arising from the inseparable connection of holiness and happiness.

5. Miscellaneous.—(1) European Protestant Churches.

(1) National Reformed Churches of France and Switzerland.—(a) Children, after baptism, are first instructed, then examined before the pastor, or the presbytery assembly (conseil presbytéral), or consistory, then received publicly, often after profession of personal faith, and finally admitted to communion.

(2) Adults from without, on introduction, declare to the assembly and the pastor adherence to the general principles of the Church, bear a share in the expenses, and, unless in the case of foreigners, must enjoy civil and political rights. Excommunication is pronounced from the pulpit, in general terms, with a particular application. ii. Lutheran National Church.—Nearly the same system exists here.

(3) Free Churches.—Admission is said to be by public profession of faith. Uniformity of practice does not exist among the Reformed churches. In some cases, in Free churches, rebaptism of converts exists, generally by affusion, but, in the case of Baptists, by immersion.

(2) New Church, orSwedenborgians.—Baptized infants receive full membership by confirmation on arriving at years of discretion. Members coming from without are usually baptized, though opinions and practice on rebaptism are not uniform. In excluding members, in addition to the directions in Matt. xviii, 17, the following principle prevails: "He who differs in opinion from the minister ought to be left in peace, so long as he makes no disturbance; but he who makes disturbance ought to be separated."

(8) Friends, or Quakers.—Membership for persons native to the body is a birthright, but it confers rights of work and service on committees only after proved usefulness. In恳eness, the assumption of personal responsibility in request, examination by a committee of similar sex with the candidate, and acceptance by the following monthly meeting. Excision is only after contumacious resistance of official efforts for reform, the final one of which is the presentation of a written "testification" before the monthly meeting. This follows a failure of two official interviews between the offender and the committee appointed in the case. Only after a second failure to secure reform is official record made of offences.

(4) Plymouth Brethren.—Application must first be made through one of the brethren to a Saturday meeting of the leaders of the various assemblies of the place. The candidate is then visited by leading men, and rigidly examined on doctrines and separation from all other Christian bodies. Satisfactory examination results in recommendation to the Saturday meeting; and, if approved, the person enters next Lord's Day by communion. The mode of baptism is an open question. Fellowship or excision, among "Close Brethren," relates not to one assembly, but to all in the world. From decisions of the Saturday meeting there is no appeal.

(5) The Reformed Church in America.—This demands baptism, profession of faith before the consistory, composed of pastor, elders, and deacons, or a letter of recommendation from some other church.

(6) The Evangelical Association.—This body holds, in addition to the ordinary rules of admission to Methodist churches, that traffic in liquor is unlawful.

(7) The "Church of Christ."—This adopts, as necessary terms of membership, belief that Jesus is the Son of God, repentance and a righteous life, profession of faith by word of mouth, and immersion in the name of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.

(8) The "Work of God."—This body, believing that immorality and incorruptibility arise from the likeness of Christ's resurrection, which, with them, means being immersed, make immersion, with the ordinary demands of Congregational churches, imperative for membership.

(9) "Christians" (or the Christian Connection).—This demands no more than a profession of Christian faith and a corresponding life, the congregation being the judge of the life, and the person himself of the faith. This list of organizations, calling themselves, as a whole, or in part, the Church, is by no means complete; but a sufficient number has been given to show on what comparatively unimportant grounds the majority of sectarian differences are based, and to suggest the question whether, in our reaction from corporate intolerance, we have given due weight to the calm statements of Christ, and the earnest pleadings of St. Paul, on the subject of the unity of Christ’s body, the Church. For further particulars, see each religious body in its alphabetical section. (A.R.)

Memmi, Simone (called also Morisi), an eminent Italian painter, was born in Siena in 1285, and was probably a pupil of Giotto. He was invited by the pope to Avignon to do some work for him. His great picture in St. Peter’s has perished, but there are several copies of it in the churches at Florence, Pisa, and Siena. In the Campo Santo of Pisa are several frescoes of the history of St. Ranieri, and the far-famed Assumption of the Virgin amid a Choir of Angels. His large pictures may be seen at Florence, among which are several of Christ, of St. Peter the martyr, and St. Dominico. There are some more of this class of pictures in the churches of Siena. Memmi died at Avignon in 1344. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Menchen, Salomo, of France, a rabbi who lived in the 12th century, is the author of יד יד, a dictionary of the Hebrew language, written about 1170. Specimens of this lexicon were published by Dukes in יד יד (Eisenberg, 1846). He also wrote a commentary on the Pentateuch, entitled יד לברא, a specimen of which, under the title יד לברא, was published at Hamburg in 1784 (in a Latin translation by Delitzsch, in his Jeshurun eine Insgang [Grimm, 1838], p. 184–188). Menagenot, François Guillaume, an eminent historical painter, was born in London, July 9, 1744, and was instructed under Deshayas, Boucher, and Vien. He carried off the grand prix of painting in 1766, and visited Rome with the royal pension. In 1780 he was chosen an academician, and afterwards appointed professor. In 1814 he returned to Paris, and became professor of the Academy of Painting. He has a fine picture in the sacristy of the Church of St. Denis. He died Oct. 4, 1816. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Menche, Heinrich Gottlieb, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born April 24, 1796. He studied at Marburg, entered the ministry in 1820, was pastor at Rüdesdau, Hannover, from 1851 to 1882, and died June 21, 1884, at Mitten, doctor of theology. (B.P.)

Mende Version of the Scriptures. The Mende is spoken by a considerable population to the south and south-east of Sierra Leone. A version of Matthew had been prepared at an early period by American missionaries, who had settled on the border of the Mende country. A translation of the four gospels was made by the Rev. J. P. Schon, of the Missionary Society, and the standard alphabet of Prof. Lepsius (q. v.) being adopted for the version, Schon was aided in the work of translation by Harvey K. Ritchel, of the Mende country. In 1871 the Acts of the Apostles were printed by the British and Foreign Bible Society; the translation having been made by the Rev. H. Johnson. In 1872, an African clergyman, in 1873, the Epistles to the Romans was published. The remainder of the New Testament is still in manuscript. (B.P.)

Menga, Antonio Raphael, a distinguished painter, was born at Anzio, in Bohemia, March 12, 1728, and studied the works of Raphael at Rome when but thirteen years of age. In 1744 he was appointed painter at Dresden by the Elector Augustus, with a salary. His first great work was The Holy Family, which was exhibited at Rome, and gained him great reputation. In 1745 he received the direction of the new academy at Rome, and in 1757 was employed by the Celestines to paint the ceilings of the church of Santissima Trinità dei Monti. In 1761 he went to Madrid by Carlos III, and granted a liberal pension. He executed, among other works, The Descent from the Cross and The Council of the Gods, for the king’s court. He returned to Rome, where he was engaged by Clemens XIV to paint in the Vatican a picture of James the St. to History, and The Holy Family. After an absence of three years he returned to Madrid, where he commenced his celebrated work in the dome of the grand saloon of the royal palace at that place. But his health was failing, and he died at Rome, June 23, 1778. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Menzert, Johann, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Jahnem, in Upper Lusatia, July 27, 1658. He studied at Wittenberg, was in 1681 preacher at Merseburg, in 1686 at hauswolde, in 1696 at Kemsitz, near Bernstadt, and died Feb. 24, 1764. He wrote about fifteen books, some of which are translated into English, as Lob sei dir, treuer Gott und Vater (in Chorals Book for England, No. 8, “I praise Thee, O my God and Father “); O dus ich tumend Zungen kätte (by Mills, in Horae Gemanicae, p. 183, “Oh that I had a Thousand of Tyres, which is coloured in Lyra Germanica, ii, 222, “He would make the Prize his Own”). Menzel, Karl Adolph, a German historian, was born at Rödtenburg, Dec. 7, 1778. He studied at Halle, was in 1802 professor and in 1814 pro-rector at St. Elizabeth’s, in Breslaw. He died Aug. 19, 1855. He is the author of Staats- und Religionsgeschichtliche der Königreiche Israel und Juda (Breslaw, 1853):—Religion und Staatsidee in der vorchristlichen Zeit (edited by Wustke, Leipzig, 1872) (B.P.)

Menzel, Wolfgang, a German historian and critic, was born at Waldenburg, June 21, 1778. He studied at different universities, was for some time teacher at Aarau, went in 1824 to Heidelberg, in 1825 to Stuttgart, and died April 23, 1873. Of his many works we only mention, Christliche Synkretistik (Mayence, 1854, 2 vols.):—Kristenernes Zerfall (2 vols. ed. 1873):—Die vorchristliche Unsterblichkeitsfrage (1869, 2 vols.). His Denkwürdigkeiten were published by his son Karl (Bielefeld, 1877). (B.P.)

Mepeham, Simon, archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Meapham, in Kent, and educated at Merton College. He derived himself chiefly to the study of the sacred Scriptures, and became a Biblical divine. He was ordained priest at Canterbury on St. Matthew’s day, 1257, and became rector of Tunsall, in the diocese of Norwich. He was elected archbishop Dec. 11, 1257, and received the temporalities from the King at Lynn on Sept. 19, 1258. His attention was chiefly directed to the state of morals and discipline in the Church. We occasionally find him interposing his good offices to effect a reconciliation between parties at variance. His endeavor to compel diocesan synods to attend, and to rendred him all things but popular among his suffragans. Notwithstanding, he was in all things respectable, in nothing great. But the age demanded something more than respectable mediocrity, and Simon Mepeham, by confining himself to his religious duties, was regarded as meaner than those who looked, in his position, for one who could lead them in temporal as well as in Messianic Hope.

By way of supplement to the article Messiah (q.v.), we give in general outlines a history of the expectation of the Messiah as developed in the apocalyptic writings.

Of the deepest influence upon the development of the messianic prophecies were the tendencies of Daniel, the essence of which is the reign of the pious (see ii, 44; vii, 14, 27). The apocrypha of the Old Test. contain but few messianic allusions, because, for the most part, they are historical or didactic, and not prophetic. But this does not mean that the messianic idea was not entertained by the authors. Besides the hope of a return of the dispersed of Israel (Baruch, iv, 87; v, 5-9; 2 Macc. ii, 18), of a conversion of the Gentiles (Tobit, xiii, 11-18; xiv, 6, 7), and the perpetual existence of the Jewish nation (Eclus. xxxvii, 25; xlv, 13), we also find the idea of an everlasting kingdom of the house of David (Eccles. xlviii, 11; 1 Mac. ii, 67).

The richer, however, flows the stream of messianic prophecies in the oldest Jewish Sibylline Oracles (q.v.), especially iii, 682-794. Very few messianic comments are found in the groundwork of the Book of

He was descended from a noble Spanish family, and entered the Belgian army in 1841, serving with distinction as a volunteer in Algeria under marshal Bugeaud. He began the study of theology at Rome in 1848, and took priest's orders in 1850. He was then appointed chamberlain to the pope and canon of St. Peter's, and in 1860 was made minister of military affairs. He resigned this office in 1865, in consequence of his disagreement with cardinal De Sales, but was appointed archbishop of Mélitene, June 22, 1866, and private almoner to the pope. He opposed the dogmas of papal infallibility in 1869, but in 1870 accepted the decision of the Vatican Council. He died at Rome, July 24, 1874. His wealth was largely devoted to the founding of charitable institutions, to the improvement of the streets and squares in Rome, and to archaeological excavations.

MEROOTH. It has been suggested (Memoirs of the Ordinance Survey, iii, 814) that this may be represented by Kharbet Marra, a ruined site seven miles north of Hama.

MEROS. Tertullian (Bible Praise, p. 280) identifies this site with that of Merooses, about four miles north-west of Bethanah, remarking that "it would command the passage from the plain of Jezreel to the Jordan;" but there do not seem to be any traces of antiquity there. MERRICK, John Austin, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was a missionary in 1855, in Fort Ripley, Minn.; in 1857 he was rector in Paris, Ky., being pastor of St. Peter's Church, and professor of Oriental and Biblical literature in Shelby College. In 1860 he became rector of St. Luke's Church, Hastings, Minn., in 1865 president of the Sewanee Mission and Training School, in Winchester, Tenn. The next year he went to St. José, Cal., as a missionary. The year following he was a professor in St. Augustine College, Benicia. In 1870 he was officiating in Martinez; in 1872 he removed to West Farms, N.Y., where he resided without charge until his death, July 16, 1877, aged fifty years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1878, p. 169.

MESSIANIC HOPE

Enoch (q. v.; see xcm, 16–38), but more in the Psalter of Solomon (q. v.; see Ps. xvi, 11; xvii, 6–9), and in the Assumption of Moses (q. v.). The messianic time is also depicted in the Book of Jubilees (q. v.). All these documents prove sufficiently that the messianic hope had not been dead in the last centuries before Christ, and this is corroborated by the Targum of Onkelos and Jonathan. Another important witness is Philo, who, in De Exegeese, § 8, 9 (ed. Mang. ii, 425 sq.), and De Legem et Fatis, § 13–20 (ibid. ii, 421–428), speaks of the messianic hope.

But, aside from these witnesses, we have the New Test., which fully proves that the messianic idea in the time before Christ was by no means extinguished in the consciousness of the people (see Matt. xi, 3; xvi, 13–27; Luke vii, 20; xvii, 19; xix, 18, 35 sq.; John xii). For the time after Christ we need no evidence. Many political events prove, beyond the shadow of a doubt, that the people expected the beginning of the kingdom of God on earth. Josephus himself confesses that the messianic hope was one of the most powerful instruments in the insurrection against Rome, although, to please the Romans, he referred the messianic prophecies to Vespasian.

As for the messianic hope after the destruction of Jerusalem, the apocalyptic of Baruch and Ezra give ample proof that it was preserved. While Ezekiel finds its reflection in the Jewish prayer called Shemoneh Eshreh (q. v.), especially in the 10th, 11th, 14th, 15th, and 17th petitions. Thus far the historical outline. We come now to the systematic arrangement of messianic dogmas.

1. Signs of the Last Times.—Almost everywhere, where reference is made to eschatology, we meet with the same thought, that the beginning of the time of salvation is to be ushered in by great tribulations. The basis for these speculations was no doubt Dan. xii, 1, "There shall be a time of trouble, as never was from the beginning of the world unto that same time." Thus originated in the rabbinic dogma the doctrine of the hebrew יְהִי בְּיְמֵי יַהֲדוֹתֵךְ בְּזָרַע בִּרְאוֹת אָדָם, "the birth-pains of the Messiah" (see Matt. xxiv, xvi, 8; וּלְאֵת הַנַּעַרְתֵּי אֱנוֹךְ). Glowing descriptions of the signs of the last times are found in Orac. Sibyll. iii, 795–807 (comp. 4 Ezra vi, 18–19; vi, 18–28; ix, 12–13; xxii, 38–31; Apocrypha of Baruch, i, 22, 24–26; Book of Jubilees (see also Ewald's Jahrhundert. iii, 23 sq.); Misha, Sota, x, 15; xvi, 17; Mark xv, 27; Luke xvii, 20; xxiii, 22; John xx, 27; comp. Schöttgen, Horae Hebraicae, ii, 509 sq.; Schürer, Christol. Judaiz., p. 121–123; Gföhr, Das Jahrhundert der Hebr., ii, 225 sqq.; Oehler, in Herzog's Real-Encyclop., i, 436 sq. (2d ed. i, 666); Hamburger, Richt-Evangel. art. "Messianische Leidenzeit," p. 735–738.

2. Elijah the Forerunner of the Messiah.—From Mal. iii, 1 (A. V. iv, 5, 6) it is inferred that the prophet Elijah was to return to prepare the way for the Messiah. This idea is most forcibly presented in the Apocalypse of Baruch, xi, 10 (see also Matt. xvi, 10; Mark xi, 11; Matt. xiv, 16, 14; xvi, 14; Mark vi, 15; vii, 28; Luke ix, 18, 19; John x, 21). The object of his message is to make peace on earth (see Misha, Elyoth, vii, 1, sq.; and to harmonize differences (Boeb. Mem., iv, 5, 4; xiv, 4, 6). Besides these things, he was to anoint the Messiah (Justin, Dial. cum Tryph. c. 8, 49), and to raise the dead (Sota, ix, 5, 1 sq.). Besides Elijah, some also expected the prophet like Moses (Deut. xviii, 15; comp. John i, 16, vii, 14; vii, 40, while still others thought that Jesus (Matt. xvi, 14) was to be the forerunner of the Messiah. In Christian writings, Enoch is mentioned as one who was to come back (Ec. Niceorn., iv, 2; see also Thilo, Codex Apocryph. Nov. Testamenti, p. 756–768). On the forerunner of the Messiah, comp. Schöttgen, u. a. p. 585 sq.; Lightfoot, Horae Hebr. on Matt. xviii, 10; Bertheau, u. a. p. 49–55; Gföhr, u. a. p. 227–229; Alexandre, Orac. Sibyll. i, ed. ii, 513–516; Der Prophet Elias in der Legende (Frankel's Monatsch. 1868, p. 241–255, 291–296; Elias who was to Come (Journal of Sacred Literature and Biblical Record, nov., 1867, 9; Daniel xii, 7; Maimonides secondo gli Ebrei, p. 196–201; Weber, System der allsumgogiellen polvitischen Theologie, p. 387–389.

3. Appearance of the Messiah.—After these preparations, Messiah comes. It is by no means correct to say that pre-Christian Judaism expected the Messiah only after the judgment, and that through the influence of Christianity the idea had become prevalent that the Messiah himself was to judge his enemies. For in the books of Baruch and Ezra, Enoch, and in the Targums, in the Psalter of Solomon, and in Philo, Messiah appears everywhere as conquering hostile powers.

As to his name, the common one is the Anointed, the Messiah (Enoch xlviii, 10; iv, 13; Baruch xxii, 3; xxxi, 1; xxxiii, 7; xl, 1; lx, 9; lix, 2; Ezra vii, 28; 29, where the Latin translation is interpolated; xxv, 12: "unctus"); Greek, αὐξημέρις ἐπίστολος (Psalt. of Sol. xvii, 86; xviii, 68); Hebrew, מַשְׁחַט (Mishna, Sota, xix, 15); μασχατος (Luke xx, 37; xix, 15), or נַעַרְתֵּי אֱנוֹךְ (in the Targums). Peculiar to the Book of Enoch are: "the Son of man" (xlvii, 1–4; xlviii, 2; lx, 7; 9, 14; x, 11; lix, 28; lx; 25, 17, 17); and the "Elect One" (xlvii, 3, 4; xlviii, 2; li, 3; lii, 6; liii, 4; lixiv, 1); Very seldom is he called the "Son of God" (cv, 2; 4 Ezra vii, 28; 29; xli, 92; 93; xlii, 9); and only once he is called "Son of the woman." (Enoch lixi, 5). He was to come from the tribe of David (Psalt. of Sol. xvii, 5; 23; Matt. xxvi, 32; Mark xii, 35; Luke xx, 41; John vii, 42; 4 Ezra xii, 32; Targum on Isa. xi, 1; Jer. xxiii, 5; xiii, 15). Hence "Son of David" is the common designation of the Messiah (in the New Test. after Luke, in the Targums, 15th petition, תּוֹדָה לִיהוָה). As belonging to the tribe of David he must also be born at Bethlehem, in the city of David (Micah vi, 1, and the Targum in loco; Matt. ii, 5; John vii, 41, 42).

Whether the pre-Christian Judaism thought of the Messiah as a mere man or as a being imbued with higher power, especially whether it ascribed to him pre-existent, cannot be decided with certainty. Eschatolog- ical it can be said that he was expected as a human king and ruler, but endowed with special gifts and powers by God. This is especially evident from the Psalter of Solomon (xvii, 28, 47, 48, 46, 42). The same idea we find also in the Targum of Enoch 49, but his place is also described in the Book of Enoch, xlvii, 1, 2; lxii, 7; xlviii, 8, 6; xlv, 8; xxiv, 2–4; comp. also 4 Ezra xxi, 82; xiii, 28, 52. And this idea of pre-existence cannot be ascribed to Christian influences, because it fully harmonizes with the Old-Test. idea concerning the Mess- ich (comp. Micah vi, 1; Daniel vii, 13, 14).

4. The Last Enemies.—On the appearance of the Messiah the enemies of the Israelites and of God will muster their forces for a last decisive conflict. The picture which Ezekiel drew of the armies of Gog and Magog, and the relations given in Daniel, is not dissim- ilarly reproduced in Orac. Sibyll. iii, 668 sq.; 4 Ezra xxii, 38 sq.; Enoch xx, 16, except that the conflict does not concern the Messiah, but the congregation of God. In general, it is supposed that the leader in this conflict is the antichrist, who is called in rabbinic writings Armilla (דָּרָק עַל מָאתָ).

6. Destruction of the Enemies.—From the dangers which will attend that movement the Israelites are to be delivered by the signal destruction of their foes. Comp. Assumptio Mosia x; Enoch xx; Orac. Sibyll. iii, 652 sq.; Psalt. of Sol. xvii, 27, 28; Apoc. Baruch xxxix, 7–21, 2; lx, 9; lix, 2–6; 4 Ezra xxi, 32, 33; xiii, 27, 28, 58, 58.

7. Renunciation of Jerusalem.—Since the messianic
With this kingdom of glory in Palestine the eschatological expectation generally closes; indeed, many regard it as without an end. But afterwards the messianic kingdom is described as of a limited period, and in the Talmud the duration of this time is a matter of debate (Soncino, b. 90, col. 1). The same view is taken in the Baraita (b. 16), and the Baraita in the Targum of the twenty-sixth verse, viii, 29, 28. Wherever, therefore, a temporal duration is ascribed to the messianic kingdom, at the end of the time a renovation of the world and the last judgment is still expected.

9. Renovation of the World.—The hope of a renovation of heaven and earth is founded on Isa. lxx, 17; lxvi, 22 (see also Matt. xix, 28; Rev. xx, ii, 1; Pet. iii, 13). Accordingly, a distinction was made between the present world and the world to come, ἐν παρακάνειν τῷ θανάσι καὶ ἐν παράκανειν τῷ ἐκ πρωτοκόλλου. But there was a difference of opinion. Some would make the new world commence with the beginning of the messianic time (Enoch xiv, 4), others with its end (4 Ezra vii, 80, 3; x, 31). In accordance with these different views the messianic time is either identified with the world to come, or is still reckoned to the present world. But the older and more original view is the one which identifies the days of the Messiah with the world to come. On the "world to come" cf. Maimon, Bembach, i, 8; Sos., i, 1; Kedebiah, iv, 14; bar Samuel, x, 1-4; Abot, iv, 16; v, 19; Apoc. Baruch xiv, 15; xlvii, 50; lxiii, 8; 4 Ezra vi, 9; vii, 12, 18, 42, 48; viii, 8. 10. General Resurrection.—Before the last judgment is held, a general resurrection of the dead occurs. In general, there was a firm belief in the resurrection of the dead, which is for the first time intimated in Dan. xii, 2; and this belief was held by all who were more or less influenced by Chaldaism. Only the Sadducees denied the resurrection (Joseph. Ant. xviii, 1, 4; War, ii, 8, 14), and the Alexandrian theology substituted for it an immortality of the soul (Wisdom of Solomon iii, 1 sqq.; iv, 7; v, 16). The time between death and resurrection is for the righteous sufficiently long to await the wicked a provisional state of misery. The literature on this subject is very rich. See Bembach, u. s. p. 176-181, 203-206; Gfrörer, u. s. 275-285, 808 sqq.; Herrfeld, Gesch. d. Volkes Israel, iii, 307-310, 328-335, 349-351, 356-356; Langen, Das Judenthum in Politik, 338 sqq.; Roth, Dogmatik, ii, 67-72, 298-308; Oehler, Theologie des Alten Testaments, ii, 241 sqq.; Hermann Schultz, Altenmittelalterliche Theologie, 2d ed. p. 718 sqq.; Hamburger, Real-Encyklop. ii, 58 sqq. 11. Last Judgment, Eternal Bliss and Damnation.—A last judgment after the end of the world and of man’s period can only be thought of when the messianic kingdom is of a finite duration (see Baruch i, 4; 4 Ezra vii, 33-35). God himself in the judge of all men (Baruch ii, 4, 5; 4 Ezra vi, 2). In general it may be said that all Israel have a part in the future world (Soncino, x, 1), with the exception of the wicked, who are malice in their midst. Hence they are all holy (Psal. of Sol. xvii, 29, 29, 38, 48, 49; xviii, 9, 10). The life in the messianic kingdom is a perpetual λατρεύοντας τοῦ ἐν κοινωνίᾳ καὶ δικαιοσύνης ἰδίων θεοῦ (Luke i, 74, 70).
acquires a limited duration of hell-punishment (Mishna, Edapoth, ii, 10). The righteous and pious will be received into paradise, and will behold the majesty of God and of his holy angels. Their face shall shine like the sun, and they shall live like lions (Baruch ii, 8, 8; 4 Ezra vi, 1-3, 68-73; Assumptio Moyses ii, 9, 10).

Messmer, Joseph Anton, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born Oct. 17, 1829, and died at Munich, Dec. 23, 1879, doctor and professor of theology. Metatron, an angel frequently mentioned by rabbinical writers, and to whom they ascribe superior prerogatives. He is said to be "the king of angels," and to "ascend to the throne of glory above every hundred firmaments to carry up the prayers of the Israelites." He is supposed by some to have been the angel who conducted the Israelites through the wilderness, and by others to have been Enoch.

Motaawilah, a heretical Mohammadian sect, who maintain that the allegorical and not the literal meaning of the Koran is binding on the faithful. They are found principally in the district lying to the south and east of Tyre, in the regions contiguous to the sources of the Jordan, and in Cade-Syrus proper. They are an exclusive sect and recognize the supreme Imamite of Ali (q.v.).

Motez, Kenderick, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, devoted nearly the whole of his active life to educational work. For many years he was Hobart professor of the Greek and Latin languages and literature in the Hobart Free College, Geneva, N. Y. For some time he was a member of the standing committee of his diocese. In 1867 he was elected professor of rhetoric, and chaplain of the college. The following year he was Horace White professor of rhetoric and English literature, a position which he retained until his death, Oct. 80, 1872. See Proc. Episc. Alumnae, 1878, p. 134.

Meurer, Moritz, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Aug. 8, 1806, at Pretzschach, on the Elbe. He studied at Leipzig, was in 1833 teacher at the seminary in Weissenfels, in 1834 deacon at Walsenburg, and in 1838 pastor at Lichtenberg, and in 1841 pastorate at Calenberg, May 10, 1877. He is the author of biographical sketches on Luther, Catharine von Bora, Melanchthon, Bugenhagen, Myconius, etc. Besides he published, Musae, der Erzfeind Gottes (Walsenburg, 1868): Der Tyg zu Schleiden (Leipsic, 1857): Der Kirchenmantel der Strengsten und nach der Buvez des Lutherischen Kirchen (ibid. 1877). Movieva, an order of rigid Mohammedan monks. Their novices receive his preliminary training in the convent kitchen during the period of a thousand and one days, after which he is received into the order. Their doctrines are chiefly those of the Persian Soga (q.v.). Contrary to the teachings of the prophet they have introduced music and dancing into their worship. They are the best endowed of all the orders of Islam and use more perfume than any other sect; they drink coffee, and the plainest raiment, while they distribute much of their revenue in alms to the poor. They are the Dancing Dervishes of Turkey, and consist chiefly of the higher class of Turks. See Dervish; Mohammebander.

Mexican Religious Beliefs and Fables. The wondrous country lying between North and South America was long inaccessible, and much too wild, until A. von Humboldt and some modern travellers lighted up the darkness which hung over the country. The Mexicans accepted four world periods, according to the creation of the Greeks and the Romans: the first is called Atomia, the period of water; it began with the creation of the world, and its destruction by the flood; the second, Teotlania, the period of fire, the period in which we live, and which will end by a universal destruction by fire. At the end of each period the world was destroyed except a few pairs; they died not, but were changed into fish, and afterwards, into birds. The Noah of the Mexicans was called Cooxoz, and his wife Xokiquetzal. They saved themselves in a small ship, and landed on the mountain Cohuanin. Their children learned from wise birds languages so different that they could not understand

Meyboom, Ludwigo Toscón Pateros, a Dutch theologian, was born at Amersfoort, April 2, 1817. He studied at Groningen, where he also took his degree as doctor of theology. In 1854 he was called to Amsterdam, in spite of the protest of the orthodox party, and died November 18, 1874. Meyboom belonged to no-called party, and his belief was that Christianity, the historic Christ, the immortality of the soul, and the inexpressible energy of the Holy Spirit in the Church. He published, De Ida et Rebis in Facto Positis, in re Christiana aperte Conjectura (Groningen, 1849); — De Francisci Hemsterhazii Meritio (ibid. ed.); — History of the Kingdom of God (ibid. ed. 1854); — God of Jesus (1854 ed.); — Principles of the Neo-Christian Tendency (2nd ed. 1874). Meyer, Christian Gottlob, a Lutheran minister of Germany, was a convert from Judaism. From the preface of Prof. Semler, given to the German translation of Levita's Masoroth ha-Masoroth, we learn that Meyer, who was a native of Posen, was admitted into the Church by the Rev. Dr. Schultz of Halle. After his baptism Meyer studied theology at Halle, and here it was that he translated Levita's work, at the instance of Semler. After having completed his studies Meyer was admitted into the ministry, and in 1788 was called to the pastorate at Dasseneece, in the duchy of Grubenhagen. Besides Levita's work, he also published Semantica Sacrae Scripturae de Supplementis Et Testamentarum (Halle, 1775). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud., i, 870; Levita, Masoroth ha-Masoroth (Ger. transl. 1772). Meyer, Gottlob Wilhelm, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Lübeck, November 29, 1768. In 1801 he was university preacher at Göttingen, in 1804 professor of classics and preacher at Altona, and in 1818 doctor and professor of theology at Erlangen. He died May 19, 1816, leaving, De Notione Opii apud Hebraeos (Lübeck, 1788); — De Fidei cum Jehovah (Göttingen, 1797); — Versuch einer Hermeeneutik des Alten Testaments (Lübeck, 1800); — Grundriß einer Hermeeneutik des Alten und Neuen Testamentes (Göttingen, 1801); — Geschichte der Schriftenverhältnis und des Wiedereinsetzungs der Wissenschaften (1802-1806, 3 vols.); — Apologie der geschickten Aufklärung der historischen Bücher (Stuttgart, 1811). Meyer, Heidelich August Wilhelm, a famous German exegete, was born at Gota, January 10, 1800. He studied at Jena, passed his candidate's examination in 1821, and in 1823 was installed pastor at Osthaven. In 1829 appeared the first part of his work on the New Testament, including the Greek text and a German translation. In 1830 followed his Liber Symboli Sacratissimi Lutharianorum. In the same year, having previously obtained citizenship in the kingdom of Hanover, Meyer was appointed pastor at Harste, near Göttingen. In 1832 appeared the second part of his work on the New Testament, containing the commentary on the epistles and gospels. The original design was to embrace the whole commentary in two large volumes, but this he soon found to be impracticable; besides, he discovered that his own strength and time would not be sufficient to complete the work without assistance; accordingly he secured the services of Drs. Lüneburg, Huther, and Düsterdieck. In 1837 he was called as superintendent to Hoya, where he remained only four years. In 1841 he was called to Hanover, where he spent the rest of his life as member of consistory, superintendent, and head pastor. John's Custer, in 1841, he received the degree of doctor of theology from the faculty of the University of Göttingen. In 1848 he gave up his pastorate, retaining only his position in the consistory. In 1861 he was made member of the superior consistent, but in 1865 he retired from public life on a pension, which he received from the government. He died June 21, 1873.

Meyer's reputation beyond Hanover rests upon his contributions on the New Testament, and the excellence of his work was acknowledged not only on his own land, but in England and America, through Clark's translation. Meyer lived to see many editions of his work appear, and continued, down to the time of his death, to work diligently, making improvements. He grew with his task, and in each stage of his growth he expressed himself in his commentaries just as he felt. His study of the New Testament produced in him a more perfect experience of the saving grace and truth of the Gospel. As is the case with most scholars, Meyer became somewhat more dogmatical in his old age. The student who compares the last editions of the commentaries with the first will find wide differences: Meyer was constantly correcting himself, and with relentless honesty removing from his work what he had come to regard as defective. Since his death, the continuation of Meyer's commentary in new editions has been intrusted to Prof. Weiss in Berlin, who has associated himself with such scholars as Wende, Henrici, Sieffert, and others. See a biographical sketch of Meyer by his son, in the fourth edition of the Commentaries on the Philippian and Colossian Epistles, in the New Testament, 1735, and 1783, by R. Lichtenberger, etc. Nowell, in the Bibliothek der Aufklärer, ii, 58.

Meyer, Johann Andreas Georg, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born in Hildesheim in 1768, and died March 28, 1841, doctor of theology. He wrote, Luther das Verdenst des Christenthums (Erfurt, 1795); De charitate et caritate amabilis (Hanover, 1797); Versuch einer Verstehung und Erläuterung der Geschichte Jesu (1805); - Natur- Analogien, etc. (Hamburg, 1813). Meyer, Johann Matthias von, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Aschach in 1814. In 1839 he was vicar, in 1843 director of the teacher's seminary at Schwalbach, in 1844 preacher at Nordlingen, in 1845 at Munich, and in 1855 dean there. In 1872 he was made member of the superior consistory, and became its president at the death of Harless (q. v.). Meyer was born in 1815, died in 1889, doctor of theology, and member of the council of the Bavarian empire. He published a few sermons, for which see Zuchold, Bibl. Theol., ii, 880. (B. P.)

Meyer, Louis Georg Frédéric, a Lutheran minister of France, was born at Montbeliard, Jan. 1, 1839. He sailed from Liverpool to Switzerland, in 1859, became professor of French at Leipsic, and in 1863 he accompanied two young men to Paris, and took up his abode in the house of John Monod. In 1867 he succeeded Mr. Boissart as pastor of the Lutheran Church at Paris, and in 1857 president of consistory and ecclesiastical inspector, and died Oct. 11, 1867. Meyer advanced the cause of home missions within his church, and originated many institutions. After his death were published Sermons, Leiters et Proverbes. Miell, Edward, an English Independent minister and journalist, was born at Portsmouth in 1809. He was educated at the Dissenters' College at Wymondley, Herts, and served for three years an Independent congregation at Ware, and afterwards one at Leicester. In 1841 he went to London, and established the Non-conformist, a paper in the interests of religious equality, becoming proprietor and editor, a position which he continued to occupy until his death, April 30, 1881. He was several times a representative in Parliament, and wrote numerous works on political and ecclesiastical subjects.

Mic-Mac Version of the Scriptures. The Mic-Mac, or S couriaguie of French writers, are a North American Indian tribe, inhabiting the peninsula of Nova Scotia. Since Edward's Island, a portion of New Brunswick. A version of the Bible into that language is of recent origin. The gospels of Matthew and John were the first portions issued in 1854, by the British and Foreign Bible Society. In 1856 the book of Genesis and the gospel of Luke were also published, the translations being made by the Rev. S. T. Rank, who continued the work. Several portions of the Old Testament, and the entire New Testament, are at present published. The language has been treated by Maillard, Grammar of the Mic-Mac Language (1846). (B. P.)

Michmas. On this interesting locality, Lieut. Conder remarks as follows (Test Work, ii, 112 sq.):

'The site of the Philistine camp at Michmash, which Jonathan and his armorer-beard attacked, is very minutely described by Josephus. It was, he says, a precipice with three toes, ending in a long, sharp tongue, and protected by overhanging cliffs. Exactly such a natural fortress exists immediately to the west of the village of Motza, and it is still called "the fort" by the peasantry. It is a formidable escarpment rounded knobs above a perpendicular crag, ending in a narrow tongue to the sea, with cliffs below, and having an open valley behind it, and a saddle away from the central ridge. Opposite this fortress, on the south, there is a crag of equal height and seemingly impassable; thus the description of the Old Testament is fully borne out—a sharp rock on one side, and a sharp rock on the other' (1 Sam. iv, 4).

'The southern cliff, as we have noticed above, was called Seneb, or the saela, and the same name still applies to the modern valley, dip to the saela-trees which dot its course. The northern cliff was named Beaze, or 'shelter,' and the true explanation of the name only presents itself on the spot. The great vase is thus partly due east, and thus the southern cliff is almost entirely in shelter of the sea. The contrast is surprising and picturesque, between the dark, cool colliery of the cliff on one side and the rocky or tawny tints of the northern cliff, crowned with the gleaming white of the upper chalkly strata. The picture is unchanged since the days when Jonathan looked over to the white camping-ground of the Philistines. The trees have still not only been in existence for ages, but heightly as it does now, in the full light of an Eastern sun' (See illustration on following page).

Migas, Joseph, Ben-Moḳ Ben-Hal-Leri (also called Hasan [Bassean], from the initials of Ben-Moḳ Ben-Hal-Leri), one of the greatest Talmudic scholars of his time, was born at Granada in 1077. When twelve years of age he went to Cordova to attend the lecture of Isaac ben-Jacob Alfasi (q.v.), with whom he stayed for fourteen years. The master who gave him the ordination (Badek) was very proud of this scholar, of whom he used to say, that even in the age of Moses none could be found like him, and he appointed him as his successor in the presidency of the College of Cordova, which post he held for thirty-eight years (1108-41), until his death. Migne, Jacques Paul, a Roman Catholic theologian, was born at St. Flour, Cantal, France, Oct. 25, 1800. He was educated at the theological seminary in Orleans, acted for some time as professor at Châtillon, and after his ordination served as curate in the diocese of Orleans. In consequence of a controversy with his bishop respecting his (Migne’s) book upon the subject, he went to Paris, and started L’Univ. Religieuse, later called simply L’Univers. In 1833 he sold his interest in the paper, and went to Petit Montrouge, near Paris, where he soon built up an enormous printing establishment, to which he gave the name “Imprimerie Catholique.” From this proceeded the famous Patriarche Curamus Completus sive Bibliotheca Universialis, Integra, Uniformis, Commoda, *Economica Omnium SS. Miles, Henry D., an English Presbyterian clergyman, was born in 1699, and entered the ministry in early life. He was the minister of a church at Tooting, Surrey, for many years; a learned and ingenious man of considerable ability, and an eminent Christian. His skill in natural science led to his being elected a fellow of the Royal Society. In 1737 he was chosen assistant minister at the Old Jewry Church, where he preached once on the Lord’s Day for seven years, but resigned in 1744, and confined himself to Tooting, where he died, much regretted, Feb. 10, 1763. His first volume in this branch of religious literature, Our Hymns, their Authors and Origins, appeared in 1866; three years later a second edition was published, under the altered title of Singers and Songs of the Church (Loud. 1869), which has also been reprinted in New York. Miller, Samuel, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Princeton, N.J., Jan. 23, 1816, being the son of professor Samuel Miller of Princeton College. He graduated from the college in 1832, and the theological seminary in 1844, having been tutor in the college for several years in the meantime. He studied law, and while engaged in its practice prepared a full report of the great suit between the Old and New School branches of the Presbyterian Church at the time of the disunion. He was ordained in 1844, and after serving as stated supply at the Presbyterian Church at Mount Holly, N.J., for many years, became pastor in 1850. He also established a classical school of a high order, which continued there from 1845 to 1857. From 1858 he was pastor successively at Colonia and at Columbus for twenty years, and for four years of the churches of Zuckertown and Bas River. He was relieved from the charge of Mount Holly Church in 1873, but continued to supply various pulpits. In 1890 he was installed pastor of the Church of Oceanic, who had been until failing health obliged him to resign. He died at Mount Holly, Oct. 12, 1893. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem., 1894, p. 52. (W. F. S.)

Mills, Cyrus Taogart, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Paris, N.Y., May 4, 1819. He graduated from Williams College in 1844, and from Union Theological Seminary in 1847, 1848, and 1849 and went out as a missionary to Ceylon, having charge of the Battacotta Seminary. In 1855 failure of health obliged him to return. From 1856 to 1858 he was stated supply at Berkshire, N.Y., and in 1859 was president of the Oulsia College, in the Sandwich Islands, where he remained four years, and then resided for a year at Ware, Mass. In 1865 he was appointed agent of the Board of Commissioners of Foreign Missions to California, where he established in Brooklyn a female seminary. He died in California in 1884.

Minnot, Thomas, an Irish priest, was consecrated archbishop of Dublin on Palm Sunday in 1663. In 1666, the revenues of the precentor of St. Patrick's having been much reduced by the invasion of the Irish from the mountains, he united to that dignity the Church of Kilmainham. This addition was for the purpose of enabling the incumbent to live hospitably, give alms, and answer the expenses and charges of his office. About 1870 Minnot repaired part of St. Patrick's Church, which had been destroyed by fire. In 1873 he was one of those who advised the customs and assessments imposed, and other arbitrary measures enforced by William de Wind- sor, lord deputy. In 1674 he erected the Church of Ranelagh into a prebend, and in 1675 the royal mandate to attend a council to consider and provide against the hostilities of the O'Brien's of Thomond, who invaded Munster. But in June of 1675 he died in Lon-

Mira Basi, a subdivision of the Vallabha-charas (q.v.), originate by Miri Basi, who flourished in the reign of Akbar, and who was celebrated as the author of poems addressed to Vishnu. She was the daughter of a petty rajah, the sovereign of a place called Merti. Further than that her history is enveloped in fable.

Misler, Johann Nicolaus, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born in 1615. He was archdeacon at Marburg, was in 1652 professor of theology and Hebrew at Giessen, in 1654 doctor of theology, and died Feb. 20, 1683. He wrote, Serenismus Scripturae Sacrae: —Syr- nospis Theologiae Totius Christianae Religionis Systematice Theologi- siae sive de Deo Triino et Verbo Incarnato: —Speculum anti-judaicorum. —Disputationes: —V. de Sacra Scriptura s. Mitchell, Jacob Duché, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., Nov. 2, 1806. When eighteen years of age he entered the College of New Jersey, where he graduated in 1827, and in the same year went to Princeton Seminary and studied two years there. He was licensed to preach by the Oneida Presbytery, Sept. 18, 1829: first laborer in Albany, and was ordained as an evangelist, Nov. 17 of the same year. He afterwards served at Shepheardstown, Martinsburg, and Smithfield, in Jefferson Co., Va. In this early period of his ministry, and for years following, when he labored far and wide in Virginia as a revival preacher, all testi- monies agree that he exhibited extraordinary pulpit power. In 1832 he became pastor at Lynchburg. From 1833 to 1837 he served as secretary of the Central Board of Foreign Missions for Virginia and South Carolina. In 1838 he became pastor at Peaks, near Liberty, Va., where he labored for fourteen years, having very great success in winning souls. Next he went to Alexandria and labored as an evangelist in the Chesapeake Presbytery, and in 1873 and 1874 acted as general agent for Hampden Sidney College. He died June 28, 1877. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem., 1878, p. 23.

Mitchell, John S., D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born on Block Island, R.I., in 1800. In his twenty-third year he entered the Genesee Conference; from 1837 to 1842 was agent of the American Bible Society in Maryland; and in 1850 was transferred to the New York East Conference, in which he took promin- ent appointment as a pastor and presiding elder. In 1864 was secretary of the Freedman's Relief Association, and finally superintendent of missions in Virginia and North Carolina. He died at Newburgh, N.Y., Sept. 16, 1862. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1863, p. 95.

Mithron, a title of Mithras, the Persian sun- god.

Mispeh of Benjamin. Respecting this place Lieut. Conder remarks (Tenet Work, ii, 117):

"There are plenty of Mispehs in Palestine, but in places quite inapplicable, whereas, in the right direction there is no name of the kind (so far as has yet been discovered), for Sabsa is not apparently derived from Mispeh, but is a name very like that of Jeshaphat and the natives of the place say that it was called after a Jewish king. In the old times the town seems to have been a place under the title Jeshaphat.

"The early Christians placed Mispeh in another direction, and Not at Beth Nabi, which is famous in the history of Richard Lion Heart. Their site for Mispeh was near Sién, west of Jerusalem, and here we found a ruin with the title Shi'a, which in meaning is equivalent to the Hebrew Mispeh; but this place cannot be described as 'over against Jerusalem,' and its recovery is thus a matter of minor interest.

"There is another site which has been proposed for Mispeh, though it is merely a conjecture, and not a name which might lead to the identification: this site is the remarkable hill called Nebi Samwil, north of Jerusalem. The place is conspicuous from the tall minaret which crowns the old crusading church on the summit, and within the church is the cenotaph now revered by the Moslems as the tomb of Samuel—a modern monument covered with a green cloth.

"The crusaders, with their usual contempt for facts, fixed on this hill as the ancient Shi'a; they also called it Ramah, and added besides a title of their own. 'Two miles from Jerusalem,' says Sir John Manville, 'is Mount Joy, a very fair and delicious place. There Samuel the prophet lies in a fair tomb, and it is called Mount Joy because it gives joy to pilgrims' hearts, for from that place men first see Jerusalem.'

"The tradition which places Samuel's tomb here seems, however, to be only recent. Rabbi Benjamin of Tudela, who is a tolerably safe guide as regards Jewish sacred sites, discourses the story and speaks of a change of site. 'When the Christians took Ramleh, which is Ramah, from the Mohammedans,' says the rabbi, 'they discovered the sepulchre of Samuel the Ramathite near the Jew- ish synagogue, and removed his remains to Shi'a, where they erected a large place of worship for him, called St. Samuel of Shi'a to the present day.'"

Nebi Samwil is fully described in the Memoirs to the Ordnance Survey, iii, 12, 149, according to the law of Mohammed, as being indifferent.

Mobaedians, a name given to the followers of the famous Mohammedan impostor Borkai or Mokana (q. v.). They made an insurrection in the province of Khorasan against the caliph Mahdi, who, however, at length defeated them. Their name is derived from an Arabic word signifying white, the color of their dress by which they were distinguished from the adherents of the caliph, who were clothed in black garments.

Mobeds are the officiating priests among the Parsees of India. They read the holy books in the temples, and superintend all the religious ceremonies, but being themselves unlearned, they seldom understand the meaning of what they read, or the prayers they recite. The mobeds are distinct from the dastars, who are doctors and exponents of the law. There is also an inferior order of clergy among the Parsees, called hirdas, who have immediate charge of the sacred fire, and sweep and take care of the temple. The priests receive their office by inheritance, and have no fixed salary, but are paid for their services. Many of them follow secular employments.

Moberley, George, D.D., D.C.L., an English priest, was born in St. Peter'sburg in 1803. He was educated at Winchester School, and graduated from Balliol College, Oxford, in 1829; was for some years tutor and fellow there; in 1835 was appointed head-master of Winchester School; in 1866 rector of Brixton, in the Isle of Wight; in 1868 a canon of Chester; in 1869 bishop of Salisbury, and died July 7, 1885. Dr. Moberley was the author of numerous sermons and essays, also one of the five clergyman who published revised versions of several parts of the New Testament.

Modin. El-Modiieh, the modern representative of this place, famous in the Maccaenian history, is fully described in the Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey, ii, 341 sq. (See illustration on p. 782.)

Moffat, Nicol de, a Scotch priest, was elected bishop of the see of Glasgow in 1260. He died at Timningham, in East Lothian. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 241.

Moffat, Robert, D.D., an eminent English missioner, was born at Inverkeithing, Fifehire, Scotland, Dec. 21, 1795. He was originally a gardener, and was brought up within the fold of the Secession Church, to which his parents belonged. In 1816, having resolved to become a missionary to the heathen, he offered his ser-
Mogon, Angola, etc., in Africa. They are a kind of genii or spirits, and are in subordination to a superior being, called by the natives Zambian-Pongo. Their idols are composed either of wood or stone; a few are erected in temples or temples, but the much greater part in the public streets and highways. Some are in the form of four-footed beasts, others are like birds. To these the negroes bow, and offer sacrifices to appease their anger, or to obtain their favor.

Mokudjye, a sect of the Anamians (q. v.).

Moladah. Khurbet el-Milh, the probable representative of this locality, is seven miles and three quarters south-west of Tell Arad, and thirteen and a quarter east of Beersheba. It is briefly described in the Memoire accompanying the Ordnance Survey (iii, 415), and more fully by Tristram, Bible Places (p. 19), as follows:

"The two wells are in the shallow valley, very thinly built of marble, about seventy feet deep, their sides scored with the ropes of the water-drawers of many centuries. The ground around is strewn with records of the Roman occupation. Fragments of shafts and capitals, probably the support of roofs that collapsed from the weight of huge marble water-trenches, lie around the mouth. There traces (that are not in the north to the south) stand a small isolated 'tell' or hill, covered with ruins, and now used as a burying-ground of the Dhaman tribe. This hill was the market place of the city, and its name, Josephus; and we could clearly trace the circuit of the wall that once surrounded it, nearly square in shape, and still in places three or four feet high. The traces of buildings and fragments of walls cover an extensive area both south and north of the city; and near its feet, on the south-east, are the outlines of a building, probably a Byzantine church. The other ruins seem to belong to an earlier and more enduring, and are perhaps the remains of the town of Simeon."

Molobideya, a name sometimes applied to the Ammassis (q. v.).

Moltor, Wilhelm, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born Aug. 24, 1819, at Zweibrucken. He first practiced law, but in 1849 betook himself to the study of theology at Bonn, was given holy orders in 1851 at Spira, was in 1857 cathedral dean and in 1864 doctor of theology, a distinction conferred on him by pope Pius IX. In 1868 the same pope called him to Rome as consultor of the Vatican council. Moltor died Jan. 1, 1890, at Spira. He published, in connection with Hilskamp, Papst Pius IX in seinem Leben und Wirken (3d ed. 1873). (B. P.)

Moll, Carl Bernhard, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Wolfzah, Pomerania, Nov. 29, 1886. He studied at Berlin and Greifswald, and entered the ministry in 1880 at Naugard. In 1884 he was called to Lókken near Stettin, in 1885 to Stettin, in 1880 as professor of theology to Halberstadt, and in 1860, general superintendent of the province of Prussia. He died Aug. 17, 1878, at Königsberg, leaving, Die georgische Notb der evangelischen Kirche Preussen (Pawelack, 1843): Das Heil in Christo in Predigten (Halle, 1852): Das System der profanen Theologie im Grundriß dargestellt (1857): Christologia in Epistola ad Hebreaos (1854-55): De Justo Atributatorum Dei Discrimation (1855): Zeugnisse vom Leben in Christo in Predigten (1856). For Lange's Bibliothek he wrote the commentary on the Psalms and on the Epistle to the Hebrews. See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. ii, 892 sq. (B. P.)

In 1572 he was called to the ministry at Kesseldorf, and in 1575 to Sprottau, Lower Silesia. In 1600 he was appointed pastor primarius at Görlitz, in Upper Lausitza, and died March 2, 1606. Besides his Prosia

MONDARI VERSION of the SCRIPTURES. The Mondari is spoken by the Koles of Chota Nagpur, Bengal Presidency. The Rev. N. Nottrott, of the German Missionary (Gonner's) Society, translated the gospel of Matthew into the Mondari in 1875, which was printed in 1876 by the Calcutta Auxiliary. In 1878 the gospel of Luke was printed, and between 1881 and 1882 the gespel of John and Matthew followed. The work of translation was done by the missionary already mentioned and the Rev. L. Beyer. Each translator revised the work of the other by the help of native assistants.

Mongolian Version of the Scriptures. In the Mongolian there exist different versions: I. The Burait, or Northern Mongolium, for the Buraita about lake Baital, in Siberia, and for the Kakia tribes of Mongolia. In 1824 the New Test. was printed at St.
Petersburg, under the superintendence of Bishop Schiefer, who, with the aid of two learned Buraitas, had commenced the translation, but during the work one of the Buraitas died. The surviving Burait was afterwards associated with Meisen, Swan, Stallybras, and Yulje, missionaries at Seling, in the translation of the Old Testament and the revision of the New Test.
The Old Test. was translated from the Hebrew, with constant reference to such critical apparatus as could be obtained. The style of writing adopted in this version is reconcileable place between the vulgar colloquial language of 1821-31, of the people, which are different districts, and the abstruse modes of expression employed in some of their books. It is above the common business dialect, but not so much higher as to place the subject beyond the reach of any one of common understanding. This edition was completed at Khodon, Siberia, in 1840, and during the same year. Swan and Stallybras accomplished a fresh translation of the New Test., from the original Greek, based on the version previously made. An edition of this Testament was completed at press in 1846 at the expense of the British and Foreign Bible Society, while a reprint of it was undertaken in 1878 by the Academy of Sciences at St. Petersburg, under the editorship of Mr. Schiefer, in the Mongolian type instead of the Manchu character, reducing thereby the size of the book by two thirds. This edition was completed at press in 1899, under the editorship of Mr. Pomme, professor of Mongolian in the St. Petersburg University, who had taken the place of superintendent after the death of professor Schiefer.

II. The Kulmuck, or Western Mongolium, for the Kalmucks of the Don and Volga, in Rossia and Eschiuchkalmucks, and Soungars, of Mongolia. In this dialect there exist translations of the gospels of Matthew and John and of the Acts of the Apostles, published between 1815 and 1822. Concerning these efforts of translation and the Kulmucks themselves we read the following in the annual report of the British and Foreign Bible Society for the year 1877: "The Kalmucks are a Mongolian of Astrakhan, about whose mode of life and habits not much is known in Western Europe. While it is not likely that they, at the present time at least, in any way answer to the description given of themselves to the patriarchs as a third of their chief deacon, recorded by Macarius, and quoted by dean Stanley in his Eastern Church — where, being brought into the presence of the patriarch, they are represented as saying to him, 'When we have conquered a man, we cut away his nose, and then carve him into pieces and eat him. Good Lord, whenever you have any men deserving of death, do not trouble yourself about their guilt or punish- ment, but give them us to eat, and you will do us a great kindness' — they are certainly in a very low state of civilization, even though their chiefs are sometimes educated in Russian schools. Mission work was begun among them early in the present century, and by the preaching of the Gospel and circulation of the Scriptures, parts of which had been translated into Kalmyck by the missionary Conrad Neitzl, and others, and subsequently revised by the laboring under the auspices of the emperor Alexander I, and of the British and Foreign Bible Society, a number of conversions took place. But days of trouble and persecution fell upon the mission, and in a recent letter the pastor of the Moravian settlement of Sarpepta, founded with the express purpose of evangelizing the Kalmyks, forms your agent that at present no thorough knowledge of Kalmyck is possessed by any of the brethren. A search made in the archives of the village revealed the presence of a few copies of the gospels of Matthew and John, besides a number of Kalmyck tracts. A copy of each of the gospels having been sent by you to London, specimen pages of a reduced and convenient size have been printed by the photographic process. These were forwarded to Sarpepta, and we now await the result of their critical examination by learned Kalmyck interpreters, the day when they may, and to know the extent of the labors of the brethren themselves. Should these be deemed satisfactory, and the committee otherwise see fit to proceed with the printing of the Scriptures in the vernacular of this tribe, future reports may contain something more interesting and instructive about the progress of Bible work among its members."

From the report for the year 1880 we learn that the agent of the British and Foreign Bible Society at St. Petersburg has been authorized to employ M. Podznieff and archpriest Smirnoff to translate the gospel of Matthew. M. Podznieff assures me that Kalmucks are among the Kalmyks, will see that the words and idioms are suited to the people. On this plan there will be reason to hope that an excellent translation will be prepared. It is to be feared that until the other books of the New Testament have been translated, the translation of the gospels will be slow."

In the 11th century a mystic Christian sect appeared in the north of Italy, having its headquarters at Montfort, in the neighborhood of Turin. Their president or leader was one Gerhard, who was called upon by Heribert, archbishop of Milan, to give an account of his doctrines. They were considered heretics, and subjected to great persecution, which they bore with the spirit of martyrs; but the sect made little progress.

Montgomery, Robert, a distinguished English missionary, was born at Bangor, Aug. 19, 1811. He studied at Edinburgh and was licensed by his presbytery about the end of 1841, and a few weeks afterwards was set apart for the mission to India. In 1843 he was stationed at Poorbunder, on the western coast, and three years later was transferred to Surat. He early acquired a scholarly knowledge of Gujarati, into which he translated the Epistle to the Romans and the Song of Songs in Isiash: likewise two little volumes by Dr. Barth, entitled, Scripture Stories of the Old and New Testament. He also prepared a Dictionary, English and Gujarati, which stands now as a help to all students of that language. His pentameter poem, Sacred Songs, was included in the Gujarati Book of Praise. When he returned in broken health in 1876, advantage was taken of his presence to appoint him moderator of the General Assembly. He was one of the delegates at the general missionary conference in London in 1879. Montgomery died in November, 1880. (B.P.)

Monod, Horlacq, an eminent French Protestant minister, the youngest son of Jean (q.v.), was born in Paris, Jan. 20, 1814. He studied at Lausanne and Strasbourg, and in 1830 was deacon at Marseilles.
MOODIE, WILLIAM, D.D., a Scotch Presbyterian minister, who died June 11, 1811, in the fifty-third year of his age, was one of the ministers of St. Andrew’s Church, Edinburgh, from 1787, and professor of Hebrew and Oriental languages in the University from 1798. He was a man of considerable literary acquirements, very popular as a preacher, and the author of several works. A volume of his Sermons has been published, to which is prefixed a biography of the author (Edinburgh, 1817, 8vo.).

MOODY, Louis, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Dauphin County, Pa., July 4, 1776. After graduating from Princeton College, in 1796, he studied theology with Rev. James Sandgate, and was licensed by the Presbyterian Church in 1801. In 1803 he was ordained as the same presbytery pastor of Middle Spring, where he remained until his death, in 1857. During the latter years of his life he was unable to perform his ministerial work. He was a laborious, faithful, and successful pastor. See Alexander, Presb. Coll. 18th Cent.

MOORE, John L., D.D., a pioneer Baptist minister, was born in Lewis County, N. Y., Feb. 17, 1803. He was converted at the age of twenty-two; graduated from the Hamilton Institute in 1821; was ordained at the same year at Watervliet; visited and preached in several of the larger towns of Ohio, under the direction of the Home Mission Society; and in 1834 settled in Piqua, in that state, spending half his time with a new church at Troy. Next year he was elected pastor in that church for two years, and then, for eight years, was in the service of the Ohio Convention, acting a part of the time as an agent of the college at Granville, now Denison University. After a short pastorate in Springfield, he devoted himself to promoting the interests of the theological seminary at Fairmount, and became an expending missionary in Ohio, and finally gave up public life, preaching occasionally. He died in Topeka, Kansas, Jan. 23, 1878. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclopedia, p. 812. (J. C. S.)

MOORE, Smith William, D.D., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born Nov. 1, 1818, in North Carolina. He was converted in 1837, and entered Randolph-Macon College in 1838, but was obliged to leave a few months before graduation. He then taught school in Tennessee for two years, preaching in the meanwhile, and joined the Tennessee Conference in 1844, when he was ordained deacon. From 1840 to 1844, he was a Professor in the Female College at Athens, Ala., when he was elected president, which position he resigned in 1853 to accept the vice-presidency of La Grange College. After a few months he resigned this position, and being transferred to Memphis Conference, became president of both La Salle Female Seminary and Seis position he held several years. One year he was agent of the Book and Tract Society, and at the same time one of the editors of the conference paper, Christian Advocate. In 1866 he was appointed president of Andrew College at Florence, Tenn., where he continued four years. The remainder of his life was given to the itinerancy, his last appointment being Central Church, Memphis, in 1879. He died at Brownsville, Sept. 2, 1890. Dr. Moore was a polished scholar, skilled theologian, and faithful Christian. His preaching was clear, strong, interesting and impressive. He was a generous, kind, studious, prayerful, laborious, pure in heart, chaste in speech, consistent in life, catholic as well as evangelical, and profoundly earnest as a minister of the gospel. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1895, p. 167.

MOORE, Thomas Verner, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Newville, Pa., Feb. 1, 1816. He graduated from Dickinson College in 1838; became agent for the Pennsylvania Colonization Society, graduated from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1842; and was ordained pastor at Carlisle the same year; was settled at Greenwich in 1845: the First Church, Richmond, Va., in 1847; editor of the Central Presbyterian.

MORAVIA, Andrew DR., a Scotch prelate, was bishop of Moray from 1224 to 1242, in which year he died. He had his See in Ross, and his See prelate laid the foundations of the Moray Deanery, which was dedicated to the Holy Trinity, and ordered to be the cathedral church of Moray forever. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 138.

MORAY, DAVID, a Scotch prelate, was consecrated bishop of the see of Moray in 1229, at Arignon. He died Jan. 20, 1236. This prelate founded the Scots College at Paris in 1235. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 140.

MORAY, GILBERT, a Scotch prelate, was consecrated bishop of the see of Caithness in 1222. He died at Scrabster in 1245, after having built and consecrated the cathedral church of Caithness, at Dornoch. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 207.

MORNING HYMN. In the Apostolical Constitutions mention is made of a hymn for the morning, which is there, however, called the morning prayer. Other writers term it the hymn, the angelical hymn, and the great doxology. It ran in these words: "Glory be to God on high, on earth peace, good will towards men. We praise thee, we bless thee, we glorify thee, we worship thee, O Holy High and Majestic God, who art in the truth, the only begotten, whom no one can approach, for thy great glory. O Lord, heavenly king, God the Father Almighty; Lord God, the Father of Christ, the immaculate Lamb, who taketh away the sin of the world, receive our prayer, thou that sittest upon the cherubim. For thou only art holy, thou only, Lord Jesus, the Christ of God, the God of every created being, and our King. By whom unto thee be glory, honor, and adoration." This hymn was used daily in the ancient morning service, and is still used in the modern Greek Church.

Morrison, John Hunter, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Wallkill Township, Orange Co., N.Y., June 29, 1806. He studied at Bloomfield Academy, N.J.; graduated from Princeton College in 1844; and from the theological seminary there in 1847; and was ordained the same year. Soon after, he sailed for India, and thenceforward his whole ministerial life was spent in the foreign missionary work, in connection with the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, including two brief visits to his native land. During one of these, in 1865, he was elected moderator of the General Assembly. It was at his suggestion, while in India, that the first week of January was set apart for united prayer for the conversion of the world to Christ. He lived and labored successively at Allahabad, Agra, Sabathu, Simla, Ambala, Lahore, Rawal Pindi, Dehra Doin, and died at the last-named place, Sept. 16, 1881. Dr. Morrison was a man of rare devotion to his work. See Necrolog. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem., 1882, p. 86.

Morris, Interpreted, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was rector of St. Paul's Church, in Steubenville, O., for many years, until 1865, when he removed to Gambier. He died Feb. 13, 1866. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1867, p. 55.

Morris, Jannes, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at Newburyport, Mass., Oct. 25, 1779. After acquiring the rudiments of an education at the public schools of his native town, he commenced to learn the joiner's trade; but in his seventeenth year entered Harvard College, and graduated in 1800. He taught the grammar school at Bowdoin in Maine and in Brookline after leaving college, and began the study of theology. Soon after, he was employed as lay-reader at Cambridge, and some time later completed his theological course under bishop basan. He was ordained deacon, July 3, 1805; became assistant to the bishop in St. Paul's Church; in November following rector; and died in that position, April 26, 1842. Among his literary remain is a number of published sermons, addresses, etc. See Sprague, Anmals of the Amer. Pulpit, v. 492.

Mortar, a broad bowl of brass, latten, or copper, either with a pricket for a thick lighted taper, or else filled with a mixture of perfumed wax and oil, in which a broad wick was kept burning both at festivals and funerals. See Mortar at St. Mary Magdalen College, Oxford.

Mosche, Gabriel Christian Benjamin, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Grosen-Seer, in the principality of Schwarzburg-Sondershausen, March 6, 1728. He studied at Jena, and for some time assisted his father in the ministry. In 1748 he was preacher at Erfurt, and lecturer at the university, in 1759 superintendent at Arnstadt, in 1773 preacher at Frankfurt-on-the-Main, and died Feb. 8, 1791. He published, De Ann. Seregetami Judicia Socia (Jena, 1747); Das Gesetze der Summen Nationa Superstiti in Inleute Leit- gterum (Erfurt, 1750); —Commentatio de Contemplationis Mortis Atque Resurrectionis Jesu Christi Evan Hominis Amor (Jena, 1758); —De Rediui Christi in Vitam (Arnstadt, 1758); —Triplex Gloriae Coloniae Magnitud (Jena, 1760); besides a number of sermons and ascetical works. Motu Version of the Scriptures. The Motu is a dialect spoken by the natives round Port Moresby, New Guinea, hence it is also called the Port Moresby or New Guinea dialect. The Rev. J. Chalmers translated the first three gospels, and of these the gospel of Mark has been carefully revised by the Rev. W. G. Lawes, and an edition of five hundred copies was printed at Sydney during the year 1881 by the New South Wales Auxiliary to the British and Foreign Bible Society, Mr. Lawes, who is preparing other portions for the press, says, concerning the gospel of Mark: "This is the first portion of the Scriptures translated into any language of south-east New Guinea. The Dutch missionaries at Dobuay, at the extreme north-west of the island, I think, translated a portion into the language spoken there, but, with that possible exception, this is the beginning of the work of translation on New Guinea." From the report of the British and Foreign Bible Society for 1885, we learn that the gospel of Mark, which has been circulated, is more widely read than was expected. The gospels of Matthew and Luke were also revised by Mr. Lawes, and printed at Sydney in 1882, while the gospels of John, by which he translated himself, was published in 1884. (B. P.)

Moulinié, Charles Etienne Francois, a Swiss Protestant theologian, was born July 25, 1757. He studied at his birthplace, Geneva, and was ordained in 1781. In 1798 he was pastor at Saconnet, in 1794 at Darguad from 1755 to 1829 at Geneva. He died Aug. 3, 1836. Moulinié was a prolific writer, who left seventeen volumes in manuscript to the library of the ministers association at Geneva. Of his published works to be mentioned, Lett. de la Parole (1788), a catechism — Notice sur les Livres Apocryphes de l'Antic. Testament (1829). See Gautier, Notice sur les Lettres et les Écrits de M. le Pasteur Moulinié, in the Christt. 1821, studied one year at Andover Theological Seminary, and was admitted to a priest's orders March 15, 1822, being South Parish, now Southold, Long Island, where he remained until 1827, when he became rector of St. John's Church, Northampton. For two years (1831-33) he was rector of Trinity Church, Saco, Me., and then was professor of sacred literature in the junior department of the Williams College, Williamstown, Mass. From 1841 to 1843 he was rector of St. Paul's Church at Middletown, Conn., and remained at that place without parochial charge until his death, Feb. 16, 1884. Dr. Muenchener had a decided musical taste, and in 1885 published Church Choir, a collection of sacred music. For several years he was editor of the Gambier Observer and the Western Episcopalian, and contributed largely to theological reviews and religious periodicals. In 1885 he published a Manual of Biblical Interpretation, in 1886 a Revised Version of the Book of Proverbs; in 1876, Orthography and Pronunciation of the English Language. See Necrology of Brown University, 1885-86. (J. C. S.)

Muhlenberg, William Augustus, D.D., LL.D., a distinguished Protestant Episcopal clergyman, great-grandson of Dr. Henry Melchior, was born in Philadelphia, Sept. 16, 1736. He entered the University of Pennsylvania at the age of fourteen years, and graduated in 1754. Having pursued a course of theological study, he became a clergyman in the Episcopal Church in 1754, and for five years was assistant rector of Christ Church, Philadelphia, being associated with Bishop White. In 1768 he became rector of St. James Church in Lancaster, in 1782, principal of St. Paul's College in Flushing, L. I.; in 1846, rector of the Church of the Holy Communion, in the city of New York; in 1858, superintendent and pastor of St. Luke's Hospital, New York (which he largely instrumental in founding), as also the church village of Johnland, on Long Island, holding this office until his death, April 9, 1877. In 1824 there appeared in the Episcopal Register, of Philadelphia, his admirable hymn, entitled "I would not live alway," which has been incorporated into nearly every standard church hymn-book. Many years afterward, when he was the editor of the Evangelical Catholic, Dr. Muhlenberg explained the circumstances of its history. He was the author of, Church Poetry (1825): — Music of the Church (1852): — The People's Singer (1858). His life was devoted to public and private forms of Christian philanthropy. See his Life and Work, by Anne Ayres (N. Y. 1880). (J. C. S.)

Mühlhäuser, Carl August, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born in 1825, at Kleinikems, in Baden. He studied at Heidelberg, was for some time vicar and deacon at Carlsruhe, and in 1852 pastor at Solzfeld. In 1857 he was called as member of the ecclesiastical council to Heidelberg, but retired in 1864, when the liberal party had obtained its influence upon ecclesiastical affairs. He went as pastor to Wilferdingen, where he died Jan. 20, 1881. Mühlhäuser seemed to have been prepared to be the leader of the Christian party of his country. Everywhere where his counsel was asked for, and his work was appreciated by the Bonn University, which honored him with the doctorate of divinity. He published, Die christliche Weltanschauung (Heilbronn, 1876): Christentum and die Propheten (Jena, 1883); — he also edited O. Röhrs's Brief Johannes präisch erklärt (Wittenberg, 1858). (B. P.)

Muir, James, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Cumnock, Scotland, April 12, 1757. After the usual course of classical and philosophical studies at the University of Glasgow, at which he graduated in 1778, he went to America, being ordained in Edinburgh. In 1781 he was ordained an evangelist and sent to Bermuda, in 1785 joined the New Brunswick Presbytery, and in 1789 became pastor of the Presbytery Church in Alexandria, Va., where he died, Aug. 8, 1820. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Presb., iii, 516; Kirk, John, a famous Samoset scholar, was born at Glasgow in 1816. He studied at his native place, and in 1828 went to Bengal in the service of the East India Company, where he interested himself in the moral and religious welfare of the natives, and for this purpose published, among other works, in 1839, A Sketch of the Arguments for the Argument Against Hinduism, and of the Examination of Religions. In 1853 he returned to his native country. He died March 8, 1882, at Edinburgh. Muir's main work is Original Samoet Texts, on the Origin and History of the People of India, their Religion and Customs; and in 1866 they were published in 700 volumes, which were responsible for the student of ancient Hindu life and thought, dealing principally, as it does, with the Vedic period of Indian literature. The first volume discusses the legendary accounts of the origin of the castes; the second, the primitive home of the Hindus; the third, the opinions of Hindu writers on the Vedas; the fourth, the contrast between Vedic and later Hindu theology; and the fifth, the cosmological and mythological conceptions of the Indians in the Vedic age. (B. P.)

Muirhead, Andrew, a Scotch prelate, was first rector of Codzow, and next preferred to the see of Glasgow in 1840. He came in 1838, at the age of forty, to England in 1842, in order to negotiate a truce between the two nations. He died Nov. 20, 1883. This prelate founded the vicars of the choir at Glasgow, and beautified the cathedral. He also established a hospital, which he dedicated to St. Nicholas. See Keith, Scotch Prelates, vii, 147. (B. P.)

Mullen, Joseph, D.D., an English Congregational minister, was born in London, Sept. 2, 1820. He gave his heart to the Saviour at the age of fifteen, and joined the Church a year later. He was educated at Cowan College, and in 1841 graduated B.A. from the University of London. In 1843 he was accepted for service by the London Missionary Society. He then studied for a time in Edinburgh University. He was ordained Sept. 5, 1843, and sailed for India on the 9th. On his arrival at Calcutta he entered the institution at Bowrapore, and in 1846 became pastor of the first church there, in which office he continued for twenty years. He rendered important service to the society by the collection of carefully prepared statistics. In 1866 he returned to England to assist Dr. Tisdall in the foreign secretaryship of the society. This office he held till his death, which occurred in 1878. He visited America in 1875 and 1876 as an annual meeting of the American Board of Foreign Missions. In 1873 he visited Madagascar in the interest of the mission there. While making a journey to the heart of Africa to establish the mission at Tanyaraka he died, July 10, 1878. Dr. Mullen is the author of, Twelve Months in Madagascar (London, 1873): — Vedanism, Brahmanism, and Christianity: — Religious Aspects of Hindustan: — Missions in India, and several other works on missionary subjects. See (Lond.) Cong. Yearbook, 1880, p. 342. (B. P.)

Müller, Alexander, a Roman Catholic canonist of Germany, who was born at Zell in 1780, and died at Mayence in 1844, is the author of, Encyklopädisches Handbuch des gesammten in Deutschland Kirchenrechts (Erfurt, 1829-32, 2 vols.). — Ueber die Wehrhaftigkeit der Reorganisation des Corpus Evangelicum (Leipzig, 1838). — Erzbischöfe und Erzbischöfe (Jena, 1838). — Totale, zwei, dritte und vierte Gesetzsammlung (Jena, 1833). Müller, Christian Gottfried, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Dec. 28, 1747, at Zeitz, near Marienburg. In 1780 he was rector at Schleiz, in 1786 at Naumburg, in 1788 at Zeitz, and died Aug...
MÜLLER, Johann Georg (1), a Roman Catholic prelate of Germany, was born at Coblenz, Oct. 15, 1738. He studied at different universities, took holy orders in 1821, and received the degree of doctor of theology in 1837. In the same year he was professor of Church History and Latin at the University of Trier, in 1847 elected bishop of Münster, and died in 1870. He published, Ueber die Architektur der ersten Kapitel des Evangeliums nach Matthäus (Trieres, 1830) — Die Bäldischen Darstellungen im Sacramentar der christlichen Kirchen (ibid. 1865). See Winer, Handbuch der theolog. Lit., i, 86, 230; Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. ii, 416. (B. P.)

Müller, Johann Tobias Immanuel, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born in 1763, and died at Erfurt, in 1812. He is best known by his edition of Das evangelische Konkordienbuch, etc. (Stuttgart, 1860 and often). (B. P.)

Müller, Julius, a Protestant theologian of Germany, and brother of Karl Ottfried (q.v.), was born at Breslau, in 1795. He studied jurisprudence at Breslau and Göttingen, according to the wish of his father, and at both universities Müller's dissertations gained prizes, so that in 1817 the faculty at Göttingen made him doctor of laws. But the ideal of a happy life was present itself to his mind, and he betook himself to the study of theology at Göttingen. He soon felt that the then Göttingen theology could not satisfy him, and so returned to Breslau, in 1822, to continue his theological studies. While Tholuck was on a visit to Breslau, Müller, at the suggestion of a friend, visited him. He afterwards carried on a correspondence with Tholuck, whose personality, rather than theology, influenced him. In the spring of 1822, Müller, by the urgent advice of Tholuck, went to Berlin, where Strauss, Neander, and Tholuck, but not Schleiermacher, met the demands of his heart and mind. In 1825 he was called to the pastorate of Schönbrunn and Rosen, near Strelen. Here he wrote his Zur Begründung der Schrift, die katholische Kirche Schleismen (Breslau, 1827). A second edition was soon called for. Soon after, he came into conflict with the ecclesiastical authorities, by refusing to introduce the new liturgy, and in May, 1826, announced this as his final decision to the "consistorium." His official relations to the Church were thus endangered; but he was happily delivered from the inconvenience of a removal from his pastorate by a call, in 1828, to Göttingen, as university-preacher, with the promise of a professorship as soon as he should publish a learned book. In 1832 he commenced his academic career by publishing Lutheri de Praedestinatione et Libero Arbitrio Doctrina. He soon was made professor. In 1834 an urgent call as professor of systematic theology to Marburg could not be refused, and when Müller preached his last sermon in Göttingen (March, 1855), Lücke, in behalf of the university, presented him with the degree of doctor of divinity. The contributions which Müller made to the Studien und Kritiken after 1859 prepared the way for the work which has immortalized the name of this great Christian lexicographer (Engl. transl. The Christian Doctrine of Sin, Edinburgh, 1877, 2 vols.), of which several editions have been published. In 1883 Müller accepted a call to Halle, where, with Tholuck, he became the chief centre of attraction and activity of the students. In 1885 he founded, in collaboration with Neander and Nitzsch, the Deutsche Zeitschrift für christlich. Wissenschaft und christlichen Leben, to which he contributed many valuable articles, which, for the most part, have appeared in his Dogmatische Abhandlungen (Bremen, 1870). In the summer of 1878 he resigned his professorship (March, 27-29, 1878. A provision of his will stipulated that all his manuscripts should be destroyed. His works, besides those already mentioned, are Die Miraculorum Jesu Christi Natuara et Necessitate (Marburg, 1839); Lutheri et Coelestis Sententiae de Contra Sepulcrum (Halle, 1853); Die evangelische Union, ihr Wesen und gottesliches Recht (Berlin, 1854), besides several volumes of sermons. Münier, David, a Protestant theologian of Geneva,
MURCH 738 MYSLENTA

was born in 1798. He studied at his birthplace, and was admitted to the ministry in 1819 on presenting De Evangelio Primitivo. In the same year he went to Havre and then to Paris. In the latter place he made the acquaintance of Cousin, and Jean Monod. In 1825 Muriel was called to Chêne, in the neighborhood of Geneva, and in 1826 he commenced his lectures on the New Test. at the theological faculty at Geneva, where he was rector from 1832 to 1837. In 1835 he founded The Presbyterian minister, and took a lively interest in all matters pertaining to the welfare of the Church. His public life has been divided into three periods: from 1825 to 1841 a parishan in the Church and the academy; from 1847 to 1862 a religious conciliator; from 1862 to 1872 a laborious veteran. He died Oct. 9, 1872. His discourses are found in the Parables (1838): — The Miracles (1841): — The Reading of the Bible (1850): — The Divinity of Christianity in History (1853), etc. See De la Rive, in the Journal de Genève; Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. Murch, William Harris, D.D., an English Baptist minister, was born at Hounton, Devon, May 17, 1784. He was baptized in May, 1802, by Rev. Dr. Riggen, and united with the Carter Lane Church, London. Subsequently he became assistant pastor with the celebrated John Foster, and then solo pastor of the Church at Sheppard's Barton, Frome. In 1827 he was appointed president of the theological college at Mineral College, London. In 1844 he resigned his post on account of ill-health, and a year afterwards became pastor of the Church in Rickmansworth, Herts, where he remained till 1851. After preaching in and around London for a few years he removed, in 1856, to Bath, where he died, July 12, 1859. See (London) Baptist Handbook, 1861, p. 100. (J. C. S.)

Murray, Andrew, a Scotch prelate, was elected bishop of the see of Ross in 1213, but refused to be consecrated. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 185.

Murray, George, D.D., a bishop of the Church of England, the second son of Lord George Murray, bishop of St. David's, was born in 1754. He was educated at Christ Church, Oxford, graduating B.A. in 1806. In 1814 he was consecrated bishop of Sodor and Man, and in 1827 he was transferred to the diocese of Rochester, which was then but a small bishopric, comprising ninety-three benefices, but under the administration of bishop Murray the number was increased to a hundred and sixty-four. He died Feb. 16, 1860, being at the time the senior of the English bishops. He was a churchman of the old school, and held himself aloof from extremists. See Amer. Quart. Church Rev. 1860, p. 184.

Musgrave, George Washington, D.D., LL.D., an eminent Presbyterian minister, was born in Philadelphia, Oct. 19, 1804. He studied at the classical academy of the Rev. Dr. Wyile, and although he did not enter college on account of ill-health, he pursued his studies privately under the tuition of Rev. Dr. Archibald Green, and finally entered Princeton Theological Seminary in 1825, and spent nearly two years there. In 1828 he was licensed by the Third Presbyterian of Baltimore, and in 1830 he was ordained pastor of the Third Presbyterian Church of that city. He continued there twenty-two years, laboring with great success. In 1856 he was elected director of the Princeton Theological Seminary, and continued in that relation until the time of his death. He was also a trustee of Princeton College. Having received the appointment of corresponding secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Publication, he resigned his pastoral charge and removed to Philadelphia. He was also corresponding secretary of the Board of Domestic Missions. He finally accepted an invitation to the pastorate of the North Tenth Street Church, Philadelphia, where he labored until 1868. Having resigned the post of corresponding secretary of Domestic Missions, he was reapointed, and continued until the board was removed to New York. The elder was elected moderator of the Old School General Assembly in the same year. Dr. Musgrave took a prominent part in the convention which met in Philadelphia in 1867, composed of delegates from both branches of the Presbyterian Church, the object of which was to promote the reunion of the two. He was a delegate to the First General Council of the Presbyterian Church in Edinburgh in 1875. He was also president of the Presbyterian Historical Society. Dr. Musgrave was a man of warm study, strong antagonism, and too deeply interested in all matters pertaining to the welfare of the Church. His public life has been divided into three periods: from 1825 to 1841 a parishan in the Church and the academy; from 1847 to 1862 a religious conciliator; from 1862 to 1872 a laborious veteran. He died Oct. 9, 1872. His discourses are found in the Parables (1838): — The Miracles (1841): — The Reading of the Bible (1850): — The Divinity of Christianity in History (1853), etc. See De la Rive, in the Journal de Genève; Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. Muskokke (or Creek) Version of the Scriptures. The Muskokke is spoken by the Creek Indians, who possess in their vernacular the gospels of Matthew and John, the epistles of John, James, Titus, and Ephesians—all published since 1868 by the American Bible Society. In 1879 the printing of the Acts of the Apostles was commenced at the New York Bible House. (B. P.)

Musarrad, Pirkerek, a French Protestant theologian, was born at Geneva in 1627, where he also studied theology. In 1654 he was ordained, and in 1656 ministered at Stourton and attended the national synod at London (1659-1660). In 1669 he was president of the provincial synod held at Is-sur-Thil, and in 1675 he accepted a call as pastor of the French Church at London. He died in 1686. Besides two volumes of sermons and other miscellaneous works, he published: Les sermons sur les missis des Clercs Modernes (Leyden, 1667; new ed. Amsterdam, 1744; a German translation was published at Leipsic, 1695). See Winer, Handbuch der theolog. Litt. i. 624; Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Nadab, the ecclesiastical head of the Mohammedans in Persia. His office corresponds to that of the Mufti (q.v.). In Turkey, but with this difference, that the nadab can divest himself of his spiritual functions, which the mufti cannot do.

Nadhiami, a heretical Mohammedan sect, which maintained that God could do evil, but that he never does it, lest he should appear a wicked and imperfect being.

Nagas, a class of Hindo mendicant monks who travel about in a nude state, but armed with warlike weapons. They are not limited to one sect, but being Vaishnavas and Saivas Nagas. The Sika Nagas, however, differ from those of the other sects by abstaining from the use of arms, and following a retired and religious life.

Nagel, Johann Andreas Michael, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Sept. 29, 1710, at Sulzbach, Bavaria. He studied at Altdorf, Jena, and Leipzig, commenced his academical career at Altdorf in 1757, was in 1770 professor, and died Sept. 29, 1788. He wrote, De Medio Disputandi Doctorum Judaorum, etc. (Altdorf, 1787); — De Lingua Arabica (1789); — Compositio Arimentica, etc. (ed.); — De Lingua Orbis Babylonae (1740); — Observationes in Genesis, i, 1 (1741); — In Genesis, i, 2 (1742); — De Lulio Securitatis Romanorum, etc. (1745); — De Textus Codicibus Monasteriorum Ebraicis (1749); — De Stilo Moris (1755); — Disput. ad Genes. xir, 26 (ed.); — Ad Genes. xir, 24 (1756); — Ad Amor. iii, 11 (1757); — Ad Mosaic. i, 15 sq. Nagel, Leopold Julius, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born in 1809 at Stecklin, Pomerania. He studied at Halle and Berlin, was preacher at Kolzw, and afterwards military preacher at Stargard. In 1848 he published the New Testament of the English Bible Society. In 1846 he was a member of the Lutheran Laymen's Association (q.v.). In 1853 he was called to Breslau, the main seat of the independent Lutherans, and died Jan. 17, 1884. He published, Die Errettung der evangelisch-lutherischen Kirche in Preußen (2d ed. Erlangen, 1868); — Die Kämpfe der evangelisch-lutherischen Kirche in Preußen (Stuttgart, 1869). (B. P.)

Nageolsbach, Carl Wilhelm Eduard, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, who died Feb. 9, 1880, at Guzenhausen, Bavaria, doctor of theology, is the author of, Der Prophet Jeremia und Babylon (Erlangen, 1850); — Was ist christlich? (Nuremberg, 1852); — Der Gottesmann, die Grundlage der Offenbarung (1853); — Der Prophet Jeremia (Bielefeld, 1869); — Der Prophet Jesaja (1870), the last two works for the German Bibelwerk; — Hebräische Grammatik (4th ed. 1880); — Gedanken über die Wiederherst. (1871). (B. P.)

Nagle, Nano, foundress of the Presentation order, was born at Ballygirrin, on the banks of the Blackwater, Ireland, in 1728. She was educated in Paris, and while in that city, in 1756, resolved to devote herself to the poor children of her native country. She privately opened schools, first in Dublin and then at Cork. She afterwards assumed the habit of the Ursulines; but since that order undertakes principally the education of the children of the wealthier classes, Miss Nagle left them, and recruited new auxiliaries, who became the root of a new order which was approved after her death by pope Pius VI, in 1791. She also established an asylum for aged females, and the splendid building in the neighborhood of the South Presentation Convent, Cork, is the result of her work. There were in 1875 fifty convents of the Presentation order in Ireland. Miss Nagle died April 26, 1784. See (N. Y.) Cath. Almanac, 1754, p. 83; De Courcy and Shea, Hist. of the Cath. Church in the U. S., p. 368; Life of Miss Nano Nagle, by the late Rev. Dr. Coppinger (Dublin, 1843); Dublin Review, 1844, 1845.

Naglar, in Norse mythology, is the greatest ship of the world, built out of the nails of the dead, and designed to bring the inhabitants of Muspelheim to combat against the Asas, when Ragnarok, the destruction of the world, begins.

Nahalal, Meshal, the site proposed by some for this place, is described in the Memoiren accompanying the Ordnance Survey (i, 274) as "a mud village on a hill, with open ground on the west, where stands the prominent ruin Kur ez-Zit."

Nain, Nain, the present representative of this place, so interesting in New-Test. history, is thus described in the Memoiren accompanying the Ordnance Survey (ii, 86): "This little village stands on a small plateau at the foot of Jebel el-Dalo, in a position elevated above the plain. It is of stone and mud, with a little mosque called Mukam Sidna Alas on the north. There are numerous traces of ruins, extending beyond the boundary of the modern hamlet to the north, showing the place to have been once larger; but these ruins have a modern appearance. There is a small spring north of the village: a second, Alq al-Baz, exists on the west, and besides it rock-cuts tombs, much defaced, and a tree." (See illustration on following page.)

Nalib, the chief of the Emirs (q. v.) among the Turkish Mohammedans, who is held in great respect as being the head of the descendants of the prophet, and has the power of life and death over the other emirs.

Nama Version of the Scriptures. The Nama is spoken in Namquailand (q. v.). In 1815 the Rev. C. Allcroft commenced a translation of the gospel of Matthew into the Nama, but it does not appear that he completed the version. Ten years subsequently a translation of the gospels was effected by the Rev. Schmelin, of the London Missionary Society, which was printed at Cape Town at the expense of the British and Foreign Bible Society and the London Missionary Society.

so frequently in the language, while in the latter this important omission is supplied. A new effort towards a translation was again made by a missionary of the Rhenish Society, the Rev. G. Krönlein. The British and Foreign Bible Society having consented to meet the expense of printing an edition of the New Test., the translator went to Europe for the purpose of carrying the work through the press, which was completed in 1865. In addition to the New Test., Mr. Krönlein translated the Psalms, which were printed during the year 1872. On Oct. 25, 1881, Mr. Krönlein completed the translation of the Old Test., early portions of the same having been begun on May 23, 1873. The translator is now revising into one harmonious whole the entire books of the Old Test. See Bible of Every Land, p. 480.

Namaz, the five prayers which the Mohammedans repeat regularly every twenty-four hours. Tradition says that the prophet was commanded by God to impose upon his disciples the daily obligation of fifty prayers. By the advice of Moses he solicited and obtained permission to reduce them to five, which are indispensable. The times of prayer are, 1. Daybreak; 2. Noon; 3. Afternoon; 4. Evening; and 5. The first watch of the night. On Friday (their Sabbath) a sixth prayer is added, to be repeated between daybreak and noon. If the prayers are not repeated at the prescribed hours they are useless. The arrival of each of the hours of prayer is publicly announced by the muezzin (q. v.).

Nasr, the name given by the Jews to the president of the great Sanhedrin, who was held in high respect by the court. Moses is said by the rabbins to have been the first to fill the office. Till the captivity the sovereign or chief ruler acted as Nasr, but after that time the two offices became entirely distinct, the right of holding the office of Nasr belonging to the descendants of Hiel.

Nax, was one of the five gods of the ancient Arabs, mentioned in the Koran. He was the supreme deity of the Arabs of Yemen, and, as the name signifies an eagle, he may have been the sun-god.

Nashir, Charles William, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Philadelphia, April 12, 1804. His early education was received in that city and at the academy of Joseph P. Engles. He graduated from the University of Pennsylvania, July 6, 1821, and spent the following year in studying Hebrew under Dr. Banks. In November, 1822, he entered Princeton Seminary, but ill-health caused him to leave in one year. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, April 23, 1824; was stated supply at Norristown, Norriston, and Providence from April 23, 1825, until he was ordained by the same body, Nov. 16 following. He had charge of a school for boys at Montgomery Square, Pa., and was professor of Latin and Greek in Lafayette College. During the eight years spent here he supplied the Durham Church. He was president of Lafayette College for one year, and was proprietor and principal of a female seminary at Lawrenceville, N. J., for twenty-four years. He died Aug. 6, 1878. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1879, p. 21.

Neander, John, a Presbyterian minister, was born of Jewish parents, Nov. 12, 1588, at Neuborm, in the province of Posen. He was educated in accordance with Talmudical Judaism, and in 1635 was called to Bremereich, near Bremerhaven, to occupy a rabbinical position there. In 1638, however, he joined the Church at Bremen, and became a missionary to the Jews. In 1643 Neander arrived in New York, and in Germany, laboring among the Jews. In 1646 he was or

NECKER described by Lient. Conder in the "Quar. Statement of the Pal. Explor. Fund," Oct. 1881, p. 276. It was also visited by Dr. Merrill, and his investigations (Ev. Journ. 241 sq.) confirm the views expressed by as under the art. Pisgah. Tristram remarks (Bible Places, 346) that a recent traveler here showed that Jebel Shigalas, the spot where these ruins stand, is Pisgah. The arguments adduced would be equally conclusive in behalf of any of the many flat-topped mounds of the neighborhood, one of which must have been Pisgah, although its Arabic equivalent, Fethk, seems to have dropped out of the local nomenclature.

NECKER, THOMSON, a Protestant minister, was born at Trieste, May 7, 1830. He was a prominent member of the Church at Geneva, where he was the means of founding the Evangelical Society and of promoting the cause of the Young Men's Christian Association. He labored for the cause of the evangelical schools, not only in Geneva, but also in Bohemia and Moravia, where he went for this special purpose. He also visited England and France to promote the kingdom of God, and during the winter of 1870 and 1871 he labored among the Protestant French in New York. There was no branch of home mission work in which he was not engaged, and his sudden death, Jan. 10, 1881, was a heavy loss to the Evangelical Church in Geneva. (B.P.)

NEEL, For this place Lient. Conder suggests (Test Work, ii. 339) Kurbur Yamin, a ruined site eight and a half miles east by south from Acre, described in the Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey (i. 405) as "a terraced hill, with heaps of stones on the top; the masonry hewn but small; on the north is a well."

NEL, HENRY, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Philadelphia, Oct. 13, 1815. He entered the University of Pennsylvania in 1832; made a profession of religion in 1832; entered upon a postgraduate course at Amherst; in 1836 became tutor or assistant teacher in Andover Theological Seminary; in 1839 was ordained pastor at Hatfield, Mass.; subsequently was pastor at Lenox, Mass., Detroit, Mich., and New Brunswick, N. J.; in 1873 organized a Presbyterian Church at Bryn Mawr, near Philadelphia, and died there, April 21, 1879.

NEKIR, in Mohammedanism, is one of the two angels who wake up every dead body, and ask for the faith of its former possessor. If he be true, he is refreshed with the dew of paradise, and laid to rest again; but if he is not favorable to Islam, he is whipped with two iron rods until he yells aloud, and then is cast into a snake's nest, where poisonous reptiles gnaw at him until his resurrection.

Nelson, John, D.D., a minister of the Free Church of Scotland, was born in Edinburgh, in October, 1829. After graduating from Edinburgh University, he studied at Berlin, Bonn, and Heidelberg. He became pastor at Greenock in 1851, and exercised there a useful ministry of twenty-six years. In 1855 he visited America, and published, as the result of his observations, an Essay on National Education in the United States and Canada. He travelled extensively on the Continent, officiating as pastor of several of the Free churches. He also spent some time in Egypt, Palestine, and Syria, his failing health requiring repeated rest from labor. He was an earnest advocate for the union between the Free and the Reformed Presbyterian churches in Scotland. He died at Abden House, Edinburgh, Jan. 26, 1878. (W. P. S.)

NELSON, REUBEN, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Andes, N. Y., Dec. 13, 1818. He was converted at the age of fifteen. At seventeen he was licensed to exhort, at eighteen to preach, studied the next year, and in 1840 entered the Oneida Conference. He preached one year on Otsego Circuit, and one on Westford, serving meantime as principal of the Otsego Academy, at Cooperstown. In 1844 the Oneida Conference founded the Wyoming Seminary, at Kingston, Pa., and Mr. Nelson was chosen its first principal, which office he held for twenty-eight years, with but one year's exception, during which he was presiding elder of Wyoming District. In 1872 he was elected agent of the Methodist Book Concern, in New York city, which office he held till his death, Feb. 20, 1879. Neugonese (or Maré) Version of the Scriptures. The Neugone is spoken in the Loyalty Islands. In 1854 a missionary was sent on board the Maré, under the auspices of the London Missionary Society. The missionaries, the Revs. S. M. Creagh and J. Jones, devoted themselves assiduously to the task of translating portions of the Scriptures into the native language. The Neugone New Testament was published in 1863 at the expense of the missionaries. In 1866 a revised edition was issued at Sydney under the care of the Rev. J. Jones. In 1869 a revised edition was printed in England, whilst the books of Genesis and Exodus were printed at Maré. In 1874 the Book of Psalms had been added to the translations and editions of the Scriptures already existing, and was issued from the press in 1877, under the care of the Rev. S. M. Creagh. From the annual report of the British and Foreign Bible Society for 1886 we learn that the translation of the entire Pentateuch is now undergoing revision. See Bible of Every Land, p. 121. (B.P.)

Neapolease (or Khapooras) Version of the Scriptures. Neapolese is the principal dialect prevailing in Nepal (q. v.), and was exclusively used by the higher castes. It is becoming prevalent throughout the whole country, and is rapidly superseding the other dialects. A new version was commenced on the island of Serampore, and an edition of 1000 copies of the New Testament was issued in 1821. Of late a new translation of portions of the New Testament into this dialect was made by the Rev. W. Stuart. In 1850, 1000 copies of Luke were printed, and in 1852 a revised edition of 1000 was sent to press, together with 1500 of the Acts of the Apostles. From the annual report of the British and Foreign Bible Society for 1886 we learn that the Scotch Mission at Darjeeling has printed Genesis, Exodus, Proverbs, the Gospels, and Acts. See Bible of Every Land, p. 121. (B.P.)

Nesselmann, Roderich, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born in 1815, and died June 12, 1881, at Ellbong. He is the author of, "Kern der heiligen Schrift" (Ellbong, 1845); — Uebericht über die Entwickelungsgeschichte der christlichen Predigt (1862); — Der ewige Frieden (1865); — Die anglikanische Konfession erläutert (1876); — Der ewige Friede (Königsberg, 1878). Newhall, Fales Henry, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Saugus, Mass., June 19, 1827. He was converted at the age of twelve; graduated from Wesleyan University, Conn., in 1844; taught for several years thereafter; joined the New England Conference in 1851, and occupied several of its most important appointments; in 1863 became professor of rhetoric and English literature in his alma mater; in 1867-68 travelled and studied in Europe; in 1871 returned to the itinerant work as a pastor; in 1873 was elected president of the Ohio Wesleyan University, but soon experienced an attack of insanity, from which he never afterwards fully recovered. He died April 6, 1883. Dr. Newhall was an eloquent speaker and writer. He published a number of sermons, essays, etc. See Alumni Record of Wyal University, 1889, p. 77; Minutes of Annual Conference, 1883, p. 91.

Newman, William, D.D., an English Baptist minister, was born in 1772, and early in life became a member of the Church at Waltham Abbey, Essex. For some time he was an associate with the eminent John Ryland as a teacher. In May, 1794, he was ordained pastor of the Church at Bow, and subsequently, on the establishment of the Baptist College at Stepney, was chosen its president and theological tutor. For the prosperity of this seat of learning he labored most faithfully for many years. See Bapt. Union, 1834, p. 19. (J. C. S.)

Newton, Alfred, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Colechester, Conn., Nov. 11, 1808. He graduated from Yale College in 1828, was tutor there from 1831 to 1834, and in the latter year graduated from the Divinity School. In the spring of 1853 he was invited to supply the pulpit of the Presbyterian Church in Norwalk, 0., and was ordained the same year; was installed pastor July 24, 1836, and sustained that relation until Aug. 1, 1870. He remained as pastor emeritus of the Church and a resident of the town till his death, Dec. 9, 1878. See Old, Record of Yale College, 1873.

Newton, Roger, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Danville, Conn., May 23, 1737. He graduated from Yale College in 1758; studied theology under Rev. Elizur Goodrich; was constituted pastor of the Church in Greenfield, Nov. 18, 1761; and died Dec. 10, 1816. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, 1:313.

Newton, Thomas Henry, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., Jan. 2, 1815. He graduated from Lafayette College in 1846, and from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1849; was licensed by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, and was ordained an evangelist by the same presbytery, Nov. 15, 1850, but was never settled as a pastor. In 1849 he began to labor on the island of St. Thomas as a chaplain, under the appointment of the Seaman's Friend Society; in 1859 as chaplain at St. Louis; in 1863 was missionary in south-western Missouri, where he organized a church at Linn Creek. He afterwards resided in, and served as pastor at Carlinville, III. The last two years of his life were spent in Richmond, Va. He died at Waverly Station, Nov. 19, 1880. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 69.

Newb. The modern representative of this site, Brit.-Nebb, is laid down as a ruin on the Ordnance Map, eight miles north-west of Hebron, and described in the accompanying Memoir (iii, 324) as consisting of "cisterns and caves, foundations and ruined walls, with a few pillar shafts. . . . The buildings seem to date back to the Byzantine period, judging from the character of the masonry; but the cisterns and caves are perhaps earlier."

NGUNESE VERSION OF THE SCRIPTURES. Ngunese is a language spoken on the island of Nguna, one of the Sandwich Island group, which lies six miles north of Efate, and has a population of about a thousand. Except for two widely separated islands, all the other islands are visible, with a population of about seven thousand five hundred souls, who use the same language, or dialects of the same. The islands, with their population, are as follows: Efate, 8000; Lelapa, 100; Moso, 200; Pele, 200; Nguna, 1000; Emas, 500; Naruo, 100; Emas, 100; Ewona, 50; Yale, 20; Tongariki, 200; Bunnga, 150; south end of Epi, 150. On Emas and the Tonga group different languages are spoken on each side of the islands, but the Ngune is understood throughout them all. In 1881, at the request of the New Hebrides Mission Synod, the British and Foreign Bible Society published an edition of two thousand copies of the gospels of Matthew and John. The translation was made from the Greek by the Rev. Peter Milne, a missionary of the Presbyterian Church of New Zealand, and who for ten years has labored on the Bula Islands. Each of these islands having a church and a school, with a church attendance of one hundred and fifty, and an attendance at school of one hundred. (B. F.)

NIASIAN VERSION OF THE SCRIPTURES. Niasian is spoken on the island of Nias, which lies near Sumatra, and contains a large population, estimated by the Rev. J. Denninger at eighty thousand souls. Up to the year 1871 nothing had been done for the island in the way of printing; but Mr. Denninger, of the Baronian Evangelical Mission, who labored for many years in this and the adjoining island, committed the language to the press, and grammatically arranged some parts of the Scripture. In 1878 the British and Foreign Bible Society printed the gospel of Luke, and this is at present the only part of Scripture extant. (B. F.)

Nicholas, Samuel D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born Nov. 14, 1787. He graduated from Yale College in 1811; was ordained by bishop Hobart in 1813; from 1815 to 1817 he was rector of St. Matthew's Church, Bedford, Conn.; resigning this charge, he retired from the active ministry, and died in Greenfield, July 17, 1870. See Whittaker, Almanac and Directory, 1875, p. 174.

Nicholson, Edward G., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, appears in the records, in 1864, as having a parish in the city of Mexico; the following year he removed to Kentucky; in 1870 he became a resident of New York city, where he remained until his death, Sept. 1, 1872, at the age of fifty-four years. See Prot. Episcopal Almanac, 1873, p. 138.

Nicholson, Joseph B., D.D., an English divine, antiquarian, and author, was born in 1756. He graduated at Magdalen Hall, Oxford, in 1820; in 1826 became domestic chaplain to his royal highness the duke of Clarence; in 1833 he was appointed rector, and in 1846, natural dean of St. Albans, where he continued till his death, July 27, 1866. He was also appointed surro-gate for the archdeaconry of St. Albans, and in 1826 was nominated an honorary canon of Rochester Cathedral. Dr. Nicholson was a fellow of the Society of Antiquaries, of the Royal Astronomical Society, and a member of the Numismatic Society; was vice-president of the Archaeological and Architectural Society; a magistrate for St. Albans and the county of Hertford. In 1851 he published the first edition of a work entitled, The Abbey of St. Albans, and soon after an enlarged edition. See American Annual Cyclopaedia, 1866, p. 589.

Nichols, Christopher Maryborough, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Pemquisad, Me., Jan. 18, 1805. He graduated from Brown University in 1826, for one year thereafter was principal of an academy at Northfield, Mass., and in 1827 was expelled from the Andover Theological Seminary, spending a year meantime as tutor of Latin and Greek in Brown University. The last-named year he became the minister of the Congregational Church in Gloucester, Mass., where he remained for nearly thirteen years, and was greatly blessed in his work. For the benefit of his wife's health he went to New Orleans, and while there preached at the Bethel, and founded a seaman's home. In the summer of 1850 he came back to the North, and for five years had charge of the Congregational Church at Barre, Mass.; he then went to the Central Presbyterian Church, Newark, N. J., a position which he retained on account of ill-health, in 1884, and then spent a year in Europe and the East. In 1887 went abroad the second time, and after seven years he took up his residence in Newark, N. J., whence he removed to Princeton, and finally to New London, Conn., where he died, July 10, 1878. He joined the Church in 1833, graduated at Glasgow University, studied two years (1836—37) at the Theological Hall of Glasgow, offered his services to the London Missionary Society, attended Cheshunt College for two sessions, and, in 1840, in company with his fellow-student and co-worker, Dr.
NIUEAN VERSION

George Turner, was ordained and appointed to Tanna, an island in the New Hebrides, whither they at once sailed. Here they carried on operations for a short time, but on account of an insurrection among the natives they were forced to withdraw. Returning to New Zealand, they landed at Samoa, set out afresh on their missionary life, and soon met great success. In 1844 they established the Samoan Mission Seminary, which sent forth more than six hundred native agents before Dr. Nisbet's decease, May 2, 1873. He possessed a well-stored mind, and the humble culture and industry he manifested adapted him to his work. See Cong. Year-book, 1877, p. 402.

NIUEAN (or Savage Island) Version of the Scriptures. Niue is a long island four hundred miles from any other land, the nearest groups being the Friendly Islands, in the west, and the Samoan, in the north. In 1849, after long opposition, a Samoan teacher was received in the island. In the course of time, amid his evangelistic labors, he translated the gospel of Mark, which was sent to the missionaries of Samoa, and, after revision, printed by them. Then, in 1861, the Rev. W. G. Lawes and his wife went to Niue as the teachers, taking with them the printed gospel, they found that the other books of the New Testament had been translated by the native teachers. The translation was revised by the Rev. G. Pratt, of Samoa, and printed at Sydney, together with the epistle to the Philippines and John's epistle, in 1862, by the New South Wales Auxiliary. The New Testament was completed by Mr. Lawes and printed at Sydney in 1867. The book of Psalms, also translated by Mr. Lawes and revised by the Rev. Mr. Pratt, was printed in 1869 or 1870. The whole has been once more revised, and, together with the books of Genesis and Exodus, and printed in London in 1873, under the superintendence of Mr. Lawes. From the annual report of the British and Foreign Bible Society for the year 1882 we learn that the society has published, not only a new edition of five thousand copies of the New Testament and Psalms, but also three thousand copies of the Pentateuch as prepared by Mr. Lawes, who continues the translation of the other books of the Old Testament. Nob. The probable representative of this place, acquainted in by Triaram (Bible Places, p. 120), and substantially also by Conder (Text Work, ii, 117), is laid down on the Ordinance Map as Kharvit es-Samud, and is situated on the edge of a mile north of Shafi, and described in the accompanying Memoirs (iii, 125) as "heaps of ruins; a cistern fourteen paces by four, with a rubble roof; and a crumbling building, apparently modern." There is a remarkable knoll of rock in the place, at the summit of the hill. On the top of this knoll is surmounted by the remains of a small vaulted chamber. There are also a few rock-cut tombs on the south-east, now closed.

Nobbe, Mason, D.D., a Congregational and afterwards a Presbyterian minister, was born at Williams- town, Mass., March 18, 1803. He studied at Stockbridge Academy; graduated from Williams College in 1827; spent a year in New York city in studying modern languages and in teaching; went to Princeton Theological Seminary in 1828, and spent one year; became a tutor in Williams College, continuing his theological studies; was licensed June 14, 1831, by Berkshire Congregational Association, while a tutor, and was ordained by the same body, Feb. 15, 1832, at Williamsport. His successive fields of labor were as follows: Presbyterian Church in Washington, D.C., from 1832 to 1839; Eleventh Church in New York city, from 1839 to 1849; associate pastor with Dr. Lyman Beecher; Independent Church of Shafar, from 1849 to 1852; of the Presbyterian Church of Baltimore, Md., in 1850 and 1851; principal of a young ladies' seminary in Washington, D.C., from 1851 to 1855, at the same time gathering and organizing the Sixth Street Church; chaplain in the navy, from 1853 to 1861; supply to the First Congregational Church of Williamsport, Mass., in 1866 and 1867. On returning to Washington, in 1870, the Sixth Street Church elected him to be its pastor, and without being installed he thenceforward served until his death, Oct. 24, 1881. See Necrol. Nodhamiana, a heretical Mohammedan sect, who, to avoid falling into the error of making God the author of evil, ascribing neither directly nor indirectly, permissively nor authoritatively, had God any connection whatever with evil. They denied also the miraculous character of the Koran.

Nolasque, St. Pierre, a French monk, founder of the order of the Beata Maria Virgo de Mercede pro Redemptione captivorum, was born at Digne, in the department of the Alpes-de-Saint-Puelles, in Languedoc. In 1228, Nolasque, in company with some other knights and priests, organized the order mentioned above, the special object of which was to redeem Christian captives in Mohammedan countries in extreme cases, where there was danger of a conversion of Islam, even with the sacrifice of liberty and life. At first the order occupied a portion of the royal palace at Barcelona, but in 1222 a splendid monastery was built and dedicated to St. Eulalia, the patroness of Barcelona. The order was confirmed by Gregory IX, in 1229, and soon spread over Spain, Italy, and France. Nolasque died in 1256, and was canonized by Urban VIII in 1628. By Benedict XIII, the order was transformed into a common mendicant order (1725), and a century later it was swept away by the revolution. North American Indians, Religious Idear Of. It is not necessary to separate all the small tribes according to their religious usages, for they had much in common, and will here be treated accordingly. They do not believe that a dryad was thought to inhabit every tree, but the natives believed in protecting spirits of the woods and trees. These spirits were called, among the northern tribes, Nortca (singular Oka). Among the Iroquois the whole company of spirits was called Apokon, or Hunterocks (singular Harker). The worship of all good spirits Thoronhionwonow was worshiped, who was the grandson of the goddess of all evil, Arachntuk. Both were regarded as living in the land of the blessed. Exalted over these was the great spirit, who dispersed fear; who dispensed grace; who dispensed life, but without any, although he could hinder evil. But only those receive his grace who do good and abandon evil. Sun, moon, and stars, and the natural forces, are objects of nature. In dreams the great spirit sends protecting beings, who are guides all through life. Only in Virginia was there a visible representation of supreme beings—a human figure, with an apron, in a sitting posture. There are many of these, who are called Kineus, and are considered protectors of the dead. In the southern part of North America the cultus took another form. Here were temples, and bloody sacrifices. In Florida the first male born was brought as a sacrifice to the sun, and this shows the transition to the Mexican cultus. In all acts of worship, politics, or friendship, the tobbacco-pipe played a noteworthy part. The natives were also permitted a future life; but there was no concernment whether they were taken from their present existence. They believed in a continuation of life, but with higher joys and all possible success in hunting, fishing, and war; therefore they buried with the dead his clothes and weapons, nourishment for the journey, and even his pipe and tobacco. They assembled around the dead, and praised his deeds of bravery and valor. All his friends and relatives visited him, and after a meal, which was first handed to the departed, the aboriginal Americans left their village and journeyed away without the dead, who became a prey to the wild animals. Others, who had permanent dwelling-places, buried their dead in various ways. A singular practice, only found among the North American tribes, was the voluntary death of aged people. When they became sick, they awaited their death with great composure. The physicians informed them that they were unable to heal them. They died the necessary arrangements, and died joyfully and without fear. This was the natural death. But to old people, who could not fish and hunt, life became a burden. The father usually ordered his son to kill him with the club. Then the friends, relatives, and children accompanied him into the woods. Two dogs were killed, that their souls might herald the coming of a warrior into the other world. The old man then smoked a pipe, conversed with his friends, sang his song of death, and gave the sign employed by the Negrum to the former, and the latter slew him with his club. A small hut was then built over the buried body. The friends of the departed gave away all his goods, even the most costly and precious. Their sorrow was touching. They tortured themselves in the flabby parts of their body, and sometimes lost so much blood that they died themselves. Often, when a child died, its mother killed herself in the hope of nourishing it beyond death, for they feared that without such nourishment the child would die a second time. The com munion of the North American tribes differed from the other. They first drank before the world. All human beings originated from woman, and the Turtle tribe, living in the central point of the world, was the first and noblest. See Indians, American.

Northall, Richard, an Irish prelate, was born in London, and became a Carmelite friar. He obtained a high reputation for his preaching, learning, and acquirements, and attracted the notice of the king, who advanced him to the bishopric of Osawry in 1896. About 1390 he was constituted a commissioner by the king to inquire into the state, losses, abuses, and government of Ireland; in particular, to report how and on what security Nigel O'Neill was enlarged. In 1391 and 1394 he was the envoy of the same monarch in the quality of an ambassador to pope Boniface X, and was appointed chancellor of Ireland in 1395. Having spent nine years in the prelacy of Osawry, he was, in 1396, promoted to the archbishopric of Dublin. He died July 20, 1397. See D'Alton, Memoirs of the Archbishops of Dublin, p. 149.

Norton, Augustus Theobald, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Cornwall, Conn., March 28, 1808. He graduated from Yale College in 1832; studied theology privately; was licensed as an evangelist; labored first at Windham, N. Y., and afterwards at Griggfield, Napier, Pittsfield, and Atlas, in southern Illinois. He organized the Second Presbyterian Church in St. Louis, Mo., and in 1839 was called to the pastorate of the First Presbyterian Church in Alton, Ill., where he labored for nineteen years. In 1859 he was appointed district secretary of Church Extension and Home Missions for the West, and was requested to report every church in his field as supplied with a pastor. In 1879 he published a large volume of seven hundred pages, on the History of the Presbyterian Church in Illinois. He died at Alton, April 29, 1884.

Nott, John, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Albany, N. Y., Dec. 14, 1801. He graduated from Union College in 1828. In the autumn of the same year he entered Andover Theological Seminary, where he studied until June, 1828. He then entered Princeton Seminary, June 30, and studied there until September, 1826. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Albany, May 3, 1827, and ordained as an evangelist the same month. He was tutor in Union College from 1830 to 1839, and assistant professor of rhetoric and the institutes for fifteen years. From 1839 to 1841 he was stated supply to the church at Rotterdam, N. Y. Thence he went to the South as stated supply of the churches of Goldborou' and Evert, in North Carolina. Returning to the North, he became supply of the Dutch Reformed Church at Auriav, in the county of Co., N. Y. He died at Batavia, May 18, 1878. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1879, p. 23.

Novitiiol is a name applied by Tertullian to catechumens, because they were just entering upon that state which made them candidates for eternal life.

Nubian Version of the Scriptures. From the announcement of the Pure Bible Society, and for their publication of the books of the Old Testament, in 1885, we learn that an edition of five hundred copies of the gospel of Mark has been published for the benefit of the Mohammedans in and around Dongola, East Africa. This version, made in the Fadidja dialect, was prepared by the late Professor Leper, of Rame, and published as an appendix to his Nubian Grammar. From the latter it was republished, with permission of the translator's son and of the publisher, in Roman characters, under the editorship of Professor Reinach, Vienna. (B. P.)

Nupe Version of the Scriptures. Nupé is a territory of Central Africa situated between Yoruba on the south-west and Hausa on the north, divided into two portions by the river Rowara, which runs through it from a north-westery direction, till it winds its way southery after it has cleared the bases of the Rennell mountains. The south-west portion of Nupé is a belt of land not more than twenty-five miles from the river's bank to its boundary with Yoruba land at Saregi, formerly a mutual place of meeting in their hunting expeditions between the two tribes, but now it is an important town, inhabited by both tribes, the Yorubas, however, being the more numerous and influential. The breadth of the northern portion of Nupé is much larger, or some three or four days' journey across, or about sixty or seventy miles broad towards Hausa from the river's bank. The extreme length of the country from Kuma to the town of Yaba, or the metropolitan of Bussa, on the upper parts of the river to the tribes of Ijatokoti, next to Mye, and Bidon of Kakanda, on the lower part of the river, is about one hundred and sixty miles. Such is the geographical position of the Nupé country, as described by the Rev. S. Crowther, who, in connection with the Rev. J. J. Schenck, translated the first seven chapters of Matthew in the Nupé, which, at the request of the Church Missionary Society, were published in 1860 by the British and Foreign Bible Society as the first instalment of an entirely new translation in a language spoken over a vast extent of country. At present there are extant the gospels of Matthew and Mark in the Nupk. (B. P.)

Nutting, Rufus, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Old Groton, Middlesex Co., Mass., July 28, 1758. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1818, and for several years thereafter took charge of a young ladies' seminary at Castkill, N. Y.; in 1821 became principal of Randolph Academy, Va., which position he held seven years, meantime completing his theological course under the celebrated Dr. John Holt Rice. In 1828 he became professor of languages in the Western Reserve College at Hudson, Ohio; in 1840 resigned his chair, and two years later removed to Rome, N. Y., taking charge of the branch of the State University then located there. In 1847 he established an academy at Lodi Plains, Wathenaw Co., Mich.; in 1850 removed to the city of Detroit, where he died, July 12, 1875. (W. P. S.)

O'Brien, Matthew, D.D., a Roman Catholic clergyman, was a native of Ireland, where he enjoyed a high reputation as a preacher. About 1800 he came to New York, N. Y., to preach and was attached to St. Peter's Church. He afterwards left New York in consequence of difficulties which arose, and died in Baltimore, Oct. 20, 1816. Dr. O'Brien published Sermones in the Most Important Subjects of Morality and Religion (Cork, 1798). See Dict. of Christ. and Shee, Hist. of the Catholic Church in the United States, p. 261.

O'Byran, William, the founder of the Bible Christian Societies, was born at Gunwee, in the parish of Luxulion, Cornwal, Eng., Feb. 6, 1778. At the age of seventeen he obtained a clear manifestation of God's pardoning mercy, and almost immediately began to preach. In 1805 he was engaged as a supply in the place of a Wesleyan minister. In 1810 he was formally excluded from the Wesleyan Methodist Society for preaching in an irregular way, and in 1814 he relinquished business in order to devote himself wholly to the work of the ministry. Hearing that there were fourteen parishes in the east of Cornwall and the west of Devon in which there was no evangelical preaching, he visited them. His labors were successful, souls were converted. He organized the first class, or society, which afterwards received the appellation of Bible Christians. In 1812 he was appointed to the pastoral charge of the parish of Luxulion, and he died at that place, Dec. 9, 1815. Twenty-two persons gave their names. At the session of the first conference held at Baddath, Launcester, Aug. 17, 1819, he was elected president. He filled this office each succeeding year until 1828. Unpleasant circumstances arising between himself and the brethren, in 1829 he left the conference. At the conference in 1830 William O'Byran sought reconciliation with his brethren, and a satisfactory union was effected. Afterwards he left the denomination of his own free will. He came to the United States, crossed the Atlantic between New York and England several times, and died at a good old age, in New York city. His remains are interred in Greenwood Cemetery, Brooklyn. See Jubilee Volume of Bible Christians (1865); Bible Christians.

Ochiltree, Michael, a Scotch prelate, was dean of the New York of Dunblane in 1425, and was made bishop in 1430. He was bishop at Dunblane in 1429 when he appended his seal to a solemn agreement between the queen-thrawer and a committee of parliament, about the keeping of the young king, James II. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 177.

O'Connor, Michael, D.D., a Roman Catholic prelate, was born at Cork, Ireland, Sept. 27, 1810. He was educated at Queenstown, and entered the Propaganda at Rome in 1838. He became president of the Roman Catholic Seminary of St. Charles Borromeo, Philadelphia, Pa., in 1868. He was consecrated bishop of Pittsburgh in 1848, translated to the see of Erie, Pa., in 1858, and referred to his former diocese in 1864. He resigned his episcopal office and united with the Jesuits in 1860. He died at Woodstock College, Md., Oct. 18, 1872.

Odenheimer, William Henry, D.D., a bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., Aug. 11, 1817. He graduated from the University of Pennsylvania in 1835, and from the General Theological Seminary in 1838; was ordained deacon by Bishop Onderdonk, of Pennsylvania, in the same year, and presbytery in 1841. After this he served as rector of St. Peter's Church, Philadelphia, of which he remained pastor until his election as bishop of the diocese of New Jersey, April 27, 1859. The consecration to this office occurred Oct. 13 of the same year, in Richmond, Va. In 1874, when the diocese was divided, Bishop Odenheimer selected the "northern" portion. He died at his residence in Burlington, N. J., Aug. 14, 1875. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1880, p. 170.

Oelrich, Bernhard, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Itzehoe in 1626. He studied at different universities, was in 1664 court-preacher at Stockholm, in 1665 doctor of theology, and in 1668 pro-chancellor and professor of theology of the academy at Lund. He then went to Bremen as super-tendant and pastor, and died March 30, 1668. He wrote, De Testamento Christi non Violando: — De Angello: — De Sacra Scriptura: — De Ecclesia Lutheran. See Witte, Skrifter, Societatis Christianae Latinorum, Volume VI. See also, Oelrichi, Literatur; Jocher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon. (B. P.)

Old Man of Obi, a remarkable idol of the Otaic Tartars, who live near the river Obi. It consists of wood, and has a nose resembling the snout of a hog, in which is a hook of iron. The eyes are made of glass, and the head is embellished with a large pair of horns. Its devotees oblige it to change its place of residence every three years, transporting it over the Obi from one station to another with great solemnity, in a vessel made for that purpose. When the ice dissolves, and the river overflows its banks, the Otaica flock to this idol in a body and beseech it to prove propitious to their fishery. If the season fails to answer their expectations they load the god with a myriad of reproaches, and insult him as an old, impotent, and despisable deity; but if they prove successful in fishing, the god is allowed part of the booty.

Oliver, George, D.D., an English divine, was born at Papplewick in 1782, and educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1803. He took orders, and in 1809 became head-master of King Edward’s Grammar-school at Great Grimsby. He became a vicar of Scopwick in 1831, incumbent of Wolvæmpton in 1834, rector of South Hykeham in 1841, and died at Lincoln on Aug. 3, 1867. He filled the highest offices in the Masonic order, and wrote numerous works on local ecclesiastical history and Freemasonry, for which see Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, n. v.

Ollier, Pierre, a Protestant theologian of Montauban, was born at that place in 1573. In 1606 he was pastor at Saint-André de Valborgne, in 1616 at Aiais, and in 1621 at Montauban, where he died Oct. 5, 1640. He was the successor of Pierre Bérald in the theological chair, and wrote La Conferencie de St. Antoine entre Pierre Ollier, et Psecou (Montauban, 1624). Ollivant, Alfred, D.D., an Anglican prelate, was born at Manchester, England, in 1798. He studied at St. Paul’s School, London; graduated at Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1821, and became a fellow. In 1820 he was elected Craven University scholar, and in 1822 Tywhitt Hebrew scholar. He was vice-principal of St. David’s College, Lampeter, from 1827 to 1848, and from 1848 until 1849 held the regius professorship of divinity at Cambridge. He became bishop of Llandaff in 1849, and died Dec. 16, 1882. He published a number of sermons and some other practical works. He was a member of the Old Test. company of the Bible Revision Committee.

Oniedam, Lennart, M.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Maltese, N. Y., July 5, 1808. He graduated from Union College in 1824, and pursued his studies in the Western Theological Seminary. He was licensed by the Presbyterian Board of Examiners in 1826, and ordained by the Presbytery of Erie, April 20, 1848. He then visited Europe, sojourning in Rome for several years. His principal business was teaching. During the war of the rebellion he acted as chaplain for some three years. He died March 18, 1880. As a scientific scholar and antiquarian Dr. Oniedam has had few equals among his brethren of the Presbytery. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 54.

Oncken, John Gerhard, D.D., a German Baptist minister, was born in Vare, in the grand duchy of Oldenburg, Jan. 26, 1800. He went to England in his youth, and was converted. The British Continental Society sent him in 1825 as a missionary to Germany, his labors being principally confined to the counties of Prel de Bremen, and the province of East Frisia. In 1828 he became the agent of the Edinburgh Bible Society. He and six others were immersed, April 22, 1834, in the river Elbe, near Hamburg, by Rev. Barnas Sear, then of the Hamilton Theological Seminary, pursuing his studies in Germany. At the close of 1879 there were in Germany 16,692 members of Baptist churches, and the gospel was preached in 1178 preaching stations. Later statistics would largely swell those numbers. Mr. Oncken was ordained soon after his baptism, and Ono. The probable representative of this place, Kafr Ana, is laid down on the Ordinance Map at nearly five miles north by west of Ludd (Lydda), and described in the accompanying Memoirs (ii, 291) as "a mud village, surrounded with palms and other trees in gardens, and has a well (sebil) to the north." Onuphis, one of the sacred bulls of the ancient Egyptians. It was of a black color, had shaggy recurved hair, and is supposed to have been the emblem of the sacred cow through all Egypt.

Oosterzee, Johann Jacob van, a noted Dutch theologian, was born April 1, 1817, at Rotterdam. He studied at Utrecht, and on leaving the university in 1840 was made doctor of theology for presenting his Disputatio Theologica de Jezu, et Virginie Maria Nato. In 1841 he was preacher at Kemes, in 1843 at Alkmaar, in 1844 at Rotterdam. In 1862 he became professor of theology at Utrecht, and opened his lectures with a Latin oration, De Sceptico Modernioris Theologiae Coena Olimando. Oosterzee lectured upon almost all the branches of theology, and soon became the recognized leader of the evangelical school of Holland. In learning, eloquence, and piety he ranked with the greatest divines of his age. He was also a voluminous writer. Several of his works have been translated, and commend themselves very highly to practical and conservative religious minds in Great Britain and America. Oosterzee died July 29, 1882, at Wiesbaden, Germany, where he had gone to restore his broken health. Besides his opening addresses, as, 'How meet the modern Naturalisme bestreden weorden' (1855);—Zeden wij nog Theologie studeren of niet? (1864);—Welke Theologie en waarvan de Ontstaan in de Daders en Delen verdeert? (1866);—Van welke Theologen is iets goeds voor de Toekomst der Kerk te verwerken? Ophir. The modern representative of this place, Jaffa, is laid down on the Ordinance Map, about two and three quarter miles north-west of Bethel (Bethel), and thus described in the accompanying Memoirs (ii, 294):—An important Christian village, with a Latin church and consecrated (Mär Yisef), on an ancient road from the north to Jerusalem. The octagonal shape of the church is covered with colored glass in its east window, and a red-tiled pointed roof, forms a conspicuous feature of the village as seen from the road. The place is still a town, though small, plain, and on the south, higher up, is a spring called Ain Elaziz. The road crosses the valley-bed by a small footbridge (now broken), with an inscription in Arabic, and on the south of this is a Greek church of St. George, with fine white marble columns, and two nets-entresolles. There are two mansions of a town in the village, and pillar-shafts, as if of a former chapel, east of the Latin monastery. The hills and valleys are cultivated with olive trees, vines, pear, peach, and pomegranates. The population is stated by Robinson as two hundred, some Latins, some Greeks.

The Greek church is particularly described, ibid, p. 822.

Ophrah, or Ophir, a place of modern Gaza, and modern representative of this place, et-Tubuk, lies four miles north-east of Bethel on the Ordinance Map, and is thus described in the accompanying Memoirs (ii, 298):—A large village in a conspicuous position, with well-built stone houses. A central tower stands on the top of the hill, on either side are olive and fig gardens in the foreground. The view is extensive on both sides. A ruined church of St. George exists near, and there are remains of a ruined castle in the village. The inhabitants are Greek Christians. The archeological remains are minutely described (ibid, p. 870). (2) Or MANASA. The modern place lies on the road between Tekoa and Bethlehem (Tent Work, ii, 339 the modern Fruta, south-west of Nabila; but this is not within Manasseh, and is proposed by Guérin for Piratouch (q. v.). It is more probably (Tristram, Bibl. Places, p. 208) Arrabeh, which is laid down on the Ordinance Map at two miles south-west of Dothan, and described in the accompanying Memoirs (ii, 184) as a very large village on the slope of a bare ridge, with remains of an ancient town.

Opitz, Paul Friedrich, a German scholar, son of Heinrich, was born at Kiel, March 26, 1804. He studied at different universities, was in 1721 professor of Greek and Oriental languages at his native city, in 1727 professor of philosophy, and died Oct. 5, 1747. He published, De Custodia Tempûs Hierosolymitani Nocturna (Kiel, 1710);—De Gigantibus (1715);—De Amino Irenitam in Facto Tabernaculorum Consenso (1717);—De Clarâ Evangelii restaurâtione (1721);—De Hadrianâ Imperasoria Nomine, Indole, Virtutibus ac Vitis (1722);—De Hadrianim Imperatoris Moriis, Eruditissimumque cum Doctoribus judaeorum Consorcionem (1725). Opurin, Joachim, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Sept. 12, 1655. He studied at different universities, and commenced his academic career at Kiel in 1719. In 1738 he was professor of theology, in 1735 went to Göttingen, and died Sept. 5, 1738, doctor of theology. He published, Historia Critica de Perruclia Animae Humanae (Kiel, 1719); — Historia Critica de Perruclia Animae Animatae (Hamburg, 1738); — De Memoria, cum Infima Esset (1738); —De Firmatce ac Inspiratione Divina (1740); — Claris Evangelis Jovannis (Göttingen, 1748); — Zucharias ovv\-s Neue Übersetzung, etc.; — D. Oppenheim, David, a modern Jewish writer, was born Dec. 18, 1816, at Leipnik, Moravia. He received a thorough rabbinical education, was in 1846 rabbi at Jamnitz, in 1857 at Gross-Breeskeer, Hungary, and died Oct. 21, 1876, at Vienna. Oppenheim contributed to all the leading Jewish journals and reviews, and caused a great stir among Roman Catholics by keenly criticising, in the Wimmer Mittheilungen, an article on the history of the Jews in Austria, which had appeared in the Friedberger Kirchenzeitschrift. Oppenheim laid bare the falsehoods and misrepresentations of that article, and elicited the rejoinder of Ritter von Pawlikowski, who, in his book of a hundred sheets, on the relation between Jews and Christians, devoted no less than seventy pages to refute, or rather to insult, Oppenheim. One of his ancestors was David ben-Abraham Oppenheim (q. v.). (B. P.)

Oresa were nymphae who presided over the mountains, daughters of Jupiter. They were very numerous, Diana having a thousand to attend her. These nymphae were accredited with having first claimed men from devouring each other, by teaching them to subsist on acorns and chestnuts.

Oreb, The Rock. Tristan (Bible Places, p. 230) is a consequence in the identification of this with the remarkable peak two and a half miles north of Ritha (Jericho), called Och el-Cherah, which is the most prominent of all the conical peaks that terminate the terrace running down into the Jordan valley, and is about five hundred feet above the plain (Memoirs accompanying the Ordinance Survey, li. 167).

O'Reilly, Bernard, D.D., a Roman Catholic bishop, was born in Ireland in 1803. He was consecrated bishop of Hartford, Conn., Nov. 10, 1850, and died at sea in January, 1856.

Orenburg-Tartar Version of the Scripture. As the name indicates, this version is intended for the Tartars in the vicinity of Orenburg. The version made into that dialect is not an original translation, but merely an accommodation of Mr. Brunton's Kassan Version (q. v.) to the peculiar idiosyncrasy and orthography of the Kirghisian Tartars, residing in the Russian government of Orenburg. Mr. Charles Fraser, one of the Scottish missionaries, prepared a translation of the New Test., which left the mission-press at Astrachan in 1820, at the expense of the British and Foreign Bible Society. Since 1871 a part of the Old Test. has also been published. (B. P.)

Oriental Literature and Languages is the common designation for the languages and literatures of all countries of Asia, as well as of those of Modern Africa and Europe. Even during the Middle Ages the attention of European savants was turned towards the Oriental languages, especially the Arabic, and this for two main reasons. In the first place, it was religious zeal which, by the knowledge of the Arabic, intended to refute the Mohammedan and convert them to Christianity. For this purpose Pope Innocent IV ordered that chairs for instruction in Arabic should be founded at Paris, and popes Clement IV and Honorius IV showed also a great interest in the matter. Under Clement V, the synod held at Vienne, in 1311, resolved that professors of Arabic and Chaldean should be appointed at Paris, Rome, Oxford, Bologna, and Salamanca. Pope John XXII especially instructed the bishop of Paris to see that these languages were taught in the Sorbonne. In the second place, it was a scientific interest with which the savants of the 12th century were occupied in order to make the Western nations acquainted with the medical, astronomical, and philosophical writings of the Arabs, and with the works of Aristotle, which were extant only in Arabic translations. Towards the end of the 12th century we find Arabic works with Latin translations from the Arabic, which increased during the Middle Ages, and were printed in the 15th century. The Reformation revived the study of Oriental languages by their application to Biblical exegesis. For the Church of Rome the study of Oriental languages became a matter of necessity, because of her missionary stations in the East, and thus pope Urban VIII founded, in 1627, at Rome, the Collegium pro Fide Propaganda, where the Oriental languages were taught. Through the Jesuits in China and Japan, Europe became acquainted with eastern languages and their literature. In a more scientific manner the study of the Oriental languages was taken up in the middle of the 18th century. The Englishman, William Jones, while a resident in East India (1760-90), called special attention to the riches of the Indian literature, and founded the Asiatic Society, in 1754, the Asiatic Researches. At Paris, Silvestre de Sacy made the study of Arabic of special interest, and attracted students from all parts of Europe. Till towards the end of the 18th century the study of the Oriental languages had only occupied a subordinate position in the curriculum of science, while the study of the different Asiatic societies the study of Oriental languages had become a specialty. The societys for promoting this study are as follows, of which the first three are the most important in Europe:

1. The Asiatic Society of Bengal, founded in 1784, by Sir William Jones, at Calcutta, published the Asiatic Researches (Calcutta, 1788-1999, 11 vols.), which were partly translated into French and German. Since 1830 the Asiatic Researches have been superseded by the Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal, which is published monthly. Under the auspices of this society, but at the expense of the Anglo-Indian government, since 1848 the Bibliotheca Indica, a collection of Oriental works in the original, with a translation, of which at the beginning of the year 1860 more than five hundred numbers had already appeared. Besides the Asiatic Researches, the society has a great many branch societies, which also have their own periodicals.

2. The Royal Asiatic Society of Great Britain and Ireland, which was opened by Cottebrooke, March 19, 1838. In the place of the Transactions (1824-34, 8 vols.), it now publishes the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society.

3. The Deutsche meisingeräulische Gesellschaft, founded in 1814. Its journal is Zeitschrift der deutschen Gesellschaft.

5. The Sino-Egyptian Society, at London, with Original Papers as the journal since 1860.

8. The American Oriental Society, at Boston, founded in 1834, with the Journal, since 1843, for its organ.

Osgood, Samuel (2), D.D., LL.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at Charlestown, Mass., Aug. 30, 1812. He graduated from Harvard College in 1832, and entered the Unitarian ministry in 1835. In 1857 he was settled over a church in Nashua, N. H. Previous to this he had been the editor, with James Freeman, of "The Christian Esquire," a Unitarian journal published in that city. Having resigned his charge, he travelled abroad for seven months. Returning to New York, he entered the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal Church in 1869. He died in New York city, April 14, 1880. Dr. Osgood's contributions to different magazines, reviews, and newspapers were of a high order; the same is true of the occasional orations, lectures, and addresses which he delivered from time to time. He was a very versatile student, although perhaps his strong point was that of theology and Christian morals; an excellent German scholar, and familiar with all the great German theologians; also fond of historical researches, and a prominent member of the New York Historical Society, of which for a long time he was home corresponding secretary. But although of studious habits, he always took a warm interest in current events, as a public-spirited citizen, ever ready to co-operate in the advancement of any scheme for promoting literature or art. His last public work was the reading of his paper before the Historical Society on "Channing's Place in American History." Much of Dr. Osgood's literary work, scattered through periodicals or printed in a pamphlet form, is impossible here to catalogue. He published, among other works of greater or less importance, translations from Olshausen and De Wette, "The History of Passion" (1869), and "Human Life" (1847). Among his original works are: "Student in Christian Biography" (1851); "The Hearthstone" (1854); "God with Men; or, Footprints of Presidential Leaders" (1856). "Milestones in Our Journey" (1855); "The Holy Gospel, illustrated by Overbeck" (1856); "Student Life" (1865); "American Leaves" (1867). Among his principal addresses before the New York Historical Society was one upon "Thomson Crawford and Art in America," in 1875. He also delivered a discourse before the society on its sixty-second anniversary, Nov. 20, 1866. Many of his essays will be found in "The International Review," "North American Review," "The Bibliophile," "Sucra," Harper's Monthly Magazine, and other periodicals. It is stated that he left unfinished a work entitled "The Renaissance of Art in America," which was to include his papers upon Bryant and Channing.
Otey, JAMES HERVEY, D.D., a bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born at Liberty, Bedford Co., Va., Jan. 27, 1800. He graduated at the University of North Carolina in 1820, was ordained deacon in 1822, and priest in 1823. He held the vicarage of St. Paul's, in Franklin, Tenn., from which parish he was elected bishop of the diocese, the consecration taking place in Christ Church, Philadelphia, Jan. 14, 1834. He died at Memphis, Tenn., April 29, 1863. From his urbanity and piety he usually went by the title of Bishop Otey. He was an able scholar, and a good preacher, blameless in life, and held in high esteem by all who knew him. He published three Tracts respecting the Bible Society against bishop Marsh (1812–13):—Life and Reflections of E. D. Clarke (1824, 4to; 1825, 3 vol. 8vo):—Life of J. T. Mulla (1836). After his death a volume was published of his Pastoral Addresses (1841, 8vo). Otho, Jacob, the reformer of Eswatini, was born in 1813 in Abaco. He studied at Freiburg, where Wimpeling was his teacher, and while a resident at Strasburg Otto published the sermons of Gerier, of Kaiserberg, in a Latin translation, in 1510. In 1520, while preacher at Wolfenweiler, near Freiburg, he was captured by the Emperor and imprisoned, where he remained, under the superintendence of the translator, and since then the entire Bible has been in circulation. (B. P.)

Othiribani, in Kalmuck worship, was a god of third rank, represented under a singular form. He appears only clothed about the hips. The figure has large eyes, a monstrous open mouth, is contracted, with head turned back, as if in convulsion. This deity was sent to heaven to combat the evil demon. He was victorious, and decapitated the spirit with which he made himself a crown, ear-rings, and a long necklace, which extended to the belly. From these runs a straight channel, which physicians use to give medicine. The idol is placed on the mouth of the sick, a pill is put into the channel, and falls into the mouth of the patient.

Otto, WM. D., D.D., an English prelate, was born at Cuckney, Nottinghamshire, Oct. 23, 1768. He was educated at Jesus College, Cambridge, of which he became fellow and tutor; was presented to the rectory of St. Mary's, Colinton, and held the vicarage of Sturmer, in Essex; appointed to Clench, Shropshire, in 1810; to Kinlet, in 1816; St. Mark's, Kennington, in 1825; was principal of King's College, London, in 1831, and consecrated bishop of Chichester, Oct. 2, 1856. He died Aug. 29, 1840. A Bishop Otey. In 1857 he accomplished the ancient scholars and the Bible preacher, blameless in life, and held in high esteem by all who knew him. He published three Tracts respecting the Bible Society against bishop Marsh (1812–13):—Life and Reflections of E. D. Clarke (1824, 4to; 1825, 3 vol. 8vo):—Life of J. T. Mulla (1836). Otto, Leopold Martin von, a Lutheran theologian, was born in Warsaw, in Poland, Nov. 2, 1819. He studied at Dorpat and Berlin, and acted for some time as pastor in Berlin. In 1844 he was pastor at Petrikau, and in 1849 at Warsaw, where he developed a great activity in founding many Christian institutions. Having taken part in the Polish revolution, he was imprisoned and suspended from his office. From 1856 to 1873 he served as pastor at Tshen, in Austrian Silisia, and when permission was granted for his return to his native town, he resumed his pastorate there again, where he died, Sept. 22, 1885. In acknowledgment of his great efforts for propagating theological literature in the Polish language, the Leipzig University conferred on him in 1884 the degree of doctor of divinity. He published, The Augsburg Confession in the Polish language, in 1832:—History of the Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession of Warrnaw, from 1652 to 1781 (1862). He afterwards published an evangelical review, the Zwiaszt Evangeliceg. (B. P.)

Ouseel, Philip, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Bornitz, Oct. 7, 1643, and studied theology and medicine at different universities. In 1711 he was preacher at Leyden, in 1717 professor at Frankfurt, and died April 12, 1724, doctor of theology and medicine. He wrote, De Lepra Cutis Hebraeorum:—Introductio in Accensiones Hebraeorum Metricam:—De Accensiones Hebraeorum Provenientibus a Phlebitis Decalogi:—De Nominibus Decalogi:—De Decalogi soli Israeliti Data:—De Demario regni Cabalorum:—De Naturae Decalogi. Outrein, Johann D., a Reformed theologian, was born at Middleburg, Oct. 17, 1683. He studied at Franeker, and was preacher there in 1687. In 1688 he was appointed librarian of the academy, in 1691 preacher at Arnhem, in 1708 at Dort, in 1708 at Amsterdam, and died Feb. 29, 1722. He was a voluminous writer. A complete list of his many works is given in Jäger's Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B.P.)

Outremont, Hector Albert Chaulet d', a French prelate, was born at Tourn, Feb. 27, 1825. He became titular of St. Gatiën of Tours in 1862, bishop of Agen in 1871, archbishop of Mau in 1874, and died Sept. 16, 1884.

Owen, Ludwig Benejamin, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Preussin, Prussia, May 7, 1735. He studied at Halle, and was for some time private tutor. In 1763 he was made court-preacher at Danzig, in 1770 member of consistory, and in 1772 professor of theology at Giessen. Outrer died Oct. 1, 1792. He published, Untersuchung über die Lehreäute der Christentums (Verlin, 1778):—De Theologia Populari (Giessen, 1775):—Nota mores ad 2 Pet. ii, 2:—De Necesseitate Satisfac- tionis a Paulo Rom. viii, 3 Asserta (1777):—De The- ologia Morali (1779):—De Actus, etc., 24 Spicileg. Sacra- tum Doctar Universi Creator (1780):—De Hexam in Re- surrectioni Resurrectionis Corporis (1781):—Geschichte der Religionen unter ihren Gründen und Gegenständen (1781-85, 2 vols.). See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschland's, s. v. (B.P.)

Overkamp, George Wilhelm, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Jan. 9, 1707, at Greifswald, and died at his birthplace, July 27, 1730, professor and senior of the university. He wrote, De Significatione Verborum Quibus Induratio Pharsaro in Historia Morie- nos Exprimitur (Jena, 1738):—De Judaeis Primaria Christiani Normam Iustitiae (ed.):—De Judaeis Prurita a Guillelmo Whitano albisse Corrupta Hebrew Co- dices Inutilitatis (Greifswald, 1739):—De Hebraorum 120 Pontificum Maximin in Summo Expiationis de Vico- rio (ed.):—De Succurso cum Jasa Iudaeorum (1748):—De Divinitatis Luciculo ad Definito Tempore Naturati- vita Messae (ed.):—De Philosophia Orientali (1744):—De Magia ex Oriente ut Verà Superstitius (1749):—De Solomoni, Verum Specimen Magiariae, ex Libro Coeleth Octanrius (1754):—Debatten Quadrigemina in Ica, iiii, 7, 8, 9 (1760):—Commentario in Ps. xxxii (1770):—De Distinctione in Judaeos et Graecos, in Graecos et Barbaros (1797).

Owen, Isaac D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Milton, Vt., March 8, 1809. Two years later he removed with his parents to Indiana. He was converted in his sixteenth year, in his twenty-third was licensed to preach, and in 1834 entered the Indiana Conference. For fourteen years he filled without interruption the regular appointments given him by that Conference, and during the last four years of the time served with great efficiency as agent of the Indiana Asbury University. In 1848 he received a transfer to California as a missionary. Upon his arrival in California the interests of the work were mainly placed in his hands. For many years he filled the office of presiding elder; twice he was elected to the General Conference; once, upon the non-arrival of the bishop, he was chosen to fill his place and preside; and he was always among the foremost in Church and literary enterprises. To no one man was California more indebted for her progress in morals and social reform than to Dr. Owen. He died in the bishop's seat, Sept. 5, 1866. Industry, zeal, and faithfulness marked his life. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1867, p. 233; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodist, s. v.

Owen, Joseph D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Bedford, N. Y., June 14, 1814. He graduated from Princeton College in 1835, and from the Theological Seminary in 1836. He was ordained in 1839 for the mission-field, in which he did his life-work. Landing in India in 1840, and assigned to the station of Allahabad, he continued to labor there without release or relaxation for four-and-twenty years. After the death of his first wife, in 1864, he obtained a short release, and crossed the Himalaya mountains into Tibet. Five years later he undertook a visit to his native land. In acknowledgment of the value of his translation of the Bible into Hindi, the North India Bible Society presented him money to visit Palestine. He visited Egypt, Jerusalem, Constantinople, Greece, and Scotland on this tour, and was intending to visit America. He died at Edinburgh, Scotland, Dec. 4, 1870.

Owl-headed Minerva. The idea of this goddess is due to the imaginative enthusiasm of Dr. Schiirmann, who believed that he saw an owl-headed Athena in the rude attempts at the imitation of the human face on vases and other objects discovered by him at Hissarlik. The faces of certain images of Apollo, found on the coasts of Asia Minor, and now in the British Museum, are ruder than those of the Hissarlik antiquities. Similar faces are also found on the Etruscan blackware from Chimi, where the spit of the vase serves as mouth, and it is probable that the ornamentation originated in two eyes being set on each side of a vessel's spout or mouth, to ward off the evil eye. Two large eyes are sometimes introduced on Greek vases in the midst of a group of figures. See Minerva.

Oxygraphus (from σχευρης, to write, and γράφω, to write), a name sometimes given by the Greek fathers to the Notary (q. v.) of the ancient Christian Church.

Ozem (Heb. O'tsem, ὡτίμη, strength; Sept. ἀειμι v. r. ᾠειμι and ἀειμι; Vulg. Aemum and Aemum), the name of two men of the tribe of Judah.

1. The fourth of the sons of Jerahmeel by his first wife (1 Chron. ii. 25). B.C. c. 1566.

He was appointed chaplain to the Church of Santa Maria sopra Minerva, and after four years of arduous study graduated doctor of theology and doctor of civil and canon law. From 1858 to 1860 he practiced as a jurist to the congregation of the Council of Trent. In 1861 Dr. Pabisch returned to the United States, and on his arrival at Cincinnati was given the chair of ecclesiastical history and canon law at the Seminary of Mount St. Mary's, and in 1865 succeeded to the rectorship. On the financial downfall of that institution, his intellect gave way, and he was taken to the Mount Hope House, near Baltimore, where he died, Oct. 2, 1879. In connection with Rev. Thomas S. Pachacamac, the supreme god of the Peruvians. This deity had a magnificent temple in a valley called Pachacamac, built by the Incas or emperors of Peru. Such treasures and religious objects had been carved in this temple that Pizarro found 900,000 ducats in it, though four hundred savages had taken away as much as they could carry.

The Peruvians had so great a veneration for this deity that they offered him whatever they esteemed most precious, and so great was their awe of him that they durst not look upon his image. Each in their priests and kings entered his temples with their backs towards his altar, and came out again without daring to turn.

Packard, Alpheus Spring, D.D., a Congregational minister and educator, was born at Chelmsford, Mass., Dec. 20, 1799, and was the son of Rev. Dr. Hezekiah Packard. He studied at the Phillips Academy of Ephraim and Bowdoin College in 1816. He was elected tutor of the college in 1817, and in 1818, professor of languages and classical literature; from 1824 to 1825 filled a vacancy in the chair of rhetoric and oratory; in 1826 was called to the chair of the Collins professorship of natural and revealed religion; and in 1833
and 1844 was acting president. He was chosen a member of the Maine Historical Society in 1828, and was long its secretary and librarian. He died suddenly at Squirrel Island, Boothbay Harbor, Me., July 13, 1884. His sermons, lectures, and contributions of various kinds to the press were numerous. See Boston Advertiser, July 14,

Paddock, Zacariah, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Northampton, N. Y., Dec. 20, 1798.
He was converted at the age of eighteen, licensed to preach in 1816, and the same year entered the Genesee Conference. His most responsible appointments were:
Ridgeway, Clarence, Batavia, French Creek, Westmoreland, Buffalo, Rochester, Auburn, Cazenovia, New York Mills, Saugerties, Ithaca, Binghamton, Oxford, Utica, Wilkesbarre, Honesdale, and Chenango; upon most of which he was eminently successful. He took a superordinated relation in 1827, and died, a member of the Wyoming Conference, at his home in Binghamton, N.
Y., July 4, 1879. Dr. Paddock's name in American Methodism in his declining years became a synonym for gentleness, sweetness, and purity. He published some several volumes, and wrote quite extensively for the Church papers and periodicals. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1880, p. 95.

Paine, Robert, D.D., a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church South. was born in Person County, N. C., Nov. 12, 1799, of Baptist parents. In early life
he removed to Tennessee; was converted Nov. 9, 1817;
licensed to preach the same year; the next year was admitted to the Tennessee Conference, and after laboring on several circuits and as a circuit rider, in 1836, was elected president of La Grange College, Alabama, in 1830, a position which he retained until his elevation to the episcopacy in 1846. He had been a member of every General Conference from 1824, and was active in the discussion that led to the division of the Methodist Church in 1844. His extensive labors as a bishop closed with his death, Oct. 20, 1882. He was a very able preacher, a ready speaker, and a devoted Christian.
He wrote Life and Times of Bishop McKendree. See

Paine, William Pomeroy, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Ashfield, Mass., Aug. 1, 1802. He studied at Ashfield Academy; in 1827 graduated from Amherst College; and in 1832 from Andover Theological Seminary; from 1820 to 1831 he was tutor in Amherst College. His only published work was the History of the Church at Holden, Mass., where he was regularly ordained and installed, Oct. 24, 1833. He resigned this charge in February, 1875, but remained pastor emeritus until his death, Nov. 29, 1876. See Cong. Quarterly,

Painting, Christian. The first law which governed the early Christian sculptors and painters was to present Christ as the source and centre of their life, and so to depict him that other figures in their compositions should appear like rays emanating from him.
With respect to the contents and spirit of representation, it may be said that, during the entire period of early Christian art, both sculpture and painting were,
for the most part, limited to symbolic expression.
In the beginning, symbolic representations were alone permitted. Soon, however, the art impulse partially broke through the formative fetters; yet art itself remained a sort of bōtis papyrus, and served chiefly as a mere reminder of the themes of sacred history. Even at a later period, when works of art were employed in multiplicities for church decorations, Biblical scenes, especially from that book of the Bible, were still preferred.
As early as the 4th century we find a portrait-like representation of sacred personages accompanying these forms of artistic symbolism. It was even believed that veritable portraits of Christ, the Madonna, and the Apostles, existed in paintings from the hand of St. Luke, and in sculpture from that of St. Eclectus, in the mosaics of St.
Veronica, yes, even in the so-called eπιπτωση ("likenesses of celestial origin ").

In the first third of the early Christian period, from the 8th century to the second half of the 8th century, of which numerous works of art in the so-called cemeteries (catacombas of Rome, Naples, Syracusa, etc.) have been preserved, painting still maintained the ancient plastic method of representation (as may be seen also in the paintings in the cemeteries, in the mosaics of Santa Costanza and Santa Maria Maggiore in Rome, San Giovanni Evangelista and the catacombs of Rome). In the second third, till the 8th century, painting sought more and more to adapt the antique forms to the idealistic, transcendental spirit of Christianity, as may be seen from the mosaics of Santa Pudenziana and Santi Cosma e Damiano at Rome, of San Appolinare Nuovo, San Apollinare in Classe and the catacombs of Rome, and some miniatures. After the 8th century, painting, and in fact, the entire art of early Christianity, lapsed into a continually deepening decline, till the 11th century, as may be seen in the mosaics of San Prassede, San Marzio, and others in Rome, and miniatures of various manuscripts, and the Iconostasis (q. v.) of Greek and Russian churches.

With the new life which the 11th century ushered in in Western Christendom, architecture reached not only the climax of its own development, but also asserted itself against anatomical figures over whole scenes and antithesis of painting. One spirit and one life prevailed in all three of the sister-arts. The newly awakened art impulse developed itself in the North, especially in Germany, much later in Italy. Here the earliest movement took place at the court of the Umbran school, and the Romanesque church, it has been ushered in before the first endeavors were made by single artists of lesser rank to blend the Byzantine style with the ancient Italian, and thus to infuse new life into the old Christian types. The "Romanesque" style of painting first reached completeness in Giovanni Cimabue and in Duccio di Buoninsegna of Sienna (fl. about 1292). On this there grew up two schools of painting—that of Florence and that of Sienna; the Florentine of a severer type, approaching nearer to the early Christian (Byzantine), the Siennese more independent, and likewise more graceful in the rendering of form. These two masters were followed by Giotto di Bondone of Florence (1266-1336), known under the title of "the father of Italian painting," but in fact only the founder of the Gothic style of painting. Giotto's first works are, however, and even before the 14th century, the works of the 13th century. The best pupils of Giotto were Taddeo Gaddi, and his son, Angelo Gaddi, Giottino, Orcagna, Spinello, Arezzo, Antonio Veneziano, and others. In Germany, the beginnings of the Romanesque style may be traced back to the 11th century. An improvement is manifest in the 12th century, especially in the famous altar of Verdun (of the year 1180, now in the monastery of Neuburg, near Vienna), in the mural paintings of the grand hall of the monastery of Brauweiler, near Cologne, and the ceiling of the central aisle of St. Michael, at Hildesheim. Far more numerous and important are the works still preserved from the period of the Gothic style, in which the peculiar spirit of mediævalism first attained to complete artistic expression. The development of glass painting may be noted: probably a German invention, dating at the end of the 10th century—examples of which are seen in the windows of St. Canibert, at Cologne, in the choir of Cologne Cathedral, in the Church of St. Catharina, at Oppenheim, and in Strassburg Cathedral. In easel pictures, which previously appear to have been very little painted, there is manifest no higher artistic endeavor until the middle of the 14th century. After this three separate schools may be distinguished: 1. The Bohemian, or school of Prague, founded by Charles IV; 2. The Nuremberg school, the chief representatives of which are several altar-pieces in the Frauenkirche, in St. Laurence, and St. Sebal, at Nuremberg; 3. The school of Cologne, by far the most important, whose chief representatives were master Wil-helm (about 1580) and master Stephan Lochner (about 1480).

With the beginning of the 16th century bought forth, in opposition to the spirit of mediævalism, a decided endeavor after greater truth of expression in art—an endeavor in light, color, drawing, and composition, to bring the spiritual import of representation into harmony with the laws and principles of nature. This naturalistic development first manifested itself in Italy in the Florentine school. Fra Giovanni Angelico da Fiesole (1487-1455), although in other respects wholly dominated by the spirit of mediævalism, was, nevertheless, the first who sought to immerse himself in the physiological and anatomical meaning of the human countenance. Over against him, already decisively emancipated from mediævalism, stands Tommaso di Giovanni da Castel, called Masaccio (1401-28), one of the greatest masters of the 15th century. With Fra Angelico are associated the names of Benozzo Gozzoli and Gentile da Fabriano; with Masaccio those of Fra Filippo Lippi, his son Filippino, Domenico Ghirlandaio, and Bastiano Mainardi. Other Florentine artists, as Antonio Paitiuno and Andrea del Verrocchio, who were also sculptors, strove by means of sculpture and painting to elevate and transform the spiritual import of representation in harmony with the laws and principles of nature; while Luca Signorelli of Cortona (1440-1521), by the nobleness and artistic truth of his compositions, presents a strong contrast with the deeper sentiment of the Florentine school. With the vicinities of Assisi, is an antithesis of the Florentine. Celebrated masters of the Umbrian school were Pietro Perugino (1446-1526), the teacher of Raphael, and the latter's father, Giovanni Santi (died 1494), as well as Raphael's friend, Francesco Francia (died 1517). The remaining schools of Italy, as the Venetian, with its Giovanni Bellini (about 1450-1516), the school of Padua and Mantua, with masters like Francesco Squarcione and Andrea Mantegna (1431-1506), follow the Florentine.

Italian painting reached its climax in the 16th century. The most celebrated masters of that period were Leonardo da Vinci, Cesare da Sesto, Andrea Salino, Francesco Melzi, and especially Luini. The Venetian school of the 16th century sought to realize by means of color the noble results to which Leonardo had attained. In this quality of color this school achieved in a more vigorous modelling of the human figure; while Luca Signorelli of Cortona (1440-1521), the teacher of Raphael, and the latter's father, Giovanni Santi (died 1494), as well as Raphael's friend, Francesco Francia (died 1517). The principal seat of the Lombard school in the 16th century was Parma. Its chief master was Titian. With him labored the distinguished pupils of Giorgione,—Fra Sebastiano del Piombo, Giacopo Palma, called Il Verchio, and Pordenone. Among Titian's own pupils we distinguish the brothers, and called Tintoretto. In the renowned Paul Velenzo, we have a master of color of the highest rank. The principl seat of the Lombard school in the 16th century was Parma. Its chief master was Correggio. The Florentine school, and, later, almost the entire painting of Italy after the beginning of the 16th century, were ruled by Michael Angelo, and by such lesser lights as Ricciarelli, Venedicto, Sarto, and others. The greatest of the five great masters is Raphael. His best pupils were Giulio Romano (1492-1546), Gaudenzio Ferrari, and Giovanni da Udine. In the Netherlands a new impulse was given to Christian painting by Hubert van Eyck (died 1426), the inventor, or, rather, the improver, of oil painting, and his younger brother and pupil, John van Eyck (died 1441). Their principal pupils were Pieter Chris- tiaen, Reger van der Weyden, and particularly Hans Memling. The influence thus begun made itself felt in Holland, where a similar school was founded, whose chief masters were Lucas van Leyden, and his contemporary Jan Mostaert. At the beginning of the 17th century a number of artists followed the style of the Van Eycks. The most distinguished of these was Quin- tim Manss, the smith of Antwerp (died 1599).

Similar was the career of German art during this period. The Gothic style had a long supremacy; but about the middle of the 18th century all the German schools followed the Italian. The chief masters of this period were, in the school of Cologne, Johann von Mehem, the painter of the Death of the Virgin; in the school of Westphalia, the master of Liesborn monastery; in the school of Ulm and Augsburg, Martin Schon (about 1480), the somewhat younger Bartholomaeus Zeitsheim, and his successor, Martin Schaffner, of Ulm, and Hans Holbein, father of the renowned Holbein the younger, of Augsburg; in the school of Nuremberg, Michael Wohlgemuth (1434-1519), and more especially his pupil Albrecht Dürer. Mention must also be made of the school of Strassburg, whose most famous pupil was the well-known Lucas Cranach (1472-1553), the friend of Luther, whose best pupils were his sons, John and Lucas Cranach the younger. The only artist who can be compared with the great master of Nuremberg in Hans Holbein the younger (1497-1554). His most characteristic works are the Darmstadt Madonna, a copy of which is at Dresden, and his well-known Dance of Death.

In the second half of the 16th century the painting of Germany and the Netherlands lost its independence by servile imitation of Italian masters. But in Italy, too, new Italian schools rose in the wake of the Baroque, and followed the deviations of art, that art had passed its zenith. A second race of pupils became mere imitators, even exaggerating the one-sidedness of Titian, Correggio, and Michael Angelo. The best examples of these so-called "manneristas" were P. Salvati, and Giorgio Vasari. In opposition to this continued pursuit of the end of the century arose the Bolognese school of the Caracci, whose advent marks for Italy the commencement of the fourth period of modern painting. Ludovico Carracci, and his nephews and pupils, Agostino and Annibale Caracci, established a sort of eclectic system, whose purpose it was to imitate the chief distinguishing qualities of the five great masters of painting. Their best pupils were Domenichino (1581-1641), Guercino (1550-1666), Franc. Albani (1578-1660), and especially Guido Reni (1575-1642), the most distinguished of all. A second school of Italian painting, arraying itself in opposition to the idealism of the great masters, and developing a one-sided realism and naturalism, was founded in the beginning of the 17th century. Its principal representative was Nic. Angelo Amicdighi da Caravaggio, whose pupils, the two Frenchmen, Mouton and Simon Vouet, and the eminent Spanish master, Gius. Ribero, called Spagnoletto, transplanted their influence to France and Spain. Notwithstanding the eminent talents exercised to uphold the fame of Italian painting, yet in the 18th century it reached its lowest level of decadence. It was in Spain that the school of catholic churchmen found, in the latter part of the 17th century, its strongest support. The five great masters who represent the complete development of painting in Spain were almost all from the school of Seville. They were: 1. José Ribera; 2. Francisco Zur-baran (1594-1669); 3. Diego Velasquez da Silva (1599-1660), one of the most eminent of portrait-painters; 4. Alonso Cano; 5. Bartolome Murillo. The flourishing period of Spanish painting was of short duration; and in the last quarter of the 17th century the schools of Spain degenerated into mere factories of art, such as Luca Giornalo of Italy introduced.

In the Netherlands, painting maintained a certain elevation of rank for a somewhat longer period. Here two distinct schools, that of Brabant (Belgium) and that of Holland, developed themselves out of national divisions. The former had its masters in Peter Paul Rubens, and in his pupils, viz. Jac. Jordaens, Caspar de Crayer, and, above all, Anton van Dyck (1599-1641). The latter was represented by Thedore de Keyser, Franz Hals, Harth, Van der Helst, and others, who were almost exclusively portrait-painters. A far higher development was, however, reached in the famous Rembrandt school, whose most distinguished pupils and successors were Gerbrand van der Eckhout, Solomon Koning, and Ferdinand Bol.

France and Germany can claim no position of imp-portance during this period in a brief review of Christian painting. In Germany, the Thirty Years' War had nearly uprooted all elements of culture, and when, in the 18th century, the country began to recover from these devastations, masters of only subordinate rank, as Dalh, Denner, Dietrich, and Raphael Mengs (1728-1806), appeared upon the scene. In France, the great and better masters, like Nic. Poussin, Eustache Leaure, and others, strove in vain to make head against the theatrical style represented by Charles Lebrun, the favorie of Louis XIV. Since the diffusion over Europe of the French style, in the latter part of the 17th century and followed the French Revolution, Christian painting has naturally experienced a marked decline. But in Germany, France, and Belgium individual schools have again grown up, the excellences of which, in the appreciation of the grand and the beautiful, cannot be denied. In Germany, Munich, Düsseldorf, Berlin, and of late Vienna, must be mentioned as the principal seats of revived painting, in which sacred themes occupy a most significant place, and these treated both in a Catholic and a Protestant spirit, the former by Cornelius, the latter by Lessing, Hübner, Bendemann, Deger, Von Gebhardt, and others. On the whole, however, modern religious painting, corresponding to the religious con-tion of the present time, seems partly a mere endeavor to revive a greatness and power which has perished, and partly an effort to reach a new goal, which is still enshrouded in darkness.

The best modern works on the history of Christian painting are, Kugler, Handbuch der Geschichte der Mister seiit Constantin dem Grossen (3d ed. Berlin, 1847; 4th ed. by Lübke at Leipsic, 1858); A. Woltmann, Geschichte der Malerei (Leipsic, 1878; Engl. transl. London, and N. Y. 1881); Rus-

Palestine: Colonists in. On this subject we here present an extract from Lieut. Conder's Tent Work in Palestine, ii, 305 sq.:

"The German colonists belong to a religious society known as the 'Temple,' which originated among the Pietists in Germany, and which, in 1820, and in 1821, emigrated to America, and later to the Rhine Church, separated themselves from the world, and met every Sunday morning in private family meetings for private religious observance, and were publicly known as the Pietists. The Pietists accept as their standard the explanations given by Dr. J. A. Bengel (in his Onomastikon of the New Test.), of the prophecies in the Revelation. Among the friends and disciples of Bengel was a certain Dr. Hoffmann, who, obtained from Frederick, the eccentric King of Wurtemburg, a tract of barren land at Kornchal, where his disciples established a Pietist colony, which he intrusted to transplanted Pietists. Hoffmann, however, died, and his followers remained contentedly on his lands; but Hoffmann's son was not forfuteful of his father's work, and hastened to create a new colony at Kirschhardthof, with a special view to its final removal to the Holy Land. Among his earliest disciples was Herr D. Hardegg, who in 1828, and in 1829, sent twelve men and women to Palestine. They settled in wretched huts near the Sea of Galilee, on the edge of the Plain of Esdraelon, now of Nazareth; and in spite of the warning of friends who knew the unhealthy climate of that place, they remained in the unhealthy atmosphere of the low-lying country and the springs, until they all died of fever. A. A. 1838, C. Christopher Hoffmann and G. D. Hardegg left Kirschhardthof, and in October they reached Palestine; after visiting various places, they re-trained at Haifa, and both of them took the oath of both places. The Haifa colony was the first founded, that at Jaffa being some six months younger. Hardegg became president of the former, and Hoffmann of the latter."

"The religious views of the colonists are not easily understood, but I believe that most of them have rather vague ideas of the life of the immortal soul; they are inclined to regard it (as many people believe) as a mere fragment of the whole. They are especially impressed by the doctrine of the Revelation of God and the climate of Zechariah. They suppose it to be a duty to separate themselves from the heathen people, and to form a separate community living, as closely as possible, on the model of the apostolic age. The spread of infidelity in Germany appears to be the main object of this separatist tendency among the Pietists.

The Temple Society are probably best summarised in the 'Profession of Faith of the Temple,' published by Herr Hoffmann, and including five articles as follows:

1. To prepare for the great and terrible day of the second coming of Jesus Christ, which, from the signs of the times, must needs be near. Our main object is the building of a spiritual temple in all lands, specially in Jersu-

2. This temple is composed of the gifts of the Spirit (1 Cor. xii. 4), which make the true Church, and every one of the members the temple of the Holy Ghost.

3. The means to obtain these is to seek the kingdom of God, as described by the prophets (Isa. ii. 2; 9: 10-17), and as the religious society of which they are a part.

4. The temple of Jerusalem is not a building of stones; men of every nation (1 Pet. ii. 4-11) united in the worship of God in spirit and truth.

5. The Temple Society consists of sacrifices such as are described in the New Testament (Rom. xii. 1; Heb. xii. 18; James i. 7).

The writings of Hardedge are far more diffuse and miscellaneous. His chief work is a pamphlet which he offered up a long prayer in German, a hymn was sung with the music of the German, and a sermon preached on the prophecy of Zechariah. The President then delivered an exhortation, announcing the immediate advent of the hour, who would 'suddenly come to his temple.' Other elders followed, speaking with much earnestness, and another hymn was sung, after which the congregation quietly dispersed from the bare schoolroom in which they had assembled. A discussion of the affairs of the colony often immediately succeeds the religious services.

Of the history of the Jaffa colony we gathered comparable facts. In the year 1870, the Jaffa colony, under the leadership of Dr. Sarona, about two and a half miles north of the town, consisting of 120 houses; the second, nearer the sea, consisting of about 200 houses; the third, further east, belonging to a German colony which came to grief, and this settlement consisted of thirteen houses and one hotel, the latter kept by Hardedge's son, who also represents the German government in Jaffa.

In 1872 the colonists numbered two hundred and fifty-four single and forty-seven married men, thirty-two single and fifty-one married women (four widows), and four children. The colonists cultivated forty-five acres of vineyard, thirty acres of orchard, and seventeen acres of vineyard.

In the first three years of its existence only seven deaths occurred in the colony, but the mortality increased later: in 1873 there were fifteen deaths among the two hundred and fifty-four persons, viz., sixteen accredited to disease, and one suicide.

The little village of well-built stone houses is situated west of the walled town of Hafia, under the shadow of the Carmel range. A broad street runs up from the shore and divides the town into two parts, the houses of the buildings stand, in their gardens, on either side. Close to the beach are the villas and gardens, with villas and moderate laudubri, and a little farther up are the school and meeting-house, in one building. Mr. Hard-

The Jaffa colony numbered three hundred and twelve in 1873, and the number of unmarried men and women was equal.

The Jaffa colony has been in existence for two years, and the number of the colonists was then forty in 1873 was thus far greater than that of all the settler. The land had also increased, in the same period, to six hundred acres, under which were twenty acres of vineyards, and twenty acres of orchards and gardens; but the soil of the newly-acquired property near Tiberias, in the plain west of Carmel, is of very poor quality, and the German settlers succeeded in the cultivation of obtaining grounds on the top of the mountain, where the climate is mild and the crops are good.

The stock consisted of seventy-five head of cattle, two hundred and thirty sheep, goats, and pigs, and all the wool and mutton of the colony. The wool and mutton of the colony have been imported. The trades followed are house-carpentry and masons' work, carpentry and wagon-makers. The colony is supplied with good shoes and harness, tailors, butchers, harness-makers, tailor-makers, soap-makers, vienaters, and quarrymen are also found among the colonists. There has been an attempt to trade in soap, olive-oil, and olive-wood articles, but for these undeveloped markets the capital is not sufficient. The reasons are that the Ger-

The colonists were many of them employed on the English or on the German side at Nazareth, which is the only place in the Jaffa district designed and built; and all the masons' and carpenters' work was done by the German colonists. The colonists have done much to show the road from Hafia to Nazareth, though they have not made it, considering that, from a religious point of view, it is of importance for the colony to have their own roads. Their wagons are now driven between the two places, and the natives employ them for moving grain.

The school of the colony is for attending one of the Sunday services, in the colony at Hafia. The congregation was devout and earnest; the service was simple and free from any kind of formality. A young man offered up a long prayer in German, a hymn was sung with the music of the German, and a sermon preached on the prophecy of Zechariah. The President then delivered an exhortation, announcing the immediate advent of the hour, who would 'suddenly come to his temple.' Both superintendents of the Jaffa colony, one of which of the Hafia colony may be, they cannot compare with the Mormon chief in the qualities to which his success was due.

In the second place, the colonists are divided among themselves. In 1876 we found that Herr Hardedge had been deposited (temporarily, I understand) from his views) from the leadership of the colony, and he had been succeeded by a committee, consisting of three men, two farmers, and an architect, who, is, moreover, the representative of the American government at Hafia. This deposition of the original leader had caused dissensions among the Ger-
the Pali was commenced in 1813, under the auspices of the Colombo Bible Society, by Mr. Tolfrey, assisted by two learned Buddhist priests. The version had advanced as far as the end of the epistle to Philemon, when Mr. Tolfrey died, in 1817. In 1825 the Rev. James Clarke took the work, and in 1835, the whole New Testament was printed in Pali. One of the Buddhist priests who assisted Mr. Tolfrey in the translation became a sincere convert to Christianity, and subsequently devoted his whole attention to the completion and revision of this important work. Pallium, a piece of pontifical dress. It is the peculiar mark of princes, metropolitans, and archbishops, and a few privileged bishops, to be worn by them at councils, ordinations, and on certain occasions in church. Its other names were amphorion, superhernamuris, and, in the writings of Theodoret and St. Gregory Nazianzen, hiera stola. It is a circular scarf of plain lambs' wool, worn like a collar about the neck, and having two falling ends fastened together with a chasuble by three gold pins fixed on the left shoulder, the breast, and back, the number three signifying charity, or the three crowns. Before the 8th century it was ornamented with two or four red or purple, but now with six black, crosses, fastened with gold pins, which superseded an earlier ornament, the Good Shepherd, or one cross, in the 4th century. It has been supposed to be the last relic of an abbreviated toga, reduced to its latteid by degree. In the time of Gregory the Great it was made of white linen cloth, without seam or needlework, hanging down from the shoulders. See PALL.

He studied at Jena, was for some time court-chaplain at Wolfenbuttel, in 1727 pastor at Hamburg, and died Feb. 17, 1743. He is the author of, Eisleitung in die Geschichte der ungarischen Konfessionen (Hamburg, 1726). Palmer, Edward Henry, an English Orientalist, was born at Cambridge, Aug. 7, 1840. In 1868 he took part in the expedition for exploring the Sinai territory, and made an examination of the names of places, traditions, and antiquities of Arabia Petraea. With the same object in view he explored in connection with Cyril Drake, the desert El-Tih and Moab, in 1869 and 1870. Upon his return to England he was made professor of Arabic at Cambridge in 1871. In 1878 he settled at London, and in 1882 went on a secret mission, at the instance of the English government, into the desert east of the Suez canal. On his second trip through the desert he was killed, in October, 1882. Palmer published an Arabic translation of Thomas Moore's Paradise and the Peri (1865): — Oriental Mysticism (1867): — Report on the Bedouins of Sinai and their Traditions (1870): — A History of the Jewish Nation (1874; germ. trad. Gotha, 1876): — A Grammar of the Arabic Language (London, 1874): — A Persian-English Dictionary (1876): — Life of Harrow Ali Ruschi (1878), and for Max Müller's Sacred Books of the East he translated the Koran. Palmer, Karl Christian, father of Heinrich Julius, was born at Delitzsch, May 3, 1759. In 1787 he was professor at Leipzig, and died at Giessen, July 17, 1838, doctor and professor of theology. He wrote, "De Ascens inter Theologiam Moralem et Publicam Religionis Institutio (Leipsic, 1788);" "Paulus und Gamaliel, ein Beitrag zur altesten Christengeschichte (Giessen, 1806);" "Predigten über die Evangelien des ganzen Jahres (1817)." See Winer, "Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 495, 589; ii, 134." (B. P.)

Palmer, Walter C., M.D., a devoted Methodist evangelist, was born Feb. 9, 1804. He was converted in 1817, and among the hallowed associations of the "Old Allen Street Church" in New York, grew up to a beautifully developed Christian character. He practiced medicine for many years in that city, and at length, in connection with his sanctified wife, gave up his time to labors for the conversion and sanctification of souls, traveling extensively, and holding meetings everywhere in this country as well as in Great Britain. He died at Ocean Grove, July 29, 1883. (See N. Y.)

Palma Version of the Scriptures. Palma is a dialect spoken in the small states north of Oude, below the Himalayas. A version of the New Test. was commenced at Serampore in 1817, and completed at press about 1832. See "Bible of Every Land," p. 122. (B. P.)

Paulet, Karl Friedrich Wilhelm, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Mannheim, April 19, 1802. He studied at Heidelberg, was for some time preacher at Kaiserslautern, near Mannheim, in 1848 at Ziegenhals, near Heidelberg, in 1839 pastor at Bremen, and died in 1867, doctor of theology. He published, "Allgemeine Uebersicht derjenigen Gegenstande, welche das gesammte Bedürfniss der evangelisch-protestantischen Kirchen in Deutschland erfordern" (Mannheim, 1837); "Das Historische und Heimatsche Magazin (Heidelberg, 1836, 2 vols.):" "Protestantische Geschichte der christlichen Bereisung und der Homiletik (Leipsic, 1839-40)." See Zuchold, "Bibl. Theol. ii, 973 sq.;" Winer, "Handbuch der theol. Lit. ii, 129." (B. P.)

Panis Litirum ("bread briefs") were letters of recommendation, by which a secular lord ordered a monaster or other institution of charity to receive a certain person for support. The right of issuing such letters was connected with the duty, originally imposed upon such institutions, of showing hospitality to princes and other great lords when they were travelling. During the Middle Ages the emperor of Germany exercised a very extensive right of this kind; but the custom existed also in other countries. Towards the end of the 18th century the princes of the different countries refused to admit such royal briefs in their respective territories and Frederick the Great openly refused to acknowledge such a brief, and asked to be let alone in future with such imperial orders. See Klüber, "Literatur der deutschen Staatsrechte (Erlangen, 1791), p. 540-543, 548; Haberlin, "Protestantische Geschichte der neuzeitlichen Verhältnisse der deutschen Litumkunde (Leipsic, 1792)," p. 97; Pfitz-Hieronymi, "Real-Encyklop., s. v. "Panisbriefe." (B. P.)

Panhiser, David, a Scotch prelate, was vicar of the Church of Carstairs, in the diocese of Glasgow, prior of St. Mary's Isle in Galloway, and some time commendator of the abbey of Cambuskenneth. In 1543 he was his principal person of worship. He was not able to escape the see of Ross about 1545, and was still there in 1566. He probably died in 1568. See Keith, "Scottish Bishops," p. 192.

Pape, Heinrich, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Bremen in 1745. He studied at Göttingen, was preacher at different places in the duchy of Bremen, and died April 17, 1805. He is the author of, "Das 53. Capiel Jesu übersetzt und erklärt (Bremen, 1777):" "Das Evangelium Luc. überschrieben und erläutert (1777-81, 2 vols.):" besides, he wrote some ascetical works, for which see Düring, "Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands," s. v. (B. P.)

Papst, Johann Georg Friedrich, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Wittingwald, Bayreuth, Oct. 21, 1724. He studied at Leipsic and Erlangen, was in 1788 professor of philosophy at the latter place, in 1794 dean at Zirndorf, near Nuremberg, in 1815 doctor of theology, and died June 7, 1821. He wrote, "De Authorum Copiae XI. Joannis Erlangens (Erlangen, 1779):" "Institutiones Christiana Religionis Initii (1786):" "Geschichte der christlichen Kirche (1787):" "De Ispium Christianorum Cupola in Veronaeomus Motia a Romanis (1789-90):" "De Apostolica Ecclesiae Exemplo Conti Atheniensi (1780):" "Commentari über die Geschichte der christlichen Kirche nach dem schweizerischen Lehrbuch (1792-1801)." Paradise. There have been at least four notable attempts in very recent times to discover this long-sought locality; two of them by American, and two by German authors. Their theories have been put forth with the greatest assurance, and in most cases supported by a vast array of learning; but they all seem to have failed to satisfy the judgment of the literary world, or to add anything substantial towards a reasonable solution of the question.

1. The view of Friederich Delitzsch, the eminent Assyriologist and of the well-known commentator, has already been given under the art. Eden. Brilliant as are the researches of his work, its conclusions have been rejected by the most careful and competent critics. See Hailer in the "Ser Setus Critique," 1881, p. 457 sq.; Noldeke, in the "Ztschr. d. deutsch. Alterthuma, Geschicht- schrift," 1882, p. 174; Lenormant, in "Les Origines de l'Hit-
PARADISE, vol. ii. We cite (from The Nation, N. Y., March 16, 1885) some of the geographical objections:

"Why, if the stream of Eden be the middle Euphrates, is it left unnamed in the narrative, though it is certain that it occurs nowhere else in the same poetic; and why the middle and the upper course of that river? . . . If the looting was done by the Hidush, it is often described as flowing in front of Assyria, which lay above the central Mesopotamian lowland sweeter to be Eden? Have we a word for the begettor, familiar with the whole course of the Tigris, deem its lower part a branch of the Euphrates? . . . Why in Hastin, if the Arabian border-land so well known may be meant, so fully described by its products? Who tells us that the gold, the bédilum, the skins of Babylonians were also characteristic of the adjoining Hastin?"

A modern traveller, Rev. J. P. Newman, D.D., had previously indicated a somewhat similar position to the above (A Thousand Miles on Horseback, N. Y. 1875, p. 69), namely, at the cleftude of the Euphrates and the Tigris; and he was confident that ancient tablets would yet be exhume fully establishing this location. But the inscriptions recovered by Smith, Ramsay, and others in that vicinity do not confirm the theory, and it has thus been brushed aside with the multitude of other conjectures that preceded it.

A startling conclusion is announced by Rev. William F. Warren, D.D. (loc. cit.), professor of the Boston University, "that the cradle of the human race, the Eden of primitive tradition, was situated at the North pole, in a country submerged at the time of the deluge" (Paradise Found, Boston, 1885, 8vo). This is the outcome of his researches in early traditions, noticed under our art. COSMOLOGY. The author brings to the support of this view an amazing amount of reading and investigation, which we have no space to criticize in detail. To such as are prepared to accept the mythologies of antiquity as having a historical basis, and to place the Biblical account on a level of authority with them, and at the same time to extend the origin of the human race to a date contemporaneous with the thermal era of geology, this book, which is written in a fascinating style, and illustrated with a copious reference to the literature of the subject, will prove at least an ingenuous and plausible, if not a conclusive, argument, but for those who maintain the literal accuracy of the history in Genesis, and the substantial agreement of the topographical conditions there given with the present conditions of the earth's surface, it will appear a naïve, preposterous, and chimerical hypothesis. The great objection which we see in it is the setting aside as an unintelligible narrative the only professed and historic description which we possess of the Garden of Eden, and then restoring to it geographical and topographical elements of an ingenious, combined with the scanty and problematical indications of cosmological science, for an identification that is at last claimed as decisive and final. If the Biblical passage (Gen. ii, 10-14), with its explicit items, fails to point out the true spot, we may as well give up the attempt as hopeless. To us that account seems sufficiently clear and consistent; and we believe that explorations in the region thus designated will vindicate the accuracy of the Scripture language beyond any reasonable doubt. It is a question of exegesis and geography, not of mythical comparison.

4. The last formal production in this line is an attempt to show that Paradise was situated about sixty-five miles south-east of Damascus, in a shallow alluvial basin, amid the wild basaltic crags of the desolate volcanic region known as the Hasbim (Die Anführung der Paradies-gebiete, by Lotitz Engel, 1881). An elaborate effort is made to identify the names and circumstances; but the agreement is most fanciful and insubstantive. Eden is the present Rohb, an Arabic term for a rich patch of soil; the four rivers are the wadis which penetrate the surrounding slopes in the rainy season; while the most violent of all the attempts of rationalism are resorted to for the purpose of disposing of the associated names and features of the narrative: e. g., the cherubim are volcanoes of the Hasbim; Cain is only a more specific title for Adam; Cain's sons and Lambech's wives are mountains—peaks adjacent, etc. It would seem as if the place seems to be reached in the vagaries on this subject, and it is time to return to sober examination of the given data, if any success is to be achieved in the exposition.

Parah. The probable site is Kherbet Farah, laid down on the Ordnance Map at five and a half miles south-west of Jerusalem, with the accompanying Memoirs (iii, 299) as "heaps of stones only."

Parasura, is the sixth creditor, or incantation of Vishnû, in which he appears as Rama, the son of *Jamaadgî, armed with a *parasu, or axe. Arjuna, king of the Haihvaya, had obtained, as a reward for his pious deeds, a thousand arms and sovereignty over all the earth. The gods, alarmed at his power, applied to Vishnû, who decided to be born as a son of Jamaadgî, in order that he might slay him. Jamaadgî was a pious sage, who had married Renuka, a princess, and had obtained by her five sons, the last of whom was Rama, a Vishnû incantation. On a certain occasion Arjuna came to the hermitage of Jamaadgî, and was there hospitably received by the saint, who could treat him and his followers sumptuously, as he possessed a fabulous cow of plenty, that not only supplied him with the milk and butter required for his sacrificial offerings, but was able to produce all that he wished for, as well as the precious qualities of this cow, and disregarding the kind treatment he had received, Arjuna carried off with him the cow and her calf. When Rama, who was absent at this time, returned to the hermitage, he took up residence in his own house and slew Arjuna and his army. The sons of Arjuna, to avenge the death of their father, attacked the hermitage and succeeded in killing Jamaadgî. Thereupon Rama made a vow to exterminate the whole Kshatriya, or military race, and, not satisfied with destroying the sons of Arjuna, he killed every Kshatriya whom he met afterwards. It is said that "he cleared three seven times the earth" (i. e. slew as many generations) "and filled with their blood the five large lakes of Samantapureha, from which he offered libations to the fire of Bhûru." He then performed a solemn sacrifice, and distributed the land and great riches among the ministering priests. There can be little doubt that the legend in essence historical, recording a great struggle in primeval times between Brahman and Kshatriya, of which we have the parallel in the history of Vaisishtha and Viswamitra (q. v.).

Pareau, Louis Gérald, a noted Dutch theologian, a follower of the Calvinists, was born in Amsterdam on 10, 1800. He studied at Utrecht, and at the age of twenty took the degree of doctor of theology on presenting Commentatio Critica et 1. Cor. xii. On the same day (Sept. 23, 1820) he was also made doctor of philosophy "honoris causa." After ministering for some time at Nederrijn and Veere, he was made professor of moral theology at Groningen in 1831. He opened his lectures with an address, De Animâ von Miniâ Theologorum quorum Ingenio Academica Intstitu- tione Informante, Pareau was twice rector of the university of Groningen (1843 and 1858), and died Dec. 27, 1864. He is the author of, Institia Institutionis Christianae Mor-alis (Groningen, 1842). — Dogmatia et Apologetica Christiana (1845); in connection with Hostede de Groote, Hendrik, Codex Sacreti (1846) — Euchar- istia Sacramentum Christiani (1851), also in connection with Hostede de Groote, M. (1858) — Merciehiser, Eucharistie, des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Paris, Alexius Vincenz, a Roman Catholic theologian of Austria, was born at Prague, Nov. 10, 1748. In 1765 he joined the Dominicans, and received holy orders in 1771. For a time tutor at the grammar- school in Prague, he went, in 1785, to Klaatan, Bohemia, as director of the German grammar-school. In 1786
he was made episcopal notary at Budweis, in 1802 doctor of theology, in 1811 dean of the theological faculty at Prague, and died April 15, 1822. He is the author of a number of theological works, for which see Dining, Die geheiligten Theologen Deutschlands, s. v.; Wiss. Jahrbuch der theolog. Lit. i, 238, 350. (B. F.)

Park, Calvin, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Northbridge, Mass., Sept. 11, 1774. He graduated from Brown University in 1797, three years after was appointed tutor in the university, and in 1804 was elected professor of languages and literature. From 1811 to 1822, he was professor of moral philosophy and metaphysics. In 1806 he was licensed to preach, in 1815 ordained an evangelist, and from 1825 to 1840 was pastor of the Evangelical Congregational Church at Stoughton. He died there, Jan. 3, 1847. His literary taste was exquisite, and he invented and published the beauties and defects of a literary performance. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ii, 460.

Park, Roswell, D.D., an episcopal minister and educator, was born at Lebanon, Conn., Oct. 1, 1807. He was educated at Union College, and at West Point Military Academy, where he graduated in 1827. In 1821 he was licensed to preach, in 1825 ordained an evangelist, and from 1826 to 1840 was pastor of the Evangelical Congregational Church at Stoughton. He died there, Jan. 5, 1847. His literary taste was exquisite, and he invented the beauties and defects of a literary performance. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ii, 460.

Parker, Charles Carroll, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Underhill, Vt., Sept. 26, 1814. He graduated from the University of Vermont in 1841; studied one year at the Union Theological Seminary, N. Y.; taught at Burlington, Vt.; one year: was a congregational pastor at Timnath from 1848 to 1854; thereafter served at Watervliet until 1867; at Boston Centre, Me., until 1868; at Goshen until 1871, and finally, as a Presbyterian minister, at Paterson, N. J., until his death, Feb. 15, 1880.

Parker, Joel, D.D., a Presbyterian divine, was born at Bethel, Vt., Aug. 27, 1799. He graduated from Hamilton College, N. Y., in 1814; was ordained in 1825, and settled at Rochester, where he remained until 1830; was ordained at Shrewsbury, Mass., in 1830 to 1833; at New Orleans from 1833 to 1838, and at the Broadway Tabernacle, New York city, from 1838 to 1840. He was chosen president and professor of sacred rhetoric in the Union Theological Seminary in the latter year, and retained the position two years. During the next ten years he served the Clinton Street Church, Philadelphia. He became pastor of the Brecker Street Church, New York city, in 1852, and of the Fourth Avenue Presbyterian Church in 1854. He died in New York city, May 2, 1873. Dr. Parker was for some time associate editor of the Presbyterian Observer, and other periodicals, and editor of some of them. See Allibone, Dictionary of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Parker, John, D.D., an English prelate, was born at Oxford, Jan. 26, 1758. He graduated at Oxford College, was chosen a fellow of Balliol, and appointed to the college living of All-Saints' and St. Leonard's, in Colchester. He was recalled to Oxford by his election to the mastership of Balliol, Nov. 14, 1798; received the office of vice-chancellor in 1807; was promoted to the deanship of Christ Church, in 1810, and to the vicarage of Weare, Somersetshire, in 1812; and consecrated bishop of Peterborough in 1813. He died March 12, 1819. Bishop Parker was an humble Christian, a ripe scholar, an able preacher, and a wise administrator. See The (Lonl.) Christian Remembrancer, June, 1819, p. 324; November, p. 609.

Parks, Justin Wright, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Westport, Mass., in 1824. He graduated at Williams College in 1845, and from Union Theological Seminary in 1845; was ordained by the New York Presbytery, Dec. 26, 1849, and immediately thereafter sailed for Thessalonica, Greece. After laboring at this post until 1854, he was transferred to Smyrna, Asia Minor, and in 1857 to Baghchilijeh, Turkei, thence again in 1861 to Nicomedias, and then, after an absence in the foreign field for twenty years, he returned to his native land on a short visit for the benefit of his health. Having again entered upon his work, in July, 1860, he was making a missionary tour on the mountains east of the sea of Marmora, accompanied by his servant, when they encamped for the night; the next morning they were found by the roadsides murdered by a band of Zalucks. See N. Y. Observer, Aug. 12, 1860.
Parsons, Levi, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Northampton, Mass., Aug. 20, 1779; graduated from Williams College in 1801; subsequently spent two years longer, and was ordained for the ministry under Dr. Hyde of Massachusetts. He was licensed in 1807, and the same year became pastor of the Church in Marcellus, N.Y., where he remained twenty-six years. He then supplied Tully for one year, and Otisco for another; next went to his former charge in Marcellus, held it six years longer, and then returned to his ministry with the Third Church in Marcellus, and at Bordino. He died Nov. 20, 1864. See Mears, Presbyteryans in Central New York, p. 626.

Fasch, Georg, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Sept. 23, 1661, at Danzig. He studied at Rostock and Wittenberg, was in 1899 professor at Kiel, and died Sept. 30, 1707. He wrote, Diet, de Rechabitis et Jerem. zxe, an essay prepared while yet at the gymnasium (Danzig, 1691):—De Operationibus Domnomum (Wittenberg, 1684):—De Physico de Pluralitate Mundorum contra Ciceronianos (ed.):—Uram Pontifici-

ficati Coeperet Concordiae in Religionem seu Salarvati (Kiel, 1689):—De Philosophia Characteristica et Parmenidos (1703):—De Viriss Molis Moralis Tra-

Paterson, James, D.D., a Scotch Baptist minister, was born at Dumfartoon, on the Clyde, in 1801. His early education was obtained at the church school of his native town; and he began life as a school-teacher. He entered the University of Glasgow with the idea of becoming a physician, but never took his degree. During his course there he labored as an evangelist with the Glasgow City Mission. He was invited by Dr. Marshman to become a missionary to Scarampore, but declined the invitation. In 1816 he hired a small room in Glasgow, fitted it up with forms, and began preaching to a congregation of very poor persons. Here a Church was organized, and removals were made from time to time to better quarters. In 1835 he undertook the management of the Scotch Temperance College, and subsequently of the Scotch Review. He was one of the originators (in 1846) of the Glasgow Commercial College, and long one of the instructors. He died Jan. 29, 1860. See (Lowd.) Bapt. Hand-book, 1861, p. 334.

Paterson, John (1), a Scotch prelate, was first minister at Forfar, and next at Aberdeen. He was advanced to the see of Ross, Jan. 16, 1662; where he remained until his death in 1675. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 203.

Paterson, John (2), a Scotch prelate, was first minister at Ellon, Aberdeenshire, and afterwards at the Tron Church, and dean of the city of Edinburgh. He was preferred by the interest of the duke of Lauderdale to the see of Galloway, Oct. 23, 1674, where he continued until March 22, 1675, when he was transferred to Edinburgh. In 1675 he was put into the see of Glasgow, where he continued until the revolution in 1688. He died at Edinburgh, Dec. 8, 1708. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 64, 270, 282.

Patton, James, a Scotch prelate, was elected bishop of Dunkeld in February, 1571. He was deprived in 1578, and died July 20, 1596. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 56.

Patrick, Francis Xavier, a Jesuit, who died at Rome, April 23, 1881, professor of exegesis at the Col-

egium Romanae, is the author of, De Interpretatione

Scripturum Sacrorum (1844, 2 vols.):—De Exemplis

(1830, 1 vol.):—Commentarius in Evangelium Josue

(1857):—Comment, in Evangelium Merici (1862). (B. P.)

Patten, David, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal

minister, was born at Boston, Mass., Oct. 10, 1810. He graduated at the high-school there, went thence to Wilbraham Academy, where he was converted in his eighteenth year, and afterwards to Wesleyan University, Middletown, Conn., where he graduated in 1834. In 1882 he was licensed to preach, and employed as supply at Hartford, and also supplied Power Street Church, Providence, R. I., during his last college year. On completing his course at Wesleyan he was at once called to the principalship of Willbraham, and in 1835 entered the New England Conference. He served as principal at Wilbraham seven years, then entered the pastoral office, and, receiving a transfer to the Providence Conference, was sent in turn to Chestnut Street, Boston; Nantucket; Elm Street, Bedford; Fall River, and Mathias Street, Providence, serving two years in each place, and one year to Warren. In 1852 he was appointed presiding elder of Providence District, which office he filled until his election, in 1854, to the professorship of theology in the Biblical Institute at Columbus, Ohio. By successive efforts he became an enlarged endowment for the institute, in memory to Boston, its establishment on an assured financial basis as a department of Boston University, and retained his position in its chair of homiletics and pastoral theology until 1873. Then, on account of impaired health, relinquished his office and became agent of the university and secretary of the board of trustees, devoting to its interests his unflagging lore and unflagging zeal until his death, March 26, 1873. The estimate placed upon Dr. Patten's character and worth by his conference is made manifest by his three elections to the General Conference in 1848, 1852, and 1864. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1873, p. 98; Simpson, Cyclops, of Methodistism, n. v.

Patten, William, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Halifax, Mass., about 1760, and graduated at Harvard College in 1780. He was ordained pastor of the Second Church at Newport, R. I., May 24, 1786, dismissed April 13, 1835, and died in 1889. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, p. 392.

Paterson, Andrew Oliphant, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Fayette County, Pa., July 1, 1774. He graduated at the Reimand College in 1814, spent one year in theological study at Princeton, and was ordained by the Presbytery of Redstone, April 18, 1821; preached at Mount Pleasant and Swickley churches until 1804, was agent for the Domestic Board of Missions until 1836, preached at Beaver Church from 1837 to 1839, and at New Lisbon from 1840 to 1851; then became stated supply at Bethel, O., for one year, and settled as pastor from 1853 to 1857. He supplied College Corner for a short time, and died at Oxf-

Pattison, Dorothy Wyndlow (usually called Sister Dora), an English philanthropist, was born at Hauxwell, Yorkshire, Jan. 16, 1832, being the daughter of the rector there. In 1864 she joined the "Sisterhood of the Sacred Martyrs," a religious order recognized by the Church of England, and the next year became a nurse in the Cottage Hospital at Walsall, where she devoted herself in the most exemplary manner and with rare skill to the care of the sick, both in body and soul, until, exhausted in strength, she retired in 1876 and died Dec. 4, 1876. See her Biography by Mary-cart Longman (London and Boston, 1889).

Pattison, Mark, D.D., an English clergyman, was born at Hornby, Yorkshire, in 1813, and educated at Driel College, Oxford. He became a fellow of Lincoln College, Oxford, and rector in 1861. He died July 31, 1884, leaving numerous essays and reviews on literary and educational subjects. See Men of the Time, v. 7.

Paton, William, D.D., a Congregationalist, was born at Philadelphia, Pa., Aug. 28, 1798. He graduated from Middlebury College in 1818, attended Princeton Theological Seminary from 1819 to 1820, and in the latter year (June 8) was ordained an evangelist in Charlotte, Va. Having gathered a Presbyterian congregation in New York City, he became the Central Presbyterian Church, he was installed pastor May 7, 1822, and remained in charge until Sept. 15, 1834. The three years following he was secretary of the Presbyterian Education Society. From October, 1837, to October, 1847, he was pastor of the Spring Street Church, New York city, and from 1848 to 1852 was pastor of the Hammond Street Congregational Church. During the next ten years he resided in New York without charge; then removed to New Haven, Conn., where, in 1863, he was acting-pastor of the College Street Church. Subsequently he removed to New Haven, where he lived until his death, Sept. 9, 1879. From 1864 Dr. Paton was one of the vice-presidents of the American Missionary Association. Besides important articles in various periodicals, he published, in 1833, a revised and enlarged edition of Paton's Bible, in English. The same year he published The Village Testament, and in 1859 the same work, revised, under the title of The Cottagers Testament. His other works are, The Christian Pessimist (1836);—The Laws of Fermentation, etc. (1837);—The Judgment of Jerusalem (1837);—James of Nazareth (1840);—The Principles Hand-written by Bible Characters (1875). He also issued editions of Edwards on Revivalism and Finney on Revivals, besides a number of pamphlets. He was an ardent advocate of temperance and a powerful lecturer on that subject. He made fourteen voyages to Europe, at first for health, and afterwards as a delegate to various religious bodies.

Dr. Paton was a clear, forcible, and copious writer, a bold and impressive speaker, valuable for the truth, an humble and devout Christian. See Necrol. of Princeton Theol. Sem., 1880, p. 8; Comp. Year-book, 1880, p. 35; Film. Trib.; by Dr. William W. Paton (Washington, 1880).

Paul, John de Str., an Irish prelate, was prebendary of Dunnington, in the cathedral of York, and canon of Dublin, when he was advanced to the archbishopric of Dublin, Sept. 12, 1560. In 1560 he was one of the three whom the king appointed to explore for such mines of gold and silver as were thought to be abundant in various parts of Ireland. In 1561 he had an especial writ of summons to a great council to be held in Dublin, on which occasion he is said to have labored with his usual good sense and judgment to effect a general amnesty and pardon of such of the Irish and English as were then opposed to the government. He died Sept. 9, 1562. See D'Alton,Memoirs of the Archbishops of Dublin, p. 134.

Pauh, Carl Wilhelm, a German jurist, was born at Lübeck, Dec. 18, 1792. He studied jurisprudence at Göttingen and Tübingen, and occupied the highest positions in his profession at his native place, where he died, March 18, 1828. For a number of years he belonged to the officers of his Church, which he served everywhere, and for which he undertook the publication of a new hymn-book in 1802. Having thus become interested in hymnology, he continued his studies, and published at Emden a volume of odes under the title Predigten fur fremme Israeliten (Halle, 1824), by Hirsch Prinz, as his Jewish name originally was. When twenty-five years of age he embraced Christianity at Minden; on coming to England was for some time a student at Cambridge, and while there he invited to come to Oxford, where he was appointed lecturer in Hebrew. This post he held for thirteen years, and published, in 1839, his Analecta Hebraica. In 1840 he was ordained, and sent to Berlin by the Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews. In 1843 he was stationed at Montpelier, but resigned that charge in 1854. He then retired to Lonon, Bedfordshire, England, and died May 4, 1877. He also published, The Great Mystery; or, How can Three Be One? and A Translation of the Chaldee Paraphrase of Isaiah (Lond. 1871). (B. F.)

Paul, George Jacob, a Reformed theologian of Germany, was born at Brunswick, July 24, 1722. He studied at Halle, was in 1746 director of the Reformed gymnasium, in 1750 cathedral preacher, in 1751 preacher at Berlin, in 1774 again at Halle, and died Feb. 28, 1786. He published, De Occasione Paulini xxxvir Consociationis, etc. (Halle, 1747); De Compendio Locis Morali, etc. de Joh. ziz, 14 (1748); De Auctoribus Classici in Christianorum Schola Caute Tractandii (1749); Entwurf einer katholischen und populären Theologie (2d ed. 1786); Heidelberger Kaischnachien (1781). See During,Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, s. v. (B. F.)

Paulinians is a name sometimes applied by the Arians to the ancient Christians, from Paulinus, bishop of Antioch.

Pauwler, Louis Daniel, a Protestant theologian of France, was born at Autretot, Feb. 28, 1789. He studied at Lausanne, and in 1819 accepted a call to a parish in the neighborhood of Bouloie. In 1821 he was called to Rouen, where he spent the remainder of his life. Besides his ministerial functions, he instructed in a parochial school, which he had founded in 1820, organized different Christian societies, and succeeded in opening a Protestant hospital. Pauwler died Sept. 15, 1865, highly honored by both Protestants and Roman Catholics. See Lichtenberger, Encylop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. F.)

Pawson, John, a prominent minister in early Methodism, was born at Thornton, near Leeds. Nov. 12, 1737. He was early convicted under Methodist preaching, and after a laborious struggle was joyfully brought into the fold of light. He preached his first sermon in 1761, in 1762 Wesley sent him to York, and from that time to Feb. 3, 1806, when he preached his last sermon at Wakefield, he exercised his ministry with marked diligence, ability, and success. He was frequently appointed to the large cities, and in 1785 Wesley ordained him, with Hanby and Taylor, for Scotland, in which country, owing to the Scottish character, creed, and mode of worship, Pawson was convinced Methodism would never make much headway. Triumphant in his busy life it was closed at Philadelphia, March 18, 1806. Twice Paw- son was elected president of the conference (1799 and 1801). "During the trials which followed Wesley's death, he was one of the pillars of the shaken structure of Methodism." He wrote in favor of giving the sacréments to the societies in 1792, commenced Kilham's pamphlet on the same subject, proposed the solution of the difficulties at the conference in London in the same year, published a revised and enlarged copy of the Large Minutes (1797), and An Affectionate Address to the Members of the Methodist Church (1798). He favored Methodist legislation, yet the Methodist government was not sufficiently articulated, favored the appointment of bishops, and the division of England into four Methodist dioceses, and introduced services in the Established Church hours. He was a man of sound judgment, piety, and zeal, and Adam Clarke published a worthy eulogy of him in the Methodist Magazine (Lond. 1807). See Jackson, Early Meth. Preachers, iv 1 sq.; Stevens, Hist. of Methodism, iii, 202 (see Index); Smith, Hist. of Methodism, ii (see Index); Crowther, Portrayal of Methodism, 2d ed. p. 382 sq.

Pay, Stephen De, a Scotch prelate, was prior of the abbey of St. Andrews, and in 1365 was elected bishop of the same. But he was taken prisoner by the English at sea, on his way to Rome, and died in March, 1366. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 26.

Payne, George, LL.D., an English Congregational minister, was the son of a Baptist minister at Walgrave, Northamptonshire, and at a very early age gave indications of superior intelligence. He was educated in Hoxton College and the University of Glasgow. In 1807 he became assistant to the Rev. Edward Parsons, of Leeds, and in the following year to the Rev. George Lambart, of Hull. In 1812 he removed to Edinburgh as pastor of Albion Street Chapel, where he labored eleven years. In 1824 he was called to the theological chair in Lancashire College, Blackburn. After five years in that capacity he became president and theological professor of the Western College, Exeter, where he remained until his death, June 19, 1848, at the age of sixty-seven. He published: Divine Sovereignty—Divine Sovereignty—Divine Sovereignty—Divine Sovereignty—Original Sin (Lond. Congregational Lectures for 1844).—Elements of Mental and Moral Science.—Elements of Language.—: and a tractate on Congregationalism. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1848, p. 284; (Lond.) Evang. Mag., 1848, p. 928, 415.

Payne, John, D.D., a missionary bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was consecrated in St. Paul's Church, Alexandria, Va., July 11, 1861, as bishop of Western Africa. He resigned his jurisdiction in October, 1871, and returned to the United States, fixing his residence at Oak Grove, Va., where he continued to reside until his death, Oct. 25, 1874, aged sixty years. See Prot. Episc. Alman., 1875, p. 144.

Payson, Charles Henry, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Lebanon, Mass., Sept. 28, 1831. He graduated at Amherst College in 1852, and from the Union Theological Seminary, N. Y., in 1857; was ordained pastor of the mission church connected with the Madison Square Chapel in 1860, where, with the exception of a year and a half spent at Berlin and Heidelberg, he labored uninterruptedly with great zeal and success until his death, Jan. 24, 1877.

Peck, Jesse Truesdell, D.D., LL.D., a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born at Middlefield, Ohio Co., N. Y., April 4, 1811. He was converted when sixteen years old, immediately united with the Church, and commenced a course of study preparatory to the ministry. After two years he was licensed as a local preacher, and in 1832 was admitted into the Oneida Conference, and sent to Dryden Circuit. The next year he was appointed to Newark, and successively to Skaneateles and Rutland, when he became principal of Governor High School, and remained four years. In 1841 he was elected principal of Troy Conference Academy, at Poughkeepsie, N. Y., a position which he retained till 1848. In 1849 he was chosen president of Dickinson College at Carlisle, Pa.; in 1852 he became senior preacher of the Foundry Church in Washington, D.C.; in 1854 secretary of the Tract Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church; in 1856 he was appointed pastor of Greene Street Church, N. Y. He was next stationed at Powell Street, San Francisco; in 1860 was made presiding elder of the Pacific District. At the close of that year he became pastor in Sacramento City, and after two years was stationed at Santa Clara. From 1864 to 1865 he was pastor of Howard Street Church, San Francisco, and was for several years president of the board of trustees of the University of the Pacific, also president of the California State Bible Society. In 1866 he was appointed to Peekskill, N. Y.; in 1867 to Hudson Street, Albany, where he remained three years, and was then stationed at Centenary Church, Syracuse. In 1872 he was elected bishop, and at once entered upon the duties of that office with great earnestness and intensity of interest, also striving to advance the interests of Christianity, wherever his influence was felt. He was a delegate to the Methodist (Ecumenical) Conference, held in London in 1881, where he distinguished himself by his able and dignified manner of presenting. He died at Syracuse, May 17, 1883. Bishop Peck's religious experience was especially rich and full, and his life most consistent and irreproachable. He was devoted to Methodism, but his broad, catholic spirit led him to regard Christians of all denominations as brothers in Christ. His sermons were clear and strong; as a pastor he was loving and faithful; and as a bishop, untiring in his energy till attacked by disease, which rendered further labor impossible. He was author of, The Central Idea of Christianity.—The True Woman.—What must I Do to be Saved?—And The History of the Great Republic. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1888, p. 76; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Peckelhaus, a Scotch prelate, was bishop of the see of Galloway about 780. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 271.

Pectoral, a square plate of gold or silver, either jewelled or enamelled, sometimes worn by English and archiepiscopacy of St. Andrews, constituted lord chancellor in 1377, and in the same year became bishop of Dunkeld. He died in 1396. See Keith, Scottish Diak-
ops, p. 85.

Pegase Version of the Scriptures. The Pegase is still spoken in Pegu, a country which formerly included all the sea-coast and the mouths of the rivers of the Burman empire, but the Burmese portion of which, comprising by far the greater part of its extent, is now a province of the British Indian empire.
The Pegase language is supposed to be more ancient than the Burmese, although the alphabet is the same, excepting the addition of two letters, which were put into the language by the Portuguese in the sixteenth century. The first Pegase version of the New Test, was printed at Maulmein in 1847. This is the only part of the Bible now extant. See Bible of Every Land, p. 11 sq. (B. P.)

Penny, Joseph, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Ireland, was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, came to America he taught in the academy at Flushing, L. I. In 1821 he took charge of the First Church, read continuously. For the rest of the Church year, three separate and independent series of lessons are employed—one series for the Sundays, beginning with the second after Pentecost; one series for the Saldathis, beginning in the Pentecost week; and one series for the three weekdays between the Sunday and Sabbath. All three series select both from gospels and epistles, following the order of the books and chapters in the New Test. History explains this strange phenomenon. It is very evident that the Greek Church at first introduced lessons for the Sundays, later for the Sabbaths, and still later for the weekdays.

Next in importance is the Armenian system, which has only become known by professor Petermann's translation from the Armenian Church Almanac, published at Venice in 1792, and in German translation found in Alt's Kirchentageb., ii. 136, 255. Scripture-reading is one of the most important part of the Armenian church-service—more so than in the Greek Church, and lessons from both the Old and New Tests are employed. Among the Syrians we find for the most part the Greek reading-system, while the Nestorian system of Bible-lessons contains for the first time a series of lections selecta, which in some respects deserves to be placed at the side of the Romish pericope system.

The documents with reference to the reading-system of the Jacobite Christians are quite ample; a list of three of the series of Coptic lessons is found in the edition of the Syriac New Test, published by Wiltmannstadt (Vienna, 1855). The Maronites have virtually the same plan of Scripture-reading as the Jacobites. While the lectionary plan adopted by the Alexandrian churches was only a branch of the Greek, that of the Coptic churches was entirely distinct, and is a portion of the Coptic liturgy of St. Basilus. A Latin translation is found in Renaudot's Collection, ii, 157 sq., from which it is evident that, in every church service, the Coptic read from four different parts of the New Test. Various systems exist with the Coptic in the Coptic and Trinitarian systems.

A proper transition from the eastern to the western systems would be the North-African lectionaries, if we were in possession of such. With the exception of the Mozarabic, prevalent among the African and Spanish Christians in the 13th century, no list has been preserved.

In the Occidental Church we have, in reference to the public reading of Scriptures, a phenomenon similar to that observed in the Church of the East. As, here, there was also an isolated, and in the West, the Roman system gradually supplanted all the rest. A difference between the two consists in this, that the non-Byzantine systems of the West were mostly followed by bodies that stood opposed to the Byzantine Church, while the non-Roman system found a home in bodies on doctrinal and pastoral footing with the Roman Church.

To the reading-systems no more extinct belongs the Capuan. Of its existence we have ample proof in the Cod. Fuldenensis, corrected in the year 646 by bishop Vitalis of Capua. That the Capuan Church once pursued a peculiar plan in the public reading of the Scriptures is manifest from a letter of the missionary Augustine to Gregory the Great. Besides, there are other scattered evidences from Hilary (354), Sidonius (472), Salvianus (490). See Mathillon, De Literae Galliae. p. 29 sq. Then we have a capitular of Charlemagne, abolishing the Gallic liturgy in favor of the Romish. Under the title, Missa Ambrosiana, the very ancient liturgy and reading-system of the Milan Church is still preserved. Its original form cannot be definitely determined, as the different printed texts do not agree among themselves. Concerning the Mozarabic liturgy, comp. the art. s. v. Of the Old British and Irish systems not a single trace remains, the Roman having entirely supplanted them. The Roman system of Scriptural reading, like the whole Roman liturgy, has passed through three stages—that of its origin and development, down to the time of the Carolinians, that of supremacy in the Middle Ages, and that of fixed and formal codification by the Council of Trent.

The oldest traces of it are found in the 5th century, about the time of Jerome, to whom Berno and later writers ascribe its origin. It consists of a double list—one of the epistle, and the other of gospel selections—partly chosen freely, and partly with partiality for certain.

In the second period, this system made its greatest conquests, in France supplanting the Gallic, in Germany entering with Christianity. It also experienced some internal changes during this time, especially on account of the many saints' days and the introduction of the Corpus Christi festival in 1564.

Finally, the Council of Trent declared the papal system the only legitimate one for the Roman Church, only allowing those churches the use of any other which could prove that the latter had been in constant use there for the past two hundred years.

With the reformation effected by Luther and his German Bible, the traditional character of church services necessarily had to change also. The Bible was read, studied, and explained. The most complete system of Bible-lessons was introduced in England, to some extent in the Reformed Church. This whole subject is treated by Ranke, Forbund der kerkvormijken (Bohla, 1859).

The old pericope system has a peculiar history with in the section of the Protestant Church that has retained it. In England, Cranmer, in composing the prayer-book, simply took the epistles and gospels as found in the missal of the English bishops, omitting only those intended for days not celebrated by Protestants. This latter was also done in Germany; but some other changes were made here, especially at the time of the fundamental laws and the pre-reformational system there were no lessons for the sixth Sunday after Epiphany, nor for the twenty-sixth and twenty-seventh Sundays after Trinity. This defect was remedied successfully during the 16th century by an unknown master in liturgics, and the present arrangement is the result.

The subordinate services, such as the matins, vespers, as also services during the week, prayer-meetings, and the like, found great favor in the eyes of the Reformers. Luther, in 1526, the Zurich order of worship for 1585, and in 1632, the Gallic directions for the year nineteen.

The Church of England pursues its own plan in arranging the daily lessons. Not content, as the Continental reformers were, with selecting only certain sections of Scripture to be read, Cranmer arranged for morning and evening services such a course of lessons that in every year the entire Old Test, with the exception of the Psalter and the purely ritual sections of the Pentateuch, was read through once, the New Test, three times, and the Psalter twelve times, i.e. was to be chanted through once a month. In Germany, theology had during the week in course of time became almost extinct.

The public Scriptural reading, thus reduced to the regular gospel and epistolary lessons for the different Sundays, could not long satisfy the Church. Already a plan was entertained to enrich the weekly course by the introduction of pericopes. See Suckow, Die Kirch. Perikopen (1860); Mathiow, Die evang. Perikopen des Jahres (Amsterdam, 1844-45, 2 vols.); F. Strauss, Das evangelische Kirchentagbuch (Berlin, 1850); Piper, Der verbesserte evangel. Kalender (1850); Bobertag, Das evang. Perkins, Aaron, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Bridgewater, Mass., May 5, 1792. He was converted in 1811, and ordained June 8, 1818, pastor at Latten- town, N. Y., where he remained twelve years. Twice he was pastor of churches in the city of New York. He died in October, 1861, at Red Bank, N. J. He was remarkably successful in his ministerial labors. See The Christian at Work, Oct. 20, 1861. (J. C. S.)

Perkins, Henry, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Vergennes, Vt., Feb. 5, 1790. He graduated from Union College in 1817, and spent two years thereafter at Princeton Theological Seminary. In 1819 he became pastor of the Presbyterian Church at All- town, N. J., where he labored faithfully for thirty-three years. He retired from active service, and died at Allentown, June 30, 1880. Perm. Version of the Scriptures. The Persian is a sister dialect of the Syriac and Wotjak, and the three peoples who live in the north-east of European Russia, in the Perm, Wotjak, and Archangel governments, belong to a common race. Mr. Schiessner estimates the number of the Persians at 50,000, the Syriacans 70,000, and the Wotjakas 20,000. From the annual report of the British and Foreign Bible Society for 1880, we learn that the gospel of Matthew, prepared for prince Louis Lucien Bonaparte by P. A. Popou, has been revised and translated into the Russian character by the asceticist Wiedemann, and published by the above society. From the report for 1882 we learn that the Holy Synod have sanctioned the publication of the gospel of Matthew, long delayed by the censorial authorities, and that the portion will now be circulated throughout the government of Perm, among the population of 100,000 souls. (B. P.)

Perreyve, HENRI, a Roman Catholic writer of France, was born at Paris in 1831. At the age of twenty he was made a priest, and in 1861 he was professor of Church history at the Sorbonne. He died in 1865, leaving La Journeé des Malades, an asceticical work. Father Gratry, the teacher of Perreyve, wrote Le Voeu de Henri Perreyve (Paris, 1866), See Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Perrine, Matthew LA Rue, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Freehold, N. J., May 4, 1777. He graduated from Princeton College in 1797, studied theology under Dr. John Woodfall of Freehold, and was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, Oct. 18, 1799. On the 24th of June, 1800, he was ordained, and for four months acted as a missionary in western New York. On June 15, 1802, he was installed as pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Bottle Hill (now Madison), N. J. In 1804 he visited the city. In 1811, he was installed as pastor of the Spring Street Church, New York City. Here he continued till the summer of 1820, when, by his own request, the relation was dissolved. In 1821 he was elected to the professorship of ecclesiastical history and Church polity in the Auburn Theological Seminary. He died in Feb., 1839. Perrine had the reputation of being an accurate and thorough scholar. He was of a speculative and metaphysical turn. As a preacher he was always instructive and interesting. He published, Letters Concerning the Plan of Salvation (New York, 1816).—A Sermon Before a French Mis- sionary Society in N. Y. (1817).—An Abstract of Biblical Geography (1835). See Alexander, Princeton College in the 18th Century; Gen. Cat. of American Theol. Sem., 1888, pp. 198; Alkman, Historical Discourse (1876), p. 13.

Perrine, William Henry, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Lyons, N. Y., Oct. 8, 1827, and moved with his parents to Michigan when he was seven years old. He was converted at the age of thirteen; in 1848 graduated at the Spring Arbor College, having entered the ministry in 1851. The following are his successive appointments: South Albion, Jackson; Lafayette Street, Detroit; Adrian, Ann Arbor; superannuated two years; Flot; professor of Albion College four years; preserving elder of Lansing District; professor again in Albion College; St. Joseph, Albion, Marengo, Parma, Concord. He died in Albion, Mich., Jan. 22, 1881. Dr. Perrine was a fine pulpit orator, and had great versatility of his talent. He took especial interest in Sunday-schools and Bible studies, having visited Palestine in 1857. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1881, p. 812; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Perry, Gideon BARCOCK, D.D., LL.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at South Kingstown, R. I., Oct. 12, 1800. Among several parishes of which he was rector were St. Paul's, Cleveland, O., and Grace Church, in the same city. He was also the founder of St. James's parish in Cleveland. Subsequently he was rector of Trinity Church, Natchez, Miss., and of Grace Church in Hopkinsville, Ky., where he died, Sept. 30, 1879, having been fifty-seven years in the ministry. See Proceedings of General Convention, Oct. 13, 1879. (J. C. B.)

Persian Version of the Scriptures. By way of supplement we add the following: "As the style in which the gospels of the Polyglotta is written has long been antiquated at Isaphan, several efforts were made during the present century to produce a version in the polished dialect now spoken by the Persians. A translation of the gospels was made under the superintendence of colonel Colebrooke, and printed at Calcutta in 1804. In 1812 the Rev. L. Sebastiani had advanced nearly to the end of the Epistles, in a translation of the New Test. from the Greek, and during the same year the gospels of this version were printed at Serampore. In the meantime another translation of the New Test. was progressing at Dinapore, under the superintendence of Henry Martyn. The translators were Sabat and Mirza Firouz. This version was completed in 1806, but it was so replete with Arabic and abstruse terms, intelligible only to the learned, that the Rev. H. Martyn determined upon visiting Persia in person for the sake of obtaining a clearer and idiomatic version. In 1811 he reached Shiraz, the seat of Persian literature, and remained there nearly a year, in the meantime executing from the original Greek a translation of the New Test. The state of his health compelled him to return to England, but he ex- pired during his journey homeward, at Tokat, Asia Minor, in 1812. Copies of the work were deposited with Sir Gore Ouseley, the English ambassador in Persia, who, on returning to England by way of St. Petersburg, met with prince Gorchakov, then at the head of the Russian Bible Society. The suggestion made to the prince to have an edition of Martyn's Test. printed was complied with, and in less than six months the impression was completed.

In 1813 a communication was received by the corresponding committee at Calcutta from Meer Said Ali, the learned native employed by Mr. Martyn at Shiraz, in which he informed the committee that the manuscript of the Persian New Test. and of the Psalms (which had likewise been translated at Shiraz) was in his possession, and he waited for his disposal. He was directed to take four copies of the manuscript, and send forward the same to Calcutta, while he was invited himself for the purpose of superintending the publication. The Palster and the New Test. passed through the press at Calcutta in 1816. The Palster was reprinted at Lou-

London, under the superintendence of Dr. Lee, in 1824, and the New Test., edited by the same scholar, in 1827. Other editions followed in 1837 and 1847.

Of all the editions of the Persian New Test., the most incorrect seems to have been that printed at St. Petersburg in 1815, and, at the request of the missionaries, the issue was stopped by the Russian Bible Society. The Rev. W. Glen, of the Scottish mission at Astrakhan, was in consequence led to undertake a version of the Psalms in Persian, for the benefit of the numerous individuals speaking that language who resort to Astrakhan and the south of Russia. In 1826 the British and Foreign Bible Society made arrangements with the Scottish Missionary Society for the services of Mr. Glen in the translation of the poetical and prophetic books of the Old Test. In the meantime Mirza Jaffier had been engaged by the same society to produce a translation of the historical books of the Old Test. at St. Petersburg, under the eye of Dr. Pinkerton, and according to special directions given by Dr. Lee. The only portion of Mirza Jaffier's version which was published was the book of Genesis, printed at London in 1827, under the care of Dr. Lee. Mr. Glen's version of the Psalms and Proverbs was published at London in 1830-31, and again in 1836. The entire Old Test., translated by Mr. Glen, was finally published in 1842.

In 1824, the Rev. T. Robinson had commenced another translation of the Old Test., which was printed in 1838. A Persian version of the prophecy of Isaiah was published by the British and Foreign Bible Society in 1828. This version was executed by Mirza Ibrahim, of the East India College at Haileybury, and was published in 1826. Since 1872 a revision of H. Martyr's New Test. has been undertaken by the Rev. R. Bruce, of the Church Missionary Society, stationed at Julfa, near Isaphan, which was completed in 1877. The same translator also commenced the revision of the Old Test. From the report of the British and Foreign Bible Society for 1879, we learn that Mr. Bruce and the Rev. J. Bassett and J. L. Potter, of the American Presbyterian Mission, have formed themselves into a committee for the revision of the Persian Scriptures. The different books of the Old Test. were distributed among the different revisers, and each will carefully examine the work of the others. The revised New Test., too, was to be subjected to a joint revision. From the report for the year 1857, we learn that the latter, having been thoroughly revised by the translator and professor Palmer of Cambridge, was published by the British and Foreign Bible Society. As for the Old Test., the work of revision is progressing slowly. (B. P.)

Personality is an attribute of conscious beings only, and thus distinguishes individuals from each other. In the Trinity it is simple and absolute, so that the three persons, the godhead are not three beings, since they have a common personality. In man it is compound, consisting of a body and a soul, which are not homogeneous, as are the three divine persons, and yet constitute but a single being, inasmuch as the consciousness essentially resides in the soul, which is therefore personal and real, person, and remains such after the separation from the body. In Jesus Christ there was a double or complex personality, because he had a complete human soul (as well as body), and was also filled hypothesis with the divine spirit. He consequently may be said to have had a sort of double consciousness, for the divine spirit did not always communicate everything to the human spirit, and the latter could not be consociate with the former. Yet he was not two persons, inasmuch as the two natures were indistinguishably blended, and the twofold personality likewise. The personal identity of humanity between the divine and the human spirit in him did not negative this, just as the still greater dissimilarity between human flesh and soul does not negative unity in man.

Peters, Friedrich Matthias, a Protestant theologian of Germany, son of Friedrich Christoph, was born at Hamburg, Jan. 16, 1800. In 1842 he was pastor to the Jews of Hamburg, and died Aug. 29, 1859. Peruvian Religion. In the earliest times the inhabitants of the kingdom of Peru, which Manco Capac, the first inca, ruled, seem to have been believers in the coarsest fetishism. They only had one supreme deity, the mother of all, Mama Kocha, in honor of whom wild animals, plants, and prisoners of war were sacrificed. The devouring of fallen or sacrificed individuals was a custom of the Peruvians. Water-flood had overflowed the country, and after this Manco Capac, and his wife, Mama Oello, children of the sun, came from a foreign country to the shores of the sea Titicaca, where they built the city of Cuzco, collected the remaining people, and gave them laws and sacred teachings, which were carefully preserved until the arrival of the Spaniards. The supreme being of the later Peruvians was called Pachacamac, who was the creator of all beings, also of the sun; the latter was his only visible representative on earth, and was therefore divinized; but the god human was immediately above the sacrifices of mortals. The moon and stars also had temples, like the sun, but of less splendor, inasmuch as all that was of gold in the temples of the sun was made of silver in those of the moon and stars. There were male and female priests: of the latter, the maidens of the sun were of two kinds; the higher, from the Inca-family, dedicated their whole lives to the service of the sun, and there were more than fifteen hundred of these in convents. If unhappy, they and their whole family were to be exterminated, according to the law known as the "hard law." But in the history of Peru not an instance of this occurs. The second class of servants of the sun did not live in the capital, Cuzco, but in the provinces of the kingdom, and were chosen from all classes. The conditions of reception were beauty and the post of sovereignty to cruel Pizarro came to Peru, the immense riches were carried off by the Spaniards, and the beautiful daughters of the Inca, the virtuous sun-maidens, became a prey to the insolent warriors.

Peter (Saint), festival on, 1, Deposito Pietri in catachresis 2, in via Ostiense. The Catachresis Libriarum (854) first mentions the entombment of the bones of Peter and Paul as having taken place in the year of the consuls Tuscus and Bassus (355), and gives the text as III, 26, 27. As this date is 148 years earlier than the 258, a festival in commemoration of that day is recorded in the Latin Church by Prudentius in the 4th century, by Augustine (Serm. 295–299), Maxim. of Turin (ibid. 69–69), and Leo the Great (ibid. 82–84) in the 5th; after the 6th it is noticed in all martyr chronicles. In the Greek Church it is stated by Theodorus Lector, in his Church Book (16), that it was first celebrated in Constantinople towards the close of the reign of Anastasius I (518); after the 7th century it is given in all calendars, even those of Coptic, Ethiopians, and Armenians. In 1748 Benedict XIV decreed a celebration of eight days for the city of Rome; and in 1867, in the Göttliche Kommunion, it was renewed with great magnificence by Pius IX.

II. Festum Cathedrae Petri Antiochenae, for Feb. 22, mentioned in the Calendarium Libernum, and celebrated in commemoration of the accession of the apostle Peter to the episcopal chair, without, however, specifying the locality of the chair. The same is the case with the Calendarium of Polenius Silvius (448). In the Ambrosian Liturgy, and in the Sacramentarium of Galasius I, the festival is omitted altogether; but it is found again in the Sacramentarium of Gregory, and in his later works.

III. Festum Cathedrae Petri Romanae, Jan. 18, was generally confounded with II, but became independently established in the 8th century, and formally fixed during the Carolingian age, to which time, also, belongs the final revision and codification of the double episcopal title of St. Peter.

IV. Festum Sanctum Petri ad Vincula or in Vinculis, also called Festum Calamorum Petri, Aug. 1, is not mentioned until the 9th century, in Wandalbertus Martyrologium, and Pseudo-Beda's Hymn. de Vinculis Sancti Petri (Becker, Opp. iii, 94). In the Greek Church it is celebrated Jan. 16, in the Armenian Feb. 22. The latter Church also celebrated a festival of "the finger of the apostle Peter" (Asenazai, Euchol. Eccles. Orient.).

Pharaoh of the Exodus. Owing to the deep interest in the history of the Bible, extraordinary efforts have been made by Biblical scholars to identify this Egyptian king, whose name is not given in the sacred narrative. Most writers have been content to compare the chronologies of Egypt and the Bible together, and rest in the simple synchronism, a result necessarily necessary, from the acknowledged uncertainty of both these chronological schemes. Thus the Speaker's Com- mentary (i, 465, Amer. ed.) concludes that the Egyptian monarch in question was Thothmes III; but this result depends upon a series of chronological upheavals and comparisons in which is debatable. The most favorite identification, however, of late, has been with Manetho, who is said to be the Pharaoh of the name of the monuments, and the Amenophis of the 19th dynasty, as the Pharaoh of the Exode.

In another passage (Apion, i, 82, 83) Josephus gives a similar narrative from Charonion; but, as he justly shows, the contradictions of the story would still more disprove it. See Lysimaschus (ibid. 84) the Egyptian king's name is given as Bocchus, and so all trace of identity disappears. Josephus himself repeatedly affirms that Manetho's own work gave Tethmosis (or Thummoses, son of Aha-momoseuthia) the name of the Pharaoh of the Exode.

2. The circumstances of Rameses II, father of the Egyptian king under consideration, are supposed to favor his identification with the Pharaoh of the opposition. There is no coincidence with the facts. Thus he was a great builder of cities, especially (it is alleged) of Pt-Tum and Pi-Ramesse, which are held to be the Pithom and Raamesses of the Bible. But the last identifications are extremely doubtful, and the name Rameses appears as that of a district as early as Joseph's day (Gen. xlvii. 11). The identification of an oppressed or conquered people in his reign, named Aperu on the monuments, with the Hebrews, is equally doubtful, both in the reading and application; it is at all events certain that the people so named were foreign serfs, and that they were employed at a time considerably later than the Exodus (Brugsch, Hist. of Egypt, ii, 120). Opposed to this identification is the well-known character of the Rameses in question as a just and humane prince, who cannot have been guilty of the atrocious policy of lowering all the male children of a portion of his subjects.

3. The character and circumstances of Manethoph himself are not given with sufficient detail in the Egyptian chronicles or monuments to enable us to say with definiteness whether they agree or disagree with the Biblical account. There is nothing in the context which tally with the overthrow as at the Red Sea. If, as the history in Exodus implies, and as letter Scriptu- nesal notices expressly affirm (e. g. Psa. cxxxvi, 15), the Egyptian king was himself drowned there, it cannot have been Manethoph, who certainly reigned much longer than the brief interval between Moses' return to

EGYPT (Exod. iv. 19; comp. ii. 15) and the Exodus. Moreover, Menaphthah was one of a large family of sons born to Rameses during his long reign, and this militates decidedly against the adoption of Moses as heir through a daughter. Dr. Schaff adduces (Through Bible, ii. 407) a circumstance mentioned in the He- rodotean (ii. 113), that the successor of Sesostris (sup- posed to be Rameses II) was smitten with blindness for ten years as a punishment for hurling his spear into the Nile during an extraordinary outflow; but this looks to us very little like the catastrophe at the Red Sea; and besides, the historian calls the king in ques- tion Theron, and he names his successor Proteus, words which have no place in the dynamic lists.

4. Finally and conclusively, the chronology of the period will not allow this identification. The lowest date for the Exodus is the Rabbittical, B.C. 1812; Usher's is 1491; Hale's, 1614; our own, 1658; while the dates assigned to the end of Menaphthah's reign are as follows: Mariette, cir. B.C. 1288; Lepsius, 1273; Wilkinson, 1200; ours, 1175. The difference, in any case, is from a quarter of a century to four centuries and a half. It is the uncertainty and the remoteness of the dates in either line, because it is precisely here that both the Egyptian and the Biblical chronologies begin to be definite; and the tendency of modern criticism is to widen rather than contract the discrepancy at this point. In February he was placed in expressly remarks (Apion, i. 27) that, according to Manetho, "Moses lived many generations earlier" than the king in question, or, more definitely (ibid. 28), 515 years, or, according to his own detailed estimate (ibid. 15), exactly 527 years. Our calculation, 489 years, is nearly a mean between these. Josephus further states (Apion, ii. 2) that "Solomon built the temple 612 years after the Jews came out of Egypt" (he elsewhere makes it variously 592 and 632 years — in our own scheme it was 648 years) and he fortifies this date by a reference to the well-known statement of the Tyrian annals. He adds (ibid.) that the date of the Exodus, according to the above notice of Lyshmachus (i.e. as occurring under king Bocchoris) would make it "1700 years ago," or about B.C. 1550, which again is substantially our date. We conclude therefore that Josephus at least (from whom, be it noted, the whole basis of this proposed identification is derived) was clear and consistent as well as definitely grounded in his chronology, both in its Biblical and its Egyptian relations; and like him we must decidedly reject this synchronism. See MANETHO.

PHILIP the Magnanimous, landgrave of Hesse, born at Marburg, Nov. 28, 1504, was one of the most prominent characters in the history of the German Reformation. He was only five years old when his father died, and only fourteen when he was declared of age. He was present at the diet of Worms in 1521, but had, at that time, nothing to decide with the new doctrines of Luther. He was, however, one of those who insisted that the safe-conduct accorded to Luther should be kept sacred. He visited Luther in his lodgings, and on his return allowed mass to be celebrated in Ger- man at Castor, but reluctantly, in February he expressed expressly remarks (Apion, i. 27) that, according to Manetho, "Moses lived many generations earlier" than the king in question, or, more definitely (ibid. 28), 515 years, or, according to his own detailed estimate (ibid. 15), exactly 527 years. We conclude therefore that Josephus at least (from whom, be it noted, the whole basis of this proposed identification is derived) was clear and consistent as well as definitely grounded in his chronology, both in its Biblical and its Egyptian relations; and like him we must decidedly reject this synchronism. See MANETHO.

The present Kârabet Fasâil is laid down on the Ordnance Map at twelve and a half miles north of Latrun (Jericho), and is briefly described in the Memoirs accompanying it (ii. 392).

Phelps, Elia, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Belchertown, Mass., March 20, 1790. From 1811 to 1818 he was a member of Brown University, but graduated in 1814 from Union College. He was ordained at Brookfield, Oct. 28, 1816, as the colleague of E. Ephraim Ward, and continued to minister there until Oct. 1, 1820. In the same year he was principal of the Ladies' High-school at Pittsfield. In February, 1830, he was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Geneva, N. Y., and held that position until September, 1836. From 1836 he was secretary of the American Education Society in Philadelphia, and of the same in New York to 1844. For one year he was acting-pastor at Kingston, R. I., and served in the same relation at Putnam, Conn., from 1856 to 1858. His residence from 1871 to 1874 was at Andover, Mass., and from 1874 to 1890 at Weehawken, N. J. During 1913-25 he was a member of the Auburn Theological Seminary, N. Y., and for the last year of that term was president of the commissioners. He died at Weehawken, N. J., Dec. 29, 1920. Dr. Phelps published a volume of addresses, entitled The Ministry We Need, besides pamphlets, etc. See Cong. Year-Book. 1881, p. 31.

Philip the Magnanimous, landgrave of Hesse, born at Marburg, Nov. 28, 1504, was one of the most prominent characters in the history of the German Reformation. He was only five years old when his father died, and only fourteen when he was declared of age. He was present at the diet of Worms in 1521, but had, at that time, nothing to decide with the new doctrines of Luther. He was, however, one of those who insisted that the safe-conduct accorded to Luther should be kept sacred. He visited Luther in his lodgings, and on his return allowed mass to be celebrated in German at Castor, but reluctantly, in February he expressed expressly remarks (Apion, i. 27) that, according to Manetho, "Moses lived many generations earlier" than the king in question, or, more definitely (ibid. 28), 515 years, or, according to his own detailed estimate (ibid. 15), exactly 527 years. Our calculation, 489 years, is nearly a mean between these. Josephus further states (Apion, ii. 2) that "Solomon built the temple 612 years after the Jews came out of Egypt" (he elsewhere makes it variously 592 and 632 years — in our own scheme it was 648 years) and he fortifies this date by a reference to the well-known statement of the Tyrian annals. He adds (ibid.) that the date of the Exodus, according to the above notice of Lysmachus (i.e. as occurring under king Bocchoris) would make it "1700 years ago," or about B.C. 1550, which again is substantially our date. We conclude therefore that Josephus at least (from whom, be it noted, the whole basis of this proposed identification is derived) was clear and consistent as well as definitely grounded in his chronology, both in its Biblical and its Egyptian relations; and like him we must decidedly reject this synchronism. See MANETHO.
from it was, nevertheless, no small one. During the difficult times which followed after the peace of Crepsy (1544), the Protestant party had no acknowledged head; during the Smalkaldian war (1546-47), no acknowledged leader. After the war, the emperor treacherously seized the landgrave, and kept him in prison for five years. After his release, in 1552, Philip spent all his energies in ameliorating the condition of his country, which had suffered so much from war. But he still had a lively interest in religious matters, and acted the part of a mediator between Protestant and Roman Catholics; thus he was very active in promoting the conference of Naumburg in 1544 and that of Worms in 1557. Philip died March 81, 1567. See Rommel, Philipp der Grossmütige (Giessen, 1839, 3 vols.); Lenz, Briefe, und Lebens- und Lerntagebücher Philippis mit Boeck (vol. Philipp, Hermann, a medical missionary, was born of Jewish parentage at Brunwick in 1813. While a student of medicine he joined the Prussian army, which he left in 1832. He served in one year's campaigns. In 1834 he joined a brother of his who was in Java in the Dutch service. Philip embarked at Rotterdam for Batavia, but owing to some accident which happened after the vessel had left the harbor, he came to England. At London, through his employers, he became acquainted with a Presbyterian minister. When he spoke to him of Christ, he made him think of the Saviour. Philip, with the recommendation from this minister, went to Scotland. At Glasgow he became acquainted with Dr. Duncan, who encouraged him in his inquiries. On Dec. 9, 1838, the Kirk session of St. Luke's Church at Edinburgh admitted him a member of the Church of Christ. Philip now went through a regular course of theological studies, and commenced his missionary labors in 1841, along with the Rev. D. Edward, among the Jews in Moldavia. Being convinced of the great advantage to a missionary of a thorough knowledge of medicine, Philip, after nine years' missionary labor, returned to Edinburgh to complete his medical education. This done, in 1850 he was sent to Algiers, under the auspices of the Scottish Society for the Conversion of Israel, as medical missionary. From Algiers, in 1852, he was sent to Alexandria, in Egypt. In 1860 Philip, who, by this time, had the degree of D.D., in addition to that of M.D., was engaged by the British Society for the Propagation of the Gospel among the Jews, and was sent to labor at Jaffa, the seaport of Palestine, where he remained for six years. When he returned to Jaffa in 1865, and the population was panic-struck, and the civil and military authorities had fled, Dr. Philip was the only practitioner at Jaffa, and acted not only as physician, but also as governor and police. The Malaya Times of September, 1865, states that "the calls and appeals which Dr. Philip had were constant, innumerable, that, when passing through the streets, the crowds thronged upon him to kiss his hands and feet; and while Christians and Jews offered up masses and prayers for him, the Mohammedans forgot their profane, and the sound was heard in the mosques, 'There is but one God, and the doctor!'" In 1866 Dr. Philip, at his own request, was removed to another field, and sent to Leghorn, where he remained until 1870, when the door was opened to him to preach the gospel to the Jews in Rome. He died Feb. 8, 1882. (F. P.)

Philippi, Friedrich Adolph, a noted Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born of Jewish parentage at Berlin, Oct. 15, 1740. At the age of eighteen he entered the Berlin University to study philosophy. In 1762 he went to Leipzig for the study of philology, and in the same year joined the Lutheran Church. In 1760 he was promoted as doctor of philosophy, and acted for two years as teacher at Dres-

In 1837 he returned to Berlin, passed his examination, and in 1833 received the "facultas docendi." He was appointed professor of ancient languages at the Joachimsthal Gymnasium, a position which he resigned after one year. In 1836 he became doctor of theology, and afterwards held the chair of New Testament studies. Having passed his examination, he was in 1836 made a licentiate in theology, and commenced to lecture in 1837. In 1841 Philipi was called as professor of theology to Dorpat, in 1851 to Rostock, and died Aug. 29, 1862. He wrote, De Celis Adorati, Opera theologica, Philosophica, et philologica (Berlin, 1836); Der thätige Gehorsam Christi (1841); Commentar über den Brief Pauli an die Römer (Frankfort, 3d ed. 1866; Engl. transl. Edinburgh, 1876)—but his main work is Kirchliche Glaubenslehre (Üttersrode, 1845-83, 6 vols.), a learned and able vindication of systematic dogmatism. After Philipi's death there were published from his manuscripts, and edited by his son, Erklärung des Briefes Pauli an die Galater (Üttersrode, 1884); Symbolik. Akademische Vorlesungen (1885)—Predigten und Vorträge (cited). See Mecklenburgisches Kirchen- und Zeitschrift, 1882, No. 19-21; Plitt-Herzog, Real-Encyclop. s. v.; Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. ii. 989 sq. Philipp, Georg, a German professor of canon law, was born Jan. 6, 1804, at Königsberg, Prussia. He studied at Göttingen, and commenced his academic career at the University of Königsberg, which he joined the Benedictine Congregation. In 1833 he went to Munich, in 1849 to Innsbruck, in 1851 to Vienna, and died Sept. 6, 1872. His main works are, Das Kirchenrecht (Ratisbon, 1843-73, 7 vols.); Lehrbuch des Kirchenrechts (3d ed. 1871); Deutsche Rechts- und Reichsgeschichte (4th ed. 1893, 3 vols.); Vermischte Schriften (Vienna, 1856-60, 3 vols.). Phinehas, Hill and Tomb Of. According to Liut. Condor these have been identified. He says (Ten Word, i. 77): "The village of 'Avertah, called Abearb'ah in the Samaritan, stands in the Plain of Meidah, and is sacred to the Samaritans and to the Jews as containing the tomb of Phinehas. A little to the north of Meidah is the tomb of Ithamar. It is probably to be recognized as the Hill of Phinehas, where Eleazar was buried according to the Bible (Josh. xxiv. 25), and which is described as in Mount Epherim. In 1871 I visited the village and examined the two principal monuments. That of Eleazar, west of the houses, is a rude structure of masonry in a court open to the sky. It is eighteen feet long, planned over all, and shaded by a splendid terebinth. In one corner is an intact mosque with a Samaritan inscription bearing the date 1190 of the Moslem era. That of Phinehas is a spike of the same building, and the walls of its court have an arcade of round arches now supporting a trellis covered with a white wattle, under which is the mosque. Above the trellis there exists here as well as at the little mosque adjacent, the tomb of Ithamar and of Abinob, the supposed author of the famous roll, are shown by the Samaritans, close by." (See illustration on following page.)

Piderit, Johann Rudolph Anton, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Aug. 18, 1720, at Pymont. He studied at Jena and Marburg, and commenced his academic career at the latter place in 1746. In 1747 he returned to Jena, and was called to tutorship in theology, in 1768 professor of Oriental languages at "Collegium Carolinum" in Cassel, and died, after having experienced in a high degree the "odium theologici," Aug. 2, 1791. He published, De Voluntate, Decreti et Bonitate Dei (Jena, 1780) and Divi Inauguralis de Ap.
Traditionary Tomb of Pilatus.

Pleij, Louis François Désiré Eduard, a French prelate, was born at Pougouin (Eure-et-Loir) in 1815. For some time vicar-general of Chartres, he was appointed in 1849 bishop of Poitiers, and made himself conspicuous by his zeal in defending the temporal power of the pope. He opposed the imperial government in a series of pastoral letters and assembled, in January, 1858, a provincial council at Poitiers to discuss the religious interests of his diocese and of France. From the very beginning of the ecumenical council in 1870 he was one of the most ardent defenders of papal infallibility. Pie was made cardinal in 1873, and died at Angoulême in 1880. He published, Instruction Symodale sur les Erreurs de la Philosophie Moderne (1855); Instruction sur les Principales Erreurs des Temps Présents (1854); Discours Prononcé à l'Occasion du Service solennel pour les Soldats de l'Armée Pontificale (1880). Piedmontese Version of the Scriptures. As early as 1831 a translation of the New Testament, faithfully rendered from Martin's French version into modern Piedmontese, was forwarded to the British and Foreign Bible Society by lieutenant-colonel Beckwith. The translation was made by Mr. Berte, pastor of La Tour, and Mr. Gegnet de Lausanne. An edition was completed at press in 1834, but in 1840 the New Testament was put on the index of forbidden books at Rome. In 1857 the British and Foreign Bible Society issued the gospels in parallel columns with the French text, and in 1841 the Piedmontese version of the Psalms, executed from Diodati's Italian version, was published. This edition had also, in parallel columns, the Italian text. Of late, however, things have changed for the better, and the British and Foreign Bible Society now freely circulates the Piedmontese New Testament, the Psalms with the Italian text, and the gospels with the French, in parallel columns. See Bible of Every Land, p. 286. (B. F.)

Pierce, George Foster, D.D., a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, son of Dr. Lovick Pierce, was born in Greene County, Ga., Feb. 8, 1811. He graduated from Franklin College, Athens, began to study law, but was soon after converted, and in 1831 was received into the Georgia Conference, in which he filled important appointments until his election as presiding elder in 1840. He was a member of the memorable General Conference of 1844. Having returned to the pastoral work, he was called in 1848 to the presidency of Emory College, and in 1854 to the episcopacy, an office which he filled with eminent ability until his death, Sept. 8, 1894. He was a laborious, patient, eloquent preacher, and a most upright Christian. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1885, p. 152; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Pierce, Lovick, D.D., a distinguished minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Halifax County, N. C., March 24, 1786. In early childhood he removed with his parents to South Carolina; in 1803 was converted; in 1804 began to preach; and Jan. 1, 1805, entered the South Carolina Conference. In it he served Pedee Circuit; Apalachee Circuit, Ga.; in 1807 Augusta Station; in 1809 was made presiding elder; in 1812, while stationed at Milledgeville, he was drafted to serve as a soldier, was soon commissioned as chaplain, in which capacity he acted during the war: about that time he studied medicine, and, retiring from the conference, followed its practice for about six years. In 1822 he re-entered the effective ranks, and was stationed at Augusta. From the time he filled the chief appointments. He was a member of the first General Conference, which met in 1812, and was always elected to represent his conference in the General Conferences. He read much and wrote a great deal; was always ready, clear, cogent, coherent, and powerful. He died at the residence of his son, bishop Pierce, in Sparta, Ga., Nov. 11, 1879. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1879, p. 88; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Pierius, Ulrich (originally Birnbaum), a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Schwedt, Pomernais, in 1544. He studied law and theology, was for some time doctor and professor of theology at Frankfort, afterwards pastor at Brandenburg, and superintendent at Cistrin. In 1589 he was appointed superintendent at Dresden, and in the same year professor of theology and general superintendent at Wittenberg. In 1591 he was dismissed as a Crypto-Calvinist, and imprisoned, but was finally released at the intercession of queen Elizabeth of England. Pierius then went to Bremen, and died May 12, 1616, superintendent. He wrote, Typus Doctrinae Orthodoci de Persona et Officio Christi—Examen und Erläuterung der in der Lehre predestini, Nic. Cred's 'Begräbnis neuen Religions-Streitigkeiten.—Apologetia und Verantwortung des über Nicol. Cred nach gehaltener Leichenspradig angestellten Examini. See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 1759; Jöcher, Augegenwied gedruckten Lektionen, s. v. (B. F.)

Pierre, Jean Henri Grand, D.D., a minister of the National Reformed Church of France, was born at Neufchâtel, Switzerland, towards the close of the 18th century. He was educated at Neufchâtel and at the University of Tübingen, Germany; was called to be an assistant pastor with Vinet at Basle, in 1822, where his pietistic zeal and eloquence were the means of an extensive revival of religion. In 1827 he went to Paris to take charge of the House of Missions, virtually a theological seminary, in which Dr. Pierre also acted as professor of theology and languages, being a fine classical and Hebrew scholar, as well as an able theologian, ready writer, and eloquent preacher. He was eventually called to L'Oratoire, the great Protestant Church of Paris, where he remained for twenty years. While Venet was compared to Pascal, and Adolph Monod to Saurin, Dr. Grand Pierre was called the Bourdaloue of Switzerland. He visited America in 1870 in order to attend the Evangelical Alliance. He died near Baal, Switzerland, July 10, 1874. Dr. Pierre published a considerable number of works, commentaries, sermons, etc., which had a wide circulation. His last production was a volume of sermons dedicated to his former parishioners. For many years he was editor of L'Espérance, the principal religious paper of the orthodox Protestants of France. See (N. Y.) Presbyterian, Aug. 8, 1874. (W. P. S.)

Pietista, Catholic, a name which was applied to the brethren and sisters of the pius and Christian schools founded by Nicholas Barre in 1678. They devoted themselves to the education of poor children of both sexes.

Pikullos (Pikullos, or Potollos) was the destroying principle, the third person of the triune among the Lithuanians, or ancient heathen Prussians, being the opposite of Potrimos, the preserving principle. An instrument at Romowe stood in the walk of the sacred oak-tree. He was represented as an old bearded man with pale face, the head bound by a white cloth. Three skulls, one of a man, another of a horse, and the third of a bull, were his symbols. Human beings, castles, horses, and goats, were sacrificed to him, and their blood was poured out in the center of the great oak-tree to cause its constant growth. Potrimos was loved, Pikullos feared. He found joy in men's misery. He was not worshipped among other nations, but was compared with Pluto, and with the moon, Loke, Hel, and Odin of the Scandinavians.

Pilet, Jean Alexandre Samuel, a Reformed theologian, was born at Yverdon, Switzerland, Sept. 19, 1797. He studied at Lausanne, and was ordained in 1821. In the same year he was called to Morges as director of the college, and in 1826 succeeded Louis Henri Manuel as pastor of the French Reformed Church at Frankfort-on-the-Main. In 1834 he returned to Switzerland, and was in 1836 appointed professor of Biblical literature at Genoa. He died April 5, 1865. Pilet was one of the Old-Test. translators of the French Bible, called the Version de Lausanne. See Chrétiens Écossais (1849); A. E. Montet, Diction. Biog. et Lit. Genève et des Vaudois qui se sont Distingués, etc. (Lausanne, 1878); Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Pilgrims, Poor, an order of Roman Catholic devotees, which originated about the year 1500. They commenced in Italy, but passed into Germany, where they wandered about as mendicants, barefooted and bareheaded.

Pilmore, John, a Scotch prelate, was consecrated bishop of Moray, April 8, 1225, and continued bishop there for thirty-seven years. He died in the castle of Spynie in 1362. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 140, 187.

Pin (cous) in ecclesiastical use. Pins made of precious metal, and, in later mediæval times, enriched with jewels, were used for attaching the archiepiscopall (or papal) pallium to the planeta or casula (chasuble). The earliest mention of these is, probably, the description given by John of laumoniers of the pallium of Gregory the Great. Their first use, therefore, must probably date between the close of the 6th and the beginning of the 9th century. Innocent assigns to these pins a certain mystical significance.

Pinkney, Miles. See Care, Thomas (1).

Pinkerton, Robert, D.D., a Scotch Congregational minister, was born in 1790. He left Scotland in 1805 as missionary among the tribes of the Caucassia, under the patronage of the Edinburgh Missionary Society. In 1809 he took up his residence at Moscow, and, in company with Dr. Paterson and Henderson, undertook the visitation of the Russian empire with the view of setting the Bible into universal circulation. When those labors were suspended by imperial authority, Dr. Pinkerton travelled over the entire continent of Europe for the purpose of organizing societies for the dissemination of the Bible, both in Protestant and Catholic countries. He died April 7, 1855. See (Lond.) Comp. Year-Book, 1856, p. 203. (10. P. S.)

Pinkham, John, a veteran Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Dorrer, N. H., Jan. 25, 1806. When he was two years of age his parents moved to Casco, Me., where he was converted at the age of sixteen, and at eighteen became a public exhorter. In 1830 he was ordained pastor of the Church at Sandwich, N. H., where he remained for seven years, and then removed to Gilford, where, for eight years, his labors were greatly blessed. His next settlement, of five years, was at Alton. He was, for the next two years, a resident of Dorset, and spent most of the time in assisting pastors in revival work. He then returned to Casco, was occupied as an evangelist. He died there, Jan. 8, 1882. See Morning Star, March 1, 1882. (J. C. S.)

Pinkney, William, D.D., LL.D., a Protestant Episcopal bishop, was born at Annapolis, Md., April 17, 1810. After graduating from St. John's College, in his native state, he became a rector in St. Sebastian's Church in 1836, at Bladensburg in 1838, and at Washington in 1855; was consecrated assistant bishop of Maryland Oct. 6, 1870, and became sole bishop Oct. 17, 1875. He died July 4, 1888. Bishop Pinkney was decidedly evangelical.

Pinkney, John Brooke, LL.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Baltimore, Md., Dec. 25, 1806. He graduated from the University of Georgia in 1828, having studied law while in college; graduated from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1837; was ordained by the Presbytery of Philadelphia the same year, and soon after went to Africa in the service of the American Colonization Society as agent for the colony of Liberia. He returned in 1847, and was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Washington, Pa., where he remained until his appointment as secretary of the New York State Colonization Society, a position which he occupied from 1848 to 1865, and again several years later. He made two visits to Africa to promote the interest of the colony of Liberia. His entire life was devoted to the welfare of the African race, and he engaged in his mission in the most discreditable seal and in the most uncomplacent manner. He was led on himself out long before his end came, but, though infirm, he labored to the last. He died at his plantation, near Ocilla, Fla., Dec. 25, 1882, and was buried under the shade of the oaks near his house, six black men acting as pall-bearers. See Neef's, Report of Proceedings, 1882, p. 80. (W. V.)

Piquet, François, an eminent Roman Catholic missionary, was born at Bourg-en-Bresse, France, Dec. 6, 1708. Having been educated at the seminary of St. Sulpice, Paris, he was admitted to that order, and in 1738 was sent to Montreal, of which the Sulpicians were the founders and pastors. In 1740 he was placed in Pirahmet. The modern Ferata is laid down on the Ordnance Map at five and a half miles south-west of Nabula, and described in the accompanying Memoirs (ii, 162) as a "small village of ancient appearance, standing on a tell or mound, with a rock-cut tomb to the south; the remains of a cistern and a few cisterns and the remains of a sarcophagus" (ibid., p. 265). Instead of this identification Lieut. Conder, with less probability, suggests Ferón, lying ten miles west of Sebastiach, and described (ibid. p. 164) as a "small village on a slope, at the edge of the plain, with a few trees and a well to the east. The inhabitants are all Greek Christians."
1866 he was professor at the gymnasium in Ulm, in 1869 at the seminary in Blaubeuren, in 1873 jurisconsult of the seminary at Maulbronn, and died June 7, 1880. He published, Gesetze und Ziel der neueren Kulturwissenschaft (Stuttgart, 1870); — Seide und Geset (1871); — Geschichte des Choreografen (Leipzig); Grundzüge der Logik (1873); — Anthropologie und Psychologie (1874); — Logische Causalgesetze und natürlich Zureckhaltung (1877); — Ziel und Erkenntnungsgegent der alten Philosophie (1877); — Testament eines Deutschen (edited after the author's death by K. Platt, James McClure, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Athens, Pa., Dec. 31, 1856. He graduated from the University of the City of New York in 1874, and from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1858; became pastor at Lawsville, O., the same year; at Leckdale, Pa., in 1867; and at Bath, N.Y., in 1869, where he died, April 14, 1884. See NecroL Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1885, p. 47.

Plesken, Meinhard, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Bremen, June 8, 1866. He studied at Wittenberg. In 1872 he was called as sub-rector to the university school of his birthplace, and in 1873 as pastor to Stade, in 1873 he was member of consistory, in 1743 general superintendent, and in 1748 doctor of theology. Plesken died May 30, 1753, leaving. Plitt, Gustav Leopold, a noted Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born March 27, 1836, at Genin, near Liebeck. He studied at Erlangen and Berlin, and commenced his theological career at the former place in 1862. In 1868 he was made professor, and in 1872 doctor of theology. He died Sept. 10, 1880. Plitt, who is best known as the associate editor of the second edition of Herzog's Real-Encyklopädie für Protestantische Theologie und Kirche, published the following works: De Autoritate Apostolicae Sedis sacerdotum (1853); — Augustiniana (1855); — De libris Herderin (1860); — Melanchthonis Locis Communes in ihrer Urgestalt (1864); — Einleitung in die Augustana (1867-68, 2 vols.); — Aus Schelling's Leben in Briefen (1869-70, 3 vols.); — Die Abschafftheit oder die Evangelische Gemeinschaft (1871); — Die Apologie der Augustana (1873); — Grundzüge der Symbolik für Vorlesungen (1875); — Jodokus Trussefater von Eisenach, der Lehrer Luther's (1876); — Gabriel Bihl als Prediger (1879); — Dr. Martin Luther's Leben und Wirken (edited after the author's death by F. Plitt, 1883). See Plitt, Herzens, Real-Encykelop. a. s. (B. P.)

Plitt, Johann Jacob, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Feb. 27, 1772, at Wetter, Hesse. He studied at Halle, was in 1749 preacher at Cassel, in 1755 professor at Rinteln, in 1762 preacher at Frankfort-on-the-Main, and died April 4, 1775, doctor of theology at the University of Göttingen, De Gloria Dei in Compositione Logia Sineatica (Gottingen, 1755); — De Nieuwe Homilieën der Inventaris de Justitiae eorum van Oecumenica (1756); — De Vero Conceptu Convenabilis de Filio Spiritu Sancto (1759); — Testamentina Quorundam Eclesiae Patrum pro Redemptio Infantium (1756); — De Paternitate Caiini (1756); — Theologische Untersuchungen (1764-71, 8 vols.); besides he published a number of sermons and other ascetical works. Plumb, Elliah Whiton, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Halifax, Va., July 28, 1786. He attended Hopkins Academy at Hadley, Mass.; spent one year in Harvard College; graduated from Middlebury College in 1824; taught school the next two years in Brattleboro, Vt. From 1826 to 1828 he was employed in Hampton, N.H.; studied theology with David Dana, D.D., of Newbury-port; was ordained pastor, May 18, 1831, at Pawlet, Vt., and dismissed Oct. 9, 1845; from 1846 to 1851 was pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Potomac, N. Y.; in 1853 became principal of St. Lawrence Academy; and from 1864 to 1867 was acting pastor in Sterling, Ill. The two succeeding years he resided at Potomac without charge, and then removed to East Bloomfield, which was his residence until his death. July 12, 1879. See Cong. Year-book, 1879, p. 26.

Plummer, William Swan, D.D., LL.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Greensburg (now Darlington), Beaver Co., Pa., July 26, 1802. He graduated from Washington College, Va., in 1825, and from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1827; having been licensed to preach in 1826, he soon after organized a Presbyterian Church at Danville, subsequently another at Warrenton, N. C., and preached also at Raleigh, Washington, and Newbern, in the same state. In 1834 he became a pastor in Richmond, Va., and in 1837 founded the Watchman of the South, a weekly religious journal, which he edited for eight years. The same year he resided as pastor to Baltimore, Md. In 1834 he became professor of didactic and pastoral theology in the Western Theological Seminary at Allegheny City, Pa.; in 1866 was called to the chair of theology in the Theological Seminary at Columbus, S. C., where he remained until it was closed in 1880. He died at the Union Protestant Home, Darlington, Md. In 1884 Dr. Plumer was the author of many excellent works, among which are, Argument Against the Indiscriminate Incorporation of Churches and Religious Societies (1847, 8vo); — The Bible True, and Infidelity Wicked (New York, 1849); — Plain Thoughts for Children (Philadelphia, 1854); — The Children of Love (Philadelphia, 1856); — Thoughts Worth Remembering (New York, 1859); — The Saint and the Sinner (Philadelphia, 1860); — The Grace of Christ (1858, 12mo); — Rome Against the Bible and the Bible Against Rome (1846, 12mo).

Plunket, Thomas Lord, D.D., a bishop of the Church of Ireland, was born in 1799, being the eldest son of William Conyngham Plunket, the Irish chanceller, distinguished as a lawyer, an orator, and a statesman, and whom he succeeded as second baron in 1834.
Dr. Plunket was appointed dean of Down in 1831, and promoted to the bishopric of Tuam in 1839. He became ecclesiastical commissioner in 1851, and died at Tournamready, County Mayo, Oct. 19, 1869, being, at the time patron of ninety-five livings in his united diocese. He was an energetic and indefatigable laborer in the missionary department of his work, especially in Connouagh. See Amer. Quar. Church

Piquet, François André Adrien, an ecclesiastical writer of France, was born at Bayeux in 1716. He was professor of philosophy at the College de France, canon of Cambrai, and died at Paris in 1790. He published, Examen du Fatalisme (Paris, 1757, 2 vols.)— Dictionnaire des Hirondelles, des Erreurs et des Schismes (1762, 2 vols.)—Essai Philosophique et Politique sur le

Fogatschar, Johannes, prince bishop of Laybach, was born at Brezov, Jan. 22, 1811. From 1838 to 1852
he occupied the theological chair at the Laybach Theo-ological Seminary, was made prince bishop in 1875, and died at Brezov, May 15, 1886. For many years he edited the Laybach Church Gazette, and in the political affairs he sided with the Austrian government in the new
of the school-laws. (B. F.)

Pohiman, Henry Newman, D.D., a Lutheran minister, was born at Albany, N. Y., March 8, 1800.
In August, 1820, he graduated from Hartwick Seminary
—the first student in the first Lutheran theological seminary in the United States. In March following he received license to preach in Rhinebeck, and in May was ordained in New York city. After serving a few months in two small churches at Saddle River and Ramapo, N. J., he took charge of the Lutheran churches in Hunterdon County, which at that time numbered three, many miles apart. For twenty-one years he continued in this work, until each of these congregations was able to support its own pastor. The great event of his ministerial life was a remarkable revival of religion in New Germanstown during the winter of 1839-40. In 1843 he became pastor of the Evangelical Lutheran Ebeneser Church in Albany, N. Y., and remained in this pastorate about three years. Of the General Synod he was three times elected president, and was a delegate from 1838 to every meeting of that body where the admission of Missions was considered by the General Synod had just been formed, and the New York Ministerium, a party to the original convention, had already withdrawn. This led to the creation of two parties in the ministerium, resulting in 1830 in the formation of the Hartwick Synod. Dr. Pohiman, with a few other friends of the General Synod, decided to remain with the ministerium; and in 1836 the ministerium renewed its connection with the General Synod.
He took an active part in the work of organizing churches. On Sept. 5, 1867, after the New York Ministerium had decided to withdraw from the General Synod, a new synod was organized, and Dr. Pohiman was elected its first president, and held this position until his death in Albany, Jan. 20, 1874. For many years he was a trustee of the State Idiot Asylum at Syracuse.
During thirty years he was the principal classi-

Poland, Ancient Mythology of the. The Poles, a Slavic people, had a religious system agreeing with that of some other Slavonic mythologies, and it is an error
to call them fire-worshippers, or to say they worshipped Romain gods, as some affirm. Gneisen, the capital of Poland, the seat of prince Primas, contained a row of great temples, of which now only a few traces may be found. There stood the temple of Nia, the god of the soul; of Perun, the god of thunder, etc. There the principal gods of Slavonic heathendom were worshipped with bloody sacrifices. This warlike nation had many gods of war, but some superintended also domestic concern.

vision of the New Test, from the Greek, undertaken for the British and Foreign Bible Society in 1828, by Meurs. Manitius, Diehl, Popioleek, and Fecht, of War-thousand copies was published at Vienna under the Polychronius, bishop of Apamea, and brother of Theodore of Mopsuestia, was one of the most prominent exlegates of the school of Antioch in the 4th century. Of his life nothing further is known. He wrote commentaries on Job, Daniel, and Ezekiel. Of his commentary on Daniel we have a great many fragments. He explains the book according to Antiochus Epiphanes, and not to the anti-Christ; in the fourth monarchical he sees the Macedonian empire, and in the ten heads the diadochai.

He everywhere contends for the historical sense and opposes the allegorical interpretation, as well as the theory of the twofold sense. Though he was never formally condemned, yet he was nevertheless considered a heretic. See Platt-Herzog, Real-Encyklop. a. v., but more especially Bandenuheren, Polychronius (Freiburg, 1879), and Möller’s review, in Schüter, Theol. Litera-turszeitung, 1879, cols. 255 sq. (B. P.)

Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus, A.D. 196, is known in Church history by his opposition to the Roman bishops. He was troubled by the famous Heresy (q. v.).
Eusebius has preserved Polycrates’ letter of protest, which is given in English by Schaff, History of the Christian Church (N. Y. 1888), ii. 216 sq. See also Eus-bio, Hist. Eccles, v. 24 (ed. Heinichen, i. 250 sq.);

in 1542, and died at Augsburg, Nov. 25, 1595, professor.
He edited Cyrilis Alex. Comment. in Du-

Poole, George Atlihers, an English theologian, who was born in 1809. He was a scholar of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, and took his degree in 1831. After holding several curacies and a benefice at Leeds, he settled permanently in Northamptonshire, first as vicar of Welford, from 1843 to 1876, and then as rector of Winwick, from 1876 to 1883. Poole, who died Sept. 6 of the latter year, ranked as one of the leading English authorisities on ecclesiastical architecture. He published a variety of sermons and theological works, including an account of the Life and Times of St. Cyprian (1840).
His chief works, however, related to ecclesiology. In 1843 appeared Appropriate Character of Church Architecture:—Churches, their Structure (1845);—History of Ecclesiastical Architecture in England (1848); in conjunction with Mr. J. W. Hugall, he issued an account of the Churches of Stowborough, Flety, and Neighbors-brook, and was the last York Cathedral. Poole’s last work was History of the Diocese of Peterborough, for the series of Diocesan Histories, in the course of publication by the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. (B. P.)

Popo Version of the Scriptures. The Popo or Dahomey is spoken at Dahomey, between the Volta and Lagos. A translation of Matthew and Mark was made by the Rev. T. J. Marshall, a native missionary, and printed by the British and Foreign Bible Society at London in 1884. Other parts of the New Test.
are now being translated. (B. P.)

Porter, Herschel B., D.D., a Cambridger Præ-byterian minister, was born in Butler County, Ky., Feb.
15, 1816. After studying at various academies, he was licensed to preach in May, 1835, and in September, 1837, was ordained at Glasgow, Ky. He spent about four years as an itinerant in Kentucky, travelled also for some time
as an agent for Cumberland College; then served a year as pastor at Fayetteville, Tenn.; subsequently made an extension preaching tour, passing through many States, returning to Kentucky in 1848. He spent several months of that year in Western Pennsylvania, then went to Philadelphia to organize a congregation, and remained there until the spring of 1851.
In the fall of that year he settled in Memphis, Tenn.
and labored there until the latter part of 1855. He died there Oct. 5 of the same year, professor of natural history in the Memphis Medical College. In 1858 he was moderator of the General Assembly. Dr. Porter was devoted to science, and was proficient in astrology and geology. He published a series of Astronomical Sermons, 400 pp.:—The Atonement:—and a work on the Foreknowledge and Decrees of God. See Beard, Biographical Sketches, 1st series, p. 867.

Porter, Noah, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born Dec. 15, 1781, at Farmington, Conn. After his graduation he taught for some time, and then studied theology, and was ordained over the Congregational Church in his native town, Nov. 5, 1808, where he had a long and successful ministry. From 1828 to 1862 he was a member of the corporation of Yale College, and was long a member of the prudential committee. He died at Pasadena, Mass., Aug. 24, 1866. A number of his occasional discourses were published, and among them A Half-Century Discourse, preached Nov. 12, 1856. See Obituary Record of Yale College, 1887.

Portuguese Version of the Scriptures. By way of supplement, we add the following: The first New Testament was printed at Lisbon in 1581; a second or revised edition was published at Batavia in 1598, and another again at Amsterdam in 1712.
In 1744 were published at Tranquebar the books of J-b, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Canticles, and in 1751 followed the four greater prophets, the first three of which were translated by Almeida, and the fourth (Daniel), by C. F. Walther, missionary at Tranquebar.
Another edition of the entire Old Testament was published at Batavia in 1748. In this edition it was given of the books left untranslated by Almeida, by Jacob op den Ar, who had joined the Dutch missionaries at Batavia.
Between 1721 and 1757 two revised editions of the Pentateuch and of the Psalms, two revised editions of the New Testament, and one of the four gospels, were printed at Tranquebar and Batavia. Another edition of the Old Testament was printed at the latter place in 1782, and 1804, and no further editions appear to have been given of this version until it was republished by the British and Foreign Bible Society.

A Catholic Portuguese version of the entire Scriptures, from the Vulgate, was published in twenty-three volumes, with commentaries, at Lisbon, from 1618 to 1728, by Don Antonio Pereira de Figueiredo, a Portuguese ecclesiastic. An edition containing his latest corrections was commenced at Lisbon in 1794, but was not completed till 1815. On account of the numerous corrections, this edition may be regarded as a new version.

A translation of the Scriptures was accomplished by the Rev. Thomas Boys, at the expense of the Trinitarian Bible Society. This version, based on Almeida’s translation, but faithfully made in accordance with the original, was published in London; the New Testament in 1845 and the Old in 1847.

When the British and Foreign Bible Society undertook the publication of the Portuguese Scriptures, the version of Almeida, the only Protestant one, was selected. But this publication was not received as was anticipated, perhaps, because Almeida was a converted

Protestant, but mostly because it was an antiquated version, many of the words being obsolete, and the style not idiomatic. The complaints against this version were laid before the society, and in 1818 an edition of Pereira's version of the New Testament was printed, which was followed by another edition of both the entire Bible and the Apocrypha by the Rev. Mr. Carew, about the same time. Another edition of Pereira's New Testament was printed in 1823, and a revised edition of the whole Bible was given in 1824, under the care of Messrs. da Costa and Green. In 1857 the American Bible Society published a Portuguese New Testament, the version used being a translation by Dr. J. R. de Sousa, from the English. Of late years the British and Foreign Bible Society has undertaken a revision of Almeida's Bible translation, the version and idiom being modernized. This edition was printed in Lisbon in 1874, the text being accompanied with occasional alternative renderings, and with the most important references from the Old to the New Testament. The orthography and style have been modernized, and the translation has been compared with the original throughout by the society's editorial superintendant, who has been assisted by competent natives in completing the edition. The same society published, in 1878, an edition of the Portuguese Bible of Figueiredo, with alternative renderings from the Hebrew and Greek, under the care of the Rev. Robert Stewart and the editorial superintendant. From the report of the British and Foreign Bible Society for 1885, we learn that steps have been taken, in consultation with the American Bible Society, for the formation of translation committees in Spain and Brazil for the production of a new version of the Scriptures, which will be acceptable on both sides of the Atlantic.

Porkasak, Gustav, a Protestant theologian, was born at Riga on March 13, 1812. He received his classical and theological training at the lyceum of his native place, which at that time was one of the most prominent Protestant schools of Austria-Hungary. To continue his studies he went in 1838, to Vienna, and two years later to Berlin. In 1847 he was called as pastor of the Free Greek Congregational Church at Tyrmnus, and in 1840 he accepted a call to Vienna. In this important position he developed all his faculties for the benefit of the Church, school, and mission, and his efforts were acknowledged by the Vienna faculty, which honored him in 1871 with the doctorate of theology. He died July 17, 1876. He published, Evangelische Kanzelvorlesung (Vienna, 1833): Festredenken über das Leiden und Sterben Jesu Christi (1854); Jacobus, der Zeuge vom lebendigen Glauben (1861); Die Rechte der Protestanten in Österreich (1867). See Zuchold, Biograph. Theol. ii. 1003; Rokok, Zur Erinnerung an Dr. Gustav Porkasak (Vienna, 1876). (B. P.)

Porseinus, Pierre, a French Jesuit, was born at Narbonne in 1590. He was an excellent Hebrew and Greek scholar, and died at Rome towards the end of the 17th century. He published, Theologiae Aristotelis, etc. (Paris, 1694); Collationis Index, Index, etc. (Rome, 1657); Niti Opera (1693); Niti Epistola (1657). See Winer, Handbuch der theolog. Potimpos, in Littish mythology, was a chief deity of the Lithuanian and ancient Prussians before the occupancy of the country by the Germans, being the second person in the Northern trinity, which consisted of Perkunos, Potimpos, and Pilkolos. He was the god of victory in war, and in peace the giver of fruitfulness, of blessing, and of domestic felicity. His image stood at Romowe. It represented a friendly, laughing youth. As Perkunos was a god of the warming and destructive fire, so Potimpos was a god of the fructifying and destructive water. Ears of corn and wheat were offered to him, and his head was decorated with field products. Many children were also burned as sacrifices to him. In a large brass urn a snake was kept and fed in honor of him; therefore the snake was always a sacred animal among the Prussians. It seems possible that Potimpos was a female deity, and the wife of Donner— at least, some modern writers affirm this. Perhaps the mother of the gods, whom Tacitus mentions as worshipped among the Cathayans.

Potter, Louis Joseph Antoine de, a Belgian writer, was born at Bruges in 1786, and died at Brussels in 1859. He published, Considerations sur l'Histoire des Principaux Conciles, etc. (Brussels, 1816; Paris, 1818, 2 vols.): Esprit de l'Église, etc. (Paris, 1821, 6 vols.). These works were reprinted in 1836, with the title Histoire Philosophique, Politique et Critique du Christianisme et des Églises Christiennes (ibid. 1836-37, 8 vols.), and an abridged edition, entitled Résumé de l'Histoire du Christianisme (1866, 2 vols.): Vie de Scipion Ricci, Évêque de Pietro (Brussels, 1825, 3 vols.; Paris, 1896, 4 vols.): Lettres de Pie V. sur les Affaires Religieuses de Son Temps en France (1827): Cultichius Rationem (ed.; reprinted by baron de Pounat in 1862). But all of Potter's works, written in the philosophical spirit of the 18th century, were placed on the "Index" at Rome. Potton, Richard de, a Scotch prelate, was made bishop of Abereogan about 1256, and died in 1267. See Keit, Scottish Bishops, p. 108.

Pouchen, Levin, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Königsberg, Oct. 26, 1594. He studied at the theological university of that city, was in 1623 professor, in 1625 second court-preacher, in 1626 professor of Hebrew, in 1640 doctor of theology, and in 1645 attended the colloquy at Thorn, and died May 4, 1648. He was the author of Prognos. in Prophecia, Explicatio Historioe Passionis Christi; Deputat. de Usu Philosophiae in Theologia: De Protovangelio Paradisiaco: De Resurrectione Jesu Christi: De Pia et Vera Philosophandi Ratio: De Ecclesia: De Sapiencia: De Resurrectione Mortuorum: De D Proceedius in Christo et Naturae, etc. See Arnold, Historie der köögischen Universiteit; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. Poullain, Nicolas, a Reformed theologian, was born at Messini, near Lunay, Seine-Inférieure, Jan. 13, 1807. He was pastor of Nanteuil-lès-Meaux in 1823, in 1833 at Havre, in 1857 at Lausanne, and in 1862 at Lausanne. Poullain died at Gêvres, April 3, 1868. He published, Qu'est-ce qu'un Christianisme sans Dogmes et sans Miracles? (1865)—Réponse a Trois Lettres de M. Albert Rivière (1864)—L'Œuvre des Missions Évangéliques (1867), an apologetic work of great value. See Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Præbenda, Robert de, a Scotch prelate, was elected bishop of Dunblane in 1258. In 1268 he, with one other, was sent to protest against the contributions imposed upon the Scotch clergy by Ottobon. He was still bishop here in 1282. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 178.

Prætorii, a name common to several Lutheran theologians of Germany, of whom we mention the following:

1. Andreas, who died Dec. 20, 1586, at Frankfurt-on-the-Oder, doctor of theology, is the author of Proposiciones de Jesu Christo, Del et Maria Filio. See Jocher, Sagissemnes Ῥωμαϊκου Ἐχθρον, v. v.; Jocher, Algemeines Gelehrt Lexikon, s. v.
2. Christian Gottliebes, born Aug. 30, 1583, at Beratzdorf, Upper Lusatia, studied at Wittenberg, and died in 1738 at Barnstadt, in his native province. He wrote Amenable Vncth, comprising only the Pentateuch (1724–29, 9 parts). See Döring, Die gelehrten Deutschnordland, s. v.; Jocher, Algemeines Gelehrten Lexikon, s. v.

3. Ephraim, was born at Dantzig, March 11, 1657. He studied at Wittenberg, was in 1685 preacher at Münsterberg, in 1698 at his native city, in 1705 at Thorn, and died Feb. 14, 1728. He wrote Exercitacions theolog. de Jona — Athen Prograe Gekiel, Eptatropia ex Eccl. iii. 18–21:—Bibliotheca Homiletica (Leipsic, 1691–96, 3 parts; 2d ed. 1711–19). Præceolus, Garemius, a Roman Catholic theologian of France, was born at Marcoussis in 1511, and died at Pérone, April 19, 1568, doctor of theology. His main works are, De Vivia, Sectio et Dogmatibus Omnium Haereticorum (Cologne, 1569);—Historia de l’Etat et Succès de l’Eglise (Paris, 1585). See Winer, Handbuch der theolog. Lit. i, 637; Lichtenberger, Encyclopaedia des Sciences Religieuses, v. (B. F.)

Pratje, Johann Hinrich, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Sept. 17, 1710. He studied at Helmstädt, was in 1735 preacher at Homburg, his native place, in 1743 at Stade, and in 1749 general superintendent of Bremen and Verden. In 1787 his alma mater honored him with the doctorate of theology. He died Feb. 1, 1791. His writings, comprising almost all departments of theology, are given in Döring, Die gelehrten Kunzlereder, p. 299–305; Winer, Handbuch der theolog. Lit. i, 119, 799; ii, 282, 290. (B. F.)

Pratt, James, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was rector in Portland, Me, for several years prior to 1854; then of the Church of the Covenant, in Philadelphia, Pa., where he remained until 1860, when he took charge of Trinity Church, Chicago, Ill. About 1864 he left that parish, and in 1866 was residing in New York city; in 1868 he removed to Philadelphia as the financial secretary of the Evangelical Knowledge Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church. During several years he resided in Philadelphia without assuming the duties of the regular pastorate, until 1873, when he became rector of St. Philip's, in that city. He died Jan. 17, 1874, aged sixty-five years. See Sprague, Episcopal Ann. 1875, p. 169.

Pratt, John A., D.D., a Bishop and educator, was born in Windham County, Conn., Oct. 12, 1800. After spending a few years in Columbian College, he graduated from Brown University in 1827. For a short time he was a professor in Transylvania University, Ky., and then accepted a call to the pastorate of the First Baptist Church in New Haven, Conn., in 1831, for six months, he had charge of the South Meeting, Mass. (now Wakefield), Academy, and then was invited to preside over the Granville, O., Literary and Theological Institution. In 1837 he resigned, and accepted the professorship of ancient languages in that institution, and held this position, with occasional interruptions, for twenty-two years (1837–59), when he retired to private life. He died Jan. 4, 1882. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclopedia, p. 358. (J. C. S.)

Pratt, Nathaniel Alpheus, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Centre Brook, Conn., Jan. 29, 1796. He graduated from Yale College in 1818, and from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1823, and was ordained Feb. 25, 1824. From this time till 1836 he labored for the Shrewsbury Church, N. J. From 1837 to 1840 he was pastor of the Church at Darien, Ga. He organized a Church in Roswell, in 1842, where he continued until his death, Aug. 30, 1873. During the time at Roswell he taught, for five years, a boarding-school for boys. See Necrology of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1880, p. 11.

Presbyterianism. A popular designation of a class of theologians who understand "the first resurrection," spoken of in the above sense, as predicting a separate and literal re-creation of the saints previous to the millennium, and their personal reign with Christ on earth during that period, in opposition to the usual or post-millennial view, which explains it in a figurative and spiritual sense. Among the advocates of the premillennial scheme have been counted, with as much or less reserve, such eminent names as those of Mede, Jurieu, Dabwitz, Sir Isaac Newton, archbishop Newcome, bishops Newton, Horsey, and Heber, doctors Gill, Toplady, Bengel, Dorner, Nitzsch, Delitzsch, Van Oostromer, Holtmann, Bishop Rethe, Langbein, Christ, Luthardt, Gaufrin, Godet, Trench, Elliptic, Ryle, Hoare, Tregelles, Elliott, Alfred, Bickersteth, Bonar, Tyng, Lord, and many other learned and pious divines, especially among Protestants, while the great majority of scholars and writers of Christendom, in all ages and denominations, have been ranged on the opposite, or post-millennial side, of whom we need mention only, among moderns, Whitby, Faber, Brown, Barnes, Hengstenberg, Stuart, and Wordsworth. The history of the Chiliasm doctrine, both Jewish and Christian, is well summarized in Elssner's Commentary, at the end of Rev. xx. See RESURRECTION: THE FIRST.

Preston, William, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born at Woodbury, Conn., Aug. 26, 1801. He graduated from Yale College, was first a clerk in New York city, then studied theology in Alexandria, Va., was tutor in Kenyon College for a year, and on Oct. 12, 1828, was admitted to deacon's orders by bishop Chase of Ohio. He began his ministry in the town of Worthington, but soon removed to Trinity Church, Columbus, where he remained for twelve years. In 1841 he accepted a call from the parish of St. Andrew's, in Pittsburgh, Pa., where he continued ten years. He was then called to his former parish in Columbus, but, owing to ill-health, removed some four years later to Christ Church, Bridgeport, Conn., where he labored until 1856, when he went back to his old charge in Pittsburgh. In 1873 he resigned this post, and after a time removed to Bedford, Conn., to the St. Andrew's at Exeter. He died there, April 23, 1875. See Ohio Rec. of Yale College, 1875.

Priapus, in Greek mythology, was the son of Bacchus and Venus. The angry Juno touched the body of the pregnant Venus so that she gave birth to a hideous monster with unnaturally large genital organs. The older writers do not know him. He was worshiped as the god of country fruitfulness, and his statues were placed in gardens.

Price, THOMAS, LL.D., an English Baptist minister, was born at Bristol, April 21, 1802. He was converted at fifteen, and baptized in Broadmead Chapel by Dr. Ryland. In 1820 he studied in the Bristol Academy, and afterwards at the Glasgow and the Edinburgh universities; in 1826 he was the chief of the chaplain of the Devonshire Square Church, London, and in 1826 became pastor. He delivered popular lectures, which he published in two volumes in 1836, with the title, A History of Protestant Nonconformity. He resigned his pastoral the same year, and became one of the founders of the Anti-State Church Association. In 1852, he was appointed treasurer, and was one of the society's most zealous advocates. A disease in his throat utterly incapacitated him from public speaking, so he devoted his energies to the founding of the Dissenters and General Fire and Life Assurance Company. He also became proprietor and editor of the Eclectic Review, which he conducted for nineteen years. In 1848 he became a confirmed invalid, and died May 29, 1867. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1868, p. 125.

Prichard, JOHN, D.D., a Welsh Baptist minister, was born near Amlwch, Wales, in March, 1796. He pursued his college course in America, and in 1823 was ordained as pastor of the Church at Llangollen, which was his only settlement. Through his exertions a college was established in the place where he resided, in 1862, for training young men for ministry, of which he was for a time the president. He died Sept. 7, 1875. See (Cardiff) Baptist Encyclopedia, p. 596. [C. C. S.]

1. JOACHIM HINRICH (I.), was born Nov. 12, 1714, at Rostock, where he began his theological studies, which he continued at Jena. At the university of his birthplace Fries commenced his academic career in 1739. In 1748 he was appointed professor, in 1749 he took the degree of doctor of theology, and died Aug. 1, 1768. He is the author of, De non Consummati Patribus Vetere Testamenti ad Dictum Pauli Epist. xi, 39, 40 (Rostock, 1749);—De Sensu Existentiae Dei Fzcas ai Momentum (1752);—De Jona, Christii Typo (1753);—De Precationibus Dei Ante Abrahamum (1755);—De Prophecia et Apostolica (1757);—De Insubilsitae Apostolorum (1780), etc. See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutslands, n. v.

2. JOACHIM HINRICH (II.), son of the preceding, was born at Rostock, Sept. 34, 1747. He studied at the universities of Jena in 1763, and Jena. For a time he was professor of theology at Rostock. In 1779, he took the degree of doctor of theology in 1751, and died Oct. 24, 1767. He wrote, Progr. in Denk. zuit., 15 (Rostock, 1767);—Stipendia Rationis, et Jheronimiana (1780).—Natura Jesu Christi Divina (1796);—Mortuorum Reuecctio Veteris Fidei Non Incoquita (1788).—De Personae quibus Epistolae ad Galatas Scripta est (1786);—De Morti Christi Vicaria (1788);—De Numero Paschaustum a Christo Post Baptismum Celebratorem (1789). Prime, SAMUEL IRENEUS, D.D., an eminent Presbyterian divine, son of Dr. N. S. Prime, was born at Ballston, Saratoga Co., N.Y., Nov. 4, 1812. He graduated from Williams College in 1829, and from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1835; was pastor of the Baptist Church at Matawan the same year as pastor at Ballston Spa, in 1837 assumed the same relation at Matteawan, but on account of failing health resigned in 1810, and became editor of the New York Observer; in 1841 one of the secretaries of the American Bible Society; in 1849 editor of the Presby-

Ancient Medal representing Prometheus forming a human figure of clay, on the head of which Minerva holds a Butterfly as the symbol of the Soul, while a Snake behind him symbolizes his craftiness. Vulcan nailed him to the Caucasus, and with a long time he bore these worsting with patience, for he knew a mortal would eventually liberate him. This Hercules did by shooting the eagle. According to others Chiron liberated him. A third myth makes Jupiter himself the called apocryphal, or such as should be kept secret (ευρύγραμμα). Virtually the same books which the ancient Church called apocrypha are embraced under the name Pseudepigrapha by the Protestant Church. Since, after the example of Jerome, the non-canonical books of the Old Testament received the name apocrypha, it became necessary to find a new one for the third class. The name ευρυγραμμα is, indeed, taken only from a single and outward mark, namely, the spurious character of the author's name which they bear. It is neither sufficiently comprehensive, nor does it distinguish sufficiently this class of writings from the apocryphal (and, it is applicable to all the writings of the third class. For many reasons, however, it is probably the best term that could be found.

As there is an Old and a New Testament, so likewise there are pseudo-apocrypha of each, all writings that claim either to have been written by or be of the Old Testament, persons, who whether these writings are of Jewish or Christian origin, being called pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament; and those writings which pretend to be gospels, acts of the apostles, epistles of apostles, and revelations under a New Testament name, being termed pseudo-pseudepigrapha of the New Testament. The latter class might probably be better called apocrypha of the New Testament (in the old sense of the word).

In the following the pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament, those that are purely Jewish as well as of which only fragments are preserved, or which are only known by name, will be treated. We premise a few remarks on the origin and development of this whole class of literature. The rapid growth and spread of pseudepigraphic literature among the Jews and Christians in the last century before, and the early centuries after, Christ, is a peculiar phenomenon, for which other nations have only distant analogies: and it is all the more remarkable, because such writings are in direct contradiction to the duty of strict truthfulness demanded by both Mosaic and Christian law. That these books were used only in sectarian circles cannot be proved. It is true that heretics in early days of the Church frequently adopted this method of promoting their errors, but this was in the period of the decay of literature, and we must remember, on the other hand, that in the course of the centuries during which it flourished, it generally was employed for the imitation of oracles, and especially noble purposes, and in connexion, of course, with the Christian Church. There is no doubt that their origin is not to be explained as an imitation of the secret books in possession of the priests of the Gentile temples, but that it is the outgrowth of the peculiarities of the Jewish congregation, and were not intended for the Christian Church. Above all, it must be remembered that it was the custom of Jewish writers not to prefix their names to their productions, as these were written for the benefit of the congregation, not for the author's glorification. Different was the practice with the prophets, who, with their names, guaranteed the truth of the revelation. Thus the names of the authors of nearly all other books have been hidden from posterity.

The custom of omitting the author's name explains, to some extent, the original writings under a strange name. The other weighty reason lies in the inner rupture in the spiritual life of the Jews, which began before the captivity, but showed itself in great power in the first centuries of the new Jerusalem. With the union of the old political and religious organization, and the sufferings under heathen supremacy, the freedom of the national spirit was also broken. The Holy Spirit of revelation withdrew, the state of affairs and the sufferings of the earlier days became decisive for the new period: and all this led to the formation of a canon in the first centuries after the exile, it increased the reverence for the old histories, biographies, persons and writings, so much, that these rules and decreed the whole spiritual life of the people. The examination, study, and application of the sacred writings were the fundamental objects of these times. Although, through association with other nations and educational forces (Persians, Greeks, Romans), and through a more extensive and deeper study of the old books, new knowledge and aims were born, and although, in extraordinary and dangerous times, prominent men felt themselves called upon to speak to the congregation, yet the lack of personal influence always induced such authors to put their thoughts and words into the mouth of some pious man of antiquity, and conform the shape and style of their writings to those of the Old Test. A thorough acquaintance with these latter facilitated the application of their contents to later circumstances. Such revivification of ancient persons, which makes them the bearers of their thoughts, was common to all literature; and it was but one step further to ascribe a whole book to them. In many respects this kind of literature can be compared with the dramatic works of other nations; but to call it intentionally fraudulent is hardly to be justified, for the multitude of such books shows that the knowledge of their late origin was constantly present to the minds of the readers. Yet the danger of leaving a false impression, at least in the minds of the less cultivated part of the congregation, although for the contemporaries comparable and even sometimes greater, is, of course, especially when Christianity brought these later spiritual productions of the Jews to nations who did not understand them. The opposition of the early Christian Church against such books can thus be easily understood, but theological science must investigate, and make all possible use of them. The pseudographical form was chiefly adopted for the purpose of instruction, exhortation, and consolation in the great trials and troubles of post-exilic days. What the prophets had been for the past, the later writings were intended to be for the present, by the prophetic character which they assumed. Most of the pseudographical works are prophetic in their nature, some also apocalyptic, in imitation of the book of Daniel.

Besides the pseudographical literature, the so-called Hegaddic midrash, as we find it in the later Targumim: Midrashim, and Talmud, as well as in the Pseudepigrapha, was especially cultivated.

With the rise of Christianity, a new element was introduced into this literature, and contributed to its growth and development, not through the Essenes, as mentioned above, but through the Jewish sects, especially the Judaizing sects and the gnosticism arising from them, especially in Asia Minor and Egypt. In the hands of the sects and heretics they later became instruments for dangerous purposes, which resulted in the antagonism of the Church to Jewish and Christian pseudopigrapha was undoubtedly very large. Even in the apocrypha of Ezra (4 Ezra xiv, 46 Lat., xiv, 61 Ethiopic), seventy apocryphal writings are distinguished from the twenty-four canonical books, which, however, is probably a round number that became authoritative for later times. It is probable that those preserved are the best of their class. Of many we have only the titles, or short extracts in the Church Fathers. The last decades have discovered some that were regarded as lost, and the future may yet furnish us others. They have more than a passing interest, for they have a real value, because they are from the popular literature of their day. According to their contents, the pseudepigrapha may be divided into different classes, viz.

1. Lyrical Poetry. To this class belong:
   a. The Psalter of Solomon (q. v.). By way of supplement, mention is made of the Psalters of Tyre and Damascus (Greek and English, in the Presbyterian Review, October, 1893), and an arr. by Dean in the Expositor (London, December, 1893).
   b. A pseudepigrapha of Ἀδάμ, mentioned in the Con st. Apost. vi. 18. Whether this is Ps. 110 of the Greek Bible, or a larger, independent work, cannot now be decided.
   c. A. Pseudojohanan. Under this head we emergera:
      XIII. D D D
Jubileos (No. 81), and the Assumptio Mariae (No. 40). We know of only 12 Syriac, Protopus Amphit., and others (Fabricius, p. 886), who mention it as the source of Gal. vi. 13.

19. A Lameck book is mentioned in the catalogues of Coteler and Montfaucon; and

20. The Gnostic Sethites possessed an apocalypse of Abraham (q. v.).

b. Testaments:

21. A Testaments, according to Fabricius, II, 58, contained the mention that Adam was taken into Paradise when forty days old. It is probably a portion of the Vitalis Adam (No. 35).

22. The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs (q. v.); to the twelve patriarchs must be added Pick's and the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, in the Lutheran Church Review (Philadelphia, July, 1898); Schaupp, Die Testaments der zwolf Patriarchen (1899).

23. An apocryphal, προτάρα Ἰσαίας, is mentioned in the Conat. Apost. vi. 16.

24. An apocryphal testament of Jacob, mentioned in the Decretum Gelasii (Fabricius, i, 437, 799).

25. Εὐαγγελία Ιωάννη, "prayer or blessing of Joseph," is frequently mentioned, and is also counted among those read (πραγματεία) by Origin and others (Fabricius, i, 765-78). It seems to have been strongly cabalistic.

26. A διάδοσις Μακεδών is mentioned in the four catalogues of Nicephorus of Cesarea (No. 172).

27. Concerning the διαδοχὴ Ἰουδαίων, Avi. Jea. cap. 1-3, see XI.

28. The testaments of Adam and Noah are portions of the Vitae Adam (No. 85).

29. Other books concerning the Prophets:

29a. In the act of the Nicanor synedr. (Fabric. i, 540) mention is made of the Buch Adam (nowt) Ναηνον μακροποίησε Ναηνον, which book has been lost. The latter was a work of Adam of Mose, the death of Moses.

29b. The Testaments of the Medes is mentioned in Pastor Hermann, i, 3, 2, and cited as the only writings generally are; later authorities mention it as an apocryphon of the Old Testament.

30. Books on Historical Matters and Hagiographic Writings. These include:

30a. The Book of Jubilees (q. v.). To the literature we add Drummond, p. 148-147; Deans, The Book of Jubilees in the British Library, August, 1888; Dillmann, Beitriitze aus dem Buche der Jubiläen zur Kritik der Pentateuch-Critere (Berlin, 1883, in reports of the Friedrichshain Seminar); Schofield, The Book of Jubilees (translation, etc., in Bibliotheca Sacra, October, 1896, etc.).

30c. Manasseh's conversion (2 Chron. xxxiii, 11) early gave rise to an apocryphal of Manasseh, used both by Christian writers and by the Targum on Chronicles (Fab. i, 1000 sq.).

30d. A book based on Gen. xii, 40, we have in Amos (q. v.).

30e. Books of Adam, see Adam, Book on. To the literature we add, Trumpy, in Abhandlungen der bayerischen Akademie der Wissenschaften (Munich, 1898, 1929); Meyer, Völkerr. Arch., in the same journal (1879); Maian, The Book of Adam and Eve (Loud. 1898).

30f. A gnostic writing, called Noia, after the wife of Noah, was unknown to Epiphanius, but useful for the study of Ephraimites.

30g. An Epistolical book, ἀποστολὴ Ἰωάννου (Gen. xxviii), also mentioned by Epiphanius (Fabricius, i, 443).

On the Jewish Midrashim. See Midrashim. In this Supplement.

Later, this class of literature was used for worldly and evil purposes, and stood in the service of quackery, witchcraft, and sorcery. The name of Solomon was, above all others, connected with this kind of works; sometimes, also, that of Joseph and Abraham (Fabricius, i, 1048, 390, 785). See Plitt-Herzog, Real-Encyklop. a. v. (H. Pufendorf, Samuel, a German historian, was born at Chemnitz, Saxony, in 1632. He lectured on jurisprudence and moral and civil law at Berlin as historiographer to the elector of Brandenburg. Pufendorf died in 1694. His principal work is De Jure Naturali et Gentium (Lund, 1672 and often; transl. into German, English, and French). Though essentially only an elaboration and systematization of the ideas of Grotius and Spinoza, on the foundation of natural law, it is a great work, conceived in the doctrine of natural and international law. Previously that doctrine had been based on the decalegone and developed in accordance with the idea of the justice of God. But Pufendorf emancipated the natural law from theology, without opposing the dogmas of the latter, because he recognized in religion the means of realizing the right and God as its author. Pufendorf's work attracted great attention, but also met with much opposition; indeed, Buddeus and Wolff were the first who fully recognized it. Among his other works, his De Jure Belli et Pacis Christiani ad Finitum Curiae (Bremen, 1687) has also theological interest as a defense of his colleagues' system. In a work published after his death, in 1695, entitled Just Feticum Divinum seu de Consenso et Dissonabue Protestantis, he demonstrates the impossibility of uniting the Lutheran and Refformed, as long as the latter retain the doctrine of absolute predestination. Punshon, William Morely, L.L.D., an eminent Wesleyan Methodist minister, was born at Doncaster, Yorkshire, England, May 29, 224. His home influences were decidedly Methodist, and at the age of seventeen he gave himself to Christ. He at once conscientiously devoted himself to a rigid course of self-culture in the pursuit of usefulness, which he continued until his death. In 1840 he removed to Sunderland, where he became an accredited local preacher. In 1848 he began his preparation for the ministry, under that devoted missionary, Benjamin Clough, at Weds- linton, as a probationer, and was appointed to the conference in 1844, and went to the theological school at Richmond, but did not complete his course, as he was sent to Maidstone Circuit to supply a vacancy. In 1845 he was appointed to the Whitehaven Circuit. In 1867 he was appointed by the conference as its representative to the Canadian Conference, and also elected to its presidency. He arrived in America in 1868, and met the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Chicago the same year, to which he was the representative of the Wesleyan Church. He visited the United States for the first time in 1868, and in July of that year he returned to England. Pun- shon was undoubtedly the greatest orator which the Wesleyan body of England has produced in this cen-
He was by nature poetic, and his style was largely controlled by this tendency, highly ornate, with great beauty and variety of illustration. In early life his discourse at Coleraine meant rather than logical, but during the latter part of his career his efforts "combined, as far as would be possible, the Ciceronian and Demosthenic styles." These qualities, coupled with a wonderful voice and great personal magnetism, gave him a power over an audience which is seldom equalled. His character as a man was likewise specially attractive. "A remarkable fact in the history of Mr. Punshon is that he displayed, in the important positions in which he was placed in later years, very great practical sagacity, and proved that a great semi-poetic orator may be a successful man of affairs." He published several volumes of sermons and addresses, also one of poems. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1881, p. 36; (N. Y.) Christian Advocate, April 21, 1881; also his Biography (Long, 1881).

Purcell, John Baptist, D.D., an eminent Roman Catholic prelate, was born of humble parents at Mallow, County Cork, Ireland, Feb. 26, 1800. In his eighteenth year
he left his home for the United States, and in June, 1820, entered Mount St. Mary's College, Emmitsburg, Md. After three years he received minor orders, and the following year was sent to France to complete his theological course at the seminary of St. Sulpice, Paris. On May 21, 1829, he was ordained a priest and archbishop, Quelen in the Notre Dame cathedral. Immediately on his return to America he was appointed professor of philosophy at Mount St. Mary's College, and in 1829 he became president of it. On Oct. 18, 1833, he was consecrated bishop of Cincinnati. By his unflagging zeal he saw his diocese flourish, his churches and charitable and religious foundations. In 1836 he had his great public debate, which lasted a week, with Alexander Campbell. In 1850 Cincinnati was made an archiepiscopal see, and Purcell and Hughes received the title of archbishops in the pontificate of Pius IX. The bishop Purcell died at St. Martin's, O., July 4, 1863.
He was a man of great vigor, devotion, and labor, naturally generous and charitable. His latter years were made unhappy by the memorable financial disaster which overtook him, and which caused him to retire some time before his death to a monastery. He left debts to the amount of one million of dollars. He pub-ilished several volumes, chiefly sermons and biographies.

(N. Y. 1865).

Purinton, Jesse M., D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Colborne, Ont., Aug. 12, 1806. He united with the Church at the age of eleven, studied at Hamilton, N. Y., and was ordained in 1834. His pastorates were in his native place; Arcade, N. Y.; Forestville and Mount Moriah, Pa., and at Morgantown, W. Va.
For several years he was a missionary in north-western Virginia, and assisted pastors much in times of revival.
He died at Morgantown, June 17, 1869. See Cathcart,
Baptist Encyclopedia, p. 950. (J. C. S.)

Purvanca, James D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Baltimore, Md., Feb. 19, 1807. He was educated at St. Mary's College and at the U. S. Academy at West Point, where he studied law, and graduated from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1835.
He was ordained an evangelist by the Presbyterian of Louisiana in 1837; served one year thereafter as stated supply at Baton Rouge; at Carmel, Miss., in 1841, and pastor from 1846 to 1854. He was president of the New Orleans Seminary from 1855 to 1858, and at Carrollton, La., from 1861 to 1862; at Natchez, Miss., in 1863, from 1863 to 1871, and died there, July 14
of the latter year. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol.
Sem., 1861, p. 90; Nevins, Presbyterian Encyclopedia, s. v.

Pusey, Edward Bouverie, D.D., D.C.L., an eminent scholar, son of the late Hon. Philip Bouverie (half-brother of the first earl of Radnor), who assumed the name of Pusey by royal license, was born in 1800. He was educated at Christ Church College, Oxford, where he graduated with high honor in 1822,
and the next year was elected to a fellowship in Oriel College. After studying in Germany for two years, he was appointed in 1825 regius professor of Hebrew at Oxford University, a position to which is attached a canonry in Christ Church, and he retained these offices until his death, Sept. 16, 1882. His connection with the Tracts for the Times, and the controversies growing out of them, are dealt under Puseyism (q. v.). Dr.
Pusey was a High-churchman of the purest morala
and the stanchest orthodoxy, and also a scholar of no ordinary character. Besides his doctrinal writings, he published several exegetical works (on the minor prophphets and Daniel), and a number of small volumes on Church-history. See his Life, by Hugon (Lond. 1888); Memorial Sermon, by Liddon (ibid. 1884).

Puseyites, a term often applied to the High-Church party in the Anglican Church, from their adherence to the views of Dr. Edward Pusey (q. v.), but repudiated both by him and by them.

Pushtu Version of the Scriptures. By way of supplement we add here the following. The first attempt to give a Pushtu version of the Scriptures having been made to be done by Dr. Leyden, who in 1811 published the corresponding committee of Calcutta with a translation of the gospels of Matthew and Mark.
At his death the translation was continued by the Scram-pore missionaries, with the aid of some learned natives previously in the employ of Dr. Leyden. In 1813 the New Test was published at Scarpore, and in 1822 the Pentateuch and the historical books of the Old Test, were also issued there. Considering the circumstances under which these versions were made, they were very fair productions, in spite of their deficiencies. A need for a new translation was, however, felt more and more, and efforts were made in that direction. Previous to the mutiny in India, the gospel of John, translated by the Rev. R. Clark, and that of Luke, by Captain James, been placed in the hands of the North India Auxiliary Bible Society. But both were destroyed with the press at Agra, in 1857. Copies, however, were soon ready for publication, to which were added the gospels of Matthew and Mark, and the Acts as translated by the Rev. J. Lowenthal (q. v.). In 1864 the entire Pushtu New Testament was printed, the translation having been made by Mr. Lowenthal. He was not allowed to translate the Old Test into the Pushtu. Before he had fairly entered upon the duty, he was killed, in 1864. The work of translating the Old Test, was taken up by the Rev. T. F. Hughes, of the Church Missionary Society, in 1873. In 1877, Rev. T. F. Hughes, the Rev. T. F.
Hughes, of the Church Missionary Society, has been engaged in translating the Old Test, and, assisted by Quazi Abdul Rahman, he translated the Psalms, which were printed in 1881. From the report of the British and Foreign Bible Society for 1885 we learn that considerable progress has been made in translation work, both in the Old and New Tests, and preparations are in progress for a revision of the New Test. The bishop of Lahore has arranged to have meetings of the revision committee in Kohat and at Murri, when it is hoped that the different translations will be harmonized under the guidance of the bishop. (B. P.)

Putnam, Israel. Warrington, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Danvers, Mass., Nov. 24, 1786. He entered Harvard College in 1805, but left in his sophomore year, and graduated from Dartmouth in 1809. He began the study of law; in 1811 united with the Church, and, and not long afterwards began the study of theology, graduating from Andover Theological Seminary in 1814. In October of that year he preached at Brookfield and in various other places, and in January, 1815, accepted a call to the First Church in Portsmouth, N. H., which he filled a time after engaged in a controversy on Unitarianism with Dr. Nathan Parker, pastor of the South Parish Church in Portsmouth. In October, 1833, he was installed pastor of the Old Pilgrim Church, Middleborough, Mass., and continued in that relation until his death, May 3, 1868. See Cong. Quarterly, 1868, p. 317.

Puto (Poo, Pouto, or Poo-Teon-Shan) is a small rocky island off the eastern extremity of Chusan, coast of China. It is about twenty miles from the mainland, near Ningpo, in latitude 30°-35° north, and longitude 122°-40° east, and is about five miles long and from one to two broad. It is famous in the annals of Chinese Buddhism, as having been devoted to the religious rites and services of that faith for more than a thousand years. It has numerous shrines and temples, and here Chinese Buddhism may be seen in its perfect, its rites being carefully practiced in the great temple.

Pyreums, a fire temple of the ancient Persians. It was simply an enclosure, in the centre of which was placed the sacred fire, and the building was so constructed that the rays of the sun could not fall on this fire. The first pyreum was built by Zoroaster, at Bala, in Persia; and thence the sacred fire was conveyed to other fire-temples both in Persia and India. See Parsis; Zoroaster.

Pyres (πυρα, from τῷ, fire), the funeral pile of wood on which the ancient Greeks often burned the bodies of their dead. The body was placed on the top with oils and perfumes, and in the heroic age it was customary to burn animals and even slaves along with the corpse. When the body was consumed and the pyre burned down, the fire was extinguished by throwing wine upon it, and the bones were collected, washed with wine and oil, and put in urns.

Pty, Henri, a Protestant theologian of France, was born April 5, 1796, at Sainte Croix, canton of Vaud, Switzerland. He studied at Geneva, and in 1818 went to Saverdon, France, where he acted as an evangeliist. In 1819 he entered the services of the London Continental Society, and was ordained at London in 1821. He was pastor at Hayonne and Ébrard, but most of his time he spent in missionary work at Boulogne-sur-Mer, Versailles, etc. He died at Calais, France, on September 24, 1835. Of his literary work we mention the revision of the New Testament into the Frenchlanguage, which he undertook at the instance of the British and Foreign Bible Society. See Guerra, Vie de Henri Pte (Paris, 1830); A. de Montier, Dict. Biog. de Geniere et de Vaud, ii, 944; Lichtselter, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Pythia, the priestess of Apollo at Delphi, who gave forth the oracular responses of the god. At first there was only one Pythia, but afterwards there were always two, who alternately took their seat upon the tripod. See Oracle.

Pythian Games, one of the four great national festivals of the Greeks. They were celebrated on a plain in the neighborhood of Delphi in honor of Apollo, Artemis, and Leto, and on one occasion they were held at Athens. They are said to have originated in a musical contest, which consisted in singing a hymn in honor of Apollo, with an accompaniment on the cithara. The other exercises customary at the Grecian games were subsequently added. They were held originally they were held at the end of every eighth year, but in the forty-eighth Olympiad they began to be held at the end of every fourth year, and were regularly observed down to the end of the fourth century. Lesser Pythian games were celebrated in many other places where Apollo was worshipped. See Games.

Quade, Michael Friedrich, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born July 28, 1692, at Zachau, Pomerania. He studied at Wittenberg and Greifswald; was in 1716 rector of the gymnasiun at Stettin, and died July 11, 1757. He wrote, De Divinio Areopagita Scripturae ludi Suppor te (Greifswald, 1716); Deque 1772: A Latinae in Apostolorum Epistulam Exegesis (1711) — De Vita Judae Apostoli (eol.); De Ruta Venerii Vota Solemni et Vunepandini Variaque Votorum Genera (1783). See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschland, s. v. (B. P.)

Quagutl Version of the Scriptures. Quagutl is the vernacular spoken by the Indians of Van- couver's Island. From the report of the British and Foreign Bible Society for 1882 we learn that, at the request of the Church Missionary Society, the gospel of Matthew, translated by the Rev. A. J. Hall, the only European who has studied the Quagutls, has been printed by the British and Foreign Bible Society. The same society also published, in 1884, the gospel of John, prepared likewise by Mr. Hall. (B. P.)

Quarles, Francis, an eminent author and poet, was born at Stewards, near Rumford, Essex, England, in 1592. He was educated at Christ's College, Cambridge, and Lincoln's Inn. He occupied various civil offices until the rebellion of 1641 in Ireland, and he died Sept. 8, 1644. He was a great reader, and the writer of many books in prose and verse, which are admirable for their moral and religious character. The following are a few of his works: Emblems, in five books; —A Feast for Worms, in a Poem on the History of Jonah; — Haykash, or History of Queen Esther; —The History of Samson; —Job Militant, with Meditations Divine and Moral; — Sion's Sonnets Sung by Solomon the King; — Sion's Elegies Sung by Jeremy the Prophet: — Pantologia, or the Quin-

Queatsalcoatl, an idol or god of the Mexicans, particularly worshipped by all persons concerned in traffic. Forty days before the feast of this god, the merchants purchased a well-shaven slave, who during that time represented the deity, spending his time in dancing and rejoicing, and on the day of the festival was sacrificed to the deity at midnight, his heart being first offered to the moon, and then laid before the idol. This deity was worshipped under another name at Cholula, where he was looked upon as the god of the air, the founder of the city, the inventor of parchment, and the author of sacrifices. He was represented sitting on a kind of pedestal, habited in a cloak ornamented with red crosses. His devotees drew blood from their tongues and ears to procure his favor; and before going to war sacrificed to him five boys and as many girls of three years of age.

Quichuan Version of the Scriptures. Quichua was the predominant language of Peru during the sovereignty of the ancient Inca. It still prevails on the plateau of the Andes, from Quito to Santiago del Estero, and in some districts it is exclusively spoken. Before the year 1800 the Quichuans were entirely without the word of God in their vernacular. At the request of the Rev. F. N. Lett, the British and Foreign Bible Society's agent for Buenos Ayres, the gospel of John was translated by the Rev. J. H. Gibson-Spilsbury, of the South American Missionary Society, and an edition of one thousand copies was published at the expense of the British and Foreign Bible Society.
QUINBY 789 RAGNAROK

This is the first portion of the word of God translated and published in the Quichuan. (B.F.)

Quinby, Hokea, D.D., a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Sandwich, N. H., Aug. 25, 1804. He converted in 1824, and graduated from Waterville College, now Colby University, in 1832. He became principal of the Parsonsfield Seminary, Me., and having been ordained June 2, 1838, preached habitually during his nearly seven years' connection with the institution. He was one of the editors of the Morning Star, and began to write a history of the Free Baptist denomination, which was published in part in the Quarterly Magazine. For a few years he was pastor and teacher at Meredith village, N. H. Upon the establishment of the Smithville Seminary, afterwards Lapham Institute, in North Scituate, R. I., in 1846, he was appointed its principal, and was very successful in the management of its affairs. Subsequently, as the seminary was greatly embarrassed financially, it was sold to Mr. Quinby, and carried on by him as a private enterprise for several years. For thirty years he did double work as preacher and teacher, and may be said to have been the founder of the educational interests of the Baptist denomination in this State. In January, 1855, he became, a second time, pastor of the church in Meredith, and resumed his work as a teacher. On Feb. 28, 1857, he entered upon his duties as pastor of the church in Pittsfield, N. H., at the same time having charge of a high-school in that village. His last official acts were at Lebanon, Me., in 1861, and Lake Village, N. H., in 1864. In 1868 he removed to Concord, and devoted himself to literary work, and to his duties as chaplain of the New Hampshire state prison, for several years. His last pastorates were at Nottingham, October, 1872; Pittsfield, January, 1875, and Mellon Mills, in May, 1876, where he died, Oct. 11, 1878. (J. C. S.)

Quisthorp, John Jacob, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Rostock, March 19, 1717. He pursued his theological studies at the university of his native place, was in 1743 professor at Kiel, in 1747 court-preacher at Eutin, in 1754 professor at Rostock, and died Dec. 30, 1766. Besides several volumes of sermons, Quisthorp published, De Cruo Judaeorum et Prophe- tas non Solenete, sed Impulse (Rostock, 1759); — De Sacris Pontificiæ Victimis Janseniistarum (1760); — De Recentissimis Loci de Angelica Bonis ex Theologia Dogmatica Proclamatione Telerisi (1764). See Döring, Die geklerten Theologen Deutschlands, a. v. (B. F.)

R.

Rabbah (Jos. xv, 60) is conjectured by Lieut. Conder (Test Work, ii, 389) to be the present Khurbet Rubba, laid down on the Ordnance Map at five miles northeast of Beit-Julin, and described in the accompanying Memoirs (iii, 360) as consisting of “caves, cisterns, and heaps of stones, ruined walls, bases of pillars and shafts much worn, two lintel stones with cross, each measuring about seven feet by two and a half feet.”

Rabbab—Ammon. Some additional particulars respecting Amona are given by Merrit, East of the Jordan, p. 386 sq.

Rabbith. Tristram (Bible Places, p. 327) thinks this may be the modern Arrabeh, which, however, does not lie “in the plain” of Esdraelon, but about two miles southwest of Dothan; while Lieut. Conder suggests (Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey, ii, 229) Rabbath, a small stone village lying about nine miles southwest of Beisan, and therefore entirely beyond the boundaries of Ismechar.

Rabe, Johann Jacob, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Jan. 16, 1710, at Lindvluhr, near Wirsburg. He studied at Altdorf, was in 1741 deacon at Eichstätt, and in 1744 archdeacon, and member of consistory, in 1790 general superintendent. Rabe died Feb. 12, 1798. He is best known by his German translation of the Minha (Anspach, 1780-83, 4 parts), and by his translation of the treaties Berachoth and Peah, according to the Jerusalem Talmud (1777, 1781). See First, Bdk. Jud. iii, 127; Winner, Handbuch der theolog. Lit. i, 212, 528, 594, 625; Döring, Die geklerten Theologen Deutschlands, a. v. (B. F.)

Racovian Catechism, a Socinian catechism which was published in Poland in the 17th century. It was prepared by Smalz, a learned German Socinian who had seduced Poland, and by Mostowicz, a learned and wealthy nobleman. It derived its name from being published at Racow, a little town in southern Poland, the seat of a famous Socinian school. The catechism was published in Polish and Latin, and afterwards translated into German and English. In 1652 the Racovian catechism was published in both of these languages, and in the same year appeared in Latin under the title of Didascalicon. The English version was published in 1680. The Polish version was published in 1693. The English version was published in 1712 by Abraham Rees, with a historical introduction. There was also a smaller catechism, drawn up by Smalz in German, and first published in 1605. See CATECHISM; SOCINIANISM.

Rada, in Hindu mythology, was the first wife of the god Krishna. She was afterwards adored as the goddess of love.

Radifus, a Scotch prelate, was consecrated bishop of the see of Brechin in 1202. He died in 1218. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 157.

Radwell, a Scotch prelate, was ordained bishop of the see of Galloway in 790. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 272.

Rae, William, a Scotch prelate, was made bishop of Glasgow in 1385, and died 1387. See Keith, Scott- ish Bishops, p. 244.

Ragnarokr (Divine twilight), in Norse mythology, is the final destruction of the world, which threatens the Scandinavian deities, the Asa, their treasures, their creations, and also the earth and its inhabitants. The Edda gives the following description of it:

“There will come a winter, called Fimbulwinter, in which snow will fall from all sides, with a severe frost and thick fog, on which the warmth of the sun will be destroyed. Three such winters will succeed each other without a break, until human beings perish. Then a great battle will ensue, which will deceive the sun, another wolf, Hati, the moon. The stars will disappear from the heavens, the earth will reel, the trees will be torn out by their roots, the mountains fall, and all chains and bands burst asunder. The Fenris-wolf will break the bonds that are fastened about him. The Midgard-serpent will seek the shore. Then also, the ship Naglfair will become loose. It is made out of the nails of heroes and giants. The giant Fenris will escape it with open mouth. The Midgard-serpent vomits poison, which contaminates the air and the water. In this tumult the heavens will burst, and Muspel’s sons come riding, led by Surtur, who is surrounded by fire, and whose sword shames everything that was on earth. When they ride over Bifrost (rainbow bridge) it will collapse. Muspel’s sons will come to Fenris and the Midgard-serpent, Loki, Hymey, and all Hymjotnae-will join them. Muspel’s sons will have their own order of battle. Then Heimdall will blow into the Gialtar horn and wake up Odin. Odin will ride to Fensalir and get advice for him and his. The ash-tree Yggdrasil will fall, and everything be full of fear in heaven and earth. The Ash is the tree which sustains the heavens and the earth. The survival of the world depends on the Ash. The Ash continues the human race. The Ash will not break. The Ash will continue. Odin will rise and the two kill each other. Thor will slay the snake, but fall, poisoned by the snake’s venom. The wolf Fenris will devour Odin, but Vidar will rend open his jaw and pull Odin out. After this, Surtur will throw fire and burn the whole earth. But then there shall arise out of the sea, from the beautiful green earth, a corn which shall grow. Vidar and Ull will live on the Ida-plain where formerly Asgard lay. There Thor’s sons also, Naglfari and Muspellah will come, with the brand Riyd, in teaching most of his life, but organized a church at Conohoboken, near Philadelphia, in 1845, and the same year founded the Oakland Female Institute at Norristown, Pa., of which he continued the head, with a period of intermission (1874–77), until his death, Nov. 10, 1880. See Necro. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem., 1881, p. 61; Nevin, Prof. Encyclop.-s. v.

Ramah of Asher. The Orname Ordinance Map exhibits no name corresponding to this in the local registry except Klubel Scudum, which lies six miles and a half from the shore, between Es-Zeb (Ezdippa) and Ras en- Nakurah, and being described in the accompanying map (i, 180) as “heaps of scattered stones; a few cisterns.”

Ramah of Benjamin. Er-Rama lies five miles north of Jerusalem, and is “a small village on a conspicuous position on the top of a high white hill, with olives. It has a well to the south. . . . The houses are of stone, partly built from old materials” (Memoirs to Orname Survey, iii, 18). The remains in the vicinity are described (ibid. p. 155).

Ramah of Naphthali. Er-Ramiek lies seven miles and a quarter south-west of Safed, and is described in the Memoirs accompanying the Orname Survey (i, 202) as “a small stone village, containing about one hundred and fifty Moslems, situated on a hill-top in a valley, with a few figs, olives, and arable land; the valley to the west turns into a swamp in the winter, owing to its having no drainage; there are cisterns and a large pool for water supply.” “There are several large sarcophagi round this village, and one olive-press” (ibid. p. 255). See Beth-Degannah on p. 791.)

Ramah-lehi. For this Lieut. Conrad suggests (Topi Work, i, 277) Ayun Karda, a name, some given to the springs Ayun Abu-Mekbiris, on the slope of a low hill, seven miles from Beit Atab, a little way (three miles and a half) north-west of Zoreh; and this he thinks represents the ancient En akh-Koreh.

Ramath-mispeh is conjecturally located by Tish-Ramath-negeb is regarded by Tritram (Bible Places, p. 17) as probably the present "Karmeh, south-west of Dhu-lam, where alone for many miles water is always to be found in plenty, and where the ravine is crossed by a strong dam to retain it. The walls of a fortified town are yet clearly to be traced, with extensive ruins, and it is at the head of the most frequented pass into Palestine from the south-east."

Ramathaim-zophim. Lieutenant Conder is inclined (Feni Work, ii. 116) to identify this with Rima Allah, east of Beth-horon, on the west slope of Mt. Ephraim, overlooking the maritime plain but he admits that the connections are very much disputed.

Rambach, Friedrich Eberhard, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Pfullendorf, near Gotha, Aug. 24, 1708. He studied at Halle, was in 1750 teacher there, in 1754 deacon, in 1756 preacher at Tepenitz, in 1740 deacon at Halle, in 1755 member of the upper consistory at Breslau, and died in 1775. Rambach is best known as translator of the works of Sherlock, Roques, Lenfant, Bentley, Saurin, Chatelain, Serres, Doddridge, Kidd, Stackhouse, Watt, Sarpi, and others. See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theolog. Lit. i. 250, 438, 607, 657, 678, 683; ii. 29; Flitt-Herzog, Real-Encyclop. s. v. (B. P.)

Rambach, Johann Jacob, a Lutheran theologian, was born March 7, 1787. He studied at Halle, was in 1780 rector at Magdeburg, in 1785 at Quedlinburg, in 1774 first preacher there, in 1786 pastor at Hamburg, and died Aug. 6, 1818. He wrote, De Archbihore in Utroque Sacramento Obieci (Halle, 1768); De Actionibus Prophetae Proverbios (Magdeburg, 1761), besides a number of sermons. See Döring, Die deutschen Kunstredner, p. 305-315. (B. P.)

Ramath-Gilead. Dr. Merrill strongly urges the claims of Jerash as the site of this place (East of the Jordan, p. 284 sq.), but Tritram (Bible Places, p. 857) adheres to es-Sult.

Ramsay, Edward Bannerman, LL.D., a Scottish clergyman and author, was born at Balmain, Kincaidshire, Jan. 31, 1838, and graduated from St. John's College, Cambridge, in 1855. He took orders in the Church of England, and was a curate in Somersetshire for seven years. In 1859 he became minister of St. John's, Edinburgh, and in 1841 dean of the Reformed Episcopal Church of Scotland. He died at Edinburgh, Dec. 27, 1872. His publications include, a Manual of Catechetical Instruction (6th ed. Edinburgh, 1851; 9th ed. 1863);—Sermons for Advent (1857); Scripture Doctrine of the Eucharist (1858);—Reminiscences of Scottish Life and Character (ed.);—Diversities of Christian Character Illustrated in the Lives of the Four Great Apostles (ed.);—Present State of our Canon Law Considered (1859);—Christian Life (1863);—Episcopal Church of Scotland (ed.);—Two Lectures on Handel (ed.);—Christian Responsibility (1864);—Thomas Chalmers, D.D., a Biographical Notice (1867);—Pulpit Table-talk (1868), and other works. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Ramsay, James (1), a Scotch prelate, was rector of Hamilton, and in 1676 was made dean of Glasgow. He was preferred to the see of Dunblane and to the archiepiscopate of Glasgow. In May, 1684, he was translated from Dunblane to Ross, and here he continued until the abolition of episcopacy in Scotland in 1688. He died at Edinburgh, Oct. 22, 1696. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 204.

Ramsay, James (2), D.D., an Associate minister, was born in Lancaster County, Pa., March 22, 1771.

is supposed that he commenced his classical studies under his minister, Dr. Anderson, when twenty-five years of age. He was licensed at Buffalo, N. Y., by the Presbytery of Chautauqua, in 1809; and ordained and installed pastor of the congregation of Chautauqua, Sept. 4, 1810, and in 1815 he was the first Episcopal minister of the West Philadelphia Seminary, to which office was added the professorship of Hebrew in Jefferson College. In 1842 he resigned his professorship and continued his duties as pastor. He died March 6, 1855. See Sprague, Annuals of the Amer. Pulpit, IX, iii, p. 177.

Ramsay, Peter de, a Scotch presiate, was formerly a monk of Arbroath, but was bishop of Aberdeen in 1250. He died in 1256. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 107.

Randall, Benjamin, the founder of the Free-will Baptists, was born in 1749, and converted under the preaching of Whitefield. He died the Baptist, but in 1779 was silenced for holding Arminian views respecting the atonement and the will. He was nevertheless ordained at Durham, N. H., in 1780, by a party of seceders, and disseminated his opinions so successfully that in 1781 he was joined by a company who, in 1782, settled on Eacola, in Carolina, called "Separate Baptists," and thus the church now called Free Baptists was formed. Randall died in 1806.

Randall, David Austin, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Colchester, Conn., Jan. 14, 1813. He united with the Church in 1827; removed west, and was licensed to the ministry June 30, 1835. He ordained at Richfield, O., December, 1839, where he was pastor of the Church for five years, during which period he edited a Washington paper, and was an earnest advocate of temperance. He removed to Columbus in 1845, and became one of the editors of the Journal and Messenger. From 1850 to 1855 he was elder of the Church at Columbus, then spent several years abroad, and on his return published a volume entitled The Handwriting of God in Egypt, Sinai, and the Holy Land. For six years Dr. Randall was corresponding secretary of the Ohio Baptist Convention. He died at Columbus, July 27, 1884. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclopedia, p. 555. (J. C. S.)

Randall, George Maxwell, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born at Warren, R. I., Nov. 29, 1810. He graduated from Brown University in 1833, and from the General Theological Seminary in New York in 1836. Soon after he became rector of the Christ Church, Fall River, Mass., where he remained six years, and then removed to Boston to take charge of the newly constituted Church of the Messiah, where he continued from 1844 to 1986. During most of this time he was the editor of the Christian Intelligencer. He has also edited several newspapers, among which was the Western Citizen, a democratic paper. He was a member of the committee appointed to revise the Book of Common Prayer, and to frame the liturgy of the Protestant Episcopal Church in New England. He was chosen, in the fall of 1865, missionary bishop of Colorado, Wyoming, and New Mexico, and performed the duties of that office most faithfully for seven years. He died at Denver, Col., Sept. 26, 1875. Bishop Randall published several sermons and tracts.

Randolph, John, D.D., a bishop in the Church of England, was born in 1749. He was the son of Dr. Thomas Randolph, president of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, at which college John was educated. After occupying different academical posts and ecclesiastical preferments, he was, in 1790, raised to the see of Oxford, translated to that of Hangor in 1807, and thence to London in 1811. He performed with zeal and assiduity the duties of his function, and died July 28, 1815. His publications were chiefly occasional sermons and charges, and a Latin prelection on the study of the Greek language. See (London) Annual Register, 1815, p. 120.

Ranft, Michael, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Sept. 9, 1700. He studied at Leipzig, was in 1728 assistant preacher to his father at Droyssig, in 1729 dean at Neuba, and succeeded his father in 1748. In 1749 he was preacher at Beerwalde, Altenburg, and died April 18, 1774. He is the author of, Acta Lipsianum Academica (Leipzig, 1723-24, 15 parts):—Leben und Thaten Pabst Benedikt XIV. Rarotongan Version of the Scriptures. By way of supplement, we add that a revised edition of the Rarotongan Bible was printed in London at 1872. The revision was undertaken by the Rev. R. W. E. Krause, who returned to Europe on account of illness. The revised Rarotongan version was to be published in London, wherever it was possible, for the foreign words which had been used to a large extent in the version in the first instance. In this labor Mr. Krause was aided by the advice and suggestions of the Rev. G. Gill, who had to complete the latter portion, owing to the alarming and serious illness of the original translator, the report of the British and Foreign Bible Society for 1884, we learn that the Rev. W. Wyatt Gill, who has had forty years' experience of the South Sea, is now engaged for the Bible Society Committee on a thorough revision of the Rarotongan Bible, and from the report for 1885 we see that the reviser has reached the close of the New Test. RATTOONE, ELLIAM D., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, graduated from the College of New Jersey in 1787; was ordained deacon, Jan. 10, 1790; soon after took charge of St. Ann's Church, Brooklyn, N.Y.; in 1792 became professor in Columbia College of Latin and Greek, and in 1794 was made professor of Grecian and Rhetorick, resigning in 1797 to assume the rectorship of Grace Church, Jamaica, L.I., in which position he remained until April, 1802, when he became associate rector of St. Paul's Church, Baltimore, Md. A few years after he resigned this charge, and Trinity Church, in a built-up city, was erected, where he ministered until the fall of 1809, when he left Baltimore for Charleston, S. C., having been selected president of the Charleston College. His death occurred there in the summer of 1810, of yellow fever. He was an accomplished scholar, and an eloquent preacher. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpits, v. 301.

Raulston, John, a Scotch prelate, was first rector of Cambridge and sacrist of Glasgow, next provost of Doune, and bishop of Dunkeld. In 1444 he was preferred to be royal secretary, and in 1447 keeper of the privy seal. He was consecrated bishop of the see of Dunkeld, April 4, 1448. In 1449 he was constituted lord high-treasurer. In 1451 he was employed in an embassy to England. He died in 1492. See Keith, Scotch Bishops, p. 99.

Raymond, JOHN HOWARD, LL.D., an eminent Baptist educator, was born in New York city, March 7, 1814. He entered Columbia College when he was but fourteen years of age, where he remained until nearly the close of the junior year, when he was "suspended," and, as he always admitted, justly. Subsequently he went to Union College, Schenectady, where, in 1832, he graduated with high honors. On leaving college he studied law for two years in New York and New Haven. When he became a Christian, he pursued his theological studies at the Hamilton Theological Seminary, where he graduated in 1836, and was licensed to preach. For ten years (1840—50) he was professor of rhetoric and English literature in Madison University, and filled the same chair in Rochester University from 1851 to 1855, when he was elected president of the Polytechnic Institute of Brooklyn, N.Y., and held that position until his election, in 1864, to the presidency of Vassar College. He died at Poughkeepsie, Aug. 14, 1878. See Dr. Edward Lathrop, in The Baptist Weekly, Aug. 22, 1878. (J. C. S.)

Read, THOMAS, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Maryland in March, 1746. He was educated at the old Academy of Philadelphia; in 1769 received the license to preach and began his ministry in Shad's Creek, Del.; in 1772 he was installed as the pastor; and in 1798 accepted a call from the Second Presbyterian Church of Wilmington. He resigned this pastoral charge in 1817, and died July 14, 1823. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpits, iii, 301.

Reogard, Gottlieb Christian, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Wernigerode, March 18, 1735, and died at Königsberg, Oct. 8, 1798, doctor and professor of theology. He wrote, De Nemoiz Judaorum Piaculi; — De Paga Infantiae Iena in Egyptum. See Holzhey, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 155; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. s. v. (B. P.)

Recchi, IMMANUEL HATIM, a Jewish author of Ferrara, who died at Leghorn in 1743, is the author of, νόειν ποιεῖν, a treatise on the structure of the tabernacle, the holy vessels, etc. (Venice, 1716); — νόειν γράφειν, a cabalistic commentary on the Psalms (Leghorn, 1742); — νόειν λεγεῖν, a commentary on the Mishna (Amsterdam, 1781), etc. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. s. v. (B. P.)

Reuchenberg, ADAM, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Sept. 7, 1642, at Leipzick, Saxony. He studied at Leipzig, where he began his academical career in 1659. In 1677 he was professor of languages, and in 1678 commenced his theological lectures. In 1699 he was doctor of theology, and died Oct. 22, 1721. He published, Athenagora a Polologia pro Christianis (Leipaic, 1684); — Athenagora Liber de Resurrectione Mortuorum (Leipaic, 1685); — Athenagora Opera Graeca et Latina cum Annotandobus (Leipaic, 1688). — Novum Testamentum Graecum cum Praefatione et Libris Parall. Rectorial View of the Atoneinent is a phrase expressive of the aspect of the sacrifice of Jesus Christ upon the cross. While the reconciliation of legal justice with pardoning mercy is indeed thus beautifully exemplified, yet it is a very partial representation of the atonement which would make this the final cause or constraining purpose of it. That God may be just and yet the justifier of the heathen, on the one hand, is true. But the important result of the vicarious redemption by the Saviour, but to put it forth as the one grand motive or impulse in the divine mind is to reduce the scheme of salvation to a mere piece of governmental policy, the retrieval of an original blunder, an expedient to remedy a constitutional defect in the divine plan. The atonement would have been equally necessary and equally efficacious had Adam been the sole erring or even the sole intelligent creature in the universe. It was required by the nature of God himself, and is demanded by the majesty of the sinner likewise, who is thus "without excuse." Neither the prophylactic nor the curative, the coercive nor the punitive, ends of government are normally involved in it, and except as an exhibition of infinite and sovereign love is logically abortive. Redepeining, Ernst Rudolf, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Steitten, May 24, 1810. He studied at Berlin and Bonn, and commenced his academic career at the latter place. In 1836 he was professor there, and in 1869 went to Göttingen, where, in connection with his professorship, he acted as university-preacher. In 1855 he was called as superintendent to Ilfeld, and died March 27, 1888. He is the editor of Origenis de Principiis (Leipaic, 1886), and the author of Origenes. Eine Darstellung seines Lebens und seines Lehres (Bonn, 1851-54, 2 vols.)—Vorschläge und leitende Gedanken zu einer Kirchenordnung für das protestantische Deutschland (Göttingen, 1848)—Ueberwiese und Beständigkeit einer kirchlichen Lehreordnung (1849)—Christliche Wahrheiten für unsere Zeit (1850). Rees, George D.D., a Welsh Congregational minister, was born near Brynherian, Pemrokehire, in 1797, of eminently pious parents. He joined the Church in 1813, and soon began preaching. He received his ministerial education at the Carmarthen Presbyterian College, and, on completing his course, taught and preached for some time in the English portion of Pemrokehire. Thence he removed to Flintshire, and, with great efficiency, he conducted a grammar-school forty-three years. In 1833 he was ordained pastor at Gideon. His last five years were spent in confinement from paralysis. He died Aug. 51, 1870. Dr. Rees was a thorough Hebrew and Greek scholar. His character was most exemplary. See (London) Cong. Year-book, 1871, p. 288.

Reese, Daniel C., D.D., one of the four brothers who became distinguished ministers in the Methodist Protestant Church, was born at Baltimore, Md., Feb. 17, 1810. He was converted in his fourteenth year, and in 1830 joined an intervening divine mind in this denomination. While the reconciliation of legal justice with pardoning mercy is indeed thus beautifully exemplified, yet it is a very partial representation of the atonement which would make this the final cause or constraining purpose of it. That God may be just and yet the justifier of the heathen, on the one hand, is true. Reeve, Williams, D.D., a minister of the Methodist Protestant Church, was born in Kent, England, Dec. 5, 1802. His parents being poor, his early education was limited. He was converted at the age of twenty-three, and united with the Church. Landing in America in 1833, the principal of the organization of the Methodist Protestant Church, he united with the Ohio Conference at its first session. In 1853, at the formation of the Pittsburgh Conference, he became one of its members, and was frequently its president. At various times he was elected delegate to the general conferences and conventions of the Methodist Protestant Church. He died April 29, 1877. See Cohbauer, Founders of the Meth. Prot. Church, p. 308.

Reformer is a term usually applied in a religious sense to those who were most prominent in bringing about the current religious reformations of the 16th century. The principal of these were Wycliffe, Huss, Luther, Calvin, Zwingle, Melanchthon, Zécolampadius, Bucer, Reza, Cranmer, Latimer, Ridley, and John Knox. There are also many others who are fairly entitled to be called reformers.

Regylia Petri (the royalties of Peter) are regarded by Roman Catholics as belonging to the pope in his capacity of sovereign monarch of the universal Church. This claim to royal prerogative is founded on canon law, and has been asserted by the popes with more or less stringency since the 7th century. Among these claims are the following: "To be superior to the whole Church, and to its representative, a general council; to call general councils at his pleasure; to be obliged to attend his summons; to preside in general synods, so as to propose matter for discussion; to promote, obstruct, or overrule the debates; to confirm or invalidate their decisions; to define points of doctrine; to decide controversies authoritatively, so that none may contest or dissent from his judgment; to enact, establish, abrogate, suspend, or disperse with ecclesiastical laws and canons; to relax or do away with ecclesiastical censures by inducements, pardons, etc.; to dispense with the obligations of promises, vows, oaths, legal and ecclesiastical; to perform the offices of all parochial and ecclesiastical jurisdiction and dignity; to constitute, confirm, judge, censure, suspend, depose, remove, restore, and reconcile bishops; to exempt colleges and monasteries from the jurisdiction of their bishops and ordinary superiors; to judge all persons in spiritual causes by the presentation of all pastoral clergy to his presence, delegating judges, and reserving to himself a final, irrevocable judgment; to receive appeals from all ecclesiastical judicatures, and revenue or confirm their sentences; to be accountable to no one for his acts; to erect, transfer, and abolish episcopal sees; to exempt the clergy from the obligation of the clergy; to found religious orders; to summon and commission soldiers by crusade to fight against infidels or persecute heretics."

REID

REGINALD (2), a Scotch prelate, was consecrated bishop of the Isles in 1217. He died about 1295. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 299.

Regino, born at Altrip on the Rhine, near Spire, was a monk in the monastery of Prüm, and elected abbot there in 892. In 899 he resigned his position and went to Treves, where archbishop Rabold made him a monk of the monastery of St. Martin. Regino died in 915. He is the author of Libri duo de Ecclesiasticis Disciplina et Religione Christiana (best edition by Waschschleben, Leipzig, 1840):—De Harmonica Institutione (included in Cossenacer's Scriptorum de Musica Medii Aevi Parisiis, 1867, vol. vi, part 1);—De musica. His work is the Chironicon, the first world's history written in Germany, comprising the time from the birth of Christ to the year 906. The best edition of the Chironicon is found in Monumenta Sacra, i, 585-612 (Germ. trans. by Dünnler, in Geschichtschronik der deutschen Vorszeit, Berlin, 1867, vol. xiv, part 20). Regis, Jean François, a French Jew, was born Jan. 31, 1607, at Font-Couretou, Narbonne. In 1616 he joined his order, and intended to go as missionary to Canada. Being, however, denied this by his superiors, he devoted himself entirely to missionary work at home and in churches, chapels, hospitals, prisons, and, in fact, everywhere where he preached and exhorted. Regis died Jan. 11, 1640, and was canonized by Clement XI, June 16, 1737. Rehhoff, Johann Andreas, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Tondern, Aug. 24, 1809. He studied at Kiel and Berlin, was for some time archdeacon at his native place, and in 1837 provost and first pastor at Apenrade. In 1851 Rehoff was called to Hamburg as pastor principal of St. Michael. In 1870 he was senior of the Hamburg ministerium, resigning in 1873 his pastorate, and died at Kiel, Jan. 9, 1883. Reh Hoff published some homiletical works, for which see Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. s. v.; also Zum Gedächtniss an Dr. Johann A. Rehoff (Hamburg, 1888). See B. P.

Rekkoph, Johann Friedrich, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Aug. 17, 1758. He studied at the university of his native place, was in 1761 deacon at Zwickau, in 1766 archdeacon at Reichenbach, in 1769 doctor and professor of theology at Helm stadt, in 1778 superintendent at Dresden, and died March 15, 1789. He published, Vite Patriarchorum Alexandrinorum (Leipsic, 1757-59);—De Zwickauerius Litus terarum Orientalium Studio Claria (1763);—Jansus Hr breus Lingus Veteris Testamenti Olim Adornatus a Reiscng (1769);—De Trinitate (1770);—Michae et Mathai in Loco Natalli Messa Consenatus (1772);—De Vite Frederici Sacratissimi Philippi Augusti (1783);—Legatius Feciola ad Mediolani (1773);—De Persona Jesu Christi Scripturarum Nova Testamenti Expositio (1775), etc. See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, s. v. (B. P.)

Reichel, Gustav Theodor, a Moravian missionary, was born Dec. 15, 1868, at Bertholdshof, Saxony. In 1916 he married (in Pardubitz) Legatius Feciola of Mediolani, and in 1873, married the daughter of the executive board of the Unatras Fratrum. For nearly twenty-four years he devoted his entire energy to the service of his Church, and his rich experience was of great value to the executive board, whose presi dent he was from 1918 to 1928. (B. P.)

Reichhelm, Carl August Wilhelm, a Reformed theologian of Germany, was born Jan. 20, 1817, at Brom berg, and studied at Berlin, where he was assistant preacher at the cathedral for some time. In 1842 he was appointed military preacher at Frankfort-on-the- Oder, in 1849 superintendent at Belzig, in 1853 first preacher of the Reformed Church at Frankfort, and died Dec. 6, 1879, member of consistory. He published, Sinai, Predigten über das Pentateuch (Belzig, 1855);—Christus, die rechte Speise und der rechte Frakt (Frankfurt, 1857), sermons in the fourth and fifth chapters of John. See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. s. v. (B. P.)

Reichlin—Meidegg, Carl Alexander von, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born of Catholic parentage, at Gravenau, Bavaria, Feb. 21, 1804. For some time professor at the gymnasium, and afterwards at the University of Freiburg, he joined the evangelical Church, Feb. 19, 1830, and was in 1840 appointed professor at Heidelberg, and died in 1857. He was the author of: Die Theologie des Magier Menes, etc. (Frankfort, 1825):—Die Geschichte des Christentums, incompleta (Frelburg, 1881);—Die mosaische Geschichte vom brennenden Dornbusche (Erlzt, 1849).—Heinrich E. G. Paulus und seine Zeit (Stuttgart, 1858, 2 vols.), the best biography of the famous Heidelberg rationalist. See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 119, 548, 642. (B. Reid, James Seaton, D.D., an eminent minister at the Presbyterian Church in Ireland, was a native of Lurgan, and the only child of his parents. He was ordained minister of Donegon, July 20, 1819, from which place he removed to Carrickfergus in 1823. In 1827 he was unanimously chosen moderator of the Synod of Ulster, and in 1830 was appointed its clerk. In 1838 he was chosen professor of ecclesiastical history of the Belfast Institution. In April, 1841, he was nominated for the chair of ecclesiastical and civil history in the University of Glasgow, by the crown, which position he held until his death, March 26, 1851, in the fifty-third year of his age. He is the author of History of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland (3 vols. Edinburgh, 1830-33). Dr. Reid spent about twenty years in collecting materials for the work, and putting it into print. The first two volumes were published during his life. At his death he left, in MS., about seven chapters of the third volume. Dr. W. D. Kilner was chosen to finish the work which he did, and published the third and last volume in 1858. This work is a monument of historical research, and is valued not only for its ecclesiastical history, but also for reclaiming many civil facts which would otherwise have been lost.

Reid, Numa Fletcher, D.D., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born at Richfield, Virginia. Dr. Reid, was born in Rockingham County, N. C., July 8, 1825. He was a boy of remarkable and unyielding integrity and filial affection; was educated at Emory and Henry College; began school-teaching in his eighteenth year at Thompsonville; in 1846 opened an academy at Wentworth, where he labored with great success for five years. He was licensed to preach in 1847, and traveled Wentworth Circuit two years as supply, and in 1851 entered the North Carolina Conference. His fields of labor were: 1852-55, Tar River Circuit; 1854-55, Front Stanards, withdrawal; 1855-56, Raleigh Station; 1857, Greensboro Station; 1858-59, presiding elder of Salisbury District; 1860-63, of Greensboro' District; 1864-67, of Raleigh District; 1868-71, of Greensboro' District; and in 1872 was again sent to Raleigh District, but ill-health led him to exchange for work in Greensboro' District, where he died June 4, 1873. Dr. Reid was four times elected to the General Conference, and three times headed the list of delegates. In all the relations of life he was a model man. He was learned, logical, solicitous, and eminently successful. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1879, 1880, 1881, 1882.

Reid, Robert, a Scotch prelate, was born at Aiken head, and was educated at St. Salvador's College. He was first sub-dean, in 1536 was nominated abbot of Kinloss, and in 1540 was made bishop of Orkney. He

Reihing, JACOB, a Roman Catholic divine of Germany, was born in 1579 at Augsburg. He joined the Jesuits in Ingolstadt, taught theology and philosophy there, published an influential court-preacher to the apostate count-palatine, Wolfgang Wilhelm. In 1615 Reihing published at Cologne, Muri Civitatis Sanctae, etc., a kind of apology for his master's apostasy, which elicited rejoinders from the Lutheran theologians Baltsmaier and Matthias Hœf von Heugwig, and from the theologian Bammecourt. Reihing, not satisfied with this apology, commenced to Romanize the Palatinate. But the careful study of the Bible, which he found necessary in order to dispute with the Protestants, had its influence. In the beginning of the year 1621 Reihing suddenly fled to Stadttarg, and joined the Evangelical Church Nov. 28 of the same year. In 1622 he was made professor of theology at Tübingen, and died May 5, 1628. His writings are mostly polemical. See Oehler, in Mariott's Wahrn Protestantism, vol. iii, 1834; Flitt-Herzog, Real-Encyclop. s. v. (B. P.)

Reinmann, JACOB FRIDERICI, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Jan. 22, 1666. He studied at different universities, was in 1692 rector at Oeserwick, in 1693 at Halberstadt. In 1704 he was appointed pastor primarius at Emsleben, in the principality of Halberstadt, in 1714 cathedral preacher at Magdeburg, in 1717 superintendent of Saxony, at Dornburg, and died Jan. 1, 1748. See Reinmann was a voluminous writer. See Jöcher, Algemeines Gelehrten-Lexicon, s. v.; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. s. v. (B. P.)

Reinbold, a Scotch prelate, was a monk of Melrose when he was made bishop of the see of Ross in 1195. He died in 1198. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 185.

Reinbold, GEORG KARL VON, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born at Bamberg, Nov. 3, 1808. For some time tutor of the Bavarian royal family, he was in 1847 appointed dean of the chapter of the episcopal diocese München-Freiburg, and died at Munich, Dec. 28, 1892. He wrote, Die Sendung des Propheten Jonas nach Nimmer (Bamberg, 1836);—Abriss der christlichen Kirchengeschichte für Katholiken (1834);—Tempel der katholischen Anschauung (Ratisbon, 1841). (B. P.)

Reineccius, JACOB, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Salzwedel in 1751. He studied at Wittenberg, for some time pastor at Gernermünde, and in 1601 provost at Berlin. In 1600 he was called to Hamburg, and in 1611 was appointed inspector of the newly-founded gymnasia. Reineccius died in June, 1618. He wrote, Panoplia sine Armatura Theologiæ et Lawæ (Hamburg, 1609);—Articulæ Disputandi (ed.);—Clavis Sanctæ Theologiae (Hamburg, 1611, 2 vols.);—Vetustæ de Novi Testamenti Constituuntia et Differentiae (1612);—Calvinissorium Ordinatus, Carus et Eiusus (ed.). Reinmuth, J. F. D.D., a Lutheran minister, spent his boyhood and early manhood in Lancaster, O., to which place he removed with his parents when thirteen years old. After the usual course of classical studies, classical and scientific education was secured at Wittenberg College. Findlay was the scene of his first pastoral labor. From Findlay he went to Lancaster, from which, after a successful pastorate, he removed, in 1868, to Springfield, where he was employed as superintendent of public schools. In 1873 he received and accepted a call to Lebanon, Pa., Dr. Reinmuth was a member of the committee of the General Synod that revised the Hymnus und Tune Book. In the hope of restoring his failing health he went to Jacksonville, Fla., but never returned. He died April 26, 1880, at the Mission house, 1221 Oberlin, Oberlin, May 7, 1880. (B. P.)

Rekom is thought by Tristram (Bibl. Places, p. 122) to be the present village of aia Karus, about four miles west of Jerusalem.

Remeth is regarded by Tristram and Conder as the present er-Ramesh, five and a half miles north-west of Sebastia, "a conspicuous village on a hilly knoll above the small plain, with a high central house. It is of modern building, with olive-groves." "The sides of the hill are steep" (Memoirs to the Ordnance Survey, ii, 154).

Carter's ed.) that the thousand years were to be computed from the birth of Christ, and coupled with this reckoning was often expressed a belief in the literal resurrection of saints at that time, prior to the general resurrection. It is barely correct, therefore, to say that "those who lived next to the apostles and the whole church for three hundred years, understood these words in their literal sense" (Alford, Comment. ad loc.). Bishop Wordsworth affirms (Greek Test. with Notes, ad loc.) that the spiritual interpretation is "that which has been adopted by the best expositors of the Western and Eastern churches from the days of Augustine to those of bishop Andrews." A glance at the concensus given in such works as Poole's Synopsis Criticorum, and Wolff's Curis in N. T., at this place, will suffice to show the great discrepancy in the earlier interpreters on the subject, and that in Elicott's Horns Apocalypticas, ad loc., displays an equal divergence in modern times. Those who hold the literal view maintain (1) that this is the only plain meaning of the text, and (2) that it is sustained by several other passages which speak of a distinction of the righteous as raised first (especially 1 Thess. iv, 16). But these latter passages do not require, nor even admit, so long an interval between the resurrection of the saints and that of others, which, moreover, are elsewhere represented as substantially simultaneous (John v, 26, 29; Rev. xx, 13); indeed, almost everywhere (whether the language in the passage in dispute knows of but one future advent of our Lord, and that the final and universal one, at least at the figurative one at the destruction of Jerusalem. See ESCATOLOGY. Moreover, such a temporal and earthy reign of Christ as the literalists here require, is at variance with the whole spirit and economy of the Gospel; and we may add that the anticipations which such a theory engenders have been the bane of Chiliasm (q. v.), and the fosterer of fanaticism in all ages. See MILLENNIALISM. Finally, and conclusively, the passage in dispute itself is explicit in limiting the case to this case to the "souls" of the martyrs (not all saints), apparently meaning a revival of their devoted spirit, or, at most, their glorification (as in the case of the "two witnesses," Rev. xi, 11, 12); and not a word is said about a terrestrial reign, but only one "with them," i.e. in the celestial or spiritual sphere. The modern literature of the discussion is very copious, but quite sporadic, and no complete treatise has yet appeared on the subject. The best is that by David Brown, D.D., Christ's Second Coming (London. 1846, 1847, 1856).

RÉVÈS, ÉMMI, a Reformed theologian of Hungary, was born in 1826. He studied at Debrecin and Buda, and after spending some time for literary purposes in Belgium, Holland, Switzerland, and Germany, became pastor of two country congregations in succession, but in 1856 to 1858 was detained where he labored until his death, Feb. 18, 1881. His learning and character made him the leader in the Reformed Church of Hungary. When, on Sept. 1, 1859, the emperor of Austria issued the famous "Patent," which was the basis for an edict issued by the minister of public worship, the Protestants of Hungary felt grieved, for the object of the "Patent" and the edict was nothing less than a complete reorganization of the Reformed Church, involving the destruction of self-government and the transfers of ecclesiastical legislation to the civil authority. This attempt to destroy the Reformed Church of his inherent rights aroda the spirit of self-defense against the intrusion of the secular power, and Révész came forward with his A Protestantis Egyházalkotmány, etc., i. e. Fundamental Principles upon the Reformed Church Constitution according to the Statutes of the Lutheran, Congregations, Confessions, and Church Organizations (1856), which appeared as a reply to the order issued by the Austrian imperial cabinet. In this work he sets forth the views of the Reformers, especially Calvin, regarding the Church's inherent and indefeasible right of self-government, and delineates the organizations of the German, Swiss, French, and Scottish Reformed churches. His next production was Opinion Regarding the Chief Points of the Hungarian Protestant Church Constitution (1857). The Hungarian Reformed Church protested against the invasion of the secular power, and was joined to a national free synod. All who dared to speak publicly against the edict—and among these was Révész—were summoned before the civil courts, and some were even committed to prison. A great deputation of Protestants was sent (Jan. 25, 1860) to the emperor at Vienna, with a petition for the withdrawal of the "Patent" and the edict. The leading spirit in this movement was Révész. On May 15, 1860, the "Patent" was withdrawn, and amnesty was granted to all who were suffering for their opposition to the decrees. Another struggle began when the new constitution of 1868, the Hungarian parliament hurriedly passed the law for the secularization of the elementary schools. Révész, with his usual deep and wide insight, and true Protestant instincts, stood forth to criticize and assail the law on its dangerous side. With the view of enlightening and directing public opinion, as well as vindicating the right of the Protestant Church to manage her own schools, a right secured by constitutional law, he started a scientific monthly magazine in 1870, called the Magyar Protestanti Observer (Magyar Protestantes Folyóirat), a still brilliant organ reserved by Providence for the Observer in the field of polemics. The views of the German so-called "Protestant Union" found many advocates in Hungary among the professors of divinity and ministers. The "modern" or rationalistic tendency, begetting modern negations, and claiming unrestricted freedom in religion and doctrine, began to exercise its terrible influence in the professorial chairs, religious newspapers, and public meetings. After some preparatory skirmishes, the "Liberals" founded the Hungarian Protestant Union at Pesth, in October, 1871, declaring its chief aim to be "to renew the religious-moral life in the spirit of Jesus, and to harmonize it with universal culture." This Protestant Union denied revelation, the divinity of Christ, and highly extolled Unitarianism. But when it had reached its height Révész raised the banner of evangelicism, and every number of his monthly review was eagerly read in both camps. The chief work by him against the negative theology appeared in a separate form, A Magyar Osztagy Protestanti Egyletről, i. e. Concerning the Hungarian Protestant Union, a work reprinted from the Observer. It is an effective and conclusive defense of evangelical Protestantism. So severe was the attack on the so-called "new Reformers" that the rationalistic Unitarian Union soon lost its prestige, evangelical principles were re-adopted, and the famous association silently dissolved. Besides the texts already mentioned, Révész

he went to Mobile, in 1869 to Franklin, Tenn., and afterwords to Mason, till 1876. After this he labored as an evangelist, preaching to the poor and abased, in 1876. On the death of the Presbyterian Church, in 1861, he adhered to the Southern General Assembly. Dr. Rice had a knowledge wide and varied; his sermons were often of a very high order. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1873, p. 49.

Rice, Samuel D., D.D., a general superintendent of the Methodist Church in Canada, was born in Maine, in 1816. He studied for some time at Bowdoin College, and was converted in his seventeenth year. In 1837 he entered the itinerant ministry. With the exception of a year at the Sackville Wesleyan College, he spent six years in the city of St. John. From 1837 to 1867 he was treasurer and moral governor of Victoria College; from 1875 to 1880 stationed in the city of Hamilton; from 1867 to 1878 governor of the Wesleyan Ladies' College there; in 1878 and 1874 president of the conference; in 1899 appointed to Winnipeg, where he remained for three years as chairman of that district. In 1892 he was elected president of the Methodist Church of Canada; and at the first session of the General Conference of the United Methodist churches he was elected general superintendent. He died Dec. 11, 1884. Dr. Rice was a man of tall and commanding appearance. As a preacher he was dignified and firm, as a missionary, earnest and forceful; as a pastor and administrator his principle was "not to mend our rules, but keep them." He was a man of strong faith and lofty courage. See (Canada) Christian Guardian, December, 1883-1884.

Richard (4), a Scotch prelate, was made bishop of the Isles in 1252. He died in 1274. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 800.

Richard, archbishop of Canterbury, was by birth a Norman. Very little is known of his early life. When the primary education of Richard was finished he was received into the monastery of Christ Church, Canterbury, and his manner being noticed by archbishop Theobald, he was desired to become his chaplain. Richard's first preferment was to the place of prior, in the monastery of St. Martin, Dover, in 1140. He was consecrated to the see of Canterbury, April 7, 1174, at Anagni, and "a more amiable man than archbishop Richard never sat in the chair of Augustine." In 1176 he was sent to Normandy, to arrange a marriage between the princess Joanna and William, king of Sicily. Ten years after he was seized with a violent chill when making a journey to Rochester, and died while there, Feb. 10, 1184. See Hook, Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, ii, 506 sq.

Richards, John D., D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Farmington, Conn., May 14, 1797. He graduated at Yale College in 1821, at Andover Theological Seminary in 1824; was for a year agent for the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions; pastored in N. York, Va., from 1825 to 1831, associate editor of the Vermont Chronicle from 1831 to 1837, and pastor of the Church at Dartmouth College from 1841 until his death, at Hanover, N. H., March 29, 1859. "Dr. Richards was a comprehensive scholar, faithful to Christ, and heartily devoted to the best interests of mankind. No man ever questioned his learning, integrity, and piety." See Cong. Quarterly, 1859, p. 316.

Richardson, Elias Huntington, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Lebanon, N. H., Aug. 11, 1827. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1850, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1853; was ordained at Goffstown, May 16, 1854, and remained there two years, then was pastor at Dover until 1863; next of the Richmond Street Church, Providence, R. I., until 1867; of the First Church, Westfield, Mass., until 1872; of the Center Church, Hartford, Conn., until 1879, and finally of the Center Church, New Britain, until his death, June 30, 1883. See The Congregationalist, July 5, 1883. (J. C. S.)

Richardson, Merrill, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Holden, Mass., Oct. 4, 1811. He graduated from Middlebury College in 1835, then taught for two years in the Academy of Middlebury, and graduated at Andover Theological School in 1839. He was ordained at Terryville, Conn., Oct. 27, 1841, remaining there nearly five years. From 1847 to 1848 he was acting pastor at Durham, when he was reinstalled at Terryville. From this charge he was dismisses, Jan. 12, 1857. The same month he was installed pastor of the Salem Street Church, Worcester, Mass., and here he remained until September, 1870. The following November he assumed charge of the New England Church, New York city, from which he was dismissed in May, 1872. From June 12, 1878, he was in charge of the Church at Milford, Mass., until his death, Dec. 12, 1876. During 1876 and 1877 he was a member of the Connecticut School. See Cong. Quarterly, 1877, p. 423.

Richardson, Edward D., D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Middleborough, Mass., in 1877. He graduated from Brown University in 1878; studied theology under Rev. Dr. Gurney, of North Middleborough; was ordained pastor of the Church in Southborough, Dec. 6, 1792; dismissed, Jan. 15, 1817; installed at Dorchester, June 25 following; dismissed in 1838; then resided for several years in Braintree, and died in Boston, April 10, 1842. Dr. Richardson was a candid man, a close and acute reasoner, and was much respected as a minister and a neighbor. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ii, 417.

Richler, Karl, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born in 1804 at Warendorf. In 1828 he was director of the gymnasium at Rietberg, in 1828 professor at Paderborn, in 1837 director at Colm, in 1844 canon and professor at Pselin, in 1849 at Posen, in 1867 at Treves, and died Aug. 14, 1863, doctor of theology. See Catholic Encyclopedia, s. v.

Riddell, Mortimer S., D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at East Hamilton, N. Y., May 8, 1827. After pursuing secular business for several years, he studied at the Hamilton Institution, graduating in 1858, and was soon after ordained pastor in New Brunswick, N. J., where he remained as such for a number of years. His eight years' ministry was eminently successful. His labor, during a revival of remarkable power, broke down his health, and he was obliged to suspend his ministerial work. All his efforts to regain his wasted strength proved futile, and he died at Ottawa, Eau, Feb. 1, 1870. See Catholic Encyclopedia, s. v.

Ridley, Joseph James, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in North Carolina in 1810. He was confirmed in 1833; made deacon in 1843, and presbyter in 1844; became rector in Oxford, N.C., in 1858, and the following year in Clarksville, Tenn. While in this pariah he received the degree of M.D., after having been graduated course of study by the medical department in 1859, he removed to Knoxville, as president of East Tennessee University; the following year returned to Clarksville, as rector of Trinity Church; in 1866 was rector of St. Paul's Church, Louisville, N.C.; in 1867 of St. Thomas's Church, Somerville, Tenn.; about 1870 of Zion's Church, Brownsville, where he died, March 10, 1878.

Riederer, Johann Bartholomäus, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Nuremberg, March 8, 1720. He studied at Altdorf and Halle, was in 1744 afternoon preacher at Nuremberg, in 1745 preacher at Altdorf, in 1752 professor of 1738 doctor of theology, in 1789 archdeacon, and died Feb. 5, 1771. He wrote, De Genesio Sacer Jerem. xxxii. 8 (Altdorf, 1758) — De Pauli Propoundic inter Grandes Exempla Successus (1759), etc. See Dürr, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands s. v.; Winer, *Handbuch der theol. Ridgon, Sidney, a prominent Mormon leader, was born in St. Clair, Beaver Co., Pa., Feb. 19, 1738, and received a fair English education. He learned the printer's trade, and was working in an office in Pittsburgh when, about 1812, a manuscript was offered for publication by an eccentric preacher named Solomon Spaulding, who was emploved, The Map of America, etc., or, The Book of Mormon. Ridgon was so much interested in the work that he made a copy before it was returned to Spaulding, who died a short time after. About 1817 Ridgon became a Campbellite preacher, with an evident leaning towards Adventism. In 1829 he became acquainted with Joseph Smith, and was arraigned with him to have the Book of Mormon published, as the basis for a new sect. From this time he was closely identified with the Mormon movement, going with the few body, and suffering persecution with them. He was a cadet candidate for the leadership on the death of Smith, and on the election of Brigham Young refused to acknowledge his authority. Accordingly he was excommunicated, and returned to Pittsburgh. He afterwards lived in obscurity, and died at Friendship, N.Y., July 14, 1876. See Mormons.

Riggs, Stephen R., D.D., LL.D., a venerable Presbyterian missionary to the North American Indians, was born at Steubenville, O., March 22, 1812. He graduated from Jefferson College, and pursued his theological studies at Allegheny Seminary. He was ordained and commissioned as a missionary to the Dakota Indians in 1836. He commenced his labors at Lacouapari, where he made encouraging progress in teaching and converting the red men. He reduced the Dakota language to a written form, published text-books for spelling and reading, and translated the Bible. He also published a Dakota Dictionary. Upwards of fifty books and tracts of original writings and translations in connection with a history of Dakota, constitute the literary work of his life. In 1880 Dr. Riggs, Hon. W. E. Dodge, and Justice Strong of the United States Supreme Court, were appointed by Congress a committee by the General Assembly of the United States to present to Congress the case of securing to Indians the rights of white men. Dr. Riggs was the author of the memorial which was read to the Senate committee by Justice Strong. More than forty years of his life were spent among the Indians, and he lived to see six of the churches of Dakota transferred to the Board of Foreign Missions. He died at Beloit, Wis., Aug. 24, 1888. See Presbyterian Home Missionary, Sept. 1888; Neevin, Fresh. Encyclop. s. v. (W. P. S.)

Rinck, Friedrich Theodor, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born April 8, 1770, at Stave, Pomerania. He commenced his academic career in 1792 at Königsberg, was in 1800 professor of theology, in 1807 appointed as professor at Danzig, and died April 27, 1821, doctor of theology. He is the author of, De Lingua Germaniorum orientalium cum Graeco Miretum Concordantia (Königsberg, 1788); —-A rabisheskisches, myrisches, und chaldäisches Lexeb (col.); — Commentarii in Homeris et Virgilio Specimen (1789); — Neue Sammlung der Reisen nach den Orienten (1807). Ripley, Gnomon, L. D., a Unitarian divine and author, was born at Grantham, Mass., Nov. 5, 1832. He graduated from Harvard College in 1853, and from the Cambridge Divinity School in 1856; the following year became pastor of the Purchase Street Unitarian Church, Boston. After remaining a few years he resigned, and devoted himself exclusively to literary pursuits. In 1847 he became literary editor of the New York Tribune, and retained that position until his death, July 4, 1880. He published, Discourses on the Philosophy of Religion (1859): — Letters on the Latest Forms of Infidelity (1840): — Specimens of Foreign Standard Literature (1842). Among his greatest literary labors are, Appleton's New American Cyclopædia, which subsequently was revised and greatly enlarged. He was also editor of an Annual Cyclopædia, published by the same house. He translated Philosophical Essays, by M. Victor Cousin (Edin- burgh, 1867). He was in connection with R. W. Emerson, and S. M. Fuller, The Dial, and with C. A. Dana, Parke Godwin, and J. S. Dwight, The Harbinger. He contributed numerous articles to the Christian Examiner, and Putnam's and Harper's Magazines. See (N. Y.) Observer, July 8, 1880; Allibone, Bibl. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v. (W. P. S.)

Rist, Johann von, a German hymn-writer, was born March 8, 1607, at Pinneburg, Holstein, and died Aug. 31, 1667. He is the author of about six hundred and fifty-eight religious hymns and poems. Some are, indeed, of little value; but very many of them are really good, and some belong to the first rank. They were even read with delight among Roman Catholics, and an emperor once lamented 'that it were a great pity if the writer of such hymns should be sent to hell.' Rist was very much honored, and attained the highest titles in Church and State. A splendid monument, and the church he honored him in 1654 with the crown of poet-laureate and a patent of nobility. Quite a number of Rist's hymns have been translated into English, as "Auf, auf, ihr Reichslogenmen" (Lyra Germani, ii, 28): — "Wach auf, wach auf, du siehst bald dein Welt," (ibid. i, 6): — "Die Welt hast Satan eingebüßt" (ibid. i, 144): — "Folget mir, ruft uns das Leben" (ibid. i, 188): — "Wenn muter mein Ge- mütthe" (ibid. ii, 12): — "Ehr und Dank sei dir gesungen" (ibid. i, 203): — "O Traurigkeit, O Herzelein" (Christian Singer, p. 191): — "Werde Licht, du Volk der Hebräer," (ibid. p. 80): — "Gott sei auch Gerechtigkeit" (ibid. p. 192): — "O Ewigkeit der Donneron" (Jacobi, Paulinodica Germani, i, 97). Ritual of the Dead is the name given by Egyptologists to the oldest sacred book of the Egyptians. Portions of this book date from the time of king Gagamakham, a monarch of the third dynasty, the text itself being in many places accompanied by a gloss, which was added at a later period, to render it intelligible. The delites principally mentioned in it are Osiris, Anubis, Horus, and Tut; Amen Ra, as a distinct divinity, being only indirectly referred to. Although the mystical work is now treated as one book, it is really made up of a collection of not less than eighteen separate treatises, including three supplemental chapters and two litanies, which seem to have been added at different periods of the new empire. Selections from chapters and illustrations from the ritual abound on the walls of many of the tombs of the eighteenth and nine- teenth dynasties, and notably on that of Sethi-Mensheph I, in the Biban el-Moluk. Other chapters were used by bakers to defend their bakeries, and others of the religious worship of the Egyptians, and a few ob- scure passages as secret mysteries, the meaning of which is now lost. Many hundreds of papyri have been found in the mummy-cases, which contain different portions of the ritual, with their accompanying vignette and rubric, but a complete revision and comparison of all the existing texts have not yet been effected. The text of the ritual underwent no less than three different revisions, viz., in the ancient empire, in the period of the nineteenth dynasty, and in the reign of the Saitic kings. This last was the edition which is most com- monly met with, but there appears to have been an attempt at a partial re-edition in the Ptolomaic period. The chief divisions or books of which the Ritual of the Dead is composed are as follows:

2. The Egyptian Faith. — xvi-xvii
3. The Creation. — xxiv-xvii
4. The Protection of the Body in Hades. — xxvii-xliv
5. The Lily. — xxvii-xliv
7. The Protection of Osiris. — xli-xliv
8. The protecti...
Robert, Carl Wilhelm, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Cassel, March 21, 1740. He studied at Marburg and Göttingen, and was ordained in 1763. In 1769 he was second preacher and professor at Marburg, 1768 doctor of theology, and in 1771 member of consistory. In 1778 Robert resigned his theological position and commenced his career in the faculty of law. In 1779 he took the degree of doctor of law, in 1787 he was called to Cassel, and died April 5, 1855. He published, De Nomine ipso Bonum Regiam Christianam, etc. (Marburg, 1768); Encyclopaedia et Methodi Theologiae Hieros Originationis (1769); Ethico Christianum Compendium (1770); Canus Reali a Israei Isras Ceramica, etc. (1778). Robert, Chambert, archbishop of Canterbury, was by birth a German. He was abbot of Jumièges, a monastery on the Seine. He had been formerly a monk, and was made bishop of London in 1044. In 1051 he was translated to the see of Canterbury. In 1052 he was deposed, and retired to his monastery at Jumièges, where he died. See Hook, Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, i, 494 sq.

Robert, Joseph T. LL.D., a Baptist minister and educator, was born at Robertville, S. C., Nov. 28, 1807. He was baptized in October, 1822, and graduated from Brown University in 1826 with the highest honors of his class. During 1826 and 1828 he was a resident graduate and medical student, at Yale College, and in 1831 took his degree at the South Carolina Medical College. In 1832 he was licensed to preach by the Robertville Church, pursued his theological studies at the Furman (S. C.) Seminary, and was ordained pastor of the Robertville Church in 1834, where he remained until 1839, when he accepted a call to the pastorate of the Church at Covington, Ky. In 1841 he took charge of the Church at Lebanon. About 1848 he went to the First Church at Savannah, Ga.; in 1849 became pastor of the Church at Portsmouth, O.; in 1859 pastor of the Methodists and in 1864 professor of languages in the University of Virginia, succeeding E. D. White, and in 1876 president of the university. He returned to Georgia and was LL.D. at the University of Georgia. He died there, April 28, 1886.
ROBINSON 804 ROGERS

Georgia in October, 1870, and in July, 1871, became principal of the Augusta Institute. Subsequently this institution, established for the education of colored ministers, was removed to Atlanta, and in 1879 was incorporated with the Atlanta Baptist Seminary, under the presidency of Dr. Robert. He died March 5, 1884. See Bibl. Baptist Cyclop., p. 1006. (C. S.)

Robinson, Stuart, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Strabane, Ireland, Nov. 26, 1816. He received his preparatory education under Rev. James M. Brown, D.D., in Berkeley County, Va., and Rev. William H. Foote, D.D., at Romney; graduated at Amherst College, Mass., in 1836; was admitted to Union Theological Seminary in Virginia, and spent one year; then taught from 1837 to 1839; from 1839 to 1841 studied at Princeton Seminary, was licensed by Greenbrier Presbytery, Va., April 10, 1841; and was ordained by the same presbytery, Oct. 8, 1842, at Lewisburg (now in West Virginia), pastor of a Church at Kanawha Saline, from which he was released May 8, 1847; was installed pastor of the Church at Frankfort, Ky., by the Presbytery of West Lexington, June 18, 1852, and labored there until Sept. 2, 1852, removed to Baltimore, Md., and supplied the Fayette Street Church in 1852 and 1853; then organized the Central Presbyterian Church in the same city, and was installed its pastor May 10 of the latter year, and released Oct. 27, 1856, was professor of pastoral theology and Church government in Danville Theological Seminary, Ky., in 1857, and settled as pastor of the Second Church of Louisville from 1856 to 1881, at which time he was released on account of the failure of his health. He died in Louisville, Oct. 5, 1881. Dr. Robinson was a man of rare learning, and one of the finest expository preachers in the country. He wrote much and published much, but his principal productions are the two volumes, The Church of God, and Discourses on Redemption. See NecroL Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1882, p. 42.

Rochat, Auguste Louis Philipe, a Protestant theologian of Switzerland, was born July 17, 1799, at Cramier, Vaud. In 1812 he was ordained, and ordained as preacher at different places. In 1825 he founded an independent Church at Rolles, in which he labored till his death, March 7, 1847. Rochat wrote, Midisstions (1821)—La Nature, la Constitution et le but de l'Eglise du Christ (1822)—Choix des Plus Importants de la Parole de Dieu (1836)—Destinies Posthumres (1848). Rockwell, Joel, Eben, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Salisbury, Vt., May 4, 1816. In 1837 he graduated from Amherst College, and in 1840 from Union Theological Seminary, N. Y. The same year he became pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Valatie; in 1847 of the Hanover Street Church, Wilmington, Del.; in 1861 of the Central Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. After laboring constantly for eighteen years, he spent five months in Europe for the benefit of his health. During the war of the rebellion he served as a member of the Christian Commission. In 1866 he was one of the Edgewater Presbyterian Church, on Staten Island, where he continued until his death, July 29, 1892. Besides fulfilling the duties of an active pastor during all these years, he was a prolific writer, and contributed to a number of religious periodicals. See (N. Y.) Observer, Aug. 5, 1892, Evangelist, same date. (W. P. S.)

Rockwood, Elihu, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Chesterfield, N. H., May 9, 1778. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1802; taught an academy in Plymouth, Mass., two years; was tutor in Dartmouth College; while there studied theology, and in 1806 was appointed by the Londonderry Presbyteries. After preaching as an occasional supply in several places in Vermont and Massachusetts, he was ordained in Westboro', Oct. 28, 1808; was dismissed March 11, 1835; and finally was pastor in Swan's, N. H., from Nov. 16, 1836, until his death, June 19. See Hist. of Mendon Association, p. 164. (J. C. S.)

Roo, Charles Hill, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in Kings County, Ind., Jan. 6, 1800, his father being born and reared in the Established Church. Having become a Baptist, he entered, in 1822, Horton College, Eng., and on the completion of his studies became pastor of the Church in Middleton, Lancashire, not con- fining his labors to his own church, but preaching extensively in all the neighboring region. He acted as secretary of the Home Mission Society from 1834 to 1842, and then became pastor of the Church in Birmingham, where his labors were greatly blessed. He came to the United States in 1853, accepted a call to Belvidere, Ill., and during a part of the time of the civil war was chaplain of the 10th Illinois Volunteers. He visited England, and labored to promote the interests of the freedmen, and raised funds for educational purposes among them. After two years' pastorate at Wauke- she, Wis., and two years' service for the University of Chicago, he died at Belvidere, June 20, 1872. See Cath.-Baptist Cyclop., p. 1008. (J. C. S.) on the Whole Books of Judges (1615). Mr. Chester, in his John Rogers (1615), p. 298-344, disputes Calamy's oft-repeated assertion that this divine was a descendant of the martyr. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Rogers, a Scotch prelate, was witness to a charter dated March 4, 1528, at Rome. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 187.

Rogon, Louis, a Protestant theologian of France, was born at Lyons, Feb. 4, 1826. Having completed his studies, he was successively pastor at Vala (1850), Montpellier (1852), and Paris (1861). He died April 15, 1889, leaving Memoires, Vocabularia, Religion et Litterature, and Sergens (Paris, 1870). See Lichtenberger, Encyclo. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Rohrer, Franz, one of the best historical scholars of Switzerland, was born at Unterengstringen in 1822, and studied theology at the universities of Freiburg and Tubingen. He was ordained in 1856, and was for some time pastor of Kerna. His chief attention, however, was given to historical research, which his subsequent position as librarian at St. Gall enabled him to prosecute with greater freedom. After the death of Dr. Lütolf, he became president of the Historical Society of the Five Cantons and editor of the Geschichtsfreund. He was also one of the most active members of the Swiss Geschichtsforschende Gesellschaft, and undertook its continuation. His volume of travels appeared, under his care, bringing down the history to the peace of Austria with Lucerne and the Forest Cantons (1839-40). After serving as rector of the gymnasium at Alt-Eckendorf in 1862, he was called to the chair of Greek and later of Biblical exegesis at Lucerne, where he died, September 2, 1892. See Donald, Diet, gelehrter Theologen Deutslands, s. v. (where ninety titles of Roll's works are given). (B. P.)

Roll, Richard Heinrich, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Ums, Hesse, Nov. 2, 1888, and studied at Halle and Gottingen. In 1750, he became a clergyman by examination, and in the next year, July 1, at Heidelberg, he received his ordination as a pastor. He published, De Nummo Confraternitatis Oblationis (Ros- tock, 1707); -Bibliotheca Nobilium Theologorum Historico-Theologico-Critica (4 vols.); -De Sacris Philosopheorum Scripturis Graecae Polirurtiae (1708-1709); -De Objeto Psalmi Izce (1714); -De Paolo Apostolo Polychriste (1715); -Jobus Sophicius immenso Acce- satus (1719); -Lineamenta Theologiae Naturalis Sive Philosophicae (1720); -De Fide Centurionae Corporatae ad Mith., etc. (1790). Rollock, Peter, a Scotch prelate, was made titular bishop of Dunkeld by King James VI. He was one of the lords of the session, and accompanied the king to England in 1603. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 258.

Rood, Heman, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Jericho, Vt., Jan. 29, 1785. He graduated from Middlebury College in 1819, was preacher at Montpelier Academy for two years, and in 1822 tutor at Middlebury College. In 1825 he graduated from Andover Theological Seminary. In the next year, July 6, he became pastor at Gilmanton, N. H.; in April, 1820, at New Milford, Conn.; in September, 1885, professor of sacred literature at the Gilmanton Theological Seminary; and occupied that position until November, 1843. The next two years he was employed in teaching at Haverhill. From 1828 to 1833 he was acting pastor of Quechee, in Hartford, Vt., and from 1833 to 1844 served in the same relation at Hartland. From 1846 to 1878 he resided without charge at Hanover, N. H., and thereafter at Westfield, N. Y., until his death, June 8, 1892. See Cong. Yearb., 1892, p. 81.

Roover, a Scotch prelate, was bishop of Ross about the year 900, and is buried at St. Munchols, in the Isle of Man. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 296.

Rosecrans, Sylvester Horton, D.D., a Roman Catholic prelate, was born at Homer, O., Feb. 5, 1827. He entered Kenyon College, but on joining the Roman Catholic Church went to St. John's College, Fontham, N. Y., where he graduated with high honors in 1844. He studied five years in the College of the Propaganda at Rome, and was ordained priest in 1852. Returning to the United States, he became an assistant at the cathedral of Cincinnati, a position which he held for seven years, and in 1859 became professor of theology at Mt. St. Mary's Seminary and one of the writers of the Cincinnati Catholic Telegraph. In 1859 archbishop Purcell established a college in connection with the seminary for the education of Catholics, and Dr.

Rokeye, William, an Irish prelate, was a native of Rokeye, in Yorkshire, and a doctor of the canon law. He was a brother to Sir Richard Rokeye, lord treasurer of Ireland. He received his early education at Ruth- ram and finished at Oxford, where he was presented by the monks of Lewes, in 1487, to the rectory of Sandal, near Doncaster. At the close of the 15th century he was nominated to the vicarage of Halifax in York- shire; in 1498 was constituted lord chancellor of Ire- land, and afterwards advanced to the see of Meath, in 1507. On Feb. 5, 1511, he was translated by pope Julius II to the see of Dublin, the temporalities of which were annexed to his episcopal see in June following. In 1514 this prelate confirmed the establishment of a college of clerks, founded at Maynooth by Gerald, earl of Kildare, which was subsequently remodelled. In 1520 he was dispatched by the lord deputy and council to Waterford for the purpose of pacifying such discord and debates as existed between the earl of Desmond and Sir Piers Butler. Archbishop Rokeye died Nov. 29, 1521. See D'Alton, Memoirs of the Archbishops of Dublin, p. 178.
ROSEBAUM

ROSEBAUM was appointed president, which position he filled until the college was closed, March 25, 1862. He was made auxiliary bishop of Cincinnati in 1866, and when Columbus was erected into a diocese he was appointed its first bishop, the duties of which office he filled until his sudden death, Oct. 11, 1878. See (N.Y.) Catholic Annual, 1879, p. 91.

ROSEBAUM, JOHANN JOSEPH, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born in 1797. In 1825 he was professor of dogmatics in the clerical seminary at Frey, in 1842 pastor at Andernach, in 1862 member of the chapter at Frey, and died April 15, 1867, doctor of the divine law. He was one of the founders of the Zeitschrift für Theologie und Philosophie, published at Bonn, and printed in defence of Hermes and his philosophical system, Ueber Glauben (Trexes, 1883). (B.P.)

ROSENKRANS, JOHANN KARL FRIEDRICH, a Protestant theologian and philosopher of Germany, was born April 29, 1895, at Magdeburg. He studied at different universities, and commenced his academic career at Halle in 1828. In 1831 he was appointed professor, and was called to Königberg in 1833, where he died, June 14, 1879. In his philosophical system he was a follower of Hegel, and published, Der Zweifel am Glaubensrecht der Tolteken Impotentes (Halle, 1830).—Die Naturreligion (Jersbohn, 1831).—Encyclopaedie der theologischen Wissenschaften (Halle, edd.; 2d ed. 1843).—Kritik der Schlichtmacherschen Glaubenslehre (Konigberg, 1836).—Ueber Schelling und Hegel (1843).—Kritik der Philosop. ROSMINI (Serbelloni), ANTONIO, an Italian ecclesiastic and philosopher, was born at Roveredo, in the Tyrol, March 24, 1797. He studied at Padua, became a priest at the age of twenty-four, and in 1827 published his first treatise on philosophy, to which he had devoted himself early in youth. About the same time he formed the acquaintance of Manzoni, and the next year founded a new religious order, the "Instituto del Preti della Carità" (Brethren of Charity), visiting Rome in 1830 to obtain the sanction of the pope. In 1834 he returned to Roveredo as archdeacon, and in 1836 became abbot there, and founded a similar female order (Sisters of Providence). Meanwhile he continued his philosophical studies and publications, in consequence of the liberality of which he failed to secure the confirmation of his cardinalship (given him in 1848 by Pius IX), and some of his books were even put on the Index Expurgatorius. He died at Stresa, July 1, 1855. His writings fill thirty-five volumes. His Life has been written by Lockhart (1856) and Garelli (1861). For a notice of his career and philosophy see the Fortnightly Review, November, 1801, and July, 1802.

ROSS, ARTHUR, a Scotch prelate, was minister of the parish of Abernethy, and was educated at the University of St. Andrews. In 1665 he was pastor at Glasgow, where he continued until 1675. He was then promoted to the see of Argyle, whence he was transferred to that of Glasgow in 1675, and to that of Galloway the same year. But he was retranslated to the see of Glasgow Oct. 15, the same year, and thence advanced to the see of St. Andrews, Oct. 31, 1684, where he continued until the revolution in 1688, when he was deprived. He died June 13, 1704. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 43, 305, 382, 291.

Roumanie comprises 4,598,219 inhabitants belonging to the Greek Church, 115,420 to the Church of Rome, 8,903 to the Armenian Church, 7,790 to the Evangelical Church, 6,901 to the Jewish Church, and 3,668 to themselves Lipovianians. The Greek Church is the State Church, organized on strictly hierarchical principles. At the head of the clergy is the archbishop or metropolitan and primate of Roumania. The Orthodox Church in Roumania, as in Bucharest, and the archbishop of Moldavia, at Jassy. The lower clergy of the Church is performed by laymen, who are not under the jurisdiction of the bishop, but are paid by the state. The presbyters, who are the leaders of the church in the country, are elected by the people.

Rouen, France, a city on the Seine, has a population of 104,483. It is the capital of the department of Seine-Maritime, and is divided into two parts: the old town, or Vieux-Rouen, and the new town, or Quartier Saint-Jean. The city is noted for its beautiful cathedral, which is considered one of the finest in France. It is a popular tourist destination and has a rich history.

Rouper, Christian, was born in 1764 in Germany and died in 1835. He was a Lutheran theologian and wrote extensively on topics related to the church. His work, "Die Religionsgeschichte der Welt," was influential in the development of Protestant theology. He also wrote "Die Musikgeschichte der Welt," which explored the history of music and its relationship to religion.

Ruskin, John, was born on June 8, 1819, in England. He was a British writer and art critic, known for his influential work on aesthetics and social commentary. His most famous work is "The Seven Lamps of Architecture," published in 1849. Ruskin's ideas had a profound impact on Victorian society and continue to influence modern thought.

Rüdiger, Franz Joseph, a Roman Catholic priest of Austria, was born April 6, 1811, at Partenwein. In 1838 he was made bishop of Linz, and died Nov. 24, 1884. Rüdiger was one of those prelates who opposed all measures of the Austrian government which tended towards depriving the Church of any of her prerogatives. Rüdiger only knew one government, the supremacy of the Church. When the dogmas of the Immaculate Conception was proclaimed, he celebrated that event by building a splendid cathedral at Linz, and erecting monasteries throughout his diocese. (B. P.)

Rule (Heb. zar, נֹעֶשׁ, a line for measuring, as elsewhere rendered) is mentioned (Isa. xiv. 13) among the tools of the carpenter (בַּעַל כָּרָן, hearer of wood), the associated implements being the "line" (Heb. zar, נֹעֶשׁ, probably a graver), the "plumb" (Heb. חֵשָׁב, probably a chisel), and the "compass" (Heb. mechugah, נֹעֶשׁ, probably compasses). Rupp, Julius, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born in 1869. He belonged to the so-called Friends of Light (q. v.), and founded in 1846 the first free congregation. He died July 11, 1884, doctor of philosophy.

Rupp, Peter, a Benedictine Abbot, was born in 1760. He died in 1824. He was a noted scholar and author on the history of the Benedictine Order. His works include "The History of the Benedictine Order" and several other publications. See (N. Y.) Catholic Almanac, 1881, p. 106.

Russell, David, D.D., a Scotch Congregational minister, was born in Glasgow, Oct. 10, 1779. He studied literature and the classics privately, and theology at the University of St. Andrews. He was ordained in August, 1805, and was sent to Aberdeen, where he supplied the pulpit five months. He then removed to Montrose for nine months, but returned to Aberdeen, where he was ordained pastor in 1807. He went to Dundee in 1809, and became pastor of the Church then assembling in Sailor's Hall. In this charge he continued thirty-nine years, with great honor to all concerned. He died Sept. 28, 1848. Dr. Russell published, among other works, Letters, chiefly Practical and Consolatory: On the Old and New Covenant, etc. (Lon.) Year-Book, 1848, p. 257.

Russell, John, L.L.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Cavenhill, Vt., July 1, 1738. He graduated from Middlebury College in 1812, was converted just before entering upon his senior year, and soon after his graduation went to Georgia, where he was minister for a time. From 1819 to 1820 he was tutor in a private family in Missouri, and subsequently taught in St. Louis, Vandalia, Alton Seminary, and later in life was principal of Spring Hill Academy, in East Feliciana, La. On Feb. 9, 1832, he was licensed to preach by the Middlesex Church. He died Jan. 21, 1868. The last will of Russell wrote, as an advocate of temperance, "Vomous Worm: or, Worm of the Still To counteract Universalism he preached a number of discourses, which were afterwards published under the title of The Serpent Uncoiled. He was an accomplished linguist and an able scholar. See Minutes of Illinois Assemblies, 1863, p. 13. (J. C. S.)

Russell, Patrick, D.D., an Irish prelate, was promoted to the see of Dublin Aug. 2, 1688. In July, 1685, he held a provincial council at Dublin, in which it was ordained that any priest, celebrating a marriage without lawful canonical form, or the parish priest of the place, should be excommunicated, etc. The council further confirmed the decrees of those held in 1614 by Dr. Eugene Matthews and in 1640 by Dr. Fleming. In 1665 Dr. Russell assisted at a session of the Roman Catholic clergy, held in Dublin. He also presided at a diocesan synod, held there, June 10, 1686, in which it was decreed, in reference to the parochial clergy, every five years, "Christian doctrine and good courses." In 1688 he presided at a synod held in Dublin. On the downfall of the Stuart dynasty he fled to Paris. He returned to his native country and died at the close of the year 1692. See D'Alton, Memoirs of the Archbishops of Dublin, p. 446.

Rutledge, Francis Hough, D.D., a bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church, a native of South Carolina, and a son of chancellor Hugh Rutledge, graduated from Yale College in 1820, and was for some time rector of St. John's Parish, Tallahassee, Fla. He was consecrated bishop of Florida, Oct. 15, 1851, in St. Paul's Church, Augusta, Ga., and died at Tallahassee, Nov. 6, 1866, aged 61 years. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev., Jan. 1867, p. 646.

Rütz, Franz Georg Christoph, a Lutheran theologian, was born at Ratzeburg, Oct. 22, 1733. He studied at Rostock. In 1762 he was preacher of the Lutheran Church at Amsterdam, in 1764 was called to Breis, and in 1775 accepted a call to the Hague. Rütz died Dec. 31, 1802, leaving, Non Plantis Nobis Orthodoxia sine Pietate, nec Pietas sine Orthodoxia (Amsterdam, 1777) ; — Exercitiae und Britische Briefe (London, 1783). Ryan, George Frederick, D.D., a Welsh Congregational minister, was born at Abergevanny, Monmouthshire, in 1790. He joined the Church at the age of fourteen, began village preaching in his sixteenth year, was admitted to the Bethel College in 1813, and commenced his pastoral life at Brillington. After four years' labor in that place he removed to Stockport, where he ministered ten years, and then went to Dogley Lane Chapel, near Huddersfield. In 1828 he again returned to Brillington. He died at Dore, Aug. 19, 1865. His principal publication was entitled The Devil's Abode. He also, at various times, published sermons and pamphlets. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1866, p. 288.

Ryan, Henry, founder of the "Canadian Wesleyan Methodist Church" (so called), or Ryanites, was born of Irish parentage in Connecticut, April 22, 1775. Educated a Roman Catholic, while teaching school he heard the preaching of the Methodist preacher, John Dow, was converted, united with the Methodist, and was disowned by his parents. He taught school for six years after his conversion, preaching regularly, however, and introducing Methodism into a part of Warren County, N.Y. In 1800 he was received into the New York Conference. His circuits in the United States were Ver- gennes (large part of Vermont) and Plattsburg, N.Y. In 1805 Aubury sent him and William Case to reinforce the Methodist force in Canada. Firm to obstinacy, of indomitable perseverance and iron will, he had a courage that never quailed. In labors and sacrifices he was abundant. During the war of 1812 the oversight of the societies in Canada devolved upon him, and from 1815 to 1825 he continued to itinerate as a preaching elder, now on the Upper Canada District, then on the Lower Canada District. In 1827 he withdrew from the connection, in consequence of a difference of opinion on Church government. Shortly afterwards some of those who had espoused Ryan's cause organized the Canadian Wesleyan Methodist Church, making lay delegation its distinguishing feature. With this body Ryan united, and he was continued to be its president during the brief remainder of his earthly existence. He died in September, 1882. See Dr. T. Webster, in the National Repository, Sept. 1890; Stevens, Hist. of the Meth. Episcopal Church (see Index, vol. iv); Platter, Hist. of Methodist in Canada (Toronto, 1882), p. 254, 257-59.

Ryder, John, D.D., an Irish prelate, was created bishop of Killaloa in 1741; transferred to the see of Down and Connor in 1743, and to the archbishopric of Tuam in 1752. He died at Nice, Italy, Feb. 4, 1775, in the seventy-first year of his age. See (Lond.) Annual Register, 1775, p. 206.

Ryerson, Egberton, D.D., L.L.D., an eminent Canadian Methodist minister, was born in the Province of Ontario, Canada, in 1809. He united with the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1823. He received an early classical education preparatory to the study of law, but entered the Methodist College at Kitchener, where he preached his first sermon on Easter Sunday, 1825. In 1829 he became the first editor of the Christian Guardian; in 1842 was appointed the first president of Victoria College; and in 1845 was made superintendent of education for the Province of Upper Canada, an office he held for thirty years. On the union of the Wesleyan Methodists, the New Connectional, and the Eastern British Conference, he was elected first president of the Methodist Church in Canada. He visited Europe and the United States a number of times in the interests of Methodism and education, and was twice a representative of the British Conference and the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church of the United States. He died at Toronto, Feb. 19, 1882. Among his writings, aside from editorial work, may be mentioned his Manual of Agricultural Chemistry;—Compulsory Education:—The Clergy Reserve Question, etc.

Ryland, John, D.D., a learned English Baptist minister, was born at Warwick, Jan. 29, 1738. His father was a fine scholar and able minister, and taught his son Greek and Hebrew and Scripture history. He was baptized at fourteen, and began to preach in 1778, in and around Northampton, as his father's assistant; then as co-pastor, aiding his father in his academy, in which young men were trained for the ministry. In 1786 he was sole pastor at Northampton. In co-operation with Carey, Fuller, Sutcliffe, and others, he originated the Baptist Missionary Society, Oct. 2, 1792. He was one of the representatives to the Baptist College, Bristol, and pastor of the Broadmead Chapel in that city in 1794. In 1815 he became secretary of the Baptist Missionary Society. He died May 25, 1825. Dr. Ryland wrote, Memoirs of Robert Hall, of Drury; — A Condensed Statement of the Reasons which Induce the Baptists to Differ from Their Christian Brethren; — Sixth Sermons; and nearly a hundred Hymns, which appeared in magazines, signed "J. R. jun." These have been published in a neat volume by Daniel Sedgwick.

Sabai Version of the Scriptures. Sabai is spoken in several islands in Torres Strait, between Australia and Papua. The gospel of Mark was printed at Sydney in 1883 under the care of the Auxiliary of the British and Foreign Bible Society. The translation was made by a teacher, Elia, who had been fifteen years engaged on the work, and revised by the Rev. S. Macfarlane, of Murray Island. The gospel of Matthew has since then been added. Sadbe, Abraham Isaac, a Jewish writer of the 16th century, who was banished with thousands of Jews from Lisbon in 1499, is the author of a very extensive commentary on the Pentateuch, entitled The Bemile of Myrrh, מיל עפר, in which he largely avails himself of the zohar and other earlier cabalistic writings. The commentary was first published at Constantinople in 1514; then at Venice in 1523, 1546, 1566, and at Cracow in 1558. Pellican has translated this commentary into Latin, and the MS. of this version is in the Zurich library. See Firstly, Bibl. Jud. s. u., Ginsberg, Kabbalah, p. 128; Lindo, History of the Jews in Spain and Portugal, p. 266; Jocher, Allgemeines Geschlehrten-Lehrbuch, s. v. (B. L.)

Saddler, Isaac, F., D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Westmoreland County, Pa., Oct. 5, 1807. He was converted in 1809, licensed to preach in 1840, entered the Pittsburgh Conference in 1858, was superannuated in 1872, and assigned to the East Ohio Conference at its organization in 1874. He died sud-edly, March 2, 1882. See Minutes of Annual Confer-ce, 1882, p. 319.

Sa'df, an important, but comparatively modern town of Palestine, eight miles north-west of the sea of Galilee, famous especially as a medieval seat of Jewish learning. The following account of it is taken from Murray's Hand-book for Syria (p. 418). Further details may be found in the Memoirs accompanying the Ordinance Survey (i, 192, 246).
Safford lies on an isolated peak, which crowns the southern end of the mountain range. A deep glen sweeps round its northern and western sides, and a stream, issuing from the Passaic river, flows into the former a few miles to the south. Beyond these, on the north-east, north, and west, are higher hills, but on the south the view is open. The old village crowns the peak; the Jewish quarter of the town clings to the western side, considerably below the summit, the rows of houses, built like stairs, two and three stories high—one occupying the ridge to the south, and the other nestling in the valley. The population may be estimated at about four thousand, of whom one third are Jews and a very few families Christians.

"The only attraction of Safford is the splendid view it commands. This is best seen from the summit of the old village, where a large mound is surrounded by a ditch, within which was a wall. All is now a mass of ruins. Only a shattered fragment of one of their temples remains, and the lower town has survived the earthquake of 1827. Before that cattastrope it was not in the best repair, still, its afforded an accommodation to the new citizens; in a few months, it was utterly ruined, and many of its inhabitants were forced to bury beneath the fallen towers.

"Safford is first mentioned in the Volsung version of the book of Tobit (rather as Seafot in the Jerusalem Talmud; perhaps also the Mea of Josephus (War, II, 5, 1), it lies on the site of Bethmal, the book of Judith, but without evidence. The castle seems to have been finished under the Crusaders to guard their frontier against the invasions of the Saracens. It was garrisoned by the Knights Templars. Its defences, both natural and artificial, were so strong that it was occupied by the Saracens for weeks before he was able to capture it. After lying in ruins for many years it was re-occupied by the Turks in 1622 by order of Suleiman the Great, of 1580. But it only remained twenty years in the hands of the Christians, for, being hard pressed by the Turks, the citizens of Safford, non-Christians, were massed and were murdered to a man, the chief being slain alive by the barbarous Mohammedans. By 1630 the city was in ruins, being in possession of the Turks.

"We know not when the Jews first settled in Safford, or at what period they moved to the town of the rank of a holy city. There were no Jews in the place in the middle of the 12th century, when Benjamin of Tudela visited the country; and it was not, in fact, until four centuries later that the schools of Safford became celebrated. Then a prince called Elia, a famous soldier and Rabbi, was sent to Safford to maintain and extend the religious instruction. He became the chief rabbi of Safford and was acknowledged as the chief rabbi of the Hasidim. The 16th century was his golden age. In the 17th the learning and funds began to decline, and the earthquake of 1832 gave a deathblow to the Jewish cause. Printing-press, synagogue, schools, houses, and people were all involved in one common ruin."

Safford, Jefferson, Price, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, born at Zanesville, Ohio, Dec. 12, 1826. He graduated from the University of Ohio, at Athens, in 1843; taught at Dry Creek Academy, Covington, Ky.; and at Indianapolis Academy, Ind., for two years each; was professor of mathematics at Covington, in 1847 and 1848; next entered Princeton Seminary, N.J., where he was graduated in 1852; was then invited to the President of the Pennsylvania Academy, by the Philadelphia, April 8, 1851; taught mathematics at Richmond Academy, Richmond, Va., three years, supplying also, part of the time, the Church at Bethlehem, and was ordained by the Presbytery of West Lexington, at Frankfort, Ky., Feb. 9, 1853. His fields of labor were the Church at Frankfort, from 1855 to 1857; pastor of First Church, Piqua, O., from 1857 to 1862; First Church, New Albany, Ind., from 1862 to 1867, and district secretary of the Board of Missions for Ohio and Indiana from 1867 to 1870. He served as a captain in the Army during the Civil War, and has been a prominent citizen of the city since 1871. He was ordained to the Presbyterian ministry in 1856, at the same time supplying also Fairmount Church from 1870 to 1877, Rossville Church from 1871 to 1873, acting as president of Zanesville University in 1871 and 1872, supplying also Uniontown (O.) Church from 1871 to 1873, Kirkwood Church in 1871 and 1872, and Northrup Church from 1874 to 1875, Clearfield and West Carisle churches until his death, which occurred at Zanesville, July 10, 1881. Dr. Safford was also the accurate and efficient stenographer clerk of the Presbytery of Zanesville from 1873, and of the synod of Columbus from 1875 to 1880. See Neotrop. Report of Princeton Seminary, 1878, p. 49.

Salm, Peter, D.D., a Lutheran minister, graduated from Gettysburg Theological Seminary in 1831, and entered the ministry in 1832, the period of his service comprising forty-four years. He preached in both the German and English churches. He was a man of considerable size; was born in 1806, and reared in the old Dutch quarter of Zanesville, Ohio. His parents emigrated to America when he was seven years old, and settled in the village of Zanesville in 1819. Dr. Safford, at that time, was an itinerant preacher, and he was the first to give them a religious training. He was a man of great learning, and was known as a scholar and a preacher. He died March 14, 1872, at the age of sixty-six years. See Lutheran Observer, March 24, 1876.

Sacker, Alfred, a missionary to the "Dark Continent," was born in England, July 21, 1874. At the age of twenty-nine he was accepted by the Baptist Missionsary Society of the mission on the west coast of Africa. In 1845 Sacker settled at King Agaa's Town, the seat of a large tribe, on the left bank of the Camerons River, and about twenty miles from its mouth. With great difficulty he mastered the Duala language, spoken by the people among whom he lived. Early in November, 1849, he baptized the first convert, and in the afternoon of the day a church was formed, consisting of the missionary and his wife, the native helpers, and the Duala convert. Mr. Sacker translated the Bible into the Du-ala language, and died at Victoria, March 15, 1880, having spent thirty-four years in it, and at the age of seventy.

Salim. Lieut. Conder (Tom Work, i, 92) advocates the position of this place at Salim, four miles east of Nubbi, urging the abundance of water there, and the presence of a village, Ainimi (Emon), seven and a half miles to the north-east; and Tristram (Bible Places, p. 192) likewise accepts this situation for similar reasons, adding that it is close to the old main lines of road from Jerusalem to Galilee. "The hard-springs are found in an open valley surrounded by desolate and shapeless hills. The water gushes out over a stony bed, and flows rapidly down in a fine stream surrounded by bushes of oleander; the supply is perpetual, and the continual succursals of little springcourses over the bed of the valley, so that the current becomes the principal western affluent of Jordan south of the Vale of Jesreel. The valley is open in most parts of its course, and we find the two requisites for the scene of baptism of a multitude—an open space and abundant water." (Conder). Salim itself is described in the Memoirs accompanying the Ordinance Survey (ii, 220) as "a small village, resembling the rest, but evidently ancient, hav-
Salvation Army, The. This new religious organization is, in some of its agencies and operations, suggestive of the reformation under Luther and of religious awakening under the Wesleys. Each of these great movements was so startling in its character that it commanded wide-spread attention, and excited opposition and envy on every hand. Their enemies declared that the work would soon come to nothing, and that such inflammable material would soon burst itself out. These disparaging predictions have not been fulfilled with regard to the former two efforts, nor are they likely to be realized in the case of the Salvation Army. Not designed for any merely human agrandissement, not antagonistic to any orthodoxy, it is a movement full of evangelical zeal, with a burning desire in the heart of one Christian minister to "rescue the perishing" in London. It was the privilege of the writer to hear William Booth, the general and founder of the Salvation Army, preach the gospel in a prison when he was only twenty years old, and to be an intimate personal acquaintance of his from that time to the present.

L. Origin of the Movement.—1. William Booth was born in the town of Nottingham in the year 1829. His parents belonged to the Church of England, but at the age of nineteen he began to attend the meetings of the Wesleyan Methodists, then and now a large and influential body in the town. Their services had in them more life and energy than he found in the Established Church, and having experienced a change of heart in these services, these communications were naturally centred where he had derived so much good; hence, through young years, he began to attend mission and open-air services and cottage-meetings among the poor in the neglected parts of the town. He soon became an exhorter, and related at the meetings his own happy experience, persuading others to seek salvation. During the daytime he was employed at the miscellaneous store of a pawnbroker, and there he became practically acquainted with the wants, privations, and sufferings of the poor. His natural quickness of observation and his retentive memory were used by him to advantage. In the evenings and on Sundays, while a mere youth, he began to preach short, earnest sermons, in the open air, in all weathers, inviting sinners to Christ. In 1846, when only seventeen, he was accepted as a local preacher, became zealous and useful, and his labors were much owned of God. He was then a mere stripling, tall, with long, flowing black hair, a piercing eye, and an edge of fire. Before he was twenty he was urged to enter the Methodist ministry, but in addition to his want of theological training, the doctors told him that one year of the clerical work, to which he was occasionally called, would probably exhaust the energies he had; and as he was not physically strong, he waited for a time to see if his health improved. In the meanwhile he was wholly engaged, partly in London and partly in Lincolnshire, as an evangelist, a work in which he took special delight.

At the age of twenty-four he was accepted as a minister on trial in the Methodist New Connection, and placed for a time under the care of the Rev. William Cooke, D.D., for theological training. Shortly afterwards, in 1854, their society at Guernsey invited him to raise their cause, then in a low condition, and at the same time improve his own health in their mild and genial atmosphere. At the first Sunday service he held there thirty persons were converted, and within a month three hundred were added to the church membership. He had preached in London, but the novelty of his success quickly spread through the Connection, and he was soon afterwards sent to ten cities, to hold special services for a week or two in each. The conference that year sent him out as an evangelist, the results of which may be judged by the returns from a few places: at Hanley, Staffordshire, 400 conversions; at Newport, one week, 290; at Sheffield, in four weeks, over 400; at Chester, several hundred. Fifteen of these converts are known to have become ordained ministers of the gospel.

2. Jealousy among a few senior preachers, who could not command such success, obliged him to settle down in the man's life, his name was a great deal on the Gateshead-on-Tyne, where, by his labors, the membership was trebled. He was next sent to Newcastle, with the same result, having in the meantime married Catharine Munford, daughter of Mr. J. Munford, a good London Methodist; and his young wife worked earnestly and laboriously with him. In piety, zeal, and devotion, and ability, he took part with the late Mrs. Phoebe Palmer, of New York, as one of the specially called and gifted of God to do a great work for him in the world and in the church. Seeing how God was working by Mr. Booth among classes of people seldom reached by the ordinary minister, and feeling the burden of souls pressing upon him, he made a most earnest appeal to the Liverpool Conference of 1861 to again appoint him as an evangelist; and his appeal, worthy of Dr. Coke or George Whitefield, was supported for a while by an equally earnest appeal made by Mrs. Booth from the gallery of the chapel. Some of the older preachers were shocked by a woman addressing the conference, and she was silenced. The conference made a great mistake in not accepting Mr. Booth's services as an evangelist, but the doors opened ought to have been doubled in ten years; instead of which, after the lapse of a quarter of a century, their membership is less to-day than it was then, and does not number thirty thousand after the lapse of nearly ninety years. Mr. Booth resigned his connection with the body, and resolved to wait the openings of Providence; without employment, home, or income, he and his devoted wife looked alone to God for guidance, and it soon came.

Visiting Cornwall, he found many earnest Methodists in hearty sympathy with the yearnings of his heart. Many of them are laboring hard in preaching and holding revival services both on the Sabbath and on week days. In this way they spent two years as missionaries, in various localities, for three or four weeks each. Fishermen and tin miners came to their services by thousands, whole neighborhoods were stirred all round, the claims of religion became paramount, and men by scores left their work to seek divine mercy. The knowledge of these gracious outpourings of the Holy Spirit spread throughout the country. One chapel was kept open from daylight in the morning till midnight for a whole week. The result of such manifestations awakened general interest in the country, and invitations for the services of Mr. and Mrs. Booth reached them from all parts of England and Wales. These occupied them both for two years more, and in June, 1865, they came to London.

Provisionally they were directed to the East End, a locality where, within the limits of half a mile, eighteen thousand persons, men and women, were counted entering drinking-saloons on one Sunday. There, on a heap of refuse, Mr. Booth commenced the work which has developed into the Christian Saloon known to the world over. A small pocket Bible and hymn-book were in his only weapons. In 1888 Mrs. Booth, in writing of herself and Mr. Booth in 1886, remarks: "He left a happy and prosperous ministerial career, gave up all that is commonly regarded as valuable in life, came out without any human encouragement or guarantees, and devoted himself to labor among the neglected masses, with no thought beyond that of a local work in the east of London. We surrendered home, income, every friend we had in the world, save my parents [whom they nourished in old age], with four little children under five years old, to trust only in God. During the ten years following, we were groping our way out of the conventionalism in which we had been trained, and often reluctantly following the pillar of cloud by which God was leading us. We tried committees, conferences, and all sorts of governments, showing how far we were wrong till the grand military idea was revealed to us."

Not much consideration was required to convince Mr. Booth that in East London there was labor for a man's life, his name was a great deal on the streets, and having his sympathies strongly drawn towards the dense mass of godless people in the streets day and night, he gave up invitations to labor in the provinces to devote himself fully to the teeming population of Whitechapel and its surroundings. In ten or fifteen minutes he would gather a congregation of thousands of people, to whom he preached daily the plain gospel in the old-fashioned manner. He was a Methodist to the backbone, and in all his addresses he taught and enforced the necessity of repentance, faith, and holiness. God wonderfully owned the work he presented; its effects had been witnessed in Cornwall and other parts, and it was soon found that conversive followed the preaching in London. As there was no place in which to gather the people, Mr. John Eaton, an old Methodist, lent Mr. Booth a preaching tent which he had long used on London Fields. Crowds gathered there, many were saved, and for these soon began to be useful in their own localities, each one asking himself, after he had found Jesus,

"What shall I do to make it known What Thou for all mankind hast done?"

Mr. Booth prepared a cheap hymn-book, which was sold freely at all the meetings, and thousands were bought and read by the new converts. These, one after another, began to speak of the blessings they had received, and their testimony deepened and intensified the general interest in the services; so that the companions of these poor men, now made rich by faith, began to think there was something in the preaching which had completely changed very bad persons, and made them lovers of home, of God, and of their fellow-creatures. The storms of autumn scattered the tent in which they found shelter, but there were wages going on in the open air. As winter approached, shelter was required, and one of the lowest of the many drinking-saloons, a very den of infamy, was secured, and converted into a mission hall and book-store, for the sale of hymns, tracts, and such literature as would be suitable to young converts brought up in utter ignorance of religion. Next a large dancing-saloon was taken and used in the same way. Both these places were soon filled by eager listeners, services being held on the ground-floor and the first-floor simultaneously, the stairs and passages crowded at nearly every service by the neglected poor, who saw in these agencies and ministrations the promise of salvation out of sin, misery, and poverty. Believing in the advantages of labor, and in the truth of Mr. Wesley's adage, "All at work and always at work," Mr. Booth found employment for many of the converts in extending the mission, and it was soon manifest that they were gradually rising in the moral and social scale. Converts increased, people by thousands attended the exercises, and in less than a year Mr. Booth hired a large theatre for services on Sunday, which proved attractive to the outcast. Crowds gathered there, young and old, most of whom had lived like heathens, and in knowledge of God for many years for his laws. Drunkards became sober, swearers began to pray, those who had lived by stealing stole no more, scores of old and forgotten debts were paid, multitudes of women were rescued from ruin, and appeals now came to Mr. Booth to open new missions in Soho, Green, Limehouse, Poplar, Canning Town, Croydon, Norwood, and other places; in these localities the applicants were directed to procure a room, and speakers were sent to hold services. It is amusing to survey, at this time, the variety of spots used for the new efforts, many of which the writer personally visited at the time—a club-room, a cellar, a shed, a railway arch, behind a pigeon-shop, an old factory, a schoolroom, a cottage—so eager were the poor people to get the gospel preached to them. They had not been accustomed to churches or chapels; they knew little about the Bible, and parsions they thought their greatest enemies. They belonged to the refuse of mankind—navvies, sailors, gypsies, infidels, scoundrels, drunkards, thieves, dog-fanciers, pigeon-keepers; men, women, and children, the roughest, wildest, most ignorant and degraded met together, and on them the full power of the gospel was manifested in their conversion and after-life. Persons from all these classes stood forth and openly declared what the grace of God had done for them, then appealing to their old companions in sin as to the truth of their testimony.

While Mr. Booth was thus evangelizing the masses, his wife was engaged in holding meetings in many of the largest halls and most aristocratic centres in the kingdom. At Hastings, Margate, Brighton, and many other places, crowds of the middle and upper classes attended her services, and numbers, whose interest and sympathy were enlisted, became friends and helpers in the establishment of missions for the working classes on the plans already described. The motto of Mrs. Booth's life seemed to be, "I must be about my Father's business." While thus occupied in public work, her family was not neglected; for she tells us that every hour which was not spent in public work was sacredly devoted to her children, who were mainly educated at home, and trained on the principles laid down in a book entitled The Training of Children, recently written by her husband. How completely this task was accomplished is manifest from the fact that all their children were converted early in life, and all who are old enough are doing useful and important labor in the Salvation Army. The work spread faster than Mr. Booth's family could keep pace with it, and their converts carried the holy fire with them into their homes; and thus began fresh missions at Old Ford, Stoke Newington, Shoreditch, Tottenham, Mill Wall, and other parts in and around London, progress being reported monthly in a new periodical which bore the title of Christian Mission Magazine.

3. In 1870 a great impulse was given to the movement, when Mr. Booth purchased a pile of rough, strong buildings in Whitechapel, London, which had been used as "a people's market," but having been a commercial failure, was now obtained at a reasonable cost, and fitted up as a hall to hold two thousand people, with numerous separate rooms, soon occupied as offices, class-rooms, a book-room, and a kitchen. All these were put to active use, and there the new converts found a hearty welcome at the daily services, and a fresh converting the and in that building many have been saved from every kind of misery, and even from self-destruction, as despair seized upon them. The daily services were well attended, and on Sunday three or four services were regularly held, at which both Mr. and Mrs. Booth labored continuously and earnestly. At length his health gave way, and a long rest was needed; but God raised up ready helpers, much prayer was offered up, and, on his recovery, a fresh campaign was started, in 1873, large additions being made to the membership, and officers were sent into new districts to rescue the perishing. In 1874 a new mission was opened at Hammersmith, and others were begun in towns far away from London, operating with the same results as those in the metropolis.

In the provinces some remarkable conversions took place of persons who had been notorious sinners, and they soon became as noted in spreading the news of salvation.

These converts were chiefly uneducated people, but were easily led by those who had been helpful to them, and it became necessary to issue suggestions for their guidance. The following five points were accordingly distributed: 1. To hold meetings out of doors, and to march singing through the streets in harmony with law and order; 2. To visit public-houses, gin-palaces, prisons, private houses, and to pray with anyone who can be got at; 3. To hold meetings in theatres, music-halls, saloons, and other common resorts of those who prefer pleasure to God, and services in any place where hearers can be gathered, especially such as would not enter ordinary places of worship; 4. To use the most popular song-tunes, and the language of every-day life, to convey a knowledge of God to every one in novel and striking way; and 5. To make careful investigations for Christ, both in public and private. The White-chapel headquarters soon became a centre of great influence, which reached far beyond London, and the deaths of two of the officers there proved to be a blessing to the cause, as they were the authors of the well-known words of the Rev. Charles Wesley, "God borrows his workmen, but carries on his work." In six months nine valiant officers came forth to supply the places of those who had died. Quietly, but like a deep and mighty river, the work was spreading through the provinces, and the army of the Lord was making such rapid growth that the foundation had become necessary, with more efficient organization.

4. After mature consideration, in the spring of 1878, the entire mission was remodelled as a military organization, with the title "The Salvation Army," and the writer was present, by invitation of Mr. Booth, at the first meeting, but under the new designation, as the organiser was called "General Booth." The reason given by him for the change was that his adherents were really an army of salvation. "The name," said he, "is preferable, because the only reason for which the organization exists being war against sin, common sense requires that it shall be framed after that pattern which mankind, in all ages, has found to be the most effective, and the only one possible for an army." The novelty of the new designation at once attracted the notice of the press, some to approve, others to oppose; but the object was gained. The mission at once rose from comparative obscurity and weakness to one of strength, and in a few months thirty new stations were opened, most of which have had prosperity. By the end of a year the new openings were increased to eighty, and the number of officers (evangelists) increased from thirty to one hundred and twenty-seven. Thus the leisure-loving Christians saw a spectacle which takes its rank among the marvels of the age, an army "strong in the Lord and in the power of his might." When the army was formed, in 1878, it numbered 29 corps and 32 officers; in 1882 it was increased to 331 corps and 760 officers; in 1883, to 531 corps and 2,500 officers, with a total registered membership in June, 1888, of 90,000 in Great Britain and Ireland.

II. Organization, Characteristics, etc. — 1. As the plan of organization is the same as that employed in the army in the United States, it will be described by the words of General Booth himself, who says, "Our organization makes every soldier in some degree an officer, charged with the responsibility of so many of his townsmen, and expected to carry on the war against the locality where he resides. Every corps is mapped to a portion of the country, and every village is placed under the care of a sergeant until a corps be established in it under commissioned officers. England is divided into 18,000 districts, each all the command of a major, whose duty it is to direct and inspect the operations of every corps therein; he has to see to the extension of the war, and the calling out of new officers, and to the removal of others unfit for their position. Each corps is under the command of a captain, assisted by one or two lieutenants, who are entirely employed in and supported by the army, their duty being to conduct services out-doors and in-doors, to visit those enlisted, and to plan and work for the salvation of the whole population around. Captains and lieutenants are removed every six months, and no one is settling into old ruts, and to prevent their forming too strong attachments to either persons or places. We have tens of thousands of soldiers who are ready at a word to leave all and go out to rescue the souls of others, and who give no submitting to the leadership of either men or women placed over them, for Christ's sake. Experience has taught us that real soldiers care little who leads or how they march, so that there is victory. We have never enjoyed such an unbroken peace and harmony as we have had since it was thoroughly understood that a captain is under the division under his major, and the whole army under its general, with no hope of successful agitation against superior authority. It is a great object with us to avoid using our system of government so as to limit spirit, liberty, or hamper any officer with awkward restrictions, who is seeking the accomplishment of his great mission." In 1883 the army had 509 centres of operation in England, 85 in Scotland, 17 in Ireland, and, at the last account, one each in France, Switzerland, Sweden, United States, Canada, India, South Africa, South America, New South Wales, Queensland, and New Zealand—a remarkable development as the result of five years' work.

2. Shortly before the army was organized, it was found that property, valued at many thousand pounds, was owned by Mr. Booth's mission, and in order to leave no doubt of its security for the objects for which it had been acquired or built, a deed was drawn up, and enrolled in chancery, Aug. 7, 1875, which declares that the property belongs, first, to William Booth, second, to his son, William Bramwell Booth, and at the death of the latter, whole or in part, to the women in trust, for the use of the army so long as it may exist; and the solicitors to the army hold in their possession the deeds, and a complete schedule of all property standing in the name of William Booth, which is increasing rapidly every year.

The finances of the army are derived from various sources. From the first, all who attended the services were taught the duty and privilege of giving in support of the work, and the majority of the corps have long been self-supporting. In 1864 the members of the army contributed among themselves more than $500,000 to carry on the work, and this in addition to subscriptions and donations from the general public, and the sales of their various newspapers and publications. The total revenue for 1884 was $1,350,000, made up as follows: Central, or office funds, $675,253; local funds, $675,000; foreign funds, $21,500; donations from religious bodies, $10,000. All denominations contribute to this result, and the accounts are under the supervision and yearly audit of regular charitably accountants in London. The net profits on the sale of books, newspapers, medals, and other intra-army productions amounted in 1884 to $24,000. Out of these results the salaries of the officers were paid, including also general Booth and his family. During the time (about twelve years) previous to the formation of the army, and for several years afterwards, a benevolent Christian gentleman, member of parliament for Nottingham (Mr. Booth's birthplace), afterwards for Bristol, generously provided for the wants of Mr. Booth and his family, and this was continued until the book profits were sufficient for the purpose, without trenching on the general funds. These profits are Mr. Booth's own private property, and as general editor he might claim them, but, instead, he maintains the official staff from that source of revenue.

3. Having to organize mostly by means of uneducated persons, the work has been slow and uphill. The officers are drawn from the ranks; those who prove the best soldiers are recommended by their captains to headquarters, inspected and reported on by the major, and if then able to answer (to the satisfaction of the general himself) a lengthy series of questions, they are placed in the training-barracks at Clapton. There, a few weeks of hard work would set them true to their qualifications; and even if they are trained in combating every branch of the service, carefully drilled, and taught the simplest way of conveying the truths of the Bible to the people. Some have to be taught the elements of arithmetic, reading, writing, and arithmetic; but the training is not so much scholastic as spiritual, the great necessity pressed upon every one being that of holiness of heart and life. Those who prove unfit for officers are sent back to the ranks; the care in selecting cadets is such that this necessity does not often fall upon the captain, for few persons who do not give up homes or positions more comfortable, from a worldly point of view, than the one they come to, so that self-seeking persons are seldom found in the army. The training lasts from six to twelve weeks; then the cadet is sent as lieutenant to some captain in the field. Neither captain nor lieutenant has often many shillings in pocket when commencing the work in a new place, whether city or village. Constant dependence on God for the supply of all needs is a lesson often learned amidst hard surroundings. So rapid is the complete and successful growth of the army, that it is not often one of much privation. For a few years mob-violence was his chief hardship, but as the army becomes better known and understood by the authorities, and their non-resistant disposition discovered by all classes, the officers are also given their whole strength to the service. Each officer is expected to conduct from twenty to twenty-five meetings weekly, extending over thirty to thirty-five hours; to spend eighteen hours in visiting from house to house, and to spare no possible effort in seeking the good of souls. The amount of this work is by a single set of accounts, in 1884, one shilling weekly, by a woman-captain fifteen shillings, and by a married captain twenty-seven shillings, with one shilling per week per child, so that drones are seldom found in the Salvation Army. A negligent or unsuccessful officer is dropped after eighteen months trial, and is left without an appointment. The frequent removals check all selfish sentiment, and thus the officers, by experience, become examples of self-sacrifice for the salvation of the world.

The uniform worn by the army consists of a plain simple dark-blue dress, trimmed with a neat red braid, and marked with the letter S on the collar: the S on the general's garments is marked in gold. It is found to be useful, attracts attention, gives opportunity for conversation, gathers people at the open-air demonstrations, excites respect in the rougher class of the people, indicates a man who respects an organized army, and is a safety-guard against the fashions of the age. The military form of government, affirms Mr. Booth, in his Book of Instructions, contradicts no form of government laid down or practiced in the New Testament, and is in perfect harmony with the only answer to the universal appeal, the Cross of Good Test, and cannot therefore be said to be unscriptural.

4. The doctrines taught in the army are Armenian, such as Mr. Booth learned to love and preach when he was a Methodist minister. In describing this matter, he says, "We have not a particle of sympathy with those who desire to let down or adapt the gospel of Christ to the fancy of the 19th century. The gospel which tells a man that he is thoroughly bad, and under the power of the devil; which draws out the hidden things of iniquity to the light of the judgment throne; which denounces sin without mercy, and warns men of eternal wrath to come unless they repent and believe in the only Saviour; the gospel of a crucified Saviour, who shed real blood to save men from real guilt, real danger, a real hell, and who lives again to give a real pardon to the really penitent—a real deliverance from the guilt, power, pollution, and fact of sin to all who really give up to him a whole heart, and trust him with a perfect faith—such is the gospel of the Salvation Army. We heartily believe the three creeds of the Church, we believe every word of the commination service, and we denounce the wrath of God against sinners as those who believe that all these things are true. We teach men to expect salvation from the guilt of sin the moment they turn from sin to God, and trust him to receive and pardon them. We teach that God is able and willing perfectly to purge the heart from all its evil tendencies and desires, the moment the soul trusts him for it all: we urge the people not to rest until God has thus cleansed the thoughts of their hearts by his Holy Spirit; and we assure them that God will preserve them blameless, and cause them everywhere to triumph, so long as they fully trust and obey him. We teach that sin is sin, whoever commits it, and that there cannot be sin without the divine displeasure; that there is a real, constant, and perfect deliverance from sin provided by Jesus Christ, which all men are responsible either for accepting or rejecting. We teach that all saved men and women ought to lay down their lives for the salvation of others, if required; that being followers of Christ means sacrificing all our own interests, enjoyments, and possessions to save a rebel world, and that whoever does not so bear the cross has no right to expect the crown.

6. Printing has been a great factor in the progress and success of the army. From the commencement of the mission in East London Mr. Booth has had strong faith in the power of the press. A cheap and good hymn-book was one of his first requisites, and his first collection, sold at one penny, was often enlarged and added to, until it has become one of the best penny hymn-books in use, and hundreds of thousands have been sold of it. He then began a penny monthly magazine, called The East London Evangelist, which was followed by another, with the title Christian Workers Magazine. Both these were too slow in their oper-

"Christ Church" or "Jesus College." The carrying of colors, using bands of music, processions, and other sensational methods are justified because other methods have failed to influence the masses. Striking handbills are used as the only means likely to influence drunkards, gamblers, thieves, and neglecters of salvation. The words "Blood and Fire," used on the banners and in their literature, refer to the blood of the Atonement by which men are saved, and fire means the Holy Spirit, who sanctifies, energizes, and comforts all true soldiers of God.

All the. troops are taught and encouraged to speak immediately after their conversion, just to tell what the Lord has done for them; it commits them to a life of uselessness in his service before all their old companions, kindred, and friends. God blesses them in so doing, it makes them happy and useful, and has been the means of saving scores from becoming backsliders, by returning to their old ways.

The employment of women to speak and preach has been objected to by some, but it is justified by various passages in the New Testament. Beyond these, the fact that the salvation army has preached to the people and Miss Booth have in a very high degree—and preach most effectively, is evidence that the gift should be exercised. Philip the Evangelist had four daughters who were preachers. For ten years and more Mrs. and Miss Booth, and scores of other female members of the army, have continued to go about preaching to all classes of people, without any evil consequences following: on the contrary, hundreds of people, rich and poor, have been saved under their ministrations. The army does not recruit its ranks by drawing members from any church, it openly avows its objection to accept members belonging to any existing Church; but churches of most denominations have voluntarily contributed to its funds, especially the Church of England and the Methodists, who best understand its operations and designs. Many of the army converts go to join other churches, and it is known that more than four hundred persons, converted and trained in its ranks, were, in 1885, employed by different religious organizations as ministers, evangelists, missionaries, colporteurs, Bible women, and in other like agencies. Great care is taken of the health of the soldiers in the army, and when unable to attend to the duties of their station they are sent to a House of Rest, which was many years the home of general Booth and his family, and there they remain till recovered strength justifies their return to duty.

III. Strength and success of the army, especially in Great Britain and the colonies, has commanded the attention and consideration of persons in all classes of society. On June 30, 1882, queen Victoria intimated her personal disposition towards the army in a letter to Mrs. Booth, from which the following is an extract: "Madam, I am commanded by the queen to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 27th inst., and to assure you that her majesty has much satisfaction that you have, with other members of your society, been successful in your efforts in winning many thousands to the ways of temperance, virtue, and religion. About the same time the bishops in conversation spoke most favorably of the army, and they unanimously passed a resolution "for a committee of their lordships to inquire into the workings of the army, to see what advice they could give to their prebendaries in dealing with them." The archbishop of York and the bishop of Bedford, among others, have gathered large companies of the army and administered the Lord's Supper to them in their churches. The great Congress Hall in London is the school for the army. There about one hundred and fifty soldiers are constantly under training in various departments; some have to learn the mere elements of knowledge, and the elements of theology are not forgotten. To many of the cadets the interior of a church or chapel was a place of mystery before their conversion. The army is now so thoroughly a part of the public mind, that it is at times impossible to escape; it is like the Christian Gospels, which have been impressed on the minds of unprejudiced persons, that it has become a most important factor in raising fallen and degraded humanity in nearly all lands. As described by general Booth himself, "The end and design of the Salvation Army is to spread throughout the entire world, and to last as long as God has enemies to be fought with and overcome!"

Samaria. The archaeology of Sebastia is given in detail in the Memoirs accompanying the Ordinance Survey (ii, 211 seq.), and the topography somewhat (p. 180). See also Conder, Tent Work, i, 88 sq.

Sanctius, Caspar, a Jesuit, was born in 1554, and died Nov. 16, 1628, professor of theology at Madrid. He is the author of De Quaestor Libros Regum et De Dvoua Paralipomenorum Commentariv (Antwerp, 1624; Lyons, 1625); Commentariv in Libros Ruth, Esther, Nehem., Tob., Judith, Estheru et Maccabearum (Lyons, 1628); Commentariv in Acta Apostolorum. Sandbüchler, Alois, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born Feb. 20, 1751. In 1770 he joined the Augustinians at Salzburg, was in 1780 professor of the Oriental languages, and biblical exegesis, and was made regent there, and died Feb. 3, 1820, doctor of theology. He published, Darstellung der Regeln einer allgemeinen Auslegungskunst von dem Buchen des Alten und Neuen Testaments nach John (Salzburg, 1833); Kurze Darstellung einer Einleitung in die Bücher des Alten Testaments, nach John (Goellnitz, 1832); Aeneas in den hebräischen und griechischen Grundtexte dem Wortinne nach richtig zu verstehen (1791); Vertheidigung der Göttlichkeit des jüdischen Gesetzes und der Alten Bundes (1787-88, 4 parts); Ueber die Zuverlässigkeit des Grund-Sandby, Bernhard von (1), a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Oct. 4, 1766, at Insterburg. He studied at different universities, was in 1664 preacher at Königsberg, in 1674 professor, and in 1675 doctor of theology. In 1690 Sanden was made general superintendent, and died April 19, 1703. He published, Theologiae Symbolicae Lutharianae:—Disseratio de Gen. xlix. de Propheta Promisso:—De Verba Dei et Pericuri Mut. xlii. 19:—Pentas Illustrium Quaternionis Theologorum. See Jocher, Allemaghen Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Sanden, Bernhard von (2), son of the preceding, was born at Königsberg, May 4, 1666. He studied at different universities, was in 1695 professor of theology at the university of his native place, in 1709 first court-preacher, and died Jan. 22, 1721, doctor of theology. See Jocher, Allemaghen Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Sarf, Miles, D.D., a Baptist minister, a native of Connecticut, was, for a time, a Methodist, then became a Baptist, and was pastor of the First Baptist Church in Chicago, Ill.; subsequently an editor in Detroit, Mich., from which place he removed to East Boston, Mass., then to Gloucester, and at length to North Adams, Mass., where he was a chaplain of a Western Massachusetts regiment to active service in the late war. Next he was for a short period financial secretary of the American Bible Union, and then became pastor of the First Church in Salem, N. J., where he remained about two years. He died at Salem, Oct. 31, 1874. See Cyclop. of Methodism, p. 161. (J. C. S.)

Sarf, Peter F., D.D., a Methodist bishop and missionary, was born at Lodi, N. J., Feb. 28, 1781. He was religiously inclined from childhood, converted at the age of eighteen, and in 1807 entered the Philadelphia Conference. In 1810 he was transferred to the New York Conference, and in it continued laborious till his death, Oct. 14, 1857. De Sarf was a thorough divine, an able scholar, and an eminent, honest, and devout man. From 1810 to 1852 he was elected a delegate to every general conference. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1857, p. 321; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Sanger, Ralph, D.D., a Unitarian minister, son of Rev. Zeeliaiah Sanger, D.D., was born in Duxbury, Mass., June 22, 1766. He graduated from Harvard College in 1806; then, after spending three years in the study of theology under his father, he was appointed tutor at Cambridge; was ordained pastor of the church at Dedham, Oct. 16, 1812, and continued there until his death, May 6, 1860. See Necrology of Harvard College, p. 305. (J. C. S.)

Sanguline Version of the Scriptures. This language is used in the Sangur Islands, the inhabitants of which amount to about 80,000 souls, 10,000 of whom have been baptized, but have recently been blesséd with a translation of the New Testament. From the report of the British and Foreign Bible Society for 1878, we learn that the Rev. Mr. Kelling, who has been laboring twenty years on the island of Tagulandang, where he has formed a church, has completed the New Testament, and is giving it a final revision. This translation was published at London, in the Siamo dialect which, in 1882, the Rev. W. E. King, of Tilbury, having read the proofs. Encouraged by the good reception which the New Testament had received at the hands of the natives, the committee of the British and Foreign Bible Society agreed, in 1884, to print an edition of the Psalms, the translation having also been made by the Rev. Mr. Kelling. (B. P.)

Sanke, Christopher, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Dec. 19, 1700, at Guben, Lower Lusatia. He entered the university of Breslau, Oct. 4, 1722. He wrote, Diss. Philol. de Anatomia Fasculi Votivi Roman, i. 3 (Leipsic, 1729):—Volupthiges Anwurimg zu den Accidenten der Hoed (1740):—De Differenta Inter Vocationem ac Testamentationem circa Mens Ecclesiasticum (1749). Saphir. The probable representative of this place is thus described in the Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey (ii, 418): "Three mud villages of the same name as Sudair exist close together, the søke of the nearest being the Squeak in the district of Askham, given as property to the bishop of Beverley, A.D. 1160 (William of Tyre). The most ancient of the sites of these hamlets is that of Sudair, which is situated on the north-western side of theAskham (spelt northerly of the three), where there are ruined cerniers of old habitation. There are small gardens and wells at each village."

Saphir, Jacob, a Jewish traveller, was born in 1800, and died at Jerusalem, June 22, 1885. He visited Egypt, Arabia, India, and Australia; the results of his researches he published in "MED. ii 238 (1864, 1874, 3 vols). This work is of great historical and ethnographical value. For the Hebrew codex which Saphir brought from Arabia and sold to the public library at Paris in 1886, see SHAPIRA MANUSCRIPT. (B. P.)

Sarid. Lient. Cordier suggests (Memorials to the Ordnance Survey, ii, 49) that the original name may have been Sodaid ("for 7", as in the Sept., and in that case the place may be represented by the modern Tdl Soudud, three and a half miles south-west of Nazareth, consisting of a "good-sized artificial mound, with five springs beneath on the south") (ibid. p. 70).

Sartorius, Christoph Friedrich, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Oct. 22, 1701. He studied at Tübingen, was vicar at Ludwigsburg in 1727, at Stuttgart in 1728, and in 1729 preacher at Heilbronn. In 1747 he went again to Ludwigsburg, was called to Tübingen in 1755, and took the degree of doctor of theology in 1766. He died Dec. 2, 1768. Sartorius published, Meditationes ad Psal. 111 de Solvitur ex Zione (Tübingen, 1732):—Positiones Generales de Libro Generacionis (1734):—De Historia Filiis De Generacione Altera ex Psal. ii, 7 Adserita (1738):—De Sacramente in Gener, (1736):—De Baptismo (1736):—De Sacra Cena (ed.):—De Leger Ceremoniis (1762):—Vindiciae Canis Contrauerunt (1785):—Diss. Satisfactional View of the Atonement. The vicarious sufferings of Jesus Christ upon the cross are often represented by theologians as mainly intended to appease the divine wrath by offering a satisfaction for humankind. That this, however, is evident, not only from the character of God himself, who is no Shylock demanding his “pound of flesh,” and is infinitely anxious to be reconciled to the sinner, but it is clear likewise from the fact that no adequate quid pro quo was either attempted or achieved in this regard. The virtue and obedience and holiness of Jesus did not in the slightest degree lessen, palliate, or modify the crimes, the sins, and the transgressions of man, nor are they ever represented as any apology or excuse for these. They accept the merit of the pure as a counterpoise of the demerit of the impure, in the same reasonable equivalent, much less to condone the fault of the offending by the suffering of the innocent. Such a satisfaction is opposed to the plain teaching of the parable of the prodigal son, in which no reparation, but merely a promise of pardon is attempted or spoken of on the part of the wanderer. Nor does this conflict with Paul’s doctrine of the release from the claims of the law (Rom. v. 11), for he everywhere represents this from a Judaic or human point of view, and especially insists that these obligations are cancelled for the past and fulfilled for the future simply by a subjective conformity to the will of God (Rom. x. 4, xiii. 10). It is, in fact, the sinner himself who is ultimately and practically called upon to be satisfied with this arrangement, and upon his acceptance of the substitute the whole efficacy of the scheme is finally made to depend. God needs no such inducement, but man does, and this is not so much outside parties as the offending individual himself. It is the sinner’s conscience that demands a satisfaction, and this he can find only in Christ. See VICARIOUS SUFFERING.

SAUL, John, D.D., an Irish Methodist preacher, was born at Dromore, County Down, in July, 1795. He was brought up in the Established Church, converted in 1818, and joined the Methodists to exercise his gift for preaching. He entered as a student of the Irish Conference in 1828, and for forty-two years employed his talents to the glory of God and the good of man. He was some years treasurer of the Children’s Fund, became a supernumerary in 1868, and removed to England. He was for fifty years a diligent student of the Bible in the original languages. He was a happy, pious, and useful minister, and died near Manchester, Oct. 11, 1878. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1879, p. 43.

SAUL, Alessandro, an Italian Barnabite, was born at Milan in 1585. He studied at Pavia and Milan with such success that he knew the “Summa” of Aquinas almost by heart. In 1567 Sauli was made superior of his order, in 1570 bishop of Aleria, in 1591 bishop of Pavia, after having refused the archbishopric of Genoa. He died in 1592. Benedict XIV beatified him in 1741. SAUNDERS, Ephraim Dodd, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born near Mendham, N. J., Sept. 30, 1809. After graduating at Yale College in 1828, he remained in New Haven for several months for the purpose of theological study. In the autumn of 1828 he went to Virginia, where he spent a year in teaching and study. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of East Hanover, in session at Nottoway, Oct. 18, 1833. After four years of pastoral work, during which time he collected money to build two churches, he opened a school for boys in Cumberland County, which he removed to Greensboro, Pa. In 1848 he became professor of New Testament of the Classical Institute at Petersburg, Va., and held this position for four years. In 1848 he visited Europe, and on his return established a Church in Pottsville, Pa. In 1851 he removed to West Philadelphia, and founded a school for girls, which was afterwards removed to Collegeville, Pa. During the late war a military department was established, the pupils being styled the “Courtland Saunders Cadets,” in honor of the founder’s only child, who was killed in battle, in September, 1862. Dr. Saunders was made chairman of the Bounty Fund Commission of Philadelphia. In 1871 he offered to give his real estate in West Philadelphia to the Presbyterian Alliance for the purpose of founding a hospital. He also obtained subscriptions to the amount of one hundred thousand dollars towards the endowment of the hospital. He died in West Philadelphia, Sept. 18, 1872. See Obituary Record of Yale College, 1872.

Sayres, Gilbert D., D.D., a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, a native of New Jersey, died at Jamaica, L. I. (where he had formerly been for many years rector), April 27, 1867, aged eighty years. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. July, 1867, p. 395.

Scamblair, Edward D., an English Protestant Distorant and bishop, was born in 1512, and educated at the University of Cambridge. In the reign of queen Mary he was pastor of the first Protestant congregation in London, but went abroad during the Marian persecution, returned in the early days of Elizabeth’s reign, and was chaplain to archbishop Parker, consecrated bishop of Peterborough in 1560, translated to Norwich in 1584. He conducted himself with wisdom and moderation, was a learned man, but zealous against the papists. He encouraged religious meetings among the clergy, but the queen suppressed them because Puritans were admitted. He died May 7, 1597, and was interred in Norwich Cathedral. See Wilson, Dissertation Churches, 4.

Scepticism, Recent Phases of. Scepticism is primarily nothing more than an inquiring state of mind, with provisional suspension of positive conclusions. It soon comes to mean denial, or repudiation of what transcends human observation and inference therefrom, in matters necessarily of faith. See SCPEETICISM in vol. i. IX. It is in the latter signification that it will now be treated, either in its characteristic features or in its development.

Every age has its own philosophical tendencies, recurring under modified fashions, with the change of antecedents and surroundings. Thus, old scepticism reappears with altered face, moving always in a vicious circle. Every philosophy is the imperfect expression of the faintly perceived and feebly understood manifestations of the universe, and of their supposed significance. Each has its own scheme for the interpretation of the mysteries with which "we are girt about," either recognising or excluding the supernatural. Scepticism, therefore, varies with the ages, in degree, in method, and in spirit. In the higher sort of history, and unbelief too of revealed or natural religion, which is unbelief in all the foundations of knowledge, assumed so many varying forms and shadows of form as in the present day. Much, very much, of recent thought and speculation is corroded by the borrowing virus of the diseased and monstrous. It is difficult to employ familiar phrases and current modes of argument without being involved and entangled, unaware, in some of the ramifications of the pervading infection. All men are creatures of their age and of the intellectual atmosphere encompassing them. The mind is moulded, and its developments and products are shaped or colored, by the influences which it habitually endures. Hence it becomes a difficult task, but urgent in proportion to its difficulty, to examine the modes of aberration, and to detect the fallacies in widely accepted systems of error. Of these, indeed, the thought of thought, which is nothing but a system of ideational limitations, to distinguish the manifold varieties of recent scepticism, to trace the melting hues by which they blind almost insensibly into each other, and to discriminate the multitudinous variations and degrees of disproportion in the diversity of philosophical sects. No more can be safely or profitably attempted than to note the most accepted types of sceptical speculation in this declining century. All might be included under the single head of Rationalism (q.v.), but this term has a more restricted meaning in theological terminology. All proceed from the negation or exclusion of everything in the intelligible universe beyond the grasp of the observing and reasoning faculties.

The species of scepticism which will be estimated here are those which assail, extrude, or undermine religious truth—which reject knowledge or authority, superior to such as may be compressed into the narrow domain of scientific or demonstrative processes. Of these there appear to be six leading classes, the appreciation of which will afford guidance for the criticism of the intermediate or affiliated varieties of incredulity. They are: 1. Naturism; 2. Naturalism; 3. Phenomenism; 4. Phenomenism; 5. Pessimism; 6. Naturalism, which last approaches to Neo-Buddhism. These several schemes have been exhibited in more or less developed proportions since human inquiry gained atmosphere. With a more logical exposition, to present an adequate answer to the torturing questions, Whence come man and the universe? How are they sustained? What are their meaning, their purpose, and their destiny? What are their relations to the source of their being, of their maintenance, and of their order? The manner in which these enigmas have been answered has continually suffered change with the extension of human knowledge and the consciousness of previous failure. The latest transmutations now attract our regard. Of the six classes, into which the chief recent theories of a sceptic tendency have been divided, two have been especially considered in the articles specially devoted to them. These are, Materialism and Pessimism (q.v. severally). They require no further notice than may be incident to their relations to other theories.

Before proceeding to the examination of the remaining forms, it may be judicious to indicate the fundamental delusion which underlies and vitiates all schemes of scepticism, using the designation in the restricted sense of unbelief in the transnatural. All knowledge of things included within the observation of physical perception is obviously and necessarily limited by the range of the several senses. The calorific, the astatic, and the chemical rays of light are invisible; yet they are probably more important and more operative in the economy of nature than the color-rays, with their endless service and infinite variety of beauty. There are sounds too loud for the human ear to distinguish, too slight for human hearing; notes that are discord to some races and musical to others; odors too faint or evanescent for man's olfactories to detect; tastes too delicate or too oppressive for the tongue of man to discriminate; things too diminutive or too disgusting. Assuredly there are stars beyond the reach of the telescope, organisms too minute for microscopic vision. These facts are recognised by observation and reflection, aided by artificial concomitants. They prove the senses cannot attain to the appreciation of a variety of unperceivable for human intellect. Intellectual comprehension is limited by its constitution, in like manner, in regard to things intelligible. This is in consonance with the physical or material creation. The conclusion is the same in the one case as in the other. It is only transferred from the senses to the mind, and adapted to a new sphere. It is identical, also, with the irrefragable axiom or postulate that the finite can neither intellectually grasp nor logically deny what lies beyond its comprehension. But it may and must recognise it, or else renounce all validity of effort. Every form of dogmatic scepticism vanishes out, therefore, with a fatal and utterly irrational assumption.

On any scheme of philosophy the office of the human race on earth is to improve its habitation, its conditions, its understanding, its power. From the perspective of a realistic philosophy, the enlargement of its knowledge and the expansion of its capacities. The fullfilment of this destiny or the achievement of this result would be impossible, and, indeed, inconceivable, if the limits of the unknown did not always spread around, and if humanity were not always led on and guided by an imperfect apprehension, a confident intuition, a persistent assurance of further enlargement of its acquisitions. It is the very law of its existence, of the possible sustenance of its increasing numbers, that, as Roger Bacon said, the recognition of the unknown and still unknowable advances more rapidly than the increase of the known. "Quae secl, paucus sunt et vilia respectu eorum quae non intelligis sed credit, et longe pauciora respectu eorum quae ignoras." This is only an illustration of the law which renders fallacious all knowledge dwarfed to the compass of the reasonings of man.

There is another line of procedure—a purely logical argument—which arrives at the same result. Every conclusion must rest on accepted premises. These premises, whether as previous conclusions, or as interpretations of the objects which are dealt with, in order to arrive at a determinate conclusion, depend upon more remote premises. Ultimately a point must be reached beyond which it is impossible for analysis to go. Yet the first principles reposed on surer conviction than any inferences that may be drawn from them. The sphere beyond the utmost range of systematic rationalisation is not the darkness of the unapproachable, but the realm of the partially unknown, yet inevitably believed. Throughout, the invisible, the incomprehensible, the unattainable, must be received as existent and operative, or all knowledge and all fact will be nothing. Nothing but the idea has been created. This is only the development of the profound and sagacious observation of Aristotle, that whoever demands a reason for ultimate principles takes away all possibility of reasoning. The necessary inference from these truths, which are only diverse aspects of the same truth, is that the whole order of existence, physical and intellectual—the whole procedure of valid reasoning on any subject—requires the constant admission of influences, causes, powers, purposes, and governance beyond the possible limits of formal and systematized knowledge, beyond the grasp of the intellect. In any scheme of philosophy which pretends to include all being, and all appreciation of being, within the brief tentacles of human apprehension, is not merely incomplete and fallacious, but absurd.
With this preliminary exposition of the fundamental conditions of thought, the artful sophistry involved in all forms of dogmatic scepticism, and cunningly disguised or ignored in the recent phases of philosophical unbelief, becomes manifest. The countless forms of scepticism lie between the antagonistic extremes of materialism and idealism. These extremes are not necessarily sceptical, but in their development they tend to sceptical issues. Milton and Berkeley were fervent in their religious convictions. Of course, as materialism and idealism are the opposing poles of speculation, every scheme for the exposition of being and its interpretation must approximate more closely to the one or to the other. All may be included in the two. But such absorption of divergent currents of thought tends only to confusion. It will explain, however, the impossibility of separating discordant systems by sharp lines of discrimination. They are variously compounded, and coalesce with each other in various modes and in varying proportions. The failure, then, to maintain sharp distinctions will be due to the nature of the subject divided, not to the error of the division.

I. Of method. As buried delusion, as has been remarked, has already been amply discussed. Naturalism is an extensive species of it, which requires special notice. There is, indeed, one subdivision of naturalism which is the purest idealism, when all nature, concrete and operative, is resolved into the divinity, and this again is dissolved into abstract spirit. This opinion has been entertained in all varieties of pantheism. In its current philosophical acceptation, however, naturalism signifies the interpretation of the facts, functions, and developments of existence by the forces and changes of physical realities. It sees nothing beyond. It denies higher causation. It imprisons itself within the domain of the sensible, and affirms that this is the sole and adequate exposition of all things. The voluntary captive, in his self-constructed dungeon, affirms that there is neither sun nor sunlight without. The unreasonableableness of the conclusions and of the philosophy erected upon them is shown by the preliminary considerations which have been presented.

It should be remarked that, in these fashions of scepticism, the supposed conclusion is always the staving-point of the doctrine. That which is to be proved is assumed. The philosophy is invented and manipulated for the support of the thesis. Great acuteness and ingenuity, greater self-delusion, and the confidence of wilful ignorance, are shown in the elaborate artifices of the fall but often imposing structure. Every fact of natural history has been further analyzed, and if the analysis be conducted to its utmost limit—inevitably leads "from nature up to nature's God." The same thing is true of every intellectual or emotional experience, which gives facts of another order. Understanding the spontaneous revelation of the transnatural through the forms of the natural does not rest upon the same kind of evidence, or generate the same species of conviction as are characteristic of scientific conclusions. But they come clothed with a former and more impressive certainty. This is no novel doctrine, for Aristotle and Aquinas said, "The dubitation which occurs in regard to articles of faith arises from no uncertainty of the thing, but from the weakness of the human mind. Nevertheless, a minimum of knowledge of the highest things is more to be desired than the most certain knowledge of things little in comparison." Such testimony may be rejected with scorn, as the utterance of a schoolman, a metaphysician, and a theologian. But the Angelic Doctor makes his avowal on the authority of Aristotle, who should be safe from the petty censure of our recent science. His remark is (De Part. Aristotelis, i. b.), "If it be but little of these things that we apprehend, that little, on account of the preciousness of such knowledge, is more acceptable than all within our grasp." Old error should not, on account of its attempted rehabilitation, object to cogent refutation because it, too, is ancient.

II. Evolutionism is the most prominent and the most controlling type of naturalism in our age, the credit and the parentage of which are usually assigned to Darwin, though its most elaborate and systematic development has been sought in the trifling, though always admirable treatises of Spencer. The foundations and the main walls of the building are distinctively Darwin's. To him is due the patient, persistent industry by which the materials have been quarried, chiseled into shape, and adapted to their place in the bewildering edifice: But the plan and the purpose of the philosophy may be found in the notes to the prosaic poems and in the prose romances of his grandfather. Nor is the elder Darwin to be considered as the original inventor of the system. Many critics have shown that the whole essence of the speculation and its line of argument were the teachings of Lucretius. The Roman poet proved, in his own case, his maxim, "Ex nihilno nihil fit," and borrowed his dogmas, but not their radiant setting, from Epicurus. In this recurrence to the resuscitated phantasms of long-ago times, evolutionism is adapted with an old trick, schemes of sceptical speculation. They return with the revolving cycle. But never before, not even under the Roman republic or the empire, did Epicureanism display so bold a front or arrogate so absolute dominion as Darwinism has presented and received. It claims to be acceptable to the scientific mind, and yet has been extensively admitted into nearly all departments of knowledge. These have been remodelled in consonance with it. Now it looks forward to an early sovereignty over the whole realm of thought and action.

The eminent naturalist maintained, during his life, that his doctrine was not inconsistent with the Christian faith. His letter to a German student, published after his death, revealed his suppressed conviction that it was so, and that it had proved so in his own case. His declaration may, nevertheless, be so interpreted as to be true. There is no inevitable inconsistency between the creed of Christendom and the hypothesis of a progressive development. Everything depends upon the exposition and the application of the cardinal dogma. To human apprehension there is a more marvelous exhibition of creative intelligence and power in so ordering the world from the beginning, that every force and every creature in the universe should, like the fruit-tree, have "its seed within itself," and exert its characteristic peculiarities in the perpetuation and progressive modification of all developments through endless generations. But there is a further exhibit of intelligence and power in the supposition of constant divine action in maintaining, regulating, combining, and modifying all the successive agencies and results of existence. The imminent operation of divine energy, which Thomas Aquinas considers the most cogent demonstration of the being of God, is imperative in the one case as in the other. The former explanation will not, indeed, satisfy the requirements of either true religious belief or genuine religious apperception; but it is the more difficult of conception. It is not, however, under this aspect that Thomism has been pro- mulgated, applauded, and accepted.

One reason of the wide diffusion of evolutionism has, unquestionably, been the plausibility of the doctrine, and the ambiguity of the term. Evolution is true—"sub modo et terminis suis"—and every form of evolutionism is erroneous as a theory. That things change is a commonplace, that organic beings grow is another, that the chicken comes from the egg is undisputed; that plants and animals, including man, will, under suitable circumstances, be modified, improving or retrograding, has never been denied. The entire series of mutations can take place only within wider or narrower limits—still, within restricted limits—has never been disproved. It is the baldest assumption and the wildest reverie, to presume that the possible changes are li-limitable and uncontrolled, and that one genus can be transmitted into another, even in the imaginary moons of time. This is worse hallucination than alchemy. Even if a formula will not work, it is fallacy in the long term. If it is wholly arbitrary to employ it as the designation of a philosophical system. Evolution cannot appropriately signify a force, a process, a mode, or a determining rule. It is merely descriptive of a phenomenon—unexplained. Smoke is evolved out of a gun-barrel. Nothing more. It cannot be traced the force, the nature, and the action of the gunpowder. This criticism may appear trivial, but it indicates the frailty and delusiveness of the theory of evolutionism. Certain modes succeed each other, and are noted. This affords no evidence of the fact or character of any philosophical relation between the forms. Nor is there much more to be ascertained from the cabalistic symbols of the school—the differentiation of the homogenous, and the integration of the heterogeneous. These phrases have meanings, but what their precise meaning may be depends upon the presumptions of the interpreter. Of themselves they are as obscure as "Greek invocations to call fools into a circle."

Abandoning, however, this skirnishing about the outposts, evolutionism, as a heresy, is sufficiently disputed. It signifies the progressive growth of all existence by successive stages, and through the influence of the surroundings, from primitive and unintelligent germs. There is a recent exposition, elaborated with great skill and acumen, which builds up society in its ancestral and prehistoric existence, from protoplasm; and protoplasm from the diffused, undisguised, and undistinguishable antecedents of cosmic dust. Where did the dust come from? The elephant may stand on the tortoise, but on what does the tortoise stand?

Into the details and assumptions of evolutionism it is impossible to enter here. A hasty notice of a few salient characteristics is all that should be attempted, notwithstanding the hazard of such brevity. It may be said, however, that there is not a single principle relied upon by the evolutionists that is proved, that admits of proof, in the latitude required for the theory; that the ingenious multiplication of asimilated details is not argument, and does not authorize the inductions drawn; that the accuracy and propriety of the details is questionable, and has been questioned; and that "the siren" or "the whisper" of the philosophers, except through such casuistry and quibbling, such limitation and explanation, as constrain the evidence to fit the hypothesis. Throughout the theory there is a latent and unperceived "petitio principii," which cannot be evaded, unless there is a substitution of a new and original assumption to the conclusion into which it is converted. It is scarcely necessary to repeat the preliminary proposition—that the world of observation reveals and necessitates, at all times, the admission of a higher force, guidence, and wisdom; initiating, sustaining, and directing all that is or can be observed.

The aim of evolutionism is to exclude from the theory of being and of truth everything transcending the manifestations of physical existence. Of course, the virtual effect on the spirit of speculation is the same, whether the supernatural is denied or rigidly ignored. The practical outcome of epicuresianism, which relegated the gods to unimportant repos, was identical with that of the most absolute atheism. There is a logical and a metaphysical distinction, but little diversity of consequences. Hence Darwinism and evolutionism are on the same plane with positive unbelief, and merely into, even when they are not embodied in the general procedure of agnosticism. See EVOLUTION.

III. AGNOSTICISM is the current designation of the most prevailing type of sceptical philosophy. It requires the most internal supposition that it is unnecessary to deny the divine, which it banishes. Indeed, Tyndall, Huxley, Spencer, and other bisophonists of the fashionable delusion, have admitted the reality of what they exclude from consideration and from rational inquiry. They do not deny divinity; they do not dispute the fact, they do dispute the term. They are content to say that they know nothing, and can know nothing, about it, and that no one does or can know anything on the subject. They, therefore, refuse to admit it into their contemplation, or to accord it any intellectual status over the thoughts and conduct of men. They pass by it, as it sits wallowing in the filth and muck of ignorabimus and ad nos. Agnosticism is simply shameless profession of ignorance—know-nothingism in all that is essential to philosophy. It is the substitution of human science, or unscience, for human knowledge. It may, accordingly, be extended to all forms of negation, or rejection of what lies beyond the domain of matter, or of physical science. But can physical science, or human reason, in its finite systematizations, fill the whole globe of human thought, feeling, and conduct? Of human aspiration and of human duty?

As has already been pointed out, science, observation, experience, reasoning, imperatively require the constant recognition and support of what the agnostics reject as being unknowable. What they repudiate, but what, nevertheless, remains indispensable, is unknowable, in the sense that it is beyond the reach of human scientific knowledge. But there is much knowledge of the highest practical value which is unreduced to such demonstrable form, much which is incapable of being reduced to that form. Scientific knowledge would be vain a memory in the clouds, a candle in the air, if it had nothing but propositions reached by induction or deduction to rest upon. In the brilliant developments of modern science the necessary philosophical basis of science is forgotten, and in the pretensions of scientific system-builders it is ignored. The sun shines calmly on, if invisible to the blind, or denied by them. True wisdom is distrustful of itself. It eschews pretension, and avoids the confidence which would restrict the world to the limits of human comprehension. What cannot be scientifically arranged, co-ordinated, and syllogistically or inductively proved, is not absolutely unknown. Were it so, a child could possess no knowledge, and could never learn. In things transcending the "beg- gary elements of man," we are and must be "as little children." Here humility is the condition and means of knowledge. The assurance thus gained is accepted in humility. It is a difference to know something for certain, except by such casuistry and quibbling, such limitation and explanation, as constrain the evidence to fit the hypothesis. Throughout the theory there is a latent and unperceived "petitio principii," which could not be evaded, unless there is a substitution of a new and original assumption to the conclusion into which it is converted. It is scarcely necessary to repeat the preliminary proposition—that the world of observation reveals and necessitates, at all times, the admission of a higher force, guidance, and wisdom; initiating, sustaining, and directing all that is or can be observed.

The aim of evolutionism is to exclude from the theory of being and of truth everything transcending the manifestations of physical existence. Of course, the virtual effect on the spirit of speculation is the same, whether the supernatural is denied or rigidly ignored. The practical outcome of epicuresianism, which relegated the gods to unimportant repos, was identical with that of the most absolute atheism. There is a logical and a metaphysical distinction, but little diversity of consequences. Hence Darwinism and evolutionism are on the same plane with positive unbelief, and merely into, even when they are not embodied in the general procedure of agnosticism. See EVOLUTION.
to investigate physical phenomena apart from their origin or cause, but the essence of morals consists in the acceptance of right, as a rule, extraneously presented, and obligatory in obedience to an authority above and beyond those bound to obey, though they have the power of disobeying. These traditions transcend the realm of mere knowledge.

A more dogmatic, but not more satisfactory, attitude is asserted by that growing sect of physiological psychologists who discern in mind only an exudation from matter, and resolve thought into a cerebral process, stimulated or stimulated, through the telegraphic lines of nerves and the conducting tissues, like those to Spencer, a complex series of nervous "shocks," like those of an electric battery. If the nature and action of the human intellect are degraded to the level of the electric fluid, or of the currents of sap in vegetative growth, there is neither room nor occupation for any agency higher than organic motions. But how did these motions originate? Whence were their capabilities primarily derived? In all the play of nervous excitation, direct or reflex, where is the intelligence that notes and employs the communications transmitted? Is the nerve cell where the operation of the nerve line, or at the completion of the circuit, is indispensable. The apparatus is useless without something diverse from the apparatus, to interpret the messages. The gray matter of the brain, however wonderful its constitution and functions, in its usefulness, its utility in its best, it is only a central office. The mind must be something entirely different from its complicated network of agencies. The spider's web is not the spider. But mind, intangible in its essence and modes, is incomprehensible and meaningless, without a creative mind to form and to inform it, after a fashion far different from any physical changes. Physiology has rendered, and may continue to render, most important services in the interpretation of the physical accompaniments and instrumentalities of mental processes. But Maudsley, and Bain, and Spencer, and the other advocates of human automatism, cannot detect mind or thought under the scalpel, with the aid of any microscope. Their theories are wholly superficial. They deal only with the manifestations on the surface, produced by the underlying forces. They exclude the idea of forces, except as the sequence of charges, and the sequence for which forces can exclude the term if they could dispense with it. They fail, however, to see that its indispensability attests the reality of what they would expel. As these speculations confine their attention to the show of things, they might as well be eradicated, and the powers of the universe analized, or rendered unsubstantial shadows. All things, so far as man is concerned, would be resolved into the spectral shapes cast on the clouds of the human mind. Even these phantasms must be cast by something, or evoked by something. This primary something is a cause, and a first cause, but its essence is beyond human grasp. There are, therefore, but two existences in the universe, conjoined to each other—the mirror of the mind, and the entity which starts the images from the reflecting surface. Obviously, this reduces the actual, the intelligible, and the intelligible entity. The same of whose pulsations manifest themselves as the phantasms of the human mind. This, too, is pantheism.

The fatal defect of the Hamiltonian philosophy, and of its developments, is, apparently, not in the assertion of the relativity and conditionality of human knowledge, but in the exclusion of all knowledge of the "universal conditioned." Knowledge is a very elastic term: "conditioned" is a very ambiguous one. It may be doubted whether incomprehensible technicalities—"absolute," "unconditioned," "infinite," etc.—afford such definite ideas as justify strictions in the conventional in regard to them. They are shifting phantoms of the mist. Controversies in regard to them are as effective as would be battles of children, fighting with iridescent soap-bubbles. Waiving the discussion of the question, which would be endless, and presumably inconclusive, it must be true, as the philosophers are due to the unpeopled diversity of latitude in the meaning of the terms conjured with. Knowledge is of various degrees, kinds, and characters. Some is scientific, some philosophical, some intuitive, some revealed in mode and form apt for human acceptance. If all knowledge were denied, or excluded, but that which is established by logical or scientific reasoning, the human mind would wander in endless mazes lost. It will stagger helplessly along, led only by the marsh-fires of the night, through forest and bog; making every step foible for eternal sunlight. Science is due itself to scientific knowledge. The range is wide enough for any ambition. But science must beg its first principles. It must rest on postulates which have a metaphysical basis. Logic observes the processes and sequences of thought, but the mind is in itself, beyond human observation. All that it receives or produces is derived from impulses within and impulses without, whose existence must be accepted without other testimony than themselves. Thus, in all the grades and species of knowledge, the fundamental and indispensa ble assurance which renders any knowledge possible is the preceding and the unerring reception of knowledge, outside of systems of philosophy and provinces of science. Reason demands this. Conscious experience confirms it. Common-sense proceeds at all times from its influence, without a thought of its requirement, or the necessity of human knowledge, and its character as "conditioned," should be admitted, but accompanied with the further admission that such knowledge is built upon the "absolute" and the "unconditioned."... V. Pessimism. It might be supposed to be a natural resilience from the optimism of Leibniz; but the schemes are separated by too wide an interval of time, and exhibit no links of actual connection. It rather grew out of the despair of the disappointed age which with the growth of the dark ages and the French revolution, and found utterance in the gloomy strains of Byron. Every age presents the results of the preceding philosophy, and moulds the philosophy of the age succeeding. That strange, poetic genius, Leopardi, sang the prelude of pessimism; Schopenhauer gave it form, expansion, and coherence; and Hartmann has endeavored to give it systematic exposition. Pessimism is not so much a negation of creative power and authority as a denigration of creative wisdom and benevolence. It maintains that the order of the universe is so constituted and regulated as to produce only wretchedness and increasing distress. In a period of brilliant industrial and intellectual achievement, but of augmenting disgust, discontent, and misery, it presents a doctrine discharging an order of things so often embittering life, and multiplying the myriads of the suffering in the surrounding and of those who find no rest in one respect, pessimism is to be reproved more severely than agnosticism. It does not merely hide the supernatural behind an impenetrable veil; it calumniates the creator and the creation. It degrades man, and units him for the discharge of the duties of humanity. Man's function on earth is not enjoyment; that may be an incident of his life, a result, or a recompense of his conduct. It is not to exult in the possession of pleasures and ease and vanities and gratifications. Pessimism often concludes, through constant trials, through sorrows, and "much tribulation," to strengthen and fit himself for the work set before him, and to do it—to make his contemporaries, and posterity, and the world, better and better provided, in consequence of his action—and to serve earnestly and loyally, as private or public service, in promoting the unseen purpose of Providence, and the destinies of humanity. What may be the fortunes or the fate of an individual is of passing moment. Countless bubbles burst every second on the ocean of life; but the movement of the ocean is uninter rupted, the individuals participate in the many of laborers. When he falls, his place will be taken, almost by one better fitted for the growing task. There would be an impotency in dwelling on this type of pessimism, as it has been already noticed in this work. See Pessimism. It must suffice to add that the blackening of the unseen, and of its cause, the substitution of a malignant author, or order of creation, for the wise and the beneficent, are as distinc tly sceptical procedures as any other mode of repudiating a transcendent authority. These remarks do not mean that pessimism has been produced chiefly for the purpose of noticing an increase in the growing darkness and consequent to each other. True, there is a consolatory feature in the dispensation of innumerable problems: to make the best, for selfish comfort, of what is presumed to be inevitably bad, as well as uncertain; to seek tranquillity, as far as practicable, in the renunciation of all annoying duties, and of all unselfish aims. "How weary, stale, flat, and unprofitable Seem to me all the uses of this world!"... VI. Nihilism. It is a convenient designation for the inop tient doctrine. Its purpose is to escape from the people and arguments of the battle-ground of immobile resistance, and to surrender likeable arguments and the battle-ground of immobile problems: to make the best, for selfish comfort, of what is presumed to be inevitably bad, as well as uncertain; to seek tranquillity, as far as practicable, in the renunciation of all annoying duties, and of all unselfish aims. Nihilism, and the pessimism from which it descends, display analogies to the rehabilitated Buddhism, which has been recently compared to Christianity, and which will be described for it in the midst of the chief centres of modern civilization. The Gallican, in folly or delusion, says Cicero, which has not been advocated by some of the schools of the philosophers. If such extravagant reveries meet with acceptance in a cultivated and thoughtful generation, it is a consolation to see their influence in the world of letters—consummated before—and have been forgotten. They are dreams which vanish with the morning, and belong to those fashions of the world which soon pass away. If man be regarded—and the individual perhaps may properly be so regarded—as one ant in the busy ant-hill of humanity, the problem of life and of the universe in respect to him becomes as simple and clear as it is grand. What is needed for earthy necessities he learns by transmission, by observation, by experience, by the advance of science, and the growth of his faculties. Of all that is above him, and that is so strongly felt as to regulate his conduct and his understanding, he knows nothing, of his own knowledge, except imperfectly, for it is "wisdom unsearchable, and past finding out." Can he reject the knowledge, and the author of all his knowledge, because both remain incomprehensible? Whether affirming or negating, he cannot attain his rest. Shall the ant deny the existence of superior beings, which he can neither measure nor comprehend? Shall the clay ignore the hand of the potter? Shall man, walking in obscurity, and seeing only "as through a glass, darkly," go out of the world before he has fathomed with his short plummet line? He has his office upon earth. What that office demands he knows, or may know, so far as is required for its discharge. He works for his family, that others may take his place when his time of labor is over. He works for his countrymen, and for his age; he scarcely knows why, or how. He knows imperfectly what has gone before, made him what he is, and elevated and facilitated his tasks. He thinks in the present day, with his times, with his life. He knows nothing certainly of what may come after him. He "struts his hour upon the stage," unconsciously ministering to purposes of which he can hardly dream. When generations have succeeded generations, the retrospect may show a grand result flowing from the primitive activity of his profession and his contemporaries. The prospect may reveal a still more glorious advancement to be accomplished. A new earth, if not a new heaven, will proceed from the successive swarms of mankind.

Can it be rationally questioned that there are controlling influences and purposes from the beginning, pressing forward to a determinate end? They necessitate the admission and the governance of a wisdom which man cannot conceive, of a beneficence which man cannot understand, of a plan which man cannot perceive and a guidance which man cannot, rationalistically or logically, ignore or deny.

Inferences.—It is a natural result of the self-confidence of men—an inevitable exorbitancy of that daring thought and speculation which are the handmaidens of progress, that, in the hour of intellectual triumph and national splendor, the bold leaders of the day undertake the erection, on earthly foundations, of "towns reaching to heaven." In their exultation, they are unmindful that these edifices must totter over, like other Babels, and note their existence by their ruins. The shattered monuments will furnish the quarries for humbler but secular dwellings. The churches and fortresses of medieval Rome were mainly built with the broken capitals and architraves, columns, statues, and other carvings, of fallen palaces and pagan temples. The strong places of later progress are similarly constructed. We mount on ruins, and on the corpses of those that have preceded us. It would be weak fanaticism to disparage the services to human knowledge and performance rendered by the theories of scepticism which have been surveyed. It would be imbecile ingratitude to refuse admission to the learning, ingenuity, and perseverance of the high priests of recent aberrations. Their devices may produce a dreary impression—"We start, for soul is wanting there!"—but there is no reason for consternation or despondency. They have opened new paths through the haunted forest of life. They have made clearings for the day-light, and for cultivation. They have extended our journeys, noted the dangerous routes, and proved by their failures the limits of human capacity in many directions. They have wrought for ends unseen by themselves. They have erected magnificent edifices for other occupants.

Literature.—The materials for the full appreciation of the recent phases of scepticism must necessarily be sought in the writings of the founders and leaders of the movement and in the critical works of the critics which those writings have provoked. The literature of the subject, accordingly, embraces the works of the principal philosophers of the last and current generations who have propounded theories of sceptical design or tendency. It equally includes the multitudinous controversies which they have excited, embodied in volumes, pamphlets, and periodicals. The biographies of the authors, as illustrative of their doctrines, constitute a desirable appendage. This literature would form a goodly library, and is too extensive for specification. So vast and so various has been the activity of these schools, their expositions, their refutations, and their rejoinders, that, instead of multiplying the titles of the emblazoned hosts of books, it might be appropriate to employ the epitaph of Sir Christopher Wren, in St. Paul's: "Circumspice." Some valuable and accessible treatises may, however, be designated, for the purpose of fuller, but still summary elucidation of the prevalent forms of philosophical incredulity. Such are, Temple, "Bampton Lectures;" Tulloch, "Theism; Modern Theories in Philosophy and Religion;" Martineau, "Types of Ethical Theory." (G. F. H.)

Schaeffer, Charles Frederick, D.D., an eminent Lutheran divine, was born at Germantown, Pa., April 8, 1807. He graduated from the University of Pennsylvania in 1827, and studied theology with his father and with his father's assistant, the Rev. Charles R. Demme. He was licensed by the Synod of Pennsylvania and Virginia June 17, 1829, and spent some months assisting his brother in New York. His first charge was at Carlisle, Pa., and his ordination took place Oct. 12, 1831. He left Carlisle Dec. 1, 1834, to enter upon the pastorate at Hagerstown, Md., where he remained until 1840, when he received a call to become professor in the Theological Seminary at Columbus, Ohio. His relation to the Ohio synod became unpleasant, and he removed to Lancaster, Nov. 21, 1843. He next removed to Red Hook, Dutchess Co., N. Y., Dec. 28, 1846, where he was much esteemed. In 1851 he became pastor of St. John's Church, Easton, Pa., where he had a prosperous ministry of four years. It was during this period that he translated Kurtz's "Sacred History," and made a careful revision of the translation of Luther's Smaller Catechism. In June, 1855, he was unanimously chosen as German professor in the Lutheran College and in the Theological Seminary at Gettysburg. The ministerium of Pennsylvania having decided to establish a theological seminary at Philadelphia, in July, 1864, called Dr. Schaeffer to become professor of dogmatic theology, his instruction to be given in German and English. In this field he labored until his death, Nov. 23, 1879. Besides the above-named works, he published several sermons, translated Lange's "Commentary on the Acts," (1866), and contributed numerous articles to the Evangelical Review and the Bibliotheca Sacra. See a Memorial of his life, funeral address, etc., in German and English (Philadelphia, 1880).

Schaeffer, David Frederick, D.D., a Lutheran minister, was born at Carlisle, Pa., July 22, 1787. He graduated from the University of Pennsylvania in 1807, and, having finished his theological course, took charge of the evangelical Lutheran congregation at Frederick City, Md., in July, 1808. He was ordained at Philadelphia in 1812, and in 1829 was unanimously selected principal of the Frederick Academy. He died at Frederick City, May 5, 1837. See Sprague, "Annals of the Amer. Pulpit," i, 128.

Schaeffer, Frederick Christian, D.D., a Lutheran minister, was born at Germantown, Pa., Nov. 12, 1792. He pursued his classical and also his theological studies under his father, was licensed in 1812, and soon after accepted a call from the Harrisburg congregation. He preached two years in New York city. In 1830 he was appointed professor of the German language and literature at Columbia College, but died March 29, 1882. See Sprague, "Annals of the Amer. Pulpit," ix, i, 145; Evangelical Review, viii, 200.

Schaeffer, Frederick David, D.D., a Lutheran minister, was born at Frankfort-on-the-Main, Nov. 15, 1769, and received his education at the gymnasium in Hanau. In 1774 he began his theological studies at the University of Marburg, and in 1778 was licensed to preach by the Synod of Pennsylvania. He was ordained to the pastorate of the Lutheran Church at Carlisle, preaching at different places in other counties. In 1790 he assumed the pastoral charge of Germantown District, and in 1812 removed to Philadelphia, where he became the co-founder and co-pastor of the Reformed German Church at young Zion's churches. In 1824, in consequence of declining health, he removed to Maryland, where he died, Jan. 27, 1838. See Sprague, "Annals of the Amer. Pulpit," ix, i, 79; Evangelical Review, vi, 776.

Scheide, Johann Georg, a Reformed theologian of Germany, was born at Cassel, May 15, 1714. He studied at Marburg, was ordained in 1738, and appointed pastor at Carlsaffen in 1741. In 1745 he was called to Rinteln, was in 1756 member of consistory, and died May 13, 1792. He wrote, De Velo Taboruscili, etc. (Marburg, 1736)—Bega Observationum Sacrarum de Codice Bibliothecarum Eruditorum MS. Bibliothecae Casselanae (Bremen, 1738). See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschland's, s. v.; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. s. v. (B. P.)

Schirmber, August Gottlob Ferdinand, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born in 1756 member of consistory, and died May 14, 1791, and in 1863 at Greiswalde, doctor and professor of theology. He published, Observationes Exegetico-Critica in Librum Ebræum (Breslau, 1820)—Die biblische Dogmatik, etc. (ed.)—Verzeichniss von weissenbscherischen Abhandlungen des Supramontanus und Ruttenius (1818)—Die Anbetung Gottes im Geist und in der Wirtheit (Greiswalde, 1830), etc. See Winer, Handbuch der theolog. Schlegel, Johann Karl Fürchtegott, a German theologian, son of Johann Adolf, was born in Hanover, Jan. 2, 1755, and died Nov. 13, 1831, member of consistory. He wrote, Ueber den Geist der Religion aller Zeiten und Völker (Hanover, 1819, 2 vols.)—Kirchen- und Reformationsgeschichte von Norddeutschland und der von der humaner'schen Staaten (1828—32, 5 vols.)—Kurkenswertes'Kirchenrecht (1901, 6 vols.). See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theolog. Lit. i. 510, 797; ii. 16, 23. (B. P.)

Schlegel, Karl August Moritz, a German divine, son of Johann Adolf, was born in Hanover, Sept. 25, 1795. He studied at Göttingen, was in 1798 president of the university of Greiswalde, and in 1799 at Göttingen, where he died Jan. 29, 1826. He published some sacrificial works. See Döring, Die deutschen Kanzelredner, p. 409—418. (B. P.)

Schleyer, Petrus, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, who died at Eittenheim, Feb. 28, 1602, doctor and professor of theology, was a member of, Orakel des teutsch über den Untersuchung Bubelis (Freiburg, 1839):—Ueber die neutestamentliche Lehre von der Unaufsichtlichkeit der Ehe (1844)—Der Puerusmus nach seinem Ursprung und seine Lehre systematisch dargestellt (1845). Schleimann, Adolf, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, who died at Schwerin, July 80, 1789, doctor of theology, is the author of, Die clementinae Recognitiones (Kiel, 1843)—Die Clementinae nebst den zwei anderen Schriften, der der Illumination, and der der Stauferzeit (Breslau, 1844). See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. s. v. (B. P.)

Schlachow, Emanuel Moritz, a minister of the Episcopal Church, was born of Jewish parentage in 1826, at Winzig, Silesia. In 1848 he joined the Christian Church at Breslau, and in 1851 acted as lay missionary among the Jews in Upper Silesia, in order to make himself more fit for missionary work. Schlochow entered the Hebrew College of the London Society, and in 1853 was appointed to Jassy, where he remained for nearly ten years. In 1853 he was appointed to Milthausen, and at the end of the Franco-Prussian war settled at Strasburg, as the most important place in Alsace and Lorraine. At the beginning of the year 1876 he was compelled to retire from the mission-field on account of broken health, and settled at Worthing, England, where he died, Dec. 30, 1876. (B. P.)

Schmid, Christian Ernst, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born May 14, 1715, at Rabenau, Saxony, studied at Leipzig, and entered upon his pastoral duties in 1738. He died at Ellenburg, Nov. 27, 1786, supeintendent, leaving, Expositio Ritu Contempti Martini, etc. Noctes deereticae ad Nofventium (1738) —De Lege per Pecatum Infornati (1789) —De Veritatis Divinae Doctoribus Tamentum στόχεος ἐκκλησιαί (ed.)—De Sacrificio a Perpetuo Offerendo (ed.)—De Corpore christi in Sepulcro Exepta Corruptione contra Anonymi Dubia (1740). Catechism, and, in company with Rev. C. P. Krauth, prepared the English Human-book. The work to which he believed himself to be called was the preparation of candidates for the ministry. When the General Synod decided, in 1825, to establish a theological seminary, he was at once elected the first professor. The institution was opened Sept. 5, 1826, at Gettysburg, to which place he removed. For four years he was the sole professor. During his connection with the seminary of four hundred and fifty students, he published, in 1828, a third edition of his Popular Theology, which has been through eight editions; his Psychology reached a third edition. He published forty-four works, most of which were synoptic and theologically useful. It is said that his attempts to produce liturgies were the most unsuccessful of his literary endeavors. As a preacher he was very careful in his preparation, and was always gladly heard. See Penn. College Year-book, 1882, p. 154; Fifty-Fifth Annual of the Lutheran Ministry (1876), p. 121; Gettysburg Evangelical Review, Jan. 1886.

Schneck, Benjamin S., D.D., a minister of the German Reformed Church, was born near Reading, Pa., March 14, 1806. He studied theology under Rev. Dr. F. S. Herman, was licensed in 1825, and ordained in 1826. His first charge consisted of seven congregations in Centre County, where he labored until 1838. In 1834 he became pastor of Gettysburg and vicinity, but, his health failing, he resigned in 1855. Shortly after he took charge of the Weekly Messenger, continuing as editor until 1844. He resumed the editorial management of the Messenger from 1847 to 1862. He was an editor of the Ref. Church of Gettysburg from its beginning until 1864, as well as minister at different intervals to congregations in the vicinity of Chambersburg. In 1855 he took charge of St. John's Reformed Church at Chambersburg, of which he continued pastor until his death, April 19, 1874. In 1839 he was president of the synod which met at Philadelphia. For some time before his death he was professor of German in the Wilson Female College, near Chambersburg. He was a man of much general information; a genial, pleasing, and instructive writer. See Harbaugh, Fundamentals of the Ref. Church, p. 129.

He commenced his academic career at Halle in 1842, was professor there in 1849, in 1853 court-preacher and member of consistory at Gota, and died March 23, 1885, doctor of theology. According to his own request, Schwarz's body was cremated. He published: De Sancta Trinitate, etc. (Halle, 1842):— Das Wesen der Religion (1847):— Lebing als Theolog. (1854):— Zur Ikonik der Theologie (4th ed. 1869):— Predigten aus der Gegenwart (1859-79, 7 vols.). Schwarz was the leader of the so-called liberal theologians of Germany. See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. s. v.

Schwarzenberg, Friedrich Johann Nepomuk, prince-archbishop of Prague, was born April 6, 1862. In 1886 prince Schwarzenberg was made archbishop of Salzburg, in 1842 cardinal-priest, in 1849 archbishop of Prague, and died at Vienna, March 27, 1885, cardinal-archbishop. At the Vatican council he made an address, May 18, 1870, against the dogma of papal infallibility, which caused a great sensation in all Europe. But the resistance of Schwarzenberg was soon broken; he did not sign the protest of the opposition party, and retired to a monastery to avoid being further pressed by his former adherents. In Rome the papal faction succeeded in obtaining cardinalates for suitable persons, and such was the case, for Schwarzenberg was one of the first who proclaimed the dogma of infallibility in his archdiocese. Otherwise he was one of the most peaceable and tolerant prelates in Austria. (B. P.)

Schwarzlüber, Stanislaus, a Benedictine, was born at Augsburg, Dec. 17, 1787, and died at Salzburg, April 30, 1855, doctor of theology. Sconce, a movable candlestick of brass, latten, or other metal, sometimes affixed to a wall, placed against a pillar, or let into the rail-moulding of a pew. Sconces were likewise arranged along the top both of the rood-screen and of the side-screens of choirs and lateral chapels, in which, on great festivals, such as Christmas and Candlemas, lighted tapers were placed.—Lee, Gloss. of Liturgy and Eccles. Terms.

Scott, John, a Scotch prelate, was archdeacon of St. Andrews, and soon after, in 1200, was made bishop of Dunkeld. He died in 1208. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 76.

Scott, Matthew, a Scotch prelate, was archdeacon of St. Andrews and chancellor of the kingdom. He was postulator of the bishop of the see of Aberdeen in 1228, and about the same time postulate bishop of the see of Dunkeld. He died before he had been consecrated to either see. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 73, 106.

Scott, George, D.D., a Reformed Presbyterian minister, was born at Clogher, County Tyrone, Ireland, July 26, 1804. He was one of the preachers who came of the Presbyterian stock, and was well educated. In 1822 he came to America, and, after a short engagement in mercantile pursuits, joined the church of Dr. Samuel B. Wylie, in Philadelphia, by whom he was encouraged to prepare for the ministry. By teaching school, and the most severe economy, he completed his studies privately, and after licensure travelled as an evangelist for some time, but at length was ordained pastor of the Reformed Presbyterian congregations at Little Beaver, Pa., and Austintown, O., April 19, 1831. He afterwards continued his labours, and formed his own church, Oct. 1, 1860. He died Dec. 16, 1881. Dr. Scott was a most honored, faithful, and successful pastor. (Pittsburgh Presbyterian Banner, Aug. 9, 1882.)

Scott, John Work, D.D., LL.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in York County, Pa., Nov. 27, 1807. He attended the Lower West Nottingham Academy and Slate Ridge Academy, and graduated from Jefferson College in 1827. He then taught three years at Butler (Pa.), Churchville (Md.), and Chestford (Pa.). In 1830 he entered the middle class at Princeton Theological Seminary, where he remained two years, at the same time preaching, as an assistant to Prof. Robert R. Pallon, at the Edgehill Seminary at Princeton. He was licensed by the Presbytery of New Castle, Oct. 3, 1832; preached as stated supply at Poland, O., during the winter following, and was also tutor at Jefferson College. In 1835 he became stated supply to the Church at Three Springs, also of the Free Church of Steubenville, O. After this he preached frequently, but had no stated place. Dr. Scott's chief work was as an educator. He was founder and principal of the Grove Academy, at Steubenville, and with this was connected from 1842 to 1847, and principal of the Lindsey Institute, at Wheeling, Va., until 1853; president of Washington College, Pa., from 1853 to 1865; principal of Woodburn Female Seminary and of the Academy, at Morgantown, W. Va., until 1867; then vice-president of the State University at the same place, and for two years was acting-president. This he was obliged to resign in 1877, because of failing eye sight. His eyes being treated with success, he went, in 1879, to Biddle University, N. C., to fill a vacancy. He died July 25, 1879. Dr. Scott was a man of excellent mental powers, of great vigor of mind. As a teacher he was admirable and rarely surpassed. See Necrology, Princeton Theol. Sem., 1860, p. 18.

Scott, Levi, D.D., a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born at Cantwell's Bridge (now Odaea), Del., Oct. 11, 1802. He was trained to labor, and began his thorough intellectual discipline after reaching manhood. He grew up in a Christian home, his father was an itinerant minister. Levi was converted in 1822, and entered the Philadelphia Conference in 1825. He served a number of the most important charges in his conference, and soon gained a high reputation as a clear, logical, incisive preacher. In 1840 he became principal of the grammar-school of Dickinson College, where he remained until 1845. The next two years he was pastor of Union Church, Philadelphia; and from 1845 to 1848 presiding elder of the South Philadelphia District. At the General Conference of 1848 he was made assistant book-agent at New York. In 1853 he was elected bishop, and from that time until the close of his active career was most earnest in labor for the Master. Shortly after his election to the episcopal office he visited our mission in Liberia, and for many years suffered from the effects of the climate. In 1860, after twenty-eight years as bishop, and fifty-five years of active service, he retired from the superintendence of his church, and spent the remainder of his life at his childhood's home, where he gradually declined until his death, July 13, 1882. "In his most vigorous days the preacher's eye was first arrested by the searching expression of the preacher's eye; then by the condensed energy of his diction, then by the conciseness and clearness with which point after point of the argument was made out. No time was lost in amplification; the paraphrase of logic was sent home to the conscience with the force of shocks from an electric battery. A torrent of appeal, brief, but intense, followed, and the preacher's work was done." See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1882, p. 901; Life and Times, by Dr. Mitchell (N. Y. 1884).

Scott, Thomas Fielding, D.D., a missionary bishop, was for many years a Presbyterian minister in Georgia, but was ordained deacon in 1843 in the Protestant Episcopal Church. His first parish was at Marietta, which was a new field, and where he remained for six years, a church property and a female institute were purchased. In 1851 he became rector of Trinity Church, Columbus, from which he was promoted to missionary bishop in 1858. His jurisdiction extended over Oregon and the Rocky Mountain territory. He died in New York city, July 14, 1867, aged sixty-two years. See Amer. Church Rev., 1867, p. 499.

Scott, Uriah, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at Lincoln, England, in 1820. He was first employed as a minister in New Milford, Pa.; but in 1839 was chosen rector of Grace Church, Honesdale, where he remained until 1861. He then went to New York city, where he officiated occasionally, and in 1867 ministered to the Church of the Redemption. In 1870 he was chosen rector of that church, and died in the same city, Dec. 25, 1878. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1896, p. 172.

Scott, Rev. Hiram Odingle, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Charleston, S. C., in 1774. He graduated from Brown University in 1795, and was licensed to preach in 1801. His ministerial labors were confined to Liberty and the immediate counties. In 1806 he was elected president of Mt. Enon College, where he remained and taught probably about two years. His only publications are two sermons. In 1802 a painful disease began to develop itself in one of his eyes. He continued to prosecute his labor until 1821. The last six years of his life were years of intense and almost uninterrupted pain. He died in New York, July 2, 1830. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vi, 4891.

Scroggie, William, a Scotch prelate, was minister of Raphan, in Aberdeenshire, and was elected and consecrated bishop of Argyll in 1666, where he continued until his death in 1675. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 291.

Seaman, Elizur, D.D., an English Presbyterian minister, was born at Leicester, and educated at Emanuel College, Cambridge, where he took the degree of M.A. in 1631. By diligence and hard study he attained great eminence in literature and in the learned languages. He went to London as chaplain to the earl of Northumberland, and was lecturer at St. Martin's Lane. His ability secured for him the valuable living of Allhallows, Bread Street, given by archbishop Laud in 1642. The next year he was chosen a member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines. He was an able disputant, and defended twice Romish priests in a set controversy. In 1644 he was made master of Peterhouse, Cambridge. He had interviews with king Charles I before his imprisonment. Cromwell appointed Dr. Seaman visitor to the University of Cambridge, and vice-chancellor thereof. After the Restoration he lost all his preferments, was ejected from Allhallows, and gathered a congregation of his former hearers, who formed a new and important church, which met in Silver Street, continued about a century, and had a fine body of ministers. He died in Warwick Court, Newgate Street, Sept. 9, 1658. For more than thirty years his skill as a casuist procured him great fame; as an interpreter of Scripture he was one of a thousand; he was also a model pastor. He published several sermons, and a translation into Turkish, in 1660, of John Balle's Catechism. He had a very choice and valuable library, the catalogue of which is preserved, and now in the museum at the Baptist Assembly, Bristol. See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, iii, 6-12.

Sears, Barnas, D.D., L.L.D., an eminent Baptist minister, was born at Sandisfield, Mass., Nov. 19, 1802. In 1825 he graduated from Brown University, and four years later from Newton Theological Seminary. From 1827 to 1829 he was pastor of the First Baptist Church at Hartford, Conn. From 1830 to 1832 he was a professor in the Hamilton Literary and Theological Institution (now Madison University), and from 1833 to 1836 he studied theology at the German universities. During this period he inaugurated the German Baptist Church by dismissing Rev. J. G. Ockenfels and six others in the Elbe, at Hamburg. He was a professor in the Newton Theological Seminary from 1835 to 1847, acting part of the time as president of the institution. He succeeded Horace Mann as secretary and executive agent of the Massachusetts Board of Education in 1848, and served in that position until 1855, when he became president of Brown University. In March, 1867, Dr. Sears was selected as the general agent of the Peabody Educational Fund, and at once went to Virginia to live. In this position he did much towards promoting education in the South. When the fund was established not a single Southern state had a modern system of public schools, but within eight years no state was without such a system. He died at Saratoga Springs, N. Y., July 6, 1880. Dr. Sears succeeded professor James D. Knowles as editor of the Christian Review in 1828, and held the position for a number of years. He was also a contributor to the American Cyclopaedia, and the Bibliotheca Sacra. Among the works published by him were the following: Nöthden's German Grammar with Additions (1842) ; Classical Studies (1842) ; The Ciceronians (1844) ; Selected Treasures of Luther (1846) ; Life of Martin Luther (1850) ; Roget's Thesaurus (1854). Dr. Sears also published many addresses, educational reports, and miscellaneous essays, including his discourse at the centennial celebration of Brown University in 1864.
SECACAH. For this site Leitir Conder suggests (Test Work, ii, 389) the modern Sikdeh, but he does not indicate the locality. It is thus referred to in the Quarr, Statement of the “Pal. Explor. Fund,” Jan. 1881, p. 56: “In the Judaean desert; possibly the ruin Sikdeh, east of Bethany (sheet xvii).” But no such name appears in the accompanying Memoirs.

Seceders is a term applied in Scotland to those bodies of Christians who have separated from the National Church on grounds not implying a disagreement with its constitution and standards, in which latter case they are termed Dissenters (q. v.).

Seelu. Leuder Conder suggests (Test Work, ii, 116) that Leuder, exhibited by K. G. Bailey, whilst three and a half miles north-west of er-Ram, consisting of “walls, foundations, and heaps of stones; pieces of tessellated pavement” (Memoirs to Ordnance Survey, iii, 126).

Seuglit, an Irish prelate, was called bishop of Dublin in 785 in the martyrology of Marian Gorman, and in the Life of Tollaigh. He died May 4, 786. See D’Alton, Memoirs of the Archbishops of Dublin, p. 24.

Segedin, Stephen Kis, D.D., a Hungarian divine and educator, was born at Segedin in 1505, and educated at the universities of Cracow and Wittenberg. In the latter place, where he spent three years, he had the privilege of attending on the instructions of Luther and Zwingli. He commenced his professional career at Thaynardin, where he instructed those who were studious of the best arts, and preached the gospel to the common people. This dual work he prosecuted to the end of his life, laboring successively at the following places: Gyula, Cegeles, Temeswar, Thurin, Bcken, Tlonja, Lascow (where he was ordained pastor by the imposition of hands in 1543), Calmanze, and Kevin. He died May 2, 1572. Dr. Segedin was eminent for piety, distinguished for eloquence, and held in high esteem by the Christian Church of his time for the earnestness and fidelity with which he enforced the doctrines of the Bible. See The (Lond.) Theological Magazine, Feb. 1802, p. 43.

Segond, Louis, a Swiss Protestant theologian, was born in 1810, and died at Geneva, June 18, 1885, professor of Hebrew and doctor of theology. Segond is best known as the latest translator and interpreter into French, whose name will be remembered with that of Le Fèvre, Olivetan, De Sacy, Martin, and Osterwald. The Old Test, in Segond’s version was first published at Geneva in 1874, then at Nancy in 1877, and lastly at Geneva in 1879. But the entire Bible was issued in 1890 from the Oxford University Press, printed with admirable care and skill. The translation is pronounced an exquisite one. (B. P.)

Ségur, Louis Gaston de, a French prelate, was born at Paris in 1820. In 1856 he was made cardinal of the chapelry of St. Denis, and died in 1881. Ségur was one of the most active and influential members of the clerical party, unjust towards the Protestants, and a promoter of ultramontane ideas. He published, La Paix et la Vie Intérieure (1852–64, 4 vols.); Instruciones FAMILIARES y Lectures du So,ir sur Toutes les Versets de la Bible (1859, 2 vols.); La Loi (1868); Le Dogme de l’Infallibilité (1872); Le Jeune Ouvrier Chrétien (1876), etc. See Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, &c. (B. P.)

Seldemann, Johann Karl, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Dresden, April 10, 1807. He studied at Leipzig, was for some time private tutor, and in 1834 was appointed professor of the philosophy of law in the university. He retired from the ministry, and died at Dresden, Aug. 5, 1879, doctor of theology. He published, Thomas Münzer (Dresden, 1843); Die leipziger Disputation im Jahre 1519 (1843); -Karl von Miltitz, eine chronologische Untersuchung (1844); -Erörterungen zur Reformationsgeschichte durch bisher unbekannte Urkunden (ed.)—Beiträge zur Reformationsgeschichte (1846)—Lutherbriefe (1859)—Aton Lauterbuck’s, Diancon zu Wittenberg Tagebuch (1872)—Jacob Schenck (1875)—Luther’s erste und dilette Vorlesungen über die Psalmen (1876).

See Neues Archiv f. die Geschichte d. Kathol. Kirche, p. 94 sq.; Zeitschrift des bürgerlichen Geschichtvereins, xvi, 257 sq. (Bonn, 1881); Platt-Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v. (H. P.)

Selwyn, George Augustus, missionary bishop of New Zealand, was born at Hampstead, England, in 1809, and received his earlier education at Eton. He studied at Cambridge, and in 1831 was appointed private tutor to Lord Stanley of Eton, with whom he remained three years, taking time as a curate at Windsor. In 1841 Selwyn was appointed first bishop of the Anglican Church in New Zealand, and after having been consecrated in October, he sailed in December for his station. He landed at Sydney in April, 1842, and remained some time there to confer with the bishops. In the first year of his arrival Selwyn established a college for the training of candidates for the ministry, and five years after his landing in New Zealand he commenced to work among the islands of the South Sea. In 1854 bishop Selwyn came to England. Twelve years experience had taught him that his diocese must be divided, and that Melanesia must have some one who could spend all his energies on its many islands and its diverse population. His time in England was not wasted. When he returned to New Zealand he was accompanied by bishop Paterson. For some years he shared and directed Paterson’s work among the islands, and in the college at Auckland. Then the diocese was divided, and divided again. In 1866 there were six bishops under Selwyn’s direction as primates, and among them Paterson was giving his whole attention to those islands among which he was afterwards to lay down his life. In 1867 Selwyn came again to England, and during his stay the diocese of Lichfield became vacant. It was offered more than once to him, and he refused. At length, on being strongly pressed by archbishop Longley, he yielded. His administration of this new and trying sphere, which comprised the so-called “Black Country,” was very vigorous. Selwyn died April 11, 1878. His Life has been written by H. W. Tucker (Lond. 1879, 2 vols.). (B. P.)

Seminaries, Theological, in the United States. Professional schools for the special training of ministers of the gospel are almost peculiar to America. Although the universities of the state had been originally instituted chiefly for educational purposes, and clerical studies were for a long time mainly pursued in them, this was only an accident of the time, arising principally from the imperfect views of science then entertained, and the predominance of religious teachers in the world of letters. In some instances, such as the famous Sorbonne (q. v., of France, the academical studies gradually supplanted the theological; while in but a few cases, such as those of Geneva in Switzerland, Montauban in France, and the Propaganda at Rome, is was prominently or exclusively kept up. To these must be added the training-schools of the English Dissenters, which are comparatively few and unimportant. As a very general rule, however, the various branches of theology in Europe are included as departments of the great universities, and are therefore taught, almost entirely by lectures, as parts of a scientific education.

In America, on the other hand, while nearly all the higher schools were originated and are sustained by various Christian bodies, yet the system of special preparatory and theological instruction for the ministry was generally carried on in distinct institutions, sometimes included in a so-called university, but nevertheless having each its separate faculty and particular course of study, which is intended and arranged so as to be supplementary to those of the academy and the college. definiteness and practical character to ministerial training scarcely attainable, or even attempted, by the looser method of European instruction. See MINISTERIAL EDUCATION.

I. Growth and Character of American Schools of Theology. The earliest of these institutions, exclusive of a Roman Catholic one founded in 1791, in Baltimore, Md., which still survives, and a private one established in 1804 by Dr. John M. Mason, in the city of New York, which lasted several years, is the Theological Seminary founded in 1816 by Professor Marsh, at Northampton, Mass., in 1808, although a foundation was made somewhat earlier for a similar institution by the Reformed Dutch Church at New Brunswick, N.J., which did not go into operation for a long time. The next great theological seminary was that of the Presbyterians, founded at Princeton, N.J., in 1824, although, through neglect of the College of New Jersey, with which it is connected, was established in 1775. The divinity schools of Harvard and Yale are even more modern, while the universities themselves are much older. After the above dates numerous schools and departments of a strictly theological character sprang up in the more thickly settled states, and in more recent times they have rapidly multiplied throughout the Union. Thus, in the first decade of the present century (1800-1809) there were but two organized, in the second, 2 in the third, 14, in the fourth, 5, in the fifth 6, in the sixth, 19, in the seventh, 6, in the eighth (1800-1809) 20. The Report of the United States Commissioner of Education for 1885 (the latest return) gave the total of theological seminaries and departments as being 145, with an aggregate of 688 resident teachers and 5773 students.

II. Statistics.—The accompanying table, compiled from the above-mentioned report, exhibits a summary statement of the theological institutions in the Union, arranged in the alphabetical order of the several states. For further details, see the annual catalogue of each, which is furnished gratuitously on application to the presiding officer.

SEN

Kesbuh Chunder, one of the chief priests of the Brahmo Somaj (q. v.), was born in India. The sect of which he was a leader was formed in 1839 by Ram Mohun Roy. In 1859 Kesbuh Chunder Sen gave a new impulse to the sect by his remarkable ability and enthusiasm. He effected the separation of those who were willing to abolish caste in their communion, as the Brahmo Somaj of India. The more conservative members of this Church (at Calcutta), where the first building was opened for worship in 1869. Sen, in his published sermons and tracts, avows his belief in the unity of God, in immediate revelation, in the necessity of a new birth, in the immortality of the soul, and the immortality of theBody. As to his morality was pure, and he inculcated a reverence for the character of Jesus Christ, but repudiated the doctrines of his divinity, mediation, and atonement, as taught in the gospels. He believed that Christ was better than Mohammed or Confucius. Sen died in India, Jan. 8, 1884.

Seneca Version of the Scriptures. For this branch of the Iroquois the American Bible Society has provided the gospels, published in 1829, while the British and Foreign Bible Society published the gospels of Matthew and Mark. In general the Iroquois version (q. v.) is understood by the Senecas, Mohawks, and Oneidas. See Bible of Every Land, p. 456.

Sennet, Rosser, a veteran Methodist Episcopal missionary. He was born at Queen Anne, Md., Dec. 12, 1758. He lost his father while yet an infant, was educated in New York city, graduated from Columbia College in 1815, studied law, was converted, licensed to exhort, travelled some time with Rev. Nathan Bangs, and in 1820 entered the New York Conference. He served the Syracuse circuit; in 1821, New Rochelle; in 1822, Wethersfield, Conn.; in 1823, Poughkeepsie; in 1824, Middlebury, Vt.; in 1825, Flushing; in 1826 and 1827, New York city; in 1828 and 1829, Newburgh; in 1830 and 1831, Sandy Hill and Glen's Falls; in 1832, Whitehall, N.Y.; in 1833, New London; in 1834, New Haven; in 1835, Vesey Street and Mulberry Street, New York city; in 1836, Mulberry Street, alone; in 1837 and 1838, Third Street, Brooklyn; in 1839 and 1840, Newburgh; in 1841 and 1842, First Church, Poughkeepsie; in 1843 and 1844, Allen Street Church, New York city; in 1845, Marietta Methodist Episcopal Church; in 1846 and 1847, Washington Street, Brooklyn; in 1848, Danbury, Conn.; in 1849, Carlton Avenue Church, Brooklyn; in 1850, Washington Street Church, as superintendency; in 1851, South Brooklyn Home Missionary Church; in 1852-1853, superintendency at Brooklyn, where he continued to reside until the close of his life, July 1, 1854. Mr. Sennet was eminently devoted and successful, able and winning. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vii, 487; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Sennara, in Hindustan, is the sacred Brahminical cord, whose use is restricted to the three superior castes as a mark of distinction. It is composed of a definite number of threads of cotton taken from a particular plant. Its length is such as to allow of its being worn diagonally across the body, from the left shoulder to the right side. The longest cord is called by Brahmans, that of the Kahatrivas being thinner and that of the Vaisyas being very slender, so that the cord serves to distinguish between the castes. (Butler, Land of the Veda, says that the Brahmin's cord is made of cotton threads, the Kahatriva's of hemp, and the Vaisyas' of wool. The Brahminical devotional cords or sants often wear a snake-skin instead of the cord.

Sepharvaim, Dr. William Hayes Ward, who has recently explored the region in question, and is well versed likewise in Assyriology, finds in the ancient inscriptions four cities or districts called Sippure, the Greek rendering of this name. Of the principal one of these, the "Sippara of the Sen," discovered by Mr. Rassam at Abu-Halba, and the original place, known as the "Sippara of Asur," being the one where Sargon I was exposed in his infancy, the town of Xisithros, the one captured by Cyrus without fighting, and the seat of the famous Jewish school, which Dr. Ward believes he has found in the large tell or mound still bearing the medieval name of Aššur, south of the point of the effluence of the Sakkara canal from the Euphrates. See Hebronic, Jan. 1866, p. 75 sqq.

Serapion. By way of supplement we add the following bearers of that name: (1) eighth bishop of Antioch, successor of Maximus, and opponent of the Montanists persecuted by Eusebius, I Euseb. v, 19, 22; (2) a martyr by the name of Serapion is mentioned by Eusebius, iv, 41, said to have suffered martyrdom under Decius at Alexandria; (3) a third by the same name is mentioned by Eusebius, iv, 44, as belonging to the Inpasp (q. v.); (4) another Serapion is mentioned by Cassian in Collat. ii, 2. Serpilus, Georg, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Odenburg, Hungary, June 11, 1668. He studied at Leipzig, was in 1690 deacon at Wildbruech, near Dresden, in 1695 pastor at Ratibor, and died Nov. 23, 1728. He published, Voldaendige Liedervercordia (Pirna, 1696).—Descrip. Synagoge Serpillii Incerti (Ratisbon, 1723):—Personalia Moses, Jonas, Samuelis, Ezra, Nekemia, Mordechai et Estheri (Leipzig, 1708):—Personalia Jobi (1710):—Personalia Davidi (1713)—Solomo in Continuationem Scriptorum Bibliorum (1715):—Personalia Jesu (1717), etc. See Dufre, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschland, a. v.; Furst, Bibl. Jud. a. v.; Jocher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexicon, a. v. (B. P.)

Servatius, Saint. According to Athanasius (Apol. ii, 787), a Gallican bishop, by the name of Servatius, was among those who attended the Council of Sardica in 347, and he may probably have been the same whom Sulpicius Severus sent to Rimini in 359 to defend the Athanasian orthodoxy against the Arians. See Retzb. Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, i, 204 sq.; Friedr. Session, Church (or Kirk). See Presbyterianism.

Set (or Sutekh), an ass-headed deity, the national god of the Shemitic Hyksos, who, on their invasion of Egypt in the interval between the thirteenth and eighteenth dynasties, forced his sole worship upon the Egyptians. Set was already one of the cosmical dei-ies of the country, but after the expulsion of the Hyksos his worship was annulled, his statues defaced, and his name everywhere erased. He was represented as an ass-headed man, holding the usual crux ansata, or staff of life, and the cem-fa, staff of divine power. The Egyptians were accustomed to regard Set as a personification of the evil principle. "The worship of this god passed through two historical phases. At one time he was held in honor, and accounted as one of the greater gods of Abydos. He appears to have had a position analogous to that of the Theban deity Mentu, in which he was the adversary of the serpent Apophis, the symbol of wickedness and darkness. Some time later on, in consequence of political changes, the worship of Set was abolished, and his statues were destroyed. It is difficult to state at what period Set was introduced into the Osiran myths as a personification of evil, and thus became identified with Typhon as the murderer of the great Egyptian god Osiris. The treatise (by Plutarch), De Iside et Osiride, makes Nephthys the companion of Set, and she is represented united with him in a group in the Museum of the Louvre, in the Hall of the Gods. The animal symbolical of Set was a carnivorous quadruped, at one time confounded with the ass-god of Josephus and Apion, having a long, curved snout and upright, square-topped ears, which characters are often exaggerated to distinguish him from the Jackal of Anubis" (Pierrot). After the second restoration of the old mythology, in the period of the nineteenth dynasty, Set was identified with the Hyksos Sutekh, who was properly an Asiatic deity, and whose worship was maintained even by Seti I and Rameses II. Both gods, however, were treated as impious, and their worship as heretical, and it is at the present time impossible to distinguish exactly between them, owing to the complete destruction by the Egyptian of all those parts of the monuments whereon their names occur.

Seysse, Gustav, a Lutheran theologian and archaeologist of Germany, was born at Ulgien, Saxony, July 13, 1796. He studied at Leipzig, and commenced his academic career there in 1823. In 1857 he came to America, was professor at the Lutheran Concordia College, in St. Louis, Mo., retired in 1871 to New York, N. Y., and died Nov. 17, 1894. He published, Ueber das ursprünglichen Laute der hebr. Buchstaben (Leipzig, 1824); — Beiträge zur Kenntnis der Literatur, Kunst, Mythologie und Geschichte der alten Ägypter (1828-40); — Chronica Sacra (1845) — Das tausend- jährige Reich in Lichte der Offenbarung des Alten und Neuen Testaments (N. Y., 1860). See First, Bibl. Jud. s. v.; Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. s. v. (B. P.)

Sfondrata, Celestino, prince-abbot of St. Gall, and nephew of Gregory XIV, was born at Milan in 1644. He was educated in the abbey of St. Gall, taught theology, philosophy, and canon law at various places, and was elected prin-cess-abbot of St. Gall in 1699. In 1695 Innocent XII made Sfondrata a cardinal, but he died soon after his promotion, in the same year, at Rome. Sfondrata wrote, Regula Sacrarium Romano Pontifici Asservatum et Quatuor Propositiones Explicitum (1684), which is a defence of the absolute supremacy of the pope over and against the pretensions of the Gallican Church. Five French bishops refuted this work: — Nodus Prædestinationum... Dissoluto (Rome, 1696; Venice, 1698). This posthumous work was attacked by the Sorbonne, Bosanet, and others, who vainly tried to have the book put on the Index. See Moreri, Actores Divini Italiae (Venice, 1732), vol. vi.; Journal des Sarrasins, 1698, 1708, and 1709; Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (H. P.)

Shaallim. The probable representative of this place, Selb, lies two miles north of Amwās. It is a desert ruin, and "appears to be the Sebēs of Jerome's Comment. on Ezek. xxviii, 22" (Memoirs to the Ordnance Survey, iii, 52).

Shaara. The probable site is that of Khuṣer Sāiwa, three and a half miles north-east of Beit Netuff, and one a half west of Beit Abat. It consists of "foundations on a hill, with a spring below" (Memoirs to the Ordnance Survey, iii, 124).

Shaara. The conjecture is confirmed by Lieut. Conder (Text Wark, ii, 339) to be the present Tell er-Rašīd ("a very large artificial mound near the Jordan") (Memoirs to the Ordnance Survey, ii, 128), eight miles south of the Sea of Galilee; but there is no special ground for this identification.

Sharpe, Samuel, an Egyptianist and Hebrew scholar, was born in England in 1779. After starting in life as a banker, he soon retired from business, and devoted himself to the studies of Egyptology and Hebrew. The numerous volumes which came from his pen during his long and busy life—he died in August, 1881—were all devoted to the elucidation of ancient Egyptian, or with Biblical researches. "A Unitarian and liberal," says the Academy, "he occupied himself in popularizing a mode of interpreting the Scriptures which, though it would now be considered at once conservative and narrow, seemed half a century ago startling, if not profane." His chief Egyptological works were the following: — Early History of Egypt from the Old Testament, Hierodota, Manetho, and the Hieroglyphic Inscriptions (1836) — Egyptian Inscriptions from the British Museum and other Sources (first series, 1857; second series, 1855) — The Rudiments of a Vocabulary of the Egyptian Hieroglyphics (1825) — The History of Egypt under the Ptolemies (1838) — History of Egypt under the Romans (1842) — The History of Egypt from the Earliest Times till the Conquest of the Arabs, A.D. 640 (1846; 5th ed. 1870) — The Chronology and Geography of ancient Egypt (1843) — Historical Sketches of the Egyptian Buildings and Sculpture (1844) — Alexandrian Chronology (1857) — Egyptian Hieroglyphics (1861) — Egyptian Antiquities in the British Museum (1862) — The Decree of Canopus (1867) — The Rosetta Stone (1868). His most important publications on Biblical matters were, Historical Notes on the Books of the Old and New Testaments (1854; 3d ed. 1858); — Critical Notes on the Authorized English Version of the Old Testament (1856; 2d ed. 1867) — The Chronology of the Bible (1866) — Texts from the Holy Bible Explained by the Hieroglyphics and Papyri of ancient Egypt (ed. by Mr. Sharpe) (1868); — History of the Hebrew Nation and Literature (1869; 2d ed. 1872) — On the Journeys and Epistles of the Apostle Paul (1856) — A Short Hebrew Grammar without Points (1857) — The Book of Isaiah arranged Chronologically in a Revised Translation, and Accompanied with Historical Notes (ed. Mr. Sharpe's two lines of study meant in his work on Egyptian Mythology and Egyptian Christianity, with their influence on the Opinions of Modern Christians" (1863). In 1875 he brought out a volume on Hebrew Inscriptions from the Valley between Egypt and Asia Minor, and added a volume in 1882. He published his Bāyābāy Eṣtrakāl, El-Eṣtrakāl, the Epistle of Barnabas from the Sinaitic Manuscript of the Bible, with an English translation (1881), in which he seeks to fix its date to the year of the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus. (H. P.)

Shairiz. His most probable representative of this place, Tell er-Shairiz, lies ten miles north-west of Khurxbir es-Seba, and is thus described in the Memoirs to the Ordnance Survey (iii, 339) — "a large mound on the north bank of the valley, broken pottery and a few small unheaven stones are found on the top. In the valley is a well-cut rough of basalt.

Shaw, William D. D., a Congregational minister, was born at Bridgewater, Mass.; ordained pastor of the Church in Marshfield in April, 1769; and died June 1, 1816. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. pulpits, i, 573.

Shecheh. The archaeological remains of the modern Nishāh ta copiously described in the Memoirs to the Ordnance Survey (ii, 205 sq.)

Sheldon, George, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Northampton, Mass., Oct. 12, 1813. He graduated from Williams College in 1837, and was ordained to the Andover Theological Seminary in 1838. He was pastor of the Presbyterian Church near Charleston, S.C., from 1840 to 1843, and was afterwards chosen district secretary of the American Bible Society for New Jersey and Delaware. The latter office he filled for several years. It may be said his life was spent in organizing means for the dissemination of the Holy Scriptures, and in the discharge of his duties he displayed great energy, wisdom, and executive ability. He was much esteemed by the citizens of Princeton, where he resided twenty years. He died there, June 16, 1882. See N. Y. Observer, June 23, 1881. (W. P. S.)

Sheldon, Luther, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Rupert, Vt., Feb. 18, 1786. He graduated from Middlebury College in 1808, and was ordained at Easton, Mass., in 1810, which pastorate he retained until his resignation in 1835. He preached six thousand written sermons and declined eight calls to larger salaries. He died at Easton, Sept. 16, 1866. See Cong. Quarterly, 1867, p. 304.

Shelton, George A., D.D., a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, rector of St. James's Church, Newtown, L. I.; died Dec. 27, 1863, aged sixty-six years. See Amer. Quart. Church Rev. April, 1864, p. 150.

Shelton, William, D.D., a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born at Fairfield, SHEMA 843 SHILOH

Conn., in September, 1798, his father being the Rev. Philo Shelton, the first Episcopal clergyman ordained in America. William graduated from the General Theological Seminary of New York in 1823, was ordained deacon the same year, and presbyter in 1826; ministered at Plattsburgh and Red Hook, N. Y., and in his last two years was rector of St. Paul's Church, Buffalo. In 1873 he was made pastor emeritus, and so continued until his death, at the old Fairfield parsonage, Oct. 11, 1883. See (N.Y.) Church Almanac, 1884, p. 109.

SHEMA. The name between Tell Milh and Beer sheba proposed for this place, is an error for Soresh (i.e. Hazor-Shual); and Tristram suggests (Bible Places, p. 18) that Shema (i.e. Sheba) is represented by Tell es-Saba, about two miles east of Bir es-Saba. See BEREBISHA.

Shepard, George, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born in Connecticut in 1809. He graduated from Amherst College in 1824, from Andover Theological Seminary in 1827, and was ordained Feb. 5, 1828, pastor at Hallowell, Me. He became professor of sacred rhetoric in the Theological Seminary at Bangor in 1856, and pastor there 1857-1868. See Trim. Cut. of Andover Theol. Sem., 1870, p. 76.

Shepard, Thomas, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Norton, Mass., May 7, 1792. After studying at Taunton Academy, he graduated from Brown University in 1816, and in 1816 from Andover Theological Seminary. The two succeeding years he was some missionary in Georgia. In 1818 and 1819 he was agent for the Connecticut Asylum for the Deaf and Dumb. He was ordained pastor at Asbelfield, Mass., June 16, 1819, and remained there until May 8, 1833. From 1833 to 1853 Dr. Shepard was agent of the American Bible Society. In April 30, 1853, until his death he was pastor at Bristol, K. 1., although he had resigned active service in 1856. In 1846 he was elected a corporate member of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. He died Oct. 5, 1859. Among his publications were various sermons and thirty New Year's sermons. See Cong. Year-Book, 1890, p. 27.

Shepley, David, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Solon, Me., in May, 1804. His father dying when David was quite young, he went to Norridgewock, where he resided for a time in the family of Rev. Jonath Flett, and became a Christian. He pursued his preparatory studies at Saco, graduated from Bowdoin College in 1825, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1828. He was ordained as pastor of the First Church at Yarmouth, Me., in February, 1829, and resigned in April, 1849. He was next pastor at Winslow from April, 1849, to June, 1851, until his nomination by the Central Church at Falmouth for a short time, and then provisional secretary of the Maine Missionary Society. His health failing, he removed to Providence, R. I., in 1871, where he remained until his death, Dec. 1, 1881. See Providence Journal, Dec. 3, 1881. (J.C.S.)

Sherman, Joseph, LL.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Edgartown, Mass., March 3, 1800. He graduated from Bowdoin College in 1825, was principal for six years of the Academy at North Yarmouth, studied two years at Andover, and in 1834 went to Columbia, Tenn., as professor of ancient languages at Jackson College. For fifteen years he was connected with the college, during three of which he was its president. He died in June, 1849. See Hist. of Bowdoin College, p. 555. (J. C. S.)

Sherwood, Adiel, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Fort Edward, N. Y., Oct. 3, 1791. He studied three years at Missisquoi College, graduated from Union College in 1817, and from Andover Theological Seminary, and then went to Georgia for his health, where he took high rank as a preacher. He was ordained pastor at Bethlehem, near Lexington, in 1820. While at Easton, whither he went in 1827, having charge of an academy, as well as preaching, a most remarkable revival began in his church, and for two years it spread through the state. He may be said to have been the originator of what is now Mercer University. In 1837 and 1838 he was a professor in Columbian College, Washington, D. C., and from 1839 to 1841, professor of history and literature in Mercer University, Ga. For several years he was president of Shorter College, Alton, Ill. In 1848 and 1849 he was president of the Masonic College, Lexington, Mo., and from 1849 to 1857 pastor of the Church at Cape Girardeau. Returning to Georgia, he was president of Marshall College for a few years. The closing years of his life were spent in Missouri, his death occurring at St. Louis, Aug. 18, 1879. Among the numerous productions of his pen may be mentioned his Gazetteer of Georgia, Christian and Jewish Churches, and his Notes on the New Testament. In his personal appearance Dr. Sherwood was tall and commanding, with noble and dignified features. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclopedia, p. 1054. (J. C. S.)

Sherrwood, Reuben, D.D., a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, died at Hyde Park, N. Y., May 11, 1835, at the age of sixty years, one of the oldest clergymen of his denomination in Dutchess County, and for the last twenty-two years of his life had been rector of St. James' Church at Hyde Park. He was formerly, for a long time, in charge of the Church at Norwalk, Conn., and was the founder of the parishes at New Canaan and New Canaan, N. Y. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1856, p. 301.

Shircon is thought by Tristram (Bible Places, p. 84) to be the modern Zrönumber, which lies two and a half miles north-east of Yebnah (Jabneh), and is a "large mud village, with cactus bushes around it, and wells in the gardens" (Memoirs to Ordnance Survey, ii, 414). Liet. Conder suggests (Quar. Statement of Fel. Explor. Fund," Oct. 1876, p. 170, note) that it may be the Khurbet Suberereh, a small ruined khan, near the river of the same name, four, and a half miles south-west of Yebnah, and exhibiting traces of a cistern, a reservoir, a viaduct, and a canal (Memoirs, ii, 433).

Shiloh. For this place both Tristram (Bible Places, p. 277) and Conder (Tract Work, ii, 389) accept Ayun or esh-Shulim, two miles north west of Debir, which consists merely of "two springs, built up with masonry, about thirty yards apart; good perennial supply of water no stream" (Memoirs to Ordnance Survey, i, 377). On the other hand, esh-Shelh, the old Shiloh, two miles north by east of Debir, contains the ruins of an ancient building later used as a mosque (Ibld, p. 414).

Shiloh-Hilton. Both Tristram (Bible Places, p. 299) and Conder (Tract Work, ii, 389) identify this stream with the Wady esh-Shaghur, which comes down the mountain east of Jericho, and by its junction with Wady Shalath forms the Wady el-Halazin, that runs into the Nahr Numein, or Belus. This, however, is at least fourteen miles north-east of Carmel, and more than twenty from the south west extremity of Asher.

Shiloh. The archeological remains at Səlīʿa are minutely described in the Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey (ii, 387 sq.) The following particulars from Conder's Tract Work (i, 81 sq.) are of interest:

- "We approached Shiloh from the south, by a mountain-road of evident antiquity, from the little plain. The ruins of a modern village here occupy a sort of tell or mound. On the east side the site is shut in by bare and lofty hills of grey limestone, dotted over with a few fig-trees; on the south, it is cut down by a broad, deep ravine, and cross-ed by a deep valley runs behind the town on the north, and in its sides are many rock-cut sepulchres; following its course nearly due westward, we came again on the main road, thus avoiding a steep pass, and turning northwards found the village of Lebanon perched on the hillside to the west of the road and meeting of Shiloh walls, and placed in the middle of the Bible.

- "Shiloh was for about four hundred years the chosen abode of the tabernacle and ark. It is a question of no little interest whether this was the first spot selected after..."
the little low chamber within, but the name seems to preserve a tradition of the position of the Tabernacle.

"The only water close to the village was once contained in a little tank with steps, south of the great mosque. There is, however, a fine spring placed, as is often to be observed in Palestine, at a distance of no less than three quarters of a mile from the town, in the bed of the valley which comes down behind the ruins from the east. A good supply of water here issues into a rocky basin, and was once carried by an underground aqueduct to a rock-cut cistern, but is now allowed to flow away. The vineyards of Siloah have disappeared, though very possibly once surrounding the spring, and perhaps extending down the valley westwards, where water is also found. With the destruction of the village desolation has spread over the bare hills." A yearly feast was held at Siloah, when the women came out to dance in the vineyards (Judges xxi. 9). It is possible that a tradition of this festival is retained in the name Me'ar kh. 'Ald. "Meadow of the Feast," to the south of the present site.

Shimron. The present Semainik is described in the Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey (i, 280) as "a small village on a knoll, at the edge of the plain of Daniel [five miles west of Nazareth], with three springs... and contains probably not one hundred souls." It has "artificial mounds, traces of ruins, and a sarcophagus" (ibid. p. 389).

Shinn, ASA, an eminent Methodist Protestant minister, was born in New Jersey, May 8, 1781, of poor but honest Quaker parentage. He received his education chiefly among the western hills of Virginia, became a Methodist at the age of eighteen, was requested to become an exhorter, and before his twentieth year was employed as a travelling preacher in the Methodist Episcopal Church, in which connection he continued over twenty-seven years. The fact that he never saw an English grammar or a clock until he entered upon his first circuit pictures his illiterate and inexperienced condition; yet such was his progress that in 1829 we find him by appointment in the city of Baltimore. He gave himself wholly to the work, utilized his opportunities as a student, and whether in season or out of season, in town or in country, in the woods or on horseback, his ministry was always at work. He was a theologian before whose logic and masterly delivery no foe of the truth could stand. In 1825 Mr. Shinn was transferred to the Pittsburgh Conference, and in 1829 withdrew from the Methodist Episcopal Church, helped to organize the Methodist Protestant Church, and at its first conference in 1828 was elected president. He afterwards was the first president of the Pittsburgh Conference. In 1834 he was elected editor of the Methodist Protestant, and served two years. When a young man Mr. Shinn experienced an accidental fracture of his skull, which, because of improper surgical attention, caused his insanity in old age, and he was removed to Brattleboro (Vt.) Lunatic Asylum, where he died, Feb. 11, 1883. Mr. Shinn produced two theological works: The Plan of Salvation, and The Benediction and Restoration of the Supreme Being; they evince great logical power, piety of heart, and loyalty to Christ. See Bassett, Hist. of the M. P. Church, p. 225.

Shorewood, GEORGE, a Scotch prelate, was rector of Culter in 1445, and in 1453 was chancellor of the Church of Dunkeld. He was confessor to the king in 1454, in which year he went on an embassy to England. He was master of the chapel of the see of Banchory, Oct. 22 the same year, was also royal secretary, and afterwards became lord high chancellor. He was bishop there in 1462. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 164.

Short, AUGUSTUS, D.D., an Anglican prelate, was born near Exeter in 1605. From Westminster School he was sent to Christ Church College, Oxford, where he graduated A.B. in 1824, and A.M. in 1826. He was appointed vicar of Ravensthorpe, Northamptonshire, in 1835; Bampton lecturer at Oxford in 1846, and the first bishop of Adelaide, South Australia, in 1847. He died Oct. 8, 1888.

Short, David Hawkins, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in 1800. He graduated from Trinity College in 1833, and from the General Theological Seminary, N.Y., in 1836; was ordained the same year; for a number of years was employed as a teacher in Riddlefield, Conn.; in 1860 became rector of St. James’s Church, Waistend; in 1861 of Grace Church, Broadwalk; in 1866 removed to Greenwich as rector of two churches, viz.: Calvary Church, at Round Hill, and Emmanuel Church, in Glenville; in 1867 officiated in St. John’s Church, Hartford; the next year in the Memorial Church of the Holy Trinity, Westport. He resided in Portland, in 1870, without charge; but the following year officiated in Trinity Church, in that place; in 1872 he was chosen rector of St. Andrew’s Church, Northfort, where he remained for several years. He died in Fairfield, Jan. 21, 1877. See Prot. Episc. Alumni, 1878, p. 170.

Shunem. Its modern representative, Suleim, is three and a quarter miles north of Zerin, and is briefly noted in the Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey (ii, 87). The following particulars concerning its situation are given by Conder (Test Work, i, 120):

"Westward the view includes Fuleh—the crowning Castle of the Bean, with its two and maraby pool outside, and extends as far as Carmel, fifteen miles away. Thus the whole extent of the ride of the Shuammite woman (2 Kings iv, 84) under the burning noonday sun of harvest-time is visible. Were the houses of that time no larger than the mid-cabin of the modern village, it was not a great architectural undertaking to build a ‘little chamber’ for the prophet, and the enumeration of the simple furniture of that chamber—the bed, perhaps only a straw mat, the table, the stool, and the lamp, seems to indicate that it was only such a little hut that was intended. Another point may be noted: how came it that Eli-ba so constantly passed by Shunem? The answer seems simple; he lived habitually on Carmel, but he was a native of Abel Mebok, ‘the Meadow of Circles,’ a place now called ‘Atin Hlevih, in the Jordan valley, to which the direct road lied past Shuemm down the valley of Jezreel.”

Shur. Dr. Trumbull labors at great length (Kadesh-burnea, p. 44 sq.) to prove that Shur was the name of a line of fortifications extending from Suez to the Mediterranean; but in that case the word must have taken the article (the Wall), which, on the contrary, it never has. His etymologies connecting it in this sense with Ezhan are very forced. That there may have existed some such defences, in the way of forts, Migdol (q.v.) being the principal one, may very well be granted, without supposing a continuous or wall-like series, of which there is no evidence. Nor is the word itself ever used in any such relation. The phrase היה צלע (Gen. xvi, 7), can only mean, in Hebrew idiom, “the way to Shur,” like בר צלע (1 Sam. xxv, 7), or, more exactly, בר צלע (1 Sam. xxvii, 8) not “the Wall-Road.”

Shurtleff, Roswell, D.D., a Congregational professor, was born at Ellington, Conn., Aug. 29, 1775. He was educated at Chesterfield Academy and Dartmouth College. In 1800 he was appointed tutor, and in 1804 professor of theology and college pastor at Dartmouth. This office he held for twenty-three years, and from 1827 to 1838 he held the professorship of moral philosophy and political economy. His remaining years were spent quietly at home. He died at Hanover, N. H., Feb. 4, 1861. Dr. Shurtleff’s mind was clear, far-sighted, versatile, and logical; his wit and humor were unfailing; his sympathies were strong, his preaching was powerful, and his learning was ample. In theology he was a Hopkinsian. See Cong. Quarterly, 1861, p. 318.

Siber, Ubran Gottfried, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Dec. 12, 1669, at Schandau, Saxony, and studied at Wittenberg. In 1703 he was deacon, and in 1708 archdeacon at Schneeburg. In 1711 he went to Leipzig, was in 1715 professor, in 1734 doctor of theology, and died June 18, 1741. He wrote, De oatenpoequg a Sententia Graecorum (Wittenberg, 1697):—De Gann, Pulentia Oppida ejusque Episcopis ad Actor. viii, 26 (Schneeburg, 1718):—Prolegomena ad Historiam Melodorum Ecclesiae Graecae (1714):—Ecclesiae Graecae Martyrologium Meridianum (1727). Siher, Wilhelms, a Lutheran minister of Germany, was born in 1801. Having completed his theological studies, he was for a time tutor at the Bischusinn Institute at Dresden. In 1843 he came to America, labored for a time in the state of Ohio, and accepted a call as professor at the Lutheran seminary in Fort Wayne, Ind., in 1846, where he died, Oct. 27, 1885. He published, Lehrbuch der lutherischen Pflaster (1860, 2 vols.).— Predigten (1862, 1874, 1880). (B. P.)

Silvan, Pool of. A remarkable Hebrew inscription on an interior passage lately discovered behind the present Fountain of the Virgin, by which the water was reached by the inhabitants of the city, commemorates the cutting of the tunnel leading between these two caverns (see Dr. G. Gathke, in the Zeit.-d. deutsch. morgenländ. Gesch relationship), pp. 3-7). The following translation is by Professor Seyce (in the Quart. Statement of the "Pal. Explo. Fund., Oct. 1883, p. 210):

"1. (Behold) the excavation! Now this had been the history of the excavation. While the workmen were still lifting up

2. the axe, each towards his neighbor, and while three cubits it was still required to pass through, (each heard) the voice of the other who called

3. to his neighbor, since there was an excess of the rock on the right hand and on the left. And on the day of the

4. excavation the workmen struck, each to meet his neighbor, axe against axe, and there flowed

5. the waters from the spring to the pool for a thousand two hundred and eighty cubits; and

6. of a cubit was the height of the rock over the heads of the workmen."

3. Consecrated bishop of the Isles in 1226, and witness a charter dated Jan. 9. In the seventeenth year of king Alexander II. He held a synod in 1259, where he made thirteen canons, which are to be found in the Monastic Annals. He died at his palace of Kirkmichael, in the isle of Man. See *Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 209.

4. Dean of the see of Moray in 1236 and also in 1424, and advanced to the bishopric of Moray in the latter year. He was bishop nine years, and died in 1236.

See *Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 189.

Simpson, Calvinaus Abraham, LL.D., an English Congregational minister, was born in 1789. He was educated at the Glasgow University, and left that institution with the highest testimonial for intellectual character and scholarly attainment. He essayed to make proof of his ministry first at Fulbourne, and in 1820 removed to Haverhill, where he was ordained, and for eleven years greatly blessed in his work. In 1836 he was sent to the city of Dundee, thence he was removed to Cardiff, and in 1844 entered upon his final pastorate at Long Sutton, Lincolnshire. He died March 17, 1866. "His literary reading was very wide; he had singular conversational powers and great urbanity of manner; his love of theological and metaphysical questions amounted to a passion, and on them he spake with decision and authority." See (Lond.) Camb. Yearbook, 1867, p. 318.

Simpson, Matthew, D.D., LL.D., a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born at Cades, Harrison Co., O., June 10, 1810. He graduated from Malison College (afterwards merged into Allegheny University, Pittsburgh, in 1832). In 1833 he took the degree of doctor of medicine, but before the year was out he decided to enter the Pittsburgh Conference. The second year thereafter he became pastor of the Liberty Street Church, Pittsburgh, where he soon gave evidence of the eloquence which eventually placed him among the greatest pulpit orators of the age. In 1857 he was called as professor of natural sciences at Allegheny University, and two years afterwards was appointed president of Indiana Asbury University, at Greenscacle, Ind. Under his management the college showed wonderful progress. In 1838 he was elected to the editorship of The Western Christian Advocate, of Cincinnati. In 1852 he was elected a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He adorned the episcopal office with gentleness, humility, and devotion. He was indefatigable in the discharge of his duties, and though careful in the maintenance, doctrine, and discipline of his Church, he did so without exciting enmity from those of his own or other sects. He died in Philadelphia, Pa., June 18, 1884. Bishop Simpson will be best remembered by his patriotic labors in the cause of the temperance movement during the civil war, which gave him a national reputation. He was the trusted friend and advisor of president Lincoln, and it was at his request that bishop Simpson made a series of powerful addresses on the Union in many of the cities of the North. He was the staunch supporter of the colored race, and was urged by the secretary of war to undertake the organization of the freedmen at the establishment of the bureau, and was afterwards invited by president Grant to go as commissioner to San Domingo, both of which offers he declined. Besides the public addresses which the bishop delivered in the maintenance he was employed by the government on many missions of a confidential nature, which aided largely in strengthening the Union cause. In view of these services rendered during the war and under the direction of president Lincoln, it was fitting that he should have been chosen to deliver the Commencement Oration upon his discharge as president. In 1870, on the death of bishop Kingsley, bishop Simpson visited Europe to complete the work which had been assigned to him on the Continent, and also as a delegate to the English Conference. In 1874 he visited Japan and in 1882 attended the conferences held in Germany and Switzerland, and also to meet the missionaries on the Continent. In 1881 he attended the Ecumenical Council of the Methodist Church, which was held in London, and while there was the recipient of many kind attentions from the members of his denomination in England. He is the author of A Hundred Years of Methodism, a volume of Yale Lectures on Preaching, and was the editor of the Cyclopaedia of Methodism, which contains information on almost every subject to interest the denomination. Some of his Sermons have been edited by Dr. R. K. Crooks (N. Y. 1885); also his Life (ibid. 1890).

Sin, man or (δικαιός τίς ὄναμας), 2 Thes. ii, 8. In the admirable essay on this subject appended to Eastie's Commentary on Thessalonians (London, 1877), the untenableness of the earlier interpretations is clearly shown, and even that the popular application of the phrase by Protestants to the Roman papacy is not corrected. Dr. Robert Salt, entered upon one of the discussions is the summary dismissal of Elliott's argument for an imperial antichrish by simply denying the meaning (successor) assigned to the participle ἐκαίριον and πρὸ εκαίριον, "that withholdeth" or "letting" (p. 349).

The proof that a person is meant does not depend upon that significance of these participles, but upon the fact that the personal masculine is thus exchanged for the imperial neutral, and especially that the principal power is likewise designated by the abstract μουσικός, "mystery" (ver. 7). In like manner the Johannian term "Superchrist" (ὁ ἐπεξιστάτης) (2 Thes. ii, 22) is not a proper name, nor even the designation of an individual, for it is used in the plural in the same connection (ἐπεξιστάτοι, ver. 18; comp. 2 John 7), and also as a neuter or abstract (τό τού ἐπεξιστάτου). To understand this impersonation of the royal principle (comp. δικαιός as an embodiment of Scripture influence, we must advert to the conventional use in the New-Test. figures, especially in eschatological passages, of the concrete terms and names of the Old Test., such as especially appears in the adoption of Gog and Magog from the prophecies of Ezekiel (xxiii), where they probably designate a particular people, hostile to Judaism, to express a collective or abstract power of persecuting in the future of Christendom (Rev. xx, 8). In like manner the "little horn" of Daniel, which invariably represents Antichus Epiphanes, has been conflated with the persecuting beast of the Apocalypse. The names of the Old Test. have been typically transferred to the symbolology of the New Test., like Zion, Jerusalem, Babylon, etc., but have never lost their literal, local, and personal meaning. In fact, this very type of Antichus was evidently in the apostle's mind while employing the masculine in the passage under discussion, and the whole aspect of the persecuting power is evidently borrowed from the description of that blasphemer in the book of Daniel. The expressions what has been a persecutor, to the executors, the impious arrogance of the future antichrish (2 Thes. ii, 4), which is exactly parallel with the prophet's language (Dan. vii, 8, 20, 25; viii, 10-12; xi, 36). We conclude, therefore, that in the eschatology of the New Test. writers these expressions are to be interpreted figuratively, and not literally, as the Old Test., and that they probably refer to some great onset of iniquity near the close of the present dispensation. See Mystery of Iniquity.

Sinclair, a Scotch prelate, was dean of Restabrig and Edinburgh, and put into the see of Brechin in the 17th century. He died in 1656. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 165.

Sinclair, Henry, a Scotch prelate, was rector of Glasgow in 1539, and in 1541 abbott of the abbey of Kilwinning, which latter benefice he exchanged for the deanship of Glasgow in 1550, where he had ministered two years before. He was bishop of Ross in 1551. He died in France, Jan. 2, 1664. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 193.

Sinclair, William, a Scotch prelate, was made bishop of Dunkeld in 1812. He probably died in 1837. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 82.

dean, and in 1841 elected primus of the Church in Scotland. See Amer. Quart. Church Rev. 1857, p. 314.

Slater, Richard, D. D., a Congregational minister, was born in Boston, Mass., in 1728. He graduated from Harvard College in 1749, studied medicine and became a skillful practitioner; then studied theology, and for some time supplied one of the pulpits in Boston. He was ordained pastor at Mansfield, Conn., June 27, 1744, and died there, April 14, 1789. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 421.

Slaughter, W. B., D. D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in New York city in 1828. He was converted early in life; graduated from Genesee Wesleyan Seminary, Lima, N. Y., and entered the Genesee Conference, in which he served Palmyra, Carlton, and Old Niagara Street Methodist Episcopal Church, Buffalo; then accepted a call to the principalship of the Academy at Coldwater, Fx., and later to that of the Genesee Wesleyan College in 1789; continued to be pastor of the church in Durham, Feb. 15, 1799, and was ordained Aug. 15 following; was dismissed Jan. 11, 1832, and died at Fair Haven, March 5, 1862. When ninety years old he was able to act as chaplain to the Cincinnati Society, in Boston, and preached at Washington, in Congregational Hall. See Churcian Memorial, p. 170. (J. C. S.)

Smith, Edward Dunlap, D. D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Greenwich, N. J., Sept. 17, 1802. He graduated from Princeton College in 1822, and from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1825; was licensed to preach in 1826; was ordained as a home missionary in Georgia in 1828 and 1829, and served as of the University of Virginia in 1830. In 1831 he was ordained pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church of Washington, D. C., which church he served until 1853. During his pastorate in Washington he was chaplain of the House of Representatives. He next became pastor of the Eighth Street Presbyterian Church, New York city, where he remained until 1842, when he accepted the pastorate of the Chelsea Church, in the same city, and toiled there faithfully until his death, March 29, 1863. Dr. Smith was a fine scholar and an able preacher, but his eccentricities and manner of living seemed to have kept him in the background. See Newel, Report of Princeton Theol. Sem., 1888, p. 75. (W. P. S.)

Smith, George (1), D. D., an English Wesleyan author, was born about 1800, of humble parentage. He was educated in a Lancasterian school, and although engaged in mercantile business, acquired a vast number of books, and enough knowledge of learning as to enable him to amuse himself with a translation of the gospels into the Slavonic language, which he published in 1833. He then translated the entire New Testament into the Slavonic language, and printed it at Riga. His translation was afterwards published in London, and was translated into German, Greek, and other languages. He was a good expositor of Scripture, and was the author of several works on Scriptural subjects. He died in 1870. See Smith, Life of a Christian in the World, 1872, p. 42. (W. P. S.)

Smith, George (2), D. D., an English Congregational minister, was born at Poplar, near London, in 1803. After a course of theological instruction, he was sent out to preach under the direction of the "Test Mission," and in 1827 was ordained pastor of Hanover Chapel, Liverpool. In 1834 he was settled over the New Tabernacle, Plymouth, and in 1842 removed to London as pastor of the Hanover Chapel, where for twenty-eight years he preached with great acceptability. He died Feb. 19, 1870. Many large schools, both Sunday and day, were built, and still remain a monument of his labors. Dr. Smith was elected secretary of the Anti-Slavery Society in 1839. He was also a director of the London Missionary Society, and secretary of the Irish Evangelical Society and Congregational Union. His published works are, The Pentateuch:—Prayers for Domestic Use:—The Origin of Language:—The Spiritual Life. See (London) Cong. Year-Book, 1871, p. 846. (W. P. S.)

Smith, George (3), D. D., a bishop of the Church of England, was born in 1815, and graduated from Magdalen Hall, Oxford. When China was opened to reside the residence of Christian missionaries, Mr. Smith offered himself for service there, and was accepted. After spending several years in the work of a missionary, a bishopric was founded in China, to which he was elected. For sixteen years Bishop Smith discharged the duties of the episcopate in the British colony of Hong-Kong, among the British chaplains, and in the missionary fields occupied by the Church Missionary Society in that vast country. As a preacher he exercised a wide influence for good, as a bishop he ruled wisely, and as principal of St. Paul's College, Hong-Kong, he instilled a disposition of great spirit and independence into his Chinese youths, who afterwards became influential members of the native community, not a few of them professing Christianity. The bishop twice returned to England to recruit his health, passing on one occasion through India, but was by the Japanese and Franciscos through North America. Of his visit to Japan he published a very interesting journal. He died Dec. 14, 1871. [See (Lond.) Christian Observer, Feb. 1872.]

Smith, George (4), an eminent English Asyriologist, was born about 1840. Originally a bank-note engraver, he began, in 1857, the study of the cuneiform inscriptions, and after publishing several interesting discourses in a German periodical, was called in 1867 to a position in the British Museum, where he rendered important aid to Rawlinson in the preparation of volume three of his Cuneiform Inscriptions of Western Asia. He made two visits to the ruins in Assyria, one in 1859, and the other immediately afterwards, in 1862, and during his second residence at Aleppo, Aug. 19 of that year. Among his other contributions to antiquarian science are Chaldean Account of Genesis (1876), and many papers in the Journal of the Society of Biblical Archæology.

Smith, George Charles, an English Baptist, known for more than half a century all over England as "Boatwain Smith," was born in London in 1782, brought up religiously by a pious mother, and went to sea while a boy. He was forcibly impressed into the king's service in the last century, and transferred into various ships of war, visiting most of the seaports of Europe. In the battle of Copenhagen, the battle of Copenhagen, and was engaged in the mutiny at the Nore. The dreadful scenes of immorality he witnessed on board ship and in seaports impelled him after his conversion to devote his life as a missionary to sailors and soldiers; and with a constancy, a perseverance, and a self-denial quite heroic, he spent nearly sixty years of his life in that toilsome work, night and day often, and every day. In 1804 he began his labours at Plymouth, in 1807 was ordained to the ministry at Devonport, and in 1809 established the first Sailor's Guardian College. The shipwrecked and the abandoned, cast off by God with the conversion of sailors, and he began to itinerate to all the British seaports, preaching everywhere, and supporting himself by holding his hat for gifts after he had preached. In 1810 Rev. Dr. John Rippon aided Mr. Smith to establish a Sailor's Mission for London, at his chapel, Carter Lane, by the river Thames. He wrote and published a dialogue in the sailor's dialect, and also the immensely popular story of The Cabin-boy, Bob. In 1814 he joined the duke of Wellington's army in the Spanish Peninsula as soldiers' missionary. In 1817 he resumed his labours among the sailors, and established the first Floating Chapel and the Beetle Union Society. He also commenced, and edited to the month of his death, The Soldier's and Sailor's Magazine, containing for over forty years some of the most remarkable experiences ever put into print, but it was so genuine and honest, though rough and illiterate, that it led the way for the lords of the admiralty to make many changes and improvements in the navy and in the conduct of ships. He established sailor's homes and seamen's friendly societies; he benevolently took and the cause of numerous orphan children of sailors and soldiers; they travelled with him, he preached for them, mostly in the open air, daily—and the boys with their caps collected what was the means of their support for many years. He died at Penzance, Cornwall, Jan. 10, 1862.

Smith, Gervase, D.D., an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Langley, Dorkshire, June 27, 1821. In his youth he received a liberal education, and early began, as a local preacher, to invite sinners to repentance. He was accepted as a candidate for the ministry in 1842, and spent three years in study at Didsbury, receiving his first appointment in 1845. His preaching was notably successful, of an earnest and spontaneous type, from the beginning of his career. He also had a special adaptability to the presentation of the various benevolent enterprises of the Church. In 1873 he was elected secretary of the conference, and two years later its president. In 1874 he was appointed British representative to the first General Conference of the Methodist Church in Canada; and in 1877 to the Australasian Conference, with instructions to visit the districts in Polynesia formerly under the care of the Wesleyan Missionary Society. For nearly twelve years he was secretary of the Metropolitan Chapel Building Fund; and in 1880 became treasurer of the Auxiliary Fund. He died April 22, 1882. [See Minutes of the British Conference, 1882, p. 26.]

Smith, Henry Augustus, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Palatine, Montgomery Co., N.Y., May 29, 1826. He graduated from Williams College in 1848 and from Union Theological Seminary in 1856; was ordained pastor of the South Street Church, Philadelphia, in 1858; resigned this charge in 1864 to become pastor of the Northminster Church, West Philadelphia, where he continued eighteen years, until ill-health compelled him to relinquish his work. He died there, March 7, 1883. Dr. Smith was an able, scholarly, eloquent divine, and his labors were attended with success. (W. P. S.)

Smith, James, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Glasgow, Scotland. He became a deist from reading the works of Volney and Paine, came to America, settled in Tennessee, and edited a paper in Nashville. Soon after he was elected professor of his独有的 work, The Bible its Own Revelation, he was challenged to a public debate on the evidences of Christianity, and achieved a great victory. He afterwards compiled his argument, and published it in a book entitled Christian Evidences. Dr. Smith was connected with the Cumberland Presbyterian Church in Kentucky, but was thoroughly Calvinistic in his theology. The Springfield Church, in Illinois, of which he became pastor, April 11, 1849, prospered under his ministration. He died Dec. 17, 1866; acted for two or three years as agent for Peoria University, and, on Mr. Lincoln's accession to the presidency, was appointed consul to Glasgow. There he spent the closing years of his life, and died at Dunbar, but the date does not appear. [See Hist. of the Presbyterian Church in Illinois, p. 358.]

Smith, J. Brinton, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was rector at Kingseas, Pa., several years preceding 1856. In 1859 he became rector at Troy, N.Y., whence he removed to Jersey City, N.J., as rector of St. Matthew's Church; in 1866 removed to New York city; in 1867 was elected principal of St. Augustine Normal School and Collegiate Institute, at Raleigh, N.C., and held this position until his sudden death, Oct. 1, 1872. [See Prot. Epic. Almanac, 1873, p. 134.]

Smith, John, an English Wesleyan minister, styled "the revivalist," was born at Cudworth, near Barnsley, Yorkshire, Jan. 19, 1794. Although trained religiously, he became profane, a gambler, and a pulpitist. He was converted in 1812, and entered an academy at Leeds, where he enjoyed the instruction of David Stoner. He was received into the ministry in 1816, and labored on the York, Barnard Castle, Brighton, Windsor, Froom, Nottingham, Linton, Lyme Regis, and Shrewsbury circuits. Like William Carvoos and Bramwell, he was a man of intense zeal and mighty faith. On his circuits the whole vicinity was stirred, the men were smitten, and hundreds were added to the Church. His chapeis were crowded, and his prayer-meetings were like the day of Pentecost. But his work wore him out, and in Sheffield, his last circuit, he died in his prime, Nov. 3, 1881. See Treffrey, Memoirs of Rev. John Smith (London, 1882, 12mo; 2d ed. with introduction by Dr. Dixon); Sheffield Records, iii, 468; Smith, Hist. of Wesleyan Methodism, iii, 133, 134, 135; Minutes of the British Conference, 1882; West, Sketches of Wesleyan Preachers, p. 139 sq.

Smith, John Cotton, D.D., an eminent Protestant Episcopal clergyman, son of Dr. Thomas M., of Kenyon College, grandson of Dr. Leonard Wood, and a descendant of Cotton Mather, was born at Andover, Mass., Aug. 4, 1826. He studied at Phillips Academy, graduated from Bowdoin College in 1847, and from the Theological Seminary at Gambier, O.; was ordained deacon in 1849, presbyter in 1850, and the latter year became rector of St. John's Church, Bangor, Me.; in 1856 was assistant minister at Trinity Church, Boston, Mass., and in 1860 rector of the Church of the Ascension, New York city, where he died, Jan. 9, 1882. Dr. Smith was a man of great literary acquirements, and of broad and liberal ideas in religion, without, however, overstepping the pale of the orthodoxy of the creed to which he belonged. He was remarkable not only for his pulpit eloquence, but as an after-dinner speaker. He was a prominent member of the University Club, and of other social and religious associations of the day. The Church Mission was one of his noblest charitable conceptions, to elevate the tenement-house population, and has been very successful. He was the author of a number of works upon theological and social subjects, among which are, The Charity of Truth:—The Liturgy as a Basis of Union:—The Church's Law of Development:—The Oxford Essays and Reviews:—The Homeric Age:—The Principle of Patriotism:—The United States a Nation:—Evolution and a Personal Creator. He was also the editor of Church and State, an Episcopal journal of high standing. His published works have all been collected in two volumes.

Smith, Thomas Mather, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at Stamford, Conn., in 1797. He was a son of Rev. Daniel Smith, who, for fifty years, was pastor of the Congregational Church at Stamford, and a descendant of the Cottons and Mathers of Puritan fame. Thomas graduated from Yale College in 1816, spent the following year in study with his uncle, John Cotton Smith, governor of Connecticut, and graduated from Andover Theological Seminary in 1820. In 1822 he was ordained minister of the Congregational Church at Portland, Me., but, his health failing, he removed to Fall River, Mass.; was next pastor at Taunton, N. Y., and subsequently at New Bedford, Mass. During this period his views of the ministry underwent a change, and he was ordained in the Protestant Episcopal Church. Soon after he was appointed to the Milnor professorship of systematic divinity in the Theological Seminary at Gambier, O. He combined with the duties of his professorship the presidency of Kenyon College during four years. In 1863 he resigned his professorship at Gambier, receiving the appointment of emeritus professor. He died at Portland, Me., Sept. 6, 1864. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev., Oct. 1864, p. 684.

Smyth, Arthur, D.D., an Irish Prelate, was dean of Derry, and in March, 1732, was promoted to the united bishoprics of Clonfert and Kilmacduagh. In 1753 he was translated to the sees of Down and Connor, and in October, 1765, to that of Meath. On April 4, 1766, he was promoted to the archbishopric of Dublin. In 1771 he died at St. Sepulchre's, London, Dec. 14, 1771. Bishop Smyth amassed property to the amount of £50,000, of which he bequeathed £1000 to augment the funds of Swift's Hospital, £200 to the poor of St. Sepulchre's, and £500 to those of the parish of Tullagh. Solitarina, Philip, a Greek monk, who lived in the latter part of the 11th century, in Constantinople, is the author of a mystico-ascetical work, written in the form of a dialogue, and entitled Diaphora, The Mirror. It is a representation of the ascetic views of the Greek mysticism of the time. The work found favor, was commented on by Michael Psellos, and translated into Latin prose by the Jesuit Jacob Pontanus (Ingolstadt, 1694). The Latin translation was republished in the Biblioth. Patrum, tomo. xii, and in the Biblioth. Patrum Marc. Lugden. tom. xxii. The Latin translation, however, is according to Lambeusius, very deficient. Of the Greek text only a few fragments have been printed by Oulton, Lambeusius, and Cotelerius. See Cave, De Scrittur. Evang. p. 638; Plitt-Hertzog, Real-Encykl. s. v. (R. F. P.)

Sommers, Charles G., D.D., a Baptist clergyman and author, was born in London in 1758. His parents removed to America in 1774, and in his sixteenth year he was employed as the confidential clerk and traveling agent of John Jacob Astor. Having prepared himself for the sacred office, he commenced his labors as preacher at the old almshouse in City Hall Park, New York city. His first regular settlement was with the First Baptist Church of Troy, where he remained several years, and in 1823 received an invitation to become the pastor of the South Baptist Church, New York city. In 1856 he retired to private life. He died in New York, Dec. 19, 1884. Dr. Sommers, at different periods of his life, was called to fill prominent positions in several religious organizations. (J. C. S.)

Sonntag, Karl Gottlob, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Aug. 21, 1758. He studied at Leipsic, was in 1787 rector at the cathedral-school at Riga, in 1791 first pastor there, and in 1799 a member of the Livonian consistory. In 1803 he was general superintendent and president of the superior consistory, and died July 17, 1837. He published, Dialogue De Jesu S. Cur cuc, Ecclesiasticus Non Libro, et Liber Foroegus (Riga, 1792), besides a number of ascetical, liturgical, and homiletical works. See Durrer, Die gelehrten Künstler, p. 452-462; Winer, Handbuch der Gesch. Lit., ii, 865; iv, 92, 164, 167, 173, 296, 292, 370. (R. F. P.)

Sorek. The village by this name mentioned in the Onomasticon is probably represented by the present ruined site Khuiret Surk, lying one and a half miles north of Wady Surar, and the same distance west of Surah (Zorah). It contains "traces of a ruined vi-race, with a rock-cut vine-press and cave to the west, and a sacred tree" (Memoirs to the Ordinance Survey, iii, 126).

Sorin, Matthew D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., Sept. 7, 1801, of Homan, and his father, a merchant. His father died when he was about nine years of age, and the latter was apprenticed to a paper-maker, whose family, though Protestants, were bitter enemies of the Methodists. He procured a New Testament, read it secretly, and began its memorization. He joined the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1817. removed to his uncle Dr. John W. Homan, and in 1823 entered the Philadelphia Conference. He labored on Dauphin Circuit in that year; in Somerset, Md., in 1824; on the shores of the Chesapeake in 1825 and 1826; travelled Snow Hill Circuit in 1827; Salisbury Circuit and Accomas, Va., in 1829 and 1830; became discouraged, and located in 1831 at Drummondton: started with his wife for the far West in 1832, but was overtaken and induced to return as senior preacher on Snow Hill Circuit, where, early in 1833, he was blessed with a great revival. That year he re-entered the effective ranks of the Philadelphia Conference, and was made presiding elder of the Chesapeake District. In 1836 he was stationed at Asbury, Wilmington, Del., then at Union Church, Philadelphia, Pa., in 1839 at Ebenezer Church, same city; a failure of his health. As he was then rendering his services, he had to study; he tried book-publishing at Philadelphia between 1842 and 1848; then moved West, within the bounds of the Rock River Conference, and practiced medicine; removed to St. Paul, Minn., in 1852, and to Red Wing in 1855, where he took charge of the mission. His health being somewhat restored, he was transferred to the Missouri and Arkansas Conference in 1865, and appointed presiding elder of St. Louis District; in 1869 of Kansas City District; in 1873 and 1874 was stationed at Austin, Mo.; in 1875 at Rolla; in 1876, at the request of the Philadelphia Conference, he was transferred to its active ranks, and stationed at Marcus Hook, Pa.; in 1877 was appointed to Bostleton; and in 1878 to Oxford, Chester Co., where he closed his active labors, took a superannuated relation, and spent the remainder of his days traveling in the far West. He died suddenly, in Pueblo, Col., Aug. 11, 1879. By his own energies and perseverance, Dr. Sorin became an able scholar in history, general literature, and theology. He was an intellectual and physical giant, one of the most powerful preachers of his day. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1889, p. 57; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, v. 5.

Soucby, Pierre, a Protestant theologian of France, was born in 1804. After having finished his studies at Montauban and Strasbourg in 1827, he assisted the Rev. Gibault, at Rouillé, Vienne. In 1829 Soucby was elected pastor of the Church at Rouillé, and retired from the ministry in 1871. In acknowledgment of the great services which he rendered to the Church, he was made honorary president of the consistory, and died Jan. 25, 1878, highly respected and honored by both Protestants and Roman Catholics. See Lichtenberg, Encyclop. der Secularierw., 4th ed. (B. P. T.), 876.

Spackman, Henry S., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was assistant minister of the Church at Frankville, Pa., in 1836, served in the same relation to St. Clement's Church, Philadelphia, in the following year, and afterwards as its rector until 1864, when he was appointed chaplain in the United States Hospital, Chestnut Hill Hospital. In 1866 he became a chaplain of Trinity Church, Williamsport, and continued in that pastorate until 1868, when he was elected chaplain of the Episcopal Hospital, Philadelphia. He was elected chaplain of the House of Representatives in 1812 translated to that of Ely, which he held till his death, April 4, 1886. See The (Lond.) Christian Remembrancer, May, 1886, p. 814.

Ky, May 23, 1810, being descended from the Catholic settlers of Maryland. He graduated from St. Mary's Seminary, Marion County, in 1826, and in theology from St. Joseph's Seminary, Bardstown, after four years' study. In 1830 he went to Rome, and after four years in the Urban College of the Propaganda, publicly defended, for seven hours, in Latin, two hundred and fifty-six propositions in theology, was rewarded with the doctor's diploma, and ordained priest by cardinal Pianiana. He was now made pastor of St. Joseph's Church, Bardstown, afterwards president of St. Joseph's College, and again pastor of St. Joseph's. In 1845 he was called to the cathedral of Louisville, where he served five years. He was one of the most zealous missionaries of his time in Kentucky. In 1840 he was consecrated bishop of Lenoque Cathedral, and coadjutor to bishop Flagg, of Louisville. In 1864, on the death of archbishop Kenrick of Baltimore, Dr. Spalding was installed seventh archbishop of Baltimore. He labored assiduously in his office. New churches were erected, schools founded, and noble charities endowed. He convened the second Plenary Council of Baltimore, over which he presided. He attended the Ecumenical Council of the Vatican at Rome in 1869 and 1870, where he was distinguished by his labors and zeal. With the other American bishops, he favored the dogma of papal infallibility as thus defined. He is last year laborious as his early priesthood. "His amiability, simplicity of character, love of his people, and especially of children, his devotion to the faith and to his duties, have placed his name high among the illustrious prelates of the American Roman episcopacy. He died in Baltimore, Feb. 7, 1872. Dr. Spalding was a distinguished controversialist and literary reviewer. He was one of the editors of the United States Catholic Magazine. His principal works were, Sketches of the Early Catholic Missions of Kentucky (1844);—Hist. of the Propaganda in Europe in Louisville, 1860, 2 vols.; 4th ed. Baltimore, 1860), being an enlarged ed. of his Revue d'Aubigné, Ronse, etc. (1844), which was republished in London and Dublin (1846);—Lectures on the Evidences of Catholicity (1847, 4th ed. Baltimore, 1866, 5vo);—Life and Times of Bishop J. J. Flagg (Louisville, 1822, 2vols.);—Lectures on Essays: Miscellaneous (London, Baltimore, and Louisville, 1850; 4th ed. 1866, 8vo, edited, with introduction and notes, by Abbé and Darras)—Ges. Hist. of the Catholic Church (N. Y. 1863-66, 4 vols. 8vo). His works are published in 5 vols. under the title of Dr. Spalding, in Boston, Philadelphia, and Almanacs, 1873, p. 35; DeCourcy and Shea, Hist. of the Church in the United States, p. 178 sq.; Rev. Spangenberg, Johann, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, father of Cyriacus (q. v.), was born March 30, 1484, at Harlesden, near Göttingen. He studied at Erfurt, joined the Lutheran reformation, was in 1521 archdeacon, in 1524 first evangelical preacher at Nordhausen, in 1546 at Eisenach, and died June 13, 1550. He published sermons, hymns, and ascetical writings. See Koch, Geschichte des deutschen Kirchengeschehens, 1, 372 sq.; Beste, Kirchengeschichte, 1, 140; Plitt-Herzog, Real-Encyclop. (B. P. T.).
Spence, James, D.D., an English Congregational divine, was born at Huntley, Scotland, April 6, 1811. He graduated at King's College, Aberdeen, accepted a call to the Congregational Church, Oxford, in 1848 and removed to Preston, and in 1852 settled at Poultney Chapel, London. In 1865 he visited Egypt and the Holy Land. In 1869 Dr. Spence was appointed to the editorship of the Evangelical Magazine, and the functions of this office he was able to discharge till his death, Feb. 28, 1876. He published The Pastor's Prayer for the People's Well:—So help me, Lord, as Peter did in Thy Name:—At the Foot of the Throne of Grace in Weakness:—Sunday Mornings with my Flock on St. Paul's Letter to the Colossians:—The Martyr Spirit:—The Religion of Mankind: Christianity Adapted to Man in all the Aspects of his Being. See (Long) Cong. Year-book, 1867, p. 614.

Spence, Thomas, a Scotch Prelate, was bishop of Glasgow and Galloway in 1451, and was employed in several embassies, particularly in the treaty of marriage between the duke of Savoy and Lewis, count de Maurienne, with Arbeilla, in 1449. In 1451 he was appointed by king James II one of his ambassadors to negotiate a truce with England, and was made keeper of the privy seal in 1458. In 1459 he was translated to the see of Aberdeen. He died April 15, 1480. He erected a hospital at Edinburgh. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 114, 275.

Spencer, George Trevon, D.D., a missionary of the Church of England, was born in 1820. He graduated at University College, Oxford, in 1822, the same year he was ordained incumbent of Buxton, Derbyshire, but resigned this position in 1829, when he was presented to the rectory of Leaden Roding, near Chipping Ongar. In 1887 he was nominated as bishop of Madras, but in 1849 returned to England. In 1860 he became rector of All Saints, Wallingford, in 1861, when, in the same year, he was appointed to the see of St. Paul's Cathedral. He died at Edgemoor, Buxton, England, July 18, 1866. See Amer. Quart. Church Rev. Oct. 1866, p. 493.

Spielder, Johannes, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born March 26, 1756, at Wolfhagen, in Lower Hesse. He studied at Marburg, and was in 1775 preacher at Rauschenberg, near Marburg, in 1800 preacher at Hersfeld, and in 1818 director of the theological seminary at Herborn. Spiedker died April 18, 1823. He published, besides some catechetical and homiletical works, Uber den Mystischen, dessen Begriff, Ueberregung und Urtheil (Hannover, 1827). See (During, Die deutschen Künstlerfreunde, p. 672, 673, 674, 675, 676—Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 365, 430; ii, 73, 108, 148. (B.P.)

Spotwood, John, a Scotch Prelate, was born in 1653, became master of Calder, in Mid-Lothian, in 1686, and in 1692 was chosen to accompany the duke of Lennox, as his grace's chaplain, in his embassy to France. He became bishop of Glasgow in 1709, and in 1715 translated to the see of St. Andrews, and made chancellor of Scotland, Jan. 14, 1635. He was excommunicated by the rebellious Assembly at Glasgow, and died in London, Nov. 26, 1639. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 41, 262.

Sprague, Nathaniel D.D., a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born in Cheshire County, N. H., Aug. 20, 1790. At the age of seventeen he entered Dartmouth College, where he remained only two years, but continued his studies privately; spent several years as an instructor in Oneida County, N. Y.; was professor in Boylston College, in 1825, and began the study of law at that place. He had belonged successively to the Presbyterian and Congregational churches; having joined the Protestant Episcopal communion, he was ordained deacon in 1838, and shortly after became a priest. He was elected coadjutor of the See of New York from 1844, at Drewsville, N. H. An unfortunate habit of stuttering was entirely overcome at the age of thirty-six. He died at Claremont, N. H., Oct. 29, 1855. See Amer. Quart. Church Rev. 1854, p. 626.

Sproles, William Thomas, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Baltimore, Md., Jan. 16, 1818. He studied privately, and spent a year and a half (1827-28) at Princeton Theological Seminary, was licensed in 1829, ordained an evangelist the same year, and became pastor of the First General Reformed Church of Philadelphia in 1832; stated supply of the First Presbyterian Church at Carlisle, Pa., in 1837; pastor of the First Presbyterian Church at Washington, D. C, in 1843, and for five years acted as chaplain of the House of Representatives. In 1847 he received the appointment of chaplain and professor of ethics in the Military Academy at West Point, but resigned in 1856 to accept a call to the First Presbyterian Church at Newburgh, N. Y., from which he was released in 1872. In 1874 he removed to Detroit, Mich., and became pastor of Wood- worth Avenue Church, a charge which he resigned in 1877. He died at Detroit, June 9, 1882. See Amer. Episcopal Church Year-book, 1874, p. 921 (W. S.)

Spurden, Charles, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in London, England, May 25, 1812. In his twen-ty-fifth year he entered the Bristol Baptist College. On May 13, 1841, he was ordained pastor of the Baptist Church at Hereford, where he continued until the latter part of 1842, and then, in answer to application from the committee of the Baptist Education Society of New Brunswick, Canada, was sent out to take charge of the Seminary at Fredericton. In 1867 he resigned this position. He was one of the examiners of the University of New Brunswick and of the Provincial Training College, Fredericton; also president of the University. He was a man of literary attainments, profuse, wise, modest, and a devoted Christian. See (Canada) Baptist Year-book, 1876, p. 84; Bill, Hist. of Baptists in Maritime Provinces (index).

Stafford, John (1), archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Hook, near Beaminster, England, and educated at Oxford. On Sept. 9, 1419, he became archdeacon of Salisbury, of which diocese he was chancellor in 1421. In 1422 he became dean of St. Martin's, in London, and Sept. 9, 1423, was installed dean of Wells. As a lawyer Stafford soon attracted the attention of archbishop Chicheley, who appointed him his vicar-general, and advanced him to the deanship of the Court of Arches. In May, 1421, he was keeper of the privy seal, and was subsequently appointed lord high-treasurer of England. He was consecrated bishop of Bath and Wells in 1423. His introduction to the Staple, London, May 27, 1425. As keeper of the privy seal he accompanied Henry VI to Paris in 1430, to receive the crown of France. On his return he was appointed lord chancellor, an office which he held eighteen years. On May 13, 1445, Stafford was transferred to the see of Canterbury. He continued to hold the great seal, and to take an active part in the politics of his party. He was zealous in promoting the marriage of Henry VI with Margaret of Anjou, and officiated at the ceremony, April 22, 1445. John Stafford died at his manor of Maidstone, May 25, 1452. See

Stafford, John (2), D.D., an English Independent minister, was born at Leicester in August, 1728. He was brought up a wool-comber, but devoting himself to the ministry, studied, first under Dr. Dodridge, at Northampton, then in London, and finally at Mili End, and joined the church of Dr. Gayse, in New Broad Street, London. In 1761 he went to Hoch at Soissons, but in 1758 accepted a call as pastor in succession to Dr. Gayse, at New Broad Street, and for nearly forty years continued the pastor of that important church. He lived in a constantly prepared state for death, even in full health, and in that spirit died, Feb.
22, 1811, his name held the highest position among the Independent ministers and preachers. See "A Man and Grace Considered in Twenty-five Discourses" (1772), which reached a second edition, and a Funeral Sermon for his daughter Elizabeth (1774). See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, ii, 243.

Stahl, Friedrich Julius, a famous jurist of Germany, was born at Munich, of Jewish parentage, Jan.
16, 1763. He was reared as a Christian. He obtained the degree of doctor of law, and, being entitled to the position of professor at the university, he began his career with a major work on the jurisprudence of Germany, and was in 1829 made doctor of law. In 1827 Stahl commenced his academical career at Munich, was called in 1832 to Erlangen, and in 1840 to Berlin. Here he gathered crowds of people, not only of juridical students, but at times, also, of educated people in general, as, for instance, in 1850, when he lectured on The Present Party Position in Church and State (which lectures were published after his death, in 1863). He held the highest position in the state government of the Church, and took a very active part in Prussian politics. His brilliant parliamentary talent soon made him one of the most prominent leaders of the conservative party, both in political and ecclesiastical affairs. Democracy and free-thinking he understood, and was not afraid of; but he hated liberalism and rationalism. The former is revolution, he said; but the latter is dissolution. Stahl died Aug. 10, 1861. In his Philosophie des Rechts (1809-37; 5d ed. 1834) he tried to show that philosophy is not the last end of God, but that God is the last end of philosophy. He called science to "repentance," and thus caused a great stir both among jurists and philosophers. To understand Stahl's greatness and influence one must study his Kirchengesetzgebung nach Lehre und Recht der Protestantism (3d ed. Erlangen, 1836); Uber Kirchenrecht (Berlin, 1840); Der christliche Staat und sein Verhältnis zu Drusmus und Judendichem (1847); Was ist Revolution? (1852); Der Protestantismus als politisches Prinzip (4th ed. 1855):
Die katholischen Widerlegungen (1854); Uber christ-lzechische Gelehrsamkeit (1856); Werden der Protestantismus (1858); Die lutherische Kirche und die Union (1860). Stahl was very intimately connected with professor Hengstenberg, and, like the latter, an able advocate of high Lutheran orthodoxy. See Flitt-Hertzog, Real Enzyklop.

Stamp, William Wood, D.D., a Wesleyan Methodist divine, was born at Bradford, Yorkshire, England,
May 28, 1801, and educated at Woodhouse Grove School.
He was converted in early manhood, during his reside-ence in London as a medical student, entered the ministery in 1822. The late Rev. Richard H. T. Inman, from institution from 1846 to 1848, chairman of important districts, president of the Conference in 1860, became supernumerary in 1873, and died at Waterloo, Liverpool, Jan. 1, 1877. Dr. Stamp had studied the history and polity of Methodism with thoroughness and discrimination, and in its welfare he took persistent interest. During his long tenure of office as chairman he won the confidence, esteem, and admiration of ministers and laymen, by his intelligence, firmness, and urbanity.
During the closing years of his life, his experience and judgment made his services in settling questions of discipline in much request. His fidelity as a friend and counsellor was unflagging. He was the author of,
Memoir of Rev. John Crose, M.A., Vicar of Bradford, Yorkshire (Lond. 1844, 8to) — Domestic Worship: a Sermon (Lond. 1850, 8to) — "Historical and Wesleyan-ian Methodism in Bradford and Vicinity" (without date, 12mo) — The Orphan House of Wesley, with Notices of Early Methodism in Newcastle-upon-Tyne and its Vicinity (1863, 8vo). For some years, and until the issue for 1878, he was editor of the (Lond.) Wesleyan Methodist Connectional Record and Year-book. He was a deletee at the British Conference, 1857, p. 24; Wesleyan Methodist Connectional Record and Year-book, 1874, p. 136; Osborne, Wesleyan Bibliography, p. 177.

Stanley, Arthur Fennbryn, D.D., LL.D., an eminent Anglican divine, son of bishop Edward Stanley, and nephew of the first baron Stanley of Alderley, 1653-1708, was born at Newcastle, Cheshire, 1822.
By the age of fourteen years he entered the Rugby School, and remained there five years. During this time he was a favorite student and enjoyed the especial friendship of Dr. Arnold—a fact which was witnessed, without doubt, by him. He then proceeded to Magdalen College, Oxford, where, in 1841, he was admitted into the choir, and during his residence at Christ Church, Oxford, he was a student of the "Broad Church" party, although the opposite sentiment prevailed at Oxford. In 1851 and 1852 he was secretary to the University Commission, and in 1858 became regius professor of ecclesiastical history at Oxford and canon of Christ Church Cathedral. In 1872 he was a second time chosen select preacher to the University, and on March 31, 1875, was installed lord rector of the University of St.
Andrew's. Early attracting attention as a pulpit orator, he was made, in 1854, chaplain to prince Albert; in 1857 to Dr. Talbot, bishop of London, and to the queen and prince of Wales in 1862. From 1851 to 1858 he was canon of Canterbury Cathedral. He declined the archbishopric of Dublin in 1863, and early in the following year was made dean of Westminster, a position which he occupied until his death Julv 18, 1881. In 1852 and 1853 he made an extensive tour in the East, visiting Egypt, Arabia, and Palestine, and gathering there material for his work on those countries. In 1852 he again visited the East in company with the prince of Wales. In 1858 he visited America in search of health and rest, and was greeted by the public with universal approbation.
everywhere not only with the respect his genius commanded, but with warm personal friendship. During his stay he addressed the students of the Union Theological Seminary in New York, and preached at Trinity and Grace churches. He also met a number of prominent Baptist preachers, and was given receptions by the Methodist Episcopal clergy and the Century Club. Among his poems and essays, Stanley's first literary venture was the biography of his former master, Dr. Arnold, in 1846. In the following year he published a volume of Sermons and Essays on the Apostolic Age. He edited, in 1851, a volume of his father's addresses and essays, adding thereunto a commemorative memoir. A series of his lectures delivered to the Young Men's Christian Association was published in 1854, and was followed the next year by The Epistles of St. Paul to the Corinthians, with Notes and Dissertations — Historical Memorials of Canterbury, and a number of sermons. His well-known work on Stasi and Palestine was issued with some minor volumes, in 1856: — Lectures on the History of the Eastern Church (1861): — Lectures on the Jewish Church (1862-76); — Sermons Preached before the Prince of Wales during his Tour in the United States of America (1860); — Descriptive History of Princeton University (1860); — Historical Memorials of Westminster Abbey (1867); — Lectures on the Church of Scotland (1872). During these years he was the author, also, of numerous other volumes of essays, sermons, lectures, and disquisitions. He was a voluminous contributor to the various reviews and periodicals, and published a valuable series of Biblical biographies to Dr. William Smith's Dictionary of the Bible. His sermon delivered at the funeral of Sir Charles Levett in Westminster Abbey, Feb. 27, 1875, and since published, was notable for its hearty recognition of the services of that eminent geologist in having, as he believed, scientifically established the facts in regard to the creation of the earth and the human race. His latest literary work was performed as a member of the association for the revision of the Bible.

Stanley, James, D.D., brother of Thomas, Earl of Derby, a native of Lancashire, England, was born at Leyton in 1458, of York in 1460, of Durham in 1479, archdeacon of Richmond in 1500, precentor of Salisbury in 1505, and preferred bishop of Ely by Henry VII in 1506. He never resided at his own cathedral, but in the summer with his brother, the earl, and in the winter at his manor at Somersham, Huntingdonshire. He died March 22, 1516. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), ii, 195.

Stark, Christian Ludwig Wilhelm, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Sept. 26, 1790, at Jena, where he also pursued his theological studies. In 1815 he commenced his academic career there, was in 1817 professor, and was drowned in the Saaale, July 1, 1818. He published, De Notione, quam Jesus Verbo Ipsi Tribuverit (Jena, 1813). — Paraphrasia in Evangelii Johannis zizii-seu (1814). — Beiträge zur Verkündigung der Herrnseele, insbesondere der des Neun Testament (1818). Steadman, W., D.D., an English Baptist minister, was born at Eardisland in 1764. He was early converted, and baptized in April, 1784. Three years afterwards he was called to the first congregation, and in 1818 he was admitted to the Baptist Academy, Aug. 29, 1788, into Bristol Academy. He was ordained, Nov. 2, 1799, pastor in Broughton, Hampshire; and in 1804 he became the assistant of Rev. Isaiah Birt, in Devonport; and in 1806 pastor of a colony from that church; and in 1808 removed to Horton, near Bradford, where for more than thirty years he was president and theological tutor in the Baptist College, as well as pastor. He died at his residence, Ashfield Place, near Bradford, April 13, 1837. See (London) Baptist Magazine, 1837, p. 229. (J. C. S.)

Steane, Edward, D.D., an English Baptist minister was born at Oxford in 1728. He studied primarily at Oxford; in 1719 entered the academy at Bristol; and in 1721 went to Edinburgh to prosecute his studies still further. While at Oxford and Edinburgh his services were much in demand as a preacher. In 1723 he entered upon his first and only pastorate at Campton, near Huntingdon, where his health and the vicissitudes of the times induced his retirement from the pastoral office in 1802. He removed to New House Park, near Rickmansworth, where he died, May 8, 1802. Dr. Steane was active and efficient in all the denominational enterprises, and instrumental in the organization of the Evangelical Alliance. He was one of the editors of the New Baptist Miscellany, and for some years editor of Evangelical Tentendom. He published, besides numerous sermons, a volume entitled The Doctrine of Christ, as Developed by the Apostles, etc. (1827). See (London) Baptist Handbook, 1876.

Staede, Shurley, a noted Baptist minister, was born in Boston, Mass., Jan. 28, 1706. He was converted under the preaching of Whitefield about 1740, and became connected with the Separatists in 1745. In 1751 he embraced the views of the Baptists, was immersed at Tolland, Conn., and on May 29, was ordained for the ministry. He labored in New England for two or three years, and then went South and preached for some time, first in the counties of Berkeley and Hamp- shire, Va., and then in Guilford County, N. C., where he made his permanent settlement. He died Nov. 29, 1771, and was buried with undisputed titles as a Christian, and as a preacher. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vi, 60.

Steck, Daniel, D.D., a Lutheran minister, was born near Hughesville, Lycoming Co., Pa., Nov. 18, 1819. After pursuing a partial course in the college at Gettysburg, he graduated from the theological seminary; in 1846 he was licensed; and in 1847 began preaching in English in the German Church at Pottsville, from which grew, in about one year, an English Lutheran Church. In 1856 he was called to St. John's Church, in Lancaster; and in 1862 became pastor of the Main Street Church, Duncansville, Pa., remaining a little more than two years. Subsequently he organized St. John's Church, and became connected with the English Synod of Ohio. The congregation in Pottsville recalled him in 1868, and he served them the second time nearly two years. From 1870 to 1875 he preached in Middletown, N. Y., and then became pastor of St. James's Church, Gettysburg, Pa. He died there, June 10, 1881. See Lutheran Observer, July 1, 1881.

Stedman, James Owen, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Fayetteville, N. C., Oct. 31, 1811. He graduated from the University of North Carolina in 1832, and was ordained from Theological Seminary in 1835. He was licensed the same year, and became stated supply of the First Church of Baltimore, Md. After this he labored as a missionary in Waynesboro, N. C., for a time, and was ordained pastor of the church in Tussumba, Ala., in 1857. In 1845 he was president of the Medical College at High Point, N. C., but in 1851, his wife's health failing, he removed to Philadelphia, Pa. During 1852 and 1853 he supplied the First Church of Chester. He was next called to the First Presbyterian Church of Memphis, Tenn., in 1854; and in 1858 organized the First Street Church, in the same city, which he served until 1869, when failing health obliged him to retire from active work. He died in Memphis, April 29, 1882. See Negro Report of Principal Theol. Sem., 1883, p. 88.
STEEL 855

STEELE, John Lawrence, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was residing, in 1872, in Ottawa, Ill., where he became the rector of Christ Church. In 1874 he removed to Key West, Fla., as rector of St. Paul's Church, and continued his health so good, Oct. 18, 1878, at the age of thirty-six years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1879, p. 170.

STEEL, William, L.L.D., a Presbyterian clergyman, was born and educated in Scotland, and began his ministry at Dyer, in Ayrshire, where he preached for some years. He came to London in 1751, and became pastor at Fother's Hall. His health being very bad, he died before he had been a year in the metropolis, yet he was so much esteemed that the Church collected two hundred and fifty pounds for the benefit of his wife and children. See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, ii, 427.

STEERE, Edward, L.L.D., an English missionary prelate, was born in London in 1838. He graduated from the university of that city in 1847; was curate of King'swell, Devonshire, from 1856 to 1858; next of Skegness, Lincolnshire; chaplain to bishop Tozer, in Central Africa, from 1862 to 1868; resigned his rectorship at Letchworth. In 1869 be was consecrated bishop of Central Africa at Westminster Abbey in 1874, and died at Zanzibar, Aug. 28, 1888. Besides being lawyer, preacher, and metaphysician, he was printer, master carpenter, and physician. He was the author of Sketch of Preachers under the Roman Emperors, and prepared an edition of Bishop Butler's Works, A History of the Bible and Prayer-book, and hymns and stories in the Shambella and Swabili languages.

STEIFFEN, Heinrich, a German philosopher, was born at Stavenger, Norway, May 2, 1775. He was pro- fessor of natural sciences at Breslau and Berlin, but in 1831 he renounced his pantheistic ethics and published Wie ich wieder Lutherer wurde, und was mir das Lutherthum ist. In the same year he published Die falsche Theologie und der wahre, Glaube, which was directed against the union of the Lutheran and Re- formed churches, as inaugurated by king Frederick William III of Prussia. Steiffen's main work is Christi- liche Religionsphilosophie (Breslau, 1839, 2 vols.). He died in 1845. See Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Scienc. Religieuses, &c.; Steiffen, Was ich erlebte (Bres- lau, 1840, 2 vols.).

STEIG, Sepulchral. These monumental slabs were generally placed at the bottom of the principal chamber of the tombs of the old dynasties of Egypt. They are square, and often of colossal proportions, with large hieroglyphics, sometimes in bas-relief, and spaced out. The representations are the façade of a building or tomb. At the time of the sixth dynasty they still have a degree of archaism. From the earliest period till the twelfth dynasty these tablets are dedicated to Anup, or Anubis, not Osiris, whose name is rarely found. Anubis is invoked as the god who presided over the funerary chapel and the embalming of the dead. The formula of dedication is short and elliptical, the usual expression "go" is omitted, as also that of the gift; the name of Osiris is not found before that of the deceased, or the expression "justified" after the name. In the formula at the time of the abridgment of the older tablets, is often introduced, as a mention of the festal day of the beginning of the year, the new year, Thoth, that of the greater and lesser heat, the monthly and half-monthly. The numerous titles of the offices held by the deceased are given in detail. The tablets continued rude till the time of the eleventh dynasty, when the mention of the festival of the heliacal rising of Sothis, or the dog-star, is added. Under the twelfth dynasty the tablets change in shape and text; most of them being rounded at the top, and forming the kheti of the texts. The upper part of the tablets has often the winged disk, the kut or Tek- hau. The dates of the years of the monarchs under whom the deceased was buried appear. The scenes represented are the acts of sepulchral homage or ancestral worship made by the children or other relatives of the dead to himself and his wife, the tables before them being loaded with offerings, among others a sheep, a head and haunch of a calf, and other joints of the same animal, ducks or geese, circular or oval loaves or cakes of bread, gourds, onions, and papyrus or lotus flowers, while jars of wine or beer of conical shape are seen placed under the tables. The name of the god Anubis, which is so prominent in the tables of Memphis, either disappears or becomes secondary to that of Osiris, and the dedication often contains the names of other deities, as the frog-headed goddess Heka, the ram-headed god Khnum, and others; but no god is represented on the tables. The inscriptions are also different, according to the expressions of the fourth dynasty, the verb "to give," omitted at that time, as also the subject of the gift, is introduced into the text, the deceased is called "justified," but the name of Osiris does not precede his. His merit is often told in a terse style, to which are sometimes added the public works in which he was en- gaged. The contents of these texts often contain curious historical and other information, throwing much light on the mythology and ethics of the Egyptians. Under the eighteenth dynasty the tables changed again, and the scenes of the funeral or sepulchral worship were made subordinate to the principal scene of the tablet, placed at the upper part, represents the deceased, sometimes attended by his wife, sister, son, or other member of the family, standing or kneeling in adoration to the solar boat, or deities, or Osiris, accompanied by Isis, Nephthys, Anubis, Horus, and other deities who presided over embalming and the future state, before whom is placed a table of altar offerings. A second division generally has the scenes of family worship, while in the accompany- ing text the adorations to the deities occupy the most important portion; and the merit of the deceased, or his works, are only slightly men- tioned. At the time of the nineteenth dynasty the name of Osiris appears first placed before the name of the deceased, while the title of "justified," or makher, always follows. These tablets were in general use during the eighteenth and nineteenth dynasties, became rarer under the twentieth, exceedingly rare at the pe- riod of the twenty-sixth dynasty, and disappear after that time. They reappear, however, again under the Ptolemies, and besides the usual formula of dedication, often contain a description of the reposing of the body in sepul- cherations and offices discharged by the deceased, and fami- ly details. They are in this period often accompanied by inscriptions in the cursive handwriting, the so- called Demotic, or Enchorial. Under the Romans the art and the importance of the tablets again changed. The subjects are in bas-relief, and the deities represent- ed in the hybrid types prevalent at the epoch. The inscriptions are in Greek, and follow the usual formulas used at that period; the older dedications to the gods being omitted, only the name of the deceased and date of his death being retained. A penitential address being sub- stituted. The Coptic sepulchral tablets, made after the introduction of Christianity into Egypt and at a late period, and those in Cufic, the tomelstones of the Moham- medan conquerors of Egypt, follow also the forms of their respective nationalities, all trace of the old repre- sentations and formulas having been obliterated and em- ployed. See Birch, Guide to the British Museum (Vestibule).

STEM, Nathan, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal minis- ter, was born in Chester County, Pa. While young he entered upon a genteel life in Philadelphia, in his attention having been urged to the ministry, he en- tered the Alexandria Theological Seminary in 1824. On account of ill-health he left the seminary, and sub- sequently attended Kenyon College, O.; afterwards re- moved to Worthington, and pursued his studies under bishop Chase, by whom he was admitted to the diaconnate in 1829 and to the eldership in 1829. His first parochial charge was in Delaware, Ohio, where he labored several years; then accepted an invitation to St. Stephen's, Harrisburg, Pa.; in 1838 he was called to St. John's, Norristown, a parish which he served until his death, Nov. 1, 1854, at the age of fifty-four years. See Amer. Quart. Church Rev. 1860, p. 179.

Steinle, Johann Christian, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Oct. 12, 1701. He studied at Leipsic, was in 1728 rector at Sangerhausen, in 1730 at Naumburg, in 1739 superintendent at Torgau, in 1741 died, St. John's, Norristown, Pa.; in 1751 professor and died March 29, 1773. He published, De Critice Profumo in Sacra Umo (Leipsic, 1727); - Conciilium Pauli et Petri ad Rom. xxii, et Petr. ii, 13 (ed.); - De Emphasi Voci a Graeco transit in Latinam 2 Tim. 4 (1729); - Notitiae de Christo Confessio (1755), etc. See During, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschland, s. v. (B.P.)

Stephen, a Scotch prelate, was bishop of the Ileas in 1238, and in the same year confirmed the monastery of Paisley all the churches and lands they held within his diocese. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 800.

Stephen, William, a Scotch prelate, was divinity reader in the University of St. Andrews, and was ordained deacon in 1722. He probably died in 1749. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 177.

Stern, Henry Aaron, D.D., a minister of the Church of England, was born April 11, 1820, at Unterreichenbach, Heisse-Cassel, of Jewish parentage. In 1840 he embraced Christianity in London, England, and in 1844 the London Jews' Society sent him as a missionary to Bagdad, to labor there among the Jews. At Jerusalem, where he stopped on the journey, he was admitted into deson's orders by the late bishop Alexander, the first Protestant bishop in the Holy City. In 1849 Stern left his station for England, and was admitted into priest's orders by the bishop of London. In 1850 he returned to Bagdad, a few years afterwards was removed to Constantinople, and from this centre he undertook missionary journeys to Asia Minor, Arabia Felix, and the Crimea. At the request of the London committee, he then proceeded in 1859 to Abyssinia, for the purpose of making known the gospel among the Falsaia Jews. For eighteen months he labored there, when he was invited to visit England with a view of setting before his society the importance of laboring in Abyssinia. In 1862 Stern started on his second journey to that country. The progress of that journey was eventually to form an important episode in the history of England. The semi-barbarous king of Abyssinia had endeavored in vain to open diplomatic relations with England. The infuriated king imprisoned the helpless missionary who came to carry their expectations. The other Europeans, including the British consul, shared in Mr. Stern's sufferings and imprisonment. This happened in October, 1863, and not till April 11, 1868, were the prisoners delivered. Having recovered from his many sufferings, Stern accepted in 1870 the charge of the Home Mission in London. He died May 31, 1888. (B. P.)

Steuber, Johann Engelhard, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born March 16, 1638, at Marburg. In 1716 he commenced his academic career at Jena, was in 1721 professor at Rinteln, and died Dec. 6, 1747. He published, De Primaevita, etc. (Marburg, 1711); - De Deo Jovino (Rinteln, 1720); - Legitimationi Feti- rorum ad Cornua Alaria (1723); - De Sipio Filii Hominis ad Matt. xxiv, 36 (ed.); - De Mortuo Psalmorum Nexu (1735); - De Philosophia Platonico-Pythagorica (1744). See During, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschland, s. v., etc. (B. P.)

Stevens, John, D.D., a Baptist minister and educator, was born at Townsend, Mass, June 6, 1798. He graduated from Middlebury College, Vt., in 1821, had charge of the Montpelier Academy for one year, then entered Andover Theological Seminary, was converted, and in 1823 was baptized and united with the First Church in Salem, Mass. From 1825 to 1828 he was a tutor in Middlebury College, and then, for three years, classical teacher in South Reading (now Wakefield) Academy. From 1821 to 1825 he was editor of the Ohio Baptist Journal, and was then chosen professor of moral and intellectual philosophy in Granville College (now Denison University), a position which he occupied till 1845, when he accepted an appointment from the Missionary Union as district secretary for the states of Ohio and Indiana, and held this important office till 1848. In 1844 he was ordained in Cincinnati. In all educational matters affecting the welfare of the denomination he took great interest. For several years he was secretary of the Western Baptist Education Society; and was one of the early and warm friends of the theological institution established at Covington, Ky., and of the institution established at Fairmount, near Cincinnati. He was appointed professor of Greek and Latin in Denison University in 1859, and when a division was made in the two departments, he retained the chair of Latin until 1875; on his resignation he was continued "emeritus" professor. He died in Granville, Ohio, April 30, 1877. See Catbire, Baptist Encyclopedia, p. 1103. (J. C. S.)

Stevenson, Andrew, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Strabane, Ireland, in 1810. He came to America when a young man, and after passing through a literary and theological course, was ordained pastor of the Reformed Presbyterian church in New York City. He remained pastor of this church until his health failed, and on his resignation was continued senior pastor until his death, June 29, 1891. (W. P. S.)

Stewart, Abel T., D.D., a Reformed (Dutch) minister, was born at Somerville, N. J., Aug. 4, 1822. He graduated from Rutgers College in 1843, from the New Brunswick Seminary in 1846; and in the same year was licensed by the Classis of New Brunswick, was pastor at Greenville from 1846 to 1850, and at Greenville and Brunswick from 1850 to 1852; First Church, Tarrytown, from 1852 to 1866, Holland, Mich., from 1866 to 1878, and died May 24, 1878, at Watkins, N.Y. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America (5th ed.), p. 468.

Stewart, Alexander, a Scotch prelate, was first prior of Whithorn and then abbot of Inchaffray. He was made bishop of Moray in 1237, and remained until 1255.

Stewart, Andrew (1), a Scotch prelate, was subdean of Glasgow in 1456, and soon after rector of Monkland. In 1477 he was provost of Lincluden. He was elected dean of the faculty in the University of Glasgow, and was made bishop of Moray in 1482. He still held that office in 1492, and died in 1501. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 145.

Stewart, Andrew (2), a Scotch prelate, was made bishop of Caithness in 1490. He died June 17, 1518. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 214.

Stewart, Ios., Charles James, D.D., a Canadian prelate, was born April 13, 1775. He was educated at All Souls' College, Oxford, England, of which he became a fellow; ordained, and became rector of Oxford and Lyncombe, 1811, and in 1807 proceeded to Canada as a missionary. He first settled at St. Armand, thence removed to Holy, and on Jan. 1, 1826, was consecrated bishop of Quebec. He died July 15, 1837. Bishop Stewart was pre-eminently a faithful and successful missionary, and adopted field of labor. See The Church of England Magazine, July, 1838, p. 55.

Stewart, Charles Samuel, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Flemington, N. J., Oct. 16, 1798. He graduated from New Jersey College in 1815, and from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1819; was ordained Aug. 14, 1821; served as a missionary to the Sandwich Islands from 1822 to 1825, became chaplain in the United States navy in 1826, made his last cruise in 1862, and died at Cooperstown, N. Y., Dec. 14, 1870. He edited the United States Naval Magazine in 1856 and 1857, and published several interesting books of travel and description, for which see Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Stewart, David, a Scotch presbyte, was bisho of the see of Moray in 1462, and continued there until his death in 1477. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 144.

Stewart, Edward, a Scotch presbyte, was bishop of Ockney about 1511. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 223.

Stewart, James (1), a Scotch presbyte, was dean of the see of Moray and lord-treasurer afterwards, in 1453, and in 1459 was advanced to the bishopric. He died in 1462. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 144.

Stewart, James (2), a Scotch presbyte, was elected to the bishopric of St. Andrews in 1457, and in 1508 was both bishop and chancellor. This prelate also held the monastery of Arbroath. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 32.

Stewart, Robert (1), a Scotch presbyte, was elected bishop of the see of Caithness in 1542. He never was in priest’s orders. He had the title of bishop in September 1543, and died at St. Andrews, March 29, 1580. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 215.

Stewart, Robert (2), a veteran missionary of the Presbyterian Board, was born in Kentucky in May, 1796. He was licensed to preach and ordained for mission work in southern Illinois, where he spent a long, laborious, and successful ministry, preaching to the very last of his life. He organized many churches in that destitute region, which he supplied with preaching, and multitudes, through his instrumentality, were brought into the fold of Christ. After an active service of over fifty years, he died, in Troy, Madison Co., Ill., July 11, 1881. See Presbyterian Monthly Record, Sept. 1881. (W. P. S.)

Steward, Thomas, a Scotch presbyte, was archdeacon of St. Andrews, and was elected bishop of the same in 1401, but declined. He probably died about 1414. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 27.

Stewart, William, a Scotch prelate, was born in Glasgow about 1473. He was doctor of laws and afterwards minister of Lochmaben, then rector of Ayr, and a prebendary of Glasgow. In 1527 he was preferred to the deanery of Glasgow, and in 1528 sat in parliament. In 1530 he was made lord-treasurer and privy seal of Scotland, and was elected bishop of Aberdeen in 1532. After having resigned the treasurership, he died about 1545. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 121.

Stiebritz, Johann Friedrich, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Halle, Aug. 7, 1707. He studied there and at Jena, commenced his academical career at Gießen in 1731, was professor at Halle in 1738, and died Dec. 12, 1772. Stiebritz published, De A ccommodatio, etc., in which see Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Stockey, John, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Castle Donington, Leicestershire, England. He was born at Canongate when about twenty years of age, received into the ministry in 1828, and appointed to eastern Canada. From 1829 to 1829 he labored on the Gibraltar mission, leaving the Church there in much prospering. In 1833 he resumed his work in Canada, spending the years in Kingston and five in Toronto, being general superintendent of the mission and president of the Canadian Conference in 1888. In 1842 he for the first time received an appointment to a circuit in England (Sevenoaks), and after laboring in Sheffield, Leeds, London, Bradford, and Manchester, he again left for Canada. In 1848 he was again president of the Canadian Conference, and he spared no labor to meet the demands upon his time and talents. There was a genial warmth and suavity in his spirit and manners: he had a well-cultivated mind and a fine taste. He died in Toronto, Aug. 26, 1862, in his sixty-first year. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1867, p. 18; Minutes of Canadian Conferences, 1868; Carroll, Case and His Contemporaries, index, vol. v.

Stip, Gerhard Chrino Hermann, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born May 4, 1805, at Nordt, East Friesia. He studied at Göttingen and Bonn, and was for a time preacher to a country congregation. He then travelled through Switzerland, and settled for a time at Berne, where he became acquainted with Schneekenburger. In 1841 he lived in London, in the house of Bunsen, whose sons he instructed. Having returned to Germany, he settled at Alexanderwijk, near Potsdam, and died June 21, 1882. Stip belongs to the most prominent hymnologists of the 19th century, and published, Beleuchung der Gesangbuchbesorgung (Gotha, 1842, 2 vols.); — Hymnologische Reisebriefe (1858, 2 vols.); — Kirchenfreund und Kirchenrath (cod.); — Das Kirchenrecht und die kirchenpolitische Brandfuß (1854); — Unverfälschter Liederessigs (1851); — Das Kleinen der evangelischen Religionsfreie: Erhalt uns Herr bei deinem Wort (1855), etc. See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. s. v. (B. P.) Stockton, John, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born near Washington, Pa., Nov. 18, 1808. He graduated from Washington College in 1829, and was for two years teacher of Latin in that institution; prosecuted his theological studies under Rev. Drs. Wylie and Anderson, and spent one year (1825–26) in Princeton Theological Seminary; was ordained pastor of the Cross Creek Church, Allegheny, in 1827, and remained in his charge until 1877, when he was released from responsible duties, with the title of pastor emeritus. During the fifty years of his pastorate, fifteen hundred and forty-five men were added to the Church, more than forty ministers of the Gospel were raised up, and one hundred elders were ordained. One year after his settlement he founded a classical school, which was a means of great usefulness to the surrounding country. He died at Cross Creek, May 5, 1882. See Kerrol, Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1888, p. 20. (W. P. S.)

stant contributor to its press, was born at Burlington, N. J., April 8, 1785. From a youth he developed a taste for good reading that never left him. In 1820 his first book was published, entitled Truth Versus a Wesleyan Methodism, and in 1821 he published a series of sermons, aimed against the use of spirituous liquors as a beverage. He became identified with the periodical known as The Wesleyan Repository, and was one of the first to agitate with his pen the subject of lay representation. He assisted in the publication of the first American issue of Wesley's work, and wrote the article on "The Methodist Protestant Church" in Hay's edition of Buck's Theological Dictionary, contributed to the secular press as an editorial writer, and also wrote for Methodist periodicals. One of his most important literary undertakings was the publication of Whitehead's Life of John and Charles Wesley. He was a distinguished philanthropist, and as such was well known in the city of Philadelphia. In 1860 he removed to Burlington, the place of his birth, and died there, Nov. 20 of that year. See Colhouer, Founders of the M. P. Church, 48.

Stover, Martin Luther, LL.D., a Lutheran educator, was born at Germantown, Pa., Feb. 17, 1830. In 1833 he entered the preparatory department of Pennsylvania College at Gettysburg, and graduated from that institution in 1838. In the fall of that year he took charge of a school in Jefferson, Md. One year after he returned to the preparatory department of Pennsylvania College, assisting also in the college proper. During the presidency of Dr. Krauth, professor Stover lived in the college building, acting as president pro tem. The last ten years of his life were spent especially devoted to instruction in Latin. His literary labors were almost entirely confined to the Evangelical Quarterly Review, in every number of which, from its beginning in 1849, with the exception of two issues, one or more of his articles appeared. In 1862 he became sole editor and proprietor of that periodical. During the winter he was intimately connected with the United States Christian Commission. It was his original purpose to enter the Lutheran ministry, but he was deterred by his hesitancy of speech. In many respects he was one of the most distinguished men in his Church. He died in Philadelphia, July 22, 1870. See Fifty Years in the Lutheran Ministry, 1878, p. 222.

Stohlman, Charles F. E., D.D., a Lutheran minister, was born at Klein Bremen, kingdom of Hanover, Germany, Feb. 21, 1810. He studied at the gymnasia of Bückeburg; was a student of theology at the University of Breslau under Dr. Tholuck. After his graduation came to America, in September, 1834, and, with his family, settled in Erie, Pa., taking charge of a small congregation. He began his career in New York city, Sept. 12, 1838, as pastor of St. Matthew's German Lutheran Church, in Walker Street, a position which he held until his death, May 3, 1866. See Lutheran Observer, May 15, 1866.

Stolz, Alban, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born Feb. 3, 1808, at Bühl, Baden. In 1833 he was made a priest; was for some time vicar at Rothenfels, in 1841 teacher at the gymnasium in Bruchsal; in 1848 professor of pastoral theology at Freiburg, and died Oct. 16, 1883. Stolz's writings comprise thirteen volumes (Freiburg, 1877 sq.). (B.P.)

Stone, James R., D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Westbrook, Mass., in 1818. He removed to Providence, R. I., when a child, and united with the First Baptist Church in that city in 1835. After studies at Brown University, he became principal of Washington Academy, in Wickford, and, in 1839, was ordained pastor of the church in that place. A few years afterwards he became pastor of the Stewart Street Church, in Providence; subsequently held pastorates in Connecticut, New York, Pennsylvania, and Rhode Island. For two years he had charge of the Worcester (Mass.) Academy. In 1864 he was appointed district secretary of the American Baptist Publication Society for West Virginia, Ohio, Indiana, and Michigan. He was for several years pastor of the church in Fort Wayne, Ind. In 1869 he removed to Lansing, Mich. His last pastorate in that city was in Lansing, Mich. He died Feb. 1, 1884. See Cattcarr, Baptist Enclav. p. 119. (J. C. S.)

Stone, John Seely, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal divine, was born at West Stockbridge, Mass., in 1785. He graduated from Union College in 1802; was ordained deacon in 1802; began his ministry in Maryland; was afterwards (1832-41) in New Haven, Conn., Boston, Mass., Brooklyn, N. Y., and Brooklyn, Mass.; was some years lecturer in the Philadelphia Divinity School; in 1869 became dean of the Theological School at Cambridge, Mass., and died there, Jan. 13, 1882. Besides numerous tracts, etc., he published, The Mysteriae Opened (1844);—Life of Bishop Griswold (ed.);—The Church Universal (1846); enlarged under the title The Living Temple, 1866;—The Contrast (1853);—Life of James Milner (1854);—Lectures on the Christian Subliff (1867);—The Christian Sacrarium (ed.).

Stork, Theophilus, D.D., a Lutheran minister, son of Rev. Charles A. G. Stork, of Brunswick, Germany, was born near Salisbury, N. C., in August, 1814. He graduated from Pennsylvania College in 1835, and from Gettysburg (Theological Seminary) in 1837. In each year he was licensed to preach, and was immediately called to Grace Lutheran Church, Winchester, Va. In 1841 he became pastor of St. Matthew's Church, Philadelphia, where he labored nine years. In 1842 he was one of the active promoters of the organization of the East Pennsylvania Synod. The large church, known as St. Mark's, in Philadelphia, was organized by him in 1850. Eight years after he was called to the presidency of the new Lutheran Church at Newberry, S. C. In 1850 he became pastor of St. Mark's Church, in Baltimore, Md., where he labored until 1865, and then returned to Philadelphia and organized St. Andrew's Church, which was afterwards merged in the Messiah Mission, since the Church of the Messiah. Impaired health compelled him to resign pastoral labor in 1873. He died in Philadelphia, March 10, 1874. Dr. Stork was a scholar of fine literary taste, an elegant writer, and an eloquent preacher. At various times he was editor of the Home Journal, of the Lutheran Home Monthly, and joint editor of the Lutheran Observer; also author of, Luther at Home;—Luther and the Bible;—Luther's Christmas Tree;—Luther's Epistle of the Lord's Supper;—Notes on the New Testament;—Jesus in the Temple;—Afternoon. A volume of his sermons was published after his death. See Pennsylvania College Year-book, 1889, p. 201.

Stoehl, Eberhard Heinrich Daniel, a Reformed theologian of Germany, was born at Liebenberg, Prussia, March 16, 1716, and studied at Frankfort-on-the-Oder. In 1738 he was assistant preacher at Jerichau, in 1744 to Soldin, in 1748 professor at Daisburg, in 1749 at Frankfort, and died March 27, 1781, doctor of theology. He published, Commentaria Historicall-Theological Bibliotheca Germanica (Frankfort, 1775);—De Ecclesia Divinae Bibliothecae Inspirationi Testandae (1751);—De Septem Dominis Occulta Periblustrum totam Terram ex Zachar. ver. 10 (1751);—De Revelatione Divinae Ante Mosis Scriptura Commentarii;—Theologia Dogetica (1778);—Institutio Theologia Dogmatica (1779). See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, a. v.; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. a. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theolog. Lit. 4, 77, 292, 303, 394, 555. (B. P.)

Stoehr, Ferdinand, a brother of the foregoing, was born Dec. 80, 1717, at Liebenberg. He studied at Frankfort, was in 1749 con-rector at Lingen, in 1741.
STOWELL, William Henry, D.D., an English Congregational minister, was born on the Isle of Man in 1800. He entered secular business at an early age in Liverpool; was then persuaded to enter the ministry; studied theology at Blackheath Academy, and settled as pastor at North Shields in 1821. In 1838 he was invited to the presidency of Rotherham Independent College, and the pastorite at Masborough, which offices he filled until his acceptance of the presidency of Cheshunt College in 1856. He retired from public duty about a year and a half before his death, which took place at his residence at Bransbury, Jan. 2, 1858. Dr. Stowell's scholarship was extensive and varied. He was well acquainted with history and ethics, good in the classics, and able in theology. He published, History of the New Testament Church in England, in the Order of Richard Winter Hamilton, D.D., L.L.D. (1850): The Work of the Spirit (1858), and a volume of sermons, as well as several lesser works. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1859, p. 222; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Strachan, David, a Scotch prelate, was pastor of Fettercairn, and upon the king's restoration promoted to the see of Brechin, and consecrated June 1, 1662, where he continued until his death in 1671. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 167.

Strain, John, D.D., a Scotch Catholic prelate, was born Dec. 8, 1810. He was consecrated bishop of Abila (d'portibus) by Pius IX, Sept. 25, 1864, and appointed vicar-apostolic of the eastern district of Scotland. On the restoration of the hierarchy by Leo XIII, in March, 1878, he was translated to the archiepiscopal see of St. Andrews and Edinburgh. He died July 2, 1888.

Strathbrock, Robert, a Scotch prelate, was bishop of Caithness about 1444. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 214.

Strasser, Carl, a Lutheran minister of Germany, was born at Berlin, Oct. 27, 1807. After completing his theological studies, he assisted his father in the ministry at Mittenwalde from 1829 to 1835, was then appointed pastor at Werder, in 1836 at Falkenhagen, and died March 2, 1861. Strasser was very active in the work of home and foreign missions, and his Reisetpaler has become a household work in the Christian families of Germany. (B. P.)

Straus, Otto, son of Gerhard Friedrich Abraham (q. v.), who died March 6, 1880, is the author of Nakum de Nino Vaticinium Explicatum ex Assyris Monumentis (Berlin, 1853), the publication of which appeared at the same time as an article in the University University. In 1857 he was military preacher at Posen, and in 1865 first preacher of the Sophienkirche, in Berlin, where he labored to his end. Besides the work on Nakum, he published, Nimiue und das Wort Gottes (1855); Der Paterl als Granum- und Getreide (1859); and, in connection with his brother, Friedrich Adolph, Länder und Städte der heiligen Schrift (1861). See Pank, Zur Erinnerung an Lic. Otto Straus (Berlin, 1880). (B. P.)

Strockland, William Peter, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal, and later a Presbyterian, was born at Pittsburgh, Pa., Aug. 17, 1829. He studied at the Ohio University, entered the Ohio Conference in 1832, labored several years in Cincinnati, and then became agent of the American Bible Society. In 1856 he engaged in literary labor in New York, chiefly in connection with the Methodist press, and as assistant editor of the Christian Advocate. In 1862 he was chosen pastor of the New York regiment at Port Royal, S. C. In 1863 he supplied the pulpit of the Presbyterian Church at Bridgehampton, L. I., and in 1874 was installed its pastor. Three years later he resigned through ill-health, and retired to private literary pursuits. He was born at Grove, N. J., July 15, 1848. Dr. Strockland was a frequent contributor to the religious journals, and also to the cyclopædas, and was the author of numerous volumes, of which we may mention, Hist. of the Amer. Bible Society (New York, 1849; new ed. 1856); Hist. of Missionary Work in the United States (1851); Christianity Defended (1852); Memoir of J. B. Finley (1858); Manual of Biblical Literature (ed.); Light of the Temple (1864); Astrolabe of Chaldea (1866); Pioneers of the West (ed.); Life of Asbury (1858); Life of Groves (1869); Old Macbeth (1860); besides editing the Literary Casket, the Western Review, and the Autobiography of Peter Cartwright (1856).

Strobel, Georg Theodor, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Sept. 12, 1786, and studied at Altdorf. In 1812 he was preacher at Rastch in the neighborhood of Altdorf, in 1774 at Würz, and died Dec. 14, 1794. Strobel published, Melanchthoniana (Alteldorf, 1771): Nachrichten von den Verdiensten Melanchthon's um die heilige Schrift (1778); Bibliotheca Melanchthoniana (Nuremberg, 1778; 2d ed. 1802); Literaturgeschichte von Ph. Melanchthon's Leben. Theologica (1778); Ph. Melanchthonis Libellus de Scripturis Ecclesiasticis (1780), etc. See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theolog. Lit. i, 296, 745, 746, 767, 851. (B. P.)

Stuart, Andrew, a Scotch prelate, was postulated bishop of the see of Dunkeld in 1515, and was afterwards put into the see of Caithness. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 93.

Stuart, John, D.D., an Episcopal minister, was born at Harrisburg, Pa., in 1740. He graduated at the College of Philadelphia, was ordained in 1776, and appointed to the curacy at Port Hunter. In 1786 he published a Mohawk translation of the gospel of Mark, an Exposition of the Church Catechism, and a compendious History of the Bible. During the revolutionary war he became an object of suspicion, and was subjected to many hardships. At length he removed to Canada, and in 1789 he was appointed an academy at Kingston. About 1799 he was appointed chaplain to the garrison. He died at Kingston in August, 1811. He has been called the "Father of the Upper Canada Church." See Sabin, Loyalties of the Revolution War, ii, 339. (J. C. S.)

Stuart, Robert L., a philanthropic merchant, was born in the city of New York, 1806. He inherited a considerable fortune from his father, together with his business, the refining of sugar and the manufacture of candy, by which he amassed a large property, and liberally contributed of it for religious and benevolent purposes, especially to the library and mission enterprises of the Presbyterian Church, of which he was a consistent and devout member. He died in his native city, Dec. 13, 1888. It is estimated that he gave more than three million dollars.

Stubbs, Alfred, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born at Turku, Island, West Indies, May 12, 1815. He passed his school-days at Birmingham and in Brooklyn, graduated at Yale College in 1835, and at the General Theological Seminary, New York city, in 1839. In the latter year he was chosen rector of Christ Church, New Brunswick, a position which he continued to hold until his death, Dec. 11, 1882. His was a warm-hearted and generous man, and of uniting energy and earnest devotion to the principles of the Church. In the conviction of the diocese he took an active and leading part, and frequently was sent as deputy to the General Convention. He had been for a long time in the Senate Committee. In 1867 Dr. Stubbs made a charge against the Rev. Stephen H. Tyng, Jr., of violating the canon laws of the Church by preaching in a Methodist meeting-house in New Brunswick. Dr. Stubbs was a prominent person in that trial, which attracted wide attention.

STUTTENVILLE, Rossett Dr, a Scotch prelate, was probably bishop of the see of Dunkirk in 1772. He died in 1801. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 81.

Stütze, Johann Nepomuk, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, born in 1807 at Schwerin, Württemberg, was made a priest in 1832 at Augsburg, called to Balzhausen, Augsburg diocese, in 1849, and died April 17, 1874. He published, Ferschung einer Harmonierung der Welt- und Kirchengeistes (Zürich, 1868):—Handbuch zum römisch-katholischen Religionsunterricht (Augsburg, 1868, 2 vols.):—Stunden der Andacht für Katholiken (Troppau, 1869–73). (B. P.)

Styles, John, D.D., an English Congregational minister and author, commenced his ministry in early life at Cowes, Isle of Wight, thence removing to Brighton, where for many years he attracted large audiences. His next charge was Holland Chapel, North Brixton, which he built, and which he left in 1835. From 1836 to 1844 he officiated in Clayasdale Chapel, at the same place. In the latter year he became pastor at Foleshill, where he remained until his death at Kennington, June 22, 1849. A masculine energy, a noble generosity and benevolence of disposition, were his characteristics. His mind was energetic and powerful, he could write on almost any topic, was an acute critic, had superior colloquial and written grace of fancy, and his style was polished, vivacious, and luminous. Dr. Styles published, An Essay on the Stage (2nd ed. Lond. 1807; 12mo):—Legend of the Velvet Cushion (exposing in a masterly manner a writer on the Puritans):—Sermons (ibid. 1813, 1823, 2 vols. 8vo) the sentiment of one's own Spirituality of God (Isle of Wight, 1806), and that on Temptations of a Watering-Place (Brighton, 1815) were published separately:—Sermon on Lord Byron's Works (Lond. 1824):—Prize Essay on the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals (elegant and convincing):—Critical Papers in Words's Magazine, no. 68 in the Evangelical Magazine. See (Lond.) Evangelical Magazine, August, 1849, p. 389.

SUMMERS, THOMAS OSBORN, D.D., LL.D., an eminent divine of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born near Corfe Castle, Isle of Purbeck, Dorsetshire, England, Oct. 11, 1812. He was trained by Dissenters, came to America while a youth, joined the Methodistists in 1832, was converted the following year, soon began to preach, and entered the Baltimore Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1835. In 1840 he became a missionary in Texas, and was one of the first members of that conference; was transferred to the Alabama conference in 1844, with which he ever afterwards remained connected, occupying for several years its most important charges, and afterwards engaged in literary work, as the editor of the Southern Christian Advocate (1846), of the Quarterly Review of the M. E. Church South (1855), and other periodicals. He acted as secretary of every General Conference of his Church, from its organization in 1845 to his death, which occurred during the session of that body at Nashville, Tenn., May 5, 1862. During the civil war he served as a pastor in Alabama, and for several of its later years he was a professor in the Vanderbilt University. He was a man of encyclopedic information, unfettered diligence, and wide liberality of sentiment. He wrote and edited very many works for the press of his Church, and numerous articles of value for its journals. See Minutes of the Annual Conferences of the

M. E. Church South, 1882, p. 125; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.; Life by Fitzgerald (Nashville, 1884).

SUMNER, CHARLES RICHARD, D.D., an English prelate, was born at Kenilworth, Warwickshire, in 1790. He was educated at Eton and at Trinity College, Cambridge; became rector of St. Helen's, Abingdon, Bucks, and librarian and historiographer to George IV; prebend of Worcester in 1822; of Canterbury in 1825; dean of St. Paul's, prebend of London, and bishop of Llandaff, all in April, 1826; was translated to Winchester in 1827; and resigned his see, on account of the infirmities of age, in September, 1868. He died Aug. 15, 1874. Bishop Sumner was an earnest, evangelical preacher, and a hearty supporter of the Bible and missionary societies. He published, Professiones Academicae Oxoniensis Habilis (Lond. 1860):—Biographical Character of Christ (partly Considered) (ibid. 1824, 8vo; 2d ed. 1833, 8vo), and several Charges. See (Lond.) Christian Observer, May, 1876, p. 325.

SUPPER, the Last, is a modern phrase often used to designate the Lord's Supper, in view of the fact that it was the last meal of which Jesus partook with his disciples (Matt. xxvi., 29; Mark xiv., 25; Luke xxi. 19). The circumstances of the repast have been so fully discussed in preceding articles that it remains to consider more particularly only one feature, namely, the relative position of the guests at the table: as this reflects special light upon several incidents and expressions in the narratives of the evangelists.

1. Supper would properly be that of honor among the disciples; and it is agreed upon all hands that such was by custom the uppermost or left-hand one on the highest or left-hand wing of the triclinium or dinner-bed, reckoned according to the fact that the guests reclined upon their left side (so as to leave the right hand free for eating with), each facing the person next below. In this arrangement also it would be the first to whom the Master would come for the foot-washing, as is evident from the account of that incident ("began," John xiii., 5). Moreover, he would thus be opposed charges, and sufficiently removed from him to render "beckoning," necessary in order to ascertain through him the person of the traitor (John xiii., 34).

2. The interesting group of which the Lord himself formed the centre consisted, besides him, of Judas and John, who were so situated that the latter, as he lay "in Jesus' bosom," could lean back (ἀποκοσμός, John xiii., 25, for which many read ἀποκοσμεῖται, both to be carefully distinguished from the ἀποκοσμεῖται of the verse preceding), and whisper to the Master; and the former so located that he could readily receive the sop from the Master's hands. All this renders it plain that Judas occupied the honorable position above, i.e. at the back of Jesus; and John the next favored location below or just in front of him.

According to classical etiquette, the master or host reclined in the middle of the plate or dish; and in that case the arrangement of the whole would be as in the accompanying diagram (see Smith, Diet. of Class. Antiq. s. v., triclinium). This meets the ordinary sense of propriety also. But Edersheim maintains (Life and...

Time of Jesus, iii, 494, from certain rabbinical notices, that the appropriate place for the giver of the facts is at the foot of the table, and in that case John would be exactly opposite Peter, at the other extreme of the entire series, as the subjoined diagram. In this way, however, these two disciples would seem to be too near each other to suit the need of signs, since they could freely converse across Supposed Rabbinical Order at the Last Supper.

Saskland, Friedrich Gottlob von, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born Feb. 17, 1877. He studied at Tübingen, was in 1798 deacon at Urach, in 1798 teacher at Tübingen, in 1805 court-preacher and member of consistory at Stuttgart, and died Nov. 12, 1829. He published: Quaest. Sacrae Sacer. Josephus Doctrinae Divinae Perhibita (Tübingen, 1798-1801; in German, ibid. 1802) — Symbola ad Illustrandum Quaedam Ecclesiast. Loca (1802-1804, 8 parts) — Magazin für Christliche Dogmatik und Moral (1803-12) — Prüfung der Schelling'schen Lehre vom Gott (1812). See Doring, Die deutschen Konzilredner, p. 502-505; Winer, Handbuch der Theol., ii, 1, 249, 400. (F. P.)

Sutcliffe, Joseph, M.A., an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Baldon, Yorkshire. He was converted in early life, was appointed by Wesley to Redruth in 1786, introduced Methodism into the Scilly Isles in 1788, spent the last twenty years of his life in retirement in London, and died May 14, 1856. His course was one of "unspotted Christian purity and progressive excellence. In Biblical scholarship he especially excelled." He was an indefatigable writer, publishing in all thirty-two works on religious subjects, the chief being A Commentary on the Old and New Testament (London, 1848, 2 vols. royal 8vo). See Minutes of the British Conference, 1856, p. 211; Stevens, Hist. of Methodism, ii, 434; Smith, Hist. of Wes. Methodism, ii, 647; Wes. Meth. Magazine, 1856, p. 508; Osmaston, Meth. Biog., p. 161, Wesleyan Tithings, i, 303.

Sutton, Amos, D.D., an English Baptist minister, was born at Sevonoka, Kent, Jan. 21, 1802. At fifteen he resided in London, at twenty returned home and joined the Baptist Church. He was accepted as a general Baptist missionary, and sailed for Calcutta in 1824, thence to Cuttack, Orissa, India, where he labored till his health failed in 1829, and then returned to England. He returned to Cuttack in 1837, and labored till 1847, when he had again to seek rest in England, and became pastor at Leicester. In 1850 he returned again to India by way of America. He reached his station in Bombay only on Aug. 17, 1851.

Swain, Thomas, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Pemberton, N.J., March 80, 1817. He was for a time a student in Brown University in the class of 1888, and having completed his college course in Madison University, graduated from Hamilton Theological Seminary in 1841. He was ordained in November, 1841, at W. Washington, Pa. And the end of four years' successful labor, he accepted an agency in the service of the missionary union for six months, and then was pastor in Flemington, N. J., sixteen years. In 1867 he became the financial secretary of the New Jersey Classical and Scientific Institute at Hightstown, and in 1868 district secretary of the American Baptist Home Missionary Society. He died in Philadelphia, Pa., March 24, 1884. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclopedia. p. 1124. (J. C. S.)

Swain, Leonard, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Northfield, N. H., Feb. 26, 1821. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1841, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1846; was immediately ordained pastor of the Church in Nashua, establishing from the outset a reputation as an able and eloquent preacher. His next pastorate was over the Central Church of Providence, R. I., from 1852 to 1869. For nearly two years he was laid aside from his work, and died July 14, 1869. See Rhode Island Biographical Cyclopaedia, a. v. (J. C. S.)

Swan, James Smith, a noted Baptist evangelist, was born at Stonington, Conn., Feb. 23, 1806. He had early educational advantages; was converted at the age of twenty-one; licensed the following year; studied at the Hamilton Institute, N. Y.; became pastor at Stonington in 1827; Norwich, N. Y., in 1830; Preston in 1837; Oxford in 1842; New London, Conn., in 1843; Albany, N. Y., in 1846; at New London again in 1849; served as a missionary through the states of from 1852 to 1863. For several years became pastor at Watertown, where his health failed in 1862; and died Nov. 19, 1884. He was powerful in prayer and preaching, and great revivals followed his labors. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclopedia, a. v.

Syderer, Thomas, a Scotch prelate, was translated from Orkney to Galloway in 1638, and was excommunicated. He was the only bishop who survived the troubles, and then was translated to the see of Orkney, Nov. 14, 1602. He died in February, 1676. See Keith, Annales Diaconiae, 229, 281.

Sydow, Karl Leopold Adolf, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born Nov. 23, 1800, at Berlin. He studied theology under Schleiermacher; in 1828 was chaplain and tutor in the military school at Berlin, and in 1857 was called as court and military chaplain to Potsdam. In 1841 he was sent by Frederic William IV to England, to study there, in connection with other commissioners, the institutions for the religious care of the population of London and other large cities, and to report of his experience, and at the same time of the newly founded Anglo-Prussian bishopric at Jerusalem. This he did in the work, Deutsche Berichte über die Zeit in England erreichte Thätigkeits für die Vermehrung und Erweiterung der kirchlichen Anstalten (1845). As this mission brought him in connection with the queen of England and prince Albert, he was requested to prepare a paper on the movement then pending in Scotland for separating the Church from the State. This he did in his Heirldger zur Characteristik der kirchlichen Dinge in Grossbritannien (1844-45, 2 parts), in which he freely advocated the separation. In 1846 he accepted a call as pastor of the Neue Kirche in Berlin, which position he occupied till the year 1876. In connection with Eltzer, Thomas, and Fischon, he published the Monatschrift, afterwards Zeitschrift für die unirte Kirche, which, in 1854, was replaced by the Protestantische Kirchenzeitung. In 1848 he was a member of the Berlin National-assembly, and ten years later the theological faculty of Jena honored him with the doctorate of theology.

Sylburg, Friedrich, a German scholar, was born in 1586 at Weeze, near Marburg, and died Feb. 16, 1636.
at Heidelberg. Sylburg is known as the editor of some of the works of the Church fathers, to which he made annotations. Thus he edited the works of Clement of Alexandria, in Greek and Latin (Heidelberg, 1892), an edition which is still highly praised. See Jocher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Winet, Handbuch der theolog. Lit. i, 831, 883, 888, 896. (B. P.)

Syme, Andrew, D.D., an Episcopal minister, was born in Lanarkshire, Scotland, in September, 1764. He went to Petersburg, Va., before 1800, and remained till his death, Oct. 26, 1845, being at the time the oldest citizen in the town, and the oldest clergyman in the state. See Sturgis, Amer. Bioi. Notes, p. 886. (J. C. S.)

Symington, W., D.D., a minister in the Reformed Presbyterian Church of Scotland, was born in 1796, and died at Glasgow, professor of theology in the seminary of his mother Church, Jan. 29, 1862, in the forty-third year of his ministry. His works on the Atonement and Intercession of Christ, and on The Mediatorial Dominion of Christ, were the best known to the public. He was also the author of a volume of Sermons. See Appleton's Annual Cyclop. 1882, p. 688.

Symmons, Charles, D.D., a Church of England divine, was born in 1749. He was educated at Westminster, at the University of Glasgow, and at Clare Hall, Cambridge, where he took the degree of B.D. in 1776. He was presented to the rectory of Netherth by the king in 1778, and died at Bath, April 27, 1828. His first publication was in 1788, an octavo volume of Sermons. In 1789 he published in quarto a Sermon for the Benefit of Deceased Persons, in the Diocese of St. Davids; and in 1790, The Consequence of the Character of the Individual, and the Influence of Education in Forming It; in 1797 he produced Inex, a dramatic poem; and in 1800 another called Constantia. In 1806 appeared his Life of Milton, prefixed to an edition of Milton's prose works, of which he was not the editor. In 1818 he published an octavo volume of poems, partly his own, and partly the compositions of his wondrously gifted, but then deceased, daughter. Subsequently he spent his hours with writing a Dysthene Translation of the Envid, which was published in 1817. His last work was a sketch of Shakespeare's life. See (Lond.) Annual Register, 1826, p. 247.

Syria (Modern Version of the Scriptures). The modern Syriac language, written in Nestorian characters, and spoken by the Christians of the latter name, is a very corrupt dialect of the ancient Syriac, abounding in Persian, Turkish, and Kurdish words, and pronounced very harshly. Mr. Perkins, of the American Board of Missions, commenced, in 1836, a translation of the Scriptures from the ancient or ecclesiastical language into the vernacular now known among the people. The gospels were soon issued from the press at Oromiah, and later the entire Bible. See Bible of Every Land, p. 46.

Syro-Roman Christians are a class of converts to the Roman faith in Malabar and Travancore, in India. They have their own bishops and priests. Their forefathers appear to have belonged to the Christians of St. Thomas, as they were called; and were given over to the Roman Church by the Portuguese, who compelled the churches nearest the coast to acknowledge the supremacy of the pope. The Syro-Roman Christians, along with the converts from other tribes in the district, are said to amount to upwards of one hundred thousand. They are allowed to retain their own language in divine worship, as well as their own liturgy, and they have a Syriac college.

Taanach. The present Tawwah lies six miles north-west of Zerka (Jezreel), and is "a small village on the south-east side of the great tell or mound of the same name, at the south-east corner of the great plain (of Esdraelon). It has olives on the south, and wells on the north, and is surrounded by cactus hedges. There is a white dome in the village. The rock on the sides of the tell is quarried in places, the wells are ancient, and rock-cut tombs occur on the north, near the village* (Memorials to Ordnance Survey, ii, 46; comp. p. 63).

Taanath-Shiloh is thought by Tristram (Bible Places, p. 193) and Conder (Ten Tent. Work, ii, 840) to be the present ruin Tav, seven miles south-east of Shechem, and two north of Janohoh (Yanm), containing "foundations, caves, cistern, and rock-cut tombs" (Memorials to Ordnance Survey, ii, 245; comp. p. 63).

Tabaraud, Mathieu Mathurin, a French controversialist, was born at Limoges in 1744. He was educated by the Jesuits, was for some time professor of belles-lettres at Nantes, professor of theology and Hebrew at Arel, in 1783 superior of the college at Peyerne, in 1787 at Rochele, emigrated in 1791 to England, and died at Limoges, Jan. 9, 1825. He published, Traité Historique et Critique de l'Érection des Évêques (Paris, 1792, 2 vols.):—De la Nécessité d'une Religion d'État (1803, 1804):—Principes sur la Distinction du Contract et du Succursal de Mariage (1802, 1816):—Histoire de l'Église Presbyte de France, Fondeur de la Congrégation de l'Oratoire (1817, 2 vols.). Tables, The Four. During the fierce contest in Scotland between the adherents of the Church of England and the Presbyterians, several outbreaks occurred. On Nov. 15, 1557, there was a meeting of the Privy Council, and large numbers of Presbyterians assembled at the capital. In order to prevent any tumultuous commotion, the nobles were requested to use their influence to induce their friends to return to their homes. This was consented to on condition that a sufficient number should remain to look after their interests. It was arranged that as many of the nobility as pleased, two gentlemen from every county, one minister from every presbytery, and one Burgess from every burgh, should be included in a general commission, to represent the whole body of the Presbyterians. Still more to concentrate their efforts, a smaller number was selected, who should reside at Edinburgh, watch the progress of events, and be ready to communicate with the whole body on any emergency. This smaller committee was composed of sixteen persons—four noblemen, four gentlemen, four ministers, and four burgesses, and from the circumstance of their sitting in four separate rooms in the parliament house, they were designated The Four Tables. A member from each of these constituted a chief table of the current, making a council of four members. See Hetherington, Hist. of Church of Scotland, i, 291.

Taboo (or Tabû), an institution common to all the Polynesian tribes, which solemnly interdicted whatever was esteemed defiled. Hence the term was used to designate anything devoted. With persons whom death had thus been tabooed, all intercourse was prohibited. They were tabooed or sacred days, when it was a crime to be found in a canoe. Pork, bananas, cocoa-nuts, and certain kinds of fish were tabooed to women, and it was death for them to eat any of these articles of food. This eating together by man and wife was also tabooed, as was the preparation of their food in the same oven. Anything of which a man made an idol, and articles of food offered to idols, were tabooed to him. There were other instances of taboo, as the arkii, or head chief, of an islet.
and, who was so sacred that his house, garments, and everything relating to him were taboos. The taboo arose from the idea that a portion of the spiritual essence of the divinity indwelling in sacred things and persons was more or less transmitted to anything else brought in contact with it.

Tabor, Mount. For the latest description and plan of Tabor, see the Memoirs to the Ordnance Survey, i. 388 sq.

Tabunisaston, among the Kalmucks, is a deity of the second rank, who has appeared fifty-two times in as many different forms. The principal form is that of a woman, which, in all external appearance, is entirely like that of the Kalmuck women in general. She sits on a throne, and in an elevation, is in part unclothed, and wherever the flesh appears it is painted red. Head-dress and clothing are about tpsantamont to each other in most Kalmuck deities; the lower part of the body is enveloped in a light robe, while the head is crowned with a towering ornament, and adorned with flowers. Tabunisaston holds in her hands a vessel of fruit, and is regarded as the goddess of earthly fruitfulness, with which her frequent reviviscence agrees.

Tae-Kei is the fundamental unity of the Chinese literati, the absolute, or, literally, the "great extreme." Beyond this they allege, no human thought can soar. Itself incomprehensible, it girdles the whole frame of nature, animates and animates. From it, flowers, from the fountain-head of nature, issued everything that is. Creation is the periodic flowing forth of it. Tae-Kei is identical with Le, the immaterial element of the universe.

Tallry, The, a room adjoining the wardrobe in monasteries, where a number of the lay brethren, with a vocation for that useful craft, were continually at work, making and repairing the clothes of the community. These two rooms and the lavatory were in charge of the camerarius or chamberlain. See Hill, English Monastic Life, p. 210.

Tairi, the principal deity of the Sandwich Islanders.

Tait, Archibald Campbell, D.D., LL.D., an English prelate, was born in Edinburgh, Scotland, Dec. 22, 1811. He graduated from the Edinburgh High School, Edinburgh Academy, Glasgow University, and Oxford University, from the last with the highest honors. He became a public examiner of the university, and in 1842 head of the faculty of theology, where he remained until 1853. He was appointed dean of Carlisle in 1850, where he conducted an extra pulpit service, and gave much time to visiting and instructing the poor. In 1866 he became bishop of London, and successfully originated a scheme for the accommodation of the metropolis, by raising in ten years a fund of five million dollars. He was translated to the archiepiscopal see of Canterbury in December, 1868. He presided over the Pan-Anglican Synod in Lambeth in 1867, the Church Congress in Coventry in 1871, and the Congress of Anglican Bishops in Lambeth in 1878. He died in London, Dec. 3, 1882. Archbishop Tait was a churchman of conservative spirit. He wrote, Dangers and Safe- guards of Modern Theology: — The Word of God the Ground of Faith: — Charge to the Clergy: — Some Thoughts on the Duties of the Church of England: — Letters on Education and Reformed Topics, in Scotch and British reviews. Talbot, Richard, an Irish prelate, was collated to the precentorship of Hereford in 1407, and in 1416 was elected to the primacy of Armagh. In 1417 he was consecrated archbishop of the see of Dublin. In 1428 he was lord justice, and subsequently lord chancellor of Ireland. In 1432 he had a grant for all his services of a share of the lands of Matthew St. John, deceased. He was at the same time constituted justice and guardian of the peace in the county of Dublin. In 1426 he reduced the proxies that were formerly paid by the prior and convent of the Holy Trinity to the archbishops of Dublin, from five marks to two and a half, which concession pope Eugenius afterwards confirmed. He was again constituted lord chancellor in 1428. In 1432 he established a chantry in St. Michael's Church, which, from being a chapel, he constituted parochial, and likewise founded the chantry of St. Andrew's Church, for the maintenance of six priests to pray for the king, the founder, and their successors. In 1443 he was elected archbishop of Armagh, but refused the dignity. In 1445 he was a fourth time lord deputy of Ireland, and in 1447 an appointed deputy to the earl of Ormond, viceroy of Ireland. He died August 31, 1454. See D'Alton, Memoirs of the Archbishops of Dublin, p. 158.

Talisman, a word used by the Chaldean magicians to prevent the attacks of evil spirits, injury from wicked sorcery, poison, etc. We give the following translation of part of the seventeenth formula on the tablet found in the library of the royal palace at Nineveh:

"Two double bands of white cloth upon the bed on the platform as a talisman if he binds on the right hand, two double bands of black cloth if he binds on the left hand."

The possessor of this talisman was assured that all evil spirits and other ills would leave him, never to return. These talismans were of different kinds. First of all there were those which consisted of bands of cloth, covered with certain written formulas, and were fastened to the furniture or the garments, like the phylacteries of the Jews. There were also Amulets (q. v.). Vessels, containing food and drink for the gods and genii, were placed in the apartments as protecting talismans. The demons are represented by figures of such hideous forms that it was believed that they would be shown their own image to cause them to flee away. In the museum of the Louvre is a bronze statuette of Assyrian workmanship; a figure of a horrible demon in an upright position, with the body of a dog, the feet of an eagle, the claws of a lion, the tail of a scorpion, the head of a skeleton but half decayed, and adorned with goat's horns, the eyes still remaining, and, lastly, four great expanded wings. See Lennorman, Chaldean Magic, p. 680, Volbeding, Index Programmatum, p. 169; Thomson, List and Book, i. 140, 217; comp. CHARM.

Tall Brothers, an epithet (from their stature) of four Nitian monkeys, named Diquos, Anmonius, Eusebius, and Euthymius, who were reluctantly induced by Theophilus, the patriarch of Alexandria, to leave the desert and receive ordination. They were so disgusted during the troubles of the time of Chrysonotom that they repeated once more to their ascetic life, and, although condemned and denounced, A.D. 401, and even personally attacked by Theophilus, they persisted in remaining there.

Tantalus, a Greek mythological character, was, according to some, a son of Zeus, or, according to others, of Tindarius. All traditions agree in stating that he was a wealthy king, but assigned him to different kingdoms, as Lydia, Sipylus, in Phrygia or Paphlagonia, and Argos or Corinth. Tantalus is peculiarly celebrated in ancient story for the severe punishments inflicted upon him after his death. The following are some of the traditions, of which the most common is that Zeus invited him to his table and communicated his divine counsels to him. Tantalus divulged these secrets, and the god punished him by placing him in the midst of a lake, of which he could never drink, the water always withdrawing when he stopped. Branches laden with fruit hung temptingly near, but withdrew whenever he reached after them. Over his head there was suspended a huge rock ever threatening to crush him, and another tradition relates that, wishing to try the gods, he cut his son Pelops in pieces, boiled them, and set them before the gods as a repast. A third account states that Tantalus stole nectar and ambrosia from the table of the gods, and gave them to his friends; while a fourth relates the following story: Rhea caused the infant Zeus and his nurse to be guarded by a golden dog, whom subsequently Zeus appointed guardian of his temple in Crete. Pandænus stole the dog, and carrying him to Mount Sipylus, in Lydia, gave him to Tantalus to take care of. But when Pandænus demanded the dog back, Tantalus took an oath that he had never received him. The punishment of Tantalus was proverbial in ancient times, and from it the English language has borrowed the verb "to tantalize," that is, to hold out hopes or prospects which can never be realized.

Tantas (from tanas, to believe) are the sacred writings of the Hindoos, which are said to have been composed by Siva, and bear the same relation to the Votaries of Siva that the Parana do to the votaries of Vishnu. The Saiva sect look upon the Tantas as the fifth Veda, and attribute to them equal antiquity, and superior authority. The observances they prescribe have, indeed, in Bengal, almost superseded the original ritual. The date of the first composition is involved in considerable obscurity; but professor Wilson thinks that the system originated early in the Cordic, and that the Laws found on the Indus were written for the female principle and the practices of the Yoga, with the Mantras or mystical formulas of the Vedas. The principal Tantas are the Siyama-raka-sagha, Redrupamala, Mantramohodaki, Saradatuloka, and Kulakatantra. Rammohan Roy alleges, in his Apology for Vedantic Tantras, that the Tantra is as ancient as the Vedas, and that the works and passages, published as if genuine, "with the view of introducing new doctrines, new rites, or new precepts of secular law." Some of the Tantas appear to have been written chiefly in Bengal, and in the eastern districts of India, and the west and south, and the rites they teach having there failed to set aside the ceremonies of the Vedas, although they are not without an important influence upon the belief and practices of the people. The Saktas (q. v.) derive the principles of their sect, and their religious ceremonies, wholly from the Tantras, and hence are often called Tantraitsa.

Tantum Ergo (So great therefore). The concluding part of the hymn for Corpus Christi day, entitled Fange linga, which is sung in the Latin Church when the holy sacrament is exposed for the worship, and elevated for the benediction of the faithful.

"Tantum ergo Sacramentum"
"Veneremur cernut:"
"Et antiquum documentum"
"Novo credimus:"
"Presnet fides supplementum"
"Sensum defectu:"
"Genitori, genitoque"
"Las est jubilatio,"
"Satis, honor, virtus quoque,"
"Sit et benedictio"
"Vindicata, in fine"
"Comparat laudatio. Amen."

Tapestry. The Church of the Middle Ages required for various purposes a great number of tapestries—for domus in the back of the choir-stalls, for closing the doors and windows, for the protecting enclosures of the altars, for the veiling of the sanctuary during the fast-time (fasting-clothes), and especially for clothing the walls and the floor. At first the tapestry came from the East, until, in the 4th century, a tapestry-manufactory was established at Palermo in which the hands of Saracen and Byzantine workmen, imitated the Oriental patterns. Those old silk webs, of which we find remains here and there in collections, show a strict architectonic style, and are covered with figures of animals of a typical character, such as griffins, unicorns, lions, elephants, and birds of paradise. The second order of choisters, tapestry-weaving, was learned and soon practiced, even from the beginning of the Romanesque period, and the circle of representations was increased by Biblical and symbolical scenes, to which were added representations out of favorite poets. Tapestry-broidery was an occupation followed with zeal in the nunneries. From the 14th century, carpets painted with size-colors on linen were also made. With the entrance of Gothic art, there appears in use a frieze-like composition, hand in hand with a naïve naturalistic border, which drives out the severe style of the earlier times. Interesting tapestries of the Romanesque period, partly with antique mythological representations, are to be seen in the treasury of the collegiate church at Quedlinburg; others of the same time, with Christian subjects, in the castle of Lichtenstein, in the Nassau-stadt, intended for the backs of choir-stalls. A complete selection of tapestries is in the monastery of Wiesenhausen, near Zell, one of them an embroidery with the history of Tristan and Isolde; others in the St. Elisabeth Church at Marburg, in St. Sebastian and St. Lorenzo, at Nuremberg, and in many church treasuries.

Tappan, Henry Philip, D.D., L.L.D., a distinguished educator, was born at Rhinebeck on the Hudson, April 23, 1805. He graduated from Union College in 1825, and from Auburn Theological Seminary in 1827; became assistant to the Rev. Dr. Van Vechten, in the Reformed Dutch Church at Schenectady; the next year was settled as pastor of the Congregational Church at Pittsfield, Mass.; and in 1831, was compelled by ill-health to resign. In 1832, he was appointed professor of moral and intellectual philosophy in the University of the City of New York, and resigned in 1838. During the next few years he spent most of his time in traveling, and was conducting a private school in New York city. He published, A Review of Edwards Inquiry into the Freedom of the Will (1839);—The Doctrine of the Freedom of the Will Determined by an Appeal to Consciousness (1840);—The Doctrine of the Freedom of the Will Applied to Moral Agency and Responsibility (1841);—Elements of Logic, with an Introductory View of Philosophy in General, and a Preliminary View of the Reason (1844);—a treatise on University Education (1851). In the latter year, he went to Europe, and on his return in 1862 published A Step from the New World to the Old. He was president of the University of Michigan from 1862 to 1863, and gave it a new life by his administration. After his retirement from this school he lived almost entirely abroad, and died Nov. 15, 1881, at Vevey, Switzerland.

Taylor, Benjamin C., D.D., a Reformed (Dutch) minister, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., Feb. 24, 1801. He graduated from Princeton College in 1819, and from the New Brunswick Theological Seminary in 1822; was licensed the latter year, and immediately became pastor at Denville and Blooming Grove, Rensselaer Co., N.Y.; in 1825 at Aquacknock (now Passaic), N. J.; in 1828 at Bergen, where he was made pastor emeritus in 1870, and died, Feb. 2, 1881. He published several sermons and addresses, and a volume entitled Annals of the Classis and Township of Bergen (1866).

Taylor, James Barnett, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in Alyth, Scotland, March 19, 1804. He came to New York with his parents when an infant; removed to Virginia in 1817, having already, at the age of thirteen, made a profession of religion; began to preach at the age of sixteen, and was formally licensed at twenty. He performed, for a year or two, missionary labor in the Meherrin District, Va.; was ordained May 2, 1826, at Sandy Creek, and, in the same year, was called to the pastorate of the Second Church at Richmond, where he remained thirteen years. He was elected chaplain of the University of Virginia in 1835, and became pastor of the First Street Church, Richmond, where he remained until 1844, and then entered upon his duties as corresponding secretary of the Southern Baptist Convention, which office he held with distinguished ability for twenty-six years. During thirteen of these years he was pastor of the Taylorsville, Ky., and also in the Florida army as chaplain and post-chaplain. For a short time he was editor of The Religious Herald. The Southern Baptist Missionary Journal and Home and Foreign Journal were established by him. He wrote also a Life of Lot Curry, a Life of Rev. Lyes of Virginia Baptists, and had prepared, in a History of Virginia Baptists. After the war he took a deep interest in the spiritual welfare of the freedmen. He died Dec. 22, 1871. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 1134, (4th ed.)

Taylor, John Lord, D.D., a Congregational divine, was born at Warren, Conn., May 29, 1811. He graduated from Yale College in 1833 and at the Divinity School in 1839, having been a tutor in the college for two years; was ordained pastor of the South Church, Andover, Mass., the last-mentioned year; became prosector of theology and homiletics in Andover Theological Seminary in 1860, resigned in 1875, and died there, Sept. 23, 1884. Besides many contributions to the literary journals, he wrote, a Memoir of Hon. Samuel Phillips (1856);—Memorial of the Semi-Centennial Celebration of Andover Theological Seminary (1858).

Taylor, Joseph Wells, born in Avonmore, a missionary of India, was born at Bellary, Southern India, in 1820, where his father was a missionary of the London Society. He was educated at the Bishop's College in Calcutta and at Glasgow, graduating at the latter place in 1845. In the same year, having been accepted by the London Missionary Society, he left England for India, and after he labored for thirty-four years, the last twenty-one years in connection with the Presbyterian Church of Ireland. He died in 1881. Mr. Taylor, besides translating the Confession of Faith into Gujarati, wrote two of the best grammars in that language. The natives of Gujarat are indebted to him for a History of the Christian Church, founded on that of Dr. Barth, as well as for a Book of Christian Prize and a Manual of Devotion. Several of the best tracts in the list of the Gujarat Tract and Bible Society are printed by him. He also translated the Shorter Catechism, and was engaged at the time of his death on a translation of the Philosophy of the Plan of Salvation, which he left unfinished.

Teaching of the Twelve Apostles is the title of a newly discovered writing belonging to the Patriotic period. In the year 1883 Philotheus Bryenios, metropolitan of Nicomedia, published, from the Jerusalem manuscript of the year 1056, and preserved at Constantinople, a hitherto unknown writing, bearing two titles, Διαλογις των ουκελα αποστολων and Διαλογις ευαγρον ει τωνη ανωτερων των Ιησους. An edition with critical emendations was published in 1884 by Hilgenfeld, in his Novum Testamentum Extra Canonem Hexapym (Leipsic, 1884, iv, 94-105), and from that time the republic of letters has been kept alive by translations, essays, etc.

I. Contents. The “Teaching” comprises sixteen chapters, and may be divided into four parts: ch. i-vi, comprising the doctrinal and catechetical part, setting forth the whole duty of the Christian; ch. vii-xiv contains the liturgical and devotional part, giving directions for Christian worship, ch. xii-xiii, and xiv contains the ecclesiastical and disciplinary part, concerning church officers, and ch. xvi the eschatological part, or the Christian’s hope.

II. Theology of the Teaching. God is the Creator (i, 2), who made all things (x, 3), and is our Father in heaven (vii, 2). Nothing can happen without him (iii, 10); he is the giver of all good gifts, the author of our salvation, the object of prayer and praise (ix and x), to whom belongs all glory through Christ Jesus (viii, 2; ix, 4; x, 4). Christ is the Lord and Saviour (x, 2), God’s servant and God’s son (ix, 2), and David’s God (x, 6), the author of the gospel (viii, 2; xv, 4). He is spiritually present in his Church, and will visibly come again to judgment (xvi, 1, 7, 8). Through him knowledge and eternal life have been made known to us (ix, 3; x, 2). The Holy Spirit is associated with the Father and the Son (vii, 3); he prepares man for the call of God (xiv, 10), speaks through the prophets, and the sin against the Spirit shall not be forgiven (xi, 7).

The Teaching speaks of the Lord’s Day as a day to be kept holy (xv, 1), and recognises only two sacraments, Baptism and the Eucharist (vii, 1-4; ix, xiv).

Man is made in the image of God (v, 2) but sinful, and needs forgiveness (vii, 2); he must confess his transgressions to receive pardon (ix, xiv, xvi, 2). There are only two ways, the way of life and the way of death.

III. Language of the Teaching. The “Didache” is written in Hellenistic Greek, like the New Test. It is the common Macedonian or Alexandrian dialect, with “a strong infusion of a Hebrew soul and a Christian spirit.” The “Didache” contains 2190 words, 504 are New Test. words, 497 are classical, and 473 occur in the Septuagint, 15 occur for the first time in the “Didache,” but are found in later writers.

IV. Authenticity of the Teaching. It is first quoted by Clement of Alexandria (Stromata, i, 20), who cites a passage from it as “Scripture.” Eusebius (died A.D. 340) mentions it as “the so-called Teachings of the Apostles” (Hist. Eccl. iii, 25), and so does Athanasius (died A.D. 373) (Epist. Fest. 89, in Opera, ed. Bened. i, 2, 963). The last mention of the “Teaching” is by Nicephorus, patriarch of Constantinople (died A.D. 982), who speaks of such a book as among the Apocrypha of the New Test.

V. Date, Place, and Authorship. The most prevailing view as to the time when the Teaching was composed is between A.D. 90 and 120; but this date seems to us rather early, since the majority of scholars speak of the Teaching to Alexandria in Egypt, a minority to Palestine or Syria. Who the author of the Teaching was not known. From the work itself, it may safely be stated that he was a Jewish Christian.

VI. Synopsis of Quotations and Allusions in the Didache. The author of the Teaching quotes not only the Old and New Tests, but also the Apocrypha of the Old Test., as the following table will exhibit:

1. Quotations from the Old Testament.

2. Allusions to the Old Testament.

3. Quotations from, and allusions to, the Old Testament Apocrypha.

numerous essays and expositions. In addition to the treatise mentioned above and De Romestin, Teaching of the Twelve Apostles (Lond. 1884, 8vo), the most complete and exhaustive work, giving, besides the original text, an English translation and literary matter, is the one published by Ph. Schaff, The Latin Church Manual, containing The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles (New York, 1885). (B. P.)

Ten Broeck, Anthony, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in New York city in 1816. He graduated from Columbia College, and from the General Theological Seminary in 1837; for many years was engaged in teaching; was connected with a school in Orange, N. J., under the supervision of bishop Doane; taught in the Mt. Auburn Institute in Washington; founded the bishop Bowman Institute at Philadelphia, Pa.; and was rector of Duke Chapel. He was rector of St. James's Church, Eatonown, N. J., at the time of his death, Sept. 22, 1880. See Whittaker, Almanac and Directory, 1881, p. 175.

Tennent, William Mackay, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, graduated from the College of New Jersey in 1785, and in 1772 was ordained pastor at Greenfield, Conn. In 1784 he accepted a call to minister at Walpole Church at Abington, near Philadelphia, where he continued until his death, in December, 1810. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iii, 26.

Tenney, Edward, D.D., a Congregational minister, son of Dr. Joshua Tenney, was born at Corinth, Vt., June 11, 1801. He studied at Brattle Academy; in 1826 graduated from Middlebury College; was called from the Andover Theological Seminary; was ordained pastor, Jan. 5, 1831, at Lyme, N. H., and was dismissed Aug. 12, 1867. From 1867 to 1880 he resided at Westborough, Mass., without charge; and from 1880 until death, Nov. 12, 1882, at Norwich, Conn. See Cong. Year-book, 1888, p. 33.

Tent. The following description of this Arab domicile, from Conder's Test Work, ii, 275, contains some additional information:

"The tents are arranged in different ways. Among the Suyy a large encampment was set out in parallel lines as far as the eye could reach, with the tents now being close together, end to end. Among the ‘Amireh and ‘Ajlun the tents are arranged in a straight line. The average height of a tent is about twenty feet, but the small ones will sometimes be only ten feet long, and the larger forty or fifty feet; the distance between two tents in a line is about four feet. Thus a camp of twenty tents occupied a space of two hundred feet by seventy feet. In another case the form was a triangle, the position of this in this aspect being that if the tents are driven into the enclosure at night, and thus protected from the attacks of robbers or prevented from straying by themselves." (El greco.

The Arab tent is extremely unlike the usual representations, in which it is shown either as a sort of hut, as among the Turkomans, or as a bell-tent, instead of a long black "robe of hair," with a low, sloping roof and open front. It, however, has been carefully noted by the European, and the Arab's, and there is little to add to his account. The canvas of the roof and side walls is of goat's hair, tacked on with occasionally stripes of white running horizontally (Fins., 2, 5). The pieces of stuff are about two feet wide, and thirty to fifty long. The tent has generally blue poles (‘Awamid), arranged three and three, those in the centre being the longest; thus the tent has a low ridge both ways in order to run the rain off. The cloths at the side can be easily removed as the sun and wind require, one side being laced across with cords and by pegs (Aituk), which are driven with a malet (Jd., iv, 31). The average height of a tent is about seven feet."

"Frost and cold as these habitations might be thought to prove in winter, they are really far more comfortable than would be expected. Being so low, the wind does not blow them over, and they are, moreover, most skillfully provided with several blankets or covers to keep them warm all night long. Even in heavy storms I have found the interior dry, and the heavy canvas does not let the rain through. The"

THOMAS, the name of several Scotch prelates.
1. Bishop of Galloway, who swore fealty to Edward
I of England in 1296, and recognized king Robert Bruce's title to the crown in 1304. He was bishop here July 20, 1305. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 273.
2. Bishop of the Isles about 1334. He died in Scotland, Sept. 20, 1338. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 303.
3. Bishop of Galloway 1369. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 274.
4. Bishop of Ross in 1481, and founder of the collec giate church of Tain the same year. He was still bish op there in 1487. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 189.

THOMAS OF WILTON, D.D., was made first chancel lor and then dean of St. Paul's, London. In his time (during the reign of Edward IV) occurred the contest between the prelates and friars, the latter upbraiding
the former for their pomp and plenty. Wilton entered into this contest, and charged upon the monks that, although confessing their poverty, they really, by their influence at the confessional, opened the coffers of all the treasures in the land. He wrote a book, As Valens artefactus et in Status Perfectionem, maintaining that such were roguy of the laws of God and man, and fit for the house of correction than a state of perfec tion. Wilton flourished in 1460. See Fuller, Worthies

THOMAS, BENJAMIN, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in Maine in 1792, and when quite young, removed to Ohio. He graduated from Denison University, was ordained in 1840, and, for a time, taught in Vermillion College. His pupils were as follows: Mansfield, Monroeville, First Church in Zanesville, Bradfield, and Newark, all in Ohio. Subsequently he removal to Bloomington, Ill., and became western sec retary of the American Bible Union. Having occupied other prominent positions in his denomination in Illi nois, he removed to Arkansas in 1864, and became pres ident of the university at Hot Springs. During the war he was an army chaplain in the Northern army, and became bract-colonel. He died at Little Rock, Ark., March 5, 1884. See Calhurt, Baptíst Encyclopedia, p. 1147. (J. C. S.)

THOMAS, JOHN, M.D., the founder of the Christ
delphians (q. v.), was born at Hoxton Square, London, April 19, 1825. He was a son of a Dissenting clergyman while in England and a Baptist clergyman after coming to the United States in 1852. John was educated as a physician, beginning, at the age of sixteen, a medical course under a private physician, and continuing it for three years at St. Thomas's Hospital. He then assisted a London physician a year, and practiced medicine at Hackney three years. Although a member of his father's church from boyhood, his first attention to creed was in 1850 or 1851, when he began the study of the subject of immortality, upon which he made con tributions to The Laced. Purely as a business venture he sailed for New York, May 1, 1852. Short ly after reaching Cincinnati he became acquainted with Walter Scott, the original founder of the "Chris tians," or Campbellites. Before he was aware of it, he had heard from Scott a full exposition of their doc trine, and almost immediately was attracted to them as anxious to unite rational, and had been induced to indicate that assent by im mersion at ten o'clock at night in the Miami canal. On a trip east, in 1853, he met and visited Alexander Camp bell, was forced reluctantly into assisting him in public addresses, and was so well received by the people that,
on reaching Baltimore, he made addresses every even ing for a week upon religious topics. During 1834 and 1835 he practiced medicine in Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Richmond, speaking to the Campbellite congrega tions on Sundays. In May, 1835, he issued the first numerous volume of his religious Advocate, a Baptist magazine, of which five volumes were issued in all. His first opposition to the received views of the sect con sisted in publishing, in No. 6 of his magazine, an article on Anabaptism, resulting in controversy between him and Mr. Campbell. The former insisted upon the re immersion of persons coming to the sect from Baptist churches; the latter denied its necessity. On Dec. 1, 1835, Dr. Thomas made another advance in free-thought by publishing thirty-four questions which hinted at materialism, annihilation of the wicked, a physical kingdom, etc. The chief outcry against these was for his materialistic tendencies. By 1856 Mr. Campbell denounced him openly. About this time Dr. Thomas moved to Amelia County, Va., abandoned the prac tice of medicine, set up a printing-office on his farm, and devoted himself largely to literary work. In Au gust, 1837, he engaged in a public discussion with a Presbyteritan clergyman, Rev. Mr. Watt. In November he was publicly disfellowshipped by Mr. Campbell, while, in response to the demands of the latter, he was called to account by the churches at Painesville and Berea for his opinions. They did not, however, see fit to disci pline him, contenting themselves with some suggestions concerning the spirit in which he should carry on the discussion. In 1838 he made a preaching tour through the southern counties of Virginia, coming in contact more or less with Mr. Campbell. In 1839 the printing office, moved to Longgrove, Ill., took up two hundred and eighty-eight acres of land, and for two years confined his attention to farming. After a brief residence at St. Charles, where his printing-office and physician's office were burned, he opened an office at Hennepin, and continued the appointment as lecturer on chemistry in Franklin Medical College. The Advocate having now been suspended for nearly three years, he started, in 1842, a monthly called The Investigator, of which he issued twelve numbers. In 1843 he began The Herald of the Future Age, at Louis ville, Ky., and continued it at Richmond, where, in

THOMAS 869 THORNEBROUGH

1844, he held his first meetings separately from the Campbellites. Collisions with the latter led to further study and to wider divergence of creed. He published his articles of belief at this time, and in October, 1846, delivered a series of ten lectures in New York in defence of his views. Having still further perfected his declaration of belief, he decided, in February or March, 1847, that he ought to be baptized into that belief; accordingly, he requested a friend to immerse him and to say over him, "Upon confession of your faith in the things concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ, I baptize you into the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit." After fourteen years of search he was now satisfied that he had reached the truth. He began to advocate it more earnestly than ever, visiting Baltimore, where he was permitted to speak in the Campbellite meeting-house; Buffalo, where he was furnished with the Millerite place of worship, and New York, where he was received by the Campbellites. With letters from many Campbellites and other friends he sailed from New York in June, 1848, for England. His enemies had communicated his peculiar doctrines to the Campbellites of Nottingham and elsewhere. He was therefore refused audience by them, but he addressed the Millerites of Nottingham, Derby, Birmingham, and Plymouth. The London Campbellites denounced him officially. Those of Lincoln and Newark received him, and he made the most of his time when he went to the Church convention at Glasgow. An effort to prevent his sitting was unsuccessful, and he addressed a large audience in the City Hall. A call for the publication of his views, while at Glasgow, led to the preparation of Elysia Israel (478 pp. royal 8vo). At Edinburgh he delivered a course of ten lectures. Spending the winter of 1848-49 in London, upon his book, he made subsequent tours through England and Scotland lecturing and preaching. In November, 1850, he came again to the United States, resumed The Herald of the Faith, published vol. 1 of Eureka. He travelled and advocated his views through the States and Canada until 1862, when the war caused the cessation of his paper, and he sailed for Liverpool. He visited all the places where groups had been organized to advocate his views, and, returning to the United States, issued the second volume of Eureka. The third volume was published in 1868. A third trip to Great Britain was made in 1869, when he found that his Birmingham church had grown from twelve to one hundred and twenty-three members. Crossing to the United States for the third time, in May, 1870, he began a tour of the country, but was proscribed at Worcester, Mass., and compelled to give up his work. He died in New York, March 6, 1871. In addition to the periodicals and books mentioned above, he issued, The Apotheosis Unveiled (1868, 149 pp.); — Anatolida (1864, 102 pp.); — Anarxistia (1866); — Phileroveta, and several tracts and lectures.

Thomas, Robert S., D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in Scott County, Ky., June 29, 1805. He united with the Church in 1821, was ordained, in 1830, pastor at Columbus, Mo., and for several years performed much evangelical labor in Missouri, being the first to introduce Sabbath-schools into that state. He was chosen professor of languages and moral science in the State University, and in 1853 president of William Jewell College. He finally removed to Kansas City, where he organized a church, of which he was the pastor until his death, June 12, 1869. See Catholic Baptists Eclog. p. 1149. (C. S.)

Thomas, Thomas, D.D., a Welsh Baptist minister, was born in Conway, Wales, in 1805. He began to preach when fifteen years of age, and labored with much zeal. At the age of seventeen he entered the Baptist College at Aberavvenny, and two years later removed to Stepney College, where he spent four years in faithful study. In 1828 he entered upon the pastorate of the Church in Henrietta Street, Brunswick Square, London, where he remained eight years. In 1836, on the removal of Abercynon College to Pontypool, he became its president, and retained the office until 1877. In the beginning of this work he was energized in his ministry at Harrismith, Del., as a Baptist Church, which, in time, became the leading one of the town. He died Dec. 6, 1881. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1883, p. 278.

Thomas, Thomas B., D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in London, England, in 1812, and graduated from Miami University in 1834. His first pastorial charge was near Harrison, Del., his second at Hamilton, for twelve years. He then accepted the presidency of Hanover College, Ind., and passed from that to a professorship in the Theological Seminary at New Albany. In 1859 he became pastor of the First Presbyterian Church at Dayton, O., and in 1871 was elected professor of Biblical literature in Lane Theological Seminary. He died Feb. 2, 1875. Dr. Thomas was a man of strong mind, and one of the leaders of the anti-slavery party in the Presbyterian Church long before the civil war. See Presbyterian, Feb. 13, 1875.

Thompson, Thomas Jefferson, D.D., a Methodist Episcopalian, was born in Delaware County, O., March 13, 1803. He was converted in his thirteenth year, began his itinerant career in 1825, and in 1826 entered the Philadelphia Conference. In it he served in turn Milford and Talbot Circuits; St. George's, Philadelphia; Railway, N. J.; St. John's, Philadelphia; Kent Circuit, Md.; Trenton, N. J.; Newark; East Jersey District; Harrisburg, Pa.; Fifth Street, Philadelphia; St. Paul's; Snow Hill District; Asbury Church, Wilmingtom; Union Church, Philadelphia; South Philadelphia District; Reading District, as general agent of Wesleyan Female College, 1861; Easton District, Dover District, and Wilmington District—thus summing twenty-two and a half years on circuits and stations, two years as agent, and twenty-five years as presiding elder. In 1866 the New Jersey Conference was organized and Mr. Thompson became identified therewith but the next year resigned. In 1868, on the formation of the Wilmington Conference, he fell within its limits, and therein remained till his death, at Wilmington, Del., Nov. 29, 1874. Dr. Thompson was a member of the General Conferences of 1844, 1852, 1854, 1860, 1868, 1872. He was characterized by promptness and sterling integrity, zeal and solid worth. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1875, p. 27.

Thorne, James, an eminent minister of the Bible Christians, was born at Stickley, Devonshire, England, Sept. 21, 1795. At an early age he was converted, and in 1816 entered the ministry. By nature and grace he was peculiarly fitted to be a leading spirit in the Connection. His gifts were diversified, his pietic deep, his devotion to the work thorough, and his spirit catholic, childlike, and forbearing. He was president of the Conference five times, viz., in 1831, 1835, 1842, 1857, and 1865; secretary from 1819 to 1830, from 1832 to 1835, in 1849 and 1850, and in 1853—eighteen times; and for several years editor and book-steward. He died Jan. 24, 1872. See Minutes of the Conference, 1872, Jubilee Volume, published in 1866.

Thorneborough (or Thornborough), John, B.D., an English divine of the 17th century, was born at Salisbury, Wiltshire, educated at Magdalen College, Oxford, was preferred bishop of Limerick in 1658, dean of Christ Church in 1663, Bishop of Ely in 1617, at the same time holding his deanship and his Irish bishopric in commendam with it. He was translated to Worcester in the latter year, and died July 19, 1641. His skill in chemistry is spoken of. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), iii, 326.
THROP, Charles, D.D., F.R.S., an English divine, was born at Gateshead rectory, Oct. 18, 1783. He was educated at the Cathedral School, and at Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship, and subsequently was appointed tutor of University College. In 1807 he was presented with the rectoryship of Ryton, where he spent several years in active service; in 1829 was presented with a prebendal stall in the Cathedral of Durham; and about 1831 was promoted to the archdeaconry of Durham. At the same time he was elected one of the lord Crewe trustees, in which capacity he exerted himself to the utmost. On the establishment of the University of Durham, he became its first warden. He died at Ryton rectory, Durham, Oct. 10, 1862. Dr. Throp was proverbial for his love of the fine arts, his gallery of pictures surpassing any other in the north of England. He was a man of rare benevolence, giving £400 per annum to endow the parish of Winlanton, and erecting a house of worship at Greendale, at his own expense, to the memory of his parents. See Appleton's Annual Cyclop. 1862, p. 993.

Tebbe, Christian Gottlob, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born in Saxony, March 19, 1742. He studied at Leipsic, was in 1775 rector at Butzow, Mecklenburg, in 1776 preacher at Baumgarten, and died Jan. 25, 1825. He published, Anleitung zum richtigen Verstehen der Glaubenslehre (Minden, 1785); 2d edition of Der Kirchenfreund by Daniel, neu übersetzt und erklärt (1797): — Das Buch des Propheten Sarcharja, neu übersetzt und erklärt (1801). See During, Die gelehrt en Theologen Deutschlands, s. v.; Furtmü, Bibl. Jud. s. v. (B. P.)

Thummeil, C. B., D.D., a Lutheran minister, was born in Halle in 1662. In 1689 he was called to the University of Tübingen, in Württemberg. In the spring of 1824 he was licensed to preach, and was ordained in 1826. On his arrival in America, in August of that year, he commenced the study of the English language. The first year he was employed as a missionary. From 1827 to 1838 he was professor of languages in Hartwick Seminary, and then accepted a professorship in the Lutheran Seminary at Lexington, S. C. In 1845 he removed to Prairieville, Ill., where he remained until the close of his life, May 23, 1855. For fifteen years he was secretary and treasurer of the Farmers' Mutual Fire Insurance Company of Palmyra, Ill. See Lutheran Observer, July 29, 1881.

Thurston, Eli, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Bellingham, Mass., June 14, 1805. At the age of seventeen he went to Millbury to learn the gunsmith's trade, but having been converted in his twelfth year, he immediately began to study for the ministry, attending Day's Academy at Wrentham, and graduating from Amherst College in 1824. The year following he spent in Andover Theological Seminary, and the two succeeding studied theology with the Rev. Dr. Jacob Ide, of West Medway. He was ordained pastor in Hallowell, Me., Jan. 3, 1838, and filled this position for ten years. The following twenty years, dating from March 21, 1849, he was pastor of the Central Church in Fall River, Mass. He died there, Dec. 19, 1869. In theology Dr. Thurston was ranked as a Hopenkian Calvinist, and his sermons were all constructed on the basis of his theology. As a preacher he was remarkable for clearness of statement and directness of argument. See Cong. Quarterly, 1871, p. 483.

Tiben (also written Twin or Dwin), Council of, the Council of Tiben (perhaps the same as Thebys or Divos, supposed to have been the present Erivan), under Chosroes II, became the capital of Armenia, and the religious centre of the realm. Several councils were held there.

I. The first council, held in 452, declared Tiben the seat of the patriarchs.

II. The second council was summoned by the catholicos, Nerses II, in 557, and passed thirty-eight canons, the last of which ordered a fast of one week every month.

III. The third council was held in 551, under Moses II, with a view of regulating the Easter festival. The 11th day of July, 557, was ordered to begin the Armenian era, and was declared the New Year's day of the first year.

IV. The fourth council, held in 594, was important for bringing about a separation between the Armenians and Georgians. Up to the year 590 the Georgians elected their own catholics, who were always ordained by the Armenian. About that time, when the Georgian catholics had died, the Georgians asked Moses II to elect one for them. He appointed Cyrus, a very learned theologian, who decreed the acceptance of the acts of the Council of Chalcedon. Moses' successor, Abraham I, who differed with Cyrus concerning the Council of Chalcedon, urged the Georgian catholics to reject the decrees of the Council of Chalcedon, but in vain. At the fourth Council of Tiben, Cyrus and his followers were condemned. This act was the occasion of much controversy among the Armenians.

V. The fifth council, held under Nerses III, in 645, condemned all heretics, and especially the Council of Chalcedon and its supporters.

VI. The sixth council was convened by Nerses III, in 648, which again condemned the Council of Chalcedon.

VII. The seventh council was held under John IV; twenty-three canons were passed, which provided, among other things, that the altar and baptismal font should be made of stone, unleavened bread and unfermented wine should be used in the communion, the clause "Thou wast crucified for us," in the Tractate, should be sung three times, morning and evening, as well as at the mass, etc. The last canon strictly forbade the intercourse with the Paulicians.

VIII. The last or eighth council was held in 725, and condemned Julian Halicarnassensis, his followers, and his writings. Tiben was celebrated for the faith from which some faithful Christians suffered there. See Piltz-Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v. (B. P.)

Tiberias. The present Tiberias is described in the Memoirs to the Ordinance Survey, i, 361, 418.

Tidman, Arthur, D.D., an English Congregational minister, was born at Mickleton, Nov. 14, 1792. He was trained for the medical profession, but afterwards studied theology with the Rev. George Collingwood, and in 1818 commenced missionary work in Sidmouth. In 1818 he received a call from Frome, and in 1828 settled at Barbian Chapel, London. During the last years of his pastorate he held the office of foreign secretary of the Missionary Society, and in 1868 passed to that same office. Dr. Tidman was well versed in all civil and diplomatic questions of the day; cool, far-seeing, and practical in all questions of Church doctrine or government, and especially distinguished by the wisdom, energy, and depth of his spiritual perception. See (Lord) Cong. Year-book, 1869, p. 281.

Timmann (or Tidemann), Johann, the reformer of Bremen, was born at Amsterdam about the year 1500. In 1522 he went to Wittenberg, where he made the acquaintance of Luther and Melanchthon. In 1524 he was called Kirkabuser, and was appointed pastor of St. Martin's. He now introduced those reformatory changes which have immortalized his name. In 1529 count Enno II, of East Frisia, called him to Emden to work there against the Anabaptists. In 1538 the city council adopted a church order, which was, no doubt, prepared by Timann, and was approved by Luther and Bugenhagen. Timann was also present at the colloquy in Worms, and at the meetings held at Ratisbon in 1541. He died Feb. 17, 1557, at Nienburg. See Rotermund, Lexikon aller Gelehrten in Bremen, ii, 216 sq. (where a list of Timann's writings is given); Flutt-Hertzog, Rede Ewigkeits, s. v. (I. P.)

Timmah (or Timmuth). There seem to be three localities thus designated.

1. In the mountains of Judah (Gen. xxxviii, 12-14; Josh. xv, 57). For this no modern representative of a corresponding name (Tinbeh) has been discovered in the region required, for the ruined site, Timah, two and a half miles east of Beit Netiff, and nine miles west of Bethlehem, suggested by Conder (Memoirs to the Ordnance Survey, iii, 65), and containing only "foundations" (ibid. p. 161), is entirely out of the neighborhood of the ancient localities (in Josh.).

2. In the plain of Judah (Josh. xv, 10; Judg. xiv, 1, 2, 5; 2 Chron. xxviii, 18). The present representative, Tinah, lies five and a half miles north-east of Tell es-Safieh (Gath), and eight miles south of Abu Shashieh (Gezer). It is merely described in the Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey (ii, 441) as "ruined walls, caves, and wine-presses, with rock-cut cisterns. The water supply is from a spring on the north side."

3. In Mount Ephraim (Josh. xix, 50; xxiv, 20; Judg. ii, 9). The modern ruin, Tinah, which lies ten miles north-east of Beith (Bethel), and ten and a half miles north-east of Jimzib, is described at length in the Memoirs to the Ordnance Survey, ii, 374 sq. Lieut. Conder remarks (Test Work, ii, 229):

"It seems to me very doubtful how far we can rely on the identity of the site with that of Timnath-Hecae. It is certain that this is the place called Timnath-HERES. It is also almost certain that the place called tinmaH-TINMAH is the same. It is possible that the site called Tinah is the same as that mentioned in the Old Testament."

TiphraSAH (2 Kings xv, 16) is thought by Lieut. Conder (Memoirs to the Ordnance Survey, ii, 169) to be (different from that of 1 Kings iv, 24) the present Khurbet Tsufsah, six miles south-west of Shechem (Nablus), and described (ibid. p. 198) as "a small ruined village in gardens, appears to be modern."

Tirzah. The present Tirzah, which Tristram assumes (Bible Places, p. 196) as the modern representative, lies twelve miles east by north from Sebastia (Samaria), and is described in the Memoirs accompanying the Ordnance Survey (i, 228, 245). As to the identity of the name, Lieut. Conder remarks (Test Work, ii, 108):

"It contains the exact letter of the Hebrew word, though the last two radicals are interchanged in position, a kind of change not unusual among the Semites. The beauty of the position and the richness of the plain on the west, the ancient remains, and the old main road to the place from Shechem, seem to agree well with the idea of its having once been a capital; and if I am right in the suggestion, then the old sepulchres are probably, some of them, those of the early kings of Israel before the royal family began to be buried in Samaria."

Tittelmann, Francis, a Roman Catholic theologian, was born in 1497 at Haselt, Belgium, and studied at Liege. Having completed his studies, he joined the Capuchins, went to Rome in 1537, and died the same year. He wrote Commentarius in Omnes Psalmos:—Paraphrasing into Ecclesiastic Latin. Commentarius in Coenaculorum Collationem:—Commentarius in Speciosam Bibliorum Scripturam:—Expletur in Omnes Epistolae Paulini, etc. See Mirraeus, Polygraphiae Legati Belgici Scriptorum; Andreas, Bibliotheca Legati; Jocher, Allographia Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (II. P.)

Titius, Gerhard, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Quedlinburg, Dec. 17, 1620, and studied at different universities. In 1646 he was professor of Hebrew at Helmstedt, in 1650 doctor of theology, and died June 7, 1681. Titius was a voluminous writer. Of his publications we mention, De Principio Fidei Christianae seu Christianae Scriptura:—De Ministeria Ecclesia:—De Heilattutudine et Damnatione Aeterna ex Misericordia et Commentarius Rubrinius Consideratvm:—De Theophastrorum Harenae:—De Orthodoxa Fidei Christianae Doctrina:—De Jesu Christo Officio Prophecitatu Sacerdotii et Regni, etc. See Witte, Memoria Theodorus: Jocher, Allographia Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Tobenz, Daniel, an Augustinian, was born at Vien- na in 1743. In 1768 he was made a priest, in 1772 doctor of theology, and in 1775 professor of theology at Vien- na. In 1811 he retired from his professorship, and died Aug. 30, 1819. He published, Institutiones, Usus et Doctrinae Potrum (Viena, 1779-83):—Examen Tractatus Joannis Harberguci de Doctrina Morali Potrum Eccle- sie (1785):—Commentarius in Novum Testamentum (1804-6, 2 vols.):—Paraphrasia Psalmorum ex Hebraico
TODD

Adornatus, Notis et Summaria Instructa (2d ed. 1814). His works were published under the title Opera Omnla (1825, 15 vols.). See Dugan, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, v. (B. P.).

TODD, AMBROSE S., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal minister, son of Rev. Ambrose Todd, was born at Huntington, Conn., Dec. 6, 1798. His early education was acquired at Cheshire Academy, and Yale College, conferred upon him the honorary degree of A.M. in 1824. He was ordained presbyter June 30, 1822, and his first charge was the parishes of Reading, Newburyport, Greenwhich, New Canaan, Darien, and Stamford. For thirty-eight years he was rector of St. John's, in the latter place, and died there, June 23, 1861. He filled many offices of honor and responsibility in the diocese, and was universally respected. See Amer. Quurr. Church Rev. 1867, p. 557.

ToLEs, RUSSELL G., D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Dunham, N. Y., in 1811. He graduated from Madison University at an early age, studied theology, and then took charge of a Baptist Church in Cooperstown, where he was ordained. At the breaking-out of the rebellion he was given control of one branch of the Christian Commission, and stationed at Fortress Monroe. From these duties he was called to the Howard Mission of New York. He founded, with the aid of ten wealthy laymen, the Wanderers' Home, in Baldwin Place, Boston in 1853. At first it was a mission school as well as a home, and even invalids, and were carried there in the daytime by their parents, and taken home at night; but eventually it became a permanent home for children until adopted into families. Dr. Toles died in Boston, July 11, 1864.

ToNE, SIMON D., a Scotch prelate, was bishop of Moray in 1171. He was a monk of Melrose, and before that he had been abbot at Cogstaff, in Essex, England. He died in 1184. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 136.

TOTTY, PATRICK, D.D., a bishop of the Episcopal Church of Scotland, died at Peterhead, Oct. 3, 1862, aged ninety years. He was consecrated Oct. 12, 1868. At the time of his death he was bishop of Dunkeith, Dumblane, and Fife, Scotland. See Amer. Quurr. Church Rev. 1863, p. 150.

TOSIPHTA (NINEN) or the addition of supplement is the title of a great halakahic work, which originated in the time of the Mishna (q.v.). It is of great importance, because the Tosiphta (or Toesiphta, as it is also called) contains the decisions of the Jewish teachers in their original form, while the Mishna gives them in an abbreviated manner. Thus many things are contained in the Tosiphta which are not found in the Mishna. The Tosiphta is also richer in quotations from the Old Testament, while we have noticed twelve variations in the "textus receptus" of the Mishna—"textus receptus," because Lowe's edition, from the Cambridge MS. (The Mahabah on which the Palestinian Talmd Talmud, edited from the unique MS., preserved in the University Library of Cambridge [Cambridge, 1888]) does not always agree with the common text—and about ninety-five in the Gemara, we have collated two hundred and thirty-three variations from the Tosiphta, that is, more than double the number that the Talmud presents. The best edition is that of M. S. Zuckermandel, Toesiphta nach den Wiener und Erfurter Handschriften herausgegeben (Pasewalk, 1880), and it is this edition that our references are made. The following incomplete list of variations will at once show the importance of this work for the Old-Test. scholar.

Exod. xxxix, 34, 52, is omitted, p. 201.

Lev. xii, 19, 52, is omitted, p. 169.

xv, 29, the reading is, "the blood of the peace offerings," for "the sacrifice of his peace offerings," p. 47.

xvii, 7, "and to teach," so Sept., Syr., p. 618.

xviii, 3, "upon the ark," instead of "upon the testimony," p. 181.

TOUSSAINT

Num. v, 15, "he shall put to nil upon her nor put frankincense upon her," the reading is הילל, p. 594.

v, 22, the first הילל omitted, p. 595.

Deut. v, 14, "and a skinned bull," omitted, p. 553.

xvi, 8, הילל omitted, p. 511.

Josh. i, 1, the last three words omitted, p. 515.

iii, 13, in all versions, p. 516; the Revised Version, "at Adam," marginal note; another reading, "from Adam." Josh. iv, 19, reading is, "hence from under the feet of the priests," p. 116.

iv, 5, at the end, "and leave them in the place where they stood, under the hands of the priests stood," p. 518;

viii, 3, and their officers, הילל, p. 511; so also Targums (ed. Lagarde), and Mishna, Sotha, ch. vii, § 5; but Lowe's Cambridge edition reads as the present text of the Bible.

1 Kings x, 27, "for abundance," omitted, p. 71.

Job xxxvii, 11, "they shall wax old in the good of their days." The Masoretic text reads הילל, and the mark מני ל, l. e. it is thus written, viz. with 2, indicates that there already existed a diversity of readings. Indeed, Michaelis (Hebr. Bible, in loeo) advances a number of MSS. which read יילל with both.

Prov. ix, 1, "wise women build." The plural nun may be double to stand opposed to the Sept., Targ., and Syr., read פירס.

xx, 27, "the lamp of God" יילל, p. 154; so Targ., Taumel Parchim, fol. 1, col. 2; fol. 8, col. 1, and ancient Midrashim.

Ezek. xxvi, 10, and caused me to pass through the waters, waters that were to the hine, יילל, p. 155. את, and בד, in their edition of Ezekiel, remark, in loco, "in tractate Tosa, et Tov, vit, ill, he locus adducitur, tanquam al scriptum erat יילל et revars in Rechabinita prima manus sic scriptum." יוליא, "to Galilee to the Front Sea, יילל, p. 156; the "Front Sea" is explained בד, p. 154, i. e. that in the sea of Sdom.

The reading is not, as in the Masoretic text, יוליא, but יוליא, so read Sept., Targ., Syriac. One codex to which Bär and Delitzsch attach great importance, the codex Jemarana, reads, as the two editors note, יוליא, even as יוליא קומראכオンライン.

xviii, 11, יוליא ל, p. 196; so also Bär and Delitzsch, against the גל of the textus receptus.

Zech. viii, 19, "love Truth," פירס, p. 241; so also Talmud, Yebamoth, fol. 14, col. 2.

A few of these variations have already been noted by De Rossi in his Varron Lectures. A complete list is given by Pick in Studen's Zeitschrift für die altesten schafflichen Zeitschrift (Giessen, 1886). (B. P.)

TOYLAN, SILAS D., L.L.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was for a long time engaged in educational work in Williamsburg, Va., until 1859. In that year he was elected president of the Iowa State University, and also ministered in Trinity Church, Iowa City. For a number of years he was one of the standing committees of the diocese of Iowa; was one of the trustees of Griswold College, Davenport, and was identified with the missionary work in his diocese. In 1864 he was rector of St. John's Church, Decatur, III.; in 1867 became rector of Christ Church Seminary, Lexington, Ky., in charge of which he remained until his death, Oct. 7, 1872. See Proc. Episc. Almacenar, 1874, p. 132.

TOUSEQAI (Lat. Tousaquea), Pirkke, father of Daniel, was born at St. Laurent, Lorraine, in 1499. He studied theology at Cologne, Paris, and Rome, and was made a canon at the cathedral of Metz. When the persecution against the Protestants began, he fled to Spain, and embraced the Reformation. Two attempts which he made to propagstire his views in France
TOWNLEY 873

TOWNLEY, CHARLES GORING, LL.D., an English Congregational minister, was born in 1780. He devoted himself to the study of law, but with his brother Henry prepared himself for the ministry. After studying divinity at Hoxton Academy he began to preach in Ireland, laboring with self-denying devotedness for the good of both Romanists and Protestants. From 1817 to 1841 he preached in Limerick and vicinity. He then returned to England, where he resided at Brixton, afterwards at Finsbury. He was a small church at Mortlake, Surrey, where he erected school-houses at his own expense. He died at Pimlico, June 17, 1856. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1857, p. 209.

Townsend, Stephen, M.P., Ph.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in 1806, and was for forty-six years a member of the Philadelphia Conference, being a supernumerary from 1863 until his death, Aug. 5, 1883. He was a man of extensive literature. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1883, p. 71.

Trowson (or Townsend), Robert, D.D., a divine of the 17th century, was born in St. Hotoloph's Parish, Cambridge, became fellow of Queen's College, being admitted therein but twice years of age. He was an excellent preacher, attended King James as chaplain into Scotland, became dean of Westminster in 1617, bishop of Salisbury in 1620, and died May 15, 1621. See Fuller, Worthies (Nuttall), i, 231.

Tracy, Samuel Walter, D.D., an English Independent minister, was born at Portsea, in February, 1778. He studied under Rev. Dr. Bogue, preached at Lichfield, next at Hot Wells, near Bristol, then at Yeovil, was secretary of the London Missionary Society, spent several years on the Continent, and afterwards preached at Hounslow, Chelsea, and Brixton Rise. He died Feb. 18, 1853. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1854, p. 256.

Trelaw, Walter, a Scotch prelate, a canon of St. Andrews, was elected bishop of that diocese in 1885, and was still there in 1800. He died in the castle of St. Andrews, and was buried in the cathedral. See Kitto, History of the Church, i, 366. Transcaucasan Tartar Version of the Scriptures. A peculiar and rather corrupt dialect of the Turkish is spoken by the greater part of the Moslem population in Georgia, Shusti, Shirwan, Derbend, and North-west Persia. It is vernacular in numerous European provinces on the shores of the Black Sea, Ararat, and the Caspian. This dialect has been termed, by way of distinction, the Transcausan. Parts of the New Text were prepared in this language many years ago by Mirza Ferrookh and the Rev. Dr. Pendar. In 1875 the committee of the British and Foreign Bible Society proposed to reprint the gospels under the superintendence of Mr. Abraham Amiranjanz, the son of Mirza Fe-rookh, who has latterly been employed in the service of the Baseh missions. From the report of 1877 we learn that the British Bible Society resolved to print the remaining portions of the New Test, and Mr. Amiranjanz has revived the remainder of his father's manuscript, and translated the Epistle to the Romans. In 1878 the entire New Test was printed under the superintendence of Messrs. Amiranjanz and Sauerwein. From the report of 1881 we learn that the British and Foreign Bible Society secured the base of Mr. Amiranjanz for editorial work, and that he had undertaken a translation of the Old Test. This translation, which was completed in 1883, induced the American missionaries to give up their version, on which they were engaged, and unite with Mr. Amiranjanz in a final revision of the Old Test, in order to secure but one version of the Bible in the Transcaucasan language. (B. F.)

Trapier, Paul, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, a graduate of the General Theological Seminary, was for several years prior to 1856 rector in Charleston, S.C. In 1862 he removed to Lynchburg, Va., and remained there until 1859, when he removed to Dresden, S.C., having been appointed professor of ecclesiastical history and the evidences of Christianity in the theological seminary there. When the seminary was removed in 1866, to Spartanburg, Dr. Trapier removed to that place and professed in the school. In 1868 he was assigned to ecclesiastical history and exegesis. In 1870 he removed to Locust Grove, Md., and became rector of Shrewsbury parish, where he remained until his death, July 12, 1872, aged sixty-six years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1873, p. 135.

Treat, Siskel Burr, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Hartford, Conn., Feb. 19, 1804. After studying at Lenox Academy and Hopkins Grammar School, he graduated from Yale College in 1824; in 1826 was admitted to the bar, and began the practice of his profession at St. Winder Hill, removing, however, in 1831 to Penn Yan, N.Y., where he became a chromite, and, abandoning the law, graduated from Andover Theological Seminary in 1835. The next year he became pastor of the Third Presbyterian Church, Newark, N.J. In 1840 he was associated with Rev. Dr. Abasol Peters in editing The Burgess and America Ecclesiast. In New York. In 1843 he was appointed editor of the Missionary Herald. In 1847 he was elected one of the secretaries of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, his special work being the carrying on the correspondence with the missionaries among the North American Indians. In 1859 he was called to take charge of the home department of the board, and continued in this office until a few months before his death, which occurred March 27, 1877. He had continued his editorial labors until 1866, at which time he took a second extended trip abroad, his first journey having been taken in 1856. See Cong. Quarterly, xix, 347, 375. (J. C. S.)

Tregury, Michael, D.D., an Irish prelate, was a native of the village of Tregury, in Cornwall, and for some time fellow of Exeter College, Oxford. He was consecrated in St. Patrick's Church, archbishop of Dub- lin in 1849. See Kitto, History of the Church, p. 96. The church in the city of Tregury, and presented there several years of his life. In 1847 Tregury assigned a moiety of the parish of Luak for the treasurer of St. Patrick's, and constituted the rectory of St. Aucane in the city. In 1848 he held a visitation in the chapter-house of St. Patrick's Cathedral. He died in 1871. See D'Alton, Memoirs of the Archbishops of Dublin, p. 159.

Trench, Hon. Power Le Poer, D.D., a prelate of the Irish Episcopal Church, was born June 10, 1770, and educated at Dublin University. His first preference on being ordained was the union of Creggh, in the diocese of Clonmacnoise. He was consecrated bishop of Waterford, Nov. 24, 1802; in 1810 translated to the see of Elphin; and in 1819 appointed to the archiepiscopate of Tuam, on which he held till his death, March 21, 1839. Archibishop Trench was a fine scholar, a profound theologian, a devout Christian, a brilliant orator, and diligent in the performance of all his duties. See The (Lond.) Church of England Magazine, June, 1841, p. 369; The (Lond.) Christian Remembrancer, May, 1839, p. 315.

Tresenreuter, Johann Ulric, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Oct. 31, 1710, and studied at Altdorf. His theses were accepted at Altdorf in 1738; he commenced his academical career at Altdorf in 1738, and died March 21, 1744. He published: De Rubbe contra jus Natura Justae Aequitiae (Altdorf, 1738); — De Paradisi Igne Deletio (1735); — De Persona Christi (1735); — De Signo, quod Deus Carina Iudel (ed.); — De Variacione Henochi in Epistolis Judæ.

TREVOR, RICHARD, D.D., a Church of England divine, was born in 1707; became canon of Christ Church, Oxford, in 1785; was consecrated bishop of St. David's in 1744, translated to the see of Durham in 1752, and died at his home in Tendeteren Street, Hanover Square, London, June 9, 1771. He published a number of sermons. See (Lond.) Annual Register, 1771, p. 179; Life (1776).

TRIFCHEV, ADAM, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Aug. 11, 1641, at Lübeck, studied at different universities, was in 1672 ecclesiastical counselor at Gotsis, in 1676 general superintendent, and died Aug. 17, 1687. He published, in Latin:—De Impositione Mammum in Sacrificiis et Elebororum nec non Christianorum Monumentis.—De Ephesitibus Scriptura Sacra ad Ies, i, 6.—De Recessibus ad Jerem. xxxvi.:—De Angelis:—De Mose Aigyptiorum Osiride:—De Conventura Dei.—Historia Naturalem a Prima a Sua Origine ad Notissimam Tempora per eam Classen Deducta (edited and published by his son, Jena, 1700). Trümmer (Sancti, tr., "three," and murrii, "form"), the name of the Hindi triad, the gods Brahma (masculine), Vishnu, and Siva, which are considered an inseparable unity, though three in form. Different works assign the chief place to different members, according to the schools from which they emanate. The Purana, Parana of the Vaishnavas (q. v.) sect assign to Vishnu the highest rank in the triumvir, and thus define its character: "In the beginning of creation the great Vishnu, desirous of creating the whole world, became threefold—creator, preserver, and destroyer. In order to create this world the Supreme Spirit produced from the right side of his body himself, as Brahma; then, in order to preserve this world, he produced from the left side of his body Vishnu; and, in order to destroy the world, he produced from the middle of his body the eternal Siva. Some worship Brahma, others Vishnu, others Siva; but Vishnu, one, yet threefold, creates, preserves, and destroys; therefore let the pious make no difference between the three. The Matsya-Parana, speaking of the Matru, or intellectual principle, says, "Mahat becomes distinctly known as three gods, through the influence of the three qualities, goodness, passion, and sin; being one person and three gods, viz. Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva." We are thus enabled to see that, aside from sectarian belief, which makes its own god the chief, triumvir implies the unity personified of the three principles of creation (Brahma), preservation (Vishnu), and destruction (Siva). When represented, the triumvir is one body with three heads: in the middle of that of Brahma, at its right that of Vishnu, and at its left that of Siva. The symbol of the triumvir is the mystical syllable om, in which o is equivalent to a and u, and where a means Brahma, u means Vishnu, and m means Siva.

Trümmer, Johann Anton, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Oct. 5, 1762. He studied at Leipzig, Halle, and Halle; was in 1748 assistant minister at Braunroda, in the county of Mansfeld, Saxony, and died at Eiselen, May 8, 1784. He published, Scholastica Historiarum De Conspiratione Prusiorum Jerusalemm (1744);—Dissertatio Histo- riographicum de Diamantia Clericorum quibuscum Eova (1746):—De Padiatria Sanctorum (Rostock, 1742):—

Theologisches Wörterbuch (Leipsic, 1770), etc. See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, a. v.; Wi- nner, Handbuch der theolog. Lit. 1, 575, 500, 556. (B. P.)

Trümm, in Greek mythology, was primarily a son of Neptune, by Amphitrite, who lived with his father and mother on the bottom of the sea in a golden palace. Hence the name was applied to any demon of the Mediterranean Sea, who rode, sometimes upon horses, at other times on monsters of the deep, and occasionally appeared, assisting other deities in riding. Such Tritons are described differently. They are probably of the double nature, half man and half fish. The hair of their head is green, they have fine scales, gills under their ears, a human nose, a broad mouth with animal teeth, gills on their forearms, webbed hands, and webbed fingers, and instead of feet they possess the tail of a dolphin. They blow a spiral-formed trumpet.

Trotter, John, D.D., a Scotch Presbyterian clergyman, was born in Edinburgh in 1728, in which city his father was a magistrate. He showed marks of true piety in his youth, and a preference for the ministry. He studied the learned languages, philosophy, and divinity at the City University, passed his trials before the Synod of Edinburgh in 1749, and was soon afterwards presented to the living at Ceres, Fife-shire, where he was very popular for seventeen years. The Swallow Street Church, in London, became vacant in 1759, and Dr. Trotter accepted the pastorate there in December of that year, and with uniform and unwearyed diligence performed the duties for nearly forty years. After a short illness he died, Sept. 14, 1806, and was interred in Bunhill Fields Cemetery. He made Calvinistic theology his careful study through his long life of more than fourscore years. He published a short memoir of his first wife in 1771. See Wilson, Discours sur les Touristes, iv, 49.

Trotter, Jean Pieter Philips, a Protestant theologian, was born at La Tour de Peisey, in the canton of Vaud, Dec. 12, 1818. He studied at Lausanne and at some German universities, and was ordained in 1851. In 1888 he published a volume of Discours Evangélistiques (Paris), and spent some years at Stockholm as pastor of the Welsh Church, where he published, against Green von Prinsterer, La Parti Orthodoxe Par dans l'Église Walloon de La Haye:—La Parti Anti-Revolutionnaire et Com- munal dans l'Église Réformée des Pays- Bas:—Pourquoi je Prend Complé de l'Église Walloon de La Haye (1860-61). In 1882 he retired to Geneva, and died Aug. 80 of the same year. He published also, Grandes Jours de l'Église Apostolique, Considérée Relativement à l'Epoque Actuelle (Paris, 1866):—Gémie des Civilisations (1862, 2 vols.). See Montet, Dict. Biec. des Gén. et des Relig., s. v.; Christian Economist, 1859, 1862; Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Reli- gieuses, a. v. (B. P.)

Trümm, Nicholas, a publisher of London, who died April 8, 1884, deserves an honorable mention for the great interest he took in Oriental research, and more especially in Indian studies. His Record has always been a welcome and invaluable visitor to all those who were interested in such pursuits, and the assistance which it has rendered to Oriental learning cannot be overestimated. But Mr. Tintern's interests and sympathies were not confined to these researches. The history of religions, the study of languages, the development of political life in the East, all claimed a share of his time and thought. Many struggling scholars have lost in him the best friend they had. (B. F.)

Trudpert is the name of a hermit and founder of a celebrated monastery in the Breisgau, Baden. About the year 640 he came into the region of the upper Rhine, and settled at the river Neumagen. Ochthep, a German noble, gave to Trudpert the land, besides six serfs, to assist him in the clearing and making arable the wooded country. Soon a chapel was built in honor of St. Peter. Three years Trudpert led an ascetic life, when two of the servants killed him while resting from his manual labor. Ochthep had Trudpert buried in the chapel. During the 8th century the place lay waste, but in 816 Hambert, one of Ochthep's descendants, built a splendid basilica in honor of Peter and Paul, and Trudpert's remains were placed there. Trullian Councils. They were held in a room of the imperial palace at Constantinople, which had a dome (γατολίθος), whence the name.

I. The first Trullan council was called in 680 by the emperor Constantinus Pogonatus, and held eighteen sittings. The legates of pope Agatho were accorded the highest rank, then followed in order the patriarch George of Constantinople, the legate of the patriarch of Alexandria, Macarius of Antioch, the legate of the patriarch of Jerusalem, three delegates from the Western Church, delegates from Ravenna, and finally the bishops and abbots present. In the very first session the pagan legates accused the Church of Constantinople and Antioch of heresy. Macarius defended himself against this accusation, and referred to the canons of the councils of Ephesus and Chalcedon, and of the fifth Constantinopolitan council. In the eighth session George of Constantinople went over to the emperor, and pronounced the doctrine of the sixth council anathematized. The patriarch Macarius was deposed at a later time.

II. The second Trullan council, called together by Justinian in 692, is known as the Concilium Quinisextum, for which see the art. Quinisextum Concilium. Turner, John M., D.D., an Anglican missionary bishop, was born in England about 1766; educated at Christ Church, Oxford; in 1823 presented to the vicarage of Abingdon; in 1824 removed to the rectory of Willswal, Cheshire; and in 1829 appointed to the bishopric of Calcutta, India, which he held till his death, July 7, 1831. Bishop Turner was a man of exemplary piety, faithful in the discharge of his duties, and much loved and respected by all with whom he was associated. See appendix to the (London) Christian Observer for 1831, p. 819; The (London) Christian Guardian, Feb. 1832, p. 75.

Turley, Edmund, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in Eden, Conn., May 6, 1816. He received his education at the Hamilton Institute, N.Y., and his first pastorate was in the Second Church, Hartford, Conn. Subsequently he was pastor in Granville, O., and Utica, N.Y. He became professor of Biblical criticism in the Hamilton Seminary in 1850, and for five years (1853-58) he was professor in Fairmount Theological Seminary, O. After preaching without settlement for a few years, he started, in Washington, in 1865, the first experiment for the education of colored teachers and preachers. With great disinterestedness and self-sacrifice he labored in this effort for several years. "He seemed inspired with the conviction that God had specially intrusted this great business to him, and nothing could change his impressions of duty." He died Sept. 29, 1872. See Catcath, Baptist Encyclop., p. 1177. (J. C. S.)

Turpin, a Scotch prelate, was elected to the see of Brechin in 1578. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 156.

Tutin, Surveyor General, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, who died at Washington, D.C., Oct. 28, 1871, was in 1836 chaplain of the University of Virginia, and in 1844 was elected chaplain of the United States Senate. At a later period he was pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Hagerstown, Md., and of the First Presbyterian Church, Germantown, Pa. He was the delegate from the Old-School Assembly to the New-school Assembly, which sat in Philadelphia in 1868. He was warmly interested in the reunion of the Presbyterian Church.

Ulf, Hermann Wilhelm, a Swedish theologian, was born June 19, 1830, and studied at Upsala and Utrecht. In 1867 he commenced his academic career at Upsala, in 1872 he was made pastor at Stora Skedwi, in 1877 doctor of theology, and died Dec. 18, 1895. He was consecrated by the Lutheran Church of Sweden. (B. P.)

Ullmann, Karl Christian, a German Protestant bishop, who died at Walk, Livonia, on Oct. 27, 1871, doctor of theology, is best known as the editor of Mittheilungen und Nachrichten für die evangelische Göttingen. (Dorpat, 1898 sq.), besides he published, 'Sermone (1840)—Das gegenwärtige Verhältnis der evangel. Brudergemeinde zur evangelisch-lutherischen Kirche in Liep. und Estland. (Berlin, 1862).—Wie die Bistümer der luth. Kirche die Bibel entgegenstellen (St. Petersburg, 1865). (B. P.)

Ullrich, Jean, a Protestant theologian, was born Dec. 20, 1822, in Switzerland. He studied at Zurich, and after having travelled through Holland, England, France, and Germany, was appointed pastor at Creutz in 1850; in 1865 became professor of Hebrew, in 1869 pastor at the Frauen-Münster, and died in 1892. He wrote, Oratio de Dubius Textibus Apologeticis:—Oratio de Anti-Christian Adversus Milesium in Terra Christian Ecclesiis Ultimo Conatu, etc. See Allgemeine Historische Lexikon, s.v.; Jocher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon, s.v. (B. P.)

Ullrich, Hermann, a philosophical writer of Germany, was born March 23, 1806, at Pforten, Lower Lusatia. He studied law at Halle and Berlin, and commenced to practice in 1827. Upon the death of his father, in 1829, he gave up the practice of law, and began studies which were more congenial to him. In 1833 he commenced his academic career in the philosophical faculty at Berlin, went to Halle in 1834, and died Jan. 11, 1884. Ulrich belonged to the school of speculative philosophy which combated the idealistic pantheism of Hegel by a theistic view of the universe, based upon the facts of natural philosophy and psychology. His principal works are, Glauben und Wissen, Speculation und existire Wissenschaft (Leipsic, 1859) — Gott und die Natur (1862 ; 2d ed. 1866) — Gott und der Mensch (1866). (B. P.)

Ummah is probably the present Alaca esk-Sakhab, two and a half miles south-east of en-Nakbrat (near the promontory of the same name), described in the Memoirs to the Ordnance Survey, 1, 150, as "a large Christian village, containing about five hundred inhabitants, and is clean and well built. There are two churches, and the place seems increasing in size. It is situated on a ridge, with figs, olives, pomegranates, and arable land around. To the east and north the land is covered with brashwood. There is a spring within reach, and about thirty rock-cut cisterns in the village."

Universities. By way of supplement, we give here a list of the European universities that have theological faculties:
1. Berlin, founded in 1502, Protestant (Evangelical).
2. Bonn, founded in 1818, mixed, i.e. Protestant and Roman Catholic.
3. Halle, Roman Catholic.
4. Dresdau, founded in 1702, mixed.
5. Brugge, founded in 1478, Lutheran and Reformed.

VAIL, STEPHEN M., D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Union Vale, Dutchess Co., N. Y., Jan. 15, 1816. At fourteen he entered Cazenovia Seminary, where he was converted. In 1838 he graduated from Bowdoin College, and in 1842 from Union Theological Seminary. After completing his studies he joined the New York Conference, and was stationed successively at Fishkill, N. Y., Sharon, Conn., and Pine Plains. He was two years principal in Pennington Seminary, N. J., and from 1849 to 1868 was professor of Hebrew in the Biblical Institute at Concord, N. H. His health giving way, he resigned his professorship and returned to his home on Staten Island. In 1869 he was appointed consul to Bavaria, where he remained five years. Returning home, he continued the literary labors in which he had been engaged for years, preaching as he had strength and opportunity, without salary, until his death, which occurred in Jersey City, N. J., Nov. 26, 1880. He wrote numerous articles for the Quarterly Review and other periodicals. Among his literary works were, Ministerial Education.—Bible against Slavery.—and a Hebrew Grammar. He lived an earnest, faithful, noble Christian life, characterized by the strictest integrity and honor to the Church. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1881, p. 85.

VAN ENG, JOHN V., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was rector of a church in Rochester, N. Y., until 1864, and of Christ Church, St. Paul, Minn., until 1869, when he became chaplain in the United States army; in 1864 he returned to Rochester as rector of Trinity Church. While in that city he was appointed chaplain of the Rochester institutions and missionary at Victor. In 1877 he became rector of St. John's, in Clyde. His death occurred Dec. 1 following, at the age of seventy-one years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1872, p. 170.

VAN OOSTERZEE. See OOSTRIZER.

VAN PEIT, PETER, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, served as secretary of the Board of Missions of his Church for several years prior to 1856, resigning during that time in Philadelphia. Shortly after he was elected adjunct professor of English literature in the Diocesan College at Burlington, N. J. In 1858 he was professor of Hebrew in that college, and at the same time held the position of secretary to the General Board of Missions in Philadelphia. In 1862, although still holding the secretariaty, he was elected professor of Oriental languages in the Protestant Episcopal Diocesan School in Philadelphia. He retired from this position in 1867, but remained a resident of that city until his death, Aug. 20, 1873, at the age of seventy-five years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1874, p. 38.

VAN SANTVOORD, STAATS, D.D., a Reformed (Dutch) minister, grandson of Cornelius, was born at Schenectady, N. Y., in 1736. He graduated from Union College in 1811, and from the New Brunswick Theological Seminary in 1814; was licensed in the latter year, and preached at Belleville, N. J., until 1828, when he became agent for the New Brunswick Seminary for one year, and thereafter successively pastor at Schoedack (1829, including Coeymans in 1836), New Baltimore...
(1884), Onoskethan (1889), including New Salem in (1848), and Jerusalem (1845–57); in 1846 he engaged in the service of the Christian Commission at Nashville, Tenn. He died May 31, 1882. Dr. Van Santvoord published several sermons. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America, 3d ed. p. 521.

Van Zandt, Abraham Brooker, D.D., LL.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born Nov. 16, 1816, in Albany County, N. Y. His preparatory education was acquired under the able instruction of Asbury Hall. He graduated from Union College in 1840, teaching the grammar-school at Schenectady during the last half of his senior year, and for the same time after his graduation; studied at Princeton Theological Seminary from 1840 to 1842, and was ordained by the Presbytery of Troy, Feb. 18, of the latter year, and ordained by the Presbytery of North River, at Matteawan, Dutchess Co., June 29 following; on the same day he was also installed pastor of the Matteawan Church, from which he was released Oct. 29 following; was pastor of the Reformed Dutch Church of Newburgh from 1842; and of Tabb Street Presbyterian Church at Petersburg, Va., from 1849 to 1856; of the Central Reformed Dutch Church on Ninth Street, New York city, from 1866 to 1869; of the Reformed Dutch Church at Montgomery, N. Y., from 1869 to 1875, when he was inaugurated professor of Exegetical and polemical theology in the Theological Seminary of the Reformed Dutch Church at New Brunswick, N. J., Sept. 24 of the same year. On account of ill-health he was released from the active duties of this professorship, June 5, 1891, but was continued as professor emeritus until his death, July 21 following. He was a man of marked ability, an eloquent and scriptural preacher, and one of the foremost scholars of his denomination. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem., 1892, p. 48.

Vardin, John, D.D., an Episcopal clergyman, was born in 1732. He graduated from King's (now Columbia) College, in 1752, and was then tutor in that institution. In 1774 he went to England to take orders, and the same year was elected assistant rector of Trinity Church, New York city, but preferred to remain abroad. The British government employed him in some department of labor. He wrote some satirical poems on the Whigs, and Trumbull allies to him in his History. He became rector of Skirbeck and Fishtoft, Lincolnshire, and died in 1811. See Sabine, Loyalties of the Revolutionary War, i, 381. (J. C. S.)

Vatke, Johann Karl Wilhelm, a Protestant theologian, was born at Behnborf, Saxony, March 14, 1806. He studied theology and philosophy at Stras- sburg and Berlin, and was privy-counsel in theology at the latter place in 1830. His publication of Die Religion des Alten Testaments (1835) excited the wrath of the late professor Hengstenberg to such a degree that he declared, in Wilhelm Vatke, Peter von Bohlen, and David FriedrichStrauss, the antichrist has appeared, with three heads. Vatke was in 1837 appointed professor in extraordinary, and died April 19, 1882, doctor of theology. Besides the work mentioned already, in which Vatke shows himself to be the forerunner of writers like Weilhousen, Kuenen, Brunus, and others, who regard the prophets as older than the law, and the Psalms as more recent than both, he published Die menschliche Freiheit in ihrer Verhältnisse zur Sünde und zur göttlichen Gnade (1884). In philosophy Vatke belonged to the left wing of the Hegelian school. See Brunus, G. (B. P.)

Vaughan, William, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in Westmoreland County, Pa., Feb. 22, 1785. In 1810 he was converted, licensed in 1811, and ordained in 1812. He settled in Mason County, Ky., where he preached to several churches and had charge of a school for about fifteen years. During this period he became a well-regarded leader of the church, and during two and a half years, from 1831, he was in the service of the American Sabbath School Union, and established in Kentucky not far from one hundred Sunday-schools. He was for a time general agent for Kentucky of the American Bible Society. In 1856 he became pastor of the Bloomsfield Church, and resigned in 1868. He died May 31, 1877, universally loved and honored. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 119. (J. C. S.)

Vehmho Court (Frühgericht), probably derived from ren, i.e. "punishment," was the name of a peculiar judicial institution, which, according to tradition, was founded by Charlemagne and Leo III, and continued to exist, at least nominally, in Westphalia down to the beginning of the 15th century, when it was suppressed (in 1811) by Jerome Bonaparte. The tribunal was composed of freemen of speaking character, but not necessarily belonging to any certain social rank or state; both the emperor and the peasant could be members. The presence of seven members was necessary in order to form the court. When duke Heinrich von Bayern was sentenced, in 1434, over eight hundred members were present. The court took cognizance of all kinds of cases, as heresy, witchcraft, rape, theft, robbery, murder, and summoned all kinds of persons, except Jews, and foreign women, to appear before it. Its sittings were public — held in the open, partly secret, and its verdicts were executed by its own members. In the course of time, when the state became able to maintain its laws, the Vehmho court became superfluous, and in the 16th century it held its last and final session. Van, Hans Loewi, an LL.D., a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Haardenmarschen, Holstein, April 10, 1785. In 1811 he was deacon at Tallinigstedt, and from 1816 to 1833 pastor in his native city. He resigned the pastorship in 1833, and died April 21, 1873, member of consistory. He published, Luther's Werke in einer der Beschreibung Christliche Religion (Wiesbaden, 1837). See Winer, Handbuch der theolog. Lit. i, 35, 754; ii, 257, 872; Zuchold, Bild. Theol. a. v. (B. P.)

Vermeill, Antoine, a French Protestant theologian, was born at Nimes, March 19, 1799, and studied at Geneva. In 1824 he was pastor at Bordeaux, where he founded many benevolent institutions. In 1840 he was called to Paris, and died in 1864. Vermeil has been universally admired for his i.e., his great development. The Institute of Deaconesses, which he founded at a time when Flieder's name was not yet known in France. A biographical sketch of Vermeil is given in his sermons, Catechismus Liturgicus, published after his death (Paris, 1868, sq. 8 vol.). See Lichtenberger, En cyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, a. v. (B. P.)

Vernes, Jacob, a Protestant theologian of Geneva, was born in 1728, and died in 1791. He is the author of, Lettres sur le Christianisme de J. J. Rousseau (1768)

VERNY, Louis EDGARD, a Protestant theologian of France, was born at Mayence, March 17, 1790. He studied law at Strasbourg, and practiced at Colmar. In 1828 he gave up his profession and betook himself to the study of theology. In 1830 he was appointed principal of the college at Mulhausen, and in 1835 accepted a call to the Lutheran Church at Paris. He died Oct. 19, 1844, in the pulpit of St. Thomas, at Strasbourg, where he had made the opening address of the session of the Superior Consistory. After his death a volume of Sermons, containing also a biographical sketch, was published (Paris, 1867). See Scherer and Colani, In Revue Théologique, of Strasbourg, first series, ix, 263 sq.; Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, a. v. (B. F.)

Vialart (de Herse), Felix, a French eclesiastic, was born in Paris, Sept. 4, 1618, of a noble family, and pursued his studies at the Collège de Navarre. In 1638 he was made doctor of theology, and in 1641 consecrated to the bishop of Châlons, whom he succeeded in the following year. Vialart died June 17, 1650, and was highly esteemed by all classes. He published, Rituels ou Manuel de l'Eglise de Chalons (Paris, 1649); —Dumburces, Mandements et Lettres Pastoraux pour le Rétablissement de la Discipline Ecclésiastique (1660, 1662); —L'Ecole Chrétienne, a kind of catechism. Villers, Charles François Dominique de, a distinguished French writer, was born at Belchien, in Lorraine, Nov. 4, 1764. He was educated in the military school of Metz, and entered the army in 1782, but studied at the same time classical literature and philosophy. His De la Liberté (1791) proved too moderate for the Jacobins, and in 1792 he was compelled to flee. He settled at Liéboe, and became, in the course of time, thoroughly acquainted with the German language and literature. Having written with great openness against the violence of Napoleon's generals, he was expelled from the Halle Towns by Davoust in 1806. Villers went to Paris, and obtained from the emperor the repeal of the order. In 1811 he was made professor of philosophy at Göttingen, from his position, however, he was dismissed in 1814 by the request of the Hanoverian dynasty. Villiers died Feb. 26, 1815. His principal works are, Essai sur l'Esprit et l'Influence de la Réformation de Luther (5th ed., published by Madser, Strasbourg, 1851), which received the prize of the French Academy in 1804, and was translated both into German and English; —Philosophie de Kant (Metz, 1802, 2 vols.). Wilm, Jacob Wilhelm George, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born in 1804, and died Dec. 7, 1877. In 1823 he was the organizer of the Separaute Lutheranen of Hesse, and published, Die protestantische Lehre der Rechtsfrigkeit durch den Glauben (Casel, 1833); —Was fürst der biblicke Beschrieb der Sünde in sich hat (1840); —Die kurhessische Kirche (1845); —Protestantismus und Christentum (1847); —Der gegenwärtige Stand der hessischen Kirche vor der Selbständigkeit. (1847). (B. F.)

Vincent, Jacques Louis Samuel, a Protestant theologian of France, was born at Nimes, Sept. 8, 1787. After having studied at Geneva, he settled in his native city as pastor. In 1825 he was made president of the consistory. After the Revolution, the French Church Gradually sank down into the deism of Rousseau, and its theology became mere conventionalism without any true vitality. Vincent felt the evil, and it is his great merit that he pro cured the remedy. His first original production was an attack on Lamennais's Essai sur l'Indépendance et la Nature de Religion, and his Observations sur l'Unité Religieuse (1820), and Observations sur la Voie d'Autorité Applicée à la Religion, created quite a sensation. From 1820 to 1824 he published Mélanges de Religion, de Morale et de Critique Sacrée (10 vols.), which made the French public acquainted with the Sturm und Drang in Germany, and though still deeper influence were his Vues sur les Protestantismes (1829, 2 vols.; republished by Prevost-Paradol, 1860), and Mélange de Religion (most complete edition by Fontanes, 1863). Vincent died July 10, 1837. Vincent, Philippe, a Reformed theologian of France, was born in 1595. Having completed his theological studies, he was ordained in 1639, was appointed, in 1629, pastor of the Reformed Church at Tours, and died March 12, 1651. He is the author of Paraphrase sur les Lamentations du Prophète Jerémie (1646). See Jochet, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon, a. v.; Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, a. v. (B. F.)

Vinton, Alexander Hamilton, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at Providence, R. I., May 2, 1816. He studied criticism at New Haven, Conn., and practiced as a physician from 1828 to 1832. He then studied theology in the Protestant Episcopal Seminary in New York city, and was ordained in 1835. For about a year he was pastor of a church at Portland, Me., and from 1836 to 1841 was stationed at Providence, R. I. From 1842 to 1858 he was a pastor in Boston, Mass. He then went to Philadelphia, Pa., remaining in that city until 1861. He next became rector of St. Mark's Church, New York city, until 1869, when he went to Boston as rector of Emanuel Church, and later was a professor in the Protestant Episcopal Divinity School, Cambridge, Mass. He died there, April 26, 1881. Dr. Vinton published a volume of Sermons (1855) and several separate discourses and addresses.

Vinton, Francis, D.D., D.C.L., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at Providence, R. I., Aug. 29, 1809. He graduated at West Point in 1830; became lieutenant, and in 1832, in the employ of the Survey of the Coast Survey. In 1837 he studied law in Harvard College, and served as civil engineer; left the army in 1836; and after studying in the General Theological Seminary, was rector in Brooklyn, N. Y., several years prior to 1856, and shortly after became assistant minister of Trinity Church, New York city. About 1870, in addition to his pastoral duties, he was elected Laudlow professor of ecclesiastical polity and law in the General Theological Seminary at New York. He died in Brooklyn, Sept. 29, 1872. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1873, p. 134.

Vormbaum, Riehold, a Protestant theologian of Germany, who died Oct. 2, 1880, at Kaiserswerth, where he was laboring for the Separate Lutherans of Hesse, and published, Die protestantische Lehre der Rechtsfrigkeit durch den Glauben (Casel, 1833); —Was fürst der biblicke Beschrieb der Sünde in sich hat (1840); —Die kurhessische Kirche (1845); —Protestantismus und Christentum (1847); —Der gegenwärtige Stand der hessischen Kirche vor der Selbständigkeit. (1847). (B. F.)

Vouilla, Johann August, a German Orientalist, was born at Bonn, Oct. 25, 1808, and died at Giessen, Jan. 21, 1869. In 1836 he had been professor of Oriental languages since 1833. He published, Fragmente über die Religion des Zoroaster (Bonn, 1831); —Institutiones linguae Persicae cum Sinenica et Zendicae linguae comparata (Giessen, 1840-50, 2 vols.); —Lexicon Persico-Latinum Etymologicum (ibid, 1855-64, 4 vols.); —Sup-

Vullemin, Louis, a Protestant theologian, was born at Yvon, Switzerland, Sept. 7, 1797. He was educated in the institute of the famous Pestalozzi, and pursued his philosophical as well as theological studies at Lausanne. He was ordained in 1821, and acted for several years as vicar in various places. But his delicate health prevented him from assuming a pastorate, and he betook himself to literary work. In 1828 he published an Essai sur l'Evangile; in 1829, Considerations

Wackerhagen, Augustus, D.D., a Lutheran minister, was born in Hanover, Germany, May 22, 1774. He was educated at the University of Göttingen; employed for a time in a young ladies' seminary, and also as private tutor in a nobleman's family. In 1801 he arrived in America, acted as tutor three years to the son of Mr. Bohlen, a Philadelphia merchant, then visited Europe, returning to the United States, was shipwrecked, but his life was saved. In 1805 he accepted a call to Schoharie, N. Y.; in 1810 he was pastor of various churches in Columbia County; for several years he had charge of the academy at Clermont, and died there, Nov. 1, 1865. Dr. Wackerhagen was a diligent student of ancient and modern languages. For twelve years he presided over the New York Ministerium, and was an original trustee of Hartzwick Seminary. Except a sermon on the Lutheran Pulpit, the only work he published was a German volume, Faith and Morals (Philadelphia, 1804). See Fifty Years in the Lutheran Ministry (1876), p. 58.

Wadsworth, Charles, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Litchfield, Conn., May 8, 1814. He graduated from Union College in 1837, and after teaching one year at Canajoharie, N. Y., graduated from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1840. He was ordained pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church of Troy, N. Y., Feb. 17, 1842; in 1850 was called to the Arch Street Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, Pa., which, under his charge, became large, influential, and flourishing; in 1862 he accepted a call to the Calvary Church, San Francisco, Cal., in 1869 returned to Philadelphia as pastor of the Third Reformed (Dutch) Church, which in 1873 united with the Immanuel Presbyterian Church. He died in Philadelphia, April 1, 1892. Dr. Wadsworth was an earnest, eloquent preacher, and had few equals in the pulpit. See Necrolo. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1882, p. 39. (W. P. S.)

Wait, Samuel, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in Washington County, N. Y., Dec. 19, 1789. He made a profession of religion March 12, 1809; was ordained at Sharon, Mass., June 8, 1818, and afterwards pursued his studies at Columbia College, Washington, D. C., where for a time he was a tutor. He became pastor at Newbern, N. C., in 1827, and for a number of years travelled through that state. Under his auspices the religious organ of the denomination, the Recorder, was established. To him, also, Wake Forest College owes its existence. It was started as a manual-labor institution in 1833, and he was called to preside over it. The school, in 1819, having abandoned the manual-labor feature, was made a college, and Dr. Wait continued at its head until 1846, and then resigned, filling the position of pastor of several churches until 1856, when he became principal of a female school in Oxford, N. C., where he remained until 1856. He died July 28, 1867. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclopedia. p. 1196. (J. C. S.)

Walckirk, Mackenzie E. C., a minister of the Church of England, was born at Bath, Dec. 15, 1821. He was educated at Winchester and Oxford, at a very early period in life entered upon authorship, and for more than thirty years issued a constant succession of works on topographical and ecclesiastical history. As a curate of the churches of St. Margaret and St. James, Westminster, he was naturally drawn to the story of the historical associations connected with those parishes. His three volumes on the narrative of Westminster, and the two most famous parish churches which bear its name, were published before 1851. In that year he published The English Ordinal: its History, Textility, and Catholicity; with an Introduction, by Johannes von Millen. In 1863 he was appointed to the precentorship and prebendal stall of Oving, at Chichester, and illustrated the history of the cathedral to which he was attached by numerous volumes on its bishops and episcopal registers. He died at London, Dec. 22, 1880. Besides the writings already mentioned, he published, Sacred Archaeology (Lond., 1868):—Traditions and Customs of Cathedrals (1872):—The Constitutions and Canons Ecclesiastical of the Church of England (1874):—Church-work and Life in English Minsters (1880). Mr. Walckirk was also a frequent contributor to the Transactions of the British Archæological Association and the Royal Society of Literature. (B. P.)

Waldby, Robert, D.D., an Irish prelate, was born in the city of York, and received the rudiments of his education in the abbey of Tickell, in Yorkshire. He became divinity professor at Touloune. In 1828 he was sent by Richard II. to treat with John, duke of Lancaster, another time to negotiate a neutral league with Charles, king of Navarre, and a third to effect the reduction of John, earl of Armagnac, to true obedience. In 1391 he succeeded to the see of Dublin. In 1392 he was constituted chancellor of Ireland. In 1394 he was summoned to a great council to be held at Kilkenny. He was translated to the see of Chichester, and from that promoted to the archbishopric of York. He died in 1397. See D'Alton, Memoirs of the Archbishops of Dublin, p. 146.

Walker, Joseph R., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was ordained deacon in 1817. For fifty-five years, that is, from 1823 to 1878, he was rector of St. Helena's Parish, Beaufort, S. C. He died April 2, 1879, aged eighty-three years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1888, p. 172.

Wallace, Robert, a Scotch prelate, was minister at Barnwell, Ayrshire, and was consecrated bishop of the Isles, at St. Andrews, in January, 1661. He died in 1675. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 810.

Wallor, William J., M.D., St.T.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born Jan. 5, 1779. He was ordained deacon in 1814, and presbyter in 1845. From 1847 to 1859 he was president of Shelby College, and then removed to Louisville, Ky. About 1864 he returned to his former position at Shellyville, and there remained until about 1868, when he went to Lelason. About 1872 he removed to Louisville. In 1877 he went to Anchorage, where he died, April 21, 1879. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1880, p. 172.
WALTER (1), a Scotch prelate, was probably bishop of St. Andrews in the 12th century. See Keith, Scotch Bishops, p. 3.

WALTER (2), a Scotch prelate, was bishop of Dunkeld in 1324. See Keith, Scotch Bishops, p. 86.

WALTERS, W. T., D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in Pittsylvania County, Va., in 1825. He made a profession of religion early in life, and graduated from Wake Forest College in 1848, in which he became first a tutor and then professor of mathematics, remaining in that position until the college was closed by the civil war. He was chosen, in 1867, corresponding secretary of the Southern Society of Baptist Colleges and was for many years engaged in the duties of that office. He was also for some time occupied in editorial work, being connected for a while with the Biblical Recorder, of which for several years he was the agricultural editor. Two churches, those of Littleton and Wilson, N. C., were organized by him. He died Dec. 21, 1872. See Cathcart, Bapt. Enquiry, p. 1298. (J. C. S.)

Waltón (called Moustewr), John, an Irish prelate, was the eighteenth abbot of Osney, near Oxford, to the government of which house he was appointed in 1452. From this abacy he was advanced to the archbishopric of Armagh, which he entered in 1472. He did not receive formal restitution of the temporalities of his see until 1477. In 1478 this prelate annexed the perpetual vicarage of St. Kevin to his choral vicar of the prebend of Cullen. He resigned in 1484. See D'Alton, Memoirs of the Archbishops of Dublin, p. 166.

Warburton, Charles Mongan, D.D., an Irish bishop, was born in 1755, in the north of Ireland. He was intended for the Roman Catholic Church, sent to study in one of the institutes on the Continent endowed for the education of Roman priests, but was thrown by a flood into the Society of Jesus, who induced him to become a Protestant. He was, after taking orders, appointed chaplain to a regiment in America. Not long afterwards he changed his name from Mongan to Warburton, became dean of Arlagh, then bishop of Limerick in 1806, and of Cloyne in 1829. He died at Cloyne palace, Aug. 9, 1836. See (Lond.) Annual Register, 1836, p. 270.

Ward (prop. ἡμερής or ἡμερήσις, daily; occasionally ἡμέρα, day), a prison (q. v.) or an apartment thereof (Τινα, x 3; Acts xii, 10); also a watch-post at the gates of the Temple (Neh. xii, 25; 1 Chron. ix, 23). This term is likewise used to designate a class or detachment of priests or Levites (xxv, 8; Neh. xii, 24; xxvi, 21).

Ward, John, LL.D., an English Baptist educator, was born in London in 1679, his father being a Baptist minister. He possessed learning of the highest order, and loved the acquisition of knowledge with an intense affection. He was elected professor of rhetoric in Gresham College in 1720, and died in 1756. Among the productions of his pen were, The Lives of the Gresham Professors;—The Westminster Greek Grammar. He assisted Horsley in his Britannia Romana, and Ainsworth in his Dictionary. See Cathcart, Bapt. Enquiry, p. 1296. (J. C. S.)

Ward, Seth, D.D., F.R.S., an eminent English divine and mathematician, was born at Buntingford, Hertfordshire, in 1617. He graduated at Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, about 1637, and became a fellow of the same college in 1640; but was ejected from his fellowship in 1646, for refusing to sign the Solemn League and Covenant. He then became a private tutor, and afterwards went to Oxford, where he was chosen Savilian professor of astronomy in 1649, and remained at that post until 1691. He was elected principal of Jesus College in 1657, but did not receive possession; and president of Trinity College in 1672 but was obliged to resign this position at the Restoration, in 1660. The same year, however, he received the vicarage of St. Lawrence, Jewry, London, and the preceptorship of Exeter; and was promoted to the deanship of Exeter in 1661. He became bishop of Exeter in 1662, bishop of Salisbury in 1667, chancellor of the Order of the Garter in 1671, prebendary of St. Mary's, 1679; prebendary of Wilts in 1675, prebendary of Winchester in 1676, chancellor of Salisbury in 1681, and treasurer of Salisbury in 1687. In 1692 he founded at Salisbury a college for the widows of clergymen. About 1687 he lost his mental faculties, and died at Bath, on New Year's Day, 1698. He was a distinguished astronomer, and one of the founders of the Royal Society. He was the author of An Essay on the Being and Attributes of God; on the Immortality of the Soul, etc. (Oxford, 1632);—a volume of Sermons (London, 1674);—Proyecto de Cometa, etc. (1636);—Astronomica Geometrica (1636);—and other works.

Warden, a keeper, a guardian; a term sometimes applied to the head of a college, and sometimes to the superior of the chapters in conventual churches.

Wardlaw, Walter, a Scotch prelate, was archdeacon of Lothian, and secretary to king David II, when he was associated with the see of Glasgow in 1388. He was bishop here in 1389. See Keith, Scotch Bishops, p. 246.

Warne, Joseph Andrews, D.D., a Baptist minister, born in London, England, in 1755, was converted in early life, graduated at Stepney College in 1821, in 1822 came to America, settling first in North Carolina, where, after teaching some time, he became pastor of the Church in Newbern, and afterwards principal of the Furman Academy of Edgefield, S. C. Later he came north, and supplied the pulpit successively of the First Baptist Church in Providence, R. L.; South Reading (now Wakefield), Mass.; Brookline (seven years); The Second Baptist Church in Providence, and the Sassaon Street Church, Philadelphia. He died at Frankford, March 9, 1881. Dr. Warne was greatly interested in foreign missions. He was editor of a Baptist edition of The Compendious Commentary. See The National Baptist, March 17, 1881. (J. C. S.)

Warneford, Samuel Wilson, D.D., a clergyman of the English Church, was born at Sevenhampton, near Highworth, in Wiltshire, in 1756. He was educated at University College, Oxford, where he received the degree of A.M. in 1786, and B.C.L. in 1790. He became rector of Lidderdale, Millen, Wilts, in 1689; and of Bourton-on-the-Hill, in Gloucestershire, in 1810, in which he lived plainly, and bestowed the large fortune of which he was then in possession in gifts of public charity and benevolence. He endowed schools and almshouses in his own parish, and contributed largely to schools, colleges, and hospitals throughout the kingdom. To the Clergy Orphan-school he gave thirteen thousand pounds, and to Queen's College, Birmingham, upwards of twenty-five thousand pounds. In 1844 the bishop of Gloucester conferred on him an honorary canonry in Gloucester Cathedral; and in 1852, at the age of eighty, he was received in the Warneford Lunatic Asylum at Oxford, the expense of which was met by public subscription. He died at Bourton, Jan. 11, 1855.

He possessed considerable fortune, and was very liberal with it, giving during his lifetime and bequeathing at his death some twenty thousand pounds for charitable purposes.

Warner, John (2), D.D., an English clericman, son of Dr. Ferdinando Warner, was born at Ronde, Wiltshire, in 1736. He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, from which he graduated in 1758; preached many sermons in a chapel in Long Acre; became rector of Hockliffe and Chaigreave, Bedfordshire, in 1771, and afterwards of Stanton, Wilts. He died in St. John's Square, Clerkenwell, Jan. 20, 1806. He resided in France during the Revolution, and thus became an ardent republican. He was the author of Metternich; or, A New Pleasure Recommended in a Dissertation upon a Part of Greek and Latin Prose (Lond. 1797); and Memoirs of Mekerbuss, in the Gentleman's Magazine.

Warpulla, in Slavonic mythology, is the god of the wind, one in the train of followers of Perun, the god of thunder. He causes the roaring of the storm.

Warren, John (1), D.D., an English clericman, was born in 1670, became prebendary of Exeter in 1709, and died in 1736. He published some single sermons which have been commended. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Warren, John (2), LL.D., an English prelate of the 18th century, became archdeacon of Worcester in 1775, bishop of St. David's in 1778, was translated to Bangor in 1788, and died in 1800. He published six single sermons (1777–92). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Warren, Joseph W., D.D., one of the oldest missionaries of the Presbyterian Board in India, was born at Brunswick, Me., Aug. 30, 1809. After a course of study at the academy at Plymouth, N. H., he learned the art of printing at Concord, and afterwards resumed his studies at Phillips Academy, Exeter, where he was converted, and soon after determined to devote himself to the work of the ministry. At the age of twenty-five he entered Lane Theological Seminary, and was one of the large body of students who left on account of the abolitionist movement. He completed his studies at the Allegheny Seminary, where he connected himself with the Presbyterian Church. In October, 1828, in company with Messrs. Freeman and Scott, he left for India, where his knowledge of printing contributed to his great usefulness in superintending the press. He took with him his press, which had been shipped to Allahabad, the first mission press ever established in India north of Serampore. He was much engaged in promoting the cause of education in India, and aided in establishing the high school at Agra for European and Eurasian children. In 1853 he returned to the United States to make provision for the education of his children, and entered for a time upon pastoral work in Indiana. He served also as chaplain during the late civil war. In October, 1872, he returned to India and completed a Grammar of the Urdu Dialect, and partially completed a translation of Gramma’s Hebrew Lexicon. The Rev. John S. Woodside, of Dehra, Northern India, in communicating the death of Dr. Warren, writes, among other things, "Throughout his illness his constant prayer was for patience, that he might have grace to endure all he had to suffer. He did not desire that his life should be unlaidly prolonged, but his prayer was, "Come, Lord Jesus, and come quickly." He died at Morar Gualior, March 7, 1879. (W. P. S.)

Warren, Samuel, LL.D., eminent in the history of English Methodist, commenced his career as a Wesleyan minister in 1602. He was a man of large ability, and occupied some of the most important circuits in England. Jealous of the rising influence of Dr. James Bunting, he objected to certain features in the formation of a theological institution in 1834, and not ceasing in his opposition, he was suspended from his ministerial functions at a special district meeting at Manchester, where he was then stationed, in October of that year. Controversial publications were issued by both parties, violent language was indulged in, an extensive agitation followed, and a large defection from the societies was the result. Dr. Warren's case excited much sympathy. Denying himself unconstitutionally suspended, Warren appealed to the high court of chancery, but on March 25, 1835, the lord high-chancellor denied the appeal. At the Wesleyan conference at Sheffield, in August following, Dr. Warren was expelled from the conference and connected with the Leeds secessionists, who had adopted the title of the Protestant Methodist in 1832, and assumed the name of the Wesleyan Association Methodists in 1835, and in 1857 both united in the formation of that respectable body, the United Methodist Free Church. Dr. Warren himself, becoming tired of the excitement and extremes connected with an agitation, many features of which could never have been congenial to his sober and deliberate judgment, was received into the Episcopal Church, and became the incumbent of All-Souls' Church, Manchester, which position he could not hold until his death, in 1874. Dr. Warren published, besides a number of sermons, Memoirs and Select Letters of Mrs. A. Warren (1852, 12mo)—A Deponent of the Laws and Regulations of the Wesleyan Methodists (3d ed. Lond. 1858); E. Stevenson, Hist. of Old Road Chapel, p. 587; Adeline Wadley, Life of S. D. Wadley, D.D., p. 98; Smith, Hist. of Wes. Methodism (see supra and Appendixes H–J), iii, 575–580; Minutes of Conference, 1850, vii, 542–591; Jackson, Life of Robert Newton, D.D. (Lond. and N. Y. 1855), p. 143 sq.

Warren, William, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Waterford, Me., Oct. 21, 1608. He was a student at Phillips Academy, Andover, Mas.; also in Bowdoin College from 1834 to 1836; graduated from Andover Theological Seminary in 1838; preached in Wells, Me., six months; was ordained at Windham, Feb. 14, 1840; installed at Upton, Mass., Nov. 14, 1849; dismissed April 18, 1856; was district secretary of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions for northern New England, residing at Gorham, Me., from 1857 to 1876, and died Jan. 28, 1879. He published, Geography and Atlas (1843)—Household Accommodation and Baptism (1846):—Teacher's Institute Lectures (1853); The Old Testament (1858);—Religious Progress: A Voice to the Young, and other sermons. Also a work on, Theories of the Will:—Twelve Years with the Children:—Our indebtedness to Missions. See Cong. Year-book, 1880, p. 31.

Warrener, William, an English Wesleyan minister, was received into the work by Wesley in 1759. After laboring in Great Britain for seven years, he went to the West Indies, "being the first of our preachers," say the Minutes, "who was regularly appointed to that work." He, with Clarke and Hammet, went over with Dr. Coke, in 1786, on that celebrated voyage intended to terminate in Nova Scotia, but which ended really eighteen hundred miles south, at the island of Antigua. Warrener was stationed on that island, where a most flattering cause was inaugurated, the society having been, in fact, already formed by Nathaniel Gilbert and John Baxter. In 1797, after a successful career, he returned to his own country and was appointed to a circuit in South Wales; and on retiring, in 1836, in the seventy-fifth year of his age, he passed away, "triumphing gloriously over death." He was the first Methodist missionary who addressed the great annual gatherings of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, doing so at the memorable meeting at Leeds. See Smith, Hist. of Wes. Methodism, iii, 101 sq.; also 1, 944; in 262.

WAR OF THE LORD, BOOK OF, the (בָּרֵא-שָׁלָה)
Book of the (םֵעַּמָּה), a document cited Num. xxii, 14.
It was probably a collection of poems or songs celebrating the victories which had been achieved by the Israelites by the help of God. That it was an Amoritish work, as Michaelis suggested, is disproved by the use of the term גֲּלּוֹפָּה, which Michaelis vainly attempts to show is to be taken as a verb, and the passage transl. ates, "in the book of the word which it shall be." There is no reason to doubt that there were minarels enough in Israel at all times of their history to record the events of that history in song, and those composed before the date of this notice might have been written in a book. What confirms this are the undamaged fragments of ancient songs in ver. 17, 18, and 27-30.

It is not clear what the passage meant; but it seems to give a geographical notice, and probably was of some importance as indicating the ancient boundaries of the Moabite and Amorite tribes. (Rosenmuller, and Haver-
inck, transl. i, ii, 564, Ensley, transl. p. 821; Bleek, Einl. p. 199). Hengstenberg has a peculiar view (Heitgrä ber, ii, 223), which Baumgarten (Theolog. Commentar., ii, 844) follows. He translates: "And Yahweh (he took—ннеl Jehovah) in the storm, and the brooks, the Arnon and the river of the valley which goes down to the dwelling of AHi, and leaves on the borders of Moab.
This is not very different from the Sept. version: διὰ τοῦτο λέγεται ἐν βιβλία: πόλης τοῦ Κυρίου τὴν Ζωοῦ (they probably read Ἰέρυλις ἢ ζλέσατο, κα τούς αὐτών ἀρχόντων ἀρχῶν. —Kitto. It was evidently one of the documents used by Moses in the composition of his Mateateh. It may have been, among other matters, the history of the expeditions occasionally made by the Hebrews, while in Egypt, among the surrounding tribes. At any rate, some such document seems to have been used by the writer of Chronicles, and its contents are characterized as "ancient things" (1

Warton, Joseph, D.D., an English clergyman, son of Thomas Warton, Sr., was born at Dunfod, Surrey, in 1722. He was educated at Winchester School, and at Oriel College, Oxford, where he graduated in 1744;
took orders in the Church of England, and was constinued to his father at Basingstoke from 1744 to 1746; curate at Chelsea from 1746 to 1748; became rector of Rinsland, Hampshire, in 1748; travelled in France and elsewhere on the Continent with the duke of Bolton in 1751; became rector of Tewnton in 1754, of Wickham in 1782, and of Upham in 1788. He was second master of Winchester School from 1755 to 1766, and head master from 1766 to 1776. He became chaplain to Sir George Lyttelton in 1756; prebendary of St.
Paul's, London, in 1782; and prebendary of Winchester in 1787. He died at Wickham, in Hampshire, Feb. 28, 1800. His principal published works are, One on Various Subjects (1746)—a poetical translation of

Wazer, Carpar (or Garpar), a Swiss theologian, was born at Zurich, Sept. 1, 1556. He studied at Altdorf and Heidelberg; travelled extensively through Holland, England, Ireland, and Italy; and after his return, in 1568, was appointed pastor at Wittikon, which place
he exchanged, in 1596, for the deanery at Zurich, connecting at the same time the professorship of Hebrew.
In 1667 he received also the chair of Greek, and in 1811
the theological chair, and died Nov. 9, 1680. He was Wash (denoted by several Hebrew words of varying import; but in Greek ναύστα, which applies to a part of the person, is distinctly distinguished from λοίχ, which applies to the whole body, in John xiii, 10, where the

A. v. unfortunately confounds the two). This act for ordinary purposes of personal cleanliness is considered under Barsin in Is. We here treat it under its ceremonial aspect. See AMALGAM.

The Jews had two sorts of washing for purposes of religious purification: one, of the whole body by im-ersion, θάτα, tabdil, which was used by the priests at their consecration, and by the proselytes at their initiation; the other, of the hands or feet, called dipping, or pouring of water, ἤμισυ, tabd, which was of daily use, not only for the hands and feet, but also for cups and other vessels used at their meals (Matt. xxv, 2; Mark vii, 8, 4). The six water-pots of stone used at the marriage feast of Cana in Galilee (John ii, 6) were set for this purpose. To these two modes of purification our Lord seems to allude in John xiii, 10, where the being "clean every whit" implies one who had become a disciple of Christ, and consequently had renounced the sins of his former life. He who had so done was supposed to be wholly washed, and not to need any immersion, in imi-itation of the ceremony of initiation, which was never repeated among the Jews. All that was necessary in such a case was the dipping or rinsing of the hands or feet, agreeably to the customs of the Jews. See Wash-tu (the Hands and Feet). Sometimes the lustration was performed by sprinkling blood or anointing with oil. Sprinkling was performed either with the finger, or with a branch of cedar and hyssop tied together with the scarlet cord (Lev. xiv, 4-5; Numb. xix, 18; Pass. ii, 7).
See BAPTISM.

The practice of frequent ablutions was not peculiar to the Hebrews; we find it rigidly enjoined by the Mohammedan law. We quote the following extract from Taylor, History of Mohammedanism:

"The Sunnah of the Mohammedans exactly corresponds with the מָכֵס, מָכָּס, of the Jews, and comprehends all their religious traditions. (a) From it we take the following account of the greater purification, ḳhsth. It must be remembered that there are seven species of water for righty performing religious acts. See: the laws, to say, rain, sea, river, fountain, well, snow, and ice water. But the purification of the greater lustration, as the principal cases, are these: (1) Intention; (2) a perfec1 cleansing; (3) that the water should touch the whole skin and every hair. There are five required:
the traditional law, or Huwâa: (1) the appropriate phrase, Blasphâm ('In the name of the most merciful God'), must be pronounced: (2) the palms must be washed before the hands are put into the water: (3) the lustration Wôdâ must be performed: (4) the skin must be moist when the hands are rubbed. If it must be produced, one must omit the cases in which this lustration is required.) (b)
The second lustration, ṭathath. The principal parts, indeed, of the divine lustration are called the ṭathath because of the two Hebrews, the ṭathath Wôdâ and ṭathath Bîyân (the Koran) institutions, of the lustration Wôdâ are six: (1) Intention; (2) the washing of the entire face; (3) the washing of the hands and forearms up to the elbows; (4) the rubbing of some parts of the head; (5) washing of the feet as far as the ankles; (6) observance of the prescribed order.

"The Institutes of the traditional law about this lustra-tion are ten: (1) the preparatory formula, Blasphâm, must be used; (3) the palms must be washed before the hands are put into the basin; (4) the mouth must be cleansed; (5) all wounds must be drawn through; the mouth must be washed; (6) the right hand and foot must be washed before the left; (7) these ceremonies must be thrice done; (8) the whole must be done in uninterrupted succession. (We omit the cases in which this instruction is required.)

"The purification by sand. The divine institutions respecting purification by sand are four: (1) intention; (2) the rubbing of the face; (3) the rubbing of the hands and forearms; (4) the lifting up to the knees of the hand or foot. The Sonnite ordinances are three: (1) the purification of the right hand and foot; (2) that the ceremony be performed without interruption. The Mohammedans have borrowed the permission to wash with sand from the Jews. In cases of necessity the Jews, indeed, Cedrenus mentions an instance of sand being used for a Christian baptism. Their necessity dictated the permission; we need not therefore have recourse to Ralston's strange theory, that sand is really a liquid. Four things to its validity are added by the commentators: (1) the person must be on a journey; (2) he must have diligently searched for water; (3) it must be at the stated time of prayer; (4) the sand must be clean." See Illustration.

Washburn, Alvin H., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was rector of Christ Church, at Hyde Park, Mass., in 1862, and in 1866 removed to Cleveland, O., as rector of Grace Church, where he continued until his death, near Ashtabula, Dec. 30, 1878. See Protest Episcopal Almanac, 1878, p. 170.

Washburn, Edward Abiel, D.D., an eminent Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in Boston, Mass., April 16, 1819. After receiving a good primary education, he entered the Boston Latin School for preparation for Harvard College, where he was admitted at the age of sixteen. He graduated in 1838 with high honors. After studying a short time at the Theological Seminary at Andover and the Yale Divinity School, he served for about six months as a licentiate under the Worcester Association of Ministers, but in 1843 took orders as a deacon in the Protestant Episcopal Church. In 1845 he was ordained presbyter by Bishop Eastburn, of his native state. His first call was to the rectoryship of St. Paul's Church at Newburyport. After laboring seven years in this parish, he spent two years in travel in the East and on the continent. Returning home in 1854, he succeeded Dr. Coxe at St. John's Church, Hartford, Conn., his next parish was St. Mark's Church, Philadelphia, Pa. In 1865 he accepted a call to the Calvary Protestant Episcopal Church on East Twenty-first Street, New York city, where he labored until his death, Feb. 2, 1891.

Dr. Washburn was a large-minded, warm-hearted theologian, a practical preacher, and an upright pastor. He was also active in the religious enterprises of his day. He was a member of the American committee for the revision of the Bible, aided Dr. Schaff in the preparation of one of the volumes of Lange's Commentary, and was the author of a volume of Sermons on the Ten Commandments.

Washing the Hands and Feet. The particular attention paid by the Jews to the cleansing of the hands and feet, as compared with other parts of the body, originated in the social usages of the East. As knives and forks were dispensed with in eating, it was absolutely necessary that the hand, which with the mouth is the common dish, should be scrupulously hand and food clean; and, again, as sandals were ineffectual against the dust and heat of an Eastern climate, washing the feet on entering a house was an act both of respect to the company and of refreshment to the traveller. In the following account of the Jewish particulars not given in previous articles. See Wash.

1. Washing the Hands was transformed by the Pharisees of the New-Test. age into a matter of ritual observance (Mark vii, 3), and special rules were laid down as to the times and manner of its performance. The neglect of these rules by our Lord and his disciples drew down upon him the hostility of that sect (Matt. xxv, 2; Luke xvi, 38). Whether the expression πυγμαίω was used by Mark has reference to any special regulation may, perhaps, be doubting; the senses of "of" (A.V.) and "difficult" (R.V.) are both possible; but it may possibly signify "with the feet," as though it was necessary to close the one hand, which had already been cleansed, before it was applied to the unclean one. This sense appears preferable to the other interpretations of a similar character, such as "up to the wrist" (Lightfoot); "to the belly" (Theophylact); "having closed the hand" which is undergoing the washing (Grotius; Scaliger). The Pharisaical regulations on this subject are embodied in a treatise of the Mishna entitled Yadaim, from which it appears that the ablation was confined to the hand (ii, 3), and that great care was needed to secure perfect purity in the water used. The ordinary, as distinct from the ceremonial, washing of hands before meals is still universally prevalent in Eastern countries (Lane, i, 190; Burchhardt, Notes, i, 65; Thomson, Land and Book, i, 184). See Hands.

The Mosaic law directed that in certain cases the Jews should wash their hands, to signify that they were guiltless of the blood of an unknown person found murdered (Deut. xxvi, 6). Pitale was probably aware of this custom, for, from Matt. xxvii, 24, we find, "When Pilate therefore washed his hands..."; but he will not prevail nothing of the business, on washing his hands, and washed his hands before the multitude, saying, I am innocent of the blood of this just person: see ye to it." He knew that this symbolic act was calculated to make an impression, and would be distinctly understood. To himself, also, the adoption of this ceremony was perfectly natural, as the rite was common among the Greeks and Romans as one of expiation for an act of unintentional or unwilling homicide. See the monographs on the subject cited by Volbeding, Index Properum, p. 55, 59, 121. See Yad Haraan.

II. Ritual washing of feet did not rise to the dignity of a ritual observance except in connection with the services of the sanctuary (Exod. xxx, 19, 21). It held a high place, however, among the rites of hospitality. Immediately after a guest presented himself at the tent-door, it was usual to offer the necessary materials for washing the feet (Gen. xviii, 4; xix, 2; xxiv, 22; xxxii, 14, 24; Judg. xix, 21; comp. Hom. Od. iv, 49). It was a yet more complimentary act, betokening entire equality and affection, if the host actually performed the office for his guest (Gen. xviii, 4; Luke vii, 44; Acts x, 45, 46; Rom. xvi, 25; 1 Tim., v, 10). Such a token of hospitality is still occasionally exhibited in the East, either by the host or by his deputy (Robinson, Res. ii, 229; Jowett, Res. p. 78, 79). The feet were again washed before retiring to bed (Cant. v, 8). A symbolic significance is attached in John xiii, 10, 11, to the feet as compared with bathing the whole body, the former being partial (πυγμαίω), the latter complete (Απωλεία). The former referred to the course of the day, the latter done once for all; whence they are adduced to illustrate the distinction between occasional sin and a general state of sinfulness. After being washed, the feet were on festive occasions anointed (Luke vii, 46; John xii, 5). The indignity attached to the act of washing another's feet appears to have been extended to the vessel used (Lsa. lx, 8). See Foot-washing.

Foot-washing (pedilium) became as might be expected, a part of the observances practiced in the early Christian Church. The real significance, however, was soon forgotten, or overloaded by superstitious feelings and mere outward practices. Traces of the practice abound in ecclesiastical history, and remnants of the abuse are still to be found, at least in the Roman Church. The present wishes to see these studied and these may consult Siegel, Handbuch der christl.-kirch. Alterthumer, ii, 156 sq.

kinson (Anc. Egypt. i, 77 sq.) remarks as follows: "To those who arrived from a journey, or who desired it, water was brought for their feet previous to entering the festive chamber. Joseph ordered his servants to fetch water for his brethren that they might wash their feet before they ate (Gen. xliii, 24), comp. also xviii, 4, the Egyptians did not receive guests without their being washed. It was always a custom of the East, as with the Greeks and Romans (comp. Luke vii, 44, 46). The Egyptians also washed their hands before dinner, the water being brought in the same manner as at the present day; and ewers, not unlike those used by the modern Egyptians, are represented, with the basins belonging to them, in the paintings of a Theban tomb. In the houses of the rich they were of gold or other costly materials. Herodotus mentions the golden foot-pan in which Amaias and his guests used to wash their feet. The Greeks had the same custom of bringing water to the guests, numerous instances of which we find in Homer—as when Telamachus and the son of Neoror was received at the house of Menelaus, and when Asphalon poured it upon the hands of his master and the same guests on another occasion. Virgil also describes the servants bringing water for this purpose when Eneas was entertained at Dido. Nor was the ceremony thought superfluous, or declined, even though they had previously bathed and been anointed with oil."

Wasuda (or Vasuda) is the earth in India, a sublime goddess whom they worship alike with the pre-server Vishnu. She also carries the surname Surebha—cow of plenty; which is not in the least an unbecoming comparison, as it might seem, because the cow in India is worshipped and held sacred to the gods. In poetry she receives still other surnames: the dark border of the sea-like Indra's chariot (ibid. xxv, 89; 1 Sam. xxv, 46). It was always a custom of the East, as with the Greeks and Romans (comp. Luke vii, 44, 46). The Egyptians also washed their hands before dinner, the water being brought in the same manner as at the present day; and ewers, not unlike those used by the modern Egyptians, are represented, with the basins belonging to them, in the paintings of a Theban tomb. In the houses of the rich they were of gold or other costly materials. Herodotus mentions the golden foot-pan in which Amaias and his guests used to wash their feet. The Greeks had the same custom of bringing water to the guests, numerous instances of which we find in Homer—as when Telamachus and the son of Neoror was received at the house of Menelaus, and when Asphalon poured it upon the hands of his master and the same guests on another occasion. Virgil also describes the servants bringing water for this purpose when Eneas was entertained at Dido. Nor was the ceremony thought superfluous, or declined, even though they had previously bathed and been anointed with oil."

WATCH, in Heb. פְּלִימָן, denoting "to cut into," thence "to impress on the mind," "to observe," "to watch," in the sense of keeping or guarding; or פְּלִימָן, the original meaning of which is "to look out," thence "to watch," as in English, "to keep a lookout," in the sense of spying or noticing. Watching must have been coerul with danger, and danger arose as soon as man became the enemy of man, or had to guard against the attacks of wild animals. Among a primitive and nomadic people this was particularly necessary. Accordingly we find traces of the practice of watching in early portions of the Hebrew annals. Watching must have been carried to some degree of completeness in Egypt, for we learn from Exod. xiv, 24 that the practice had, at the time of the Exode, caused the night to be divided into different watches or portions, mention being made of the "morning watch" (comp. 1 Sam. xi, 11). In the days of the Judges (vii, 19) we find "the middle watch" mentioned (see Luke xii, 38).

At a later period Israelites, by being entertained at the gates (2 Sam. xvi, 34 sq.), 2 Kings ix, 17 sq., Ps. cxvii, 1, cxx, 6; Prov. viii, 34), where they gave signals and information, either by their voice or with the aid of a trumpet (Jer. vi, 17; Ezek. xxxiii, 6). At night watchmen were accustomed to perambulate the city (2 Cor. iii, 5; v, 7). In the New Test. we find mention of the second, the third, and the fourth watch (Luke xii, 38; Matt. xiv, 25).—Kitto. On the watch at Christ's sepulchre (Matt. xxvii, 66), see the monographs cited by Volzeldig, Index Programmam, p. 67. See WATCHMAN.

WATCH OF THE NIGHT (יִשָּׁרְאֵל, יִשָּׁרְאֵל). The Jews, like the Greeks and Romans, divided the night into military watches instead of hours, each watch representing the period for which sentinels or pickets remained on duty. The proper Jewish reckoning recognised only three such watches. These would last respectively from sunset to 10 P.M.; from 10 P.M. to 2 A.M.; and from 2 A.M. to sunrise. It has been concluded by Lightfoot (Hor. Heb. in Matt. xiv, 25) that the Jews really reckoned four watches, three only of which were in the dead of the night, the fourth being in the morning. This, however, is rendered improbable by the use of the term "middle," and is opposed to the rabbinical authority (Mish. Erash. Berach. ii, 1; Kibon, On Psa. liii, 7; Rash., On Judg. vii, 19). We find, however, different opinions on this subject as early as the Talmud (Berach. iii, b, etc.). The Old Test. mentions expressly:

1. שָׁמַר שָׁמַר, head, first, of the watches (Lam. ii, 19).
2. שָׁמַר מָרָא, middle watch (Judg. vii, 19), which, according to those who affirm that there were always four, means the middle of those three watches which fell in the time of complete night.
3. שָׁמַר נָא, morning watch (Exod. xiv, 24; 1 Sam. xi, 11).
Subsequently to the establishment of the Roman supremacy, the number of watches (vigiliae) was increased to four, which were described either according to their numerical order, as in the case of the "fourth watch" (Matt. xix. 26, comp. Josephus, Ant. v. 6, 5), or by the terms "even, midnight, cock-crowing, and morning" (Mark xiii. 85). These terminated respectively at 9 P.M., midnight, 3 A.M., and 6 A.M. Conformably to this, the guard of soldiers was divided into four relays (Acts xii. 21, 22). The murder of Herod appears to have followed in Herod's army. (SeeVeget. De Re Milit. iii. 8, "in quattuor partibus ad clepsydrum sunt diversae vigiliae." ut non amplius quam tribus horis nocturnis, necesse est vigilarc. Censorin. De Die Natud. lxxxv. 4, 5, Coelum. S. Joannes. Aut. xxvii. 3, S. Joannes. Aut. xix. 40; Xenoph. Anab. iv. 1, 5; Buxtorf. Lex. Talmud. Fischerus. Procl. de Vitis Leg. N. Test.) Accordingly, in the New Test. four night-watches are mentioned (Mark xiii. 85):

1. Ox or Ox, the late watch, lasting from sunset to the third hour of the night, including the evening dawn: also called aon or aon (Mark xi. 11), or simply aon (John xix. 19).

2. Myia (or Myia), from the third hour to midnight.

3. Acalendaria or Acalendaria, from midnight to the third hour after midnight. This ended with the second cock-crowing.

4. Ox, early, from the ninth hour of the night to the twelfth the morning dawn or twilight. It also called aon or aon morning-tide or moru (Mark xviii. 29).

See Night-watch; Viol.

Watches ("W", walking), a class of angelic beings mentioned in the description of Nebuchadnezzar's dream (Dan. iv. 10). It is said to have believed that God had delegated the moral government of the earth to celestial spirits, who had the charge of making inquisition into human actions, and punishing the guilty. See Angel.

Watchers, a class of monks who are said to have performed divine service without intermission, by dividing themselves into three classes, and taking their turns at the service at stated hours. (See Acres.) The term is applied to the keepers of the Easter sepulchre. Usually there were two or three who sang psalms and maintained the watch. The term is also used to designate the keepers of the Church who went the rounds at night.

Watching with the Dead. See Wake.

Watching Loft is an apartment over the side, sacristy, or porch of a Church or cathedral, from which the great shrines were observed by the watchers of the Church. Such seats remain at Nuremberg, Germany; and at Oxford, Lichfield, St. Albans, Westminster, Exeter, Hereford, and other ancient English dioceses.

Watchman ("W", 2 Kings xvii. 9; xviii. 8; Jer. xxxi. 16, "watcher," Jer. iv. 16; elsewhere "keeper," "preserver," etc.; but usually in Les or "W"). Even strong walls and double gates would not of themselves secure a city from the enemy. Men were therefore employed to watch day and night on the top of the walls, and especially by the gates. It was thus that the messengers from the army were seen long before they reached the place where David anxiously sat (2 Sam. xxi. 24-27). In like manner the watchman of Jeruzalem saw in the distance the company of Jehu driving furiously (2 Kings ix. 17-20). So Isaiah, in one of his sublime visions, saw a watchman standing by his tower day and night (Isa. xxxi. 5-12). A figurative use of the word watchman is beautifully seen in Isa. lxii. 6; Ezek. xxxiii. 2, 6, 7; Hab. ii. 1. There were others whose duty it was to patrol the streets of the city and preserve order (see Psa. cxxxvii. 1; Song of Solomon iii, 3). There are such in Oriental cities to-day, and they challenge all persons found abroad after certain hours of the day and night. They are not able to give a good account of themselves, and sometimes subjecting them to rough treatment. In Persia the watchmen were obliged to indifferent those who were robbed in the streets, and make satisfaction with their own blood for those who were murdered, which accounts for the vigilance with which they discharged the charge of their office, and illustrates the character of watchman given to Ezekiel, who lived in that country, and the duties he was required to perform. If the wicked perished in his iniquities without warning, the prophet was to be accountable for his blood; but if he duly pointed out his danger, he delivered his own soul (Ezek. xxxiii. 5). These terms, therefore, were neither harsh nor severe; they were the common appointments of watchmen in Persia. They were also charged to announce the progress of the night to the slumbering city: "The burden of Dammah: he calls to me out of Seir, Watchman, what of the night? watchman, what of the night?" The watchman said, The morning cometh, and also the night." (Isa. xxii. 11). This is confirmed by an observation of Chardin, that, as the people of the East have no clocks, the seven watches of the day and of the night, which are eight in all, are announced. In the Indies, the parts of the night are made known, as well by instruments of music, in great cities, as by the rounds of the watchmen, who, with cries and small drums, give information that a fourth part of the night has passed. No one, as these cries are not more frequent than one in an hour, or at two hours after night, or at any quarter of the part of the night, it appeared to them but as a moment. There are sixty of these in the Indies by day, and as many by night; that is, fifteen for each division. They are required not only at each watch of the night, but at frequent intervals in the progress of it, to cry aloud, in order to give the people, who depend upon them for the protection of their lives and property, assurance that they are not sleeping at their posts or negligent of their charge. In these latter occasions, their exclamations are made in a form calculated to enliven the tedium of their duties, as, "God be merciful to you!" while the other responds, "Blessings be on you likewise." This practice of salutation, when they meet, in the form of a set dialogue, was observed also by the ancient officers of this description among the Jews, the watch word being then, as we have seen it is still among the watchmen of the caravans, some pious sentiment, in which the name of Jehovah was specially expressed. Two remarkable instances of this occur in Scripture. The only instance of the watchmen of Jerusalem, who were always Levites, and among whom the same regulations subsisted as among other watchmen, he addresses them under the poetical description of "Ye that make mention of the Lord," i.e. Ye whose watchword is the name of Jehovah (Isa. xxvi. 7). The other instance is in Eze., the whole of which, as is justly observed by Bishop Lowth, is nothing more than the alternate cry of two different divisions of the watch. The first watch addresses the second, reminding them of their duty; the second answers by a solemn blessing. This is the form, and the answer seem both to be a set form, which each proclaimed aloud at stated intervals to notify the time of night.

First band of watchmen"—"Bless ye the Lord, all ye servants of the Lord, who by night stand in the house of the Lord. Lift up your hands in the sanctuary, and bless the Lord."Second band of watchmen answer—"The Lord bless thee out of Zion, the Lord that made heaven and earth."

Watch-night is a Wesleyan custom. Near the beginning of watch-night the members of that body in Bristol began to meet at night, that they might worship without interruption. Mr. Wesley, knowing that such meetings would soon be misinterpreted, made them public, and for a time held them once a month. Afterwards, however, they were observed only on the eve of the new year. This custom prevails to a certain extent to the present time.
Watch-tower (יוֹדִּקָה, Isa. xxi, 5; יְשָׁרָה, 2 Chron. xx, 24; Isa. xxi, 8), a structure over or by the side of city gates in the East, in which a watchman was stationed to observe what was going on at a distance, especially in times of danger (2 Sam. xviii, 25). We find that he went up by a staircase from the passage, which, like the roof of the dwelling-houses, was flat, for the purpose of desecrating at a distance those that were approaching the place, or repelling the attacks of an enemy. The observations made by the watchman were communicated by him immediately to the king, but by the intervention of a warden at the outer gate of the tower; and it appears that a private staircase led from the lower room, in which David (in the above passage) was sitting, to the upper room over the gateway; for by that communication he retired to give full vent to his sorrow (see Thompson, Land and Book, ii, 411). See City; Gate; Tower.

Waterford, Council of (Synodus Guaterfordicus). Waterford is a city of Ireland, capital of the county of the same name, situated near the southern coast, on the right bank of the Suir, nine miles from the sea. An ecclesiastical council is said to have been held there about 1148, but it is ordered that all English slaves throughout Ireland should be liberated to aver the divine wrath. It seems that many of the English had been in the habit of selling their own children to the Irish for slaves, and that not under the pressure of circumstances. See Mansi, Concil. Councils, i. 397. Both the date and place of this council are probably incorrect, as the account of it in Labbe exactly coincides with that of the Council of Armagh in 1171 (q.v.), and in both the council is said to have been convoked "ad Ardamunichum."—Landon, Manual of Concils, i. 259.

Waterhouse, Edward, an English author who became a clergyman, was born in 1619. He received a learned education, became a member of the Royal Society in 1668, and took holy orders the same year. He died May 30, 1670. He was the author of Humble Apology for Learning and Learned Men (1653);—Two Contemplations (ed.);—Discourse of the Piety, Policy and Charity of Elder Times and Christians (1655);—Gentleman’s Monitor (ed.);—Short Narrative of the Late Dreadful Fire of London (1667);— and other works. Waterlanders (or Waterlandians), a sect of Anabaptists (q.v.) in Holland, so called to distinguish them from the Flemishers, or Flemish Anabaptists, also because they consisted, at first, of the inhabitants of a district in the north of Holland called Waterland. The Flemishers were more rigid in their views and practice than the Waterlanders. Both are governed by presbyters and deacons, and each congregation is independent of all foreign jurisdiction. The Waterlanders are also called Johannites, from John de Ries, who was of great service to them in many respects, and who was one of the composers of their Confession of Faith in 1580. The Waterlanders of Amsterdam afterwards joined with the Galenists (q.v.). See Moversius.

Waterman, Henry, D.D., an Episcopal clergyman, was born at Centerville, Warwick, R.I., Aug. 17, 1818, and was a graduate of Brown University in the class of 1831. He pursued his theological studies, in part, at Cambridge, at a school taught by Rev. John Henry Hopkins and Rev. George Washington Doane, which, on their appointment as bishops—the one of the diocese of Vermont, and the other of the diocese of New Jersey—was given up. Mr. Waterman completed his course of study at the Episcopal Seminary in New York, and was ordained deacon by bishop Griswold, at Providence, in June, 1835, and presbyter by the same, at Boston, in 1837. He commenced the active duties of the ministry at Woonsocket, R.I., as rector of St. James's Church, where he remained six years (1835-41), and then took charge of the parish of St. Stephen's in Providence, commencing his ministry in November, 1841. Here he continued for four years (1841-45), and then went to Andover, Mass., where he was rector of Christ Church until June, 1849. He spent nearly a year in foreign travel for his health, and, on his return, in the summer of 1850, he again became rector of St. Stephen's Church, occupying that position until October, 1874, a period of twenty-five years, during which time the vigorous and vigorous parish grew up under his administration. Resigning his parish, he continued to reside in Providence, preaching in different parishes of Rhode Island and other places as his health allowed him. His death occurred in Providence, Oct. 18, 1876. "Dr. Waterman," says Prof. Gammage, "was an instructive and effective preacher, and a careful student of the works of the old English divines, and was thoroughly Anglican in all his ecclesiastical views. Beyond his immediate sphere as a clergyman, he seldom cared to appear in public. In that sphere, however, he exerted a very important influence, and was greatly respected by his brethren." (J. C. S.)

Waters, Francis, D.D., a local deacon and elder, and a noted educator in the Methodist Protestant Church, was born Jan. 16, 1792, in Maryland. He graduated in Pennsylvania University, in 1810, and took charge of a congregation, in Society Hill, Philadelphia, Pa., in 1814. In 1818 he was elected president of Washington College, in Chestertown, Kent Co., and resigned this position in 1823. From this date until 1828 he resided in Somerset County; from 1828 to 1833 he taught private school in Baltimore. In 1840 he became president of the Theological and Literary School for the education of young men for the itinerant ministry of the Methodist Protestant Church; in 1846 he went to reside in Baltimore, and filled several important positions of an educational character until Jan. 30, 1860, when, on account of failing health, he was obliged to resign. He was president of the General Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church in 1846 and 1862. He died April 25, 1868. See Cuthbert, Founders of the M. P. Church, p. 182.

Water-spout is the rendering in the A. V. at Ps. xlii, 7, of מָשַׁלַע, "marshaller" (from מָשָׁל, a root of doubtful import), which Gesenius thinks a cataract or water-course ("mitter," 2 Sam. v, 6), and Thurna a pipe or orifice. Water-spouts are actually seen on the Mediterranean (see Thompson, Land and Book, ii, 256). See Guttus.

Watson, George, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was rector in Norwalk, O., in 1854, and from that time until 1865 served the parish of St. Paul, in that city. He died Nov. 15, 1870, aged sixty-eight years. See Prof.eyer, Almanac, 1871, p. 118.

Watson, James Clemson, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Donegal township, Lancaster Co., Pa., Jan. 27, 1805. He graduated from the College of New Jersey in 1827; studied at Princeton Theological Seminary between two and three years; was licensed in 1830, and ordained, in 1832, in a united church of the united churches of Gettysburg and Great Conewago, Pa., where he labored until 1849; then became pastor at Clinton, N., J.; next at Kingston in 1851, and finally in 1854 at Milton, Pa., where he died, Aug. 8, 1866. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 81.

Watson, Robert, LL.D., a minister of the Church of Scotland, professor and author, was born at St. Andrew's about 1720, was educated at the universities of St. Andrews', Glasgow, and Edinburgh. In 1751 he began to deliver in Edinburgh a course of lectures on rhetoric and belles-lettres, which he repeated for several successive winters. He became a minister of the Church of Scotland in 1768; professor of logic, rhetoric, and belles-lettres in the College of St. Salvator, in St.
Andrew's, soon after; and principal of the United College of St. Leonard and St. Salvador, and minister of the Church and parish of St. Leonard, in 1777. He died in 1781. He was the author of a History of the Reign of Philip II, King of Spain (London, 1777, 2 vol.); and a History of the Reign of Philip III (1785). The latter work was left unfinished at the author's death, and was completed for the benefit of his family by William Thomson, LL.D. The former was translated into French, Dutch, and German.
Both works have been republished in the United States
(N. Y. 1818), but are of little value, being heavy and incoherent in style, and yielding inevitably to the more philosophical and elegant works of Frencott.

WATSON, Thomas (1), D.D., an eminent English prelate, was born about 1520. He was educated at St.
John's College, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow and master in 1553. He took orders in the Church of England; was appointed dean of Durham in 1558; bishop of Lincoln in 1558; and was preceptor to queen Mary.
On the accession of queen Elizabeth, he refused to take the oath of supremacy; was deprived of his bishopric, and from that time until his death adhered firmly to the Roman Church. He was imprisoned near London until 1588, when he was removed to Wisbech Castle, where he died, Sept. 25, 1592. His published works are The Necessity of Submitting to the Present and the Safeguard of the Church's Doctrines concerning the Real Presence (1554); and Hominum and Catholicke Doctrine concerning the Seven Sacraments (1558). He was also the author of a Latin tragedy, which was greatly admired, but never published.

WATSON, Thomas (2), an eminent Nonconformist
divine, was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, and was pastor of St. Stephen's, Wallbrook, London, in 1649. Ejected for nonconformity in 1662, he preached in Croody Hall in 1672, and died in Essex about 1699.
Watson was an eminent preacher, and one of his sermons, entitled Heaven taken by Storm, was often reprinted. Besides A Body of Practical Divinity, consisting of one hundred and seventy-six sermons on the Assembly's Catechism (1629; last ed. N. Y. 1871), he published
The Christian Charter:—The Art of Divine Contentement:—A Discourse of Meditation (6th ed. Lond. 1650).
His Select Works were published in London in 1821, and reissued in 1833. See Plot-Herzog, Real-Encyklop. n. v. (B. P.)

Watt (also Vadianus), Joachim von, the Reformer of St. Gall, was born Dec. 30, 1494, of ancient family in that city. His father was a merchant, his mother a judicious and pious woman. His early education was conducted by his mother and pedagogues of his native town, but he soon went to Vienna in order to avail himself of the superior privileges there afforded.
He there became acquainted with Ulric Zwingli and Heinrich Lorti (Glarenus). A period of dissolute behavior ensued in his life, but it was speedily followed by a continuous season of earnest classical study. A Virgil which he was wont to use as a pillow in those days is still preserved in the town library of St. Gall. He also tried his powers in Latin verse, and, in obedience to the customs of his day, changed his name into the Latin Vadianus, afterwards Vadiana. After a tour through Poland, Hungary, and Carinthia, and an essay at teaching in Villach, he returned, by way of Venice, to Vienna, and resumed his studies. He joined the learned society known as the Danube Association, and included jurisprudence, theology, and medicine in his course, obtaining the doctorate in the last-named department. After three years, he returned home and began his literary labors. He entered in Alexandria, D. C., in 1801, Georgetown in 1808, Alexander City in 1864, and in 1865 was appointed to Washington city. The remainder of his life was spent on his farm in retirement.
He died March 29, 1827. Mr. Watters accomplished
a great amount of good under very adverse circumstances, and his un Marietta Green.

The Church of St. Gall was wholly controlled by the spirit of Middle-Age Catholicism; but Watt, who had become acquainted with the writings of Luther and the ideas of the Reformation while at Vienna, gave himself fully to the whole reformation condition. He was assisted in his endeavors by the newly installed minister of St. Laurent, Benedict Burgauer, and his helper, Wolfgang Wetter. He maintained an active correspondence with Zwingli. He resigned in the Colloquy of Zurich in 1529, and of Berne in 1526. He became the chief promoter of the Reformations initiated in St. Gall, after the Zurich Colloquy, and incurred much hatred in consequence. The Anabaptist movement in St. Gall and Appenzell also gave him trouble; but the continued support accorded him by his fellow citizens sustained him. He had a brother-in-law, the famous Reformer Bel, of Zurich, who was drowned in punishment of his heresies. He was chosen burgomaster of St. Gall repeatedly, and in that capacity gave himself to the work of instructing the populace and increasing their comforts.
He also participated in the theological controversies of his time, particularly the sacramental controversy and Schwenk-feldian disputes, and in connection with them wrote several books. He died April 6, 1551, and was mourned by Calvin and others as being lost to the great work of the Reformation in whose promotion he took so influential a part.

The life of Watt was first described by Kessler, the friend whom he had brought under the influence of Luther and Melanchthon, and thereby gained for the Reformation. Kessler's MS. is preserved in the Library of St.
Gall. Of his biographers are Huber, Historiae Helveticaden des . . . Joachim v. Watt (St. Gall, 1698); Froesel, Joachim Vadianum, etc. (Kilberfeld, 1861), pt. ix.—Herzog, Real-Encyklop. n. v.

Watters, Nicholas, a Methodist Episcopal minister, and brother of William Watters, was born in Anne Arundel County, Md., Nov. 20, 1739. He entered the travelling connection about the year 1773, and was appointed as follows: Kent, Md., 1776; Hanover, 1777-78;
Union, S. C., 1794; Selden, 1798; Harford, Md., 1800; Winchester, Va., 1801; Lancaster, 1802; Broad River, Ga., 1803; Charleston, S. C., 1804, where he died in peace and triumph Aug. 10, 1840. Beuinet Kendrick, his colleague in the ministry, reported to the South Carolina Conference that Nicholas Watters was peculiarily attentive in visiting the sick, and would not let a favorable opportunity slip. He exercised a great degree of humanity in his Christian and ministerial duties.
His last words were, "I am not afraid to die, thanks be to God!" See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1915,
p. 126; Bangs, Hist. of the M. E. Church, ii, 174; Stevens, Hist. of the M. E. Church, ii, 21; iii, 398; iv, 240; 241.

Watters, William, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Baltimore County, Md., Oct. 16, 1751, of Church of England parentage. He was naturally vain, self-willed, and passionate, but his decision to his owed mother led him to seek religion early in life.
He acquired a good education; joined the Methodists at the age of twenty; soon began earnest Christian work by prayer and exhortation; and in 1773 entered the Phi-adelphia Conference. In 1776 he was appointed to Fred-errick, in 1778 to Fairfax, in 1772 to Brunswick, and in 1779 to Baltimore Circuit. In 1792 he retired from the regular work to his little farm in Fairfax County.
In 1796 he re-entered the active ranks, and was appointed to Berkeley Circuit, Va., but was soon obliged to return to Virginia, the home of his forefathers. He entered in Alexandria, D. C., in 1801, Georgetown in 1808, Alexandria city in 1864, and in 1865 was appointed to Washington city. The remainder of his life was spent on his farm in retirement.
He died March 29, 1827. Mr. Watters accomplished

WAVE-BREAD (יוֹסֵפָה יִשְׂפָּה) is a ceremonial bread presented in connection with the wave-offerings on the Day of the波悉 (תּוֹם נְבָאָה). In the context of the biblical offerings, the wave-breath is connected specifically to the presentation of the wave-breath, as a special kind of offering brought to the sanctuary by the priests. This type of offering is associated with the sanctuary and its sacrifices, indicating a significant role in the religious and ceremonial life of the Israelites. Further details and context regarding the wave-breath and its significance can be found in the relevant biblical passages and commentaries. The wave-breath is associated with the wave-breath of the Passover, which is an important event in Jewish history, commemorating the deliverance from slavery and the liberation of the Israelites from Egyptian bondage. The wave-breath, as a part of the Passover ceremony, is a symbolic act that celebrates the beginning of the harvest season and the renewal of life. The wave-breath is presented with a blessing, indicating its importance in the religious and cultural practices of the Israelites. The wave-breath and its associated rituals serve as a reminder of the Israelites' history and the ongoing connection to their spiritual traditions and practices. Further details and context regarding the wave-breath and its significance can be found in the relevant biblical passages and commentaries.

WAYSIDE CROSS

xxix, 27; Lev. vii, 30, 32, 34), and what is called (Exod. xxxviii, 24) wave-gold is also called sheave-gold (Numb. xxxi, 52). Indeed, the Jews scarcely distinguish between the two (הראב and נירוב) as ritualistic acts, but explain each as an upward and downward motion (Mishna, Menach. v, 6), a sort of elevatio. Both would therefore have been generally expressive of some consecration to God as the universal Owner and Giver (see Gesenius, Theaur. p. 866; Bähr, Symboλικ, ii, 355 sq., 377). Some moderns incorrectly regard the two acts as identical (Jahn, Archäol. iii, 58), or take "heaving" (הראב) in the vague sense of "offer" or "offere" (like Gesenius, Theaur. p. 1277), and connect דָּשָא, Exod. xxxii, 27, with דָּשָא הָאשת, contrary to the accents and the parallelism; but see Kurlt, ב. יז하며, p. 140 sq. See LEAV-OF-FERING.

Wax (בֲּדָשָא or דָּשָא, dendra, supposed to come from a root דז, significant of melting or yielding), the soft sticky substance of which bees form their cells, and which is readily separated from the honey by melting in warm water (Iam. xxii, 14; Ivvi. ii, 25; ivvi. 5; Mic, i, 4). This is properly called beewax, and is of vegetable origin, although manufactured by the bees from the pollen of various kinds of flowers. But there is a species of wax, made from resin, either vegetable or mineral (the latter originally vegetable likewise), by the addition of proportions of greases, such as shoemaker's wax, grafting-wax, etc. It is doubtful whether the Hebrews were acquainted with any of these artificial sorts.

Waxen Figures. A well-known custom of curing an enemy in the Middle Ages was that of making a waxen figure, and, as it melted before the fire, the person represented by it was supposed similarly to waste away. This practice is referred to in Horace (Satires, i, 6, 30 sq.), and it is worthy of remark that the same custom is described in the incantations of the ancient Egyptian sorcerers. See Lenormant, Chaldæan Magic, p. 5.

Way. This word has now in ordinary parlance so entirely forsaken its original sense (except in combination, as in "highway," "causeway"), and is so uniformly employed in the secondary or metaphorical sense of a "custom" or "maner," that it is difficult to remember that in the Bible it most frequently signifies an actual road or track. Our translators have employed it as the equivalent of no less than eighteen distinct Hebrew terms. Of these several had the same secondary word "way" in combination with us. Two others (ॠִּּּ and דֵּדֵּּ) are employed only by the poets, and are commonly rendered "path" in the A. V. But the term which most frequently occurs, and in the majority of cases signifies (though it also is now and then used metaphorically) an actual road, is דַּשָּא, דַּשָּא, connected with the German treiben, and the English "tread." It may be truly said that there is hardly a single passage in which this word occurs which would not be more clear and more real if "road" were substituted for "way of." Thus Gen. xvi, 7, "the spring of the road to Shur;" Num. xiv, 24, "the road to the Red Sea;" 1 Sam. vi, 12, "the road to Bethhemesh;" Judg. ix, 37, "the road to the oak of Morecum;" 2 Kings xi, 10, "the road to the gate." It turns that which is a mere general expression into a substantial reality. In like manner the word דַּשָּא in the New Test. is also involuntarily translated "way." Mark x, 32, "They were on the road going up to Jerusalem;" Matt. xx, 17, "and Jesus took the twelve disciples apart in the road." One of the roads of pilgrims who, like themselves, were bound for the Passover.

There is one use of both דַּשָּא and דַּשָּא which must not be passed over, viz. in the sense of a religious office. In the Old Test. this occurs but rarely, perhaps twice; namely in Amos viii, 14, "the manner of Hebron;" where the prophet is probably alluding to some idolarous rites then practiced there; and again in Ps. cxix, 24, "look if there be any evil way," any idolatrous practices, "in me, and lead me in the everlasting way." But in the Acts of the Apostles δεευ, the way," the road Is the road is also mentioned, almost repeatedly, for the new religion which Paul first resisted and afterwards supported. See Acts ix, 2; xix, 9, 23; xxxii, 4; xiv, 11, 22. In each of these the word "that" is an interpolation of our translators, and should have been put into itacles, as it is in xiv, 22.

The word דַּשָּא is spoken in the Koran as "the path" (et-tarīk, iv, 66), and "the right path" (i, 5, iv, 174). Gesenius (Thesaur. p. 335) has collected examples of the same expression in other languages and religions. See Road.

Waynflete, William of, an eminent English prelate of the 13th century, founder of Magdalen College, Oxford, was born of a noble family in Waynflete, Lincolnshire. He was educated at Winchester School and one of the colleges at Oxford. He was ordained deacon in 1420, and presbyter in 1426; became head-master of Winchester School in 1429; rector of Wrasall in 1433, master of St. John's College, Oxford, in 1441, and was connected to Eton with a part of his school in 1440, by the advice of Henry VI; became bishop of Winchester in 1447, in which position he continued for thirty-nine years. In 1450 he was called upon by king Henry for advice in the matter of the rebellion of Jack Cade, which he tendered at the prince's residence; and soon afterwards rendered a like service, when Richard, duke of York, took upon arms against his majesty. In 1453 he baptized the prince of Wales, afterwards Edward IV. In 1456 he was appointed lord high chancellor, and resigned the office in 1460. He died Aug. 11, 1461, and was buried in the church of Winchester Cathedral, in a magnificent sepulchral chapel, which is kept in the finest preservation by the Society of Magdalen College. He founded Magdalen College, established a free school in his native town, and was a benefactor to Eton College and Winchester Cathedral. He possessed considerable ability as an architect, which he employed in connection with his benefactions.

Waylsde Chapel is a small house of worship at some frequented place on a public highway, formerly resorted to on pilgrimage, or as a place of safety by pilgrims. These buildings were commonly attached to bridges at the entrance of towns— as at Rochester, Stamford, Elvet, Durham, Exeter, Newcastle, and London. Two still exist at Castle Barnard and Wakefield, the latter being of the 14th century. It has a remarkable carving of the Resurrection. In France, Germany, and Italy, it is common; there is a good example at Pisa, about 1360. They were frequented sometimes as objects of pilgrimages, but more commonly by pilgrims going and returning from a shrine, and by ordinary travellers when the dangers of the highway and bypaths were considerable. Until recent times the bishop of Chichester was met at St. Roche's Hill by the civic authorities, on his return from parliament, to congratulate him upon his safe arrival home.

Waylsde Cross is a cross set up on the public highway, either to commemorate some remarkable event, to indicate the boundary of an estate, to designate a customary station for a public service, or the temporary resting-place of the corpse on a royal or noble funeral; or to mark the confines of a diocese, monastic, or parochial boundary. Anciently, in England, wayside crosses were sometimes abundant, and reminded the faithful of the duty of prayer. They were often of stone, standing on the steps; though, no doubt, wooden wayside crosses were frequently set up. Stone crosses appeared to the distinct architectural features of the age and time in which they were erected. One preserved from the site of the abbey is preserved in Langley Park, Northumberland. The Weeping Cross at Shrewsbury was a station on Corpus Christi Day, when the various guilds, religious and corporate bodies visited it; and there offered prayers for an abundant harvest, returning to hear mass in St. Chad's. There was a weeping cross at Caer, erected by Queen Matilda in memory of her sorrow at the cruel treatment of her husband, William of Normandy. Sometimes it commemorated a battle, as the Neville's Cross, near Durham, erected in 1464; or a death, like the memorial of Sir Ralph Percy, who was killed on Hedgeley Moor in 1464. There are remains of wayside crosses near Doncaster and Bath, with inscriptions, inviting the prayers of the passing traveller. In Devonshire alone there are one hundred and thirty-five places called by the name of the cross. At Pencran and St. Herbit, Brittany, there are superb specimens; and others, richly carved, at Nevers, Carew, and Nante, among others. A massive cross from Elsing's sepulchral cross of the 7th century. In Spain, Italy, Lubbeck (near Lounain), Willesbrock, and on Bonhill, Berwickshire, there are memorials of a violent death. In the life of St. Willehad the English labourers are said to have gathered round a cross in the middle of a field for daily prayer as an ordinary custom.

Webbe, Geo, D.D., an English prelate, was born at Bromham, Wiltshire, in 1851. He was educated at Oxford University, took holy orders, and became minister of Steeple Aston, Wilts, where he also kept a grocery shop, as he afterwards did at Bath. In 1861 he became rector of St. Peter and St. Paul's in Bath; was made chaplain to Charles I, on his accession to the throne; and was consecrated bishop of Limerick, Ireland, in December, 1834. Some time before his death he was confined in Limerick Castle by the rebels, and died there near the close of 1641. He was the author of Practice of Quietness (1st ed. 1681) — A Brief Exposition of the Principles of the Christian Religion (1612) — Arrangement of an Unruly Tongue (1619) — A proper Prayer; or, The Christian's Choice (1624) — Lessons and Exercises out of Cicero ad Atticum; — some other text-books for schools, and several Sermons, which appeared from 1609 to 1619. He was accounted the best preacher in his time in the royal court, and the smoothest writer of sermons that were then published.

Webber, Francis, D.D., an English clergyman, of the 18th century, was rector of Exeter College, Oxford; and in 1756 became dean of Hereford. He published five single Sermons (1738-50). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Webber, George, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Shapleigh, Me., March 18, 1801. He embraced religion in early life, and, after spending some time as a student in Maine Wesleyan Seminary, joined the Maine Conference in 1828, and was appointed as junior preacher on Strong Circuit, which embraced nearly the whole valley of Sandy River. His reputation as an able preacher soon spread, and he was sought by all the important charges in the Conference. No preacher in the Maine Conference had ever been so highly honored by his brethren. Sixteen years he served as presiding elder; five times was a delegate to the General Conference; once to the Evangelical Alliance in London; and once to the Methodist Episcopal Church of Canada. At the General Conference of 1852 he was a prominent candidate for the office of bishop. For many years he was a trustee of Maine Wesleyan Seminary, and was prominently connected with all the great interests of the Conference for nearly half a century. As a preacher, Mr. Webber was sold rather than brilliant, profoundly impressive, evincing thorough mastery of his subject, deliberate and ex- haustive, and purely extemporaneous. His forty-seven years of ministerial record stand without a blemish. In 1874 he superannuated, and retired to his home at Kent's Hill, and died May 11, 1875. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1876, p. 96.

Webber, Anania, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Lünehausen, in Saxony, Aug. 14, 1596. He studied at Leipzig, where he also took the different theological degrees. In 1627 he was appointed to the pastorate at Morschen, in 1634 to the superintendency at Leisnig, having in the same year received the degree of licentiate of theology. In 1638 he went to Leipzig as archdeacon of St. Thomas's, was appointed in 1639 professor of theology, and in 1640 received the doctorate of divinity. In 1643 he was called to Breslau, in Silesia, where he occupied the highest philosophical positions. He died Jan. 26, 1665. He wrote, Adversus Marciannum D daemoni Factum et in Aene Mundum Daemones, etc.:—Problema Theologico de Authoritate Divina et Incorrigibili Verbi Dei Scriptae, etc.—Synopsis Doctrinae Orthodoxae de Conscientia Humanis Irrerendi contra Guadino Policingentorium, etc., Auerer; Punicus anti- Cuniculum, etc. See Kemp, Memoria Ananiae Weberti (Lips. 1739); Freher, Theatron Eruditorum; Orationes in Honorem Scriptorum Hidelbr.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten—Lexikon, s. v.; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. iii. 496. (B. P.)

Webber, Andreas, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born March 27, 1718, at Eisleben. From 1738 to 1742 he studied at Jena and Leipzig. In the latter place he publicly spoke on De Cognitione Spiritus Finiti circa Mystera (1742). In 1749 he was called as professor of philosophy to Halle, and in 1750 to Göt- tingen, where he remained until 1770, when he accepted a call to Kiel as professor of philosophy and theology. He died May 26, 1781. He wrote, Die Ubersichtung der Natur und Gnade, etc. (Leips. 1748-50, 5vols.):—Commentatorio de Prima Melanchthonis Locorum Comnis Editiones (Kiloni, 1771); — Progr. ururum Jaderns Mosai at Leipzig, 1752; — Nova de Mirabi et quibusdam Com- puneis erat, Religionem Obsequiim Debeatm, etc. (ibid. 1771). See Düring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutsch- lands, iv. 659 sq. (B. P.)

Webber, Beda, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born Oct. 26, 1730, at Lienz, in the Tyrol. In 1814 he received holy orders, and in 1825 was called as professor to Meran. In 1849 he accepted a call to the pastorate in Frankfort, where he died, Feb. 28, 1858. He wrote, Tirol und die Reformation (Innsbruck, 1841):—Goramma Maria della Croce e ihre Zeit (Hatis- bos, 1840):—Predigten an das Tiroler Volk (Frankfort, 1861); —also translated six books of Christian on the priests in Sweden, (1833). See Theologen- Lexikon, s. v.; Brithl, Geschichte der kathol. Lit. Deutsch- lands (Vienna, 1861), p. 411 sq. (B. P.)

Webber, Christian Friedrich, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born March 4, 1741, at Cannstadt, and died as dean at Nuttingen, in Württemberg, in the year 1822. He wrote, Briefe zur Geschichte des neuesten Kains (Tübingen, 1791):—Neue Untersuchungen über das Alter und Aussehen der Erzgebirge der Hebräer (ibid. 1806): — Doctrina Eri Primi ac Priscipr prapoci Mosaicus de Eute Summo (Stuttgart, 1829): — Schmärrers Leben, Charakter u. Webber, Ferdinand Wilhelm, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Oct. 22, 1836, at Schwab- bach. His preparatory education he received at the gymnasium in Nuremberg, which he entered in 1847 for the University of Erlangen. Here he attended the lectures of Hofmann, Delitzsch, Thomasius, Heyder, and Harnack; and, besides theology, he also studied history and Hellenic literature. After the completion of his academic curriculum, he became vicar of the well-known Luise, and second teacher at the mission school.
in Neuenestettelsau. On account of a dissertation Uber den Begriff des Schönen und Erhabenen bei Kant, he received the degree of doctor of philosophy. At Neuenestettelsau his great talents found a wide scope for usefulness. Here he published his well-known work, Von Zeitnarrow (with the introduction by Delitzsch) in 1862, and his Introduction to the Writings of the Old and New Testaments (ed.; 5th ed. 1878). In 1864 he went to Diezach, where he labored until 1872, when he was appointed Lohe's successor. Bodily infirmities, however, soon obliged him to retire to Pfolingen, where he died, July 10, 1872. Besides the works already mentioned, he published, Herzog Mohamed Brundotreslen, oder die Juden und die Kirche des Mittelalters (Nördlingen, 1861), with a preface by Lohe: — Kurze Betrachtungen über die Deutung und Erklärung der Propheten- und Festtags des Kirchenjahres: — Der Prophet Jesaja in Bibelstudien ausgelegt (2 pts, 1875, 1876). He left in manuscript Grundzüge der philosophisch-jüdischen Theologie aus Targum, Midrash und Talmud dargestellt, which will soon be published. See Delitzsch, Sitzau auf Hejz- namo (Erlangen, 1875), p. 259 sq.

Weber, Georg Gottlieb, a Protestant theologian of Germany, who was born in 1744, and died Feb. 18, 1801, as court deacon and member of consistory at Weimar, is the author of, Die Augsburgische Confession nach der Uebersicht im Reichsarchiv (Weimar, 1781): — Kirchenrechts-Buch der Augsburgischen Confession, aus architektonischen Nachrichten (Frankfurt, 1783). See Winer, Handb. der theol. Lit. I, 326, 328. (B. P.)

Weber, Johann Georg, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Herwigsdorf, near Zittau, July 10, 1807. He studied at Leipzig, and was appointed there in 1781 preacher in the university church. In 1791 he was called to Weimar, where he was made chief court preacher in 1720. In 1729 he made general superintendent and chief preacher of St. Paul and St. Peter's, at the same time having the superintendency of the gymnasium there. He died Nov. 24, 1738. Besides the number of ascetical works, he published, Dissertatio de Sacer. Nocturna (Lipsa, 1718): —Ordo Evangelisticus in Augustiniana Confessione Triumphans (Vimaria, 1730): — Doctrina Tutor de Decencu Christi in Inferno, etc. (ibid. 1731): — O 'AMHN ent ro 'AMHN, hoc est, Commentarius Evangelistico in Aman Evangelico, und im ersten Buche Evangelico, Exor. mirando Christi Confirmatum, etc. (Jena, 1734). See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, iv, 622. (B. P.)

Weber, Joseph, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born Sept. 23, 1733, at Ravinn, in Bavaria. In 1776 he received holy orders; in 1779 he was appointed lecturer on canon law and catechetics at the seminary of Hofenthal; in 1781 he was made professor of philosophical sciences at Dillingen; and in 1800 he was made doctor of divinity. In 1826 he was appointed cathedral dean and general vicar at Augsburg, where he died, Feb. 14, 1831. He wrote, Leitfaden zu Vorlesungen über die Verhältnisse (Dillingen, 1788): — Institutiones Legum (ibid, 1792): —Logica in Lumen eorum qui studiun (Landshut, 1793): — Metaphysica in Usuan eorum, etc. (ibid. 1795): — Charakter des Philosophen und Nichthollosophen (Augsburg, 1873): — Philologus, Religion und Christenthum im Bunde zur Veredlung und Belebung des Menschen (Munich, 1803—11): — Lichter für Erbauung suchende Christen (ibid, 1816—20, 3 vols, etc. See Keller, Gerehten-Lexikon, ii, 482 sq.; Schmid, Domdecan Joseph v. Weber (Augsburg, 1831); Theol. Universäl-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Webster, Alexander, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, was born in Edinburgh in 1707. He became minister of Culross in 1735, and of Tolbooth Church, Edinburgh, in 1737; drew up for the Scotch government in 1755 the first attempt at a census; published several sermons and poems; and died Jan. 25, 1754. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Webster, Noah, L.L.D., the lexicographer, was a learned layman of the Congregational Church, and born at Boston, Mass. Oct. 16, 1758. By the guidance of Rev. Nathan Perkins, he was fitted for college, and entered Yale in 1774, at the age of sixteen. The Revolution seriously interrupted the college exercises, and in his junior year he joined the army. Notwithstanding, he graduated with his class in 1778. After graduation he occupied more or less in teaching, and also in the study of law with Oliver Ellsworth, of Hartford, afterwards Chief-Judge of the United States. In 1781 he was admitted to the bar, but still taught school: and for a time was principal of an academy in Goshen, N. Y. In 1792 he received the plan of preparing and publishing a series of school-books, and returned from Goshen to Hartford; and in the following year published the American Spelling-book. Soon after he issued an English Grammar and a Reader. The spelling-book attained an unprecedented popularity. Five million copies had been issued up to 1816, and in the year 1847, 24,000,000 had been published. After that time the annual demand was about 1,250,000 copies. Since 1861 the sale has been about 500,000 copies annually. Among his publications may be mentioned, Sketches of American Polity, 1776—85: — Discourses on the English Language (1787): — Effects of Skriery on Music and Industry, etc. In 1788 he began the publication, in New York, of the American Magazine; in 1783 he established there a daily paper called the Minerva; and afterwards a semi-weekly paper known as the Herald. Between 1788 and 1822 his time was passed at Hartford, New Haven, New York, and Amherst. He removed from Amherst to New Haven in 1822, and made that place his residence until his death. His great work is, of course, his Dictionary of the English Language, which he began in 1807. Preliminary to this, he prepared in 1796, 7, 8, and 9, the octavo dictionary, which he completed in 1798. He received the degree of LL.D. from Yale College: and then, having nearly completed his large dictionary, he sailed for France, in June, 1824; spent two months at Paris in consulting rare works in the Royal Library; and then went to England, spending the summer at the University of Cambridge, with free access to the libraries. There he finished the American Dictionary. An edition of 2500 copies was printed in the United States at the close of 1828, which was followed by an edition of 5000 in England. In 1840 a second American edition was published. In 1843 he published a volume entitled A Collection of Papers on Political, Literary, and Moral Subjects. As a religious man, Dr. Webster was earnest and prayerful, having united with the Church in 1808. The Bible was his daily study, and he prepared a revised edition of the common English version (New Haven, 1833, 8vo). He died at New Haven, May 28, 1843. See Cong. Quar. 1865, p. 1.

Webster, Samuel, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Bradford, Mass., in 1716. He graduated at Harvard College in 1736, became ordained in 1737, and was the pastor of the Church at Stoughton, Aug. 12, 1741, and died July 18, 1796. In 1757 he published a pamphlet entitled A Winter Evening's Conversation upon the Doctrine of Original Sin, etc., which brought out rejoinders from Rev. Peter Clark and others. Mr. Webster issued a defense of the pamphlet, which led to a general controversy. This was conducted with great spirit and ability on both sides. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 291.

Webster, William, D.D., a learned English divine, was born in 1669. He was educated at Caius College, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1711. He became the curate of St. Dunstan in the West, London, in 1715; was removed in 1731; became curate of St. Clement Eastcheap in 1732; rector of Depton, Suffolk, in 1735; resigned his curacy and rectory for the vicarages of Ware and Thundersfield. He died Dec. 4, 1756. He was the author of A Short Account of the Clergy's Right of Maintenance Violated:—Two Discourses, on the nature of error in speculative doctrines and the doctrine of the Trinity (1729);—A Translation of Simon's New Testament (1730):—The Fitness of the Witnesses of the Resurrection of Christ Considered (1731);—several other works, chiefly pamphlets of temporary interest. He also edited the Life of General Monk (1725); and conducted The Weekly Miscellany for a short time, beginning in 1735. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Wechselbalg, in German mythology. The elves or dwarfs sometimes partake well-formed children from the dead, and plant them in their own ugly, or even themselves, in their stead. These spurious beings are therefore called Wechselbalgz. The object for changing seems to be a desire on the part of the elves to improve their race. A protection against such changing, in the popular estimation, is to place a key or a part of the father's clothing, or something regarded as sacred, in the cradle. An interesting piece of superstition is the manner of freeing one's self from such a Wechselbalg. It is necessary, first, by some strange and unusual act, to bring him to an acknowledgment of his own age, and then of the author of exchange, upon which he immediately withdraws and the stolen child returns, as the elves want nothing gratis. For example, if the Wechselbalg should see water boiling in egg-shells over a fire, he calls out, "Now I am old as Westerwald, and have never yet seen water boil in egg-shells."

Weda, in German mythology, is one of the two gods of war among the Frisians. He was represented and worshipped with his brother god Freda. The head was covered with a feathered helmet, the breast with a shield; and he was also represented as having wings. Because Weda and Freda appeared as twins, it was thought they were Castor and Palaemon returned. See Wodan.

Wedgez, Zacharius Wilhelm, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born in 1758 at Neuenrade, in Westphalia. He studied at Halle and Duisburg; and after the completion of his academical curriculum he acted as a private tutor. Having no prospects for obtaining a position in his own country, he thought of going to Amsterdam, and there to obtain from the East India Company a position as preacher in the East or West Indies. Having received a call from the Reformed congregation at Dortmunt in 1786, he remained at home. But his position was such that he was often obliged to preach in other congregations in order to keep his calling. On one occasion he preached at Leipsic, where he proved himself such an excellent pulpit orator that after Zollkofler's death (1789) he was called as his successor. Here he labored until his death, May 18, 1799. He published some works of an ascetic character, for which see Doring, Deutsche Kanzel- reiner, p. 695; Winer, Handbuch der theolog. Litt. ii, 98, 176, 244. (B. P.)

Wedderburn, James, a Scotch prelate, was born in Dundee, and studied at Oxford. In 1641 he became provost of St. Mary Colinde, in the diocese of Wells, England. He was afterwards consecrated by the bishop of St. Andrews. In February, 1636, he was preferred to the see of Dunblane, and in 1638 deprived and excom municated by the Assembly at Glasgow. He died in 1639. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 182.

Wedge of Gold (y đo, l'aketh, Josh. vii, 21, 24, a tongue, as elsewhere rendered; more elliptically, y đo, ke'them, Isa. xiii, 12, fine gold, as elsewhere rendered). See Gold.

Wedlock, a word that occurs but once in the A. V. (in the phrase "break wedlock," y đo, Ezek. xvi, 80, to commit adultery, as elsewhere rendered); but the relation is very often referred to both in its literal and figurative (spiritual) sense in the Scriptures. The term properly designates the state of lawful marriage, as distinguished from all illicit or irregular connection of the sexes. As this is a subject having extensive social relations, we give here a treatment of the several topics embraced under it, presenting some additional points to those given under previous articles, and supplementing the whole from various sources, especially the preceptions and regulations of the Talmud.

I. The Married State.—This among the Hebrews was contracted by the fathers of the two parties (Gen. xxiv, 4; xxvii, 6; I Kings ii, 17; comp. Homer, Ilid. xix, 556; John, i, 1), and the marriage ceremony (y đo) was, and still is, generally the same, except in the absence of the mothers (Gen. xxvi, 21; by daughters with the consent of their full brothers, xxiv, 50; xxvii, 10), so that the bride (y đo) and the bridegroom (y đo) were often not even seen each other previously (as is still customary, at least with the inhabitants of cities in the East; see Russell, Aleppo, i, 414; Burchardt, Proc. p. 178; Descrip. de l'Egypte, xxvi, 84; but comp. Judges iv, 18, 20; Ecclus. vii, 10, 11; Tob. iv, 10). Indeed, the parents sought the wife for their son (Gen. xxiv, 4, 8; xxvii, 6; Judges xiv, 1; comp. Rippl, Abuys, ii, 49; yet see Tob. viii, 10), and a formal price (y đo, dowry) had to be stipulated (Gen. xxix, 15 sq.; xxiv, 12; Exod. xxxii, 16 sq.; I Sam. xviii, 25; Hos. iii, 2), a rule which prevailed likewise with the ancient Greeks (Homer, Odyssey, vii, 318 sq.; Aristotle, Politi, ii, 8; Pausan. iii, 12, 2), Germans (Tacitus, German. c. 8; see Strodttmann, Deutsch. Allerth. p. 309 sq.), Babylonians (Herod. i, 196), and Assyrians (Elilan, V. ii, iv, 1; Strabo, xvi, 745), as still among the Arabsians (Arvieux, ii, 21, 254; Buckingham, ii, 129; Joliff, Proc. p. 304; Kirda (Nebi, Roti, ii, 429). Persians (Olearius, p. 318), and other Asiatics and Africans (Rippl, Abuys, ii, 49; comp. B. Michaelis in Pott's Syllag. i, 81). This sum was naturally very various (Gen. xxiv, 12; I Sam. xviii, 23; Hos. iii, 2, etc.), but in one case (Deut. xxii, 29) was to be fifty shekels as a minimum (see, on the other hand, Hos. iii, 2). The practice of the modern Egyptians illustrates this; for with them the dowry, though its amount differs according to the wealth of the suitor, is still graduated according to the state of the bride. A certain portion only of the dowry is paid down, the rest being held in reserve (Lamb, i, 211). Among the modern Jews also the amount of the dowry varies with the state of the bride, according to a fixed scale (Picart, ii, 240). See Dowry. Different from this was the present (y đo) which the wiser bestowed beforehand (Gen. xxvi, 58; xxxii, 12; Gr. νηπέλ). In some cases, where the suitor was poor or a particular task was expected, the daughter was earned (Gen. xxxix, 20, 27; Josh. xv, 16; Judg. i, 13; 1 Sam. xviii, 24 sq.; 2 Sam. iii, 14; comp. Psaun. iii, 12, 2; Herod. vi, 127; Diod. Sic. iv, 22, 4). The ceremony was accompanied by dowry and sometimes by a dowry accompanied the bride (1 Kings xi, 16; comp. Josh. xvi, 18 sq.; Tob. viii, 23). But it is a disgrace, according to Oriental ideas, for a maiden to make the match herself (Isa. iv, 1). The Talmudists specify three modes by which marriage might be effected, viz., marriage by presentation, by sale, and consummation (Kid 11a, i). The matrimonial agreement between the parents was verbal in the presence of witnesses, but occasionally ratified by an oath (Mal. ii, 14); it is only after the Exile (Tob. vii, 13) that we meet with a written marriage contract (Talmud, Bikk. 2a, 2; lit. a writing; see the Mishnic tract entitled Ketuboth). The technical term of the Talmudists for the dowry which the wife brought to her husband, answering to the dow of the Latins, was בקע (Bak). The technical term used by the Talmudists for betrothing was קדש קינון (Kid hashinon), derived from קינון, "to set apart." There is a treatise in the Mishna so entitled, in which various questions of casuistry of slight interest to us are discussed. As to the age of the parties, nothing is specified in the Mosaic law; but later enactments require full twelve years for the girl and thirty for the boy (both in public, but being much earlier in warm climates, so that females of ten or eleven years often become mothers, and lasts but little older fathers; see Riph, Nof. p. 42; Abiba, i, 201; ii, 50, 57; Harmer, Obs. ii, 312), though the usual age was about eighteen (Mishna, Bekah Abot, v, 21; Carnov in the Tzem. Bikhoth, ii, 907). See BARTHOL.

The Mosaic law permitted several wives to one man, as is universally customary in the East; yet before the Exile this practice seems to have been mostly confined to princes and important personages. See POLYGAamy.

Second marriages, especially on the woman's part, were held in disrepute (see Rau, Le Oono Second, Nupturninum [Lips., 1893]), at least in later times (Luke ii, 66 sq.; 1 Cor. vii, 8; 1 Tim. i, 9), if we may judge from the priestly (Josephus, Izefe, § 75, 76) and the apostolical regulations (1 Tim. iii, 2; Tit. i, 6), as generally among the Greeks and Romans (Diod. Sic. xiii, 12; Virgili., Aen. iv, 23 sq.; Plutarch, Quest. Rom. c, 105; Val. Max. ii, 2, 8; Josephus, Ant. xviii, 6, 6). The celibacy of the Essenes (Philo, ii, 482, 633; Josephus, Ant. xviii, 1, 5; War, ii, 8, 2; Pliny, v, 15) was a disputable asceticism (see MATTH. vii, 3). See MATTH. ii.

II. The Wedding itself.—In this the most observable point is that there were no definite religious ceremonies connected with it. It is worthy of note that there is no term in the Hebrew language to express the ceremony of marriage. The substantive קתוענוך (qatunuch) occurs but once, and then in connection with the day (Cant. iii, 11). The word "wedding" does not occur at all in the A.V. of the Old Testament. It is probable, however, that some form of a ceremony with an oath took place, as implied in some allusions to marriage (Ezek. xxi, 8; Mal. ii, 14), particularly in the expression "the covenant of her God" (Prov. ii, 17), as applied to the marriage bond, and that a blessing was pronounced (Gen. xxiv, 60; Ruth iv, 11, 12) sometimes by the parents (Tob. vii, 18). But the essence of the marriage ceremony consisted in the removal of the bride from her father's house to that of the bridegroom or his father. There seems, indeed, to be a literal truth in the Hebrew expression "to take" a wife (Numb. xi, 1; 2 Sam. xvii, 21), for the ceremony appears to have mainly consisted in the taking. Among the modern Arabs the same custom prevails, the capture and removal of the bride being effected with a considerable show of violence (Burckhardt, Notes, i, 108). The bridegroom prepared himself for the occasion by putting on a festive dress, and especially by placing on his head the handsome turban described by the term פור (Isa. ix, 10; A.V. "ornaments"), and a nupcial crown or garland (Cant. iii, 11); he was resplendent in myrrh and frankincense and "all powders of the merchant" (ver. 6). The latter name was given to various materials (gold or silver, roses, myrtle or olive), according to his circumstances (Selden, Ut. Ebr. ii, 15). The use of the crown at marriages was familiar both to the Greeks and Romans. The bride prepared herself for the ceremony by taking a bath, generally on the day preceding the weding. This was probably in ancient, as in modern, times a formal proceeding, accompanied with considerable pomp ('Icicart, i, 246: Lane, i, 217). The notices of it in the Bible are so few as to have escaped general observation (Ruth iii, 5; Ezek. xxi, 40; Epph. xvi, 26, 27); but the passages cited establish the antiquity of the custom, and the expressions in the last ("having purified her by the laver of water," not having spot) have evident reference to it. A similar custom prevailed among the Greeks (Smith, Dict. of Class. Ant. n. v. "Bathos"). The distinctive feature of the bride's attire was the צדפק (zadpek) or veil—a light robe of stiff texture, which covered only the face, but the whole person (Gen. xxiv, 6; Lev. xxxviii, 14, 15). This was regarded as the symbol of her submission to her husband, and hence in 1 Cor. xi, 10 the veil is apparently described under the term הושינא, "authority." The use of the veil was not peculiar to the Hebrews. It was customary among the Greeks and Romans and among the Jews. It gave rise to the expression דבוק, i.e. "to veil," and hence to our word "nuptial." It is still used by the Jews (Icicart, i, 241). The modern Egyptians envelop the bride in an ample shawl, which perhaps more than anything else resembles the Hebrew צדפק (translator, i, 220). She also wore a peculiar girdle, named קיבחרים (qibherim; A.V. the "girdle"), which no bride could forget (Jer. xi, 22). The "girdle" was an important article of the bride's dress among the Romans, and gave rise to the expressionсолвер соням. Her head was crowned with a chaplet, which was again so distinctive of the bride that the Hebrew term קתוע (qatun), "bride," originated from it. The bride's crown was either of gold or gilded. The use of it was interdicted after the destruction of the second Temple, on account of humiliation (Jub. Ebr. i, 15). If the bride were a virgin, she wore her hair flowing (Ketub. ii, 1). Her robes were white (Rev. xix, 8), and sometimes embroidered with gold-thread (Wis. xiv, 13, 14), and covered with perfumes (Rev. viii). She was clad in a gown, covered with jewels (Matt. xi, 10; Rev. xxii, 2). When the fixed hour arrived, which was generally late in the evening, the bridegroom set forth from his house, attended by his groomsmen, termed in Hebrew הנוס (hunoas; A.V. "companions," Judg. xiv, 11), and in Greek νυφίς τού τετραποσίος (nuphi of the bride-chamber, Matt. xi, 15). Winer (Rech. s. v. "Hochzeit") identifies the children of the bride-chamber with the sk стола (stola) of the Talmudists. But the former were the attendants on the bridegroom alone, while the sk стола were two persons selected on the day of the marriage to represent the interests of bride and bridegroom, apparently with a special view to any possible litigation that might subsequently arise on the subject noticed in Deut. xxv, 5-10 (Selden, Ut. Ebr. ii, 15). Those attendants were preceded by a band of musicians or singers (Gen. xxxix, 27; Jer. vii, 84; xvi, 9; 1 Mac. ix, 39), and accompanied by persons bearing flambeaux (2 Esdr. x, 2; Matt. xxv, 7, comp. Jer. xxv, 10; Rev. xviii, 25, "the light of a candle"). With these flambeaux we may compare the δρακαὶ αἰνοῦσαι of the Greeks (Aristoph. Pax, 1371). The large torches described in Matt. xxv, 7 would be small hand-lamps. Without them none could join the procession (Trench, Parables, p. 257, note). See LANTERN. Having reached the house of the bride, who with her maidens anxiously expected his arrival (Matt. xxv, 6), he conducted the whole party back to his own or his father’s house. The bride went to get (2 Kgs. 20:19) a house of her husband (Job. xvii, 18; Judg. i, 14)—an expression which is worthy of notice, inasmuch as it has not been rightly understood in Dan. xi, 6, where “they that brought her” is an expression for husband. The bringing home of the bride was regalized in the later days of the Roman empire as one of the most important parts of the bridal ceremony (Bingham, Hist. of the Rom. Church, xxiii, ch. iv, § 7). This procession was made with every demonstration of gladness (Psa. lxxv, 15). From the joyous sounds used on these occasions the term khalıd (יהודא) was applied in the sense of marrying in Psa. lxxviii, 63 (A. V. “their maidens were not given to marriage,” lit. “were not praised,” as in the margin). This sense appears preferable to that of the Sept., ινον ἕλεγχον, which is adopted by Gesenius (Theot. v, p. 596). The noise in the streets attendant on an Oriental wedding is excessive, and enables us to understand the allusions in Jeremiah to the “voice of the bridegroom and the voice of the bride.” On their way back they were joined by a party of friends of the bridegroom, who were in waiting to catch the procession as it passed (Matt. xxv, 6; comp. Trench, Parables, p. 244, note). The inhabitants of the place pressed out into the streets to watch the procession (Cant, iii, 11). At the house a feast was prepared, to which all the friends and neighbors were invited (Gen. xxix, 22; Matt. xxii, 1-10). Luke xiv, 8; John ii, 2), and the festivities were protracted for seven or even fourteen days (Judg. xiv, 12; Tob. viii, 19). The feast was regarded as so essential a part of the marriage ceremony that κωτύλη γαμοῦ acquired the specific meaning “to celebrate the marriage feast” (Sept. at Gen. xxix, 22; Esth. ii, 18; Tob. viii, 19; 1 Macc. ix, 37; x, 58; Matt. xxii, 4; xcv, 10; Luke xiv, 8), and sometimes to celebrate any feast (Esth. ix, 22). The guests were provided by the host with sitting robes (Matt. xxii, 11; comp. Trench, Parables, p. 290), and the feast was enlivened with riddles (Judg. xiv, 12) and other amusements. The bridegroom now entered into direct communication with the bride, and the joy of the friend was “fulfilled” at hearing the voice of the bridegroom (John iii, 29) conversing with her, with his hand laid on her head, as a symbol of the success of his share in the work. In the case of a virgin, parched corn was distributed among the guests (Kethub, ii, 1), the significance of which is not apparent; the custom bears some resemblance to the distribution of the cup (Gen. xxvii, vi, 20) among the guests at a Roman wedding. The modern Jews have a custom of shattering glasses or vessels by dashing them to the ground (Vicart, i, 240). The last act in the ceremonial was the conducting of the bride to the bridal chamber, chêder (כִּשְׁדָר, Judg. xv, 1; Joel ii, 16), where a canopy, named chuppâh (ךּפָה), was prepared (Psa. xix, 5; Joel ii, 16). The term occurs in the Mishna (Kethub, iv, 8), and is explained by some of the ancient commentators to have been a bower of roses and myrtles. The term was also applied to the canopy under which the nuptial benediction was pronounced, or to the robe spread over the heads of bride and bridegroom (Selden, Ur. Ebr, ii, 10). The bride was still completely veiled, so that the bridal ceremony practiced in Jerusalem (Kethub, iv, 23) was very possible. If proof could be subsequently adduced that the bride had not preserved her maiden purity, the case was investigated; and if she was convicted, she was stoned to death before her father’s house (Deut. xvii, 19-21). The modern Jews are newly married men, and are exempt from military service, or from any public business which might draw him away from his home, for the space of a year (xxix, 5); a similar privilege was granted to him who was betrothed (xx, 7). See MARRIAGE.

III. Violation of Marriage Vows.—Unfaithfulness on the part of the wife was punished with death (Lev. xx, 10; Deut. xxxi, 22; Ezek. xvi, 40; 49; Sus. 46; comp. Josephus, Antiq. x, 28, 2); and the penalty of execution was prescribed by the Codex Justinianus, (Deut. xxxi, 4; Ezek. xvi, 40), and not by strangulation (as the Talmudists maintain, Mishna, Sanhedrim, xi, 1, 6). The legislation of other nations was milder (Tacitus, Germ. 19; Eilam, v, ii, 6; xii, 12; xii, 24; yet see Arnob. iv, 29). The Roman law (Lex Julia de Adulteris Cont. in Dei, v, 19, 23) only prescribed confinement of part of the culprit’s goods, and public infamy, as the extreme penalty. Constantine first made adultery a capital crime (see Dict. in the Stud. u. Krit. 1892, vol. iv; Ren, Rom., Criminalrecht, p. 639). The ordeal of the bitter waters (Numb. v, 9-25) which was practiced the Mithraic legends (Deut. xxii, 22), and has its parallel in other nations (Eilam, Anim, i, 67; Achil. Tat. viii, 3; see Grodeck, in Ugelino, Theot. xxx; Otho, Lex. Robb. p. 62). See ADULTERY.

IV. Dissolution of the Marriage Tie.—Separation of a man from his wife was legitimate (Deut. xxiv, 1), except in two cases (xxiv, 3, 19), when he found reason (ךּפם דַּרְשָה, a phrase that led to much Talmudical casuistry); but must be done by a regular certificate of dismissal (A Brigham, Tov. 1, Is, 1; Jer. iii, 8; Talmud), or בָּאָרִים בָּאָרִים, Matt. xvi, 7; Mark x, 4; or שְׂדָרִים simply, Matt. xvi, 31; comp. repudium, Stutt. Calig. § 30). The subject is treated at great length in the Talmud (tract Gitten), and by Selden (Uz. Hebr.) and Buxtorf (Spousal. et Deiort.). See Divorce.

Wednesday is a day often marked by special religious exercises being numbered among the Sabbath and Ember days in the Church of England. At a very early period in the history of the Christian Church, the custom of meeting for divine worship on Wednesdays and Fridays was adopted. Both days were considered as fasts, on the ground that our Lord was betrothed on a Wednesday and crucified on a Friday. The fasting continued till three in the afternoon; hence they were called semi-pastas, or half-fasts, in opposition to the fast of Lent, which was continued till the evening. Subsequently the Montanists introduced the custom of eating raw flesh food to be kind of fast which consisted only of bread, salt, and water. These fasts were called stationes, from the practice of soldiers keeping guard, which was called statio by the Romans. Lent begins on that day (see ASH WEDNESDAY). In the Western Church Saturday at length took the place of Wednesday as a fast. See FAST: EAST; LENT.

Weed (ץקן, siph, Jon. ii, 6; elsewhere rendered "dag," Exod. ii, 8; Isa. xix, 6, but usually as an epithet of the Red Sea, lit. the seed-sea; Sept. πετρος; Lat. alga, see Pliny, xxxv, 46, 6; ix, 25); the sea-weed (Fucus mutatus of Linn.; Fucus marinus, Pliny, xxvi, 66 and 70), a sort of sea-grass with lanceform, serrated leaves, and threadlike knotted stalks, which grows in great abundance on the shores of the Mediterranean (Jon. ii, 6; see Hirtius, Bull. Afric., 24); but especially of the Helleboropteris (Ovina, Hervul, xviii, 106); Belon, Obscr, ii, 3), as likewise of the Red Sea (comp. Strabo, xvi, 773; Diod. Sic. iii, 15, 9); the last taking its name from the Greek θαλάσσης, from that circumstance. See Red Sea. The plant is described by Acoetia (in Clusi: Exot. Etib. [Antwerp, 1805], p. 235); Delile (Flora Egyptiën, in Descr. de l'Egypte, xiv, 113), Bochart (Phaleg, iv, 29); Celsius (Herodot. ii, 19); Pliny, xxvii, 23, xxvi, 22; Galen, Med. WEED

Weed, Bartholomew, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Ridgefield (now Danbury), Conn., March 6, 1878. He was trained in the Calvinistic faith, and became a Baptist in 1899, but joined the Methodist Episcopal Church in the eighteenth year of his age, under the ministry of Rev. Seth Crowell; was licensed to exhort in 1812; obtained local preacher's license in 1813; and was elected superintendent in the Philadelphia conference in 1817. During his ministry of sixty-four years he filled appointments in Philadelphia, Bridgeton, Trenton, etc., and was four years a presiding elder in the Rock River conference, from which he was elected delegate to the General Conference of 1844. His last years were spent in the New York conference, which, in 1864, gave him an unperannulated relation. During the last eleven years of his life he acted as chaplain of Essex County Jail. He died in Newark, N.J., Jan. 5, 1879. Mr. Weed was ardent in his attachment to the doctrines, discipline, and usages of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and bore with cheerfulness a part in the sacrifices and sufferings of her pioneer work. His ministry was characterized by clearness, warmth, and strength. He was a man of simple tastes and manners, of strong convictions and attachments, and of a heroic and magnanimous spirit. Hisえempioyment of his loved position seemed as hard for him to quit it, though in his eighty-sixth year, as it was for him, a few weeks later, to die. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1879, p. 73. (R. V.)

Weed, Henry Rowland, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Ballston, N. Y., July 30, 1789. He graduated from Union College in 1811 and with the first class of Princeton Theological Seminary in 1815; was ordained pastor at Jamaica, L. I., in 1816, and in 1822 went to Albany, N. Y., as pastor of the First Presbyterian Church; in 1830 became agent for the Board of Education; in 1832 pastor of the First Presbyterian Church at Wheeling, and died at Philadelphia, Pa., Dec. 14, 1870. In the councils of the Church he was greatly respected.

Week (יוֹכָהּ, or יָכָהּ, skhabah, from יָכָהוּ, "seven," lit. a leptad of anything, but specifically used for a period of seven days; Sept., ἡ ἑβάτη; Vulg., septima), See SEVENS.

1. The origin of this division of time is a matter which has given birth to much speculation. Its antiquity is so great, its observance so wide-spread, and it occupies so important a place in sacred things, that it has been very generally thrown back as far as the creation of man, who, on this supposition, was told from the very first to observe this time to the moon, the Creator's order of working and resting. The week and the Sabbath are, if this be so, as old as man himself, and we need not seek for reasons either in the human mind or the facts with which that mind comes in contact, for the adoption of such a division of time, since it is to be referred neither to man's thoughts nor to man's actions.

A purely theological ground is thus established for the week and for the sacredness of the number seven. They who embrace this view support it by a reference to the six days' creation and the Divine rest on the seventh, which they consider to have been made known to man from the very first, and by an appeal to the exceeding prevalence of the hebdomadal division of time from the earliest age—an argument the force of which is considered to be enhanced by the alleged absence of any natural ground for it. See DAYS.

To all this, however, it may be objected that we are quite in the dark as to when the record of the six days' creation was made known; that as human language is used and human apprehensions are addressed in that record, so, the week being already known, the perfection of the human work and Sabbath may well have been set forth under this figure, the existing and actual habit of time-moulding the document, instead of the document giving birth to the division; that, old and wide-spread as is the recognition of that division, it is not universal; that the nations which knew not of it were too important to be overlooked from its prevalence to stand; and that, so far from its being without ground in nature, it is the most obvious and convenient way of dividing the month. Each of these points must now be briefly considered:

(1.) That the week rests on a theological ground may be cheerfully acknowledged by both sides; but nothing is determined by such acknowledgment as to the original cause of adopting this division of time. The records of creation and the fourth commandment give, no doubt, the ultimate and therefore the deepest ground of the hebdomadal division, but it does not therefore follow that it was not adopted for lower reasons before either was known. Whether the week gave its sacredness to the number seven, or whether the ascendancy of that number helped to determine the dimensions of the week, it is impossible to say. The latter fact, the ancient ascendancy of the number seven, might rest on divers grounds. The planets, according to the astronomy of those times, were seven in number; so are the notes of the diatonic scale; so also many other things naturally attracting observation.

(2.) The evidence of the weekly division was indeed very great, but a nearer approach to universality is required to render it an argument for the view in aid of which it is appealed to. It was adopted by all the Shemitic races, and, in the later period of their history at least, by the Egyptians. On this side of the Atlantic we find it but identically the same as the Hebrews, and the Persians. It also obtains now with the Hindoos, but its antiquity among them is matter of question. It is possible that it was introduced into India by the Arabs and Mohammedans. So in China we find it, but whether universally or only among the Buddhists admits of doubt. (See, for both, Pius IX.'s Quæstiones, questions Motacist, a work with many of the results of which we may be well expected to quarrel, but which deserves, in respect not only of curious learning, but of the vigorous and valuable thought with which it is peopled, to be far more known than it is.) On the other hand, there is no reason for thinking the week known till a late period either to Greeks or Romans.

(5.) So far from the week being a division of time without ground in nature, there was much to recommend it to the Hebrews. For the six days' work and seven days' rest were named from planetary deities, as among first the Assyrians and Chaldees, and then the Egyptians, there of course each period of seven days would constitute a whole, and that whole might come to be recognised by nations that disregarded or rejected the practice which had shaped and determined it in the East. These nations and nearly an exact quadruplication of the month, so that the quarters of the moon may easily have suggested it.

(4.) Even if it were proved that the planetary week of the Egyptians was named from Dion Cassius (Hist. Rom. xxvii. 18), existed at or before the time of the Exode, the children of Israel did not copy that. Their week was simply determined by the Sabbath; and there is no evidence of any other day, with them, having either had a name assigned to it, or any particular associations bound up with it. The days seem to have been distinguished merely by the work in the field, and counted from the Sabbath.

2. History among the Hebrews. Whatever controversies exist respecting the origin of the week, there is no doubt that these days attract the great antiquity; on particular occasions at least, among the Shemitic races, there was the division of time by a period of seven days. This has been thought to be implied in the phrase respecting the sacrifices of Cain and Abel (Gen. iv, 3), "in process of time," literally "at the end of days." It is to be traced in the narratives of the creation of Adam (viii, 10), "and he stayed yet other seven days;" and we find it recognised by the Syrian Laban (xxix, 27), "fulfil her week." It is needless to say that this division of time is a marked feature of the Mosaic law, and one into which the whole year was parted, the Sabbath sufficiently showing that. The week of seven days was also made the key to a scale of Sabbaths, running through the sabbatical years up to that of jubilee.

We have seen in Gen. xxix, 27 that it was known to the ancient Syrians, and the injunction to Jacob, "fulfil her week," indicates that it was in use as a fixed term for great festive celebrations. The most probable exposition of the passage is that Laban tells Jacob to fulfil Leah's week, the proper period of the nuptial festivities in connection with his marriage to her, and then he may have Rachel also (comp. Judg. xiv). So, too, for universal observance, as in the case of the sabbatical years of Jacob, Joseph "made a mourning for his father seven days" (Gen. i, 10). But neither of these instances, any more than Noah's procedure in the ark, goes further than showing the custom of observing a term of seven days for any observance of importance. Nor does it prove that the whole year, or the whole month, was thus divided at all times, and without regard to remarkable events.

In Exodus, of course, the week comes into very distinct manifestation. Two of the great feasts—-the Passover and the Feast of Weeks (Lev. xxiii, 15-20) occur at intervals established for seven days after that of their initiation (Exod. xii, 15-20, etc.), a custom which remains in the Christian Church, in the rituals of which the remembrances and topics of the great festivals are prolonged till what is technically called the octave. Although the Feast of Pentecost lasted but one day, yet the time for its observance was to be counted by weeks from the Passover, whence one of its titles, "the Feast of Weeks." The division by seven was, as we have seen, expanded so as to make the seventh month and the seventh year sabbatical. To whatever extent the laws enforcing this week have been neglected under the Captivity, their effect, when studied, must have been to retard the words גת, בַּשָּׂנָה, week, capable of meaning a seven of years almost as naturally as a seven of days. Indeed, the generality of the words would have this effect at any rate. Hence their use to denote the latter in prophecy, more especially in that of Daniel, is not mere arbitrary symbolism, but the employment of a not unfamiliar and easily understood language. This is not the place to discuss the innumerable interpretations into which we propose giving our opinion of any such, but it is connected with our subject to remark that, whatever be the merits of that which in Daniel and the Apocalypse understands a year by a day, it cannot be set aside as forced or unnatural. Whether weeks were or were not intended to be thus understood in the places in question, their being so would have been a congruous, and we may say logical, attendant on the scheme which counts weeks of years, and both would have been a natural computation to minds familiar and occupied with the laws of the sabbatical year. See Day.

8. Christian Observances. —In the New Test., we of course find such clear recognition of and familiarity with the week as need scarcely be dwelt on. Sacred as the division was, and stamped deep on the minds and customs of God's people, it now received additional solemnity from our Lord's last earthly Passover gathering up his work of life into a week.

Hence the Christian Church, from the very first, was familiar with the week. Paul's language (I Cor. xi, 2, καὶ μὴ ὄφσαται) shows this. We cannot conceive from it that such a division of time was observed by the inhabitants of Corinth generally, for they to whom he was writing, though doubtless the majority of them were Gentiles, yet knew the Lord's day, and most probably the Jewish Sabbath. But though we can infer no more than this from the place in question, it is clear that if not by this time, yet very soon after, the whole Roman world had adopted the hebdomadal division. Dion Cassius, who wrote in the 2d century, speaks of it as both universal and recent in his time. He represents it as coming from Egypt, and gives two schools, by the name of each of which he considers that the planetary names of the different days were fixed (Dion Cassius, xxvii, 18). Those names, or corresponding ones, have perpetuated themselves over Christendom, though no associations of any kind are now connected with them, except in so far as the whimsical consideration which some has perpetuated with their Pagan origin, and led to an attempt at their disuse. It would be interesting, though foreign to our present purpose, to inquire into the origin of this planetary week. A deeply learned paper in the Pthological Museum, by the late archdeacon Leigh, gives the credit of its invention to the Chaldees. Dion Cassius was, however, pretty sure to have been right in tracing its adoption by the Roman world to an Egyptian origin. It is very striking to reflect that while Christendom was in its cradle, the law by which she was to divide her time came, without connection with her, into universal observance, thus making things ready for her to impose on mankind that week on which all Christian life has been shaped—that week grounded on no worship of planetary deities, nor dictated by the mere wish to quadruplicate the seven sabbatical days, which were already consecrated to God, and proposing to make his Maker's model as that whereby to regulate his working and his rest—that week which once indeed in modern times it has been attempted to abolish, because it was attempted to abolish the whole Christian faith, but which has kept, as we are sure it ever will keep, its ground, being bound up with that other, and sharing therefore in that other's invincibility and perpetuity. Weeks, John Willis, D.D., a colonial bishop of the Church of England, died March 25, 1857, having just returned to Sierra Leone, of which he was bishop, on the 17th of that month, after visiting the stations of the Tarragon Mission. His consecration to this see occurred in 1855. See Amer. Quart. Church Rec. 1857, p. 471.

Weeks, William Raymond, D.D., a Presbyterian divine, was born at Brooklyn, Conn., Aug. 6, 1788. He graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1809; studied theology at the Andover Theological Seminary and was licensed to preach by the Association in Vermont, and was ordained and installed by the Columbia Presbytery as pastor of the church in Plattsburg, N.Y., in February, 1812. He resigned this charge in 1814, and was occupied in supplying different churches and teaching until 1829, when he became pastor of the Fourth Presbyterian Church in Newark, N.J., where he continued to perform the double duty of preaching and teaching a school until 1846, when, on account of declining health, he had to give up both. He died June 15, 1848. In his weeks had a mind of more of ordinary activity and independence; the classics and the Hebr.

WEEPING (עָנָּא, עָנוֹ) was the ancient Hebrews

wept and made their troubles to appear openly, in mourning and affliction; they were not of opinion that courage and greatness of soul consisted in seeming to be insensible, or to remain unheeding of their tears. It was even looked upon as a great disrespect for any one not to be bewailed at his funeral. Job says of the wicked man, "His widow shall not weep" (Job xxviii, 15). The Psalmist, speaking of the death of Hophni and Phinehas, says, "Their priests fell by the sword, and there was no man lamenting over them" (Psa. lxxxix, 64). God forbids Ezekiel to weep or to express any sorrow for the death of his wife, to show that the Jews should be reduced to so great calamities that they should not have the liberty even to mourn or bewail themselves (Ezek. xxix, 16). See Mourning; Tears.

Wegelin, Jobus, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Jan. 11, 1649, at Augsburg. He studied at Tubingen, and was appointed in 1627 deacon in his native place. In 1629, when, at the command of the emperor Ferdinand III, the evangelical churches were closed and divine service was prohibited, Wegelin had to withdraw from the Evangelical ministers. He returned again in 1632, after Elector Adolphus had entered the city, to leave it again in 1635.
He went to Prague, in Hungary, where he died, Sept. 14, 1640. For the benefit of his members in Augsburg he composed Augsburger Berichthein (24 ed. Nuremb., 1646 and 1650, and 4 ed. Landsv., 1687). After his death, his ascetical writings were published under the title Gebete und Lieder (ibid. 1660). One of his hymns, Auf Christi Himmelsfahrt allein, has also been translated into English, "Since Christ has gone to heaven, his home," in the Cherub Book for England, No. 64. buch, 15th series; Koch, Gesch. d. deutschen Kirchenleids., iii, 169 sq. (B.P.)

Wegelin, Thomas, a Protestant divine of Germany, was born at Augsburg, Dec. 21, 1577. At the Ratisbon Colloquy he acted as amanuensis of the Protestant theologians. Illi, as professor of theology and president of the church-convent at Strasbourg, March 16, 1629. He wrote, Dissert. III de Scriptura Sacra Auctoritate, Linguis, et Versionibus. — Hypomnem Themoologicum de Hymno Triasio; — Prelectiones in Posteaichthonum. — Des Christi; — Historiae Christi. — De In-

Weger, Laurentius, a German philologist, was born Dec. 30, 1563, at Königsberg. He prosecuted his studies at his native place and Leipzig, and was appointed in 1593 to the oriental language at his native city, where he died May 21, 1715. He wrote, Dissert. de Verbo Dei Occasioni Phaenae Chaldaicnsis νόετει νυ — De Osculatio Manus Didascalliae ex Joh xxxii, 20, etc. He also wrote on Psa. xxiii, Hist. iii, 4; Ezek. xvii, 17. Weimärer Hymn-Book was a work prepared by Hinder at Weimar in 1728. His plan was to restore the old hymns to their original readings, and introduce as many as possible that were already established in the hearts of the people. He thought it best not to concern himself with the highest interests of the Church to alter these compositions to meet the peculiar views of theologians of succesgive generations, yet he would not pursue his own method of restoration without certain restrictions within the hands of reason. See Hagenbach, Hist. of the Church in the 18th and 19th Centuries, ii, 50 sq.

Weinbrenner, Friedrich, an eminent German architect, was born at Carlsruhe in 1766. He was trained as a carpenter and builder, and in 1788 began to travel for improvement, visiting in turn Zurich, Dresden, and Berlin, and in 1792 started for Italy. Here he discovered his own want of training and instruction, and entered upon a thorough course of study and research, supporting himself in part by giving instruction in architecture to numerous persons, some strangers of distinction. He returned to Carlsruhe in 1797, where he became architect of buildings, and soon after erected a synagogue and some private mansions. He removed to Strasbourg two years after, but did not find much employment, and in a short time returned to Carlsruhe in his former capacity. He entertained higher views of his art than his countrymen generally, and did much to diffuse the same sentiments throughout the next generation by his instructions. At Carlsruhe he constructed the Catholic church, Lutheran church, Theatre, Museum, Mint, Hochberg Palace, and other edifices. At Baden he supervised the erection of numerous buildings. He also constructed several churches, mansions, villas, etc., in various parts of Germany. He published a number of works on different branches of architectural study, viz., Zeichnungslehre (1810); — Optik (1811); — Perspektivlehre (1817-24); — Über Form und Farbe (1819); — Über architektonische Verein-rung (1820); — and other works. He died March 1, 1826.

Weinrich, Johann Michael, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born Oct. 12, 1688, at Deutern, in Franconia, and died as court-deacon at Meiningen, March 18, 1737. He wrote, Kirchen und Schlaumonum Dei Praestantiae Heimweh ab mehrer Ziernen (Leipa. 1780) — Historische und theologische Betrachtungen der werkwürdigen Altdürmer und gehörten Dieners (Coburg, 1725); — Comparativo Passae Germanicarum cum vicm Hebræorum Veteris (printed in Misc. Lips. x, 76 sq.). See Winer, Handb. der theol. Lit., 803; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. iii, 502. (B.P.)

Weinzierl, Franz Joseph, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born Dec. 24, 1777, at Juffenbach, in Bavaria. He studied at Munich and Ratisbon, and received holy orders in 1802. He was at first chaplain at Penting for a short time. In 1802 he went to Ratisbon as professor of the gymnasium, where he Weis, Nikolaus von, a German prelate, was born March 8, 1796, in Schönbach; in the bishopric of Mesta. He studied at Mayence, was appointed pastor at Lichten- bofen in 1820, and two years later capellany at Speyer, where he was consecrated as bishop July 10, 1842. He died Dec. 15, 1869. In connection with the bishop of Strasburg, Andreas Ries, he founded the Catholic, a very influential paper in Germany, and translated many works into German; thus they translated Butler's Lives of the Saints (Mayence, 1821—27, 23 vols.) from the French translation of Godescard; from the latter language they also translated Rabelo's work On the Influence of Language upon Religion, Politics, etc. (ibid. 1822). Weiss, Geog. Andreas, a Lutheran minister of Germany, was born Dec. 11, 1777, at Astrahak, in Russia. The youth to Halle with his father in 1785, and here he received, not only his early education, but also his theological instruction, and Franke, Michaelis, Freylinghaus, Baumgarten, and Knapp were his teachers in the university. From 1761 to 1768 he superintended the schools of the Orphan Asylum; in the latter year he was appointed a member of the Staatspfand, and 1778 pastor of a church in Magdeburg. In 1783 he was called to Magdeburg, where he died, June 16, 1792. He published, Über die Reden des noblen Moisters (Halle, 1778); Reden über die Weisung der Jesu vor Christi Leiden und Auferstehung (ibid. 1790). He also published sermons for the Christian year. See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, iv. 684 sq. (B. P.)

Weiser, Daniel D.D., a German Reformed clergyman, was born at Selingsgroe, Pa., Jan. 13, 1799. In his youth he learned the trade of a nailsmith in Lewisburg, and in 1814 served four months in the United States Army. He began to study for the ministry at Hagerstown, Md., in 1818, was licensed in 1823, and ordained in 1824. His first charge embraced three congregations in the vicinity of Selingsgroe, which he extended to eleven. After laboring in this field for ten years, he became pastor at New Goshenhoppen and Great Swamp, in Montgomery Co., Pa., to whom he ministered for thirty years. In 1868 he withdrew from the active ministry, but until the close of his life frequently assisted his son, who succeeded him, and supplied neighboring pulpits. He died Dec. 2, 1875. Dr. Weiser was hard-working, warm-hearted, and a good preacher. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the German Ref. Church, v. 146.

Weishaupt, Adam, founder of the sect of the Illuminati (q. v.), was born at Ingolstadt, Feb. 6, 1748. He was educated at the seminary of the Jesuits in his native city, but soon quitted it for the university, where he was made doctor in 1768, and in 1772 professor of jurisprudence. In 1757 he displaced the Jesuits in the chair of canon law, and thenceforth became their opponent, first by means of a powerful secret society, and afterwards by the establishment of the mystical or en- trenched sect above named, in whose interest he worked (for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.) were written. In 1785 he resigned his professorship, and retired to Gota, engaged in scientific and social labor, still occupying the honorary position of scribe counsellor. He died there Nov. 18, 1830.

Weismann, Christian Eberhard, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Sept. 2, 1677, at Hirschau. He studied at Tubingen, was appointed in 1701 deacon at Calw, and in 1704 court chaplain at Stuttgart, but in 1707 he exchanged his position for that of professor of church history and philosophy at the gymnasium there. Here he published his Einleitung in die Wichtigkeiten der Kirchenhistorie N. Testamentum zur Erfahrung der Erkenntniss des Rechts Gottes, etc. (1718, 1719, 2 pts.). In 1721 he was called as professor of theology to Tubingen, was honored in the same year with the doctorate of D.D., and succeeded G. Hoffmann as provost of St. George's in 1729. He died May 26, 1747. Besides his Institutiones Theologicae Exegetico-dogmaticae (1789), he wrote some very fine hymns. See Moser, Beiträge zu einem Lexico der jetzigen lou und reform. Weiss, Charles, a Protestant theologian, was born at Strasbourg, Dec. 16, 1852. On the death of his father, he entered the College of St. Andries, at Louvain. After preparing a second edition of the last work, Weiss became insane (1864), and spent the rest of his life in an asylum at Vanves, near Paris, where he died in 1881. See Lichtenberg, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Weiss, Lat. Wettius, George Michael, a (Dutch) Reformed minister, was a native of the Palatinate of the Rhine, but was licensed and ordained to the Gospel ministry at Heidelberg in 1725. With about four hundred German emigrants, he settled in Pennsylvania in 1726—27, accompanying them by request of their classis as their spiritual teacher. They were aided on their way by the Classis of Amsterdam. In 1731 the colony numbered fifteen thousand souls, who sought here a refuge from persecution. Mr. Weiss settled and founded a Church at Skippack, about twenty-four miles west of Philadelphia. In 1728 he asked help for these scattered sheep in the wilderness from his classis of the Palatinate. But these persecuted "churches under the cross" would only refer them to the Reformed Church of Holland. In 1729—30 he visited Holland with an elder, J. Reif, to solicit money, which was given to a large amount for that day. But Reif stole most of it, only one hundred and thirty-five pounds being recovered. The Classis of Amsterdam sent over ministers and mon- ey to sustain these German churches, and thus began that system of missionary labor and supervision out of which the German Reformed Church has grown up, and which formed a strong and early tie between her and the Reformed Church of Holland. When Weiss returned to America in 1731, he settled among the Ger- mans in New York state, in Schoharie and Dutchess and Greene counties, at Catskill (now Leeds). Coxsackie, etc. Indian depredations obliged him about fourteen years afterwards to return to Pennsylvania. He was a member of the first German ecclesiastical assembly, held in Philadelphia in 1746, and was minister of three Ger- man congregations west of Philadelphia about fourteen years. He died at the age of sixty-five. He is repre- sented to have been a fine scholar, speaking Latin as well as he did his native German. His ministry was thoroughly a public work, proving him under all difficulties and with manifest blessings attendant upon it. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America, p. 262, 263. (W. J. R. T.) Weiss, Michael, a German divine, contemporary with Luther, was born at Neisse, in Silesia. When the Reformation began, the Bohemian Brethren were among the first to hail it; as early as 1522 they sent messengers to Luther to wish him success and confer with him. The question of Church reform was in Michael Weiss, who afterwards became pastor of the German branch of the Bohemian Brethren at Landskron and Fulneck, in Bohemia, and for their benefit translated into German the finest of the Bohemian hymns, adding some of his own. Weiss died in 1546. Of his own hymns we will mention: Christus, das ist erstanden (Eng. transl. in Chorale Book for England, No. 58; "Christ the Lord is risen again"); - Lob sei dem hochkönigsten Gott (Eng. transl. in Moravian Hymn-book, No. 24; "To God we render thanks and praise"). (B. F.)

Weiss, Paul, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born in 1548 at Steylen, in Silesia. In 1568 he was appointed professor of Greek at the Königberg University, and in 1581 professor of theology there. In 1589 he was appointed court preacher, and died Jan. 5, 1612. He wrote, Disputaciones de Pecato Originali ex Jerem., xvi, 9; - De Ecclesia ejusque Signis, etc. See Weiler, Philippus: Arnold, Historie der königlich-sachsichen Universitat; Jocher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lezikon, v. (B. F.)

Weise, Christian Hermann, a Protestant theologian and philosopher of Germany, was born Aug. 10, 1801, at Leipzig. At first he studied law, but betook himself more and more to the study of Hegelian philosophy, and commenced lecturing in his native place in 1823. In 1828 he was appointed professor of philosophy, but in 1837 he retired to spend his time entirely in literary pursuits. Having thus spent a few years, he again commenced lecturing, and in 1845 he was reappointed in ordinary of philosophy in the same place as Privatdozent on theology. He died Sept. 19, 1866, having been endowed with the doctorate of divinity in 1838 by the Jena University. At first a follower of Hegel, he soon emancipated himself from that system, as may be seen from his Über den Glauben, die Konfirmation u. die Quellen der Mythologie (Leipzig, 1827). Prominent among his works are: - Die Idee Gottes (Dresden, 1883); - Die philosophische Geheimlehre von der Unterhölichkeit (ibid. 1831); - Grundzüge der Metaphysik (Hamburg, 1834); - Die reale, Geschichts- und politisch-kritisch-beobachtet (Leipzig, 1839, 4 vols.); - Ueber die Zukunft der evangel. Kirche (ibid. 1849); - Philosophische Dogmatik (1853-62, 3 vols.); - Christologie Luthers (ibid. 1855); - Die Gelehrtenfrage in ihrem gegenwärtigen Stande (ibid. 1856). After his death were published, Beiträge zur Kirchengeschichte, Briefe über die Unterhölichkeit (Leipzig, 1867). See Seydel, Chr. H. Weise (Leipzig, 1866); Theolog. Universal-Lexikon, s. v.; Zschokl, Bibl. Theol. ii, 1481; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 412, 472. (B. F.)

Weissel, Georg, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born in 1590 at Domna, in Franconia. He was professor of the French language for thirty years, and in 1629 became minister of the newly erected Rosengarten Church at Königberg. He is said to have quickened the poetical powers of others, and especially of Simon Dach, his junior contemporary. He died Aug. 1, 1635. Weissel is said to have written some hymns which are still used in the German Evangelical Church, e. g. Macht hoch die Thür, das Thor macht weii (Eng. transl. in Lyra Germ, i, 10; "Lift up your heads, ye mighty gates"). See Koch, Gesch. d. deutschen Kirchengesch. iii, 180 sq. (B. F.)

Weissenbach, Joseph Anton, a Roman Catholic divine of Germany, was born Oct. 15, 1754, at Bremgarten, in the Canton of Zürich, and died April 11, 1801, at Zürich. He was a religious writer, and in 1773 published Kritisches Verzeichniss der besten Schriften, welche in verschiedenen Sprachen zum Beweis und zur Vertheidigung der Religion herauskommen (Basle, 1784). - De Eloquentia Patrum LXXIII (Augsburg, 1775, 9 vols.). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 380, 882. (B. F.)

Weissenborn, Friedrich Ludwig, a German theologian, was born April 16, 1816, at Karlsruhe, in Mecklenburg-Schwerin. He occupied the philosophical chair at Halle, and afterwards at Marburg, where he died, June 4, 1874. He published, Vorlesungen über Schicksalmacher Dialektik und Dogmatik (Leipzig, 1847, 2 pts.); - Vorlesungen über Psychiatrie und Theosophie (Marburg, 1858). (B. F.)

Weissenborn, Johann, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Nov. 15, 1753, at Small-cald. He studied at Erfurt, in 1770 was appointed pastor of St. Michael's there, was made superintendent in 1772, professor of theology in 1774, and died July 8, 1780. He wrote, Disert. de divinorum: - De Sohls-tiki Obligatione Naturali; - Deus Ponitiorum cu Christi Memoriam Collator: - Detrimentum Fidei et Piaetatis et Dogmata Reformatorum de Absoluto Deere Christum: - De Negotiatione.ie Regnatis Christi Deducenda et Povini Verba 1 Cor. av, 17, 18: - De Divisioni S. Scrip. Praematura et Ignorata, etc. See Moser, Lexikon, 2nd edition, Gottgelehrten; Neubauer, Nach- richt von jetztlebenden Gottgelehrten; Jocher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lezikon, s. v. (B. F.)

Weissenborn, Johann, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Sigtigz, in Thuringia, Nov. 21, 1644. He studied at Jena, was appointed rector of the Evangelical School at Small-cald in 1672, and in 1683 went to Hildesheim as director of the gymnasium there. In 1681 he received a call as pastor to Erfurt, was made doctor of divinity in 1692, and in 1700 followed a call as professor of theology and superintendent to Jena, where he died, April 20 of the same year. As he was a professor of philosophy, under him was placed the author of Schinkalidachs kunstvoll Gelehrte nebst allerhand geistreichen Lebensregeln (1706; new ed. 1716). See Pippin, Mem. Theol. Decas IX (1706); Zueremi Vita Prof. Theol. Jenaensam, p. 252; Koch, Gesch. d. deutschen Kirchengesch. vi, 418 sq. (B. F.)

Weissenborn, Philipp Heinrich, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Feb. 6, 1675, at Vickerb, in Wurttemberg. He studied at Tubingen, was appointed in 1708 teacher at the monastery in Mainzbruck, and in 1708 he was called for the same position to Blaubeuren. In 1722 he received the prelacy in the same school, and in 1737 that of Hirschau. In 1740 he was appointed professor of theology and extraordinary minister to Denkendorf, and died Jan. 6, 1767, as senior of the evangelical church of Wurttemberg. He is the author of some fine hymns which are still in use in Germany, and published in 1718 an edition of Thomas à Kempis's book, The Imitation of Christ, in German rhymes. See Dürr, Der Christenbote, 1847, No. 3, p. 55-28; No. 11, 130 sq.; No. 16, p. 187; No. 25, p. 297; Pegzerm, Gotyk, Porsie (Tub. 1727), p. 280-285; Koch, Gesch. d. deutschen Kirchengesch., v, 79 sq. Weissmann, Ehrhard, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born July 15, 1641, at Weyersberg, in Lower Austria. In 1725 he resigned, and in 1732 became minister of the Church of Krippen, which he abandoned in order to leave his country. He went to Wurttemberg and studied at Tubingen. In 1762 he was appointed pastor at Hirschau; in 1800 special superintendent and pastor at Walblingen; in 1813 he was called to Stuttgart; was made general superintendent and abbot at Maulbronn in 1815; and died Feb. 28, 1817. He wrote Heilige Noven, besides ten vols. on homiletical subjects. See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. ii, 10; Jocher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lezikon, s. v. (B. F.)

Weiss, Georg, a pioneer of the German Reformed Church in Ohio. He was born in Northumberland County, Pa., June 21, 1768. He served as pastor of the German church at Gettysburg. He began his theological studies with Rev. Isaac Gerhart, and finished with Rev. Dr. Samuel Heffenstein in Philadelphia. In 1816 he was appointed by the Synod of the WEITENAUER

German Reformed Church as an exploring missionary to Ohio. In 1817 he settled permanently in Lancaster, Ohio, extending his missionary labors over four counties. He laid the foundation of numerous flourishing churches, being in labors abundant to the end of his life. He died in peace, March 10, 1859. He has a son in the ministry.

WEITENAUER, Ignatz, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany who lived in the last century, is the author of, Trifolium Hebraicum, Chaldaicum, Syriacum, per quos Posisse intra Aliquos Horas cum Hierarchia Antiqua a Sulpicii Canonum & Biblicum, etc. (Augustburg, 1759) — Job, Psalmi, Prov. He also translated into Latin the Old Testament, to which he added annotations. See Furst, Bibl. Jud. iii, 508; Stein Schneider, Bibliog. Handbuch, s. v. (B. P.)

Wejose were fortune-tellers of the barbarous Prussians, who foretold future events from the force of the wind and the direction of the clouds.

WELAND, Jakob Christoph, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born July 18, 1752, at Bremen, and died March 10, 1818, as abbot, general superintendent, and first abbot at Holzminden. He wrote, Uber Wunder nach den Verdiensten unserer Zeit (Gottingen, 1788) — Predigten über die Evangelien (Brunswick, 1813) — Einleitung in die Bibel, nach den Verdiensten unserer Zeit (Hanover, 1812). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 324, 392; ii, 133, 244, 251, 306, 365. (B. P.)

WELAPOTREN or WELAPOTREN, in Hindu mythology, is that giant who came into existence when Siva, in despair, because of his wife’s death, pulled a hair from his head. The giant decapitated the father of this lovely wife, Shakti, as he had been the cause of her death.

WELDA, in German mythology, was one of the most famous fortune-tellers in the 1st century of the Christian era. A maiden born of peasant parents, she is said to have wielded a mighty political influence over her people. Having been brought to Rome as a prisoner, she was carried about in triumph, and received great distinction at the hands of the emperor Vespasian. After her return to the German territory, she was honored as a god.

WELE, in Slavonic mythology, was the foster of the deities after Perun, the supreme god of the Pole. He was also worshipped in Russia as a god of protection, especially of horses and cattle.

WELL, ECCELESIASTICAL. The most ancient examples of Christian baptismal wells are to be found in the Catacomb. Wells occur in crypts, some of which were regarded as possessing miraculous powers, as at Pierefontina; but very possibly they were made in imitation of the baptismal wells of the Catacomb. There was usually a well or fountain in the centre of a cloister garth. There is one highly enriched in the south nave aisle of Strasburg. Probably these wells, as in cathedrals, served to drain water and supply the baptismal font, as in St. Patrick’s, Dublin, and at York, Carlisle, Glasgow, and Winchester. In many of the small Cornish oratories or baptisteries there is a well. St. Keyne’s Well, in Cornwall, was an object of frequent veneration. St. Winifred’s, in North Wales, which was built in 1495, and contains a star-shaped basin, formerly surrounded with stone screens and contained within a vaulted ambulatory under an upper chapel. Wells are found also in many of the ancient Cornish churches of the 5th and 7th centuries, at Marden, Kirk Newton, and Durham. Joubert’s Well at Pottiers is a good medicinal specimen. At Ratisbon, in the south wing of the transept, there is a well with figures of the Saviour and the woman of Samaria. There is also an ancient well in the cloister of Aries. St. Alldhelm’s Well at Shepton Mallet, St. Chad’s at Lichfield, St. Julian’s at Wellow, Somerset, St. Thomas’s at Canterbury, and numerous others in Wales are still regarded as possessing medicinal virtues. Throughout all Christendom such wells exist, and rules concerning them have been made from time to time by canonical decrees, because of abuses which arose in past ages. They were forbidden to be worshipped without the bishop’s authority in 960, 1016, and 1102. In 950 they were made sanitary. Round them were frith-gardens, for sanctuary, which were reputed holy ground. They were determined as holy by the diocesan, by canons passed in 960 and 1102, and abuses were condemned by the Synod of Winchester in 1806. See Lee, Gloss. of Liturgy, and Eccles. Terms, s. v.; Walcot, Sacred Arch. s. v.

WELLER, Hieronymus, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Sept. 5, 1499, at Freyburg. He studied at Wittenberg, where he became intimately acquainted with Luther. In 1535 he took the degree of doctor of divinity, and in 1539 was appointed superintendent at Freyburg, where he died, March 20, 1572. He wrote commentaries on the books of Samuel, Kings, Job; on the epistles to the Ephesians, Philippians, Thessalonians; on Peter and the first of John. He also wrote Explicationes in Epistolae et Evangelia Dominui et Ecce Dominus Novi Testamenti — De Pauentura Dominii Nustri Jesu Christi; besides homiletical, ascetical, and exegetical works in German. See Frer, Theatri Eruditorum; Acta Eruditorum Latina; Jochen, Allgemeines gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Winer, Handb. der theol. Lit. ii, 58. (B. P.)

WELLER, Jakob, a Protestant divine of Germany, was born Dec. 5, 1602, at Neukirchen. In 1636 he was appointed professor of Oriental languages at Wittenberg; in 1640 superintendent at Brunswick; and in 1616 first court preacher and church councilor at Dresden, where he died, July 16, 1664. He wrote, Adnotationes in Epist. Pauli ad Romanos ... Collectae a J. Schindlero (Brunswick, 1654) — Syriacum Questio-Biblia-Hebreorum-Syrarum (Wittenberg, 1673) — De Lingua Hebraica Ambiguatuti contra Han- tum (ibid. 1631) — Disputation AnPenta Hebr. Wellesley, Gerald Valerian, an Anglican prelate, was born in 1805. He graduated from Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1880; held the rectory of Strathfieldsaye, Hanta, from 1886 till 1855; became domestic chaplain to the queen in 1849; dean of Windsor in 1854; and died Sept. 18, 1882.

Wellesley, Henry, D.D., an English clergyman, a natural son of Richard Colley Wellesley (marquis Wellesley) and Milly. H. G. Holand, was born in 1792; graduated at Christ Church, Oxford, in 1816; became rector of Woodmancote, Hurst Monceaux, in Sussex; was appointed principal of New Inn Hall, Oxford, in 1842; became preacher to the University of Oxford; curator of the Bodleian Library, University Galleries, and the college of his benefaction; and died Jan. 11, 1866. He was the author of, Anthologia Polyglotta; or, A Selection of Versions in Various Languages, chief from the Greek Anthology (1849);—and Stray Notes on Shakespeare (1865). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, ii. 95.

Wellesmen (or Willammen), in Hindu mythology, was one of the two wives of Kartikeyathmanes. The other name is Devanesi, who was the daughter of Indra. Statues of both are erected in the temple of this god.

Well-naids, in Norse mythology, were daughters of Anger and Ran. They swim upon the stormy sea around their mother, and appear with white veils to assist those drowned out of the wild wave, and lay the drowned down in the lap of their mother. Their names are Himingafisa, Dufa, Hildugudhela, Hefring, Udur, Raun, Bygilin, Drobon, and Kolga.

Wells of Pity, "the five wounds of Christ, distilling his sacred blood—for grace, from the right foot; for ghostly comfort, from the left foot; for wisdom, from the right hand; for money, from the left hand; and from the heart, for everlasting life—each represented by a drop of blood in rich ruby glass, issuing from a gash which bears a golden crown, as in a pane of Perpendicular glass at Sidmouth."

Wells, Edward Livington, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, began his regular ministry in 1860, as pastor of the Church of Our Saviour, Plainville, Conn.; the following year became rector of Calvary Church, Louisville, Ky.; in 1865 went to Pittsfield, Mass., as rector of St. Stephen's Church, and remained there until 1871, when he became rector of Trinity Church, Southport, Conn. and there had resided until 1879, part of the time without charge, and afterwards as minister of St. John's Church, New Milford, where he died, Aug. 7, 1880, aged forty-six years. See Whittaker, Almanac and Directory, 1881, p. 173.

Wells, Eleanora Mather Porter, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in 1798, being a descendant of Thomas Wells, who had come to Salem with Winthrop and Wilson in 1629. He entered the ministry in 1825, and preached at Plymouth, Calais, and Bangor, Me. In 1826 he was ordained a deacon by bishop Brownell, of Connecticut, and was professionally engaged for brief periods at more than a dozen places in New England. His special vocation, however, was found when he was placed in charge of the House of Reformation for Juvenile Offenders at Boston, and also became superintendent of St. Stephen's House. He was a great philanthropic city missionary, and up to the time of his death, which occurred in Boston, Dec. 1, 1876, he was "in labors more abundant." (W. P. S.)

Wells, Henry, a distinguished philanthropist, was born in New Hampshire in 1805. He was brought by his parents when a child to Central New York. Without the advantages of an early education, but with a purpose fixed within him, he began his career as an expressman; his first route being from Albany to Buffalo, at which time he carried all the matter in a carpet-bag himself, and gave personal attention to its delivery. His business gradually prospered, and he increased it as circumstances permitted. Such was its wonderful progress that he organized a company, under the title of "The American Express Company," which subsequently bore the name of "Wells, Fargo & Co." Their business increased to such an extent that it embraced the whole country from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and from Canada to Mexico and across the ocean. The reward of his enterprise and prudence was his great fortune. With its avails he purchased a beautiful property on the banks of the Cayuga Lake, at Aurora, N. Y., and there erected a palatial residence, which he filled with all the comforts and luxuries of art. In the retirement of his body, a rural home, he conceived the idea of erecting and funding an institution for the higher education of young women. By the side of his own mansion he laid off a park embracing woodland, hill, and plain, and in the middle of it he erected a splendid brick edifice, with all the appointments of a moneyed gentleman. The carrying-out of the great object he had in view. This magnificent edifice, with the entire property, was conveyed by deed as a free gift to a board of trustees, who gave it the name of "Wells College." A board of instructors was organized, and the college sprang rapidly into high repute. Its halls were soon filled, and students flocked to it from all parts, many of them the daughters of gentlemen with whom Mr. Wells had been associated in business. Its library and cabinets were made rich by contributions of his friends. The Hon. C. B. Morse of Aurora, added the munificent gift of $100,000 to the endowment of the institution, and is about to erect another important building for the college.

On Nov. 9, 1878, Mr. Wells sailed for Glasgow, and reached there on the 19th. He was too far enfeebled to proceed farther, and after lingering for a few weeks, his active, eventful, and useful life closed, Dec. 10, 1878. (W. P. S.)

Wells, Horatio T., LL.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was head master of the English department in Burlington College, N. J., in 1839, and the following year acting rector of the college; in 1842 was principal of a boys' school in Andalusia, Pa., which institution, in 1860, became known as Andalusia College. Mr. Wells was elected president and professor of English literature and commercial law, and remained at the head of the college until his death, in December, 1871. See Prot. Educ. Almanac, 1842, p. 183.

Wells, William, D.D., an English Unitarian minister, who afterwards emigrated to America, was born at Bignessedale, Bedfordshire, in 1744. He was educated at the Academy of Devonshire; became minister at Bronsgrove, Worcestershire, in 1770; was a friend to the American Revolution; in 1776 he contracted inoculation for small-pox among his poor neighbors, attending some thirteen hundred cases; removed to America, arriving in Boston with his family, June 12, 1783; settled on a farm at Brattleborough, Vi., in 1794, residing there and preaching to the Society in the town until his death, which occurred Dec. 27, 1827. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 234 sq.

Wells, Calvinistic Methodist, a considerable body of Methodists, chiefly in Wales, which dates its origin from 1735, sprang from the labors of Mr. Howel Harris, of Trevecce, in Brecknockshire. This young man had gone to Oxford to prepare for the ministry of the Church of England; but, becoming disgusted with the immorality and gross carelessness of that place, he returned home and began to visit from house to house, warning people to flee from the wrath to come. He soon began to preach in public. Crowds flocked to hear him. When he was twenty, he began his career as an evangelist. He appointed meetings for religious conversation in several places; hence arose those private societies which form a prominent part of the arrangements of this body. His labors were crowned with extraordinary success, notwithstanding the opposition of the regular clergy; and in 1736, after only four years of effort, he had established as many as three hundred societies in the south of Wales. Mr. Harris was greatly aided by the Rev. Thomas Price, of Llanegryn, Caernarvonshire, who attracted large crowds by his eloquence. Several pious members of the Establishment seceded and joined the Methodists: a considerable band of itinerant missionaries was formed; a most precious revival spread among the different districts of institutions; and the new sect grew so popular that in seven years from its commencement few if any but ten ministers of the Church of England had joined it. The first chapel built by the Welsh Calvinistic Methodists was erected at Builth, Breconshire, in 1747. In the following four years more were built in Montgomeryshire. The Church made rapid progress in the south of Wales, but was greatly hindered in the north. It was about this time that the Rev. Thomas Charles began his labors. He lived at Bala, Merionethshire, and it is to his exertions and influence that these societies are chiefdy indebted for their prosperity. He was converted under the preaching of Mr. Rowland, and, after the usual preparation, entered the ministry of the Church of England. But in 1784 he decided to leave the Established Church and join the Methodists, where he could enjoy greater latitude in his labors. He found the principality in a deplorable condition on account of the ignorance and degradation of the people. A Bible could scarcely be found in any of the cottages of the peasantry, and in some parishes very few were able to read it. He therefore set about to enlighten the people in the rudiments of learning and religion. He established for this purpose what he called circulating schools, that is, schools which might be removed from one place to another at the end of a definite period, any nine or twelve months. He induced a few friends to set up a subscription on foot to pay the wages of a teacher, who was to be moved circuitously from one place to another, to instruct the poor in reading, and in the first principles of Christianity by catechising them. "This work was begun in 1786 with only one teacher. Others were added as the funds increased, until they numbered twenty.
At first he instructed the teachers himself, and these in turn instructed others. In this manner many thousands were instructed, and the good seed thus sown produced abundant fruit, religious awakenings occurring in many places where the teachers had labored. In 1792 a religious periodical was started by Mr. Charles, entitled The Spiritual Treasury, the design of which was to supply the people thus instructed with religious reading.
Hitherto, Bibles in the vernacular had been very scarce, and the want was met by the formation of the British and Foreign Bible Society in 1804. In association, Welsh Bibles and Testaments were scattered throughout the principality, and eagerly received.

In the organization of the Welsh Calvinistic Methodist Society Mr. Charles took an active and prominent part. At an association held at Bala in 1782, he drew up a set of Rules for Conducting the Quarterly Meetings of the North Wales Association, consisting of the preachers and leaders; and these Rules form the basis of the present system of Church government of the whole society. In 1803 Rules of Discipline were first published, laying down the order and form of Church government and discipline. To these were added, in 1811, several regulations designed to render the organization, in its membership and ministry, permanently independent of the Established Church.

In 1829 they adopted and published a Confession of Faith, which was unanimously agreed upon at the associations of Aberystwyth and Bala. The doctrines th-sus avowed are decidedly Calvinistic, and accord with the Thirty-nine Articles and the Westminster Confession; and the main points of doctrine and practice.
Their Church government is neither Episcopal, on the one hand, nor Congregational, on the other, but approaches more nearly the Presbyterian form. The pri-ivate societies are subordinate to the monthly meetings, and these again to the quarterly associations, at which the general business of the body is transacted. Their preachers in most cases earn their living by the ministry, and while of limited education, they are generally dependent on some secular employment for their support. Of late years they have turned their attention towards the importance of an educated ministry. Accordingly, in 1837, a college for the purpose of training theological students was established at Bala, and in 1842 another at Trevooca.
The ministers of the Connection are selected by the private societies, and reported to the monthly meetings, which examine them as to their qualifications, and permit them to begin on trial. After they have preached for five years, and more on trial, if they are qualified, they are ordained to administer the sacra-cements, and the ordination takes place at the quarterly associations. The preachers are expected each to itinerate in a particular county; but generally once in a year they undertake a missionary tour to different parts of Wales, when they preach twice every day, each time in a different chapel. Their remuneration is derived from the monthly pence contributed by the members of each congregation; out of which a small sum is given to them after every sermon; but some have a stated stipend given to them.

The Welsh Calvinistic Methodists have about 1000 chapels and about 80,000 communicants, 60,000 of whom are in Wales and 4000 in America, the rest principally in England.

In 1840 they formed an association for sending missionaries to the heathen, and towards the end of the same year a mission was commenced among one of the hill tribes in the northeast part of Bengal. They have also a mission-station in Brittany, France, the language of that portion being a sister dialect of the Welsh; and they have, besides, a mission in Patiala.
The operations of the home mission of this denomination are carried on among the English population inhabiting the borders between England and Wales.
There are several societies in England belonging to the Connection—for example, in London, Liverpool, Manchester, Bristol, Chester, Shrewsbury, etc.—whose worship, public and private, is performed in the Welsh language. There is also a small congregation among the Welsh miners of Lanarkshire, Scotland, who have begun preaching in their own language. In some parts of Wales, and on the borders of England where the English language is most prevalent, worship is conducted in that tongue.

Welsh Version. The first edition of the New Test, was printed in London in 1567, in consequence of a law enacted by Parliament in 1562. The translation was made by William Badeley, assistant to Richard Huet, a chancellor of St. David's, and Dr. Richard Davies, bishop of the same place. In 1588 the entire Bible was given to the Welsh people, the Old Test, being translated by Dr. W. Morgan, afterwards bishop of St. Asaph, with the aid of several eminent scholars, who also revised Salisbury's version of the New Test. A new and revised edition was prepared by Dr. R. Parry, successor to the see of St. Asaph, and published in 1620. This dition was held in such high estimation that it has been used as the text of all succeeding editions. Being in folio, a second edition was issued in 1630, which,
besides the Old and New Tests, contained the Apocrypha,
the Book of Common Prayer, and a metrical version of the Psalms; the latter, which is still used in the Welsh churches, was prepared by Pryse, archdeacon of Merioneth. Of the editions of the whole Bible which have appeared from time to time we mention the following:

1664—sometimes called Cromwell's Bible.
1675—with corrections by the Rev. S. Hughes.
1699—published by the Rev. J. Jones, 1699—printed at Oxford for the use of churches, in Roman characters, sometimes called Bishop Lloyd's Bible.
1718—printed at London, often called Moore's Williams's Bible.
duty of missionary work; but the orthodox superintendent Urinating, at Ratisbon, dismissed him mockingly. In the same year (1664) Welts went to Surinam to preach the Gospel there, which he did until his death. This was the beginning of evangelical missions. See Nicholls, Geschichte der lutherischen Mission (Erlangen, 1871), p. 22 sq.; Theol. Universal-Lexikon, v. (B. P.)

Wen is the inaccurate rendering in the A. V. of 22, yôbbîd (on Lev. xxix, 22), which means forcing with a running sore; spoken of a diseased flock.

Wenezelaus (Wenzel, or Wenzelav). St., a prince of Bohemia, son of Vratislav and Drahomira, was murdered at the beginning of the 10th century. His education was intrusted to his grandmother Ludmilla, a devoted Christian; and he thus received a training which led him to become a pious Christian, and follow the course of a clergyman more than that of a prince. His brother Boleslaus (or Bolzalav) was a fierce pagan; and, in conjunction with his mother, also a pagan, secured a visit from him, and slew him at the foot of the altar while engaged in prayer, Sept. 28, 935. Weneze-laus has been the subject of many works of art. See Jameson, Legends of the Monastic Orders, p. 175 sq.; Neander, Hist. of the Church, iii. 922.

Wendelin (or Wandelin); a saint of the 7th century, was born on October 20, and who is said to have been of Scottish family. He established himself as a hermit in a forest in the neighborhood of Treves, and afterwards as a hermit in the late principality of Lichtenberg. His fidelity in this service led the monks of Tholey on the Saar to elect him their prior. The circumstances of his life and career are to be found recorded solely in the Acta SS. Bull. Juli, vi, 171, and similar legendary depositories. Comp. Vogt, Rhrm. Gesch. u. Sagen, i. 285 sq.; Retberg, Kirchengesch. Deutschlands, i. 480; Bierlech, Die Alten in Natur u. Wendelin, Marcus Friedrich, a theologian of the Reformed scholastic school in the 17th century, was born near Heidelberg in 1584, and after graduation, presumably at the university of that town, became tutor of the princes of Anhalt-Desaun, and in 1611 rector of the gymnasium of Zerbst. He retained the latter position during a period of forty-one years, and died there on Aug. 7, 1652. He composed a number of textbooks which bear witness to the breadth of his culture; but his most important works were of a theological character. Among them were, Compendium Christianae Theologiae (1648) — Christianae Theologiae Systema Majus (posthumously published, Frankf. 1566 and 1677). — Exercitationes Theol. contr. Jo. Jerdard. den Hauver: — and Collatio Inscrut. Reformatorem et Liberaorumus (Cassel, 1660). He avoided abstract discussions, assumed only simple and evident premises, made only a formal use of dialectics. His method was to discuss the contents of the dogma itself instead of an extraneous addition of Aristotelian tenets to the doctrine. The arrangement of his material and the deter-mation of the problems presented to his mind gave vividness to his sentences. His Chiaro. Theat. Theol. was translated into Dutch and Hungarian. See Wenden-lin's Works; Becmann, A Akadische Historie; Jocher, Allgemeine Gelehrten-Lexikon; Herzog, Real-Encyk., v. (B. P.)

Wendt (von, wendt), a Slavic people who as early as the 6th century occupied the north and east of Germany, from the Elbe along the coast of the Baltic to the Vistula, and as far south as Bohemia. They were divided into several small tribes, which were sucsessively subdued by the Germans, and either exterminiated or Germanized. Charlemagne drove them back towards the Vistula, and by the close of the 13th century his successors in Germany had almost completed the work of extirpation. In the 16th century remnants
For a number of years he acted as professor of Oriental languages at the Carolinum and Lyceum of his native place. In 1786 he was called as professor of theology to Marburg, where he died, Nov. 30, 1792. Werndandi (Present), in Scandinavian mythology, was one of the three deities of fate. See Unn.

Werder, Peter, a Baptist preacher, was born in 1726, and ordained in May, 1751, at Warwick, R. I. The first nineteen years of his ministry were spent in that vicinity. He removed in 1770 to a Rhode Island settlement, then known as New Providence Grant, within the present limits of Cheshire, Mass., where he labored for thirty-eight years, preaching his last sermon on the Sunday before his death, Feb. 21, 1808. He was an influential and controversial preacher, and as a father among the churches of his faith in Western Massachusetts. See Mass. Bapt. Mag. ii. 948.

Wermember, a learned Swiss monk of the 9th century, was born at Coira, studied at Fulda under Rabanus Maurus, and became teacher in the Monastery of St. Gall, where he died, May 24 (or 29), 898. He was the author of numerous commentaries, and a commentary, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Werenfsels, Samuel, a Swiss theologian, was the son of the antiquities of Basle, Peter Werenfsels, and was born March 1, 1657. He was educated at Basle, Zurich, Berne, Lausanne, and Geneva; became professor of Greek at Basle; and afterwards undertook an extended scientific tour through Holland and North Germany. On his return he received the chair of rhetoric at Basle. He was himself an orator, and sought to develop the oratorical faculty in his pupils, encouraging them to cultivate naturalness and simplicity of manner and style, together with elegance of diction. He regarded disputatiousness as a malady having its root in moral conditions, as pride, etc., and for its cure he recommended a universal lexicon containing exact definitions of all scientific conceptions. In 1696 Werenfsels became a theologian of the Basle, receiving the charge of dogmas and polities, and in the same year received the doctor's degree. He interpreted his duty in the new position as having less to do with the anticipated heresies of bygone ages than with the perverse tendencies of the time in which he lived, and as involving the effort of restraining theological zeal within its proper limits. In these opinions he had the sympathy and co-operation of Friedrich Ostervald (q. v.) and Alphonse Turrlet (q. v.), with whom he became acquainted at this time, and with whom he formed the so-called theological triumvirate of his day. He also entered into relations with the learned Parisian Benedictine Montfaucon, though by no means indifferent: as respects the profound questions at issue between Romanism and Protestantism. In 1708 he was promoted to the chair of Old-Test. exegesis. In this office he devoted himself to an attack on the criticism of the Psalms, and introduced a new study into the curriculum of the school—that of hermeneutics. His principles of interpretation were altogether those which were subsequently brought to general recognition and acceptance, viz. the principles of the grammatical-historical method. In 1711 he was sent for as preacher to the Church, and became very popular, though obliged to speak in an acquired tongue. His sermons were printed and translated into Dutch and German. In the same year he advanced to the foremost theological professorship in the university—that of New-Test. exegesis—and continued to hold that office until his death, Dígite por Google
June 1, 1740. He rejected a call to the University of Franeker, secured for him through the intervention of Vitringa, but accepted the honor of membership in the British Society for the Spread of the Gospel in Foreign Lands and in the "Berlin Scientific Association.

No striking events occurred in the life of Werenfels by which he might secure a name, nor did he compose any important and epochal theological work. His Opuscules, a secure, containing collection of treatises on different exegetical and doctrinal subjects which are still discerning. His spirit was irenic, and his labors were put forth in constant endeavors to promote honorable fraternity among Christians. He felt assured that the root of evil is not in the head, but in the heart. As a teacher, he combined practical instruction with theoretical, that he might give a higher fitness to the young men who came under his care. In the evening of his life an effort was made to compel Werenfels to assist in the endeavor to degrade the learned and meritorious Wetzlar from the ministry on account of alleged heretodoxy. He consequently abstained himself from the sessions of the theological court, and ultimately withdrew from the academical life to privacy.

No suitable biography of Werenfels has yet been prepared, and the few grains of information scattered through his Opuscules have not been collected. See the Athek. Raur. p. 57 sq.; Hanhart, Erinnerungen am Sam. Werenfels, in Pastor wisensch. Zeitschr. 1824, p. 22; and Hagenbach, Programm, 1860.—Herzog, Reel-Encyklop. a.v.

Verfo, Adrian van der, an eminent Dutch painter, was born at Kralingen- Amstel, near Rotterdam, in 1659. He studied under Cornelius Piccolto for two years, and under Egzon van der Neer during the next four. At the age of eighteen he commenced his career as a painter at Rotterdam, and met with great encouragement. He was commissioned by the elector-palatine to paint a picture of the Judgment of Solomon and his own portrait. After finishing these works he went to Dusseldorf, where the elector desired to retain him in his service; but he agreed to paint for him six months of the year, and give the other six to his own engagements. He afterwards removed to the Hague and many valuable presents, and continued in his service until the death of his royal patron, in 1717. Among his pictures in the Dusseldorf Gallery is a life-size Magdalene, painted as a companion-piece to the St. John of Richter, in the Hague, and admired by critics and admirers, as inferior to that work. He carried his finishing to a very high pitch, and as a consequence his works are rare and command a high price. He died in 1722.

Wernin, in Persian mythology, was an evil dev, placed by Ahriman against Ormuzd, and designed to hinder the falling of rain, and thus also the fruitfulness of the earth.

Werkmeister, Benedict Maria von, a Roman Catholic theologian and representative of the so-called Josephinism or reformatory tendency in his Church, was born at Flinsen, in Upper Sibizia, Oct. 22, 1745, and became a Benedictine monk in 1765. By direction of his abbot he studied theology at Benedictbeuren, making Oriental languages and exegesis his principal subjects, and finding in father Agidius Bart- scher a teacher who developed in him the faculty for independent research which he naturally possessed. He so discovered that ethics, which appeared to him to be of primary importance, was altogether overlooked by theologians in their eagerness to employ their wits upon the mysterious. He could not be satisfied with the schemes of probabilists or probabilist, of liberalists or rigorists, among the Roman teachers of ethics, and he therefore set out to seek for a guide enshrined in the lectures of the Protestants Gellett and Mosheim, and in the Life of Jesus by Hess.

In 1789 Werkmeister became a priest and superintendent of novices at Neresheim, the latter post being associated with that of professor of philosophy. He became a member of a society known to have been formed about 1767, and which was not suppressed until 1782. He was a professor of canon law, and a librarian. Duke Charles of Württemberg made Werkmeister his court preacher in 1784, and, being a highly enlightened Roman Catholic, permitted him to both preach and administer the rituals of his Church as he might prefer. A fruit of this liberty is presented to view in the Grusenburgnee des angehörenten Geistlichen, etc., for the duet vocal, solo, which contains a large number of Protestant hymns and tunes, and is wholly in keeping with the general style of hymnology and liturgy in that time.

Physical ailments began to trouble Werkmeister seriously in 1787, and to make it difficult and ultimately impossible for him to preach; and as a result he became secretary to the prelate of the empire; archivist and librarian at Neresheim; and afterwards resumed his duties as professor of philosophy at Freising, and added to them those of a director of the curriculum, of a professor of canon law, and a librarian. den, where he connected himself with the Lutheran Missionary Society. In 1842 he again returned to Prussia, and in 1844 he became pastor of the Lutheran congregation at Erfurt, and died Dec. 20, 1872. Werner'skirch was very active in behalf of Christian missions, and the Lutheran Missionary Society in Thuringia is the fruit of his labor. (B. I.)

Wernersdorf, Ernst Friedrich, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Dec. 18, 1718, at Wittenberg. He studied theology and philosophy at Leipsic, where he was made magister in 1742, and after presenting his dissertation De Septimia Zenoebis, Palmyrenorum Augustis (ibid. 1744), was allowed to lecture at the university. In 1746 he was made, and in 1749 he resigned, professor of theology, and opened his lectures with an oration De Novis Historiarum Cognitionum cum Omnibus Philosophiae Ambitus. In 1752 he was appointed to the chair of Christian antiquities, and presented on this occasion a dissertation, De Quinquagenario Persae Paschali. Four years later, in 1756, he was called to Wittenberg as professor of theology, where he died, May 7, 1782. Wernersdorf was a very learned man and quite at home in patristic literature, from which, especially from the writings of Ignatius, Eusebius, Tertullian, he explained the Christian antiquities and older ecclesiastical usages which, in the course of time, had either entirely disappeared or received another form. This subject he treated in dissertations like De Quinquagenario Persae Paschali (1752) — De Paschate Annoeicato (1760) — De Sacerdotio Latinos Legem et Institutionem (1761) — De Veterum Ecclesiae Romanae Festae Anni Trinitatis, etc.

Wurthmun Bible designates a German version of the Pentateuch, which excited great interest at the time of its first appearing (Easter, 1755), but has now lost whatever importance it may have heretofore possessed. It has not even the merit of being rare. It is, as its title indicates, the first volume of an intended issue of the whole Bible, and contains a preface of forty-eight pages, followed by ten hundred and forty pages of subject-matter, in small quarto. The preface sets forth the purpose of the author to show that the questions of the Jesuits are not merely with respect to the Latin versions, and that the church authorities are to some extent warranted, and that the current conception of their authority rests largely upon prejudice and unscientific notions; and his further purpose to conform the statements of the Scriptures to the requirements of the human understanding, aided in this work by the literary style of the story and the evidence of sound reason, and also to popularize the language of the Bible more than was done by Luther's version. The work is a simple product of vulgar rationalism, evincing in its features the marks of a half-educated, general reader, and is based entirely on the part of its author, who was Johann Lorenz Schmidt, in 1725 and afterwards tutor in the family of Count Löwenstein, and a graduate of Jena. He spent years in the preparation of the book, and submitted it, with varying result, to different scholars. It was printed in secret and published anonymously, and on its appearance excited a controversy which led to the issue of an imperial mandate, Jan. 15, 1737, ordering its confiscation and the apprehension of its author. Schmidt was imprisoned a whole year before the author was allowed to publish his book and was only seen by his friends. On his release he had fled to Hamburg, where he was again arrested and committed to prison. He was released in 1738 but continued to write under a pseudonym. Schmidt published a collection of writings in support of or in opposition to the Wurttemberg Bible, which contains reviews, polemical pamphlets, and his own replies (429 pages, 4to). Schmidt was also involved in the printing and distribution of materials that were critical of the church. He was active in the development of printing presses and was known for his contributions to the field of typography.

WESSENBURG, IGNAZ HEMLECH, Barten for, was a prominent liberal among the prelates in the Roman Church of Germany, and also a theological writer and a participant in civil affairs. He was born at Dresden, Nov. 4, 1721. His education, being largely under the direction of Jesuits, was defective to a degree that impaired his efficiency as a scholar while he lived. He visited the schools at Augsburg, Dillingen, Wurzburg, and Vienna, nowhere finding the assistance which his active, questioning intellect demanded, and eventually concluded that the use of the Latin language and the study of art, for which latter employment the society of Vienna afforded opportunity. He had come into the possession of benefits as early as 1792, and to one of them, at Constance, he retired when the unpatriotic policy of the state in the closing years of the century drove him from the capital in disgust. In 1792 he published at Zurich a poetical epitaph on the corruption of manners in Germany. In 1800, Dalberg (q.v.) called Wessobrunn to be his vicar in the diocese of Constance, and he entered on the duties of the place with enthusiasm. He regarded with particular affairs of the diocese with a spirit which elicited the commendation of the pope himself. He sought to help his clergy to a more systematic and thorough culture, and to stimulate it to greater activity, giving to the enterprise his personal efforts and reorganizing the seminary at Meiningen in his behalf. He also sent individual clergymen to Pestalozzi, that they might become more practically acquainted with the work of educating the young, and established teachers' seminaries within his own diocese. By such measures he not only contributed materially to the prosperity of his see, but also arrayed against himself the opposition of Rome, which was yet further intensified by his attempts to introduce the German language into the liturgy, and to place Es's New Testament and Schmid's Biblische Geschichte in the schools as text-books. The nunneries at Luzern, Tschert, a. a. a. a. a. a. in taking Switzerland from under the jurisdiction of Constance, in 1817 Wessobrunn was unanimously chosen to succeed Dalberg as bishop of Constance, having previously been coadjutor to that prelate; but the election was set aside at Rome in the most unqualified manner, and when Wessobrunn went to Rome to plead his cause, he was not granted audience of the pope. The grand-duke Charles of Baden laid the matter before the German Diet, but without effect, and the next duke, Louis (1818), was not favorably disposed towards Wessobrunn. On the death of the liberal bishop of Freiburg, the local clergy proposed Wessobrunn as its successor, but the government this time refused its assent as decidedly as the curia had done in the former instance. The king of Wurttemberg next desired him to fill the episcopal chair of Rottenburg, without being able to secure the assent of Rome. In 1819 a new career opened before Wessobrunn through his election to the Chambers of Baden, in which he did not make his appearance during the next thirteen years, and in which he was a most zealous, eloquent, and influential representative of liberalism in its best and purest form. In 1833 he retired to private life, devoting his declining years to literary occupations and to the collection of works of art. His circle of friends was very wide, and his influence over them very strong. Queen Hortense, who resided near Constance, was among his friends, and it was her influence which induced Louis Napoleon in 1880 to voluntarily relieve Switzerland of the embarrassment occasioned by the demand of King Louis Philippe for his banishment by forsaking the country. He died Aug. 6, 1860. His leading ideas as a Churchman had occasioned the erection of a German National Catholic Church, and a re-stirvigation of Church councils. His principal work was written with an eye to the latter subject. It is entitled Die grossen Kirchen- satzungen, des 15. u. 16. Jahrhunderts (Constance, 1840, 4 vols.), and is considered of some value. His other works are of but little importance, because they lack an adequate basis in historical research. See Wessobrunn's writings in the Fr. F. T. v. Wessobrunn (Wagner, 1862); Baur, Kirchengesch. d. 15. Jahrhunderts, p. 147 sq.; Herzog, Real-Encykl. s. v.

Wessobrunn Prayer (Wessobrunner Gebet). Wessobrunn is a Bavarian village in which, according to documentary evidence, duke Thassilo established a monastery in 760; others say 740. Certain remnants of the studies of the monks there domiciled, upon geography, weights and measures, and also certain important glances of the 8th century, have been preserved, and particularly this prayer, which exists in a codex now at Munich, and which antiquarians assign to the 8th century. The entire piece, as given in Wackenroder's Abhandlungen, 5d ed. p. 61, reads:

Reitbarg argues (ii, 781) from the superscription to the first part of the piece (Die Poetä) that it was taken from some other source by the author, who appended to it the second part containing his prayer for faith and strength. Part first seems to be designed for a hymn of the office of St. Michael, however, is not limited beyond the stage of God's premonitory existence. Part second is almost word for word the same as a prayer in St.
Emmerau's manuscript, with Latin translation, which was closed in 821. Grimm ("Geschichte d. deutschen Sprach", p. 484 sq.) states that the dialect in which the entire piece is written is genuine Old-German.

Westminster, Councils of (Concilia West- monasteriacis). Westminster is a city of England, county of Middlesex, forming the west part of London, having on the south and west Chelsea and Kensington, on the north the Marylebone, and on the east the Thames. In 1871 the population was 246,006. It contains numerous magnificent public buildings, and is the seat of many important historic events. Several ecclesiastical councils have been held there.

1. Was held about 607, by archbishop Lanfranc, in the presence of William I, in which Wulstan, bishop of Worcester, who alone of the Saxon bishops had withstood William, was deprived, upon the plea of want of learning. When he found that he was to be stripped of his episcopal vestments, he boldly exclaimed to Wil- liam, "You are a better man than thee; to him I will restore them." Whereupon he went to the tomb of Edward the Confessor, who had advanced him to his see, and there taking off his vestments he laid them down, and struck his pastoral staff so deep into the stone that, as the legend states, no human force could draw it out. This miracle, or his deserved reputation for sanctity, produced a revision of the sentence of de- privation, and he retained his bishopric. See Johnson, "Preface to Lanfranc's Canons at Winchester"; Wilkins, Concil. i. 367; Wharton, "Anglia Sacra", ii. 225.

2. Held in 1102, in St. Peter's Church, on the west side of London," i.e. at Westminster — Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury, and Gerard of York, being present, with eleven other bishops, and some abbots. In this synod, three great abbots were deposed for simony, three not yet consecrated were turned out of their abbeys, and three others deprived for other crimes. Roger the king's chancellor was consecrated to the see of Salisbury, and Roger the king's lorder to Hereford. Twenty-nine canons were published.

1. Forbids bishops to keep secular courts of pleas, and to apparel themselves like laymen.
2. Forbids to let archdeaconies to farm.
3. Enacts that archdeacon must be deacon.
4. Prohibits that no priest, monk, or canon shall marry, or retain his wife if married. Enacts the same with regard to subdeacons who have married after profession of chastity.
5. Declares that a priest guilty of fornication is not a lawful priest, and forbids him to celebrate mass.
6. Declares that no one may be ordained deacon, or to any higher order, except he profess chastity.
7. Orders that the sons of priests be not heirs to their fathers' churches.
8. Orders that no clergyman be a judge in a case of blood.
9. Orders that priests go not to drinking-boots, but drink "to pege."
10. Orders that their clothes be all of one color, and the color of their plate.
11. Orders monks or clerks who have forsaken their order, shall not be excommunicated.
12. Orders that the tenure of clerks be visible.
13. Orders that tithes be paid to the Church only.
14. Prohibits any churchmen or priests.
15. Forbids to build new chapels without the bishop's consent.
16. Forbids to consecrate new churches until all things necessary for it, and the priest, have been provided.
17. Forbids abbots to create knights; orders them to eat and sleep in the same bed with their dependants.
18. Forbids monks to enjoin penance except in certain cases.
19. Forbids monks to be godfathers, or nuns godmoth- ers.
20. Forbids monks to hire farms.
21. Forbids monks to accept of the Improprations of churches without the bishop's consent, and further for- bids them to reduce or to poverty those who minis- ter in their parishes.
22. Declares marriages of marriage made without wit- nesses to be null, if either party deny them.
23. Orders that those who have hair be clipped, so that their ears or nose shall not be visible.
24. Forbids those who are related within the seventh degree to marry.
25. Forbids to defraud the priest of his dues by holding a corpse for burial to another parish.
26. Forbids to attribute reverence or sanctity to a dead body, or fountains, etc., without the bishop's authority.
27. Forbids to sell men like beasts, as had hitherto been done in England.
28. Anathematises persons guilty of certain horrible sins of uncleanness.
29. Orders any application of the above excommunication in all churches every Sunday.

See Johnson, "Eccles. Canons", A.D. 1102; Wilkins, Concil. i. 382.

11. Was held Jan. 18, 1126. Otto, the pope's nuncio, was present, and read a bull of Honorius containing the same proposition which the legate had made to the French clergy assembled at Bourges in November, 1225, viz., that in every cathedral church the pope should nominate to two prebends and in every monastery to two places. This was the start of a series of papal bulls coming to any decision. See Mansi, Concil. xi. 303.

11. Was held Sept. 9, 1126, by William Corbell, arch- bishop of Canterbury—John de Cremona, legate from Honorius II, presiding. Thurstan, archbishop of York, and about twenty bishops, forty abbots, and an innume- rable assembly of clergy and people, were present. Seventeen canons were published.

1. Forbids simony.
2. Forbids to charge anything for chrism, oil, baptism, visiting and anointing the sick, communion, and burial.
3. Forbids to demand cope, carpet, towel, or basin at the consecration of bishops, or churches, or blessing of abbots.
4. Forbids investiture at the hands of lay persons.
5. Orders any one to challenge a church or benefice by inheritance, and to appoint a successor. Pius lx. xiii, 14, 13 is quoted.
6. Deprives beneficed clerks who refused to be ordained (priests or deacons) in order that they might live more freely.
7. Orders that none but priests be made deans or pri- ors, nor any but deacons archdeacons.
8. Forbids any one to ordain a priest without a title.
9. beetle, under pain of excommunication, to eject any one from a benefice to which he has been instituted without the bishop's sanction.
10. Forbids bishops to ordain or pass sentence upon any one belonging to the jurisdiction of another bishop.
11. Forbids, under pain of excommunication, to receive an excommunicated person to communion.
12. Forbids any one to hold two dignities in the Church.
13. Forbids priests, deacons, subdeacons, and canons to dwell in the same house with any woman, except a mother, sister, aunt, or unsuspected woman. Offenders to lose their orders.
14. Forbids the practice of usury among clerks.
15. Excommunicates sorcerers, etc.
16. Forbids marriage within the seventh degree of consanguinity.
17. Declares that no regent is to be paid to husbands who impede their wives as too near akin to them.

11. Held at 1127, by William Corbell, archbishop of Canterbury, the pope's legate; ten English bishops attended, and three Welsh. It is also said that the multitude of clergy and laity of all ranks who flocked to the council was immense, but no mention is made of abbots. This council, which the York sent to, was the last at which the bishops of Durham and Worcester were also absent; the sees of London and Coventry were at that time va- cant. This synod sat three several days, and ten can- nons were published.

1. Forbids, "by authority of Peter, prince of the apo-WESTMINSTER, COUNCILS OF 910 WESTMINSTER, COUNCILS OF

ties," and that of the archbishop and bishops assembled, the buying and selling of churches and benefices.
5. Forbids any one to be ordained or preferred by means of money.
6. Forbids all demands of money for admitting monks, canons, or nuns.
7. Orders that priests only shall be made deans, and deans of churches.
8. Forbids priests, deacons, subdeacones, and canons to live with women not allowed by law. Those that adhered to their former profession or wives to be deprived of their order, dignity, and benefice: if parish priests, to be cast out of the church declared infamous.
9. Requires archdeacons and others whom it concerned to use all their endeavors to root out this plague from the Church.
10. Orders the expulsion from the parish of the conclaves of priests and canons, unless they are lawfully married.
11. Orders the bishop afterwards to send to Rome, directed that they shall be brought under ecclesiastical discipline, or servitude, at the discretion of the bishop.

Matthew of Paris declares that the king (Henry I) eluded all these provisions (to which he had given his consent) by obtaining from the archbishop a promise that he should be intrusted with their execution; whereas, in reality, he executed them only by taking money from the clergy of the diocese as a tax for the consecration of canons. See Johnson, Eccles. Canones, A.D. 1127; Wilkins, Conc. i, 410.

VI. Was held in 1188 by Alberic, bishop of Ostia, legate of pope Innocent II, during the vacancy of the see of Canterbury; eighteen bishops and about thirty abbots attended, who proceeded to the election of Theodore to the see of Canterbury. Seventeen canons were published.

1. Forbids to demand any price for churlom, oil, baptism, penance, visitation of the sick, exsorials, excommunication, or burial, under pain of excommunication.
2. Orders that the body of Christ be not reserved above eight days, and that it be ordinarily carried to the sick by a priest or deacon only. In case of extreme necessity by any one, but with the greatest reverence.
3. Forbids to demand a cope, ecclesiastical vestment, or any other vestments upon the consecration of bishops and benefactors of abbots; also forbids to require a carpet, towel, beast, or anything beyond the canonical procuration, upon the deducation of a church.
4. Forbids to demand any extra fees when a bishop not belonging to the diocese consecrates a church.
5. Forbids lay investitures; orders every one, upon investiture by the bishop, to swear upon the gospels that he has not received money directly or indirectly, given or promised anything for it, else the donation be null.
6. Forbids the ecclesiastical with canon, A.D. 1124.
7. Forbids persons other than their own bishop without letters from him to exercise their office; remains of the restoration of them to their order to the pope, unless they take a religious habit.
8. Deprives conciliarly clerks, and forbids any to hear their mass.
10. Anathematizes him that kills, imprisons, or lays hands on a cleric, monk, nun, or other ecclesiastical person.

Matthew of Paris states that the king (Henry I) eluded all these provisions (to which he had given his consent) by obtaining from the archbishop a promise that he should be intrusted with their execution; whereas, in reality, he executed them only by taking money from the clergy of the diocese as a tax for the consecration of canons. See Johnson, Eccles. Canones, A.D. 1127; Wilkins, Conc. i, 410.

VI. Was held in 1188 by Alberic, bishop of Ostia, legate of pope Innocent II, during the vacancy of the see of Canterbury; eighteen bishops and about thirty abbots attended, who proceeded to the election of Theodore to the see of Canterbury. Seventeen canons were published.

1. Forbids to demand any price for churlom, oil, baptism, penance, visitation of the sick, exsorials, excommunication, or burial, under pain of excommunication.
2. Orders that the body of Christ be not reserved above eight days, and that it be ordinarily carried to the sick by a priest or deacon only. In case of extreme necessity by any one, but with the greatest reverence.
3. Forbids to demand a cope, ecclesiastical vestment, or any other vestments upon the consecration of bishops and benefactors of abbots; also forbids to require a carpet, towel, beast, or anything beyond the canonical procuration, upon the deducation of a church.
4. Forbids to demand any extra fees when a bishop not belonging to the diocese consecrates a church.
5. Forbids lay investitures; orders every one, upon investiture by the bishop, to swear upon the gospels that he has not received money directly or indirectly, given or promised anything for it, else the donation be null.
6. Forbids the ecclesiastical with canon, A.D. 1124.
7. Forbids persons other than their own bishop without letters from him to exercise their office; remains of the restoration of them to their order to the pope, unless they take a religious habit.
8. Deprives conciliarly clerks, and forbids any to hear their mass.
10. Anathematizes him that kills, imprisons, or lays hands on a cleric, monk, nun, or other ecclesiastical person.

Forbids any but the pope to grant him penance at the last extremity in danger of death; denies him burial if he die impotent.
11. Excommunicates all persons violently taking away the goods of the Church.
12. Forbids any one to build a church or oratory upon his lands without the bishop's license.
13. Forbids the clergy to carry arms and fight in the wars.
14. Forbids monks after receiving orders to recede from their former way of living.
15. Forbids nuns, under anathema, to use parti-colored alms, or dalmatic gowns, and to wear the head hair.
16. Commandes, under anathema, all persons to pay the tithe of their fruits.
17. Forbids schoolmasters to hire out their schools to be governed by others.

See Johnson, Eccles. Canones, A.D. 1138; Wilkins, Conc. i, 413.

VII. Was held in 1178 by cardinal Hugo or Hugo, who had been sent from Rome to endeavor to settle the dispute between the archbishops of Canterbury and York; the latter of whom claimed the right of having his cross borne before him in the province of Canterbury.

Many prelates and clergy attended; but when Roger of York, upon entering the assembly, perceived that the seat on the right hand of the legate had been assigned to the archbishop of Canterbury, and that on the left kept for himself, he thrust himself into the lap of the archbishop of Canterbury; whereupon the servants of the latter and many of the bishops (as Hovendine writes) threw themselves upon the archbishop of York, and forced him down upon the ground, trampled upon him, and rent his cope; upon which the council broke up in confusion.

Johnson, ut sup.; Wilkins, Conc. i, 485.

VIII. Was a national council held in 1200 by Hubert Walter, archbishop of Canterbury, in which fifteen canons were published.

1. Orders the priest to say the canon of the mass dually, and to remove the hours and all the officium, and without clipping the words. Offenders to be resented.

2. Forbids to celebrate two masses in one day except in case of necessity. When it is done, it directs that nothing be performed into the chalice after the first celebration, but that the least drop be diligently supplanted out of the chalice, and the fingers washed and washed; the washings to be drunk by the celebrant. On the second celebration a deacon be present to do so at the time. Orders that the eucharist be kept in a decent place, and carried to the sick with care to be taken that none of the consecrated and unconsecrated hosties.

3. Forbids to baptize and confirmation shall be conferred upon those concerning whom there is a doubt whether or not they have received them. Forbids fathers, mothers, and godparents to baptize, and confirm without the presence of the priest, or in case of the priest's absence, or other necessity. Permits no father or mother to baptize their child in case of necessity, and orders that all that follows after the permissio shall be accomplished subsequently by the priest.

4. Relates to the administration of penance.

5. Renews the decrees of the Council of Lateran, A.D. 1179, concerning the expenses and retrenchments of prelates and other ordinaries when in visitation, and declares the design of visitations to be to see what concerns the cure of souls. Orders every church to have a silver chalice, decent vestments, and necessary books, utensils, etc.

6. Orders that bishops ordaining any one without a title shall maintain him till he can make a clerical provision for him.

7. Orders the canon of Lateran, A.D. 1179, which forbids prelates to excommunicate their subjects without canonical warning. Orders the yearly pronouncement of a general indulgence against persons guilty of various specific crimes.

8. See canon 9, Lateran, A.D. 1179.

9. Orders the payment of tithe without abatement for wagons, etc.; grants to priests the power of excommunicating all withholding the tithes of land newly cultivated to be paid to the parish church. Orders detaileders of tithes to be excommunicated.

10. Forbids any person to estivate more than worth more than three marks per annum who will not go to the council of Lateran, A.D. 1179. Forbids clerks to go to taverns and drinking-begs, and so put themselves in the way of being insulted by laymen. Orders all clerks to use the canonical tose, and clerical habit, and archdeacons and dignified clergy men cope with sleeves.

11. Forbids marriage under various circumstances: orders that the bans be thrice published; that marriages be celebrated publicly in the face of the Church.

12. Orders those who, being suspected of crimes, deny them, to undergo a perjury.

13. See canon 9 of Lateran, which forbids the Temples to enter into unauthorized guilds, etc., without the bishop's consent.

14. See canon 9 of Lateran, which contains various regulations relating to the dress, etc., of the religious.

See Wilkins, Conc. i, 505; Johnson, Eccles. Canones, ad ann.

IX. Was held about 1229 by Richard Wibershe, archbishop of Canterbury. Twelve constitutions were published, of which are the acts of a church published in the Council of London, A.D. 1172. The last refers to the duties of physicians. See Johnson, Eccles. Canones.

X. Was held in 1229 under master Stephen, chaplain and munice of the pope, who, sorely at the discomfort of the assembly, demanded on the part of Rome the truth of all movable belonging to clergy and laity in England, Ireland, and Wales, in order to enable the Roman pontiff to carry on war against the excommunicated emperor Frederick. The arguments by which, assuming Rome as the head of all churches, it was asserted that her fall would involve the ruin of the members, was most in the part of the laity by a plain refusal; and the clergy, after three or four days' deliberation and no small murmuring, were at length brought to consent from fear of excommunication or an interdict being the consequence of disobedience to the demand. See Wilkins, Conc. i. 622.

Whalley, Thomas Shoewick, D.D., a Church of England divine, was born in 1648. He was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, graduating B.A. in 1676, and M.A. in 1774; was presented to the rectory of Hagworthingham, Lincolnshire, in 1772, and died at La Fleche, Nov. 30, 1826. He published his Eddy and Eddle, a tale (1758, 8vo).--The Fatal Kiss, a poem, written in the last stage of an asthma, by a beautiful young lady (1781, 4to).--Verses addressed to Mrs. Siddens (1782, 4to).--Mount Blanc, a poem (1788, 4to).--The Castle of Montsalvat, a tragedy (1781, 8vo).--Poems and Translations (1788).--Kennet and Finelot, a legendary tale (1800, 8vo). See (Lond.) Annual Register, 1826, p. 267.

Whedon, Daniel Deshons, D.D., LL.D., an eminent Methodist Episcopal divine, was born on Onondaga, N. Y., March 20, 1808. He graduated from Hamilton College in 1828; studied law in Rochester for a year, and then became teacher in caesavonian Seminary; in 1831 tutor in his alma mater; in 1851 professor of languages in Wesleyan University, Conn.; in 1844 joined the New York Conference; in 1842 was transferred to the Troy Conference, and stationed in 1843 at Pittsfield, Mass.; in 1845 became professor of rhetoric in the University of Michigan; in 1855 pastor at Jamaica, L. I.; in 1856 editor of the Methodist Quarterly Review, a position which he retained until 1884. He died at Atlantic Highlands, N. J., June 8, 1885. Dr. Whedon was noted for his incisive, vigorous style, both as preacher and writer, and was remarkably powerful in controversy. He wrote very largely for the denominational press, and prominent among his works are a Treatise on the Will (New York, 1864), and a Commentary on the New Test. (1860-80, 5 vola. 12mo). See Alumns Record of Wesleyan University, 1882, p. xxix, 656.

Wheel. The vision of the wheels demands some remark (Ezek. i, 15, 16, 19-21).--'Now as I beheld the living creatures, there appeared a wheel upon the face of the living creatures, with four faces. The appearance of the wheels and their work was like unto the color of a beryl: and they four had one likeness: and their appearance and their work was as it were a wheel in the middle of a wheel. And when the living creatures went, the wheels went by them: and when the living creatures were lifted up from the earth, the wheels were lifted up. Whithersoever the spirit was to go, they went, thither was their spirit to go; and the wheels were lifted up over against them: for the spirit of the living creature was in the wheels. Then those went, these went; and when those stood, these stood; and when those were lifted up from the earth, the wheels were lifted up over against them: for the spirit of the living creature was in the wheels. This vision was before my mind, and I knew that the wheels were good news and Christians as very abstruse and difficult of interpretation, so much so, indeed, that the former anciently forbade it to be read by persons under thirty years of age. Bush observes, 'From all that we can gather of the form of these wheels, they appear to have been spherically oval, each wheel having an equal size and inserted the rim of the one into that of the other at right angles, and so consisting of four equal parts or half-circles. They were accordingly adapted to run either forward or backward, to the right hand or to the left, without any lateral turning, and by this means their motion corresponded with that of the four faces of the living creatures to which they were attached. 'When they went upon their four sides, they turned not as they went,' Heb. 'When they went, they went upon the quarter-part of their fourfoldness, 'i.e. upon or in the direction of one of the four vertical semicircles into which they were divided, and which looked towards the four points of the compass. When it is said 'they turned not,' it is not to be understood that they had not a revolving or rotary motion, but that they, like the faces, never sought a straightforward course.' A similar crustiform position of the wheels is adopted by most commentators. Of verses 19 and 20 the same author observes, 'These circumstances are doubtless dwelt upon with peculiar emphasis in order to show the intimacy of relation and harmony of action subsisting between the living creatures and the wheels, or, more properly, between the things symbolically represented by them.' Layard observes that the 'wheel within wheel' mentioned in connection with the emblematic figures may refer to the winged circle or wheel representing at Nimrod the supreme deity (Ninerech, iii, 932). See CHEVRUM.
clent Church for the discipline of Junior monks and inferior clergy for insubordination. It was also applied to others in certain cases. Bingham (Christ. Antiq. bk. vii, ch. iii) quotes from Palladius as follows: "In the Church of Mount Nitria, there were three whips hanged upon three pillars, with thongs, one for cursing monks, another for the correcting of thieves, and a third for the correcting of strangers, whom they entertained in a hotel adjoining." Again, in Bingham's Antiquitates (bk. xvii.
ch. iii), we find these statements: "Cyprian, in the life of Cornelius Aemerileus, says that bishop observed this method both with slave and freemen; and that when they were to be scourged for their faults, they should suffer forty stripes save one, according as the law appointed. The Council of Agde orders the same punishment, not only for junior monks, but also for the inferior clergy. And the Council of Mache, Gennadius gives upon the number of forty stripes save one..." The Council of Eopeo speaks of stripes as the peculiar punishment of the minor clergy for the same crimes that were punished with excommunication for a whole year in the superior clergy." See Sco/ons.

WHIRLWIND (πτέρων, mpάδα, Job xxxvii, 9; Prov.
i, 27; x; 25; Isa. v, 28; xviii, 13; xi, 1; lvvi, 15; Jer.
xx, 13; Hos. viii, 7; Amos i, 14; Neh. i, 8; elsewhere
"storm," etc., denoting the sweeping force of the wind or hurricane; also "[πτερν], star Jer. xxiii, 19; xxv, 82; xxx, 2; elsewhere "tempest," or [πτερν] 2, Kings ii, 21; 1, 15; Job.
xxii, 19; Lxx, 14; xi, 10, Jer. xxiii, 19; xxi, 23; Ezek.
e, 4; Jer. vi, 14; elsewhere "storm," etc., denoting rather the violent rain or tempest, although accompanied with wind, Ps. cviii, 25; Ezek. xiii, 11, 13). The two Hebrew terms above noted convey the notion of a violent wind, but with a different radical import—the former, because such a wind sweps away every object it encounters; the latter, because such objects so swept away are torn about and destroyed. In addition to this, Gennadius gives a similar sense to [πτερν], in Ps. lxxviii, 18 (A.V.

'heaven') and Ezek. x, 18 (A.V. 'wheel'). Generally, however, this last term expresses one of the effects of such a storm in rolling along chaff, stubble, or such light articles (Thee/rag, p. 298). It does not appear that any of the above terms express the specific notion of a whirlwind, i.e. a gale moving violently round on its own axis, and there is no warrant for the use of the word in the
A.V. of 2 Kings ii, 11. The most violent winds in England are those from the north east and passage in Job xxxvii, 9, which in the A.V. reads: 'out of the south cometh the whirlwind,' should rather be rendered 'Out of his chamber,' etc. The whirlwind is frequently used as a metaphor for violent and sweeping destruction.
Cyrus's invasion of Babylonia is compared to a southerly gale coming out of the wilderness of Arabia (Isa. xxxi, 1; comp. Knebel, ad loc.), the effects of which are most prejudicial in that country. Similar allusions occur in Psa. lvii, 9; Prov. i, 27; x; 25; Isa. xi, 24; Dan. xi, 40" (Smith). In a large proportion of the passages the terms in question are employed in a figurative sense with reference to the resistance and power of some distin-tion that is sure to overtake the wicked. But this of course implies that tempests of such a character were phenomena not unknown in some parts of Palestine.
We have only to look into the accounts of travellers to see how much this is the case, especially in the South
Country and the regions bordering on the Dead Sea.
Prof. Robinson and party were exposed to a violent surocco in the desert, in their route from Aklah to Jerusalem, which continued until towards evening.

"The wind had been all the morning N.E., but at eleven of clock it suddenly changed to the south, and came upon us with violence and intense heat, until it blew a great tempest.
The atmosphere was filled with fine particles of sand, which were presently vis-able, his disk exhibiting only a dun and sickly hue; and the glow of the wind came upon our faces as from a burnning oven. Often we could not see ten rods around us, and our eyes, ears, mouth, and clothes were filled with Sand; this fell upon us with violence, until it blew a great tempest.
The atmosphere was filled with fine particles of sand, which were presently viable, his disk exhibiting only a dun and sickly hue; and the glow of the wind came upon our faces as from a burn-

Further on he states, "The tempest had become a tornado. It was with the utmost difficulty that we could pitch our tent, or keep it upright after it was pitched.
For a time it was almost as destructive as a flood, as the storm in itself was probably as terrible as most of the tornadoes we have given rise to the exaggerated accounts of travellers." (Expedition, p. 314). Kito remarks (Pict. Bible, note on Isa. xxxvii, 36): "As we have ourselves only felt the mitigated effects of this wind on the skirts of deserts and in the shelter of towns, we can form no experience of the destructive dissastative effects which it exhibits in the open deserts: but, judging from what we observed under the circumstances indicated, and from such information as we have collect-lected, we have no doubt that the numerous accomplished travellers of the last century and the one before, as Chardin, Shaw, Niebuhr, Volney, Bruce, Ives, and others, were cor-cor in their united testimony, supported as it is by the counting evidence of natives accustomed to traverse the deserts. It is necessary to mention this, because some more recent travellers, who, on account of the reason or directions given them, and no occasion of observing any thing other than the milder effects of this wind, have seemed to doubt the destructive power which has been attributed to it it." The most complete account of the simoon and its effects is that given by Volney (Travels, i, 4). That part which describes its effects in the towns tourists can confirm from their own experience, and the rest is amply corborated by the testimony of other travellers.

"Travellers have mentioned these winds under the name of pneumonos winds, or, more correctly, hot winds of the desert. Such, in fact, is their quality; and their heat is sometimes so excessive that it is difficult to form an idea of their violence without having experienced it: but it may be compared to the heat of a large oven at the minute of drawing out the hot bread. The wind begins to blow, the atmosphere assumes an alarming asp ect. The sky, at other times so clear in this climate, becomes dark and thickly veiled, and the subduing appearance of a violet color. The air is not closely but gray and heavy, and filled with an exhalation from the dust that penetrates everywhere. This wind, always light and rapid, is not at first remarkably hot, but increas-

The ninth plague with which the Lord afflicted the Egyptians was a thick darkness, which is generally identified with the tempest called khamsin, prevalent in Egypt in the months of April and May (Exod. x, 21-23). When the khamsin blows, the sun is pale yellow, its light is obscured, and the darkness is sometimes so great that one seems to be in the blackest night, even in the middle of the day. Sonini says, "The atmosphere was heated, and at the same time obscured by clouds of dust. Men and animals breathed only vapor, and that was mingled with a fine and hot sand. Plants dropped, and all living nature languished. The air was dark on account of a thick mist of fine dust as red as flame." Hartmann says, "The inhabitants of the cities and villages shut themselves up in the lowest apartments of their houses and cellars; but the inhabitants of the desert go into their tents, or into the holes which they have dug in the ground. There they await, full of anxiety, the termination of this kind of tempest, which generally lasts three days." The hot wind of the desert, called by the Italians sirocco, and by the Arabs shurfiyeh, i.e. an east wind, resembles the khamsin of Egypt. The sand-storms occur in the most awful form in deserts, when the fine sand is thrown into hillocks, and these are swept by furious winds, the sand of which they are formed being tossed on high, and whirled rapidly and densely through the air, until the storm has finally subsided. Under this most awful visitation of the sand-storm, it sometimes happens that travellers and their cattle are overwhelmed and suffocated. And even the more common and less dangerous forms of this phenomenon, which occur in regions less absolutely sandy, or where the sands are less extensive than in the great sandy deserts of Asia, are still very formidable and alarming. Mr. Buckingham has given a description of such a storm, of that kind which must have been familiar to the Israelites during their wanderings. It occurred in the desert of Suez, that is, on the western verge of that sandy desert which occupies a considerable portion of the country between Egypt and Palestine.

"The morning was delightful on our setting out, and promised us a fine day: but the light air from the south soon increased to a gale, the sun became obscure, and as every hour brought it into a lower sand, it flew about us in such whirlwinds, with the sudden gusts that blew, that it was impossible to proceed. We halted, therefore, for an hour, and took shelter under the lee of our beasts, who were themselves so terrified as to need fastening by the knees, and uttered in their wrappings but a melancholy symphony. . . . Fifty gaits of wind at sea appeared to me more easy to be encountered than one among these sands. It is impossible to imagine desolation more complete. We could see neither sun, earth, nor sky: the plain at ten paces' distance was absolutely imperceptible. Our beasts, as well as ourselves, were so covered as to render breathing difficult; they hid their faces in the ground, and we could only uncover our own for a moment to behold this chaos of mid-day darkness, and wait patiently for its abatement."

Dr. Thomson states (Land and Book, ii, 811): "We have two kinds of sirocco—one accompanied by vehement wind, which fills the air with dust and fine sand, I have often seen the whole heavens veiled in gloom with this sort of sand-cloud, through which the sun, shorn of his beams, looked like a globe of dull, smouldering fire." See WIND.
Whitby (or Strenechol). Council of (Concilium Pharnese). Whitby is a seaport town of England, County of York, North Riding, on the Esk, near its mouth in the North Sea. An ecclesiastical council was held there in 664. This was properly a provincial council between the English and Scottish bishops on the subject of the celebration of Easter. There were present on the English side Agilbert, a Frenchman, bishop of Rochester, with his presbyter, Agatho; Wilfred, a young Northumbrian priest, who had studied at Rome; Roffmanus, who had before contended the point with Finan, late bishop of Lindisfarne; and an old deacon, James, whom Paulinus had left thirty years before. On the Scotch side were Colman, bishop of Lindisfarne, and Cedul, a bishop who acted as interpreter. Oswy, king of Northumbria, was also present, who opened the proceedings, and desired Colman to explain the nature and origin of the rites which his Church had so long practiced. The Scots alleged the example of St. John, Wilfred that of St. Peter, and the latter concluded his address in the following terms: "But for you (Colman) and your adherents, if, after having heard the decree of the apostolic see, of the whole Church, and these, too, confirmed by Scripture, you refuse to obey them, you certainly are guilty of sin. For, allowing your fathers to have been holy men, is their small handful in a century to be compared to the Church of Christ over the whole earth? And great as that Columba of yours may have been, is he to be preferred to the blessed prince of the apostles, to whom the Lord said, 'Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my Church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it, and to thee will I give the keys of the kingdom of heaven'". This fortunate quotation from Holy Scripture determined the king in favor of the Roman custom; he, as he said, fearing to contradict one who held the keys of heaven, and might peradventure refuse to build his Church when he was mocked. In this council, moreover, the affair of the tonsure was discussed, the Roman fashion differing from that in use among the Scotch, which the former pretended had been derived from Simon Magus. See Manl, Concil. vi. 491; Wilkins, Concil. i. 35.

White (prop. W. T., Lewic). In Canaan persons of distinction were sumptuously dressed in fine linen of Egypt; and, according to some authors, in silk and rich cloth shaded with the choicest colors. The beauty of these clothes consisted in the fineness and color of the stuffs; and it seems the color most in use among the Israelites, as well as among the Greeks and Romans, was white, not only on the dressed part of a garment, but also on the coarse one, being most suited to the nature of their laws, which enjoined so many washings and purifications. (Indeed, so early as the days of Henod the Greeks considered white as the color in which the celestials appeared: men went to heaven in white clothing [Opera et Dies, i, 198.] The general use of this color seems to be recognized by Solomon in his direction, "Let thy garments be always white" (Eccles. ix. 8). But garments in the native color of wool were not confined to the lower orders; they were in great esteem among persons of any considerable rank, and are frequently valued in Scripture as the emblem of knowledge and purity, gladness and victory, grace and glory. The priests of Baal were habited in black, a color which appears to have been peculiar to themselves, and which few others employed. The Egyptians except mumified bodies to wear. In all countries and all ages white has been regarded as the emblem of purity. See Whitby, Isaias says, "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as white wool" (Is. Ix. 7). See also the paragraphs cited by Velheding, Index Programmatum, p. 134. See Colors.

White of an Egg is the rendering adopted in the A.V. at Job vi. 6 for the Heb. הב_frequency, הר כחלש (Sept. in piuman enferc [V. T. querc]). Vulg. good gustatum offert mortem). Most interpreters derive the Hebrew word from בץ, cha'dam, to dream, and, guided by the context, explain it to denote somnolence, futility (comp. Eccles. vi. 9, and so insipidity (comp. Hucce in Discoridies, spoken of tasteless roots). The phrase is used it by the Gospel writer, which signifies portulaca oleracea or portulaca, an herb formerly eaten as a salad, but proverbial for its insipidity ("portulaca stultior," in Meidan. Proverb. No. 344, p. 219, ed. Schultens). The phrase will thus mean portulaca-bréot, i.e. silly discourse. See Mallow. The rabbins, following the Targums, regard it as l. q. Chald. porta-pure, the coagulum of an egg or card; and so explain the phrase, as the A.V. V., mean a sling or white of an egg put as an emblem of insipidity. This in itself is not ill; but the other seems more consonant with Oriental usage. See Gesenius, Thesaur. p. 490.

White (or Whyte), John (1), D.D., an English prelate, was born at Fernham, in Surrey, in 1511. He was educated at Winchester School and at New College, Oxford, where he became perpetual fellow in 1527; soon after made warden of Winchester College; became rector of Chelton in 1551; was imprisoned in the Tower for some months during the preceding year for his supposed correspondence with persons abroad who were opposed to Edward VII; was made bishop of Lincoln by Queen Mary in 1553; translated to the see of Winchester in 1557; deprived, on the accession of Queen Elizabeth, on account of his opposition to Protestantism; and imprisoned for a short time in the Tower in 1559 for his public attacks upon the queen. He died at South Warenborough, Jan. 11, 1560, and was buried in Winchester Cathedral. He was the author of certain Latin poems, and some of his sermons and orations have been published.

White, John (2), D.D., an English clergyman of the latter part of the 16th and the beginning of the 17th century, was vicar of Eccles, and subsequently chaplain in ordinary to James I. He died in 1615. He published The Way to the True Church, and other works. See Allison, Dict. of First, and Amer. Authors, s.v.

White, John (3), a Puritan divine, known as the Puritan of Derbeaker, was born at Stainton, near Darwen, John, Oxfordshire, England, in December, 1574. He was educated at Winchester School and New College, Oxford, of which he became perpetual fellow in 1595; here he graduated, took holy orders, and became a frequent preacher at Oxford; became rector of Trinity Church, Derbeaker, in 1609; preached in Westminster Abbey in 1612; translated to the college of Massachusetts in 1624; had his house plundered and his library carried away by the soldiers of Prince Rupert; escaped to London, and was made minister of the Savoy; was appointed one of the learned divines to assist in a committee of religion selected by the House of Lords in 1649; became a member of the Westminster Assembly in 1643; was chosen rector of Lambeth in 1645; and afterwards returned to Derbeaker, where he died, July 21, 1648. He published, The Plater's Pea; or, The Grounds of Plantations Examined, and the Counsel of Reason to Serve Ourselves, and the Nation, in Seasonable Times; and Wrote to the Tree of Life Discovered, etc. (1647); Commentary on the First Three Chapters of Genesis (1650).

White, Nicholas, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Middletown, Vt., June 8, 1786. He received a careful religious training; experienced religion in 1810; joined the New York Conference in 1819, and from that date to 1854, when he superannuated, he led an active, successful itinerant life. In 1854 he retired to Brooklyn, where he resided until his death, Feb. 14, 1861. Mr. White was earnest and fervent as a speaker, greatly beloved as a pastor, devoted and affectionate as a husband and father. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1861, p. 76.

White (Whyte, or Vittus), Richard, an English historian, antiquary, and afterwards Catholic priest, was born at Basingstoke, Hampshire. He was educated at Winchester School; admitted fellow of New College, Oxford, in 1567; lost his fellowship on account of his attachment to the Bekenianism of 1564; became regius professor of civil and canon law at Divinity School; and in his relation he remained nearly twenty years; was appointed by that university the cancellor, or recteur magnificus; was created count palatine by the emperor; after the loss of his second wife, was ordained priest and made a canon of St. George's Cathedral in Dublin in 1612; and was buried in St. James's Church. Among his publications were, Etnia Latina Crispsia; Epistolae Antiqua quod in Agro Bononiam adulce Videat, etc. (1618); Orations Quinque (1566);—Nota ad Legos Decemvoeres in Deo Domino (1617);—and Historic Britannico Insulæ ab Origine Munch ad Asam Domini Octingentisam (1602).

Whitehead, a body of enthusiasts who appeared in Italy about the beginning of the 15th century, and were so called from being all clad in white linen robes reaching to their feet, with hoods of the same material. They lived at the church by their own labors. They were first collected together by a priest, whose name is unknown, among the villages on the southern side of the Alps. He led them down a large multitude, into the Italian plains under the pretense that he was the prophet Elias. Bearing a cross at their head, he bore them through the land to call the nation to the purpose of regaining the Holy Land; and so great was his influence that not only the peasant, but some priests and even cardinals, are said to have enrolled themselves among his army of penitents. They advanced in troops of ten, twenty, and forty thousand, marching from city to city, singing hymns and uttering loud prayers; and wherever they went multitudes were ready to give them alms and join in their pilgrimage. They met at Viterbo by a body of papal troops, which had been ordered to march against them by Boniface IX under the impression that their leader intended to dethrone him and seize upon the papal dominions. The pilgrims were dispersed by the troops, and their leader taken captive to Rome and burned as a heretic, about the year 1408. Their history is very similar in many respects to that of the Apostolica, led by Segarelli and Dolcino a century earlier; hence some have supposed that both uprisings were by the same sect. See Apostolica.

Whitefield, James, D.D., a Roman Catholic prelate, was born in Liverpool, England, Nov. 3, 1770. Having received a good education, he engaged for some time in the ministry of the Church of England, but afterwards devoted himself to the study of divinity, which he prosecuted under Dr. Ambrose Maréchal. He was ordained a priest in 1809, settled in Baltimore, Md., in 1817 as minister of St. Peter's Church, and succeeded Dr. Maréchal as archbishop of Baltimore May 25, 1828. He died at Baltimore, Oct. 19, 1834.

Whitefield, J. G. D.D., a minister of the Methodist Protestant Church, was born in Virginia, Sept. 10, 1810. He was converted when seventeen years of age; in August, 1829, was licensed to preach, and in the following September went to his first appointment. For nearly fifty years he was a faithful minister of the Gospel. He was elected to the General Conferences of 1842, '45, '50, '54, '58, '62, '66, and also of 1870, of which he was president. He was a member of the conventions of 1867 and 1877, when the discoursed Church was reunited. In 1874 he became a member of the North Carolina Conference, and represented that body in the union convention held in Baltimore in May, 1877. He died Aug. 28, 1879. See Founders of the M. P. Church, p. 578.

White Garments were worn by the clergy as early as the 4th century, and the use has been continued to the present time in the ritualistic churches. White garments were also worn by persons newly baptized. In the Latin Church this vesture came immediately after confirmation, but in the Greek Church it immediately after this ceremony was to represent the having put off the old man with his deeds, and having put on the new man, Christ Jesus. Those who wore the garments were called in the Greek, karyeitai katharoi, and in the Latin, i.e. "Christus et uniusce vitæ omnes" (the white flock of Christ). The garments were delivered to them with the following solemn charge: *Receive the white and immaculate garment, which thou mayest bring forth without a stain. Never may thou, as a priest of the Lord Jesus Christ, that thou mayest have eternal life." These garments were commonly worn eight days, and then laid up in the church. The Sunday after Easter is mentioned as the day appointed for this purpose. This was the Litany of the Paschal festival, and then the neophytes changed their belt; whatever that day is thought to have the name of Dominicus in Albia; and Whitunday (q. v.) is said to be so called from this custom of wearing white robes after baptism. These being laid aside, were carefully preserved in the vestries of the church as an evidence against them if they afterwards violated the baptismal covenant. See Bingham, Christ, Antig., bk. xiii, ch. viii; bk. xii, ch. iv; and bk. xx, ch. vi.

Whitehead, David, an eminent English divine of the 18th century, was born at Tuderley, in Hamp- shire, about 1711. He was sent to Oxford; became chaplain to Anne Boyley; retired to Franklin, in Germany, during the reign of the queen of Mary, and there became pastor to the English congregation; returned to England on the accession of queen Elizabeth, and was one of the committee appointed to review king Edward's liturgy; was selected as one of the public disputants against the pope and the papists in 1659; and declined the archbishopric of Canterbury and the mastership of the Savoy. He died in 1751. The only published works left by him are Lectures and Homilies on St. Paul's Epistles, and several of his discourses in Brief Discourse of the Troubles Begun at Frankfort (1757). We speak of him as "a great light of learning and a most heavenly professor of divinity." See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Whitehead, George, an eminent public preacher of the Quakers, was born at Sunnibeg, in the parish of Orton, Westmoreland, England, about 1656. He was educated at the school of Mr. Jones, in Cumbria, and attended school for a time; began to travel as a Quaker preacher before he was eighteen years old; was several times imprisoned; and sometimes whipped for his preaching; appeared at the bar of the House of Commons in defiance of the act for his sect; and was frequently in danger of his life. He exercised considerable influence with Charles II. He died in March, 1722. Among his numerous publications the following may be mentioned: Nature of Christianity in the True Light Asserted (1671); —The Christian Quaker, etc. (1824, 2 pts.), in which he was assisted by William Penn; —Enthusiasm above Atheism (1674); —The Way of Life and Perfection Lively Demonstrated (1678) —An Antidote against the Venom of a Snake in the Grass (1697); —Christian Progress of George White head, in Four Parts, with a Supplement, being Memoirs of His Life (1720); —Smith, Catalogue of Friends' Books, ii, 884-908.

Whitehead, John, M.D., a biographer of Wesley, was born in 1740. He studied medicine, and became physician to the old Bethlehem Hospital, Moorfields, London. From 1764 to 1769 he travelled as a Methodist preacher, returning again to his professional duties. He was a Quaker for some years, but afterwards returned to the Methodists. He was chief physician to John and Charles Wesley during their last illnesses. At the request of the executors of John Wesley and the trustees of City Road Chapel, he preached the funeral sermon of Wesley to an audience "still and silent as night," to use Crowther's words, March 9, 1791. This sermon was pubwhiteland, went through several editions, and realized to the Book-room a profit of £200. With Coke and Moore, Wesley appointed him literary executor. A long and unfortunate dispute ensued between Whitehead and his executor. After leaving the paper at Wesley, the former refused to give them up for examination and a possible cremation. For this he was expelled from membership and from his office as local preacher.
Whitehead, having the advantage of the possession of Wesley, held an advantageous account of the Lives of John and Charles Wesley, the first volume of which was issued in 1738. In the meantime, however (1792), Coke and Henry Moore published a hastily prepared Life, heavy editions of which were at once sold, thus supplanting to a large extent the more authoritative biography by the layman. In 1797, Whitehead restored the papers to his co-executors, and was reinstated in his position in the Church. Having served as physician to the Methodistis for many years, he died in London, March 18, 1804.

Dr. Whitehead published the following: Essay on Liberty and Necesity (1775, 12mo), in which Mr. Wes-ley's Thoughts on Necessity are examined and defended:
—Materiaism Philosopically Examined, or the Imma-
ternal of the Soul Asserted and Proved on Philosophiical Principles, in an Answer to Dr. Priestley's Dialogue between Reason and Passion (London, 1778, 78 pp.)—A Discourse (ibid., 1791, 8vo) delivered at the New Chapel, City Road, March 9, 1791, at the funeral of Rev. John Wesley: — A True Narratise of the Origin and Progress of the Difference concerning the Publication of the Life of Rev. John Wesley (1792, 8vo)—a Defence (nod. 8vo)

(Lond. 1796-98, 2 vols. 8vo; reprinted in Dublin in 1806, with an Appendix by the Irish editor, and Whitehead's Sermon on Wesley; in Boston, Mass., with Preface by John McLeish, 1844, 8vo in Aulurn and Rochester, N. Y., 1854, 8vo), collected from his private papers and printed works, to which is prefixed some account of his ancestors and relations, with the Life of Rev. C. Wesley, M.A., collected from his private journal and never before published. See Stevenson, Hist.

ley (see Index, vol. III). For the dispute about Wesley's

Whitelamb, John, one of the Oxford Methodists, was born in 1707, near Wroot, Lincolnshire. He was educated in the charity-school of that place, and while residing with Samuel Wesley at Epworth, was prepared for Lincoln College, Oxford, where he graduated about 1718. In 1733 he became S. Wesley's curate, and afterwards married his daughter. In 1738
he was promoted to the rectory of Wroot, a position which he retained until his death, in July, 1769. In 1742 John Wesley preached once in his pulpit, and friendly but not intimate relations existed between him and his minister ever afterwards. See Tyerman, Oxfford Methodists, p. 374 sq.

White Stone (\\u026a\u0269 asa l\u026a\u0269, a white pebble), referred to as given to the Christian conqueror (Rev. ii, 17), is supposed by many to refer to the usage among the Greeks of absolving those who were tried on the ground of any accusation, by the use of white balls or stones, and coined by the ancients for this purpose. The balls were thrown together into an urn, whence they were drawn and counted. But the white stone is given to the victor himself. Hence others think reference is made to the tessera given to the victor at the Olympic games, on which the reward was to be received from his native city, the value of his prize. But in these cases the white stone is wanting, and the mystic inscription which no one but the recipient could read. The reference is undoubtedly to Hebrew sources. Christians are called kings and priests unto God (Rev. i, 6; v, 10; xx, 6; 1 Pet. ii, 9). On the front of the mitre or turban worn by the Hebrew high-priest was the plate of gold with the inscription "Sacred to Jehova" (Exod. xxviii, 86). The name Jehovah was the incommunicable and secret name, which could be pronounced only by the high-priest, and was known, as the Jews say, only to him. Victors in the Christian struggle are to be exalted to the dignity of high-priests and kings. Instead of a plate of gold in their mitre they have a white stone,
a pellucid or resplendent gem, with an inscription equivalent to "Sacred to Jehovah" (Rev. i, 4), a new name, doubtless some name of the Saviour, perhaps, "Sacred to the Logos or Word," that is, the incarnate Jehovah (John i, 1; xix, 13). The whole probably symbolizes the assurance of the faithful by the indwelling of the Holy Spirit. This is the pellucid gem, the seal of the living God, having the inscription of divine acceptance which no one can read but he who possesses it. See Sanct and Saron.

Whitford, (Whitford, or Whytforde), Richard,
an English monk of the 16th century, was educated at Oxford; subsequently joined the Order of St. Bridget in the monastery called Sion, near Bremdish, and changed his name to "Sion," or "Sion of Sion," afterwards became domestic chaplain to William Mountjoy. He was the author of several works, among which we note, The Frughe of Redemptyoun (1514):
—A Hoke Called the Fywe or Towne of the Life of Perfeccion (1532)— and Doyners Instruccióny Tronyns
very Iustassen for the Hilles of Muses Souls, etc. (1541).

Whitford, Walter, D. D., a Scotch prelate, was first minister at Monkland and sub-dean of Glasgow, then rector of Moffat. In 1634 he was consecrated bishop of Brechin, in which see he remained until departure for Assembly in 1668, after which he fled to England, where he died in 1694. See Keith, Scotch Bishops, p. 167.

Whitney, Joseph, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Plainfield, Conn., Aug. 11, 1731. He graduated at Yale College in 1752, and was ordained at Brooklyn, Conn., in 1756, which charge he retained for sixty-eight years, but Whitsun Day, 1820, though two colleagues successively settled with him. To extreme old age Dr. Whitney's mental faculties remained almost as keen as ever; he was social, witty, and yet had the dignity of a Christian old age. In theology
Dr. Whitney was a moderate Calvinist, but he delivered

Whitsunday, a festival of the Christian Church commemorative of the descent of the Holy Ghost upon the apostles, as "they were all assembled together with one accord in one place," on the day of Pentecost (q. v.), from which fact the name Pentecost is sometimes used instead of Whitsunday. Blunt says (Hist. of Doct. and Hist. Theol.), "The etymology of the term has been strangely confused. It has been derived (a) from White Sunday, in supposed allusion to the white garments of the neophytes, as Whitsun-tide was one of the two chief seasons for baptism; and (b) from Wytsunday, i.e. Wit, or Wisdom, Sunday, in reference to the outpouring of wisdom upon the apostles. But the real White Sunday is the octave of Easter, or Dominica in albis, and both of these derivations must be abandoned when the proper use of the title is considered. It is not Whits Sunday, the day after Pentecost, that is, the day of the Feast of Whitsun, but Whits Day, and the week is Whitsun Week, not Whit Week; and the season Whitsuntide, not Whitside. In Yorkshire, and doubtless also in other parts of England, the feast is called Whitsun Day, the accent being strongly thrust on the first syllable, while at this day follows White, Whitsun, and Whitsun Tuesday. The name is thus derived, as Dr. Neale shows (Essays on Lithurgy, etc., directly from Penticost, passing, by various corruptions, Fingsten, Whingsten, into the German Pfingsten and the English Whit Sunday. The Germans have also their Pfingsten-Woche, in exact correspondence to our Whitewash Week.

Still other derivations of the term are given, Hamon L'Estrange thinking it is derived from the French âve, or eight; because there are eight Sundays between Easter and Penticost. Wheatley publishes a letter of the famous Gerard Langbain, written on Whitsun eve, 1590, in reply to a friend who had asked him of the origin of the name, in which it is attempted to be shown that gifts of the Holy Ghost are called from ancient times on the ancestors upon this day to give all the milk of their ewes and kine to the poor for the love of God, in order to qualify themselves to receive the gift of the Holy Ghost; which milk being then (as it is still in some countries) called white-meat, therefore the day from that custom took its name. It is also suggested that all persons were required to pay their tithe of young before that day or be liable to the wife, or mullet.

Anciently the whole period of fifty days between Easter and Whitewash was a sort of festival, and each was called a Day of Joy. We are told that the Christians had solemn worship every day, and paid the same respect to these as they did to the Lord's day. All fasting was forbidden, and no one prayed kneeling, the standing posture being considered more in accordance with the joyous spirit of the season, which was the counterpart of the ancient Roman feast, and ascent. On these services the Acts of the Apostles were read, because they contained a history appropriate to the season; alms were freely distributed; slaves were liberated; places of worship were decorated with evergreens; and baptisms were frequently solemnized. At first all persons were baptized as opportunity served; but while the discipline of the Church began to be settled, baptism was confined, except in urgent cases, to Easter and Whitewash, including the fifty days' interval.

In countries where Romanism has prevailed, the greatest abominations have been practiced on this day; fire has been thrown down from elevated places, to represent the cloven tongues of fire; flowers of various hues scattered abroad, in token of the various tongues and divers tongues are sometimes tanta about the church as an emblem of the Spirit's presence. The following instances are cited from Walcott's Sacred Archeology (p. 612-613): "At Lichfield, 1197, 'on Penticost and the three days ensuing, while the sequence was sung, clouds were by custom scattered.' A circuit was made round the centre of the vanport of Norwich, and there are similar apertures at Exeter. Through it, on Whitewash, a man, habited as an angel, was let down to cense the rood. At St. Paul's a white dove was let fly out of it, and a long censer, reaching almost to the top, was swung from the west door to the choir steps, 'breathing out over the whole church and company a most pleasant perfume.' At Dunkirk, in 1662, the ceremonial was always performed during the chanting of the Veni Creator, as in Spain. Balaam alludes to the loosing of the dove in the East. At Orleans, on Whitsunday, during the singing of the prose, birds, lighted tow and resin, wildfire, and flowers were thrown into the cathedral. At St. Julien's, Caen, until the end of the 16th century, seven kinds of flowers were showered down. In Sweden churches are on this festival still decorated with the wind flower and Pentecost lily—the daffodil. ... In most cathedrals the country folk came in procession on this day, and Sir Thomas More mourns over the unwomanly songs of the women who followed the cross; their offerings then made were called Whitun-farthings or Penticostals. On Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday in Whitsun week the famous Whitun plays of Chester were acted from the 14th century until 1594 on Whitun-Wednesday, 'Whitsunday, the making of the Creed,' being performed. Titus and tournays amused knights and fair dames; the morris-dancers delighted the common folks; and in many a rural parish the church ale, a sort of parochial picnic, was kept in an arbor, called Robin Hood's Bower, followed by dancing, bowls, and archery. ... Whitsunday was also called the Easter of Roses.

Wichern, Johann Heinrich, father of the Inner Mission in Germany, as one of the most active Christian philanthropists of the century, was born at Hamburg, April 21, 1808. He studied theology at Göttingen and Berlin, and reached the degree of "candidate." On his return home, encouraged by his pious mother, he started a Sunday-school for the poorest and most wicked children in the city; and ultimately had five hundred children under his care. It was this school which gave him the idea of the institution which he opened on Nov. 1, 1833, at Horn, a suburb of Hamburg. He called it the "Rauhe Haus" (q. v.). In 1845 Wichern sent out his Frauenthes, or "Büter aud" (q. v.), to aid the organ of the Inner Mission, in which he urged the duty of laying to heart the misery of our fellow-mortals, and at the same time told the story of his own institutions. In 1848, at the Church diet held at Wittenberg, Wichern presented with such extraordinary eloquence the claims of the work as to move even the most indifferent and sinful, who were their countrymen, that from that hour a new movement on their behalf was begun. This was the so-called "Inner Mission" (q. v.), the very name of which is due to Wichern. Under Friedrich Wilhelm IV, Wichern found favor in court circles, and exerted great influence upon the aristocracy. In acknowledgment of the great services rendered to the cause of the Church, the University of Halle honored Wichern, in 1861, with the doctorate of theology, while Friedrich Wilhelm IV made him a member of the supreme consistory of Berlin. In his official capacity, Wichern was enabled to provide regular religious services in the prisons. In 1858 he founded the "Evangelische Johannissämt" in Berlin, a similar institution to the Rauhe Haus, and organized the Prussian military chaplaincy. In 1872 he had a stroke of paralysis, from which he never recovered, and died at Hamburg, April 7, 1881. Widow (παρέκκλητος, χώρα). The benevolent influence of the Bible is in nothing more apparent than in the superior treatment which woman has experienced among those nations where it has prevailed; especially in that most forlorn and helpless class of females who have been deprived of the support and protection of a husband, husband-grown, or, on the contrary, and conspicuously in Oriental lands, the condition of widows is most deplorable. They are generally regarded with suspicion and contempt, and, in many countries, with positive abhorrence, as if the cause of their husband's death. In India this oppression seems to have reached its culmination of misery; and the atrocious custom of widow-burning or suicide (q.v.), was for ages the doom of this unfortunate class. See Woman.

1. Widows among the Hebrews. — Besides the general law against their hard treatment (Exod. xxii, 22-24), there was special legislation respecting them. 1. Their rights should always be respected (Deut. x, 18; xxvi, 19); nor should their clothing or cattle be pledged (xxiv, 17), nor their children be sold for debt (2 Kings iv, 1; Job xxi, 5). According to Maimonides (Sanhedr. 21, 6) their cases must be tried next after those of orphans.

2. They must be invited to the feasts accompanying sacrifices and tithe-offerings (Deut. xiv, 29; xvi, 11-14; xxvi, 12 sq.). Childless priest-widows living in their fathers' houses had a right to the priests' meat (Lev. xxv, 7). In general, the times at which the rich sent them wine for the paschal meal, in the time of the Maccabees widows were also allowed to deposit their property in the temple treasury (2 Macc. iii, 14).

3. Glaubers were left for them (Deut. xxiv, 19-21) and they shared in the battle spoils (2 Macc. viii, 28-30). Their remarriage was contemplated (Lev. xx, 14, but the high-priest was forbidden to marry one, and only on the childless widow did the Levirate law operate (Deut. xv, 5; see Levirate). The later Judaism greatly restricted the remarriage of widows (Jehoakim, xix, 1 sq.; xxvii, 4 sq.; xxiv, 4 sq.), but this was to be done not less than ninety days after the husband's demise. According to Kethuboth, xii, 2 sq.; Gittin, i, 9, if the widow remained in her husband's house the heirs had to provide her with the necessary rooms and means for her support; but if she went to her father's home she forfeited her right to support more than was absolutely necessary, and neither she nor the heirs could lay claim to her dowry until the expiration of twenty-five years, provided she could prove by oath that she had not yet received any part of it. In orphans, and in cases of destitution, widows were allowed to sell the property of their husbands, both real and personal (Kethuboth, viii, 8; ix, 9; Maim. Ibbuth, xvi, 7 sq.). In case a man left two widows, the first wife had prior claims (ibid. Conj. xvi, 1). Childless women whose prospective husbands were dead or died were considered as widows, and such a one the high-priest was also forbidden to marry. In spite of these laws and regulations, complaints of the unjust treatment of the widows in Israel were heard at different times (I Sam. i, 17, 28; x, 2; Jer. vii, 6; xxii, 13; Ezek. xxii, 7; Mal. iii, 5), and even in the New Test. period (Matt. xxiii, 14). II. Widows among Christians. — 1. In the early Church abundant and careful provision was made for them by apostolic and episcopal appointment under the apostles themselves (Acts vi, 1-6); and Paul gives particular directions concerning them (1 Tim. v, 3-16) in terms which have been understood by some commentators as ranking them in a special class of Church officials, but which rather seem to indicate their general maintenance at the expense of the body of believers, after a careful discrimination, such as the nature of the times then dictated. The writers who immediately succeeded the apostles often refer to the duty and practice of caring for the poor widows of the Church (Herma, Manu, viii, 2; Stobaeus, Gephyrae, xii, 10; Suidas; Polygen, vi; Ad Polycarp. iv; Polycearp, Ad Phil. iv, etc.). In still later times the Apostolical Constitutions and other authorities speak of a distinct order by this name (αρσενοτρόποι), but these appear to have held an eleemosynary office, rather than to have been themselves benefactors. They eventually took vows like nuns, and, in fact, devoted themselves to a conventual, or, at least, continent and actively benevolent life. See Smith, Dict. of Christ. Antiq. s. v. At the same time this body formed a convenient refuge for the destitute widows of those days, and in the Roman Catholic Church nunneries have largely been recruited from the ranks of bereaved or disappointed women. But, aside from this, Christian churches have in all ages exerted themselves with a praiseworthy diligence and liberality to furnish shelter and maintenance for believing widows whose relatives have been found unable or unwilling to provide for them. In more recent times special retreats, called "Old Ladies' Homes," have been established, where, for a moderate charge or entirely gratuitously, indigent widows are comfortably and pleasantly taken care of, and enabled to make good use of the training which they provide for public charity. Wigand, Johann, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Mansfeld in 1522. He studied at Wittenberg, and was appointed pastor of his native city in 1546, superintendent of Magdeburg in 1558, pro-professor of theology at Jena in 1560 (from which position he was discharged the next year), superintendent of Wismar in 1562, and again professor at Jena in 1569. In 1570 he accompanied the duke Johann Wilhelm to the diet at Spires, but after the death of the duke, in 1573, Wigand was expelled from Saxony. At the instance of Martin Chemnitz he was appointed professor at the Jena gymnasium in 1573, preaching elec-tively the Gospel of the Law of Moses and the Doctrine of Pomerania. Wigand died at Liebauh, Prussia, Oct. 21, 1587. He was an ultra-Lutheran, an ardent champion of Flicius (q. v.), and took part with great vehemence in all controversies of the time, persecuting with blind fanaticism any one who differed from him in opinions. At last he fell out with his own master, with whom he at one time labored for the establishment of a Lutheran popedom, and wrote against him.
Wigand's autobiography is found in Fortgesetzte Sammlung von altent und neuen theologischen Schriften (Leipzig, 1581), p. 60, and complete text of all his writings is also found; comp. also zeumeg, Vita Professorum Jenaen.., p. 43 sq.; Schlüsselburg, Oratio Funeris de Vita et Obitu J. nection with the dedication of a new house of worship.
Of this church he continued to be the sole pastor for more than thirty years (from 1785 to 1813). On Nov.
18 of the latter year, the Rev. Joel Mason was ordained as his colleague. Dr. Wight was dismissed at his own request Nov. 11, 1819. His residence during the remainder of his life was among his own people in Bristol. He died Aug. 12, 1837. His ministry in Bristol was a prosperous one, two hundred and thirty-eight persons being received into the membership of the church dur-ging the ten years. See Harvard University, p. 87; Memorials of R. I. Conv. Ministers, (J. C. S.)

Wightman, William May, D.D., LL.D., a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born at Charleston, S. C., Jan. 8, 1808. He was converted at sixteen, graduated from Charleston College in 1827, entered the South Carolina Conference in 1828, and immEDIATELY sprang into position and popularity. After laboring successively on the Palmetto, Orangeburg, Sumter, and Abbeville circuits, and in the Charleston and Camden stations, he was appointed agent for Randolph-Macon College in 1834; in 1837 was made professor of English literature in that institution; two years later he was appointed president of it, and when died, 1851, he was one of the Southern Christian Advocate; in 1854 president of Wofford College; in 1855 president of the Southern University at Greensboro', Ala.; and in 1866 bishop, an office which he filled with great ability until his death in Charleston, Feb. 15, 1882. He was singularly effective as a preacher, dignified and successful as an administrator, ardent as a friend, and modest and earnest as a Christian. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1865, p. 151.

Wigram, Joseph Cotton, D.D., a bishop of the Church of England, was born Dec. 26, 1798, being the son of right Reverend Wigram, bart. He graduated at Cambridge in 1820, and was ordained deacon in 1822, and priest the next year; in 1827 he was appointed secretary of the National Society for Promoting the Education of the Poor, and in the same year became assistant minister at St. James's, Westminster; in 1835 he was appointed rector of East Twickenham, Hants, and was made archdeacon of Winchester, holding that position until his appointment as bishop of Rochester, to which he was consecrated in 1860; from 1861 until 1869 he was rector of St. Mary's, Southampton. He died suddenly at London, April 6, 1867. His literary remains consist of a large number of published sermons. See was born in 1282, and was an archdeacon in Wiltshire.

For a time he was fellow of Merton College, and was advanced to the see of Dublin, Oct. 12, 1375, before the close of which year he was consecrated. In 1377 he was appointed chancellor of Ireland. In 1378 he had an excommunication and confirmation of the manor of Swords to him and his successors. About 1385 he obtained a grant to the see of all its possessions. In 1392 De Wikeford was ordered to attend a conference of the prelates, to be held at Nass. In 1385 he was again appointed lord chancellor. In 1399 he visited Eng-lond, where he died, Aug. 29 of that year. See D'Alton,

Wilbur, Hevey, D.D., an American minister, was born at Wendell, Mass., in 1878. He was pastor of his native place from 1871 to 1872; subsequently presided over several female seminaries; and died at New-buryport in 1886. He was the author of a course on the Religious Education of Youth (1814) — Reference of Useful Knowledge (1830) — and Reference Testament for Bible Classes (1831).

Wilbur, John, an American minister of the Society of Friends, was born at Hopkinton, R. I., in 1774. He oppressed the introduction into the society of new doctrines or practices. In 1886 he was accused by several members of the Rhode Island yearly meeting of publishing statements derogatory to the character of Joseph Gurney, who was then visiting the United States. He was so moved by his own personal meeting, that of South Kingston; but that body having been superseded by the Greenwhich meeting, he was disowned by the latter body, and its action confirmed by the higher powers. His supporters in various parts of New England united in forming a separate yearly meeting, whose members were known as "Wilburites." They maintain the strictest traditions of the sect, and claim that Quakers, as a body, are giving up their principles. Mr. Wilbur died in 1856. He was the author of, Narrative and Description of the Late Proceedings of the New England Yearly Meeting, etc. (1845): A Few Remarks upon the Controversy between Good and Evil in the Society of Friends (1856)—and his Journal and Correspondence have appeared since his death (1859).

From the frequent and familiar allusions to the wild ass in Scripture, we may conclude it was much more numerous in the countries adjacent to Palestine in former times than it is at present. Though well known by name, the wild ass is rarely now found west of the

Hauran (Bassan); nor do we find it in the Syrian wilderness. The species which is found east of Syria is the Ainus hemippus, or Syrian wild ass, which differs from the Ainus hemieon, the wild ass of Central Asia, in sundry slight particulars of osteology and form. This species was undoubtedly known to the Jews, and is probably the pere of Scripture. The Ainus vulgaris, or Onager of the ancients, the original of the tame ass, inhabits the Egyptian deserts, and must also have been known. If the species were distinguished from the Syrian one, it may probably be the orod of the Hebrew. Travellers have seen this ass wild in the deserts of North Africa, in small troops of four or five. When riding in the Sahara, they have detected what they took to be antelopes on a slightly elevated mound of sand; then, by their glasses, discovering they had no horns, they suspected they were the horses of Bedawin, who might be concealed behind them, till they allowed an approach sufficiently near to make them out more clearly, when, snuffing up the wind, they dashed off at a speed which the best of horses could not have approached. Tritaram saw a wild ass in the oasis of Souf, which had been branded with a colt; but though it had been kept for three years in confinement, it was as untractable as when first caught, biting and kicking furiously at every one who approached it, and never enduring a saddle on its back. In appearance and color it could not have been distinguished from one of the finest specimens of the tame ass. The Syrian wild ass (Ainus hemippus) in no way differs from the African in habits. All the species of wild ass are more or less migratory, travelling north and south, according to the season, in large herds. The Asiatic (Ainos hemippus) proceed in summer as far north as Armenia, marking their course by grazing the herbage very closely on their march. In winter they descend as far as the shores of the Persian Gulf. In the same manner the African species is only in summer on the coasts of Egypt, retiring in winter towards the interior. Their habit of congregating at watering-places, and of standing on the watch on any rising ground, are both alluded to in Scripture (Psa. civ. 11; Jer. xiv. 6). See Traitram, "Nat. Hist. of the Bible," p. 42. See Asa.

Wild Beast is the rendering of the A.V. at Psa. i. 11; 1xxx. 13 [elsewhere "abundance," Isa. lxvi. 11], of "siz, a poetical word for any moving creature of the field. Another Heb. term, sadoth (twn), Sept. Σαταρ, Σάταρ, τατάρας, κτήων, θρατσών, θρατσίων, satoth, satoth, satoth; Vulg. foeta, animantis, animalis), also rendered "beast," "wild beast," "the female of the adjective of, "living," used to denote any animal. It is, however, very frequently used specially of "wild beast" when the meaning is often more fully expressed by the addition of the word ἡμιτίς, has-sadk (wild beast) "of the field" (Exod. xxiii. 11; Lev. xxvi. 22; Deut. vii. 22; Hos. ii. 14; xiii. 7; Jer. xii. 7, etc.). Similar is the use of the Chaldean ἡμιτίς, chesed (Dan. iv. 11). See Beast.

Wild Beast of the Desert is the rendering of the A.V. at Isa. xiii. 21; xxxiv. 14; Jer. i. 26 [elsewhere "dwelling in the wilderness," (Psa. lxx. 9; xxxv. 14; Isa. xxi. 13) of the Heb. word found only in this sense in the plur. ὡμιτίς, ὡμιτίς, although the sing. ομίτις, occurs Num. xxiv. 22; Isa. xxxiii. 21; Ezek. xxx. 9; Dan. xi. 30, in the sense of "ship." It is thought to denote some (or perhaps any) species of animal living in the desert, such as the ostrich, etc. The ancient versions are inconsistent (Sept., Syriac, inodmata; Vulg. bestia, dracome.) The Targum understands apes, Michaelis (Suppl. p. 2986) serpentes, Antirivllius (Distort. p. 296) vmpqyq, Sandites and Abdulwaid wild bulls, and others wild cats. See Bokhart, Hierosol. ii. 211.

Wild Beast of the Islands is the rendering of the A.V. at Isa. xiii. 22; xxxiv. 14; Jer. i. 29, of the Heb. word which occurs in this sense only in the plur. ὡμιτίς, ὡμιτίς, although it frequently occurs both in the sing. and plur. in the sense of "island," The ancient interpreters variously understand cats (Chald. and Kimchi) and spectres (Sept. ἐπονομασάτοκαί; but later writers generally agree that the jackal (q. v.) is meant, from its habit of howling (Bokhart, Hierosol. i. 485).

Wild Bull is the rendering of the A.V. at Isa. ii. 20, of θετος, to (Sept. στερείεις; Vulg. oryx), which is now generally thought to denote some of the larger species of oryq, (q. v.), as the same word in a slightly longer form, θετος, θετος, occurs elsewhere (Deut. xiv. 3, A.V. "wild ox," where the ancient interpreters (Sept. ἱππεῖς; Vulg. oryz), as well as the context, agree in that sense. The particular kind is probably the oryx, although no exact species may have been intended. Others, however, are inclined to regard the creature intended as kindred rather with the rees, or "unicorn" of our version. It is a singular fact that various animals of the ox kind are figured on the monuments as tribute to the ancient Assyrians. See Buffalo.

Wilderness is in the A.V. the most frequent rendering of ἡμιτίς (wildbear, ἀγιος), which primarily denotes a region not regularly tilled or inhabited (Job xxxviii. 28; Isa. xxxii. 15; Jer. ii. 2), but used for pasture (from ἄγιος, to track, referring to the cattle-paths) (Jer. ix. 9; Psa. lvii. 13; Joel ii. 22; Luke xv. 4); mostly treeless and dry, but not entirely destitute of vegetation or fertility, such as are of frequent occurrence in the East (Robinson ii. 656; occasionally cultivated in spots, Josephus, Ant. xii. 4, 5). Towers were sometimes erected in them for the protection of flocks (2 Chron. xxvi. 10; 2 Kings xvii. 9; comp. Isa. i. 8). The term is likewise in some instances applied to particular barren tracts of hard arid steppes (Isa. xxxv. 6; xii. 16; xiii. 20; Lam. iv. 3; Mal. i. 8, 11) in which occur with wild animals (see Rosenmüller, Morgenl. 88 sq.); although in such spots the words ἄγιος (Joel ii. 2; lv. 19) ἄγιος (see Credner, in the Stud. v. Kirch. 1835, iii. 788 sq.), are usually employed. For a remarkable phenomenon of these dry wastes, see Mirag.

Although this kind of region is not particularly characteristic of Palestine, yet the term midbear is applied to the following localities in it or its immediate vicinity (see Dussart): 1. The Wilderness of Judah, also called Joshimone (1 Sam. xxiii. 19; xxxvi. 1, 3), is a rocky district in the eastern part of that tribe adjoining the Dead Sea and including the town of Engedi (Josh. xxv. 61; Judg. i. 16). It appears to have extended from the vicinity of the Keridon, a few miles east of Jerusalem, to the S.W. shore of the Dead Sea and to the hills of Judah. The convent of Mar Saba (q. v.) is a marked feature of one of its wild and barren della. See Judah, Wilderness of. On the N.W. border of the wilderness of Judah lay the Wilderness of Tekoah (2 Chron. xx. 18; v. 20; 1 Mac.
The western section is triangular in form, the base being marked by the Mediterranean coast and the hills of Judea. It is ruled by the Sultan of Turkey in Asia, and is divided into the provinces of Damascus and Beyrut. The coastal strip, which is about 20 miles wide, is fertile and produces a variety of crops, including wheat, barley, olives, and figs. The interior, on the other hand, is arid and consists mainly of desert and semi-desert areas.

The region is noted for its rich and varied wildlife, including numerous species of birds, mammals, and reptiles. The Mediterranean coast is home to a variety of fish and marine life, while the interior harbors a diverse array of reptiles, such as lizards, snakes, and turtles. The Mediterranean Sea is also a popular destination for both leisure and sport fishing, with opportunities for deep-sea fishing and yachting.

In terms of historical significance, the region has been the site of several important events and civilizations. The ancient city of Damascus, for example, is one of the oldest continuously inhabited cities in the world, and has been a center of trade and culture for thousands of years. The city is home to a variety of archaeological sites and landmarks, including the Umayyad Mosque and the Citadel of Damascus.

The region is also home to a number of religious sites, including the ancient city of Jerusalem, which is considered sacred by three major religions: Judaism, Christianity, and Islam. Jerusalem is home to a variety of religious and cultural landmarks, including the Western Wall, the Dome of the Rock, and the Church of the Holy Sepulchre.

In conclusion, the region of the Mediterranean coast and its interior is a fascinating destination, offering a rich blend of natural beauty, cultural heritage, and historical significance.
triangle on its west and east sides respectively. One or other of them is in sight from almost all the summits of the island, and, far away to the west, the two branch towers on the north end of the gulf of Suez are visible from the highest points of the two branches. The eastern coast of the gulf of Suez is strewed with shells, and with the forests of subaqueous vegetation, which grow in the shallow water where the whole surface of the bay is covered with limestone vegetation of the "Sea of Weeds." The "huge trunks" of its trees of coral may be seen even on the dry shore, where the fragments of madrepores gathered from the jewel-like surface of the quaking coraline forests are described (Stanley, Sinai and Palestine, p. 28) as marking the coast of the gulf of Akaba. The northern portion of the western shore of Suez is a plain, bounded southwards by the range of the el-Th, which droops across it on the map with a curve somewhat like that of a slack chain, whose points are, westwards, Suez, and eastwards, but farther south, some "sandstone cliffs," which shut off this region from the gulf of Akaba. The north-western mountains of this chain converge with the shore of the gulf of Suez, till the two run nearly parallel. Its eastern shore, however, consists of several fragments of long and short ridges towards the gulf of Akaba and the northern plateau called from it el-Th. The Jebel Dhiilal (Burckhardt, ch. 4) is the most southerly of the continuations of this eastern member (Seetzen, Reisen, III, III, 418).

The greatest elevation in the el-Th range is attained a little west of the meridian 34°, near its most southerly point; it is here 4684 feet above the Mediterranean.
Even here, however, the western slope of the plateau runs obliquely between north and east towards Helvion, westward of which line, and northward from the western mountains, the whole plateau, with its gradual slope to the Mediterranean. The shorter and more steep eastern slope with its contrary direction drained by the great Wady el-Arâbîa, along a gradual slope to the Mediterranean. The shorter and more
steep eastern slope with its contrary direction
among the Wady fiyâk and el-Jelb, entering the Dead Sea, and still lower than the northern wall of the Ghôr, and partly finds an outlet nearly parallel, but farther to the south, by the Wady Jerash into the Arabian Sea. This great depression of the Potamon is below the Mediterranean) explains the greater steepness of this eastern slope. In crossing this plateau, Seetzen found, that, running over the top of the plateau, it had worked its way through the desert, and spent its energy in forming the large sandstone plateaus, westwards and eastwards. The parts of its flat, which contained a few shrubs or isolated large clumps of vegetation, were there in heights steep on one side, composed of white chalk with frequent inlets of flat embedded (ibid. III, 45). The plateau has a central plateau, which he calls the Nûkûl, so named because of its date-trees which once adorned its wady, but which have all disappeared. This point is nearly equidistant from Suez westwards, Akaba eastwards, el-Arish northwards, and the foot of Jebel Mûsá southwards. It lies half a mile north of the "Haj route," between Suez and Akaba, which traverses "a boundless flat, dreary and desolate" (ibid. p. 56), and is 1494 feet above the Mediterranean—
nearly on the same meridian as the highest point before assigned to el-Th. On this meridian also lies um-Elbâ-mir, farther south, the highest point of the entire peninsula, more than 600 feet higher than the highest point that of el-Th. A little to the west of the same meridian lies, on the northern edge of the great peninsula, the sizable height of 34° 17'. Thus the parallel 31° and the meridian 34° form important axes of the whole region of the Arabian peninsula. A full description of the wildness of el-
Th is given by Robinson (Bibl. Resa, I, 177, 178, 199); together with a memorandum of the traveller who explored it previously to himself.

On the eastern edge of the plateau to the north of the el-Th range, which is raised terrase-wise by a step from the level of the Ghôr, rises a singular second, or, reckoning that level itself, a third plateau, superimposed on the entire surface of the el-Th region. These Atoseggers (Map) distinguish as three terraces in the several courses. Dr. Kruse, in his Anmerkungen on Seetzen's travels (Reisen, III, III, 410), remarks that the Jebel el-Th is the monte niger, or massato of Ploery, and that the view that ranges descends to the extreme southerly point of the peninsula, thus infinitely extending to the interior of the same, the Sinaitic region. This confusion arose from a want of distinct conceptions of the general details. The name seems to have been obtained from the dark, or even black, color which is observable in parts.

The Haj route from Suez to Akabah, crossing the peninsula in a direction a little south of east, may stand for the chord of the arc of the el-Th range, the length of which latter is about one hundred and twenty miles. This slope, descending northwards from the higher ranges of the Arabian peninsula, is of limonite (Stanley, Sinai and Palestine, p. 7), covered with coarse gravel interspersed with black flints and divided into smaller pieces by the Atoseggers (Map). But its depression has not been so extreme, ozen, ascent, and slope having once grazed in parts of it where now only the camel is found.
Three passes through the el-Th range are mentioned by Robinson (Bibl. Resa, I, 192; comp. 565-565, App. xxii).—el-Râkin, the western; el-Murânikhi, the eastern; and el-Warâm, between the two. These all meet south of Re-hsibeh (Rehoboth, Gen. xxxv, 22), in about north latitude 35° 2', east longitude 34° 45', and these diverge towards Hebron and Gaza. The eastern is noted by Atosegger as 4883 feet above sea-level. Seetzen took the el-Th range for the "Mount Seba," passed on the way from Sinai (Horeh, Deut. I, 7) to Kadesh Barnea by the Israelites would form a conspicuous object on the left to the Israelites, going south-eastwards near the coast of the gulf of Suez. Seetzen, proceeding towards Suez, e. a. in the opposite direction, mentions a high sandy plain (Reisen, III, 111), apparently near Wady Ghûfrînâd, whence its steep southern face was visible in a white streak stretching westwards and eastwards. Dr. Stanley (Sinai and Palestine, p. 7) says, "However much the other mountains of the peninsula vary in form or height, the mountains of the Th are always alike—always faithful to their tabular outline and blanched desolation." They appear like a long limonite wall." This traveller saw them, however, only "from a distance" (ibid. and note 3). Seetzen, who crossed them, going from east to west, says of the view from the highest ridges of the lower mountain-line,
"What a huddlescape was that I looked down upon! On all parted the sky, so white the ridge, and in the distant view in every direction, without tree, shrub, or speck of green. It was an alternation of flat and hills, for the most part black as night, only the naked rock-walls on the hummocks and heights showed patches of dazling white light. The picture is a striking image of our globe, when, through Phenex's careless eye, the sun came too near to it." (Reisen, III, 50). Similarly, describing the scenery of the Wady el-Arâbîa, by which he had traversed the el-Th range, he says, "On the south side rose a considerable range, dense-lie. Here was the wild, crooked, and naked. All was limonite, chalk, and dirty. The chaff cliffs gave the steep offset of the Th range on its south side the aspect of a rose mountain." (p. 55). The Wady el-Arâbîa, attributing its name to the Arabians, is the same river which, although not the usual one for travellers, is by Wady Wutah, which lies at the head of Wady Ghûfrînâd, and which is a fair specimen of the pass of the entire region.
The other routes which traverse the peninsula are, that from Hebron to Suez along the maritime plain, at a distance of from ten to thirty miles from the sea, passing el-Arâbîah; that from Suez to Tars, along the coast of the gulf of Suez through the Ras; and that from Akaba, near Elom-geber, descending the western wall of the Arabah through the Wady el-Jelb, by several passes, not far from the mouth of the Suez. The eastern shore is more of a course here nearly north-west, then again north. A modern mount road has been partially constructed by Abbâs Pasha in the pass of the Wady Elom, leading from the coast of the gulf of Suez towards the convent commonly called St. Catherine's. The ascent from the trough of the Arabah (which is steeper-sided at its northwestern extremity than elsewhere) towards the general plains of the Dead Sea. All but the uppermost part of the Arabah, and that of the deeper floor of the Dead Sea itself, is marked by a broad and that of broad surface is attained. The smaller plateau rests abruptly upon the latter, slitting the Dead Sea at Mount Sodom, and that of the higher floor of the Dead Sea at the Arava, and is reached by ascending through the higher Nablus, Kispert, and from the southern face of the Mount Ida, plateaus, considerably to the west of south, owing to this obliquity, and is delineated like a wide belt of lowlands, having клипы at the south-east angle a bold butts and the Jebel Mukhār, and at the south-west angle in the Jebel Arilf en-called promontory at sea. From the former mountain, in the north latitude, this plateau extends northward a little, till it emerges in the southern slope of Judaea, but at about 30° 30' north latitude, it is traversed almost directly through by the Wady Pibrak, one of its branches, eroding its area eastward, and not quite meeting the Wady Mīrāh, which has its declivity apparently towards the Wady el-Arish westward. The face of the mountains is not a wild aspect of broken, cliff, and irregular masses, with pointed tops and precipices of the entire group, is of four huge ranges, which run north and south, and with an inclination eastward. The ranges are separated from each other by deep valleys or watercourses. The entire range was once scored by the Edomites, and travelers seem to see remarkable features for the rocks and mountains seemed to be of interest for the Edomites, and interest that a few leading details of the aspect of principal mountains may find place here. Approaching the granitic country, the life of the mountain is very different. Here are seen three masses, "ever between two high and naked cliffs of granite." All possible forms of mountains blended in the view, lying in a chain, continuous, and of various forms, surrounded, and rounded (Reisen, III, 67, 69). Immediately previous to reaching the Wady el-Arish, the Wady Mīrāh is filled with stone cliffs, which in El-Dīblil bounded the sandy plain er-Ramlah on the eastern side, while similar steep sandstone cliffs are seen in the upper sources er-Ghazal, view small bright quartz (Quartz-kiesel), of white-yellow and reddish hue, was observed in the coarse-grained sandstone. the north-east, and of the Sissilnic range, "closely packed" with the intermediate Jebel Watleh, "forming the most confused mass of mounlin-tops that can be imagined" (p. 112). The ascent of the peak was like "the ascent of a glacier, only of smooth granite, instead of ice. At a quarter of an hour from the summit he also "came to a labyrinth of rocks, sharp and angular on the surface of the smooth, slippery rock" (p. 112). On the northern summit are visible the remains of a building, "composed of square-faced stones and sound mortar," and "close beside it three of those mysterious inscriptions," being the "only object of interest surrounded by the ruins of pilgrims who used these characters" (Sinait and Palestine, p. 72).

2. At little Jebel Musa from the west is only practicable on foot. It lies through Wady Solam and the Nibkh Hawy, "whose stair of rock leads upward to the summit. It is a long flight of rude steps winding through crease of gran- ite." He reached it by "an ascent on the south-west of the slope of the ascent, and the summit is marked by the ruins of a mosque and of a Christian church. But, Struensee adds, "it is on the high plain that the landscape remains higher still," and the point of this, "Jebel Musa, eighty feet in diameter, is distant two hours and more from the plain, but within an hour's walk of the ascent. The summit seems a small, steep, and high mountain, which is inter- pested with crevasses and rocks. It is said to be the tomb of the prophet Mozes. The ascent, and from its position, surveys both the openings of es- Shelikh north-east and of er-Rahbeh north-west, which command the road to the Mount of Beatitudes, and, as Struensee states, is described as being, in conjunction with these moun- tains, wonderfully suggestive, both to its grandeur and its sublimity, for the giving and the receiving of the Law. "That such a plain should exist at all in front of such a cliff is so remarkable a coincidence with the ac- cedus narratives, as to furnish a strong internal argument, not merely of its identity with the scene, but of the scene itself having been described by an eye-witness" (Sinait and Palestine, p. 47, 48). The character of the Sissilnic granite is described by Seetzen (Iviesen, ii, 88) as being (1) slate-layered, (2) mottled with white quartz, black, red, and grey-white with abundance of the same mica. He adds that the first kind is larger-grained and hay- seed-like, the second is a more 3. Two hours' journey south from Jebel Musa, the road through the wilderness, which would not be the case with the mountains, as the--this symbolism also contains reference to "the rock with the twelve months for the twelve tribes of Israel," i.e. the five small crested rocks in the desert which are the only matter their prayers before it. Bishop Clayton accepted it as genuine, so did Wiston, the translator of Josephus; but still, as Plutarch says, "it is the most ignorant man in the world," so they must be "less conspicuous," in the same valley, "with pra- cedly similar marks." In the pass of the Wady es-S sélection de la voie de Musa vers le mont, est un gave de la tradition musulmane, qui est encore un sujet de controverses. Le mont est considéré comme le lieu du deplacement de Moise, et les traditions lui attribuent de nombreuses miracles, tels que l'extinction des eaux de la mer Rouge. En effet, le mont est situé sur une colline isolée, qui domine la vallée de Wady Solam, et qui est entourée de rochers abrupts. La montagne est un sanctuaire pour les musulmans, et elle est également un point de passage pour les pèlerins qui se rendent au mont Sinaï.

3. L'ascension du mont Musa, à partir de la plaine, est un défi pour les marcheurs. Elle passe par un vallon encaissé, entouré de rochers abrupts et de falaises. À mi-parcours, un chemin sinueux mène à la cime du mont. La montagne est couverte de rochers et de pierres, qui font de l'ascension un véritable parcours de montagnes. À la cime, on peut observer une vue panoramique sur la région environnante, avec des montagnes et des vallées à perte de vue.

4. La montagne de Musa est un lieu de pèlerinage important pour les musulmans. Elle est également un lieu de méditation et de prière. Les traditions lui attribuent de nombreux miracles, dont l'une des plus célèbres est l'extinction des eaux de la mer Rouge. En effet, lors de l'histoire de Moïse, il est raconté qu'il a transformé une eau de mer en eau potable, ce qui a été considéré comme un miracle par les musulmans. Ainsi, le mont Musa est un lieu de foi et de spiritualité, qui attire chaque année des milliers de pèlerins venus du monde entier pour y effectuer leur pèlerinage.
tween them, while Mt. St. Catherine bounds the scene on the north (see Palmer's Desert of the Exodus, p. 592 sq.).

6. The rocks, on leaving Sinai on the east for Aksab, are curiously interlaced, as if made by some artificer, and support the foundations of the wady al-Khazneh and Mokattash. Wady Suyal contains "hills of a conical shape, curiously splayed across each other, and with an appearance of serpentine and basalt. The wady...then inundated a short rocky pass--of hills capped with sandstone--and entered on a plain of deep sand--the first we had encountered--over which were scattered isolated clumps of sandstone, with occasional chasms...At the close of this plain an isolated rock, its high tiers rising out of lower tiers, like a castle," here "the level ranges of the 5th rose in front." Soon after, on striking down, apparently north-eastwards, "a sandy desert, amidst fantastic sandstone rocks, mixed with talus and dullest green, as if of turf," succeeded. After this came a desert strewn with "fragments of the 7th," i.e. limestone, but "presently," in the Wady Udabah, which turns at first nearly due northward, and then deflects westward, the "high granite rocks" reappeared; and in the Wady el-Ahli, the "rocks red, red granite or black basalt, occasionally draped as if with curtains of sandstone to the height of about one thousand feet...and finally open on the sea." At the mouth of the pass are many traces of flood--trees torn down, and strewn along the wind (ibid., p. 80, 51).

III. Comparative Fertility.--A most important general question is the extent to which this "wilderness" is capable of supporting the arable and human life, especially when taxed by the consumption of such flocks and herds as the Israelites took with them from Egypt, and probably--though we know not to what extent this last was supplied by the monies--by the demand made on its resources by a host of from 2,000,000 to 3,000,000 souls. In answer to this question, "must it be observed (Sinait and Palæstine, p. 94), "may be allowed for the spread of the tribes of Israel far and wide through the whole peninsula, and also for the constant means of support from their own flocks and herds." Something, too, might be elicited from the unobtrusive fact that a population nearly if not quite, equal to the whole permanent population of the peninsula does actually pass through the desert, in the caravans of the five thousand African pilgrims, on their way to Mecca. By these considerations, it is important to observe what indications there may be of the mountains of Sinai having ever been able to furnish greater resources than at present. These indications are well summed up by Blunt (Sinait, p. 268, 272). There is no doubt that the vegetation of the wady has considerably decreased. In part, this would be an inevitable effect of the violence of the winter torrents. The trunks of palm-trees washed up on the shore of the Dead Sea, from which the living tree has now for many centuries disappeared, show what may have been the devastation produced among those mountains where the floods, especially in earlier times, must have been violent to a degree unknown in Palæstine; while the peculiar cause--the imperigation of salt--which has preserved the vestiges of the older vegetation there, has, of course, no existence. The traces of such a destruction were pointed out to Burckhardt (Arab. p. 539) on the eastern side of Mount Sinai, as having occurred within half a century before his visit; also to Mr. Gough (ibid., p. 79) on the western side, having occurred near Tüf, in 1823. In part, the same result has followed from the reckless waste of the Bedawin tribes--reckless in destroying and careless in replenishing. A fire, a pipe, lit under a grove of desert trees, may clear away the vegetation of a whole valley.

The sycamore-trees have been of late years ruthlessly destroyed by the Bedawin for the sake of charcoal, which forms "the chief, perhaps the only traffic of the peninsula" (Sinait and Palæstine, p. 94). Thus the clearance of this tree in the mountains where it abounded once, and its decrease in the neighboring groves in which it abounds still, is accounted for, since the monks appear to have aided the devastation. Vegetation, where maintained, nourishes water and keeps alive its own life, and no attempts to produce vegetation anywhere in this desert seem to have failed. "The gardens at the walls of Mecca, under the French and English agents from Suez, and the gardens in the valleys of Jebel Musa, under the care of the Greek monks of the convent of St. Catherine," are conspicuous examples (ibid., p. 76). Besides, a traveller in the 16th century calls the Wady el-Rabah, in front of the convent, now entirely bare, "a vast green plain" (Monemusa). In this wilderness, too, abode Amalek, "the first of the nations," powerful enough seriously to imperil the passage of the Israelites through it, and important enough to receive the name of one of the petty kings, or "charybes," of that monarchy. Besides them we have "king Arad the Canaanite, who dwelt in the south," i.e. apparently on the terrace of mountain overhanging the Ghob near Masada on the Dead Sea, in a region now wholly desolate. If his people were identical with the Amorites or Canaanites of Num. xiv, 65; Deut. i, 4, 44 then, besides the Amalekites of Exod. xxvii, 8, we have one host within the limits of what is now desert who fought with Israel on equal or superior terms; and, if they are not identical, we have two such (Numb. iv, 40-45; xxi, 1; xxix, 40; Deut. i, 4, 44). These must have been "something more than a mere handful of bedawin. The Egyptian copper-mines, monuments, and hieroglyphics in Gebel el Khadura and the Wady Meghara imply a degree of intercourse between Egypt and the peninsula" in a period probably older than the Exodus, "of which all other traces have long ceased. The ruined cities of Edom, in the mountains east of the Arabah, and the remains and history of Petra itself, indicate a traffic and a population in those remote regions which now is almost inconceivable" (Sinait and Palæstine, p. 96). Even the 6th and 7th centuries A.D. showed traces of habitation, some of which still remain in ruined cells and gardens, etc., far exceeding the tale told by present facts. Section, in what is perhaps as arid and desolate a region as any in the whole desert, asked his guides to mention all the neighboring places whose names he knew. He received a list of sixty-three places in the neighborhood of Madáin, Petra, and Aksab, and of twelve more in the Ghob as-Sabi'ah, of which total of seventy-five all save twelve are now abandoned to the desert, and have retained nothing save their names—"a proof," he remarks, "of the extent of this principal coming from the sea, and accidental, and that the fierce rage with which the Arabs, both before and after the age of Mohammed, assailed the sea, and the exulting spirit of the desert, as foreign in this blooming region, extending from the limit of the Hejaz to the neighborhood of Damascon " (Ramat. III, 106).

Thus the same traveller in the same journey (from Hebron to the Dead Sea), who found a secretively concealed in a cistern, and served out by slaves, might probably have clothed the bare wady with verdure. This is confirmed by the remark of the same author, "the vegetation shows itself in this climate wherever there is water, and is even seen in the desert at Hebron, as is practiced in Hindustan. He also notices that there are quicksands in many spots of the Debbat er-Rahim, which is difficult to cross to-day, much more as understood in accumulations of water (ibid. p. 67). Similarly in the desert Wady el-Kudeisa, between Hebron and Sion, he found a spot of quicksand with sparse shrubs growing in it (ibid. p. 48). Now the situation is surely a pertinent one, as compared with that of the subsequence of the flocks and herds of the Israelites during their wanderings, how the sixty-two thousand that have perished in the desert could have sustained themselves? It is pretty certain that fish cannot live in the Dead Sea, nor is there any reason for supposing that its shores were of such large proportion near enough to its waters to avail themselves of the vegetation when the ground was watered. It is possible that the country could ever have supported extensive cultures for game is the most difficult of all countries to rear animals, and the difficulty of obtaining this is increased by the nature of the soil, the rocks, as bays, antelopes, gazelles, jerboas, and the hordes that burrow in the sand (el-dabab), alike the population of several places, that is, not at Sion, III, 410-446, and Laborde, Comm. on Num. xxiii, 40, are far too few, to judge from appearances, to do more than suggest a possible season of the rise of the water. If the country were otherwise supplied, and the same remark will apply for such casu infections as arabs of edible lagorad, or frits of quails. Nor can the memory of these places be probably connected with the distant period when Petra was in the desert [the desert of the Arabic] and we have enjoyed the thriving trade between the Levant and Egypt westwards, and the rich communities farther east. There is this remarkable, that the south of the mountains to the existence of mines, or by asphalt gathered from the Dead Sea, or by any other native commodities, they can ever have enjoyed a commerce of their own. We are thrown back, then, upon the supposition that they must in some way have protected themselves from the produce of the soil. And the produce for which it is most adapted is either that of the date-palm, or that of earlier parallel points, as those of Jethro and the Kadesh, and of the various communities in the southern border of Jindah (Num. xiv. 22), or the herd of yaks or as if, that of pasture for flocks and herds, a possibility which seems solely to depend on adequately husbanding the produce of the soil. The very name, the use of the word ἡππά, for "wilderness," i.e. "a wide open space, with or without actual pasture, the country of the nomads, as distinguished from that of the agriculture," (Gen. xxxii, 8) App. I 9). There seems, however, to be implied in the name a capacity for pasture, whether actually realized or not. This corresponds, too, with the "thistle," or rather "transparent coating of vegetation," seen to clothe the greater part of the Sinai wilderness in the present day (ibid. p. 16, 32), and which furnishes an initial mulhum on which human fostering hands might extend the prospect of domestication. It all Ran to a great extent in other facts as were the numbers of the Israelite host above the six thousand Bedouin computed for by the census of the desert (ibid. p. 16), as regards the date-palm, Hez-eklitas speaks as though it addition, the absence of the meaning of "wildness" in the Arabic communities. Hamilton (Sion, p. 17) says that in his path by the Wady Hebran, towards the modern Sion, the "thistle" is common, and that between the granite walls of the pass, wherever the winter torrents have left sufficient debris for their nourishment. Again, after describing the uses of the passes of the Con- vent, he continues, "beneath lies a veritable chaos, through which the mountain torrent rushes during a winter and during the last winter rushes down a bolting torrent " (ibid. p. 19). It is hardly too much to affirm that the resources of the country, and the vegetation, on a small area in which might be, to its present means of subsistence, as that winter torrent's volume to that summer streamlet's slender flow, as "the galley's natural bath," "formed in the granite by the "Ain Hebran, called "the Christian well," (ibid. p. 33). At the base of the Jebel Moses he cau shown upon a "frozen streamlet" (ibid. p. 58); and Seetzen, on April 14, found snow lying in sheltered clefts of Mt. St. Catherine, where the rays of sun could not penetrate (Ill, 92).

Himilcon encountered on the Jebel Mousa, with "heavy rain" (Sion, p. 16). There seems to the country no doubt of the possibility of an irrigation system, that an employment in the desert. The graphical situation would rather bespeak a copious supply. Any shortly wind must bear a great amount of water vapor, as shown by the Red Sea, or by the sand, which is the eastern flank of Egypt, which screens the rain supply of the former; therefore, in the valley of the Nile, the contrary, the conformation of the peninsula, with the high wedge of granite mountains at its core, would rather receive and condense the vapor from either south, and precipitate their bounty over the lower faces of mountain and troughts of wady, inter-seep between it and the sea. It is much to be regretted that the low intellectual conditions of the monks forbid any reasonable hope of adequate measures to be taken. It would be of the greatest possible interest to see these merely probable arguments with trustworthy statistics and facts: but in the absence of any such register, it seems only fair to take them as much as not to mislead the reader. Some significant facts are not wanting to redeem in some degree these probabilities from the ground of mere by-haghery. "The mountain wilderness on the coast of the Gulf of Suez," "Ghurin-keld and Do, with its continuation of the Wady Tilstul, the tracts of vegetation are to be found in confusion of vegetation." The wadys leading down from the Sinai range in general to the Gulf of Aqaba, the coast of the Nile, and even the Nile, are in still greater degree," as stated by Ribieli, Miss Martin, Dr. Robinson, and Buckhardt. "In three spots, however, in the desert of Sion, the Ghalr, the Ghalr, the Ghurne, and the Ghurne, the wadys from the mountains immediately above the convent of St. Catherine must always have made that region one of the most important in the world, and the source of the springs of Ammon in the western desert of the Nile) are to be found wherever the waters from the different wadys or hills, whether the torrents or springs, or the showers of rain, or the springs as have just been described, converge to a common reservoir. One such oasis in the Sinai desert seems to be the palm- grove of el-Wady at Tsur, described by Buckhardt as so thick that hardly one can find his way through it (Stiin and Palestine, p. 7). Buckhardt, el-Wad, 892). The other and the more important is the Abu Feiran, high up in the table-land of Sion itself (ibid. p. 12, 19). Now, what nature has done in these favored spots might surely be seconded in the eastern part of the desert as a result of the frequent shows and bullying that the country has even the wife's family others who knew it even better than he (Num. x. 31). It is thus supposable that the language of Prov. cv. 9 may be based on the actual fact: "He turneth the wilderness into a stauding water, and her land into a garden (Psa. cvii, 35) which he maketh the hungry to dwell, that they may prepare a city for habituation; and sow the fields and plant vineyards, which may yield fruits of luxuriance. He beareth them so that they are multiplied greatly; and suereth not their cattle to decrease. Thus we may find an approximation of rest for the enhanced poetic imagery of Isaiah (xlii, 19; iv, 13). Palestine itself affords abundant tokens of nature so hallowed, as in the artificial "terraces of which there are still traces to the very summits" of the mountains, and some of which still, in the Jordan valley, are described as "the groves of vegetation" (Stiin and Palestine, p. 159, 597). In favored spots wild luxuriance testifies to the extent of the natural resources, especially in the confines of the classic city of Jericho, where "far and wide extends the green circle of tawny age, the green sward, and the garden" of the holy land of the modern village, beside which stood, in ancient times, the great city of Jericho " (ibid. p. 306). From this plain alone the correspondences of nature to prophecy, the Japhet asserts that he could feed the whole population of Israel's territory (Sedit Supply Reporter, June 14, 1853). But a plantistant seems to be descended from the wildness of the position of a besieged city; when once the defence of the human race is endowed with the grace of God, she is "nourished by her agency must obviously perish by the invasion of the wild. So we may probably suppose that, from numbers to grace, thus imposing upon the mind of it. Other reasons; some in situations only moderately favorable, the traces of verdure have vanished, and the desert has retained its original character of the soil only in great part by its latent capacity by an unprofitable dampness of the sand.
WILDERNESS

WILDERNESS

Seeteen, on the route from Hebron to Sinal, after describing an "immense flaming plain," the "drearriest and most terrible" in the land, observes that "long as the rainy season is over and the warm weather sets in, the pine (of rains) water drives away the thorns and there are no low woods or springs here" (iii, 55, 56).

Dr. Stewart (Teni and the Khan, p. 14, 15) says of the Wady Abiah, "a region in which the Bedawin obtain their most valuable herbage and where they secure their cattes in the safety of a large natural fortress bounded by steep cliffs on three sides" (Exod. xxxiv. 12).

Namb. xxxiii, 6, "sand-bills of considerable height separate it from the sea, and prevent the winter rains from wasting it. A considerable deposit of rich alluvial loam is the result, averaging from two to four inches in thickness, being the result of the winters of the Bedawin, who could certainly reap a rich harvest: but they affect to despise all agricultural labor.

On the contrary, the nomads of the desert have supplied food by its own natural vegetation for so great a multitude of flocks and herds as followed in the train of the nomads. One of the most sublime sentences for one can hardly tell what its improved condition under ancient civilization may have yielded. But we may almost see how the Bactrians, at any rate after the rise of the Assyrian empire, would discern their interest and would be quickened when their goods were, as it were, herds of sheep and cattle followed the Israelites out of Egypt. We only know that "sheep and herds" went with them, were for-bidden to graze "before the mountains" (Sinal), and shared the fortunes of the desert with their owners. It further appears that, at the end of the forty years wandering, twelve tribes were left. The half of the whole force was called the "sheep and cattle-masters." And, when we consider how greatly the long wandering and the hardships of the journey must have interfered with their favorite pastime during the eighties of Moses' life before the Exode, it seems reasonable to think these tribes only a few, and that the whole could have possessed cattle on leaving Egypt. The notion of a people "scattered abroad throughout all the land of Egypt" (Exod. twelve tribes) is a mere fiction, and the labor, being able generally to maintain their wealth as shepherds, was probably not even required. Therefore supposed that Reuben, Gad, and a portion of Manaseh had, by remoteness of local position, or other favorable circumstances, to protect their families, except the consequences to their flocks and herds which must have generally prevailed. We are not told that the families at the first passover were numbered from the flock of Reuben; from Joseph to be sure. The shepherds, only that they were "sheep" and "cattle" with their families. And when there was enough cattle to find their pastime in tending them, and the others had not, economy would dictate a transfer;
and the whole multitude of cattle would probably be far better by such an arrangement than by one which left a few head scattered up and down in the families of different tribes.

Nor is there any reason to think that the whole of the forty years' sojourn was spent in such location as marks the more continuous portion of the narrative. The greatest gap in the record of events left by the statement of Dent, i, 46, "Ye abode in Kadesh many days, and the people murmured at the remembrance of the eat in a haste so large and so disposed to murmur, would be, in a human sense, necessary. Nor can any so probably an in reference to the remark of the Sinaitic text, that the half tribes, as that of drawing from the wilderness whatever contributions it might be made to afford. From what they had seen in Egypt, the work of irrigation would be familiar to them, and from the prospect before them in Palestine the practice would at some time be necessary: thus there were on the whole the soundest reason for not allowing their experience, if possible, to lapse. Irrigation, though there is little, if any, difficulty in supporting its results; to the spontaneous new growth, I mean a crop of corn, small as has been cited above. At any rate it is unwise to decide the question of the possible resources of the desert from the idea, of which the apathy and idleness of the Bedawin have reduced it in modern times. On this view, while the purely pastoral tribes would retain their habit, the remnant would gradually acquire more or less inclination in those works of the field which were to be done by human labor. That, of course, is a great point in the system of the pastoral nomad, which

of Egypt and Arabia, without, however, pointing out such as are peculiar to the wilderness. Among these are thistles, thorn-apples, oca, tamarisk, and a certain kind of frog, besides fifteen of Nile-fish. Labord's "spur of serpents," scorpions, and black-spotted lizards, which perform a curious dance about a thistle or a thorny bush near Tulleh (Comm. on Numb. xxxiii. 42). The Mos. of Mr. Tytthorp speaks of starting "a large sand-colored lizard, about the size of a small mouse, which creeps like a caterpillar, with a single narrow band about his fore-legs, the elbows turning only a little inward. It is sometimes seen only, in "scales," in a regular arm, which rattled quite loudly as he ran." He "stopt before the dromedary, and when I called him by name there were found some remains of a hare at the head of the Wady Mokattab. Hassequest (p. 290) gives a Lacerta Scincus, "the Scinc," as found in Arabia Petraea, which he says is much used by the inhabitants of the East to dress their fish, and is frequently given in powder, and in broth. He also mentions the edible locust, Oryptes Arabicus, which appears to be common in the wilderness, as in other parts of Arabia, giving an account of the preparation of it for food (p. 250-255). Burkhardt names a cape not far from Akkabah, He Um Hare, from the number of serpents which abound there, and accordingly applied to this region the name of "serpent country" (in Numb. xxiii. 4-8). Schulz (ii, 262) remarked the first serpents in going from Suez and Sinaita Petro, near el-Hindab; he describes them as the "mother of the saurian" (in the plural). He saw tracks of serpents, two inches thick, in the sand. According to Rippel, serpents elsewhere in the peninsula, especially in the neighbourhood of the Red Sea, are very numerous, but he gives no name of his own for them. The spider (Lat. Segesta) (Ritter, p. 289). The spider has given his name to a place near the sea, "the boundary of Judah on the side of the southern desert. Wady es-Zaweriah, in that region, swarmed with them; and some of them, Ritter adds, are large, and capable of being killed in the Nejed (a branch wady) without finding one under it." (De Saulcy, i, 383, quoted in Sebah, p. 51.)

The reader who is curious about the fish, mollusca, etc., of the Gulf of Suez should consult Schulz (ii, 383 note); and for the method of catching them, the method in which they are preserved, and the names under which they are sold, Ritter (p. 292). For a description of the coral-banks of the Red Sea, see Ritter (p. 415 sqq.), who remarks that these formations are never found to the north of the Red Sea, but sometimes the "dom" valley is seen, as on the shore of the gulf of Akabah (Schulz, ii, 310; comp. Robinson). But the so-called "dom" valley is, according to the definition of desolation, an area of sand dunes of sterile aspect, and it is used by the Arabians as a playground for their camels. The Atmow may be mentioned as furnishing to the Bedawin the fish-skin sandals of their own produce. Ritter (p. 382) thinks that fish may have contributed materially to the sustenance of the Israelites in the desert (Numb. xx. 32, 33), as they are now dried and salted for sale in Cairo or at the Convent of St. Catherine. In a brook near the foot of Socrab, Schulz saw some varieties of Ephedra, Dracunculus, and other water insects (ibid., ii, 292 note).

As regards the flora of the desert, the most frequently found trees are the date-fruit (Pharisa dactylifera), the desert acacia, and the tamarisk. Wild Goats.

el-Handorfîk (or Handakhook), el-Liddemma, el-Haddad, Kuî, Aadam el-Hamedâr (or Aadam el-Hamdûr). Some more rare plants, precocious on account of their products, are the following: Bauhinia aeronia, or nus behen, called by the Arabs Postok el-bisân, from which an oil is extracted having no perfume of its own, but scented at pleasure with jasmine or other odoriferous leaf, etc. to make a choice unguent. It is found in Mount Sinai and Upper Egypt—Cucubita Linnana, Arab Charrah, found in Egypt and the deserts of Arabia, wherever the mountains are covered with rich soil. The tree producing the famous balsam called "of Mecca," is found many days' journey from that place, in Arabia Petraea. Linnana, after some hesitation, decided that it was a species of Anapsis. The obierbus frankincense is mentioned by Hasselquist as a product of the desert; but the producing tree appears to be the same as that which yields the gum arabic, viz., the Milomas nitens, mentioned above. The same writer mentions the Schermophila officinalis, "camel's hay," as growing plentifully in the deserts of both the Arabs, and regards it as undoubtedly one of the precious aromatic and sweet plants which the queen of Sheba gave to Solomon (Hasselquist, p. 256, 288, 294, 297; comp. p. 260, 261, 260). Fuller details on the facts of natural history of the region will be found in the writers referred to, and some additional authorities may be found in Spengei, Historia rer. Herb. vol. ii.

Besides these, the cultivation of the ground by the Sidonitic monks has enriched their domain with the choicest fruit-trees, and with a variety of other trees. The produce of the former is famed in the markets of Cairo. The cypresses of the convent are visible far away among the mountains, and there is a single copious tree near the "cave of Elias" on Jebel Mus. Besides, they have the silver and the common poplar, with other trees, for timber or ornament. The apricot, apple, pear, quince, almond, walnut, pomegranate, olive, fig, citron, orange, cornelian cherry, and two fruits named in the Arabic Neeltok and Baroal, have been successfully naturalised there (Robinson, i. 94; Seelem, iii. 76, etc.; Hasselquist, p. 420; Sinai and Palæstina, p. 281). Dr. Stanley views these as mostly introduced from Europe; Hasselquist, on the contrary, views them as being the original whence the finest varieties we have in Europe were first brought. Certainly, nearly all the above trees are common enough in the gardens of Palestine and Damascus. See Sinai.

Wild Goat is the rendering in the A. V. of two Heb. words which seem to refer to cognate species of the caprid tribe. See Goat.

1. The more frequent term is always found in the plur. יָטָהָנ (yātān), yerlîm (Sept. περγαλίς or ἀλατοῦ, Vulg. hircace), which occurs 1 Sam. xxiv, 2; Job xxxix, 1; Ps. cxxv. 18; besides the fem. sing. יַטָתֶר (ytāṭer, "roe, fishing in the evening to drink. They also asserted that, when pursued, they will throw themselves from a height of fifty feet and more upon their heads without receiving any injury." Hasselquist (Trav. p. 190) speaks of rock goats (Copra cervicapra, Linn.) which he saw hunted with falcons near Nazareth. But the C. cervicapra of Linnaeus is an antelope (Antilope cervicapra, Pall.). The Copra Simunicus, however, is not identical with the Swiss ibex or steinbock (C. albi), though it is a closely allied species. The wild goat of Arabia and Palestine differs only from the European in the shape and marking of the horns and in its lighter color. It is still occasionally found in the neighborhood of Engedi, its old resort, which thence took the name (see Tristram, Nat. Hist. of the Bible, p. 56). See ISRAEL.

2. The other word rendered "wild goat" is אֶבֶּר (ebēr), which occurs only in Deut. xiv, 5, as a clean animal, and... which the Sept. and Vulg. understand to be a kind of deer (spyrhaphos, tragelaphus), and the Targums and Syriac a goat (ṣayyim). Genesius concludes in favor of the roebuck; while other prefer the chamois, and others the gazelle. Genesius derives it from Arab. anah, while Furst says it is to be traced to a radiz nominalis, common to both the Sanscrit and Semitic tongues. Schultens (Origines Hebraicae) conjectures that the name arose from the nehm, from its nyne and semitically readiness to feed; and Dr. Harris points out what he meant to be a confirmation of this conjecture in his Travels, which, from the translations of the Sept. and Vulg., makes it a goat-deer, or Tragelaphus, such as the lerwa or šktát, by mistake referred to Capra mambrice of Linnaeus; whereas that naturalist (System. Nat. 13th ed. by Gmelin) places lerwa among the synonyms of An. cervicapra, which does not suit Shaw's notice, and is not known in Western Asia. The šktát is, however, a ruminant of the African desert, possibly one of the larger Antilopidae, with long mane, but not so yet scientifically described. Some have referred the šktát to the tribe of the Persian, l. e., the Capreus ngoragour, or the "tailing horse" (Shaw Zool. ii, 287), of Central Asia. If we could satisfactorily establish the identity of the Persian word with the Hebrew, the animal in question might represent the šktát of the Pentateuch, which might formerly have inhabited the Lebanon, although it is not now found there. Perhaps the passage (Cui. aegagrus, Cuyv.), which some have taken to be the parent stock of the common goat, and which at present inhabited the mountains of Persia and Caucasus, may have in Biblical times been found in Palestine, and may be the šktát of Scripture. It is, on the whole, as likely to have been the buburu, or wild goat of Mt. Sinai, as any other. See DEER; ROE.

Wild Grape is the rendering of the A. V. at Isa. v. 5,4 of the Heb. word which occurs only in the plural, brsákh, brsákki, and indicates a noxious species of plant or kind of fruit. In form the word is a pass. participle of brsák, which means to smell offensively, as many poisonous vegetables do; and this connects it radically with brsák, bsák ("cockles," Job xxxi, 40), although the two seem to denote different plants, but both useless. The Sept. gives ávr-sáq as the Greek equivalent, nearly as a common name, unless they have some other reading of the original text. The rendering of Aquila is ávr-sáq, that of Symmachus ávr-sáq, both of which give rather the etymological meaning or force of the original word than translate it into its Greek equivalent as a significative appellation. The rendering of Jerome is labriscus; and this has been followed by Luther (Herlingus) and the A. V. (wild grape). The species of plant intended has been supposed by some to be the Vitis labrusc., a plant which produces small berries of a dark-red color when ripe, but sour to the taste; Hasselquist suggests the Solanum inamomum, or gray nightshade; and Celsius contends for the Aconitum napellus, wolfsbane. It seems more probable, however, that no specific plant is referred to in the passage of the prophet; but that the word is simply used as an adjective with its substantive understood, as a designation of worthless grapes. The account appears to indicate that his vineyard should produce grapes, but it produced only brsák, vile, unetable grapes. See Rosenmüller, Bibl. Bot. (Eng. transl.), p. 111; and Comment. ad loc.; Genesius, Henderson, Knobel, ad loc.; See GRAPE.

Wiley, Isaac William, D.D., LL.D., a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born at Lewiston, Pa., March 22, 1825. He was converted when ten years old, at eighteen began to preach, and in 1846 graduated from the medical department of the University of the City of New York. After three years of practice as a physician in Pennsylvania, he joined the Philadelphia Conference, and in 1851 went as a missionary to China. Three years afterwards he returned to America, and was engaged in pastoral work in New Jersey, including an agency for Pennington Seminary. In 1864 he was elected editor of The Ladies' Repository, at Cincinnati, and in 1872 became editor-in-chief, which he held until his death, Nov. 22, 1884, at Foo-Chow, China, where he was so cultured a man, his fires put out by a calm but impressive manner, deep cordiality of disposition, and great tact and method in labor. See Meth. Review, Jan. 1866; Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1884, p. 518.

Wilhelm, Ludwig Wilhelm, a reformed theologian of Germany, was born at Neuenhain, Nov. 19, 1796. He studied at Marburg and Heidelberg, was in 1816 assistant priest at Frankfort-on-the-Main, in 1818 third priest, in 1828 second, and in 1826 first priest at Wiesbaden. In 1868 he was made bishop of Nassau, and died May 11, 1869, doctor of theology. B.P.

Wilhelmina, a fanatical woman of Milan, who died in 1281, pretended to be the daughter of Constantia, queen of Primislavus, king of Bohemia. She spent the last twenty or thirty years of her life in Milan in pious labors, especially in works of active charity. She had organized a band of followers (afterwards known as the Wilhelminians), who revered her as a saint, and began in her lifetime to make her the object of extravagant and fanatical veneration. This increased after her death to an undue extent. She had claimed that her birth was announced to her mother by the angel Raphael, just as the birth of Christ was announced to Mary by the angel Gabriel, and that the Holy Spirit became incarnate in her for the purpose of working out the salvation of Jews, Saracens, and false Christians, as that of true Christians had been wrought by Christ. She deluded her followers into the expectation, first, of her repeating in her own person the sufferings of Christ, and, secondly, of her resurrection and return to them after her death. But, with no indications of any fulfillment of such promises, a number of her followers, headed by Andrew Saranita, disregarded the recently buried body, arrayed it in costly robes and erected a marble monument over the grave, and proclaimed the worship of the Holy Ghost incarnate in Wilhelmina, as of equal importance with the worship of the incarnate Son of God. She had appointed a nun named Mayfeda, of Forzano, as the successor under the title of the Virgin Mary of the Holy Ghost—a female pontiff to represent her as the Roman pontiffs represent St. Peter. The sect was entirely rooted out about the year 1300, the remnant of her followers having perished at the stake, and her tomb and dead body having been destroyed. See Muratori, Ant. Ital. Med. i, 467; e. g. of the writings of Tuckey, letters from Italy (Prague, 1838), p. 72 sq.; Mosheim, Hist. of the Church, bk. iii, cent. xiii, pt. ii, ch. v.

Wilken, Friedrich, a famous historian, was born May 23, 1777, at Ratzeburg, in the duchy of Lauenburg. He studied at Göttingen, at first theology, but afterwards classic and Oriental philology and history. In 1798 he received the prize for an essay, Heiliges Römisches Imperium ex Abfolta Historia; in 1805 he was appointed professor of history at Heidelberg, and in 1807 director of the university library. In 1817 he was called to Berlin as first librarian and professor in the university, and in 1819 he was made a member of the Academy of Sciences. He undertook a literary journey to Italy in 1826; in 1829 he went in behalf of the government to France and England, and in 1838 to Wiesbaden and Munich. He died Dec. 34, 1840. His main work is the Gesch. der Kreuzzüge nach morgenländischen und abendländischen Quellen, 1837-39, 6 vols. He also wrote, Gesch. der Bildung, Beraubung und Verherrlichung der alten Heidelberger Bücheransammlung (Heidelberg, 1817); Gesch. der königlichen Bibliothek zu Berlin (Berlin, 1829).

Wilkie, Sir David, a British painter of great celebrity, was born at the manse of the parish of Cults, on the banks of Edenhanger, in Fife-shire, Scotland, Nov. 18, 1785. He received a limited education at the grammar-school of Kettle, where he was sent to the Trustees' Academy, established by the Encouragement of Manufacturers. Here, in 1803, he won the prize of ten guineas for painting Callisto in the Bath of Diana. In 1804 he returned home, and spent some time in painting portraits and scenes of common life. He then went to London, and entered the Royal Academy as a student. His picture, the Village Politicians, exhibited in 1806, gained for the young artist great notoriety; and, indeed, established his fame. He now settled in London, and was largely employed in the execution of his commissions for several years. In 1811 he became a member of the Royal Academy. In 1823 he was appointed limner to the king in Scotland. Two years later he made a tour of the Continent, spending the greater portion of the time in Italy. In 1830 he became painter in ordinary to his majesty. In 1852 he exhibited his celebrated picture of John Knox Preaching the Reformation in St. Andrew's, painted for Sir Robert Peel for twelve hundred guineas. It is claimed that his greatest historical work is the picture of Sir Darnel Baird Discovering the Body of the Sultan Tippoo Sahib, after Storming Srirangapatam. In 1840 he started for the East, and made an extended tour through Holland, Southern Germany, Constantinople, the Holy Land, and Egypt. He died, on his return to England, on board the "Oriental," then off Gibraltar, June 1, 1841. His works have been made known to the world by the engravings of Rainbach, Burnet, Cousins, Doo, and C. Fox.

Wilkins, Anne, an eminent Methodist Episcopal missionary, was born in the state of New York, June 8, 1806. She was converted in 1836, and sailed as a missionary for Africa, June 15, 1837. She labored there until 1841, when she returned to America; and was inducted into the church again in 1842, returned with broken health in 1853; sailed again in 1854, but was once more obliged to return, in 1857. She was preparing for active service in a juvenile asylum, when she suddenly died, Nov. 15, of the last-named year.

Wilkinson, Henry, eldest of those thus named, was born in the vicarage of Halifax, Yorkshire, Oct. 9, 1566. He went to Oxford in 1581, was elected fellow of Merton College, and graduated in 1586, in 1601 became rector at Waddesdon, in Buckinghamshire, and died there, March 19, 1647. He was one of the Puritans, a member of the Westminster Assembly, and wrote, A Catechism. Deoos, book, etc.

Wilkinson, Jenema, a fanatical Quakeress, was born at Cumberland, R. I., in 1753. In October, 1776, on recovering from an attack of sickness, in which she had fallen into a kind of trance; she announced that she had been raised from the dead, and had received a divine commission as a religious teacher. She gathered around her a few prosectes, who styled themselves "Universal Friends" (q. v.), and formed a settlement between Seneca and Crooked lakes, N. Y., which she called New Jerusalem. Here she secured the belief of her followers in the most absurd pretensions. She claimed to be inspired and to have reached absolute perfection. She pretended to foretell future events, to discern the secrets of the heart, and to have the power of healing diseases. She declared that those who refused to believe in her claims rejected the counsel of God to their own hurt. She even claimed to be Christ in his second coming. On one occasion she declared her intention of walking across Seneca Lake; but when all the preparations were made, she was seized by her followers whether they had faith in her power to do so, and only according to the affirmative of Little Girandette, in the same county; became chaplain to prince Henry, and died at Huddesden, in Hertfordshire, Dec. to be established, and two of her disciples declared themselves to be the "two witnesses" mentioned in the book of Revelation. She lived in a luxurious style in an elegantly furnished and spacious house, having amassed a large fortune by the donations made by her followers. She died in 1619. See HUDSON, History of Joseph Wilkins (Geneva, N.Y., 1821); and MEMOIRS OF BATH.

Wilkinson, John, a Puritan divine, brother of the Henry foregoing, was born in Halifax, and educated at Oxford, where he became fellow of Magdalen College; in 1655 principal of Magdalen Hall, and in 1648 president of Magdalen College. He died Jan. 2, 1649.

Willard, Samuel, D.D., a Congregational minister, nephew of president Joseph Willard, was born at Petersham, Mass., in 1775. He graduated at Harvard College in 1804 and 1805, became pastor of the Church at Deerfield in 1807, and resigned his pastorate, in 1833, at the close of the last term of the Academy of 1829, when he became president of Amherst College. His D.D. degree was conferred on him by Harvard College in 1823 and by Williams College in 1838. See Willard, Samuel, History of the Church, 1775-1837, 3 vols.

Williamus, an ecclesiastical of the 11th century, became abbot of Metz in 1073, and was friendly to Gregory IV. Seven of his epistles and an oration have been published in Mabillon's Analecta, i, 247. See Mohrmann, Hist. der Kirche, b. iii, cent. xi, pt. ii, ch. v. 2

Willemer, Johann Helvich, a German theologian, who flourished in the latter half of the 17th century, at Wittenberg, is the author of, Disserat, de Unica Adami Relax (Wittenberg, 1689); Dispatatitio de Suddicini (ibid. ed.); Diz. Willes, Edward, D.D., a Church of England divine, was prebend of Westminster in 1724, of Lincoln in 1730, dean the same year, elected bishop of St. David's in 1742, translated to the see of Bath and Wells in 1744, and died Nov. 24, 1778. See (Land.) Annual Reg. 1775, p. 176.

Willert, Andrew, a learned English divine, was born at Ely in 1562. He was educated at Peterhouse and at Christ College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship; became prebendary of Ely July 22, 1584; had the rectory of Childerley, in Cambridgeshire, in 1591; and, in 1594, in 1597, and in 1602; at the death of Bishop Little Girandette, in the same county; became chaplain to prince Henry, and died at Huddesden, in Hertfordshire, Dec.
WILLIAM OF CONCHES

4, 1621. He was the author of, Synopsis Paparum (1583) — Tetraetonym Populicum (ed.); — Sacerorum Exordiorum Centuria Unum, etc. (1598) — A Catholico (1602) — Hexapola on Genesis, Exodus, etc., and other works.

William, the name of several Scotch prelates.

3. Bishop of Argyle in 1240. He was drowned in 1241. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 296.

5. Bishop of Dunblane in 1353. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 175.

William of Conches, a philosopher of the 12th century, was a native of Conches, Normandy, and ing sustained at the cathedral-school of Chartres. William was famous as a grammarians, but took part in theological questions. His work, entitled Philosophia, in which he espoused Abelard's doctrine of the Trinity, was attacked after his master's condemnation by William of St. Thierry, and the author did not hesitate to render his reply. William of Conches died in 1154.

His Philosophia was published three times, with different titles, and under the name of three different authors: 1. Philosophicum et Astronomicum Institutionum Divinorum Crucis Inscriptiones et Notae in Hierosolimitanum Liber; 2. Hypo Eiskiaph sive Elementarium Philosophiae Libri IV, in Bologna; 3. De Philosophia Mundi, by Honorius of Autun, in the Maxima Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. xix (Lyons, 1647). Another work of William is Druggi, in which he rejects the errors expressed in his Philosophia. The Druggi, too, is extant under at least six different titles. William also wrote a commentary on Boethius's De Consolatione Philosophiae. William III of England (William Henry of Nassau) was born at the Hague, Nov. 4, 1650. He was the son of William II of Orange, by Mary, daughter of Charles I of England, and was born to a large inheritance, though his party was kept in check for some time by the influence of Cromwell. The house of Orange had long sought to obtain supreme power in Holland, a country which its greatest member had freed from the Spanish yoke. The death of William II eight days before the birth of his son put a stop to the project for the establishment of a despotism over the republic, and threw the power into the hands of the opposing party. For years the Orange party was depressed for want of a representative of sufficient influence to maintain its policy and secure the stadtholdership. The republic was governed by Jan de Witt, the grand pensionary. The attack upon Holland by France and England combined, and the change of the young prince of Orange. He was immediately chosen captain and admiral-general of the United Provinces. The contest was at first unfavorable to the Provinces, but by the wisdom and determination of the young stadtholder, the struggle which lasted for nearly seven years, was, in 1678, terminated by the treaty of Nimeguen, in a manner highly advantageous and honorable to Holland. This was brought about more especially by the diplomatic abilities of William, who detached England from the alliance and brought her over to the side of the Dutch. The change in the party their ruin had seemed inevitable, and the fame of William became great over Europe. In November, 1677, William had married his cousin Mary, eldest daughter of James, duke of York, afterwards James II. This marriage was entered into chiefly for political purposes, and proved very popular in both countries, the prince being regarded as the natural head of the Protestant party, and his wife being expected to succeed to the English throne. James II came to the throne in 1685, and determined to establish the Catholic religion; but the man of the people. At the same time in 1686 became the head of a league formed among the Protestant princes of Germany, the kings of Spain, Sweden, and others, having for its object the crushing of the power of Louis XIV of France, whose influence was the dread of all Europe, and who was the most dreaded foe of Protestantism. The treaty by which the alliance was constituted was signed at Augsburg in July, 1686. The oppressions of James II drove many of the Protestants into exile, and Holland became the place of refuge for the discontented English. The national distastions became so great that in 1688, a number of prominent English statesmen invited the prince of Orange to enter England with an army. William conducted his operations with great secrecy and skill, and on Nov. 15 of the same year he landed at Torbay with a thousand men of the thousand men of the English and Dutch. Soon the whole country was at his side, and James was an exile in France. Men of influence of all parties gave him their presence and support, and on Dec. 18 following he entered London triumphantly as a national deliverer. The adherents of James held out for some time in Scotland and Ireland, but the death of Dundee ended the resistance of the Highlanders; while in Ireland it was quelled after a vigorous contest in 1691. In spite of his sterling qualities and of the debt which they owed him, the English nation never really liked William III. In 1695 the death of queen Mary diminished her husband's influence, and leaving factious opposition at home, he had to maintain unequal strife with Louis, until the treaty of Ryswick was brought about by sheer exhaustion on both sides, in September, 1697. During the whole war William had been disturbed by Jacobite plots and schemes against his life. A partition treaty regarding Spain was violated by Louis, who took the throne of that country for his grandson, the duke of Anjou, and the French king, on the death of James II, acknowledged his son's right to the throne. To meet this, were making preparations for a powerful invasion, when William was thrown from his horse while hunting, and died March 8, 1702. His career was one of incessant and strenuous activity, and he carried himself victoriously amidst immense difficulties and numerous disasters. The predominant motive of his foreign policy from the beginning of his career as stadtholder of Holland until the close of it as king of England was resistance to the aggressive and tyrannical policy of Louis XIV. There is little room for doubt that he accepted the English throne for the sole purpose of enhancing his power against French despotism. While it is true that his policy dragged England more thoroughly than before into the circle of European politics, yet it brought to the English a free constitution, with political institutions capable of receiving indefinite improvement without danger of disintegration. One principle of toleration, both in civil and ecclesiastical matters, was firmly established, though its full bearings and application were not yet developed or even clearly apprehended. Covenanters, in the North, and high- churchmen, in the South, hated the change of moderate and reasonable Protestants felt that he was a thoroughly practical and inflexibly just sovereign. He loved his own countrymen, and advanced them to positions of trust and honor; but no discredit is to be attached to him on this account, for they were loyal to him and not disloyal to England. While his temper was cold, the noble passions of man were in him deep and strong, and he possessed that stern love of truth, honor, and right that distinguishes a moral hero. Few princes who have ever ruled in England can boast the massacre of the Macdonalds of Glencoe, and his conduct towards the promoters of the Darien scheme are two blots on his reputation which his most thorough-going apologists have been unable to efface. In addition to the above-mentioned services to the English nation it may be mentioned that during his reign the Bank of England was founded, the modern system of finance introduced, ministerial responsibility recognised, and the liberty of the press secured. His manner was wholly Dutch, and even among his own countrymen he was thought blunt. In his theological opinions he was decided but not illiberal. See Trevor, Life and Times of William III (Lond. 1855-56, 2 vols.); Vernon, Court and Times of William III (ibid. 1841, 2 vols.); Macaulay, History of England (1849-55); Ranke, Englische Geschichte, im 17. Jahrhunderte (1855-67, 6 vols.); Engl. transl. 1875).

William of Tyre, a prominent ecclesiastic and judicial historian, lived in the time of the Crusades. He was born in Syria about A.D. 1130, and reared at Antioch or Jerusalem. About 1169 he visited Italy and France and studied at the liberal schools of the University of Paris, and in 1173 went to Jerusalem, after an absence of several years, he became the friend and instructor of king Amalric (reigned 1162-1173). In 1167 he became archdeacon of Tyre, and in the same year was employed by Amalric to negotiate a league with the emperor Manuel I at Constantinople, with a view to the invasion of Egypt. Soon afterwards some unpleasantness arose between his archbishop, Frederic of Tyre, and himself, in consequence of which he visited Rome; and immediately after this Amalric gave him charge of the education and training of his son, the prince Baldwin. In the summer of 1170 a terrible earthquake convulsed the East, destroying many ancient towns and numbers of lives, and overthrowing several strong towers in Tyre. King Amalric died July 11, 1173, and his successor, Baldwin, called William to the post of chancellor; about the same time the archbishop Frederic died, and William was given the vacant see, being the sixth incumbent of that diocese since the founding of the kingdom of Jerusalem. In this capacity he was present in 1178, at the third Lateran synod, and on his return wrote out the decisions of the synod, together with a list of the names and titles of all participants in its business, in a work which he deposited in the archives of the principal church at Tyre. He spent seven months in Constantinople in the transaction of business for his see, then visited Antioch on a mission from the emperor Manuel, and, after an absence from home of one year and ten months, returned to Tyre. So much may be gathered from his own writings, which form the almost exclusive source for his life. An ancient French writer ascribes to him a work that William was renowned through the agency of the patriarch of Jerusalem, Heraclius, at Rome, whether he had gone to effect the deposition of that prelate. Another tradition states instead that William acted as a commissioner to the West after the taking of Jerusalem by Saladin in 1186, and was appointed legate in matters pertaining to crusades by pope Gregory VIII, being present as such at a meeting of Philip Augustus of France and Richard of England, which took place between Gisors and Trie.

William of Tyre composed two historical works, one of which contained the history of his own time, a period of five hundred and seventy years (Historia Principium Orientalium). It was based upon Arabic sources which were placed at his disposal by the liberality of king Amalric. This work is no longer extant. The other work contains the history of the Crusades, from A.D. 1100 to 1184, in twenty-three books, the last of which is unfinished (Historiarum in Paradis Transmarinia Gestarum et Tempore Multumque usque ad A.D. 1184). It was drawn from documentary sources and from his personal observations and carefully managed inquiries among his personal correspondents, respecting various points, as respects natural, political, and ecclesiastical conditions in both the East and West, and the literatures of the Arab, Syriac, Greek, and Latin languages. Its matter also is very full, and its tone, upon the whole, impartial, and little affected by the personal activities of the writer in the events he relates. Its style, finally, is that of animated description, such as best harmonizes with the portrayal of events in which the military element plays a principal part. It earned for its author the reputation of being one of the foremost historical writers of the Middle Ages. The oldest edition of this work extant is that of Basle (1549 fol.; 2d ed. 1560). Other editions are by Borgonius (1564), in Gestis Dei per Francos, i, 625 sq.; G. du Préau (in French, Paris, 1573 fol.). The continuation of the work to 1285, by an unknown writer, is given in Mirab. Histor. Reg. Henrici Paleopolit. v. 581. Another fragment is given in Bernhard, Thesauri, with continuation, in French, to 1284; in Latin, by the Dominican Pipin (1820), in Muratori, Thesauri, viii, 657 sq. A German edition was issued in 1844 at Stuttgart, by Kausler, with the title, Das Crimson, s. d. Engn. The Jesuit J. Conlan, Bishop of his see, wrote a sequel (1591, De Hist. Lat. p. 53; Fabricius, Biblioth. Lat. Medii â€œri, h. v.); Wäthler, Handbuch der Gesch. d. Literatur (2d ed. Leipsic, 1828), ii, 722; Herzog, Real-Encyklop. n. v.

Williamites, an order of monks deriving their name from a hermit, who, after conversion from a licentious life, had made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem by the advice of hermits and pope Eugenius III, and had then, in 1158, established a hermitage in a desert of Tuscany, near Pisa. Disorderly followers destroyed all prospect of retirement and he sought a new refuge in the depths of a forest on Monte Pruno. New disciples gathered about him, who, in time, became offended with him and expelled him from their society. He returned to his original retreat on the island of Lupasavia, but found the community unimproved, and therefore journeyed until he discovered a stony vale containing a cave, in the bishopric of Grosseto, in Sienna. Here he settled in 1155 and began an ascetical life, whose rigor was somewhat relieved by the lord of Buriano, who built him a cell. In the following year he composed a treatise and a later Rainold arrived, though only in time to assist at the burial of William, who had died Feb. 10, 1157. These two men remained at the place, which was at first called Stabulum Rohdis, and afterwards Malavalle, and which became the original of all the congregations of hermits which adopted the name of Williamites. Such congregations extended over the whole of Italy and beyond, to Germany, the Netherlands, and France. The institutions of their founder, together with a description of his life, had been transmitted from Albert. The monastic community of Williamites was preserved through the action of the Benedictine monks, and thence to the present day.
has been spoken of, but is entirely apocryphal. See Bolland, Acta Sotetorum, Feb. 10, with Hensenius's Dict. Hebron, Belg. et Miliaries, i. 259; iii. 18; vi. 142-152; also Herzog, Real-Encyklop. a. v.

William, Aaron, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Leechdale, Pa., Nov. 20, 1807. He graduated from Jefferson College, and in the first class at that institution was the highest man, both in classical and philosophical studies. He served with eminent ability as professor of languages in the Ohio University, and subsequently filled the same chair in his alma mater at Cannonsburg, Pa., being at the time a member of the Presbytery of Allegheny. He died at Leecastle, Dec. 31, 1878. (W.P.S.)

William, Alvin F., D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at St. Louis, Conn., March 15, 1813. At the age of seventeen he was publicly set apart as his father's assistant in the ministry, and afterwards labored as an evangelist. Among his pastorates were Lexington, Miami, Bethel, St. Joseph, and Glasgow, in Missouri; He was conspicuous among the most able ministers of his denomination in the South-west. "His sermons, expositions, and essays before the association for twenty-five years mark him as a man of extraordinary ability, a second Andrew Fuller." See Cather., Baptist Encyclopedia. p. 175. (P.T.)

William, Charles F., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was a teacher for many years in a classical school in Philadelphia, Pa., and died in that city, June 12, 1859, aged sixty-seven years. See Proc. Episc. Almanac, 1860, p. 98.

William, Isaac, an English clergyman, was born in Wales in 1802. He graduated from Trinity College, Oxford, in 1826, and became a fellow there in 1832; entered into holy orders in 1831, and was curate of Windrush, St. Mary the Virgin's, Oxford, and Blakesly, in succession; wrote tracts Nos. 80, 86, and 87 of the Pency. Tractatus, and the Lypa Aporoica, and spent his later years in retirement at Stinchcombe, Gloucestershire, where he died, May 1, 1865. He was a voluminous writer, and we name the following among his numerous works: The Church of England, Independent of the Church of Rome in All Ages:—Ecclesiastical Antiquities of the Cymry (1844)—Glossary of Terms Used for Articles of Britsh Dress and Armor (1851):—Ancient Welsh Grammar (1856)—Brut y Tywysogion; or, The Church History in the Welsh Poems (1860)—Barddoria, or; Bardism: a Collection of Original Documents Illustrative of the Theology, Discipline, and Usages of the Bardic-Dudric System of the Isle of Britain; with Translation and Notes (1862).

William, Samuel, LL.D., a Congregational minister, son of Rev. Warham Williams, of Waltham, Mass., was born there, April 20, 1745. He graduated from Harvard College in 1761; was selected by professor Winthrop to accompany him, the same year, to Newfoundland, to observe the transit of Venus, taught school at Waltham, and pursued his theological studies; was licensed to preach Oct. 11, 1763; preached at Concord, and at Waltham, Mass., and was pastor of a church in the latter place Nov. 20, 1765. In May, 1780, he was installed in the Hollis professorship of mathematics and natural philosophy in Harvard College. He was a member of the Meteorological Society of Mannhein, Germany, and of the Philosophical Society of Philadelphia, also of the Academy of Arts and Sciences in Massachusetts. In 1786 he went to Penobscot Bay to observe a total eclipse of the sun, in a galleon fitted out by the General Court of Massachusetts. The same year the government of Massachusetts appointed him to assist in running the line of jurisdiction between that state and New York. He resigned his professorship in 1788, and removed to Rutland, Vt., preaching there as a stated supply from January, 1788, to October, 1795. Subsequently he preached at Burlington more than two years. He died at Rutland, Jan. 5, 1817. In 1794 he published The Natural and Civil Constitution of Vermont (8vo), which was republished in two volumes in 1809. In 1805 governor Ticknor appointed him to ascertain the boundary of the state of Vermont. A course of lectures was delivered by him in the University of Vermont, which, after his death, was delivered by MSS. on astronomical, philosophical, and mathematical subjects of great value are among his literary remains. WILLIGIS

Williams, Samuel Wells, LL.D., a distinguished Chinese scholar, was born at Utica, N. Y., Sept. 22, 1812. He graduated from the Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute, Troy, learned printing, and in 1836 went to China, as agent for the American mission, where he assisted in editing The Chinese Repository. In 1837 he visited Japan, learned the language, and translated Matthew and Luke into Japanese. Returning to China, he edited many works; became interpreter to commodore Perry's Japan expedition in 1853; became a member of the United States Consular Service in 1860 he revisited the United States, and in 1875, after various public services in China, permanently settled in New Haven, Conn., where he acted as lecturer on Chinese, until his death, Feb. 16, 1884, at which time he was president of the American Bible Society. He is the author of many works on China, especially The Middle Kingdom (N. Y. 1848, 1857).

Williams, William, D.D., LL.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Easton, Putnam Co., Ga., March 15, 1821. He united with the Church in 1867; graduated from the University of Georgia in 1846, and from the fountainhead of Harvard in 1847; became pastor at Auburn, Ala., in 1851; professor of theology in Mercer University in 1856; professor of ecclesiastical history, etc., in the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary in 1858, and in 1862 of systematic theology, which he held until his death, at Athens, Ga., Feb. 9, 1867. See Cathedr., Baptist Encyclopedia, p. 1255. (J. C. S.)

Williams, William Frederick, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Utica, N. Y., Jan. 7, 1818. For a time he studied at Yale College; graduad in 1847 from Auburn Theological Seminary; in 1848 was licensed, and ordained by the Presbytery of Utica; the same year he was commissioned by the American Board, and sailed for Syria, his first station being at Beyrut. Thence he was transferred to Moulou, and next was called to Mardin, East Turkey, where he died, Feb. 14, 1871. For some years he was especially engaged in training native helpers and preachers.

Williams, William R., D.D., LL.D., an eminent Baptist divine, was born in New York city, Oct. 14, 1841, being the son of Rev. John Williams (1797-1825), pastor of the Oliver Street Baptist Church for twenty-seven years. He graduated from Columbia College in 1823, studied law and practiced it one year, entered the ministry in 1825, and in 1831 he became pastor of the Amity Street Church, a relation which continued until his death, April 1, 1865. Dr. Williams was an ele-ger writer, and the author of several valuable works on Baptist history and literature, for which see Allibone, Dict. of Biol. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Willigis, archbishop of Mayence, was a statesman and prime of the German Church in the period of the Saxon emperors. His origin is unknown and was probably obscure. His birthplace was, it may be assumed, the town of Schoningen, in Saxony. He was a canon at Hildesheim, when Volodya, tutor of the young Otto II, whose friendship he had been fortunate enough to gain, recommended him to notice, with the result that he was transferred, about A.D. 950, to the imperial chapel and received into the number of imperial councillors. On Jan. 13, 957, he became archbishop of Mayence and archchancellor and metropolitan of Germany, and in 962 also became archbishop of Magdeburg, and the confirmation of the pope, Benedict VII. The papal bull provided that he should have pre-eminence over all prelates in Germany and Gaul in ecclesiastical matters, and particularly on the occasion of royal coronation, in return to the holding of certain offices to be chosen by himself. He took part in all the important affairs of the empire until other favorites temporarily usurped his place, but was not a participant in Otto's Italian campaign, A.D. 980. When Otto suffered defeat in Calabria, July 15, 982, Willigis accompanied other German princes to the imperial camp, and at the dict of Verona, where the infant son of Otto was chosen king and successor to his father, he appeared insted in all his former honors. Otto II died Dec. 7, 983, at Aix-la-Chapelle. Willigis officiated at the coronation of the new king as the representative of the transalpine peoples, and in the dispute respecting the guardianship of the young emperor he was the head of the Saxon party and the most terrible opponent of duke Henry of Bavaria, who had seized the prince and had attempted to secure the crown. During this dispute, which closed in 985, Willigis was repeatedly recalled from the empress. When the empress-mother died, June 15, 991, a commission was appointed to assist the grandmother, Adelheid, in exercising care over the prince, and of this commission Willigis was a member. Later authorities even confer upon him the title of regent during a period of three years. The education of young Otto was also the peculiar charge of Willigis, and was by him intrusted to his protege, Bernward, a later bishop of Hildesheim. Willigis prepared the first Roman expedition of his pupil and guided him over the Alps. Easrrm, 996, was celebrated at Pavia, and a delegation announcing the death of John XV and asking the king to choose a new pope was received in the same place. Willigis, more than any other person, determined Otto to choose his own cousin, Bruno, the son of the emperor Henry, and, in conjunction with Richdald, chancellor and bishop of Worms, he escorted Bruno to Rome, and was present at his election by the clergy and people, and his enthronement as Gregory V. May 3, 996. Before leaving Rome he induced the pope to convoke a synod, through which he secured the return of Adalbert, bishop of Prague, to the diocese which that prelate had twice abandoned, though the return was not desired by the emperor, the pope, or Adalbert himself.

The next important affair in the life of Willigis was his dispute with bishop Bernward, of Hildesheim, respecting the right to exercise jurisdiction over the nunnyre of Gandersheim, where Sophia, the emperor's sister, was about to take the veil. The emperor sided with Bernward, and Sophia with Willigis. The dispute was finally brought before a synod at Rome, which sent a legate to Gandersheim to forward the interests of Bern-ward. Willigis refused to obey this authority, and was accordingly suspended from his offices by the legate, and cited to appear before the pope. He nevertheless persisted in the exercise of his episcopal functions, and found many supporters among the emperors, as is evident from the large attendance of bishops at a synod convoked by him at Frankfort, Aug. 20, 1002. Bernward's entrance at Gandersheim, on the other hand, was resisted by its inmates with force of arms. The opposition against both pope and emperor was everywhere, whether in Rome or Germany, so strong as to make it possible for Willigis to desist the wrath of either. The emperor's death, followed by the accession of Henry II, occasioned a truce, during which Willigis persecuted Sophia as abbess of Gandersheim; and in 1007 a peace was concluded. But a new synod, on the part of Willigis, of jurisdiction in the disputed territory. Otto's idea of establishing a universal empire, in which Bernward and his coadjutors were his principal supporters and Willigis his principal opponent, had, however, been defeated, and papal intervention in the affairs of the German Church had been finally reasserted, in the course of a quarrel which seemed to concern local matters only, but which, because of the prominence of the persons engaged, involved issues of the gravest importance for the entire Western Church.

Wills, see Winsted. Of Wills, in Mayence, and in Willigis the most prominent supporter of his claims as against those of margrave Eckard of Meissen and of duke Hermman of Saxonia. Willigis, assisted by his suffragans, anointed and crowned the emperor, June 6 or 7, 1002, at Mayence, and the empress Kunigunde, Aug. 10, at Padern. He accompanied the emperor to Aix-la-Chapelle, where the latter was recognised as sovereign by the assembled princes, and to Bruchsal, where his claim to the crown of Austria was definitely recognized by the diets of the province of Styria, and where he was married to one of that province. He was present also at a synod held at Thunsee, and was the influential personage who caused the punishment of death, denounced upon count Ernest of Austria, for rebellion, to be changed into the impostion of a fine.

Everything in the records thus reveals Willits as the most powerful and influential friend of the emperor. His power is evidenced in numerous documents, and in many ecclesiastical provisions and arrangements of the time. He was incessantly, energetically active in the affairs of both Church and State. Several churches in the diocese of Mainz, a number of prisons and other public works, and various works of art, were among the permanent relics of his administration. He died Feb. 25, 1011.

Wills (or Willison).—John, a divine of the Church of Scotland, was born in 1600, became minister at Brechin in 1703, and in 1716 at Dundee, where he remained until his death, May 8, 1750. He was the author of, Examples of Plain Catechising (1757); —Sacramental Directory; or, a Treatise Concerning the Sanification of a Communion Supper (1774); —A Digest of Men's Converts (1755); —Sacramental Meditations and Advice (1759); —Sacramental Catechism; —Christian Scripture Directory; —Free and Impartial Testimony to the Church of Scotland, and other works. An edition of his Works was published in Aberdeen in 1762, and other editions have since appeared, including his later publications. See Fusi Eccles. Scotchian, iii, 689, 813; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Wills, Payton, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at West Haven, Conn., in 1763; graduated at Yale College in 1783; studied theology at New Haven; became pastor at Easthampton, Mass., in 1795, where he remained until 1838. He died there Jan. 30, 1856. He published a Sermon in 1799, a Half-century Sermon in 1859, and contributed several articles to Sprague's Annals of the Amer. Pulpit (vols. i and ii).

William, Joseph, a Protestant pedagogue and philosopher, was born at Heiligenstein in 1725. In 1751 he was professor at the gymnasium in Strasbourg. In 1783 he retired from the professorship of the seminary, and died in 1838. He published, De l'Education du Peuple (1783); —Histoire de la Philosophie Allemande depuis Kant (1844), which received the prize from the French Academy of Sciences. From 1844 to 1850 he was one of the contributors to the Dictionnaire des Sciences Philosophiques, published by Hachette. Wills, Brook of (wîlls brûk) of Nächal ha-Arabim; Sept. παπνύσας Απαφάσσις; Vulg. torrens sinit-um), a wady mentioned by Isaiah (xxv, 7) in his dirge over Moab. Over these waters flows a singular flight in his Commentary on Isa. xxv, 7, connecting it with the Oddbim (A. V., "raven") who fed Elijah during his seclusion. The prophet's language implies that this wady was one of the boundaries of the country—probably, as Genesis (ix, 188) observes, the southern one. It is possible identified with a wady mentioned by Amos (vi, 14) as the then recognised southern limit of the northern kingdom (First, Huldah; Ewald, Propheten). XII—20*

This latter appears in the A. V. as "the river of the wilderness" (7223277 21, Nächal ha-Arabim; Sept. ἐχάμοισασ τοῦ ἐσθήλου; Vulg. torrens decem). Whitely, as they differ in the A. V. it will be observed, that the names are all but identical in the original, the only difference being that it is plural in Isaiah and singular in Amos. In the latter it is ka-Arabim, the same name which is elsewhere almost exclusively used either for the valley of the Jordan and the gader of it, or for its continuation, the great Arabah, extending to the gulf of Akaba. If the two are regarded as identical, and the latter as the accurate form of the name, then it is probable that the Wady el-Ahav is intended, which breaks through the southern part of the mountains of Moab into a broad channel called Ghôr el-Saîfeh, at the lower end of the lake, and appears to form a natural barrier between the districts of Kerak and Jebal (Burckhardt, Syria, Aug. 7). This is not improbably also the brook Zered (nachal-Zered) of the earlier history. The Tarçum Pseudojonaathone translates the name Zered by "ostrich," or "baskets."

Should, however, the Nachal ha-Arabim be rendered the "Willow-torrent"—which has the support of Genesius (Jesia) and Pusey (Comm. on Amos, vii, 14)—then it is worthy of remark that the name Wady Stysaff, "Willow Wady," is mentioned in part of the map of the ravine which descends from Kerak to the north end of the peninsula of the Dead Sea (Iby, May 9). Burckhardt (Syria, p. 644) mentions a fountain called 'Ain Stysaff, "the Willow Fountain" (Batafég, Arabic Dictionary, p. 1581).

The Rev. Mr. Wilton, in his work on The Negeb, or South Country of Scripture, endeavors to identify the Nachal ha-Arabim of Amos with the Wady el-Jeih, which forms the main drain by which the waters of the present Wady Arabah (the great tract between the Jebel Sherb and the mountains of et-Tih) are discharged into the Ghôr es-Saîfeh at the southern end of the Dead Sea. This is certainly ingenious, but cannot be accepted as more than a mere conjecture, without a single consideration in its favor beyond the magnitude of the Wady el-Jeih, and the consequent probability that it would be mentioned by the prophet.

Willow-Sunday is a local term to designate Palm-Sunday in some parts of England; so called because boughs of the willow-tree are used instead of palms.

Wylls, John, D.D., a Church of England divine, was born at Seabourough, Somersethshire, in 1740. He graduated M.A. in 1765 at Wadham College, Oxford; succeeded to the wardenship of that college in 1783; served the office of vice-chancellor from 1792 to 1796, and held the rectories of Seabourough, and of Tydd St. Mary, Lincoln, in the gift of the dr. Wills died May 16, 1806, very rich, leaving numerous benedict bequests. See (Lond.) Annual Register, 1806, p. 685.

Wills, Samuel, D.D., an English Baptist minister, youngest son of Rev. Alexander Wills, of Ashley, was born at Salisbury in April, 1808. He united with the John Street Church, London, at seventeen; the twenty manhood he was engaged for several years in preaching in the neighborhood of London; in 1833 opened a boys' boarding-school in Dorking, Surrey, preaching on the Sabbath, chiefly at Mortlake; in 1840 became pastor of a Church in Gosport, remaining till 1846, and then returned to England, in 1847 emigrated to the United States, and in New York established an open-communion church, of which he was the pastor for a time. Besides his ministerial work, he prepared several volumes for the press, which had a large circulation in this country. Among these were, Daily Meditations (纽约); —The Seven Churches in Asia: Christian Ordinances: —A Commentary on the Prophet Daniel. In 1858 he returned to England, and was pastor at Upper Norwood.
then at Vernon Chapel, King's Cross, and of West Row, Suffolk. His last settlements, which was of brief duration, were at Winchester and Milford, Hants. Resigning his pastoral work, he retired to Thornton Heath, Surrey, where he died, April 12, 1876. See (Lond.) Diary and Remains, 1859, p. 266. (J. C.)

WILSTADTER, ELIAS, a Jewish rabbi of Germany, was born in the year 1736, at Carlruhe. In 1821 he attended the lectures at the Wurzburg University, and in 1824, after due examination, was enrolled among the rabbinical candidates of Baden. In 1837 he was appointed to fill the vacancy at Carlruhe, and died Nov. 14, 1842. He published, Abriß der gesammten jüdischen Theologie (Carlruhe): Predigten bei verschiedenen Gelegenheiten (ibid. 1829). Together with some other rabbis he edited an edition of the Old Test. for the use of schools (ibid. 1838-39). See Frits, Bibl. Jud. iii, 516; Kayserling, Bibliothek jüdischer Kanzelredner, i, 331 sqq. (B. I.)

Wilmeid, in Norse mythology, is the progenitor of all the magicians. He is the originator of the science of medicine, magic, and fortune-telling.

Wilmer, Joseph Pyke Bell, D.D., a bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was for a number of years rector of St. Mark's Church in Philadelphia, Pa., after which he was presented to Ware, in Hants, remaining in that parish until 1820. In 1826 he was consecrated bishop of Louisiana, in Christ Church, New Orleans, and died Dec. 2, 1876, aged about sixty-five years. See Prot. Episc. Alman., 1879, p. 169.

Wilmsen, Friedrich Eduard, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born Jan. 25, 1736, at Halle. In 1777 he was called as pastor of the Evangelical Church to Berlin, where he died, May 23, 1798. He is the author of, De Suaestia Christi in Seligendo ad Apat, Genit. Mamas Paulo Copiscuia (Halle, 1766): — Beutvicklungener über Weisheit und Thorheit im gemeinen Leben der Menschen (Berlin, 1796): — Moralische Predigten (ibid. 1796; edited by F. Ph. Wilmsen): — Predigt für Hausrätter und Hausmütter (Leipzig, 1775). He also translated into German S. Clarke's Paraphrase of the Four Evangelists (Berlin, 1783, 3 vols.). See Winer, Handbuch der theolog. Lit. i, 245, 506, ii, 204, 267. (B. I.)

Wilson, Harry Bristow, D.D., an English clergyman, was born in London in 1774; educated at Merchant-Taylors' School, and at Lincoln College, Oxford; was appointed third undermaster of Merchant-Taylors' School in 1798, and second undermaster in 1805, in which office he continued until 1824, when he resigned, becoming, subsequently, master and bursar of St. Michael's, Bayswater, in 1807; and was rector of St. Mary Aldermen and St. Thomas the Apostle from Aug. 2, 1816, until his death, Nov. 21, 1853. He published a volume of Sermons on Several Subjects (1807): — History of Merchant-Taylors' School (1814): — Index to the Bible (1819); and other works. See (Lond.) Gentleman's Magazine, 1854, i, 536.

Wilson, N. W., D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in Pendleton County, Va., Oct. 20, 1824. He was ordained in 1858, and after having been a pastor of country churches for several years, was invited to the pastorate of the Church at Chapel Hill, N.C., and subsequently to Farmdale, Va., where he remained two years.

In 1870 he was called to the Grace Street Church, Richmond; in 1875 he removed to New Orleans, and became pastor of the Christ Church. He died of the yellow fever in 1878. He is spoken of as having been "one of the most eloquent ministers in the South." See Cyclopedia of Southern Biography, p. 190.

Wilson, Thomas (2), an English clergyman and school-master, was born in 1748. He was master of the grammar school at Clitheroe, Lancashire, for about forty years, and died in 1813. He was the author of An Archaeological Dictionary: or, Classical Antiquities of the Jews, Greeks, and Romans, Alphabetically Arranged, and a volume of Miscellaneous.

Wimmer, Gabriel, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Sagan, in Silesia, Oct. 29, 1671, and died at Berlin, May 14, 1746, in his first and only pariah, to which he was appointed in 1697. He is the author of Ausführliche Liedererklärung (Altenburg, 1749, 4 parts, published by his son). He also wrote some hymns, which are still in use in the Evangelisch G. d. deutscen Kirchische, v, 497 sqq. (B. I.)

Wimpeling, Jakob, a German humanist, was born July 26, 1450. At Freiburg he was the pupil of Geiler von Kaisersberg (q. v.). An epidemic drove him to Erfurt, but he eventually completed his university course at Heidelberg. He became master in philosophy in 1471, and began the study of canon law, exchanging it, however, ere long for that of theology. In 1473 he was made dean of the philosophical faculty, in 1481 superintendent of the Artist College and rector, in 1488 bachelor of theology and licentiate. Soon afterwards he was consecrated to the priesthood, and made preacher and canon at the cathedral of Spires. He was, however, rather suited to be an educator than a preacher, by reason of physical debility and a weak voice, and the natural bias of his mind. He was incessantly busy with his pen, and constantly had charge of a number of young men whom he inspired with the love of learning and of truth, which made them, as a rule, the ready, and, in some instances, effective supporters of the Reformation, when that movement began. In this period (1497) he wrote the Ildnomen Germania, one of his most important works, and one of the first to direct the course of education into a new channel. Fourteen years were spent at Spires, where he resolved upon retiring with Christoph von Utenheim (q. v.), Geiler von Kaisersberg, and others, to a hermitage in the depths of the Black Forest, but was hindered from the execution of the plan by a transfer to the faculty of arts at Heidelberg, Sept. 13, 1498. It was characteristic of his spirit that while concerned to introduce a purer Latin, and engaged in the delivery of lectures on rhetoric and poetry, he should confine himself chiefly to the teaching of those subjects, which he knew to be the very corner-stones of the Church and Prudence, and that he should reject the study of heathen authors as being injurious to youth. From this judgment he excepted Cicero, Virgil, and a few others only; but slight as was this concession, it obliged him to deliver two apologetic discourses to prove, against the assaults of monstrous adversaries, the utility of humane studies. In 1500 he resigned his professorship on the invitation of Utenheim, to resume the project of a hermit life, but while tarrying at Strassburg, Utenheim was made administrator of the diocese of Basle, and Wimpeling accordingly remained with Kaisersberg, and completed
WIMPELING 939 WINCHESTER, COUNCILS OF

(1502) the edition of Gerson's works, upon which the latter had been employed since 1486. At this time he came into conflict with the notion of monasticism. This, however, was not through the publication of a work intended to promote the hostility of Strasbourg towards Germany, and basing its plea on the false statement that the Gau of Caesar's time had never extended to the Rhine, but only to the borders of Austria, subsequently a German province; and as he was victorious in the dispute, he retained his erroneous opinion while he lived. In December, 1502, Utenheim succeeded to the see of Baale and invited Wimpeling to collect and examine existing synodal statutes, with a view to reforming the clergy of the diocese. Wimpeling completed this work. Wimpeling returned to Strasbourg to take possession of a summissariata, to which he was appointed, but which was given to another person. He was therefore obliged to resume the training of young men as a means of earning a livelihood, and accepted a tontopship over the sons of his friends, Sturm and Paulus. A tract written at this time for one of these young men, in which he proved that Augustine had never been a monk, and that the boast of monasticism, that all wisdom takes refuge in a cell, was false, since neither the apostles nor the early fathers, nor the apse, nor the early fathers, nor Gregory the Great, Ulecl, Alc Tho., etc., were in any wise identified with monasticism, brought upon him the full weight of monkshy fury, and made him the earliest of humanists to experience its rage. His book enraged many of the secular clergy also, as they contained frequent exposures of the abuses tolerated in the Church, and of vices existing among her ministers, and persisted in demanding a reform of these evils. He was accused at Rome, but pope Julius II commanded the bishops of the monasteries to be silent. Wimpeling now undertook the work of improving the current methods of educating the young, but with different success, as he received no encouragement from persons in authority. He also wrote a history of the diocese of Strasbourg, which is still a source of some value. After the death of Geiler von Kaiserburg he wrote an appreciative characterization of the great preacher who had so long been his friend. His next important occupation was the drawing up of the list of complaints laid to the charge of the papacy by the German people, by direction of the emperor Maximilian I. To the list he added a number of recommendations, touching, e.g., the plurality of benefices, and an adaptation of the French Pragmatic Sanction to German conditions, which were favorably received, as was a supplementary work entitled Mediae Scriptoriam Pragmaticam. In 1506 he was made Bishop of Trier, and received in his charge by his friend, bishop Utenheim, and in this place he spent several years. In 1512 he wrote a valuable pedagogical work, entitled De Probus Institutione Puerorum in Triebullab et Adolescentum in Universali- bus Operis; but he felt himself to be too old to put his theories into practice at the head of a school, and therefore declined a call to teach theology at Strasbourg. The warfare with the monks was continued steadily, and drew forth from him a number of exposures of their conduct, and ultimately a broadside from the authors of the Epistola Obsecratram Fecunditatus. Towards the close of 1515 he retired to his native town of Schlettstadt, and thenceforward made that place his home. He surrounded himself with a company of ambitious young men, and organized a literary society which included Bucer and Phrygo among its members, and for a time the monastery scholars as promoters of improved methods of study. Wimpeling himself greeted the rise of the Reformation, and approved of Luther's course. In 1518 he submitted an opinion to the emperor at the diet of Worms, which, though guarded, was certainly in favor of Luther's science. He soon found, however, that the new movement was taking on more extensive proportions, and assuming a more radical character than he had expected, and, with the timidity which characterized the class to which he belonged, he withdrew his support, but Wimpeling wrote to Luther to persuade him that the change of the mass contained nothing contrary to the doctrines and usages of the early Church. He saw with pain that the Reformation was the fruitage of a seed which he had himself helped to sow. Wimpeling's life and character were full of contradictions, growing out of the fact that while he saw clearly the corruption and danger of the Church and the age, he yet failed to understand the methods through which alone a reform could be secured. He trembled at the idea of any hands attempting an improvement, even though the hands were those of God's own king, or king, and shrank in terror from the idea of assailing the pope and existing institutions in the Church. With scholarly bias he thought that the study of theology would alone elevate the clergy and reform the Church. His pedagogical writings contained many ideas which were reduced to practice by Protestant teachers in the next generation, though he was still too much a schoolman to intend more than a reform in grammatical and rhetorical instruction with his proposals. He cared more for the study than for the theory of the teaching of antiquity as a means of culture for the mind. He studied the hymnology of the Church, and attempted its improvement. He also wrote an Epitome Rerum Germanicum, which is interesting as the first essay towards the writing of German history. Wimpeling's style was easy and perspicuous, precise, often elegant, lively, and witty, though verbose. He wrote poetry which lacked inspiration and fancy, and which may be characterized as mere practice in Latin versification. He was, in a word, rather partial to that speculativa, which lacked originality. His writings were generally brief tracts, filled with citations from other books, and the influence they exerted was largely due to the elevated sentiments they expressed. His personal bearing was amiable, modest, and yet helpful. Reuchlin honored him as a sturdy supporter of religion, and, after his death, Nov. 17, 1528, Erasmus wrote a very beautiful letter in his praise to Vlattten. For material towards his biography, consult Rieger, Amentses Litterarios Fridericenses (Ulm, 1776; Fasc. 2), and see, generally, Herzog, Real-Encyklop., s. v.

Winchell, James Manning, a Baptist minister, was born at North East, Delaware Co., N.Y., Sept. 8, 1791; was converted at 16; entered the ministry in 1807; graduated from Brown University in 1812; was licensed by the Baptist Church at North East, Oct. 4 of the same year; supplied the Baptist Church at Bris- tol, H. L., during 1813; was ordained pastor of the First Baptist Church in Boston, Mass., March 30, 1814; and died Feb. 22, 1820. He published an edition of Watts's Psalms and Hymns, with a Supplement, and Two Dis- courses, Exhibiting an Historical Sketch of the First Baptist Church in Boston from 1665 to 1818 (1819). See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vi, 99.

Winchester, Councils of (Concilium Winoni- num). Winchester is a city of England, capital of Hampshire, situated on the right bank of the Itchen, twelve miles north-north-east of Southampton and sixty-two miles west-south-west of London. Several ecclesiastical councils have been held there, as follows:
I. Was held in 856, in the presence of three kings. It was enacted that the temporalities of all churchmen should belong to the Church, free of all burdens, as an indemnification for the losses sustained by the incursion of the Normans who had ravaged England. See Mansi, Concil. viii, 248; Wilkins, Concil. i, 184.
II. Was held in 795, by St. Dunstan, in consequence of the disturbances caused by certain clerics who had deprived of their churches on account of marriage and scandalous life. The well-known incident of t-image of our crucified Saviour having decided in favor of the monks, is said to have occurred in this council. The clergymen were condemned, and imposed the intercessions of the young king Edward, who entered Dunstan to re-establish them, but in vain. See Manse, Concil. i., 721; Wilkins, Concil. i., 851.

2. He was held in 1061, under king Canute, to confirm the exemption of the abbey of St. Edmund. See Manse, Concil. i., 848; Wilkins, Concil. 1., 297.

IV. He was held on the octave of Easter, 1070, in the presence of William the Conqueror. The three legates of Rome, Hermensfrid, bishop of Synon, and the cantinates John of Synon and Stephen, priests of Canterbury, was deposed; (1) for having retained the bishopric of Winchester together with the archbishopric of Canterbury; (2) for having worn the pall of his predecessor Robert until the pope sent him a new one; and (3) for having received-in his absence, Benedict X., Agelmar, bishop of the East Angles, and several abbots were also deposed. Wulfred, bishop of Worcester, claimed from William certain lands belonging to his bishopric which the latter had withheld, and the claim was allowed. Thirteen canons were published.

1. Concerning the coming-in of bishops and abbots by simoniacal hire.
2. Of ordaining men promiscuously, and by means of money.
3. Of the life and conversation of such men.
4. That bishops should celebrate council twice a year.
5. That the ordination and consecration of the minsters of their order in their own churches.
6. That bishops be free in their dioceses over the clergy and laymen.
7. That bishops and priests inviate laymen to penance.
8. That the clergy be not violent clerks and monks.
9. That the canons and monks have their sees seceded, and that none ask of them for the prince.
10. That bishops and priests assume tithes, as it is written.
11. That none invade the goods of the church.
12. That the clergy will bear secular arms.
13. That the clerks and monks be duly reverenced, let him that does otherwise be anathema.

See Johnson, Excl. Canons; Mansi, Concil. i., 1302; Wilkins, Concil. 1., 822.

V. He was held in 1071, by archbishop Lanfranc. Sixteen canons were published, the heads only of which remain to us.

1. That no one be allowed to preside over two bishoprics.
2. That no one be ordained by means of simoniacal hire.
3. That foreign clergymen be not received without letters commendatory.
4. That ordinations be performed at the certain seasons.
5. That bishops be not of stone.
6. That the sacrifices be not of beer, or water alone, but of wines mixed with water only.
7. That baptism be celebrated at Easter or Whitsun only, except there be danger of death.
8. That masses be not celebrated in churches before they have been consecrated.
9. That the corpses of the dead be not buried in churches.
10. That the bells be not tolled at celebrating in the time of the Secret (Secretum Missae).
11. That bishops only give penance for gross sins.
12. That monks who have thrown off their habit be admitted neither into the army, nor into any convent of clerks, but be esteemed excommunicated.
13. That no bishop celebrate a synod once a year.
14. That tithes be paid by all.
15. That all clerks and canons observe continence, or desist from their office.
16. That clerks be not of wax or wood.

It was probably resolved in this council that an institution of penance for the soldiers of William of Normandy, left by the legate Hermensfrid, should be executed. It is in the third book. See Johnson, Excl. Canons, 1078; Wilkins, Concil. i., 856.

VI. He was convoked by William the Conqueror, and held in 1072; fifteen bishops were present, with Hubert, the lieman legate, and many abbots and barons. The dispute between the archbishops of Canterbury and York was renewed, with care; and it was established, both from ecclesiastical history and by popular tradition, that, from the time of St. Austin till the last one hundred and forty years, the primacy of the see of Canterbury over the whole of Great Britain had been recognized; that the archbishop of Canterbury had often held ordinations and synods in the very city of York itself.

At the following Whitsuntide it was also decided, in a synod held at Windsor, that the see of York was subject to that of Canterbury. See Mansi, Concil. i., 1211; Wilkins, Concil. i., 951.

VII. It was held in 1074, by archbishop Lanfranc. Six canons were published.

1. Forbids canons to have wives. Ensures that such priests as live in cages and villages be not forced to divide their wives if they have them. Forbids such as have no wives to marry, and bishops to ordain in future any who do not declare that they have no wife.
2. Forbids to receive a clerk or monk without letters from his bishop.
3. Forbids the clergy to pay any service for his benefice but what he be paid in the time of king Edward.
4. Laysmen accused of any crime to be excommunicated after the third summons to appear before the bishop, if they refuse.
5. Declares a marriage made without the priest's benefice to be a state of fornication.
6. Forbids all appellation of churches.

See Johnson, Excl. Canons; Mansi, Concil. i., 851; Wilkins, Concil. i., 867.

VIII. He was held Aug. 29, 1130, under archbishop Theobald of Cantorbay, and King Stephen, who had seized upon certain houses belonging to the churches of Salisbury and Lincoln, and thrown the two priests into prison. Stephen himself was cited to appear before the council. Henry, bishop of Winchester, the pope's legate, combined incendiary justice done to the cause of religion by those who plundered the property of the Church upon the plea of the ill-conduct of the bishops. He required that the king should begin by re-establishing the injured bishops, who, by the common law, were incarc- terated from pleading on account of their seizure. The king sent a warning to the bishops, that none of them should have the boldness to make complaint to Rome against him. Upon this the council broke up without settling anything, for the king refused to submit to the judgment of the prelates, and the latter did not think it advisable to employ ecclesiastical censures against him upon their own responsibility, and surrounded as they were by his power. See Wilkins, Concil. i., 419; Mansi, Concil. i., 1041.

IX. It was held in 1143, on the Monday after the octave of Easter, by Henry, bishop of Winchester, legate a la- tera. Two apostolical canons were published.

1. Declares that none who violated a church or churchyard, or laid violent hands upon a clerk or religious person, should be absolved by any person but the pope.
2. Declares that the plough and handwielding in the field should enjoy the same peace as if they were in the churches.

All who opposed these decrees were excommunicated with candles lighted. See Wilkins, Concil. i., 421; John- son, sub ann.; Mansi, Concil. x., 1024.

Wind (Wind, runac; Sept. w'neuol, 81waoel; Vulg. spiritus, ventus). This Hebrew word signifies air in motion generally, as breath, wind, etc. Both the Sept. and Targum words occur in the following definition of wind (Arbiter Mundus, ii., 4): "Wind (brepeag) is nothing else but a large quantity of air blowing, which is called w'neuol." So also Plato has πνευμα του w'neuol for a high wind (Phaedon, § 24, ed. Forster). Josephus also uses w'neuol βαένειον for a violent wind (Ant. iv., 2, 2). As Lucian also does, βαηνεωρ w'neuol (Her. vi., 1, 7). The Vulgate word spiritus, from spiritus, "to breathe, "blow," is applied in like manner in Latin, as by Virgil (Aenid, xii., 366): "Boreas cum spiritus alto Inostrat Egero," "When the northern blast roars in the Aegean."
WIND 941

WIND

7; cxviii, 16; comp. Baruch vi, 61). In the New Test.
it occurs in Matt. ii, 7; xiv, 24; Mark iv, 39; John iii, 8; xxvii, 4; Eph. iv, 14; James i, 6; Rev. vi, 18;
vi, 11). Throughout the New Test, the word is ἄνεμος, extent in our Lord’s illustration, John iii, 8.
In the ἄνεμος occurs in Wisdom v, 14; xi, 2, etc.; but νεφέλη in xvii, 18; Eccles. v, 9; xxvii, 18; Song of the children, xxxvi, 42). We might perhaps attribute the exactness of the translation, for “the wind,” from the New Test, to its having become almost entirely appropriate to “heavenly things.” In Acts ii, 2, we have νεφέλη translated “wind”; Vulg. spiritus. It is meaning in Hebrew (Heb. 2, xi, 15; Sept. διανοιχητής; Vulg. spirit). The evening breeze is still called, among the Persians, “the breeze of the day” (Chardin, Voyage, iv, 48). In Amos iv, 13, God is said to create “the wind.” Although this idea is very conformable to the Hebrew theory of causation, whether we regard it as a natural cause or as an attribute of every natural phenomenon immediately to the divine agency, yet the passage may perhaps be directed against the worship of the winds, which was common among ancient nations. Comp. Wisdom xiii, 2. Herodotus relates the same of the Persians (i, 181). The words of our Saviour, “a reed shaken with the wind” (Matt. xi, 7), are taken by some in the natural, and by others in a metaphorical sense. The former view is adopted by Grotius, Beza, Campbell, Rosenmüller, Schlüter, and Wetstein; and is confirmed by Rosenmüller observes, by the antithesis of the rich man, whose magnificence all magnificence. The comparison is adopted to reprove the sickness of the multitude (comp. ver. 15 and Eph.
iv, 14).

2. The wind occurs as the medium of the divine intervention, or agency (Gen. i, 2; ii, 8. Exod. xv, 10;
Num. xi, 31; I Kings xviii, 43; xix, 11; Job i, 19; Isa.
xi, 5; Jonah i, 4). In the New Test, the wind was super naturally employed at the day of Pentecost, like the “sound” and “fire” (Acts ii, 2). Indeed, our Lord’s illustration (John iii, 8), and the identity of the Hebreus with the Greek word signifies, as hands, and spirit, lead to the inference that the air in motion bears
the nearest resemblance of any created object to divine influence, and is therefore the most appropriate medium of
it. See SPIRIT. To this class of instances we refer Gen. i, 2, “And the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters.” Along with Patrick and Rosenmüller, we construe the phrase, “a wind of God,” a wind employed as the medium of divine agency. Rosenmüller compares Psa. civ, 30; cxviii, 8; isa. xi, 7. Dr. Lee refers to 1 Kings xviii, 12; 2 Kings ii, 16, and Psa.
xxviii, 11; Isa. xi, 4. In the two latter passages, he observes that the word is equivalent to power, etc.
The communications of the elements, etc., through means of which the petulance of Elijah was reproved (1 Kings xix, 11), are best understood as having occurred in visions (comp. Dan. ii, 35; Zech. v, 9). The word is used metaphorically in the following instances: “The winds of the wind” denote the most rapid motion (2 Sam. xxi, 12), where the phrase may be a poetical representation also of the incident recorded (2 Sam. v, 24; Psa. civ, 9). The onomatopoeia in the text occurs in the passages, in Hebrew, is remarkable.
Nothing like or trilling is called wind (Job vii, 7;
Isa. xlii, 29; Psa. lxviii, 39; comp. Eph. iv, 14; Eccles.
v, 9). Violent yet empty speech is called “a strong wind,” or a mere tempest of words (Job viii, 2). “Vain knowledge” is called יִנָּה לַיְבֹעֵד, knowledge of wind (Job xv, 2); “vain words,” words of wind (xvi, 8).
Many expressive phrases are formed with this word. “To inherit the wind” denotes extreme disappointment (Prov. xx, 29); “to hide the wind,” impossibility (xxvii, 16); “to labor for the wind,” to labor in vain (Eccles. vi, 16); “to bring forth wind,” great patience and pains for no purpose (Isa. xxvi, 18; comp. Hos.
vi, 8, 9; xl, 11); “wind to become void,” to result in nothingness (Jer. vi, 19). “The four winds” denote the four quarters of the globe (Ezek. xxxvii, 9); “to scatter to all winds,” to disperse completely (v, 10; xii, 11;
xxvii, 21); “to cause to come from all winds,” to restore completely (xxvii, 9). The wind hath bound her mouth (Hos. iv, 19); “to sweep away the wind,” Harmon’s rendering, into a far country (Hos. iv, 19); “to sow the wind and reap the whirlwind,” unwise labor and a fruitless result (viii, 7); “to feed on the wind,” to pursue delusive schemes (xii, 11);
“to walk in the wind,” to live and act in vain (Mica ii, 11); “to observe the wind,” to be over-cautious (Eccles.
x, 4); “to winnow with every wind,” to be credulous,
apt to receive impressions (v, 9).

Comparisons.—Disappointment, after high promise or pretension, is “as wind without rain” (Prov. xxv, 14); the desperate speeches of an afflicted person are compared to the wind (Job xi, 26).

Symbolically.—Empires are represented as having wings, and “the wind in their wings” denotes the rapidity of their conquests (Zech. v, 9). The wind is often used as the symbol or emblem of calamities (Isa.
xxii, 2; xlii, 16, 18; lvi, 18; lvii, 6); destruction by the Chaldean army (Jer. iv, 11, 13; comp. Wind. iv, 4; v; xxi, 20). “The windy storm” (Psa. iv, 8) denotes Absalom and his party. The wind is the frequent element of the divine chastisements (Isa. xxvii, 8, 9;
Jer. xxii, 22, ii, 1, etc.

Beautiful expressions occur as in Isa. xxvi, 2, “He stayeth his rough wind in the day of the east wind;”
that, God doth not aggravate the misfortunes of man kind by his chastisements; to make a weight for the winds” (Job xxvii, 20).

Mistranslations.—In Psa. lxviii, 8, 9, “He remembered that they were but flesh, a wind that passeth away
and cometh not again,” should probably be rendered, “a spirit going away and not returning.” All the versions make the words relate to the soul of man.
Homer has a very similar description of death (Iliad, ix, 406). In Ezek. i, 6, the translation is faulty and the sense further obscured by a wrong division of verses.
The passage should be read: “The sun also riseth and the sun goeth down, and hasteth to his place where he ariseth, going to the south and circulating to the north.
The wind bloweth as it listeth, and returneth upon its whirlings.” All the versions give this rendering; our version alone mistakes the meaning. The phrase “brought forth wind,” is understood by Michaelis as an allusion to the female disorder called empneumatia, or windy inflation of the womb (Syn-tagma, Comment. ii, 165). The Syriac translator also understood the passage in this way: “Enixi sumus ut ilia que ventos patrim.”

4. The east wind (Ἐνότερον). ἄνεμος νότος, ἄνεμος caudus, νότος, ventus aera, spiris veherens, ventus auster.
(palmar, arbor, eurus, ventus aera). Both forms denote the natural phenomenon (Gen. xlii, 6, 28; Job xxxviii, 24; Psa. lxviii, 7; lxvii, 26; Noah iv, 8). Considerable indeterminacy attends the use of these words. Dr. Shaw remarks that every wind is called by the Orientals אֶרֶץ, an east wind, which blows from any point of the compass between the east and north, and between the east and south (Travels, p.
285). Accordingly, the Sept. often understands this word to mean the south, as in Exod. xii, 13; xiv, 21 (see Boehm, Hierozonion, ii, 10). If the east wind happens to blow some days in the month of May, June, July, and August, it occasions great distress to the vines and harvests on the land, and also to the vessels at sea on the Mediterranean (Hom. xiii. 15; Job iv. 8; Job xiv. 2; xv. 2; Isa. xl. 7; Gen. xlii. 6, 28; Ezek. xvii. 10; xix. 12; xxii. 26; Isa. xlviii. 7; ciii. 5). In Job iv. 8, the phrase occurs, "διέθρεσθαι κατα θέρμαντος," a still or sultry east wind. For testimonies to the destructiveness of this wind in Egypt and Arabia, see Niebuhr, Hebr. Gesch. von Aegypten, p. 8; Thevenot, Voyages, i, ii, 84; Hackett, Illustrations of Scripture, p. 135.

The east wind crosses the sandy wastes of Arabia Deserta before reaching Palestine, and was hence termed "the wind of the wilderness" (Job i. 19; Jer. xiii. 24), It is remarkably dry and penetrating, and has all the effects of the sirocco on vegetation (Ezek. xvii. 10; xix. 12; Hos. xiii. 15; Job iv. 8). It also blows with violence, and is hence supposed to be used generally for any violent wind (Job xxvii. 21; xxxiv. 24; Psa. xlvii. 7; Isa. xxxii. 8; Ezek. xxvii. 26). It is probably in this sense that it is used in Exod. xiv. 21, though the east, or at all events the north-east wind, would be the one adapted to effect the phenomenon described, viz. the gathering of the waters towards the north and south, so that they stood as a wall on the right hand and on the left (Robinson, Researches, i. 57). In this, as in many other passages, the Sept. gives the "south" wind (δουρὰς) as the equivalent for the Greek κυνίμη. Nor is this wholly incorrect, for in Egypt, where the Semitic winds are pronounced, the north wind has the same characteristics that the east has in Palestine. The Greek translators appear to have felt the difficulty of rendering κυνίμη in Gen. xlii. 6, 28, 27, because the parching effects of the east wind, with which the inhabitants of Palestine are familiar, are not attributable to that wind in Egypt, but either to the south wind, called in that country the khaimis, or to that known as the asūn, which comes from the south-east or south-south-east (Lane's Modern Egypt), i. 22, 23). It is certainly possible that in Lower Egypt the east wind may be more parching than elsewhere in that country, but there is no more difficulty in assigning to the term κυνίμη the secondary sense of parching, in this passage, than that of ιρείνων in the other portions quoted. As such, at all events, the Sept. treated the term both here and in several other passages, where it is rendered kuyne (κυνίμων, lit. the burner). In James i, 11, the A. V. erroneously understands this expression of the burning heat of the sun. In Palestine the east wind prevails from February to June (Raumer, p. 79).

It is used metaphorically for pernicious speech, a sum of words (Job iv. 2; 2: calamities, especially by war (Isa. xxxvi. 8; Jer. xvii. 10; Ezek. xvii. 12; xxii. 26; Hos. xiii. 15). In this latter passage the east wind denotes Shalmaneser, king of Assyria; in Ezek. xxvii. 26, it denotes the Chaldeans. Tyre is thereby represented under the beautiful alliteration of a ship towed into deep waters, and then destroyed by an east wind. A very similar representation is given by Horace (Carm. i. 14). The east wind denotes divine judgment (Job xxvii. 21), "To follow the east wind," is to pursue a delusive and fatal course (Hos. xii. i). In this it is equivalent to the Arabic "الشمال الغربي," (Greeks, ἐν τοῖς ἄκτοις). The west and south-west winds reach Palestine loaded with moisture gathered from the Mediterranean (Robinson, i. 249), and are hence expressive of the Arabs "the fathers of the rain" (Raumer, p. 79). The little cloud "like a man's hand" that rose out of the west, was recognized by Elijah as a presage of the coming downfall (1 Kings xviii. 44), and was consecrated by our Lord as one of the ordinary signs of the weather (Luke xii. 54). Western winds prevail in Palestine from November to February. See West.

6. North wind (Τῦξ Πωρυγίου, Prov. xxx. 23; ἄνθρωπος ἄνθρωπος, Ruth vi. 9). The north wind, or, as it was usually called, "the north," was naturally the coldest of the four (Eccles. xiii. 50), and its presence is hence invoked as favorable to vegetation, in Cant. iv. 16. It is further described in Prov. xxx. 23, as bringing (A. V. "drivest away" in text; "brought forth" in marg.) rain; in this case we must understand the north-west wind, which may bring rain, but was certainly not regarded as rainy. The difference connected with this passage has led to the proposal of a wholly different sense for the term τραχόν, viz. "hidden place." The north-west wind prevails from the autumnal equinox to the beginning of November, and the north wind from the time to the equinox (Raufer, Nam. p. 79). See North.

7. South wind (Σιρός, Job xxxvii. 17; γυναικεῖον, Ps. lxxvi. 26; Λύτην, ἀνθρωπος, Luke xii. 55, γυναικεῖον [Sirocco]. Acts xxviii. 13). The south wind, which traverses the Arabian peninsula before reaching Palestine, must necessarily be extremely hot (Job xxxvii. 17; Luke xii. 55); but the rarity of the notices leads to the inference that it seldom blew from that quarter (Ps. lxxvi. 26; Cant. iv. 16; Ecclus. xiii. 16); and even when it does blow, it does not carry the νεκρόν into Palestine itself, although Robinson experienced the effects of the south wind (not far south of Gaza) (Researches, i. 196). In Egypt the south wind (khaimis) prevails in the spring, a portion of which, in the months of April and May, is termed el-khamis from that circumstance (Lane, i. 22). See South.

8. The four winds (ἡερπρώ, ἀντόνα ἀντόνα, ἀντόνα πεζών). The Hebrews knew only of four winds; and so Josephus (Ant. viii. 8, 5). This phrase is equivalent to the four quarters of the world (Ezek. xxxiv. 9: 2 Edom xiii. 5), the several points of the compass, as we should say (Dan. viii. 8). See Tristram, Nat. Hist. of the Bible, p. 33. "Parish.-" Striving of the four winds," is a great political symbol (Dan. vii. 2: comp. Jer. ev. 11, 12; Is. vi. 1); "to hold the four winds," is by contrary to secure peace (Rev. vii. 2); "to be divided to the four winds," implies utter dispersion (Dan. xi. 4; Jer. xlix. 22; Ezek. vi. 10, 12; xviii. 2). So also the phrase is το πέντε ταξινομούν (Matt. xxvii. 81) means from all parts of the world (Mark viii. 27).

9. The Hebrews, like other ancient nations, had but few names of winds. Homer mentions only βοῦς, νῦ- ρος, ἱππος, and ἀργος. Aul. Gellius, indeed, complains of the infrequency of names of winds in ancient writers. The N. T. contains the same indefiniteness of expression in Hebrews (see Larcher's notes on i. 188). In the course of time the Greeks and Romans added eight other winds to the original four, but that appearing too minute a division, they reduced the additional ones to four, thus making only eight in all. The names of these may be seen in Larcher (in supple), or Pliny (Hist. Nat. viii. 34). Further information may be found in Corey's Translation of Hierocles, De Erotibus, Agris et Locis (Paris, 1800); Discours Préliminaire, and see index. For a comparative table of the English, Latin, and Greek divisions of the winds, and their names, amounting to more than thirty, see Belo's Herodotus (Polye- nius, notes, iii. 298, London, 1791).

One Greek name of a wind occurs in Acts xxvii. 14, ἐσθαλήν, Euryfholon, a tempestuous wind in the Mediterranean, now called a Levant. The Alexandrians, Vulg. and Syr., read "εὐρυφθολον;" Syr. ἐπανελθειν. The common rendering, Erosos, Euryfholon, from ιππος, "east wind," and κλεον, "a wave," quasi an eastern tempest. Other MSS. read Eoros, Euryfholon, from ιππος, "broad," and κλεον, "a wave," or rough waters; and then the word would mean the wind which peculiarly excites the sea. Barnes comments the common rendering, and describes the wind as blowing in all directions from the north-east round by the north to the south-east (Fren- de, p. 380, 4th; see Bowyer's conjectures, and Dod- dridge, in loc.).
The Hebrews had no single terms indicating the relative velocity of the air in motion, like our words breeze, gale, etc. Such gradations they expressed by some additional word, as "great," הליברעה, "a great wind" (Joel i, 4), "rough," חזק, etc. Nor have we any single word indicating the destructive effects of the wind, like their verbs רעש and רס, as סער (Zech. vii, 14, etc.), and answering to the Greek word ὀξεύομαι (see Sept. of Gen. xii, 6, 23). Our metathorical use of the word storm comes nearest. The term צלופוד (톨ופוד), in Ps. x, 6 (A. V. "horrible"), has been occasionally understood as referring to the nimbus (Olahsman, in loc.; Geiss, Theol. p. 418); but it may equally well be rendered "wrathful," or "avenging" (Hengstenberg, in loc.). The phrase צלופוד נון, "stormy wind," צלופוד נון אורים, צלופוד PROCESSE, occurs in Ps. cvii, 25, cxlvii, 8. It is metaphorically used for the divine judgments ( Ezek. xiii, 11, 18). The word צלופוד is usually translated "whirlwind;" it means, however, more properly a storm (2 Kings ii, 11, 12; Job xxxviii, 1, x, 6; Zech. ix, 14; Sept. ἐνερατός, λειβος, νηφός; Vulg. turobo; Ecles. xxxii, 17; ἐνερατός, νηφός). We have notice in the Bible of the local squalls (λειβος—Mark iv, 37; Luke viii, 23), to which the sea of Gennesaret was liable in consequence of its proximity to high ground, and which were sufficiently violent to endanger boats (Matt. vii, 24; John vi, 18).

The Hebrew word is used metaphorically for the divine judgments (Isa. xl, 24, xlii, 16); and to describe them as sudden and irresistible (Jer. xxiii, 19; xxx, 32, xxx, 29). "A whirlwind out of the north" (Ezek. i, 4) denotes only a Babylon. Another word, כֹּל, is also translated "whirlwind," and properly so. It occurs in Job xxxvii, 9, Isa. xxi, 1. It is used as a simile for complete and sudden destruction (Prov. i, 27); and for the most rapid motion, "wheels of war-chariots like a whirlwind" (Isa. v, 28; Jer. iv, 15). Total defeat is often compared to "chaff scattered by a whirlwind" (Isa. xvii, 13). It denotes the rapidity and irresistibleness of the divine judgments (Isa. lxxvi, 5).

The phrase "to reap the whirlwind" denotes useless labor (Hos. viii, 7); "the day of the whirlwind," destruction by war (Amos i, 14). "The Lord hath his way in the whirlwind," is probably an allusion to Sinai (Num. x, 39). A beautiful description of it is given in Prov. xvi, 10: "As the whirlwind passeth, so is the wicked no more: but the righteous is an everlasting foundation." See WHIRL

Windesheim (or Windsen), a Dutch monastery of the order of Regular Canons, celebrated as the centre of a somewhat extensive congregation of reformed convents, flourished in the former half of the 15th century. It was intimately connected with the association of Brothers of the Common Life, having been established by Radewin, the pupil and successor of Gerhard Groot, to serve as a rallying-point for its members. It was founded in 1279 by Van Hattorp, in Zealand, and one of Groot's converts, donated his homestead property of Windsen, worth above three thousand florins, to the prospective monastery on the inception of the plan, and other donations followed, so that the convent became an accomplished fact in 1286. Six brothers constituted its original congregation. The church was dedicated, and the investing of the brothers with the robes of their order was performed Oct. 16, 1287, Henry of Huxibia being made temporary superior, with the title of rector. Voss von Huesden, who succeeded to the government of the convent as prior, four years afterwards, became the real founder of its importance. During thirty-three years he was zealous in the promotion of its internal prosperity, as well as in the erection of its buildings and the extension of its influence. Its riches became immense under his administration, and the number of monasteries, and also of nunneries, connected with it, increased remarkably. Among these the monastery of St. Agnes, near Zwoll, became chiefly famous, through Thomas a Kempis and Johann Wesel, who were its inmates. In 1402 the first convocation of the general chapter was held at Windsesheim. In 1438 the Council of Basle directed Windsesheim to undertake the reformation of the convents of Regular Canons in Germany. This reformatory work extended within many years to the convenants of other orders, and continued until the general reformation of the 16th century brought it to a close. The convent of Windsesheim itself continued to exist until the end of the 16th century, and a chapter of Windsesheim even until the 18th century. Its members were bound only by the three substantialia of monachism, the vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, and they employed themselves, particularly during the earlier period, with the copying of manuscripts and industrial pursuits. Their reformatory labors aimed merely at a re-establishment of the earlier monastic discipline by reducing asceltical requirements to a tolerable degree. Windheim, Christian Ernst von, a Protestant theologian, was born at Wernigerode, Oct. 29, 1728. He studied at Stade, and after completing his course went to Helmstäd, where he commenced his philosophical lectures. In 1746 he publicly defended a dissertation, De Intellectu Divino, quo Sociocnasmus Philosophicus Argumcntum suis prioriur, and was appointed adjunct to the philosophical faculty. In 1747 he went to Göttingen as professor of philosophy, and in 1750 to Erlangen, where he also lectured on theology. He died Nov. 6, 1768. He wrote, Commentatios Philosophico-criticis de Hesperosvora Verum Consensivo Futurum (Halle, 1744); — Dias. de Paulo, Gentium Apostoli (Ibid. 1745); — Syloge i-x, Theism Philosophicaram Miscellaneorum (Helmstäd, 1746-47); — Consecratae Theism Philosophicarum (Ibid. 1749); — Dias. in Dianatomiam Grammaticam Hesperosvora (Erlangen, 1781); — Dias. Windschmann, Friedrich Heinrich Hugo, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born at Aschaffenburg, Dec. 13, 1811. In 1836 he received holy orders, went to Munich in 1838 as professor of canon law at New-Terr. exegesis, and made the canon of St. Cajetan in 1839; in 1842 he became a member of the Munich Academy of Sciences, in 1846 general vicar, and died Aug. 24, 1861. He wrote, Sanctorum Sacrae de Theologisimis Vestinentium (Bonn, 1833); — Uber den Somnusculi der Natur (Munich, 1846); — Urons der synlichen Volker (Ibid. 1853); — Die persische Anubita (Ibid. 1856); — Anubita (Ibid. edd.); — Muhr (Leipzig, 1857); — Vindiciae Petriniae (Regensburg, 1856); — Einleitung des Briefe an die Galater (Mayence, 1864). Windsor, Council of (Concilium Windsorianum, or Windsorienses). Windsor is a town in Berkshire,

England, on the right bank of the Thames, twenty-three miles south-west of London. Its castle is the residence of the queen of England. Old Windsor is a mile and a half east-south-east of this, and was the royal residence during the Saxon dynasty. The present location was chosen by William the Conqueror. Two ecclesiastical councils have been held at Windsor, as follows:

1. Was held on Whit-Sunday, 1070, in which Agelric, bishop of the South Saxons, was deprived, and committed to prison at Marlborough; no crime was imputed to him, and the sole object of the proceeding seems to have been to make room for a Norman. Several abbots were in like manner deposed at the same time. See Johnson, Ecc. Commons, sub ann.; Mansi, Concil. x, 1993.

2. Was held April 26, 1114, in which Ralph, bishop of Rochester, was elected to the see of Canterbury, vacant during the five preceding years. See Mansi, Concil. x, 793; Landon, Manual of Councils, p. 696.

Wine, Ecclesiastical Use of. In the celebration of the Lord's Supper, the common wine was ordinarily used. Such was probably that which our Saviour used at the last supper. The ancient mixed water with the wine; and this practice seems at one period to have been general, and is abundantly authorized by canons of the Church. The proportion of water varied at different times. Sometimes it was one-fourth, at others, one third. The Western Church mixed cold water only; the Greek Church first cold, and then warm water. This was said to be emblematical at once of the fire of the Holy Spirit and of the water which flowed from our Saviour's side. Various idle questions respecting the sacred elements were agitated at different times. With some there was a question of what grain the bread should be made. Others mingled salt and oil with the bread. Some substituted water for the wine. Red wine was preferred in order to avoid mistakes by the use of white wine, and also more sensibly represent the mystery. The Roman Church now uses white wine. In the 17th century claret and in the 18th century sack was employed in England. See Eucharist.

Wine, Sacramental. The Rev. Dunlop Moore, D.D., shows most conclusively, in the Presbyterian Review for January, 1882, in opposition to the statements of Dr. Samuel (Fineene Liquor to Wine, p. 159 sq.), that the early Christian fathers knew only of fermented wine in this connection; and likewise, by the testimony of the most eminent rabbis of modern times, that the Jews to-day use fermented wine for Passover purposes. The use of steeped wines is only reported in those where pure wine (i.e. wine free from ceremonial impurity by Gentile contact) cannot be procured; but even in that case the Jews are utterly indifferent as to whether it has fermented or not. They also freely use meqor during the Passover, although this is, of course, the product of fermentation.

Wine-cup (יוֹם דְּבָא, cup of the wine). Wine, or the cup in which it is contained, often represents in Scripture the anger of God: “Thou hast made us drink the wine of astonishment” (Isa. lx, 8). “In the hand of the Lord there is a cup, and the wine is red; it is full of mixture, and he poureth out of the same. But the dregs thereof all the wicked shall wring them out and drink them” (Isa. xlv, 8). The Lord says to Jeremiah (Jer. xxxv, 15), “Take the wine-cup of this fury at my hand, and cause all the nations to whom I send thee to drink it.” Elegant forms of drinking-cups are represented on the Assyrian and Egyptian monuments. See Cur.

Wine-press is the rendering in the A. V. of three Hebrew and one Greek words: תְּבַנֶּה ("wine-press," Judg. vi, 11; Neh. xiii, 15; Lam. i, 15; "wine-fat," Isa. xliii, 2; "press" Joel iii, 13), which denotes the whole apparatus (see גֵּדֶשׁ-סֵנֶקֶע), or (as Gesenius prefers) simply the large vat (לַעֲבֹךְ) in which the grapes were trodden, the latter being a meaning specifically borne by פָּרְדָּח ("wine-press," Isa. liii, 3; "press," Hagge, ii, 16); while פַּרְדָּח ("wine-press," Num. xviii, 27, 30; Deut. xv, 14; Judg. vii, 25: 2 Kings vii, 27; Job xxxiv, 11; Isa. v, 2; Jer. xlvii, 12; Hos. ii, 2; Zech. xiv, 10; "press" Prov. iii, 10; Isa. xi, 13; "vat," Joel ii, 24; iii, 13; "press-fat," Hagge, ii, 16; "vine," Deut. xvi, 13) is thought to denote the lower trough or receptacle into which the expressed juice flows, the מַשְׂמַרת of Mark xii, 1. The last Hebrew word is derived by Gesenius (Diction. p. 619 b.) from a root signifying to hollow or dig out; and in accordance with this is the practice in Palestine, where the "wine-press" and "vats" appear to have been excavated out of the native rock of the hills on which the vineyards lay. From these scanty notices contained in the Bible we gather that the wine-presses of the Jews consisted of two receptacles or vats placed at different elevations, in the upper one of which the grapes were trodden, while the lower one received the expressed juice. The two vats are mentioned together only in Joel iii, 13: "The press (gëdesh) is full; the fat (gebeth) overfloweth" — the upper vat being full of fruit, the lower one overflowing with the must. פָּרְדָּח is similarly applied in Joel ii, 24, and probably in Prov. iii, 10, where the verb rendered "burns out" in the A. V. may bear the more general sense of "abundant" (Gesen. Thesaur. p. 1180). גּוֹתָח is also strictly applied to the upper vat in Num. xii, 15; Lam. i, 15, and Isa. liii, 2, with פָּרְדָּח in a parallel sense in the following verse. Elsewhere פָּרְדָּח is not strictly applied; for in Job xxxiv, 11, and Jer. xliv, 33, it refers to the upper vat, just as in Matt. xxi, 8, ἐπίσυχαν (properly the vat under the press) is substituted for λαύρα, as given in Mark xvi, 1. It would, moreover, appear natural to describe the whole arrangement by the term בַּהֲלָה, as denoting the most important portion of it; but, with the exception of proper names in which the word appears, such as גָּתְח, גִּתְחָה-ם, גְּתְי-הָפֵם, and גְּתִיתָה, the term פָּרְדָּח is applied to it (Judg. vii, 25; Zech. xiv, 10). The same term is also applied to the produce of the wine-press (Numb. xviii, 27; 30; Deut. xv, 14; 2 Kings vi, 27; Hos. ix, 2). The term puradh, as used in Hagg. ii, 16, perhaps refers to the contents of a wine-vat, rather than to the press or vat itself. The two vats were usually dug or hewn out of the solid rock (Isa. v, 2, marp.; Matt. xxi, 33). Ancient wine-preses so constructed are still to be seen in Palestine (Robinson, Bibl. Res. iii, 337; comp. p. 608). Dr. Tristram examined several of these on Mount Carmel, which he describes as being exactly like others observed in the south of Judah. "In all cases a flat or gently sloping rock is made use of for their construction. At the upper end a trough is cut about three feet deep and four and a half by three and a half feet in length and breadth. Just below this, in the same rock, is hewn a second trough, fourteen inches deep and four feet by three in size. The two are connected by two or three small holes bored through the rock close to the bottom of the upper trough, so that, on the grapes being put in and pressed down, the juice streamed into the lower vat. Every vineyard seems to have had one of these presses" (Land of Israel, p. 106). The wine-preses were thus permanent, and were sufficiently well known to serve as indications of certain localities (Judg. vii, 25; Zech. xiv, 10). The upper receptacle (gypt) was large enough to admit of threshing being carried on in it (not "by," as in the A. V.) it, as was done by O'reon for the sake of concealment (Judg. vi, 11). See PRESSES; VINEYARD.

In Palestine the vintage takes place in September, and is celebrated with great rejoicings (Robinson, Bibl. Res. i, 431; ii, 81). The ripe fruit was gathered in baskets (Jer. xii, 8), as represented in Egyptian paintings (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. i, 41-45), and was carried to the wine-press. It was then placed in the upper one of the two vats or receptacles of which the wine-press was formed, and was subjected to the process of "treading," which has prevailed in all ages in Oriental and South-European countries (Neh. xiii, 15; Job xxiv, 11; Isa. xvi, 10; Jer. xxx, 30; xlviii, 33; Amos ix, 18; Rev. xix, 15). A certain amount of juice exuded from the ripe fruit from its own pressure before the treading commenced. This appears to have been kept separate from the rest of the juice, and to have formed the gluelos, or "sweet wine," noticed in Acts ii, 13. The first drops of juice that reached the lower vat were termed the demsa, or "tare," and formed the first-fruits of the vintage (Sept. πρωτοφανθροι) which were to be presented to Jehovah (Exod. xxii, 29). The "treading" was effected by one or more men, according to the size of the vat, and, if the Jews adopted the same arrangements as the Egyptians, the treaders were assisted in the operation by ropes fixed to the roof of the wine-press (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. i, 46). They encouraged one another by shouts of joy (Isa. xii, 9, 10; Jer. xxx, 80; xlviii, 33). Their legs and garments were dyed red with the juice (Gen. xlix, 11; Isa. lxiii, 2, 3). The expressed juice escaped by an aperture into the lower vat, or was at once collected in vessels. A hand-press was occasionally used in Egypt. (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. i, 45), but we have no notice of such an instrument in the Bible. As to the subsequent treatment of the wine, we have but little information. Sometimes it was drunk as must, but more generally it was bottled off after fermentation, and, if it was designed to be kept for some time, a certain amount of lees was added to give it bears (Isa. xxx, 6). The wine consequently required to be "refined," or strained, previously to being brought to table (Leu.). For further elucidation of the subject, see Hackett, Illust. of Scripture, p. 156 sq.; Van Lennep, Bibl. Lands, p. 117 sq. See WINE.

Wingate, W. M., D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Darlington, S. C., July 28, 1824. He graduated from Wake Forest College, N. C., in 1849; for two years was a student of theology at Furman Institute, S. C.; from 1852 to 1854 agent of Wake Forest College, and in the latter year was chosen president, which office he held for twenty-five years. He died Feb. 27, 1879. (J. C. S. C.)

WINCKELERS, a sect existing in Strasburg towards the end of the 14th century. Their teachings and usages resembled those of the contemporary Waldenses, though with some divergences; but it is probable that the sect was of native growth, and originated in the increasing sense of need for an improvement in religious teaching, which existed in the consciousness of the people. Its members sustained communication with those of other similar associations in different cities along the Rhine and in Wurttemberg and Switzerland. They rejected, on the authority of the Bible, all mariolatry and saints' worship, the use of images, the priesthood, and the doctrines of meritorious works and purgatory. They wished to restore the worship of God in spirit and truth. They made use of lay teachers, who were required to be unmarried and unencumbered with property, and who itinerated continuously. The teachers were supported by the members of the sect, whose confessions they also received and upon whom they imposed penances. In their assemblies it was customary to offer prayer, read from books, and preach. They attended mass and confessed minor offences to the Ro-miah priests for the sake of peace. In Strasburg laborers and artisans composed the sect, master Johann von Blumstein—later, after he had renounced their errors, synod of the city—being its most prominent member. A number of Beguins were also among its members. They were not disposed to deal aggressively with the Church, but were content to meet the secrecy of private houses, but the fear of being discovered some- times led them into crime. In 1374 a Winkler, who had returned to the Church, was murdered by direction of the sect, which paid a certain sum for the deed and submitted to undergo the same sentence imposed by its rulers. At another time the inquisitor, Johann Arnoldi, was so emphatically threatened with death in the confessional that he fled the city. In 1400, however, thirty-two members, both men and women, were arrested and tortured. Twenty-six of them acknowledged their connection with the sect, and were banished from the city and diocese, under the penalty of death by fire if they should return. The documents belonging to the trial are yet in existence, and are given in Rochricht's Mitbühlungen aus der Geschichte der kirch. Kirche des sächsischen Deutschland, 1663, i, 8 sq. of Waldensian was ever found in Strasburg after this trial. See Herzog, Real-Encyclop. s. v.

Winkelhofer, Sebastian, a Roman Catholic theologian, was born Jan. 18, 1483, at Munzing, in the Lower-Danube department. When sixteen years of age he joined the order of the Jesuits. Two years later he went to Innsbruck, where he studied philo- sophy and theology. In 1478 he took refuge of himself to the study of theology, especially of Church history and canon law. In 1572 he received holy orders, and in the year following was made head of the congrega- tion of St. Maria de Victoria. In 1715 he was appointed preacher of St. Maurus, and in 1720 he delivered his first sermon as dean in Neuburg, on the Danube. Here he labored till 1724, when he was called as court-preacher to Munich, where he died, Nov. 16, 1908. He wrote, Reden über die Verbreitung unseres Herrn Jesus Christi (edited by S. M. Sailer, Munich, 1809; 2d ed., 1812); the same editor published his Vermuthliche Privilegien (ibid., 1814-17, 4 vols.). See During, Die gelehrt en Theologen Deutschlands, iv, 781 sq. (B. P.)

Winkelherr, Hermann, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born April 11, 1736, at Hildes-heim. He studied at Göttingen under Walch, Michaelis, and Heilman. In 1753 he was appointed pastor in his native town, and in 1772 accepted a call to Hamburg, where he labored for twenty years; in 1798 he was called to Lun- burg as superintendent, and while he was delivering his first sermon, on March 18, he was paralyzed, and died a few days later. Winkelherr was very well versed in Greek history, philosophy, and literature; Pindar he knew almost by heart. His published writings are of no importance. See During, Die deutschen Kunstlereder, p. 570 sq. (B. P.)

Winkler, Johann Dietrich, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Hamburg, Dec. 27, 1711. He studied at Leipzig from 1732 to 1736, and in the latter year he was made master of magister, on the subject of his dis- sertation, De Iesu, Eucharistica Medico. In the same year he was called as professor to Hamburg, to occupy the chair made vacant by Fabricius. He entered upon his duties by delivering an oration, De Fidei Publica ac Necesaria Noua Evangeliorum Philosophia cum Arte Bat. et Orate Diatribe. In 1744 he accepted a call to Hildesheim as superintendent and member of consistory. The University of Rinteln conferred on him the degree of doctor of divinity on presenting a dissertation, De Philosophia Platonico-Phythagorica Fraudulenta, which secured for its author the degree of doctor he declined. In 1758 he was called as first pastor of St. Nicolai to his native city, where he died, April 4, 1784. Of his many works we mention, Disquisitiones Philologicae, etc. (1741); —Hypomoneata Philologica et Critica (1745); —Ani-} madversiones Philologica et Critica (1750-52, 3 parts). See During, Die gelehrt en Theologen Deutschlands, iv, 735 sq.: Fürst, Bibl. Jud. iiii, 523; Winer, Handbuch der theolog. Lit. i, 191, 279, 545, 570, 796, 909. (B. P.)

Winkler, Johann Friedrich (1), father of Joh- nathan Dietrich, was born Dec. 13, 1673, at Wertheim, in Franconia. He studied at Greifswald, and, after complet- ing his studies, traveled extensively in Switz- erland and England. With the large material which he had collected in England he went to Frankfort, with the view of preparing a new edition of the Ethnic grammar, published by Ludolph, his former teacher, in 1702. In 1704 he accepted a call to Hamburg as professor of Oriental languages, and in 1712 was made first pastor of St. Nicolai. He died Oct. 24, 1738. Be- sides his Ethnic grammar, which he edited in a sec- ond edition, he published a number of sermons, for which he earned, Die gelehrt en Theologen Deutschlands, iv, 742. (B. P.)

Winkler, Johann Friedrich (2), a Lutheran theologian, was born Aug. 17, 1805, at Hohen-Priesenitz, in Saxony. He studied theology at Halle, and in 1834 came to America. In 1835 he was called to Newark, N. J., where he labored for seven years. In 1842 he was called to the theological seminary at Columbus, O., where he taught for three years. In 1845 he went to Detroit, Mich., and labored there for twelve years. In the meantime he had become ac- quainted with pastor Grabau, the head of the Lutheran Buffalo Synod, which he joined, and which appointed him, in 1856, professor of the Martin Luther College. Here he labored until his death, June 9, 1877. (B. P.)

Winkler, Johann Joseph, a Lutheran theo- logian, was born at Luckau, in Saxony, Dec. 28, 1860. He was at first pastor in Magdeburg, afterwards a chaplain in the army, and accompanied the troops to Hol- land and Italy. Subsequently he returned to Magde- burg, and in 1885 was called chief minister of the church, and member of consistory. He died Aug. 11, 1722. Wink- ler left some hymns which are still sung in the German church. Thus, Soldi' ich aus Fürcht vor Menschen- kindern (Engl. transl. in the Moravian Hymn-Book, p. 718, "Shall I, thru' fear of feeble man"); —Rufet recht, wenn Gottes Guide (Engl. transl. Igors. G. iv, 46, "Strive, when thou art call'd of God"); —Meine Seele sentet sich (ibid. i, 198, "Yes, my spirit faint would sink"). See Koch, Gesch. des deutschen Kirchenleides, iv, 583 sq. (B. P.)

Winner, Isaac, a Methodist Episcopal minister. Scarcely any data of his life are obtained. He was admitted into the Philadelphia Conference in 1822, and some time later joined the New Jersey Conference. He died July 4, 1868. He was a remarkable man every- way: original, strong in his convictions, peerless in self-respect and self-possession. He was one of the founders of the first Methodist Church in Harpers Ferry, and took large interest in all educational matters, except theological schools, which he opposed bitterly, on the ground that they were prolific of theological errors. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1869, p. 62.

Winnowing ("atit", lit. to scatter). Among the Hebrews, as still in Palestine, when the grain had been threshed, or, rather, crushed and trodden, in the open threshing-floor, it was thrown out, altogether, into the middle of the floor; it was then tossed up into the wind, which removed the broken straw and the chaff, while the grain, the unthreshed ears, and clubs of earth, with grain adhering to them, fell in a separate heap. The earth and the straw were then removed; the grain by means of a sieve; and the winnowed heap containing many ears that were broken, but not fully crushed out, was exposed again to the threshing opera- tion. This was again thrown across the wind by a shovel ("matzid", mizrād, rendered "fan" in our version of Isa. xxx, 24), when the pure grain fell to the ground and the light chaff was borne away by the wind, as the psalmist describes. The scattered straws, so far as required for the fodder of cattle and the making of bricks, was collected for use, but the light chaff of the second winnowing was left in the ground entangled with the stubble (the threshing-floor being in the harvest-field), with which it was burned on the ground to help to manure the soil. It therefore furnished a fit symbol of the destruction of the wicked. These win-nower processes are still followed in the East; and, as far as appears by their paintings, are much the same as were practiced by the ancient Egyptians.—Kitto, Pict.
Bible, note on Psal. 1, 4. See Agriculture.

Winram, John, a Scotch reformer of the 16th century, was superintendent of Fife and Strathern, and died in 1582. He was the author of a Catechism, of which all copies are thought to have perished.

Winter, Vesp Avton, a Roman Catholic theologian, was born May 22, 1754, at Hoogeveen in Friesland, and died in 1788. He studied at Ingolstadt, and in 1778 received a holy order. For two years he continued his studies at Halle, and after his return was appointed pastor at Laiching, near Eggmohl. Some years he spent in travelling with the son of a count, whose tutor he was.
After returning home, he was called to Ingolstadt as preacher and professor of Church history. In 1775 he commenced his lectures. When the University of Ingolstadt was removed to Landshut, in 1801, he went there, and died Feb. 27, 1814. He wrote,—Vorwort zur Verbesserung der katholischen Liturgie (Munich, 1804):
—Sammlung kleiner liturgischer Schriften (ibid., 1811):

hundert (ibid., 1808) ;—Kircbengeschichte von Altbreitbach,

Winterfeld, Georg August ViVigens Carl Von,
a German scholar, was born in 1794, and died at Berlin, Feb. 19, 1852, during the morning prayer. He is well known in the Department of Church music, and as editor of the following works: Der evangelische Kirchenge-meinsam und sein Verhältnis zur Konf der Tumate (Leipzig, 1843-47, in 3 parts): the first is entitled, Der evangelische Kirchengegmeinsam im 1. Jahrhundert der Kirchenverbesser-ungen; the second, Das siebenzehnte Jahrhundert; the third,

Winterfeld was by profession a jurist. See Zuchold,

Winterthur (Vidderanna, or Orts de Oppido Win-terur, "Pratum Minorum Minima," as he describes himself), Johannes von, was a Minoret monk of the 14th century, and the author of a chronicle which is preserved in the town library of Zurich, and is a source for the history of South Germany and Switzerland.
He was born in the period 1222-1300, at Winterthur, in the present canton of Zurich, and became a Minoret about 1230. He probably died at Zurich after 1244.

The original manuscripts of the chronicle was doubtless that owned by Antistes Bullinger of Zurich, a his-toriographer of the 16th century, and now in the Zurich library. All other manuscripts and editions are derived from that, though an additional codex is mentioned by Montfaucon (Biblioth. Bibl. Manuscr., Nova, i, 21, Paris, 1789) as having been transferred from the library of queen Christina of Sweden to that of the Vatican.
The period covered by the chronicle extends from the death of the emperor Frederic II to 1448. It is based in part upon more ancient chronicles, in part upon the oral and written statements of contemporary witnesses, and to some extent upon personal observations made by the author. The writer was acquainted with the ecclesiastical and profane literature of his time, with the Scriptures, with the works of the masters in his order, Lyra, Occam, etc., and the decrees of the popes. He mentions Ariatotile, Anp, Horace, Isidore, etc. The contents of the books are, however, made up of disconnected notices and illustrations, string together in chronological order.
It is important as a portrayal of the conflicts of the emperor
Louis, the Bavarian, with the papacy, and of the consequently disturbances in the life of the Church. It is the earliest report, for Swiss history, of the battle of Morgarten, of the vengeance visited by the dukes of Austria

WIRCO, SAIN, an Irish prelate, was born in the county of Clare, and was at an early period of life elected bishop of Dublin. He went to Rome and was consecrated by the pope. He governed this see some time, and gained a high reputation on account of his sanctity. He finally resigned his bishopric and went to Gaul. He built an oratory at Mons Petri, which he dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, and called it St. Peter's Monastery. He died May 8, on which day his festival is observed. Wisdom or God is that great attribute of his nature by which he knows and orders all things for the promotion of his glory and the good of his creatures. It is that perfection of God, by virtue of which he realizes the highest designs by the use of best means. The ascension of Spinoza and Strauss, that no design at all can be referred to God, is connected with the pantheistic idea of the impersonality of God. Certainly there does not exist for the infinite understanding the opposition, nor even the great disparity, between means and ends, which so frequently hinder us. The exclusion here of the idea of design is the exclusion of the idea that God is a Spirit who thinks and wills. As such he must not only be the All-wise, but also the Only-wise One, in comparison with whom all human wisdom is as nothing. Holy Scripture also presents him to us precisely in this light (1 Tim. i, 17). He is a God who not only has himself wisdom in creation (Prov. viii, 22), but communicates it to others (John xiv, 26). He is the All-wise, and possesses a manifold wisdom manifest for the eye of angels, although for that of man unsearchable (Ephes. iii, 10; Rom. xi, 33).

This wisdom appears in all the works of God's hands (Ps. cxxiv, 2); in the dispensations of his providence (xxvii, 1, 2); in the work of redemption (Eph. iii, 10); in the government and preservation of his Church in all ages (Ps. civ, 7). This doctrine should teach us admiration (Rev. xv, 5, 6); trust and confidence (Ps. lxxi, 5); piety (Ps. xliii, 1, 4). In Prov. viii, 12—30, we have a beautiful and poetical personification of this wisdom. As an attribute we find wisdom here to be the same as the Logos (q. v.) or Word, mentioned in John i, 1, 14. We only need observe here that wisdom, in the passage mentioned, is spoken of as an attribute and not a person; a virtue, and not a concrete being. See the article following. The term wisdom is used of the divine wisdom as revealed in and by Christ (Matt. xi, 19; Luke vii, 57; xi, 49; Mark vi, 2); also of Christ himself, as the author and source of wisdom (1 Cor. i. 30). See Bibliothek der Bekenntnisse, April, 1868; July, 1868.

Wisdom PERSONIFIED. The foundation of this view is to be found in the book of Proverbs, where (viii) wisdom (WISDOM) is represented as present with God before (viii, 29) and during the creation of the world. So far it appears only as a principle regulating the action of the creature; but it is in this way it establishes a close connection between the world, as the outward expression of wisdom, and God. Moreover, by the personification of wisdom, and the relation of wisdom to men (viii, 31), a preparation is made for the extension of the doctrine. This appears, after a long interval, in Ecclesiastes, where the great description of the wise man is given in that book (xxiv), wisdom is represented as a creation of God (xxiv, 9), penetrating the whole universe (4—5), and taking up her special abode with the chosen people (8—12). Her personal existence and providential functions have been distinctly brought out. In the book of Wisdom the conception gains yet further completeness. In this, wisdom is identified with the Spirit of God (ix, 17)—an identification half implied in Ecclus. xxix, 3—which brooded over the elements of the new world (ix, 9), and inspired the prophets (vii, 7, 27). She is the power which unites (i, 7) and directs all things (viii, 1). By her, in especial, men have fellowship with God (xiv, 1); and her action is not confined to any period, for "in all ages entering into holy souls, she maketh them friends of God and prophets" (vii, 27). So also her working, in the providential history of God's people, is traced at length (x), and her action is declared to reach beyond the world of man into that of spirits (vii, 28). See Ecclesiasticus.

The conception of wisdom, however boldly personified, yet leaves a wide chasm between the world and the Creator. Wisdom answers to the idea of the Spirit vivifying and uniting all things in all time, as distinguished from any special outward revelation of the divine person. Thus, at the same time that the doctrine of wisdom was gradually constructed, the correlative doctrine of the divine utterance was also reduced to a definite shape. The word (Μεμωρα), the divine expression, as it was understood in Palestine, furnished the exact complement to wisdom, the divine thought; but the ambiguity of the term Greek Logos (Ὄρνος, ratio) introduced considerable confusion into the later treatment of the two ideas. Broadly, however, it may be said that the Word properly represented the mediative element in the action of God. Wisdom the mediative element of his reasoning. Thus, according to the later distinction of Philo, wisdom corresponds to the immaterial word (Λόγος Ινδιανός), while the word, strictly speaking, was defined as emanucltive (Λόγος πρωτοφαν-κος). Both ideas are included in the language of the prophets, and both found a natural development in Pale- stine and Egypt. The one prepared men for the revelation of the Son of God, the other for the revelation of the Holy Spirit. See Logos.

The book of the Pseudo-Solomon, which gives the most complete view of divine wisdom, contains only two passages in which the Word is invested with the attributes of personal action (Wis. of Sol. xvi, 12; xviii, 15; ix, 1) of different character). These, however, are sufficient to indicate that the two powers were distinguished by the writer; and it has been commonly argued that the superior prominence given in the work of wisdom to the creation of a date anterior to Philo. Nor is this conclusion unreasonable, it is probably established on independent grounds that the book is of Alexandrian origin. But it is no less important to observe that the doctrine of wis- dom in itself is no proof of this. There is nothing in the direct teaching on this subject which might not have arisen in Palestine, and it is necessary that we should recur to the more special traits of Alexandrian thought in the book which have been noticed before (§ 6) for the primary evidence of its Alexandrian ori- gin; and starting from this there appears to be, so far as can be judged from the imperfect materials at our command, a greater affinity in the form of the doctrine of wisdom to the teaching of Alexandria than to that of Palestine (comp. Ewald, Geschichtc, iv, 548 fol.; Weisse, Fritslung, p. 151 sqq., has some good criticisms on many supposed traces of Alexandrian doctrine in the book, but err in denying all). See Wisdom of Solomon.

The doctrine of the divine wisdom passes by a transition, often imperceptible, to that of human wisdom, which is derived from it. This embraces not only the whole field of human and spiritual knowledge but also the various branches of physical knowledge. In this aspect the enumeration of the great forms of natural science in Wisdom of Solomon, vii, 17-20 (viii, 8), offers a most instructive subject of comparison with the corresponding passages in Kings iv, 24-34. In addition to the subjects on which Solomon wrote (Songs, Proverbs: planta, beata, fowls, creeping things, fishes), cosmology, meteorology, astronomy, psychology, and even the elements of the philosophy of history (Wis. viii, 8), are included among the gifts of wisdom. So far, the whole book, had it been a work of Christian era penetrated into the domain of speculation and inquiry, into each province, it would seem, which was then recognised, without abandoning the simple faith of his nation. The fact itself is most significant; and the whole book may be quoted as furnishing an impor- tant corrective to the later Roman descriptions of the Jews, which were drawn from the people when they had been almost uncivilized by the excitement of the last desperate struggle for national existence. See Bruch, Die Weisheitslehre der Hebräer (1831). Comp. Philo.

Wise (בִּשְׂנָה, chaddān, σοφός). The Hebrew word, בִּשְׂנָה, chaddāmim, rendered "wise men" (Gen. xii, 8; Exod. vii, 11; Eccles. i, 17; Jer. i, 55; Esth. i, 10) not only signifies men celebrated for wisdom, men, but also magicians or enchanters. See Magic. The feminine of the same term, בִּשְׂנָה, chadāhād, is used for a "wise woman," one noted for cunning or skill (2 Sam. xiv, 2; xx, 16). See Witch. The Hebrew word בִּשְׂנָה, chartummin, rendered "magicians" (Gen. xii, 8, 24; Exod. vii, 11, 22; viii, 7, 18, 19; ix, 11; Dan. i, 20, ii, 21), properly signifies sacred scribels, skilled in the sacred writing or hieroglyphics; and is applied to a class of Egyptian priests; and also to the magi of Babylon and Persia. See Magi. In Matt. ii, 1-16, the Greek term is βαθηρός, having the same significance. See Star in the East.

Wise, Francis, an English clergyman, was born at Oxford in 1655. He was educated at Trinity College, of which he became a fellow in 1718; was assistant to the English librarian in 1717; afterwards presented to the living of Elesfield, near Oxford; custos archi- vorum in 1726; became rector of Rotherfield Greys in 1745; Radelife librarian in 1748; and died Oct. 6, 1767. He published, Amulea Rerum Getaeum Amphiem Magnus (1722):—Familiae de Nummo Aegypti Regia (1736)—A Letter to Dr. Mead Concerning some Antiquities in Berkshire, etc. (1738):—History and Chronology of the Fabledous Age, Considered Par- ticularly with Regard to the Two Ancient Devils, Bacchus and Hercules (1764), and other works. Wise, Michael, one of the most eminent of Eng- lish music-composers, was born in Wiltshire about the middle of the 17th century. He was among the first set of children chosen at the Chapel Royal after the Restoration; became organist and master of the choristers in the cathedral of Salisbury in 1668; was appointed gentleman of the Chapel Royal in 1675; and was made almoner of St. Paul's Cathedral in 1686. Quitting his house at night in a state of great irritation, he was stopped by the watchman, with whom he entred into a quarrel, and was killed in the street in August, 1667. His anthems, "Awake up, my Glory," "Prepare ye the Way of the Lord," and "The Ways of Zion do Mourn," are still listened to with admiration.

Wiseheart, the family name of several Scotch prelates. 1. Gideon, was minister at North Leith, and de- posed in 1648 for refusing to take the covenant. He went to England in 1660, and soon after had the rectorcy of Newcastle-upon-Tyne conferred upon him. Upon the restoration of episcopacy in Scotland, he was pre- ferred to the see of Edinburgh, into which he was con- secrated, June 1, 1692, at St. Andrews. He died in 1671. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 92.

2. John, came into the see of Glasgow in 1619. He was an enemy to the English interest in Scotland. He was taken prisoner and confined in the Tower of Lon- don, April 6, 1620, but was probably released in 1622. He died in 1635. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 248.

3. Rowanty, was consecrated bishop of Glasgow in 1627. In 1628 he swore fealty to king Edward I of England. He was appointed one of the lords of the regency in 1596, and died Nov. 1, 1596. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 241.

4. William, was archdeacon of St. Andrews and lord high-chancellor. He was elected to the see of Glasgow in 1629, and afterwards to that of St. Andrews. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 241.

WISLICENUS, Gustav Adolf, a liberal Protestant theologian of Germany, was born Nov. 20, 1808, at Batavia, near Eisleben. He was a student at Halle, and while yet a student was sentenced, in 1824, to prison for twelve years on account of democratic intrigues. Having been pardoned after five years' imprisonment, he resumed his studies at Berlin in 1829, in 1834 was appointed pastor near Querfurt, and in 1841 was called to Halle. Having become a member of the "friends of light," he lectured in their behalf on May 29, 1844, at Köthen. Professor Guericke, then at Halle, denounced him before the ecclesiastical authorities, in consequence of which Wislicenus published his Oe Bank, "Der Glaube (Leipzig, 4th ed. 1848)." In 1846 Wislicenus was dismissed of his office, and wrote Die Amtsenthebung (ibid. 1846). He now preached to a congregation of so-called "free members" at Halle, and after the publication of Die Bibel im Lichte der Bildung unserer Zeit (Magdeburg and Lübeck, 1858), he left for literary pursuits to Flurnter, where he died, Oct. 14, 1873. Beside the publications mentioned already, he compiled the Nachdrucke der Gemeinden in Halle (Halle, 1847): Beiträge zur Förderung der Religion der Menchenfreundschaft (ibid. 1855): Aus Amerika (Leipzig, 1854): Die Bibel für die deutsche Leser (ibid. 1863—4, 2 vols.; 2d ed. 1866): Entweder—Oder (Zurich, 1866): Gegenwart und Zukunft der Religion (Leipzig, 1867). Wissowatius, Andreas, one of the most prominent Socinians, and grandson of F. Socinian, was born in 1608 at Philippsport, in Lithuania. For many years he was pastor of different Socinian congregations in Poland. He died in Holland in 1678. Of his sixty-two writings we mention, Religion Rationalis (1656): Stimuli Virtutum Freni Pectorum (Amsterdam, 1682). He edited the Bibliotheca Fratrum Polonorum, and the Racovian Catechism. Leibnitz wrote against him a treatise On the Trinity. See Winer, Handbuch der Theol. Lit. i, 398, 374, 855; Theologisches Universalleksikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Witch of Endor (Heb. בְּנֵק יְדֵי הָאָנָב, 1 Sam. xxvii, 7; lit. a woman, mistress of an an): In Dan. iv, 9; Sept. γυναῖκα ἐκ τοῦ ἐν θηρίῳ (Vulg. Vula, maier pythonom habena in Endor); A.V. a woman that hath a familiar spirit in Endor). The story of the "witch of Endor," as she is commonly but imprecisely called, is usually referred to magical power. She, however, belongs to another class of pretenders to supernatural powers. See DIVINATION. She was a necromancer, or one of those persons who pretended to call up the spirits of the dead to converse with the living (Isa. xlvi, 7; xlvii, 11; 1 Chron. xii, 20). A full account is given of such persons by Lucan (vi, 591, etc.), and by Tibullus (i, 2; v, 45), where the pretensions of the sorceress are thus described—

"Hae cantu finditique soluta, Manseque sepulchro Elicit, et tepido devotis aupa rogitis."

Of much the same character is the story in the sixth book of Virgil's Aeneid. For the pretended modern instances of such intercourse, see SPIRITUALISM.

It is related as the last and crowning act of Saul's rebellion against God, that he consulted such a person, an act forbidden by the divine law (Lev. xxvi, 6), which sentenced him to such a painful death (ver. 27), and which law Saul himself had recently enforced (1 Sam. xxviii, 8, 9), because, it is supposed, they had freely predicted his approaching ruin; although, after the well-known prophecies of Samuel to that effect, the disasters Saul had already encountered, and the growing influence of David, there "needed no ghost to come from the grave to tell them this." Various explanations of this story have been offered. See NICROMANCY.

1. It has been attempted to resolve the whole into imposture and collusion. Saul, who was naturally a weak and excitable man, had become, through a long series of vexations and anxieties, absolutely "delirious," as Patrick observes: "he was afraid and his heart greatly trembled," says the sacred writer. In this state of tormented mind, the miserable monarch last hired, in commisions his own servants to seek him a woman possessing a familiar spirit, and, attended by two of them, he comes to her "by night," the most favorable time for imposition. He converses with her alone, his two attendants being beside her, as she was, "somebody yet, however, close at hand. Might not one of these, or some one else, have agreed with the woman to personate Samuel in another room?"—for it appears that Saul, though he spoke with, did not see the ghost (ver. 18, 14): who, it should be observed, told him nothing but what his own attendants could have told him, with the exception of these words, "to-morrow shalt thou and thy sons be with me" (ver. 19); to which, however, it is replied, that Saul's death did not occur upon the morrow, and that the word so translated is sufficiently ambiguous, for though "to-morrow" means "to-morrow" in some passages, it means the future, indefinitely, in others (Exod. xiii, 14, and see the margin of Zech. vii, 6; 21). Comp. Matt. vi, 30, 31, and further urged that her "crying with a loud voice," and her telling Saul, at the same time, that she knew him, were the well-timed arts of the sorceress, intended to magnify her pretended skill.

It is, however, objected against this, or any other hypothesis of collusion, that the sacred writer not only represents the pythomme as affirming, but also himself affirms, that she saw Samuel, and that Samuel spoke to Saul, nor does he drop the least hint that it was not the real Samuel of whom he was speaking.

2. The same objections apply equally to the theory of ventriloquism, which has been grounded upon the word used by the Sept., γυναῖκα ἐκ τοῦ ἐν θηρίῳ.

3. Others have given a literal interpretation of the story, and have maintained that Samuel actually appeared to Saul. Justin Martyr advocates this theory, and, in his dialogue with Trypho the Jew, urges this incident in proof of the immortality of the soul (p. 353). The same view is taken in the additions to the Sept. in 1 Chron. x. 18, καὶ ἄνδρον ἀντί Σαμουήλ ὁ προφήτης; and in Exclus. xvi, 3, 20, it is said, "and the Lord had spoken to Saul, prophesied, and showed the king his end," etc. Such also is the view Josephus takes (Antiq. vi, 14, 3, 4), where he bestows a labored eulogium upon the woman.

It is, however, objected that the actual appearance of Samuel is inconsistent with all we are taught by revelation concerning the state of the dead; involves the possibility of a spirit or soul assuming a corporeal shape, conversing audibly, etc.; and, further, that it is incredible that God would submit the departed souls of his servants to be summoned back to earth, by rites either utterly futile, or else deriving their efficacy from the co-operation of Satan. So Tertullian argues (De Animi, cap. lvii), and many others of the ancients.

4. Others have supposed that the woman induced Satan or some evil spirit to personate Samuel. But this theory involves other difficulties, attributes nothing less than miracles to the power of the devil; for it supposes the apparition of a spiritual and incorporeal being, and that Satan can assume the appearance of any one he pleases. Again, the historian (ver. 14) calls this appearance to Saul, καὶ Σαμουήλ, "Samuel himself" (the latter word is entirely omitted by our translators); which he could not with truth have done if it were no other than the devil; who, besides, is here represented as the severe reprobate of God's enemy, and the instrument of the admission that Satan or an evil spirit could thus personate an individual at pleasure, would endanger the strongest evidences of Christianity.

The text mentioned another interpretation, which appears to us at once tenable, and censured by similar narratives in Scripture, namely, that the whole account is the narrative of a miracle, a divine representation or impression, partly upon the senses of Saul, and partly upon those of the woman, and intended for the rebuke and punishment of Saul. It is urged, from the air of the narrative in verses 11-12, that Samuel appeared before the woman had any time for juggleries, fumigations, &c.; for although the word "when" (ver. 12) is specially printed in Roman characters, it has no such force when answer to it in the context, as it reads simply thus, beginning at verse 11: "Then said the woman, Whom shall I bring unto you? And he said, Bring me up Samuel." And the woman said Samuel, and cried with a loud voice. So no sooner then had Saul said, "Bring me up Samuel," than Samuel himself was presented to her mind—an event so contrary to her expectation that she cried out with terror. At the same time, and by the same miraculous means, she was made aware of the royal dignity of her visitant. The vision then continues in the mind of Saul, who thereby retains this last reproof from heaven, and hears the sentence of his approaching doom. Thus God interposed with a miracle previously to the use of any magikal formula, as he did when the king of Moab had recourse to sorceries to overrule the mind of Balaam, so that his spirit was compelled to be by the Lord. Balaam wanted him to curse (Num. xxiii.); and as God also interposed when Abashaiz sent to consult Baal-zebub his god, about his recovery, when by his prophet Elijah he stopped the messengers, reproved their master, and foretold his death (1 Kings ii, 16). It may also be observed that Saul was on this occasion simply sentenced to the death he had justly incurred by having recourse to those means which he knew to be unlawful. This theory concerning the narrative of Samuel's appearance to Saul is maintained with much learning and ingenuity by Hugh Farmer (Disputationes on Miracles, Lond. 1771, p. 472, et seq.). It is adopted by Dr. Waterland (Serm. ii, 267), and Dr. Delauney, in his Life of David; but is combated by Dr. Chandler with objections, which are, however, answered or obviated by Farmer. This last-named writer is of opinion that the expression "his spirit was compelled to be by the Lord" (ver. 14), and the introduction of the word "when" (ver. 12), are to be ascribed to the prejudices of our translators. If they do not betray a bias on their minds, these instances support the general remark of Bishop Lowth, upon the subject, "in respect of the sense, and accuracy of interpretation, the amendments of which it is capable are great and numerous." (Preliminary Dissertation to Isaiah, ad finem.) See Saul.

Witchcraft.

BIBLICAL MENTION OF. 1. The word "witchcraft" occurs in the A. V. as a translation of עשת-מכרות, ἐζήθερ (but only in the plur.), in 2 Kings ix, 22; Is. xix. 12; Mic. vi. 12; Nah. iii. 4 (Sept. ἐζήθερα, ἐζήθησαν; Vulg. revelerunt, revelerunt). In the Apocrypha, witchcraft, or "sorcery," occurs as renderings of φατασμα (Wind, xiv., 4; xvii., 13), and in the New Test. (Gal. v. 20; Rev. xiv., 11; xviii., 23, 25). As a verb עשת-מכרות, ἐζήθερ, he used witchcraft, occurs in 2 Chron. xxxii. (5 Oct. ἐζήθησαν; Vulg. maleficai artibus incurreverat). This verb, in Arabic, signifies "to practice a discover," in Syriac ἐπικράτησα, according to Gesenius, "to possess," but this word, he observes, like many other sacred terms of the Syrians, as מאי, מאי, מאי, etc., is restricted by the Hebrews to idolatrous services; hence כחת means "to practice magic," literally "to pronounce or mutter spells." The word φατασμα is connected with φατασμα, to administer or supply medicines as remedies or poisons, to use magical herbs, drugs, or substances, supposed to derive their efficacy from magical spells, and thence to use spells, conjurations, or enchantments; hence φατασμα means, the classical writers, a preparer of drugs, but generally of poisons, or drugs that operate by the force of magical charms, and thence a magician, an enchantor, of either sex. It occurs in the latter sense in Josephus (Ant. xavii, 4, 1), and is applied by him to a female φατασμαν και φατασματα ανεκδειξατο (ibid. ix, 6, 8). This word also answers in the Sept. to מאי, and to μαγικα. (Exod. ix, 11), φατασμα, malefic. The received text of Rev. xxvi, 8 reads φατασμα; but the Alexandrian, and sixteen later MSS., with several printed editions, have φατασμα, a reading embraced by Wetstein, and by Grapheus on the text. The word φατασμα occurs in the same sense as φατασμα in Lucian (Dialog. Deor. xxiii, 1; Joseph. Life, § 31). The word φατασμα is used of Circe by Aristophanes (Plat. p. 302), and in the same sense of enchantment, etc., by Polybius (vi, 18, 4, xii, 7, 5). It corresponds in the Sept. to מאי, מאי, etc., "enchantments." (Exod. vii, 22). The verb φατασμα is employed in the sense of using enchantments by Herodotus (vii, 114), saying that when Xerxes came to the river Styxmon, the magi sacrificed white horses to it.

Some other mis-translations occur in reference to this subject. In 1 Sam. xv, 27, "rebellion is as the sin of witchcraft" should be rendered "divinity offered to God." In Ex. xviii, 10, the word מאי, מאי, does not mean "witch," but, being masculine, "a sorcerer." In Acts viii, 9, the translation is exceedingly apt to mislead the more English reader: "Simon used sorcery, and bewitched the people of Samaria." —Σμαν πορευσεται τεν πολιν μαγευς και οιεται τον ιεων τον Σαμαριτανον—i.e., "Simon had embraced sorcery, and perplexing (or astonishing) the people," etc. See also ver. 11, and comp. the use of the word מאי, Matt. xii, 28. In Gal. iii, 1, " Foolish galatians," εφημεροι γυναικεια, οι ητο τις εξερευνηθεν, "who hath subtler notions?" (For the use of the words פאשע and φατασμα in magic, among the Greeks, see Potter, Archeologia Gracae [Lond. 1775], vol. i, ch. xviii, p. 356, et seq.). It is considered by some that the word "witchcraft" is used metaphorically, for the allurements of pleasure (Nah. iii, 4, Rev. xviii, 23), and that the "sorcerers" mentioned in xxi, 8 may mean false judges, false witnesses, false politicians, "a pervert" used by metonymy, as signifying "to charm," "to persuade by flattery," etc. (Plato, Symposium, § 17), "to give a temper to metals" (Odyss. ix, 893).

2. The precise idea, if any, now associated with the word "witchcraft," is not distinctly visible: in the West, however, it is used in a very general sense, known by nearly the whole nation in the time of our translators, that of a female, who, by the agency of Satan, or, rather, of a familiar spirit or gnome appointed by Satan to attend on her, performs operations beyond the powers of humanity, in consequence of her compact with Satan, written in her own blood, by which she renounces herself to him forever. Among other advantages resulting to her from this engagement is the power of transforming herself into any shape she pleases, which was, however, generally that of a hare, transporting herself through the air on a broomstick, "on the back of a cloud," "gliding through a keyhole, inflicting diseases, etc., upon mankind or cattle. The belief in the existence of such persons cannot be traced farther than the Middle Ages, and was probably derived from the wild and gloomy mythology of the Northern nations, among whom the "Fatale Sist" was a figure in personification. The popular agency in a female form, were prominent articles of the popular creed. This comparatively modern delusion was strengthened and confirmed by the translators of the Bible into the Western languages—a popular version of the original text having led people to suppose that there was positive evidence for the existence of such beings in Scripture. Bishop Hutchinson declares that our translators accommodated their version to the terminology of King James’s Treatise on Demonology (Encyclop. Metropolitana, art. “Witch,” etc.).

8. A very different idea was conveyed by the Hebrew word, which probably denotes a sorcerer or magician, who pretended to discover, and even to direct, the effects ascribed to the operation of the elements, conjunctures of the stars, the influence of the planets, and the influence of the sick, the days, the power of invisible spirits, and of the inferior deities (Graves, Lectures on the Pentateuch [Dublin, 1829], p. 109, 110). Sir Walter Scott well observes that “the sorcery or witchcraft of the Old Test. resolves itself into a heklschicht with idols and seeking counsel of false deities, or, in other words, into idolatry.” (Letters on Demonology and Witchcraft [London, 1830], let. 2).

Accordingly, sorcery is in Scripture uniformly associated with idolatry (Deut. xvii, 9-14; 2 Kings ix, 22; 2 Chron. xxxiii, 5, 6; etc.; Gal. v, 20; Rev. xxi, 8). The modern idea of witchcraft, as involving the assistance of Satan, is inconsistent with Scripture, where, as in the instance of Job, Satan is represented as powerless till God gave him a limited commission; and when “Satan desired to sift Peter as wheat,” no reference is made to the assistance of a witch. Nor do the actual references to magic in Scripture involve its reality. The mischiefs resulting from the pretensions, under the theocracy, to an art which involved idolatry, justified the statute which denounced it with death; though instead of the unexampled phrase אִשָּׁר לֹא לֹא אָסָף (Deut. xviii, 11), which also better suites the parallel, “There shall not be found among you, etc., a witch” (Deut. xviii, 10). Indeed, as “we know that an idol is nothing in the world, and that there is none other God but one” (1 Cor. viii, 4), we must believe all pretensions to traffic with the one, or ask counsel of the other, to be equally vain.

Upon the principle of supporting idolatry, however, the prophets of Baal also were destroyed, and not because Baal had any real existence, or because they could avail anything by their invocations.

It is highly probable that the more intelligent portion of the Jewish community, especially in later times, understood the emptiness of pretensions to magic (see Isa. xliii, 25; xlvii, 11-15; Jer. xiv, 14; Jonah ii, 8). Plato evidently considered the mischief of magic to consist in the tendency of the pretensions to it, and not in the reality (Lev. Leg. bib. 11). Demonstration of the kind had fallen into disuse at the time of Cicero: “Dulibus non est quin hic disciplina et ares augurarum evanetiam et vetustate et negligimenta” (De Leg. ii, 13). Josephus declares that he laughed at the very idea of witchcraft (Vit. § 31). For the very early writers who maintained that the arts of the magicians were not supernatural, see Universal Hist. (8vo ed.), iii, 574.

It seems safe to conclude from the Septuagint renderings, and their identity with the terms used by classical writers, that the pretended exercise of this art in ancient times was accompanied with the use of drugs, or fumigations made of them. No doubt the skillful use of certain chemicals, if restricted to the knowledge of a few persons, might, in ages unenlightened by science, along with other resources of natural magic, have made the means of extensive imposture. The natural gases which would contribute to the effect, as appears from the ancient account of the origin of the oracle at Delphi. See PHRENOLOGY. The real mischiefs ever effected by the professors of magic on mankind, etc., may be safely ascribed to the actual administration of poison. Josephus states a case of poisoning under the form of a philosophical exercise, and two Jewish women were reported to be skilful in making such potions. (Ant. xxvii, 4, 1). Such means doubtless constitute the real perniciousness of the African species of witchcraft called Obi, the similarity of which word to the Hebrew זיון, inflation, is remarkable. Among the Sandwich islanders, some, who had professed witchcraft, confessed, after their conversion to Christianity, that they had poisoned their victims. The death of sir Thomas Overbury is cited as an instance in England, by sir Walter Scott (ut sup.). There was, indeed, a wide scope for the production of very fantastic effects, short of death, by such means.

WITCHCRAFT, IN POPULAR ESTIMATION, is the practice and powers of a person supposed to have formed a compact with Satan. The powers deemed to be possessed by the witches, and the rites and incantations by which they acquired those powers, were substantially the same as believed to the deities of the Greek, Hecate, the Striga and Venefica of the ancient Romans, and the Vals or Wise Woman of the Teutonic pagans. But when, along with the knowledge of the one true God, the idea of a purely wicked spirit, the enemy of God and man, was introduced, it was natural that all supernatural powers not proceeding directly from the true God should be attributed to Satan. This gave an entirely new aspect to such arts; they became associated with heresy; those who practised them must be in compact with the devil, and have renounced God and the truth, and rendered themselves liable to the most stringent punishment. If a witch was punished, it was because she had been guilty, or, at least, believed to have been guilty, of poisoning or some other actual mischief. Now, however, such power was only the power to work evil; and merely to be a witch was in itself a sin and crime that filled the best times. This idea of an indirect power connected with magic and sorcery. That was new and distinctive in the witchcraft of Christendom was the theory of magical arts which it involved. The doctrine of Satan, as finally elaborated in the Middle Ages, established in the world a rival dominion to that of the Almighty. The arch-fiend and his legions of subhuman demons exercised a sway, doubtless only permitted, but still vast and indefinite, not only over the elements of nature, but over the minds and bodies of men, except those who had been admitted to the number of the faithful, and were guarded by the faith and rites of the Church. But even they were not altogether exempt from diabolical annoyance, for the protection does not seem to have extended to their belongings. All persons in possession of these supernatural powers (and there was no doubt of their existence in all ages) must, therefore, have been subject from the private suggestions of devils, and being under his agency—excepting, of course, those miraculous powers which had been bestowed upon the Church directly by Heaven. But Satan, bestowing these powers, was supposed to demand an equivalent; hence it came to be the established belief that, in order to acquire the powers of witchcraft, the person must formally sell his or her soul to the devil. This, however, was not the early view. Magicians had been diligent students of their art. Alchemists, astronomers, and astrologers had searched into the hidden things of nature; and the circumstances would show that the higher kind of European magic in the Middle Ages was mixed up with what physical science there then was; and the most noted men of the time were addicted to the pursuit, or were, at least, reputed to be so. So far from deriving their power from the kingdom of darkness, the scientific magician, by the more force of his art, could compel the occasional services of Satan himself, and make inferior demons the involuntary slaves of his will. A belief, however, had early existed that individuals in desperate circumstances had been tempted to purchase, at the price of their own soul, the power of the devil to extricate them from their difficulties; and hence the suspicion began to gain adhesion that many magicians, instead of seeking to acquire their power by the laborious studies of the regular art, had acquired it.
WITCHCRAFT

in this illegitimate way. The chief cause of the prominent part in this matter assigned to females, particularly married women, was the natural dislike of ugliness. It may also be noted that their more excitable temperament renders them peculiarly liable to those ecstasies which have been associated with the gift of divination from the priestess of the ancient heathen oracle down to the medium of modern spiritualism. Witches' Sabbats were considered to be natural intercourses between witches and evil spirits. The bargain by which the soul was sold to the devil was usually in writing, and signed with the witch's own blood. She was rebaptized, receiving a new name, and had to trample on the cross and renounce God and Christ (among the Roman Catholics also the Virgin Mary) in forms parodying the renunciation of the devil in Christian baptism. She received a "witch mark," which remained, and the location of it was known by that part becoming callous and dead—a matter of great interest to the inquiring confessor. These servants were essentially the same as those ascribed to sorcerers, and the mode of exercising them was the same, viz. by charms, incantations, concoctions, etc. The only change was in the theory, that is, that instead of any power inherent in the sorcerer or derived from any other source, the result was all wrought by the devil through the witch as his servant. The power was also exerted exclusively to work evil—to raise storms, blast crops, render men and beasts barren, inflict rack ing pain on an enemy, or make him pine away in sickness. If a witch attempted to do good, the devil was enraged and punished her, and whatever she did she was powerless to serve her own interests, for witches always remained poor and miserable.

A prominent feature of witchcraft was the belief in stated meetings of witches and devils by night, called Witches' Sabbats. The places of meeting were always such as had feelings of solemnity and awe connected with them, such as old ruins, neglected churchyards, and places of heathen sacrifices. First anointing her feet and shoulders with a salve made of the fat of murdered and unburied children, the witch mounted a broomstick, rake, or similar article, and making her exit through the chimney, rode through the air to the place of rendezvous. If her own particular demon-lover came to fetch her, he sat on the staff before, and she behind him; or he came in the shape of a goat, and carried her off. In one case a girl appeared as a demon, in the shape of a large goat with a black human countenance, sat on a high chair and received the homage of the witches and demons. The feast was lighted up with torches, all kindled at a light burning between the horns of the great goat. Among the stands there was no bread or salt, and they drank out of ox-hoofed and horse's skulks, but the meal neither satisfied the appetite nor nourished. After eating and drinking they danced. In dancing they turned their backs to each other; and in the intervals they related to one another what mischief they had done, and plotted more. The revel concluded with obscene debauchery, after which the great goat bathed himself to ashes, which he divided among the witches to raise storms. Then they returned as they came. (For a vivid and entertaining description of some of these revels, see the Tam O'Shanter of Robert Burns.)

2. The prosecutions for witchcraft form a sad episode in human history. Thousands of lives of innocent persons were sacrificed to the silly superstition, and thousands more were involved. Various reasons have been given as to why they suspected of having some connection with the black art. In the Twelve Tables of Rome there were penal enactments against him who should bewitch the fruits of the earth, or conjure away his neighbor's corn into his own field. A century and a half later one hundred and seventy Roman ladies were convicted of poisoning under the pretence of charms and incantations, and new laws were added. But in these and in all other heathen laws there was no penalty attached, except in the case of positive injury done. Magical of supernatural power was looked upon rather with favor than otherwise, only it was feared that it might be abused by its possessor.

The early Church was severe in its judgments against magic, astrology, augury, charms, and all kinds of divination. The civil law condemned the Mathematici, or men that formed calculations for the prediction of future events. Venerificus, or Maleficium, poisoning and mischief-making, was the name given to sorcery. The Church would not, by a law of Constantine, baptize astrologers, nor a special class of them called Genethliaci, or those who calculated what stars had been in the ascendant at a man's birth. The canon of Ancysa says: "Let those who use soothsaying after the manner of the heathen, or entertain men to teach them pharmacy or exegy, fall under the canon of five years' penance, viz. three years of prostration, and two years of prayer in prayers." Those who consulted or followed such soothsayers as were supposed to be in compact with Satan were to be cast out of communion. Constantine, however, made such divination a capital crime, as well on the part of those who practiced it as of those who sought information from it. Arambol, or spells for a cure disease, were reckoned a species of idolatry, and the makers of such phylacteries shared in the same condemnation. The abraxas or abracadabra (p. v.) of the Basilians came under similar censure. But the prosecutions against witchcraft as such were of minor importance comparatively until as late as the 11th century, when the prosecutions against hereesy were systematically organized. Hitherto magic had been distinguished as white or black; now no distinction was made, and all magic was reckoned black. Almost all herecies were accused of magical practices, and their secret meetings were looked upon as a kind of devil-worship. Forced by the proceedings against hereesy, the popular dread of witchcraft had been on the increase for centuries, and numerous executions had taken place in various parts of Europe. At last Innocent VII, by his celebrated bull Prohibitor (1494), issued in 1494, gave the full sanction of the Church to these notions concerning sorcery, and charged the inquisitors and others to discover and put to death all guilty of these arts. He appointed two special inquisitors for Germany, Heinrich Inistor and Jacob Sparengern, who are also mentioned in the case of Michaelis Heilig, who afterwards became a Franciscan monk. His instance, Johannes Gremper, drew up the famous Malefiz Mallefauchum, or Hammer for Witches, in which the whole doctrine of witchcraft was elaborated, a form of trial laid down, and a course of examination appointed by which the inquisitors could discover the guilty parties. This was the beginning of the witch-mania proper. The edict of Innocent was reinforced by a bull of Alexander VI in 1494, of Leo X in 1521, and of Adrian VI in 1522, each adding strength to its predecessor, and calculated to increase the popular agitation. The results were despicable. Armand with the Mallefiz, the judge had no difficulty in convicting the most innocent persons. If the accused did not confess at once, they were ordered to be shaved and examined for "witchmarks." If any strange mark was discovered on the person, no further evidence was required. If, in examining in this, the accused was put to the torture, which in almost all instances elicited confession. Many, in order to avoid this ordeal, confessed at once, and were forthwith led to execution. Others seem to have become sorcerers because they were accused of having some connection with them. The extent of the prosecutions in Germany is appalling to consider. In the bishopric of Bamberg 600 victims fell within four years, and in Würzburg 990. In the district of Lindheim a twentieth part of the population perished in the same time. And during this inquisition 7000 lives were sacrificed at Trier. Such atrocities were railed by 1000 executions in the Italian provinces of Como within a single year, 45 executions at Spilto, and 960 in Vienna in three months. It is said that in France, about the year 1520, fires for the execution of witches blazed in every town.

The madness seized upon all nations and all estates of men, alike on Catholics and Protestants, and often on the accused as firmly as on their accusers, so that the trials represented perjury and unmitigated delusions. Even Martin Luther looked on his earache as "peculiarly diabolical," and exclaimed of witches, "I could burn them all."

England, by its insular position and intense political life, was kept longest from the witch mania; but when it came, it was no less violent than it had been on the Continent. The statute of Elizabeth, in 1562, first made witchcraft in itself a crime of the first magnitude, whether directed to the injury of others or not. The act of James I (VI of Scotland), in the first year of his reign, repeated the crime in the community. It is as follows: "Any one that shall use, practice, or exercise invocation of any evil or wicked spirit, to or for any purpose, or take up any dead man, etc., such offenders, duly and lawfully convicted and attainted, shall suffer the said delusion speedily and without all abatement throughout all England, and increased to a frenzy. Witch-dinders passed through the country from town to town, professing to rid the community of all witches, and receiving therefor a stipulated sum. Their methods were most inhuman. They stripped the accused, shaved them, and thrust pins into their bodies to discover witches' marks; they wrapped them in sheets with the great toes and thumbs tied together, and dragged them through ponds or rivers, and if they sank they were accounted innocent; but if they floated, which they were sure to do for a notorious witch-dinder, but his well-executed. Many times the poor creatures were kept fasting and awake, and sometimes walking incessantly, for twenty-four or forty-eight hours. Indeed, such cruelties were practiced as an inducement to confession, that the unhappy victims were glad to confess and end their miseries at once. During the sittings of the Long Parliament, three thousand persons are said to have been executed on legal convictions, besides the vast number that perished at the hands of the mob. Even so wise and learned a judge as Sir Matthew Hale condemned two witches in 1654. John Leverett and Holt were the first to set their faces steadfastly against the continuance of this delusion. This was in 1694, but summary executions continued as far down as 1716, when the last victim was hanged at Huntington. The English laws against witchcraft were repealed in 1736.

The burning of witches forms a dark chapter in the history of Scotland, and the penal laws are said to have been first inflicted in the reign of James III. In that reign twelve women are said to have suffered, but their witchcraft was associated with treason and murder. James V was a notorious witch-dinder, but his well-known statute was only in accordance with the spirit of the times. The General Assembly of the Church of Scotland and its presbytery, from convictions of duty, had often taken the matter up, for the Old Testament expressly said, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live." The number of victims in Scotland from first to last is estimated at over four thousand. When the penal laws were at length repealed, the early seeders mounted over the repeal as a sad declension of national duty to God. The principal scenes of witchcraft were in the lowlands, where the fairies of the highlands being harmless and ingenious sprites, rather than dark, ugly, and impassioned fiends. Many of the Scottish witches, as appears from their trial, were the victims of miserable hallucination; others seem to have gloried in a fancied power to torment others, and to have profited by it; others, when some sudden calamity happened, or some individual was afflicted with any mysterious malady, malignantly took credit as having had a hand in producing it; and others made the implied compact with Satan a knavish cover for crimes of various kinds, both dastardly and vicious. New England was settled at a time when the excitement over witchcraft was very general and intense, and several persons were executed in Massachusetts prior to the extraordinary outbreak at Salem. As in Scotland and elsewhere, the clergy were the prime movers. Two clergymen were on, Norfolk, a reputable notoriety for the part they had in it. The one was Cotton Mather, a man who was considered a prodigy in learning and piety, but whose writings and proceedings in regard to the trial and punishment of witches display an amount of bigotry almost incredible. The other was Samuel Parris, of Salem Village (now Danvers Centre), who seems to have made use of the delusion to gratify his own personal dislikes. Previous to the outbreak the last instance had been the hanging of an Irish woman in Boston, in 1688, accused of bewitching four children. In 1692, the people at Salem and nearby were touched by the delusion. During the winter of 1691 and 1692 a company, consisting mostly of young girls, was accustomed to meet at the house of Mr. Parris for the purpose of practicing magic, necromancy, etc. They soon began to exhibit nervous symptoms, such as contortions, passing insensibly to the floor. The children were declared to be bewitched, and, being pressed to reveal the perpetrator of the mischief, they accused an Indian woman, named Tituba, a servant in the family of Mr. Parris; Sarah Good, a woman of ill-repute, and Sarah Osburn, who was bedridden. These were tried before the magistrates March 1, 1692. From this time the excitement became intense. The clergy were zealous in the prosecution, being urged by the belief that Satan was making a special effort to overthrow the kingdom of God in New England. The court was full of clergymen, and in the delusion. The special court appointed to try these cases met the first week in June, and continued its sessions until Sept. 9. Nineteen victims were hanged, as a result of the investigation, some of them pious and respectable citizens. An old man, more than eighty years of age, was pressed to death for refusing to plead to a charge of witchcraft. A reaction now set in, and subsequent sentences were not executed. In May following the governor discharged all then in prison, about one hundred and fifty in number.

Witchcraft and Prophecies The moods of the people of many countries, a reality for almost a century after the general excitement had abated. The last judicial execution did not occur in Germany until 1766, in Spain until 1780, and in Switzerland until 1782. And from the cessation of executions many think that belief in witchcraft has entirely passed away, but facts are contrary to such a supposition. Some occurrences in England in very recent times point to the fact that the popular mind is still infected with the belief in witchcraft as a thing of the present. In 1863 a poor old man paralysed by planter's disease was carried to the sea and being dragged through the water as a wizard at Castle Heddington, in Essex; in 1875 the trial at Warwick of Amizer of the murderer of a reputed witch brought out the fact that over one third of the villages of Long Compton are firm believers in witchcraft; and in April, 1876, at East Dereham, Norfolk, a man was convicted for assaulting the daughter of an old woman who was alleged to have charmed him by means of a walking toad. With very rare exceptions educated people do not believe in witchcraft, but among the ignorant and illiterates of all countries the belief is still prevalent. To the mass of the adherents of Buddhism, in Central Asia, the lama, or priest, is merely a wizard who knows how to protect them from the malignity of evil spirits; and, according to modern travellers, trials and executions for witchcraft are at this day common throughout Africa, as they were in Europe in the 17th century, and under very similar forms. 3. The literature of the subject is copious. Among the many works the following may be noted: Wier, De Praestigiis Daemonum (Haale, 1653); Scot, The Discoveries of Witchcraft (Lond. 1834); Glanvil, Sadducisms Triumphant; or, Full and Plain Evidence concerning Witchcraft and Demon Possession (Lond. 1699); Certainty of the World of Spirits; Mackenzie, A History of the Witches of Renfrewshire (1768); Mather, Memorable Providences relating to Witchcraft and Possessions, with Discoveries and Appendix (Lond. and Boston, 1693); Hutchinson, Historical Essay concerning Witchcraft (1712); Mackay, Extraordinary and Popular Delusions (1814); Soldan, Geschichte der Hexenprozesse (Stuttgart, 1843); Upham, Salem Witchcraft (Boston, 1857); Mudge, Witch Hill: a History of Salem Witchcraft (N. Witenagemot (or Witan) (Anglo-Saxon, witenace, of wise men, from witan, to know, and gemot, assembly), the great national council of the Saxons, by which the king was guided in all the main acts of government. Each kingdom had its own witan before the union of the heathen laws in 927, after which there was a general one for the whole country. Its members are all spoken of as men of rank, and most probably included bishops, abbots, and chamberlain of the church, and thanes. In 994 there were present at one of these assemblies king Athelstan, four Welsh princes, two archbishops, seven bishops, four abbots, twelve dukes, and fifty-two thanes. Every measure of national importance was debated here, the laws received its sanction, and the succession of the crown depended upon its approval. It could make new laws and treaties; it regulated military and ecclesiastical affairs, and levied taxes; without its consent the king had no power to raise forces by sea or land; and it was the supreme court of justice, civil and criminal. The voice of the Church was never absent from its deliberations, so that the right of British prelates to sit and vote in the national assembly was one of the principles of the earliest regular form of government, not derived from Norman laws, but from that time, long before, when the Saxon archbishop, bishop, and abbots took their seats three times a year (at Easter, Whitsun, and Christmas) in the Saxon witan. The witenagemot was abolished by William the conqueror and its powers only in part transmitted to parliament. "With (\"with\", yther, Judg. xvi. 7, 5, a rope; "cord, "Job xxx. 11; 'string,' Psal. xi. 2). In the passage of Judges cited we read that Dalleth bound Samson with "green ropes," as distinguished from "dry ropes," is the proper meaning, the peculiarity being in the greenness, not in the material. It may imply any kind of crude vegetable, commonly used for ropes, without restricting it to rushes, or to thick and pliable rods, twisted into a rope. Such ropes are used in the East, and while they remain green are stronger than any other. In India the legs of wild elephants and buffaloes newly caught are commonly bound with ropes of this sort. Josephus says (Ant. v. 9, 11) that the ropes which bound Samson were made of the tendril of the vine. At the present day ropes made of the East are made of hemp or flax. Except some that are made with hair or leather, they are generally formed with the tough flares of trees (particularly the palm-tree) and roots, with grasses, and with reeds and rushes. These ropes are, in general, tolerably strong, but are in no degree comparable to green hemp ropes. They are very light in comparison, and, wanting compactness, in most cases they are also rough and coarse to the eye. The praises which travelers bestow on ropes of this kind must not be understood as putting them in comparison with those in use among the wild savages with the hands of hay which our peasants twist, and with reference to the simple and crude materials of which they are composed (Kitto, Pictorial Bible, note ad loc.). See Cord.

Witness (\"witness, see\") Sept. and New Test. (\"martyr,\" Vulg. testament). It is used in the English Bible both of persons and things.

1. Leading Significations. — This frequent term occurs, 1. In the sense of a person who deposes to the occurrence of any fact, a witness of any event. The Hebrew word is from \"qaw\", to repeat. The Greek word is usually derived from \"mu\", to divide, "decide," etc., because a witness decides controversies (Heb. vi. 16); but Damon (Lex. Hom. col. 1495) deduces it from the old word \"m\", "the hand," because witnesses are supposed to hold up their hands in giving evidence. This custom, among the ancient Hebrews, is referred to in Gen. xiv. 22; among the heathens, by Homer (Iliad, x, 392), and by Virgil (Aeneid, xii, 196). God himself is represented as swearing in this manner (Deut. xxxii. 46; Ezek. xx. 5, 6, 10; comp. Numb. xiv. 20). So also the heathen gods (Pindar, Olympia, vii. 119, 120). These Hebrew and Greek words, with their various derivations, preserve the entire subject. They are applied to a judicial witness in Exod. xxiii. 1; Lev. vi. 1; Numb. vi. 13; xxxiv. 30 (comp. Deut. xvii. 6, xix. 15; Matt. xxii. 16); 2 Cor. xii. 1); Prov. xiv. 2; xxiv. 28;Matt. xxvi. 65; Acts xi. 13; 1 Tim. v. 19; Heb. xvi. 28. They are applied, generally, to a person who certifies, or is able to certify, to any fact which has come under his cognizance (Joseph. xxii. 72; Isa. viii. 2; Luke xxiv. 48; Acts i. 8, 22; 1 Thess. ii. 10; 1 Tim. vi. 12; 2 Tim. ii. 2; 1 Pet. i. 6). So in allusion to those who witness the public games (Heb. xii. 1). They are also applied to anyone who testifies to the world what God reveals through him (Rev. xii. 3). In the latter sense the Greek word is applied to our Lord (Rev. i. 5; iii. 14). Both the Greek and Hebrew words are applied to God (Gen. xxxi. 50; 1 Sam. xii. 5; Jer. xi. 5; Rom. i. 5; Phil. i. 8; 1 Thess. ii. 5); to incriminate things (Gen. xxxi. 52; Psal. lxxxix. 37). The supernatural means whereby the deficiency of witnesses was compensated under the theocracy, have been already considered under the articles ADULTERY, TUAL, OR; UNM. And THUMMIM. For the punishment of false witness and the suppression of evidence, see Punishment. For the forms of adjuration (2 Chron. xviii. 15), see Adjuration. Opinions differ as to what is meant by "the faithful witness in heaven" (Psal. lxxxix. 57). Some suppose it means the moon (comp. Psal. lxxxi. 5, 7; Jer. xxxxi. 35, 36; xxxix. 20, 21; Exclus. xiii. 6; others, the rainbow (Gen. ii. 12-17).

2. The witness or testimony itself borne to any fact is expressed by \"p\", \"mu\", \"mu\", (testimonium). They are used of judicial testimony (Prov. xxx. 18; Mark xiv. 66, 59). In verse 56, Schleusner takes the word \"mu\", from the abstract for the substantive. In John xxi. 7; John vii. 17; Josephus, Ant. iv. 8, 15). It denotes the testimony to the truth of anything generally (John i. 7, 19; xix. 35); that of a poet (Tit. i. 13). It occurs in Josephus (\"Con. Apion, \"i. 21). In John iii. 31, 32, Schleusner derives it from the verb \"dak\", \"proven,\" to be proved; in \"e\", \"proofs\", the proofs given by God of our Saviour's mission; comp. \"v\", \"9. In viii. 13, 14, both he and Bretschneider assign to the word the sense of praise."

In Acts xxii, 19, the former translates it teaching or instruction. In Rev. iii, 7, it denotes the condemning or profession of Christianity, or testimony to the truth of the gospel (comp. i, 2; vi, 9). In 1 Tim. iii, 7, μαρτυρία καλά means a good character (comp. 3 John 12; Eccl. xxxii, 34; Josephus, Ant. vii, 10, 1). In 1 Peter, xix, 7, "The testimony of the Lord is sure" probably signifies the ordinances, institutions, etc. (comp. xxii, 22, 24, etc.). Those ambiguous words, "He that believeth in the Son of God hath the witness in himself" (1 John v, 10), which have given rise to a variety of fanatical meanings, are easily understood, by explaining the word ἴσως, "receiveth, receiveth," e. g. the foregone testimony of which God hath given of his Son, whereas the unbeliever rejects it. The whole passage is obscured in the English translation by neglecting the uniformity of the Greek, and introducing the word "record," contrary to the profession of our translators in their Preface to the Reader (ad finem). The Hebrew word, with μαρτυρίαν, occurs in the sense of monument, evidence, etc. (Gen. xxii, 30; xxxi, 44; Deut. iv, 45; xxxii, 26; Josh. xxii, 27; Ruth iv, 7; Matt. viii, 4; Mark vii, 11; Luke xxii, 13; James v, 3). In 2 Cor. i, 12, Schleusner explains μαρτυρίαν, evidential or evidential properties. In Prov. xxiv, 14, and Amos iii, 14, it pointed to spoken peremptory, but the Septuagint gives εἰς μαρτυρίαν: Aquila, εἰς ἱκανον; Symmachus, εἰς δὴ; Vulg. in aeternum. In Acts vii, 44, and Rev. xv, 5, we find ἵσωμαι τοις μαρτυρίοις, and this is the Sept. rendering for γινεται γινεται (which really means "the tabernacle of the congregation") in Exod. xxix, 42, 44; xxi, 22, 24—deriving ισωμαι from ισων, "to testify," instead of from ισων, "to assemble." On 1 Tim. ii, 6, see Bowyer, Conjectures. In Heb. iii, 5, Schleusner interprets εἰς μαρτυρίαν τῶν λαλησιμάτων, "the promulgation of those things about to be delivered to the Jews." 3. To be or become a witness, by testifying the truth of what one knows. Thus the Sept. translates γινεται γινεται (Gen. xi, 3), μαρτυρίαν, to bear witness, and Amos iii, 13: see also 1 Kings xxi, 10, 11. In John i, 7; xv, 26; xviii, 23, Schleusner gives as its meaning, to teach or explain; in John iv, 44; vii, 7; 1 Tim. vi, 13, to declare; in Acts x, 18; Rom. iii, 21, to declare prophetically. With a dative case following, the word sometimes means to approbe (Luke iv, 22). So Schleusner understands Luke xi, 46, "Ye approbe the deeds of your fathers," and he gives this sense also to Rom. x, 2. In like manner, a passive past participle, to approbe, to showed, to have a good character, etc. (Acts iii, 1; 1 Tim. vi, 10; comp. 3 John 6, 12). "The witness of the Spirit," alluded to by St. Paul (Rom. viii, 16), is explained by Marknight and all the best commentators, as the extraordinary operation of the Holy Spirit concurring with the filial disposition of converted Gentiles, to prove that they are the "children of God," as well as the Jews. (See below.) 4. "To call or take to witness," "to invoke as witness," μαρτυρίαν (Acts xx, 20; Gal. vi, 3; Josephus, War ii, 383). A still stronger word is μαρτυρίαν, which corresponds to γίνεται (Deut. iv, 26). It means to "admonish solemnly," to "charge earnestly," to "urge upon" (1 Peter iii, 11; Heb. ix, 26; Luke xvi, 28; Acts ii, 40). In other passages the same words mean to teach earnestly. In Job xxii, 11, a beautiful phrase occurs, "When the eye saw me it gave witness to me. The adorning expression used for the word, "the face upon beholding a man of eminent virtue and benevolence, is here admirably illustrated. The description of the mischief occasioned by a false witness, in Prov. xxxi, 18, deserves notice: "A man that beareth false witness against his neighbor, is a maul, and a sword, a sharp arrow. For in his soul is the deceit of distrust, in the utterance of his mouth is deceit, in the consequence of the various shades of meaning in which the context requires they should be understood.

II. Hebrew Usage.—1. Among people with whom writing is the common method of communication, it is given by some tangible memorial or significant ceremony. Abraham gave seven ewe-lambs to Abimelech as an evidence of his property in the well of Beer-sheba. Jacob raised a heap of stones, "the heap of witness," as a boundary-mark between himself and La¬man (Gen. xxii, 30; xxxi, 47, 52). The tribes of Reuben and Gad raise an "altar," designed expressly not for sacrifice, but as a witness to the covenant between themselves and the rest of the nation: Joshua set up a stone as an evidence of the allegiance promised by Israel to God, "for he is a witness between us both, the Lord" (Josh. xii, 30, 36, 34; xiv, 26, 27). So also a pillar is mentioned by Isaiah as "a witness to the Lord of hosts in the land of Egypt" (Isa. xix, 19, 20). Thus also the sacred ark and its contents are called "the testimony" (Exod. xvii, 38, 39; xxvii, 16; xxxvii, 21; Numb. i, 50, 53; ix, 15; x, 11; xxvi, 7, 6; xxvii, 2; Heb. ix, 4). Thus also symbolical usages, in ratification of con¬tracts or completed arrangements, as the ceremony of shoe-losing (Deut. xxv, 9, 10; Ruth iv, 7, 8), the or¬dination of a priest or a Levite (1 Sam. ii, 31), and the making of the covenant with Benjamin (Judg. xv, 17—31), with which may be compared the ordeal of the Styx (Class. Mus. vi, 386). The Bedawin Arabs practice a fiery ordeal in certain cases by way of con¬trary (Burchardt, Notes, ii, 121; Layard, Nine and Bab., p. 306). The ceremony also appointed at the ob¬lation of the new moon (q. v.) may be mentioned as partaking of the same character (Deut. xxxi, 4) But written evidence was by no means unknown to the Jews. Divorce was to be proved by a written document (Deut. xxix, 1, 5), whereas among Bedawin and Mussalmans in general a spoken sentence is sufficient (Burchardt, Notes, i, 110; Sale, Koran, c. 53, p. 348; Lane, Mod. Egypt, i, 156, 236). In civil contracts, at least in later times, documentary evidence was required and carefully preserved (Isa. viii, 16; Jer. xxxii, 10—16). On the whole Moses was very careful to provide and enforce evidence for all infractions of law and all trans¬gressions bearing on it: e. g. the moral stones of Jordan and of Ebal (Deut. xxvii, 2—4; Josh. iv, 4, 50); the fringes on garments (Num. xxix, 39, 40); the boundary-stones of property (Deut. xix, 14; xxvii, 17; 1 Cor. x, 28—29); the "broad plates" made from the molten vessels of the Korahites (Num. xxxi, 38): above all, the ark of testimony itself—all these are instances of the care taken by the legislator to perpetuate evidence of the facts on which the legislation was founded, and by which it was supported (Deut. vii, 20—25). Appeal to the same law is repeatedly made in the case of prophecies as a test of their authenticity (Deut. xxvii, 22; Jer. xxviii, 9, 16, 17; John iii, 11; v, 36; x, 38; xiv, 11; Luke xxiv, 48; Acts i, ii, 32; iii, 15, etc.). 2. Among special provisions of the law with respect to evidence are the following: (1) Two witnesses at least are required to establish any charge (Num. xxxv, 30; Deut. xvii, 6, xix, 15; 1 Kings xxi, 18; John vii, 17; 2 Cor. xi, 13; Heb. v, 29); and a like principle is laid down by Paul as a rule of procedure in certain cases in the Christian Church (1 Tim. v, 12). (2) In the case of the suspected wife, evidence be¬sides the husband's was desired, though not demanded (Num. v, 18). (3) The witness who withheld the truth was cen¬sured (Lev. v, 1). (4) False witness was punished with the punishment due to the offence which it sought to establish. See OATH. (5) Slanderous reports and malicious witnesses are dis¬couraged (Exod. xx, 16; xxiii, 1; Lev. xix, 16, 18; Deut. xv, 16—21; Prov. xx, 10). (6) The witnesses were the first executors (Deut. xiii, 9; xv, 7; Acts vii, 58). (7) In case of an animal left in charge and torn by wild beasts, the keeper was to bring the carcass in proof of the fact and disprove of his own criminality (Exod. xxii, 13).

(8) According to Josephus, women and slaves were not admitted to bear testimony (Ant. iv, 8, 15). To these exceptions the Mishna adds idola, deaf, blind, and leprous, and, 'a person of the consanguinity of the court, and some others, ten in all (Selden, De Synedr. ii, 13; i, 11; Otho, Lex. Rabb. p. 653). The high-priest was not bound to give evidence in any case except one affecting the king (ibid.). Various refinements on the quality of life may be seen in the manner of taking it given in the Mishna (Sanhedr. iv, 5; v, 2; 3; Maacoth, i, 1, 9; Sheb. iii, 10; iv, 1; v, 1). In criminal cases evidence was required to be oral; in pecuniary, written evidence was allowed (Otho, Lex. Rabb. p. 653).

8. In the New Test. the original notion of a witness is exhibited in the special form of one who attests his belief in the gospel by personal suffering. So Stephen is praised by Paul (Acts xxii, 20), and the "faithful Antipa" (Rev. ii, 18). John also speaks of himself and of others as witnesses in this sense (Rev. 1, 9; 6, 9; xi, 3; xiv, 8). See also Heb. xi and xii, 1, in which a number of persons are mentioned, belonging both to the Old Test. and New Test., who bore witness to the truth by personal endurance; and to this passage may be added, as bearing on the same view of the term "witness," Dan. iii, 21; vi, 16; 1 Macc. i, 60, 63; 2 Macc. viii, 5, and which use of this ecclesiastical term "martyr" has arisen, of which copious illustration may be seen in Sueton, Theog. ii, 310, etc. See Martyr.

WITNESS, FALSE. The early civil and ecclesiastical laws were very severe in their denunciation and punishment of this crime. We learn from Aulus Gellius that the punishment of false witness among the old Romans, by the law of the twelve tables, was to cast the criminal headlong from the top of the Tarpeian rock. Afterwards, by the law called Lex Remnia, false witnesses were burned in the face and stigmatized with the letter K, denoting that they were calumniators. In opposition to these the law designates honest men as homines integrae frontis, or men without such mark. And, though the Christian law abolished it, as it did other laws of undue severity, still false accusation and calumny were corrected with suitable punishments, such as civil banishment, and suffering the evil, by the law of retaliation, which the accuser intended to draw upon others. The substance of the law is as follows: If any one called another man's credit, or fortune, or life, or blood into question in judgment, and could not make out the crime alleged against him, he should suffer the same penalty that he intended to bring upon the other. And no one could formally impeach another at law till he had bound himself to this condition, which the law terms vinculum inscriptions, the bond of inscription. While the civil laws were thus severe, the ecclesiastical laws did all that fell within their province to effect the same results. By a canon of the council of Elbiereis the false witness in any case was to be punished five years, and in case the false accusation was of murder, the criminal was to be debarred from communion to the very last, as in the case of actual murder. The council of Agde and Vannes impose a general penance upon such offenders, without naming the term or duration of their penance, which was left to the discretion of the bishop, who was to judge of the sincerity of their repentance. But the first council of Aries obliged offenders to do penance all their lives, and the second only moderates their punishment so far as to leave it to the bishop to determine their repentance and satisfaction. See Bingham, Ch. Antig. bk. xv, ch. x, § ix, and ch. xiii, § i.

WITNESS OF THE SPIRIT is a phrase common with many Christians, especially the Methodists, to denote the inward assurance which every believer has of his filial relation to God, namely, that the Holy Ghost immediately and directly witnesses to and with (suyu-mappers) his spirit that he is a child of God, involving the collateral assurance that through faith in Jesus Christ, who died and rose again for him, all his sins are blotted, and he is reconciled to God. Gal. v, 5; Col. i, 17; Gal. iv, 5-7; John i, 12; 1 John v, 9-18. Mr. Wesley observes, "I do not mean hereby that the Spirit of God testifies this by any outward voice; no, nor always by an inward voice, although he may do this sometimes. Neither do I suppose that he always applies to the heart, though he does not always do so, one or more of the texts of Scripture. But he so works upon the soul by his immediate influence, and by a strong though inexplicable operation, that the stormy wind and troubled waves subside, and there is a sweet calm—the heart resting as in the arms of Jesus, and the sinner being clearly satisfied that all his inequities are forgiven and his sins covered." The immediate result of this testimony is "the fruit of the Spirit—love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance" (Gal. v, 22, 23). Without these the testimony itself cannot subsist; for it passes away, not only by the commission of any outward sin, or the omission of known duty, but by giving way to any inward sin—in a word, by whatever grieves the Holy Spirit of God." Some claim a similar testimony for special states of grace, and even peculiar experiences or prophetic gifts. But such an extension of the privilege is not authorized by Scripture. See Adoption; Assurance.

Witnesses, The Three Heavenly, is a convenient designation of the famous controversy respecting the genuineness of the clause in the first epistle of John (v, 7). "For there are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost, and these three are one." I. History of its Introduction into the Text.—In all the first printed Bibles, which were those of the Latin Vulgate, as amended by Jerome, the clause appeared substantially as at present (Ed. Princeps, 1462), being found in the great majority of manuscripts of the Vulgate. It may therefore be considered as the generally received form at that period. But when the first edition of the Greek Test. appeared, which was that of Erasmus, published at Basle in 1516, the clause in question ["in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Spirit, and these three are one; and there are three which bear witness in earth"] was wanting. Erasmus was attacked by Stonica, one of the editors of the Complutensian Polyglot, of which the New Test. in Greek and Latin had been printed in 1514 (and consequently before the appearance of Erasmus's edition), although not published until 1522. Erasmus replied to Stonica by observing that he had faithfully followed the Greek manuscripts from which he had edited his text, but professed his readiness to insert the clause in another edition, provided but a single Greek manuscript was found to contain it. Such a manuscript was found in England, upon which Erasmus, although entertaining strong suspicions respecting this manuscript, yet professed his willingness, if the evidence were verified, to insert the clause in his third edition, which was published in 1522, as it now stands in the common Greek text.

Nevertheless, the absence of the definitive article from the six nouns in the disputed passage in this pretended manuscript is of itself sufficient to excite suspicion of its genuineness, if not completely to overthrow, its genuineness. What has become of the manuscript is not known, but it is generally believed to have been the same with that now possessed by the library of Trinity College, Dublin, called the Codex Montfortianus, or Dublinus. The clause with the disputed clause appears, but without the conclusion, and these three are one." Erasmus also speaks of a Codex Britanicus as containing the entire clause, with some minute variations (Anton, 4th ed. p. 697). See Montfort Manuscripts. The Dublin manuscript is generally ascribed to the 15th or 16th century, and cannot possibly be older than the 13th; it likewise varies from the received Greek text in several less serious particulars. The clause has been also found, although in a form not clear, in a manuscript in the Vatican (Cod. Ottobon. 290), of the 15th century, first collated by Dr. Scholz, of Bonn.

The above is the amount of Greek manuscript authority for this celebrated clause, for although all the libraries in existence have been examined (containing above one hundred and eighty Greek MSS. written between the 5th and 15th centuries), no other copy has been found which contains a vestige of it. Nor has it been once cited by a single Greek father, although abundant opportunities presented themselves for introducing it, which they could not have failed to avail themselves of, had it existed in their copies; but they have invariably cited the passage as it has been preserved in all the ancient manuscripts. It found its way, however, into the received text of the Greek Test., having been copied from Erasmus's third, fourth, and fifth editions (1522, 1527, and 1530), with more or less of variation, into all Stephen's editions, from the third or folio edition of which it was adopted by Beza in all his editions, the first of which was published in 1565, and again by Elzevir, in his edition of 1624, to which his anonymous editor of Tertullian adds it. The best critical editions since have left out the words as spurious. They are wanting in those of Aldus, Gerbelius, Cepheus, Colinaeus, Mace, Harwood, Matthai, Griesbach, Scholz, Lachmann, Tischendorf, and others. Bowyer enclosed them in brackets, and Knapp in double brackets, indicating their spuriousness. The clause appears in the principal printed editions of the New Test., before the time of Griesbach. These were the editions of Mill (1707), Bengel (1784), and Wetstein (1751), the two former of whom held it to be genuine.

At first, Erasmus rejected this clause from all his translations. It is absent from his last edition (1546), published after his death, and was first inserted in 1583, in and subsequent editions. Since the beginning of the 17th century, with the exception of the Wittenberg edition of 1687, its insertion has been general. This was, however, in opposition to Luther's injunction.

It is inserted in all the early English printed versions, commencing with Coverdale's in 1535, but is generally printed either in brackets or in smaller letters. It was, however, left out of the editions of 1582, and in the Geneva Bible (1557), without any marks of doubt. It found its way, perhaps, from Beza's Greek Test., into the then authorized English version.

II. External Evidence.—The earliest Greek form in which the disputed clause is found is contained in the Latin translation of the acts of the council of Lateran, held in 1215, and the first Greek writer who absolutely cites any part of it is Manuel Calescas, a Dominican monk of the 14th century, while in the next century it is cited by Joseph Bryennius, a Greek monk.

To explain how it has come to the field of ancient MSS. is also absent from all existing manuscripts of the Latin Vulgate, written between the 8th and 10th centuries, anterior to which date there is no manuscript of this version now in existence, containing the Catholic epistles. Nor has any writer of the Western Church cited the passage before Cassiodorus, at the close of the 6th century, although even the fact of his having done so is doubted by Pomon. There is, indeed, a preface to the canonical epistles, bearing the name of Jerome, in which the omission of this clause is ascribed to "false translators," which makes it most improbable that any of the ancient MSS. wanted in all the manuscripts of the Syriac, Armenian, and other ancient versions.

From the circumstance, however, of the clause in question having been cited by two north-west African writers of the 5th century—Vigilius, bishop of Thapsus (the supposed author of the Athenian Creed), and Victor Vitensis, the historian of the Vandal persecution—it has been fairly presumed that it existed in their time in some of the African copies of the old Latin version, from whence, or from the citations of these writers, it may have come, and thence into the later manuscripts of the Vulgate. It is cited by Victor, as cited in the Confession of Faith drawn up by Eugenius, bishop of Carthage. Vigilius, however, cites it in so many various ways, that little reliance can be placed on his authority. After this it is cited by Fulgenzio, bishop of Brescia, in the last part of the 6th century, but is omitted in the same century by Facundus, bishop of Hermonie, from which it is at least evident that the copies in that age and country varied. But, at a much earlier period, the whole clause is cited by Augustine of Hippo, who has been supposed, indeed, to have referred to the clause, but the proof of this depends on the proof of the previous fact, whether the clause existed or not in their copies.

III. Internal Evidence.—Various have been the opinions on this point for and against the genuineness of the passage. The advocates of the clause have generally maintained that the context requires its insertion, while its adversaries maintain that the whole force of the argument is destroyed by it. Lücke, one of the ablest modern commentators on John's writings, maintains that the whole context is insufficient to reject the passage, inasmuch (besides other reasons) as John never uses ὁ γὰρ καὶ ὁ λόγος as correlative, but ordinarily, like Paul, and every other writer of the New Test., associates ἂν ὁ λόγος with ὁ γὰρ (ii. 22, 29; iv. 14; v. 9, 11, 20, etc.), and always refers the ὁ λόγος in Christ to ὁ λόγος, and not to ὁ γὰρ. He unites with those critics who look upon the rejected passage as an allegorical gloss, which found its way into the Latin text, where it has, "ever since the 4th century, firmly maintained its place as a welcome and orthodox etymology." He adds, however, that "our geometrical conscience will, in our age, forbid the most orthodox to apply this passage, even if it were genuine, for such a purpose, as ἐπί τῶν εἰς ἡμᾶς ἐστιν a quite different sense from that which is required by the doctrine of the trinity. Here Lücke fully coincides with the late bishop Middleton (Greek Arch.) Lücke's conclusion is a strong one. "Either these words are genuine, and the epistle, in this case, a production of the 5th or 4th century, or the epistle is a genuine work of John's, and then these words spurious."

Among recent writers to vindicate the genuineness of the passage is that of M. Guassen, of Geneva, in his Theologiae (1839). But his reasons are founded on a palpable error—the interpolation of the words ὁ γὰρ καὶ ὁ λόγος (in the earth) in the eighth verse, which he cites upon the authority of Griesbach's text, where they do not exist! The corresponding words in terra are, indeed, found in the present text of some MSS. of the Vulgate, and of some ancient writers, although wanting in the seventh verse.

IV. Literature.—The following are some of the principal controversies to which this false argument has given rise, of which a more complete account will be found in Mr. Charles Butler's Hora Bibliica; and most fully in Orme's Memoir (1800) on the subject (under the pseudonym of "Críticus"), especially the American edition by Abbett (N.Y.1860). The earliest was the debate between Erasmus and Lee, afterwards archbishop of York, and between Erasmus and Stunica, one of the Complutensian editors. Erasmus was the first to suspect the genuineness of the passage of the canonical epistles above referred to, at which time which ascribes the omission of the last line to the translators or transcribers. The genuineness of this passage, which led Sir Isaac Newton to charge Jerome with being the fabricator of the disputed clause (whereas it is certain that that learned father was totally unacquainted with its existence) of the text, is now given up. It is considered in the Benedictine edition of Je-

Witschel, Johann Heinrich Wilhelm, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born May 9, 1769, at Hensenfeld, near Nuremberg. In 1801 he was appointed pastor at Igersdorf, in 1818 dean at Gräfenberg, in 1819 pastor and dean at Katzenlochstadt, in Bavaria, and died April 24, 1847. He is the author of Spätere theologische Schriften, (Göttingen, 1843-45), and of many other works. He was a true Roman Catholic (Nüremberg, 1806; 10th ed. 1854) — Moravische Biester (ibid. 1801; 84 ed. with the title, Stimmen religiöser Erhebung, 1852) — Herrnkonst (ibid. 1796) — Ausführung von Gängen und Liedern zur käuflichen Erhebung (Hanover, 1817). See Wirtner, Handbuch der theolog. Lit. ii. 334, 383, 386; Theol. Universalkatalog, s. v.; Zschold, Bibl. Theol. s. v. (B. P.)

Wittack, a citizen of Stettin, Pomerania, of some note, flourished in the early part of the 12th century. He was converted and baptized during the first visit of bishop Otto to Stettin, and endeavored to show his zeal for Christianity by fighting against the pagans. He was taken prisoner on a piratical expedition, and for some time kept in chains. Resorting to prayer for consolation in his confinement, he was, as he thought, providentially released, and made his way back to his home. This deliverance, and some other events of like character, he considered as a Divine call to proclaim Christianity to his perishing countrymen. Through his aid Otto was enabled to overcome paganism in Stettin, and place Christianity on a firm footing. See Neander, Hist. of the Church, iv. 26.

Witt, Daniel, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in Bedford County, Va., Nov. 8, 1801. He united with the Church in December, 1821, was licensed April 10, 1822, and itinerated through several counties in his native state for two or three years. About 1825 he became pastor of a Church which he had organized at Sandy River, and for forty-five years occupied that position. During a period of this long ministry he had the oversight of several churches. He died Nov. 15, 1871. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclopedia, p. 1267. (J. C. S.)

Wittenberg, The Concord of, signed May 29, 1536, denotes one of the most interesting, as also one of the most important, stages in that series of negotiations which, during the first period of the Reformation, was carried on in order to bring about an agreement between the Swiss and Saxon reformers. Politically, landgrave Philip of Hesse was the motive power of these negotiations; politically, Bucer; and the personal meeting which the former brought about, in 1534, between the latter and Melancthon, at Cassel, formed the introduction to the large assembly which was held in 1536. The hard words which Luther let drop in his letter to Albrecht of Brandenburg, immediately after Zwingli's death, showed the aversion he cherished to him; and it was well known how anxiously he watched that no one inclined to the Zwinglian doctrine of the Lord's Supper should be allowed to keep up community with the Saxon camp, as his letters to Brunswick, Münter, and Augsburg show (De Wette, iv. 472; vi. 143). With Melancthon, however, a change had taken place. He learned from (Ezinrupiel's) Dialogus that many of the more important fathers from the various parties had signed his Seminulun Veterum Aliquot Scriptorum de Corpus Domini (Corpus Reformatorum, vol. xxvii) were more interpolations, and that Augustine never taught a "manuscript oralis," etc. Thus he wrote to Bucer, in April, 1531; "Aliquando inter nos veram et solam fides in Oswaldian doctrine esse, iudicat ut desus, orum, certe quantum ad hoc amantur. Nuncumque parvum mihi hrec viidentum et horribilis diab diei inter Lutherum et Calvinum. Melius illi causa consilium fuerit, si sinas nus parrus conscribere habead tropicae cimtiones" (ibid. ii. 481). Under his presidency he gradually lost all interest in Luther's peculiar conception of the Lord's Supper, and became more and more anathema for the elimination of all elements of discord between the two evangelical churches.
In March, 1533, he wrote to Bucer concerning the moderation which both had hitherto shown, and begs of him as instantly as possible "ut det operam, magis ut contentiones istae sedentur atque consensunt, quam ut excitentur et infinimantur" (ibid. ii. 461); and Bucer, in his letter of Oct. 10, 1533, Melancthon even goes so far as to write to Bucer, "Utiam saltem nos aliquando possemus una commentarii atque communicacere de doctrina" (ibid. ii. 675). The Swiss had also become more susceptible to the idea of concord. Bucer had succeeded in gaining for every side of the reconciliation—Myconius at Basle, Bullinger in Zürich, his colleague Capito, etc., and in the summer of 1534 an attempt at practical union was made, and proved successful, in Wittenberg, and on July 31 a colloquy was held at Stuttgart, in the presence of duke Ulrich, between Simon Grynaeus of Basle and Ambrosius Bucer of Constance, who represented the Swiss, and Erhard Schnepf, the Lutheran representative. In the same year, Dec. 27, Bucer and Melancthon met at Cassel, and in spite of the very stringent instructions which Luther had given Melancthon, they succeeded in drawing up a formula of concord which satisfied both. Copies of the formula were sent to Urbanus Rhegius, Brenz, Amstorf, and Agicola, with the request, "an ista sentientes tolerant sint, ne dammantur" (ibid. ii. 462). On October 5, 1535, Luther wrote to Strasburg, Augsburg, Ulm, Eisleben, to Region Seller and Hultschin, etc., inviting them to a general discussion of the formula of concord.

Eisenach was decided upon as the place of rendezvous. In April Bucer left Constance, accompanied by nine preachers. As they progressed they were joined by Capito, Musculus, Bouchauff Wolff of Augsburg, Gervassus Schuler von Memmingen, and Martin Frecht of Ulm. At Eisleben they were joined by others. Meanwhile Luther had fallen sick, and requested the visitors to come to Grimma; they determined, however, to go directly to Wittenberg. On May 22, at seven o'clock in the morning, Bucer and Capito arrived at Luther's study. At three o'clock in the afternoon they again went to Luther, accompanied by Bugenhagen, Jonas, Cruijger, Meinius, Mecum, Weller, and magistrate Georg Kovarius. Luther was suffering, irritable, harassed; Bucer became confused. The subject of the debate was the doctrine of the Lord's Supper. Luther demanded that the Swiss should make a formal recantation of what they had hitherto believed and taught; this they refused, on the ground that they could not recant anything which they had never taught or believed. The next day the assembly was enlarged. Bucer was clear and adroit, Luther was mild and kind. After some debate the Saxons theologians retired to another room to deliberate in private, and the result was the formula proposed by the Swiss was substantially accepted. May 24 the assembly met in Melancthon's house. The subjects of the discussion were baptism, absolution, the school, etc., and the agreement which was arrived at was chiefly due to the tact and resolution of Bugenhagen. On Sunday Bucer preached in the foremost, Luther in the afternoon; and all the members of the assembly took the Lord's Supper together. Lutherans, like Osiander and Amstorf, were not satisfied with the result; they continued to demand that Bucer should recant. But Luther himself spoke for a long time with great contentment and confidence of the affair. In Switzerland, too, there were some difficulties to overcome; but Bucer succeeded. WITTE of WITTE), in Hindu mythology, is the god of wealth, one of the eight protectors of the world, or of the ten patriarchs, Rishis, masters of created beings. He always appears upon a magnificent wagon, overlaid with precious stones, or on a white feather-covered horse.

Wittich, CHRISTOPH, a Reformed theologian of Holland, was born Oct. 7, 1625, at Breug in Silesia.

He studied at Gröningen and Leyden, was in 1655 appointed professor of theology at Nimewegen, where he lectured for sixteen years. In 1671 he was called to Leyden, where his lectures were received with great favor, and died May 19, 1687. He wrote, Consensus Veritatis Philosophica et Jurisprudentiae, De veritate philosophica et jurisprudentiae, De veritate Philosophica et Jurisprudentiae, De veritate Philosophica et Jurisprudentiae, De veritate Philosophica et Jurisprudentiae, De veritate Philosophica et Jurisprudentiae, De veritate Philosophica et Jurisprudentiae, De veritate Philosophica et Jurisprudentiae, De veritate Philosophica et Jurisprudentiae, De veritate Philosophica et Jurisprudentiae. Witting, JOHANN CARL FRIEDRICH, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born March 30, 1760, at Alfeld, in Hanover. He studied theology and philosophy at Göttingen, and after completing his curriculum he acted for ten years as private tutor in the house of a nobleman. In 1783 he received the pastorate in Elmsen, near Embeck. Here he wrote his Studie ün der Christlichen Kirchenkunde (Göttingen, 1786; 2 ed. 1789); Grundzüge über Konfessionen und deren zweckmässige Einrichtung (ibid. 1791). In 1799 he went to Brunswick as second preacher of St. Magnus, and advanced in 1805 to be first preacher. He died Jan. 24, 1834. Belonging to the strict orthodox party, he published, Cuer christologicum et Rationalismos Brunswick, 1822); — Biblischer Beziehungen von der Himmel- fahrt Jesu (ibid. 1820); — Practicae Handbuch für Prediger (1791—96, 6 vols.); — Grundzüge der Theol. und Religionslehre (1802). Wittmann, GEORG MICHAEL, a Roman Catholic prelate of Germany, was born at Finkenhammer, near Pleistin, in the Upper Palatinate, Jan. 23, 1760. He studied at Amberg and Heidelberg, and received holy orders in 1782. In 1800 he became head of the episcopal clerical seminary at Ratisbon, in 1804 was made cathedral-preacher, in 1821 made suffragan and general vicar to bishop Sailer, and, at the same time, cathedral-provost there. When Sailer died he was appointed his successor, but before the confirmation reached him from Rome, he died. March 9, 1833. He wrote, Principia Cathol. de Sacra Scriptura (Ratisbon, 1783); — Principia Catholica de Matrimonio Catholico (Ratisbon, 1788); — Allorta Porta Protestantica (ibid. 1831; Germ. transl. 1832); — Annotationes in Peninsula Mognis (ibid. 1790); — Beichtreden über die Bruch- und Glaubensfragen der Protestantit (Saltzburg, 1832; 3rd ed. 1832); — Confessarum pro Eritus Juvenilia (ibid. 1832; 3d ed. Wittel, LUDWIG, GERMAN, a German theologian, was born at Yach, Hesse, in 1504. He studied theology and in 1530 went to Paris to attend the lectures of Luther and Melancthon, but was nevertheless ordained as priest by bishop Adolph of Merseburg. Appointed vicar in his native town, he preached the doctrines of the reformation, married, and was expelled in 1555. Driven away by the peasants, war from Löbnitz, in Thuringia, where he had settled, he was, on the recommendation of Luther, appointed pastor of Niemcek, but released into Romanian, began to write with great violence against Luther and Melancthon, and was expelled in 1530. After some years of uncertain endeavors, he entered the ser-te of Basel in 1535, where he assisted in the chief of his principal book, Typus Ecclesiæ Priorior, and presented his Querela Pacis to Charles V at the Diet of Spire, (1544), who appointed him to draw up, together with Agnicola, the Augsburg Interim. The troubles of the war induced Witschel to leave Fulda in 1554 and to settle at Mayence, where he published, in 1564, Via Regia seu

de Controversiae Religionis Copulatae Reconciliacione Sententiae. He died in 1573. See Ströbel, Beiträge zur

Witschel, Hans, an Anabaptist hymn-writer of the 16th century, is known by some hymns which he probably wrote in the first half of that century, be-because he speaks of the inroad of the sultan, Soleiman II, in 1521, and of the preparations of the emperor Charles V against the Smalkald League, in 1546. One of his hymns, Kempt her zu mir, spricht Gottes Son, has been translated into English, "'Come hither,' says the Son of God," by the late Dr. Mills, in his Hora Germanica, Wizenmann, Thomas, a German champion of orthodoxy, was born at Ludwigshafen, in Wurttemberg, Nov. 2, 1759, of pietistic parents. After having passed through preliminary studies, he was received into the training-school and orphanage of his native town, as famales, Oct. 28, 1775. In the spring of 1777 he resigned that position, however. He received the master’s degree in October of that year, and in 1780 passed the theological examination and became vicar at Esingen. He had previously studied deeply the writings of Bengel, Oetinger, and Fricker, and continued to employ his leisure in the examination of standard

authors, particularly Wolf, Locke, Leibnitz, Wolflin, Kopf, Born, Herder. He was also accustomed to commit the results of his thinking to writing, and on many occasions to give them to the public. Pflegher’s Christ-litches Magazin (1780-83) contains an extended series of articles contributed by him; but many papers on theological and psychological subjects were never published, and were found, usually in an unfinished state, among his literary remains after he died. In 1783 Wizenmann exchanged his vicarate for a tutor’s place in a private family at Barten, and, while journeying thither, made the acquaintance of Johann Jacob Bobo, which was not without influence over his mental life.
Jacobi subsequently made him acquainted with Spinoza’s
Ethics and Kant’s Critique of Pure Reason. In April, 1784, Wizenmann began a work on the gospel according to Matthew, in which he attempted to make the gospel narrative demonstrate its own genuineness. He died before the work was completed, but it was published as a fragment by Kleuker in 1789. In 1785 he resigned his tutorship and took up his abode in the house of Jacobi. In 1786 he published Rerumulae des Jacobischens

s. Mendelschoen, Philosoph., kritisch untersucht, etc., in which he denied the possibility of proving the existence or non-existence of God by the method of demonstration, but asserted the reasonableness of a belief in a revelation whenever trustworthy historical proofs in its support can be adduced. The work excited considerable interest, and was favorably reviewed by many influential scholars, among them Jacobi, but Kant published an unfavorable criticism in the Berliner Monats-schrift, alleging that Wizenmann had conviced himself of enthusiasm in the positions assumed in the Rerumulae.
Wizenmann felt obliged to repudiate in a second edtion emanating from so high a source, and made so masterly an exposure of the weak spots in Kant’s argument as gained him friends among those who had not previously approved his book, among them Hamann.
The strain upon his delicate constitution had, however,
been too severe. His strength gave way, and he lay down to die. The end came Feb. 22, 1787, when he had scarcely begun a course of what promised to be important labors for the cause of truth. A memoir was published by von der Golza, under the title T. Wizenmann, der Freund Jacobi’s, etc. (Gotha, 1803, 2 vols).

Wjetzka, a small branch of Russian dissenters,
who, about A.D. 1730, during a time of persecution, took refuge in the islands of Wjetka, in a small river between Russia and Poland, from which circumstance they derive their name. Here they formed a separate community and built two monasteries, from which some of them migrated, fifty years later, to Poland, and built a church and convent at Tchnorobol. They belonged originally to the Polotschina, and their chief peculiarity is that they will not take oaths nor offer prayer for the emperor.

Wolo (usually 'wo or o), all onomatopoetic is often used in the English version where a softer expression would be at least equally proper. "Wo to such an one?" is in our language a threat, or imprecation, which comprises a wish for some calamity, natural or judicia-tal, to befall a person; but this is not always the meaning of the word in Scripture. We have, "Wo to thee who change," "Wo is me," that is, Alas, for my sufferings! and " Wo to the women with child, and those who give suck," etc., that is, Alas, for their redoubled sufferings, in times of distress. It is also more agreeable to the gentle character of the compassionate Jesus to consider him as lamenting the sufferings of any, whether person or city, than as imprecating, or even as denouncing them, since his character of judge formed no part of his mission.
If, then, we should read, "Alas, for thee, Chorazin! alas, for thee, Bethsaida!" we should do no injustice to the general sentiment of the place or to the character of the person speaking. This, however, is not the sense in which wo is always to be taken, as when we read,
"Wo to those who build houses by unrighteousness,
and cities by blood:" wo to those who are "rebellious against God," etc. in numerous passages, especially of the Old Test. The import of this word, then, is in some degree qualified by the application of it; where it is directed against transgression, crime, or any enority, it may be taken as a threatening, a malcondic-but in the words of our Lord, and where the subject is suffering under misfortunes, though not extremely wicked, a kind of lamentatory application of it would seem to be most proper. See IMPRECATION.

as Peter Pindar, was born at Dedbroke, Devonshire, in 1738. He was educated as a physician, and in 1757 accompanied sir William Trelawney, governor of Jaman awkward undertaking. He was returned to England, took orders in the Church, and sailed again for Jamaica, where he accepted a small curacy until the death of Trelawney, in 1768, when he returned to England, and spent twelve years in trying to establish himself as a physician at several places in Cornwall. He died Jan.

14, 1819. He published numerous satirical pieces, rid-government, it is said, thought worth while to purchase his silence with £300 a year. Collections of his writings appeared between 1789 and 1812.

losopher, was born at Breslau, Jan. 24, 1679. He was dedicated to the ministry from his childhood by his parents, and hence received, as he himself expresses it, an preached a few times with great acceptance, and was noted for the clearness of his explanations. He was a professor at Halle from 1707 to 1723, when he was driven from the country by Frederick William I, and assumed a similar position at Marburg. In 1740 he

Wolf (Lat. Wolfus), Jerome, a learned German, was born in the principality of Oettingen (Swabia), Aug. 15, 1516. As an envoy to Nuremberg and then to Frankfort, he made rapid progress in the ancient languages. His misanthropy and morbid asceticism prevented his promotion, but at length, in 1536, the death of his father left him at full liberty to gratify his inclination for study. The fame of Melanchthon attracted him to Wittenberg, where he had opportunity to hear the lectures of Luther and Amerbach. In 1545
he was charged with the direction of a Protestant school at Milhausen (Thuringia), but he left this position after a very brief trial, and from that time he lived in the homes of his friends at Tübingen and Strassburg, devoting his time to translating the Greek authors into Latin. In 1557 he obtained the position of director of the college of Augsburg, and thus of the library, which position he held until his death, Oct. 8, 1580.
He wrote, De vero et ficto us astrlogiœ (1558)—De expositione
Utriusque linguae (1561), etc.—De universa quaestionibus Buicium et de poeta Academia.—De Christiano Chrsisis
vitæ. He is better known by his Latin translations, accompanied with notes, of Isocrates (1549, 1570), Demosthenes (1549), Nicetas (1557), Zonaras (edd.), Epictetus (1660), Nicophorus Gregorius (1582), and Suidas

Wolfenbüttel Fragments (or Fragments of the Wolfenbüttel Anonymous Work) is the name of a work written from the deistic point of view to contest the truth of the gospel history, of which Lessing (q. v.) began to publish fragments in 1774. As early as 1771, during a visit to Berlin, he tried to find a publisher of the work, in spite of the advice of Ch. P. Nicolai and Moses Mendelssohn to the contrary, but as the royal censor (though he promised not to interfere with the publication) refused to authorize it, he gave up the plan for the time. In 1775, however, he began to issue it under the title of Gesammelte Geschicht- und Litteratur aus den Schätzen der herzoglichen Bibliothek zu Wolfenbüttel, which was exempted from the control of the ducal censor; and in the third number of that publication appeared, in 1774, the first installment of the work, Vom Duldung der Dräten, Fragment eines Urgenannten, accompanied with a few cautious remarks by the editor, but very adroitly introduced by the preceding article. The fragment attracted no particular attention; but when, in 1777, the whole fourth number was occupied with fragments of which none, Unser Druckwerk, Durchgang durch das rothe Meer, Uber die Abwertungs-geschichte, etc., were of a rather pronounced character, quite a sensation was produced; and Lessing did not fail to deepen the impression by publishing, in 1778, in the form of an independent book, a new fragment, Von dem Huldigung der Dräten, which so completely lost his privilege of publishing anything without the permit of the censor, and a violent controversy with the orthodox party began, the most prominent figure of which was the Lutheran pastor, Johann Melchior Gülden (q. v.). After the death of Lessing, the seven fragments which he had published appeared in Berlin in 1784 (4th ed. 1835). Some more fragments, which Lesing had bad in his possession, but had not published, appeared in 1787, edited by C. A. E. Schmidt, a pseudon-nym for Andreas Riem, canon of Brunswick. The author of the first fragment of this series, which form one of the most remarkable productions of the age, was Samuel Reimarun (q. v.). Lessing tried to lead public curiosity on a wrong track by hinting that the author probably was Johann Lorenz Schmitt, editor of the Wertheim Bible (q. v.). But already Hamann mentions Reimarun as the author in a letter to Herder, of Oct. 18, 1777; and the authorship was afterwards established beyond any doubt by the declaration of the son of Reimarun, made in a letter addressed to the managers of the Hamburg town-library, to whom he also presented a complete manuscript of the entire work of his father. That letter was written in 1791, a year before the death of the younger Reimarun, was published by Gurlitt in the Leipzig Literatur-Zeitschrift, 1827, No. 58, and by Klose, in Niedner's Zeitschrift für die historische Theologie (1850), p. 519 sq. See Röпе,

Wolf, Ludwig, a Lutheran minister of Germany, was born in 1808. He was brought up in rationalism, but the influence of Leo and J. Muller of Hallé, gave him that true foundation on which he afterwards lived and labored. In 1866 he was appointed superintendent of the Ottestein diocese. He died at Hallé, Oct. 15, 1877. (B. P.)

Wolflin, Christoph, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Owen, in Würtemberg, Dec. 23, 1625. He studied at Tübingen, was in 1651 deacon at Aurach, in 1657 at Tübingen, in 1659 professor of Greek, and in 1660 was made doctor and professor of teology. In 1669 duke Eberhard III appointed him court-preacher, and provost of Lorch. In 1680 duke Frederic Charles appointed him provost of Stuttgart, a position which has never again been occupied after Wolflin.
He died Oct. 30, 1698. He wrote, Excercitiones 8 de nitorem: —Disert. de Trivio Mortis Christi: —Historia

Wolfgang of Ahnatal is known from the history of the reformation as one of those German princes who fought for the cause of Luther. Born in 1492, he succeeded his father in 1508. At the Diet of Worms, in 1521, the new doctrine found in him a strong arm and Luther a true friend. In his own country he intrduced the reformed doctrine, and was its warmest promoter at home and abroad. He opposed the emperor, signed in 1529 the protest at Speyer, and the Augsburg Confession in 1530; and here (at Augsburg) it was that he, together with George of Brandenburg, told the emperor that he would rather give up their heads than follow the procession on Corpus-Christi day.
He belonged to the promoters of the League of Smalkald, and the part which he took in the war brought upon him the ban of the empire and the loss of his estate, which was given over to the Spanish Lander Berth.
Back he left his castle in Bernburg, singing Luther's famous battle-song of the reformation “Ein feste Burg.”
In 1552 his estates were returned to him, and he died March 28, 1566. See Theol. Universallexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Wolff (Lat. Lupulus), Heinrich, a Swiss baptologist, was born about 1470 at Berne. He was director of the gymnasium at his native place in 1497 of the chapter. The doctrines of Zwingli, who had been his disciple, he corrupted. He spread with ardor the religious reform, married in 1594, was appointed in 1597 secretary of the consistory, and died in 1532. Wölfelin contributed much towards reviving the tone of literature among his compatriots. He wrote, Vite Nicolai Subiuliani (1501); it was republished by J. Eichhorn, under the title, Historia F. Nicolai de Sazio (Fritsburg, 1609); W. Lowes, S. Johannis Martini (Basel, 1517). WOLFRATH, FRIDRICH WILHELM, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born Sept 3, 1757, at Glückstadt. In 1794 he was called as pastor primary to Hasum, in 1798 as court-preacher to Glücksstadt, in 1801 pastor of the church; a learned of theologians, and died June 26, 1812. He wrote, Was soll der Candidat der Theologie wissen? (Altorf, 1800); Versuch eines Lehrbuchs der allgemeinen Katechistik und Didaktik, etc. (Lemgo, 1806, 1807); Fragen über lutherische Gegenstände, etc. (Hamburg, 1792); Predigten (ibid. 1791-97, 8 vols.); Gesammelte Predigten (Altosn, 1791); Menchewelten und Schicksal (Rinteln, 1808); Religionslehre nach der Kirche und Gesetze (Hamburg, 1811); Liturgisches Handbuch (Marburg, 1806). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit., i, 45, 51, 69, 76, 126, 182, 141, 163, 174, 193, 203, 287, 289, 300, 360, 364 (B. H. B. P.).

WOLFFASCH, AARON, also called Aaron Halis, a German rabbi, was born in 1736, and died at Fürth, March 29, 1855. He was a distinguished disciple of Mendelssohn, and worked in the department of Biblical exegesis and Hebrew literature in conjunction with Joel Löwe, G. Solomon. He published a German translation of Lamentations, with an elaborate Hebrew introduction and commentary by Löwe (Berlin, 1788); a translation of Esther, with a German introduction, etc. (ibid. eod.); a Hebrew commentary on the Song of Solomon, written conjointly with Löwe, accompanying Mendelssohn's translation of this book (ibid. 1780); the book of Job, with a German translation and Hebrew commentary (Prague, 1791; Vienna, 1806); the first book of Kings, with a German translation and Hebrew commentary (Breslau, 1809); critical and exegetical annotations on the visions of Habakkuk (ibid. 1806); a German translation of the first two chapters of Habakkuk, published in the periodical Jedéyn, ii, 107 sq.; a German translation and Hebrew exposition of the Sabbath and festival lessons (Berlin, 1795); a Hebrew primer, entitled Yedidat Levi, written conjointly with Löwe, and published in London by B. F. M. de Medekinder (ibid. eod.). See First, Bibl. Jud. iii, 583 sqq.; Kitto, Cyclop. a. v.; Steinschneider, Catalogus Libr. Hebr. in Bibl. Bodl. col. 2782-2784; the same, Bibl. WOLLASTON, GEORGE, D.D., an English divine, for some time father of the Royal Society, and sixty-two years a member of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, was born in 1728. He was educated at the Charterhouse, and afterwards at Sidney College, Cambridge, where he graduated A.B. in 1748. Such was the high character he sustained, that he was chosen mathematical lecturer; and while at Cambridge he was also engaged in editing Newton's Principia. He was presented to the rectory of Stratford, Suffolck, in 1754; to the rectory of Denegy, Essex, in December, 1762; and to the rectory of St Mary Aldermanery, London, in 1774. He died Aug. 14, 1824. See (London) Annual Register, 1826, p. 226.

WOLLASTON, WILLIAM, an English clergyman and author, was born at Coton Clauford, Staffordshire, March 26, 1658; became pensioner at Sidney College, Cambridge, in 1674; took deacon's orders about 1681; became assistant master of Birmingham School; was ordained priest in 1686; inherited a large estate in 1688, and thereafter passed his time in literary leisure in London, where he died, Oct. 29, 1724. He published, The Design of a Part of the Book of Ecclesiastes; or, the Unreasonableness of Men's Restless Contentions for the Present Enjoyments, Represented in an English Poem (1691); and Religion of Nature Delivered (1722). He also left a number of works in MS. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. a. v.

WOLLE, CHRISTOPH, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born Jan. 24, 1700, at Leipzig, where he also prosecuted his theological, philosophical, and Oriental studies, preparing and defending his dissertation, De Facultatibus Intellectibus in Bous HDabius Metandis, he was allowed to lecture as private dean. In 1746 he was made doctor of divinity, and two years later was appointed to the chair of theology. He opened his lectures with a discourse, in Anton. Colloquium de Christianis. In 1751 he published the following: Tractatus est, Non ri. unus minus quam Falsus Fratres Farc. He died July 6, 1761. Of his many writings we mention, Diss. Philol. Sacra de Regula xxvii Hermeneutica, ad Circumstantiam Sacrae Isaiae Illustrationem, etc. (Leipsic, 1722); Diss. de mysteriis Oraculiorum ad Mysterae Resolutorum Pedagogiae (ibid. eod.); Diss. WOLLEG, JOHANNES, a theologian of the Reformed Church, was born Nov. 80, 1666, at Baile, where his father, Oswald, was a magistrate. At the age of twenty, after preliminary courses in philosophy and theology, in both of which he excelled, he entered the ministry. In 1607 he was made city deacon; in 1611 pastor of St. Leopold's; in 1618 pastor at the Cathedral, as successor to Grynaeus, and professor of the Old Test., as successor to Sebastian Beck. He wrote a number of dissertations, and a single theological work, called the Compendium Theologiae Christianae (1620), a volume of only 273 pages, but a masterpiece of compact brevity, clear arrangement, and thorough comprehensiveness as respects all important doctrinal matters. It was a text-book at Baile and several other reformed universi- ties; in 1620 it appeared in a third at Amsterdam in 1688. An English edition was prepared by Alexander Rose, and published under the title, Wolleg's Christian Divinity. Wolleg did not live to see the success of his book, but died of the plague, Nov. 12, 1619, leaving two sons, Johann and Theodor, both of whom afterwards became pastors at Baile, and in 1667 died of the same disease. A volume of funeral sermons by Wolleg appeared in print in 1687. See Herzog, Real-Encyklop. a. v.

WOLLEAST, JOHANN FRIEDRICH, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Schweinditz, May 18, 1757, and died March 29, 1829. He is the author of Kirchenagenda fur Stadt- und Landprediger (Breslau, 1811, 2 parts). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit., ii, 290. (B. P.)

WOLLNER, CHRISTOPH, the Prussian statesman of the reign of Frederick William II, who originated the famous religious edict in which orthodox in teaching was commanded, was born in 1732 at Doberitz, and was at first an orthodox, though tolerant, theologian. He became engaged in secular affairs after a time, and resigned his pastorate at Behnitz. During fifteen years (1769-88) he contributed nearly all the reviews on dogmatic and biblical questions which appeared in Nicolai's Allgemeine deutsche Bibliothek. In 1776 he joined an order of templars founded at Wiesbaden by a certain knight, Theophillus a Cygnus, which promised to open the way into the most secret mysteries of nature. In 1777 he published in Nicolai's Bibliothek a prophecy... concerning "the impending destruction of the prevalent rationalistic enlightenment." He became tutor in political economy to the crown-prince in 1782, was ennobled in 1786, and appointed councillor of finance and intendant of royal buildings, etc. On July 3, 1788, he was made minister of the department of justice, which included the affairs of church and education, and in that position was employed by the king to place a barrier in the way of the progress of the "enlightenment," which had become powerful in the land. The notorious religious edict, written by Wöllner, was issued in consequence. In 1790, the first volume of his "Religionslehre" appeared, everybody, but ordered that teachers who could not accept the doctrines of evangelical orthodoxy should either resign their positions or refrain from promulgating their own views, and in public support those of the Church, under penalty of "being dismissed and still more severely punished." The edict, issued in the country of Frederick the Great, and after fifty years of governmental principles of a directly opposite character, produced an immense excitement, and called forth more than a hundred pamphlet reviews, about one third of which was in its favor, and, curiously enough, one by Schiller, the enemy of the king, in t. o. clock. Nothing in the way of enforcing the edict was done, however, for about two years; but then a royal order, dated Aug. 13, 1791, compelled Wöllner to proceed against offenders, e. g. Bahrdt (q. v.), who had ridiculed the edict, and then, by procuring a comedy entitled a confession of which pastor Hermann of Breisau was the head, was instituted by the king to give effect to the edict; but as its members were altogether unknown in the learned world, its authority was not great, and its work unimportant. It addressed threatening fulminations to Nussell, Niemeyer, Kast, the University of Halle, etc., which were followed by no consequences whatever. With the accession of Frederick William III (1797), all the measures taken to advance the cause of orthodoxy were set aside. Wöllner retained his office, and in 1798 attempted to revive the religious edict, but received a cutting rejoinder from the king. He resigned and retired to his estates, where he died, respected for his character and abilities, in the year 1800. See Teller, Denkschriften auf Herrn Staatsminister v. Wöllner, etc. (1802); Das preussische Religionswesen, etc. (Leipzig, 1842); Manz, Geschichte der protestantischen Staaten in der ehemaligen Ober- und Niederdeutschland bis zur Bestätigung ihrer religiösen Behinderungen durch die neueren Synoden (last ed. Wölter, Albrecht, a Protestant theologian of Germany, who died at Halle, March 30, 1878, doctor and professor, is the author of Freidurg, published in 1874, Reformation und kirchliches Leben bis zur Bestätigung ihrer religiösen Behinderung durch die neueren Synoden (last ed. Bonn, 1868) (B. P.)

Wölter, Otto Ludwig Siegmund, doctor of theology and pastor of St. Catherine's, a. Hamburg, was born there Dec. 17, 1756, and died May 13, 1874. For thirty years he occupied the pulpit of St. Catherine's, in his native place, of which he was one of its most beloved and most learned sons. His sermons were repeatedly printed. See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. ii, 1469. (B. P.)

Woltersdorf, Ernst Gottlieb, an evangelical hymn-writer, was born at Friedrichsdorf, near Berlin, May 31, 1725. He was a student of Halle, and resided and taught in the orphanage. In 1744 he became a private tutor, and four years afterwards associate pastor at Barmstedt. He evinced a great interest in the fiction of the young, and consented to assume the direction of an orphanage founded in his parish by a mason named Zahn. This institution enjoyed his supervision until his death, Dec. 17, 1761. Woltersdorf possessed uncommon readiness in versification, and was continually tempted to spread his thoughts over a great deal of surface. Some of his hymns are largely in the style of Zinzendorf, with whom he shared many doctrinal views, though not otherwise connected with him. Several of them have considerable value, and have found deserved admission, in a revised and abridged form, in the hymn books of various evangelical churches. He had the ability to seize upon some pregnant word taken from Scripture or other source, and to present it in a different light with every succeeding strope, and did so several times. It is attributed to him to write also a number of parodies. He published a collection of Psalms (1750; 2d ed. 1768; a recent ed., by Schneider, accompanied with a biography of the author, Dresden, 1849). A second collection was issued in 1751. This was followed by a little collection of sermons prepared by him which was published. See Herb., Rech-Encyklop. s. v.

Wolsogen, Johann Ludwig von, a famous Socianian, was born in 1599, in Austria, of a family belonging to the physiognomy he has made abundantly clear. He lived in 1685, at Schöllingsheim, near Frauenl. His exegetical writings are found in the Bibliotheca Fratrum Polonorum (Amsterdam, 1656). He also wrote, Compendium Principiorum Christismi (ibid. ed.). His Opera Omnia were published posthumously by the same author, 2 vols. Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 1, 17.31, 308, 419. Wolsogen, Ludovicus van, a Reformed theologian of Holland, was born in 1632. After completing his studies, he travelled through France and Germany, and was appointed preacher of the French congregation at Gröningen. In 1664 he was appointed professor in Utrecht, and shortly afterwards was called to Amsterdam, where he died, Nov. 13, 1680. He wrote, Orator Sacror, seu Præcepta Dei Ratione Considerantia — Tractatus de Scripturis Sacris Interpretis — Dissert. Critico- Theologico de Correctione Sorbatorum, etc. After his death there was published, 1700, Explication de la Priere. See Burmann, Trajectum Eruditum, Lettres sur la Vie et sur la Mort de Louis de Wolzogen (Amsterdam, 1692); Oud, Wolzogenii Apologia Particularis, Acta et Contra Caecilium, 1(2d ed. 1693), Jücker, Allgemein Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. Woman (Heb. נָשִׁי, 'ishah), a masc. form contracted for נָשִׁי נָשִׁי, fem. of נָשִׁי, 'ish, as civra [in virgino] from ivr, and averter from avr, like our own term woman, is in the Hebrew (and so the Greek, γυνα) used of married and unmarried females. See Max.

1. Original Position of the Sex.—The derivation of the word shows that, according to the conception of the ancient Israelites, woman was man in a modified form—one of the same race, the same genus, as man, a kind of female man. How slightly modified that form is, how little in essential structure woman differs from man, is a fact of physiology that is abundantly clear. Vindicated in 1685, even, in make as man and woman are, they differ still more in character; and yet the great features of their hearts and minds so closely resemble each other, that it requires no depth of vision to see that these twain are one. This most important fact is characteristically set forth in the Bible in the account given of the formation of woman out of one of Adam's ribs: a representation to which currency may have the more easily been given, from the apparent space there is between the lowest rib and the bones on which the trunk is supported. "And Adam said: This is now bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh: she shall be called Woman, because she was taken out of man." An immediate and natural inference is forthwith made touching the intimacy of the marriage-bond: "Therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave unto his wife, and they shall be one flesh" (Gen. ii. 21-24). This narrative is hence effectively appealed to as supplying an argument for enforcing the duties of the husband towards the wife (Eph. v. 28-31). Those who have been pleased to make free with this simple narrative may well be required to show how a rude age could more effectually have been taught the essential unity of man and woman—unity of nature which determines us only in a united soul. The conception of the Biblical writer goes beyond even this, but does not extend further than science and experience unite to justify. There was solid reason why it was not good for Adam "to be alone." Without a helper he would have been an imperfect being. The genius homo consists of man and woman. Both are necessary to the idea of man. The one supplements the qualities of the other. They are not two, but one flesh, and as one body so one soul.

The entire aim, then, of the narrative in Genesis was, by setting forth certain great physical facts, to show the essential unity of man and woman, yet the dependence of the latter on the former; and so to encourage and foster the tenderest and most considerate love between the two, founded on the peculiar qualities of each—pre-eminence, strength, intellectual power, and wisdom on the one side; reliance, softness, grace, and beauty on the other—at the same time that the one set of excellences lose all their worth unless as existing in the possession of the other. Many usages of early times interfered with the preservation of this truth, but these were not always in the existence of polygamy, the autocratic powers vested in the head of the family under the patriarchal system, and the treatment of captives. Neverthelass a high tone was maintained generally on this subject by the Mosaic law, and, as far as we have the means of judging, by the force of public opinion.

II. Condition of Ancient Hebrew Females.—1. Liberty.—Women appear to have enjoyed considerably more freedom among the Jews than is now allowed them in western Asia, although in other respects their condition and lot seem to have been only, or less, dissimilar.

At present, women of all ranks are much confined to their own houses, and never see the men who visit their husbands or fathers, and in towns they never go abroad without their persons and faces being completely shrouded; they also take their meals apart from the males, even of their own family. But in the rural districts they enjoy more freedom, and often go about unveiled. Among the Jews, women were somewhat less restrained in their intercourse with men, and did not generally conceal their faces when they went abroad. One of the most important points in Scripture with regard to women eating and drinking with men (Ruth ii, 14), but that was at a simple reflection, and only illustrates the greater freedom of rural manners. Instead of being immersed in a harem, or appearing in public with the face covered, the wives and daughters from the many times mingled freely and openly with the other sex in the duties and amusements of ordinary life. Rebekah travelled on a camel with her face unveiled, until she came into the presence of her affianced (Gen. xxiv, 64, 65). Jacob saluted Rachel with a kiss in the presence of the shepherd (Gen. xxix, 11). Each of these maidens was engaged in active employment, the former in fetching water from the well, the latter in tending her flock. Sarah wore no veil in Egypt, and yet this formed no ground for supposing her to be married (Gen. xxi, 14-19). An outrage on a maiden in the open field was visited with the severest punishment (Deut. xxii, 25-27), proving that it was not deemed improper for her to go about unprotected. Further than this, women played no inconsiderable part in public celebrations: Miriam headed a band of women who commemorated with song and dance the deliverance of the Egyptians (Exod. xv, 20, 21); Jephthah's daughter gave her father a triumphal reception (Judg. xi, 34); the maidens of Shiloh danced publicly in the vineyards at the yearly feast (Judg. xxi, 21); and the women feted Saul and David, on their return from their defeat of the Philistines, with singing and dancing (1 Sam. xviii, 6, 7). The odes of Deborah (Judg. v) and of Hannah (1 Sam. ii, 1, etc.) exhibit a degree of intellectual cultivation which is in itself a proof of the position of the sex in that period. Women also occasionally held public offices, particularly that of prophetesses or inspired teachers (Exod. xx, 20), Huldah (2 Kings xxii, 14), Noaiah (Neh. vi, 14), Anna (Luke ii, 36), and above all Deborah, who applied her prophetic gift to the administration of public affairs, and so was entitled to be styled a "teacher of Israel." Judges (xiv, 4, 7, Judg. xiii, 25), and the usurpation of the throne of Judah by Athaliah (2 Kings xi, 3), further attest the latitude allowed to women in public life.

2. The employment of the women were very various, and not entirely confined to home. In the earlier or patriarchal state of society, the daughters of men of substance tended their father's flocks (Gen. xxix, 9; Exod. ii, 16). In ordinary circumstances, the first labor of the day was to grind corn and bake bread. The other cares of the family occupied the rest of the day. The women of the peaceableness and of the poor consumed much time in collecting fuel, and in going to the wells for water. The wells were usually outside the towns, and the labor of drawing water from them was by no means confined to poor women. This labor, however, was always performed by the women, and the water was carried in earthen vessels borne upon the shoulders (Gen. xviii, 19-20; John iv, 7, 28). Working with the needle also occupied much of their time, as it would seem that not only their own clothes but those of the men were made by the women. Such garments, at all events, were either for the use of the family (1 Sam. ii, 19; Prov. xxxi, 21), for sale (Prov. xxxi, 14, 24), or for charity (Acts ix, 39). Some of the needlework was very fine, and much valued (Exod. xxxvi, xxviii, xxxix, 39; Judg. v, 30; 1 Sam. xiv, 14). The condition of the women, who did many of the women's work, was that of a slave. A task that was in use (Exod. xxxv, 25; Prov. xxxi, 19) and much of the weaving seems also to have been executed by them (Judg. xvi, 13, 14; Prov. xxxi, 22). The tapestries for bed-coverings, mentioned in the last-cited text, were probably produced in the looms, and appear to have been much valued (Prov. xvii, 16). See Handicraft.

The value of a virtuous and active housewife forms a frequent topic in the book of Proverbs (xi. 16, xii, 4, xiv, 1, xxi, 10, etc.). Her influence was, of course, a matter of public concern in Scripture. The wife, as the head of the family and as a woman, was the mistress of the house, she controlled the arrangements of the house, to the extent of inviting or receiving guests on her own motion (Judg. iv, 18; 1 Sam. xxi, 18, etc.; 2 Kings iv, 8, etc.). The effect of polygamy was to transfer female influence from the wives to the mothers, and eventually show in the application of the term gebirah (literally meaning powerful) to the queen mother (1 Kings ii, 19; xv, 13; 2 Kings x, 18; xxix, 12; Jer. xxiii, 18; xxix, 2). Polygamy also necessitated a separate establishment for the wives collectively, or for each individually.

Thus, in the palace of the Persian monarch there was a "house of the women" (Esth. ii, 9), which was guarded by eunuchs (ii, 8); in Solomon's palace the harem was connected with, but separate from, the rest of the building (1 Kings vii, 8); and on journeys each wife had her separate tent (Gen. xxxi, 50). In such cases it is probable that the females took their meals apart from the males (Esth. i, 9); but we have no reason to conclude that the separate system prevailed generally among the Jews. The women were present at festivals, either as attendants on the guests (John xii, 2), or as themselves guests (ix, 1; John iii, 1). In such cases there is good ground for concluding that on ordinary occasions also they joined the males at meals, though there is no positive testimony to that effect. See Eating.

4. We have no certain information regarding the dress of the women among the poorer classes; but it was probably coarse and simple, and not materially different from that which we now see among the Bedawin women, and the female peasantry of Syria. This consists of drawers, and a long and loose gown of coarse blue linen, with some ornamental bordering wrought with the needle, in another color, about the neck and bosom. The head is covered with a kind of turban, connected with which, behind, is a veil, which covers the neck back, and bosom. See VEST. We may presume, with still greater certainty, that women of superior condition wore, over their inner dress, a frock or tonic like that of the men, but more closely fitting the person, with a girdle formed by an unrolled kerchief. Their head-dress was a kind of turban, with different sorts of veils and wrappers used under various circumstances. The hair was worn long, and, as now, was braided into numerous tresses, with tinkets and ribbons (1 Cor. xi, 15; 1 Tim. ii, 9; 1 Pet. iii, 3). With the head-dress the principal ornaments appear to have been connected, such as a jewel for the forehead, and rows of pearls (Sol. Song i, 10; Ezek. xvi, 12). Ear-rings were also worn (Isa. iii, 20; Ezek. xvi, 12), as well as a nose-jewel, consisting, no doubt, as now, either of a ring inserted in the cartilage of the nose, or an ornament like a button attached to it. The nose-jewel was of gold or silver, and sometimes set with gems (Gen. xxiv, 47; Isa. iii, 21). Bracelets were also generally worn (Isa. iii, 19; Ezek. xvi, 11), and anklets, which, as now, were probably more like fitters than ornaments (Isa. iii, 16, 20). The Jewish women possessed the art of staining their eyelids black, for effect and expression (2 Kings ix, 30; Jer. iv, 30; Ezek. xxiii, 40); and it is more than probable that they had the present practice of staining the nails, and the palms of their hands and soles of their feet, of an iron-rust color, by means of a paste made from the plant called henna (Lawsonia inermis). This plant appears to be mentioned in Sol. Song i, 14, and its present use is probably referred to in Deut. xxi, 12; 2 Sam. xix, 24. See DRESS.

4. Family Relations.—The customs concerning marriage, and the circumstances which the relation of wife and mother involved, have been described in the article MARRIAGE.

The Israelites eagerly desired children, and especially sons. Hence the messenger who first brought to the father the news that a son was born, was well rewarded (Job iii, 8; Jer. xxv, 15). The event was celebrated with music; and the father, when the child was presented to him, pressed it to his bosom, by which act he was understood to acknowledge it as his own (Gen. i, 28; Job iii, 12; Psa. xxi, 10). On the eighth day from the birth the child was circumcised (Gen. xvii, 10), at which time the child was taken by the name given to it (Lev. xvi, 20). The first-born son was highly esteemed, and had many distinguishing privileges. He had a double portion of the estate (Deut. xxi, 17); he exercised a sort of parental authority over his younger brothers (Gen. xxv, 13; xvii, 16; Gen. xxvi, 33, etc.; Exod. xi, 29; 2 Chron. xxxi, 16); and before the institution of the Levitical priesthood he acted as the priest of the family (Numb. iii, 12, 13; viii, 16). The patriarchs exercised the power of taking these privileges from the first-born, and giving them to any other son, or of distributing them among different sons; but this practice was overruled by the Mosaic law (Deut. xxi, 15-17).

The child continued about three years at the breast of the mother, and a great festival was given at the weaning (Gen. xxi, 8; 1 Sam. ii, 20-24; 2 Chron. xxxix, 8; 2 Sam. xi, 16); Matt. xxi, 16). He remained two years longer in the charge of the women, after which he was taken under the special care of the elder, with a view to his proper training (Deut. vi, 20-23; xi, 19). It appears that those who wished for their sons better instruction than they were themselves able or willing to give, employed a private teacher, or else sent them to a priest or Levite, who had perhaps several others under his care. The principal object was that they should be well acquaintcd with the law of Moses; and reading and writing were taught in subservience to this leading object.

The authority of a father was very great among the Israelites, and extended not only to his sons, but to his grandsons—indeed, to all who were descended from him. His power had no recognized limit, and even if he put his son or grandson to death, there was, at first, no law by which he could be brought to account (Gen. xxi, 14; xxviii, 24). But Moses circumscribed this power, by ordering that when a father judged his son worthy of death, he should bring him before the public tribunals. If, however, he had struck or cursed his father or mother, or was refractory or disobedient, he was still liable to capital punishment (Exod. xxi, 15, 17; Lev. xx, 9; Deut. xxi, 18-21). See CHILD.

III. Description of Modern Oriental Females.—It will at once be seen that under the influence of a religion, at the bottom of which lay those ideas concerning the relations of the sexes one to another, slavery on the part of the woman was impossible. This fact is the more noticeable, and it speaks the more loudly in favor of the divine origin of the religion of the Bible, because the East has in all times, down to the present day, kept women everywhere, save in those places in which Judaism and Christianity have prevailed, in a state of law, even if in some cases gilded, bondage, making her the mere toy, plaything, and instrument of man. Nothing can be more painful to contemplate than the humiliating condition in which Islamism still holds its so-called free women—a condition of perpetual childhood—childhood of mind, while the passions receive constant incense; leaving the fine endowments of woman’s soul undeveloped and inert, or crushing them when in any case they may happen to her. And converting man into a capricious, haughty idol, for whose will and pleasure the other sex lives and suffers. In those parts of the East where the influence of the Bible has not prevailed, woman has been subjected to degradation, and viewed as little better than the slave of an imperious master. Being mainly immersed within the harem, and prohibited from mingling in general society, their minds are left wholly uncultivated; and what time they can spare from their household duties is principally devoted to embroidery, dress, and smoking. This universal want of education, with the influence of polygamy, naturally disqualifies them from being the proper companions of their husbands. The state of morality in the higher circles, in some of the principal Eastern cities, consequent on this condition of society, is just what might be expected. Wherever the influence of Christianity prevails, woman is invariably elevated to her natural position in society—the equal and companion of man.

It will assist the reader in forming a just conception of Hebrew women in the Biblical periods, if we add a few details respecting the actual condition of women in Syria. Mr. Bartlett, in his "Sketches of the East" (p. 231 sq.), visits the house of a rich Jew in the metropolis of the Holy Land. We give the substance of his observations:

"On entering his dwelling we found him seated on the low divan, fondling his youngest child; and on our expressing a wish to draw the costume of the female members of his family, he commanded their attendance, but it was some time before they would come; when,
however, they did present themselves, it was with no sort of reserve whatever. Their costume is chastely elegant.
The prominent figure in the room was the married daughter, whose husband, a boy of fourteen or fifteen, as he seemed, wanted nearly a head of the stature of his wife, but was already chargable with the numerous duties of a father. An oval head-dress of peculiar shape, from which was slung a rich veil of embroidered muslin, admirably set off her brow and eyes: the neck was ornamented with jewels, and the bosom with a profusion of gold coils, partly concealed by folds of muslin; a graceful robe of striped silks, with long open sleeves, half-laced under the bosom, invested the whole person, over which was worn a jacket of green silk with short sleeves, leaving the white arm and bracelets bare at liberty. An elderly person sat on the sofa, the mother, whose dress was more grave, her turban less oval, and of blue shawl, and the breast covered entirely to the neck with a kind of ornamented gold shawl, and in all was seen a dignity of air; she was engaged in knitting, while her younger daughter bent over her in conversation; her dress was similar to that of her sister, but with no gold coils or light muslin folds; and, instead of large ear-rings, the vermilion blossom of the pomegranate formed an exquisite pendant, reflecting its glow upon the dazzling whiteness of her skin.
We were surprised at the fairness and delicacy of their complexion, and the vivacity of their manner. Unlike the wives of Oriental Christians, who respectfully attend at a distance till invited to approach, these pretty Jewesses seemed on a perfect footing of equality, and chatted and laughed away without interruption."

Many of the daughters of Judah, here and at Hebron, are remarkable for their attractions. Mr. Wolff describes one of them with enthusiasm, and no small unconscious poetry,—"the beautiful Sarah," whom his lady met at a "wedding-feast."

"She was scarcely seated when she felt a hand upon her shoulder, and then a voice, 'Are you new here?'
She turned in the face and saw a most beautiful Jewess, whom I also afterwards saw, and I never beheld a more beautiful and well-behaved lady in my life, except the best bred girl in the valley of Cashmere; she looked like a queen in Israel. A lovely lady she was; tall, of a fair complexion and blue eyes, forehead broad and high, and nose right aristocratic.
No queen had a finer deportment than that Jew-ness had."

Mr. Bartlett was also admitted into the abode of a Christian family in Jerusalem, of whom he thus speaks
(p. 205, 206):

"The interior of their houses is similar to those of the Jews. In our intercourse with them we were received with great kindness; and the hostess, a modest and obliging woman, a tolerably good housekeeper, whom we have described as Mrs. G, was so much given to the care of her children and servants, and besides pipes and coffee, the guest is prevented with a succe of agreements and small glasses of alcohol; which, when done with, are taken from him by her fair hostess or her servant, who kiss his hand as they receive them. They are more reserved, often standing during the visit. Their dress is more gorgeous than that of the Jewish women, but not so chaste and elegant; it suits well with the languor of their air, their dainty complexion, and large black eyes. The head-dress has a fantastic air, like that of a Monday queen in England, and the hat is a little in the style of

B. Beutles by sir Peter Lely.

Whose drapery biff over all."

A heavy shawl is gracefully wreathed round the figure,
and the dress, when open, displays long, loose trowsers of muslin and small slippers. The ensemble, it must be adnitted, is very fascinating, when its wearer is young and lovely."

We now pass to the peasantry, and take from La-martine a sketch of the Syrian women, as seen by him at the foot of Lebanon, on a Sunday.

"After having with their families attended divine service, the latter return to their houses to enjoy a rest somewhat more sumptuous than on ordinary days: the women and girls, adorning in their richest clothes, their hair plaited, and all swarmed with oranges, flowers, scarlet wall-flowers, and carnations, seat themselves on mats before the doors of their dwellings, with their friends and neighbors. It is impossible to describe with the pen the group so resplendent of our picture, or the vivacity of their costume and their beauty, which these females then compose in the landscape. I see them among daily visitors. They dress as Raphael had not beheld in his dreams as an artist. It is more than the Italian or Greek beauty; there is the nicety of shape, the delicacy and grace of outline, as much as that Greek and Roman beauty, which Raphael had not beheld in his dreams as the most finished model; but it is rendered more bewitching still by a primitive artlessness of expression, by a serene and voluptuous languor, by a heavenly clearness, which the glances from the blue eyes, fringed with long black eyelashes, over the features, and by a mellow beauty, a harmony of proportions, a rich whiteness of skin, an indescribable transparency of tint, a metallic glow upon the hair, a gracefulness of movement, a poetry in the attitudes, and a vibrating silver tone of voice, which would move as powerfully as any of the great Syrian girls the very heart of the visual paradise. Such admirable and varied beauty is also very common: I never go into the country for an hour without meeting several such females going to the fountains or retaining, with their Etruscan arms upon their shoulders, and their unkissed legs clasped with rings of silver.

The ordinary dress of the women of Palestine is not, perhaps, much fitted to enhance their natural charms, and yet it admits of ease and dignity in the carriage. Dr. Transal has described the customary appearance of both male and female:

"The people wear neither hats, bonnets, nor stockings; both sexes appear in loose, flowing dresses, and red or yellow slippers; the men wear red caps with or without tassels, the women are concealed by white veils, with the exception of the eyes" (ii. 451).

The singular beauty of the Hebrew women, and the natural warmth of their affections, has inspired them to throw off the domestic looseness over the pages of the Bible. In no history can there be found an equal number of charming female portraits. From Hagar down to Mary and Martha, the Bible presents pictures of womanly beauty that are unsurpassed and rarely paralleled. But we should very imperfectly represent in these general remarks the formative influence of the female character as seen in the Bible, did not we refer to the amiable traits of character to the original conceptions of which we have spoken, and to the pure and lofty religious ideas which the Biblical books in general present. If woman there appears as the companion and friend of man, if she rises above the condition of being a bearer of children to that noble position which is held by the mother of a family, she owes her elevation in the main to the religion of Moses and to that of Jesus. The first system—as a preparatory one—did not and could not complete the emancipation of woman. The Oriental influence modified the religious so materially as to keep women generally in some considerable subjection. Yet the placing of the fondest desires and the glowing hopes of the nation on some child that was to be born, some son that was to be given, as it made every Marion's heart beat high with expectation, raised the tone of self-respect among the women of Israel, and caused them to be regarded by the other sex with lively interest, deep regard, and a sentiment which was akin to reverence. There was, however, needed the finishing touch which the Great Teacher put to the Mosaic view of the relations between the sexes. Recognising the fundamental truths which were as old as the Orpheus of Greece, Jesus proceeded to restrain the much-abused facility of divorce, leaving only one cause why the marriage-bond should be broken, and at the same time teaching that as the origin of wedlock was divine, so its severance ought not to be the work of man. Still further—beying to bear on the domestic ties his own doctrine of immortality, he made the 5th and 6th commandments, and the ying soul, only teaching that the connection would be refined with the refinement of our affections and our liberation from these tenements of clay in which we now dwell (Matt. v., 31; xix. 5 sq.;

XII. — 81*
WOMEN

(Ad Philipp. 4) exhorts the Christian wives of Philippi to live in the faith, in love and purity, to duly honor their husbands, and to instruct their children in the fear of the Lord. Second marriages being systematically discouraged in the early Church, the advice given by the same writer to the widows seems directed against the faults to which women, when lonely and unemployed, are specially prone—"calumny, speaking against their neighbors, bearing false witness, and avarice" (ed. Dressel, p. 381). The advice of Tertullian (Ad Uxorem, bk. ii, c. 8), that a woman should not refuse to marry one slightly below herself in station, provided he is likely to prove in other respects a good husband, points probably to the existence of a certain social ambition among those to whom this counsel is addressed, which he considered unbecoming to a woman of unworthy of the Christian character. As contrasted with the cruelty which too often disguised the privacy of pagan households, we find Chrysostom observing that it is a shame for a man to beat his female slave, much more his wife (In Epist. 1, ad Corinth. Hom. 36; Migne, Patroec. Græc. lxxi, 222).

The teaching of the most enlightened of the fathers was undoubtedly to the effect that there was no natural inferiority in the woman to the man. Theodoret (Gree. Affect. Curat. bk. v) insists emphatically on their exact equality in the order of the God made world, and in order that the tendencies and action of both might be harmonious. Sometimes, indeed, he observes, woman has been found superior to man in encountering adversity (Migne, lxxxii, 686). Chrysostom (Hom. lxi, 8) says that no one is more fit to instruct and exhort her husband than a pious woman. This conception differed, however, materially from that of Plato (Rep. v, 455), in that while the Greek philosopher sought to oblitera the ordinary distinctions between the sexes, the Christian father held that nature assigned to woman a distinct province of activity. Chrysostom, in a passage of singular beauty, gives us a comparison between the duties of the wife and those of the husband, the former being represented as in some respects the more dignified; for while the husband is described as engaged in the rougher work of life, in the market or the law-courts, the wife is represented as remaining at home and devoting much of her time to prayer, to reading the Scriptures, to prayer and philosophy. When her husband returns, harassed with his labors, it is her function to cheer and to soothe him, so goes forth into this world purified from the evils influences to which he has there been exposed, and carrying with him the higher influences of his home-life (In Journ. Hom. 61; Migne, lix, 840).

The participation of young females in the exercises of the palestra and in races, commended by pagan theorists (Grote, Plato, iii, 217), is condemned by Clemente of Alexandria (Paed. iii, 10) as altogether repugnant to the notions of female modesty (Migne, viii, 626). Chrysostom (In Matt. Hom. 1) contrasts the difference in relation to these points between Christian and pagan teaching, and even goes so far as to affirm that true virginity was a notion which paganism was unable to realize (Migne, lxi, 19).

At the same time we have satisfactory evidence that this exalted conception of the female character and female duties did not involve any renunciation of woman's humbler functions. Clemens says that it is right that women should employ themselves in spinning, weaving, and watching the bread-maker (της ψωμοδοσίας) and that it is no disgrace for a wife to grind corn or to superintend the cooking with the view of pleasing her husband (Migne, lxxii, 241).

The excessive luxury of the 4th century would seem, however, to have been not less fatal to the maintenance of the high ideal than to other features of the Christian character. Amédée Thierry says that, by one of those contradictions which "déstournent la logique des idées," Christianity itself, essentially the religion of the poor, was surprised to give to the manners of the Western empire a degree of effeminacy unknown in pagan times (Saint Thérèse, p. 2). Chrysostom declares that many of the ladies of Constantinople would not walk across even a single street to attend church. It was reported to him that they were employed for the shortest distance (In Matt. Hom. 7; Migne, lvi, 79). When there were to be seen with their necks, heads, arms, and fingers loaded with golden chains and rings, their persons breathing precious odors, their garments oozing with odors of dress and stuff and silk (Mitres HIST. DE CHRISTIANITE, bk. iv, c. 1). On the contrary, he deplored the affected masculine apparel and seemed to blush for their womanhood, cutting short their hair, and presenting faces like those of eunuchs (Jerome, Epist. 18). According to the same authority, the greater facilities possessed by ecclesiastics for obtaining admission to female society was an inducement to some with become priests (ibid.). Elsewhere Jerome strongly disdains the clergy from accustoming themselves to private interviews with those of the other sex (Epist. 82; Migne, xxii, 291).

The exaggerated importance attached by Jerome to the unwedded life, as one of superior sanctity, seems to have led him to dwell somewhat harshly on the weaknesses and worldliness of many of the wealthy matrons of his day. He represents them as given to excessive peramorous indulgences, and as consulting with their maidservants on preparations for feasts and other household matters. When, however, we find him enumerating such obvious duties as "dispensatio dominus, necessitates maritum, liberum educatum, correctio servorum," as prejudicial to the higher interests of the soul, we perceive that his tone is that of one to whom the ascetic life alone appeared adequately Christian (De Pers. Virg. c. 20; Migne, xxxii, 228). On the other hand, it is evident that the state of Roman society at this time rendered it exceptionally difficult for Christian women to carry on their duties in the day's work; and we may trace this Marcella's retirement to her mansion in the suburbs, as described by the same father, is an indication. He depicts the very different future which her mother, Albinia, had designed for her—a splendid marriage and the possession of great wealth, while the daughter rarely issued from her home save to visit the churches of the apostles and martyrs, especially those least frequented by the multitude (Epist. 90). The miseries of large establishments, according to Jerome, were often exposed to exceptional temptations; and he states that he would have young women visit the church of their own free will, in order to avoid being plundered by dishonest stewards, and to escape the anxieties inseparable from the management of a large household, thus bringing home to their children by a former marriage, "not a guardian, but an enemy; not a parent, but a tyrant" (Epist. 94; Migne, xxii, 291).

Among other indications of the confusion and demoralization characteristic of that and the following century must be included that laxity of Church discipline which permitted the performance of public religious rites to be sometimes intrusted to women. In the twenty-first canon of the collection ascribed to Gelasius this is spoken of as evidence of the "contempt" into which religion had fallen.

It is generally assumed, though on somewhat scanty and doubtful evidence, that at the period of the conversion of the Teutonizations the regard for the Christian charity and the respect paid to the sex were greater among pagan communities than among the Latin races. But however this may have been, it is certain that the views inherited and handed down by the Western Church with regard to the "liberal and prudent women" were greatly superior to those that find expression in any of the barbaric codes. Something of this feeling seems reflected in Jerome when (Epist. 130) he censures parents for their too common practice of leaving deformed or otherwise unmarrageable daughters inadequately provided for (Migne, xxii, 301).
"The Church," says Sir Henry Maine, "conferred a great benefit on several generations by keeping alive the traditions of the Roman legislation respecting settled property, and he points out that Christianity was really carrying on the tradition of the Roman law. The formula for marriage, "I will be faithfully obedient to my goods I thee endow," is one, he says, "which sometimes puzzles the English lawyer from its want of correspondence with anything which he finds among the oldest English law" (Early Hist. of Institutions, p. 267; see also De Broglie, L'Eglise et l'Empire, I, ii, 278, and Ecclesiastical Diary)."

WOMEN, CHURCHIONG OR (το κοσμοθείαν και προφορά), is alluded to by Pope Gregory, in 601, as the thanksgiving, and by the emperor Leo's Constitutions, in 460. The Salisbury use calls it the purification after childbirth at the church door, evidently in allusion to the purification of the Virgin Mary. In 1549 the "quire door" was substituted for the original place. A veil, or churching-cloth, of white material, was used in 1560 by the woman and a new or old seat was allotted to her from an earlier date.

Women's Galleries were upper rooms or apartments in ancient churches, set apart for women and their attendants. They were called κοσμοθέου και προφορά. The author of the Constitutions speaks of it as the custom of the Church in his time, where he gives directions about it that women should sit in a separate place from the men, and thus orders, Let the door be closed at the gate of the women, and the deaconesses at the gate of the women. Intimations of this custom are frequent in writers on early Church usages. The barrier between the two was usually made by rails, or wooden walls, as they are called by Chaucer, who has these remarkable words concerning the origin of this custom: "Men ought to be separated from women by an inward wall, meaning that of the heart; but because they would not, our forefathers separated them by these wooden walls. For I have heard from our seniors that it was not so from the beginning. For in Christ Jesus there is neither male nor female. Do we not read that men and women prayed together in their upper room?" (Homil. 74 in Matt.). In later times, however, as in the Roman and Greek usage, the separation was made by placing the women in galleries directly over the apartments of the men. See Bingham, Christ. Ant. bk. viii, ch. v, § 6, 7.

Woomock, Lawrence, D.D., an English prelate, was born at Lopham, in Norfolk, in 1612. He graduated from Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, in 1632; took deacon's orders, Sept. 21, 1634; is supposed to have succeeded his father in the living of Lopham upon the latter's death, in 1642, but was ejected by the Norfolk commissioners, and perhaps imprisoned, for his adherence to the cause of Charles I.; was made archdeacon of Suffolk and prebendary of Ely at the restoration in 1660; became rector of Horsmehill, in Suffolk; in 1662, and of Boxford, in the same county, in 1663; was made bishop of St. David's, Nov. 11, 1668, and died March 12, 1835. He published, Beaten Otle for the Lamps of the Sanctuary; or, The Great Controversy concerning Set Prayers and our Liturgy Exposed (1641);—The Examination of Trimmers before the Triers (1645);—A Reremantasia Antis-Monstratur; or, The Calenclists' Cabinet Unlocked (1569):— The Result of False Principles (1661);—The Solanae League and Covenant Arraigned and Condemned (ed.);—Suffragum Protestantism (1833), and other works.

Wonders (usually נבָה, παράξενον, both generally used in the sense of prodigy) is some occurrence, or thing, which so strongly engages our attention by its surprising greatness, rarity, or other properties, that our minds are struck by it into astonishment. Wonder is also nearly synonymous with sign: "If a prophet give thee a sign, or a wonder," says Moses (Deut. xiii, 1), and "if the sign or wonder come to pass," etc. Isaiah says, he and "his children are for signs and wonders" (viii, 18), that is, they were for indications of, allusions to, prefigurations of, things future, that should certainly take place; and they were to excite notice, attention, and consideration in beholders, to red in wonder in them. Wonder also signifies the act of wondering, as resulting from the observation of something extraordinary, or beyond what we are accustomed to behold.

See MIRACLES, WONDERS.

Wonderful is the rendering in the A. V. at Ism. ix, 6 of the Heb. נבָה, παράξενον (Sept. Saucppa, Vulg. admirabile), as an epithet of the Messiah, and designates his incomprehensible character as the God-man.

Wonders, in an ecclesiastical sense, are those remarkable occurrences, whether deceptive or otherwise, which partake of the nature of miracles, and have been regarded as such by those who witnessed them. Miracles were very common in the early Church, and were a powerful weapon in the hands of the clergy, both to convince unbelievers and to secure submission on the part of believers. It is proposed in the present article to consider them under the heads of the persons or objects by which they were wrought, and in subdivisions to consider their purpose and the manner of their being wrought.

I. Wonders wrought by Living Saints. —These were performed either by direct means, such as invocation of the name of Christ, prayer, signing of the cross, or the imposition of hands, or by indirect means, such as sending to the sick the garments of saints or others, bread, oil, or water which had been blessed by saints. It is a noticeable fact that in the accounts of miracles which have reached us from the early fathers the writers lay no claim to the performance of the miracles they attest, and do not even mention the authors by name. Under this head we notice, 1. Miracles Beneficentia. These consisted of

(1) Exorcism and Healing.—Justin Martyr tells us that Christians, in the name of Jesus, cast out demons from those whom pagan enchanters could not cure. Ireneus and Cyprian bear similar testimony to their power, while Tertullian declares, "Devils we not only despise, but both overcome and daily expose and expel from men, as is known to very many." Some of the earliest miracles of this class were wrought by Gregory, bishop of Neo-Caesarea, in Pontus, in the 5th century, the record of which, however, belongs to the 4th century. Among those mentioned may be mentioned the exorcism of a youth by the imposition of hands, and the healing of the plague-stricken of Neo-Caesarea. Among the miracles of this class wrought by the Eastern monks, those of Antony and Hilarius will serve as examples. As belonging to the former we note the case of a boy in a fishing-boat, whose state of possession was indicated by a foul stench in the boat, whose spirit yielded to the exorcism of the monk; and also that of a girl from whom he cast out an evil spirit at Alexandria in his old age; while among his cures may be mentioned the case of a man afflicted both with epilepsy and madness, upon whom he employed no means to effect a cure at once, but sent him away into Egypt, declaring that there he would be cured. Hilarius wrought chiefly in Sicily and Palestine. Of his miracles in the former place we have the testimony of a Greek Jew that "a prophet of the Christians had appeared in Alexandria, and was doing so many miracles and signs that men thought him one of the old saints." Jerome, who was his biographer, records among his miracles the restoration of sight to a woman who had been blind for ten years, a cure of paralysis, another of dropsy, and exorcising the possessed, even a camel, which, in its fury, had killed many. In one case a man was dispossessed, and offered a sum of money to the saint for the cure which had been wrought, but was informed that his acceptance of the money would surely bring back the possession. In another instance he effected the cure of an uneducated Frank, who began at once to speak Syriac and Greek, although having no previous knowledge of those languages. In the West we find, in the 1st century, St. Apolinus, a soldier of palmy, laying his hand on her in prayer while she touched his garment, casting out evil spirits, and, on the other hand, causing a thief to be repossessed on account of his misdeeds; also St. Martin of Tours delivering a slave of a devil, and healing a leper at Paris; while, in the following century, Germanus of Auxerre, at Arles, cures a préfect’s wife of a quartan ago. At Alexia beaux power of speech on a girl who had lost it twenty years, at Autun heals a girl of a withered hand, in England a boy of contracted limbs, and at Milan and Ravenna casts out evil spirits.

Thus far the examples have been confined to exorcisms and cures by direct means. Some examples of the same results wrought through indirect means will now be presented. The monk Pachomius had been applied to by a man, whose daughter had an evil spirit, to work a cure. The saint bade the man bring him one of his daughter’s tunics, warning him at the same time that the blessing he should bestow upon it would be of no avail so long as his daughter continued to live a sinful life. Accordingly, the girl was cured until she put on her tunic, and forsook her son. In another instance the saint directed that in order to obtain a cure the energumen should, before each meal, take a small piece of a loaf of bread which had been blessed. As, however, he refused to touch the bread, the device was adopted of concealing morsels of it inside dates, but with no better success. The demoniac carefully extracted them. At last, having been left some days without food, he took the bread and was cured. By means of consecrated oil Hilarion healed the bitten of serpents, and St. Martin of Tours cured a paralytic from the spirit of death, by putting into her mouth a few drops of this oil. Threads frayd from St. Martin’s garments healed the sick when wound around the neck or fingers, and a letter written by the saint cured a girl of fever when laid upon her chest. Straw upon which Germanus of Auxerre was repose for a single night cured a demoniac when bound upon it, and a barley loaf, which the bishop had blessed and sent to the emperor Placidia, possessed and retained for a long time wonder-working properties. St. Genevieve of Paris cast out devils by threads of her garments, and Sultan built the bridge by lots of her hair.

With regard to the comparative prevalence of miraculous gifts of healing, as exercised by living saints in different ages, we can form an opinion only from the records which have reached us. It would appear, however, that the practice of working cures was in most cases diminished in the 6th, 7th, and 8th centuries. Demoniacal possessions, madness, leprosy, paralysis, blindness, deafness, lameness, and many other diseases and infirmities constantly called forth, and found relief through, the thaumaturgic powers of the saints; and as such blessings were endowed, while accidents, such as those to which monchs themselves were exposed in the performance of their agricultural labors, were naturally not excluded from the sphere of miraculous treatment. Nor was there any partiality in the distribution of these gifts over the various regions of Christendom, although the accident of the birthplace or dwelling of some of those who undertook to record certain miracles might lead us to a contrary opinion. If, for example, during the 6th century, thaumaturgy, as exercised in the matter of healing and exorcism, shone brightly in the person of monks and bishops, it shone no less brilliantly in Palestine in the person of the abbots Theodorus, or in France in the instances of Melanion, bishop of Rennes, and St. Genevieve of Paris.

(8) Raising from the Dead.—Irenæus declares that "the use of fasting and prayer the spirit of the dead returned;" and again, "before now, as we have said, even the dead have been raised up, and have remained with us many years." We mention a few alleged instances of this wonder occurring at different times. Julian, who suffered martyrdom at Antioch in the Diocletian persecution, raised a dead man from the grave; St. James, bishop of Nisibis, in A.D. 325, a man who was brought to him as dead, with a view to obtaining money (presumably to defray the expenses of burial), and who really died while counterfeiting death. St. Martin of Tours restored to life a catechumen, who had died in his monastery unbaptized, by throwing himself upon the dead body and praying earnestly for its restoration, and on another occasion a slave, who had bangered himself. Hilary of Poitiers raised a child to life who had died of despair; Marcellus, abbot of a monastery of the Acomites, near Constantinople, in 446, a monk, and Gelasius, abbot of a monastery in Palestine, in 452, a child. Germanus of Auxerre, when at Ravenna, raised a man from the dead; St. Benedict of Nursia, a boy; St. Varo of Ghent, in 638, a man; St. Walburgis, abbot of a monastery on the Somme, in 662, one who had been unjustly hanged; St. Wulfiram, bishop of Sens, in 720, five Frisian youths who had been hanged as a sacrifice to the gods.

(3) Miracles of Deliverance, Protection, and Salvors.—The works of deliverance range all the way from the deliverance of cities from famine, pestilence, or of districts from inundation, to the multiplication of corn in a granary, or of wine or beer in a cask. They differ widely from one another in respect of their object and importance, and the sphere they affect, and often degenerate into little else than a display of miraculous power for its own sake, thus losing the character of a true miracle. The raising of the siege of Nisibis will serve as an example of the power ascribed to living saints in this direction. Sapor II was besieging the city. The inhabitants, in their alarm, appealed to their bishop, St. James, to point out the one to whom they should offer their prayers, swarms of gnats attacked the besiegers, their horses and elephants, irritating them to such a pitch of frenzy that they broke loose. To increase his discomfiture, the Persian king mistook the bishop, when he appeared on the wall in his purple and with his diadem on his head, for the Roman emperor, and therupon raised the siege. According to Theophanes (Chronographia, p. 52, 58), the bishop’s prayers had the further result of bringing famine and pestilence upon the cities and villages turned to their own land. The deliverance of Paris from the Huns by St. Genevieve is a case of like import. The miracle wrought by Gregory Thaumaturgos on the banks of the river Lyceu furnishes an instance of the exercise of this power in another direction. The bishop, having been appealed to protect the inhabitants of Nicaea, engaged to deliver them from the calamities to which they were from time to time exposed by the overflowing of this river, made a journey to the place, and, invoking the name of Christ, planted his staff at the particular spot where the stream was most violent and struck through the mound which had been erected on its banks to prevent its encroachments. The staff became a tree; the water rose as usual, but henceforth never passed the tree. The miracle had its ethical result in the conversion of the inhabitants, who were at that time heathens. Similar miracles are ascribed to several others in different places.

As a rule, however, such interpositions of miraculous power were in behalf of small communities and frequently of individuals. As illustrations of this fact, we may mention the case in which St. Hilary cleanses the Issa Galiariotes of second blindness. Marcellus, bishop of Tours, when, in his missionary zeal, he set fire to a heathen temple, successfully repels the flames from an adjoining building; St. Maurit walks on the water to save his friend Placidus; Germanus of Auxerre restores a stolen child to its owner; St. Benedict of Nursia, and Leufred, abbot of a monastery near Moz.

A.D. 739, cause iron to swim, and others of like import. In marked contrast with this miracle of Christ and his apostles, we find the monks, on their missionary journeys or at home, working miracles in behalf of their own special needs, such as causing water to flow in dry places by the simple expedient of planting a staff in the ground or of striking on the rock with a rod, multiplying wine or beer in the cask, and of quenching the flames when fire had chance to break out in a monastery or convent.

2. Miracles of Power.—In the early Church these assumed the forms of speaking with tongues, prevision of events, and the seeing of visions. Under this head we shall consider:

(1) Miracles Wrought in Confirmation of Christianity.

—For example, Gregory Thaumaturgus on one occasion was forced, through storm and the approach of nightfall, to take refuge, together with his companions in travel, in a heathen temple which happened to be famous for its oracles. Having invoked the name of Christ and signed the cross, the bishop spent the night in praising God. In the morning the priest of the temple found upon his arrival that the deacons had forsaken the place; Gregory informed him that "the Christians could bring them back as well as expel them." Challenged to do so, he wrote upon a piece of paper, "Gregory to Satan enter," and handed it to the priest, who placed it upon the altar. Withdrew the deacons gave evidence of their return. To satisfy the priest still further, Gregory of Christendom that they accepted a challenge to move a large stone which lay near, by means of his word alone. He at once moved it, and thus convinced his opponent. Hilariou brought a remarkable miracle of this class at Gaza. A Christian named Isidora, who was renowned for her beauty and for the chariot-races, applied to Hilariou to help him against a rival who made use of magic to check the speed of his horses, and thus secure the victory for his own steeds. The saint, although at first unwilling to lend his aid in so trivial a matter, acceded to the request, and sent Isidora the vessel he was wont to use in drinking, filled with water, wherein horses, chariot, and charioteers were to be sprinkled. This done, the Christian's horses, flying like the wind, easily won the race. Whereupon the pagan priest, whose gods were Manna, raised a loud shout, "Ammonius conquered."—Miracles of thunder, etc.

(2) Miracles Wrought in Confirmation of Orthodoxy.

—St. Arnulph, having received a command from the king of the Visigoths, who wished to test the saint's powers, to rid the land of a serpent whose breath was of so fiery a nature as apparently to dry up water, was compelled to go. Whereupon a man with a lamp, stole upon the head of the monster, and, binding him follow, led him to a pond, and forbade him ever to leave it, or else thereof to injure any living creature. In the same pond lay the body of a man who had died a violent death. Upon the approach of the saint the dead man prayed to be delivered from his miserable resting-place. In answer to the prayer, St. Arnulph raised the body and buried it in a fitting place. These miracles are said to have made such an impression upon the king and his courtiers that they forsook their Arianism and accepted the Catholic faith.

(3) Miracles Wrought in Punishment of Evil-doers.

—When St. Willibrod, A.D. 739, was on a missionary journey, he, with his company, sought rest one day in a field. The owner of the land proceeded to drive him away, refusing to listen to his remonstrances, to drink with him in token of alms. "Then did not," exclaimed the saint, and the man lost the power of drinking, while suffering all the pangs of thirst, nor did he regain it till he had confessed his sin to the saint upon his return in the course of a year.

(4) Miracles Wrought in Illustration of the Gifts Bestowed upon Men for their Enterprise and Piety.

—St. Benedict of Nursia miraculously detected an infraction of the monastic rules by some of his monks, and a theft on the part of a messenger, and enabled two monks to carry a heavy bag of stone on their back. Numerous other examples of miracles performed by living saints might be cited, but the foregoing will suffice.

11. Wonders Wrought by Relics.—The relics of a saint perpetuated the benefits which the saint himself, during his lifetime, had conferred upon those who stood in need of healing or succor. They originated in the latter half of the 4th century, and may be divided into:

1. Miracles of Healing, consisting of:

(1) Exorcisms and Miraculous Cures, wrought

1. By the Bodies of Saints. —Many miracles were wrought by the body of St. Stephen. The town of Calla eth had possessed relics of St. Stephen for about eighty years, and that of Hippo for less than two years, when St. Augustin declared that many books would have to be written in order to recount all the miracles of healing alone which had been wrought by means of these relics during this space of time in the two districts of Calama and Hippo, and that of those which had been wrought in the latter district alone nearly seventy accounts had already been written (De Civitate Dei, xxii, 8, 20). 11. By Objects brought into Contact with, or Proximity to, the Bodies of Saints, Living or Dead.—Such mira cles, according to Gregory the Great, were likely to make a deeper impression on the popular mind than those wrought by the bodies of the saints themselves, for the reason that in the latter case they might be regarded as wrought in answer to prayer, by the saint himself, whose spirit was supposed to haunt the place, and not as the former tenement. These may be further classified:

(a) The Garments or Possessions of Saints. —The tunic of St. John the Evangelist, preserved in Rome, worked many miracles; the shoes of St. Gall, A.D. 646, healed a man to whom they were given after the saint's death from an ailment of the legs; the hair of St. Jerome from contraction of the l lys; while the keys of St. Peter wrought many cures at Rome.

(2) Cloth Laid upon the Bodies of Dead Saints. —Cloths were laid upon the face of Miletilus of Antichio on the occasion of his funeral at Constantinople, in A.D. 361, and distributed among the people as prophylactics. Handkerchiefs and garments in use were cast upon relics, in order to invest them with remedial properties, and even threads which had been frayed from a handkerchief that had been used to cover the face of Ni

(a) The Candles or Lamps which Illuminated the Tomb of a Saint.

(c) The Candles or Lamps which Illuminated the Tomb of a Saint.

—The Dust which Gathered upon the Tomb, e.g., of St. Hilar of Poitiers, was the means of cleansing two lepers, of bestowing sight upon a blind person, and soundness of limb upon two persons with withered hands. Dust from the tomb of martyrs in Lyons, when gathered in a spirit of faith, cured the infirm.

(1) Water which fell from the Hands of Several persons at Tours were cured of dysentery by the water with which St. Martin's tomb was washed in preparation for Easter.

—The Fabric and Furniture of the Church which Held the Relics.—A boy suffering from the effects of a poisoned dart was cured upon kissing the threshold of St. Martin's basilica. Sidonius Apollinaris tells a friend that he lost the sense of his delirium when prostrate upon the threshold of the Vatican basilica at Rome.

(2) Raising the Dead.—A presbyter at Calamia, in Africa, laid out as dead, revived when a tunicle which had been taken to a memoria containing relics of St. Stephen was placed on his body. A wagon-wheel went over a child and killed him, his mother took him to the same memoria, "and he not only came to life again, but even appeared unhurt" (Augustine, De Civitate Dei, xxii, 8, 12).

(8) Deliverance, Protection, Succor.—This belief came into existence along with that in their curative properties, and has been quite as prevalent and deep-seated.
The Romans regarded the relics of St. Peter and St. Paul as safeguards to their city. When a band of rebellious monks, belonging to the monastery of St. Sabas, in Palestine, were on their way to attack the monastery, they were stopped by the blindness and inability of their leader to reach their destination. This deliverance of the abbots and his party was attributed to the presence of the relics of St. Sabas. In the time of Gregory of Tours, the population of several districts of Gaul were visited with a plague of an infectious character, and among them the province of Frisia, in Germany. The town of Rheims, however, escaped by virtue of the pali or covering of St. Remignia's tomb, which was carried in procession, accompanied by processions and candles, round the town. The belief in the miraculous virtues of relics led to the practice of carrying them, as the Jews their ark, into battle. The Frankish princes required their army chaplains to carry them at the head of their forces; Chilperic had them carried before him when he entered Paris, and an Eastern king, according to a story repeated by Gregory of Tours, went so far as to insert the thumb of St. Survius in his own right hand, and was able, by raising his arm, to conquer his enemies. Besides this public use of relics, many individuals were accustomed to carry them about their persons for their own protection, especially when travelling.

2. miracles consisting in (1) Those Wrought in Attainment of the Righteousness of the Innocent and the Guilt of the Wrong-doer. — Gregory of Tours relates that a priest who had taken refuge in the Church of St. Martin at Tours, and was there put into chains, was proved to be innocent by the fact that his chains fell off him, and could not be made to remain on him when replaced. On the other hand, a priest who had falsely asserted his innocence before the tomb of St. Maximin, in Treves, fell down dead.

(2) Those Wrought in Punishment of Such as Treated Relics with Disregard. — For example, the relics of St. Babylas, bishop of Antioch, had been removed at the emperor Julian's command from Daphne, where their presence was supposed to render dumb the oracles of Apollo, the temple of that god caught fire, and no traces of it were left (A.D. 354).

III. Wonders Wrought by the Exarchate. — It is a note-worthy fact that the miracles alleged to have been effected by the exarchate were wrought by it not only as a sacrament, but as that of the Catholic faith, in contradiction to the rite, and in condemnation of the doctrine of the heretical creed.

1. Miracles of Beneficence.

(1) Exorcism and Healing. — A girl possessed of an evil spirit, upon receiving the exorcist from St. Augustin of Bourges, in 624, at once ceased to shout and rave; and a singer in a church choir, having been exhausted and in a prostrate condition from a conflict with demons, revived upon receiving it from Sulpicius, bishop of the same see, in 644.

(2) Deliverance, Protection, Succor. — During the reign of Justinian it was customary to distribute among the young children of Christian parents such fragments of the eucharistic bread as remained after communion. By accident a Jewish child, mingling with his Christian companions, received and ate one of these fragments. The father of the boy, a glass-blower by trade, was so exasperated that he shut his son into his furnace, in order not only to kill him, but to destroy all traces of him. The child, however, was saved, and the miracle resulted in the conversion of the mother, who was baptized, together with her child.

2. Miracles of Power, wrought in (a) Concord of Immortality. — Gregory of Tours relates that as a deacon, a man of unholy life, was one day carrying the eucharist into a church, the bread flew out of his hands and placed itself on the altar.

(b) In Condensation of Heresy. — Certain members of the Donatist sect, in token of their contempt for the Catholics, had ordered the eucharistic bread to be given to their dogs. Upon eating it the dogs went mad and bit their masters. A woman receiving some of the eucharistic bread of the Macedonians, to her alarm found that it had turned into stone.

3. Miracles wrought by holy baptism. For example, as related by Augustine, the cure of a surgeon afflicted with the gout, and of an actor having paralysis.

IV. Wonders Wrought by Pictures and Images.

1. Miracles of Benevolence. — A picture of the Virgin Mary and St. Nimba in Pavia, was wont to shed, at the point where the hand of the Virgin was represented, a sweet-smelling ointment. The fact has been asserted, it is claimed, by many witnesses. An image of our Lord on the cross, which stood near the great gate of the imperial palace at Constantinople, was said to possess miraculous virtues, and, in fact, was believed to have wrought a cure of hemorrhage similar to that mentioned in the gospels.

The victories which Heraclius won over the Persians were attributed to the fact of his carrying at the head of his legions images of our Lord and the Virgin Mary; and the repulse of a Saracen army before the walls of Nicomedia, A.D. 718, to the possession by that city of images of the saints.

2. Miracles of Power. — A Jew stole a picture of our Lord in the church, and in token of his great hatred for the person it represented transfixxed it with a dart. Forthwith blood began to flow from the picture, and in such quantity that the Jew was covered from head to foot. Thereupon he resolved to burn it, but the blood it had shed enabled its rightful owners to trace and bring conclusive punishment upon the thief.

Images of the cross, as representatives of the true cross, on the same theory, came to be regarded as possessing the same miraculous powers.

V. Wonders Wrought by Celestial Visitations. — Whatever value is given to these wonders, they are attributed to those beings supposed to possess the holy qualities, the angelic visitants. For example, St. Cath. bert, bishop of Lindisfarne, in 687, was cured of weakness in his knee by an angel who appeared to him on horseback; and a nun in a convent at Pauvilly, in Normandy, of an ulcer in her throat, after the band of some invincible personage had been placed in support of her head, and a vision had been subsequently accorded to her of one clothed in the white robes of a virgin.

VI. Wonders Wrought Apart from Human or Angelic Agency. — Of this class of wonders, those which are best attested are least marvellous, while those which are most miraculous rest on manifestly insufficient testimony. Many of them might be looked upon as special providences, others as extraordinary coincidences; but at the time of their occurrence they were all looked upon as interpositions of Providence, intended to supply the needs or confound the enemies of the faithful. Of these we note

Many of them might be looked upon as special providences, others as extraordinary coincidences; but at the time of their occurrence they were all looked upon as interpositions of Providence, intended to supply the needs or confound the enemies of the faithful. Of these we note of the confessors, but in an old monroy it was stated as sixty.

When the emperor Marcus Aurelius was waging war against the Quadri, his troops suffered greatly on one occasion, down to the number of his soldiers being numbered by the captives. Among his soldiers were many Christians. Those who belonged to the Mamelon legion fell on their knees in prayer: a shower of rain fell, refreshing and invigorating the Roman army, but terrifying and dispersing the enemy, to whom it had been a storm of thunder and lightning. The account is given without any mention of the prayers of the Christians, and again the miracle is attributed to the prayers of the emperor.

Individuals are mentioned as having been miraculously protected. We may mention Theodosius, bishop of Tomi, A.D. 400, who became invisible to his pursuers; St. Martin of Tours, the arm of whose assailant fell powerless; Arnogastus, a young Catholic in Theodosius's service, whose limbs were freed from their bonds on his signing the cross and invoking Christ.

(2) Miracles of Power.—As an example of a primitive miracle, which rests upon ample testimony, we note the fiery eruption on the rebuilding of the Temple of Jerusalem. The emperor Julian had given orders for the rebuilding of the Temple, having intrusted the superintendence of the work to his lieutenant, and himself assisted the Jews on the day they gathered to assemble at Jerusalem and aid him in accomplishing his purpose. Of the marvellous manner in which the work was interrupted and the emperor's design thwarted, we learn the particulars from several writers. A whirlwind arose, scattering heaps of lime and sand in every direction; a storm of thunder and lightning fell, melting in its violence the implements of the workmen; an earthquake followed, casting up the foundation of the old Temple, filling in the new excavations, and causing the fall of buildings, especially the public porticoes, beneath which the workmen had sought shelter. When the workmen resumed their labors balls of fire burst out beneath their feet, not once only, but as often as they attempted to continue the undertaking. The fiery mass traversed the streets, repelling from the doors of a church, even with the loss of life or limb, those who had fled to it for safety. This miracle has the support of contemporary writers, Gregory Nazianzen (Orat. iv, 4), and Ammianus Marcellinus (Hist. xxxii, 1); and of later historians, Rufinus (Hist. i, 87), Socrates (iii, 20), Sozomen (v, 22), Theodoret (Hist. Eccl. xvi, 29). See also Watson, Julius; Gibbon, Decline and Fall, c. xxxii; Newman, On Miracles, clxxv; Migne, Dict. des M. ii, 1115.

(2) Miraculous Appearances.—Gibbon (c. xv) declares that "it is impossible to overlook the clear traces of visions and inspirations which may have been in the early fathers." The purport of visions was sometimes to allay the fears, to solve the doubts, to direct the steps of those who were in trouble or difficulty, sometimes to forewarn of approaching calamities. They were not restrained in their coming to any particular sort of persons, but appeared to all. We may classify them into

(1) Apparitions of Beings.

(a) Angels.—The appearances of the archangel Michael were numerous, both in the East and the West. An angel appeared to St. Theodotus, directing him where to erect his monastery, two angels to Fur- seius, A.D. 650, admonishing him, as abbot of a monastery, that monks should pay less attention to the mortification of the body, and more to the cultivation of an humble, contented, and charitable disposition.

On one occasion, St. Anthony, in the guise of a woman, then of a black child, as a monk with leaves in his hands, when the saint was fasting; as a spirit calling himself the power of God, and, lastly, avowing himself to be Satan.

(c) Departed Spirits.—St. Stephen appeared, A.D. 450, to Pulcheria, sister of Theodosius II, informing her of the safe arrival of his relics (right hand) from Jerusalem. St. Ambrose, on the night, being Easter eve, on which he was laid out for burial, appeared to the newly baptized infants, varying the manner of his appearance, but the result of the same: to the right of them, even when pointed out. Again, on the day of his death, he appeared to saints in the East, praying with them and laying his hands on them, while in Florence he was frequently seen after his death, praying before the altar of the church he had built in that city.

(d) Living Saints.—A child who had fallen into a well was found sitting upon the surface of the water. His account was that St. Julian Sabas, who at the time was entertained by the mother of the child, had appeared to him and borne him up. A similar story is given in the Life of Thaddæus of Palestine.

(2) Visions of PURGATORY, HELL, AND HEAVEN.—A vision the martyr Perpetua had of her brother, in whose behalf she had been led to pray, first as suffering and in a place of darkness, and then as comforted and surrounded with light, has been supposed to refer to a state of purgatory. As indicative of the punishment of the wicked, an abbot in Auvergne had a vision of a stream of fire, and of men immersed in it, bitterly moaning their sufferings. These had lost their footing when crossing a narrow bridge which spanned the stream, and perishing, that the priests might exercise the discharge of their spiritual duties. After this vision the abbot became stricter in the regulation of his monastery. Visions of heaven were accorded among others to St. Furseus and to Salvius, bishop of the Albignenses, as a place paved with gold and silver, and illuminated by a cloud shining beyond the light of sun or moon.

(3) Apparitions of Crosses.

(a) In the Air.—Constantine, when marching against Maxentius, A.D. 311, and in doubt as to what deity he should apply for succor against an enemy whose forces he saw in the middle of the camp, saw, in the camp, a luminous cross in the sky above the mid-day sun, with this inscription, "In this conquer." The same night our Lord appeared to Constantine in a vision, showed him a cross, and bade him fashion a standard after the pattern of it as a means of victory in his contest against Maxentius. This is the account given by Eusebius in his Life of Constantine (i, 28-32), but not till twenty-six years after the occurrence, and which he professes to have heard from the emperor himself, who affirmed his statement with an oath. Socrates, Theodoret, Eusebius, and Nicomachus, all describe the phenomenon as seen in the sky; Sozomen and Rufinus in a dream, although on the authority of Eusebius they also mention the apparition in the sky. On the feast of Pentecost, May 7, 351, a cross appeared in the sky at Jerusalem, stretching from Mount Calvary to Mount Olivet, and shining with a brilliancy equal to that of the sun's rays. The apparition lasted for several hours; the whole city beheld it, and all, residents and visitors, Christians and unbaptized, alike joined in the acknowledgment that "the faith of the Christians did not rest on the miraculous discourses of human wisdom, but upon the sensible proofs of divine intervention." Of this phenomenon Cyril, then patriarch of Jerusalem, wrote an account to the emperor Constantinus, who at the time was fighting against Maxentius in Pannonia, where also, according to Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. iii, 26), it was seen by the extending armies to the confusion of the pagan and the encouragement of the Christian host. Several other appearances of like character are mentioned.

(b) On the Garments of Men.—We read that when the emperor was going to enter Illyricum, his men appeared laden with unripe grapes, although the vintage had taken place, and that dew falling from them on the garments of the emperor and his companions left upon them the imprint of crosses; a phenomenon which by some was supposed to portend that the emperor should perish prematurely, like unripe grapes.
The appearance of the luminous cross in the sky, on the occasion of Julian's attempt to rebuild the Temple, was accompanied by the appearance of an animal horn offering in sacrifice, he beheld in them the figure of a cross encircled by a crown. St. Placidus, when hunting a stag, beheld amid its horns a luminous cross and the figure of the Crucified, and heard a voice saying, "Why persecuted thou me, Placidus? Behold, I am here on account of thee. I am an image of Christ, and stand in the midst of the most worship." St. Minulphe also saw a cross amid a stag's horns.

Besides the foregoing there are many other marvelous items mentioned in ancient writings, but illustrations of the leading classes have been given. For the credibility of such accounts see Miracles, Ecclesiastical.

Wood, Andrew, a Scotch prelate, was bishop of the Isles, where he continued until 1680, when he was translated to the bishopric of Caithness. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 218, 310.

Wood, Jeremiah, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Greenfield, N. Y., Nov. 11, 1801. He graduated from Union College, Schenectady, in 1824; spent over two years in Princeton Theological Seminary; began his labors at Mayfield, N. Y., Nov. 26, 1826; was ordained as an evangelist, Jan. 10, 1828, and continued his work as stated above until Mayfield until 1840. He was installed pastor at that place in September, 1841, and continued to labor there until his death, June 6, 1876. Dr. Wood was a man of clear intellect, and of unusual power in the pulpit and in debate, a wise counsellor, deeply pious, consistent in life, and successful as a pastor. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1877, p. 20.

Wood, N. N., D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Fairfax, Va., May 1, 1808. He graduated from Middlebury College, in 1833; for one year was principal of the Black River Academy; studied theology for a part of the regular course at Madison University; was ordained pastor of the Church at Lebanon Springs, N. Y., in 1835; in 1842 went to Vicksburg, Miss.; resigned his pastorate in 1845, and went to Market Street Church, Zanesville, O., where he remained until 1850, when he was called to the presidency of Shurtleff College, Upper Alton, III., holding this office until 1860. For one year after his resignation he was pastor at Palmyra, Mo.; then became a chaplain in the Union army. Near the close of the war he removed to Jacksonville, III., where, for several years, he was professor of mental and moral philosophy and logic in the Young Ladies' Athenaeum. He died there, Jan. 21, 1874. See Minutes of Illinois Amusements, 1874, p. 16. (J. C. S.)

Woodbridge, George, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal, was born in Massachusetts. He graduated at West Point, served a short period in the United States army at Old Point, and afterwards at Fort Independence, near Boston; resigned, and went to Maryland, afterward to New York City, a political newspaper. He subsequently went to the Theological Seminary at Alexandria, Va., graduating in 1833, was ordained by bishop Moore, and soon after was called to the Monumental Church, Richmond, where he remained until his death, Feb. 14, 1878, at the age of seventy-four years.

Wood-carrying. The Feast of, one of the annual festivals instituted all after the Babylonian captivity, although not mentioned in the Bible. See Festival.

I. Name of the Festival and its Significance. — The name שָׁמַיִם, שָׁמַיִית or שָׁמַיִית, which literally denotes the wood-offering, עַלְיוֹן, עַלְיוֹנָה, or its fuller phrase, עָלָיוֹנֶה יְרוּשֲׁלים, the feast of wood-offering, הַשָּׁמַיִית, or הַשָּׁמַיִית, (Josephus, War, ii, 17, 6), by which this festival is designated, is derived from Neh. x, 85; xiii, 1. It obtained its name from the fact that on the day in which it was celebrated all the people, without any distinction of tribe or grade, brought wood to the temple, being the last day in the year wherein wood could be fetched for the burning of the sacrifices and the perpetual fire on the altar. It is also denominated יָמִים אֲרָמִים, the time of wood for the priests (Megillah Tannith, v), because on this festival the priests too, like the rest of the people, offered wood.

II. The Day, and Manner of its Celebration. — The day on which this festival was annually celebrated was the 18th of Ab (28th August). This is distinctly attested by the unanimous voice of the most ancient and most trustworthy records (comp. Mishna, Taanith, iv, 8; Babylon Gemara, ibid. 80 a; Babli Bathra, 123 a; Megillah, 16a; 16b; Mishna, Rubr. 2. ivii). The remark in Josephus, that this festival was celebrated on the 14th (טְבַלְטֵּל נַחֲשַׁבִּי) of Nisan (which is the 28th of Ab), and the 13th (טְבַלְטֵּל נַחֲשַׁבִּי), is certainly an error, and the 18th of Ab, the 28th of Nisan, is more in accord with the practical life of the Jews. The 28th of Ab was the day when the harvest of the grain was gathered; and the 18th of Ab, was celebrated by the priests and Levites, as the general was the day when the sacred vessels were brought into the temple, and the priests, Levites, and all those who did not know from what they descended, as well as the families of Gibeonite, Benjamite, and of Jonathan and Jeshua (Mishna, Taanith, vii, 1). To this day, the 18th of Ab, the day of the Mgillah, was called the Day of the Harvest (Megillah, v). Hence the remark of Josephus, that on this day all the people brought wood, from which circumstance it derived its name (War, ii, 17, 6).

On this day, when all the people were thus congregated together, discarding all distinction of tribe, of rich and poor, of Israelite and proselyte, of master and slave, the maidens of Jerusalem met together for singing joyous and religious songs, and for dancing. Dressed in white garments, they paraded in order not to shame those who had none of their own, these damsels assembled together in an open place in the vineyard. They sang strophic songs in the sacred language, and danced in the presence of the congregation. It was on this occasion that the happy choice of partners was made, and the annual meeting place, since it was one of the two annual opportunities afforded to the young people of making their attractions known without violating feminine modesty (Mishna, Megilla, iv, 8). Contention from manual labor on this day was, however, not enjoined; but fasting, penitence, and prayer, concerning the dead were forbidden (Megillah Tannith, v; Maimonides, Yad, ha-Hasdnah, Bk. of Laws, Rab. on Moed, vi).
III. Origin and Date of this Festival.—The origin of this festival is involved in great obscurity, as the ancient Talmudic authorities which describe its celebration differ materially in their opinions about the occasion which gave rise to its institution. From Neh. x, 52; xii, 31, we learn that this statement, in order to supply the gap for the breaking of the Sabbath and the keeping up of the perpetual fire on the altar, ordained that each family in rotation was to furnish wood for the temple at a certain period of the year, and that the order and time of delivery were to be settled by casting lots. The result obtained by the casting of lots is not mentioned in the canonical Scriptures; but the post-canonical documents, which describe the temple service, furnish us with a minute account of both the names of the respective families upon whom it devolved to supply the wood, and the periods of the year in which they delivered it. This account is given in the preceding section of this article. It is, therefore, only natural to conclude that the different families who are thus recorded to have offered the wood at appointed times did so in accordance with the results obtained by the casting in rotation. Now, the reason why the 15th of Ab was kept as a special festival, and why all the nation at large took part in the offering of wood on this day, is, according to some authorities in the Talmud, that on it the people ceased to fell wood for the temple, because, according to R. Eliezer the Great, the heat of the day was too great for this purpose. Hence, the 15th of Ab was designated "the day on which the axe is broken." As it was also believed that the wood cut down after the 15th of Ab is unsaleable (Rosh hashanah, 2 a, 14 d), Herzfeld (Geschichte des Volkes Israel, i, 145) ingeniously conjectures that the trees were regarded as dead after this date, and the wood of such trees was considered as unfit for the altar.

The other ancient opinion about the origin of this festival is, that the furnishing of wood for the temple by the priests, which existed from time immemorial, and which Nehemiah reestablished after the return from Babylon, was prohibited by some wicked sovereign, and that this interdict was abolished on the 15th of Ab. Hence this day was constituted a festival, and the families who jeopardized their lives in stealthily supplying wood for the temple during the time of the prohibition are those named above, who, as a privilege, continued to bring some wood on this festival, whether the fuel was wanted or not. There is, however, a difference of opinion as to who this wicked monarch was. The Jewish authorities say that it will have it that it was Jeroboam who placed guards on the roads leading to the temple in order to prevent the people from taking to the sanctuary the first-fruits and wood, and the families of Gombei Ali and Kozai Keziouh, mentioned in the Mishna, who encountered the danger in clandestinely supplying the wood (Jerusalem Talmith, iv, 6). The Megillah Talmith (cap. v) again has it that this interdict proceeded from "the kings of Greece," who intimidated the conduct of Jeroboam; while the Babylonian Talmud omits the dynasty altogether, and simply remarks that Jeroboam reestablished the furnishing of wood (Talmith, 28 a). As the reference to Jeroboam on the part of the Jerusalem Talmud is simply to make this monarch the author of all the wicked deeds in connection with the Jews, and as, moreover, the ascription of this deed in the Megillah Talmith to Greek rulers is unhistorical—since Antiochus Epiphanes, to whom alone it could refer, totally abolished the temple service, which rendered it useless to smuggle the first-fruits and wood—Grätz concludes that this prohibition could only proceed from Alexander Jannæus, who forbade the offering of wood out of hatred to the Pharisees, and that then the above-named pious families clandestinely furnished the fuel. When this interdict ceased with the reign of Alexander, and the ancient custom of wood-offering was resumed, the concluding day for the delivery of it (comp. Tammith, 31 a) obtained a higher significance, and was elevated into a national festival (Grätz, iii, 477). It will be seen from the account of the nature of this festival that the custom for all the people to bring large supplies of firewood for the sacrifices of the year could not possibly have been designed to relieve the Nethinim, and that these Nethinim did not bear a conspicuous part in it, as is supposed by many.

Wooden Churches. In Walcot's Sacred Archeology (p. 614, 618), the principal facts concerning the wooden churches of the Middle Ages and a little later are given in brief.

"Neither beast, built in the time of Henry II; a chapel atbury St. Edith 14th century: St. Aldeburgh, Suffolk, about 1595; St. Stephen's, Mayence, 1011: a small Lady-chapel at Tykford, and another at Spalding, in 1609, were all built of wood, as were the New Nettlechurch churches in the county of the Greenfield, 1013; Newton, Montgomeryshire, and Newton, Worcester, in 1609, are to this day. The last may have been a genuine survival of the wooden nave-arcades. The excellence of English carpentry is manifest in the woodwork present in these very old roofs, as at Peterborough, Ely, Old Shoreham, Polebrooke, Warmington, and St. Mary's Hospital and the palace kitchen, Chichester; the Gallery Hall, now in a church, at Worcester, and St. Mary's, Reading: doors, as at Beaulieu and Larin; chosters, like the one at Windsor, of the 14th century; lych-gates, as at Beckham: windows, like those of Roughfold; stalls, as at Lancaster, and some of early English date at St. Augustine's, as at St. John's Hospital, Winchester, Blydon, Ewery, the palace chapel, Chichester, Lavenham, and St. Margaret's, Lynn; or festive stalls, as at St. John's, preserved in the 18th century. The curious "fish-scale" ornament of Norman spires is in imitation of the otter scale so common in Kent and Sussex, a clear proof that there were earlier spires of wood. Probably the Gothic stone spire was derived from Normandy, where the earliest—the pyramid of Thamns—forms a succession of steps, of the end of the 18th century, and was the prototype of Comorons, Basley, and Rosel. But England never produced such a grand example of ornamental carpentry and lead as the 'sheaf of Ailmsa.'

American churches and chapels from the first have been largely of wood; but the present tendency is towards structures built of more substantial material.

Woodford, James Russell, D.D., an English prelate, was born at Henley-on-Thames, April 30, 1820. He graduated from Pembroke College, Cambridge, in 1842; was ordained deacon in 1843, and presbyter in 1845, became incumbent at St. Mark's, Easton, near Bristol, in 1847; vicar at Kempston, Gloucestershire, in 1855; of Leeds in 1868; bishop of Ely in 1873; and died Oct. 24, 1885. He published several volumes of sermons, lectures, etc.

Woodhead, Abraham, an English clergyman, and subsequently a Roman Catholic controversial writer, was born at York in 1663, and educated at University College, Oxford, of which he became fellow in 1665, and soon after entered into holy orders. In 1661 he was proctor at Oxford, and about this time travelled on the Continent as tutor to some young gentlemen of distinction. While at Rome he was baptized a secret convert to the Catholic religion. In 1648 he was deprived of his fellowship for absence, but was reinstated at the Restoration in 1660. Finding it impossible to conform, however, he obtained leave to travel with an allowance of 200, on which he lived in concealment, teaching English and Latin to pupils, and writing controversial books, at Hoxton, near London, until his death, May 4, 1678. He was considered one of the ablest controversial writers, on the popish side, of his time, and his abilities and candor have been commended by some Protestant writers. Among his publications we note, Brief Account of Ancient Church Government (1662) — Guide in Controversies, in IV Discourses (1666) — Dr. Stillingshead's Principles (1711) — Life of St. Teresa, from the Spanish (1682) — Two Discourses Concerning the Adoration of our Blessed Saviour in the Exsultat (1687) — Of Faith Necessary to Salvation, etc. (1688) — A Comprehensive Discourse on the Exsultat, etc. (ed.) — Motives to Holy Living (ed.) — Catholic Theology (ed.) (1689) — and Concerning Images and Idolatry (ed.).

Woodland (Wοῦδον, "forests"). The groves of Palestine, inhabited by wild and even rapacious animals (2 Kings ii, 24, Jer. v, 6, xii, 8; Amos iii, 4, etc.), were, especially before the cultivation of the soil by the Israelites, not inaccessible, but not adequate to be termed wild. See Wood. In the Mosaic law there is reference to forests and their employment (Deut. xix, 5), and configurations in them are occasionally noticed (Isa. lix, x, 15; Isa. x, 17, comp. Jer. xxi, 14, James iii, 5). Several tracts of woodland are enumerated in the Bible (Rozia, Palm, p. 287 sq., Hamanwell, i, 386 sq.). See Foresst.

Woodruff, GEORGE W., D.D., a Methodist Episcopal bishop, was born in New York city, April 21, 1824. He was educated in the public schools of that city and at Oberlin, O.; joined the Methodist Church in 1847, was elected bishop in 1871, and died in 1889. His successive appointments were: Riverport, Greenhead, Flatbush, L.I.; New Britain, West Winsett, Conn.; York Street, Brooklyn, N.Y.; Danbury, Conn.; St. John Street, New Haven; Middletown; Waterbury; Hanson Place, Brooklyn; Seventh Street, Brooklyn; and 276 Broadway, New York city; First Church, New Haven; New Rochelle, N.Y.; in 1874 superintended; St. Paul's, Fall River, Mass.; Allen Street, New York city; Nostrand Avenue, Brooklyn; in 1881 superintendency. He was secretary of the New York East Conference fourteen consecutive years, and was delegate to the General Conference four times, of which body he was three times secretary. He died March 29, 1882. He was an able and effective preacher to a good pastor, and a zealous counsellor. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1882, p. 77.

Woodworth, FRANCIS C., a Presbyterian minister and author, was born at Cohocton, Col., Feb. 12, 1818. He served eight years as a printer; was educated at Oneida Institute, N.Y., graduated at Union Theological Seminary in 1840, was licensed by the Third Presbytery of New York, April 26 of that year, and ordained as pastor of the Church at St. Peter's, Seventh Street, Almshouse Church, Wall St., in the 26th of October. Here he labored three years, and then resigned, on the failure of his health, and devoted himself to juvenile literature, in which department he acquired a wide reputation. He died June 5, 1859, on board a steamer, at the wharf in New York, just arrived from Florida. He published, Uncle Frank's Home Stories (6 vols. 16mo) — Uncle Frank's Boys' and Girls' Library (6 vols. 16mo) — Uncle Frank's Picture Gallery (2 vols. 16mo) — Theodore Thinker's Stories for Little Folks (12 vols. 18mo). He also published in England, England as It Is (18mo) — Scotland It Is (18mo) — The World It Is (2 vols. 18mo) — Youth's Book of Gems (8vo) — Young American's Life of Fremont (1856, 18mo) — Uncle Frank's Pleasant Pages for the Rivetit (1857, 12mo) — A Wheat-shaef from Our Own Fields (16mo; reprinted as Seeds and Blossoms from Our Own Garden (6mo) — String of Pearls for Boys and Girls (16mo) — American Miscellany of Entertaining Knowledge (6 vols. 12mo), which is warmly commended — Youth's Cabinet, and Uncle Frank's Dollar Magazine, of which he edited about fifteen volumes, and which made him about $20,000 in small sum in many hands. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1861, p. 168; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, n. v.

WOOF (ワープ, "dye, mixture, as sometimes rendered), the cross-threads inserted into the warp in weaving (Lev. xiii, 48-59). See Weft.

Wool (Gr. ἰούκσιον, Heb. ix, 19; Rev. i, 4). The fleece of the sheep, as such, was properly called τρίχαια or χρίσια, while the material of which it was composed was called χρίσιον; hence ἱούκσιον, a fleece of wool (Judg. vi, 37).

Wool was used by the Hebrews from an early period extensively for clothing (Lev. xxi, 47; Deut. xxi, 11; Job xxxi, 20; Prov. xxxi, 18; Ezek. xxiv, 3; Hos. ii, 6) — Kitto, s. v. The importance of wool is incidentally shown by the notice that Mosea's tribute was paid in a certain number of rams "with the wool" (2 Kings iii, 4), as well as by its being specified among the first-fruits to be offered to the priests (Deut. xviii, 4). The wool of the sheep was at one time highly prized in the country of Tyre (Ezra xxviii, 18), and is compared in the Sept. to the wool of Miletus (Ipa απεικονιστα, the fame of which was widely spread in the ancient world (Pliny viii, 78; Virgil, Georg. iii, 306; lv. 334). Wool is occasionally cited as an image of purity and brilliancy (Isa. i, 18; Dan. vii, 9; Rev. i, 14), and the skins of swine are appropriately likened to it (Isa. xlvi, 16). The art of dyeing it was understood by the Jews (Mishna, Shab, 1, § 6). See Sheep, WOOLE.

Woollen and Linen (i.e. iowool and reed). Among the Mosaic laws against unnatural mixtures is found one to this effect, "A garment of mixtures of χρίσιον καὶ καθάνθατι, shall not come upon thee" (Lev. xix, 19); or, as it is expressed in Deut. xxii, 11, "thou shalt not wear kattath, wool and linen, together." Our version, by the help of the latter passage, has rendered the strange word καθάνθατι in the former, "of linen and woollen," while in Deuteronomy it is translated "a garment of divers sorts." In the Vulgate the difficulty is avoided; and in the middle ages "counterfeit," the rendering of the Sept., is wanting in precision. In the Targum of Onkelos the same word remains, with a slight modification to adapt it to the Chaldee; but in the Peshito-Syrac of Leviticus it is rendered by an adjective, "moxely," and in Deuteronomy a "moxley garment," corresponding in some degree to the Semitic phrase, which has "spotted like a leopard." Two things only appear to be certain about kattath—that it is a foreign word, and that its origin has not at present been traced. Its signification is sufficiently defined in Deut. xxii, 11. The derivation given in the English (Kadern, i, x, 8), which makes it a compound of three words, signifying "carved, spun, and twisted," is in keeping with rabbinical etymologies generally. Other etymologies are proposed by Bochart (Hieros. pt. i, h. c, 45); Simons (Lex. Hebr.), and Pfeiffer (Duk. Ver. cxx, 2; loc. xi). The last-mentioned writer defended the Egyptian origin of the word, but his knowledge of Coptic, according to Jaboniski, extended not much beyond the letters, and little value, therefore, is to be attached to the solution which he proposed for the difficulty. Jaboniski himself favors the suggestion of Forster, that a garment of linen and woollen was called by the Egyptians kattath, and that this word was borrowed by the Hebrews, and written by them in the form kattath (Opusc. i, 294). See Linen.

The reason given by Josephus (Ant. iv, 8, 11) for the law which prohibited the wearing a garment woven of linen and woollen is, that such were worn by the priests alone (see Mishna, Kiloim, ix, 1). Of this kind was the girdle (of which Josephus says the warp was entirely linen, Ant. iii, 7, 2), epidem, and broadcloth (Braunius, De Vet. Sac. Hebr. p. 110, 111) of the high-priest, and the girdle of the common priests (Maimonides, Elea ha-mo'ed, viii, 1). Spencer conjectured that the use of woolen or linen girdles in the same garment prevailed among the ancient Azabli, and was associated with their idolatrous ceremonies (De Leg. Heb. ii, 83, 3); but that it was permitted to the Hebrew priests, because with them it could give rise to no suspicion of idolatry (Maimonides, ibid.). It was found in the books of the Zabli that “the priests of the idolaters clothed themselves with robes of linen and woolen mixed together” (Towleny, Reasons of the Laws of Moses, p. 207). By “wool” the Talmudist used the word of sheep (Mishna, Kiloim, ix, 1). It is evident from Zep. i, 8, that the adoption of a particular dress was an indication of idolatrous tendencies, and there may be therefore some truth in the explanation of Maimonides. See Dives.

Woolston, Thomas, an English divine, who was noted in his day for the boldness of his opinions, was born at Thame, in Oxford-shire, in 1666. He was employed in the proper training in the grammar-school, and entered Sidney College, Cambridge, in 1685, where he subsequently graduated, and became fellow of his college. He was prosecuted before lord chief-Justice Raymond for the views advanced in his Discourses on the Miracles of Our Saviour, and was sentenced to a year's imprisonment and a fine of £100. He purchased the liberty of the rules of the King's Bench, where he continued after the expiration of the year, being unable to pay the fine. Efforts were made for his release, but were unsuccessful, because he refused to desist from offensive writings. He died in the bounds of King's Bench prison, Jan. 27, 1729. Among his principal writings are the following: The Old Apostacy for the Truth of the Christian Religion against the Jews and Gentiles Revised (1703)—Discourse of Postit Nicot ad Tiberiam Epistola (1720).—A Free Enquiry into the Clergy's Duty in an Answer to a Free Enquiry (1722—24).—Moderator Between an Infield and an Apostate (1755).—Six Discourses on the Miracles of Our Saviour (1727—28).—Defence of the Six Discourses on the Miracles of Our Saviour (1729—30).

Worcester, Councils or (Concilium Vigilantiae). Worcester is a city of England, capital of the county of Worcestershire, situated on the left bank of the Severn, twenty-five miles south-west of Birmingham. Under the name Coer Gw廓rona, it was one of the principal cities of the ancient Britons. Two ecclesiastical councils have been held there, as follows:

1. Held about 601, by St. Austin, in which he endeavored, ineffectually, to persuade the bishops of the British Church to observe the festival of Easter, to administer baptism according to the custom of the Latin Church, and to yield obedience to the Church of Rome. See Manzi, Concil. i, 1610; Wilkins, Concil. ii, 24.

2. Held July 6, 1240, by the bishop Walter of Chanteloup. Fifty-nine constitutions were published, which, among other things, enjoined to baptize conditionally in doubtful cases, but always with trine immersion. Forbids to celebrate mass before having said prime, to put on vestments when fasting, and to reserve any particular day or month for marriage. It is also ordered that any person desiring to confess to any other than his own priest, shall first modestly ask permission of the latter. See Manzi, Concil. xi, 572; Wilkins, Concil. i, 665.

Word is in Hebrew (נג), often put for thing or matter; as Exod. ii, 14, “Surely this thing [Heb. word] is known.” “Tomorrow the Lord shall do this thing [Heb. word] in the land” (ix, 5); “I will do a thing [Heb. word] in Israel, at which both the ears of every one that heareth it shall tingle” (I Sam. iii, 11); “And the rest of the acta [Heb. words] of Solomon” (1 Kings xi, 41). So likewise the Gr. ἄρμα, which properly signifies an utterance, came to denote any sensible object or occurrence.

Word of God, or, of the Lord. Sometimes Scripture ascribes to the word of God supernatural effects; or represents it as animated and active. So, “He sent his word, and healed them” (Ps. cvii, 20). Entering upon this idea, the apocryphal book of Wisdom ascribes to the word of God the death of the first-born of Egypt (xviii, 10; xvi, 26; ix, 1; xvi, 12); the miraculous effects of the manna; the creation of the world; the healing of those who looked up to the brazen serpent. In a similar sense of omnific power the centurion in the gospel says to our Saviour, “Speak the word only, and my servant shall be healed” (Matt. viii, 8). Referring to the preserving influence of divine truth, Christ says to the devil that tempted him, “Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God” (v. 4).

From these and other passages we see that the phrase “word of God” or “of the Lord” is taken (1) for that internal word heard by the prophets, when under inspiration from God; (2) for that which comes from without, externally, when God spoke to them; as when he spoke to Moses, face to face, or as one friend speaks to another (Exod. xxxiii, 11); (3) for that word which the ministers of God, the priests, the apostles, the servants of God, declare in his name to the people; (4) for what is written in the inspired books of the Old and New Testaments; (5) for the only Son of the Father, the uncreated wisdom. For the first four of these, see Bible; the last only we propose to discuss here.

I. The Logos (ὁ Ἑγεμόν) is the name given to the divine or pre-existent nature of Christ, designating him as the great medium of communication between God and man (John i, 1, 14; 1 John i, 1; v, 7; Rev. xiv, 13; comp. Heb. iv, 12). This remarkable usage of the term word, as designating not a mere attribute, but a hypostasis in some respects diverse from God, yet at the same time God himself, does not appear to have been derived from the poetical personification of “wisdom,” in Prov. viii, 12, 22; nor from the apocryphal books of Wisdom, vii, 22—26; and of Ecclesiasticus, i, 10—12; xxiv, 1—14. Even the Logos of Plato, and that of Philo, is no more than an abstraction or personification of divine power, intelligence, and wisdom. As John has united the idea of proper personality with his designation of the Logos, it is certain that he could not have derived his views from any of those writers. There is an immeasurable discrepancy between the views of John and those of the Jewish writers. The word of God in John be the same as theirs, then proper personality and divinity are out of the question. But from the passages cited it is evident that the Logos of the New Test. is a proper and real person, not a mere personification, but a philosophical, speculative, or poetical abstraction, amounting to nothing more than a poetico-rhetorical method of describing either divine attributes or divine operations or energies. In the prologue to the gospel of John, the original state or condition of the Logos, and his essential nature, are first described; and then the intellectual and essential being of himself, which he has become either in the way of creation or redemption. He is eternal; was with God; was God. As such he was the Creator of all things without exception. In particular, he was the source of all life; and as the author of spiritual life, he was the source also of all spiritual light (1 Cor. viii, 6; Col. i, 15—19; Heb. i, 2, 8). See FULLNESS.

How God communed with the first human pair in the innocence of Eden we know not; but after the first transgression his communications were in a different mode, and adapted to man's changed condition. The Logos was God revealed—communicating with his creatures, and disclosing to them the way of salvation. The various divine revelations to the patriarchs, and to others under the law, whether as the angel Jehovah, or otherwise in visions, voices, and symbols, were revelations by the Logos. So, in the tabernacle, God of old dwelt, and the shekinah, as significant of the abiding divine glory over the mercy-seat, was the symbol of his presence among his people. So also in the theophany described in Exod. iv. 1-13, in the glowing of the glory of the Logos before he became incarnate (John i. 14; xii. 41; xvii. 5). Jehovah was indeed revealed in many respects, in the Old Test.; but God as Father, and Christ as Son and Redeemer, and the Holy Spirit as Sanctifier, were, to say the most, only foreshadowed in the Hebrew Scriptures. It is the Logos manifested in the flesh, Christ the Son of God, who hath revealed God, i.e. placed the character and designs of God in the light that the gospel affords. His light shone on the darkness of all the ages which preceded his coming; but this darkness was so great that little impression was made upon it. In order to save the world from its ruinous state, the Logos became incarnate, i.e. took on him the human form and nature, and thus dwelt among men, and manifested his glory, which was truly that of the Only Begotten of the Father. Neither Moses nor any other of the prophets and other writers understood the character and designs of God in such a way as was adequate to accomplish the plan of our redemption. But he who is in the bosom of the Father exhibited grace and revealed truth in such a way as fully to satisfy our wants and meet our woes. See LOGOS.

II. The Menra (מְנַרָא).—The Chaldee paraphrases, the most ancient Jewish uncannibalistic writers extant, generally use this name (signifying word) where Moses puts Jehovah, and it is thought that under this term they allude to the Son of God. Now, their testimony is so much the more considerable, as, having lived before or at the time of Christ, they are irrefragable witnesses of the nature of the Logos. It is certain on this construction, since their Targum, or explication, has always been, and still is, in universal esteem among them. In the greater part of the passages where the sacred name occurs, these paraphrases substitute Menra Jehovah (מֵנְרַא הָיוָה), the Word of God, and as they ascribe to Menra all the attributes of deity, it is concluded that they believed the divinity of the Word. In effect, according to them, Menra created the world; appeared to Abraham in the plain of Mamre, and to Jacob at Bethel. It was to Menra Jacob appealed to witness the covenant between him and Laban: "Let the Word see between thee and me." The same Word appeared to Moses at Sinai, gave the law to Israel, spoke face to face with that lawgiver, marched at the head of that people, enabled them to conquer nations, and was a consuming fire to all who violated the law of the Lord. All these characters, where the paraphrases use the word Menra, clearly denote Almighty God. This Word, therefore, was God, and the Hebrews were of this opinion at the time when the Targum was composed. See SHEKINAH.

The author of the book of Wisdom, as above observed, expresses himself much in the same manner. He says that God created all things by his Word (Wisdom ix. 1): that it is not what the earth produces that feeds man, but the word of the Almighty that supports him (xvii. 20). This was a Word that fed the Israelites in the desert, healed them after the biting of the serpents (ver. 12), and who, by his power, destroyed the first-born of the Egyptians (xviii. 15; see Exod. xii. 29, 30), and by which Aaron stopped the fury of the fire that was kindled in the camp, which threatened the destruction of all Israel (Wisdom xvii. 22; see Num. xvi. 40). See WISDOM.

III. The Bath-Kol (בְּתַ-קֹל, the daughter of the voice).—Under this name the Talmud, the later Targums, and the rabbinical writers make frequent mention of a kind of oracular voice, constituting the fourth grade of revelation, which, although it was an instrument of divine communication throughout the early history of the Israelites, was the most prominent, because the sole, prophetic manifestation which existed during (and even after) the period of the second temple. The Midrashim and the Gemara, cited in Rabbinic Ant. Suet. pi. ii, ch. ix, severally affirm that the Bath-Kol ( Mouth of the voice which spoke to Abraham, Moses, David, Nebuchadnezzar, and others) was heard by the patriarchs than and of Jerusalem make the Bath-Kol appear in Gen. xxxviii. 26; Numb. xxvi. 6, and in other places. The treatise Sanhedrin, cited in Vitringa's Observ. Suet. ii. 336, uses the words, "From the descent of Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, the Holy Spirit (יהוה נבון), which, according to the Jewish distinction, is only the second degree of the prophetic gift) was withdrawn from Israel, but they nevertheless enjoyed the use of the Bath-Kol.

The Jewish authorities are not agreed as to what the Bath-Kol was, nor as to the precise reason of its designation. It is disputed whether the persons hearing the Bath-Kol heard the very voice from heaven, or only a daughter of it—an echo of it; whether, as thunder is often mentioned as a sign of the divine presence, and as the word voice appears to be used for thunder in Exod. ix. 25; Jer. x. 18; Psa. cxix. 8, the Bath-Kol may not signify an articulate voice proceeding out of the thunder; or whether, according to the explanation of Maimonides, "the Bath-Kol is when a man has such a strong imagination that he believes he hears a voice from without himself."

As to the meaning of the name itself, passages are cited in Buxtorf's Lex. Talm. s. v. פָּעַון, and in Rabbinic Ant. Suet. loc. cit., which show that the daughter of the voice sometimes means the echo of a sound, and sometimes merely a primary sound itself. It is certain that the Parohi has sometimes rendered the simple Greek φωνή by "daughter of the voice," as in Acts xxi. 22; 1 Tim. vi. 20; Heb. ii. 15. It is necessary, however, to remark that, according to a fundamental law of all Syro-Arabian grammar, these two words must either stand to each other in the relation of opposition or of the state construct. But as apposition can only take place between equivalent and convertible terms, which "daughter" and "voice" are not, accordingly the alternative rendering of daughter voice proposed by Prideaux and Horne, that it also has adopted, (ib. loc. cit. iv. 149) violates that rule, because, in such an English combination, the word "daughter" has the force of an adjective; and the Hebrew language, possessing but few adjectives, would have expressed the sense of daughter voice (if it had been the sense intended) be conveyed by Bath-Kol) by making Bath the last word, depending as a genitive on the former. For instance, what we render the Holy Spirit is literally "the spirit of holiness" in Hebrew. Thus, "daughter voice" is not an apposition in English, nor is it the translation of a state construct according to the Hebrew order, but of a state construct in which Prideaux has taken the liberty of transposing the dependent word, i.e. of making "daughter of the voice" become, in effect, "voice of a daughter." Jennings also, in his Juedis Antiq. p. 229, when he renders "daughter voice" as φωνή γυναίκας, only commits, in the first case, the same error more palpably, and is guilty of quite as great a violation of the first principle of Hebrew grammar as he would be, in the case of Latin, were he to translate filius vocis by "voice of the daughter."

The occasion in which it is alleged that the Bath-Kol was heard after the death of Malachi are of very various degrees of solemnity or significance. Supposing the instances mentioned in Josephus (Ant. xiii. 10), of the voice which announced to Hyrcanus that his sons had consorted with Antiochus, and (ib. xii. 40) of the awful voice which was heard in the temple, just before the capture of Jerusalem, to exclain, מֵרְבָּא יָעַבְרָא יִרְדֵּשׁ not to belong to the Bath-Kol (as it is to be observed that the pseudo-Josephus ben-Gordon has,

in these cases, merely used the Hebrew word for voice), most of the other recorded instances fall far short of these in dignity, and some appear irreconcilable with even very crenulous notions of the limits of divine interposition. Only a few of them, however, can be classified under a general description of divination as the Sortes Virgiliane, which is done in the unfair statement of Pritheas (Comenii, ii, 854). The fact is, that most Christian writers who have treated of the Beth-Kol have not been able to divest themselves of an undue desire to discredit its pretensions, in consequence of their fearing any comparison which might be instituted between it and the voices from heaven mentioned in the New Test. Indeed, Lightfoot (in his llor. Heb. 0d Mutt. iii, 17) considers all cases of Beth-Kol to be either Jewish fables or devices of the devil.
Instances of voices from heaven, on occasions outwardly very analogous to some among the Jews, are recorded in the history of the early Christian Church, as the voice which was instrumental in making Alexander bishop of Jerusalem, and that which exhorted Polycarp to be of good courage (Eusebios, Hist. Eccles. iv, 15; vi, 11).

Words of Institution are those words which were used by our Saviour when he instituted the sacrament of his body and blood, the essential parts of which are commonly held to be "This is my body" and "This is my blood of the New Testament," words found in two of the ancient liturgies.

Wordsworth, CHRISTOPHER, D.D., an English prelate, nephew of the poet, was born in 1807. He graduated from Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1830;
was elected a fellow, ordained, and in 1836 appointed public orator at Cambridge and head-master of Harrow School; in 1844 canon in Westminster, and bishop of Lincoln in 1857; a position which he held until his death, March 20, 1885. He was of the Low-church or evangelical type, and the author of numerous critical and historical works, the most important being his Holy Bible, with Annotations (Lond. 1856-75, 10 vols).

in his native place, in 1873, was suspended in 1892 on account of his great zeal, and disobedience against the magistrate, and died, as a private scholar, in 1878. He was also a voluminous writer. See Seelen, Athenae Labe-

Works (greco), "works, or deeds, of the law," is equivalent to the works which the law requires, or the entire performances of those works which the moral law, whether written or unwritten, i. e. law in general, whether applicable to Gentile or Jew, demands (Rom.
ii, 15; iii, 20; ix, 12, 22; x, 6; xi, 8; Gal. ii, 16; iii, 2, 6, 10; Eph. ii, 8). On the ground of works, i. e. of perfected obedience and therefore of merit, none can be justified, he says, "by the works of the law," and thus has the glory of God. If, then, any are justified at all, it must be of grace; but this grace, although freely bestowed and without any just claims on the part of the sinner, is still not unconditionally bestowed. Faith in him who died to save sinners is requisite to secure one for the reception of pardon; and he who is justified in this way, as a consequence of his faith, is still justified in a manner altogether gratuitous.

The reader will mark the difference between the phrase "works of the law," in the above passages, and the phrase "works of faith" or "good works." (1 Thess.
1, 3; 2 Thess. 1, 11; 2 Cor. ix, 8; Ephes. ii, 10; Col.
1, 10; 1 Tim. v, 10, 25; vi, 18; 2 Tim. iii, 17; Titus
1, 16; ii, 7, 14; iii, 1, 8, 14). In the writings of Paul, works of the law always designates the idea of perfect obedience, i.e. doing all which the law requires. But works of faith or good works are the fruits of sanctification by the Spirit of God; the good works which Christians perform, and which are sincere, are therefore acceptable to God under a dispensation of grace, although they do not fulfill all the demands of the law. On the ground of the law, Paul endeavored to show the im-habits of good works; in other words, he avers that a mere speculative faith is not a real Christian faith (James ii, 14-25). In a word, Paul has taught us that justification is not on the ground of merit, but of grace: James has taught us that a faith which will entitle one to hope for justification must be accompanied with evan-gegelical obedience. Both are true and faithful teachers; the doctrines of both are equally the doctrines of the scripture. Good works, in the gospel sense of those words, are an essential condition of our acceptance with God;
but on the ground of perfect obedience to the divine law, no one ever was or ever will be accepted. See Justification.

In an evangelical sense, good works are those actions which spring from pure principles, and are conformable to truth, justice, and propriety: whatever natural, civil, relative, moral, or religious. The phrase is often used of acts of charity. The qualities of a good work, in the Scriptural sense of the term, are, (1) That it be according to the will of God; (2) that it spring from love for God (1 Tim. i, 5); (3) that it be done in faith (Rom.
xiv, 28); (4) that it be done to the glory of God (1 Cor. x, 31; Phil. i, 11). The causes of good works are,
(1) God himself (Heb. xiii, 21); (2) union with Christ
(Heb. xii, 10); (3) through faith (Heb. xvi, 4, 6); (4)
by the will of the Spirit (Eph. ii, 8; Luke xvi, 8; 1 Tim.
iii, 16). As to the nature and properties of good works in this world, (1) They are imperfect (Eccles. vii, 20; Rev. iii, 2; (2) not meritorious (Luke xvii, 10; Titus
iii, 5); (3) yet found only in the regenerate (Matt. vii, 17). The necessary uses of good works, (1) They show our gratitude (Psa. cxvi, 12, 13); (2) are an ornament to our profession (Titus ii, 10); (3) evidence our regenerate (Job xv, 5); (4) are profitable to others (Titus iii, 8). See Gill, Body of Div. vol. iii, bk. iv.

World is the English term by which our translators have rendered four Hebrew words (in addition to the general term yhwh, or ethn., "earth"); 1. בָּרָא, chēdāb, which is erroneously sup posed by some to have arisen
by transposition of letters from בָּרָא, comes from a root which signifies "to rest, to "discontinue," and hence
"to cease from life," "to be at rest," and as a noun,
"the place of rest," the grave. The word occurs in the complaint uttered by Hezekiah, when in prospect of dissolution, and when he contemplates his state among the inhabitants, not of the upper, but the lower world (Isa. xxxiv, 13); the language with which other passages to show that the Hebrews, probably borrowing the idea from the Egyptian tombs, had a vague conception of some shadowy state where the manes of their departed friends lay at rest in their ashes, retaining only an indefinable personality in a land of dreariness and "a shadow of death" (Isa. xxvii, 21, 22). 2. בָּרִית, chēde (Psa. xiiii, 14), means "to con-
cess," and derivatively "any hidden thing," hence
"age," "antiquity," "remote and hidden ages;" also
"the world," as the hidden or unknown thing (Psa.
xxxix, 1). 3. בָּרָכָה, oldam (in the New Test. αἰών), the root-signification of which is "to hide," denotes a very remote, indefinite, and therefore unknown period in time past or time to come, which metaphysicians call eternity a part ante, and eternity a part post (Eccles.
iii, 11). In Ps. lxxiii, 12, it is rendered “world,” but in this and in the previous instance it may be questioned whether the natural creation is really meant, and not rather “the world” in our metaphorical use of the term, as denoting the intelligent inhabitants of the earth, and still more specifically that portion of them with which we are immediately concerned.

4. ἐκείνος, τὸδὲ (the usual word so rendered the Greek ἔκεινος), comes from a root that signifies “to flow,” and as water is the unceasing source of fertility in the East, it denotes “to be productive,” “to bear fruit,” and as a metaphor, “to be the nourisher,” of the earth. This word is frequently rendered “world” in the common version, but if more was intended than the earth on which we dwell, it may be doubted if the passages in which it occurs will justify the translators.

In truth, the Hebrews had no word which comprised the entire visible universe. When they wanted to speak comprehensively of God’s creation, they joined two words together and used the phrase “heaven and earth” (Gen. i, 1). We have already seen that they had an idea of an under world; the meaning of their ordinary term for earth, הַבָּלָה, signifies the “beneath,” and that they also regarded the earth beneath the sun; while the term for heaven, הַבָּלָה, denoting “what is elevated,” indicates that their view was that the heavens, or the heights, were above. Above, below, and under—these three relations of space comprehend their conception of the world. See Earth; Heaven.

The following Greek words are also translated “world:” 1. κόσμος, kosmos, the world, universe (Matt. xiii, 35; xxiv, 21; Luke xi, 50; John xvii, 5, 24; Acts xxiv, 24; Rom. i, 20); the inhabitants thereof (1 Cor. iv, 9); also the earth, as the abode of man (Matt. xiii, 38; Mark xvi, 15; John i, 9; iii, 19; vi, 14; xxii, 29; Acts iv, 28; v, 13; Matt. v, 20; Matt. xiv, 11; 17; Acts v, 8); 2. the inhabitants of the earth (Matt. v, 14; John i, 29; iii, 16; xvii, 14, 25; Rom. iii, 6, 19; Heb. xi, 7; 2 Pet. ii, 5; 1 John ii, 2); 3. the multitude, as we say “everybody” (John vii, 4; xii, 19; xxiv, 22; xviii, 20; 2 Cor. i, 12; 2 Pet. ii, 5); and the other world (Rom. xi, 12, 15). It likewise designates the state of the world, as opposed to the kingdom of Christ (Matt. xvi, 26; Mark viii, 36; John xvii, 8; 1 Cor. iii, 22; v, 10; Ephes. ii, 2; Gal. vi, 14; James iv, 4) and men of the world, worldlings (John xii, 31; 1 Cor. i, 2; iii, 19; 2 Cor. vii, 10; 1 Thess. ii, 15; also the Jewesh dispensation, founded on Sinai and ended on Calvary (Ephes. i, 4; 1 Pet. i, 20; Heb. ix, 7). 2. Oikoosmos, Οἰκοκόματος, the inhabited earth, the world as known to the ancients (Matt. viii, 4; xviii, 14; Luke iv, 5; Rom. x, 18; Heb. i, 6; Rev. xvi, 14); also the inhabitants of earth (Acts xxi, 31; xix, 27; Rev. iii, 10; xii, 9); the Roman empire (Acts xxiv, 6; xxiv, 5); Palestine and the adjacent countries (Luke ii, 1; Acts xi, 28). 3. Ἀιών, Ἄινός, the world, or age, the present time, or the future, as implying duration (Matt. xii, 32; Mark x, 30; iii, 28, 29; Luke xviii, 30); the present world or age, with its cares, temptations, evils, etc. (Mark xviii, 22; Luke vi, 8; xx; 24; Rom. xii, 2; 1 Cor. i, 20; ii, 6, 8; 2 Cor. iv, 2; 2 Tim. iv, 10; Tit. ii, 12; Gal. i, 4); and men of the world, wicked generation (Ephes. ii, 2; Luke vi, 8; xxv; 34; also the world itself, as an object of creation and existence (Matt. xxi, 37; xiii, 58); the earth, the earth (Acts vi, 31). This term also denotes the age or world before the Messiah, i.e. the Jewesh dispensation (1 Cor. x, 11; Heb. ix, 26); also, after the Messiah, i.e. the Gospel dispensation (Heb. ii, 5; vi, 5). See Cosmogony.

5. The Christian phraseology, the world is taken also for a secular life, the present state of existence, and the pleasures and interests which steal away the soul from God. The love of the world does not consist in the use and enjoyment of the comforts God gives us, but in an inordinate attachment to the things of time and sense. We love the world too much (1)

when, for the sake of any profit or pleasure, we wilfully, knowingly, and deliberately transgress the commands of God; (2) when we take more pains about the present life than the next; (3) when we cannot be contented, patient, unambitious, and inconceivable circumstances; (4) when we cannot part with anything we possess to those who want, deserve, and have a right to it; (5) when we envy those who are more fortunate and more favored by the world than we are; (6) when we honor and esteem and favor persons purely according to their beauty, or extent, and success, measuring our judgment and approbation by their outward appearance and situation in life; (7) when worldly prosperity makes us proud and vain and arrogant; (8) when we omit no opportunity of enjoying the good things of this life; when our great and chief business is to diversify ourselves till we contract an indifference for rational and many occupations, deceiving ourselves, and fancying that we are not in a bad condition because others are worse than we (Isa. x, 3). See Hopkins, On the Vanity of the World; Sextus, Sermon on Conformity to the World; More, On Education, vol. ii, ch. 9; Walker, Sermons, vol. iv, sect. 20.

World is the rendering in the A. V. of several Hebrew and one Greek word.

1. סד (2Q7from its leaping; Sept. σαρξ; Vulg. timus) occurs only in Isa. ii, 8, “For the αἰων (2Q8 moth) shall eat them up like a garment, and the סד shall eat them like wool.” The word probably denotes some particular kind of moth, whose larva is injurious to wool, while perhaps the former name is the more general one for any of the destructive αἰων, or “clothes-moths.” See Moth.

2. Ῥιμρῶν (2Q9, of uncertain etymology: Sept. σαληθής, σαληθοφρία; Vulg. vermis, patredo, timex) occurs except in Exod. xvi, 11; Job vi, 5; xvi, 11; xxv, 20, 26; xxvii, 15; xxxiv, 11; xxxv, 5, 11; Ps. xliii, 9; also the putrid substances, or putridity itself. The Hebrew word points evidently to various kinds of maggots, and the larvae of insects which feed on putrefying animal matter, rather than to earth-worms. Job, under his heavy affliction, exclaims, “My flesh is clothed with Ῥιμρῶν” (Job vii, 5; see also xiv, 12). There is no reason to doubt that the expression is to be understood literally; a person in Job’s condition would very probably suffer from מושו from some kind. In Job xxvi, 21; xxiv, 20, there is an allusion to worms (insect larve) feeding on dead animals. In Jer. vi, 8, 17; xxi, 6, 11; and Ezek. x, 15, 16; 3; 1 Macc. vi, 6), Our translators, in the well-known passage (Job xix, 26)—“And though after my skin worms destroy this body”—have over-interpreted the words of the original, “My skin shall have been consumed,” for there is no mention of worms whatever in the original. These passages, and especially the last, have contributed to the popular impression that the human body, when buried in the grave, is consumed by worms. The Oriental method of burial in wrappings, and of depositing the corpse in caves, etc., would go some way toward affording the spectacles of the human body devoured by the larve of different insects; but the allusions in Scripture to such sights do not apply to burial elsewhere, except where the body is buried in a wooden coffin only, in vaults which have communications with the external air, when swarms of a species of fly, of a certain aspect, insinuate themselves between the lid and lower part of the coffin, and their larve enter the corpse within, while the adult insect sports in the lurid atmosphere of the vault.

3. The distinctive term is τὸ ἐκείνον (τὸ ἐκείνον; Exod. xvi, 20; Isa. i, 18; Lam. iv, 8), or (fem.) toleth, ἐκείνη (τὸ ἐκείνη; Deut. xxviii, 89; Job xxv, 6; Ps. xxvi, 6; Isa. xiv, 11; xii, 14; lxvi, 24; Jonah iv, 7; besides the use of the latter in connection with τὸ ἐκείνον, altogether rendered “scarlet” [q.v.]), yet it often stands in parallelism with the preceding term. The mAnna that the disobedient Israelites kept till the morning of a week-day "bred worms" (יוֹנָה), and stank (Exod. xvi. 20); while of that kept over the Sabbath and gathered the next day, it is said that it "did not stink, neither was there any worm (ינוֹן) therein." The patriarch uses both terms in Job xxxv. 6, where he compares the estate of man to a vin mandak, and the son of man to a toledak. Homer also compares a man of inferior condition to a worm (οὐράκλεις)

(II. ii. 564). "יוֹנָה" is applied to that which preys on human flesh (Job xiv. 11; lxvi. 24); on vegetables, as on the gourd of Jonah (Jonah iv. 7); and on vines (Deut. xxvii. 89). The ancient Hebrews applied such words as indeterminately as the common people now do the words "worm," "fly," and "spiders." Similar indiscriminate references are made by the Sept. and Vulg. renderings.

Aristotle also applies the word σκάλμα to the larva of any insect—τὰ ὑπὸ πάντα σκάλμα γίνονται,—"all insects produce a worm" (H.S. Anim. v. 19).

The insect which the manna is said to have "bred, when kept till the morning" (Exod. xvi. 20, 24), whatever it is, must be considered as miraculously produced as a punishment for disobedience, since the substance now understood to be the same is kept good for weeks and months, nor did the specimens laid up in the ark breed worms. See MANKA.

It is alluded to as an injurious vines and grapes (Deut. xxviii. 89; יונה, σκάλμα, ρημία). The Greeks had a distinct name for this insect, and probably as early as the Sept. translation of Exodus was made, γατα and Ιησοῦ (Theophrastos, De Carv., iii. 27).

It was called by the Latins incoloctus, comoleolus, and rcolece (Plantus, Cistek. acq. iv. sec. 2; Pliny, Hist. Nat. xvi. 29).

Rossmatmuller thinks it was the Scarrantis hortillus, or the Scarrantis hortillius, which the Greeks called the Pyralis vittata, or Pyralis fasciata. Various kinds of insects attack the vine, among which one of the most destructive is the Tortrix viridana, the larva of which, when at rest, covers the inner part of the blossoms, the clusters of which it binds together by spinning a web around them. A species of beetle, Lethrus cephalotes, is injurious to the vines of Hungary; other species of beetles do similar mischief (ρυχαέθες, βελεβειη, κονιακός). Vine-leaves in France are frequently destroyed by the larva of a moth, Tortrix vittana. In Germany another species does great injury to the young branches, preventing their expansion by the webs in which it encloses them; and a third species, Tortrix fasciata, makes the grapes themselves. See Kirby and Spence, Intro. to Entomology (1829), p. 205. It may serve as an illustration of the looseness of popular diction respecting insects to remark that what the farmers call "the fly" in the turnip is in reality a small species of jumping beetle, for which turnip-fly would be a more appropriate name.

The "gourd" of Jonah is said to have been destroyed by "a worm" (Jonah iv. 7; יִנָּה, σκάλμα, ρημία).

The identity of the gourd with the Ricinus communis has been thought to be well established (see Goëuri, and Rumphius (Herbar. Ambrosiana, iv. 85) testifies to the ravages of a species of black caterpillar upon it. These are produced, he says, in great quantities in the summer, feeding on the leaves of the Palmus Christi, and gnaw its branches to the pith in a single night (Michaels, Suppl. ad Lex. Hebraic. 2187). Allusive to the worm in wood occurs in the Sept. of Prov. xii. 4, and xxvii. 20: וּנָא אֲדֹנָי σכָלָם; Vulg. reum, which words have no corresponding translation in their present Hebrew text (see Vulg. of 2 Kings xxiii. 8, 8).

It is possible that the word יונָה was also given as a proper name; thus "Tola" occurs among the descendants of Issachar (Gen. xvn. 18), and was also the name of a person of the same tribe (Judg. x. 1).

Bochart conjectures that the name was given to these children by their parents because the tribe of Issachar was one of the meanest, and they were themselves in need of circumstanced, or that these were very sickly children when born. He remarks, however, that the first Tola became a great man, a leader of the Tolaites (Numb. xxvi. 29), who, in the days of David, amounted to 22,600 (1 Chron. vii. 2), and that the latter judged Israel twenty years (Judg. x. 1, 2).

5. The usual Greek word for worm is σκάλμα. In 1 Macc. ii. 62, "Fear not the words of a sinful man, for his glory shall be dust and worms," instead of σκάλμα, "dung," should be read σκαρία, "rottenness," as in the Sept. of Job vii. 5, xxv. 6, and also in Eclus. ix. 8, "Moths and worms shall have him that cleaveth to harbors," instead of σίφης, "moths," read σκαρία, "rottenness."

"Worm" occurs in the New Test. in a figurative sense only (Mark ix. 44, 46, 48), "Their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched;" words borrowed from Isa. lxvi. 24, which originally relate to a temporal state of things, but which had also become, in the Lord's eyes, the proper representation of future punishment (Judg. xvi. 17, Eclus. vii. 17). See TOR. Origin here understands "worm" in a metaphorical sense, as denoting the accursed of conscience; but Austin, Chrysostom, Cyril of Alexandria, Theophylact, etc., contend that the word should be understood literally.

The death of Herod Agrippa I was caused by worms (αἰχμαλοφόρος, Acta xii, 23); according to Josephus (Ant. xiv. 8, 2), his death took place five days after his departure from the theatre. It is curious that the Jewish historian makes no mention of worms in the case of Agrippa, though he expressly notes it in that of Herod the great (Ant. xvii. 6, 5; War, i. 83, 6). A similar death was that of Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Macc. ix. 9; see also Eusebius, Eccles. Hist. viii. 16; Lucian, Prede- mone, i. 904; comp. Wetstein on Acta xii, 23). Whether the worms were the cause or the result of the disease is an immaterial question. The "angel of the Lord struck Herod" with some disease, the issue of which was fatal, and the loathsome spectacle of which could not fail to have had a marked humiliating effect on his proud heart. It has been attempted to explain all these cases of phthisis, or the losey disease, but the conjecture is inconsistent with the words employed in the several narratives; and since they are instances of persons being devoured by worms while alive, contrary to the order of nature, we are compelled to ascribe them to an agency from divine or infernal sources. At all events, the larvae in Herod's case were internal. On the other hand, the cruel Pharaoh, the wife of Battus, whose horrid vengeance is detailed by Herodotus (Hist. iv. 202, 204), is described by him as dying under a disease which, from the term the word, must have been peculiarly terrible. "She died miserably; for even while alive she was covered with maggots. So odious to the gods are the excesses of human vengeance." The word γλύκα, which the father of history employs in this passage, is generally considered as synonymous with σκάλμα, inasmuch as it signifies the maggots or larvae produced by the carrion-eating flies; but the two terms are not equivalent, since the Greek σκάλμα has a wider meaning, including all insect larvae without an exception (Arist. Hist. Anim. ii. 1). For the account of insects infesting the distasteful worms which are often so much affected with disease, see Spence, Intro. to Entomology, i. 84; Hartholin, Morb. Bibl. c. 23; Mead, Bibl. Divers. c. 15.

There are several species of earth-worms (lambrius) in Palestine similar to our own, but by far the most abundant of the so-called worms there are the myriapods, or millipedes, especially the euscolus, which appear to perform the functions of the earth-worm in

Worms is a city of Germany, in Hesse, province of Rhein- Hessen, on the Rhine, twenty-six miles south-east of Mainz. It was formerly an imperial city, and is very ancient, having existed before the arrival of the Romans. Three ecclesiastical councils have been held there, as follows:

I. Was held in 829. Several regulations were published, one of which condemns the ordeal by cold water; a decree written by Agobard against these practices is still extant.

II. Was held May 18, 868, in the presence of Louis of Germany, to which all the bishops of his kingdom were cited. Having drawn up a confession of faith, in which the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father and the Son was clearly stated, the council proceeded to publish forty-four canons.

1. Forbids to administer holy baptism except at Easter and Whitsun, unless in a case of necessity.

2. Orders that the churl be consecrated by the bishop only.

3. Forbids bishops to exact any fee or present for the consecration of a church; also forbids them to consecrate any church except there being a writing under the hand of the founder, constituting the foundation, and specifying what endowment he has given.

4. Forbids to offer upon the altar for the eucharist any thing save bread, and wine mixed with water. States that wine and water should be used, "qua vidae in aqua populo intelligi, in vino vero oenologi sacram Christi," and thus, by the union of the water with the wine, the union of Christ with his Church.

5. Restates the regulations of St. Gregory, upon the subject of single and triple immersion.

6. Gives to the bishop, and not to the founders, the disposal of the revenues of new churches.

7. Orders that all offerings and revenues belonging to a church be divided into four portions—one for the bishop, the other three for the church according to their zeal and diligence, the third for the poor, and the last to the fabril.

8. Orders the celibacy of the clergy.

13. Forbid excommunication, without weighty and sufficient cause, and declare that the bishop or excommunicating without sufficient cause shall be deprived of the communion of the neighboring bishops.

15. Declares that when a robbery shall have been committed in any monastery, the thief being unknown, the abbot or some other priest shall celebrate mass, at which all the inhabitants shall attend, in order by this to prove severally their innocence.

16. Excommunicates bishops who refuse to attend synods, or who retire before the conclusion of business.

17. Orders bishops keeping sporting dogs, or birds, to be excommunicated three months; a priest two; and a deacon, one.

18. Excommunicates and suspends priests who refuse to obey their bishops.

22. Forbids those who, having been in their infancy offered up for sale, or some money paid for the service of God, and who have accordingly been brought up to the regular life, when they come to the age of puberty, to renounce their religious life and return into the world.

26. Declares that a man who has murdered a priest shall not eat meat nor drink wine, but fast on every day, except festivals, till the evening; that he shall not carry arms, nor go except on foot, nor enter a church, nor sit in the church, nor enter the church, but shall still be received to communion. At the expiration of ten years he may be received, but shall fast the whole week to his life's end.

25. Orders that a madman who has killed any one shall be put to a light penance should he ever recover his senses.

31. Orders that the holy eucharist be given to lepers.

See Mansi, Conc. viii., 341.

III. Was held Sept. 8, 1122. It was settled that all elections and changes were to be freely conducted according to the laws of the Church, but under the supervision of the emperor; and that the right of spiritual investiture by ring and staff belonged to the pope, while that of secular investiture with the sceptre was conceded to the emperor. This agreement was confirmed by the first general council of Lateran in 1123.

WORMS, DIRT OF, was held in 1221; for an account of which see LUTHER.

WORMS, EDIT OF, was the edict passed at the diet of Worms, which declared Luther a heretic and schismatic.

WORMS, RELIGIOUS COUNCILS OF. (This title applies to two conferences held at Worms, in Germany, in the 16th century, for the purpose of effecting a reconciliation between the Romish and Protestant parties in the German states.)

I. The first Colloquy of Worms formed a link in the long series of negotiations by which it was intended to render a covenant to the sword unnecessary. It is certain, that the desire for peace was very sincere, whether the situation be regarded in its religious or its political features. The Augsburg Confession, though the ultimate of the Protestant party at the time, was yet intended as a new basis upon which to enter into the whole Church, rather than a separate party, might stand. The Romanists conceded the need of reforms in the Church, and a spirit of improvement seemed disposed to assert itself even in the immediate vicissitudes of the pope. The emperor, also, though emphatically rejecting the demands of the Evangelical party, evinced an intention to make some concessions in important matters. It was natural, therefore, that the Protestants should indulge the hope of ultimate reconciliation, however strongly a few of the more sagacious minds among them might insist that no solid peace could be thus secured. In its political bearings, the Augsburg Confession led to the formation of the Small kald League (q. v.), an alliance intended to be wholly defensive in its nature, but nevertheless constituting a powerful influence in favor of peace, by reason of the general complication in which the affairs of the empire were involved. The result of these conditions was an alternation of warlike preparations with efforts to preserve the peace, continued through more than a decade of years.

The Reformation had been able, in about twenty years, to influence even the regions previously regarded as the strongholds of Romanism, and seemed likely to obtain control of the whole of North Germany. A majority of the electoral college, too, was on its side. These facts, coupled with the pressure brought to bear by the immense operations of the Turks on the one hand, and the hostile attitude of France on the other, compelled the emperor to give respectful attention to Protestant grievances and demands, and to arrange for a conference which should attempt a reconciliation upon disputed matters of doctrine, such as had been suggested in 1539. The assembly was appointed to meet at Speyer, April 2, 1540, but was compelled by an epidemic to convene at Hagenau instead, in June of that year. A preliminary meeting of Romanists, called by king Ferdinand, had been held in May, however, in which Morone, the papal legate, aided by the emperor and king, who imagined the holding of a national council to be contrary to the interests of the empire, was able to start a train of influences which led to the breaking-up of the Hagenau Conference before it had fairly begun. The emperor's necessities, however, compelled its revivalization, and a decree rescinded all its decisions. As a consequence, the princes were represented by their political and theological agents. Rome was represented by Campeggio, brother to the cardinal, and bishop of Feltre, whose diplomatic ability was equal to the task of preventing the success of this renewed attempt to secure a national council. He proposed that each party should have but one vote, instead of being permitted to secure victory by a majority of individual voices, both of which measures were rejected. Granvelle's proposition, however, that a single theologian from either party should represent his side, but that any member of the conference should be at liberty to add whatever he might deem proper, was rejected by the nuncio, and afterwards admitted only with the proviso that such additions might be made by a majority of either party only, a minority being allowed to submit their objections in writing to the president and the imperial orator. Discussions respecting such matters of form occupied the whole of December. The business of the conference began Jan. 2, 1541. Melancthon and Calvin were prominent on the Protestant side, and the former was opposed to his familiar antagonist, Eck, the dispute beginning with the charge, advanced by Eck, that the alterations made in the Augsburg Confession marked a departure from the original ground of that instrument, and the response by Melancthon that the changes made had respect merely to the form and mode of expression. The calumnies of original sin was again taken in hand, but with no result, as might have been expected from a dispute to which a man like Eck, whose vanity would permit no rejection even if he were defeated, was a party. The conference was thus fruitlessly occupied from Jan. 14 to 17, and on the following day an imperial rescript brought the Conference of Worms to a close, and transferred its business to Ratisbon, where a diet of the empire had begun to assemble. The result of that congress demonstrated completely the impossibility of a peaceful settlement of existing differences, and the sequel was marked by clouds of strife, which ultimately burst in the Smalkald war.

Documents relating to the first Colloquy of Worms are quite fully given in Corp. Reform. iii, 1142—iv, 90. See, in addition, Raynald, ad ann. 1540, 47—59; Sackendorf, Hist. Luth. iii, 21, § 79, 80; Salzig, Hist. d. Augsburg Conf., i, bk. iii, 2, § 3, 4; Ranke, Deutsch. Gesch. im Zeitalter d. Reformation, iv, 151 sq.; Herzog, Reut-Eck., s. v.

II. The Colloquy of 1557 was the last in the series of fruitless endeavors to bring together the now composed parties of the German Empire. Its principal importance, however, consists in its bearing upon the internal conditions of the Protestant Church itself. The religious peace of Augsburg had secured the external interests of that Church for a time; but the rise of Fianism originated most bitter controversy within its own pale, whose subject was the Augsburg Confession, the union of which the Evangelical Church based its right to recognition itself. There was consequently no desire among theologians for a religious congress, particularly such a congress as was called for by the resolution made at the assembly in 1556, to convene the following year. There was, however, a colloquy between the adherents of the Roman Catholic faith and of the Augsburg Confession should be held. Statesmen, for their part, had learned by repeated experiences to regard such measures as wholly unsuited to accomplish the end in view and give the desired rest to Church and country. The wish of king Ferdinand, however, decided the case, and the colloquy was fixed for August 1557. A previous diet of Protestant princes was convened at Frankfurt, for the purpose of attempting a reconciliation of parties in the evangelical camp, but without result; and the representatives of Ernestian Saxony went to Worms instructed to labor that a solid front might be presented to the Roman Catholic foe, but to make the utterance of the Fianian scholastic the condition of any unity that might be reached. The arrival of the delegation from electoral Saxony was delayed, and the Fianianists used the opportunity thus afforded to attempt the proselytizing of the representatives of other governments as they arrived; but in this respect their success was very imperfect. An attack directed against Melancthon in his absence failed to modify the theologians of Weimar was equally without satisfactory result, and even led to threats of excluding the troublesome party from the colloquy, the occasion being marked with great violence and passion. A written condemnation of the corruptors of the Augsburg Confession was finally placed in the hands of the Protestant assessor, with the reservation of liberty to publish the paper if it should become necessary. Melancthon, against whom all those efforts were principally directed, endeavored to harmonize the conflicting elements, and even drew up a formula of consensus, which amounted to a retraction of the points offensive to Fianianists, but was thwarted in his purpose to restore peace by the obstinacy of others, particularly the Wirtembergers.

In the absence of the princes king Ferdinand had appointed the bishop of Spires to preside at Worms, and when that prelate became sick he substituted for him the bishop of Naumburg. Julius von Pflug, the only person, perhaps, besides Melancthon, who cherished a real desire for reconciliation. Pflug was supported by Seldius, the royal vice-chancellor, and each party had its assessors, Audenot and Dreyden, the principal collectors were Melancthon, Brennus, Mörlin, Schneit, etc., on the Protestant, and the theologian Canisius and the pervertus Staphylus and Wycillianus (qu. v.) on the Romish, side. A preliminary meeting, for agreement on the methods to be observed in the discussion, was held in September, which, however, served only to begin the series of difficulties encountered in the progress of the conference, and to foreshadow its failure. Melancthon made a preliminary statement, unequivocally based on the Augsburg Confession, in behalf of the Protestant party; and Siidius, speaking for the other party, proposed to the resolution of authority by which to test questions of doctrine, etc. The Romanists proposed and insisted on the Consensus Patrum as such a standard, but the Protestants interposed a formal quarrel against the proposition. The attempt to ignore the fundamental character of this difference, made by introducing and proceeding to discuss the doctrine of original sin, met with failure; and as it was now evident that no agreement could be reached where the opposing principles were so fully destructive of each other, the Roman party adopted the tactics of exciting quiet among their opponents, which should hasten the adjournment of the conference. Canisius called attention to the many alterations made in the Augsburgan, and Siodius demanded that the evangelicals should declare whether Zwinglinians and Calvinists on the sacraments, Osdianians on justification, Fianists on the De Serro Arbidario and good works, and the Picardi on many points, were judged to be beyond the pale of the Augsburg Conference. The Weimar theologians now submitted their hitherto unpublished protestation to the president and the Roman councillors, despite the opposition of the Protestant assessors and the threat that they should be excluded from the congress. Duke John Frederic the Intermediate attempted, by personal intercession, to influence Melancthon to favor the Weimar party, but that theologian could lay the blame for the failure of the colloquy no other door than that of the Weimar delegation, and was, besides, too closely united with the Württembergers to become the ally of Weimar. The Freckmantips thereupon wrote to Puff to explain their objections and to protest against their exclusion from the congress; and the Romanist assessors, etc., voted against the continuation of the colloquy, on the ground that it was no longer possible to determine the party with which the dispute ought, by the terms of the Ratisbon decree, to be held. Both protestations were officially acknowledged by Puff, Oct. 6. Duke Christopher of Saxony sent other theologians, but the Romanists persisted in their refusal to dispute. A delegation of French Protestants arrived at this precise juncture to invite the good offices of their coreligionists. It is said that Christian had induced the hundred learned and thirty-five members of the Evangelical Church in Paris, and their arrival complicated matters by raising the question whether adherents of the Augsburg Confession could properly take action in favor of members of the Reformed churches; and the difficulty was still further aggravated by a violent controversial sermon, with which George Major, at Leipzig, responded to the charges submitted by the Weimarianus at Worms. The protest rendered Oct. 21 by the evangelical party, in which they charged the failure of the colloquy upon the Romanists, though not signed by any of its author- isms, was yet neutralized by the irreconcilable differences which were thus shown to exist among its alleged supporters, and elicited no response. All the papers relating to the colloquy were sent to Ferrand, and the high mass of the congress scattered. A formal protest was received, Nov. 16, ordering, if possible, a renewal of the colloquy, in which the Weimar theologians should be allowed to participate, and in connection with which the Roman party should be satisfied with a general profession of adherence to the Augsburg Confession on the part of the Romanists. A long series of protests and responses was the result of this order, whose persistency, finally exhausted even the patience of Puff. He forwarded the whole collection to the king, and reported the impossibility of securing the results desired from a disputation. The last official attempt to unite the two opposing religious parties of Germany was ended.

For documentary sources, see Corp. Reform., vol. ix, and Raynal, ad ann. 1857, No. 81, 35. The most thorough presentation of the colloquy is that of Salig, Hist. d. WORMWOOD, STAR OF (aσσ) aσσενς, Rev. viii, 10, 11), the Apocalyptic appellation for the national demon of Egypt, set forth in the vision of Patmos as a luminous animal preying over "the third part of the world." The vocation of this star was to destroy by poison, not by fire, sword, or famine. The "Sericulism," "poison in Egypt," is put in opposition to food or "fern in Ephraim" as the symbol of blasphemy and idolatry (Hab. Talmud, Mekoroth, fol. 83, 1). Philo also, speaking of Helicon, "the scorpio-like slave," represents him as having cast upon Egypt the double ligates to the dwellers in Palestine (De Lepet, p. 102, ed. Turenbe). Daniel gives a clear intimation of his acquaintance with the prevalent belief that, like Persia, Greece, and Judaea, every nation had a celestial prince or patron, "Mess sanc, or sit" (Dan. x, 21). This "star lamela," "prince of high," of the rabbinic has also a representative image in the material firmament (rabbi Sibonites of A. xiv, 1), some ήδειον, kēdēl glittering son of the morning (Isa. xiv, 12), or "light of lights" (mos' rād) among the splendid stars or intercessors above (Melitum, Ezek. xxiiili, 78), who were "darkened" when Pharaoh was extinguished. Eusebius (Democr. Eroic. iv, 8, 10) and Iamblichus (De Απόστολοι Μυστερία, § 7, c. 25) both mention "the seed of heaven preyer" over the nations and rabbi Simeon, the chief of the Gallican synagogue in his day, affirms that "before God wreaks his vengeance on a people he punishes their prince, because it is written, 'The Lord shall punish the host of the high ones on high,' and then follows, 'down to the earth upon the earth'; and moreover, it is written, 'How art thou fallen, O Lucifer, son of the morning.' " (Comment. in Isa. xiii, 13). Hence, as the literal fulfilment of Isa. xxiv, 21, the Jews yet anticipate "the extirpation of all the Gentiles, with their princes on high and their (god- tailed) gods" (Nitzkow, p. 255, in Wagenseil's Teia (Rommun)).

John seems to employ this symbol of Egyptian poison and bitterness, as the prototype of a great anti-Christian power, which would poison and embitter the pure word and its bearers. He had introduced the hundred laden golds, converting them into "wormwood," mitserēm being a figure of apostasy and rebellion. See STAR.

Woronics, Jan PawaL, an eminent Polish prelate and writer, was born in 1575. He was educated at a Jesuit seminary, entered that order at an early age, and on its abolition, in 1772, entered the Society of Missionaries of Jesus. In the composition of important literary services rendered bishop Cholm, then vice-chancellor, he was rewarded with the deanship of Lwow. In 1785 he retired to the small town of Kazimierz, and took upon him the duties of a parish priest. When the encyclical of Joseph was formed, in 1808, he was living in it, both as a member of the council and dean in the chapter of the cathedral. In 1815 he became bishop of Cracow, and in 1827 archbishop of Warsaw and primate of Poland. Going abroad for medical advice, he died at Vienna, Oct. 16, 1829. He published, among other works, Šibila, a poem; Šem Haliczek, or the Prophetess, in the style of a poem. His sermons were published at Cracow in 1829, under the title of Kazikow, eszki Nauki Pxsorslawe.

Worrell, Charles Flavel, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Chester County, Pa., June 30, 1805. He graduated from Lafayette College in 1836, and from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1840. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Newton in 1839. During his last year in the seminary he supplied the churches of Knowlton and Blairstown, N. J., preaching half of his time in Titusville. He was ordained an evangelist by the Newton Presbytery, and supplied the Upper Freeland (now Perrinville) Church for two years, when he was installed pastor. He labored here for twenty-five years, when he was released, in 1868, and supplied the Plumsted Church at New Egypt for one year. His next charge was at Squan Village, where he was installed in 1869, and then retired in 1880 to his farm in Perrinville, and gradually declined until his death, Jan. 27, 1881. See Necrology Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 58. (W. P. S.)

Worship (properly some form of ἱερα, especially in Hithpael; ἱερος), homage paid to a superior, especially to God (which we consider only), usually expressed by prayer, sacrifice, and ritual. See each term in its place; also ADORATION.

I. General View.—The homage of the progenitors of our race was the direct and simple effusion of gratitude (see Schroder, De Prima Culta Civili Publici Institutione, Marburg, 1746). There can be no doubt that the Most High, whose essence no man hath seen, or can see, was pleased to manifest himself in Eden, by an external symbol, to the eyes of his innocent worshippers. This divine manifestation is called the presence of the Lord: and may have been in connection with the mystery of life in the midst of the garden (Gen. ii, 9; iii, 8).

After the first transgression the mode of the divine manifestation was altered; and a mediatorial economy was established. Henceforth, the homage paid by man was the service of a creature conscious of crime, approaching God through the medium of sacrifice, pleading for forgiveness, and confiding in mercy. Though the divine manifestation was no longer immediate, yet a visible symbol of Jehovah was still vouchsafed in the Shekinah or visible glory, from which Cain was exiled (Gen. iv, 16; comp. 2 Thess. i, 9; Ps. xcvii, 8), which was seen by Abraham (Acts vii, 2); by Moses and the people (Exod. iii, 2-6; xiii, 21, 22; xxiv, 16, 18; Numb. xiv, 10; xvi, 19, 42); by the high-priest (Exod. xxv, 22; Lev. xvi, 2); by Solomon in the temple (1 Kings viii, 10-12); and finally in "the Word made flesh" (John i, 14).

Since this last visible manifestation, the worship of the Most High, which is no longer external and symbolic, has not been confined to any one place. "God is a Spirit, and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth" (John iv, 24).

God now manifests himself to the spirit of his faithful worshipers, helping their infirmities. Hence the presence of the Lord is in every place where Christ is active in the Spirit, and where through him, the sole mediator, the faithful pay their homage. As the true worship of God is only in the inward heart, and the whole life a spiritual service, every Christian in particular, and every Church in general, now represent a spiritual temple of the Lord. In the assemblies of the faithful, God by his Spirit diffuses his vital and sanctifying influence, and takes his devout worshipers into fellowship with him, making them both the instruments to do and suffer his will in the various scenes of life, while he there affords them the foretaste of the deep and hallowed pleasures which are reserved for them in his immediate presence forevermore (Matt. v, 8; Heb. xii, 14).

See the monographs cited by Volvooding, Index Progremmatum, p. 107, 127, 130.

II. Among the Ancient Israelites.—1. In General Acts. —The forefather of the Hebrew nation, Abraham, appears at the outset as a firm monotheist; but in his migrations there are obscure traces of a lingering idolatry (Gen. xxi, 33, 34; xxxvii, 2 sq.; comp. Josh. xxvii, 2, 14; Jud. v, 6 sq.; see Jon-athan, Targ. on Gen. xxxi, 19; also Sonne, Der Gott Abraham's (Hanover, 1806)). See Tephahim. The worship of the patriarchs (Ben-David, Ùeb. der Religion der Ebräer vor Moses (Berlin, 1812), contains strange hypotheses) was exceedingly simple, consisting of offerings and prayer (Gen. xxvi, 65), presented at whatever place of residence, although very early particular spots seem to have been held sacred (i.e. where God had specially manifested himself; see Gen. xvii, 8; comp. xxxvi, 19; 2 Sam. vi, 12; Ps. lxi, 19). People of various tribes (Gen. xxxviii, 18; xxxix, 14), meeting the preference to plains (Gen. xxii, 2; xxxi, 54; see Creuzer, Symbolik, i, 128 sq.; Zachariah, Ùeb. Meere Veti. in Locccc Editcbs Colin. Deux (Italie, 1704)). See High-place. Subsequently worship was held under (slaty) trees and in groves (Gen. xviii, 18; xxii, 38; comp. Tacit. Germ. xxxii, 7, 9); Callim. In Dian. xxxiii, Soph. Trach. 754; Ovid. Fast. iii, 295; Apollon. Rhod. iv, 1714; see Woken, De Leova Temporebus qua Fideles, Ante Legem Erimum, Præcis Declarantium (Rosostock, 1770); Doughton, Ancient Israel, i, 24 sq.). See Grove. In the offerings the ruling idea was that of thanking and propitiating God in general, the proper notion of expiation not yet appearing. See Offering. The priests were the heads of the families. See Melchizedek.

In Egypt the larger part of the Israelites may perhaps have been more or less addicted to nature worship (see Exod. xxvii; Lev. xvii, 7; Josh. xxiv, 18, 14; Ezek. xx, 7), and in the desert traces of Sabbath are evident (Numb. xxv; Amos v, 25 sq.). Moses, however, established the cultus of Jehovah as the exclusive religion, and to this the strict rule of monothelism is due. The ritual of the Twenty-second of the Egyptian (Nome) or of the Phoenician (Yatke) institutions, although particular features may have been derived from the former (Hengstenberg, Moses, p. 147 sq.; Bühler, Symbolik, i, 22 sq.), but recognised Jehovah as the sole national deity, and stood in direct personal as well as public relation to him. See Law. It contained a multitude of special provisions (such as sacrifices, vows, fasts, &c.), both of a positive and a negative kind, pointing to God as the giver of all good, and the object of all moral obligation, both of blessing and atonement; especially embodying the distinction of clean and unclean in all the bodily relations of life. The cardinal sections of this cultus are marked by the regularly recurring festivals (q. v.), and the tabernacle and temple were its central meeting-points as a national system of observance, while the priests formed its official conservators and expounders. See Priest.

The most marked of its peculiar features were the irrevocable character of the deity adored, in which it stood in bold contrast with all the prevalent idolatries; and the universality of its provisions, as containing not only to the whole nation, but to every individual in it, and to the minutest affairs of social and private economy. See Moses.

In later times, especially after the exile, the national worship was in some degree affected by foreign subjugation, and in process of time abnormally elements gradually crept in, such as Sadduceism and Esseniun. Under Antiochus Epiphanes a violent effort was made to force paganism boltily upon the Jews, but it succeeded only to a small extent. Under the Ptolemies full toleration and prospcrity was allowed, and under the Romans, privileges were granted even to foreign Jews. During all this period the heathen rulers occasionally contributed to the Mosaic worship (see Ezra vi, 9; 1 Macc. x, 34; 2 Macc. iii, 8; Josephus, Anti. xiii, 8, 3; xiv, 10-20). It is well known that under the Roman rule, the Jews, even in Rome itself (Do Coss. xxxvii, 12), were allowed the full exercise of their religion (see Zimmern, Gesch. d. röm. Privatrechte, ii, i, 470: Levy-sohn, De Judaeor. sub Caesar. Conditione [L. B. 1828]). See Judaism.

2. In Later Particulars.—This, as constituting the central idea of worship, was always strictly, although not formally, understood in the Mosaic service. There are no directions as to prayer given in the Mosaic law; the duty is rather taken for granted, as an adjunct to sacrifice, than enforced or elaborated. The temple is emphatically designated as "the House of Prayer" (Isa. i, 7), it could not be otherwise, if "He who hears prayer" (Psa. lxv, 2) there manifested his special presence; and the prayer of Solomon offered at its consecration (1 Kings vii, 50, 85, 88) implies that in it were offered "the prayers of every single man, and the public prayers of all Israel. It is hardly conceivable that, even from the beginning, public prayer did not follow every public sacrifice, whether propitiatory or eucharistic, as regularly as the incense, which was the symbol of prayer (see Psa. cxiii, 2, Rev. viii, 4, 14). Such a practice is allowed to be common in Luke i, 10; and in one instance, at the offering of the first-fruits, it was ordained in a striking form (Deut. xxvi, 12-15). In later times it certainly grew into a regular service, both in the temple and in the synagogue. See Sacerdote. But, beyond the public prayer, it was the custom of all at Jerusalem to go up to the temple, at regular hours if possible, for private prayer (see Luke xvii, 8; Acts iii, 7); and those who were absent were wont to "open their windows towards Jerusalem," and pray "towards" the place of God's presence (1 Ki. iv, 35; Ps. iv, 7; xxxvii, 2; cxxxvii, 2; Dan. vi, 10). The desire to do this was possibly one reason, independently of other and more obvious ones, why the house-top or the mountain-top were chosen places of private prayer.

The regular hours of prayer seem to have been three (see Psa. i, 17; Dan. vii, 2; the "evening prayer" that is, the ninth hour (Acts iii, 1, x, 3); the hour of the evening sacrifice (Dan. ix, 21); the "morning prayer," that is, the third hour (Acts ii, 15), that of the morning sacrifice; and the sixth hour, or noonday. To these would naturally be added some prayer at rising and lying down to sleep; and thence might easily be developed (by the love of the mystic number seven), the "seven times a day" of Psalms cxix, 164, if this is to be literally understood, and the seven hours of prayer of the Greeks. Some at least of these hours seem to have been generally observed by religious men in private prayer at home, or in the midst of their occupation and in the streets (Matthew vi, 5). Grace before meat would seem to have been an equally common practice (see Matthew xv, 36; Acts xxvii, 35).

The posture of prayer among the Jews seems to have been most often standing (1 Samuel i, 26; Matthew vi, 5; Mark xi, 25; Luke xviii, 11); unless the prayer were offered with special solemnity and humiliation, which was naturally expressed by kneeling (1 Kings vii, 54; 2 Chronicles vi, 18; Ezra ix, 5; Psalms cxiv, 6; Daniel vi, 10); or prostration (Joshua vii, 6; 1 Kings xviii, 42; Nehemiah viii, 6). The hands were "lifted up," or "spread out" before the Lord (Exodus ix, 33; Psalms xxviii, 2; xxxiv, 2, etc.). In the Christian Church no posture is mentioned in the New Testament, excepting that of kneeling; see Acts vii, 50 (Stephen); ix, 14 (St. Peter); xx, 36; xxi, 5 (St. Paul); perhaps from imitation of the example of our Lord in Gethsemane (on which occasion alone his posture in prayer is recorded). In after-times, as is well known, this posture was varied by the custom of standing in prayer on the Lord's day, and of kneeling and prostrating from Easter to Whitsunday, in order to commemorate his resurrection, and our spiritual resurrection in him. See PRAYER.

II. Christian Worship. This is usually divided into three kinds, according to the extent of the persons engaged in it.

1. Private Worship, otherwise called secret prayer, is between the individual and his Maker. It is specifically enjoined by our Lord (Matthew vi, 6), and is essential to the maintenance of spiritual life in the soul of the believer. See CONFESS.

The lately discovered Teaching of the Twelve Apostles (§ viii) enjoins the use of the Lord's Prayer "three times a day," evidently for private devotion. See LORD'S PRAYER.

Private worship should be conducted with (1) reverence and veneration, (2) self-abasement and confession; (3) contemplation of the perfection and promises of God; (4) supplication for ourselves and others; (5) earnest desire of the enjoyment of God; (6) frequency and regularity. See DEVOTION.

2. Public Worship, i.e., regular domestic worship. This is obviously called for in order to the proper religious conduct of the Christian household, and its obligation is enforced by nearly every branch of evangelical Christendom. See FAMILY.

3. Public Worship, i.e., religious services conducted in the general congregation. Some who have acknowledged the propriety of private worship have objected to that of a public nature, but without any sufficient ground. For Christ attended public worship himself (Luke iv); he prayed with his disciples (Luke ix, 28, 32; x i, 1); he promises his presence to social worshipers (Matthew xvi, 28); it may be inferred from the conduct of the apostles (Acts i, 24; ii, 24; iv, 4, 5, 26; Romans xv, 30; 1 Corinthians xiv; 2 Thess. iii, 1, 2; 1 Corinthians xi) and from general principles (Deuteronomy xxxi, 12; Psalms c, i; 1 Timothy ii, 2, 8; Hebrews x, 25).

The obligation of public worship is partly founded upon example, and partly upon precept; so that no person who admits that authority can question this great duty without manifest and criminal inconsistence. The institution of public worship under the law, and the practice of synagogue worship among the Jews, from at least the time of Ezra, cannot be questioned: both of which were sanctioned by the practice of our Lord and his apostles. The preceptive authority for our regular attendance upon public worship is either inferential or direct. The command to publish the gospel includes the obligation of assembling to hear it; the name by which a Christian society is designated in Scripture is a Church, which signifies an assembly for the transaction of business; and, in the case of a Christian assembly, that business must necessarily be spiritual, and includes the sacred exercises of prayer, praise, and the reading and exegesis of the Scriptures.

But we have more direct precepts, although the practice was obviously continued from Judaism, and was therefore conterminous. Some of the epistles of Paul are commanded to be read in the churches. The singing of psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs is enjoined as an act of solemn worship to the Lord; and Paul cautions the Hebrews that they "forsoke not the assembling of themselves together." The practice of the primitive age is also manifest from the epistles of Paul. The Lord's Supper was celebrated by the body of believers collectively; and this apostle prescribes to the Corinthians regulations for the exercises of prayer and prophesying, "when they came together in the Church"—the assembly. The periodicity and order of these holy offices in the primitive Church, appear also from the apostolic epistle of Clement of Rome: "We ought also, looking into the depths of the divine knowledge, to do all things in order, whatsoever the Lord hath commanded to be done. We ought to make our oblations, and perform our holy offices, at their appointed seasons; for these he hath commanded to be done at fixed times and seasons; but we have no times and hours; as he hath likewise ordained by his supreme will where, and by what persons, they shall be performed; that so all things being done according to his pleasure, may be acceptable in his sight." This passage is remarkable for urging a divine authority for the public services of the Church, by which Clement, no doubt, means the authority of the inspired directions of the apostles. See SERVICE.

The ends of the institution of public worship are of such obvious importance that it must ever be considered as one of the most reverenced and precious communications of God to man. By this his Church confers his name before the world; by this the public teaching of his word is associated with acts calculated to affect the mind with that solemnity which is the best preparation for hearing it to edification. It is thus that the ignorant and the vicious are collected together, and instructed and warned; the invitations of mercy are published to the guilty, and the sorrowful and afflicted are comforted. In these assemblies God, by his Holy Spirit, diffuses his vital and sanctifying influence, and takes the character of a deeper and more intimate fellowship with his people, as they there derive strength to do and to suffer his will in the various scenes of life, while he there affords them a foretaste of the deep and bellowed pleasures which are reserved for them at his right hand forevermore. Prayers and intercessions are offered for national and public interests, and while the benefit of these exercises descends upon a country, all are kept sensible of the dependence of every public and personal interest upon God. Praise calls forth the grateful emotions, and gives cheerfulness to piety; and that instruction in right religious sentiments, which the influence of the principles of morality and religion throughout society, enlightens and gives activity to conscience, raises the standard of morals, attaches shame to vice and praise to virtue, and thus exerts a powerfully purifying influence upon mankind. Laws thus reasonably enacted, and other circumstances, they could not acquire, even were they enacted in an as great perfection; and the administration of justice is aided by the strongest possible obligation and sanction being given to legal oaths. The domestic relations are rendered more strong and interesting by the very habit of the attendance of families upon the sacred services of the sanctuary of the Lord: and the meeting of the rich and the poor together, and their standing on the same common ground as sinners before God, equally dependent upon him, and equally sustaining for his mercy, has a powerful, though often an insensible, influence in blemishing the pride which is nourished by superior rank, and in raising the lower classes above aljectness of spirit, without injuring their humility. Piety, benevolence, and patriotism are equally dependent for their purity and vigor upon the regular and devout worship of God in the simplicity of the Christian dispensation.

Public worship therefore is of great utility, as (1) it gives Christians an opportunity of openly professing their faith in and love to Christ; (2) it preserves a main element of religion in the mind, without which God's people could not well exist; (3) it enlivens devotion and promotes zeal; (4) it is the means of receiving instruction and consolation; (5) it affords an excellent example to others, and excites them to fear God, etc.

Public worship should be (1) solemn, not light and trifling (Ps. lxxxix. 7); (2) simple, not pompous and ceremonial (Isa. lxii. 2); (3) cheerful, and not with forbidding aspect (Ps. c); (4) sincere, and not hypocritical (Isa. i, 12; Matt. xxiii. 13; John iv, 24); (5) pure, and not superstitious (Isa. lvii. 15). Worshipper is a translation of the Greek word ναόθος, used once only (Acts xix. 35; marg. "temple-keeper"). The necoșor was originally an attendant in a temple, probably intrusted with its charge (Eurip. Ios [ed. Dindorf], p. 115, 121; Plato, Leg. [ed. Bekker], vi. 7; Theodoret, Hist. Eccles. iii, 14, 16; Pulxus, i, 14; Philo, De Prov. Sac. 6, ii, 237; Heeckhuyss explains it by ο' των ναων κωχων, κωριν γαρ το σαρυστο. Suidas, κωριν και ευεργετον, δι' ου' ο σαρυς [ed. Gaisf. p. 855]). The divine honours paid in later Greek times to eminent persons, even in their lifetime, were imitated and exaggerated by the Romans under the empire, especially in Asia (Plut. Lyce. p. 23; Appian, Mithr. p. 76; Dion Cass. xxxi, 6). The term necoșor became thus applied to cities or communities which undertook the worship of peculiar emperors, even in their lifetime, but there is no trace of the special title being applied to any city before the time of Augustus. The first occurrence of the term in connection with Ephesus is on coins of the age of Nero (A.D. 54-68), a time which would make it impossible with its usual meaning to account of the riot there, probably in 65 or 66. In later times the title appears with the numeral aucta ες, ρως, and even τετράς. A coin of Nero's time bears on one side Ερυθανος νεκωρ, and on the reverse a figure of the temple of Artemis (Mionnet, Inscr. iii, 97; Eckhel, De num. ii, p. 250). The ancient veneration of Artemis and her temple, on the part of the city of Ephesus, which procured for it the title of νεκωρος της Άρτιμους, is too well known to need illustration; but in later times it seems probable that with the term νεκωρος the practice of necromancy became reserved almost exclusively for the veneration paid to Roman emperors, towards whom many other cities also of Asia Minor are mentioned as necoors, e. g. Nicomedia, Perinthus, Sardis, Smyrna, Magnesia (see Herod. i, 26; Strabo, xiv, 640; Arist. Or. [ed. Dindorf], xiii, 775; Mionnet, Inscr. iii, 97, Nos. 281, 295; Eckhel, De num. ii, 520, 521; Boeckh, Inscr. 1827, 1828, 262, 290, 2957, 2990, 2992, 2993; Krause. De Cic. Necoror. Hoffmann, Lex. s. v. Worthington, John T., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was rector at Pittsfield, Ill., several years, and subsequently at Prairieville, Mo. In 1859 he became rector at Louisiana, Mo. The following year he served two churches, viz., Calvary Church, in the same place, and St. Mark's Church, in Bowling Green. He served these two parishes until about 1864, when he fixed his residence at Pittsfield, Ill.; but in 1865 again became rector of Calvary Church, in Louisiana, Mo.

The following year he was employed as a missionary at Macou City and Shellbina, and in 1867 officiated at Pittsfield, Ill., where he died in 1868, at the age of sixty-six years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1869, p. 109.

Wound (usually γήγος, γήγος; stroke; but prop. τραύμα, τραυμα). The Hebrews had but little knowledge of surgery, less than the Egyptians. They seldom used inward remedies, but trusted to outward applications. Isa. i, 6 illustrates the treatment of wounds; they were "closed," that is, the lips of the wound were pressed together and bound, that cohesion of the parts might be effected. "There was, and is, no sewing up of wounds in the East; and hence the edges, healing without being perfectly united, make the scar of a wound more conspicuous and disfiguring than with us. The only attempt to produce cohesion is by 'binding up the wound, after the edges have been as far as possible 'closed' by simple pressure" (Kitto, Daily Bible Illustr. vi. 26). See Medicine.

Wrangel, Charles Magnus, D.D., a Lutheran clergyman, regarded as the ablest of the early Swedish Lutheran ministers, entered upon his labors in America, as provost or chief pastor of the Swedish churches, in 1758. During his brief ministry here two new churches were built at Kingsessing and at Upper Merton. Ps. vii. 11. He was associated with facility and accuracy in the learning of the Swedish, German, and English. The Synod of Pennsylvania recommended the use of his translation into English of Luther's Catechism. He preached, not only throughout Pennsylvania, but occasionally in New Jersey, laboring in company with the Rev. Dr. Muhlenberg. He was a man of culture, large and varied acquisitions, and great eloquence. The crowds that attended his preaching compelled him to hold service in the open air. After a residence of nine years in America he was recalled, and returned to Sweden in 1768, where he received from the government an episcopal appointment. He died in 1786. See (Loud.) Evangelical Review, ii, 589.

Wraith is great and permanent anger (q. v.). The wrath of God is his indignation at sin and punishment of it. "For the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men who hold the truth in unrighteousness" (Rom. i, 18). The objects of God's anger or wrath are the ungodly, whom he has declared he will punish. His wrath is sometimes manifested in this life, and that in an awful degree, as we see in the case of the old world, of Sodom and Gomorrah; and in the plagues of Egypt, the destruction of the first-born in the land of the Egyptians; the punishment of the Jews, and the many striking judgments on nations and individuals. But a still more awful punishment awaits the impenitent in the world to come, for the wicked, in the said, shall go away into everlasting punishment (Matt. xvi, 46), where the worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched (see Rom. ii, 8). See Meditation: Punishment.

Wraith (Ζαζούν, ἥραυξ, a net-work or lattice [as often rendered], i. e. balustrade, 2 Kings xxvii, 17; 2 Chron. iv, 12, 13; but perhaps really a festoon or checkerwork: as γηγή, γηγή, 1 Kings vii, 17 ["fringe," i. e. tassel, Deut. xxiii, 12] certain means). Garlands in ancient times were chiefly made of green leaves or twigs (Wisd. ii, 18), which, among the ancient Israelites, likewise were symbols of joy (3 Macc. vii, 16). Accordingly, victorious chieftains and warriors were crowned with such wreaths (Jud. iii, 8; comp. He- rod. i, 7, 11), and they were sometimes strewn in their path (Sueton. Ner. xxv; Livy, xxxiii, 38; Curat. Ha. x, 10, 25). Some of those of Valentine, John, etc., are recorded by Hau- dorf, Horat. Sutur. (ii, 3), p. 250; et saeta (3 Macc. iv, 8; comp. Athen. xvi, 674); and on gala occasions dwellings and sacred objects were decked with them (1 Macc. iv, 57; Let. Jer. 9 [in the Apoc. Greek]; see Voss, Virg. Georg. p. 826; Orelli, Arch. ii, 43), as likewise sacrificial victims (Herod. iv, 11, 8) and altars (Acts xiv, 18; comp. Herod. ii, 45; Strabo, x, 729; Pliny, xvi, 4; Ovid, Met. v, 566; see Tetrazes, Lyceoph., p. 927; W. Smith, I. H., x, 81; Parthey, Ath. II. F., ii, 3; and finally the worshipers themselves (Herod. i, 132; Athen. xvi, 674; Lucian, De dea Syr. xvi. Tibull. i, 10, 28; ii, 2, 16; Apollon. Rhod. ii, 159; see Bühler, Symbol. ii, 252).

The Eucharist is a circular garland of flowers interwoven; a chalice; that is interwoven or entwined. Such symbols were made use of to designate certain saints, and are found represented both in old MSS., stained glass, and on the lower panels of rood-screen. A wreath of flowers, sometimes designated a "marriage crown," was often placed on the head of a virgin bride. Wreaths were also carried at funerals. One, of the 17th century, remains suspended in the south aisle of St. Alban's Abbey. And they are anciently, and are now not uncommonly, put upon graves and memorial crosses. See CORONA.

WREN, Sir CHRISTOPHER, an eminent English architect and mathematician, son of Dr. Christopher Wren, was born in St. William's church, Fleet St., in 1632, and early discovered a special genius for mathematics. He entered Wadham College, Oxford, at the age of fourteen, and graduated A.B. in 1650. He was then chosen fellow of All-Souls' College, and graduated A.M. in 1652. He was made professor of astronomy in Gresham College, London, in August, 1657, and three years later he received the Savilian professorship at Oxford. In 1661 he was appointed by Charles II assistant to sir John Denham, the surveyor-general, and was commissioned, in 1665, to survey and report upon St. Paul's Cathedral, with a view to its restoration in such a form as to harmonize it with the Corinthian colonnade added to it by Jones. The scheme met with such opposition from many quarters that it was indefinitely postponed. Wren was in the meantime employed on some other buildings, as the Sheldonian Theatre at Oxford, from 1664 to 1669, and the library of Trinity College, Cambridge, which, however, was not built until 1772. He visited Paris in 1665, while the works of theLouvre were in progress. After the great fire of 1666 he began at once a plan for the entire reconstruction of the city of London on a monumental scale, with new streets and piazzas at intervals. But the immediate necessities of the citizens prevented the accomplishment of so vast a design, so he was obliged to content himself with labors upon individual structures. Among these were the Royal Exchange, Custom-House (both since destroyed by fire and rebuilt), Temple Church, Monument, and some churches, including that of St. Stephen's Walbrook, all of which were built before St. Paul's was begun. He was busy in the meantime with designs for St. Paul's Cathedral, and when it came to the actual construction of the edifice, the plan which he preferred was rejected, and the one chosen he was compelled to modify contrary to his own judgment. The first stone of the present edifice was laid June 21, 1675, and the last stone on the summit of the lantern was laid by the architect's son, Christopher, in 1710. On the decease of his father, in March, 1723, Wren succeeded him in the office of surveyor-general of his majesty's works, an office which he held until after the death of queen Anne, in 1714. He had resigned the office of Savilian professor in 1672, and accepted that of president of the Royal Society in 1680. He also sat several times in Parliament, but his numerous and important professional engagements left him little leisure for other pursuits or duties. He was found dead in his chair after dinner, Feb. 23, 1723, and received the honor of a splendid funeral in St. Paul's, where his remains were interred. Yet, not without his protest, his body was given to the state's use, and his remains, as the inscription, "Si monumentum quaeris, circumspice." Among his numerous architectural works not already mentioned are, spire and Church of St. Mary-le-Bow (1671-78); St. Lawrence Jewry (1671-81); Royal Observatory, Greenwich (1675); Chelsea Hospital (1682-90); St. James's, Westminster (1683); Hampton Court (1689), and towers of the west front of Westminster Abbey (1718). Wrestling (грек. Ген. xxx, 8, figuratively; πείριζμα, Eph. vi, 12, literally; in Gen. xxii, 25, 26, the verb is πείριζε, used in a literal sense). This was one of the principal exercises in all the public games of Greece. The Greeks ascribed the invention of wrestling to mythical personages, and Mercury, the god of all gymnastic exercises, being prominently associated with wrestling. The Homeric age wrestling was much practiced; during this period wrestlers contended naked, and only the loins were covered with the περίζων (τόμπων), and this custom probably remained throughout Greece until the Ptolemaic period. It was later no longer used, and wrestlers fought entirely naked. In the Homeric age the custom of anointing the body for the purpose of wrestling does not appear to have been known, but in the time of Solon it was quite general, and was said to have been adopted by the Cretans and Laconians at a very early period. After the body was anointed it was covered over with sand or dust, in order to enable the wrestlers to take a firm hold of each other. The Greeks, in their combats, were generally matched two against two, but sometimes several couples contended at the same time. In case the whole aim and design of the wrestlers was to throw their adversary upon the ground, both strength and art were employed for this purpose; they seized each other by the arms, pulled and tumbled, the arms being passively used, and the body being carried by the arms, and levers, and distortions and twisings of the body, locking their limbs in each other's, lifting from the ground, dashing their heads together, and twisting one another's necks. In this manner the athletes wrestled standing, the combat ending with the fall of one of the competitors. See GAME.

Among the ancient Egyptians likewise, according to Wilkinson, "wrestling was a favorite amusement; and the painting of the grotesques at Beni Hassan presents all the varied attitudes and modes of attack and defense of which it is susceptible. In order to enable the spectator more readily to perceive the position of the limbs of each combatant, the artist has availed himself of a dark and light color, and even ventured to introduce alternately a black and red figure. It is not, however, necessary to give an instance of every position indicated in those varied subjects; and a selection of the principal groups will suffice to convey some idea of their mode of representing the combatants, and of their general system of attack and defense. It is probable that, like the Greeks, they anointed the body with oil when preparing for the contest; and they were entirely naked, with the exception of a girdle, apparently of leather thongs. The two combatants generally approached each other holding their arms in an inclined position before the body, and each endeavored to seize his adversary in the manner best suited to his mode of attack. It was allowable to take hold of any part of the body, the head, neck, or legs; and the struggle was frequently continued on the ground, after one or both had fallen, a mode of wrestling common also to the Greeks. I do not find that they had the same sign of acknowledging their defeat in this game as the Greeks, which was by holding up a finger in token of submission; and it was probably done by the Egyptians with a word "(Anc. Egypt.
1, 204). See Sports.

Writing (some form of אֲרֵעַ, יָדֶה, γραφή) is the art of expressing thought by letters or other marks.
See Letter.

I. Origin and Various Kinds of Writing.—Language expresses thought, preserves thought, and also suggests creates thought. But it is obvious that, so long as language is unwritten, it can accomplish these ends only in a very imperfect measure. Hence we may well suppose that, at a very early stage of man's history, attempts were made to present in some way to the eye
the thought which spoken language conveyed to the ear, and thus give it visible form and permanence. But we cannot wonder that no record remains of the origin of an art, the beginnings of which must be placed in the political infancy of mankind. Pliny speaks of the "aeternus literarnus usus" (N. H. vii, 56).

The various kinds of writing which have been in use in different ages and in different parts of the world may be classified in two great divisions, according as the object of their inventors was to present the ideas to which they wished to give visible expression directly and immediately to the mind, or indirectly, through the medium of spoken language. Each of these methods—the ideographic and the phonographic or phonetic—has its attendant advantages and disadvantages; but the advantages of the latter method greatly preponderate.
The principal recommendation of the former method,
in which the depicted idea is caught up immediately by the mind, is that it addresses itself to a much wider circle than the letter, being intelligible, so far as it is intelligible, alike by all classes and in all countries;
whereas the latter, in which the word is depicted, not the idea, is of course intelligible only to those who are acquainted with the language to which the depicted word belongs. On the other hand, the very serious drawbacks attendant upon the direct method are (1) that it is capable of giving distinct expression only to a very limited range of ideas, viz. the ideas of sensible objects and qualities, and if it attempts to go beyond that range at once becomes arbitrary and obscure; and
(2) that in its representation even of the limited class of ideas to which it is capable of giving distinct expression, it is cumbersome and altogether unfitted for general use.

The sacred writing of the Egyptians may be regarded as forming a stage of transition between the two sorts of writing just described. Regarding the Mexican writing, see Robertson's America, bk. vii, and Prescott's Mexico, i, 86. See also Kopy's remarks on the Chinese writing in Bilder u. Schriften, ii, 66, 76, 87. Till the present century it was the received opinion that the ancient Egyptian was an exclusively ideographic writing, and to this conclusion the testimonies of those ancient writers who have given any account of it seemed to point (Kenrick, Anc. Egypt. i, 285—292). But the labor of Young, Champollion, Wilkinson, Lepsus, and others, during the last half-century, have thrown new light on those ancient and mysterious characters; and it is now agreed that, though very possibly a picture-writing originally, the hieroglyphic, in the form in which it has most ancient representations, and which it retains unchanged down to the early centuries after Christ, bears a composite character, being in part ideographic, in part phonetic. According to Mr. Ken- rick (i, 300, etc.), “the characters are used in three different ways. There is first of all the pictorial use, in which the character is designed to convey to the mind the idea of the object it represents, and nothing more... This pictorial representation sometimes stands instead of a phonetic name for the object, but the most common use of it is to make the phonetic group of characters make up the sound by being joined to them. Thus, to the names of individuals the figure of a man is subjoined.” Such characters Champollion calls determinatives. “The second use of the hieroglyphical writing is the symbolical, in which the object delineated is not meant to convey to the mind the idea of itself, but of something associated with it and suggested by it. Thus, a crescent denotes a month, a stretched-out hand the act of giving, etc.” “The last class, the phonetic, is really by far the most extensive. The greater part of the characters are as truly letters of the language as, in our English alphabet, the capital letters are the exception, not the rule.” Mr. Kenrick adds that “in every inscription of any length we find these three modes of writing in use together, but with a great predominance of phonetic.” See Hieroglyph.

Thus, in the hieroglyphic, we find the same of meeting between the two great classes of written characters, the ideographic and phonetic, and, as it seems, we have some light thrown on their mutual relation, and the manner in which the one arose, or, at least, may have arisen, out of the other. It has been affirmed, indeed, that the two kinds of writing are so entirely distinct that it is impossible to entertain the idea of a historical relationship between them (Kopp, ii, 62). But the fact is, that in the hieroglyphic, and to a certain extent also in the Chinese, such a relationship is already established. No nation which has made any considerable advance towards civilization can remain satisfied with a pictorial or symbolic writing, more particularly if it be disposed to cultivate to any extent intercourse with other nations. To represent by means of such a method of writing foreign words and names is a proof of the utterance of civilization; and it is not improbable that the origin of the phonetic writing may be traced to the intercourse of nations speaking different languages. Thus the Chinese are compelled to employ their ideographic characters phonetically in writing foreign words; and sometimes, in the hieroglyphic, we find the same discovered even in the Mexican writing. In the hieroglyphic the process had advanced much further. In Chinese, the name of the patriarch Shem is represented in writing by the ideograph for “life,” sem being the Chinese for life (Kopp, ii, 80, 91). Here, consequently, we have an example of the same character used in two ways: (1) ideographically, to represent the idea of life, and (2) phonetically, to represent the sound sem.

From this there is but a step to the discovery of an alphabet, viz. the employment of the same sign to represent not the combination of sounds forming the word sem, but the initial sound s. That this step was actually taken by the Egyptians we appear to have sufficient evidence. “Thus, an eagle stands for A, and its Coptic name is akhm; a leaf of an aquatic plant, Coptic akh, stands for the same letter; a lion for L, Coptic lilo; an ox, for x, Coptic lalkos, etc.” (Kenrick, i, 905, 906). It is true, as Mr. Kenrick remarks, this correspondence cannot be traced through the whole of the phonetic alphabet. But when we consider how very imperfect is the knowledge which even the most distinguished Egyptologists possess of the ancient Egyptian language, we are fully warranted in putting aside this negative evidence, and receiving the hypothesis just mentioned (which was that of Champollion), as furnishing a very probable explanation of the origin of what may be called the Egyptian alphabet. Passing now to the purely phonetic system of writing, it is of two sorts, viz. syllabic and alphabetic, in the former of which each character represents a combination of sounds, in the latter a simple sound. The most ancient alphabet is the Hebrew, or Phoenician, which, having spread within the area of Asia, the home of the Semitic nations, was at a very early period introduced by the Phoenicians into Greece, and perhaps at a somewhat later period even into India (Max Müller, Ancient Sanscrit Literature, p. 521; Journal of Archæology, vi, 461, etc.; Zeitkritik d. D. M. G. x, 390, etc.), and by being joined to the Greek, which almost all that is known of the ancient world has been preserved for the instruction of mankind. Who the person was who framed the first alphabet, and thus conferred upon his race a benefit of incalculable value, is unknown. It is the received opinion that in Southwestern Asia, as in Egypt, the alphabetic writing had for its precursor an ideographic, which, after passing through several stages of change, assumed at last the form in which it has come down to us. This opinion was founded on a comparison with the hieroglyphic and other forms of writing, in which it had never been observed, we detect the process of transition from the ideographic to the phonographic; and (2) on the names of the letters. These names are all significant; and it is probable that each of the letters in its original form was an ideograph representing the object denoted by the name which the letter still bears. Thus alpha (α) in its original form would be the ideograph of ex, beth of house, etc. Afterwards, when the ideographic writing gave place to the alphabetic, each of the alphabetic sounds was represented by a character which had formerly been the picture or symbol of an object of whose name that letter was the initial sound. We admit that it is by no means easy in the case of several of the letters to trace the resemblance between the letter and the object of which, according to this hypothesis, it was originally the picture. But this need not excite our surprise, if we consider how great the change of form which these letters must have undergone as they passed from one country to another, or were transmitted from age to age (see Kopp, ii, 157, 377-399). The ancient and the most ancient Semitic stonecutters and engravers were not always careful to preserve an exact uniformity in their delineation of the several characters; they were probably less expert than their Egyptian contemporaries; and, it may be, had no very fixed standard of accuracy by which to test the accuracy and to correct the errors of their workmanship. Moreover, the wide diffusion of the Semitic alphabet would naturally occasion still more extensive changes in the forms of the letters. Emil (Lehrbuch, § 77, 2) speaks of three main branches from the parent stem, a southern, western, and eastern, viz. (1) the Hymyanitic, in Southern Arabia, and the Ethiopic, though the latter is by others brought into closer connection with the Greek form of the Semitic alphabet; (2) the western, including the Phoenician writing, and the Samaritan, which closely resembles it; and (3) the Babylonian or Assyrian, of which it is generally agreed that the Hebrew square character is an offshoot. Now, it is impossible to say which of these different forms of the Semitic alphabet approaches nearest to the original. It is probable that all have deviated from it more or less. The original symbolic meaning of the characters having fallen into disuse, there was nothing to be gained by rigid adherence to all the details of the original forms. Some writers, admitting that a resemblance does exist between the letters and the objects denoted by their names, have attempted to assign for it otherwise than by the hypothesis of an earlier ideographic use of the alphabetical forms. They are of opinion that letters were from the first arbitrary signs of sounds, never of objects; and that the names they have so long borne originated, like the names of the constellations, in some fancied resemblance between them and the objects denoted by them. Dr. D. G. Du Cange, in his preface, does not mention other objections to this view, when we consider that this resemblance in form is not the only point of correspondence, that there is the further correspondence between the sounds expressed by the letters and the initial sounds of the letter-names, it must appear improbable that whoever invented the letter should have been at the pains to search for names bearing to the letters this twofold correspondence, in initial sound and in form, and should not have been satisfied with a single point of correspondence. On the whole, the weight of argument, and also the weight of authority, are in favor of the other hypothesis.

It is impossible with any confidence to decide to which branch of the Semitic family of nations the invention of the Semitic alphabet is to be traced. From the names of the letters one might expect to have some light on the Hebrew origin; but the conjectures are not realized. For, though the names are certainly Semitic, there is no single language of the Semitic family (so far as these languages are known) in which they all find explanation. But, in truth, of the Semitic languages, in form, with the exception of the Hebrew, our knowledge is very imperfect; and it would be extremely rash to say that such and such words did not exist in, for example, the old Phoenician language, because they have not been found in the few fragments of that language which have come down to us. See PHENICIA.

It is the opinion of some that the idea of the alphabet was borrowed from Egypt. Hug (Die Erfundung der Buchstabenkunst, p. 82, etc.) thinks the Phoenicians resident in Egypt were the inventors of the alphabet. They took the letters being Egyptian, the names Phoenician. But if the Semitic nations did borrow the idea from Egypt, they certainly worked it out much more successfully than those with whom, according to this hypothesis, it originated; and moreover, when we consider that there is no very marked correspondence between the Egyptian and Semitic alphabets, except in the general idea, it is on the whole safer to conclude, in the absence of all historical evidence, that the two alphabets originated independently of each other, and were alike the offspring of that necessity which is the mark of all invention. See SEMITIC.

II. The Hebrew Alphabet.—This consists of twenty-two letters. It has been conjectured that several of these letters did not belong to the alphabet in its original form; and there is a traditional statement found in some Greek writers of authority that the Phoenician alphabet (which, there is no question, was identical with the Hebrew) when first introduced into Greece consisted of not more than fifteen letters (see Hug, Erfundung der Buchstabenkunst, p. 12, etc.). However, this may be, it is certain that at a very early period the Hebrew alphabet included the same number of letters as at present. This is ascertained (1) from the Scriptural songs and poems, the several lines of stanza of which begin with the successive letters of the alphabet (see Poetry); and (2) from the use of the letters as marks of number, particularly when compared with the correspondence use of the Greek letters.

With regard to these twenty-two letters various questions have been started, to some of the more important of which it is necessary briefly to advert.

1. Did these letters originally represent syllables or simple sounds? Some writers, as Lepsius (Poldiographie, § 19), have maintained that originally one and the same sign stood for both vowel and consonant. They hold that after the ideographic writing comes not the alphabetical but the syllabic; our separation of vowels and consonants being entirely ideal, and never actually possible, inasmuch as consonants cannot find expression without the aid of a vowel sound; and vowels cannot be pronounced except in dependence on a preceding consonantal element more or less distinct. In all this these writers are probably theoretically correct. Of the existing writing, not only in Egypt, but in the earliest stage, and in the Assyrian cuneiform we have the example of such a writing in actual use among the Semitic nations (Rawlinson, Ancient Monarchies, i. 84, 857). But how essentially different in their nature the Assyrian letters are from the Hebrew is evident from the fact that the former, according to Sir H. Rawlinson and M. Oppert, number from three to four hundred, the latter only twenty-two. Indeed, it is impossible that a really syllabic alphabet should have fewer characters, except in the case of such a state of language as Lepsius presupposes, in which all the syllables are open, i.e. end with a vowel, and there is no variety of vowel sounds.

It is to be noted, however, that in the Ethiopic alphabet, in which each letter appears under seven different forms, according to the vowel sound associated with it, the simplest form is not that which the letter takes when no vowel follows, as we might expect, but that which it takes when followed by short a. When this sound follows, the original form of the letter is retained unchanged; when no vowel follows, a slight alteration is made in the form of the letter, provided that it closes the syllable. See ETHIOPIAN LANGUAGE.

2. Admitting that the Hebrew writing was alphabetic, is it purely consonantal, or does it contain signs to express vowel sounds as well as consonants? Some have held that the letters נ, ס, צ, were originally vowels, and that their use as consonants was of later introduction. It has been said that the alphabet of each language must contain a sufficient number of letters to represent all the sounds of the language, and that it is as easy to conceive of a language without vowel sounds as of an alphabet without vowel letters. And further, with regard to the Hebrew alphabet, Kopp (Bilder u. Schriften, ii. 112, etc.) thinks it absurd to suppose that it originally contained separate forms for guttural breathings so little differing from one another as נ, ס, צ, and not a single sign to represent the vowels, which constitute the life of every language. Now, with regard to the letters נ, ס, צ, it is certain they were used as vowels from a very ancient period; but there is no reason whatever to suppose that this use of these letters preceded their use as consonants, but example may impose the contrary. At the beginning of a syllable only נ is ever used as a vowel, and in the few cases in which it is so used it has been softened from an original consonantal sound. In the middle of a word, נ, ס, צ appear as vowels much less frequently in the earlier Hebrew books than in the later; and on the surviving monuments of the Phoenician language and writing they have uniformly a consonantal force. Besides, it is known that one of these letters, viz. צ, passed over from the Phoenicians to the Greeks as a consonant, though as a Greek letter it afterwards fell out of use. As for נ, it is difficult to conceive how, if it originally stood for A in the Hebrew alphabet, it should, even at the date of the very earliest monuments of the language, have so entirely lost this power, and passed into a simple breathing. With regard to the alleged improbability of so ancient an alphabet distinguishing the closely allied sounds of נ, ס, צ, by the use of different characters, we are scarcely in a position to form a sound judgment on such a question, inasmuch as the Hebrew alphabet, as we speak differ so entirely from the Semitic tongues, and our organs are consequently incapable of giving distinct expression to the variety of guttural sounds which characterized the ancient Hebrew, as it does the modern Arabic.

8. As to the origin of the Hebrew square characters, which appear in all extant MSS, as well as in our printed Bibles, the most diverse views have been propounded; some, especially among the older scholars, tracing them back to the age of Moses and the tables of the Law; and others believing them to be of comparatively recent origin. The latter view is taken by Kopp (Bilder u. Schriften, ii, 164), who places their introduction somewhere about the 4th century, chiefly on the ground that the Palmyrene characters, from which, in his opinion, they were derived, were in use, as appears from inscriptions yet extant, as late as the 8th century of our era. But whatever may be the connection between the square character and the Palmyrene (and there is no doubt it is very intimate), the opinion of Kopp is quite untenable. We have direct testimony to the fact that the square character belongs to a much earlier age than that to which he assigns it. Jerome informs us that in his day the inefiable name Jehovah, יהוה, was sometimes introduced into Greek MSS, in its Hebrew form, and that readers of these MSS, acquainted with Hebrew often by mistake read the name Πᾶσα, ἸΗΒΑΩ, from which it is quite certain that, in Jerome's age, the Hebrew Bible must have been written in the square character presently in use, for only on this supposition was such a mistake possible. But, if Kopp's hypothesis be well founded, the Hebrew square character must then have been quite recently elaborated from the Palmyrene. Was it so? Let us turn to another passage of Jerome, in his celebrated Prolegomena Galactica, in which he informs us that the Hebrew character in use in his day had been introduced into Ezra, in place of a more ancient character which had passed over to the Samaritans. Is it credible that the square character was invented by the Jewish scholars, and introduced into MSS, for the first time in the 4th century, and yet that before the close of that same century its origin was already forgotten, and it was passed from the region of history to that of tradition or fable? A similar testimony on the part of Origen gives us a similar character. He, too, mentions the Jewish tradition of a change of characters by Ezra, and speaks of MSS, in which the divine name was found even in his day written in the ancient characters (Montefaucon, Hexasplota, ii, 94). The expression in the sermon on the mount, "not one jot," carries us back a step further still, indeed, almost to the beginning of our era; for it is evident that the phrase was a proverbial one, and that the province of the character which gave rise to the square story over Amasa in Rephaim, and which Moses was directed to "rehear in the ears of Joshua" (Exod. xvii, 14; this sipher or document may afterwards have formed part of the "Book of the War of the Lord," mentioned in Num. xxiii, 14); and at a later period mention is made of a written account of the journeys of the Israelites in the wilderness (Num. xxxiii, 2). We also read of the high-priest's breastplate with its four rows of stones, on which were engraved, "like the engravings of a signet," the names of the twelve tribes of Israel; and of the mitre with the plate of pure gold, on which was written, "writing like the engravings of a signet," Holiness to the Lord (Exod. xxxix, 14, 50). Of the use of writing in legal transactions and processes mention is made in Num. v, 23; Deut. xxiv, 1, 5. Specially to be noted is the figurative use which is given to the workman in Exod. xxxvii, 26, 33; "Blot out the book which thou hast written," in which we already meet with the idea of a memorial book kept by God, "for them that feared the Lord and that thought upon his name" (Mal. iii, 16; Psa. lxi, 9 [8]). From all this it is evident that in the age of Moses the art of writing was commonly employed for the purpose of preserving the knowledge of important truths and the memory of important events. The assumption by some writers that the art of writing among the Hebrews is due to and dates from the delivery of the Law on Sinai, is negatived by the fact that it was evidently accepted at that time as a well-known art, and no hint is there given of its being a new invention.

We are not, however, to conclude from this that in that age, or for many ages after, writing was in common use among the body of the people. The knowledge of it was probably confined to the few who occupied an official position; the people being still dependent chiefly on oral instruction for their knowledge of what God had done for them, and what he required of them. Writing was in those days employed rather as a means of preserving than of circulating knowledge. The tables of stone were laid up in the ark. The book of the covenant (mentioned Exod. xxiv) was read to the people. The book of the law (mentioned Deut. xxxi, 24-28) was given to the Levites “to put it in the side of the ark;... for a witness against Israel.” The song of Moses (ch. xxxii) was not circulated in writing among the people, but “was spoken in their ears” (xxxii, 30); and thus they were taught to repeat it and to transmit it to others (ver. 19, 22). It is only the king who was expressly enjoined to have written out for his special use a copy of the law, and to read therein all the days of his life (xviii, 18, 19). Of the people in general it was required that they should learn God’s statutes, and have them in their heart, and teach them diligently to their children (vi, 6, 7), plainly by word of mouth; for when it is added (ver. 9), “Thou shalt write them upon the posts of thy house, and on thy gates,” the expression is probably to be understood figuratively, like the “binding on the hand, and as frontlets between the eyes” (ver. 8; comp. also Psa. xlv, 2 [1]; lxviii, 8, with ci, 19 [18]).

During the wars under Joshua no advancement in the art of writing is to be looked for. In the book of Joshua, accordingly, there is mention made but of one new document, viz., a geographical description and sevenfold division of the land west of Jordan, drawn up by delegates from the several tribes (Josh. xviii, 9). The selecterim are likewise mentioned among the civil and military officers (i, 10; iii, 2; viii, 28; xxi, 2; xxiv, 1). In the same connection, also, frequent reference is made to the book of the law, which Joshua, in accordance with the injunction of Moses, wrote upon great stones on Mount Ebal, and afterwards read in the hearing of all the people. The book of Jasher (quoted x, 13) probably belongs to a somewhat later age (2 Sam. i, 18). See Book.

Important to our present purpose is the mention in Josh. xv, 15, 16, and Judg. i, 11, 12, of Kirjath-sepher (book-town), afterwards named Debir; and with this may be conjoined the allusion in the immortal song of Deborah to the mechokekim (engravers) and sopherim (writers), who led the bands of Machir and Zebulun “to the help of the Lord against the mighty” (Judg. v, 14). As yet the art of writing was not only confined to certain classes, but would seem to have been cultivated chiefly in certain localities (yet comp. viii, 14). The vicinity of Zebulon and Machir to Phoenicia and Damascus might be noted (Gen. xxix, 18).

Under Samuel the institution of the schools of the prophets must have conduced not less to the literary than to the religious advancement of Israel. The seed which was then sown ripened into an abundant harvest during the glorious reigns of David and Solomon, which were rendered not less illustrious by the literary achievements which distinguished them than by the successful cultivation of the arts of war and peace. During these reigns the art of writing must have been largely employed, not only for literary, but also for political, or secular, purposes. The epistola, or letter, was a constant attendant upon the monarch’s person (2 Sam. viii, 17; xx, 25); so also the mazzalit, or recorder. We also read of David himself writing a letter (sopher) to Joab (xi, 14, 15), though the fact that the reply of Joab was by messenger, and not by letter, would seem to indicate that the latter mode of communication was still rare and exceptional.

In the age of Isaiah, in which (or not long before) the strictly prophetic literature may be said to commence, various circumstances contributed to the development of a certain amount of writing. Such an activity of the reign of Uzziah; the closer relations and increased intercourse between Palestine and the great seats of civilization on the banks of the Euphrates and Tigrit, on the one side, and of the Nile, on the other; and also the captivity of the ten tribes, and the breaking up of the local and geographical unity of Israel, which would necessitate a written intercourse between the widely separated branches of the nation. Accordingly, in the book of Isaiah, we find various notices illustrative of our present subject, one of which is specially interesting, as it would appear to indicate a wider diffusion than we have had any evidence of previously to this period, of the practice of reading and writing among the people. We refer to Isa. xxxii, 11, 12, where the prophet, in describing the blindness of the people, compares the word of God to a sealed book (םריאמה ממת), a document of any description, “which men deliver to one that is learned (lit. that knows writing, ידוע בלק), saying, Read this, I pray thee: and he saith, I cannot, for it is sealed; and the book in the hand of him that is not learned (lit. not know writing), saying, Read this, I pray thee: and he saith, I am not learned (אין ידוע בלק, I do not know books or writing).” Here we read of two classes of the population, those able to read a written document, and those not able; and though the latter were probably still much the larger class, it would seem from the form of the prophet’s language that the knowledge of writing was no longer confined within the limits of an official class, but was diffused somewhat more widely among the people.

This was still more decidedly the case in the age of Jeremiah, as is evident from the frequency with which the art of writing is alluded to in his writings, as compared with those of the earlier prophets. In Jeremiah we read for the first time of a conveyance of property being drawn out in writing, and subscribed not only by the principal parties, but also by witnesses (Jer. xxxii, 10-12). That this was the common practice is evident from ver. 84 of the same chapter. Copies of the sacred writings appear also to have been multiplied (viii, 8). Letters are spoken of more frequently (xxxvii, 29). The class of sopherim, or scribes, had become numerous (viii, 8; xxxvi, 10, 12, 23, 36; xxxviii, 15, 20; lii, 25; Ezek. ix, 2, 3, 11; 2 Chron. xxxiii, 18). On the whole, the state of matters, with respect to the art of writing at this period, was very similar to that which we find delineated on the Egyptian monuments (Kenrick, Egypt, i, 285, 284; ii, 52). A still wider diffusion of the art of writing is indicated by the notices.
in Eccles. xii, 12, and Ecclus. xxxii, 7; Luke xvi, 6. See Scrim.

IV. Materials of Writing.—We have no very definite statement in the Old Test. as to the material which was in common use for the purposes of writing. In all ages it has been customary to engrave on stone or metal, or other durable material, with the view of securing the permanency of the record; and accordingly, in the very commencement of the national history of Israel, we read of the two tables of the law written in stone, and of a subsequent writing of the law on stone (Deut. xxxii, 39; Josh. vii, 9). In the latter case there is this peculiarity, that plasters (sid, lime or gypsum) was used along with stone, a combination of materials which Hengstenberg, in the valuable dissertation on the art of writing among the Hebrews, contained in his Geomnesie des Poinstclerk, illustrates by comparison of the practices of the Egyptian engravers, who, having first carefully smoothed the stone, filled up the faulty places with gypsum or cement, in order to obtain a perfectly uniform surface on which to execute their engravings (i. 438, Clarke's transl.; comp. also Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. ii, 11). The metals also are mentioned as a material of writing; as lead, in Job xix, 23, 24 (though whether the reference in that passage is to writing on lead, or filling up the hollow of the letters with lead, is not certain) (comp. Pliny, Nat. Hist. xiii, 11; Hengstenberg, i. 440, xxxv, 22; iv. 10, 27, 46); gold (Exod. xxxix, 30). Of stamped coins of the Hebrews there is no trace earlier than the age of the Maccabees (1 Macc. xv, 6).

To the engraving of gems there is frequent reference in the Old Test., as in the account of the high-priest's breastplate (see also Isa. xxxix, 11, 12, 18; Jer. xxxi, 14; Dan. xii, 4). In Gen. xxxviii, 18 we read of Judah's signet, and from the recent discoveries in the East we learn that it was the custom of the ancient Chaldaeans to carry about with them an engraved cylinder in agate or other hard stone, which was used as a seal or signet, and probably worn round the wrist, but the engraving on these cylinders was not always accompanied with an inscription. (For specimens, see Rawlinson, Anc. Mon. i, 87, 117, 118, 124, 211, 881; comp. also Heeren, Hist. Rest. ii, 203). See Sall.

The common materials of writing were the tablet (tablet, huch) and the roll (p'ebb, megillah), the former probably having a Chaldean origin, the latter an Egyptian.

"The tablets of the Chaldeans" says Rawlinson (Anc. Mon. i, 85-87), "are among the most remarkable of their remains... They are small pieces of clay, somewhat rudeiy shaped into a form resembling a pillow, and thickly inscribed with cuneiform characters... What is most curious is that these documents have been in general enveloped, after they were baked, in a cover of moist clay, upon which their contents have been again inscribed, so as to present externally a duplicate of the writing within; and the tablet in its cover has then been baked after fresh." The same material was largely used by the Assyrians, and many of their clay tablets still remain. "They are of various sizes, ranging from nine inches long by six and a half wide, to an inch and a half by an inch wide, and even less... Some thousands of these have been recovered; many are historical, some linguistic, some geographical, some astronomical." (comp. Pliny, Nat. Hist. vii, 56; Heeren, Hist. Rest. ii, 185).

For the similar use of hollow cylinders, or prisms of six or eight sides, formed of fine terra cotta, sometimes glazed, on which the characters were traced with a small stylus, in some specimens so minute as to be capable of decipherment only with the aid of a magnifying-glass, see Rawlinson (Anc. Mon. i, 580, 478). See Brick.

In Egypt the principal writing material was quite of a different sort. Wooden tablets are indeed found pictured on the monuments (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. ii, 100); but the material which was in common use, even from very ancient times, was the papyrus. This reed, found chiefly in Lower Egypt, "had various economic uses... for writing, the pith was taken out, and divided by a pointed instrument into the thin pellies of which it is composed; it was then flattened by pressure, and the strips glued together, other strips being placed at right angles to them, so that a roll of any length might be manufactured (Pliny's account, Nat. Hist. xiii, 23, is partly erroneous)" (Kenrick, Egypt. i, 89, 90). That this material was in use in Egypt from a very early period is evidenced by still existing papyri MSS. of the earliest Tchban dynasties (ibid. i, 285, 337, 485, 497, ii, 102, 142; see also Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. ii, 99). As the papyrus, being in great demand, and exported to all parts of the world, became very costly, other materials were often used instead of it, among which Wilkinson mentions leather, a few leather rolls of an early period having been found in the tombs (ibid. p. 152).

Now, as Palestine lay between Babylonia and Assyria on the one hand, and Egypt on the other, and formed the highway of union and commerce between them, we may expect to find the materials of writing very similar to those in common use in the two great centres of civilisation, with which it was so intimately connected. Accordingly, we do find mention made in the Old Test. of both of the tablet (huch) and of the roll (megillah); but we are not distinctly informed of what substance either tablet or roll was composed. From the character of the soil of Palestine it is pretty certain that the tablet was not, as usually in Assyria and Babylonia, of baked clay, unless we are to suppose an importation of Assyrian tablets, which is scarcely possible. As the writing seems to have been inscribed on these tablets when the clay was fresh, which, of course, it could not be after the lapse of time occupied in its carriage from Assyria to Palestine. Accordingly, brick is mentioned in Scripture usually in connection with Babylonia or Egypt (Gen. xi, 8; Exod. v, 7-19; Nah. iii, 14; Jer. xxxiii, 9; Ezek. iv, 1); rarely in connection with Palestine (Isa. ix, 9 [10]); and we read of no tablet of clay, but either of stone (as in the case of the tables of the law), or of metal (1 Kings vii, 46, Isa. vii, 18; comp. iii, 20, 32), or of wood, which was probably the material commonly employed for writing on (Luke i, 63; comp. 2 Esdras xiv, 24), where tablets of box-wood are mentioned.

The roll (or nipi, ntii) (Psa. xl, 8 [7]; Jer. xxxvi, 2, 4; Ezek. ii, 9), is not mentioned before the time of Jeremiah (unless Psa. 21 be earlier), and only in Jer. xvi, 12, in Ezek. ii, and i, and Zach. v (comp. also Isa. xxxiv, 4, 'And the heavens shall be rolled up as a book;') also 1 Esdras vi, 28; Luke iv, 17; Rev. vi, 14). Considering the close connection between Judas and...
Egypt, especially in the later period of the kingdom, it is probable that the roll was of papyrus, though we have no actual statement to that effect in the Hebrew Scriptures. All we certainly know is that a substance which might be torn and burned (Jer. xxxvi, 23); that the writing was with ink, 𐤀𐤁𐤃𐤃, and was arranged in columns, 𐤀𐤁𐤃𐤃; deludik, lit. doors (ibid.); and that both sides of the material were sometimes written on (Ezek. ii, 10). Mention is made of paper in 2 John 12; also 2 Esdras xv, 2; Tobit vii, 14. See Paper.

That prepared skins were used for writing on by the ancient Hebrews is probable, but we have no direct evidence in either book, letter, or document, was so called from its connection with a root meaning to "scrape," is very doubtful; it is certain that in Hebrew the root אָסָף has no such meaning. The only Scriptural mention of parchment is found in the New Test. (2 Titus iv, 12). See Parchment.

The tablet was inscribed with a stylus, which made an indentation in the substance of which the tablet was composed; the roll was written on with ink (2 Cor. iii, 3; 2 John 12; 3 John 18). In Ezek. ix, 3, 3, 11, the inksand, עַשׁ הַדּוֹס, is mentioned. As to the stylus or pen, the Hebrew word for it is עַשׁ הַדּוֹס, the derivation of which is obscure. It is found in four passages, in two of which it has attached to it the epithet "iron" (Job xix, 24; Jer. xvii, 1); in the other two (Psa. xiv, 2; Jer. viii, 8) it denotes the pen in common use among the scribes or scribes, of whatever sort that may have been. The word עַשׁ הַדּוֹס, choret, which is usually conjoined by writers upon this subject with עַשׁ הַדּוֹס, is mentioned only in one somewhat obscure passage (Isa. viii, 2) as an instrument of writing; it has probably some connection with chartumum, the name of the Egyptian sacred scribes. In Egypt the reed-pen seems to have been in use from the earliest times. It even forms part of one of the ancient alphabetic characters. "The reed-pen and inksand, and scribes employed in writing, appear among the sculptures in the tombs of Gizeh, which are contemporaneous with the pyramids themselves" (Kennic, Egypt, ii, 102, 142). Wucherer, Johann Friedrich, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born March 8, 1806, at Nördlingen. He studied at Erlangen, and, after completing his course, acted for some time as assistant minister in his native place. In 1823 he was appointed hospital-preacher of Nördlingen, and pastor at Baldingen. In 1855 he was called to Aha, and died there, Dec. 28, 1881. Wucherer was a faithful follower of his Master, and the many difficulties which he had to overcome in the early period of his ministry proved to be a blessing not only to him but also to his flock. He wrote, Vom evangelisch-lutherischen Hauptpoetischen Entarten (Nördlingen, 1846) — Zu einem Zweigesis (ibid. ed.). — Populäre Einleitung in die Schriften des neuen Testaments (ibid. 1854). — Der Pfarrer in der hand (ibid. 1855). Wilfer, Daniel, a Lutheran theologian of Ger- many, was born at Nuremberg, July 3, 1617, and died there, May 11, 1685, professor and pastor. He is best known as the author of that fine hymn, O Ewigkeit, O Ewigkeit, a favorite with thearian Niebuhr. It has been translated into English in the Lyra Germani, ii, 26: "Eternity! Eternity! How long shall thou, Eternity!" See Will, Nürnberger Gelehrten Lexikon, iii, 1757; Wulfersche Lebenspredigt (Nuremberg, 1688); Koch, Gesch. d. deutschen Kirchenliedes, i, 194 sq. (B. P.)

Wulflam, archbishop of Canterbury, was consecrated by archbishop Athelom, to whom both at Wells and at Canterbury, he was the successor. One of the first public acts he was called upon to perform, within two years of his appointment, was to officiate at the coronation of Athelstan, which occurred in 925. In January, soon after the coronation, his services were required at Tamworth, to officiate at a political marriage. Again, at a later period, the good offices of the archbishop of Canterbury were required at the marriage of the daughter of Edward the Elder to Hugh the Great, count of Paris, the son of Robert I. As a rule he was never called upon to officiate in religious matters, or to promote church privileges. He died in 942. See Hook, Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, i, 389 sq.

Wulfisch or Wulflam, an ecclesiastical of Longobard origin, established himself as a stylist, in the latter half of the 6th century, in the district of Trier, France, and gained the admiration of the people for whose conversion he prayed, preaching to the multitudes that thronged around him, and persuading them to destroy their idols. See Neander, Hist. of the Church, iii, 28.

Wufred, an English ecclesiastical of the 10th century, went over as a missionary to Skara, in West Gothland, and very inconsiderately seized an axe and dashed to death a man to whom a metal object that he was attacked by a body of furious pagans and put to death at once. See Neander, Hist. of the Church, iii, 292.

Wulfried, archbishop of Canterbury, was nominated by Ethelhard, and was the first occupant of that important office. His consecration took place in August, 905, and it is said that, although he held the archbishopric for more than twenty-eight years, he died nothing worthy of record. He died March 24, 882. See Hook, Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, i, 270 sq.

Wunderbar, Reuben, a Jewish teacher at Riga, where he died, Aug. 19, 1868, is the author of, תּוֹלֵק הַנִּצָּה, i. e., Biblisch-talmudische Medizin (Riga, 1850-69, 2 vols.). Besides, he contributed largely to Fürst's Orient and other periodicals. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. iii, 587. (B. P.)

Wundt, Daniel Ludwig, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born Nov. 12, 1741, at Creuznach. He studied at Heidelberg, was appointed in 1766 second preacher in the parish church of Tübingen, and in 1770 first preacher at Oppenheim. In 1778 he was called to his native place, where he labored till 1788, when he was appointed second professor of theology at Heidelberg, advancing in 1787 to the first professorship. He died Feb. 19, 1805. Würfel, Andreas, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Nuremberg, Feb. 28, 1718, and died at Offenhausen, in Bavaria, Oct. 6, 1768. He is the author of Lebensbeschreibungen aller Geistlicher, welche in der Reichsstadt Nürnberg auf deren Land seit der Reformation gediht (Nuremberg, 1756; continued until 1779 by Waldau, ibid. 1779-85). — Historische Nachrichten der Judengemeinde, welche ehedem in der Reichsstadt Nürnberg angesiedelt waren, aber anno 1499 ausgeschieden worden (ibid. 1758). — Historische Nachricht von der Judengemeinde in der Hofmark Fürth, etc. (Frankfort and Prague, 1754). Wurksaiti were priests of the third order among pagan Prussians. Gria was the lead as supreme head; next in order come the Griaaites, then the Siggones, and lastly the Wurksaiti. They are said to have had control of the management of religious duties. Possibly the same dedication, discipline, and sacrifice of the offerings were their main duty.

Württemberg, The Kingdom of, has, according to the census of 1880, a population of 1,971,255 souls, of whom 1,861,412 are Protestants, 590,405 Roman Catholics, 13,536 Jews, etc. The constitution of the Protestant Church is consistorial. The highest legislative and administrative authority is, so far as regards purely ecclesiastical matters, vested in the consistory, composed of a president, a legal councillor, and seven ordinary councillors (five laymen and two ecclesiastics), who are all appointed by the king. Since 1848, however, the consistory has been established as the consistory, and acting in union with it, a series of parish councils, diocesan synods, and annual synods-general, to which the membership is elective. The territory of the Church is divided into six superintendencies, each with a "primate" at the head. These prates supervinted 49 deaneries, comprising 906 parishes, with 1021 pastors. Each prate has to visit his dioce every three years. The general synod meets every four years, and is composed of fifty-six members, viz., of forty-nine members representing the different deaneries, one representing the theological faculty of Tubingen, and six nominated directly by the king. The University of Tubingen has a faculty of Protestant theology, consisting of five ordinary professors, besides professors extraordinary and "Privatdocenten." The Roman Catholics in Württemberg form the episcopal diocese of Stuttgart, which comprises 672 parishes and 946 priests, paid by the state. The University of Tubingen has also a faculty of Roman Catholic theology, consisting of six professors. The diocese of Rottenburg belongs to the ecclesiastical province of Freiburg, to which its relations have been arranged by the papal bull Pro visa solvendi, of Aug. 11, 1821. The present incumbent of the episcopal see at Rottenburg is the famous Church historian Heffe. Besides the Catholic faculty, there is also a clerical seminary at Rottenburg, with three professors. The relations of the Jews are regulated by the law of April 25, 1825. The territory of the synagogue is divided into twelve rabbinates, which are governed by an ecclesiastical council, consisting of the chief rabbis of Stuttgart and five laymen, who are responsible to the ministry for ecclesiastical affairs. Würzburg (or Wurtszburg), Council of (Concilium Herbipolense). Würzburg is a fortified city of Bavaria, capital of the circle of Lower Franconia, one hundred and forty miles north-west of Munich, on the right bank of the Main. An ecclesiastical council was held there March 18, 1297, in the presence of the emperor Rudolph, by the legate, John, bishop of Tuscumb, assisted by four archbishops, viz., those of Mayence, Cologne, Salzburg, and Vienna, some of their suffragans, and many abbots. Forty-two canons were published.

The first five relate to the moral conduct and manner of life of the clergy, prohibiting, for example, the wearing of gold rings, nor play with dice, and to dress according to their calling.

1. Forbids to celebrate two masses in one day, except in case of necessity.

2. Orders the Body of our Lord shall be carried with proper solemnity to the sick, and to women near the time of their delivery.

3. Forbids to hold two vicarages.

4. Orders those who have received investiture at the hands of laymen to resign their benefices into the bishop's hands, and to deliver the colligation property to the bishop.

5. Forbids any fee for the nuptial benediction and for funerals.

6. Forbids to certify a church without the bishop's consent.

7. Forbids to excommunicate wives or mothers on account of their deceased husband's or children's debts, except they have succeeded to their property.

Wurtze, Karl Friedrich Adolf, a Protestant theologian and philosopher of Germany, was born at Breslau, Nov. 10, 1818. Here he studied theology and philosophy, and lectured from 1843 as a private teacher on philosophy. In 1854 he was called as professor of theology to Berlin, and in 1861 as ordinary professor to Halle, where he died, April 12, 1870. He wrote: Abhandlung über die Cognoscens der heidnischen Religion vor der Zeit Jesu u. der Apostel, a prize essay (Hague, 1850). — Geschichte des Heidentums in Bezug auf Religion, Wissen, Kunst, Stütlichkeit und Staatslehre (Breslau, 1861-83, 2 vols.) — Der deutsche Volkserbe (Hamburg, 1856; 3d ed. 1868). — Handbuch der christlichen Sittenlehre (Berlin, 1863-65, 2 vols.; Engl. transl. by J. P. Lacroix, ChristiWEth, N. Y., 1873, 2 vols.). After his death was published Zur Geschichte der Bartholomäusbrunnen von Dr. S. Müller-Præmestin (Leipsic, 1878). Besides these works he published some minor writings. See Literaturarchiv Handwörterbuch, 1870, p. 489; Theologisches Universallexikon, s. v.; Zuchold, Bibl. Theo. ii, 1478. (B. P.)

Wylie, Samuel, D.D., a Reformed Presbyterian minister, was born in Ireland about 1732, and came to the United States when a boy. He was educated under the supervision of his uncle, the Rev. S. B. Wyile, D.D., of Philadelphia. He graduated from the University of Pennsylvania and at the theological seminary of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, and was ordained in 1818. He acted as a home missionary until 1820, when he was settled as pastor of a church in Sparta, Ill., where he remained until his death, March 20, 1872. He exerted a wide influence in his field of labor, above a dozen churches having been formed from the nucleus of his original congregation.

XENOPHANES, a Greek philosopher, was born at Colophon, Ionia, probably about 570 B.C. He was the son of an Orthophoros, or, according to others, of Deaion. He left his native land and sought himself to the Ionian colonies, Sicily, Zancle, and Carthage. There can be no doubt that, as the founder of the Eleatic school, he lived for some time at Elea (Yela, in Italy, founded by the Phocians about 556 B.C.), the foundation of which he had sung. His death occurred probably about 480 B.C., though amid the conflicting statements concerning his age it is best to say that he lived between the times of Pythagoras and Heraclitus, for he mentions the one and is mentioned by the other.

Xenophanes was a poet as well as a philosopher. He wrote an epic poem of two thousand verses on the founding of Elea, and a poem on the foundation of his native city, Colophon. His philosophical doctrines were expressed in poetical form, and from the few fragments of his poetry which remain, and the brief notices of him by other writers, we collect what we know of his doctrines. He attacked Herodotus and Homer, in hexameter verses, elegiacs, and iambic verses, for their representations of the deities, to whom those poets attribute all the vices and weaknesses of men. He taught that God was one, unlimited in form or mind. He pointed out the facts that the representations of gods, depicting them as having bodies like their own, and declared that if animals could make representations of the deity, they would make them like themselves. Assuming that the deity is the most powerful of beings, he proves the necessity of being one, and alike endowed with equal powers of seeing, comprehending, and hearing. He asserted that the deity is of a spherical form, neither limited nor unlimited, neither moving nor at rest. God rules and directs all, and things as they appear to us are the imperfect manifestations of the One eternal. He maintains that God's true nature cannot be known. He has been charged with being a pantheist, but from this accusation certain principles take some pains to defend him. In the early history of philosophy the language of the science was not well defined, so that many expressions which have since come to mean certain things did not then have those meanings. Certain expressions of Xenophanes have been quoted by modern writers to prove his pantheism; but other quotations, as, for example, those of Aristotle, show that he speaks of God as a Being eternal, and distinct from the visible universe.

XENORIN, a sect of materialists in Japan, who believe in no other life than the present.

XEOODINIA are a sect among the Japanese who acknowledge a future state, and believe in the immortality of the soul. Amida is their favorite deity, and the bonzes of this sect go up and down the public streets and roads, summoning devotees by the sound of a bell, and distributing indulgences and dispensations, constantly crying in a chantin tone, "O ever blessed Amida, have mercy upon us."

XEROGRAPHIA (Xerography, from gr. Xeritis, dry, and gyneis, to eat) was first-day in the early ages of the Christian Church, on which they ate nothing but bread and water, but afterwards pulses, herbs, and fruits were added. Epiphanius assures us that throughout the Holy Week people continue to use dry food, viz. bread and salt, using water only in the evening" (Compend. dog. Cath.). This great fast kept was six days of the Holy Week for devotion, and by obligation; so that the Church continued the Montanists, who, of their own private authority, would not only oblige all people to observe the xerographia of the Holy Week, but also other fasts that they had established, as well as several Lent. The Essenes, whether they were Jews or the first Christians of Alexandrea, observed xerographia on certain days; for Philip and his companions put nothing to their bread and water but salt and hyssop. During Lent fish was the only animal food permitted; but, according to some authorities, fowls were afterwards added.

XERES (Xeris) : Pers. KshKaوا، or Khorsa; according to Benfer, XshXshg, king of Persia, is chiefly known for his gigantic but unsuccessful invasion of Greece (Herod. vii, viii; Diod. Sic. xi). He was the son of Darius Hystaspis, and of Atossa, daughter of Cyrus. He succeeded his father, 485 B.C., having been brought up in the kingdom of Persia a short time before his father's death, who preferred him before his elder brother Artabanus, because the latter was born while Darius was a private individual; but Xerxes was born after his elevation to the throne. He was the fourth king prophesied of in Dan. xi, 2: "Be- hold there shall stand the king of Persia; and yet three kings in Persia (Cyrus, Cambyses, and Darius, son of Hydaspes), and the fourth (Xerxes) shall be far richer than they all; and by his strength through his riches he shall stir up all against the realm of Greece." Xerxes' army, when his march from Sardis: his army was moved forward with great deliberation, and being numbered on its arrival in Europe was found to muster 1,700,000 foot, and 80,000 horse, besides camels, car- riots, and ships of war. These numbers, and the undis- ciplined crowds who must have attended them, to supply their necessities, are perfectly bewildering to the imagination; and they become still more so when their varied costumes, the silken and gilded tents, the standards, the costly armor, and the variety of national weapons are considered. One of the political parties of Greece, it must be borne in mind, was in league with the Persian court, and the terror of the country verged upon despair of maintaining their liberties. Those misadventures, however, while the pass of Thermopylae was defended by Leonidas and his Spartans, succeeded in rallying their countrymen, and, having created a navy, defeated Xerxes at the battle of Salamis. This great event took place in the year of the expedition, 480 B.C. The Persians were allowed to retreat in such order as they could, but Mardonius, one of the principal commanders, reserved a more manageable army, the best he could pick from the flying host, and with these he was defeated by the combined Greeks the year following. After the return of Xerxes from his unsuccessful campaign, he ordered the demolition of all the Greek temples in Asia; that of Diana at Ephesus alone being spared. He had been instructed in the religion of the magi by Zoroaster, and was inspired with a horror of idolatry; therefore he also destroyed all the idols in his empire. In 477 B.C. he attempted to fulfill the prophetic promise of Jeremiah vii. 2, and li, 44-47. See BABYLON. Xerxes was assassinated by Artabanes, one of the great officers of his court, who aspired to found a new dynasty in Persia, 465 B.C. See Smith, Dict. of Class. Biog. s. v. See Faramur.

This prince was, according to most interpreters (see especially Scaliger, Emend. Temp. vi, 587, 696), the Ahura Mazda (اًهرامزدا) of the book of Esther (q. v.), an identification which the whole romantic story of Esther goes to confirm (see Rosenmüller, Alterth. I, i, 388 sq.; Hähnichen, Einl. ins A. T. II, i, 389 sq.; Baumgarten, De Fide Libri Esth. p. 128 sq.; Rödiger, in the Halle Encyclop. I, xxxviii, 236 sq.). The enumeration of his resources (Esth. I, 2; ii, 16) agrees with the statement of Herodotus (vii, 7 sq.) respecting the rallying of his forces against Egypt; and the date of the great feast, the third year of his reign (Esth. i, 8), tallies with the successful conclusion of that expedition which took place in his second year, the luxurious character of the carousal, moreover, being consistent with Persian custom. (Herod. i, 139). Between the first and the second year, the sultan Vahshi, resulting from that feast, and the reception of Esther into his harem in his seventh year (Esth. ii, 16), falls appropriately the Greek campaign which Xerxes, after several years of preparation, undertook in his fifth year (Herod. vii. 20). The duration of the expedition, from the crossing of the Hellespont by Xerxes (ibid. vii, 38 sq.), to the return to Susa, is disputed by chronologers (see Baumgarten, l. c. p. 142 sq.); but two years is a most probable interval (see Clinton, Fasti Hellen. ii, 28; L'Art de Vérifier les Dates, ii, 887 sq.). Again, the extent of the dominions (Esth. i, 1 sq.) corresponds with the classical description of Xerxes; he occupied Ethiopia, which Cambyses had already attempted (Herod. iii, 20 sq.; moreover, the Ethiopians served in Xerxes' armies, ibid. vii, 69 sq.), as well as India, to which Durai Hystaspis had advanced (ibid. iv, 44 sq.). Moreover, the voluptuousness and impieness of women (Esth. v, 8; vii, 8 sq.; viii, 8 sq.; ix, 12) in the time of Xerxes are well known (Herod. ix, 10 sq.). But especially does the vexation which Xerxes experienced from the failure of his expedition to Greece explain why, while living entirely for his own pleasure (Cicero, Tus. v, 7), he should not only abandon the most important affairs of state to an upstart (Esth. iii. 16), but also give his assent to deeds of violence, now on this side, and now on that (iii, 10 sq.; vii, 10; viii, 8); all of which facts characterize, according to our ideas, a senseless (Herod. vii, 85, goddess (viii, 109), and cruel despot (viii, 87 sq.). Finally the raising of a large tax (Esth. x, 1) may readily have followed the exhaustion of the royal treasury by the disastrous expedition into Greece. See ARABURUS. Xuarez, Juan, an early Roman Catholic prelate in America, was a native of Valencia, Spain, and entered the Franciscan order in the province of St. Gabriel, established by Martin at a time when, by the zealous reforms of cardinal Cisneros, the Franciscans of Spain were full of fervor and piety. When Cortez applied for Franciscan missionaries to undertake the conversion of the thickly settled towns in the kingdom just reduced by his arms, a Spanish father, Francis de los Angeles, had just been elected general of the order of St. Francis. For the leader of the twelve missionaries chosen, he selected Martin de Valencia, and fourth among their number was Juan Xuarez. With his superior, he embarked at San Lucas, Jan. 16, 1524, and on May 18 they reached the castle of San Juan de Ulloa, before Vera Cruz, and met Cortez at Mexico. Father Xuarez was placed at Huecoango, and as the result of his labors there the temple, where human sacrifices had often been perpetrated, was destroyed. After laboring here two years he returned to Spain, in 1526, accompanied by some of his Indian pupils, and sent out six more missionaries. In 1527 Xuarez was assigned to the expedition then fitting out by Fampillo de Narvaez, which was intended to establish in Florida a settlement to rival that of Mexico. Xuarez was not only made commissary of his order, but was nominated bishop of Florida, his diocese to extend from the Atlantic to Rio de las Palmas, Mexico. With four Franciscan fathers and other priests, he sailed from San Lucas, June 17, 1527, and reached Florida in April. Misfortune attended this ill-starred expedition. The people were fierce and hostile, and the force, thinned by disease and constant engagements, crept along the northern coast of the gulf of Mexico. The brave Narvaez was driven out to sea, and never again heard of. The party then scattered, and many perished on an island called Mahado, probably that called massacred by the French. There is no record of the death of bishop Xuarez and his companions, John de Palos. Alvar Nunez Cabeza de Vaca, with three others, reached a Spanish post in Sonora, but has left no details. They either perished of hunger or at the hands of the Indians, about the close of 1528. The portraits of the original twelve Franciscans of Mexico have been preserved, and that of Xuarez appears in the relation of Cabeza de Vaca. See (N. Y.) Catholic Almanac, 1872, p. 67.
YARN

Yorubas enjoy the entire New Test., together with the books of Genesis to Ruth, Psalms, and Daniel, of the Old Test., in their vernacular (B. P. H.).

Yarn (_metric, a collection; or_tape, twine).
The notice of yarn is contained in an extremely obscure passage in 1 Kings x, 28 (2 Chron. i, 16). "Solomon had horses brought out of Egypt, and linen yarn; the king's merchants received the linen yarn at a price." The Sept. gives de oros, implying an original reading of ofo, the Vulg. has de eo, which is merely a Latinized form of the original. The Hebrew received text is questionable, from the circumstance that the second mikveh has its final vowel lengthened as if it were in the status constructus. The probability is that the term does refer to some entrepot of Egyptian commerce, but whether Teshoah, as in the Sept., or Coa, or as in the Vulg., is doubtful. Gesenius (Theutet, p. 1929) gives the sense of "number" as applying equally to the merchants and the horses: "A band of the king's merchants bought a drove (of horses) at a price." but the verbal arrangement in 2 Chron. is opposed to this rendering. Thieneus (Ezeg. Handb. on 1 Kings x, 28) combines this sense with the former, giving to the first mikveh the sense "from Teshoah," to the second the sense of "drove." Bertheau (Ezeg. Handb. on 2 Chron. i, 16) and Furst (Lex. a. v.) side with the Vulgate, and support the view called Coa, the Egyptian frontier: "The king's merchants from Coa (i. e. stationed at Coa) took the horses from Coa at a price." The sense adopted in the A. V. is derived from Jewish interpreters. See LINN.

Yashpeh. See Jabez.

Yatun. The religion of the Yatun, a name given to the enemies of Zoroaster in the Zend-Avesta. These were overthrown by Darius, the son of Hyastaspes, and the religion of Zoroaster re-established. See Lenormant, Chaldæan Magic, p. 219.

Year (מָעָשָׂה). skandh, lit. repetition, kindred with מָעָשָׂה, second; f roc, the highest ordinary division of time, marked by the solar revolutions of the seasons. See TIME.

I. Years, properly so called.—Two years were known to, and apparently used by, the Hebrews. See CALENDAR.

1. A year of 360 days, containing 12 months of 30 days each, is indicated by certain passages in the prophetic oracles. The time, times, and a half; of Daniel (vii, 25; xii, 7), was "77 years; 2°, 3°, 1200 years." 2°, 3°, 1200 means "year," evidently the same period as the 42 months (Rev. xvi, 2) and 1260 days of the Revelation (xi, 3; xi, 6), for 360 x 3.5 = 1260, and 30 x 42 = 1260. This year perfectly corresponds to the Egyptian Vague year, without the intercalary days. It appears to have been in use in Noah's time, or at least in the time of the writer of the narrative of the flood, for in that narrative the interval from the 17th day of the 2d month to the 17th day of the 7th of the same year appears to be stated to be a period of 180 days (Gen. vii, 11, 24; viii, 5, 4; comp. 18), and, as the 1st, 2d, 7th, 10th, 11th, and 12th months of one year mentioned (vii, 11; viii, 4, 5, 13, 14), the 1st day of the 16th month of this year being separated from the 1st day of the 1st month of the next year by an interval of at least 54 days (vii, 5, 6, 10, 12, 13), we can only infer a year of 12 months. Idolers disputes the former inference, arguing that as the water first began to sink after 150 days (and then had been fifteen cubits above all high mountains), it must have sunk for some days ere the ark could have rested on Ararat, so that the second date must have been more than 150 days later than the first (Huffsch, i, 69, 70, 467, 479). This argument depends upon the expression "high mountains," and upon the height of "mountains of Ararat," upon which the ark rested (Gen. viii, 4), and we are certainly justified by Shemitic usage, if we do not consider the usual inference of the great height attained by the flood to be a necessary one (Genesis of the Earth and of Man, 2d ed. p. 97, 98). The exact correspondent of the interval mentioned to 5 months of 30 days each, and the use of a year of 360 days, or 12 such months, by the prophets, the latter fact overlooked by Idolers, favor the idea that such a year is here meant, unless, indeed, one identical with the Egyptian Vague year, of 12 months of 30 days and 5 intercalary days. The settlement of this question depends upon the nature and history of these years, and our information on the latter subject is not sufficiently certain to enable us to do more than hazard a conjecture.

A year of 360 days is the rudest known. It is formed of 12 spurious lunar months, and was probably the parent of the lunar year of 354 days, and the Vague year of 365. That it should have continued any time in use would be surprising were it not for the convenient length of the months. The Hebrews were not so long as to the time of the Exodus, as we shall see, were evidently lunar, though in some manner rendered virtually solar, and we may therefore infer that the lunar year was as old as the date of the Exodus. As the Hebrew year was not an Egyptian year, and as nothing is said of its being new, save in its time of commencement, it was perhaps earlier in use among the Israelites, and either brought into Egypt by them or borrowed from Shemitic settlers.

The Vague year was certainly in use in Egypt as an remote an age as the earlier part of the 12th dynasty (cir. 2050 B.C.). And there can be no doubt as to that it was there used at the time of the building of the Great Pyramid (cir. 2650 B.C.). The intercalary days seem to be of Egyptian institution, for each of them was dedicated to one of the great gods, as if the innovation had been thus made permanent by the priests, and perhaps rendered popular as a series of days of feasting and rejoicing. The addition would, however, date from a very early period, that of the final settlement of the Egyptian religion.

As the lunar year and the Vague year run up parallel to so early a period as that of the Exodus, and the former seems to have been then Shemitic, the latter then, and for several centuries earlier, Egyptian, and probably of Egyptian origin, we may reasonably conjecture that the former originated from a year of 360 days in Asia, the later form, 365, in Africa, this primitive year having been used by the Noachians before their dispersion.

2. The year used by the Hebrews from the time of the Exodus may be said to have been then instituted, since a current month, Abib, on the 14th day of which the first of the month was kept, was then the seventh month of the year. The essential characteristics of this year can be clearly determined, though we cannot fix those of any single year. It was essentially solar, for the offerings of productions of the earth, first-fruits, harvest-produce, and ingathered fruits were, in certain days of the year, two of which were in the periods of great feasts, the third itself a feast reekoned from one of the former days. It seems evident that the year was made to depend upon these times, and it may be observed that such a calendar would tend to cause thankfulness for God's good gifts, and would put in the background the great luminaries which the heathen worshipped in Egypt and in Canaan. Though the year was thus essentially solar, it is certain that the months were lunar, each commencing with a new moon. There must, therefore, have been some method of adjustment. The first point to be decided is how the commencement of each year was fixed. On the 16th day of Abib ripe ears of corn were to be offered as first-fruits of the harvest (Lev. ii, 14; xxiii, 10, 11): this was the day on which the sickle was begun to be put to the corn (Deut. xvi, 10, 11), and no doubt the first time that, until the offering of first-fruits had been made no harvest-work was to be begun (Am. iii, 10, 5). He also states that ears of barley were offered (ibid.). That this was the case, and that the ears were the earliest ripe, is evident from the following circumstances. The reaping of barley commenced the harvest (2 Sam. xxi, 9), that of wheat following, apparently without any considerable interval (Ruth ii, 28). On the day of Pentecost, the barley is considered as the first part of the harvest, and it was therefore called the Feast of Harvest. It was reckoned from the commencement of the harvest, on the 16th day of the 1st month. The 50 days must include the whole time of the harvest of both wheat and barley throughout Palestine. According to the observations of modern travellers, barley is gathered in the warm parts of Palestine, in the first days of April. The barley-harvest, therefore, begins about half a month or less after the vernal equinox. Each year, if solar, would thus begin about that equinox, when the earliest ears of barley must be ripe. As, however, the months were lunar, the commencement of the year must have been fixed by a new moon near this point of time. The new moon must have been that which fell about or next after the equinox, not more than a few days before, on account of the offering of first-fruits. Idolers, whose observations of the moon were not very accurate, but were so far following the sun, that the new moon was chosen by observation of the forwardness of the barley-crops in the warmer parts of the country (Hardenbach, i, 490). But such a method would have caused confusion on account of the different times of the beginning of the seasons of the Exodus, and in the first days of the period of the Judges there would often have been two separate commencements of the year in regions divided by hostile tribes, and in each of which the Israelites population led an existence almost independent of any other branch. It is more likely that the Hebrews would have determined their new-year's day by the observation of heliacal or other star-risings or settings known to mark the right time of the solar year. By such a method the beginning of any year could have been fixed a year before, either to one day, or, suppose the month-commencement fixed by actual observation of the vernal or the autumnal equinoxes. The year we have in the period of the Judges would therefore have been two beginnings, respectively at about the vernal and the autumnal equinoxes. The former supposition is a hypothesis, the latter may almost be proved. The strongest point of evidence as to two beginnings of the year from the time of the Exodus to the time of the Judges, is in this relation by Idolers, is the circumstance that the sabbatical and jubilee years commenced in the 7th month, and no doubt on the 10th day of the 7th month, the Day of Atonement (Lev. xxx, 9, 10), and as this year immediately followed a sabbatical year, the latter must have begun in the same manner. Both were full years, and therefore must have commenced on the 1st day. The jubilee year was proclaimed on the 1st day of the month, the Day of Atonement standing in the same relation to its beginning, and perhaps to the civil commencing with the beginning of the year, inter alia, on account of this beginning. This would be the most convenient, if not the necessary commencement of a year of total cessation from the labors of agriculture, as a year so commencing would comprise the whole round of such occupations in regular sequence from seed-time to harvest, and from harvest to vintage and gathering of fruits. The command as to both years, apart from the mention of the Day of Atonement, clearly shows this, unless we suppose, but this is surely unwarrantable, that the injunction in the two places in which it occurs follows the regulations of the people of the Levites in the other parts of the land (Exod. xxxiii, 11; Lev. xxv, 3, 4, 11), but that this was not intended to apply in the case of the observance. Two expressions, used with reference to the time of the Feast of Ingathering, on the 10th day of the 7th month, must be here noticed. This feast is spoken of as γεωργίας, "in the going out" or "end of the year" (Exod. xxv, 16), and as γεωργίας ἀρχή, [as] the change of the year (xxxiv, 22), the latter a vague expression. We may as well understand it, but this is not in point with the other, whether indicating the turning-point of a natural year, or the half of the year by the sacred reckoning. The rabbinical use the term Γεωργίας to designate the commencement of each of the four seasons into which they divide the year (Hardenbach, i, 556, 561). Our view is confirmed by the similarity of the 1st and 7th months as to their observances, the one containing the Feast of Unleavened Bread, from the 15th to the 21st inclusive; the other, that of Tabernacles, from the 15th to the 22d. Evidence in the same direction is found in the special sanctification of the 1st day of the 7th month, which in the blowing of trumpets reenacted the dedication of the Passover year on the Day of Atonement. We therefore hold that from the time of the Exodus there were two beginnings of the year, with the 1st of the 1st and the 1st of the 7th month, the former being the sacred reckoning, the latter, used for the operations of agriculture, the civil reckoning. In Egypt, in the present day, Moslems use the lunar year for their religious observances, and for ordinary affairs, except those of agriculture, which they regulate by the Coptic Julian year.

3. We must here notice the theories of the derivation of the Hebrew year from the Egyptian Vague year, as they are connected with the tropical point or points, and agricultural phenomena, by which the former was regulated. The Vague year was commonly used by the Egyptians; and from it only, if from an Egyptian year, is the Hebrew likely to have been derived. Two theories have been forming connected the two years at the Exodus.

(1) Some hold that Abib, the 1st month of the Hebrew year by the sacred reckoning, was the Egyptian Epiphi, called in Coptic, Epepi, and in Arabic, by the modern Egyptian Abib or Eib, 11th month of the Vague year. The similarity of sound is remarkable, but it must be remembered that the Egyptian name is derived from that of the goddess of the moon, Pepet or APAP-T (7) whereas the Hebrew name has the sense of "an ear of corn, a green ear," and is derived from the unused root 2223, traceable in 228, "verdure," 2228, "fruit," Arabic, 226, "green fodder." Moreover, the Egyptian P is rarely, if ever, represented by the Hebrew V, and the converse is not common. Still stronger evidence is afforded by the fact that we find in Egyptian the root ABB, "a nosegay," which is evidently related to Abib and its cognates. Supposing, however, that the Hebrew calendar was formed by fixing the Egyptian Epiphi as the 1st month, what would be the chronological result? The latest date to which the Exodus is assigned is about 1290 B.C. in the Julian, or 1820 B.C., the month Epiphi of the Egyptian Vague year commenced May 16, 44 days after the day of the vernal equinox, April 2, very near which the Hebrew year must have begun. Thus, at the latest date of the Exodus, there is an interval of a month and a half between the beginning of the Hebrew year and Epiphi 1. This interval represents about 180 years, through which the Vague year would retrograde in the Julian until the commencement of Epiphi corresponded to the vernal equinox, and no method can reduce it below 100. It is possible to effect thus much by conjecturing that the month Abib began somewhat after this tropical point, though the precise details of the state of the crops at the time of the plagues, as compared with the phenomena of agriculture in Lower Egypt at the present day, does not half a month an extreme extension. At the time of the plague of hail, the barley was in the ear and was smitten, with the flax, but the wheat was not sufficiently forward to be destroyed (Exod. ix, 31, 32). In Lower Egypt, at the present day, this would be the case about the end of February and beginning of March. The Exodus cannot have taken place many days after the plague of hail, so that it must have occurred about or a little after the time of the vernal equinox, and thus Abib cannot possibly have begun much after that tropical point; half a month is therefore excessive. We have thus carefully examined the evidence as to the supposed derivation of Abib from Epiphi, because it has been carelessly taken for granted, and more carelessly alleged in support of the latest date of the Exodus.

(2) We have founded an argument for the date of the Exodus upon another comparison of the Hebrew year and the Vague year. We have seen that the sacred commencement of the Hebrew year was at the new moon about or next after, but not much before, the vernal equinox: the civil commencement must usually have been a little before the vernal equinox. At the earliest date of the Exodus computed by modern chronologers, about the middle of the 17th century B.C., the Egyptian Vague year commenced at or about the latter time. The Hebrew year, reckoned from the civil commencement, and the Vague year, reckoned from the sacred commencement, therefore, nearly or exactly agreed. We have already seen that the Hebrews in Egypt, if they used a foreign year, must be supposed to have used the Vague year. It is worth while to inquire whether a Vague year of this time would further suit the characteristics of the first Hebrew year. It would be necessary that the 14th day of Abib, on which fell the full moon of the Passover of the Exodus, should correspond to the 14th of Phamenoth, in a Vague year commencing about the autumnal equinox. A full moon fell on the 14th of Phamenoth, or Thursday, April 21, 1652 B.C., according to a Vague year commencing on the day of the vernal equinox, Oct. 10, 1658 B.C. A full moon would not fall on the same day of the Vague year within a shorter interval than twenty-five years, and the triple near coincidence of new moon, Vague year, and autumnal equinox would not recur in less than fifteen hundred Vague years (Encyclop. Britit, 8th ed. "Egypt," p. 458). This date of the Exodus, 1652 B.C., is only four years earlier than Hale's, 1648 B.C., and only six years later than that adopted in this Cyclopædia, 1658 B.C. In confirmation of this early date, it must be added that in a list of confederates defeated by Thothmes III at Megiddo, in the twenty-third year of his reign, are certain names that we believe can only refer to Israelitish tribes. The date of this king's accession cannot be later than that of 1640 B.C., and his twenty-third year cannot therefore be later than about 1440 B.C. Were the Israelites then settled in Palestine, no date of the Exodus but the longest would be tenable. See Chronolo.

II. Divisions of the Year.—1. Seasons.—Two seasons are mentioned in the Bible: γεωργία, "summer," and γής, "winter." The former properly means the time of cutting fruits, the latter, that of gathering them; therefore, the season corresponds to rather summer and autumn than summer and winter. But that they signify ordinarily the two grand divisions of the year, the warm and cold seasons, is evident from their use for the whole year in the expression γής τῆς γεωργίας τῆς γής, "summer and winter" (Psa. lxxiv, 17; Zech. xiv, 8; perhaps Gen. viii, 22), and from the mention of the "winter house" (Jer. xxxix, 22) and the "summer house" (Amos iii, 15, where both are mentioned together). Probably γής, when used without reference to the year (as in Job xxix, 4), retains its original signification. In the promise to Noah, after the flood, the following remarkable passage occurs: "While the earth remaineth, seed-time and harvest, and cold and hot, and summer and winter shall not cease" (Gen. viii, 22). Here "seed-time," γής, and "harvest," γεωργία, are evidently the agricultural seasons. It seems unreasonable to suppose that they mean winter and summer, as the beginnings of the periods of sowing and of harvest are not separated by six months, and they do not last for six months each, or nearly so long a time. The phrase "cold and heat," γης καὶ ψυξ, probably indicates the great alternations of temperature. The whole passage, indeed, speaks of the alternation of seasons, a reproduction of the seasons, or light and darkness. As we have seen, the year was probably then a wandering one, and therefore the passage is not likely to refer to it, but to natural phenomena alone. See Season.
2. Months.—The Hebrew months, from the time of the Exodus, were lunar. The year appears ordinarily to have contained 12, but, when intercalation was necessary, a 13th. The older year contained 12 months of 30 days each, and 5 months of 29 days each.

3. Weeks.—The Hebrews, from the time of the institution of the Sabbath, whether at or before the Exodus, reckoned by weeks, but, as no lunar year could have contained a number of weeks without a fractional excess, this reckoning was virtually independent of the year. The Feast of Unleavened Bread lasted 7 days; from the 15th to the 21st, inclusive, of the same month. Its first and last days were kept as Sabbath. The Feast of Weeks, or Pentecost, was celebrated on the day which followed 7 weeks, counted from the 16th of the 1st month, that day being excluded. It was called the Feast of Harvest, and Day of First-fruits. The Feast of Trumpets (lit. "of the sound of the trumpet") was kept as a Sabbath on the 1st day of the 7th month. The Day of Atonement (lit. "of Atonement") was a fast, held the 10th day of the 7th month. The Feast of Tabernacles, or Feast of Gathering, was celebrated from the 15th to the 22nd day, inclusive, of the 7th month. It was a long and solemn religious observance, and not known to be of higher than priestly authority, are the Feast of Purim, commemorating the defeat of Haman's plot; the Feast of the Dedication, recording the cleansing and re-dedication of the Temple by Judas Maccabaeus; and four fasts. See Festival.

III. Sacred Years. 1. The Sabbath-year, פהּיָּמֶל, the "fellow year," or, possibly, "year of remission," פֶּהֶל שַׁמֶּל, alone, kept every seventh year, was commanded to be observed as a year of rest from the labors of agriculture and of remission of debts. Two Sabbatical years are recorded, commencing and current, 164-3 and 186-5 B.C. See SABBATICAL YEAR.

2. The Jubilee Year, פֶּהֶל פֶּסָחַס, the "year of the trumpet," פֶּהֶל שַׁמָּה, alone, a like year, which immediately followed every seventh Sabbatical year. It has been disputed whether the jubilee year was every forty-nine or fiftieth. The former is more probable. See JUBILEE YEAR.

YEAR, ECCLESIASTICAL. The present arrangement of the ecclesiastical year is one which has grown up and developed during the course of a long time, representing the wisdom of successive ages. It was but natural that the anniversaries of the chief events of our Lord's life, and of the day on which the Holy Ghost came upon the Church, should be observed by the disciples. Accordingly, it is not surprising that one of the very earliest questions debated in the Church was as to the time of keeping Easter. As early as A.D. 158, Polycarp went to consult Anicetus at Rome on this question, and the controversy, which they could not settle, was brought to a close by the Council of Nicaea. Similar early testimony may be found as to other festivals and solemn days. The anniversary of our Lord's death, Good Friday, must have been kept from the first. So, too, Epiphanius (Heres. Ixxv.; Eriu. vi.) speaks of St. Paul as keeping the feast of Pentecost, and quotes Acts xx. 16, in that connection. We find notices of the Epiphany as early as A.D. 200. Augustine observes that it, with other anniversaries solemnities, was either instituted by the apostles themselves or by plenary councils.

It may be that these "days which the Lord hath made," there arose the commemorations of the saints and martyrs of the Church. These are of very high antiquity. In the epistle of the Church at Smyrna to the Church at Philomelium (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. iv. 15), the Christians of Smyrna tell their brethren where Polycarp's body was entombed, and how they intended to assemble at that place and celebrate his birthday with joy and gladness. The festival of St. Peter is traced back to the 8th century, and no doubt was observed much earlier as a festival of Peter and Paul. Origen names the celebration of the Holy Innocents, and Chrysostom the Festival of All Martyrs, which was kept on the octave of Pentecost.

Then, in course of time, other festivals were introduced; such as the Encena (q. v.). Bishops were also wont to keep the anniversaries of their consecrations, and of the shrines which had special devotions. It was given for great mercies and deliverances vouchsafed to them from God. Ordination was gradually limited to the Ember (q. v.) season, that thus there might be a special time of prayer and fasting on behalf of the newly ordained. Marriages were forbidden in certain parts of the year; as from Advent Sunday to Epiphany, from Septuagesima to the octave of Easter, three weeks before the feast of St. John, and from Rogation Sunday to Trinity Sunday. The special times for baptism were Epiphany, Easter, and Whitsunday, but chiefly the latter two. Intermingled certain festal seasons, one being kept as prayers were forbidden, as from Easter to Whitsunday inclusive, as ordered by the twelfth canon of Nicaea. On the Lord's day the standing posture was also adopted, in memory of our Lord's resurrection. Thus gradually, and harmonized the seasons of the Church. Kurta says:

"In the East, the symbolic relation between the natural and the ecclesiastical year was ignored, except so far as it was implied in the attempt to give to the events the significance of a Christian adaptation. To some extent, indeed, Western ideas had been imported in reference to the great festivals, such as Christmas, Easter, and Whitsunday, not in connection with the ordinary sun and feast days. At first the ecclesiastical year in the East commenced with Easter, afterwards with Quadragesima or with Epiphany, and ultimately in September, as under the old dispensation. The year was divided into six great periods, according to the 'lecho continua' of the gospels, and the Sundays observed corresponding names. The exs annexo the year 325 was divided into 10 portions immediately. The Latin ecclesiastical year commenced in Advent, and was divided into a 'Semestre Domini' and a 'Semestre ecclesiastica.' But the idea underlying this arrangement was only carried out in reference to the 'Semestre Domini'—Christmas, Easter, and Pentecost, in connection with the Sundays which they included, indicating the commencement, the development, and the completion of the history of the Church. In this sense reference to the 'Semestre ecclesiastica,' only the commencement of a symbolic arrangement was made. Thus the Feast of Peter and Paul, on the 29th of June, represented the foundation of the Church by the apostles; the Feast of Laurentius, the martyrs, on the 10th of September, awaiting the 'Church militant'; and the Feast of Michael, the archangel, on September 29, the complete success of the 'Church triumphant.' Other days were intended to mark the phases of three cycles of festivals we gather from the circumstances that the Sundays after Pentecost had been arranged in the above fashion post. Laterus, post. Lauret. But the idea was not developed; the frequency of salutations not only made this arrangement impossible, but rendered it even unnecessary to enroch on the 'Semestre Domini.' The principle of attempting to Christianize the worship of the heathen was authoritatively sanctioned by Gregory the Great, who, in 691, instructed the Anglo-Saxon missionaries to transform the heathen temples into churches, and the pagan into salina festivals or martyr days, 'ut dura mentes gradibus vel patientiis antico saeculi elevarint.' Salinas now took the places of the old gods, and the ecclesiastical was made in every respect to correspond with the natural year, only in a Christianized form.'

"Ecclesiastical festivals have seasons of home employment; holy days were turned into holidays; the Church's children learned, in private life, to think and to speak in the Church's way. The governors of the state fell almost unconsciously into the times and seasons of her who is not of this world; the clergy pricked on the shoulder of St. Martin; lawyers reckoned by Hilary or Trinity term; every class was taken to the same moulding influence. It was the same influence always and everywhere at work; sometimes beautifully, sometimes amusingly, sometimes extravagantly, but always really" (Neale, Essays, etc., p. 509). See CALENDAR.

YEZIDIS

Yebamoth. See Talmud.

Yedinovertzi, a name signifying co-religionists, was given to some members of the Russian sect of the Staroverots (see Russian Sects, i, 4) in the reign of the emperor Alexander (1801-25), when strong hopes were entertained of regaining them to the orthodox communion. They assume for themselves the name of Blagosloreni, or, The Blessed.

Yeomans, Edward Dobb, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at North Adams, Mass., Sept. 27, 1825. He spent one year in Princeton Theological Seminary, N. J., and became stated supply at New Columbia, Pa., from 1847 to 1849; was principal of the academy at Danville, from 1847 to 1850; ordained by the Presbytery of Northumberland, Nov. 29, 1854; pastor at Warrior Run from 1854 to 1858; of the Fourth Church of Trenton, N. J., from 1859 to 1860; of St. Peter's Church, Rochester, N. Y., from 1863 to 1867 of Central Church, Orange, N. J., in 1867 and died there, Aug. 25 of the latter year. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 160.

Yesterday (prop. ὕπόθεσις, e'mesh; but frequently ἑγερτήμα, after)mes; ἑκατοτόμος) is sometimes used in Heb. to denote all time past, however distant: as to-day denotes time present, but of a larger extent than the very day. (Zech. xiii. 9.) "He that is wont to push with his horn in time past." (Exod. xxxi. 29; Heb. yesterday.) "And it came to pass when all that went before Heb. yesterday) whereas thou campest but yesterday." (2 Sam. xxvii. 20.) "Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day, and forever." (Heb. xii. 8.) His doctrine, like his person, admits of no change; his truths are invariable. With him there is neither yester- day nor to-morrow, but one continued to-day. Job says (viii. 9), "We are but of yesterday, and know nothing; because our days upon earth are a shadow."

Yew Sunday. A term used in some parts of England to designate Palm-Sunday (q. v.).

Yew-tree, an evergreen tree of the genus taxus, allied to the pines, and valued for its wood or timber, is very commonly planted in the old English churchyards; and was formerly much used to decorate churches at Christmas, Palm-Sunday, and Easter.

Yezidis, an ancient sect of unknown origin, forming a tribe with a distinct nationality and language, in the neighborhood of Mosul, in Asiatic Turkey. This obscure race appears to be a relic of the ancient Chaldeans, and their religion seems to be a confused mixture of Gnostic Christianity, grafted upon the Chaldean superstitions, including Magianism, and then adulterated with Mohammedanism. They are generally called devil-worshippers, but profess to take their name from Azaz, the ancient name for God in the Yezidi dialect.

"We are Yezidis," they say, "that is, worshippers of God." The following account is taken from Layard's Nineveh and its Remains (New York, 1849), i, 246 sq.: "The Yezidis recognize one Supreme Belog, but, as far as we could learn, they do not offer up any direct prayer or sacrifice to it. They are superstitious, and endeavor to our questions on this subject, and appeared to shun, with superstitious awe, every topic connected with the existence and actions of the deity. The characteristic monos- mean forms of expression—half-loathe, half-enthusiasm— are nevertheless frequently in the mouths of the people, and are sometimes by their priests referred to. It is, however, never mentioned, and any allusion to it by others is immediately suppressed. They have, however, every expression which may resemble in sound the name of Satan, or the Arabic word for 'accursed.' When they speak of evil, they do so with the prefix 'Molek,' as Molek Tuba (king Peacock) or Molek el-Khit (the mighty angel). Their most distinct admission of the existence of a bronze or copper figure of a bird, which, how- ever, he was careful in explaining was only looked upon as a symbol, and a several days after birth. The woman, great sheif, and is carried with him wherever he may journey. This symbol is called Molek Tuba, and the officia in her sacred clothes. They believe, when the chief of the angelic host, now suffering punishment for his part in the divine will, but still all-power- ful, and to be restored heretofore to his high estate in the celestial hierarchy. He must be conciliated and re- versed, for the angel now has the power of civil evil to mankind, so will he hereafter have the power of rewarding them. Next to Satan, but inferior to him in might and power, are seven archangels, who exercise a great influence over the world: they are Gabrail, Michail, Raphael, Azrail, Didiel, Arazthiel, and Shemiel. Occasionally, when they speak of them, they often add the name of one who had taken the form of a man. He did not die on the Cross, but was translated. They hold the Old Test. in great reverence, and believe in the cosmogony of Genesis, the Deluge, and other events in the Bible. They do not reject the Koran, nor the Koran, but consider them less entitled to their veneration. Still, they always select passages from the latter for their tombs and holy places. Moreover, they look upon him as a prophet—as do Abraham and the patriarchs. They believe in the resurrection of the body as well as the reappearence of Ismael Mebil, giving cre- dence to the Mussulman fables relating to him. Shiel Adi is the same as Melchisedech. "It is difficult to trace their ceremonies to any particular source. They baptise in water, like the Christians; if possible, they do not baptise within a year, and on the other hand, the ceremony at the same age and in the same manner as the Mohammedans; and reverence the sun, and have many customs in common with the Sabaeans. They are accustomed to kiss the object on which its beams first fall; and I have frequent connexion with a com- pany at sunrise, observed them perform this ceremony. For fire, as symbolic, they have nearly the same rever- ence: the fire is profane if it, but frequently have their hands through the flames, kiss, and rub them over their right eyebrow, or sometimes over the whole face. The colors of the Sabaeans, to the Sabaeans, or to the sheik of the sanctuary, and never to be worn in dress, or to be used in their houses. They do not suffer their dead to be seen, but while performing their holy ceremonies, is that part of the heavens in which the sun rises, and towards it they turn the faces of their dead. In their funeral processions, in their cleanliness of habits, and in their frequent ablutions, they also resemble the Sabaeans. . . .

"The Persians, or, most reverenced after the great sheik, or religious head of the sect. They are be- lieved to have power, not only of interceding for the people, but of curing disease and insanity. They are ex- pected to lead a life of great sanctity and honesty, and are looked up to with great reverence. . . .

"The Sheiks are next in rank. They are acquainted with the hymns, and are expected to know something of the Arabic, in which the hymns are written. Their dress should be entirely white, except the skull-cap beneath their turban, which is black. They are sheik Adi they are the guardsians of his tomb, keep up the holy fires, and bring provisions and fuel to those who dwell within the town, and to pilgrims of the highest na- tion. . . .

"The Causas, or preachers, appear to be the most ac- tive members of the priesthood. They are sent by sheik Nasr on missions, going from village to village as teach- ers of the sacred books. They are able not only to perform on the flute and tambourine, both instruments being looked upon, to a certain extent, as sacred. . . .

"The melodies in the plains are either running in tone, or they wear coarse dresses of black or dark-brown cloth or cau- vass, descending to the knee and fitting lightly to the person, and a black turban, acres or over which is tied a red handkerchief. They perform all menial offices connected with the tomb, trim and light the votive lamps, and keep clean the sacred buildings.”

Ygdrasil, in Norse mythology, is the tree of the world, an enormous ash, whose branches touch the sky and stretch out over the entire surface of the earth. Three roots feed it: one extends to the assembling place of the gods, Asgard; another into the giant country, Jotunheim; and the third reaches down to Niflheim (infernal regions). By the spring, Urdarborn, live the three holy destinies of fate, who daily wash the roots with the water from the spring. This fountain is in the country of the Asas. By the other root, in Jotunheim, is the well of Minerva, and in the kingdom of Hel is the spring Hwegelselmi, from which the Niflheimers draw. The tree is inhabited by different animals. The two harts, Dunair and Durator, eat the buds of the tree. In the peak of the tree lives an eagle, which carries the hawk Vedurfilhun in his eyes. The bottom of the tree is the reptile Nidhogg lives, and gnaws at the roots of the tree; between both there travels up and down a squirrel, Rattakisk, which seeks to cause discord between the eagle and the snake. The harts bite its branches to destroy it, but its tail glistens so resplendently and will be set on fire until the destruction of the earth, up to which time the gods will assemble daily in its shade to seek advice — and even at the end of the world it will not be destroyed, but only receive a heavy shock. See Norse Mythol. out.

Thib-kong, “the book of changes," is the oldest of the sacred books of the Chinese. It was written by Fohi, the reputed founder of Chinese civilization, and is described as a very mysterious and almost unintelligible work, treating chiefly of the nature of the universe in general, the harmonious action of the elements, and periodic changes of creation. These ideas were expressed by means of eight peculiar diagrams, which constitute the basis of natural philosophy as well as of religion. Some contend that in Fohi and his family we may recognize Noah and the second parents of our race. Many commentators have been written on the Thib-kong, and very varied have been the expositions, so that, from being regarded originally as a cosmological essay, it came to be looked upon as a standard treatise on ethics.

Ymer, in Norse mythology, is the giant from the separate parts of whose body the world was created. The heart of Mimir, a dwarf, the mind in Niflheim melted, which caused the creation of the giant Ymer and the cow Audumbla, from whose milk the former was nourished. The cow satisfied her hunger by licking the salt-stones, by which means the first man, Buri, was created. Ymer himself created the frightful dynasty of the Hrinyttunen. But he did not live long, for Buri's nephews, sons of Bori—Odin, Wif, and We—killed Ymer, and of his blood they made the sea, of his flesh the earth, of his bones the rocks and hills, of his skull the firmament, of his brain the clouds, and of his eyelashes the battles about Asgard.

Yoga (San Scotyug, “to join;” hence, junction, and figuratively, contemplation, religious or abstract) is the name of one of the two divisions of the Samkha (q. v.) philosophy of the Hindus. The main object of the Yoga is to establish the doctrine of a supreme being, and to teach the means by which the human soul may become permanently united with it. The reputed author of the system is Patanjali, who explains the term Yoga as meaning “the hindering of the modifications of thinking.” These are accomplished either by a repeated effort to keep the mind in its unmodified state, or by dispensation, which is the consciousness of having overcome all desires for objects that are seen or heard of. According to the founder of the system, the practical Yoga, to wit, the concentration is to be brought about by some form of asceticism, the purifying of the minds of certain ascetics, and a devoted reliance on the Supreme Being. Through its meditations are established, and afflictions got rid of. By afflictions are understood ignorance, egoism, affection, avarice, and tenacity of life; which terms are then the subject of an especial investigation into the nature of what is to be got rid of, of what is not desired to be got rid of, of what is constituted by the cause, and of what is the constitutive cause.

There are eight means or stages subseivient to the attainment of concentration, viz. gama, forbearance; moksha, knowledge; bhakti, religious love; nirodha, expulsion; samadhi, profound meditation. The practical part of the Yoga was admitted into the later Vedanta (q. v.). Its ethical part is especially dwelt upon in the Mahabharata (q. v.). But the great power it has at all periods exercised over the Hindu mind is less derived from its philosophical speculations, or its moral injunctions, than from the wonderful effects which the Yoga practices are supposed to produce, and from the confidence they give to the favorite tenets of the popular Soto-dox Hinduism—the performance of austerities. Frequently these practices were and are merely a cloak for imposture and hypocrisy. Professional Yogins (q. v.), numbers of whom are met with throughout India, are often nothing but lazy mendicants or jugglers; or, impressing the vulgar with a belief in their supernatural powers, convert it into a source of easy livelihood. Such followers of Yoga pretend, for instance, to foretell future events; they deal in palmistry, and profess to cure diseases. There are instances, too, where, for a handsomely consideration, they allow themselves to be fettered for a certain time, so as to exhibit the power of the Yoga. Two such cases are related as authentic in the treatise of Navinachandra-pala; and it would appear from them that a human being, after having undergone certain preparations, such as the Yoga prescribes, may be shut up in a box, without either food or drink, for the space of a month, or even forty days and nights, and yet remain alive. The author of the treatise endeavours, in deed, to show that the rules laid down by the Yoga regarding the mode of respiration, the postures, and the diet of a Yoga have been found by the faithful observance of the Yoga philosophy of hibernating animals; and in support of this view he enters into a detailed investigation of the effect of the Yoga practices on animal life. If, as it seems, his statements are correct, much of what otherwise would be incredible is accounted for, and the accounts given of the performances of the Yogins, could be received as true, because admitting of explanation.

The system of Patanjali was taught by him in a little work called Yogacarana, which consists of four padas, or chapters, each comprising a number of sutras (q. v.). The oldest commentary on it is ascribed to a Vedas (q. v.); and this was commented on by Vachaspati Misra. For an elaborate enumeration of works on the Yoga, see A Contribution towards an Index to the Bibliography of the Indian Philosophical Systems, by Fitzedward Hall (Calcutta, 1859). The first two chapters of the sutras have been translated, with annotations founded on the commentary of Bhojaveda, by the late J. R. Ballantyne (Allahabad, 1865); and a paraphrase, but somewhat too free, of the same commentary is contained in vol. iv of William Ward's View of the History, Literature, and Religion of India (London, 1818-1820, 4 vols.). For a brief account of the system, see also vol. i of H. T. Colebrooke's Miscellaneous Essays (London, 1837, 2 vols.); and for the practice of the Yoga, A Treatise on the Yoga Philosophy, by N. C. Paul (Benares, 1881). Yogins are the followers of the Yoga (q. v.) system of Hindu philosophy, based on popular asceticism; a term generally denoting a Hindū, ascetic or devotee, a man who has entered the fourth stage of religious life as described in the sastras. A large class of such persons forms a division of the votaries of Siva.

Yoke, an agricultural term used in two senses.

1. The curved piece of wood upon the neck of draught animals, by which they are fastened to the pole or beam. This well-known implement of husbandry is described in the Hebrew language by the terms מֹדְח (modak, modak), and מֹדֶה (modah), the former two specifically applying to the bows of wood out of which it was constructed, and the last to the application (binding) of the article to the neck of the ox.

The expressions are combined in Lev. xxvi, 18 and Ezek. xxxiv, 27, with the meaning, "bands of the yoke." The Hebrew word מֹדֶה (Numb. xix, 2; Deut. xxxi, 8; 1 Sam. vi, 7) is often used as the symbol of servitude or slavery (1 Kings xii, 4-11; Isa. ix, 4; x, 27; xiv, 26; xvii, 6; Jer. v, 5), and to break the yoke is to become free (Gen. xxvii, 49; Jer. ii, 20; v, 5; Nah. i, 13). An iron yoke is the symbol of severe bondage (Deut. xxvii, 46; Jer. xxxviii, 14). The term "yoke" is also used as the symbol of calamity or suffering (Lam. i, 14; iii, 27). The Hebrew word מֹדְח also signifies a piece of matting for protecting the two shoulders from friction.

Among the ancient Egyptians yokes of different kinds were used for several purposes (see Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. i, 33, 879; ii, 15).

1. In many instances men were employed to carry the water in pails, suspended by a wooden yoke borne upon their shoulders. The same yoke was employed for carrying other things, as boxes, baskets containing game and poultry, or whatever was taken to market; and every trade seems to have used it for this purpose, from the potter and the brick-maker to the carpenter and the shipwright. The wooden bar or yoke was about three feet seven inches in length; and the straps, which were double, and fastened together at the lower as well as at the upper extremity, were of leather, and between fifteen and sixteen inches long. The small thong at the bottom not only served to connect the ends, but was probably intended to fasten a hook, or an additional strap, if required, to attach the burden; and though most of these yokes had two, some were furnished with four or eight straps; and the form, number, or arrangement of them varied according to the purposes for which they were intended.

2. For ploughing the mode of yoking the beasts was exceedingly simple. Across the extremity of the pole a wooden yoke or cross-bar, about fifty-five inches or five feet in length, was fastened by a strap lashed backwards and forwards over a prominence projecting from the centre of the yoke, which corresponded to a similar peg, or knob, at the end of the pole; and occasionally, in addition to these, was a ring passing over them as in some Greek chariots. At either end of the yoke was a flat or slightly concave projection, of semicircular form, which rested on a pad placed upon the withers of the animal; and through a hole on either side of it passed a thong for suspending the shoulder-pieces which formed the collar. These were two wooden bars, forked at about half their length, padded so as to protect the shoulder from friction, and connected at the lower end by a strong, broad band passing under the throat.

Sometimes the draught, instead of being from the withers, was from the head, the yoke being tied to the base of the horns; and in religious ceremonies oxen frequently drew the bier, or the sacred shrine, by a rope fastened to the upper part of the horns, without either yoke or pole. See Flows.

(8) For curricles and war-chariots the harness was similar, and the pole in either case was supported on a curved yoke fixed to its extremity by a strong pin, and bound with straps or thongs of leather. The yoke, resting upon a small, well-padded saddle, was firmly fitted into a groove of metal; and the saddle, placed upon the horses' withers, and furnished with girths and a breast-band, was surmounted by an ornamental knob.

Ancient Egyptian Yoke for a Chariot, with Enlarged View of the Saddle, or Pad at each End.

while in front of it a small hook secured the bearing-rein. See Chariot.

The word "yoke" also signifies a pair of oxen, so termed as being yoked together (1 Sam. xi. 7; 1 Kings, xix. 19, 21). The Hebrew term, tâmedîm (תָּמֵדîים), is also applied to asses (Judg. xix. 10) and mules (2 Kings v. 17), and even to a couple of riders (Isa. xxxi. 7). The term tâmedîm is also applied to a certain amount of land, equivalent to that which a couple of oxen could plough in a day (Isa. v. 18; A. V. "acre"), corresponding to the Latin jugum (Varro, R. R. i. 10). The term stands in this sense in 1 Sam. xiv. 14 (A. V. "yoke"); but the text is doubtful, and the rendering of the Sept. suggests that the true reading would refer to the instruments (יוֹּכַלָּה) wherewith the slaughter was effected. See Ox.

Yoke-fellow (ἔς πρεσβῦτος), a colleague (Phil. iv. 8). But many interpreters regard the word there as a proper name, Syngius (although the gender is uncertain), as it occurs in connection with other actual names, and the person addressed would not otherwise be specified at all.

York, COUNCILS OF (Concilium Eboracense). York is the second city of England in point of rank, though not in size or in commercial importance, a parliamentary and municipal borough, and county of itself, capital of the county of the same name (Yorkshire), near its centre, at the junction of the Three Ridings on the Ouse, at the influx of the Foss, one hundred and seventy-five miles north-west of London. The ecclesiastical authority of the archbishop extends over the province of York, consisting, with the archbishopric, of the bishoprics of Durham, Carlisle, Chester, Manchester, Ripon, and Sudbrok and Man. It contains York cathedral, the finest structure of the kind in England, mostly built in the 13th and 14th centuries. Several ecclesiastical councils have been held there, as follows:

1. Was held June 14 and 15, 1185, in the Church of St. Peter, at York, by Hubert Walter, archbishop of Canterbury, legate and chancellor of England. No other bishop was present in the council, which was attended by Simon, dean of the Church, the procurator, the archdeacons of Nottingham and Cleveland, the chancellor, Robert, the provost of Beverley, and some of the canons, with almost all the abbots, priors, officials, deans, and chapters of the churches in the possession of York. Pope Celestine III appears to have suspended Geoffrey, archbishop of York (son of the fair Rosamond), from the exercise of all his episcopal functions, and a few years before had cut off from his province the whole of Scotland, which he now subjected to the see of Rome. Nineteen constitutions were published.

1. Relates to the administration of the holy communion; directs that the minister shall take care that bread, wine, and water be provided for the sacrifice, that it shall not be celebrated by a priest, a deacon, or a lettered minister, that the host be kept in a decent Pyx, and renewed every Lord's day.

2. Directs that the host be carried to the sick with suitable solemnity.

3. Orders archdeacons to take care that the canons of the mass be corrected according to some approved copy.

4. Forbids to impose masses as part of penance, in order to obtain money for saying them. Forbids also priors to make bargains for celebrating masses.

5. Ordains that no more than two or three persons shall take a child out of the sacred font: that a child found exposed and not baptized, whether it be exposed with salt or without, for that cannot be said to be literate which was not known to have been done before.

6. Forbids deacons, except in cases of necessity, to baptize, minister, or excommunicate a body of Christ, or enjoin penance at confession. Charges priests, when desired to baptize a child, or administer the communion to the sick, to make no delay.

7. Directs that the ordination and vicar shall take care that their churches are kept in proper repair.

8. Directs that in all ministrations the proper ornaments shall be used.

9. Orders that the chalice shall be of silver.

10. Orders all clergymen to preserve their crowns and tresses, under pain of losing their benefices, if they have any, and of being forcibly clipped by the archdeacon or dean, if they have not.

11. Forbids priests to go about in copes with sleeves; orders them to wear suitable apparel.

12. Forbids any money to be taken by the judge in ecclesiastical causes.

13. Orders that the tithe be paid to the Church first, before the wages of the workmen, &c.

14. Forbids monks to take estates to farm, and to leave their houses without reasonable cause.

15. Forbids nuns to leave the verge of the monastery, unless in the company of their abbess or prioress.

16. Forbids bishops to form churches or cities.

17. Orders that every priest shall annually excommunicate, with candles and bells, those who swear themselves.

18. Requires priests to abstain from drinking-bouts and taverns. Forbids them, under pain of suspension, to open or communicate in their own houses, or in the houses of others.

19. Orders that when any one is suspected of a crime on public report, the dean of the place shall familiarly admonish him thrice; if he do not thereupon reform, the dean shall reprove him in conjunction with two or three more with whom he has lost his reputation; if he cannot be reformed by this means, the dean shall bring the matter before the archbishop, in order that the accused may be either punished or canonically purged.

See Wilkins, Concil. i. 501; Johnson, Eccl. Canons, x. 1791.

11. Was held about the year 1568, by John Thorpe, archbishop of York. Five fresh constitutions were published, and seven constitutions published by archbishop Zoche, in a provincial synod held at Throp, in 1547.

1. Forbids to hold markets, pleadings, &c., in churches, churchyards, and other holy places, on the Lord's day, or on other holy days.

2. Forbids the performance of plays and vanities in churches on vigils.

3. Requires the salaries to be assigned to stipendary priests and chaplains, and reserves a constitution made by William Green, archbishop of York, which assigns a salary of not less than five marks. Also reserves seven constitutions made by archbishop Zoche, at Throp, in 1547, viz. 1. Relating to the stipends to be assigned to-

After these constitutions follow the constitutions of archbishop Kemp, published in 1444, as given in the preceding council. See Johnson, Eccl. Canon., xiii, 1425, Wilkins, Concil. iii, 599.

York Use is a term employed to designate that ritual which, taking its name from the cathedral of York, was commonly used in the north of England prior to the Reformation. Printed editions of the York Ritual were issued in A.D. 1516, 1518, and 1582. In the main it differs but slightly from that of Salisbury—first, in the manner of making the first obligation; and, secondly, in the words used by the priest in partaking of the sacrament. Other minor differences exist, but they are unimportant. See Usu.

Young, John, a Scotch prelate, was professor of divinity in Glasgow, where he was elected bishop of Argyle, but died before he was consecrated, in 1661. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 291.

Young, John Freeman, LL.D., a bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born at Pittston, Me., Oct. 26, 1825. He graduated from the Theological Seminary in 1845, was ordained deacon the same year, and became rector of St. John's Church, Jacksonville, Fla.; in 1846 was ordained presbyter, and removed to Texas as a missionary; in 1850 to Mississippi, and in 1852 to Louisiana; subsequently became assistant minister of the Trinity Parish, New York city; was consecrated bishop of Florida, July 25, 1867, and died in New York city, Nov. 15, 1885. See The Church Almanac, 1886, p. 102.

Young, William McIntosh, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Edinburgh, Scotland, about 1820. In early life he went to Providence, R.I., where he was converted, and subsequently graduated from Columbian College, Washington. His first settlement was at Norfolk, Va.; next at Williamsburg, and then at Wilmington, N.C. Afterwards he became pastor at Pittsburgh, Pa., then successively of churches at Oil City, Warren (Pa.), and Cheyenne (Wyoming), where he died suddenly, Feb. 20, 1872. See Catech., Baptist Encyclopedia, p. 1288. (J.C.S.)

Younger. Under the Jewish dispensation it was frequently the will of God to prefer the younger sons before the elder, notwithstanding the right of primogeniture, as Shem before Japheth, Isaac before Ishmael, Jacob before Esau, Joseph, Judah, and Levi, before Reuben, Ephraim before Manasseh, Moses before Aaron, and David before all his brethren. In some of these cases the elder had forfeited his right of primogeniture by transgression, as Esau and Reuben, but not so the others. The cause of the proceeding of God's providence may be conjectured to have been twofold—first, as a memorial of the sin of Cain, first-born of Adam, by which Seth and his posterity were preferred before them; and, secondly, as a type of the future preference of the Christian, or younger Church, before the Jewish, or elder Church, in consequence of the forfeiture of the latter by unbelief. See Aoz.

Younglove, John, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was a native of Cambridge, N.Y. He graduated from Union College in 1801, was tutor in the college from 1802 to 1805, settled in the ministry at Brunswick, N.Y., and died there in 1838. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 97.

Youth. The ancients considered youth in a much more extended view than we do. They regarded it relatively with strength, activity, vigor; and while a man retained those attributes he was reckoned a young man, or a youth, without reference to the number of his years. Thus Benjamin is viewed as a mere youth when upwards of thirty years old. So in Num. xxxi, 28, Joshua is called a young man when about forty. The word frequently translated in our version young man is
YULE

YULE, the old name for Christmas, still in provincial popular use in England. It points to heathen times, and to the annual festival held by the Northern nations at the winter solstice as a part of their system of sun-worship. In the Edda (q.v.) the sun is styled fagræokuol (fair or shining wheel), and a remnant of his worship, under the image of a fire-wheel, survived in Europe as late as 1823. The inhabitants of the village of Kozn, on the Moeselle, were in the habit, on St. John's Eve, of taking a great wheel wrapped in straw to the top of a neighboring eminence, and making it roll down the hill, flaming all the way: if it reached the Moeselle before being extinct, a good vintage was anticipated. A similar usage existed at Trier. The Greenlanders of the present day have a feast at the winter solstice to rejoice at the return of the sun, and Wormius (Fest. Dan. lib. i) tells us that in his time the Icelanders dined the beginning of their year from Yule. The old Norse jöel, Anglo-Saxon hœl, have developed into Iceland jól, Swedish and Danish jult, English wheel: but from the same root would seem to have sprung old Norse jœl, Swedish and Danish jul, Anglo-Saxon geol, English yule, applied as the name of the winter solstice, either in reference to the conception of the sun himself as a wheel, or, more probably, to his wheeling or turning back at that time in his path in the heavens. The general nature of the observances of this festival are noticed under the head of Christmas (q. v.). In the greenery with which we still deck our homes and places of worship, and in the Christmas-trees laden with gifts, we may see a relic of the symbols by which the pagan ancients of the modern English signified their faith in the purity of the returning sun to adorn again with green and hang new fruit on the trees; and the festivity, until lately eaten in many parts of England (in Scotland the preparation of oatmeal called soeven) on Christmas eve or morning, seems to be a lingering memory of the offerings paid to Hulda, or Bertha, the divine mother, the Ceres of the North, or personification of fruitfulness, to whom they looked for new stores of grain. The burning of the Yule-log, Yule-clog, or Christmas-block, testifies to the use of fire in the worship of the sun. This custom still survives in the north of England. Herrick tells, in his Hesperides, how the Yule-log of the new Christmas was wont to be lighted "with last year's brand," and already, in the same year, its blazes are condemned by Warton as "foolish and vain, and not countenanced by the Church." The religious keeping of Yule and Easter had been one of the articles of Perth (q. v.), which had been strongly objected to. On the accession of William and Mary the Scottish discharged what was called the "Yule vacancy" of the Court of Sessions, and compelled the judges to attend court at that period. But in 1712 an act was passed re-establishing the Christmas recess. The act gave great offence to many Presbyterians in Scotland. See Atkinson, Glossary of the Cleveland Dialect (1868); Grimm, Deutsche Mythologie; Brand, Popular Antiquities, s. v.

Yule Boughs are branches of holly, ivy, yew, and mistletoe, used to decorate churches and private houses at Christmas.

Yule Festival is the same as Yule (q. v.).

Yves (Ives de Rem-Martin, known by the name of Stiavan) was born at the manor of Rem-Martin, parish of Mont-Échard, Loiret, Oct. 17, 1553. The noble family of the diocese of Treguier, he was son of Heelor, or Helori, and Azo of Kenquis. Being sent to Paris, he devoted ten years to the study of theology and of civil and canon law (1567-77). Having passed through the University of Orleans, he attended the lectures of William of Blaye, with whom he examined the Decretals. Afterwards, at Rennes, under the Franciscans, he studied the Sentences of Pierre Lombard and the interpretation of the Scriptures. Having received there the minor orders, he was successively rector of Tredres (1586) and curate of Lohance (1597). He was connected with the hospital of the patrimonial estate of Rem-Martin. and appointed Advocate of the Poor. The fests and austerities to which he submitted himself did not hinder him, in the meantime, from actively engaging in preaching, nor from filling his judicial functions, with the energy and equity as to make him an object of terror to the evil litigants. The crown found no favor in his eyes in urging fiscal claims against the clergy, and he opposed more than once the levying of royal impositions, which he deemed unjust. He died at Stiavan (1597). His writings, mostly in French, but translated into Dutch and German, were once extensively read, and were not without influence upon the formation of Christian life in the Reformed Church. Yvonetus, a Dominican who was supposed to be the author of a tract of the 15th century, entitled Tractatus de Heresi Pavarverum de Lydogenes, and given in Martene and Durand's Thesaurus Nostras Auctor, vol. v, p. 1777, of whom nothing else is known. Pfeiffer has proved that the tractate is the production of the Franciscan David of Augsburg early in the 15th century. Two manuscript copies of the piece exist, at Stuttgart and Strasbourg. Zabarella (or De Zabarella), archbishop of Florence and cardinal, the most notable man among the Italians present at the Council of Constance, was born at Padua in 1289. He studied canon law at Bologna, and taught at Padua. During the siege of the city by the Venetians he was deputed to invite the assistance of France, and, after Padua had surrendered, he was the erator of the fourteen deputies who, in St. Mark's Place in Venice, handed over the Paduan flag. He subsequently migrated to Florence, and engaged in teaching canon law. After a time the town authorities elected him archbishop, but it was found that the pope had already given the place to another. Boniface IX called him to Rome to submit an opinion respecting the best methods for healing the schism in the Church, on which question he wrote the book De Schismatis Autorisate...
ZABARELLA 1013 ZABISM

Imperatoris Tullienae (Baile, 1565; Strasburg, 1609, 1618), which, together with the preface by Schardin, was placed in the index. He was appointed archbishop to the cathedral on his return to Padua, and held a wealthy abbacy for a time, and until the dissolution John XXIII, who favored learned men, called him to Rome and made him bishop of the canton of Besançon, with the title of St. Commandant Damianus (1411). He had previously earned a scholarly reputation by the numerous books which emanated from his pen.

When arrangements were made for the Council of Constance, Zabarella was one of the papal envoys to the court of emperor Sigismund. In the council itself he was the youngest cardinal, announced the time of the first session and read the bull of John XXIII, intended to regulate the drift of its business. He joined other cardinals in submitting a memorial relating to a reform in the administration of the papal court, and read the offer by which the pope volunteered to abdicate if the antipopes were renounced their pretensions to his office. When John died from Constance, Zabarella supported the objections to the propriety of submitting to the superior of the general council to a pope; but he nevertheless incurred the censure of the council by an unevenness committed in the interest of the pope, in connection with the reading of resolutions which had been agreed upon, affirming the divine right of the council to require the submission of all heresies, including the papacy, as well as the breaking of the schism, the removal of the existing schism, and the reformation of the Church in head and members, the italicized clause having been omitted by him from the reading. He was eventually sent with a delegation of cardinals to negotiate with John, and obtained from him the unconditional surrender of his pontificate.

Zabarella participated also in the negotiations with Huss, and suggested the drawing up of an exceedingly mild form of retraction, which the reformer, however, refused to sign. In connection with the schism he delivered a strong argument against pope Benedict, in which he charged the miserable state of the Church upon the obstinacy of its leaders; and when a new pope was to be chosen, he delivered another speech in support of the cardinals’ view that the election ought to proceed any movement looking towards a reformation of the Church, which was so violent that he predicted it would be the occasion of his death. He soon became dangerously sick, and died Sept. 26, 1417 (others say Nov. 5). It is probable that he would have been chosen pope, instead of Martin V, but for his early death. Zabarella wrote numerous works of limited extent, e.g., Comment, in Libros Decretal, et Clementinam (Venice, 1602).—Comment. in Clementinam (ibid. 1481, 1487).—Comment. in Clementinam (ibid. 1381).—Variae Legum Repetitiones (ibid. 1387).—De Schismatibus (supra), etc. See Yeo d. Zabarella, Bartholomeus, nephew and heir to the cardinal, a teacher of canon law at Padua, participated in important consultations at the papal court, and ultimately archbishop of Florence. He died in 1448. See Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v.

Zabarella, Jacob, professor at Padua, A.D. 1664 et seq., and author of the book, De Invenzioni Externi Motoris. Ideas presented in the book and otherwise, exposed him, before the inquisition, to the charge of doubting the immortality of the soul, from which, however, he was acquitted. He was born at Padua in 1638, and died there in 1701. See Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v.

Zabathelius, the follower of Zabaththi Zeri (or Zabaththi Sebi), a celebrated Jewish emperor, who appeared at Smyrna about 1666, and, pretending to be the Messiah, promised to deliver the Jews, and re-establish them in more than pristine glory. Multitudes of his nation were deceived by him, and many of his followers pretended to visions and prophetic ecstasies. At length, falling into the hands of the sultan, he ordered him to be placed as a mark for his archers, to prove whether he was vulnerable or not (as he pretended), to avoid which Zeri turned Mohammedan. See MUSEUM, PARL. His sect, however, survived, and there is said to be still a remnant of them in the castles of Mullas, and that they profess to be Musulmans, observe the Jewish rites in secret, marry among themselves, and all live in the same quarter of the city, without communicating with the Turks, except in commerce, and in the mosques. Zeri, it seems, had also adherents among the Jews of England, Holland, Germany, and Poland, some of which have remained to our own time; and M. Grégoire mentions a musician of this sect who came to Paris so lately as in 1806. See Adams, Hist. of the Jews, p. 516, 526; Grégoire, Hist. ii, 500-518. See SABBATHAL.

Zabians, an ancient sect, said to be Chaldéans, addicted to astrology and star-worship. The word is derived, according to Pococke, from the Aramaic tobud, the heavenly host, from which same root the word Sabian is taken, but in the different sense of "to change religion." The Zabians were idolaters, dwelling in the north of Mesopotamia, in the Biblical Haran. An Arabic writer, who consulted Chwolson, says that they adopted the name Zabiah as being a religion tolerated by the Koran, and so escaped persecution to which their star-worship would have exposed them. They first gave planetary names to the days of the week; the feast day of each planet being determined by the time of its culmination; hence, also, the alchemists of the Middle Ages, and through them heralds, have borrowed the notion of assigning a particular metal and a particular color to the several planets. In common with other Aramaic races they had a civil year, which began like the Jewish Roseh-Shenud in autumn, and the ecclesiastical year commencing at the vernal equinox. Before the time of Mohammed they offered human sacrifices to the deities which they believed were embodied in the planets. See Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v. See SABBIANS.

Zabism, the religion of the Zabians (q. v.), or Haranian idolaters. It was formerly understood that they were a distinct race, and that their religion was composed of Chaldaism, Parsism, Judaism, Christianity, Neo-Platonism, Gnosticism, and cabalistic speculations. This is not, however, strictly true. They might best be described as Syrians, who, partly descended from Greek colonists, had been subject so long to Syrian influences that the religion prevailing in a majority of the population was a mixture of Syrian and Jewish elements. Their religion was the old heathenism of their fathers, which had, with incredible obstinacy, resisted not only Christianity, but rendered even Mohammedan ill-will harmless by stratagem. But there were certain non-pagan elements which crept into it during the early centuries, and many other additions of later years. We mention, first of all, a number of legends about Biblical personages, from whom they pretend to be descendant. There are also laws of purity and impurity, and of sacrifices, which are very similar to Jewish. There are, names of Greek and Roman gods, such as Helios, Ares, and Kronos, occur, a circumstance which may be explained from the prevailing tendency of the period of exchanging the names of native divinities for Greek and Roman names. There are also certain metaphysical and physical views in their creed, which are distinctly traceable to Aristotle, and finally, the Neo-Platonic philosophy of heathenism, as presented by Porphyry, Proclus, Iamblichus, and others. All these elements, infused into it by the circumstances of the period, do not prevent it from being in reality heathenism.

The sources of information in reference to the creed are written in Arabic, in Hebrew, and in Greek. The Arabic are the most copious; the Hebrew are chiefly represented by Maimonides; and the Greek are ascribed to various pseudonymous writers, among whom are Aristotle and Hermes Trismegistus. From these, though somewhat various and contradictory, the following facts may be gathered in reference to the creed. The Creator is the source of original and eternity; but manifold in his manifestations in bodily figures. He is chiefly personified by the seven leading planets, and the good, knowing, and excellent of earthly bodies. But his unity, they claim, is not thereby disturbed; and it is "as if the seven planets were his seven limbs, and all the seven limbs were his seven spheres, in which he manifests himself, so that he speaks with our tongue, sees with our eyes, hears with our ears, touches with our hands, comes and goes with our feet, and acts through our members." Zabism expresses the idea that God is too great and too sublime to occupy himself directly with the affairs of this world; that he therefore has handed over its ruling to the gods, and that he himself only takes the most important things under his special care; and that man is too weak to address himself directly to the highest, and is therefore obliged to direct prayers and sacrifices to the intermediate deities to whom the rule of the world is intrusted. Thus the veneration of the planets, and even the worshipping of idols, is nothing but a symbolic act, the consequence of that original idea. There are many gods and intermediaries in the Zabian stamp. It is not the planets themselves, but the spirits that direct them, conceived as deities that stand to the spheres in the relation of soul and body. Apart from these there are those gods who cause or represent every action in this world. Every universal natural deed or effect emanates from a universal deity, every partial one from a partial deity that presides over part of nature. These gods know our most secret thoughts, and all our future is open to them. The female deities seem to have been conceived of as the feeling or passive principles of these gods or intelligences emanate directly from God without his will, as rays drawn from the sun. They are of abstract forms, free of all matter, and neither made of any substance nor material. They consist chiefly of a light in which there is no darkness, which the senses cannot appreciate, by reason of its immense clearness, which the understanding cannot comprehend, by reason of its extreme delicacy, and which fancy and imagination cannot fathom. Their nature is free from all animal desires, and they themselves are created for love and harmony, friendship and unity. Their existence is full of the highest bliss, by reason of the harmony of the Most High, keeping a strict guard over one's words and deeds, by fasting, sincere prayer, invocations, sacrifices, fumigations, and incantations. By steadfastly persevering in these and similar acts of devotion, man may reach so high a step of perfection that he may communicate even directly with the Supreme Power. The planets, as the principal representative and intermediate gods, are to be carefully observed, especially as regards (1) the houses and stations of the planets; (2) their rising and setting; (3) their respective conjunctions and oppositions; (4) the knowledge of the special times and seasons, the hours and days of the ruling of special planets; (5) the divisions of the different figures, forms, climates, and countries, according to their dominant stars—in fact, everything below heaven, according to their belief, was subject in some way to the influence of the stars or the spirits which inhabit them. Every substance and every action, every country and every hour, had its special planetary deity. It is important, therefore, to study carefully the special conjunctions and figures, as well as the special times and seasons, which might render the individual numen propitious. Thus, for instance, the first hour of Saturday stands under Saturnus, and it is right and advisable at that time to select such prayers, seals, amulets, dreeses, and fumigations as might be especially pleasing to that planetary god. In order to address themselves to the same mediators, some of the Zabians are supposed to have directed their devotions to the stars themselves. But they soon found a worship that addressed itself to things that appeared and disappeared in turn very unsatisfactory. Accordingly they manufactured permanent representatives of them in the shape of idols, wrought in as complete accordance as possible with the theurgical rules derived from the nature of the deity to be represented. They were of gold to represent the sun; of silver, to represent the moon. The very temples in which they were placed were of as many corners as were supposed to correspond to the form of certain stars. Zabism teaches that man is composed of contradictory elements, which make him the vacillating, struggling creature he is. Passions and desires rule him and lower him to the level of the brute creation, and he would either eat himself or have himself eaten. The same rites as purifications, sacrifices, and other means of grace, by which he may be enabled to approach the great gods once more and attempt to become like them. The soul of man partakes partly of the nature of the animal soul and partly of that of the angelic soul. The soul never dies, and rewards and punishments will affect only it. These, however, will not be wrought in any future world, but in this, only at different epochs of existence. Thus all our present joys are rewards for good deeds done by us in former epochs, and the sorrows which we suffer now are the retribution of evil actions we committed at former stages. As to the nature of the general world-soul itself, they say it is primitive, for if it were not so it would be material, as every newly-created being partakes of the material nature. Kathibhi says: "The soul is thus an immaterial thing, and exists from eternity, is the involuntary reason of the first types, as God is the first cause of the intelligences. The soul once beheld matter and loved it. Glowing with the desire of assuming a bodily shape, it would not again separate itself from that golden body. Through this it became a part of God. At that time the soul forgot itself, its everlasting existence, its original abode, and knew nothing more of what it had known before. But God, who turns all things to the best, united it to matter which it loved, and out of this union the heavens, the elements, and complex things arose. In order that the soul might not wholly perish within matter, he endowed it with intelligence, whereby it conceived its high origin, the spiritual world, and itself. It further conceived through this that it was but a stranger in this world, that it was subject to many sufferings from the world and the soul from all passions of this world are but the source of new sufferings. As soon as the soul had perceived all this it began to yearn again for its spiritual home, as a man who is away from his birthplace pines for his homestead. It then also learned that, in order to return to its primitive state, it had to free itself from the fetters of sensuous desire and from all materialistic tendencies. Free from them all, it would regain its heavenly sphere again, and enjoy the bliss of the spiritual world."
different periods, they disappear from history since the middle of the 11th century. Thus obscurely ended a sect which for two hundred years had produced a host of men pre-eminent in every branch of learning and literature, in philosophy, astronomy, history, natural history, poetry, medicine, and the rest. See CHWOL.

ZACARIA, ANTONIO MARIA, an Italian monk, founder of the congregation of the Barnabites, was born at Cremona in 1500. He studied at first medicine and philosophy at Padua, and afterwards theology also. Having received holy orders, he settled in Rome, where, in 1502, he founded the fraternity of Eternal Wisdom, and where he soon, in connection with several other members, and with the sanction of Clement VII, founded a new congregation, of which he was made superior. From their first church, St. Paul's, in Milan, they were originally called the Regular Clerks of St. Paul's (Pauli sodaliis), which name they exchanged for Barnabites, when, in 1514, they were presented with the Church of St. Barnabas, in Milan. Zacaria, who is said to have had the power of prophecy and of working miracles, died, according to his own prediction, July 6, 1539, at Cremona. Of his writings we mention a compilation from the Church fathers, Dei Notabili Raccordi da Diversi Autori (Venice, 1583; printed in French, Lyons, 1625; Latin, by J. A. Galius, Auxilia Sacra). See ARIUS, CREMONA, LITUR., BIBL. (P.F.)

ZACHMANN is a local name for the Gnostics, mentioned by Epiphanius (Her. xxvi, 3), but without adding where they were so called.

ZACHALOS, an ancient Babylonish writer, is mentioned by Pliny (Hist. Nat. xxxvii, 10) as the author of a book on gems and their magical powers, which was dedicated to the king Mithridates. "It was evidently a writing belonging to that Greek-Babylonian literature which so widely developed during the centuries bordering the Persian era, and which had the same connection with the real Chaldaean doctrines as the Grecian literature of the hermetical books had with the doctrine of ancient Egypt" (Lenormont, Chaldaen Magy., p. 176).

Zacharia, JUFT FRIEDRICH, a Protestant theologian, was born at Haina, in Gota, in 1704. He studied at Jena and Kiel, was appointed at the latter place, in 1735, professor of Oriental languages, in 1742 elected to the chair of Biblical antiquities, and in 1747 to that of theology. He died March 6, 1778. He published, Dissertatio secundum Commentatio Sodolami, Commentarius Quinti Horea Cupitis Explicata (Kiloni, 1731) = Progr. de Usu Linguae Ebraea in Philosophia (ibid. 1736) = Diss. de Relibus Scholastica Judaeorum (ibid. 1745). See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, iv, 767 sqq.; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. iii, 540. (B.P.)

Zacharias, bishop of ANDONI, Italy, was sent in A.D. 860, as one of the legates of pope Nicholas I, to Constantinople with letters of reply to those of the emperor Michael and the patriarch Photius, making overtures to the Church of Rome for sympathy and cooperation. See Neander, Hist. of the Church, iii, 562.

ZACHARIAS SCHOLASTICUS, bishop of MYTILENE, in the Island of Lesbos, was present at the Synod of Constantinople (A.D. 586) which deposed Anthimus, the patriarch of Alexandria. Zacharias had studied philosophy at Alexandria, and for some time practiced as an advocate at Berytus. He is the author of Ammonius sire de Munii Opificio, a dialogue in which he defends the Christian view of creation, and governments of the world against objections to it raised from the point of view of the Greek philosophy. It was first published at Paris in 1619. The best edition is that by Jean Fr. Boismarda, 1618. See GASANZ and Zacharias Mitileneus, de Immunabilitate Anima et Mundi Commutatione (Paris, 1866).

ZACYNTHIAN MANUSCRIPT (designated as Z) is a palimpsest uncial fragment in the library of the British and Foreign Bible Society in London, which, under an evangelistical, written on coarse vellum in or about the 13th century, contains large portions of Luke's gospel down to xiii, 38, in full, well-formed characters, but surrounded by, and often interwoven with, large extracts from the Lectors, in a hand which cannot be earlier than the 8th century. It was obtained from Zante in 1821. The entire volume must have originally been a large folio (14 inches by 11), of which eighty-six leaves and three half-leaves survive. The readings are very valuable. They were communicated to deane Allford for the fourth edition of his New Test. By Dr. Tregelles, who has since (1861) collated and published it in full. See Scrivener, Intro. to the New Test. p. 126; Christian Remembrances, Jan. 1862; Jour. of Soc. Lit. Jan., 1862, p. 495. See Manuscript.

Zahlaron, Jacob BEN-ISAAC, a Jewish writer of Rome, was born in 1580, and died at Ferrara in 1638. Besides a large medical work, אֵלֶּחֶם מָוֵן, he left, in MS, a commentary on Isaiah, entitled על מהו עם פה פה: — a commentary on Ecclesiastes, קֹלֵי עֵקֶב עַלֺ עֵקֶב, a homiletic exposition on the Pentateuch, קָרֹת עֵקֶב יִתְרֹת בָּעַר מְדִינֵיה: — a commentary on the Song of Songs, קָרֹת אִינוֹת יִתְרֹת בָּעַר מְדִינֵיה, etc. See Fürst, Bibl. Zahn, a German philanthropist, was a mason of Bunzlau, who wandered about as an orphan in childhood, and learned to read at the age of twenty-four. He carried on a little school in his own house for the benefit of orphans. He made the first movement towards the establishment of an orphan-house in Bunzlau, and went to Berlin to solicit the royal sanction. The corner-stone was laid in 1756. Zahn became the first superintendent, but died of the plague in 1756. The institution was conducted from that time by Ernest Gottlieb Woltersdorf. Zallwein, GREGORUS, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born at Obervorchach in the Palatinate, Oct. 20, 1712. In 1738 he joined the order of the Benedictines, and received holy orders in 1756. In 1744 he was elected prior of the monastery at Wesnumbrun, and shortly afterwards was called to Strasburg.
in Carinthia, as professor of theology, Church history, and canon law. In 1749 he was called to the Salzburg University, and died Aug. 9, 1766. Of his publications, we mention: Fontes Oris Sacri Juris Canonici, etc. (Salzburg, 1754-56);—Iux Ecclesiasticum Particulare Germaniae aærae Christiani usque ad Carolum IX Imp. ZAMORA, ALPHONSO. See ALPHONSO DE ZAMORA.

Zamperl, DOMENICO (commonly known as Domenichino), an eminent Italian artist, was born at Bologna, in 1581, and received his first instructions from Denis Calvert, but, on account of severe treatment by that master, he was removed to the Academy of the Caracci. His great talents did not develop themselves so early as in many other painters, and his studies and thoughtful manner drew from his fellow-students the appellation of the Ox; but Annibale Caracci testified of his abilities by saying to his pupils, "This Ox will in time surpass you all, and be an honor to the art of painting." In the first contest of the students for a prize after he entered the Academy, Domenichino was the favorite; but this triumph, instead of rendering him confident and presumptuous, only stimulated him to greater assiduity, and he pursued his studies with such patient and constant application that he made such progress as to win the admiration of some of his contemporaries and to be rated the equal of others. After leaving the school of the Caracci, he visited Parma, Modena, and Reggio, to study the works of Correggio and Parmigianino; and soon after returning to Bologna he went to Rome, where he commenced his brilliant career. Cardinal Aguecci was the first to patronize him, and he employed him in his palace, and commissioned him to paint three pictures for the Church of St. Onofrio, representing subjects from the life of St. Jerome. He was employed about this time to assist Annibale Caracci in his great works in the Farnesian Gallery at Rome, and he executed a part of them from the cartoons of Caracci. He also painted in the loggie, in the garden, from his own designs, the Death of Adoniscus, in which his skill in representing Venus springing from her car to succor her unfortunate lover, He was employed by cardinal Borghese to assist in the decoration of the rooms of San Gregorio, in which his Flagellation of St. Andrew is so justly celebrated. Cardinal Farnese next employed him to paint some frescoes in a chapel in the abbey of Grotto Farnata, where he executed several subjects from the life of St. Nilo; one of these, representing the cure of a demoniac, is considered one of his finest inventions. Soon after this he executed his famous Communion of St. Jerome, painted for the principal altar of San Girolamo della Cività, a work which has immortalized his name, and which was accounted, next to the Transfiguration of Raphael, the finest picture of Rome. This work has experienced some removals, but has been returned to its original place and copied in mosaic to preserve the design, the original having suffered from the effects of time. His next great work was in the Church of San Lodovico, representing the life of St. Cecilia. His great success and increasing fame had by this time so excited the envy and hatred of his contemporaries that he was constrained to leave Rome in disgust. He therefore returned to Bologna, where he resided several years in the quiet practice of his profession, and executed some of his most admired works, particularly the Morghen tapestry, representing the legend of that saint, the Madonna dell Rosario, both of which were engraved by Gerard Audran for the Louvre at Paris by order of Napoleon. The fame of Domenichino was now so well established that intrigue and malice could not suppress it, and pope Gregory XV invited him to return to Rome, and appointed him principal painter and architect to the pontifical palace. Cardinal Montalto employed him to decorate the vault of San Andrea della Valle, where he represented the four evangelists, with angels, in such a-masterly manner that they were the admiration of Italy and the study of artists. He also painted in the chapel of cardinal Bandini, in the Church of San Sylvestro, in the Quirinal, four pictures—Queen Esther before Ahasuerus, Judith with the Head of Holofernes, the Harp before the Ark, and Solomon and his Mother, Bathsheba, Seated on the Throne, which were esteemed among his finest works. Soon after he painted the Four Cardinal Virtues in the Church of San Carlo Catenari. He was next invited to Naples to paint the chapel of St. Januarius. He executed one of his most admired works in the Palace of the Caracci, representing the dead Christ supported on the knees of the Virgin, together with Mary Magdalene and others. But his life soon became so embittered by the jealousy and hatred of his rivals that he quitted Naples in disgust, and returned once more to Bologna, where he died, in 1641. His works were executed in connection with the superintendence of the pontifical palace under Gregory XV, but he executed various other works, particularly two designs for the Church of San Ignazio, at Rome. He was not, however, allowed to complete this work, for Gregory XV was succeeded by Alexander VII, who transferred the work to Grassi in another edifice. Therupon Domenichino refused to furnish additional plans, and the building was transferred to Algardi. In Santa Maria Trastevere he designed the rich and ingenious entablature, also the chapel, called Della Madonna di Strada Cupa. He also designed the greater part of the elegant villa Belvedere at Frascati, and designed and erected the picturesque villa Lodovico at Rome, of the gardens of which he laid out with a number of verdant walks, and divided the grove with exquisite taste. No better proof of his great merit as an artist can be desired than the fact that upwards of fifty of his works have been engraven by Gerard Audran, Raphael Morghen, and other famous engravers, and that many of them have been frequently copied. See Spooner, Bldg. Hist. of the Fine Arts, p. 355, 1119; Millias, Lives of Celebrated Architects, ii, 152.

Zanchi, Jerome, a clergyman and theologian of the German Reformed Church, was born at Alzano, in the territory of Bergamo, Feb. 2, 1516, and was the son of the historian Zanchi. He entered the Augustinian Order of St. Augustine, by which he was professed at San Gregorio, in 1535, after his residence in theological and theological studies, and, on their completion, came with his friend, count Celso Martinengo of Brescia, to the monastery of Lucca, where Vermiglì was teaching, and where they became acquainted with the writings of Luther, Melanchthon, Bullinger, and Calvin. They soon took a deist interest in these writings, and were compelled to flee—Martínengo to Milan and Geneva, where he became pastor of the Italian Church, in 1552, and Zanchi to Switzerland and Geneva, in 1551. In 1558 Zanchi accepted a professorship of the Old Test. at Strasburg, as an architect and other Lutherans were his colleagues, the association involving him in controversies upon the doctrines of the antichrist, predestination, and the perseverance of the saints, which began in 1561, and were superficially settled by arbitrators, who drew up a formal agreement, which was signed by all the clergy and professors of the city, Zanchi, however, appending a reservation to his signature intended to prevent his being compelled to teach what he did not receive as the truth. Calvin and other reformed theologians, however, censured the yielding temper in which he signed, and thus prevented him to speak his sentiments more positively. This naturally renewed the strife and involved disagreeable consequences, from which he was glad to escape by accepting a call to Chiavenna as pastor of the Italian congregation. He had previously des- cended repeatedly to a similar case in more leniently teachers and uneasy Italian agitators troubled him at

Chiavenna, and in 1564 a pestilence interrupted the services of his Church and compelled his retirement to a mountain near Piuri, where he occupied himself with writing a sketch of his controversy with Marbach, which afterwards appeared under the title of "Miscellanea" (1565). In 1566 he became professor of theology at Heidelberg, and rapidly rose to the first place among the scholars of the theological faculty. His advice was sought by persons in every quarter and upon all the debated questions of the day, e.g., the sacraments, the Trinity, the mediation of Christ, and replies in their name to inquiries written by clergy and laity in the name of the faculty, and often in his own name, all tending to the confirmation of the teachings of Reformed orthodoxy. He was equally zealous and influential in the work of introducing a strict discipline in the churches of the Palatinate. Of larger theological works written by him in this period we mention De Trinitas Elohomin, etc. (1572), which is chiefly important as collocating the grounds upon which the antitrinitarians based their opinions; De Natura Dei, etc., a sort of speculative philosophy of religion, in which the doctrine of predestination especially, as well as to its logical consequences; and De Operibus Dei intro Spatium See Dierum Creatis, a cosmology in which dogmatic hypotheses and physical facts are intermingled—interesting as showing the amount of knowledge possessed, or supposed to be possessed, respecting nature and natural forces in that day. A. Fouquet, Histoire de Fransi (1647), etc., was begun at Heidelberg, but not completed. A Lutheran prince succeeded to the throne of the Palatinate, and Zanchi was dismissed. The newly established University of Neustadt-on-the-Hardt received him, and made him its professor of the New Testament in 1578, and this post he retained until he died, Nov. 19, 1590, though he had been invited to return to Heidelberg when the Palatinate was restored to Calvinism. In 1577 he was required to write a confession by the deputies of the Reformed churches, then assembled at Frankfurt, which confession was intended to be opposed to that of Geneva (1619), 3 vols., ser. 8 parts). These works rank among the leading sources of the Reformed theology of his time, but are already tainted with the scholastic spirit. See Schmid, in Stud. u. Krift. 1839; Herzog, Real-Encyklop. u. v.

Zanchius, Basii, a learned Italian monk and writer, was born at Bergamo in 1501. His real name was Peter, which he exchanged for Basili when he became a canon regular. He studied at Rome and various other places, but resided for the greater part of his life at Rome, where he died in 1560. He was the subject of persecution, for some cause not clearly ascertained, and died in prison. He was one of the best Latin poets of his age. His Latin poems were first printed at Rome in 1540, and were often reprinted. He also wrote observations on all the books of Scripture (Rome, 1553). He published Epitaphororum Commentarii (1542), a second edition of which appeared under the title Dictionarium Posticum et Epitaphia Veteranorum, etc. (1612).

Zanoah. (1) In the plain of Judah. The present Kharbet Zanoa lies one and a half miles north of Beit Netfiv and two and a half south-east of Ain Shems (Beth-Shemesh), and is "a large and important ruin on high ground, mainly east of the road; but remains are also found on the hill-top to the west," consisting of chambers with arches and foundations of houses, walls, traces of mills, cave-tombs, etc. (Memoirs to the Ordnance Survey, iii, 129). (2) In the hills of Judah. The modern Kharbet Zanoa lies four and a half miles south-west of Es-Semna (Eshtemoa), and one and a half north-west of Attop, and consists of "heaps of stonework and foundations, fallen pillars, caves and cisterns on a hill" (described in the Memoirs to the Ordnance Survey, iii, 410 sq.).

Zanolini, Antonio, a Jewish writer of the 18th century, is the author of "Questiones et Scripture Sacra (Padua, 1725).—Lexicon Hebraicum (ibid. 1728).—Lexicon Chaldaico-Rabinicum (ibid. 1745).—Instituta et Institutiones LINGUA CHALDAE-ROB. Talmudica cum Singularum Dialeclicum Exempla etiam Latinislate Donatus, etc. (ibid. 1750)." See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. iii, 542 sq.; Wolff, Bibl. Hebr. iv, 812; Steinhaeuser, Bibl. Handbuch, a. v. (B. Zantz, Akhm, a Jewish physician, philosopher, and poet, was born in 1670, and died, rabbi of Venice, in 1729. He was the author of KEBIR THERIVIM, or a metrical paraphrase of the Psalms (Venice, 1719). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. iii, 543; De Rosei, Dictionario Storico (Germ. traual), p. 385. (B. P.)

Zanzala, Jacob (called also Baradaus), a monk of the 6th century, became conspicuous by reviving the Monophysite (q. v.) sect of the Eutychians (q. v.). They had been reduced to a very small number, but these had ordained Zanzala bishop of Edessa, and by his zeal and unceasing toil he left the sect, at his death in A.D. 588, in a flourishing condition in Syria, Mesopotamia, Armenia, Egypt, and other countries. These are known as Jacobites (q. v.).

Zanzala, Felician Martin von, a famous missionary, was born at Zaroy, in the Russian government of Grodno, in Lithuania, March 15, 1794. He studied at Dorpat for a political career. In 1816 he was made doctor of philosophy, and in 1817 engaged at St. Petersburg in the college for foreign affairs. In the same year he decided to give up everything and to work in the service of his master. He went to Basle in 1818, and having spent there nearly three years, was appointed to commence missionary operations in Grauia. Having received his ordination in 1821, he went to Shusha, which became the nucleus for his operations. In 1820 he was obliged to leave his post on account of feeble health, and returned to Basle. In 1885 he again returned to his post, but, on his way, an imperial ukase forbade further operations. All representations were in vain, and Zanzala, the first and last missionary of the Basle Society, left Shusha in 1838 for Tiflis. In 1859 to 1861 he travelled through Europe in behalf of his society, but in 1865 he was struck with apoplexy. He died May 31, 1874. See Der evangelische Heidenbote, 1874, No. 7. (B. P.)

Zeal, a passionate ardor for any person or cause. The word in Hebrew is zeb, kindh, from zeb, kindh, "to flush" with passion. The Sept. usually renders it by qedoc (the New Test. term), which is derived from qd, "to be hot." Thus we say, "a fiery zeal." The psalmist says (Psa. lxix, 9), "The zeal of thine house hath eaten me," or consumed me like fire (see Bauer, De Messiis Zelo pro Domi Dei, Vitebo. 1744). Zeal is an earnestness in a spirit either from good or evil motives (2 Sam. xxi, 2; 1 Cor. xiv, 12; Col. iv, 18). Thus Phinehas was commanded because he was zealous for Jehovah (Numb. xxxv, 11-18); but Jehu, when he slew the priests of Baal and the family of Ahab, was zealous in order to gain public applause (2 Kings x, 16-31). Zeal may be misdirected, or it may be burnt out (1 Kings iii, 6; Gal. iv, 17, 18; Tit. ii, 14; Psa. lxix, 9; John ii, 17). Zeal is attributed in Scripture to God as well as to man (2 Kings xix, 31; Isa. ix, 7; Ezek. v, 15). There are various kinds of zeal, as (1) an ignorant zeal (Homm. x, 2, 9); (2) a persecuting zeal (Phil. iii, 6); (3) a self-seeking zeal (1 Kings iii, 6); (4) an apprehensive zeal (2 Kings x, 16); (5) a contentious zeal (1 Cor. xi, 16); (6) a partial zeal (Hos. vii, 8); (7) a temporary zeal (2 Kings xii, xiii; Gal. iv, 15); (8) a genuine zeal, which is a sincere and warm concern for the glory of God, and the spiritual welfare of mankind (Gal. iv, 18; Rev. iii, 19). This last is generally compounded of sound knowledge, strong faith, and disinterested regard; and will manifest itself by self-denial, patient endurance, and constant exertion. The methods of attaining the zeal are (1) the divine command (Rev. iii, 19); (2) the example of Christ (Rom. xii, 13); (3) the example of the Church, the Church of Christ after his death (John ii, 17; Acts x, 38; Tit. ii, 14); (4) the importance of his service; (5) the advantage and pleasure it brings to the possessor; (5) the instances and honorable commendation of it in the Scriptures: Moses, Phineas, Caleb, Jonathan, Paul, etc. (Gal. iv, 18; Rev. iii, 15, etc.); (6) the incalculable good effects it produces on others (James v, 20). Zealots (Σκόραρι) were, in a technical Jewish sense, the followers of Judas the Gaulonite, or Gallusian (q. v.). Josephus speaks of them as forming the "fourth sect of Jewish philosophy," and as distinguishing themselves by their Pharisaic contempt of the Gentiles, their unchangeable love of liberty and a contempt of death. Their leading tenet was the unlawfulness of paying tribute to the Romans, as being a violation of the theocratic constitution. This principle, which they maintained by force of arms, after the government, was soon converted into a pretext for deeds of violence against their own countrymen, and during the last days of the Jewish polity the Zealots were lawless brigands or guerrillas, the pest and terror of the land. After the death of Judas, and of his two sons, Jacob and Simon (who suffered crucifixion), they were headed by Eleazar, one of his descendants, and were often denominated Sicarii, from the use of a weapon resembling the Roman sica (Joseph. Ant. xviii, 1; War, iv, 1-6; vii, 8; see Lardner, Credibility, pt. i, bk. i, ch. vi, ix; kitto, Palestine, p. 741, 751). See Zealots.

Zegedin (or Zsegedin), Stephen de, an eminent Lutheran divine, was born at Zegedin, a city of Lower Hungary, in 1565. His family name was Ká. He studied under Luther and Melanchthon at Wittenberg, taught and preached Lutheranism in several cities in Hungary, and was taken prisoner by the Turks, who treated him with great cruelty. He subsequently effected his release as minister at Budah and in many other places. He died at Reven, in Hungary, May 3, 1572. He left the following works, which were afterwards published: Asertio de Trinitate (1573);—Tubulis Analytica in Propheta, Psalmos, et Novum Testamentum (1589); —Spinae Romanorum Pontificum Historicum (1602). See Chalmers, Bib. Antiq. xiv.

Zeitlich, Carl Heinrich, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Elisenburg, June 19, 1777. He studied theology, philosophy, and phallogos at Wittenberg, was made magistrate in 1797, on presenting a dissertation, De Chalcedoniorum Veritas Testamenti apud Judaeos auctoritatem. In 1792 he was made professor, and died Aug. 8, 1798. Of his writings we mention, De Lingua Judaicae Hebrew Temporibus Christi et Apostolorum (Viteb, 1741); —De Codicium Vetearum Testamentorum Orientalium et Occidentalem dispersionibus (ibid. cod.). —De Rito Baptistico in Mortem Christi, ab Eunomianis Reconsiderboribus Introducto (ibid. 1759); —Eumvtria Antiquissimorum Scriptorum Veterum Monimenta Collecta (ibid. 1760). Zeisberger, David, a Moravian missionary among the Indians of North America, was born in Moravia, in 1721, when his parents emigrated to Herrnhut, in Upper Lusatia, for the sake of religious liberty. He was educated by the Moravians in Saxony, and afterwards lived at their settlement of Nenndyck, Holland. In 1738 he came to Georgia, where some of his brethren had begun a settlement, that they might preach the gospel to the Creeks. Thence he removed to Pennsylvania, and assisted in the commencewelder's Narrative. Amid all his privations and dangers he was never known to complain, nor ever regarded that he had engaged in the cause of the Redeemer. He would never consent to receive a salary, although he deemed it proper for some missionaries. He trusted in his Lord for the necessities of life, and he looked to the interests of his church. He had never a word of criticism to speak of those who disapproved of his free, cheerless, and uncomplaining spirit of universal love filled his bosom. A more perfect character has seldom been exhibited on the earth. It is a melancholy fact that he suffered more from white men, called Christians, by reason of their selfishness and depravity and hostility to the gospel, than from the Indians. Zeitmann had never been out of his native land. He had never known a white man, who believed in Christ or paid the price of his freedom and his spirit. Amid all obstacles the brethren, in the days of Mr. Zeisberger, instructed and baptized about fifteen hundred Indians. The calm death of those who were murdered at Muskingum, in 1782, is a striking proof of the influence of the gospel on men, concerning whom it is sometimes said they cannot be made Christians. About 1768 he wrote two grammars of the Onondaga, in English and German, and a dictionary, German and Indian. In 1772, he published, in Lenape, or language of the Delawareas, he published a spelling-book, sermons to children, and a hymn-book, containing upwards of five hundred hymns, translated partly from German and partly from English. He left in manuscript a grammar on German or Delaware, a language which has been translated by Mr. Du Ponceau; also a harmony of the four gospels, translated into Delaware. See De Schweinitz, Life and Times of David Zeisberger (Philadelphia, 1870); Heckewelder, Narrative of the Missions among the Delaware and Mingo Indians (ibid. 1890); *Allen, Amer. Zeitmann, Gottfried Thomas, a Lutheran minister, was born of Jewish parentage at Cracow, Poland, in 1766. On account of the war between Poland and Sweden, Zeitmann's father had to leave his country, and settled at Frankfort, where his son Hirshel (this was Zeitmann's name before his baptism) received his early education. In 1707 he was baptized, taking the above-mentioned name. He desired to learn a trade, but his friends advised him to attend the gymnasia at St. Anna, at Augsburg, where he had gone on account of being persecuted by his relatives. In 1717 he commenced his studies at Jena, where he remained until 1731. He had passed some years as a tutor, he was in 1782, chosen pastor at Oberode, and in 1786, one of the pastors of Frankfort and Sachsenhausen. He died Feb. 7, 1747. His biographer, Dr. C. H. Martin, says of him, "Zeitmann preferred to speak in Latin, and as oft as we quoted a passage of Scripture, whether of the Old or New Test., he repeated the same in the original, with chapter and verse. He never entered the pulpit without having studied his subject with prayer and meditation. His delivery was distinct, his voice powerful; he could be heard in the largest church in Frankfort." (B. P.)

Zeill, Matthew, the earliest Reformed preacher of Strasburg, was born in 1477 at Kaisersberg, in Upper Alsace, and graduated in theology at Freiburg. In 1518 he became pastor to the cathedral of Strasburg, having already been strongly influenced by Luther's Theses, and in 1521 he took decided ground as an evangelical preacher, while engaged in the exposition of the epistle to the Romans. Some persons traduced him for his course, but others became his supporters, and even the magistracy of the city pledged themselves in his defence against the chapter. In 1528 his bishop formulated a series of charges against him, to which Zeill gave a refutation, which may tend to the promotion of love for God and his own convictions. He gave hospitable entertainment to the fugitive Schwenkfeld, and refused to anathematize the Swiss because of their opinions respecting the sacraments. He attached no great importance to formal creed creeds, and took no part in current disputes, nor yet in Bucer's attempt at unification. In 1584 he published, in the name of the Strasburg clergy, a catechism (Kurzbrief christliche Erbauung für die Kinder u. Anglnnder, etc.) for beginners; which seems suited rather to teachers than to children. He also wrote for his countrymen an exposition of the latter in Latin. In 1542 he united with his colleagues in sending an opinion respecting images, etc., to the preachers of Frankfort, which decided them to be anaphtoria, and which asserted the real presence of Christ in the sacrament, and that in a man, and not in a substance, as taught in 1548. His wife, Catharine, was a skilful disputant, and maintained a correspondence with Schwenkfeld during many years, besides issuing a defence of her association with him. She also wrote a brave defence of her husband's memory, in 1557, against an attack made by Louis Babus. She obtained the reputation of a pious benefactor of the afflicted, and especially of "poor scholars" and such as had fled for refuge to Strasburg on account of their religious convictions, not excluding even Anabaptists. See the biographies of Zell and his wife in Rohrer, Mitteil. ons d. Gesch. d. Evangel. Kirche d. Elbauen (Strasburg, 1865), iii, 89 sqq.; Herzog, Real-Enzyklop. s. v.

Zella, Council of (Concilium Zelianum or Telepumend), was held in 418, at Zella, or Tella, in the province of Byzaenca, in Africa, Donatianus, bishop of Zella, presiding. Various regulations were made.

1. Enquiry. No man shall be admitted to holy orders who has served in war after baptism.

2. Bishops shall be consecrated by the hierarch, and no bishop shall be consecrated in the city of Zella, unless that of the bishops of the province, expressed in writing.

3. Declares that one bishop only can consecrate another, except in the Roman Church.

4. Exhorts bishops, priests, etc., to observe continence.

5. Directs that the Montalutus and Novatianists shall be admitted into the Church by imposition of hands.

See Mansi, Concil. ii, 1577.

Zeller, Christian Heinrich, a Protestant pedagogue, was born at Hohen-Entringen, near Tübingen, March 29, 1799. He studied law at Tübingen, which he did not practice, but gave himself entirely to the cause of education. In 1808 he founded his famous institution for children and teachers at Beuggen-on-the-Rhine, where he died, May 18, 1860. He published, Göttliche Ansichten auf menschliche Fragen (24 ed. Basel, 1852) — Kurse Seelsorche (Stuttgart, 1846) — Monatsblätter von Beuggen, in which contains the set of essays on various subjects. Zeller also distinguished himself as a hymn-writer: one of his hymns, Gott bei mir am jedem Ort, is found in an English translation in Hymns from the Land of Luther, p. 27 ("My God with me in every place."). See Zachold, *Theol. a. v. a.; Herzog, Real-Enzyklop. s. v.; Koch, Theologie des deutschen Kirchenlebens, viii, 188 sqq. (B. P.)

Zeller, Hermann, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Neckarweihingen, Aug 26, 1807, and died at Mülhausen, April 10, 1885. He is best known as the editor of Bibliisches Wörterbuch für das christliche Volks (3d ed. Leipzic, 1884). (B. F.)

Zeller, Johann, a Protestant theologian, was born at Zurich, June 29, 1807, and died July 6, 1889. He is the author of Stimmen der deutschen Kirche über das Leben Jesu von Strauss (Zurich, 1857). His Predigten were published after his death (1940). See Zuchehl, Bibl. Theol. s. v. (B. F.)

Zemzem is the name of a well at Mecca accoated sacred by the Mohammedans. It is said to have been formed from the spring of water which God pointed out to Hagar and Ishmael when they were driven from the house of Abraham and compelled to flee into Arabia. The Mohammedan pilgrims drink of its water and believe it to be effectual in healing diseases, and even in purifying the soul.

Zend-Avesta is the name commonly given to the sacred books of the Parsees (q. v.), which are ascribed to Zoroaster (q. v.). The word avesta (arceatd) means text, or original text; send, or sand, means translation and paraphrase. According to the latest researches, it would seem as if only a small portion of the entire collection now extant were formed by avesta, or text, the rest being made up of send, or commentary, without text. The term send has changed its meaning somewhat, for it is more or less of a paraphrase by an author. An imitative interpretation coming from the highest source, which was in time embodied in the text itself. Later it came to denote a translation into the Pehlevi, or native idiom of Persia, made by the Zoroastrian priests during the Sassanian period. There is also a special send doctrine which differs considerably from that contained in the avesta. A still further explanation of the send doctrine is the pzdend, a word which often occurs in connection with avesta and send.

The doctrine of the "Magi," as the Zoroastrian priests were known, as well as the Magi of India and Babylonia, is first alluded to in Jeremiah, where the chief of the Magi is mentioned among Nebuchadnezzar's retinue. In the New Test. (Matt. ii. I) the Magi came to worship Jesus at Bethlehem. The earliest account among Greek writers is furnished by Herodotus. There are also accounts by Ctesias, the Greek physician of Artaxerxes II., by Denion, Theopompos, and Hermippus. But only fragments from their writings remain, embedded chiefly in Phitarus and Diogenes Laertius. The writings of Pldny, Strabo, Pausanias, Dion Chrysostom, and others, were confined to correction on the subject. Among the Armenian writers of the 5th century of our era we find Ennix and Elinxus, from whose records we may gather that the Zoroastrians at their time were split into two parties, the one called Mag, the other Zendik—the former inhabiting chiefly Media and Persia, and acknowledging in the main the avesta; the latter living principally in Bactria, and following the traditional explanations, or send proper. The nations of modern Europe came into contact with the adherents of Zoroastrianism in the western parts of India, and in the latter half of the 14th century some Mts. of Zend-Avesta, or Zend-Avesta, were translated. In 1761 he returned to Paris with one hundred and eighty MSS. in different Oriental languages, and in 1771 published in French the first European translation of the Zend-Avesta, to which was added a great deal of supplementary matter. This work produced a profound sensation throughout Europe. In England it was pronounced a forgery by all but a few scholars. In France there was but one opinion, viz., that English scholars were trying to pull down the work out of sheer spite and jealousy. In Germany, however, much more considered opinion was prevalent, for while some of the arguments arrayed against it, there arose another renowned German scholar, Kleecker, who, in token of his complete and unreserved trust in the genuineness, set about translating Anquetil's work into German, adding much supplementary matter. After the lapse of more than fifty years, Heslop, a Danish scholar, undertook an investigation of the matter. In 1826 he wrote a pamphlet, in which he pointed out (as had been done before) the close affinity between the language of the Zend-Avesta and the Sanscrit, and proved it to be, not corrupt, but a distinct branch of it. He also proved that modern Persian is derived from Zend, as Italian from Latin, and this gave the key to many of the errors of Anquetil's version. The learned dustur himself, from whom Anquetil derived his information of the language, possessed no grammatical knowledge of it. Heslop had pointed out the way, Eugene Burnouf followed it. He, indeed, may be called the father of Zend philology. For more than twenty years this eminent scholar devoted all his energies to elucidating, commenting on, and discussing this language, and the more ancient language of the Zend-Avesta, to which he added many new verses and translations. In Germany, Osiannsen, Bopp, Muller, Brockhaus, Spiegel, Haug, and in Copenhagen, Westergaard, have been busy ever since in editing and translating the Zend-Avesta or some portions of it.

The Zend-Avesta is originally of very great extent, consisting of vastly more than at present. Pliny says that Zoroaster composed two million verses, and Attavari, an Arabuan author, says that his writings covered twelve thousand cow-skins. But from the conquest of Persia by Alexander the Great, in 330 B.C., to the accession of the Sassanides, in 221 B.C., the words of Zoroaster and the wisdom of the Magi were thrown into the background by Greek ideas, and became nearly lost. When, however, the Sassanides assumed the rule their principal endeavors were directed to the revival of the ancient faith, and their unceasing efforts after the ancient fragments of the Zoroastrian doctrine have resulted in the small collection which we now possess. The whole Scripture is said to have consisted of twenty-one sects, or parts, each containing avesta and zend, that is, text and commentary. The number was reduced to twenty by the introduction of Zend-Avesta. The number of which the most sacred prayer of the Zoroastrians (the Honover) was composed. By the unanimous consent of both classical and Persian writers the whole bulk of the sacred literature is ascribed to Zoroaster himself. They are supposed to be the substance, or, as was subsequently held, the very words of divine revelations to the prophet in the form of conversations.

The name Zend-Avesta belongs more particularly to the three collections which are severally called Vendidad, Vispered, and Yasna, while the remaining writings are comprised under the title of Zoroaster, or small Avesta. The latter contains short prayers, and especially the Yashta, or Yaska, hymns addressed to the different genii, on the days which bear their names and are sacred to them, or on the days of those genii who are considered to be the attendants of the former.

The Vendidad consists of twenty-three formulas, or sections, which treat of cosmogony, and may be called the religious and civil code of the old Parsees. The first fargost relates how Akuru-Manza (now called Ormuzd), the good spirit, created the several countries, the earth, and the plants and the animals, and perfect in their kind, but that Angro-Masus (now called Ahriman), the evil or black spirit, created in opposition all the evils which infest these worlds. In the second fargost Zoroaster bids Yima announce to mankind the sacred law which he had taught him, but Yima refuses compliance with this benediction. He then bids him enlarge the worlds and make them prosperous. This he obeys, and carries out the orders given him by Ahura-Mazda. The third fargard enumerates the five things which are the most agreeable, then the five things which are the most disagreeable, and afterwards the five things which convey the greatest satisfaction in harmony with the fargard rules, and the criminal code of the Avesta. It enumerates, in the first instance, various offences, which are considered to be so grave as to affect, not only the person who commits them, but also his relatives, and then proceeds to define the punishments incurred by the offender. The eight following fargards contain injunctions in reference to impurities caused by dead bodies. The thirteenth fargard begins with the description of two kinds of dogs, the one created by Ahura-Mazda, the other by Angro-Manyuš—the killing of the former being a criminal, that of the latter a meritorious, act; and the remaining part of the book is devoted to the proper treatment of dogs in general, while the same subject is continued in the fourteenth fargard, which enumerates also the penalties for injuring dogs. The treatment of young dogs is left to the subject matter of the latter part of the fifteenth fargard, which, in its first sections, treats of sexual offences, and the bringing-up of illegitimate children. The great care and attention given to dogs seems to have arisen from the fact that the country was infested with wolves. The sixteenth fargard treats of the precautions to be observed when mixed marriages are in contemplation. The seventeenth fargard treats of impurities caused by the cutting of hair and the trimming of nails. The next fargard is more of a mixed character; it treats of various ceremonies, and gives injunctions on cleanliness, decency, and moral conduct. The nineteenth fargard relates how Angro-Manyuš endeavoured to kill Zoroaster, but how the latter successfully defended himself with weapons given him by Ahura-Mazda. Then the evil spirit, being aware that it had no material power over Zoroaster, next resorted to temptation; but those, too, were defeated by the prophet, who now resolved to conquer the evil spirit, and for this purpose addressed to Ahura-Mazda various questions on the rites of purification and the condition of souls after death. The twentieth fargard gives some information about the first man who understood curing diseases. The twenty-first fargard is devoted to the phenomena of the sky and the luminous bodies, and comprises invocations of the clouds, the sun, the moon, and the stars. The last fargard relates that Angro-Manyuš, having engendered diseases, Ahura-Mazda is compelled to fight against them; the book concludes with an account of the creation of various animals and other objects to this end. The form of all these fargards is nearly always that of a dialogue between Ahura-Mazda and Zoroaster, and the same form is occasionally observed in the two other portions of the Avesta, which differ materially from those of the Vendidad.

The Vispered contains a collection of prayers, composed of twenty-three chapters, resembling the younger Yasna, next to be noticed, and referring to the same ceremonial actions and the Yasna spirit, and containing a nearly a liturgical character. All that can really be held to emanate from Zoroaster himself are the five Gathas, which form part of the Yasna. This Yasna consists principally of prayers to be recited at the sacrificial rites, such as the consecration of Zeothra, or holy places, and the Yasna spirit. The Yasna of fire, Kahathra-vairya, or the genius of metals; Spenta-arnaiti, or the genius of earth; Haurvat, or the genius of water; and Amratai, or the genius of trees. They are severally opposed by the Devas, or demons, subordinate to Angro-Manyuš, viz., by Aksme, Ander, Sauvra, Mithi, Yasu, and Zarachka. Other demons are named in the Vendidad. The worshippers of fire belong to Ahura-Mazda, whereas the worshippers of the Devas are possessed by Angro-Manyuš. See Zoroaster.

The worship taught by Zoroaster seems to have been of the simplest kind, the adoration of fire by means of hymns and offerings, chiefly, if not exclusively, taken from the vegetable kingdom, an essential concomitant of the sacrifice being the juice of the homa (or soma), which occupies an important part also in the Vedic rites. This worship, however, must not be confounded with the considerable period of the prehistoric and early Parthian creed, which assumed a similar development to that based by the Hindus on the Rigveda text, and is indicated by several portions of the Avesta, which cannot be looked upon as its earliest part. At the present day every Persian is taught to repeat long passages in the original Zend; but hardly a single word in the language is intelligible even to the Parsi priest or darustur.

Literature.—In the Zend language this consists chiefly of its translated text, the accompanying glosses, and a few independent works in the same language, the Hormuz, an ancient literary Parthes Pollux, and the Don-kur, of much later date. It is an important aid to the understanding of the Avesta; yet its interpretation is not to be implicitly trusted. That part of the Zarathostran literature which is composed in the so-called Parasee dialect is of still more modern date and limited extent. Glosses or interpretations of the Avestan texts, called Pa-Zend, versions of certain portions of them and of Pehlevi texts, sundry invocations and ascriptions of praise, and expositions of Parasee doctrine, constitute nearly its whole substance. Several passages of these glosses or expositions were published in Spiegel's Grammar (Leipsic, 1851). After the settlement of the Parsis in India, a Sanscrit version of the Yasa and some other parts of the Avestan text was made by Nersieoehn. It has been published in a Latin transliteration by Spiegel (Leipsic, 1861). See Spiegel, Avesta; die heiligen

Zenkel, Georg Petrus, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born March 20, 1717, at Schwarzenbach, in Bayreuth. He studied theology, Oriental languages, and natural sciences at Jena. In 1740 he was permitted to lecture, and in 1746 was made adjunct to the philosophical faculty. In 1754 he was called professor of philosophy to Erlangen, and opened his lectures with an address, De Methodo Docendi apud Veters Hebros.
In 1755 he resigned his position, and died Dec. 14, 1760.
He wrote, Commentarius Grammaticus Ebraea
Lezgica (Jena, 1748, 1749);—Commentarius Evangelico-Hebraici-
(1747, 1748, 1751);—Beitriige zur Ver一定程度

Zero, a reputed bishop or Vanzo, and alleged author of ninety-three sermons, which were published in 1508 by Jacob de Lenco and Albert Castellan under the title, S. Zenoni Episc. Veronae. Sermones, after a very ancient manuscript found fifty years before in the episcopical library of Verona by Guarinus. These sermons were previously wholly unknown, and Zeno himself lived only in a few miracle-legends. He was represented with a fish attached to his ange or episcopial staff, because he had, while angling, delivered a drowning man from the clutches of the devil.
Eleven of the sermons are certainly not by the author of the general mass. The collection was variously estimated; Vogel, in Herzog (following Dorner), dating them back perhaps to the beginning of the latter half of the 3d century, Baronius to A.D. 200, others to A.D.
450-500. It would seem that they emanated from the mind of a bishop who was endowed with earnestness and dignity of character as well as theological learning, and who presided over an established Church and a regularly organized clergy. See Franke, Institut, Patrology

Zengrav, Johann Jacob, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Strasburg, May 21, 1643. He studied at Leipsic and Wittenberg, was in 1767 professor in his native city, in 1768 doctor of theology, and died Nov. 28, 1767. Zengrav was a voluminous writer. A complete list of his writings, embracing all departments of theology, is given by Jocher, Altpommersches Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. F.)

Zephyrus, in Greek mythology, the representative of the west wind, was a son of Astraus and Eoa. He was represented in Athens on the tower of wind, lightly draped with a mantle, because he was the warmest wind. In the lap of his mantle he carried a quantity of flowers.

Zer (Heb. Tef, "S. rock; Sept. by misereprehension, Tiphoc, Vulg. Ser.), one of the fortified towns of Naphtali (Josh. xix, 35), where it is named between Ziddim and Hamath; but from the absence of the copulative ("") and between this and the preceding name, as well as from the total ("nineteen cities") in ver. 35, it is evidently a part of the preceding name, Ziddim-ser. See Ziddim. Schwarz remarks (Passet, p. 193) that Zer is mentioned in the Jerusalem Talmud (Megillah, 1) as lying near Ziddim.

Zera Abraham (ארבי אברם) is the title of a grammatico-historical commentary on the Pentateuch, written by Abraham Seeb, of Brzeze, in the 17th century, and published at Solzbach in 1685. See De Ross, Dictionaire Storico (Germ. transl., p. 85; Fürst, Bibl.

Ordnance Survey, ii, 290).

Zerremer, Heinrich Gottlieb, a Protestant theo-lologian of Germany, was born at Wernigerode, March 8, 1750. He studied at Halle, and, after completing his studies, accepted a position as teacher of Latin and mathematics at Klosterbergen. In 1775 he was called as pastor to Bayendorf. In 1787 he was appointed first preacher at Dernenburg, in the duchy of Halberstadt.
In 1810 he was appointed general superintendent at Halberstadt, where he died, Nov. 10, 1811. He was a popular writer, and his publications were greatly es-

Zickler, Friedrich Samuel, a Protestant theologian, born in Meiningen, Nov. 14, 1721, at Schwabendorf, in Weimar. He studied at Jena, where he was made magister in 1744, on presenting a dissertation, Ad Vaticinium Jacoboum Genes. zicx, 12. In 1758 he was made professor of philosophy, and at the jubilee of the Jena University was made doctor of theology, presenting a dissertation, De Glorioso Servatione in Calum Adiversum. In 1769 he went to Erlangen as third professor of theology and university-preacher. He opened his lectures with a dissertation on De epistemologia et ephorapia necessaria in Doctora Ecclesiae Reginitatis. He returned again to Jena in 1769, advanced rapidly, and died April 25, 1779, having four years before been chosen first professor of theology. He wrote, Dis. i at II Historico - Exegetica, Religionem Bestiarum ab Egiptiae Consacratarum Exponentes, etc. (Jena, 1745-46);—Dis. Exegetica Status Exegetico Eorum, inseminis i, 14 sq., Predictibilis Futuritys (ibid. 1747):—Chaldaismus Daniellis Prophetas, etc. (ibid. 1749, etc.). Zidlim. The modern Hattin lies seven and a quarter miles north-west of Tiberias, and four and three quarters south-west of Mejdal (Magdala); it contains some rock-cut tombs to the west, and the wady of Neby Shnaib (Jethro) on the south (Memoirs to the Ordnance Survey, i, 884).

Ziegendorf, Bartholomaeus, a well-known Protestant minister of Germany, who was born June 14, 1688, at Pulzlin, in Lusticia. He studied at Halle, where A. H. Francke enlisted him for missionary service. On Nov. 29, 1705, he left for Tranquebar with his friend Flitschow. For a time his work was opposed by the Danish officers, but finally he succeeded. Having mastered the language, he translated Luther's small catechism, the New Test., and commenced the translation of the Old Test. into the Malabar language. He also founded schools and built chapels there. In 1714 he returned to Europe, to return again to Tranquebar in 1718, where he died Jan. 29, 1719. His published works include, Lcarnomenos Damulicos (Halle, 1716);—together with J. E. Gründler, he published Theologia Thetica in qua Omnium Dogmata ad Salutem Cognoscamus Necessaria Perspectiva Methodo traducturam, etc. (2d Ed. Halle, 1866). Ziegenbein, Johann Wilhelm Heinrich, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born in 1766 at Braunschweig. In 1798 he was appointed pastor of St. Peter's, in his native place, and advanced in 1808 as general superintendent of the diocese of Hanover. In 1819 he was appointed abbot of Michealestein, and died Jan. 12, 1824. Ziegenbein's writings are mostly of a pedagogical nature. He translated from the French Senebier's lives of Calvin and Beza (Hambourg, 1789); from the English Priestley's Compendium of the Institutions of Moses with those of the Hindus and other Ancient Nations; The Life of Gibbon, etc. See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, iv, 793 sq.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Ziegen, Daniel, D.D., a German Reformed minister, was born at Reading, Pa., July 11, 1804. His parents removing to New Berlin, Union Co., in his infancy, his youth was spent there. He was a suggested by trade, and went to Philadelphia to work; but his mind not being turned to the ministry, he entered the University of Pennsylvania, located at Philadelphia; studied theology in the seminary of the Reformed Church at Carlisle; was licensed in 1820, and became pastor of some congregations in York County; was called to the Kutztucke church, where he spent the whole of his life, with the exception of the last few years, which were devoted to the First Reformed Church in York. He died May 23, 1876. He preached almost exclusively in German, which he spoke with great fluency, accuracy, and elegance. His preaching was calm, clear, and impressive. He was a man of culture, pleasure, open-hearted, kind, and sympathetic. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church, v, 199.

Ziegler, Werner Carl Ludwig, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born May 15, 1763, at Scharmebeck, in Lüneburg. He studied at Göttingen, some time lectured in the Göttingen University, and was called, in 1792, as professor of languages by Bostock. He died April 24, 1809, leaving, De Minimo Romano Commentatio (Göttingen, 1788):—Vollständige Eindringung in den Brief an die Hebräer (ibid. 1791):—Prodr. A Dis. Ziller, Tschirn, a German philosopher, was born Dec. 22, 1817, and died April 20, 1889, at Leipzig, doctor and professor of philosophy. He was a pupil of Herbart, whose system he followed. Ziller published, Die Regierung der Kinder (1869):—Grundlegung zur Lehre vom erziehenden Unterricht (1861):—Vorträge über allgemeine Philosophie (1876):—Allgemeine philosophische Ethik (1880). In 1860 he started with Allihn the Zeitschrift für exakte Philosophie im Sinne des neueren philosophischen Rationalismus. He also organized the society of scientific pedagogues, whose organ, the Jahrbücher, he edited for fourteen years. (B. P.)

Zillerthal, a valley of Tyrol, stretching for about five miles along the Ziller between Salzburg and Innsbruck, and inhabited by about 15,000 souls, has become memorable in Church history on account of the infamous manner in which the Roman Catholic clergy succeeded in suppressing an evangelical rising which took place in 1716. In other parts of Germany, the Reformation found its way into Salzburg and Tyrol, but it was suppressed, in the latter part of the 18th century, in Salzburg, by the archbishops, and in Tyrol by the government, in connection with the nobility and the ecclesiastics. In 1730 archbishop Flrinna inaugurated a cruel persecution, with a view of exterminating all adherents to the evangelical faith. Nevertheless it reappeared in the Zillertal in the begining of the present century. As soon as the Roman clergy became aware of the danger, the number of priests was doubled in the villages and the strictest watch was kept. When, in 1832, the emperor Francis of Austria visited the valley, the evangelical Zillerthalers petitioned him in behalf of their religion. The emperor promised to do what he could. When the Roman clergy became aware of this, they resorted to violent measures. The toleration edict of Joseph II, and the stipulations of the congress of Vienna, were thrown aside, and, instigated by the fanatical clergy, the provincial estates of Tyrol decreed that no split in the Church of the country should be allowed that those who would not conform to the Church of Rome should leave the country and settle under an evangelical prince.

But before this could be effected the Evangelicals had to suffer many things. Being under the ban of the Church, their neighbors were warned against holding any kind of intercourse with them. The children of the Evangelicals were forced to frequent the Roman Catholic schools, where they were placed on separate seats, as "children of the devil," apart from the "Christian children." When, after eleven years of perpetual christian children. When, after eleven years of perpetual

Zimmermann, Johann Christian, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Langenwiesen, near Ilmenau, Aug. 13, 1702. He studied at Leipsic, and was appointed court-chaplain at Hanover in 1738. In 1745
he was called as provost and superintendent to Uelzen, in Hanover, where he died, May 28, 1788. He is the author of several hymns, which are found in Verwirrttes Hausvermischtes Kirchen-Gruftisch (edited by Zimmermann, Halle, 1747), and with Koch, Gesch. d. deutsches Kirchengedichts, v. 566 sq. (B. P.)

Zimmermann, Johann Jakob (1), an eloquent German preacher, was born in the duchy of Wurtemberg in 1644. He was generally regarded as a disciple of Boerhman and Brouquelle, whose doctrines he rendered highly popular, making many converts in Germany and the united provinces of the Netherlands.
He was for some years professor of mathematics at Heidelberg. He was about to depart for America to escape the persecution to which his preaching had subjected him, when he died at Rotterdam, in 1688. The most noted of his works is entitled a Revelatio of A mi-christ.

Zimmermann, Johann Jakob (2), a Swiss theobian, was born in 1685, became professor at Zurich in 1737, and died in 1756. He introduced more liberal views in his teaching than had been current hitherto,
and was often suspected of heresy. See Hagenbach, Hist. of the Church, II, 664, 665; and Conzernius i, 1761;
Fritzsche, Dissertation (Zurich, 1841); Schweizer, Con-traldboggen, ii, 791 sq.

Zimmermann, Karl, a Protestant theologian
of Germany, was born at Darmstadt, Aug. 28, 1805.
He studied theology and philosophy at Giessen, and, after having labored for some years in the department of education, was appointed dean to the faculty of theology at Darmstadt in 1832. From that time he remained in the ministry, advancing rapidly, and was appointed in 1842 first preacher to the court. In 1847 he was made prelate and member of consistory, and filled this high position till 1872, when he retired. He died June 12, 1877. To him the Gustavus Adolphus Society (q. v.) is much indebted for the great interest and activity shown in its behalf. His publications, mostly sermons, are all specified by Zuchbild, Bibl. Theol. ii, 1485-
97. See also Theol. Universaliszierung, s. v. (B. P.)

Zimmermann, Matthias, a German theologian, was born in 1809, and died in 1860. He began his studies in his native village, and afterwards went to the College of Thun (1839), and thence (1844) to the University of Strasburg, where he studied philosophy.
Having decided upon a religious career, he studied at Leipsic, and in 1861 returned home. He was soon named rector of the College of Leutsch, in Upper Hungary, but the next year (1862) returned home again.
Soon afterwards the elector of Saxony appointed him a colleague of the superintendent of Colditz, and the min-
ter and superintendent of Meissen. He had prepared himself for these positions by a license in theology
(Nov. 1611), and in 1666 was made doctor in the university at Leipsic, but died suddenly, Nov. 29, 1689, leaving many religious works, which are enumerated
in the Biogr. Universelle, s. v.

Zimmermann, Wilhelm, historian and controversialist of Neustadt, in the duchy of Wurtemberg, was preacher at Wimpfen in 1569, member of comme-tory and court-preacher at Heidelberg in 1578, and finally (in 1586) inspector of churches and schools at Grotz. He left a Historia Germanica, and some Litterae, which are inserted by Fecht in his collection of Epistolas Theologicas.

Zinge-rle, Fru, a Roman Catholic Orientalist, was born at Mezen, March 17, 1901, and died Jan. 10, 1918,
at Mariaberg, Tyrol. He published, Echtes Albten heidiger Märtyrer des Morgenlandes, aus dem Syrischen übersetzt
(Innsbruck, 1836, 2 vols.)—Clement Romanius' zwei Briefe an die Jungfrauen, aus dem Syrischen mit Anmerkungen (Vienna, 1827) — Ephraim Syrus' auxur-wählte Schriften (Innsbruck, 1830-34, 5 vols.); besides, he compiled a last volume of Zionische Archiv der German (Catholic Social Society) (B. L. V.)

Zinzendorf, Nicholas Lewis Count von, is entitled to a fuller notice than space allows in vol. x. The founder of the modern Moravian Church was born at Dresden, May 26, 1732, and died at Herrnhut, Saxony, May 9, 1784. He was descended from an ancient Austrian family. For the sake of the Protestant faith his grandfather relinquished broad domains in Austria, and settled in Franconia. When he was but six weeks old, his father, one of the cabinet ministers of the elector of Saxony, died; while several years later his mother married the field-marshall von Natzmar, of the Prussian army, and removed to Berlin. Young Zinzendorf did not accompany her, but remained with his grandmother, the baroness Catharine von Gersdorf, one of the most distinguished women of her day, who had organized the first reformed convent in the mining department of Hessen, near Cassel. He was that intrusted to her care proved to be an important event in his life. Amid the influences of that ecclesiola he spent his childhood, daily breathing the atmosphere of transparent piety. His grandmother adored the virgin and child Jesus, as a personal and spiritual dependent. When he was not yet four years old he grasped, with a clear perception and a flood of feeling, Christ's relation to man as a Saviour and divine brother. This consciousness produced a love for Jesus which was the holy and perpetual fire on the altar of his heart; so that in mature years he could truthfully exclaim: "I have but one passion; and it is—He—He only!" In 1710 he was sent to the Royal Pädagogium at Halle, at the head of which stood the celebrated Francæ; in 1716 he entered the University of Wittenberg, and in accordance with the custom of young nobles of that day, began his travels. During all these years he confessed Christ with youthful enthusiasm, and labored for his cause with manly courage. At Halle he organized a fraternity among the students, known as "The Order of the Grain of Mustard Seed." At Wittenberg he exercised no little influence; in Paris, where he spent an entire winter, neither the blandishments of the royal court nor the flatteries of the highest nobles could seduce him from the path of godliness. His commentary on the French capital, in a hollow book of 1721, is remarkable. A volume remained unpubbed, with the inscription, "Hoc est pane, quod factus est pro me?"—in the picture-gallery of Dittelsdorf made upon his heart followed him through life. When Zinzendorf returned from his journey, it was his earnest wish to devote himself, in spite of his rank, to the ministry of the gospel. But neither his mother nor grandmother would listen to such a proposition, and insisted upon his adopting, like his father, the career of a statesman. With a hearty heart he accepted the position, but in 1721, when he was elected a position as Aulic and Judicial Councillor at Dresden. His purpose to promote the cause of Christ remained, however, unshaken, and soon after attaining his majority he purchased the domain of Berthelsdorf, in Upper Lusatia, with the intention of making that centre of his Christian activity. In what such activity was consistent, he did not as yet know. He was supported in his purpose by his young wife, the countess Erdmuth Dorothy von Reuss, whom he married in 1722, and through whom he became connected with several of the royal houses of Europe, from whom, in manner in which he was led to grant an asylum on his newly-purchased estate to the remnant of the Moravian Brethren, of the renewal of their Church through his agency, and of the peculiar character which he gave to it, a full account may be found in the article on the Moravian Brethren, 2, vi, 565, etc. In all that he undertook in this respect his aim was, not to interfere with the established Church, but rather to make the Moravians a Church within that Church. His course was misunderstood and excited bitter opposition. In 1736 he was banished from Saxony, and, two years later he determined to sign a bond acknowledging himself guilty of "offences," banished "forever." The same result which generally grows out of religious persecutions appeared in this case also. His enemies overreached themselves. Instead of putting a stop to his Christian activity, it grew and extended its influence and its reach and wide. A "Church of Pilgrims," as it was called, gathered around Zinzendorf, composed of the members of his family and his chief ministerial coadjutors, and itinerated to various parts of Germany, Switzerland, Holland, and England, everywhere making known the renewal of the Unita Fratrum, and attracting large numbers to its communion. Zinzendorf, with the aid of his fellow-laborers, directed the entire work of the Moravians in Christian and heathen lands. He had long since resigned his civil office at Dresden, and devoted himself entirely to his missionary work. On the recommendation of the king of Prussia, he was consecrated, at Berlin, a bishop of the Unita Fratrum, by bishops Jablonsky and David Nitschmann. In the following year he set out on a tour of inspection to the mission in St. Thomas, and in 1741 visited America. His course continued to be opposed, and brought him personal defamation of the grossest character. Few servants of the Lord have suffered more in this respect. But he leaned upon the strong arm of his divine Master, and gradually won the victory. The Saxon government recalled him to his native country, and fully acknowledged the Renewed Church of the Brethren; the British parliament recognised the Church, and passed an act encouraging the Moravians to settle in the British colonies; the government of Prussia granted the most favorable concessions. At the time of his death the Church for whose renewal God had appointed him the instrument was everywhere firmly established, and in Germany, over against the State Church, had gained a position even more independent than he had intended to secure. Zinzendorf died full of joy and peace, triumphing in the thought of his "going to the Saviour," blessing his children and fellow-workers, and when speech failed him, looking upon them with a countenance that was irradiated with the brightness of coming glory. Thirty-two presbyters and deacons from Germany, Holland, England, Ireland, North America, and Greenland, were his last resting-place on the Hutter, at Herrnhut. Zinzendorf was an extraordinary man, a heroic leader in the Church of Christ, a "disciple whom Jesus loved," a priest of the living God. Like all great men he had his faults, and some of them were of a grave character. He was often impetuous when he ought to have been calm; he allowed himself to be unduly swayed by his feelings; in one period of his career his theological views and utterances, which, however, he subsequently retracted, were set down as a position, and his efforts to renew the Unita Fratrum and yet make it a part of the established Church of Germany brought him into dilemmas the inevitable outcome of which was offences on the score of insincerity and double-dealing, although nothing was further from his thoughts. On the other hand, his writings manifest, that the Saviour, his Johannese intercourse with him, his work for the Moravian Church, his labors for the Church universal, the principles which he originated, often misunderstood and ridiculed in his day, but now the accepted property of all loyal Christians, the missions which he inaugurated among the heathen, the lifelong efforts which he made to promote the unity of the children of God of every name, and to bring about the fulfilment of Christ's high-priestly prayer—"that they may be one"—assign to him an exalted place in ecclesiastical history, give him an imperishable name, and justify the epithet on his tombstone: "He was ordained that he should go and bring forth fruit and his fruit should remain." In many re-dpects—and this truth explains to a great degree the opposition with which he met—Zinzendorf was more than a century in advance of his age. His writings number more than one hundred, and consist of sermons, hymns, offices of worship, controversial works, cate-chalms, and a number of political selections. He was a gifted gospelist. In public service he frequently improrvised hymns, which were sung by the congregation as he announced them line by line. Many of his compositions, both in point of the sentiments and the poetry, and in the wealth of originality and imagination which complement each other, have a place among the standard bodies of the Christian Church. The best collection of them was edited by Albert Knapp, Geistliche Lieder des Grauens von Zinzendorf (Stuttgart and Tübingen, 1845).

We append a brief account of Zinzendorf's labors in America. His chief purpose was not to found Moravian churches, but to care for his neglected German country-2, 1741, accompanied by his daughter, the countess Beigna, his private secretary, and several others. From New York he traveled to Philadelphia, and established himself at Germantown, where he rented a house which is still standing. Keeping in view the main object of his visit to America, he opened, in that dwelling,

a school for German children; preached the gospel where-ever he came, in churches, school-houses, and farms; acccepted the Lutherans of Philadelphia, who were without a minister, an appointment as their temporary pastor, a thing that led, on Muhlenberg's arrival from Europe, to bitter animosities, for which both sides were responsible; and organized the so-called Pennsylvania Synod. This last was his favorite undertaking. He conceived the idea of uniting the German churches and sects of Pennsylvania, upon the basis of experimental religion, into what he called "The Congregation of God in the Spirit." Gaining over to his views Henry Antes, a prominent magistrate of the Reformed persuasion (see Minim, Life and Times of Henry Antes, Moorstown, N. J., 1886), a call was addressed to all German religious bodies within the colony to send representatives to a Union Synod to be held at Germantown. It convened on Jan. 12, 1742, and met again, at various places, seven times before Zinzendorf's stay in America was fourteen times after his return to Europe. But, however beautiful the ideal, it was premature—that real union was brought about; the interest in the movement gradually waned, and, in the end, it served but to augment the differences among the German religious parties of Pennsylvania. Reports of the first seven meetings of this Synod, together with cogitate documents, were published by Benjamin Franklin, and form a volume which is as valuable as it is rare. The title of the first report is Authentische Relation von dem Anlassen, Fortgang und Schluss der in gynen Jahren gegründeten Gemeindes einer Arbeiter in der meisten christlichen Religionen und vieler vor sich selbst Gott-erlebenden Christen-Menschen in Pennsylvania (Philadelphia: by Ben. Franklin). Zin-zendorf's labors among his own brethren resulted in the organization of several churches, particularly the one at Philadelphia. After he had left the country, Moravian enterprises were begun at nearly all the places where he had preached. The Indian mission attracted his earliest attention. He undertook three journeys to the aboriginal domain—the first, in July, 1742, to the Delawares, the second, to the Mohicans of New York; and the third, in September, the Shawnees of the Wyoming Valley. He was probably the first white man who encamped on what is now the site of Wilkesbarre, and he would have been murdered by the savages had it not been for the opportunity arising of Console Weitzel, his commission agent.

The rattlesnake story, which has found its way into so many books and is so often quoted as an instance of God's special providence, is a fake. During his stay in America Zinzendorf laid aside his rank as a count.
His writings number one hundred and twenty-three,
among which are: Thesen, which came forth in 1746;
and was a gifted

language of the Moravian missionary vessel which plied between England and the American colonies.

Literature.—The books in relation to Zinzendorf are very numerous. Besides the works noted in the article on the Renewed Moravian Brethren, the most important are the following: Spangenberg, Leben des Grauens von Zinzendorf (Bar by, 1772—73, 3 vol.; an English translation by Jackson, Lond., 1850); Verleben, Leben des Zinzendorf (Grauen, hagen von Ense, Leben des Grauen Zinzendorf (Berlin, 1840); Pilgram, Leben des Grauens Zinzendorf (Leipzig, 1867), from a Roman Catholic standpoint; Kohler, Der Graf von Zinzendorf dargestellt aus seinen Gelehrten (Grauen, 1860); Braun, Leben des Grafen Zinzendorf (Bielefeld, etc.; Boret, Le Comte de Zinzendorf (Paris, 1865; an English translation under the title
The Banished Count, by John Gill, Lond. ed.); Zinzendorf's Theologie, dargestellt von H. Pfitt (Gotha, 1869—74,
4 vol., a Dutch translation under the title Im Verhältnis zu Philosophie und Kirchenleben seiner Zeit (Leipzig, 1886).) (Ed. B. P.)

Zipser, MAIER, chief rabbi at Stuhlweissenburg and afterwards at Rechnitz, in Hungary, was born Aug.
14, 1815, and died Dec. 10, 1870. He contributed largely to the Literaturblatt der Oesterre (1846 to 1860), Bene-Chasmonai, and the Jewish Chronicle, published in London. His contributions to the latter periodical, headed "The Talmud and the Gesenius" were called forth by Mr. Newdegate in the British House of Commons, when he opposed the admission of Jews into Parliament, were published separately under the title,
The Talmud and the Mount (Lond., 1862). After his death, Dr. A. Jellinek published his Die Floraus Jacob-Worck, "Uber das hohe Alter des jüdischen Lebens gegen Apion nach hebr. Originalquellen erläutert..." (Wien, 1871). See also Sipser, eine Biographie, in the Beth

Germany, was born at Silbach, near Hamshurg, July 28, 1762, and died at Wurzburg, Dec. 18, 1867, as came chamberlain to king Wenceslas. He had early embraced the doctrines of the Hussites, and entered directly into the movement for the execution of Hus and Jerome of Prague excited throughout Bohemia. A powerful party was soon formed, which urged upon the king a policy of resistance to the decisions of the Council of Constance. Ziska was one of the prominent leaders of this party, and his personal influence with the king was crowned by the latter's sanction to offer resistance, though the king's vacillating disposition incapacitated him from giving effect to his own honest convictions, and taking open part with his subjects against their oppressors. About the time of the outbreak of the war, a monk, named Theophanes, was chosen to induce him to moderate the hatred entertained by himself and his followers against their opponents. Ziska considered himself the chosen instrument of the Lord to visit his wrath upon the nations, and a fanaticism which asked no mercy for its defenders gave none to its opponents. His line of march could be traced through a country laid waste with fire and sword, and over the ruins of plundered towns. One of the dogmas held by his followers was, "that when all the cities of the earth should be burned down and reduced to the number of five, then the kingdom of kingship and the world of men would be concluded; because there was now the time of vengeance, and God was a God of wrath." The cries and groans of the monks and priests whom he sent to the stake he was wont to call the bridal song of his sister. His victories were generally won by the decisive charge of a chosen band of his followers named "the invincible brethren." In his great victory at Aussig over the German crusading army, commanded by Frederick the Warlike of Saxony, and the elector of Brandenburg, the furious onset of the Hussites was steadily sustained by the Saxons, and the Bohemians recoiled in astonishment at a successful resistance which they had never before encountered. Ziska, being apprised of the circumstance, approached on his cart, thanked the men for their past services, and added, "If you have now done your utmost, let us retire." Thus stimulated, they made a second charge, still more furious than before, broke the Saxon ranks, and left 9000 of the enemy dead on the field. Zittel, Karl, a Protestant theologian and doctor of theology of Germany, was born at Schmichew, in Baden, June 21, 1802. He studied theology at Jena, and was called in 1828 as pastor to Bahleningen, in 1849 to Heidelberg, where he died, Aug. 28, 1871. Zittel is known as leader of the Liberal Church movement in Baden. He published, Zustände der evangelisch-protestantischen Kirche in Baden (Karlsruhe, 1843):—Motion auf Gestaltung einer Religionsfreiheit (ibid. 1846):—Regründung der Motion über Religionsfreiheit (Berlin, ed.):—Die Sonntagsfeier (Heidelberg, 1851).—Der Rekonstruktiv in der protestantischen Kirche mit besonderer Berücksichtigung der Schrift von Hundrathen (Manheim, 1832). Zohar ("light"); i.e. light) is the name of the standard code of the cabalistic system, and has been called "the Bible of the cabalists." The titles of the book vary: Midrash of R. Simon ben-Jochai, from its reputed author: Midrash. Let there be light, from the words in Gen. i, 4; but more commonly Sepher haz-Zohar, from Dan. xii, 3, where the word Zohar is used for “the brightness of the firmament.” The title in full is, Sepher ha-Zohar, or Sefer ha-Zohar, me-ṭekho Elokoh Kadosh, hu nore ned hat-tamui R. Simon ben-Jochai, etc., i.e., “The book of Splendor on the Law, by the very holy and venerable man of God, the Tanaiti rabbi, Simon ben-Jochai, of blessed memory.”

1. Contents.—The body of the work takes the form of a commentary, extending over the Pentateuch, of a highly mystic and allegorical character. But the Zohar is not considered complete without the addition of certain appendices, attributed either to the same author, or to some of his personal or successorical disciples. These supplementary portions are:

1. Siphra de Tanaim (ספירה על תנאים), i.e., “the book of mysteries,” given in vol. ii, pp. 134-175. It contains five chapters, and is chiefly occupied with discussing the questions involved in the creation. It has been translated into Latin by K. v. Rosenroth, in the second volume of Los Kabbala Denudata (Frankfort-on-the-Main, 1864).

2. Idda Raaba (אuida ראבה), i.e., “the Great Assembly,” referring to the community or college of Simon’s disciples, in their conferences for cabalistic discussion. This treatise is given in vol. iii, pp. 327-377, and has also been translated into Latin by Rosenroth, l. c. See Index.

3. Idda Zuta (אuida צ个多月), i.e., “the Small Assembly,” referring to the few disciples who still assembled for cabalistic discussion towards the end of his master’s life, or after his decease. This treatise is given in iii, 570-579 (ed. Amsterdam, 1860), and is also found in Latin in the Kabbala Denudata, l. c. To these three larger appendices are added fifteen other minor fragments, viz.:

4. Saba (סבא), “the aged man,” also called Saba de-milhashpatim (סבא דמיל禧תים), or the discourses of the aged in milhashpatim, given in ii, 604-114. The aged is the prophet Eliezer, who converses with R. Simon ben-Jochai about the doctrine of metempsychosis, and the discussion is attached to the Sabbath section, called Eshkol, i. c., Exod. xl, 1, xxvii, 8.

5. Midrash Ruth (משרח רוע), a fragment.

7 and 8. Tosephta and Mattanitam (תוספות ומכתנות), or “small additional pieces,” which are found in the three volumes.

10. Hekhalot (הקהלות), i.e., “the palaces,” found in the first and second volumes, treats of the topographical structure of paradise and hell.

12. Midrash ham-neriam (משרח המנرياים), i.e., “the concealed treatise.”

15. Manaser to Chari (מנאסר על שאך), a discourse, so entitled from the first words “come and see.”

16. Yamaka (יאמקה), i.e., “the Youth,” and is given in iii, 156-192.

17. Pekuda (מקודה), i.e., “illustrations of the law.”

18. Kabbura kalmaa (קברעה כולמה), i.e., “the ever-young—Zohar.

The body of the work is sometimes called Zohar Gadol (ברוח כוח), and the other portions Zohar Katan (ברוח קטן). The edict principle is that of Manass (יוחנן דניאל), which it has often been reprinted. The best edition of the book of Zohar is that by Christian Knorr von Rosenroth, with Jewish commentaries (Sulzbach, 1864, fol.), to which his rare Kabbala Denudata (1667-1684, 4to) forms an ample introduction. This edition was reprinted with an additional index of matters (Amsterdam, 1714, 1719, 1729, 1795, 1818, 2 vols. 8vo). To this last-mentioned issue the references in this article apply. The latest editions are those of Breslov (1785, 3 vols. large 8vo), Broidy (1873, 3 vols. 8vo).

II. Authorship.—The Zohar pretends to be a revelation from God, of the time of Simon ben-Jochai (q. v.), to his select disciples, according to the Ideru Zuta (זורה, iii, 267). This declaration and the repeated representation of R. Simon ben-Jochai, in speaking and teaching throughout this production, made R. Simon the author of it, an opinion maintained not only by Jews for centuries, but even by such distinguished Christian scholars as Lightfoot, Gill (A Dissertation concerning the Antiquity of the Hebrew Language, Letters, Vowel-points, and Accents, Lond. 1767), Bartolocci (*Mappa bibl. Rom. iv, 230 sq.), Pfeiffer (Critical Source, Knorr von Rosenroth, Kabbala Denudata), Molitor (Philosophy of History, vol. iii, Münster, 1839), Franck (Los Kabbala. Germ. transl. by A. Jellinek, Leipzig, 1844), and Etheridge (Introduction to Hebrew Literature, Lond. 1856, p. 314). On the other hand it has been clearly demonstrated by such scholars as Zunz (Gesammelte Forträge, Berlin, 1851, pp. 405, Geiger (Melchajfejum, Ibid. 1840, introd. p. xvii), Sachs (Religiöse Poesie der Juden in Spanien, Ibid. 1845, p. 827), Jellinek (*Moese ben-Sheem-Tob de Leon, Leipzig, 1851), Grätz (Gesch. d. Juden, Ibid. 1865, vii, 130 sqq.), Steinmann (Die Rabbiner, Heidelberg, 1859-1860, 567-567), Steinmann (Introduction to Hebrew Literature, Lond. 1857, p. 104-122; 249-309), Ginsburg (The Kabbalah, p. 85-93), and a host of others, that it is not the production of R. Simon, but of the 15th century, by Moese de Leon (q. v.). For Simon ben-Jochai was a pupil of R. Akiba; but the earliest mention of the book a. it existence occurs in the year 1290; and the anachronisms of its style, and of the facts referred to, together with the circumstance that it speaks of the vowel-points and other Masoretic inventions, which are clearly posterior to the Talmud, justify J. Morinus (although too much in his wilful and baseless attempt to depreciate the antiquity of the later Jewish writings) in asserting that the author could not have lived much after the year 1000 of the Christian era (Exorcismes Biblique, p. 358-360). This later view of the authorship is sustained by the following reasons:

1. The Zohar most fundamentally praises its own author, and calls him the Sacred Light (יוחנן, i. c.). It exalts him above Moses, “the true shepherd,” (Zohar, iii, 124-134), while the disciples deify R. Simon (ii, 389).

2. The 290 quotes and mystically | inscribed Hebrew vowel-points (I, 168; iv, 116; vii, 60), which were introduced for the first time by R. Moche of Palestine (i, 44).

4. The Zohar (i, 168, 290) quotes and explains the inter-change, on the outside of the names (q. v.), of the verbal roots (יודא יתא יпедא), Jehovah our God is Jezebel for (יודא ודוד אדו אולא), gives because to, substituting for each letter its immediate predecessor in the alphabet, which was transplanted from France into Spain in the early middle ages (d. Ginsburg).

5. The Zohar (iii, 289) uses the expression Emanoel, which is a Portuguese corruption of synagogue, and explains the 180 words in the same manner as a compound of two Hebrew words, i.e., Emanol (ספירה על תנאים), i.e., Emanol (ספירה על תנאים), i.e., “brilliant light.”

6. The Zohar (ii, 284) mentions the Crusader, the momentary taking of Jerusalem by the Crusaders from the Jeloud, and the retaining of it by the Crusaders, and the lasting power of the Zohar.

7. The Zohar records events which transpired A.D. 138. A. Rava notes in the Sifre de Joseph (p. 128) that the earliest of the Zohar, according to the account in the Cabalistic book Jehudah Chayyot (f. 1000), was unknown to such distinguished cabalists as Nachmanides (volatile) and *Meir b. Shesh二 (volatile); the first writer of any note is T-dris Abulafia (1234-1308).

8. Issue of Akko (f. 1250) affirms that Zohar was first compiled from the head of a Spaniard. To the same effect is the testimony of Joseph ben-Wakker, who, in speaking of later books which may be relied upon,

IV. Literature. — Besides the authorities already quoted, we will mention Fürst, Bibl. Jud. iii, 329-335; Jellinek, Beitrdge zur Geschicke der Kabala (Leipzig, 1852); Ben-Chananja, vola. i, ii, iii, iv, where a most thorough and instructive analysis of the Zohar is given by Ignatz Stern (Szegezin, 1858-61); Jost, Gesch, d. Sekten, iii, 70 sq.; Menke, Melanges de Philosophie, d’Histoire et d’Arabe (Paris, 1839), p. 273 sq.; Pauli, Die Geschichte des Qabalah, or How the Zohar (London, 1883), an endeavor to prove the doctrine of the Trinity from the Zohar; Wunsche, Die Leiden des Messian (Leipzig, 1870), p. 95 sq., gives some passages relating to the atonement and the Messiah. See also the articles in the Encyclopaedia, Univerksalhistorical.

V. Doctrines. — The treatise of the Zohar is difficult and fantastic, embracing, moreover, not merely the origin of the world, but likewise speculating on the essence of God and the properties of man; in other words, covering at once cosmology, theology, and anthropology. It sets out with the conception of divinity as the self-existing, eternal, all-embracing first cause, the active as well as passive principle of all being, for which thought has no adequate measure, or language a fit name, although, while other systems have therefore been styled by Rabbi Nathan or Void, the Zohar terms it the Boundless or Infinite (א"ל א' ר'). Deity in length emerges from this absolutism and reveals itself, i.e. becomes at once active and capable of being known; and thus, through the division of its essence into attributes (which before did not separately exist, because they imply a reduction incompatible with the absolute), is established a connection between the finite and the infinite, or real creator. These attributes are ten, called Sephiroth (תחרית, numbers), constituting so many vessels of the infinite, which contain and are forms of its manifestation, subject always to the contained, like colored glasses that receive the light and irradiate it.

The importation of the contents—in other words, the creation of the Sephiroth, is thus also a beaming or emanation; a fundamental principle of the speculation, as we shall see. The idea is further illustrated by various figurative applications, e.g. the cube, with its three dimensions and six surfaces, making up the perfect decade; and so man, with his limbs (the ten Sephiroth), hence being sometimes designated as the first man, נושאר, or ideal form of divinity, in accordance with Ezek. i, 26; Dan. vii, 13), whose shape is represented by the so-called "caballistic tree" as follows:

1. ה' (Crown).
2. י"ב (Intelligence).
3. ת"כ (Wisdom).
4. י"ו (Judgment).
5. נ"ב (Mercy).
6. נ"ט (Beauty).
7. ל"ו (Majesty).
8. י"כ (Splendor).
9. י"ס (Foundation).
10. י"ת (Kingdom).

To each of these Sephiroth correspond certain appellations of the Deity. The first, which is the concentration and partial developmental of all the others (called also figuratively the old or the long face, פ"ה פ' פ"ו פ"ו פ"ו פ"ו פ"ו פ"ו פ"ו פ"ו פ"ו פ"ו פ"ו פ"ו פ"ו פ"ו פ"ו פ"ו פ"ו פ"ו פ"ו פ"ו פ"ו פ"ו פ"ו פ"ו פ"ו פ"ו פ"ו פ"ו פ"ו פ"ו פ"ו פ"ו פ"ו פ"ו פ"ו פ"ו פ"ו פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o פ"o П представлении автора, основной текст состоит из следующих разделов:

В целом, текст представляет собой пересказ и обсуждение различных аспектов Зохара, включая его историю, развитие и доктрину, а также обращение к некоторым литературным источникам, связанным с ним. Эти источники включают различные учёные труды, этнографические и философские работы, а также комментарии к Зохару от разных авторов. Текст также включает подробное обсуждение доктрины Зохара, в том числе его связи с другими концепциями, такими как каббала и еврейская философия. В заключение, текст рассматривает значение Зохара в истории идей и его влияние на современные дисциплины.
also the throne of God; the divine, spiritual element of it; which again, the corporeal systems would represent as the seat of the soul of the world, is here called Sandalphon (she-land-fon). This is the third world of the universe; the spiritual, natural, or celestial forces, or the assembling, governing principle, and is therefore called the angel Metatron (meh-sut-ron), i.e. bear witness.

The expression "throne" brings us back to Ezekiel, from whom we learn the vision of the seven seraphim, in which the agraffes (term of action) are here employed; so that the first world represents the glory, and the third the four beasts. These are followed by the fourth world, which is symbolized by the first angel, by the minfulness of God's symbols, and the signs of the new creation, of the covenant, of the cross, of mortification; and by that of action (os-sion), i.e. the material, the rind of the spiritual, the residuum of the divine light. As we had just now ten classes of angels, which were leaning on the natural and vital forces, and which were retained in the ethic sense, although not to be considered as essential to divinity, or as constituting the divine personality, or as being of major importance; so here we have also in this system but four worlds or states, or integral of four main classes of devils as integrations of existence, i.e. as limits to intelligence and life. These last ten Sephiroth are, in fact, the Whole (whol), Vold (voi-d), and Darkness (dahk-sinness), the seven houses of corruption (the lape), whose act, or principal unity, is Sammael (poison god), the angel of death; next to him, as personification of evil, is the harlot, or the form representing the active, the other the passive conception of the idea; while both, as a whole, are called the beast (she-land-fon). From all these metaphysical ground-ideas spring original views of the nature and destiny of man. From the foregoing scheme itself it follows, in short, that man, in his organization, union of spirit and body, in his structure, of which the 6th, as a consequence of the 5th, is called 6th, and the 10th, as a consequence of the 9th, the Spirit (the latter is also the female or feminine part, and only exists at once at the point of contact of the Gnostic speculation with the Chaldean, and also the unsolved question of the manner of this connection.

These ten sephiroth or "vessels" (val-ses) of the infinite, so far as they are considered at once in their plurality and in their unity, are also called a world (val-ses), and, in contrast to the other worlds, from which we speak hereafter, the world of essence (or emanation, man-yun). This does not mean to imply that the origin of things outside of that world was in any special manner involved in it, which would make it self-consistent, but rather seeks to establish between the infinite and matter what the object was of every system of evolution, and as such, in every sense of the word, not merely with regard to space between effect and cause, this working could be understood. Now this medium is established by the two middle worlds, namely, the world of creation (man-yun) and the world of formation (man-yun), in which we are not yet led to substantial elements. The first is described as the world of the pure spirit, the latter as that of the angels of all nature. We can thereby make this distinction that neither of these names is to be taken in its precise and literal sense. The idea, the other of power, physical as well as ethic, but not of actual beings. In both worlds the decade is again found as a division-element, as a production of the proceeding, which is therein implied, and, at the same time, reflects the original light in a more dif-

For the rest, the Cabalists does not speak of predestination, nor, on the other hand, does he solve the problem of the relation between free-will and omniscience; but, in order to afford full scope to this free-will, and yet maintain the apokatastasis, or restoration (a consequence of its fundamental idea), it introduces the wandering (man-yun) of the soul, i.e. an indefinite range of probablistical life, which is to end only on reaching the aim above mentioned. The soul in its pre-worldly existence are already male and female, and are therefore in complex state, and have to times to enter into life separately, but they will unite again in trium---, and a third, the latter completed and merged into one existence; thus they strive jointly towards the great end, which is their junction in heaven, in the temple of love (man-yun), with God, who takes them to himself with a kiss (earthly death); and by perfecting themselves in the same order and in that they will become partakers of eternal bliss.

See Herzog, Real-Encyclopedia, v. s. "Kabbalah," and comp. Aharon Selig, man-yun (Craw, 1866), which is a full commentary on the Zohar. See also Cabala.

Zoharites, so called from their attachment to the book Zohar, are properly to be regarded as a continuation.

ZOOLOGY

tion of the sect formed by the famous Sabattai Zevi (q. v.). Their creed is briefly as follows: 1. They believe in all that God has ever revealed, and consider it their duty constantly to investigate its meaning. 2. They believe the earth was created out of chaos, and the shell, and that it admits of a mystical and spiritual interpretation. 3. They believe in a Trinity of parzaphin, or persons, in Elohim. 4. They believe in the incarnation of God; that this incarnation took place in Adam, and that it will again take place in the Messiah. 5. They do not believe that Jesus Christ will return to the earth. 6. They believe that it is vain to expect any temporal Messiah; but that God will be manifested in the flesh, and in this state alone, not only for the sins of the Jews, but for the sins of all throughout the world who believe in him.

This sect was revived about the year 1570 by a Polish Jew, of the name of Jacob Frank, who settled in Podolia, and enjoyed the protection of the Polish government, to which he was recommended by the bishop of Kamez, in whose presence he held disputations with the orthodox Jews, and who was astonished at the approximation of his creed to the principles of Christianity. On the death of the bishop, he and his adherents were driven into the Turkish dominions; and being also persecuted there by the Rabbinists, they resolved to conform to the rites of the Catholic Church. Frank at last found a place of rest at Offenbach, whither his followers flocked by thousands to visit him, and where he died in 1791.

Their numbers do not appear to have increased much of late; but they are to be met with in different parts of Hungary and Poland. See ZOHAR.

Zöllner, Johann Friedrich, a Lutheran theologian, was born in 1753, and died in 1825. He was professor of Eisgrütze (Frankfort, 1776) — Petrus Mundeleus's Juramentum (1787) besides a number of sermons. See Döring, Die gelehrten Kanoniker, p. 280—385.

Zonaras, Johannes, a Byzantine historian, was born in the last part of the 11th century, and died about 1130. He was secretary to the emperor Alexius Comnenus. After the death of Alexius (1118) he retired to a hermitage near Athens, and devoted himself to theological and literary studies. His Chronicle, from the creation till the death of Alexius, is a mere compilation from Josephus, Eusebius, Xenophon, Herodotus, Plutarch, Dio Cassius, etc., and was edited by Hieronymus Wolf (Basel, 1557), Du Fresne, and Dietrich (Bonn, 1841—44, 2 vols.). Of more value is his commentary on the Syntagma of Photius: Αίγγλας τῶν ἡμῶν καὶ στίχων ἁρματων τῶν τίμων καὶ στιχῶν θεολογίαν, καὶ τῶν ἡμῶν οἰκείων συνώνομα, etc. In Latin and Greek the work was published at Paris in 1619; the best edition, however, is the one published at Oxford in 1672 fol. Zonaras also wrote scholia on the New Testament. On which see Zonara Glossia Suorae Novum Testamenti Illustratia a F. W. Schurr (Grazia, 1819—20). On the first two works see Schmidt, Uber die Quellen des Zonaras zu den Quellen der Literaturhistorische Forschungen (Darmstadt, 1839), vol. vi., 30—36; Zander, Quibell & Fynn's Zonaras Heuristori suas Annoles Romanos (Ratzeburg, 1848); Biener, De Collecti- nos Canones Ecclesiae Graecae (Berlin, 1827); the Zürcher und Koniakische Briefe der griechischen Kirche, in Mittermaier's Zeitschrift (Heidelberg, 1855), xxvii., pp. 201—281; Moreuil, Histoire du Droit Byzantin (Paris, 1843), iii., 428—429; Herzog, Real-Encyklop. a. v.; Lichtenberg, Encyklopädie der Menschenwissenschaft, ii. Zoraster (more correctly Zaratustra, which in Greek and Latin was corrupted into Zorastrophes and Zorastro, whilst the Persians and Parsees changed it into Zeruakht) was the founder of the Zoroastrian religion. The original meaning of the word was probably that of "chief," "senior," "high-priest," and it was a common designation of a spiritual guide and head of a district or province. Indeed, the founder of Zoroastrianism is hardly ever mentioned without his family name Spîrima. He was a native of Bactria. He applied to himself the terms Manîhran (reciter of "Manîhran"), a messenger sent by Ahura-Mazda, or a speaker, one who listens to the voice of God, given by the spirit of nature, one who receives sacred words from Ahura-Mazda through the flames. His life is covered with obscurity. The accounts of him are legendary and unhistorical. In the Zend writings he is to a great extent represented, not as a historical, but as a dogmatical personality, vested with superhuman, or even divine, powers, standing next to God. His temptations by the devil, whose empire was threatened by him, form the subject of many traditional stories and legends. He is represented as the fountain of all wisdom and truth, and the master of the whole living creation. One of the prayers of the Fravardin Yašt declares—

"We worship the rule and the guardian angel of Zara-thantra Spîrima, who first thought good thoughts, who first spoke good words, who first performed good actions — who was the first priest, the first warrior, the first cultivator of the soil, the first prophet, the first who was inspired, the first who was given to manifest his power and reality, and word, and hearing of word, and wisdom, and all good thoughts created by Mazda, which embolden reality, who is the heel to turn the world and all men, who first praised the purity of the living creation and destroyed, who is he that confounded the Zoroastrian belief of Ahura-Mazda, the religion of the living God against the devil. Through him the whole true and revealed word of the world, which is the highest guidance of the world. . . . Through his knowledge and speech the waters become destinies of growing; through his knowledge and speech all beings created by the Holy Spirit are uttering words of happiness."
ZOROASTER

In the older Yassa alone it appears like a living reality, a man acting a great and prominent part, both in the history of his country and that of mankind.

I. History.—Zoroaster's father seems to have been called Purusaspas, and his daughter, the only one of his children mentioned, called Xanthus of Lydia, who was, when he died, very obscure. He is usually said to have flourished in the reign of a king Guishtasp, who had, on apparently sufficient grounds, been identified with the Darius Hystaspis of the classical writers (Malcolm, Hist. of Persia, i. 294). The dates generally given are as follows: B.C. 625, 520, 400, 364, Xanthus of Lydia places him about six hundred years before the Trojan war; Aristotle and Eudoxus place him six thousand years before Plato; others, again, five thousand years before the Trojan war. Berosus, a Babylonian historian, makes him a Babylonian king, and the founder of a dynasty which reigned over Babylon between 2200 and 2000 B.C. The Parsaean place him at the time of Hystaspes, the father of Darius, whom they identify with a king mentioned in the Shah-NAMEh, from whom, however, Hystaspes is wholly distinct. This account would place Zoroaster probably in B.C. 600. Yet there is an exceedingly strong doubt that he must be considered as belonging to a much earlier age, not later than 1000 B.C. It is almost certain that Zoroaster was one of the Sohbatans, or five priests, with whom the religious reform first arose, which became religious reform. The Aramaean is a man, a body of his own, the four elements of which his body is composed mingled with the original primitive elements; his soul, understanding, and judgment unite with the ferev, and all become one. In this state man goes to judgment, and according as his good works or his bad works have preponderated during man, he is rewarded with immortality in paradise, or punished by being cast into hell. During life he is in constant conflict with the Deos or Dvvas, a class of beings possessing a body formed of the four elements—beings essentially evil, and who tempt man to sin, but at the resurrection are annihilated, and all men at last shall be received into paradise. Even Ahriman himself shall be accepted and blessed; for the Deos are gradually abstracting from him the evil and darkness that are in him, so that at last he shall be left pure and bright (see Hyde, Hist. Rel. Vet. Pers. [Oxon. 1766]; Asvetic du Perron, Zend-Avesta [Paris. 1773, 4 vols. 4to]; Vullers, Fragmens uber die Rel. des Zoroaster [Bonn, 1881]).

It is chiefly from the Gathas, however, that Zarathustra's real theology, unadulterated by later ages, can be learned. The leading idea was monotheism. While the five priests before him, the Sohbatans, believed in a plurality of good spirits called Ahuras, as opposed to the Indian Devas, he reduced this plurality to unity. Zarathustra believed he called Ahuru-Mazda, or the creator of the universe — the Auramazdas of the Zend-Avesta were the creator of the universe. He was so called by Zoroaster the light and the source of light. He is wisdom and intellect; he possesses all good things, temporal and spiritual, among them the good mind, immortality, wholeness, the best truth, devotion, piety, and abundance of all earthly goods. All these gifts he grants to the pious man who is pure in thought, word, and deed. He rewards the good and punishes the wicked, and all that is created, good or evil, fortune or misfortune, is his work alone.

Nothing was further from Zoroaster's mind than to assume anything that supported being, one and indivisible. But the great problem of the unity of evil and its incompatibility with God's goodness, holiness, and justice, he attempted to solve by assuming two primeval causes, which, though different, were united, and produced the world of the material things.
18. The soul of the pure will hereafter enjoy everlasting life; that of the wicked must have to undergo everlasting punishment, or as modern Parsee theologians explain, to the day of the resurrection.

19. He is the reality of the good mind, word, and deed.

Zorba’bela (Zoroastrian), the Greek form (1 Ecd. iv. 13; v. 5–70; vi. 2–29; Eccles. xlix. 11; Matt. i. 12; Luke iii. 27) of the name of Zorababel (q. v.).

Zoph’i (Heb. with the art. kata-Toeopri), "Εζωφρήν; Sept. των Σαπηλείαν; Vulg. aurochis; A. v. "the goldsmith") is a marginal suggestion in Neh. iii. 31, for the name of the father of Malchiah, as if a proper name, but it may be connected with Zorba’bela, the name of the builder.

Zooby, John Joachim, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born about the year 1750. In 1775 he took an active part in political matters, and was selected as one of the Georgia delegates to the Continental Congress at Philadelphia. The Georgia divinity did not prove loyal to the Whig side, and a correspondence of his with the royal governor of Georgia was afterwards discovered, he was compelled to resign his position in Congress, and subsequently his property was forfeited under the Conscript Act. He died at Savannah, before the war ended, in July, 1781. He is said to have been "a man of vigorous and penetrating mind." See Sabine, Royalists in the Rev. War, ii. 467. (J. C. S.)

ZuckgriJ, Jakob, a Roman Catholic theologian of Austria, was born July 26, 1807, at Grossmolkowitz, in Moravia. In 1831 he received holy orders, in 1837 was appointed professor of Christian religious philosophy and university-preacher in Vienna, and in 1847 the Freiburg University honored him with the doctorate of divinity. In 1848 he was called to the chair of apologetics, theological and philosophical studies at Tübingen, where he died, June 9, 1876. He wrote, "Die orthodoxen christlichen Erfahrungen," etc. (Vienna, 1846): "Die orthodoxen christlichen Erfahrungen," etc. (Vienna, 1856). Besides, he contributed largely to the Tübinger Theologische Quartalblatt, the Freiburger Kirchenblätter, and the Bonner theologische Literaturblatt. Zulu Version of the Scriptures. In this language, which is vernacular to the Kaffres, a translation of the New Test. has existed since 1869. It was published by the aid of the American Bible Society. It has been formally reported that the analogies and general principles subsisting between the Kaffre and Zulu dialects were so proximate that one translation would meet the wants of the two tribes. This idea has been relinquished, and a translation was prepared by American missionaries to provide the Word of God for a million of Kaffres. About the last of the British and Foreign Bible Society for 1879 we see that an edition of the New Test., slightly revised, but conforming to the society's rule, has been issued by the American Zulu Mission, and that this society has shared largely, as on former occasions, in the work. (B. P.)

Zulun, Laopol, a famous Jewish writer, was born at Bermud, Germany, April 10, 1734, and studied at Berlin, was in 1809 preacher at the new synagoge
there, in 1835 at Prag. and in 1839 director of the Teacher's Seminary at Berlin. When that institution was closed, in 1836, Zunz retired to private life, devoting all his energies to the production of works which have made him famous in the republic of letters. Zunz died at Berlin, March 18, 1886. He was a voluminous writer, and of his many works we especially mention "Lebenbegeschichte des Salomo Jarchisch, genannt Rokchi (Lemberg, 1840): — Die gottesdienstlichen Vorträge der Juden, historisch entwickelt (Berlin, 1832): — Zur Geschichte und Literatur (1845): — Die Synagogale Poetik des Mittelalters (1855): — Die Rücks der synagogalen Gottesdienste (1859): — Die Poetische der Juden Poetik (1865). His minor writings were issued under the title of Gesammelte Schriften (1875, 1876, 3 vols.). See Först, Bib. Jud., iii, 555-558; Morais, Eminent Israelites of the 19th Century (Philadelphia, 1880), p. 880 sqq. (B. F.)

Zurich Letters is the name of an English publication of the Parker Society. On the accession of queen Mary, more than a thousand of the Reformers sought refuge on the Continent, and many of them settled in Zurich. On the return of the Zurich exiles to England, at the accession of Elizabeth, in 1558, they naturally maintained a correspondence with the ministers and magistrates of Zurich, who had so kindly welcomed them and given them shelter. A portion of these letters have been published, and show the opinion of that time on subjects which afterwards produced such agitation. These letters are a letter dated 15 October, written in 1590, by queen Elizabeth to the thirteen Swiss cantons; also a few letters from Peter Martyr, Bollinger, and Gueter, in reply to some of the English Reformers before mentioned.

Zwickau Propheta, a local sect of fanatic Lutherans (A.D. 1521), who believed themselves to be the subjects of immediate inspiration. The leaders of the party were Nicholas Storch (q. v.), a weaver of Zwickau, Mark Thomas, of the same trade and place, Mark Störner, a former student at Wittenberg, and Thomas Münzer, Lutheran pastor of Zwickau, subsequently the rebel chief of the Anabaptist rebellion. These fanatics rejected the Bible, considered human learning a hindrance to religion, and predicted the overthrow of the existing governments to make way for the millennium of the saints (themselves). Storch declared that the angel Gabriel had appeared to him in a vision, saying to him, "Thou shalt sit on my throne." and in anticipation of the new kingdom the prophets chose from the number of their followers twelve apostles and seventy evangelists. They drew after them a great many of the laboring classes and tradespeople; but when open sedition broke out, the magistrates drove the leaders out of Zwickau. See ABRIDGMENTS; ANABAPTISTS.

Zwinger, Johann, a son of Theodor, and grandson of the younger Buxtorf, was born Aug. 26, 1634, became professor of the Old Test. at Basle in 1675, and of the New Test. in 1685. He died of apoplexy, while engaged in lecturing to his students, in 1696. He was a rigid presbyterian, a correspondent with the ministers, the pupil of Gomarus, and an opponent of Copernicus, concerning whose system he waged a literary war with the Basle mathematician, Peter Merzlin.

Zwinger, Johann Rudolf, a son of Johann, was born Sept. 12, 1660, and died Nov. 18, 1708, and was antinomian to the Basle Church and theological professor. He wrote dissertations and sermons, and also a book on the conversion of the Jews, entitled Der Trost Israels (1708).

Zwinger, Theodor, a Swiss theologian, was born Nov. 21, 1597, at Basle. He was a strict Calvinist, and defended the doctrine of predestination at Heidelberg. In 1630 he was made antinomian in the Church of Basle, to which position was attached a professorship of theology. The breaking of bread instead of the use of the host in the sacrament was introduced at Basle, as part of his administration, recepting, which event he published a report in his work on the Lord's Supper (1655). Of other works by his pen we mention a Commentary on Romans (1655). Both these works were published soon after his death, which occurred Dec. 27, 1654. See Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v.

Zwinglianism. See ZWINGLI; ZWINGLIS.

Zwinglians, a name given to the early Swiss Protestants from their leader Zwingli (q. v.). It is also used as a controversial designation of those who hold Zwingli's view respecting the mere memorial character of the eucharist. The theology of Zwingli is of interest as having influenced the Eugenic Puritans to a considerable extent, until Zwingli was overshadowed by Calvin during the reign of queen Elizabeth. Zwingli's innovations respecting the ministerial office began, like those of Luther, with the principle that every one, in virtue of his Christian baptism, is at liberty to preach, teaching being the chief function of the ministry. The irregularities of the Anabaptists, however, compelled him to have recourse to some form of mission from the Church. He lays down the necessity of a call to the ministry, notices three kinds of election named in the Bible, and states that it is proper for the election to rest with the body of the faithful, advised by learned men (Eccles. 52, 53-54). But he rejected all notion of priesthood or holy orders. The Basle Confession places the election in the ministers and church deputys, and mentions it in the position of hands. The Helvetic Confession decrees that ministers be called by an ecclesiastical and lawful election, either by the Church or its deputies. It adheres strictly to the Zwinglian principle that all ministers have one and the same power and function; but it departs from this principle in assigning them some power of governing, and in vesting in them some power of excommunication. Zwingli considered the exercise of the power of the keys to be nothing more than the general preaching of the gospel. His magisterial excommunication was only an external, not a spiritual sentence. The Helvetic Confession gives the same account of the power of the keys, and the excommunication which it restores to the ministers still belongs, therefore, only to the forum exterum, not to the forum conscientiae.

Zwingli's doctrine of the sacraments is peculiar. He holds that they are mere signs of initiation or of punging of continuance. They confer no grace; they do not free the conscience: they are not even pledges of grace. Every spiritual efficacy which has been attributed to them is denied. Baptism does not make a Christian of one who is born of the flesh, but those who are sons receive a token of their sonship. It does not take away sin. The baptism of Christ and his apostles was the same as the baptism of John. The eucharist is regarded in the same way.

The liturgical forms of Zwingli and his followers were constructed on the basis of the documents held. The form of baptism in Zwingli's Works (ii, 98) has a prayer for the infant that God would give him the light of faith, that he may be incorporated into Christ, buried with him, etc. This refers all to a faith to be given to the child as he grows up to a capacity of faith. The form carefully avoids, either in prayer or declaration, any mention of remission of sins or of regeneration. The Liturgia Turgina has the same prayer, and reads the same gospel from St. Mark. It adds the Creed, related to the baptism in which the belief in which the child is to be brought up, and the minister addresses the ureties: "We will bring unto the Saviour this child as far as it lieth in our power; that is, through baptism we will receive him in his Church, and give him the earnest of the covenant and of the people of God." The form of administration of the eucharist in the future is the same as that in Zwingli's Works (ii, 653), and is adapted to the doctrine of sacraments already stated.
Theoretically, Zwingli did not view the community in its two capacities, civil and ecclesiastical, and recognise as belonging to it two independent jurisdictions, temporal and spiritual; the community to him was a Church, and nothing else. His magistrates were Church officers, deriving their authority equally with the ministry from the body of the faithful, and distinguished from them only by the character of the work which a division of labor assigned to each. Practically, however, the result was that the sovereignty in spiritual as well as in temporal matters was vested in the civic authorities of each community.

The system of Zwingli was in some measure modified by Bullinger, who introduced something approaching to a recognition of a clergy and of efficacy in sacraments; and, again, the influence of the Geneva ministers added to the Zurich doctrine of the Lord's Supper something of that Calvinistic teaching regarding receiving the body and blood of Christ, which corresponds to the present accepted belief. It was Swiss theology, so modified by Bullinger, that found advocates in England. Hooper was a faithful follower of Bullinger. Peter Martyr, a Lasco, Dryander, and Ochino were on the same side, and with them acted most of the party of the Marian exiles (see Zurich Letters), who had been received with great hospitality at Zurich. Hooley's doctrine of the Lord's Supper is not distinguishable from Zwingli's. See Zwingli's Works, by Guider (144-45), especially the treatises Exposition Fidelis Christiana, De Vera et Falsa Religione, Ecclesiasticum, Archetuba; also Bulae Confessionis (1567), Helvetiae Confession (1568), In Syllogos Confession (Oxford, 1827), and Liberorum Typosinum (Engl. transl. ADDENDA.

A.

Abbott, Ezra, D.D., LL.D., a distinguished Unitarian scholar, was born at Jackson, Me., April 18, 1819. He studied at Phillips Academy, Exeter, N. H.; graduated from Bowdoin College in 1840, taught for about five years at East Machias, Me.; removed to Cambridge, Mass., in 1847; in 1856 became assistant librarian of Harvard University, and in 1872 professor of New-Testament criticism, a position which he retained until his death, March 21, 1884. In 1855 Dr. Abbott edited Andrew Norton’s posthumous Translation of the Gospels, and in 1856 Norton’s Statement of the Reasons for not Believing the Doctrines of Transubstantiation. In 1864 he published his Literature of the Doctrine of Future Life, in which he gave a list of more than five thousand works on that subject. In 1865 he edited Lawson’s Church of the First Three Centuries, and in 1866 Orme’s Memoir of the Controversy on the Three Heavenly Witnesses. In 1860 he edited and revised Hudson’s Critical Greek and English Concordance of the New Testament. He was one of the writers for the American edition of Smith’s Dictionary of the Bible, and his additions to the bibliography of that work are exceedingly valuable. He gave substantial aid to the Rev. Dr. Noyes in his Translation of the New Testament, which was published in 1869. His work on The Authorship of the Fourth Gospel: External Evidence, brought out in 1880, is well known to European and American scholars. Among his last labors was the assistance which he gave to Dr. C. R. Gregory, of Leipzig, in the preparation of his Prolegomena to Tischendorf’s last critical edition of the Greek Testament. Dr. Abbott was also a voluminous contributor to the periodical literature of the day, in Europe and America. He was a member of the American Bible Revision Committee. In the special department of Biblical literature he stood among the foremost scholars of the present day, and in textual criticism he was probably superior to any other in America. He was a man of singular modesty and disinterestedness, and was endowed with an almost unlimited capacity for work, possessing within the qualities of thoroughness and accuracy, and in all his studies was more anxious to learn the truth than to establish any foregone conclusion.

Abecken, Heinrich, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Osnabrück, Aug. 19, 1809. He studied at Berlin, was appointed in 1824 chaplain to the Prussian ambassador at Rome, and in 1841 at London, where he was also actively engaged in the founding of the bishopric at Jerusalem. In 1842 he accompanied professor Lepsius to Egypt and Ethiopia, and in 1848 was appointed member of the Prussian ministry for foreign affairs. During the Franco-Prussian war, in 1870-71, he accompanied prince (then count) Bismarck to France, and died Aug. 8, 1872. He is known by his biography of Bunsen in Unserer Zeit, vol. v (Leipzig, 1861), and by his Babylon und Jerusalem (Berlin, 1858), written against the countess Isa Hahn-Hahn, who had embraced Roman Catholicism. (B. F.)

Abercorombe, Richard Mason, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born in Philadelphia in 1822, being the son of the Rev. James Abercorombe. After a liberal education in his native city, he graduated from the General Theological Seminary in New York city in 1848, was ordained the same year, and took charge of a church at Rahway, N. J. He was successively rector of the Church of the Intercession, in New York city (1848-50); St. John’s, Clifton, S. L.; Christ Church, Hartford, Conn.; St. Paul’s, Rahway, N. J., and St. Matthew’s, Jersey City, where he died, Dec. 7, 1884. He was practically the founder of Christ Church Hospital in that city, and of the Clergyman’s Retreat Fund Society. See The Church Almanac, 1886, p. 102.

Abernethy (or Abernethie), John, D.D., a Scotch prelate, studied at the University of Edinburgh, was laurate in 1587, and became reader in 1588. He was a member of the Assembly in 1601, 1605, 1608, and forty signers he signed against introducing episcopacy in 1606; was chosen constant moderator of the Presbytery; solicited the appointment to the archbishopric of Glasgow in 1615; was a member of the Court of High Commission in 1616; made bishop of Caithness the same year, and demitted Sept. 15, 1635, deposed in 1638, but was permitted to minister in any place. He died April 24, 1639, aged about seventy-two years. He published, Christian and Heavenly Treatise concerning Physick for the Soul (1615):—Two Letters to King James VI (1620):—The Duty and Dignity of a Christian (Loud, ed.). See Park Eccles. Scoticam, i, 491.

Ablone, a little village on the Seine, about thirteen miles from Paris, is noted in the history of French Protestantism as the place where the reformed worship was first held after the cessation of the edict of Nantes, May 2, 1568, in consequence of the opposition to that liberty in Paris by the Romanists. See Lichtenberger, Exposition des Sciences Religieuses, u. v.

Acoverth, James, LL.D., an English Baptist minister, was born at Chatham, Aug. 1, 1788. He studied in the Baptist College at Bristol, graduated from the University of Glasgow, settled as co-pastor at Leeds in 1825, and the next year became sole pastor. In 1835 he was chosen president of Horton College, Bradford, a position which he held with great efficiency until 1858. He died Oct. 13 of the same year. Dr. Acoverth was active in all the public religious associations of his day, and was the author of several addresses, sermons, etc. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1884, p. 279.

Adam, a Scotch bishop, was witness to a charter by William Binet to William de Newbigging. He was bishop of Galloway in 1589. See Keith, Scottish Bisla, p. 274.

Adam, Johannes, a Jesuit, was born at Limoges in 1608. He made himself known by his controversial writings against the Huguenots and Jansenists. For forty years he was attached to Paris, Poitiers, Sedan, Bordeaux, and other cities, making proselytes wherever he could. His work, Coelum Dissilit par Saymeme et par les Armes de St. Augustin (1660), elicited a rejoinder from the famous Jansenist, cardinal Norris. Against the un-Catholic Heures de Port-Royal de Maistre de Sacy, Adam, published, in 1651, the Heures Catholiques. When Innocent X condemned Jansenism, Adam published Le Tombeau du Jansénisme (1654), and Con-dictions des Janséniens par les Bénédictins (1655). During the session of the Reformed synod held at Lauden in 1659, he converted the Calvinist Cotthi, who, in the year following, joined the Church of Rome. When the Jesuits erected a college at Sedan, he became its rector, and published, in 1671, Le Triomphe de la Ste. Eucharistia ou la Présence Réelle contre le Ministre Claude. He died at Bordeaux, May 12, 1884. See R. Bauer in Wetzer u. Weite's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Adams, Scotus (also called Adamus Anglicus), a Franciscan of the 12th century, was born in Scotland. About the year 1170 he entered the convent of St. Andrew in Scotland, and in order to become better fitted for asceticism he spent some time at the monastery in Premontre, in the diocese of Laon. Having returned to Scotland, he was made abbot and bishop of Canone Carnigel, in Galloway. The time of his death cannot exactly be given. He wrote: Liber de Ordine, Habitu et Professione Premonstratensi (14 sermons): -- De Tripartito Tuberculosis (part 3); De Triplex Genere Contemplationum. These works were printed in 1578. An enlarged edition, containing additional sermons, appeared in 1627 and 1632, entitled Sedulitudo de Instructione Animae, was published by Godfr. Ghisbertus, at Antwerp, in 1659. A complete edition of his works is given by Migne, in Patrol. Lat-cin. See Schenid, in Wetzer u. Weite's Kirchen-lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Adams, Bishop, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Williamsport, Vt., July 29, 1815. He studied at Newbury Seminary for some time, and spent three years at Norwich University, was licensed to preach in 1835; in 1838 was ordained deacon, and in 1840, elder. Of the forty years spent in the ministry in New England, he gave eight years to circuit district work, eighteen to stations, and three to the agency of the conference seminary, of which he was a trustee from the beginning. His labors were everywhere acceptable and successful, and three times he was a member of general conference. He was a man of one work, and as a preacher was strictly evangelical. He died in Concord, N. H., Aug. 15, 1880. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1881, p. 91.

Adams, George F., D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Dorchester, Mass., Oct. 3, 1802. He removed to Ohio with his father's family in 1805, was baptized as the seventh Baptist child in the state, and licensed to preach two years later. He graduated from Columbian College, Washington, D. C., in 1829, having been ordained at the Navy-Yard Baptis-tist Church of that place, April 22, 1827. After teaching for several years, he became the pastor of a church at Frederickburg, Va.; in 1835 removed to Baltimore, and, in January, 1836, became pastor of the Calvert Street Church. After serving as general missionary of his denomination in Maryland, he took charge of the Second Church, Baltimore, in 1848; in 1860 went to Hampton, Va., as pastor, and on the breaking-out of the civil war, in July 1861, took the commission as chaplain in the Confederate army. For about three years (1862-65) he acted a second time as state missionary in Maryland. After teaching a year or two, he returned to Hampton, and was pastor nine years (1867-76), and then returned to Baltimore as city missionary for a few months, and died there, April 16, 1877. See Baptist Encyclopedia, Vol. 10. (J. C. S.)

Adams, Jasper, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in Massachusetts. He graduated from Brown University in 1813; spent two years in Andover Theological Seminary; was tutor in Brown University in 1818 and 1819; was ordained deacon in September, 1820, and presbyter Aug. 4, 1820. He was professor of mathematics in Brown University from 1819 to 1824; president of Charleston College, S. C., from 1824 to 1826; of Geneva College, N. Y., from 1826 to 1828; of Connecticut College, from 1828 to 1830; and chaplain and professor of ethics at U. S. Military Academ-

Adamas, Mrs. Sarah Flower, an English poet-ess, daughter of Benjamin Flower, a liberal editor and Harlow, Eng., Feb. 22, 1805, and in 1834 married William B. Adams, an engineer and writer. She died Aug. 13, 1849. Mrs. Adams published a dramatic poem, entitled Victria Perpetua (1841), and a catechism with hymns, entitled The Rock of the Foundation (1846). As a member of the congregation of William Johnson Fox, to whose volume of lyrics and Anthems (1840) she contributed thirteen pieces, the most noted of which is "Nearer my God to thee." In later years she is said to have become a Baptist. Her sister, Eliza Flower, set some of Sarah's songs to music, and herself wrote a number of poems.

Adams, Thomas, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at West Brookfield, Mass., Feb. 7, 1792. He studied at Leicester Academy, graduated from Amherst College in 1814, and then studied theology with Rev. Dr. Thomas Swift, of West Brookfield. He was ordained pastor in Vassalboro, Me., Aug. 26, 1818, and remained there until April 1, 1834. In 1835 he was agent for a temperance society. The following year he was installed pastor at Waterville, and remained nearly two years. The five subsequent years he was editor of the Temperance Gazette; and from 1843 to 1846 he was agent of the Tract Society. The next year he was acting-pastor at Hampden, O.; and until 1848 he sustained the same relation to the Church at Thompson. From 1856 to 1860 he was the Ohio agent of the Congregational Board of Publication; in 1863 acting-pastor in Pittston, Me.; and from 1864 to 1870 filled the same position in Vassalboro. After this he resided, without charge, in his native village. Here he died, Feb. 13, 1886. Several of his sermons have been published. See Cong. Yearbook, 1882, p. 17.

Adeloga, saint, virgin, and abbess of the 8th century, was the daughter of Charles Martel, by Kunihelda. She was of singular beauty, so that she was greatly sought in marriage, but she constantly refused, having given her heart to a heavenly spouse. Her father, exsasperated, treated her with studied brutality and public insult. She sought comfort in the advice of her director, her chaplain, and they were both expelled from the palace. Adeloga and the priest journeyed till they came to a wild and desert place in the province of Anasch, and there they built a convent. To her came virgins, the priest gave her the veil, made her abbess, enjoining her to adopt the rule of St. Benedict and St. Scholastica. He attended to the temporal affairs of the convent till he died. In after-years Charles Martel was reconciled to his daughter, endowed her monastery with lands, and visited her. St. Adeloga has a place in the Benedictine martyrology, and those of Ferrarius, Menardus, etc. There is an an-

Alten, Joseph, D.D., LL.D., a noted educator and author, was born at Cairo, N. Y., Jan. 4, 1867. He graduated from Union College, in 1887, and from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1890; was tutor two years in the College of New Jersey; ordained over the Congregational Church in Williamstown, Mass., July 3, 1884; professor in the college there from 1885 to 1852; and in Lafayette College, Pa., thereafter until 1875, when he was elected its president; from 1868 to 1865 preached as stated supply at Boiling Spring, N. J.; from 1867 to 1880 was principal of the New York State Normal School at Albany, and died in the city of New York, Aug. 30, 1886. He wrote chiefly for the young, especially for the department of Sunday-school literature, and in the religious journals.

Alexander, Robert, D.D., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Tennessee, Aug. 7, 1811. He was converted at the age of seventeen; the next year was licensed to exhort, and the following year joined the Tennessee Conference; in 1832 was transferred to the Mississippi Conference; in 1836 was appointed missionary to Texas, and labored zealously and successfully in that field in various capacities until near the time of his death, which occurred in 1892. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1896, p. 112.

Alexander, Stephen, LL.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Schenectady, N. Y., Sept. 1, 1808. He graduated from Union College in 1824, and from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1832, when he became a tutor in Princeton College, and, in 1834, professor of mathematics, astronomy, and mechanical philosophy, and was connected with the college for upwards of fifty years. Professor Alexander, in 1860, went to the coast of Labrador, at the head of a government astronomical expedition, to observe the eclipse of July 18. In 1863 he was at the head of an expedition to the Rocky Mountains to observe the solar eclipse of that year. He was the author of numerous papers on astronomy and mathematics, which attracted much attention in this country and in Europe. He was one of the founders of the National Academy of Science, a member of the American Philosophical Association, of the Academy of Arts and Sciences, and of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, of which he was president. He was a devout Christian, and an elder in the Presbyterian Church. His old age passed away in the quiet study of the stars, his favorite pursuit. He died at Princeton, N. J., June 26, 1883. See Nevin, A C. D. D., 1884, p. 16; Nevin, Presb. Encyclopaedia, s. v. (W. P. S.)

Alexander, William Lindsay, D.D., an eminently independent minister, was born at Leith, near Edinburgh, Aug. 24, 1808. He graduated while young from the High School of Edinburgh and the University of St. Andrews, and in 1828 was appointed classical tutor in the Lancaster College, then located at Blackburn, but subsequently removed to Manchester. He had expected to study medicine, but having been religiously educated, he officiated in a small chapel in Wales, whither he had retired for his health, and subsequently in Newington Chapel, Liverpool. After a course of study at the German universities, he accepted the pastorate of the North College Church, Edinburgh, in 1835. In 1854 he was appointed professor of theology in the Scottish Theological Hall, in 1861 examiner in philosophy at St. Andrews' University, but resigned the latter position in 1882. He died at Dec. 30, 1883. Dr. Alexander was noted less as a preacher than as a scholar. He was a member of the Old-Testament society, company of the Bible Revision Committee, and the author of numerous Biblical and theological works, the principal of which are the Congregational Lectures for 1850, The Book of the New Testament (1854), Christ and Christianity (1854), Life of Dr. Wardlaw (1856), Christian Thought and Work (1869); St. Paul at Athens, and many articles in the reviews and cyclopaedias, besides editing the third edition of The Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible, 1896, pp. 146; Althone, Dict. of Br. and Nat. Authors, s. v.

Alfonso, Pedro, formerly rabbi Moses of Mores, in Aragon, was born in 1062. At the age of forty-four he was baptized in the cathedral of his native city, on St. Peter's day, and in honor of the saint and his godfather, the king, the name of Alfonso, he took the name of Moses Alfonso. He was, besides being physician to the king, Alfonso VI, a very learned and fine writer of the medieval Church, highly praised by all Spanish writers. He wrote a defence of Christianity, and a refutation of Jewish incantations, in the form of a dialogue between Moses and Pedro Alfonso, under the title of, Dialogi in quibus Impius Judaeorum Opiniones Credentiamus from Naturae quam Calesiam Philosophiae Argumenta Confirmamus, etc. (Cologne, 1536), a work spoken of in high terms, and which has since been in great use in Spain. He also wrote a Disciplina Clericales, a very popular book, which was translated into French in the 13th century. The date of Alfonso's death is not known. The Disciplina Clericales was edited by F. W. V. Schmidt (Berlin, 1827). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i. 36; Kalkar, Geschichte der Kirche, p. 22; Hitzig, Die Kirche, Robb. iv. 69; Antonii Bibl. Hist. ii. 7; Wolf, Bibl. Hbr. iii. Allen, Francis, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Lar, County Donegal, Ireland, in 1705. He came to America when about thirty years of age, and engaged in teaching. In May, 1737, he was ordained pastor at New London, Pa., and in 1749 took charge of the Philadelphia Academy, afterwards the University of Pennsylvania, of which he was vice-president and chief professor, at the same time acting as assistant minister of the First Presbyterian Church. He died Nov. 28, 1779. Dr. Allen was a prominent actor in the public enterprises of his time. See Nevin, Presb. Encyclopaedia, s. v.

Allen, A. C. D. D., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Iredale County, N. C., March 19, 1818. He was converted in early life, was educated at Emory and Henry College; joined the North Carolina Conference in 1842; was ordained deacon in 1844, and elder in 1846. He filled some of the best appointments in the conference. In 1852 he located and organized the First Church of Tuscaloosa, Alabama, which he supervised the presidency of a female college at Tuscaloosa, remaining there throughout the war, when he entered the Confederate army as chaplain. In 1864 he joined the Memphis Conference, wherein he served one term as presiding elder. In 1870 he was transferred to the North Mississippi Conference, in which he served in a like capacity. He was transferred to the North Texas Conference in 1874, where he served three charges. The year 1877-78 he was president of a college in the city of Dallas. He was a delegate to the general conferences of 1870 and 1874. His death occurred at Fort Worth, Jan. 17, 1890. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1880, p. 302.

Allen, Robert Welch, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Shelby County, Ky., March 25, 1817. He graduated from Wabash College, Ind., in 1839. From thence he entered Princeton Seminary, where he remained until 1848, when he was called to the St. Louis Theological Seminary, where he remained until his death. He was ordained to the Presbyterian ministry in 1842, and was called to the charge of the church at Pigeon Church, Ky., which he remained until his death. for over eleven years, afterwards he served as missionary, and supplied the Church of St. Charles, Mo. At the end of two years he returned to Jacksonville, and supplied the churches of Union and Murrayville until a new church was organized called Unity, over which he was installed pastor, and which relation he continued during life. He died at Jacksonville, Ill., July 28, 1863. See New Report of Princeton Theol. Sem., 1863, p. 39.

Alline, Henry, a remarkable character in the religious history of the last century, was born in Rhode Island in 1748. In 1760 he went to Nova Scotia and settled at Newport. Six years after he commenced preaching without ordination, although he received the imposition of hands at Cornwallis as an itinerant preacher. He preached in Nova Scotia from 1776 to 1784, then went to the United States, where he died at the residence of Rev. David McCutre, Northampton, N. H., Feb. 2 of the latter year. He travelled throughout the provinces, preaching with remarkable fervor and power, assailing all denominations, causing divisions in the churches, and making many converts.

Alline rejected the doctrine of creation, denied that man possessed a material body before the fall, and affirmed that all souls were actually created at the beginning of the world and akin in Eden. He also denied the resurrection of the elemental body. He had a keenly metaphysical mind and a love of speculation. Some of his writings were published, now very rare, viz.:

Of the first-mentioned work it has been said, "In its statement of doctrine it is a confused medley, not resembling a sick man's dreams, and yet it is varied with the most imposing and sublime appeals, when he touches upon some of the grander or more tender topics of religion." His autobiography is a book of thrilling interest. Alline had an agreeable manner and a natural eloquence. He never left the Congregational ranks, in which he was brought up. He was indifferent as to the mode of baptism, and cared little for the ordinance at all. Some of his followers joined the Baptists, but the majority united with the Free-will or Free Christian Baptists. See his Life and Journals, "Bibl. Theol. Theol. Bibl., vol. v.; Smith, Hist. of Methodism in Eng. British America, vol. i.; Bibl. of the Baptists of the Maritime Provinces (St. John's, 1881), p. 13-18.

Altenburg, a Benedictine abbey, in Lower Austria, was founded by Hildebrand, count of Buige, in 1114 a number of monoks settled there from St. Lambrecht, in Styria. Till 1878 this abbey had forty-9 (46) abbots, the first of whom was Gottfried. Altenburg was several times destroyed by fire, twice by the Hussites, and suffered greatly from the peasants' war, and from the Swedes, Russians, and French. The famous abbos was the thirty-eighth, Manius Bokter, who greatly promoted the spiritual and material interests of the abbey. His clergy were educated at the universities of Vienna and Salzburg. Under the forty-fifth abbos, Honorius Burger, who died in 1878, the seventh century of this institution was celebrated in 1844. Burger also wrote the history of his abbey, and published the documents concerning the same in Festschrift zum 400. Jubilaeum der Stiftung Altenburg. Diploma, et Acta, xxi (Vindob, 1855). Alteri, Luigi, a Roman Catholic prelate, was born in Rome, July 17, 1806, of a noble family. He began his career in the collection of the collii for art and lodged in the Vatican as private chamberlain to the pope. His next step was to the secretariety of the Congregation of Studies, whence he was promoted to the municiate at Vienna, and consecrated by Gregory himself archbishop of Ephesus, July 17, 1866. He was created cardinal Dec. 14, 1840, and published April 23, 1845. During the twenty years of his cardinal's life he occupied some of the most laborious and important posts as chamberlain of the holy Roman Church, apostolic delegate, etc. On June 2, 1865, St. John Lateran, lord chancellor of the Roman University, and bishop of the subbarcian see of Albano, about fourteen miles from Rome. While (1867) receiving the oaths and distributing the diplomas to the students of the university, a hasty messenger arrived announcing the change of persons desiring his presence. Without a moment's hesitation he broke up the meeting, summoned a notary, made his will, and rode hastily to the stricken town of Albano. He at once assumed control of the municipal as well as religious government of his see, seconded by the temporal authorities, and the church was at length brought under control. But Alteri was seized himself with the disease, and died Aug. 11, 1867.

Ambrose Podobedow, a Russian ecclesiastic, was born Nov. 30, 1742, in the government of Vladimir. He was educated at the Troiz monastery and took holy orders in 1768. Having become archbishop of Yekaterinoslav, he died in 1785, of the Kursk epidemic; was in 1794 elected member of the Holy Synod, and in 1799 made archbishop of St. Petersburg, Estonia, and Finland. In the year following he received the archepiscopal see of Novgorod, with the appointment as metropolitan, and died May 21 (June 2), 1818. He wrote an ascetical work, in three vols. (Moscow, 1810), and A Guide to the Reading of the Holy Scriptures (new ed. ibid. 1840). His most important work, however, is his Russian Church history, Istoria Rossiajki Terierk (ibid. 1807-15, 6 vols.; 2d ed. 1827). (B. F.)

Ammoniacal Sections are those numerical divisions of the Greek alphabet, 6 as material element which were introduced by Annonius of Alexandria into his Dialet- saron, or harmony of the four gospels, and were retained in the margin of many of the early copies of the gospels as being useful for comparing the parallel accounts. See New Testament.

Anastasy, Brittany, one of the most famous pulpits orators of Russia, was born in 1761, in the neighborhood of Kiev. He studied at the theological school in Perejaslaw, became in 1790 a monk, was appointed in 1797 bishop of White Russia, in 1801 archbishop, and in 1806 member of the Holy Synod. He died in 1816, archbishop of Astrachan. He published a collection of his poems called XIII. Fruits (St. Peters- burg, 1796; Moscow, 1799-1807): — Tractatus de Concionam Dispositionibus Formandi (Moscow, 1806). (B. F.)

ANDERS, Alexander, LL.D., a Scotch Baptist minister and educator, was born at Peterhead, Aberdeen County, in September, 1696. He studied at St. Andrew's University, was ordained pastor at Berwice in 1699, joined the Free Church party in 1694, in 1695 was settled over a church in Old Aberdeen, but in 1847 resigned his charge on account of a change of views on the subject of baptism, and took charge of the Channan House School, in Aberdeen, to which he joined the pastoral care of a Baptist congregation in George Street Hall, which eventually united with that in Crown Terrace. He died at Abobe, Oct. 25, 1884. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1886, p. 101.

ANDERSON, David, D.D., an English prelate, was born in London, Feb. 10, 1814. He studied at Edin-burgh University, and graduated from Exeter Hall, Oxford, in 1836. In 1841 he was made vice-principal of St. Bee's College, Cumberland; in 1848 incumbent of All-Saints' Church, Derby; and in 1849 consecrated the first bishop of St. Rupert's Land, but resigned that see on being appointed vicar of Clifton in 1864; in 1866 he was made chancellor of St. Paul's Cathedral, and died in London, Nov. 5, 1885. He was the author of, Notes on the Flood: — Not in the Bay: — five Charges, and some Ordination Sermons.

ANDERSON, Thomas D., D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., June 30, 1819. He rejoined the church of his fathers in 1880, and was holding an office under the government. In 1888 he graduated from the University of Pennsylvania, and in 1841 from the Newton Theological Institution. In 1842 he was ordained pastor of the First Baptist Church at Salem, Mass., in 1846 he became pastor of the First Baptist Church at Chicago, and in 1855 pastor of the Baptist Church in New York City. He achieved distinction and success in the difficult field in which he was called to labor. During nearly all his ministry he was officially connected with the American Baptist Missionary Society, the American Baptist Home Mission Society, and, while in New York, with the American Tract Society. For four years he acted as president of the Rutgers Female College, in New York City. Other important positions in benevolent and educational institutions he also filled. In the summer of 1876 he resigned his charge in New York, and not long after became pastor of the South Church, in Boston, where he died, Dec. 19, 1888. Dr. Anderson published only a few occasional discourses. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. s. v. (J.C.S.)

Angelina, Filippo de, an Italian canonist, was born at Canterano, near Subiaco, Feb. 10, 1824. He studied philosophy and theology at Rome, and after having received holy orders in 1846, practiced law. When quite young he was made professor of canon law at Rome. In 1871 he resigned his position, and died March 5, 1881. Pope Leo XIII, who appreciated his great talents as a teacher and exponent of canon law, made him canon of Maria Maggiore. He wrote Prae-Communiones Juris Canonici et Methodum Decretalium Gregorii Exeetae (Rome, 1877-80, 3 vols.). See Streber, in Weitzer u. Weitz's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Angevill (or Angelvill, alias Bury), Richard de, an English prelate of the 14th century, son of Sir Richard Angevill, was born at Bury, Suffolk, and educated at Oxford, where he attained to great eminence in learning; was governor to King Edward III while a prince, and the latter afterwards advanced him to be his cofferer, treasurer of his wardrobe, dean of Wells, bishop of Durham (1338), chancellor, and lord treasurer of England (1344). He was noted for his charities, bestowing on the poor every week eight quarters of wheat baked, and other benefactions. He was a great lover of books, confessing himself "extatico quidem librorum amore potenter absurptum," and he had more books than all the bishops of England in that age put together, which library he bequeathed to the University of Oxford. The most eminent foreigners were his friends, and the most learned Englishmen were his chaplains until his death, April 14, 1345. He wrote Philobiblos. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), iii. 166.

Anquetil (Depretor), Abraham Hyacinthe, a French Orientalist, brother of Louis, was born at Paris, Dec. 7, 1641. He studied theology at his native places, Auxerre, and Amersfoort, and with the subvention of his government he went in 1755, to India, to study Sanskrit and Zend there. At Surat he succeeded in obtaining the help of some Parsee priests, who dictated to him in the neo-Persian language the contents of their books written in Zend and Pehlevi. Having returned, in 1762, to Paris, he was appointed interpreter of Oriental languages at the royal library, and published a translation of the Zend-Avesta (Paris, 1771). In 1776 he published, at Amsterdam, the Legislation Orientale, which was followed by the publication of Recherches Historiques et Geographiques sur l'Inde (Bruxelles, Paris, 1787, 2 vols.). He also published a Latin translation of a Persian extract from the Upamandus, or the theology-philosophical treatises of the Vedas. He died at Paris, Jan. 17, 1790. (B. P.)

Anzela, a name common to several archbishops of Milan, of whom we name the following:

1. Anzelma Bilius (814-812), who was exiled with other bishops on account of the part he took in the conspiracy of Bernard. He was, however, restored again, and crowned, in 821, king Lothar; at Monza.

2. Anzelma Compa (829-897), who crowned, in 888, Berengarius, at Pavia, as king of Italy.

3. Anzela Radif (1086-1093), was a faithful adherent of the pope and opponent of Henry IV, and crowned his rebellious son Conrad in 1093.

4. Anzela Valvaso (1097-1101), second successor to the former, and a papal adherent. In 1098 he held a large synod, went to the Holy Land, but returned in 1099. The second time he took the cross to join the crusades, but died at Constantinople.

5. Anzela of Fultersa (1123-1158), refused to accept the offerings from the hands of Henry in 1128. He crowned, in 1128, Conrad, the rival of Lothair, in consequence of which he was put under the ban by the pope, together with Conrad. When Anzela II was elected antipope, Anzelma sided with him, and accepted the papacy from the hands of his legate. The legitimate pope repudiated the interdict, which on account of the confusion, since Anzelma inflicted ecclesiastical punishment upon faithful adherents of the pope. At last the people of Milan expelled Anzelma, in 1133, and the council held at Pisa in 1185 confirmed the act of the people of Milan. While on the way to the antipope, Anzelma was taken prisoner, and died at Rome, Aug. 24,

4 Ansbach, Friedrich Rinkhardt, D.D., a Lutheran minister, was born in January, 1815, in Potter Township, Centre Co., Pa. He studied at Binghamton, at Millmount Academy, graduating from Pennsylvania College in 1839; subsequently pursued the theological course at Gettysburg, and was licensed to preach in 1841, when he became pastor of the Harren Hill and Whitemarsh charge, Montgomery County; from 1850 to 1864 he was pastor in Hagerstown, Md., and remained there until 1857. He was interested in the founding of the Hagerstown Female Seminary. About this time he became co-editor and proprietor of The Lutheran Observer. From 1857 to 1861 his residence was in Baltimore; and subsequently, owing to failing health, he retired from active work and resided principally in Anne Arundel County. He died in Baltimore, Sept. 16, 1867. Among his published works are the following: translations from the German of Hezekiah Buhl, etc., by Caspar Schwenkfeld (1851);—The Sepulchres of our Departed (1854);—The Sona of the Sires (1855);—a lecture on Spiritualism (ed.);—Aesop's Fables (1857), etc. See Pennsylvania College Book, 1887, p. 204; Lutheran Observer, Sept. 27, 1867.

5 Antioch. Joseph, an English poet, was born at Maidley Wood, Shropshire, in 1808; educated at Westminister School, and became professor of classical literature in King's College, London, and died at Torquay, Feb. 29, 1836. Among his productions were a select number of hymns (anonymously published in 1836), several of which are quite popular.

6 Antioch, Council of. In addition to those notices in vol. i, councils were also held at this place in 391, at which the Arian Gregory of Antioch was elected to the see of Alexandria; in 360, at which the Arian Mission of Sebaste was elected patriarch of Antioch; in 391, at which Flavianus anathematized the Manicheans; and in 417, at which Pelagius was again condemned.

7 Antioch, William, D.D., a prominent minister of the English Primitive Methodist Conference, was born in 1813. In his seventeenth year he began to preach. He held nearly all the positions of honor it was in the power of his denomination to bestow. From 1862 to 1867 he was Connectional Editor, and at the request of the Conference he wrote an excellent biography of Hugh Bourne. He was twice president of the conference. For some time he was principal of the Sunderland Institute. He died in December, 1884. See Christian Guardian, Dec. 17, 1884.

8 Antonius, a Christian poet of the 3d century, is the author of Carmen Adversus Gentiles, which consists of two parts, the first treating of the vanity of heathenism, the second of the truth of Christianity. The first edition of this poem was published by Muratori, in his Anecdota, vol. 1 (Milan, 1697), and in Opera S. Pauli (Verona, 1738), where it is erroneously ascribed to Paulinus of Nola. Other editions are given in Galliaecii, Bibliotheca Latina; Migne, Patrologia Latina, vol. 55; Schmid, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

9 Antonius a Mater Dei, a name common to two Carmelites.

1. The first lived about the beginning of the 16th century at Alcâna, and is the author of Collegii Companiâ Terzo Diacatorum Fruiter Ordinis B. Maria de Jesus, etc., which contains a very excel lent biography of St. Anthony. See Also the sermons of St. Anthony Aristotelis: 11. In Duos Libros de Generatione et Conceptione sive de Ortu et Interitu; 111. In Tres libros Aritotelis de Animo. See Hurter, Nomenclator, i. 597; Peters, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v.

2. The other lived in the second half of the 16th century, and was professor of theology in the college of his order at Salamanca. He is the author of Prædictâ Inseptâ ad Sacrorum Bibliorum Interpretes, etc. (Leyden, 1669). See Kaulen, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

3. Apelt, Ernst Friedrich, a German philosopher, was born March 5, 1812, at Reichenau, near Zittau. He studied at Jena and Leipzig; commenced his lectures at Jena in 1839; was, in 1840, professor of philosophy, and died Oct. 27, 1859. He published, Metaphysik (Leipzig, 1837);—Die Religionphilosophie (ibid. 1860);—Die Eigentümlichkeiten der Geschichte der Religion (ibid. 1845-46, 2 vols.; 2d ed. 1852).—Wie muss das Glaubensbe- kenniss zu sich setzen, das zur Vereinigung aller Konfessionen führen soll? 4. Appearance of Our Lord to his Disciples after the Resurrection. Professor Gardiner has given "synopses of the events, so far as the points of difficulty extend," that relate to Mary Magdalene and the other women, with a view to accommodating the statement in Mark xvi, 9 (that he appeared first to her); and his scheme, if practicable, would be a desirable solution. It is as follows (Harmony of the Gospels in Greek, p. 258):

"The resurrection itself occurred at or before the earliest dawn of the first day of the week. The women, coming to the sepulchre, and seeing it open, supposed the body gone. They were amazed and perplexed. Mary Magdalene alone runs to tell Peter and John. The other women remain, enter the sepulchre, see the angel, and are instructed by them to announce the resurrection to the disciples, and depart in their errand. Simon Peter and John, the two disciples, appear rapidly to the sepulchre. They enter the tomb and are astounded at the orderly arrangement of the grave-clothes, and then return to Mary. Mary follows them, not doubting, nubile quite to keep pace with them, and so falling behind. She remains standing at the entrance after they have gone, and, looking in, sees the angels. Then, turning about, she sees Jesus himself, and receives his charge for the disciples. This was our Lord's first appearance after his resurrection (Mark xvi, 9)."

"To return to the women who were on their way to the sepulchre to the disciples. They went in haste, yet more slowly than Peter and John. There were many of them, and, being in a state of great agitation and alarm, they appeared to each other as they became surrounded and passed the city by different gates. One party of them, in their astonishment and fear, say nothing to any one; the others run to the disciples and announce all that they had seen, viz. the vision of the angels."

"At this time, before any report had come in of the appearance of our Lord himself, the two disciples set out for Emmaus."

"Soon after, Mary Magdalene comes in, announcing that she had actually seen the risen Lord."

"While the women are supposing, the first-mentioned party of the women are stopped on the way by the appearance of the Lord himself, and they also receive a charge to his disciples."

"The proper test of this scheme is to tabulate it, allowing a reasonable interval for each incident. It must be borne in mind that all the parties were more or less in haste; and as the entire breadth of the city is but little more than a mile, and the sepulchre was very near the city, fifteen or twenty minutes is sufficient time for any person, under the circumstances, to have passed from any probable point within the city to the sepulchre. Reckoning, therefore, from any fixed point, say four o'clock, the record, on that theory, would stand about as follows:

a.m.
Resurrection

4:00

The women on their way to the sepulchre

4:00

They arrive at the sepulchre.

4:40

Mary sets out to return.

5:00

Peter and John set out to the sepulchre, on the return of Mary

5:40

They reach the sepulchre.

6:00

Some of the other women reach the city, and report.

6:40

Peter and John leave after inspecting the tomb.

7:00

Mary arrives the second time.

7:50

She sees Jesus, and reports.

8:00

The other party of women sees Jesus, but do not report.

8:50

"If we can believe that it took any of the women three quarters of an hour to go part of the way back to the city, when it is especially said that "they fled in haste," "departed quickly," under an urgent message, which "they ran" to deliver, we may accept the above scheme, but not otherwise. It should, moreover, be observed that the supposition of a division of their company and the sacrifice of the consequences warranted by the sacred narratives, which invariably speak of them all together, except Mary. The statement in Mark xvi, 8, that "they said nothing to any man," evidently means "no person whom they met on the way." We are not at liberty to refer the report Alluded to by the disciples on the way to Emmaus (Luke xxiv, 22-24) to a single division of the women, for the same evangelist (ver. 10) distinctly includes Mary among those who made it.

The true solution of this problem lies not in any formal division of the events, but in a just apprehension of the language of the several evangelists. Matthew mentions in general terms the appearance to the women, including Mary; Mark speaks only of the appearance to Mary as the representative of the whole company of women; Luke (as Paul in I Cor. xvi, 4-8) does not recognize any appearance to the women at all; John gives the details of the appearance to Mary, but makes no allusion to the other women.

Appelbe, William Parker, LL.D., an Irish Wesleyan minister, was born at Bandon, Nov. 19, 1867. He was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, with a view to the Wesleyan ministry; and on the completion of his course decided to enter the Methodist itinerancy. He was received by the Conference in 1834, and appointed to the Londonerry Circuit. He labored on the most important circuits in the Conference, and was chosen to nearly all the principal offices in the connection, having twice elected president of the Conference. During the last nine years of his life, in addition to his circuit work, he filled the important office of theological tutor in the college at Belfast, a position for which his learning, culture, and sympathies well qualified him. He died at Belfast, June 22, 1882. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1882, p. 39.

Appuhn, August Wilhelm, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Oct. 4, 1804. In 1838 he was appointed pastor at Attenhausen, and in 1852 cathedral priest and member of consistory at Magdeburg. He retired from the ministry in 1871, and died at Wernigerode, June 6, 1882. He published, Zoe, der Knecht Gott's (Magdeburg, 1845); - Festreden (ibid. 1857); Entwürfe zu Predigten im Festen und Fastestem (ibid. 1876). See Zuchold, Bibliothek, i, 57. (B. P.)

Araujo, a name common to some theologians of the Society of Jesus.

1. ALFONSO (or ILDEFONSO DE PERAFIEL), was born at Ribambo, in Peru (now Ecuador), in 1549. He joined his order in 1610, was professor of theology and philosophy at Cusco and Lima, and died at Guanaca-Vela, Nov. 16, 1655. He wrote, Currum Integri Philo-soeophii (Leiden, 1668-70, 4 vols.); - Theologia Scholastica Naturalia, etc. (ibid. 1666, 2 vols.).

2. Joseph, was born at Oporto, in Portugal, Oct. 10, 1596. In 1712 he joined his order, was professor at Coimbra, Oporto, and Lisbon, and died in 1736. He wrote Currum Theologici (Lisbon, 1734-37, 2 vols.), See Bauer, in Wetzer u. Wele's Kirchenlexikon, n. v. (B. P.)

Aruaes, Pedro, a Spanish inquisitor, was born at Epila, in Aragon, in 1442. He studied at Huesca and Bologna, and was, in 1471, professor of moral philosophy at the latter place. In 1478 he was made doctor of theology and in 1474 canon of Saragossa. After having returned to his native place, he joined, in 1476, the order of the Augustinians, and in the following year received holy orders. As a preacher he attracted large crowds, and as an instructor of the young clergy was very successful. In 1484 he was appointed, together with the Dominican, Caspar Jügler, inquisitor of Aragon. This appointment was made by the grand-inquisitor Torquemada. With cruel fanaticism Aruées executed the orders of his chief, and many Jews and Moors were delivered to the stake. Among the relations of his acts are the sentences on those who engaged in the inquisition. In the night of Sept. 14th, 1485, Aruées, while kneeling at the altar, received a deadly blow, and died on the 17th of that month. His murderers, together with many of the members, had to pay the penalty of their deed. In the Roman Church he is celebrated as a martyr. Pope Alexander VII pronounced him blessed in 1661, while Pius IX canonized him in 1867. The famous Kaublach painted, in 1871, a picture, on which Aruées is represented as condemning heretics to death. See Zimbalii, Peter Aruées and the spangnische Inquisition (8d ed. Munich, 1872). (B. P.)

Azevalo, Rodrigo Sanchez de, a Spanish bishop, was born at St. Maria de Nieva, in the diocese of Segovia, in 1404. He studied law at Salamanca, and the kings, John II and Henry IV of Castile, whose secretaries he was, made use of his talents on several occasions. When in 1456, he was sent to Portugal in order to pope Calixtus III the congratulations of his monarch, he was made bishop of Oviedo. Under Paul II he occupied the episcopal see of Zamora, next of Calahorra, and finally that of Valencia. He died Oct. 4, 1470. Most of his works are still in MS. in the University Library; only three have been published, Speculum Vitae Humanae (Rome, 1468): - Historia Hispınica, giving the history from the earliest times to the year 1469 (ibid. 1470): - De Monarchia Orbis et de Origine et Et de Regimarum Principiorum Imperialis (ibid. 1551). See Bibo, Centro, xii, 349 sq.; Hambrecht, Zuer-lässige Nachrichten, iv, 800 sq.; Staniski, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, n. v. (B. P.)

Arius, usually pronounced A'reias, but strictly A'rius, from A'reios, meaning married, the famous heresiarch, was born about A.D. 256 in North Africa (Cyrenaica, Libya, or Egypt), but nothing is known of his early life or circumstances. He is said to have been educated by Lucian, a presbyter in Antioch, and ordained deacon by Peter of Alexandria and elder by Achillas, Peter's successor, who placed him (A.D. 313) in charge of Baulcia, one of the great churches of Alexandria. On the death of this bishop he came near being elected to the see, but was rejected by the hierarchy, but was defeated by Alexander, through envy of whom (as Theodoret asserts, Hist. Eccles., i, 2) he began, about A.D. 318, a controversy respecting the nature of Christ, which ultimately involved the whole of Christendom. See A'rius, A'rius. Arianism. Arianism had previously been censured for connection with the schism of Meletius, but in some way had been restored to favor. He was now excommunicated for heresy by a council held at Alexandria in 321, and his views formally condemned by the Council of Nicea in 325. Constantine banished him to Illyria, but in 331 he recalled him through the intercession of his sister, Constantina, and Eusebius of Nicomedia. Athanasius, however, refused to recognize the heretic. In 386 Athanasius himself was banished to Treves, and Arian, after a personal interview with the emperor, was about to be received in full honor at Alexandria, when he suddenly died of a disease of the bowels, apparently a violent attack of dysentery, which his enemies attributed to the visitation of God and his friends to the effect of poison. His views are but the outcropping of the earlier errors of Cerinthus and the Gnostics, now put into a shape by the virtual denial of the divinity of our Lord. Arianism was evidently a man of much acuteness, but little depth of intellect, and of a controversial turn. No charge of immorality was ever alleged against him. He is said to have been tall in person, easy and eloquent in manner, but austere in habits. The representation of him in the recent re-

nance, entitled Aria the Lyricus (New York, 1883), is lively but somewhat too favorable.

Armistead, Jesse H., D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was educated at Hampden-Sidney College and the Union Theological Seminary of Virginia. He was licensed to preach in 1836, when he is thought to have been twenty years of age. He was pastor of churches were at Carterville and the Brick Church at Flavi-anna; in 1828 he became pastor at Buckingham Courthouse, and in 1842 at Cumberland. He died at Woodville, Va., May 90, 1869. He was eminently useful, and his memory was blessed with powerful revival.

Arma, Hiram Phelps, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Windsor, Conn., June 1, 1799. He studied at Phillips Academy, Andover; graduated from Yale College in 1824, and from Yale Divinity School in 1828; was ordained June 80, 1828, pastor at Hebron, where he remained until Oct. 10, 1822; in February, 1833, became pastor at Waltonville; in 1836 of the First Church, Norwich, of which he remained pastor emeritus from the time of his resignation, Feb. 20, 1872. He deceived at Norwich, April 6, 1862. From 1866 he was a member of the corporation of Yale College. Besides seven volumes of sermons, he has edited a pamphlet,
Notes of the Congregational Churches in New London County, Conn., from 1838 to 1869. See Cong.
Year-book, 1885, p. 17.

Arnold of Bonneval, a Benedictine writer of the 12th century, was, in 1144, appointed abbot of Bonneval, in the diocese of Chartres. Like his predecessors he had to undergo many trials. His appeal to pope Lucius II was of no avail, and he went to Rome a sec-time, where he succeeded, in 1154, in receiving the permission of pope Hadrian IV to resign. He died in Monte Cassino, where he had resided. Arnold enjoyed the friendship of St. Bernard, who, on his death-bed, sent a letter full of expressions of love for Ar-old. After St. Bernard's death the monks of Clairvaux requested Arnold to continue the life of the saint, which William of Thierry had commenced to write. Thus the Vita Sancti Bernardi (Migne, Pat. lat. clxxvi, 267 sq.), which is erroneously ascribed to a Cistercian Arnold (comp. Oudin, Script. Eccles., ii, 1294), originated. Arnold also wrote a speculative treatise on the Hexameron:—Homiliaris de 132a Psalm:—a book entitled De Spiritus S.:—De Sepulchro Verbi Domini in Crusco:—Medicipatione, and De Cardinallis Operibus Christi. It is remarkable that the latter work, which was dedicated to pope Hadrian IV, was regarded for a long time as a work of St. Cyprian, and was published by Pamelius in his edition of Cyprian (Amsterdam, 1652). His works are published in facsimile, Pat. lat.
cxix (1518). See Streber, in Wetzer u. Weite's Kirchenlexicon, s. v.

Arnold, Albert Nicholas, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Cranston, R. 1., Feb. 12, 1814. He graduated from Brown University in 1838, and from the Newton Theological Institution in 1841; was ordained pastor at Newburyport, Mass., Sept. 14, 1841;
and in 1843 appointed a missionary to Greece, and stationed successively at Athens and in the island of Corfu. For eleven years he was engaged in his missionary work, and then returned to the United States. For two years he was a professor at Newton, for seven years pastor of the Church at Westborough, Mass., for five years professor in the Hamilton Theological Institution, and for four years professor in the Chicago Theological Seminary. In 1870 he returned to his early home, near Providence, R. I., where he died, Oct. 11, 1886. See

Arnold, John Motte, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Acra, Greene Co., N. Y., Oct.
15, 1824. He was converted early in life, and in 1848 joined the Michigan Conference, in which he was successively pastor at Port Huron, St Clair, Flint, Corunna, presiding elder of Owasso District, pastor at Dexter, Woodward Avenue, in Detroit, and Walnut Street, in the same city. In 1863 he was placed in charge of the Detroit Methodist Book Depository, and later of the Michigan Christian Advocate. He died suddenly in Detroit, Dec. 24, 1883. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1886, p. 381.

Arnot, Robert, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1746; presented to the living of Ceres in 1770; elected presbytery clerk in 1777; resigned in 1792; was appointed professor of divinity in the new college of St. Andrews in 1799; minister of Kingspark, (1801), but appears on account book as holding one important office: the General Assembly of 1800 approved of the double appointment. He died July 2, 1806, aged sixty-three years. See *Fusti Ecc.
cles. Scoticae,* ii, 444, 478.

Arnecke, Vett, a Bavarian historian, was born about the year 1440 at Landshut. He studied at Amberg and Vienna, was for some time pastor of St. Marin's, in his native city, and died about the year 1505.
He is the author of, Chronicon Austriacum to the year 1488 (reprinted by Pez, Script. rer. Austr. i, 1165)—

chapters were published.—Landon, Manual of Councils, s.

Arthur, William, D.D., a Baptist minister, father of the recent president of the United States, was born in County Antrim, Ireland, being by descent Scotch-Irish, and was a graduate of Belfast College. In his eighteenth year he came to America, and subsequently entered the Baptist ministry. For about eight years he was pastor of the Calvary Church, New York city;
afterwards of several churches in Vermont, and then of churches in the state of New York, among them those in Schenectady, Lansingburg, West Troy, and Newtown. In the last-named place he died, in October, 1875. He was lauded as "an author of systematic study, and a minister of great usefulness and piety." See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclopedia, p. 1291. (J. C. S.)

Articles, Irish. The articles of religion of the Protestant Church of Ireland, numbering one hundred and four, were probably drawn up by archbishop Usher, and adopted by the Irish Episcopal Church in 1615.
They are in striking agreement with the Westminster Confession, and may be found in Creeds of Christendom i, 662; comp. iii, 526. They were, however, by the Irish convocation of 1635, and the thirty-nine articles of the English Church have ever since been the standard of the Irish Church also.

Aschbach, Joseph, a Roman Catholic historian of Germany, was born in 1801 at Höchst. He studied at Heidelberg, was in 1828 professor of the gymnasium in Frankfort-on-the-Main, in 1842 professor of history at Bonn, and in 1854 at Vienna. He died, April 25, 1892. He is best known as the editor of Algemeene Nederlandse, s. v. Kirchenlexicon (1826, 50, 4 vols.), to which he contributed largely. (B. P.)

Assamese Version. Assam is a British provin-
cce, now forming part of the eastern frontier of India.
The original language of the Assamese nation was the Ahom, a branch of the Siamese family of languages.
When the people adopted the religion of Bengal in the middle of the 17th century, they also gradually habituated themselves to the use of its language, till at length the ancient Abon tongue became extinct. During the lapse of years the language now spoken in Assam has contracted several peculiarities of its own, distinguishing it from the Bengalee, so that in printing
the Scriptures it was found impracticable to use the Bengalee characters, and a new font of type was cast for that purpose. In 1815 the first two gospels were printed at Serampore, while the whole New Text was finished at press in 1819, with the title The New Testament Translated from the Original into the Assam Language by the Serampore Missionaries. In 1821 the Pen-ta-tateu was also printed, and the printing of the entire Old Text, was subsequently completed. The annual report of the British and Foreign Bible Society for 1883 stated that "preparation is being made for revision;" but how far the work has progressed we are unable to state.

Asseburg, Rosamunde Juliann von, a German visionary, was born in November, 1672, at Eisenstadt, near Magdeburg. According to her own statement, she had visions at different times. When seven years of age she saw the Saviour, who told her of his suffering in his grandmother's kingdom. News concerning the visionary soon reached Magdeburg, and Pfeiffer, a young theologian of Lauenburg, sought the opportunity of becoming acquainted with Fräulein Asseburg. Pfeiffer wrote to Petersen concerning the visiionary, and the latter, after some correspondence, in company with his wife paid a visit to her. As the result of his visit he published Species facti von dem adligen Fräulein Rosamund von Assseburg, with an appendix (1691). This was intended as an address to the most prominent theologians, in order to ascertain if they would accept the story of R. P. Rosamunde as divine inspirations or not. Some asserted, others violently opposed. Spener, whose opinion was asked, was too cautious to commit himself in any way.
Meanwhile Fräulein Asseburg's name became known in France, England, and Denmark. The consistory, however, at the instance of the preachers of Lüneburg, who accused Petersen because he allowed the visionary to stay at his house, took the matter into consideration, and in accordance with a decision of the theological faculty at Helmstädt, deposed Petersen, in 1692, from his office, and besought him to leave the country. Under this verdict, an opinion was publicly pronounced upon Fräulein Asseburg, who accompanied her friend first to Wolfenbüttel, then to Magdeburg. From Magdeburg she went to Berlin, where she lived in the house of a countess. In 1708 she saw once more her friend Petersen at Berlin, but after this she rapidly lost her prestige, and sank into oblivion. Not even the date of her death is known.
The famous Leibnitz defended her moral and religious character, and as to her visions he compared her to Brigitta, Hildegard, and Melchthilis, who were regarded as saints among the more faithful of the Middle Ages. See Petersen, Autobiography (2d ed. 1719); Ber-

Assemani, the Italian form of the name of a learned Maronite family; namely, Giuseppe Simone,
the head of it, Stefano Evvolo, and Giuseppe Luci (in Lat. Agios, born about 1710), two of his nephews, and his grandfather, who was born in Greece on March 14, 1749, at Tripoli. He was educated in the Maronite College at Rome, and after completing his studies spent twelve years as a missionary in his native country, and then went to Padua as teacher of Oriental languages, where he died, April 7, 1781. He wrote a famous work On the Churches of the East (Padua, 1787). See Wetzer u. Weite's Kirchenlexikon, a. v. (B. P.)

Athune, James, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, son of a commissary of Orkney, was born at Kirkwall in 1618;
took his degree of M.A. at the Edinburgh University in 1636; studied divinity at Oxford in 1637; was chaplain to the marquis of Hamilton in 1638; presented by the king to the living of Birnay in 1642; deposed in 1649, and for taking part with the marquis of Montrose in 1650 he was excommunicated. He fled to Holland in 1656, afterwards returned to Edinburgh, and lived privately, with the encouragement of Parliament granted him for his sufferings. On visiting London he was collated by Brian Walton, bishop of Winchester, to the living of Wimniffith; was appointed minister at Elgin in 1677; elected bishop of Moray the same year; consecrated in 1679; transferred to the see of Galloway; and died Nov. 15, 1687. He made a bold stand in Parliament, in 1686, against rescinding the penal statutes respecting popyry. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticani, iii, 392-452, 778.

Atkinson, John Mato Plessant, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Mansfield, Va., Jan. 10, 1827. He graduated from Hampden-Sidley College in 1855, and from the Virginia Union Theological Semiinary; was ordained as an evangelist, and became a stated supply of the Church in Houston, Texas; was afterwards installed pastor atWarrenton and Salem, Va. In 1869 he was installed pastor of Bridge Street Church, Georgetown, D. C. In 1857 he was elected president of Hampden-Sidley College, and continued in that position until near the date of his death, Aug.
25, 1883. His life was full of good deeds, generous impulses, and Christian sacrifice. See Necrol. Report of Attigey, Council of (obdictional), held in May, 1670, at which Charles the Bold brought his son Carlo-man to judgment, and Hinemar of León was compelled to submit to royal and ecclesiastical authority. See

Atwater, Lyman Hotchkiss, D.D., LL.D., an em-ninent Presbyterian divine, was born at Cedar Hill (now in New Haven), Conn., Feb. 25, 1818. He graduated from Yale College in 1831, spent the ensuing year at the head of the classical department of Mount Hope Institute, Baltimore, Md., and then entered Yale Divinity School. At the end of the first year he was appointed professor of mathematics in Yale College, where he remained two years, continuing his theo-ological studies. He was licensed to preach in 1834, and became pastor of the First Church in Fairfield, Conn., where he remained twenty years. In 1854 he was appointed professor of intellectual and moral philosophy in Princeton College, which position he substantially held until the close of his life, Feb. 17, 1883.
In 1861 he was appointed to the lectureship extraordinary in Princeton Theological Seminary, which office he held for five years. He was a member of the joint committee appointed to the subject of the old and new school branches of the Presbyterian Church. He was acting president of Princeton College from the retirement of Dr. McLean to the inauguration of Dr.
McCosh. He was a voluminous writer, especially for the reviews, and became editor of the Princeton Review, which position he held until it was united with the Presbyterian Review. His contributions greatly exceeded those of any other man, beginning, in 1840, with his well-known essay on The Power of Contrary Choice.
Many of his articles have been reprinted in this country and in Europe. He held in the highest esteem by his colleagues, and was very popular with the students. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Alumni, 1883, p. 8; Nevins, Prob. Encyclop. a. v. (W. P. S.)
Auber, Miss Harriet, an English poetess, was born in London, Jan. 20, 1778. She lived a long and retired life, and died at Hoddesdon, Hertfordshire, Jan. 20, 1862. Of her poetry only a single volume was published, entitled The Spirit of the Psalms (anonymously, 1829), containing some sacred pieces, but much original matter of great value, which has been largely adopted in modern hymnals.

Auburn Declaration, a popular designation of the "Exceding Act," passed in that city (N. Y.) against the churches in the western part of the state as non-Presbyterians, for failing to come up to the higher Calvinistic theology. It has been practically a dead-letter. For its text, see Schaff, Creed of Christendom, ii. 777.

Augsburg, Josias Bernhard von, dean of Bamberg and Würzburg, was born March 28, 1671, at Mengersdorf, in Franconia. He was baptized in the Lutheran Church, but through the influence of his uncle, Carl Sigismund, dean of Bamberg and Würzburg, he was brought up in the Roman Catholic faith. From 1688 to 1690 he was educated at the seminary in Würzburg, in 1695 dean of Bamberg, and in 1714 he received besides the deanery of Würzburg. In 1723 he was also appointed provost of St. Stephen at Bamberg. He died April 1, 1728. His name is the subject of a famous sermon at Bamberg. Aurelian (fully Lucius Domitius Valerianus Aurelianus), Roman emperor, was born about A.D. 212, at Sirmium, in Pannonia, or, according to some, at Dacia or Moesia, of very humble parentage. He gradually rose as a soldier under Claudius, whom he succeeded in August, 270, by the proclamation of the legions. He reigned until March, 275, with great military vigor, subduing Zenobia and the other Oriental powers. His civil administration, however, was harsh, and he is said to have been a persecutor of the Christians. See Smith, Dict. of Class. Biog, s. v.

Austin, Thomas Ralph, LL.D., a Protestant Episcopalian, was born in London, June 16, 1810. He graduated from Oxford, was ordained in England, and then came to America, but in 1833 returned and studied medicine. Once more coming to America, he settled in Indiana. During the late civil war he was commissioned as a surgeon in the army. At its close he preached at Terre Haute and Jeffersonville, and was fifteen years rector of St. James's Church, Vincennes, where he died, Feb. 6, 1884.

Autum Incription. One of the most remarkable Christian epigraphs was found in 1839 in the cemetery St. Pierre l'Estive, near Autum, where the Christians, during the persecutions, used to hold divine services on a marble plate, consisting of eight pieces, containing a metric inscription in Greek. It originally was attached to a wall or a tomb. According to Garucci (with additions and corrections placed within brackets) the inscription reads thus:

"The heavenly Ichthyus divine race, a pure heart
Keep, having received among mortals the immortal found.
Of divine waters. Refresh, O friend, thy soul
With the ever-flowing water of riches-giving wisdom.
The honey-sweet meal of the saints Saviour receive,
Eat with hunger, the Ichthyus holding in the hands.
With the Ichthyus satisfy thee, I long, my Lord Saviour.
Sweet rest and the mother, I enwrap thee, the light of the dead.

Ambrosio, O dearest father to my heart,
With the best mother and my brethren,
In the peace of Ichthyus remember thy Pectorium!"

It is not improbable that the first part, containing six verses, belongs to another author, as may be seen from the last two lines of the epigram; in opposition to that of the other. According to the character of the writing, the epigram belongs to the 4th, if not to the 5th, century. For the meaning of Ichthyus, see that article. The first two lines are a clear testimony of the divinity of Christ. Pohl suggests that the first six lines contain an ancient liturgical formula from the time of Irenaeus, which perhaps was used at the celebration of the eucharist. The rest contains a prayer of Pectorium for the soul of his deceased mother, and a petition that she, in connection with the father and brethren, may remember the son. Avancinus, Nicholas, a Jesuit, was born at Tyrol in 1612. At the age of fifteen he joined the order at Graz. For fourteen years he lectured on civil and scholastic theology at Vienna, was then appointed rector of the colleges of Passau, Vienna, and Graz, and in 1676 he was made provincial of the order in Austria and visitor of Bohemia. He died Dec. 6, 1686. His main work is Vita et Doctrina Jesu Christi sive Quatour Evangelistiae Collecta (Venice, 1665), which has repeatedly been reprinted (best edition by Westphol, 1844), and translated into German by Feichtenleins (Augsburg, 1820); Wetttmann (ibid. 1822; 2d ed. 1834), by a Catholic priest (Munich, 1850; 3d ed. 1860), by Ziller (Regensburg, 1862). Avelling, Thomas William Baxter, D.D., an English Dissenting minister, was born at Castletown, Isle of Man, May 11, 1815. He was educated by a kind guardian, joined the Independent Church at Wisbeek when sixteen years of age, at nineteen began to preach in the neighborhood, graduated from Highbury College in 1838, entered upon his ministry the same year at Kingsland, near London, and continued there until his death, July 3, 1884. Dr. Avelling was for many years the honorable secretary of the Asylum for Fatherless Children at Reetham, travelled in Italy, Egypt, and Syria, visiting many more than once the chairman of the Congregational Board in 1873, and in 1874 of the Congregational Union. He published, Namein:

Avery, Benjamin, LL.D., an English Presbyterian, and an accomplished scholar, was educated for the ministry in England and Holland. He was chosen assistant pastor at the Bartholomew Close Church, under Thomas Freke, afterwards under John Muncleby. He died at an advanced age, July 28, 1764. In 1713 he published a German on Martin Luther, translated into English in 1777, and reprinted in 1798. He wrote also a History of the Reformation in Saxony. He delivered lectures on the Life of Luther, and was one of the physicians of Guy's Hospital, and one of the writers in the Discourse on the Reformation. He wrote against Luther, but was answered in a satire, written Backus, John Backus, D.D., LL.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Wethersfield, Conn., Sept. 5, 1810. He studied at Albany Academy, spent two years at Columbia College, and graduated from Yale College in 1832; studied law one year, and theology one year at New Haven, joining the Congregational Church in the meantime; spent part of a year at Andover Theological Seminary; graduated from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1835; was licensed to preach the same year, and ordained the next, serving meanwhile as assistant secretary of the Board of Domestic Missions. On Sept. 16, 1866, he became pastor of the First Presbyterian Church at Baltimore, Md., and remained there until his death, April 9, 1904, having been pastor emeritus from October, 1875. His talents were of a high order, and few had greater influence in the Church. See Necrolog. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1865, p. 21.

Bacon (de Baccone, or Bacchone), Francisco, a Spanish theologian, was born at Granada, or at Peralada, in Catalonia. He joined the Carmelites of his native country, studied at Paris, where he also lectured on theology. He is known by the name of doctor bibliopolus. He became archbishop of Tarragona in Catalonia, and died at the monastery of Camprodon, Aug. 8, 1782. He wrote Commentarius super Sanct. I, 4:—Repertorium Producicium. See Schmid, in Wetzer u. Weite's kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Baillot, Francois, a Scotch clergyman, was born at Inverarvon in 1728; licensed to preach in 1767, presented to the living of Dunkeld in 1777, and took his M.A. degree the same year; was transferred to the New Greyfriars Church, Edinburgh, in 1779; transferred to the New North Church in 1789; held in conjunction the principalship of the university in 1799; was transferred to the High Church in 1801, and died Jan. 14, 1840. At his suggestion the General Assembly, in 1824, formed a committee for extending education and religious instruction, especially in the Highlands and islands of Scotland. He devoted much time and money to this work, and travelled throughout the whole of his native country, and the Bute islands in furtherance of the benevolent scheme. See Fusti Ecclesi. Scotican, i, 30, 69, 71; ii, 785, 786.

Baker, Sir Henry Williams, an English clergyman and poet, was born in London, May 21, 1817, being the son of a baronet. He graduated from Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1844; was ordained deacon in 1848, and ordained priest at Alfriston, near Alfriston, in East Sussex, in 1851, and died there, Feb. 11, 1877. Besides writing some essays, he was one of the editors of Hymns Ancient and Modern (Lon. 1861, 1866, 1874), which contains several of his own compositions.

Baker, William Munford, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Washington, D. C., June 5, 1825. He joined the Church at sixteen, graduated from the College of New Jersey in 1846, and after studying theology with his father one year, and in Princeton Theological Seminary, became a Presbyterian at Alfriston, in East Sussex, in 1851, and died there, Feb. 11, 1877. Besides writing some essays, he was one of the editors of Hymns Ancient and Modern (Lon. 1861, 1866, 1874), which contains several of his own compositions.

Bakoven, Paul, a German controversialist, was born at Chemnitz about 1466. He joined the Cistercians, and was abbots of Altenzelle from 1522 to 1555. In connection with Cochlaeus, Emser, Peter Forst, and Augustin von Alveloth, he opposed the Lutheran Reformation in Saxony. He tried to reform monastic life, but could not prevent the departure of his co-religionists from carrying over to the Church of the Reformation. He wrote against Luther, but was answered in a satire, written Bannister, Henry, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister and educator, was born at Conway, Mass., Oct. 5, 1818. He united with the Church at the age of sixteen, studied at Cazenovia Seminary, N. Y., graduated from Wesleyan University, Conn., in 1838, taught one year at Lowville, N. Y., studied two years at Auburn Theological Seminary, teaching one year meanwhile at Cazenovia; in 1840 became principal of Fairfield Academy; in 1843 of Cazenovia Seminary; in 1856 professor of exegetical theology at Garret Biblical Institute, Evanston, Ill., and died there, April 15, 1883. In 1869 he took a trip abroad. He was a delegate to the General Conference in 1864, 1868, and 1872. He was licenced to preach in 1858, and in 1842 joined the Oneida Conference, and in 1857 transferred to the Wisconsin Conference. He was an able divine, a fine scholar, and an excellent teacher. Besides numerous contributions to the periodical press, he prepared the part on Isaiah for Wheler's Commentary. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1868, p. 922; Alumni Record of West. Univ. 1882, p. 10, p. 54.

Baptism, Historical, i. e. when administered by heretics, has been generally held, at least in the Roman Church, ever since the Donatist schism, to be valid; so likewise if performed by women, heathen, or even in adult persons, if self administered (Smith, Dict. of Christ. Antiq., s. v.). See Baptism, LAV.

Bär (Lat. Bernus, i. e. Baerer), Ludwig, a Swiss humanist and theologian, was born at Basle towards the end of the 15th century. He studied at his native place and at Paris. In the latter city he was promoted to the doctorate of theology. In 1513 he was appointed professor of theology at his native city, and soon attracted many students. At the beginning of the Reformation, he sided, in connection with Erasmus, with that movement. But when the intentions of the leaders became more and more known, he stood up for the church, and, as one of the leaders of the theological faculty, opposed the Ecologists and Pelagians. When, however, in 1529 the evangelical party had gained the victory and the Church of Rome was declared to be abolished at Basle, Bär, in connection with Erasmus, Glarean, and other professors and canons, left Basle and settled at Breisgau. He died at the last named place, April 14, 1554. He wrote, De Christianis ad Mortem Preparativos Liber: — Pamatium Expositio: — Quaest. an Tempore Festas Fugere Liceat. See Herzog, Athema Raurician (Basle, 1778); Wachter, Geschichte der Universitäten der Gründung 1460 bis zur Reformation 1529 (ibid. 1869); Fials, in Wetzer u. Wetzel's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (H. P.).

Barbier, Jouré, a French pervert, was born at Die about 1578. He was pastor of the Protestant congregations at Quinc, St. Marcellin, and Livron (1603–1615), but was brisked by the bishop of Valence to tult Romanist, and enquiring the royal estate at Grenoble, wrote several abusive books against his former co-religionists, for which see Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.

Barrows, Comport E., D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Attleborough, Mass., Dec. 11, 1831. He graduated from Brown University in 1858, and from The Newton Theological Institution in 1861; was ordained Dec. 25 of the same year pastor at South Danvers (now Peabody), Mass., and in 1865 became pastor of the First Church at Newport, R. I. He died there, Dec. 26, 1883. Besides articles for reviews and papers, Dr. Barrows published several sermons and addresses. See B. L. P. Biogr. Hist., v. 291. (J. C. W.)

Barry, John, a Roman Catholic prelate, was made administrator of the diocese of Savannah, and on Aug. 2, 1857, consecrated bishop. Florida was at this time made a vicariate, and the diocese of Savannah embraced only Georgia. He labored earnestly and zealously in his capacity of bishop, as he had in that of presbyter, but his health was broken down. Going to Europe to recruit, he was prosaunched in Paris, and died there, Nov. 19, 1859, aged fifty. See De Courcy and Shea, Hist. of the Catholic Church in the U. S. p. 533.

Basil of Jerusalem, a Jacobite patriarch in the 9th century, is the author of Epistles Symphorit, of S.S. Imaginatur ad Theophylam, Ed. Gr. Lat. Contraflamulans Orig. Renaurge Costantinopolitan (Paris, 1664), an epistle addressed to the emperor Theophylus, on account of his severe edict against the image-worshippers. See Milman, Hist. of Latin Christianity, ii. 367; Peters, in Wetzer u. Wetzel's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Bastida, Fernando, a Spanish Jesuit, was born at Salamanca in 1572. He joined his order in 1598, and went to Rome as procurator of Molina. Here he defended the doctrine of predestination as held by his order. Having returned to Spain, he was obliged to leave his order on account of some defect which debarred a candidate from becoming a member, but which was not known at the time of his entrance. Up to his death he was canon and professor primarius of the University of Valladolid. See Meyer, Historia Congreg. de Aviisua; Schneeman, in Wetzer u. Wetzel's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Bathurst, William Hiley, an English clergyman and poet, was born near Bristol, Aug. 28, 1796. He graduated from Christ Church College, Oxford; was ordained in 1819; in 1833 became rector of Barwick-in-Elmet, Yorkshire, resigned in 1852, and in 1853 retired to his estate at Sydney Park, Gloucestershire, where he died in 1877. Besides An Essay on Human Knowledge (1827) and A Translation of Virgil's Georgics (1849), he published two volumes of poems, entitled respectively Psalms and Hymns for Public and Private Use (London, 1831, 1842) and Metrical Thoughts in Verse (1849), from the former of which several pieces have been quite popular, especially the hymn beginning "Oh for a faith that will not shrink," and "Oh for that flame of living fire."

Bayle, Marc Antoine, a French religious author, was born at Marseilles in 1825, and died in 1876. He wrote, Vie de Saint Vincent Ferrer (Marseilles, 1856) : — Vie de St. Philippe de Neri (ibid. 1859) ; — Messillon (1867) : — Oraison Funèbre du R. P. Locardais (1868) : — Homilies sur les Évangiles (Tourneur, 1863, 2 vols.). He also translated Philliger's A Mork, Christenthum und Kirche in der Zeit der Grundlegung, and took an active part in the publication of the Conseller Catholique et L'Amis de la Religion. See Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Bayley, James Roosevelt, D.D., a distinguished Roman Catholic prelate, was born in New Jersey, Aug. 23, 1814. He graduated from Washington (now Trinity) College, Hartford, Conn., in 1835, and studied theology under Dr. Samuel Jarvis at Middletown; was ordained a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church; preached at Harlem, N. Y., and afterwards at Half way in New Jersey; Md., where he went to Ian, entered the Roman Catholic Church in 1842, studied theology in the Sheffield Seminary at Paris, and was raised to the priesthood in New York by archbishop Hughes, March 2, 1844. He was engaged thereafter in teaching and pastoral duties in New York city, and in filling the position of secretary to archbishop Hughes. On Oct. 30, 1853, he was consecrated first bishop of Newark, N.J., and on Oct.

12, 1854, received the pallium of his archbishopric of Baltimore. He took part in the third provincial conferences of New York, in the second plenary council of Baltimore, and in the oecumenical council of the VAT-cian. He also visited Rome in 1862 for the canonization of the Japanese martyrs, and in 1867 for the centenary of the death of St. Peter Canisius. In 1877 he went to Europe for the Vichy waters, but, receiving no benefit, returned to America, and got as far as Newark, where he died, Oct. 3, 1877.
Archbishop Bayley wrote, Sketch of the History of the Catholic Church on the Island of New York (N.Y., 1876), new ed.; Life of Simon G.
Brute, First Bishop of Vincennes (1869); Pastoral for the People. See (N. Y.) Catholic Almanac, 1878, p. 38.

Beatty, Charles Clinton, D.D., LL.D., a venerable Presbyteriian minister, was born near Princeton, N.J., Jan. 4, 1800. He joined the Church there in 1817, graduated from the College of New Jersey in 1818, and from the Theological Seminary at the same place in 1822. After serving as an evangelist in Indiana, Illinois, and Kentucky, he was ordained pastor of the First Presbyterian Church at Steubenville, O., in 1823.
In 1829 he founded a female seminary in that town,
to which he devoted his chief attention thereafter until 1879. In 1857 he resigned his position as pastor, but continued to act as stated supply in adjacent churches for several years thereafter. He died at Steubenville, Oct. 30, 1882. He possessed rare executive ability, and was enabled to amass a large fortune, of which he gave liberally to various causes of benevolence. See Noreo.

Beatty, William Trimple, D.D., a Presbyt-ernian, was born of Scotch-Irish parentage, in Fairfield County, O., June 1, 1833. He joined the Church at the age of seventeen, graduated from Miami University in 1857, spent one year at the Danville Seminary, Ky., and finished his theological studies at the Western Seminary, Allegheny City, Pa. He was licensed to preach in 1859, and ordained pastor at Greencastle in 1861. Two years afterwards he became pastor at New Brunswick, N. J., and in 1867 at Shady Side, Edinaburgh, Pa., where he continued until 1880, and then served as an associate pastor. He died at Minneapolis, Minn., April 10, 1882. He was an excellent preacher, and active as secretary of his presbytery and of several literary institutions. See Nevin, Presb.

Bebenburg, Koldofy von, a German prelate, who died at Fursac in 1295. He was the son of a noble family in France. He studied canon law at Bologna. In the controversy between Ludwig the Bavarian and the popes John XXII, Benedict XII, and Clement VI, Bebenburg sided with the emperor. In 1338 he was canon of Mayence, Wurzburg, and Bamberg, and from 1352 to 1363 bishop of the latter place. He wrote, De Zela Religiosa Anti-quorum Principum Germanorum (Basel, 1497; reprinted in the Bibliotheca Patrum, xvi, Cologne, 1822);—Tractutae de Juvinalis Regni et Imperii Romanorum (Stras-

Bec, Anny or, a celebrated French Benedictine monastery, belonging to the congregation of St. Maur, situated at the confluence of the Bec and the Rille, ine leagues from Rouen, was founded about 834, by St.
Herliuin, its first abbot, near the present site. It became famous as a seat of learning under Lanfranc, then prior, afterwards archbishop, of Canterbury, and was eventually exempted from episcopal jurisdiction, but is now in ruins. See Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Beccarrelli, Giuseppe, a Milanese spiritualist, a farmer and agriculturist (q. v.), and an active proponent of the education of youth, was seized by the Inquisition in 1708, and after recantation in 1710, at Venice, was commended to the galley.

Beckedorff, Georg Philipp Ludolf von, a pedagogue, statesman, and author, of Germany, was born April 14, 1778, at Hanover. At first he studied theology at Jena, and afterwards medicine at Göttingen, where he was also promoted in 1799 as M.D. In 1810
he accepted a call as tutor of the electoral prince of Hesse, and in 1811 he went to Ballenstedt as tutor of the prince of Anhalt-Bernburg. When, in 1818, the union between the Reformed and Lutheran Churches was decreed, his mind was greatly occupied with questions concerning the Church, and at that time he already regarded the Catholic Church as the historical development of the Apostolic Church. To this time belong his Zur Kirchenerziehung (Halle, 1814), and Briefe erste judge zwischen zwei Geistlichen bei Gelegenheit der Verurtheilung zur Kirchenerziehung (Leipsic, 1818). In 1810 he was called into the Prussian ministry for worship and instruction, but his joining the Church of Rome, in 1827, resulted in his discharge from office.
When William IV ascended the throne in 1840, he was summoned to his old position, and in 1840, he did justice to Beckedorff by appointing him to some high position, on which occasion he published his An gottlos/christliche protestantische Christen. Warte den Frieden und der Wiedererwärmung (Weisenburg, 1840). Besides, he wrote, Das Verhältnis von Gott und seiner Kirche zu einem, etc., (Cassel, 1842);—Oblieh beansprucht und Veruntheit (Ratisbon, 1858). He also founded some charitable institutions, and died Feb. 5, 1858, at Grinthof, in Pomerania. See Essioselth,

Beckmann, Otto, canon and "Professor elo-genietus" at Wittenberg, was a friend of Luther and Melanchthon, although he did not join them in the work of Reformation. "Alitur nescio quid magnum, he wrote in a letter to Martin Luther, Feb. 24, 1519, to the same time of the exciting sermon in which Luther had

In 1523 he was pastor at Warburg, his native place, where he was one of the signatories of the Dorothean proce-siones Lutheranorum Errores (Cologne, 1523);—Com-

Begg, James, D.D., a Scotch clergyman (son of Dr.
Begg, minister and kirk-servant, graduated from Glasgow University; was licensed to preach in 1829; appointed assistant minister at North Leth in 1830; elected minister of lady Glenorey's Chapel, Edinburgh, in 1831; promoted to Paisley the same year; joined the Free Secession in 1845; was elected moderator of the Free Germans in Scotland in May 1865, and died Sept. 29, 1888, aged seventy-four years. Dr. Begg was one of the foremost men in the Free Church of Scotland since the death of Dr. Chalmers. Among many other smaller works, he published, Are You Prepared to Die? (1845):

burgh (1849)—Pompeian and the Four Doors (ed.):

Belfast Society is noted in the history of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland for its having formerly agitated the Church for many years upon the question of subscription to the Westminster Confession of Faith. It had its origin with Rev. John Abernethy, jr., who became minister at Antrim in 1763. He was a diligent student, and soon drew around him as associates Rev. William Taylor, of Handalatow, Rev. Alexander Brown, of Donegore, and Rev. James Kirkpatrick, of Templepatrick — all young men of much promise. They were soon joined by Rev. Thomas Orr, of Comber, Rev. Alexander Colville, of Dromore, licentiates and theological students, and a few laymen of Belfast. The object of the organization was theological improvement. They first gave their organization the name of Belfast Society in 1705. "At their meetings, generally held monthly, each member preached in succession; chapters out of the Old and New Testa., previously agreed upon, were read in the original languages, and their difficulties discussed; reviews and analyses of books read by the members since the previous meeting were given; and dissertations were read on important theological topics, specially on those questions which were then attracting the attention of divines elsewhere, but not becoming the subjects of controversy." Their sermons treated of "the nature and Scriptural terms of the unity of the Christian Church, the nature and mischief of schism, the rights of conscience and of private judgment, the sole dominion of Christ in his own kingdom, the nature, power, and effects of excommunication, and other subjects of that kind." Through Mr. Abernethy the latitudinarian notions on the inferiority of dogmatic belief and the nature of religious liberty, which had obtained currency on the Continent and in England, were introduced into the Presbyterian Church in Ireland. This society held and diligently promulgated their ideas, principal of which are the following: error is innocent when not wilful; that every man's persuasion of what is true and right is the sole rule of his faith and conduct; "that the Church has no right to require candids for the ministry to subscribe to a confession of faith prepared by any man or body of men, and that such a required subscription is a violation of the right of private judgment, and inconsistent with Christian liberty and true Protestantism." There is much evidence which leads one to believe that the society was guilty of the heresy of Arianism; such was the prevalent impression at that time. Such views, held by some of the most learned of the Church, soon caused widespread alarm. The question of subscription became the topic of the day. The controversy was taken to the press, and over fifty pamphlets were published by the members of the society and their opponents. In 1721 the General Synod met at Belfast, when the orthodox Calvinists attempted to enforce subscription. A law to that effect was passed by the synod, to which all conformers were bound of the Belfast Society by the law of 1722. At that time the Belfast Society was principally known by the appellation of non-subscribers. The synod, however, did not now exult, but passed pacific resolutions. The controversy still continued with unabated fury. The non-subscribers formed a presbytery (the Presbytery of Antrim). The subscribers refused communion with the non-subscribers. Finally, in 1726, the synod expelled the non-subscribers, some of whom established independent churches, others lost their following, and ceased from the ministry; thus a most unfortunate quarrel was extinguished, and the Belfast Society passed out of existence. In August, 1727, the Belfast Society published a very valuable work; though partial and one-sided, it contains an elaborate defence of their peculiar views. It contains compilations from original documents, and reports of the synod's debates, which are nowhere else preserved: A Narrative of the Proceedings of Seven General Synods of the Northern Presbyterians in Ireland, with Relation to their Differences in Judgment and Practice, from the Year 1720 to 1726, in which they I n c l e d a n a Synodical Debate. See Reid, Hist of the Church of Scotland, ii, 619 sqq.

Bell, George, a Calvinistic Methodist, who was the first of John Wesley's followers to make a division in the Methodist societies, was a local preacher in Southwark, a man of heated imagination, who said he possessed a miraculous discernment of spirits. His doctrinal sentiments were high Antinomianism, mixed with enthusiasm. He first separated from the Foundery Society, with the Rev. Thomas Maxfield, in February, 1763, and was a member of his church in Princes Street, Moorfield, but soon afterwards set up as preacher himself, and took one of Mr. Wesley's preaching places, situated in Baker's Lane, near Mr. Isaac's Court Inn Lane, London, where he had many followers, and preached there many years. Bell's fanaticism obliged Mr. Wesley to expel him from the Foundery Society. He afterwards prophesied the destruction of the world on a certain day, against which Mr. Wesley preached, as great fear was created by the prophecy. The failure did not discover Bell, who continued his wild enthusiasm. See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, iii, 418-419.

Bell, L. G., a pioneer Presbyterian minister, was born in Augusta County, Va., in 1788. He served in the war of 1812, and entered the ministry in 1827 in Tennessee, but afterwards devoted himself to missionary work in the West, especially in Iowa, where he raised up numerous churches. He died May 29, 1868. See Nevin, Presbyterian Encyclopedia, s.v.

Benkert, Franz Gregor, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born at Nordheim, Sept. 25, 1790, studied at Würzburg, and received holy orders in 1816. In 1819 he took the degree as doctor of divinity, and became a Professor of Theology in the University of Erlangen. This society held and diligently promulgated their ideas, principal of which are the following: error is innocent when not wilful; that every man's persuasion of what is true and right is the sole rule of his faith and conduct; "that the Church has no right to require candidates for the ministry to subscribe to a confession of faith prepared by any man or body of men, and that such a required subscription is a violation of the right of private judgment, and inconsistent with Christian liberty and true Protestantism." There is much evidence which leads one to believe that the society was guilty of the heresy of Arianism; such was the prevalent impression at that time. Bennie, Archibald, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, was born Nov. 1, 1797. He graduated from the Glasgow University, where he obtained three prizes; was licensed to preach in 1820; and appointed to be successor to the First Chapel of Erase, Glasgow, in 1823; promoted to the third charge at Stirling in 1824; presented to the living at Lady Yester's Chapel, Edinburgh, in 1833; appointed a chaplain in ordinary to the queen of England, and a deacon of the Synod of Scotland in 1841; and died at Dunoon, Sept. 21, 1846. He published five sermons from 1825 to 1839: — A Letter to Patrick Arkley, Advocate, Edinburgh (1846) — Discourses, with a Memoir (1847); and he edited, for two years (1860-37), The Edinburgh Christian Instructor. See Fasti Eccles. Scotianae, i, 64; ii, 34.
BENTOVIGLIO

Bentoviglio, CORNELIO, an Italian prelate, was born at Ferrara in 1668. Pope Clement XI made him chaplain, afterwards titular archbishop of Carthage, and legate at the French court. His zeal against the Jansenists gained him the favor of Louis XIV, but when the latter died he was recalled. In 1719 he was made cardinal, and in 1720 legato a latere for Ravenna and the Romagna. Under Benedict XIII he was appointed by the king of Spain, in 1726, as his representative at the imperial court. He died in 1722. See Kaulen, in Wetzlar u. Weite's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Beresford, MARCUS GERVAIS, D.D., an Irish Protestant prelate, was born in 1801. He was educated at Richmond School, Yorkshire, and Trinity College, Cambridge, where he was made bachelor of arts in 1824; appointed rector of Kilclallen in 1825, afterwards vicar of Drumkeeran, and was dressed as a barrister at Kilmore, and archdeacon of Armagh. In 1854 he was consecrated bishop of Kilmore, Elphin, and Ardagh, and in 1863 translated to the see of Armagh, and made primas of Ireland. He died Dec. 26, 1885.

Bernard de Botono. See BERNARD OF POLIGNA (1).

Bernard of Constance, who died March 15, 1099, was teacher at the cathedral-school of Constance. He wrote De Damnatione Schismatium, i. e. Decretorum et Convivum Extra Decretorum Corpus Vogantium. (B. P.)

Bernard of Pavia, a canonist, and bishop of Pavia about 1198, is the author of Brevisarium Extraevangelium, i.e. Decretorum et Convivum Extra Decretorum Corpus Vogantium. (B. P.)

Bernard of Pomerania was a Spanish monk, whose pope Paschal II had appointed bishop of that country. In 1122 he undertook, accompanied by his chaplain and an interpreter, to preach the gospel to the Pomeranians. But the Pomeranians would not recognize him. As he was, however, Bernard was about to cut down the Jul-tree, the tutelary deity of the inhabitants of the city of Julin, the Pomeranians drove him out of their country. In company with his chaplain and interpreter, Bernard retired to Bamberg and induced bishop Otto to undertake the conversion of the Pomeranians, but in a more pompous manner. See Andrea, Albert. S. Michael (prop. Rumi, Vita S. Ottonis, Episc. Bamberg. in Ludw. Scriptor, Rerum Episc. Bamberg. i, 464; Alzog, in Wetzlar u. Weite's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Bernard of Waging, a Benedictine, was born about 1120. He studied at Salzburg and Vena, and joined the Benedictines at Tegernsee in 1446. On account of his piety and learning he was appointed prior of the convent at Tegernsee; hence he is generally called Prior Tegernensis. He now labored for the benefit of his monastery, and for his clergy he wrote Confraternitatem. — Speculum Mortis. — Consolatorius Tri- butatorum. — Remedium Passiosum. — De Consolando Deum. — De Sententia Spiritualibus, etc. For the monks at Wildingen he wrote, in 1456, Contra Eum Carnam; for those at St. Ulrich, in Augsburg, De Ministerio et Contra Viam Propriet. In 1461 he assisted bishop John of Aich in the reformation of the Pergen monastery, and prepared for the clergy, Preparat. ad Missam; Formula Communia; and Specul. Pastorum. With the cardinal Nicolaus of Cuna, with W. Weite's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Beyer, Hartmann, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Frankfurt-on-the-Main, Sept. 30, 1516. He studied at Wittenberg under Luther and Melancthon. In 1545 he was called to his native place as preacher. At that time Calvinism flourished at Frankfurt, and yet Beyer at last succeeded in founding the Lutheran Church of that city. In 1554 he was excommunicated by the Calvinists, but also against the Roman Catholics, Beyer showed his dislike. His sermons, comprising forty-nine volumes, are still preserved in the library of the Church of Frankfurt. He died Aug. 11, 1577. See Stein, in Herzog's Real-Encyklop. s. v. (B. P.)

Bieloborski, Martin, bishop of Kamienie, was born in 1522, and died in 1586 at his episcopal see, which he had occupied since 1577. He was one of the most talented pulpit orators and writers of Poland. The rights of his Church he defended everywhere, especially against heretics. Thus he opposed, in behalf of the Roman Catholic Church, the congregation of 1575 de pace inter dissidentes in religionem iurandum, and pointed out its danger for Church and State. Against "the errors of his time he wrote a catechism (Cracow, 1567). He also wrote against the Socinians (Orthodoxa Confessio de Uno Deo (ibid. 1570), and likewise published Postilla Orthodoxa (ibid. 1581, 1588). See Gotowinski, Hulosteliska, p. 395 sq.; Lewicki, Katalog Bibliotek, etc., ii, 23; Micherski, Hist. Wyznaniu, p. 82; Nowodzierski, Encyklop. Kościelna, s. v.; Lutikol, in Wetzlar u. Weite's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Bickersteth, Robert, D.D., an English prelate, was born at Acton, Suffolck, Aug. 24, 1816. He graduated from Queen's College, Cambridge, in 1841; became curate of Sapcote the same year; of St. Giles, Reading, in 1843; at the parish church of Clapham in 1844; incumbent of St. John's, in the same place, the same year; rector of St. Giles-in-the-Fields in 1851, canon residuary of Salisbury in 1854, and bishop of Epon in 1856, in which office he died, April 15, 1884. He published, Bible Landmarks (1860); — Lectures (1861), besides sermons and charges.

Bigelow, Andrew, D.D. of Providence, the congregational minister, was born at Boylston, Mass., Dec. 13, 1809. He graduated from Amherst College in 1838; studied theology with his half-brother, Rev. Jonathan Bigelow, of Rochester; was ordained pastor at South Dartmouth, Mass., in 1841; in 1847 became pastor at West Newbury, Mass.; in 1848 at Woburn; in 1855 at Medfield; in 1866 acting pastor at Boylston; in 1874 at Southborough; after 1875 he was without charge, and died Sept. 28, 1882. See Cong. Year-book, 1882, p. 19.

Bigelow, John F., D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Paxton, Mass., April 25, 1818. He studied two years at Massachusetts University, and graduated at Amherst College, N. Y.; studied theology first in New York, and completed his education in Berlin, Germany. Soon after his return he became pastor at Bristol, R. I.; subsequently at Middleborough, Mass.; Knoxville, N. Y.; and established a church at St. Albans, Vt. In 1873 he became associated with his brother in conducting the Athenaeum Seminary, Brooklyn, N. Y. He died June 20, 1884. Dr. Bigelow was an eloquent preacher, and a man of scholarly attainments. See The Christian at Work, June 20, 1884. (J. C. S.)

Billich, Urbann, one of the most famous Roman Catholic theologians of the 16th century, was born at Brik, near Düsseldorf, and died in the year 1557. He belonged to the Carmelite order, and was professor at Cologne. When it was intended to call Beier to Cologne, he opposed this movement by publishing his Judicium Universitatis et Clerii Comunium Coloniae (1548). In 1548 he published another polemical work against Protestantism, which was propagated at Cologne, under the title, Judicium Universitatis et Clerii Comunium Coloniae Amundus Philippes Me- lanthochonis, Martini Boveri, etc. In 1546 he was present at the 41st synod of Cologne. Pope Paul IV honored him with the title of bishop of Cyrere. See Hartenich.

Bird, Milton, D.D., a Cumberland Presbyterian minister, was born (Oct. 25, 1867, in Barren County, Ky. In 1898 he established an evangelical and, the next year, visited Western Pennsylvania as a missionary; for some time he was pastor of the Waynesburg congregation, and for several years at Pleasant Hill, Washington Co. In 1849 he became professor of moral and intellectual philosophy and natural theology in the college, but resigned in 1842. Meanwhile he assumed control of the Union Evangelist. For a time he also served as pastor at Uniontown, where he began, in 1845, the publication of the Theological Medium, afterwards the Medium and Quarterly. Besides he preached extensively in Pennsylvania, and his influence became very great. In 1847 he removed to Jeffersonville, Ind., and while residing there took charge of the Book Concern in Louisville, where, in July, 1850, he commenced the publication of the Watchman and Evangelist. In 1855 he became pastor at Frankfort, Ky. For some time, also, he was nominally president of the old Cumberland College. In 1858 he became editor of the St. Louis Observer. When the Civil War began he removed to Jeffersonville, Ind. He was several times moderator of the General Assembly. In 1864 he returned as pastor to Caldwell College, and in 1873 became professor there. In his book, Doctrines of Grace (1856). See Dr. Beards's Biographical Sketches, 2d series, p. 339.

Blake, Mortimer, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Pittston, Me., Jan. 10, 1818. He graduated from Amherst College in 1835; was principal of Franklin Academy, Mass., for three years, while studying theology with Rev. Elam Smally, D.D.; taught in Hopkins Academy, Hadley, one year; was ordained pastor at Mansfield in 1839; installed over Winlow Church, Taunton, in 1855, and died there, Dec. 22, 1884. He published several sermons and addresses. See Cong. Year-book, 1886, p. 20.

Blakeney, Richard Paul, D.D., LL.D., an Anglican divine, was born at Roscommon, Ireland, June 2, 1820. He was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, taking a first-class place in theology in 1843, became cure of St. Paul's, Nottingham, the same year; vicar at Linlithgow, Scotland, in 1859; pastor of Christ Church, Clapham, Birkenhead, in 1852; at Bridlington, Yorkshire, in 1874; canon of Fenton, in York Cathedral, in 1882; and died Jan. 1, 1883. He wrote largely on the Catholic controversy, and was the author of several works on the subject (all otherwise): —Hist. and Interpretation of Common Prayer (1865 and since) — besides very popular Catechisms.

Blakley, Joseph William, an English divine, was born in London in 1808. He graduated in 1831 at Trinity College, Cambridge, of which he was afterwards fellow and tutor; in 1843 became vicar of Ware: in 1863 canon in Canterbury Cathedral; in 1872 dean of Lincoln; and died April 1883. Besides several ecclesiastical honorary positions, he was a member of the Bible Revision Commission, and author of, A Life of Aristotle (1839) — Heroedus, in the Bibliotheca Classica (1854): — Foulis, in Historical and Critical works.

Blanchard, Amos, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born in Massachusetts in 1807. He graduated from Yale College in 1826, studied theology for one year in Andover Seminary, and was ordained Dec. 25, 1828. He was tutor in Yale College in 1828 and 1829, studied for three years theological department there in the same year. He became pastor of the First Church, Lowell, Mass., in 1829; of Kirk Street Church, in the same city, in 1845, and died there, Jan. 14, 1870. See Treni, Cat. of Andover Theol. Sen., 1870, p. 50.

Blanchard, Nikolaus, a Carmelite, was a native of Uberch, and joined his order at Cologne. In 1546 he held a public disputat on the doctrine of purgatory, and was made licentiate of theology; in 1551 he was appointed professor of theology and dean of the theological faculty at Cologne. In the same year he also went to Trent to attend the council there. He died in 1554 at Cologne. He wrote in Latin, Judicium Johannis Calvisi de Summa tur Religiosae Col laborum cum Orthodoxorvm. S. Ecclesiae Catholicae Putram (Cologne, 1551). He also prepared a translation of the Bible in Low German, which was published in 1546. See Stäuber, in Wetter u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Blarer (von Wartensee), Jacob Christoph, a Swiss prelate, was born May 11, 1542. He studied at Freiburg, in Breisgau, and was in 1575 elected prince-bishop of Basle. When Blarer entered upon his duties, he found that Protestantism had greatly advanced in his diocese. But by his perseverance and energy he at last succeeded in restoring the bishopric of Basle. He died April 18, 1608. See Vautrey, Jacques-Chris tophile Blarer de Wartensee, in the Recueil de la Societe Catholique, x, 65-82; Burchhardt, Die Gegenreformation in den ehemaligen Vogteien Zwingies, Heizlingen un d Bischofs Basels Basle, (Basle, 1856); Vautrey, Histoire du College de Porrentruy (Porrentruy, 1866); Fiala, in Wetter u. Böhm, Johann, a German religious fanatic, known under the name "der Pauker von Niklashausen," came before the public in the name of the mother of God, at whose direction he commenced preaching. He was especially severe against the clergy, whom he charged with avarice and other vices. The people, poor as well as rich, flocked from all parts, till at last bishop Rudolf of Würzburg made a prisoner, and ordered him to be burned, July 19, 1476. Bosco, Johannes, a famous Scotist, was born at Antwerp in 1613. For some time he occupied the cathedra S. Petri et S. Geminiani a University in Louvain, where his main work is Theologia Sacramentalia, Scholastica et Moralia ad Mentem Doctrinae Subtilis (Louvain and Antwerp, 1665-85, 6 vols. fol.). After his death some smaller treatises of his were published at Antwerp, with the title, Theologia Spiritualia (1686, 2 vols. fol.). See Scheeben, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Boström, Christoffer Jakob, a Swedish philosopher, was born at Piteå, Jan. 1, 1797. He studied at Upsala, where he also commenced his lectures in 1827, and was appointed his professor in 1862, when he retired from his professorship. He died March 22, 1866. Boström was the most independent thinker of Sweden, and founded a philosophical school, the influence of which has essentially prevented the propagation of materialistic and pessimistic teachings in Sweden. (B. P.)

Botzheim, Johann von, a Swiss theologian, was born at Botzheim, near Schlettstadt. He studied at Heidelberg, and having completed his studies in Italy, where he was made doctor of canon law, he was appointed after his return, in 1512, dean of Constance. In 1516 he became acquainted with some of Luther's writings, and became greatly attached to Luther and his cause. In 1520 he wrote to Luther, encouraging him in his work; but he soon turned his back upon him. In 1527 he was obliged to leave the place, and went to Freiburg, where he died in 1535. He was on very good terms with Erasmus, and it was mainly his influence which led Erasmus to write the Catalogue Elucubratorum. See Dollinger, Reformation, i, 519; Walch, Johann von Botzheim und seine Freunde (Schaafhausen, 1836); Hartmann, in Allgemeine deutsche Biographie, iii, 208; Göpfert, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Bouclet, Stephen, D.D., a Presbyterian minister of Huguenot descent, was born in Cumberland County, Pa., in 1770. He was educated at Dickinson College, and studied theology under Dr. David Rice, of Kentucky. He was licensed in 1796; in 1798 went to Abingdon, Va.; from 1804 he was pastor at Sinking Spring, Pa.; he was also teaching and occasionally making missionary tours into Indiana. In 1837 he removed to Missouri, and died at Paris, Ill., in December, 1840. He was widely influential. See Nevin, Presbyterian Encyclopedia, s. v.

Bouhous, Dominique, a learned French Jesuit, was born at Paris in 1526. At the age of sixteen he joined his order, studied under the care of the Jesuits, and died Jan. 29, 1722. He was an enthusiastic admirer of Mohammed, and a fierce opponent of Christianity. He wrote Réfraction des Eyreurs de B. de Spinoza (Brussels, 1731). See Tenenmann, Geschicthe der Philosophie, x, 486; Erach u. Gruber, Encyclop., xii, 115; Fritz, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Boulavilliers, Henri, count of, a French philosopher, was born at St. Saire, in Normandy, Oct. 11, 1654, and died Jan. 29, 1722. He was an enthusiastic admirer of Mohammed, and a fierce opponent of Christianity. He wrote Réfraction des Eyreurs de B. de Spinoza (Brussels, 1731). See Tenenmann, Geschicthe der Philosophie, x, 486; Erach u. Gruber, Encyclop., s. v.; Hefele, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Boulanger, Nicolas Antoine, who belonged to the French encyclopedists, was born in 1722, and died in 1759. He was an opponent of Christianity and of all revelation, and wrote, L'Antiquité Dissolue par ses Causes (Amsterdam, 1766; Germ. trans., Greifswald, 1791), and Ete-Ete Ete-Ete (1755). To him is also ascribed the authorship of Examen Critique de la Vie et des Événements de St. Paul (London, 1770), as well as Le Christianisme Dissous et L'Histoire Critique de la Vie de Jesus Christ, in Antike Erinnerungen der Evangelisten (cxl.), which were probably written by his friend Holbach. His works were collected (Paris, 1791, 10 vols.; 1792, 8 vols.; Amsterdam, 1794, 6 vols.). See Hefele, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Bower, Edwin Rea, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Lancaster County, Pa., Sept. 5, 1825. He joined the Church when eighteen years of age, and was graduated from College, the next year, when he retired from New College. He spent one year in teaching, graduated from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1855, acting one year also as tutor in his alma mater; was ordained pastor at Wappinger's Falls, N. Y., in 1855; installed over the Second Church, Springfield, O., in 1861; elected president of the board of trustees of Lincoln University, Pa., in 1865; and was a member of the board of directors of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, and was bishop in that office, April 7, 1883. See Necrolo. Reprot of Princeton Theol. Sem., 1884, p. 40.

Boyd, Archibald, D.D., an Anglican divine, was born at Londonderry, Ireland, in 1803. After passing through the diocesan college of that city, he graduated from Trinity College, Dublin, in 1823; became canon of the cathedral at Derry in 1827; of Christ Church, Cheltenham, in 1842; canon of Gloucester cathedral in 1857, vicar of Paddington in 1859, and dean of Exeter in 1867, a position in which he died, July 11, 1883. He was the author of several works on ecclesiastical law, and died March 27, 1888. See Boynton, Charles Brandon, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at West Stockbridge, Mass., June 12, 1806. After spending one year (1827) at Williams College, and some years in business and legal practice, he studied theology with Rev. Dr. Woodbridge of Speciertown, N. Y.; was ordained associate pastor at Housatonic, Mass., in 1840, and installed there in 1842; acting pastor at Lansingburg, N. Y., in 1845; at Vine Street, Cincinnati, O., in 1846; pastor at South Church, Pittsfield, Mass., in 1856; again at Cincinnati in 1858; at Washington, D. C., in 1865, at the same time acting as chaplain of the House of Representatives; a third term in Cincinnati, from 1873 to 1877, and finally without charge there until his death, April 27, 1888. He published several books of travel and history. See Conn. Year-book, 1864, p. 20.

Braman, Milton Palmer, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at New Rowley (now Georgetown), Mass., Aug. 6, 1799. He graduated from Harvard College in 1819, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1824; was pastor at Danvers from 1826 until 1832, and thereafter resided successively at Brighton and Auburndale until his death, April 10, 1892. He published several sermons and addresses. See Conn. Year-book, 1892, p. 19.

Brassicanus, Johann Alexander, an opponent of the reformation, belonged to a family of Contarese, originally named Kohorn Kees, which, however, took the Latin name of Brassicanus in the 15th century. In 1493 a certain Johannes Kees, called Brassicanus, was promoted at Tübingen; he was Melanchthon's teacher, and is probably the father of Johann, who was professor at Ingolstadt in 1525. At first Alexander belonged to the secret adherents of Luther, but his patriotic studies made him soon a decided opponent of the Reformation. In 1524 he was called to Vienna, where he died Nov. 27, 1329. See Dollinger, Information, i, 529 sq.; Hefele, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Braun, Jacob, a Benedictine, was born in 1756 at Peving, in Upper Bavaria. In 1775 he entered the monastery of St. Ulric, at Augsburg, and, having charge of the library, published Notitia Hist. Litt. de ab Lustr. (Aug.-Vind. 1777), and Notitia Hist. Litt. de Coloniens M.S. et Ill. Monasterii Exstantibus (1791-96, 6 vols.). In 1808 he was made member of the Bavarian Academy of Sciences, and edited Codex Diplom. Monasterii S. Callistini (in the Mon. Boicen, tom. xxii, xxiii), and collected the Codex Episcopatus Augsburgensis. He also published a history of the bishops of Augsburg, in four volumes.
BREMER

(Ansgar, 1818-15.) He died Oct. 29, 1829. See Lindner, Schriftsteller des Bem, Orden in Bayern seit 1750 (Regensburg, 1880), ii. 124; Streeber, in Wetzer u. Weite's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

BREMER, FRIEDRICH, a Roman Catholic theologian of Bavaria, was born at Bamberg, Jan. 10, 1784. In 1807 he took holy orders, and in 1808 he received the degree of doctor of divinity. In 1813 he was appointed subdirector of the clerical seminary at Bamberg. In 1820, its director, at the same time occupying the chair of dogmatics at the same university. In 1821 he became a member of the newly founded chapter, in 1844 its dean, and died Aug. 29, 1846. He wrote Versuch einer historisch-philosophischen Darstellung der Oeffentlichkeit (1810):—Katholische Dogmatik (1815-17, and often, 3 vols.):—Geschichtliche Darstellung der Verbreitung und Auswendung der Sacramente (1818-24, 3 vols.).—Das Gericht, etc. (1829). Brown, Andrew, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, was born at Biggar, Aug. 22, 1703. He became tutor in the Cranston family: was licensed to preach in 1786; ordained in 1787 minister to the Presbyterian congregation at Halifax, Nova Scotia: admitted minister at Lochmaben, Scotland, in 1793; transferred to New Greyfriars, Edinburgh, in 1799; promoted to the Old Church in 1800; appointed professor of rhetoric and belles-lettres in the university in 1801, which he held in conjunction; elected moderator of the General Assembly in 1813, and died Feb. 19, 1834. He was characterized by elegant composition, unobtrusive manners, and kindly disposition. He published a series of sermons, and the Life of Alexander Christison. See Fasti Eccles. Scoitana, i, 72, 71, 360, 642.

Brown, John, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in New York city, May 19, 1731. He graduated from Columbia College in 1811, and was ordained in 1812. He was rector of St. George's Church, Newburgh, from 1815 until his death, Aug. 15, 1884.

Brown, Mrs. Phoebe Hindeale (her maiden name), a poetess, was born at Canaan, N. Y., May 1, 1773. She had no early education; married a painter of Edinburgh, Conn.; lived a humble and painful, but Christian life, and died at Marshall, Ill., Oct. 10, 1861. Among her hymns the most noted is "I love to steal awhile away," written in 1818, and included with others in Nettleton's Hymn Book (1824). She also wrote for the newspapers, and was the author of several tracts and a series of tales, entitled The Tree and its Fruits (N. Y., 1832). See Independent, Jan. 6, 1881.

Brown, Samuel Gilman, D.D., L.L.D., a Congregational divine, was born at North Yarmouth, Me., Jan. 4, 1813. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1831, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1837; was principal of Elingtonton (Conn.) High-school in 1832 and 1833, and of Abbot Academy, Andover, from 1833 to 1838; spent two years the latter place, became professor at Dartmouth College in 1840, president of Hamilton College in 1867, instructor at Dartmouth College in 1881, at Bowdoin College in 1883, and died, Nov. 4, 1885, at Utica, N. Y. He had been ordained in 1852, but was without a church. He was the author of numerous works of a popular character, chiefly biographies and addresses. See Corp. Year-book, 1886, p. 20.

Brown, William Lawrence, D.D., a Scotch clergyman (son of the professor of divinity and Church History at St. Andrews), was born at Urachy, where his father was minister, Jan. 7, 1755. He graduated from the University of St. Andrews in 1772, was licensed to preach in 1777, ordained for the English congregation at Urachy, and appointed professor of moral philosophy at the University in 1788. Being threatened by the revolutionary army of France, he fled to England, and in 1797 was elected minister at Great Marischal, Aberdeen, in 1798, and promoted to be principal of Marischal College, which he held in conjunction; was appointed one of the chaplains in ordinary to the king in 1800, dean of the Order of the Thistle in 1803, re- signed the living at Greyfriar's in 1829, and died May 11, 1830. He was a man of great talents and gifts, with warmth of temper, he was open, sincere, and generous, exercising unbounded liberality. He published, An Essay on the Folly of Suspicion (London, 1788); Oratio de Religiosis et Philosophic Societate et Concordiae Maxima Substantia (Utrecht, 1786); Oratio Inaugurale in Vitae Institutione Regna (ibid. 1790); Essay on the Natural Equality of Mankind (Edinburgh, 1793); seven single sermons (Lond. ed.);—Speech in the General Assembly on the Settlement at Kingbaurns of the Rev. Dr. Atkin (Edinburgh, 1800);—Letters on the Principal Hill (Aberdeen, 1801);—Sermon (Edinburgh, 1805);—A Letter to Principal Hill (1807);—Philosophy or, The Progress of Virtue, a poem (1809, 2 vols.);— An Attempt towards a New Historical and Political Explanation of the Revelation (1812);—An Essay on the Existence of a Supreme Creator (Ayrshire Church, Edinburgh, 1812, 2 vols., for which was adjuted Bennett's prize of £1,250);—A Comparative View of Christianity (Edinburgh, 1826, 2 vols.). Brunner, Karl, a Swiss theologian and architect, was born at Hemberg, in the Treuggut, in 1831.
BRUNSON

He studied at Zurich and Tübingen. At the latter university he became a zealous disciple of the thirteenth-century "Thomistic school," to which he remained faithful until his death, although throughout his life he maintained friendly intercourse with men of all parties. His first ministerial duty was at Kappel, where he served as vicar. In 1856 he was elected pastor of Heilig Blut, a parish in Appenzell, and in 1864 he was called to the cantonal school of Appenzell, at Troggen, and in 1867 invited to become rector of the gymnasium at Biel. In 1873 the government of Aargau invited him to take charge of its rich archives, a task which he readily accepted. He devoted the remainder of his life, without, however, attaining the great object—the complete organization of the archives of the illustrious "gau" of the Aar. He died Jan. 26, 1891. (B.P.)

BRUNSON, ALFRED, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Danbury, Conn., Feb. 9, 1798. He was educated in the common-schools and trained as a shoemaker; converted July 8, 1809, while living with an uncle at Carlisle, Pa., and licensed to exhort. Returning to Connecticut the same year, he settled at Bridgeport and began to hold religious services. In 1812 he removed to Ohio, and entered the army under General Arthur St. Clair, and in 1813 was commissioned chaplain of the Thirty-first Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, but resigned on account of failing health one year later. He remained on the superannuated list until 1829, when he again became effective. He travelled until the fall of 1872, when he was superannuated for the last time. He was four times elected a member of the General Conference, and closed his remarkable career at Prairie du Chien, Aug. 3, 1882. He was a frequent contributor to the secular and religious journals, and especially to the Methodist Quarterly Review. He published his autobiography in two volumes, entitled The Western Pioneer, and also A Key to the Apocalypse. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1882, p. 308.

BRUS, ANTON, a Bohemian prelate, was born at Mlgitz, in Moravia, Feb. 13, 1518. He studied at Prague, where he also received holy orders. In the war against the Turks, 1542-45, he was Austrian chaplain. In 1558 the emperor, Ferdinand I, made him bishop of Vienna, and in 1562 he was raised to the arch-episcopal see of Prague. He also attended the council at Trent. He died Aug. 28, 1580. See Österreichische Vereinsfassung für Katholische Theologie (Vienna, 1874), where his biography is given; Borovy, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchenlexicon, s.v. (B.P.)

BÜCHSCHNITZ, LEWIS JACOB THORDOR, a Lutheran minister of Germany, was born March 20, 1814. In 1846 he entered upon his first ministerial duties, and in 1858 was appointed superintendent of the Lützelspring district, which he was removed to Weyer, the centre of his diocese, where he laboured for twenty-three years zealously defending the sacred rights of evangelical faith. He died July 6, 1882. (B.P.)

BUGBEE, LUCIUS H., D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Gwenn, N. T., Nov. 23, 1860. He was educated in boyhood, licensed as an exhorter at eighteen, graduated from Geese College in 1853 and Amherst College in 1854, became teacher in Coopers-town Academy in 1856, joined the Upper Iowa Conference in 1857, and was appointed president of its university; in 1869 was transferred to the Rock River Conference, and served in important stations; in 1865 became president of the Female College, Evans- ton, Ill.; in 1868 that in Cincinnati; in 1875 of Allegheny College; being then transferred to the Pittsburgh Conference, in which, in 1882, he was appointed to Monongahela city, but his health failed, and he died at Pittsburgh, Pa., and in Washington, D.C.; in 1845 became pastor at Nashua, N.H.; in 1852 at Dover, Mass.; and died at Cambridge, Oct. 12, 1870. He published several prose works, as well as Poems (Charleston, S. C., 1844). See Duyckinck, Cyclop. of Amer. Lit., ii, 345.

BURGNY, JEAN LEVESQUE, a French historian, was born at Rhems in 1892, and died at Paris, Oct. 18, 1788. He wrote, Traité de L'Autorité du Pope (1730, 4 vols.);

BURLEIGH, WILLIAM HENRY, a reformer and poet, was born at Woodstock, Conn., Feb. 2, 1812. He early became a temperance and anti-slavery lecturer; removed to Pittsburgh, Pa., in 1847, where he published the Christian Witness, and served as editor of the Temperance Banner; in 1843 to Hartford, Conn., as editor of the Christian Freeman, soon known as the Charter Oak; in 1849 to Albany, N. Y., as editor of the Prohibitionist; in 1855 to New York city as harbor-master, and subsequently as one of the principal hosts. He died at Brooklyn, N. Y., Oct. 18, 1871. He was the author of Poems (Philadelphia, 1841; enlarged, with biography by his wife, New York, 1871). See Duyckinck, Cyclop. of Amer. Lit., ii, 859.

BURS, JOHN, D.D., a minister of the Methodist Protestant Church, was born in 1807. He was an honored member of the Maskingum Conference, and was one of the signers of his denomination's declaration of independence; was an able preacher, had good executive ability, and wherever he was stationed the Church prospered. For some years he was chaplain of the Ohio Penitentiary. He died at Cadiz, Sept. 12, 1883. See The Methodist Recorder, Sept. 22, 1883.

BYRD, See BURKE.

BYRON, JOHN, an English poet, was born at Kernall, near Manchester, in 1802. After studying at Merchant-Taylors School in London, he graduated from Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1711, became a fellow there, travelled in France, next gave lessons in stenography in London, and at length settled upon his native estate, and died there, Sept. 28, 1788. He was of a mystical turn, and besides various miscellaneous essays and pieces, he published Hymns and Sacred Poems (1739; reprinted 1773, 1814, and in his collected poems, 1857), some of which are quite popular.

CAMPAGNOLO. We notice two other members of this family.

1. ALEANDRO, son of Lorenzo, was born at Bologna in 1504. He was educated by the most learned men of Italy, and was appointed, in 1526, by pope Clement VII, as his father's successor in the bishopric of Bologna. The ninth and tenth sessions of the Tridentine Council were held in his palace. Pope Julius III made him cardinal in 1551. He died Sept. 20, 1554.

CAMPANUS, ETIENNE, a French Jansenist and prelate, was born Nov. 16, 1682. In 1660 he was already a doctor of the Sorbonne, but his unchristian walk brought on him the disfavor of Mazarin, and he was banished. Prince Conti, governor of Paris, received him, and brought him under the influence of the Jansenist bishop, Pavillon of Alet. Louis XIV made him, in 1671, archbishop of Grenoble. In 1686 pope Innocent XI made him cardinal, and he was present, in 1700, at the concord held at Rome for the election of Clement XI. He died in 1707. He founded a clerical seminary at Grenoble. See Gallus Christ, xvi, 255; Guarnacci, Hist. Pont. Rom. et Curd. i, 237; Loyson, L'Assemblée de 1682, p. 188-205; Arnauld, Oeuvres, i, 698 sq.; Ritter, in Wetzer u. Wetl's Kirchenlexikon, s. v. (B. CAMPBELL, WILLIAM GRAHAM, D.D., an Irish Wesleyan preacher, was born near Sligo in 1805. He was converted in 1822, and soon began preaching, his first regular appointment being the Killeshandre circuit, in 1821. He succeeded in twenty-five years of great power in the general work. He died Feb. 24, 1885. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1885, p. 35. XII—34

CAMPBELL, J. M'CLOED, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, son of the minister at Klinburn, born May 4, 1800, was presented to the living at Row in 1825, and ordained; deposed in May, 1831, for teaching universal atonement and pardon, also that assurance is necessary to salvation. He continued teaching these doctrines to his followers, first at Klinburn, and afterwards in a chapel at Glasgow until 1837. He died at Roseheath, Feb. 27, 1872. His publications were, Sermons (1831, 2 vols.); Notes of Sermons; Speech at the Bar of the Blynd (ed.); Letters on Keeping a Conscience Void of Offence (1834); Christ the Bread of Life (Edinburgh, 1851); Atonement (1854); Nature of the Atone- ment (1856); Thoughts on Revolution (1862). CAMPAGNOLO. We notice two other members of this family.

1. ALEANDRO, son of Lorenzo, was born at Bologna in 1504. He was educated by the most learned men of Italy, and was appointed, in 1526, by pope Clement VII, as his father's successor in the bishopric of Bologna. The ninth and tenth sessions of the Tridentine Council were held in his palace. Pope Julius III made him cardinal in 1551. He died Sept. 20, 1554.

CAMPANUS, ETIENNE, a French Jansenist and prelate, was born Nov. 16, 1682. In 1660 he was already a doctor of the Sorbonne, but his unchristian walk brought on him the disfavor of Mazarin, and he was banished. Prince Conti, governor of Paris, received him, and brought him under the influence of the Jansenist bishop, Pavillon of Alet. Louis XIV made him, in 1671, archbishop of Grenoble. In 1686 pope Innocent XI made him cardinal, and he was present, in 1700, at the concord held at Rome for the election of Clement XI. He died in 1707. He founded a clerical seminary at Grenoble. CAMPBELL, J. M'CLOED, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, son of the minister at Klinburn, born May 4, 1800, was presented to the living at Row in 1825, and ordained; deposed in May, 1831, for teaching universal atonement and pardon, also that assurance is necessary to salvation. He continued teaching these doctrines to his followers, first at Klinburn, and afterwards in a chapel at Glasgow until 1837. He died at Roseheath, Feb. 27, 1872. His publications were, Sermons (1831, 2 vols.); Notes of Sermons; Speech at the Bar of the Blynd (ed.); Letters on Keeping a Conscience Void of Offence (1834); Christ the Bread of Life (Edinburgh, 1851); Atonement (1854); Nature of the Atonement (1856); Thoughts on Revolution (1862). his appointments were located. He was a most faithful and laborious pastor. Besides the history of his early years, called My Boy Life, he published several small volumes, a number of pamphlets and magazine articles, especially Cases and his Contemporaries (Toronto, 1897, 5 vols.). See Christian Guardian, Dec. 17, 1894.

Cashmerian Version of the Scriptures. Of late the work of translation into this dialect has again been resumed, for the annual report of the British and Foreign Bible Society for 1884 states that the Rev. T. B. Tringham, now of Amritsar, has completed the translation of the New Test, on which he has been engaged for six years, and in the annual report of the same society for 1886 we read that the New Test. has been published. (B. F.)

Caswell, Edward, an English clergyman and poet, was born at Tatchery, in Hampshire, July 16, 1814. He was educated at Brasenose College, Oxford, ordained presbyter in 1839, in 1840 became curate of Stratford-under-Castle, in 1847 joined the Roman Catholic Church, and died Jan. 2, 1878. Besides several prose works, he published metrical translations of many medieval hymns, entitled Lyra Catholic (1848), and other poetical effusions, collected in Hymns and Poems (1878).

Catholic Emancipation, an enactment to relieve Roman Catholics of the civil and religious disabilities imposed by the laws passed in the time, chiefly, of Elizabeth. These forbade a Catholic priest receiving a neophyte into the Church in England under penalty of death; Jesuits forfeited life by appearing in the country; no man could plead at law or become a schoolmaster, or hold any office, especially in Ireland, without taking the oaths of supremacy and against transubstantiation. All this was abolished by the act of parliament of April 28, 1829, since which time Catholics and Protestants have enjoyed equal protection and liberty before the law.

Cawood, John, an English clergyman and poet, was born at Matlock, Derbyshire, March 18, 1775. He graduated from St. Edmund's Hall, Oxford, in 1801; became curate at Ribbesford, Dowses, and Bewdley, and died Nov. 7, 1872. Besides several prose works, he published occasional hymns, a number of which were inserted in Cotterill's collection, and the one beginning "Hark, what mean those holy voices," has become especially popular.

Chandler, George Clinton, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Chester, Vt., March 19, 1807. He was baptized in 1825, and licensed to preach in 1881; graduated from Madison University in 1883, and from Newton Theological Institution in 1888; preached as a missionary among the Indians, and at Terre Haute, Ind.; became pastor at Indianapolis in 1889, president of Franklin College in 1884, in 1850 of the new Baptist college in Oregon, but soon resumed missionary work; became pastor at Dallas in 1874, and died there in November of the same year. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop., s. v.

Chandler, John, an English clergyman and poet, was born at Witley, in Surrey, June 16, 1806. He graduated from Corpus Christi College, Oxford, in 1827; became vicar of Witley in 1837; afterwards rural dean, and died at Putney, July 1, 1876. Besides some prose productions, he published translations called Hymns of the Primitive Church (1857), of which several have been included in most hymnals.

Channing, William Henry, a Unitarian divine, nephew of Dr. William E. Channing, was born in Boston, May 25, 1810. He graduated from Harvard College in 1829, and from Cambridge Divinity School in 1833; was ordained in 1839; successively served independent congregations at Medford (Pa.), New York city, Cincinnati, O., Nashua, N. H., Boston, Mass., Rochester, N. Y., and Liverpool, Eng., and finally resided without charge in London until his death, Dec. 24, 1884. He edited various journals, wrote frequently for the reviews, and was the author of several sermons and memoirs, particularly of his uncle (1848, 3 vols.).

Chaplin, Charles Crawford, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Danville, Va., Sept. 22, 1831. He was converted in 1858, spent two years in Richmond College, became pastor at Danville in 1856, at Owensborough, Ky., in 1870, at Paducah in 1873, and died at Brenham, Texas, Nov. 2, 1884. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop., s. v.

Chaplin, Robert Martin, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at Petersburg, Va., April 20, 1810. He was ten years president of the State University, Vincennes, Ind.; rector successively at Jef fersonville, Ind., Pewee Valley, Ky., Sacramento and Oakland, Cal.; and died at Los Gatos, April 8, 1883.

Chase, Benjamin, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Litchfield, N. H., Nov. 20, 1799. He graduated from Middlebury College in 1814, and labored as a missionary in Louisiana; in 1828 took charge of "Carmel Church," ten miles south of Natchez, Miss.; in 1830 became Bible-agent in the South-western states; in 1840 deserted in health, and died Oct. 11, 1870. See Nevin, Presbyterian Encyclopedia, s. v.

Christian, James W., D.D., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Merriweather County, Ga., in 1844. He was converted in early manhood, licensed to preach in 1868, admitted into the Alabama Conference in 1873, labored on the Frederica Circuit, at Monticello, and at Birmingham; was appointed editor of the Alabama Christian Advocate in 1881, and died Oct. 7, 1882. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1889, p. 79.

Clarke, Dorus, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Westminster, Mass., Jan. 2, 1797. He graduated from Williams College in 1817, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1820; was pastor at Blanford, Mass., from 1823 to 1825; at Chicopee Falls, from 1835 to 1840; editor thereafter of various religious journals, and died March 8, 1894. He was the author of numerous popular works. See Cong. Year-book, 1895, p. 20.

Clarkson, Robert Harper, D.D., LL.D., a bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born at Gettysburg, Pa., Nov. 19, 1825. He graduated from Pennsylvania College in 1844, and studied theology at St. James's College; was ordained deacon in 1848; became rector of St. James's Church, Chicago, in 1849; was consecrated bishop of Nebraska, Nov. 15, 1865, and died March 10, 1894.

Colleges, American. The methods of organization and instruction adopted in these institutions naturally grew out of those pursued in the educational establishments of the mother country, especially the great universities of Oxford and Cambridge, in which the colleges possessed subordinate or detailed offices. See Universities, European. In a few, chiefly the older and better-endowed colleges of the Eastern and Middle States, the original academic foundation has gradually expanded into a fully-developed university, and in many of the newer institutions the entire curriculum has been laid out for future completion; hence the use of the title "university" has been not altogether inappropriate, although few American educational incorporations cover the entire field of liberal arts and learned professions. In one instance, the University of the State of New York, the European idea has been substantially adopted, but without any local appurtenances of buildings, teachers, or personal instruction. Special schools of technical training are generally relied upon to supplement the literary course in the departments of law, medicine, engineering, etc. See Technical Seminaries. In many of the newer colleges of America, and in a few of the older ones, ladies are now admitted to the full privileges and honors of study and graduation, and there are numerous institutions, often styled "Female Colleges," in which women exclusively have nearly equal literary advantages, besides the ornamental branches more appropriate to their sphere. The honorary degrees (A.B., etc.) are in America sometimes conferred by schools which in reality are little above the rank of ordinary "academies." See Education.

The following tables are compiled from the Report of the (U.S.) Commissioner of Education for 1888-84 (the latest return). Detailed information on nearly all the colleges may be found in Kiddle and Schem's Cyclopaedia of Education, under the title of each.

COAN, Titus, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Killingworth, Conn., Feb. 1, 1801. He joined the Presbyterian Church at Riga, N. Y., in 1829; studied privately, graduated from Auburn Theological Seminary in 1838, was ordained the same year a missionary to Patagonia, in 1855 went to Hawaii, where he labored with great success at Hilo until his death, Dec. 1, 1882. Besides some tracts, essays, etc., he published Adventures in Patagonia (1860)—Life in Hawaii (1882). See Cong. Year-book, 1884, p. 21.

Cochran, William Porter, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Millerton, Pa., Nov. 10, 1803. He graduated from Dickinson College in 1824, and from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1827; was ordained an evangelist in 1829, became stated supply at Columbus, Mo., the same year, at Palmyra in 1854, at Big Creek in 1861, pastor there in 1865, preached in various places, was pastor of a church in New York in 1867, and evangelist from 1869 until his death near West Ely, Mo., Dec. 25, 1884. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem., 1885, p. 14.

Cooker, Benjamin Franklin, D.D., LL.D., a Methodist Episcopal divine, was born in Yorkshire, England, in 1821. He was brought up as a Wesleyan, converted in early life, and at eighteen became a local preacher. He was educated at King James's Grammar-school for one of the learned professions, but after spending several years in business in England, and from 1850 several more in Australia, he came to America in 1866, settled at Adrian, Mich., and the next year joined the Detroit Conference, being sent to Palmyra; the following year was stationed at Adrian, afterwards at Ypsilanti, Ann Arbor, and Adrian; and in 1869 was appointed professor of philosophy in Michigan University, a position which he retained until his death, April 8, 1888. He was a fine scholar and a brilliant writer. He was the author of Christianism and Greek Philology:—Aesthetic Conception of the World:—Student's Hand-book of Philosophy. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1885, p. 315.

Coggshall, Samuel D., D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Lynn, Mass., Feb. 18, 1811. He was converted in early life, and immediately began to preach; was admitted in 1822 into the New England Conference, in which and (after 1840) in the Providence (now the New England Southern) Conference he occupied important positions until his death, Oct. 9, 1888. By private studies he acquired a good degree of scholar, and was well known as a local preacher. He was the author of Christianism and Greek Philology:—Aesthetic Conception of the World:—Student's Hand-book of Philosophy. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1886, p. 90.

Cott, Thomas Winthrop, D.D., LL.D., a Protestant Episcopal divine, was born at New London, Conn., Nov. 26, 1805. He graduated from Yale College in 1821; became rector of St. Peter's, Salem, Mass., in 1827; of Christ Church, Cambridge, in 1829; of Trinity Church, New Rochelle, N. Y., in 1839; afterwards of St. Paul's Church, Troy; president of Transylvania University, Lexington, Ky.; professor of Trinity College, Hartford, in 1844, of Hartford Divinity School, Hartford, Conn., in 1872, and remained in that position until his death, June 21, 1885. He was the author of, Theological Commonplace Book (1822, 1857).—Remarks on Norton's Statement of Reasons, etc. (1888).—Bible in Ephesians.

Cottrell, Thomas, an English clergyman and poet, was born at Canock, Staffordshire, Dec. 4, 1773. He was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge; ordained in 1806; labored in the ministry successively at Tutbury, Lane End, in the Staffordshire potteries, and at St. Paul's, Sheffield (1817), until his death, Dec. 29, 1829. Besides a book of family prayers, he published (aided by James Montgomery) a Selection of Psalms and Hymns (1819), among which the version of Ps. ciii., beginning "O bless the Lord, my soul," has become especially popular. Mrs. M. J. Cotterill's hymn, "O thou who hast at thy command, The hearts of all men in thy hand, from the same collection.

Cotton, Nathaniel, an English physician and poet, was born in 1767. He studied medicine at Leyden under Boerhaave; established an asylum for lunatics first at Dunstable, Bedfordshire, and afterwards at St. Albans, and died Aug. 2, 1788. Besides two medical books, he published Visions in Verse (1751, and since). His works, both in verse and prose, were edited by his son (1791, 2 vols.).

Cowley, Abraham, an English poet, was born in London in 1618, and educated at Westminster School, and Trinity College, Cambridge. In 1648 he was compelled to retire to Oxford on account of his royalistic sentiments, and afterwards lived in England for ten years, and spent the rest of his life in studious retirement. He died at Chertsey, July 28, 1667. Besides some scientific and philosophical treatises, he published many poems, which, however, are now little valued.

Crake, James, D.D., LL.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at Alexandria, Va., in 1806. He graduated from the Transylvania University; practiced law at Kanawha, W. Va.; was ordained in 1839; was rector five years at Weston, and thereafter of Christ Church, Louisville, Ky., until his death, June 9, 1852. He was president of the General Convention in 1865, 1868, 1871, and 1874, and for many years a member of the standing committee of the diocese of Kentucky.

Crane, William Cary, D.D., LL.D., a Baptist minister and educator, was born at Richmond, Va., March 17, 1816. He graduated from Columbian College, D. C., was converted in 1832, and ordained in 1838; was pastor successively at Montgomery, Ala., Columbus, Vicksburg, and Yazoo City, Miss., from 1839 to 1851; in 1863 president of Baylor University, Texas, and died Feb. 26, 1885. Crossman, Samuel, an English clergyman and poet, was born at Bradley, Suffolk, in 1824; became prebendary of the first stall at Bristol in 1667, dean in 1688, and died Feb. 4, 1684. Besides Sermons, he published The Young Man's Meditations (1664, 1683), which contains several popular hymns.

Cruelty to Animals is a subject which has lately attracted much public attention from moralists and legislators. The principle upon which owners are restrained from exercising unnecessary severity in the treatment of their beasts is not, as often imagined, because brutes have any moral rights in themselves, but because society requires to be protected from exhibitions of cruelty, inasmuch as these not only outrage the feelings of humane spectators, but also tend to generate ferocity in the individuals who practice such excess, and thus render them dangerous to their fellow-beings.
On this ground Christianity, as soon as it succeeded in gaining a footing among the Roman emi
pire, abolished the atrocious customs of the amphitheatre, not even allowing beasts to contend with each other in mortal combat for the amusement of the populace; and the same benign influence has nearly banished the bull-fight, the cock-pit, and pigeon-shooting, as sports, from Christendom. Wanton infliction of suffering is at variance with the fundamental law of the Gospel, and invariably reacts with injury upon its perpetrator. Even criminals are not to be executed with needless severity, nor with prolonged or aggregate useless torture. Pain is inflicted both with and that of intense character, but never unnecessarily
nor for the gratification of revenge, malice, or barbarity.
The heavenly Father himself, like the wise surgeon, cuts keenly and cauterizes sorely, but only for the good of the sufferers. So the human lord of creation has a right to take the life of inferior creatures when this is subservient to his own or others' important advantage, but he is not authorized to superadded torture. The modern laws passed in most Christian countries to prevent cruelty to animals have this principle for their only legitimate foundation. Hence they should be judicially administered, so as not rashly to interfere with the proper rights of ownership, nor subject parties to vexatious interference. The practice of vivisection for scientific and medical purposes has especially been, in our judgment, unduly restrained by some of the enact-m ents in certain states as well as in Great Britain.
The valuable information to be acquired by this means alone should not be lost for squeamish regard to nervous individuals, who are not compelled nor expected to witness such operations. Provided no unnecessary amount of pain be caused, and the animal, nor any aggravating cir-stances introduced into the operation, these experiments should be fostered by the statute law, rather than repressed. They ought doubtless to be placed under regulation, but not prohibited. They should, of course, be performed in private, and by scientific practitioners.
When carried on properly they are a means of mercy and not an act of inhumanity.

Curtis, Richard Augustus, D.D., a Presbyterian clergyman, was born at Millington, Pa., July 15, 1808.
He graduated from Washington College in 1834, and from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1837; was licensed to preach in 1842, and became supply at various churches in New Jersey, Ohio, and Georgia until 1842, after which he was pastor of several churches successively, in Pennsylvania chiefly, teaching occasionally at the same time until 1875, when he retired to Indiana. He died there, March 26, 1883. See Necrol.

Currey, George, D.D., an English divine, was born in London, April 7, 1816, and educated at Charterhouse School and St. John's College, Cambridge, graduating in 1838. He became a fellow of the latter in 1859, in 1840 a lecturer, in 1844 a tutor, in 1845 White-

the age of 14. He graduated at Harvard College in 1830, and at the University of Dublin and Glasgow, and finally at Leipzig; in 1858 took charge of the Baptist Theological Institution at Montreal, Canada; and in 1844 was made professor in McGill College, Montreal; in 1837 in Steppen College; then removed to Regent's Park, London, and died July 19, 1875. He was active in philological and Biblical labors, and published numerous works in that line. He was a member of the Bible Revision Committee. See (Lond.) Bapt. Hand-book, 1876, p. 941.

Davies, Sir John, an English writer, was born at Tisbury, Wiltshire, in 1670. He graduated from Queen's College, Oxford, in 1590, studied law, became a member of Parliament in 1601, in 1608 solicitor-general of Ireland, in 1596 chief-justice in Ireland, in 1616 returned to Ireland, and died Dec. 7, 1626. Besides several po-

(First Church), in 1817, at Utica (Second Church) in 1829, at Auburn, New York City, in 1833, and at Auburn from 1833 to 1838, in Illinois in 1838, was pastor successively at Utica, Syracuse, and Auburn until 1846, of churches in New York city and Brooklyn until 1855, and died March 19, 1857. He was also a professor in Auburn Theological Seminary from 1821 to 1826. See Nevins, Presb. Encyclop. a. v.

Dismembered State of the Soul after Death. In our almost total ignorance of the essential nature, whether of matter or spirit, and of the bond of union between them in the human constitution, we are able to predicate very little with certainty respecting the condition of the soul after its separation from the body. Neither science nor revelation affords us much positive information on the subject. After all the long and earnest inquiries of Christian as well as pagan philosophers a few general points only have been definitely ascertained. They may, be in fact, be summed up in the two following propositions. See PSYCHOLOGY.

In all Conditions of the Body. — The continuity of its intellectual and emotional powers is indeed essential to its identity. If not to its very existence, for we can form no conception of a dismembered spirit where these are absent. The so-called "soul sleep" is a contradiction in terms, for literal sleep is a state of the body rather than of the mind, or, at least, a status of the latter superinduced by a certain condition of the former. In like manner all the analogies based upon temporary unconsciousness by reason of accidents or disease during life are false and self-confuted, since the very relation of corporeity upon which they are hypothecated is absent in the premises. It is scientifically certain that all such comatose or insensible states are merely the result of injury or inaction on the part of the brain and other nervous centres, and are produced by purely physical causes; hence, if they prove anything at all, it is against the uniform course of things at Heaven, the morality of the soul equally with that of the body. If the spirit really survives the dissolution of the flesh — and this is conceded by those who maintain the theory in question — then it must continue to possess and exercise its faculties, or else drop into atrophy, in which it is tantamount to non-existence. A disembodied soul is difficult enough for us to apprehend in any supposition without this superadded notion of inanimation of thought. It is as nearly as possible analogous to a mere point, but this, if deemed of proper function is a sheer non-entity. Moreover, a restoration to consciousness by means and in consequence of a reunion with the body would be a recreation and a total destruction of the idea of identity. See RESURRECTION.

According to the testimony of Scripture is clear as to the continued exercise of all its essential powers by the soul after death. Whatever else the parable of Lazarus and Dives may or may not mean, it certainly includes this, and the frequent, nay customary, use of such expressions as "being with Christ," etc., must imply, at least, as much as this. That the penitent thief and the apostle Paul expected to fall into absolute unconsciousness is abhorrent to common-sense and opposed to the plain tenor of their language. There could be no joy in such an anticipation, and there can be no comfort to those who believe in such an unscriptural as it is irrational. See SOUL-LEEP.

2. The Disembodied Soul Causes to Hold its Present Relations to Earth and Senses.—This follows necessarily from the absence of the body, through which alone it maintains these relations. The supposition of the development or continuance of spiritual associations or some occult faculty by which it discerns outward objects, is a sheer fancy destitute of logical or scientific support. A great deal of vague phraseology and equally indefinite imaginings is often indulged in by Christians on this point. One of the best metaphysicians carried his speculations so far as to invent a whole new world of post-mundane wonders, and to people it with the creations of his fertile fancy. Sober theology should be wary of such extravagance. The figurative expressions of Scripture must not be pressed into the service of visionary conceptions. Nothing can be more certain than the total suspension of all communication with the external or physical universe by the disruption of the tie between the body and the spirit at death, and prior to its resurrection at the resurrection. How far a disembodied spirit may be able to hold intercourse with another is a pure matter of conjecture, upon which experience affords no information. That God, and perhaps angelic beings, have direct access to the mind in that state is a reasonable supposition, but it must be purely by internal and spiritual influences, which leave no trace of means or method upon the consciousness — as, in fact, they do not in the embodied state (John iii, 8). They can be detected only by their character and tendency (1 John iv, 1). The joys of the righteous and the misery of the wicked will doubtless be intensified by the absence of all disturbances and interferences from external occasions and will result chiefly, perhaps wholly, from the recollections and combinations of their former habits and associations of thought and feeling, just as in the state of final beatification or perdition they will be mainly due to similar causes. The soul will continue its usual state fixed by the present absence of the body, and its spiritual influences. Nor will it pursue the hallucinations of dreams, which are the effect of a suspension of the rational and perceptive faculties during sleep in a corporeal state, but will have the full consciousness of its position as to guilt or innocence, and from it clear apprehensions of a final award. A practical lesson, this, of the importance of cultivating those moral faculties and spiritual aspirations upon which the happiness of a rational and accountable creature must everlastingly depend! See INTERMEDIATE STATE.

 Dobell, John, an English hymnist, born in 1757, was a pious layman of moderate education, who died at Poole, Dorset, in May, 1840, leaving four volumes on Baptism (1807) and Humanity (1812), A New Selection of Hymns (Lond, 1812, 8vo, and later), containing several of his own.

Pictorial Bibles. The value and interest added to books of almost all sorts by graphic illustrations has not escaped the attention of editors of the Holy Scriptures. In the Middle Ages this was effected by illuminating copies by hand. See Illumination, Art of. Since the invention of printing and the discovery of engraving, a similar effect has been more cheaply produced by designs on wood, metal, or stone, either etched or in relief. The romantic scenes of Bible history have been so often reproduced in paint and pencil, and the realistic scenes of Bible lands are so rich in aspect and important elucidation of ancient customs and institutions, that a just idea of Oriental life and manners can hardly be conveyed without some such aid to the eye. Accordingly both fancy and fact have been put into requisition for this purpose, and multitudes of volumes have been expressly aimed at such a result. One of the earliest is the Poor Man's Bible. See Bible, Pauuperum. The most noted is that of Hans Holbein (q.v.). In modern times artists and authors have vied with each other, and publishers have been lavish in their efforts to enrich and beautify their pages, with pictorial additions, representing not only the realities of antiquarian research, but also the conceptions of creative genius. Much of this is of little real help to the student, and some of it has really misled readers by imaginary notions and false analogies. But a real gain has been effected by most of the delineations borrowed from books of travel and exploration. These have been also incorporated in a compact and convenient form in the best Bible dictionaries now so widely circulated. One of the most popular and really serviceable of all the pictorial Bibles is that edited by Rev. Dr. John Kimball (q.v.). More expensive and elaborate ones have been issued by several English and American houses, which are an ornament to the household and an heirloom to the family.

Pike, Gustave Dorsey, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Topfield, Mass., Aug. 6, 1831. Y., in 1841, after 1846 a missionary to the Chocow Indians, teacher and stated supply in various places, until his death, July 32, 1871. See Gene., Col. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1865, p. 112; Nevin, Presb. Encyclop. a. v.

Reading of the Bible. The regular and constant perusal of the Holy Scriptures is so delightful a privilege of Christians that it is spontaneously adopted by the converted heart, and the book has such a charm both for the young and the old, the scholar and the unlearned, as to be a perpetual theme of study for every intelligent mind. It is also enjoined as a religious duty, as well in the volume itself [Deut. vi. 7; John v. 39], as in the prescriptive rules of most ecclesiastical bodies. The public use of the Bible was practiced by the Jews and by the early Christians, and has been continued among all Protestant bodies. See Lessons. Special officers were detailed in the early Church for the more general diffusion of this work. See Reader. In the Roman Catholic Church, however, and to some extent in the Greek Church, the perusal of the Scriptures, in the vernacular, has been prohibited. See Bible, Use of, by the Laity. Much of the modern so-called
"Bible-reading" is rather a mode of sermouning, or a casual stringing together of disconnected texts on some fanciful principle.

Reding, Joseph, a pioneer Baptist minister, was born in Faulquier County, Va., about 1750. He was baptized in 1771; began to preach immediately; labored in the country in South Carolina and died in December, 1815. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclopedia, a v.

Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, an important religious association of the Church of England, founded in 1698, designed to support charity-schools in England and Wales, and to circulate annotated Bibles, tracts, and books, chiefly in the British dominions. It has published many valuable works of a popular religious character. It is distinct from, but somewhat akin with, the Religious Tract Society, which was instituted in 1799, and which has a wider field. It is supported by endowment, contributions, and sales, and has an annual income of about half a million dollars.

Sophia (Saint), Church (or Mosque) or, the most notable edifice in Constantinople, built by the emperor Constantine, A.D. 330, and so named in honor of the divine wisdom (Sophia). It was one of the first Christian churches permitted after the persecution by Diocletian. Thirteen years afterwards it was enlarged by Constantius, son of Constantine; was burned in 404, rebuilt in 415 by Theodosius II; burned a second time in 532, and in 588 was reconstructed from the foundation by Justinian, and dedicated on Christmas eve, 549. In 1453, when the Turks entered the city, the people gathered together in this church, but they were seized and massacred, the building being saved from destruction by Mohammed II, who conceived the idea of transforming it into a mosque. The whole aspect, both internally and externally, was entirely changed to accommodate the new worship; the pictures and mosaics were covered over, the altar rebuilt in the corner towards Mecca, a minaret was added at one corner, and the form of the church was changed to that of a crescent. Since then other buildings have been added to the original, a sacristy and baptistery being the most prominent. Among the sacred curiosities found in the crypt are, according to tradition, the block of red marble used as the cradle of our Saviour, the cup used by Mary in washing Jesus, both from Bethlehem; also the "sweating column," "shining stone," and "cold window," visited by Moslem pilgrims as miraculous. The original form of the church was that of a cross enclosed in a square, whose sides measure two hundred and forty-five feet; including the portico, two hundred and sixty-nine feet. Having been enlarged and rebuilt several times, the original form has been lost, and now the exterior of this edifice is singularly heavy. Unsightly and disproportionate in appearance, even the effect of its unusual dimensions is destroyed by its lack of symmetry, it presenting an irregular mass of cupolas, half-domes, shelving roofs, circular tablets. On the top of the cupola the verse "God is the light of the heavens and the earth" is illuminated during the festivals. Like all mosques the centre, so celebrated for its architectural beauty, looks low and flat, and from the outside produces nothing of the effect which was its purpose. The west side forms the entrance. The first vestibule was called in ancient times the narthex. The gallery for the women runs around three sides, supported by many magnificent columns borrowed from ancient buildings. The chief object of beauty is the dome, called the "spherical dome," on account of its exceeding light weight, consisting of pumice-stone bricks from Rhodes. It rises to the height of one hundred and eighty feet, resting on four massive arches. In the corners of this dome are four seraphim in mosaic, and on the arches can still be traced the sketches of madonnas and saints. Most of the ornamentation has been replaced by gigantic specimens of Turkish calligraphy, quotations from the Koran, on this is closed to Christian visitors except upon special firman, which may be easily obtained, at a small expense, through the interposition of the masters of the principal hotels.

Toby, Thomas W., D.D., a Baptist minister, was for several years a missionary to China, afterwards pastor in North Carolina, professor in various literary institutions, pastor at Union Springs, then at Camden, Ala., and finally principal of the Collegiate Institute at Eufala, among the Creek nation. He died at Lake
Weir, Fla., in February, 1885, aged sixty-five years.

Trench, Richard Chevrevix, D.D., a prelate of the Irish Church, was born in Ireland, Sept. 5, 1807.
He was educated at Harewood and at Trinity College, Cambridge, and took his degree in 1829. He was shortly afterwards ordained as curate to Hugh James Rose of Hadleigh. At this time Trench joined the High-Church party, without having the smallest leaning to Romanism. He had a tolerance for, though not intellectual sympathy with, the broad school. While holding a small incumbency in Hampshire, Trench became acquainted with the Rev. Dr. (afterwards bishop) Wilberforce, whose curate he became. In 1845 Wilberforce was made dean of Westminister, and Trench became rector of Itchenstake, a small village near Winchester, joining to his work there, as soon as Wilberforce became bishop, that of examining chaplain, and soon after that of theological professor at King's College. In 1856 Trench was made dean of Westminster, a position which he held to the end of 1863. On Jan.
1, 1864, he was consecrated archbishop of Dublin, and resigned his office in 1885, and died March 28, 1886.
As a writer, Trench is known beyond the confines of his own country. He was poet, philologist, and theologian. Of his many writings the best known are, On the Authorized Version of the New Testament (Naples, 1858) — Synonyma of the New Testament (8th ed. revised, Lond. 1875) — Exposition of the Sermon on the Mount, etc. (3d ed. 1865) — Studies in the Gospels (1870) — The Star of the Wise Men (1860) — Commentary on the Epistles to the Seven Churches in Asia, Rev.
14, 16, 17 (1884) — Notes on the Parables of Our Lord
(1871) — Notes on the Miracles of Our Lord (edd.) —
On the Lessons in Proverbs (1865) — Lectures on Mediceval Church History (1878) — Sermons Preached before the University of Cambridge (1886) — Sermons Preached in Westminster Abbey (1881) — The Hebrews Lectures.

journals, and several times was a member of the General Conference. See Alumni Record of Wesleyan University, 1888, p. 17, 654.

Wesleyan Methodist Connection of America. This society grew out of a separation from the Methodist Episcopal Church, on account of the connexion of that body with slavery, and the arbitrarily character of its government. The withdrawal of Rev. O. Scott, J. Horton, L. R. Sumner, J. Der-lee, and Lucius C. Matlack, in the latter part of 1842, and the establishment of a religious paper known as the True Wesleyan, are regarded as the commencement of the movement which led to the Wesleyan organization. A bill, signed by all of the above-named persons except L. C. Matlack, was issued in the True Wesleyan, and otherwise circulated, for a Wesleyan anti-slavery convention, to be held at Andover, Mass., commencing Feb. 1, 1843; and fifty-two delegates from Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Connecticut, and New Hampshire, responded to the call. In this convention a large number of resolutions were presented and adopted, setning forth the principles which had guided them in their separation from the mother church. Provisions were also made in this convention for another general central convention to be held in Utica, N. Y., May 31 following, for the purpose of effecting the permanent organization of the Wesleyan Methodist Connection. One hundred and fifty-three delegates responded to the last-named call, representing New York, Michigan, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New Hampshire, Ohio, Pennsyl-
avania, and Massachusetts.

At this latter convention a discipline was formulated,
and among the principles set forth for the government of the Church the following were some of the most prominent:
Opposition to slavery.
3. No fellowship with secret, oath-bound societies.
4. Plainness in apparel and manner of life.
5. Equal representation of ministers and laymen in the government of the Church.

Such early confessions were established, viz.: New England, Champaign, New York, Miami, Alleghany, and Michigan, and the youthful denomination started upon its heaven-appointed mission. The first general conference was held in Cleveland, O., commencing Oct. 2, 1823.

Like all other reformatory bodies, this society was born in the midst of the most bitter persecution; and, viewed from a human standpoint, under the most unfavorable circumstances. Their opposition to the institution of American slavery at a time when the masses of society had believed it to be right, as a matter of policy, opposed it, made them a target for all kinds of abuse, and the opportunity was not neglected by the people. A single illustration in this connection will be sufficient. On one occasion, while Rev. Luther Lee was speaking against slavery, he was treated to a solution of whiskey and lampblack, which was thrown upon him, and not only marred his personal appearance, but ruined his suit of clothes. He continued his address, however, and that meeting proved to be one of the best for the cause that was ever held.

The combination of the historian and the benefactor, the encouraging notwithstanding these unfavorable surroundings; and within ten years the membership in the various conferences aggregated more than ten thousand. They were not of the popular and aristocratic class, neither were they altogether poor and unlearned. Among the membership were men and women of remarkable intellectual ability, who were instrumental in the hands of God in building up and establishing the educational interests of the Connection, until they were not behind other denominations of equal size in this particular.

The history of the society, the propriety of establishing an institution of learning was urged upon the people, and efforts were made in this direction at Leoni, Jackson Co., Mich., and also at Wheaton, Ill., but the matter finally took a more definite form in the location of a denominational college at Adrian, Mich. The citizens of Adrian donated largely towards the enterprise with the understanding and agreement that, if within five years the Wesleyans should erect buildings and secure property, free from debt, amounting to $100,000, the school should become the property of the denomination, and to that end the sum was raised in the given time, and the terms having been complied with, an unquestionable title was secured. A competent faculty was placed in charge of the college, and astonishing success attended the enterprise from the beginning. Students flocked in from all parts of the country, and many were compelled to find rooms in private residences near the college, all of the desirable rooms in the two large buildings erected for that purpose being occupied.

After the war of the rebellion had closed and peace had been restored, the nation bore the heavy curse of human bondage, some of the leading men in the Connection, believing that the mission of the denomination was ended, conceived the idea of uniting all non-Episcopal Methodist churches into one body, and combined their efforts with others in effecting the proposed combination. A convention was held in the city of Cleveland, O., June 21, 1865, where committees were appointed and steps taken looking towards such a union of churches. Provisions were also made for another conference, which met in Cincinnati, May 9, 1866, and at this time the union was brought upon and the foundation laid. The expectations of the Wesleyan leaders were not met, however, from the fact that the denomination, as a whole, were not satisfied with the terms of the union, and also from their general disagreement with the proposition that the mission of their church was ended. When the reformatory principles adopted by the Wesleyans were presented for the consideration of the convention, they were entirely ignored, and secret societies were eulogized instead of being reproved. Finding that the union was not a success, most of the Wesleyan leaders in the movement withdrew and united with other religious communions, and a number of local churches followed their example. These may be properly termed the "dark days" of the Connection, and when the "smoke of battle" had cleared away, it was found that somewhat serious injuries had been sustained. Not the least of these was the transfer of Adrian College to the control of another denomination. In the midst of the exciting scenes connected with the union movement a majority of the trustees were prevailed upon to make the transfer, though not in harmony with the wishes, and without the consent of the denomination. Committees have been appointed by the General Conference to look after the legality of the transfer, and to consider the feasibility of taking legal steps for the recovery of the college. Notwithstanding the tidal wave of adversity that had swept over the Connection, those who remained true and strong by their "colors" were not disheartened. Other men as noble as the first—and of greater value to the Connection, because of the fact that they remained true to principles through the struggle that tried men's souls—succeeded in seeing the business through the breakers to the calm sea of renewed prosperity.

The troubles of the conflict only intensified the zeal of the tried and true, and the result was a general revival all through the Connection, and a healthful growth has been realized since that time both in membership and finances.

A large and commodious publishing house has been erected in the city of Syracuse, N. Y., which is the headquarters of the denomination, where the principal part of the business of the Connection is transacted. Rev. W. C. Kimball is the business manager, who not only has charge of the business transacted at the office, but visits the various annual conferences, and looks after the denominational interests in connection therewith. Rev. N. Wardner is editor of the Wesleyan Methodist, the official organ of the denomination, and of the Bible Standard, a monthly magazine devoted to the doctrine and experience of Scriptural holiness, both of which are published at the publishing house in Syracuse, and receive a liberal patronage from the people. He is also editor of The Children's Banner, and Good Words, pamphlets issued to sustain the way of truth.

The publishing interests of the Connection, including building, printing machinery, etc., are valued at about $50,000, to which additions are constantly made, and all is free from debt.

Two seminaries are now the property of the Connection, one located at Waseca, Dodge Co., Minn., with professor E. G. Paine as principal, and the other at Houghton, Alleghany Co., N. Y., with professor A. R. Dodd as principal. Both of these schools are in a prosperous condition, and an honor to the Connection.

Added to these is the Illinois Seminary, in connection with Wheaton College, Ill., under the care of Rev. L. N. Stratton, D.D., as president, where a goodly number of young men are in course of education each year for the Christian ministry.

There are at this date (September, 1896), twenty-one conferences in the denomination, aggregating about five hundred ministers and twenty thousand members. Officers of the General Conference are, president, Rev. N. Wardner, Syracuse, N. Y., and secretary, Rev. E. W. Bruce, of the same place, who are the joint authors of this article.

Westgate, George Lewis, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Fall River, Mass., April 12, 1844. He graduated from Wesleyan University, Conn., in 1865; studied two years in Union Theological Seminary, N. Y., and in 1867 joined the Providence Conference, in which and afterwards (1874) in the New York
East Conference he occupied important stations until his election, in 1880, as professor of social science in his alma mater, a position which he retained until his death, June 28, 1885. See Alumni Record of Wesleyan University, 1885, p. 212; Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1886, p. 65.

White, William Spottswood, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Hanover County, Va., July 30, 1800. He attended Hampden-Sidney College, studied theology under Dr. John H. Rice, and was licensed to preach in 1827; labored in Nottoway, Amelia, Lunenburg, and Dinwiddie counties, Va.; in 1828 became pastor at Roanoke, Va.; in 1829 was elected in 1834 agent of the American Tract Society, in 1836 principal of a female school, in 1848 pastor at Lexington, Va., and died there, Nov. 29, 1873. See Nevin, Presbyterian Encyclopedia, s. v.

He graduated from Columbia College in 1891, and from the General Theological Seminary in 1896; became rector of St. Paul's, Orange, in 1897, and continued there until his death, Sept. 3, 1888. He was president of the standing committee of his diocese for many years.

Williamson, Samuel D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in York District, S. C., June 12, 1796. He graduated from South Carolina College in 1818, and studied theology under Rev. Mr. Stevens, pastor at Providence in 1822, professor in Davidson College in 1840, his president from 1841 to 1854, and pastor at Washington and Columbus, Ark., from 1857 to 1876. He died March 12, 1882. See Nevin, Presbyterian Encyclopedia, s. v.

Wilson, John A., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at Washington, D. C., in 1810. He graduated from Kenyon College and Gambier Theological Seminary; was rector of Zion Church, Pontiac, Mich., from 1840 to 1847, and thereafter of St. Luke's Church, Ypsilanti, until 1882. He died May 7, 1885.

Wilson, John Glasgow, D.D., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Maury County, Tenn., in 1826. He was piously reared in the Presbyterian Church, graduated from Nashville University at the age of sixteen, and licensed to preach at twenty-four; served for twenty years as president of Huntsville Female College and Warren College, Ky.; in 1876 became pastor of St. John's Church, St. Louis; in 1880 president elder, and died Aug. 5, 1894. See Minutes of the Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1894, p. 142.

Wilson, Samuel B., D.D., a Presbyterian divine, was born in South Carolina about 1782, studied in the usual schools of the day, was pastor for thirty-seven years, and subsequently professor in the Union Theological Seminary of Virginia, at length emerging until his death, in August, 1869. See Nevin, Presbyterian Encyclopedia, s. v.

Wilson, Samuel Jennings, D.D., LL.D., an eminent Presbyterian minister and educator, was born near Washington, Pa., July 19, 1828. He graduated from Washington College in 1852, and from the Western Theological Seminary in 1856, was licensed to preach the same year, served two years as teacher in the seminary, in 1857 became professor there, and continued in office until his death, Aug. 17, 1883. See Nevin, Presbyterian Encyclopedia, s. v.

Winkler, Edward Theodore, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Savannah, Ga., Nov. 13, 1823. He graduated from Brown University in 1848, and studied theology under Dr. Albert G. Slichter; in 1845 was assistant editor of the Christian Quarterly, and supplied the pulpit at Columbus, Ga., for six months; in 1846 became pastor at Albany, and subsequently at Gallionville; in 1852 secretary of the Southern Baptist Publication Society; in 1854 pastor at Charleston, S. C.; in 1872 at Marion, in 1874 editor of the Alabama Baptist, and died Nov. 10, 1883. He wrote several denominational works. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclopedia, s. v.

Witherspoon, Andrew D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Leith, Scotland, May 16, 1808, and emigrated to America with his parents when nine years old. He was converted at sixteen, licensed to preach in 1822, and next year admitted into the Troy Conference, in which he held prominent appointments until his superannuation, in 1877, when he removed to Kansas, and died there, Feb. 9, 1885. He was a member of six general conferences. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1885, p. 35.

Worlds, Plurality of. The question whether other worlds than the earth are inhabited is one of great interest both to the student of nature and to the theologian. There are two classes of arguments that may be brought to bear upon its solution.

1. Probabilities from Analogy. From the fact that our own globe is populated, it has naturally been inferred that other stellar bodies are so likewise. Else why do they exist? Surely, it is contended, they cannot have been formed merely for the delectation of the comparatively few denizens of this relatively insignificant orb. But are we sure of that? If man be the only intelligent creature, it is inconsistent neither with reason nor with almost any reasonable view, that the whole visible creation was intended for his express benefit and behoof. Moreover, the presumption from analogy almost wholly breaks down if extended to its legitimate results in this question. If the other celestial spheres are inhabited, it is doubtless with rational and moral beings like ourselves, for mere accountable animals would be a sorry outcome of so vast creative power and skill. In that case they are free of will, and some of them, at least, have probably fallen, like men and angels. Has a Redeemer been provided for them also? It would seem not, from the silence of revelation on the subject, or rather from the implications of soteriology. It is hazardous to aver that Christ has died for other worlds than our own, or that he will ever do so. Here is apparently an incongruity which clogs the hypothesis of other planetary bodies being inhabited.

2. Evidence of Science. This is really a problem within the domain of physics, and should be decided by an appeal to known facts. These are neither few nor indistinct. The moon, which is our nearest and most familiar neighbor, is pronounced by the latest observers to be utterly uninhabitable. She has neither atmosphere nor water, at least not on the hemisphere which is constantly presented towards us. But she has enormously deep craters, which speak of fearful convulsions upon her surface, and her face appears to be entirely destitute of all possibilities of vegetation. In fact, an ordinary-sized farm, or even a considerable dwelling, had it existed there, would probably have been detected by the powerful telescopes which have scanned and even photographed the lunar landscape.

Turning now to Venus, our nearest fellow-planet, we find her not much more favorably situated. She has so wide a variation of temperature at different seasons of the year, owing to the great obliquity of her ecliptic, as must be fatal to all animal or vegetable existence. Mercury, the sole other planet within our orbit, is even worse off, being so near the sun that no life could possibly endure the terrific heat. Mars, our first outside neighbor, is circumstance no less favorable; but the close observation, for which he affords peculiar facilities, has failed to discover any positive indications of habitation or population; and his inhabitants, if they are members of our own planetary system, Jupiter and Saturn may perhaps have a temperature capable of supporting life, but the different colored moons of the former and the singular electric zone of the latter, besides their exceeded—Zschokke, Johann Heinrich Daniel, a German writer, was born at Magdeburg, March 22, 1771. He was erratic in his early youth, but studied at the University of Frankfort-on-the-Oder, and although proficient in philosophy, history, and mathematics, was refused a position as professor on account of his opposition to the government. Leaving Prussia, therefore, he travelled through Germany and France, and settled in Switzerland as a teacher, but the French revolution compelled him to take refuge at Aarau, where he played an active part in those times. He died there, Jan. 22, 1848. His later productions were chiefly poetical and historical, many of them novels. His best known is Stunden der Andacht (1806; twice transl. in English, Meditations on Death); but, as might be expected from his career, it is neither profound nor inspiring. His collected works were published at Aarau (1825, 40 vols. 8vo). See Hoefer, Novae Biog. Générale, s. v.
FURTHER ADDENDA

A. ABBOTT, AMOS, a Congregational minister, was born in Wilson, N. H., June 2, 1812. He was educated at Phillips Academy and Andover; was a missionary of the A. B. C. F. M. in Western India, 1854-47; city missionary at Manchester, N. H., 1859-51; Portsmouth, 1851-56; resident licentiate at Andover, 1855-57; again became a missionary to India in 1857-59; was without a charge at Nashua, N. H., in 1859-74; but graduated from the Philadelphia Homoeopathic College in 1871; was resident at Steele City, Neb., 1874, but practiced his profession and was also home missionary at Alexandria in 1876-77; at Fairfield, 1877-78; and the Otoe Reservation, 1878-79; and without charge at Ryd, on the Isle of Wight, from 1887 until his death, April 24, 1889. He was the author of an arithmetic that was used in the mission schools for forty years. He also wrote, Pilgrimages:—Cholera:—Index to the New Testament:—Logic:—Vicarious Punishment:—Diseases of Women:— and translated several works, among them a Natural Philosophy.

Aiken, Charles Augustus, a Presbyterian minister and educator, was born at Manchester, Vt., Oct. 30, 1827. After graduating at Dartmouth College in 1846, and Andover Theological Seminary in 1858, having spent some time in German studying, he was pastor of the Congregational Church at Yarmouth, Me., 1854-59; professor of Latin in Dartmouth College, 1859-66; in Princeton, 1866-69; president of Union College, 1869-71; professor of ethics and apologetics in Princeton Theological Seminary, 1871-82; professor of Oriental and Old-Testament literature at the same place, from 1882 until his death, Feb. 14, 1892. BEECHER, Henry Ward, an eminent Congregational minister, was born in Litchfield, Conn., June 24, 1815. Graduating from Amherst College in 1834, he then studied theology at Lane Seminary, of which his father was president; married in 1835 to Katherine K., daughter of Samuel Tilden as a Presbyterian minister in Lawence, Indiana. In 1839 he moved to Indianapolis, and in 1847 accepted the call to become pastor of Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, where he remained until he died, March 8, 1887. After 1859 his sermons were published weekly. During his theological course in 1831 he was editor of the Cincinnati Journal, a religious weekly. While pastor at Indianapolis he edited the Farmer and Gardener. He was one of the founders, and for twenty years an editorial contributor, of the N. Y. Independent. In the summer of 1874 Theodore Tilton, formerly his associate in the editorship of that journal, charged him with commercial commerce with Mrs. Tilton. A committee of the Plymouth Church reported the charges to be without foundation; but Mr. Tilton brought a suit against Mr. Beecher, placing his damages at $100,000. The trial lasted six months. The jury failed to agree—three standing for the plaintiff and none for the defendant. Mr. Beecher was prominent as a public speaker. In April, 1865, he delivered an address at Fort Sumter on the anniversary of its fall. In 1878 he was elected chaplain of the Thirtieth Regiment, N. Y. State Militia. He delivered the first three annual courses of lectures in the Yale Divinity School, "Lyman Beecher Lectureship." He was very prolific as a writer, and a list of his works will be found in Appleton's Cyclopaedia of American Biography. See also the Congregational Year-Book, 1886, p. 19.

McAII, Robert Whittaker, D.D., F.L.S., a Congregational minister, was born at Macclesfield, Cheshire, England, Dec. 1, 1821. He first studied at the University of Heidelberg, but afterwards turned his attention to theology, and became a pastor in 1847, in which relation he continued until 1871, when he went to Paris with his wife for the purpose of viewing the scenes of the Franco-Prussian war. While he was standing on a street corner and distributing tracts to the passers-by, a man stepped from the throng and said: "Sir, I perceive you are a clergyman; if any one like you is ready to come over here and teach us a gospel, not of superstition, priestcraft, and bondage, but of simplicity, liberty, and charity, where are you?" and added, "but I can't hear you with priests." Mr. McAII and his wife considered this a divine call, and accordingly rented a room in Belle- ville, and on Jan. 17, 1872, held the first meeting; twenty-eight were present. Mr. McAII could not speak French, and his French minister would say: "God bless you," and "I love you," and that won them. The work has grown from this humble beginning until, in 1889, there were 126 stations and 27 missionaries, employed not only in Paris, but in the provinces. The income of the mission is from private donations and legacies, and has amounted to $65,067. The Secretary of State has administered on a very economical plan, spending for the year $16,480 16s. 10d. Meetings to the number of 14,083 were held for adults, and 3820 for children. The aggregate attendance of adults was 319,925; of children, 235,927; 26,131 visits were made, and 500,007 Bibles, Testaments, tracts, etc., circulated. There is also a medical mission and two dispensaries. Each station has a small free lending library. Dr. McCaill died May 11, 1893. The work is now carried on by his widow. There is an office of the mission at Room 21, No. 1710 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia. See Bonar, White Fields of Foreign Missions (N.Y. 1875); Missionary Review of the World, Aug., Dec., 1889; July, 1890; (London) Cong. Year-book, 1890, 1894.

McAuley, "Jerry," an evangelist, was born in Ireland in 1839. His father came to this country to escape arrest. Jerry never received any schooling, and when nineteen years old was committed to Sing Sing state-prison for fifteen years on the charge of robbery. While there he was religiously impressed, but, after his parson in 1864, he returned to his old pursuits. In 1872 he found friends who stood by him, and in October of that year he opened his "Helping Hand for Men" on Water Street, New York city, which resulted in the conversion of many. In 1876 the old building was replaced by a new one, called "The McAuley Water Street Mission." In 1882, feeling that his work was done in that quarter of the city, he began a new mission in West Thirty-second Street, called the "CONEY ISLAND Mission." In June, 1888, he began the publication of Jerry McAuley's Newspaper, which is still published every other week. He died Sept. 18, 1884. See Jerry McAuley: His Life and Work, by R. M. Oftord (N.Y. 1885).
